I resisted the urge to close my eyes. I was going to let that one go, for the sake of avoiding the awkwardness of a correction this early into the talk.

"Just to make sure I'm addressing you properly," I said. "Would you happen to be a boy drow or a girl drow?"

Ivah blinked, silver fluttering behind long lashes. Not because it needed to, I suspected. It was a conscious expression of surprise.

"I am no longer Mighty," it replied.

"That, uh, was not the question," I said.

"If you were human," Diabolist said. "Which gender would you consider yourself to be?"

Ivah looked a little uncomfortable.

"Cattle has no gender," it said, sounding apologetic.

"As a Callowan, I can tell you that's frankly terrible way to approach animal husbandry," I noted. "But let's keep moving. You were... Mighty, is that right?"

"When still named Dimas, I was third under Zapohar and a rylleh in my own right," Ivah said. "What stands beyond you was toppled and disgraced, harvested of all but a sip of Night and sent to die in the Burning Lands as final mockery."

My eyes narrowed. I lacked context for most of that, but there was one part I had guesses about. I tapped the side of my eye.

"The silver," I said. "Yours is dulled. It's this Night that caused it in the first place?"

"That is so," Ivah sadly agreed.

"Your people are said to pay obeisance to the Tenets of Night," Diabolist said, standing at my back. "The matter is linked, I take it."

"All is one," Ivah gravely said, touching its lips with two fingers. "All is strife. The worthy will rise."

"I don't like the sound of that," I told Akua in Kharsum. "It's one thing for them to have some sort of cult paying dues to Below, but that silver in its eyes is no illusion."

"The drow mercenaries I hired were not capable of the shadow flicker," Akua noted in the same. "Perhaps the power ebbs away from the Everdark?"

"That lot outside is bottom-feeders, Diabolist," I murmured. "And still they were capable of a trick most Named wouldn't sneer at. There's something wrong here. If their lower ranks are this strong there's no way they'd be a ruin of an empire as they supposedly are."

"Unless," Akua said calmly, "that very power is the cause of ruin."

My brow rose. That was possible, yes. Were they all fighting of this Night so ferociously they'd broken their own realm?

"Ivah," I said. "The other drow outside, were they also Mighty once?"

The prisoner smiled thinly.

"None of us are drow, Lately Queen," it said. "Had we returned in glory, perhaps once more, but this is disgrace heaped upon disgrace."

So that was just going to keep happening, huh. Lovely.

"I thought Mighty was a gender," I said.

"Mighty are," Ivah stiffly said. "We are not, no longer. Most of them never were. They fought under no sigils, nor knew the favour of cabals. Meat for harvest."

"Mighty are people," Akua suggested in Kharsum. "And so those not Mighty, by definition, are not. Natural nobility, it would seem. Power earned or lost blade in hand."

"It's madness, Akua," I grunted. "If the only way people can ever amount to anything in a society is by killing, that's all they'll ever..."

I trailed off. Well. Yeah, I supposed that would collapse an empire. There would be a need to dig deeper into that nightmare of a culture later, but first there were immediate matters to be addressed.

"Do you know a way into the Warrens?" I asked the prisoner.

"The path we took was also meant for our return," Ivah warily said. "The marks on our feathers allow for passage through the Gloom, twice."

"Your feathers," I repeated carefully, then leant forward to flick a finger on one of the strips of obsidian making up its armour. "Those?"

"It is so," the drow agreed.

"What is the Gloom?" Akua probed.

"The gate into the realm of the Mighty," Ivah said. "Only those marked may leave, or enter."

"Indrani told us that when Ranger tried to get into the Everdark she got stuck in the tunnels," I told Akua in Kharsum. "Some kind of warded labyrinth, sounds like."

"We've enough at hand to salvage keys for ourselves," Diabolist said. "Though I would suggest we keep one guide to learn how to use it."

"I'm not going to just execute prisoners, Akua," I peevishly said.

"Those unable to speak Chantant are useless to us," she pointed out.

"It's not a question of usefulness," I said. "We don't execute prisoners."

"Dearest, I understand that mercy is a useful tool," she assured me. "I do not dismiss it. Yet for it to have worth in the eyes of the enemy, there need be a cultural value assigned to it. There is no indication it is so with the drow."

"This isn't about the drow, Akua," I said. "It's about us not putting holes in people who've surrendered. I've got no issue with killing on the field, and I've made my peace with assassinations when there's no other way to avoid making a mess. This is different. They're no real threat to us."

"They are blades we must then keep an eye on," Diabolist said. "Perhaps you and I are proof to such slights, but Archer is not. Nothing we have seen leads me to believe they will honour their surrender the moment the threat of death is lifted."

"If they break that understanding, after being made aware it exists, then they can be killed," I patiently told her. "That's how keeping prisoners of war works, Akua."

"The warband sought to slay or enslave us, and gave no warning before striking," the shade reminded me. "They have not earned such treatment. This is an unnecessary risk."

"It'd be easier to kill everyone, Diabolist," I said steadily. "It always is. But when you behave like that, you end up living in the fucking Wasteland. Is this the simplest way to do things? No. But it's how we do it, because if we don't act civilized then people don't act civilized with us."

Scarlet eyes flicked to the prisoner facing me. Ivah's eyes were watching us carefully, unable to understand the words but not beyond following the tones.

"Will they?" she wondered. "Act civilized, even if we offer them such civility."

"It was always one of your worst habits," I coldly said, "to burn bridges without ever trying to cross them. It may not work. We'll never know unless we try."

Diabolist languidly shrugged.

"I offer only perspective," she said. "The decision was always yours."

"It's been made," I flatly said.

I turned away from the shade, and cleared my throat.

"Ivah," I said. "I want you to guide us through the Warrens."

The drow's face fell.

"The passage leads to the holdings of the Kodrog," it said carefully. "The Mighty of that sigil are said to be among the strongest of the outer rings."

"Stronger than the sigil you used to fight under?" I asked.

"The Zapohar once ruled a whole district of Great Parun," Ivah proudly said. "Our Mighty claimed seats on no less than five cabals. The Kodrog would have been broken in an hour's passing, facing our wrath."

It grimaced.

"Their wrath, now," the prisoner corrected sadly.

"Parun was one of the great cities of the drow, before their empire broke apart," Akua told me in Kharsum. "Though not the capital, which I recall to be named Tvarigu."

"I'd guess the more powerful tribes – sigils, I suppose – live in the old cities," I replied. "Not sure what the cabals are, though. Some sort of alliance? Their Mighty seem to be able to belong to both at the same time."

"Warrior lodges, perhaps," the shade mused. "Or an association of influential aristocrats. It is hardly unprecedented."

I'd ask our songbird later.

"We can handle the Kodrog," I told Ivah. "I'd rather avoid a fight if I can, but if I can't I assure you they're not going to stop us. We're looking to speak to, uh, your most powerful sigils. The people that make the real decisions for the Everdark."

"You speak of the entire realm of the Mighty," Ivah said questioningly.

I nodded.

"There is no such thing, Lately Queen," Ivah told me. "No cabal has ever claimed to influence more than two cities, and the Hour of Twilight was massacred by its rivals a century past."

"All right, let me put it another way," I said. "Is there anyone at all that if they speak, everyone in the Everdark will listen?"

"Sve of Night," the drow said in a hushed whisper, touching its lips again.

"The Priestess of Night," Akua said, chancing a guess at the unfamiliar Crepuscular term.

"That is cattle-term," Ivah reproachfully said. "The Sve is Mighty."

Ah. That shed light, in a manner of speaking. So a Mighty was not male or female or anything else, they were just Mighty. Priestess was a female term, in Chantant, so the implication would be insulting to the drow. I'd keep that in mind for future reference. No need to give insult to the people I'd come to bargain with.

"And if the Sve gives an order, the Mighty will obey?" I pressed.

"The Sve has already given order," Ivah. "It is the truth of us, embraced."

"If the Sve says the drow are going to war," I patiently tried. "Would people listen?"

Ivah's face creased, folds in the skin appearing that no human could mimic.

"It may be so," the prisoner said. "The Sve does not speak, yet if the silence was broken all would hear of it."

"Then that's where we're headed," I said. "To have a chat with the Sve."

The drow shivered.

"Holy Tvarigu is forbidden," it told us. "Ancient and powerful sigils guard the paths to it."

"I can be convincing. I'm known as a diplomat of great skill, on the surface," I lied.

Akua was too self-controlled to snort, but the way she folded her arms together told me everything she thought about that mild reframing of that slight exaggeration.

"It would be better to be slain," Ivah softly said. "There are things worse than death."

Well, I hadn't expected the locals to be friendly from the start. Gods, when had anyone ever been?

"Tell you what," I said. "Get us into the realm of the Mighty, past the Gloom, and when we're there we'll change guides for the next stretch of the journey. You'll be free to go."

The drow's strange eyes narrowed.

"You would speak oath to this?" it asked.

"I would," I said. "And there are forces beyond your understanding that make me keep to those, when I care to give them."

Ivah hesitated.

"I would be slain, even free," it admitted. "I return bereft of Night, failing the terms of my exile."

Diabolist leaned forward.

"Tell me, Ivah," she said. "You spoke of the Night being harvested. From the living, as was done to you, but can this also be done to the dead?"

"That is so," the drow said.

"We have a corpse," she told me in Kharsum.

The one she'd held, who'd been killed by his own warriors. An easy enough concession.

"Do you need to have killed the person yourself to do the harvest?" I asked.

Ivah shook its head.

"Due can be bestowed," the drow said. "It is rare, yet not unknown."

"There was a warrior with feathers on their helmet," I said. "If you harvested them, would that fix your problem?"

"Tiarom was first in power among the warband," Ivah said, sounding rather eager. "There would be enough to no longer walk as meat, though it would leave me well short of Mighty."

"That sounds like a yes," I said.

I offered my hand.

"Ivah of no sigil," I said. "Should you take us past the Gloom and into the Everdark, I swear to return your freedom to you. We will part ways there without enmity or demand."

The drow looked at my hand curiously, then back at my eyes.

"You're supposed to clasp it," I informed it.

"Strange ways," the drow murmured, but without further fumbling we shook on it.

I rose to my feet, stretching out.

"All right, let's get this done," I said. "Akua, see to the rest of the warband."

"Healing is no power of Winter," she reminded me.

"You're telling me tending wounds wasn't something your tutors went over?" I replied, eyebrow raised.

"I will do what I can, if that is your wish," she conceded. "Though I promise no miracles."

"Never considered those to be in your wheelhouse," I drily replied. "Come, Ivah. I'm getting curious as to this harvest of yours."

The silver-eyed warrior followed without a word. Indrani was carving away at a piece of wood, when I came out, sitting on a stone and watching the others.

"Fruitful talks?" she called out.

"You might say that," I replied. "Wanna see something I assume will be highly gruesome?"

"Do I ever," she enthusiastically replied.

"Come with me, then," I said. "Where'd you leave the corpse?"

She blinked.

"Was I supposed to pick that up?" she asked.

"Where it died, then," I snorted.

It was a short stroll down the slope to where Fancy Hat – Tiarom, apparently – had found himself on the bad end of drow politics. The body was drenched with half-melted ice from Akua's construct, but otherwise untouched.

"Are we corpse-robbing?" Inrdani mused. "I thought we had, like, moral objections to that."

"I'm putting this under religious exemption," I told her. "Ivah, it's all yours."

"Many thanks, Lately Queen," the drow murmured, bowing.

It dragged the body further away from the wetness even as I felt Archer stiffen.

"Did they just-"

"Don't you say a fucking word," I hissed.

"Oh, that's making it into my next chat with Hakram for sure," Indrani crowed.

I valiantly ignored her, instead putting the full weight of my attention on Ivah and its 'harvest'. Kneeling at the dead body's side, the drow closed the corpse's eyes before leaning over. I could barely make out whispers in Crepuscular, low and rhythmic. Then the dead drow... shivered. Liquid tendrils of darkness ripped out of the body, leaving bloody holes behind, and they slithered up Ivah's arm beneath the armour. The living drow exhaled. You are what you take, a woman's voice whispered in my ear, in no tongue I knew.

Ivah's eyes shone deep silver before dimming again, and I learned that this magical adventure was going to be a little more complicated than I'd like.

---

DroughtBringer

I've been bad at posting this link, I apologize to all those who get their hopes up each Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, just to be able to go vote for the guide, but then do not see the link as the first comment and thusly do not vote. I have made a grave sin, and for that I apologize and will try to be better.

Now, back to your regularly scheduled yell:

GO VOTE!!!!!! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

TeK

You disappoint us all. Shame.

Daniel

Shame

Gunslinger

Once more and you shall be considered Mighty no more, merely meat

Someguy

"No, see, you'll profit as well. All you need is to convince five others of contributing coin and when they do you'll get a part of their own contribution. It'll all work out, I promise."

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful, convincing High

Lords to invest in the construction of ritual pyramid outside Ater

The Bastard! He introduced the pyramid scheme!

ATRDCI

He introduced the pyramid scheme in order to build a pyramid.

soonnanandnaanssoon

If I had a WordPress account I would have liked this.

Is Irritant's real name Ponzi?

boballab

What? You didn't know that one of his titles was founder of Amway?

Gunslinger

Irritating but oddly successful is such a succinct description of Amway

GreenSunLuminary

This was absolutely inspired by the LoadingReadyRun Kroglist Pyramid crapshot IMO.

erraticerrata

No idea what any of that is.

Jane

You know, I've always wondered (where "always" is defined as "A year ago at most") whether that's Dread Emperor Irritant (who was unexpectedly successful, despite expectations) or Dread Emperor Irritant (who defined success in unusual ways).

With so many of his successes, it could be either way, really...

Milpool

The fact that it's both is just yet another example of how oddly successful he is.

Definitely my favourite Dread Emperor

Dainpdf

I still prefer Traitorous. He's such a meme.

Dainpdf

We prefer the term "Multilevel Sorcery" these days, thank you very much.

Metalshop

Oh boy. This is gonna have some wild fucking implications for surface politics if Cat can actually get them on her side.

Allafterme

I thought conning the high lords in a ponzi scheme was among Traitorous' wheelhouse 😊

Someguy

Being in Irritant's wheelhouse means it will definitely work since it's the first part of his plan.

donforrester456

Well, you have to admit that 'Irritant' describes Ponzi schemes nicely.

Dainpdf

Seems to me like Traitorous is more likely to convince you to start a ponzi scheme, profit from it, then have you arrested for starting a ponzi scheme.

Euodiachloris

And then you discover he was working in the mailroom all along as an intern. ;P

Dainpdf

And then for the ultimate surprise you're actually him, too! He had the real you killed weeks ago and used liberal amounts of self hypnosis.

DroughtBringer

Huh, interesting chapter.

interesting Drow culture that is being built up here, it does seem that Exiled Drow are kept alive, though. In The Forgotten Realms they were generally put to death, so it *may* be a slightly better culture than that of Drizzt Do'Urden, Hmm, I wonder if Cat will be able to do something similar to that of the Drow, and gather power from the dead.

Fair warning, tons of speculation:

"You are what you take"

Cat has taken a lot, over the story.

The Name of the Squire, she took over the other Claimants, then took it back from (The Goblin who's name I can't remember)

She took Rise
She took the mantle of Duchess of Moonless Nights
She took pieces of Summer's power
She took on the full mantle of Winter
She took on the title Queen of Callow
She took the Dead King up on his deal to visit.

Drow society, however creepy, may be a reflection of Cat.
Beyond that, it almost seems like Cat's (old) aspects might lead up to what we have here, The Drow Take power from the dead, and use it till either the power, or the Drow themselves Break, and then they Fall from grace, into Exile. Could prove interesting.

donforrester456

>>She took the

One of those was not like the others...

mavant

Little bit of an arson, murder, jaywalking list there.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The goblin's name was Chider. Took me a hot minute to remember.

RoflCat

I'm hoping we'll get a Sve of Moonless Night by the end of this. After all, if the moon still get out, is it really EVERDARK?

Also, it's about time she get proper worshipers, not in just popularity sense but as in deity sense.

And the Drow society is a lot like the 'concept' of Winter, constantly taking until it consumes itself.

Azure

Hah seems like the drow are all necromongers from chronicles of Riddick. Keeping what you kill. You are what you take. Same difference.

burguulkodar

Aha, so THAT is why the quote sounded so familiar to me, though I couldn't recall why. My thanks.

beleester

I think the Forgotten Realms drow are slightly more functional.
IIRC in the Drizzt books they have rules about attacking each other (well, rules about not getting caught, at least), which keeps the backstabbing down to a dull roar. And they have some actually functional institutions, like schools for fighters, wizards and clerics, so they believe it's possible to become stronger without murdering someone.

