Also, I do wonder why the DK would simply try and face this great alliance when he knows he would lose. And the other option is not just retreat into Serenity, but to strike at the alliance at other angles (Ashur) and with the help of his – very quiet so far – ally, Malicia.

Good moves! Also we don't know what bard's endgame and DK's counter-game are.

mammon

Enough on the awesomeness of this chapter and lawyering Kairos's words, can we return to the beginning? Does anyone get why Irritant would win by surrendering unconditionally? Knowing him it won't be a serious political thing, it will be Story-bound. But I don't see how one would turn around a war by losing another war.

I don't think it's the pattern of three, that wouldn't apply to Callow if it happens to another country or that he would trigger it at all if he plans to lose the first time around for that guaranteed victory third match.

And finite doom or being beaten shouldn't affect the war on Callow, he cannot be a cornered monster or a thought beaten Villain suddenly turning things around, when he does something like this. There's no actual Villain twist, plan or Story in it that I can see turning Creation against Callow's invasion. Anything that it could do, would require Ashur to mobilise and send in troops themselves, or do serious political bickering with Callow. Which are again, real politics rather than the Story that Irritant would be quoted for.

I don't get it. Does anyone else care to illuminate me?

Fayhem

Absent full political/historical context it's difficult to say with any certainty. But to give it the old college try, my impression is that it's less about "how one would turn around a war by losing another war" and more about escaping the consequences of losing a war; i.e., he isn't trying to turn the war around and start winning against Callow, he's trying to make it so Callow can't extract any meaningful/tangible gains from the fact that it's winning.

As for how that would work, I think the idea is to end the disadvantageous state of being in a losing war without having to surrender to your winning opponent (and directly adjacent nation) who is in a position to actually extract significant concessions. With regards to the story-fu factor that typically goes into Irritant's oddly successful ploys, I would assume it has something to do with "successfully turning back an invading army (bc let's be real, how else do Praesi wars with Callow ever start) and then bringing the hurt to them on their own turf" being a meaningfully different and much more advantageous story than “continuing to make war on an enemy who has technically surrendered already”.

If he surrendered to Callow in order to achieve the desired “technically surrendered already” condition they would have legitimately had grounds to refuse to accept his surrender unless it came with hefty concessions (reparations for war damages/expenses, etc.). If he surrenders to Ashur, even unconditionally, pretty much the max they can reasonably go for is some trade concessions, which incidentally would also help serve as a guarantee that trade with Ashur won’t stop.

So tl;dr is that it’s a weird ploy, but one that in the Guideverse especially is likely to be oddly successful. Classic Irritant.

mammon

I assumed something similar, but it sounded too much like a real political move. Nothing bound in cliches that we’ve already seen in stories from the real world, like ‘You cannot possible defeat all of us’ strenghtening a Hero.

If it would be a second army actually joining the Callowans with actual soldiers, like Procer showing up and turning a well-earned victory for Callow into certain defeat for Praes, I can see Irritant declaring the disaster averted. The moment Procer would do that, they’re inviting Praes’s next ritual to be a complete and un-Hero-interrupted success that turns around the war. Or for the story that props up Callow’s victory to be broken and evening the playing field.

But this seems like much too shallow a Story prompt to use, because it contains literally nothing. As Black has shown and Cat has said before, Stories aren’t completely unbeatable. A powerful enough Villain can still best a Hero with brute force even when the Story says otherwise, too many or untethered Story threads are snapped easily, and a Story doesn’t excuse stupidity or mistakes made. And this move by Irritant is too shallow to even sway a single sword swing, as it’s neither reactionary nor with Ashur being actually involved in the war if they’d be surrendered to immediately after finding out war was declared.

It’s just weird, I expected that I was overlooking some real-life story cliché.

Tohron

I think, since Ashur wouldn’t be in a position to hold major claims in the long term, they’d be more inclined to make claims they know the Praesi want to give like “5 years of ownership of all Praesi lands up to 20 miles from the Callowan border”. And then, Callow would be unable to move troops through there without first signing treaties with Ashur.

Walter

Before the surrender Callow is attacking Praes. After the surrender Callow is attacking Ashur, is my guess. Dude is hoping the Ashurans will defend their new possession.

Joe

Interesting. My bet is Malicia's still in concert w/ Keter. As the grand alliance push him north, the wights in the south become new troops for a surrounding play.

BarthHumphries

I have been thinking that the Tyrant is the envoy. But what if they got someone truly incredible to be the envoy, someone who would be wants more than anything else to see things settled lawfully?

What if the envoy is the White Knight?

matesbe

Can't be, ignoring the personality conflict, White Knight has not been staying with Kairos, let alone sheltered by him.

BarthHumphries

We don't know what happened with White Knight, because it seemed like the Prince put him on trial but we don't know the aftermath of that.

Mental Mouse

Not yet, we're still waiting on Kairos's trial of Hanno. The Prince didn't charge Hanno, she just no-sold his judgement.

Rey d`Tutto

Is the Dead King's envoy Malicia?

Walter

Interesting thought, we've never really seen her exert her Name, but I've always sort of understood it to be supremely Intrigue/Charm focused. She might be at her absolute best in an environment like these talks, wheeling/dealing with supernatural skill.

Shveiran

... And she would survive to open her mouth how?

If England and the US were negotiating during WW2, and Hitler showed up to say its piece, do you think he would have gotten away with it?

Mental Mouse

Yes. Remember, the full scope of his Final Solution didn't become clear until fairly late... for most of the war, Hitler was just another enemy head-of-state... who had considerable support among the American populace. Bluntly, America, was ready to sit out the war, right up until we were attacked directly! If the Japanese had been able to hold their water, we might well have stood by until the conquest of Europe was a done deal.

Abrakadabra

Well the japanese were baited to attack for exactly that reason. That is the only explanation if we look at the diplomatic talks before the attack.

Mental Mouse

And EE just handed us a Wednesday cliffhanger: This game needs three players. Who's about to fill that third seat?

Andrew Mitchell

Oooo, good question.

Maybe the Dead King's envoy? It could still work even if the envoy is a shard of the Dead King that's inside Tyrant. You know, one of those multiple personalities due to possession situations.

gnaruscat

I'm honestly not sure which dread emperor I love more, Irritant or Traitorous. I think that I'd read a spinoff based solely on either of them.

gnaruscat

Oh, and Kairos is sneaky. Teaching Cat a lesson on how to win a 3way battle so obviously (if you defeat either the Bard or DK, the other one will defeat you. So you play them off against each other), she completely missed the sneaky misleading truths and implications he fed her.

aran

Oh. Oh shit. Kairos IS the envoy, isn't he.

Abrakadabra

So Kairos is making undead sailors?

Chapter 81: Devotional

"To have faith is to believe there is a plan greater than your own. And so the dreadful crowned are faithless one and all, for what plans could ever be greater than our own?"

– Dread Emperor Reprobate the First

"As I recall, the game requires three people," I said. "I've only had half a cup, Kairos, it's too early to start seeing double."

Which was as pointed a cue as he could hope for before unveiling whatever nasty surprise he'd been keeping up his sleeve. The wretched little bastard grinned at me appreciatively, recognizing the extended hand for what it was. It was never pleasant to be forced to look in the eye the truth that I understood Kairos better than I did more people – and that it came naturally, without effort.

"I believe you're familiar with the man," the Tyrant of Helike mused. "He goes by Beiakim."

In Ashkaran, that'd be Be-Iakim, which translated to 'Child of Iakim'. The name was not unknown to me, for though it had been millennia late and in another realm I had attended King Iakim's burial. It'd been in that echo that I had first heard the word Intercessor spoken by the lips of the man that would become the Dead King: Prince Neshamah, at one time the most obscure of King Iakim's many children. That was on the nose, even by villain standards, but I couldn't say as much without acknowledging Masego and I had stolen knowledge of the long-dead tongue from Arcadian echoes. Along with others things. Hierophant had plundered the thoughts of still-mortal Neshamah but I'd seen//. Still, this was a rather clear indication of our coming guest's identity. Chittering gargoyles scattered as someone left the back of the shop to join us, some of them hurrying to bring forward a skull-adorned chair and place it to the side between myself and the Tyrant. The Dead King's puppet, for I much doubted this to be the true body of the King of Death, made no pretence of still living. Though dressed in long cloths of purple and silver – the colours of Keter's banner, as I recalled – it was a skeleton that I was looking upon. The bones were as polished ivory, much of them adorned with purple chalcedony and silver, and there was something lurking in the shadows of the empty eye sockets that was dreadfully vital.

"Catherine," the King of Death greeted me. "How pleasant to see you again."

"He is rarely so sweet to me, you know," Kairos complained. "Favoritism is a sin, Catherine."

"Might have something to do with all those betrayals you did," I noted.

I then cleared my throat, gaze turning to the Dead King. Wariness quickened my pulse, but I could not show weakness in this den of tigers. They would not strike at me with violence, not here and now. It would have been more reassuring if those two were not some of the finest masters of twisted words living and dead. The dead thing claimed the skull chair, leaving me to wonder if Kairos had ordered it made for this very occasion or if he'd campaigned across a third of Procer with a spare skull thorne stashed somewhere in Helike's baggage train.

"Beiakim, is it?" I said. "That's new. Surprised you didn't stick with the classics and go with Trismegistus."

"If I had, I would have been robbed of the pleasure of your pretended ignorance," Neshamah replied in Ashkaran.

"I don't speak that, you ought to know it by now," I replied without missing a beat.

"Dandelion mouse fishing," the Tyrant proudly added in Ashkaran.

More or less, anyway. He was accenting the wrong parts of the words and there were some syllables he was pronouncing in what I figured to be the tradertongue way which just... didn't work with Ashkaran. There was almost no commonality between the languages. He might have meant moue instead of mouse, now that I thought about it.

"Well said, Kairos," I agreed.

"I suppose that, bereft of anyone able to share my humour, Trismegistus will have to do," the Dead King said.

"King Trismegistus," the Tyrant mused. "It has a ring to it. Might I offer you refreshments, Your Highness?"

I eyed the clothed skeleton skeptically. It had no, well, throat. I assumed the fact that he could speak at all was the result of sorcery, maybe some sort of runic trick. Likely I was looking at a small sliver of the Dead King invested in a construct, not unlike the crows that Sve Noc has sent south with me – and which, physically speaking, had about as much business talking as a skeleton. I had to say I admired Kairos a little for the amount of sheer pointless pettiness it took to offer the Dead King drinks he couldn't drink. Say what you would about the Tyrant, but there was absolutely no one to which he would no offer at least one inconsequent slight.

"That will not be necessary, Tyrant," the Dead King said.

I willfully ignored the chittered disappointment of a few gargoyles, unwilling to entertain exactly what it was that Kairos Theodosian might have considered fitting refreshments for the Hidden Horror.

"Come to attend the peace conference, I take it?" I said.

"As I told you I would," Neshamah said. "I find I've lost taste for war, even in the defence of my ally."

Keter had made bargain with only the Tower – officially, anyway, I thought as I glanced at Kairos – which meant it was Dread Empress Malicia he was speaking of. Might have been more apt to call her a shield or an excuse than an ally, in my opinion, but it was true he'd not actually struck before being invited out of his lair by the Empress. I was not unaware that killing Malicia might actually forced him back into the Serenity, though actually achieving that would be difficult considering Ater would be murder to siege and against all odds the Empress still had a firm grip on most the Wasteland. Pulling away the kind of forces that would be required to take Praes from the Proceran fronts would almost certainly collapse them, which made the plan rather unattractive. It might still come to that, if everything went to shit, but it was not the first or finest arrow in anyone's quiver.

"It's more than a few corpses too late to be claiming a fondness for peace," I said.

"Mayhaps," the Dead King said, "it is a few corpses too early instead. It matters not: I am a patient man."

"How I love a pleasant evening with friends," the Tyrant enthused. "Yet I believe there was talk of indulging a foible of mine."

"Tower-raising, is it?" the Dead King said.

"Indeed," Kairos smiled. "'tis an interesting game, though I believe it would benefit from a greater number of competitors."

"Is there a single thing you don't believe that about?" I drily asked.

That actually surprised a laugh out of him, and it ripped out of his throat in too ungainly a manner – spit touched his lips, his side convulsed – to be entirely feigned. Though I wasn't all the inclined to play and the Dead King seemed largely indifferent, Kairos still adroitly pressed for us to indulge him. The rules were not all that complex, and I'd had vague memories of them. Each of the three of us would begin with a hidden amount of stones: either six, eight or ten. To win one of us must gather twenty stones, and those could be obtained both by taking from opponents as well as from the 'kingdom', a pile of fifteen stones all could see and take from. Acquiring stones had a tad more nuance to it, for taking from an opponent required the assent of the third while taking from the kingdom could be done without. One could destroy one's own stones, one at a time, also without assent. The game ended in common defeat should twenty full circles pass without anyone having raised their tower, as the kingdom being plundered 'rebelled'. The last detail was the 'pledges', bargain struck between opponents.

Anything could be agreed on, with the only forced detail being that a number of stones had to be 'pledged' as collateral by both sides. Should one of them then break the pledge, the stones would be obtained by the wounded party. The Tyrant covered the bowls with embroidered cloths after having a gargoyle move around the stones, and only then had them set on the table before us. I checked under mine, raising an eyebrow. Fortune had been a little too much on my side, these days: I began with six stones.

"As the most ancient king among us, I would invite honoured Trismegistus to begin," Kairos said.

The Dead King's eyeless gaze turned to me and I shrugged.

"If you're robbing him, I'll assent," I said.

The Tyrant of Helike pouted but handed over his stone, which the Hidden Horror deftly took and slid into the cloth-covered bowl before him.

"So Malicia twists the Thalassocracy's arm so it'll leave the Grand Alliance," I lightly said. "And now the two of you are here, thick as thieves. Now, if I were a suspicious sort, I'd suspect some sort of coalition was being assembled."

A counterweight to the Grand Alliance, in a way. The Dread Empire, the Kingdom of the Dead and the League of Free Cities bound by treaty. With that in mind, forcing Ashur on the fence made a great deal more sense. Malicia had been trying to make an alliance there for decades without successes, but the Thalassocracy lived and died on trade: when its ports were closed by blockade, it quite literally starved. It could not petition to re-enter the Grand Alliance the moment the wight fleet sailed away if doing so cost it closed ports across the entire League, the same of Praes and the displeasure of the Dead King. Trade with the League of Free Cities was Ashur's lifeblood, much more so than trade with Levant and Procer. Oh, I doubted the Thalassocracy would turn on the Alliance even then. But it would suddenly have a great interest in remaining neutral, one that'd be highly encouraged by how absurdly lucrative it would be for Ashuran trade to become the middleman between the two great alliances. This had Malicia's mark all over it, precise violence followed by the subtle chains of coin and politics.

Of course, there was one little detail in the way: such an alliance could not take place without the assent of the Hierarchy of the League, and I suspected Anaxares of Bellerophon would rather eat his own sandals than bargain with the likes of Malicia or the Dead King. Not for the Evil involved, but rather the crowns. Sisters bless that highly inconvenient madman. I stole a stone from Kairos as well, with the Dead King's amused assent.

"Catherine," the Tyrant said, "if you would-"

"No," I said.

The Dead King refused as well when Kairos's gaze moved to him. The Tyrant took from the kingdom, still pouting.

"There would be advantages to endorsing peace with such a coalition," the Dead King said. "I'd think such a gesture would sway all its members into signing your Accords."

And there was the bribe they wanted to throw my way. Even if Praes and the League came out as allied with Keter – which I still figured at least somewhat unlikely – the Grand Alliance might still try its luck. The League's armies were marching south and depending on Procer to ward off hunger, Praes dealing with the loss of two major cities, one of them lost to goblin rebellion that'd birthed the Confederacy of the Grey Eyries and now threatened the Wasteland's south. It'd be damned risky to push through with war in such a situation, but it was a gamble that might be made. It couldn't be made without me, though. I brought to the table the Firstborn as well as the Army of Callow and the Legions-in-Exile, and if war came out the eastern front would be my kingdom. In effect, if I refused to press through with war then the Grand Alliance had little choice but to accept peace. My pulse quickened with excitement. Not because the offer was one that pleased me, for it did not, but because of what it implied.

The drow were marching on the Kingdom of the Dead with the intent of seizing it as their home on the surface. If the Dead King had known as much, he would have realized that his offer was not so tempting after all – it involved selling down the river my own patron goddesses and the nation that was arguably my steadiest ally, while they were all carrying out a plan I'd been the one to suggest in the first place. No, if the Dead King knew then this was a botched offer. Which meant he'd not yet found the Firstborn marching towards him, and they might yet launch their assault from the north with the benefit of surprise.

"A meaningless gesture," I hedged. "You could forge the kind of doomsday artefacts forbidden by them in the Serenity by the dozens and without access we'd have no way of knowing."

Silently, I assented to the Hidden Horror once more stealing a stone from Kairos then in quick succession did the same.

"Inspection might be considered, should the inspectors not bear Names," the Dead King said.

"Catherine-

"No," I said without turning.

"No," the Dead King said, before Kairos could even ask.

The Tyrant took from the kingdom again.

"Gods," I muttered. "She really scares you, doesn't she?"

"You believe it is fear of the Intercessor that commands my interest in your Accords," the King of Death stated. "In a sense, you are not incorrect."

My brow rose. That was quite the admission, coming from the Hidden Horror himself.

"So long as the Liesse Accords stand, I have no need to war against Creation," the Dead King calmly said. "I lose nothing in observing such a peace, even on the terms of another."

An ivory finger pointed at Kairos questioningly and I absent-mindedly agreed. The Tyrant complained about the unfairness of being so brutally and repeatedly plundered, but neither of us lent much of an ear to it.

"No need," I repeated.

"What is it that you believe I gain from such ventures, Black Queen?" the Hidden Horror asked. "Wealth, bodies, fame?"

We both knew he had need of none. His wealth was beyond measure, he had a Hells' worth of human farms to harvest and the Dead King was the most storied being on Calernia bar none.

"You keep your story alive," I said. "And shape it in the cultures of those who live in your shadow. It's not about invasion, you know the risks in that. You were pruning Calernia so nothing that could strangle you would ever grow."

That was the conclusion I'd come to, after my latest chat with the Intercessor. The Wandering Bard might nakedly have tried to manipulate me, but she'd not necessarily been lying about everything. There was no denying it was unlikely to be a coincidence that the Principate had never had a Named ruler. Someone must have had a hand in that and given that the Intercessor worked best through Named she did not strike me as the obvious culprit there. The routine of tower-raising continued, Trismegistus assenting to another theft of Kairos and the both of us refusing the Tyrant's attempts to break out of encirclement.

"You miss the forest for the trees, Black Queen," the Dead King said. "Why is it that all that grows in this garden of Creation would so seek to destroy me?"

I frowned.

"You're saying you were warring on the Intercessor, not on Calernia," I said.

"I was denying tool to my opponent," the Hidden Horror said. "You would do this for me with your Accords. What need have I then of pursuing the matter further?"

I paused. Ghastly as what he was implying was it sounded terribly, well, believable. Neshamah as a mortal prince had already recognized the dangers in bearing a Name, for all the power they brought, and so carefully arranged his apotheosis through the work of years if not decades. He would not have forgotten those early lessons after touching the godhead, him least of all: undead did not change, at least no in the way that the living did. His only invasions had been under the shield of alliance or invitation, and it could not be denied that he'd been cautious about intervening on Creation. He'd been utterly monstrous when he did, but then it wasn't his soul I was putting on trial. That ship had long ago sunk at the bottom of a deep, black sea. It was the sense in what he said and horrified as I was to admit it rather fit. If he'd been using scorched earth tactics against the Intercessor instead of pursuing conquest of any sort, some pieces of the puzzle began to fit together. Cordelia Hasenbach had nearly gained a Name, hadn't she? Which meant the Principate had been growing into a nation where the ruler might be Named, which the Dead King would see as a direct threat.

Which explained him taking Malicia's offer over mine, among other things. He wasn't really interested in taking lands or helping the Tower: he wanted to thoroughly dismantle everything about the current Principate that might grow into a danger to him, and there was no world in which I would have allowed him that loose of a leash. The Dread Empress, though? So long as Praes and its breadbasket stood, she hardly cared about what happened to the rest of the continent. I'd been invited to Keter to bag two birds with a stone: the Dead King could have a look at the latest fool to touch the outmost edges of apotheosis and simultaneously use my presence as a way to finally secure Malicia's agreement after months of negotiations. Now, though, large parts of Calernia had come together in a coalition, which as a story was poison to him. War, even if he had the advantage in strictly military affairs, carried other risks if pursued.

On the other hand, signing the Liesse Accords meant that so long as he did not provoke the living realms he wouldn't be up to his neck in crusades anymore. What was curtailing a few of his worst habits in the face of that? Shit. It fit together well enough I couldn't be sure if this was true or an exquisite lie – the only kind the likes of the Dead King would deign to employ. The Firstborn might be able to find a home among the tall grasses of the Chain of Hunger, I thought. It'd certainly give the Mighty something to do other than killing each other. Another circle passed according to our habit, Kairos' stone slowly dwindling at our hands. No, I decided, that entire approach was mistaken. The Intercessor being an enemy did not mean her opponent was an ally, or indeed ceased being an opponent.

Leaving the Dead King to rule his realm and garden horrors in the Serenity was not the same thing as admitting that Stygia's slavery was not mine to curtail, or that Praesi blood magic would not end because I found the practice disgusting. On the other hand, was it really my place to make a decision that would see at least dozens of thousand die? No, even though I probably had the influence to force the outcome either way. It was something that Cordelia Hasenbach needed to be brought in on, and likely the Blood as well. Another circle passed, the Tyrant complaining at how dully uninspired our playing was. My eleven stones could not be in the lead, no matter who it was that'd begun at ten stones, but soon enough the rising threat would see the game beginning to have real conflict.

"This isn't a decision I can make in haste," I said, biting my lip.

It was a lie, I thought. Unless the rest of the Grand Alliance flinched, the decision was already made. And I remained skeptical that the League would fall on the side of this scheme, no matter what the Tyrant wanted. So long as the Hierarch lived it was unlikely and should he be slain I rather doubted Kairos Theodosian would be elected to the office instead, or anyone for that matter. Which would mean the end of unity between the city-states, every ruler able to bargain for their own people again. Malicia might have full coffers and the influence to sway some, but she wouldn't even get most the cities on her side. It'd turn into a quagmire that would effectively take the League out of the war, which was more than acceptable. That would leave Praes and Keter, and a fight that could be won.

"There is yet time," the Dead King said. "Consult your pawns if you must."

Another way around the table, leaving me at twelve stones – and Trismegistus at either fourteen or sixteen. One more, then, I'd assume he'd begun at ten.

"Lovely Catherine," Kairos tried.

"Flattering," I said, but shook my head.

The circle passed, and I now had thirteen stones in my bowl.

"Truce for seven turns," I offered the Tyrant. "Neither theft nor assent against either of us. I'll pledge six stones over it."

"Alas, I only have one stone," Kairos smiled.

I frowned, counting in my head, and that should mean he'd begun at eight stones. The Dead King was only three away from winning, then.

"What happens if you can't pay the full pledge?" I asked.

"One pays as much as one can," the Tyrant said.

"Offers stands, then," I said.

I glanced at the Dead King, whose gaze conveyed amusement and little else.

"Denied," Kairos grinned.

My brow rose. Interesting strategy. The moves continued in quick succession. I allowed Kairos to be robbed once more by the Dead King to turn up the pressure then myself took from the kingdom, as did the Tyrant. I reiterated essentially the same offer for fewer turns and a lesser pledge but was once more turned away. The Dead King took from the kingdom, bringing him to nineteen and I gazed at the Tyrant. Unless he wanted to throw the game, if I took from the kingdom he'd have to ask from my assent and take from the Dead King. It'd be better for me to take from the kingdom, there were only four stones left in it and they were the only way to gain stones without someone's assent. So I smiled back at Kairos, and from the kingdom's bounty rose up to fifteen stones in my own bowl.

"A pointless exercise," the Dead King suddenly said. "It is not a game that can be won save through the idiocy of another."

Hollow sockets gazed at Kairos.

"Should you require it for the settling of my boon I will continue until the end, but this can only lead to a common loss," the Hidden Horror said.

He wasn't wrong, I thought. Cannibalizing the rest of the kingdom with Trismegistus would bring me up to sixteen while he stayed stuck at eighteen, but after that Kairos would have no real incentive to do anything but assent to the Dead King and I robbing each other while he profited from the side. Our possessions would then slowly equalize until we all lost.

"I got all I bargained for, Trismegistus King," the Tyrant of Helike grinned. "The debt is settled in full."

"Then a pleasant evening to you both," the King of Death said, rising to his feet.

He did not bow, for haunted bones or not he was the Dead King, and left without further deigning to speak.

"Tell me a game of tower-raising isn't what you asked for in exchange for bringing him to Salia," I slowly said.

"That would be a lie," the Tyrant piously said. "Although I'll confess, this affair was not meant for my own benefit."

My eyes narrowed. Kairos Theodosian smiling took the last stone in his bowl and rolled it against his own palm, before tossing it behind him.

"You would have destroyed your last stone," I said.

"I have lived on no terms but my own," the Tyrant of Helike tranquilly replied. "And when the day comes, as it does for us all, it is on my terms I will perish. That is my nature, Catherine Foundling. That is the truth of me."

And with Hakram's game, he'd also tried to show me the nature of the Hidden Horror. Who'd not considered for a moment, I thought, that any of us could take any action in this save that which benefited us the most.

"He wouldn't keep to the Accords," I quietly said. "That's what you were trying to tell me. It's not in his nature to suffer his will to be leashed."

"Neither of them would tolerate your little orderly world, I don't think," the Tyrant mused. "And who could blame them? It's a dreadfully dull one you have painted. Yet for all your occasional snivelling self-righteousness, you've not been boring. And you've indulged me, so I shall return that favour with a boon of my own."

The odd-eyed boy leaned forward.

"Here is the first secret: angels cannot be seen by the Augur, save if they allow it," he said. "Neither can the Intercessor, the Dead King and yourself."

He smiled.

"Here is the second secret: one who has made treaties with the Queen of Callow will soon break them."

He grinned, red eye shining malevolently.

"Here is the third secret, and the last I offer this night: the Twilight Paths can lead to places not of Creation."

Kairos Theodosian dropped back into his cushioned seat, a grin like a knife still stretching his lips.

"Sweet dreams, Catherine Foundling."

Zggt

Well that's ominous.

Zarquon

What a beautiful chapter.

NerfContessa

Agree to bove posts above.

No is not of creation limited to hells and such, or 9THER worlds, I wonder.

And since it can't be the first prince, as she only just agreed, who will betray cat... Hmmmm...

The Gentlemen

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

You know the game, go vote!

Andrew Mitchell

We're 11 votes behind Ward! Go vote, people!!

darkness559

Blasphemy!

Aston Whiteman

If you keep demanding people to vote it get ignored after while.

We're here for EE Story... Not vote.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahaha. "...keep demanding..." you must be joking, right? It's been at least two months since I last asked anyone to vote.

Sir Giggles

It seems like the first two or three comments on every chapter are asking people to vote. It gets very tiresome. I'd rather see actual discussion, rather than the same thing on every chapter.

snowy

Someone does, and most care not who is the one doing.

Liliet

Would you vote if it wasn't asked for?

Does this request actually move you to rescind your vote out of contrary spite, or does it just fail to move you to do something you weren't going to do anyway?

Or does it actually succeed at providing you with a convenient way to do something you'd only do if it was made convenient for you?

If it's not that last one, you're not the target audience for this. Our loss. Lots of people are, though...

Barthumphries

And a typo thread.

there was absolutely no one to which he would no offer at least one inconsequent slight Change the second no to not Ok, people, go find the others. I promise, there are more. 😊

Mental Mouse

The sentence beginning ""Hierophant had plundered the thoughts of still-mortal Neshamah but I'd seen" is cut off by clearly-spurious slashes and line breaks.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Based on prior experience I'm pretty sure this is EE's way of conveying that a character's train of thought has been magically derailed; a similar effect cut off Brother Simon's attempt to describe Scribe's appearance to himself.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Upon reflection I'm pretty sure it was Cordelia's other spymaster, not Simon. But who it was isn't the important bit.

Mental Mouse

Good point. And in this case, it's clearly eliding the Bard's appearance in Neshamah's time.

Aston Whiteman

If you keep demanding people to vote it get ignored after while.

We're here for EE Story... Not vote.

ethericsentinel

For those of us who vote every week, it's helpful when someone posts the link. This is also standard for most web novels.

Why complain? You can just read the next comment thread.

Shequi

I swear to every god, above or below, that Kairos Theodosian would stab himself in the back if only his arm could bend that far.

byzantine279

Why do you assume he has not?

ChillyPepper

Twenty seven times.

Soma

Are the hells of creation?

excession638

I am taking this to mean she can invade Serenity.

konstantinvoncarstein

Or that the DK will be the one to break his bargain with Catherine and open a new front using the Twilight Ways.

caoimhinh

Nope, they count as another realm. Arcadia, the Hells and whatever is they call the place where Angels live (likely the Heavens) are realms not in Creation A.K.A the mortal realm.

Fun fact: The Hells are to the left of Creation, said by Wekesa in one of the Villanous Interludes.

ChillyPepper

I'm personally of opinion that she can reach that dark place she met the real Dead King at, and by the same line of thinking, Bard's.

Morgenstern

Hey, so with the Twilight Ways in existence, everyone can reach every place in- and outside of Creation? Fun. What kind of beings will battle for this kind of access, do you think...?

*mulling it all over

...and what did the Augur see that either Intercessor or DK – or both of them – wanted her to see (while keeping from her view other things)?

Morgenstern

Or is he, once again, just strewing doubt everywhere – for the sheer fun of it? Return to the Guide to see more! =D

sengachi

No they are not.

Thea

Nope, I believe invading the Serenity is an option... if Kairos was truthful there, and why shouldn't he in that situation.

Shveiran

This time he straight-out said things, so I don't think he COULD have lied.

Halinn

He can't say something he believes or knows untrue

P

That is true, but he's already problem he can design his statements such that the first, second, and third things you think are untrue. Naming how Mike for instance.

doominator10

That last line though really clicks it again for me how unnerved Cat must feel that she understands and relates(?) to the Tyrant better than anyone else. Hakram mentioned I think in book one or 2 how whenever Catherine gets the knife-smile, things are going to be absolutely fine no matter how dire the situation. What does absolutely fine look like for the Tyrant?

Also we've had a criminal lack of Hierarch and his pedantic ways. Also, it's voter's appreciation day (or was that yesterday?), so here: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> .

You know what to do.

Morgenstern

I wonder if the Hierarch will try to reach the Heavens via the Paths. ^^

NerfContessa

Or through violence.

^^

Shequi

So anyway, what is it that's missing between the 4th and 5th paragraphs? The format with the // is similar to how Louis de Sartrons memory goes when he can't describe Scribe in the recent "Interlude: Mirror" chapter, so there's obviously a section missing from what happened with Catherine there.

Sparsebeard

We can only hope it's her doing or that of the sisters... else, this bodes very badly for Cat's plans.

Anon

Did we ever find out what happened to the demon of absence back at the battle of camps? We know it probably killed a few heros but do we know if the heros successfully killed it?

konstantinvoncarstein

Catherine didn't mention the loss of a large chunk of Callow, so I suppose it was killed.

Someguy

No one remembers whether a large chunk of Callow disappeared so I suppose it no longer exists.

anon

I mean wasn't there some discussion before about how the number of seats for Procer in this book (back when Caramel Hazelnut was said to hold the majority of votes) are less than the number of provinces mentioned in the earlier books? Like 21 vs 24 or something I think? Granted it could just be that the DK wiped them off the map though.

Tom

I'm pretty sure EE confirmed that was a typo

mavant

Is that chunk definitely gone? I haven't seen a word-of-Errata about it.

edrey

it should be the Bard plan that the Dk found at Liesse but with a trigger so the intersesor who is always looking dont be alerted, that is the greatest game of the night

Sparsebeard

Thinking about it, I suspect it's in fact the real conversation between the three amigos hidden from prying ears... ready to be remembered at the right moment.

The subsequent conversation would then be nothing more than a ploy...

caoimhinh

What she saw in Keter: Neshamah's apotheosis.

I wonder if Sve Noc took that memory from Catherine. They are influencing her in more ways than simply reading her thoughts. Notice, for instance, that Catherine now swears in the Sisters' name.

Instances of Cat saying "Sisters bless me" "by the Sisters" "Sve Noc forbid" "Sisters damn it" and such variations have been appearing with more frequency in each chapter, both in her thoughts and a bit in her speech.

So I would suspect Sve Noc, rather than it being Catherine forcefully sealing her own memories. The other option is the Dead King being able to steal that knowledge from her, which is unlikely since Sve Noc is protecting Catherine; he seems capable of detecting knowledge related to him, though. He knew she has knowledge of Ashkaran from the beginning, and reading Neshamah's echo's mind was enough to have Masego possessed, so who knows.

medailyfun

I believe Bard's memory from the echo is anti memetic

JJR

Just need to remember. It's not a sphere.

Mental Mouse

Oh, that's an interesting point... I'd assumed it was a cut-and-lose error, but if Cat's memories have been edited...

Morgenstern

Marked like this? That's no error, it's author's marks for something having happened in world. We've seen it before 😊

Scribe and Intercessor, so far, if I remember correctly. But at this instance, I was actually wondering if the DK was there before his reveal, listening in, having access to things Cat thinks that very moment and snipping them away, despite goddesses' protection. It might just be the Intercessor being similar to Bard in that seeing her anyplace anywhen cannot be "transcribed"... who knows. We'll see ^^

Mental Mouse

Cat may need to arrange for a permanent mindshield...

Hellspirit

Yup

Javvies

...
So ... that's not exactly what anyone would call promising.

Hmmm. Someone who has made treaties with the Queen of Callow covers a lot of potential people.

Probably not the dwarves. Not the drow.

Queen of Callow isn't explicitly Cat, allowing for treaties that predate her.

Leading candidates are probably Tariq or a (rogue) Matron. I don't think Malicia ever made a treaty with Cat/Callow and I doubt shy of her predecessors ever did either.

Could maybe be the Deoraithe, going for independence, but that seems unlikely under the known circumstances.

Could maybe be the Fae, but keeping one's word is a big deal to them, but maybe they can consider Cat giving up Winter as becoming someone other than who they made a deal with.

The Twilight Paths can be used to invade Serenity, bypassing the gate in Keter. That's going to be hugely useful.

Kairos is hax and bullshit. How the hell does he learn this stuff.

erebus42

I'm sure with copious amounts of madness, corpses, and good old fashioned underhanded fuckery.

Sparsebeard

It could also be the DK himself, the truce was a deal made with the queen of Callow or callowan nobles for all we know...

Still, that's the kind of things I fully expect to be a twist out of the left field but foreshadowed. I mean, Tariq betraying his word would be almost as predictable as Kairos at this point...

Mengha

His eye of blood is a magic oracle that answers questions... which I'm pretty sure Cat would also describe as "hax and bullshit"

Novice

I disagree, I think the dwarves are the most probable. They could have just made a deal with the DK and gave him info about the Everdark being empty in exchange for maybe a truce or lands the DK previously held. After all, they don't really have as much incentive to siege Keter as the surface-dwellers. They have the entirety of the Everdark to play with right now.

Shveiran

It's possible, yet the DK is the only contender with the dwarves as real power on Calernia. They have no interest in sabotaging the war effort when it could lead to them having literally no contender for underground expansion. Any concession obtained this way could, realistically, be pried from cold dead hands (after they stopped moving).

Novice

To be fair, it's kinda hard to assume things from the dwarves since we know next to nothing about them aside from the leader of their expeditionary force. Everything about what's going on in their seat of government is pretty much opaque.

I'm basing my thoughts from the fact that the dwarves look down(heh) upon the surface. The people in power might be arrogant enough to think that the Kingdom Under can't rely upon the surface or that they themselves could pull one over the Dead King.

Again, this is all just speculation.

konstantinvoncarstein

In my opinion, if we combine the information about the treason and the Twilight Ways, the Tyrant is saying that the perpetrator of the former is Neshamah, who will be using the latter to open a new front.

Shveiran

It's true that "Queen of Callow" could refer to someone other than Cat, well spotted.

However, it is "one who has made treaties with", not "someone belonging to a side that made treaties with".

Considering that Callow has been under occupation for a long time and had a king as its last monarch pre-Conquest, I'd say the only entities that could count as having made a deal with a Queen of Callow not Catherine and still being around are the DK and the Bard.

Of the two, I think the Bard is the only one to not have made a deal with Cat beforehand?

You are right, don't get me wrong: I think this is the kind of "technical-truth" Kairos would abuse, I'm just saying this is a very narrow broadening of the possible subjects.

Javvies

Titles could arguably count as entities separate from their current holder.

As in, "the Duchess of Daoine", or "the Prince of Iserre". Similarly, it's possible that Names could be viewed in the same sort of light. Ie, "The Warlock", "the Black Knight", or "the Wizard of the West" could refer to a current or past bearer of that Name and arguably be covered.

Point is ... we just don't have anywhere near enough information to narrow down the potential candidates.

Shveiran

Possible, but in my opinion that feels unlikely.

To have the previous rulers or Callow as the true meaning of "Queen of Callow" is indirect but misleading only through implications.

To have "one who holds the same position as someone who previously made a deal with" to stand in for "one who made a deal with" is disingenuous, and untrue.

It's kind of like going "well, you'll notice that this here legal document was signed by Shveiran, but since I've been knighted I go by Sir Shveiran, and thus it's null and void: I owe you nothing". If you squint a lot, it can pass for technically true... but it's not. It doesn't hold water, and for all its stupidity the Pilgrim's curse had weight. You can easily go around it, but I expect skimming the line too closely would cost you.

konstantinvoncarstein

Neshamah made a deal with Catherine, the 3 months-truce

Insanenoodlyguy

That's the one thing we know will hold though. Interlude already said the truce holds up. It doesn't preclude the Dead King from doing some other sort of betrayal, but that one he's sticking to, if only for his own self interest as he doesn't want to hand this kind of "I Lied" as Ammo to somebody like Cat.

Decius

The dwarves made a deal with her as well.

Breaking a truce has narrative penalties that Neshamah would never accept.

Mental Mouse

How about the Elves of the Golden Bloom? IIRC they border Callow, and must have made treaty at some point.

Shveiran

I guess the Good King had a Name, so the elves wouldn't shoot him. Then again, making a deal with earthly powers? Filthy, human earthly powers?

I dunno, it's definitely possible, but I'm not seeing it.

Someguy

Probably not the Goblins though I'm not sure of that one since it was made by Viv in Cat's name.

Noldo

Does Tyrant himself have any active treaty with Cat at the moment? It would be just in character for Kairos to refer to himself in third person in such a context.

skovbenjamin

I feel like it could be a reference to Catherine only recently being recognized as queen of callow. During all of her previous negotiations she was treated with as the queen in callow.

I'm not sure what the implication of this could be but wanted to bring up this information

Sparsebeard

Well, it would seem that getting the DK to sign the accords wouldn't be such a boon in the end...

Still, they will probably be used by both sides as a distraction. Seeing that the real problem of the destructive forces all sides can bring to the others means that plotting is sure to be used to reduce the losses and try to ensure victory.

However, any dally-dallying means that there is a risk the isolated forces of the Empire Ever Dark are singled out by the DK and destroyed.

And yeah, I can't hate Tyrant, he's just having fun. Just keep him entertained until you're ready to end him Cat, if you make it interesting enough he'll probably walk to his doom willingly lol.

caoimhinh

Or if you make it look as if the other party is trying to manipulate Kairos' fate or free will. He took it deeply personal when the Skein was spooling back time and predicting the future.

Liliet

"Make it look like" is prone to backfiring. "Goad the other party into" sounds more like the thing that will probably work every time, assuming you succeed at it.

erebus42

Awww. I just realized that Catherine is probably the closest thing to a real friend the Tyrant has (and probably is capable of having). I meant he probably did all that at least partially to fuck with her, but still she's the only one who ever bothers to take the time and play with him. For someone who lives their life with the constant knowledge of it's imminent end that probably genuinely means a lot to him. Is he still likely to betray her? Absolutely. But of everyone else I think he probably hopes that - if not him- she'll be the one to end up on top.

Sparsebeard

Well, you can expect someone who put so much importance on having fun during his short stay on Calernia to get along with someone who is literally F.U.N.

Shikkarasu

I don't think Kairos cares who wins. He's a little blue/orange in that respect. He's been saying since he was 12 that it isn't the end that matters, nor how he's treated, it's how you play the game.

Kind uncle? Pitiful and pandering. Drunk Father? Useless and ineffective. Black Knight? Guilty of half-measures. Kairos juggles enemies to see how many and how long he can go because he's the only one insane enough to try and it's not like he'll live long enough to deal with the consequences. In return his name keeps his illness at bay, just long enough for him to finish digging his own grave.

In short, as long as Cat dances to her own tune and hates compromise she will be a kindred spirit. And as long as she fights him she's another enemy to juggle. It is a form of love. Twisted and unhealthy, but sincere and platonic. She is literally what gets him out of bed in the morning.

Shikkarasu

*nephew, not uncle. I am a dumb

edrey

Kairos is so nice. the first secret shouldn't be about the inability of the Augur but the Augur herself, the second could be Procer but Cordelia is not a fool, the Pilgrim won't risk millions, so it must be the Dwarfs telling the DK about the Drow, I see the bard hand here, the third could be the fae, the golden bloom, the hells or even the heavens. I bet is the DK attacking Salia and then blaming Malicia but who knows, well Kairos.

Andrew Mitchell

Called it. Specifically, that the Dead King's agent would be the third player.

But, more importantly, what do you all think about Karios' boon to Catherine?

And you've indulged me, so I shall return that favour with a boon of my own."

The odd-eyed boy leaned forward.

"Here is the first secret: angels cannot be seen by the Augur, save if they allow it," he said. "Neither can the Intercessor, the Dead King and yourself."

He smiled.

"Here is the second secret: one who has made treaties with the Queen of Callow will soon break them."

He grinned, red eye shining malevolently.

Three secrets; all reasonably direct statements that, as we know, cannot be untrue. That's quite a boon.

Who's going to break the treaties? The goblins? The dwarves? The Sisters? Levantines? Procer? Pilgrim?

What places outside creation? Hells, I assume so. Heaven, maybe. Arcadia, probably. Wherever the Wild Hunt have bugged off to. The Golden Bloom? (I think this last one has the most intriguing potential. Commenters here have talked about the possibility of getting the elves involved.)

caoimhinh

The third secret is no surprise, as the Twilight Paths are in themselves a realm from outside creation, they are a shard of Arcadia stolen then transformed by the sacrifice of a god. The premise of being able to travel outside Creation is exactly why they are useful, enabling people to save travel time. In fact, Cat and co. should already be grateful that Neshamah apparently can't use those roads to strike at them... yet.

I think the most important secret that Kairos shared is the second one, as it pertains to a breaking of treaties and thus would be something significant on a national scale. In the current state of affairs, that could create quite a mess.

A lot of candidates there:

The worst-case scenario would be Dead King breaking truce and attacking again, but then it would be pointless to do so why trying to sell a peace treaty.

The Dwarves backing off on their end of the bargain would be a huge hit, but it's also unlikely.

The Goblins betraying Callow is a possibility, but it also involves a huge risk for them. Who knows what has been happening in the East while the narration has been focused on the West? High Lady Abreha (whom the last time we knew of her was sending envoys to Callow) and the Goblin Federation hadn't been idle, that's for sure.

The first secret is, in fact, inaccurate. Maybe a piece of second-hand information (which would mean it is tinted by the pride of who made the statement). The Augur can see those beings of power and predict them, but it is risky for her and if she is found then they will strike at her through the vision. Yet as we learned in the recent interlude, Agnes has learned from those experiences and managed to find a way to see along the edges of their power.

P.S: The Golden Bloom is in Creation, it's the forest next to Daoine. The Elf settlement inside was teleported to Arcadia when this whole mess started, though, so reaching it wouldn't be too hard, but it would be a mess to even talk with them as they apparently kill anyone in sight. Which is kind of weird considering the Forever King tried to prevent Akua's Folly by sending two ancient and strong Elves to kill Akua (yet they were stopped by Bard) so maybe they aren't quite as evil as everyone thinks? Calernia's knowledge of the Drow was wrong due to lack of contact (even with some Drow living as mercenaries through Mercantis), so anything is possible.

Andrew Mitchell

> The Goblins betraying Callow is a possibility, but it also involves a huge risk for them. Who knows what has been happening in the East while the narration has been focused on the West? High Lady Abreha (whom the last time we knew of her was sending envoys to Callow) and the Goblin Federation hadn't been idle, that's for sure.

This seems to fit the current situation the best.

> P.S: The Golden Bloom is in Creation, it's the forest next to Daoine. The Elf settlement inside was teleported to Arcadia when this whole mess started, though, so reaching it wouldn't be too hard

I'm pretty certain the whole Golden Bloom is gone; as stated in this quote from <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/07/05/chapter-16-shambles/>

[“The Tower's used the emergency channels to inform everyone of general rank or higher that the Golden Bloom is phasing out of Creation,” Juniper told me.]

ChillyPepper

The most probable candidate is the Grey Pilgrim for me.
Patterns of three and all.

Andrew Mitchell

IIRC Cat's pattern of three with GP has been broken by Book 5 events. But you're still right that it could be GP; for example, the Bard could have talked him into not backing the Accords.

ChillyPepper

I meant the pattern of betrayal. He just made the second recently when he slowed down in helping Zeze so the pattern is still ongoing.

Shveiran

If that is the second, what do you count as the first? I don't think anything before Prince's graveyard matters, they were still enemies.

Insanenoodlyguy

He agreed to be a captive in Callow and then left. He even notes during the battle that this has ensured Cat will always have an edge against him, one of the reasons he had to try such extreme measures to have a real chance against her.

Shveiran

Mhm, I don't know. I think that's like mixing apples and oranges?

I mean, to have a pattern of three you need three somethings, right? So what do you count these as?

Although... Uh, you may be right now that I think about it.

He broke his word when he left, then again when he didn't do all he could to help Masego. It kind of works.

I still hope you are wrong, though. After all this time and effort...

Liliet

He was absolutely going to do all he could to help Masego, then followed the guidance of an ally in a split-second event that didnt have space for him to consider this ally's relationship with his other (situational) allies. He can be said to have been tricked into that as accurately as anything.

No betrayal was involved.

matesbe

That was not a deliberate betrayal. He delayed helping because he trusted that the Bard knew best in this matter. It was not an intentional slight against Masego. We literally see his PoV. He wasn't thinking about screwing over anyone, just that Bard was asking him to wait a second or two.

For all he knew, helping too early would just lead to the DK killing Masego outright, or maybe them being too closely linked together and killing the fragment would kill both.

ChillyPepper

It is a betrayal, and he knows it enough to not tell cat about it afterwards. His intentions are always well and good, it means nothing to the other side.

Mental Mouse

Or (and this is not a spoiler as of latest episodes) it might be that Masego's sorcery would have doomed him against the Dead King – either because it was contaminated, or simply because the DK is the ultimate sorcerer. Note that in any case, Masego has not been left powerless without it. Then too, it gave the easy-going researcher an actual grudge against DK.

goliath1303

Here's a shocker... Some people reading this chapter haven't read whatever chapter you're taking about! It does not matter if your referencing the next chapter or the last chapter of the whole story, if it comes after the one you're commenting on it's a spoiler. I honestly can't believe you actually think that you can claim sharing information from literally any distance farther into the story is not a spoiler. Especially with the justification of "It's been posted so it's not a spoiler." If it hasn't been posted it wouldn't exist so what exactly do you count as a spoiler? Damn...

Javvies

The Elves residing in the Golden Bloom are nominally Good, and the kind of things Diabolist was doing in Liesse are not the sort of thing anyone wants to have happening.

Even if you are a bunch of xenophobic racist genocidal assholes who will kill any non-Hero who gets too close to the Golden Bloom.

That said, I believe Akua was also working on getting information about/access to the source of power used by the Deoraithe to empower the Watch. Who are enemies of the Elves.

I'm pretty sure that there's statements from EE saying things to the effect that the Elves of the Golden Bloom really are as bad as people think they are.

Someguy

Which makes me wonder if Cat could barter/reward the passage into the Bloom with Daoine once they have enough firepower.

Javvies

Eh, assuming the Dead King gets beaten back, the Elves will return with the Golden Bloom to Creation, eventually.

And murdering the Elves and reclaiming the Bloom is on the racial to do list for the Deoraithe. Problem is, Elves are ridiculously OP.

On the other hand, most of Calernia isn't going to mind the Deoraithe killing the Elves, but neither are they likely to help, though I think that might be part of the deal they have with Callow. So I don't anticipate dealing with the Elves anytime soon, even discounting the probable losses the Dead King will inflict, then there's Malicia to deal with, probably Kairos and Hierarch, and we can't forget about Bard, unless the Deoraithe reclamation of the Golden Bloom happens in a sequel series.

laguz24

No, it's crashing the golden bloom into the serenity.

Ton

I really like this idea – instead of dumping a lake from Arcadia onto a crusade, dump a city full of elves onto the Serenity 😊

Crash

Completely unrelated but ever since it has been pointed to me that the Deoraithe could well be a representation of native people it has been shedding a new light on a lot of stuff through the story and it has just occurred to me that the empowering of the Watch through the spirits of ancestors is literally the whole concept of shamanism and power in the knowledge of the previous generation realized. The spirits have granted the Watch its power.

NerfGlaistigUaine

And this is why I love Kairos. He is a true Unfettered. He's super smart, chaotic and fun. This is a man who cares for nothing but the dance and until the very last step he moves to his own beat.

Erraticerrata, please, please, please make a Kairos-like character the protagonist of your next work. A true villain protagonist with no scruples, no greater good, just pure chaotic evil is one I would absolutely adore, especially one written with your skill.

Shveiran

It would be near-impossible to write a satisfying book that revolved around one such character: you experience the narrative world through the eyes of the protagonist, and if he cares about nothing but the dance, it means what he does has no weight in your eyes because even the dance impacts nothing. It doesn't come off as satisfying.

Here, Kairos works because he's at odds with the other characters, which allows you to feel he is playing with fire near an orphanage. On his own, it wouldn't really work.

nimelennar

You have successfully killed my hope for a Dread Emperor Irritant prequel story.

I hope you're happy.

Shveiran

I find the taste of your broken tears staves off the void of my dreamless nights. It helps some, thanks for asking.

NerfGlaistigUaine

No weight does not necessarily mean uninteresting although it does become harder to write. You can want a character to succeed without dramatic stakes, although again, it's hard to write well. However, there can be weight by showing the world around him, the other characters who care, the effort and suffering they go through crushed by the gleefully uncaring protagonist. It would create a character you both hate and love; hate b/c he pointlessly destroys all the hopes of the other characters you love and love b/c he's, well, Kairos.

I think it can be done and done well. And I think Erraticerrata can avoid the cardinal sin of making a great card-carrying too sympathetic when he doesn't need to be. It's why I couldn't get into the show Lucifer. He's the motherfucking devil who's supposed to be a magnificent bastard, why does he have so many scruples? Why does he care so much? Choose whether you want him to be a suave evil bastard acting for shits and giggles or a sympathetic misunderstood bad boy! Sorry for rant. Anyways, I don't think it's impossible and I think Erraticerrata can pull it off if he chooses to.

laguz24

He would be a total bore, like boba fett, there is only so much of backstabbing, betrayal, and I don't care what happens before it gets old and the minute it does he is over. He is fun to watch but not that fun to see the inside the head of.

matesbe

My question is, what does Catherine have in common with angels, the Dead King, and the Intercessor? It's easy to say that the Sisters' protection causes it, but the statement seems too specific for that.

SINISTAR

Keep in mind, the Dead King has suggested in the past that Cat is still on the path of Apotheosis, having cast aside a poor, cheap version(Winter) for another.

Sylwoos

It is the sister though, we already know this from the interlude.

matesbe

That doesn't line up though. Auger totally saw Cat in that interlude, it just was only for a moment before the sister's intervened. Maybe I'm nitpicking on wording, but it seems like something might have changed since.

Liliet

Don't get too hung up on exact wording. Kairos meant that Augur cannot watch her and get useful information beyond "protected by the Sisters". That is true, as of that interlude.

Mental Mouse

It's just confirmation that she really is up there with the high-rollers:

Catherine Foundling has fought demons directly, and bent angels to her will. She has cast aside a Name and a Fae throne, yet gained power beyond either. She signed on with Sve Noc as their representative and intermediary, but by the same token, they are also her mentors... and last time she had a mentor, she rose far beyond him.

The Dead King suggested that "renouncing" apotheosis was not so easy, and the Wandering Bard said that "because of who you are", Cat can call her anytime. The greatest of Heroes and Villains alike look on her works with varying combinations of respect, awe and fear.

Mortals say that Fate and Providence shape their lives, and must merely be endured, but Cat has taken them in hand, and made them tools and weapons for her purposes. And where most people live out stories, Cat writes them.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said!

WuseMajor

I mean, I'm pretty sure she has at least one deal going on with Kairos right now. If we're talking "sudden, inevitable betrayals" he's kind of the obvious suspect, especially since he's the one telling her about this.

Shveiran

Doesn't the // in the beginning remind you of Spool?

Morgenstern

Right. That, too. Intercessor and Scribe "deleting" ... memories ... of them as well, if I remember correctly.

Leventide

So will the series end with Cat invading the Heavens?

konstantinvoncarstein

I doubt it. Just one Choir is a pretty tough opponent, and we know there are at least 5 of them (Contrition, Judgement, Endurance, Mercy and Compassion). The power needed to destroy them is more than anything on Calernia could provide, and that story is those of an over ambitious mortal going against the Heavens.

Insanenoodlyguy

Agreed that on her own she can't possibly win that fight.

However, by then, Grand Marshall "Godkiller", "The indomitable", "Stab all the shiny fuckers" Abigail will be leading her armies. The only way to defeat her would be to catch her while she's asleep and keep stabbing and never stop till you have more blood on the outside then inside because you are not going to beat her on the field, any field.

konstantinvoncarstein

And the whole time, she would be trying to escape 😊

frolamiz

Very interesting!

Here is my theory: the ones who are about to break their treaties with the queen of Callow are the Dwarves. Because it would absolutely fuck with Cat plans, and would be relatively unexpected, since Dwarves keeping to their words is such a big trope.

It would probably come from dissensions among them, one faction that want to shank the Dead King and the other that want to remain cautious, and the cautious one win. Obviously with Nussy or the Bard manipulating things from the shadows. It would open many narrative avenues for an arc in the Dwarven kingdom.

The cautious faction that won would represent the conservative part of their society and its inertia, and the conflict to have them fulfill their oaths would help expand the story.

And lets be honest, the accords can live without the rats and elves because they don't do diplomacy, the giants are isolationists and have yet to recover from Triumphant, but without the signature of the Dwarves, the strongest mortal kingdom of Calernia, they become kind of pointless. And an arc in their kingdom would be a perfect excuse to sell the accords to them.

Of course, it has absolutely nothing to do with the fact that I want an arc focused on them. Really, I promise =)

Another interesting thing in this chapter is what happen during the game. The two "big" players that are focused on each other deny everything to the third "smaller" player and only stop doing so when one of them is about to win. It remind me a lot of Nussy and the Bard swatting Cat's attempts to make the accords as a side-thought while they are focused on each other.

NZPIEFACE

I don't think Tyrant can truly die anymore.

He can no longer tell lies.

He rewards entertainment with gifts of knowledge.

He's a fucking fairy.

mavant

He's too entertaining to die.

grzecho2222

Hero: There's nowhere left to run. Nowhere.

Kairos: Nowhere, my dear? Oh, now you don't really mean that.

Hero: Oh, but I do!

Kairos: Nonsense, child! If you'd lost all your faith, I couldn't be here, and here I am! Oh, come now. Dry those tears. You can't go to the ball looking like that.

Cinderella: The ball? Oh, but I'm not—

Kairos spreads butterfly wings.

Fairy Kairos: Of course you are. But we'll have to hurry, because even miracles take a little time.

Hero: Miracles?

Fairy Kairos: Uh-hmm. Watch. What in the world did I do with that magic scepter? I was sure I—Hero: Magic scepter?

Fairy Kairos: That's strange... I... I always—Hero: Anyway, you must be—

Fairy Godmother: Stopped? Of course not. Where is that scepter? I— Oh! I forgot. I put it away.

Sidekick: Look-a what he did!

Love Interest: Duh... duh... How'd he do it?

Fairy Kairos: Now... let's see. Hmm... I'd say the first thing you need is, um... a pumpkin.

Hero: A—a pumpkin?

Fairy Kairos: Uh-huh. Now, um... Now... the magic words. Uh... Oh... Ahem!

(Singing): Salaga doola menchicka boola

ninegardens

So....

I think Kairos might have just moved up the list of "Cats greatest Allies".

Like seriously, this guy is a frickin' magician:

"Hey, I'll invite the DK to the peace talks... but also go about explicitly reminding the other speakers as to exactly WHY they don't want him to sign... and the bastard won't suspect a thing."

He loves Cat. He loves that she GETS him, that she knows how to play the game, that she sets up his line, and understands his subtle jokes. Even if she doesn't laugh along, and even if she hates him for his past treachery, he likes her, and one can't help but suspect that when he eventually throws the game and annihilates himself (as he has just suggested he will eventually do), he will do it to the cost of Cat's enemies, not Cat.

Because he doesn't LIKE the Dead king. One can't help but suspect that Kairos views DK much the same way he viewed Amadeus- a terrible boring winning machine made of gears and misery. He might jump around for the Evuls, but based on this scene, you can't help but suspect that at the end of the day, DK is truly Tyrants enemy. And he WANTS Cat to beat him.

And what about Intecessor? Fate made flesh?

Well... If Bard is truly the monster she appears to be then she stands for all that Kairos despises. (If she is herself against the gods, their monster bound in chains, this may change slightly)...

But Cat.... Cat is another player in the game. Cat is an honoured adversay. Cat is his AUDIENCE, and no matter what happens, at the end of the day, I don't think he will be willing to damn her.

He'll probably betray her again (multiple times), and work against her purposes....

But I can't help but think that at the end of the day, he'll be offered one last chance to betray her and destroy all she has made.

And He'll refuse.

laguz24

He won't because she is fun and does the dance with him. Amadeus, Dead King, and especially Bard. They are the ones on top, the inevitable grinding machines of the way things have always gone and what he always hated, he literally got his name by pulling on the string of fate. Cat is still on the trek upward, not on the keep what you have plateau.

mammon

There is a pretty big thing that Cat seems to be overlooking about the counter-alliance. The Bloom is inhabited by infertile good-ish elves that live in nature or at least control weather and stuff, and their equally infertile and previously stagnant and isolated counterpart of the Drow recently changed massively.

This balance might have some mayor effects on the alliance being forged, especially considering DK would remember exactly what happened to the elves thanks to being around at the time. If creation balances them out, then the elves may join DK and Praes if Cat commits the Drow against them, and vice versa.

Especially if the Duke of Cloudless Noons (Which I'm still convinced must be out there somewhere, Cat couldn't get the Last Mantle of Winter without the Summer Queen being both enabled and obligated to create an equal but opposite action at the same time.) went to the Bloom and changed it up as well. Maybe with an equal but opposite reaction, in that he won and gained control of the Bloom by tyranny and Saint levels of unyielding stubbornness, at the same moment that Cat lost and gained control of the Drow by cooperation and understanding. Or some other Named emerging to change things up.

The moment the Drow changed this much by a Story being woven for Cat, which is definately the case with the dwarves mobilising exactly when she entered and stuff, the same must've happened with the elves in parallel manners. Cat might've been manipulated by Creation to go to the Underdark exactly because something was about to reach it's pivot in the Bloom.

Cat is considering the balance of Calernia, without assuming that Creation already has some counter-weight in place to not give her free reign.

matesbe

The Drow are not infertile, just relatively uninterested. Which is evolutionary speaking a bad thing (there's a reason why humans have sexual desire), but they totally can have children. They just usually don't.

Also, the only reason why Cat inherited all of Winter is because she was already of Winter before the rest of Winter decided to fuck off and become Fall. The Summer Queen almost certainly had not given a mortal a mantle of Summer before the joining between Summer and Winter, and after said joining she didn't have power over Summer to give someone such a mantle. I would be shocked if a Summer counterpart to Cat showed up.

The Elves join with the DK? Frankly I feel like they have a smaller chance of joining the DK than the rest of Calernia. They hate non-Elves, but have some respect for Heroes. The same cannot be said for Villains.

Mammon

I'm not 100% sure but still pretty sure that race-wide infertility was a side-effect of the rituals and immortality-gaining and their pre-Cat state of eternal self-decay. The events even stated that Cat finally found someone who had a kid once so that she finally knew whether she was looking at a woman to compare her to the rest, showing how utterly rare this event was. While many drow are so young that they don't remember the glory days, they're not new either.

Those post-apocalypse generations wouldn't have been affected by the rituals of their previous civilisation and/or over time they could have ended the whole shebang by paying off their debts of unborn child years of lifespan by sheer time passing. And thus this combined with what we've seen, suggests that there weren't any Drow generations past the pivot of She Noc's first step to godhood and turning the Everdark into their domain whole.

And when you look at how the fey work, that would most definately be a thing that would have to be done. Not after Summer and Winter married, but the moment before they did and when their balance still applied. Cat's reward as the last Duchess of Winter in Creation created a massive disbalance and a chance for a whole new Winter Court to come into being, so sheer balance at the time that she was given it would still dictate a balancing reaction by Fey rules. The two courts were now finally at peace, but with a seedling of their conflict sown to continue their eternal war. Just without their participation.

So when you ask me whether there should be a Duke of Summer created to balance out the Duchess of Winter created, then I'd say for this universe of course it has to be. A Villain like her without mirror Hero in case she beats the regular Heroes, Creation is too seasoned for that. A court of Winter that has no counter-balance at all, the fey would never operate like that. And a freaking Court of Twilight being created by the first of the Night by the death of Dusk and the rebirth of Dawn, without there being a newly formed lesser god and/or Court of Day? That's the kind of perfect Story balance that I find more illogical than a Duke of Summer not existing, in this universe operating by these rules.

And with the elves, they don't have to side with DK. They've just got to side against Cat for balance, and that's when the political concrete shoes called the Deoraithe come in. Callow's North will essentially ensure that Cat and the Bloom will have to be at opposite sides of the conflict, whether that means the Elves joining the counter-Alliance or joining against DK to prevent Cat deciding that there won't be war. Whatever Cat will decide, thanks to Deo the politics are already set that the elves will be forced by events and pivots to be opposing her. Remember, being a Good country doesn't immediately mean you side with the other Good all buddy buddy and cannot have alliances of convenience with Evil ones.

Liliet

> I'm not 100% sure but still pretty sure that race-wide infertility was a side-effect of the rituals and immortality-gaining and their pre-Cat state of eternal self-decay. The events even stated that Cat finally found someone who had a kid once so that she finally knew whether she was looking at a woman to compare her to the rest, showing how utterly rare this event was.

To narrow it down a bit for you: Catherine, who was not looking because she was busy conquering the place and this was only a passing curiosity, finally stumbled upon someone who she happened to know had just personally given birth to a child becoming one of her Peerage.

If nisi didn't regularly, if passionlessly, have children, such an event would be infinitesimally unlikely.

Mammon

It was never defined when she had a kid, it might've been from before Sve Noc ascension step 1. So when there was still fertility. And you know that Cat spends more of her off-screen time on that kind of nonsense than she should, right?

Kel the Seer

It would be very in character for Kairos's first secret to be wonderful misdirection. So, the Augur cannot see Cat or the DK directly, but only infer from their impact on Creation. But she can see Kairos just fine.

Which means that this whole game was a setup. The Augur, only seeing Kairos's side of the conversation, but knowing that the other two 'Major Villains' are there? Or maybe just Cat after her chat with the First Prince? How would she interpret this whole scene?

Would it focus on the game or the conversation, or some odd amalgamation of both? Would she see Cat and DK "allying" against the Tyrant as they all increase their wealth at the expense of a kingdom that cannot defend itself. That could easily be interpreted as the villain having secret alliance to divy up a weakened Procer. Especially in loght of Cat's recent admission that she went to Keter to do more than stymie Malicia's plans.

Liliet

> But she can see Kairos just fine.

When he isn't in their company.

It works like a cloud, shrouding them themselves and their works, including anyone in their immediate vicinity. The angels' effect is likely more targeted/localized, leaving their heroes visible at all times except when the angels are directly present. Which, by the way, implies to me that Agnes cannot predict results of Hanno's coin throws except the same way any mortal can try (Neshamah ain't getting laurels, for example).

Anyway, no, Agnes could not see this game, or the entire shrouding would be pointless by Catherine being as good as completely visible whenever she is surrounded by not-personally-shrouded mortals, which is most of the time.

NZPIEFACE

Intercessor showed up. I think. That's why she had a break in her thoughts.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

I feel like we are setting up for a big plot twist. Tyrant might end up being the hero and martyr of this arc which might explain why we keep saying we dunno what he wants, why he keeps getting badass screentime, why we are building some weird rapport with Cat.

ninegardens

See, personally I see him being a thorn in the side THIS arc... but in a way that screws over other players as well... and LATER he does something reckless and cool. Maybe not as a martyr as such... but... useful.

This arc feels like diplomacy, there isn't really anything to martry AGAINST it would seem.

aran

Hierophant had plundered the thoughts of still-mortal Neshamah but I'd seen/

Is the narrator losing her thread here because of some memetic thing where Catherine can't talk about what she saw, or is this an editing mistake?

aran

It's not stated, but I'm assuming she said that back in Ashkaran, right? Catherine has never missed the opportunity for some deadpan humor.

aran

Nesh is right, though, there doesn't seem to be any way to force a victory for yourself.

Going backwards, if you win, you had to start your turn with 19. That means you got to 19 on the last turn, and BOTH opponents didn't agree to let one of them take from you. Why wouldn't they?

Satan

Cat talking with the dead king reminds me of the long-distance chats between Cordelia and Cat, with her role reversed.

Yunamed

Is it possible that the twilight ways lead to more than just Arcadia, and maybe the afterlife for dead souls. The twilight ways representing the end of a journey of one's life.

Chapter 82: Delegations

"Trouble reveals either true friends or a corpse."

– Arlesite saying

I'd charged Vivienne with handling the ceremonies from our end and come out pleased with the arrangements.

Mostly for the swiftness of them, truth be told, as instead of squabbling with the Procerans and the rest over pre-eminence and etiquette she'd cut through the waste and agreed the Callowan delegation would be the fourth to enter the hall. After the Proceran one – save for the First Prince herself, who would be the last person to enter – and the other two current members of the Grand Alliance, Levant and Ashur. Out of the twenty delegates I'd brought a share of five had been set aside for Black, who'd brought in Scribe as one of them as well as two translators and an officer from the Legions-in-Exile. My people were a little more varied in nature, though it couldn't be denied that we were thin on the ground when it came to actual diplomats. The Empress and the High Seats would have trained diplomats, usually highborn, truthfully not unlike the way the Old Kingdom had usually sent powerful and trusted nobles to talks with foreigners. I'd had precious few aristocrats I could call on even before I'd crushed their overly ambitious faction in my court, though, and the few I had a modicum of trust for were already in military or administrative positions. I couldn't exactly pull away Grandmaster Talbot from his knights simply to bolster my delegation's prestige, not when he was so much more useful at the Hellhound's side.

The presence of Lady Vivienne Dartwick, heiress-designate to Callow and arguably these days my main diplomat, had never been in doubt. Neither had been Lord Adjutant's – who was one of the only two orcs in the room and so stood out not unlike a bull surrounded by lambs – or General Abigail's, as my respective right hand and the ranking commander of the forces I'd brought to Salia. The dark-haired general had discreetly downed half flask of brandy before we set out in what I took to be an attempt at fortifying her spirits, and ever since tired with admirable effort to attract the least attention possible even though her ceremonial armour clearly indicated her rank as one of the ten highest officers in the Army of Callow. I had two sapper officers with me chosen at Pickler's recommendation, one specialized in fortifications and the other in war engines, and beyond that mostly civilians. Scribes and translators from the personal staff Vivienne had brought across the Whitecaps, as well as the closest thing we had to a scholar of Proceran etiquette – Henrietta Morley, eldest daughter and heiress of Baroness Ainsley of Harrow. Vivienne had apparently set her to studying with the now-abdicated Prince Amadis to shore up what she'd been taught by tutors, the former Prince of Iserre apparently having been thoroughly amused he was being asked for etiquette lessons and not state secrets.

After us the Empire Ever Dark was to follow in, General Rumena having gathered a band of ten sigil-holders for prestige, accompanied by Ivah and three dzulu from the Losara because someone needed to take notes and few Mighty were all that likely to do so. Ivah had told me that the Losara Sigil's sworn duty of marking down the oaths made by sigil-holders had actually been drawing to its ranks Firstborn inclined towards scholarly pursuits. Though literacy was one of the more common Secrets, the Losara were beginning to stand out in that even dzulu were expected to know their full glyphs. Akua had once, after a few drinks, gotten into a heated debate with Indrani about whether the surprisingly high literacy rate of the Firstborn was because there had been more drow when the Night was formed and so literacy became more common along all lines when the population number reduced, or because it was one of the few things no one would bother to kill over and so a harmless skill to learn the old-fashioned way. I knew not the answers, and even the Sisters had given ambiguous reply, but whatever the truth of it I suspected the Firstborn could only benefit from the prominence of such knowledge deepening with every generation. Not that they'd ceased... acquiring through the old means. Of the ten sigil-holders, all familiar to me, all spoke Chantant and three Tolesian. One had even acquired Lunara from the Princes' Graveyard, which I was pretty sure Rumena had almost killed it for. Getting the drow to, uh, do that less often was admittedly something of a work in progress. I'd made sure to get oaths none of them would fight here, even against each other.

The delegation for the League of Free Cities would be the last to enter, and though I'd yet to see them with my own eyes Vivienne had made inquiries as to its composition. It was about what one would expect from an alliance as shaky as the League tended to be even when it had common enemies. The Tyrant and his favourite commander, General Basilia – who I'd met her once before, at Rochelant – were clearly the heart of it, but all cities seemed to have claimed seats as well. Basileus Leo Trakas of Nicae and his personal scribe, the two self-proclaimed Exarchs of Penthes, a senior member of the Secretariat with a lesser one carrying his ink and parchment, the Bellerophon's appointed general and his minder from the kanenas, one of the foremost Magisters of Stygia, Zoe Ixioni, and two preachers from Atalante. These last two had for some reason been made to carry a copy of the Book of All Things nailed to a plank and were seemingly deeply offended by it, though the other delegates seemed to find it most amusing. Like everyone else they'd brought translators aplenty, and even a few scribes for what I assumed would be their common records. There was no trace of the Hierarch, which was cause for both relief and renewed wariness.

The Jacks had found no sign of the Dead King among the delegation but that meant little. He was not the kind of monster that would be found unless he wished to be.

"Queen Catherine Foundling of Callow, First of Her Name, Protector of Daoine and high priestess of the Empire Ever Dark."

We'd not waited long before the painted gates barring the hall, for we'd been fetched only when the Dominion's delegation was already moving, but it'd been long enough for my thoughts to drift. As the gates swung open and the majordomo's voice ran, I was jolted back to full attention and stepped forward. The Cloak of Woe trailed behind me as I limped forward, leaning on my staff of yew. No plate for me today, not if I was to be seated for hours while talking, though the dark embroidered tunic that'd been chosen for me was discreetly padded. Enough it could blunt a knife, if one found its way into my ribs. Hakram knew me well. Belted across my body under my breasts and at belly height, the tunic was almost uncomfortably high-collared and came down to my hips, where I'd prevailed when demanding trousers and comfortable leather boots. I'd had a look at the effect of it in the mirror that morning, and though it made it rather plain I was... less than curvy, when matched with my cloak it also leant a certain severe martial look I rather liked. The crown on my brow was the same I had worn at my coronation: a thing of jagged iron that dug into my scalp, though since my crowning a single pitch-black piece of onyx had been set at the front of it.

A murmur passed through assembly as I entered, and though I'd hardly expected a tavern's common room to serve as our place of gathering I was still faintly surprised as the sheer size of it. The tea hall where I'd met with Hasenbach yesterday had been beautiful but not overdone, but this? You could fit a garrison in here, if you piled them up. I'd never seen ceilings so tall save at the cathedral in Laure, and the dome there was not bordered by sculpted gold depicting passages from the Book of All Things. The dome's surface was a superb painting of the founding of Procer, beginning at the collapse of the Tower and ending with the election of Clothor Merovins as First Prince. The hall itself was a broad circle touched by painted doors at an interval that was pleasing to the eye, as were the ornate golden arcs filled with the Merovins heraldry above the doors. The marble of the square pillars holding up the dome was bare, though polished, in what was clearly a conscious choice to allow the brown tone to stand out and contrast with the white and gold that was otherwise prominent. The floor beneath my feet, itself also pure marble, was of the same tone and so perfectly polished it could serve as a mirror. The circle shape of the hall had leant itself well to the arrangements, curved tables radiating out from the centre at increasingly longer length. There was a broad avenue between each set of tables, of which there was one for every delegation, which allowed servants and attendants to come and go with ease.

The announcements continued behind me as the rest of my delegation entered behind me, and I cast a look at those delegations already inside. That of the Dominion of Levant I recognized well, as I'd at one time or another fought most of them. Lord Yannu Marave of Alava, of the Champion's Blood, had been the leading Grand Alliance general for most of the Princes' Graveyard. Big man, muscled like an ox and with that unsettling calm that never seemed to thaw. Lady Itima Ifriqui of Vaccei, of the Brigand's Blood. Old but lean and whip-hard, before the Tenth Crusade she'd brutally raided Orense and nearly started a way with Procer. Juniper said she and her brood of sons were cunning as vipers and just as vicious, and she'd know: they'd fought running battles across half of the Principate. Lady Aquiline Osenia of Tartessos, of the Slayer's Blood, who sadly was not wearing the tight leather vest and paints she'd on last I saw her. Slender and graceful with coiled muscles, she was said to be a fine killer and a more than passingly skilled intriguer. Mighty Jindrich had sung her praises after the Graveyard, boasting in her stead of having killed it once and suggesting she be offered the opportunity to be slain in single combat and harvested so her Night could toughen up one of our weaker Mighty.

The last was the most familiar of old, Razin Tanja of the Binder's Blood. Heir to Malaga, though as I understood it Levantine inheritance laws meant he could not be lord of Malaga until he returned there to be acclaimed by his kin. It spoke well of his influence that he sat at the same table as the ruling lord and ladies, though, and the way his eyes and Aquiline Osen's kept finding each other and lingering told me there might be some 'diplomacy' going on there. He looked older, I thought. Still sharp-boned and handsome, but where before his eyes had been raw emotion now there was a colder fire in them. Purpose, I decided. It tempered people like nothing else, that cold blaze. That one had gone through crucibles, at Sarcella and the Graveyard, and perhaps become the better for it. I winked at him and he replied with a scowl. To my amusement, I saw as my gaze moved on that Tariq was not seated at the Dominion's foremost table. He was only at the second, making a show of his lack of formal authority, and Gods but he must have insisted to be seated there. I'd bet the Blood would have preferred him to be the sole person on the first rung and the rest of them where he now sat. I inclined my head in a polite greeting, and he did the same.

Ashur's delegation was a bare bones affair. To the left of the Proceran one, as the Dominion was to its right, it counted a mere ten men and women in saffron-coloured robes. The important one was an official from the committee the Thalassocracy had formed to oversee its presence in the Grand Alliance. Sitter Ahirom Senegart was a tanned young man of exquisite manners but whose role as the voice of the Ashuran bureaucracy on the continent had dipped into irrelevance with the annihilation of the greater part of Ashuran fleets at Thalassina followed by an immediate sucker punch of the League's own fleets. With the Thalassocracy's star being rather dependant on its supremacy at sea, his influence would have waned and these days he was unlikely to be anything more than an official mouthpiece for the decisions of Magon Hadast, the ruler of Ashur. I'd just finished studying the Ashurans as much as I could without being rude when the last of my delegations' announcements came: Lord Amadeus of Praes, the Carrion Lord. Attendants ushered us to our slice of the hall, which was to the side of the Dominion. Our foremost table remained light: myself, between Vivienne and Hakram, and to Adjutant's side sat Black. Behind my father the Praesi 'delegation' radiated out, as behind me the Callowan one did.

It felt like half the damned room was looking at me, so as a distraction I looked up the Procerans. Theirs was by far the largest presence – there must have been at least sixty people at their tables – and they were certainly heavy on royalty. Princess Rozala Malanza met my eye and returned my polite nod. I was surprised to see Louis Rohanon behind her, the former Prince of Creusens apparently serving as an aide. Brother Simon of the Holy Society I recognized from yesterday, but few of the other faces. I leaned forward Vivienne, who helpfully provided names to match.

"To Simon de Gorgeault's left, the man who looks like the dried up remains of a man?" she murmured into my ear. "That's Louis de Satrons, the head of the Circle of Thorns."

Cordelia's spies abroad, and from Black had told me by far the most competent of her spymasters. Considering one had been a traitor and the other missed a conspiracy that involved half the upper priesthood of Procer when that priesthood was his very area of expertise, that might not have been a difficult crown to claim. Louis de Sartons had beady and watchful eyes, I thought, made even more prominent by his almost skeletal thinness.

"Tanned man with the mustache, middle-aged?" she continued. "Prince Renato of Salamans. His brother Alvaro died fighting the Stygians down south. He's fresh to the throne but he's been his brother's man in Salia for years, he's one of Hasenbach's most loyal backers. Fought for her during the coup, too, so he's bound to be in favour. The blond with the well-cut beard is Prince Ariel of Arans – not a Hasenbach supporter but not an enemy either, and he came out more or less on her side when the blades went bare."

Prince Ariel of Arans's lands would also be playing host to both the Army of Callow and the Legions-in-Exile soon enough, which I imagined had informed his lack of support for the coup. The Proceran delegation's arraignment was actually slightly different from the rest. A small and luxurious table had been set most forward, presumably for the First Prince, yet there were two seats awaiting there. Slightly back and to the left the table with the spymasters stood, though once more an empty seat awaited at the table, and on a mirroring table to the right the two princes and Rozala were seated. From there the tables radiated as everyone else's delegations, though the missing seats rather drew my eye.

"I would have expected Princess Rozala to have that seat at Hasenbach's side, if anyone," Hakram murmured.

"Coup's still too fresh," Vivienne disagreed.

"It is the first official event with foreigners since the coup," Black softly agreed. "Malanza has to be clearly shown as subordinate. Sitting her with two known princely supporters of Cordelia Hasenbach adroitly addressed the issue without slighting anyone. Note that of the three Rozala Malanza is seated closest to the high table, an acknowledgement of influence."

The Firstborn delegation was announced before the conversation could continue, beginning with General Rumena of the Empire Ever Dark, the Tomb-Maker. I'd actually made a note of the proper titles for all the Mighty before passing it on to the Procerans, and I was pleased to see they'd actually observed the courtesies. Ivah was even addressed as Lord of Silent Steps, though like everyone's attendants the dzulu accompanying it went unnamed. They made waves, the drow. Their procession as they entered Salia had drawn eyes as well, but today they had come in their full ceremonial glory instead of their war-making clothes, and it could not be denied they were a sight. Grey skin and silver-blue eyes were half-covered by the colourful paint of sigils, from Rumena's ochre and gold to my Losara's purple and silver. They wore strips of obsidian and exquisitely woven clothes, all dripping with jewels and gold, and though perhaps on a human it would have been mocked as vulgar on the drow it made them look like the exotic princes of a distant land. I even caught a few eyes lingering, though anyone trying to talk a drow into a night on the sheets should be prepared for disappointment. Firstborn had little interest in such affairs, save for the lowest among them – and even then, only for a certain part of their lives.

The Tomb-Maker sat alone at the leading table, and none even thought to contest this.

"That leaves the League seated next to the Ashurans," Vivienne murmured, sounding amused. "Hasenbach has a sense of humour, it seems."

She was right about the seating, at least: only one slice of the circle remained free, between the Firstborn and Ashur's delegation. I was less certain it'd been meant humorously, however. It would bring a pressure to bear, the two colluding parties being side by side in their corner and bearing the weight of everyone else's disapproval. The Thalassocracy's envoys had no real say in the decision they were to announce, but this could be a passingly clever ploy if aimed at the League. The Tyrant was a fearless madman, true enough, but not all of the Free Cities boasted such spirit. Some would see the writing on the wall, and weigh whether following their madman Hierarch and madder Tyrant was truly worth antagonizing every other nation in this hall so deeply.

"I would not venture to give you orders, Carrion Lord," Adjutant said, sounding pained, "but perhaps it would be wiser to cease smiling so at the Pilgrim."

I turned to a glare at Black, whose apparent calm was marred by a vicious little twist of the lips.

"I was merely greeting an old acquaintance," Black said.

Tariq's lips were pressed thin, and though obviously my teacher was the one being a shit there I was still a little miffed that it took so little to provoke the Peregrine. It was like Black's presence here was an insult already and the slightest addition to it was enough to tip the vase. I incline my head in implicit apology and after a moment he accepted it.

"You going to taunt Hasenbach too?" I muttered under my breath, casting a dark look at him.

He shook his head.

"I've nothing but respect for the First Prince," he calmly said. "A thoroughly competent woman. Had our interests not been so completely at odds for the entirety of our careers, I might even have been personally fond of her."

I frowned at him.

"Didn't she try to have you taken from the Pilgrim and decapitated?" I asked.

"As I said," he smiled, "a thoroughly competent woman."

Maybe that shouldn't have surprised me, coming from the same man whose response to learning thousands of knights had slipped his watch in the south had been mourning the likely death of whoever had first come up with the plan to achieve that. The League's delegation was announced moments later and I trusted Vivienne and Hakram to memorize the names while I was seeing to more important business: namely, watching raptly what was intended for the Book of All Things nailed to a plank. The League's front table ended up rather crowded, as few were willing to surrender a seat there even if the room was limited, and to my utter delight one of the two Atalante delegates was forced to relinquish his seat to the book – the plank was propped up against the chair, the book lulling open lazily. Mere moments after the League settled into their seats, the majordomo struck the floor with his staff of office and the entire Proceran delegation rose to its feet. None of the Blood did, save for the Pilgrim, nor the League's rulers. The Firstborn did not stir, and among my tables Black and I stayed seated. Cordelia Hasenbach entered the hall from the door at the back of the Proceran tables and strode forward flanked on both sides.

One of the two was a woman, blonde and short-haired and wearing a rather loose dress. I knew her not by sight, but the similarities with Hasenbach's face and her own hinted at the answer. Agnes Hasenbach, the Augur, was cousin to the First Prince. As to the other, there was no need to wonder: the White Knight was familiar enough a sight. Well now, I'd wondered in what capacity he would attend. Hanno split off before the Hasenbach, coming to stand by the empty seat with the two spymasters, and Agnes Hasenbach was eased into the seat to the First Prince's left at the high table. Finally, Cordelia Hasenbach smiled at the assembly and elegantly sat. All who had risen followed seat, and a moment later the First Prince of Procer broke the silence.

"And so I declare this conference to have begun, under auspices of truce," the First Prince said.

The Tyrant, in the heartbeat that followed, clear his throat.

"Your Most Serene Highness, if I might be allowed to address the point?"

I met Cordelia Hasenbach's eyes from my side of the room and smiled a hard smile. All right, Hasenbach, I thought. Let's see what you and I can achieve, when we're on the same side.

Soronel Haetir

All right, Hasenbach, I thought. Let's go vote.

erebus42

Gotta love Black. "Oh I don't blame her for trying to cut my head off. It was definitely the right move. I probably would have tried to cut my head off too."

I know it's a bit of a tired and unoriginal thing to say but hey what the hell, let the games begin!

Liliet

Amadeus is a treasure at all times always, and I am so incredibly happy to have him here.

Even if he's being a shit to Tariq ;u;

Javvies

Eh, it's not like Tariq hasn't earned it.

Liliet

Has everyone else involved who might end up collateral damage if this bullshit escalates???

Javvies

Eh, if Tariq is dumb enough to escalate, he'll get cut off at the knees by Cat. And probably by Cordelia and the Procerans (using a plague on civilians didn't exactly endear him to them).

And Amadeus usually doesn't go for collateral damage. That's not to say he shys away from it, but he didn't seek it out, either.

So ... I'm not too worried.

Shveiran

I mean... yes, Amadeus is taking shots at Tariq and yes, it counterproductive and yes, he should probably stop.

On the other hand... if Tariq (or anyone else) still is a smile from having a fit over the people sitting in this conference, as if they were the only ones who had suffered... smiling as provocation really, really isn't the biggest problem to solve if this is going to work.

Shikkarasu

There is no 'if'; only Goblinfire. 3 full carts worth.

stevenneiman

He's taunting Tariq because he knows nothing will come of it. Tariq is mad that he's still here (and still alive, for that matter), but he also knows that if he starts a fight here it's going to go against his objectives (minimize suffering, maintain his ability to continue doing so), so he'll exercise his self-control and avoid doing anything more than scowling.

Shveiran

Well, yeah. The "problems" are that on Amadeus' side, it is petty and counterproductive, and on Tariq's he should really, really get down his high horse.

jamesc9

Unless Amadeus has some plan which requires Tariq unsettled, in which case there's a meta-problem, that he hasn't cleared it with Kat.

BarthHumphries

And make a typo thread:

The blond with the well-cut beard if Prince Ariel Change if to is

There are at least three more typos. Can you find them all?

SpeckofStardust

Game has began, now to keep score.

Hellspirit

The suspense

caoimhinh

I know, right? This image sums up all of us right now, hanging there, just waiting for next chapter...

Andrew Mitchell

The next TWO chapters. 😊 October starts tomorrow so we get an extra chapter on Wednesday.

Mental Mouse

I'm wondering if the extra will give us Cat's meeting with WK and WotW.

Andrew Mitchell

Seeing that from the White Knight's perspective would be A W E S O M E !!

Shveiran

Seconded. It would go a long way in clarifying Hanno's perspective on the current mess. And it could offer insights on the Seraphim, which we still know next to nothing about.

Liliet

OH MY GOD YOU ARE SO RIGHT

caoimhinh

Wouldn't this month's Extra Chapter be showing us the continuation of what it was showing last month's? It was called Winter I, so next extra is Winter II. I'm expecting it to be a bit more of the battles in the north and the interactions of the Heroes, then the revelation of what prompted Hanno to go south towards Salia (he was already on his way south when the truce started), and finally the reactions of the Heroes up north when the truce started.

Shveiran

It is certainly possible, though I don't think EE has always done the sequels to the extras in a row? I could be wrong though

magesbe

This chapter is in the interesting position of providing an enormous amount of information, and also would be able to be summed up in a couple paragraphs.

But doing that would make it much lesser. We get to see the movers and thinkers of each faction, and we're ready for debate.

Soronel Haetir

Something I was just thinking, it has been too long since there was an undead suicide goat. Though probably better not showing that one with the Dead King around, don't want to give him ideas after all.

SilverDargon

I wouldn't be surprised if the Dead King INVENTED the undead suicide goat. He's been around so long that he has to have tried almost everything. it's easily possible that he could have spent a decade or so just filling different corpses with explosives to see which ones worked best against different targets.

of course, this provides an even more amusing idea of him watching over a battlefield filled with nothing but zombie animals with a clipboard. On the other side sits an army.

"Hmm, the rats seem to not carry enough munitions to make a significant impact on anything more than cavalry." Jots down notes on clipboard

"Well, next up, send in the flying squirrels."

More_Dakka

Proper reanimation is a process ok

James, Mostly Harmless

It is when you send in Moose and Squirrel that you get the best effect!

Shikkarasu

Misread as invited, instead of invented. That was a good mental image. Dead King with a goat seated next to him, grinning for reasons no-one dares ask.

JJR

So Tyrant is going to try to get the Dead King into this conference then? I wonder if it would be best to just tell him no.

Or, maybe the Dead King's puppet is already there somehow? Tyrant is just confirming that there's not going to be any violence so that he can say "SURPRISE DEAD KING HERE!" and then the rest of the delegates can't get rid of him.

SpeckofStardust

eh Cat has promised to back one of Tyrants bids in this.

konstantin von carstein

I think that after so much treason from Kairos Catherine will take back her word.

Liliet

I think Catherine went back on THAT rather blatantly when her army allied with the Grand Alliance's against the League. She even informed Kairos that she lied and betrayed him explicitly back during the band of 5 negotiations. She's not doing an Akua again, bless her.

caoimhinh

Nope, Cat doesn't go back on her word. She does as she promised, selling Kairos out to the Dead King during the Princes' Graveyard was all the "betrayal" she did to him; she still backed up his petition, which was to have Hanno under trial, she is also supporting the League having a seat in the conference as was promised.

Remember their conversation in Kairos' tent right after the Princes' Graveyard:

"You made a deal with the Bard, while we were out there," I said, tone even.

"A greater game is in the works than you suspect," the Tyrant of Helike said. "She is no ally of mine."

"The rest I could stomach," I mildly said. "But the Bard? You burned a bridge with that. Still. There'll be a conference of the great powers and you'll have your seat."

"As was promised," he said.

"As was promised," I agreed.

I turned and began to limp out.

Nanobeaver

Would he really be the Tyrant if he wasn't the first to speak

Shequi

Jindrich singing Lady Aquiline's praises for having managed to kill it is so very very Jindrich.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Jindrich is best drow.

Insanenoodlyguy

Since we had a little time skip here, the most important question: where are Cat and Hanno at, romance wise? I'm going to guess at no less than 3 moments of heavy sexual tension, and Witch has cockblocked them with a sudden early return during the one that was most likely to result in them misplacing clothes.

WuseMajor

Hakram probably should have explained about the Book of All Things, though I suppose it's funnier this way.

ninegardens

So... anyone wondering what happened to Cat's evening chat with the White night?

Or was it less of a confirmed date, and more of a "I'll be here most nights, drop by if nothing comes up"?

konstantinvoncarstein

It probably happened off screen

medailyfun

nothing happened, she got her hands on the free wakeleaf and vale wine

Liliet

She probably went to see him after being done with Tyrant, and then they just kinda hung out and chatted about Proceran weirdness or something. Nothing worth showing onscreen, it'll probably be called back to if/when it comes up.

Mental Mouse

Maybe in the extra chapter....

Agent J

Here's hoping.

Surrealgoblin

I imagine conversation between wotw, wk and cat will be revealed after the missing chunk of the conversation with dk and tyrant. The plot by the dk and tyrant will be on the verge of shattering the alliance/winning the war, only for the contingency planned at the second meeting to win the day.

Or alternately, the conversation between the wotw and the wk will be revealed just before the missing chunk of the talk with dk and tyrant, when the heroes betrayal in favor of the bard almost causes the alliance to crumble/the war to be lost only for the contingency cat worked out with the villains and forced herself to forget about will

caoimhinh

Cool chapter. I was actually expecting this chapter to be Catherine's second meeting with Hanno, maybe warn him about what she knows of Kairos' plans.

We got confirmation that Night's ability to steal knowledge works on humans and those not sworn to Sve Noc, interesting. The Night is a really OP power, its potential is endless and has an extreme level of flexibility.

Catherine sure loves teasing Razin, and Amadeus taunting smile at Tariq is priceless.

Now the conference commences, I wonder if Agnes will be whispering augurs to Cordelia throughout the session, like warning her when one of the delegates says something or pushes a motion that could lead to a trap.

It would be interesting to see Augur facing Tyrant and Dead King's schemes.

I wonder if Cat passed on the information she got from Kairos to Cordelia and Hanno, because when the Dead King appears there, they could react unpredictably if taken by surprise. Catherine focused her eyes on the Book of All Things nailed to a plank, so maybe that's Neshamah in a hidden form and not the "delegate from Atalante" we saw during the Princes' Graveyard? Of course, he could also be simply camouflaging as one of the delegates, but the sheer irony of the Hidden Horror disguised as Calernia's Holy Book would be delightful.

Soronel Haetir

Sorry but while the image is amusing I just don't see DK stooping that low, his dignity requires more. Consider the form he took during the meeting with Cat, somewhat over-the-top even for an audience that might not dismiss him out of hand. I expect that to be the floor for his appearing before the Alliance.

sengachi

Hearing Rumena be called the Tomb-Maker never gets old.

Also, just like, there's no way Mighty Jindrich isn't here. Mighty Jindrich, who literally cannonballed into enemy lines, slaughtered its way through priests and casters and warriors, was only eventually killed by a heroic tale, and then casually got back up (despite the Grey Pilgrim largely negating its power!) to talk about how cool the person who killed it was. Mighty Jindrich, who is both Rumena's age and apparently didn't even think about sitting at that first table regardless.

Gods, Rumena is awesome.

frolamiz

I don't think Jindrich is as old as Rumena. If I recall correctly, at some point he commented that Jindrich was too young when the Drow empire fell, so he could not truly understand what was lost. On the other hand, Rumena was already old and well established back then.

Shveiran

True, yet I don't know how long the Empire had been under the influence of the Twilight Sages' ritual, at that point. How old was Rumena when the dwarves invaded back? Considering he claimed to be over 3 millennia old, if he was even 200 years old at the time the age difference between him and Jindrich is negligible.

sengachi

Jinrich was alive when the empire fell but too young to remember it, while Rumena was old enough to be getting on in years (or just adversely affected by the immortality backlash, I'm not sure). So technically Rumena is older than Jinrich, but they're also both had at least four thousand years old, so I think by this point they're basically the same age. In terms of total time they have had to acquire Night and power, they're definitely on an even playing field. Any advantage Rumena has over Jinrich is just a function of how badass Rumena is.

Javvies

Heh.

Haven't you figured out that Tariq is incredibly thin skinned and touchy, Cat? He's too used to the massive and automatic deference he's gotten for decades.

Do we know if Amadeus has told Cat about the theory he shared with Tariq?

I hope and expect that Cat has shared the news about Kairos and the Dead King's envoy/representative with others outside of her own people.

Novice

I think it's more like Black radiating smugness and superiority inside his thoughts so that Pilgrim will pick up on it with Behold. He's basically supernaturally trolling Pilgrim.

Shveiran

... I like this so much, I'll deny any evidence it is not canon to my death bed.

Tohron

I'm pretty sure she did share, since Catherine seemed to think that Ashur's placement next to the League was a maneuver by Cordelia to put pressure on them for wanting to back out of the Alliance.

NZPIEFACE

That fucking Book of All Things.

God damn it, the League is filled with retards.

Liliet

Can you... not be using that word? Cost you a like, and 🙄

Navi-Hank

Is he wrong though?

Liliet

Yes, because their delegation is not in fact predominated with developmentally disabled people? And if it were it'd be much more coherent, organized and sane to deal with than it is now? :3

sengachi

Yeah I'm seconding this, you can mock/criticize the League without using slurs.

konstantinvoncarstein

No, it is just the Tyrant trolling

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nice casual usage of a slur there, friendo. Real charming, I gotta say.

caoimhinh

The league is full of weirdos on a cultural level. Apparently each city took one thing and obsessed with it to the point of centering their civilization around it. And those that haven't been shown with such cultural behavior, have delegates that are apparently idiots (like the Exarch claimants from Penthes). So far the exception is Nicae, though they might be obsessed with ships, for all we know.

-Delos' Secretariat is thoroughly obsessed with bureaucracy, paperwork and written records to a religious degree. Everything in Delos must go through a lot of paperwork (which is not per se a bad thing, but it's their lust for paperwork that's insane).

-We don't know much of Penthes except that it's wealthy and that their government is currently paralyzed after there were 12 claimants for the title of Exarch (5 later on, and now only 2 survive, and what we have been shown of those two shows them more like quarreling children).

-Bellerophon is full of repeatedly-brainwashed people living in a stupid, ineffective, and fake democracy under the magical control of the kanenas, where knowledge of everything is highly restricted.

-Atalante is obsessed with debates of rhetoric and religion to the point that the only thing their delegates (some priests) did in the instances shown was talking about Good and Evil, and quote from the Book of All Things, which prompted Kairos to replace their delegate with a gargoyle that read a random passage every few minutes.

-Stygia is a city of sorcerous slavers that raise people like cattle (along with magical sterilization) to serve their upper chaste. To the point that they have a cycle where they murder their slave population above a certain age.

-Helike seems to do fine until a Tyrant arises, then they all go in a frenzy supporting their Named leader. As General Basilia said "it's under a Tyrant's banner that we shine the most"

-Nicae seems to be the most "normal" of the League's cities, or at least the one that has displayed the least excentricities in the mindset of their population. They are also the only other relevant naval power besides Ashur in Calernia, apparently.

That said, they have been bullied into submission by Kairos, so they have to put up with any trolling of his under the fear of being killed. Even when exposing themselves to public embarrassments, like right now, walking into an international conference doing such a ridiculous thing.

NZPIEFACE

I'm starting to feel real bad about Nicae. They're like... normal.

Shveiran

So far as we know.
Give them time, they are hanging with the right crowd.

caoimhinh

Nicae is the "Straight Man" and "Only Sane Man" in the crazy comedy that is the League of Free Cities right now, hahaha.

3nd3rn

I foresee another "All acodring to...", "Someone's plan" chapters. After all timeskips rarely happen like this, when important things are left out, and we have a load of players on the field.

Shveiran

I kind of hope so, it would mean a) more people talking about Cat, which is something that I enjoy way too much for my own good, and b) that Catherine has things under control with regards to the Tyrant's scheme, or at least mostly so. Interludes like these usually end with Cat pulling a trump card out of her ass, after all, and there is enough blank spots for EE to do so satisfactorily once more.

ninegardens

I want to see that, except with Catherine's plan SECOND to last (or maybe third), and someone like Black or Tyrant getting the last laugh.

Chapter 83: A Mould Unbroken

"Diplomacy is half lies and half courtesies, which is to say it is entirely lies."

– King Alistair Fairfax, the Fox

The Tyrant of Helike had seemingly decided to strike with his surprises hard and early, which I could appreciate. It'd save us time, since admittedly anything discussed before 'surprise, the Dead King is here!' was likely to fall by the wayside. I'd half-expected him to wait until we were halfway through a particularly complex discussion before dropping that into our laps, actually, since Kairos Theodosian was rarely one to avoid heaping insults upon injury. Murmurs spread through the room at the Tyrant daring to speak so boldly in the wake of the First Prince, though I'd seen to it that the people that mattered would already be in the know.

"Shut your cripple mouth and sit down, boy," Lady Itima of Vaccei snarled out. "It's a fucking outrage you even have a seat in this hall."

Hasenbach had implied to me that while Itima of the Brigand's Blood was – rather ironically, given the legendary hatred of her line for foreigners in general and Procerans in particular – her steadiest ally among the Blood she was also very much out to get the Tyrant's head on a plate for his actions during the adventure that birthed the Twilight Ways, as well as a handful of prior betrayals. The redeeming aspect of that was that unlike most Levantines the Lady of Vaccei was not insistent on having that head taken on a battlefield or by honour duel. A knife in the dark or poison in the cup would do just as well, for the Vengeful Brigand's brutal pragmatism in aging war against the Proceran occupation had trickled down to his descendants.

"The Dominion of Levant objects to this departure from the agreed-upon order of affairs," Lord Yannu Marave calmly translated in more polite terms.

"Look at the other two Blood," Vivienne murmured.

I followed her own gaze and found the faces of my old buddy Razin and Lady Aquiline utterly calm. I knew precious little about Aquiline Osen, but I'd watched Razin Tanja come apart at the seams in the shadow of Sarcella. I liked to think I had a good grasp on the man, and he was not all that skilled a liar or dissembler – if anything he a rawness to him I found almost refreshing compared to the practiced masks of near every other aristocrat I knew. He would have been embarrassed by Lady Itima's outburst, if it had come as a surprise to him. Which meant it wasn't. I let out a small noise of approval at Vivs for that, I might not have caught if not for her sharp gaze. She was getting to be a fair hand at these games, which boded well for the years to come.

Itima Ifriqui's flare of temper had been planned, it seemed, though I could only wonder as to why. Reinforcing the knowledge that Kairos was hated abroad to the rest of the League? It might even be a simple matter of herding him towards a particular response, though that would mean the true hand behind this was the First Prince. This was her preferred battlefield, not mine.

"Friends, allies, companions," the Tyrant of Helike enthusiastically said. "How could I dare to defy such ironclad law as the order of affairs? No, I speak now so that an oversight might be corrected."

"Get on with it, Tyrant," I called out. "There's only so long of you orating at your own navel I'm willing to suffer."

"Catherine," the odd-eyed villain cried, sending me a wounded look.

From the corner of my eye I saw Princess Rozala's lips twitch in suppressed amusement. It would have been impolitic to wink, I supposed, and besides I had a policy.

"And what oversight might that be, Lord Tyrant?" Cordelia Hasenbach calmly asked.

"Why, there are yet delegates to arrive and be seated," Kairos Theodosian grinned.

The First Prince of Procer elegantly extended her arm, palm up, and a dark-haired attendant offered her a small ceremonial baton of sculpted alder. Though carved from one piece, it'd been made to look like it was a bundle of small twigs tied together by a string. One twig for each principality, symbolizing that each twig alone was fragile but the bundle was stronger than the sum of its parts. It'd been a common imagery in Procer until the Liturgical Wars, during which it fell out of favour, and had been around long enough for a few verses back home to have been written about it. Even as Cordelia Hasenbach knocked the baton against the surface of her table I hummed the tune to Two Dozen Snakes A Knot Do Make, Vivienne at my side going rigid to avoid showing reaction.

"And though Billy King did step on them," Black quietly hummed, lips twitching, "they hardly even--"

Of course Black would know the words, I amusedly thought. He'd ruled Callow for twenty years and unless he'd done so without ever setting foot in a tavern he probably knew most the old songs.

"-nooooooited," I could not help but finish, swallowing a grin.

Vivienne had joined her voice to the sound as well, though discreetly. Even in a Legion haunt like the Rat's Nest they'd sung that regularly, legionaries being rather fond of the imagery of anyone stepping hard on the proverbial knot of snakes west of the Whitecaps.

"Your people do have a singular talent for putting mockery to a tune," the Carrion Lord fondly said.

Our shared mirth had not gone unnoticed by the rest of the hall, a few other delegates eyeing us curiously. It was rather pitiful that between three former Named not a single one of us could properly hold a tune but aside from that I claimed no regrets. Yet Black's uncharacteristic levity, I suspected, might just be the result of seeking diversions to distract from his worries about a matter I'd warned him of. While we whispered in our corner the First Prince had begun out first gambit of the day. At the knocking of the baton the attendants were set abuzz like a swarm of bees, the gates to the back of the League delegations' left and right opening. Down both avenues a small but beautiful desk was carried, and behind the desks a single seat each. Kairos's good eye narrowed for the fraction of a moment as he took in the second desk before his face eased into a delighted smile. It'd stayed long enough for me to catch his surprise, though.

Come now, Kairos, I thought. You might as well have told me outright. I know how Malicia works, there's no way she'd ever trust one of her lords to negotiate with the likes of you. Even if they were not treacherous and courting you support to overthrow her, they'd be always a step behind you in any talks. Which meant the old body-taking trick of Dread Emperor Nefarious would have been put to good use. It was a small leap from there to figuring out it was rather likely that Malicia's host body might have accompanied him in his campaign, or meant to be another surprise attendance at this conference – after all, Black's presence here meant that in principle the Dread Empire of Praes was allowed to attend. It'd been a risk to bring out the two desks from the start since this was speculation and not certainty, but the First Prince had argued we lost precious little from being wrong while inflicting sharper uncertainty should we be correct. I'd still been against it, but Cordelia's instincts had seemingly paid off if the Tyrant's surprise was not mere playacting.

Now he had to wonder how deeply we'd seen through him and if my alliance with the First Prince might not be closer knit than he'd assumed. The painted desks were set to the sides of the League's delegations, slightly behind their leading table. A subtle slight, that, implying inferior status. Cordelia was apparently not above venting her displeasure through small details, which I found rather endearing. It added a touch of humanity to the ice-cold and masterfully controlled princess I'd been treating with, a woman who'd use even her own grief and shame as tools to get her way without batting an eye.

"How very gracious of you, First Prince," the Tyrant laughed. "Without further ado, I then present-"

Black tensed. If I'd now known the man I might not have noticed, for he had not moved a hair, but his eyes gained an edge of razor-sharp attention that'd not been there before.

"His Majesty Trismegistus of Keter, the Dead King!"

It was almost amusing the way the older of the Atalante preachers went white as a sheet when the other one rose to his feet. Sorcery coursed down the body of the impostor in thick rivulets, revealing beneath an illusion the same skeletal puppet of polished ivory bones and long purple cloths I had met with last night. I'd been wondering if it'd be the same, or if he had another host form to ride hidden away somewhere in the city. The tall dead thing stood before the desk set out for him, and the room erupted in whispers. Some scribes even cried out in fear, as if they'd been told the Gods Below had come up to see to them personally. It was a different sort of fear they had for the Hidden Horror, here in Procer. Even in the south he was not so much a legend as a sword hanging above everyone's head: after decades of it not falling down you could tell yourself it never would, and even forget about it.

But every time you happened to look up, you were made to remember that safety was just the tale your parents told you as a child so you'd sleep well. Callow knew the Tower's shadow like its own breath and blood, but it could not be denied that the Principate knew the Crown of the Dead's almost as intimately.

It was not all fear, though. Lady Aquiline looked like she was itching to draw a blade, and her fellow Blood all had measuring stares. I glanced at the princes' table, and my respect for them rose a notch when I saw only cold disdain on those faces. The luxuriantly mustachioed Renato of Salamans took in the Dead King's clothes with a look that could only be called scornful, and Ariel of Arans leaned to the side and idly spoke to Princess Rozala in a low voice. As for Rozala Malanza, her dark eyes stared at the Dead King unblinkingly. The burning intensity of the hatred I saw in there gave me pause, for I'd seen hatreds great and small in my time and that one was neither shallow nor passing. As for the First Prince herself, her face was a cold and regal mask framed by golden curls, offering only icy loathing.

Parts of the League's delegation – Atalante, Nicae – were dismayed by the sudden revelation, but others largely indifferent. Delos and Bellerophon's delegates were respectively keeping notes and looking rather lost, while the Penthesians seemed more cautious than alarmed. Yet it was the Firstborn whose reaction had me savagely grinning. General Rumena, silver-blue eyes staring straight at the King of Death, clenched its fingers into a fist and struck against the table once.

"Prav ruvan," the Tomb-Maker said.

First claim, it meant. A statement, but also the beginning of something more. Mighty Jindrich laughed, the sound scything through the room filled with murmurs, and struck at its table as well.

"First claim," Jindrich also said. "For this I offer three spears of finest obsidian, and the Secret of Shells."

Mighty Soln jeered.

"Cheapskate. First claim," it said. "A finely made bureau of wood, and the Secrets of Shaping and Sight."

The only word of that not in Crepuscular was in Chantant, bureau, for the drow were wildly appreciative of the Proceran style of elaborate wooden desks and in deference to that appreciation had been very particular about using the 'proper' term for it. And so, as the rest of the hall handled the surprise of the Dead King's presence, the proud Mighty of the Empire Ever Dark held their bidding war over which of them would have the privilege to first attempt to kill the Dead King on the field and take his Night. The Tyrant cleared his throat, and I felt Black tense again.

"And, naturally, Her Imperial Majesty, Dread Empress Malicia of Praes!"

He sounded, I thought, like a merchant hawking wares at the market. Murmurs bloomed anew as one of the translators from the League rose to her feet. I noted with faint amusement that Malicia's host-body had chosen to be seated close to the aisle. I supposed the revelation would have lost some of its gravitas if she'd had to politely ask the other League translators to pull forward their chairs so she could stride out with the right sort of presence. The illusion laid there was rather simpler than the one that'd revealed the Dead King: a young Soninke woman was revealed, but one of broadly similar height and body shape as the feigned translator. Bright runes were visible, carved directly into the skin and looking halfway between mutilation and tattoos. The Empress' puppet made way to her pulpit with a fluid grace that was all Malicia, impressively conveyed halfway across the continent and to a body not all that like her own save in the dark tone of the skin.

Whatever amusement I'd savoured while pondering the practicalities of that theatrical reveal went up in smoke when I turned my gaze to Black. He was looking at Malicia's puppet with the naked desperation of a drowning man, eyes roaming her form almost obsessively. It took me a moment to understand why. My father was looking for a hint, any hint at all, that this might not truly be Dread Empress Malicia. That it could be a trick or some sort of fake. My fingers clenched as I watched him watch her stand before her desk and he was forced to admit there was no such thing. Something died in those pale green eyes, at that moment, and I realized Scribe had been right. Even now, even after the betrayals and the lies and the mistakes, he'd still intended on finding a way for the Empress to live. And when Amadeus of the Green Stretch grasped the truth, truly came to look in the eye, that he was about to be robbed that recourse? A light went out in his gaze that I suspected none still living could bring back.

Something flickered across his pale face, a weighing of choices, and then something like disgust. In the heartbeat that followed, he pushed back his chair and rose to his feet.

"Alaya," Amadeus said in Kharsum, voice only barely clinging to calm, "this is a very grave mistake."

Sigil-marked and burning with hollow fire, the puppet that Malicia rode turned empty eyes to Black. Considering, until she spoke.

"Unless oaths were sworn to the crown of Callow, the correct placement for the Empire's delegation is behind me," the Empress replied in Lower Miezan.

"This is madness," Black hissed, still in Kharsum. "Dark Days protocols and alliances with Keter will not take us through the storm, Alaya. I have secured other means, if you would simply let me-"

The eyes of nearly the entire hall were on the two of them. I wondered how many people could even speak Kharsum, here. It was not even all that common in Praes, much less Callow, and so I doubted even the Procerans had a translator for the main orc dialect. I hid a wince at my teacher's mistake a moment before he bit his tongue over it, but it was too late.

"Let you?" the Empress softly replied. "Am I then to hide in your shade like a child and let the rules of power to be decided in this ostentatious scrap heap of a city? I think not."

Something like a twitch of pain marred the puppet's face.

"Stand behind me," the Empress ordered, asked, pleaded. "The game can still be won, Amadeus. I yet know how."

I bit my tongue, knowing from experience that my stepping between those two ancient monsters had ever only earned the disapproval of both, and followed across the face of the green-eyed man the war between the Carrion Lord and Amadeus of the Green Stretch. One had followed and trusted Dread Empress Malicia for most of his life, murdered and sacrificed and bled to see the order they'd built together stand. Yet of the two that creatures was the one that'd turn on the Empress. Not easily, or without cause, but turn on her it would. If the gears turned and the verdict churned out was that victory demanded the blood of his dearest friend, the steel would be whet red once more.

The other, though, was that part of Black that had seen a barren wasteland of empire and wanted to mend it. That'd made a family of a young mage hunted by the most powerful practitioner in the empire, offered friendship to a woman whose curse had devoured her life and charmed the likes of the Ranger and the Assassin through the strange mixture of devotion and black-hearted ruthlessness. The same boy who'd struck a friendship with a tavern girl long before either of them ever saw the Tower's hulking shape on the horizon.

It was the part of him I loved, if not the one I'd taken lessons from. And I thought it might just be the part of him that, right now, was murmuring in the back of his mind about one last leap of faith. Murmuring that by abandoning Malicia now all the darkest fears – and Gods, how could she not fear when it'd been armies led by Black and loyal to him above all else that saw her rise to the throne? – would be confirmed by his own hesitation, his own weakness. Guilt and love and the chains of a loyalty that had been well-worn long before my birth. I was my father's daughter, and so this I understood.

As he'd no doubt understood, when for the heraldry of the noble house of Foundling I chose not some glorious beast or some fearsome weapon. I did not even choose to ape the dignity of the Fairfaxes and the Albans by stealing their arms so I might better suckle at the love they'd earned among my people. I'd chosen a silver balance, set on the stark bleak blackness of the man who'd taught me, and on it I'd weighed a crown and sword. Right and might. Principle and necessity.

The wants of the woman, as Akua had once told me, and the needs of the queen.

The thing was, that as much as we – Malicia, Black, myself – were pretending this was a war, it wasn't. It was the inexorable sound of a noose being pulled tight, the song of an arrow before it tore flesh. It was the march of the inevitable, because while I believed it was Amadeus of the Green Stretch that both the Empress and I cared for, that boy was just who he'd been born to be. The Carrion Lord, the Black Knight, the cold-eyed and steady-handed killer that broke armies and conquered nations? That was who he'd chosen to be. And so, inch by inch, the inevitable one. Those hungry, callous cogs of steel ground up the boy that'd been and the girl he'd loved.

And when the steel came free of the last parts with a wet squelch, the Carrion Lord breathed out shallowly.

"It was never a game, Alaya," he gently said. "It is a mould, and it will be broken."

They shared a long glance, in a hall where the great and powerful of an entire continent had gathered to speak and yet not a single whisper could be heard – only utter, oppressive silence. What he was going to say now, I'd predicted. I'd told Cordelia what he would say, what would drive him to it, with a degree of exactness that now chilled me. Dark hair flecked with grey, back straight as an arrow, the Carrion Lord turned to address the hall with eerie calm.

"I address now all who would lend ear, mighty of Calernia come to this hall," the green-eyed man said, in perfect Chantant.

Translators hurriedly whispered as he spoke, for those who did not speak the tongue.

"The so-called Dread Empress Malicia I hereby denounce as unfit to reign and having lost the favour of the Gods Below through carelessness and misrule," the Carrion Lord said. "I claim the Tower as Dread Emperor of Praes, and ask for the recognition of the delegates to speak in its name."

Sometimes, I thought, it was an ugly thing to be right.

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, which means extra chapter in the tab of the same name. Titled "Winter II" it's a continuation of the last extra chapter, from the POV of the White Knight,

Javvies

Long live the Emperor!

Kairos is really preemptively burning bridges by bringing the Dead King and Malicia.

Soronel Haetir

Kairos has nobody left as his friend anyway (not even DK or Malicia).

Insanenoodlyguy

He has Cat. He'll always have Cat (For a certain temporary and fatal value of always. Though I honestly believe if she's the one who sinks the blade in, or at least makes him bring the fortress down around him, he'll be smiling all the wider because it was her)

Nafram

It hurts to see Black declare war on Malicia, even though it was inevitable.

At least it's better than what it would be like for him to side with her and go to war with Cat

Nafram

Sorry, I intended to make a new comment, not reply

Oshi

This is his endgame. he's just playing out the what he had planned.

Soronel Haetir

Dayum!

Razorfloss razor

That had to hurt to say. He will be feeling this for years to come even if he hides it.

greatwyrmgold

Just one more death that will haunt him until the day he can die. But this is one he knows he could have prevented.

NerfContessa

True.

And he will likely be an amazing dread emperor.

Hmmm, emperor cognus?

Emperor necessitas?

Maybe emperor inevitable.

greatwyrmgold

Amadeus doesn't go for the flashy stuff. I think it would be hilarious if he went for Emperor Eques ("Knight," sort of) or Emperor Nigreos ("Black," obviously).

NerfContessa

Or it will be benevolent, as the fav fan theory goes.

Even at rereading it, nothing of its impact was lost.

Shequi

Ahhh, the claimant becomes manifest.

And to think, the attendance of the Dead King isn't the most important thing at this meeting...

IDKWhoitis

It seems like most major players had seen it as a given. The Praesi Civil War, less so.

Insanenoodlyguy

Uncivil wars aren't done yet!

IDKWhoitis

Benevolent? Is that you? Oh we've wanted to meet you for a long, long time.

Big Brother

Dread Emperor Practical the First.

Captain Amazing

Terribilis the third.

KageLupus

Please. Black would never take another Dread Emperor's name. Why would he tie himself to any of their legacies when he thinks them all foolish?

Nothing breaks the Praesi mould more Benevolence.

Insanenoodlyguy

Dread Emperor Poopypants.

jack

There's already a -Dread Emperor Benevolent the First, at least.

Benevolence isn't much different.
Dread Emperor Utilitarian. maybe? Practical?

ThatOneGuy

There's a longstanding theory that Amadeus will be the one to become Benevolent the First.

WuseMajor

I mean, when you look at the quotes from him, it's a pretty credible theory.

"Morality is a force, not a law. Deviating from it has costs and benefits both – a ruler should weigh those when making a decision, and ignore the delusion of any position being inherently superior."

–

"There's no surer sign you're being played than being certain you've grasped your opponent's intent."

–

"Please, do keep digging your own grave. I look forward to your splendidly inevitable demise."

–Dread Emperor Benevolent the First

Those all really do sound like Amadeus.

And, as long as I'm quoting, have this one that Malicia has apparently forgotten:

"It is impossible for the Empire to make an appreciable gain so long as this gain is a loss to every other nation on Calernia. To remedy this, we must discard the traditional lines of allying only to Evil polities and make it so that it is in the interest of other powers for us to rise."

–Extract from 'The Death of the Age of Wonders', a treatise by Dread Empress Malicia

Given that she's resorting to classically Evil Schemes now, instead of trying to get into the back room and do some horse trading with these people, it really seems like she's forgotten the book she wrote and why she's been successful this whole time.

When you get the role of Villain in the story, your end becomes certain.

Liliet

It's not credible because 1) these don't sound anything like Amadeus actually acts and thinks, 2) you sure did omit the High Lords one, huh.

Oh, and Benevolent is worldbuilding that would damn suck for erratic to go back on now.

Liliet

There's also a longstanding theory that Bard is time-traveling Catherine from the future.

It has about the same amount of credibility.

JJR

To really break the mold he could go for something like Dread Emperor Ultimate The Last.

NerfContessa

Hahahahaa....

Cap'n Smurfy

Say what you will about Tyrants diplomatic strategies, you kind of have to admire the man who does the social equivalent of saying "Hey guys I invited literally Satan to the peace conference, hope that's cool. Oh and Hitler's here too."

weakman54

More like, "Oh, and your ex, which you still have complicated feelings for, Hitler, as well"

Pilberyy Toeby

Kairos appears to belong to the "explode your bridges rather than burn them" school of diplomacy.

Liliet

He is a GIFT

jamesc9

Is GIFT an acronym, in this context?

(I ask only for clarification, you understand.)

Liliet

I was not thinking of one but it could totally be a backronym if you would like to participate 😊

samshadar

He already has the goat, now he just needs munitions...

erebus42

Love him or hate him (I personally love him) , there really is something so supremely sad about watching a man who cares for so few and so little willingly destroy his most treasured relationship. It had to be done and I never doubted he'd be able to do it, but still damn.

Insanenoodlyguy

What I hate is that scribe was right. Don't really like scribe, so that's part of it. But gotta give her her due. She uncomplicated (for a certain value of complicated, at least made less complicated?) something that almost certainly needed to happen.

Liliet

I'm sorry but she did so while refusing to prevent A FUCKTON OF INNOCENT DEATHS that only 'needed' to happen to 'uncomplicate' this a tiny bit.

Scribe was in no way proven right to do what she did by this. Right about some of her statements, sure. Right in what she did? No.

Shveiran

A matter of perspective, surely; yet this perspective I fully share.

Insanenoodlyguy

You could say the same of the Augur. Short term tragedy for long term necessity. Though admittedly the latter's motives were a lot purer.

Shveiran

I think I'm missing something; what tragedy did the Augur cause?

oh wait, you mean not warning Cordelia of the coup?

ninegardens

Pretty sure Augur would have outright prevented the coup given a chance.

She didn't have that chance, she was never playing vs Scribe, or Malicia or the traitors.

Augur's only goal was to ensure that her cousin had a choice, and she did that by ensuring that the Bard was distracted at the opportune moment. Hence, Pretty sure no blood on Augur's hands.

(More disagreeing with Noodleguy than you Shveran, but this seemed the natural place to reply)

Insanenoodlyguy

She wondered if she'd be "damned for her silence." She had a chance to shut it down and save a lot of lives.

She wouldn't have thought about it like that if there was nothing she could have done.

Jane

Plus, I fully expect her secret to come out at the worst possible moment. She's right when she says that it's her entire thing to keep this sort of thing quiet, but in my opinion, this just involves too big a story for her role to work this time.

Well, plus, now that this is an actual story – as in the one that we're reading right now – Chekov's Gun applies in a way that it didn't for her other schemes.

Shikkarasu

Scribe was not Right or Wrong; that's playing the Game or the Gods, and it is not a game, but a mould to be broken. She was Practical. Hundreds of innocent deaths? Rice on the scale. Wounding a man she loves unconditionally (as a knife loves a steady hand)? Taken into consideration. She is a monster, as are any of the Calamities, and she has been shaped by her time with Black.

Soma

Damn.

Abused woman goes power mad and needs to be put down is something that, for me, can only be ever be so sharp, even when well done. I was hoping for... well, something else. Some thing or way where that essence isn't preserved. It would seem others have had a better read on this than me. Kudos to the foresight on the direction the story appears to be taking to those who had it.

Mirror Night

I mean say what you will about EE but I would agree his record on Black Woman looks a little suspect. I mean Akua is a happy slave now (or so it seems and was a monster before hand) and Malicia Is a mad former rape victim that has to be put down by a White Man....not the intent sure perhaps but....yeah not as balanced out as say Weseka is by Masego or Hanno.

Stormblessed

I disagree with both of you. This isn't a Dark Phoenix or Daenerys situation. Malicia isn't a "mad woman who needs to be put down". She didn't go mad with power or become insane. She's just wrong in the eyes of Amadeus and Cat (and the audience by proxy). She still has all her faculties and even might be correct in her assumptions and actions. Her actions might be correct and legitimate given the specific outcome she wants. The key difference is that Black wants a different outcome.

I think on the surface it might appear similar, but that's only superficial.

Mirror Night

I am not sure that particularly matters sure Malica might not be insane sure but she is painted unfavorably by the narrative such that I don't think the distinction matters. She is wrong in the eyes of Cat and Black thus she is wrong in the narrative and to most of the fan-base. The end results still leaves of the two most significant Black Woman in the series. One as a seemingly happy slave and one dead by her white male BFF. Anyway you spin it the optics of that aren't great in my book. Unlike say Weseka, these two aren't balanced out by Masego or Hanno. An author doesn't have to intentionally set out to reinforce bad narratives (say crazed rape survivor) to reinforce them by accident.

TeK

So? What's wrong with that? Isn't equality imply that some people are shit regardless of skin color? I don't get you. The rape survivor can't be bad because rape is bad? Or something? Please explain your position. If a Hero was a rape survivor too, would that make everything ok? If first chapters were changed to someone raping Cat first, would that be ok then? The amount of attention you put to this is ridiculous.

Soma

Nothing wrong with it, per se. Just might be less interesting if you've seen something often, instead of something you haven't seen before.

Some people might be inclined to dislike it for different reasons too, and they're entitled to those feelings as others are entitled to like it.

TeK

Sure, and I am entitled to be annoyed by their reasons for those feelings. And argue, and disagree. Free speech, right?

tynam

If you have no better reason to be annoyed than 'people are objecting to a narrative about black people that they're disappointed by' or 'women are objecting to an old misogynist trope', then it's not necessarily the best time to use your free speech. People are allowed to dislike things that you like. It's not something to be angered by.

Mirror Night

I mean that assumes society has achieved perfect equality already it has not so I am not the relevance. I am saying the optics of having a Black Woman overcome rape, rise to the top, only to be put down by her white male bff are rather poor. Same for taking the other black woman who is sure evil and turning her into a happy slave. The cast is broad and diverse sure but it does stand out that Cat doesn't have any Black Woman on her coalition when she is drawing most of her high council from a country with a lot of Black People. I am not saying I think EE is a Raicst (I dont think he is) but a less charitable person could with what we are seeing so far can make a case he has some issues with Black Women.

caoimhinh

Looking at this story through that optic would be extremely superficial and narrow-minded, and also judgemental to a ridiculous degree while at the same time disregarding everything about the characters except their skin color.

That optic can only be done by willfully ignoring EVERYTHING about them, their circumstances, life choices, personal philosophies, goals and their personal struggles in pursuit of those goals.

The argument you are pushing for (summarizing Amadeus and Alaya's clash as "a white man vs a black woman") is simply ridiculous.

Soma

It is judgemental to do the thing this story encourages by its overarching theme of analyzing the context a story operates in?

Shveiran

It is, if one ignores most of context the story operates in in order to draw one's conclusions.

This series is made of five long Book, involves a plethora of themes, and has one of the most diverse casts I've ever seen for cultures, genders, sexual identities and genders.

The very idea of ignoring everything else and say "yes, but these two women are both black and they are not morally great, so there is a judgment on black women going on", is frankly ludicrous.

It also ignores characters like Indrani, or Aisha, or Captain, who though flawed human being are portrayed mostly in a good light.

It ignores that male or non-black rulers have been harshly criticized by Catherine and the fan-base both, so it's not like Aqua and Malicia are being singled out.

If you feel that way, fine. But in my opinion there is nothing about the context, if taken in full, that suggests the context is not trying to portray the characters as human beings and not drawing lines based on gender, race, religion or sexuality.

If anything, it is painfully obvious that EE as much as he can to be as inclusive as humanly possible. By this point, I feel like arguing the opposite requires either a very distracted read or straight-out bad faith.

Liliet

> "yes, but these two women are both black and they are not morally great, so there is a judgment on black women going on"

That's not what is being said.

"There is an unfortunate matching of a pattern" does not mean "erratic is judging black women".

Erratic did his best to be as inclusive as humanly possible. He STILL accidentally fell into a bad pattern. Nobody's saying he's written Akua and Alaya in bad faith. Just that the result stumbled and fell on its face.

Shveiran

Two instances of something is not a pattern. It's two things.

Insanenoodlyguy

You know when some folks say there are some people out there just looking for a reason to be offended?

This is the kind of thing they refer to. You're taking amazing characters and being upset because they are a glorious example of villainy, shaped by a well thought out background, and a character having a shockingly dark but cathartic redemption arc... and being upset because they are black skinned. As opposed to... what, being white skinned, thus removing representation and adhering all the more closely to a anglonormative model of older, less inclusive fantasy?

You know when some folks say they might as well adhere to that model because it's safer then trying to do something past that out and being inevitably criticized by somebody looking to be offended? That's also you.

Liliet

Nobody's getting offended, nobody's making this a big deal, nobody's saying Erratic hates black people or something.

You know what would have solved this problem? Having another black woman or two in the cast that did NOT match an unfortunate pattern. If Aisha had been also Soninke for example the tone of this would have been WAY different.

This is still, in fact, a problem of INSUFFICIENT representation.

Inay

Isn't Catherine black (at least partly)? She's half-deoraithe and I remember them being described as dark-skinned people.

denimcurtain

If it's solved simply by changing Aisha's race when race hasn't exactly been a prominent role doesn't that mean this is an extremely superficial problem that requires assumptions (we are the ones deciding Soninke are black and Tagrehb is not), close reading (how often does Aisha's race come up for instance) and a willingness to elevate skin color as an analog over cultural and historical parallels.

We have slave races and discrimination in story. We have countries that still rely on slavery. We have imperialists and the oppressed.

I guess it strikes me as strange that something can be prominent enough in one's mind to make the effort to draw such a connection but matter so little that an unimportant retcon by the author would solve it. Isn't the goal meaningful representation rather than reducing race to a box that needs to be checked?

I'm honestly asking. I'm sure I missed the boat in plenty of parts in this comment but I remember superficial tokenism being a bad thing but now it seems to be in vogue and it's confusing to see someone drag characters out of a story and make assumptions about what race and role they are in the real world then be ok with a fix that doesn't amount to that much more than replacing a couple reference points.

Allafterme

Excuse me for being blunt, but you are in the comment section of a web novel that is inclusive as it is well crafted that such inclusiveness does not stand out like a swollen thumb like the rest of media, some themes in it are so progressive that I'll bet my right hand some publishers will shy away from the press it will garner when ErraticErrata finally decide to publish it, and you are saying "Insufficient" Representation. I can only recognize it as acting in bad faith, for the series, for the author and the rest of the fans. I know you are invested in Practical Guide to Evil, but you need to cool down. For I see only one problem here, and it is your mindset.

tynam

With respect, that is a fucking terrible argument. Nobody was saying EE is not a progressive author who's done an excellent job of representation in general. You are arguing that once a story is progressive it should be immune to all further criticism – worse, that criticism automatically becomes "bad faith" – and that is ridiculous, and worse it is a recipe for failure to learn, in which once we're progressive 'enough' all remaining problems are swept under the carpet. And in this case it is exactly contrary to the themes of the story itself. (See Pilgrim's interlude; a lifetime of honest and just rule does not make one injustice any less so. Not that EE has ever hired assassins, although frankly reading the comments there must have been times it was a temptation.)

I don't entirely agree with Liliet but if your strongest opinion is 'you shouldn't have expressed the criticism at all', then it's not a useful opinion to state.

TeK

Disclaimer: trigger warning, I am triggered, where's my safe space.

Well take down those fucking optics. If the roles were reversed, you would be shutting up. Unlike Malicia, Black was target of systematic racism. I am getting disgusted by this entire fucking topic. Less charitable person my ass, fuck them. And fuck Black Women too. Is Indian women is not enough for you? Or Arab? Both are in Cat's cast. Now, we don't have Black women, ergo it's bad. Fuck I am angry now, I do apologize. I can't properly articulate how idiotic this is.

ErraticErrata

Straying a little close to personal attacks there. Nothing wrong with arguing, but let's keep it civil.

TeK

Well now I am embarrassed.

Decius

" If first chapters were changed to someone raping Cat first"

Changed? Did the scene where Cat met Black get retconned since I read it?

RandomFan

Huh? In the version I read, (The story at that point was After book 1 ended, but before the first demon attack) Cat ran into soldiers raping someone else, and got involved, and they decided they'd kill her as well as the rape victim to cover up the witnesses- and then Black showed up. I'm not sure whether you remember wrong, or a retcon happened, but I think it's the former.

TeK

If it was, this guy's entire point could be moot. It was another girl that was raped.

panic

Ofcourse she is painted unfavorably by the narrative. She is a ANTAGONIST to the protagonist that is Cat. What does it matter that they are black? Would you have preferred that the two individuals who come from a nation and culture where the majority are black where white instead? Because to me that sounds about as silly as you complaining about this. You say seemingly happy slave and don't even realize how right you are. SEEMINGLY. As in she only looks that way. Don't you remember when Cat made her say the truth. That she was bidding her time in the Underdark until she found a way out of her captivity? And when has Malicia ever been crazed? Why is crazed a problem when it's been established that it's literally a staple of Praesi culture. Should she now go against the culture AND ethnicity? Should we make her a hero while we're at it? Perhaps make her the protagonist because clearly The Woe aint diverse enough for you. Stop being a potato.

Soma

Reads a story about stories. Complains about analysis of the meta narrative.

panic

Analysis my ass. He is complaining about two characters for the sole reason that they are black and he does not like the way they are going.

Soma

Or, for those capable of looking upon the eldritch horror of Mirror Nights words without panicking, there may be a conversation there about image, context and the society we the readers live in. Only should any be capable of not screaming at the incomprehensible horror of such cthonic sounds, of course.

Shveiran

Has it occurred to you that we may have read that same comment and, rather than spitting out of beverage of choice in outrage, actually thought about the words and STILL come to the conclusion that there is nothing of merit in that analysis, in our opinion?

The implication here seems that if we weren't howling simpletons oblivious to the complexity of the world, we'd share your view.

That assumption I challenge: it takes more for an analysis to be meaningful than bringing up a relevant issue for the modern world. You need to actually analyze the subject, and those insights can be judged and found wanting.

Liliet

It's a pattern that's being matched.

No, it does not imply anything about erratic's intent, worldview or Guide's overall quality. It's kind of like throwing stones randomly and accidentally spelling out a bad word. Yes, it's accidental. No, it wasn't on purpose. The bad word is still there.

There is nothing to analyze beyond "does it match the pattern of the trope?" which it does. Any further comparison shows that yes, erratic is doing his best and doing great overall. But this point? It stands regardless

Soma

I think my implication was that it is a bit exasperating for me to see my comments and Mirror Night's being interpreted as being in bad faith because they touch on tough subjects. I don't think anyone is simple for not agreeing with me.

I don't necessarily agree with Liliet that EE has used the tropes they have unintentionally. It is possible that the use of tropes with unfortunate implications intentionally relates to the title of this chapter 'A Mold Unbroken', and says something about Amadeus's intent to break that mold and by extension those unfortunate tropes. Maybe there is something really interesting there, maybe there's not. Maybe there are even some other really interesting themes in the guide that have some relation to the world we live in and deal with hard topics.

It would be nice to be able to explore the narrative, the metanarrative, how they relate, and what that says in a conversation, even if such things touch on hard topics. Conversations can be great ways to find new ways to think about something, and the guide is a complex thing with a lot of ways to think about it. I am a bit exasperated that the potential for such a conversation was shut down with assumptions of bad faith and sensitivity, and even more so that there was a veneer of that being done in the name of free speech.

Shveiran

I'll be blunt:

So far as I can see, the reaction to your comments was not spawned by the fact that you are raising a tough question.

It was caused, instead, by the belief that you are pointing at one of the most inclusive works of fiction I've ever read and saying: "it's good, but it ought to be better".

That argument (not you, not Liliet, not Mirror Night or anyone else: that argument) I believe to be toxic.

Representation will never be perfect. It can only be improved.

And while I fully believe that you may very well be trying to do that very thing (trying to make this work more inclusive, I mean) I am convinced this kind of reasoning achieves the opposite.

If a work that is already raising the bar so much will still be pointed at and told "yes, but" there will be no making this kind of attention common. It is a snake biting its own tail, you'll never look at it and say: that's enough; because it can always be more representative. Maybe next we'll notice how the only male homosexual was a vile warlock that blew up a city, I don't know.

There is a finite limit to how many characters you can put into any work of fiction and still making them great while allowing the story to flow. This cannot end like you want it to end.

Soma

The assumption the guide is above being critical of is toxic. Not because the guide has so much that really desperately needs to be criticized, but because in the course of examining and trying to understand something sometimes one necessarily has thoughts that are, or could be taken to be, critical.

For instance, say you see a trope you're not fond of. If the guide had something to say about that, or intends to subvert it in some way, it may be necessary for the trope to be present somehow in the story. In order to understand what is being said about that trope, or the subversion, a reader would have to identify the existence of the trope. It also might be there accidentally as a potential flaw.

The fact that this thing you're looking at is potentially a flaw means that bringing it up could be a criticism. As potentially part of a statement the guide is trying to make, it might be necessary to identify this thing's existence to understand what the guide is saying.

That said, I think I do regret bringing up a perspective that could, or does, touch on hard topics. To the comments section's credit, it often seems like a place where good discussions, insights, or conversations could be had, even about tricky and complex subjects. That doesn't seem to be the case here, and perhaps that's on me for not being a better communicator, or for not finding a better space to think about these things where it doesn't disturb other people.

Soma

Entirely possible you are correct. Things could change, be further clarified, or a more fine grained examination could be needed.

However, the characterization this chapter lends some support the idea of 'stupid evil' that caoimhinh, and others, saw in Malicia. One where emotion and some kind of unreasonable distrust and need for control, for some reason, rules her. Not to say it confirms it, merely this chapter does lend some heavy support to the idea this story is moving in a direction where Malicia must be put down.

caoimhinh

It always has, the story has been moving towards Malicia being put down since Book 2. You can't possibly be noticing it only now.

Alaya's obsession with power and her distrust of Amadeus became a self-fulfilling prophecy as her own actions drove him to be against her. She is taking actions like the Villains of Old School, so she needs to be stopped, lest all they had built for Praes is destroyed.

Soma

I thought I saw something far more interesting to me there. I'd made argument to that effect. It certainly seems you had a better read on it.

Liliet

Hopefully we're not done yet.

But yes it sure would be nice to have Soninke women who aren't villainous in the cast

laguz24

Aisha is soninke I think. Or is she tagrheb? Personally, I just think of her as praesi and be done with it.

Gunslinger

She's Taghreb

Liliet

Aisha is Taghreb who are presented as culturally much more unified / loyal to family than Soninke, without any cultural counterweight being given in anything positive at all in Soninke culture.

Which is bad, in context of real world people reading this book in the real world.

Shveiran

She is Tagrheb. Though I'm not sure what the fact that she is not Sonike changes.

Tagrheb have been describe as having lighter skin than Sonike, as have Indrani and Deorathies. Yet if an argument is to be made about skin colour, "lighter than" does not mean "not black". Skin comes in a spectrum even in Africa.

Of course, the argument could be made that Tagrheb culture and names resembles Arabic ones more than African ones.

But then we'd be discussing something other than the colour of the skin of this fictional people, and that is clearly not the basis this arguments are build upon.

SITB

The biggest problem is that there aren't enough Soninke protagonists/protagonist aligned.

There's Masego and uhh...? By contrast both Aisha and Ratface were Tagrhebi and both brought viewpoints from that ethnicity (Aisha as a noble, and Ratface as someone who was chewed by nobles). Despite the fact that Soninke are supposed to be the most widespread ethnicity they don't appear as such in the text.

Soma

I'd preface my comment with let the art take the artuer where it will. The story's got needs. But still, Malicia as a femme woman with power, and willing to use it, has been a fascinitating part of the guide for me, and fun to think about. Less so in a more typical context.

An uncharitable reading would lead one to some questions about the presentation of black women, among other presentations. But I do think its to The Guide's credit that, on such a complicated set up with objective Good and Objective Evil, that would be an uncharitable reading.

Hierus

"rape victim" "white man" "record on black women"

Uh. What? I think you can find a crime in everything if you look hard enough.

In the end both both malicia and akua could not escape their own experiences in childhood and youth which is a story as old as time.

What makes this so exspcially tragic that the same mailica wrote the treaty on the end of the age of wonders.

Soma

It's a fairly literal reading. Doesn't mean the story is bad, just, for some people, it might be less interesting given certain characterizations.

>Uh. What? I think you can find a crime in everything if you look hard enough.

You are saying that in a story about stories. This work was always going to attract a decent amount of people looking at the meta narrative. May as well complain about a political intrigue story about a Queen having a fan base with an interest in politics. Doesn't even mean we think it's bad story. That's just a thing present here.

Amoonymous

I mean, I guess if race is everything to you. Given how little it's thought of beyond descriptions by the characters we see the world through, I don't even think of it that much in this story (which is to say I don't think of all of the characters as any race in particular). Obviously I recognize that a LOT of characters aren't white, but that doesn't alter my perception of them a ton given that there seems to be less persecution based on skin color in this world anyway.

Funnily enough I think the most concrete example of persecution based solely on race might be how the Soninke and Taghreb treat the pale-skinned Duni now that I actually give some thought to the matter. Not everything needs to be looked at through a modern sociopolitical lens.

caoimhinh

You are simply wrong.

That's like saying that EE killed the only gay marriage on scene (Wekesa and Tikoloshe) and calling it a homophobic act, it would blatantly ignore all the background and story building that led to that moment.

Making this a racial issue is simply wrong, because it has never been about their skin color, it's about their chosen philosophies and their life choices. Alaya and Akua went down the path they took not because they were black women or victims of abuse, but because they chose to embrace the social ways of the Old Villains. Many of the characters in this story have suffered to some degree, but due to their environment and the choices they made, but ultimately each of the Named took a stand for what they believe in and walk that path to the bitter end.

Their skin colors are irrelevant to their struggle and their confrontation. This is a clash of philosophies, and with a deep background, it's a clash that has been building for many chapters, so if you are only seeing a white man and a black woman while disregarding everything else that makes them unique people and amazing characters, maybe the problem who has a problem is you, seeing only the most superficial layer and in fact the most irrelevant in their confrontation.

In fact, between Alaya and Amadeus, it was him who suffered discrimination due to his skin color, as the Duni are despised by the other ethnicities of Praes.

You saying that Amadeus standing against Malicia is simply “a white man killing a black woman” is an insult to this entire story, the amazing world-building and character development that led to this moment.

Shame on you for disregarding all the effort the author had put on this work into such a narrow frame as “white man vs black woman” and for implying that ErraticErrata might be discriminating against black women.

Mirror Night

In a Vacuum you may be right but stories do not exist in a Vacuum. Thus it stands out to me that the two most relevant Black Women by far are Villains who need to be proven wrong and put in their place. It just stands out that when you consider how diverse the Core of Cats coalition is, it doesn't have single Black Woman.

I am saying no matter the way you spin it the story still at the end of the day has a Black Woman being a Slave to Native American (Cat) and another getting killed by White Man (Black). I don't think EE is a racist or homophobic but it does raise my eyebrows.

caoimhinh

Quite the opposite, in fact. You are the one trying to put them in a Vacuum, trying to make it look as if they are only a white man and a black woman, when they are so much more and their skin color is the most irrelevant part of their confrontation.

You are oversimplifying the issue and limiting your view to skin color, while willfully disregarding all other factors, which makes this a poor analysis on your part.

You are trying to spin it so that instead of this being the culmination of a life-long friendship between two of the most powerful and influential individuals of the continent, who are fighting over the course that their nation must follow in order to improve, prompting the clash of two philosophies that will shape the future of their continent; this is according to you, simply “he's a white man and she is a black woman”.

Soma

Your refusal to examine the context that Mirror Nights argument is in does not mean it does not exist, merely that you don't wish to engage with it.

caoimhinh

Nope, it's just that Mirror Night's "context" is actually taking this out of context, and judge this situation based only on the skin color and sex of the two confronted characters.

That's like summarizing the confrontation of Catherine and Pilgrim as "a bisexual woman vs a straight man". It's just a ridiculous frame to evaluate it, as it judges by prioritizing irrelevant aspects of their lives. Not even in metanarrative is this relevant.

It is ridiculous and narrow-minded to treat Amadeus rebellion against Alaya as a racial issue, worse still to try to accuse the author of discrimination based on such a view.

Javvies

I've gotta be honest.

I'd forgotten that what being of Soninke descent meant for Akua and Malicia and their skin color. Their color hasn't mattered to the story in any meaningful way.

And it still doesn't. Soninke could be purple or blue or green for all the difference it would make, which is to say none. Oh, maybe there'd have been an early line about some ancient Dread Emperor, Warlock, or other spellcaster having done something stupid that turned them that color, but it wouldn't affect the story.

Masego is also Soninke (I think).

Insanenoodlyguy

He is. I was going to say Aisha was as well but a comment about says she's Taghreb. I don't have the energy to go and find citations but I'm sure this is correct. I have had the wrong mental image of her the entire story and will likely continue to do so since it changes absolutely nothing of relevance about Aisha to me (Namely the shipping! Kiss the Orc already. Do ittttttt)

Soma

It's almost as if there are multiple different contexts a work operates and exists in.

Shveiran

It's almost like, because of that, pointing at a single one of them and discussing it makes them meaningless. Because they are connected to the rest, and if you single them out you are NO LONGER DISCUSSING THE SAME THING.

I suppose we should complain about the lack of a white heterosexual male in Cat's inner circle, too. Or de-fanged orcs and curvaceous drows, while we are at it.

Insanenoodlyguy

As long as we are really stretching here... how dare EE take the one Black Male Protagonist and strip him of the power he's had since birth? That sounds like... a shackle to me! At the hands of a White Man (I actually have no clue what Grey's racial identity is supposed to be?) and a Woman who can't stop appropriating cultures no less! Fuck this shit, I'm out! (I'm not out).

Liliet

You are wrong.

Shveiran

Your detailed rebuttal has made me reconsider my position.

dera

First, really I forgot all the times about the characters skin colors, because frankly Duni discrimination is the only examples we have in-story.

And second, it feel a pretty conceited comment. I mean, the story doesn't relate att all to the colonization of the americas for me, i was at lot more relating this to the South of the african continent really.

So yeah, just saying that I feel you are projecting a lot on a story who has done, let's face it, everything possible to escape racials/sex issues

pentephraxis

Characters are characters. The story was originally Praes-centric rather than Callow being its own thing, and so the "ruling class" were mostly dark-skinned. Now that the story has shifted so that Praes become narrative enemies rather than symbolic ones, those same people are also the enemy. The very nature of the story is that people who were once your enemies are now your friends and vice versa. Thus, no matter how you slice it, some black person is going to be on the receiving end of some white person's war, because a fair coin occasionally comes up heads. If a black woman being put in their place by a white man is verboten, no matter how many white people are put in their place by black people (Black has suffered outright discrimination for his light skin), the only way to get that to not happen is to remove diversity and make there be either fewer black women or fewer white men.

pentephraxis

Not to mention, the significance of black women being dominated by white men is fundamentally rooted in good old Planet Earth. Culture doesn't carry over just by virtue of being the same color. Alaya's melanin concentration's effect on her identity, her interactions, the way she's viewed, etc., are absolutely unrelated to what someone of the same melanin concentration would experience here on Earth. Praes, and the Soninke bloodline, have absolutely zero parallels to Africa, American slavery, or anything else that contributes to POCs struggles in modern day America. Hell, it's not even an Earth thing so much as it is an American thing – in, say, the UK (which EE is from!), pretty much nobody would interpret it in a racial context.

tynam

That is a terrible argument. Stories do not exist in a vacuum; we, the readers, live on Earth and our reading is informed by Earth cultures. You are arguing that we're only ever allowed to analyse the Watsonian perspective, but that is wrong in all cases and spectacularly wrong in this story, which is specifically about the importance of the Doyleist perspective and the larger context.

Authors choose what the cultures of their fictional worlds are like; it's not a magic 'may not be critiqued or analysed' cure all.

Please consider the logical consequences of your argument: we wouldn't be allowed to criticise even an outright and deliberate work of misogyny, as long as the author at some point said "in this fictional world women are objectively more stupid and emotional than men so they're unfit to lead". You would have us condemned to just accept that at face value and not point out the obvious problem.

And I'm from the UK and interpreted the racial context just fine, thank you. The UK does better than many countries but we still have racism and a hell of a lot more of it recently; at the time of writing our racists were being directly empowered by an openly xenophobic government. The context isn't the same as in the US, thankfully, but we're still the country that started the slave trade in the first place. And we're perfectly aware of the US context, which EE has generally shown a deft hand at writing around.

Insanenoodlyguy

Has it occurred to you that with her apparent redemption arc on track, that slave you mention is heading towards a full-fledged redemption? Or does her becoming a proper protagonist not count for whatever reason?

Liliet

Redemption through slavery is SUPER unfortunate in the context of real world history and context.

No, it doesn't have those implications in-universe. Unfortunately, it's not in-universe that the readers are.

Shveiran

Point me to a single country that doesn't have a rehabilitation system that doesn't include stripping people of their freedom after they committed a bad enough act.
So far as I know, those that don't murder wrongdoers and be done with it.

But sure, let's call it slavery. After all, Aqua's story has so many similarities with historical slavery.

tynam

There's a difference between stripping someone of their freedom and forcing them to work for you afterwards.

Mental Mouse

If you wanted to raise your eyebrows, the place to do that might have been back at the beginning when the darkest-skinned race on the continent was cast as the Evil Empire. After five books' worth of characterization and backstory... nope.

Jane

I wondered when somebody was going to mention that. It was neat back at the start of the story, when Praesi comprised all of the most important characters and so it offered strong representation for people who don't often get to be seen as important characters, but... It's kind of ended up more unfortunate as the story has moved beyond Praes.

It doesn't really bother me since I don't visualize when I'm reading (I wouldn't even remember what characters are supposed to be attractive and who aren't, if it weren't for Cat ogling everyone every two minutes), but it'd make me raise an eyebrow if I didn't know the reasons behind it.

tynam

Wait, you're saying that if something isn't immediately criticised it can never be examined in hindsight?

That's ridiculous.

Back at the beginning the evil empire was the entire context of the story, and for all we knew the story would entirely be set there... with Malicia expressly an antihero and not necessarily an antagonist, in that she's doing morally unacceptable things toward a good end. In a story full entirely of Soninke, Taghreb and Callowans, this would never have been worthy of mention.

But that's not the story we're reading now.

Stormblessed

The more I think about, the more I am coming around to your viewpoint in many ways.

The idea of overarching meta tropes and the pattern that exists across all literature making certain elements less than ideal here I think is fair. The idea that Akua and Malicia being strung up is interesting in that context.

That being said, I still maintain it's not a "put down the rapid dog" situation. Those tend to be quick affairs where the once favorable ally is suddenly overcome with madness (ie: Dany and the bells) [also GoT season 8 is not an example of good story telling].

Also "two most relevant black women" is an interesting phrase. I'll give you Akua as the "most relevant black women", but I wouldn't say Malicia is. She's been more of a 'force of nature' than a mainstay character. She shows up at climaxes and then disappears from the story for large chunks of time.

Another interesting element you mentioned that I disagree with is how Archer not a Black Woman amongst Cat's Core Coalition? Archer is literally described thusly when introduced "Her lower face was covered by dark linen, but I could still see her dark ochre skin betraying a bloodline from across the Tyrian Sea and delicate hazelnut eyes" Unless I'm mistaken as to what 'dark ochre skin' means, and I might be, I think Archer is literally described as Black.

Personally, I'd call Archer one of the most important characters and a Black Woman and part of Cat's core cast. While Malicia is "more relevant" from a pure story perspective (ie: she pushes more plot points) I think Archer is "more relevant" on a chapter by chapter basis.

I'm trying to respond in good faith. I've seen a lot of responses that don't seem to be doing that so I hope my go achieves that a bit better. (all the people saying "shame on you" are utterly ridiculous) I'm curious for your thoughts. Also Soma's thoughts, but I don't think they'll see this? Should I respond to one of their comments directly?

Soma

I do really appreciate the effort to keep things civil and have an understanding conversation. The way I communicated things likely contributed to the outrage, or, at least, didn't stop pressing people's jitter triggers on a sensitive topic area. For that reason, I'm a little hesitant to continue commenting on this all that much more. That said, I'll try to give you my view on your questions relatively quick here.

I believe Indrani is Indian as her name seems to come from a Hindu goddess, among other characterization that would seem to indicate she doesn't look like she's from Calernia, if I recall correctly.

On the relevance on Akua and Malicia you may be right that Malicia isn't the most relevant, but perhaps what Mirror Night was saying makes more sense with 'prominent' in place of 'relevant'?

On the rabid dog issue, you may be entirely correct. I tend to think of rabid dog situations as being slower, given how it progresses. Initial infection, fairly long incubation, then incurable once noticeable manifestations occur. I think if Malicia has a need for control that overcame her it could fit into this view of the trope, but even then it might not be the most appropriate or relevant of tropes for viewing this. Might be others fit better because of something I've missed, or that rabid dog needing to be put down just doesn't fit with a slow set up.

Also, the existence of these tropes might not even be a mistake. They could be there because the guide is saying, or is going to say, something about them. It might be interesting to view them as related to the chapter title. Might also be just viewed through a certain lens these things just happen to be here too.

Liliet

Indrani is another ethnicity that's not white, but not African either.

Which brings us back to how Malicia might not be in the top 10 most relevant characters, but she's still in the top two most relevant black women, because there's no one that's more relevant than her other than Akua.

Soma

You're talking about the story. Mirror Night is talking about the metanarrative. These are fundamentally different. They operate in different contexts, so things can look different depending on the context it is examined in. It's something that the guide encourages, on purpose or accidentally, by being a story about stories.

Mirror Night

Yes basically a story about stories would be a story where you expect an writer to be careful about stepping on obvious landmines. This is a rather obvious one where its like gee maybe we should counterbalance Akua and Malicia with some pro Cat Black Women in major roles.

Soma

I mean, depending on how you planned things out and the dictates of the story you plan to write, it could be hard to fit everything together. Especially depending on the update schedule.

The differences between a good work and a masterpiece, and a good work is already hard enough to write.

medailyfun

Very good point about the story about the author who writes the story about stories! But there's no guarantees the story you propose would be a nice story, so I would stick to the current one and you can write your own

medailyfun

But what if the story enveloping the author is Evil story? /Philosoraptor image/ The kind of story we like so much and want to see in development.