Yotz

That's what always irked me in the depictions of FR drow society. Authors always recited litanies of cruel drow whose society was built on the unbridled lust for power with betrayal as a chief virtue – well, except for this school. And that institution. And also that immensely powerful ancient noble family. And basically everyone other except for fringe groups and outcasts. In the end, any other society described in those books looked more like stereotypical drow society than drow society itself.

I may be biased, of course – but if you need an example of functioning, more or less, drow-like society, that would be The Dark City of Commorragh.

RanVor

Commorragh only works because the Supreme Overlord is unbackstabable. If he died, the city would tear itself apart in no time.

lqueenofblades1

Azdrubael did die. And the conflicts stopped because the Nobles wondered if they were next if even Azdrubael himself could be killed.

“With every Incubi bodyguard within Commorragh deployed to stem the tide of Daemons, long-stifled rivalries between the Dark City's elites erupt into bloodshed. Assassinations become commonplace, and the threat of civil war looms ever closer. Yet right when the denizens of Commorragh seem set to tear themselves and their city to shreds, the impossible happens. Asdrubael Vect himself is murdered, cut down by Mandrakes in service to an unknown master. Furthermore, every receptacle that contains a fragment of the Supreme Overlord's essence is destroyed simultaneously, ensuring that he cannot be regrown by the Haemonculi. The internecine conflicts that have ravaged the Dark City are quickly replaced by an uneasy stillness as every Commorrite assesses their alliances. If Vect can be killed, then who amongst the Drukhari can be assured of their own survival?”

They'll eventually get around to fighting but not before attending his funeral to gloat. At which point every person loyal to Vect who died got resurrected, his enemies killed and as their blood split in great rivers, in a 'Just as Planned' moment the Praesi Highlords can only dream of, he was resurrected using their life force at which point he resurrected some of them as twisted and mutated slaves to his command.

This guy is a 11/10 on the badassery scale. He's like the unholy result of Cat, Akua and Malicia's souls merging into one and being put into an Asuryan body.

Iqueenofblades1

For this echo are still confused:

He killed himself to draw his enemies into the open, slaughtered them, used their life force to resurrect himself and his loyal servants, and then resurrected some of his enemies as barely sapient slaves to be murderfucked like Dark Eldar like to do.

RanVor

I meant if he died for real. Like, permanently.

Iqueenofblades1

To be fair, they did think he had died permanently. And they stopped fighting

RanVor

They temporarily stopped fighting in order to assess the situation. And before they could get back to murdering each other, Vect came back and murdered them first.

Javvies

Let's be fair here.

While you can technically backstab Cat, it is both unlikely to take and likely to result in her stabbing you in the face.

As such, it seems a distinct possibility that Cat could maybe make the drow work for her. She'd probably have to make some examples out of some of them before that, though. But hey, if the speculation that Cat is going to end up stealing some of the power of Night for herself is correct, each example made would simply make her stronger.

Dylan Tullos

Javvies:

I'm not sure that recruiting an entire "army" of backstabbing murderhobos is actually worth it. Even if they're too scared to fight Catherine, their civilization has collapsed because they constantly murder each other.

Decius

You don't "recruit" such an army. You use them against your enemies. It's a little bit easier if you provide their supply lines and consider expending them completely to be a desirable outcome.

Euodiachloris

I'd suggest she disinfect, fumigate and quarantine Night for three months, first. I suspect that is the real eldritch pyramid scheme going on here. 🤔

Yotz

I'll disagree.

True powers behind the continuing survival of the Dark City are Haemonculi Covens and Sculptor of Torments in particular, however insane he may be. Commorragh is like a dark reflection of the City of Doors in that regard, true. It's just that Vect is of no consequence in the big picture.

If Vect ever truly dies, Lady Malys will inherit his Mantle, so to say. And in that verse of minuscule probability where they would take each other out – or someone else would take them (which seems even less probable so far), the new Overlord will emerge from the roil and toil of Lower Commorragh streets. Yes, the Dark City will bleed for this, but then again – it constantly bleeds.

Now, if someone would manage to remove all the Heamonculi from the existence...

RanVor

The Haemonculi keep the dark eldar from starving, but not from backstabbing themselves into extinction. It's the iron fist of Vect that keeps the violence down to manageable levels.

Yotz

And before Vect there were ancient Aristos who managed to do exactly that.

But then Vect's random Salamanders' strike cruiser with ensuing rescue party eliminated most of them, clearing path to Vect's ascension.

And now Cabals and Cults rule the City, dancing on the Covens' strings like marionettes they are.

Vect knows, and is OK with this. Kinda-sorta. It's complicated(C).

Second point – Haemonculi don't feed the populace for free – or at all. Well, food for bodies – maybe, if there are no Cabals ready to overtake that area.

Sustenance of the other kind – that's a coin with which Cults and Cabals acquire Covens' services. Haemonculi don't produce that. Their chief function in context of civilization is population growth. Without their cloning vats Dark Eldari would die out long time ago, Vect's iron rule or not. Yes, they leave tedium of actual ruling to the Archons – but they also need a civilization around to sustain their style of life. And so, civilization exists.

RanVor

Ok, firstly, the Haemonculus Covens are actually completely self-sufficient. They have more than enough servants to survive with no help from the Kabals. They trade with Archons simply because it's more convenient this way. Even if the Dark City descended into all-out civil war, they wouldn't lift a finger to save it, because they don't care. The entire Dark Eldar society is a commodity they can survive without. But there is one person who cares and actually makes an effort to keep the society of Commorragh from collapsing. His name is Asdrubael Vect.

Secondly, read my original comment again. I didn't say Vect is unbackstabable. I said the Supreme Overlord is. For Commorragh to survive, this must be seen as a fact for anybody who holds the position, be it Vect, Malys or anyone else. The major factor in the continued survival of Vect is that most Archons effectively gave up on trying to depose him. Even if he died, his successor would have no choice but to uphold his legacy, to the point of making the identity of the ruler essentially irrelevant.

Yotz

Firstly, Covens are definitely not self-sustainable.

They are in dire need of the same thing Drukhari need in general.

Souls.

Without large amounts of poacher they will die out. Without them to preserve population numbers, tech, and culture – Dark Eldars would not be able to harvest enough souls to stave off continuous assault of Hungry Bitch, and will promptly be devoured.

Secondly – if you'll read my comment/response, I never said Supreme Overlord is of no consequence – only that Vect is. (re-reads thread) Umm... At least I meant that, using his position as a substitute for his name. One Overlord or several Aristor like it was before Vect, but Drukhari need a chokehold power above them to survive. So on this we are in complete accord.

RanVor

Exactly. If there was no Overlord, or if he/she was weak and easily replaced, the Dark Eldar would swiftly meet the same end as the Drow, with or without the Haemonculi.

Of course, the strict “no backstabbing while on the raid” policy also helps.

Yotz

Eh, I remain of the opinion that in case of weak Overlord either new more powerful one will arise on a relatively short time-scale, or Covens will create one because of all the hubbub the absence of such figure is causing.

My point here is – Covens keep culture and knowledge intact, more or less. This means that even in the hypothetical case of total civilizational collapse, Haemunculi would be able to recreate it from scratch simply because they can't be bothered with menial tasks like harvesting the souls beyond their specific and quite limited obsession-driven antics like Theft of Lethidia. Remove Overlord/s – and a replacement often is already here, ready to be drafted from the pool. Remove Covens – and there will be no pool to draft replacement from.

RanVor

Also, I believe we have strayed from the original topic of the discussion, which was why the Dark City didn't suffer a societal collapse like the Drow Empire. And the reason for that is that Commoragh has someone strong enough to keep everyone else more or less in check. Someone so powerful the very idea of messing with him is insane. Asdrubael Vect.

The notion that the Drow Empire collapsed because it didn't have Haemonculus Covens is simply not true.

Yotz

Well, since we don't know about Drow Empire structure, I have no comment on its collapse with regard to Haemunculi. My comments were about Commorragh, and its dependence on them.

lqueenofblades1

>Vect dying is of no consequence

U wat m8?

Vect dying is a very, very big thing for the Dark Eldar. He's 14,000 years old and spent 8,000 years of bloody intrigue and murder, clawing himself up from a lowborn slave to the Supreme Ruler and then spent 6,000 years actually ruling the Dark City which is probably more impressive considering everyone is after his blood.

Yotz

And that's precisely why his death is of no consequence in big picture. As I said, Lady Malys is more than capable of going toe to toe with him, and can replace him with ease. Yes, Vect is impressive – more than impressive. He more that earned his recent kinda-sorta-ascension. Yes, Vect's true death will shake the Dark City to the roots – but all the Archons Vect was killing for being too ambitious will be able to realize their ambitions. Sooner or later, new Overlord will arise. If he/she/it will prove their merits, they will surpass Vect, otherwise – new Overlord will climb the Tower.

Yes, there – probably – will be another no one even comparable to Vect in a few (hundreds) of years.

But I was talking about big picture.

The kind of picture, say, Urien Rakarth lives in. You know – one who was old when Old Eldari Empire was still around. One who allows Vect to rule simply because he can't be bothered with such mundane things (and also because he's insane). One who outclasses Vect as much as Vect outclasses everyone else sans Malys. One who actually can break few laws of Commorragh without any repercussions – not in the last because he wrote most of them. That Urien Rakarth.

So, yes – with true death of Vect, Dark City will bleed.

But it bleeds always.

And soon(*) there will be new Supreme Overlord.

(*)terms and conditions apply.

Javvies

Well that's interesting. In a creepy sort of way.

I foresee these negotiations with the Sve of Night going poorly and ultimately ending with Cat stealing its power.

Especially since Cat heard the "You are what you take" bit.

She might end up being a messianic figure to the drow, and shouldn't that just terrify everybody who is still remotely mortal.

So these aren't just mooks, they're outcast, underpowered mooks who are too weak to be allowed to live back home. Archer should be pleased. And Ranger might get irked, because she apparently couldn't get into the Everdark when she wanted to go hunting drow. But the knowledge on how to get into the Everdark might be useful to trade Ranger for something.

But drow culture, from what we can see of it is nuts.

fbt

i have to say, this makes more sense than I would like to admit! E may go a dif direction for several reasons, but your argument seems exceedingly plausible, authorial considerations aside.

SilentWatcher

NO! Silence your tongue fool! EE will read your post and decide to do something different! dont mention possible cool twists of the storie, or else EE will do something else just to surprise us.

papermache7

Am I the only one who feel this whole thing is truly is absolutely perfect for Cath particular skills? No need for fancy diplomacy, just devour strong people and amass enough Night to dictate what's gonna happen to everybody else.

She'll come back with an army at back and some new party tricks like the Warlord she is.

Rook

Absolutely, this is as fitting for Catherine as it could possibly get.

The drow are all about darkness and taking from each other. Catherine is wielding the full might of a winter mantle that holds domain over darkness and taking power. The 'queen of moonless nights' literally walking into a realm of permanent moonless night.

Even before donning the mantle she had fucking – take – as an aspect, which is supposed to be reflective of the core essence of the person in question.

If she can't find any success with the drow, she might as well retire and become an immortal farmer. It'd be like channeling the spirit of Michael Phelps and drowning in a bathtub, you just don't live that down.

Someguy

The Tenets of Night is a shitty pyramid scheme based on killing and harvesting Night from corpses and everyone harvesting each other for it...Good luck trying to adhere them to the Rules of War or even basic regimental discipline Cat.

Just a potato

That sounds an awful lot like the Wild Hunt to me... The only difference being that they do it for the joy and maybe the story.

ATRDCI

Ah, but who better than to reform those Tenets than the Duchess of Moonless Nights?

NZPIEFACE

Cat tries to be civil. She should stop trying.

Someguy

It is the Uncivil Wars after all.

Wizgrot

What is this bullshit about not killing people who have surrendered? A few chapters ago, she killed a mage that cried for surrender after being abandoned by Malicia and did the same with her colleagues, when they tried to surrender.

I can get behind the justifications she might have got at the time, about how less witness=better, as the Dead King might see fit to interview them. But if you do approve the killing of prisoners or people who try to surrender if it meets your goals, you have no right to go grandly announcing principles afterwards.

J.spring

I believe her behavior in the fight with Malicia was influenced by winter. She did push herself quite far.

Walter

Cat kills people who surrender all the time, just doesn't like to admit it to Evil Collar Fairy. Lies and violence, yeah?

Polite Cultist

Cat has executed her opponent by various means and for various reasons, but never immediately after capturing them. She doesn't casually execute people, is what she's saying here. These Drow are practically harmless compared to a wizard of Malicia's personal guard.

FactualInsanity

This will veer into semantics, but there's a distinction between "people who try to surrender" and "people whose surrender has been accepted".

Back in Keter "take no prisoners, kill all witnesses" may well have been part of the plan. By definition that would make all those kills kills in battle, which Cat has limited qualms about.

Here it would be the murder of people (beings?) that have already surrendered and been taken prisoner, simply for having exhausted their usefulness as tools. Cat's not nice, but she has been making efforts to be merely ruthless, not an outright monster.

medailyfun

probably she never accepts Praesi as proper prisoners

Euodiachloris

Praesi do have a tendency towards pulling an I Surrender, Suckers or two just about every time... So, that always has to be kept in mind. 🙄

Decius

Sometimes it's unsafe to accept a surrender. Wastelanders feign surrender as a matter of policy, which means that any "surrender" from one of them is unsafe, particularly when it takes a form other than the form that you told them to use.

superkeaton

Ah, so the drow are much like their D&D counterparts, sans female dominance. Might makes, all else is nothing. And they seem very deeply tied to their source of power.

Andrei

The big question now is what exactly is this Night does the power of Winter relate to it in any way, I'm getting the feeling that Cat might bestow her first title in this arc since the powers are interchangeable to some degree, thats how she'll get the drow on her side, the promise of returning them to what they once were.

Cicero

Yeah... is it strange that my response to all these revelations is that this is going to be another bad idea, and will turn out worse than Keter did?

Good thing they didn't bring Thief along, she's much too vulnerable for the backstabbing murderfest that is the Everdark. Even Archer is going to have to step up her game.

Cayle

Didn't she crucify a bunch of praesi prisoners? That whole conversation felt weird.

TeK

Nah, she punished war criminals and rebels and mass murderers. She would've made them into her advisors, free to sass and flirt, but alas, the narrative has limited place.

Decius

To be fair, Cat did kill the war criminal that she ended up making an advisor, too.

Walter

Yeah, and left their corpses out on the road. Surrender has NEVER protected anyone from Cat. I dunno what she is on today.

taliesinskye

Those prisoners were war criminals. She executed them for being party to the mass murder of an entire city.

Decius

The crucifixions were the result of a judicial action.
Executing a war criminal that you captured in battle is different from executing a soldier captured in battle.

TeK

I can't put my finger on it, but I think that Sve is dead. She didn't talk since proclaiming the Tenets, it seems, so it just may be that she was murdered a long time ago, say because she actually decided to take Tenets back and some ancient and powerful cabals hadn't liked it..

Clmineith

I was thinking exactly the same. And, also, that the Important-Person-of-Moonless-Nights might become the Sve of Night. If drow's powers are bound to Everdark, she might make it bound to the Moonless Nights instead, allowing them to leave...

nick012000

I doubt it. I get the impression she might actually be a drow Villain that ascended to "divinity".

Drd

Descended into godhead you mean (divinity doesn't seem to fit the ones downstairs)?

pyrohawk21

Okay, so anyone else betting that Catherine Foundling, the Duchess of Moonless Nights is going to end up either taking the majority of Night from the Drow, or claiming the title as Mightiest of Mighty/Sve/Queen/Empress/something like that?

Because seriously, I think it highly unlikely that the fact that Cat is the Duchess of Moonless Night of all things is not going to play a major role in this. Especially when we've just had an entire arc about how Cat's body is something that is not set, but rather an artifice of magic and power... And that the power thing for the Drow is called Night and causes their eyes to become silver, which is strongly associated with the Moon...

Thecount

Didnt she become QUEEN of moonless night by default since she is the last winter fae?

gloomyMoron

She is de facto Queen, but her power is still only that of a Duchess. She has yet to come into the full power of Winter.

ALKATYN

She's queen of winter (by default, being the last winter noble) and duchess of moonless nights separately. Like how the British royals were kings and queens of England and Scotland, but also Dukes of Normandy

Morgenstern

Actually, that thought (body = magic construct) is rather worrying me. As in "the drow might try to siphon that construct's power away" and "what would happen if they succeed (at least to some degree)"??

Unorginal

Things go very very badly for the Drow as they try to draw upon a well that never ends filled full of the sweetest poison.

Grey

Cats gonna put the night into duchess of moonless nights where it belongs

Silverking

"Catherine doesn't hesitate, she exhibits no restraint, she takes, and she takes and she takes..."

One key question: is the Night explicitly a function of Evil that Procer and the heroes we've met are used to, or is it a separate evil-ish force like Winter? Because if Cat can harness another force that doesn't have traditional weaknesses against Good, that could be a very useful tool. I can almost imagine the Bard working to make that society destroy itself to take them off the board...and then got frustrated when the elves created the Golden Bloom and effectively took themselves off the board.

I hope another thing that sticks with Cat is an increased understanding of how evil cultures can function, or rather, how they fail. The Wasteland's constant backstabbing and hare-brained schemes got them stuck in a rut until Malicia came along. Winter is a slave to its own nature, to the point that even when it wins, it will perish from its own excess. The Dead King survives, but only by effectively being a kingdom of one individual, with the rest being mindless undead, bound Named, and content slaves. Hopefully, by seeing the successes and failures of people who have taken the Evil ball and run with it, Cat will find useful patterns she can exploit so she can eventually beat the Bard at her own game...or at the very least, figure out how to handle a Callow that is slowly turning to Evil.

Javvies

Well, if memory serves, the drow have been said to be a failed culture that is aligned with Evil.

However, they're so failed and the only drow that anyone other than the Dead King, Wandering Bard, and perhaps some of the dwarves, have ever seen are apparently exiled losers who are too weak to live among other drow, I suspect that the Mighty will be an unpleasant surprise to most of Calernia, since at least some among them were at some point considered by Ranger to be worthy of hunting.

Countermeasures to their powers, other than general ones, are likely to be known/ practiced by few, if any.

I think it distinctly possible that in the process of getting the drow, or most of them, to serve her, Cat will end up claiming access to the sort of power they use – the Night, whatever that is.

While the Night likely has weaknesses, especially to the Light/ Hero powers, specific counters have likely been all but forgotten.

Claiming the power of Night, especially in quantity, will give Cat something else to work with the next time she gets hit with anti-Fae wards/Fae-suppressing magic/Aspects and forgets that she is Winter.

Away any rate ... I think that the Night is something different. It probably is not a completely separated system from the Good and Evil mechanics of Creation.

Winter and Fae powers are fully separated because in Arcadia Good and Evil do not exist.

There is, at present, no indication that the drow or the Night originated outside of Creation and the framework of Good and Evil.

However, the Night, since it appears to be something transferable in a way we haven't seen or heard of before, might very well not be something the drow originally had, and instead somehow created it or stole it from someone, something, or somewhere else. That might explain how they had an empire, only to lose it – gaining access to the Night could have caused a collapse.

Euodiachloris

I dunno. I'm getting symbiote/parasite vibes from this whole Night dealie. Something Lovecraftian/ Bloodborne this way comes?

I suspect it might even be what is left of the Sve. In part.
*shrugs*

mavant

Jesus, that chapter quote nearly killed me.

mavant

This read like an Abbott and Costello skit. I can only imagine the next chapter is the establishment of an all Drow baseball team with the other prisoners, whose names turn out to be Who, What, I Don't Know, Today, Tomorrow, and I Don't Give A Darn.

WuseMajor

I suspect the last order the Sve gave was "You are what you take."

lqueenofblades1

I like how this chapter is called "Finesse" and it involved Cat chewing on a (glamoured) eyeball. At least it wasn't her own tongue...again.

All hail Catherine Foundling, the Black Queen, the Duchess of Moonless Nights and Sole Sovereign of Winter, Queen of the Wild Hunt, Mightiest of the Drow, Arch-Heretic of the East, First of the Woe and the Lately Queen of Callow.

—

You know what I really want though? An interlude from someone at her orphanage. Maybe the Matron or one of the girls who picked on her or whatever. Maybe one of the guys who groped her while she worked at the tavern in Laure, someone she fought in the pits, Booker, the girl she rescued in chapter 1, or her employer/his son at that tavern, maybe even that Praesi Lieutenant she used to gossip with. I want to see what they think of that tiny slip of a girl now being a walking legend and the greatest warlord since maybe Triumphant (because she's certainly eclipsed Black by now and no one else as far as we know has come close to what Cat did, other than Triumphant).

Generations from now, for all you know instead of Dread Empress Triumphant being the boogeyman, it'd be "The Black Queen – May she never return", and all the while Cat is fucking around, maybe in Keter, maybe with Neshamah 😊 (Yes I ship Cat and the Dead King).

OutspanFoster

My prediction is Cat will have a severe advantage with the Drow that she might learn or grow into at some point during this arc. It will be based on her being of Winter and its ties with whatever Night is. I mean, her Winter power can bring on total darkness. There has to be some sort of tie with Night. Hopefully, this gives her a much needed power up and she gains some awkward and funny by way of murder allies out of the Drow.

Drd

I wonder whether she might find them more of challenge than expected and finally be pushed into the realisation of what she can become when she chooses to fully let go of the the confines of her physical construct and become the very fabric of Winter itself.

Now THAT might make them stop in their back-stabbing murder-fest and take notice.

After all, for the Duchess of Moonless Nights, darkness means nothing, and it would seem that the Night is at least partially tied to darkness (themetically maybe), as the power they have shown allowed them to step through shadow, and what is darkness if not the deepest of shadows?

Novice

"We don't execute prisoners."

Careful, Cat. Your hypocrisy is showing.

Polite Cultist

Executing war criminals after a trial is NOT the same as killing a harmless prisoner. She doesn't mean that her prisoners are untouchable, she means she doesn't kill without reason. These people are basically harmless to her, and they haven't committed mass murder in a Callowan City, or anything of that sort.

TheAtomicOption

"You are what you take, a woman's voice whispered in my ear, in no tongue I knew."

So the solution is simple if not easy: Take the Sve's life. Become the Sve. All the drow are now yours to command.

Drd

Now, the voice that spoke that couldn't possibly belong to the Wondering Bard... could it?

Javvies

I doubt it is Bard or connected to her.

I suspect the voice saying "You are what you take" is connected to the Night in some manner, if it is not part of the Night itself. Followup guess would be something to do with Cat's Fae/Winter titles/ powers. Third option is a reaction with her Name/Aspects, or what's left of it, or the parts of her that contributed to her gaining Take as an Aspect. Alternatively, it is connected to her potential for apotheosis.

Or possibly some combination/interaction between the above possibilities.

It being in Cat's ear and in no language she knows, despite her understanding it dictates a far more metaphysical source than Bard showing up and literally whispering into her ear.

onedollargum

"You are what you take"

and you keep what you kill.

Morgenstern

>> Ah. That shed light, in a manner of speaking. So a Mighty was not male or female or anything else, they were just Mighty. Priestess was a female term, in Chantant, so the implication would be insulting to the drow. I'd keep that in mind for future reference. No need to give insult to the people I'd come to bargain with. <<

Uhm. What?? Above, it was stated that he LOST being of any gender when he BECAME cattle. Gender cannot be the thing about this term that makes it cattle-term, Cat. At least I presume this was an in-character mistake and not one by the author...? When in doubt, think about in-world-explanations first. Thus, I guess, he takes offence at a term of "priesthood" as being a thing for cattle. Guess "Sve" is more like a god/dess...

Morgenstern

Or an avatar maybe. Some *actually* direct channel to the G/gods.

Or something else entirely...

Anyway, making gender only apply to the Mighty and then claiming gender does NOT apply to the Mighty, but offends them is rather... paradoxical.

Decius

Gender does not apply to cattle.

Gender does not apply to mighty.

Clearly, gender only applies to outsiders.

Drd

Exactly.

RanVor

Why the drow empire collapsed is obvious. What I'm wondering is how they'd come to have an empire in the first place.

Gunslinger

Possible their tenets changed after a point.

Allafterme

The Wandering Bard said the Twilight Sages of Drow consider death the only sin to Dead king before his ascension so something must be horridly gone wrong in the last few millennia...

erraticerrata

Was wondering if someone would remember that. Drow society undertook some pretty drastic changes after the introduction of the Tenets of Night, few of them for the better.

Allafterme

Even the name of Drow language implies associates them with Twilight but they either they shifted or corrupted to Night long time ago. Huh, very interesting. I'm looking forward to this arc and what will you make of it EE.

werafdsaew

Maybe their way of life is sustainable as long as there's an external outlet for their killing (Deoraithe Kingdom).

Letouriste

Interesting...I would bet cat will get some of that darkness...or even kill that mighty priestess and take over her place, leading the drows at war. Can you become an honorary drow?

1queenofblades1

Yes.

Lung: You are now Asian.

Sve: You are now Drew.

1queenofblades1

Drow*

Bloody autocorrect

Unorginal

Nicaraguan is a type of Asain AmIRight?

Euodiachloris

Follow ancestral lines back about 40,000 years... the answer would be "yes" for just about everybody in Nicaragua, considering the vast bulk of us with Eurasian origins have South East and East Asian cave shelters of the various Ice Ages in our genes. 😊

No exceptions.

Africa just about gets a pass (but, Eurasian genes have trickled back there in spurts fairly regularly).

Yeah: we all have Africa and Eurasia in us. It's called "being a human primate" (the first primates came from polar rainforests mostly in what we'd now term as Eurasia – they quickly made it all around the north pole thanks to even early primate shapes being good for swimming between island chains, and then spread south as things cooled). 😊

Dylan Tullos

I'm unsure why Catherine would want to recruit an entire species of backstabbing monsters who view Callowans (and all mortals) as cattle. It's not like they would make good soldiers; for all their cool powers, they lack basic discipline and they're more interested in cannibalizing each other than fighting the enemy.

The drow are basically made out of Stupid Evil to the point that they destroyed their own civilization. Even if Catherine can make them march to war, she can't make them magically stop being completely awful and mostly useless.

Someguy

One can only pray that they are a useful distraction for "heroes" deep in enemy territory by dumping them there via a variant of Bonfire.

Dylan Tullos

Someguy:

"Useful distraction" seems to be all the drow are good for. Even if their Mighty are an order of magnitude more dangerous than the exiles we saw, they spend so much time murdering each other that they're not exactly a threat to anyone else.

Catherine wanted an alliance with the Dead King. Instead, she's having to try to get help from a failed civilization of Chaotic Evil murderhobos. They're certainly less dangerous than the "original abomination", but they're also not that powerful. Her only other possible ally is the Tyrant, who had an alliance with Black before he betrayed him for fun.

Javvies

Nah. The Mighty are likely to be on par with Named, if not greater.

Remember – according to Archer, Ranger tried to hunt some of them but had issues finding her way into the Everdark proper. So at least some of them are or were considered “worthy” ... which means they’re good in a fight, if only on an individual level.

These exiles, while they got curbstomped by the trio of Cat, Archer, and Akua, aren’t actually pushovers relative to normal people – and they’re the ones considered too weak to be allowed to live among other drow.

Besides ... the most likely target for them is Praes, meaning Malicia and her High Lord allies, because the Crusade, the Grand Alliance, and the Heroes are probably going to be preoccupied with the Dead King.

And whatever the Augur’s prediction of “Woe to the south” was referring to. Probably not Black, but likely connected to the Tyrant of Helike/the League.

Dylan Tullos

Javvies:

The problem is that the Mighty would be equivalent to Villainous Named, including all of their traditional weaknesses. This is an entire civilization based on backstabbing and infighting, and they’d be going up against a Dread Empress who specializes in social manipulation. Malicia would have them murdering each other in about five minutes.

Moginheden

“Woe to the south” was explained in the interlude 2 chapters ago. A conclave the House of Light is being convened to the south of where Cordelia rules from. (I think in Orne.)

This is a problem for Cordelia because it will unite all of Callow’s desperate factions against her, and possibly remove the Ashuran’s fleets that are attacking Praes freeing up Malicia to run wild even more. (As the Dread Empress is no longer the Arch-Heretic.)

Cordelia NEEDS to beat Callow to stay in power. That’s now both highly unlikely, and more required.

Javvies

No. The Conclave is being held in Salia, in the palace itself, per Fatalism 1.

Orne is, I believe, one of the Principalities bordering the Vales and is Southeast of Salia.

Fatalism 2 says that the Lanterns (the Levantine delegation) almost caused a diplomatic incident when they passed through Orense – the Principality bordering the Dominion.

The Ashuran fleets are not going to stop going after Praes just because Malicia is no longer the Arch-heretic. For one thing, while not completely landlocked, Callow might as well be. For another, Praes is still a target of the Crusade.

It is a problem for Cordelia because it kills any possibility of a deal with Callow short of complete and total military victory with an extended occupation of all of Callow, including somehow taking Cat (and thus the rest of the Woe) all the way out, and also means that there is no practical way to have Callow return to its pre-Conquest Role. It'll be worse than after the Fourth Crusade when the Principate tried to occupy Callow.

Furthermore, it means that, especially with the Dead King moving, Procer and the Crusade are facing a war on at least two fronts for sure, plus the waiting "Woe to the south", which is probably connected to the League and the Tyrant of Helike, which would likely be a third front.

erraticerrata

The conclave is taking in place in Salia, which is where Cordelia rules from as First Prince. Both Black's legions and the League are to the south of it.

Moginheden

Also the power level of the drow is not what makes them a terrible army. Their lack of discipline and likelihood of killing allies does.

Take 5000 drow that are likely to back-stab each-other and kill any allied army you put them near, and pit them against 5000 slightly-trained peasants who have each-other's backs and have been through multiple wars in recent history.

Sure each drow is way more powerful than your peasants, but by the time the battle starts you only have 300 drow left as the rest murdered each other, and you lost any non-drow that were marching anywhere near them. That's presuming you were able to maintain control over the drow long enough to get them to the battlefield at all.

Drd

I find it interesting that it mentions the Hour of Twilight (that were massacred) and Sve of Night. Is there also a Dawn and Day, or are they yet to come? And I have to wonder at what the Bard said about "death being the only sin" to the Drow. Could the silver eyes and Night they have be something to do with life and/or power? They have been drained of all but the smallest of amounts, but as death is sin for drow, they can't be killed but are exiled. That could be why humans are "cattle", that it is not a sin to suck their life dry to feed the Night within the drow? And these exiles could only go back if they attained "glory", which would explain the "slavers" that occasionally go on hunting trips, if they were actually desperate groups of exiles looking to find "cattle" to gain enough power to go home again.

Decius

Give them enough outside enemies to form temporary alliances against, and they will form temporary alliances that last until the outside enemy is almost defeated.

Let the Drow almost defeat Procer and the Dead King and the Empress, before killing themselves over who gets to rule when the enemy is finally defeated. Once they have almost defeated all of your enemies (including themselves), clean up the mess they made.

The problem with escalating by letting the Dead King out was that afterwards there would be a more powerful Dead King to deal with. The Drow will clean themselves up.

RanVor

Because cannon fodder. Somebody has to take losses the Army of Callow can't afford, and the Drow just happen to be the only ones available.

Luis

I want Catherine to wipe them out.
If you can take from one you can take from the many or all.

The drow are backstabbing savages that cannot be made into useful troops. At least not legion standard troops. More people like the wild hunt.

Powerful, but not committed to the idea of helping her, and treacherous at the worst.

Best to kill them off and turn them into at least useful cannon fodder and a power up.

the verbiage ecstatic

I'm getting increasingly confused by this Drow arc. I get that Cat wants another army and is pretty desperate, but this seems like it's miles past long-shot territory and deep into the "totally illogical, only happening for plot reasons" zone.

Negotiating with the Dead King was a Hail Mary play: making an alliance with a ancient horror that is probably playing you (as in fact he was) is a gambit of last resort. But at least Cat had reason to think that she might have negotiating leverage, since the Dead King was the one who invited her to the table.

The Drow as potential allies have all the same downsides that the Dead King did (reputation damage, likelihood of betrayal, pure evil who would happily slaughter all the Callowans, unknown and vast reserves of power that could be turned on her if negotiations sour). But unlike with the Dead King, Cat has no reason to believe she has anything they want in the slightest, or that they care at all about events outside their own borders.

I was assuming Cat had something up her sleeve here, but this chapter makes it clear that she doesn't have the faintest understanding of Drow culture or goals.

And even assuming the Drow do have goals that could be furthered by invading her enemies, and that they are willing to potentially negotiate with non-Drow, what does she think that Callow, a beleaguered minor power that is already militarily committed, doesn't share a border with the Drow, and is practically bankrupt, possibly offer the Drow from a geopolitical perspective?