Liliet

I'm not going to blame erratic overmuch for stepping into this. For one, this is a first draft being published as it is written, and judging it by the standards applicable to, like, a popular TV show is a bit disingenious. For another... yeah okay the first point is pretty much the entirety of my point. Erratic fucked up. He also has fucked up with numbers, dates, character names, compass directions and Wasaliti appears to cut through a mountain range and flow from sea to sea.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Well, I think even if this was an edited and revised work it'd be an easy point to miss. Fair representation of every group is near impossible simply due to conservation of detail. And while major character black women here, all two of them, are evil, Soninke in general are not portrayed as uniformly worse than others and both Akua and Malicia are complex characters who don't fall into the usual evil black women stereotypes.

To be honest, if this was a published work there'd be reviewers up in flames about the Evil Empire being primarily made up of dark-skinned people while the good kingdoms are mostly light-skinned.

sivarajan

You mean like an Uncle Tom?

caoimhinh

That's not metanarrative, he is trying to find fault by accusing the author of being racist and misogynist, that's fundamentally different. And frankly ridiculous, given the story we have read so far, that has a diverse cast, not only on race, color, and sexuality, but on backgrounds and personal philosophies, there's intellectual diversity in this work.

In the chapter that finally shows us a confrontation that has been built up over the course of 5 books and hundreds of chapters, after all the introspections on the two leading figures of Praes of the last 40 years, and the declaration of their war on each other to decide the fate of the nation they had spent their lives protecting and improving, the only thing Mirror Night sees is a white man planning to kill a black woman? REALLY? That's petty and narrow-minded.

medailyfun

I want to kindly point you to the old story where a person starts silly flame in the comments, mayhaps deserving some laughs, but not much attention. The grooves of the story are very deep in the Creation.

caoimhinh

True, one must not fall victim of the Bait Aspect.
Thanks for the reminder.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Think Flame would fit better than Bait.

I AM proud of this community for being mostly civil even when such a sensitive topic comes up. So far it's been accusations of stupid/ illogical arguments not stupid/illogical people and no one's accused anyone's mother of being a cow.

grzecho2222

But, what their Name would be?

Mental Mouse

I was going to supply the obvious answer... but then I reconsidered. Let's not fall into the trap of defining MirrorNight (and Soma) as essential personae, on the basis of a single argument, no matter how ill-advised.

Insanenoodlyguy

Flamebait!

Insanenoodlyguy

Wise cat is wise.

Liliet

> he is trying to find fault by accusing the author of being racist and misogynist

Nope!

Neither Soma nor Mirror Night actually accused personally Erratic of being either racist or misogynist.

All that's happening here is a pattern match in a very unfortunate manner, which deserves being pointed out.

Aotrs Commander

Do we really want to be in a place where every single aspect of anything has to be strangled by the idea that that it dare not show anything ever in anything other than a completely homogenised fashion, in case it offends someone? Where spades cannot just be spades?

Moridin isainde vadin

Do you want to be a place where any opinion that isn't gushing about the work isn't welcome? Pointing this out is a meta observation about the story in our cultural context. I love wheel of time and i still wouldn't claim that it contains no implications that someone with a critical metatextual eye would find problematic.

Shveiran

The argument being made isn't "critics aren't welcome", it is "this critique is unreasonable".

If you take a single piece of anything and hold it up to scrutiny whilst ignoring everything else that gives it context, nothing will ever be able to hold water. Nothing will ever be so perfect that all its parts are perfect in their own ways under any possible light.

Pointing -this- out is, in our opinion, not a meaningful meta observation. It is pointing at the Monna Lisa and saying "why isn't there at least a ginger in the background?".

Arguing for inclusion in works of fiction is, again, not only fine but also necessary. Doing it like this is trying to empty a bottomless well – an unending labor that achieves nothing but tiredness.

Liliet

It's not a mistake. It's just ONE layer. There are MANY MORE and you are correct, but this layer also exists, and as Soma pointed out is not counterbalanced by black women in the cast who are not villains. And unfortunately IRL black women are a very specifically targeted group

Shveiran

Aside from Archer and Aisha and Captain and Ranger... I'm not even sure the Witch and Raphaella would count as white. But even then, so what? Sonike have nothing to do with real life cultures, they are a culture of warlocks who build giant pyramids.

WHO ARE WE SAYING SHOULD BE OFFENDED HERE, THE WARLOCKS? Geez.

Liliet

Soninke are the only black people on the continent, in this story.

We wish we lived in a world where it didn't matter. We all really do, and erratic probably most of all, if only just so he can write whatever story he likes without accidentally stepping into real world sucky shit cow dung.

But the real world sucky shit cow dung still exists. And we can all take a step back and be collectively sad about that.

Shveiran

Sonike are the race with the darkest shade of skin.

That does not make them the only ones that can be defined as having black skin. African ethnicities do not have one shade.

I share your wish, yet I still believe this to be a non issue, and without real base in the text to boot.

Mental Mouse

And they've been cast as the core of the Evil Empire from the beginning. The thing is, even if someone pulled the same stunt on this epic as someone did on the Earthsea miniseries, (filming it as a bunch of white folks with a token black)... the characterization and backstory here would be utterly unaffected.

This is a world that's deep enough to stand on its own; it has its own racial issues, but one thing it does not have in its history is the American Original Sin (Stygia is closest, and that's not very close). We don't even have an equivalent to European-style colonialism – the closest to that would be the determinedly-offscreen gnomes..

To call out the characters' skin color specifically at the climax of their conflict – that's not highlighting a genuine issue in the narrative, it's just a derail based on forcing our real-world racial issues into the fictional world..

Allafterme

But adding something to the narrative for the sake of balance and counter-balance IRL is not healthy for the very story itself. EE himself crafted a story where there is absolute equality between men and women and none challenged it because it was cleverly woven into PGtE and never broke the suspension of disbelief. There is a reason new series from CW and Comics market lost much of the wind under their sails. With the words of my favorite monster, doing so would be a "Grave Mistake".

Liliet

Adding a single other character who would be a Soninke woman who hasn't fallen into Old Evil? Would be a Grave Mistake? How & why?

Shveiran

Having one would be perfectly fine.

ADDING one for the sake of more diversity wouldn't be, because it would be bending the need of the story to chase after something called "perfect representation" that does not, cannot exist.

It is a temptation one must avoid, or you never stop one-upping yourself and your story suffers because of it.

Trying to be inclusive is awesome; trying to include all spectrums of humanity in a single work of fiction is a bottomless well.

Allafterme

Aptly put, my friend.

Aotrs Commander

Precisely.

Clmineith

I could be completely wrong, because sometimes I miss the obvious, but isn't Cat a black woman herself? She's Deoraithe, or at least part-Deoraithe, right? And they are described as 'dark skin'. That mean... well, not white, even if you're making me doubt.

Mirror Night

Cat is Native American. Indrani is Indian. Ratface and Aisha are Arab. Masego, Weseka, Akua, Malicia are all West African.

Liliet

There are options other than "black" and "white". "Non-white" doesn't automatically mean "black". There's a dizzying array of non-white women, you are correct (Catherine, Sabah, Indrani, Aisha...), but BLACK women specifically are... Akua, Alaya, Tasia... Ain't a good look, that's correct.

This story is still better than 90% existing ones. This doesn't mean pointing out off-key beats that are STILL there is wrong.

pentephraxis

Except it's not off-key. Not at all. The story is intentionally extremely diverse in cast, for color, gender, and worldview. Going to unrealistic standards even – in an egalitarian military you simply would not get a female representation this high, and EE ignored that to make the characters more diverse.

Characters are characters. The story was originally Praes-centric rather than Callow being its own thing, and so the "ruling class" were mostly dark-skinned. There, the POCs were on top and made out to be the little-g good guys. Now that the story has shifted so that Praes become narrative enemies rather than symbolic ones, those same people are also the enemy. The very nature of the story is that people who were once your enemies are now your friends and vice versa. Thus, no matter how you slice it, some black person is going to be on the receiving end of some white person's war. If a black woman being put in their place by a white man is verboten, no matter how many white people are put in their place by black people (Black has suffered outright discrimination for his light skin), the only way to get that to not happen is to remove diversity and make there be either fewer black women or fewer white men.

Finally, the significance of black women being dominated by white men is fundamentally rooted in good old Planet Earth. Culture doesn't carry over just by virtue of being the same color. Alaya's melanin concentration's effect on her identity, her interactions, the way she's viewed, etc., are absolutely unrelated to what someone of the same melanin concentration would experience here on Earth. Praes, and the Soninke bloodline, have absolutely zero parallels to Africa, American slavery, or anything else that contributes to POCs struggles in modern day America. Hell, it's not even an Earth thing so much as it is an American thing – in, say, the UK (which EE is from!), pretty much nobody would interpret it in a racial context.

The “metanarrative” is being used as a defense here, but a meta-narrative is all about finding patterns in the complexities of the story. This isn't a complexity and it isn't a pattern. It's one isolated instance, significant only because of an aspect of the characters fundamentally unrelated in any way to the characters' identities or even the story as a whole. You may as well complain that something in the story violated the Constitution.

Abrakadabra

They could be all blue as a fuck you to sjws. 😊

Clmineith

Yes, of course. But for some reason, I was sure Cat was Black when I started to write, and then think better and realized I didn't know. Maybe because the people described as Black in the real world have skin from the-actual-black-color to are-you-really-sure-they're-not-white. I just didn't visualized her as Amerindian. The wiki has corrected me.

Also, when talking about racism and white privileges in western countries, it's usually White with privileges or non-White without.

In any case, I'm unsure there is a 'black woman put down by her white ex-boyfriend' here. If there is something to complain about here, it's that the Evil Empire is the nation of Black people. But, well, they act more like racist colonists than like oppressed people. If anything, Callow is the poor (white) nation with natural resources but lesser technology/magic often invaded by the rich (black) nation feeling entitled to plunder the natural resources because their obvious superiority. That was what I understand in the first book, and think it a nice irony.

Malicia IS a Black Woman, of course, but in a place where Blacks are the elite majority and the gender doesn't matter, I'm not sure if that matter. Like, there are the unconscious representation of races in the media, and it does matter a lot, but 'race' elements in TPGTO are not unconscious at all. There are purposely used to make points.

For me, real non-white minorities are Orcs and Goblins. Even Duni like Amadeus are more similar in status to White people from other countries in real world rather than non-white.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat is unsure of her exact parantage, as are most orphans, but from description appears to have Deoraithe and mainland callow blood, with an emphasis on the former in her appearance. WOG is that we'd identify Deoraithe as corresponding in appearance to Native Americans.

Misguided anger

Cat is a black woman. Good things happen for her, bad things happen to her antagonists who also happen to be black. Your outrage about racial roles in this work is a bit forced.

Liliet

Cat is half-Native American, she has no black heritage to the best of anyone's knowledge.

caoimhinh

All hail Dread Emperor Amadeus.
May he break the mold and mend Praes.

sivarajan

His regnal name is highly unlikely to be Amadeus.

caoimhinh

True that, but as it is unconfirmed right now, I simply called him Amadeus.

Now that I recall it, Amadeus means "lover of God", right? That's highly ironic for the Carrion Lord, given his relationship with them XD

sivarajan

I think it means "loved by God" in Latin.

sivarajan

On second thought, a name that probably means "Beloved of the Gods" in Old Miezian would definitely break the mold.

Cap'n Smurfy

Say what you will about Tyrants diplomatic strategies, you kind of have to admire the man who does the social equivalent of saying "Hey guys I invited literally Satan to the peace conference, hope that's cool. Oh and Hitler's here too."

Jane

To be blunt, I think Amadeus is making a mistake in not having talked to Alaya first. He knows that her entire thing is schemes that aren't what they first appear, that her philosophy is broadly in line with his despite a major difference of specifics in whether deterrence would also fall afoul of Story, and that he's only had second-hand accounts of what she's doing since their first major break. He has every reason to think that what's she's doing now isn't what it looks like (although it could be exactly what it looks like; I'm just saying he has every reason to doubt).

And so his reaction, when first seeing her after months of not knowing what she's been doing, while he has done little but cause a significant problem, die, and then fall in line with Cat's plans is... Demand that Malicia listen to him, then claim the tower for himself when she doesn't immediately listen. In public, where it was never even possible for her to defer to him, because it would be publicly demonstrating a lack of authority.

This is remarkably like his insistence that they should have purged the High Lords (crippling Praes's magical talent for a generation, as though that wouldn't invite invasion by Callow or the other Good-aligned nations), or his failure to do anything to build Cat's trust in Malicia, as though that didn't set her on an inevitable course towards rebellion.

For all that that Calamities were the original Woes, he just doesn't get the idea of people acting outside of his plans, or how that might come back to bite him. Oh, the plan will be a good one, and he'll have countermeasures to protect his plans since he knows something will happen, but he just won't understand something like this – like how, say, having had a nice long conversation with Malicia last night, now that scrying works again, would have avoided having had this conversation today.

Mirror Night

Yeah it really is amazing that Black didn't try to clear the air with Malicia at least one more time before his Peace Conference went down. Black doesn't understand people constantly shows up as a liability. And yeah there is no way Malicia could ever defer to Black in public, even speaking Orcish aint really a defense. Cause while sure most don't know it, Cat, Hakram, probably VIv know it. I bet good money DK does as well. I even speculate Hanno or GP could probably know it. One cannot show the level of weakness such deference would show in public in front of the whole Continent. Black is suppose to be smart and that is just dumb.

TeK

And they say he and GP are nothing alike.

Jane

I don't know that I'd say that Amadeus doesn't understand people – that seems more like Masego or the Dead King to me, while Amadeus has generally understood what to say and do to build close relationships with the Calamities, make Cat his apprentice, avoid the traditional emotional beats of Stories, and use his reputation as a tool. That all conveys a good understanding of people to me.

But it's definitely an intellectual understanding, in my opinion, where he knows what to say and do when he thinks about it – and when he doesn't realize he needs to, such as navigating a problem in his relationship with a close friend, he just seems to fail completely at treating them like a friend instead of a tool.

Or perhaps a better way of putting it is that he doesn't seem able to properly apply that understanding when he's being The Black Knight instead of Amadeus? That he's compartmentalized himself enough when planning that he stops understanding people intuitively, as he focuses on what he needs to do to win?

SpeckofStardust

His trust got shot to hell with the super weapon, and then further shot with the dead king getting set loose, both of which Malicia could and should have informed him sooner of, if she trusted him to make decisions anymore. Which she lost when he started (rather openly) planning for his death. After all if he knew the dead king would be set loose he wouldn't have been caught by the Grey pilgrim and party. Black Trusted her and frankly she showed zero trust in him for their private meetings leading up to the doomsday weapon.

Jane

To build on your point, the Black Knight was also dead-set on what very much looked like a hopeless war against an inevitable Crusade, and was making deep mistakes in his handling of Callow – and when confronted with disagreement, his reaction was to smash Malicia's plans in favor of his own. There were reasons not to trust his judgement, because he seemed only to care about his victory against the narrative of the world, over and above things like "ensuring Praes survives" and "justifying all of this money we're spending on Callow in a way that doesn't make us look like we've lost our minds".

If Malicia had told him, "I think if we happen to have a superweapon, instead of building one, it will put us in the Dead King's story of 'overwhelming doom keeping to itself' while ensuring nobody possesses the story weight of revenge to use as a weapon against us; this could protect us from the Crusade.", and he disagreed, would he have deferred to her position as Dread Empress? Or would he have just sabotaged it at an earlier point, forcing them into a conventional war that couldn't be won without unleashing the Dead King?

They both did a lot to undermine their relationship, because while the Black Knight was the leader of the Calamities, the Dread Empress has to be the Dread Empress; as the leader of an actual nation, her Empire has to come first, not the Story of their names.

Jane

Or to make a comparison – Amadeus and Malicia's relationship has been like if Cat were to abdicate to Vivienne after the war and go off to mentor the Drow for a decade, before coming back to tell Vivienne that should implement all of these different policies she's thought of.

Cat might be right about these hypothetical policies, but she's in no position to know all of the practical obstacles to implementing them, or what other plans might currently be in the works that this would interfere with – and regardless of what their old relationship might be, it's inappropriate for her to tell a Queen to do things as though they were still in their old Band of Five.

Amadeus used to be the head of their group, and certainly has valuable insights, but he turned down the Tower in favor of reforming the legions, conquering Callow, and trying to remake it into a society that will freely export grain to Praes. He knows next to nothing about what it takes to keep the High Lords in line, and keeps ignoring that fact in favor of what Praes needs to do – which is perfectly fine so long as he's an advisor to the Empress, since he's not wrong, but too often he behaved like this was back when they were a band of rebels instead of she an Empress and he her general.

And this is certainly on Malicia as well, for not setting clear boundaries – she should have insisted that she be more present for Cat’s education, for instance. But this contradiction at the heart of their relationship is the key fault line that has lead to the current problems between them, in my opinion.

caoimhinh

Except that we have seen for a fact, ever since Book 1, that Amadeus deferred to Malicia’s judgment in matters of politics and even when he disagreed he trusted her enough to obey her and let her handle matters on her end.

Amadeus also always told her about his plans, he was open about them and trusted her, it was Malicia who broke trust and did things behind his back out of fear and a need for control. We saw multiple instances that both stated and hinted that Amadeus shared his plans with Malicia, but when Amadeus asked Malicia about what she was doing about Akua, she asked him to trust her, and he did, hence Akua’s Folly happened under the auspice of the Empress.

It’s not that he left Praes and returned after decades to tell the Empress what to do, it’s that the Empress went back on what they had been building for decades to have her own personal Doomsday Weapon, which he recognized as a terrible mistake and she considered a safe gamble out of technicalities (she didn’t build the weapon, simply had it) while the Narrative Force accelerated the Crusade as a consequence (even if the Villain didn’t make the weapon, if they find it and keep it then they are a target for Heroes, as the Villain with a Doomsday Device is a threat, doesn’t matter if they created it or not).

Jane

That is not how I have interpreted the conversations between them that we have seen – that he never truly overruled her in the past sounds to me more like a practical reflection of the fact that she has formal authority and nothing would be improved by his leaving, rather than any true deference on his part. Take <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/02/17/villainous-interlude-coullisse/> for instance – he frankly ignores any complaint she makes of his conduct, while he (understandably) gets upset when she pretends she’s going to make a compromise to appease her political opposition. That is not how a general speaks to his superior; it's how a leader speaks to a misguided subordinate.

This is a consistent theme regarding their conversations; he doesn't truly see her as the Empress, even if he acknowledges the political authority that he has given her. Because their inner circle always saw him as the leader, and her as the figurehead, and they've been close enough friends that nothing has forced the issue – until now.

And honestly, even the framing you're providing puts lie to the fact that he's truly subordinate to her – “he trusted her enough to obey her”? “Malicia broke trust with him”? He is sworn to her service – he owes her that loyalty no matter how little he trusts her, and it is her right to order him as she wishes, with as few details as she desires. That's what it meant to put her on the throne in truth instead of taking it for himself – no state can function without someone clearly in charge, and that is meant to be her, not him. Obedience isn't optional just because they're old friends.

And, I would add, he himself has acknowledged that rather than dealing with the practical concerns of running the Empire, he's been focused on his own projects – the legions, being the uncrowned king of Callow, putting down heroes, so on and so forth. He has very little grasp of what Malicia had to deal with day-to-day in keeping Procer from gaining enough allies to invade, or in preventing the High Lords from doing something truly stupid. So when he says it's no big deal to give Cat the right to execute Wasteland nobility, he doesn't know what he's talking about. Just letting her kill the one would have been an actual problem if Malicia hadn't already been near to success in her scheme to break the Truebloods – his alternative was to invite a rebellion when they knew they were already out of time to prepare for a Crusade! While grooming another, more dangerous rebel, I might add. How was any of this a good plan on his part?

As for the superweapon plan, if she could have trusted him to not break her plan if he disagreed, perhaps she would have consulted with him more deeply. Because honestly, it still looks like a sound plan to me – the Dead King has relied on that story for generations, of being the big scary evil place that isn't actively threatening the world. It works for him because most traditional narratives rely on Evil being proactive, and passive dangers being a threat rather than a target

– if Malicia could acquire that level of danger without being proactive, then she should be able to step into that story herself. Is the hellportal dangerous enough to serve that function? I couldn't say, and it was broken before it could ever provide deterrence. In such a way that it still served as the catalyst for the Crusade, incidentally.

But even still... Everybody in the story agreed that the Crusade was coming, and that the Empire would not be able to prepare enough conventionally to win. And everything we saw happen was consistent with that – Cat and Black put up a strong fight on two different fronts, but would be overwhelmed by the reinforcements if they'd been given time to arrive.

So if Black wasn't preparing to unleash the Dead King himself, how exactly did he expect to save Praes, Malicia's priority? Because he shot down Malicia's plan, but his hardly seemed any more effective – just one that would make Cat less angry. She may have been wrong, but he wasn't any more correct.

caoimhinh

The thing is, they weren't simply a general and an empress, they were a team. They built the current Praes together, by combining their strengths and covering for each other weaknesses. Amadeus was not a follower of Malicia, he was her partner, that's an important thing.

So Amadeus didn't blindly obey Malicia, nor did Malicia left all matters related to Callow to Amadeus, they worked up their plans together, and only in very specific subjects did they work without the intervention of the other, like Amadeus fighting Heroes and Malicia political schemes with the High Lords.

Also, keep in mind that Malicia was aware of the Narrative Force at work, she stated as much both to Catherine and Black when she was justifying her actions. Malicia's reasoning was the if she didn't make the weapon and wasn't planning to use it, she would avoid the shackles of the Story. Her justification in front of them also included stating that she didn't consider them capable of winning, so they had to look for a way to not fight. Which would have been fine except that her method was getting her hands on one of the things they had avoided because Doomsday Weapons are Old School Villain's means and thus condemn them to Old School Villain's ends.

Jane

They were partners, but they were never equal. Malicia was Black's follower during their rebellion, and now Black is supposed to be Malicia's follower – unless she is instead supposed to a puppet or figurehead. They respect each other and are friends, but they aren't equal.

It's like how Cat's first response to seeing Vivienne in Procer was to give her a dressing down for thinking her adventure was a good idea – Cat and Vivienne are friends, and respect each other, but Cat is clearly in charge, and Vivienne defers to her judgement, even when it appears deeply questionable. And true, Vivienne gives her some lip, but not about important matters the way Black did. That's how such a relationship is supposed to work, when one party is the formal head of the nation, and the other is a trusted subordinate.

Instead, Black flouted Malicia's request to end the civil war quickly, or to deal with Cat in a way that didn't lead to another inevitable revolt.

This isn't sustainable so long as Black is in charge of Praes's military. A military that can't be trusted to listen to the orders of the Empress means that the Empire does not truly have a military of their own – they have a vassal of temperamental attitude who has an army, a situation that came to a head as soon as the Crusade began and the army was divided into camps of differing loyalty.

If they wanted their relationship to continue as before, then Black should have left the army to someone else while he acted as her independent agent. Or perhaps made him the official ruler of Callow, as a vassal to Praes with loose obligations; Malicia could have managed the politics of it.

Instead, in trying to keep their relationship the way it was before despite vastly different circumstances, they may well have destroyed that relationship.

As regards Malicia's reasoning... The Dead King's ritual was Old School Villain's means, but it's still given him millennium of protection by making him obscenely overpowered and killing everyone who might have had a grudge over the costs. If the Doomsday Weapon made Malicia obscenely stronger than the enemies who wanted to invade, without giving a story advantage to any Heroes looking to break the weapon, why shouldn't the same model work for her? Hasenbach isn't stupid – she wouldn't have invaded if she expected to face a Hell's worth of devils if she tried, no matter how much she wanted the Grand Alliance.

Javvies

Stopping the Crusade was entirely practical.

Land armies could only get at Praes/Callow by forcing the Vale – a heavily fortified and garrisoned strategic choke point.

Any invasion by sea would maybe be able to force a landing and secure a foothold, but most likely would not have been able to hold onto it long enough for ships to return with the next wave of troops.

And without the Doom of Liesse, there's far less urgency and cohesion amongst the Crusade's component members. Remember, prior to the Doom, Praes under Malicia and Amadeus had spent decades trying to reshape the image of Praes into a more or less normal nation, not one filled with madmen and Villians who urgently need to be put down for everyone's well being. The Doom destroyed all of that work.

For that matter, Malicia made the war with Procer inevitable by continuing to meddle in the Proceran Civil War long past the point she needed to keep Procer focused inwards for the Conquest of Callow. Not that Callow would have asked for or wanted Procer to get involved anyways.

Malicia kept the Proceran Civil War churning until Hasenbach decided to end it and needed to focus Procer on an external enemy in order to remain in power. Malicia either should have stopped funding everyone, or just picked a winner who wouldn't go after Praes/Callow.

Plus, Crusades end in failure.

We know for a fact that every Crusade 3-9 has ended in failure. 3 and 4 ended so badly against one of the Terribilis's that every subsequent Crusade prior to the 10th was declared against the Dead King, not Praes and the Tower.

The trend, and thus the Story, is that Crusades fail, despite their nominal advantages. Good defeats Evil ... but Evil endures and outlasts Good when it comes to Crusades.

jonnnney

Crusades often fail to create a long term change in the borders of nations, but the ones that weren't aimed at the dead king often succeeded at killing the main villain. Also you say Callow wouldn't seek help from Procer to fight against Praes when Callow did in fact seek and receive help from Procer in order to rebel against Praes.

shieldredblog

Callow didn't rise up though. Only a few nobles and their personal forces did.

The majority of the population just ignored them and even their levies turned on them and went back to work in the fields when it was all over.

Even the knights in hiding didn't bother to join that rebellion. In one extra chapter, Talbot basically pegs the rebellion as a bunch of nobles realizing Callow would never to free in their lifetimes and trying to die gloriously.

willfultrooper

There are two things that I disagree with. 1. "Black doesn't know what he's talking about" – concerning wasteland nobility and cat's blood thirsty actions and 2. Black owes Malicia his loyalty regardless of trust.

To address the first point, though Black doesn't run the day to day ruling of Praes he does in fact interact with the nobility. This is shown during Heirophants' flashback regarding his first experience with nobility when he was at a party. So we could assume that he has an idea (no matter how bad that idea is that still establishes a basis of that). It would also be out of character for Black to just give a go ahead without some idea of what's going to happen. He knows that the Wasteland nobility run the empire when he and Malicia talk about previous emperors of Praes (It was one of the bonus chapters I forgot which) so it would be fair to say he has a rough idea what the downfall of Praesi nobility might entail. The reason why he's still so gung-ho about it is because he believes that Praes might be better without the current nobility chief argument in favour would be how Praes is currently a wasteland and for the nobility's casual disregard of their actions i.e when the then heiress pillaged and looted in Callow in the civil war, Akua got away with it. They are surprisingly strong arguments supporting Black when you think about it. He might not run the empire but to say he has no idea of the wasteland nobility OR the consequences they might entail should Cat butcher them is wrong. He might have a worse idea than Malicia but he still has a fair idea of what might happen. He just weighed their value on a scale and decided they weren't really worth it.

In regards to the second point, Black does not owe Malicia blind obedience. Even a loyal dog will turn on the owner if abused enough and for Black this was the final straw. She ignored his advice on how the wasteland nobility should be handled – which might not be a sin but for Black who has seen how they act it might as well be one. He put her on the throne true. But he didn't specifically say that he would follow her blindly and even then loyalty has its' limits. In fact I would refer to that bonus chapter again when Malicia and Black talk about Emperors of Praes. Black said it was a two person deal. Their methods might differ but their goals were the same, the betterment of Praes. Black wants the overhaul and change of upper society and leadership as well as the better treatment of Orcs, goblins and others living in the Empire. Malicia was to establish strong leadership to allow for a more united and stronger empire by guiding it herself i.e giving all its resources and talent a direction outward instead of inward. Both agreed that Callow was necessary. Black through integration, Malicia through subjugation. In fact just because he crowned Malicia does not mean he would follow her blindly. That's not why he put her on the throne. He put her on the throne because her central ideology matched his. A better Praes. I don't remember when Black explicitly claimed blind obedience. I might have missed it, if so I welcome any form of discourse opposing my established points.

I do agree however that what Malicia did was a good move for both Praes and Callow, they were in a tight spot, though I doubt defeat was inevitable just that if they won it would be a Pyrrhic victory.

When I refer to Black and Malicia's talk I refer to the chapter Seed I and II. Or at least I think those are the chapter. Anyway, what I mean to say is that this chapter establishes that Black is indeed aware of the influence of the nobility. He may not say it explicitly, that does not mean he is not aware.

Jane

A fair point, but let me clarify a bit with an example; I know how a bakery works. You order the ingredients, mix them in large batches, divide them up into loaves, and sell them to customers at as high a price you can without hurting sales.

But I've never actually run a bakery in my life; I know in the abstract how it's supposed to work, and even know a few bakers, but I don't have the day-to-day experience of finding good suppliers who won't gouge me, spending all day in a hot kitchen, dealing with unsatisfied customers, or how to try and figure out the right price point for my area. Heck, I don't even know where I'd put a bakery, or what type of bakery would be appropriate for this area.

This is what I mean when I say that Black doesn't understand what he's proposing – he's used to Malicia dealing with all the practical matters of how to pacify the High Nobles, without understanding what really goes into all of those political games that Malicia plays. He knows the Praesi nobility plot incessantly and waste their strength on petty games of power, but he doesn't play them himself; he's essentially an outsider, having spent decades spending as little time in court as he can get away with.

And so while he might understand that he's asking for something politically expensive in order to keep Callow attached, he doesn't understand what Malicia would have to do to prevent the nobility from revolting – either the opportunity cost that would come from her having to spend time breaking apart any potential opposition, or in what she might have to trade away in return. Nor would he understand how that might affect her ability to keep their external enemies divided; if it was put in terms of "I can do this to better bind Callow to us, but the distraction will mean that Procer will invade five years earlier", would he be so blithe about it?

As for whether Black owes Malicia his loyalty... She's the Dread Empress, and I presume that he swore his loyalty to her, seeing as how he put her on the throne. Someone as powerful and high-profile as him must be either loyal to the throne, or removed as a dangerous element for discontented nobles to rally around. I don't mean killed, of course – he could just as readily go adventuring around the world as many other Named who don't attach themselves to a single country do. As Ranger herself did, for that matter.

But a monarch who people don't listen to is no monarch at all – and the country they claim to lead will be a powder keg ready to explode as soon as the many powerful nobles beneath them realize that the monarch's power isn't infallible, if it doesn't first collapse in the face of a catastrophe when someone hesitates to follow her orders.

To draw on a theme from the book – the woman may have friends, but the queen may only have subjects. Amadeus and Alaya may be friends, but the Dread Empress must trust that the Black Knight will obey her without fail.

Mental Mouse

You (and others) are thinking in terms of “Black must obey the Empress, because she's the ruler and he's just a general”. But... that's thinking in terms of our own world's “divine right of kings”.

But even in our own world, there's a level where that doesn't really apply, where the ground truth isn't a “God-given” hierarchy, but rather, a power balance among several “top dogs” – where a king who overreaches their actual power is liable to lose their head, when their generals or nobles stand up and demonstrate that the king's authority is not so absolute after all.

And “divine right of kings” really doesn't apply when we're talking about the self-acknowledged Evil Empire, where succession to the throne is always a “Klingon promotion”, and “might makes right” is literally the command of the Gods.

willfultrooper

I'll use the bakery analogy just to ensure we at least have a common ground. Like you said, just because I know what a bakery does does not mean that I actually know what goes on in how to manage a bakery. However let me put this in Black's perspective using the same analogy. Black doesn't know the entirety of how a bakery works but he has a fair idea, it provides bakeries to people and feeds them all well and good. However, the bakery

(or the Preasi nobility) have been making bread that is detrimental to the overall population such as food poisoning to the degree that people are dying because of it. Now they might not be dying all at once but it's a good guess to say that if this continues the entire town (empire) will have turned into a ghost town if not resolved. You don't need extensive knowledge about how to run a bakery to realise that it is a danger to the town, in fact it's safe to assume that removing the bakery would be beneficial for the town, now the outcome might be bad after the removal of the bakery i.e the starvation of the town but it is still a valid assumption to say that removing a bad thing might be a good thing. You can't say that removing the bakery would 100% result in the starvation of the town. After all, a better bakery (Black overthrowing Malicia In Blacks' current perspective – this is an assumption) might crop out or the town might realise that they don't need a bakery to feed them, they could rely on fruits or another source of food (a change in government from the nobility system to a democratic system AS AN EXAMPLE). Of course, it is still a valid assumption to say that the town will still starve regardless.

I'd also like to point out that the main reason why Black actually turned on Malicia is her siding with the Dead King. That is also not the only reason but the one that tipped the scales.

Black put Malicia on the throne because they needed, at least in my assumption, one of the two to be the publicly recognised leader of the wasteland and Black might of assumed that Malicia had a better idea and thus crowned her in dread. Now however Black has come to the realisation that the woman who is currently sitting on that throne is no longer the same woman he crown so many years ago. He owed the Malicia he crowned loyalty, but when that woman no longer believes in the same ideas he does then why stay loyal? If you swore loyalty to both king and country and the king swore to destroy the country who would you follow? The kings standard or the country's? Black may be knight sworn to the empress's service but he is also a knight sworn to Praes, though he may not have said so explicitly his actions show that he is loyal to Praes. And now he perceives that Malicia is a threat to Praes. Now Malicia might actually be right or Black might be right, we don't know for certain. All we do know is that Black believes that Malicia is acting in a detrimental fashion against Praes and he now believes that it would be better if she were removed. Now I'm not saying that he's right or wrong, all I'm saying is that Black had to choose between his empress and his country and he chose his country. Putting a crown atop her head might have made her the leader of said country it did not however make her THE country.

Jane

Ah, I think I see the point where we're talking past each other – Black does indeed know what he's talking about with his greater idea of what to do with the High Lords (kill them all, even if it means civil war), though he seems to underestimate the costs.

But he doesn't know what he's talking about on a smaller scale, which is what I meant – he's been out of the capital for twenty years, and doesn't know how much it complicates Malicia's position when he lets Cat kill a specific High Lord. Especially since those positions were meant to be bribes and rewards to help stabilize Praes's internal political situation.

And this matters when Black has agreed that they're not going to pursue his larger idea – if they're not going to immediately pursue purging the nobility, then they need to be properly managed until they can be whittled away more slowly.

As for Black's loyalty in general, he's free to rebel! It's how succession works in the Wasteland, after all. What he can't do is ignore Malicia's orders to end the civil war more quickly, or sabotage her plans just because she disagrees with him – not if he doesn't intend to rebel against her.

Black's loyalty if granted must be absolute, given his power and profile. If not granted, he must rebel (as he did) or leave (if he couldn't bear the thought). This is what I meant at the start of the conversation – that Black isn't doing Malicia some favor when he trusts her and follows her orders; that's just a basic part of obeying his Empress, even if their history makes that look more complicated.

Liliet

Amadeus absolutely never promised blind obedience, that is correct.

Javvies

Except that they weren't looking at a "hopeless war".

They were looking at an inevitable one, in part because Malicia kept meddling in the Proceran Civil War long past the need to keep Procer occupied for the Conquest of Callow. Not that Callow would have asked for Proceran help anyways.

Malicia honestly should have either gotten out of the Proceran Civil War or picked a winner, long before Hasenbach decided to end it.

However, the inevitable war was one that they could successfully hold off the Crusade and win. It had been done before, and, honestly, the Story of Crusades is a Story of Failure. Every Crusade from the 3rd to the 9th had ended in utter failure. In fact, Crusades 3 and 4 failed against one of the Terribilis's so badly that all subsequent Crusades would be called against the Dead King, not Praes.

The Legions would need to hold the Vales, a heavily fortified and well garrisoned strategic choke point, and the only point where land armies could get to them. That leaves a possible invasion carried by sea ... or, in other words, enough to possibly grab a foothold, but not enough to keep it long enough for the ships to return with the next wave of troops.

In short, beating back the Crusade, especially without the threat of the kind of thing the Doom of Liesse represented to drive urgency and cohesion amongst the Crusaders, was entirely practical. It would be bloody and expensive, but entirely doable.

The Doom of Liesse undid decades of work to make Praes seem like a relatively normal nation that wasn't filled with raving madmen and Villians in dire need of being put down immediately if not sooner.

Jane

The Crusades have traditionally failed in the past, yes, but those were all being fought on their home territory – terrible for provisioning an invading army, and protected by High Lords with enough ancient sorceries to break ten armies.

This Crusade would be the story of liberating Callow, however, a much stronger story – and once they break through the Vales, Callow is much friendlier terrain for them. Either they abandon Callow to the crusaders, land they likely won't reclaim after the war if they do, or they fight the war on land much more favorable to the attackers; it's also a lot less likely that the High Lords will (or even can) break out their best defenses if they're not in imminent danger.

I would also point out that most every character we saw in the story doubted their ability to actually win the war without some kind of miracle, and that I'm inclined to trust their judgement given how badly things were going for the characters before the Dead King invaded. The Crusade we saw was of the "Worst Case Scenario" sort, true, but all of the most important parties would still have joined, and a later Crusade probably wouldn't have had the Tyrant nipping at Procer's heels.

As regards Malicia's meddling in Procer, I'd point out that was being done to delay the Crusade – she knew that Hasenbach was preparing the Grand Alliance for her own agenda. Praes was just a convenient target; if she'd given Procer a freer hand, it would have just allowed them start the war earlier. Having taken Callow was cause enough.

Javvies

Amadeus and Grem both believed they could win.

Frankly, it would be bloody and expensive, but as long as your victory condition is that the Crusade stops coming after Praes/Callow? That would be entirely doable.

The Crusade would have at least half gutted itself grinding through the Vales ... if it got through them at all. The kinds of casualties it would take would have basically broken and ruined any units involved. Then, they've either got to take and occupy a broad swath of Callow to secure their supply lines (or what passes for them) then grind through Summerholm, then invade Praes proper, or leave their supply lines unprotected and try to bypass as much of Callow as they can and go straight for Ater and the Tower, which would be doomed to failure. Callowans weren't going to be welcoming them as liberators. Rumors would have been spread that the Procerans were planning on annexing Callow again.

Also, when I talk about Malicia's meddling in the Proceran Civil War, all she needed was a few years to consolidate the Conquest, then she could have picked one candidate she thought she had the most leverage on or was otherwise least likely to cause her problems (maybe one that wanted to go after the Levant or the League) and back that one, or one that would have the weakest ruling coalition. She didn't need to keep it going for as long as she did, she could have let it end years before Cordelia Hasenbach decided to step in and end it. After Cordelia became First Prince, all Malicia could do in Procer was buy some time while ensuring Procer would eventually come after Praes/Callow and maybe getting hooks into some of the possible candidates to succeed Cordelia.

Jane

This isn't the quote I had in mind (from Villainous Interlude: Coullisse), but it's close enough. Black didn't think the Empire would be prepared for even Procer alone to invade without many more years of preparation – preparation that Hasenbach had no intention of giving them, because she dreamed of ending the meaningless warfare between Good nations by binding them through diplomacy.

And Hasenbach still would have Ritual'd her way around the Vales, exactly as she did in the story, and avoided needing to force her way through the Vales. I mean, we saw how things went – Black and Cat barely held on even before the Grand Alliance was able to bring their full strength to bear. If they got the Dominion on their side, which they would have eventually, that would be enough for Procer to decisively win, absent outside interference. It happened earlier than either side planned, courtesy of Liesse, but a Crusade was coming in years instead of decades either way.

If Black thought they had a chance, it's only because he had unreasonable faith that Malicia could keep Hasenbach occupied until he could build their army up more, something that she herself seemed less certain of, and which doesn't really fit well with the way he was managing Cat.

As for the civil war... Honestly, Procer's an expansionist empire that has had its eyes set on Callow for ages; I think any First Prince had a strong chance of invading (though less effectively than Hasenbach, granted), and likely with a stronger base of support than Hasenbach started with. There weren't really any good candidates for Malicia to choose from, considering Procer's nature.

She might have stopped it earlier, true, but it would have bled out Procer less, strengthening their relative position in general – and nobody really expected Hasenbach to come out of nowhere like this. It'd have taken omniscience to see coming, considering the strength of her rivals.

Fayhem

> The Crusade would have at least half gutted itself grinding through the Vales ... if it got through them at all. The kinds of casualties it would take would have basically broken and ruined any units involved.

You realize that in the actual timeline that actually took place in the Guide the Crusade basically did get through the Vales without that being the case? Grem and Black were effectively dislodged from the Vales by that battle, and their fortifications were reduced to/buried in rubble. The Vales were temporarily blocked by Wekesa's magic, but that's just a matter of digging to get through, which is not a notably casualty-intensive process. That battle didn't even break the Iron Prince's forces, and didn't touch any of the (many, many) reinforcements we've seen on the field since.

When we continue a little further down the actual timeline we see that the Grand Alliance never actually had the time to finish digging its way through the Vales, but that's because of Malicia's unleashing the Dead King. If we remove that from the equation, then Black's granary-burning spree might have bought them some time, but nothing about how Pilgrim brought that to a stop was contingent on the Doom of Liesse or any of Malicia's other actions – meaning that presumably in an alternate timeline where Malicia let Black have the conventional war he wanted it would have ended up the same way.

This, in turn, means that once Black was stopped any forces that were pulled off of digging because of his actions would be free to return to digging through the Vales. And Praes would now be out more than half of its legions while the Grand Alliance's forces would have been reduced by a vastly lower percentage, and the actual fortifications in the Vales would already be gone. Which means that Praes. Would. Have. Lost.

And as Jane's quoted passage in her comment shows, Black even knew that himself. Hell, I'll quote it again (I hope, WordPress is tricky) because it's worth repeating.

I still disagree with Malicia's actions, but her fears were not in the least bit irrational. And the fact that Black was still insisting on conducting a conventional war despite his own prior assessment that it was a doomed approach means that honestly there are good grounds for considering him to be the one acting more irrationally between the pair of them.

Neither of them is really right here – Malicia's fears are reasonable, but I can't excuse her methods. I agree more with Black's philosophy overall but honestly how was a story-savvy Evil Overlord like him even able to kid himself that a plot to orchestrate mass starvation of civilians wasn't a villain story that'd see him put down? Just because you aren't using a flying fortress or a grand ritual to do it doesn't mean that it isn't a doomed villain story. The real tragedy of this story isn't that Black's old friend has gone mad with power and must be put down by her reasonable friend. It's that they're both wedded to their goals past the point of reasonability, and it's tearing them apart. And if Catherine wasn't around to play combination wildcard/arbiter, it would probably have torn Praes apart as well, destroying both their personal hopes and dreams for their nation. I'm not 100% convinced that arguing over which of them was more wrong is really important given that following either of their paths without interference would have led to utter catastrophe for everything they've said they believe in and are fighting for.

P.S. I couldn't find a good place to fit this in above, but I also don't agree with the people who say that Malicia could have used the Doom of Liesse to squirm Praes' way into a Dead King-type story where they're too dangerous to bother since they're not actively invading. Akua specifically built that superweapon to only be usable by somebody with the Name of Diabolist. Could Warlock have worked around that, with time? Almost certainly – but the key part of that sentence are the last two words. "With time". Because at that point the story you have is villains trying to bring a superweapon online in time to unleash it against a crusade, which is pretty much a 100% narrative guarantee of failure via heroic interference. Again, they were both wrong. That's the tragedy of it.

Jane

Just to comment on the superweapon thing, since I've defended it here...

I don't necessarily think it would have worked, just that it's not Obviously Stupid the way a lot of people suggest since we have an in-universe example of something similar working and a really good reason that they had to try something. A desperate plan with logical reasoning behind it failing doesn't mean the person was a fool for trying it.

Fayhem

I would agree that it isn't Obviously Stupid, in that there is a conceivable scenario where it does everything Malicia wanted it to. But I think the odds of that scenario actually coming to pass would be very low (it's worth noting that the in-universe example you're referencing is literally older than written history and we haven't heard of another successful example since).

I think we might actually be on the same page mostly? I believe that Malicia was desperately trying for the edge case because it would at least be a chance and a conventional war would give Praes about a 0% chance. I can't condone her doing so (especially not just to chase something that I can't see as more than an edge case) since giving Akua that much free rein can extremely easily be predicted to result in atrocity even if Malicia didn't predict the exact nature of it, but she isn't called Dread Empress because it's her job to be nice so I understand why she'd do it. I think she has to go, I think she's been wrong about more than one thing that mattered, but I don't think she's ever been a fool.

Insanenoodlyguy

One thing I am left to wonder though, and this is all background stuff that probably did happen...

Has he tried to Scry her? He's been awake for a while, he's been talking to other people, it seems like at some point he'd phone his up till now BFF. It seems like he'd have done so by now, or vice versa. It's not great if somebody isn't taking somebody's calls.

Insanenoodlyguy

... wow I wish I'd read even one more down before saying things. DAMN YOU WORDPRESS

SINISTAR

You fail to account that one of the people who knows him best, and whom has absolutely terrifying power over bureaucracy has been making steady efforts to poison their relations. And his daughter figure knows and has kept silent.

Jane

And so he never even talks to the person who had been closest to him in the world at all? Despite the fact that he knows darned well that there are things they urgently need to talk about?

If he'd talked to her only for the rift to deepen, I'd agree that we can't overlook the Scribe's role in things, but to never even try talking to him at all is purely on him – he knows that talking to her is the only way to fix things before one of them ends up dead for good.

Soronel Haetir

How exactly would Amadeus have gotten in touch with Alaya from this distance? It's not like he had the ability to look up her closest flesh puppet (which may well have been keeping DK company anyway). He doesn't even have Warlock's support anymore.

I seem to recall that he used to have a mirror shard he could use to communicate with her but I somehow suspect that was taken and not given back.

And even here he asked for both to back down some and have a chance to consider matters only to be told "Heel, you dog".

Jane

The same way that Scribe was able to get in touch with Praes. It might not be as secure a connection as he's used to, but when he's just been told deeply troubling information about her, and knows that she's attending the diplomatic conference tomorrow, he doesn't really have a choice but to talk to her if he wants to have any influence on what happens.

And for goodness sake, literally every person of importance on the continent (outside of Gigantes and the Golden Bloom, I guess) is in attendance; what else could she do but tell him to heel? If she backed down now, it would essentially be telling the world that he's the one who's really in charge of Praes.

What does her listening to him even look like in this case? He doesn't know why she's there or what she's doing – she could be announcing that she's willing to agree to a white peace out of deep sorrow for Procer's losses, for all he knows. I doubt it, but this is a truce conference, after all.

But no, his demand is "Let me handle this, while you do nothing". That is frankly insulting and arrogant of him, considering that her plan of bringing the Dead King in was the only thing that saved Praes's position for the moment, and his plan went disastrously wrong for him and almost lead to the loss of multiple legions.

Magicturtle

I dont believe scribe would be able to do it in less than a day though... At the end of the day Malicia could easily have contacted him but she chose not to. they have been a team from the get-go and for her to completely cut him out is unacceptable. Sure they have been in disagreement and fought hard with each other, but my understanding is that no matter how hard they fight they still care for each other. As, for example, seen with Malicia's reaction when learning that BK have been captured. To reiterate even if Scribe could find the puppet in less than a day (doubtful) Would anything have changed? She wouldn't change her position and would expect BK to heel. We might have gotten an interesting conversation out of it, but thats it.

Liliet

You're not wrong that him asking her to listen to him is entirely irrational and absurd and clearly him riding on emotions.

That said. You're putting all the onus for not communicating on him. Shouldn't that part be split 50/50? It's not like SHE didn't have the means to send him a message too, hmm? She, too, chose to tell him to heel in public, putting him on the spot to betray the allies he's sitting with (which doesn't just burn his bridges with them, it burns bridges of him being a trustworthy ally period, it makes him publicly break his clearly-to-everyone-involved given word). Instead of contacting him beforehand – there's only so blatant Scribe would dare be in sabotaging that methinks. And working out some sort of strategy they could follow without either of them blowing their gains to smithereens.

She did not even warn him she would be there. He learned from Catherine's GUESS. While she knew full well where he would be and what he would be doing, it's PUBLIC INFORMATION.

Even if we assume she did try to contact him and Scribe gleefully burned that bridge, he's operating without that information. What he sees is her not trying to contact him at all, what he sees is her trying to lean on the relationship she herself had already burned down and he's already made that clear to her with throwing how badly she betrayed him with Akua's Folly in her face. He sees madness and irrationality, he sees no hope at all for actually achieving anything.

So yes, that plea? That was something he needed to say for himself, for his own sake, to see her reaction. Not something he expected to achieve anything at all.

Mirror Night

I mean I think its more cause of the scrying Block and Black being out of contact. Malicia wouldn't know when Black got out and was able to talk whereas Black would. So it should be easier for Black to phone the Tower then it is for Malicia to try to call up Black in the middle of nowhere. Normally I would say the onus is on both of them to try to talk but in this case, I think Black has to make the call given the situation.

Jane

...He's been dead, and his soul trapped. That's a pretty good reason for not trying to talk to him 🤪. And before that, they did talk, once, and decided to spend some time apart to cool down (my interpretation, at least); after he was revived, it's been a matter of days, and he's been in Cat's camp (literally, not necessarily figuratively), with little practical way to get in touch with him. She's likely still trying to work out how to do so without the Jacks seeing everything.

I don't disagree that she should try to talk to him as well, but she had no reason to expect that he was going to be making a major move today, and so had less of an urgent reason to speak to him. Plus, she's not expecting him to die if he doesn't change his course, while he is expecting her to die; he believes the stakes to be higher than she does.

Liliet

> but she had no reason to expect that he was going to be making a major move today

Well, he wasn't going to be making that move if she wasn't there, I think?

What she knew was that he would be present at the conference as a representative for Praes, and that's what she needed to act on.

Jane

Eh, I don't know. Malicia attending the conference was meant to be a shock to everyone, and whatever her purpose there is, it's going to be a major play. If she tipped her hand prior to this, it would lessen the shock of whatever it is she's planning – she has every reason to think that Cat will hear whatever she tells him.

Amadeus's attendance, on the other hand, could very easily have been simple support for Cat, and settling the matter of whether he was going to be executed for war crimes; there was no particular reason to think that he'd be doing anything disruptive at the conference, and she didn't particularly need Amadeus's support when acting in her specialty.

I do agree that Malicia should talk to him, but her failing to do so just feels like much more of a justifiable mistake than him failing to talk to her.

Death Knight

What makes you think that talk would have settled anything? They've had a similar talk before, it effectively kick started Amadeus' Role waning as the Black Knight.

Remember how Malicia's Name is described? A perfectly fitting glove. At her heart and core, she is a control freak and as such will not brook loss of control for ANY reason. She won't abdicate. She won't go away to the Tideless isles on an indefinite vacation and her becoming Amadeus' Chancellor is impossible.

Moreover, Cat and Cordelia both want her dead and the latter won't change her mind on the matter (Cat would be fine if Malicia went far away but it's been repeatedly established that she won't).

So even if the talk worked and she stepped down she'd still need to die or go away for all the shit she has caused.

Black likely realized the situation and simply preempted the process. Cat said in this chapter she already told Cordelia how he would react. So if both Callow and Procer recognizes Black's claim and pledges to support it all of Malicia's supporters will defect seeing as Black has the backing of the Grand Alliance, the Goblins and the vast majority of the legions of terror and the entire Orcish race. The writing is on the wall then.

Liliet

Well, technically, Malicia will likely end up with all the remaining High Lords gathering behind her, because she's clearly the superior option to him at least and she's been pretty successful at quashing their own claims.

Jane

Amadeus is still a person – even if you're right, and nothing changes in practice, he would still want a chance to try to talk his best friend in the world out of a fatal mistake. Instead, the thought would always be in the back of his mind that if he'd just had the chance, he could have saved her life. There's a big difference, emotionally, between having had that talk and watched it fail, and in never having had that talk at all.

Not to mention, like this, he'll always wonder what went wrong, why Malicia chose this path – in seeing her reasoning and her motives, he would at least understand what happened, and be able to empathize with her reasoning instead of letting it all be some big black box.

And from a more practical perspective, none of us know why Malicia is there – if he had some clue as to why, he wouldn't be caught flat-footed, which is never a position one wants to be in before a major diplomatic conference.

Liliet

> Not to mention, like this, he'll always wonder what went wrong, why Malicia chose this path – in seeing her reasoning and her motives, he would at least understand what happened, and be able to empathize with her reasoning instead of letting it all be some big black box.

He knows what went wrong, they had this conversation already, in Epilogue III. He just kept hoping she would manage to fix it, but he knows what the break is.

Jane

Eh, I don't really agree – Epilogue III covered the immediate break between them, but they were too angry with each other to really talk, and beyond that – like Alaya said, the roots of this ran much deeper between them. There were reasons she went behind his back, and there were reasons why she had to go behind his back, and they only barely touched on those.

I mean, take Black's plan of "Give up Callow to Cat, so long as we get the grain it doesn't matter" vs Malicia's objection of "Do you really think people will so readily accept giving up the prize that so many bled to acquire?" – no doubt they could have come to a better understanding of each other if Black had been able to discuss how the transfer could be done in ways that would mollify the worst objectors, and Malicia could explain how it wouldn't just be the High Lords who would be upset, and how looking too weak to hold on to Callow would be a complete disaster for her authority. And also touching on how Black expects that strong institutions would prevent their successors from restarting the cycle by invading Callow, while Malicia explains how it would only take one bad actor for everything to go to hell in the next generation. They might not end up agreeing, but they would at least understand where the other was coming from.

We don't need to see any of this as readers, but it's still the kind of conversation the two of them need to have for Amadeus to have proper closure – or else he'll just find himself filling in the blanks on his own, while wondering how badly he's misreading what happened.

Javvies

Except that wasn't Amadeus's plan for Cat and Callow. His plan was to turn Callow into a willing vassal state through Cat.

That would necessitate Cat being able to exercise control over domestic Callowan policies and legal systems, within the broader strokes of overarching policy goals and foreign policy as set by the Tower, but one of the key things necessary to convert Callow into a willing vassal through Cat was that she needed to be able to slap around Praesi High Lords when they crossed lines set in Callow. Malicia objected to transferring any meaningful control over domestic Callowan affairs to Cat, even though Malicia would have retained control when it came to foreign policy, and the things that really matter on a broader objective perspective.

It would also have served to create a power base in the greater empire independent of and generally opposed to the Praesi High Lords, who Amadeus thinks still have too much power and are inherent threat to the stability of the Empire, but generally supportive of the Legions and, through Cat, the Tower.

Problem is, Malicia was unwilling to give up any control, even though she'd gain far more than she lost, and the Empire would be the better for it.

Jane

I was talking about their conversation in Epilogue III, as Lilliet referenced, where Cat's break from the tower was already assured, and that was literally what he said –

He explicitly says that Praes shouldn't seek to profit from their conquest, that they shouldn't seek to take land either, and that it doesn't matter who owns the country so long as they can import food from Callow.

Which is completely true in the sense that it would allow Praes to operate as a normal nation again, but which is completely insane from an actual policy perspective.

Javvies

It may be technically irrelevant to Black who rules Callow as long as Praes can buy grain and other foodstuffs.

However, as a practical matter? Black intended Cat to rule Callow as a willing vassal state, subordinate to the Tower.

Malicia didn't like the idea of Cat ruling Callow as a subordinate vassal state.

Jane

...To reiterate, this conversation took place in Epilogue III, after Liesse, where Cat is consolidating her own power independent of Malicia because that whole affair created a permanent rift between them. Black darned well knows that his original plan is completely shredded, and that the most he can hope for is that Cat won't embargo Praes because their economies are now so intertwined.

Black thinks that good enough, but it really, really wouldn't be enough in the eyes of pretty much any other ruler.

And honestly, he was pretty rubbish in with his original plan, too. Cat deeply resented Praes for their management of Callow – she was willing to work within the system, and set old grudges aside, but she never particularly liked Praes. And Black... Did pretty much nothing to change that. He gave her authority, but he never gave her any reason to like any part of Praes outside of the legions – he barely even introduced her to Malicia, his single best tool for encouraging friendly relations between them.

If he wanted a willing vassal instead of a rebellion, he really should have reconsidered his approach. As it is, all he really did was craft a powerful weapon that happens to be too busy fighting off another enemy to deal with Praes.

denimcurtain

How is that insane from a policy perspective?

Jane

It's taking all of the expense of a messy invasion and occupation, and setting all of that money and lives lost on fire. The entire idea behind a war of conquest is that what you gain at the end outweighs the expenses – without that, it's weakening yourself and angering your neighbors for little lasting gain.

Moreover, to publicly give up on the occupation of Callow makes it look like they couldn't hold on to Callow – signaling to Hasenbach that their military must have been weakened past that which was previously considered, and signaling to the High Lords that Malicia might be in a position where she can be challenged. This creates instability both abroad and at home.

This even jeopardizes the benefit that Black sees in just leaving, because if Malicia is deposed, the next Dread Emperor is extremely likely to try and re-invade Callow as their first act, to prove themselves "better" than the Empress they replaced, and quite likely tear up the Reforms. At which point Callow again refuses to trade with Praes, and everything Malicia accomplished to try and fix Praes is undone.

If they had declared war to open trade with Callow, that would be fine – trade wars are a thing. But to release a country to a borderline-hostile ruler without any perceivable benefit, that looks a lot like unilateral surrender – something that no society would accept without a darned good explanation.

Quite Possibly A Cat

It occurs to me that if Malacia was able to poison the food of enemy ships, she can probably poison the food of her own Legions.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, but that kind of trick won't work as well this time. Using it once or even on rare occasion as a Magnificent Bastard move is effective. Using it as regular leverage is doomed to failure. Whenever you have a "You will obey or all these people die" one of two things happens:

1. It's used, but now you have no leverage, and the weight of the story is that you are a fucker who has to die (See: Akua)
2. The trick, especially once it's known, is countered. Masego has an idea that some hero mage can pull off with his advice or Cat's night can pull the poison out or Akua thought of this a while ago and they've already taken steps. You have no leverage, and a whole group of pissed off that just found a great reason to saddle up with the side that wants to screw you over.

medailyfun

What if Malicia did this deliberately to legitimize Amadeus' claim before the whole gathering?

Death Knight

This exchange would not have looked this way if that were the case. Why speak Kharsum at all then?

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm not saying I'm on board with the theory, but playing devil's advocate, she's pulling a Kairos of her own. She knows she's doomed, so she shapes her downfall to be as favorable as it can. Black doesn't know she's setting him up, because nothing sells a lie as well as somebody who believes it to be the truth. He isn't in on it.

Shveiran

It's possible, sure. Though I'd argue that to be satisfying such a twist would need a rather big change of heart from Malicia's side that has not really been foreshadowed – as in, she hasn't really been set up as a martyr.

Not impossible, but I find it unlikely.

Jane

Well, she's definitely doing something.

She's been characterized as a masterful schemer, but for the entire series, she's not been shown to do much of anything – just enable Leise, something that could have been accomplished narratively without involving her character at all, and antagonize Hasenbach in their backstory, a character who is theoretically less important than her even if she's gotten more screentime. If Malicia was actually meant to be as passive or inept as she's pretending to be, she would have been introduced (or at least hinted) as such, because this isn't a poorly written series.

What, precisely, she's planning could be anything, but a "Of course I was actually on your side all along, I told you this years ago" twist seems likely enough to me, given the contrast between how she acts to Cat and her own personal philosophies – though deliberate self-sacrifice seems more off the table, in my opinion.

Shveiran

Is that your view of her? Personally, I think she was very active, just not in a flashy way. She dismantled the highborn, played 4D chess with several foreign powers set dead against her for decades, maneuvered Callow to cover for her whilst remaining weak even after the breakdown, and made a deal with Keter through little more than cleverness. And Liesse, sure.

I'm not saying she won't pull something else out her sleeve, but I wouldn't be disappointed if she didn't.

Jane

The vast majority of that is off-screen, though; it's not that it isn't flashy, but the fact that, in a narrative sense, it's part of the setting rather than part of the story.

We know that she's the reason the High Lords aren't a larger problem, but the only role that played in the story was breaking the Truebloods after they outlived their usefulness; we know she played every trick in the book to keep Procer occupied, but that's something we've almost exclusively heard about after the fact; asking the Dead King to come out when he already wanted to and was just looking for an excuse... Just really isn't really noteworthy. That makes her part of the Dead King's story, not her own.

Contrast this with Akua, who played a very active role as Cat's antagonist over multiple books before her defeat, Hasenbach, who got half the continent together to invade before outsmarting the Bard, Kairos, who takes every minute in the spotlight he can so that he can use it to betray someone, and Pilgrim, who's weight is constantly felt in the background.

Malicia has been in the story from the very start, without nearly the sort of presence the story's various antagonists have had; for that to work, she has to have either had some long-running scheme that has a lot of hints in retrospect, or to have been shown to be a lot more active. Otherwise, she just feels less important than all of the other opponents Cat has dealt with, and would feel like an anticlimax given the importance her character is supposed to have.

It's like one of those cliché stories where after spending multiple arcs defeating her rival, the character goes on to kill God in a couple of chapters – it establishes the rival as the real antagonist, and the deity the afterthought that readers think of as wrapping up the story.

TeK

I am not crying, you crying.

NerfGlaistigUaine

That was actually painful to read. Kudos.

SpeckofStardust

oh also point lead Kairos is in the lead.
But still early game here.

Bonifacio Mario Peña Jr.

Since black lost his Name.... Did he just qualify for Heir?
Is there a Usurper Name?

caoimhinh

I had thought he would have to be Chancellor first to be claimant for the Dread Emperor Name, but it seems he is just going straight to the rebellion part, right now he is only a Nameless claimant to the Name Malicia holds.
This nevertheless effectively just started a Praesi civil war.

Insanenoodlyguy

Malicia was never Chancellor. That is a path to the Tower's throne but not the only one.

caoimhinh

Yep, but that was called "Right of Usurpation", which is that whoever kills the Dread Emperor has a right to claim the Tower (check for example, the Santient Tapirs Trial).

However, Amadeus is claimant to the Name of Dread Emperor right now, so there's a pull towards that, in such occasions it was common that one would get a transitional Name, like Heir and Chancellor, before challenging the Tyrant of the Tower.

Anyone can claim the Tower if they kill the Empress, even a Nameless, but since Amadeus is already involved in Name stuff I half-expected him to get a transitional Name before fighting Alaya.

I doubt Malicia would lose her Name if everyone in the international conference recognized Amadeus as Emperor, but maybe it will weaken her and start to make the Name slip out of her like what happened to Vivienne and Amadeus?

Either way, this is definitely a pivot for Amadeus and Alaya. It will be interesting to see where this leads to.

medailyfun

Heir Name is not given as a gift for Emperor claimants, person should fit the groove, and obviously Heir groove requires something else.

Clmineith

Giving how things usually go, Heir mean probably Usurper. I bet most of the Dread Emperors earn the name via treason.

Liliet

He's a claimant to Dread Emperor. There is no need for any intermediate Name, any Name can be claimed from scratch, transitional Names are optional. See: Hanno who was never a Squire.

Casey Glick

I think Kairos had a good idea what was going to happen here and by introducing Malicia in this way invited it. Remember that Kairos wants to have fun, to play the Chaotic Evil role to its fullest, and the conventions of this universe sharply constrain him. Although he is allied with both the Bard and the Dead King, he has given Catherine enough information to strongly imply that he supports neither of their games, since their games are "stasis". Although he enjoys playing the Story, I don't think he wants to be bound by it long-term, and this is why he's become such an expert at manipulating it. By forcing the break between Black and Malicia, Kairos takes an important step at ensuring that the Old Order is well and truly broken.

If you list the top-tier Story manipulators, I think you have Black, Catherine, Kairos, and Grey Pilgrim (plus the Wandering Bard, and the Dead King). What unites all the mortal players is a certain, hem, Practicality, and desire to personally keep free of the bonds of Story. But only Cat and Kairos have been playing against WB and DK.

In short, I think Kairos is probably Catherine's closest ally in the MetaMetaGame.

Shveiran

Kairos is definitely a player, but I don't know if I'd define as "ally" someone who has goals incompatible with her.

Barthumphries

The Tyrant wants a new name. He wants to be The Betrayer, an in-world analogy for our Satan, someone who's always willing to ally with you, support you, and give you everything you ever wanted, but who will ultimately betray the Faustian bargain that you made in a way that you least expected and most regretted.

Essentially, the Tyrant wants a bit part I'm the future stories to come as long as his bit part comes with immortality.

Spellblade's Father

You've just gotta love the drow bidding over who gets to fight the dead king using dressers. It's so perfectly drow.

Allafterme

I wonder if this open break between Alaya and Amadeus is enough to draw Ranger back to his side.

Shveiran

Uh. That... Uh.

Allafterme

To be frank story itself is rather railroaded into the of death of Calamities at this point and Ranger is kind of in the back plan since Arcadian War. I just wonder if this particular story thread would bring her into the spotlights and her eventual death or EE will superbly subvert it as always...

Liliet

Hye is ancient and wise and knows better than to allow caring about someone to draw her into a path that might potentially put her in any actual danger.

This is all sarcasm, I hate her, and I really fucking wish she'd pull a mini-redemption here by actually sticking her neck out for Amadeus. But she won't.

She hasn't been a Calamity since she left. She left for a reason.

Shveiran

Also, Hye is one of the old monster that the narrative doesn't really need to die. She has no beef with the world changing, and that is what the climax will be about. It's not really a loose end, though maybe she'll become involved anyway.

We can have a good ending without addressing her (unlike, say, Malicia or Black)

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, but she might have beef with the fact that literally all her students will have to attend Cardinal.

Forrest

I might remind that the reason given for ranger leaving was that she did not like Alaya, or rather Malicia, and wanted Black to be the Dread Emperor since he did all the work. Oh, and look what was just announced.

Insanenoodlyguy

I was wondering how she'd die. That seems likely to be part of it, coming out and being more vulnerable. The Calamities do seem to be on the chopping block of fate. Amadeus might survive (though I don't think it likely by the end of this story, who knows), but I've suspected the rest will not.

Javvies

Except Ranger left because the Story of the Calamities was not her Story.

If she returns it'll not be because Calamities, it'll be because love of Amadeus. Different Stories.

Might still not end up great for her, though.

Barthumphries

She'll return because as much as she loves Black, this is her chance to kill a Dread Emperor. When else will there be one whose weaknesses she knows so well? She can't give up the chance to bag something like that.

Andrew Mitchell

Now, that's a reason that fits.

Tom

Amadeus has to survive so that he can be quoted as Dread Emperor Mr. Rogers

DNRFTW

Praes position looks pretty good right now, actually. Nobody likes them, sure, but no one's in a position to strike at them either. And their politically united, the legions are doing great and they have their doomsday magic still.

No idea why their so desperate. Let Procer and Levant and Callow and the Drow fight with the Dead King. Praes isn't threatened?

Sparsebeard

They also lost two of their most important cities, have lost the Matrons and are heading into a potential civil war between the armed forces and the clans vs the WMD rich aristocracy...

And one of their allies is friggin Tyrant!

"Tout va très bien, madame la Marquise..."

Quite Possibly A Cat

You know, I think Tyrant should defect to Team Good. It would be the ultimate betrayal. Rend the DK in the back and Wish for Amadeus to never take another Name even as he climbs the Tower. That would be another shard of the DK down and take the Dread Emperor Name off the board. Since it is the first step of his Evil scheme it will 100% work.

Liliet

I COULD GENUINELY SEE THAT

Allafterme

I said the very last betrayal of Tyrant will be to himself in the past and I still stand by my words!!!

ninegardens

Wait... so the reason that Kairos is destined to die last year (two years ago? Whenever), is because a timetravelling Kairos is going to go back in time and betray him?

...
That's amazing.

And yeah, I can totally see Tyrant betray DK and doing a final betrayal... but not here.
Now is far too early for Tyrant's final move.

Shveiran

I've long since stopped trying to predict that guy.

shieldredblog

An interesting idea, but...
That's a lot of power your assuming Wish has, used in a meta way Aspects usually aren't.
At the very least, I think that sort of thing would need Narrative weight that I don't see here.

ninegardens

So... just a random point, but why the hell is everyone convinced that Black will be forced to kill Malicia or whatever?

I mean seriously, if he says "I'm the emperor" and negotiates a treaty and then goes back to Preas and says "Hey, I got a treaty, no Crusades are coming as long as we stop making hellgates, can we please stop fucking up everything now?" is she really going to say no?

If she's doing stupid shit based on fear, and he can create a situation where the threat goes away, is there any reason for her to be killed? (And no "Justice for past crimes" doesn't count)

Jane

We don't really see enough from Malicia's perspective to say either way, in my opinion. Personally, I think she would accept "retirement" (exile) if she believed her position to be truly untenable while still being strong enough to demand some conditions, but a lot of readers believe her to desire control too much to let go in any circumstance but death.

That said, I don't know that she could accept Amadeus as Dread Emperor, given her justified concerns with him as a non-military leader – he's not really the right person to put in charge of the country, if you don't want an ocean of blood to be the result. Ironically, at this point she might actually consider Cat to be the more acceptable replacement after her diplomatic successes, though she'd probably be feeling sick the entire time if she had to hand the Tower to her rather than her dear friend.

Fayhem

> That said, I don't know that she could accept Amadeus as Dread Emperor, given her justified concerns with him as a non-military leader – he's not really the right person to put in charge of the country, if you don't want an ocean of blood to be the result.

About that! I still love the theory about Amadeus winding up as Dread Emperor Benevolent bc it fits so nicely (sorry Liliet), but literally the quote from DE Bennie's coronation is about inviting the High Lords/Ladies to change with him and work together for the future of Praes. Which is dubiously plausible if you assume Amadeus sticks to his previously stated convictions vis-à-vis the High L/Ls. BUT. This moment, right here, could presage the pivot where he actually changes his mind.

At this point I think we all know that Amadeus is not a man of lightly held convictions – he isn't changing anything he believes lightly. But this, right here, the pain of losing one of his only remaining friends not to enemy action, but from being forced to turn on her himself? There's nothing light about that. And I could easily believe in that pain motivating him to FINALLY give Malicia's perspective of Praes and what it needs real consideration.

Because let's be real, he never really has (see previously mentioned point about being a stubborn mofo). He deferred to Malicia's judgment in the matter for decades, but he never actually accepted her argument/perspective as legitimate/correct (see his exploding at her after Second Liesse). And she always knew that. And after this, I think he'll have to be asking himself something akin to what many of the commenters have been saying – could this have been avoided if the two of them had just been able to truly talk this all out at some earlier point? And if it could have (I'd say maybe), why didn't that happen? Was his own well-established recalcitrance at least in part a factor (I'd say it was), and if so isn't giving her arguments one more chance with a truly open mind the least he owes his friend's memory? Because I think if Amadeus can let go of himself for long enough to do that (no longer being tied to the same Name will probably help; see Amadeus' own statements about Names inducing tunnel vision) he actually will see Alaya's point. Flooding Praes with its own blood to wash away the parts he doesn't like really, really isn't actually an acceptable mode of reform.

ninegardens

Also, crack theory that I'd love to be true, but probably isn't:

Malica and Black have been in regular contact for the past week, and already discussed Scribes scheme, the DK, the Accords, etc.

Everything that is happening now is part of their cunning scheme.

Insanenoodlyguy

While still highly unlikely, I am now considering a possibility I hadn't before:

I had put out before the idea that Akua might become empress in an ironic twist of fate, being punished with what she always wanted now that she realizes how shallow that desire was. A new flavor of irony now presents itself to me, the other thing she planned to restore once being a similar ironic hell: As a new emperor emerges, the unlikely tolerance formed along the way brings about the triumphant return of an old name, and so Chancellor Akua begins the process of making the wasteland something better.

sivarajan

Now we find out what happens when someone lays claim to a Name that's in use. Will Alaya become a claimant too?

ninegardens

Pretty sure she is still Empress until he actually claims the super ugly throne.

...

You know all this leads to the super disturbing thought of ... this seems like Bard's plan.

Black trying to claim the throne seems EXACTLY like Bard's plan.

And when Black first heard about this, he chuckled to himself and thought "Mistake", but now it looks like he is running with it, and even though Malica is being crazy, I really REALLY do not like this idea of going along with Bard's plan.

So can we not.

Maddy.

Please?

Andrew Mitchell

Too late!

ninegardens

D:

Barthumphries

Well, this is a surprise. I just reloaded the page and there's not yet a vote post.

Go vote: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also, a typo thread:

the result of seeking diversions to distract frim his worries Change frim to from

There are more typos. Can you find them all? 😊

Jack

"I trust people to act according to their nature. Anything more is sentimentality."

—Dread Empress Malicia the First, First of her Name

Goobinator101

Good lord, the comment section on this one is something special to read but I'll digress. I am excited to see where this clown fiesta of a conference goes.

Abrakadabra

Right? Like people have ANY Right to dictate what kind of characters the writer puts in their own book. They could be all blue skinned with fucking tentacles and genitalia on their foreheads, it would not change the story one iota.

sengachi

You know what I like about Malicia and Black as a character dynamic? They've always been this way. Even before all the stuff with the previous Dread Emperor happened to them, when they were just two kids talking politics in a tavern, the seeds of this were sown.

They both always wanted to topple the existing order and build something reformed and better in its place. But Malicia, from the beginning, saw it as "I could run it better". And Black saw it as "It could be run better". From the very beginning, the very, very beginning this was a difference between them.

The fact that they're at odds now has nothing to do with the losses they've suffered or the traumas they've experienced or the atrocities they've committed. It was just the simple inevitable collision of two people with aligned but subtly different values who are both utterly unwilling to yield. And I love that. The fact that from the very beginning this was a doomed friendship. There's something very Greek tragedy about that which appeals to me.

And gods, they're both monsters. They've both sacrificed their humanity to be the monsters they are. But it's beautiful to see the motives which these humans set out with still reflected in the monsters they've become.

mavant

I'm sad for him.

But also, ROCK ME AMADEUS

Aranaya

Shit just got real

Queen

I love all powerful women and it is just such a shame that Malicia has put herself in the particularly weak position of classical Evil. I liked her a lot before the Folly.

Abrakadabra

Well. Well. If I ever write a book, everyone will be blue skinned, everyone will have a pussy, and they all will possess dicks too, on their foreheads.

FUCK YOU ALL!

Interlude: Rise, Rise

"A treaty is fooling all the people at the right time, an alliance is fooling the right people all the time. A war is when all the people are fools all the time."

– Prokopia Lekapene, first Hierarch of the League of Free Cities

The Carrion Lord's spoken Chantant was flawless, the First Prince grudgingly admitted. Almost entirely without accent, too, and it was the tongue the most people in the hall would speak so it'd been the canniest choice. After such an incendiary claim it was no surprise that the hall fell into disarray, a hundred whispers filling the room as loudly as any ringing shout. There were many faces that Cordelia Hasenbach could have watched. The Dead King, the Enemy incarnate, was seated and still not a hundred feet from her. The 'Firstborn', whose unknown tongue and strange disposition married to the sudden strategic importance made increasingly important to understand. Even the Carrion Lord himself, who she had watched for some time as he had that terse, charged exchange with the Dread Empress in some eastern tongue. The pale man's face had turned corpse-like halfway through, like a mask made of wax.

Malicia's inhabited body was not so expressive, but she'd seemed shaken as well. Perhaps there truly was genuine sentiment between the two of them, Cordelia thought. It hardly mattered, with monsters like those. The First Prince's gaze had left them before the end, though, turning to the tanned woman leaning back into her seat at the same table. Catherine Foundling's face had not lost any of the sharp angles that meant no one would ever call her a beauty, but where before she'd seemed sullen there was now a certain... carefreeness. The Black Queen's eyes had always been what softened her mien to something short of severe, Cordelia considered, but now instead of wild swings of emotion or utter iciness there was an unsettling candidness to what could be glimpsed in them. The First Prince had found her personable, when spoken to face-to-face, which she had not expected.

Which made it all the more chilling that the sequence of events the Black Queen had so offhandedly predicted last night was coming to pass so unerringly.

Cordelia Hasenbach was not above admitting when she had made a mistake, and her early assessments of Queen Catherine had been very much mistaken. She'd taken the lapses in etiquettes, the strange asides and poorly-kept temper to mean that the Black Queen was mediocre diplomat, and in truth little more than a charismatic warlord whose grip on power was maintained by terror in blood. Considering the other woman had since wheedled support out of the Kingdom Under – the likes of which had not been seen since Triumphant's day! – and somehow become the foremost religious figure of the drow and then leveraged this into the Everdark's entry into the war, it would be absurd to keep believing as much. And so much of this was absurd already, Cordelia grimly thought. How could anyone have a pitched battle with the Dominion and somehow come out of the slaughter in good odour with the Blood?

No, Foundling was not a mediocre diplomat. She simply disdained the usual means of diplomacy, which had seemed the same when it was through these that Cordelia interacted with her. Her Liesse Accords, which admittedly she professed to be as much the work of Vivienne Dartwick and Hakram Deadhand, were also a diplomatic solution coming from a woman the First Prince had once considered a canny, dangerous thug with an army. It was necessary to reassess what she'd once thought of the Black Queen, for though she was now an ally only a fool kept both eyes on the stag when hunting with a wolf. Cordelia had known all of this, or at least thought she did. Yet looking at Catherine's Foundling calm face, the barely-veiled sympathy she looked at the Carrion Lord with, she could not help shiver. For all that the Black Queen had yet to even address the hall, every person here had so far danced to the tune of her choice. Cordelia set aside the thoughts and the wariness, striking at the table as her majordomo loudly called for order. The noise withdrew, leaving a palpable sensation of absence in its wake.

"We recognize the words of the Carrion Lord," the First Prince said. "Yet let it be said, and known, that this conference claims not the authority to install or depose rulers."

Enthusiastic approval from the Dominion's tables at that, as they'd been understandably wary of the precedents that might be set today. For all that Levant now stood strong compared to a weakened Procer and bloodied Callow, it would not last forever. None of the Blood wanted foreigners to use this conference as pretext to meddle in Dominion affairs a decade from now, when their power waned and Procer's waxed. Cordelia waited a beat, for her partner in this intricate dance to step in. The Black Queen rose to her feet, demanding the floor, and a nod from the First Prince to her majordomo had it granted.

"The Wasteland's affairs are its own," Catherine Foundling said, then offered the Empress a hard smile, "at least for now. Yet it cannot be denied that the Carrion Lord speaks for the Legion-in-Exiles, and others among the Dread Empire. We may not have the right to crown him, but let us not shy from practical realities for politeness' sake."

And there it was. The line that would allow them to hamstring Dread Empress Malicia and bring the Carrion Lord to the table without granting her the wellspring of Praesi support that 'foreigners attempting to place their chosen candidate atop the Tower' might otherwise garner. Lord Yannu Marave rose and was passed the right to speak.

"The Dominion backs the right of the Carrion Lord to speak for the Legions-in-Exile and any other who come under his banner," the Lord of Alava said, his Chantant polished and practiced.

He had been the right choice, the First Prince decided. Razin Tanja was emerging as a rival power among the Blood, and one the Grey Pilgrim was taking an interest in, but he was young and not as skilled a speaker.

"The Kingdom of Callow seconds this," Vivienne Dartwick said, tone brisk.

A moment passed as the Black Queen raised an eyebrow at the drow.

"The Empire Ever Dark recognizes the Lord of Carrion and his rights," General Rumena said, sounding amused.

It – Cordelia had learned that the drow eschewed sexes, and found insult in their use – was smiling most unsettlingly, the pale blue eyes that seemed universal to its kind never blinking. It was ancient, the First Prince tell that much by a simple glance. Yet it also looked ancient. Given that the Black Queen had once casually mentioned her attendant, the one they called the Lord of Silent Steps, had been alive before the Conquest and yet looked near boyish the princess had to wonder how long it would take for age to become so visible among one of their kind. Centuries? A thousand years?

"Why don't you take this one, Leo," the Tyrant of Helike said, grinning as he winked. "Did I not say that I would allow other voices than my own to be heard?"

The Basileus of Nicae, Leo Trakas, looked hesitant at the sudden offer. The young man was unfortunately not a well-known quantity to her. Until recently his ancient office had been the lesser of the powers in the city-state, largely concerned with stewardship and ceremony while the ruling Strategos truly held the reins. Strategos Nereida Silantis had been an ally of hers, and one cultivated by half a decade of gifts and correspondence as well as fair mediation between Ashur and Nicae. She'd also died when the Tyrant took Nicae and in the chaos Leo Trakas had seized great authority, preventing the nomination of another Strategos. His victories against the Thalassocracy had since ensured he was highly popular in Nicae, though his hold on rule was a great deal more fragile than one would assume at first glance.

He'd be deposed within the month, should he blunder badly enough the people turned against him. The Basileus mastered himself, after a moment, and as Kairos Theodosian had no doubt expected him to do he chose the safe path.

"The League of Free Cities abstains," Leo Trakas said.

Which left only one vote, until Procer delivered its own.

"The Thalassocracy abstains," Sitter Ahirom said.

The man had kept his composure, but it was visibly fraying at the seams. As it would be, Cordelia thought. Magon Hadast might have been forced to break alliances to repay a debt of gratitude and prevent the starvation of his people that might follow ingratitude, but keeping company with Keter and Ater was nothing to be proud of. Much less when it was becoming increasingly clear that neither the Crown nor the Tower were quite as masterful as they'd no doubt pretended to be.

"The Principate of Procer supports the motion," Cordelia Hasenbach crisply spoke into the silence. "Four in favour and two abstentions, the motion passes. The Carrion Lord's right to speak for the designated peoples is accepted by this hall."

In the silence that followed, the First Prince of Procer mused, one could almost hear the first spark of civil war in the Wasteland.

—

It had all been going smoothly, which in Vivienne Dartwick's experience meant the other shoe was due to drop.

The Black Knight – she knew he held the Name no longer, but how could that man ever be anything but the Black Knight in her eyes? – had a seat at the table without this conference and its heart, the Grand Alliance, overreaching by attempting to enthrone him. Most importantly, the careful wording the First Prince had convinced Lord Yannu to employ had deep implications down the line. And any who come under his banner, the large Levantine had said, and the wording had been upheld even if Hasenbach had been careful not to repeat it. It meant that the Black Knight could be offered terms now, lenient ones, and that those terms could then be made to apply to all of Praes should he become Dread Emperor. As Dread Empress Malicia had earned little but hate from those in this hall, any terms she might receive would be decidedly inferior. It was leverage that might tip the scales win favour of supporting the Carrion Lord among certain Praesi, though unless the Empress outright abdicated it was good as certain there'd be a civil war between their supporters.

Not necessarily a long one, given that the loyalties of the Legions of Terror might just swing in his favour hard and early, but Wasteland wars were always nasty stuff.

Another two rounds of the tables saw confirmed the recognition of Dread Empress Malicia – even the Carrion Lord voted in favour, amusingly enough, which made the vote unanimous in favour with Magister Zoe Ixioni's assent in the name of the League – and another for the Dead King. Ashur abstained on that one, as did the Black Knight, and Nestor Ikaroi of the Secretariat voted against in the name of the League. Malicia was his sworn ally, however, and the Grand Alliance delegations had all been forewarned and agreed on common action, which meant that the majority in favour carried the vote. The King of Death had his seat and his vote, at least for now. Not that the motions had much power outside the strictures of the peace conference: they were a tool to manipulate the rules of this game through formality, not something that could be used to truly produce diplomatic results.

Vivienne had voiced the votes for the Kingdom of Callow both times, Catherine remaining silent. She knew well what it was Cat was doing, giving her the duty to speak for their shared home in front of every great power on Calernia. It was as tacit an endorsement of her as a successor there could be without Vivienne being named a princess, which would be... complicated to accomplish, and likely require her adoption into House Foundling. Setting aside the thoughts, Vivienne forced herself to sharpen her focus on the proceedings. Though the Dead King had yet to speak a word, little more than a grim sculpture of bones, the Empress had no shared such compulsions. With a pleasant, sonorous voice – Vivienne wondered if the body had been picked for it – she opened her part of the dance. The Carrion Lord, a mere landless rebel, had been allowed to address the hall while the rightful ruler of Praes had been denied the same right, she said, which was miscarriage of procedure.

It was not an unexpected assault. Hasenbach had named it a likely avenue, since refusing the Empress would taint the appearance of fair proceedings and accepting would allow her to go on the offensive while bypassing the agreed-on order of affairs. Which would otherwise keep her contained until hours into the talks simply by speaking of very little Praes could weigh in on.

"We recognize the words of Dread Empress Malicia of Praes," the First Prince said.

Malicia's mangled puppet smoothly rose to her feet.

"The Dread Empire cedes its speaking right to the Thalassocracy of Ashur," she smoothly said.

Ah, Vivienne thought, almost grimacing. And there went the first stumble in the plan. Tightening the vise on the opposition by hammering home how isolated the League and the Empire were one motion after another wouldn't work if Ashur withdrew from the Grand Alliance formally before the talks had even begun. Sitter Ahirom rose to his feet, acknowledging the First Prince's evenly spoken recognition of his right to speak with a nod.

"I speak now the words of Magon Hadast, citizen of the second tier of the Baalite Hegemony, Sitter of the Eminent Committee," the man said.

A heartbeat of silence passed.

"As of this day, the Thalassocracy of Ashur declares its withdrawal from the Grand Alliance and all attendant treaties," Sitter Ahirom said.

Few across the room were surprised, and those that were told much to Vivienne. The Dominion had been brought into this early and the Firstborn had only middling interest in matters unrelated to the war against the Dead King, but the lack of surprise did come as a surprise to Sitter Ahirom himself. It was as the First Prince had speculated, then: Ashur was good as blind on the continent, and clutching at any offered driftwood that would prevent it from drowning. More interestingly, there was a great deal of surprise among the League's delegation. Not Magister Ixioni, though, Vivienne thought. Helike and Stygia were traditionally kept close alliance when the League was at war, as they fielded its finest armies and typically both benefited greatly from strife. A Tyrant's rule also meant that Below held the reins in both city-states, buoying Evil in the Free Cities for a span.

Delos and Atalante had both had no idea. The general from Bellerophon still looked lost and afraid of asking questions, but the two Penthesians were calm. Better at hiding their thoughts, or in the know?

"Penthes?" Vivienne murmured.

"Theodosian owns and informs them, I'd wager," the Black Knight softly said. "Prodocius has an emperor's ambition and the wits of a well-bred trout while Honorion is afflicted by that peculiar condition where one comes to believe that gold makes up for any and all shortcomings. Scribe has theorized the Tyrant ensured they'd be the last two claimants because they are singularly inept at anything but banquets and squabbling."

"If he leans towards one we could back the other," Hakram suggested.

"Tyrant's too canny for that," Cat grunted. "He'll have them both convinced he's secretly helping them against the other."

"The Empire has influence there as well, through trade," the Black Knight said. "Penthes is a dead end. Nicae might not be."

Basileus Leo Trakas looked like someone had slapped him across the face. He was a handsome one, Vivienne thought, though less so when his eyes were narrowed in surprised anger.

"He doesn't know about the ships yet," Vivienne quietly said. "Otherwise he'd be storming out. Trakas only thinks he's about to get strong-armed into backing off Ashur by his own side."

"Agreed," Catherine said. "He's not smooth enough to keep it in the pot if he gets knifed that hard and deep in the back."

"Then we approach him during the recess," Hakram said. "We lack proof beyond the Tyrant's own words, which only a fool would take, but the groundwork can be laid."

"Hasenbach tried to use Nicae as a counterweight for Kairos and that went over about as well as pepper in a kennel," Cat reminded them.

"If enough of the League's armies keep withdrawing to their territory, it no longer matters that Theodosian is dominant," the Black Knight noted. "He'll no longer have the strength to collapse Procer or invade Callow, which effectively muzzles him."

Which would be ideal, as far as she was concerned, since acting against the madman outright was likely to see them burned. If he could instead be dragged back into the lesser squabbles of the League of Free Cities until the war against Keter was brought to an end it should be significantly less risky of a proposition. Which meant bending the individual city-states, and that would require significantly more pressure than the coalition had brought to bear so far.

"We need to strike while they're still uncertain," Vivienne said.

Catherine looked at her curiously.

"We out it now, Cat," Vivienne said. "It's out of the order, but then so was this. It ought to put them on the back foot again."

The Queen of Callow considered it for a moment, then nodded.

"Hakram," she said, "find me an in."

The orc's brow creased as he put his superb memory to work.

"This isn't a motion, it's an address," the Adjutant said. "Which means we can ask for right of reply on if what we speak of is associated. If the First Prince grant it, which I'd venture to assume."

Catherine's lips quirked into half a smile and she turned.

"Do it."

Vivienne started in surprise, looking at the woman that was both her ruler and her friend.

"This isn't a vote, Cat," she said. "It's-"

"I know what it is," Catherine said. "It was your notion, and a good one. Besides, you're the one who'll reign under it. Speak the words."

Vivienne breathed out shallowly. But it was too late to flinch, to fear. It'd been too late since that night in Laure where she'd chosen to bet on the Squire. She rose to her feet.

"The Kingdom of Callow request right of reply," Vivienne Dartwick said.

Cordelia Hasenbach, tall and fair and with eyes like chips of ice, considered her for a moment.

"We recognize the words of Lady Dartwick, heiress-designate to Callow," the First Prince said.

"Pertaining the Grand Alliance, as addressed by Sitter Ahirom," Vivienne said, "we declare now before Gods and men that the Kingdom of Callow is a member and signatory."

copaceticcockroach

For Liliet: Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

For Others: The Queen of Callow considered it for a moment, then voted. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Insanenoodlyguy

"If enough of the League's armies keep withdrawing to their territory, it no longer matters that Theodosian is dominant," the Black Knight noted. "He'll no longer have the strength to collapse Procer or invade Callow, which effectively Votes for Practical Guide to Evil on Topwebfiction”

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

BarthHumphries

Don't leave a naked vote thread without a covering typo thread!

None of the Blood wanted foreigners to us this conference
Change us to use

There are several more typos. One meaningless internet point to everyone who can find one!

Mental Mouse

> “The Empire Ever Darks recognizes the Lord of Carrion and his rights,”

Empire Ever Dark.

Javvies

Heh.

Ah, Cordelia. Realizing that you've consistently underestimated Cat has to be a little embarrassing. At least you're figuring it out now, and it's not exactly open embarrassment.

Viv doing all or most of the talking is going to make whatever Cat says all the more important.

Oshi

Which is the point I would expect. Cat is being careful to set the ground. This is the game of mortal rulers at the moment.
The story is about to come up and that's where she will be needed.

Zgggt

I somehow have a feeling that Cordelia prepared herself for winter!Cat, and will end this day when finally having no one else around and a long string of profanities

Liliet

Well, it's less embarrassment and more sheer terror, at the moment ;u;

I mean even Catherine was creeped out by how exactly she managed to predict this ♥

Mental Mouse

Admittedly, Cat's continuing record is still made of WTF.
(Which for her can also stand for "Won The Field") 😊 Cordelia may be on the back foot, but at least she's managing to dance.

Shveiran

It is, admittedly, Cordy's home turf
miles

Cat also can't make deals with them, as she's a villain. Viv has only ever held a heroic name.

Liliet

This shouldn't matter, given who else is at the table.
Between the drow and Carrion Lord, the matter would already have to be set – and then they recognize Dead King and Malicia which just clinches it.

Oh, and then there's the Tyrant of Helike.

Oshi

And the dance continues. Still no surprises to come out yet, I wonder when the other shoe will drop.

Hellspirit

I'm like a child at Christmas \^^/

Jane

Vivienne, stop picking up bad habits from Cat. It seems harmless now, but the next thing you know, you'll have that hall burning with goblinfire.

erebus42

In Callow, a peace attempt without some mild arson is considered a dull affair.

hakureireimu

Wait a minute...you can't just declare yourself to be a member of the alliance, unless the members already agreed, in which case it is no longer a secret.

Shequi

Unless you're at a point where said Alliance has just lost a founding member and desperately needs to be supported lest it collapse. And Cat does have the support of both the Dominion and Princess Rozala, guaranteed, which probably means Princess Cordelia as well. So the only other part of the Grand Alliance would be the Thalassocracy of Ashur... except that it just quit, removing the impediment.

Liliet

Yep. Ashur was the last piece of puzzle missing and oh look it's just fucking voluntarily removed itself

onedollargum

Nice summary.

caoimhinh

Next chapter they are gonna be like "That's right, Ashur, we voted without you. Because we knew you would withdraw. We have predicted you" and the poor spokesman will feel even worse and more at a loss. Hahahaha

Oshi

It's more likely that Ashur will be sidelined and used as a tool to mess with the league. It might be a permanent state of affairs given how this is shaking out.

Hitogami

This sounds like a comment made by Dread Emperor Irritant 😂
😂

Liliet

More likely the vote will be held right now immediately. "Procer recognizes and agrees." "Levant recognizes and agrees." Aaaand that's the end of it. Nobody who's not a member has a right to say anything about their procedure 😊

Shveiran

I like Shequi's view that this already took place behind closed door and with Ashur's removal it changed from "most members agree" to "all members agree" whether or not Ashur ever voted on the subject.
But it could be you are right, I didn't consider it before. It effectively ends the same unless a big reveal is coming.

Liliet

But why would they have held the vote without Ashur in it? That's just rude towards it, and they want it back.

Some Smartass

You can when the alliance's naval strength just decided to turn tail and you're the only land border with Praes.

Quite possibly a cat

They must have gotten Ranger to sign them in. She is half elf, so she is allowed to break one mortal law at a time.

Liliet

omfg bless

Shikkarasu

Ranger: [s]I can be defeated[/s]

Also, it only just hit me that Saint of Swords had an anti-elf Aspect. She can [i]add[/i] laws to creation. F—king well done, EE.

Andrew Mitchell

Next time, change those [] to angled brackets and your formatting will work. 😊

erebus42

“Boom bitches!” – Robber probably (if he had been part of the delegation)

Liliet

Nah, he doesn't speak like that.

More like “Booom!” and gleeful cackling as everyone flinches

Fayhem

And then the explosives go off for real, unless Cat remembered to frisk him.

/joking but not joking but mostly joking

The Spurious Spectator

Frisking Robber sounds like Cat has a firm -delegate to Adjutant- policy on. After all, its not like he's going to lose a hand over it or anything

NerfGlaistigUaine

A short interlude update... sigh. Don't get me wrong it's a great chapter, but I feel like I got half the drug when I need the full dose. You're going to leave me craving more the entire weekend.

Anyone want to debate on who would win in a fight – Irritant vs. Traitorous? Come on guys, entertain me!

Oshi

Traitorous.

ChillyPepper

Dread Emperor Unexpected.

spornol

Nobody expects the Nicaean Inquisition!

Nafram

Only after revealing he was Irritant all along

WuseMajor

We already had this vote. Irritant won because the vote was split between Traitorous and Grandmaster Ouroboros of the Order of Unholy Obsidian.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I thought that was a favorite/popularity poll. I mean if the two went toe to toe, mano a mano

gnaruscat

Would either of them actually mano in person? I see an emperor slapfight as most likely outcome

konstantinvoncarstein

Irritant have a better grasp of story-fu, so he would have a head start. But it is difficult to know for sure.

Liliet

They would immediately make an alliance. A terrifying, terrifying alliance.

ninegardens

“My dear and trusted friend, who I would never lie to, nor betray”

Liliet

Not at all. Irritant had >50%, Traitorous and Ouroboros summed together couldn't have taken him either.

Daemion

Irritant is abusing a loophole in the rules to prevent himself from ever losing, Traitorous is a munchkin who has only one tactic applied to everything because this is how he wins every single time.

Their conflict would never end, each of them would have his victories only to discover they mean nothing. It's a draw.

Or it would be... if their battle was even possible. There can be only one Dread Emperor at a time, they'd never be able to fight each other in the first place. 😊

Liliet

I suspect if they were claimants at the same time, Praes WOULD end up with precedent for two Dread Emperors.

They'd be like Catherine and Kairos, or I guess like two Kairoses, dancing the dance for their mutual amusement and understanding and never trying to actually get rid of the other because who else would they then pin all the blame on?

ninegardens

Oh God. Kairos would love this so much.

Way back at the start, Bard told him he needed to invest in better enemies...

If he could only duplicate himself, then he would have the best enemy of all. Himself.

...

Actually pretty sure he's going to do that anyway, come to think of it.

Oshi

Yep, this is what I'm waiting for. Kairos is stamp is that there is always going to be a Kairos.

Barthumphries

Traiterous would win of course. But Irritant would find a way to still be irritating, so I guess it depends on how you define "win".

Naeddyr

Traitorous would win, but Irritant wouldn't lose.

Sun Dog

Traitorous betrays himself, fouling Irritants plan to lose in a way advantageous to himself. Both are eaten by tapirs, who still don't have the right of usurpation. Pears as a whole shrugs and moves on.

ethericsentinel

The Dread Empire of Pears is then usurped by Dread Emperor Autocomplete.

Quite possibly a cat

If only Cordelia could have got Cat in like two books ago!

Liliet

YEP

caoimhinh

Nice, Interludes started. Time for the back and forth of the political schemes and traps of technicalities.

Hold on to your belts, people!

We are in for a string of deliciously painful cliffhangers, each one leading to the next, and making us crave for more each time!

Made a meme to further illustrate my feelings :v

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, very, very nice. 😊

daegone823

I can totally see how this debate between nations must be boring the fuck out of both the above and below lol.

Above and Below:

"There like where is the drama where is the angels, not even the threat of a doomsday weapon"

Above: "Man what happened to our puppet bard wasn't she supposed to turn one of them into a hero so we could interrupt then below could do something too...."

Below: "B00000RRRRRIIINNGGG!!!
Where is the blood where is the knives"

Bard: Give me a couple of days I got soemthing in the work"

I think even the fact that most princes, the pilgrim included sacrificed there right to rule also is nice. Or the fact that Chat did not bring her crows despite knowing the dead king would attend.

In a way this is the most fair interplay the nations could ever hope to have(no interference from Gods). This is the Dark Knight's Dream realized which is why he no longer needs/has his name. Which is probably why he views Malicia's own intrusion/motives to be a betrayal, she is committing a mortal sin. She is stopping forward progress, she is standing in the way of his grand design finally bearing fruit, which is a recurring theme. (Sve Noc, Fae, the tribes). No one wants to read the same story over and over, especially if it is already a boring story.

I wish I could e a fly inside of the dead king's head he has probably been in many assemblies like this in some fashion or another. Hopefully he is as entertained as I am.

Mental Mouse

> I wish I could e a fly inside of the dead king's head

LOL!

Liliet

I love this.

I love Cordelia noticing the subtleties of sentiment involved, even as she dismisses them as unimportant (unimportant right now, at least). I love her getting fucking terrified of how wrong she was about Catherine but also going on a paragraph of musing about her face which is just. Yeah okay I did not expect that god fucking bless ;u;

I love Vivienne making clear some of her views on Amadeus (AAAA I WANT MORE THIS IS LIKE DANGLING A CARROT ON A STICK IN FRONT OF MY NOSE), I love her being terrified of stepping forward but steeling herself and doing so, I love her being clever as clever gets and that involves asking her own table for input because they have knowledge and insight that she doesn't (AND THAT INCLUDES AMADEUS AHFFF)

I love the League creaking and swinging side to side as Kairos gleefully sets his own side on fire.

I love everything about thisssssssss

SpeckofStardust

The Tyrant is still in the lead point wise, gaining even more by allowing Ashur to get 'saved' causing it's removal from the Grand Alliance giving Callow the chance to make this play.

Crash

If it wouldn't absolutely fuck with everything Cat has planned I would have like to see Vivienne come into a new name as the Diplomat.

With Creation came discord

She has spoken a grand total of like what less than 10 sentences at a diplomatic forum and already she embodies the role of a diplomat strongly enough to come into that name? I mean I know this story has a strong protagonist bias but that might actually top the list of things where the world works according to different rules depending on who it's impacting.

Raivshard

She's not going to get a name. Ever.

That's the whole point of Cat naming her the heir to Callow and the Accords proscribing Named from meddling in the affairs of nations.

Liliet

I somehow doubt Accords can prevent her from gaining a Name. They're brand new and don't have that kind of weight.

laguz24

She also cannot forge a new name like that, new names are formed in archetypes and based on who they are not what they represent.

Liliet

Oooh thank you great phrasing!

Names form out of archetypes.

Raivshard

The Accords won't have that strength for a good long while, true, but as we saw with Cordelia, a Name can be rejected. Vivienne knows what's at stake and will go out of her way to avoid screwing it up.

Liliet

It can if the conditions are right for you to get a choice. Agnes had to work hard to give Cordelia the B button on that.

Interlude: All Ye Villains

"In studying our histories I have cast aside old mistakes, instead embracing fresh and interesting ones."

– Dread Empress Atrocious, later devoured by man-eating tapirs

The games being played on this marble floor, Hakram thought, were no less deadly than any played axe in hand. Perhaps even deadlier, for an axe took one life at a time while here a streak of ink and a sharp phrase could kindle the death of thousands. Most of his kind despised the ways of the Tower's court: the poisons drunk and spoken, the colourful clothes worth a manse and the alliances that came and went faster than the tides. It was not that orcs knew nothing of treachery or cunning ways, for though the Adjutant had long left behind the Steppes he still remembered the spoken histories and there were betrayals aplenty in the tales. Some were spoken of as reverently as great deeds unsullied, for though the treachery was not in question neither was the greatness.

Aslog Ironfoot's warbands turning on Warlord Gorm at the Battle of the Lights, bringing bloody end to Eldest Horde. Dagmar Hardteeth allying with the Queen of Okoro to murder their rivals by sorcery and surprise at the gathering of the thaw. And lesser betrayals, too were spoken of, not worthy of legend. Not even a century ago the Blackspear Clan had broken alliance with the Howling Wolves at the incitement of the Painted Dogs, allowing warbands through their territory, and then ambushed the returning Dogs to take the spoils of the cattle-raids. No legend had come of this, no tale save that Blackspear blood flowed without honour. No, Hakram Deadhand did not believe the Clans to be made of finer stuff than the rest of Creation, for their history spoke otherwise time and time again.

Yet his people disdained those who made sport of their own word, those who pretended to valour and honour while acting otherwise. And there was a sense of that, hanging around this great hall. Vivienne's words were ringing still, yet the harvest of surprise they reaped was meagre indeed. A few of the Tyrant's playthings, the Thalassocracy's man – who like the nation he stood for was this day isolated and out of his depths, ship bound to currents unknown – and those few scribes and translators too low in status to have warranted warning. The Dread Empress of Praes, wearing a mutilated and marked body like a coat, betrayed no surprise. Neither did the grinning devil known as Kairos Theodosian, or the utterly still corpse inhabited by the Dead King.

It was the first of these that Hakram was most wary of. Malicia had lost the reins of much she once commanded, but the most dangerous part of the Empress had ever been her boldness and clever mind, neither of which had been taken from her. Catherine thought her half-spent a force, with jackals circling the Tower and her realm deeply wounded, and dangerous mostly in that way a desperate villain tended to be. The Adjutant was not so certain. The Empress had not even attempted to bring the Carrion Lord to her side, by scrying or sent agent, this he knew for a fact: as the Eyes had people in the Army of Callow, so did the Jacks have people among the Legions-in-Exile. And the Scribe would have forewarned them, if those eyes were fooled, for the Adjutant understood her in a way most frightful.

He would act in similar manner, if Catherine was preparing to throw away her life and life's work.

And so while the hall twisted and turned, twining around the already half-known revelation that the Grand Alliance had known of Ashur's unfaithfulness and behind the Thalassocracy's own back prepared answer of its own, Hakram Deadhand watched the Empress. Malicia was not beloved of his people as her right hand had been, still was, for unlike the Carrion Lord she had neither been warlord nor tireless defender. Yet she was respected, by the wise among the Clans, for having enacted the Reforms without needing to cram them down the throat of the High Lords by civil war as the Black Knight's iron-handed ways might well have required. She had been good the orcs in a way few of her predecessors could boast, and never given slight without reason nor meddled in the affairs of the Clans beyond the old rights of the Tower.

Malicia had been a fair ruler to his people in most regards, Hakram thought, and looking upon the puppet-thing she now wore he could not bring himself to believe her to have gone the way of the Old Tyrants. The Empress had bought and paid for the Doom of Liesse, it could not be denied, yet meant to use it to serve the principles she had once writ in her treatise 'The Death of the Age of Wonders'. She'd since used only the blades of assassins, sharp intrigue and the sole doomsday weapon of the Warlock that was already known to Calernia. Still Water was a thing of terror, true, but it should not be forgot that in the eyes of most in this room that terror had already been laid at the Empress' feet.

She lost little by using it, and gained from the use a great fleet as well as means to influence Ashur into leaving the Grand Alliance. It had not been a careless or desperate act, he thought. Which meant Malicia's keen edge had not faded, and nothing of the play taking place in this hall was a coincidence. Not even that raw thing that the Carrion Lord's voice had carried, when he good as begged for a reason not to turn on her. It'd be a damned cold thing, making that cut on purpose.

But cold was oft the winner, in Wasteland games.

"Catherine," the Adjutant whispered in Kharsum, leaning closer to her. "I think we are being had."

Tanned face set into a calm look as she studied the hall, his warlord slowly nodded.

"There's no swing in them," the Black Queen murmured. "This isn't their game. We misread them, Hakram."

As was often the case whenever Catherine's eyes narrowed and her twisty mind wandered down paths the rest of them could only dimly glimpse, Hakram was forced to take a moment to parse what she'd said. Not enough swing. As in the opposition was not putting up a fight, and so without pause she had decided it meant they saw what was happening as not worth fighting over. It might be argued instead, Hakram knew, that Callow's entering of the Grand Alliance was good as certain, and so the opposition had not considered it something that could be fought. Yet the Adjutant's instincts sung in accord with his queen's, for one did not face the longest-reigning Dread Empress in the history of the Wasteland and the King of Death himself and received so little 'swing', as his warlord had said.

Vivienne sat down even as a clarification was requested by the current speaker for the League of Free Cities – Basileus Leo Trakas once more – as to the veracity of the statement made by Lady Dartwick. Confirmation from the First Prince and Lord Yannu Marave followed.

"If they have no stake in this, then their victory lies not in a contested field," the Carrion Lord quietly said.

"That would mean they're not looking to get anything out of this conference," Vivienne said, her Kharsum still a little ragged even though they regularly practiced together. "So why are they even here?"

Catherine's hand half-reached to the pockets sown within her cloak, before she remembered it would be unseemly for her to light her pipe before so many eminent rulers. She forced it back down and let out an annoyed hiss through her teeth. Odds were, Hakram fondly thought, that she did not even realize how around greenskins she tended to mimic their manners. That particular manner of hissing couldn't properly be done without goblin teeth, for unlike theirs human teeth had no gaps when put together, but more than once Adjutant had seen goblins shoot her almost awestruck looks when she did it before them. There was a reason half the goblins in the Army of Callow considered her to be a Matron in human flesh, and contrary to what Indrani kept insinuating it wasn't the height. Well, not only the height.

"Where else are they going to get a gathering like this?" Catherine said. "What happens in the conference is as dust to them, I bet. But they've got an audience with the powerful of most Calernia here, don't they? They're hear for the ears, not the tongues."

Utter silence seized the room, sudden and oppressive. Half the hall was watching the same thing, and Adjutant followed their gaze. The Dead King he saw, had moved for the very first time since his body sat. His skull had turned to gaze at Catherine, hollow sockets empty and unblinking. The slightest of tremors was going through the skeletal thing, Adjutant saw, and for a moment he did not understand. Then he did, and his blood went cold.

The Dead King was looking at Catherine Foundling, and shaking as he laughed.

—

The Enemy was laughing.

Cordelia Hasenbach was not one to boast of bravery, for hers were not the gifts of courage on the field, yet neither did she consider herself to be faint of heart. And yet the sight of the Hidden Horror's silent tremors of amusement sent a shiver up her spine. That the monster was gazing unerringly at the Black Queen as he did only made it eerier. The blonde princess did not allow it to reach her face, or seep in her eyes, instead thinking of Hannover. Of the city broken once more, walls torn down and her kinsmen slaughtered to the last. Cordelia thought of the brave men and women who'd died on those walls, keeping dawn from failing just a little while longer, and when cold wrath roared through her veins she fed it the fear. Composure returned to her, for that anger was an old friend, and finally she gestured for the page standing behind her table to step forward. At her side, Agnes suddenly stirred.

"Magon Hadast was killed," the Augur said.

Agnes, she saw, was staring at the Carrion Lord. The page passed Cordelia a sealed scroll, bearing scarlet wax stamped with the heraldry of the Order of the Red Lion. She set it down and turned a sharp gaze on her cousin.

"Is he dead now," Cordelia whispered, "or is he going to die?"

Agnes blinked sleepily, a look of utter frustration flickering across her face. It took her a moment to speak again, as if she had to piece together once more when and where she was.

"Soon," the Augur said. "Many branches but always he dies. The spider waited until he was too deep in the web to turn back."

There is nothing anyone can do. Too quick. All the paths are dead ends."

She hesitated, scowling.

"They are learning," she admitted.

The spider, Cordelia thought. There were some who called the Scribe the Webweaver, in the Wasteland, yet the Augur had used the word before to mean another. The Assassin, who more than once had tried to take her own life and that of people dear to her. Had this been the order of the Carrion Lord, then? The other villain was said to answer to him alone. Ashur had made bargain with Malicia, and so Magon Hadast was to die? It would sow chaos, Cordelia admitted to herself, until the old man's successor consolidated power. The heir that'd been groomed before had died at Thalassina and now only distant relatives remained, none of which would be a deft hand at navigating the Thalassocracy's labyrinth of committees and bureaucracy. It was still unacceptable, if it was truly the Carrion Lord's order.

Magon Hadast had long been her ally, and for his defection now she blamed him not as the Grand Alliance had failed him before he it. He might yet return, besides, given time enough for it. To have him so casually ordered slain was a foul thing, though no less than should be expected from a rabid animal like the Carrion Lord.

"Darkness looms, Cordelia," Agnes murmured. "Tarry not in opening the scroll."

Lips tightening in sudden wariness, the First Prince reached for the parchment and broke the seal. She unfurled the scroll and her eyes moved carefully across the contents. This was not a direct report but instead the welding of several, from across broad swaths of Procer. Three names in particular caught her eye: Prince Otto Reitzenberg, Prince Gaspard Langevin and Princess Beatrice Volignac. The ranking commanders on the three northern fronts of the Principate, at least in principle. Prince Otto's words were coming from the Morgentor, the last fortress held in Twilight's Pass, and though he cautioned of the Enemy possibly laying a trap Gaspard of Cleves and Beatrice of Hainaut were both seeing the same thing. And like Prince Otto they'd followed the dead carefully. Cordelia turned to the awaiting page.

"One whose authority was the scroll sent?" she curtly asked.

"Anselme of Beaudry, Your Highness," the man quietly replied.

A telling detail. Anselme of Beaudry was the ranking officer of the Order of the Red Lion in Salia, and Cordelia had chosen him for that office in large part because his cautious and meticulous nature. He would not have sent such a scroll without first making certain there had been no misunderstanding or sudden change. The First Prince quietly thanked and dismissed the page, mind racing, before glancing meaningfully at one her closest attendant. The young woman approached discreetly.

"Have word passed to the Callowan and Levantine delegations that I will put forward an extraordinary motion for immediate recess and I would request they support it," Cordelia said. "There is urgent need for a private discussion between us."

Cordelia allowed time for the messages to be passed, through Razin Tanja for the Dominion and the heiress to the Barony of Harrow for Callow. When the First Prince of Procer asked for immediate recess soon after, the vote in favour was unanimous. The Enemy's gaze moved towards her as it deigned to vote for the first time that day, silently raising a hand in approval.

The Dead King had yet to speak even once, and some part of Cordelia Hasenbach felt blind dread at that realization.

—

Half an hour of recess had been voted on, and Hakram found himself part of the handful of guests invited into a nearby parlour by the First Prince. The Blood were likely to be brought in as well, he guessed, for whatever it was that Cordelia Hasenbach had learned it seemed to concern all signatories of the Grand Alliance. The Carrion Lord's presence along with Catherine, Vivienne and himself was a reality all involved politely refrained from looking in the eye, as the man was deeply despised in Procer and might well have been excluded from such talks if not for the Queen of Callow's influence. It was an almost amusing turn, that after early years of relying on the Black Knight's power and influence it was not the same man who was relying on his former pupil's instead.

There was an almost feverish energy to Cordelia Hasenbach, Adjutant saw when they entered the parlour. Though she was composed as ever, she was standing instead of seated and looking at her gave the sense she had a burning urge to pace that only manners were keeping at bay. Catherine limped in ahead, eyes considering as she took in the sight of the full roster of the Blood as well Princess Rozala. Liveried servants offered refreshments that all refused, and Hakram noted with exasperated amusement that his warlord's eyes were lingering a little longer than necessary on Rozala Malanza. Half the Blood too, though he was surprised that among the men she seemed to prefer the almost orcish frame of Yannu Marave to Razin Tanja's, who was much closer in age.

As she was less than discreet he wondered if offence might accidentally been given, but if he was reading the expression correctly Lady Aquiline Osená looked more flattered than anything else by the roving eye. He met Vivienne's eyes in shared aggravation behind Catherine's back, though he figured at least they should be pleased she'd not been undressing the First Prince of Procer with her eyes. That might go over poorly, he thought. As the others advanced and went to stand with the other nobles Hakram remained at the back near the threshold, where he could watch from a distance. A set of eyes removed from the thick of it was often more useful than another wagging tongue, he'd found, and he'd always disliked wandering into arguments without first taking the measure of all that was being said.

"Thank you all for coming," Cordelia Hasenbach gravely said. "And for your trust in aiding my motion."

"You seem to have received news," Lady Itima Ifriqui said, rather bluntly.

"I have," the First Prince agreed. "I have received reports from all three northern fronts against Keter, and they all speak to the same truth: the dead are retreating."

Exclamations of surprise from many here followed, though not Hakram Deadhand or the queen that had chosen him as much as he had chosen her. Catherine Foundling's hand went inside her cloak and Adjutant, Name tugging at his feet, was moving before she could even begin stuffing the pipe with a satchel of wakeleaf. He struck a match a heartbeat before she extended her pipe, lighting it neatly, and was offered a thankful flash of pearly teeth before stepping back. The nerve of the Lord of Silent Steps, that it'd think itself fit to step in between the ordained cogs of fate with its little moving tricks. You didn't need to move swift as an arrow to see too things, just leave at the right time moving to the right pace.

"Does the Hidden Horror seek to hold the northern shores against us?" Lady Aquiline frowned. "It hardly seems necessary, given his advantages."

"It will allow us time to bring our armies to bear, regardless," Lady Itima said. "A blunder, this."

Catherine blew out an acrid stream of smoke that had Lord Yannu wrinkling his nose in distaste at the smell.

"No," the Black Queen said, "it wasn't. We just got knifed in broad daylight, make no mistake about that."

It amused Hakram a great deal that though several of the great nobles here suppressed distaste as the spoken 'us', not a single one of them denied it. It seemed that his warlord's usefulness had at last outstripped the distaste these righteous folks had for the colour of her cloak.

"You believe this to be a scheme," Cordelia Hasenbach said, then sharply nodded. "I agree. This is a poor decision by the eye of a general, which means it was made by another."

"They're going to offer us a truce out there," Catherine said, jabbing a thumb towards the wall.

The wrong one, Hakram drily noted, if she meant to point towards the hall.

"They?" Lord Yannu calmly asked.

"This is, if not outright the plan of Dread Empress Malicia, at least in part her notion," the Carrion Lord tiredly said. "This sort of manoeuvre is her very signature: weakening the opposition then posing great incentive to keep a truce that allows her to further work on dismantling her enemies without the direct use of force."

First Prince Cordelia would not doubt be the first of that western lot to grasp what exactly it had meant, when the Hidden Horror had extended Catherine an offer to sign the Liesse Accords last night. The implications of it, in the long term.

"We have no reason to accept this truce even if it offered," Razin Tanja flatly said. "We war against Keter to the end, and Dread Empress Malicia makes herself enemy to all that live through alliance with it."

Vivienne Dartwick had spent years in the shade of one of the great villains of their age and yet more in the service of another, so it was no surprise she caught on quick.

"If the decision was made solely in this room, you would be right," Vivienne grimly said.

"They will be seeding rumours of the offer of truce even as we speak," Cordelia Hasenbach told them all. "In Salia and everywhere they can, which given the reach of the Dread Empire and the Tyrant of Helike is far and wide."

Her lips thinned.

"There will be riots if we push for prosecuting a war against the Dead King in the face of offered peace while the north is months away from collapse," the First Prince said. "Mayhaps even rebellion."

"The odds are strong that the Empress will declare a treaty of mutual protection with Keter," Lord Amadeus calmly said. "The Dead King ought to agree, as otherwise there would be free hand to settle his sole reliable ally."

"Why should we pursue if the Hidden Horror retreats to his lands?" Lord Yannu Marave bluntly asked. "Is that not the victory we sought to achieve?"

The King of Death had not even yet spoken, Adjutant darkly thought, and already he was drawing blood among the Grand Alliance's ranks.

"You would call this victory?" Razin Tanja scathingly replied. "Keter coming and going as it pleases, massacring any who oppose it?"

"Are we then to send armies to die in the Kingdom of the Dead for the sake of your boyish swagger?" Lord Yannu harshly retorted.

"Better honourable death than a coward's disgrace," Lady Aquiline sneered.

"This is what he wants," Princess Rozala said, voice cutting through the rising noise. "Chaos among our ranks. It is why he is marching north instead of south, because if he does not we are a threat."

"Well said," First Prince Cordelia calmly added. "Make no mistake, my friends, the Enemy cares nothing for peace. He has only ever known truce, and ever broken it when suited him."

"We have yet to speak of the League," Lady Itima said. "The Tyrant offers aid to their wicked lot and sows chaos in his own ranks. It is madness, and I would not let a hound gone sick lounge at my threshold for long."

"That is the nature of Kairos Theodosian," Catherine said. "He will set fires until either the world is ash or he is."

She had not spoken loudly, but it commanded the attention of all in the parlour. She blew out another stream of smoke, visibly savouring the leaf.

"Can't set fires if there's nothing left, though," she idly continued. "And that's what happens if the Dead King wins. So I'd suggest we all save ourselves some trouble and invite the Tyrant of Helike in here."

She grinned.

"I'm rather curious how long it'll take him to sell out the King of Death, this time."

mavant

"I'm rather curious how long it'lll take him to vote, this time."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

mavant

I have cleverly also started the typo thread here, by inserting a typo of my own.

It was totally on purpose.

ChillyPepper

Then I shall take your offer and introduce said typos in here.

any played axe in hand > played [b]with[/b] axe in hand (I'm not sure about this one since I'm not proficient in English) good the orcs > good [b]to[/b] the orcs gained form the use > gained [b]from[/b] hear for the ears > [b]here for the ears[/b] arrow to see too things > to see [b]to[/b] things

ChillyPepper

I am also clearly bad in formatting on wordpress.

Andrew Mitchell

Angled brackets rather than square brackets.

Shikkarasu

Test

Test

Test

Test

~~Test~~

Isi Arnott-Campbell

You're awfully testy today.

Liliet

Played axe in hand sounds right to me.

Mental Mouse

> Which meant Malicia's keening edge had not faded,
Should be "keen", she is sharp not shrill.

> Catherine thought her half-spent a force
Should be "a half-spent force", as given it becomes ambiguous.

> yet meant to use is to serve the principles
"meant to use it"

> "One whose authority was the scroll sent?"
on whose authority

> First Prince Cordelia would not doubt be the first" no doubt > several of the great nobles here suppressed distasted as the spoken 'us' distaste at > he wondered if offence might accidentally been given, offense might be given (Mostly the Guide sticks to American spelling)

Liliet

'half-spent a force' sounds right to me

Fayhem

Eh, not quite I think? I think EE just accidentally a word, since "half-spent as a force" matches what appears to be the intended format and leaving out a conjunction is such an incredibly easy typo to make if you're writing quickly.

Liliet

Nn, I think it's right. "It's not so big a deal",
"Catherine thought her half-spent a force". It's a rare phrasing but its a real grammar thing.

gingerlygrump

Agreed. Adjutant narrates in a rather old-fashioned manner, so these linguistic peculiarities fit his usual cadence. He's gotten more formal as the story progressed, too, as though the administrative functions of his Name are tailoring his thought cadence.

Liliet

I would say he's not so much formal as high literary style poetic. "Grinning devil" etc.

Fayhem

Which matches his demonstrated fondness for reciting poetry (while breaking bones, but hey he is an orc, let's not project our cultural standards here). Good catch, both of you – I hadn't noticed that Adjutant's narration style differed in that sort of way, but now that it's been pointed out I think that's right.

Still disagree about the grammar tho 🤪

Liliet

Hakram is a warrior poet and I love this aspect of his character ♥

Fayhem

s a m e

Fayhem

Mm, I certainly know “not so big a deal” is valid? My research on that (because I'm a me) suggests that adjectives of quality would be valid in that formulation, but (at least some) adjectives of quantity would use the “[adjective] of a [noun]” formulation rather than “[adjective] a [noun]”.

However, “as a” is different from “of a”, I think, and “as a” is the formulation I think applies – I certainly wouldn't suggest “Catherine thought her half-spent of a force” would sound right. Let me see if I can put together a convincing example. “Weak” is a similar term to “half-spent”, so I'll use that. If you think a, let's say, prince is a weak ruler, would you say you “think them weak a ruler” or that you “think them weak as a ruler”? I'm unfortunately struggling to find the precise grammatical terms to define why, but I think the second one seems correct and the first one does not. Do you disagree?

Liliet

“Think them weak a ruler” doesn't sound right to me, but “despite them not thinking him so weak a ruler” does. Maybe it's the ‘not’? I feel like it's a sentence complexity thing, with dropping the particle becoming allowable if it's at the end of a looong complicated flourish.

Fayhem

Hmm, I do agree that “despite them not thinking him so weak a ruler” sounds better, but I think it’s the “so” that makes the difference since “despite them not thinking him weak a ruler” doesn’t sound any better. In either case there’s neither a “not” or a “so” in the formulation Catherine used. If “Catherine thought her weak a force” doesn’t sound right (which I don’t think it does) then I don’t think “Catherine thought her half-spent a force” is any better since unless I’m mistaken “weak” and “half-spent” are being used as the same type of part of speech in both cases.

Also bless u for actually appearing to be interested in this conversation, this is usually the type of discussion that Appeals to Nobody but Fayhem.

Liliet

OH MOOD re: type of discussion that Appeals To Nobody But Liliet. Sounds like we’re buddies here.

And I think it’s the ‘half’ in ‘half-spent’ that’s making it sound ok to my ear? ‘weak a force’ or ‘spent a force’ doesn’t sound good’ but ‘half-spent a force’ does. Maybe it moves it further away from adjective and more towards verb form?

Fayhem

> Sounds like we’re buddies here.

You can’t see it because this is the internet, but imagine you’re receiving some kind of very grammatical fistbump here.

“Half-spent a force” definitely sounds better by comparison than “spent a force” BUT I can’t see what is actually changed about the way the applicable term is being used or the role it is filling in the sentence. So that makes me feel like it’s just obscuring that it’s not valid instead of actually making it valid. Like, it makes it feel less obviously incorrect, but if nothing is actually changed by it then it must actually be just as incorrect, is the reasoning I’m going on there.

Liliet

-meets the fistbump with own fist-

You might be right in strict grammar sense, but I would argue this is one of those places where grammar can be bent in favor of poetry as Hakram's personal narration style. It would sound more correct without this deviation, yes, but it would sound less like him – and it's comprehensible either way.

Fayhem

Hmm, maybe – I do tend to focus on determining the technically correct formulation because as previously mentioned I'm a me. So you could def be right about that.

Liliet

I learned 90% of English grammar informally because as a foreign speaker I only was taught the sturdy basics. Approximately 50% of Guide sentences would be 'incorrect' according to how they taught us to do it at school, you know? So I'm used to picking up on informal expression. Sometimes it trips me up as I assume something is informal that's actually just wrong, but in this case it really does sound much better as is to my ear -\\/(0_0)\\/-

Fayhem

See, English is my native language and I'm honestly very fond of it, but I will very willingly admit that if English-language instruction was honest then every "rule" they taught you would come with a footnote reading something like "except for sometimes randomly not, because fuck you it's English, that's why". I can usually file that under "endearingly quirky" myself, but I've always thought I would expect that for someone actually trying to learn English for the first time "endearing" would likely be pretty far from the first term to come to mind.

I actually did also learn most English grammar informally tho, because I was homeschooled on a very self-directed curriculum all the way up until college, and my parents only insisted on actual formalized study of math during that time period (because they expected, correctly, that I would not be able to "informally" pick up on how to do algebra etc.). So determining grammar rules by this kind of process of "does this sound right, and if so why or why not based on relevant examples or comparisons" is pretty much exactly how I've always done it lol.

Javvies

It's because the English language has mugged all kinds of other languages and stolen their stuff/ words (and rules for those words).

Like ... seriously, the English language has major Germanic roots, but also extensive Latin/Romance connections, plus Celtic influences, plus Norse influences. Plus Greek.

And that's before it ever got off the British Isles. Whereupon it started nicking stuff from languages even more distant.

English is an evolved common tongue from a place that everybody invaded conquered and settled, but nobody could run away or otherwise be displaced from.

Fayhem

> It's because the English language has mugged all kinds of other languages

Yup! The line that... I think it was Stephen Fry? – anyway, the line that whoever it was had that I liked a bunch was that English doesn't so much borrow words from other languages as chase other languages into dark alleys, knock them over the head, and rifle through their pockets for loose vocabulary.

Javvies

This is true.

I can't remember who the first version of that line is from either. But it's a good line, and while a hilarious mental image, it's basically accurate.

Although ... for most of the development of English it was may have technically been less chasing them into alleys for their linguistic distinctiveness and more of a beating up and robbing the burglars who broke into its house before tossing them back out the door.

Wait, I just realized something – the English language is the Borg of languages.

Trebar

"It was an almost amusing turn, that after early years of relying on the Black Knight's power and influence it was not the same man who was relying on his former pupil's instead."

not -> now

Aston Whiteman

No update today then..

Will wait for Friday.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

There is one, it's just that EE forgot to add it to the sidebar.

Here: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/10/09/interlude-so-smile-tyrants/>

Aston Whiteman

Thank you for your consideration

mavant

There's one today! <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/10/09/interlude-so-smile-tyrants/>

antoninjohn

Kairos Theodosian the Dead King thought you were his friend, he trusted you how could you possibly betray him.

Slider

"It seemed to be the most entertaining thing to do at the moment, and what would life be if we didn't enjoy it?"
-Kairos Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike, on the question of his betrayal against the Dead King.

Zgggt

"More enemies is a fantastic way to make diplomacy fun" – widely attributed to Kairos Theodosian, unknown time (assumed at the betrayal of the Dead King)

Halinn

Which of them?

TeK

"This plan involves making an enemy of one of the most dangerous men on this continent for no tangible gain," Anaxares said. "It is not a good plan."

"Don't be foolish, advisor," Kairos said. "Making an enemy of one of the most dangerous men on this continent is the point of the plan, not a side-effect."

Decius

Then the frog told the scorpion "I've spent the last several years developing an immunity to your venom."

wirelessgrapes

Catherine is the kid in 3rd grade who already knew negative numbers and is just stunting on the rest of the class

NerfGlaistigUaine

I'm sad to say that was me. I was also the kid in 1st grade who knew how to carry in addition and trolled my teacher by giving her two numbers that couldn't be used to show carrying. Three times in a row. Yes, I was a little bastard and still am.

Andrew Mitchell

I approve. ♥

ICSM

As a fellow teacher, if a teacher wants to show a new concept and ask the student for an example, he kinda deserves being trolled. It is just asking for trouble.

sengachi

Ah, I still remember being a little 3rd grader, looking out the window of the car, and then asking "Hey Mom. If $7-4=3$, what is $3-7$?" And then spending the rest of the trip learning about negative numbers. Good times.

Someguy

>"I'm rather curious how long it'll take him to sell out the King of Death, this time."

Oh. That's easy, "INSTANTLY".

Amy Lear

Instantly?

For his great and true friend Catherine, he will have already sold out the Dead King before the question is asked.

caoimhinh

Indeed he did.

Kairos already told 3 secrets to Cat the previous evening, forewarned him of Malicia's use of Still Water against Nicae and her actions to move Ashur, plus he helped Cat glimpse a bit more into the nature of the Dead King.

He's a true friend of Cat XD

Fayhem

> He's a true friend of Cat XD

You know, I think that's actually literally true, in his own (awful) way. Though I don't believe the reverse is. I can't decide if that makes me more sad happy or more happy sad. But either way I'm certainly amused.

greatwyrmgold

Catherine is the only person who understands Kairos. Of course he values her.

Stephen R. Marsh

I'm seeing this as the intercessor's play finally coming in.

Should be interesting.

a_man_in_black tangle, retangle, untangle, tie the knot again. Erraticerrata i love your writing. i absolutely love every chapter of this story you've written. but i truly feel you're running the risk of getting too clever for yourself. the over-arching plot has grown tangled and confusing. if i have to re-read the last two dozen chapters to try to figure out what is going on, things have gotten too complicated with the intrigue.

i read this story for the awesome adventure and tales of anti-heroes and heroic villains. the politics, double-speak, spy vs spy drama and intrigue are only useful wherein they enhance that. such things have long since taken over the story, and you're losing me the same way wandering inn did, albeit for different reasons.

Jane

I mean, one of the consistent themes of this story has been that strong institutions and diplomacy ought matter more than wandering heroes and grand adventures – which would be why Cat's ascension to godhood mattered less to her ability to fight Procer than her alliance with the Drow, and why the decisions made in that room at this moment will affect the course of the war far more than anything Hanno's band of heroes can. Not to mention how Cat's overarching goal in this story is purely political in nature, and few adventures can get a treaty signed.

Cat's only one person, and despite her personal power, she's one of the weaker monarchs in that room (setting aside her influence over Drow policy); it's only natural that we'd see the political angle grow as Callow becomes less isolated, and Cat becomes a power in her own right.

I don't mean to argue with your tastes, but I don't see how the Guide could stay true to its founding themes without scenarios like this.

Shveiran

I think he is arguing the intrigue has grown too complicated, not that it should be less relevant to the plot.

I don't really agree, but I think he is making a different statement.

Mental Mouse

Well, we are headed toward the usual closing Xanatos pileup.

Liliet

Ask questions and ye shall receive. The fandom is following, and the fandom is here for you.

Short recap: Amadeus has been reforming Praes to do a little less starvation+war. He recruited Catherine into the cause, so now she's leading Callow with an eye to allying with Praes long-term also. Alaya was also with him on this, but their vision on how to do it and what they actually want out of it has grown far enough apart that their alliance broke, so now Amadeus is chilling at Cat's. That's the east.

Catherine has allied herself with the drow and made treaty with dwarves to attack the Dead King as soon as the rest of the surface forces attack him. That's the north.

The Grand Alliance considered Amadeus's conquest of Callow to be unacceptable, and did not brake in time when Callow was actually granted factual independence again, and went into a narrative trainwreck trying to invade it (that's Procer and Levant) / attacking Praesi coasts (that's Ashur). Now Dead King is attacking from the north and they're in a tailspin that Catherine is trying to pull them out of because she wants continental unity for her own reasons, and also fuck Dead King. She has just formally announced joining the Grand Alliance, which Procer and Levant are also in. The plan was to counterattack him and then kill him, hopefully. That's the west.

Levant isn't really INTERESTED in attacking the Dead King per se, but it's the right thing to do, so they're tentatively in. They're currently the one nation NOT touched by war, and so in one of the strongest positions on the board. No-one else has anything to coerce them with.

The League of Free Cities is currently acting more like a single entity than a loose coalition of city-states because of the election of a Hierarch, except the Hierarch is Anaxares of Bellerophon who isn't doing much ruling and is doing fuck knows what (a current point of plot tension: where even IS he???). Kairos Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike, is the dominant military power with a talent for intrigue and so is more or less telling the rest of them what to do. He also ~~suffers from~~ enjoys Chronic Backstabbing Disorder, and so no-one can predict what the League is going to do and who it's going to side with at any given time. Catherine can sort of follow Kairos's logic, though, so she's the current most successful Kairos Wrangler. He seems to enjoy that.

Ashur got their fleet wrecked in attacking Praes, then got besieged by the League (the fleet of one of its cities, Nicae, to be exact). They're an island that doesn't grow its own food, so a blockade is literally starving them. They're not in a good position.

That's the south.

Of all that, there are currently two major coalitions: The Grand Alliance And Allies, and The League of Evil (name not canon). The former is the faction that Catherine consolidated, and they are the people who are present in the room where the discussion is happening at the end of the chapter. Levant and its rulers, called the Blood; Procer and its First Prince, Cordelia Hasenbach; Callow and its Queen, Catherine; drow and, well, also Catherine tbh, though they had Rumena speak for them formally at the conference.

The latter, the League of Evil, is very freshly formed. It consists of Neshamah, the Dead King; Malicia, the Dread Empress of Praes (Alaya); and Kairos Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike. Neshamah and Alaya have to be allies because Neshamah invaded on her invitation in the first place: she's desperate for him to take the heat off her because otherwise she's out of allies completely, and he's also kind of desperate because if he doesn't come up with a clever way to stop it, Catherine's faction WILL wreck him. And then Alaya, in close succession.

Kairos is there because they asked, and will shortly turn on them because Catherine asked. That's just how he rolls.

Catherine's faction currently has overwhelming military (and narrative) advantage. They are facing two problems, however: 1) internal cohesion. Very recently most of these people were trying to kill each other. Amadeus is a part of it, and a year ago he ordered Assassin to kill people in Ashur before cutting communication with him, which is now coming to bite everyone in the ass. The Good folks don't like or much trust the Evil folks, and Levant has no skin in the game in the first place; 2) Procer is broken to fucking pieces, and it's the geographical and factual center of the alliance. Their population doesn't want to fight anyone anymore and is angry at everyone at the same time. The military advantage is only real as long as there isn't an internal rebellion, and that seems to be what Neshamah is after exploiting.

If his plan succeeds, the Grand Alliance And Adjacent will have to back down, leaving him alive, the drow more or less homeless (because the plan was to conquer the Kingdom of the Dead as their new homeland), and Alaya untouchable because they'll have a mutual defense pact. That would be bad.

The goal Catherine is after is to prosecute war on him, while setting up for Alaya to be overthrown shortly after. Amadeus in this plan takes over as Dread Emperor after her.

Hopefully this is helpful.

Mental Mouse

Except that if Catherine abdicates... well, Callow joined the Alliance, but the Everdark didn't. Also, Cordelia has fairly well unified Procer, while Cat has gained swing with the Levant, so it's not so clear that the Alliance is so ready to stand down. Especially since with Procer's north in rubble, they can point out that any treaty with DK leaves him in an unacceptable advantage for the next round.

Liliet

> Except that if Catherine abdicates... well, Callow joined the Alliance, but the Everdark didn't.

Hm.

Well, it's still a worse option that involves the breakup of the alliance.

Insanenoodlyguy

Pretty accurate, but I'm not so sure of your timeline. I suspect that the east can not be left unattended while the north is a problem. In other words, she has a bit under 3 months to install Black as emperor and get the east to march north with the rest of them. Or at least sends him off to go do that thing with a little help while she takes the main army up north. Because "Even the Devil we know just showed up in good faith to crush the real BBEG" is a solid story, especially when "I gave my word" is in effect (where several parties expect the evil guy to betray them at the last moment and that moment comes and goes while they shrug and say just that. Can't have that story without winning first!)

A civil war cannot be resolved in under 3 months, story or not, I suspect, but a coup/assasination might be. And that is literally considered a perfectly valid succession rite over there.

Liliet

Yeah, Amadeus is totally definitely going to assassinate Alaya.

I mean, you're probably right about everything.

I'm just thinking about that part like eeeeeeeh yeah this alliance is a MESS.

Shveiran

Nicely done. Kudos.

Liliet

> he former is the faction that Catherine consolidated, and they are the people who are present in the room where the discussion is happening at the end of the chapter. Levant and its rulers, called the Blood; Procer and its First Prince, Cordelia Hasenbach; Callow and its Queen, Catherine; drow and, well, also Catherine tbh, though they had Rumena speak for them formally at the conference.

And Amadeus, leading the Legions-In-Exile as a claimant to Praes. Duh.

Fayhem

Nicely done! One update to the bit on Ashur that I think is super relevant right now: the blockading League fleet from the city of Nicae just got Still Water-ed (Still Water is the same ritual Akua used on Liesse's population to undeadify them) by Malicia, which means that she turned every person in it into a wight under her control. So Nicae's fleet is now Malicia's fleet. Tyrant helped introduce the necessary alchemical agents for Still Water into the fleet's water, which we know because he basically just proactively bragged about it to Catherine because Kairos. We don't know (unless I missed it) exactly what reasons Kairos had for doing this beyond "because Kairos", but he's a twisty fucker so there's probably something nasty on top of that.

Nicae doesn't know any of this yet. They're probably not going to like it much.

Liliet

Yeah, I neglected to clarify what was up with Ashur altogether in this refresher. It's a recent enough revelation I figure nobody reading serially would have forgotten / lost track of it yet lmao

Fayhem

I feel like (from my own experience, not pointing fingers anywhere else) you should never underestimate what can potentially slip by someone, especially if the starting premise is that they're having a hard time figuring out the premise for what's happening right now. I don't feel as if I'm having trouble following what's happening in Guide right now, but my experience with stuff where I did feel like I was having trouble following is that I could miss stuff that other people thought was clear because I had trouble understanding the context that would make clear what things were important. Idk if that applies here for anyone lol, that's just the basis of what I was thinking.

Liliet

Good point. My experience is mostly with remembering the last couple of plot beats but being utterly confused wrt any other context, with further-reaching plot threads vanishing into grey fog of 'stuff is happening'. Too many details making it impossible to track what's happening large scale; so I tried to minimize details and go over broader dynamics instead. After all, rereading the latest arc will help solve the problem of missing the recent details, but will not solve the problem of failing to understand who are all these people and what they are doing here.

There isn't really a perfectly right answer here, I feel =x

Fayhem

> There isn't really a perfectly right answer here, I feel =x

Yup! I refuse to dwell on any similarities to life overall. 😊

greatwyrmgold

So...the coalition fighting the League of Evil could be abbreviated to GAAA? Shame we can't force an H at the end...

erebus42

Awww isn't that sweet, Cat just invited Kairos to sit with her at the popular kids table.

She does make an excellent point about Kairos though, there really is no fun to be had in a dead (or undead) land.

SyperNyce

Kairos' entire gimmick is change, while a running theme of the Dead King's entire narrative arc is that without direct interference from the living, the undead never change. Gods are even worse about it, so as a self-inflicted undead God, the Dead King is most likely to a T the exact same person he was when he died his first death, only with that static id applied to a dynamic environment.

He can certainly do all of the creative things he would have thought of before he died, and as a very intelligent monster that is a great many things, but he seems to be incapable of drawing out something entirely new – which is where someone like Malicia comes in, full of new ideas.

That makes Kairos a great foil, too, because how else do you get one unchanging tyrant to beat another unchanging tyrant other than offering up an infinitely changing bag of tricks for them to chuck at each-other blindly? Sure, most of Kairos' Spy-vs-Spy powergaming won't stick, but eventually one will.

What happens when it does, though? Hegemony and stagnation.

Sure, the Dead King has a lot of interests and priorities, but they will be sated. Eventually, he will settle on an endless but ultimately effective task like murdering all the angels with the power of bone or something, and he will stick to it forever, or at least 'forever' relative to a timescale that matters to the plot, and more importantly, Kairos' lifespan.

Even if the sudden grinding halt to chaos doesn't make Kairos totally impotent, he will simply be cornered by frail mortality. The only way to beat that would be to apotheoses and make himself the now-all-powerful Dead King's next eternal enemy down the list, another loss.

Worse, even if he tolerated that, the Dead King will by definition never, never ever get bored. Zero opportunities to exploit. He will not change his mind, because it's what he would have done in that situation, and naught else. Once his present objectives are complete, it's unlikely he will respond in any friendly manner to attempts to set new ones, as that would again digress from his original self. You're in boring angel war hell forever and you can't even old age your way out of it.

Insanenoodlyguy

It occurs to me that this is why he loved Triumphant so much. She was that change-allower that did so without being antagonistic towards him. For the first time in a long time, he was getting new IDEAS, and without having to get them from somebody trying to kill him! No wonder he still pines for her.

erebus42

Also Hakram being jealous of Ivah is both hilarious and adorable.

eamon DeMarsh

where is that?

erebus42

After Hakram was a good boy and lit his Queen's pipe for her with out fancy Night tricks.

"The nerve of the Lord of Silent Steps, that it'd think itself fit to step in between the ordained cogs of fate with its little moving tricks. You didn't need to move swift as an arrow to see too things, just leave at the right time moving to the right pace."

Mental Mouse

There was a similar incident a ways back, when Cat heard a brief scuffle before Hakram put the Cloak of Woe on her back.

Liliet

Nah, it's Ivah who's jealous of Hakram. Hakram is disdainful of Ivah.

It's adorable.

ChillyPepper

They both want to be mommy's favorite kid.

Shequi

Careful, Catherine. The one thing that the Tyrant is even less faithful to than Allies is consistency.

Oshi

It will cost them the White Knight and the league to get this but well I guess we'll see.

konstantinvoncarstein

Hanno has not tried to kill him yet, and the Tyrant is a part of the conference. If he can help them against the DK, Hanno is probably willing to wait before killing Kairos

Taichi22

We get it already, Cat. You vape.

caoimhinh

LMAO, Hakram is jelly of Ivah and feeling possessive of the position of something as small as lighting the match for Cat's pipe.

He's like "Catherine only needs one Adjutant, thank you very much."

On a more serious note, Hakram stating that he would act the same way as Scribe if Cat were to "attempt to throw away her life or her life's work" shines like a beacon to me as a flag and foreshadowing.

Given some hints since quite a while ago from Catherine that she plans to "step aside" once the big messes are over, it seems that it will fall on Hakram to snap her out of it if she goes for a more extreme measure like the death route.

Shveiran

He will try. He may even succeed, given it is him. Yet it is an uphill battle.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, because I don't think he'd see it as the same thing.

Cat's destiny isn't "I will rule" it's "I will be the one that says 'DON'T MAKE ME COME OVER THERE.' and have it STICK."

She won't rule Callow, but she will rule Cardinal, albeit perhaps not as a queen.. She will instruct those chosen by fate how to act and when they do not act right take those named who have sworn oath to her, both good and evil, and march them right over there to show exactly why you didn't want her to come over there. I think Hakram would be just fine with that sort of end.

Liliet

Yeah, Hakram wouldn't be after Catherine being Queen of Callos specifically. Her life's work is the Accords.

Her life though? He might just be on the same page as Indrani there, not that Indrani was wrong.....

Sparsebeard

I just hope that the DK isn't turning all those forces on the Drow as they all speak...

caoimhinh

Yep, Cat and co. are not being subtle in the Drow's involvement. It was one thing to have them participate as a force in the field, but granting them a seat in the political conference of the powers of Calernia changes the nature of the Ever Dark's involvement and makes it plain for all to see that they have a bigger game afloat.

Even if he doesn't know from where the Drow are coming, Neshamah must already have figured out that they will be marching against him.

Truthhut

I will truly miss the Tyrant and his brand of madness when he inevitably gets his head cut off. If Cat gets here way, he will be the last of his kind to truly get to have a run of the place. Alas, such is the way of progress.

Liliet

Eh. His kind is exactly the kind that will thrive under the Accords: conniving, backstabby, hilarious, artful at bending the rules to their purposes, taking limitations as an excuse to sharpen their art. Kairos isn't erratic in the way Catherine and Hanno discussed will be eliminated, he pushes exactly as far as he knows he can without having it blow up in his face. (And when it does blow up anyway, it does so not too catastrophically). Kairos is exactly the kind of Evil Amadeus talked about in his "let me speak for the crooked and cruel" speech. A lil babby rules lawyer who will use whatever weapon is at hand with absolute glee, the more counterintuitive the better.

The difference made will be in collateral damage. Accords! Kairos doesn't make flying towers, he makes formal accusations before continental arbitrage court.

Shveiran

It is an interesting view; as you describe, Kairos certainly has the potential to thrive under the Accords. I'm still not totally convinced he'd accept them, though. Like, really accept them, not "of course I'll sign your delightfully Accords, you dear friend of mine whom I'll never ever backstab! Whyever would I not?" accept them.

Whatever else Kairos is – and he is all you've described him as – Kairos is also enamored with the all ways. With the monologues and the crackling thunder and the rituals of inevitable doom. His opening move was to poison the representatives of the other cities, strongarm the Evil ones, declare war on all the rest and then face an army alone with glee and will as his weapons.

I... not sure Kairos really DOES limits. He can toe the line, he could do it masterfully. But all the time, he'd just be waiting for an opportunity to betray the Accords to, just to see if he can. The more time passes by, the stronger the Accords become, the more urgent his need to wreck them will grow.

Because... well, I'd argue that's just what Kairos does..

Liliet

Oh, that's absolutely true. Kairos specifically and personally, this one right now, can only be Accords-safe because he has a rapidly approaching expiration date and Accords just won't have time to make it onto his wrecking list.

A future Kairos, however, might just accept the Accords as a framework to work with the same way Kairos accepted the League of Free Cities.

Decius

The Empire Under Dark has no reason to accept such a truce.

They can, as an empire, hire mercenaries from outside the empire.

The wages of those mercenaries can be nothing.

What's the problem with a truce?

Javvies

The Story consequences. Also more practical consequences. It's just a variation of his earlier offer of "a decade, or make it a century" long truce to Cat. Without the clear and present danger, the urgency of the Alliance will fade and the moment will pass – he can come back at any time, having spent the entire waiting time weakening the Alliance members, but this time with Malicia's help.

Also, no, the wages of any "mercenaries" the Drow hired could not be nothing.

Decius

How much would the crusade have to be paid to join?

Insanenoodlyguy

It wouldn't matter. Even if they did a "this will cost one coin" thing, unless it was every nation accepting the contract on behalf of the entire nation, which would be a "you clever bastards" sort of cheat, there is much less weight to "the everdark has amassed a large army to conquer this land" as opposed to "The united peoples of several disparate groups have united to stop the great evil". Even if the numbers are still overwhelmingly high, the first group is the kind of thing the Dead king can smash much more easily.

Javvies

Then there's the practical realities involved in the costs of feeding and arming large numbers of people. That ignores the cost of paying the troops.

Armies, especially quality ones, aren't cheap to maintain, even in peacetime. And wartime armies are even more expensive.

Decius

Those expenses would exist without a thin veneer of working for a party not involved with the truce.

Decius

"The Everdark is leading the Crusade, and gaining support from the House of Light and the Black Queen and the Kingdom of Praes, none of which are signatories to the truce. Oh, and the Kingdom of Callow does not permit the pretender to Praes free passage, and is in a mutual defense agreement with the rest of the Grand Alliance."

And all the same armies march, perhaps with some different banners, until Malicia makes a move, at which point SHE has violated the truce and triggered a mutual defense clause.

Shveiran

In my opinion, you are applying an international politics approach to a story contest. It's not that what you say doesn't have merit or logic, it is that you are applying them to a field where those arguments do not stick.

We got a crash course of the interactions between the practicalities of the real world and the story in Book IV, during the peace conference.

Applying those teachings here, I'd argue that the approach you propose is a losing one.

On the practical end, to switch from the Grand Alliance to the Allies of the Empire Ever Dark makes the war a much harder sell to the soldiers of Calernia: people are scared, tired, and hungry; they want to go home and check on their loved ones and sleep in their bed without fearing they won't wake again.

Selling them on the "let's bring the fight to the bastard who caused all this and end him once and for all" is much easier than to do the same on "let's help this weird lot who we never really saw before and that most of you don't give a fuck about to get a new home by invading an immortal undead overlord."

In the first case, you have powerful emotional chords to pull; in the second one, you can try to pull them, but they are once-removed and thus weaker for it; meanwhile, you gain no emotional edge that I can see.

On the narrative side, you are suggesting putting the hurt on Malicia if she breaks the truce.

But that doesn't work because the Gran Alliance would already be twisting their words and not honoring it in bad faith.

In our world, world leaders do it often, but ours is not a world ruled by the narrative. Here, you'd be reaping bad karma in heaps.

Javvies

I expect that Magon's death eased set in motion quite some time ago – long before Amadeus was seriously planning on splitting from Malicia, and therefore well outside the ability to readily call off.

Possibly it's what Assassin has been working on setting up for months, likely in conjunction with other Praesi assets in Ashur, at least initially.

Kairos is going to flip on the Dead King and Malicia no matter what, it's just a question of how much he thinks he can extract for it before somebody calls him on his bluff that he's not going to flip without more.

Liliet

Yep. Hopefully Cordelia realizes this isn't a fresh stupidity, but a stupidity from long ago coming to bite them in the ass now.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's still a problem. It's a hard pill already, but it's one thing to say, as scribe pointed out "Yeah, we did fuck you and yours over... you had declared war on us and made your intentions clear that you were going to march across our (still nominal) ally, divide up their lands, and use the pathways to come burn us to the ground. We burned you instead. that's war." It's another thing to say "Hey, we want peace now! Buttttt we might still be killing people you like and the fact that they stopped being your ally was something we couldn't possibly have known before that arrow was loosed... oooooops?"

That's a hard damn sell. That's some Kairos shit right there. Not on purpose, but doesn't something like that sound more like it came from him if you just change some of the language?

"I, of course, set out to help my best friend and forever ally by killing that traitor who abandoned them in their hour of need! Clearly the fact that they were good friends until just now when you heard they were dead suggests I have excellent foresight and duplicitous motives would be suspected only by the untrusting!"

That's going to lead to a lot of "Do you seriously expect us to believe this horseshit" at best, or at worst "so that's how it is, you leave the great alliance and you die right after? Oh yeah, allying with evil is working out great!" and either way, the "deal with the dead king and save my ass so i can distance myself from this clusterfuck" starts looking better then it should.

Liliet

That's why Tariq is a treasure. He's an idiot, but he can at least confirm "yes this statement is literally true and no treachery is being intended".

And Cordelia can figure out the "this would have to have been planned long before Carrion Lord's body and soul were put back together" thing on her own I think, once she thinks about it -_-

ninegardens

So... I gotta admit, I think the DK has got them.

Like seriously, from any practical perspective, if Malicia and DK sit down at the table and say "Okay, so DK is leaving, dread empire isn't invading anywhere. Tell us about the Accords if you like, or not. Whatever."

What is the team going to do?

Politically, attacking DK now is going to be a nightmare. Black's shot at taking Malicia from the throne was based on the assumption that she was doing something stupid and reckless, but (at least to outside appearances) she isn't.

To all appearances, the entire story could end here with the Accords being signed, DK going home, and all the main cast spending the next decade slowly putting their kingdoms back together and grumbling about the Dead King kicking their ass again and Malicia being awful for letting him out.

Hell- they can probably even get Malicia to sign the Accords, if doing so means that Praes gets to maintain cordial trade relations with Callow, and membership to the new court of courts and school of schools. Her and Black will be pissed at one another, but at the end of the day he'll be like "What were you thinking?" and she can respond "Hey, it worked."

I don't think that's what will happen (because story), but looking at the story in the present moment, that looks like a perfectly plausible outcome.

... which kind of just shows what a genius move this is, both on Malicia's part, and on the part of EE.

Mental Mouse

DK's trying to split the forces of the Alliance between Keter and Praes. Here's the thing though – Callow has joined the Alliance, but the Everdark has not. If Catherine abdicates, she and the Everdark can still take on Keter. And any Alliance truce with Keter can be made contingent on Praes' behavior, and vice versa. And that's assuming that both the truce and the Axis of Evil's contract hold, which is not given.

ninegardens

Right- but Catherine + Everdark is not SUFFICIENT to take on the dead king.

She NEEDS the alliance, not just for the sake of fighting DK, but because if she doesn't fight DK she's got 100,000 displaced Drow with no place to live.

The Dwarves will only commit below ground if the rest of the continent is in on the game above. Without the grand alliance, all Cat has is one displaced and broken empire- a hammer with no Anvil.