With the Dead King, EE at least gave the handwavy explanation that he might require an invitation to leave his realm, thus giving him an incentive to talk to Malicia and Cat. A little thin, but okay, sure. With the Drow, we've got nothing.

The elaborate parting of the Woe chapter made clear that this is a costly, high-risk expedition for Cat. Presumably, not being a complete idiot, she thinks that there's a probabilistic reward that makes this a better play than returning to fortify Callow and hoping the Dead King and Procer keep each other busy long enough for Cat to deal with Malicia. But I really don't see it. Am I missing something?

the verbiage ecstatic

Also, I don't totally get why Malicia outbidding Cat with the Dead King is so much of a setback for Cat that a second desperation play is needed. The biggest outcome of the negotiations is the same either way: the Dead King invades Procer. Cat wanted to give Procer better odds and minimize collateral damage, because she's not a total monster, but from a Machiavellian perspective it's not clear that Cat's worse off with the Dead King having more freedom.

Yes, it increases the probability that he crushes Procer completely and becomes a threat to Callow, but that was a risk anyway. Cat was planning to stab the Dead King in the back by warning Procer, which might have prompted retaliation; at least this way, Cat doesn't have any commitments to the Dead King that she needs to fulfill or betray. And it makes the flip side of that risk – that the Dead King isn't enough to derail the Crusade – less likely.

Other than Cat's humiliation at being outplayed by Malicia, it seems as though Cat got most of what she wanted from her excursion: the Crusade is now fighting a two-front war. It's unclear why Cat thinks that adding yet another volatile element to the situation would improve her strategic position enough to offset the continued weakening of Callow that her absence is causing.

Javvies

Cat needs to take on Malicia and the High Lords, and win. She also needs to cover the Vales and the Stairway with sufficient force to hold them against the Crusaders or the Dead King, at least long enough to reinforce them. She also needs to have sufficient forces left after beating Malicia, the High Lords, and everything that they're willing to pull out against her, which will likely include devils and possibly demons, that she can either attain outright military victory or be strong enough to force a negotiated settlement with either the Crusaders or the Dead King, without a pyrrhic victory that would endanger her hold over Praes and Callow.

Jane

This is easiest answered with another question; why did Malicia feel a need to outbid Cat? After all, she could have just let Cat make the deal, if this was just about attacking Procer.

It's more likely than not that Malicia's deal involves some delayed unpleasantness for Cat, and having another ally at hand when it comes will put her in a better position. She can't be certain what, exactly, she's planning for, but she knows she can't readily face it alone.

Decius

Cat wanted to use Dead King against Procer, to force a diplomatic solution and actually end the war.

Malicia wants to use the Dead King against Cat, and possibly Black as well.

Javvies

More to the point, the impression that I have is that Malicia opened negotiations with the Dead King and he decided to allow Cat the opportunity to make an offer and to test her at the same time.

If Cat had made a deal with the Dead King, especially under her original reasoning, behind the Dead King's motivations, it is unlikely that she would have needed to be overly concerned about him attacking Callow or otherwise betraying or acting against her interests, and she could have focused more attention on Malicia and Praes.

Cat did not want Malicia making a deal with the Dead King, especially one so expansive in scope.

With Malicia having made the deal with the Dead King and the scope of what she offered ... Cat has to heavily fortify the Vales and the Stairway, plus improvement patrols all along the mountains, because an army of the dead has limited need for logistical support, and can cross far rougher terrain than once burdened with supply wagons for food.

That drastically reduces the number of troops Cat can deploy against Praes and on the border with Praes, and Cat had been, and still is, short on trained troops.

John

Cat needs to keep Malicia busy for six months, as cheaply as possible, while the Hellhound rebuilds Callow's army. Malicia is overwhelmingly better at political maneuvering, has more money, more magical resources (especially now that Heiropant is unavailable), and is no slouch at spycraft. What Malicia doesn't have, at the moment, is legions to spare or a Black Knight to lead them. So, Cat needs to present an immediate military threat to the Wasteland, using non-Callowan troops. Something that can't be bought off with cash or deflected with political intrigue.

Drow culture is completely unknown to the outside world, so there's no remotely plausible way Malicia has agents in place, or any other established lever for influence. If the drow are solely interested in personal glory and mystic cannibalism, they won't accept ordinary bribes. From the Dread Empress's perspective, at least in the short term, drow invasion would be an almost context-breaking problem. Big distraction, then there's the time and cost of actually dealing with it, and any time and energy spent on that is taken out of the budget for undermining Callow.

TheCatLord

Am I the only one slightly interested in Cat returning to the orphanage and the bar, interacting with others from before she took on a name?

Jessica Day

I can't help but assume Cat will be taking some of that night power and conquering the Drow while she's at it. Another step on her way to godhood 🤔

*ahd*

Uh. Guys?

What if they recruit drow who are willing to learn new ways, and power them up with the corpses of those who aren't?

The followers of the Tenets of Winter can come live in Callow; it can't be any worse than goblins, orcs, or ogres.

Drd

A very good point, as I believe the Everdark is cut off by the Dead King and the chain of hunger (I think...). Moving to Callow via Cat's fae portals to help guard either the Procer or Preasi borders would be easy living compared to current neighbours.

*hampchas* hampchas a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/Yu14U0LTjPNiLgu7Zxq->

=

---

Chapter 53: Gloom

"I am ever amused to hear men speak of senseless violence. What is violence, if not the failure of reason? One might as well bemoan the wetness of water."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

"So what are we doing with the spares?" Indrani asked.

It was bluntly put, as was her wont, but she wasn't wrong to ask the question. Ivah, after being further questioned, had been pretty clear: the only way for someone to pass through the Gloom was with the obsidian 'feathers' the drow were wearing. We'd had a corpse already, so one of us was covered. Two more prisoners had to be stripped of their armour to make sure we'd pass without trouble, though, and that left the issue of what we'd now be doing with them.

"We can't take them into the Gloom," I said. "Ivah was vague – I think it doesn't actually know a lot on the subject – but the implication was that we'd just 'lose' them the way Ranger got lost."

It was still night, though now dawn was a great deal closer. While Akua saw to the wounded, I'd told Indrani she should catch a nap. We'd be moving out as soon as she was rested, since I saw no point in idling around the surface any longer now that we had a guide. I softly inhaled the lingering scent coming from the cup of tea in my hand. Actually drinking it was nothing to write home about, but the smell was strangely pleasant. I'd though nothing of it, at first, but now that it'd become a habit I was realizing I'd seen something like this before. The fae in Skade had taken delight in small, ephemeral things too. A lot more than in the physical pleasures I'd once preferred.

"So that'd be releasing them, pretty much," Indrani mused. "I take it we have some issues with that."

"They came to the surface to slave and kill," I said. "It'd be irresponsible to simply let them loose after capturing them."

My friend shrugged, hazelnut eyes tinted with indifference. She'd yet to slip on her leather coat, or even her mail, wearing instead thick grey cloth cut close to her form. The only touch of panache to the drab attire was the dark linen scarf hanging from her neck, some kind of weave allegedly particular to Mercantis. It was certainly finer than anything I'd seen come out of Callowan weaver shops, and I knew it could be used to breathe through noxious fumes if she needed it to. It was one of the few possessions I'd ever seen Indrani care for, save for her bow. I'd gathered from idle talk that both were gifts from Ranger.

"So kill them," she said. "We never flinched at that before. Crucified a bunch of Praesi after Second Liesse, didn't you? Those you didn't make into your most expendable soldiers."

"They were all complicit in mass slaughter," I told her. "And it was the mages I had crucified, those who had a direct hand in the killing of innocents. This is different."

Killing Malicia's minion who'd tried to surrender came much closer to the line, in my eyes, but it'd been a trick played on an enemy. It felt like a step closer to becoming someone I cared little for to have played it in the first place, but I could swallow my discomfort.

"They're slavers, Cat," Indrani mildly said. "Kill them all, let the Gods sort it out."

"Their entire civilization practices slavery, as I understand it," I reminded her. "Should I murder my way through the whole lot?"

"Their entire civilization didn't pull blades on us," she said. "They did."

"Then we're killing them for pulling blades, not being slavers," I pointed out.

"Sure," Indrani said. "Let's kill them for that, then. I'll do it myself, if you're feeling contrary."

"My point was that we don't do that," I said.

"Oh, for fuck's sake," she muttered. "Cat, what else can we do? You don't want to release them and we can't keep them. There's not a lot left, is there?"

No, I grimly thought. There wasn't.

"Let them settle it the drow way, then," Indrani suddenly said. "You're being all lawful, so let them follow their own damned laws."

"They don't have laws, Archer," I replied in a low voice. "They seem to murder each other at the drop of a hat."

She met my eyes, the deep tan of her skin seeming even deeper under cover of dark.

"You need to make a decision," Indrani said, "about why we're going into the Everdark. Because if you're going down there to murder bigwigs until their people are terrified into playing nice, I'm on board. They have it coming, let them choke on it. But if you're just going down there for an army, Catherine, there's going to be darker lines to cross than this."

I grimaced, then looked away. Once more, she was not wrong. I'd known going in that this would be ugly business. My conversation with Ivah had only lent weight to the notion. It was an odd thing to hear a person seeming otherwise perfectly reasonable to dismiss the rest of the continent as cattle and preach the virtues of cold-blooded murder without a hint of irony. Even the Praesi kept a veil over that, twisting the act into some kind of wicked art. The drow had spoke of killing without reason as if there was no need for pretext or justification, and I suspected it had not been one of the stronger Mighty. Those at the top of the pyramid would have swum through a sea of blood to get there, and it was them I'd need to make pacts with. Them and the Priestess of Night, who was the very architect of this bloody misery.

"I can't fix an entire empire," I admitted tiredly. "I can barely even handle Callow, and that's with a second born for the work."

"Then we don't pretend," Indrani said calmly. "We don't go in half-baked, posturing like we're liberators. Because that's how we lose, Catherine – by straying from what we're actually after. Don't swing for the toes if you want to cut a throat."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"Even letting them settle it by their laws," I said quietly. "It's just posturing, isn't it? Foisting the dirty work onto them. The blood would still be on my hands, only with cowardice added to it."

"Responsibility's a bed of thorns," Indrani said. "You keep lying down and then getting surprised at the bleeding. It's not on you to save every stranger you meet. Especially if they don't want to be saved."

"Is it really too much to ask," I murmured, "that we get to behave like decent souls, for once?"

"There's a lot of those, at the feet of Above," my friend said. "They don't tend to stick around long down here."

Maybe I was a coward, because when I gave the order it was for drow to settle it among themselves. The fought, until two were dead. The most heavily wounded, though they might have survived if they'd not been slain. Their Night was harvested by their killers as I watched in silence.

But we put on the dead men's armour, and went into deeps.

—

I'd not been sure what to expect when we entered the Warrens. The Everdark was supposed to be a wreck, nowadays, its people fighting over faded glories they no longer knew how to restore. On the other hand, a lot of those tunnels should date back to when the drow had been more than a pack of backstabbers living in ruins of their own making. There wasn't a lot known about the days when the drow had been a power to reckon with: what records dated to when the era was theorized to have taken place were sparse and didn't tend to extend much further than whatever nascent city they'd been written in. In the echo Masego and I had eavesdropped on, the Wandering Bard had mentioned something called the Twilight Sages. That they'd 'considered death the only sin'. That didn't exactly sound like pacifism, but it was a long way from the drow encountered now. The territory of the Everdark on the surface was smaller than Callow's, and nearly all of it mountainous, but then that didn't mean much: they were a subterranean people, like the dwarves and once upon a time the goblins. Their holdings would have been measured in depth more than in length or breadth.

The Warrens ended up being tunnels. Just that. Not particularly well-maintained ones, damp and cold and occasionally half-collapsed, but they weren't strewn with bones or filled with packs of monsters. I kept pace with Ivah, at the head of our little band, and the drow led us forward unerringly from tunnel to tunnel. It'd already been a few hours and I could honestly see no difference between the paths we'd taken at the occasional crossroads and those we had not. We were going deeper, that much I'd felt. But there were no markers, no signs our guide could be drawing on.

"How long before we enter the Gloom?" I asked.

Ivah flicked a silver glance at me.

"We already have," it replied.

My brow rose. I'd not felt so much as a speck of power. I was particularly sensitive to wards, nowadays, so the passing of a threshold should have been noticeable.

"I can see no difference between when we first entered and now," I admitted.

"Nor will you, Queen," it said. "We bear feathers. There is no Gloom for us."

"So if we didn't have the feathers," I said. "We... wouldn't have seen the tunnels?"

"We would see others," Ivah said. "Leading nowhere."

That didn't sound like a ward. More like a domain, honestly, though it was a terrifying thought there could be an entity out there powerful enough to keep a domain going for centuries.

"It seems too easy to cross," I said.

"The nerezim have pierced through before," Ivah said. "Never for long. They rip ore from the stone and leave, do not linger."

"You mean the dwarves," I said.

"That is so," Ivah agreed. "They have slain Mighty with great machines of steel. They are not cattle."

"Because they killed drow," I frowned.

My guide shook its head, rueful smile baring sharp white canines.

"Because to them, it is us who are cattle," Ivah said. "One does not fight nerezim. One survives them, hiding until their purpose is fulfilled and they leave once more."

Well, it was almost heartening to know the Kingdom Under had everyone as terrified underground as they did on the surface. I'd begun to suspect that the Gloom had been placed to make sure the madness of the Everdark remained contained, but now another candidate had emerged: it might just be a sorcerous moat to keep the dwarves at bay. The Kingdom Under was not known to tolerate rivals underground, as the ancient exodus of the goblins tribes to the surface had made abundantly clear. I let the conversation lapse after that, though boredom saw me speak again when the journey through the tunnels continued to stretch on.

"You said you used to be a rylleh," I said. "What is that, exactly?"

"Dimas was rylleh," Ivah replied. "What you look upon never was."

"And what did it mean, when Dimas was rylleh?" I asked.

"To earn this honour, one must know twelve Secrets and slay another rylleh," Ivah said. "Even then, it is worthier to hold than to claim. Many do not last long."

I hummed.

"And Dimas?" I probed. "How long did they last?"

"A hundred years and three," Ivah proudly said. "Many tried to claim its Secrets, for Dimas knew the three glorious arts of killing."

My eyes narrowed. First at the revelation that my guide was over a century old. Scholars argued about how long drow could physically live, but most ascribed them a lifespan no longer than a human's. Apparently that was incorrect. More importantly, there'd been an implication to what Ivah said.

"Dimas knew these arts," I slowly said. "Ivah does not?"

The drow eyed me with surprise.

"Night was taken from Dimas, save the last sip," it said. "Tiarom knew no Secrets, and so none were learned from the harvest."

"You make it sound like there is more to the Night than the shadow tricks," I said.

"That is so," Ivah said, then touched its lips. "Shapeless and shaped, encompassing all. The worthy take. The worthy rise."

It's knowledge too, I realized.

"Those three glorious arts of killing, what are they?" I asked.

"Spear and blade and bow," Ivah said. "Dimas harvested many, to learn them whole. It was great accomplishment."

I breathed in sharply. So by killing someone who knew one of those Secrets they could just become a master swordsman instantly? That was insane. You couldn't just create knowledge out of nothing, that wasn't the way Creation worked. Unless it's the same knowledge, I thought. Passed from killer to killer, since times immemorial. Were they just passing around the same few learnings, one corpse at a time?

"Ivah," I quietly said. "Can someone add to the Night?"

"That is poor choice," the drow amusedly said. "What worth is there in empowering Mighty by one's death?"

"If a drow learned to make steel," I said. "And someone killed and harvested them. Would they know how to make steel?"

"Weapon-making is a powerful Secret," Ivah acknowledged. "The Ysengral hoard it mercilessly, and Ysengral itself hunts for the finest whispers."

So anytime someone learned anything useful they were murdered for it. Gods. No wonder they lived in ruins. If someone tried to restore them they'd probably get stabbed for the knowledge of how they wanted to do it.

"Is Ysengral a sigil or a Mighty?" I asked, slightly confused.

"A sigil is a Mighty," Ivah told me, tone implying I was a little slow.

"So Dimas' old sigil, Zapohar..." I prodded.

"Zapohar is Mighty, of great influence in the cabal of the Silent Song," the drow said. "Though forced out of Great Perun, the Zapohar are first of the inner ring. Many fear them."

"And was that how Dimas ended?" I asked. "Fighting for the Zapohar?"

"Dimas grew fat and lazy," Ivah bitterly said. "Forgot that many coveted its Secrets. That which broke it was worthier to hold them, and now stands second under Zapohar."

So backstabbed by an ambitious colleague, not beaten by an outsider. And still it seemed to feel some sort of pride for the Zapohar, instead of hatred towards the sigil that had seen it laid low. That smacked of Wasteland morals to me, the way Praesi highborn claimed that hatred and enmity were unrelated matters. It seemed a touchy subject, regardless, so I didn't press any further. There'd been something else I was curious about, anyway.

"Tell me about the Kodrog," I said. "We're heading into their territory, right?"

"They lurk near the Gloom, unfit for the strife of the inner ring," Ivah said with open disdain. "Kodrog's Night was thinned by the Mighty Soln, three hundred years past. It fled to the outer rings and has not returned."

"Soln didn't kill it?" I asked.

"Kodrog is said to know whispers from the Secret of Many Lives," the drow informed me. "A single death was not enough, though it lost much Night in defeat."

"I thought you said the Kodrog were strong," I pointed out.

"To meat," Ivah said. "To drow. To the least of the Mighty. Not to great sigils. It will crush you like an insect, Queen, but that is different matter."

"I wouldn't count on it," I mildly said. "Is it the Kodrog that gave you all your feathers?"

The drow shook its head.

"I journeyed to Great Mokosh under brand of disgrace, to be granted this last chance," Ivah said. "There the Sukkla discharge holy duty, having been granted sigil from the Sve of Night itself. Any can claim feathers, if they know the tongues of the Burning Lands and despair enough to try striding them."

"So it's a holy duty, to try the Burning Lands," I said. "Why?"

Ivah touched its lips once more.

"It serves the purpose of the Night," it said.

Oh, that did not sound all that pleasant.

"Killing cattle," I said. "Taking it. What does it do for you?"

"The Night grows," Ivah smiled. "To do such sacred act would redeem any disgrace."

"I want to be perfectly clear, here," I said. "If you kill humans, or any other race. It grows the Night?"

"That is so," the drow reverently said. "All is one. All is strife. The worthy rise."

I sucked at my lip.

"Killing undead," I said. "Would it also grow the Night?"

The drow paled.

"Speak not of the Hidden Horror," Ivah whispered. "For its crown is dawn, and that pale light is the end of all things. Only the mad would enter the eye of the Host of Death."

"It does, doesn't it," I said. "The necromancy that keeps its army walking, you can claim it for the Night."

"I say no more," Ivah insisted. "It sees all. It hears all."

Well, Neshamah had clearly paid these people a visit at some point after his ritual. The drow were a murderous bunch, they shouldn't be so scared unless the Dead King had spanked them roughly after being provoked. I honestly wasn't sure to root for there. Still, I was pleased to have learned that. If the undead had been of no worth to the drow's societal murder pyramid it would have been much, much harder to gain any ground there. Ivah had been pretty high up the ladder at some point, by the sound of it, but he'd still been someone's minion. The people on the notch above might be less terrified at the idea of a fight with Keter, if they were offered the right incentives. I had a few notions about what those might be, though the offer I knew would be most tempting was one I very much wanted to avoid.

"Let's talk about the Kodrog, then," I said. "I'm looking for practical information. Number of Mighty, which is known for what. How many fighters to they have, what are their defences like?"

I'd come with the intent to negotiate, but I might have actually found a place where my propensity to stab before making an offer would be considered reasonable. If I could get through without killing, I would. But if blades came out, well, it wouldn't be the first time I walked over a few corpses to get where I needed to be. Ivah had unfortunately little to share, since it'd been ushered through Kodrog territory into the Gloom after copious mockery and a few beatings, but little was better than nothing. By the sounds of it, there were a few thousand drow scattered across several large caverns but only a small part of those were considered fit to fight. Even fewer of those would be Mighty, which I'd mentally put in the same league as half a company of Watch. Dangerous, if you took them lightly, but rather killable. If Archer hung at the back taking care of those with fancy Secrets, Diabolist and I could handle the brawlers. Unlike on the surface, I didn't intend to take prisoners here. Wouldn't run down anyone fleeing either, but if they became an obstacle capture wouldn't be the objective.

It took us three days to leave the Gloom. Over the last stretch of the journey the tunnels changed from rough bare stone to something more ornate. Base-relief was carved on every surface, even the floor and ceiling, though the sculptures under our feet were covered by moss and dirt. It was my first look at anything the drow had made, and to my utter lack of surprise pretty much everything depicted was their kind sallying out to the surface and winning glorious battles before returning to the Everdark covered in glory, riches and slaves. There were also depictions of single combat between drow champions, though oddly enough they did not seem to be to the death. The loser was made servant of the winner, carrying their spear and quiver. Honour duels? Those were supposed to be common in Levant. The Northern Steppes as well, though orcs didn't stop until one of the fighters was dead and dinner. The last step was a threshold carved into the tunnel, though one without gates, and there we found fresh signs of life. Symbols had been painted in blood over them, which Ivah informed me promised sundry torments to all venturing in the holdings of Mighty Kodrog.

"We now reach the realm of the Mighty, Queen," our guide told us.

I nodded.

"Bargain was struck," I said evenly. "We part ways now, if you wish, with no enmity or further demands."

The drow hesitated.

"I walk with you a little longer," it said. "Until we reach the ring of stones."

The Kodrog apparently held the remains of an old border fortress, which barred the entrance to their territory proper. It was probably as deep as Ivah could go without being openly associated with us.

"Follow behind, then," I said. "Archer, Diabolist – look sharp."

"Oh Gods, finally," Indrani whined.

I took the lead through the threshold, though my advanced faltered after a single step. The others trailed in after me as I stood there in silence, ignoring the words they spoke. Well, we'd found the Kodrog. The cavern I'd entered was twice as large as the throne room in Laure, its uneven ceiling a natural dome. It could have fit at least a thousand comfortably, which I knew for a fact because it currently did.

The floor was covered with dead drow, thick as a carpet.

"Shit," I finally cursed. "I'd better not get blamed for this."

---

DroughtBringer

Go vote everyone! I made it on time today as well!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

NerfContessa

Dun dun DUNN 😊

SpeckofStardust

well, who got here first?

Jonnnney

I'm betting pieces of Malicia's new army trying to deny Catherine an ally.

DroughtBringer

Huh. Well, this could be hearkening back to WB telling DK to 'eat the baby' or whatever the direct quote, although I feel there is a bit more at play here.

Also, if Cat *did* get blamed for it, that might actually be a good thing, all things considered for the Drow.

Javvies

So ... this looks somewhat unpromising.

Huh. Any kill helps grow/strengthen the Night.

The Night carrying knowledge from host to host is an interesting tidbit. And that's probably going to have interesting implications down the line.

Time to check – have these drow been drained of Night or not? Either option could be interesting. Not sure which would be more concerning, though.

Ternbugkle

Waste not want not, free night empowered drow winter zombie army sounds like a thing worth having.

Misting

Indeed, which is why DK might already be doing it. If he had a couple of drow zombies, it would make sense for one of the first things to do upon being released being to go and slaughter a few thousand drow with them to power them up.

Rook

Catherine learning the same lesson young Akua did in that basement all those years ago. The same one Black was reminded of in second Llesse.

If you're going to balk, then balk. But if you take the step? No half measures, it only makes it worse.

Make it count, Cat.

Clint

She keeps learning this lesson every book

Stayer

Yeah, we're supposed to believe that cat is learning and adapting but honestly she just whines about doing shit until she's forced to do it anyway and then cries about it with an enlightenment sometimes coming in although its soon forgotten. I can't take the long ass conversations about morals and shit seriously when they don't matter at all in the story.

Someguy

Aww...Cat was late to the party!

Decius

Blamed for it? Cat, you want to take CREDIT for it.

Sparsebeard

She'd look like a fool if it was revealed she took credit for a feat she didn't accomplish though.

Jane

On the other hand, if it gets her foot in the door, it'll save her a lot of trouble – and there's no doubt she's going to end up fighting plenty of people anyways, which will establish that she's no weakling pretending to strength.

Assuming the Drow have no strong taboo against lying, it'd probably be a net advantage for her.

Snowfire1224

Something tells me that they probably have a Prasi attitude towards lying.

Yotz

That's why you must vehemently deny any relation to this act in a such overly specific way that your denial can but raise questions about your involvement. And after such questions would be raised, your denials must become even more overly specific – to the point of telling anyone who was not able to hide from you that “told you it wasn't me” upon the reveal of even hint on actual culprit.

Works miracles.

TeK

Wow. The first half is like EE read all the comment and compressed them into chapter.

Nice bit of exposition. Although, I wonder, why drow society didn't give a rise to a single panultimate being that slaughtered every drow and just grew stronger with each year. Like Rnger, but on steroids. I'm betting it's the ultimate goal of the whole Tenets of the Night in the first place.

Also, typo? “granted sigil from the Svet of Night itself”. Is ot Sve or Svet? The second sounds similar to Russian word meaning “light”.

Also also, giving how this book capitalizes on showing us the rest of Calernia and throwing some heavy bit of worldbuilding, I wonder if these drow were killed by dwarves.

erraticerrata

It was a typo.

Quite possibly a cat

Well, the Priestess of Night might very well be that ultimate being.

Well, I think we should be glad they never learned the Secret of Working together. Just imagine if a team of drow had a people farm like the Dead King?

Hell, I bet a Drow could go to the surface and get a job interrogating corpses. “Oh, I can get answers from the dead. You can skip all that unreliable torture and those faulty truth spells. For a small fee of course. I'm certainly not absorbing all their power into myself."

Javvies

That only works if the Night can transfer memories from those who weren't already carrying some Night of their own.

I think what happens with non-Night-bearing kills is that the killer/absorber simply draws on the remaining essence or something of the victim to feed/multiply/grow the Night in the absorber's body.

Thus, in order for knowledge to be added to the Night, it has to be learned by someone carrying the Night.

beleester

That would make sense – otherwise weapon-making wouldn't be a problem, since they could just go up to the surface and stab a couple of blacksmiths.

Yotz

They can, but the bearers of new secrets would be immediately hunted down by the more powerful Sigils. After which >"The Ysengral hoard it mercilessly, and Ysengral itself hunts for the finest whispers."

So the society itself would be deprived of the secret of weapon-making.

It seems that Drow stumbled upon the something akin to Borg problem – the Borg can not invent. Drow can be incredibly knowledgeable and powerful, but they are not able to multiply Secrets – only transfer it from one vessel to another, with communal Harvesting being single possible way to actually spread knowledge. And if vessel is lost with its Night unharvested – so is the knowledge. And if someone culls Drow population and prevents Harvesting, that would result in total collapse of civilization, for all the Secrets the killed bore would be lost.

Similarly, if someone of Drow is to invent something, it would be immediately harvested by more powerful ones, thus strengthening the strong and weakening the weak. There are literally no incentive for anyone of the lower stand to do anything not directly related to harvesting enough Secrets to higher its stand in one swoop. If it tries to penny-pinch Secrets from different sources – or create new Secrets for the matter, it would be Harvested long before it could get even a bit closer to its goal.

We may see more on this point, but so far it seems that total sum of Drow knowledge follows the modified version Laws of Thermodynamics:

- * in isolated society knowledge can never be created, only transferred or changed from one form to another;
- * in isolated society total sum of knowledge always decreases until it reaches the possible minimum of knowledge;
- * total sum of knowledge of isolated society approaches constant value with number of vessels decreasing, to the point of being zero if there are no one to bear Secrets.

...or something like that.

With this structure in place, only possible way for the society to gain new knowledge would be to Harvest outside the system – id est, to raid other races for their Secrets. And such raids must be done by lowest of low – simply because loss of even one Mighty without the ability to Harvest its Secrets will result in weakening of the Night. That's why it's the "Last Chance" mission for disgraced – read, "weak". Lowest of the low have nothing to lose, and – if – they can return with new Secrets, that would increase their status – at least temporarily.

SilentWatcher

Maybe this slaughter was made by this panultimate being? It makes way more sense to let many Drow grow the night and when the time is right, they get "harvested" of their night. Could be a reaction to Cat intruding into the everdark. or something/ one else intresting. i seem to recall the scuttling of green and pale? skin underground in hierarchs vision in the epilogue of ark 3. I love these little hints which suddenly make sense

SilentWatcher

WAIT! this system benefits mostly the top dogs right? 2 chapters or so back wasn't there a quote about pyramid systems? i bet sve of the night founded the tenets of the night

Reqqe

Link to here doesn't appear to be showing up on the previous chapter

NZPIEFACE

And you know she will.

So, why doesn't she just raise an army of dead Drow and make an artificial name? Have a random Drow just absorb the rest.

Rook

I think it'd be more advantageous if she could find a way to partake in Night and absorb it herself.

It would be the way to reinforce her biggest key weakness. She's too young by several thousand years.

She's got power gushing out her metaphorical ears, but her foundation is so flimsy it's an insult to wet cardboard. Like a baby wielding a sledgehammer. A hundred years from now she'd still be a baby in the eyes of the big name players

But if that could be shored up with thousands of years of knowledge, experience, and unending practice from an ancient, warlike race that predates the first elf that ever set foot on the continent? It could turn that crumbling foundation into the rock of Gibraltar.

WuseMajor

Yeah, but...I kinda suspect that the Night might contain more than just skills, it might contain memories. Personalities.

Trying to eat The Night might be akin to letting it eat Winter. The resulting amalgamation would be a monster to be put down quickly not an amazing master.

haihappen

Let Winter eat the Night. Seems thematically sound. Winter takes, that's its nature, she should fit right in.

I can see the Sve taking a good look at Cat and the bodies that will trail her wake, and decide: "yup, you make a fine drow".

And I reckon the list of things Cat could offer them is very long:

- * Metalworking, or just "trade" weapons (oh the secret that secrets can be "learned", not only "claimed")
- * Opportunity to kill Praesi legionaries/Procerean soldiers - > absorb their skill etc
- * Learn/Claim the secrets of Praesian mages, as even the lowest Drow would probably make excellent raiders/assassins if properly lead. Discipline seems to be the major hurdle
- * training in advanced tactics, courtesy of Juniper

The list could go on but discipline in following orders without backstabbing seems to be a major issue.

It would need a skillful commander with lots of experience...

oh... can anyone else see Black train/lead a company of Drow to devastating effect?

Another thought: Have the Drow "forgotten" that Secrets can be learned?! That skill can be accumulated without taking it from somewhere else? It would certainly explain the state of their society.

In an ideal world, a few intelligent Drow that see the big picture would enterprise to accompany Cat to learn the Secrets of the Burning Land's people. Upon their return, they would be masters of many Secrets (mostly related to killing), and other Drow would see this and decide that this "Exchange Program" that Icy Princess was proposing may not have been a bad idea, resulting in many new gray-skinned recruits that Juniper has to whip into shape... But as I said "in an ideal world", and their culture may make them incapable of even thinking this way.

samshadar

Winter might be one thing, but she is/was the 'Duchess of Moonless Nights'... Can't get much more 'moonless' than 'underground'...

knockoffnikolai

It looks like a society-wide Prisoner's Dilemma to me. If everyone learned skills, they could rebuild society. But if you learn skills and someone else kills you for them, then you're dead and they get all of the benefits with only a fraction of the work. So that means everyone defaults to an equilibrium of killing instead of learning.

Jane

Counterpoint: Being blamed for a massacre of a decently powerful group is a wonderful advantage when dealing with an entity that only values strength, and cares nothing for the dead. If there was ever a time to practice "lies and violence", it's with the Drow.

You know, this whole "harvest the power and knowledge of the slain" thing sounds perfect for Cat, assuming it's not exclusive to Drow, attached to membership in some kind of deranged cult, or intrinsically drives those who know the secret to madness and/or violence. It probably is, though, that kind of thing has a way of spreading elsewhere.

That's a horribly overpowered talent, too... If they weren't so viciously self-destructive, they'd pretty much be the Borg, only a bit more digesty than assimilaty. One can only imagine how much the mightiest of the Mighty know... Above and beyond the killing arts, there's all sorts of secrets they must possess. A pity that they can't actually do anything with it, though.

Incidentally, I wonder if this whole suicidal system originated as a way to preserve knowledge... That by killing the oldest and wisest amongst them, rather than only harvest the wisdom outsiders, they could ensure that their lessons lived on whole in the next generation. Of course, that also sparked conflict as to who would inherit the knowledge, and encouraged some to attempt to claim said knowledge earlier than its possessor would prefer, and sparked this whole system of paranoia and endless bloodletting as things grew worse.