... also, I'm really not sure how the current move is meant to split the Alliance between Keter and Praes- Was there a quote I missed?

I totally agree it is contingent on the contract holding, which is not given- but the point is that the IDEA of peace, the IDEA that war is not inevitable is what is being offered to the populous of the continent, and that undermines Cat and Cordelia's political liscence.

... also, what's to stop Malicia and DK going to work on offering the Drow a better deal than Cat has given them....

Mental Mouse

> what's to stop Malicia and DK going to work on offering the Drow a better deal than Cat has given them....

Mostly Sve Noc, who rather like Cat and have little reason to trust DK or Praes. (Even if Malicia personally has supported greenskin rights, so has Black, and Praes doesn't have a great history with nonhumans.)

Liliet

They can't give the drow a better deal, because they don't have what Cat has to offer.

Catherine has offered them:

- the dwarves' support until they win this war (I don't want to know what the dwarves will do if the drow go back on their word about fighting the DK and I bet the drow don't either);
- a territory that no-one living contests (admittedly DK could theoretically let him have the very same one, it's not like he's using it either);
- potential help from mages, priests and heroes to heal the aforementioned territory until it's no longer blighted (doubt DK can match that perfectly, given he has no Light users available);

and most notably

- good relations with pretty much the entire continent. DK is isolated, it's Intercessor's entire game that no-one likes him and no-one's willing to ally with him except really desperate Dread Emps. Good relations that'll last for generations, too, with a deliberately set up to last treaty and trade ties. Whereas Malicia's diplomatic abomination will definitely die with her.

Oh, and Catherine's help in navigating surface affairs - someone they actually trust. DK will fuck them over however he can, try to control them in every way he can, there are no pesky “ethics” restraining him. Catherine is genuine in her desire to help and not looking to consolidate power.

DK cannot match the offer, no.

caoimhinh

It's not that plausible to happen, because they can't trust the Dead King and there's too much risk in letting him stay active and existing.

This was already considered by Catherine when Neshamah offered a truce of 100 years; if the sense of alarm and imminent danger is lost then the cohesion of the alliance against Keter vanishes and they will tend to more practical and immediate matters, while the Dead King can amass his forces for the next invasion.

The Grand Alliance can't accept peace with the Dead King, both Catherine and Cordelia know this, probably Amadeus and Tariq too. So they not accepting the trap of a long-time truce with Keter is a consequence of more than Story, there are practical realities to that decision.

However, that won't stop Neshamah from making the offer, and some will start having second thoughts like Yannu this chapter, as some of the leaders and the population losing their will to fight the war will mean weakening the alliance army that marches against the Dead King.

The brilliance of this move is not in its capability of ending the war (it can't and won't) but rather in the cost for the members of the Grand Alliance in stopping those who start having second thoughts (political leaders backing off deals, discontented soldiers, rioting population, etc).

Stephen R. Marsh

I'm thinking the Bard's play at a name for Black and a stay of execution for the Tyrant should wrap into the payoff tomorrow.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Cough cough Its funny how the story disses fools working together and trading information with the Tyrant while Cat has been doing the same thing and even she dissed those fools at one point i think. Cough cough

Shveiran

Is it? I mean, I'd be colled a reckless idiot if I tried to draw a project for a suspension bridge, since I lack the necessary knowledge; that doesn't mean no one should draw suspension bridges, so long as they are qualified for the task.

Tyrant is a viper, so trying to deal with him without being a very skilled snake charmer is a reckless mistake. Whereas Cat has played him several time, so it's clear she has the skill to handle him.

Dreamer

I wouldn't really call Kairos a viper. It seems he's there just to be relevant. It seems like his essence of being. And best way to be relevant is to be a man in the middle. And so it feels like you can't really "get" him as he wants to be swayed from one side to the other. I think his preferred outcome would be never-ending struggle between Alliance and The Enemy.

Mental Mouse

> it's clear she has the skill to handle him.

Up to a point, anyway – he did get an unexpected stab in during the Twilight adventure, along with the expected one.

Shveiran

Undoubtedly.

But this is not a game that can be won without a measure of risk; all I'm saying is, in her case, it is a calculated risk. When the Proceran Princes did...it was not.

Insanenoodlyguy

The thing is that he's a player, and so can't be ignored. But this was because other people let him come and play. Cat is good at fighting him, but she would have told everybody not to let him at the table in the first place.

Decius

And he would have destroyed his last coin, rather than see an opponent win.

He's playing the game to have a chance at winning, because he sees that the first-order ideal strategy makes everyone lose. But he's still open to the idea of making everyone lose, if they don't give him a chance to win.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I love this comment section. It's so nice and friendly and there are nearly no blabbering idiots. Considering the forums I usually frequent it's a true breath of fresh air.

I've talked about religion, death, character motivations, morality, and history with this fic and have never gotten any truly stupid replies. It's just so freaking nice.

TeK

I have an incredibly intense feeling to prove you wrong now. Was that your plan all along?

Andrew Mitchell

Andrew Mitchell

♥ Well said. 99.9% of posts are civil contributions that enhance this community. Certainly one of the nicest places on the interwebs.

konstantinvoncarstein

I may be wrong, but it could be because a story where tolerance is omnipresent would attract people more prone to respect others?

Liliet

Good moderation of the comment section is also paramount ♥

knockoffnikolai

The interlude titles sounded familiar, so I googled them. These phrases are from "The Many Deaths of Traitorous," quoted here: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/01/17/villainous-interlude-crescendo/>

Unfortunately, all this tells me is that Tyrant is going to be involved, and we already knew that. But fun piece of trivia!

Andrew Mitchell

Well spotted!

ninegardens

Nice catch:

In particular, I am now expecting:

"So smile, Tyrants,"
"And let us be wicked"

ErraticErrata

suspiciously casual whistling

Liliet

that entire poem makes me so emotional about Praes's whole deal

'we are not kind or just, deserving or any victory,
we are a thing of dust,
promised only misery'

NO YOU ARE OKAY IT WILL BE FINE I PROMISE AAAAAAAA

Ben Serreau-Raskin

These external views of Catherine are some of my favorite parts of the series.

Interlude: So Smile, Tyrants

"And so as night fell over the Blessed Isle, his Dread Majesty sent across the river the corpse of Prince Robert and the captured Princess Juliana, still bound in chains, for when released she had bit off the ear of the High Lord of Okoro. King Selwyn Fairfax rode halfway across the bridge, where he thus addressed His Dread Majesty: 'You have fought this war grimly on the field and gallantly beyond. Would that you had been born west of the river, under a virtuous star.' And so His Dread Majesty replied: 'For having been born east of the river I became instead a man to pluck stars from the sky. Is that not a higher virtue?'" – Extract from 'Commentaries on the Campaigns of Dread Emperor Terribilis the Second'

To match the coming Damned, Chosen had been sent for.

Because Creation was a strange and ironic thing, Rozala Malanza thought, this had been the suggestion of Catherine Foundling and opposed largely by Cordelia Hasenbach. Not that the First Prince would be so uncouth as to risk offending the Dominion by implying its favourite son was anything other than a treasured ally. There'd been talk instead that the Peregrine's presence might incite the Tyrant to misbehave, that surely the White Knight himself would be enough. Princess Rozala suspected that the First Prince had known it would fail, and it had, but had allowed herself to vent a sliver of personal dislike in as harmless a manner she could. That Hasenbach despised the Peregrine was no surprise to her, not since she'd heard the full story of what had taken place at Saudant. The sleepy little fishing village by the shores of Lake Artoise that had been butchered to bring the Carrion Lord to heel, leaving not a single survivor. Not even children.

It had shaken Rozala's high esteem of the Chosen, to hear this. A greater good had been achieved by the act, that much could not be denied. How many more dozens of thousands would have died if the Legions of Terror slipped the noose in Iserre to ravage the western principalities as well? Yet it'd been a grave evil, that too could not be denied, and one dealt unto a sworn ally. The First Prince's view of the matter was without nuance, but the Princess of Aequitan could not quite bring herself to share it in full. She remembered still the Grey Pilgrim saving thousands of lives during the Battle of the Camps, and almost as many after when he went from wounded to wounded and worked his healing to exhaustion. It had been an ugly choice the old hero made, and one he had no right to make. But did they not breathe a little easier for it? Were they not, behind the outrage at the lives taken and the brutality of the act, all a little grateful for what had come of it?

The dark-haired princess could not embrace the choice he had made, the deaths it had meant, but neither would she condemn it outright. It would be hypocrisy of the worst sort to let Peregrine undertake the bloody work of capturing the Carrion Lord for them and then in the same breath to complain of his murderous meddling.

"Princess Rozala?"

The Arlesite general turned a pleasant smile upon the woman who had approached her, for this was a relationship that must be cultivated for years to come should they all survive these dark times. Lady Vivienne Dartwick cut rather more regal a figure when out of the thief's leathers she'd worn at the truce talks in northern Callow, though Rozala decided that the milkmaid braid crowned by a tasteful silver circlet rather helped the effect. It was said she'd once been a Chosen, before the Black Queen turned her to villainy. Though few believed the Black Queen's handpicked successor to be anything close to 'redeemed' from such damnation, she was still considered rather less incendiary an interlocutor in diplomatic talks. Nobly born as well, for House Dartwick was on the Callowan lists of nobility, which was a balm on the pride of those who still balked at negotiating with a no-name orphan like Catherine Foundling. A foolish thing, that, when the shadow of that orphan's displeasure had half of Calernia shaking in its boots, but pride could oft be a foolish thing.

"Lady Dartwick," Rozala replied. "How may I be of service?"

"The Lord Adjutant is being sent out by my queen and will require a guide," Lady Vivienne said. "If I might trouble you to provide one?"

A matter of too little importance to speak to the First Prince over, Rozala idly thought, yet requiring the assistance and assent of a high-ranked Proceran. The Callowan noble had correctly navigated etiquette in approaching her, which was a refreshing change compared to her mistress – who largely behaved as if she were above such things. Rather more gallingly, she was not wrong to believe so.

"My personal secretary Louis Rohanon will see to it," the Princess of Aequitan said.

She discreetly gestured for one of the attendants to approach her, so Louis could be informed of her request. It was insulting that her dear friend's abdication of his crown for the sake of the Principate meant he no longer qualified to attend councils such as this, but given the recent... agitation in Salia the princess knew it was not the time to test the First Prince's tolerance.

"Will the Lord Adjutant be leaving us, then?" Rozala asked.

She would not mind that, for the quiet watchfulness in the orc's eyes spoke of little missed. Yet it would not do to loose a Damned without first learning where he would head, and for what purpose.

"Queen Catherine intends to sound out the loyalties and interests of Nicae," Lady Vivienne said.

And she'd sent out an orc to do so? The Princess of Aequitan was no village bumpkin, to believe orcs men turned to corrupted forms by some ancient sin and the hand of Below, but it could not be denied that the Deadhand's large fangs and leathery skin fed into his looming presence to unsettling result. Though the Lord Adjutant had struck her a clever-minded and methodical, he hardly made for a pleasant envoy. Unless, of course, a reminder of force was what the Black Queen meant to send. Who could truly know, with that one?

"Then allow me to offer my secretary's services as scholar and translator," Princess Rozala suggested.

The heiress-designate eyed her pensively. It would mean anything spoken would later be reported to her, true, but it would also lend the weight of Procer's tacit approval to whatever was spoken. Besides, Louis truly was fluent in tradertalk and of scholarly inclination besides. He would be of practical use, regardless of all the rest.

"I thank you for the boon," Lady Vivienne said, tone formal. "I am certain Lord Adjutant will delight in the use of such an able aide."

Secrecy was not paramount to whatever the Black Queen had planned for the League, then, or perhaps even Nicae in particular. The arrangements were made swiftly, and all was in motion before the latest arrivals stirred the room. The Grey Pilgrim's stride was greeted enthusiastically by the highborn of the Blood, though rather more coolly by the Callowans and the Carrion Lord. First Prince Cordelia herself offered the due courtesies and not an inch more, for even in utter scorn the Lycaonese princess was rarely anything but flawlessly polite. The White Knight's entrance was, by contrast, was more warmly received. The Chosen's willingness to work with the Highest Assembly – though never under, for Hanno of Arward answered to the Tribunal alone – and the strictures of Proceran law had endeared him to Hasenbach and even Rozala herself, she would admit. Never before had she heard of a Chosen who would list and explain every kill he'd made in a rioting city before scholars of law so that the actions might be assessed.

At least not without hinting it was mere humouring of mortal crowns, while the White Knight had instead seemed serious and even earnest.

The White Knight and his companion the Witch of the Woods were also notably strong Chosen who had come to safeguard Salia and the peace talks, which had been reassuring considering who would be attending. The Black Queen, the Hierophant, the Tyrant of Helike – and now it seemed even the Hidden Horror himself. In truth Princess Rozala had been surprised at Queen Catherine's suggestion that the White Knight attend this council, for the Sword of Judgement was blatant enough a ward against her that the dark-haired general had believed she might take offence. Apparently, Rozala Malanza faintly thought, someone had forgot to inform Catherine Foundling of this: she met the White Knight's arrival with a smile and a respectful nod, which the Chosen casually returned. Rozala was not the only one to take notice, the eyes of half the room coming to rest on the pair in silent surprise.

"Kairos Theodosian nears," the Black Queen suddenly said.

—

It had been more than a year now since the Tyrant of Helike had sworn eternal friendship to Cordelia Hasenbach. Not that she had ever believe him. Nor would she now put too much stock in anything he said, not even if Chosen insisted he had been bound by a curse of truth. If a madman believed the sky to be green, did that make it so? No, the Tyrant had been a thorn in her side for too long to be taken as anything but a peril.

The First Prince had considered the young king a diplomatic and military headache from more or less the first breath after he'd taken the throne, for he'd proven to be both cunning and very much inclined to turn that cunning against Procer. The blonde princess had once believed that Helike and its boy-king could be restrained by fetters of ink, treaties binding the League to a ten-year truce with the Principate until other affairs were settled, but that had arguably been the second-most serious diplomatic blunder of her reign. She could not be certain that the Tyrant's rise could truly be laid at her feet, for he might well have struck out for power regardless of anything she did. Yet the League's vote for truce with Procer had undeniably been the trigger of the civil war that propelled the Tyrant of Helike to greater heights. And saw Anaxares of Bellerophon elected to the office of Hierarch of the Free Cities, though in some ways that seat was still good as empty.

Still, for all that Cordelia had maneuvered and plotted against Kairos Theodosian she had never seen the man with her own eyes until he came to Salia. Much of what she had read of him proved true, the First Prince pondered once more as the Tyrant swaggered into the parlour, but it did not quite do the man justice. The thin sickliness, the loose robes that did not quite hide erratic convulsions and trembling, or even the blood-red eye under wispy brown curls: Theodosian almost seemed more notion than man, as if some godly hand had painted grinning malevolence on the canvas of Creation and crowned it king of Helike. Most of those here loathed him, the First Prince considered. Some loathed him so deeply it was like a poison in their veins. Yet looking at the young king and the two waddling gargoyles flanking him, one would think he was among friends.

"Oh my," Kairos Theodosian drawled. "Such a gathering of great and mighty names. My heart is made all aflutter."

"Lord Tyrant," Cordelia Hasenbach calmly said. "Welcome. You are thanked for accepting our invitation."

"Wouldn't miss it for the world," the odd-eyed villain grinned.

"Gods, you really are such a prick," the Black Queen of Callow said, sounding almost admiring. "If I didn't know better, I'd call it an aspect."

The fair-haired Lycaonese bit down on her initial wave of fear and irritation. Much as she disliked the manners of the other ruler, it could not be denied that no one in this room had even half the understanding of the Tyrant she could boast of having. As if to prove correct her thought, instead of storming out at the casual slight and informality the other villain instead let out a cackling laugh.

"Catherine," he replied cheerfully. "A pleasure to see you, as always. Is that my old friend Amadeus I see cowering in your shadow?"

The Carrion Lord, who had kept his peace and spoken only sparingly since his declaration of war on the Tower, never lost his air of cold indifference.

"It is a rather broad shadow, these days," the Carrion Lord casually replied. "It makes for comfortable cowering."

The choking sound from her side was, Cordelia realized, most of the Blood suppressing laughter.

"An empire's worth of room, eh?" the Tyrant sneered. "I wonder, did the broken spine take the Name or was it the other way around?"

She must step in now else the villain would needle everyone here 'til Last Dusk. Satisfying as it was to hear the Carrion Lord pricked, it did nothing to endear the one pricking him to her heart. Or advance the cause of Procer's survival to let it devour time from the recess, for that matter.

"The Dread Empire of Praes," the First Prince said, "is not why it was asked you attend this council."

"Then by all means," Kairos Theodosian drawled, "reveal this revelation to me, Warden of the West."

Cordelia stepped forward, back straight. Closer to a villain whose suspected body count was in the hundreds, who had once routed an entire host by wielding a storm and not so long ago ripped out thousands in cavalry from Arcadia and smashed them down onto the earth. She stepped forward with utter calm, for these were her chosen grounds and her favoured manner of strife.

"Circumstances have ensured there is an alignment in our interests, Lord Tyrant," Cordelia said.

A heartbeat passed; the blood-red eye blinked.

"Boring," the boy-king said, solemn as a judge passing a sentence.

"Yet here you are, standing among us," the First Prince said, unruffled. "Itching to turn on the Crown and Tower who have used you better than you used them."

"Slightly less boring," the Tyrant conceded. "Still I've yet to hear a single reason I should break such deep trust or sunder a precious bond of fellowship."

"You require assurances, understandably," Cordelia said. "This can be arranged. You stand, as you said, among an assembly of great and mighty names."

"And what would be required of me in exchange for these assurances?" the Tyrant grinned. "Go on now, Warden of the West. Do not disappoint."

"You have been deep in the Enemy's councils, Lord Tyrant," Cordelia said. "Reveal their plans to us and-"

"Nononono," the Tyrant of Helike interrupted, growing increasingly shrill. "That was not the right thing to ask. You're doing it wrong."

The villain seemed genuinely agitated, his arm slipping out of the folded sleeve hiding it in a spasm. His brown eye had grown watery, as if he were in pain or sorrow. The First Prince was taken aback, and for once uncertain as to how she should respond. A limping gait whispered across the floor, the Black Queen hobbling behind the Tyrant's back and slowing only to offer her the most insolent wink Cordelia had ever seen. She flushed.

"Sometimes they need us devils to speak the ugly things, Kairos, you ought to know that by now," Queen Catherine said, tone teasing.

Tension in the Tyrant's shoulders loosened by a fraction at the words, and Cordelia grasped the game. Silk and the steel, then. She was more used to standing as the former than the latter, but not unskilled at the exercise.

"Say it," Kairos Theodosian demanded.

"Give us a good reason to keep warring on Keter," the Black Queen said.

As she often did, the Queen of Callow was cutting to the bone of it for that was the truth exact of what they needed. A great banner of fear and outrage that would bind Principate – and beyond – to pursuit of the war against the Dead King, and if there was one man who might give them that at this very moment it was the Tyrant of Helike.

"Ah," the odd-eyed king said, savouring the sound. "There it is. Now, let the mangled relic in the corner attest to my words – not you Amadeus, at least this time – and pronounce truth where it is. I have such a reason and can reveal it to you."

All eyes in the parlour turned to the Grey Pilgrim, whose eyes were narrowed.

"Truth," the Peregrine slowly said. "In word and intent."

"Then let us speak of price, Theodosian," Cordelia said. "Some offences may yet be forgiven, should you bargain in good faith. Wealth and honours could be laid on your brow."

Cordelia was much taller than the Tyrant and made certain to loom over him as he spoke. A tilt of the neck lent her the appearance of looking down on him as she spoke, and she added a faint hint of sneer to her lip. Dislike was as distracting a feeling as any other, and if she must wield the reputation of the Alamans abroad to best achieve it she would not balk at the indignity.

"He's not the coin kind of king, Hasenbach," the Black Queen drawled. "No, he's an old-fashioned sort. He wants his seat at the table back. Don't you, Kairos?"

Which Queen Catherine wanted no more than Cordelia herself, though with the amused glint to her eye she was doing a fair impression of desiring otherwise.

"Catherine, how distressing," the Tyrant grinned. "That would imply that I currently no longer have a seat. Am I not a participant in good standing of this peace conference?"

"Helike can be spared retribution for its reckless war-making and treachery," Cordelia said, phrasing it as a great concession. "Your abdication, however, might be required for the sake of peace."

"Now there's a familiar tune," the Black Queen smiled.

It was, the fair-haired princess thought, a little too sharp a smile for that sharpness to be entirely feigned.

"Ladies," the Tyrant intervened, sounding utterly delighted, "come now, is there truly need for such language? Now, unless I am mistaken there was some talk of dues."

Queen Catherine began circling again, and Cordelia breathed in. Time to see what the two of them could bargain him down to.

"You are due quite a few things," the First Prince pleasantly agreed.

"Mostly the one, as far as I am concerned," Kairos Theodosian grinned. "And dear Catherine knows what I want, she does. She even brought it for me."

The trial, Cordelia thought. It was all coming to hinge on the trial of the White Knight, as promised at the crossroad of the Princes' Graveyard. She had been warned by every Chosen and Damned she was on speaking terms with that to allow such a thing to unfold would be highly dangerous and acted accordingly.

"Your demand for a trial of the White Knight is on the official order of affairs, Lord Tyrant," the First Prince mildly said.

"Very far down the list," the Tyrant replied, just as mildly.

"And I could not help to notice some details of procedures related to its positioning. Now, were I a suspicious man, I might suspect they'd allow a clever sort to put off that discussion for weeks, if not months."

Which had been the very intent. The League of Free Cities as it currently stood was a derelict taking water, and the situation would only worsen unless the Hierarch himself intervened. It was unlikely he would, meaning that waiting for a span might very well see the Tyrant's power among the League and perhaps the League itself collapse – and so make any demands of his utterly irrelevant, for he would no longer have the knife at the throats to see through his extortion.

"Then we move it up the list," the Black Queen shrugged.

"I would not wish to be unseemly in my demands," the Tyrant smiled. "And so, I've a suggestion to offer that could be considered less of an imposition."

The smile widened, until all that Cordelia could see was a thin, sharp slice of teeth and a pulsing red eye.

"Let us hold the trial now."

Javvies

Huh.

This can't be Kairos's endgame. Putting White Knight on trial now isn't going to be something that ends the game for Kairos, because there's other stuff going on that he's interested in seeing play out.

So perhaps he's just trying to establish a precedent for use in some other plot.

Oshi

The treachery is the end game. He is the ultimate partisan for below. Chaos is what's needed and he will do anything he can to achieve it. This is when the fun starts.

erebus42

While all of that is true, Kairos prefers to maximize the impact of his treachery. This seems like lesser treachery to me so that makes me think he's got something grander in mind.

Andrew Mitchell

"something grander"? I agree. I wish I could guess what he's planned. The best I can think of is to use Heirarch and the trial to strike a significant blow against the choir of judgement and cause people to lose some faith in Above.

Mental Mouse

IIRC, a number of knowledgeable folks have said that his plan is to actually trap and perhaps kill at least one of the Seraphim. However, I would have thought that he'd require Hierarch's presence for the trial, and I can't imagine nobody would have noticed that. (That said. I'm reading this late, so I haven't seen the current chapter yet.)

caoimhin

My current hypothesis is that this Trial of the Choir of Judgement is actually a test trial for whatever Kairos has in mind for dealing with the Bard.

This would engrave into Creation the instance of mortals exacting judgment over the tools of the Gods, which is a powerful thing and with a huge weight even if unprecedented (or perhaps on behalf of being unprecedented). This could very well be the sharpening of the blade that ultimately takes the Intercessor out of commission and banish her from the game.

Kairos is the one who understands the most about the Bard (along with Neshamah) after all. His Wish aspect enabled him to see through her, back when he was still plotting to make Anaxares into Hierarch, which is pretty early on in the series.

Andrew Mitchell

I like your thinking here. 😊

Kyle

I agree he could be trying to establish a precedent, or he could be going for something more direct. It has been implied that hierarch can pass judgement on even beings normally beyond judgement. Given how strongly the choir of mercy reacted to threats against the Pilgrim, and how the choir of judgement has in the past directly intervened on behalf of the white knight when his passing of judgement was interfered with, perhaps Tyrant is trying to bait the choir into intervening to prevent heirarch from passing judgement on the white knight. I am willing to bet it is against the law in Bellerophan to interfere with legal proceedings which would give heirarch the ability to pass judgement on the whole choir.

Andrew Mitchell

This makes sense. It's entirely plausible IMO. 😊

ninegardens

You gotta admit- Heirarch swatting down the entire choir of Judgement is pretty fricken' badass. Shame that they seem to be one of the most reasonable angel factions around (based on Hanno's backstory).

Honestly, neither Mercy nor Judgement seem all that bad really. Not GOOD, but still reasonable.

That said... Hierarch is getting crazier and crazier. Anarexes V1.0 was a chill dude, but the Hierarch of the free cities has been getting more and more nutso each time we see him.

Also, IF Kiaros manages to use this to stab the Choir of Judgement, pretty sure Below is going to give him 50 many brownie points, and probably grant him an extra year worth of good health.

Shveiran

I'd argue that Anaxares was simply powerless and therefore not dangerous in the beginning, not "a chill dude". The election didn't really change his ideas, it just made them relevant. I always found him rather... disturbing, personally.

ninegardens

HHmmmmm fair.

He's distrubing due to the brain washing... but I'll respect his refusal to accept power when it was offered, and his bizzare calm when facing down Tyrant as a mere mortal. But yeah- fair call "Chill dude" may be taking the description a bit far.

reyishi

Actually Judgement is described as a pretty hardcore choir : Hanno is the very first hero acting to its name because every time a hero wants to go for the Judgement route they were instantly smited (it was said in thr earlier I don't remember which but I think the Lone Swordsman was still alive).

Liliet

I don't know where you got this from, but actually we have comments from Bard on what Judgement heroes are normally like. There have been plenty.

Shikkarasu

That would be Prosecution II
"Five I have sent, in my day," the stranger said.
"None returned. Ashur is not loved by them, child.
There is too much rot in the flesh, and the Seraphim despises that sin most of all."
I don't think the Boatman was saying there have been no Judgement Heros, just that in his time(probably a mortal life, so 30-60 years depending how old he was) he hadn't seen anyone succeed. Either the last Judgement Hero was a few decades ago, or they didn't use that boat trick to gain their name.

Liliet

Also, it's just the Ashurans.

Liliet

Oh, and notably, Hanno did not return to the boatman or to Ashur either.

onedollargum

Anaxerxes is taunt steel cable that the Tyrant has turned into a crossbow. His nature is unerringly the same, but the circumstances have changed XD

NerfContessa

Agreed.

Then let's watch the madness and cackle, as is our due and duty.

Licens

He doesn't want the White Knight put on trial. He wants to be tried by the White Knight, for Hanno to flip that coin, and he wants it BEFORE he tells them what they need to know. He's trying to force the hand of a choir, or break the Knight. Either the choir lets him live, the WK defies his choir, or the information dies with him.

Poetically Psychotic

I get the feeling it's not Hanno he wants on trial, it's the Choir of Judgment responsible for his actions. Executing the White Knight on a technicality would be hilarious. Executing an entire Choir of angels would be the stuff of legend.

trevorkirkby123

Isn't it kind of Kairos' thing that he always has something bigger in the works? Always launching into some great new scheme and never reaching a true endgame?

It's one of the ways for a villain to survive. The first steps of the villain's plans always work, not to mention there is a degree of narrative stability found by becoming the recurring villain. Bard commented on it the first time she met Kairos.

Aaradur

I was honestly hoping Cat would offer the recently de-equestrated Cataphraktoi with purebred liessen chargers

James

"Let us hold the vote now."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The best one yet. You saw the opportunity and went for it. I laughed. Not a grin or a snort or a chuckle, a full-on laugh. Thank you.

Liliet

Even I like this one!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

A rare seal of quality.

Liliet

I'd say it's probably because it does not use characters as corrupted handpuppets on a distorted stage shouting our words as their own over sharp shards of the fourth wall.

It puts us in their place cosplaying, instead. That's much better.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

That's a pretty raw way to phrase it. I mean that in a good way. And yeah, this is definitely better.

My very own name

Typo thread:

> anything but flawlessly polite. The White Knight's entrance was, by contrast, was more warmly received. [Double was] > the Black Queen hobbling behind the Tyrant's back and slowing only to offer her the most insolent wink Cordelia had ever seen. She flushed.

And the ship just sailed!

Inay

Can we talk about the other ship in the room too? ;D (Cathanno)

erebus42

Despite it frequently being pointed out that she is no great beauty, between Hanno, Cordelia, Aquilline, and Rozala Cat's got a nice potential harem going. But as the late great Rateface once pointed out she's got "charisma not beauty" which makes a difference.

Jane

Didn't the last chapter mention how she hisses like a goblin?

We don't often see how many characters ogle Catherine back, but... That doesn't sound like the basis for a traditional harem MC to me...

/tongueincheek

roseocean2012

I have no clue what you mean, goblins are peak hotness.

Mental Mouse

> Apparently, Rozala Malanza faintly thought, someone had forgot to inform Catherine Foundling of this: she met the White Knight's arrival with a smile and a respectful nod, which the Chosen casually returned. Rozala was not the only one to take notice, the eyes of half the room coming to rest on the pair in silent surprise.

I love this image of half the nobles present doing a quiet "wait, what?"

ChillyPepper

who had once router an entire > who had once route(b)d(/d) an entire

ChillyPepper

Oh no, I blundered once again.

Liliet

Oh my god I MISSED THAT.

It's HAPPENING yall it's HAPPENING

Oshi

Oh you know hes fan baiting but ITS HAPPENING!

Liliet

He's what now?

Inay

Aaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaah cliffhanger !

I hope next chapter is Hanno's point of view. (I like his PoV, he's growing on me)

Slider

Of course the little shit wants the trial now. Why does everyone let the madman dance unimpeded?

He's a very refined man for brushing off Dear Catherine insults, though. Such gentlemanliness is rarely seen amongst his peers.

Zgggt

He knows something we don't.

Judgement being held accountable under a human court is guilty: human morality cannot be based on complete knowledge, therefore the assumptions of "Above's Plan is good", "Judgement knows better than mortal justice", and "by definition, Judgement cannot be unjust" are not legitimate defense under a court of law.

And yet, even with all that, Hanno and Judgement should still win. Perhaps because Hanno uses knowledge of earlier White Knights to enforce Judgement, then he can be held accountable for their actions, which may have fit the time. Or, since Black mentioned that had heroes not interfered stealing Callows weather would have succeeded. So, instead of an exchange of weather, Callows remained untouched, but all generations of Praes since have paid the price... But somehow I don't see any White Knight judging anyone for centuries of suffering, and in there lies a massive injustice that can be attributed directly to Judgement and their representatives.

What would happen if Judgement would find the concept of a White Knight guilty?

My assumption has always been Kairos knowing to a certainty he could create a spectacle with absolutely massive ramifications.

Dantalion

For Liliet: Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

For Others: The smile widened, until all that Cordelia could see was a thin, sharp slice of teeth and a pulsing red eye.

"Let us go and vote now." <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Alex

The smile widened, until all that Cordelia could see was a thin, sharp slice of teeth and a pulsing red eye.

"Let us go vote now."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Jane

Foundling and Hasenbach really do work quite well together, when they're not too busy working against each other. Hasenbach playing to Proceran stereotypes was a delight, as well.

NZPIEFACE

You know, considering that the White Knight considers himself above no other mortal, I actually think nothing will really happen to this, apart from maybe the Angels getting slightly fucked over.

But if that happens, doesn't that just give him more agency? To see that the absolute aren't so absolute in the first place, and that man itself has right to judge their own.

Oshi

People have to stop focusing on the White Knight. When was the last time Kairos ever targeting the person he said he was. The trail ITSELF is the goal. The outcomes don't matter if he can carve into creation something. I can't wait to find out what it is.

mindsword2

One thing I'm wondering if the trail is the means to a different end. He can see another's Wishes and so if he can get Judgement to make an appearance he might learn what they Wish, which would be a wonderful insight into how to manipulate the Choir of Judgement itself.

Andrew Mitchell

I like your idea!

Someguy

Hmmm... Hanno might be fine but I'm not so sure about the Choir

caoimhinh

Wow, Cordelia is really bad at dealing with Kairos. She might be a skilled diplomat and politician, but she simply does not have the right mindset to face Kairos.

Oshi

Good cop, bad cop. She planned this with Cat.

hakureireimu

There's no planning; Cordy's just quick on the uptake.

Cicero

What's particularly funny is that Cordelia notes she is used to playing silk (good cop), and in this instance is instead playing steel (bad cop), but in fact she doesn't really have to change much to play bad cop, since all her courtesies and politeness irritates Karios, while Cat's playful insults is what he likes.

...

...

Is Karios an M?

Oshi

Well yeah, life is pain for him. What else would he be?

jack

Cordy deals with two realms. The Material and the political. Steel and soldiers, and noble promises. More the latter than the former, in her case.

She's not named, she doesn't understand stories or why they're important. she doesn't understand that Kairos needs to be treated like a villain, a treasonous viper, not a political adversary or the leader of an enemy faction.

Offer him a knife and a back to stick it in, and he's as happy as a clam. He couldn't care one jot for promises of clemency, political power or gold to pay his soldiers.

Cordelia doesn't get that. It's why she doesn't understand why The pilgrim's attempt to shape a story that could kill Catherine could be considered an assassination attempt.

She doesn't realise that all of creation moves because stories tell it to. It's her blind-spot, and why she doesn't reckon much to Cathrine's warnings that whatever they're digging out of the lake could be used to wipe out Procer as a whole. She knows names, but she doesn't know Roles, or what a Pivot is.

Her only direct interaction with Name Lore is when she refused to allow the Gods Above to Name her, because she thinks that her own country's system of governance is more important than the Gods literally empowering someone with divine authority.

Shveiran

Though to be fair... very few people on Calernia do. Really, a handful at best. We just spend time with them all so it seems like there is a lot of them.

ninegardens

I so so love the phrase "Happy as a clam".

It feels nice to sit back and imagine a bunch of happy smiling clams.
With one red eye.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The full expression is "happy as a clam at high tide," which may be more or less endearing.

Liliet

I mean, fucking nobody has the right mindset to face Kairos (except Cat). I think Cordelia could pick up on it over prolonged interactions, but her default is too alien for her to grasp how he works quickly.

She works so well with Catherine though.

Jane

If memory serves, even Hakram questioned Cat's approach to Kairos when she had him draw up the letters back at the Graveyard – because exactly how many people like being treated with open contempt by their "allies"? It's not the sort of thing one would find out naturally, certainly – not unless one were prone to a quick temper, and started insulting him when he didn't do what you wanted. Except in that case, I think he'd probably continue misbehaving to wind you up further.

...Catherine really had the right of him in her description of him this chapter. No doubt the only reason it isn't an Aspect is the fact that his personality flaws are not a transitive verb.

Liliet

I wouldn't call "abused kid gets triggered by 90% of the ways the world can approach him into actively making every situation worse" a 'personality flaw' per se. Like I'm not saying Kairos is a good person, this particular bit of terminology just doesn't sit well with me.

And yep, Catherine getting him after just one face to face conversation is fucking genius.

heyhiyou

listen to the Tyrant "Let us hold the trial now" vote on top web fiction

<http://topwebfiction.com>

Andrew Mitchell

Of course, Cordelia & co. have to let this happen; THE reason to prosecute this war against the Dead King is just too important.

I'm looking forward to seeing the trial. Hanno, Heirarch and the choir will all be important players, but it's unclear to me how the trial is going to play out and what the result will be. It's could be quite an important milestone in Cat's aim, to upset the game between Above and Below, by showing everyone that Above (and by extension Below) really don't give a shit about the people of Calernia.

caoimhinh

Time for the Trial Mini-Arc, I wonder if it will really be done in a couple of interludes right away or in a later date. The trial seems important enough to not be finished in a single chapter, but who knows.

Either way, that is not Kairos' goal or endgame, putting the Choir of Judgement to Trial by mortals is just a means to an end. But I wonder what it is...

Anyways, I really hope someone shouts "Objection!" at some point of the Trial. Maybe the Bard making a dramatic entry or something.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The boldness of the text denotes it as an aspect, in which case it should be Object, not Objection. 😊

Oshi

Omg Kairos is the snake oil lawyer!!!!

MrMaturity

...And let us be wicked!

devildragon777

...Kairos is going to swing Anaxares in for the trial, isn't he? Heirarch may actually be able to usurp or cause damage to the Choir of Judgement in the process...there's a reason the Tyrant picked Hanno, and it definitely has to do with either his patron or Hanno's own beliefs regarding mortal law.

Nah

It could also have something to do with the fact that the Tyrant saved Hanno's life.

caoimhinh

I think it's rather that Kairos saved Hanno's life because he had this plan of using him against the Choir in the future, and he also used that chance to make a deal with the Bard if I recall correctly.

Kairos is one of the characters that sees furthest ahead, despite appearances.

Hardric62

> The dark-haired princess could not embrace the choice he had made, the deaths it had meant, but neither would she condemn it outright. It would be hypocrisy of the worst sort to let Peregrine undertake the bloody work of capturing the Carrion Lord for them and then in the same breath to complain of his murderous meddling

Methinks Cordelia is seething both because the Peregrine decided to keep Amadeus alive after that (despite the fact it is paying up dividends now), and probably because she remembers the Saint of Bitches' self-professed goal of burning Procer to the ground. Odds that the Grey Peregrine didn't know of that are likely considered as quit elow in her book, meaning he approved her enough for not stopping her. Might cause you to be a tiny little bity salty.

caoimhinh

I would just like to point out and remind you that the dark-haired princess is Rozala Malanza of Aquitan.
Cordelia Hasenbach, the First Prince, is blonde.

Hardric62

I know, I was just pointing out why Cordelia could be so disgruntled about the Peregrine to Rozala.
And I guess I'm using this as a PS too, because the Saint of Bitches' meddling with the House of Light for that Arch-Heretic mess was also likely why the pricks felt too big for their britches and took part in that coup attempt. One more reason for being salty.

superkeaton

Cat's being such a cheeky shit to Cordelia, I love it. And she shameless eye-candy eating. For all the talk of proper diplomacy, it's the low-born warlord Villainess who has to do the sweet talking. Love. It.

Wonder what kind of work Secret Agent Hakram's about to get up to... Heh, 00rc.

caoimhinh

It's funny because only 3 chapters ago Catherine was saying "From the corner of my eye I saw Princess Rozala's lips twitch in suppressed amusement. It would have been impolitic to wink, I supposed, and besides I had a policy."

Yet she winked to Cordelia in this chapter (mere minutes afterward) in such an insolent way that Cordelia flushed in indignation. Hahahaha

Liliet

Indignation? Are you sure?

Shveiran

Why else? Cordelia is playing along, but she is poised, genteel and does care for courtesies and protocol.
To have such an informal approach is an indignity to her. Not one she'll not cast aside of course, she is not stupid. But... yeah, I think it makes her feel indignation at the gesture. Don't you?

Liliet

Cordelia had just been knocked askew and is unsure what to do. If she were somehow angry or indignant at the Black

Queen in the middle of looking to her for cues on how to act, I'm sure it would have been remarked upon.
No, this is a different kind of flushed.

Agent J

Someone gets it. That's not indignation. That's just blatant ship teasing.

Long live the Unsinkable Fleet!

Shikkarasu

Catdelia intensifies

Liliet

Erratic doesn't do teasing. Erratic does buildup.

Shveiran

Do you really find more likely that that kind of flushing would go unremarked?

Ultimate_procrastinator

My friend, you are attempting to argue with Shipping Gogglestm. That can only end one way: with you flat on your rump, collecting the shattered pieces of your rejected reality, while the owner of the Shipping Gogglestm triumphantly substitutes their own reality. Best just to role with it 😊(or roll your eyes, whatever you prefer) incidentally, does anyone know how to make text a superscript here? I tried googling html tags for it; the tags don't show up, but the text was just left as normal, so I'm not sure what was wrong. I would assume if I screwed up the tags they would show up in the comment?

Ultimate_procrastinator

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, if they were ignored (and not seen) that means that wordpress recognised them but stripped them out as unsupported.

Ultimate_procrastinator

That makes sense. Thanks

Liliet

Does this mean that in your world, everyone who ever argues that a character is attracted to another character is wrong by definition, and even if it ends up explicitly acknowledged in text they were still wrong that other time? Or do you just have a firm conviction that this particular time is wrong and no such thing is happening between Catherine and Cordelia in particular?

Ultimate_procrastinator

No, I was just jokingly pointing out that, right or not, shippers tend to hold tightly to anything which is or is perceived as evidence for their chosen ship, and arguing about whether it makes sense doesn't really tend to go anywhere. I also decided to throw in a mythbuster's reference with the whole rejected/substituted realities line, which probably muddled the joke a bit. Personally, I have no particular opinion on why Cordy was blushing here; could be for shipping reasons, could be, as others have pointed out, because she's a stickler for protocol. Either way, it was a funny moment, and I don't particularly enjoy arguing about shipping in general, so I will make no further statement or commentary on the matter. I apologize for not communicating more clearly, especially if I gave offense in the process

Liliet

> No, I was just jokingly pointing out that, right or not, shippers tend to hold tightly to anything which is or is perceived as evidence for their chosen ship, and arguing about whether it makes sense doesn't really tend to go anywhere.

You might not have considered that in context this would refer to the specific people participating in the discussion? Like, with this statement being made on the commend chain of a specific discussion, this is you making a statement about commenters in it.

"Jokingly" unfortunately does not make this un-hurtful, as the essence of the joke is not "haha nobody would take this statement seriously right?" but "haha these particular arguments so stupid right?"

As illustration, note how it led to specific people checking out of the discussion like "ur right", instead of smiling at the joke and continuing the conversation like before.

This was a pretty damn hurtful thing to have happen to you, and so I am clarifying: did you mean for it to lead to this, or did you completely misread how it would be taken in context?

Shveiran

It "was a pretty damn hurtful thing to have happen to you" to have someone point out their belief that these theories regarding ships seem built on sand?

That's a pretty strong reaction for someone who has often done the same regarding theories they dislike.

He didn't call anyone names, he didn't say you have to stop, he just said "this seems silly, and I don't think you are willing to discuss it seriously".

If that's past the hurtful bar, I'm not sure we can have discussions.

Liliet

> these theories regarding ships seem built on sand?

It is fairly rude to state this so indirectly and not to the person you actually disagree with, yes.

Liliet

Yes, because it doesn't change her mood – she's still off balance and looking to Catherine for directions. And she has no time to acknowledge this, nor any intention. Absolutely no part of her wants to think for even a second about why she flushed there, so the narration moves on immediately. That, in fact, makes perfect sense.

caoimhinh

Yes, I am sure.

Cordelia just emphasized the insolence of that gesture right before flushing. That's not an embarrassed flush of "Oh, my god my crush is looking at me!" nor anything romantic or sexual, it's the simple indignation of a proper and mannered noble receiving an informal and disrespectful gesture by someone else.

We have already seen this a lot of times, Cordelia does not like informalities, and she is obsessed with them to the point it almost pains her when she has to skip formalities (we have seen this from her own POV) and she has always frowned upon Cat's disregard of etiquette.

ninegardens

The Hilarious part of all this being is that Cat winding up Cordelia and winking and breaking all rules of decorum... is the perfect diplomatic play for getting on Tyrants good side.

Probably that's WHY she is doing it (also because fun). But the point is, the more she does this, the more she plays Tyrants game, and the happier he is to play along. Hell, even if he knows its manipulation, he's happy to have a dance partner.

Shveiran

I think Ultimate_procrastinator has it right, caoimhinh. I refer you to his wisdom just above.

Liliet

You know, talking about someone in third person and dismissing everything they say as distorted is pretty rude.

ninegardens

Errr... is this comment attached to the right post? ShVERN is using peoples names to refer to them (usefull for clarity), and doesn't seem to be calling anything distorted?

Liliet

The comment Shveiran is referring people to does.

Shveiran

That is rude, yes.

I don't think that's what I did, though. I said (implied, really) that I find one particular discussion silly and that in light of this I am opting not to participate in it anymore rather than have a fight.

I'm not sure what you are angry about. Do you feel I have to join every discussion?
Or do you think it was it wrong of me not to concede even if I wasn't convinced?

Liliet

You did not just concede / quit the discussion, you 'referred to the wisdom above'. Was that not meant to be read as 'and i suggest you quit too'?

Liliet

When Cordelia is pissy about formalities, she marks that clearly in her narration, and not with an italicized "insolent".

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

"Never before had she heard of a Chosen who would list and explain every kill he'd made in a rioting city before scholars of law so that the actions might be assessed."

[Lawmeter breacks]

His lawfulness! ...It passed 100.000 points!!

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, Hanno is really a welcome change from the Hero who thinks of the law as something to ignore. I really like him.

Shveiran

It's over nine thousands!

Though seriously, I liked THAT little detail A LOT. Kudos to Hanno.

Jane

Idly, I wonder what his justification was for killing that woman selling carpets. I mean, she was defending her shop from looters, before the coin flipped; she evidently had sins in her life, but I don't know that Proceran law would have condemned her at that specific moment.

Liliet

I would say that judging from Hanno submitting all his kills for arbitration, he assumes it would have. It just likely wasn't for what she was doing at that specific moment

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, my thought at the time was "she must have done something really bad in the past to deserve that judgement".

Liliet

My favorite hypotheses are 'child molester' and 'serial killer'.

Fayhem

Interesting question! If I had to hazard a guess, I'd say he told them whatever the Choir showed him when he was meting out judgment that made him get all smitey and because it's Hanno he probably did his best to suggest where they could find material supporting evidence that would corroborate that (e.g., "in the vision she killed the child in her cellar so I'd check for a buried skeleton of a child there with severe damage to the skull from a blow struck from behind with a blunt instrument"). And then they checked and found that evidence, which would both justify that specific kill and bolster Hanno's credibility overall.

As for whether Proceran law would support an on-the-spot execution, it's true that I don't know that it would but it's also true that I don't know basically anything about Proceran law period (because I don't think any of us do, and extrapolating modern standards of justice backwards into a feudal political system is a dubious methodology at best). Though even with the relative shortage of Chosen/heroes in Procer I think it's been shown they're generally highly revered when they do show up, so I would find it plausible that they might at some point have been granted legal status to act as dispensers of high justice (sort of like a prince, but without any broader political powers or rights). Which would mean that Hanno had the legal standing to pass judgment himself rather than legally needing to drag a criminal before a different judge, meaning that the only question would be whether the judgment itself was justifiable as a valid verdict.

Jane

Ah, that would be plausible, and would entirely address the issue of timing.

Does the coin show him why they're being judged guilty, though? I was under the impression it was a simple "Hey, Judgment, Smite or Not?"-style system, but I don't recall anything specific either way...

Shveiran

That is my idea as well, though I don't think we ever saw it from Hanno's POV so it is entirely possible every detail of teh judged life pass before his eyes. Or, for that matter, that he sees dancing monkeys to lift his spirit before he has to take a life. We really have no data, so far as I recall.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The dancing monkey option is henceforth my headcanon until and unless EE decides to show us anything that contradicts it.

ninegardens

We HAVE seen him react to people based on the coin flip though.

In particular, with the rando shop keeper he kills he very much gives them the look and "You know what you've done", compared to random riot instigators where his reaction is "Oh, your doing a bad thing".

Based on that, it feels like he must have SOME information, otherwise he wouldn't have emotional reactions to people.

Liliet

I figure if he didn't get any information from the check, he wouldn't have had anything to submit there, so...

Fayhem

Yeah, I don't think we've ever gotten a picture/statement of exactly what happens when he flips the coin, even during his POVs. Given that he's had a few of those at this point I'm guessing that might be a deliberate authorial choice, but idk really. So that's just a guess on my part, but it seems plausible at least to me.

Liliet

That's what it sounds like to me.

laguz24

Finally, though that trial would have happened no matter what anyone would have done. Seriously, both above and below would be chomping at the bit to have it.

Shveiran

Yeah, for all that this seems like they are handling it to Kairos, there was no preventing this trial. At least they get what they want out of it.

ninegardens

I mean, really Kiaros is being the very patron saint of reasonability here. He's only asking for a thing that everyone has already agreed to give him.

In some sense, I'm surprised people aren't more relieved to get this debacle over and done with sooner rather than later.

The fact that Tyrant is willing to pay Cat TWICE for the privilege of putting Hanno on trial (once here, once at prince's graveyard) is rather nice of him.

It's almost as if Kairos is a true friend and ally who has no hidden agenda whatsoever.

I mean... you can barely even be angry at him for bringing DK and Alay-bells along – it's not like their plan particularly hinged on Tyrant inviting them, they COULD have spread word of a truce offer in plenty of other ways (heck, they probably ARE, like... right now... screaming their peace offer from the rooftops, and via spies in inns, and a dozen other channels. Them being in Salia is just the icing on the cake).

Liliet

Kairos knows when he can push and when he cannot. He has very little leverage, there's a reason why Cordelia and Cat opened with "let's say in return for this service we won't kill you". They could and they would.

Also, I'm visually remembering this scene like that one with Andronike and Komena circling around Cat when she explained her case wrt not eating the Twilight crown, only it's Kairos at the center and Cordelia and Catherine circling him. Sure that's not what they are physically doing, but it's the spirit of the thing.

Shveiran

I mean, yeah, Kairos already paid for this...
... then betrayed the band of five...what, three times?
(shove the RS and steal the crown; duke it out with Catherine for the souls; nudge Saint's death)

Considering his part of the deal was being part of the band of five in exchange for the trial, I'd say there is a need for a new payment XD

ninegardens

Look, on average that's less than one betrayal per person. I mean really, if you're only betraying each person 0.6 times, I don't know why they would be upset about it.

Mental Mouse

Well, "shove the RS and steal the crown" was a play on Cat's behalf. Not that either said anything explicitly, but she was waiting for it and scored big from it.

Oshi

I think it's a little more than that. Kairos has always hated the idea of the Dead King because he is stagnation and an end to the game. He played the game to win and paying twice to Cat is winning in his book because ti gets him all he wants and loses him the things he wanted to give away anyway. I've been sayin this for a while now but this is Kairos's game through and through and Friday will bring his final stage.

Calemyr

This setup reminds me of the Discworld book Thief of Time by Terry Pratchett.

One of the foundations of the story was the creation of a clock so precise that it captured the "universal tick", the smallest fraction of time. To do that, it needed to be more precise than time itself and so, the instant it was turned on, time got gummed up and broke, creating a timeless world where only creatures that could exist outside of time (or trained time manipulators with specialized equipment) could function and everyone else was just so much furniture.

Putting Hanno (who never operates without Judgment's guidance) on trial is pretty much the same as the clock. It's capturing the divine within the mundane, placing the mortal above the immortal. Even if the trial exonerates Hanno, the very act of the trial places the choir of Judgment within the purview of mortal law. That's going to break things, and probably make things that were once impossible now merely improbable. The thought that this might, in fact, make the Bard vulnerable may well make it a worthy sacrifice to the Dead King (who would lose his foothold in the mortal world) and the Dread Empress (who once dreamed of making a world where Evil was allowed a fair shot at the game if they just played it smart).

Others have said this better than I, I know, but I cannot resist when the opportunity arises to reference the Discworld.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"I cannot resist when the opportunity arises to reference the Discworld."

You and every other person of good character who's familiar with the series. 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

So maybe I'm missing a turn of phrase here, but I don't really get the "broken spine take the name" bit. I've heard of having no spine, so something like "Did losing your spine take the name, or was it the other way around?" would have made sense to me, but maybe there's some other turn of phrase I don't know?

Liliet

Break someone's spine = break their resolve, make them submit.

Interlude: And So Let Us Be

"The source of might in an army is unity, not numbers. Therefore, the mightiest of all armies numbers a single soldier."
– Isabella the Mad, Proceran general

Hakram was smelling a rat. Adjutant had always enjoyed using that particular human idiom, as it happened, mostly because it was patently untrue by face value. Humans had all the nose of a sparrow, stumbled around like drunks in the dark and were terribly fragile in most ways that mattered. The last had little to do with rodents, but it was always worth mentioning. As a rule, humans would not be able to smell a rat if it was nesting under their own pillow. Unlike goblins, who entirely coincidentally tended to have very full cookpots when Legions were garrisoned in cities. Goblin stew was always an enjoyable meal, Hakram thought, if not necessarily for the taste then always for the surprise.

"The Magisterium is pleased by your understanding, Lord Adjutant," Magister Zoe Ixioni smiled. "It is always a delight to speak with a professional like yourself."

The slaver – he would not forget for a moment what she was, even if she offered an empire's worth of smiles and compliments – offered Louis Rohanon a more restrained look.

"And we honour the Principate as well, of course," Magister Zoe added. "It is deplored by the enlightened members of our assembly that war was waged between our nations."

"First Prince Cordelia is a fervent adherent of peace and diplomatic resolution," Louis Rohanon replied without batting an eye, lips quirking enough to imply a smile without ever delivering it.

Princess Rozala's 'secretary', who regardless of what he was now titled had been until recently the Prince of Creusens, had proved to be fairly adept at navigating the meetings Hakram had found himself dragged into one after another. Adjutant rumbled out a breath, feeling the rhythm of Bittertongue's old song sound against his bones. No peace can there be, between lash and orc. It was an affront to the history of his kind that he must now speak otherwise, pretending the ways of the sorcerer-lords of Stygia did not sicken him as he watched the magister slip away. Rohanon let out a noise of distaste, when it was only the two of them left in the room.

"I always end up feeling like I need a wash after entertaining someone from the Magisterium," Louis Rohanon admitted.

"Would that someone had laid to waste that city and its slaver-lords with it," Hakram gravelled. "Yet they have tread with care to avoid this, over the years, and it seems still."

The man nodded, slowly. He was a skinny, scholarly sort this one. Yet not without spine or cleverness, and for a Proceran seemed a surprisingly decent man. That might explain why the Jacks had found out he was so badly in debt to Iserre. Decency was unlikely to see one thrive in a place like the Highest Assembly.

"If I might speak frankly, Lord Deadhand?" Rohanon hesitatingly said.

"I would prefer it," Adjutant said. "Mine are a simple folk, and the sly ways of humans confuse me."

It was almost appalling, the orc thought, how eager people this far west were to believe that. Not so appalling he would not use it, however. The former Prince of Creusens choked.

"That would have been more believable a lie before I saw two envoys fall for it, my lord," Rohanon delicately said. "It no longer holds water in the slightest. Not that listening to Basileus Leo explain to you the office and powers of the Hierarch was not most entertaining, but I would spare myself the indignity if you'll allow it."

"Leo Trakas was a most helpful young man," Hakram drily said, neither admitting nor denying anything. "You offered frankness, Louis Rohanon, and I accepted. Speak accordingly."

"I would not dare to presume as to the Black Queen's intent in sending you out," the former prince said, "yet if you were meant to assess divisions and seek weaknesses in the League, you should have come to the same conclusion as I."

The orc studied the man, considering if this was a conversation he should be having, then lightly inclined his head in agreement.

"The League of Free Cities is on the verge of collapse," Hakram acknowledged. "Nicae has yet to hear of the disastrous fate of its fleets but already the Basileus seeks to displace Helike as the leading power. Atalante chafes under a villain's lead, and at the frequent slights it is offered."

"Bellerophon is out of its depth," Louis Rohanon noted. "I would hazard a guess its general-delegate has not received instructions from the People in weeks, if not months, and is entirely unwilling to do anything that might result in execution by the kanenas."

Which was, as far as Hakram could tell, essentially any action at all. The Republic of Bellerophon's legal system struck him as what might come to be if a dutiful scribe set down every single shout from an angry mob and made them all into law, then repeated the process half a hundred times.

"Delos remains aloof, but it appears both Stygia and Penthes are readying to leave the sinking boat," Hakram added. "Else Magister Zoe would not have been so eager to assure me theoretical alignment with the Tower would not result in military support of any kind."

"The Tower has been digging at the Tyrant's position in the Free Cities," Louis Rohanon openly acknowledged, "and the Empress has lived up to her reputation in achieving such broad success. Unless the Hierarch takes the League in hand this day it will not survive this conference as a united entity. Should he die, nearly half the League will seek the Empire's protection against coming retribution before the corpse is cold."

Which was inconvenient as without allies in either the League and the Thalassocracy the sole avenue to bring the Empire to heel was a land war of the old way, Callow and Praes entwined in the ancient dance of steel once again. Yet as much as Hakram's mind was inclined to tumble down the slope of logistics and strategy, it would be a mistake to do so. The Tyrant of Helike was the devil of the day, and what they had now discovered the Named must have already known. The ship that had carried him to the peace conference of Salia, the large and largely untouched army of a united League of Free Cities, was on the verge of collapse. As things stood, even if the Tyrant ordered these armies to ravage southern Procer most of them would ignore him and continue the retreat south. And with Catherine having crippled the famous kataphraktoi, Helike's own army was crippled in turn.

The Tyrant of Helike no longer had the clout to make demands. More worryingly the boy-king must have known it would come to this for weeks if not months, and he had still come. And so, Hakram was smelling a rat.

"I fear," Hakram Deadhand said, "that Lady Dartwick's instincts have proved true."

"In what way?" Louis Rohanon asked, eyes cautious.

"Kairos Theodosian is exactly where he meant to be," Adjutant said, "and cares little for the fate of the horse he rode after he ceases riding it."

—

Indrani had never been one to shy from admitting to herself when she was enjoying something, and so she wasn't going to start now: this was hilarious, and she in no way regretted striking the first spark of that debate.

"Soon you'll be telling me magic is an art and not a discipline," Masego scathingly said. "Divine approval? You might as well start praying for spell formulas."

"There is recorded precedent for certain workings functioning better when aligned with the words of the Book of All Things," Roland said. "While I would not—"

The Rogue Sorcerer was trying to keep things civil and academic, which naturally meant he was doomed to fail just as all voices of reason had been since First Dawn.

"Spoken like a Trismegistan coinpurse," the Witch of the Woods snorted contemptuously. "Praying would work swifter than your method and involve rather less scribbling of numbers. And Gods forbid you forget to carry a one: you'll melt your face instead of lighting a candle, if anything happens at all."

"While Trismegistan sorcery is known to require significantly more study than most, it has also been proven to produce more reliable—" Roland tried.

"You defend ignorance as creativity and methodology as shackles," Masego retorted, deeply appalled. "I should expect nothing more from someone who apes Ligurian magic without—"

"Dogs of Trismegistus bark not —"

"Perhaps," the Rogue Sorcerer desperately said, "we should lower our voices. At this rate illusion or not they'll hear us arriving."

A moment of silence followed, the two mages who'd been arguing looking away in embarrassment at how heated the conversation had grown.

"I hear Jaquinite sorcery can do stuff neither yours can do," Indrani idly said.

"That would matter, I imagine, if Jaquinite sorcery could reliably do anything in particular," Masego said.

"Teach an apprentice Proceran magic for a year and they will crush one taught Wasteland posturing for the same," the Witch of the Woods retorted without missing a beat.

Ah, Archer thought. Much better. Roland shot her a betrayed look she answered by prettily batting her eyes, and the giant wolf the Witch was riding on glared at her woefully. Indrani sniggered. 'Woeful', which worked as two puns because Archer was one of the Woe but it was also close to wolf and... eh, just wasn't the same when Cat wasn't there to be offended to her core by the puns. She'd keep it in mind for when she ended up giving her report, though. The four of them were getting close to Lyonceau, the small town they'd been headed towards for the better part of an hour now, so perhaps it was time to pretend she'd been on Roland's side this whole time.

Zeze and the Witch were in a full blow argument again, voices progressively rising along with the general pettiness of what was being said, so she cleared her throat loud enough it'd cut through.

"Shame on both of you," Indrani piously said, "ignoring poor Roland, when he's trying to warn you about dangers."

The Rogue Sorcerer eyed her pensively.

"I believe," he said, "that you might just be the worst person I know."

"That was unkind," Masego seriously said.

"Rogue," the Witch said, "comport yourself cordially. They are our allies for now."

There was a pause.

"You have fought the Dead King, besides," the Witch reminded him.

"I know what I said," the Rogue Sorcerer muttered.

"I forgive you, as mine is a forgiving nature," Indrani lied.

Roland met her eyes discreetly, lips moving to silently mouth 'the worst person I know' in Chantant, and she grinned back. Indrani had grown to like the Rogue Sorcerer: he was a delight to toy with and halfway decent in a fight. Not too hard on the eyes, either, which was always nice in a boon companion. He'd also proved more useful when they'd run into the Witch of the Wilds and accusations had flown about how they were plotting to murder the entire Grand Alliance. Which Indrani was reasonably sure was not the case, since she would have had a seat at the council where that'd be decided and she'd not been that drunk in a while. Roland had more or less vouched for them not being up to no good – at that moment in time, anyway – and that'd led to the question of why the Witch would think they were up to some skulking murderousness.

The answer was, in a word, Lyonceau.

Archer herself had found there was something odd with the League's camp when she first went out on a walk thereabout, in essence because there was nothing at all odd with the League's camp. The Tyrant might be able to keep his lunacy in check for a few days, Indrani had mused, but the Hierarch? Unlikely. She still remembered the frightful madness that'd fallen over Rochelant like a veil, the red-handed tribunals that'd spread out like tendrils of sickness from where the Hierarch sat. It was the sort of thing you could tuck away in Arcadia or some other neat little pocket, on occasion contain behind the right sort of wards and sometimes even something you could lull into sleep. For a time. But there were always, always signs. So Indrani had told herself, maybe there were wards. None she could find, true, but it wasn't her specialty by any means.

Zeze had been raised by a man who'd turned warding into weapon to shatter fortresses, though, and losing his sorcery had done nothing to curb his sight. The Rogue Sorcerer had been with him then, the two of them discussing the Twilight Ways and the making of gates for it, and it'd been easy to bully – convince! Convince him to come along. No wards of the calibre that'd keep the Hierarch quiet in the League camp, they'd confirmed for her. Might have been a good time to go to the Crows, then, but Zeze still kind of wanted them on a vivisection table and the Sisters tended to ask payment up front for miracles from anyone but Cat. Who had half a dozen other cats to skin, about then, and a limited amount of additional hands in Hakram and Vivienne. So instead Indrani had called on the finest band of useless busybodies she knew, namely Robber and his cohort of miscreants.

Her Majestic Catherinery had helpfully turned them loose on the countryside with even looser instructions, so it'd been child's play to commandeer their little goblin legs and watchful eyes. The Hierarch had to be close, because there was no way to the Tyrant was wandering too far away from him, and it wasn't like the man was going to feed himself – so find the food, find the man. Or so had been the thought. And Robber had put his cohort to passable work, keeping a watch on the League's camp through the day and night. Unfortunately Kairos Theodosian was, as usual, a twisty little fucker. The food wagon had gone out under illusion veils, then passed through some wards carved into stones. Twice they'd followed a wagon and lost it, which none of them had taken well pride-wise, and some Magisterium prick had caught the goblins lurking so Archer was forced to send them away.

They'd gone hunting for the ward stones instead, since those would be the key, which was when they'd run into a masked woman on a giant wolf and some very hurtful accusations. The Witch had come to it from the other way entirely, as it happened: she'd found an abandoned town a few hours out of Salia that was entirely hidden by wards and followed the wagon line from the other direction until she ran into them sniffing around a ward stone. Conclusions were leap to, though Indrani would admit that a pair of villains around a disappeared town was usually pretty damning stuff. The place was, according to the maps Roland had gotten his hands on, called Lyonceau. It was one of those small Proceran towns that emptied during winter, and according to the locals pretty much the only thing of note about it was that it had a large House of Light: several towns and villages around used it for the festivals instead of their own small altar, since it was cheaper than building and maintaining one of their own.

It was suspicious nonetheless, all had agreed, and they'd gone to trespass – by which Indrani meant investigate, naturally, since you got to call it that when you were on the side of the angels. Though in theory the Witch was the one guiding them, in practice since she'd spent most the way arguing with Zeze it had been the helpful giant wolf that led them.

"This isn't right," Masego suddenly said.

All four of them were Named, and none fresh to the mantle, so the moment the Hierophant spoke the other three ceased moving forward. Indrani could see nothing but a snowy plain above, and apparently neither could Roland, but even with the mask she could see Masego and the Witch were looking at the same place.

"We've arrived?" she asked.

Leaning on her aspect might allow her to peer through an illusion or a ward, but she'd rather not begin using those too early in the day – not when there might yet be a fight ahead of them.

"We are at the outermost boundary of the wards," the Witch of the Woods said. "I grasp your meaning, Hierophant. This is... unusual work."

Roland muttered under his breath in the mage-tongue, gesturing sharply with one hand as he reached within his coat with the other. The silvery sorcery that gathered around the tip of his fingers he laid against the small wooden box he'd produced and it sank within. He opened it deftly, revealing some sort of oily ointment.

"Around the eyes," the Rogue Sorcerer told her, "and over the eyelids."

Indrani's brow rose and she dipped a finger, handling one eye and then the other. The smell was unfamiliar to her, save for what she suspected to be apple tree bark, and it tingled pleasantly against her skin. One she'd applied it as the hero had instructed, she found she could now glimpse colours where before there had been only air. It was a vast tapestry of many-coloured threads, she thought, yet she could only ever see the threads she was directly looking at.

"It is not merely unusual work," Masego said, sounding troubled. "It, in part mine. Akua Sahelian's also, and a myriad others, but some of those patterns were first laid down by my hand."

"There are other influences in there," the Witch of the Wilds said. "Callowan wards, Aenian cants and that odd Jaquinite escapement."

"No sorcerer could make such a thing," the Hierophant said. "No living one, anyway."

"The Tyrant's bargained with the Dead King before, we know that," Indrani said. "What's so troubling about these wards anyway?"

"The Doom of Liesse was meant to bring forth devils, to forge Greater Breaches," Masego hesitantly said. "This is..."

"Angels," the Witch of the Wilds said. "They are not as easily summoned as devils, but this is meant to command the attention of angels."

Well, Archer thought, shit.

—

Vivienne found Adjutant waiting in the hallway, along with a worried-looking Louis Rohanon. She was not the only one to notice this, Princess Rozala excusing herself from her conversation with Lady Itima to silently join her as she sought out Hakram.

"Lord Adjutant," she greeted him, "Secretary Rohanon."

Rozala Malanza went through the same round of courtesies, receiving the same nods for it.

"The situation in the League is considerably more unstable than we'd believed," Hakram quietly said.

"We believe the Tyrant no longer holds sway," Louis Rohanon added just as quietly. "And that he was undermined by the Tower. Both Stygia and Penthes seem to be leaning towards Praes."

Which went some way in explaining why the Tyrant had willingly served as the Dead King's herald once more, Vivienne thought. She'd believed until now it was simply a matter of letting loose a wild lion in the pen so he would not seem as dangerous, but this... fit. Though a raging lunatic, the boy-king of Helike was brilliant in his own way. He must have known that the Princes' Graveyard would be the beginning of the end for his influence in the League, and with it his right to make demands of the Grand Alliance, so he had helped forge another calamity so that he could bargain away the key to beating it back in exchange for the promises being made to him being kept. The vicious wretch had yet to miss a single step, though Vivienne had a hard time believing the outcome of the Graveyard had been his intent. Most likely Catherine's victory had forced him to improvise in the wake of the defeat, leading to this fresh madness.

"It no longer matters he's lost the League," Vivienne admitted.

Surprise, from both men.

"He swore before the Peregrine he has a way out of our current predicament," Princess Rozala elaborated. "His bargaining chip has changed, though the bargain has not. He still requires the White Knight to stand trial for his actions in the League."

"When?" Hakram asked, hairless brow creasing.

"Today," Vivienne said. "The recess will be extended into a dismissal of today's session. We will be heading out to the trial's grounds presently."

Catherine and Hasenbach had returned to the hall along with Yannu Marave and the Carrion Lord to swiftly pass the motion, though given that the Grand Alliance commanded a comfortable majority in such votes that was largely a formality.

"It cannot be held in Salia, surely?" Louis Rohanon said, looking alarmed. "I know not the consequences of attempting to pass sentence onto the Sword of Judgement himself, but surely we cannot risk the people of the capital so recklessly."

"The First Prince agreed," Princess Rozala said, smiling approvingly. "The trial will be held outside the city. Hagglings had over the exact grounds, until we settled on a town in the countryside three hours' ride from here by the name of Lyonceau."

"It is a trap," Hakram bluntly said.

"It's Kairos," an amused voice drawled. "Of course it's a fucking trap."

Vivienne turned and saw her friend – her queen – limping forward, leaning on her strange yet oddly soothing staff. She did not hide her surprise at the swift return, or at the way that the drow called the 'Lord of Silent Steps' stood at her side. Hakram was just as surprised, by the looks of it.

"Your Majesty," Princess Rozala greeted her. "Was your right to vote passed to a delegate?"

"We're already done," Catherine replied. "First Prince Cordelia wasted no time on ceremonies, and most votes were known before they were cast."

"The League?" Vivienne asked.

"Couldn't even agree on a delegate without the Tyrant herding them," the Queen of Callow said. "The wheels are coming off that cart, mark my words."

"And the Dead King, Your Majesty?" Princess Rozala probed.

"I hesitate to ascribe surprise to a bare skull," Catherine mused. "But this was not his work, I'd bet rubies to piglets over it. This stage belongs to Kairos Theodosian alone."

"We believe the Tower to be actively courting cities among the League, Queen Catherine," Louis Rohanon said. "Dread Empress Malicia would have greatly undermined the standing of the Tyrant for this to succeed."

The Queen of Callow frowned.

"Then after riding his last horse to the grave, he has saddled a fresh one," Catherine said. "You saw it true, Vivienne."

Even now, the former thief was surprised by the flush of pleasure she felt at the freely offered praise. It was not entirely warranted, in her eyes, for while she'd brought up the notion first but she doubted they would not have seen it themselves in time. Still, it was not unpleasant to hear. She smoothed away the emotion, for there were higher callings than indulgence at hand. A drow painted in the colours of the 'Losara', the tribe among their kind that Catherine had unsurprisingly ended up forging when none at hand suited her purposes, stepped forward to murmur in Lord Ivah's ears before retreating. The Lord of Silent Steps addressed the queen in Crepuscular, and she closed her eyes in thought. A few moments passed, and she opened them.

"No, doesn't mean anything to me," she told the drow. "Adjutant, I need you to find me someone who knows something. An herbal brew made of foxglove, nightshade and powdered graveborn mushrooms – what is it for?"

Vivienne was looking for it, so she caught it: the faint tremor, the pulse that shuddered through the fabric of Creation as Adjutant called on one of his aspects. The tall orc's head snapped to the side, cheeks creasing in amusement as his eyes came to rest on the approaching form of Lady Aquiline Osená.

"Providence, warlord," he gravelled in Kharsum. "The wind is in our sails for once."

"Don't rejoice," Catherine replied in the same. "Think on how bad the opposition must be, that we are smiled upon."

The Lady of Tartessos was approached, and Princess Rozala was prevailed upon to make introductions. Few courtesies were had, as Levantine ways tended to be pleasantly brisk. The question was asked, though nightshade was a term unfamiliar to the Levantine. Belladonna, however, she recognized.

"That is champion's brew, though I have never heard of graveborn mushrooms being used in the recipe," Lady Aquiline said, though she looked bemused at the question. "Only one without character would use it in an honour duel, but it can be a worthy thing when drunk in the deeps of the Brocelian."

"What does it do?" Catherine pressed.

"It lends strength to the dying," Lady Aquiline said. "It calms limbs, eases the flow of blood and lends vigour – for a time, and at a price. It is false strength, and when it fades often kills the drinker."

"Let me guess," Catherine Foundling grimly smiled, "graveborn mushrooms would add a little more to the vigour, right?"

"I am not certain," the Lady of Tartessos admitted. "It would be better to ask Razin, as one of the Binder's Blood would be learned in such lore. Yet what you say seems likely, for barrow-born things often lend poisonous strength before they kill."

"Catherine?" Vivienne asked, looking at her cautiously.

Something almost like fear had flickered across the Black Queen's face for a moment.

"The Tyrant of Helike was drinking this by the cup last night," Catherine said, "and it was brewed potently enough it would have outright poisoned someone without a Name."

A moment of silence passed.

"Steel yourselves, my friends," the Black Queen gravely said, "for when the likes of Kairos Theodosian comes to sing his swan song it is not a thing to be taken lightly."

"Steel yourselves, my friends," the Black Queen gravely said, "for when the likes of Kairos Theodosian comes to vote it is not a thing to be taken lightly."

TeK

Nice touch to not actually include a voting link.

Big Brother

The word Vote is the link?

Insanenoodlyguy

look again, the word vote is a hyperlink.

Barthumphries

I'm disappointed, Soronel. A vote thread without an accompanying typo thread? The true responsibilities of a vote thread are not to be taken lightly and most votes were know before they were cast."

Change know to known

Aston Whiteman

Is there an update today and the side bar wasn't updated?

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/10/14/interlude-wicked/>

NerfContessa

Dang, so his tab is finally due?

Amazing work, as always.

Slider

So, an all-out battle against a Berserk Tyrant? Nice.

Big Brother

This isn't a berserk Tyrant. This is everything he's worked towards since the beginning. The forging of the Hierarch, the unification of the League under him, the war on Procer, the Trial of Hanno.

Kairos is nearing the end of his plot, and we are finally seeing it. The Judgement of the Choir of Judgement by the Hierarch, and the (possible) shattering of a Good Power source older than Calernia.

Big Brother

And since I've never seen it mentioned in the comment threads or on the Discord, everyone seems to have forgotten Kairos' main Aspect. WISH. Every time his red eye has flared he's been making a Wish, to ensure everything has flowed the way he wants it to. His actions seem absolutely random at worst, and just a constant stream of betrayals at best because it's a distraction to keep people from realizing he's been following one of the most powerful Aspects on Calernia the entire time, and his master plan has moved uninterrupted throughout the story.

Also, is there a rough timescale of when Kairos came into his Name in the story, because if it's just as the story started, a Wish he made to set everything in motion may be why Cat became Black's Squire instead of becoming the White Knight. Bard even mentions Cat was supposed to lead Will's little party and act as the glue keeping it together as the White Knight, but doesn't know why Cat ended up a villain.

Lord GM

You wouldn't happen to have a neat little collection of scenes that mention his eye flaring red? Because if that truly indicated him using that insanely powerful aspect, it would shine a whole new light on many things.

I probably wouldn't go as far as making it the inciting incident for Cat's heroic journey, but it would definitely proof that he is playing a far greater (and far more meta) game than everyone believes he does.

Jane

You know, it's questions like this that make me Wish that this was one of those stories that conveniently tagged every chapter that a character made an appearance in, so that it would be easier to go back and review this sort of thing. And the author could play fun meta games like, "Why is the Scribe tagged here, I didn't see them!".

Liliet

Assassin...

Shikkarasu

Or Assassin. Let's not forget he was on screen in the first 2/3 books according to Word of God. I wouldn't put it past EE to have had him appear in all books so far.

Risser

Wait... assassin was on screen? When?

BBX

Exactly

Dsylexic Wofl

Case and point

goliath1303

*Case in point

At in of wet made a list of times Assassin was siren in person, the case of Risser beong confused and asking when that happened would be one of the bullet*point*s on the list.

That example honestly has nothing to do with how the phrase can't about, I just think it helps to show exactly what the idiom means.

Here's a webpage that gives more information.

Scrutable

Does anyone have a convenient link to where the abilities of Wish were explained? I see people reference it a lot in the comments but I don't remember what exactly it's supposed to be able to do.

Big Brother

I don't think it's been 100% explained, but the rough gist is Kairos can make a Wish, and will lose years off his life equal to the value of the Wish

Vega

The best part about all of this is that this could be the FIRST part of a plan of his so it will go off without a hitch but the rest could be derailed by the HERO who was recently blessed by providence (cat) to change the outcome to her favor. So Tyrant gets to flip the finger to the above while Cat gets to "mess up" phase two

caoimhinh

I don't think you should put that much faith in Wish, it can't possibly be as powerful as to warp reality and even had affected Catherine's choice.

Also, Wish hasn't been properly explained, it's capabilities have only been hinted twice.

The first, by Kairos himself when talking with Anaxares, he said that he had the ability to know what people wish for. From Villanous Interlude Thunder:

Notice that the word shone when he spoke it, implying the use of the Aspect, lending credibility to this instance. Further down in that same chapter, in another conversation with Anaxares, Kairos hinted that it was thanks to this that he was able to make the Kanenas do as he said, as he "gave them what they wanted most, deep down, under all the laws and the lies."

The second hint of what the Wish aspect is capable of, is what you are taking as guide for your comment, what the Skein said when it was facing Kairos in Liesse and its spooling of time was undone by the Tyrant.

From Book 5 Chapter 43 Treachery:

"Spool," the Skein snarled.

And just like that/

/the Tyrant of Helike sneered.

"Fate is a tug of war, you raggedy old thing," Kairos Theodosian said, and there was something sharp in his tone I'd never heard there before. "Do you think the wishes of the conquered matter more than those of contenders?"

"You die laughing," the Skein hissed. "Or. You flee. Or. I am broken. Or. Everything burns. Or. Or. Why does it keep changing?"

"There's more than one reason I picked him out for this band," I amusedly said.

Was Kairos Theodosian a treacherous, unpredictable and murderous madman? Yes. Obviously. But against a particular kind of foe – say, an oracle who'd spin out of new thread of prediction from his every whim as the lunatic committed to them with ironclad will unhesitatingly – that had its uses.

"Spool," the Skein snarled again and/

/"Do you think yourself above even the Gods, you presumptuous relic?" the Tyrant of Helike snarled back. "Do you think you can erase me like chalk on a slate? Learn your place."

"Shouldn't have done that," I told the Revenant, pulling at my pipe.

"It will kill you," the Skein cackled, its laughter like rumbling thunder. "Wish, wish into the grave. How many years can you spend?"

I winced. I'd fought enough Named to recognize when one's bottom line was being crossed, and the continued attempts of the Revenant to use its aspect were definitely whipping Kairos into a proper frenzy. I could only guess at what was the cause of it, but the rage in that crimson bloodshot eye and the wildly shaking hands struck me as too raw to be a lie.

While the Skein implies that wishing takes years out of Kairos' life, it's unconfirmed and could be a misconception, it could be that Kairos was simply undoing the reversal of time since Spool could be considered the Skein's wish and the Tyrant's aspect happens to counter it.

It's also shown that Kairos rage is not because of the loss of life, but rather because of the attempt of manipulating his fate, a subject he is very touchy about, and it's in fact the pivot of his coming into the Tyrant Name.

Also, it's highly unlikely if not outright impossible that his aspect could warp reality to make his wishes come true. In the instances I recall of his red eye shining nothing lucky or extraordinary has happened, rather it had been said that the red eye seemed to pierce into them and shone as Kairos displayed more "madness".

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for laying it out so clearly.

ninegardens

So.... hate to say it, but I don't think that Kairos has been running on a "grand plan" this entire time.

By which I mean, based on seeing Heirarch's POV, the plan to judge angles seems very much HIS plan. If I had to guess, I'd say Kairos was juggling for the lulz right up until Heirarch was formed... and the subsequently managed to catch with in Heirarch's desires, realized they were insane amazing, and decided to build the rest of his plan so as to achieve it... but I DON'T think he created Hierarch with this specific plan in mind. (He just wanted to make Anarexes to screw with things).

That would be my guess... time will tell. (maybe)

Zggt

I'm not sure; Kairos was supposed to die while his heroic brother that everyone loved got everything. He was born crippled and literally dying, and used his Name to subvert destiny. But in this world you can subvert destiny, not avoid it altogether. It really would fit him, all the old-school villainy, which allows you to curse with your dying breath (as Cat did with Will). It also fits with the metaphor of the game – where he would destroy himself to spite the so-called inevitable because he cannot allow the choice (even one of his own death) to be made by anyone else.

Liliet

I think it's more like first he planned to take Helike and see what he can do from there, then he planned to make Hierarch and see what he can do from there, and then he had a plan.

Lord GM

As Cat has learned at the academy, every complicated plan with too many moving parts will come apart sooner than later.

I was not trying to imply that he masterfully planned every move from the beginning. Instead he was improvising the hell out of every situation to get closer to his final goal and probably using Wish to help things along. Heck, he was trying so many different ploys that he turned "always being in the first step of a plan" into a valid strategy (at least for a while). Sure, half of them failed and half he did just for fun, not really knowing where they might lead. But some of his crazy schemes actually succeeded. And now all the plans he juggled are about to come tumbling down on everybody's heads.

greatwyrmgold

The magnum opus of a mad artist, with the world as a canvas and paint composed primarily of blood.

JJR

I doubt it. Roiding out into a giant muscle beast is always the last thing the villain does, and the most boring part of their character. He's got something far more interesting planned.

caoimhinh

More like he is doping himself before running a marathon. That the components of this drink usually kill the drinker doesn't mean much, given that it is a Named who is drinking it.

More important is the fact that Kairos is doing this because he is going to need a lot of power for whatever he is planning.

WuseMajor

I suspect his plan, at least as far as the drink is concerned, is simply "live long enough to enjoy watching his endgame." Because he's been sick and dying since we met him and I think it's starting to catch up to him or a price might be coming due.

caoimhinh

It would be awesome and hilariously ironic if Kairos manages to bargain for a cure for his disease from the Choir due to some part of this whole Trial plan.

Mental Mouse

And even more hazardous to the Choirs, dangerous, as it would confirm Cat's precedent.

imagesbe

Was the spelling Catherine as Catherinery... intentional? I mean, I wouldn't put it past Indrani, but it does seem like an odd way to slang.

Also, pieces are beginning to come together. A trail for a servant of the Seraphim. A ward capable of bringing an angel. A Hierarch (possibly) capable of judging them.

Yes, it's coming together. The only thing I'm missing is why this would be his end game. What does he get out of this aside from the amusement of watching a Seraphim, a member of the choir of judgement, get judged?

Francis Nicholai

We know there's a balance. If Above gets judged, it is likely some great power of Below will be brought to heel in order to balance the scales.

Jane

I'm not so certain – the way I understand it is that the more of a nudge one side gets, the more of a nudge the other is granted, allowing a balance of influence – and that when one side gets the upper hand, that allows the other to better concentrate their influence (one really powerful Hero instead of a dozen decent Heroes, for instance).

Since this is acting on the Powers That Be instead of the Powers That Be acting, that shouldn't apply – setting aside for the moment that the rules outside of Creation presumably differ.

That said, if it does work that way, I think that would qualify the Tyrant as the greatest traitor in history, indirectly murdering one of his divine patrons via Story. He'd probably be the greatest Saint in history to Praes for such a deed, an act of holy betrayal that killed two of the highest powers.

onedollargum

Kairos killing the hell-gods by proxy would be an awesome betrayal.

Liliet

> Was the spelling Catherine as Catherinery... intentional? I mean, I wouldn't put it past Indrani, but it does seem like an odd way to slang. Given the full address is "Her Majestic Catherinery" instead of "Her Majesty Catherine" it's definitely 100% intentional and actually flows quite well ♥

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Re: Catherinery: yes, it's intentional. It's her name paired with the suffix -ry to create a humorous faux-respectful title on Archer's part.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I've been ninja'd. Oh well.

Liliet

Oooh, you explained it better than I did.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Theo Promes

I suspect he might be trying to corrupt the choir of justice. Putting the white knight on trial by the incarnation of mob justice, surrounded by some eldritch angel-trap... Maybe the plan is to change the meaning of justice towards Hierarch's approach.

ninegardens

Oh god, he isn't planning to destroy the Choir of justice, he's planning to inject Heirarch into it... that's horrifying. I love it.

tithin

Theory: he's going to force the white knight to trial, and judge his choir via a forced summon.

I thought the trial would be a metaphorical judgement, using his colleague Anaxares, but the more I consider it based on this most recent development, I think it's going to be a literal judgement.

Two hostile forces representing judgement, judging each other, one via their champion the white knight, and the other via anaxares.

Zggt

Heirarch said as much; he saw the choir through the White Knight's coin and decided that the choir itself must stand trial (and using his Kafkaesque logic: be found guilty and executed, as is the right of everyone who stands trial for standing against the will of the people).

Some Smartass

We all knew it would come. I wasn't expecting it to happen this soon, though, I admit.

Someguy

White Knight was just the Spell Ingredient to summon the Choir of Judgement into Creation to be put on trial under Bellerophon laws & proceedings.

Tesla

Holy crap, he's going out with a bang

chris S

Steel yourselves, my friends," the Black Queen gravely said, "for when the likes of Kairos Theodosian comes to Vote for the Guide it is not a thing to be taken lightly."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Always wanted to do one of these!

Trystan Heck

Don't be like the Tyrant, plan to live long and Vote

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

superkeaton

Well, so it begins. Or ends, rather. Fun, fun, fun.

Jane

I do believe someone had mentioned the influence of shipping goggles in the last set of comments?

Well, I do believe I'm wearing my set quite securely this chapter

Liliet

We know Vivienne is straight, sadly.

She definitely does care about Catherine's opinion a lot though

Jane

Well, we know that Vivienne likes guys, and Catherine believes Vivienne is straight, but... That's not 100%, ironclad, this-is-completely-unchangeable proof that she is. If the author wanted to put them together, all it would take is a conversation between the two where Vivienne said "Oh, yeah, I usually date guys, but I am interested in women sometimes – including you," or something to that effect.

It's evidence enough to presume she's straight, but not so much evidence that the author couldn't include a twist to the contrary if they were so inclined, to put it succinctly.

Liliet

Vivienne has never actually dated onscreen, or likely ever. Catherine goes off subtler clues, and those are less likely to be wrong. I mean Cat was pining for her for half a book, you'd think they'd have found each other by now if that had a snowball's chance in hell of happening.

Also, this particular mentor/student-like relationship would make romantic entanglement pretty damn squicky. Cat is in position of authority over Vivienne, both formally and in Vivienne's mind. No sexy times on top of that p l e a s e, Killian was enough of a trainwreck already

Jane

Regarding dating, that's not quite right; Cat mentioned that she knows that Vivienne has had some hookups with some guys while in town. None of them were relationships to the best of our knowledge, but that's strong proof that she likes guys, though not necessarily exclusively.

Regarding the timeline, I don't think the timing has ever been right for such a resolution, either way; during the Fey arc, Vivienne was still adjusting and everything was on fire; after that, Cat was Winter Cat, and everything was on fire; after that, Cat was underground while Vivienne held Callow together, and everything was on fire; after that, it's now, and while both of them might be in the right headspace and physical space to start thinking about things, everything's currently on fire.

Regarding Cat's opinion, I'd also note that she's too close to be an unbiased observer; if she thought that a relationship with Vivienne was even possible, it would mean that she would have an actual choice to make. One that risked her plans for Callow, and the balance of the Woe, for her own personal happiness. Setting aside the fact that Cat seems to have a thing about being happy, would she really be willing to add that kind of complication to her actual goals for a personal relationship? As you note, it would be messy – so for her, it's a lot easier to just tell herself it was never possible to begin with.

Anyways, all of that said, there's a difference between what's reasonably possible in the work and a prediction about where the author is actually going – just because it's possible, and there are passages that can be interpreted as suggesting that outcome, doesn't mean that that's where anything is going.

Liliet

Fair.

I'm just here like... if I'm getting pissy and passive aggressive about ppl shipping canon lesbians with guys (which I am) then in ONE WORK where like 90% of everyone is LGBT+ maybe we can try and extend this respect to the one (1) character explicitly said to be straight. I know real life is still Like That and all f/f is a gift but Guide is not!

You have a point about Catherine, but I would also note that she could simply say Vivienne was not interested in her, not clarify she's straight. I don't think Cat's the kind of cocky casanova who'd assume the only reason someone could possibly be not interested is because of incompatible orientation.

Fayhem

> I don't think Cat's the kind of cocky casanova

This isn't really germane to this conversation (or anything), and is also a bad idea, but I kinda really want to portmanteau that into "cocksanova".

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I approve of this non-germane, non-good idea. In a platonic sense I would almost say that this makes you the real cocksanova.

Jane

While I understand your reasoning, and would never dream of making this argument if we were talking about real people instead of fictional characters, I would also note that the two issues aren't really the same – there's a tendency to downplay the seriousness of lesbian characters and relationships that doesn't exist with straight characters. Wishing that a lesbian character was bi contributes to that marginalization, while wishing that a straight character was bi is just fans being unrealistic again. It may be somewhat inappropriate, but I imagine most authors probably find it more squicky when readers pair characters up with their mortal enemies.

Regarding Catherine, there are many benign reasons she could come to that conclusion – it's easier to conclusively close that door rather than believe she can change Vivienne's view of her, Vivienne's cues are subtle enough that they're easier to ignore, it's the first excuse her subconsciousness came up with... We would need more evidence that Cat was mistaken before we could really argue why she was mistaken. It's something that would be easy to explain, but that's putting the cart before the metaphorical horse.

Liliet

> I imagine most authors probably find it more squicky when readers pair characters up with their mortal enemies.
-giggles in CatAkua-
(by which I mean these two aren't going to be a couple any time soon because DUH everything, but.....)

> Regarding Catherine, there are many benign reasons she could come to that conclusion – it's easier to conclusively close that door rather than believe she can change Vivienne's view of her

I suppose.

Mostly, when I'm reading Guide, I want to live in the world where inequality already doesn't exist (like in Guide), you know? =x

Liliet

Orientation aside, though, I also take issue with the specific relationship. The phrase you cited is part of the dynamic of Vivienne looking up to Catherine and seeking her approval, whereas Catherine knows it and uses it to 'steer' her (and feels a little bad about it). That is the exact opposite of something that should be mixed with a romantic/sexual relationship. Like forreal, the power dynamic goes sharply away from okay here. Sure, it doesn't quite pass my treshold of "no nope never and I'm never visiting this comment section again just because it was suggested", but it's... closer to Hye/Amadeus, The Great Nope Ship, than Wekesa/Tikoloshe or something else like that.

Jane

Ah, with regards to that, I'll simply say that their relationship was different prior to this book (and that I signed on to this ship prior to this book), and that I'm trusting that things will either change again, or that Cat is direly misreading the hero worship.

I mean, back before the Underdark, Vivienne's relative position to Cat sounded a lot more like Indrani that it did Hakram. This is a pretty new twist to their relationship, that wasn't really introduced prior to Cat scolding her during the rescue of the army.

Liliet

Nnn. I'm not so sure. There's a reason Vivienne went straight from opposing Catherine to getting third degree burns in every single goddamn fight she was in with the Woe. She threw herself into this fully, beyond all logic, reason and self-preservation, and I think Indrani nailed it when yelling at Cat in Everdark – a girl who wanted to belong and matter so badly she'd joined a doomed rebellion with people she didn't like, respect or trust. She was still trying to hold herself back, to make her imprinting on Catherine conditional, as of Book 3 – but it was always nothing short of imprinting. She's a baby duck following her mama duck, and if anything it is indeed getting better lately, because she's letting it outside and taking the reins, instead of allowing it to steer her beyond her conscious control.

Insanenoodlyguy

Between Cat, Indrani, and Akua (you know she'd do it just to, pun intended, fuck with her if it was an option), if Viv was going to drift up the kinsey scale, it seems likely it'd have happened by now.

Liliet

Mhm.

Zggt

On one hand true, but I think that our author knows better than pulling the "yet another person who hangs around the MC wants them" again (two is kinda the boundary of cheesy-harem territory, do you really want this story to cross that line?).

Jane

Hey, a shipper wants what a shipper wants, darn the consequences 😊!

Joking aside, though, her relationship with Indrani is explicitly not a romantic one, and neither thinks it will be a long-term relationship, so I don't think it would risk falling into the cliché – and with the general lack of romance around the main character (Killian... Doesn't really count, given how she just kind of faded away from the story), the author has plenty of freedom to act, so long as they commit to a given relationship past this point.

And while it's entirely likely that Cat will end the story single, if she does end up in a relationship, it's not really going to be possible to avoid the issue you raise – this late in the series, it would have to be someone that the reader is already fairly familiar with, as there isn't enough time to develop a new character up to the standards of the existing ones before the climax. While that's not a barrier if she ends up with Hasenbach, Rozala, or Malicia, Cat already has fairly close relationships to most other characters who have been previously introduced.

Trebar

That is kind of an oversimplification, don't you think? I assume one of them is Killian, and that was a full-on relationship. Indrani has to be the other, but that relationship is hardly harem territory.

doominator10

"Her Majestic Catherinery"

Is the best thing in this novel and I hope it's not a typo.

ErraticErrata

It isn't.

konstantinvoncarstein

Damn you for giving us yet another cliffhanger! 😊

TeK

How would you know?

Javvies

Because ErraticErrata is the author?

Andrew Mitchell

TeK knows that.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

How would you know? 😊

Vega

He could've typo's but the typo was so epic he rolled with it

Sparsebeard

That whole Indrani POV way glorious to be fair though.

Lord GM

Indrani is indeed glorious. We already knew for a book or two that she is far more intelligent and educated than she lets on. Now we see that she also has the social intelligence to lead others by the nose.

I just feel pity for Roland. He just can't win against Indrani using fair means. The other two are too deep in her pocket already.

Liliet

Roland is close enough to Indrani's level to know exactly what she's doing ♥ best friends all of these 4 im tellin' ya

Aston Whiteman

Judgement or Reptenance...

There's one more angel in heaven...there's one more star in the sky.. Kairos we'll never forget you.

Let telling truth never die.

Sun Dog

And eternal friendship!

'Ladi Williams

Especially eternal friendship.

Barthumphries

It's tough but we're going to get by.

Quite Possibly A Cat

The ultimate betrayal would be to get an Angel to smite DK and Dread Empress, be redeemed and Ascend to Heaven on the back of that very same Angel. Then spend the rest of Creation throwing Wishes down from Heaven.

WuseMajor

"Then let us be wicked,
Let us be reddest ruin
Rent, broken, crooked
Black hearted and cruel

Then let us be doom,
To both friend and foe
Fly banner of gloom
We lowest of the low

Rise, rise all ye villains
You rogues and madmen
Proudly claim the stage,
Of this wondrous age

We are not kind or just Deserving of any victory
We are a thing of dust
Promised only misery

So smile, Tyrants,
And let us be wicked”

— Final monologue of “The Many Deaths of Traitorous”, a play on the reign of the Dread Emperor Traitorous

I found the source for the recent titles.

This is definitely the Tyrant’s Swan Song. And it will be glorious.

Next title is likely to just be Wicked.

Lord GM

Nice work finding that.

This just is final proof that Kairos is not plannig to survive this. As he outright told Cat with the game of Tower Building they had.

burguulkodar

Awesome find. Thanks! I was a bit puzzled by the recent titles, but couldn’t put my finger on it.

Might I just add that these titles synchronicity is one MORE marvelous touch from this wondrous series, it never ceases to amaze me.

Author, kudos to you. Again. You somehow really reflect some of the inner workings of my mnd sometimes. I love these little secret things you put inside the text, like little puzzles to be sorted out by the readers. This is just so me in my own short stories and poems! So few people get it though, but it is worth it anyways.

Andrew Mitchell

> So few people get it though

For sure: I wouldn’t have got 95% of EE’s hidden gems without this commenting community pointing them out to me.

You make me wonder what ELSE EE may have included that this community has missed...

caoimhinh

For a moment I thought Kairos had used Still Water on the League’s armies. Turned out this was about him preparing the ground for the Trial.

I'm surprised Cordelia and co actually agreed on doing it on the place Kairos asked, even when they know it's a trap. It would be funny if Kairos had used reverse psychology on them by asking the trial to be done somewhere and they were like "Oh, no. We are going to use it on our chosen ground, let's use Lyonceau." although Pilgrim was there Beholding Tyrant, so he should have noticed.

Now the question is: will Kairos die doing this?

I personally don't think so. His doping with that drink seems to me like he is filling his tank in preparation for an action that will drain him extremely.

If I were one to let my imagination and speculation roam free, I would think Kairos is actually planning to strike a bargain with a Choir after creating the huge mess that the Trial of Judgement is bound to be.

Draylen

If Kairos does die here, Catherine is going to need to pull Wish out immediately. Otherwise, Neshama is going to have access to all of its wonderful uses with no drawbacks at all (like the fact each Wish is killing Kairos). If we thought Skein was bad... Wish could be so, so much worse.

And Neshama gets to walk away with something else, here, too. Lyonceau is ripe to summon an Angel, obviously a Seraph here. So not only will everyone present be afflicted with JUSTICE, just like our long forgotten tool Will tried to do with Contrition, Neshama will be able to trap/seal/kill-and-take-over/absorb it. Because we all know if anyone is able to, it would be the Dead King.

Unless Heirophant can steal it first. Which... is Probably Very Bad, but not the worst option here? Either way, I think we're in trouble.

burguulkodar

I was wondering when, if ever, Masego would get his sorcery back.

This mess kinda makes me feel it might be the right time to do so. Although he might never recover it and just become a theorethical teacher in that Villain-Hero School.

Liliet

I don't think Kairos outright asked for Lyonceau. More likely, he checked around to find the town best suited for a trial by the criteria he knows the Procerans would employ, then fervently argued for holding the trial in Salia.

Javvies

...

The obvious answer has never before been the right answer when it comes to what Kairos is up to.

Ah, Indrani. Never change.

Also, pitting the Witch of the Woods and Masego into a magical debate in front of the Rogue Sorcerer? That's cruel. But funny.

Liliet

Remember when she got Masego to teach her curses by insisting Creation was flat?

Fayhem

Indrani is Best Troll. Fite me internet.

Liliet

You have my bow.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

And my axe.

erebus42

If the Tyrant is to die, then hopefully he dies as he lived; hamming it up and fucking over everyone available.

TeK

I think that Kairos needs his magical berserker pill because he lost a favor of the Below. It was stated outright that the only thing that is keeping him alive is said favor, and when his power dwindles, his illness encroaches. And the stated effect of the drink is "giving life to the limbs and vigour to blood". It is likely a way for him to power through the most sacred of acts, that can be considered a prayer towards Gods Below – a betrayal of them.

negagardens

So... here's a fun question:

What do you think the team are going to do with hierarch if his minder Kiaros bites it?

Because the obvious thing to do is off him for crimes against common sense and sanity, but then again, he is probably the mortals ONLY weapon vs Wandering Bard at present, and she is NOT

YOUR FRIEND.

I can't help but think it would be wise to keep the madman around somewhere.

... except, gods damn it, none of our heroes KNOW that Heirarch is effective at smiting WB. ... or perhaps his previous smiting was just happenstance, and nothing special- it just fell under the category of "Promised death" and hence forced her to leave.
... but I suspect is more than that.

ninegardens

Addendum:

She is PROBABLY not your friend.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The enemy of my enemy is my enemy's enemy.

Yeah

I think hierach will fuck up the angel. Because if the angel judges or influences the judgement without the will of the people hierach will bend reality.

Oshi

What makes you think Hierarch will survive the Tyrants play?

ethericsentinel

The fact that the League falling apart on the Hierarch's death would be anticlimactic, for one.

This is Kairos's swan song, but it's Anaxares's grand stage. There's plenty more story there to be told if EE cares to tell it.

Andrew Mitchell

I laughed out loud at

Roland is a delight.

Liliet

I love how there was a meta level slapfight there between the two of them that Masego and Antigone seem to both have missed entirely.

konstantinvoncarstein

What happened on a meta level?

Liliet

On a meta level, Indrani was gleefully throwing gasoline into the fire while Roland was frantically looking for a fire extinguisher. When he did succeed at getting them to leave off for a moment, she restarted the conflict anew. And he knows exactly what she did, so when in the end she's like "anyway shame on you for not listening to poor Roland" he KNOWS EXACTLY WHAT SHE DID, while both Masego and Antigone seem to miss what's going on.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes! ♥ that aspect.

Lord GM

For the first couple of books, Cat has played DnD, Black played Chess using Named as chesspieces, Malicia played Diplomacy against Procer where every move is a game of Chess. Bard and DK try to steer the way the entire Chess tournament goes by meddling on all levels (Bard prefers to micromanage on the DnD-level while DK prefers Chess and Diplomacy.) The Great Game the Gods play is probably even one level more meta than that.

Now Kairos is going to get to the Gods and make them pay for the injustice he had to suffer being born into a weak body to a cruel father.

And so he is going to deny the Gods their favorite game. And the way to do that is to cause a logic breakdown in the operating system all the games are running on by proving that the Choir of Judgement is unjust.

Lord GM

* Bard and DK try to steer the way the entire Diplomacy tournament...

burguulkodar

ha, would be fun if it happened. Reminds me of the Cradle series (still ongoing):

404 error!

Rebooting 2812 iteration world...

shimizubad

Knowing DND GM's and playing, I know that's the best game to screw the gods even when not metagaming.

Lord GM

By “playing D&D” I mean “looking at life as a serious of combat encounters and trying to solve all problems by punching them in the face until they stop being a problem”, as opposed to “thinking long-term and considering the consequences outside the initiative order”. It took First Liesse (and probably Second Liesse as well) for Cat to learn that lesson. That is why she chose the staff over the sword.

It is easy to mess with gods in D&D, because typically your games are run by a mortal GM and have the limitations that come with it. It always bugged me when I hear a player brag how their character pulled a fast one on Asmodeus, the god who invented scheming!

In the Guideverse, the Gods are much harder to mess with because they are played by actual Gods. We know that they know how to cover their bases so that no lucky villain accidentally stumbles over a method to actually mess with them. And if they do, the Gods throw Providence and Bard at them before they can use it.

So my laudations to EE for coming up with this complex, yet consistent and absolutely compelling world design,

TAP_M113

I am suspecting that the Tyrant is going to win BIG this time... and the results are going to look like Irritant, Traitorus and Triumphant decided to settle down and raise child together.

Reasons? Kairos seems the sole representative of the classical “Age of Wonders, flying fortress” brand of Villainy that Below historically seemed so fond of. Since our dear protagonists and even Malicia are pretty much against the classic methods favored by Below, and are even spreading infectious memes against the tight leash Above keeps on their favored named, the hard-liners amongst the Gods must be pushing HARD for some backlash against the over-ambitious mortals.

And whatever is happening right now, the near-unprecedented and frankly concerning providence downpour raining on the woe standing besides the heroes tells us that Below is going to strike a BIG blow.

Besides, I believe that, since the very beginning, Kairos has CONSCIOUSLY grown and tailored his name, aspects and role for what is to come next chapters. Consider this: Tyrant has inherited one of the mightiest names Below keeps on its arsenal, and even brandishes the stolen concept of “Hierarchy” – one of the greatest meta-level victories Below has ever got over Above, stealing away what once was one of its core concepts. Yet, with all the power he has, he seldom has used any other aspect besides “Wish”; as a social-based villain it is VERY concerning he has survived, yet alone achieved most of his goals without more than the occasional visible use of more than one aspect.

This is even worse when you consider that Kairos has got two striking and even more disturbing features in his arsenal. The first is that, simply put, he is a Meta-level Munchkin exploiting "superpower disability", "lacks magic abilities", "lacks martial abilities" "comic relief", "affably evil", "Flying fortress" and "Lesser Evil" tropes to an extent that SHOULD have got him killed already. He is a social villain character which has specced a couple of dual-use nuke aspects as a concession to his survivability, and "Wish" as his single "social" aspect. He is burning the candle from both ends, as much as he can conceive, because he has been stockpiling "narrative karma" for this moment. And now he is chasing the "near-death" advantage with his poison ingestion... So I expect him to win this round, and introduce the "mortals against the gods" angle in the story anew.

The second is that he KNOWS a lot of things he shouldn't. His three known aspects, "Wish", "Rule", and "Rend" should not give him so much information as he wields. There are three answers for that. Either he is Bard's favored and trusted tool in creation, has the old Oracle/God of Helike riding shotgun in his left eye, or he is THAT smart as to get ALL of his information by sheer social manipulation skills (including the Hierarchy "Receive" aspect visions). And as a social villain character, he has got access to ALL of the major world players, named or not, that HE has tricked into going to a judgement presided by the Hierarchy, which is the named cultural linchpin binding the League together. A naval power which just shattered its sole contender, the Ashur thalassocracy.

My suspicion is that, as long as he does not escalate enough to leave the "lesser Evil" position and upstage DK and Malicia as the main threat all the free races must overcome, he is going to succeed. He will trap everyone before the Hierarchy, and will auction who gets to survive the gaint "Rube-Goldberg Judgement deathtrap" Hierarchy is presiding. Those who don't give Kairos the right terms and the best bids get judged and beheaded by the Hierarchy.

And you know what is funny? He can judge EVERYONE and EVERYTHING. Hierarchy can judge ABOVE (Hanno), BELOW (Catherine), MORTAL DESPOTS (Cordelia/Malicia/Vivienne) and UNLIVING DESPOTS (Death King).

And you know what they say... the number THREE is very story-relevant, and has let VERY deep grooves on Creation. And you can permute the above elements in many ways to fit the bill...

ninegardens

Oh yeah, this is Kairos Victory incoming.

He's damn well earned it (both in universe, and in narrative terms OUTSIDE the in universe scoring system).

And because his final plan is unlikely to be aimed directly at the protagonist, its unlikely that anyone's plot armour is going to get in the way.

He's just going to... wreck...
Something.

I don't think he's going to hold everyone present hostage as it sounds like you're suggesting. I suspect he has one or two targets that he is just going to DESTROY.

... Amadeus might actually be one of them, come to think of it. He does hate that guy. But probably not as much as he hates fate, so who he's out to sunder is pretty much up in the air.

burguulkodar

His "Wish" aspect reminds me a lot of the Neverending Story artifact, the "Aurn".

It also let you make wishes, but with each wish you would lose a memory of your self in the "real world", until you would become completely woven into the fantasy world and thus without any more wishes to make.

Lord GM

You make a very good point how Tyrant was able to survive that long by playing the tropes.

But like ninegardens I think that his plan is not solely to take mortal rulers hostage and extort worldly concessions. He is planning to die and doesn't care if Helike, the League of Free Cities or all of Calernia crumble to dust. There is nothing they could give him.

The open question remains: What does he really want?

What could he want?

As I said, he doesn't care much about worldly matters like wealth or politic relations. He is burning those like there is no tomorrow (which probably really isn't, at least for him). He doesn't care for his own people (or people in general) too much either.

It might be possible that he is out for glory, that he wants to go down in history as the greatest Villain who bested famous Dread Emperors and maybe even Triumphant herself. But even if he is all about enjoying the spectacle of a villanous live, this seems pretty shallow and I would be disappointed if that truly was his only motive.

So I think, glory is merely a welcome side effect of his true goal: Ruining the Great Game of the Gods the best he can. And to do that he would have to break either the playing board (Calernia / Creation), or the means by which the Gods interact with it: Bard, the Choirs, Providence and/or Names, if he doesn't aim for outright Deicide (with capital D).

Cat is already aiming to limit the influence of the Gods' Game by restricting Names through the Acords. And we know the Gods don't like that. (I don't believe Bard when she says they don't care about that paper.) But such a softhanded and reasonable approach is not Kairos' style. It has to be a show for him.

Andrew Mitchell

> Ruining the Great Game of the Gods the best he can. And to do that he would have to break either the playing board (Calernia / Creation), or the means by which the Gods interact with it: Bard, the Choirs, Providence and/or Names, if he doesn't aim for outright Deicide (with capital D).

I think you're on the right track here. There's some foreshadowing from Villainous Interlude Thunder when Karios is talking to Anaxares. Karios says he can see the Bard's one burning desire and it's glorious. And remember some people believe that the Bard wants to end the Gods influence over people.

Mental Mouse

"... and when the hour is mine, I seek the story that will free Creation".

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you, thank you, that's a fascinating contribution. Either he is Bard's favored and trusted tool in creation, has the old Oracle/God of Helike riding shotgun in his left eye, or he is THAT smart as to get ALL of his information by sheer social manipulation skills (including the Hierarch "Receive" aspect visions).

Bard's favored tool? Yes, extremely plausible given, back in Villainous Interlude Thunder, Karios told Anexares (sp?) that he can see Bards 'only one burning desire' and 'it is glorious'. Whatever Bard's aim is, Karios is probably working towards it as well.

Oracle riding shotgun in his left eye? Very plausible IMO and not something I have thought of before. We know some of the advantages Cat has received due to her close involvement with the Sisters. Karios benefiting from a similar relationship could explain a lot.

THAT smart via social manipulation and Hierarch? Possible and certainly part of Karios' package but I don't think that would give him enough of a knowledge boost.

Andrew Mitchell

Damn. F'd up my HTML tags. 😞

Walter

"No peace can there be, between lash and orc."

Are we sure Hakram is, like, okay? Did he maybe have a stroke and forget about the Gallowborn, the Mantle of Woe, or the attempt to enslave the entire Drow nation? If the Dead King isn't 'lash' then no one is, did Hakram miss the explicit try at forging a peace between him and orc?

The orcs as a people have been the gleeful instruments of Callow's subjugation for like twenty years, they worship the man who took their enemies freedom away. They are the oppressor's whip hand. Governor Miezies stayed in power because the Legions killed everyone who opposed him.

But their self image is that they are somehow opposed to slavery? Hackram looks down on a city of people who are basically just amateur hour praesi cosplayers? It would be pitiable if the body count from their delusion wasn't so incredibly high.

The only other Named orc we know of was Captain, whose entire schtick was that she enslaved a monster. The orcs are just fine with slavery.

devildragon777

...Captain wasn't an orc, though?

And Hakram isn't fond of the Praesi subjugation either? A lot of the reason Amadeus was/is so well-liked among orcs is orecisely because he managed a half-fix that gave them actual authority and standing in Praesi society, even if it was mostly just contained within the Legions. Or do you think that prior to the Black Knight an orc could have even had a shot at becoming a general?

Hakram wasn't there for the Drow, and the finale of that was an attempt to bring them back to relevancy and give them their own nation and bringing them out of a cultural deadspin...something that has parallels with what Hakram wants to do for the Tribes. Akua mostly doesn't have a leash anymore, and the Gallowborn are gone as an entity, pretty much.

Morgenstern

Eh. Sorry. Post wasn't up when I was still typing mine. ^^°
Good point about the parallel of what Cat is now actually trying to do with/for the Drow and what Hakram wants for the Orcs.

Sidenote: The Gallowborne were not a people enslaved. They were sentenced to death for the worst crimes Callow acknowledges as such, if I remember correctly, and given the choice to suffer their "just" sentence (hanging) – or try to redeem themselves by fighting for Callow. Not quite the same as enslaving a whole people, is it? At least to me it feels a bit like going in the direction of comparing apples to eggs.

"No peace can there be, between lash and orc." – That's from something far larger that came up in one of the Interlude-chapters of Hakram, explained via the history of the orcs in much detail there; I just can't remember which one. =/
It certainly might be worth to look at that again, for a definition of that phrase as understood by the Orcs and to whom they apply it in which sense.

Morgenstern

Wait... What? Since when is(/was) Captain an orc?
Far as I remember, Captain did not enslave a monster... she WAS the monster... werewolf-like. Also, she was just a very big human wielding a very big weapon.

Are you entirely sure that Hakram is against the lash in general – and not simply in the closer context of "the orcs shall never be enslaved again" (and maybe the Magisters somewhen subjugated orcs)?

Conquerors are often quite fine with conquering others... they just don't like to feel the leash themselves; wounded pride and all that, I guess... He joined a Warlord in the person of Cat... who are meant to conquer (and be personally free; no mention of letting everyone else go free).

As an aside, did Hakram ever learn Cat basically tried to enslave the Drow? He wasn't there at all during that arc; the only ones with her were Indrani and Akua the Shade. And Cat came back as high priestess, not enslaver, but ... ally... shall we say; all turned out more or less well with the Drow, she is now more or less respecting their right to form/develop their culture by themselves, just trying to influence them towards not killing everybody and each other...

Morgenstern

Also, Cat initially went to the Drow to look for allies, not to enslave them. The whole enslaving method only came up when she encountered a totally different state to everything down there than imagined and it was kind of a effed-up-from-the-start i-don't-have-any-other-ideas spontaneous notion, potentially going along with some leftover Winter possession, and even then coming along with/via the method of "who wants to be my new court and get new powers?", a messed-up attempt to adjust to the whole death-cycle-Night-harvesting-everyone-killing-each-other down there and how the Drow ... made "allies". (And, yes, a rather mistaken understanding of "omg, what is going on here, these people need to be "saved" from their own madness" ... and most of all the HOW to achieve that.)

Morgenstern

Don't get me wrong. It was certainly wrong all over to go at it that way Cat turned to down there (and she realized it herself, if rather belatedly, but at least she did). Point is, the whole arc was (also) about realizing how NOT to.

Hakram's chapter containing the quote reminisced here, bringing up the history of the Orcs and his own wished for them, ALSO was about OVERCOMING the shortcomings of the past. Not only about their own subjugation, but also the work they did for the Empire, what they were/are still used at, despite the reforms bettering their place in the scheme of things over there, and some own thoughts about what was wrong with the Orcs tribes before their fall as well. But no, it's certainly not perfect and caring-for-everyone; it was centered about caring about the ORCS. Again, patriotism. Just as with Cat for Callowans. Caring for others/the continent comes after that / is informed by that. They're also Villains for a reason and not in any way perfect. Yes, it IS probably a mite hypocritical. They're far from perfect in their attempts to make things better. The whole Guide is about such questions and mistakes (among other things), isn't it?

I guess I'm just really surprised the question if Hakram is all okay in the head (or the Orcs in general) is only coming up now, when the whole thing with the orcs vs. lash is dozens of chapters past already. Including the contrasting examples used here of things he might have taken offence to, depending on the definition of how exactly he despises slavers / enslavement, in what context etc. *headscratch

Lord GM

I'm sorry but half your arguments are not valid.

The DK is a great evil and nobody felt comfortable when the Woe collectively reached the conclusion that they are simply out of options. The only "real" slaves Nashema keeps are the undead Named IMO. His mortal subjects actually live a good life and worship him as their beloved god (or so we are told). And the mindless undead don't have a will that could be enslaved.

Conquering a land and enslaving its people are two different things. Callowans kept most of their freedom even under Praesi rule. Never did Black attempt to take away basic human rights. (The right to bear weapons is NOT a basic human right!)

That Praesi governors abused their power is true. But even they couldn't just pick someone from the streets, strip away their dignity and dictate every move they make from then on. Basically all they did was raising taxes into unsustainable heights. But these governors acted explicitly against the wishes of the Tower. They also couldn't use the Legions to enforce their laws but had to use their own troops. Actually the Legion and especially the orcs enjoyed it when they could show the governor's guards who the boss is. Which ironically endeared them to the locals.

Blaming the Legions for maintaining order and suppress violent rebellions is like accusing the police for keeping law and order.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"Blaming the Legions for maintaining order and suppress violent rebellions is like accusing the police for keeping law and order."

I was with you until you said that. I still agree that Callow's people were not reduced to chattel (modern definitions of slavery are more inclusive and would encompass basically the lion's share of any population under feudalism, but chattel slavery is the extreme form we're discussing here), but all cops are collectively bastards even if individual cops aren't, I say. There are dire systemic issues inherent to law enforcement as we know it, correction of which would eliminate their comparability to the Legions.

hakureireimu

When your rant ends with such obvious falsehoods it's just hard to take it seriously at all.

Mental Mouse

>"It is not merely unusual work," Masego said, sounding troubled. "It, in part mine. Akua Sahelian's also, and a myriad others, but some of those patterns were first laid down by my hand."

>“There are other influences in there,” the Witch of the Wilds said. “Callowan wards, Aenian cants and that odd Jaquinite escapement.”

>“No sorcerer could make such a thing,” the Hierophant said. “No living one, anyway.”

Hmm. IIRC, the Rogue Sorcerer himself doesn't seem to actually be a sorcerer, rather running on his Name (like Heiropant, for that matter). It could be the Dead King, but I wouldn't be surprised if Kairos found yet another option.

TAP_M113

Taking into account that the Wandering Bard confessed that, any time she was given freedom to act on her own, she sought “the story that would free Creation”, do you think that the enchantment has been woven by her?

Because from Death King and her own revelations, it has been heavily implied that she is working against the God interests. From all magicians that have been introduced so far, only Death King and Bard would have the longevity and experience to do this kind of work. The fact that Masego and Akua wards are present points to Neshamah, but Bard was also very involved in the doom of Liesse, so it could be her. Malicia could also have had the necessary exposure, but she doesn't seem so much of the sorcerer type, excepting her admittedly impressive experience with body-jacking spells.

At last, having the Bard heavily invested in this operation would FINALLY explain how Tyrant can know so much secrets he shouldn't ever had the chance to learn; Bard would have been steadily feeding him secrets, while Tyrant's job was to gather all relevant world players at the same place so that Hierarch judgement has a lot of witnesses and the precedent of judging Choirs or Gods makes an indeledible, smoldering grove on the Narrative. If the Deicide of Gods with capital G succeeds in front of the representatives of all nations of Calernia (and maybe with their aproval), it will enter the folklore of all those nations as a self-evident truth. It is a story that would free creation, or rather, a sufficiently large narrative gun – Nobody can escape the rule of Law. Should it be broken, its retribution will strike down even the Gods.

This angle also has two major fuel sources to make it suceed. First, the free Leagues star is waning. With the Above-fearing Thalassocracy cast down, the League beat its sole competitor and is on the verge of becoming a superpower. The League and Thalassocracy are similar to the ancient Greeks, where their cultural identity is defined by the primacy of law and the concept of political Utopia. The Hierarch is THE symbol of the League as a people, its cultural named bedrock. If the Hierarch judges a Choir, or even a God successfully, this will be the long-overdue catalyst that the League had been narratively "owed" for centuries, and will represent their ascension as a people, with the same weight as Triumphant had for Praes. Second, at least half to two thirds of the current named of Calernia are currently questioning the rule of the Gods, with Above being perceived as particularly meddlesome, unfairly abusing of their meta-narrative advantage, as exemplified by the OP providence mechanics, and due their comeuppance. So I get the feeling that Kairos judgement is going to succeed, and I get the feeling that at least half of the audience is going to find that the results align with their personal ethics (particulalrly Catherine). Which half of the audience its is, and who Kairos gets to kill/shaft in the process, is going to be decided on a whim. This is the Tyrant's, and Irritant/Traitorous brand of narrative kung-fu: Since complex plans are bound to fail, gather all your ennemies/allies in the same place, let their cumulated stories conflict and sabotage them into failure, and then attack whoever makes a narrative mistep before they can recover. In short: If you are a Villain with a shotgun surrounded by all your foes in a barrel of finite doom, you won't miss your shots, no matter where you aim. And you WILL have your narratively-enforced killstreak...

Mental Mouse

One quibble: "least half to two thirds of the current named of Calernia are currently questioning the rule of the Gods..."

Not even close – it's just several of the most powerful ones, and that's just among the ones on-screen.

TAP_M113

In a lighter tone: Do you ship Kairos and Catherine? Because, on a meta-narrative level, I would. They get along great, and no matter what you say, I get the feeling that Catherine is the only person in the world that Kairos genuinely likes and respects, let alone fee that can understand his brand of wacky, pyromaniac humor and rage against the heavens. Conversely, Catherine has cut Tyrant a lot of slack, humors all his antics, and cannot avoid but respect and like Kairos panache and brand of trolling. Should they have met at the War College, they would have been thick as thieves. Robber-grade at the very least, maybe Hakram-Grade. Kairos would have been Catherine's (and everyone) favourite treacherous lieutenant, I bet.

Give Kairos 3-5 years more of life, and I could see Kairos creating an intricate plot to doom the world that only Catherine and friends can thwart. After a lot of adventures, comedy and devious scheming across the free cities, Catherine narrowly escapes Tyrant's latest "Rube Goldberg" deathtrap, just to find Kairos Theodosian waiting at the exit with a political marriage treaty that would conveniently solve all of Catherine's and Callow problems, and a marriage ring packed hidden within a bundle of wakeleaf. Of course, Kairos would be mounted on Hakram, his faithful Liessen charger (yes, hakram the goat) 😊

Jokes aside, both Kairos and Catherine have cut each other very preferential deals and treated each other with a surprising amount of lenience. When Kairos Theodosian goes so easy on you, you bet there is a reason....

The only people I would "ship" so much are mighty Jindrich and Robber. Jokes aside, after everything is said and done, either Jindrich gets adopted into the "Lesser, lesser Footrest" tribe Robber and Pickler create, or they get adopted in his sigil. I have a soft spot those two, and we definitely need more Robber time. Since Nauk died and the rat company vets have slowly drifted apart under the pressure of professional life, we need more wacky antics...and nobody delivers them as well as Robber and the other goblin do.

Well, Kairos does, but I think he is a honorary Goblin Matron, anyway. I wonder what would happen if he gets the chance to make a recruitment drive in the Green Eyries... I bet Goblins would love this guy, and Kairos would see them as all he wishes his gargoyles could be. It is a match made in Hell and showered in goblinfire, that would make a lot of folks happy and propel property damage to unprecedented heights. Why hasn't it happened yet?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nitpick: The Tribes' capital is the Grey Eyries, not green.

Big I

I really hope the Hierarch wipes out the Choir of Judgement. I've been looking forward to that.

It just struck me that the White Knight and the Hierarch are suited to be each other's nemesis. One believes in Divine Right, the other in the Will of the People.

heymady

I felt the fear run through my shoulders reading it was Kyros drinking the brew.

aran

I can't believe Hakram got through that with a straight face

Mental Mouse

Louis didn't. 😊And he has no problem calling BS on it.

Re-read observation & question: I'm kind of surprised that Witch Of The Woods did not mention fighting Wekesa when she was wrangling with Masego during the ride to Lyonceau. As Masego spent time with his fathers in Thalassina after the Battle of Red Flower Vales, presumably he's aware of the wizards' duel that had taken place. Would WOTW be aware that Hierophant is Warlock's son? And how would Masego feel about it?

Interlude: Wicked

"Inexorable is the end of the journey; choose wisely how you spend your steps."

– Ashuran saying

"Look, I'm not saying half a hell won't come howling out if you disappear instead of attending like a good Choir boy," Queen Catherine said. "But this whole serene thing you've got going on? That's the look on the face of someone about to have it slapped right off."

Hanno was not certain what was more surreally amusing: that the most prominent villain of their age was expressing sincere worry for his well-being, in her own rough way, or that the First Prince of Procer was seemingly unable to decide what part of this she found the most appalling. The three of them were riding ahead of the rest of the column and at brisk a pace, though Lyonceau would not be in sight for some time.

"I have fought the Tyrant before, Your Majesty," the White Knight replied. "I am not unaware of the danger he represents."

"You fought Kairos when he was sowing the seeds of a hundred enmities," the Black Queen flatly replied. "Now he's reaping his harvest, Hanno. He's going to burn every favour and story he's got up his sleeves so he can snap Judgement over his knee."

"Damned or not, he remains a single man," Cordelia Hasenbach carefully said. "Surely you do not mean Kairos Theodosian could face a single angel alone, much less an entire Choir."

"I've been in brawls with two Choirs, Your Highness," Queen Catherine reminded the other woman. "It can be done, and without losing a finger if you're quick and careful enough."

From the look on the First Prince's face, Hanno mused, she had finally happened upon the part she could find the most appalling. The White Knight was less offended, for though the touch of Contrition always served a purpose it was not often gentle in pursuing it. As for Endurance... Hanno cleared his throat.

"Fuck off, you bottom feeders. This one's been claimed fair and square," he quoted, drily amused.

Some of the last words the Stalwart Paladin had ever heard. That life had perhaps been the most useful to call on, when studying the Black Queen. The Lone Swordsman had been the rival of her youth, and her struggles there too far removed from the woman she'd become, and none of those who'd died at the Battle of the Camps had seen much of her aside from the terrifying foe that'd been the Sovereign of Moonless Nights. The Stalwart Paladin, though, had walked among the people of the Callowan city of Dormer and then spoken with the Black Queen for some time. It had been fascinating, hearing through him the offer she'd extended. Go home, Catherine Foundling had offered, looking so very exhausted. She'd offered peaceful means, and bared steel only when pushed.

It was not his place to judge, yet it had troubled Hanno that he could not easily decide what his answer would have been, had he truly stood in the other hero's boots.

"Shit," Queen Catherine said, cheeks darkening. "Went fishing for that, did you? In my defence, they tried to snatch the man after I'd already put him down hard. It was unsporting, is what I mean."

"You cursed at angels," Cordelia Hasenbach slowly grasped. "You called them bottom-feeders?"

"It wasn't about the bird wing thing," the Queen of Callow assured the other royalty. "I can't stand puns. It was about the kill-snatching."

"Perhaps," the First Prince said, voice choked, "we might return to the matter at hand."

"As I was saying, Your Majesty," the White Knight calmly continued, "your worry is appreciated yet I speak not in arrogance. I understand what it is that the Tyrant of Helike seeks to achieve through this purported trial."

"He's going for Judgement," the Black Queen agreed. "And any other day I'd say the Seraphim lose a feather before they eat him, but today? We get a curse on the way out, White Knight, and it sticks. Even when it has no right to."

For once, the memories that set his mind astray were not another's. Gods of my ancestors, grant me due, his mother has once snarled. And as the blood-soaked tile through which she had honoured Below for many years shattered, the heavy weight of a curse had filled the air. All it had taken for it to seize men by the throat was for a knife to kiss a throat, and Hanno of Arwad to become entirely an orphan. The White Knight knew a thing or two of curses spoken with one's last breath.

"I speak not in ignorance either, Your Majesty," he softly said. "I understand that Kairos Theodosian is perhaps the closest thing to a high priest of Below that draws breath on Calernia, and his passing will not be a gentle thing. Yet it is your own past, that drags your eye away from the truth of this."

She considered him with those clever, serious eyes that ever belied the casual manner of speaking she wielded as club and scalpel both. Honestly examining herself for where she might have made a mistake, a misstep. A refreshing thing, this. The willingness to entertain she might have erred.

"You think it doesn't matter what he comes at you with," she slowly said. "All he's accomplishing is giving the Seraphim a good, clear shot at him."

Judgement had already been passed on Kairos Theodosian, on a floating tower in sight of the walls of Delos. That verdict had not waned or weakened for the passing of months, and still resounded like a whisper in the back of Hanno's mind. The Tyrant of Helike had ran across half the continent hiding in the shadow of great hosts and great needs, yet now he was delivering himself to the Tribunal of his own free will. There was no escaping that judgement, once it had been passed.

"Even as Queen of Winter, you did not wield your full might," Hanno said. "You understood, then and now, that strength without restraint in a villain is a call to the grave. Yet I am not a villain, Catherine Foundling."

He met her gaze, serenity untroubled.

"I am the Sword of Judgement," the White Knight said. "If Evil seeks to end me, I will break it. Should the Enemy seek to struggle against the Tribunal instead, then what heeds not justice will be put down with overwhelming might."

"Using strength on Kairos Theodosian is like trying to strangle a stone," the Black Queen warned.

"Yes," the White Knight agreed. "And crow he might, that he will not lack for air. Yet it will not matter when the grip shatters rock."

He watched her watching him, saw the eyebrows narrow and the thoughts adjust. She had understood, without him speaking a word of it, that there was more to his certainty than she knew. From he could almost see her passing through a list of possible allies, now as nimble in her thinking as William of Greensbury had found her to be on her feet. Her eyes almost flicked behind them, to look where the other guests were riding, and Hanno nodded in assent. Yes, she'd understood correctly. It would be not one but two Choirs the Tyrant of Helike would face, should he bare his fang against the Tribunal. The Black Queen clicked her tongue against the roof her mouth.

"I've given you warning," she finally said. "I have nothing more to say on the matter."

Her gaze moved to the First Prince, whose face had remained inscrutable for some time as she followed the conversation closely.

"Your Highness, I extend offer from Sve Noc to weave... containment over Lyonceau, in case the Tyrant's last surprise is meant to spread."

Cordelia Hasenbach smiled pleasantly.

"A kind offer," the Warden of the West – though only the shadow of what that might have been, to his sorrow – replied. "Yet I wonder at the price of it."

The Black Queen grinned.

"No cost," she said. "Call it a gesture of goodwill between allies against Keter."

The First Prince seemed even less pleased, which took Hanno some time to grasp. Ah, it had been horse-trading. Cordelia Hasenbach would have preferred this to be a transaction, bought and paid for. The Black Queen offered instead a favour, to be repaid in kind one day. It was a bargain that demanded little of Procer yet would benefit the drow in the currency they would need the most after the Tenth Crusade came to an end. The blue-eyed princess turned to him, and already he could hear the question on the tip of her tongue: how likely would it be that such protection would be needed? Yet she never spoke the words and looked faintly ashamed for a flickering moment.

"Procer will be grateful for the aid, First Under the Night," the First Prince of Procer said.

Hanno's esteem for the woman, which had already been set high by the laurels branded onto her palm, rose a notch. She'd preferred owing a favour than to gamble with lives in her charge, even on the finest of odds. The Black Queen nodded in acknowledgement, then flicked him a glance.

"Mind you, they're not coming any closer even if things go south on your angels," Catherine Foundling said. "I'm not risking their feathers on the Tyrant of Helike's chosen grounds."

"The grounds were our choice, Queen Catherine, not his," the First Prince reminded her.

"That doesn't mean they're not his chosen grounds," the Black Queen grimly replied.

Both she and the White Knight moved in unison when there was a tremble of sorcery ahead, though when the silhouettes revealed became clearer the tension went out. Antigone could hardly be taken for anyone else, riding Lykaia's broad back as she was, and Roland's eternal leather longcoat was almost as familiar a sight. The other two he recognized only by description. The tall woman in mail with a long green coat and a half-hidden face must be the Archer, a guess that the massive longbow on her back seemed to support. The blind man with dark skin and long trinket-woven braids must be the Hierophant, a warlock who when enthralled by the Dead King had very nearly killed every single living thing in Iserre. Hanno cocked his head quizzically at Antigone, who replied in the same Gigantes stance-speak.

Respect, dislike, danger. The dislike had implication of arrogance, not offence, which was interesting. So was the danger, for the corresponding tilt spoke not of 'past danger' or 'potential danger'. Antigone's opinion was that the Hierophant, even stripped of his sorcery as he currently was, might be able to kill either of them in a fight. That spoke to the respect, for the Gigantes prized not a single virtue should it be accompanied by weakness.

"You both seem untroubled by those approaching," the First Prince of Procer mildly said.

Unlike them, her eyes could only discern details so far.

"Archer, the Rogue Sorcerer and Hierophant," the Black Queen said. "And if I'm not mistaken?"

"The Witch of the Woods," Hanno agreed. "I expect they will have word of Lyonceau for us."

Simply because the Tyrant of Helike had kept his cards hidden until the last moment did not mean they would enter the trap blind. The White Knight had learned much from his own defeats, from studying the dooms and triumphs of his heroic predecessors. And this particular method, which he had once discussed with the Peregrine, often served: sending a companion out with only vague mandate when the enemy was afoot. It was creating an opportunity for providence to smile upon them, for as all other things providence must be helped along lest it fail. That Roland had been chosen as an instrument along with Antigone was no great surprise, and neither was the Archer's presence. Like her storied teacher the Lady of the Lake, she was likely cast in Roles either heroic or villainous by circumstance.

Her allegiance to the Black Queen put a hand on the scales towards Below, it was true, but then Catherine Foundling had often sailed dark ships to pale shores – terrible shores, it was true, but pale nonetheless. The Hierophant's presence was more surprising, and ill-omen. For providence to have offered a stirrup to his foot, his particular knowledge must have been needed. The four approached, and though the First Prince's armed escort neared they were not so uncouth as to take defensive positions. Cordelia Hasenbach's horse was shaken but not put aflight by the massive shape of Lykaia, which he noted approvingly. It was a well-trained beast.

"I don't suppose you just happened onto Lyonceau by accident," the Black Queen tried.

"Warded up to the Heavens," the Archer said. "Literally, even!"

The Hierophant stirred.

"Inaccurate," he said, voice mildly irritated. "For the third time-"

"Greetings, Your Majesty, Your Highness," the Rogue Sorcerer said, bowing. "What my companions are attempting to convey is that the town is heavily warded with an eye as to the angelic."

Accurate, Antigone silently told him. Secrets, Dead King.

"Are any of the wards harmful in nature?" the White Knight asked.

"No," the Hierophant said. "Not in the slightest. They command and retain attention, and so in function have similarities with the initial part of a ritual Breach-"

"As in devil summoning," the Black Queen flatly interrupted.

"The first segment of such a ritual, yes," the Hierophant peevishly replied. "As I was saying, Catherine, if you had let me finish."

"Surely that must be harmful in some manner," the First Prince said, looking sickened.

"Not unless you want to argue that attracting angelic attention is harmful," Queen Catherine drily noted. "Which I'm guessing might be less than popular a stance with some of your subjects."

"Simply the act of warding makes such a meeting place suspect," the blonde princess insisted.

"Salia's warded," the Archer said.

"What Lady Archer means, Your Highness, is that making such an argument given the nature of the wards might be considered by some a breaking of faith," Roland delicately said.

Which was a peril that Hanno would not lightly risk, as it would expose all those that had broken faith with the Tyrant of Helike to the vengeance that would follow. In a stroke, the heads of all signatories Grand Alliance would be in the villain's reach. There was no understanding of this situation that was acceptable, for even if the White Knight was certain to die in such a trial his life would weigh less on the scales than that of Catherine Foundling and Cordelia Hasenbach: without those two, the war on Keter was lost. The cause would be weakened by his own death, but hardly irreparably.

"We must proceed," the White Knight said. "Though given the circumstances, I believe the presence of great mages among our number could not easily be made into a slight."

"I don't care if the Tyrant gets snippy about," the Black Queen snorted, "Hierophant is coming. Archer, I need you in Salia."

"You can't be serious," the Archer replied, tone hardening.

A swift exchange in Kharsum followed, neither of them apparently aware he'd used Recall to learn some of the tongue months ago. Queen Catherine was insisting that should they all die in Lyonceau then Vivienne Dartwick would need both the Archer and the Adjutant at her side to keep things from collapsing, while the Archer argued not untruly that if the Black Queen died the talks were dead anyway. The discussion ended when the Archer informed her queen that she'd stick around 'Zeze' to watch his back and stay out of trouble, if that was what it took, and Queen Catherine angrily conceded. Neither of them paid any attention to the Hierophant's protest he had no need of a bodyguard.

Antigone inclined her head in question, but he dismissed it. Best for all if she started with them, as far as Hanno was concerned, and Roland as well. He was not as powerful a spellcaster, but he was cunning and his knowledge broad in scope. And so they resumed the ride forward to Lyonceau, into the jaws of the beast waiting to gobble them up.

It was, for a hero, one of the most practical places to be.

—

It had made for a serviceable temple, if to admittedly asinine Gods and the occasional feckless Choir, but it made for a rather dignified courtroom.

Kairos Theodosian had seen to it, assigning his most trustworthy servants to the task. Sadly most of the gargoyles that could tell colours apart with their beady little stones eyes had been merrily massacred by Catherine when they'd had their little tiff at twilit Liesse, which had made for a charmingly eclectic selection of paints and cloths. Even as the latest of his esteemed guests passed the threshold of the wards encircling Lyonceau, the Tyrant of Helike leaned back against his throne and cast a critical eye on the stained glass before him, which was depicting the first elected First Prince being crowned by what appeared to be a flock of naked giggling cherubs. One of his trusted servants had painted over the face of Clothor Merovins a bright red beaked nose and touched up his hair with bright blue spikes, which one might venture to say was a fetchingly clashing addition, yet it was lacking a certain je ne sais quoi, as the Alamans said.

"Naked angels?" the Tyrant of Helike said. "'tis most obscene, my loyal minions. Possibly blasphemous as well, I'd have to inquire with a priest."

Inquisitive chittering was his answer, his last gaggle of gargoyles gathering to hear his regal proclamations.

"You shall have to clothe them," Kairos decided, touching his lip with his scepter. "In undergarments, naturally."

More chatter, increasingly inquisitive.

"The colour will be of your choice, I would not lightly infringe upon your artistic integrity," the king of Helike assured them. "Yet if I might venture a suggestion as to the appearance? Lacy."

The chittering turned rather enthusiastic, matching his mood perfectly. Even as he ordered his porters to move him away, his heart already warmed in anticipation of the fresh abomination those incompetent little mongrels would create in trying to paint something as delicate as lace. The House of Light was coming along nicely, in his opinion, and all it'd taken was knocking off the roof. And large swaths of the walls, and rearranging most the insides. Also desecrating the consecrated grounds, as the delightful outrage from Above at his presence thundering in his ears sadly hadn't been worth the constant migraines. Yet now the temple was a lovely piece of work, raised platforms with benches and seats surrounding what he liked to think of as an arena: the altar to Above turned into the defendant's stand, and the splendidly shoddy table and chair the Hierarch of the Free Cities had spent several days making with his own hands, as Anaxares despised the notion of using tyrannical Proceran tables and chairs instead.

Gods Below, Kairos had not regretted having the man elected even once.

The sole standing walls that remained were those encasing the tall panels of stained glass, casting colours lights on the ground that mixed with that which the afternoon sun carelessly shone through the gaping swaths. The Hierarch of the Free Cities was already seated on his rickety three-legged stool chair, methodically scraping any ink off the parchment that'd been used to send messages to him, avoiding the need of in fact using any such scroll not given unto him by the People – which was perhaps for the best, as to Kairos' understanding of Bellerophan law he would then have to report anyone having gifted him such parchment to the kanenas for having paid tribute to a Foreign Despot, namely the Hierarch himself. The laws of the Republic were as a splendid maze made entirely of trapdoors, to the Tyrant, most of which led to a pit of spikes but some instead to a mob of angry crocodiles. That there would be a dead body at the end of the journey was perhaps the only part of it not in doubt. Truly, the people of the Free Cities could all learn a lesson or two from the Republic.

They were significantly better than anyone else at spontaneous lapidation, for example.

"It's all the practice, I think," Kairos told his trusted attendants.

"It is fascinating," the Dead King said. "Even now, I cannot tell if you are mad or feigning."

The Tyrant's good eye found the skeleton-thing that claimed kingship of death and Keter, and to his continued distaste found nothing at all. Oh, the body was there. A shell, pretty enough if a little too pretentious for his tastes, but he couldn't see in it. Even if he leaned into the aspect, in that way that allowed him to glimpse past that first burning wish at the heart of everyone into that myriad of lesser ones, all that there was to be found in the Dead King was a darkness. If he saw the first body, the true one, Kairos believed his sight would not fail him so. It had not failed him with the Wandering Bard, after all. Yet Trismegistus was ever a cautious one, a creature of brokers and emissaries and intermediaries. All of them the same old horror, but as the name went it was intent on remaining hidden. How unsporting of it, really. How was he to break what the Dead King wanted most in the world, if he knew not what it was?

"How boring life would be, if there were only ever two choices to be had," Kairos lightly said. "Our guests have come, dear friend."

"Yes," the Dead King said. "I can feel the Hierophant. Soon, now."

"It is a shame the Empress could not attend," the Tyrant sighed.

The old thing laughed, for the both knew Kairos would have betrayed her as eagerly as he intended to betray Ol' Bones himself. Sadly, Malicia had decided that after wringing him dry of every use she had of him and cutting the grass under his feet among his beloved allies she no longer had a need to humour him. The Dead King himself was here because the old thing was under the impression the only one that could make him bleed was the Intercessor, and that these games in Salia were a passable amusement until he retired to his domain. What splendid arrogance, this, what sumptuous hubris! Truly, was the King of Death not among the greatest of their ilk?

"I shall have refreshments brought to you," Kairos smiled, for he was an impeccable host.

It should be interesting to see if the Dead King would in fact drink from a cup of human blood, even though he had no throat or stomach or any real need to. Still, with the guests so soon to arrive the Tyrant of Helike had his porters bring him to the highest point in the old temple, atop the platform in the back. A more discreet snap of the wrist had another cup of Valiant Passing brought to his hand, and he drank the brew fully though the taste was horrid. It was a necessity, sadly. Without it the fits came every half hour and he was blind in one eye, though the old recipe was only a temporary reprieve. Soon, Named or not there would be enough of the poison in his bones that no purging trick would see him through it unharmed. Ah, but the harm had been done long before the drink and there'd never been any purging of that. Tossing away the cup in a corner, Kairos allowed his loyal attendants to drape him in the formal regalia of the kings and queens of Helike: the cloths of purple and gold, the heavy bejewelled crown that Theodosius has adorned with the jewels of defeated royalty, the pearl-incrusted slippers.

He was ready before the first of his guests arrived, passing through the open and unhinged gates of the former temple. Catherine, bold as ever strolled in first. The Queen of Callow still bore one of the strongest wishes he had ever seen, pulsing with her heartbeat: peace, peace, peace. It was like watching a flower bloom anew with every beat. Even now it was all he could do not to laugh until his throat bled, for what an exquisite jest it was that one of Below's finest servants in the long history of Calernia was at heart one of Above's! At her side that boring little thing the White Knight tread, all desires his own faded while that horrid thing intertwined with the Seraphim – I wish to be just – tainted everything. Most of the others that followed behind were tedious to behold, Cordelia's implacable duty and ugh, the Blood was all honour and glory as always and oh, wasn't that Itima Ifriqui craving revenge? Ah, what a proper villain that one would have made with a little prodding.

Neither Rozala Malanza nor Vivienne Dartwick were attending, which was amusingly cautious of Catherine and Cordelia, though it seemed the Witch of the Wilds and the Hierophant had been dragged along. Reading the latter was always amusing for the splitting headache it gave him, the Hierophant's path to apotheosis being so deeply steeped in High Arcana that trying to understand the concept was like driving nails through his own forehead. The Witch was intriguing, for a hero, her wish for completion too complex and driven in notions he did not understand to properly grasp, but she was still a passing fancy compared to the Archer and that delightfully strange and nuanced horizon. The wonder of discovery, of the fresh and new, of doing things no one had done before. It was not all-consuming like Catherine's craving for a peace that would justify all the horrors or the White Knight's childish need to have his hand felt, but it was deeper in some ways.

It was not always the wish that commanded her, but it was so deeply ingrained abandoning it would kill her sure as dawn.

The Tyrant of Helike gestured for his porters to take flight, though until more of the flock joined in to even the sides his throne was slightly askew in the air and Theodosius' crown, always too large for his brow, went askew with it. His rise caught the eye of everyone in the room, even the Hierarch.

"Greetings, friends," Kairos Theodosian grinned, "and welcome. Now that all are in attendance, it seems we can at last begin the trial."

At last, he yearningly thought. At long last.

Aston Whiteman

Update. Good.

Barthumphries

Aston, that's all you have to say? No vote thread? No typo thread? Just the word Good?

Vote: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Beginning of the typo thread:

The three of them were riding ahead of the rest of the column and at brisk a pace

Move "brisk" from before "a" to after it.

jecherio

when they'd had their little tiff at twilit Liesse, at twilight liesse?

Brigsby

Actually this is correct, if more formal than usual. It might not be exactly what was meant to be typed, but this is correct English.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"Twilit" essentially means "twilighted." During twilight things are twilit; Liesse is continually so.

JJR

"Damned or not, he remains a single man,"

Too bad Black wasn't there to cuff him before he finished that particular sentence.

Zggt

He's not a villain, when he says some pithy one-liners about how justice will prevail it increases the odds of victory.

erebus42

Unless he happens to be in a Tragedy

erebus42

Honestly, he might as well have said, "what could possibly go wrong?" Or "there's nothing he could do to hurt us anymore then he has". That's the unfortunate thing about heroes, they haven't learned to not give fate straight lines like that.

erebus42

*than

Oaclo

So this is the first time we've had anything from Kairos' viewpoint, right? Quite interesting. Unfortunately I think we would need significantly more to get a solid idea of his sanity once and for all.

theothin

First time in the present. He's also had a bonus chapter from right before he became the Tyrant, but this is his first POV as the Tyrant.

Liliet

There's no such thing as a "solid idea" of "sanity". Sanity is a social construct anyway.

Andrew Mitchell

Do you think sanity is totally a social construct, or just partly? If the latter, can you put a % on it?

Liliet

Completely and totally. There is no sanity outside of comparing people to one another.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

This. I mean, it's right there in the etymology of the term: sanitation. There aren't truly unclean minds in the sense referred to, only minds with differing content.

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting, thank you. I thought that might be what you meant.

Liliet

To elaborate, the concept of 'sanity' comes from comparing people with each other, and outside of that comparison it simply does not describe anything.

(The same notably applies to the overall concept of health and ability/disability – if, say, everyone in a society is malnourished, malnourishment won't be seen as a medical condition; if people normally grew wings, those without them would be seen as disabled)

This is opposed to concepts such as hair color – if you only have one sapient being in the entire universe, their hair still has color, which can easily be defined in comparison to the color of their other body parts, not to mention other objects and creatures in the universe.

But to define the concept of sanity, you need at least two, for one to be saner than the other – and for cleaner definition you'll need three, for two to be the norm and one the deviation. If you only have one, whatever they are is what sanity is and that's all there is to it.

This is similar to more obvious social constructs, like in-group/out-group: if you don't have enough sentient beings existing to form a society in which they exist, they simply have no referent. 404 null not found.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep. Got it. ♥

ATRDCI

The extra chapter Usurpation shows his origin story from his PoV as well

Mirror Night

I mean Cordelia is the one who said that line...not Hanno.

Crash

Cordelia wouldn't have lasted a goddamn week with a Name. She has zero ability with stories it's so funny. I'm sure she could learn given time but she wouldn't have had that. The way that Procer vaguely dislikes Names in general means that she would have come into a name with little to no knowledge and a Bard whispering bullshit on her ears. The Augur really came through on that one, Hasenbach would have been Fucked.

Liliet

Eh. Named, she would still be in the same Role she is in right now. It's not like she'd have suddenly started going dungeoneering or fighting other Named in one vs one duels. Her overall lifestyle would be the same and the challenges she faces would be the same, and as Named she'd have some intuitive sense of stories to go with it.

To stop nitpicking and address closer to the point, I'm sure Exiled Prince had had his name for longer than a week when he ran into Catherine. Being a fucking idiot is not an immediate death sentence for a Named, just a very likely one if you don't learn real fast.

And Cordelia is already being tutored... to learn real fast. That saying things like that is so utterly ridiculous it doesn't even jinx you, it's just straight up a false statement.

JJR

Oh, opps. I misread that really badly somehow. And cuffing the First Prince is probably a bad idea, diplomatically.

She still shouldn't have said it though. Normally it's the villains complaining about the hero but the story is still probably going to conspire to show Cordelia just how much damage one man can do.

Mental Mouse

Also, it's not just one man... there are two of them.

snowy

Hasenbach said that, not Hanno

StarlightGlimmer

"Nothing can stop me now! Soon I will be invincible!"

Soronel Haetir

"Ladies and gargoyles of the jury, how do you vote?"

Aston Whiteman

Once a year..

Barthumphries

Soronel, we covered this last week, you need to at least mention that the first post is also the beginning of the typo thread.

I started a vote/typo post under the current first post.

greycat

Early and often!

j

The Queen of Callow still bore one of the strongest wishes he had ever seen, pulsing with her heartbeat: vote, vote, vote.

Someguy

So what is Kairos' own [Wish]? An end to his pain and nailing it into people like his pre-Named caretakers who really should have shut their mouths telling him to “pray for his salvation to absolve him from the sin of being born”?

Oshi

We are about to find out.

Liliet

Seems, interestingly, that it was this trial all along.

Crash

Isn't it just the most delightful little thing?
The child that learned his death was all but mandated by Fate rebels and lives not only one more day, but several years. Claims a Name and power for himself, and spends all his time dedicated to nothing but sowing chaos and doing exactly what he wanted, no longer a slave to Fate but a man who wields it. Kairos is passing judgement on those who thought themselves Above it, he's bringing the Choirs to a heel yes, but I think he means to judge Fate itself.

Pokekid01

I disagree on the idea that Fate mandated he die before his thirteenth birthday. It's my interpretation that the Oracle Beneath Helike doesn't necessarily tell people things that are TRUE, just what they most benefit from hearing.

Or I'm wrong and he should have died, but he cut a deal with Below to stave off inevitable demise, kinda like the drow.

Crash

See I really like that thought on the Oracle. Wouldn't that be interesting? I have no idea what to do with it but it's delightful.

However I don't think he cut a deal with Below. He's very clearly still staving off death, in fact at this point I reckon he's being kept alive by his tea thing alone and the fact that names can purge poison. But the real reason for doubting a deal with Below is his reaction to the Skein's audacity of changing his "Fate" even a little bit, messing with his choices while Spooling.

Kairos is a guy who takes offence to having his choices taken for him or a path neatly laid out for him that isn't of his own making. I doubt Below would just offer him a life with no strings attached, nah I don't think they did it.

I think that Kairos Theodosin, the Tyrant of Helike is alive because he is that much of a magnificent bastard.

He's playing his odds against his own body by ingesting poison everyday and purging it away until he physically can't anymore all because this man has a Wish and he'll absolutely see it through.

JJR

I went back to the Usurpation chapter to see the exact wording of the Oracle and an idea struck me. Kairos was told specifically that, "he would not make it to his thirteenth nameday." Which makes me wonder if the Calendar that Helike uses has leap years. If it does, and if Kairos was born on the equivalent of February 29, then he could still be on track to die before his 13th name day. Sure, it would be a technicality, and I'm not sure if we ever did learn what his name day is, but prophecy loves technicalities.

There's also the chapter quote, "One hundred and forty-three: do not try to avert prophecy, fulfil prophecy or in any way tinker with prophecy. Swallowing poison will lead to a quicker death and less ironic horror inflicted upon Creation." I'm not sure about this, it could be that his averting the prophecy is about to unleash ironic horror upon creation. But part of me thinks that's it's an unfulfilled promise of sorts, Kairos tried to avert his death prophecy but is about to learn that he never did and drinking poison would have been a better idea. He is actually drinking poison at the moment, so he does have his bases covered in that regard.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for sharing your findings. Very interesting potential implications here.

Liliet

I think the idea is that Kairos knew full well that tinkering with prophecy is a terrible idea when he first went to ask for one. He's just not against terrible ideas. Given we see him literally drinking poison here and all. Ironic horror unleashed upon Creation? When can I start? – Kairos, cheerfully

Liliet

I also disagree with the idea that Fate mandated that he die before his thirteenth birthday. It was just a medical diagnosis more accurate than doctors are normally capable of giving. [If his condition was unchanged by factors outside the medical aid he was in position to receive within that period] he was going to die.

So he introduced such a factor in claiming a Name, and the oracle went 'cool, that went outside the predicted framework, let's high five over that'.

sengachi

He's to die before his thirteenth name day, which could mean something very different than birthday.

JJR

That's true too. What if it meant something like "the 13 time the day you got your Name occurs." Do we know how long he has been the Tyrant?

Javvies

Probably at some point before Cat became Squire, since she hadn't been Squire all that long when she knocked off Kairos's nephew.

Though, admittedly, that itself isn't the greatest marker of time.

Liliet

Kairos was 12 when he claimed the throne, and 16 during Preipitation, which took place in summer after First Liesse when Caterine was 17. Right now Caterine has recently turned 20. So yes, we have a fairly decent idea.

Sorry about my keyboard.

Mental Mouse

Well, it was classic oracular fuckery: His culture doesn't celebrate birthdays, Kairos was told that he would die before his thirteenth "name-day". And then he got a Name.

haihappen

I have a couple of ideas and half-backed theories about the trial.

My newest one is

"He wants Fate itself to stand trial"

Fate is the Thing below the crypt. Fate is the Thing that Kairos has been fighting against all his life. Fate is the Wager between the Gods, making pieces on a chessboard paint themselves white or black.

Ending Fate would free people from having to make a choice between two nuclear options.

The Hierarch is there to preside over the trial, his Domain working as a force-multiplier or enabler, He himself precedent on the abstinence of choice. Hanno with the Choir of Judgement is meant to be the executioner of this abstract concept.

And a death is needed to make it stick.

And somewhere in there, he also screws over the Dead King, because he would not be Kairos if he didn't.

Fayhem

> And somewhere in there, he also screws over the Dead King, because he would not be Kairos if he didn't.