It's unfortunate, in many ways; knowing that all of your studying and practice would live on in the hands of an heir would normally be a wonderful thing, giving back to those around you. Even if you hated the first person who inherited your talents, they aren't immortal, and in time your work would pass to someone you didn't despise. By taking it to this extreme, though, they've squandered the benefits to the whole in pursuit of maximizing the benefit to the individual – it's long past time for the strongest amongst them to begin to rebuild, but because none of them can trust one another, they remain hiding in a mountain.

Well, perhaps I'm passing judgment a bit early – what we know about the Drow is still mostly hearsay and assumption.

Amoonymous

Could you imagine if they had a relatively normal, cohesive society?

Every drow works to learn, increase their skills, etc. When an Elder dies, they have some kind of ritual for another drow to inherit their knowledge and further refine and build upon it.

The drow would have the capacity to become one of the most advanced species if they weren't so self-destructive.

RanVor

Maybe this is what the Tenets of the Night are for – to prevent the drow society from advancing. Maybe someone intentionally installed a system that causes them to self-destruct to stop their growth before they could become a threat to the surface... and suddenly I have a strong suspicion the Bard is somehow involved in this.

bookhero123

Now here is an interesting thought, what if Cat claims parts of the night? Giving her winter and night powers to work with and as she kills she grows more powerful.

That would be very interesting.

Thanks for the chapter~~

Faiir

Well she is the Sovereign of the Moonless N...

Javvies

She's the Duchess of Moonless Nights and the Sovereign of Winter.

It's not quite the same thing, though while it may or may not be a significant asset in dealing with the Night, it is unlikely to be a significant detriment, unless the Night and Fae powers are inherently inimical to each other, which seems unlikely.

However, what is also relevant is that she has the Aspect of Take, which seems like a more limited form of claiming the Night that doesn't require a corpse, first.

Sidenote – I wonder what would happen if Cat used Take on Hanno's past Hero-life power, can't remember what it is called offhand. Besides violence.

Whatever the source (Fae Mantle, Take Aspect, or something else), Cat certainly appears to have a some sort of affinity for, or connection to, the Night based on the "You are what you take" bit.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Cat doesn't have Take anymore; when she went full fae, her name effectively died of frostbite. She still has Fall, but only that and IIRC it works differently than it did when she was still relatively mortal.

JAMES

For the record Cat's Fae title are "We swear to your service, Queen of the Hunt," the fae said. "Queen of Air and Darkness, Sovereign of Moonless Nights"

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/03/07/epilogue-3/>

naturalnuke

I'm totally stealing The Night and these drow for my dnd campaigns

nick012000

It'd probably work as a fluff explanation for getting XP for killing monsters, at least. Reminds me of the fluff explanation for how XP worked in Knights of the Old Republic 2.

Euodiachloris

This template may come in handy... May need some tweeks to account for losing whatever was gained (and probably a well-maintained "baseline" character sheet keeping tabs on "home" skill points vs "Night" ones). But...

Jane

Say... Just how much knowledge ends up transferred, exactly? Because it occurs to me that "living" the entire life of the person you just killed – and who they killed, and who they killed, and so on – could easily end up "erasing" who you once were, under the weight of so many memories that weren't "you".

I doubt it actually works that way, for plenty of reasons, but if it did... Well, that would also be another way of explaining why the Drow are the way they are, would it not? Those who might have been inclined to change the system found their goals buried under the weight of those they killed, while those who chose to abstain never had the strength to consider changing things at all.

It's a plot point I've seen used before, where directly absorbing information on too large a scale had dangerous side effects – though, not used in this particular manner before.

WuseMajor

22. No matter how tempted I am with the prospect of unlimited power, I will not consume any energy field bigger than my head.

On the other hand

"You can never have too many tiger pits, Chancellor. That's the same lack of vision that has people say "that's too large a field of energy to absorb" or "calling yourself a living god is blasphemy"."

–Dread Emperor Malignant III, before his death and second reign as Dread Emperor Revenant

nick012000

Might be why the Mighty get referred to using gender-neutral pronouns, to be honest.

---

Well, yeah, different names referring to the same person with the different amounts of power are somewhat of a hint in that regard. Catherine was able to resist something similar, when fed a slice of a mind by Masego – and he has an Aspect to make up for that – but that was explicitly because she was approaching divinity even then. Add to that the fact that the Mighty are sigils, yet at least some of the sigils are apparently granted, and the whole thing starts to look like a liability bigger than even the Winter titles.

1queenofblades1

Think Ranger finally managed to get in? Or Neshamah helping Cat out/hobbling her? (dunno if this is positive or negative yet)

Malicia killing the Drow before Cat could recruit them? The Grey Pilgrim? Ugh why isn't it Monday already!?

DroughtBringer

I don't think Malicia has the resources to pull this off at the moment, Grey is probably busy preparing for the Dead King, and Ranger doesn't fit quite right, although I couldn't say why.

SpeckofStardust

Ranger is explicitly not made for army killing, going by her interlude with the dead king, she wouldn't kill absolutely everyone.

Javvies

Though, she certainly is built as more of a boss-killer/single-target type, Ranger doesn't normally bother with army-killing because it's not a meaningful challenge to carve her way through grunts, not because she can't. She goes after those she deems "worthy". These days, "worthy" is apparently around the level of a Fae Monarch, and she's been beating up and stealing the eye from a Fae Prince every year? for so long, just because she likes the ring she made out of it.

Now, call me crazy, but I doubt that all of the now-dead drow would have been anywhere near being "worthy" by Ranger's standards.

haihappen

Looks more like something the Saint leaves in her wake. But an internal power play is more likely.

MetruX

Don't worry. All shall die before you know it, and after Monday you'll still be waiting for Wednesday ;3

Javvies

Malicia has not the resources, nor the knowledge that Cat was going to the Everdark, though it is certainly within the bounds of possibility that within the Tower and/or the basements of various High Lords, the knowledge of accessing the Everdark exists.

Neshamah/Dead King is watching Cat to see what and how she does. While I'm certain it is within his abilities to do so, I don't think he did. Getting involved here like this would not serve to help him determine whether or not Cat is worthy of apotheosis. He's intrigued by Cat, but I don't believe that he's going to randomly involve himself in her own arc(s) that don't involve him – at least not so blatantly.

Grey is probably more concerned with the Dead King and/or the actions of the Conclave. Plus, while he is a Hero, a Levantine Hero at that, I didn't get the army-killer vibes from him.

Javvies

Argh. Didn't mean to hit post yet.

Ranger is unlikely because she couldn't get in, the last time she tried, per Archer. Also, it's likely that she would have stealthed or skirmished past this outer lot towards more powerful/stronger types further in, rather than massacre them all, unless they did something to seriously piss her off.

---

This may be the dwarves, at least I hope so. It's about the time they became relevant, and a common enemy would be a great way for the drow to be at least temporarily united, maybe even grow stronger in the same way that goblins and orcs did during the civil war.

Euodiachloris

Or, it could be one city of Night getting back at another because it wants its sewer maintenance engineers' knowledge back (enchanted sewers are no joke to keep maintained).
*shrugs*

Berder

The mysterious bodies here might be just perfect for Cat. Trying to negotiate with a whole lot of pathologically violent clans that hold no single leader? Virtually impossible. Trying to negotiate with the most powerful few drow that are left cowering in their last fortress after some horrible disaster slaughtered most of their kind? Substantially more manageable.

Helirous

famous last words Cat. Its like with the goblinfire, there is no way in hell you are not getting blamed for this

Snowfire1224

Drow courtship must be complicated considering that identifying as any gender is considered an insult. I imagine it's a bit like Discworld Dwarves but with lots of backstabbing since the Drow are Evil. The other possibility is that they are a one gendered race and so it doesn't actually matter.

Cold Cyberia

Could Cat try necromancy on the drow? When she raised the mages during the Second Liesse, they seemed to have retained some of their knowledge so it might be a good way of gathering info. Plus, it seems like a good idea to see how her powers interact with the Night.

Novice

I still don't understand why Cat kept justifying herself here. Of course, I'm glad that she agreed with Indrani in the end but still. Didn't Cat intend to use the Dead King's horde in the first place? Knowing that she would be holding the thinnest of leashes especially after they saw the echoes in Arcadia, that the DK would be further strengthened for future atrocities?

Did the trio met with the force-ghost of Willicakes offscreen or something?

Anyways, I'm looking forward to their adventures in the Underdark. This is bound to be good.

Dylan Tullos

"Justifications only matter to the just" is basically a joke at this point. Catherine has spent the entire series trying to justify her actions.

Novice

Oh, I'm fine with her hemming and hawing in the earlier books since she was just getting set up character-wise. But I was not expecting it to last into the middle of Book 4 when shit is going down and Calernia is catching goblinfire (metaphorically of course).

Allafterme

Don't worry about goblinfire, book is still young...

ALKATYN

The Night is a really cool concept for a magic system. Makes the whole society inherently unstable and zero sum. Some thoughts:

- Does knowledge from non-drow get absorbed? I'd guess not given their technological stasis, they would have killed someone with knowledge of blacksmithing or whatever eventually.
- They talk about absorbing skills and secrets, but not memories. Why are those different? Or are they doing so, hence why the guide refers to its past self as a different person. Could one use it to obtain passwords, battle plans, etc?
- Can non-Drow learn how to absorb the Night? If so that's a massive available power source. You could make your own version of the Watch by powering up human soldiers with Night from the Drow.
- Hypothesis for how the Drow society collapsed: While they had a steady stream of Night coming in from surface enemies (the cattle) one advanced by doing raids and getting their share, and the proceeds were spread around the rest of society. But when the supply dried up (due to the Chain of hunger, Dead King etc) the "economy" of night collapsed, it became more effective to advance by killing other drow and stealing their Night, so it became a zero sum all against all continuous war, and cooperation to do large scale raids, infrastructure, etc, collapsed.

Masego will be pissed he didn't come. This seems totally different from the rest of magic in Calernia.

Letouriste

I think the drows are not the only ones who can have the night. Cat didn't kill any drows yet but when she does she could get their power and their knowledge...

Someguy

It's the other way round. Drow can harvest Night from undead, Cat can mass raise undead. If Cat allows the Drow to powerlevel via herself, she has something to get their attention. Too bad they can't be trusted to harvest enough Night/Winter to make Cat mortal again.

ALazyMonster

Anyone else feel that all of Cat's hesitation might be coming from the redemption story that the pilgrim was trying to start? All this angsting seems slightly exaggerated from what Cat used to be like.

Novice

Right? This reeks of the same kind of mind whammy as when the Lone Swordsman was still alive.

ATRDCI

I mean, to each their own, but I don't see it as that bad. More along the lines of likw when she was trying to take out the Assassin's Guild. Her inner morals all but demanded it if her (because what is the point of ruling if you are no better than the previous regime) but practical issues forced her to give up the moral stand

Novice

I guess I thought she was already over all this kind of moral dilemma since her badass stand against the Hashmallim. Justifications and all that jazz, you know?

Euodiachloris

People and characters can and do backtrack, you know. Just ask any cognitive therapist.

Doesn't mean they stop moving in a general direction, but old habits, behaviour patterns and ideas aren't all that easily broken.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Doubt it. The Pilgrim threw away the redemption story when he chose the "Sacrifice Callow to the Gods Above for Peace" plan.

Dylan Tullos

Well, the drow have just been promoted from "largely useless" to "worst idea ever".

This is an entire society based on treachery and murder. They can eat people to gain their skills. And Catherine wants to let them loose in Calernia, where there are mages and priests and soldiers for them to devour.

If Procer takes over Callow, the people live. If Malicia takes over Callow, the people live. But If the drow get loose in Callow, they'll kill everyone from great nobles to subsistence farmers. Even Akua wanted to leave some people alive to pay her tribute, while the drow would be quite happy to murder every single Callowan to harvest their knowledge.

This has gone from being a bad idea because the drow aren't strong enough to help to a terrible idea because the drow will level up by murdering half of Calernia.

superkeaton

Finally, Cat's learning to get over her soapbox moralizing

DarkDweller

The whole twilight sages thing makes me think that the night started as a way to keep knowledge immortal. After all, they 'considered death the only sin'. Then the Sve co-opted it in order to increase her power, and turned it into a magical pyramid scheme with her at the top. Probably drained the night from other twilight sages as an opening gambit so none could possibly oppose her, then spread a doctrine that justified her actions.

Steve

How do we know these corpses aren't just Drow decor? It could be, like, totally normal.

Isa Lumitus

You know, reading Forgotten Realms and Warhammer books taught me to really hate dark elves. It always seemed like their civilizations should have descended into... Pretty much exactly what you have just described for the Drow. So I'm liking the deconstruction.

Viconr

Perun and Mokosh? Really – old slavic gods? Is it Fantasy Counterpart Culture or they had stolen someone's cities?

Levi Kalden

I assume she can harvest theNight as she is the duchess of moonless night

---

Chapter 54: Scavenger

"One hundred and ninety-three: should your nemesis offer you a wager, a truce or delay for the first time always accept it. Villains with a fated heroic match have reached the peak of their power, whereas you and your companions can only grow."
– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

"That's a lot of dead bodies," Indrani noted. "Like, battlefield a lot, not 'the Woe has a bad day' a lot."

I ignored the attempt at humour. In someone else I might have attributed it to needing to cover up shock, but Archer didn't get those kinds of shivers. The benefits of being raised in a part of the world where every day a single misstep could get you killed by a raging monster-hunting lunatic. It was an uncomfortable truth that I'd gotten somewhat used to the sight of corpses as well, though not quite to my companion's extent. The drow who'd scuttled in behind us had gone still as statues, stricken by either terror or awe. I left them behind and waded into the pool of death. I knelt in lukewarm blood and guts, flipping over the nearest body to have a better look at it.

I immediately withdrew my hand.

"Cat?" Indrani probed, catching up to me.

"There's still Night in those," I said.

I knew that because I'd felt the eldritch power react to my own. Not an attack or an attempt to meld, but... almost like the darkness had been licking my hand. Like it recognizes something larger and meaner, and tries to make friends. I shivered, and it'd been a long time since any kind of cold had caused me to do that. The dead drow was badly mangled. The face had been smashed in, skull crushed through the eye socket, but it had an earlier wound. A bloody hole in its chest, near the centre. I stuck my fingers in there again, ignoring the feeling the Night eagerly pressing against Winter, and popped open the ribcage to have a closer look. There was an organ in there that looked somewhat similar to a human heart, though it had way too many veins coming out of it and it stood deeper in the body – almost next to the spine, which at least was easily recognizable in shape. It was more grey than white, though, and oddly granular.

"That's going to be a pain to wash," Indrani commented, glancing at my now blood-drenched clothes.

"It was a crossbow bolt that did this," I said. "Look at the indent. It's similar to what Legion-issue makes on humans. Didn't go deep enough, so whoever did this had to finish them up close."

For all her many flaws, Archer had deep knowledge of the ways of murdering at a distance. When she turned her attention to the wound I was indicating her eyes narrowed.

"That's a much bigger mark than the crossbows Robber's minions used would have made," she said. "Bigger bolt, and much stronger impact. Honestly, it looks like it should have gone straight through."

Which would require much more force, if the head of the bolt was larger. Whoever had done this they had significantly better crossbows than the Legions of Terror fielded – when it came to the power of a shot, at least. Hard to tell the rate of fire from a single corpse.

"That points a damning finger already," I said.

The Dread Empire was hardly the only nation that fielded crossbowmen, though they did field the largest amount by a significant margin. I could honestly think of no Calernian power that wouldn't have crossbows in a field army, save for the Chain of Hunger. But Praes used a goblin crank model that was a significant improvement on what the likes of Procer and the old kingdom used. Better rate of fire, better range, better impact. Whoever had done this used a superior model, and I couldn't think of any power that could boast of one. Not on the surface, anyway. Indrani leaned forward, jostling the corpse from my grasp, and then leaned back with a frown on her face. She was looking at the eye wound, the one that'd broken the skull.

"Yeah, you're right," she said. "Look at the angle. Hammer – and it's absolutely a hammer that did this – came down all wrong for someone of the same height. That's dwarf work, unless there's another bunch of murderous little people running around the region."

I dropped the dead drow entirely, slowly rising to my feet. For a butcher's yard, this place smelled nothing like rotting flesh and blood. There was that coppery scent wafting around, but aside from that? Another physical oddity for this already strange race. My gaze swept across the slaughter, looking for the lay of it. Some bodies had obviously been dragged and dropped, but others had been left where they fell and from those I could try to piece together the events that had preceded our arrival.

"First volley hit them by surprise," Indrani said, come up at my side. "Look at the bodies there. Too many of them are face down, they were shot in the back."

I followed her pointed finger. The corpses were as she'd said, but that was not what drew my attention. The crossbows would have been fired from a passage leading roughly to my current left, but I could see it winding closer to my back. That should lead to either the Gloom itself or a cavern very close to it. Ivah had said that the dwarves sometimes pierced through the Gloom, sending an expedition through to mine or claim other sources of wealth.

"Then the second volley went straight into the crowd, right there," Indrani mused, finger moving towards a handful of dead bodies closer to the centre. "That's interesting. You'll know what kind of tactics that is even better than me."

"Panic," I said. "They were inciting a panic, so the drow would try to flee instead of fight back. Which means..."

Our two gazes swept towards the right side of the cavern, where the other passage out could be seen. It was broader than the other one, would likely allow for twenty through at a time. The corpses near it were piled almost hip-high, not a single one coming closer than twenty feet of the passage.

"There was another force waiting there," I said. "So they're numerous enough to afford splitting up at least, assuming there's a single dwarven expedition at work here."

"They did it cold and methodical," Indrani grunted. "I'd guess they let the panic sink in before moving in the second force, so the drow wouldn't get desperate too early."

"It was mean to be a massacre since the beginning," I softly agreed. "They never intended to leave anyone alive."

"There's more. Look around. No structures in here, Cat," she pointed out. "Nowhere to huddle in, not even the beginnings of a camp site. So why were there at least a thousand drow in the middle of fucking nowhere?"

"You think the dwarves slaughtered the entire tribe," I said. "Sigil, whatever."

"Whatever they're up to, it doesn't involve leaving survivors," Indrani shrugged. "This lot didn't give much a fight, by the looks of it. I'd bet they were bottom feeders who fled another battle and got cleaned up before the dwarves moved on."

"That's monstrous," I said, appalled. "I understand hitting those who can fight back, but civilians? Gods, Archer, I wouldn't be surprised if we found children in the piles should we look for them."

"There's a sense to it," she replied. "Hard sense, mind you, but still sense. Leave a bunch of Night-bearing corpses behind and the survivors will eat that. Possibly make trouble on the way out. No one can harvest if there's no one left."

"Fucking Hells," I said. "Is there a single place on Creation where we're not going to find atrocities if we scratch the varnish a bit?"

"This whole fucking place is an atrocity, Cat," Indrani dismissed. "All the dwarves did was heap another ugly day onto the pile."

My finger clenched. Her utter lack of sympathy for the drow was not without reason. But there was a difference between holding the responsible to account and shrugging off massacres. I'd wrestled with this before, when I had to make choices about the Empire. How many people in Praes could really be called at fault for the many sins of the High Lords? Farmers and shopkeepers did not get a voice in the run of the world, no matter whose banner they lived under. For every drow calling themselves Mighty and heedlessly partaking in the slaughter, how many thousands were just meat?

"Enough," I said. "We've got too many worries for me to be angry with you."

The other Named shrugged.

"Sure," she said. "We might consider this a useful turn, if not a good one. We need to get deeper, right? If we follow in the wake of the dwarves I expect we'll have an easier way of it than on our own."

"We don't know why they're here," I reminded her. "Or even where they're headed."

Indrani gestured down at the slaughter beneath us.

"That's not the opening move of someone after a few rubies, Cat," she said. "They're leaving no one behind, so it follows they're gonna be in the Everdark long enough they're worrying someone might raise a banner here before they return."

I reluctantly nodded. Not because I agreed following the dwarven expedition was our best bet, but to concede she was right about the logistics. The drow were terrified of the Kingdom Under, evidently with good reason, but this brutal a massacre wasn't something that would go unanswered. Even a rat bared its fangs when cornered. The entire affair reeked of calculated risk.

"This complicates things," I finally sighed. "It might be easier to find friends here, if the drow are under attack, but the price..."

"We're not picking a fight with the Kingdom Under," Indrani flatly said. "Not even the Lady does that. You kill a single dwarf and they won't send a complaint, they'll sink cities underground and slaughter everyone remotely involved. Maybe their relatives just to be sure. It doesn't matter if by some miracle you manage to beat the army they send, Catherine. They'll keep sending them, just get across the point that you don't fuck with the dwarves."

I glanced at her, surprised. I didn't disagree with what she'd said – odds were that if the Queen of Callow killed a dwarf then Laure would be a ruin before winter arrived – but I was taken aback by how vehement Archer was being about it. She'd always been, well, fearless. Occasionally to the point of foolishness, though that was not unusual for any of the Woe. Including myself. I'd been under the impression few dwarves ever came to Refuge, even though it probably the surface entity with the closest ties to the Kingdom Under. Save maybe Mercantis, but that was famously strictly business as all the relationships of the City of Bought and Sold tended to be.

"You won't get an argument from me," I said.

"Good," she said. "You got more on your plate, anyway."

"How's that?" I frowned.

Archer pointed down at the pond of corpses.

"That's a lot of Night, Cat," she said. "Even if they were all nobodies, that's a great many nobodies. You just going to leave that lying there?"

I'd been trying not to think about that, all the while knowing I would have to soon enough. I wasn't sure if I could devour the Night myself, but I did have Diabolist with me. If there was anyone who could tutor me in the basics of eldritch cannibalism it was Akua Sahelian. That'd still involve eating power from a source I only poorly understood, unaware of the possible long-term consequences. If Ivah had been upfront about what the Night was, then this could represent an extremely useful addition to my arsenal. I'd been running into old monsters more and more, of late. Older heroes, yes, but there was also the fact that the Dead King would be fielding an entire battalion of the most dangerous Named he'd been able to get his hands on. Having a much shallower bag of tricks than the opposition had cost me, in my last few fights, and I didn't have the time or the kind of opponents available that'd allow me to play catch up. Drawing on the ancestral knowledge of an entire race would, to be frank, be the perfect solution. That was the most obvious reason not to go through with this.

It was too good a solution, too perfect. Like it'd been handpicked for my problems. Mundane coincidence was not unknown to Creation – the Gods were not behind every stroke of fortune or disaster, even for Named – but this crucial a coincidence? No. It wasn't happenstance. I would go as far as to say I was inclined to believe this was a bid from Below. Look at what you could get, if you start acting like a proper villain. My last talk with the Dead King had involved a warning about the offers that would come knocking at my door. About the kind of stories that would be offered to me. I had not forgot it, even though it had been the least ominous part of what was spoken.

"No," I finally said. "I can't. It's too useful."

"Tell me you're not drinking dead drow juice," Indrani said. "You don't know where it's been, Cat, it could be full of diseases."

"Not me," I said, glancing back at the rest of our band.

The drow had gathered themselves while the two of us had been examining the massacre. None of them came within even spitting distance of the corpses, though, and from the looks of it one of them had thrown up against the cavern wall. Diabolist was still with them, though her eyes remained on the bodies. She was too well-taught to let her face betray her deepest thoughts, but the blankness of her expression was a hint in and of itself.

"Shit, you feeding them to Dubious Witch?" Indrani muttered. "Vivi's going to have a fit when she learns."

I waded back to dry land, boots trailing blood all over the stone. The drow visibly shrunk on themselves while Akua withdrew her gaze from the massacre's aftermath to meet my eyes.

"Catherine," she greeted me. "Have your deliberations come to an end?"

"In a manner of speaking," I said. "Akua Sahelian, I forbid you to partake in Night."

Diabolist shivered as my order sunk into the heart of her being, words writ into law. She threw me a reproachful glance, after gathering her bearings.

"I would not have so blundered, dear heart," she said. "Such power would not come without trappings or demands. I am more discerning in my usurpations."

"Then this shouldn't be a problem," I replied flatly.

She could argue all she wanted that she wouldn't have done it, it was bad form to give an alcoholic the keys to a liquor shop. Even when they told you they didn't like the bottles on the shelves.

"As you say," Diabolist murmured, bowing her head.

I turned to the drow. I'd gotten used to them over our journey, well enough I no longer had trouble telling them apart. Ivah was the only one who talked regularly, even among each other. The former guide shifted uneasily when my gaze came to rest on it.

"Ivah," I said. "Are you still set on us parting ways?"

Silver eyes narrowed.

"I am reconsidering this matter, Queen," it said.

"Good," I smiled. "Then I have a bargain for you. I still need a guide to Holy Tvarigu, or at least someone who can take me to the path that leads there. If you're willing to be that guide, I can offer safety on the way there."

I paused, then glanced at the corpses behind me.

"There would be other benefits, were you so inclined," I added.

The drow's face creased in thought.

"You would grant me right to harvest all of them?" it probed.

"So long as you can do it in a reasonable amount of time," I said. "I want to get a move on as soon as possible. I don't suppose it's possible to take all of the Night at once?"

"There are rites to do this," Ivah admitted. "Yet I know them not. It could take more than hours to finish this. The act of harvest is tiring."

"If I may intervene?" Akua asked.

I nodded at her.

"If simply gathering the Night is the issue," she said. "I believe we can be of assistance."

"You can drain all those dry?" I said, jutting a thumb at the dead.

"The power itches to be held," Diabolist said. "It would not fight us in this."

"And contamination?" I pressed.

I got the impression the shade had to hold back from rolling her eyes.

"I have struck bargains with demons and devils most ancient," Akua said. "This is ancient work, to be sure, and strong. It is also incredibly simplistic. I am no green warlock, drunk on the success of binding an imp."

"Gods, you sound like Masego only two parts more Evil," I muttered. "Fine, I didn't mean to impugn your talent at short-sightedly endangering the very fabric of Creation to try winning battles you ended up losing anyway on account of being kind of a fuckup."

I heard Archer choke behind me.

"That was unnecessary," Diabolist said, sounding genuinely miffed.

"Don't know about that," Indrani mused. "I got a laugh out of it."

Ivah's eyes were moving from one of us to the other in sequence as we spoke, face visibly split between fear and befuddlement. I suspected the Mighty weren't keen on banter with their underlings. What little I knew implied they were pretty direct about having their displeasure felt, though in all fairness that made me the pot mouthing off at their kettle.

"The terms stand, with the addition that we'll help you gather Night at least this once," I told the drow.

Ivah did not need to mull over it much longer.

"I would accept your bargain, then," it said.

I nodded, pleased.

"Give me a moment to phrase the oath," I said.

"That will not be necessary, Queen," Ivah said.

My brow rose. Trust already? We'd only struck one bargain, and I'd needed it for urgent purpose. The silver-eyed guide smiled thinly, reading my surprise.

"This will make me drow again," it said. "Drow neither give nor take oaths."

"That's rather inconvenient," I frankly replied.

Would it try to betray us the moment it had a bit of power under the belt? I wasn't overly worried about it hurting us, Secrets or no Secrets, but it'd be a pain to have to find another guide so soon after empowering the last one. A closer eye needed to be kept on it, then. I gave Diabolist a meaningful glance, getting the slightest of nods in response.

"Let's get this done," I said. "Akua, I'm getting the impression that improvising here would be a bad idea."

"Your discernment remains impeccable," Diabolist said, without a hint of irony.

I smothered a grin. The diabolism quip had actually gotten under her skin, which was just delightful.

"If I may?" she said, extending her hand towards me.

I nodded and she made contact with the bare skin of my neck. It felt... like when we'd fought together against the Skein, but softer. Access granted but not power. Her thoughts bloomed right under my fingertips, little whispers of knowledge and intent.

"Extend your will," she murmured.

I closed my eyes. I could feel the Night wriggling in the bodies. She'd been right to say it was itching to be held: it responded eagerly to even the slightest of approaches. My mind covered the whole of the cavern – close to the perception that emerged when others entered my domain, but somehow incomplete. There was no inherent understanding here. I was blindly groping my way.

“Call it,” Akua said.

To me, I ordered. The Night slithered out of the corpses like a tide of snakes, eating through dead flesh. It hesitated, but I lashed it with my will and called it closer. It became easier the more I exerted myself, as if I’d overcome its hesitation. I spun it into a sphere until it grew larger than a person, then told it to contract. When I opened my eyes, there was only a pinprick of darkness hovering in the air before me.

“Ivah,” I said. “Now.”

The drow approached and bowed towards the Night, beginning cadenced whispers, but they fell away from my ears. I was looking into the small piece of darkness, and seeing beyond it. Through it.

I was not the only one looking.

There was a face, but I could only make out the barest contours because of the eyes: deep and perfect silver, they were glaring harshly in otherwise absolute darkness.

Splendid, a woman’s voice spoke into my ear.

“Who are you?” I asked.

Ah, perhaps not. Merely usurper. What an unusual creature you are.

I could feel her mind scuttling across my own, like a spider on glass. Feeling out the shape of it, tasting the power. It went both ways. Her soul, her mantle was no thick bundle of power. It was an impossibly large web of the thinnest possible strings, spread out so far and wide I could scarcely comprehend it.

“You’re not the Night,” I said. “I can feel you too, Named.”

I sensed you tread the Gloom with stolen feathers. Felt you come to me, purpose on your lips.

“Sve of Night,” I whispered. “I seek audience with you.”

So take it, the woman laughed. What stays your hand?

“You’re under attack,” I said.

All is strife. The Tenets will hold, or they will break. Only the worthy rise.

"Then you're willing to talk," I tried. "We need to-"

All paths lead to Tvarigu. I await you beyond the reach of dawn.

Silver light shone, blinding, and for a heartbeat I thought I saw her whole. A colossal silhouette, limbs outstretched and shivering in pain. Then I saw only the cavern and the concerned looks of my companions.

"Fuck," I said feelingly. "This just keeps getting better, doesn't it?"

---

DroughtBringer

Yet another monday, everyone! Time to go vote so we can keep the Guide on the top (where it deserves to be) <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also when I got here (To the website) the chapter wasn't up! Which is surprised me, and is awesome. (Sad that the chapter wasn't up, but...) this just goes to show how good Erratic is at getting chapters up on time, that I am caught off guard when they aren't up, because it so rarely happens. Thank you, Erratic, for all the work you do sharing this amazing story with us, and putting in the effort to publish an *outstanding* three chapters a week, and getting them out almost always on time. It is appreciated, and I am always looking forward to each chapter. Thank you for all you do.

SpeckofStardust

"Fine, I didn't mean to impugn your talent at short-sightedly endangering the very fabric of Creation to try winning battles you ended up losing anyway on account of being kind of a fuckup." Well... this is fun.

Antoninjohn

Cat does not need the Drow night she can make her own night out of Moonless Nights to gain power from those she slays

DroughtBringer

I think the Night, and Moonless Nights are too separate of things. She might be able to do *something* from the corpses of those she slays, but not the same.

Gunslinger

It does feel like the Night's usurpation aspect is related to the Sve's aspect. I don't think Cat can replicate that with Winter.

*shieldredblog*

She could come into a name though, in the right situation. For example if she kills Sve and usurps the Tenants of Night, safe money is on those Below offering her a job.

*Javvies*

That's mildly ominous.

Cat is not going to be claiming Night here, though she could, because it looks too good and would come with strings attached and lock her into certain stories. That's irksome. I wonder if that would apply to all possibilities of claiming some of the Night or just this specific opportunity laid before her (and thus similarly laid out freebies).

And, of course, Cat just looked like she was taking to herself because nobody else was aware of Sve of Night's presence.

Byzantine

Hmm. It feels like Sve's aspect – if that is what it is – drove her insane and left nothing behind but the aspect.

Nic

"should your nemesis offer you a wager, a truce or delay for the first time always accept it. Villains with a fated heroic match have reached the peak of their power, whereas you and your companions can only grow." – Considering this was what Cat did with the Lone Swordsman in Summerholm, it seems inaccurate. She did, in fact, grow tremendously.

Michael Sanders

Not the first time, nor the last time, Cat played a Heroic role in a story despite nominally being a Villain. She's an uncooperative bitch like that, riding the line between the two as best suits her own whims.

*DroughtBringer*

The concerned looks... did Cat accidentally take the Night? Did something happen to her, did they see part of the whole of the Sve? So many unanswered questions. Kind of sad that Cat did not (willingly) partake of the Night, but she might have? No idea. But it makes sense why she did not, at the very least. Might cause a few too many problems. Wednesday will be fun.

FactualInsanity

I believe in this case the simple answer is the most likely one by far. Her companions merely heard her talk, seemingly to no one.

What I find more thought-provoking is that the Night seems to be a manifestation of an aspect. Is the Sve a reverse-Ranger? One that grows in power through her minions amassing experience, instead of doing it herself?

Yotz

I do believe the concerned looks caused by the fact that she just went on discussion with an imaginary collocutor – from Archer's and Akua's pov; and the fact that Sve actually talked to someone – from the Drow. Though, the latter ones probably not so concerned, as more like "eyes popping out in disbelief, awe, and shock".