At a guess, he's going to get Judgment to screw over DK before he does whatever else he has planned with/for them. Because if DK had enough splendid arrogance to show up for this like it's a passing amusement then he deserves an appropriate party favor.

Morgenstern

Hmm.... killing the Bard and taking away the DK's only ever-constant companion (before Ranger anyway)?

.
. .
.

Naaaah.

Morgenstern

Setting her free....? -o.0'

Liliet

> Fate is the Thing below the crypt.

I somehow doubt that.

I think PGTE's world is bigger than that, and sturdier than that.

Crash

Yeah it's best to remember Calernia is actually some backwater small continent.

The Miezens with their sorcery that still can't be reproduced milenia later came from somewhere. The Yan-Tei are vague ideas, the Ashurans bend their necks to their patrons on the other shore. Somewhere out there the Gnomes have their little cyberpunk utopia going on.

Liliet

Yeah. We aren't going to be breaking the entire worldbuilding here, the laws of physics are going to stay the same after as they were before. It is only the Calernian pattern that we're taking scissors and scotch tape to.

Inay

A Hanno AND Kairos point of view interlude? Truly it is a marvelous day! Thank you E.E! ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Hear, hear!! ♥ indeed. This chapter was a delight.

Reddin

Ahh the sputtering fit Cordelia has as she fully grasps Catherine's sheer audacity when dealing with Above. Had me laughing.

Liliet

The best part, though, was Catherine blushing at Hanno quoting her and hastily assuring everyone present it at least wasn't a pun. Their dynamic here is amazing and the best tbh

ATRDCI

Cat: "Cordelia, I give you my strongest assurances. I wasn't making a....a pun. I merely told a Choir to fuck off because those assholes were going to steal my kill. I took down that Hero fair and square."

Cordelia: rendered silent by a combination of shock, offence, and extreme confusion as to how how a person could so violently and thoroughly miss the point

Fayhem

> extreme confusion as to how how a person could so violently and thoroughly miss the point

While we the readers know that the answer to "how" is "on purpose". 😊

Liliet

Hanno: takes a fresh bucket of popcorn from the Seraphim

Tohron

I definitely anticipated what Catherine's Wish was, though it was interesting to learn some of the others.

caoimhinh

We already knew some of those, but it's really interesting seeing it through Kairos' eyes, isn't it?

Catherine's desire for peace is what's driven her all this time. Indrani told her about her wanderlust and Cat had even reflected about it on some chapters. Cordelia has always put a heavy emphasis on "because we must" to make it clear she makes all this because she sees it as her duty.

The members of the Blood are really as expected, a lot of glory-hungry people. Though I'm surprised it was Itima and not Aquiline who wished for revenge (Aquiline's brothers were killed by Itima).

The Witch's desire is interesting, as her "Completion" seems to have a lot of meanings that Kairos wasn't able to fully grasp. Hanno desire for justice being wrapped by the Choir also has interesting implications, but makes sense given how he relays the bigger matters of judging and decisions to the Angels.

I actually thought Masego's wish would be understanding or comprehending everything, rather than becoming a god. The way I saw it, Masego's Apotheosis was rather a consequence of gaining knowledge about the laws of Creation rather than the goal all along; though Kairos did mention that that wish had a lot of nuances and was wrapped in High Arcana, so maybe it's both things.

Now the bigger mystery is: What is Kairos' own Wish?

Oaclo

I think Masego's wish isn't quite as simple as it seems here.

I'd say it's probably more like he wants a systematic, complete understanding of what makes and breaks apotheosis as opposed to coming up with a single path that would get him there.

Liliet

This. I think he wants apotheosis more as a research subject dissected than a tool for his own use.

Fayhem

As others have noted, I think both? Remember that Masego's original motivation was related, by him, as resulting from seeing his father(s) unravel the shard of Arcadia they raised him in and realizing that the Gods could do the same thing to Creation itself any time they pleased. In light of that I think that Masego probably wants apotheosis because he thinks he could use it to either safeguard Creation or make his own as a backup if necessary, which would be why he would need to both thoroughly understand it and be able to use it as a tool.

Bellaco

Hmm you make a very good point! Zeze sees Apotheosis as the result of gaining full understanding and knowledge of everything. For him they are one and the same.

caoimhinh

Yeah.

That reminds me of one of Masego's more iconic phrases:

"Power is a consequence, a happenstance enforced by laws that were artificially set in place. Knowledge is the heart of this. And should a man know as much as a God... Would there even be a difference?"

Shveiran

I'd remind you good people that "the godhead is a trick of perspective". Masego believes to understand more and to ascend are one and the same – achieving one achieves the other as well, and so splitting the two is an exercise in futility.

TAP_M113

I think that this episode will offer more light about apotheosis – namely, by destroying it in live TV. After all, what else would be "Witnessing" Hierarch casting down the Choir of Judgement? Zeze LIVES for dissecting this kind of stuff, and weaponizing it to maximum effect.

I predict that Masego is about to gain a VERY powerful tool to his arsenal, and maybe the stuff of what Death King downfall will be made of. Besides, it would be fun to see Hierarch and Masego interacting. I think they could actually become friends, or those academics that are frontally opposed, yet they see each other as the sole scholar they can respect....

Or we get Masego to be Alexander the Great, and Hierarch play Diogenes. Masego pesters Hierarch to teach him to harness his brand of madness, offering literally anything he may desire for it, and Hierarch only asks him to "step away from his sunlight".

This would be so fun, at so many levels – Hierarch has access to the ultimate Villainous Dream power (harming even the Gods), but has no desire to exploit it for himself.

Interestingly, Kairos seems to have accessed some sort of future-sensing to ensure that they would pick this city, or he heavily used his "Wish" aspect to ensure it happens. The fact of him being in so bad health means that, either he had to use a lot of heavy aspect use to set the board and it took a toll on him, has lost a lot of favor with Below, or he is about to lose his name and transition it into something even greater.

In all of those cases, there is a window of opportunity here – he shouldn't be able to pull aspects like crazy. If he is outsmarted, it will stick.

Guess what it would mean? The Trial stands to be a BIG success in Below's name if he can pull it off, if the possibility of gaining a name Greater than "Tyrant" is on the line...

Liliet

The easiest answer as to how they picked this town is that they employed a sensible and predictable set of criteria that made it the best choice. Which Kairos had employed before them to figure out what they would choose.

When a vase is pushed off the table, you don't need future vision to guess that it will next hit the floor.

Javvies

Or ... it's just the town that they (Procer) assigned the League delegation to be housed in outside of Salia for the talks.

Presumably one that was least defensible and/or valuable.

Which Kairos then had warded up.

lennymaster

It was not, simply because Masego and Indrani followed a supply wagons tracks FROM the League camp TO the town. They did so to find Hierarch on Cat's orders.

Liliet

We know it's not that town, because that's the entire problem Indrani had – that Hierarch wasn't in that one.

caoimhinh

Yeah, like was said in this chapter, when Cordelia goes "hey, we were the ones who chose this ground for the Trial" and Catherine is like "sure you did, Cordie. But it's still Kairos' chosen grounds."

Cordelia is really bad at dealing with Kairos, and still refused to acknowledge they had been predicted and/or manipulated for this, even when it was obvious and undeniable. She's learning to put her pride to a side and look more objectively to things, but she's still not quite there. Cat had to beat Procer and co. repeatedly and in different manners before Cordelia acknowledged Cat was more than a strong thug ruling Callow.

Their only chance at getting off well in whatever Kairos has in mind lies with Catherine, otherwise everyone else (including Neshamah) are gonna be played like a fiddle by Kairos.

Liliet

I don't think she "refused to acknowledge" it so much as it didn't occur to her until Catherine spelled it out. She's a step behind when it comes to Kairos because he's even more offbeat than Cat is – she's odd, but she at least wants the same things Cordelia does, so she can figure her out motivation first. Kairos is just... utterly alien.

I'd say right now their best chance in this is Catherine's passive effect, so to speak – the sympathy she's earned with Kairos, and his inclination to fuck over her opposition more than her.

Andrew Mitchell

We know we're going to find out what Karios' wish is in this next arc. That final line "at last, at long last" made it clear that Karios deepest desire is about to come true.

As to what it is, I'm sticking to my previous guess. He wants to do harm to Gods in revenge for his childhood.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

My own deepest wish is for you to spell "Kairos" correctly.

I kid. Just giving you heck 'cause I can. And because "Karios" sounds like some kind of candy or cereal or candy-based cereal or something.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahaha, thank you. I had NO idea!

Kairos correction accepted. Your deepest wish has been fulfilled.

Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos,
Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos,
Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos, Kairos...

It takes a while to get my muscle memory going. 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Believe me, it's my pleasure. 😊

Mental Mouse

Yeah there's a couple of those wishes where Kairos can see, but never truly understand. Not that it matters...

Draylen

Oh Kairos, forgetting that the majority of people aren't the villains of their own story. Names tend to be exceptions, because so many of them either grab the Villain Ball or hit a Then Let Me Be Evil, but none of the Woe, nor Malicia, really believe themselves to be the Villains of the story, except where circumstances are forcing it explicitly. And even that's only happened to Cat, fighting against a bigger, stronger, more experienced hero, and getting away with it by being cleverer and smarter and more devious and dastardly than anyone else expects.

Oh, right, Akua is sort of part of the Woe now. So they have a Token Evil Teammate. Although even she is having a redemption arc (perfect for RED!)...

You know, typing this out makes me wonder if somehow Cat has been winning everything because she keeps getting to play the Underdog Never Loses card. Despite being renowned as an invincible army. Someone needs to assemble a ragtag group of volunteer peasants to assassinate her.

Also, I wonder if, the way it's bolded, a Personal Wish can somehow be developed into a fourth Aspect. Especially as powerfully tied to the character as it is.

Liliet

Catherine keeps siding with the losing side, attempting to protect those who cannot protect themselves. And she throws herself into it completely enough it does in fact grant her perpetual underdog status.

Liliet

Also, what makes you think Kairos is forgetting anything here?

Cicero

So... does that suggest Catherine would have been for the Choir of Mercy if she had not chosen to turn to Below?

No wonder the Grey Pilgrim was so distraught when he first met her.

Shveiran

It's possible, though I'd argue that while she always had a "practical" approach to things, her Greater Good philosophy was very much shaped by her mentor's influence.

A different key figure in her early years could have led to a different approach, and thus made her closer to a different choir.

Shveiran

An easy contender, for instance, would have been Contrition. Cat has long believed the sword had a key role to play in shaping the world, which we have been told is a recurring theme with Contrition, and she tends to her past mistakes like pot plants and feasts on those flagellant fruits as often as possible.

Mental Mouse

I suspect that may in fact be because though she doesn't realize it, when she faced Contrition the Choir marked her in her triumph.

Shveiran

She was kind of doing it before First Llesse, though. Remember Three Hills?

Mental Mouse

Looking back to II.20: Ashes, where she muses on regret:

>And yet as I searched myself for that feeling, watching at over half a thousand men going up in flames, I found nothing. No, that wasn't right. Not nothing, just... little.

Not a patch on the self-flagellation that her officers start to notice later.

Liliet

Cat would have a thing or two in common with Judgement, too. Yes, her early motto was in opposition to it, but that's exactly the thing – it's Judgement-based questioning that threw her off her stride enough that she needed to wrap herself in pithy words to keep going. I said and continue to say that what Catherine wants to be is Sam Vimes – arresting an army for breaking peace, if that’s what it takes. Her despire from the start was to uphold the law, preferably just law, but any law will do in a pinch – peace is irrevokably tied to order, in her eyes, and she would see Mazus hanged for his crimes, not violently overthrown. You know?

Fayhem

> I said and continue to say that what Catherine wants to be is Sam Vimes

That’s not a half-bad comparison at all – she even historically shares (one of) his defining flaws, namely the tendency to over-centralize power in her own person*. Because when Sam Vimes answers “who watches the watchmen?” with “me” it sounds cool and is very representative of the character, but it’s not exactly a stable system that can be relied on to outlive him personally being present and able to enforce that. And to her credit Catherine has recognized the failings of that approach and is currently actively trying to mitigate that/prepare her people to do without her if/when that becomes necessary.

*And that despite being extremely disdainful/distrustful of authority figures who exercise unquestioned authority in general – like Sam Vimes.

Liliet

Catherine shares his zen approach to being anti-authoritarian while being the authority, too XD

But seriously, I’m just picturing Catherine pointing at the Night Watch books and going ‘that. that’s what i want to be doing’. She’s only not doing that because she doesn’t have a Vetinari to arrange the conditions neatly for her, so she’s been forced to step into his shoes instead XD

Shveiran

You make a good point. Though I’d argue judgment really really really requires trusting something other than yourself to choose what is Just.. and Cat was never willing to uphold anything but what she thought was Just. She always wanted the power to change things, you know? Still, I had dismissed judgment out of hand... And you made me see that was quite the mistake.

Liliet

When Vimes encountered a conflict between written law and what he knew was right, never once did he side with the law.

Catherine wanted to change very specific things. Even to this day, her central goal is to make laws and ensure their enforcement.

Mental Mouse

And she thinks about the implications and consequences of the laws she proposes.

Andrew Mitchell

AND she also discusses the implications and consequences with people she trusts and allows those discussions to improve.

Liliet

Yep. Vimes never did that because he was never in a position to be lawmaker, but it comes from the same basic worldview as he has.

Liliet

The biggest difference between Catherine and Vimes is age and experience – Vimes entered the story adult, experienced and utterly disillusioned and broken by powerlessness. Catherine entered the story 15yo, idealistic and as utterly naive in some respects as she was wickedly sharp in others, and those weren't the same as they were for Vimes. They had rather different lessons to learn in many ways – Catherine didn't need to be shaken out of her apathy, Vimes didn't need to be brutally shown that actions have unintended consequences (he learned THAT on the glorious 25th of May). They start at very different positions, so it is fascinating that so much of the ideals they hold is basically the same.

Liliet

Oh, and outsourcing to the Choir of Judgement the way Hanno does is actually an outlier for Judgement heroes. Normally Choir heroes follow their own understanding of the Choir's signature virtue, with the Choir only caring that they don't stray from that and supporting them on that path.

Fayhem

We don't know that what Hanno does is an outlier for Judgment heroes because we haven't seen any other Judgment heroes. We've seen three choir-sworn heroes in action – Sad Contrite William, Merciful Tariq, and Aspirationally Just Hanno. And IMO each of them has had a markedly distinct relationship with their patron choir, and only Tariq's relationship closely resembles what you're describing as being generally typical. When Bard (it was Bard, right? I'm not crazy?) was talking about the different choirs it definitely made it sound like each has a different style/approach with their sponsored heroes also.

SpeckofStardust

But we do, Bard outright states this-

"So speaks the Choir of Judgement," she said. "Though you're fairly moderate for one of theirs. Most would have executed the upper Secretariat and taken command of the siege after our little tower episode."

He eyed her silently for a moment.

"I do not judge," he finally said. "That is not my Role."

"You're going to be a fun one, I think," Aoede grinned. He is by the account of the teller of a thousand tales is a strange/fun one.

Liliet

Yes, thank you! I'd say the quote you provides encapsulates the 'more typical Judgement mindset' quite descriptively, in comparison to how Hanno is (the exact opposite of that).

Fayhem

Mm, good note; I'd say I need to do another re-read but I save those for the breaks in between books. That does seem to indicate that Hanno is unusual in not taking the figurative gavel of judgment into his own hands.

Liliet

We know he's atypical for Judgement because Bard commented on it in his first POV in Book 3.

Liliet

And William absolutely had that relationship – note that his genius idea for gathering an army for his revolution straight up came from Cat's branding, and at no point did the Choir course-correct him on anything in any way. As long as he was being contrite and attempting to compensate the world for his wrongs, they didn't have opinions on what exactly he was doing, even if every single other hero he met agreed he was fucking awful at life.

People tend to headcanon that Choir of Contrition just mysteriously exactly matched William in temperament and idiocy, but from what we've seen of Mercy and of the curious case of atypical hero of Judgement (with Judgement treating him like they held his exact opinions the entire time actually), it makes much more sense to assume a Choir simply molds itself to its chosen champion.

Shveiran

Also, to be Hero is to embrace Above's vision for the world, in a way fitting your limited understanding of it. Virtue – Above's idea of virtue – is how you get your Name.

I don't think Judgment would be cool with someone going "yeah dude, I know what's right, and I'll murder anyone who acts differently".

Judging is to compare one's actions to a set of rules, not to define those rules in the first place. It's Choir of Judgment, not Choir of Lawmaking.

Also, I love Sam Vimes to bits, but I doubt he'd be cool with Choirs either, Judgment included.

And an argument could be made that while he is definitely a good man (a gentle man, if you would) he is not a very good policeman.

Liliet

> I don't think Judgment would be cool with someone going "yeah dude, I know what's right, and I'll murder anyone who acts differently".

> "Though you're fairly moderate for one of theirs. Most would have executed the upper Secretariat and taken command of the siege after our little tower episode."

You were saying?

> Judging is to compare one's actions to a set of rules, not to define those rules in the first place. It's Choir of Judgment, not Choir of Lawmaking.

Cat's ambition wasn't initially to make laws, it was to get herself into a position where she could enforce them on those who thought themselves above them. She only realized she needed to full on rule Callow after her time in Ater and Black's tutorship showed her just how badly there low key weren't laws that Obviously Needed To Be There, and how the only position from which she could really enforce them was the very top.

We're talking about a hypothetical scenario with hero! Cat, one where she is not in fact thrust into a position to seize power through the Empire's internal hierarchy early on.

Shveiran

> You were saying?

I believe you may have misunderstood my point.

Murderousness is not the factor I'm aiming at, but rather the reason behind the murdering.

My argument is that Heroes (try, within the limits of their own limited undeerstanding, to) use the rules of Above as guidelines for hwo the world should be, and swing away to make it closer to that shape, Hanno's moderation compared to usual Judgment types really has no relation to this.

Regarding Early!Not!Cat, I would argue you are focusing on the fact that she wasn't about "writing new laws" but rather about being in a position "to prevent abuses". It seems you took that as "she wanted to enforce laws".

I disagree. Cat perception was that Mazus was perfectly within its right to raise taxes, and didn't like that. She simply didn't believe she had a reasonable way to interfere with that.

So she wanted to be a part of the system to have the necessary power to affect the situation.

That wasn't because she wanted to be an enforcer, it was because she didn't believe changing the rules was an option.

Liliet

Catherine has always wanted to be a guardian.

Liliet

Okay, so in notepad some of my keys don't work, and on wordpress pressing enter sends te message. Amazing.

Let me try again.

Caterine as always wanted to be a guardian, and she said that she is not fit for making the new age, only beating up people who want to break it and protect people who CAN make it. I don't think wanting to change laws is central to her character the way you seem to. I can see where we read the same thing the exact opposite ways. This is what I see: that Caterine was forced into writing laws, and would rather just stand over the ones already made with a fiery sword and a 😊 @ anyone who wants to break them.

She believes the laws she is trying to bring are utterly obvious, elementary, and it's just an oversight that they weren't already there. She has no love for Heavens specifically, although a lot of it is a function of her time as a villain, but their laws matter to her because she believes THEY SHOULD be. I believe a Coir can work with that.

Mental Mouse

Note that Sam Vimes, or any of his Watchmen, would probably slug you for calling them "police".

Cat

We don't know much about Endurance but it keeps getting mentioned and by name alone does that not remind you of Cat? To keep going despite the obstacles is Cat's nature.

"You will bleed, a chorus of voices whispered into his ear. You will suffer. You will weep, yet find no relief. Though your soul is young and your weight feeble, you will take on the burden of many. Iason, son of Idrim, We offer you the misery of Endurance. We would embrace you one of our own, to blood and tears and bitter end. Iason Brightsword, Son of Tears, will you withstand horror so that others do not?"

From the Stalwart Paladin's chapter.

Shveiran

Yeah, but to be fair, you could put most characters into that definition. Doesn't Cordelia sound like that? Or Black? Or Tariq? Or Saint?

Basically, so long as you keep going after bruising your knees, you fit in.

Liliet

All heroes match Endurance in a basic way, arguably even most Named. So you gotta look closer than 'gets hurt a lot', and when we look closer at Cat, we see her giving up and going 'ok guess I die now' no less than twice – the two I remember were at First Summerholm against Rashid, right before she got Struggle after he insulted Callowans, and in Everdark after having her soul cut, where she just gave up and lay down to die, but didn't die quickly enough for her restlessness to not get her to get up and keep trying out of sheer boredom, god bless this ADHD wonder of a person.

I'd say Endurance really ain't her.

Tohron

It's been established that there is a Choir of Peace, so she presumably would have been aligned with that if she'd been a hero.

Liliet

If she'd been aligned with a Choir from the start of her career, I'd argue it wouldn't be that one. Her desires morphed into this over time, early on she was willing to start a war to see done changes she wanted.

Adrian_V

Wow, spectacular chapter and i can't believe even with a direct POV the only thing we got to what the Bard wants is teasing from Kairos, is like he knows what her end ame is and is rubbing it on our faces!!!

Wonder if the comment about Masego arriving implies they plan to use him or if it just a left over from when he was possessed (like DK can smell him or something xD)

Andrew Mitchell

> ... the only thing we got to what the Bard wants is teasing from Kairos, is like he knows what her end ame is and is rubbing it on our faces!!!

We know that Karios knows the Bard's deepest desire and he thinks it's "glorious".... So, yes, he IS rubbing it in our faces. 😊

Ultimate_procrastinator

As is only expected of the Tyrant

Javvies

Whoa! Kairos POV. I don't remember one of those before.

Huh. Kairos wants to break what people desire most. Or, at least, he wants break the greatest desires of certain people, presumably Bard, Dead King, and it's not clear who else he wants to kill the dreams of.

And Heirarch judgy powers vs Choir of Judgement is confirmed. Wait ... would the Seraphim Judgement Coin even work on Heirarch? Well, Heirarch with his "judgement of the people" domain/aura active.

—

Heh.
Cordelia will need to get used to Cat's irreverence.
Fortunately, Hanno doesn't seem to mind it.

greatwyrmgold

If this is how Kairos thinks and what he sees when he looks at people, we would have definitely remembered seeing Kairos's point of view before now.

Whether or not Hierarch is subject to the Seraphim's justice and vice versa seems to be the uncertainty driving the tension at this point.

I like a hero who doesn't mind a snarky companion, even if they're technically an enemy. Pragmatism, in both finding every friend against a common foe and not taking slights to your side too personally.

Liliet

Hanno actually managed to get Catherine embarrassed about her own shit. This man is at the top of the trolling food chain here and I adore him with my entire heart.

Also, the part where he thought that even if he were certain to die in this trial, his life was less important than those of Catherine and Cordelia. My heart ;~;
(heroes in PGTE are real heroes and they HAVE me. every single one of them has me)

Fayhem

> This man is at the top of the trolling food chain here and I adore him with my entire heart.

Hmm idk, I feel like Catherine responding to that quote from Hanno by giving earnest assurances that when she called angels bottom-feeders and told them to fuck off she certainly wasn't making a pun was actually her trolling Cordelia, by massively (and deliberately) missing the point of what would be offensive about that. Which Cordelia's reaction bears out IMO.

Liliet

She blushed when he brought it up though. Sure, she then recovered by bullying Cordelia, but Hanno scored a very definite hit there.

caoimhinh

Kairos POV was awesome and a delight to read, not the least because it gave us insight on the deeper Wishes of many of the most relevant characters (plus confirming that's why Kairos laughed like crazy the first time he saw Catherine).

Also, he hinted that Neshamah is not really completely safe right now, which is cool. I want to see exactly what Kairos wants to accomplish here.

Now the trial "at long last" starts, and the hype is off the roof!

cark-with-an-m

When we take into account Irritant's Law, we might have a problem on our hands. Both Tyrant and the dwarves are making a play for Keter.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Tyrant describe the Wish of every attendant, except Roland. Is it because he is hidden as an ace in the hole?

caoimhinh

Pilgrim and Amadeus aren't there at the moment either, apparently.

Hanno said that "the Tyrant would be facing two Choirs" so that implies Tariq is there in the group.

I guess Amadeus was kept in Salia for his safety? It seems Cat is expecting this to blow up so she kept him away since without his Name his fighting ability is diminished (he's likely still very dangerous, but in the face of a clash that's involving Choirs and Named of the Hierarch, Tyrant and Dead King caliber, it's better to not have him near the blast area.

TAP_M113

You know, the "Mirror Knight" is said to be fated to become monstrously strong thanks to his "Dawn" aspect, which makes him stronger with each passing day. Remember how even Hanno was quite scared about what kind of threat he would need to face in the future, that the Choirs thought they would need such a potent weapon to fight it?

Above and the Choirs have been noted to be precognitive (Hanno glimpse of the Seraphim and how they judge, how the Augurworks), but they have also been shown to be very fettered by unspoken rules when it comes to acting on that knowledge (Augur will get waylaid by other deities, or by spontaneous, spur-of-the-moment decisions). The fact that the Ophanim could not resucitate Grey Pilgrim, even if they wished to, also points in that direction.

My hypothesis? Above itself has seen that Judgement, and maybe even Mercy, will be crippled or outright killed by the Trial, and has started damage control one or two years ago, by turbo-boosting the Endurance Choir and its champions, so that they will be able to hold the fort alone, at least for the generation that Judgement and Mercy will need to spend licking their wounds.

Unless our merry band of misfits is VERY GOOD, they won't be able to change what is to come – the Trial is already prophesized to be a success. So yes, things are THAT dire for Above.

konstantinvoncarstein

Is the Mirror Knight sworn to Endurance?

TAP_M113

Yep, he is. Makes you wonder, isn't it? What will the Choirs have to "endure" in the future? 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

Where it is said?

caoimhinh

No, he isn't. It was the Stalwart Paladin who was about to be sworn to Endurance, and he was killed by Catherine.

If Mirror Knight was sworn to a Choir, it would have been mentioned more often, either by Cristophe's POV or by Hanno when thinking or talking about him, as we have seen Hanno do when talking about Pilgrim (he always mentions the Seraphim).

Also, something worth mentioning is that, according to Book 4 Interlude Kaleidoscope VI, Mirror Knight obtained his Name after passing a set of trials in "the Old Lake" set by the spirits who lived there, which he called "the Elfin Dames". They were also the ones who gave him his armaments and the blessing that became his Aspect of Dawn.

Fayhem

I don't think so, no. If anyone has a textual citation stating that he is I would be extremely interested to see it bc that's super-relevant character info for him.

Liliet

Not that we know of, I'm pretty sure 😊

Oshi

I figured he was made to act as a hatchetman for something the Dead King pulls out in his last stand.

Sparsebeard

Having Amadeus stay back seems pretty dangerous in hindsight seeing that Malicia is also unaccounted for...

Mental Mouse

Well, they do have some stuff to work out...

Liliet

They need the time to find a good marriage counsellor.

Liliet

Oh dangit, we had Hanno and Amadeus in the same room and barely had either of them react to one another, didn't we?

Liliet

Good question.

Big I

I predict that by the end of the trial Hanno will have become the Black Knight, and the Choir of Judgement will have either been destroyed or corrupted somehow into Fallen Angels.

Long term, I predict Cat will become the Grey Pilgrim. She's got the sage advice thing down pat.

TAP_M113

Oooh, that would be a GOOD one! I doubt it will work that way (It is a test of faith, and Hanno has been described as a Man of unbreakable certainty), but I see how it checks, story-wise. Still, this comes with the same problems as when Heiress tried to turn Cat – namely, this trope tends to backfire at the wielder so damn often that I doubt that Kairos would fall for it. Not enough reward for the paltry benefits it offers.

Mammon

Highly doubt it, but really want it to happen. Probably more a matter of either nothing happens or an acceptable cost is taken.

Or Cat doublecrosses Kairos by suddenly asking Hierarch to instead pass the judgement onto the long since turned more evil than good Hashmallim. She just needs one other to back her vote, and they'll outvote the Tyrant whose of course only gets one vote same as anyone else. And considering judgement of the angels is rare, she might make a case to Hierarch for having the People of Callow weigh in before whatever Kairos wants.

The Hashmallim seem the most tied to the Choirs' foundations of being made when Good still considered slavery okay, and thus inherently utilise and allow it. Can't call enslaving an entire city including the children to go crusading as mindless zealots anything less than super-evil these days, and Cat's new wave of morals would lend itself for these archaic 'Good' guys to be put on the chopping block.

All the Story elements are there, Cat just needs to claim them. The Callowan Long Prices for even the smallest slights (One successful and one attempted enslavement of an entire city by the Hashmallim), Procer having given her the smooth excuse to Hierarch that some know her as the Queen In Callow which isn't a title rather than a name freely given by the People, and maybe even the recently ascended Sve Noc (who're currently worshipped or acknowledged by some Above Callowans and whose wings color a still technically good country's banner) with her Drow that copy the angelic power remaining the same even when individuals die schtick to be a suitable replacement.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately, AFAIK she doesn't have a rep for the Choir of Contrition handy.

theothin

I don't think the Grey Pilgrim is a Name available to non-Levantines.

Mental Mouse

No, but Cat can certainly develop into the mentor and advisor-figure. She's already beaten him at the manipulation side of things, and has arguably been serving "good" (as opposed to Above) better than he has.

Liliet

I have said before and keep saying that the chapter where he argues he needs to die instead of her is basically a passing of the torch – he has acknowledged that she is filling the same basic Role he is, on a level more broad than Names, and is doing it better than he had been, so it's time for him to move over.

Liliet

That picture, for completion, requires Amadeus to also become the White Knight, I'm sure we can all agree on that.

antoninjohn

Cat's story is that of a good person doing what is needed even if it's evil for Callow. That is going to leave a mark on creation.

TAP_M113

Yes, it would drag Below kicking and screaming into doing community service, and allow to cement Evil "Hero roles" that are positive and widely accepted by society. Incidentally, the same as the Yang-Ti (a major, peaceful and prosperous superpower, by the way) have a ruling representative of Above and Below at all times without the place exploding into a mess of flying fortresses and bands of five roaming the countryside...

I think it is NOT a coincidence both Above (10th crusade) and Below (Hierarch+Kairos trial) are trying to mess has hard as they can with this particular outcome, each from their own side.

I bet that Above and Below old hard-liners are fussing and screaming about how "The stupid parental control is about to lock PEGI 18+ games running into the X-Box (Calernia)! It was already bad enough when it happened with the Wii (Yang-Ti)!"

Andrew Mitchell

I like that metaphor. 😊

Liliet

> Yes, it would drag Below kicking and screaming into doing community service, and allow to ciment Evil "Hero roles" that are positive and widely accepted by society.

Yassssssssss

WuseMajor

...Honestly, I think they're STILL underestimating Kairos. They think he's going to stage a suicide strike and use the Hierarch to attack Judgement in some way. And...maybe he will, but I think there has to be more here. His final act is going to betray everyone, as much as possible, somehow, and I doubt the full scope of that will be evident in advance.

He's kept something hidden. I don't know what, but his plan here still has something they haven't grasped that is going to bite them all. Yes, even the Dead King.

...I'm starting to suspect that he's going to try to break the world, get the Hierarch to argue that the Wager of the Gods is formally unjust or something.

Also called it on the title.

TAP_M113

I fully agree with you. My suspicion is that, while Kairos has 1-2 main plans he wants to see through, he has intentionally stockpiled at lot of targets of opportunity by piling all the people he dislikes/antagonizes/wishes to betray in the same place.

If he doesn't get his big, evil plan to fruition, he will go to town "betraying everyone present as the first step of my plan", and make sure that the ungodly amount of collateral damage he causes will achieve the same result.

I like him. He has got his Irritant/Traitorous-fu honed to a sharp edge, he deserves to win here. Hell, not even Amadeus nor Catherine have ever displayed so much Meta-level cunning as he is displaying by arranging the playing field as he is doing.

Including the lace underwear on the Seraphim. Stop pretending that you cannot see through the 4th Wall, Kairos! Munchkinning the "Comic Relief" trope and musing how you "Are Near Death" and "No One is Invulnerable" just before your final confrontation gave you way, you sly magnificent bastard. You know we want you to win already, no need to lay the Meta so thick (even if it is part of what we adore about you) 😊

laguz24

Oh, crap Recall is even more op than I realized. Seriously it gives him memories and skills without the story baggage. Everything Cat and all the other heroes/villains have learned they have learned from their triumphs or failures which makes them even more wrapped up in fate's tangles. Hanno gets to have all the experience in the world without the story baggage and when something like this comes along that comes from his own life he is completely unprepared for it.

Andrew Mitchell

> Oh, crap Recall is even more op than I realized. Seriously it gives him memories and skills without the story baggage.

Good point. And it seems he can learn from any hero (e.g., the Lone Swordsman and the Stalwart Paladin) and not JUST from White Knights like I had previously assumed. So, very OP indeed.

konstantinvoncarstein

If he was even slightly interested in history and other cultures, he could explore the memory of Heroes from across the whole world and all eras. He could even Recall Dwarven or Gnomes Heroes 😊

Andrew Mitchell

A useful exploit!

TAP_M113

You bet. After everything is done, somebody has to avoid the unchallenged Dwarfen and Gnome polities deciding that a little human Genocide is acceptable. Given how societies progress, and the fact that dwarves are close to industrial societies, while Gnomes are already firmly on it, somebody is bound to postulate and spread the worse schools of Social darwinism, Manifest Destiny and violent XXth century Utopias amongst those races. And then it is game over if Calernian and human tech levels have not improved in the meantime...

Fayhem

> And then it is game over if Calernian and human tech levels have not improved in the meantime...

Eh, not sure I agree. The gnomes' previous cited violent intervention matched the story of "foolhardy researchers ignore dire warnings, then dire shit happens" which isn't a story that's biased against the gnomes at all. Those philosophies you cited might have "worked" IRL (in the sense of being able to spread and do a lot of damage, not in the sense of functioning to actually produce good things), but in Calernia/Guideverse those lend themselves very handily to being framed as villain stories. And villains always lose in the end, at which point we can expect the gnomish tech monopoly to be well and truly broken which is pretty much Game Over for the gnomes as a species given how many bridges they would have not just burned but detonated.

So tl;dr here is I expect the gnomes are canny enough not to let themselves in for that, because if they weren't it would probably have happened already given that the gnomes have been maintaining this tech monopoly for, what, thousands of years now? More than enough time for that to have happened if they weren't deliberately and consciously avoiding that as a matter of policy.

medailyfun

Cmon, it was mentioned he'd borrowed Thief of Stars skills

Andrew Mitchell

I must have missed that. When/where was that said?

caoimhinh

Back when he fought Amadeus, Hanno explicitly said he was Recalling lives from many different Heroes. For the two confrontations, as I recall, he used the Spear of the Free, the Lone Swordsman, the Rebel Knight, the Merry Brawler, The Unconquered Champion, Flawless Fencer, the Lance of Light and the Barehanded Pugilist.

Hanno can't use their Aspects, but he can use their experience and fighting styles.

Andrew Mitchell

TY

Mental Mouse

Well, Cat and Masego did have that stint in Arcadia. And for that matter, Name dreams.

TAP_M113

Great interlude EE! Now FINALLY we get an inkling of how the Tyrant is able to be so damn insightful and know so many things he has not business knowing – “Wish” is a dual use aspect, with the ability to see in real-time what any individual wants, besides rewriting reality when personally used by Kairos himself.

I have to say that Kairos is a grade AAA+ Meta-level Munchkin with a weapons-grade name. “Wish” is the most OP social/meta aspect I have ever seen, particularly when one accounts the fact that it is a first aspect, which tend to be very serviceable, but weaker as a rule. I think that only Malicia’s “Speak”, Hanno’s “Recall” and Pilgrim’s mind-reading aspects are that powerful, and they are senior-level names. I guess that “Tyrant” is a REALLY powerful and historied name that has carved a sizeable groove in creation, right there with “Dread Emperor” and “Grey Pilgrim”. That, and also the fact that Kairos is getting rocket-grade fuel from multiple overlapping “superpower disability”, “underdog”, “chronic backstabbing disorder” and “near death” tropes.

And Hierarch refusing the use of “tyrannical” Proceran furniture? Priceless. Keep on living, our favourite doublethinking “Homo Sovieticus”. You shall have my bow, Hierarch.

Between this, and the likelihood to witness Hierarch with his 3 aspects fully online, I am really fired up. Go Kairos! Leave a choir-sized, charred groove of ruin in Creation. The Gods have long been meddlesome and despotic, and their demise was long overdue.

Long life Bellerophon! Death to the celestial tyrants and foreign despots!

negagardens

I can’t remember when, but I’m pretty WISHes secondary use has been mentioned a few times before. Like- he explicitly eyeballs Hakram and gets weirded out by him at the start of prince’s graveyard...

...

What’s the bet that he tells everyone Bard’s deepest Wish, shortly before he snuffs it?

Mental Mouse

> What's the bet that he tells everyone Bard's deepest Wish, shortly before he snuffs it?

That would be a good way for him to betray the Dead King!

Shveiran

What? The DK wants that. He would be doing him a favor, not the other way around.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, for me it was obvious wish took 2 forms.

konstantinvoncarstein

I dearly hope that before the end of this story Bellerophon will become a smoking crater.

Liliet

> Now FINALLY we get an inkling of how the Tyrant is able to be so damn insightful and know so many things he has not business knowing – "Wish" is a dual use aspect, with the ability to see in real-time what any individual wants

We definitely knew this before, at least from Interlude: Thunder in Book 3, which is where he discusses with Anaxares what he saw in Amadeus and in Bard.

Fayhem

Just out of curiosity, does any have a textual citation for Wish actually having the "rewrite reality" use that everybody seems to be ascribing to it? Because I at least can't remember any case where anybody in the actual Guide has referred to it working like that, so it seems like maybe people are just assuming it can be used like the D&D Wish spell when in fact it just does what Kairos is using it for here.

Fayhem

*does anyone. Damn typos.

Andrew Mitchell

Not that I can recall. I think it may just be an assumption as you suggest.

konstantinvoncarstein

During the Free Cities arc, he betrayed the Calamity but was sent to Arcadia by Warlock. After he came back to save Hanno, he said something about having to use a Wish to escape.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, but that wish could easily have been used to find the deepest wish of a Fae and that enabled Kairos to bargain with the Fae for help to get out of Arcadia.

Liliet

He said that it 'cost him a wish', while the passive use is clearly not quantified nor rationed.

konstantinvoncarstein

He said he had to use A wish

Liliet

"Wish, wish into the grave" – Skein, in Liesse.

That it can be used to produce any type of effect is an Occam's razor deduction from its name, dire price and how far apart the two precedents of its use that we know have been – teleporting around in Nicae and messing with Skein's Aspect in Liesse.

Fayhem

Both excellent examples, my thanks to both you and Konstantin. That is a good indication also of why Wish isn't quite as OP as someone might assume, because I'm guessing the fact that the (apparently) extremely physically draining aspect went to the permanently near-death cripple is very relevant to the story logic of why he was "allowed" to have something that strong.

Liliet

I think it's not just 'physically draining', I think it likely interacts directly with Kairos's sickness, allowing it to progress further in the way otherwise held off by his Name.

Fayhem

I mean. I'm not really sure why a major physical drain wouldn't have exactly that effect? Definitely not a doctor, but my layman's understanding at least is that a major health shock of any kind can worsen the progression of a chronic/degenerative condition. If it exclusively and specifically interacts with Kairos' illness per se then to me that seems like it would be necessary to have that exact condition to qualify for that Aspect, which seems a little over-specific to make sense (again, to me at least).

Liliet

> If it exclusively and specifically interacts with Kairos' illness per se then to me that seems like it would be necessary to have that exact condition to qualify for that Aspect, which seems a little over-specific to make sense (again, to me at least).

Every Aspect is individualized though? Like, they are unique to the person and arise from THEM and THEIR story, and sure some of them repeat in broad strokes, but INHERENTLY they are tailored. It's just that a lot of people wear some very similar sizes.

I don't think Wish is narratively tied to Kairos's EXACT illness, considering no-one even knows what exactly it is other than 'incurable'.

But it absolutely IS tied to the story of AN incurable illness. Kairos pays for it in his remaining lifetime, and it WOULD NOT WORK on someone who DIDN'T have a degenerative fatal illness and a mindset of 'let it all burn'. Kairos gets to make wishes BECAUSE he is dying, that's the price and the connection.

A major physical drain implies you could see, say, Catherine or Indrani having that Aspect. They couldn't. They don't meet the prerequisites, because the prerequisite is that you have to be dying.

Fayhem

> A major physical drain implies you could see, say, Catherine or Indrani having that Aspect.

No? Because literally my starting premise was that the Tyrant was only able to get this aspect because he's dying/extremely sick and using the aspect in its active form kills him faster (since it's adding such an enormous physical drain to his already extremely frail constitution). The relevant quote from what I said being "I'm guessing the fact that the (apparently) extremely physically draining aspect went to the permanently near-death cripple is very relevant to the story logic of why he was "allowed" to have something that strong."

tl;dr – I think we might be saying the exact same thing in different ways.

Liliet

The thing is, ‘physical drain’ is something that can be counteracted. With healing, potions, eating well, whatnot. That’s why I’m saying that it goes directly to the illness’s progress, instead.

Fayhem

I think we might have a different understanding of the medical dynamic underlying this. What I’m thinking of most definitely can’t be counteracted by such means, at least not with the degree of efficacy that would be required for someone who is already as sick as Kairos.

I know you play/are familiar with D&D, right? If you’re somebody who has to make Fortitude/Con saves (depending on what edition you’re playing) against your incurable degenerative illness every day for it to not get worse, which inevitably you’re going to fail a certain percentage of the time anyway, taking a big chunk of Con damage is going to result in your disease getting worse regardless of whether said Con damage is with time and treatment recoverable (Guideverse IMO doesn’t have an equivalent of quick-and-easy Restoration spells, certainly not without Light being involved). The damage being eventually “fixed” isn’t going to help you when the progress of the disease that occurred in the interim isn’t fixable.

Taking a hit to your health when you can’t afford any such thing on top of what you’ve already got just makes more sense to me as a price than somehow just making you sicker in only a single specific way. Maybe that’s just a personal perspective thing, idk. I would also stipulate that I do think that Kairos somehow magically getting well or no longer being affected by his illness would fundamentally alter the operation of his Name, much as Vivienne moving away from doing Thief-y stuff undermined (and ultimately removed) her Name. “Mad cripple” is the baseline premise of Kairos’ schtick, and both halves of the term are salient.

Liliet

Well, I would not describe 'Con damage' as 'physically draining'. It just doesn't seem to be a good description of what the mechanic reflects to me.

ChillyPepper

Just for musing sake, does anyone see similarities between Cathrine's chosen dream from the beginning of the story to events unfolding like so?

at the very least the killing of both her evil and good selves.

Mental Mouse

Cat: Hanno, you realize Kairos is top-rank and has pulled out three extra cans of whoop-ass here?

Hanno: Oh yeah... bring it on!

Dis gon be gud!

greatwyrmgold

I can't help but hear Kairos's internal monologue in the voice of Mark Hamil's Joker. Kairos is just having so much fun being nasty!

Fayhem

Approved. Personal canon is now that Kairos is Arkham Knight Joker, except both of him are Joker all the time so there's no conflict just gleeful collaboration between him and his inner demon.

SpeckofStardust

"How boring life would be, if there were only ever two choices to be had," Kairos lightly said. "Our guests have come, dear friend."

Well, he is going to stab both sides here.

After all it is the only choice that really matters.

Liliet

I love everyone present so much.

ninegardens

Gods below, you can't help but love this evil little bastard, as he stumbles towards the finish line, coughing and bleeding having given his all for the running of the race. Having lived a life free of compromises, and schemed, and struggled, and knowing his time is short, and you can practically feel how tired he is, how exhausted, how he yearns for the finish line, how he yearns for the plan to be complete, the fear of mortality nipping at his heels, that unspoken certainty that if he hesitates for a moment he'll miss out- he'll be too late. If he hesitates, he'll never get to see just what he might have done.

...and really, that's what sets him apart from the likes of Akua. Akua was driven by a desire to be remembered. Kiaros I suspect doesn't CARE if anyone remembers him, he just wants to know for himself if it can be done.... and that makes the little madman ever so endearing.

Liliet

Well, Akua was compelling and sympathetic in her own right, in the entirely different way of doing what she'd been taught was right no matter what it cost her, or anyone else, along the way...

Terrible children the both of them, and for the both of them it's the adults who shaped them so who are to blame at the core of it.

ninegardens

Oh yeah, don't get me wrong, Akua's characterization was solid....

But like, NOBODY in the audience wanted Akua to win. She wasn't loved the same way as Tyrant is (At least, not at the time of her Peak Villiany).

With Tyrant (and partly because his goals are hidden), I think there's a decent chunk of readers hoping his victory.

Liliet

He is being presented in a markedly different way than she is, and a large chunk of the audience DOES get pulled in by this difference like that, true.

mavant

"I took a deep breath and listened to the old brag of my heart: I am, I am, I am."

Walter

I feel like I wanna roll to disbelieve the Narration here, jeez.

Like, Cat's wish is peace? Our Cat? The protagonist? What peace?

If it is peace for herself she can be on a boat in five seconds flat.

Peace for her nation she's turned down over and over. Like, the whole thing with her letting Swordsman go to start a revolution so that she could rise in the ranks was her trading away peace in Callow for more personal power.

Peace in Calernia is literally trying to break out, and she is doing her very best to squash it, right? Like Dead King is literally retreating his armies and Cat has made a bargain with Kairos where he'll tell them a reason to keep on warring against Dead King if they let him put White Knight on trial.

I mean, clearly the author is correct about their creations, but, like, this revelation feels to me like it flies totally in the face of her characterization to this date. Right? Like, surely the person who craved peace wouldn't have taken the knife at the start of the story.

I buy that Catherine wants to dunk on her enemies, she wants to smoke more weed, and more seriously, she wants to reshape the future with the Liesse Accords, leave her mark on the world, all that jazz. But if she wants peace she has chosen, like, the weirdest possible way to get there.

ninegardens

She doesn't want "peace for my lifetime", she wants PEACE. She doesn't want peace for herself and her friends, she wants to build the sort of peace that does not break.

She doesn't want peace that will screw over future generation via DK.

She wants the sort of peace that will mean Callow will never be invaded by the Empire again.

Remember, she was bothered not just by the present occupation of Callow, but by the fact that it has inevitably been the battlefield of Good and Evil for GENERATIONS. That is the conflict she is trying to defeat.

If a War today puts down the dead king, stabilizes the Drow, prevents Hellgates and Angel bombs and gets the Empire into a position where trade and sorcery earn it more wealth than force of arms, THEN she has achieved peace.

Hell, the fact that she desires peace is obvious enough that people guessed it back when she met Kiaros for the first time, I'm pretty sure.

Andrew Mitchell

+1

Shveiran

Yeah, what ninegardens said. Spot on.

Liliet

Catherine has started wanting peace from the minute she started undersanding the price of war.

No, she did not always want it. But by now, she's been saturated with the price of her failures sorely and completely enough, that everything she wants boils down to this: peace. It's the prerequisite to all else she wants, and it's the end result if she is right about it. It's the opposite of strife, and strife is what she sees as the ultimate enemy. Strife, and war, and destruction: she does not believe that she can give her people prosperity, she does not see in herself the ability to provide that, but if she can provide peace, that will be enough.

It's not just a desire: it's an ideal, it's a belief. It's faith, that peace can exist, that peace can hold, that it's possible to achieve what Amadeus wanted and have everyone lift each other up instead of pulling each other down.

> Peace in Calernia is literally trying to break out, and she is doing her very best to squash it, right? Like Dead King is literally retreating his armies and Cat has made a bargain with Kairos where he'll tell them a reason to keep on warring against Dead King if they let him put White Knight on trial.

You're wrong about this one. Peace with the Dead King now will mean he'll come back to war on them another time. Peace with Dread Empress Malicia will mean that Praes will linger in the shadow of suspicion and knowledge they'll make the darkest deals the minute they're pressed. It's a peace for one generation, that will have everything descend back into the perpetual war of two sides the minute the balance shifts away from the precise configuration Cat has managed to force it into.

Catherine needs to fight this war so she can win it, because otherwise peace with the Dead King is impossible – he has nothing to gain from it unless he's losing.

Catherine needs to fight this war because Amadeus needs to continue the Reforms, and for that he needs to be in position to force his will on Praes – and the Empress cannot be trusted to cooperate even if she agrees.

Catherine needs to fight this war because it's proof of concept, because it's unprecedented unity of the entire continent with only fringe outliers staying out of it. It's making a new groove, a new story, a new pattern, one that Calernia will be able to fall into again and again from now on if it is completed all the way.

Catherine needs to fight this war because on the other side of the chasm is a hope not just for a momentary truce, but for complete rearrangement of when people go to war and when they don't. What she cannot break, she will regulate, and if she cannot stop the conflict entirely, she can at least bind it with laws – she can.

If she wins this war.

There is a saying: peace reigns when people who want peace are better at war than people who don't.

Walter

I mean, it sounds to me like you are describing someone who wants to win, and, like, we are in agreement re: that being Catherine?

It is just weird to describe that as wanting 'peace', yeah? She wants victory! People keep giving her the the option of ending the fighting, and she keeps prolonging it, and her driving goal is for there to be no fighting?

I mean, okay, if that's the tune the piper's calling, but, like, if you are gonna Greater Good the Wish revelation then what's the point of it? Like, you could have someone whose wish is East East East like a trumpet blowing and they are going west because one day it will let their descendants go east.

Go back and read the bit where Catherine gets Diabolist's ultimatum re: Liesse, a dagger to a hundred thousand throats. See if you can find a single second of consideration of the idea of surrendering.

She doesn't think about it for a day, she doesn't think about it for an hour, she doesn't think about it for even one minute. Genuinely conceding is right the fuck out. But she also doesn't pretend to concede and then attempt a rescue, doesn't beg for heroic intervention, just makes pompous declarations about getting Big Revenge.

Like, if she wants peace, it is presumably so that people can live in it, yeah? The story literally put a hundred thousand of those living people stacked together on the table and it weighed less than the chance to rant about how much of a Hard Man making Hard Choices she was.

Liliet

> But she also doesn't pretend to concede and then attempt a rescue, doesn't beg for heroic intervention,

...because it wouldn't work? She didn't have those options. She knew these people were as good as already dead, so yes she went straight to swearing Big Revenge.

> Like, if she wants peace, it is presumably so that people can live in it, yeah? The story literally put a hundred thousand of those living people stacked together on the table

...and she could do nothing to help them.

I am not saying Catherine always makes the best smartest choices that are the shortest way to what she wants. God no; I'm not even saying she was necessarily right in the reasoning she employed against Diabolist, just that that's what she thought at the time.

She doesn't want peace for herself. She wants peace for other people. That's why Kairos calls her a servant of Above at heart: she is selfless and she wants to do the right thing and what she believes the right thing is is what forms her greatest desire. If you want more money forever, investment is a smarter move than hoarding, even if it costs you money upfront, you know? Catherine is investing in future peace, and it's exactly what her characterization is.

I mean, as far as Second Llesse goes, do you remember her being more or less suicidally depressed for a book straight after it? Do you think it's because she doesn't care about that 'hundred thousand lives stacked together on the table'?

Walter

I mean, if you want to show a character regretfully writing off hostages, there are, like, ways to do that. They exhaust every possible yada yada. We see this beat used elsewhere in this story, Cat getting the band together to get everyone's take, maximize their odds. She does it when she cares about something (without looking back I feel like there was a planning session before the confrontation with the Winter Fae, and one before Keter Malicia assassination attempt), and the text generally emphasizes that she is prioritizing the thing over who gets credit for it.

The beat of 'Diabolist threatens genocide, Cat instantly laughs in her face and threatens soul slavery' is a different one. It is the one we got just recently, where Diabolist got needled about them having tortured one of her buds to death and she no-sold it and asked if he was a screamer. The point of it is that the antag in the scene has misread the protagon, threatening something they don't value. It is a way to put heat on an antag, shine on the protagon.

Like, it isn't a coincidence that Diabolist's demand is 'we 2 fight vs. Malicia, or I do a genocide', and Cat dares her to do her worst, and one genocide and one soul enslavement and a few other atrocities later we have... drumroll, Cat & Diabolist fighting vs. Malicia. That's not coincidence, it is the author beating the point home with a hammer. 2 paths to this conflict, one involving a monstrous series of utter atrocities and the other involving letting Diabolist be the one who does the dunking, and Cat didn't need five minutes to choose.

I'm agreeing with you that Cat doesn't always make the right choices, but I suspect we maybe don't mean the same thing by that. I see her as a Napoleon type of figure, basically cleverly and successfully implementing her bronze age warlord values. My guess is that your 'mistakes' are my 'character revealing beats', and vice versa.

That is, I suspect your version of Cat's mistakes are those which lead me to my conclusions re: her actual values, while my version of her mistakes are the tactical mis-steps that the story calls out from time to time.

As far as wanting peace for other people, I dunno if I can square the circle with you here. Like, we aren't just disagreeing, we are presumably wondering which book each other are reading. I doubt we can even approach consensus there, we'll probably keep on disagreeing.

I generally put Cat's post-Second Llesse mental stuff down to being Sovereign of Moonless Nights at the time. Like, if you want to root for the character, I think you kind of have to.

Liliet

You're right on the money re: we both are reading. Wondering what you think of Cat's self-sacrificing tendencies, like in Third Llesse when she literally fought the Pilgrim over the right to die on the altar? Sorry about this, two of my keyboard keys decided to stop working suddenly.

Walter

I don't see them as incoherent with the image of the character I have. My take on Cat is that she wants to win much more than she cares about what prize is at stake or how much she has to spend to do it.

She fought Pilgrim for the same reason she fights Bard, for the same reason she fought the Crusade. No one else gets to win, even Sve Noc agreement comes only after Cat loses.

Liliet

With Sve Noc Cat explicitly still had a good chance of winning, given to her by Akua being a better lawyer than Komena. She discarded a victory in the making, which is what gave the gesture weight enough for the goddesses to claim her as their priestess.

Liliet

Oh, and cypaste from a comment I made on another thread:

““Don't negotiate with terrorists” is a harsh rule, but it was invented for a reason. Catherine had realized it back in Book 1, against Akua as well. It was always nothing more than a trap, a way to turn her tendency to care about people against her.

So yes, she acts like she doesn't. She acts the way someone who doesn't care will act, only with added violent revenge, because that's the way to long term discourage it. She does the exact opposite of what a person making such a threat wants. If she doesn't even deliberate, if she doesn't allow it to affect her at all, then the threat is ineffective and there is no point to using such a tactic ever again.

That's the only way she could secure the safety of all those who could be used against her: by making sure there's no benefit in it.”

Walter

I don't think I'm going to persuade you, but, like, it seems like at the point where someone has a knife to a hundred thousand throats you should maybe abandon the Hard Guy Doctrine as bankrupt and negotiate?

Not to be mean, but, like, she very obviously didn't secure the safety of the people of Liesse, since they all got slaughtered.

It is a recurring theme of the story that dick measuring violence is bad. Everyone Cat meets, basically, ends up in the party once the foreplay is over.

Cat fought Akua and it turned out she needed exactly one fireside chat to become a friend. Now they are fighting together against Malicia. Cat fought Sve Noc and killed a lot of Drow before teaming up. Cat fought the crusaders and dumped a lake on them, killing thousands, before, you guessed it, teaming up against Dead King.

In every one of these cases, Cat would have been better off not fighting. She ended up in the same place, but with lots of bodies. She could have rebelled with Diabolist, could have negotiated with the drow, could have surrendered to Cordelia.

You can go back to the Fae if you want, who fought before friending, back to her legion, where she fought all of her officers before working together. Go back to starting William's rebellion, only to realize Black had always planned for her to be his protégé. It is crabs in buckets all the way, the entire story is beating her in the head to try and get her to understand that it is ok to not be the winner.

magesbe

> It is just weird to describe that as wanting 'peace', yeah? She wants victory! People keep giving her the the option of ending the fighting, and she keeps prolonging it, and her driving goal is for there to be no fighting?

> I mean, okay, if that's the tune the piper's calling, but, like, if you are gonna Greater Good the Wish revelation then what's the point of it? Like, you could have someone whose wish is East East East like a trumpet blowing and they are going west because one day it will let their descendants go east.

I'm probably going to repeat people above because I feel like you don't understand. Cat doesn't want peace however long it takes for the Dead King to screw over Calernia again, and he will because it isn't in his nature to be contained. She doesn't want peace until Praes decides that since it's lost all control over Callow they should invade again. She wants a peace that will span for many generations. She goes to war to remove the likelihood of future wars, or at least the kind of future war that's basically a nonstop series of war crimes. If someone has internal injuries, you may need surgery to fix them. Assuming anesthetic isn't a thing, it will probably hurt a lot. But it needs to be done or they're just going to get worse.

Cat isn't being offered lasting peace by anyone. She's being offered a number of versions; temporary peace, 'peace' but actually war and oppression (that's what Akua offered), and 'technically peace but you might as well be at war because it's just as bad.'

Speaking of Akua. Submitting to Akua would be a terrible idea. She was basically a wannabe Triumphant, and was going to fuck over the entire continent extremely hard. Callow would once again be a battle field, this time Praes vs Praes. And she'd be expected to side with a monster and actively fight against her mentor, which would just make the war worse. Sure Liesse would survive. But it's like a terrorist threat. Sure giving in will save lives. But the whole is more important than that.

And a false concession would last probably days at best, because it would require Cat actively turning against her current allies, not just watching and waiting. After all, if Akua doesn't turn the people of Liesse into zombies, her army is much weaker and thus must compensate by having Cat take her army and help.

Liliet

^

"Don't negotiate with terrorists" is a harsh rule, but it was invented for a reason. Catherine had realized it back in Book 1, against Akua as well. It was always nothing more than a trap, a way to turn her tendency to care about people against her.

So yes, she acts like she doesn't. She acts the way someone who doesn't care will act, only with added violent revenge, because that's the way to long term discourage it. She does the exact opposite of what a person making such a threat wants. If she doesn't even deliberate, if she doesn't allow it to affect her at all, then the threat is ineffective and there is no point to using such a tactic ever again.

That's the only way she could secure the safety of all those who could be used against her: by making sure there's no benefit in it.

Aaaand the guy I want to reply to is probably never going to see it.

My keyboard works again, though. Yay?

aran

Unspoken Plan Guarantee, in trope parlance. The story can't wreck your off-screen plan for drama if there is no plan.

aran

They were significantly better than anyone else at spontaneous lapidation, for example.

"It's all the practice, I think," Kairos told his trusted attendants.

That's Abigail's bit you're stealing there, Kairos

aran

This thing has been foreshadowed quite a bit, hasn't it? Hierarch has been threatening to put the gods themselves on trial for ages.

Interlude: Suffer No Compromise In This

*"Fifth of all Choirs, sternest Judgement
They who cannot abide the repugnant;
None more farsighted than the Tribunal,
And none as even-handed or as brutal."*

– Extract from the 'Hymn of Hymns', Atalantian sacred text (declared heresy in Procer and Callow)

Anaxares had been a boy when he'd first heard the song of rage.

He'd been seven when thousands boiled through the streets of Bellerophon in wrath, for the lot-drawn iakas had mismanaged the People's wheat and rationing was announced. He'd heard myriad voices howling out the same displeasure, like a great beast made up of an entire city, and it had been a thing of awe. So many voices, all telling of the same belief: this may be, yet this is not how it should be. The iakas were dragged out one and all, and before the citizens they had failed were made to answer for that failure. Tribunals were called by the People, held by the People, and the People handed down their bloody verdict. As a boy he'd watched the fear on the faces of the iakas with curiosity, but it had felt distant. Like a glimpse of another world entirely. His own was easier grasped for it was made up of the pounding of a thousand feet, the shouts of a thousand throats. The people, he'd dimly grasped then, were the river that carried them all. No single man nor woman could command the current, and like any capricious river-god it could bathe or drown as its whims demanded. What purpose was there to fear, when naught of this could be changed? And so Anaxares the Diplomat had let the river take him where it would, beyond care or worry.

Yet the river had brought him to a shore where none of the people should ever know.

What a terrible thing it had been, to watch the sole thing he truly believed in turn against itself. Your services to the people have made you a Person of Value, the kanenas had told him. And in that blasphemous betrayal the seed of a greater folly was planted, for the People cast their vote for Anaxares the Diplomat and that worst of treasons saw him elected the Hierarch of the Free Cities. Long had he wondered of this, of the purpose to it. Could there even be one? Forbidden to take his own life through action or inaction by the decree of the People, he had been left to wallow in the absurdity of his continued breath. And with every moment the world had hounded him for further treasons, flies swarming to him like they would to carrion. Named and kings and queens, princes high and low, a buzzing flock of foreign despots that wanted him to sit at their table and pretend they were anything more than ticks sucking the blood out of those they claimed to be ruling. And all the while Kairos Theodosian, Helike's bloody son, had taken the spurs to his flanks until this day came. This hour, this moment, this reckoning for all the many balances left uneven.

Anaxares was not blind. He knew well the Tyrant had paved the road to this for his own foul reasons. It did not matter to him, for the destination was of his own choice, and no part save that one weighed on the scales. It'd been a choice forged in that terrible, lucid moment where the creature that called itself the Wandering Bard had tried to clap him in chains, but he had not grown to regret it since. Anaxares had been a boy, when he'd first heard the song of rage, but he heard it still as a man grown. It had stayed with him, seeped into his bones, and as the great despots of the east and the west entered under his watchful gaze the tune was so loud he grew deaf to all that was being spoken. The Tyrant flew above on his gargoyle-carried throne – a familiar twitch of revulsion went through him at the sight, the clenching muscle of Thrones Are An Unforgiveable Abomination Unto The People, To Be Met With Scorn And Thrown Rocks – and addressed the lot of them, weaving his exact truths into the finest of lies. The song ebbed low, though it did not leave, and the Hierarch cut in through the chatter.

"Be seated or you will be expelled," Anaxares stated.

"Lord Hierarch," a fair-haired woman said. "I greet you-"

The diplomat twitched.

"There are no lords in a court of the People," Anaxares of Bellerophon coldly said. "Neither crowns nor the petty tyrannies of those claiming them are of any weight here. Be seated presently or you will be expelled-"

He did not know her name, unfortunately, and so glanced at the Tyrant in question. The mad boy grinned back.

"Cordelia Hasenbach," the king of Helike helpfully provided.

Was she? It would explain why she might be under the mistaken impression her words carried authority here.

"Yes," Anaxares said, "that."

His eyes swept the crowd, recognizing only a single face: Catherine Foundling, the so-called Queen of Callow. The Black Knight of Praes was not here, which was displeasing. The man had also committed crimes under the laws of the League and would not have been unfit to stand trial today, were he present. A woman at the back of the pack, bearing a large unstrung bow, raised her hand.

"Speak," Anaxares said.

"Is that the Dead King?" she asked, pointing behind him.

There did indeed seem to be some sort of crowned skeleton there, the Hierarch noted. It was holding a cup full of blood, which after a long moment he was forced to concede was not against any law he knew of. The diplomat once more cast a glance at the Tyrant, who equivocated with a wiggled palm.

"More or less," Anaxares replied.

She raised her hand again, to his irritation.

"Speak," he repeated.

"I see the Dead King got refreshments," the woman said. "Which is most terribly unfair, as we have not."

"That is not a question," the Hierarch peevishly told her.

It was, however, true. And damning. Anaxares turned to glare at the Tyrant.

"My staff are on it," the boy assured him.

It would suffice. He was not concerned with the matter beyond the perception of willingly allowed imbalance.

"I will not repeat myself a third time," Anaxares bluntly said. "All attending must take their seats or depart."

There was offended shuffling from the band of Avaricious Foreign Oligarchs, but they heeded the reminder. Not that the diplomat spared them much attention, not when the accused himself was stepping forward. The White Knight, Hanno of Arwad. No longer a citizen of Ashur by their own laws, inquiries to the Thalassocracy had established, and seemingly claimed by no one in particular. No one mortal, that was. The White Knight was a tall and solid man, plain of face but of calm bearing, and he strode to the stand reserved for the accused without need for prompting. Anaxares approved. He waited until the man stood amidst the gutted altar to Above before speaking up.

"I am Anaxares of Bellerophon," he informed the Named. "The elected Hierarch of the Free Cities."

"I know who you are, Anaxares the Diplomat," the White Knight replied.

The afternoon sun filtered in through the stained glass and the gaping walls, casting the court in mixed and coloured light. It made the White Knight seem as if he had been painted on, as if this entire court of law was some delirious stretch of Arcadia. Anaxares remained seated at his table, facing the accused with a quill in hand and the parchments he had prepared for this day ready.

"Then you know why you stand now before me," the Hierarch said. "A grievance was lodged by a member of the League concerning crimes you committed, and my judgement was sought over the matter."

"I am not a citizen of any nation of the League," the White Knight said.

That was true, and to be entered in the record, though of no repercussion on the proceedings.

"That is irrelevant," Anaxares flatly replied. "Crimes committed against citizens of the League on the grounds of the League fall under its jurisdiction nonetheless."

He paused.

"I am told," the Hierarch said, "that you willingly agreed to submit yourself to judgement."

If so, that was a principled action. Not one that mattered in the slightest when it came to culpability, but the principle was laudable regardless.

"I agreed to stand trial," the White Knight corrected.

"Then as is allowed the laws of the League of Free Cities, you are allowed to request someone to advocate in your name," Anaxares said. "So long as they are a citizen of a member-nation, that is."

"I have volunteered to serve as your defender, should you desire it," the Tyrant called out. "Otherwise a band of seven candidates was arranged."

Those had already been refused, which the boy knew even if he now implied otherwise, and so Anaxares made note of the Tyrant's petty obstruction.

"Your candidates were judged unlawful," the Hierarch reminded the Tyrant. "Gargoyles are not citizens, even when words indicating otherwise are painted on them."

His gaze turned to the former Ashuran.

"While remaining here in containment, you have an hour to send for such an advocate should you so wish," Anaxares informed him. "Or you may accept the offer of the Tyrant of Helike."

"It was my understanding," the White Knight said, "that it was the grievance of the Lord Tyrant that led to this trial."

A moment passed.

"That is correct," Anaxares conceded.

"I would seek to be impartial in both offices, naturally," Kairos Theodosian cheerfully assured the accused, "You have my solemn vow in this."

"A kind offer," the White Knight drily said. "I will be serving as my own advocate, Hierarch. Who is to be my accuser?"

The song stirred at the man's mellow manner, the way he seemed to take none of this seriously. Anger, anger the white-clad killer who had walked the Free Cities and killed as he pleased and never once thought there might consequence to this. That a Name and the blessing of angels set him beyond such petty matters.

"There is no accuser," the Hierarch harshly stated. "Your crimes are not in dispute, they are a matter of known record as certified by sworn witnesses from Delos, Stygia, Helike and Nicae."

"Then the actions you deem as crimes should be listed, should they not?" the White Knight said. "Unless you intend to simply pass sentence."

"I deem or dismiss nothing," the Hierarch said, grinding his teeth. "The law is writ, and known to any who care to know it."

He brought forward the first parchment, his own familiar writing providing the list that the Named was asking for.

"Murder of citizens of Helike and Stygia is the first charge," Anaxares said. "On one hundred and seventy-three counts assured, forty-two alleged with proof in only the second degree."

Which was to say, less than two witnesses and no writ evidence.

"You speak of soldiers," the White Knight said, "fought in time of war."

"In time of war between members of the League of Free Cities," the Hierarch said. "You are not a citizen, and so not legally part of such a war, unless you took coin as mercenary in the service of a lawful government. Do you here claim to have done so?"

"I do not," the White Knight said, "though I worked in lawful accord with the Secretariat in the defence of Delos and with the permission of Strategos Nereida Silantis in the defence of Nicae."

"The Secretariat has provided records that put truth to your words," Anaxares acknowledged. "Basileus Leo Trakas, who speaks for Nicae, has declined to do so. Yet in the absence of payment from Delos that would qualify you as a mercenary in the employ of the Secretariat, the point is irrelevant. The askretis cannot absolve a crime, only abet it."

Anaxares reached for his papers, where he had put to ink the names he could not all remember. There were many, some he had known when he was still entirely a diplomat.

"You also murdered sitting members of the Magisterium, the exact list of your victims being-"

"Has the Magisterium then made complaint to the League?" the White Knight interrupted.

The song rose in pitch at the interruption, not for the words themselves but at the disrespect for the trial they implied.

"It has not," the Hierarch replied, brow creasing in displeasure. "It has, however, granted rights to another party to seek redress in its name."

"That would be me," the Tyrant gleefully said.

"That is correct," the Hierarch agreed. "You have also attempted to murder the ruling king of Helike-"

"Also me," the Tyrant added, still with unseemly glee.

"- and in the attempt claimed to hold the authority to pass judgement over King Kairos Theodosian of Helike," Anaxares continued unflinchingly.

"That is incorrect," the White Knight said.

Someone in the benches loudly cursed, but the Hierarch paid it no mind.

"Speak now, if you would amend the record," Anaxares said. "It has until now been understood that in your role as the White Knight you spoke for the Choir to which you are sworn and passed judgement in their stead."

Was the man now renouncing the authority bestowed upon him by the Choir, in an attempt to exempt it from consequence? If so, it was a cowardly thing.

"I do not judge," Hanno of Arwad said, "and passed no judgement over the Tyrant of Helike. The judgement was passed by the Tribunal, and I sought to execute the sentence it as is my duty."

The song, oh the song swelled. This was, Anaxares understood, so much worse than he had believed. Had the Tyrant known? No, that did not matter. Law was law, no matter what capering gargoyle brought it to the fore. Yet mistakes here could not be allowed.

"Clarify what you mean by 'the Tribunal'," the Hierarch ordered.

"The Choir of Judgement," the White Knight replied.

"You then allege," Anaxares slowly said so there could be no mistake, "that the Seraphim of the Choir of Judgement have claimed the right to pass judgement over citizens of the League?"

"It is not a subtle thing, what you attempt," the White Knight told him. "Do you understand this? That you have not tricked or fooled any in this hall. That your intent is clear as day."

"What I attempt," Anaxares of Bellerophon softly repeated. "As if this were some sort of plot, a scheme against you or your masters. Is that what you believe, Hanno of Arwad? That the Seraphim and your service of them are owed abeyance? That the world entire is to twist and bend to your verdicts, unasked for and unsought?"

We are all of us free, the song whispered in his ear, or we are none of us free.

"Madness," the White Knight said, "is no excuse for baring steel at the Heavens."

"If the Heavens would have part in this trial," the Hierarch coldly said, "they may be seated and silent, like the rest of the gallery. Speak not otherwise of those that cannot be called to account."

"This will not end as you wish, Hierarch," the White Knight calmly said. "Yet if you cannot be turned aside so be it: the Choir of Judgement acknowledges none to be beyond its jurisdiction, save for the Gods Above."

The song filled him, up to brim, but that wroth was as much his own as the tune's.

"There is no law, writ or known, that grants this right to the Choir of Judgement," Anaxares of Bellerophon said with excruciating calm.

"And yet it is theirs nonetheless," the White Knight said.

We are all of us free, the song hissed in his ear, or we are none of us free.

"No," the Hierarch coldly said. "It is not. And if it would pretend otherwise, let it stand before this court and defend that crude arrogance."

"I warned you," the White Knight sadly said.

Power coursed around the court, first the distant weavings the Tyrant had laid around this place and then the blooming protections the tyrants high and low garbed themselves in out of fear. And then it came, the answer he had asked for. There was no ceiling above them, nothing save the cloudless blue sky, and through it the wroth of Judgement came down on him.

The Hierarch burned.

The Tribunal gazed down upon him, and its fury broke his bones and scoured his flesh. All around him shattered, even the very ground, and even as his body tore apart claws dug into his mind. Force him to look where they would, to see what they wished him to see. Before his eyes unfolded and endless shifting tapestry, made from all the decisions that were made and could be. The depth was... too much to grasp. The threads of every action and consequence, of the reasons and the endings. This was, the Hierarch grasped, what the Seraphim saw. The truth of their judgement. And as he tried to parse it, he felt his mind begin to unravel. He could have looked away. It would have spared him the horrendous pain going through every fiber of who he was. But that would be admitting that their judgement was right. That it was correct, for they knew things mortals could not. And so as he stared unblinking Anaxares of Bellerophon found oblivion snaking her arms around him. Oblivion, and with it would come rest. Would that not be a relief? And yet there was one thing he could not help but see.

It was a woman, carving words into a stele of stone that somehow reminded him of a great bird's corpse. Around her was a sea of people in rags, thin and sickly and hungry. Yet there was something in their eyes, as they looked at the stele and the woman, that made him want to weep. And the words, oh the words he knew them. Every child born of Bellerophon knew them. All are free, or none. Ye of this land, suffer no compromise in this. The woman was wounded, bleeding within, and with the last letter she died. But the words, the words stayed. And as the city rose around them, around the stele, blood splashed stone. Suffer no compromise in this, the stele had told them, and so they did not. And they bled and they bled and they bled, and they bled but they never bowed. Not once did they look at the world, even at the very bottom of the pit, and bend their neck. It would have been easy, light as a feather. And perhaps they would have been better for it. And from mother to son, father to daughter, the words on the stele had carried down. Until they ended up told to a small boy, who one day would be a diplomat. Suffer no compromise in this, Anaxares thought, and the world sang it with him.

His body was a ruin yet there was a need for it, and so the Hierarch decided it would have to Mend.

Bones set back in place, soldered by will, and flesh knit itself anew. Teeth made by heat into black and broken stones flew back into his mouth as the table and the chair snapped back into place. The Hierarch of the Free Cities dipped his quill into the inkwell, tongue lolling out of his half-broken mouth as it reformed.

"This will be added to the record as evidence of guilt," he informed the Choir.

Attempted murder of a sitting judge of the court, he penned. The Seraphim had expressed their displeasure yet not bothered to attend, but that would not be enough to spare them judgement earned. Mind clear and still as a pond, the Hierarch closed his eyes and allowed himself to Receive what he required. Silhouettes stood before his gaze, bearing each six wings of bronze and a conviction like a fire that nothing could put out. They gazed back, and in their fury struck again. The world broke, and Anaxares with it, but without pause it was mended anew.

"Petulance," the Hierarch said. "I address now the Seraphim of the Choir of Judgement, also known as the Tribunal, and Indict you for the following crimes-"

They smote him again, and he mended. It did not matter, for now his Name sang and filled the world. As it had in Rochelant, a blank slate on which all could write their accusations and have them known by all.

"- despotism high and low, arrant and illegal intervention in League affairs, attempted regicide –"

The Tyrant of Helike was laughing, he realized as he mended anew.

"- disturbance of the court, three –"

It was desperate now, the burning that consumed him tinted with dismay.

"- four times," the Hierarch adjusted. "And repeated attempted murder. Given the overwhelming evidence-"

It no longer hurt, the Hierarch mused as he mended, as if the ability to feel pain had been scoured out of him.

"- the verdict cannot be in doubt," he continued. "I pronounce you guilty and sentence you to-"

The words choked in his mouth, for something has seized his throat. Not the Tribunal, no. It was a great presence but not that, and as the grip tightened around his throat the Seraphim prepared to strike again.

"I win," Kairos Theodosian laughed.

And the grip was gone.

Mammon

First thought on this chapter: Ha, it's fun how I immediately know that Cat's the one that cursed and... Oh no, Cat cursed when Hanno said something. This is bad...

Second thought: Can I get some recognition that in this story, THIS story, one of the most badass moments we've seen is a man mending not only himself together but also his selfmade table and quill so that he can write down something while being smitten again whilst still mending?

Third thought: Oh crap, Hierophant is here to see all of this. Either providence must really be in a tight spot to allow this, or they've really been pushing the scales to allow Below to propagate their own bit of providence to enable Masego to see this. And after we've seen it confirmed in the last chapter or maybe the one before that, that Masego is still one of the more heavy-hitting Named.

Sun Dog

Magic may have fled him, but the Hierophant is still the man who vivisects gods and miracles.

daegone823

The Gods Below are painting a Fresco with demonic painters with bone brushes and blood pastels.

The tyrant laughing surrounded by gargoyles dressed in human cloth, the dead king casually sipping a cup of blood. The Judge(hierarch) half broken half mended as he continues to write down the heaven's objections. The white Knight standing resplendent pridefully shining the heaven's tool through and through.

The crowd Calernia Nations leaders as a dark Queen face palms her forehead, near her a Blind man stares in awe, while a woman with a giant bow is served a drink by a gargoyle.

This was the day that the heavens paid for there sins, they were brought to task.

Mary Gentle

Love this. I can see this SO clearly.

Including the figure in the front row of a blonde Prince, with her lips pursed up like a cat's bum. 😊

daegone823

You know the sad thing is the angels are like well win we always win we are good, don't worry every thing is going to turn around now(Angel forced to resurrect a villain)...any time now(Holy Crusade fails)... any(Dead King invades)... time now(Saint withers away/Pilgrim stabs himself)...(Trial of the century).

.....

Okay guys I think it time we accept that things have gone down hill way fast.

laguz24

I like to think they have yearly board reviews, It's like, "Let's see, Contrition, you resurrected a villain, Endurance, you failed to protect your chosen hero, Judgement, you got judged by a Villain. Mercy, you made a deal with the same villain that forced a resurrection out of Contrition. Seriously what is with you all this year, we are seriously in the red on victories this quarter."

Mammon

A bureaucracy demon strolls in Hate to interrupt your meeting guys, but Mercy, if I can have a minute? This is about that paradox you've gotten yourself in with the Tyrant. Technically he did win, so he didn't lie, meaning you smitten him for telling the truth. Which puts you in an even more nasty position because now you've not only gone and done this but also did it on unrighteous claims. And our current favourite dead boi is going to press charges.

NerfContessa

You paint a picture we all saw with better words than ours.

Thank you.

As for the chapter, this is exactly what I 3xp3c5ed. That does not detract from its power and meaning in the slightest.
Wow.

NerfContessa

At a reread 8 9nce again am awed, and would really like to know the full story of the founding of bellerophon and the dying hero who did it.

Amazing stuff.

Blue1ao

Yo what this is crazy I'm loosing it

Liliet

"one of the most badass moments we've seen is a man mending not only himself together but also his selfmade table and quill so that he can write down something while being smitten again whilst still mending?"

Oh.

Oh, you're right.

Holy shit I love this story.

Big I

I for one applaud the Hierarch's adherence to the rule of law. The Tribunal has no standing to pass judgment except through force of arms.

I'm reminded of a quote from the writings of the late great Terry Pratchett, which I will paraphrase : "The law applies to everyone, or it's not the law. It's just a way to keep people down."

And another one: "There's nothing the gods hate more than a fireproof atheist."

miles

Force of arms is the only thing which enables any entity to pass judgment, as conservative media like to remind us.

Mary Gentle

The usual democratic social contract is that the state has the monopoly of coercive force, but uses it only under the law decided by all. Ultimately, if that contract is broken severely or often enough, the state fails, as it fails to hold that monopoly.

Not that I think a world in which angels can stick their fingers into mortal affairs would work like that – up until now, at least, any state on Cat's continent has been outgunned in terms of force of arms, simply by virtue of the ability of Above or Below to exert superior force of ... miracle, I guess.

Hence why, if the Hierarch can judge, the world changes.

Except I suppose that what the Hierarch has done also allows the direct presence of Below. If Seraphim can turn up, who's to say that Devils can't arrive next?

If they don't – why not? They're facing an absolutely open goal. Plus, if a Devil does turn up in the Hierarch's court, s/he will probably have the sense to follow its rules... and subvert them. I heart Kairos, but I wonder if he's thought through what having a direct agent of evil here might do?

If he has anticipated it – there'll be even more fun. 😊

Mental Mouse

Below does have their agents here – two top-tier Named up front, with more in the gallery.

laguz24

That is an argument between above and below. Below thinks Might makes Right or Right makes. While Above thinks Right makes might, or Right makes. They are both wrong.

daegone823

No offence but a fire proof atheist might have to accept he has now become a god himself. Please someone write this story lol, we have a good beginning with the hierarch.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

Then we will have a God of Atheism.

If you lose your doubts and start believing in Him you will be damned forever.

Mammon

Atheists can believe in a god of Atheism, as long as said god can be explained scientifically and be proven reliably in modern times. The notion that such a being once explained would still be called a god rather than a more apt name likely synonymous to their original name is to underestimate humanity's ability to give new names to things.

The God of Atheism is actually an Accumbinant whose powers are generated from a totally scientifically explainable collective charging of the people who rely on him through calming the parietal lobe until the nucleus accumbens is activated combined with the release of oxytocin hormones specifically aimed at the name and image of this so-called 'God' to power them through a to them specific psionic wavelength of power freely given.

So take your theistic nonsense and leave this place, plebian, and let us good atheists continue meditating in order to power the Great and Mighty Carl who was once but a simple Accountant until he ascended into Super-Carl who now fights demons and guides our culture and society with his vast wisdom. Which of course we oppose until it has been properly proven that he is indeed suitable for dictating culture and law and/or has the omniscience that he has been hypothesised to be capable of.

Shveiran

The Hierarch doesn't adhere to the Rule of Law, he adheres to his idea of Law.

The difference is between holding a convict accountable because he broke a law that binds the whole community, and demanding someone abroad behaves like you think they should / like your laws say you and your countrymen have to.

Yes, that is what the Tribunal does.

No, the Hierarch dealing it back to them does not make it right.

A wrong is a wrong, even when you do it to someone who has wronged others.

ninegardens

I mean... to be fair, he was very much holding Hanno to Account for laws broken IN HIS COUNTRY.

He doesn't get tangled up in anything the foreigner does in foreign lands, just what he did while visiting.

If a Dutch person smokes weed in the US, they can still be charged under drug laws, even if Weed is legal in the Neatherlands. Probably the US wouldn't go after them once they left the juristiction, but that's more to do with severity of the crime, not legality of it.

Or perhaps put another way.... If the US or Russia or any other super power were to say... use drone strikes in some other country, the fact that the superpower thinks this is legit does nothing to change the fact that the government of that country may well desire to charge those soldiers as murders given the chance... and if they got the chance to charge the generals giving the orders instead, would that seem like an overstep?

To me it wouldn't. To me the generals saying "Oh, but we have better intelligence than you and that person really was bad" would mean nothing to the judicial system of the smaller country which would be like "You can't show up here and drone strike people just because you say so".

This is just Heirarchs Idea of the law, this is what's written down.

Shveiran

There are several problems I see with this reasoning.

1) The interactions between jurisdictions are not based on rules of nature, as jurisdiction doesn't exist; they are based on international treaties agreed by enough nations they became the norm in our world.

There is no evidence Calernia has nothing of the sort, and I doubt they exist since the Accords are going to be groundbreaking especially because there is no precedent for a standing agreement between this many kingdoms of different positions in the Good-Evil spectrum.

Without an agreement on jurisdiction, Anaxares is saying "MY law says I can judge you" giving zero fucks to what the other laws say (most relevant among which are the Procerans', on whose ground they stand, and the Tribunal's, of which Hanno is a "citizen").

He has no jurisdiction, because jurisdiction requires an agreement between nations. What he has, is a claim that he does signed by himself.

2) he is holding him accountable for trump up charges. The powers' Hanno fought on behalf of either confirmed the association with him or were bullied by the Tyrant in order to ensure they did not.

The "but you took no money" claim makes no sense.

3) he is holding Hanno accountable for killing soldiers in a war he didn't cause on League territory, while being on NON-League territory at the head of an invading army who answers to him and that killed many, including procerans, aka the non-foreigners in this land the League has invaded. That's like being judged for theft by a judge that robs banks and a jury of pick-pockets.

Bottom line, if you find what he is doing morally justifiable?

Fine. I mean, I don't, but this is a judgment call. Not that you needed my approval nor anything, but you get what I mean: I disagree, but you don't have to change your view because of it.

If you wish to argue that he has a legal case? No, that I really can't agree with. It's a matter of professional pride, you understand 😊

Amicus Curiae

My professional judgment is different than yours. If we take what the Hierarch is saying at face value, he is not trying to impose his own personal law, or that of his own city, on anyone. He explicitly is trying Hanno for actions taken by Hanno against citizens of league cities, in league city territories. The Hierarch explains here that there are established league laws governing conflicts between the free cities in their territories. Citizens may fight on behalf of their city, and so can paid mercenaries, but outsiders are not permitted to simply show up and volunteer to start killing people. The issue of whether Hanno was paid seems like a technicality (which doesn't mean it doesn't legally matter, of course), but on reflection I sort of see a sort of sense in the law. Mercenaries taking pay at least have a clear and known reason and incentive to take direction from league member authorities, and so perhaps may be counted on to show greater obedience to league authorities, and follow any codes governing how one conducts war.

Normally, there would be jurisdictional issues. And perhaps normally the Hierarch might ignore these. But here, Hanno has waived any jurisdictional defenses by willingly submitting himself to this trial, and the First Prince of Procer has clearly consented to this trial taking place on Procer's soil. So right I think Hanno's trial is completely legitimate.

A thornier question is any judgment the Hierarch seeks to render on the Tribunal. I would think that the Tribunal's actions would have to be adjudicated under Proceran law, by a Proceran judicial body—though the Hierarch's court presumably has some sort of inherent authority to punish contempt of court, which attempting to kill the Hierarch certainly qualifies as.

Liliet

A clear illustration of why this law would exist is Amadeus's actions in that very same law. Note how Hierarch notes it's a shame he didn't show up because he'd make a fine target too. A foreign provocateur who arrives specifically to foster war on their own initiative? Yeah, they have laws against that. And Delosi should have explained this to Hanno and insisted on paying him at least a symbolic sum, if they didn't want to fuck him over.

ninegardens

You make a fine case.

In terms of "Is he morally justifiable", I think I would say something to the effect of "Him calling out the Angels as being an alien force that maybe shouldn't get involved is legit. That doesn't change that he is a dangerous crazy person, whose ethics is bunk".

I think I was specifically arguing with "The difference is between holding a convict accountable because he broke a law that binds the whole community, and demanding someone abroad behaves like you think they should / like your laws say you and yoru countrymen have to."

in that Hanno was IN Hierarchs community when shit was going down. THIS MATTERS. The fact that Hanno left afterwards is irrelevant.

In response to your other comments:

"1) The interactions between jurisdictions are not based on rules of nature, as jurisdiction doesn't exist; they are based on international treaties agreed by enough nations they became the norm in our world."

Right- and in this case we specifically have the leaders of Procer, and Hanno himself in some sense handing over a mandate. They may be granting such a mandate due to diplomatic pressure, but that is hardly Hierarchs business.

It is totally legit for Heirarch to say "You broke a law in our country, and given the opportunity, I will hold you accountable for it". The fact that this normally doesn't happen is a comment on the practicalities of international diplomacy and power, not a comment on how Law functions.

"2) he is holding him accountable for trumped up charges. The powers' Hanno fought on behalf of either confirmed the association with him or were bullied by the Tyrant in order to ensure they did not. The "but you took no money" claim makes no sense."

The Phrase "trumped up charges" seems to imply that the charges are untrue.

Are you trying to argue here that the charges are stupid (based on their being a stupid law), or that they are false.

If the later, do we have any reason to believe the charges are false?

If the former, then yes, I agree, the charges ARE stupid. But you specifically claim that he doesn't have a LEGAL case. If the heirarch is making stupid judgements using his stupid laws this erodes his moral case, but not his legal one. And unless you happen to have a legal degree from the university of Bellephorone then I'm not sure how you would make this argument.

"3) he is holding Hanno accountable for killing soldiers in a war he didn't cause on League territory, while being on NON-League territory at the head of an invading army who answers to him and that killed many, including procerans, aka the non-foreigners in this land the League has invaded.

That's like being judged for theft by a judge that robs banks and a jury of pick-pockets. "

Okay, so here's a question, suppose you have a war veteran how serves time for his country, then becomes a judge, and then is asked to preside over a murderer. Do they have a mandate?

I'm not saying its the same, I agree, Hierarch is clearly crazy, and I'm not arguing his moral case. But at the same time Heirarchs point is "Legally, you are not a soldier. What the hell are you doing killing people on our streets?"

Sure, he has soldiers, but they are legit part of a war. Heck, at the moment they are part of a peace conference.

Put another way.... if there was a civil war in... say... Australia... and someone British dude showed up with a magical rocket launched and mech armour and took a side in that war, because they had opinions on some other countries stuff.... would a judge from Perth later have the mandate to prosecute? If they were in England, and the English crown and the accused said that they could.

....

Actually, now that I think about it, a lot of modern analogues, and ethical/legal arguments start to fall apart, simply because the modern world is not BY DEFAULT in a state of war. Now peace is the expected norm as opposed to "Everyone is eyeing each others borders all the time".

I'm not really sure how to parse the ethical/legal difference between "Soldier in a war" and "Random Murderer", particularly when we involve mercenaries, thrillseekers, very opinionated foreigners with super weapons etc.

Point 3 is probably your most compelling point, hence why I am most confused on it. Point 2 seems the weakest to me, on the grounds that "Trumped up charges" and "Very stupid laws" seem like separate things.

Majeflyer

Re Jurisdiction 1).

Jurisdiction is likely to emerge because there are borders. While there is no system for extradition and treaties regarding this like there is today, It is generally understood that if there is a crime in the Netherlands, France is not responsible for enforcing justice, the Netherlands govt is. But what in particular started this distinction? At what point in time did the Netherlands and France gain this respective power over it's citizens? This in this particular story, jurisdiction and government territorial sovereignty would be etched into "Natural Law" through story, repetition, and custom over time making the process ingrained. The narrative that certain lands within a country's borders are subject and subordinate to the ruling government of the country becomes naturalised and the country becomes "stable". Encroachment upon that "Natural Law" by a foreign agent is unnatural, and should be stopped.

What makes The Diplomat of Bellerophon so important here is that his justice is given to him by the people. His story is justice, in that at any time, those watching him may remove him from his power, but they give him consent to wield the power of law, more-so than any other king or emperor or named. As he has been named a Person of Value, he has become a representative of the people of an entire nation's will. As "The Story" is often swayed by social constructions, this investment of power into the Hierarch makes him not only backed by the ongoing role of the unitedness of the league, but by the children's stories... the cultural fabric of Bellerophon. . This belief in the Hierarch makes him a hero of Bellerophon. This is crazy, because Bellerophon normally can't have Named, having them would mean that there is an unjust tyranny of power that some hold over another. The rarity of such also increases his power (through the narrative rule of the "exceptional exception" to the world). This power and justice is enough to see a natural hierarchy that has presided over the rest of the world overturned (Angels > Named > Demons > humans > Non-human entities.) This is a huge precedent that not only affects the Choir of Judgement, but all celestial entities, This trial is a declaration of power.

Good lord that was rambling

Archayts

My theory for Kairos's "I win" statement:

We have seen before that Kairos himself doesn't know ahead of time whether a statement he makes about the future is true or false:

"This is not," Kairos Theodosian guffawed, "the last you've seen of me."

Mismatched eyes going wide, he looked up and waited. A moment passed and he did not die.

It appears Mercy is the arbiter for these statements. Now, especially in a trial setting, if you are the arbiter of a matter, you cannot participate directly with it.

So when Karos says "I win" it effectively forbids Mercy from making Kairos a liar by forcing Mercy into the arbiter's role and this is why their grip disappears.

Liliet

I'd say that's pretty close!

Questionare

I saw it coming from a mile away and yet somehow my expectations for this event and the entire story have been thoroughly shattered. Might as well rename the story to just A Practical Guide seeing how Good has been shown to be completely ineffectual one way or another. You would expect some actual meaningful conflict between good and evil in a story literally titled Practical Guide to Evil.

greatwyrmgold

I'm not sure what you're talking about. There's been plenty of conflict between Good and Evil, ranging from the Lone Swordsman fighting Catherine the Squire to the freaking war between the greatest powers of Good and Evil on the face of Calernia (which happens to have a few Evil powers eventually join the Good side).

Liliet

I mean it's been established since Book 1 that the practical way to be Evil is to not be evil.

The title was always a huge joke at our expense.

Shveiran

You know what has me really worried?

I just realized this was not the friday cliffhanger yet.

Sinestere

My dear friends, what no one has commented on (that I have seen) is that the attention of the heavens, and the movers and shakers is right here where Kairos wants it to be. It's the greatest show in the world right now. What is Kairos up to while everyone is watching this circus? Maybe other things are happening while everyone is distracted?

roobee

The interesting thing about this story is that you can't predict it because anything can be spun as following narrative. You could argue for the Heavens winning or losing narratively.

BarthHumphries

Vote:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Typo thread:

The words choked in his mouth, for something has seized his throat.

Change has to had

ninegardens

Fun facts about Heirarch:

Most Champions of Justice are reported to get killed but the choir of judgement while applying (Hanno's origin story interludes).

Hanno himself was considered to have extreme endurance in that he refused to blink under their gaze... while agreeing with them.

Heirarch by contrast doesn't just endure, he endures, sees everything they see, and turns around and says "You are wrong". Which is... pretty hardcore.

greatwyrmgold

I always respect anyone who hears someone claim that the gods/their servants approve of their actions, and asks why the hell that matters. The Republic of Bellerophon has consistently been portrayed in a negative, comedic light, but there's plenty of good in their brand of Evil, and that's the greatest of all. Who the heaven cares that some guy in the sky says you're right, if they're not willing to come to earth to justify that?

Draconic

I just noticed this...

"the Choir of Judgement acknowledges none to be beyond its jurisdiction, save for the Gods Above."

Did the Tribunal just claim to have jurisdiction over the Gods Below? They might be overreaching a bit...

No44

Yeah I'm pretty sure that's their justification for the constant murder of those under the blessing of Those Below. Their whole thing is just judging everything that isn't the gods they see as just or true I think? Like the "only god can judge me" thing. And I doubt they consider Below to be Gods with a capital G.

Satan

Kairos said "I won" at the last moment? Is he trying to lose?

I really appreciate the Hierarch's actions here, hopefully he can judge those who don't follow due trial as befitting of Bellerophon, peerless jewel of the League.

ishouldsleepc104

And that is why the Anaraxes is my favourite character
What a fucking legend

Interlude: A Hundred Battles

*"Under pale moon,
Across the snow
As the dead croon
And flies the crow*

*Did we not lose,
A hundred times?
Did we not win,
A hundred times?*

*Our iron wrought,
Saw use earnest
It rusted not Left unburnished*

*Did we not lose,
A hundred times?
Did we not win,
A hundred times?*

*We came and went,
Unconquered few
We Tyrant's get,
The tried and true*

*Did we not lose,
A hundred times?
Did we not win,
A hundred times?*

*Weep not for us,
For in the annals
Our stele reads thus:
A hundred battles*

*For we did lose,
A hundred times
And we will win,
A hundred times
'till falls the age,
And end the times!"*

– "Dead In A Hundred Battles", Helikean soldier's song

"I win," Kairos Theodosian laughed.

"- death," the Hierarch of the Free Cities said.

The Tyrant wished and the candle was lit.

No heartbeat passed before the wrath of the Choir of Mercy descended upon him: it was immediate and unflinching. Even as his lie echoed across the hall the curse laid upon him by the Grey Pilgrim tightened its grip, seeking to smother him. Ah, it was worth every irksome moment where he'd been denied the pleasure of blatant lies to now have the Peregrine's little mistake smash the Ophanim in the back of the knee just before they could tidy up all the loose ends. Mercy's cold purpose forced against him, an immeasurable sea of pressure against his soul, and the Tyrant of Helike was going to lose this. But he knew, even as his last good eye shrivelled in its socket, that he had bought a candlespan of life before that loss occurred. And that made all the difference in the world, didn't it?

"I have vexed you, I see," the Tyrant gregariously said, addressing Mercy. "Well, if you would allow me a-"

They did not, in fact, allow him a rebuttal. The full weight of the Choir's attention descended upon him and he tasted blood in his mouth, as the Ophanim finally grasped that they would not be allowed to murder the Hierarch before they'd dealt with him. Stories were such a funny thing, weren't they? Like, say, 'wicked villain is sentenced never to lie again by the champion of a Choir, then in a moment of delightful hubris speaks such a lie'. It was the kind of story that'd need a thundering, righteous Choir to smite that uppity servant of Below. Not the sort of thing you could do while simultaneously serving as the hidden knife of the Heavens in someone else's tale. It wouldn't matter that the Choir had the capacity to serve in both roles concurrently. Fate would punish such lackluster commitment with failure on both fronts.

His left knee pulped. The Tyrant was not certain whether that was his own doing or that of the angels, which rather amused him.

Kairos has once been told he would not make it to his thirteen nameday, a prophecy croaked by the dry lips of the ancient thing that laid in the crypt deep beneath Helike. And it'd told it true, it had. A hero might have thought, perhaps, that their kind and benevolent Gods had cured them of their many miseries. Kairos Theodosian knew very well what manner of deity he served, though, and so never once deluded himself into believing this – indeed it was a relief, when he first came into his favourite of his aspects. Wish. What a pretty bauble it had been, seeing the wish of others. Even more so when he learned it could be used to do things, to bridge the gap between the possible and the not. For a price, of course. It was then that he understood the prophecy, forged anew by darker hands.

Twelve times the Tyrant of Helike would be allowed to see come and go the day of the year where he had been Named and die on the dawn of the last. The Gods Below, magnificent monsters that they were, had presented him with a beautiful dilemma: would he spend his thirteen years of reprieve in mediocre obscurity, or would he spend the years to reach for glory? For that was the nature of wishing: all could be had, for a span of the life he might have lived.

"I always was a spendthrift at heart," Kairos confessed. "It is the nature of princes, my friends, to waste the treasuries of their fathers."

Alas, the Choir of Mercy was growing no fonder of him. It must have been quite cross, he mused, that its greatest strength was hamstrung by its own champion. For Mercy was not the mightiest of the Choirs, the most farsighted or the most beloved: it was the most flexible, befitting of its purpose as the tier of loose ends for the Heavens. Yet now it must pass its thread through on very particular needle's head before it could attend to greater purposes, namely the continued existence of Kairos Theodosian. Anaxares, glorious mad son of Bellerophon that he was, was attempting for force his verdict upon the dealers of verdicts, and though he was not succeeding neither was he failing. The Seraphim's crushing strength slid over the Hierarch like water off a duck's back, though his own burning indictment found bite but no flesh: even with Bellerophon's fury at his back, the Choir of Judgement remained the Choir of Judgement.

It was like watching a man attempting to wrestle the sea, and every bit as gloriously absurd as that sounded.

The Ophanim, sadly, did not seem to agree. And in their impatience as finishing to choke out the Hierarch – oh, that one detail must have burned Tariq like acid when he'd emerged at the crucial moment and unleashed his patrons like a dagger in the side – they decided the time for subtlety was past. If a tight grip would not suffice, then a fist would have to serve. The Tyrant, Gods take him if he lied, had no parry against such a stroke. Even simply receiving it would burn through the last of his life in the bat of an eye. Of course he didn't need to have such a parry, not strictly speaking. The Ophanim smiting this entire temple into barren ash would mean...

Darkness flooded the broken House of Light, the cold night soothing Kairos like a cold press as it cooled the blood seeping out of his pores. His head lolled back, the bone of his neck feeling like they were made of wobbling pastry, and he grinned malevolently as a match was struck a mere foot away from him. It was the sole light to be had, and it cast Catherine Foundling's face into sharp relief as she lighted her pipe. She puffed, glowing red embers burning as she did, and spat out long stream of wakeleaf.

"You want to burn Kairos, burn Kairos," his beloved enemy shrugged. "But you don't get to burn the rulers of half the continent with him. Archer's escorting them out, under protection of the Hierophant. Until they're out of the way, hold your hand."

It was a superb thing, the way the Black Queen could so address a Choir and expect to be obeyed. She'd survived so many close calls with angels she'd somehow come to believe she could match them, and through that utterly crazed belief become something that could genuinely give a Choir pause. And so Mercy found itself peering into the Night, wondering if the battle laid out there to be fought would truly result in its victory – and hesitating, for the consequences if it didn't would be utterly disastrous. Against any other foe it would have struck regardless, but Sve Noc? The blood-soaked goddess of theft in victory? Losing might just have consequences. And even the villainess was preventing the full exercise of their power, she was letting through the wrath still shattering him bit by bit. Their hand held, and convulsive laughter escaped his throat until he choked on it. How long would it take for them to grasp that every time she got away with that, she came harder into the story of someone who could get away with that?

"You're about to die," the Black Queen told him.

"Well spotted," Kairos cheerfully replied.

He spat out a thick glob of smoking blood afterwards, but it was well worth the trade.

"Now would be a good time to pay up what you yet owe," the Queen of Callow said.

"Indeed," the Tyrant of Helike mused. "Allow me then to grant you the greatest gift of all."

The red burn of her pipe was the sole light in the dark, and what allowed him to be certain he was addressing her instead of an endless void. It also revealed her sigh.

"It's a monologue, isn't it?" she said, sounding resigned.

His fingers clenched, not out of surprise or dismay but because a swath of flesh and muscle on his arm had gone dead and dried up in the span of a breath, contracting the rest. Yet the rebellions of his own body were nothing new to him and did not truly distract from the great pleasure of having someone who understood. Not someone who agreed or sympathized, for indeed either of those things would have spoiled the broth, but someone who... followed the cast of his dice. It was such a rare, precious thing.

"Gods Below, Catherine," he grinned, "why would it be anything else?"

His throne was half-sunken into the ground now, his attendant gargoyles made rubble, but still he clasped his scepter and his head loosely kept Theodosius' crown. All was as it should be.

"It is said among my people that the hour of death is also the hour of revelation," Kairos said, "for when the distance between life and death grows thin so do the veils that keep our eyes from hidden truths. My own father, for example, called me as grotesque imp as he died. Which was remarkably perceptive for the old drunk, I assure you. Still, I'll admit stabbing him those seventeen times might have served as something of a hint."

Talking should have, by all earthly laws, precipitated his death. Taken him tumbling down the cliff of annihilation, an already strained body and soul snapping like a twig under the added strain. Instead, the Tyrant of Helike found the trembling of his hand slowing, the blood in his throat drying. He was, after all, villain speaking his death-words: earthly laws were the lesser set of those now applying to him.

"I stabbed my father too," the Black Queen mused. "Twice. And it wasn't even the same person both times."

Well, now she was just showing off. And by amusing him doing almost as much to kill him as the angels were, which was quite inconvenient.

"Don't interrupt," Kairos chided. "This is a monologue, not repartee. As I was saying, in the spirit of my rapidly approaching annihilation, I would therefore offer revelations."

And did he not have a great trove of these to spill over the ground, painstakingly gathered one betrayal at a time?

"We begin with the corpse of an angel," the Tyrant of Helike said, "though of course there can be no such thing."

It was months ago he had first dangled that truth in front of her and knew she had been digging after it ever since. As well she should, for it was the very devil in the details – in a manner of speaking.

"In glorious old days," Kairos Theodosian wistfully said, "there was once a woman who broke in Evil as one would break in a stallion. From triumph to triumph did she march, west and ever pursuing, until by the shores of a great lake she met in strife a hundred priests-elect of the Hallowed. And these holy souls did scour themselves to bring forth the great spirit they worshipped, one that cast judgement upon all it beheld, and behold her it did."

Ah, what he would not have done for a glimpse of that grand moment. Truly, there never had been nor ever would be a match to Dread Empress Triumphant.

"For that presumption she slew it," The Tyrant feraly grinned, sharp teeth bared, "bearing tall banner, and wrote her rage in blood across a hundred trembling tribes. That which was not a corpse sunk into deep waters, turning into bones that dreamt, and there was left to slumber. Some across the years learned of this, and of the great works that might wrought from such a thing, but none were so bold as to attempt to make a sword out hallowing petrified."

Ah, but heroes lacked for such beautiful ambitions. The living kin of that dreaming thing came too easily to their help, he'd always thought, and so there was no need for ingenuity unleashed.

"That hoped-for boldness still escapes our kind," he mourned, "but a lesser manner of soul did grow desperate enough."

How could Cordelia Hasenbach not be, when doom covered her home and kin as the south tore itself apart in a war with no end nor meaning? There had been so little left to lose, and in the end the First Prince answered first to duty.

"This is no coincidence," Kairos reminded his peer, "for indeed there are no coincidences. This one least of all, however, for it is a harsh sword long in the swinging. There is a thing out there that delights in intercession —"

He paused, allowing for dramatic arrival should it be in the cards. Only silence answered.

"No?" he mused. "No, I suppose not. Not while the Hierarch still breathes."

Even should she wear a different face when she arrived, Kairos amusedly thought, all that would change would be that the crime of personation with intent to confuse the court would be added to her tally. If it was as he suspected, her very name would prevent her from putting herself in such a situation even should she desire it. Setting aside the thoughts, he returned to the thrust of his speaking, though he did not there was not anger in the Black Queen's eyes. Ah, noticed his little trick had she? That the wards around Lyonceau made escape more difficult when the fabric of Creation was troubled. Which, given the presence of two Choirs in wroth and the high priestess of Night wielding the very stuff, was very much the case. It ought to keep the hostages close long enough for his purposes.

"And that thing, Catherine," he drawled, "it has been waiting a very long time to kill another: one who claims rulership over dust and bones. But is a cautious crown that lairs to the north, one that does not often leave its shell. It took cornering and opportunity, to bait it out. Defeat on the horizon and victory at hand, how could even such a leery thing not be tempted? It scuttled out and lost a finger or two but got to witness the truth of its foe in exchange."

One of his kidneys had just melted, the Tyrant dimly noticed. Oh dear, that was quicker than anticipated. Mercy was refining its technique.

"A fair trade, as these things go," he rasped out.

He mastered his voice a moment later, with great effort.

"It would not have mattered," the Tyrant said, "if not for the hidden sting of augury. You see, there was a plan. A warden for the west, besieged. Her ears open to whispers. And as the sky darkened, inch by inch the finger would tighten until the trigger was pulled."

His only functioning arm snapped up, for the other was a desiccated waste, and he snapped his fingers.

"Death, dead," Kairos said with relish, for it had been a pretty plan indeed. "That was the trick, you see: letting it eat someone's whole world before they mattered, and then make them matter. Too late, then, to shake free of that story and the chains it brings. Quite a bit more would die along with it, of course, but then victory is not without costs. The clever crown caught on early, now, and it flees back to its lair. It would shed the chains binding it for a set more pleasing, if you let it."

He met the Black Queen's gaze, with his bloody red eye.

"Don't let it, Catherine," he said. "It does not deserve this."

He hacked out a wet laugh, for deserving hardly ever mattered.

"And so here we are now, at the crossroads of it all," Kairos Theodosian said. "The crossbow has been forged, and aimed, but the hand that wields it is closed to intercession. Its quarry is a lion rampant, and forewarned, but there are a great many hunters gathering to hunt it. It would lair again, let the danger pass, but it cannot simply vanish – lest it be followed, crossbow in hand. To survive now it must either cow the hunters or break the crossbow."

And even then, the Dead King would not ever truly trust the first of those two. Even cowed, the great Names of Calernia might still be nudged into rolling the dice. It had made striking fresh bargain with it after the Graveyard disappointingly easy. He'd been looking forward to the challenge of convincing Keter to ally again after betraying it so often and cheerfully.

"And so back it went to its old friend Kairos," the Tyrant drawled, "who happened to have a grain of sand on hand that fit that hallowed mechanism quite nicely. There was a need for some expertise to see it through, which was helpfully provided, and now we arrive at the moment of truth.

He grinned, his teeth gone red for the bleeding of his gums.

"Yes, Catherine, I see the question is on the tip of your tongue. Say it."

She studied him, unblinking.

"What happens when a Judgement-corpse is wielded, if Judgement is dead?"

The right question, as he had expected. She had yet to disappoint.

"Truth of truths, my friend," he chortled, "I already gave you the only answer to that question worthy of being spoken."

A Rochelant, when they had first begun this dance of theirs.

"That's the entire point," she softly quoted, "finding out."

He'd be dead long before that riddle was answered, naturally, but what did that matter?

"Now," the Tyrant cheerfully said, "you two distressing damsels stuck bargain with me in Salia, and I promised you a good reason to keep warring on Keter. I am a tyrant of my word, and so here it is: Keter will keep warring on you."

Surprise, for though she was clever and ruthless and dangerous, she did have an inflated sense of the threat she truly represented to an entity like the Dead King.

"Your coalition does not scare the King of Death," Kairos told her, not unkindly, "your petty assembly of armies and treaties which you so wastefully wring your hands over. He fears only one thing in all the world, and I have torn through the perilous nets she wove against him."

The darkness thinned, and the Ophanim wasted no breath in stepping harder on his existence. Kairos spat out blood that looked like boiling pitch, burning a streak down his own chin. The hostages must be close to out of danger, then. Yet it was as had been ordained, for now that he had spoken in pride through the lessened gloom he was allowed to see if his pride was to be deemed arrogance after all. Was the net truly broken? Would a thousand years of fury and madness poured into a single man be enough to humble a Choir? For all his scheming and deals, the truth was that the Tyrant had no idea.

No longer was Anaxares the Diplomat flattened into the ground by angelic verdict, he saw, mended only by stubborn will. Yet that did not mean the Hierarch was winning. It was, to his eye, a shattering deadlock. The will of Judgement was hammering down from the Heavens, to no avail, yet Anaxares' scathing dismissal of that authority was not resulting into his own judgement biting into the Choir's flesh. It was a tight embrace between entities that could not bend and a man that would not. It would not be enough, Kairos saw. In time the Tyrant would be slain, and when that moment came Mercy would choke the life out of the Hierarch.

Too strong. Even after all the schemes and the lies and the hundred petty victories, the servants of the Heavens were simply too strong. Like a rat biting a lion's tail, their rage had been a splendid but doomed gesture. Yet there was glory in that too, the Tyrant of Helike thought. In firing an arrow at the moon and coming close before it fell back down and took you in the throat. Even in defeat he would have no regrets, for –

"If you will not come to me," the Hierarch said, rising to his feet, "then I will come to you."

Anaxares of Bellerophon rose while under angel's wroth, and for that insolence the flesh was peeled from his bones by fervent fire.

"Oh," Kairos breathed out, genuinely moved. "Oh, you splendid madman."

The Hierarch of the Free Cities was swallowed whole by shimmering heat that for a moment chased out of even the darkness of Night. And when it went out, he was gone. The White Knight dropped to the ground living, but unconscious, and the Tyrant of Helike felt a laugh bubble out of his throat. Not a rat biting a lion's tail, how wrong he had been. This was a king swallowing poison. He was with them, now. Standing among them, obstructing like only the sons and daughters of Bellerophon could.

"Gods keep you, Hierarch," Kairos said, and for the first time spoke the title with respect.

Gods Below keep you, Anaxares of Bellerophon, and it is a pride to call you Hierarch of the Free Cities, he thought. Die as you lived, my friend, without peer in your madness.

"And now we have a war, Catherine," the Tyrant of Helike said. "The war that will bring this age to an end, one way or another."

The Black Queen looked at him through the dying gloom, her face a cool mask.

"On your feet, Kairos Theodosian," she said. "That much you are owed, and not a single thing more."

It would have been a lovely thing, he thought, to dance with that one until one of them died of it. A lovely thing indeed. Matted in sweat and blood, one knee a ruin and both legs half-gone, the Tyrant of Helike pushed himself up. He stumbled forward, legs failing him, and knew he would die before he touched the ground. And it came, it came as he knew it would. Like a whisper across his skin, soothing the pain like a kind hand flicking dust away from his shoulder.

Below was watching.

The attention itself was as a question, for what man or woman alive had paid finer dues than the Tyrant of Helike? And so, at this later hour, he was asked for his wish. So many tantalizing possibilities flickered in the back of his mind. Curses that would rend the continent asunder, the strength to wound even the Choir that was about to take his life or even a loop in the hole – a few years more, if he could talk his way into keeping them. O Wicked Gods of mine, do you not know me better than this? All I have ever wanted of you was the answer to a single question, and only in this moment could it be asked. One staggering step forward, and he wet his lips as he spoke.

"lo," he croaked out, "and behold..."

Another step, his knee giving out. If he could only prick his hear, he thought he might...

"I have...slain-" he whispered.

Ahead of him the veil lifted, and terrible light was revealed. And in that moment he finally heard it.

"-the Age of Wonders," the Tyrant finished, smiling with pure childish joy.

And to the sound of applause only he could hear, a moment before light engulfed him, Kairos Theodosian died.

The Hierarch strains my suspension of disbelief, and it's starting to affect my enjoyment. Can someone please help me make sense of this?

I understand narrative is a powerful force multiplier in this universe, but the thing about multipliers is that the number you multiply DOES affect the outcome.

Throughout the story, we saw that narrative doesn't guarantee you a win, it just makes it more likely; which means it has to be possible in the first place.

And power-wise... I'm not sure this adds up.

Where does Hierarch get the strength and weight to fight a Choir to a stand-still?

Is it the years of Bellerophonians worshiping the "will of the people"?

I don't have a problem with that, but... Bellerophon is a city. On Calernia. How old can it be? Everything else on the surface of Calernia seems not to have been around for too long; 1000 years seems likely the upper limit, not? I think its being generous, honestly.

So if that amount of people x time is enough to bring Anaxares in the same league -though an indirect link incidentally, since it wasn't belief addressed to him or even his Name – how comes Sve Noc isn't walking all over Choirs?

They were directly worshipped by an Empire of drows, to whose soul they had a direct link if Hierophant is to be believed, for over two millennia.

Yet we have been told that Sve Noc are, if anything, slightly less than a Choir.

So is it his undying faith in the will of the people?

Because if so... the implications trouble me.

The world is full of obsessed people. If this is all it takes, how is it possible that Calernia isn't a weirder place?

Sure, I get it: it takes one in a million to have that kind of faith. One in a billion, maybe, and many may die before they get anything done.

But Calernia has existed for a few millennias. That is a lot of billions. How come the setting isn't filled with madmen that have reached apotheosis?

If I keep someone in a dark room, sew his eyelids shut, and tell him that the sun is cursed and has toxic light that poisons your skin, does that invent skin cancer?

I... don't understand the rules anymore.

Sunsfury

So as I understand it, Bellerophon has been a hive of raging madness ever since it has been founded, somewhat of a shrine to Below a la the Everdark, without any actual Named. Named are based upon culture, and Anaxares is the embodiment of Bellerophon in pretty much every way. We have seen that determination backed by a story is a powerful thing, and what seems to be Bellerophon's only culture is raging against Tyranny and Foreign Despots for The Will of the People is Law. Anaxares, though sheer ignorance that it shouldn't be possible (combined with the Tyrant's machinations), is applying the core belief of Bellerophon – that people are the only ones who can rule people – directly on Judgement's foreheads.

Novice

If you can get past an orphan girl delivering a pithy one liner against the Choir of Contrition to get them off her back, I don't know how this would trip you up.

Vortex

I think it makes perfect sense. Catherine has repeatedly beaten people far more powerful than her by wielding the Story in clever ways. Now we see the Hierarch doing the same, except of course even with the story of a thousand years of Bellerophon citizens behind him, he lacked the power to beat them, so he used his power to join them instead.

Thorium

The complete and unshakeable belief of a madman built on the iron-willed fanatical faith of an entire city-state for 1000 years, given a Name and enabled by a set of very specific circumstances carefully set up by one of the greatest manipulators there are.

That is not something you get every day.

NerfContessa

Indeed.

And what a Finale it was.

Now if the hierarchy actually went to the choir, I wonder how that will end...

Amazing story.

Mental Mouse

The key thing is that the Angels, Devils, Demons, while not properly part of Creation, are still part of the System – they are subordinate to the Gods Above and Below... and also constrained in their dealings with mortals.

Call it Greater Creation: Arcadia was the prototype, but was then left in as a resource for the mortal world. Angels, Devils and Demons as team leaders and referees, but still subject to the rules of the system, especially Story. And the players/ game-pieces the host of mortality, subject to the power of Story, but also capable of wielding it not only against each other, but even against the other members of Greater Creation.

Mental Mouse

And a belated self-correction: EE has said that Devils are the counterpart to Angels, but demons are not part of the system, and not subject to Story constraints.

Gabriel

I think the main difference here is that Bellerophon is all about rejecting tyrants, and the adherence to the law as written by the people. The choir of Judgement is in direct opposition to that.

And as mad as it seems, to the Hierarch, and to all of Bellerophon (and to anyone who adheres strictly to the law, without thinking about it), they're in the right. The Choir of Judgement IS trespassing and abusing its authority. And so the story is against them.

Add to that the fact that the Hierarch have aspects linked only to that, to this madness of a tribunal. And we've seen in Rochelant that he is really powerful, able to break a whole city by his Name only, without acting beyond a revolutionary tribunal. Give me another Named that can do that (without acting beyond "I am here to judge tyrants").

Finally, he's not on par with them, he's able to survive them. The Choir of Judgement could refuse the challenge at any time, putting everything to a stop, with the Hierarch unable to act at all. But as Kairos told, they CAN'T bend.

And so he manages to get inside them, a judge inside a tribunal (make sense in a story). Of course he's going to be obstructive as hell, since he's from Bellerophon, but that's not the story here.

jack

A God Died in Bellerophon.

That city marks the death of a bird god, and their Truth of 'All of us are free, or None of us are' was written on it's bones.

And then none of them were free. Bound by their own laws and their own chains.

The moment Judgement tried to claim authority over them, the people who had broken their chains to man, and slain the Bird-God that tried to stop them, it made itself vulnerable. That it did this in Anaxares's court, after having their champion submit himself to Anaxares's law and Judgement, simply lent him more and more power over them.

In 'reality' he's a just a named human and they're Gods, or at least angels, so they should massively overpower him, but in the 'story' that they stumbled into, he was the Authority Of The Court Of Bellerophon, and they were the petty and arrogant creatures who believed themselves to be above Law and Judgement.

They then tried to kill him, in his own courtroom.

Stalemate seems pretty believable to me.

The story they entered weakened them down to petty criminals, and empowered him as a figure of True Authority.

Insanenoodlyguy

Any other day, any other time, any other choir, it wouldn't have worked. But Kairos set it up:

Justice made itself accountable to the law, then refused to answer for the law and tried to kill the judge. You asked about force multipliers, well the biggest ones were given to him by the Choir fighting him them-self. This was the heroic equivalent of a villian saying "I am invincible" and TURNING INTO A GIANT SNAKE.

Liliet

Oh, yes. Good comparison.

erebus42

Yeah, people often focus on the fact that the fatal flaw of Villains tends to be pride, but they forget that hubris has killed more heroes (not that the Angel's could be considered heroes anyway but still) than any villain or any monster.

Halinn

His power comes from the mandate of the People. From where does the Choir of Judgment derive their authority, for if they claim it ex nihilo, they are most definitely Foreign Tyrants.

shieldredblog

One thing to remember is that the Heirarchs particular combination of madness and Name did not arise naturally. His type of madness rejects the very concept of Names. Meaning he had to be forced into a ruling name to become Named.

So ya, even thousands of years might not be enough for such a situation to arise.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

The only rule you need to understand in this story is the rule of the cool mate. This isnt the kind of story where you set up the rules of the magic system and tell a story in the confines you set up.

There is a story on Youtube that actually reminds me of practical guide, H B N R R.

Scmrph

Gotta say, reading a capstone chapter like that and without even intending to scroll down to comments seeing your first paragraph, it was kind of a buzz kill. I won't argue the point because I think the other responses do a good job, just pointing out its not great when such a critical comment is the first thing one sees after the chapter.

Liliet

Hey, not this person's fault that they were the first one on the second page of comments lmao

Andrew Mitchell

Agree!! The positioning of the comment wasn't the OP's fault. And criticism is welcome here.

Scmrph

They were the only top level comment when I replied and right at the top. Like another poster said it was right there after Tyrants death, impossible not to see. It's a fine comment but if your the first replier maybe wait a bit or give a disclaimer and some empty space.

Liliet

Second page of the comments. It hadn't yet started when they were posting, as evidenced by them being at the top of it. They had no way of knowing unless you're suggesting they should have counted top level comments before theirs before posting.

The only choice that matters

I don't really see why you feel the need to clamp down on any criticism. It isn't like he was spewing hatred and venom, he made well articulated and clear points . If seeing an argument this mild upsets you i don't really understand why you even look at the comments.

Trying to smother anything that isn't unrepentant gushing in the crib seems like such an inherently toxic attitude to me.

Mary Gentle

I don't think it's wanting to see "gushing" comments rather than criticism that's the problem. I read that comment directly after the climax of the chapter – not because I wanted to, but because I scrolled down to read the Tyrant's death, and the comment was right THERE on the screen in front of my eyes. I couldn't not read it. And it was a bit like the floor dropped out from under me.

I wouldn't for one minute want to stop people expressing criticism. It was just unfortunate placing. I finished the chapter wrung-out with emotion, and then the comment that was immediately there made me feel "...oh. 🙄 "

At the same time, I also knew that I had no particular right to be brought down like that. It wasn't like anyone was trying to make my emotions go 'graunch'.

If there were a sharp division between story and comments, it wouldn't have happened, but there isn't, so from time to time it will.

Nash Equilibrium

I think the most important thing in this standoff is that, from my read, it's not about the Hierarch at all, he's been the Tyrant's patsy since day one. The Tyrant created him (through the name), created the incident to bring this up, set up the trial itself, set the location, and prepared it as almost a ritual to enhance the Hierarch's power for this one thing.

Anaxares could never have set this up on his own, and would have lacked the power even should he have tried, his will be damned. Even with all of the setup, the choirs would have won were it not for both Kairos and Cat getting in their way. It took all of this to create the result we read, so I think that narratively the outcome was justified. I just don't think the Hierarch was an actor with any degree of agency in it, he was just the delivery device that Kairos wielded (a la the Intercessor).

Liliet

Oh, but in the end it was still all Anaxares who won here. Sure, Kairos delivered the bomb gift-wrapped, and the bomb did not have legs on their own on which to walk, but it was still the bomb that exploded.

Yes, I know this metaphor is tortured. Hush.

Marco A Valente

Yes, it was his show, but I'd argue that the conditions that allowed him to stand here and judge judgment itself are as, if not more, important than his torturously mutilated but consistent logic that allowed him to stare down a choir and remain unbowed. He might have the ability, in principle, to stand against a choir like he did, but in creation stories aren't absolute, so he still needs the power to see it through, and that's what the Tyrant provided, though focused imagery and arcane rituals. Without it I'm pretty sure that he wouldn't be able to do it so effectively.

After all, his story is much weaker thematically than Cat's was when she bullied Contrition, to my read. There are large portions of his case that just don't hold up, and so there's a totally reasonable argument to make that the Hierarch has no right to judge anyone either. I suspect that without the Tyrant being in some ways the focus of this through his interaction with Hanno the entire narrative would fall apart.

Tl;dr Tyrant was MVP in this beautiful ending.

caoimhinh

Yep, this needed a lot of piled up preparations to pull off.

The Choir of Judgement would have struck Anaxares and then maybe leave after a while, if the wards around the court and the town weren't set in place.

The Choir of Mercy would have choked Anaxares and prevented him from fully proclaiming the sentence, if Kairos hadn't interfered.

The Ophanim also would have simply killed Kairos and then proceed to kill Anaxares if Catherine hadn't interfered and made them pause until the rest of the people left the town.

And even then, the Angels would have eventually won, as Hierarch lacked the power to kill the Seraphim, and Kairos would have died by the Ophanim's hand in a short time. But Anaxares managed to take the battle to the Angelic Realm where the Seraphim are, so now they are still locked into a stalemate in another realm, which causes the Choir of Judgement to stop functioning as they need to deal with him first before carrying any other judgment (kinda like Mercy needing to kill Kairos before choking Anaxares, lest Fate make them fail at both task if they attempted to do both at the same time) thus giving Hanno an ethereal "NO SIGNAL" which knocked him unconscious immediately.

So while Anaxares didn't kill the Angels, he didn't lose either, and is in fact stopping them from carrying judgment over Creation again until they destroy his soul or break his will.

Under Bellerophon's law, enough draws count as a win.

Marco A Valente

I hadn't made the particular connection of "enough draws equals a win" but that is so appropriate.

I thought this chapter was overall brilliant, but I can understand why people feel that having the Hierarch be the crowning actor is underwhelming considering he hasn't struggled to build the set of his victory in the same way that Cat or Kairos have. That's why I was trying to say that this was Kairos's scheme and that allowed it to succeed. But yes, it succeeded in such a quintessentially Bellerophen fashion. It's beautiful.

ninegardens

A lesser magic can defeat a greater one if it is MORE SPECIFIC.

Heirarch has less general power then Sve Noc... but Kairos has lined him up so he is doing the ONE THING he is good at. Sve Noc have more total power than Anaraxes, they can toss around miracles every day, based on whim, while he sits around doing nothing... but there's also a question of precision.

A car has more power than a dagger, but the dagger will still you if it gets shoved through your eye. A lockpick and screwdriver can take a door off its hinges just as well as any grenade.

Liliet

You're thinking of it as force multipliers instead of as a story.

The thing about Anaxares of Bellerophon is that he is NOT WRONG. His logic is internally consistent. The angels WEREN'T elected and weren't given right to judge.

It is the nature of the Choir of Judgement to be JUST. They do not 'arbitrarily smite whoever they want'. They judge. They follow internal laws.

And a judge cannot just pass a verdict on the basis of 'blah blah my sword is bigger than yours'.

Overwhelming power just... doesn't work, here. It's misaimed.

Had Anaxares been willing to be cowed, to bend, in the face of Judgement showing them what they saw, in that moment they would have proved themselves right – as he comments himself as it happens, looking away would prove they were right about judging on the basis of something no mortal can know.

But he did not bend, he did not let that argument stand. He COULD face their logic and still say they were wrong.

So... they kind of didn't have a next move from there. Police brutality ain't a winning story, not in a heroic narrative.

Mercy could interfere because this whole justice and judgement thing doesn't concern them altogether. They're going for greater good, whether it's just or not. They could ignore Anaxares's point and go 'yeah you might be right but going into that would lead to needless suffering and not prevent any so off with your head'.

This isn't a computer game, where your hit takes off a set amount of opponent's HP. This is... more like chess, where a pawn can take a queen if it's in position to.

Taichi22

Shatranj. The game you're looking for is Shatranj.

Liliet

No, I'm pretty sure it's not (c) Catherine responding to Amadeus correcting her from 'girlfriend' to 'paramour'

308924810a

It needs to be noted that he was, to his view, Mending the choir of judgement, by Indicting them for their unacceptable behavior and forcing them to Recieve him.

greatwyrmgold

You overestimate the Choirs. They are not omnipotent, nor are the greatest of demon hordes or faerie courts. Mortals have a power all their own. It doesn't take a ludicrous amount of force to wound a Choir, just a level of dedication and forethought that is almost unheard of...and, of course, a combination of "access to a Choir" and "belief that a Choir should be wounded" that is basically inaccessible without a convoluted plan of some kind.

stevenneiman

The Everdark is surprisingly lacking in actual stories. Their version of service to below is too self-centered to concentrate story power the same way it concentrates Night. By contrast Bellerophon has an intense focus on a single story, which is refusing to acknowledge anyone or anything as special or beyond their rules. This laser focus was paired with the story common to the whole League, which is that Heirarchs get things done. I think on some level almost everyone in the League since the death of the first Heirarch has been secretly hoping in their heart of hearts for another Heirarch to show up and sort out whatever they perceive to be the problems with the League. As such, Anaxares has an immense amount of story power focused through a very precise lens. Furthermore, his own personal fanaticism has more of a multiplicative than additive effect of what he's capable of. Because he is completely and utterly devoted to the idea that everyone is subject to his notion of justice and no other, it's very hard to beat him with this style of raw power. Especially because the thing that Justice is tuned for is defeating people who don't care about being just, which I think makes it metaphysically awkward for it to strike at someone who is as certain in his own moral rectitude as they are.

I think it's a little like trying to use Contrition on a newborn.

Onos

There's a lesser god aspected to something like Law backing him, which happens to conflict nicely with Judgements wheelhouse.

SilentWatcher

It's not about the Power of Belief, but about the Story. Sve Noc was made of Sacrifice and Shadow, there is no way they can match a choir without a Story at their back, because how many Stories are there where Evil Gods fail against the Light? The Hierarch on the other hand, has the Madness of Bellerophon behind him and his Story is that even Choirs must abide by the Laws of League. He needed this Trial and the Transgression of League Laws. He couldn't match a Choir if he just attacked them without reason.

Responder

>how comes Sve Noc isn't walking all over Choirs?

>They were directly worshipped by an Empire of drows, to whose soul they had a direct link if Hierophant is to be believed, for over two millennia.

>Yet we have been told that Sve Noc are, if anything, slightly less than a Choir.

The two crows which are a sliver of Sve Noc are slightly less, we haven't seen their full might.

>Sure, I get it: it takes one in a million to have that kind of faith. One in a billion, maybe, and many may die before they get anything done.

>But Calernia has existed for a few millennias. That is a lot of billions. How come the setting isn't filled with madmen that have reached apotheosys?

You're overestimating the population. It sounds like there's maybe a few millions sentient beings on the surface, maybe 10 million if we're being generous. It's estimated that Earth has had a total of 107 billion humans total across many millennia, if there was even a billion total sentient being to have ever walked on the surface of Calernia I'd be surprised.

That being said, a fair number have gone through an apotheosis. Dead King, the Sisters, Triumphant seems to have (or, if not, still killed an angel which is the concern you're having), etc.

We're not saying it's common, but it's not unheard of, and merely being crazy and obsessed isn't enough to get someone a Name. Torturing someone into believing a non-truth doesn't create an ironclad belief that they're willing to fight for no matter what.

Bookswiper

And so ends the best side character character

Liliet

Two best side characters.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Well, we still have Robber if he counts as a side character.

Zggt

Robber is not. Robber is a lesser side footrest.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Of course; please forgive my error.

Some Smartass

Goodnight, sweet prince. And flights of devil scream thee to thy rest.

ReaverOf

I've reread the entire thing while listening to :

He took his final bow, waved out to the crowd and at least he stole the show ...

Dread Emperor Apocalypse

I think the biggest thing that people are missing is that YOU CAN WIELD MULTIPLE STORIES AT THE SAME TIME. Not JUST a major story with side quests and side stories, BUT MULTIPLE MAJOR STORIES ON BOTH SIDES. ON.BOTH.SIDES. Anaxaphres just wielded multiple major stories that had all arrived AT THE SAME END PATH. Story wise the choir literally just "Became evil" by placing Itself above the law and killing the one that tried to punish it. Godslaying, Good vs Evil (Like I said earlier, Anaxapheres is the good!) The Wrath Of The People (Which was a major story in of itself because if that "bird thing" was a god then they have already KILLED A GOD) Madness, Named, and Ascent To Apotheosis. And probably one or two more that I cant think of as I'm at work right now. All these stories plus the story that The Tyrant wove around this situation makes me wonder How this honestly wasn't a one shot kill.

Liliet

Oh that's some GOOD SHIT.

Also for your perusal:

Kairos's song (to Catherine, methinks)

Shwa

omg that was perfect. Thank you.

SpeckofStardust

... the mad lad (not to be confused with the mad man) Asked as his dying wish to see and hear the applause of the Gods Below. I have no words.

While the Mad Man has ah, has effectively entered heaven to explicitly screw judgement over for an unknown amount of time, possible forever.

SITB

Until the Will Of The People breaks.

So effectively never.

Trupo

"Justifications only matter to just."

-Cat-

"Rationalisations only matter to rational."

-Keiros-

gingerlygrump

Is anyone else worried this will affect Names? I don't want Namelore to disappear, it's one of the most intriguing pieces to the story.

SITB

Anaxares only dunked on Judgement, not the entirety of Creation. Stuff relating to the Seraphim (like the discussed angel corpse) is now up to grabs, but the greater world will keep on moving.

gingerlygrump

It is the closing statement of the dying Tyrant that concerns me, "I have slain the Age of Wonders."

True, Malicia wrote The Death of the Age of Wonders decades before, but she didn't actually kill it.

What is the Age of Wonders? Is Namelore as old as Creation, as old as Arcadia?

Mary Gentle

And what, exactly, follows the Age of Wonders?

I hope something exciting, but I'm thinking there's a "follow THAT!" quality about the death of an Age of Wonders.

The Liesse Accords would be nice, but not – stunning.

Liliet

Not stunning? Buddy. Buddy.

They haven't stunned you yet, perhaps. The world they would build has only been alluded to, not painted in all its glory.

But it will not be any smaller than the Age of Wonders.

A literal capital of the continent, where all the nobles, mages and adventurers study and mix together? How is that less colorful than periodic flying fortresses and angel smittings?

Mary Gentle

I'm not your Buddy, Pal... (Sorry, came over all South Park for a moment. 😊)

OK, I concede it could be colourful. I guess. When it's painted in glory, I may well agree with you. Until then – come on, it's angels and flying fortresses!

After... I guess there could still be ventures into the Everdark, and goblins with hand grenades, and stuff, but... Eh. I guess I'm just a sucker for Classic Villainy. 'The Age of Everybody Using Medium-Level Villainy and Heroism' doesn't quite grab me the same way...

Insanenoodlyguy

Don't underestimate story potential. Heroes and villains regularly in the same place interacting and learning together. This is going to make all kinds of weird pairings. Rivalries, romances, seething hatred, and of course, unexpected but necessary team ups. It's going to get interesting.

Liliet

What do you call a thief who steals a treasury: a robber, or a queen?

That is a question of the Age of Order.

It's going to be great.

I cannot describe the colors to you if you have no frame of reference to conjure them for yourself, but... have you read Circle of Magic by Tamora Pierce? It comes close to what I see.

Rey d`Tutto

This is action unlooked for. The Undiscovered Country

GoldenCookie

Nay. The Age of Wonders was an age, and that was all. Now that it was slain, the future era is to be determined by whoever can seize it, whether it be the Dead King's slaughter or the Black Queen's Otome Game Academy. The Age of Death or the Age of Order.

Liliet

Age of Wonders is the time period where history was decided by grand gestures, wars of Good vs Evil, Crusades, angelic intervention and flying fortresses.

A lot of grandeur and a lot of death as backdrop.

Amadeus is the one who dealt the first blow, and has been steadily strangling it the whole time in partnership with his Empress.

It is time for it to die, and something better to be born from the ashes. A new groove Catherine is cutting in creation: even villains being expected to strive for the common good, peace being accepted as better than war as a universal truth, and everyone who cares caring about every part of their society, not just the one that worships the same gods. An age of responsibility and learning to get along, an age where the word 'vigilante' can be born and have a specific referent (as opposed to those who aren't). An age of interconnection, an age of new horizons. An age where the bar is set higher.

Age of Order, perhaps. I expect there be a lot of chaos still; an age of Order vs Chaos, perhaps.

It will be glorious, and it will be better.

NZPIEFACE

You know, the only person living that knows what happens in the church is now Cat.

She was the sole audience to both a semi-apotheosis and someone being congratulated by Below.

Everyone is going to wonder what the hell happened in the church once this ends. Zeze is going to be pissed that he didn't see what happened. Cordelia is also going to be pissed now that her weapon is a wildcard. Hanno is going to be confused because his Choir got fucked. Archer is probs going to be the most chill.

SITB

I think 'insensate' is probably the most accurate description of the Seraphim are now. They are still there, but are blocked by the Hierarch from doing anything.

Dan Lawrence

But he has followed in the footsteps of Triumphant, and even one upped her in showing that an entire choir can be neutralized by a committed villain. That's going to leave a mark in the story of creation.

Men are no longer forever subject to the control of angels; should you be clever enough, or mad enough, they can be vanquished.

Thorium

When Cat said that she had stabbed two different fathers, who was she referring to other than Black?

limwanya

Assassin who was disguised as black when captured by Diabolist

Truthhut

I thought she meant the far who she claimed was her "father" and black after Akua's Folly

Jesse Coombs

No. Not assassin, the Duke of Violent Squalls.

-Anonymous-

The Duke of Whatsit, that one punk in Arcadia that she lied her way into being the daughter of.

Jesse Coombs

The fairy she killed though the "the magical power of lies" (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/06/14/chapter-14-trick/>) , that let her take his power, as she was his daughter and 'inherited' it/'it was always hers'.

Wnderer

the Duke of Howling Squalls in Winter

Andrew Mitchell

Reading all the comments above, I now think there have been three times that fit the statement:

1. Duke of Violent Squalls in Arcadia.
2. When she stabbed Assassin who was pretending to be Black.
3. When she really stabbed Black.

Rey d`Tutto

Assassin don't count.
Duke of Violent Squalls.
Black
Enough said.

Draconic

Whatever the Tyrant and everyone else says, I would be more worried about the Wandering Bard instead of the Dead King.

Crash

Of note, it occurs to me that if the Free Cities are to be the City-States of Ancient Greece and Helike is to the Macedon equivalent, Kairos is our very own Alexander the Great.

Honestly, that is beautiful all on it's own don't you think?

burguulkodar

what, you just realized that connection NOW?

But congratulations nevertheless. It is as you say.

Crash

Honestly, aside from me being terribly slow at times, I've been waiting for the moment of Greatness, because I figured in a world of stories it wouldn't be just a title, this is it I would think.

Jacob McNeer

Yeah, Helike is Macedonia/Pella, Bellerophon is Athens, Stygia is Sparta, Atlante is either Delphi, or Olympia, Penthes is Corinth or Crete, Nicae is Rhodes and Delos is (for lack of a better option) Delos.

Shikkarasu

Gods Below and Everburning, Anaxares is going to filibuster a Choir. I love this. I couldn't ask for a better ending to either of these majestic madmen.

Wishun

Kairos was the Joker of this universe.
So insane he slips off the edge of the scale and backs into "super sanity"; so crazy that he comprehends the deeper Truth.
This world is a show, with Above and Below as the audience.
And say what you will about yon fallen Tyrant, he put on one hell of a show.

It takes a genius like a corkscrew to harness "David vs Goliath" and "Humble Man self-sacrifices to thwart the Arrogantly Powerful" to a villain's cause.

Liliet

It also takes prioritizing aesthetic over self-interest.

Imagine what Kairos could have been like if he'd not been pushed into the corner he was in by Above's worshippers. If he'd not decided that being a villain was the path he wanted to commit his entire being to. If he'd actually found a cause to fight, scheme and laugh for that wasn't 'make evil gods clap'.

Fern

The Gods Below don't give the ability to scale endlessly as a philosophical counterpoint to Above. It turns out, they're bored as fuck and just want entertainment 😂

Fuck the avengers, if I was immortal and had thirty years I'd totally construct the path for warlock to go ham just for the action packed b-plot climax. Sure beats the shit out of idiots using punch lasers

burguulkodar

Glorious Chapter!

You abominable yet wonderful madmen!

builds statues of them and their evil deeds

Kurona

So he went to the choir directly and killed them, jesus no wonder the intercessor was so scared of him.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Not killed, I don't think. He's in their midst now, obstructing their duties. He forced his way into honorary membership (!) and is using the position to filibuster them.

I could be wrong about this, of course.

caoimhinh

He went to the Choir to kill them, yes. But Anaxares lacks the power to kill them, while at the same time the Choir of Judgement also lacks the power to destroy him or break his will.

So now both sides are locked in a stalemate, and they can't do anything until they finish the trial, which can't finish because Anaxares will not bend and the Seraphim don't have enough power to forcefully erase him.

Dusting

Lively ending. And what a man huh? Gods favour at his fingertips and he spat on it all like he always did and always has done. Gods take you you malicious imp!

Fern

Fuckin....

I love this book, a whole lot. I've known since the end of book 2 that this thing is something special, and the death of the Tyrant is gonna be one of my favorite literary excerpts for a while. So completely obviously foreshadowed, yet none the less fascinating for it.

Two things:

Did hierarch just deify himself, or is he dead? I can't tell 🤔

MY FUCKING CRACK THEORY GAINS MORE FUEL YES I've been thinking for a while that the whole setting and the gods above/below are just essentially audiences and the moments of "attention" we're seeing are them rewarding Named for a good performance, and the gnomes only became so powerful because the Gods are literally trying to keep creation in a certain genre. Kairos, the one who played the whole thing as a game from start to finish got the ultimate vindication in death: creation is a show, and he just fucking murdered his performance. He's definitely getting a Divine Emmy for this shit.

Mental Mouse

> Kairos, the one who played the whole thing as a game from start to finish got the ultimate vindication in death: creation is a show, and he just fucking murdered his performance.

Usually "dying on stage" is bad, but this time... 😊

Big I

It's why Traitorous and Irritant were so successful ; they were the most genre savvy. Black as well, I suppose, in the opposite direction.

Sinestere

Is everyone forgetting that Cat is going to pay what is owed and what she can do? This is apart from the Wish as that was under his own power even as the Gods Below granted it. Resurrection is one of her tools now.

The Kairos might be annoying, but he was useful at the same time and wise in the ways of story-fu. Considering the company that our Black Queen keeps (like Robber), he could fit in and be part of the future. Kairos is finished as the Tyrant politically, and stripped of his toys. However, the best part of him is clearly his mind. The world will be a poorer place without him so that might not happen just yet.

Insanenoodlyguy

No. She got to use resurrection the once. No more. And it's a horrible idea. He'd feel robbed. He'd make you regret bringing him back like few others on principal.

Liliet

> Resurrection is one of her tools now.

It's not. Aspect artifacts are single use.

ninegardens

So... just a sec, but what's the bet that Cat goes Raiding Kairos's corpse for one of his aspects?

Because for serious, he has some good ones, and being able to dump a "WISH" on the battlefield, even if you only get one, is pretty damn effective.

Mental Mouse

Given the effects Kairos was experiencing, I suspect that the angels methodically destroyed Kairos' body beyond hope of salvaging anything from it.

Crow3r

Clap clap clap Kairos Theodesian. You know how to go with bang.

Crow3r

Also notice Cat saying: "It's a monologue, isn't it?" and thus granting Kairos a Right to speak, as every villain now and before.

Rey d`Tutto

Your Dying Monologue. don't think this ain't significant

Daniel E

Bit late to the comments, so I might have missed this question; Does this mean the Choir of Judgement is effectively in stasis? Not harmed, but unable to use its' power while grappling with the lower-case (but still very strong) judgement of The Diplomat?

Also, brilliant observation by Kairos – Every time Cat mouths off to Angels (and even Demons on occasion, don't forget the Tower's door knocker) & gets away with it, she adds a groove into Creation. Soon, Cat being able to tell Above & Below what to do or not do will be a perfectly normal fact of life. Seasons change, gold is shiny, and the very pantheon itself heeds the words of Catherine Foundling.

Andrew Mitchell

> Does this mean the Choir of Judgement is effectively in stasis? Not harmed, but unable to use its' power while grappling with the lower-case (but still very strong) judgement of The Diplomat?

Yes, that seems to be very much the consensus in the comments.

Some Smartass

Catherine: "That much you are owed, and nothing more."
Gods Below: "Hold Our beer."

Alex K

I loved the song, wish there was more 😊

Barrendur

Well played with Kairos – but otherwise this update just felt like a dust-storm of Name shenanigans; messy and unclear. And as to the climactic scene: It left me thinking, "Well, okay, if that's what you say this all meant, you're the author" ... but I still didn't find the outcome convincing or satisfying.

Andrew Mitchell

You're not alone. Sherivan has made similar comments (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/10/18/interlude-a-hundred-battles/comment-page-2/#comment-57059>) . And several people provided some very good responses that are also worth reading.

Liliet

I dunno, it was clear as glass to me. Any specific questions you have?

Daniel Tabakman

I think it's that Judgment just tried to subvert a judge, thereby attacking itself.

I think the differences between above and below were just made by the interceptor, and death, each one trying to get heroes and powers on their side.

The Tyrant just showed that there is no difference between above and below, that's why Cathrine is the center of the story "there is no good or evil, there is only power and what you want"

This was Kairos's gift to the world, the shattering of the illusion of the differences between good and evil, the internal contradiction within good, and the realization that death is coming for all of them.

Walter

I really liked this update, and also just want to praise a verse of the opening song.

Weep not for us,
For in the annals
Our stele reads thus:
A hundred battles

That's kind of great. Way to go author!

308924810a

Well, I suppose that they can still hope that the Corpse of Judgement will still work if they can get Anaxares to agree with the rest of the Tribunal that the Dead King deserves smiting.

Though honestly using an angel corpse against the Dead King never struck me as the greatest idea in the first place.

ninegardens

I mean... in some sense Anaraxes point is that the Choir of judgement don't have an open book of laws that people can look at. The people have no power to DECIDE what laws are applicable.

The eyes of Judgement, combined with the lawbook of... well maybe not Bellephrone, but SOME mortal editable lawbook, would be a pretty reasonable system.

laguz24

Justice and Mercy to Kairos and Anaraxes: Why, Wont, You, Die!

IronTiki

Kairos Theodosian, mad Tyrant of Helike, has been my favorite villain to read of, ever. Thanks for the delightful ride, you magnificent treacherous bastard, my applause joins that of Below!

Daniel E

Hello future reader. The comments section rarely reaches 2 pages, so just in case you missed it; please reread the Chapter 3 Prologue now.

Mack

What does Cat mean that she “stabbed her father twice” and that it wasn’t even the same person both times?

Only time I recall her stabbing Black was after second Liesse. And there’s no one else to call her Father.

Jarl Zarl

The Duke of Violent Squalls in Winter her “father” whose signet ring she’d “always” had tasellb tasellb a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/ImWswIssPTb4RQ8PZ8UFs>

Chapter 84: Declaration

“To concern yourself with wickedness and virtue is to raise partitions within your mind, expecting the world to heed them thereafter. There can be no sin, save for fettering.”

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

Kairos Theodosian died before the light engulfed him. I couldn’t know that for sure, for the Tyrant of Helike had already been a half-mangled corpse by the time he rose, but some part of me just... knew. Night wrapped around me like a cloak, for without its cold embrace I would have been blinded, I watched as the brightness burned and consumed and finally ended. Of the boy-king who’d played half the crowns of Calernia, not so much as a speck of dust remained. The fury of the Choir of Mercy had swallowed him whole, though too late. Not long, truly, in the greater scheme of things, but in affairs like this a single beat could make all the difference in the world – and he’d clawed to him a great deal more than that. The fading light of his absence left me feeling disordered, for though Kairos Theodosian had been an appalling monster in some ways in others he had been almost admirable. I would not miss him or fall into the snare of remembering him as more than he had been: mad, treacherous and like poison to all he touched. Yet neither would I pretend he had not been brilliant, in his own wicked way.

The world was better for his passing, but in some terrible way perhaps lesser as well.

In the gutted temple that'd been the seat of this lunacy of a trial, the dust settled and the darkness I had called down thinned until nothing of it was left. The Grey Pilgrim laid in a bed of shattered wood and ground, made unconscious by the heavy grip of the Choir that'd reached out through him. The White Knight's hand still clutched the side of the broken altar where he'd stood as the living channel to Judgement, or perhaps the anchor around its neck. It was hard to tell if the Tyrant would have been able to bait – although could it really be called that, when all he'd needed to do was shine a light and let nature take its course? – the Tribunal into this disaster of a situation without the White Knight at hand to work through. And a disaster it had been, no two ways about that. Mercy would walk away from this with little singed save perhaps its pride, should even have such a thing, but Judgement? I could still feel in the air the weight of the power it'd thrown around, smiting the Hierarch into the ground again and again as he refused to bow to their authority.

I could still feel his power, too, the same heavy lingering furor that'd swallowed Rochelant whole. It had been more sharply wielded here, turned against the Seraphim instead of allowed to run rampant, and perhaps been stronger for it. It'd glimpsed things at the heart of the storm, images I hardly understood – a stele in stone, a woman dying – but one thing was clear: there had been power behind the Hierarch, and it was not simply the power of a Named. The weight had come from elsewhere, and it had been... oppressive. In every sense of the term. And though it had failed to cow Judgement, neither had it been willing to be cowed by it. More worryingly, when that stalemate had grown beyond what either side would tolerate the Hierarch had, for a lack of better term, pursued. I'd not felt a speck of power from either him or the Choir since.

Still, my eyes looked beyond as I waited. To the other thing that yet waited.

"And?" I quietly said.

"He was still alive," the Hierophant said.

Masego's feet tread across the scorched earth unerringly, his stride as sure and certain it had been even as Choirs raged and darkness swelled. What would the works of godlings matter, to one like him?

"That last strike by the Seraphim burned him clean through," I said. "Not even bone left, Hierophant. What business does even the likes of the Hierarch have surviving that?"

"You mistake life for the wearing of flesh," Masego replied. "I know not if it was willingly or by chance, yet the Hierarch sacrificed his own as skillfully as any Old Tyrant: the loss of flesh was taken as victory by the Choir of Judgement, and so they withdrew."

Above us the afternoon sky grew darkened, and slowly the sky began to weep ash. It felt, looking up, like the dusk heralding the end of the worlds. Gods forgive us all, it might yet be.

"And he withdrew with them," I softly said. "Hooked into the hallowed flesh by the ironclad belief he had the right to judge it."

My old friend's steps slowed and finally ceased as he came to stand by my side, shoulder-to-shoulder. Masego, wearing cloth over eyes of glass and the ragged dark robes like a doomsday prophet, seemed more the man of the moment than I. The truth, though, was that he had been spectator while I'd had my hands all over this blunder.

"I am uncertain what will come of it," Hierophant admitted, tone displeased. "It may be that the man becomes an obstruction in all things, as a seal ever judged and judging."

"Or he could be a poison," I murmured. "Taint in the blood, changing what stood incapable of such until now."

The latter, I thought, felt more like the parting arrow of Kairos Theodosian. Something wounded but not slain, a crippling rendered back unto the Creation that had so carelessly wounded him since his first breath.

"Let us hope it is that," Hierophant said, and my brow rose.

He dipped his head to the side, conceding to the need for elaboration.

"A poison will be purged, whether it takes an hour, a decade or a millennium," Masego said. "A seal, however, might just last until the convictions of either side falter. And before that moment, would sever Judgement from the rest of Creation."

That would be... dangerous, I suspected. A Choir was no small thing, to have one removed from the machinery of Creation could not possibly be without consequence. And that was without even considering the matter of Cordelia Hasenbach's angelic corpse-weapon: Gods only knew what might come of using it, now. Ash fell like rain onto the open-sky temple at the heart of Lyonceau, and

I was forced to wonder if in my need to forge a better world I might not have doomed the world as it now stood. The Tyrant had been cryptic, as was his wont, but not beyond interpretation: the Bard had truly had a scheme afoot to slay the Dead King, and I'd taken an axe to it. I was not alone in this, it seemed, for the hidden sting of augury was undoubtedly a reference to the Augur, but it could not be said that a great deal of the blame to be laid did not belong at my feet. If I'd not tried to fix it, to make it better, the Intercessor's scheme might have gone through and the Dead King would either be dead or marching towards death. He implied using the weapon would have had... costs, I reminded myself. It must have been the sight of those to come that'd led the Augur to turn on the Wandering Bard, however she'd done it.

Gods Everburning, how harsh must that price must have been that a hero would have shied from paying it to slay the Dead King.

"I can't tell," I softly admitted, "if I've made everything better or worse."

A chuckle, deeply amused.

"Neither can anyone else, Catherine," Masego told me. "Why would you be any different?"

I looked up at the sky, at the trails of ash left by the wrath of angels, and did not answer. It was not untrue, what he'd said. Perhaps not the answer I'd wanted, but when had they ever been?

"Too late to turn back now," I said, letting out a long breath. "We'll have to see it through to the end."

A hand came to rest on my shoulder, lightly.

"I would have been disappointed if we did not," Hierophant said.

The danger had passed, as much as it would ever pass in a place marked by the indignation of two Choirs, and so it was not long before the others began to trickle back in. The Rogue Sorcerer headed first to the Pilgrim – the right choice, I thought, both tactically and politically – and with visible relief pronounced him in fine health, save for deep exhaustion and a few bruises. Lord Yannu and Lady Aquiline lifted him up, with reverent care, and brought him out. The Witch of the Woods saw to her partner hesitantly, and I suspected she knew precious little of healing. She seemed pleased when Roland came to lend a hand, though less so when admitted that Hanno's slumber was not natural, but otherwise beyond his ability to see to.

"Bring him out," I said. "And if the Peregrine cannot see to him when he wakes, then the Crows will."

The heroine rose to her feet, tall and shrouded in a cloak that covered a long tunic. The painted mask of clay on her face hid her expression, but not so much I could not feel the hostility wafting off her like smoke.

"As they did when the Choirs struggled against your kin under Below?" the Witch harshly said.

There was, I thought, something strange about her voice. I heard her speaking in Lower Miezán, but there were almost other meanings woven in – and with the Sisters warding my mind, I could almost discern what language she was actually speaking in. It didn't sound like any I'd ever heard before, and I was a more than passing polyglot nowadays.

"I warned him," I said. "Sve Noc would see to containment and nothing else. Be glad they did, or this entire town would be drowning in fire and angelic anger."

"You brought down darkness after the Tyrant struck," the Witch accused.

"And saved the lives of everyone on those grounds by doing so," I flatly said.

"I could have warded us from the anger of the Ophanim," the Witch said. "Had you not-"

"If you could have handled it better, you should have," I mildly said. "You didn't, so I stepped in. Whining afterwards is an exercise in pointlessness."

"Every hero that speaks well of you ends up crippled, Catherine Foundling," the Witch of the Woods snarled. "While you grow ever stronger. I wonder why that is?"

"Antigone," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "This serves no purpose."

"Neither does pretending she is our ally," the Witch said.

"In the face of some foes, all those that breathe are allies," the Sorcerer flatly said. "Pretending otherwise is how the day grew so dark in the first place."

"Hear hear," Archer drawled.

She'd sauntered in at some point and done so quietly enough I'd barely heard the sound of her boots biting into the ash. Throwing arms around the necks of both Masego and I – that could hardly be comfortable, given the height difference – she leaned forward grinning.

"We get you're all pissed your boy Hanno got had, but maybe if you whiteclads better kept your eye on the bird you wouldn't have to keep eating dirt," Indrani said, tone was deceptively cheerful.

Her arms were tense, and I knew well how quickly she could draw her blades when it was time for killing.

"You offer insolence and nothing more," the Witch said.

"Really?" Archer drawled, drawing out the word obnoxiously. "'cause look at how we're standing right now, my sweet. Who are, again, the only ones keeping an eye on the bird?"

And like a cold sheet of rain falling on everyone, we were all reminded of the presence in the back that had yet to move or speak a single word. The Dead King's vessel watched us all with his eyeless gaze, and it was true that while the Witch of the Woods was facing me, all this time Hierophant and I had been facing him. Indrani had spoken the observation lightly, but it had unpleasant aftertaste for much of the room – enough that the Witch briskly and oddly moved her head in a manner I assumed to mean the conversation was over. The King of Death said nothing, all the while. Now that they'd all been warned of his presence again, the others in the temple felt the same thing I had since the beginning: weight. The old monster was waiting, and as he did his looming presence grew oppressive without need of a single act on his part. If he'd incited quarrels between us, I thought, or even mocked and scorned us, it would have been different. It would have felt like he was part of this, a villain far more dangerous than most of our kind but not other. His silence, though, drew a line between him and us.

The Dead King was not involving himself in this because he was above us. Because he had no need of resorting to petty tactics when we were, to him, little more than children stumbling in the dark.

It flowed, after that, like a river settling into a riverbed. Like Creation wanted the pieces to fall into place. The White Knight was carried out by Roland and the Witch, carefully, and in the place of heroes came in the mortal crowns. Cordelia Hasenbach stood at the centre, the First Prince of Procer of regal bearing even in her riding dress but not quite successfully hiding how unnerved she'd been by the last hour. The Blood come to war north: Lady Aquiline and Razin Tanja, elbow to elbow and fitting there like a shield wall of two. The young ones, those, two, and rising. The old guard stood at their left, grizzled Lady Itima and grim Lord Yannu, both killers as fine as the Dominion had forged in my lifetime. And to the Warden of the West's right, more than half of the Woe. Hierophant, ragged and of glimmering eye, foe and student both to the Hidden Horror. Archer, smile sharp as the blades at her hip, having walked through death and come out of it without fear. And I, last of all, leaning on the long staff of yew I had chosen over the sword of a Fairfax and all it would mean. All this assembly, and on the other side only the King of Death. Seated, silent, still.

Ash drifted down through the open-sky ceiling, coating us all in grey.

"There is a place," the last king of Sephirah said, "in the heart of Levant, where the first pilgrim of grey slew many men."

Red embers lit the hollow sockets, as the Dead King finally spoke.

"In that place lies a secret that Tariq Isbili will know," Neshamah continued, "and it will tell you, should you be clever enough, of the doom you all so narrowly escaped by the grace of Kairos Theodosian."

The malevolent redness lingered on Masego's face, and he met that gaze with glass forged in Summer's flame.

"Follow the truth, Hierophant," the Dead King said, sounding almost amused.

Always more secrets, I tiredly thought. Always more schemes. Would there ever be an end, before either he was broken or we were?

"Enough," the First Prince of Procer said. "You came to these lands, Trismegistus King, to this conference, and yet held your peace. Speak now to your intent, or begone."

She must be afraid, I thought. Brave as she was, she was without power. Not even a trained warrior, as I understood it, and she was looking at the oldest and most powerful monster ever spawned by Calernia. Yet Cordelia Hasenbach stood tall and proud, eyes hard and bearing icy. I caught her fingers brushing against what looked like a necklace made of little fangs, under the sleeve of her dress.

"I have been considering peace," the Hidden Horror said, tone nonchalant. "More than truce, peace. One enforced by treaties that you all seem so eager to embrace."

I would not brook you signing the Accords, I thought. Else how could you be the sacrifice binding them together?

"But you are blind," the King of Death said. "Even the finest of you, so very blind. And so I wonder now what purpose would there be to such a peace. None. Not when the Intercessor would still use you as tools whenever she so wishes."

"You speak in riddles, of strangers," Lord Yannu Marave of the Champion's Blood said. "Your babble means less than dust."

"It seems like the path of recklessness, at first glance," the King of Death pensively said. "Yet it is more calculated a risk than waiting. Some chances never come again, no matter how long the wait."

"Has age caught up to you, dead thing?" Lady Itimi Ifriqui sneered. "You speak senselessly."

"No," I quietly said. "He doesn't."

Red embers moved to me, the patient and inhuman mind behind them gracing me with its attention.

"That was a declaration of war," I announced.

There was a thundering silence in the wake of the words I'd spoken.

"There is still time to the truce," Cordelia Hasenbach sharply said. "Will you now break your word, Dead King?"

The Hidden Horror considered her in turned, before he let out what I could only call a fond bit of laughter.

"Hasenbach," the Dead King said. "Yes, that is fitting. One of the old blood should be here, at the beginning of the end. Your line is a respectable one, Cordelia Hasenbach. Never once did the city of Rhenia fall to my armies, when one of your blood held it. None other can make the same boast."

"Dawn has not yet failed," the First Prince of Procer said. "Nor will it, so long as I breathe."

The old monster shook with laughter.

"Let us do this properly, then," Neshamah said.

The corpse rose, tall and robed and resplendent, and from the heights he had not left since we first came to this temple he looked down on us – with ember-like burning in the hollow sockets of his skull, red glimmering on the jewels set in the bones.

"There is no peace," the Dead King said. "There is no truce. There is only the shiver before the blade claims your neck. You will fight and you will rage and you will weep, but in the end there can only ever be one end to this."

The red burned, burned like red star that would swallow the world whole.

"I am the King of Death," the last king of Sephirah said. "I come."

Beginning with the crown of the head, the bones cracked and splintered and shattered. From the fractures the pale ivory-like bones turned to dust. The jewels broke and dimmed, the metals rusted and curled, until there was nothing left of the vessel at all.

Ash fell down from the sky, silent and soft.

And so it begins, I thought. Gods save us all, and so it begins.

Javvies

I wonder what this secret the Dead King is speaking of.

Yeah ... Judgement has had a really bad day, and Hanno's has likely been worse.

Judgement might be trying to use Hanno's mind/consciousness to help excise Heirarch.

Heh.

A declaration of war by the Dead King. They only thought things were bad before now.

Sylwoos

The cost for using Hasenbach's weapon against the Dead King, most likely.

konstantinvoncarstein

If Neshamah did not considered his former attacks a war, what will happen now?

caoimhinh

I think it's going to be really horrifying now, with the Kingdom of the Dead bringing out its worse weapons and dark sorceries, along with more presence by the Revenant Named.

Oh, it's going to be a horrible war, and will put to the test all their power, skills, talents and wits. It will force them to make sacrifices and create innovative strategies on par with the Princes' Graveyard and wield sorceries and miracles like Thalassina's destruction and the Red Flower Vales' shattering. Since that's the only way they will be able to face the true might of the King of Death...

But that also means that Neshamah will overcommit, and commit the errors he has spent the last millennia avoiding, so it should also present the Coalition the story force and Narrative weight to finish him for good.

Like Kairos predicted, the Dead King only fears the Intercessor, so now that the original plan she had was unmade and the weapon she wanted to point at him is unavailable, Neshamah believes he is unbeatable and a lasting victory is near at hand, which is a magnificent hubris in an old villain.

Which is, quoting our favorite pragmatic father-daughter duo:

Mistake

konstantin von carstein

I agree with your analysis, but I don't understand why the DK would commit such a stupid mistake. He is extremely genre-savvy, it's strange

Adrian_V

Because smart as he is he has blind spot plus he has stanated in his way of thinking, he is not as flexible as he may think, remember what Kairos and Cat discussed at the end of the game of tower raising.

ninegardens

He's making this "Mistake" for several reasons:

1) He believes that there is inherent risk in waiting. Technology and diplomacy moves forward. In twenty to fifty years the continent may well be largely "united" by the accords, have a fully functional magical academy, and will no longer be beaten bloody by recent wars. The continent is currently at an unusually weak point, wrecked by their own internal fighting. Which version of the Calerin would YOU rather fight.

2) If he waits, intercessor has time to make a NEW plan. If he attacks now while her most recent plan is bust and he has full intel on her movements, his odds are better.

3) Supposing he wants to take over Someday, he will ALWAYS have to fight against the story in some sense. This is just a liability he has to face, one way or another.

4) As demonstrated by Kairos, he is predictable in the same sense as General Juniper: He always makes the winning move. He can't not. He can't imagine someone not acting in order to win, and in the current circumstance, victory IS a reasonable outcome. He knows more than we readers do. He's been flattening Procer for months while softballing them. If he actually puts the effort in now, then yes, from a practical sense (not a story sense) he has a good chance of winning. Raw power does count for something.

5) Even from a story sence, Calerin is vulnerable at the moment- the present weakness of all their armies is the result of their own damn stupidity and in fighting. If he can spin the tale of "Crabs in a bucket act stupid and then get eaten by a fisherman" he may well make that stick.

konstantinvoncarstein

It makes much more sense, thank you 🙄

onedollargum

And that doesn't even touch on the recent hamstringing of the choir. The ever-adapting White Knight will be out of commission for a while too.

Zggt

He knows once he wins, he could transform what he conquered the way he did Keter, create a continent where going against him is unthinkable. He'd be written in history as the great forger of the longest standing and most terrible empire in history. He'd last until the final showdown of Good vs. Evil, leading the charge for Evil.

I think that's the gamble he was always going to take at a certain point. Every step he has taken has to become The Big Bad on the biggest scale. The Bard is the only one who has any sense of scale as to his plans, and he can be as certain as it gets that her plans have failed. Calernia's internal strife has had the entire continent rip itself apart just now. So if ever there was a story about him making that step up succeeding, it would have to start at a point like this.

The fact that he's waited patiently until now means that pragmatically, he's got a nice tragedy written for Calernia. It will be full of brave last stands, fighting old friends and enemies come back from the dead, grief, betrayal, and in the end everyone dies. It did work out for the Mizeans up to a point, and it's safe to say he's studied on how to go about it better.

So, the timing couldn't be better, the beginning of a story in which he comes out on top has basically already happened, and he has what is probably overwhelming force and enough savvy to give him a very credible chance to succeed even if everything will align against him perfectly from the very start.

He considered expansion until that land was an extension of his will by a treaty that he knows will eventually be crossed by one Named or other, and making it a story of his slow and inexorable expansion over the ages, how he ground down even the strongest of resistance. Let's not pretend that peace would be anything but that. The fact that he would have to give up such a good opportunity to act makes it too passive for a story about a Big Bad.

So, when he talks about calculations, it's for his actual endgame. His scope isn't measured in kingdoms, it's about exactly how high he can possibly rise over eons. From our perspective, Cat's story is all that. From his, she might be another Triumphant and he can survive that.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

Still, before the end, he will flense half the continent.
And likely kill all heroes and many villains alive now.

Liliet

Also, I have a theory this WAS Intercessor's trick.

She set up a plan he would find out and thwart, all the while prepping a story of the continent coming together against him that he wouldn't think was her doing and wouldn't think of as a threat.

I don't think Catherine coming up with Accords directly on the heels of a known successful Bard plot was much of a coincidence.

inegardens

Oh gawd.
See this is the kind of thinking which inevitably leads to "That's what she wants us to think!" no matter WHAT happens.

Don't get me wrong. We're dealing with Bard- I think your paranoia is justified. It's just...

Oh gawd. Dealing with Bard is exhausting on my brain.

Liliet

See, that's not actually how I came by that.

I was saying she probably let DK have the intel on purpose within a chapter posting time of that event (although I did not at the time have an explanation for why she would, and like everyone else thought he was referring to her ultimate endgame and not just the specifics of her plan for thwarting him, which is what it appears to have actually been), and that she wants the Liesse Accords for longer than that (receipts and detailed explanation).

I keep questioning that theory as new information comes up, and then new information keeps coming up that makes me go back to it again. Right now it looks to me more plausible than ever – because we're at the end of Book 5, and it's still a fitting coherent explanation for what's going on...

greatwyrmgold

Eh...I doubt it. Revealing that Catherine and the Augur's efforts to subvert the Intercessor's plots were just another part of the Intercessor's plots, like some cut-rate Xanatos parody, would go too hard against the flow of the story. Not the in-universe narrative grooves (though there's an argument there as well), but the themes and patterns set up in the actual story which is being published and read on WordPress.

The whole story is about Amadeus and Catherine striving to overcome and overturn the foul patterns in the systems which control their world; so far, on smaller scales, they have generally been successful, with failures being the result of their own flaws or deficiencies more than the Powers That Be intervening. Overturning ths at the last hurdle, having the Intercessor reveal that the Liesse Accords fettering her greatest tools and the Augur stopping what seems like a damn good plan were all a part of her true master plan would necessarily undermine some important part of the story's themes, in a way that was never foreshadowed or otherwise alluded to. It would be unsatisfying, in a way that is painfully obvious to any but the most amateur writers.

...Also, the stuff that Catherine et al have been doing has generally gone against the Intercessor's obvious interests. There's nothing to suggest that the Intercessor has secret plans that would require her to pretend to not want those things that would hurt her, instead of just letting those things happen and working with the people who would implement them to gain some goodwill.

Liliet

Augur, agreed. What has Catherine done that's gone against Intercessor's 'obvious interests'? Other than Accords themselves, which very much ARE in line with Intercessor's previously expressed preferences in some ways, especially if the 'no Named rulers' clause gets axed, which it's likely to?

Don't forget, for a mastermind, it's not your intent to oppose them that decides whether what you're doing is against their plans.

greatwyrmgold

Catherine has explicitly tried to stop the Intercessors plans. I'd call that "going against her obvious interests," unless we presume that those interests are just a sham meant to trick Catherine into ignoring her REAL master plan. Which would be... kind of a dumb twist. I'm not saying it can't be done well, I'm saying that it's almost impossible to pull off, and the setup isn't really there.

ICSM

Late to the party, but it doesn't have to be a Xanatos Gambit inside a Xanatos Gambit. It could easily be an Indy Ploy following an Xanatos Pileup.

In non TvTropes speak, she didn't have to account for Augur and Cath messing with her plan so she could unfold her REAL plan that also had to account for other dozen plans, half of which were made by un-scryable and non-mind-readable people. Making plans that can't be fruitful unless a second subset of plans are foiled is stupid.

What is much more feasible is that she had a long-term plan (Getting Cordelia named a Warden/Protector, then getting the her to shoot a WMD at DK), and when that plan was foiled, she made another on the fly that took the new circumstances into account. It would be in line with what we have seen the Intercessor do. The main example being when she weaved story after story, on the fly, to kill Cath when Cath tried to talk about her to the Pilgrim.

greatwyrmgold

One thing that none of the people who directly replied to you seem to have brought up yet: Neshamah doesn't seem to consider anyone other than the Intercessor a real threat now that Catherine isn't on the edge of apotheosis. For the reasons others have noted, he doesn't see the armies of Calernia as a threat to his own armies at this time, and he's never considered the plots of mere mortals to be a serious threat to his own. The only possible threats he sees are strategic (the armies thing) and the Intercessor... whose big plans have been neutralized.

Of course, we the readers know that underestimating the Carrion Lord's scion is folly of the highest order, especially when you let hubris put you into a narratively-disadvantageous position. But this is literally a world filled to bursting with would-be protagonists, and the Dead King has defeated all that came before now. How is he to know that only this one has a web serial about her?

konstantinvoncarstein

Well put, especially the last sentence 🙄

Jessica Day

I agree with most of this but he seems to see it as a calculated risk rather than a sure thing. I don't think he sees himself as unbeatable. He definitely sees the odds in his favor though.

JJR

Judgement.exe has encountered an unexpected error and must shut down.

Hopefully they have a secure backup they can load the last stable version from.

Garrett Therkorn

You know what they say. There's two types of people on the world: those who keep backups, and those who have never had a hard drive fail.

Somehow, I don't think Judgement has had a hard drive fail before.

Raivshard

There are two types of people in the world:
1.) Those with critical thinking skills

LokeshC2

And those with need for closure.

Mammon

I assume it's the costs that the Intercessor is willing to pay to take him down, the price that made the Augur oppose her for it was too great even for a Hero to take down the Dead King. Now the sacrifices of her first attempt or perhaps his greatest wound taken will be used to further sway his enemies from listening to the Intercessor and mayhaps even stop even the likes of the Pilgrim from considering her an ally of Above.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Dawn has not yet failed," the First Prince of Procer said. "Nor will it, so long as I vote."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

lqueenofblades1

Please stop doing this, it's really annoying and cheapens some really great moments.

None Scum

Where as I find it funny, and interesting. So horses for courses; slaughter the horses.

Insanenoodlyguy

1. Considering it's place on topwebficton, it seems to be working.

2. I am neither the only one nor the originator of this, merely the first this time.

3. While there are some people who don't like it, and I'm sorry that you and others are amongst them, you do not seem to be the majority opinion based on likes these posts get.

4. I disagree that it cheapens the moments. I am a commentator on this story, as are we all. Potentially every person here could change how you feel about part of this story, and I don't feel I am representing any special risk in that area, at least on average.

In conclusion, I deny your request. I have no intention of stopping unless Erratic requests this.

BarthHumphries

Dude, what about the typo thread?

Insanenoodlyguy

What about the typo thread? (no really, that's not meant to be sarcastic, I'm not sure what you are asking here)

BarthHumphries

A vote thread without a typo thread? Shocking.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh sure! I welcome the typo thread. I just don't do them myself nor believe I should be trusted with that task. Not my strong suit.

Liliet

"Not the majority based on likes" how do you count???
WordPress doesn't have an anti-like button...

Insanenoodlyguy

There are more likes on vote quotes than likes on people who say "i don't like these vote quotes"

This is hardly hard polling data, and I regret that I know you don't care for these (make no mistake Liliet, I like you. We have this odd alternating thing where our thoughts are either near in sync or inverse and strongly disagreeing and that's kinda neat), but like I said, Erratic doesn't seem to mind, and the guide always tends to have a high place on topwebfiction, so it seems this behavior is better received than not.

Liliet

Guide had a high place on topwebfiction back when vote links were simply 'Go vote!' too.

Liliet

(And thanks. I like you too, I just have a very strong allergic reaction to this in particular)

greatwyrmgold

Almost as if tapping a star was far, far easier (and more anonymous) than actively typing "This is dumb, why are you doing this". Or as if the latter could result in some kind of negative outcome, like people bitching at you over the Internet...

Insanenoodlyguy

You can tap the star under the “bitching” as well, friend. Though to be fair, I already gave my answer, and that was to the person asking politely.

Jarthon

I actually greatly appreciate it.

vexingvision

Many disagree. It’s clever, I like it.

Jessica Day

I personally disagree, don’t know how the others see it. I actually like it.

greatwyrmgold

Sometimes it’s funny. Sometimes it’s just dumb. This...it’s basically slapping “go vote” in the middle of an important quote. That’s the dumb kind.

Liliet

Yeah.

It’s funny if it builds on something that was already funny. Making something dramatic into something funny?
Eeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeehhhhhhhhhhhh can we not?

greatwyrmgold

Especially since it usually doesn’t work. Especially when the punchline just about every time is “This was a dramatic moment, but psyche! Now it’s a joke!”

Barthumphries

And the typo thread.

Mercy would walk away from this with little singed save perhaps its pride, should even have such a thing, but Judgement?
Add “it” after should

Decius

Wait.. in what senses is “Judgement” currently damaged?

Is it only the formal types of judgement, which allow an individual to be found guilty or not?

Or are the other types of judgement, those which can determine if an act is wise or foolish, also impaired?

Is everyone now literally incapable of forming correct judgement-

Insanenoodlyguy

No, just the choir.

caoimhinh

The Seraphim, Angels of the Choir of Judgement, are damaged, not the concept of judgment itself.

Mammon

There has been no hint that the godhood and its portfolio are so intrinsically connected that either cannot exist without the other, the Choirs merely exemplify and symbolise a virtue. Sve Noc is a twin goddess of Night, but nights and darkness existed before she ascended. Similarly, even the complete destruction of Judgement wouldn't see to a part of human thinking to just seize to be.

chris S

"I am the King of Death," the last king of Sephirah said. "I Vote."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

miles

I love the good cop bad cop thing you guys have going there.

mavant

This was a little less King of Death than King of Drama.

Insanenoodlyguy

He took on the name the King of Death. Of course hes going to be full of drama. Also eyeliner.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe eye-socket liner? 😊

caoimhinh

Boneline? :v

mavant

A big mood, as I believe the kids say.

Zoolimar

Seems like he decided to play into the story. No matter if he wins this war or loses it, this story ends with his demise. But it seems he is now considering it a worthy price for whatever he wants to achieve – at least part of it is dragging the Wandering Bard with him to hell.

LaNuup

I'm not sure that the story must end with his demise. He seems to know WB's masterplan and as long as he does not go on a continent spanning war of no holds barred extermination there are stories where he can conquer and survive. So yes it is a gamble but a survivable one.

Zgggt

It was hinted that the Dead King is a Name, perhaps this is not the first one, and that maybe Masego is being groomed such that his apotheosis will turn him to the next Dead King. The Dead King probably has contingencies for "needs to die". Hell, Cat used those in her "dead for tax reasons" episode to deal with the Lone Swordsman. This doesn't mean it's the end for him, not even close.

Liliet

Cat leaned into a heroic story for that, which seems to be inherently necessary to actually reverse death in this universe.

I'm... not seeing Neshamah managing that.

Mammon

Stories aren't inviolable nor are they the complete answer. The Black Knight has slain many a Hero despite their stories, the likes of Traitorous defied tales, the Saint of Blades turned evil despite sticking to good in a manner that should've bend the Story to her will thanks to Tyrant's meddling, and even Cat has during her Winter rampaging slain Heroes with a Story on their side with sheer brawn.

So just because you've got a Band of Five doesn't mean that you can slay the Dead King, even in Creation. There are ways around it, especially for someone as ancient as him. He may have gained Story immunity from any Non-Intercessor Named by simple virtue of the Story that either he or she must die by the other's hand, that even all the Stories turned against him yet being but a pitiful tale of less than a decade old. Or by brute power he can negate it, even if it's by sheer attrition. Saint could slay devils easily and indefinitely, but even she was stuck in an endless scene of doing that without anyone to break her out of it.

And that's without the means he has at his disposal. If he has even just one Named with the power to change Stories (f.e. a Bard with the aspect Snap that both snaps one of their guitar strings and the Story that spelled DK's demise), bye bye careful plans. It's quite likely that Stories simply do not work or put him solely and decisively in the Inevitable Victor role in any and all cases when he's in the Serenity, which Cat already seems to assume considering she's striving for containment rather than defeat.

So even if he did commit to a Story, and quite likely he didn't or one in his favour, then that will not suffice by itself regardless of anything.

JJR

I think all stories lead to him losing at this point, but that need not mean demise. He could become trapped in Serenity instead, Sealed Evil in a can.

From there un-living forever might not be too hard. Just go all "evil is not a toy" on any villain foolish enough to bring you out and make sure there is always a convenient reseal method always available to the heros.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, hes going for "the dead continent"

"Long ago, this continent was called Calernia. But a dead king came, and now the dead rule there. We do not go there."

That's the story he wants. His kingdom writ large. As long as he doesn't say "and then the world!" It can work.

Liliet

Nope, he doesn't think the story ends with his demise. He doesn't think the story needs to end at all.

He's most definitely wrong. Here's hope he finds out this generation 😊

caoimhinh

Well, everything we have seen of him is a bit dramatic, and he also likes formalities a lot.
He is King of Dramatic Death, hahahaha.

medailyfun

Dramah makes the story

Cicero

Joy...

Well, the Dead King has made it plain, it's now either Cat's Accords, or the King of Death rules all.

Wonder how the Bard will react.

JJR

With Alcohol

miles

She missed her one shot. Time to visit the nearest dive and get stupid drunk

Liliet

"Holy shit he actually fell for it. FUCK YES TIME TO GO CELEBRATE WHERE'S THE NEAREST TAVERN"

ninegardens

DK: "Tyrant screwed your plan Hasenbach, but your plan was stupid. Now I'm going to kill everyone. Lols."

JJR

"I would not brook you signing the Accords, I thought."

As it turns out, this is a non-issue, with the declaration of renewed war from the Dead King. But what could Cat do to stop him? If he got his naked phalanges on a copy all he needs is some ink to put his name to it. Given what we have seen of it and its purpose (reducing the collateral damage from Named fights, forbidding magic WMDs) most of it stuff he does anyway to prevent would be Heroes from getting story openings against him. Sure, they could mostly ignore his signature, and it in no way would stop the war against him; but it still seems like he could go ahead and sign it, if only to thumb their noses.

Jane

Well, it is a treaty; that creates certain commitments that simply pledging to uphold certain principles does not. If he's not considered party to the treaty, then when he tries to punish a villain flying a doomsday weapon, it's an act of war instead of an ally upholding international norms, and will need to be treated as such. Granted, the rest of the world can't exactly do much to punish him, but it changes how things are interpreted.

Likewise, he can't call upon the benefits of the treaty; if said villain decides to use the doomsday weapon on him, then he can't call upon the other signatories to punish him or her should they manage to survive his counterattack and limp into Procer. Which further complicates the fact that nobody else would recognize his commitment to track down and punish those who breaks the Accords, since it'd become a whole thing if he pursued them into Procer on his own.

Oh, and I guess he couldn't go to Citadel. And with that many Named around, it might even be enough to make it inconvenient for him. That might sound minor at first, but he'd probably really want the opportunity to check on the next generation of people who will try to kill him.

JJR

Yeah, I guess I was thinking of the Accords as a list of principles/promises that anyone could chose to swear to if they wanted. It's not like anyone is going to force the Dead King to use Demons or magical plagues on civilians after all (ok Bard might, to turn the story against him) And those things are a part of it, yeah there's also the mutual commitments to take actions to enforce the accords, which I can see how all the other parties and just flatly reject the dead King from being part of that.

Andrew Mitchell

> If he got his naked phalanges on a copy all he needs is some ink to put his name to it.

That's not the way signing international treaties works. Let me illustrate: If the Ukraine got their hands on a copy of the treaties that underpin the European Union, and their President signed it, that's not going to make Ukraine part of the EU.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

What if he did it in Arcadia?

Liliet

...I don't think that would work either.

Insanenoodlyguy

Maybe if he asked the new fae court for arbitration or something, but otherwise it'll still be a piece of paper. There's no story in "I stole this and wrote my name on it neeiner neeiner.", and Arcadia can enhance stories but it doesn't make them out of nothing.

JJR

There is a story about lying so hard the it becomes truth though. You don't even have to know the name of the guy whose signature you are forging. "Signed The King of Winter."

imagesbe

That wasn't a lie that turned into a truth. That was a lie that the fey decided it wasn't worth calling them on, because while they were 90% sure that it was a bluff, what if it wasn't and the King punished them for it?

Insanenoodlyguy

Different deal. The puss in boots style of lying gets you places, and you can make the lie truth by going in deep enough. But it requires a certain panache. Even Cat in her boldness mustered this, even if it was "the size of your lying balls is so gigantic I actually want to see where this goes."

But the dead king doesn't have that kind of absurdity. Nothing about him is silly or funny, at least on purpose. The closest he's ever gotten is as a foil to ranger as her straight man. He could never pull off "No see, I signed the accords and am a member."

Now Kairos, that magnificent bastard could have pulled it off. Somehow made a story where in the end, somebody asks cat or cordy, and they grit their teeth and say "his name is on it. He's here with us. He must be a member." Because acknowledging it is the only way to make whatever work. But he is dead, and I don't think wearing his corpse would have let him pull it off.

Liliet

That wasn't even much of a lie, considering it came on the heels of Cat seeing Skade in the distance and musing that the King of Winter is clearly inviting them.

She just... made it more colorful.

Jane

I mean. Foundling did warn the White Knight not to do this. It's hardly her fault that two Heroes decided to risk Judgment on striking down the Tyrant. Blame her for saving everyone else present at the cost of giving Heirarch the time he needed, perhaps, but "Unknown consequences for a Choir" vs "The probable death of everyone on the continent" isn't exactly firm grounds for a scolding, if you ask me.

Well, I guess I can give her “I would have told you that I would handle containment, if I weren’t as bad as Masego at social situations”, at least. But that’s still not really Foundling’s fault.

I wonder, is the Dead King suggesting that the angel-corpse-weapon has high costs associated with it? A sort of “The weapon will kill your greatest foe, at the cost of the lives of everyone else present” kind of deal? Otherwise, the most likely implication would seem to me to be that the Dead King would have felt he needed to kill everyone else present to sabotage the plan for the weapon – but I don’t see the connection to Pilgrim, then. Or that the Grey Pilgrim would have felt a need to kill everyone else present for some reason if he were conscious, but I can’t imagine many reasons that could be.

Jane

Oh, or perhaps it’s less of a weapon, and more of a revival – and the angel corpse is either a bit more strict than the choir it represents, or has some manner of influence on it (residue from Triumphant? A long-sewn seed from the Dead King? Influenced by the Bard’s plan in the way that Heirophant was influenced by the Dead King earlier?) that would make it super destructive in a way they didn’t anticipate.

A wild guess, but it sounds like the kind of thing that they’d want to keep secret.

ninegardens

Give Nessie’s comment to the bard back when he found out her plan of “They would all turn against you if they knew what you were planning”, I’m guessing its that the angel corpse has SIGNIFICANT collateral damage. Like... “continent wide, possibly blasting us a new wasteland” level damage.

Its the kind of thing that will work, at a price far higher than Cordelia would be willing to pay unless she was garunteed failure otherwise.

Bard thinks its a good deal, everyone else.... not so much.

Kissaten

A wildest guess – a weapon originally created to fight against Triumphant, if used, will summon her back because it’s a weapon to fight specifically her.

Necarion

Now that would be a hilarious Checkov...Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return, returned.

SilentWatcher

Am i the only one who hopes Cat gets the recall Aspect of Hanno and uses it to recall a bit of Triumphant? That would be a fine weapon against Choirs.

Mammon

Gasp

Are you suggesting what I think you're suggesting? That what Amadeus knows and revealed was but a conspiracy within the conspiracy, and that Praes's wasteland state is the result of the costs that the Intercessor is willing to pay to defeat DK? That the means that the Intercessor is planning to use, requires a sacrifice that turned a huge swath of land into the Wasteland that spawns Evil and monsters at a generational frequency.

ninegardens

YES! Not only that, but Bard was also behind the Man eating Tapir's, the invisible sentient tiger army, AND the Lord Traitorus's secret snow globe collection!

(In all seriousness though, there is a theory that she is behind "the girl who climbed the tower")

Liliet

That's the impression I got.

I also got the impression it was a fakeout, and Bard's actual plan is what Neshamah thinks is his clever victory – the all out war of all continent vs him.

Liliet

Judging from what Neshamah said about what's in Levant, it sounds like just plain ol' calling down a Choir to smite your enemy big time has the kind of consequences he's referring to.

medailyfun

She could try to kill Hierarch when the shit hit the fan

copaceticcockroach

This is the part I realize that the closer we get to this paramount battle, the closer we get to the end. I want this climax but I don't want this to end. And I can't help but think that the last line means: Gods save us all, and so the end begins.

Mary Gentle

I'm with you on this one. I know it's a really bad idea when a novel outstays the amount of story it has to sustain it – but I kind of want to go on, always reaching for the ending of this world's story, but never actually reaching it.

Maybe what I mean is, I don't mind if the story meanders round a bit on the way to the end. Or a lot. 😊

Liliet

Agreed.

Incidentally, I don't believe that we have only one book left, erratic's plans or no:3

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, I've been wondering about that too. There does seem to be too much metaphorical ground left to cover in just one book... However, I do recognise that this may just be motivated reasoning on my part because I really don't want this series to end anytime 'soon' (for any version of soon).

Adrian V

So even dead Kairos still has some surprises, now i want to see if there is some genius that manages to guess just what did he save them from and how.

Also because even if it is near imposible of almost guarantied to end badly i still ship Hanno and Cat i have to say a certain someone *cough*Antigone*cough* may be jealous, even if not for a romantic reason as a friend (well the later is less jealous and more looking out for a friend)

gbevis

The feather of an angel nearly enslaved an entire city and bound it to a holy war on the Tower. The whole body of an angel, should it be wielded by "the warden of the west" might have enslaved the west against Keter. Kairos saved them from that fate.

But now Justice is dead.

Who could wield the corpse of dead Justice without automatically enslaving the continent? Is it someone whose motto is, "Justice only matters to the Just"?

konstantinvoncarstein

It was a living Angel that nearly brainwashed Liesse. The Angel feather was William's sword.

Shveiran

Yes. The wing was just the focus of the ritual, not the source of the effect.

Inay

"Also because even if it is near imposible of almost guarantied to end badly i still ship Hanno and Cat"
You and me mate, you and me. The probability of it ending tragically is half the charm haha

miles

The obvious one is that with Judgment incapacitated they can't wake the dead angel, if it is one of judgment, and have it judge all the dead things.

Adrian_V

I am seeing lots of comments thinkng what Kairos saved them from is the maic sword, i disagree in part because what does whatever is in levant have to do with it? i suppose it could but i think not, is probably something else that may or may not involve 1 or more choirs.

Liliet

I think they are referring to a 'sword of Judgement' metaphorically. More like a nuke of Judgement. And what's in Levant is fallout from another Choir nuke (Mercy?).

edrey

Well, i have a theory of how was the bard plan, making the dead king attack, the augur making for the details and manipulating all countries.

Making cat the arch enemy lead Callow to reform their army like that landless king of callow and Juniper able to rescue the legions, there the story of the unconquered and how a king of callow hanged seven princes and one, just like that debt with larat. Cordelia, with the lost of her home, the chaos in the city and the arch enemy of the east arriving in a few days created the story of the warden of the west, from there the bard would take things directly in her hands since she could appear with cordelia anytime. Details like the coup should be a combination of the understanding of tariq, cat and the love of scribe and malicia for black. In this world stories and fate make up for all else and the bard is just the best at it

Mammon

You mean that her plans were to make a Pattern of Three or mayhaps even a Band of Five (from which the Thalassocracy's ultimate Named now got shafted by that story's plug being pulled prematurely, and the fifth one likely being either the Dwarf Named we've seen or maybe a Free Cities or Praes Hero) using the single most powerful and also strongly country-bound monarchs?

Pilgrim, even without his crown a revered king. Cat with the sword of the Fairfaxes, she of Callow's stalward defiance. The Warden of the West, first since ever of the Hasenbach line First Prince and a combined monarch warrior of duty. Whatever the Thallasocrats would've brought. And nr.5. Combining under them the entire continent against the Dead King. And then Cat turned evil. And there's no WotW at all. Which also screws up sailing T's Named ascension. Maybe the Drow are willing to let her borrow Ramera? Urgh, this is such a mess.

Gamer7956

Kyros told us the plan last chapter, if through metaphor. He said that Bard's plan was to have the counter started by "someone who did not matter", then make them matter once its too late. I.e. someone without a name, who the Dead King is already too far gone in attacking when they gain a name. Specifically Cordelia Hasenbach. Sure there were bound to be Plan Bs but that (I think) was Plan A.

Jacob McNeer

More specifically the band of 5 was (most likely) supposed to be composed of The White Knight from Ashur, The Grey Pilgrim of Levant, The Warden of the West of Procer, The Good Queen of Callow and The Dread Emperor of Praes. Every single hero/villain was supposed to represent a major power on Calernia (except Hanno who instead was the neutral leader/arbiter) but Kairos and free will fucked everything up. Hanno's out of the action for as long as judgement is, Tariq gave up his ability to represent Levant in anything when he gave up his crown, Cordelia and Catherine both straight up refused their names, and Amadeus' love for Alaya kept him from seizing the throne when he was supposed to (most likely in the aftermath of The Doom of Liesse) so he is merely a claimant instead of being comfortable in his name.

Mammon

Wasn't Cat supposed to become the White Knight had she been turned Hero instead of Villain though? Or is that just a fan theory? Hanno might not have become if everything went according to plan for the Intercessor. And instead of Praes maybe either the Bloom or Black's path to 'redemption' was already set in stone kinda.

Or maybe Tyrant by making the Hierarch also screwed up the plan to make one of the Good Free Cities produce a Hero that united them after being Tyrant.

Creation: Ah yes, now behold as we shall create Tyrant's opposite to compete with his bid for the Free Cities.

Tyrant: I'm not in charge of the Free Cities, that guy is.

Creation: ... Who's that?

Tyrant: Only my bestest friend with whom I share mutual eternal friendship. Also he's the Hierarch.

Creation: But... But... If the Free cities are already unified then I cannot give you a nemesis worthy of your evilness.

Tyrant: Looks longingly at Cat Huh? Sorry, what was that?

Actually, nevermind, I'm going to go do things now.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Not just a fan theory re: White Knight Cat. It's from one of the alternate histories briefly explored when Akua unleashed the Fourfold Crossing on Cat.

Javvies

It's also something Viv talked about to Cat – about how Cat was maybe supposed to be the leader of the Callowan Band of Five, not William the Lone Swordsman.

Jacob McNeer

I'm talking about after 3rd Liesse in which she chooses a yew branch instead of the sword of Good King Fairfax.

Jacob McNeer

In fact, I think I have figured out exactly how events were supposed to go according to WB. Black was supposed to have decided to rebel against Malicia after the Doom of Liesse but still go to the Red Flower Vales to repel the initial assault of the crusade because he recognizes that Praes can't afford to have a civil war while they're in danger of being invaded. After he repels the initial assault he has Warlock collapse the pass to buy him time and announces his claim for the throne. Meanwhile the battle of the camps happens like normal and Tariq becomes Cat's "honored guest." Cat grudgingly helps Black in the civil war because of both the pressures of her army and because Black is her best chance at an ally against the Crusade, leaving the Duchess in charge of protecting the pass. (Because she has Black as an ally and doesn't have to worry about Malicia's backstabbing, Cat isn't desperate enough to go to Keter or the Everdark and thus doesn't lose her mantle.) Because Black isn't rampaging throughout Procer, Tariq stays with Cat and gets to work on her. During the campaign Cat reveals her plan for the Liesse Accords to Black who is still in his “win the war, break the mold/world” mindset and thus not impressed with Cat’s “end/contain the war, better the world” way of thinking. Within a year Black is the Dread Emperor and Alaya has fled into exile in Keter.

Alaya, as she always does when she is desperate, falls back on the old Praesi ways of grand evil plans and releases the Dead King into Procer in return for helping her get her crown back. Keter invades Procer and Procer turns most of its attention north. Levant is split, on one hand the Dead King is an existential threat to everyone and must be stopped, on the other hand Callow still has their Grey Pilgrim and honor demands that they rescue him. So they dither around south-eastern Procer, sometimes heading north to confront the Dead King, sometimes heading south to unclog the Red Valley Vales and attack the lightly defended southern part of Callow, depending on who won the most recent honor duel. Eventually the Saint of Swords has to head down there and give them a push towards an enemy. Which enemy they fight is of no concern of hers, so long as they Fight. Ashur, having no means to reach Keter by sea, instead decides to continue the attack on Praes. Initially Callow and Praes stay neutral due to pragmatism, Mantle!Cat’s hopes that the invasion will convince the Alliance to sign a peace treaty/The Liesse Accords, Tariq’s influence and Black’s “evil winning the war” mindset. Instead they decide to focus on improving their own position and repelling Ashur’s raids. To that end Cat and Black pool their magical resources together and send Warlock and Hierophant to defend Thalassina.

The Ruin of Thalassina plays out exactly as it did in canon except there is no conflict between Masego and his parents because he never went to Keter and there is no noble because Black killed them all. At the same time as the Ruin of Thalassina, Kairos “persuades” the League to invade Procer. Masego’s disappearance and a repeat of the Doom of Liesse are like a slap in the face for Cat and reminds her what she’s supposed to be fighting for. She decides to be more proactive in her pursuit of peace and decides to offer her support to the Alliance against Keter in order to prevent further tragedies. In order to make it official she decides to go to Salia, in person, with her army (for protection, and because of the Mantle’s influence and in order to avoid doubling back to Callow after it’s over) to become a signatory of the Grand Alliance and propose a peace treaty and the Liesse Accords. The loss of Warlock (one of his last remaining friends) and a city under his protection due to both grand villainous sorceries and godly intervention cause Black to start to see things Cat’s way and he agrees to support the Liesse Accords. The weakening of his position from losing Warlock, recent revelations provided by WB as to the exact nature of Alaya’s bargain with the Dead King (putting her back on the Dread Throne), and a newfound appreciation for the Liesse Accords all cause Black to follow Cat's lead and go to Salia in the hopes of a peace treaty and the Accords. However he is still wary of joining the Alliance and fighting the dead king as that is firmly in the "not my problem" category. Cat and Black, with their armies and Tariq, in a compromise between needing to get to Salia as quickly as possible and not wanting to seem threatening to the people they are trying to form long term treaties with, begin to gate into south-eastern Procer around Iserre.

Meanwhile the League is tearing through south eastern Procer like wild dogs with Kairos playing both the Proceran and Levantine armies like a fiddle, Masego has gone mad and stolen Liesse, the Dead King is attacking northern Procer quite effectively and Malicia, sensing an opportunity to weaken the alliance before Callow can join, plays her last few cards and orders her agents inside Salia to attempt a coup. The Augur still manipulates events enough to give Cordelia the choice, but with the increased pressure of the unresolved southern and Callow situations (Cat and co. haven't gated in yet so the prince's graveyard hasn't occurred yet and Cordelia has no idea where Cat and co.'s armies are going or what their true intentions are) she accepts the Name and becomes the Warden of the West.

Once Cat and co. arrive in Iserre she and Tariq try to convince everyone that they are actually there to make peace, not war. Due to Mantle!Cat's lack of subtlety, Kairos being Kairos, Black's snarkiness, Saint's assrod, and the Levantines refusing to believe that Tariq is legitimately on Cat's side the prince's graveyard still occurs. However, Black replaces the Rogue Sorcerer in the band and Mantle!Cat is stuck in her "I want to give up the crown at some point but I'm the only one who can deal with the problems we're currently facing right now" and "lesser evils for greater goods" mindsets so she lets Rozala give up her crown and become the 1 in the "7 crowns and 1" oath. Most of the arc goes as it did in canon with Cat's winter powers taking the place of Rogue's aspects allowing them to get through Liesse. Saint still goes berserk and attacks the crown but one of Black's new aspects as Dread Emperor allows them to put her down despite Kairos' sudden yet inevitable betrayal. Mantle!Cat has much less patience for Kairos' bullshit and kills him after the betrayal in the throne room. Then because she is stuck in "Self-mutilation/destruction to achieve my goals/victory" mode she volunteers to sacrifice herself. Tariq still attempts to sacrifice himself instead but because Cat still has her Name-esque senses she catches him in time and knocks him out. Cat attempts to put on the crown but Akua stops her forcing Cat to allow her to put on the crown instead by using the precise wording of Cat's oath to Vivienne. Thus Akua, in an act of penitence, saves the very people she had once tried to destroy and lays the foundations for peace in the very city her unending ambition had destroyed. Because Akua was a part of Cat's mantle, it was destroyed along with her and Cat was no longer the Queen of Winter. During Akua's sacrifice, Cat felt everything she felt in her final moments and unknowingly helped shape the new realm. Afterwards, while Cat is wandering around a city rebuilt, with more splendor now than it ever had in life, a city that evokes longing, regret, ambition, arrogance, madness, brilliance, power, introspection, hope and most of all CHANGE with an almost frightening lack of subtlety, she comes across a yew tree and Good King Fairfax's sword stuck in a stone. She draws the sword from the stone and becomes the Good Queen in the same place where her chance at becoming the Black Queen was taken away. Unnoticed by her, Tariq looks on proudly and Black hides a bittersweet smile.

After the Levantines stop pointing blades at Cat for knocking their Grey Pilgrim out, the group heads onward to Salia. Black, after seeing the Dead King mind controlling his nephew in order to pull off an over complicated doomsday scheme, decides to go all in on joining the Grand Alliance and helping to defeat the Dead King. Because now, the Dead King has made it personal AND insulted his professional pride as a new age villian. Anaraxes, after hearing from Cat and co. as well as WB about what the Dead King is doing in Serenity, declares the Dead King an Evil Despot and Arch-Dictator against the People. While he refuses to become a member of the Grand Alliance (he still views all the other rulers as duplicitous tyrants) he does agree to enter the League into the war against Keter and sign a temporary truce with the Alliance until that is over. The conference itself goes smoothly due to Cat having a good Name, and the lack of Kairos making it so that Malicia and the Dead King can't attend. When the conference is not in session Cat begins to instruct Cordelia in namelore and stories while Cordelia tutors Cat in the finer points of politics. The Liesse Accords are signed with a loophole put in them that member countries can use the banned tactics against nonmember countries.

At some point the Band of 5 emerges to use the angel not-corpse with White Knight as the Leader, Dread Emperor as the Lancer, Grey Pilgrim as the Heart, Good Queen as the Big Guy, and the Warden of the West as the smart guy. They eventually agree (to Black and Cat's dismay) to keep the angel corpse in their back pocket in case they need to use it. Eventually the situation becomes so dire that they do use it, most likely involving a self sacrifice by either Hanno or Cordelia, to kill the Dead King (and a significant amount of the continent).

matesbe

I'm not sure that was the Bard's plan (way too many steps, and the more steps a plan has the more likely it'll fail), but damn if I wouldn't read that fanfiction/AU.

Jacob McNeer

Not really in my opinion. Bard is a chessmaster that puts Thrawn to shame. That combined with the fact that all of the main players are pretty easy to predict if you understand what they want (which is usually pretty obvious with Named) and their personality (also usually pretty obvious with Named). Betting on Black putting his ideals ahead of Malicia turned out to be a bad move, but their relationship had been fraying so a big push (such as Malicia supporting a superweapon while simultaneously destroying decades of work building the semblance of trust between Callowans and Praesi and nearly getting his protegee killed) could have feasibly completely severed the ties between them. Cat breaking the soul-scaffolding to kill Akua was a shoe in considering her tendency for purposeful self mutilation and her knowledge of stories. Cat coming up with the Liesse Accords after one of her cities nearly got destroyed by angels and devils then did get destroyed by a huge magic ritual was also fairly predictable considering her personality and history. Everything after that is just one predictable action leading to another based upon the players (Cat, Black, Kairos, Dead King, Cordelia, Tariq, Laurence, Hanno and Anaraxes) personalities, motivations and methods. She also has the advantage of working with Named whose core personality and motivations are far more inflexible than most people making them even easier to predict. This is especially true for Mantle!Cat and the Dead King.

In other words Bard only had a few steps that she needed to perform. everything else would fall into place like a row of dominoes. Also, big complicated plans are a villain's weakness only and Bard's neutral.

Liliet

Big complicated plans are ANYONE's weakness in this universe.

Named get free will, and this free will fucking with any mastermind's plans is the narrative irony step 0.

Bard isn't exempt from narrative laws, she's in fact more subject to them than most people.

WuseMajor

At some level, I do have to wonder why the Wandering Bard cares about taking down the Dead King so much? Most of the time he doesn't really seem to be too much of a problem and, given how "pragmatic" he is, it seems like antagonizing him only really provokes him.

What is it about him that worries her so much?

So, if the Tyrant wanted to spike everyone's plans here at the end, as much as possible, I'm curious as to how he managed to betray the Dead King. Because it looks like he just helped the Dead King survive a climactic and apocalyptic story that would have ended with his death. So, how did he screw over the Dead King too? Also, presumably he tried to screw Cat and everyone else in the room too, because the final climax of his life should have been to screw everyone six ways from Sunday, in addition to screwing Two Choirs of Angels.

Granted, it might be that the Tyrant had a decent idea of the kind of force that Cat can bring to bear and, knowing that the Dead King doesn't really take her seriously, figured he'd maneuver things so they end up fighting, because Cat will definitely Hurt the Dead King. Maybe he figured out a way to make this a pyrrhic victory for Cat (not that she has any real others).

ninegardens

My guess as to why WB keeps bringing down DK?

Because if she doesn't, DK will pull out some universe destroying bullshit, given enough time. DK will attempt to usurp the gods above and below.

He ain't quick.

He'll take centuries and centuries to get it done.

And then he will WIN, in the most absolute sense of the word.

She NEEDS to fuck with his plans. She NEEDS to stop him. She may have thousands of years, but defeating DK isn't easy. Every time she tries is the work of generations. She knows she'll probably fail, and she needs to line things up more carefully than even Kairos, because DK is WAY more savvy than Judgement.

So she'll toss crusade after crusade his way, and maybe convince the Ranger to use Keter as a hunting ground. She'll look for bait, and stories and weapons and she will fail, again and again.

Until she wins.

Or he does.

miles

Because when the dead king is actually dead, she'll be allowed to die too.

Mammon

He told us this, didn't he? His final words including that he ended the Age of Wonders. Perhaps that Age is fettered to the strive and vendetta of these two ancient beings, and he will end it by ending them both with the events he set in motion. DK cannot be killed within the Age of Wonders, nor can Intercessor be stopped during it. If we're talking inviolable Stories, this very age might be their plot armour, and if not then they may be maintaining it by their existence.

But whatever you assume Tyrant saved DK from, I doubt DK would be hurt even a bit by a Story that simple and shallow. He would've died a dozen times over it if something like this would suffice. Each Crusade likely had Named as powerful as the ones we see here too.

Sylwoos

Shoot, this just made me put Tyrant last words in perspective and they might have way more story weight than we thought. Remember when Cat said that if he get a curse, it might stick even if it have no right to? Well, Tyrant proclamation was his favor from the Gods Bellows, so he might very well have put a end to the Age of Wonders, LITERALLY.

Meaning we already are no longer are in the Age of Wonders, and pretty much every story precedent related to this age have been sweep aside by Gods decree. Tyrant last words crippled both Bard and DK in a way nobody have realized.

I found it weird when he made a remark about DK arrogance and nothing came out of it. No way he would have let somebody think they are out of reach without jabbing a dagger in their flank. Well, he did. DK will be going into this war with a wound he's unaware off, and this might be his undoing.

Sylwoos

And now that I think about it, Black previously called this new age, a age of order.

So what better transition between the Age of Wonder and the Age of Order than the moment a mortal men used mortal laws to judge Judgement itself? This isn't just a favor from Bellows, Tyrant created the perfect event to symbolically start a the new age. Laws will rules this new ages, and their power will be on par with the choir and demon of old.

Yup, we are definitely in a new age and the narrative rules have been rewritten without anybody noticing.

Mammon

It's probably more in it's fledging stage, these things wouldn't be too easily lest either side would've won decisively or the likes of Black could've changed things much faster and easier. Maybe something like a Pattern of Three:

- The Accords first shunned (defeat after defeat for about two books now) become acknowledged and a political inevitable of the Alliance.

- Tyrant's swan song. A draw in everyone's book.

- Whatever third act, climax and victory this will end in.

Liliet

This is in no way a favor of Below. Kairos's request was just to know if he entertained them. The 'end of the Age of Wonders' is something he did himself.

Sugar Roll

The Wandering Bard is the moderator of creation. The Dead King is so powerful that no hero has been able to take him out for a long long time. I feel like all entities who achieved apotheosis is on the Intercessors kill list. They're game breakers so to speak so the Bard steps in to fix the problem.

Liliet

Well, I don't think the Deoraithe gestalt or that one orc god in the Steppes are much of a threat. Or Sve Noc as long as she keeps to the drow.

All entities that have achieved apotheosis and are aiming to break the balance further in their favor, now...

caoimhinh

My guess on how Kairos betrayed or screwed the Dead King is that by correctly reading Neshamah's nature, Kairos has just manipulated events in such a way that the Dead King will overcommit in the fight and make mistakes, thus being vulnerable and killable.

Neshamah only feared the Intercessor's plan, so by disrupting the Intercessor's plan Kairos has ensured that Dead King will think himself invincible, as in "these guys can't hurt me now", which is something we have led to believe Neshamah is too smart to do, but if all this time he was only cautious when the Bard was involved, and in his hubris believes that the efforts of others do not matter or affect him... well, that might just be the fault in his nature that he just can't change since he is an undead thing.

By removing the only thing that the Dead King saw as a threat, Kairos successfully baited him into going fully into war. And that's how they will beat him.

That's my current hypothesis, at least.

As for why the Bard is so focused on destroying the Dead King, my guess is like Ninegardens's: the Dead King keeps making grasp towards more stuff and his power and influence grow with time. The Intercessor can't have that, even if he is slow in getting there, she needs to stop him.

We know that Neshamah tried to conquer a second Hell, and even tried to make the stolen shard of Arcadia that's now the Twilight Roads into his second Serenity, which in both times had the Bard intervening to screw him.

The first time she set the Elves from the Golden Bloom against him (it was then that he got the Spellblade as a Revenant), and during the conversation they had reminiscing about that time, she stated that it was because having a second Hell was "too much", so she couldn't let him have that; there's probably some sort of power-up he would get if he got a second Hell.

Mental Mouse

> she stated that it was because having a second Hell was "too much", so she couldn't let him have that; there's probably some sort of power-up he would get if he got a second Hell.

Power of precedent. Consider how Kairos noted that every time Cat bosses around angels, she deepens the precedent that "she gets to do that". Neither Bard nor either set of primal Gods wanted Neshamah to establish himself as The Conqueror of All the Hells.

And yeah, I think the key stroke against DK here was luring him to overcommit.

Nairne .01

That's probably on the mark. I imagine though that having even as a simple calculation of power having the force of two hells bear on a third and so on would create a pretty unstoppable snowball effect.

Bigomon

It may be a self fulfilling prophecy: if DK gets as powerful as he wants to, he can be a threat to WB, so she tried to destroy him. But by surviving multiple attempts, he established himself as someone who will not go down easily, and reinforced this bit by bit. Eventually he can reach a night that allows him to destroy her – by destroying everything that she is bound to. So she is getting desperate the closer he gets to this point.

Liliet

> At some level, I do have to wonder why the Wandering Bard cares about taking down the Dead King so much? Most of the time he doesn't really seem to be too much of a problem and, given how "pragmatic" he is, it seems like antagonizing him only really provokes him.

As I understand, he only doesn't present much of a problem most of the time BECAUSE BARD KEEPS TRYING TO KILL HIM. He's going 'gee of course I'm too pragmatic to try to conquer everything' BECAUSE it comes with consequences and traps and opening himself up to the Intercessor, not because he doesn't want to. He wants to. She's stopping him.

If you don't know what a sysadmin does, it's a sign the sysadmin is doing their job right.

Liliet

> Granted, it might be that the Tyrant had a decent idea of the kind of force that Cat can bring to bear and, knowing that the Dead King doesn't really take her seriously, figured he'd maneuver things so they end up fighting, because Cat will definitely Hurt the Dead King.

I think it's that. He thinks Cat can beat him, and he knows DK doesn't think so. So he's fucking him over by giving him exactly what he wants, and in a way fucks over Catherine the same way (though he expects her to come out on top, judging from his words in their post-tower-game talk)

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

"Having walked through death and come out of it without fear" Is this the same Archer that we know of?

Mental Mouse

It took a while for her to get over being rattled, but she has regained her confidence.

Liliet

Her first meeting with death gave her a shake of confidence, but then she found her equilibrium, and the second time she charged right into it without fear or doubt. You think she didn't know going to Masego the way she did in the Liesse throne room had a 90% chance of killing her? She just knew it also had that same chance of waking him up.

Someguy

>"I am the King of Death," the last king of Sephirah said. "I come."

But the King of Death cannot cum, he has no balls.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

His skurleton-with-bloodeye look is just a puppet. We don't know for sure that his true form isn't still as outwardly intact as it was in life.

Mammon

Hm, no comment on this? How? Is it just me?

What is going on with Masego? He's being WAY too assertive, direct and social! Masego is never this extravert! What does this mean? What can this mean? Did he behold the Choirs and learn social interaction from them? Or is it just EE writing him a bit differently for a few paragraphs? Is he really Tyrant in a wig with two cantaloupes or what kind of madness is this?

And on the thing buried in the place that does the thing that DK ominously omen'd at:

-50 silver laurels that it is proof of the sacrifice and its scale that the Intercessor is once again willing to make to kill him.

-100 silver laurels at a 1:4 ratio that this has something to do with that period of Praesi history that has been scoured clean with a demon of Oblivion, the payout being in my favour because it's also quite likely that EE forgot about that and his style long since strayed from that kind of lore.

-3 golden laurels and a band of 5 silver ones that Cat is going to try her dandiest to ignore it and not go despite the Story pulling her to go because she knows Stories and the Dead King enough to know it's likely just stalling for time or setting her in a Story that cannot kill DK.

caoimhinh

Eh, Masego was at first assertive, funny and sarcastic, he just disdained un-academic subjects (as shown during Book 2 and part of Book 3); then he got changed into socially awkward and unable to understand or use sarcasm since the latter part of Book 3 and the chapters afterward.

That said, Masego in this chapter is not displaying social interactions or assertiveness in that sense, he is simply analyzing a subject (what just happened to Anaxares) and making academic speculations (what exactly happened to the Choir of Judgement, and whether it is temporary or permanent) like the accomplished scholar he is and always has been.

Mental Mouse

Masego is cast as what we'd call being on the autistic spectrum. But even in our world, it's a mistake to oversimplify what that means. Autistics can be very social, it's just that their style and limitations are different from other sorts of people. Consider:

> "I can't tell," I softly admitted, "if I've made everything better or worse." / A chuckle, deeply amused. / "Neither can anyone else, Catherine," Masego told me. "Why would you be any different?"

That is very much the wisdom of an intelligent and mature autistic.

Mammon

Yes, I know and love how Masego is a properly displayed Autist in a written sea of terrible ones. I myself have a light touch of Autism (Hence why the odd diversion of writing style and habits immediately stood out to me.), so I can both relate and understand the basics behind his habits and quirks. While he's indeed acting within the boundaries of an Autist, especially a well-adjusted one, he's not acting within the established Masego character with little development of character to explain a change this rapid.

"You mistake life for the wearing of flesh," Masego replied. "I know not if it was willingly or by chance, yet the Hierarch sacrificed his own as skillfully as any Old Tyrant: the loss of flesh was taken as victory by the Choir of Judgement, and so they withdrew."

Masego can understand manners of speaking, but the one I've seen wouldn't use it by himself unless prodded. The wearing of flesh seems much too vague and with exceptions for him to use, especially in a world with ghosts and demon-doors and the likes. While I understand phrases and use them, I see the exceptions and incorrectness of these sayings. Masego by being such a precise scholar has been shown to only find it all the more difficult to separate the phrase from its exceptions and mentioning only the former.

And then he compares Hierarch to old tyrants by act, while from what we've seen the Hierarch didn't sacrifice his body rather than consider anything not needed like his jaw as irrelevant. The paper and table technically weren't necessary either, but they were mended because they were seen as necessary. Between him and Old Tyrants there is a distinct difference between their motivation and act, not to mention that old tyrants sacrifice people and parts of their kingdom than taking actual wounds, and to Masego such a comparison should've at least warranted a correcting footnote muttered afterwards. If not making it an inherently inapt comparison.

Insanenoodlyguy

He has his third aspect and a goal now. That sort of thing can lead to dramatic change in stories

Mengha

I thinks that, regarding his manner of speech, we see this difference because he's come into his own as the Heirophant. His words are very un-Masego-like, but they are very much the words of a Heirophant. It's also notable that EE referred to him as the Heirophant much more than usual in this chapter to indicate this.

It's a small thing but I've noticed that EE uses Names rather than names when they want to indicate someone acting less as their own individual person, and more as the Role in the Story. At least while in Cat's perspective, when writing in the perspective of others' I think EE uses Names more often.

caoimhinh

Actually, notice that he only said "You mistake life for the wearing of flesh," as a correction towards Catherine's reply, when he informed her that Hierarch was alive when he pursued the Angels.

Cat: "And?"

Hierophant: "He was still alive."

Catherine: "That last strike by the Seraphim burned him clean through. Not even bone left, Hierophant. What business does even the likes of the Hierarch have surviving that?"

Masego: "You mistake life for the wearing of flesh."

That keeps to his character of someone who further clarifies stuff in more inaccurate terms for those not as versed in the subject. Plus, he's been practicing on using metaphors as explanations ever since he first met Cat, he's an expert now.

Mammon

Yes, but we've always seen Zeze as not touchy and purely academic. He allows hugs, but it doesn't sound like him to initiate the kind of physical contact like standing next to Cat and placing his hand on her shoulder. And his way of speaking sounds not like he's carefully considering what he states purely as a scientist, he speaks in Story terms.

The real Zeze wouldn't just call it a seal and keep it at that, he'd never mention any Story and social understanding while adding a lot more academically correct tones and definitions to it. He'd always say the right things, but often with Cat having to translate it to what this meant to the Story. But now it was like he was moving as if Creation and Story were pulling the strings, deciding his words. The very way his grammar and statements are structured are fundamentally different.

Fayhem

People influence each other; it never goes in just one direction. Cat has, I believe, changed from her association with Masego. The things you're noting as Masego doing differently? Those can be summed up as Masego taking the trouble to explicitly address things to Cat's perspective. They've been friends/working together for long enough for that to be very plausible to me.

Also, you seem to be presenting speaking as a scientist and speaking of story concerns as opposed concepts. I disagree. Narrative has objective force/weight in this universe. Masego grew up with Uncle Amadeus and is now close friends with Cat and has spent the vast majority of his operational career as a Named (as opposed to his mostly study-based time with his fathers) with her also. If anyone would decide to become Calernia's first narrativologist, it would be Masego. I'm just looking forward to when he proposes a standardized unit of measurement for gauging story weight. Personally, I'm hoping that in line with the naming convention for "newtons" he decides to call his unit of measurement "foundlings".

Mammon

Agreed that he would be likely the most able to weigh Narrativism considering his viewing of the world, but this isn't that but his actions changing. He has for a long time known these things, though in the way that Cat does it he doesn't know stories that well (same as how Hakram and Vivi can barely glance into the paths that she gazes down deeply). But he wouldn't change himself over that, nor has he ever seen the need to change his speech patterns this greatly as Cat more and more managed to understand what he says as long as it doesn't involve difficult terms.

Fayhem

Idk, man. Those speech patterns really don't look that different to me. "You mistake life for the wearing of flesh" is no more poetic/imprecise than "the godhead is a trick of perspective". For that matter, it's a useful clarification as a response to Cat's misconception of what constitutes a contextually valid/relevant definition of life here; he's explaining that it doesn't matter that the Seraphim burned Hierarch's flesh away in their last blast of power, as in fact he pretty much let them do so to lay a trap (which worked). And he isn't comparing Hierarch to the old tyrants in terms of his act but in terms of the skill with which he acted, which is not the same thing at all. This all seems pretty normal for Masego/Hierophant to me; no offense, but I really don't get why people are reacting to this as if it represented some major shift.

Liliet

Yeah, I don't see much difference in speech pattern as such here.

What is really new is Masego appearing to pay attention and care about the situation at hand, and have thoughts about it. "Neither does anyone else. Why would you be any different?" and "I would be disappointed if we didn't" are what's new, what he wouldn't have said before.

But... his fathers died at Thalassina because they disdained detailed understanding of the opponent and missed the big picture implications of what they would be going up against. He relied on his scholarly understanding instead of paying attention to context and got possessed by the Dead King and nearly killed the rest of his family – literally did kill the one of them he might just care about most.

I've been expecting this change to come around since Book 4: Masego actually opening his eyes and getting jolted out of his comfort zone of not needing to pay attention to global events because he can just trust his family about it.

Remember Masego who counceled Cat on dealing with grief in Book 2 over her crippling after the demon fight? Remember Masego who dismissed 'bah, treason' becuae he knew Amadeus and Catherine would come to an arrangement easily in Book 3? Remember Masego who ended up consoling Catherine and promising he won't leave her when she tried to console him about his loss of sorcery?

He has always been someone who saw like this, and he has always been someone who paid attention to those he cares about. The only thing that changed is that he has recalibrated what is and isn't worthy of his scholarly analysis, and that changed for a damn good reason.

Masego has grown up, and we see the adult him now. This is the adult him, the equilibrium he's settled into.

laguz24

This makes me wonder if the Dead King has faced many villains in the past since only Catherine has given him trouble and the Bard is something else. While all the Heroes are like an open book to him. Also, this makes me realize how bad the Bard is at story crafting. She sees things through the story but forgets that people have desires beyond and behind the story. All it really took was someone talking to her in a garden for too long and all of her plans started crashing down. Seriously, I wonder what her total success rate is since her real strength comes from the fact that you can't take her off the board.

Javvies

She also usually works multiple steps removed from the immediate situation.

Plus, I'm pretty sure her procedure for less extraordinary circumstances is to set things up so that the worst case scenario is a null value event or series of events, but it's more likely that even in the absence of a complete victory, she makes gains in this and/or other plans she's got arranged.

Think about her stopping the Elves from killing Diabolist – Bard's (apparent) best case scenario is that Diabolist wins against Cat, Amadeus, and Malicia, reverting Praes to Classic Old School Villainy, rather than Amadeus's New Practical Villainy. A worst case scenario is almost what happened, which still gave casus belli and a major unifying incentive for the Crusade. About the only way things could have turned out worse? Malicia (for some reason) not trying to claim the Diabolist's work and not putting a wedge between Amadeus and the Tower – which since Malicia helped Diabolist pull it off seems like it would be a strange and sudden shift. But still, net gain for Bard, if lesser.

Eh, actually, the actual worst case scenario probably would have been the Fae killing Diabolist. But that's still a null value event for Bard.

Mammon

The Dead King has fought at least one Dread Emperor that tried to invade Serenity through the Hells.

It's unclear whether he fought Triumphant but considering she conquered all of Calernia it's quite likely that she at least took all but his castle-city from him.

He likely fought with the drow both pre- and post-Everdark isolation on multiple occasions.

His fight with the Horned Lord(s) is vague, he might've killed and taken that augur on his own initiative rather than having fought it more truly.

We all know that he greatly fears the Matrons and that he respects Cat because she blows through her teeth like goblins do, with the Triumphant comparison being a mere excuse.

There's not much precedent for true intelligent and capable Villains fighting him in established lore indeed, other than the first example of the Hell wars. Which are hard to gauge because there's literally no written history left on it and the people remember that particular DE as a fool which is more a manner of history written than their actual competence. They may have been extremely capable, or indeed just a buffoon compared to their peers.

ninegardens

Yeah... the histories of Dread Emperors/esses is weird, on the grounds that like... Dread emperor Sorcerous was considered a fool for their failed attempt to steal Callow's weather... and then you have a Amadeus interlude on the history and you find out that NO, that plan actually MADE SENSE, it just sounds crazy.

Obviously many of the leaders were truly nutz... but it's also likely that many of them were more competent than their legacy might suggest...

konstantinvoncarstein

Minor correction: it was an Empress that tried to steal Callow's weather, not Sorcerous 😞

And yes, some of them were remembered as madmen while having accomplished much. There is that Emperor that built most of the Praesi roads but is remembered only for having morphed himself into a giant spider

konstantinvoncarstein

He allied himself with Triumphant, she even went to Keter and slept in the same palace as Catherine. Neshamah used her in the same way as Malicia, to get an invitation outside the Serenity and be the monster.

Mammon

Yes, but to assume that they didn't also fight would be a more far-fetched presumption. Even if Evil defeats Evil and Iron sharpens Iron wouldn't be the case, and both may not be, but the question is whether he has faced many Villains. One way or another, even if they were allies from day 1 all the way to the end, he faced her and would have to deal with an equal peer and potential opposition or threat that is a Villain rather than a Hero. Still counts as experience dealing with Villains.

Liliet

> Also, this makes me realize how bad the Bard is at story crafting. She sees things through the story but forgets that people have desires beyond and behind the story. All it really took was someone talking to her in a garden for too long and all of her plans started crashing down.

Yeah, that... really does make me think that it's Neshamah who's bad at reading her – or she who's good at adapting to his expectation to pull wool over his eyes.

That was never the real plan, methinks.

Author Unknown

All those poor orphaned gargoyles. 🙄

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Dicks out for Kairos and his gargoyles.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"I looked up at the sky, at the trails of ash left by the wrath of angels, and did not answer."

Okay, so, I've never complained about this, but EE has a remarkably consistent habit of using "wroth" instead of "wrath." I'm pretty sure this is the first instance of him using "wrath" in the entire series, and I hope this is something that lasts.

Liliet

I think the words are slightly different in implication? Erratic just uses both where he thinks appropriate.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Wrath is the noun. Wroth is the adjectival form. It's the anger equivalent of saying "sad" instead of "sadness."

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you. I'm always up for adding to my lexicon. 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Quite welcome.

Liliet

Chapter 85: When It Rains

*"Kill an enemy,
Make another
How dreadfully
We do usher!
Killed; enemy
To another."*

-Extract from 'And So I Dreamt I Was Awake' by Sherehazad the Seer, Taghreb poet

"You're certain?" I asked.

"As can be," Vivienne replied. "Our own people have intercepted reports and the Scribe's agents confirm it."

"Then send for Pickler," I said. "We'll need someone navigate the implications of that."

I paused, and the other Callowan caught my eye with understanding.

"Robber as well, then," the dark-haired woman said.

She dipped out of the room long enough to send out messengers and returned as I poured us cups of wine. She took it when offered, and we both sipped in silence. Lost in our thoughts. It'd be better with the two of them, and I was glad she'd realized it. While it could not be denied that Senior Sapper Pickler's upbringing as the daughter of a Matron leant her insights into the ways of goblinkind that a nobody like Robber wouldn't have, neither should it be ignored that she was, well... horribly unsociable. Even with other goblins. Special Tribune Robber, on the other hand? He somehow seemed to know every other greenskin we came across, and though goblins were clannish in the extreme amongst themselves they gossiped with relish. Robber would have his finger on the pulse of things in a way Pickler would not.

Gods, and to think I'd believed it would be quiet after the disaster in Lyonceau. Showed what I knew.

Midnight had come and passed, though it would be more than a bell still until dawn came, and no part of that span had been calm. I'd not returned to Salia, after the Dead King's chilling farewell, for it would have been unwise. Riots were beginning again, though this time not as a tool of conspiracy: word had spread that the war against Keter was resuming, and in terror and impotent anger the people had taken to the streets. Given that there'd been killing of foreigners last time, it'd been judged cautious for the delegations not to return to the capital at least until the day after. If not longer. The First Prince had admitted that she'd rather not soldiers – even solely her own – to put down the turbulence but that she might not have a choice. Should it come to that, though, no other member of the Grand Alliance could be seen intervening even if only to help. It would feed the rumours from the coup attempt that'd not entirely died down, that the First Prince was in league with foreign powers that wanted to destroy Procer.

As Salia roiled and the rest of us kept to our camps, surrounded by soldiers, the last stretch of day into the night had been filled with fervent activity. For one, the two Named that'd been effectively keeping the League of Free Cities together were gone. The Hierarch perhaps not yet dead, as Masego had insisted, but undeniably he was in no place to rule. Not that he'd ever done that even when he was actually meant to. There'd been accusations of assassination from some cities, Penthes leading the charge, but it was hard to argue with a town covered in ash and two heroes stuck in bedrest. The League delegations had hastily withdrawn to their camp under a heavy escort of Proceran soldiers, howling mobs of Salians tossing everything they could get their hands on at them. I had Archer out and keeping an eye on them, though with strict instructions not to kick the hornet's nest. That Penthes had been so aggressive earlier was a good indication that Hakram was right about Malicia having sunk in her hooks there, but there was no telling where much of the League would fall. Helike, in particular, promised to be a mess. Kairos Theodosian had no formal successor, and rumour was he'd pruned minor branches of the Theodosians quite enthusiastically after usurping his nephew. It was not impossible that the royal house of Helike was dead, and there was no telling if some other nobles would make a play for the throne or some distant relation was about to be produced so they could 'rule'.

And now, like we didn't have our plates full enough with the south, north and west trouble was coming from the east as well. The affairs of the Confederation of the Grey Eyries, the fledgling goblin state that'd risen in rebellion against the Tower and declared independence before going a step further and taking Foramen, had always been opaque to outsiders. The Council of Matrons had ruled the goblin tribes under the Empire and it still did under the Confederation, but to my understanding the alliance between the tribes was a loose thing even at the best of times. The Matrons were nominally an ally to Callow, for Hakram and Vivienne had backed their bid for independence with dwarven gold and foodstuffs, to be repaid in goods we needed: goblin steel and munitions. A blockade of the Hungering Sands by the loyalist Legions of Terror had made deliveries of these highly sporadic, though they'd not entirely ceased, but the Matrons were making visible efforts to keep their word.

I'd believed that to be a promising sign, and though the goblins were said to have committed atrocities against Taghrebi nobility when they took Foramen, the loss of the Imperial Forges and yet another great city of Praes had been a hard blow to Malicia. The Confederation was riddled with practices I despised, and the Matrons were generally speaking about as trustworthy as a nest of vipers, but as a counterweight to the Tower in the southeast they'd been an invaluable asset. Just the fact that they'd tied up the loyalist legions down south had been worth its weight in gold, since it meant I didn't have to worry about those same troops securing the Empire for Malicia – or marching on Summerholm, for that matter. There was the promise of a long-term partnership there as well, with the Snake Eater Tribe having settled in my lands near Marchford. It'd allowed Juniper to recruit goblins to fill the ranks of the Army of Callow's sappers and scouts, and more abstract benefits as well. The relative harmony with the locals had been both a proof that Callow might be able to handle greenskin settlers and a tie to the Council of Matrons themselves.

The generous income that rent of their tribal lands brought didn't hurt either, given the until recently dreadful state of my coffers.

Some parts of it in particular: Pickler's mother, Matron Wither of the High Ridge Tribe. Who'd been trying to push Pickler into retiring and becoming Matron of the Snake Eater Tribe since the moment it was settled on Callowan grounds. I'd been more amused than anything when I'd first heard, for trying to get Pickler interested in anything that wasn't engineering was like pulling teeth, but given the fractious nature of goblin politics I'd found it shockingly impressive that Matron Wither has succeeded at ensuring no other matron was appointed in the wake of her daughter's refusal to retire and take up matronship of the tribe. Guards knocked on the door and jolted me out of my thoughts, Vivienne calling out to allow entry as I took a sip from my now near-empty cup. The two goblins came in together, for a moment allowing a glimpse of the difference between them – Pickler was, I realized, growing significantly larger than Robber. Half a head more now, and where the male's skin was beginning to wrinkle in some places as he approached his kind's middle age her own was the same as when I'd first met her. Matron lines, it was said, were as a breed apart from the rest of their kind.

That did not strike me as the kind of thing that came about naturally.

"Boss, Princess," Robber greeted us, scuttling in and sliding into a seat.

My brow rose as I glanced at Vivienne.

"Since I was designated your heiress," she admitted. "It's exactly as annoying as you'd think."

Oh, Vivienne, why would you ever admit that out loud? There was no way he was ever going to stop, now.

"Catherine, Dartwick," Pickler greeted us, slightly more deferentially.

She waited for me to invite her with a gesture before taking a seat, at least.

"I've need of your insights into the Confederation," I admitted. "There's been news."

Amber eyes wary, Pickler watched me without blinking.

"I'm not corresponding with my mother, Catherine," she said. "And even if I was, she would not share secrets with me. Nor I with her, if that is your-"

"Not in the slightest," I interrupted. "But you were raised about as high as can be, by my understanding, and you know your mother better than anybody else we've got."

"And I am here to speak for the common goblin, I assume," Robber grinned, pearly needle-like teeth gleaming. "Allow me then to present our demands: first, we would like larger cookpots. The ones we have can't fit a full Proceran child. Second-"

"Robber's here because he hears gossip even Hakram doesn't," I said, pretending to have heard none of that.

"His ears are too high up," Robber agreed without missing a beat, "it's like someone carved an ugly mug onto a tree, Boss."

"Matron Wither has seized control of the city of Foramen and, along with what seems to be another few tribes, evicted the Confederation from the region," Vivienne calmly said.

It was like someone had dropped a sheet of ice-cold water on the two goblins. Genuine surprise, from the two of them.

"Was blood spilled?" Robber sharply asked.

Vivienne handed me the scroll carrying the latest summary report and I tossed it across the table. He caught it and passed it to Pickler without hesitating, eyes remaining on me.

"As far as we can tell, all forces within the city that didn't belong to the High Ridge or their allies were taken by surprised and killed," I said. "There were a series of skirmishes afterwards that drove back Confederation warriors into the Grey Eyries. Maybe four to five thousand dead, all in all."

"The Legions haven't moved," Pickler slowly said.

"They have not," I grimly said. "Even our allies in the Eyes are certain. I'm not all that familiar with Marshal Nim, but I'm told she's the most aggressive commander among the marshals. She would not miss an opportunity like that without a good reason, I think."

"The Tribes have always turned on each other when rebellions turn sour," Robber said, "but this is... wrong. Too early. They're winning, too."

He did not, I thought, sound even slightly disapproving of the goblin tribes beginning to sell each other out to the Tower at the first hint of defeat. There was something in me that was disgusted by the notion – Gods, what kind of Callowan would sell out their own just because the going got rough? – but I forcefully reminded myself that goblins did not see the world as most humans did.

"No rebellion against the Tower ever lasted more than five years," Pickler quietly said. "My mother told me this, once, when I was a child."

"The Long War did," Robber argued. "It took fifteen years for them to put down Matron Trifler up in her hidden fortress."

"Trifler led one tribe and the castoffs of the rest," Pickler said. "After three years the rest of the Council had submitted to Sulphurous, and for the twelve years that follow it was a war of raiders against raiders."

Much as the Wasteland's history could be interesting – and I was pretty sure Dread Empress Sulphurous had actually died to the first known Shining Prince after cornering him out in the Fields of Streges – and the parts of it involving the goblin rebellions as bloody as they were fascinating, I'd not brought them here to speak of it.

"Why bring this up, Pickler?" I said. "The Grey Eyries haven't fallen."

Nor were they likely to, in my opinion. The reports of the Eyes made it clear that Matron Wither and her allies comprised less than a third of the tribes of the Confederation and that surprise had been the deciding element in her victory against her former allies. She might even be able to hold Foramen, given the wards and walls on the city, but if she tried to take the Eyries she was in for the same bloody slog Praesi armies went through every time they put down rebellion there. And unlike the Empire, she didn't have the numbers to simply take the casualties inflicted by constant vicious ambushes and keep advancing. Her people would know the grounds, sure, but so would the enemy.

"Because I do not believe my mother intends to go back to the Grey Eyries," Pickler said.

"She doesn't have the strength to fend off both the Confederation and the Empire," I slowly said. "To be honest, I'm not sure she has the strength to fend off either if they put their back into it."

"Malicia cannot tolerate losing the forges of her war machine to an independent power, from a practical perspective," Vivienne noted. "Not even one at war with her enemies. And it would see her overthrown by the High Lords, besides."

"Which she's gathering in Ater," I pointed out. "Where she has the Sentinels, the one force of soldiers that she can be assured the loyalty of."

They were hardly an army, mind you, and more like the personal guard of the reigning tyrant. But within Ater they were undeniably the largest stick around, even if I wouldn't bet on them against the household troops of most High Seats beyond those walls.

"It seems highly unlikely for her to attempt so risky a purge," my successor said. "Especially when the aristocracy is bound to come down firmly in her favour when the Carrion Lord comes for the Tower."

"You're missing the point, Boss," Robber quietly said. "Pickler's saying her mother doesn't think this can be won. So all she did was get her hands on goods to bargain with."

I blinked in surprise. This was, on the surface, madness. The Dread Empire was largely without allies at the moment. Sure, the Empress had probably made pacts in the eastern Free Cities, but none of them would be willing to march to war for her. And the Dead King had most the continent arrayed against him. Crusades with lesser forces than those gathered in Salia had driven him back into Keter, so why would Wither choose now to change sides? The Matrons were a cautious bunch: they'd waited until Thalassina was dust, half the legions were in effective exile and Callowan support was secured before finally striking. Why would Wither not wait a few more months before making her decision, at least to see how the Grand Alliance did against Keter?

"And what might she trade the return of Foramen for?" Vivienne asked.

"Rule over the rest of the Tribes," Robber suggested.

"That wouldn't hold," I said. "It solidifies goblins around a single ruler, even if it's a hated one."

And once the Tribes began to unify, a thousand years of Praesi work would begin to unravel. A coalition of tribes nudged into constant feuding by breeding restrictions and strictly limited trade was something the Tower could comfortably believe itself to be able to put down if it rose in rebellion, even with the difficulties inherent in campaigning in the Grey Eyries. An effective goblin queendom, though? That was a whole other kettle of fish. Even if the throne changed dynasties with every season, a common army and the ability to mobilize workforce from all tribes would make even a fledgling goblin state an utter nightmare to put down should it rebel. It would be much unlike Malicia to trade a short-term gain for a long-term disaster, considering she likely intended to reign until the long term came to pass. Especially when she could simply have waited until the goblin armies had bloodied each other then forcefully taken Foramen from whoever came out the victor.

I wished Akua was here, for her insights into Praes would have been welcome, but she had duties just as pressing. Someone needed to get in touch with our armies before they came out of the Twilight Ways, and though Masego still had the know-how he no longer had the sorcery. I'd told him to double down on exploring his theory, besides, with the help of the Rogue Sorcerer whenever he could be spared. If the Dead King was truly about to start flinging around a few millennia's worth of accumulated nastiness, we needed anything that might truly be able to make a difference.

"Agreed," Pickler said. "Nor is my mother a fool. If such an offer was made she would not have trusted it."

"Then what did she bargain for?" Vivienne asked. "The current situation is untenable, Senior Sapper. Her seizure of Foramen has been the death knell of our supply routes for steel and munitions. We've enough in Callow to fill the Army's stocks once more, but after that the well is dry."

And that was without even speaking of the Legions-in-Exile, who after a year of campaigning had expended the vast majority of their own stocks. Marshals Juniper and Grem had combined their stores while they were fighting together in Iserre, but fought they had. There wasn't much left in those common stores, now.

Much of the Army of Callow's war doctrine came from the Legions of Terror, straight from the Reforms, and that meant the sappers had a major role as both combat units and siege engineers. Losing one of those for lack of munitions to furnish them with would be a blow, and an ill-timed one if we were to fight Keter in the coming months. Against the hordes of the dead, goblin munitions would make a massive difference. One we badly needed if we were to have a prayer of holding the northern fronts.

"Poison Tooth," Pickler said, quoting the scroll I'd handed her. "Bitter Stride, Clay Sun, every single tribe listed here – they are all face-tribes."

"Pickler," Robber hissed.

"That is not preserved knowledge, Robber," she dismissed. "The Taghreb figured out that much centuries ago. And even if it was, what would the Preservers do?"

"The Preservers," I slowly said.

"There are some among our kind that are tasked with the preservation of secrecy," Pickler said.

Robber, never one to miss an occasion to be grisly, slit his throat with a finger.

"Loose tongues lead to open throats," Robber said. "Even a child knows that."

"And the Legions allow this?" I frowned.

"Not openly," Pickler conceded. "Yet Marshal Ranker did not join her entire tribe to the Carrion Lord's cause without requiring concessions, in the days before the Conquest. As for the days before the Reforms, well..."

What did your average Dread Emperor care for goblins killing each other, she meant. Not a lot, most likely, and they'd have to know that trying too hard to get at goblin secrets would mean a rebellion. I doubted that the common assertions that only goblins spoke the goblin tongues was true, but then Black had taught me they regularly changed their spoken language so that it could not ever truly be grasped.

"I made no such concessions," I flatly said.

"They would have sought them from you, in time," Pickler said, hissing through her teeth. "Made sale of steel and munitions contingent on them."

"Allow me to be perfectly clear," I said, tone clipped. "In choosing to serve in the Army of Callow, you have become citizens of Callow. With all rights and protections so afforded."

"We do not make exceptions to this," Vivienne said, voice as offended as I felt. "And if the old crones think they can twist our arms over such a matter with trade, then they will be taught otherwise harshly."

Robber looked, to my deep unease, almost helpless.

"You don't understand," he said. "It is... you, we... We just don't spill secrets, Boss. It's not what we do. It's not what a goblin does."

"Matrons talk," Pickler said, tone embittered. "All else hold their tongue. That is our way."

We had, it seemed, tumbled into a deeper pit than I'd thought. It would not be bridged tonight, I thought, and there were prior callings. Best move on.

"Face-tribes," I said. "Is that what I think it is?"

"Tribes who represent us with outsiders," Pickler said. "The High Ridge learn and speak with the Taghreb, by custom, but under my mother the Banu of Foramen were the humans cultivated. No doubt the secrets she stole and traded helped the Confederation take the city from the Banu and helped her take it from the Confederation."

"And all the other tribes she allied with have similar purposes?" I pressed.

"The Bitter Strides are a dark hand by custom – they hurt in concert with another tribe that speaks sweetly – but they too know well the peoples of the Hungering Sands," Pickler said.

Suddenly Pickler's assertion that her mother did not intend to return to the Grey Eyries sounded more believable. Matron Wither had assembled allies that could navigate the Wasteland and only that kind, which implied those were the people she had a use for.

"Fuck," I said. "She's trying for nobility, isn't she? With so many nobles dead the Empress can find her a holding somewhere, and she'll take in her allied tribes as retainers."

"Thalassina was obliterated with sorcery, but it has a strategic location and great prestige as a holding," Vivienne said. "A worthy reward, perhaps, for one returning Foramen to the Tower."

The knock on the door saw my irritation rise sharply, but I mastered it. A young Callowan soldier – fair-haired, likely southern of birth – entered, face anxious. He was bringing, he said, word from Lord Hierophant and Royal Advisor Kivule as well Lord Adjutant. Contact had been made with the Army of Callow. My brow rose, since Akua had told me it was unlikely to work until we were much closer to dawn. Hierophant's presence must have helped more than anticipated.

"Noted," I said. "You may leave."

He looked like he wanted to twist his hands anxiously, but he spoke up again.

"Your Majesty," he said, "your presence has been required."

I frowned.

"I left Lord Adjutant with them to see to anything that might require my presence in the first place," I said.

"And it is he that sent me to you, Your Majesty," the boy said. "I am to tell you that the Army of Callow has left the Twilight Ways, and is now encamped in northern Bayeux."

It took me a moment to place the principality in my mind – it was south of Arans, where my army was meant to march, and had commanded one of the two paths into the Red Flower Vales before the passes were collapsed. Well short of where they should be.

"Are the Legions-in-Exile with them?" Vivienne asked.

The boy shook his head.

"My lady, they left," he got out. "And Marshal Juniper has placed herself under arrest, along with almost third of the officers in the army."

Insanenoodlyguy

"And I am here to speak for the common goblin, I assume," Robber grinned, pearly needle-like teeth gleaming. "Allow me then to present our demands: first, we would like larger cookpots. The ones we have can't fit a full Proceran child. Second, vote."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

okay this one's good

Gunslinger

I've not been following comments for a while but how did we get to reviews of voting comments lol?

Liliet

Once upon a time, voting comments consisted of “Go vote for pgte on topwebfiction!” and a voting link.

Then the Fire nation attacked...

stevenneiman

TZKS has a lot more where people take a quote from the post and change it to be about voting, but that’s because it has shorter posts which I think make it easier to remember quotes.

Barthumphries

And the typo thread. Geez, it’s like y’all want Malicia to win. You know she’s the one who sneaks in typos.

I’d found it shockingly impressive that Matron Wither has succeeded at ensuring no other matron was appointed
Change has to had

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Can anyone remind me why there are no goblin named?

Big Brother

It’s not that there aren’t, it’s just that there’re no known Named. Names are born from the culture they appear in, and with a secretive culture like the goblins, all their Named could be like Scribe where your attention just slides off of them and you forget they were there.

Javvies

Names are a cultural thing, and goblins and goblin culture are all about secrets.

As such, any goblin Names would presumably also heavily prioritize secrets and secrecy.

Zggt

A pet theory of mine is that “Saboteur” is a Goblin family of Names (like Knight), and as such no one ever assumes it’s a result of a Name since a great act of sabotage is, after all, untraceable.

superkeaton

Presumably because there’s got to be a Story for it first, and goblins are so secretive that their Named, if they have any, might manifest in more subtle ways.

Darkening

Yeah, I just went to double check and in chapter 15 of book one, Black theorizes what everyone's saying about Names being a reflection of the cultures that spawned them and that the obsession with secrecy that goblins have, goblin Named would be incredibly subtle and hard to notice. The whole thing with Chider was odd though. Though she was also orange if I recall and I'm not sure we've ever gotten an explanation for that. Anyways, it's either that or they just never leave the Eyries except in cases where they can slaughter everyone that might possibly witness their existence. There's no excuse like with the orcs where their culture was destroyed, the goblins might have a messy, chaotic culture, but it is a culture. If nothing else there'd be some kind of archetypal matron or something.

RandomFan

Chider isn't that weird. Squire was selecting which narrative of "integration with Praes" it was going for, I suspect. Two outsiders were candidates, this time. Two traditional Praesi from different tribes, each whom probably sought their own narrative tied to the thing, but I bet Chider was, like Cat, trying to make Goblins better off through working with Praes- or at least that that's a theme her narrative would have contained. The fact that Chider even could become a Squire is already a sign that Goblins were "Of Praes"- worth reminding that Orcs haven't had a name since they were a separate culture, so I bet you have to be part of a culture to claim its names.

There might be backstory reason that don't make it about Goblins, but the reason Chider was publically going for a Name is because Chider was going for a Praesi Name as a Praesi citizen. It doesn't require that goblins don't have Names.

daegone823

Just putting it out there so far the Calamities were composed of:

A Prostitute who became a ruler

A werewolf who became a captain

An Apprentice who became a Warlock/Father/Lover how did this become my favorite book romance

An Elf that became a Ranger

A ? who became a Scribe

Why not a Goblin who becomes an Assassin(it so secretive no one can discern the face of the creature, each Calamity has a counterpart or connection with the woe his was Vivienne a thief who gave up her identity)

I am guessing a Goblin of royal descent appeared at the Black Knights tent. He or she was doing there job silencing one of his own for revealing a deep secret about goblins his second tak was to kill Malicia before she takes power. The Black Knight of course wanted to execute the goblin but Malicia stepped in and was able to convince the goblin to do more for his tribe. His skill with murder could be used to take out more than just Goblins for instance Praes royalty and provide his clan a place at the table. She of course does this all while looking away from him allowing him to keep his identity a secret.

This would solidify his allegiance to the empress who wanted assassinations to send messages. Hinting at the thiatricall way people were taken care of. Also it gives credence to Goblin secrecy, his name would cause him to give up his very face in order to assume a thousand different bodies to both assassinate and keep his identity, as a goblin a secret from even his allies.

Liliet

We know Assassin was trained in some assassin school and as a graduation exercise killed everyone else in it (iirc).

Adrian V

Killed everyone else using everyone else, as a sort of joke since he almost always uses something useless or unimportant in his murders xD

Jarthon

Well, except in cases where they need people to think that it wasn't Assassin. He does whatever is necessary to get the job done as Black implied in one of the earlier chapters or as when the glass was poisoned after Hanno fought the calamities.

Cap'n Smurfy

It's entirely possible there are Goblin Named and in my own opinion very likely given their strong culture. But since Goblin's value secrecy so much their Named would be hidden and secret. Black proposed that theory, in Book 1 or 2 I think.

IDKWhoitis

They have em, they just are likely to be secretive and good at hiding. Names reflect the cultures they come from.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Cool, thank you all.

stevenneiman

Pick your favorite

- Goblins are super paranoid and secretive. Named paragons of goblin culture even more so to the point that they are able to keep their very existence secret at least from non-goblins

- Goblin culture was too damaged by being conquered by the Meizans and then made a client state of the Dread Empire. Their old Names were lost and they haven't developed any new ones.

Mammon

There are also no goblin mages, until it was revealed that those were taken deep below the mountains to never see the light of day, presumably to summon, bind and dissect demons for green fire. Goblin Named are likely the same secret ones, or the Matrons.

caoimhinh

We have Black's theory that Goblins have Names but they are very secretive.

ALSO, there is evidence of the Bard interacting directly with a Goblin, even before interacting with the known Named humans at the scene.

In Book 2 Chapter 32 "Draw", right after the fight with the Demon, Catherine and Akua confronted and Heiress pushed for a draw (solidifying the Pattern of Three), then Wandering Bard appeared in the middle of a line of sappers, she made her presence known by throwing a bottle of liquor to Akua.

The interesting part is that the current working hypothesis for everyone (both in-universe and outside) is that the Intercessor can only act through Named, but she clearly interacted with at least one female goblin, Lieutenant Rattler, before throwing the bottle, as shown when Robber asks why that line of sappers wasn't attacking the Bard, Rattler answers that the Bard had bribed her and she would give half of it to Robber.

When the Bard disappears right as the goblins detonate the tiles of the roof over which she was standing, Lieutenant Rattler is shown biting one of the coins the Bard had given her and cursing as she noticed it was fake.

So... either Lieutenant Rattler has a Name, the Bard can interact with non-Named, or this was made before EE had decided on the rule that the Intercessor could only directly interact with Named.

Maybe something else?

Liliet

There is no rule Bard can only interact with Named and there has never been. You think William's and Hanno's bands would not have noticed that? When Bard first appears in the Free Cities after reincarnation she swipes someone's bottle and briefly chats with the bartender before going to meet Hanno.

What she cannot do, apparently, is appear places where there aren't Named or other great story weight. She cannot just choose to manifest anywhere she likes. She can, however, go any places she likes on foot as long as she's already there and isn't being urgently called on for another duty.

Oh, she also interacted with Barika Unonti, Akua's helper, in the demon standard place. Threw sand at her.

KageLupus

Exactly. It's not that Bard can't interact with non-Named, she can't interfere with non-Named. From a narrative perspective that is a very big difference.

Bard can talk to normal people, and bribe goblins with fake money, and do any other activity that would look "normal" for a Named who wasn't an immortal body-hopper.

What Bard can't do is stop a pair of Elves hellbent on murder from striking down someone without a Name. That would be messing with the wrong part of the story. Scaring the Elves away from Akua so she could go from Heiress to Diabolist is allowed though, since that is nudging the Story in an acceptable manner.

Liliet

Yeah. She's limited on meta level, not object level. She's limited in her actions on the basis of what consequences they would have, not actions themselves.

Mind screwy but hey the entire 'narrative is an actual force' thing always was.

stevenneiman

I think her interactions need to focus on a Named, but I don't think she's barred from interacting with other people in service of it. Bribing the sappers was clearly in service of shaping her interaction with Cat, so it was allowed.

skovbenjamin

I was wondering about this. The current main theory is that their names are super secretive. Names draw on stories of a culture but goblins are obsessive about not sharing things and that might even apply to stories. If everything is an advantage over the other tribes then why would you ever give them the chance to hear about an impressive member of your tribe by letting someone tell the story. The goblins might not have named because their culture lacks collective stories because nothing is ever shared enough to become a story. What kind of story would a goblin Named be part of, they can't be part of a rebellion without revealing themselves or drawing in other Named to the story and internal goblin politics is intentionally small and casual. If the goblins have some sort of secret culture deep underground it might have stories but might not be large enough to sustain a narrative for a Named. Based on this they could have a single Named ruler or champion related to some ancient story that hasn't ended but I think their culture and civilization isn't big enough to have an entirely self contained narrative.

The drow didn't have Named either because their culture didn't have stories anymore, Rumena and a few other ancient drow might recall old legends but collectively the drow don't have strong cultural narratives in their current state. I would expect that in a generation or two for Named to begin appearing maybe even during the war on Keter but only once they have recovered or developed stories or as part of another nations narrative (like how Hakram has a non orc name).

Bellephron also never developed Named because their culture rejects them but also possibly because their culture doesn't supply any stories except for their founding legend because a story would glorify an individual over others or might even tacitly acknowledge the authority of a foreign tyrant.

Overall I'm proposing that if a culture lacks well disseminated stories they can't become Named without joining another culture's story as well as that a narrative requires a large enough stage to occur and that goblins could lack these. This doesn't rule out the possibility that goblins have become named in the past by becoming part of another culture's story and just kept it a secret but providence would be very unlikely to permit that to play out without the secret being revealed eventually.

onedollargum

Given how long-lived and cunning the matron line is, maybe they have a distributed name system (like the drow with their Night).

Liliet

Drow are priest-like, not Named-like.

Javvies

Well ... that can't be good.

Presumably the Legions in exile are going to Praes.
Only question is if this is Malicia utilizing her hidden mind control hooks or something else.

Slider

What just happened in the end?

naturalnuke

Malicia has an aspect that lets her imbed orders in people's brains to make sleeper agents. She's spent the time to infect every officer graduate of the war college.

I believe they just got activated.

alele

When did we ever see Malicia's aspects?

konstantinvoncarstein

I think it was in the chapter where she killed Akua's mother. She has Rule, and she can use it to boost her Speaking. It is possible for her to plant commands in others and activate them later, and she did so at least with all officer in the 3 Wastelands Legions. I don't know if she did the same with other Legions.

Javvies

Malicia secretly put mind control hooks into every high ranking Legion officer she could.
The only question is where the cutoff lies. Though presumably there would have been some exceptions, such as officers of lesser rank with ties to the High Lords and other nobles.

It's one of the reasons people think Malicia has control issues and was never a true believer in Amadeus's New School Pragmatic Villainy, and was always at heart a Classic Old School Villain who was only going along with Amadeus's plans and practices while she benefited.

konstantinvoncarstein

Officers with ties to the nobility would have on the contrary be a priority, they were at the most likely to betray her.

I think Malicia is at heart practical. She was satisfied by owning only Callow, be at peace with everyone and disdained the grandiose projects of her predecessor. Even the flying city was never meant to be used. She used old-school methods only when she had nothing left.

Fayhem

> I think Malicia is at heart practical. She was satisfied by owning only Callow, be at peace with everyone and disdained the grandiose projects of her predecessor. Even the flying city was never meant to be used. She used old-school methods only when she had nothing left.

Indeed. You could, in a way, make an argument that her attachment to Practical Villainy was only ever... practical. As opposed to Amadeus', which crossed over into ideological.

Jacob McNeer

Yeah, it's ironic that Amadeus is an idealist while Malicia is a Pragmatist, considering that one reformed the legions and the other put a super complicated, multi-layered plan into effect in order to get a mobile fortress city that can spit out permanent gateways to hell.

Liliet

He's adorable, isn't he?

And, uh, probably right. Selfless idealists get a boost in this universe, after all~

jamesc9

I'm re-reading, and found a link to the chapter that includes Rule:
<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/04/closure/>

Walter

If that was the case, tho, why is Juniper able to put herself under arrest? It seems like a weird thing for Malicia to make her do.

superkeaton

First the rise, then the fall. Ebb and flow, Cat. Good luck with this shit hand.

naturalnuke

Oh, ooooooh, Malicia is finally reeling in all those hooks she's been digging into officers.

JJR

It looks like they just got order 66ed.

doominator10

"And Marshal Juniper has placed herself under arrest, along with almost third of the officers in the army"

Excuse me the fuq?

Andrew Mitchell

Refer to the comments above. Those points also apply to Army of Callow commanders who were once part of the Legions.

Insanenoodlyguy

It is odd Juniper has placed herself under arrest. This is not her failure, even if she gave insult the legion would only move for black or malicia.

My theory: It was Malicia. The hooks have been sunk in deeper then we thought, and not just in the legion. Juniper HELPED them leave. And in doing so betrayed both her Warlord and the Carrion Lord. Realizing after there is only one reason she'd have done that, she took herself and anybody else that fit her new definition of potentially compromised out of the chain of command.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe. Or perhaps Juniper felt the order too and instead of obeying she put herself and all the other Army of Callow officers who were ex-Empire under arrest so they didn't do anything Malica wants.

Shveiran

If resisting the order is that easy, the aspect is unlikely to be a game changer. Juniper is not the only one with strong loyalties, and Malicia developed this to counter Black's influence on the Legions he shaped.

gingerlygrump

Juniper has been repeatedly praised by Cat as one of the smartest people she's ever met. Don't underestimate her ability to sidestep an opponent.

Liliet

Agreed. If Malicia's order did not include "don't arrest yourself",,,

Crash

If it was anyone else, I would agree. But this is, in fact, Juniper.

She's likely to go into a train of thought of "why am I doing this and is it actually useful from a tactical standpoint?" if the answer is no and the wish to do the thing does not go away, I'm pretty sure that'd trip all sorts of alarms in her brain.

Now, I'm nto saying she resisted it, but I do think she would find it in herself to obstruct the possibility as best she could before trying to do it. So maybe Malicia said "Do A" and Juniper thought okay I'll do A, but before I do that I'm just gonna place myself under arrest. And then from prison she goes "hey guys let's do A" which is, of course, promptly ignored.

Juniper is taking a nap right now.

JJR

I don't think it's quite that simple. Juniper is clever enough to do it sure, but I don't think she'd be uniquely clever such that only she managed it and none of the Legion in Exile officers did out of loyalty to Black.

I think part of the explanation is going to stem from the fact that the Army of Callow is no longer part of the legions. If the sleeper order was outdated in this regard then there's an opening for Juniper that Legion officers can't use. Something like, "return all legion soldiers under your command to Ater an and take any appropriate action needed to ensure you are unhindered."

Well, what do you know, turns out that arresting 1/3 of the officers of the Army of Callow will create exactly the sort of disarray the Legions could use to get away. That these are also the compromised officers, welcome to r/maliciouscompliance.

Crash

Didn't mean to imply she was the only one capable of it, I reckoned Marshall Grem had his own scheme prepared to spring on the way to/upon arrival to Praes. That said... This makes a lot of sense and I like it a lot more than the half baked tangent my brain went on about the story of the Army of Callow.

Thanks, mate.

Liliet

Ey.

Shrikne

So... Does this mean Abigail is now the highest-ranking officer not under arrest in the Army of Callow, as she's the highest ranking member not from the 15th if I remember correctly?

Crash

She absolutely is. Isn't that great? She must be nearing a meltdown right now. It's gonna be fun.

I also hope that Hune somehow got out unscathed. I don't recall her original rank within the legion but it might have been low enough to not warrant a Ruling. It'd be fun to have that foil and very different perspective to Cat in the council dealing with the biggest breach in the Army of Callow.

Liliet

She has always had second highest rank after Juniper – when Juniper was a legate she was a tribune, when Juniper was a general she was a legate, etc.

I don't think Malicia would overlook her, unfortunately =x

Quite Possibly A Cat

Ah, that Malacia and her mind control. It is a big single point of failure. I guess they really need to stab her now.

Wait, is that why she's gathering the High Lords? Mind Control? That's certainly one way of getting the High Lords to behave.

konstantinvoncarstein

The last time an Empress tried that, she was swiftly killed.

Walter

Cat notes here that the high lords are almost certain to back Malicia vs. Black, but I can't shake the suspicion she is gathering them up to slaughter them. Her energy is still dirtbag left angry barmaid, in my eyes. Like, her siding with the rich vs. Amadeus just doesn't feel like a thing that might happen.

I bet she uses them as a big sacrifice or something, probably after playing them off against one another with the offer of Chancellor.

Liliet

Ah, but in her eyes this isn't a class struggle conflict. It is for Amadeus, in many ways, but he's never put it like that to her and it's not what she sees.

She sees Praes struggling to survive, singularly, and Amadeus making mistakes and suboptimal moves (same as he thinks of her) – as she also is too proud to submit even if she knows that if she sided with him he'd win. A lot of her energy is also 'a woman who was once a near-slave to a man and will not allow that to happen again'.

NZPIEFACE

I trust Juniper to have a reason for this, so how the hell did she fuck up this time.

Insanenoodlyguy

She's comprised herself. So she cordoned off everybody in the chain of command who potentially is.

Andrew Mitchell

This.

gingerlygrump

Juniper may not ever gain a name, but she sure as hell deserves to be a General, or a Brilliant Tactician, etc.

gingerlygrump

Or the Marshall, since that's what she actually is.

Fayhem

I agree, but I feel like a Name that's also a normal title should get an adjective to make it easier to distinguish from the normal title – Marshal Juniper really doesn't sound that easy to distinguish from Juniper, the Marshal. But what adjective suits for Juniper? I rather like the Steely Marshal as a Name for her personally.

gingerlygrump

Calculating Commander?

Liliet

I'd argue The Marshal would suit just fine as a Name – we have Captain and Adjutant as precedent. Names are exactly that – titles and nicknames given additional weight, not unique identifiers. Even Hedge Wizard is an example – there was apparently a hedge mage guild in Callow.

jonnney

She has the intellect for it, but lacks the passion required. The certainty that something is incorrect in the world and that they have the ability to change it. It is similar to why Robber remains nameless. They are both wonderful characters who are the best in their field, yet they come from cultures which can't have names and are too subservient to the way things are done to break that mold.

gingerlygrump

It's too bad, really. Juniper IS war. Robber IS the knife in the dark. They are both wildly passionate about those things.

But- as you said- they're conditioned to be followers. They kneel.

Which sucks. I want a lot of things for our band of scrappy oddballs and misfits, but what I want most of all is for them to live through this godsdamned war. And those without Names are so fragile. Other than Cat, of course, but we're not even sure what she is at this point.

Liliet

We know Aisha and Juniper live through this war, because future epigraphs :3

I'd say it's not so much followers/kneeling, as supporting Names exist (Adjutant, Captain, Scribe), as lack of clarity/weight/sharp point. Juniper is not making a name for herself except as an expert among experts. She's a background player, and she stands among equals as far as those on her level are. She's just not special enough, and I'd actually argue this spells better things for her life expectancy than if she got a Name. Currently, she's not a target.

Cap'n Smurfy

It never rains but it pours. I know Malicia is particularly talented at Speaking, but this kind of hidden order contingencies reeks of Aspect tier power.

Actually do we have any hints about what Malicia might have as aspects? As far as name powers go we've seen her projecting herself into others, speaking with incredible skill and appearing outright supernaturally beautiful. Maybe magic was involved in some parts but Malicia isn't a sorceress. Any guesses on aspect names? Manoeuvre or Orchestrate strike me as possible social ones.

Death Knight

I don't know about her not being a sorceress. EE mentioned in a comment way back in Book 1 when someone asked if magic (necromancy specifically) will become a staple of Cat's Name powers and he said that nothing Cat would be able to do would compare to what Wekesa or Alaya could do on a good day.

Liliet

You're mixing up two different WoGs. The comparison to Wekesa and Alaya was about Name power tiers, and the necromancy question got the answer 'not as good as an actual necromancer'.

gingerlygrump

You have an impressive memory, Liliet. I've reread this story several times now and I can't remember half the stuff you do.

Liliet

You haven't argued about it as extensively as I have!

Also, WoG document is much shorter than the entire story and much easier to reread in its entirety... 9.9

(Also, I recommend reading liveblogs. All the re-remembering of important details, much less time and attention span required!)

(Also writing liveblogs. Once you've written your thoughts on something down, it's much easier to remember. It's kind of like taking notes in class, only more fun)

konstantinvoncarstein

It is a copy of one of my previous comment:

She has Rule, and she can use it to boost her Speaking. It is possible for her to plant commands in others and activate them later, creating unknowing sleeper agents. She did so at least with all officers in the 3 Wastelands Legions. I didn't know she did the same with other Legions.

konstantinvoncarstein

And the puppet thing is done by using a method created by Nefarious, so i suppose mages are needed for that. The supernatural beauty is probably linked to her Name, and maybe a spell cast by one of her mage.

And Malicia is no mage, « only » a very good politician.

Insanenoodlyguy

The way it was described, she's obscenely beautiful to start, her name enhances it with presence to draw attention and fill with awe/fear/lust, and her clothes further enchanted to get that attention to begin with.

So she's got a few buffs but even if dispelled she still has the highest CHA bonus in the room.

Liliet

She is also very specifically skilled at making the exact impression she wants to. This is the part that comes through through the puppet 100% – it's unsettled Catherine in Book 3 and now it's how she recognized when Malicia fully inhabited the body.

Liliet

So her native Cha is probably slightly lower than Amadeus's and Catherine's – beauty is not all there is to it, and she isn't known for drawing followers to her cause just with the strength of passion the way these two do – but she makes up for it with goddamn expertise in persuasion, deception and performance.

And Name-driven and enchantment buffs.

Insanenoodlyguy

The subreddit just floated this idea, so I can't take credit but: if all the older officers of the war college who make up most of the higher ranks are for the moment compromised, then a new Marshall is needed for the time being. One who can be trusted, who has the pull and the respect, and who never went to college.

MARSHAL ABIGAILS LEGEND BEGINS .

nimelennar

After that, it's only a matter of time before she's made Heir to the Throne of Callow.

TAP_M113

EXACTLY! Above is trying to apply the cuckoo strategy!

Gift an above-powered name fuelled by Comic relief and providence to a reluctant farmer girl dragged into a position of power, that bumbles its way to posts of responsibility, and that when her mentor (Catherine) tragically dies is comically dragged into Kingdom against her will?

That story is a Tsar-Bomba on its own right, and it could very well work, since Catherine is too soft-hearted to kill any comic relief character that isn't aligned to Evil, or that doesn't have a hidden depth, or grounded in grim reality.

I hope Cat's entourage realizes it and has a serious talk with Abigail about meta-narrative, or she could unwittingly ruin EVERYONE` s work....

You know you are going to die when the Heavens grant a comic relief name to somebody you slipped into mentoring...
Gods, I dread and hate Abigail. Nothing personal, she is just made to get a whole lot of people killed, unless she sees the writing on the wall and seriously tends to her responsibilities.

Liliet

She's not a farmgirl.

You're... reading way too much into this, dude.

Also I'm personally still waiting for Shining Princess Vivienne. Now that would be a move on Above's part worthy of Below's finest tricks: "aand we are retroactively claiming ALL of this as having been in our favor all along".

TAP_M113

Oh yes, that is the second prong on the offensive.

But Vivienne would get it and reject the name.

Abigail, of common birth, out of her depth and already idolized by the rank and file?

She doesn't know anything about the dangers of metanarrative or how Catherine and friends want to craft a world without divine/narrative interference, and is desperate for ANYTHING that offers her an advantage to get out of this mess....

She would take the name bait hook, line and sinker. And you kill people or reduce their narrative weight by getting them to mentor someone, a narrative mistake Cat already has done...

Will it work that way? With a bit of luck, maybe not. Is it a sly and dangerous move? Absolutely. It would be a welcome test of maturity for Catherine to take that deadly situation and turn it around into an asset, that would be Amadeus-grade narrative Kung-fu.

Maybe get Aisha or Juniper to act as her mentors? If she gets training and the comic relief goes away, that would relieve much of the danger....

Jacob McNeer

Several problems with this theory.

1: Narrative force doesn't affect everyone equally. It seems to affect gods the most, then demigods (fey), then Named and then, after a huge gap, regular humans. One of the main reasons Cat delights in not having a Mantle or a Name is that there is no role forcing her to conform and she doesn't have to worry as much about the story turning against her. (Can you imagine what would have happened if she had a Mantle or Name when she was bluffing the cavalry charge? "Arrogant Villain trampled into the dirt!") She only has to worry about it when she is considering her friends, allies and enemies. This is why Cordelia was able to get so far despite not having a meta bone in her body, The Story doesn't affect her because she is not one of the Named Characters. What I'm trying to say is that the story hasn't affected Abigail to be the "crouching coward, hidden badass" comic relief character, it's not some hidden trap designed by above or below. She's just naturally that way.

2: Most Named don't have a choice about getting or losing their Names. Cat and Cordelia are the exception, not the rule. Black became the Squire in the heat of battle after seeing the previous Black Knight because he relied too much on his awesome power and not enough on common sense. Masego became Apprentice after becoming fed up with everyone's inaccuracies and incompetence. Iridani became Archer after she was offered a taste of freedom. Vivienne became the Thief because she wanted to make every single Praesi pay for what they did to her mother and her country, and she lost the Name when she no longer felt that way. In every single example I gave they had no choice about becoming Named (many of them didn't realize that they had become one until afterwards) and Vivienne had no choice about losing her name and if she did she wouldn't have lost it because she was still really insecure at the time. Neither Vivienne nor Abigail would most likely have any choice in the matter if they became Named, it would be due to their will, longing and the way they see the world.

2.5: While it's clear that Vivienne understands why Cat doesn't want Named leading Nations, we don't know whether she feels the same way, especially since its basically an open secret that that part of the Liesse Accords is going to be bargained away. It is quite possible that Vivienne wouldn't see anything wrong with becoming a Good Queen (I'm pretty sure that Shining Prince(ss) is a Procer Name).

Liliet

Amadeus actually deliberately chose to lay claim to the Name of Squire. It's how Praesi Names usually work – ambition-driven, you have to be TRYING to get it. But that's specific to a particular category of Names, not a universal thing. For most of them, yeah, you usually just get slotted into the groove without the pivot informing you what it's about, if you even get one at all.

Narrative actually affects regular people a lot, just... slightly, en masse. What is unusual about Named is more the disproportionate amount in which they affect the narrative. Where a regular person would be lumped in with everyone else in their broad category in, say, successfully repelling the Dead from their borders yet again, regardless of their personal choices, a Named has the story react to their every move, and that's why they're so vulnerable to making mistakes and prone to getting huge bonuses.

That said, Above doesn't guide narratives in the way described in the post above. What influence there is is subtle, there is just impression of much greater inteference in-universe because things tend to align narratively in the way Gods are assumed to like, and inconsistencies are faith'd away. Note how Cat was declared heretic after strong-arming angels in First Liesse – everyone can tell something went wrong, they just aren't quite sure how.

I think Abigail is a genuine supportive narrative to Cat, the same way Rat Company was. Back in Book 1, the story demanded that Catherine get a smooth ride to her first command, with a convenient ambitionless Ragtag Band of Misfits to win over. Now, if we infer from the convenience of Abigail's rise just when and where her particular talents (deescalation of conflicts) are needed, the story is demanding that Callow not fall apart in Catherine's hands, and doesn't that have interesting implications?

Liliet

OH DEF

Whatever the fuck it is that just happened (my theory was that Juniper helped Grem because of personal reasons and then placed herself under arrest cause she's conscientious like that), Marshal Abigail is like 99% definitely a go.

Welcome to hell, gurl.

TAP_M113

Oh shit NO. She lacks the qualifications, she is fully narrative-driven, she is fully powered by chance and luck..

The army of Callow is going to be lead by a Comic relief-powered name. FROM ABOVE.

Dear Gods, Abigail is basically made from magic swords. This is how Above kills Catherine in revenge for all her progress.

How come she is not seeing Above's dagger? When the Choirs want to murder you, they send the comic relief, ensure critical points of the plan and positions in your army are held by incompetents, and gift you magic swords.

Abigail is all of those, laced with Cyanide and tons of goblinfire for good measure. Please somebody save Juniper, so she can deliver us from this grim fate

Liliet

Abigail is actually damn well qualified. Catherine made sure of it, tutored her herself, remember? Abby is a mess of anxiety into terror, but she's good at her job. To her utter dismay.

Fayhem

This exactly. Abigail truly is the Ciaphas Cain of the Guideverse – she talks herself down constantly in her POVs, but that's a self-image thing and not an actual competence thing. She is genuinely good at this and has the potential to succeed at handling even more responsibility, and she is so incredibly uncomfortable with that idea that her psyche subconsciously refuses to recognize it.

Walter

Great observation re: Ciaphas Cain. It is just that same energy. Abigail feels like an utter fraud and constantly talks up her desire to escape, but what she actually does is all the things a heroic callowan soldier would do.

Fayhem

> Great observation re: Ciaphas Cain.

Thanks! In the interests of honesty I have to disclose that I'm definitely not the first person to make that comparison in the comments, though – I was using it because it seemed super apt to me as well when I saw it.

It really is that same energy though, right down to the dissonance between her internal monologue and what actually winds up happening being played up for comedic effect to the reader (while practically all the actual in-universe characters around her remain totally oblivious and in awe of her). And I guess here Cat would be filling the Amberley role, not romantically obv but rather in that she sees through both layers of Abigail's facade – Cat can see through Abigail's external facade and realizes that she sees herself very differently than others see her, and she can see through Abigail's internal denial and realizes that she is actually genuinely competent/good at this. And she just chooses not to ever explicitly call Abigail out on any of it bc why fix what ain't broken, right?

Liliet

I think she's tried to help Abigail with her anxiety issues and realized it's truly beyond her power. Or, well, to the degree that it's working, it's doing so very slowly.

ChillyPepper

I think people seem to forget she managed to hold her own pretty well against a surprise attack that killed her commanding officer and threw the army into a pit of chaos and instead focus on the sad anxiety narrative of hers.

Liliet

IKR.

Insanenoodlyguy

When did you get the idea she was incompetent? Every one of her ideas has made sense. She is a person who's moves work better than expected but she's never made a move that only worked because pure narrative bullshit.

ninegardens

I mean... we've seen her explicitly come up with plans that she's like "I'll ask for X, because I know they'll say no, and then I don't have to do this stupid plan" and "Oh god, I have to do something that is plausibly legit, but won't get me promoted"

Barthumphries

It happened with like all of her orders. They only succeeded because she got lucky but they made her seem prescient.

Liliet

That happened one (1) time, and even then the luck component was only in that her requisition made for different reasons ended up being usable in her situation. That she saw how to use it and used it was no coincidence, only that it was there for her to use.

Liliet

I will also note that in requesting knights, she needed to make her request seem plausible, so that she'd get demoted for incompetence, not tribunal'd for sabotage. She requested something that she thought would in retrospect make sense for her to request, just something she didn't expect to get granted anyway. Yes, that's subtle line she tried to ride, and she fell on the 'granted because plausible' end of it. Juniper didn't know what she was going to do with them but she believed it was possible she would do SOMETHING, because the knights really are a generally useful asset.

And so, because of an unsuccessful political play, Abigail ended up with a useful asset she didn't expect to have. And then used to to brilliant effect when there was in fact an opportune moment for it.

Would you really say no competence was involved at any point in that chain?

Ultimate_procrastinator

Why do you keep insisting she has a name? She doesn't, and even if Above offers her one, so long as she figures it out, it would be completely consistent for her to reject it because she doesn't want the work of being Named

Ben

I live this so much it made me comment for the first time!

TAP_M113

Welcome to the commentariat, brother!
Your application to second tier citizenry has been approved by the Ashur Thalassocracy. Enjoy the watch for new chapetrs with us!

WuseMajor

Are we certain that this isn't Black heading for Praes with an army at his back?

Goobinator101

This. Are they going to take the fight back to the Tower through the use of the Twilight Ways? He can keep Malicia busy while everyone focuses on the Dead King. A mind control aspect out of nowhere seems off.

Liliet

It's not out of nowhere, we knew about it from one of the extra chapters. And from pure Cat's-view-narrative point of view, now is the EXACT time Malicia is pulling all her hidden cards out of sleeves. It's perfectly fitting that she have a lot of those.

Liliet

He's still right here in Salia, and does not possess independent means of quick travel, let alone isntanteneous.

Well okay if Twilight gates are permanent he might have that. Still not instanteneous, and Cat would not let him go like that because that would be violating her agreements with allies and he knows it.

Too stupid for him.

Liliet

P.S. Scribe's agents reported to Vivienne on goblin movements. Sounds to me like Black's still there with them.

Walter

I feel like there is essentially zero chance Black isn't mind controlled right now. He has no Name, and we've already established that Named mind control utterly owns sorcery in the Cat/Lady Ime 'I could make you kill yourself' scene. Malicia talked to him in council, and we know she can Speak without actually Speaking from the interlude where she kills Talia.

If he was heading for Praes with an army at his back it would be to fight for Malicia as a puppet.

Liliet

A necromantic puppet cannot channel an Aspect power like that. If Malicia were there in person this would be an entirely different story – one in which everyone who saw her was in danger, but one where she herself would be vulnerable to getting killed then and there in turn. Entirely differently balanced dramatic stakes.

By using a puppet, Malicia keeps herself safe, but she is also unable to exert much of a threat through her mere presence – being, y’know, not present.

Walter

I disagree, lots of evidence for Named doing stuff at a distance.

1. Cat & Lady Ime conversation.
2. Everything DK does is through a necromantic puppet.
3. Cat animating her own corpse wasn’t impaired in using her power.

It might be that Malicia can’t use her power through a puppet, but it would be a weakness unique to her, and a really weird one for her to have, given her specialty.

Mammon

Malicia: Wait for it...

Malicia: Wait for it...

Malicia: Bit of intervening in Salia’s coup, and then wait for it...

Malicia: Wait just a little bit longer...

Malicia: Wait for Kairos to stop monologuing his death speech...

Malicia: Still waiting...

Malicia: Gods Below damn it Kairos, would you jus- Ah there we go.

Malicia: Just a little bit longer for good measure...

Malicia: And Operation There’s-no-other-Villains-to-overshadow-my-play-so-it’s-assured-to-be-serious-and-devastating-without-finite-doom-kneecapping-me is a go! Mind control, activate!

Dead King from the shadows: Foolish Dread Empress, by overshadowing my renewed invasion with your self-destructive plan you merely made the Heroes a target supported by Story to be defeated, while my forces are protected by the essential and Story-driven Heroes and Leaders’ attention being drawn elsewhere. My overwhelming forces will be successful without Story-intervention at pivots at every turn, and the bonus chapters will not suffice to stop my march.

Both Malicia and Dead King laugh maniacally

*Matron Wither, the final and most powerful Villain of this book series, stands in DK's shadows rubbing her hands together and mumbling 'Yes... Yes... Overshadow my villainry to enable me to further my plans unopposed. Yes...'

Liliet

I'm 100% buying that last one tbh.

TAP_M113

I love this comment!

Robber second demand reads as thus: Matron Wither for final boss! 😊

Crash

This is hilarious and if it wasn't bad narratively speaking to have your final villain come out of left field I would absolutely be loving this.

JJR

Need more Secretly Dread Emperor Traitorous All Along.

laguz24

Goddammit Malacia, you are trading short term gains for long term losses. You were already dead but this just leads to you guaranteed to be extra dead. Also if you are trying to mind control the entire Praesi court in addition to the goblin tribes then this is beyond stupid. You have no friends, all your 'allies' would want you dead at the drop of a hat, you are supposed to be smarter than this. Also if someone (not me) could find a full list of officers who would be affected that would be nice. Is marshal orim affected?

Liliet

"Every officer stationed in the Wasteland of legate rank or higher".

If it covers the Callowan + Exile Legions, then yes it covers Marsham Grem (I'm guessing that's who you mean, with Orim not being a Marshal). If she's that bold. IDK.

Also, she doesn't actually need to mind control the court, just show she's still in control and in power. They'll submit as long as she's clearly winning.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Orim the Grim? If someone with more patience could double-check, I thought Orim died during the Doom.

TAP_M113

Malicia has ALWAYS been smart.

She is actually getting all her objectives:

- Got the League as trading partners and allies, which are now THE naval superpower and under her thumb.
- She can retrieve Foramen and the Confederation is kicked back to the Eyries.
- DK is rampaging as intended.
- Callow armies & legions in Exile seem heavily compromised.

I bet she has a plan to always be a lesser evil and make her existence and rule acceptable to other powers.

Malicia has never crossed the moral event horizon, and trying to remove her from Praes would cause more problems it would solve, because at the end she is the sole remaining rational actor in the Wasteland and a patriot.

She knows it, and it is the cornerstone of her rule.

TAP_M113

At the end, the only dislikeable things she has done are:

- Doom of Liesse. The only thing undeniably Evil she indirectly did, and it was a nuclear deterrent she can plausibly deny when the X crusade threatened Praes with invasion and the loss of Callow, which would have resulted in as many, if not more deaths by starvation amongst Praesi citizenry.

-Ratface death, amongst other officials. Small change, modern countries kill each other agents far more often.

Did not hamper Cat nor Callow, whose "de facto" independence Malicia was nice enough to indirectly endorse – Something easily ended with Assassin waving his little fingers.

-Death King invasion: Second most damning grateful thing, until you realize that it could be a secret agreement with Bard to entice the Death King into a killing field. This could actually be an anti-villainous move; at the end, what better move to legitimate Praes in the international community than the DK head on a Pike after the Grand Alliance has been run ragged, and Praes unexpectedly saves the day?

I like Malicia. At the end, she has seemingly neglected meta-narrative, but everything she has done comes from a good place and with far less loss of life than Amadeus methods would.

It would be interesting to see Malicia making true their lifelong dreams for a new Praes from soft power, winning against Amadeus, then offering him the Chancellor post, with all the trust that comes implicit with it.

Alternatively, Malicia has actually planned for her defeat at the hands of Amadeus, and the Wasteland Nobility is trapped between the incoming hammer (Amadeus) while carefully held in place by the Anvil (Malicia).

At the end, there is no firmer chance of Victory for a Villain than the certainty of its defeat...Which means a Villain has quite a good deal of control and agency over it.

It would be original and humbling, and humility is a virtue. If there is something that I always liked about this tale, it is its originality and that results have a morality of their own...

Liliet

That would be damn cool. Both the idea of Alaya setting up for Amadeus's victory, and the idea of her having a secret agreement with Bard. I find the latter less credible than the former, and former less likely than her genuinely fighting back, but... Hm. I want that.

TAP_M113

Yes, I bet that Malicia wishes to win herself and keep her rule, but there is worse things in Meta-narrative and life to have your defeat condition be only a slightly weaker victory.

Malicia is smart, and I don't think she is going to go down in the narrative flames of old-school Evil as Amadeus seems to fear.

Win or loose, she is more interesting and likeable than that.

And having Wither granted nobility and goblins settled outside of the stifling pall of secrecy would be as great as a Strike for non-human rights and cause as the ones Amadeus did.

Both of them coincided in many things when it came to goals, it is on the methods where their disagreements always arose.

We laugh at Wither villainy, but that makes two big bold goblin emigration initiatives she has spearheaded. She is the Catherine of Goblkind, and wants her people to climb out of the crab bucket the Eyries are for her kind.

Goblins suffered a lot after the dwarves near-genocided them, it is logical they want to go out of their jail and explore their potential to the fullest. Whether this leads to a technological golden age for Calernia or a Malthus scenario followed by Gnome apocalypse remains to be seen...

Liliet

No technological golden age for Creation. Now, societal development golden age? 😊

mamm0nn

Why no technological golden age? Only thing the goblins have to do is put their sharpeners in tubes with a metal ball, upscale that to ballista size, make it accurate and powerful enough, go through a fantasy WWI and WWII to refine their means with practice and full war-effort economy, and then hopefully not find that the gnomes are even more advanced than WWII tech. No biggie, they can handle it. And if all else fail, they could weaponise the power of friendship by channelling it directly from Robber who's been bottling it up in the friend zone since book 1.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The gnomes won't politely wait for them to get there, they'll send a Red Letter at the first sign of trouble brewing. I'm pretty sure that a goblin Red Letter would ultimately be a Praesi one anyway, and Praes is already out of warnings before Gnome-ageddon ensues IIRC.

mamm0nn

Who said anything about politely waiting? Goblins, you've got... say... about three weeks? Three weeks to do all of the above. Get going.

From the upside, it's quite likely that the goblins can keep most to all of their developments a secret because it's all happening underneath the mountains. You can't tell me that the dwarven tech and means are not yet red letter worthy, but they're not letting the gnome satellites or whatever see them. They make sure that nothing but those low-tech slayers and the occasional mercenary band with axes appear on the surface. That the goblins were found out once before is likely because they did something on the surface like venting a kind of smoke that showed what they were doing, not that the gnomes can actually see through their stone into their tight-lip communities.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Okay, maybe so.

Liliet

> From the upside, it's quite likely that the goblins can keep most to all of their developments a secret because it's all happening underneath the mountains

We literally learned about gnomes from that one time someone in the Eyries was playing with powders. We explicitly START with establishing that yes, what goblins are doing is visible to gnomes.

> You can't tell me that the dwarven tech and means are not yet red letter worthy

Yes, I can. They use crossbows and ballistae, and magically bound familiars. Those aren't subject to gnomish restrictions, and all dwarven tech we see is explicitly under Red Letter level. I'll remind you that we see that underground, in their war against drow, which by your logic would be invisible to gnomes.

(But isn't)

Liliet

> and then hopefully not find that the gnomes are even more advanced than WWII tech.

LMAO

They were at that level thousands of years ago. Their technological development did not stop there.

And munitions are too unstable to be used in place of black powder. They work on magic, not chemistry, and so aren't quite so flexible and adaptable. Powdered devil, remember? Pickler is already flinging them with rope-powered siege weaponry, but a farming machine got a Red Letter.

Liliet

(Oh, and even without secret agreement with Bard, I'm pretty sure she's counting on DK being defeated either way – killed or pushed back. Him actually conquering the continent except for places she's bargained for is not plan A)

Liliet

Notably, appointing Wither as goblin nobility would secure her a steadfast ally against the High Lords. Not against Amadeus – he'd confirm goblin nobility in an eyeblink – but the old schoolers? Wither stays as long as Malicia/Amadeus's faction is in power and she knows it.

TAP_M113

Perfect analysis of the situation. Long-term, the output of goblin technology with the resources of Foramen would outstrip the power of the High Lords and solidify the rule of any Dread Emperor.

So Malicia methods are solidifying her dream of a stable Praes without putting Praesi nobility to the sword, balancing them with an additional opposed economic powerhouse instead...unless the matrons would only take two generations to get recognised by the High Lords as a delightful source of rocket fuel to the bonfire, and Praesi politics discovering fractal-grade backstabbing after Foramen Matrons teach them how you PROPERLY backstab your Dread Emperor with the lessons learned from millenia of Matron Orwelllian rule.

Everyone is gangster until the Matrons roll out the heavy scheming daggers...

Liliet

> unless the matrons would only take two generations to get recognised by the High Lords as a delightful source of rocket fuel to the bonfire

...that's what I would bet on.

A good short-term shore-up, though!

jonnnney

She is not using mind control on the goblins nor is she planning on doing so to the high lords. Malacia isn't trading short term gains for long term losses. Rather she is taking the next logical step in the Reforms, ie granting a noble title to a greenskin. By making a Matron a high lord she is fundamentally changing the story of the goblins from a group of warring tribes to just another faction of the Praesi Aristocracy and Malacia's greatest strength as a Dread Empress is her ability to control the HIGH Court. Her actions today gives her a short term gain of defeating the goblin rebellion and long term gains getting the goblins to be more invested in the Empire of Praes and making them easier for her to manage.

crescentsickle

Catherine: Gods, what kind of Callowan would sell out their own just because the going got rough?

Also Catherine: Man, it sucks that Praes owns Callow even though we hate that kind of thing for all eternity. But they will kill a bunch of us otherwise, so I better kill all these Callowans trying to rebel.

I mean, really Cat. Come on now.

Crash

To be fair she trapped herself into that narrative and also she used to be real good at not noticing her own hypocrisy, been getting a lot better on that front lately.

However, I would like to say that she didn't sell them out in any way there, she had a vision and they were her opponents to it, pushing forward an idea of revolution that she thought would lead to much more death than just putting them down would. I don't know, I feel like it's not really the same thing.

Fayhem

Yeah, I'd strongly agree with this not being the same – selling out your people is when you join up with their enemy for personal gain. Even at the absolutely most flawed level of Cat's planning, she has never been about personal gain. Remember "one life for a hundred thousand, that's a steal by any measure"? Someone who would happily die to protect their people is not a sellout by pretty much any definition I'm prepared to recognize.

And for that matter, Cat has never seen her entry into the Praesi power structure as joining up with Callow's enemy – it's been about making the Praesi into not an enemy, which is the only permanent resolution possible to the intergenerational Praes/Callow dogfight that has stunted both nations since time immemorial. That's not a betrayal, that's a vision.

jonnnney

She definitely sold out her people in order to gain the strength she needed. The difference is Callow had been conquered for 20 years while the goblins had only been rebelling for a few months. Her actions were a last resort while the goblins turned on each at the first opportunity.

Walter

Nod, was thinking very much the same. Cat has the 'I am indiscrete, you are a blabbermouth, she is being investigated under the National Secrets Act' thing going on in spades.

Liliet

Everything that everyone said above.

1) Catherine was not 'selling out' her people, she was betting on one course of action over the other. She explicitly thought the rebellion was doomed, and her joining up would not bolster their chances, just increase casualties. There is a difference between "our chances have lowered, time to bail myself out at everyone else's expense" and "this will literally have no positive effect at all and we need to do something else", albeit admittedly often a subtle one. Note that a lot of former rebels after deserting from the rebellion's army went straight to recruitment camps and requested placement with the Fifteenth.

2) To the degree that she 'sold them out' by kicking off the rebellion in the first place, it was not for personal gain. Well, technically as the immediate first step it was, but just that – the first step, a pre-requisite to her then USING that gain for a long-term advantage to her people. Don't forget that initially she also viewed getting a villainous Name as selling her soul – she was willing to do that for the very people some of which she later 'sold out'.

3) Even if she'd done it before, that wouldn't have made her wrong about it being, well, wrong. Remember the reaction people had to her in Summerholm early on? She WAS despised for being a 'sellout', BECAUSE it's something Callowans Just Don't Do. This phrase does not mean No Callowan In History Has Ever Done That, it means "Callowans who do that are considered the lowest of the low by other Callowans". Cat does self-burns on a regular basis.

Fern

... well, whatever happens I think we'll get an answer for what happened to juniper's mom. We already suspected it involved goblins, and this seems to be about the right time.

That, or cat is about to be out maneuvered by malicia so we'll be reminded just how dangerous she really is.

Daniel E

"It's always badgers, isn't it?" – Cat. +10 internet points to anyone who knows what chapter that's from.

Liliet

Uhhh that one where she bantered with Vivienne and Hakram in front of Juniper and Grem, to Juniper's growing dismay and Grem's utter indifference. Right after joining up with the biggest part of the Army of Callow, chewing Vivienne and Juniper out, and then having more of a talk with Vivienne. Right before finding out Arcadia gates were blocked by not-yet-Twilight and the bullshit in it, and then going to confer with the Grand Alliance (which ended with her being given Black's body and having Rozala ask her to just... lose for show, but no other meaningful result).

Either the chapter that had 'try a foot first' as its epigraph, or the one directly before that one.

I absolutely don't remember the name without looking into the table of contents.

Walter

Do folks think Assassin is working for Malicia now, or still Black? I tend to think it has gone back to Malicia's side (crack theory, it is just her) with the killing of the second tier citizen guy.

Crash

That might well have been an order sent while Scribe's and Malicia's wants were still aligned, in the timeframe of the Proceran attempted coup.

I'm under the impression that where Assassin is concerned, Scribe has a lot more say than Black or Malicia ever will.

Jacob McNeer

What if Scribe IS Assassin. It would explain how she's never noticed and how we never see her and assassin in the same place at the same time. Also Black had mentioned in Book 1 or 2 that Cat had already met Assassin and just didn't know it.

Crash

That would mean she enjoys talking in third person and reading orders in front of a mirror to watch her own face, as per the Interludes in Ater's sewers.

Assasin is a goblin and it's actually Borer, pass it on.

Liliet

We also have had WoG specifically given in response to this theory (IT'S OLD AS GUIDE ITSELF) that one person can't hold two Names.

Oh, and we know explicitly and exactly what Assassin is doing right now. Assassinating Magon Hadast in Ashur. While Scribe is right here.

Liliet

Black had given that order back before the Vales battle, and they haven't been in communication since.

Just... old bad plans coming home to roost.

Chapter 86: It Pours

"The cruelty of a dilemma is not only in the choice itself; it lies also in the truth it reveals to you about yourself through the making of that choice."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

Akua Sahelian and Masego the Hierophant were, undeniably, two of the finest mages ever produced by the Wasteland. One had been taught the old sorceries of Wolof since she could remember and taken to them with dreadful skill, the other had been apprenticed since he could speak to a warlock who'd dissected the corpses of gods. Their deeds were many and renowned, and their reputations were such as to make men shiver in the dark of night. They'd also used a godsdamned bathtub as the vessel of water for their scrying ritual. I'd excuse Masego in this, since he was usually more concerned with practicalities than appearance, but Akua would earn no such mercy from me. The same woman who'd campaigned with multiple enchanted ceremonial armours was now trying to pretend it'd never occurred to him there might be some slight indignity to this, an innocent look on her face. Yeah, I wasn't buying that. I spared some of my glare for Hakram, the filthy traitor who must have been willingly complicit in this, and at least he had the good grace to look abashed.

I didn't have nearly as much time to spend on designing petty vengeance as I used to, but they weren't getting away with this unpunished. And I wasn't above delegating my pettiness these days, anyway. A council consisting of Robber, Indrani and Vivienne ought to be capable of coming up with a suitably vindictive reprisal.

I limped up to the side of the copper bathtub, discretely surrounded by carved and inscribed wardstones stabilizing it against the strenuous effects of long-distance scrying, and the faint amusement I'd felt at the absurdity of having to speak with my officers through a bathing implement died. On the surface of the waters I saw Juniper, and what I read there was not promising. She looked exhausted, the thick skin around her eyes touched with muted grey, and beyond that she looked angry. The kind of low festering anger that stayed in your belly, kept simmering there by your own impotence to do anything about its cause.

"Juniper," I said. "I'd say it's a pleasure to see you, but it seems that would be premature. Report, Marshal."

"Warlord," she gravely replied, dipping her head to the side.

It bared her neck, if only slightly, which implied much greater deference by orc standards than inclining your head in agreement. I'd noticed Juniper tended to fall back into orc mannerisms when she was unsettled, abandoning the more human affectations that she'd picked up in the War College. That was not a promising sign, not that any part of this had been hinting at my night getting any better.

"Time is difficult to gauge accurately in the Twilight Ways," she began, "but around what we believe to be fifteen hours ago the Legions-in-Exile under Marshal Grem abandoned the march towards Arans and changed direction."

Fifteen hours, I considered with a frown. Aligning the timelines, and allowing for a degree of imprecision, that around the time the conference's first formal session had been held. Hakram stirred, having approached my side without my realizing. Consciously, anyway. It wasn't like he'd been silent, more that his presence at my side hardly warranted particular notice. I glanced at him and nodded, tacitly allowing him to ask the question he wanted to.

"And was reason given for that decision, or even the destination itself?" Adjutant asked.

Juniper grimaced.

"That is complicated to answer," she admitted. "Both the Army and the Legions were breaking camp, when it happened, and it was not immediately clear what was happening. The messengers I sent were given the answer that this changed march was at the order of the Carrion Lord, which I did not believe."

My eyes narrowed. All other things aside, Black shouldn't have a way to contact his people while they were out in the Ways: I'd not put Akua and Masego on the ritual so they could reminisce together about the bad old days. Here in Salia he shouldn't have the calibre of mages to accomplish something like that, much less without the Observatory to use. Which meant he would have had to give secret orders before coming with me to Salia, which was... dubious. I wasn't going to blindly trust the man, even if I loved him, but it would be ludicrous for him to turn on me at this juncture. The moment I ceased extending my protection to him the Procerans would slip a noose around his neck, if they were feeling kind, and while maybe I could see him taking calculated risks if he were still partnered with Malicia he'd just burned that bridge in front of the rulers of most the continent. No, Juniper had been right to be skeptical.

"I sough to speak personally with Marshal Grem," Juniper gravelled, "but was turned away. The rank and file of the exiles were taken by surprise, my queen, but not worried. Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara approached officers she worked closely with during the campaigns and learned that the Legions were returning to Praes."

Fuck, I thought. That wouldn't be a secret order from Black, he had to know that his soldiers were exhausted and undersupplied. Beginning a campaign to take Praes before rest and refit would be madness, the Legions-in-Exile had been out in enemy territory for almost a year now.

"Someone got to One-Eye," I said. "Either he's dead and being impersonated, or someone has hooks in him."

"Marshal Grem has a great deal of prestige among the troops," Hakram quietly said, "but not so much that such a decision would be uncontested. Marshal Ranker might be dead, but there are still Conquest generals. General Mok for the Fifth and Yawa Foehammer for the Twelfth."

Both were decorated veterans of the invasion of Callow, from what I knew, though General Yawa had been a lesser officer then – she'd been raised to general after Afolabi Magoro died at the Doom and rebuilt the Twelfth from the wreckage of that legions. Neither were anywhere as famous or beloved as the One-Eye, but among their own soldiers their word would carry a lot of weight. If both accused the Marshal of being compromised, people would listen. Juniper grunted in agreement.

"That was my thought as well, and so I pushed again for a face-to-face meeting," the orc said. "Which is when it was made clear to me that the entire upper echelon of the exiles knew of this order."

My brow rose.

"All of them?" Hakram slowly said.

"Marshal Grem, all generals and most the legates," Juniper said. "There was no arguing with that, my queen. The only way I could feasibly prevent them from leaving was putting the top officers of the exiles under arrest."

"That would have led to a pitched battle," I grimly said.

While bonds were tight between Black's army and mine, given the common wars fought and the common descendance from the Reforms and the College, the Legions-in-Exile were not mine. They'd not sworn to me, nor ever intended to. My marshal ordering their highest commanders all imprisoned would have been seen as an attempt to bring them into the fold by force, which would have gone... poorly, to say the least. The Army of Callow would probably have won that fight, between superior numbers and whatever was affecting the Legion officers, but it would have been a bloody business all around and there was no guarantee my barebones mage lines would have been able to fix whatever had been done to the generals afterwards. Juniper wouldn't have had much of a choice, when it came down to it.

"It was the right call to let them leave," I said.

"Thank you," Juniper said, dipping her head forward.

Been worried about my reaction to that, then. Fair enough.

"Hellhounds, remind me," Adjutant said. "General Birne, Ranker's replacement. He's got a golden stripe, doesn't he?"

The honour granted those who'd fought with distinction at the Fields of Streges, as I recalled.

"And a silver cord from the Siege of Summerholm," Juniper said, tone approving. "You caught on quick. It wasn't me that noticed, Deadhand. General Bagram's got a stripe too, and they're old friends."

My eyes flicked between the two of them questioningly, for clearly I'd missed something along the way.

"The golden stripes are considered the highest of the personal honours granted during the Conquest," Hakram said. "Because only forty-three were granted, and-"

"All by Dread Empress Malicia's own hand," Akua finished from behind us.

I glanced at her, and the implication sunk in. She'd once told me that her family considered any spy left alone with the Empress to be compromised. Yet Malicia had outmanoeuvred High Lady Tasia Sahelian, in the end, destroyed her completely. Even that stark a warning might have been underestimating what the Empress was capable of.

"Marshal Grem is certain to have spoken with the Empress in person at least once," I said. "And I imagine the same would hold true for any general and quite a few of the high-ranking officers that participated in the Conquest."

And whatever it was she'd done, it was possible for it to affect every single one of those individuals. Shit. That was a fucking disaster. There was no such thing as flawless mind control, especially not from a distance, but even simple planted orders could do a lot of damage. Especially if they were sown generously across the entire old guard of the Legions, which tended to be both the finest commanders we had and my father's most ardent supporters. I'd believe it too, if I was a legionary and the One-Eye told me his orders came from Black, I thought. After all those years of friendship and loyalty, why doubt it?

"Within an hour of realizing this, I removed the army from the Twilight Ways," Juniper said. "And ordered every officer who has ever set foot in the Tower or been in the presence of the Empress to be placed under arrest."

And Gods, both of those decisions had been the right call once more but looking at the scope of the mess I felt like smashing the fucking bathtub in front of me. Not all our College-taught officers would fall under those conditions, but most our Praesi highborn and distinguished veterans would. Which meant all my best and seasoned commanders. We wouldn't be without officers, since so much of the army was Callowan now, but essentially all the veteran officers we'd taken from the legions cannibalized after the Folly and kicked up the ranks would have to be removed from the chain of command. Without knowing exactly what it was the Empress had done, how it worked and what it could do, we just couldn't take the risk of leaving them in place. Including Juniper herself, for all that she was still the one giving me a report. Everything she'd just told me would have to be confirmed second-hand by someone not in doubt, for a start, and it'd be a mess to manage that considering most of her general staff was likely to be on the compromised list as well.

Dread Empress Malicia had not so much as swung as sword and she'd effectively crippled the Army of Callow. That, more than anything else, told me I was not wrong to believe this to be her work. How many people alive would be capable of a blow that vicious?

"Who's in command, at the moment?" I asked.

"Grandmaster Talbot has legate-equivalent rank and technical seniority," Juniper said. "Yet most Praesi soldiery balks at his command. Legate Tendai is the other candidate, but while she has years under her belt as a frontline officer she is fresh to higher command. For now the two are keeping the peace in accord but tensions are rising."

Thank the Gods for the Reforms, I feelingly thought. How many other armies on the continent would be able to weather so much of the upper ranks being put under arrest this well? That measures meant to prevent decapitation of leadership by heroes were working almost as well against a villain's work was a nice touch of irony.

"Has there been any sign of enthrallment in any of our people?" I asked.

"None that I know of," Juniper said. "Though I am no longer being kept informed, my queen."

"There won't be," Akua said.

I turned to face her, sharply gesturing for elaboration.

"Unlike with the Legions-in-Exile, the Empress cannot suborn the Army of Callow outright," the shade elaborated. "Which means the greatest gain she can derive of any enthrallment sown in your ranks is delay, keeping your soldiers out of action for as long as she can."

"Making a third of my officer corps commit suicide would achieve that," I pointed out.

"It would cripple your army, it is true, but also flush out her hidden hands," Akua said, shaking her head. "Better to leave the ship infested, and you aware of that. Then either you must send valuable assets to investigate the trouble or go yourself. Either way, a great deal of your might is tied down for weeks. Possibly even months. And should it look like you have a solution, well, it is not too late then to order the killings you described."

My lips thinned. Yeah, that sounded about right. Either I went myself with Sve Noc at my back, which given the distance and what needed to be done in Salia still would complicate everything, or I sent both Akua and Masego together to be safe – which lost me a great deal of knowledge and power at hand I might need for other tasks. And the moment it looked like I might turn things around, I had no doubt that just like Akua had said the Empress would twist the knife once more. If not earlier, the moment she learned through her spies that whoever went had entered the Twilight Ways. Fuck.

"Thank you for your report, Marshal," I crisply said, then grimaced. "You acted correctly in every regard, Juniper. This isn't on you, we were just had by the Empress. We'll dig our way back to daylight."

"We always do, Catherine," the Hellhound said, but she sounded so very tired.

I gestured for Masego to end the ritual, not willing to look at her in this state any longer, then breathed out as Juniper's image on the water vanished.

"Akua," I said. "How high are the odds that the Empress can just snap her fingers and have them all commit suicide?"

"I am not certain," she admitted. "This is not mere sorcery, dearest. A Name is involved, and so there are deeper considerations. In principle, such mastery of others can either be fine or numerous – as it is with Speaking, where one may have an entire crowd kneel once or enchant an individual intricately."

"Even at the peak of my Name, I wouldn't have been able to order that many people to kill themselves," I said. "Maybe two, three at most? For simpler stuff fear and thunder carries it through, but..."

"If we could Speak entire hosts to death, what need would we have of hosts at all?" Akua smiled. "Yes. In truth you were only the Squire, while Malicia is Dread Empress and a great one besides, but I took doubt that even should this be borne of an aspect she could so easily take lives. Especially if the commands were seeded. Having such a decree lying in one's mind for years would lead to severe disorders of the mind, besides."

"Unless that mind is prepared for that particular purpose, and accordingly conditioned with enchantments and alchemy," Masego cut in. "As the Sentinels are said to be."

Akua conceded with a nod.

"Without a story at her back, I do not believe it is within the power of the Empress to order deaths," she said. "Though lesser beguilements would be well within her grasp, and in their own way just as dangerous. I am greatly surprised by the skill displayed in the manipulation of the commanders of the Legions-in-Exile, I confess."

"I'm not," Vivienne said. "Not considering what you said about stories. It was around fifteen hours ago this all started, the Hellhound said. Give or take a bit, that's when the Carrion Lord declared rebellion against the Tower."

I closed my eyes and let out a soft curse.

"And that makes an empress calling her subjects to heel," I said. "Considering most who climb the Tower have an aspect related to authority, she would have had the wind at her back when she pulled that trigger."

"It would be more complex a matter when it comes to those among the Army of Callow," Akua noted. "Though some of them were once sworn to her, they are now sworn to you instead."

"Creation likes clarity," I agreed. "But that'll serve to weaken, not protect or prevent."

Neither of which I was all that sure I could do, when it came down to it. Distance was the element of dismay here, the more I thought about it. Those under my charge that needed help were far, and there was no guarantee that by the time they were reached they would still be in a state to be helped. Possibly I could leave behind someone under an illusion to impersonate me and hope that Malicia didn't catch on, but given the way it'd be impossible to keep that deception going for too long it'd be rolling the dice to try that. Assuming the Empress didn't catch on immediately, which gave how deeply the Eyes had apparently infiltrated Salia I could hardly be sure of. Sending Masego and Akua would hardly be any subtler, even if I made an effort to suppress knowledge of it, and at the end of the day I had to admit that whatever my decision was there was nothing I could do. Save perhaps doing nothing, which I expected was exactly what the Empress would prefer of me: days passing in indecision, paralyzed by the risks in committing to anything.

For the first time since I'd returned from the Everdark I'd been caught entirely flatfooted, and the impotent anger I'd earlier glimpsed in Juniper was finding a mirror in me. I'd forgotten how much I hated this. How much I hated her. There were reasons to kill the Empress that were personal to me, like the death of people I had cared for, and practical ones as well. And then there was this, the ugly sinking feeling in my stomach and how much I despised that she could do that to me. Still even now, after all I had learned and wrought. Because she was patient and cold-blooded and everything I was not. Gods, the Dead King could still scare me in a way few things could but the only foe who had ever made me feel like an arrogant child was the Dread Empress of Praes. The woman atop the tower who had, again and again, made me bleed without my ever landing a blow on her in return.

"Fuck," I cursed. "All right. I'll see if I can find a way out of this mess. Meanwhile, Hakram, speak with Talbot and this Legate Tendai. I want Juniper's report confirmed point by point, and word of everything that's happened since."

"As you say," Adjutant replied. "The Army will still need a commanding officer, Catherine. The Hellhound made it clear the current situation is untenable."

I'd be able to take care of it, if I went, but if I wasn't sure I could afford to leave Vivienne here to finish the negotiations without me. She had the judgement to see it through, sure, but cleverness was not what had brought the opposition to the table.

They'd taken a seat because they were desperate and scared of me, and though the former still held they simply would not be afraid of Vivs the way they were of me. Which would mean squabbles I wouldn't have to deal with, heroes not being as leery of meddling and a hundred other little messes we could ill-afford. On the other hand, if it was not I who went then there was only one high-ranking officer who could fill the shoes.

"It will have to be General Abigail," I said. "At least until the hooks can be dug out of our people's heads. I'll speak to her myself. Vivienne, I need you to prepare an escort for her when she's sent out. At least two full cohorts. I'll need to consult with-Black, I realized in this moment still likely knew nothing of this. Shit. I was not looking forward to that conversation at all.

"- with Black," I grimaced. "And soon. Akua, Zeze, can the scrying ritual be done again without the both of you?"

"It can be done by our mage lines, Catherine," Masego reminded me. "They are on Creation again, all this ritual commotion was unnecessary."

"Right," I said, mildly embarrassed at having forgot. "Good, then I have jobs for you. Hierophant, I need options to purge the mind of my officers from the Empress' influence."

He opened his mouth, but I raised a hand to interrupt.

"I have a dozen things I need to be doing right now, and I'd not remember all the details if you simply told me anyway," I said. "Write it down for me, Zeze. Prepare all you can, so I can put it to council when everyone is there."

"I suppose I have nothing more pressing at the moment," he said.

"Thanks," I honestly replied. "I appreciate it."

"And I, my heart?" Akua smiled.

"You're with me," I said. "Black will get snippy about you being there, but when it comes to Praesi politics you're my expert. We'll head there now, I don't doubt that with the agitation in our camp Scribe already woke him up."

I clapped Hakram's shoulder, nodded at Masego and managed to take exactly one step towards the door before it was thrown open.

"There you are," Archer said, face serious. "We have a situation, Cat. Chunks of the League's people are moving."

"Moving where?" I frowned.

"By the looks of it? Here," she flatly said.

It was a good thing I knew my way around more than a few languages, these days, because loudly cursing in only one would not have been nearly enough.

Frivolous

Many of the suppositions in the previous chapter confirmed. Congratulations to all who did so.

In other news, I'm still wondering how and why Hierophant is still dangerous. He's lost most or all of his magic, but Witch of the Woods still thought he could kill either her or White Knight.

Alexander Knight

He still has his aspects, and a deep understanding on how divine powers work. Beyond that, I'm not sure

Crash

To my understanding aside from his Aspects and knowledge, he lacks magic of his own but can wield that of others and harness rituals just fine. Limitations and methodology on that isn't quite clear yet but I reckon the Name will find a way, Usher of Mysteries and all that.

Of note, Hierophant implies, to me at least, more of a supportive role to begin with, a researcher or a wielder and less of a infantry unit, employing creative methods to make use of/invent/discover new ways to use things that are already there and less of "Yes, fireball bigger."

I can't quite articulate my thoughts on this in a nice way but I suppose I always thought of it more as a FFT Geomancer, if you will, than as a Black Mage.

Jessica Day

I really like your analogy but I'd say I thought of him as a calculator and right now his MP is stuck at 0.

NerfContessa

Knowledge and the ability to see can counter many an aspect. Unless you force him into close combat unprepared, he is still a force to be reckoned with. Also, he might be getting some power back soonish.

Oshi

He's lost Sorcery but not power. He can call to himself everything his name has granted him. Imitations of the power of gods form what he has Glimpsed. The rest? He can Wrest it from them. This means he can take their own power and use it against them. He may not be able to call on sorcery directly but he can still crush anyone who uses it. It's a weakness that can be exploited so he's not unbeatable but still friggin powerful.

Liliet

Witnessed. Glimpse was his Apprentice Aspect.

erebus42

His aspects are still good since they're a part of his name. He can also still wield and potentially usurp the powers and workings of others. That combined with the shit ton of eldritch knowledge in his head is perfectly sufficient to give anyone a bad day.

Point

He specializes in piercing the veil protecting higher powers. The White Knight is having some problems when Judgement is busy with the Hierarchy; I expect he would have had problems if the Hierophant started poking at his connection to the Choir.

And, of course, given that one of his aspects is Wrest, and usurpation is the essence of sorcery, I expect he would be considerably less than powerless against a sorcerer.

Even without his magic, we saw just this chapter that he can still help with scrying. He lacks his own magical power; not the ability to interact with magic. And given the whole usurpation thing, I wouldn't be surprised if his Role let him mess with others' magic even without using an aspect.

Vortex

We saw with Kairos that all villains get a curse at the end. A final blow guaranteed to land in their stories offered from Below. I think the knowledge and nature of a named who had seen gods slain and been possessed by the dead king could wield that curse in a particularly nasty way.

Liliet

I somehow doubt Antigone meant death-curse, though you make a fine point too.

Cicero

Well, he still has his aspects.

My guess? Some form of Magical Judo. He has no magic to strike with himself, but if another used magic around him he can redirect it and use that as his source of power. Magic includes miracles too. So maybe the White Knight could beat him if he used no aspects, and did not call on the Choir of Judgement in anyway.

Liliet

That's what I'm thinking too. Hanno translated for us the general meaning of Antigone's assessment, but that doesn't mean there aren't more nuances than she could convey with a head tilt.

Allafterme

When someone else look through a miracle they'll see, well, a miracle. The Hierophant directly sees source code equivalent of creation and intimately understand them. Let me also remind you that he totally believes to be able to think like a god is simply being a god. He also resides in a Creation that bends over backwards in order to usher even the most ridiculous beliefs of Named into reality (Hierarch anyone?).

One plus two means that if you are:

1. Utilizing your Name in bridging the gap in order to use miracle like magic
2. Your Name routinely relies on your chosen Choir's support chances are you, in fact, should not go lvl with the Hierophant...

Aston Whiteman

If you know how to stop someone breathing they die.

If you cut off a Named Magician source of magic they die.

Zeze is more like a magic martial art monk now..

Remember how he grabbed a Crow?

Thank you so much for not being a vote reminder.

Decius

He's lost his ability to use lesser forces, so all he has left is the stuff that results in needing to make new maps, because there is no longer terrain in the area.

Liliet

RIP

Crash

It's because he insists on being unarmed! Maybe he should take a page from Tinkles book and equip some more bells, learn some new skills.

Make every square of terrain count.

Fern

Masego has become even more of a strategic asset than before, because of that. Cat can't use him tactically to shift fights around pivots anymore, unless he has some serious backing from other named (since he's have to over rely on aspects to do it, and we've learned that's a death knell for named). He's more useful figuring out the high arcana shit (which he'd be unmatched in, aside from ubua, the dead king, and maybe the witch) that gets thrown at Cat on a semi-regular basis, which means he'd be best served countering the dead Kings strategic plays against the grand alliance, especially if he has other sorcerers (named or otherwise) to lend support.

However, in a situation dealing with named who draw power from the gods, which is most of them iirc, he'd have a leg up in fucking with their abilities since he's done it so many times before. The groove has been carved into creation, giving him a big advantage. And like someone earlier said, using wrest to bridge the gap would give him a ginormous leg up as well, and a decent chance for a kill on most named. Usurpation is the essence of sorcery, after all.

Mammon

He lost his innate spellcasting. I'm not sure if he lost his high arcana too. But the things he already gained, the knowledge obtained and the powers that are given and taken by his magic yet not his magic alone still remain. He likely no longer has wards and the ability to cast spells immediately, but he has all the know-how and all his gains including that summer princess's stolen powers.

Imagine training your body with lots of pull-ups but then losing your fingers. You can no longer do pull-ups because you cannot hold the bar, but you still have the muscular arms gained from those exercises for a while and you can still pull yourself up different ways like with your feet and hanging from your elbows.

Or maybe a more apt example, amnesia. You no longer remember gaining the knowledge like speaking English, who you are and what you can do, but you can still speak English, know how to operate things and use your reflexes. The basic magic that Zeze lost isn't like learning his first steps and him being able to walk no longer relying on that at all, but it's also not complete memory loss because magic is like knowing names and remembering events. He's in a fantasy-amnesia state where only the convenient to be inconveniently lost things are lost.

Liliet

I think High Arcana understanding is still his. He cannot manipulate sorcery, but he can damn well understand it. Cat has noted that he's said he 'functionally' lost the Gift, not just that he lost it, or something along those lines.

stevenneiman

I suspect that Ruin could do some serious damage to a person, and it would only get more dangerous the more metaphysical power that person wields. He might actually not be much of a threat to someone like Archer who mostly relies on Name-boosted mundane skills, but someone who used mighty sorceries like the Witch, or channels a Choir like Hanno? They would be in for hells if they picked a fight with him.

Aston Whiteman

Update site link not posted today?

doominator10

Once again we're reminded just how much "oh fuk" Malicia can be when she's basically been a minor character for the past book or 2. How much you want to bet 1/3 of the League's armies are also under her influence to some degree?

konstantinvoncarstein

Can she Speak through her puppets? If yes, most of the League leaders could be compromised.

Liliet

Most definitely not, any more than Catherine's Zombie I could Struggle.

Shikkarasu

While I agree entirely, I also desperately want to see that AU. Suicide goats that cannot be stopped and Zombie III Breaking everything that gets in her way. I mean, more than usual.

Liliet

Agreed.

Shveiran

I think you are right, but let's not forget that Nefarious' body doubles are not your average zombies. We do not know how they work, not exactly, nor do we know their limitations.

I don't think she can, but we can't really be sure.

Liliet

We can if we look at the narrative logic to it. Malicia's Rule Aspect, story-wise, is based on 'the weight of her presence', not the weight of how clever she is. When she's in the room with you, she's in charge.

And the tradeoff for that is that her presence is her vulnerability. Every time she's in a room with someone she's making a wager that person cannot in fact kill her if they try, or won't try. Think Cat in front of the cavalry charge: the very weight is based on the risk taken.

And when Malicia isn't coming in person, the weight of her presence isn't coming either. The weight of the reminder of her is there, but if she's not exposing herself to others' Aspects, she cannot use her own either.

Narratively, she cannot extend her rule and have it convincingly stick over somewhere she hasn't been.

Alexander Knight

Yeeeeeeeeessssssshhhh!!!!

What a turn around from the near omnipotent Cat we just read through since the start of the book.

sutortyrannus

It's a mark of EE's ability, I think, that for me at least it doesn't feel forced. She won, yes, and then she blind-sided and kneecapped by something she couldn't have seen coming. It mirrors Black's losses in the Free Cities and at Saudant – he's great against everything he can see coming, and he can see more than most, but the weaknesses lies in things for which he just cannot prepare.

Crash

It's also important to mention that this isn't a Deus Ex Machina random turnaround, we've been aware that Malicia had mindhooks in the Army for a while now, this was properly set-up; it's that Cat herself didn't have any way to know it.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yeah, and it was foreshadowed a long time ago. It was even said Malicia did that because an Empress should not be completely dependent from another person and that she could not accept that her armies were not loyal to her.

Liliet

I would argue Amadeus could damn well see Saudant coming – not tactically, but strategically. He had to know SOMETHING he couldn't prepare for was coming, that's just how narrative storms blow when you're massacring civilians across hero-protected land. This isn't a fight won with tactics when you're in a corner strategically, all he was doing was delaying the ending. He just didn't know for how long.

And in this case, Catherine could predict that Alaya had SOMETHING up her sleeve. The problem is, there isn't a single decision she could have made differently. At no point was there a decision fork of "if the Empress is helpless, go left, if the Empress probably still has nasty cards to play, go right". Being committed on two fronts has been her problem since Book 4, and frankly, she's in a better position now than she was back then anyway.

This is a great blow to morale, but as they discuss here, there's only so much disruption this can cause. Oh, Amadeus is in trouble, but Callow's still pretty damn in the green.

...Wonder if the Empress has that same hook in Sacker. Shit.

Okay yeah maybe Callow's far in the yellow BUT again, Catherine did not have better options.

Shveiran

I think's it is a fair assumption to make, unless Goblin Names or something along those lines come out.

I mean, why wouldn't Sacker be compromised if all other Generals are?

Crash

I reiterate Borer is Assasin, pass it on!

Or maybe the real Assasin is the goblins we met along the way.

Liliet

Because goblins are sneaky and Sacker might or might not have been the Matrons' spy the entire time. They might have means to counter that shit.

Likely not, of course.

Fern

I don't think so, I'm willing to bet from Cats intuition that she'd need a narrative foothold (i.e. a face to face meeting and authority over them through which she can channel Rule) to do so, and she doesn't have that with the league.

Er, well, maybe enough for a tiny suggestion, since she's subverted a couple city states. Something like "the black queen sees you as a loose end to be tied off, so gets to stabbing b4 she gets to tyin"

Mammon

As Hakram already ascertained, the Free States are in complete disarray. They are turning against each other and against their unified pact rapidly, some controlled by Malicia while others are Good or just trying to gain control.

This wouldn't be too much of an important facet if not for:

- Praes recently lost Thalassina in one fell irrecoopable blow. By balance and stability of the Wasteland of Evil that has to be Evil and be given its Due, Creation might have to give it another port city to balance out things and prevent them from being a trade-choked or sea-barred nation.

- Nicea currently besieges Ashur and does so mostly because Tyrant told them and Malicia's ghouls and stuff. Not really Good no more, their strings are being pulled.

- Penthes is already quite in her palm despite them being Good, and Delos would be a good new port city even if Nicea can't be appropriated.

- Kairos apparently eradicating all of the Theodosian bloodline that grants Helike its monarchy of historical value. With that gone, perhaps it can be consumed by a different Evil.

- Things are a-changing and the balance of Good and Evil being rewritten.

- No way to show that you aren't waning in the game of Eb and Flood than a successful conquest or annexation, especially Story-wise.

This isn't a given or an absolute, and depending on the how Malicia might only create a Pivot deadline demanding to stop her that make things easier on Heroes or force her hand in more direct engagement, but there's multiple grooves and strings for her to follow that could allow for Praes to conquer some of the Free cities.

If she pulls those strings well, she might have a plan that allows her to come back up on top, sate the High Lords with successful conquest, give her new treasuries and people to work with, make the Legions in Exile garrison in the no longer Free Cities instead of returning to Praes and thus preventing them inevitably turning against her despite the mind control, create new problems and hurdles politically by technically owning those cities under the Accords if she holds on to them for long enough (creating a negative shadow balance to the Accords from the get-go), gains nobility-worthy lands for Wither that are close to the Eyries but not Wasteland territory, etc.

Again, this might just as easily prove a pivot against her, but with cool head and careful hand Malicia might defy her fate of dwindling in power by growing rapidly and vastly while remaining uncontested Dread Empress and breaking that Story once and for all.

Mammon

And there are three cities striving for sea domination. Even if Ashur by story prevails strongly because Ghouls vs Named never work out (Definite Win vs Evil) and whomever comes second manages to get a close Tie by needing foreign help, the Pattern of Three might enable Malicia to get the permanent win with the third and by default maintain control over it.

Liliet

Glass Cannon.

A giant on clay legs.

A Jenga tower.

Catherine can do a lot, but her support base is much more tactical than strategic. She doesn't have roots, doesn't have foundation – neither does Amadeus, notably, though he at least has more than she does, after 40 years of community service. Still, his own support is dwindling too, specifically because he's more or less a nobody who fought his way to power. They don't have ancestral artefacts, they don't have centuries of tradition as story weight, their spy networks are as new as their stories.

Malicia is the same way, incidentally, but unlike these two, she has made a point of using these 40 years to SPECIFICALLY build herself a power base – while they were too busy trying to make the world a better place.

A queen is a powerful chess piece, but cannot win the entire game by itself.

This is good timing to remind us of that, and good timing to remind us just how far out of her depth Catherine is, genius mastermind and diplomat or not.

Oshi

Agreed but you know who has a base and is sitting around nearby, the oh so ready to get leverage Warden of the West.

Liliet

I think Cat will try to handle this herself before handing her leverage lmao

Hellspirit

Yay...
Misfortune =)

Man... her comeback will be sweet

Javvies

Amadeus is going to be furious when he finds out about what Malicia has done to his people.

Parts of the League are moving.

Hmm.

Kairos knew/expected that the trial was going to end in his death – I wonder if he left contingency directives ordering his people to help Cat.

Ooh, we know that Kairos killed most, if not all, of his relatives (and this possible heirs/successors) except for his nephew, whom Cat had shot. And Kairos mostly likes Cat, and hates most of the other players, especially the Dead King and Bard, whom Cat wants to go after ... so what if Kairos named Cat his chosen heir?

Oshi

This is kind of my speculation. She loses the Army of Callow so to speak but gains the Army of Helike.

Jane

Eh, hurt maybe, but I don't know about furious. This was the band that had actual death switches on each other in case of severe corruption, after all; it's not really different from the death switch Cat gave Masego back when he started messing around with demonic corruption.

It was a smart thing to do, and completely harmless so long as the two of them stayed together. What hurts is that she's actually putting one of those contingencies into practice.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I think what'll hurt is that she kept it from him, that she didn't trust him with this for all those years.

Darkening

Considering his sheer hatred of Tariq for killing Ranker, I imagine Malicia mind raping several other generals he considers friends is going to cut pretty deep.

Jane

She hasn't actually hurt them, though – this is essentially taking away his sword and locking it in the armory. Ordering them back to Praes and (presumably) locking them up is arguably the kindest thing that she could do, as it ends the rebellion with minimal bloodshed ensures that none of his friends die in a fruitless war.

It's not actually going to go that smoothly in practice, of course, or we wouldn't have a story – but in terms of intent, this is pretty much the least malicious secret Evil contingency plan possible. If he were to be furious for that, it'd be the height of hypocrisy, considering that declaring a civil war in the first place would inevitably lead to more of their friends dying. Absent, of course, something like her plan stopping it before it began.

Mammon

Taking the Legions in Exile back to Praes despite them still being loyal to Black and mind control never working out even in the Wasteland would be the single-dumbest thing they could do. They may stop by Wither's new crib to restock, but I don't think Malicia would be foolish enough to bring one of the greatest threats to her back to her lands. More likely we soon find out that she sent them elsewhere, like maybe the weakened Free Cities to conquer a new port for her?

Liliet

Agreed, actually. The high command appears to be operating under the impression that Amadeus gave the order, or at least more importantly this impression is being maintained for the rank and file – as soon as it's clear they're being played, they won't need Juniper to put the compromised ones under arrest.

She gets one clean strike, and she needs to make it count. I suspect she has a plan for that.

Liliet

This.

He'll be heartbroken from seeing more cracks that had been in the foundation for some time, but furious... It's not like she was proven wrong about needing the contingency.

apop

Leaving Cat the cataphracts she had crippled would be lovely

Liliet

> Amadeus is going to be furious when he finds out about what Malicia has done to his people.

Amadeus is going to be too heartbroken to be furious, methinks, on a personal emotions level =x

Crash

Well, fuck.

Jane

Hum. I'm guessing that the League isn't preparing any kind of attack; that'd basically be suicide for little likely gain, and thus a waste of bothering to acquire the League remnants. My best guess would be some sort of disorganized diplomatic situation – with the ongoing chaos of the collapse of the League, there are going to be plenty of people looking for outside intervention; it wouldn't be strange for some people to turn to Cat for one reason or another, and to bring their allies – either to demonstrate that they're not alone, or in hopes of shelter after things went badly for them.

That, or a quick delegation representing Malicia by proxy, offering terms for a truce between their individual kingdoms. In demonstrating that she can cripple Cat's war against the Dead King, this offers her a good opportunity to extend an olive branch, sincerely intended or not; looking reasonable by saying that she won't sabotage Cat's war against the enemy of all life, if only she'd not war on the Tower as well, would help her regain some of the diplomatic capital she's spent on allying with the Dead King to begin with.

Liliet

I'm betting on the former. Some of the League looking to Cat for a new ally/sponsor XD

edrey

Malicia just play the game like a master, Cat should just go all out with mountains falling from the sky.
I just hoping Kairos left a gift to betray Malicia at the end

konstantinvoncarstein

Cat is a master of stories, but Malicia is a master politician.

Is the timing deliberate? Because the Empress just used a Story, and if it was not an accident and she has a grasp on story-fu, she could be even more dangerous than we thought

Darkening

Considering she is a close associate of Amadeus and the main point of the conquest and reforms was to subvert the Story of Praes, I consider it a safe assumption that Malicia has a solid grasp of story manipulation.

Liliet

Most everyone in the setting has SOME grasp of story-fu. Surface facts like 'don't throw a hero off a cliff' are universal knowledge. I'm sure Malicia knows how to use her own Aspects, and couldn't have been around Amadeus for this long without picking up SOME tricks. We've seen her discuss story manipulation with him in Coulissee, Book 2 – she was unsettled by how deeply he was meddling, but she was following the train of thought.

It's the subtleties of competitive story-fu that she has trouble with, since none of the opponents she's had experience fighting employed any of it in a manner meaningful to her. She knows how SHE can use it to get an edge, she just has only the foggiest idea of how it can be used AGAINST her.

Novice

I swear the only person who can rival Abigail at this point in failing unsuccessfully is Caiaphas Cain, HERO OF THE IMPERIUM. Now all we need is a hyper competent anti-sorcery attendant and we'll have a stew going.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Hell yes. To all the ppl guessing Abigail would become Marshall, ur at least half-right. Still up in the air whether she becomes queen.

Also I want to give a random shoutout to the fanfic Sasuke Uchiha -HERO OF KONOHA! which gives Sasuke from Naruto the personality of Cain. Great story, great humor, only downside is that its a dead fic. If you liked Ciaphas Cain, you'll love the fic.

superkeaton

I suppose, with the loss of the Tyrant, the League will turn to Cat for something, anything.

NerfGlaistigUaine

So, how are they going to deal with Malicia when the Dead King is rearing back up for war? I thought they'd go and kill her in the three month truce, but it seems like that's out the window. It just doesn't seem feasible to me to fight two fronts when just one front is a match for your entire alliance.

konstantinvoncarstein

Well played Malicia, well played 😊

etheric sentinel

It was a good thing I knew my way around more than a few languages, these days, because loudly voting in only one would not have been nearly enough.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

C'était une bonne chose que je sois à l'aise dans plusieurs langues, ces jours-ci, car voter à voix haute dans une seule langue n'aurait pas suffi.

Es war gut, dass ich mich heutzutage in mehr als ein paar Sprachen auskannte, denn lautes Abstimmen in nur einer Sprache wäre bei weitem nicht genug gewesen.

Fue bueno que conociera más de unos pocos idiomas, en estos días, porque votar en voz alta en solo uno no hubiera sido suficiente.

最近 言語 大声 投票 十分 かの を っていたのは かったです。

konstantinvoncarstein

Your translation in French is correct but a bit too literal, so it sounds a bit strange. I would say :

C'est une bonne chose que je sois actuellement à l'aise dans plusieurs langues, car voter à voix haute dans une seule langue n'aurait pas suffi.

But good post 😊👍

NerfGlaistigUaine

Points for creativity.

Liliet

(see, taking a humorous moment for this instead of a dramatic one is MUCH better)

Хорошо что нынче я владела целой кучей языков, потому что громко голосовать только на одном было бы и близко недостаточно...

Добре що в ці дні я володіла цілою купою мов, тому що громко голосувати тільки одною було б зовсім недостатньо...

My contribution ♥

Mental Mouse

And typos:

>The same woman ... was now trying to pretend it'd never occurred to him there might be some slight indignity to this
>"I sough to speak personally with Marshal Grem," sought

> ... the copper bathtub, discretely surrounded by carved and inscribed wardstones discreetly.

Barthumphries

It should go with the vote thread but sure we could have a typo thread hanging out in the wind, much like Catherine was left by the Dread Empress to hang.

Dread Empress Malicia had not so much as swung as sword and she'd effectively Change the second as to a.

There were tense errors and once Akua was referred to as he rather than she, as well as other errors. Try to find them all! 😊

ethericsentinel

I'm honestly not sure why people started posting the typo thread as a reply to the vote thread. Maybe because the vote thread is usually at or near the top? It just seems a bit odd to me, since it seemed like two threads was the norm back in Book 3, when I started following regularly. Not that I checked the comments every week, back then...

Liliet

Two threads... three threads... four threads...

Putting the type thread on the first vote thread means it'll be in one specific fixed place, and not scattered all across the comment section as people missed others' typo threads.

That's my guess anyway.

ninegardens

MAYbe Cat should send Black to deal with the legions in Exile? (Disprove the "Black gave the order" feel).

Or maybe she should just call Malicia and say "Gods below and everburning, we don't want to FIGHT you. We just want to deal with the Dead King and then have a peace treaty- We'll damn well support your reign if you stop fucking us over with the Dead King... who I know you don't want to win"

Liliet

It's... all too well-established by now the latter isn't an option.

Malicia keeps digging herself in deeper, that-wise, and Cat doesn't expect her to stop. Cannot expect her to stop, not after the Doom of Liesse. If she wasn't a reliable ally to Black...

And the former is an interesting option. There are logistical issues, I expect, but... hmm.

Mental Mouse

> MAYbe Cat should send Black to deal with the legions in Exile?

Risky. Depending on Malicia's contingencies, it could cost her Black.

Liliet

He is, notably, not Named right now, and the only Named at his side is Scribe.

Yeah...

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

I hope we get to see the aftermath of the Tyrants end from other perspectives but i guess the story is moving on. I'm fine with that as well to be frank.

Liliet

It's still THE SAME NIGHT. He died HOURS ago.

There's room for us to see plenty of the aftermath still, methinks...

Aotrs Commander

Supreme God-Empress Abigail Abigail is still sitting, years hence on her new Combined Throne of Calernia, Above And Below, going:

"No, seriously, the fuck happened?"

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Well i mean supreme god job had some nice pension plan so.

Liliet

Abigail, shrilly: IT DOESN'T HAVE ANY!!!

aran

Okay, but at least the pay is—

"I'M STILL ON A CAPTAIN'S SALARY"

Mental Mouse

Who's paying the salary? 😊 But indeed God-King, like Tyrant, doesn't really do pensions. Or retirement, for that matter – the choice is generally either leaving feet-first, or at high speed in all directions.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

Seems that Abigail gets another promotion. In this story such things have their own force. Having Abigail directly beneath you in the chain of command is an indication that you won't keep your job for long. Be thankful if you keep your life.

Will the story lie the Designated Successor of Callow position in her feet next?

That or the position of supreme military commander in the war against DK.

laguz24

I wouldn't mind having that little, the person succeeds despite themselves story deconstructed. there is only a certain point chance and circumstance will carry you. At some point, you have to go all-in, and Abigail will not do that.

Liliet

Or she just might. And that's when the luck stops and she has to work for it.

chris S

Next chapter prediction:

The Universe throws Cat a bone. Malicia's accidentally allowed for some Executive Narrative Meddling to tip the scales for Cat.

With the Tyrant and the Hierarch no longer present, the League is in a bit of disarray with no real unified long term goals. The Dead King probably won't stop at Procer once he comes south, and I think the league realises that.

And what a familiar story "Former Enemy Appears In The Hero's Hour Of Need To Aid Against A Larger Threat" is.

Methinks Catherine might just be getting a temporary replacement for those crippled forces

laguz24

These guys are not heroes. If a hero was leading them then maybe but villains don't get bones thrown at their feet they get them chucked at their heads.

Mental Mouse

> villains don't get bones thrown at their feet they get them chucked at their heads.

Cat is pretty good about catching such things and perhaps reclaiming them. And she's basically half a hero....

Liliet

Tell that to Cat at First Liesse.

Providence isn't clear cut, and we've already had Hanno note in his internal monologue that, say, Archer is most likely not consistently a hero or a villain (despite many previous Good POVs pegging her as the latter) despite serving Catherine, because Catherine's story is not clear cut either.

We've also explicitly had Cat and Hakram discuss that Providence was on their side for figuring out what Kairos was drinking during the meeting, and that it just basically meant the opposition was worse. Stories are relative.

Against the Dead King / Dread Empress coalition? Cat's going to get the wind in her sails full on, if perhaps not quite as hard as for the band of five story in Twilight.

Crash

In short, Providence is a fickle bastard and Cat is very good at wrangling stories.

Malicia may be smart but so far she hasn't truly made use of Story in the way that Cat and Black, to a lesser extent (Wow, how far we've come eh?), do. She had the advantage to pull this trick yes, but this is very much a villain narrative and that has its drawbacks. Black has been known to stack the odds in practical ways so as not to fall in the pitfalls of old guard villainy, I'd imagine Malicia subscribes to the same school of thought.

Cat tough? Cat in the height of her "I'm the Squire, Justifications matter only to the just and if I need to be a villain to free Callow, then I will be one." said this (And I gotta say, this is where she truly won me over. One of my favourite quotes. Akua's reaction is also great.):

"I have three things," I said. "A kingdom, an enemy and a claim."

As she wrangled a HERO'S story in the height of her villainy, as a necromantic construct recently come into the name of Squire again, no less. All this right before starting to make her little path in creation as the one who challenges, and gets away with, entire Choirs. Against the tide, wrangling a story where there is none, grasping at the very last straws to weave a narrative, forcing Providence to be on her side even if she has to drag it kicking and screaming, is where Cat has always shone.

Mammon

But remember: Cat has yet to defeat a foe when compromise is to be had. The pattern of opposing Choirs and getting away with it is made, but Cat can only win when nothing short of a complete victory is an option because everything else is a complete loss. And even then she managed to break that pattern when allying with Sve Noc.

So against the likes of Malicia who will always go the rational way and have the ability to change gears rather than cling to being the enemy or their original plan and goal, Cat might find herself unable to win completely. Once proper compromise is given, she has yet to not take it and go for the brutal win. DK might've already noticed that, with Cat being troubled by her almost instinctively wanting to agree more than once.

Crash

This is a fair point but I think that at this point in time she wouldn't ever extend "trust", if you will, to Malicia. I very much think that this is the time she would refuse to compromise, she has been making it clear that she needs Malicia deposed and, preferably, to have Amadeus climb the Tower.

However this does pose what could well be the main problem with the Malicia subplot, this is one of the tougher enemies Cat will be facing.

As for the Dead King, I really do think that Cat gets the narrative advantage over him, especially because of your point about Total Victory. There can be no compromise in this, he needs to go for the Accords to be safe and, as he has now made clear, he's no longer willing to back down at all now it's victory or death, Cat's historically advantageous grounds.

Something to think about though, what the fuck is Malicia planning to do about the Dead King? How the heck does she account for him in her schemes?

Liliet

I think Malicia's going for the naive story-fu of 'the heroes will handle this somehow'. She's refusing to consider the option DK will win and then continue to win and then eventually roll over the whole continent, that's just not how things work.

And for all that I agree with you on what Cat wants to do, as long as she wants Amadeus to be in charge, she'll always be tempered by the fact he won't stop trying to save Alaya. Not her reign, not anymore, but her life, at least. And given that even Cordelia noticed how Cat reacted to him having to go against her at the conference, I don't think she'll have it in her to force the issue if, indeed, proper compromise is given. Which... it might.

Crash

If the compromise is the sort where Malicia abdicates but gets to keep her life sure that sounds okay by Cat standards.

What I meant was more the sort of deal where Malicia tries to hold something over Cat's head or has a big scheme that is very dangerous and tries to use it to convince her to back down and just leave Malicia on the throne due to "mutual assured destruction" or something of the sort. That one, I don't see Cat taking it.

Reminds me of her meeting with Akua in the Blessed Isles all the way back in Book 1. A stronger more well prepared offers deals that theoretically saves you trouble, but they are not truly palatable in the long run.

ChillyPepper

I suspect it might be Malicia throwing Cat into a story/pattern. The old Callow vs Tower story if I am guessing it correctly.

Army of Callow lead by a knight order, and the Legions of Dread/Tower forces. Perhaps a highly unlikely scenario.

Noldo

Would the timing indicate that Malicia made her move in anticipation of Black's open rebellion (but at a time when Black could no longer react to it) or as immediate reaction to Black's departure?

Could the contingency even be triggered by Black's claim?

Liliet

I think for maximum dramatic timing it had to be triggered by it, but activated manually (she'd have had to give specific commands she wouldn't have known to give all the way back when the hook was planted after all).

"I thought you'd say that. Well then, in that case,"

Mammon

I just realised something that could be really bad or really good based on your opinion of Malicia: She's likely going to win this one. Going by EE's writing pattern, she is the first half foe that demands direct attention so that the true big bad gets time to reach critical mass and those always tend to win, be able of victory or get a tie that is a mutual win. Only the second foe is essentially assured a complete loss.

We're at a chapter that suggests that book 5 is about at its end, meaning that Malicia is book 6's starting issue. She perfectly follows the groove of the pattern: Where Amadeus could smother problems in the crib by patient and careful approaches not following the enemy's ways, Cat has always been forced to rush in and wrest control in desperate situations. Now I'm not saying that Malicia knows this true-meta, but that makes it all the more likely that it will succeed because neither does Cat.

Book 1+2 (which are in length and structure a bit of an odd combo book 1 being the first act twice and book 2 being the second act twice):

Act 1 the Claimant battle. Won by William by surviving and getting the troublesome Pattern of Three. And a very good showcasing of finite doom screwing over too many Villains' effectiveness.

Act 1.2 War College. Won by Hell Hound, both practically and she could've won if she wanted.

Act 2 Fighting Akua's demons. No quarter, complete victory was necessary by devil's nature.

Act 2.2 William and Akua I. William gave no compromise, Cat won.

Book 3 act 1 vs the Fey. The Winter King won, even if Cat also won. Act 2, Akua's Folly, there was no quarter to be given. Cat wins, Akua doesn't. Except Cat doesn't win either.

Book 4 act 1 the Crusade, binding Cat's attention and one that Procer certainly didn't win but neither did Cat. Act 2 vs the Dead King is one that the Dead King won. Act 3, Cat broke the system by winning while Sve Noc also won. Book 4 really abandons the system, probably because Cat became True Villain (Fey) and therefore got the act 1 guaranteed win, act 2 tie, act 3 loss and breaking this guaranteed loss by losing her True Villain status.

Book 5 is just as confusing. The first half with the seven crowns and one doesn't really have a clear nemesis and creates another Finite Doom scenario to screw Story clarity. Larat was meant to be the final boss yet won, but he's hardly the main foe. Saint could be the main boss and lost, and Pilgrim could've been the main boss and lost only to be resurrected and 'win' by alienating Cat again, Tyrant lost yet won because it's all as planned. The main Villain DK though, he didn't lose because he merely got rid of loose ends, got Saint killed and killed Pilgrim too except no not really. But Saint, she was pretty much their best change against him.

Second act though, assuming we consider Cat being one of the few not losing much to anything and assuming Kairos to be her ally, she won because Bard, Good and pretty much all those against her lost. Except Kairos who got a tie by winning by losing, but we count that as a proper loss.

So why am I considering that Malicia has a good chance of winning despite the system of a tie followed by a win has been consistent for all of 1 to maybe 2 books? Because the groove is there.

Malicia is of the older books that still followed this pattern, the screwing of the win system lies in diplomacy and Malicia made a tie-plausible scenario for herself rather than being an inevitable deadline foe which follows the attrition and time restrains of a recent foe. If utter defeat isn't a necessity, then a tie is a good option.

Again, not saying that Malicia can use this True-meta knowledge of EE's writing style. But from a meta perspective, it's possible that she has some plan or opportunity to get a win or tie out of this. And that she has enough Story-knowledge from Amadeus to maybe know some in-game Stories that do the same thing. Amongst Calernia's mortals she's in the top 3 most Story-knowledgable after all, considering the rarity of such insight and that the likes of Pilgrim, Akua and Kairos only see and profit from the Story from their own perspective and experience.

Mammon

See I lacked a bit of clarity here, so before people misinterpretate: The pattern is only clear in book 3 and maybe when counting book 1 and 2 together in them too. But it's there in book 5, and there's a decent explanation for book 4 diverging from the pattern by Cat's base nature being changed during that book.

And Malicia isn't foolish enough to allow for pivots and all or nothing situations that are like the wind in the sails of Heroes, so considering her Story know-how she likely will follow this pattern of being the foe that gets the tie or mutual victory by naturally doing what she does and being who she is. She isn't foolish enough to make an inevitable, a deadline, a doomsday weapon or a no-quarter no compromise situation, which will make a defeat for her very difficult. Cat never won in such a situation before. If there is compromise to be had, she is pretty bound to taking it.

pault52

I'll bet money that they're going to the angel corpse

ninegardens

I wouldn't bet that money, but can you imagine:

CAT: "Alaya- why you so evil?"

Alaya: "What? This angel corpse is a stupid plan. Even you think so. Me removing it means that you can keep your gods damn peace treaty and deal with the DK, and I can stop having to worry about Bard nuking the continent."

CAT: "But you're in league with the dead king!"

Alaya: "Bard. Is. Trying. To. Nuke.The. Continent. Gods everburning, girl. Of course I'm in league with Nessie. I had a plan for him to retreat! stop screwing things up."

CAT: "Why didn't you just ask?"

Alaya: ".... Did you try asking Cordelia not to use the stupid Angel? How'd that work for you?"

ethericsentinel

See, this would be interesting and credible if Malicia hadn't already come down on the side of doomsday weapons. (That is how she and Amadeus had their falling out to begin with.)

ninegardens

Yeah, I totally agree, and realized while I was writing....

But I didn't want to ruin a silly joke.

In practice I could imagine Alaya drawing the distinction between threats of superweapon, and using it, but that isn't really a distinction I would take seriously.

Liliet

What would she do when someone called her bluff?

Because they would. This isn't an assured mutual destruction situation when the other side has the same weapon and is similarly (un)interested in using it, this is one-sided threat, and someone WILL go 'okay so what happens if we go against her ANYWAY'.

And then Malicia is either back to square 1, or she uses the superweapon.

aran

She'll be thrilled.

Chapter 87: Connive

"An enemy will remember you long after your dearest friends forget your face. Consider this, when you choose yours."

– Argea Theodosian, Sacker of Cities, Tyrant of Helike

Under the moon's light the outskirts of Salia were still a pale field of snow, but I almost started in surprise at the warmth of the breeze. Winter was dying, at last. At my right, Archer nonchalantly strolled forward as she strung her overlarge bow. I spared a moment to admire the deftness of her fingers as she did, and the strength of the arms hidden by mail and coat. At my left it was Akua Sahelian that tread the snow without leaving footsteps, so ethereally graceful she might as well have been gliding. Under the guise of Advisor Kivule she wore long black veils hiding her face, though the splendid black velour ballroom dress she'd decided to wear for our little walk provided insisted reminders she was one of the most attractive people I'd ever seen.

"It's called a Segovian cut," Indrani idly provided.

I tore away my gaze from the small slits in the dress' skirts that'd allowed glimpse of the smooth legs beneath. I did not reply, knowing from long experience that if I engaged it would be the verbal equivalent of leaping headfirst into quicksand. Akua had several veils over her face, and yet somehow I could still feel her smirking.

"They wear those for dances they have, where the women spin and-"

"We'll need to pass by my rooms so I can take my cloak," I interrupted, pretending I had no interest in her finishing that story.

Segovian cut, was it? I'd have someone look into that, there might be one that'd fit Indrani lying around Salia. Although, I couldn't ask it of Adjutant. That would be... uh. No, definitely not Hakram. And Hells, now that I thought about it, if I sent for anything like there'd be a report about it on the desk of the First Prince, the Empress and Gods forbid maybe even my father before the day was out. That made the whole notion a lot less enticing, although there might be other ways. Still, if it ended up that I had to call on the smugglers among the Jacks to get Indrani into a revealing dress without half the crowns on Calernia knowing of it I was going to find a tall cliff to leap down it. Even as Archer continued to heckle me I began to hobble towards my quarters, but quiet undercurrents in the Night warned me company was coming.

My Lord of Silent Steps emerged of the darkness between two crowded houses, the purple and silver paint of the Losara Sigil so intrinsically part of Ivah nowadays that I could hardly recall what it looked like without. Ivah's presence was ever welcome, and once more it was bringing to me what I required before I even thought to ask. Arm extended, it offered me the Cloak of Woe.

"Losara Queen," it greeted me.

"Lord Ivah," I replied. "My thanks."

I wrapped it around me, fingers rising to fasten the broach binding it closed under my throat, and the familiar weight of old mistakes and victories on my back was a reassuring thing. My hand had been filled by a sword, once. First of goblin steel, then of ice and shade, and after that of obsidian only once unsheathed. The dead yew staff that felt cool against my palm, somehow fitting it perfectly, was still a fresh choice: not one I had not fully embraced, for the consequences of it were not all known.

The mantle on my back, though? It was like an old friend, and even just wearing it made me feel sharper in thought and deed.

"Should I rouse the Mighty to war, First Under the Night?" Ivah asked. "Steel-clad soldiers march on your camp."

"No," I easily replied. "It will not come to that. The Mighty will have many wars to wage, in the coming nights. This need not be one of them."

Or even a war at all, if I could finagle that. I wasn't sure why the League of Free Cities would choose to lash out against me of all the rulers in Salia – even if Malicia was the one pulling the strings, it hardly seemed a winning venture for her – but I had no intention of allowing what was coming to develop into yet another front for Callow to fight a war on. I did not invite Ivah to accompany us out in the snows, and it did not presume to invite itself. The League's people were much further out than we were, since they'd left long before I even began to set out, but as I reached for the Night and let it empower my sight I saw they were hardly a single unified band. Out of the four thousand soldiers that the League of Free Cities had been allowed to bring, maybe two thousand were on the march. One thousand yet remained in their camp, across the distant field, and the rest was marching away. South, although they were split into two groups and one must have left recently to still be so close to the League's town-camp.

"Archer," I said. "You followed their movements from the start, yes?"

"You're wondering about the stagger," she said, sounding amused.

"The two packs of deserters, yeah," I frowned. "If the second wave was deserters who hesitated I'd not think of it twice, but they're moving in an orderly manner. Ranks, supply wagons."

"First group to walk out was Atalante," Indrani told me. "Packed up their affairs, assembled their soldiers and diplomats and left without looking back."

Which was not entirely surprising, I thought. Atalante had no real allies in the League, at the moment. It'd been at odds with Delos before the Tyrant upended the apple cart and started a round of civil war, and from what I understood the closest city it'd had to an ally, Penthes, had only been interested in using the chaos to grab some of the eastern Delosi holdings. Now that there was no Hierarch to compel the city to war against the Grand Alliance, they were likely to head home to lick their wounds instead of linger on foreign fields. If I had to guess, I'd put coin on the second band being the Bellerophon soldiery, and the old-fashioned tight formations I could glimpse in the distance held up to that perspective. It made no sense they'd waited for so long to leave, though.

"What happened with the Bellerophon delegation?" I asked.

"Mind you, I only saw from a distance," Indrani cautioned.

"You can put an arrow in a wasp from a mile away, Indrani," Akua amusedly said.

"Sure, but I could exactly hear what they were saying," Archer reminded us. "Still, as far as I could tell the kanenas tried to execute the general."

I saw no point in asking why, given that Bellerophon's laws had been written not even by a single raving lunatic but by a whole assembly of them, many of them violently opposed to each other in their ravings but every single one rabidly incensed by even the hint of foreign meddling in their common lunatic affairs. For all I knew, they'd wanted to executed him because he'd combed his hair the wrong way on the third day of the month. Tried, though, was something worth asking about.

"They defied the authority of their mage-inquisitor?" I said. "I'd never heard about one of them doing that before."

"The kanenas dropped dead all of a sudden," Archer replied, shaking her head. "And then they spent a while arguing about that."

I shiver went up my spine, and against my will I glanced up at the night sky. At what might lay behind it, waiting. What had become of the Hierarch was not yet clear, I thought, but surely all that he was must be tied up in his struggle against Judgement? The mere notion of Anaxares the Diplomat having become some sort of watchful angel to the Republic of Bellerophon was enough to make me sick in the stomach. I shook my head and focused anew.

"That doesn't explain why they're so far beyond Atalante," I finally said. "Unless they argue for nearly ten hours."

"Funny story," Indrani grinned, mouth half-hidden by her scarf, "they actually headed north first. Then they saw a road marker that said they were headed towards Salia and argued for an hour before turning south."

"And what's so funny about that?" I said, brow rising.

It was incompetence, but honestly a fairly mild one in nature. It wasn't unheard of for professional armies to need to catch their bearings, that this particular half-trained mob would have to as well wasn't anything unusual. Especially since we'd all come here through the Twilight Ways, which would be highly disorienting for those unfamiliar with Arcadian journeys. An embarrassing mistake, maybe, but nothing worth a grin.

"Well, the general," Indrani said. "You know, the one that didn't die? I think he must have been the one who chose the directions, because-"

"They executed him," I sighed.

She chuckled at that, and to my utter lack of surprise even Akua's body language hinted a smile under the veils. Yeah, well, between Wolof's golden child and the favourite pupil of the Lady of the Lake I supposed the general sense of humour for this company tended towards the dark.

"Bellerophon and Atalante flee the field, then," Akua calmly said. "We face numbers diminished and disunited. Who was it that lingered in the League's lodgings?"

"The people in the camp are mostly Mercantis mercenaries and the Delosi," Indrani said. "Everyone else is headed here, but not together."

"Should I guess?" I grunted. "Stygia and Penthes together. Nicae will have made room for a few members of the Secretariat with their own people, their Basileus needs all the friends he can make right now. Helike will come alone."

"Penthes came with Nicae," Archer corrected, "though you're right about the Secretariat. Stygia and Helike march without allies, even each other."

I worried my lip.

"Penthes is Malicia's hook in the League," I said. "And Malicia just broke Nicae's naval power in a single stroke, so why is Basileus Leo Trakas tolerating them at his side?"

"There were only two cities among the League that might feasibly be able to scry on par with Procer, much less Callow or Praes," Akua pointed out. "Stygia and Helike, and even the latter held true mostly on the back of the many deals made by Kairos Theodosian. Neither of these have an interest in passing such news along to Leo Trakas."

"Hakram assessed he still didn't know during the conference, but even now?" I frowned.

It'd been at least two days since the disaster, by my reckoning.

"Dearest heart," Akua said, sounding amused, "not all realms are so blessed as yours, to have inherited the scrying rituals of Praes and then been graced with the work of one of the most brilliant practitioners in living memory, the Observatory of Laure. Though your nets are not as wide and your spies nowhere as deeply planted as the Empire's, Callowan long-distance scrying is likely the most swift and reliable on the continent."

I grimaced as I considered that. It was true that even when I'd begun as the Squire I'd had access to the reports and assessments of the Eyes of the Empire as well as Legion scrying, and then spent near every campaign that followed with Masego at hand. My standards for the swiftness information was transmitted at were probably askew from most people's, as Akua was so gently implying. Besides, scrying was largely Trismegistan as far as rituals went – though the Principate's Order of the Red Lion used a formula Masego had noted as being raw, 'primitive' and influenced by Jaquinite methods – and the Free Cities weren't exactly practitioners of that. There were some local magics, from what I remembered reading, but no dominant school or unified tradition. The Stygian Magisterium were the finest sorcerers in the region, but they weren't sharing their secrets and it was a point of pride for them they'd been practicing sorcery for longer than the Praesi. Which the Praesi denied, of course, but that sort of historical pride pissing match tended to continue because no one could really be sure either way.

"All right," I said. "So Basileus Leo sees the League is falling apart. Stygia's the traditional rival of his city among the League as well unpalatable for the slavery besides, and Helike's the power he's trying to dislodge from the place of first among equals. Everyone knew Bellerophon couldn't be kept in the fold from the start, I'm guessing, so doubtless they didn't even try."

"That Atalante walked away implies he is failing to consolidate the League," Akua noted. "He would have attempted to keep the preachers from walking, if only for their coffers and healers."

Indrani laughed.

"So in Leo's hour of need, his buddies from Penthes come to offer support," she said. "And he's got no idea's that Malicia's hand is up the ass of the Exarchs, moving the lips so they'll say all the right things."

Colourfully put, but not inaccurate.

"You think she wants to prop up Leo Trakas and make a puppet of him?" I guessed. "I don't see how it can hold all that long. As soon as he hears about Still Water being used on his fleets, he turns on them in fury. He has to, his own people will stone him in the streets if he doesn't."

"Agreed," Akua said. "I would wager his usefulness is purely temporary, and the man himself disposable."

"Yeah, Sahelian's got that one pegged. He's an arrow loosed, not a lasting catspaw," Indrani said. "Ain't like the Tower's ever been shy about using people and then tossing them away."

"We are in agreement this is a ploy of the Empress, then?" I said.

"It seems likely," Akua agreed.

"We'd already be hip-deep in corpses if this was the Dead King's work," Archer frankly replied.

"Good," I grunted, eyes fixed on the shapes approaching in the distance. "Then we tread carefully. I'm not willing to hand her yet another fucking victory tonight."

We slowed and stopped without ever needing to speak a word, my limp carrying me atop a slight hill on the plains and the two of them coming to stand by my side as we waited for the League to walk the last stretch separating us. We could have met them halfway and gotten to speaking more quickly, but that would have been sending the wrong message: it was them coming to me, not us meeting as equals. The Tyrant had not made granted the same quantity of soldiers to all members of the League when making the delegation, that much was made clear by those advancing towards us. The two Exarch-claimants of Penthes had maybe three hundred foot with them, with the looks of professional soldiers about them: long mail shirts of good quality, crested helms with full cheek guards and oval shields. Their spears were unlike the long beasts the Stygians used in their phalanx, only about the height of a man, and they bore not swords but long-shafted axes at their hips.

The forces of Nicae, themselves numbering closer to five hundred, steady sword and board men in chainmail and cuirasses though they used small round steel shields and straight-edged sabers instead what I'd equip a shield wall in in their place. They had about a hundred riders as well, though it was only light horse. Long lances and javelins as well as what looked like armour of leather and cloth had me almost rolling my eyes. Aside from riding down conscripts, I hardly saw what good that kind of cavalry could ever do in a proper battle. They'd shatter under Legion crossbows in a hurry, and Gods wouldn't that be a horrible waste of good warhorses? The Stygians had brought a mere two hundred, their Spears of Stygian with their long spears raised high advancing at brisk pace as the few mounted people ahead I assumed to be magisters keeping an eye on the slave-soldiers. Kairos Theodosian had not been a man afraid to stack the deck in his favour, so it was the Helikean force of nearly nine hundred that was by far the largest of the approaching contingents.

Men-at-arms with their scale armour and sharp blades, the steady foot that was the foundation of Helikean warfare, counted six hundred. They moved in formation and good order. The last three hundred, however, were a sight that half-surprised me: kataphraktoi. I'd confiscated the equipment of the four thousand cataphracts that'd warred on my army in Iserre and sent them back to Kairos with a broken finger each, but it seemed at least part of that force had been raised anew. The broken finger I'd not expected to keep them down for too long, not with so many priests among the League army, but the horses and armaments were surprise. Mind you, I was looking at three hundred when my soldiers had once fought four thousand. I doubted even the deeper schemer like the Tyrant had anticipated needing to rearm all four thousand of the most elite force in his army. The last presence from the League was the Delosi Secretariat, and it evidently had not brought soldiers at all. A handful of askretis were walking with Nicaeans, carrying small scribing desks for what I assumed to be a senior member of the Secretariat.

"This is pretty nostalgic," Archer said, silver flask in hand. "The three of us, more enemies than we practically know what to do with."

"They're not necessarily enemies," I said.

"Cat insisting we're not necessarily going to kill them," Archer airily continued. "All we need is caves full of corpses and it'll be like we never left the Everdark."

"Any moment now, we'll declare war on an entire civilization," Akua suggested.

"We did pretty well last time," Indrani mused. "I'd say we rank at least a draw, don't you?"

She passed the flask to the shade, who drank a deep sip.

"Generous, that," Akua said afterwards. "Although, for an invasion force three women strong I'll concede there was a surprising amount of invading achieved."

"I need a better quality of minions," I complained. "Mine are too mouthy. I bet the White Knight never has to deal with anything like this."

Heroes must be all sweetness and light, to the Sword of Judgement. All I got were crows that got mouthy about giving me directions and underlings who couldn't ever let anything go. Akua handed me the flask and I took a sip myself – then spat it out, coughing.

"Indrani, you horrid wench," I gasped out. "This is senna."

Drow liquor, made from mushrooms and tasting like godsdamned mud. It'd been tolerable underground, where there was little else even remotely drinkable, but up here? After months of wine? It was like licking a muddy lake shore.

"You slipped me a flask when I left before the Graveyard," Indrani beatifically smiled. "How does the saying go again? For small slights, long prices. Wench."

I glanced at Akua who had brazenly betrayed me by pretending this was halfway decent liquor when she'd drunk of it herself, and she languidly shrugged.

"How could I stand in the way of righteous revenge, my heart?" the shade said. "It would have been most uncharitable of me."

"This is why Hakram is my favourite," I muttered under my breath.

At the very least, the indignation had me less tense as the soldiers approached.

"And now," Indrani narrated, "as foes stream forward like a mighty river, atop the hill stand a peerless beauty, a regal queen, a mysterious seductress – and also you two, I guess."

I could not flip off Archer in front of the League, I reminded myself. No matter how much she deserved it. Indrani shifted slightly to the side, eyes narrowing, and her tone went serious without warning.

"Mages with the Basileus," she warned. "At least three."

I followed her gaze and found Leo Trakas atop his white stallion, as well as the two Exarch-claimants, but the mages took me a while longer to figure out. Some of Basileus Leo's escorting horseman wore ill-fitting armour, I realized. The sleeves were too long, as if made for larger and taller men, and they seemed uncomfortable with the weapons they were carrying.

"You sure?" I quietly said.

"Their horses move like they've been drugged," Archer murmured. "Those are war horses, willful, and they're not good riders. Either those mounts were spelled to be docile, or they were fed something."

"Akua?" I said.

"Enchanted," she said. "Though sloppily. I'd wager they are either Nicaean mages – no great wonders, those – or hired practitioners from Mercantis."

"Lovely," I growled.

If Leos Trakas had tight reins on his 'allies' I'd call this a precaution and let it go, but given that Penthes was likely playing him at Malicia's behalf there were risks involved. The larger party, consisting of the Penthesians, Nicaeans and the Secretariat observers, halted its march maybe a hundred feet ahead of our hill. A smaller party advanced, though it wasn't that small: the Exarchs brought thirty men, Leo Trakas thirty men of his own – including the mages, now dismounted – and with four scribes and the Secretariat official it was sixty eight people who strode towards the three of us. In the distance, the forces of Helike and Stygia halted on either side of the large force. Two riders peeled out of the band for Helike, one for Stygia. Bundled up in furs, Basileus Leo was at the head of the delegation and it was him that addressed us first.

"Hail, Black Queen," the young man said.

"Hail, Basileus," I calmly replied. "Your visit is an unexpected pleasure."

"Is it a visit to walk Proceran soil, now?" one of the Exarchs mocked. "How quickly your dominion extends, Queen of Callow."

I glanced at Akua.

"Advisor," I said. "Do remind me – is that one Prodocius or Honorion?"

"Prodocius, my queen," Akua replied.

I glanced at the dark-haired man, his cheeks gone red from anger as much as the cold, and my eyebrows rose.

"Did you know that the Eyes of the Empire have you officially marked as 'having the wits of a well-bred trout'?" I asked.

The man snarled.

"You coat your insults in lies, you-"

"I assure you," I amicably smiled, "it is a verbatim quote."

"Prodocius," Basileus Leo sharply said. "We did not come to trade barbs."

"That is pleasing to know," I said.

"So why did you come?" Archer drawled. "I'm assuming it's not to visit the nice Proceran countryside. Snow's not measurably any nice close to our camp."

Knowing her, she might actually have checked.

"Accusations were made against you, Queen Catherine," an old man spoke in lightly accented Lower Miezian.

Long hair white as snow and bound in a ponytail, the man who'd spoken was wrinkled like old leather and nearly as dark of skin. This was, if I remembered my briefings correctly, Nestor Ikaroi of the Secretariat. On each of his cheeks could be found a blue stripe and a black one, tattooed. The marks of someone who had climbed the ranks of their bureaucracy until there was nothing left to climb.

"Secretary Ikaroi, isn't it?" I said.

The old man, to my surprise, gallantly bowed.

"It is a great pleasure to formally meet you, Your Majesty," he said.

"And I you," I replied, dipping my head in thanks. "I've long had an interest in the ways of the Secretariat."

Which was true enough, since back in the first days of my reign I'd been desperate to find a working bureaucratic model that wasn't an imitation of the Praesi one. There'd never really be time or resources to spend on a venture in the Free Cities though, not with Procer mobilizing.

"Then perhaps in the days to come you might be willing to speak with formal chroniclers," Nestor Ikaroi offered. "We have a troubling lack of direct sources concerning the beginning of the Uncivil Wars."

I blinked, taken aback at the continued civility. Usually people were only this polite after they'd lost a few battles or I'd put a blade at their neck.

"Time allowing, I've no objection," I slowly said. "The Marshal of Callow is already writing a history of her own, and I would not object to your speaking with her either."

"It pleases us all you are willing to interact peacefully with the League, Your Majesty," Basileus Leo said, reclaiming the lead on the League side. "Yet it would benefit us all if you would answer the accusations that were posed."

"It is interesting that the Basileus of Nicae considers himself to have authority over the Queen of Callow," Akua mildly said. "I wonder which precedent is so in use."

The younger man looked like he'd swallowed a lemon.

"Should I take this as refusal to speak with the League?" he asked me.

"Do you speak for the League now?" Indrani drily said. "You seem to be missing parts, 'Hierarch'."

I raised a hand.

"We have further guests, Archer," I said. "Let us not jump to hasty conclusions."

The riders from Helike and Stygia had finally arrived. The Stygian was no surprise: Magister Zoe Ixiani had been the voice of the Magisterium through the League civil war and the Proceran campaign, and it seemed she was still to be the same tonight. The fact that she was a slaver rather spoiled her good looks, sadly. As for the two Helikeans, I was familiar with both. General Basilia, who had I once met in Rochelant and later learned was the Tyrant's favourite general, rode well and high in the saddle. Dark-eyed and dark-haired, she had sharp cheekbones and the well-built shoulders of a warrior. The other I knew almost intimately: the pale eyes straddling the line of blue and grey, the surprisingly young tanned face I had once seen kneeling before me. General Pallas, who had led the kataphractoi who killed my men.

"Generals," I said. "Magister Ixioni."

The two commanders offered brisk salutes.

"Magister Zoe would suffice," the sorceress smiled.

I did not smile back and flicked a glance at the Helikeans.

"Quite the gathering," I said. "Dare I ask why?"

"We are here as observers," General Basilia said.

"You are here as an usurper, general," the other Exarch-claimant said.

That one wasn't Prodocius, which made him Honorion. Plump where the other was thin, he was middle-aged and his curly hair luxuriant. From what Black had told me, he was prodigiously wealthy and had no particular talent aside from this. Considering a great source of wealth for Penthes was trade with the Empire, I'd wager he was even more Malicia's creature than the other one.

"I will uphold the last will of the Tyrant of Helike, Penthesian swine," General Basilia coldly said. "Steel in hand, if I must."

I was detecting the slightest hint of tension there.

"Accusations, you said," I mused. "Am I to hear them, or will they remain a mystery?"

"Are you willing to submit to the judgement of the League?" Basileus Leo eagerly said.

I met his eyes, unamused.

"Look at my back, Leo Trakas," I said. "What do you see there?"

The young man's lips thinned.

"The Mantle of Woe, it is called," he said.

"It's a list of people who asked me to submit to things," I said. "I would not be so eager to be number among them, were I you."

"Then we are at an impasse," Basileus Leo said.

"Secretary Nestor," Akua said. "What does the record indicate the accusations are?"

Leo Trakas paled, either in anger or fear.

"Claimant to the title of Exarch Prodocius Lessor alleges that Queen Catherine Foundling murdered the Tyrant of Helike," Nestor Ikaroi calmly said. "Claimant to the title of Exarch Honorion Kapenos alleges that Queen Catherine Foundling was accessory to the murder of Anaxares of Bellerophon, Hierarch of the Free Cities."

A heartbeat of silence passed, then Archer burst out laughing. It was not, I decided, the most diplomatic we'd ever been. I glanced at the Helikean generals, who seemed untroubled.

"And what does Helike say of this?" I asked.

"We cast no such accusation," General Pallas bluntly said.

"Our sire would have disdained such a measure, even were the accusation true," General Basilia added with open contempt.

I glanced at Basileus Leo, wondering in what possible world he might have thought that my 'submission' to 'League judgement' might have resulted in anything the wholesale slaughter of everyone trying to execute me on such thin pretence. Gods Below, I'd sent running larger forces than the entire League escort, much less his little coalition. No, he was young but he wasn't an idiot – he wouldn't have been able to prevent a Strategos from being chosen in Nicae if that were the case. Ah. Had he been presenting himself as the speaker for the League so that he could then declare me innocent in that capacity, avoiding a fight with me while binding Penthes to him? On parchment that was a halfway decent plan, but he had to realize I had no damned incentive to indulge him and the precedent of the League having authority over a Queen of Callow was unacceptable. If he is not stupid, which I know him not to be, I thought, then he must be desperate.

"Gods, do you have a semblance of evidence at least?" I asked.

"Tell me you didn't march near two thousand soldiers for... this."

The Basileus flushed and gestured towards his attendants. Archer, I saw, was carefully watching the mages. Good. One of the soldiers came forward with two sheaths of parchment, but Exarch Prodocius sneered and elbowed him, snatching the scrolls. He strolled up the hill, staring me down with surprising aplomb for a man who as far as I could tell had no power and no military training – he wasn't even in particularly good shape. Except, I realized as he approached, he wasn't staring me down. His eyes were wide and showing white, like a terrified horse's. He was, I grasped as he hurried towards me, frightened nearly out of his wits. And still he threw the parchments towards my face. Akua slapped them down, even as Exarch Prodocius stepped up to me with a rictus of bared teeth that straddled fury and terror.

"There," Prodocius snarled, "you murdering tyrant, you-"

At the Basileus' barked order two Nicaean soldiers stepped forward, one grabbing him by the shoulder and dragging him back and the other offering me an apologetic bow before picking up the parchments – they'd fallen short, as open scrolls were want to do – and bowed again before pressing them into my hand.

Or at least tried to, before Archer caught his wrist and rammed a blade through the side of his neck.

Aston Whiteman

So happy no vote reminders.

Just good story discussions..

Dread Emperor Irritant

Don't forget to vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil-eamondemarsh> the placement of this comment is fantastic

greatwyrmgold

It's a reply, so that was intentional.

Morgenstern

I also like the placement of the "just story discussions" post – for me it is shown as the VERY first comment to this chapter. No discussion or anything whatsoever, other than complaining about the vote reminder, which wasn't even there yet. o_ô

Internet trolls... *shakes head
So. Amazing. 😊

Hm... Can we vote this troll post to be the very best yet?
Sure has my vote. =P

Eleron M Pfoutz

Once more, the greatest of the Dread Emperors of Praes graces our comments.

Jacob McNeer

Must be Traitorous in disguise.

NerfContessa

Isn't it always?

More serious, what could pose enough danger that indra I is forced to abandon all elegance and banter and even more so, kills before cat orders it?

Hmmnnnnnn....

Liliet

Bless your heart.

Barthumphries

Dudes, and salary start the typo thread. You know that's why Archer take a sword through that guy's neck? Because he didn't start a typo thread?

Let's review. Guy didn't start a typo thread. Archer stabbed him. Ipso facto, that's what happens when you forget the typo thread.

And he's got no idea's that Malicia's hand is up the ass of the Exarchs Change idea's to idea.

There are at least 8 more typos. Can you find them all? Can you be as eagle eyed as Akua and Archer?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I just spent several minutes fiddling about with web tutorials trying to learn how to get WordPress to let me embed a link in a comment so I could quote you and make the word "vote" a link to topwebfiction. Alas, I have nothing to show for it.

Liliet

Let's see if this works...
\\

Liliet

Okay, that didn't work. Second try.

[a href="insertlinkhere.com"]Vote[/a] only with angled brackets.

Also known as, wordpress comments use limited html.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Thanks. Is that angled brackets as in , or...?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Okay, judging by the fact that the type of angled bracket I typed doesn't show up, I'm guessing it's the correct form. So, without further ado, here goes nothing:

"So happy no vote reminders," Aston said, blithely spelling their own doom. "Just good story discussions."

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Messed up slightly but I can live with it. Thanks again, Lilliet.

Arturo

It has been far too long since Catherine has tried diplomacy and ended with a slaughter. She's finally returning to her roots.

pagesbe

I'm... guessing that there is something cursed about those papers or at least Indrani knows something we and Catherine don't. Because I can't think of another reason she'd do this.

SHARKS

I wonder if they are citizen papers or something. If cat is an honorary citizen, what laws she is subject to immediately changes.

Agent J

I don't imagine that would hold weight with the Army of Callow that's, like, right there you guys.

Jane

Well, if Hierarch does still have some power over the citizens of Bellerophon as implied, then I could see that mattering. And while it would be ridiculous, it wouldn't actually be out of character for the city to have a law as absurd as "If you touch the paperwork, you agree to be our citizen". Plus, I can certainly see why someone would be as stressed out as the Exarch, carrying those papers! Imagine the fear that you might accidentally become a citizen of that place, if the winds blow the wrong way!

...Joking aside, it's not citizenship papers. But if they were, it could actually be a more effective assassination plot than one would expect – possibly moreso than a more conventional magic attack.

Shveiran

It couldn't.

Story-fu requires actual STORIES to work. Narrative doesn't like technicalities unless the story is about technicalities. You can't step up to king Arthur and tell him you owned the field the rock was in, so you technically own the sword too because it was in the rock, and thus you are in fact the true king of Britain. I mean, you can, but it doesn't get narrative traction unless your story is about land ownership and legal battles AND your story is bigger than King Arthur's.

I'm frankly still baffled the Hierarch could get away with that, but this no name getting it to stick with the Black Queen?

Not going to happen. It must be something else.

Shikkarasu

I don't imagine that would hold weight with the ArmyQueen of Callow that's, like, right there you guys.

greatwyrmgold

I'm not a lawyer, but I'm pretty sure most legal papers aren't legally binding just because you're holding them. You have to at least drip some blood on them or something.

Shveiran

I have a law degree, so I can confirm no law system I know of works that way.

That wouldn't be a problem if we were operating within a legal system that actually works that way – I mean, it would be moronic IMO but it isn't IMPOSSIBLE nor anything, as law is a social construct – but it is a fair assumption that's not the case.

Otherwise, Anaxares would have commented on it with regards to him receiving stuff all the time, and the Tyrant would have exploited the hell out of it.

If it was that relevant, EE would have shown it to us beforehand.

Seeker

It was most likely an assassin or a trap. Stage an act of rudeness, polite soldier hands back the papers to her and stabs her while close.

Liliet

Contact poison is a thing.

There's... a lot of options for why Cat taking those could be a Very Bad Idea.

onedollargum

Contact poison's a thing, but no great hazard to a Name. I imagine it's more a sorcery/story/legal thing that could cause problems. Perhaps the scroll curses her, perhaps it reveals a page from the Dead King's ascension book, or perhaps it makes her an honorary member of the Republic of Bellerephon (subject to all laws incumbent within).

NerfGlaistigUaine

She's not Named though. She's just a squishy mortal albeit with powerful patrons. Contact poison would probably work, at least until Sve Noc healed her... actually can they heal? It seems likely, but I don't think I've ever seen them doing it...

onedollargum

Point on not being named anymore, but she's close enough that she doesn't really age much. I figured it'd count. As for Sve Noc, after digesting Winter any poison they drank would be like watered down beer.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

They healed her after beating her nine tenths of the way to death then deciding to take her on as an advisor. She even had to request that she be allowed to retain her limp, to keep her humble. But that was in person, not via the crows, so maybe it's different.

Liliet

"Nine tenth of the way"? She had her HEART ripped out (thanks Akua, you're a dear). Also, I don't think she requested the limp, she just didn't request to remove it (in one chapter it says that removing it would have demanded a price not unlike that once paid by Warlock to heal her from near death, which was human sacrifice, so... yeah. not default)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

My memory is admittedly a little blurry. Might be a good time for a reread.

KageLupus

I doubt that it is Story related, as that line of defensive thinking isn't Archer's wheelhouse. Honestly the odds are that it was a mundane assassination attempt, and that guy that got knifed was some kind of physical threat to Cat. That would make the most sense for why it was Archer that noticed and took him down.

Archer is the physical defense, able to pick out hidden weapons and incongruous details. Akua is the magical defense, and if the scrolls were dangerous she would have said something after knocking them out of the air instead of letting that little scene play out. Cat of course is the narrative defense, since her brain is oddly keyed in to meta-text and how stories can play out.

I highly doubt that the scrolls had a story-based aspect to them, mainly because there are no Named around to make that play. Maybe Malicia if she is pulling the strings here, but even then using Stories has never really been her strong suit. She is a manipulator on a grand scale, but regarding people and not only Named.

Rup

good analysis great team roles:
physical defense
magical defense narrative defense

.
that last one is a doozy

Liliet

I think Akua didn't say anything because the scene took like ten seconds from the moment she realized to the moment Archer stabbed the guy. Two DnD rounds. Talking is only a free action in DnD.

Insanenoodlyguy

Even then there can be limits once you roll initiative. My DM says you can get about 6 words out during a round if you expect to be understood and heard once you're in the thick of it. Seems legit.

Liliet

Yeah... that depends on the DM. Well, we haven't been trying dramatic speeches with ours, but...

Well, point stands either way XD

lennymaster

That was obviously one of the hidden mages.

Jane

...Well, I've seen succession crises lead to worse plans than this, and which ended in even worse places, so I guess the League is technically still ahead compared to some histories.

TeK

Something like four different people consequently pretending to be both the fifth long-dead person and all the last ones combined. Even if one of those was publicly shot out of the cannon.

konstantinvoncarstein

Are you speaking of the Dimitri affair at the end of Boris Godounov's reign?

Jane

Well, personally, I'd just been thinking of the various ways in which the Eastern Roman Empire undermined itself with fighting over who the Emperor "should" be – at least here, the League is just provoking someone who's already an enemy, instead arranging for a more powerful rival to be captured and humiliated while they decide that it's a splendid time for a civil war while an enemy army wanders through their territory.

But with the League being the League, maybe it is more appropriate to compare them to the more absurd moments in our history...

Jane

Oh, though I guess if we're talking "Bad Succession Ideas", the whole War of the Roses kind of takes the cake, doesn't it? I mean, setting aside all the bad decisions that were made during the war, spending thirty years tearing the country apart instead of just sitting down and coming to a diplomatic arrangement is pretty much the epitome of a bad idea. Assuming one actually cares about the kingdom, at least.

TeK

That is an assumption, yes.

greatwyrmgold

So far, it's holding together better than most Hellenic Leagues.

erebus42

Well that escalated quickly

Naeddyr

Archer! Don't be rude.

superkeaton

Archer must have seen something on the scrolls. Probably spelled, maybe some kind of bomb or poison or whatever those mages are around for.

Maybe it' a dickbutt.

SpacyRicochet

Not just Archer. Sahelian is the one that slapped them down before they could reach Catherine.

Liliet

Huh, yeah. They both seem to have noticed something Catherine didn't, or at least that Catherine didn't explicitly say in her POV.

Mental Mouse

Possibly magic possibly just following Prodocius's manner. He's certainly acting like someone forced into carrying the moral equivalent of a bomb.

Liliet

I'm wondering if Catherine noticed it too. After she notices Prodocius's facial expression, she stops commenting on people's motivations or reasons for anything that's happening and just sticks to straight narration of events. It's possible she also realized something, but didn't say it yet and didn't react because, well, a game of impressions. The less she reacts, the better, outside of the carefully controlled eyebrow lifting with a 'fucking really?' disdainful look.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, yes! Great point.

Nairne .01

Was that assassin that Indarni just stopped?

IDKWhoitis

It was "an" assassin, but not our guy. They probably tried to use an artifact or spell, and Archer took them down before it could go off successfully.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is an assassin, but not Assassin. He would never attack someone as powerful as Catherine from the front when they are expecting trouble.

Decius

You would never expect Assassin to attack you from the front when you are expecting trouble, which means you can't assume that your front is safe from Assassin just because you are expecting trouble.

konstantinvoncarstein

Praesi sophistic apart 😊 he would never attack a Named, a quasi Named and a powerful sorceress in a frontal assault. It would end too badly

Jarthon

While I agree that he isn't likely to do this, he has shown a willingness to fight head on as he did to Hanno right before jumping off of his exploding horse, which I assume is likely do to his strange ability to defy death (likely with clones or something)

Fayhem

That wasn't Assassin. That was Black using the same Nefarious trick that Malicia is so fond of. That's why it worked for misleading Hanno; Black's soul/mind was actually (temporarily) in that body.

konstantinvoncarstein

It was not Assassin, but a puppet with Black's soul in it.

Shveiran

By that logic, you wouldn't expect him to try to kill you by terrifying you via a scary dance performance.

I'm not quite sure that "we'd have the element of surprise" is a good reason to employ unorthodox tactics as often as people think. Some things aren't usually done for a reason.

Jane

Cat, Cat, Cat, don't look down on light cavalry like this! Yeah, they wouldn't be great at charging into a line of spears reinforced by archers, but you're not supposed to be using them in the same way as heavy cavalry.

Light cavalry excel at scouting, and at running down a routed enemy. A victory is only worth as much as it can be exploited, and your heavily armored legionnaires aren't going to be chasing down many of the stragglers – to say nothing of the danger they'd face breaking formation like that. Your heavy cavalry are better at this, but they're expensive to train and armor, and still aren't going to be as nimble as your light cavalry at the end of the day.

And it's not as though they're worthless in a pitched battle, either – sure, they're great, big targets, but they're still highly mobile, and can be sent to threaten archers, commanders, or other targets of opportunity while the enemy's main force is engaged. Or just send them at the flanks if there's nothing more appealing to strike – they're not great at charging a prepared target, but they're good for hitting a vulnerable foe and withdrawing before they're fully engaged.

They might not be revered as much as heavy cavalry was at the time, but to roll your eyes at them would be like someone rolling their eyes at sappers for not being able to hold a line. They still perform a very important function.

konstantinvoncarstein

Obviously, she never played Total War

Jane

I ~guess~ I can forgive her for not being up to date on cavalry tactics when Callow lost their horses before she was born, but... Really, she should at least know the scouting part, goblins or no.

Liliet

I'm guessing she does, but right now is looking at them as 'potential opponents for my force to fight here and now'. Mind you, all the soldiers present at Salia are meant to be guard – what scouting in the middle of a diplomatic conference?

JJR

Do you think goblin cavalry would be one goblin on a small horse, or 4 goblins on a large horse?

shadw21

I though they had this already, undead goats/horses loaded with munitions.

Alternatively, 4 goblins pretending to be a horse with a goblin riding on top, or maybe it's more of a chariot situation?

konstantinvoncarstein

Goblins on goats!

Shveiran

It would be goblins on goblins, of course.
That way, your cavalry can wield twice as many knives.

Andrew Mitchell

Or, even better, goblins on goblins on goblins, for even more knives.

Or, even betterer, goblins on goblins on goblins on goblins, for even morer knives.

Or...

Liliet

Goblin siege tower!

Insanenoodlyguy

this is actually canon in 5e. Batiri Tribe Goblins fight this way https://vignette.wikia.nocookie.net/forgottenrealms/images/6/6b/Batiri_battle_stack.jpg/revision/latest/scale-to-width-down/2000?cb=20180226232110

Decius

Light cavalry are very, very good at being somewhere where they can't be struck but also somewhere where they can't be ignored.

"We can't run the supply train through that valley, the enemy's light cavalry can reach it."

Legion doctrine means that the light cavalry is not very effective on the field, and so of course it should never take the field against the legions.

nimelennar

What are you taking about? Light cavalry are supposed to have their swords lit aflame, and be sent in, without support, against the very centre of an massive horde of undead.

greatwyrmgold

Are we making fun of the tactics in late Game of Thrones? Because we could plumb that well for days, my friend.

shimizubad

At night

machinetell

T R I G G E R E D

JJR

They got better though.

greatwyrmgold

And cloth armor, also known as gambeson, is pretty effective against most things less powerful than a crossbow. Sure, a sword'll cut through the first layers without too much trouble, but there are a lot of layers; most attacks won't pierce all the way through, or at least not anywhere near as deeply as they would without armor.

I'm starting to think Catherine has a warped view of the kinds of opponents an army is expected to fight.

machinetell

It can be even more resistant to blades than that. Leaving aside magical possibilities, or advanced tech like giant spider silk (ie Kevlar).

Some of history's most famous cavalry wore cloth armour – Alexander of Macedonia's companion cavalry wore the linothorax.

Sure, it won't do anything against an enemy lance or pike, but it's not ever meant to come in contact with either.

JJR

"What do you mean 'most battles /aren't/ against monsters from outside of creation'?"

Her Name experience probably gave her a fairly warped view of how effective armor actually is too. Though guide armor isn't nearly as bad as it is in some settings, and don't you dare forget your helmet!

Shveiran

Actually, no.

Gambeson was very often used by most European Medieval armies, but they were not employed ALONE.

The idea of the gambeson or aketon, is to provide padding between your body AND the outer shell of armor.

Alone, it isn't very effective: a slashing wound from a sword will not do great damage to you, but it will wreck the gambeson itself, which is NOT easy to make or repay. So even then, the gambeson deployed on its own will risk falling apart after the battle if you got hit once.

And that is the best case scenario, because padded cloth provides no help against puncture: spears and arrows and good old stabbing will get through just as easily.

When comboed with a different armor, however, gambeson becomes amazing. Imagine wearing chain mail on your shirt: as soon as one ring gets split, it will risk piercing your garment and cut your skin as you move, which is painful and distracting. Beside that, metal protects you from cuts but doesn't stop momentum: the rings are meant to spread the pressure over a larger area, but it still bruises fiercely. If you get hit by an axe or a mace, you'll be GLAD to have chainmail, but it could still very well be an incapacitating blow without any particular strength on the enemy's part. If you are wearing padded armor, high-impact weapons deliver much less punch because the gambeson absorbs a lot of the impact the mail spread, and your skin is protected from split rings and chafing.

Even with cheaper armor, say, leather or even better studded leather, a padding layer goes a long way in protecting you from broken bones but only if the harder, external layer is doing something to stop the cut, divert the piercing and spread the impact over a larger area.

Macedonian may very well have used cloth armor, but they were not exactly the peak of military research. They were amazing, but only compared to their time period. Caesar could not go against Napoleon and win, is what I mean.

TL;DR: Gambesons are amazing when combined with an hard, external shell like plate, chainmail or studded leather. On their own, they are better than fighting with your shirt but not by much.

IDKWhoitis

As far as attempts of assassination go, this was pretty fumbled.

Is Malica this desperate? It would make sense given that all Praesi spies in Prócer are effectively compromised with Scribe watching, and Assassin certainly answers to Black before Malica. But this attempt is barely shows any effort into killing Cat. Is this escalation to prod Cat into a bad decision?

Jane

If Cat were to act sufficiently rashly here (say, killing everyone of importance present in retaliation), I could see that being enough to push Callow out of the Grand Alliance again in conjunction with a couple more pushes. The assassination a couple chapters back, Judgment wounded, people not being comfortable with an Evil ally to begin with... There's ample arguments for people opposed to the alliance to work with. It'd just take Cat playing into those expectations a few times to put Hasenbach in a pretty difficult position, though I don't see the Dominion listening any time soon after Pilgrim.

But that would be a pretty big "if", has too many other points of failure, and would be expecting the loss of an asset that Malicia presumably spent at least a little effort to acquire – and it would have worked almost as well if Cat were to be provoked into killing a delegation instead of actually important people. Or, better yet, if they instead sent people who would be opposed to Malicia to these talks instead.

No, assuming that this is an actual plan instead of a cursed scroll disrupting everything or a lone sleeper agent primed to attack at any opportunity, this whole scheme looks ridiculous enough that I'm inclined to think it was purely a League-born plot; an ambitious and desperate ruler trying to consolidate the League around himself with a bold plan that ended up considerably less baked than it needed to be.

Hellspirit

If it is a Malica plot, considering how botched, it would not have been her true objective. Rather her objective might have been to ruin the diplomatic relations between her and the Free Cities, considering that in recent time Cat has gone from ARCH HERETIC of THE EAST, the BLACK QUEEN, a warlord with immense power and a reputation for making corpses where she goes, to a somewhat more reasonable image.

If a diplomatic party has one of theirs killed in cold blood without the true plot being unraveled/proven, it feels more like a Malica play.

Liliet

This is more what I'm thinking. Malicia is trying to throw everything she can at Cat at once, to confuse / panic her and trip her into bad decisions. While Cat is handling one crisis, she's not handling another; for all we know there are parts of Salia being lit on goblinfire right now (in a secret plot Scribe hadn't known about). The assassination attempt doesn't have to work – it doesn't even have to rattle Cat, just distracting and frustrating her means it'll have done its job. And if it fucks up her diplomatic relationship with the League – which I think Malicia would know better than to expect by now, but on the off chance – well that's just two birds with one stone.

They only have one Catherine. Note that if she hadn't picked out and groomed Abigail for just this task – to be The Liked Callowan Commander – she probably WOULD be panicking right now. And we probably don't yet know about ALL lit dynamite sticks flying in Cat's direction right now.

Morgenstern

... an excuse for something? "How dare you kill our messenger; he was just handing over papers".

Who knows, maybe one CAN prod Akua's and Indrani's sense for sth. being off (way too much) and let it be nothing at all in the end, making them / Cat look bad.

Someone was meant to kill someone so that someone else can....
(what?)

For what end, though...
We'll see. *shrugs

Morgenstern

... and why am I only seeing Liliet's post now?

Can I please delete mine? No? Not only no edit function, but also no delete? Damn wordpress.... 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hey, the saying is "don't SHOOT the messenger"; there's nothing in there about shanking the messenger.

Darkening

Huh, bit of a contradiction in the last few paragraphs, first it says that Akua caught the parchments, and then it says they fell short and someone needed to pick them up? Weird. Wonder if this is actually an assassination attempt? I suppose Cat is a lot more fragile these days, if she wasn't expecting it and it worked fast enough, a curse or some kind of explosive or something might actually manage to kill her if she didn't have the time or presence of mind to protect herself with Night.

darkening

... huh, did that get edited or did I completely misread? hm.

mavant

It got edited.

Aston Whiteman

They want Cat to take on a new leadership role/responsibility by accepting the scrolls...

Thus tying her down.

greatwyrmgold

I'm not familiar with legal procedure in international diplomacy, but I'm pretty sure reading a document doesn't imply that you accept it. Even EULA's aren't that strict; they just identify other actions that imply accepting the agreement.

Zggt

There has been a real lack of lies and stabbing among the Woe recently. Glad to see Archer is there to address this

Darkening

Yeah, I mean, when you get big enough you just don't need to lie to people or stab them as much, but there's still a real joy when you get the opportunity to go back to your roots and indulge in a little wanton violence.

Cicero

"This is pretty nostalgic," Archer said, silver flask in hand. "The three of us, more enemies than we practically know what to do with."

"They're not necessarily enemies," I said.

"Cat insisting we're not necessarily going to kill them," Archer airily continued

Archer, it really isn't sporting to open the ball just because you want to call the tune.

Aston Whiteman

Really?

Javvies

Huh.

I'm hoping that the Helikean reaction indicates that Kairos's last will and testament or final orders has him leaving presents for Cat. Like making her his chosen heir/successor.

Props to the Secretary Nestor for acting like a mostly reasonable person. Though the fetish for records is showing. But, to be fair, it's existing itself in a relatively reasonable and restrained manner.

Seriously? Charging Cat with the murder of Kairos and/or Heirarch? That's ... yeah. No. Archer might not have been the most diplomatic, but still, it's hard not to laugh at that. Might be Malicia trying to cause trouble, because I doubt that they'd come up with going after Cat on their own.

Jane

And, like, imagine thinking that anyone is going to agree to a trial after the way the trial of the White Knight went. Obviously, nobody is going to agree to have their monarch tried by a foreign country, but suggesting it just after the last trial killed the judge, the plaintiff, and nearly everybody else in the room... Yeah, that takes some nerve.

konstantin von carstein

Even without that, a head of state would never submit herself willingly to the justice of another country. It would be a loss of sovereignty.

Jane

I mean... I did say that in the comment you just replied to 😊.

Insanenoodlyguy

Crack Theory: They are trying to get the law to apply to her because the law very well may soon apply to her and this is their last chance to balance that.

Tyrant hasn't just named her the ruler of Helike. He's named her heir to Hierarch! Our newest Angel of Judgement didn't agree with this so much as not care when he signed all the papers Tyrant's gargoyle's put in front of him (whomever takes over should get to it already, he needs to be executed yesterday! Really, he ought to execute all the kanenas for not executing him..) Anyway, there's a lot of people not into her being granted such power, Malicia least of all, so this is a desperation tactic where she is either found unsuitable for the office via the legal system or ends up killing so many people in the League she is automatically disqualified. That's why everybody is so nervous yet still willing to go along with this horseshit, she has a legit claim otherwise and might well end up in charge. Ironically Pallas might be one of her strongest supporters now. "no no, she left us alive but she did it in a totally evil and sadistic way. we had to march back to a man who might well kill us for failure in the cold, while crippled, after being forced to cripple ourselves! Trust me, she's still serving Below!"

Liliet

Reading this after the next chapter: I'm fucking dying.

Liliet

Secretary Nestor has been hilarious and a star.

"The kindergarten at my side notwithstanding, we absolutely can talk like sane adults."

Ultimate_procrastinator

Ah, the Only Sane Man trope. So simple, yet it works so well

Liliet

"I swear I'm not with them. I'm so fucking embarrassed to be from the same geographical region"

To be fair, he's not the only one! General Basilia is also there ♥

edrey

Here i still waiting the tyrant last will that the general said.
I hope something unexpected happens

Crash

I've always had a bad impression of Leo Trakas. The way he speaks in his few appearances rubs me wrong, really. But this kind of stupidity? What in the hells gave him the impression he can use that kind of wording with the Black Queen?

The sheer idiocy of it all.

Cicero

Like Cat said, it was probably the least bad of his options.

Even with Cat obviously rejecting his demand, the fact that he made the demand might give him leverage in the League to try and hold enough of it together to keep his city relatively safe.

Of course, his assessment is based on the assumption that he still has his fleet, and his city has not been ravaged been Praes sorcery turning his sailors into undead.

Goobinator101

This is a "Bruh" moment if I ever saw one.

laguz24

The whole league just needs to go home and lick its wounds, the tyrant may have won but the league is kind of dying at the moment. Keeping on trying to reach beyond their grasp will just end in more failure and disappointment especially against the black queen.

greatwyrmgold

At this point, I'm pretty sure we're seeing city-states trying to properly position themselves relative to each other before going home. Hence Trakas trying a diplomatic measure which would give him implied diplomatic authority over the League rather than anything which would improve things for the League as a whole.

laguz24

Wait, is hierarch still in command, oh crap. That means that he still has influence over the league, and will continue to have it. This is not good.

Mammon

So many comments, so little love for the Hakram vs Ivah battle of being Cat's favourite manservant. Shame on you all for putting these clowns above the truest battle that has been raging for near a whole book now.

Liliet

The best part is Cat's sheer obliviousness.

Or pretend obliviousness. I'm not buying she REALLY hasn't noticed.

mavant

surely Ivah is a Mightyservant

Valkyria

This is great. How did you know that I wanted to spend my Monday hanging off a cliff?

Author Unknown

Cat: Sure the wine sucks, but it is better than getting stabbed. Allow Archer to demonstrate.

Mike E.

"I need a better quality of minions," I complained. "Mine are too mouthy. I bet the White Knight never has to deal with anything like this."

Heroes must be all sweetness and light, to the Sword of Judgement. All I got were crows that got mouthy about giving me directions and underlings who couldn't ever let anything go."

Of course, we know from Hanno's interlude that herding a Heroic band is almost worse than a Villan band.

Fayhem

> Of course, we know from Hanno's interlude that herding a Heroic band is almost worse than a Villan band.

I mean, Hanno's compatriots/followers (he seems to be more of a first among equals than an authority per se, if I'm reading that right?) are in fact more respectful to him so Cat's point does technically stand. They just infight among each other much more. Although tbf that seems to be heavily related to them being drawn from all over the continent, with all attendant cultural histories being put in the same room and attached to what are by definition strong personalities.

Liliet

Hanno would probably pay actual money to deal with Cat's problems instead of his own.

People mouthing off to him is immensely superior to trying to murder each other.

Fayhem

> Hanno would probably pay actual money to deal with Cat's problems instead of his own.

Change that to "Cat's party-management problems" and I agree lol.

Liliet

...Yeah. I meant that.

Fayhem

I figured haha. The idea of anyone looking longingly at Cat's set of problems overall was just too funny to me to not comment on tho.

Insanenoodlyguy

Also, he could get away with sleeping with his team partner instead of "but we never can" angst

Liliet

Where'd you get that off him? 0.o

greatwyrmgold

Between all the interludes we've seen about bands of heroes, villains, and mixed Named, it's probably fair to say that the quality of such a band depends less on its team jersey and more on whether they have literally anything else binding them. The Calamities (and, to a lesser extent, the Woe) had/have personal ties binding them together, so they worked well together. The hero army up north is bound together mostly by a shared fear of the Dead King.

Liliet

The Free Cities gang was adorable but also characterized by one member LIVING for pissing another off.

ninegardens

I can't help but think that Tyrant's last gift to Cat will be betrayal.

Possibly the kind of betrayal that ends up helping, but SOMEONES getting betrayed by the end of the day.

ninegardens

Wait, I have just the thing for this:

<http://octopuns.blogspot.com/2011/08/76-plan.html>

Ultimate_procrastinator

The name "Kairos" being the Helikean equivalent of "Gary" is now my newest headcanon. You have my eternal gratitude

greatwyrmgold

But what's the Helikean equivalent of "Indiana"? Not Louisiana, Paris, France, New York, or Rome...

greatwyrmgold

I give roughly 5-10% odds that it's someone who forgot they had briefly trusted the Tyrant.

greatwyrmgold

Is anyone else mildly concerned every time the story reminds us that the one nation not ruled by a monarch is a hive of incompetence and villainy specifically because it doesn't have any rulers given high-absolute power? Or confused about why the only democratic nation is so terrible, with its democracy consistently framed as the reason for its terribleness, when the story's protagonist is so firmly anti-aristocratic? Or annoyed that Bellerophon is called a Republic when it's more of a direct democracy than any real-world democracy I've ever heard of, from ancient Athens to the Hodenosaunee to modern Scandinavia?

greatwyrmgold

Hm. This comment's going to shake the wasp nest, isn't it?

konstantinvoncarstein

No

JJR

Not really. As it is the only democratic nation that the characters know about, it makes sense that many characters end up democracy itself for everything they consider wrong in Bellerophon. This might even be the purpose of the city, in terms of the wager between the gods above and bellow. That is, it might be that Calernia is 'supposed' to be the sort of high fantasy monarchs, knight, castles, and wizards stuff that we see, and that it's supposed to stay that way while the wager is playing out. But humans have that pesky free will and keep trying new things that don't fit the paradigm. So you put Gnomes in the world and they stop anyone from getting too much technology, and you put a Bellerphone down and make sure it develops into the type of place people look at and think, "On second thought, let's not go with democracy; tis a silly thing."

And of course, regardless of anything else. Cat did introduce a form of democracy into the Sigil holder selection process for the Drow. So, clearly she realizes democracy isn't all bad.

JJR

*end up blaming democracy itself.

I don't know how I accidentally a whole word, but I did.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Happens me all time.

(It's on purpose here though.)

mavant

if you mean, "am i worried this is stealthy nrx agitprop", then no

Goobinator101

I saw Bellerophon's label of Republic in the same way as I see it in other countries like North Korea and China, just because it is called the Democratic People's Republic of Korea or the People's Republic of China, doesn't make it so. Same case here.

Liliet

Actually WoG is that their democracy is Exactly What It Says On The Tin and there is no secret totalitarian ruling class.

It's just, y'know, a bad idea to have direct democracy over everything with the logic of 'if leader makes mistakes execute leader' and 'competence is treason, never teach people things'.

roobee

I think Bellerophon's general implementation of direct democracy is pretty good. I just disagree with the specifics of the morals of the population

greatwyrmgold

Except that all of those are overt dictatorships, whereas Bellerophon is less of an oppressive dictatorship and more... whatever the political equivalent of a halfway-controlled train crash is.

Shveiran

It's really not strange, IMO.

Calernia has a medievalish culture and education system. Democracy doesn't really work without good ways to establish communication and education on a large scale.

The Roman Republic was still very strict with the number of folks that could elect senators or could become one, and their infrastructures, education and mail system was way ahead of what Calernia has when you don't consider the exceptions like scrying, which are not something you can give people access to.

It's not really controversial to say that fire doesn't burn without fuel, no? It just read like that to me.

Liliet

Agreed.

And scrying is... a new technology, so to speak. Mass scrying like what Callow and Praes have is something Akua just reminded Catherine is NEW AS FUCK – Wekesa literally invented it. Procer is starting to replicate it but so far it's only a military technology.

Give it a generation or three, and many things might change. Drow, notably, are having an odd sort of anarcho-democracy established right now (no central authority except for the goddess, local elections, like three global laws mostly relating to bureaucratic procedures for the former).

greatwyrmgold

Two points.

First, Calernia is superficially similar to real-world feudal settings, but there are plenty of differences, originating both from the supernatural elements of the setting and the fact that this work is being written by a modern author with modern sensibilities. This isn't A Song of Ice and Fire; the tough edges of medieval life aren't relevant to the story's themes, so they get sanded down.

Second, this isn't a historical piece being written by a Calernian author; it's a piece of fiction being written by an Earthling. The author could have framed Bellerophon in literally any other way; it could be functional but alien to other Calernians, it could be recognized as a mess distant from its principles by the characters voicing opinions on it, or it could just be another Free City without anyone thinking that its unique method of governance was any weirder or worse than any other Free City's. Or it could not exist. Or everywhere could have some degree of democracy. The choice to include both a vocally anti-aristocratic main character and display democratic government solely through a dysfunctional parody of democracy was not the only option available to the author. They could have picked another option...but they didn't.

laguz24

Honestly, I am just waiting for this book to end. There are no more serious plot threads in the vicinity and this seems to be a good time to move onto the next one.

alele

We had a whole chapter about Malicia Order 66'ing the Legions and how graduates of the College get their own sleeper order. Catherine didn't react to her Archer and Akua's DANGER!! reactions, maybe she is compromised in some way to not notice some things she usually would.

Liliet

Catherine isn't Named and doesn't have Named reflexes anymore.

aran

One of Cat's aspects is Leer

aran

I'll admit that the presence of a guy with the title Basileus and a general named Basilia confused me much more than it should have

Chapter 88: Testament

"Reputation is as rope: it can be either a lifeline or a noose."
– Eudokia the Oft-Abducted, Basilea of Nicae

Asking Archer why the Hells she'd just killed that soldier that would have implied in front of all those people I had at best partial control over her actions. Which, while true, wasn't something I wanted to remind the League of right now. So instead of looking surprised or angry I allowed my face to slip into a cool mask, flicking a seemingly disinterested glance at the dying man. Indrani, eyes cold, left the blade in his neck and plucked at the hand still holding the parchments: a long, thin needle was brought into the moonlight by careful fingers.

"See," Exarch Prodocius frothed, "her thugs murder our attendants without-"

The Nicaean soldier that'd been dragging him back slugged him in the belly. He wheezed out in pain, looking like he was about to vomit.

"Poisoned," Archer idly said, sniffing at the needle's tip.

She casually ripped her longknife clean of the soldier's neck, snuffing out his life with the casual flick of the wrist.

"Merciful Gods," Basileus Leo Trakas croaked. "Queen Catherine, I swear on the Heavens that I had nothing to do with this. I would never-"

I looked at the young man in fair pristine armour, his hair perfectly coiffed and his eyebrows impeccably plucked. What I saw beneath the façade was fear. The ugly kind that clawed desperately at your insides trying to get out. It'd been there before we ever began speaking, I thought, perhaps even before he'd set out with this procession. But where it had been mastered before, now it had slipped the leash. No, that one did not have the stomach to try to kill me.

"A personal guard of the Basileus of Nicae just attempted to murder the Queen of Callow," Akua calmly replied. "Your guilt can be debated, Leo Trakas, but your responsibility is beyond doubt."

Would the needle have pricked me, if Archer hadn't intervened? Possibly. I wasn't sure it would have killed me, though. I was hardly immune to poison, but Akua ought to have been able to keep me alive long enough for Sve Noc to come to my side and purge the blight. Was this Malicia's doing? It was a sloppy attempt by Wasteland standards, though I'd been cavalier enough it'd nearly succeeded anyway. If there was someone who'd notice I had a habit of going ahead to negotiate with others with only slight escort, though it would be the Empress. If it'd been Masego and Vivienne with me instead, would the needle have broken my skin?

It sent a shiver up my spine I could not be certain as to the answer.

"No doubt this was the work of one of your many enemies," Exarch Honorion dismissed, cutting through my musings. "Pay reparations, Trakas, and let us return to the matter at hand."

The smug look on the man's face had me itching for a blade in my hand. Someone had just tried to kill me and he thought throwing a few coins at me like I was a beggar with a bowl would end the matter? My fingers clenched. If he could not curb his tongue, perhaps a curse that silenced it would remind him of – no, no I could not. I breathed out, tamping down on the heat in my blood. I was being provoked and it was not an accident. Prodocius might be terrified, but this one was not. Did he know something the other Exarch-claimant did not, as the likely favourite of Malicia among the pair? Black had been scathing in his opinion of the man's intellect, it might just be foolishness and arrogance.

"Secretary Nestor," I said, tone calm. "The weapon that was used, does the Secretariat have record of precedents for its use?"

The white-haired man, who'd been looking at the work of one of his scribes over the young woman's shoulder, turned his gaze to me and dipped it before turning to Indrani.

"Lady Archer," the askretis said, "has the tip of the needle been dipped in a substance that is green and viscous, yet dry as leather?"

"That's about right," Archer frowned, then sniffed again. "Smells like rotten meat, too, but with something flowery mixed in."

Her senses had rivalled some of mine even when I'd been Sovereign of Moonless Nights, nowadays even with Night lending me the occasional edge it wasn't even a contest.

"Wyvern venom made into a paste with periwinkle blossoms," Nestor Ikaroi said. "Known as the 'Taste of Redress', brought to our records by the Magisterium's profligate use of it during the latter years of the Stygian Spring."

"A wild assertion, this, and without proof," Magister Zoe said. "It is known, however that, a substance like the one you describe can be readily obtained through Mercantis. It would have no current ties to Stygia even should it truly have roots there."

"The Secretariat's records are without fault," Secretary Nestor coldly retorted. "And the use of the Taste and needle is the signature of the Manifold Laments. Killers for hire alleged to be based in the League."

"My own grandfather was slain by the Laments, Queen Catherine," Basileus Leo told me. "I would never bargain with them."

"You spineless cowards," Exarch Prodocius snarled. "How can you even know this wasn't her doing from the start? How eager you all are to lick Callowan boots."

"Catherine," Akua murmured, low enough only Archer and I might hear. "This is a noose. I know not how or why, but this is a noose. A situation like this does not fall into place by happenstance."

Yeah, I was starting to agree. Something was wrong here. Leo Trakas still didn't know about his fleets being broken and stolen, yet he was strangely desperate to get Penthes on his side. I understood he needed allies, but why would he need them badly enough to risk provoking me? He could hardly afford any more enemies, much less one that was a member of the Grand Alliance. And the two Exarch-claimants had to know they were playing with fire by coming after me this hard. Especially in the wake of an attempt on my life, when it'd be damnably easy to accuse them of having a hand in it. I was missing something.

"Mind your tongue, Prodocius," Magister Zoe Ixioni warned. "It is the mark of a weak stomach, to grow drunk from the scant power you wield."

The Helikean generals, still mounted, watched all this unfold in stony silence. Unconcerned or indifferent, not that it made much of a difference. I could see, stepping out of myself for a moment, how this was going to unfold. The young Basileus had too many enemies, and just given me slight, so though it was plain to all that Penthes was a stone around his neck he'd have no choice but to try to salvage the Exarchs. If he lost a metaphorical finger bringing them out of this untouched, they'd owe him badly enough they should be halfway-reliable allies. Especially if they were without other allies of their own and antagonizing most everyone else in the League. Bellerophon was a beast most prone to devour itself, and likely to fall into that old habit in the wake of this mess. Atalante had quite literally walked away from this coalition and Delos was positioning itself as aloof. Helike was, well, it was hard to tell what Helike was at the moment.

Exarch Honorion had earlier accused General Basilia of being an usurper of some sort, but then he was hardly the most trustworthy of sources. On the other hand, if Kairos Theodosian had truly massacred most his kin and there was no true claimant left to the throne of Helike it would not be surprising that whoever consolidated control over the army became the ruling authority of the city-state. Theodosius had risen to kingship in such a manner himself, and if I recalled correctly General Basilia was highborn. Either way, for now it looked like she was the one speaking for Helike and she seemed utterly disinclined to step in and stabilize the situation. If Basileus Leo was trying to emerge as the saviour and leading light of the League in the face of chaos, then Helike would be at best uninvolved and at worst likely to spike any of his efforts simply to ensure Nicae didn't emerge as the preeminent power among the League. Stygia, I thought. I'd not accounted for Stygia.

Magister Zoe was here for the Magisterium. Given that yesterday she'd made assurances to Hakram that even if Stygia made treaties of assistance with the Tower it had no intention of ever lending military support, I'd bet they were planning to use Malicia's 'protection' as a deterrent against the rest of the League while offering only token compensation for it. For that protection to be worth anything, though, they'll have to make it public, I thought, then hesitated. Had they already? Bellerophon and Atalante holing up, Helike looming and Nicae's old Stygian foes promised assistance by the Tower. Leo Trakas was seeing the League fall apart around him after his fleets had ravaged Ashur, and realizing that in the wake of the glories promised by the Tyrant he'd been left out in the cold. Penthes alone was offering a hand, and though there were fools they were fools with coin, a largely intact army. The kind of ally that would give an adventurous Stygia or Helike pause. I stepped out of myself and looked at the world the way Leo Trakas would.

Retribution was coming, that could not be denied. Ashur would neither forget nor forgive, had deep ties to the Grand Alliance even after withdrawing from it, and the ancient shield that was the League of the Free Cities was falling apart. The League's treaties to resist outsiders together must be shored up and the foundations of the arrangement made firm again after the debacles abroad – all under the leadership of Nicae, preferably, since no one else seemed willing to take up the mantle. If this could not be done, though? Then Basileus Leo was in desperate need of allies that would keep the wolves away from his door while he figured out a way to avoid losing his throne to a Strategos and keep retaliation from laying waste to Nicae when the balance swung back the other way. Either way, to him, Penthes was the key. And Penthes was owned by Malicia, who had carefully been setting her schemes in place even as I fought my way through Iserre. Now she was bringing them to bear one by one. So how do you want to use them to hurt me, Malicia?

"Though Exarch Honorion misspoke, he is yet a leader of his people," Leo Trakas intervened. "Threats help none of us, Magister Ixioni."

"The Magisterium seeks no help from Nicae," Magister Zoe disdainfully said.

"Already found yourself a backer, have you?" Archer said.

Indrani was, with her usual nonchalance, putting her foot in a dispute that might have been best left to the League itself. Without knowing what Malicia had planned, any step taken here might be a blunder.

"What right does a vagrant from Refuge have to ask questions of us?" Exarch Prodocius scornfully laughed. "Still your wagging tongue, girl."

Merciless Gods, I thought, half-awed. She was going to kill him.

"Archer," I got out.

Halfway through drawing her blade, Indrani reluctantly stilled.

"Your choice of allies speaks poorly of you, Basileus," Akua said.

A swing in the dark from her, as it seemed she'd come to the same conclusions as me through reasonings of her own. Both of us were watching the younger man, and both of us saw the same thing: the twitch of a repressed grimace, followed by a resounding absence of denial. So he's pursuing these idiot accusations because Penthes – meaning Malicia – put him up to it, I thought. They're backing him so long as he pushes me tonight, most likely.

"Another chattering peon for the Black Queen," Exarch Prodocius snorted. "Are you to threaten violence as well, when reminded of your place?"

Here I had no worries. Archer, for all her keen perceptiveness, was not meant for affairs like this. I'd not hesitate before sending her along with heroes for something, or soldiers, but restraint in the face of provocation was simply not the way she'd been raised. If someone slighted the Lady of the Lake, she killed them. If someone took offence to that, she killed them too. Indrani might not have the age or reputation to be able to get away with that the way the Ranger did, but she'd been raised to think that way regardless. Akua, though? Prodocius could spend all day tossing the worst insults he could think of at her and she'd hardly blink. Akua Sahelian had been playing more dangerous games with more dangerous men since before she'd had her first moon's blood. Still, the way Prodocius and Honorion were constantly antagonizing my two obviously dangerous companions was genuinely surprising me. Prodocius in particular, as the terrified white of his eyes still showed.

"Gods Below," I slowly said. "What can the Empress possibly have on you that'd put you this deep in her grasp?"

Akua, at my side, went still.

"And now you accuse us of being in the service of your foes," Exarch Honorion mocked. "As if you were not merely seeking an excuse to-"

"Still Water," Akua spoke in Kharsum. "The Tyrant helped Malicia, you said, but Helike does not border the Empire. Where did the alchemical compounds come through? It would not have been small quantities, Catherine. The Empress would have needed assistance to keep it quiet."

And it fell into place. Penthes, who had grown rich from trade with the Empire. Penthes who controlled one of the branches of the Wasaliti river. Penthes, whose last Exarch-claimants were two venal and corrupt men who'd been chosen to survive from all the many there once were by two people: the Tyrant and the Empress. They'd been accomplices to Still Water being used on the Nicean fleets, I realized. And now, too late, they were realizing that with Kairos dead and Malicia untouchable in the Tower they might end up taking the blame for that. For murdering thousands of Nicaeans, yes, and breaking that city's naval power. Worse yet, for betraying a member of the League to a foreign power while the Free Cities were at war and under the rule of a Hierarch. If it came out, they'd have no allies. Even if Penthes itself did not turn on them most the League would end up coming after them.

If Malicia said nothing, she owned them. If Malicia said something she still owned them, because who else could possibly protect them? Mind control was not needed when you had that kind of leverage on people. It would be redundant.

"Why is she having them come after me so hard, though?" I replied in the same. "It makes no sense, Akua. She gains nothing out of those two getting on my bad side, by virtue of being her creatures they were already there. I might as well not-"

I swallowed my tongue. I might as well not be there. Because it wasn't about me, not really. None of this had been from the start. I'd been thinking of these people as the tool Malicia was using against me, when in fact I was the tool Malicia was using against them. A Nicaean soldier had just tried to kill me not because the Empress had believed it would work – although I doubted she would have complained if it had – but because it burned a bridge between Callow and Nicae. And the Penthesians were going after me because the Basileus needed them, and the more he defended them the more at odds he and I became. Fuck me, she was trying to flip the League wasn't she? Leo Trakas would go home and find his fleets were gone and his reign going to the dogs, and so to avoid losing his throne and possibly his head he'd need to rely on his friends. His Penthesian friends, who unlike Stygia had not openly declared for Praes. The Tower had seeded the sickness, then offered the remedy.

Penthes, Stygia, Nicae. Bellerophon and Atalante were removing themselves from the flow, Delos wouldn't got at it alone and how difficult could it possibly be for Malicia to spark a civil war in Helike if the Tyrant had left no clear successor? She'd run the southeast of Calernia, more or less, and with the fleet that'd been broken by Still Water she'd have leverage over Ashur as well. And all she needed to get this all started was for a Catherine Foundling, a woman with a known temper, to get angry after someone tried to murder her in the middle of diplomatic talks. Gods, but I hated dealing with Malicia. Even now I couldn't even fucking be sure there wasn't another layer to this plan that I'd missed. And I still wasn't sure how to step back from the ledge even now that I might have caught the scheme. Walking away was giving her the win, but my word alone wouldn't convince the Basileus that his Exarch allies were playing him.

It was exactly the kind of thing I would say if I was trying to collapse the League so it couldn't be a sword at my back anymore.

"If I may be so bold, Your Majesty," Secretary Nestor said, "might I ask for a summary of the words that were shared with your advisor? None of the attending scribes speak the language."

I flicked a glance at the old scrivener with the tattooed cheeks. It was a genuine request, not a hint of any sort, but it still had me thinking. Could it be that simple? I'd spent all this time trying match Malicia at her chosen field and gotten dirt in my face for it again and again. But that was fighting this war the way she wanted it to be fought. Hanno had warned me, hadn't he, that I was still thinking like I was a villain needing to threaten and fight everyone into doing what needed to be done. The latter part of that, where he'd said the might of Judgement would carry the day, had been wrong. But he was right that in some ways I still thought, first and foremost, like a warlord under siege from all directions. But I wasn't that anymore, was I?

"It is called Still Water," I said. "It is a sort of alchemical poison developed by the Wekesa the Warlock that lingers in the body of those who imbibe it and, afterwards, requires only a ritual trigger to kill and turn into undead all those poisoned. Those undead in fact resist healing by Light, though they remain mindlessly violent without guiding by necromancers."

"The First Prince of Procer sent word of such a weapon, before the Tenth Crusade was declared," Nestor Ikaroi acknowledged. "Do you then confirm its existence?"

"I do," I flatly said. "It was used on the city of Liesse by the Diabolist. And once more since by Dread Empress Malicia on the war fleets of Nicae."

In the wake of that there was only silence, and the scratching of Secretariat quills. My gaze found the two silent generals of Helike, who were both unsurprised and watching me closely. Had the known? I couldn't be sure, but General Basilia was said to have been Kairos' favourite. And if nothing else, his will might have contained such secrets. So now I had a choice to make. Either I dragged Helike into this by revealing the Tyrant had a in this, or I kept my silence on that. The Exarchs might try to drag Helike into this anyway, but who'd believed them at that point? Might be enough to stir Helike to war if they tried, too, which was not ideal but still better than Malicia sinking her claws deep into the southeast. It would not be just, to spare them the consequences of helping such a great and traitorous massacre. But if kept the Dead King from devouring Calernia, I could live with having abetted that injustice.

"That is the leash the Tower has on these two," I said. "They helped smuggle the alchemical brews into the League's territory. Advisor Kivule was reminding me, Secretary Nestor, that the Empress would have needed local collaborators, individuals of authority hiding her tracks to achieve such a thing. It allowed for an explanation for the continued hostility of these 'Exarchs' to Callow, for it is no secret that their mistress is my enemy."

"Advisor Kivule, is it? She would know of Still Water, no doubt," Exarch Honorion sneered. "I had not intended to speak to this, but this filthy mudfoot intriguer leaves me no choice. Prodocius and I entertained envoys from the Tower, is true. I'll not deny it. For Dread Empress Malicia meant to warn us of a plot to destroy the League and incite war with Praes: this advisor that masquerade before us is no fae nor drow, she is the Diabolist herself. Akua Sahelian, the Doom of Liesse."

Malicia had caught on? No, of course she'd caught on. Black had too, it would have been fairly obvious for anyone in the know as those two were. And from there it was information that could be passed to her agents, like those two. But why did she think it would – oh, fuck.

"It is not the Empire that struck at the fleets of Nicae, Basileus Leo," Exarch Honorion said. "It was the Black Queen using the foul alchemies of the foe she enslaved. What a neat scheme she planned, is it not? The League sundered and at war with the Empire, her enemies clawing at each other even as she bent Ashur to her will."

Malicia, I seethed. Hellgods, I had not wanted to kill someone that much in a very long time. Could I deny Akua? No, that'd be a mistake. Too many people knew, or at least suspected, and when it came out she truly was Akua Sahelian it'd lead people to believe I was lying about not being behind Still Water's second deployment as well.

"Are you seriously accusing Catherine Foundling of using something like Still Water?" Archer said, sounding somewhere between amused and offended. "She fought a war over the last use."

Mistake, I grimly thought.

"You would have us believe it was the Dread Empress who has possessed such means for decades and never once used them?" Exarch Prodocius said. "We've all read the reports from the Battle of the Camps. Thousands dead from reckless sorceries! All of Iserre was almost destroyed because of a weapon that once lay in Callow, and we are to believe the Black Queen would balk as such a ploy?"

Leo Trakas was the key to this, I decided. Delos was unlikely to lift a finger either way, and Stygia would back the winning horse. And the Basileus did not look like he knew who or what to believe, right now.

"You then make the accusation that Callow was able to brew such alchemies, then seed them unseen in the fleets of Nicae?" Akua said. "How mighty you believe us to be, Exarch."

She knew he'd have an answer to that, he wouldn't have risked this otherwise – and his words were likely Malicia's, anyway, who would not make this elementary a mistake. Akua was baiting out the last part of their tale, so that we might see if there were holes to poke in it.

"An animal like you has no place in this conversation," Prodocius harshly replied.

The Basileus of Nicae raised a hand to end this before it could escalate.

"As part of the evidence for the accusations laid against the Black Queen was the secret meeting she had with King Kairos in the city of Rochelant," Basileus Leo said, tone cool.

He was start to lean towards believing Penthes, I realized. Because he wanted to, because it'd be easier, because Malicia was brilliant woman and it was a skillful lie.

"And to hide evidence of your malice, you then sold the Tyrant of Helike to his enemies among the Grand Alliance," Exarch Honorion said. "I will not pretend the man was anything but a bad seed, but your treacheries are worthy of contempt."

Gods, but she was good. It did not make me hate her any less, but she was good at this. Even through as feeble a tool as those Exarchs, Malicia was still hitting all the right notes for the Basileus. I could see it in his eyes. I breathed out. I was not only a warlord, now. I had allies.

"Are you willing to repeat your accusations before a truth-teller?" I flatly said. "The most skillful of our age is in Salia. I am more than willing to do the same."

Akua almost began to move before she ceased, and in the Night I read her uneasiness. I had made a mistake of my own, it seemed.

"A transparent attempt," Exarch Prodocius sneered. "You've sunk your hooks in the Grand Alliance, corrupted even rulers as respected as the First Prince. The Grey Pilgrim will say whatever you want him to say, lest you turn on Procer."

I almost laughed at the notion that I could force Tariq to do anything, much less bend the rest of the Grand Alliance to my will, until I caught the look on their faces. Not Akua or Indrani, but the delegates of the League. Over half a hundred people were here, some of the most influential people in the League, and after the lunacy Prodocius had just spoken not a single one of their faces expressed disbelief. Fear and hesitation, anger and doubt, but none of them believed it to be absurd. Because they weren't looking uphill and seeing me, I realized as my stomach sunk. They were looking at the victor of the Camps and the Graveyard, who'd strung along heroes and villains and dealt death to thousands. My reputation, these days, was enough to cow thousands of charging horsemen. I knew this, I'd relied on it.

Malicia was relying on it too.

My grip tightened around the yew staff. I'd fought wars, struck deals with the Everdark and the Kingdom Under, compromised and warned and did everything I could to keep this continent from falling apart. And still the Empress, who hadn't left the Tower in a year, was strangling me with my own fucking achievements. Malicia, though, would be Malicia – a praise and insult both. What had my blood boiling was how eager these people were to be manipulated. To believe the worse of me and in the same breath decide that the Dread Empress of Praes was looking out for them. And they had their reasons, and it was one of the finest liars alive who was making a game of them, but still it... stung. That I always had to be patient and careful and let things go, while the rest of them could just fucking blunder along and let the rest of us pick up the pieces.

I could kill them, I knew.

The Night was but a thought away. They had mages, but I had Archer and Akua Sahelian at my side. It wouldn't even be difficult or need to be a slaughter. Honorion and Prodocius were owned by the Tower, but Penthes itself wasn't – the Empress would have influence, but hardly rule. I could snuff them out like candles and there went this ploy. Gods, there was so much I could do if I simply took off the gloves. All these soldiers heading south, all this insistence on backstabbing and bickering when the Dead King was seeking to kill us all, it could end. It'd be as simple as telling the people here, over the smoking corpses of Malicia's tools, that they could march north to fight Keter either living or as corpses in my service. If their armies objected? They had no Named left to match me. I'd open portal over a battalion aligned with a large lake or a sea, then repeat the process every half-hour until I got an unconditional surrender. The Grand Alliance would whine, but the whining would end when I ensured our back was secure and brought a fresh army to the table.

Gods, it would be so satisfying. To order something instead of barter and beg, to just order something and see it get done. And even if Malicia had laid some kind of clever trap behind it all, well, cleverness only got you so far in the face of overwhelming strength. What exactly could she do, if it was Praes and Keter against the rest of Calernia? And all I needed to do was just... reach out. Sve Noc would approve, if anything. And the thing was, hadn't I done it all the right way? I'd let the heroes take their swings, taken the whipping without complaint. I'd helped the same Procerans who had meant to carve up my home for a meal, sacrificed and bargained to keep the Dead King from killing hundreds of thousands. I'd done it all right, and at the end of the day Malicia could still just upend it all with a snap of her fingers. And if it was this... weak, this fragile to do things the right way, then what was the point? If it didn't work better than being a bloody-handed tyrant, if it was objectively worse, then why was I putting myself through all this? I was not going to let Calernia die because I needed to clutch to the delusion that I was a decent woman. I would not.

I took a step forward, Night coiling, and my leg throbbed with pain. Do not forget, it whispered. That this was never a game. That you make mistakes. And most of all, and my fingers clenched white to hear it, the pain whispered one last thing: do not forget, that there must be more than ruin. I paled, leaning against my staff. Gods, the pain was agonizing.

"Cat," Archer whispered, looking at me with worry.

I gestured harshly. Do not forget, my leg throbbed.

"You'd really do it, wouldn't you?" I said.

The two men that would be Exarch of Penthes milled about uncertainly.

"Let thousands of your own people die," I said. "Birth civil war in the League. Gods, you'd gamble with the fate of Calernia itself – all because you were foolish and greedy and you're afraid to die."

I looked at the two of them and saw something that it was not in my power to mend. In anyone's power to mend.

"Go," I said. "Leave. I have nothing left to say to you."

It emboldened them, I saw. The resignation in my voice. They'd poured poison into the ear of anyone who would listen and not been chastised for it.

"How petulant you are when unmasked," Exarch Honorion mocked.

"We'll survive without you," I said, gaze sweeping across the entire lot of them. "Despite you, if we must. So let your records state this, Nestor Ikaroi: when Death came for Calernia, men and women rose to meet it. From the Blessed Isle to Segovia, from Levante to Rhenia, they came when the call sounded."

I spat into the snow.

"Death came for Calernia, and when steel was bared to turn it back the League of Free Cities was nowhere in sight," I said.

Quills moved against parchment, the scribes of the Secretariat recording the words spoken. Cloak of Woe tight on my shoulder, I let out a misty breath and looked at the sky. I was done here, wasn't I? If diplomacy could mend any of this, let Cordelia Hasenbach take care of it.

"And?" General Basilia said.

The other Helikean, pale-eyed and straight-backed, let out a hissing breath.

"Yes," General Pallas. "Yes. The blood quickened."

"Then we part ways here," General Basilia said, saddened.

I would have left, had Archer not put a hand on my shoulder. Indrani was smiling.

"Will you not flee back to your barracks, Helikeans?" Exarch Prodocius called out. "Your little intrigues are of no import to us, and the cripple no longer-"

General Basilia unsheathed her sword, which had the man flinching.

"I speak now the will and testament of King Kairos Theodosian, Lord Tyrant of Helike, the Unbroken," General Basilia said, voice echoing across the plains.

Prodocius flicked a glance at the sword and swallowed whatever he'd been about to say.

"With me dies the line of Theodosius, at last conquered by death. I name no successor and offer no legacy, save for the following words," General Basilia said, and her eyes were wetly shining, "Ye of Helike, do as you will."

"Oh, would you shut up with the-" Exarch Honorion began.

He did not finish, for General Basilia rammed her sword through his throat. Half the soldiers on the hill had swords in hand before a heartbeat has passed, but the dark-eyed woman only laughed. She ripped the sword out and flicked blood onto the snow. Penthesian soldiers crowded around the other Exarch protectively, shields raised.

"Murderer," Exarch Prodocius screamed, voice gone shrill with fear. "How dare you, you-"

"Tyrant?" General Basilia said. "I suppose we shall see. You may consider this a declaration of war, Prodocius. Penthes can hang you as a traitor to the League and servant of the Empress, or it can burn. It makes no difference to me."

"Are you mad?" Basileus Leo yelled. "Do you not understand the consequences of-"

"Tell me, you pathetic worm," Basilia nonchalantly said. "What will you do, if I ignore your petty threats? What have you ever done that I should fear you?"

"I'll not allow you to run rampant, Helikean," the young man snarled.

"Then beat me, Nicaean," General Basilia grinned.

And she had, I thought, so very little in common with Kairos in body. She was well-formed and made like a soldier, not striking save perhaps those sharp cheekbones but not in the least ungainly to look at. Yet when she grinned that grin, all pearly white teeth and daring, for a moment I would have thought... She reined in her mount, offered us a salute of her sword, and rode back to her soldiers. The young Basileus let out a shout of anger but did not pursue. He barked out orders in tradertongue and his soldiers clustered with the Penthesians once more, beginning a quick march back to the rest of his force. He offered no farewells, and I had said all I intended to say. Secretary Nestor Ikaroi, however, remained. Along with his scribes. They stood in silence, watching. Waiting. General Pallas dismounted. Under the pale moonlight she came to stand before me, tanned and grey-eyed and inscrutable.

"My name," she said, "is Pallas Messene. I am a general of Helike, raised to the rank by the Tyrant himself, for a score I have been a soldier and leader of soldiers."

"You know," I replied, "how I am."

"I have seen it," General Pallas agreed. "I tonight I saw it again. Once you called me and those under my command a worm in the flesh, Black Queen. You deemed us servants of Keter, and stripped us of all the strappings of kataphraktoi."

"And of a bone as well," I calmly said, "for the lives in my service you took."

"Bones mend," General Pallas said. "Armaments, horses, they can be had again. Pride is not to easily bartered back."

"That is not in my power to return," I said.

"It is," the grey-eyed woman disagreed. "In keeping to my oath, I spilled blood to the benefit of the King of Death. I weep not for this, for I swore to a Theodosian and there can be no higher calling. And yet I would even the balance, with oath given anew."

She knelt, dark-haired and stone-faced, in the snow.

"Every wound I dealt, I deal anew," Pallas Messene spoke. "Every battle I fought, I fight anew. Let spears shatter and swords break, for my oath will not. Let there be no rest nor relief until the war is won, and should death take me let me rise in indignation, for I am a daughter of Helike and we were borne unconquered. I swear to this, Black Queen of Callow: until the King of Death knows oblivion or I do, my sword is pledged to your war."

Behind her, three hundred cataphracts dismounted under moonlight.

"How many?" I asked.

"Half," she said.

"Half the kataphraktoi?" I said, surprised.

That was near two thousand soldiers.

"We do as we will, now," General Pallas smiled, looking up at the night sky. "He gifted us this."

After a long moment, she met my gaze.

"Half the army of Helike, Black Queen," she said. "If Death comes, let it learn the same lesson as every other army under the sun: there is Helike, and there is the rest."

j

If Death comes, let it learn the same lesson as every other army under the sun: there is a vote for A Practical Guide to Evil, and there is the rest.

Argentorum

I name no successor and offer no legacy, save for the following words," General Basilia said, and her eyes were wetly shining, "Ye of Helike, Vote!"

Daniel Tabakman

We do as we will now, we will vote!

He has gifted us this

Liliet

Can you not?

Shveiran

Can you not, please?

I understand you and others dislike these jokes, but could you please just scroll down rather than complain?
I don't understand what you wish to achieve.

Liliet

I wish to discourage and get them to stop.

This isn't just several people trying to do the vote reminder. This is REPLIES, this is people deliberately trying to one-up each other with the vote reminder.

I'm trying to get them to stop doing that, specifically.

Jarthon

I personally enjoy this thread quite a bit, and while I can understand your position, I also don't think it's likely to change because of said opinion. I'm sorry, and I say this with no mean intent—and you are, of course, ultimately free to continue as you like—but you may end up being less irritated with the comments in general if you can find a way to just skip past the comment thread and go to the story discussion that you enjoy and contribute so much too. Again, I apologize for any rudeness.

Liliet

Skip past what?

I'm confused as to the exact mechanics of what you're proposing. Just abandon reading wordpress comments altogether?

Yatr

They are suggesting either making peace with the fact that everybody has fun in different ways, and that for some people that's comedic one upping, while for others it's serious story debate.

I've worked in PR for years and my unsolicited advice would be to either become a moderator and have actual teeth other than the passive aggression of "can you not?" Or (and I've always found this option to work best for myself) to simply make peace with them having a different sense of fun from oneself.

Hope this helped & didn't come off condescending

Tek

Or you can find out where tjhey live and make them stop. Viva la Evil!

Liliet

Well I cannot just go and BECOME a mod. It's not a spell i have access to casting :3

And I'd been making peace with it for a while before starting this campaign of asking ppl to stop. I definitely found the latter to be more soul healing than the former.

clbclbclblblclblv

These sound like the words of a man who has not yet voted.

crowlute

Scrolling past this on mobile is an absolute hassle. The spacing makes it not clear when a new thread that isn't

"we all meme on VOTE lol!!!" actually starts, and when one can read actual discussion of the chapter's events.

Liliet

this one isn't. why. why. why. so many funny jokes and you do the horrible one.

Liliet

Okay this one is good ♥

Barthumphries

... the rest. Including the typo thread.

It is known, however that, a substance like the one you describe can be readily obtained through Mercantis.
The comma after that needs to be after however instead.

There are a few more typos that I saw. Can you find them?

Javvies

Malicia is twisty as hell.

Not exactly what I expected from Kairos's last wishes, but I suppose we should have expected something like this.

The League is broken. Effectively.

Oshi

ooo politics! I need to unwrap the smaller currents.

WuseMajor

The Tyrant is one of the few people who could betray someone after he was dead. He got a nice shot in at Malicia here via his Will. Nice show.

erebus42

Dread Emperor Traitorous would be proud

RoflCat

And an extra 'gift' to Cath, the closest thing to a soulmate he ever has.

I'm almost certain Kairos saw this result coming (half Helike army goes to Cath to war on Keter, the other half destroying the bastards that's been corrupting the League)
With his Wish, he can probably tell that Basilia would choose to avenge him on the League and indirectly Malicia, while Pallas has been....'charmed' by Cath's charisma since that one breaking and would join the war on Keter both for answering the call and repaying for what she's done.

Basilia also likely knew this, that's why she asked that question, even while internally she likely knew Pallas would go as soon as Cath made that declaration.

Mammon

I think it's much more elementary. The Tyrant, being who he is to his core, couldn't let a scheme like Malicia's who he knew was being woven for years amongst his cities without throwing in a wrench for shits and giggles, another for the indignation of scheming against his city even after his death, and a third because betrayal and scheming against scheming is his very nature.

It's not necessarily because Cat, this three-headed wrench which is secretly a screw-driver disguised as a bolt-cutter was meant to screw over Malicia and her schemes no matter who it would concern. And the seeds of her scheme and therefore his betrayal might actually be older than his relationship with Cat by months if not years. He might've done this before Cat came into her Name as a Squire, that upon his deathbed he tweaked things a bit to see this wrench to be wielded by her was just a personal favourite flavour of icing on the cake.

Mammon

Correction: The Still Water against Ashur specifics are only a few months old, but that's still just about as long as that Tyrant has personally known Cat. Their first meeting was somewhere before Iserre. The seeds of civil war at her fingertips post-Tyrant was what Malicia sowed for years, logically speaking considering he as a Named was actually older and active for longer than Cat.

RoflCat

He probably planned the backstabbing for sure, but I think his interactions with Cath have made him do some...final adjustment, for this result.

The initial plan was likely just Helike going to town on those League members collaborating with Malicia, hence Basilia going that way. But him giving them the freedom to choose is most likely for Pallas, so that she can follow her 'wish' that Kairos saw probably ever since Cath crushed the kataphractoï (after all, Pallas will prioritize her loyalty to Kairos over her own desire if she has to choose)

Liliet

Nah, he would have gone for 'do as you will' either way. The key moment here is knowing what Basilia wants and wanting her to do just that. Pallas is an amusing bonus.

Yes, I'm picturing Kairos having a view of this from the afterlife and giggling happily.

Insanenoodlyguy

the way you said it, "charmed." heh

I'm just imagining Akua with a flare of jealousy at this point, glaring all "Bitch, she fucking ripped my heart out, you just got some broken fingers. Fuck you, I was mutilated by her first and better, talking about your blood. Didn't even leave me any blood! Fuck off away from my woman!"

Shequi

Not just Malicia, but the entire League, and especially Bellerophon

"Ye of Helike, do as you will." is a fantastic counterpoint to "We are all of us free or none of us free; Ye of this land, brook no compromise on this"

What Kairos has done is to give Helike a guiding principle that will echo down the years, explicitly opposed to Bellerophon's core ideal.

That's not merely a betrayal; it's setting up for a dozen wars down the long centuries, all of which will be fought in the name of Kairos Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike.

Kairos, you magnificent bastard. The gods below are going to be entertained by this for centuries.

Liliet

I think you're overestimating the impact this will will have.

Ultimate_procrastinator

Possibly, but the last wishes of the last tyrant of the city, faithfully carried out by his most loyal followers after his death, would certainly have quite a large impact, particularly if you can trace it's impact over several centuries. Heck, one of the characters (White Knight I think) noted a few chapters back that Kairos was the closest thing to a High Priest of Below they had in that age; hard to imagine someone like that NOT having a near-unbelievably large influence on those he ruled > particularly if you can trace it's impact over several centuries

Liliet

See, I just think that the only impact it's going to have is on what his immediate followers do. Everyone else is going to act as Lawful/Good as they ever have, Basilia's just going to mix her own actions into it the exact way she wants.

Jane

Even when Malicia loses, she wins; the sign of a well-crafted Xanatos gambit. From the moment Penthes agreed to smuggle the Still Water, there was no real scenario where she doesn't come out ahead; either they do what she wants, or in failing her, the resulting fallout cripples a pack of possible meddlers.

Ox

I shiver thinking about the moment the dam breaks and Cat no longer holds back. When the cards are on the table, and we see her back in the ring. The returning champion, the broken idealist, the last resort.

Razorfloss razor

And when that happens creation will learn exactly why she is the black queen and fear her. When she finally cuts lose creation and anything in her way will burn

konstantinvoncarstein

The DK has no idea of what will fall on him

Decius

The DK would think "I can survive any destination that the portal opening up under me might be, if nothing else because it would be an offscreen presumed death."

Bard would think "I'm going to follow him through that portal and make sure he dies."

Heiropphant would take the opportunity to Witness the Sun up close and firsthand.

Mammon

DK: I can survive whatever situation she throws me in.

Cat: *Throws him into the gnome capital barracks.

DK: Correction, I can survive almost any situation she throws me in. But having seen just half a second of their forbidden tech makes me now tripple tripple-red-letter'd and me and Keter the top priority to be levelled to the ground. Well shit.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cold space might actually be better. The sun might destroy his body and let him get another one. Just being in the middle of space? Okay, you can't die? That's fine. Go be immortal in the void, have fun with that.

Vega

Remember kairos said that the twilight ways "lead to places not of creation"

NerfContessa

Only the twilight ways though, not cats night portals so rituals would be necessary.

Still, dumping the dk and the bard in say, the fallout world, without any name or magic except what keeps the dk undead, would be a nice solution.

Cosmicus

Probably lakes.

Liliet

She is already not holding back.

This isn't her holding back, his is her twisting out of the way of an incoming arrow.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Hot damn, that was spicy. Fantastic chapter, I legitimately got chills when Cat almost cut loose.

Also that bit with General Palas was the coolest falling in loyalty I've seen since Hakram first signed on board.

Argentorum

Here's something spicy for you. Basilia knew Pallas was taking half the army of Helike with her, and she went and started a war with Nicae all the same.

"Do as thou wilt."

Liliet

TBF it's not like Nicae has much of an army anymore...

Basilia is AWESOME.

Mammon

Basilia, even assuming she doesn't fall into a Name which I assume she won't but there are hints of Cat seeing it, doesn't have to war with the rest of the Free Cities. Athalante and Delos likely won't participate in the war lest feeling that they will be threatened if doing nothing, Bellophon will not intervene either way, meaning Helike only needs to fight against Penthes and Nicea. Assuming Nicea to face them rather than stay on the sidelines trying to pull the League together, that is. More likely, it's just them against the Exarchs.

What about Stygia? They seems to rely on Wasteland protection with no more intent to continue warring after 5 books of exhausting their troops in what the first or second book already described to be a waning period for them of the experienced lads growing old and the new recruits not yet being broken in. With too few Magisters, Akua having exhausted half their old garde and Tyrant the other half likely, the new generation needing all the reins they have left to keep from rebelling and the whole situation we've got now, they will not war unless absolutely necessary. As said, they will back the winning horse.

Can Helike win with half their troops facing Penthes? Hey Penthes. Look at me, look at your troops, look back at me, look at the map, back to me, back to you. You're in Procer, we outnumber your your armies in the delegation (courtesy of the late Tyrant) and you cannot return to your region without going through Helike. What will you do, go through the Ranger's woods again? We needed two Named and all our rested armies to pull that stunt the first time. And you're not mad enough to go through Praes AND afford Mercantis's rates to get your armies back to your country. Face it, you need to return through our lands. Hammer and Anvil against your armies, how much have you left back home to defend against a land-based attack? Didn't think so.

Politically speaking when combining hostilities and the geography, Nicea likely sees themselves looking at having to side with Helike again lest they end up with one Praes-compromised ally and an equal to greater foe because of it, Stygia backing Helike or no one at all, and the rest not getting involved at all. By choosing sides and being willing to attack the other League armies on Procerian soil while backing the Grand Alliance with troops against Keter, Helike completely tore apart the suggested political system of convenience that Malicia weaved.

New tally: Penthes supports Praes. Helike sides with Callow's Grand Alliance. Stygia, Athalante and Delos remain neutral or Grand Alliance-inclined backers but not participants. Bellophon doesn't involve themselves at all. Nicea has to side with the Grand Alliance if they want the League balance on their side to be in their favour AND to survive Ashur's retaliation politically. All because Helike did a thing.

Insanenoodlyguy

I feel like Basilla has decent odds. She loved the Tyrant (Platonically I believe, but still love), and she just effectively made a claim on the Name. If she's the ruler of Helike doing what she wants and causing wanton carnage along the way, I feel like the shoe's gonna fit. Plus there's the fact that Kairos would probably support it. After all, she just showed up, stabbed one of her allies and declared war on them, in the name of the League she's about to ensure is destroyed. Betrayal while simultaneously professing to do it in the best interests of the people she's warring on? That's keeping things entertaining!

Liliet

I get the impression Basilia hasn't decided if she wants the Name yet, and it's one of those that you need to actively claim to get them.

Insanenoodlyguy

I took it as more of a "There's things I have to do/ attempt and I will either be dead or be Tyrant at the end. Lets find out how it goes!"

I'd have to assume there's going to be at least one other claimant and there might be some certain expectations associated with it that she has to fulfil, likely in Helike, before she'd be acknowledged as more than one who is trying for the name.

Liliet

Also a fair reading, yeah!

In that context, I want to note, 'the person with the army' generally does it for 'expectations to fulfill' lmao

Liliet

Falling in loyalty is the best phrasing.

Also, it looked like Pallas was already halfway there beforehand, seeing how it only took a few words with Basilia to sort out what the two of them were doing ;u;

Jane

Oh, my. When it had been brought up multiple times that it was odd that the two city-states were allied despite the whole Still Death thing, I had thought to myself that perhaps they had somehow pinned the blame on Cat instead, but I couldn't decide how they could make it plausible. By obscuring the flaws by having Cat accuse Malicia first, however, then exposing Akua, well, that would do it. Now I wish I had made the prediction earlier, so I could take credit for it...

A nice trick with Malicia's plot, though; we're so used to seeing things through the lens of the protagonist that seeing her used as a tool against a power that we don't pay much mind ends up both being perfectly hidden in advance, and perfectly obvious in hindsight. Granted, attempted murder does have a way of making one think that the goal is supposed to be... Well, murder.

That said, if Cat had gone with her instincts and butchered them all, I can only imagine the celebration Malicia would have had... There are so. Many. Ways. for that to have gone wrong... I wonder if she would have gotten a Name for it, though, or if her high priestess status prohibits that. Because that sounds like the kind of stunt that earns one a Name.

Crash

Reckon that'd be the Black Queen claim she refused to make.

As far as being high priestess I don't see how that blocks a name. That is a facet of Catherine Foundling and as such, is part of what would make any name she grasps for herself but there's no reason to hinder that. Given enough time, High Priestess could well become a Name of the Sister's faith.

To be quite honest I'm excited for Cat's new Name because while having her go on unnamed is very interesting, by the very rules of narrative Cat is all a Claimant is supposed to be. She has an objective and the willpower to do it while believing it has to be done and that she is the one to do so, she is very relevant to the workings of history and as a rule will bend Creation to her will if that is what needs to be done. All that is missing, I suppose, is the pivot to consolidate it all and what the heck is it going to be? Something quite great either way.

Thorium

I assume the idea of Cat being unable to get a Name comes from the fact that the crows reject the choirs. They might not take too well to Cat being granted a Name by Above, but they are technically servants of Below, so I doubt they can really do much on that front.

As for the Name of High Priestess, I find that highly unlikely. The position might very well become a Name at some point, but given the drow's thoughts on gender, something like First Under The Night sounds a lot more plausible.

Liliet

> I assume the idea of Cat being unable to get a Name comes from the fact that the crows reject the choirs.

What?

It's... it's not like the crows would have any input on Cat getting a Name, other than as part of the narrative background...

> As for the Name of High Priestess, I find that highly unlikely. The position might very well become a Name at some point, but given the drow's thoughts on gender, something like First Under The Night sounds a lot more plausible.

Well, Sve Noc shared the Name Priestess of Night, so there's that.

First Under The Night cannot be a Name because it does not refer to an archetype.

Mammon

Sve Noc are lesser gods, and gods do seem to have a hand in giving Names. Remember with Captain's origin extra chapter, she went to a withering lesser orc god to get her Name instead of being just a werewolf? By killing him she got her Name, had she subjected herself to him she would've also gained a Name but lesser or different. Not allowing for Names to be granted to them seems like something that even lesser gods like Sve Noc can do similar to preventing mind reading and predicting one's future.

Whether Priestess of Night, First Under the Night and High Priestess are Names rather than titles like Exarch of Nicea is a stretch either way. They're given by the people but hold no Name powers, similar to how Cordelia is First Prince and Warden of the West from the moment she was corronated. Both are Names, but she carried both as title yet holding neither Name.

Black Queen though, that might've been Cat's Name all along since her corronation. Her fitting into Name events like the Band of Five and gaining the Yew Staff or Fairfax Sword are a lot more Story-pulled than the non-Named actions we see around. Too Story-pulled, even when assuming her Duchess of Moonless Nights title was the Name that explained her role and being controlled into a Story that Keter I and the Everdark clearly were. One doesn't happenstance into those situations at the exact right moment or way without a Name pulling providence, with the Book 5 events being a bit vaguer in this but still suggesting Name plot.

Crash

For the thousand time buddies, not every Above name is chained to a Choir and even when they are, as we saw in the interlude of Mr Stalwart Paladin, the Named has to accept their interference. While I would love to watch Endurance try to make a claim on Cat, she is not going to accept that.

We've seem gods be part of the getting a Name with Captain yes, but she didn't get her name because Orc god gave it to her. Sabah got it because she killed the god, as she tought that was her path to getting her new Name, and in my opnion if she tought that then that was the truth because that is the way the Story goes. The orc god being a god didn't matter so much as Sabah deciding what she wanted and how she'd achieve it, thus making his slaying into a pivotal point for herself, did.

As for Cat already being the Black Queen:

From Book 3 – chapter 69 – Swan Song

" If I was to be queen, it would be a queen cloaked in black with hands bloodied red. Though young and half-formed, the Name was taking shape. Beckoning. "

Here, the Name of Black Queen was starting to come into being. Then |Black Destroyed the contraption that held the souls of the Watch and as such, Cat didn't make a deal with the Empress and the Story of the Black Queen was no more. However, it doesn't seem to have been fully destroyed:

From Book 3 – chapter 72 – Curtains:

" Had I truly become the Black Queen, I thought, had my teacher not broken that transition as recklessly as he had the city, they would have been mine to rule.

[...]

Gamble was too light a word, but if every other path led to a land of graveyards it was a risk that must be taken."

Here Cat thinks about whether gambling herself into becoming the Black Queen was still worth it and while she decides it's too risky a gamble, she seems to indicate that it's still a possibility although she has no intent on doing it yet. In this chapter of today, she again wonders if it wouldn't be best to just take that plunge and again decides not to.

She has also been offered a Name from Above a couple times, most notably with the Sword of the Fairfaxes. Which she refused for her Yew Staff that she herself made into a weapon.

Now, she has refused names from both Above and Below and I don't see why she'd stop doing so. Cat's Name is likely going to be one of the Neutral names whose alignment varies with it's current owner.

Liliet

I'm not sure if the Sword of the Fairfaxes would have given her an Above-powered Name. Seems a little incompatible with her being literally a high priestess of Below-empowered deities.

That said, I would love to see that. I actively loudly WANT to see that. I want to see Cat wield Night and Light at the same time as her own native powers more than I want almost anything else.

Crash

See my guess is that the sword would have given her a Name like Queen of Blades or something close to that, think along the lines of the Saint; Not the most decent person, but certainly still associated to Above.

Sorta like Queen Elizabeth (?) Fairfax, who is thought of fondly by the people of Callow, a country historically associated to the Good side, who first instituted the Forlorn Hope treating the men and women destined to the gallows as already dead and thus using them for fodder to improve the chances of her army sorta like say, using them for blood magic like a certain Bellow-affiliated Dread Empire. By that logic, associating yourself with two goddesses that bring an entire army that could make a difference in winning against the Dead King? Well that sounds about right. Do the most good, even if to do that you have to be less nice and clean handed than other heroes.

Anyway, I'd pay good money to watch Cat and Endurance interact in any way, even better if the latter make its pitch to her, that'd be neat.

Liliet

We have WoG that Cat has no chance for Queen of Blades specifically because she'd need to be narratively associated with actual literal blades a lot more than she currently is.

That said, my understanding is that most Names are Neutral, and colored by circumstance: like what Hanno recently said about Archer and Ranger, except most Named (as opposed to their Names! people specifically) don't really flip-flop like that and tend to stick to one type of stories to be involved in and one side to be associated with.

And that said, the side Cat's associated with is certainly Below.

For that to be broken, the Name needs to be a SPECIFICALLY Light-powered one.

And that.
Would.
Be.
Hilarious.

Crash

I'd like to apologize for my terrible wording on that.

I went with Queen of Blades because I wanted something Queen-related but still martial/Army related and couldn't come up with anything, rather than to associate her with swords; the fact that I immediately followed with a comparison to Saint of Swords did not help with it at all. Sorry.

As far as names being Neutral, that sounds right in theory but can you see a Black Knight working for a choir or a White Knight born to Praes? While it sounds interesting, it doesn't sound like something that'd happen.

As far as being associated to Below yeah, I don't know how feasible it is to get a Name from Above out of that. That said, come on choirs make your damn offer already!

Liliet

(sticking this earlier so you'll see it in notifications, but I cannot access mine and so cannot make it a reply down there)

> As far as names being Neutral, that sounds right in theory but can you see a Black Knight working for a choir or a White Knight born to Praes? While it sounds interesting, it doesn't sound like something that'd happen.

Black and White Knight are the very iconic NON-Neutral Names. Like when you ask 'well what Names AREN'T Neutral' my first thought is 'well White Knight and Black Knight for example' before I even go into 'Grey Pilgrim' and 'Stalwart Paladin' and 'Warlock' and 'Tyrant'.

Neutral Names are the skill-based ones. Painted Knife, Vagrant Spear, Rogue Sorcerer, Thief, Hunter, Witch of the Woods? Captain, Adjutant, Hierophant, Scribe? Vengeful Brigand, Silent Slayer, Assassin? I can easily see these being reversed wrt what side they belong without anyone blinking an eye.

Lone Swordsman is an interesting case, as there doesn't seem to be anything inherently heroic in the basic archetype (going off stories from our world, it probably tends more towards heroic, but an opponent to a lone swordsman is another lone swordsman but evil...), but the one we knew was Choir powered and using Light. So, looks like it would vary not only from Name to Name, but from Named to Named as well.

Crash

Yeah, okay, this makes sense. I guess my failure here was that the first few Names that occurred to me had too much historied association with Below (Warlock, Black Knight, Empress, Tyrant) so going off of that I got the whole idea rather skewed.

Mammon

Not true, in Book 1 Amadeus flatly explained that Named to be are in part decided by interaction and acknowledgement by other Named. It's because he wanted her to be Squire, that she became Squire after years of no such Evil Named coming to be. And he's just a Named. Gods are Named and then some.

Now, one doesn't just give a Name, but from what we've seen it's not an act that decides one's Name being given (contrary to how some people in this chat are too eager to assign Name-earning to any heroic act) but bestowal. So all but directly and officially Names are given. Book 1 basic exposition, supported by what we've seen. There is a saturation limit, f.e. Cat could've made Named Winter Court folk but eventually she would've ran out of titles same as how the Winter King couldn't give without taking from someone else. But the Gods and Lesser Gods Bestow Names, one doesn't get it by act. The act can at most result in a God taking notice and Bestowing.

I too agree that there is still the matter of the Named to be having to accept this, never debated or suggested that. Cordelia solidly proved that one. Not sure why Thorium brought the Choirs into this at all, they kind of came out of the right field. And the sword of the Fairfax, that's you making the assumption that this would've been a Name rather than a cool magical sword. Likely it's just Creation giving Cat a sword that comes with recognition as Fairfax/Callow's ruler somehow, not actually a Name.

On her no longer being the Black Queen because the Name broke, not only is that an in-game assumption by unreliable narrator, doubly so because it's Winter Fey Cat saying it, she has been called the Black Queen by so many and has shown and proven to be helped and countered by providence that she likely has a Name in at least some capacity. The way Bard interacted with her nigh assures it, by sheer limitation of Bard's powers. Book 5 may have mended and returned the Black Queen Name, without us being told this explicitly by Cat herself.

And, what we saw in this chapter, that's not her being the Black Queen, that's her making decisive action. As she's the first Black Queen, her title doesn't come with any such defined actions, even if Names are that defined to begin with which they aren't necessarily (Not every Tyrant was chaotic evil like Kairos, the accumulated treasure throve actually suggests a more prudent lawful evil character.), Cat's Name wouldn't be defined like that. Yet. To slaughter is not synonymous with becoming the Black Queen or taking the Name.

Liliet

> but from what we've seen it's not an act that decides one's Name being given (contrary to how some people in this chat are too eager to assign Name-earning to any heroic act) but bestowal.

What?

Source?

> Cat could've made Named Winter Court folk

No, she... she could have given fae titles. That's an entirely different thing on an entirely different axis – she was Squire and a Duchess at the same time???

> I too agree that there is still the matter of the Named to be having to accept this

Most of the time, nope there isn't.

> And the sword of the Fairfax, that's you making the assumption that this would've been a Name rather than a cool magical sword. Likely it's just Creation giving Cat a sword that comes with recognition as Fairfax/Callow's ruler somehow, not actually a Name.

I actually agree with this one. The sword would have probably had enough narrative weight to catalyze a Name for a random non-Named managing to claim it, but Cat has too much weight of her own for a sword to be enough to push her into a new groove.

> On her no longer being the Black Queen because the Name broke, not only is that an in-game assumption by unreliable narrator, doubly so because it's Winter Fey Cat saying it, she has been called the Black Queen by so many and has shown and proven to be helped and countered by providence that she likely has a Name in at least some capacity.

Catherine isn't THAT unreliable a narrator, nobody has been an unreliable narrator about their own Name so far, not even Anaxares who you'd think would be the very epitome of one. And Amadeus has been called Carrion Lord by everyone the entire time since he lost his Name, are you saying that one's a Name too? Not every common nickname is a Name.

And being helped and countered by providence is a function of having a Role, not a Name. Those are different things. Every Name is associated with a Role, but not every Role is matched with a Name.

> And, what we saw in this chapter, that's not her being the Black Queen, that's her making decisive action. As she's the first Black Queen, her title doesn't come with any such defined actions, even if Names are that defined to begin with which they aren't necessarily Names are flexible, yes. There is a specific narrative groove they're a label on, and once you're out of it you lose the Name, is all. And the Black Queen narrative groove, as explained in Book 3 by not ASSUMPTIONS but Name-provided intuitive understanding which has been entirely reliable and informative in every single narration so far EVEN ANAXARES'S, was already formed as associated with Cat taking charge of the Liesse superweapon.

Mammon

The Gods Above and Below give the Name with Named having influence, it's not an act that you have to commit to be assured a Name. Saying that it's an act is less supported than this claim, as right there in Book 1 with the basic exposition Amadeus made someone who did virtually nothing but kill some corrupt guard the Squire. Hakram did nothing noteworthy, nor did Masego. They all just got on the stage near the Named that the Gods Below watched. And the way Bard tried to make Cordelia WotW showed that the act is more a pivot of first appearance having weight that can be gamed, rather than the decisive factor.

Fey titles were pretty much Names, ordered in power by the height of their title. During book 2 they pretty much outright said that the entire marketplace and then the entire court was a bunch of Named going through their Stories over and over again a thousandfold. The fey indeed aren't mortal Named, but they're a version of Named all the same. Which Cat could've made, she even considered it to give Robber immortality vs his ever impeding aging to death.

Most of the time, Named definitely have to accept it. They can do so high certainly and immediately, especially considering the Name recognition and them being simple folk, but they still have to. William's case might've involved a Hashmallim brainwashing him because of its very presence, but technically that was a choice. All Squire Claimants had a choice to participate, and likely they would've just not been Claimants if they didn't want to (unless Below wants them tied to the contest for their own amusement). Cordelia clearly shows defying her Name offered, while other Named like Masego likely felt it and immediately accepted the Name. (For all his wisdom, he's always been a bit too eager to gain powers even at the expense of 'pieces of soul he wasn't using anyway.')

The difference between the Carrion Lord and Black Queen is that the Carrion Lord is indeed just a title, while the Black Queen has been previously confirmed to be a Name in the making. Cordelia is called First Prince and Warden of the West without holding either Name, too. But Cat never directly said she didn't have a Name, and with Bard's interference, Pilgrim's behaviour towards her and her providence of playing into things like meeting White Knight, there's cause to believe she has a Name more than a mere Role like Cordelia.

If we'd only see Cat have parts of providence and abilities that mortals would have, such as Cordelia being able to jump out of a window after stabbing herself and getting scot-free thanks to reputation and knowledge on the guards' culture, then I'd agree with you that it would be the Role and the way it and providence can control everyone. But the things we've seen with f.e. getting the kapactroi's loyalty with her thresher abilities and her Role in the Band of Five, it's too much Story-supported in ways that weren't her skills alone that a Name ought to be there.

And with the hints of Sve Noc apparently roving through her mind changing or blocking memories and thought processes for her ultimate plan to ve/ / with a block of cheddar, combined with her coming fresh out of a Winter Fey state that took her free will and rationality the more she'd drink it, the transition back to a much weaker Name that doesn't cover the same as Squire might not be as obvious to Cat. I'm not saying that Cat is being a fully unreliable narrator, I am saying that there is enough reason to believe that she has a Name that she's not continuously referencing or which she herself hasn't noticed yet due to the lesser gods in her mind being enough cause for her to overlook it. Considering them to be power-stealers, her Name might be hollowed out or held in reserve by the sisters too for all we know.

And again, the Black Queen was the groove of bloodshed that was definitely the case what groove it would have to follow. Back then. It's a first-time Name, no one but Cat knew Below's newest Name design. Considering Cat still has the title Black Queen and there has never been a Black Queen ever to create a true precedent of what a BQ should be, there's no need to assume that the new Black Queen Name wouldn't be a different design by the same Name that uses Cat's easiest and most recognised title. What was said in book 3 needs not necessarily still be the case, because there's no previous Black Queen to have consolidated the groove that it has to follow.

Liliet

> The Gods Above and Below give the Name with Named having influence, it's not an act that you have to commit to be assured a Name. Saying that it's an act is less supported than this claim, as right there in Book 1 with the basic exposition Amadeus made someone who did virtually nothing but kill some corrupt guard the Squire.

Wait, is Amadeus now a God Above or Below???

It's not about committing acts specifically, it's about FITTING A GROVE. Matching an archetype. Amadeus accepting Cat as his student MADE HER MUCH MORE OF A SQUIRE. Because, y'know, a knight's apprentice is what a squire IS. She still had to prove herself by killing other claimants from there, note. And all the claimants were absolutely certain – and other characters were certain of this as well – that killing all other claimants would award them the Name. It's a stably working mechanism for this kind of situation with Praesi ambition-based Names: kill the others, get the Name.

There is an established mechanism for becoming a Dread Emperor/Empress, Warlock, Black Knight and Chancellor as well. Nobody at any point asked 'but do Gods Below like me enough to BESTOW this Name upon me?' Everyone was always like 'okay I do this, that and that and the Name is bagged'. Akua notably constructed the Name Diabolist for herself entirely deliberately, crafting a story about herself that fit her comfortably.

We can insist that Gods Below are totally a part of the process, it's just that their favor works so automatically and their selection criteria are so widely known and intuitive, everyone just KNOWS how to appease them perfectly and they never act unpredictably.

Or we can acknowledge that it's a tiny invisible angels hypothesis and it would work exactly the same way if Below didn't have any personal part in the process at all.

> Fey titles were pretty much Names, ordered in power by the height of their title. During book 2 they pretty much outright said that the entire marketplace and then the entire court was a bunch of Named going through their Stories over and over again a thousandfold. The fey indeed aren't mortal Named, but they're a version of Named all the same. Which Cat could've made, she even considered it to give Robber immortality vs his ever impeding aging to death.

Yes, fae are subject to stories. That doesn't make them Named any more than dying of stupidity made Dorian (Exiled Prince) a fae.

Names are a specific mechanic of the world. You have a Name as a label on a groove you fit, you can claim it and later you can transition out of it or (rarely) just lose it and become non-Named again. You get three Aspects and a mana pool based on your Name's strength and how well you fit it. You can do tricks with this mana pool, some of them Name-specific, some fairly universal.

Anything that isn't that IS NOT A NAME. It's just... something else. Like a fae title. Or a Role. Or a portion of Night. Or being an important politician. Or sorcerous ability. Not a Name!

> Most of the time, Named definitely have to accept it. They can do so high certainly and immediately, especially considering the Name recognition and them being simple folk, but they still have to. William's case might've involved a Hashmallim brainwashing him because of its very presence, but technically that was a choice. All Squire Claimants had a choice to participate, and likely they would've just not been Claimants if they didn't want to (unless Below wants them tied to the contest for their own amusement). Cordelia clearly shows defying her Name offered, while other Named like Masego likely felt it and immediately accepted the Name. (For all his wisdom, he's always been a bit too eager to gain powers even at the expense of 'pieces of soul he wasn't using anyway.')

Oooh, this is an interesting discussion.

I'd argue that in William's case it was less brainwashing and more that Hashmallim appeared to him because they already knew he was contrite. He already was half-mad wandering through woods alone when an angel appeared before him! But yes, angels always give their chosen heroes a choice. And for some choirs at least it's an ongoing one – when Tariq stopped acting like Mercy wanted him to, they went away for a while until he returned to the groove on his own.

Many Praesi Names – like Squire – have ambition as a part of the groove. Like specifically a part of the story is that the person WANTS this. If you don't want it, you don't fit the requirement. All Champion Names are like this on the Good side. Squire, Black Knight, Dread Emp, Chancellor, looks like Warlock as well. Actually I wonder if someone might be forced into the groove of Squire beside their will... that sounds like something that might happen, with ambition being a big but still optional element.

At the same time, we already know there are position-based Names you don't get to refuse if you're in the position. That's how Hierarch happened – Anaxares wanted nothing with it, but since others acknowledged him as the hierarch of the League, he got the Name automatically. It's possible that the same applies to Dread Emp and Chancellor – if you take up the position, the Name comes with it, and if you want to remain non-Named while still holding it, tough fucking luck. You don't get the option.

Cordelia on the verge of a new Name getting the option to reject it is something Augur had to engineer deliberately, going against Bard in doing so. The way the story would have naturally played out, she would have had a chance to run or to stay, and the Name would have come automatically with staying, inseparably tied to it narratively.

We have characters who came into a Name without even realizing it for a while – Vivienne and Tariq. Tariq in fact faced a choice of “I don’t want to be a Named, but the only way I can get out of it is by no longer doing the thing that puts me into the groove – and I do want to keep doing the thing”. Vivienne just had no idea she was becoming Named until a while into it. Masego likely realized he was Apprentice immediately upon coming into the Name, what with growing up in a family of Named and them being right there to tell him, but he wasn’t aiming to get a Name with the action that gave it to him, he was just trying to explain something. The only way he could have gotten out of it after the fact was to stop being Warlock’s apprentice, not just by saying ‘okay but I don’t want a Name’. Nobody asked!

Even when a Name’s story demands voluntary acceptance, it’s often voluntary acceptance of an object level position, with the meta level position of, well, having a Name about it, coming automatically.

Even for Cordelia the choice of having a Name or not came in the form of choosing object level actions she could take. Those actions would have been mostly symbolic, all having the same immediate object level outcome, making the choice fairly ‘purely’ about the Name. Again, that situation was deliberately engineered by the Augur for just that purpose!

> And with the hints of Sve Noc apparently roving through her mind changing or blocking memories and thought processes for her ultimate plan

What???

Are you talking about the visions when Cat was dying? Because those were visions, not changed memories.

Are you talking about the clearly cut out / blocked out memory of Bard talking to Neshamah? Because that’s not something Sve Noc would have had any interest in doing, and it makes absolutely no sense to attribute it to them. Not when we have, well, Bard, an immoral eldritch abomination with weird interaction with stories and people's consciousnesses, to finger.

> the transition back to a much weaker Name that doesn't cover the same as Squire might not be as obvious to Cat. I'm not saying that Cat is being a fully unreliable narrator, I am saying that there is enough reason to believe that she has a Name that she's not continuously referencing or which she herself hasn't noticed yet due to the lesser gods in her mind being enough cause for her to overlook it. Considering them to be power-stealers, her Name might be hollowed out or held in reserve by the sisters too for all we know.

A Name is a part of a person's soul. We know a lot more about them than you're pretending here. Cat knows a lot about them very intimately, considering she once had an Aspect cut out of her, then had the whole Name ripped away and then immediately violently reclaimed it.

There is no basis for claiming what you are.

> And again, the Black Queen was the groove of bloodshed that was definitely the case what groove it would have to follow. Back then. It's a first-time Name, no one but Cat knew Below's newest Name design.

Below's???? Names are STORIES. Archetypes! People make them!

And you need to actually FIT the archetype. There is already an idea of what the Black Queen is like in people's minds, and the key here is that IT DOESN'T FIT WHAT CATHERINE IS. She ISN'T what everyone thinks when they say 'Black Queen'. There are like a dozen people on the whole continent who have correct association with 'Black Queen', as opposed to thousands of just Callowans who have an entirely different idea about it. Note Catherine musing just this chapter about how her reputation is rather disconnected from who she is.

If the entire continent somehow changed its mind about what 'Black Queen' refers to, sure, I can see it becoming a Name for Cat. But it hasn't!

> I almost laughed at the notion that I could force Tariq to do anything, much less bend the rest of the Grand Alliance to my will, until I caught the look on their faces. Not Akua or Indrani, but the delegates of the League. Over half a hundred people were here, some of the most influential people in the League, and after the lunacy Prodocius had just spoken not a single one of their faces expressed disbelief. Fear and hesitation, anger and doubt, but none of them believed it to be absurd. Because they weren't looking uphill and seeing me, I realized as my stomach sunk. They were looking at the victor of the Camps and the Graveyard, who'd strung along heroes and villains and dealt death to thousands. My reputation, these days, was enough to cow thousands of charging horsemen.

See also: Abigail's fears, for more on the mismatch.

The groove is there. Cat has already defined it for everyone else with her actions.

And then failed to fit it.

Liliet

> Sve Noc are lesser gods, and gods do seem to have a hand in giving Names. Remember with Captain's origin extra chapter, she went to a withering lesser orc god to get her Name instead of being just a werewolf? By killing him she got her Name, had she subjected herself to him she would've also gained a Name but lesser or different.

Literally anyone 'has a hand in giving Names' in that way. If Hakram hadn't followed Catherine he wouldn't have gotten his Name either, does this mean Catherine hands those out now?

> Not allowing for Names to be granted to them seems like something that even lesser gods like Sve Noc can do similar to preventing mind reading and predicting one's future.

Not allowing Names to be granted to themselves I'll give you, though I somehow doubt lesser gods CAN have those. To their followers? Literally nobody has been shown to have that power, aside from for the Names tied to positions. (IE I'm sure they could prevent someone from claiming a Name of Drow High Priest(ess) just by not giving them that job)

> Whether Priestess of Night, First Under the Night and High Priestess are Names rather than titles like Exarch of Nicea is a stretch either way.

Pretty sure Priestess of Night was a Name the sisters shared before they finished apotheosis. First Under The Night is not a Name as it's not a character archetype and so doesn't qualify. High Priestess is definitely a potential Name, but it's not one anyone we know is currently holding.

> They're given by the people but hold no Name powers, similar to how Cordelia is First Prince and Warden of the West from the moment she was coronated. Both are Names, but she carried both as title yet holding neither Name.

First Prince has never been a Name. Warden of the West hadn't been either, until Cordelia got the option to claim it as such. Anything is a Name as long as it marks a clear story groove / Role. First Prince does not have any such. Warden of the West now does.

> Black Queen though, that might've been Cat's Name all along since her coronation.

Black Queen was tied to a specific story groove that Cat came close to fitting into, but in the end didn't. And won't, anymore. So that door is closed unless she goes back to the "ok fuck it let's threaten everyone with a superweapon" mindset for real.

> Her fitting into Name events like the Band of Five and gaining the Yew Staff or Fairfax Sword are a lot more Story-pulled than the non-Named actions we see around. Too Story-pulled, even when assuming her Duchess of Moonless Nights title was the Name that explained her role and being controlled into a Story that Keter I and the Everdark clearly were. One doesn't happenstance into those situations at the exact right moment or way without a Name pulling providence, with the Book 5 events being a bit vaguer in this but still suggesting Name plot.

You are using "Name" to substitute for narrative/Role. Name is just one type of thing that happens around those, not every single thing ever. Yes, Catherine is having Name-like things happen to her without holding an actual Name, because she is playing a significant Role in the current continental stories and every single action she takes short of wiping herself in the privy has significant narrative weight. This suggests that IF she were to fit into a character archetype groove that exists in-universe she'd get a Name out of that. But there are currently none that she fits, with Black Queen being already tied to a different one.

Insanenoodlyguy

I agree with most of this, but I got the impression that Warden of the West had been a name at one point? At least in as much as Cordelia would not have been the first if she took it.

Liliet

I think she would have been the first, but I'm not sure we have clear confirmation of this anywhere.

Mammon

Now I've noticed that you aren't digging in your heels and throwing a flame war because the argument has gone on for more than two replies, rather than remaining civil and with arguments given and considered. So let me start by saying 'Jay, constructive discussion rather than the toxic gridlocked argumentation that most internet arguments in!', and that I applaud you for the these days too rare ability to keep this argument civilised. I love it when I occasionally find such a person to argue with. Let me know if you feel if I'm digging in my heels or otherwise toxically arguing, I'd hate to not reciprocate in kind.

> Wait, is Amadeus now a God Above or Below???

No, he's Named. If he can have a hand in it, then a god certainly can. Which he didn't say was specifically something that only he could do. Yes, the Black Knight specifically has a hand in Squire, but the narration didn't narrow in on that. He explained that the presence and interaction with Named aid the surfacing of a Name.

The difference in auto-bestowal lies with Below and Above. Below is about your due, becoming Dread Emperor is a guaranteed Name because that's your due (Assuming the act to not be easily gained by sheer inheritance, which Praes virtually never does.) while the same doesn't go for First Prince for Procer because that requires Righteousness or a need. Also, auto-bestowal by title was more a thing of the early books, and EE shifted a bit between writing style and approach between 1+2 and onwards.

(Also, have to reply here because the other one simply doesn't give me the reply button any more so thin the blocks have gotten.)

On Named and fey: You seem to have a much more narrow view on Named. Named are anyone who is granted a Name or title that both benefits and counters them in the Story, which the Fey all the more fit into because they're nigh enslaved to the Story. First fey Cat fought knew he couldn't possibly win when she got him to narrate his plans and proclaim victory certain.

But, if you read back, I occasionally specify mortal Named (or human Named, though considering orcs also have Names that's not too accurate) instead of Named. Named are more powerful, mortal Named are the base system for most humans which indeed come with the three Aspects system. As we've seen, that's hardly the only Named there are. Named aren't all with three Aspects, lest you'd consider Named and mortal Named synonymous while assuming the other variants to be not Named. Which I do, because the Fey pretty clearly showed themselves a kind of Named that isn't the three Aspects Named.

Hence: You say Cat cannot have a Name because you have a completely different interpretation of Named than me. I disagree that what you specify as all Named are ALL Named instead of just a subsection of them. And in this, Cat can still have a Name instead of just a Role without Aspects and such because she's in a different category of Named. Maybe the Drow Named, maybe the kind of god-patroned Named that Amadeus said Warlock tried to get once, maybe something much rarer to not come with many precedents.

On William's brainwashing, that's more a personal opinion that when one's presence auto-brainwashes an entire city to zealous suicide-murder, then there's technically no free choice involved even if the same choice would've been made without the brainwashing.

With Hierarch, he doesn't have free will by his own free will. It's likely more that he had to get the People's approval to reject his Name before he could reject it. He already said he wasn't allowed to kill himself or have his life taken without struggle, despite wanting to do either. Quite likely the Kahenas saying he had to become Hierarch by the People's will made him 'willingly' accept the Name despite not wanting it.

With the Dread Emperors, it's the question whether there's a precedent of anyone ever not wanting the Name at all. Maybe there's a precedent of there being an Unnamed Dread Emperor while Traitorous was a humble shoemaker, lest he lost his Name during that period, but likely simple killing of the Name-rejectors too quickly to make it apparent they weren't Named made Praes always Named-ruled.

With Cordelia, it was likely a choice she could make either way. Augur just made it a choice between "Get the Name" or "Die, Procer falls into civil war and/or to Keter while warring on Callow and such and everyone you had to protect will die because you rejected the Name.". Because that's still technically a choice to reject the Name, if not so practically.

Maybe it's partly that EE simply skips the accepting if it's assured, maybe in-game auto-acceptance doesn't even warrant narration or description. But when there's an option they reject, then it's a choice. One that they likely reasoned was 0% for Masego and with Thief was likely an act she either didn't realise to be her Thief choice or a much more subtle transition. Cat has said that new Named tend to be bold and overconfident and radiating their Name when trying to gauge Cordelia, but such a thing would be detrimental to the very Name Thief. Perhaps her Name was willingly taken but gradually gained to prevent Thief going against her very nature drunk on power and sudden shift. Although that is indeed an assumption rather than with precedent or proof.

With the mind control, yes I was talking about / / only to come to the conclusion that Hakram couldn't get his hands on such tea. We've seen it with Bard, but also in Cat's memories which we cannot know whether it was Bard or Sve Noc, and with Thorns guy trying to describe and remember Scribe's appearance. At this point we don't know whether Cat's // was Bard or Sve Noc, but personally I like to think that Bard cannot intervene in the mind of Sve Noc's archpriest that easily with the crows watching over her.

>And you need to actually FIT the archetype. There is already an idea of what the Black Queen is like in people's minds, and the key here is that IT DOESN'T FIT WHAT CATHERINE IS. She ISN'T what everyone thinks when they say 'Black Queen'.

This both already supports my argument and likely shows the crux of our different interpretations. People already see Cat as the Black Queen, so she would fit the archetype even if she changes because everyone see her and the Name as synonymous. Whatever Callow sees her as, would be the archetype of the Black Queen by the groove she made. However, you assume the interpretation of all non-Callowans as relevant while I assume Named to have some semblance of culture-appropriation.

Now, even assuming that Cat isn't at least in good part a completely different subsection of Named now rather than the three Aspects mortal Named, she is Callowan and by cultural right to be shaped and seen by the Callowans to be shaped and interpreted. Granted, there is argument that f.e. the Good countries seeing Dread Emperors as infighting self-defeating lunatics that occasionally start a year of terror creates precedent that the non-Praesi have any control by interpretation over the Wasteland Names, but at the same time such interference should have much more effect on all Names. If the Wasteland would see Heroes as incompetent and failing in the face of proper planning and more assets, that should've counter-balanced the entire Good prevails in the end grooves we see now. If the majority interpretation counts, then foreign Named should all like and praise Procer rather than seeing them as land-hungry opportunists.

>Literally anyone 'has a hand in giving Names' in that way. If Hakram hadn't followed Catherine he wouldn't have gotten his Name either, does this mean Catherine hands those out now?

Yes. As I referenced before, Amadeus in Book 1 confirmed in narration that interaction with Named increases odds of getting a Name. Cat can't point at someone and say 'You're now the new Heiress!', but her presence and interaction does add to the odds of Name-bestowal, as Amadeus said in his Names 101 class.

>Pretty sure Priestess of Night was a Name the sisters shared before they finished apotheosis. First Under The Night is not a Name as it's not a character archetype and so doesn't qualify. + previous quote and reply:

I'm not sure whether PoN was a Name because the Drow are a bit iffy on that. Whether they follow a completely different set of Names (whether a different subsection without three Aspects like I'd reason or at least different like the inherent differences between Heroes and Villains) or have Names as all rather than a more powerful species in general, it's too ??? to make a decisive call on it. Too vague by lack of defined situation and culture by EE, much like much on Ranger is too vague to discuss for now.

Same as how Masego is the first Hierophant not needing such pre-existing archetype, technically First Under the Night could be a Name of the Drow or a necessary new Name because they are entering a new era and/or have no human-amongst-drow Named. Maybe Drow don't even have consistent Names, instead each being a new one never to resurface. We don't know enough.

On whether Sve Noc can decline Names in Cat's name, the question is whether Cat would even know of this before it happened. She likely doesn't know when Augur tries to read her future, either.

>First Prince has never been a Name. Warden of the West hadn't been either, until Cordelia got the option to claim it as such. Anything is a Name as long as it marks a clear story groove / Role. First Prince does not have any such. Warden of the West now does.

Now I could be wrong or merely making assumptions, but wouldn't make Cat assuming these Names to be Cordelia's when she was wondering whether Cordelia was now Named mean that both are indeed preceded Names of Proceran Rulers? She even discussed that one is apparently stronger than the other in most cases, though I can't remember which one that was.

>Black Queen was tied to a specific story groove that Cat came close to fitting into, but in the end didn't. And won't, anymore. So that door is closed unless she goes back to the "ok fuck it let's threaten everyone with a superweapon" mindset for real.

This might be a 'Lets agree to disagree.' because I think we've reached the point where we're giving our opinions as if they are arguments. My opinion is that a non-precedented Name can easily be fluent or be discarded, so that a completely different groove or archetype can create a different Name design by the exact same title of Black Queen because that's simply the most obvious or supported that Cat fits. Until she better fits a preceded Name that already has an established Name title, Black Queen might even be the Name of a humble shoemaker that doesn't do anything wrong as long as the people see that as the archetype.

The bloodshed that Cat knew would lead to the Name was the pivot to get the Name at the time, but by cultural shift of interpretation and Cat's changed personality the very interpretation of Black Queen might since have changed. We have seen that Callow's very interpretation of Good and Evil and on Cat has shifted drastically since book 3 especially in the House of Light now Insurgent.

>You are using "Name" to substitute for narrative/Role.

This is a difference in assuming how far a Role would go. Cordelia still has a Role because she has no Name but a position that makes her Role indeed inexchangeable. She is the ruler of Procer, which would fit certain grooves while not requiring a Name. However, Names are main cast while Roles are supporting characters. Cat has been too much a main character not delegated by Creation and the Name to a supporting and side character, to be a Role rather than a Name. There are Named in her employ, if she were just a Role then the Named ought to have gone through Masego and Hakram and Archer with Cat now aiding them.

Mario and Bowser are Named while Peach is a Role of the damsel in distress, but the moment that Peach gets an actual active role then she would become a Named. Zelda was merely a Role to bestow a purpose/motivation, some boons and certain acts that a ruler has to do, but once she became that desert nomad she came into a Name and actively Story-affecting role rather than a Role. (Yes, Role is a bit of an awkward way to refer to it indeed.)

Liliet

> Now I've noticed that you aren't digging in your heels and throwing a flame war because the argument has gone on for more than two replies, rather than remaining civil and with arguments given and considered. So let me start by saying 'Jay, constructive discussion rather than the toxic gridlocked argumentation that most internet arguments in!', and that I applaud you for the these days too rare ability to keep this argument civilised. I love it when I occasionally find such a person to argue with. Let me know if you feel if I'm digging in my heels or otherwise toxically arguing, I'd hate to not reciprocate in kind.

♥ ♥ No, he's Named. If he can have a hand in it, then a god certainly can.

Yes, a god can have a hand in helping someone into a Name tied to a position under them, just as a Named can. With more ease even, I'll give you that, since a god's support narratively counts for more than a mortal person's, Named or not. Though it'll always depend on the specific situation, of course.

That said, Gods Above and Below specifically, as opposed to lesser gods inside Creation, seem to have voluntarily removed themselves from the game in a way that doesn't apply to lower-power beings. That's my argument here: sure, they could probably bestow Names at will just by deciding this particular person should have one. Like how you can use cheat codes in a game to get it to a desired state. Like how in a simulation you've programmed to run, you're absolutely free to edit memory states to have whatever you want, except if what you're doing is running an experiment doing so would defeat the entire point of running the simulation in the first place.

The Gods Above and Below are programmers, with Creation as their simulation, and they've given themselves only very, very limited input, because that's the entire point.

> Yes, the Black Knight specifically has a hand in Squire, but the narration didn't narrow in on that. He explained that the presence and interaction with Named aid the surfacing of a Name.

Yes, if you're already in the middle of a story, you're more likely to get a Role in it. It's... I don't want to say correlation, not causation, but... something close to that. Causation by another mechanism. You know like how if you hang around nerds you're likely to absorb nerdy knowledge of their favorite topics? It doesn't mean nerds have mysterious metaphysical power of converting people to their cause, it's just basic cause-effect of how human relationships work. In this case, it's just basic cause-effect of how stories work. If you get drawn in, you get drawn in.

> The difference in auto-bestowal lies with Below and Above. Below is about your due, becoming Dread Emperor is a guaranteed Name because that's your due (Assuming the act to not be easily gained by sheer inheritance, which Praes virtually never does.) while the same doesn't go for First Prince for Procer because that requires Righteousness or a need.

Sooooooooooooooooo yeah the requirements are different for different kinds of stories. It's still based on a story and not on a specific being's fiat as such.

A specific being's fiat (that being not being Gods Above/Below, as they are categorically different entities) is weight on a scale. That weight alone can be enough on its own – Amadeus's favor was not quite enough for Cat to become Squire, but a Dread Emperor/Empress can make someone Chancellor just by appointing them to the position – but it can still be counterweighted by other things going on. IE a Dread Emperor/Empress cannot just appoint an attacking White Knight Chancellor and have their Name change because they said so, the weight of their other Name and also the fact they're currently attacking beats that appointment easily.

> On Named and fey: You seem to have a much more narrow view on Named. Named are anyone who is granted a Name or title that both benefits and counters them in the Story, which the Fey all the more fit into because they're nigh enslaved to the Story. First fey Cat fought knew he couldn't possibly win when she got him to narrate his plans and proclaim victory certain.

Yes, I do, and I know I'm right because that's how in-universe terminology is used. Nobody has ever at any point referred to any fae as Named. And we have WoG that it's impossible to hold two Names at the same time, while Cat has had a Name and a fae title at the same time, ergo, a fae title is not a Name.

If you're going into 'the writer is actually secretly wrong about their own magic system's terminology and mechanics' I'm afraid I cannot help you there.

> (Also, have to reply here because the other one simply doesn't give me the reply button any more so thin the blocks have gotten.)

MOOD.

I was thinking this conversation needs to be consolidated myself lmao

> But, if you read back, I occasionally specify mortal Named (or human Named, though considering orcs also have Names that's not too accurate) instead of Named. Named are more powerful, mortal Named are the base system for most humans which indeed come with the three Aspects system. As we've seen, that's hardly the only Named there are. Named aren't all with three Aspects, lest you'd consider Named and mortal Named synonymous while assuming the other variants to be not Named. Which I do, because the Fey pretty clearly showed themselves a kind of Named that isn't the three Aspects Named.

Yeah, I'm going with the terminology used in-universe and in WoG. Note how an elf Named we've met has worked the exact same way as 'human, orc and goblin' Named do – three Aspects and all. And a ratling Named, too. You'd think if anyone would have a different system... but nope, species appears to be entirely irrelevant.

> On William's brainwashing, that's more a personal opinion that when one's presence auto-brainwashes an entire city to zealous suicide-murder, then there's technically no free choice involved even if the same choice would've been made without the brainwashing.

I believe that there's a difference in how the Choir interacts with their chosen champion and regular mortals on request of said champion.

Specifically, the Choir of Contrition on its own doesn't make judgement calls. It doesn't 'know', by itself, what is moral and what isn't, what is the right thing to do and what isn't. The function of figuring it out is not implemented.

What they do instead is find a champion who thinks like they do, aka who meets a set of 'mindset' criteria. William was contrite and wished to do something to make up for it (even if it hadn't consciously come up in his reasoning per se before the Choir brought it up), Hanno wanted to be just, Tariq wanted to dispense mercy, Iason wanted to endure. The Choir picks up on that desire and as long as the person's mindset matches their requirements, they're invited to pick the direction the entire Choir goes. They more or less assume the person's values. Note how not a single time has there been a values dissonance conflict between a person and their Choir, despite how hugely the values vary by culture and by person. Contrition didn't have a problem with William being racist despite that approximately everyone else did, did you notice that?

So 'brainwashing' their chosen champion would defeat the entire point. Subject them to trauma that would keep them in the mindset the Choir likes, oh yes, and I'm 😊 @ how ethical that is right there with you. Although it's hardly worse than the entire concept of teenage Named as child soldiers, y'know, it all sucks, this doesn't really stand out much.

But when the champion has decided that brainwashing other people en masse to match the champion's values and opinions is the right thing to do in this situation – sure, they'll do that. They just need a template to brainwash to, and that's what the champion provides.

> With Hierarch, he doesn't have free will by his own free will. It's likely more that he had to get the People's approval to reject his Name before he could reject it. He already said he wasn't allowed to kill himself or have his life taken without struggle, despite wanting to do either. Quite likely the Kahenas saying he had to become Hierarch by the People's will made him 'willingly' accept the Name despite not wanting it.

I don't think they phrased it like that lmao

> Maybe it's partly that EE simply skips the accepting if it's assured, maybe in-game auto-acceptance doesn't even warrant narration or description. But when there's an option they reject, then it's a choice.

In-game, huh?

You think there's a text prompt popping up in a person's field of vision asking 'accept Name, y/n', and we just haven't been shown it a single time because Erratic hasn't bothered to?

My point is that there's no such prompt. Names are a meta-level thing that reflects object level facts. A person's attitude towards their Name is a meta-level fact per se. But a person's attitude towards Named in general (like Cordelia's), a person's choice of object level course of action, as enabled by a Name or not, THAT is object level facts. They are what gets to be weight on the scale.

Most of the time, yes, a groove that you need to fit to get a Name is a result of your own choices, and one way or another if you really badly wanted to get out of the Name you could just leave the groove. Anaxares could have gone against the Will of the People (which in your theory would do that, though not in mine), Masego could have run away from home and stopped practicing magic, Tariq could have turned into a serial killer.

And then there are Names that aren't like that at all.

Cursed.

Sabah was born to it.

You think she secretly subconsciously wanted it, and if she'd fully gotten over her desire-since-babyhood to kill and eat people, the curse would have fallen off, or what?

> With the mind control, yes I was talking about / / only to come to the conclusion that Hakram couldn't get his hands on such tea. We've seen it with Bard, but also in Cat's memories which we cannot know whether it was Bard or Sve Noc, and with Thorns guy trying to describe and remember Scribe's appearance. At this point we don't know whether Cat's // was Bard or Sve Noc, but personally I like to think that Bard cannot intervene in the mind of Sve Noc's archpriest that easily with the crows watching over her.

It has been remarked before that Bard is oddly little known for how massively she meddles. For old records of her to have an active antimemetic effect, written into the very fabric of Creation (given that she's working directly for the Gods and they can do whatever they fuck they want), would seem to fit.

And Bard has already shown herself capable of taking Cat out for a personal chat without the crows getting input on it, at that. During the campfire arc, remember?

> I'm not sure whether PoN was a Name because the Drow are a bit iffy on that.

Okay, that's a good point. I'm assuming it was, but that's just speculation on my part. That said, > or have Names as all rather than a more powerful species in general drow aren't more OP than elves.

> This both already supports my argument and likely shows the crux of our different interpretations. People already see Cat as the Black Queen, so she would fit the archetype even if she changes because everyone see her and the Name as synonymous. Whatever Callow sees her as, would be the archetype of the Black Queen by the groove she made. However, you assume the interpretation of all non-Callowans as relevant while I assume Named to have some semblance of culture-appropriation.

Yeah, coz...

> "Q: The problem really is this world doesn't really have an appropriate name for Catherine to transition into. Grey Knight would fit her best of the obvious options but it isn't a Name as far as we know.

> A: There would be no cultural drive anywhere on Calernia to birth a Name like Grey Knight, which effectively ensure it could not come into being."

(WoG document, as of Book 3 Villainous Interlude Decorum)

Evidently existing cultural drives are a requirement, see?

> If the Wasteland would see Heroes as incompetent and failing in the face of proper planning and more assets, that should've counter-balanced the entire Good prevails in the end grooves we see now.

First of all there's clearly the issue of locality: for all that Praes and Callow are deeply intertwined culturally, they are STILL different, and Callowans would still have stronger opinions = greater weight on their native Names while Wastelanders have more input on theirs.

Second, "Good prevails in the end" is a matter of where you stop telling the story. As far as Wasteland villains are concerned they win as long as they get to make their desired statement, their eventual death being utterly irrelevant. Amadeus is jealous of the rest of the continent getting to make a positive impact for their populace for the long term, remember the dried up watering hole story that served as an example? He's bitter that Evil tools aren't workable for Good goals, because he's adorable like that. He's using a rocket launcher to dig and complaining that it doesn't make a good shovel.

> Yes. As I referenced before, Amadeus in Book 1 confirmed in narration that interaction with Named increases odds of getting a Name. Cat can't point at someone and say 'You're now the new Heiress!', but her presence and interaction does add to the odds of Name-bestowal, as Amadeus said in his Names 101 class.

Okay, yes, we do see eye to eye on this, good to know lmao

> Same as how Masego is the first Hierophant not needing such pre-existing archetype

He needed the word to have meaning, though, for it to serve as a Name. What the fuck DOES the word refer to in Calernian cultural context and how did it come to be is a fascinating question, but evidently it does exist, yeah? Names are common nouns, not proper ones. Nobody in-universe asked 'wait, a hi-yero-what?', so clearly the word exists – and with it, the archetype.

> On whether Sve Noc can decline Names in Cat's name, the question is whether Cat would even know of this before it happened.

No, the question is whether THEY get a text prompt popping up in front of them with 'accept Name? y/n'. My point is they don't. They can indirectly influence Cat's Naming or not by shaping the fabric of narrative reality around her – for example, as long as they're by her side, Cat has very low odds of getting, say, White Knight as a Name. White Knights don't serve as priestesses to murder crows. Though, this being Cat... Any weight can be counterweighted if you try hard enough 0.0

* doesn't have to be an actual text prompt, obviously. A banner held up by angels that you need to put your blood signature on, an incoming train that you need to stand in front of, a surge of power you can let through or block, whatever.

> Now I could be wrong or merely making assumptions, but wouldn't make Cat assuming these Names to be Cordelia's when she was wondering whether Cordelia was now Named mean that both are indeed preceded Names of Proceran Rulers? She even discussed that one is apparently stronger than the other in most cases, though I can't remember which one that was.

No. There is no preceded Name of any Proceran ruler, Procer has no precedent of Named rulers period. It never happened, Cordelia would have been the first one since its founding. Hence, Cat was trying to guess which new one would form from among Cordelia's titles.

> However, Names are main cast while Roles are supporting characters.

Nope! Everything's a Role. Names are stickers on Roles (stickers that come with Aspects and a pool of power). When Akua made herself Diabolist, it was a Role thing. When Cat forced angels to resurrect her as an heiress to Callow, it was a Role thing. I can try and find the specific quote where Akua talks about this?

> "Praes is a story," she said. "A Tyrant to lead us. A Black Knight to break heroes. A Warlock to craft wonders. A Chancellor to rule behind them. And an Empire like clay, to shape into the tool they need: an entire nation built to empower the ambitions of a single villain."

>

> "Our Empress rules," he murmured. "Our Black Knight leads. Our Warlock crafts nothing and our Chancellor is nothing. All the while the Empire calcifies into institutions, impossible to move."

>

> Yes. Finally, he was beginning to understand. None of them were acting as they should, not in the way that mattered. Malicia was more Chancellor than Empress, Lord Black had reigned as king in all but name for twenty years and the Warlock learned without ever building. They were trying to change the story but oh, they had not thought that entirely through had they? Because once the changes began, they were no longer in control. Anyone with the right power could shape the story too. Akua looked at them, and she did not see rulers. She saw stewards. They had made themselves to be administrators, and in Praes those ever only had one function: to enable the designs of the villain above them.

>

> "Foundling came closest to understanding," Akua said. "It's how she beat me, at Liesse. It wasn't her Name she used."

>

> Akua drained the last of her cup, gently put it down on the desk.

>

> "It's never been about the Names, you see," the Diabolist smiled. "It's always about the Roles."
(Book 3, Villainous Interlude: Chiaroscuro)

> (Yes, Role is a bit of an awkward way to refer to it indeed.)

That's because that's not what it means 🤪

Mammon

My Gods Below, these posts have gotten sooooo long, and WordPress's word-compressing is making it only worse.... Soooooooo much scrolling. But don't worry, you're being an exemplary discussion partner, especially to internet standards. I mean, you haven't called me literally Hitler once, or in more actual experience that you starting telling me what I've been saying and then giving arguments against the argument that you say I made. That's an oddly oft-occurring thing.

On Gods, that's a fair assumption and interpretation. In programmer terms I'd phrase my interpretation as the user having to manually click for Named.exe to start running or be applied, that the program can indeed run by itself but doesn't and cannot automatically enable itself to start running. That the Gods Above and Below (which definately ought to be omniscient if the Choir of Judgement can claim such a thing) at the very least would get a 'A program is trying to run, allow it? Yes/No' notification.

That the gods keep some control over the matter to prevent exploitation same as how in the story Worm it's impossible to have consistent superpower trigger events from any act or trying to control the triggering. However there is indeed nothing to solidly establish or argue this, other than Black's attestment that Named can aid the triggering of Named and that this should logically enable Gods to do the same with greater ease.

>A specific being's fiat is weight on a scale. That weight alone can be enough on its own, but it can still be counterweighted by other things going on.

Oh yes, definately. Though perhaps we may see a Traitorous quote in book 6 that proves you wrong, him besting someone by turning them into Chancellor would be typically him. But when we're talking seriously, that would indeed be not how it works. One because you cannot have two Names, probably at least, two because the Name does indeed require the motivation, skills and talent without Name to support it.

Although I feel that this facet of the discussion has since drifted away, because even reading back two posts I'm still not sure where the dissonance between our opinions lie and what we're thus actually discussing any more??? I think it was about the requirement of favour / the attention of power rather than just act to get a Name, but we seem to have reached a mutual concession or consensus in this I think. Jay for proper discussion?

>Yes, I do, and I know I'm right because that's how in-universe terminology is used. Nobody has ever at any point referred to any fae as Named.

From Book 3 Chapter 9: "They're going through stories, I realized. All of them. There wasn't a single outcome here in the hundreds of conversations taking place that wasn't already set in stone.

It was enough to make me shiver. They might almost look like us, but the fae were other. Something apart, obeying completely different rules. An entire people of actors going through the motions since before Creation even existed. How many times had they gone through their stories, I wondered? If Roles were grooves worn into Creation by repetition, accumulating power by repetition, then these were an entire race of Named. Everyone from the chimney sweeps to the king himself, following along the paths set for them. And now I'd just walked into the midst of that with a lie on my lips, throwing myself headfirst into a maze of interwoven tales that went back unbroken since the dawn of existence. Gods Below, this was more dangerous than I could have ever dreamed of."

Cat calls the entire race of feykind Named at least once, and while she's indeed not yet a fey expert at this point this chapter is kinda the first and last scene where non-noble fey appear that aren't there for a clear Role of 'Observer' or 'Soldier #325' as extras solely. From this point on, there's no real need to refer to any fey as either just 'fey' or by their court title which is likely synonymous.

>Yeah, I'm going with the terminology used in-universe and in WoG. Note how an elf Named we've met has worked the exact same way as 'human, orc and goblin' Named do – three Aspects and all. And a ratling Named, too. You'd think if anyone would have a different system... but nope, species appears to be entirely irrelevant.

More as in that the three aspect Named are the lowest bar, the only one feasible for mortals to attain. Unless of course they are literally part of a god ascending. Ratlings are still mortals and even more limited, and elves need not be that much more powerful than humans. There are other forms of Named that need bigger, older or more extraordinary triggers or patrons.

>I believe that there's a difference in how the Choir interacts with their chosen champion and regular mortals on request of said champion. Specifically, the Choir of Contrition on its own doesn't make judgement calls.

Oh no, I meant it on a much more basic level. Programming language, imagine making a game that gives you a choice 'Do you want to accept this quest to start the story and your adventure?', and not actually programming in much for the 'No' option other than a quick game over. Even if you obviously say yes because you bought the game and made a character to go adventuring, technically it's not a choice as there's nothing if you decline at all.

(Except for some awesome games like Heroine: Herald of Ragnarok, where the king says 'No? This is the beginning of the game granting you an adventure, if you say no then you might as well play Tetris instead.' and then actually letting you play Tetris with a legitimate ending by reaching a certain Tetris highscore. In most games though, they don't let you just retreat and go to a farm.)

Or with a bit more human level, North Korea. Even if you'd genuinely support Kim Yong and would've done so even without cultural brainwashing, then it's still not a free choice to make if you're a North-Korean who grew up in that region. The base principle of free choice as a.o. the first US amendment intends it simply cannot work when brainwashing to reach the same conclusion as no brainwashing is a factor. That's a personal interpretation of free will and its requirements.

On the stuff you said, that's ofc the case and I'm agreeing and not contesting it. Of course the Choirs wouldn't pick someone like book1 Akua to make their Champion just for the challenge and Redemption arc.

>Quite likely the Kahenas saying he had to become Hierarch by the People's will made him 'willingly' accept the Name despite not wanting it.
>>I don't think they phrased it like that lmao

That's the sad part for Hierarch, I think they did. But that's indeed interpretation rather than fact.

>You think there's a text prompt popping up in a person's field of vision asking 'accept Name, y/n', and we just haven't been shown it a single time because Erratic hasn't bothered to?

Not outright that, rather than if the narrative description of the sensation and choice would be moot or slowing down the pace and hype it's skipped over. Like how the writer doesn't always write that the sword is being unsheathed or that you take off your coat entering a room when this would be just unnecessary narration. Rather than that this non-literal "Accept Name y/n" does appear as a forceful sensation that you'd have to actively suppress and reject like Cordelia did, but that if you wouldn't or feel it to be right that you wouldn't even notice it to be a choice.

>Cursed. Sabah was born to it.

This is a bit vague by lack of chapters on it, but Sabah was born to a curse which was likely why she got the transitional Name of Cursed. Similar to how Killian was born a half-elf and potentially could've gotten this transitional Name because of it and the troubles she had with using magic thanks to her ancestry. I don't think they ever said Sabah was born Named at all, or that the lychantrophy she got came at the exact same time as her Name.

>It has been remarked before that Bard is oddly little known for how massively she meddles. And Bard has already shown herself capable of taking Cat out for a personal chat without the crows getting input on it, at that. During the campfire arc, remember?

Jup, because Cat filled a later expositioned trigger of having to talk about the Bard to enable the Bard to take notice and intervene. Big difference between thought and what turned out to be a specific condition of Bard's intervention. However this is indeed a matter of interpretation and I indeed do not claim that it was definitely Sve Noc with no chance of Bard. With the sisters being narrated by Cat as always being in the back of her mind and listening to her thoughts, them being the cause sounds much more reasonable than >drow aren't more OP than elves.

Bard being able of also reading all Named' thoughts though even on plot-relevant internal monologue.

We hope, or rather we assume. We've seen one undead elf with a Name and if they follow fey rules of royalty meaning power they also have a lot of power. And we've heard of what the Emerald Blades can do against regular troops, which considering what we've seen some of the Drow do vs Fey Cat might be comparing a dagger to a greatsword. Or not, and they may be even more powerful. No telling quite yet, same as how the gnomes power is mostly conjecture at this point.

>Evidently existing cultural drives are a requirement, see?

Yes, but would people calling her Black Queen be such a drive while Grey Knight wasn't an option because no one called her that?

>First of all there's clearly the issue of locality: for all that Praes and Callow are deeply intertwined culturally, they are STILL different, and Callowans would still have stronger opinions = greater weight on their native Names while Wastelanders have more input on theirs.

So you agree, then? (Not to put words in your mouth, dread the thought because I hate it when people do this to me. If it's not, say so. It just sounds like you agree with the point I made.) Cultural exclusivity of certain Names tied to that culture is a factor and therefore it's not how the world and those against you view BQ, it's how Callow views its Black Queen.

The point we were discussion was that you say that the Black Queen had to be with bloodshed, while I argue that the Name by Callow's interpretation of Black Queen might've shifted now to have different requirements. Cat end book 3 and Cat now has a vastly different reputation amongst her own people, though we indeed only see a bit and hear rumours of it so it's not all too reliable what this reputation is exactly. And this facet on her being Callow's to interpretate rather than all of Calernia's (, including the hundreds of the League's delegates who see her as the bloody Black Queen Archheretic of this chapter). Callow matters, and maybe now the drow a bit.

>“Good prevails in the end” is a matter of where you stop telling the story. As far as Wasteland villains are concerned they win as long as they get to make their desired statement, their eventual death being utterly irrelevant. Amadeus is jealous of the rest of the continent getting to make a positive impact for their populace for the long term, remember the dried up watering hole story that served as an example? He’s bitter that Evil tools aren’t workable for Good goals, because he’s adorable like that. He’s using a rocket launcher to dig and complaining that it doesn’t make a good shovel.

That’s a good point, that’s indeed Evil’s problem now biting itself in the ass. Though mining does use a lot of dynamite, and they do love the Villains that won a lot in a row and continuously in ways that stuck.

>He needed the word to have meaning, though, for it to serve as a Name. What the fuck DOES the word refer to in Calernian cultural context and how did it come to be is a fascinating question, but evidently it does exist, yeah? Names are common nouns, not proper ones. Nobody in-universe asked ‘wait, a hi-yero-what?’, so clearly the word exists – and with it, the archetype.

That is very true, I had to look up what the hell Hierophant meant in our world and I don’t see how it correlates to understanding of god even now. Maybe EE used hierophant by lack of better alternatives as there were very few words that would describe Masego’s brand of what he does? Without edgy names like Godbinder, of course. In terms of that the Name needs to mean something understood combined with the sometimes lacklustre simple Names while the ones that are more vague likely being strongly cultural before the Name arose, I cannot argue against this point.

Though that isn’t quite a point for or against Black Queen though, as she too is a title without a Name precedent to it thus formed by the interpretation. One which may still be malleable to great degrees because the cultural bed is rapidly shifting, due to Callow going from seeing Cat as an invader, to the Callowan necessary evil against the worse evil that is Proceran occupationism, to now winning and making Callow a continent-wide recognised international power.

>> "It's never been about the Names, you see," the Diabolist smiled. "It's always about the Roles."

That's a bit of an assumption on whether Names are truly part of Roles and whether Akua is really completely correct on this. Of course people also fill Roles, f.e. Cat being Hero more often than Villain when dealing with the Evil guys, though that doesn't mean that Roles overshadow or underly Names. Nor that Roles could grant things that we know Names to get and do.

When William convinced the Stygian slaves to declare themselves free (and conveniently join him in the fight), that he could nigh certainly successfully do this was accredited to his Name. If someone without a Name filling the same Role would've tried it, then there was a good chance of failure, being interrupted halfway the conversation or the Stygians not aiding him to instead do something like conquer the immediate region to call their new home or move to some island after trying to enforce Jon Snow's execution. Sorry, other franchise. But success wouldn't have been certain.

We've seen this in Grem One-eye's interlude on the Vale of Red Flowers vs the Iron Prince. That how the very statistics of battle and way that things worked out were massively different for a cavalry charge (A Role) and one spearheaded by a Named. The Role would've still seen the reckless charge likely kill more Procerans than Legion soldiers as Grem's experience in these battles without Names told him, but thanks to the Name providence or Story ensured success things were vastly different despite the Roles being the same.

Or, simply put: If you throw a Named off a cliff, they're certainly not dead. Would the same apply to a Role when in the frame of the Story being woven and followed they should survive? Vague, but by my interpretation on Named powers the Role should still be bound to the statistically likely outcome of such an act for normal people. Entitled to last second save by a Named, yes, but also still bound to gravity and the effects thereof. No special powers or saving for the non-Named.

Which brings us back to where this part of the discussion started: Cat getting 2000 horsemen by her thresher Named power Story-influence. A Role can still raise an army of loyal volunteers of their own country if they're queen and have the coin, and they could get a group of these horsemen by virtue of their presence and acts and if they can pay them, of course. You can survive a fall from a cliff, depending on the how. But what we've seen here is too smooth and orchestrated in a Story in Cat's favour with an already credited to Cat power of thresher and/or making the best talent fiercely loyal to her by Name and presence to not be her Name rather than a mere Role. What we see here is someone unconscious thrown down several hundred feet, yet apparently surviving.

Which is why I think Cat still/already has a Name, even if it's not the three Aspects variant that we know. God-patroned might make completely different Named, without overuse weakening Aspects maybe.

If parts of your posts + reaction have been left out in the above, I either agree or no longer remember what we were arguing about and/or have nothing to say on it. Which, considering the length of these monster posts ought to be for the best.

Liliet

> My Gods Below, these posts have gotten sooooo long, and WordPress's word-compressing is making it only worse.... Soooooooo much scrolling.

OH MOOD

I'm copypasting this post to notepad to reply right there lmao

> But don't worry, you're being an exemplary discussion partner, especially to internet standards. I mean, you haven't called me literally Hitler once, or in more actual experience that you starting telling me what I've been saying and then giving arguments against the argument that you say I made. That's an oddly oft-occurring thing.

oh yeah I do take pride in my skill of actual reading comprehension of what the other person is saying lmao for that matter compliments on yours, you have in fact actually been reading what I'm writing too

0.0 oddly rare on the internet indeed

> On Gods, that's a fair assumption and interpretation. In programmer terms I'd phrase my interpretation as the user having to manually click for Named.exe to start running or be applied, that the program can indeed run by itself but doesn't and cannot automatically enable itself to start running. That the Gods Above and Below (which definately ought to be omniscient if the Choir of Judgement can claim such a thing) at the very least would get a 'A program is trying to run, allow it? Yes/No' notification.

Yeah that's exactly what I'm saying isn't happening. They could probably do a manual override if they really badly felt like they needed to, but it would be an abuse of mod powers and not a default feature. The entire point is that the thing runs on its own with minimal to no input.

Again, as proof I point to how there's been absolutely no divine fiat in who does or does not get Names. Only story logic.

> That the gods keep some control over the matter to prevent exploitation same as how in the story Worm it's impossible to have consistent superpower trigger events from any act or trying to control the triggering. However there is indeed nothing to solidly establish or argue this, other than Black's attestment that Named can aid the triggering of Named and that this should logically enable Gods to do the same with greater ease.

In Worm, the creatures are just that – living creatures that can still be killed by other creatures. It's entirely reasonable for them to take self-protection precautionary measures.

The beings on Creation cannot possibly do anything to harm Gods Above or Below. And their point is not self-preservation/procreation/continuing their life-cycle, but having a wager settled. The levels are completely different.

It's reasonable for Sve Noc to not give out Night without a trigger to kill anyone who holds it and take it back, to draw a parallel that closer reflects what happens in Worm.

Gods Below don't need to bother any more than Wildbow does.

> Oh yes, definately. Though perhaps we may see a Traitorous quote in book 6 that proves you wrong, him besting someone by turning them into Chancellor would be typically him. But when we're talking seriously, that would indeed be not how it works. One because you cannot have two Names, probably at least, two because the Name does indeed require the motivation, skills and talent without Name to support it.

I can actually see a Dread Emp theoretically screwing someone over by granting them one Name over the other they wanted when it's close enough ;u;

> Although I feel that this facet of the discussion has since drifted away, because even reading back two posts I'm still not sure where the dissonance between our opinions lie and what we're thus actually discussing any more??? I think it was about the requirement of favour / the attention of power rather than just act to get a Name, but we seem to have reached a mutual concession or consensus in this I think. Jay for proper discussion?

You said 'a Name requires a bestowal'. See above: I still disagree on that.

> Cat calls the entire race of feykind Named at least once, and while she's indeed not yet a fey expert at this point this chapter is kinda the first and last scene where non-noble fey appear that aren't there for a clear Role of 'Observer' or 'Soldier #325' as extras solely. From this point on, there's no real need to refer to any fey as either just 'fey' or by their court title which is likely synonymous.

This is Cat in-universe using metaphor/allegory. She doesn't mean that they're literally an entire race of Named, she means 'kind of like they are an entire race of Named'.

> More as in that the three aspect Named are the lowest bar, the only one feasible for mortals to attain. Unless of course they are literally part of a god ascending. Ratlings are still mortals and even more limited, and elves need not be that much more powerful than humans. There are other forms of Named that need bigger, older or more extraordinary triggers or patrons.

At absolutely no point has this been implied in any way.

Catherine means "the fae are kind of like if everyone was Named in how bound they are to stories", not literally "what they have is Names". If only just because we know what she bases the observation on – the fact they're acting out stories. Not any metaphysical property.

Oh, and elves are powerful enough to be able to selectively ignore a law of Creation of their choosing when they're old enough.

> Or with a bit more human level, North Korea. Even if you'd genuinely support Kim Yong and would've done so even without cultural brainwashing, then it's still not a free choice to make if you're a North-Korean who grew up in that region. The base principle of free choice as a.o. the first US amendment intends it simply cannot work when brainwashing to reach the same conclusion as no brainwashing is a factor. That's a personal interpretation of free will and its requirements.

Yeah, note how Cat did in fact get to say 'no' to a Choir and just go home after that.

> That's the sad part for Hierarch, I think they did. But that's indeed interpretation rather than fact.

Uh, when it comes to 'how they phrased it', there's not much room for interpretation. I mean what was the actual literal phrasing they used? (Please find the quote, it's in Villainous Interlude: Thunder, I just cannot look right now)

> Not outright that, rather than if the narrative description of the sensation and choice would be moot or slowing down the pace and hype it's skipped over. Like how the writer doesn't always write that the sword is being unsheathed or that you take off your coat entering a room when this would be just unnecessary narration.

That's because everyone knows a sword needs to be unsheathed or how to take off a coat. It cannot be applied to an actual metaphysical mechanic made up for this world exclusively.

> This is a bit vague by lack of chapters on it, but Sabah was born to a curse which was likely why she got the transitionary Name of Cursed. Similar to how Killian was born a half-elf and potentially could've gotten this transitionary Name because of it and the troubles she had with using magic thanks to her ancestry. I don't think they ever said Sabah was born Named at all, or that the lychantrophy she got came at the exact same time as her Name.

Sabah said that she was born to her Name. Literally. Google

"site:practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com I was born to mine", as I believe that's a close enough phrasing to a literal quote that it should show up early in the search.

> Jup, because Cat filled a later expositioned trigger of having to talk about the Bard to enable the Bard to take notice and intervene. Big difference between thought and what turned out to be a specific condition of Bard' intervention. However this is indeed a matter of interpretation and I indeed do not claim that it was definately Sve Noc with no chance of Bard. With the sisters being narrated by Cat as always being in the back of her mind and listening to her thoughts, them being the cause sounds much more reasonable than Bard being able of also reading all Named' thoughts though even on plot-relevant internal monologue.

I don't think it's the Bard's doing as in she literally read Cat's memories and selectively cut them out. I think it's a passive effect the memories themselves have. Like how Dead King did not need an occasion to read Masego's mind for his memories, for these memories by themselves to take him over as a shard of him. Like we have literal precedent for Arcadian shard memory bundles having this mechanic – activate on access.

> We hope, or rather we assume. We've seen one undead elf with a Name and if they follow fey rules of royalty meaning power they also have a lot of power.

Why would they? Fae are fae, nothing else is like fae titles. That was a very old Named elf, that he's also royalty isn't any more relevant than Hye's mom being the trainer of Emerald Swords is relevant to Hye's power, as far as we know.

Again, you're making wild assumptions about potential mechanics that don't have even a hint of evidence pointing towards them in the text. You are just... making them up. Additional complexity.

> Yes, but would people calling her Black Queen be such a drive while Grey Knight wasn't an option because no one called her that?

That discussion was of potential possible Names she might acquire in the future. If she started doing knight shit while dressed in grey, some people might have started calling her 'Grey Knight'. But it wouldn't have been enough to form a Name as there's no cultural archetype attached. Nobody would hear 'grey knight' and go 'ah yes one of those'. While people clearly have association triggers with "Black Queen" – 'ah yes, a cruel bloody queen reigning in terror'.

When I explain the Name system, I like to do it like this: "imagine you're telling a bedtime story to a child, and so instead of giving characters actual names, you just call them 'the wolf', 'the fox', 'the beggar', 'the king', 'the young knight', 'the princess' and so on".

You say the descriptor, and the audience instantly understands who the character is / what they're like.

Catherine could have been like what the descriptor 'Black Queen' implies. But she isn't, and so the story falls apart. People hear 'Black Queen' and think 'oh yeah I know what this story is', but it isn't that story. Catherine doesn't fit the Name.

Much like how Vivienne stopped being what the audience pictures when you say 'the thief'.

Or like how Amadeus stopped being what the audience pictures when you say 'the black knight'.

(To see this, it's necessary to detach yourself from the story as is and think in more general trope terms. Think video game unit monikers – what's a black knight? what's a thief? what do those do? Think anime, if you will)

> So you agree, then? (Not to put words in your mouth, dread the thought because I hate it when people do this to me. If it's not, say so. It just sounds like you agree with the point I made.) Cultural exclusivity of certain Names tied to that culture is a factor and therefore it's not how the world and those against you view BQ, it's how Callow views its Black Queen. More or less, although an important point here is that the cultural views like this are largely shared. You cannot just wave a hand and change an entire culture's mind.

> The point we were discussing was that you say that the Black Queen had to be with bloodshed, while I argue that the Name by Callow's interpretation of Black Queen might've shifted now to have different requirements. Cat end book 3 and Cat now has a vastly different reputation amongst her own people, though we indeed only see a bit and hear rumours of it so it's not all too reliable what this reputation is exactly. And this facet on her being Callow's to interpret rather than all of Calernia's (, including the hundreds of the League's delegates who see her as the bloody Black Queen Archheretic of this chapter). Callow matters, and maybe now she drow a bit.

The drow don't matter, she's "Losara Queen" and "First Under The Night" to them, they don't give a shit about her Black Queen reputation at all. Well, they matter, but they give +0 as of right now.

As for what Callow thinks of Cat, we've had two 'Callowan everyman' POVs on that – Abigail in Sarcella, who is utterly petrified in Cat's presence, and Erik (I think?) the regular young soldier, also at Sarcella. Who thinks it's fine if the queen's a bit black, they'll just rebel if she crosses the line.

That's with House Insurgent's influence already in place!

So yes, Callow still thinks of her as the original "bloody terror" archetype, same as the rest of the continent. The difference is they're willing to stand by that and in fact find it kinda awesome.

> That's a good point, that's indeed Evil's problem now biting itself in the ass. Though mining does use a lot of dynamite, and they do love the Villains that won a lot in a row and continuously in ways that stuck.

y u p

> That is very true, I had to look up what the hell Hierophant meant in our world and I don't see how it correlates to understanding of god even now. Maybe EE used hierophant by lack of better alternatives as there were very few words that would describe Masego's brand of what he does? Without edgy names like Godbinder, of course. In terms of that the Name needs to mean something understood combined with the sometimes lacklustre simple Names while the ones that are more vague likely being strongly cultural before the Name arose, I cannot argue against this point.

yeah I encountered the word approximately once outside of Guide's context. I guess maybe it means something closer to what Masego does in guideverse XD

> Though that isn't quite a point for or against Black Queen though, as she too is a title without a Name precedent to it thus formed by the interpretation. One which may still be malleable to great degrees because the cultural bed is rapidly shifting, due to Callow going from seeing Cat as an invader, to the Callowan necessary evil against the worse evil that is Proceran occupationism, to now winning and making Callow a continent-wide recognised international power.

Callow never saw Cat as an invader, only as a despised collaborationist and sellout. To invaders. But not an invader herself. (There's a difference because an invader can be strong and awesome while still being an invader, but a cowardly sellout who is strong and awesome and brave is a cognitive dissonance. That's what Amadeus was banking on) ...Though this isn't really relevant to the point either way lmao

The thing is, the Black Queen is still seen in Callow as just that – bloody and terrible and about to incinerate her enemies. Just also clever and awesome and good in the process? It makes sense in context (c) Callowans

> That's a bit of an assumption on whether Names are truly part of Roles and whether Akua is really completely correct on this. Of course people also fill Roles, f.e. Cat being Hero more often than Villain when dealing with the Evil guys, though that doesn't mean that Roles overshadow or underly Names. Nor that Roles could grant things that we know Names to get and do.

...It's also in the Prologue epigraph, the part on the origin of Names (which I regard as overall religious propaganda nonsense, but provides us with basic terminology). Never once do Roles get referenced in a way that you suggest.

I can drop the word if it's so much of a problem. What Catherine has is narrative weight. Narrative weight is ALSO something that Named have, by virtue of being Named, as a Name grants it to them automatically. Narrative weight is the underlying mechanic of how all the narrative gears turn in Guide. An event that has little narrative weight concentrated around it will happen in accordance with regular laws of physics and probability. An event that has more will find itself warped in accordance with what everyone's imagination completes it as.

Notably, in Arcadia there's no such thing as 'regular laws of physics and probability'. In Creation, narrative weight has to work against the resistance of mundanity. In Arcadia, you just get whichever outcome gets the most imagination points, even if it's only a few of them either way. If there's none, aka nobody cares, the event just doesn't happen at all. A tree that falls in the woods where no-one can hear it makes no sound, in Arcadia.

In Creation, you need to have a lot of weight to warp events. I again insist that the incident with Pallas did not require a lot of warping – the only coincidence is that she's the kind of person to get inspired by Cat and gets along with Basilia well enough for them to agree to share the army. Nobody asked the army – it's Helike, it runs on discipline.

But Cat, yes, has enough weight to count in a pattern of three. Because there are stories told about her and because there will be stories told about her centuries later, even if there's no Name that fits. A Name often goes with it, hell, there's narrative weight to the meta fact of there being a Name there period, but if it's not there it's not there.

> When William convinced the Stygian slaves to declare themselves free (and conveniently join him in the fight), that he could nigh certainly successfully do this was accredited to his Name. If someone without a Name filling the same Role would've tried it, then there was a good chance of failure, being interrupted halfway the conversation or the Stygians not aiding him to instead do something like conquer the immediate region to call their new home or move to some island after trying to enforce Jon Snow's execution. Sorry, other franchise. But success wouldn't have been certain.

Mhm. Narrative weight.

> We've seen this in Grem One-eye's interlude on the Vale of Red Flowers vs the Iron Prince. That how the very statistics of battle and way that things worked out were massively different for a cavalry charge (A Role) and one spearheaded by a Named. The Role would've still seen the reckless charge likely kill more Procerans than Legion soldiers as Grem's experience in these battles without Names told him, but thanks to the Name providence or Story ensured success things were vastly different despite the Roles being the same.

> Or, simply put: If you throw a Named off a cliff, they're certainly not dead. Would the same apply to a Role when in the frame of the Story being woven and followed they should survive? Vague, but by my interpretation on Named powers the Role should still be bound to the statistically likely outcome of such an act for normal people. Entitled to last second save by a Named, yes, but also still bound to gravity and the effects thereof. No special powers or saving for the non-Named.

You're using the word "Role" in a way that doesn't make sense to me again. Can you rephrase that without using the word?

> Which brings us back to where this part of the discussion started: Cat getting 2000 horsemen by her thresher Named power Story-influence.

* by the law of the narrative, you mean. Names are incidental to it.

> A Role can still raise an army of loyal volunteers of their own country if they're queen and have the coin, and they could get a group of these horsemen by virtue of their presence and acts and if they can pay them, of course. You can survive a fall from a cliff, depending on the how.

What you seem to mean by 'a Role' has absolutely no clear referent in the story so far.

> But what we've seen here is too smooth and orchestrated in a Story in Cat's favour with an already credited to Cat power of thresher and/or making the best talent fiercely loyal to her by Name and presence to not be her Name rather than a mere Role. What we see here is someone unconscious thrown down several hundred feet, yet apparently surviving.

Not a power. A story. A story of a thresher. It's not the same thing. The power is just Cat's charisma and momentum of object level events (she is currently gathering a coalition against the Dead goddamn King, no-one can argue with that in-universe). The additional push comes from how potent a story it is, not anything to do with Cat's metaphysical status. Any no-name in Cat's position with her skill with oratory would get the same benefits, it's a function of what's happening, not who Cat is.

> Which is why I think Cat still/already has a Name, even if it's not the three Aspects variant that we know. God-patroned might make completely different Named, without overuse weakening Aspects maybe.

Three Aspects is the only variant of Named that exists. Everything else is called something else.

> If parts of your posts + reaction have been left out in the above, I either agree or no longer remember what we were arguing about and/or have nothing to say on it. Which, considering the length of these monster posts ought to be for the best.

AGREED

Liliet

Okay, so a part of my reply got eaten by careless use of angled brackets. tl;dr: if I start acting like a superheated kettle myself, please give me a second chance by telling me I am, too.

And I'm very happy to have this discussion be civilized, too ♥

Mammon

Replying here as the option to reply has once again vanished from the discussion string.

>OH MOOD

I'm copypasting this post to notepad to reply right there lmao

So true, I myself just opened the page twice. One for the comment, the other for your post.

>as proof I point to how there's been absolutely no divine fiat in who does or does not get Names. Only story logic.

Story logic might be their fiat. Kairos's death and standing ovation returned the rumours of the Gods being an audience to be entertained. They might hold the reins to ensure that neither side ever wins by exploiting a Name surfacing or for the wrong people to get Names. What the difference and line between the Gods and Providence or Story are is vague. If providence controls the triggering of a Name, then it holds some control if only to prevent finite doom from applying too often.

The gods may be synonymous with this, as there does seem to be a rule on that they get to meddle with equal balancing measure by the other side as a result. Providence is likely this meddling by the Gods Above, though I wonder how much the Gods Below since gotten as a due for Cat's story or if they other Villains really screwed Cat over in the balancing of things. However, where the Gods end and Creation begins is quite vague indeed.

>In Worm, the creatures are just that – living creatures that can still be killed by other creatures.

The beings on Creation cannot possibly do anything to harm Gods Above or Below. And their point is not self-preservation/procreation/continuing their life-cycle, but having a wager settled. The levels are completely different.

I meant more in how in Worm, it has been found impossible (except for couldron's chemicals) to trigger a superpower on command. You cannot bring it down to 'We've got a Story of the Convenient Villain-killer that grants a Name to someone decorated for their efforts against Praes's initial attack, then gets double-knighted by our ruler and has to get any magical item that gives them brand recognition. And then they are nigh assured victory against Villains with Praes' initial victory that got the Named attention as the first in the Pattern of Three. There's always someone befitting condition one, we collect items for condition three and I can do condition two, so we've got making this Named down to a science now.'

This could be a matter of the Gods holding some control or fiat, to prevent the simulation that they're running from running itself by its internal intelligent beings finding the bugs and exploits of the simulation and exploiting them to the utmost. A computer simulation with active AI does requires some oversight until the simulation has been proven perfect enough. Which likely wouldn't involve Named at all.

>You said 'a Name requires a bestowal'. See above: I still disagree on that.

Well, I suppose that is a matter of different interpretations and not yet enough by EE specified truth on the matter to make it anything but. I respect your opinion, and can see the possibility that it will indeed be proven to be so in Book 6.

>This is Cat in-universe using metaphor/allegory. She doesn't mean that they're literally an entire race of Named, she means 'kind of like they are an entire race of Named'.

Which begs the question of where the confines and definition of a Name starts and stops. The noble titles are technically Names, though of another world. The fey are heavily bound to Story, as Named are. Their titles are always capitalised, as Names are. They operate by a different system, but they are still Named. Not three Aspect Named as we know them, but not quite non-Named like demons either.

>Yeah, note how Cat did in fact get to say 'no' to a Choir and just go home after that.

No, think even more basic. Do not look at A Practical Guide to Evil, look at the definition and interpretation of free will and making a choice. If you would've made the 'correct' choice anyway by your own will and reasoning, but the situation is so that anything but that choice would've ended badly or wasn't an option, would it still be free will and a choice?

If you get a choice of Yes or No and choosing No results in your death or the program indefinitely giving you a choice of whether you're sure or the option to come back to choose Yes yet being trapped in the previous area until you choose Yes, is it really a choice?

My opinion: No matter if your answer would be Yes without even knowing that No wasn't an option, the mindwashing aura of the Hashmallim inherently violates the concept of free will and make it so that their choices aren't actually choices on a philosophical level of the interpretation of free will and free choice. Even though William would've said yes regardless, technically he didn't get a free will choice. Cat didn't play by this scenario, she simply broke the rules by killing the one asking the question, stealing his key and walking through the gate without accepting the conditions.

>Sabah said that she was born to her Name.
Literally. Google
site:practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com I was born to mine",

Hm, nope. Google gives me nothing but an annoyingly consistent trend to only show book 5 results. And searching for it with this site's search option gives every chapter that uses the word "I", a.k.a. all of them. And I think it's trolling me by just giving the latest chapters regardless of what I search for, because looking for other terms too give me the last chapter right away.

Reading her Extra Chapter Beast, Sabah seems to suggest that she wasn't a Name rather than just a Role before, and reading through the first book for this bit of knowlege is proving annoyingly fruitless. The wiki says its a Name, but that could be an assumption. Now I'm even more confused on Cursed, as even it being a Name is now pulled into question. The only thing I could confirm about her was that she was born to a blood ritual's curse that a Warlock made, which shouldn't be an automatic Name as that would make all of her siblings and kids Cursed too.

>Like how Dead King did not need an occasion to read Masego's mind for his memories, for these memories by themselves to take him over as a shard of him. Like we have literal precedent for Arcadian shard memory bundles having this mechanic – activate on access.

I took from Tikoloshe's theories on the Dead King's continued survival that it wasn't the Arcadian knowledge rather than the knowledge of DK's apotheosis itself that was trapped. You read the book he wrote (which ought to be regular paper or being warded and analysed by the reader before reading it) and try to reach lichdom yourself using the knowledge and rituals therein described, and you play straight into the Dead King's hands giving him another powerful arcanist body to work with. He likely travelled to Arcadia to add these memories into his own echoes too and maybe even changed the echoes to encourage people to find him and extract the knowledge, probably. It's not necessarily anything that had to do with Arcadian knowledge stealing.

>Why would they? Fae are fae, nothing else is like fae titles. That was a very old Named elf, that he's also royalty isn't any more relevant than Hye's mom being the trainer of Emerald Swords is relevant to Hye's power, as far as we know.

Read back, found this little tidbit. "You bailed out of Creation is what you did," she said. "You took your pretty little kingdom and fled right into Arcadia. And boy, was she pissed when she realized it. Wiped out two cities in rage.", Book 2 epilogue. And the confusing way that the Deodraithe and people have been talking about them with f.e. "There is no relation between drow and elves, mind you," the shade noted. "I've read the former take the sobriquet of 'dark elves' quite badly, given that of the two they are the race truly native to Calernia."

I stand corrected, the elves apparently came out of Arcadia the second time around, their kingdom partly or kinda sits in Arcadia and William got chased by fey hunters in the Bloom that was also Arcadia or fey monsters somehow, but they indeed do not originally come out of Arcadia. Kinda. So I stand corrected, elves are not of fey ancestry.

>That discussion was of potential possible Names she might acquire in the future. If she started doing knight shit while dressed in grey, some people might have started calling her 'Grey Knight'. But it wouldn't have been enough to form a Name as there's no cultural archetype attached. Nobody would hear 'grey knight' and go 'ah yes one of those. While people clearly have association triggers with "Black Queen" – 'ah yes, a cruel bloody queen reigning in terror'.

Now I'm going to have to quote something back at you that you said: "Again, you're making wild assumptions about potential mechanics that don't have even a hint of evidence pointing towards them in the text. You are just... making them up. Additional complexity." You're being just as guilty of this from time to time. Like now.

Not only does Grey Knight (in a world with a White and Black Knight with some pretty obvious archetypes attached to them) sound like a very obvious archetype for all to understand, it's even more obvious than Black Queen being an archetype of a Queen reigning with terror. Black Queen without context could also refer to a tragically hated or martyred queen, while the Red Queen would be a much more obvious archetype reference to the kind of queen you're describing. (Even without Alice in Wonderland.)

There's no proof on this claim, and vaguer names like Mirror Knight and Painted Knife contradict this base necessity of an archetype having to be this obvious and not being filled in by a culture's interpretation of it. Mirror Knight likely refers to Perseus who slayed Medusa with a mirror shield, though 'mirror knight' would hardly be this greek hero's archetype descriptor. Same for Ashen Priestess not directly referring to healing priests of Good, Hedge Wizard, Myrmidon, Red Fox, Skein, etc. Even more general names like Sentinel and Pilgrim leave something to the imagination rather than being an archetype without cultural historical background being necessary. Many names like the Fortunate Fool or Lone Swordsman indeed refer directly to the archetype that is very clear to understand, but it's not a necessity as we've seen.

Even if Grey Knight wouldn't be an obvious thing to understand once you see the Named and they introduce themselves to you, just their reputation should allow you to make the Named and the Name synonymous at least within that generation. Cat is a Queen and she does dress in black after a long reputation of being dressed in black as part of her recognisable traits as Squire. Saying Queen + Black = Black Queen is her name and might be her Name is pretty obvious, even if people weren't already calling her that without the Name.

Granted, Pilgrim holding the Grey part of the balance as we've seen in the latest chapter might've prevented any other Grey from arising (despite Pilgrim not really being the neutral party of balance), if saturation and Story balance are facets of Creation granting Names. So Grey Knight might've been impossible, but not for the reasons you're mentioning.

In this, Black Queen being not bloody (Red Queen) but exactly the kind of queen that Cat is being right now could just as easily support her Name of Black Queen.

Mammon

Okay, for some reason my reply decided to post itself as I was writing it. Odd. At least I didn't lose all this writing to it suddenly collapsing itself. Continuing on...

In this, Black Queen being not bloody (Red Queen) but exactly the kind of queen that Cat is being right now could just as easily support her Name of Black Queen. The queen that isn't glorious or noble or forgiving, but the one that does what has to be done and gets the win when mere shining heroes aren't enough. The Villain redeemed fighting with the heroes, as Cat planned and Pilgrim feared during their first real peace talks and her first admission letter to the Grand Alliance.

>Catherine could have been like what the descriptor 'Black Queen' implies. But she isn't, and so the story falls apart. People hear 'Black Queen' and think 'oh yeah I know what this story is', but it isn't that story. Catherine doesn't fit the Name.

Unless, see above, she does. Interpretation of Names and archetypes, it's vaguer that you make them out to be. In this, your assumptions are as unbased as you claim of mine. Especially when we consider Roles, which would take a lot of wind out of your argument's sails as what you're saying should be more the Role that someone holds in the Story rather than the Name that they hold as an individual.

Names do seem to be a lot more flexible than we give them credit for. The first Tyrant created Helike and made it persist, Kairos chaotically destroys. They inherently differ in their archetype while claiming the same Name. Name and Role seem to have some synergy, but the Name isn't purely and solely the archetype rather than a broad descriptor that the individual, the situation and their Role in the story make them to be. Even for one person, the likes of Ranger and Archer can decide whether they fall in the archetype of good or evil to be considered not Neutral but good as the Vagrant Spear showed.

>More or less, although an important point here is that the cultural views like this are largely shared. You cannot just wave a hand and change an entire culture's mind.

Yes, but my point is, Cat hasn't waved her hand yet since book 3 we've been seeing that Callow, her culture and bed of her Name probably, has been changing its mind about her. In Book 1 she was still a Praesi born in Callow, in Book 3 she was the lesser evil necessary for now and established by Praes as a vassal queen, but now Callow doesn't distrust her like they did before. Even their House of Light rejected the other Houses of Light and declared themselves Insurgent to reject the claim of Archheretic to be Cat.

We've been hearing rumours of Callow shifting all the more in Cat's favour and the culture of Callow seeing her more and more as a saviour and true accepted queen, rather than the bloody warmonger that they still saw her as in Book 3. We've been seeing more and more hints that Callow is changing its mind on Cat decisively these last two books. The very requirement that you're claiming is being fulfilled as seen in EE's writing.

>As for what Callow thinks of Cat, we've had two 'Callowan everyman' POVs on that – Abigail and Erik (I think?)

Big difference between Abigail Who Balks at Success and your everyday Callowan, and a just as big difference between meeting Cat face to face and hearing of her through rumours. Remember that even the Levant leaders thought that the entire fey invasion in Callow were but bolstered rumours, so imagine how little the people really hear of everything going on. What they hear is Procer trying to annex Callow which they balk at, and Cat saying Nope to that. They hear of Procer proclaiming Cat the Arch-heretic, and their own House declaring themselves independent from the rest, obviously hearing House Insurgent's view on this first and foremost.

As we can take from the banners and the adding of crow wings and such to them, voluntarily and with praise, the soldiers actually love and believe in Cat. Moreso than I'd say the Callowans back home do. There's a delay between what people should think of her and them thinking it, but Callow is little by little warming up more and more to Cat as not just the bloody invader they need. The PoV from the actual peasants from book 4 prologue:

"The hero was almost nauseated. They said the villain ruling Callow had nailed hundreds to crosses after slaying her rival, made them grisly ornaments along the road. The merchant should have been appalled, but if anything he sounded grudgingly approving."

"Aye, and the Black Queen killed her dead," Albert grunted. "She's a hard one, make no mistake, but these are bad times. Hard is what we need. Even Jehan the Wise hung himself some princes. Seven and one, like in the song."

And that was mere chapters after Cat rejected the Black Queen position you're talking about. That was when the most recent fighting had still found place in Callow, rather than Callowans hearing of victories and politics without it destroying their back yard and killing their children. Now add a year, dwarven coin lessening war taxes (taxes are inevitably the most intrinsic part of a monarch's reputation amongst its people), the Wasteland immigration and influence being lessened if not completely cut off, Cat's Callow being a signatory of the Grand Alliance rather than at risk of Proceran annexation, etc.

>Callow never saw Cat as an invader, only as a despised collaborationist and sellout.

Potato potato, pronounced differently. They saw Cat as the Black Knight finding a Callowan to be a Praesi leader for them while not inherently being a foreigner. They saw her as a Praesi lapdog when she first came in said to be their new queen, leading wasteland soldiers and bringing tower mintage gold. Whatever the case, this has been gradually changing, and massively once Callow and Praes were no longer vassalaged, in federation or even with a trade agreement.

>Never once do Roles get referenced in a way that you suggest.

Or yours. See how that might be a bit of a troublesome point when you're considering your interpretation of Roles to be supported by the story when they haven't been. Remember: I'm the one claiming that Roles cannot give you Name-power threshed armies by providence just because they are your Role, with you claiming that they can by disagreeing and opposing this. But I've yet to see supporting proof for this.

Now, with the new chapter it's been confirmed that Cat indeed does not have a Name at this moment, contrary to previous chapters being vaguer in terminology, so as it turns out providence does give 2000 horsemen to unnamed with a neat bow wrapped around in it in the form of no mass desertion and unruliness. But before that chapter, there was no such confirmed event yet.

Calling it narrative weight would've helped a bit pre-epilogue, because Roles are an actual thing in the guideverse and you were attaching unfounded traits and abilities to them, though I still lament that the epilogue now confirms that Named aren't quite as special in bending Creation as they were initially said to be. We've seen Grem's PoV saying how it's different with Named. We've seen other cases where something never works when Named are involved. But now, Named just seem a lot less special and important to me. They're just a convenient power-up now, not a vital ingredient of Creation using Story at all. Why even have Names in your simulation if that's the case?

>You're using the word "Role" in a way that doesn't make sense to me again. Can you rephrase that without using the word?

Going back to my Mario and Peach example from a comment before, a Story would have important Roles (like damsel in distress) that wouldn't have to be Names. Those would be Roles, and Names when involved in a story would also get Roles. In a pattern of three, one Named gets the Role of initial victor, while the other Named gets the Role of inevitable victor.

In this mess, Cordelia holds the Role of ruler of Procer. But this wouldn't entitle them to Name-related providence and abilities. If Kairos tells Cordelia that she stands no chance of victory, her power wouldn't increase as it did for Saint. A Role is a part in a Story that can befall a Named or non-Named, and by interaction with a Named the Role ought to follow the pattern by this Named's influence. Similarly, a Named has the providence of swooping in at the last second, but unless they too have a Name a Role wouldn't be entitled to survive and hold out until the last second when attacked.

If there's no Name on either side, providence shouldn't see to the Roles working perfectly beyond the abilities of their natural talents and actions, and neither Pallas nor Cat have Names. Making it odd that Cat managed to do this without a Name, as it goes against previously established effects of Named on Creation and Stories when they are apparently not actually necessary to be part of it. Returning me to the nihillistic conclusion of Why even have Names in your simulation if that's the case?

If this happened in a story without Named like Lord of the Rings, sure. That's called plot and no one escapes it, just ask Deadpool. But in the guideverse, I lament that plot also exists when Story is a real law of Narrative in this universe. Named used to be the explanation, but apparently they're just an unnecessary addition to Creation's workings. Is it really too much to ask for things like free will, individuality, imperfect information gathering and funding to apply when Named aren't involved, in a story that has shown us exactly those things when they fit in worldbuilding and Cat's kingdom management issues?

Liliet

On reread of my post,

> Names are a meta-level thing that reflects object level facts. A person's attitude towards their Name is a meta-level fact per se Nah, that's me confusing myself. A person's attitude towards anything, including their own Name, is an object level fact. It gets weight on a scale, like any other fact. I suspect in any Name with an adjective 'reluctant' (we haven't seen those but that doesn't mean they don't exist), it would in fact count in favor of the Name, not against it, if the person didn't want it...

Mammon

Don't worry, I often read back my uneditable posts around here and don't even know what I meant myself. I know the feeling. And yes, I can see that being the case.

On the below, reading it back I can see this being hard to understand by my vague phrasing so allow me to rewrite:

>Yeah, I'm going with the terminology used in-universe and in WoG. Note how an elf Named we've met has worked the exact same way as 'human, orc and goblin' Named do – three Aspects and all. And a ratling Named, too. You'd think if anyone would have a different system... but nope, species appears to be entirely irrelevant.

I meant as in that the three aspect Named are the lowest bar, the only one feasible for mortals to attain. Unless of course they are literally part of a god ascending, like Cat. Ratlings are still mortals and even more limited, and elves need not be that much more powerful than humans. There might be other subsections, kinds and designs of Named that need bigger, older or more extraordinary triggers or patrons. Or even that at a certain point you get so powerful that you ascend Name limitations and can start designing and redesigning them as we may have seen with Saint.

>Cursed. Sabah was born to it.

This is a bit vague by lack of chapters on it, but Sabah was born to a curse which was likely why she got the transitional Name of Cursed. Similar to how Killian was born a half-elf and potentially could've gotten this transitional Name because of it and the troubles she had with using magic thanks to her ancestry. I don't think they ever said Sabah was born Named at all, or that the lychantropy she got came at the exact same time as her Name.

Addition needed for clarification: Killian was an example of in-universe already cursed and powered beings without a Name, and with the Wasteland's nonsense and experiments (such as the intelligent tigers still living around there) the lychantropy is likely a 'normal' thing there as in not necessarily Name-related.

Liliet

> I meant as in that the three aspect Named are the lowest bar, the only one feasible for mortals to attain. Unless of course they are literally part of a god ascending, like Cat. Ratlings are still mortals and even more limited, and elves need not be that much more powerful than humans. There might be other subsections, kinds and designs of Named that need bigger, older or more extraordinary triggers or patrons. Or even that at a certain point you get so powerful that you ascend Name limitations and can start designing and redesigning them as we may have seen with Saint.

Named who get domains are still Named. (And what Saint had was in technical terms a domain)

The mechanic you're suggesting here shows no evidence of existing.

Liliet

Also on reread,

> If you're going into 'the writer is actually secretly wrong about their own magic system's terminology and mechanics' I'm afraid I cannot help you there.

Amended to "if you're going into that, that's a very strong claim that you'll need to back up with strong evidence that the system is internally inconsistent the way the writer formulates it".

Liliet

P.S. Sabah had gone to the orc god to gain control over her werewolf powers, not to get a Name. That part was an unpleasant surprise.

Liliet

My turn to reply to an earlier post to make it easier to read!

> So true, I myself just opened the page twice. One for the comment, the other for your post.

I recommend my method, where I answer as I read~

> Story logic might be their fiat.

Too consistent. It's not fiat if it's consistent and people can exploit it as known mechanisms.

> Kairos's death and standing ovation returned the rumours of the Gods being an audience to be entertained.

They evidently are! What kind of audience gets entertained by seeing the same thing over and over again though? You'd think the minute people caught on to a consistent way to get a Name they'd change it to shake it up... but no, the mechanisms ARE CONSISTENT.

> They might hold the reins to ensure that neither side ever wins by exploiting a Name surfacing or for the wrong people to get Names.

You seem to have an impression that there is a "wrong" way for a simulation experiment to go.

As for not having it end prematurely, that seems to be Bard's job.

> What the difference and line between the Gods and Providence or Story are is vague. If providence controls the triggering of a Name, then it holds some control if only to prevent finite doom from applying too often.

?

Providence/story/narrative is an automatic mechanism. It was set up by the Gods because everything in Creation was. And then they pressed the 'start' button and sat down to watch as it unfolds on its own.

"The influence of the gods tends to be on the subtle side" (c) WoE. Picking who gets a Name and who doesn't isn't subtle.

As for the difference, the terminology usage seems to be that providence is specifically positive luck, things turning out your way, and more specifically than that things turning out your way because of a heroic or pseudo-heroic story (the heroic/pseudo-heroic thing is the part where characters start to differ in how they use the word).

> The gods may be synonymous with this, as there does seem to be a rule on that they get to meddle with equal balancing measure by the other side as a result. Providence is likely this meddling by the Gods Above, though I wonder how much the Gods Below since gotten as a due for Cat's story or if the other Villains really screwed Cat over in the balancing of things. However, where the Gods end and Creation begins is quite vague indeed.

Providence is non-sentient. It can be cheated. It's a force, not a living creature's will.

> I meant more in how in Worm, it has been found impossible (except for couldron's chemicals) to trigger a superpower on command.

Oh yes, it hasn't. Meanwhile in Creation it is absolutely possible.

> You cannot bring it down to 'We've got a Story of the Convenient Villain-killer that grants a Name to someone decorated for their efforts against Praes's initial attack, then gets double-knighted by our ruler and has to get any magical item that gives them brand recognition. And then they are nigh assured victory against Villains with Praes' initial victory that got the Named attention as the first in the Pattern of Three. There's always someone befitting condition one, we collect items for condition three and I can do condition two, so we've got making this Named down to a science now.'

Actually that's exactly how the more deft story-weavers, particularly those on a heroic side that don't get screwed over by hubris the minute they relax automatically, think. "Alright so my companions bantering makes them comic relief and therefore basically invincible, these are the ones I'll be sending on risky missions then".

As for getting a Name specifically, that's how Akua did it. "Okay so to get a Name of Diabolist I need to fit the story of a diabolist. What do diabolists do? I'm going to do this, this and that, hopefully it'll be enough, if not I'll just keep pouring oil into the fire until it triggers".

Oh and of course the inevitable "how do I get the Name of Warlock? Oh simple, kill the previous one". "How do I get the Name of Dread Emperor/Empress? Oh simple, claim the Tower from the previous one". Etc.

> "And then they are nigh assured victory against Villains with Praes' initial victory that got the Named attention as the first in the Pattern of Three"

For a pattern of three there needs to be a rivalry. That said, those have been planned out and exploited?

This could be a matter of the Gods holding some control or fiat, to prevent the simulation that they're running from running itself by its internal intelligent beings finding the bugs and exploits of the simulation and exploiting them to the utmost. A computer simulation with active AI does requires some oversight until the simulation has been proven perfect enough. Which likely wouldn't involve Named at all.

> "There's always someone befitting condition one, we collect items for condition three and I can do condition two, so we've got making this Named down to a science now."

Kairos made himself a Hierarch.

I'm serious.

People do this in-universe. People have done this on-screen.

> Which begs the question of where the confines and definition of a Name starts and stops. The noble titles are technically Names, though of another world.

They aren't, technically or not.

> The fey are heavily bound to Story, as Named are. Their titles are always capitalised, as Names are.

And? Most noble titles are capitalized in this story. Cat's a Countess of Marchford, not a countess of Marchford. Anne Kendall was Baroness Dormer, not baroness Dormer. Cordelia is Prince of Rhenia, Princess of Salia and First Prince, not prince of Rhenia, princess of Salia and first prince.

As for 'heavily bound to story, as Named are' – yes. They have this in common with Named. Like how goats give milk, similarly to cows. Doesn't make goats a variety of cow.

> They operate by a different system, but they are still Named. Not three Aspect Named as we know them, but not quite non-Named like demons either.

How exactly did demons enter this???

> If you get a choice of Yes or No and choosing No results in your death or the program indefinitely giving you a choice of whether you're sure or the option to come back to choose Yes yet being trapped in the previous area until you choose Yes, is it really a choice?

I'm confused. Who is getting trapped where?

> My opinion: No matter if your answer would be Yes without even knowing that No wasn't an option, the mindwashing aura of the Hashmallim inherently violates the concept of free will and make it so that their choices aren't actually choices on a philosophical level of the interpretation of free will and free choice.

For the regular people, yes. For the heroes, the aura actually doesn't do that. It just doesn't. The effect isn't on. There isn't anything for Hashmallim to brainwash them WITH. They don't have the imperative.

Overall though I can agree that the Hashmallim specifically don't give their chosen champions much choice once they've been chosen. Less of a 'getting trapped' thing and more of a 'entering a cutscene' thing lmao. How was it relevant to the overall discussion again?

> Hm, nope. Google gives me nothing but an annoyingly consistent trend to only show book 5 results.

RIP. Let me try... Okay yeah I definitely misremembered the phrasing.

...i tried again with 'sabah name born' and there we have it:

> "I was born into mine, back when I was the Cursed," she grunted.

...this was quoted in comments to Beast lmao but thankfully with indication of actual chapter. Fuller quote:

> "Some kind of Name thing for you," she gravelled. "Squires are so bleeding dramatic. Getting Amadeus settled into his Role was a pain too, though, no reason you'd be different."

>

> I raised an eyebrow. "Your Name was easier?"

>

> "I was born into mine, back when I was the Cursed," she grunted. "By the time I became the Captain, no one was dumb enough to challenge me for it."

> Reading her Extra Chapter Beast, Sabah seems to suggest that she wasn't a Name rather than just a Role before, and reading through the first book for this bit of knowlege is proving annoyingly fruitless.

...so I also remembered that there was a WoG on the topic.

> The Cursed was a transitional Name, much like Apprentice and Squire. Her Role eventually matured into a different Name, that of "the Captain".

aaaand there's more on the subject of Names and Roles right there!

> Roles don't change, only Names do. Though aspects do change when the Name does, so there would be a difference in powers.

...I'm going to search for every mention of "Role" here.

> The Squire Role isn't always Evil, no. It largely depends on who they'll be squiring for, though anyone squiring for Black is going to be Evil.

> There's no Role that's outright called Hero, much like there is none called Villain. Roles do change the appearance of the person they belong to. Usually the changes are minor, and they always reflect what the person expects someone with that Role should look like. We've already seen that Black is a lot older than what he looks like (partially because Names hinder aging, partially because he has the same mindset as he did when he had that appearance) and Captain is actually a little older.

> The influence of the gods is usually on the subtle side. You're right that Evil Roles usually let people do whatever they feel like doing – that's because they're, in that sense, championing the philosophy of their gods. Every victory for Evil is a proof that that philosophy is the right path for Creation to take. Nearly all Names on the bad side of the fence have a component that involves forcing their will or perspective on others (the most blatant examples of this being Black and Empress Malicia, who outright have aspects relating to rule in their Names). There's a reason that Black didn't so much as bat an eyelid when Catherine admitted to wanting to change how Callow is run. From his point of view, that kind of ambition is entirely natural. Good Roles have strict moral guidelines because those Names are, in fact, being guided: those rules are instructions from above on how to behave to make a better world. Any victory for Good that follows from that is then a proof of concept for the Heavens being correct in their side of the argument

> "Rashid was part of a Praesi faction that believes in old school villainy." While there are certainly advantages to going the old way – it usually feeds into Roles – there are also drawbacks. Usually lethal ones."

> A Role is the function of a Name in the pattern (as in, a Tyrant is meant to rule and a Thief to steal).

OH LOOK WE HAVE AN ACTUAL DEFINITION

> Catherine wasn't born a mage, and will never learn to use sorcery. Using Legion mages as a point of reference is a bad idea, though, since the entire point of legionary magic is for every one of them to be able to do a few specific spells so they can be used en masse – a mage or warlock having gone through a proper apprenticeship would make them look like incompetent flunkies. The Name tricks displayed so far are something pretty much every Named can do with a little training, save for the necromancy – which is for Evil Names only, and not all of them. The ward recognition isn't even a "trick" per se: any halfway decent spellcaster could do the same. Individuals with Roles are more sensitive to power as a whole, but it should be noted that if Warlock had decided to hide his wards Catherine would never have noticed them. As for the more general comment, keep in mind that a Name isn't really a specific set of powers so much as a pool of energy that can be used in a myriad of ways. The specific tricks characters can use are more a representation of local traditions more than hard limits. The real limiter on Catherine is that there's only so much power she can call on. That's the whole point of Aspects: they allow you to dig deeper into the well. More than that, as a Squire she's closer to the bottom than the top of the totem pole. She could put forward every scrap of power at her disposal and it still wouldn't be a match for what say Malicia or Warlock can do on an off day.

> We've seen the Empire – more particularly Black – isn't above manipulating public perception but fundamentally warping a culture in the way you're describing would be very, very hard. Keep in mind that this is not a modern era. People travel by horse, and while scrying can make for instant communication word spreads very slowly. And even if somehow someone figured out a way to do it, you're missing the major consequence: the people powered by the old stories, which is the entirety of the cast, would be at risk of losing their own Roles. Names don't exist in a vacuum.

> Adjutant is a Name without precedent in the Empire. No one quite knows what the Role behind it is, or whether or not it's transitional – though some individuals well-versed in Name lore have guesses.

...so I think this should conclude our argument on terminology actually. You really should read through the WoG document, it's stickied on reddit.

> I took from Tikoloshe's theories on the Dead King's continued survival that it wasn't the Arcadian knowledge rather than the knowledge of DK's apotheosis itself that was trapped. You read the book he wrote (which ought to be regular paper or being warded and analysed by the reader before reading it) and try to reach lichdom yourself using the knowledge and rituals therein described, and you play straight into the Dead King's hands giving him another powerful arcanist body to work with. He likely travelled to Arcadia to add these memories into his own echoes too and maybe even changed the echoes to encourage people to find him and extract the knowledge, probably. It's not necessarily anything that had to do with Arcadian knowledge stealing.

Masego didn't read the book and didn't try the rituals. He got Dead King riding his mind just by accessing his memories. Tikoloshe's theories are irrelevant when we have actual precedent happening right there.

> I stand corrected, the elves apparently came out of Arcadia the second time around, their kingdom partly or kinda sits in Arcadia and William got chased by fey hunters in the Bloom that was also Arcadia or fey monsters somehow, but they indeed do not originally come out of Arcadia. Kinda. So I stand corrected, elves are not of fey ancestry.

^^

> Now I'm going to have to quote something back at you that you said: "Again, you're making wild assumptions about potential mechanics that don't have even a hint of evidence pointing towards them in the text. You are just... making them up. Additional complexity." You're being just as guilty of this from time to time. Like now.

>

> Not only does Grey Knight (in a world with a White and Black Knight with some pretty obvious archetypes attached to them) sound like a very obvious archetype for all to understand, it's even more obvious than Black Queen being an archetype of a Queen reigning with terror. Black Queen without context could also refer to a tragically hated or martyred queen, while the Red Queen would be a much more obvious archetype reference to the kind of queen you're describing. (Even without Alice in Wonderland.)

What do you mean I'm making things up? I'm quoting Word of God to you. Erratic's the one making things up, we're the ones discussing them, yes? I'm just confused at this point.

Liliet

Ooops, failed to delete a paragraph I wasn't replying to. Shit.

Mammon

>Too consistent. It's not fiat if it's consistent and people can exploit it as known mechanisms.

>They evidently are! What kind of audience gets entertained by seeing the same thing over and over again though? You'd think the minute people caught on to a consistent way to get a Name they'd change it to shake it up... but no, the mechanisms ARE CONSISTENT.

>You seem to have an impression that there is a "wrong" way for a simulation experiment to go.

As for not having it end prematurely, that seems to be Bard's job.

>Providence/story/narrative is an automatic mechanism. It was set up by the Gods because everything in Creation was. And then they pressed the 'start' button and sat down to watch as it unfolds on its own.

"The influence of the gods tends to be on the subtle side" (c) WoE. Picking who gets a Name and who doesn't isn't subtle.

As for the difference, the terminology usage seems to be that providence is specifically positive luck, things turning out your way, and more specifically than that things turning out your way because of a heroic or pseudo-heroic story (the heroic/pseudo-heroic thing is the part where characters start to differ in how they use the word).

Once again I'm going to have to reflect your words back at you. You're making assumptions that are ungrounded presented as if they're facts. That the gods are absolute hands-off on a simulation they're running, that the mechanisms are consistent, that there is no hand of the gods in Name-granting at all. All of these are your interpretation without hard evidence while you claim that there is.

That Names are absolutely consistent. Assumption. That the mechanisms are consistent. Definately an assumption. That the influence of the gods is subtle as in; they don't interfere at all with Names and events at all while providence isn't the finger of Above on the scales. Assumption.

My point is, there is no such consistent mechanisms when we look at realistic worldbuilding. Especially considering that this is written by EE who doesn't leave such glaring plotheoles in worldbuilding like that societies should've upscaled and optimised the death weapons they have. If the mechanisms were really consistent, then the majority of Names would be with a clear recipe of creation and strengthening. Not bound to balancing the sides and Named saying it's literally the will of the Gods that these Names and their power came to be (Hanno about Mirror Knight Winter II).

If the mechanics were really so consistent that they are exploitable, some Names would quite literally appear every generation months after the Named's death because the people since gamed its awakening. Cultures would have turned to a Name-farming war machine after just one Named who knows how Names and Stories work, or copy it from a country that does.

Instead, we see a world that remains entertaining and ever shifting because Names aren't exploitable like this. Cat's White Knight trigger and Hanno's are vastly different, because the trigger of White Knight is evidently one that can come in various ways. (I'm going to assume that Cat's WK wouldn't have somehow involved a boatride.) That mechanism is definately not consistent. Below has a few consistent Due's, but in the creation of Names there are no such hard mechanics as you're assuming there are.

>>> I meant more in how in Worm, it has been found impossible (except for couldron's chemicals) to trigger a superpower on command.

>Oh yes, it hasn't. Meanwhile in Creation it is absolutely possible.

Except it is not because we're not talking about any Good Named that is a consistent presence farmed every generation or every conflict. We don't have a King's Guard who's an always present Named guardian of the First Prince, made by Procer propaganda and then always around to protect whomever holds the throne of Salia.

"Heroes were rare in Procer, at best a once in a generation appearance, and they were treated with distant awe." Chapter Warden I. Doesn't sound like Procer has the slightest idea of how to consistently farm Named, which directly contradicts that these would be consistent mechanics like the 200 Axioms being hard rules for Named engagement. Yet when things are happening that require the ascending of Names as current events do, Named pop up like mushrooms.

Cat killed 5 groups of Named between Book 3 and 4, and Amadeus even more before Book 1. Because these semi-chaotically appeared in reaction to their presence yet according to realistic growth of power once ascended, not according to hard, consistent mechanics. Note: Chaos is chaotic, but on a large scale follows lawful patterns. See diffusion or entrophy. If Names were bound to a hard mechanic, then Amadeus would've timed the emergence of Named to the week precise and known which Names they'd be. Instead we're shown a general reactive nature of Names according to an only partially consistent emergence, which is chaotic rather than consistent.

>Actually that's exactly how the more deft story-weavers, particularly those on a heroic side that don't get screwed over by hubris the minute they relax automatically, think. "Alright so my companions bantering makes them comic relief and therefore basically invincible, these are the ones I'll be sending on risky missions then".

Big difference on the making of Named and the general cliches of already-Named from the Axioms. Falling off a cliff meaning assured survival is a big difference to a regular person doing a thing to ensure that they become Named at all. You are assuming that getting a Name follows the same exploitable nature of what already Named would enjoy using defined cliches of providence and Story that they are bound to, there's no hard basis for this.

Akua was already Heiress, a transitionary Name intended to turn into a different one. Their Name ensures that they will get a Name if they live long enough, it's not the same as a non-Named getting a Name by defined mechanisms to follow. Big difference between a Claimant or Transition Name and getting a Name at all. And getting the Name of a Praesi is your Due, the gimmick of Below, definately not an easy feat. As we see no such thing for the Heroes, this is more a Below thing than a Named thing.

>For a pattern of three there needs to be a rivalry. That said, those have been planned out and exploited?

Yes, but you're kinda taking something from this which isn't at all the argument. Gaming the system so that someone is assured to come into a Name and already be in a Pattern of Three doing this was my point, not that the Pattern of Three itself is an unprecedented exploit.

>Kairos made himself a Hierarch. I'm serious. People do this in-universe. People have done this on-screen.

Kairos has Wish, he's quite literally cheating. And he's a Named using the "I'm a Villain, so I'm unbeatable during the first step of my plan." part, which we've also seen Akua do. I'm not saying that Named once created cannot exploit the system, I'm saying that making Named isn't allowed to be exploited. Kairos cheated and followed the rules of Below as the closest thing to a high priest to them on the continent, and even then there's the chance that Hierarch was an accident or the way that his wish took shape in an to him unknown direction while Kairos would claim it was all according to plan. That's part of scheming villain 101.

>And? Most noble titles are capitalized in this story. Cat's a Countess of Marchford, not a countess of Marchford. Anne Kendall was Baroness Dormer, not baroness Dormer. Cordelia is Prince of Rhenia, Princess of Salia and First Prince, not prince of Rhenia, princess of Salia and first prince.

As for 'heavily bound to story, as Named are' – yes.
They have this in common with Named. Like how goats give milk, similarly to cows. Doesn't make goats a variety of cow.

It does make both goats and cows mammals, which are amongst others defined by lactating. You keep accusing me of calling all Named bovines, while I'm saying that bovines are just a subsection of the larger group of mammals.

Titles in our grammar are already capitalised by usage of proper English, so that's more a matter of EE not bastardising the language for non-fey titles. Doesn't mean that the titles of the fey aren't also Names despite them following much to all of the Name patterns except Aspects.

>How exactly did demons enter this???

They didn't.

>For the regular people, yes. For the heroes, the aura actually doesn't do that. It just doesn't. The effect isn't on. There isn't anything for Hashmallim to brainwash them WITH. They don't have the imperative.

Before he became the Lone Swordsman, William was very much not a Named. So he was still a regular person.

Even assuming that what you're writing here isn't all completely assumption, which I think it is. I don't recall anything defined about the Hashmallim aura in this regard to support your words, so again you too are making blind assumptions a dozen. We don't know and haven't been told whether the Hashmallim can turn off their aura just like that.

>Overall though I can agree that the Hashmallim specifically don't give their chosen champions much choice once they've been chosen. Less of a 'getting trapped' thing and more of a 'entering a cutscene' thing lmao. How was it relevant to the overall discussion again?

This started when I made an off-hand comment on our argument of whether getting a Name is always voluntary that, by my opinion of what free will is in real life philosophical terms, that technically one cannot make a free choice when brainwashed regardless of what their initial choice would've been. I think you took it as much more relevant to the discussion and literal than I intended it. You said "Oooh, this is an interesting discussion." if you want to Ctrl+F read it back.

>...this was quoted in comments to Beast lmao but thankfully with indication of actual chapter. Fuller quote:

Damn, chapter 7. I even read the part two or three sentences above it looking for this...

Fair enough, though there could be circumstantial bolstering or abbreviating. She was born into her lychantropy, but why wouldn't anyone have smothered the baby if she was a Claimant which logically should've yielded other Claimants too? Cat's awakening as Squire made others Claimants too upon demand, as they apparently weren't around to claim Squire in the four decades before it. And again, wouldn't Sabah's parent and siblings also have to be born into the Name of Cursed if she was considering they too ought to be Warlock-cursed?

>OH LOOK WE HAVE AN ACTUAL DEFINITION. ...so I think this should conclude our argument on terminology actually. You really should read through the WoG document, it's stickied on reddit.

Yes, and I don't see how this changes much. This doesn't oppose my interpretation of Role and doesn't support your argument in our discussion on what influence and importance Roles would have vs Names and over Names. In fact, this nigh seamlessly supports my interpretation of a Role: That it is one's role and function in the Story.

It doesn't state much on the original discussion, which I think we started here:

>> Her fitting into Name events like the Band of Five and gaining the Yew Staff or Fairfax Sword are a lot more Story-pulled than the non-Named actions we see around. Too Story-pulled, even when assuming her Duchess of Moonless Nights title was the Name that explained her role and being controlled into a Story that Keter I and the Everdark clearly were. One doesn't happenstance into those situations at the exact right moment or way without a Name pulling providence, with the Book 5 events being a bit vaguer in this but still suggesting Name plot.

>You are using "Name" to substitute for narrative/Role. Name is just one type of thing that happens around those, not every single thing ever. Yes, Catherine is having Name-like things happen to her without holding an actual Name, because she is playing a significant Role in the current continental stories and every single action she takes short of wiping herself in the privy has significant narrative weight. This suggests that IF she were to fit into a character archetype groove that exists in-universe she'd get a Name out of that. But there are currently none that she fits, with Black Queen being already tied to a different one.

The main discussion lied in whether Named Roles and non-Named roles would have the same pull and benefit of providence and Story-created events, before the epilogue declared in clear language that Cat had no Name all this time.

As it turned out, you were correct once the epilogue came out. But before that, everything that assumed Roles to hold the same sway and groove that Names got was an assumption, not hard fact. Before that, I assumed that those that don't have a Name wouldn't have a Role that would do essentially the same in terms of influencing Creation and the course of events, and now that that's been debunked it has rendering Names oddly pointless in my eyes aside from a well of power.

>Masego didn't read the book and didn't try the rituals. He got Dead King riding his mind just by accessing his memories. Tikoloshe's theories are irrelevant when we have actual precedent happening right there.

Tikoloshe is basing this on the existence of DK's book and his continued survival, before Masego revealed that he already reaped the memories from Arcadia. That arcadian memories are the only means to be enthralled by DK is an assumption you make, that DK's trapped knowledge by any medium would work is an hypothesis by an in-universe character with millenia of experience.

Don't make this another "All mammals are bovines." argument. That Masego followed one path to the destination doesn't mean that all other paths are incorrect, because there's more ways that lead to Rome. That arcadian knowledge works for DK to hijack you does in no way discredit Tikoloshe's argument rather than support it, and it's no precedent to show and confirm that the book in Praes's hidden library and other means to learn the secret wouldn't have worked.

>What do you mean I'm making things up? I'm quoting Word of God to you. Erratic's the one making things up, we're the ones discussing them, yes? I'm just confused at this point.

My point is that you too are making a lot of assumptions based on what has been declared, but that you are declaring your assumptions to also be undeniable fact. F.e. you are apparently making the assumption that because arcadian reaped knowledge of DK's ritual works disprove Tilokoshe, which is purely your interpretation rather than what has actually been established and confirmed. Yet you are presenting them as the word of EE himself.

>That discussion was of potential possible Names she might acquire in the future. If she started doing knight shit while dressed in grey, some people might have started calling her 'Grey Knight'. But it wouldn't have been enough to form a Name as there's no cultural archetype attached. Nobody would hear 'grey knight' and go 'ah yes one of those. While people clearly have association triggers with "Black Queen" – 'ah yes, a cruel bloody queen reigning in terror'.

On the specifics that we're talking about here, you are claiming that Cat wouldn't have become the Grey Knight because it doesn't exist if she would've dressed in grey armour (assumption), while she did almost become the Black Queen for being a queen dressed in black, just because you assume that the former wouldn't be an obvious archetype while the latter is (assumption, as we don't know to what extent archetypes are needed and which ones exist in that world).

You are making an outright assumption that the archetype of Black Queen already exists in the guideverse and then being surprised when I call you out on making such an assumption while you've been doing the same about my assumptions. You are making a lot of assumptions you're assuming to be hard in-universe things, too.

And it's especially comments like that show that you don't seem to see the difference in your assumptions and the hard defined mechanics of what EE established. Not only are stories and archetypes of our world relevant as EE is basing his on those so we know what he's talking about and what we're dealing with, but you're also making assumptions on what is the case in EE's universe and not. You're outright assuming that the Grey Knight archetype doesn't exist in his world while the Black Queen does, yet presenting this as in-universe confirmed fact rather than your own assumption.

>You're thinking in terms of stories and archetypes existing in the real world. But that's not relevant. What's relevant is stories and archetypes existing on Calernia. It's been fairly thoroughly established by now, I think, that there's no precedent for what you're describing and no-one's matching Cat up with 'ah yes one of those' in that way. That story doesn't exist.

Let's face it, anything that EE hasn't outright mentioned and established in his world isn't necessarily the case in his world. But let's not forget, that applies on all your assumptions too. You're quite often making assumptions that are just as unfounded and out of nowhere as you claim mine to be, yet you seem to not see how these are assumptions or try to make them something that EE said. You've been trying to counter my assumptions with yours while proclaiming yours to be hard facts. Not the case.

(Also, real world archetypes are kind of relevant. As said before, EE's archetypes are based off ours. The Black Knight is hardly unique to his works, same for Pilgrim being pretty much being Merlin and Gandalf; the old mentor archetype from our world.

In this, the stories are bound to be bound to our real world archetypes. The axioms are quite literally things we often see in our fantasy and hero stories.

On the rest, PERSONAL INTERPRETATION rather than argued to be a fact that you have to agree with, I think that he particularly takes inspiration from Exalted (Book 1-3, very fitting for the mentioned demons and exalted/Named comparison and the Fey being nigh identical with EE's personal take on them, even with some names from the Exalted universe being used here.) going over into Warhammer Fantasy (More fitting for armies and politics, with Book 3-5 defined Procer and Levant closely reminiscing the Empire parts and military tone, with the Lyaconese being Kirslev and the ratlings quite literally being the Skaven with their Horned Lords.)

>Yeah, I agree with this. I don't think it's all the way there yet – too many people still think otherwise – but we're witnessing movement in that direction.

This is more a personal interpretation hoping and trusting EE to deliver on this true worldbuilding: Patriotism and that sweet dwarven coin lowering Callow's war taxes, combined with the conflict happening elsewhere while Callowan war has been a while ago, ought to be a big help. Lower taxes = happier people, regardless of their interpretation of their monarch, ought to be the case. Even a Fairfax will eventually be rebelled against if they raise taxes too high, and even Amadeus got less rebellions and a new generation being a lot more mellow and neutral towards him and Praes thanks to his non-exploit invasion of silent annexation.

>According to Bard, who I don't think was lying, Callowans were already divided on whether Cat was a Praesi sellout or their new hope as of start of book 2, before the confrontation with the heroes in Summerholm. The public opinion began shifting more categorically and universally as news about Marchford spread, as Cat had proven herself actually willing and capable to defend her land and her people. That was all they wanted. They are okay with her being bloody more than she herself is. See: the whole debacle about Bonfire at the start of Book 4.

Kind of exactly what I was saying. Cat being a puppet queen of the Wasteland in Callow's eyes and her being a Named of theirs ruling Callow holds little actual difference when it's the opinion of a country.

>>But I've yet to see supporting proof for this.
>Yeah, quoted above.
Nope, as countered above.

>You can say that. Or I can say that it was actually stated outright multiple times and you just ignored it / forgot it / handwaved it away because you liked your theory too much.

Nope, none of your arguments confirmed your assumptions to be part of the Role definition or for what you claimed Roles could do as opposed to Named&Roles. You merely made assumptions based on a few quotes and defined interpretations, claiming them to not be your own interpretation on what was being said.

>The story is more or less ABOUT how Named aren't all that special. They sort of are, but they make a difference by being in the right place in the right time, not by being inherently cooler than everyone else.

Those quotes are still on what Names are, not confirming your earlier made claims and assumptions on Roles and their extend. Again, you seem to miss where the definitions given end and your assumptions and interpretations begin. Or where the crux of the original discussion lied: What falls under Names and what under Roles, and where this border lies.

>Alright, so first of all, part of your problem was attributing to Story Power what was actually regular human reactions. See Catherine musing on how people were cheering for Cordelia because of WHAT she was saying, not because of WHO or HOW.

That's not at all what I've been saying. Read the arguments back, and you'll see that I haven't been arguing against people being capable of anything rather than the smoothless way that Creation can make some things happen for Named in a way that isn't possible in real life for plot and convenience sake. Cordelia being cheered for is basic human nature and circumstance as we see it in our world as well, some people joining a Black Queen is too. But 2000/2000 horsemen joining someone that humiliated them instead of 200/2000 or 1821/2000 without any internal discussion or issues on this is a whole different matter.

If Pallas would've bend the knee to Cat with a few guaranteed supporters that would follow her but her having to secure Cat's assurances of some things like wages or the return of their arnaments or having to do politics and pressure to get a few hundred more in the weeks after her declaration of following Cat, then I wouldn't have claimed Named powers at work. But we saw a general making a gesture and all soldiers under their command following suit with zero complications despite there definately being reason for this at an individual level to cause such a non-smoothed pattern of transition.

That's the issue here I think. You're not seeing this difference in what I'm arguing and what you're arguing.

>It's not odd. It's the kind of thing that happens in the real world, too, and we don't have Names or Roles. This is how history really works. People don't need supernatural powers to be charismatic and sway others to their cause.

Because this is not true. This is not combining. People followed others because they were charismatic, yes, I even argued so myself before. The issue lied in the 100% following with no problem when this shouldn't be the case. When Napoleon broke out of prison, his soldiers rallied back to his banner. This was not however a 100% all at once, as we're seeing here.

I bet you you cannot find an instance where ALL of the people that were beaten or humiliated by someone followed them given the right charisma and events. Some can, and the mongols for example strongly relied on this. But not everyone in a neat little bow with just one very storylike event of a general's gesture, which if you'd read back has been my point all along.

>Second, note that Cat is an ex-Named. There is definitely something of an exclusive club that you enter once you get a Name, and even if you lose it, you're still there. You're already part of the game. You don't have that specific power-up, but you've already accumulated narrative weight. Creation already has its sights on you. It's not exclusive to Named, yes, but becoming Named is how you get it 99.(9)% of the time.

This is something I can indeed agree to, however something not argued at the time.

>Have you ever tried to write a story without plot? This is a serious question. Have you ever tried to come up with a story without plot? Have you ever read one?

I meant as in, why would you have plot that isn't tied to Named when you already have Named working by plot given tangible rules and presence? Plot is a necessity of all stories, but in EE's guide there's no need for the vital plot existence of other stories because he has Named as his plot to write the story and do the plot-vital things like story progression and pace while trying to make everything non-Named related all the more realistic than in most stories we see.

>They apply?

You don't get a lot of individuality in the army though. You do what your commanding officer says, and your exercise of free will is called 'insubordination' or 'desertion' and generally gets a death penalty. If your commanding officer personally decides to swear fealty to a foreign monarch and there's nobody higher in the hierarchy to stop them, well, either the entire army mutinies or they don't. You're forgetting such fun facts of human psychology as groupthink, hyping each other up in a crowd, liking to live up to expectations, army mentality.

They apply, except now it's been established that apparently plot also affects all non-Named apparently. All those comments you read in the extra chapters on how cool the non-Named are, that's now wrong because apparently they too still know plot to affect their outcome. Any accomplishment by someone who isn't Named, just as 'impressive' as a Hero winning in the end by getting a mid-fight power-up. 'Impressive' yet inevitable and therefore hollow.

I'm not forgetting human psychology and groupthink, those have been part of my arguments up to this point. My argument all along has been that what we've seen Cat do and be thrown into have been too Story and plot to fall under those real-life phenomena. Some things that we've seen Cat do are too much plot and too little real life events where real talent and action get real life results.

Liliet

Part 2

> In this, Black Queen being not bloody (Red Queen) but exactly the kind of queen that Cat is being right now could just as easily support her Name of Black Queen. The queen that isn't glorious or noble or forgiving, but the one that does what has to be done and gets the win when mere shining heroes aren't enough. The Villain redeemed fighting with the heroes, as Cat planned and Pilgrim feared during their first real peace talks and her first admission letter to the Grand Alliance.

You're thinking in terms of stories and archetypes existing in the real world. But that's not relevant. What's relevant is stories and archetypes existing on Calernia. It's been fairly thoroughly established by now, I think, that there's no precedent for what you're describing and no-one's matching Cat up with 'ah yes one of those' in that way. That story doesn't exist.

> Names do seem to be a lot more flexible than we give them credit for. The first Tyrant created Helike and made it persist, Kairos chaotically destroys. They inherently differ in their archetype while claiming the same Name. Name and Role seem to have some synergy, but the Name isn't purely and solely the archetype rather than a broad descriptor that the individual, the situation and their Role in the story make them to be.

As has been said by WoG, the Role of a Tyrant is to grasp power by force and rule maintained by said force. Anything they do more specifically that doesn't interfere with that basic fact, well, doesn't interfere with what their Role is.

> Even for one person, the likes of Ranger and Archer can decide whether they fall in the archetype of good or evil to be considered not Neutral but good as the Vagrant Spear showed.

Yes, 'cause the underlying Roles of their Names aren't 'be good' or 'be evil'. Unlike for White Knight and the like.

> Yes, but my point is, Cat hasn't waved her hand yet since book 3 we've been seeing that Callow, her culture and bed of her Name probably, has been changing its mind about her. In Book 1 she was still a Praesi born in Callow, in Book 3 she was the lesser evil necessary for now and established by Praes as a vassal queen, but now Callow doesn't distrust her like they did before. Even their House of Light rejected the other Houses of Light and declared themselves Insurgent to reject the claim of Archheretic to be Cat.

>

> We've been hearing rumours of Callow shifting all the more in Cat's favour and the culture of Callow seeing her more and more as a saviour and true accepted queen, rather than the bloody warmonger that they still saw her as in Book 3. We've been seeing more and more hints that Callow is changing its mind on Cat decisively these last two books. The very requirement that you're claiming is being fulfilled as seen in EE's writing.

Yeah, I agree with this. I don't think it's all the way there yet – too many people still think otherwise – but we're witnessing movement in that direction.

> "Aye, and the Black Queen killed her dead," Albert grunted. "She's a hard one, make no mistake, but these are bad times. Hard is what we need. Even Jehan the Wise hung himself some princes. Seven and one, like in the song."

Yep. They're approving of her AS the bloody ruthless queen that she briefly came close to being but ultimately isn't. They're wrong about what she's like, but this wrong image they approve of.

> Potato potato, pronounced differently. They saw Cat as the Black Knight finding a Callowan to be a Praesi leader for them while not inherently being a foreigner. They saw her as a Praesi lapdog when she first came in said to be their new queen, leading wasteland soldiers and bringing tower mintage gold.

What?

According to Bard, who I don't think was lying, Callowans were already divided on whether Cat was a Praesi sellout or their new hope as of start of book 2, before the confrontation with the heroes in Summerholm.

The public opinion began shifting more categorically and universally as news about Marchford spread, as Cat had proven herself actually willing and capable to defend her land and her people.

That was all they wanted. They are okay with her being bloody more than she herself is. See: the whole debacle about Bonfire at the start of Book 4.

> Or yours. See how that might be a bit of a troublesome point when you're considering your interpretation of Roles to be supported by the story when they haven't been. Remember: I'm the one claiming that Roles cannot give you Name-power threshed armies by providence just because they are your Role, with you claiming that they can by disagreeing and opposing this. But I've yet to see supporting proof for this.

Yeah, quoted above.

> Now, with the new chapter it's been confirmed that Cat indeed does not have a Name at this moment, contrary to previous chapters being vaguer in terminology, so as it turns out providence does give 2000 horsemen to unnamed with a neat bow wrapped around in it in the form of no mass desertion and unruliness. But before that chapter, there was no such confirmed event yet.

You can say that. Or I can say that it was actually stated outright multiple times and you just ignored it / forgot it / handwaved it away because you liked your theory too much.

And I did say that the 2000 horsemen were actually a completely plausible event regardless of story fiat, so...

> Calling it narrative weight would've helped a bit pre-epilogue, because Roles are an actual thing in the guideverse and you were attaching unfounded traits and abilities to them, though I still lament that the epilogue now confirms that Named aren't quite as special in bending Creation as they were initially said to be.

Leaving aside the question of Roles (I think I've supported my point quite sufficiently), well... Named were never all that special.

> "We're Named," Archer said. "That makes it different."

>

> But it doesn't, I thought. We've seen it, you and I.

That when all there is holding up the choice is a story and the prediction of victory, the story fails. Because if all you do is pretend, go through the motions, then you've already lost what could have made it a victory in the first place.

Thematically, Guide opposes the Great Man Theory. I'll quote Vivienne to expound on this a little:

> "She's not in charge because she's been chosen, Sahelian," Vivienne said. "Gods, certainly not because she's chosen either. Or even because she has power, for that matter."

>

> "Is it the power of love, then?" Akua said, a touch drily.

>

> "There's plenty of people who care about Callow," Thief said. "And if I learned anything from the Woe, it's that caring doesn't fill granaries or run a court. She's certainly in the right place at the right time with the right amount of power to get things moving, but that's not really what matters. See, the thing is that she acts. Sometimes those actions are mistake, like going after the fae and leaving you to plot under your rock in Liesse. But, most of the time, she improves things. Just by a little bit. And she draws other people who act with her. You think that's some unearthly trait, like she's some force of nature, but that's Wasteland talk. The Tower's the centre of the world for you, and the most important person in the world is the one that climbs it."

>

> The other Callowan paused.

>

> "Except she's not," Vivienne said. "The exemplar of whatever fucked up Praesi virtues you want to sing about, that is. She's kind of petty, her temper's foul and if Hakram hadn't stepped in she'd probably be a drunk. She ogles every pretty face that shows up even if they're our enemies, and she cannot for the life of her shut the Hells up even when she really needs to. She's not unique or irreplaceable, but even if you think otherwise that doesn't really matter – because she's part of something greater than her. She's just the rock that started the avalanche, Sahelian, and she did that by doing the most Callowan thing there is: after the invasion is done, you get up and get back to work. Others will come to help you, because a kingdom's people and not banners."

The story is more or less ABOUT how Named aren't all that special. They sort of are, but they make a difference by being in the right place in the right time, not by being inherently cooler than everyone else.

> We've seen Grem's PoV saying how it's different with Named.

We've had Grem's PoV?

-goes to check-

oh yeah, found it! Praise be to CaptainOfMySouls.

...there's nothing about Names here. Like I ctrl-f'd "Name" and it's not in that section. Well, there IS a lot about heroes... okay, I'm going to expound on this in a minute.

> But now, Named just seem a lot less special and important to me. They're just a convenient power-up now, not a vital ingredient of Creation using Story at all. Why even have Names in your simulation if that's the case?

Alright, so first of all, part of your problem was attributing to Story Power what was actually regular human reactions. See Catherine musing on how people were cheering for Cordelia because of WHAT she was saying, not because of WHO or HOW.

Second, note that Cat is an ex-Named. There is definitely something of an exclusive club that you enter once you get a Name, and even if you lose it, you're still there. You're already part of the game. You don't have that specific power-up, but you've already accumulated narrative weight. Creation already has its sights on you. It's not exclusive to Named, yes, but becoming Named is how you get it 99.(9)% of the time.

Third, see my quote from Vivienne and commentary on it above. Are you familiar with the Great Man Theory?

> If there's no Name on either side, providence shouldn't see to the Roles working perfectly beyond the abilities of their natural talents and actions, and neither Pallas nor Cat have Names. Making it odd that Cat managed to do this without a Name

It's not odd. It's the kind of thing that happens in the real world, too, and we don't have Names or Roles.

You know, this is a bit of a tangent, but I really dislike it when an urban fantasy type story inserts its own mechanics into history and asserts that, say, Jeanne D'Arc was actually an alien, or pyramids were built by ancient elves or whatever. It feels like it takes away the real rules by which things happened, cheapens how history really works.

This is how history really works. People don't need supernatural powers to be charismatic and sway others to their cause.

> Returning me to the nihilistic conclusion of Why even have Names in your simulation if that's the case?

Magic is cool. Next question 😊

> But in the guideverse, I lament that plot also exists when Story is a real law of Narrative in this universe.

Have you ever tried to write a story without plot?

This is a serious question. Have you ever tried to come up with a story without plot? Have you ever read one?

> Named used to be the explanation, but apparently they're just an unnecessary addition to Creation's workings.

I'm sorry, but narrative was always an explanation for Names, not the other way around.

> Is it really too much to ask for things like free will, individuality, imperfect information gathering and funding to apply when Named aren't involved, in a story that has shown us exactly those things when they fit in worldbuilding and Cat's kingdom management issues?

They apply?

You don't get a lot of individuality in the army though. You do what your commanding officer says, and your exercise of free will is called 'insubordination' or 'desertion' and generally gets a death penalty. If your commanding officer personally decides to swear fealty to a foreign monarch and there's nobody higher in the hierarchy to stop them, well, either the entire army mutinies or they don't.

You're forgetting such fun facts of human psychology as groupthink, hyping each other up in a crowd, liking to live up to expectations, army mentality.

Insanenoodlyguy

The third time she was dying she sword she'd be mortal to the end. I believe that effectively disqualifies her for any new names. The one time she might have reversed that since (The sword), she very easily turned it down. I'm sure she'll have opportunities, but at this point, they are there mostly for the story to continue that "Catherine Foundling rejects names".

Crash

This makes a lot of sense and it's mainly why her current storyline of not being Named is interesting. She has been doing this on purpose because she dislikes the interplay of Above and Below. As well as her issues with the Wandering Bard.

That said, I do still think that if she got offered a Neutral Name she might take it. It'd certainly make it easier to find the bard when necessary

Liliet

I don't think Cat getting a Name would make a meaningful difference in HER being able to find the Bard, only the other way around.

And she's fairly solid on the whole 'I need to be a villain to speak for them and make change from the inside' thing. That's part of why she doesn't fit any existing groove probably: she doesn't fit villain Names because of her clear actual allegiance, but doesn't fit hero Names because of her clear chosen allegiance.

And Neutral Names flee screaming from how strong her current Role already is, just... unlabeled.

Crash

Probably gonna get something Neutral that implies change in some way, though I can't think of anything that doesn't sound dumb as heck. Like "Rebel", that'd be a turn off and doesn't quite make sense anymore.

Liliet

I'm partial to 'Warden of the East' myself 😊

Though something along the lines of 'Priestess' would fit her very well, as of post-Twilight when she chose the staff. She's certainly leaning into the Role, nudging Kairos's final moments to be his proper due and all.

Crash

Wayward Priestess maybe?

Liliet

Cat has never wandered, ever. She was in the exact position she was supposed to be in ever since Amadeus picked her up as a Squire, and she hadn't traveled before that.

So, uh, no, unless she changes her habits radically.

Priestess of Night is one that seems intuitive, but clearly something's in the way of Cat taking it so far.

Crash

I thought of Wayward more in the sense of her being odd for a priestess, doesn't fit the usual archetype expect of one, maybe there's a better word for it? I keep coming back to Monk but that's literally just because she carries a staff and it makes me think of FFT Monks.

Back in book 3-4 it might've been Warrior Priestess or some such but she has made it clear that she'd really rather not fight at all so while she is not quite the usual Priest-person, I don't know what qualifier to add to that.

I think the problem is that Night is something she wields but not a "part of her" (yes i realize this is bad wording, bear with me.), it's a tool more than something that is really important to her, Night belongs to the Drow it's mostly being lent to Cat instead of being hers in a way that would shape her Name.

Liliet

Catherine has actually been acting out the Priestess role rather faithfully, which interests me. It seems to be a groove she's genuinely fond of and in tune with. Making up new rules and scripture for her goddesses, then pleading her case according to those? Switching to referring to Sisters in her rhetorical flourishes? Carrying a staff and playing the role of a spiritual leader, inspiring people more than anything?

Most interestingly, seeing to it that people who are dying get their just due. That moment when she told Kairos to get on his feet had absolutely no external motivation. It changed nothing, but Cat put it as “it’s what you’re owed”, and she took it upon herself to see to it that what is owed is given. That’s a priestess’s role – a priestess of death, ruin and blood. Death Domain is Lawful Neutral.

One reason I can think of for her not having a Name for it yet is that the exact Role is still in flux. She’s acting nothing like what Sisters set the groove of Priestess of Night to be – it’s possible that Name is locked altogether as long as they exist, because that Name meant being in charge of the Night, and it’s their thing exclusively. There doesn’t seem to be much precedent for dark gods having Lawful Neutral cults/followers/rules on Calernia. I’m recognizing the archetype but I’m recognizing it from different settings entirely. Even newly minted Names have to fit a pre-existing cultural impetus – Cat might cut the groove for the next person like her to get a Name out of it, but actually never have one herself.

Liliet

BTW, a tool lent can shape the Name as much as anything. Squire was based on the position that Amadeus lent her, a Chancellor is appointed by a Dread Emp. Priests and Priestesses all over Calernia and presumably Creation get Names out of it, despite the Choirs being capable of taking Light away from someone. I’d argue Light and Night are the same in this way, with the only categorical difference being that Light is governed by Above and Heavens which is a messy automated/anarchic system, while Night is governed by the Sisters personally in a much more directed way.

Liliet

> The third time she was dying she sword she’d be mortal to the end. I believe that effectively disqualifies her for any new names.

“Mortal” has many gradations in guideverse, and I think in that situation Catherine was referring to demigodhood, not Names. Although it’d give some weight to refusing Names, too, that’s not where the primary thrust goes.

Insanenoodlyguy

I agree and I could have phrased it better, but she did make it part of her story with that. She now has a hard "I want to be detached from outside influences inside my head as much as possible. Names open me up to those, I don't want one." It could have been shaped in other directions, possibly even made into an anti-devine aspect/trend on a Name if she did take one, but I think she's since crystalized it into a form that ensures that she won't be taking any names offered (though names will be offered.)

Liliet

I'll note that she considers herself to be disqualified by the 'no Named rulers' section of the Accords regardless...

KageLupus

I don't think that Cat is going to get a new Name any time soon, and possibly never. Partly because she doesn't need one (High Priestess of Sve Noc is a replacement, power-wise), but also because it doesn't really make sense.

Names are what you get when you fall into a particular role that has been established. The storied grooves in reality. Cat has spent the last couple of books breaking new ground entirely, so she doesn't have an established groove to slip into.

She could have become the Black Queen, but that story was broken and I don't think you get a second chance. Just like how Cordelia was offered Warden of the West but turned it down, Cat lost her shot at Black Queen as a Name. Both of them are still doing the same things that created the story that would have given them the Name, but that critical pivot moment came and went and cannot come again.

For Cat to get a Name now she would have to have another narrative buildup that culminates in pivot moment of suitable weight. Except now the story would have to include her already being the Black Queen as a title, as well as High Priestess for a mythical race no one understands. I think that it all adds up to being to strange of a story to lead to a Name.

Liliet

I can see Cat falling into the High Priestess (or something else Priestess) archetype neatly enough to qualify for a Name at some point.

Keep in mind that everyone is actually different and everyone is technically doing something no-one had ever done before. Archer's breaking new ground right there at Cat's side, but it doesn't stop her from being, well, an Archer.

But yes, the roles of Black Queen and High Priestess, given that Black Queen is already tied to a specific groove she's been avoiding falling into, would likely interfere with her getting any other Name. I'm not sure the sword would have given her a Name either, unless it managed to qualify her for some kind of Warrior Queen Name that would supplant Black Queen as her new nickname. IMHO unlikely tho.

Oshi

That is Malicia in the best. She had time so she wrapped a dozen balls of death and set them up on the path to her. That way by the time they get to the tower there is nothing but taters for her to wipe out.

erebus42

Oh Kairos you beautiful little bastard. One last spanner in the works for old times sake. And really if he would have one last request for Helike "Do as you will" would be it. Open up the Lion's cage and see what it does.

Decius

Critically, "Do as you will" is an ORDER.

All of their previous Lawful traits and training weren't undone- they were fully subverted towards "Do as you will".

"I don't want to" is now a completely acceptable reason to shirk what used to be a duty, and wanting to do something makes it mandatory. What used to be Chaotic treason is now fully expected to happen.

And it will be a glorious flame. Forget lighting the rushlight at both ends, this is grinding the rushlight into a powder and dusting it over open flames.

Liliet

I don't think it'll be applying to the whole of Helike, unless Basilia sets out on a quest to revolutionize the whole damn place and succeeds at it.

And something tells me Basilia was already that kind of little shit, judging from how she supported Kairos in the first place...

Crash

Fuck, Kairos. You did it again.

Indrani is having so much fun tonight.

Heathen

And so Cat picks up another group of highly effective heavy cavalry to join the Order of the Broken Bells.

What do we call this one, the Order of the Broken Fingers?

Crash

I second this motion, get Robber on it.

Yatr

Nay I say, The Order Of Broken Bones!

Sweet sweet alliteration!

Pure Liessen Charger

Led by Hakram the Deadhand Missinghand

Xi Cree

No no... it's the 'Order of Cracked Carpels'

threeh2o

Thought the Helike cavalry was light not heavy. They use bows, is why breaking the one finger was a big deal.

Liliet

They're heavy cavalry that uses bows as one of their weapons. That's what makes them so valuable, as I understand – they are both strong and versatile.

NZPIEFACE

Half of Helike follows after the legacy of Tyrant, and half of it acts in the pride of their nation.

Wonderful, how the two generals represent these two integral aspects of the city-state.

Liliet

Best part? They get along. They just have different immediate priorities.

Insanenoodlyguy

I ship them after this chapter. Let them rule together in the end as Tyrant and her queen!

Liliet

They really do come across as best friends, don't they?

Jworks

Two months ago I would have absolutely loved to see Helike burn, now it's one of my favorite factions. Tied for second favorite with the Kingfisher Prince and whatever lands he represents.

LarsBlitzer

Halfway through the whole internal monologue I was wondering when the 4th dimensional chess would stop and Catherine would be able to chop through this Gordian Knot, if I may be permitted to mix metaphors. Her realisation at the end that she can do NOTHING that Malicia hasn't accounted and planned for was rather disheartening, especially when Akua's cover was blown. She'd fallen into the trap quite neatly. It was only when she stopped playing the part of the cornered villain that I felt any hope. And now the chaff of her alliance has cut itself away and left an elite force of mounted archers and raiders sworn to her personally. In between the Gallowsborn, the Order of the Broken Bells, an entire race of Elven Murderhobos at her command because she's the head Priestess of their Goddesses, and her Legionnaires she's got a LOT of power at her command, more than when she was a Fae Queen. Interesting.

RoflCat

Even better yet, those corrupted bastards in the League will have to deal with the remaining Helikean army, as a one last "if I maybe so rude, fuck you all for trying to ruin my bestest friend Catherine's legend" from Kairos, so they're unlikely to meddle any time soon.

Liliet

You have his character voice down pat for this joke holy shit

Decius

Cat lost to Empress, quite badly. But Tyrant bailed her out from beyond the grave.

A long time ago, Cat lost to Heiress, and Black had to bail her out.

Cat loses diplomacy battles to Wastelanders. Back when she had the chance to play Mean Girls for relatively low stakes, she was doing pit fights.

Liliet

Catherine might lose tactically, but she wins strategically. Against Heiress, in the end, she had the entire country allied with her. And right now, she might be losing the battle for the hearts and minds of these specific people, but she's already won the war for approximately everyone else's. People coming to bail her out IS her way of winning the game.

Mammon

Did she lose though? This seems more like she could've won whenever she wanted and considering the League's issue Procer might've backed her in it. Granted, doing so would've been a big issue of Cordelia once again being shoved further into the Tyrant story noose, but it's not like the League hasn't been burning too many bridges to pull this off and see everyone condemning Cat instead of them for their blunders.

Cat is weary because they still get to throw pinpricks at her (both literally and figuratively) that are but a nuisance and a first-strike issue, but ones that may accumulate and be a noose around her neck in the future or carve a deeper groove to force her ways. That they keep trying to use her attempts to unify to see her having to bail them out or indulge them. With the inevitable problem of the one giving bread to those that will not work for it because of this samaritan eventually starving themselves because the selfish beggars keep coming and demanding more loudly.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Um, actually, drow in this setting bear no relation to elves.

doominator10

"From the Blessed Isle to Segovia, from Levante to Rhenia, the(Y) came when the call..."

"What will you do, if (I) ignore your petty threats?"

Cat just got another army... dam.

Liliet

Cat got another army to follow her North, and an army willing to work on solving her southern problems for her.

I'm genuinely not sure which one'll prove more useful~

Silverking

...Gosh, do the Gods Below want Cat to take up a Name or what? Her monologue about how crushing the schemes of petty short-sighted bastards so we can get back to, you know, saving all their ungrateful asses is practically word-for-word the temptation

Cordelia recieved for the Warden of the West. I'm pretty sure that the main trigger for a Name is a moment where they look at their killed sister or hypocritical judges or oppressed species or prophecies of death or petty usurpers and saying "What we're doing does not work, and I'm not going to take it anymore". However, in Cat's case, as tempting as it is to just screw diplomacy and force people to do what she wants, she knows from experience that it will win the battle and lose the war. She's going to have to be willing to lose the cruel game everyone's been playing if she ever wants to play an better one with the Liesse Accords,

Liliet

Hmmm.

I think the temptation is largely internal, and comes from a person's own logic, in both cases. You're right that Below might juuust be giving it a tiny nudge when it's this close, tho :3

Insanenoodlyguy

the way I think of it, the thought and the intent are yours, at least as far as villiany is concerned. But the words that are put to those feelings are being helpfully provided.

caoimhinh

It's already weird that Catherine doesn't have a Name. She is too relevant to the stories of Calernia on so many levels that the Narrative Weight that she has pretty much decides the destiny of the continent.

She even gets Patterns of Three against Heroes (as shown in her confrontation with Pilgrim) and still has the connection with the Woe (as shown with Hakram's Adjutant Name still being able to feel Catherine and how Masego gets empowered by Cat presence and vice-versa).

It's way past time she got a new Name, and yeah Creation and Providence seem inclined to get her near pivots and great events that force her to make significant choices.

ChillyPepper

So, who else have a hand in the story pie without having a name. Or perhaps, what else?

ChillyPepper

Hint: has an army of undead.

Liliet

Lesser gods don't count. Cat backed the FUCK out of that.

Mammon

Assuming Black Queen not to be a Name she has had for a while, that is. See my other comment in this chapter for further explanation. Because Black Queen is a new Name, it might be very unnoticable because Cat is defining it and it's fitted to her personality. With the Duchess of Moonless Nights transition around the same time not making the change obvious, there's no reason to notice Cat's change in-universe. And remember, Bard can still see and appear before her, suggesting Cat really does have a Name.

More likely, whomever the next Black Queen will be will notice her behaviour changed more to be alike Cat's, but Cat is the OG BQ that defines her role.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, having a Name has in-world effects that Cat would definitely notice. She has explicitly refused Name status over and over. Indeed, I suspect that for some time now, she's been basically grifting off all the offering-gifts (plot and power both) that Below (and occasionally Above) are throwing at her to tempt her into accepting a name.

But certainly, in her wake she will leave a Name of Black Queen for the next person to follow in her footsteps.

Mammon

In-world effects, like coincidentally entering the Everdark when the dwarves are invading, coincidentally coming out when Callow can reallllly use her help pulling things back together, being approachable through teleportation by Bard, being part of a Band of Five, Hakram's Name still serving her intuitively, as shown again this chapter still having the definately Name-caused thresher ability of gaining the best loyal allies, being Kairos's fav enemy, etc. etc. There are so many things whose providence are a bit too tightly spun for Cat to be a non-Named. Making the claim that she doesn't have a Name is as unfounded as saying she has one.

Liliet

Providence and narrative features apply to non-Named just as much as they do Named. If it's providence that Cat met the Rat Company at the exact most convenient time to win them over, didn't Rat Company get affected by providence themselves as the other half of that equation? Stories affect all participants, Named are only special in how easily they are able to GENERATE stories around themselves. And Cat doesn't need that boost, considering all her stories are ALREADY going full steam.

So providence isn't Named-specific. What is is stuff like reduced fatigue, no longer having periods, sharper reflexes, ability to purge poison,

Mammon

Jup, which applies to the stuff that also involves and benefits Names. We've already seen during Amadeus vs Iron Prince that the Procerians having just a few Named on their side to give those providence advantages really bothered Marshal One-Eye, f.e. how a reckless cavalry charge over loose stones went off without a hitch where it should've been a matter of a single horse tripping and getting half the charge killed by their own weight and momentum. I'm not contesting that non-Named aren't influenced by providence.

I am however saying that Cat has been getting providence effects that a regular Non-Named wouldn't get, which I started saying this chapter when we so clearly saw Cat's thresher abilities. One doesn't get 2000 horsemen showing their loyalty like this with just a Role and some side-providence. This is much more likely a Name at work. Callow remaining in her control isn't Name-gained, the drow listen to her because of Sve Noc need not be Name-gained, the Legions in Exile accepting her as a semi-leader need not be Name-gained. All those are by act and virtue thereof. But what we've seen today, that's much clearer a Name rather than act pulling the final strings that prevent at least half of those 2000 humiliated men not sharing the general's masocism and rebelling with the general knowing this and needing a lot more time to arrange this merger.

Liliet

> I am however saying that Cat has been getting providence effects that a regular Non-Named wouldn't get

Here's the thing: while regular people who aren't very aware of how Names work, like Abigail, assume Cat is Named. Not a single actual Named has ever questioned Catherine being non-Named while having all of that shit still applying to her. Not Tariq, not Hanno, not Laurence, no-one at any point went 'wait, she has to have a Name, this doesn't make sense'.

So, clearly it makes sense in-universe for her to get those effects while being non-Named?

Mammon

Or she has a Name that doesn't follow the mortal three Aspects Name subsection of Named.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, if she had a Name, she'd be able to feel it directly – she certainly did when she was Squire. Instead, she'd breaking new ground as someone who's manipulating fate and Providence (and being manipulated by them in turn) without the Name that everyone thought was integral to that.

Basically she's pulling back a curtain and showing that Names aren't as necessary as everyone thinks – or at least (like Heiropant with sorcery), she's learned to directly handle the powers that most people deal with indirectly.

Liliet

I don't think so?

I don't think Cat's doing anything particularly groundbreaking here, she's just an edge case. Nobody has been actually surprised so far about her not having a Name while doing all the shit she does. It seems to be a universal understanding that narrative trickery is a function of a Role, not a Name, and as long as you have one of those, you just need a Name to be slightly less squishy. Or priestess powers, that works too.

Mammon

She'd feel it. Unless there's something out there both creating a storm of power that lays thick in her veins and being able to leech power from that Name by their basic talents, like say a twin crow goddess. A new much more subtle Name weakened further by Sve Noc taking power from it (maybe in part why Cat doesn't need to pay up front for her bargains) after coming fresh out of being a construct of fey magic, I can see a Name's thrum of power being a lot less noticeable that way.

Especially when Cat expects to be weaker and weary and limping and such, which Names as expositioned in Book 1 and 2 already stated would see to these things remaining. Thief could heal third degree burns in no time, but when the wounds stick mentally they scar physically. If Cat believes her weaknesses to return and stay, and she has put some Story significance behind them and her mortality regained, then they would be there.

Liliet

That's a conspiracy theory that has literally 0 support. Again, absolutely nobody in-universe thinks there's anything wrong with the picture of 'Catherine Foundling doesn't have a Name but has a Role strong enough to be functionally a Named in all ways except the literal'.

Oh, and crows don't have a single incentive to do something like this to Catheirne, to point out the main weak point.

Mammon

Remember the Pilgrim's words: Just because we agree doesn't mean I now bend to your will and agree with you in everything, Black Queen. (Not at all exactly what he said exactly, but it's the gist of the words.) EE doesn't make someone completely on your side just because they're on your side in a way that most lazier story-writing makes them a permanent complete friend no questions asked.

I have no reason to assume that Sve Noc is as unconditionally friendly, not scheming and not taking concessions and arguing for more power as most people in the chat make her out to be. We assume that Cat gets a lot of power and things from the sisters for free, but we don't know yet where the line lies, how much Cat balances the line in this and how much Sve Noc schemes in her own favour. Remember, EE is a great writer not at all lazy enough to fall for this lazy kind of 'Once a friend, always a friend giving you whatever you want.' trouble that too many writers fall into.

Sve Noc might have an incentive we don't know of yet, even if it's not planned all along and/or in their nature.

Liliet

The thing about Sve Noc is that we know a sufficient amount of their context and incentives to understand what they want and how they plan on getting it. We know their capabilities and know their understanding of their capabilities.

For them to be secretly betraying Cat behind her back is... not, like, literally impossible. But WHY. There's absolutely no evidence or foreshadowing in this direction, and absence of strongly expected evidence is evidence of absence. I'd argue evidence of Sve Noc not being straight with Cat would be strongly expected, in context. Given it's now the end of Book 5, out of 6 planned total, yeah?

Crash

Hierophant is a new Name. Good luck to Masego trying to hide that.

You're also implying that Cat hasn't been thinking about having a Name this whole time. Like she just... forgets to take it into account in her own internal monologue for... reasons, I guess? All while sometimes considering the difference in her physical prowess compared to her time as the Squire and as Duchess of Moonless Nights (She has literally used wording like "When I had been Named", I'm pretty sure. Which, you know, would imply that Black Queen is weaker than the transitional name of Squire. No Aspects either which is very, very odd.

I'm not saying Cat isn't an unreliable narrator. She often is. But hiding her Name by legitimately not thinking about it ever for what? 2 Books now? (What's your timeline on the Cat is already the Black Queen thing?) That's just bad writing. Erratic is better than that man.

Now, is it possible Cat might still become the Black Queen? Certainly, but it becomes more unlikely everyday. This entire chapter is an ode to how much Cat's ways have changed and to insist on her losing herself to the whole rule through fear and violence is to do a disservice to her character evolution in this Book and hell, during the series as a whole.

If she does, indeed, become the Black Queen at some point it's going to be a very different Name to the one first offered to her in the aftermath of the Doom of Liesse.

Mammon

Hierophant is supported by his Name in what he already does, which the Name only supports. And Cat is already supported by her Name as Black Queen, which people keep calling her including the ones like Pilgrim who'd know the difference between a Name and a title.

I don't recall her ever saying 'Back when I had a Name.', and her limp isn't at all something that would be resolved by her having a Name. Names cannot fix every wound, especially if the wound is supposed or Story-supported to stick. Not only does she assign value to it to ensure it stays if she'd have a Name, it's something from before gaining her Name which is all the more likely to stay. When she was the Duchess it was gone because she was literally just a construct of Winter, but the Duchess was an odd Name because it's not quite a mortal Name rather than a Fey Name.

And her power, if the new Name isn't meant for direct combat and brawn as Squire was, then she wouldn't get a great power-up. Augur can't lift up grown men just because she has a Name, Pilgrim may be a bit more spry than he ought to be but he too doesn't have super-strength or speed, Kairos never performed super-human physical activity, etc. If the Black Queen isn't a warrior Name, then it's not going to be able to jump logs and kill four men at once without magic like Squire could.

The thing is, you're assuming that I'm talking about Cat being an unreliable narrator for two books just because you assume that she hasn't been thinking in terms of her being Named. Yet when we look back, she has been thinking in terms of Stories and Patterns of Three and the likes a lot. And before, did she really think of herself as her Name that often rather than her actions in the Story? There's no reason to assume that she's not a Name just because EE hasn't said "Yes, I the Black Queen who is Named, shall...". Don't accuse me of calling EE a crappy writer when you're assuming that he doesn't know subtlety to not be that blatant about it. And with the way this story is, it's quite likely that at least for the protagonist EE wants to stray away from the original system with Aspects that can conveniently appear to save the day.

Crash

Here are some quotes from a couple different chapters:

b1 c12 Squire

[...] Learning aspect of my Name [...]

b2 c13

[...] not the way I'd been before becoming the Squire [...]

b1 c14 Villain

I still couldn't feel my Name [...]

b1 c27 Callow's Plan

My Name was a recalcitrant little brat [...]

b2 c9 Rematch

I smiled a devil's smile and my Name howled, raging at the Struggle ahead of me.

b2 c16 Trust

I heard him long before I saw him, even with my Name vision b2 c17 Aplomb

[...]claiming my Name[...]

[...]in my short tenure as Squire[...]

b2 c20 Ashes

My Name bared its fangs in approval.

b2 c21 Marchford

[...] even to my Name-sight [...]

b2 c45 Corpses

I reached for my Name [...]

That I was still a Squire[...]

So, fun story. I've been re-reading so I knew for a fact that Cat did speak/make reference to her Name a lot. I know you made a joke about cat not referring to everything as "Yes, as a Named..." but uh, Cat had a lot of trouble not mentioning she was, indeed, Named or otherwise referring to her Name instincts and general use power like the eyesight and such, mate. Do you know what she does now? Use the Night to make up for that, telling us that that is what she is doing, and mention it every other chapter just like she did her Name before.

Example:

b5 c24 Theft

"She wasn't wrong. We were looking at the same thing, I thought, but my sight was better than hers. A sliver of Night had seen to that. "

As a side note, this habit is very interesting because you can use it to track how comfortable she is in making use of her abilities and also is a fun little character trait to keep track of, like for instance how she used to swear to the Heavens a lot in the first book and then gradually started to use Hells instead and has now shifted to calling on the Sisters. Very neat stuff.

I would like to refer you to Liliet's very nice mention of Cat remind us that her monthlies have come back and that her hair is now growing again, while on campaign in the Ever Dark both things at odds with being Named.

To be quite clear, I never said EE was a bad writer, if anything I used the fact that I believe him to be a good writer to justify my thought process. Catherine likes to give us an insight on what she is doing and how she is achieving it, it's a consistent character trait. There is no "subtlety" in hiding your POV character's thoughts from your readers, especially if that runs directly counter to a well established character trait, that is just a lazy way to create mystery and EE has demonstrated he doesn't need that crutch.

Mammon

A lot of references from Books 1 and 2, which still had a vastly different writing style (I can still recall how often someone's skintone was referenced as a way of referring to the person in those...) and where things were still a lot more about the Named. Cat still heavily relied on her Name back then, as she has recently internally monologued to no longer do for smart reasons, and she used her powers a lot more directly. Since then, she has begun to rely on things like her reputation instead which is just an extension of what a Name can do, as well as use powers and means that aren't her own Name.

Since then, EE shifted away from using Aspects for Cat (while her Aspects like Take are still indirectly there) probably more because he doesn't want to rely and be bound to such Words changing the Story too easily, combined with an Aspect after one or two uses losing its weight and there only be so many new Aspects that Cat could gain. Since then, EE crafted a world and a position for Cat that doesn't need raw power and her proving herself physically to get ahead in life, instead making a rich political and warfare-based story that doesn't necessarily need Cat to be an active Name on the frontlines.

As such, from the way I see it EE no longer has to rely Cat to have her Name thrum in her head or howl in the back of her mind to do direct impossible etc., both because there's now Night indeed and because her ways are now more subtle than 'Rend! Jump, pivot, parry, slash in one second while wearing plate! Rise!'

Liliet

And so, she doesn't have a Name anymore. A Role, but not a Name. Pretty simple.

Crash

>> Since then, she has begun to rely on things like her reputation instead which is just an extension of what a Name can do, as well as use powers and means that aren't her own Name.

Okay, cool. Why does she need a Name if she doesn't want to make use of it at all?

>> A lot of references from Books 1 and 2, which still had a vastly different writing style

Yeah, that's the bit I'm re-reading so I knew off the top of my head I could very easily find the exact wording I needed to quote for this. While the writing style has changed this was a demonstration of a recurring habit of Cat's: to tell the reader exactly how she is achieving something and what she is using to do so. Her Name, her reputation, Night, the weird senses that being a Fae construct gave her; she always tells us what she is relying on to achieve her current objective.

>> Since then, EE shifted away from using Aspects for Cat

Yeah, because she lost her Name. She doesn't have those Aspects anymore. The only reason she kept some remnants of it is because her nature as Duchess of Moonlight got mixed in with her Name of Squire and so when she became the sole fae of Winter so too did it mix with that. Finally, when she gave Winter to the new Night those traces went together with it so they're there, but they're not nearly as simple to use as they once were.

>> As such, from the way I see it EE no longer has to rely Cat to have her Name thrum in her head or howl in the back of her mind to do direct impossible etc., both because there's now Night indeed and because her ways are now more subtle than 'Rend! Jump, pivot, parry, slash in one second while wearing plate! Rise!'

This is the bit that truly gets to me. By your logic then she doesn't need a Name at all so why would she have one? If no words of power are of use to her, she hasn't mentioned any gained insight or political acumen from a Name and she didn't get any physical benefit at all, what the heck is a Name doing for her? Because if it's a subtle one and more directed towards politics then she'd get some Aspect that helped her with social situations. Maybe something like Kairo's Wish that gave him an advantage in knowing what people want while negotiating; or the lost aspect of Seek to learn the information she needs; Anaxares' own Receive is a great diplomatic tool. Why did she not get any of these or even something else? Not all Aspects are battle related, you seem to forget. Even Hanno's Recall which has battle use, allows him to learn from past heroes and even pick up language knowledge.

Having the Story weight of a Named without any of the changes and Aspects that come with it is calling having a Role. All Names have a Role but not all people with a Role have a Name. Cordelia Hasenbach has a very big Role in the story of the Principate and the fight against the Dead King and as such, at a pivotal moment was offered a Name which she didn't take; did she suddenly stop being relevant politically and to the greater story of Calernia? No, because while she has no Name her Role is still there. The same goes to Cat, she has been offered Names and didn't take them but that didn't suddenly destroy the Role she has. So she remains relevant and, at another pivotal moment, might again be offered a Name but currently all she has is that Role she plays.

Mammon

>Okay, cool. Why does she need a Name if she doesn't want to make use of it at all?

Because a Name and what Squire got aren't synonymous. Getting 2000 horsemen might be a passive effect use of her Name, same as heightened political senses and persuasive abilities. Not all Named are uber-strong with magic and stuff.

>Yeah, because she lost her Name. She doesn't have those Aspects anymore.

I meant more as in the meta-aspect of convenient 'Say a word, turn the tides' that might be the kind of awesome yet lesser writing that EE no longer has to resort to because their world and writing is now so much more refined and carefully crafted. Others still do it, but the protagonist doing it when it can be done with more weight and subtlety might be more preferred by EE. Spitballing on their motivation here, yes I know I cannot speak for them. But when I look at the development through the books I can see that being the case.

>By your logic then she doesn't need a Name at all so why would she have one?

Mostly because of the writer cornering themselves. If this wasn't A Practical Guide to Evil, then quite a lot of things she does are indeed possible without a Name. But because Names and this nigh-omnipotent force called Creation or Providence or Named exists then her rather than another Named or these forces preventing a non-Named doing it becomes more difficult to believe.

Or it might be that she is a different sub-section of Named. We've seen with the Fey that Named are definately not all obligated to follow the exact same pattern and format, and even the Aspect Named mortals follow different systems like Heroes and Villains getting different boons and following different rules of coming to be. Dragons were kinda Named as a species with a domain in their stomach rather than an Aspect, the Drow could be an odd Named alternative, Saint was Named but transitioned into something not quite Named yet still Named by turning an Aspect into a Domain and becoming that Domain herself.

Named as a whole are not one hard system, rather than that the mortals most commonly see the three Aspects Named arise amongst their weak and lesser folk. Cat allying to a god ascending certainly doesn't fit the same category as 'Some Wastelander Noble wins a thing, or Procerean peasant with a sob story' to require this lowest bar Name bestowal.

(Plus, EE has a lot more tools in his bag now. Maybe Cat has Aspects-to-be, but it will take a book and a half before she actually reaches a point where she has to have one surface because all other options ran out. No need to get them in quick succession like when she was Squire.)

On Names vs Roles, this depends on far a Role would go. Cordelia still has a Role because she has no Name but a position that makes her Role indeed inexchangeable. She is the ruler of Procer, which would fit certain grooves while not requiring a Name. However, Names are main cast while Roles are supporting characters. Cat has been too much a main character by act and front line action taking rather than Role not delegated by Creation and the Name to a supporting and side character, to be a Role rather than a Name. There are Named in her employ, if she were just a Role then the Named ought to have gone through Masego and Hakram and Archer with Cat now aiding them. Or at least, providence would've tried to do this.

Mario and Bowser are Named while Peach is a Role of the damsel in distress, but the moment that Peach gets an actual active role then she would become a Named. Zelda was merely a Role to bestow a purpose/motivation, some boons and certain acts that a ruler has to do because a green-capped knight couldn't, but once she became that desert nomad she came into a Name and actively Story-affecting role rather than a Role. (Yes, Role is a bit of an awkward way to refer to it indeed.)

Crash

So sorry for the double post, forgot to add it to the first one:

"Hierophant is supported by his Name in what he already does, which the Name only supports."

I'd like to know how this is any different to what Names do in general? I don't recall who said this in the story nor the exact working but something along the lines of Name's being the result of people wanting/believing in doing a certain thing and Creation making it so that they can achieve that using the Roles that exist in the story and, if necessary, creating a new one(which in turn is supposed to be weaker due to the lack of repetition.)

For instance, Vivienne wanted to steal things, be the best thief and achieve her goal of stealing enough to pay the price on her mother's death. So she became the Thief. Hanno wanted to right the wrongs and injustice he perceived to be happening, so he became the White Knight under the Choir of Judgement.

And as far as Black influencing Cat's spot as a Squire he himself said that it was only because of the Name of Squire being associated to the Knight Names.

Liliet

Black influencing Squire seems very obvious. A Name has a set of narrative features, the more of them you have the better you fit it. One of those features for a Squire is 'tutored by a Knight Named', much like how I expect it's much easier to get the Name Apprentice for someone who's apprenticed to a mage Name or uhhh how it's easier to get the Name Archer for someone who owns a bow, y'know? That it's not a requirement is more interesting and distinct commentary on how these Names work than the fact it's related lmao

Liliet

> And Cat is already supported by her Name as Black Queen, which people keep calling her including the ones like Pilgrim who'd know the difference between a Name and a title.

Why do you think Pilgrim wouldn't be calling her by a title?

Where does he ever say or imply it's a Name?

> I don't recall her ever saying 'Back when I had a Name.'

> It was rather pitiful that between three former Named not a single one of us could properly hold a tune but aside from that I claimed no regrets.

Book 5, Chapter 83 "A Mould Unbroken"

> but the Duchess was an odd Name because it's not quite a mortal Name rather than a Fey Name. It's not a Name, it's a fae title, a completely different category of thing. Catherine had both of those at the same time in Book 3.

> And her power, if the new Name isn't meant for direct combat and brawn as Squire was, then she wouldn't get a great power-up. Augur can't lift up grown men just because she has a Name, Pilgrim may be a bit more spry than he ought to be but he too doesn't have super-strength or speed, Kairos never performed super-human physical activity, etc. If the Black Queen isn't a warrior Name, then it's not going to be able to jump logs and kill four men at once without magic like Squire could.

She would still get reduced fatigue and no more periods, though. And Aspects. And, y'know, the general pool of power for Name tricks that all Named get. Or is your theory that her Name is so weak she cannot even purge poison?

> Yet when we look back, she has been thinking in terms of Stories and Patterns of Three and the likes a lot.

So what? Narrative is determined by Roles, not Names.

Mammon

Pilgrim has been calling Cordelia by her name rather than a Name that isn't her Name, but he often refers to Cat as Black Queen. In the way that one would refer to a Villain Named.

She is a former Named, she did lose Squire. And it rolls off the tongue better than saying two and one who's.

>She would still get reduced fatigue and no more periods, though. And Aspects. And, y'know, the general pool of power for Name tricks that all Named get. Or is your theory that her Name is so weak she cannot even purge poison?

Cat also assumed herself to be more mortal, until she killed Saint while barely to not aging. She assumed it to be Sve Noc. Cat almost got poisoned, and reasoned what would happen to prevent her death if she had been assuming no poison resistance. But we've never seen her get poisoned thus far.

She would have reduced fatigue as Squire, but Pilgrim post-revival was extremely fatigued for a long period of time despite him having his full Name minus (still unconfirmed) his third Aspect gone. Enhanced Stamina is likely more something for the travelling and fighting Names, not necessarily the Leader Names and those that don't require quick moving and footing.

For the period thing, I can't seem to find back whether that was a Squire or a Fey thing. Looking for the word period (and I cntr+F'd a lot of chapters and looked through all the results that the search option of this site gave me), I didn't find back where she said it. I remember it too, but not the where and how. But if it's a fey thing, then periods aren't a necessity of Named at all. Named can get children, as Captain has shown, and Named can retain weaknesses and wounds and sicknesses that fit their appearance and personality as Kairos has shown. Even if they don't want it, as Thief has shown with retaining wounds because they mentally scarred her as well. Periods are likely something that if the Named doesn't see a reason for them or doesn't want them because they inconvenience her and the Story, then they're gone. But if she wants to feel mortal and normal like Cat now wants with her limp etc., then they could resurface upon request.

Liliet

>Pilgrim has been calling Cordelia by her name rather than a Name that isn't her Name, but he often refers to Cat as Black Queen. In the way that one would refer to a Villain Named.

People refer to other people differently depending on their relationship. And depending on the other person's personality. And...

Yeah, this isn't evidence of anything other than them being two different people.

> She is a former Named, she did lose Squire. And it rolls off the tongue better than saying two and one who's.

Liliet

Ooops, accidentally hit post.

> She is a former Named, she did lose Squire. And it rolls off the tongue better than saying two and one who's.

This is not how words work. "Former" means 'no longer one of those', where 'those' in this context is 'Named'. She is no longer a Named. Amadeus wasn't a 'former Named' during his tenure as Black Knight even though he'd once been a Squire and then no longer was.

And she could have easily picked some other descriptor to refer to the three of them is 'former Named' was inaccurate.

> Cat also assumed herself to be more mortal, until she killed Saint while barely to not aging. She assumed it to be Sve Noc.

Yeah, cause Names do it differently. She points it out explicitly in her narration, that whatever is going on with her is a different mechanism that feels differentl from the inside, as I quoted elsewhere.

Liliet

There are specific effects that Names have. Catherine had noticed her reflexes and senses changing even when she'd first been a claimant to Squire, a fairly weak Name. She's long familiar with universal Name tricks like purging poison and would know if she has access to those. She has specifically remarked on funny things like non-decreased fatigue and having periods again. And that's before we consider the issue that her current Name would likely be a villain one, with the fun side effect of no aging (she had specifically mused on how that had felt when she had a Name vs now).

And when we talk about the Name of Black Queen specifically, CAT KNOWS WHERE THAT ONE IS AND WHAT IT DOES AND REFERS TO. There was a whole thing about it at the end of Book 3. As long as Cat doesn't go off the deep end and start terrorizing the continent to bend it to her desires, she is nowhere near that.

What Cat DOES have is a Role. Narrative weight. It can be attracted by a Name, or it can be attracted by other factors (like being the pivot of continental politics). A Name is attracted by a falling into a groove, a character archetype from a story. Which Cat currently fits none of cleanly enough to get a Name.

Mammon

See my answer to the other guy; if the Name isn't meant to be faster and stronger then it doesn't have to be so. Periods was a thing she lost while being a Fey construct rather than a Named, I think? She is more resistant to aging and poison, as we've seen. And with Sve Noc's presence, being Named might be a lot less noticeable if they don't want it to be noticed and with the transition from Fey Duchess to what she is now.

And as the Black Queen is a new Name, it's hardly as defined as an already existing one. Which too wouldn't be that narrow, f.e. Kairos being chaotic evil incarnate while the first Tyrant was more likely Lawful Evil creating rather than destroying and riding dying horses into their swan song. Just because the Black Queen was a creator of terror the first time around, doesn't mean it will be so every time in every situation. Big difference between pre-conquest end of the war at Liesse and the situation after Cat returned from the Everdark.

Liliet

> Periods was a thing she lost while being a Fey construct rather than a Named, I think?

> Being Named got me out of many of the little ugly details of life – didn't get sick anymore, tired much slower and I hadn't had my monthlies in about two years – but it did nothing for sweat.

Book 3 Chapter 10 "Entrance"

> She is more resistant to aging and poison, as we've seen.

Villains aren't "resistant" to aging, they just don't age.

> "The years will kill me, one of these days," I said. "If nothing else gets around to it first."

>

> "Ah," the Dead King smiled. "But how many years would it take?"

>

> I didn't answer that, for the truth was that I wasn't sure. My body now was no stronger than it'd been before I came into my Name, not without Night being woven into it anyway. Pain and exhaustion and so many things that'd felt... distant while I was Sovereign of Moonless Nights had been returned to me in full, but I had not taken sick since being proclaimed First Under the Night. As for age, though? It hadn't been long enough for me to be sure of whether or not my aging had resumed in earnest. It didn't feel the same way as it had under my Name, when I'd still grown but there had been something contrived about it – like I was matching a vision, not following nature's writ. And it was absolutely nothing like it'd been after Second Llesse, where I had been frozen and fixed unto myself. My blood was still red, and had not become gray nor dark, so it might be that I did not share the stretched lifespan of the Mighty who partook in Night. On the other hand, I had come into the priesthood of the Sisters after the devouring of Winter: it was unprecedented grounds we were treading.
Book 5 Chapter 36 "Bid"

> And as the Black Queen is a new Name, it's hardly as defined as an already existing one.

> With the pivot came more. My mantle stirred. Queenship would be granted to me by the Tower, by Name and by right. But not like the rulers of the Old Kingdom, no. Mine would not be so pristine a reign. If I was to be queen, it would be a queen cloaked in black with hands bloodied red. Though young and half-formed, the Name was taking shape. Beckoning.

Sounds like the definition was coming along quite nicely!

Liliet

P.S. that last one is from Swan Song in Book 3

Mammon

Ah, monthlies. That's why I couldn't find it. Guess you're right, it was a Squire thing. Still not necessarily a Named thing, as female Kairos likely would've still been tormented by periods same as everything else.

Villains don't age to death. They do age, as Wekesa and Amadeus weren't young boys when Cat met them. They simply age to the age they prefer and/or stop aging physically while their internal age is slowed down. But in between Villains rarely living for centuries, Cat having explained what the consequence of magical anything to avoid consequences such as fatigue can do, and the non-undead villains we've seen, explicit proof that thousand years or more lifespans just by Name-sake rather than a longer lifespan and whatever still undefined powers Ranger has is not yet a said and done case.

Squire is a Name that is supposed to be stronger and youthful, while the Sovereign is just a complete all round army smasher Fey Name as high Fey names tend to be. Cat has no experience with any other Name including Leader Names. Akua and Masego weren't physically enhanced (remember how Masego would easily run out of breath despite being Apprentice?) because that's not part of their Name. If Cat's Name is hollowed out, camouflaged or part of Sve Noc, then she wouldn't feel its thrum or assign the effects of being Named to it over her patrons. If she refers to things that not her Name but her Name as Squire and Duchess provided, then my point still stands.

That definition of Black Queen still sounds pretty vague. Cat's hands are already bloodied red, and there's no definition of whose blood it would have to be. She's red-handed for having killed Saint and reviving Pilgrim, she's red-handed for having broken the kappa-Troy (Yes, I'm intentionally incorrectly writing the name wrong worse every time because I don't remember how you really have to spell it)'s fingers, she's red-handed for the things she did for her Callow. And she will be all the more red-handed for the things she's yet to do. Not because she's the one shedding blood but, as she again said this chapter, because she's the one so easily and grandly accused of it while the bloodshed of others and especially Good is so easily and quickly ignored or overlooked as necessary.

A queen cloaked black, and all the more black now that she is cloaked in Night, who has been for the whole book the Queen of compromises and hard actions, that sounds like the Cat we're seeing now. You're assuming she's going to have to be a lot more directly bloodthirsty for bloody red hands, but as we've seen this very chapter the way that people see her (which is what matters for Names) is that she already is a red-handed powerful Tyrant of Callow. They already fear and hate her for what she is and has done, if they oppose her.

Liliet

> Guess you're right, it was a Squire thing. Still not necessarily a Named thing, as female Kairos likely would've still been tormented by periods same as everything else.

Absolutely irrelevant. Kairos is a special case, with his illness being the central narrative thing about him that powered his everything else, so he couldn't get out of it. If his hypothetical periods were a part of that they'd stay, if they weren't they'd go.

Periods are not in fact narratively relevant for Catherine. Note how she remarks on them, like, once in the entire Book 5, and just when musing on changes that came with her no longer being fae or Named.

> while the Sovereign is just a complete all round army smasher Fey Name as high Fey names tend to be.

Still not a Name.

> If Cat's Name is hollowed out, camouflaged or part of Sve Noc, then she wouldn't feel its thrum or assign the effects of being Named to it over her patrons.

That hypothesis presents additional complexity with 0 evidence pointing towards it.

> A queen cloaked black, and all the more black now that she is cloaked in Night, who has been for the whole book the Queen of compromises and hard actions, that sounds like the Cat we're seeing now. You're assuming she's going to have to be a lot more directly bloodthirsty for bloody red hands, but as we've seen this very chapter the way that people see her (which is what matters for Names) is that she already is a red-handed powerful Tyrant of Callow. They already fear and hate her for what she is and has done, if they oppose her.

Yes, exactly. The groove is there. She just isn't the person they all think she is, and so does not fit it.

Mammon

>Kairos is a special case, with his illness being the central narrative thing about him that powered his everything else, so he couldn't get out of it.

Unless the whole issue of a travelling, fighting and bantering Name would have the monthlies is the reason for it disappearing, while more mood-swinging suitable Names would keep them. Squire lost it because she is supposed to feel the full brunt of Name change, is supposed to be the clever one outsmarting more powerful Names without two days a month weakness or change, etc. A ruler who doesn't have to travel with everything they need carried by themselves might not get the menstruation-exception.

Squire being the only we know of to not having monthlies isn't enough of a case to make a conclusion on. And for some reason EE doesn't immediately say whether new female Named, so Squire is the only one we've got to go on. Akua might still have had periods for all we know, though Archer likely didn't because of the travelling. Augur might still have them because there's no inherent weakness in this to scrap it for her. etc.

>That hypothesis presents additional complexity with 0 evidence pointing towards it.

Similar to how assuming that Cat doesn't have a Name because she has less narratively binding means to solve solutions, would feel the thrum of a potentially much more subtle Name in a more subtly written than book 1 and 2 writing style when Night is thick in her veins, and that just because Cat isn't using her Name as directly.

> Yes, exactly. The groove is there. She just isn't the person they all think she is, and so does not fit it.

Hierarch. He didn't have to be a ruler to be a ruler, as long as the people and the People saw him as a ruler. He never had to fit the groove of Hierarch and could in fact rebel all he wanted against it, it still clinged to him. Once the People and Kahunas declared that he had to accept it, he had to accept it. But he never had to fit the groove.

Crash

I'm starting to think that having this conversation with you is absolutely pointless because the problem here is that you seem to have no idea what is a Name and what is a title, and Roles just don't exist at all.

>>A queen cloaked black, and all the more black now that she is cloaked in Night, who has been for the whole book the Queen of compromises and hard actions, that sounds like the Cat we're seeing now. You're assuming she's going to have to be a lot more directly bloodthirsty for bloody red hands, but as we've seen this very chapter the way that people see her (which is what matters for Names) is that she already is a red-handed powerful Tyrant of Callow. They already fear and hate her for what she is and has done, if they oppose her.

What people perceive Cat as doesn't matter at all. The only relevant thing is what Cat thinks of herself. Having people create a groove for her to fit in with their beliefs is nice and powers up her Name but it's by no means necessary. Again, Hierophant. Masego had an objective that didn't have a storied groove in Creation but he thought he would be the one to do it, vivisect a god, usher mysteries; and so he made his own Name because he had his own idea. At that point, most people would expect him to be Apprentice until he eventually inherited the name of Warlock or some other Mage name that already existed but he, Masego, disagreed and so he became Hierophant instead.

People think Cat is a bloodthirsty person, she disagrees. Back when she was the Squire people expected her to get a Warrior-related name and thought she was bloodthirsty. Did she get named Bloody Knight or something because people think that? No.

Liliet

I'll note that from what we know of Name mechanics, the archetype of hierophant – like, the word itself – had to have already existed and been an established cultural groove, even if no-one had had it as a Name, per se, before.

For reference see: WoG about 'Grey Knight'.

Mammon

See many other comments I've already written before, as those cover much to all of the arguments I'd make here.

Crash

So literally what appears to me as a fundamental misunderstanding of what the concepts you're attempting to wield to prove your point actually mean and I'm sure you feel similarly about my own ideas on this.

I think we'll have to agree to disagree on this one for now, but thanks for the long conversation anyway. Maybe we can take it up again in light of the epilogue, but most likely only when we have new things to discuss in the next book.

IDKWhoitis

My running theory is that Cat is mutilating the very grooves of Fate in regards to her roles and massive weight story wise. They will remember her so long after her death, much like Triumphant or Dead King. To fully embody a name, is to chain yourself to an anchor. For every one of your successes, lays the seeds of your failures and forces you down paths carved before you.

Cat is creating new paths, and as such faces even steeper opposition from the status quo. However, lacking any predefined path forwards, gives her enough mobility to jump over any narrative pitfalls that a lesser Name would be constrained into falling.

Liliet

> To fully embody a name, is to chain yourself to an anchor. For every one of your successes, lays the seeds of your failures and forces you down paths carved before you.

I don't think that's a Name thing. It's a general narrative thing, and Cat's been struggling with not falling into the traps of that regardless of being non-Named.

Liliet

It's not Creation and Providence that are forcing her into pivots and great events anymore. She's just been in position for it since Book 3, it doesn't TAKE Providence for someone in her situation and with her personality to be as central to continenal politics as she is. Pivots and narrative swirlies form around her actions BECAUSE her actions are narrative heavy. The object level forms the meta level here, not the other way around.

And it's not narrative weight that determines whether one has a Name or not. It's whether or not you fit a groove / a character archetype that has accumulated narrative weight of its own to lend you – so it's actually the other way around.

Mammon

That's true for things like Callow's political standing in the Grand Alliance, but not things like 2000 horsemen joining you or an old man being certain that he can kill you with a Pattern of Three. From what we know, it's more likely to assume that Cat's thresher abilities are a Named-boosted trait of hers rather than a non-Named or even Role power of hers. To see the kapatractoi join her like this same as the Hangman and the likes strongly suggests that she has some Name, even if it's not a complete and acknowledged Name with Aspects (yet). And Pilgrim, who with his Choir insight should be able to tell the difference between Named and non-Named, hasn't changed his approach to her. Story-ties wise, she still appears to be Named based on what we've seen.

Liliet

> but not things like 2000 horsemen joining you

Yeah, that's just the Power of Charisma and also the Power of Being Right. Pallas straight up says that she's very aware she was helping Dead King at the time and would like to make up for that. And also, to Basilia, that her blood quickened at Catherine giving her impromptu speech about the League not being there for the fight. There's nothing supernatural about THIS outcome.

> or an old man being certain that he can kill you with a Pattern of Three

That's a Role thing, not a Name thing.

> From what we know, it's more likely to assume that Cat's thresher abilities are a Named-boosted trait of hers rather than a non-Named or even Role power of hers.

It's not a power. It's just a trait, an ability, a tendency. It's what she does as a person, and the narrative picks up on it and amplifies it as a feature of her Role, throwing more opportunities for it her way.

> To see the kapatractoi join her like this same as the Hangman and the likes strongly suggests that she has some

Name, even if it's not a complete and acknowledged Name with Aspects (yet).

You either have a Name or don't. If you don't, you can be a claimant, to a specific Name or in abstract, and if you're saying Cat is one of those then I'm following, but an incomplete Name is a Name you do not, in fact, have.

> And Pilgrim, who with his Choir insight should be able to tell the difference between Named and non-Named, hasn't changed his approach to her. Story-ties wise, she still appears to be Named based on what we've seen.

Yes, she is a quasi-Named, with the same narrative weight and strength of interaction with stories as Named usually have. Yet, she doesn't have a specific Name, and so is still not actually Named, not having the abilities that all Named have. Even claimants to a specific Name – as one of four claimants to Squire Cat already had access to its features. Right now she doesn't.

caoimhinh

I think Catherine is kind of in a state of being perpetually Claimant to something, the problem is that it just keeps changing. Ever since she mutilated her Name of Squire by embracing the Fae Title of Sovereign of Moonless Nights, she's been in this state, barely connected to a Name and forging multiple stories and pivots that shape up to multiple paths and multiple possible Names, she just never settles into any single one.

Even in Keter she still heard new parts of the song of the Dread Empress Claimants "the Girl Who Climbed the Tower".

She has a Role and actively plays it, so she must have a Name at some point.

But since her interpretation and manifestation of that Role keeps changing according to the circumstances, her Role is never stabilized into a single Name, but she definitely is constantly moving towards that.

When Cat finally settles into a new Name, that Name will be something that embraces everything Cat is, something that encompasses all that the manifestations of her Role are.

Liliet

Being a claimant to a specific Name gives you features of being Named though. Catherine first noticed her reflexes being much faster in the goddamn Name vision Amadeus sent her to with that one stabbing, aka literally immediately. Right now Cat's referring to herself as non-Named, and I am very much inclined to trust that.

So the way I'm reading it, like Amadeus as of Epilogue 4, she's abstractly a claimant – in position to snatch what power comes her way if she wants to. But until she does, it's only a potential that doesn't really impact her abilities or interactions.

> When Cat finally settles into a new Name, that Name will be something that embraces everything Cat is, something that encompasses all that the manifestations of her Role are.

That's not how Names work. Names are archetypes, and a complete person isn't an archetype.

That said, I agree that it's possible that Cat will manage to form an accurate archetype of herself in the minds of people, and it'll birth her a very accurate Name. So far, though, it sounds like her reputation is wildly out of control and doesn't match the real her very well stil. That doesn't sound like a recipe for a Name.

Mammon

One general, yes. A general with their troops, yes. A general with their troops which were all humiliated, their finger broken and send away with their arnaments taken, the general still being able to make that gesture without most of the cavalry leaving or protesting because Kairos said they could is a Name-aided thing of providence, not just Charisma. Threshers can find more talent better, but this here is the Name-granted providence smoothing out the wrinkles behind Story-events.

Pattern of Three, is it though? Would it really be so simple that anyone could get William's plot armour simply by getting a Pattern of Three with any non-Named and then being all the more unkillable by Named? Would it really be so simple that even someone like Pilgrim would fully assume that a Pattern of Three would stick with a non-Named who's no longer something like a Fey Duchess either, to the point that he'd sacrifice a good chunk of army to it?

>You either have a Name or don't. ... an incomplete Name is a Name you do not, in fact, have.
Unless of course there's some power and Aspect-stealing lesser god thickly flowing through Cat's veins to both take a lot of her Name and give her her Name's powers in its stead. It's quite possible that only the Story-threads remain of the Name, if she has one.

Liliet

> Pattern of Three, is it though? Would it really be so simple that anyone could get William's plot armour simply by getting a Pattern of Three with any non-Named and then being all the more unkillable by Named? Would it really be so simple that even someone like Pilgrim would fully assume that a Pattern of Three would stick with a non-Named who's no longer something like a Fey Duchess either, to the point that he'd sacrifice a good chunk of army to it?

There is a Role requirement for a Pattern of Three though. You can't just get one with whoever you like. Allow me to quote WoG on the subject:

"I've been seeing misunderstandings in the comment section for the last few chapters about patterns of three, so I'll lay out a few things here. The victory/draw/defeat setup that's been introduced in the story is something that occurs solely between Names that are rivals in their story – in this case Lone Swordsman/Squire and Heiress/Squire. You don't get to pick who your rival is, otherwise clever villains would just start a pattern of three with a weak hero, freeze them and ship them on the other side of the world then be more or less impossible to kill for a few centuries. Juniper doesn't have a Name, and so can't be involved in something like this. The Black Knight and the Wandering Bard are not rivals, so looking for a pattern there is also pointless."

Catherine managed to be in a mirror-opposite-but-roughly-equal-and-similar Role to Grey Pilgrim without being Named. This is rare and notable. It doesn't mean she was secretly Named. Again, it's the Role that's the key, not the Name. Akua explains that in her narration after First Liesse.

> Unless of course there's some power and Aspect-stealing lesser god thickly flowing through Cat's veins to both take a lot of her Name and give her her Name's powers in its stead.

Unless Cat is secretly Triumphant reincarnated with memory loss. And Tariq is secretly Traitorous. And Bard is a time-traveling Cat from the future. And the Dead King was a good guy all along and all his killings have been faked by the Bard, and the memory Cat saw was just her being an unreliable narrator as she straight up lied to the audience about what she saw.

And the entire Guide is a dying dream of a coma patient.

Mammon

>something that occurs solely between Names that are rivals in their story

This sounds like an in-story confirmed thing that Pilgrim should thus know. Again, sacrificing an army on a gamble that Cat's Role would be opposite to his Name rather than Cat having a Name in his eyes sounds like something that not even Pilgrim would risk when DK is moving. And were they really that opposite? He's been mostly banking it on 'She's an evil and clever mastermind' while he's not at all fitting the narrative opposite of young and unproven or the outmatched cornered one that never wanted conflict that such a pattern would require. He was banking it on a pattern that might work for Named but there's too much dissonance from the cliches and tropes for him to rely on that against a Role considering the investment risk.

Which again, results in different interpretations of Named that we seem to have. I'd say, Named is not necessary only three Aspects mortal Named, that's just a subsection of it.

Liliet

> Again, sacrificing an army on a gamble that Cat's Role would be opposite to his Name

No, that Cat's Role would be opposite to his Role. It's not a Name thing – Cat's rivals in Book 2 were Heiress and Lone Swordsman, and while Heiress/Squire being rivals is sort of arguably tied into the Names, Squire vs Lone Swordsman is entirely arbitrary and contextual, ie, the function of their respective Roles.

NZPIEFACE

I think she's trying her best not to create a Name out of the already deep as fuck groove she's tearing into Creation with the Liesse Accords.

She wants to create a new status quo. I think making a Name that makes new status quos will be against that wish, since you know, her status quo will be overridden.

Vin reisling

Can we just put a vote link at the bottom of each chapter to cut out the obnoxious vote comments? Every time I think I'm going to see some discussion, and it's just "hurrr hurr vote".

tithin

yeah, getting a little tired of coming down to the comments to see discussion and instead it's 6 people all tripping over themselves to reword the story to make people vote.

It was clever / original the first time it happened, when you've got a bunch of people doing it on every chapter it gets really old.

Liliet

I wish everyone would go to simple 'Vote! [link]' vote reminders =x

Shveiran

You know what I dislike, though?

Comments that complain about this kind of things.

I like the vote posts. They often make me laugh. But even if they didn't, I don't get what makes them worth arguing over: they are usually a reply to each other and they are easy to spot.

You don't like reading them? Fine and dandy.

Just. Scroll. Down. No one is requiring you read them. You won't make them stop by complaining, because a lot of us do like them and will keep making them.

Just scroll down, and go on with your day. Isn't it simpler?

tithin

Right now, I scroll down, but it's annoying to have to scroll down because there's so many of these comments on every episode, and none of them are unique, or interesting, or contribute in any way shape or form to the community.

So no, it's not "simpler" to just scroll down, perhaps by making an observation that these posts aren't enjoyable to me, it may make the people who make those posts reconsider. One or two posts? scroll. as many as are being posted? it's valid to make a comment pointing out that too many are doing it and it contributes nothing.

Liliet

For me they actively ruin cool moments from the chapter immediately by... defacing them with the joke.

And I read too quickly to realize I should just scroll past in time, not to mention how many times I refresh comments and have to scroll past these without reading all over again.

They're like a fucking enjoyment landmine, where while thinking of a cool phrasing I instead get the 'vote! hahaha funny' bullshit in my head instead.

tithin

Thank you Liliet

Shveiran

You. You find them annoying.

Others enjoy them.

Others dislike rampant speculations or shipping.

Others, like me, dislike pointless arguing.

Removing them is not an "objective" improvement, but a subjective one.

I'm not arguing you don't have the right to say "I dislike this".

I'm arguing it is pointless, and spawns just as many useless comments as you are trying to prevent:if I disliked the vote jokes, now I'd have to scroll down BOTH the jokes AND the comments about how you dislike them.

Do these kind of rebuttal offer anything to the community? Really ask yourself, is it going to improve the discussion or just spawn another pointless argument?

Because if you think it's the letter, maybe you should stop complaining.

Not because I have a right to ask you to stop, but because it achieves nothing and irritates some.

Liliet

I have seen people agree with me.

I expect I'm not the only one whose enjoyment it actively improves to see things I dislike followed by criticism posted with equal amount of weight in the same format.

caoimhinh

And you have also seen people agree with those who post the "Vote!" comments, and many who like the post where they are creative with the way they post it.

I particularly like that they get creative and find different ways to post the same message, as to avoid being repetitive. Sometimes they are good and funny, sometimes not so much, it varies like everything in life. It's also not just one person who always makes that comment, but different ones.

You don't like those comments? Ok, fine. You are entitled to that, but could you please refrain from insulting them? Basic respect is a minimum who must have even when having differences of opinion. Saying things like "they actively ruin cool moments" may be your opinion, but surely calling them things like "They're a fucking enjoyment landmine" is going a bit too far?

They are not harming anyone, it's not spam nor ads for money, and they are not even doing it for themselves, they do it because they want this web novel to get more recognition.

It's a selfless thing, it's a good thing. No need to get annoyed or grumpy like those old people who yell at children because they laugh too loud when playing. Why get annoyed over someone having harmless fun?

Liliet

Because it harms me?

caoimhinh

No, it really doesn't.

At least it harms you no more than it harms someone who gets outraged at there being LGBT characters in the story.

The problem lies within yourself, not in the others making comments that should in no way harm you yet due to your own personal perceptions annoy you.

Liliet

> At least it harms you no more than it harms someone who gets outraged at there being LGBT characters in the story.

This comparison is ludicrous. Comments about being outraged at LGBT characters ARE harmful on a level that is entirely incomparable with my complaints about shitty unpleasant upsetting vote reminders. Or, yes, the vote reminders themselves. Can we not do reductio ad hitlerum here?

Shveiran

That's not what he said.

He said "what the joke voters post harms you in the same way the existence of the LGBTQ members harms intollerant people" not "what you and haters do has the same effect on the world".

The comparison doesn't refer to your actions. Just the perceived legitimacy of what moves you to act.

He simply read your "Because it harms me" comment above, and said "no, it really doesn't. It may irritate you, but that is a different thing."

caoimhinh

You aren't harmed, Lilieth.

You are only slightly inconvenienced by the vote comments, due to your own perceptions and susceptibility, born from (as you yourself had said) a mixture of the feelings you get at the end of a chapter, and the place these comments occupy, thus generating what you called "a fucking enjoyment landmine, where while thinking of a cool phrasing I instead get the 'vote! hahaha funny' bullshit in my head instead."

You are getting annoyed out of someone who is simply having harmless fun, because their joke clashes against the serious hype you have in your head at the end of the chapter, but that's really no reason for them to stop, it's you who must learn to look past them.

Plus, there are others who do enjoy the vote comment jokes, as shown by different people doing it and those who like those comments. So I doubt these comments will stop because of two or three complainers who don't have a legitimate reason beyond "I don't find it funny"

Liliet

I am not obligated to 'look past it' any more than they're obligated to stop, though.

As for the hypothetical 'anti-LGBT' commenters, the issue with them is not that they aren't allowed to get upset about things, it's that their upsetness when expressed does a lot more harm than being upset does to them. It's a $x \gg y$, not $y=0$. Not to mention that practicing getting over this upsetness does both them and the world a lot of good, while absolutely no-one would ~tangibly have a greater benefit~ from me learning to not read the comments or something.

tithin

There's nothing wrong with "Vote for thing, link" and if it was just one or two of that, fine, no harm no foul.

But I've already detailed why I find them annoying, and Liliet's commentary also encapsulates some of my feeling here so I'm not going to repeat myself.

One of the arguments being deployed here is:

"I'm arguing it is pointless, and spawns just as many useless comments as you are trying to prevent:if I disliked the vote jokes, now I'd have to scroll down BOTH the jokes AND the comments about how you dislike them.

Do these kind of rebuttal offer anything to the community? Really ask yourself, is it going to improve the discussion or just spawn another pointless argument?

Because if you think it's the letter, maybe you should stop complaining."

Yes, the Rebuttals serve to provide notice that people dislike them and are expressing that displeasure, something that they have the right to do, and which you acknowledge

And yes, I do feel that it will improve discussion on the site by serving to make people aware that those sorts of comments, WHEN DONE BY AS MANY PEOPLE AS ARE DOING IT, are extremely annoying.

Because ultimately, with the number of people that are doing it, it doesn't feel like a "I want to see the web novel grow" it reads like a blatant attempt to be superfan#1 by being the fastest possible person to post such a comment.

Just get one person to do it, and everyone else can be all congratulatory to them, and then everyone's happy. I'm happy because I only see one of them, and y'all are happy because you get to see the rewashed content you so crave.

caoimhinh

But you do realize that they aren't actually that many people, right?

We see like 4 tops in a chapter. That's out of dozens and sometimes hundreds of comments. Although they aren't always the same people who comment, when they see someone already made a comment in that style in a given chapter, they refrain from doing it.

They are likely to be the first comments that you see, though. And maybe the only ones you see, if you read the chapter very early or if you only read the first few comments. But they aren't a spam of lots of comments.

Lilieth pointed out that one of the issues was that she saw these comments right at the end of the chapter, thus effecting a turndown of the "epic moment in her head". But honestly, that's out of anyone's control. The way someone perceives and feels about a scene and the way they feel when they see it parodied in a comment, varies from reader to reader.

But they are free to make those comments, either way. There is no bad intent in them.

tithin

To say that "it's out of anyone's control" though is not the case, it's very explicitly in someone's control to not make that comment – again, if the comment were simply "hey, here's a link to go vote for the thing" sure, no issues, I'll keep scrolling, and it won't bug Lilieth because it's not impacting on diminishing the story.

I don't see the point in arguing this further as neither of us is going to change the mind of the other, so this is as dust in the wind. You're entitled to your opinion and I to mine, suffice it to say that for me, it's extremely annoying and as people seem wont to defend it, I will continue to point out that is irritating in the vain hope that I'll see less of those sorts of comments.

Shveiran

Yes, it is pointless to keep arguing the point.

I am not so much of an hypocrite to keep doing what I'd like you to refrain from – argue for someone to stop doing what you find annoying, when there is no real chance that your words will affect them.

I hoped we could get ridd of one pointless discussion, but there is no point in spawning another.

So I'll just make this last request – that you give it some thought from our perspective.

Can't you see that just like I miserably failed to convince you or change your behavior, you won't change theirs?

These are your own words, just now:

"I don't see the point in arguing this further as neither of us is going to change the mind of the other, so this is as dust in the wind. You're entitled to your opinion and I to mine" and they are true.

But they don't apply just to you and me, do they? They also apply to you and them.

If your argument is "I dislike that", which is legit, they will reply "too bad." And that is legit too.

Because others do enjoy those comments.

Because you are not alone in how you feel, but neither are them.

Because maybe they are spoiling your fun somewhat, but staying silent would somewhat spoil theirs.

You won't change their mind, you'll just spoil their fun while not saving yours, and making it worse for those that dislike both the joke votes and your rebuttals.

Everyone loses.

So why do it?

I will say no more, so long as you refrain from outright attacking them. As we both said, there is no point.

Do what you will, I won't argue further. It's not like I could stop you, anyway.

Liliet

> Although they aren't always the same people who comment, when they see someone already made a comment in that style in a given chapter, they refrain from doing it.

You know, except for the part where these comments are being posted AS A REPLY TO THE PREVIOUS ONE.

I don't have an issue with people posting separate unrelated vote reminder comments, when it's clear the person didn't see the previous one when they posted their own. Although I'll continue to provide feedback on the jokes themselves, in hopes that people will actually respond to it and start going with jokes that are more actually funny.

But when people are clearly trying to one up each other, that's a problem.

> But they are free to make those comments, either way. There is no bad intent in them.

And I'm free to make my own comments about those comments. There is no bad intent in that, either. Free speech works both ways.

caoimhinh

>"except for the part where these comments are being posted AS A REPLY TO THE PREVIOUS ONE... when people are clearly trying to one up each other, that's a problem."

That's called a comment thread, that's where they are supposed to be. Comments of the same nature or touching the same topic being in the same thread has nothing strange or bad, you know? That's why threads exist in the first place.

There's absolutely nothing wrong with people trying to up one another either, that's how they improve; they are sharing a common interest and replying to each other as they share the joke and have fun, you should have no problem with people having fun on their own.

If some of the readers were to make a comment thread making lame puns with characters and events of the guide, and you don't want to participate or don't like the puns, you simply scroll down and ignore the thread, not start commenting to tell them to stop or tell them to make puns that are funny to you, right?

>"I'm free to make my own comments about those comments. There is no bad intent in that, either. Free speech works both ways."

Except for the part where you insulted those who made vote comments and those who parodied phrases of the chapters to invite others to vote. Or the part where you are trying to impose your own personal taste to other people's comments and now want to set a standard of "if your joke is not funny to me, don't post it".

We all have opinions and the right to express ourselves; unless their jokes and comments are actually offensive or unlawful, you have no right to censure them nor to dictate what they can put in their comments or how they make their jokes. It's harmless fun while sending the reminder to vote in topwebfiction for this web novel, they are not doing anything bad.

Liliet

> There's absolutely nothing wrong with people trying to up one another either, that's how they improve;

If they want to improve, they get my feedback as guidance. I'm helping!

> you should have no problem with people having fun on their own.

I don't have a problem with people having fun 'on their own'. But this isn't on their own, this is in a public place, where they are literally inviting commentary. This isn't on their own blog, this isn't in a private chat, this isn't in a specialized discord channel. You don't get to masturbate in front of a public building then complain that people are taking issue with you 'having fun on your own'*.

* a hyperbolic comparison meant to delineate the difference, not to suggest this is of the same severity or nature.

> We all have opinions and the right to express ourselves; unless their jokes and comments are actually offensive or unlawful, you have no right to censure them

Are you aware of what the word 'censure' means?

If I was a mod and I was deleting those comments because I don't like them, that'd be censoring. Notably, at least some people would argue that I'd have a right to do that as that is, in fact, a mod's right and responsibility, and 'the right to free speech' applies specifically to government and mass media, not to saying whatever you want anywhere you want with no-one having a right to ask you not to.

Like... by those standards, you're censuring me too. Am I doing serious harm to them by insisting their jokes aren't funny? I'm discouraging them, yes. That's exactly the goal I'm pursuing. I'm not seeing how it's offensive/harmful.

> Except for the part where you insulted those who made vote comments and those who parodied phrases of the chapters to invite others to vote.

> Or the part where you are trying to impose your own personal taste to other people's comments and now want to set a standard of "if your joke is not funny to me, don't post it".

Welp, I'll apologize for the insults if any of those people asks me to. I don't remember any specifically but I do believe I might have gotten a little heated =x

As for imposing personal taste and setting standards: yes. I'm a part of this community, I get to try to do that.

You are right now attempting to impose your own taste on me and set the standard of "no-one gets to complain about someone else's jokes unless they are actively offensive to real-world marginalized groups". I disagree with that standard, but I do not deny your right to try to convince me in its favor. It appears we're at an impasse, good sir.

Liliet

> Can't you see that just like I miserably failed to convince you or change your behavior, you won't change theirs?

I am trying to, just by giving feedback on the jokes themselves. Who knows, maybe next time when they're thinking of one they'll go 'hmm but can i make a joke AND get a compliment from Liliet on it? it's a challenge!'

It's worth trying, and it makes people who agree with me feel better, so... win-win!

Valkyria

Gods. I really wish Cat could once just do what she wants. Use all her power and just hammer it into them.

I won't point out the obvious reasons why she can't and shouldn't bc they were mentioned in the chapter.

But it would be so blissfull to watch those blithering, ignorant dumbasses realize how damn lucky they are that Cat is holding herself back. That Cat is not just smiting everyone. How happy they can be that she is not a Villian in the Old Way.
That would be so satisfying.
Stupid, alright.
But satisfying.

Liliet

Not to everyone :3

Valkyria

Well to me it would :3

Liliet

Yeah, well, see my comment below.

Cat's WINNING this game and I'm so fucking proud of her.

Valkyria

I'm not saying I don't like how great she's handling things now. It's just me feeling her frustration of just wanting to smash a table or two (or heads) in the face of stupidity.

Liliet

Yes, well, but being the bigger person is so much more viscerally satisfying!

...I might be the weird one, I'll give you that.

Valkyria

That is true but I probably just put myself in there. I mostly try being the bigger person but can't always so I know how it feels to snap. (At some point it just won't work anymore) But it is satisfying to just let it all out.

So I'm proud she knows how to handle herself but I wonder if she will be able to do that or if at some point she snaps too. Knowing her even her snapping would be controlled and measured but still.

For me there was always a point where I just couldn't take it anymore.

Of course in my life it's not nations or continents that are at stake.

Nah, you just have an opinion. Just like me. It's just not the same.

Liliet

TBH I have greatly enjoyed the moments when Cat snapping was just her going 'guess I'll die' and giving up (First Summerholm, Everdark). And I am a great fan of her leaning into her heroic tendencies as well :3

Are you familiar with the anime 'Trigun'?

Valkyria

Yes those were great indeed.

I know it but never watched it. Why?

Liliet

Well, Vash the Stampede is one of my favorite fictional characters, and btw I recommend, it's a pretty short series. He's a little relevant to my opinion on this ;u;

NZPIEFACE

She had her one moment where she DIAVOLO'd Akua.

Everything after that was sadly not carthartic at all.

Liliet

RIP 😊

Liliet

God, this was so satisfying. I'm so fucking HERE for Cat balancing on the tightrope and not falling anymore. Not throwing a tantrum, not fucking up her diplomatic relationships for the future by trying to regain control of this one, graciously admitting loss and leaving the stage when that's the best thing she can do.

Not destroying her enemies out of pure spite, because there must be more than ruin.

And winning allies without expecting any, just by being intensely herself at all times.

Agent J

Mortality is the best damned thing to ever happen to her. To keep the limp, to take up the staff over the sword, to just walk away when a battle is lost rather than losing herself to the heat of the moment. New Cat is best Cat.

She has finally grown up and grown into her own and I'm loving every bloody moment of it. Hells, even her father comfortably cowers in her shadow.

Long live the Black Queen.

Liliet

God, that conversation where Amadeus takes an insult and turns it into a compliment to his kid instead is so fucking iconic ♥

Agent J

There's a reason he's so beloved by readers. He is one of the most supportive fathers I've seen in media. Wekesa should have learned from him. Trying to imprison your son so he doesn't get in the way of murdering your niece? Poor form, 'Kesa. Poor form.

Liliet

To be fair, there's such a thing as going too far, and "why doesn't my daughter want to murder me for power?" is a little out there...

Liliet

(But yes god Amadeus nails Good Parenting while actively trying not to, god bless the idiot and icon)

Rup

"Comfortable Cowering" is my new favourite pose.. LOL

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, it was great to see her try, but then just said "Fuck it, your loss".

Liliet

It felt really climactic to me to see Cat's bad leg do exactly what Cat wanted it to and stop her from making a shitty decision – and then having Cat just take the high road again...

...AND THEN GET AN ARMY OUT OF IT.

Because Doing The Right Thing is a boomerang, and you do end up inspiring people to follow your example, if you stick with it :3

Masterofbones

And here I was thinking that there wouldn't be a reference to Aleister Crowley in this story. "Do as thou wilt shall be the whole of the law" indeed. The Tyrant is the best, and his friendship with Cat is fantastic.

ninegardens

Last chapter:

"Basillia, why are you here?"

General Basilia, dutifully: "We are here solely to carry out the final orders of Kiaros Theodosian"

This chapter:

General Basilia (Still dutifully): "Tyrants orders were to do whatever the fuck we want. Lols"

Liliet

THE FUCKING BEST

My current running theory is that Basilia and Kairos might be related on his mother's side.

Halinn

Very nice to see the bad leg being used as the reminder that Cat meant to it be

Liliet

Storyworld is convenient that way XD

Sugar Roll

Well, now all we need is for Amadeus to take control of Praes so they can join the party. The King of Death against all of Calernia. I like the sound of that.

laguz24

Is it just me or is there a fate obligated providence related law that says all long term plans must be screwed up. Since I haven't seen a single plan go off without a hitch.

ninegardens

A certain Mr Theodosian would beg to differ.

As would Auger when Vs the Bard.

As for “things going off without a hitch” – how often does that happen in real life?

And when you’ve got three or more sides playing against one another, AT LEAST 2/3 of them are going to have their plans screwed, and more likely all three.

Prediction is hard, especially when making predictions about the future. Mostly you’ve just got to make your plans robust, and then take the victories you can.

Mental Mouse

> A certain Mr Theodosian would beg to differ.

From beyond the grave: “Mister? That’s Lèse-majesté! That calls for... a ‘promotion’, heh heh heh.”

onedollargum

“The blood quickened”. I wonder what that’s meant to mean exactly.

Shveiran

I read it mostly as a “she is someone worth following. When she does what she does, my blood gets pumping like it did with Kairos. I can find purpose in joining her cause, because she is worthy in my Helikean eyes”.

ninegardens

I’m also wondering if this is a case of Cat only half knowing the relevant language. Hence the saying would make perfect sense in its native tongue, but understand it from Cat’s perspective and hence we get soemthing which only half makes sense.

Fayhem

I’m not really a polyglot myself, but I have been given to understand that grasping idiom is usually the hardest part of learning a new language since they comparatively rarely put that in the books (which IMO is a, as Amadeus would say, mistake). So that would make sense to me. I think Shveiran’s interpretation is valid, but it would also make sense that an idiom or cultural reference (e.g., maybe that’s a line in a famous Helikean play about Why We Follow Tyrants) is being used here to give the statement extra weight that Basilia would grasp immediately.

Liliet

As a non-native English speaker who is also autistic and so had to develop a special cognitive algorithm for grasping idioms in her native language too...

Wait, it's not obvious from context?

Zim the Vixen

Here's a more explicit recreation of that interaction

"And? Did you find you were looking for? Now that we are free to do as we will, do you really wish to go with her?" General Basilia said.

"Yes," General Pallas. "Yes. The blood quickened. She got angry, pulse rose, she tensed. She almost took those men's heads off. All of our heads off. This is absolutely what I was looking for in her. It wasn't just that one time, when she broke us cataphracts."

Liliet

Hm.

I took that as Pallas saying her blood quickened at Cat's speech, ie she is excited by Cat's leadership and wants to follow it.

Your interpretation feels... off to me, but I cannot see a specific reason why other than 'very different from mine'.
Hrm.

Rup

..like the three-body-problem ...
"three or more sides playing against one another,"

Liliet

Well, 'no plan survives first contact with the enemy' is a real world saying...

Or, as a very good Fire Emblem fic I recently read put it, "I trust my forces. I don't trust the opponent's".

Also, I suspect there is in fact a tendency baked into the very nature of Named to go against manipulations and being used, acting as the grain of sand in the machinery – as rare is the story that doesn't have its protagonist do that, deliberately or unwittingly.

Some Smartass

Someone's villain can be as inspiring as their hero. Even in death, Kairos teaches us more about villainy.

NZPIEFACE

Ah, the ultimate betrayal of Below. Somehow inspiring people to be Good when you were an Evil Tyrant above them.

Somehow.

Shveiran

I'm fully convinced that if Kairos bought an apple, someone would find reasons to explain how that is the ultimate betrayal to bananas.

Liliet

When you have declared undying friendship to enough opposing factions, literally anything you do is a betrayal of at least one of them!

It's foolproof!

aran

> How can you even know this wasn't her doing from the start?

You... you literally just tried to throw a poisoned weapon into her face, Prodocius; they all saw you do it...

aran

The two Helikean generals are surprisingly decent, for Helikeans.

Abrakadabra

I am a little disappointed that Bellerophon just leaves. If they think on it there is no larger tyrant Than one WHO would rule over the people even after death.

Chapter 89: Sing We Of Ruin

"Fifty-five: if your powers are lost, they will nearly always return greater than before so long as the appropriate moral lesson is learned. With kindness and humility comes overwhelming martial might."

- "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

It was over.

The League's soldiers withdrew, the hostility between the different forces open but reason prevailing just enough for battle not to erupt less than a day's march from the capital of Procer. Considering the people involved, I'd not considered that a given. Secretary Nestor and his attending scribes withdrew for the night but requested permission to send an embassy under daylight. The clear intention was to request the presence of Secretariat scribes and chroniclers up north, and I accepted tonight as I fully intended to accept tomorrow. There'd be restrictions and conditions, but in principle I had no objection to their work. If I got lucky, maybe a report making its way south would even stir some Delosi to shed neutrality long enough to cease recording the end times and actively try to turn them back. A girl could dream. General Pallas and her kataphraktoi swore oaths and sent back half their number to claim their equipment and supplies still in the League camp, the rest returning with me.

Adjutant had finished speaking with Talbot and the remaining senior legate when I arrived – Tendai, wasn't it? Sounded Soninke – though he opened his report by passing a dry comment on my 'dragging yet another army home'. Like it was a bad thing, the wretch. As it turned out Juniper's report had been essentially confirmed, with the sole fresh developments a few accusations of 'Praesi treachery' and 'Callowan purges' tossed around by soldiers that'd ended in brawls. One dead, from an unlucky broken neck, and both Tendai and Talbot had come together to hang those involved as per Callowan regulations. Adjutant argued for the growing urgency of intervention there, even if risking dire consequences to the compelled, but I had no order to give him. I hesitated still to speak when those words might just kill Juniper and Aisha, among others. I presented General Pallas to him instead and dropped onto his 'drily humorous' lap the work of getting the cataphracts settled.

There'd be talk later of how many soldiers Pallas was proposing to bring north, though it shouldn't be more than ten thousand. Less, probably, though there likely to be the most finely drilled and commanded troops among the coalition's armies. At least one good thing had come out of this otherwise ruinous night.

Archer wandered off, likely to check in on Masego though given the work I'd asked of him he was like as not to ignore her presence beyond what basic courtesy required. If even that much. Vivienne was speaking with General Abigail's staff tribune to pick out what soldiers would be sent out as her escort, and I made a mental note of having the general formally granted the authority of a Marshal of Callow until Juniper could be declared fit to resume it. I'd no intention of promoting her to the rank, not for many years yet if ever, but to get affairs in order with the Army she'd need to have the weight of that authority behind her. Both the inherited structure of the Legions of Terror and the Hellhound's preference for strict lines of command had resulted in formal authority being needed to get anything moving in the Army of Callow. Akua remained with me, a shadow shadowing mine, and though I could guess she wanted to address the fact that she'd been outed I did not approach the subject. It'd be out and about before long, I knew. If Malicia felt comfortable enough handing out that information to the likes of Prodocius and Honorion, it meant she was comfortable putting it out there.

I was still uncertain how my people would take it, on the Callowan side at least. If Akua had still been stuck in my collar save when I let her out I suspected it would have been taken as a long price, but 'Advisor Kivule' was not a prisoner or entirely unknown to the men. Like as not it'd cost me a few feathers in the eyes of the heroes in the Grand Alliance, too, though I'd not hesitate to call Cordelia a damned hypocrite if she spoke so much as a word in condemnation. She didn't get to play that card when she had people lugging a Seraphim's corpse around Procer. Truth be told, given the hour I probably ought to head to bed. The immediate necessities were seen to, and the rest was probably best approached with a well-rested mind and a clear head. Black was awake, there could be now that about that, because Scribe would have missed little of what had unfolded or left him to sleep during it. I was still not looking forward to that conversation, and arguably waiting until daylight for it would not be a bad idea. It'd allow Scribe's people in the Eyes to learn more, and that when we held council we'd both have a clear idea of what was happening before decisions were made.

It was over, the succession of twists and turns that'd swallowed up my night. Or at least it ought to be over. If it was, though, why would my shoulders not loosen? Like I was awaiting a blow I was clenching onto myself, my instincts screaming there was something yet to come. And there were not, I thought, a thousand directions from which further trouble could come. So grimly I sent Akua away for the night and, cloak trailing behind me, limped towards empty smithy the Carrion Lord had claimed as his home for the duration of the conference. There were no legionaries at the door, or near either of the two windows, which was... unusual. Black had been the one to teach me that a Name was a useful thing but that it was no substitute for people watching your back. His Blackguards might not have been able to do much against a Named assassin, but there weren't a lot of those and there were lot of the regular kind. Especially when you crossed Praesi nobles. The heavy wooden door was not locked and did not resist when I pushed it open. The burning glare of the lit furnace within blinded me for a half a beat, flames roaring tall and proud.

The shadows they cast on the walls of the smithy, which had been stripped bare of much it would contain during warmer seasons, were long and shivering. Amadeus of the Green Stretch sat alone by a blackened iron anvil, his drab grey tunic and worn boots making him look like an aging shopkeeper instead of the Black Knight of Praes. On the anvil was a bottle, and not of wine. An empty one had been set on the ground by the anvil.

"Catherine," the green-eyed man greeted me. "An eventful night for you, I am told."

It was so genuinely taken aback by the slight slur to his voice I didn't manage to entirely hide my surprise. I could not remember, in all the time I'd known him, seeing my teacher even half as drunk as he clearly was right now. Not even once.

"You too, looks like," I said, flicking a glance at the bottle.

"Salian brandy," Black replied, tone amiable. "It struck me as fitting."

Shit. I wasn't familiar with the Salian kind in particular, but brandy was hard liquor. Not necessarily the hardest-hitting stuff, but if he'd really drunk more than a bottle of the stuff I could only be reluctantly impressed he wasn't falling down his Legion-issue folding chair. This isn't like you, I almost said, but bit down on it. I'd never seen him like this before, true, but then when I'd been young he'd still had the Calamities with him. People he could unwind with, as I myself did with the Woe. Who was left of that for him now, save for Scribe? So instead I snatched a cup from his table and braced my staff against the side of it, freeing my other hand to claim the other folding chair. I bit down on a hiss of pain as I limped forward to the other side of the anvil, dropping my seat there as pale green eyes followed me. I let out a sigh when I sat down, glad for the rest, and set down my cup atop the iron by the side of his. Without a word he filled it with brandy, and his own again.

"What are we drinking to?" I asked.

"Epiphany," my teacher said. "Harsh mistress that she is."

That was not a promising start, I thought, and drank deep of my cup. The brandy burned on the way down and if I'd had swallow of that at sixteen I suspected my eyes would have watered. It was smooth on the tongue, so clearly good stuff, but it couldn't be called anything but heavy.

"It's been a day," I agreed. "And a night, even."

"Yes, it has," he mildly said. "Eventful enough I'll confess the tumult blinded me, at first. Time to think set that weakness to rest."

"Kairos took us all for a ride," I said. "Our enemies a little more than us, which is the saving grace of this, but everyone took a few bruises. It'll be months if not years before we can really glimpse the scale of what he wrought."

"Kairos Theodosian's schemes are of only passing interest to me," Black said, pausing to knock back a quarter of his cup without batting an eye. "No, it is the moments that led to his swan song I have been dissecting."

The conference. Malicia. It won't matter, Scribe had warned me. He always forgives. I might not love the woman, or even like her, but I that did not mean she had been wrong in this.

"Scribe told you about the Legions-in-Exile," I guessed.

"I knew within an hour of your knowing," Black agreed. "And now I ponder how it all came to be."

"It must have been a contingency the Empress had in place for years," I said.

Another quarter of his cup went down his throat. The breathy slip of laughter he let out after that had my fingers clenching in dismay. It was... unpleasant, seeing him like this. So close to losing control, when control had always been at the heart of him.

"Decades," my teacher corrected. "The sheer breadth of possibly compromised individuals is simply staggering, viewed in retrospective. I assume it is the consequence an aspect. Wekesa would have noticed such a contingency were it sorcerous in nature and told me of it."

Most likely, I silently agreed. Masego had rubbed elbows with Juniper for years while holding an aspect related to sight and then eyes forged of Summer flame without noticing a damned thing, so I was not overly surprised that the Warlock had caught nothing. Named power could imitate sorcery, but it should never be mistaken for it – it answered to different rules, took different shapes.

"Or he might not have," Black then genially said. "It appears that the many warnings I received of sentiment being more blinding that I believed were accurate."

"The writing was on the wall after Akua's Folly," I reluctantly said.

Not for reluctance to speak the truth, but knowing how deeply painful it was to him.

"Oh no, not when it comes to Alaya," Amadeus of the Green Stretch softly said. "It is Eudokia I gravely misread."

Fuck, I thought, and kept my face blank. I'd waited too long. All this time I'd been agonizing over whether I should tell him or not, if the likely fallout was worth the honesty, and somehow it'd never occurred to me he might just figure it out on his own. How much did he know, though? I'd gotten a confession and explanation, while he must have simply pieced together details on his own.

"It is a bad habit, forcing lack of expression," Black chided. "You still do it sometimes, when taken aback. It reveals that you know something, by consequence of revealing you have something to hide."

I grimaced. He drank again.

"Not that confirmation was truly needed," he noted. "Your request with a private conversation with Scribe stood out even at the time."

"I did not know whether I should tell you," I admitted.

I might have, I thought. I liked to think I would have. But I would not lie to him and pretend it had been a sure thing.

"It would be ill-done of me to rebuke you for behaviour I instilled in you myself, largely through example," Black said, sounding darkly amused. "Though it is a fresh novelty to be treated in so high-handed a manner by anyone save Malicia."

"Scribe, she believed, believes she was saving your life, you know," I said, then hesitated before continuing, "and I'm not sure I disagree with her."

"Would you like to know how I inferred what happened?" the green-eyed man idly said, filling his cup anew.

I'd yet to finish mine, or him his, but down the bottle went. I slowly nodded, though I was not sure I actually did. He drank from his cup and I matched him, the brandy's burn a pleasant distraction from the roaring heat of the furnace and this miserable conversation.

"In the moment it bled me, that Alaya stood in that hall and saw me only as a hindrance," Black said. "That she had not, beforehand, even attempted to speak to me so it might be made into a game of silk and steel. That she'd considered a decision that so wounded me to make as inexorable, a betrayal assured – so assured there was no need to even attempt conversation.”

He paused.

“Then I made myself cease to think of her as Alaya and began to think of her as Dread Empress Malicia,” he mildly said. “And I still saw an unexplainable mistake from a woman whose judgement I yet hold in some esteem.”

“You figured she knew something you didn’t,” I said.

“The moment Eudokia intrigued to pass the blame onto her for the botched Salian coup, everything that followed was set in stone,” he mused. “Either I had ordered this, and now stood her foe. Or I had been deceived, and anything spoken to me could aid Scribe in furthering her attacks. Or potentially reveal how they had been anticipated and answered. Either way, even a secret missive would have been a foolhardy risk.”

I drank again, deep, since what I had to say was like as not to be unpleasant to get through.

“That doesn’t excuse anything,” I said. “She’s still the ally of the Dead King. She still spent decades seeding commands in the minds of people. No one forced her to order the Night of Knives, Black. Hers might have been choices with reasons to them, but that does not excuse a single fucking thing. You’ve been preaching personal responsibility to me since the day we met – why would she, alone of all the people in Creation, get a pass?”

He held up his cup to the light of the furnace and it cast a streak of shade over his eyes.

“I trust people to act according to their nature,” he quoted. “Anything more is sentimentality. She said this not long after her formal claiming of the Tower, when there was still talk of who might be her Chancellor. It was the talk of Ater for weeks and remains her words most often quoted in Praes. I never thought much of the saying, for it presumes much, but it speaks to the woman who spoke it.”

The cup went down, and the green gaze was pensive.

“Malicia seeded commands preparing for a betrayal, and that betrayal came,” he said. “I blame her for this no more than I blame you for the terrible habits you learned at my side, though I would chastise another for them.”

“Brandy makes you chatty,” I said. “You’re muddling cause and consequence, Black. Fucking with the minds of your subjects is something that deserves answer. It’s not a betrayal to recognize that. You’re just being...”

I bit my tongue.

"Sentimental?" he finished, slightly slurring. "So I am. Eudokia said the same, when we spoke."

I went still.

"And what else did she say?" I slowly asked.

"That she regretted her actions," Black said, tone dry. "And would not repeat them. That she understood it had been a mistake. I thanked her for this, naturally, for it was a needed lesson to us both."

And yet she was not here, drinking with him.

"So where is she?" I pressed.

"I wouldn't know," the green-eyed man said. "Neither does it matter, for she is no longer in my service."

My fingers clenched.

"You're drunk," I flatly said, "you're regret this after-"

"I made that decision without having had a drop," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said, tone eerily calm.

"Then you're grieving, not in your right mind," I hissed. "There's nothing practical about-"

"No longer extending trust to someone who deftly manipulated me into rebellion and undertaking a road that ends in the murder of someone dear to me?" Black said. "An interesting premise. I offered no rancor and held no grudge. It is a parting of ways, nothing more and nothing less."

"You can't afford to lose Scribe," I bluntly said. "If you do you lose the Eyes, and if you no longer have the Eyes the Empire will eat you alive."

"I considered this, but then decided it to be irrelevant," he amiably said.

He drained the rest of his cup then, with clumsy fingers for one usually so sure-footed, produced a small strip of parchment from a pocket within his tunic. He put it down on the anvil, without a word. It was in Mtethwa, two words: Come home. I knew not the handwriting, but then unlike him I'd not spent decades corresponding with the Empress.

"You can't be serious," I quietly said.

"All of this might genuinely have untied the knot, you see," Black said, sounding highly amused. "I did betray her, in the end. As she always believed I would, deep down. And after that betrayal failed and she triumphed over me so utterly she can now, at last, feel at ease."

He poured his cup full again as I did absolutely nothing to hide the horror I felt.

"Of course, I will never question her again," he said. "I will have lost that right, alongside any notion that this is partnership instead of vassalage. But the doors of Ater will be open to me and, as far as she is concerned, kneeling before the throne as every lord and lady of Praes watches will be my great penance."

"It can still be turned around," I said. "I know it's a blow, the Exile Legions leaving and Scribe having manipulated you, but this isn't your only choice. You have allies, Black."

The green-eyed man tipped back his cup, taking another swallow.

"You misunderstand," he said after. "I could no more do this than I could pretend I still put my trust in Eudokia. It is best to look what you are in the eye, as a villain. Lying to yourself is ever a dangerous business."

"And what is it you are?" I quietly asked.

"Not yet content," he said, smiling as if he was having a private jest at my expense.

I wasn't helping him, I realized. Sitting here with Black and finishing that bottle would not make him feel any better. This breakdown had been a long time coming, maybe as far as Captain's death, but letting him drink and entangle himself in his thoughts would solve nothing. Gingerly, I rose to my feet.

"Sleep it off, Black," I sighed. "Scribe won't have gone far, and that woman would forgive you nearly anything. She'll forgive you this. We can make plans after dawn, when we're all sober and rested."

He looked at me for a long moment, then set down the cup. For a moment he looked about to say something, but instead he smiled crookedly.

"Good night, Catherine," my father said.

I left, limping, and left the blazing heat of the smithy in favour of the cold. The coolness outside leant a refreshing touch the sweat on my brow and neck, but the exhaustion I'd expected never came. Even now, after all this, restlessness lingered in the marrow of my bones. High up above, under the stars and moon, to great crows feathered in darkness drifted across the sky. Their thoughts touched mine, gently, and shared a sight they were glimpsing in the distance. One man, leaving Salia. Well now, that was earlier than anticipated. I saddled Zombie and rode out, declining escort, and the journey on her back was swifter than it had been on foot. The small farm had not changed at all since my last visit, though perhaps that should not have surprised me: it might feel like an age ago, but I'd last stood here two nights back. The cattle wall, I saw, had been built anew. And stones had rolled down, as I'd warned the White Knight they would. By the eyes of the Crows I would not have company for some time yet, so after tying Zombie to the side of the farm I was spared a few breaths to consider how to comfortably wait.

Inside would be most reasonable, I thought. But the cold was pleasant, and I was reluctant to part from it. Instead I propped up my staff against the sidewall and, after soothing my leg with Night, hoisted myself up the side of the farm. The roof was as sturdy as it looked, good tiles and well set. Grimacing in pain even through the Night trick, I crawled atop it until I was resting my back against a chimney stump. Tightening my cloak against me comfortably, I let myself drift into the mixture of warmth around my belly and coolness against my face. It was soothing, and I almost fell asleep. I was not sure how long I'd been there when I finally heard approaching footsteps in the snow. I heard the White Knight chuckle as he figured out where I was, then deftly climb up the side. As Hanno dragged himself up on the roof, I finished stuffing my pipe and went looking for a match to light it. Finding one of my last sapper pinewoods I struck it against my sleeve but it failed to light. Sighing, I discreetly tapped a finger and seeded with black flame before hastily lighting my pipe with it.

The White Knight rose to his feet and strode to the edge of the roof, the two of us watching the nearing dawn begin to light up the sky.

"Back so soon?" I said, blowing out a stream of wakeleaf smoke.

"Within an hour of Tariq waking, he drew me out of my own slumber," Hanno said.

All else about the man aside, there were Named out there with the word 'healer' in the Name who weren't half as good at the art as Tariq Isbili was. Hells, for a time he'd even been able to cure death.

"And now you're here," I said.

An invitation to elaborate, but he did not take it.

"You were Queen of Winter for a time, were you not?" Hanno asked instead.

I hummed, pulling at my pipe.

"Close enough," I said. "If only by virtue of being the sole scavenger with a road to it."

"And you are no longer," the White Knight said.

"Took a leap of faith," I acknowledged. "All things considered, I don't regret it."

"And when Winter left you, Black Queen," he softly said. "Did it feel like an absence?"

Oh, I thought, and was surprised to find I yet had pity in me.

"It felt like flying out of a pit into the blue sky," I gently said. "It felt like the first drink of water after a long day in the sun. But I never loved that power, White Knight, nor did it love me."

Not as he so obviously loved the Choir of Judgement, strange as that sentiment was to me. He stood there for a long moment, looking at the lightening horizon.

"They have all been asking me," the White Knight said, "what befell of Judgement. Would you like to know, Catherine Foundling?"

I had half a dozen flippant replies on the tip of my tongue, but I was not feeling so callous right now as to offer them up to a decent man so obviously grieving.

"Tell me," I said instead.

He flicked his wrist, and in the dawning light I caught the shine of silver. A coin, flipping, for a moment I almost struck out with the Night. But Sve Noc was silent, and I remained still. The White Knight caught the coin and did not even look at what had turned up. To him, and so to me, it'd just been a flip of the coin. There had been nothing more to it.

"Silence," Hanno of Arwad said. "Only silence."

I let out a breath I hadn't known I was holding.

"The Hierarch still fights them, then," I quietly said.

"You warned me," the dark-skinned man admitted. "I did not listen, for never before has the strength of Judgement failed before my eye. You warned me, and now there is silence."

And silence stayed there, hanging in the air.

"And now what?" I asked.

"I am blind," Hanno of Arwad said. "Yet even a blind man can see that war must be waged on Keter."

"I have pledged myself to this," I said. "And do not take such oaths lightly."

He turned towards me, his broad silhouette ringed by morning's light, and met my eyes.

"Then we are allies," the White Knight said, and offered his hand.

I took it.

And so we went to war, against the King of Death.

ErraticErrata

And so we're at the last chapter of this book before the epilogue. There'll be a formal announcement later on, but as a heads up this time instead of the usual month-long break between books I'll be taking two months – in part because the last book will be as long as this one, in part because I need to begin drafts from my next project after the Guide is finished.

As usual, first update of the month means extra chapter in the eponymous, the third and penultimate of the 'Winter' chapters, from the White Knight's perspective.

NerfGlaistigUaine

So the first chapter of Book VI I'll read will be in Denmark, studying abroad. Looking forward to it. Take your time and bring this story to a conclusion so epic it'll make the Gods, and more importantly us, your readers, weep.

Jessica Day

So, you know, no pressure 😊

NerfContessa

Ah, Amadeus.

Here he said the straightens sentence that makes us think he's dread emperor benevolent, and it was said at his lowest.

Amazing book, ee.

Thank you.

erebus42

Damn, whatever Black is planning it can't be good. It's also refreshing to hear a hero actually admit that Cat was right for once. I guess Hanno will have to learn to pass judgment himself, though he still appears to be the White Knight so he's got that going for him.

Liliet

Well, assuming he's planning, anyway.

The last couple of times he was planning it was... largely undeserving of the name =x

And I think Hanno will just be trying to avoid passing judgement on anyone ever, as is his personality. He doesn't judge, he doesn't know how to condemn people, and he'll just be, I suspect, a peacekeeper. With no longer the weight of the Choir at his back for it =x

Crash

See, I got the distinct impression there's a fifty-fifty chance of Amadeus still being alive in the morning.

Something about the wording gave me the impression he could still be planning but just the fact he was drunk off his ass and sending Scribe away? Oh, boy.

Liliet

Yeah, I get very very very bad vibes off of the whole situation too.

That said, surely he's more proud than to just straight up kill himself without at least trying to go out with a bang and solve SOMEONE's problems with it, and I don't think he'll get that opportunity before morning.

Especially, uh, considering dawn has come during Hanno's talk with Catherine, so it's already morning actually --

But, uh, yeah. Bad. Bad shit is happening.

Oshi

It's not pride. It's grief from a person who hasn't until that day truly understood the ruin that is the path he walks. He said it himself. A villain shouldn't lie to themselves. It means he has to sit there and accept that his best friend doesn't trust him, his right hand betrayed him, and his family is dead or gone. The path to the tower is a lonely one but for all his life Amadeus has never been alone. Cat misunderstood what that was about. He already chose the path but he never looked the consequences in the face. Now..he has. Just like the epigraph says humility and contrition will lead to a massive power up.

I cannot wait ::devil emoji:: The intrigues, the betrayals, the skinning alive of enemies. Oh boy!

Liliet

That's not the part I'm talking about. The pride is the part where he recovers, realizes he did an idiotic thing, but cannot take her back now because that would be going back on his word and he's too proud for that

™ .

Although in retrospect this is very little of an issue as the obvious workaround in this situation is for Cat to hire Scribe. Eudokia is well aware Catherine is Amadeus's best ally right now, I'm sure she'd prefer working for her to fucking off altogether.

gingerlygrump

I just reread the chapter, and when Cat says goodbye to Amadeus she accidentally calls him Black, once in her head and once out loud.

He pauses, then smiles, then says goodnight back.

Is he about to become the Black Knight for the second time?

gingerlygrump

She actually refers to him as Black in her thoughts several times... this feels like a hint.

Jago

I think Amadeus will get a new Name, as he said he isn't content. Maybe it will include Black, but I doubt it will be Back Knight. Now he doesn't need and probably doesn't want to lead an army.

His need to see Evil really win has been partially resolved by Theodosis and the Hegemone. They have really flipped the finger to the Choir of Judgement. So that need probably will not be the origin of the new name. But he is still not content and he has the will to get a Name. Maybe Black Chancellor to Empress Catherine.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

But maybe, given his circumstances, a lighter one than we expect.

After all, think of that axiom...

Morgenstern

... I really hope Black has not suddenly become dumb-bc-of-sentimentality&role, in his judgement of Alaya, thinking she'd ever forget about his "I do not kneel"... I'd would SUCK to see him go back, trying to play the "I've come back to your side"-card to try to slip the knife in, because he cannot take kneeling – and her knowing if he comes back, it'll be that way and simply welcoming him to his execution. It would also suck just as much to have Alaya be that dumb to forget about that bc. role/sentimentality/whatever and actually be knifed by him. Any such end would be totally unbecoming for the intellect of either, not after being shown as being not-that, but intelligent/reasonable/rational.

I don't believe in the "we can get past this, let's try again and show that Bard the finger" turn, either.

So I'm really interested with what twist EE will come up instead of these non-fitting staples, after the talk shown in this chapter... 😊

Liliet

I think Alaya genuinely DOES believe it possible that he'll come back. Maybe not yet, but after he's tried enough times and been slapped down and asked to come back every time? Her plea is not a fakeout.

That said, if he comes back right now, she probably will expect foul play. And he'll expect her to. So... yeah, that's probably not the plan lmao. Hopefully.

Oshi

Agreed. Alaya is in the throes of what I call desperate power mad success. Everything will be ok because I AM EMPRESS. I made it soo. I made it ok. Come back to me! Insert lightning in background and dramatic music.

That's right about when I would stab her in the back but thats me 😊

Probably burn the corpse with Goblinfire and salt the earth to be sure.

GnomeFromAbove

My assumption is that Amadeus was planning to take up the mantle of the Black Knight in earnest and "come home" to the tower in the... more traditional sense of what it means for a Black Knight to go for the tower. There have been a lot of hints that the BK name is supposed to be terrifyingly powerful in the one-man-army sense, and that Amadeus never got anywhere near that power level because he wasn't willing to actually give in to all those sweet dark emotions like, y'know, black despair at having lost everything and overpowering rage at the single person directly responsible for the loss of everything that's ever held him back from the edge.

Sure seems like he declared that he wanted to be boss villain who wanted to climb the tower and take the crown, and Below saw his emotionally un-compelling dry political motivations, went "nah", and obligingly provided a more appropriate backstory with some vengeance and opportunities for tragedy killing his brainwashed friends and such going on.

Oshi

When has Amadeus ever bent ot the story. The Age of Wonders ended the moment Kairos died. Give him his due. There won't be another Black Knight one man army. There will be a reckoning but it will be of a new sort.

Liliet

Mhm.

Zach

...that isn't how it works. Other Black Knights didn't become powerful because they gave in to dark emotions. This isn't the dark side of the force or FF14 Dark Knights. They (and all Named) become powerful (in the sense of the Name power they have access to) if they act according to their Role (with their Role being a "groove" formed in Creation through repetition that ends up finding its way into culture).

Black was a comparatively weak Black Knight (in the sense of the Name power he had access to) because he wasn't behaving in the same way as past Black Knights. But that's also the reason he survived so long; leaning into the Role gives the benefits of great power, but at the cost of dying to Heroes (since that's also a common characteristic to the Role).

Mirror Night

Smart really EE to make sure your next series is ready to launch soon after this one ends so you don't bleed your fanbase or waste your momentum. I look forward to the announcement and what is next on the docket. Hopefully it has plenty of diversity and turning tropes on its head like this series.

Fayhem

I would be very down for a story set in/around Cardinal, but tbh at this point I'd give a shot to literally just about anything EE cared to put out.

Liliet

EE has said before that the next project is not in guideverse.

Fayhem

Oh really? I missed that, good to know. Like I said I'll be showing up to check it out regardless.

Liliet

OH DEFINITELY SAME.

Oshi

Personally it will depend a lot on what's written. You can be an amazing writer but I'm still not reading your horror western if I loved your thriller novels.

tithin

Thank you for the book Erratic.

Frivolous

Yes, thank you for the book, Erratic.

Grand Wizard

Thank you for the book, EE!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Thank you for the book, Erratic.

JRogue

Thank you so much. This truly is a gift to those who read your work, and I hope you feel that appreciation.

stevenneiman

As maddening as I find it not having new updates to read, I'm also reassured that you're taking regular time off. Even now that George Frost is back I still worry for The Zombie Knight because I don't think he takes as many breaks as he should. Thank you, both for writing such an awesome story to share with us, and for taking care of yourself so you can keep doing so.

doominator10

Hold up, zombie knight is back?

Mirror Night

Indeed has been back for a week or two.

Barthumphries

Eh, I spent a year waiting and each of his updates are only like 3 or 4 small paragraphs. Let me know when he's been updating for six months and I'll go check it out.

Nicholas Bolton

Darn, how inconvenient that this story and TGAB always seem to go on break at around the same time.

Either way I'm sure the wait will be worth it and I look forward to the approaching conclusion

Liliet

Take your time and take care of yourself!

We'll be... busy recovering from being murdered dead by all of this. Hot damn.

Barthumphries

And with that announcement perhaps we should start the typo thread. Here are two. There are at least 10 others. Readers, can you find them all?

but in principle I had not objection to their work. If I got lucky, maybe a report making its way south would even Change not to no, and was to way.

Tom

> in part because I need to begin drafts from my next project after the Guide is finished.

Woooo next project!!! 😊

Tigellinus

Love the work! Thanks for the many nights of being able to curl up in bed and read this fantastic work!

Does anyone else get the feeling that this was Black's "Final Conversation" ?

I have this uneasy feeling that Black's going to end up dead.

Liliet

He's been here before, and I'd say the main pivot is passed on this one as of Second Llesse – he may be suicidal, but Creation isn't going to oblige.

That said, he's been suicidal since before the start of the story =x

Cpt. Obvious

This announcement makes me wish the author would consider publishing the notes used for the series in a chronological order. It would be interesting to learn the scope of the first notes, how they evolved over time and if, and in that case how much the characters started to high Jack the storyline and twist it into something unexpected.

Or perhaps that only happens to me. I jot down an idea and try to flesh it out so I have a good foundation to build my story. I have a beginning, a few key events and the end. But the moment I let the characters open their mouth all my planning tends to get throw out the window as they drag the story off into the wild.

Javvies

Alliance with Hanno, good.

Amadeus breaking ties with Scribe? Bad.

Amadeus consisting going back to Malicia? Just as bad, and possibly even worse.

Unfortunately, Cat was proven right about what would happen and Scribe was proven wrong about being able to keep her meddling secret from Amadeus. This is not a good thing.

I wonder what Scribe will do now, with Amadeus pushing her away.

RoflCat

Alliance with a non-puppet Hanno is even better, for through the breaking of his faith he can notice more things.

Black going back to Malicia is...unexpected, especially after his proclamation for Dread Emperor, unless he's going back there to become Dread Emperor Benevolent, one who doesn't murder his predecessor for the throne?

As for Scribe, I think she'll keep going with her mission of trying to keep Black alive, ironically without the guilt of keeping it from Black now that they're apart. Heck maybe she'll go back to the League and settle things there.

Liliet

I don't think his faith in anything was broken, other than the exact degree of how overwhelming Choirs' might is. But that's quantitative, not qualitative.

Oh, and he was never a puppet.

I think the implication is that Amadeus isn't going to take the offer. He's just getting drunk because he's fucking exhausted and he doesn't want to stick with either Eudokia or Alaya after the shit they pulled, but they're very nearly the only two of his friends still alive.

Here's hope he takes Cat up on that offer to plan tomorrow, because like, HOLY SHIT. There are SO MANY bad decisions available to him here.

Cpt. Obvious

Oh but the White Knight was worse than a puppet. He claimed not to judge, but he did choose who were to be judged. He knowingly avoided putting heroes who he knew had committed sins before his masters just as he didn't turn their gaze on Catherine. He knew that if he did put their gaze on them the Choir of Judgement would have found them guilty. But he chose that they were to live. And yet he claimed that he didn't judge. It went so far that he claimed he was not responsible for the killings as he fought against the Tyrants troupes as the Choir had passed judgment. But it was he who chose to put them to trial.

If he had free will in choosing whom got to be judged then he can't duck the responsibility that comes with that choice.

Liliet

I mean, he outright tells as much to Catherine. This is deliberate and he is not in denial; the point of "I do not judge" is "I do not make the decision that someone DOES deserve to die". He is fully willing to make the decision that they do not, it's a comfortable default: NOT killing people.

That's why Hanno is based.

Sparsebeard

I'd like to see Scribe join Cat as Black successor...

Liliet

She doesn't share a single priority with Amadeus, so I'm really not seeing that.

Liliet

Oh. Oh, I misread.

Omfg that would be fitting too~

gingerlygrump

It seems like Amadeus hinted that he was going back to Ater to kill Malicia, though I fully admit that I could be inventing clues because I want it so badly.

Magtok

Of course he's going to kill her. Remember Book One?

"We do not kneel."

hakureireimu

Amadeus is saying that he has no intention of going back to Malicia here.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Woof, heavy.

Insanenoodlyguy

"It can still be turned around," I said. "I know it's a blow, the Exile Legions leaving and Scribe having manipulated you, but this isn't your only choice. You have votes, Black."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

Doesn't flow well and there is absolutely nothing to the joke other than substituting a random word with 'votes'.

That said, at least it's not defacing a highly emotional moment XD

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Doesn't flow well and there is absolutely nothing to the joke other than substituting a random word with 'votes'.

Liliet

...You are correct and I shall henceforth be doing it this way.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

knockoffnikolai

"You warned me," the dark-skinned man admitted. "I did not listen, for never before has the strength of Judgement failed before my eye. You warned me, and now there is silence."

And silence stayed there, hanging in the air.

"And now what?" I asked.

"I am blind," Hanno of Arwad said. "Yet even a blind man can see that we must vote for Practical Guide to Evil on Top Web Fiction."

Liliet

Bad.

knockoffnikolai

Tangentially related, but what is your opinion on Geico commercials?

Liliet

I am unfamiliar with those.

knockoffnikolai

Their archetypal joke structure is similar. The commercial posits an absurd situation, then makes a non-sequitur transition to selling their insurance. e.g. "You know what's better than having to fight off children to keep your snacks? Saving money by switching to Geico."

I was just curious because it seemed like you would have had an interesting objection to them. No worries if you've never seen one, though.

Liliet

No, that does actually sound funny, I like absurdism in commercials.

This is not that.

Soronel Haetir

The one good thing is that Scribe's actions are out of some kind of love (whether unrequited romantic love or otherwise). She might well have recognized that there was nothing she could accomplish right then and that she needed to give Amadeus some space, but I do not believe the ties are actually broken on her part no matter what he might think.

RoflCat

It's better for them to go separate ways.

Scribe want Black alive and possibly a Dread Emperor, but Black does not desire such thing.

When they were together, she felt guilty about abusing his trust even if it's for his (in her view) benefits.

But now that they go separate ways, she can do whatever she want, including the exact same things as before, now without the guilt.

Black will do his things, she'll do her things, if their desire clash then let the result of the clash decide.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, she's still arguably the best spymaster on the continent, and possibly the second-best assassin. The question is what she does want, and what she'll do with her spy network.

gingerlygrump

We know that she wants Malicia dead and Amadeus to rule. Let's hope Scribe gets those wishes granted, because Malicia still owes the long price for Istrid and Ratface.

Fayhem

My money is still on Istrid being the Matrons' doing rather than Malicia's, but it seems like the ambiguity is deliberate at this point.

ninegardens

She arranged the murder of enemy combatants during times of civil unrest.

Pretty much all main characters in this story have done things ten times worse than that just because it was tuesday.

I'm not saying Malicia is good, I'm just saying that this seems pretty low on the list of "reasons she is owed the long price"

Mirror Night

Don't see why Malicia would kill Istrid, she has mind control on her anyway and with her being Juniper's mother that is useful leverage. Makes far more sense for the Matrons or Scribe to take out Istrid then it does Malicia.

Liliet

Honestly, I'm getting a very bad 'chasing away his support system' vibe off this lashing out. She's been trying to get him to take care of himself more, and of all the people he could end up finally lashing out at in the attempt to do so it's her? So he can continue Not Blaming Anyone Else For Anything Only Himself in peace?

Mental Mouse

No, Scribe seriously overstepped herself. It's one thing to push for Amadeus to take the throne, it's quite another to try and force him to do so, especially when it involves killing his oldest surviving friend. (Not to mention that the means she chose played fast-and-loose with his daughter's position and plans, and the fate of the continent to boot.)

Liliet

See, you're not wrong.

But the reason Amadeus turned her away was specifically fueling the conflict between him and Alaya.

And there's a reason why Catherine was surprised to hear he was still willing to forgive her and take her back when Eudokia said it.

Mental Mouse

> But the reason Amadeus turned her away was specifically fueling the conflict between him and Alaya.

That's my point, what's where where she overstepped her position. A spymaster is supposed to serve political considerations, not dictate them. And messing in your boss's personal life is a no-no for, basically anybody.

Liliet

He didn't fire her for overstepping.

Jane

Honestly, Scribe and Black needed a break – when you're willing to risk your life to save a friend turned foe, and your trusted aide considers your life to be more important than a sentimental goal, you have to go on your own. To do otherwise is both a foolish risk, as you are no longer able to predict what your usually trusted aide will do, and a cruelty to someone who is presumably close to you, as it's basically dangling their worst fear in front of them at all times.

I'd hope that he'd at least invite her back once they weren't in this sort of situation, though. I doubt the novel will end in a place where such a situation is possible regardless of their wishes, but I'd like to think that he'd accept her service again once it made sense.

As for his plan... ..He's not thinking of going to her and then killing her rather than bowing, is he? Because that's the first thought that comes to mind, when military and diplomatic options fail, he's still not willing to give up, and she's still offering to extend her trust again to him.

Liliet

Yeah, that strikes me as something that wouldn't be a good plan for approximately a million reasons =x

gingerlygrump

Are you hoping for a peaceful coup? Amadeus allows Malicia to step down, becomes Dread Emperor Benevolent, and fulfills his vision of a better Praes?

I could be on board with that, but Alaya is still a dangerous woman and letting her roam free is on par with the escaped sentient tiger army. She needs to die, she's too susceptible to Evil influence.

And I'm still pissed about the murders of Ratface and Istrid.

Liliet

I'm ignoring the 'political assassinations' part because I don't like Protagonist Centered Morality and when we put that aside Amadeus routinely does worse.

And yes, I'm hoping for some kind of peaceful resolution. There are many possible options and many possible counterbalances to minimize risks.

Mostly, I'm just hoping Amadeus ends up alive =x

gingerlygrump

I don't know what Cat is turning herself into, but I suspect it's the Practical Guide, and while she no longer needs Amadeus she loves him.

He and Cat still have some unspoken conversations that she aggressively avoids, and I think it's because they both realize it's his best plot armor.

Liliet

She does still need him – he might not be irreplaceable, but he's a very useful asset in dealing with Praesi. If nothing else, he's one of the few anchors Masego has, not to mention Cat herself.

Amadeus is the beating heart of the entire East, right now. Alaya cares about him and wants him back, Hye has at least some fondness of him and is an ever-hanging threat over whoever ends up killing him, the Legions and the Praesi part of the Army of Callow all adore him, half the Eyes of the Empire answer to the woman who cares for him above everything. Several of the Woe consider him family, and the Marshal of Callow still has that platonic crush.

Cat doesn't so much need him for his abilities, per se. While he is still excessively competent in multiple areas, he's also emotionally compromised enough that that hasn't been helpful in a while -_- . But the ties everyone else has to him? It's a stabilizing factor, and one of no little importance.

gingerlygrump

You're very pragmatic in acknowledging that he may not live through Book 6. It's so hard to admit that 😞

gingerlygrump

Admit he may not live, I mean.

Liliet

I do still hold the opinion that narratively speaking, he likely will.

But in-universe? Uhhhhhhh. Bad. Bad bad bad.

Ironically, for what's probably the first time in his entire career, no enemy is actively out to kill him, specifically. But he is a danger to himself =x

Mental Mouse

The thing is, he's already set on the path to killing her by claiming the Emperor title. None of the most recent developments really change that.

Liliet

Yeah but that doesn't mean he can't swerve at the last moment. Emperors and Empresses can abdicate, it's not a 'no surrender only death' situation.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Then we are allies," the White Knight said, and offered his hand.

I took it.

And so we went to war, against the King of Death. First, we kissed.

Added in that last missing sentence! 😊

Liliet

Oh honey. -pats u-

Adrian V

I wouldn't be surprised if those 2 do in fact start to have feelings for each other...and fall right into the getting interrupted trope, can you imagine Cat's reaction when she realizes it? XD

edrey

So, someone know what moral lesson can be found here, i am lost. Here, Ranger will appear, but eudokia have a saying right? Mosters die at the end. That is making me think too much

hakureireimu

Hanno: when the AHOTE tells you to be careful, do so.
Amadeus: something about trust and sentimentality; not sure.

caoimhinh

What does AHOTE stand for?

hakureireimu

Arch Heretic of the East.

Liliet

Hopefully, Amadeus learns the lesson of “if two of your closest people fucking hate each other, do try to actually resolve that and not just leave it festering and pretend nothing is happening until everything’s suddenly on fire and you didn’t see that coming”.

-glares at Wekesa threatening Cat in early books-

Jane

You know, I know I’ve said this before, but... I keep looking back over what Black planned, and I’m like – what did he honestly expect to happen? That he’d just kill Cat one day after using her as an experiment to see if his plan was possible at all?

He knew that Cat had no genuine loyalty to the Empire, and did nothing to address that. He saw that the people of Callow put more and more faith in her as her legend grew, and he remained unconcerned. He saw how Malicia granted Callow more autonomy at Cat’s request, and how Cat in turn demanded more, and did nothing really to mediate their expectations.

He knew Cat heard “The Girl Who Climbed The Tower”, and that evidently set off no alarm bells at all!

And he knew that whatever happened, it probably wasn’t going to take longer than a decade to happen, while they were all just waiting for a Crusade to happen – something that a civil war between Callow and Praes would definitely invite if nothing else started it first.

I mean, if he wasn’t planning to kill Malicia, he pretty much botched this entirely – either the end comes at Cat’s hands, or at the hands of Crusaders handed a golden opportunity. And if he was planning on killing Cat once he saw that his theory was sound, he probably should have either gotten around to that or changed his plans once he realized he missed his window.

And if he wasn’t planning on killing either... Then, as you note, why the devil didn’t he do anything to try and give them common ground? Don’t just spring on Malicia the idea that Callow's going to be an independent nation again, and try selling to Cat the idea that being a vassal state to Praes gives her protection from both Praes and Procer at the cost of simple grain. Cat actually received sizable concessions in terms of self-government; if he'd sat down with her and explained the benefits and the expectations that Malicia had in return for them, it's definitely a deal she would have accepted, pre-Liesse.

Even setting aside the "I should make sure my friends don't hate each other" perspective, it ends up being a critical failure of personnel management, something that he should be good at.

ninegardens

As far as Cat goes:

He planned for her to want independence.

He planned for her to get it. Read the epilogue of book 3.

His plan was for Callow to become independent, but sympathetic, so that the Empire could get food without having to go to war.

He HAD a plan, and Malicia and Cat were becoming friends.... right up until second Liese.

Which he didn't have intell about.

His plan for Cat got screwed over by Malicia earning herself the long price, not by Cat striving for independence.

He planned on Callow being on the empires side vs the Empire... but instead Malicia got spooked, had Akua build a superweapon, and betrayed Cat's trust.

Without Liese 2.0 Necromatic Bongolo, Black's plan actually makes a hell of a lot of sense.

Jane

The issue here is that Black never told Malicia that his plan was for Callow to claim independence – she was caught completely flatfooted by that, and strongly opposed the notion for obvious reasons. It would have ended in civil war with or without Liese.

Malicia considered Cat a hotheaded young child whom she has repeatedly mentioned she dislikes, and has to actively try to avoid letting that cloud her preconceptions regarding Cat's competence; Cat viewed her as overbearing, and had an active disdain for her political approach to things. They weren't becoming friends; they barely even spoke to each other of their own volition. They could have become friends, if something was done to bring them in touch in areas where they had common ground – but that never really happened.

Liesse decisively broke the relationship between Cat and Malicia, but it was already headed towards a break to begin with – Cat was never truly satisfied with Callow remaining subservient to Praes, regardless of what she told herself, and Malicia could never accept the loss of legitimacy that would come of allowing Callow true independence.

Black's plan makes a degree of sense on paper, but there are several key points that he never even tried to address – like making certain that the two people most important to the plan would be remotely okay with it, or that enacting it wouldn't cripple the power of one or more of the people involved.

Agent J

– if something was done to bring them in touch in areas where they had common ground – but that never really happened.

It did. The Summer Campaign. Malicia and Cat started bonding together as they schemed the death of two Fae Courts older than Creation.

Malicia could have leaned hard into that mentor role. See, cuz Cat was loyal. To the Empire itself, mostly nominally, true. But to the actual people? Literally everyone she loves save Indrani and Vivi are from there. Juniper basically made her swear not to do anything that put her opposite a field from her mother.

In fact, that was one of the reasons for him getting her the Fifteenth. It was a power base she needed and one that would bind her to the Empire's people.

Malicia fucked that up by feeding a hundred thousand Callowans to the Diabolist's madness.

This wasn't an oversight by Black. This was one born of Malicia's flaws. She wants unflinching loyalty and the right to do whatever the Hells she feels like.

There's a reason she resorts to mindcontrol so readily.

Liliet

What AgentJ said. He had in fact been taking steps to assure Catherine's loyalty, and while she might not have been "perfectly happy" remaining Praes's vassal, she had viewed that as a necessary evil from the beginning, and wasn't willing to pay the price breaking away would have demanded. Would have, that is, had Amadeus not actively walked away with his hands in the air like "actually feel free to rebel I'm with you on this". AND had Malicia not viewed her as already rebelling afterwards even though she had no particular intent to.

Catherine was literally more willing to work with Alaya post-Liesse than Amadeus was.

And as for how he failed to consult Alaya if she was okay with the semi-independence he was willing to give Callow... yeah. They had a bit of a fight about it in Epilogue 3. He did in fact consider her to be reading his mind and agreeing with him on everything by default. See, coz she's smart and smarter than him, so everything that's obvious to him should be equally obvious to her, right?

Cicero

Except he did tell Malicia that was her plan. She had severe doubts about it, but Black thought he would slowly persuade her.

Malicia then decided to get some insurance, not understanding, or (more likely) not caring how that would create a story that would destroy the Callow-Praes alliance.

There is a major difference between Black and Malicia that hasn't been resolved, but it wasn't about Cat. It was about whether to put their faith in stories or in power. Black believed sacrificing power to get on the right side of the story was the best way. Malicia never had that belief. She allowed Black his way because he was successful, but as soon as more risk started developing she was perfectly happy to abandon story-fu in favor of superweapons.

That was Black's misjudgement. He thought Alaya trusted him, but she never did. Not really. She only trusted him in a limited sense, but was always ready to pull back on that trust at her choice of timing.

Liliet

His plan was that Catherine would kill him and become the Black Knight of Praes, while also ruling Callow with full sympathy of its citizens, and then eventually climb the Tower and become the next Dread Empress, cementing Callow as part of the Empire.

Yes, seriously.

No, I don't know why he thought she would do that. My vote's on 'suicidal depression making all plans that involve him dying look disproportionately attractive and doable'.

Yes, in his plan Malicia took no issue with Cat killing him. See the paragraph above.

That said, the plan would still work with Cat not doing that, and was overall remarkably flexible in its applicability as long as the following conditions were fulfilled:

- Catherine remained sympathetic to the idea of Callow supplying Praes with grain and not going to war with it anymore;
- Catherine remained in charge in Callow;
- he and the Empress did not do something idiotic to convince Catherine the game wasn't worth the candle.

Hell, the plan's STILL working, it just now includes the minor snag of 'dethrone the Empress for doing said stupid thing before trying again'. Where the thing being tried for is a trade and mutual protection arrangement with Callow, any subordination of either side to the other entirely optional.

Liliet

> try selling to Cat the idea that being a vassal state to Praes gives her protection from both Praes and Procer at the cost of simple grain. Cat actually received sizable concessions in terms of self-government; if he'd sat down with her and explained the benefits and the expectations that Malicia had in return for them, it's definitely a deal she would have accepted, pre-Liesse.

Most specifically, Book 2 Chapter 'Madman'. The thing you are suggesting literally happened, word to word. And Catherine was in fact onboard with Callow being a vassal state of Praes until as of Book 3 Epilogue Amadeus himself fucked off to Vales, leaving her and the Empress without the mediator and the Empress paranoidly assuming Catherine's breaking with her and acting like it.

Seriously, after Second Liesse Catherine started taking independent action because the Empress didn't contact her. She didn't actually want conflict on two fronts. (And the Empress took her being willing to take independent action as her not being loyal enough... People turning on Alaya has been remarkably much of a self-fulfilling prophecy in this sequence of events)

Jane

I honestly question whether Callow could be trusted to fight on the same side as Praes post-Liesse, but... Even if they could, I can't really blame Malicia for assuming that Callow would demand the long price (regardless of whether or not Cat herself would), and deciding that her best bet was to focus her defenses on Praes. It's a reasonable conclusion based on pretty much everything that the people around Cat have said since that moment.

But yeah, if Black had been in the room at that moment, he probably could have reassured Cat that the offer was, in fact, sincere instead of just an attempt to save face or undermine her, while he could assure Malicia that all Cat really wants is to let Callow govern it's own affairs and doesn't desire further revenge. Even if he was no longer certain of those things, it's something he could have said. But because he was no longer in the room...

Which is why he should have set the foundation for this in advance. Malicia made Callow a vassal state as an official recognition of the de-facto state of affairs; had the transition happened in more of a planned manner, then both Malicia and Cat would have had more trust in the arrangement with or without Black. Malicia would view this as the culmination of a plan that she had vetted and had faith in, instead of a last-minute attempt to appease a powerful and rebellious figure, while Cat would have a degree of faith in what Malicia wanted from her and where the line could be drawn. Heck, if Cat had had more contact with Malicia, maybe she would have sent word to her that she was raising the Order of the Broken Bells so that it would become a special privilege instead of an act of treason.

They say that it's easier to ask for forgiveness than permission, but that doesn't really apply to planning to break away a significant chunk of a person's empire, that produces all of the food and which they just fought a significant war to secure. Black needed to keep Malicia in the loop on what he was planning here, and massively overstepped when he didn't.

(Not going to address the rest of what you said, because we're not really disagreeing on any of this; it's just me criticizing Black for not even considering how things would look to Cat or Malicia, and how even minor effort could have improved things.)

Liliet

> But yeah, if Black had been in the room at that moment, he probably could have reassured Cat that the offer was, in fact, sincere instead of just an attempt to save face or undermine her, while he could assure Malicia that all Cat really wants is to let Callow govern it's own affairs and doesn't desire further revenge. Even if he was no longer certain of those things, it's something he could have said. But because he was no longer in the room...

Wait, what room? I'm losing track.

As of post-Second Llesse, again, Amadeus is the one who actively pushed the conflict with the Empress. He apparently never intended to rebel, per se, but he certainly did not see a downside to Callow claiming independence – and as of that moment, didn't care what Alaya thought about it. And beforehand he could not have possibly imagined that he would turn on her. It's not something he planned for, considering, y'know, he would rather have prevented the whole chain of events, yeah? The whole problem was his blind trust in her and how badly he got blindsided by Second Llesse.

> They say that it's easier to ask for forgiveness than permission, but that doesn't really apply to planning to break away a significant chunk of a person's empire, that produces all of the food and which they just fought a significant war to secure. Black needed to keep Malicia in the loop on what he was planning here, and massively overstepped when he didn't.

Again, he didn't actually plan on this. He planned on Alaya and Cat coming to their own arrangement, slowly over time. He didn't plan on the entire Callow being on fire the minute he went to Free Cities, he didn't plan on Cat gaining power rapidly and restoring a knightly order whether he liked it or not, he didn't plan on Diabolist predictably rebelling right in the middle of a fae invasion because he'd assumed the Empress would handle it.

As for overstepping... Yeah, there's a fine line between 'two equal co-rulers, one of whom tends to defer to the other but both get the last word and the veto' and 'the Empress and her loyal right hand'. There's been tension there from the start – a king and a kingmaker is an odd relationship by definition, and Amadeus and Alaya working together as closely as they did only put more pressure on it.

As far as he was concerned, she overstepped by going behind his back. As far as she was concerned, he overstepped by considering anything she did as being overstepping. Overall, I'd call it a... disagreement. I don't think it was on him to be blindly unquestionably loyal as she wanted him to be. They'd been equal partners from the start.

The thing about Amadeus is that his story doesn't work by Praesi logic of personal relationships and subordination and submission of weaker to stronger. He's always been a, well, knight – one of those who are loyal to their sovereign because it's the right thing to do(tm) and remain so as long as the sovereign's actions don't make it no longer the right thing to do(tm). You know, like how Rozala swore to rebel if Procer screws over its allies in the aftermath of this again?

That isn't wrong, per se. IMHO.

He... definitely could have used more communication with Alaya though lmao

Liliet

PS All that said, none of Amadeus's actions and opinions prior to Second Liesse blindsided Alaya. He made no secret of anything he was doing, and he explained himself when she questioned him (Book 2 Coulissee, notably). She did things in secret from him because she KNEW he would disapprove. She KNEW that he considered their relationship to be one where he got to disapprove of her actions, and she chose to work around that rather than try to confront it / change it. She didn't start actively asserting her authority and her opinion that she should be the one fully in charge until after everything already broke.

She ALSO could have sorted out this mess much earlier. And she's the one who knew the mess was there, while Amadeus didn't.

Liliet

Ranger? What?

And I think it's not that there's a moral lesson in this chapter. It's that Amadeus took a heavy blow to his power base, but he's hinted to be able to take it back once he has a suitable epiphany.

edrey

Ranger is the only that could help him, i am sure. At this point he is dead inside, his lover is the only one who could help him

ninegardens

Honestly.... I put higher bets of Malicia being the one to heal him rather than Ranger.

Malicia actually genuinely seems to care for him, even when she's spooked and disagrees with him. Ranger treats him as an amusing toy.

Ranger doesn't CARE about people, and there is no evidence she ever has. Who cares if her and black used to be fuck buddies. Hell- Ranger is probably one of the few people Scribe hate's more than Malicia.

Malicia genuinely DOES want him to come home, and has so far disarmed his coup attempt in the gentlest way possible. Whether she'd actually accept him kneeling, or if she'd feel obligated to execute him I don't know.... but the point is, she's created a situation where she can forgive him despite his blatant rebellion... and doing that is HUGELY impractical, and politically costly for her. From her perspective she may well be taking the only course available to avoiding civil war and murdering her best friend. She screws over Cat a bit in the process, but ummm.... Cat isn't her friend. Cat has never BEEN her friend. She doesn't owe Cat or Cordelia anything.

Liliet

Ranger is far more of an abusive relationship for him than the Empress. At least she does in fact care and desperately want him by her side.

As far as Ranger is concerned, he's a fun toy she picked up and played with for a while, then put aside, and now picks up for old time's sake from time to time.

Romance is all nice and good, except when it's with, y'know, someone like Hye.

edrey

I cant agree more, but what amadeus need is a wake up call to tell him the he shouldnt give up.
^I do not kneel^ is his frase, its not salvation but a push in the right direction, and only Hye can do that

Liliet

I... don't think he needs one. He already told Catherine this much, that he's fully aware he isn't giving up yet, that it isn't in his nature.

What he needs right now is for people to remind him of his worth, to remind him that trust IS worth it even if in the end it backfires, that he is valued and loved and that he has a right to value and love other people even in the middle of politics.

Hye is... not the person for that. To put it mildly.

onedollargum

"No longer extending trust to someone who deftly manipulated me into rebellion and undertaking a road that ends in the murder of someone dear to me?" Black said. "An interesting premise. I offered no rancor and held no grudge. It is a parting of ways, nothing more and nothing less."

This statement could involve pretty much all the women in his life. Malicia, Eudokia, Catherine and the Intercessor pushing him from all angles, in their own ways.

cicero

thats a very good point sadly.

Liliet

Catherine is pushing him but not manipulating him, and she genuinely has THINGS HE CARES ABOUT as her priority wrt taking care of him. Like, taking care of him is not her first priority, which is entirely fair, but when she DOES turn to that, she does it things-he-cares-about first. As opposed to.

That counts for a lot.

WuseMajor

At the end of the last book, Malicia cannot be the Dread Empress any longer. And the head of the Dead King needs to be on a pike.

The head of the Bard needs to be on a pike too.

I don't think you can manage less than that and still fulfill on the promises you've made over the course of the book series.

Hierineus

what promises? I think you need to differentiate between your own wishes and expectations and the story itself

Liliet

Tension set up, questions posed but not yet answered. Loaded guns that have yet to fire.

JJR

The guns got red lettered. We have to make due with Chekov's crossbows.

WuseMajor

When you pick up a book and start reading, the story implies that various things are going to happen later on. If the book starts with a Detective in their office and a client walks in, this implies that there will be a mystery in the book and that it will be solved by the end.

These implications are often called "promises."

I'm saying that, after all this build up, I don't think that we can have a proper emotional release if the Dead King still exists at the end. Same for the Bard. At least there needs to be a final showdown with both of them.

And Malicia has become a big enough problem that I think Cat needs to actually beat her. I'm not sure if just ...taking away her empire will be enough, but she needs to lose, I think.

That said, I'm not the author and there have been enough twists that ...I dunno. Maybe it can be pulled off without the above.

Liliet

I would say it's called 'tension'. It can be subverted in small amounts – a client walking into a detective's office creates tension but can be a fakeout with the story being actually a romantic comedy about the detective taking a vacation after that client or something. But once you pile up enough of it, it has to be resolved. It's not a specific 'promise' which seems to be tripping you up here – there are multiple possible resolutions, that's what tension is all about. But it's a promise of a resolution.

Jane

Eh, I don't quite agree – these are all plot points that need to be addressed, but I can see any of those three revealing that their plans have actually been to Cat's benefit all along and that they actually can be allies. Well, the Dead King might be more of a stretch for that one, I admit.

Though, that card can only be played for one of her remaining enemies before it wears thin.

The Bard's actual endgame is completely obscured to the reader, so a "Oh, I've been arranging the pieces to kill the Dead King all this time because my real job is to ensure that the Named don't destroy all life in your squabbles"-type reveal could be slipped in easily enough – the only thing that would need to be overcome would be Cat's (and by extension, the reader's) distrust of her.

Malicia has a lot of bad karma to be repaid, but her actions have pretty much entirely been defensive – killing Ratface and unleashing the Dead King might be some cruel and/or reckless moves, but she was in a corner, and one of the themes of late has been the need to let go of enmity when there's a chance for real peace. Peace that Malicia herself has worked for in the past, incidentally, if only because she believed that knives in the dark were a surer way to win than flying castles.

The Dead King... Well, it's theoretically possible that the Bard could be involved in some world-ending catastrophe, that the only reason that he still bothers with Calernia is because he needs to kill her before she finds a way to kill him, and that he's perfectly willing to lock himself away in Serenity once he's accomplished that. And the army is necessary because... Reasons.

...Needless to say, I don't actually expect the Dead King to suddenly turn out to have been Cat's friend all along, but the other two? They're big plots that need big resolutions, but I don't necessarily agree that it needs to end with heads on pikes; a sufficiently dramatic reconciliation also works.

Liliet

> "Oh, I've been arranging the pieces to kill the Dead King all this time because my real job is to ensure that the Named don't destroy all life in your squabbles"-type reveal could be slipped in easily enough

She's already gone out and said it. Cat just doesn't consider it a good enough reason to allow her to keep her role the way she's been doing it. And also has little reason to trust her, that too.

> ...Needless to say, I don't actually expect the Dead King to suddenly turn out to have been Cat's friend all along, but the other two? They're big plots that need big resolutions, but I don't necessarily agree that it needs to end with heads on pikes; a sufficiently dramatic reconciliation also works.

Anyway, same.

Jane

Well, my thoughts as regards this hypothetical with the Bard would be that this kind of plan is highly atypical for her, but necessary because the Dead King is such a large but cautious threat – she has to rely on such widespread, indirect manipulation because it's the only thing he won't see coming until it's too late. Once that's resolved, she'll go back to her old model – the next Akua or Lone Swordsman to come out, she just tells the most appropriate Hero or Villain, "Hey, this idiot is going to kill a lot of your people for no real good reason, you should probably stop him", and then go spend the rest of her time singing at the bar in return for free drinks.

Either way, though, I just meant that there's plenty of room for the Bard's unstated greater agenda to align with Cat's, in which case it's just a matter of compromise and trust – neither of which are easy, of course.

Jane

Oh, though I should mention that I don't actually think that this kind of plan is atypical for her in the least; what we've seen of her character certainly doesn't imply it, and it would be kind of hard to loop things like the creation of Sve Noc into the plan against the Dead King. Just that that's the kind of reveal that I could see leading to her working with Cat.

Liliet

I do agree, yep.

Novice

"Not yet content" Isn't that a Triumphant quote or am I mixing up my Dread Emperors? Either way, this only means that Amadeus is going to cook up something interesting. It's gong to be a hard two-month withdrawal for me.

Dresden 67

It is.

"And so Triumphant said: 'Tremble, for I am not yet content.'" – Extract from the Scroll of Dominion, twenty-fourth of the Secret Histories of Praes

It's what she said after conquering all of Calernia.

Novice

Ah, thank you. This confirms it then. Amadeus of the Green Stretch is not yet done.

Mental Mouse

Well – it was that ambition that ultimately doomed Triumphant, as she drew opposition from outside the continent.

ninegardens

So, as this volume is winding to an end... and because we have a two months break approaching... is anyone here in the mood for playing some sort of tabletop RPG? I've got a couple lying around that I'd like to try out.

Fayhem

What, are you thinking like something on roll20 or w/e? Could be interesting. I've been eyeing trying to put together a Guideverse semi-homebrew based on the Scion 2e system myself, but I'm already DMing a Pathfinder campaign and that's been sucking up all my TTRPG-related creative energies. What did you have in mind?

ninegardens

Honestly? Whatever people are keen on.

I'm happy running something pretty classical like Pathfinder.

I've got a Sci-Fi RPG system which is homebrew, but pretty damn polished, so if people are happy in another genre, and be keen to run that. <https://www.overleaf.com/read/qyhqqwvmyymx>

And I've got another homebrew in which is somewhat more experimental, but closer to a Guideverse feel, in which players work together to run a minor city state, playing politics and strategy as diplomats, generals, archmages and courtiers.

Depends what people are interested in, and how important it is to be playing in Guideverse in particular, vs "Lets just have an adventure wherever"

Fayhem

> Depends what people are interested in, and how important it is to be playing in Guideverse in particular, vs "Lets just have an adventure wherever"

A Guideverse adventure would be fun, but I'm open to wherever. I don't think Pathfinder is a good fit for a Guideverse campaign personally – a more narrative system makes more sense IMO. Also, I've played a lot of Pathfinder already. Like, a lot a lot. I'd prefer not to play even more atm lol. Variety is the spice of life and all that.

I'm always down for some good sci-fi, though. I'd certainly be good with that if it's what the DM would prefer to run.

It occurs to me that timezones could be relevant for coordinating a game. I'm on Pacific time myself. Would it maybe be better to continue this discussion in Discord? I feel a little leery of filling up the comments with this too much, idk if that's just me.

ninegardens

I'm in the Europe, so... doable timezone, but would probably be something like Sunday evening my time, Sunday Morning yours.

As for Discord... probably just going to get lost in the hubub on the Practical Guide server... and so far you are the only reply.

If I get a couple other people replying and showing interest, I'll set up a discord server just for this, but by the looks of it, one person does not an RPG campaign make.

Fayhem

> one person does not an RPG campaign make.

Sadly true. Alas, 'twas a beautiful dream. Do you have the invite/link/whatever to the Discord server for the Guide btw? I've started actually using Discord semi-regularly now so I figure now's a good time to actually join.

ninegardens

Here's a link

<https://discord.gg/jXM8QX>

Apparently it expires in one day. Good luck!

Decius

Would Ranger still end Cat if she had killed Amadeus when it became apparent that it was necessary?

His protection from her is wearing thin.

Liliet

What scenario are you envisioning in which Cat ever would be left with that as her best/only option?

ninegardens

What Scenario are you imagining where something CAT thought necessary was also considered important to the Ranger?

Best I can tell, Ranger cares about hunting big threats and kill folks that bug her. If Cat says "I killed black to save one million lives," Ranger's gonna be "Uh huh.... you think I care about that?"

The real question is, will ranger kill ANYONE for hurting Black?

If Malicia killed him, or Pilgrim, or even just some random Bandit, would Ranger revenge, or would she just shrug and go "Welp, dumb boy didn't learn those lessons I taught him, not my problem"

Liliet

This.

Ranger might have extra anger for Cat as opposed to a random enemy because she's someone Amadeus deliberately let close, but actually her being Ranger I'm not even buying that. She doesn't care, period.

And she'll either want to kill the person who broke her favorite toy, or she'll shrug and move on.

Fayhem

IIRC when the Calamities were talking about how when Black disappeared in some hero's personal domain for a few days and they couldn't tell if he was dead or not Sabah went on a rampage after having a werewolf relapse, and there was some comment to the effect of "and thankfully he showed up again before Ranger arrived, or there'd have been an actual mountain of corpses". I don't remember which chapter, I think it was somewhere in the Free Cities arc?

Anyway, the reason I bring it up is that while evidently Ranger's version of a sentimental attachment looks like a lot of killing (as far as I can tell, Ranger's version of just about everything looks like a lot of killing) the assessment from people who know her better than most is that she does have such an attachment to Amadeus. I definitely don't see shrugging as the hypothetical response, and I'm not sure "favorite toy" is necessarily apt either – she refuses to be "chained" by anyone or anything, but I don't think that inherently means she doesn't care in her own awful way.

Liliet

Ah, but who's saying that about Ranger? About what would happen if she showed up?

Let me give you a hint: it's people who care about others. It's either Amadeus, who cares about everyone and their mom so badly he's currently getting torn apart by loyalty conflicts (Alaya vs Praes being the main one, but there's plenty more!), or people who care about him in the symmetrical way that he inspires in people.

I sure don't remember Indrani, the person who actually knows her and has an outsider's view of her relationship with Amadeus, suggesting that.

You might be right. I just don't think it's assured, is all.

broadaxe

I think cathrine misunderstood black, seems to me he is taking this road because it will bring him close to malicia with her guard lowered. It seemed to me like he was actually just explaining his plan and the narrative he planned to take to ascend to power as dread emperor without her blocking him :3 after all he still thirsts for power :3

Liliet

lmao

Liliet

you're very optimistic about his priorities in this situation is all i'm saying if it turns out to be the plan you're talking about, i'll be not very surprised. if it does AND his version of the plan ends with him alive, i WILL be

Mammon

One thing that stood out to me for Black, is that my personal opinion of his unreliable narrator around Warlock being the case is once again surfacing. He falls into the 'Friend means friend in many things.', while Warlock has shown to be unbound by friendship or pick Malicia's side when it goes against logic reasoning. He refers to Black in Story matters, but him refusing to start a school is far from his own declining or disagreeing with Amadeus. We've seen so in his internal narratives and actions, while Black and others assume a certain cliché friendship to be followed.

And as EE has shown with Pilgrim not being fully Cat's friend and ally despite agreeing and allying with her in some some manners that would in lesser stories by other writers make him barely able to disagree with her past that point, EE can implement such divergence from perceived friendship and alliance. Warlock might've seen the hooks and not told Black about them because there was no need or it fell under the same dead switch things that Masego allowed and applauded in book 1 with the hairbraid, or otherwise have been aware or suspecting.

So maybe Black is working with at least a few facets and details simply being incomplete knowledge.

Mental Mouse

Um, you realize Warlock is dead, right? Hierophant AFAIK hasn't weighed on on the school. Agreed that he might not have reported Malicia's hooks even if he saw them ("Well, of course she'd do something like that, Black should know that"), but he might not have been able to see them in the first place. That said, I'd find it dubious that neither Black, the late Warlock, nor Scribe would have any idea of Malicia's Rule aspect. Naming and categorizing another Named's aspects is practically step 1 for planning around them, and her prior use of this particular aspect would have left hints for all three to notice.

Jane

Eh, it strikes me as similar to the White Knight's modification of Ride in Winter III – technically it's still Rule fueling her mind control trick, but it's far from the standard usage of her aspect (which I expect is usually rather showier), and required a lot of personal development and experimentation to enact. Once they know about it, they can work backwards to see how she did it, but in advance... You don't expect javelin light cannons from Ride, and you don't expect sleeper agents from Rule.

Especially since she's gone out of her way to keep this ability secret even when it would otherwise have been useful, and when she has other talents that can be blamed when she's messing with someone's mind.

Mammon

The hooks have been planted years in advance, when Warlock was still alive. I'm retroactively reasoning for him to tie it to Amadeus's current reasoning including that Warlock didn't know (before dying and all) while such a thing may have been the case. As Malicia didn't seem to know of Warlock's neutral stance of rational support rather than being well within Amadeus's camp, as we've seen in the few Warlock musings we've seen when he was still alive and the interlude's narrator, it's unlikely that she had some great scheme or reveal to be in this. But when Warlock's alliances were misinterpreted by Amadeus same as Alaya's, then which ones are false too?

I'm not saying he definately saw the hooks, but I am saying there's a fair chance that if he saw them that he saw no issue or need to tell Black about them. Whether for a logical reason (to Praes standards of 'logical'), because he assumed Black to know already, or because Malicia made a compelling rational argument which included Black not knowing everything especially about this part of her hooks.

That Black hadn't seen this coming at all, that's indeed on him. Sentimentality, huh?

Soronel Haetir

Something to keep in mind about Warlock, Amadeus was very much more his friend than Alaya. (Really it was Amadeus that kept the entire structure bound together, not Alaya). Scribe, Captain and Ranger were pretty much strictly Amadeus' friend rather than Alaya, Warlock only slightly less so. We don't have anything as definitive about Assassin but there have been hints that there too it is Amadeus that is the glue. With what we've seen even for Alaya Amadeus was the glue and not some over-arching fondness for the others.

The only reason that it wasn't Black that became Dread Emperor is that he did not want it. All the other Calamities would have chosen him every time over Alaya if he had shown any inkling that he would have accepted.

Mammon

Yes, I agree that Warlock definately preferred Black as a friend much more. However you are sharing Black's misassumption in this: that this means that Warlock would pick his side over Malicia's by sheer sentimentality. In some cases he would, but not as often as Black assumes. Warlock still has some patriotic pride to help Praes maybe, or at least help its leader when he's asked to and provided the means and adequate payment. I remember that somewhere in book 4's interludes on the now destroyed port city he even mused on how Alaya assumed him to be much more in Black's favour vs her than he really was.

Black's the glue that kept the Calamities together, but he didn't 'own' Warlock same as how Pilgrim wasn't an assured ally in her court yard in everything after he acknowledged her not being evil incarnate. While in many stories (and thus to many of us fan's nigh automatic assumption) this would've been the case. Which leads to the question: What else was he wrong about?

Doesn't matter. Axiom 55 as given this chapter is uni-alignmental, at least in most stories I know assuming they go deep enough to give the villains genuine depressive periods, so anything that makes Black sadder will only see to him becoming stronger once his theme music starts playing and he resolves himself to get back in the fray. May or may not be a terrible development depending on the situation and way of change.

Liliet

Amadeus has literally said this chapter that he acknowledges it's possible Wekesa wouldn't have told him.

So, uh, yeah.

Xinci

I do wonder at the exact accuracy of Cats statement on magic as she words things in a possibly inaccurate way for such things. Named Power takes a different method of acquisition and breach in some ways than Sorcery but this does not mean it is truly disconnected from it. A different clast of a greater system of rules and powers that were used to make the various dimensions. So perhaps most cannot usurp it due to one needing to fill a role with Purpose but the truly levels of connectedness seem nebulous. Perhaps it due to the Light and whatever name we may have for the inherent power of Evil if it isn't Night serve as big enough magical mactocosms for Cat to make such a distinction. I wonder if Masego would though.

The epigraph gives hope for Masego and the Knight getting their powers back.

Without Judgment aiding his own judgement Hanno will be easier to regulate. Even with the mistakes he will no doubt make he may study his lives to adapt to this pressure.

Liliet

Hanno already didn't present any problems in regulating. Not a single time did he actually defy local mortal authority, note.

Xinci

Nah he did, he answered to Judgement, and if Judgement found a problem with Cat he would intervene. Not saying that's a good or bad thing but he was a power she couldn't regulate completely.

Liliet

Judgement didn't tell him who to flip the coin for. He chose when to ask them, and he's been if anything more willing to cooperate with earthly authorities than any other hero on the goddamn continent in the entire series timeline.

Tohron

Hmm... it seems like the Dread Empress Victorious route may be happening after all. I'm not seeing any other way for Cat to extricate Amadeus from his current situation.

Liliet

So long as he doesn't kill himself after this, there's ways. Note that the Legions-in-Exile are still under impression they're carrying out HIS orders.

As for how Cat can assure that first condition... well. I'm just going to be crossing my fingers, here.

Soronel Haetir

So here's a nasty thought, remember the "Hall of Screams" from book 1? Has Amadeus done enough to have tried for the crown and failed by whatever magic animates that place?

Liliet

Ha.

Nice.

Liliet

So, hey, does anyone feel like talking about abusive relationships and logic employed by victims to justify and support them? And how Amadeus seems to be applying it in a spinning spray to absolutely everyone he cares about regardless of if they prompted him to or not?

"Surely this was my fault and not theirs" ™

ninegardens

I mean, partly.... but partly its a "I trust people to act according to their nature". You can't change parts of the system that aren't you, only your own decisions. If you want to learn, then in some sense everything is ALWAYS your fault.

The lesson you might learn is "I should have stabbed that abusive bastard with a knife, its my fault for not stabbing them", but the lesson is always something YOU could have done.

Liliet

There's a line, though. And the line right now is that Amadeus wanted to work with Alaya despite everything – despite the revelation of the planted commands – so badly, he fired Scribe over disrupting that possibility for him. And that he doesn't even learn the lesson that he should yell at Cat about what she did in hiding it from him, he just "doesn't blame her for it since he's the one who taught it to her". He's going with the "well if I hadn't PROVOKED them-" logic, where everyone gets to do whatever they want and he never REALLY confronts them about it or turns on them because of it.

His conclusion keeps being that he's still loyal to all of these people.

Except Eudokia who's been trying to stop him from being Like That. Ah, these inconvenient support systems hinting that something might be wrong with the picture and you might need to rethink your entire approach to relationships~

hakureireimu

He was already ready to kill Malicia to take her place during the peace talks; that's why he told Cat that it was about Eudokia and not Alaya. He fired Eudokia because she betrayed his trust; he can no longer trust that she will not plot behind his back.

Liliet

He was ready to kill Alaya because he was driven into a corner by her not contacting him, which happened because Eudokia burned that bridge behind his back.

That's the big sin she committed: she drove him into a confrontation he would give almost anything (but not the current stakes) to avoid.

sengachi

Oh that is a fascinating tale for Hanno to be going down. He's actually going to have to make his own judgements now isn't he?

Liliet

Eh.

In what situations has he flipped the coin so far?

- in confronting an evil villain actively right now fighting him. I, I think he's going to be fine making the call in that situation either way lmao;
- in being actively invited to ask Judgement's opinion on the situation. I think he's going to let out a long, happy sigh of relief over y'know no longer getting asked that. The next land dispute he's asked to arbitrate, he just flips them off while moonwalking backwards;
- in sorting out an intensely ambiguous situation where it's not clear who's on whose side and who did what. Yeah, if there's another Salian coup waiting in the future, Hanno's going to figure out another way to handle it. Is there, though?

In all other situations – aka most of them – he's been just fine relying on his own judgement of what is utterly obvious in being the right thing to do. He's been actively avoiding flipping the coin unless the person possibly maybe does deserve death and now's the time to do it if so. Remember how Arnaud unsettled him but there wasn't an obvious direct provocation so he stayed his hand?

He's just going to... keep doing that.

And I expect the range of 'well obviously' situations to slowly and naturally expand... 😊

ninegardens

"Gosh, I wonder if this abominable undead horror who is currently eating one of my teammates requires smiting"

Thomas Birch

Posting a comment to get the notifications 😊 loving this series.

Epilogue

"And on the first day of the year four hundred and ninety-three after the Declaration did a stranger slay High Lord Baraka Sahelian in the streets of Wolof, and she did not flee. Instead she challenged the Sahelians in such a manner: 'Come now, you who believe you might triumph over me, that I might teach you the error of your ways.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Dominion, twenty-fourth of the Secret Histories of Praes Inch by painful inch, Malicia had dragged the Dread Empire of Praes out of the pit and herself along with it.

She allowed herself to feel a sliver of pride over that, though only for a passing moment. To grow conceited over victories would signal the beginning of a swift descent. Yet victories she had won, slowly and carefully laying the foundation for them until they could be brought to bear against her enemies. The throne that had been crumbling under her had been forged anew by the fresh blood she'd spilled abroad: watching the Imperial Court through the enchanted wall that said to be the work of Dread Emperor Sorcerous himself, Malicia read the lips of the highborn gathered before her. Rumours had swelled of the developments in Salia and the Free Cities. The sudden reverses against the Grand Alliance only echoed more loudly for the way it had before seemed on the rise to pre-eminence, restoring the prestige eroded by Ashuran depredations and the losses in Thalassina and Foramen. Malicia did not rejoice of this, for she knew every speck of that clout would be needed for what was yet to come. Though in dark days the High Seats and lesser nobles were more easily convinced of great changes, there were many who would balk at the mere setting of a precedent.

The crop before her, however, looked ripe for harvest. High Lady Abreha Mirembe's absence, for Alaya had refused to relieve her from her duties as Governess of the Blessed Isle, had naturally prompted protest from Aksum and the Mirembe. In attempt to make her influence keenly felt Abreha had ordered the lords and ladies sworn to Askum to refrain from attending court until she was summoned back to Ater, but to Malicia's eye this had backfired. Lord Kosu's lion-like mane of hair could be picked out from the crowd, as could Lady Sesay's famous enchanted dress of pure gold. Those two ranked among the most powerful vassals to Aksum, and another half dozen lesser nobility sworn to Abreha had ignored her edict and attended regardless. None whose holdings were close to the city of Aksum, for Abreha Mirembe's wrath would run hot at the defiance, but enough that the High Lady of Aksum's position was revealed for the worsening drought that it was. A year ago, Abreha had been but a few manoeuvres of having herself proclaimed Chancellor regardless of Malicia's opinion of the matter. Now the vultures were beginning to circle her, her defeats at the hands of General Sacker when she'd attempted to intervene in Callow having soured her position.

In the wake of the recall of the inaptly named Legions-in-Exile, the highborn of Praes had come to believe the entire affair a long-reaching scheme of hers and General Sacker one of her agents in humbling High Lady Abreha. Perhaps if Sacker's soldiers had not so neatly slaughtered the Askum forward parties and driven the refugees back to the Blessed Isle – where they must now be fed at the expense of Abreha – her influence could have been salvaged, but the defeats had been both swift and utter. The Governess of the Blessed Isle was then left with the dilemma of either pursuing a punitive campaign into Callow and risking starting a war with Laure or admitting herself to have been almost contemptuously swatted down. Abreha had attempted to sidestep the issue by accusing General Sacker of treason, which the goblin general had answered in kind, which had been trouble at the time. Amadeus was a rebel in all but name and conceding to the shadow of his influence would have been a grave mistake. By stretching out giving answer, however, Malicia had been able to feign control of the situation and leave the High Lady of Aksum's support to wither on the vine.

With the currents within Praes mastered, it had been time turn her full efforts outwards. The League of Free Cities had been the easiest grounds to make gains in, and so where she had first concentrated her efforts. It had swiftly become clear that Penthes could be bought, courtesy of Amadeus sowing crippling chaos across the nobility during his last visit and Kairos Theodosian then pouring oil on the fire. Reaching an accord with the Tyrant of Helike had proved necessary, for through the Hierarch he wielded great influence over the rest of the League. They'd agreed on the Exarch-claimants that should be spared, and in binding them irremediably through participation in a darker scheme: the deployment of Still Water against the fleets of Nicae. From there, it was only a matter of ensuring that her position in the Free Cities was strong enough Kairos Theodosia's coming treachery could inflict only minor damage. The Magisterium was approached and promised protection from invasion until it had finished its cycle of replenishment for the Spears of Stygia. The deal had to be further sweetened with magical tomes, but in principle Malicia had no objection to an empowered Magisterium tying down the resources of neighbouring city-states.

Antagonizing Atalante had been as simple as inciting the Tyrant and other greats of the League to constantly and publicly slight some of their most beloved preachers, culminating in their delegation being forced to carry a nailed manuscript of the Book of All Things as a formal member during the conference in Salia. The utter humiliation and the rest of the League's acquiescence to it had made them walk away from the situation the moment they were no longer bound by law to be involved. The Secretariat's long-standing tendency to state neutrality when its interests were not being threatened – as well as the dire state of its coffers after maintaining so many mercenaries in its service for so long – meant that so long as they were not provoked they could be counted on to be neutral as well. All that was required then to utterly isolate the Tyrant of Helike had been to sever or turn Nicae from the rest, which Theodosian might have assumed to be difficult given their shared treachery against the city and its young Basileus. And it had been a thorny problem for Malicia, she'd admit, at least until Catherine had returned to the surface and begun reminding the rest of Calernia of the looming threat she represented.

It'd only been a question of aiming at Basileus Leo Trakas in particular, from there, and he was not all that complicated a man.

The deceased Strategos whose authority he'd usurped had been a close ally of Cordelia Hasenbach, and now so was Catherine Foundling. A foundation for mistrust. She'd also had dealings with the Tyrant, at the best of times his enemy as well as his ally, and made the leading heroic lights of the Grand Alliance defer to her will several times. Best of all she had the soul of Akua Sahelian, the sole known user of Still Water, bound to her service. It'd not been all that difficult to tip wariness into fear and then fear into the making of mistakes. Not that her victory there had been as complete as it could have been, Malicia silently conceded. Kairos Theodosian had risen from the grave to spit on her plans one last time, a poisonous snake even in death. The Eyes had confirmed that one of his two foremost generals had sworn herself to the war against Keter while the other, General Basilia, had openly declared war on Penthes. A weakened Helike might be able to maul the even more desolate Nicae, should it support Penthes, but it would not find Penthes itself so easy a prey. The distance between the city-states was significant and marching there would involve making pacts with the states between them, which Malicia fully intended to sabotage.

Still, where the League of Cities might have informally been an ally to the Dread Empire instead it was likely to spiral into another civil war that tied it down for the foreseeable future. In the longer lay of things, the Empress would see what might be arranged. If the war went badly for General Basilia and her Helikeans, the Magisterium might yet be convinced to step in for easy spoils. And if it went well? Then the Magisterium it might yet be convinced to step in lest victory allow Helike to resume pre-eminence among the League. The Tyrant might have allowed his people to reach tall heights while he lived but in his death he had left them stranded and surrounded by potential enemies. There would be some pleasure in teaching Helike the consequences of its actions, Malicia would confess. Kairos Theodosian had been an atrocious little prick, convinced he was amusing and that his sneering smugness was somehow endearing. It'd been draining to deal with him even when he was genuinely trying to cooperate with her, and passing the duties to Ime had not been possible: the moment the little shit had sniffed out how abhorrent she found him, he'd insisted their bargaining be done only between rulers.

Steps coming from the deeper reach of the hidden corridor the Empress still stood in, studying her court as she awaited the proper time to enter, shook her out of her thoughts. Ime's pace was brisk, befitting urgent news. Malicia did not turn, eyes on the overly lingering courtesies Lady Nazar and the younger brother of Lord Salee – affair or scheme? The Salee and Nazar lands bordered one another, lending potential weight to either. It would not be the first time Lady Nazar allowed a foe's younger sibling into her bed as well as her plans.

"Speak," Malicia said, eyes moving to catch yet another of the thousand little details that might allow her to keep the court under her thumb.

"Duchess Kegan had our envoys drawn and quartered," Ime said. "In front of cheering crowds."

Unpleasant, but not unexpected. The Deoraithe were not an expansionist people by nature and with Kegan's appointment to Governess-General of Callow they'd begun accruing honours in the kingdom as the duchess appointed kin and allies to offices. Competent ones, sadly, which only added to the faction's influence. It meant that the Black Queen's promise to the Deoraithe of independence-in-all-but-name along with a tight military alliance was a very difficult bribe to better.

"The Legions?" Malicia asked.

"The Okoro mages cadres were made welcome by Marshal Nim, and construction of the ritual grounds is progressing at a steady pace," Ime replied.

Good, the Empress thought. When the time came and signal was sent by the Exile Legions mages, the ritual could be initiated and the armies forced back into Creation from these 'Twilight Ways'. Returnign exactly at the centre of fortified killing ground, manned by her more loyal armies. High officers of dubious loyalty would be taken hostage and kept at the Tower, the unsalvageable purged and more trustworthy men forced in place. Heavy-handed but necessary. The Legions of Terror needed to be unshakeably hers before Amadeus returned. It meant more blunt action than she would have preferred employing, but in these times such bluntness could serve as a reminder of her strength as well.

"And?" Malicia asked.

There would be more. Neither of those reports had been time sensitive.

"Lord Amadeus has gone missing," Ime hesitantly said. "Neither our people in Salia nor in the Army of Callow know where he is. We believe Queen Catherine herself is unaware."

Alaya stilled.

"You are certain?" she said.

"It is like he vanished into thin air," Ime said.

He was not dead, Alaya decided. She would have... felt it, somehow. She would have. And though the Empress had been harsh in demonstrating to him the futility of defying her, it was no more than he had earned. He'd know that, understand how measured the answer had been considering the gravity of his mistakes. Had she not held her hand until he claimed a right to her very throne? Even allowing for what had no doubt been poisonous whispers by Scribe – who, it was now clear, after decades was finally done pretending to be anything but an enemy – there was no light under which those actions could be seen that was anything but a betrayal. It was, Malicia knew, better this way. Now there was no longer anything let wondered and unspoken, no question of what would happen if he turned against her. He had, and he had lost. Swiftly, utterly, without ever landing a blow in return. And with that question finally laid to rest, they could forge a fresh understanding of who and what they were. Amadeus would not have taken his own life over such a thing, for sober admissions of his blunders were at the heart of who he was. He was still alive, which meant he was coming home. One way or another.

"It is likely he went into the Twilight Ways," the Empress said.

"Agreed," Ime said, standing by her side. "And though I know it displeases you to even consider this, Your Dread Majesty-"

"He could be returning as a foe," Malicia said. "I am aware."

Amadeus yet commanded loyalty with much of the Legions and had many sympathizers among the Empire's bureaucracy. Scribe had seen to that. Some of the High Seats might be using to use him as a stalking horse for their own bid for the Tower, too, High Lady Abreha most of all. There might even be some lesser nobles that would genuinely rally to his banner, should he raise it. Though despised by most highborn, his tenure as her Black Knight had also seen him become widely feared. For some that meant respect, especially with families who had martial inclinations by tradition. His Duni birth meant most would not even consider him a possible claimant, true, but there would be some with greater interest in deeds than skin. More worrying were his ties to the Clans and the currently rebelling Tribes, though Malicia had already begun to check those potential threats with measures of her own.

"I would win," the Dread Empress of Praes said.

"You would," Ime agreed. "And so I caution you of assassination."

Malicia glanced at her spymistress, almost amused.

"You believe he'd run me through in open court?" she asked.

"At this point?" Ime said. "Yes. Or, at least, I'm unsure enough of the answer I have to consider the possibility."

"Without his Name, I could have him frozen with a word," Malicia noted.

"That is no reason to expose yourself unduly," Ime said.

"I do not intend to," Malicia flatly said. "I am not a debutante thankfully accepting an ally's antidote, Ime. Regardless of his reasons he has failed and betrayed me. It will be years before I can even begin to trust him as I once did."

She paused.

"But I will not rob myself of what could be restored out of petty fear," Alaya said. "He will have a place in my court, should he return."

What was there left to fear, after all? In Praes, her vise was tightening around all who might yet oppose her. In the Free Cities, she stood queenmaker and holder of strings as the crows gathered above. In the far west she had sown chaos and confusion, stranded for months the Army of Callow, and last of all she stood the sole ally of Keter on Calernia. The Dead King needed her, lest the entire continent band against him as the sole crucible of darkness. Lest every hero turn north, the sum of every Hell and Heaven march against him. Malicia would betray him, in the end. That much had never been in doubt. She would betray him the moment the armies of the Grand Alliance were savaged beyond ability to harm her, and in the uneasy peace that followed the Dread Empire of Praes would stand without peer. Hers to mold into what it should be, as she reigned untouchable from atop the Tower.

The storm had come for Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name, and she had beaten it. She had survived the crucible thrust upon her by Below, and now she would claim her dues from Creation.

"It is time," the Empress said, eyes on the court. "Have them readied."

"By your will," Ime said, bowing low.

Malicia was left to stand alone, watching her court. Where she would soon enter and introduce before the lords and ladies of Praes the beginning of a new age. From the Northern Steppes, chieftains had come. Blackspear, Graven Bone and Stag-Crowned. Large, powerful clans of the southern stretches. Their chieftains had come to be proclaimed Lords of the Steppes, empowered to collect tribute in the name of the Tower from the other clans while themselves standing exempt of it. There were some among the court who would despise this, and what would follow yet more. For there was one more awaiting, hidden. She would be presented as the very first of her kind: High Lady Wither of Foramen, having renounced her former title of Matron as she returned Foramen to the Praesi fold. The Great Game, it always changed.

The only thing that didn't was that Alaya of Satus always, always won.

—

Tariq listened in wonder to the roars of the crowd. Mere days ago the people of Salia had been angrily rioting, boiling out onto the streets, and yet now the same mob was cheering Cordelia Hasenbach so vociferously it seemed as if the very sky above might collapse from the ruckus. Merovins Square was considered one of the great works of Procer, the great Salian gathering place built over generations of the rule of the family of the same name. In the upper reaches of the part of the city men called the Joinery, massive arches of pale stone formed a perfect circle above great open avenues. Statues and monuments of every stripe dotted the square, some so worn by ages that the faces had been eaten through by rain and sleet while others were but a few years old. The tall, slender monument to the dead of what Procerans called the 'Great War', for example. The twisted marble, showing a ring of men and women both dragging each other up and pushing each other down, had chilled him when he'd first glimpsed it. The sculptor has shown great skill in making the faces move from triumph to agony and grief under the vagaries of the 'Ebb and the Flow'. A fitting monument to a bloody civil war.

And now a young father was hoisting up his daughter so that she could peek over the weeping face of a marble woman and have a better look at the First Prince addressing the people of Salia. Merovins Squared had filled with thousands upon thousands, like a sea of people split by elegant islands of stone and metal. From where Tariq stood, under the shade of a great roofed terrace overlooking the magnificent wooden pulpit from which Cordelia Hasenbach was addressing the crowd, he could only barely make out the words the First Prince was speaking. Yet there was no mistaking their thundering approval, the way it echoed through the sunny afternoon air. He was not the only one who had been invited to wait here, far from it. The Grand Alliance's shine must be burnished, for the people to put their hope in it, and so the great names had all been brought. Young Razin and Aquiline, pretending to be speaking politics over wine when they were truly flirting in that heady, hesitant way of those still unsure of the affection of the other. Tall and serious Yannu Marave, in the cast of whose face Tariq could not help but seeing Sintra. Itima Ifriqui, the sole of the Blood could still remember him having a full head of hair, though their long acquaintance had yielded little fondness. Respect, yes, but the Peregrine had always held in distaste the fondness for bloody vengeance of the Brigand's Blood.

Others too, the seconds of their realms: Princess Rozala Malanza and Lady Vivienne Dartwick, seated in the shade and speaking in low tones of granaries and treasuries. Tariq's opinion had already been sought over the matter of a temporary common treasury for the Grand Alliance, though he'd demurred from giving an opinion. It was a sound notion, as far as he was concerned, but he must wean the Blood from the habit of seeking his council. The chances he would survive the coming war were slim, and the surrender of his crown had only made him warier of speaking on matters of rule. Yet it was the last here on the terrace that his eyes lingered over. Hanno of Arwad, once the Sword of Judgement and perhaps one day once more, was leaning against the balustrade and look down at the crowd. At his side the Black Queen of Callow, hair loose down her back and a light smile on her face, was looking down with him and speaking without reserve. The easy cordiality that held between the two, natural as a sparrow's flight, had surprised him. Perhaps it should not have been, for those two had never fought before and for a hero sworn to the Seraphim the White Knight could be said to be... unusual.

Tariq approached, as much out of curiosity as desire to converse.

"- wait, so if you recall someone that understood High Arcana, wouldn't you-"

"Only so long as I am within the memories," the White Knight replied. "Which makes you correct, but the knowledge itself impossible to use."

"You still get to learn languages by the fucking basketful, so I wouldn't complain," Catherine Foundling drily said. "Even back when I still had Learn, it took me months to learn what I knew. Even had to learn Chantant the hard way."

"I find Tolesian significantly easier," Tariq admitted, coming to stand at Hanno's side. "Though that might be because of the tradertongue and Lunara loan words."

"Everyone should just speak Lower Miezán," the Black Queen suggested.

"Chantant is the single most spoken language on Calernia, I believe," the White Knight said. "Should it not be the chosen tongue, by virtue of this?"

"It's got more exceptions than a Wasteland loyalty pledge," Catherine Foundling snorted. "Over my dead body."

The Grey Pilgrim's brow almost rose, for though the Black Queen was known as something of a wit and prone to bantering, there seemed to be a genuine rapport between the two he'd not expected. They were both young and attractive, Tariq thought, so perhaps... No, he decided, flicking them a long and considering glance. The Black Queen had a roving eye, a fact he'd heard had been the subject of great interest among Proceran royalty, but the White Knight had no reputation for dalliances. And seemingly little interest in them, which the Grey Pilgrim could only approve of considering the days they lived in. Below them, the crowd roared again,

"The First Prince is in fine form today," Tariq said.

"She is a gifted speaker," Hanno noted. "As one would expect of a woman bearing her title."

"She's offering them hope," the Black Queen said. "She could be stumbling over half those sentences and still they'd cheer fit to shake the earth."

"The Grand Alliance has lost a founding member, with Ashur," Tariq cautioned.

"The League of Free Cities retreats, or joins our ranks," the White Knight said. "And the dreaded Black Queen has been tamed and added to our ranks. There is reason to rejoice."

Young Catherine replied with what he believed to be fairly obscene language in Kharsum, to Hanno's apparent amusement, but Tariq was grimacing. Precious little of the League had joined, no matter the posturing, and Tariq mistrusted those that had. General Pallas and her ten thousand, the appallingly named Tyrant's Own, might not have the stomach to truly see through the war to the north. It remained to be seen, and soldiers were not to be turned away, but these were not to be relied on.

"Best for all of us that Cordelia has her day," the Black Queen said. "If parading us all before the crowd puts some spine back in Procer, I'll even smile and say pretty things."

"Your generosity is remarkable," Tariq said, only half teasing.

Most of her allies had, after all, until recently been at war with her. The Peregrine cast a discreet look at young Razin and Aquiline once more, heart clenching. Blood, both of them, and that would matter in the days to come. But Aquiline Osenia had not so long ago tried to kill the man she now courted and yet now the smiled softly at one another. Razin Tanja, defeated and orphaned, had not been embittered or broken but instead risen past what he had been taught. Tariq had heard of his words, of the renunciation of the honour killings. Of the harsh words he'd spoken at what Levant had become. And Gods, but Tariq was feeling his years. His soul had been wounded, and his body was nearing the end of its days. There was a future for the Dominion, but it lay not in Yannu Marave, who embodied at once the best and the worst of Levant, or in Itima Ifriqui's borderlands savagery. Yet those two, the seed of what they might yet become, it would need to be nurtured. Protected. And he might not live long enough to see this through.

"I would, Queen Catherine, ask of you a favour," Tariq said.

Dark eyes studied him, amusement sliding off her face.

"Funny, that," the Black Queen said. "I've been meaning to ask one of you as well."

"A trade might be arranged, then," the old hero said, pleased. "When the Grand Alliance marches north, you are to be among the great warleaders of it."

"Seems likely," the young priestess acknowledged.

"There are two of mine I would have you take under your wing," Tariq said. "Under your protection."

She followed his gaze to Aquiline and Razin.

"You've got plans for them," the Black Queen said.

"It is a new world you would make," the Grey Pilgrim said. "I will not have Levant left behind."

Slowly, she nodded.

"I am told you might be one of the few people alive capable of removing a compulsion from someone's mind," Queen Catherine said.

"I have some experience with this," Tariq acknowledged.

Sorceries to that effect were more easily disrupted, but even alchemies and Speaking could be purged if one knew the way. The Peregrine had greatly benefitted from the tutelage of the Ophanim in this.

"I believe Dread Empress Malicia to have planted commands among several officers of the Army of Callow," the Black Queen said. "I'd request your assistance in removing them without harming the officers in question, which I'm told could be... difficult."

"This I would offer free of recompense," Tariq frankly said. "I will not begrudge you my hand's work when it is to be used to aid your soldiers in fighting for the preservation of mankind."

She seemed surprised, which had him pushing down a grimace. It had not been unfounded a conclusion, but Tariq was attempting to bridge the gap and vexed to see how deep he had helped dig this one. The Grey Pilgrim was not unaware that there was only so long one could keep treating someone as an enemy before they became one in truth.

"I'll keep the favour, then," the Black Queen said, eyes watchful as she studied him.

Below the crowd roared anew at some fresh turn of phrase of the First Prince. White, Grey and Black, the three of them looked at the lone silhouette of Cordelia Hasenbach. The stubborn soul that would not allow the Principate to fall to its knees, no matter the coming doom.

"The Tower stirs," Tariq quietly said. "The Ophanim whisper of it."

"I suspect," the Black Queen quietly said, "that the Tower is about to have a great deal of trouble on its hands."

Suspect. Was it true, then, that she did now know where the Carrion Lord had gone?

"And if Praes sallies forth?" the White Knight asked.

"Then I will get the east in order the hard way," Catherine Foundling replied, tone steady as stone.

It was a small, almost imperceptible thing. Tariq Fleetfoot saw it anyway, as did Hanno of Arwad. A flicker, a spark. When the Queen of Callow had spoken the words and meant them, something had begun to take shape.

A Name, Gods help them all.

—

It was a beautiful realm, Amadeus thought.

A summer night unending, starry and warm. The kind of realm that made for a pleasant journey even when the sum of your earthly possessions was a horse, bundled armour and a fortnight's worth of rations. Bridle in hand, sleeves rolled up on his tunic as the sword at his hip moved with his leg, he wandered down the road snaking forward through the Twilight Ways.

Amadeus no longer had his armies, not even his personal guard — he had left them in Catherine's hands, requesting she safeguard them through the strife to come.

Amadeus no longer had spies, or wealth or even the power of a Name. He had sent away Scribe, failed Captain and lost Warlock. Assassin was gone, if not from Creation then at least from his service.

Alaya would see him kneeling, or forever gone from her sight.

Tabula rasa, a blank slate. After so many decades, the thought of it should have angered him. Should have brought in him despair and bitterness, for all he had built went up in smoke. Instead he felt relieved. Like a weight had been lifted from his shoulder. It was just him, now. Him and a sword and a plan against all the world. He looked up at the starry sky and laughed.

"Evening, stranger," a voice drawled. "Where might you be headed, that it has you in such a merry mood?"

Leaning back against a tree, shrouded in darkness, Hye Su was gazing at him with mild interest. It'd been years since they last saw each other, and she'd hardly changed at all – save for the burns on the side of her face, a mark of Summer challenged but not beaten.

"East, I would think," Amadeus mused.

"Whatever for?" Ranger asked, tone nonchalant.

Voice high and clear, he sang.

"The last is strangest, she said to them
The easiest and the most solemn
For when the tower is yours to claim
You will have forgotten why you came."

There was a moment of silence, and then the Lady of the Lake pushed herself off the tree.

"Might be I'll walk with you a while, then," Hye Su said.

"I thought you might," Amadeus smiled.

And into the starry night they went, side by side.

Shikkarasu

One.
More.
Week.
We are strong. We can do this.

WeeMadCanuck

I have been reading this since I discovered it in December. I've never spent so many nights reading till I dropped, and I suspect I never will again. This story is a masterpiece.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

And aside of my very favored series of real world books, me neither.

Thank you, erraticerrata, for letting us have part of your world.

therealgridlock

When I first round Worm, i read through years in months, and then was mad when I was caught up.

When I first round Grrlpower, i read through years in weeks, then was mad when I was caught up.

When I first round With This Ring, i read through years in a month or so, and then was mad when I caught up.

When I first found girl genius, i head through over a decade in a few nights, and now am maddened that even their prodigious upload schedule isn't enough.

I am not even done reading through PGTE and i know I'm going to be furious when it's done or I'm caught up, because few things catch my attention so much.

Twig was a beautiful story, Ward was a wonderful conclusion, i didn't finish pact (unforseen circumstances) and i was caught up on pale before I started reading this. I imagine I will then read through a few months of pale in a few days after I am done with this.

Physical mediums may be great, but boy howdy it's easy to absolutely devour millions of words and decades of work online.

Komplode

Hype

BarthHumphries

Is this story done?

knockoffnikolai

Erratic said in the comments that the first chapter of Book VI is coming out on Monday (Jan 6).

General Chaos

Only around 10 hours left. Jesus fucking Christ, I am so hyped for this thing.

Someperson

I'm a bit behind the times, but I wanted to comment on what appears to be a name in the works for Catherine. When I catch up to the story we'll see if any further revelations concerning her Name have happened.

A name comes with a lot of strings attached, and loss of protection against Bard besides, but it is also very fitting that one who would reform the Named do so from within their ranks.

As for what name in particular is unfolding...

- 1) The name was birthed from Catherine saying she would call the tower to heel if necessary, and meaning it.
- 2) The wish at the core of her name is for peace, and specifically her vision of what that peace looks like lies inside the Accords.
- 3) She has lately been having second thoughts about putting "justifications only matter to the just" on her flag. Obviously, she is no servant of above and never will be, but it feels like she may be headed towards one of the roles like Ranger, who isn't strongly hero or villain and is cast in those roles depending on the story.

It looks to me an awful lot like some kind of Name to impartially police all of Calernia and enforce the rules of engagement found in the Accords is being forged. Which is a really good sign for Catherine's endgame goal of fashioning the Accords into expectation etched into the fabric of Fate.

NerfContessa

3xcellent book, 3rraticerratica. As 3xp3cted,.but still bears mentioning.

As for the stirrings of a name, cat will likely refuse it agqijln, unless it fits her plans really really well.

Ideas: High Justice, peace ringer, or maybe even the last villain?