Someguy

I take it that Cultural connotations aside Cat is able to tell Sve of Night is a woman not by "hearing" her voice but by sensing it through her Mantle? If they physically meet she'd be anonymously androgynous like every other Drow?

Yotz

Maybe that distinction is largely dependent on the amount of power one has. Meat simply doesn't have enough to display any signs of gender, or even biological sex. And on the transition from low to Drow they gain enough power to undergo a metamorphosis of sorts – kinda like a form of neoteny.

In other news, it seems we'll finally be able to clear that point in regards to Ivah. Who will not be Ivah any longer, I assume...

TeK

You mean meat can't reproduce? I'll second Cat, it's a horrible approach to animal husbandry. You want as much cattle as possible.

Yotz

Oh, I agree completely!
Though, there is an option with Drow being a Hive life form...

TeK

That... May be closer to true than I'd like. We are yet to be introduced to hive-mind and I'm pretty sure Chain of Hunger's not it. What if drow is an artificial attempt to create a hive-mind? They even have genestealers and genderless drones. Between them and Chain of Hunger we have one whole Tyrranid hive.

16JSundberg4

Eh...not really. The Chain of Hunger is rather, almost terrifyingly so, inspired by the Skaven given the fact that the ratlings are that, ratlings. Ratmen with their leaders being "horned ones" like Grey Seers were in Skaven society. The drow though...it seems to be close to a hive mind without actually BEING a hive mind, since each of the drow have an independent will that desires to rise and grow within their own society. Cutthroat, yes, but not serving the betterment of the species as a whole.

Drd

Well the artificial hive mind thing could possibly explain why the Dwarves treat the Drow with such extreme prejudice... or they could just be bigoted, territorial, elitist, genocidal, psychopaths with small man syndrome.
0_o

TeK

Oh come on, Cat. What do you mean "this is too large a field of energy to absorb"? Are you a Villain or what?

Michael

"This energy field is off the charts!"

Is probably what she would say in the crappy, half-baked sci-fi adaptation.

BryceWilliam

its less the size the the seeming lack of a cost. evil never gives you power for free. *never*

Yotz

Ah, but there is an exception to that rule!
See, the first dose is always free...

Gunslinger

I'm was more piqued that she was taking advice from the Dead King here. Good advice but still funny

sengachi

Evil Overlord List Rule #22: No matter how tempted I am with the prospect of unlimited power, I will not consume any energy field bigger than my head.

DroughtBringer

"When I opened my eyes, there was only a pinprick of darkness hovering in the air before me."

I mean, this one **was** fairly small in the end.

sengachi

It definitely started out larger than a person. But yeah, I'm going to say that compressing an energy field larger than your head until it becomes a rift in the fabric of reality to an endless abyss and a mad, murderous demigod who stares back at you from within that abyss by no means makes the consumption of said energy field 'safe'. Not by any stretch of any definition of safe.

ArkhCthuul

Ah, but at least it makes it into a bite sized morsel of doom, no? ^^

papermache7

That'd make a lot of sense normally, but she's basically balking at eating at consuming a cloud when she's already drank an ocean before.

Alivaril

There's also the story of someone refusing dark power only to draw on it during a moment of desperation, Cat. That story ends even more poorly than the vaguely-villainous carrion devouring. Eat the baby, Cat.

"I spun it into a sphere until it grew larger than a person, then told it to contract. When I opened my eyes, there was only a pinprick of darkness hovering in the air before me."
C'mon, Cat, this IS an energy field smaller than your head. Take a little bite. You know you want to.

DroughtBringer

I'd argue the drawing on it in a moment of desperation is set up much better, the original one is a story of Gluttony, this is a story of Desperation.

sengachi

Desperation is a story that has a potentially good ending for heroes fighting a tyrannical despot. For a villain though? Down in the Underdark? No down in the Underdark Desperation only has one ending and it is far, far worse than Gluttony's.

RanVor

Cat's story has been of Desperation from day one. No need for making it even worse by adding Gluttony to it.

burguulkodar

She is a Hero in the Everdark framing. Between two evils, in a story a lesser evil is always a Hero-role. Antihero is still kind of a hero, and that's Cat since like forever.

Death Knight

"All paths lead to Tvarigu. I await you beyond the reach of dawn."

Thematically there is no way the Priestess of Night does not join Cat. She is the Duchess of Moonless Nights after all. A deity in all but Name, and what are the Roles of Priestesses?

Preaching the tenets of their deity.

GuidingMoonlight

Cat should stop trying to take moral highground, she lost this privilege like 3-4 books ago.

Anyway why she still wants this alliance with drow?

They are not organised.

They are completely untrustworthy, just because drinking Callowans is always more beneficial for drow than dieing for them.

They are currently at war with fucking dwarves. This means by making friends with drow, cat willingly puts callow in dwarven shit list.

Why is she still there?

Amoonymous

Kinda agreeing with this. Drow also don't take or give oaths, so she can't even get any oaths to make them trustworthy or not just kill Callowans and siphon them whenever they think they can get away with it.

Even before this chapter it felt like way too few pros and way too many cons, and this just made it worse.

Jane

Properly speaking, she doesn't need an alliance, per se. Just give them a reason to attack Procer and/or Praes, and offer a way to make it easy for them. Even if all they accomplish is a distraction, that's enough to give Callow a bit of breathing room.

If the Drow are hostile to everyone, just make sure they're closer to your enemies than they are to you – if they're not interested in holding territory (and they don't seem to be), then making sure they're harassing your enemies is close enough to being a friend. So long as you stay away from them.

Yotz

At it was said once – the enemy of my enemy is my enemy's enemy. No more. No less.

...

...and now I can't but help to imagine Drow raiding party with stickers "Front toward enemy"...

burguulkodar

actually what was said was "The enemy of my enemy is second on the list"

Javvies

"The enemy of my enemy is second on the list" was a Dread Emperor chapter quote ... I think. Definitely one of the Dead Emperors, though it might also have come up inside one of the chapters, rather than in an opening quote.

Yotz's "the enemy of my enemy is my enemy's enemy, no more, no less" is Maxim 29 of the Seventy Maxims of Maximally Effective Mercenaries, from Schlock Mercenary.

Drd

The Drow would LOVE a chance at praes or procer, but they can't get there due to being surrounded by the Dead king, ratlings, and psychopathic dwarves, but they STILL occasionally try anyway. All Cat has to do is open a gateway into her enemies back yard and back, I'm sure they'd jump at the chance. Because they do still want to go home with their spoils, they'll play nice with Cat too.

Gunslinger

It seemed like a desperate gambit at best before but hopeless now. I guess she's hoping that they'd listen to the Sve if she orders them to ally. Though that's never gonna happen

RanVor

No, you got it wrong. You should be asking: with whom should she make an alliance instead? Everyone else is either already hostile or even more dysfunctional, after all.

GuidingMoonlight

- 1) Goblins. Yeas they are treacherous bitches, but Cat has atleast some idea what they want to be able to predict their behavior. Unlike Drow.
- 2) Make Winter Court. Its a matter of time anyway. Better now than in Cat yet another "darkest hour".
- 3) Go full Lich King. She has alot of dead bodies. Why not use them. I dont even remember for how long we have been teased with this. Her fae zombies are inteligent and resistant to Heaven usual hard counter.

3 option from the top of my head. All far less dangerous, much quicker and in direct control by Cat. And i didnt make up any of them. They all were introduced in story at some point but cat doesnt use them because she keeps pussyfoot around some vague defined "Line"

And dont even start with "it will lock her up in villain story and villains always lose". This rule ignores Cat and Black for some reason.

werafdsaew

With (2) she'll be bringing new pieces to the board, which allows Above to do the same. At least with the Drows she's just re-purposing existing pieces.

GuidingMoonlight

New power already on the table. She brought Winter in Ceation and actively uses it. Heavens already have an excuse to put new pieces.

Jane

I think she's probably going to come to a deal with the Goblins anyway, but they're not going to be enough to change things directly – they prize their own survival too highly to play a pivotal role in her conflicts. They're excellent support, but she needs someone who can engage in a more direct fight.

Building a Court has unknown, permanent effects – it's true that it could be helpful to her, especially if it allows more people to use gates, but what if it drives her most loyal followers mad? She has a hard time dealing with the principle alienation, and she has quite a strong strength of self; those she bestows a title upon may not be able to deal with it at all.

The dead might make good cannon fodder and shock troops, but they still need to be armed to be effective, and they have a shortage of money and arms. Raising the dead from a battlefield is one thing, but building an army of dead from scratch involves a different set of economic concerns. Furthermore, Catherine's undead are "different", insofar as they retain skills from their life – raising the civilian dead as well as the military might not be as effective as her usual dead soldiers. Also, there's also a matter of suitable corpses – Black mentioned at the start that the freshly dead made for better undead than older corpses; we don't know whether digging up old graveyards will yield undead good for more than scaring farmers with. And finally, there's a real risk that she's going to have to face some of the Dead King's undead, as a result of his agreement with Malicia; they might well end up turned against her, in such an instance. It's not a bad tool in her kit, but it's questionable as to whether it would be worth more than pursuing an outside alliance.

There are sound arguments against relying on each plan that don't involve moral concerns. And besides, none of them are mutually exclusive with the Drow – it sounded like the Goblins know pretty much what they want, and just need Cat to agree to their terms, and she can start handing out titles any time she wishes. The Undead are the only thing that would take her any real amount of time, but raising an army of the dead will be much easier and faster if she has a few battlefields to work with anyway.

GuidingMoonlight

"Building a Court has unknown, permanent effects"

And releasing Drow from containment between Dwarves, Elves and Dead King doesn't? With Court Cat atleast has nope-button, because she is The Queen and can easily take power back.

"but what if it drives her most loyal followers mad?"

Than dont use unknown powers on your friends? I think Cat forgot but she has the Gallowborn. Turn them in Immortals and look for side effects. Again, Cat has full control over winter. Its established fact. If you affraid of people going mad, make them take binding oaths before they go mad.

"but building an army of dead from scratch"

There were atleast 2 major battles with ten of thousands fully equipped soldiers dead. There was a overhyped crusade but it was pretty forgettable. Damn Demon of Alzheimer.

“freshly dead made for better undead than older corpses”

Shouldnt have wasted time on DK nd Drow than.

“Catherine’s undead are “different”, insofar as they retain skills from their life”

And resistant to AOE blessings. And become more intelligent with time to the point where a horse can show personality. And animated with winter. And generally all around better.

“there’s a real risk that she’s going to have to face some of the Dead King’s undead”

Than dont send them against DK. Its not like she lacks other enemies. And frankly i dont see Cat winning against DK no matter what, so its a mute point anyway.

“none of them are mutually exclusive with the Drow”

Everything takes time, and time is limited.

Goblins can decide to deal with Malicia any moment for what Cat knows.

Finding volunteers and safe ways to make Court require testing.

And dead bodies are spoiling like you said.

Jane

Whatever ill effects might come from Cat freeing the Drow can be safely presumed to be Somebody Else’s Problem, however, unless she decides to become Dread Empress herself. Unless there’s a realistic chance of some new Drow Empire arising, they’ll just end up a persistent thorn in the side of somebody else – worst case, she might feel a twinge of guilt from time to time when she hears about what they’re doing.

The results are unpredictable, but outside of the worst case scenarios, the locations of those effects can be predicted fairly well – the Underdark (wholly irrelevant to her, unless it ticks off the dwarves), and the exit point of wherever she unleashes them.

Regarding Courts, empowering people you don’t trust (presuming that you’re doing so as an experiment to see the results, before killing them to give the title to someone that you do) sounds like a horrible idea to me.

I know you said not to bring up Narratives, but... I mean, it's really obvious how that ends. Setting aside Narrative, though, giving an unknown (but significant) power to someone so that you can observe how they respond to the power doesn't sound like it will yield good results – unless you hand them over to Masego for an unknown period of time (who has generally been working on equally important matters), you don't really have the right tools to get good answers out of them, and if something goes wrong, they'll do a lot of damage before you can properly execute them. And I don't even know how you could tell what the consequences of expanding Winter's reach might have on Callow, until it's too late.

Regarding the already-existent dead, she had to let them go in order to secure her truce; Procer certainly wasn't going to treat with her if she'd left them standing, and I doubt they would be reasonable if she asked to keep the bodies.

Regarding corpse-hunting instead of pursuing potential allies, is there some other great source of freshly dead bodies that I'm unaware of? Outside of a disaster, I don't imagine there's more than a few bodies generated in any given Callowan city per-day – certainly not enough to matter for military purposes.

Regarding the differences between her dead and “standard” undead, what I meant was that, despite their advantages, we don't know whether their “old life” restricts their capacity for military affairs. A “standard” zombie doesn't need to think much – it follows the magic in its veins, and attacks a necromancer's targets according to its programming. If Cat were to make, say, a baker undead – would she still be similarly programmed? Or would she retain knowledge of baking, but not know how to properly shamle and bite, or swing a sword? Furthermore, if they retain elements of their previous personality, would they still march solemnly forward, blue-eyed towards certain death? Or would they begin to express hesitation or cowardice? So far as I recall, everyone she's previously raised has been a soldier or mage of some sort; raising the civilian dead might not be as effective.

Regarding the Dead King... Well, then, Cat's probably already lost. Do you really think that Malicia was so eager to cut a deal with the Dead King and cut Cat out if her deal didn't involve Cat in some way? A full invasion's probably off the table, for obvious reasons, but she's going to find herself in at least a limited conflict with him. I mean, he practically said as much with that whole "Don't take it personally if we fight" speech.

Regarding time, Cat's most pressing issue is the Crusade; the goblins will be used against Malicia, if they play a direct role at all. They can wait a bit longer. Testing the effects of bestowing a title will take longer, but honestly, if she's going to do it at all, she should just skip the testing – in which case it doesn't take much time at all. Raising an army of the dead takes time if she wants to establish one before the fighting begins, but I seriously doubt that digging up a few graveyards will be of greater value than opening a second front – the series has suggested in the past that low-quality undead are of little value.

GuidingMoonlight

Regarding Drow. Do you think nobody will figure out who let the Drow out? When it's get out she will be on everyone shit list, so she could kiss goodbye to her dream of peace for callow. If nothing else, i give 75% chance that Dwarves will notice Cat following them.

Regarding Court. Trust is not a factor, because Cat already heavily relies on people she shouldnt trust: Akua and Larat. And there are still no consequences. Thats why i refuse to accept "Villain story" explanation.

Why empower people who are not your close friends? Well, you said it yourself, friend or not you cant trust him or her not to go full villain. But you can make them take oaths(like Cat did to herself and Larat) or bind them through power-link(Like Akua). Like that you have loyal winter army and all your friends alive and sane.

Regarding Dead bodies. Most recent Places in Callow with thousand dead soldiers: Red valley, New Winter-Swamp, Liese, Summerhold. Main goal of dead army is to hold the line and lower the casualties for Legions and Court army. Their main qulities are "hard to incapacitate", not "highly lethal"

Consider battle of the camps. Heroes cut through Legioners like butter, So technically there is not differents between legioner and living dead when in comes to holding the line against heroes.

Jane

Regarding the Drow, if she uses them against Praes, nobody will care – you can do whatever you want to a Villain. If she uses them against Procer, it will end up overshadowed by the fact that Malicia unleashed the Dead King on them. Besides, she's already the Arch-Heretic of the East – exactly how much worse can her diplomatic position get, at this point? And it's true, the dwarves might well notice what she's done, but what do they care? To them, the Drow appear to be little more than pests, and surface-dwellers aren't actually considered people.

Regarding trust, Akua and Larat are two people – creating a Court involves dozens of people, and would presumably be the heart of her forces. She has heavy leverage over Akua, and makes use of her in a relatively limited capacity; Larat has also been kept relatively peripheral to her plans, despite his power (I'm treating him separately from the Wild Hunt as a whole, to be clear). She can't keep dozens of powerful people with questionable loyalties under her thumb at all times, and there would be no point in making them and then not relying on their talents; it would be quite different than her arrangement with her current dubious subordinates. Oaths are a potent tool, but the Fae are well-experienced in abusing technicalities and unexpected situations; it's not a panacea. Besides, this still doesn't deal with the "What side effects might there be to bringing more Winter into Creation?" issue – there's no point in winning the wars if it plunges Callow into an eternal winter.

Regarding the dead; the Vales are on the wrong side of a landslide, and surrounded by hostile soldiers (admittedly, a good situation for stirring a bit of mischief by ambushing the enemy army, but probably not worth the risk to Cat herself), the Camps likely saw the enemy's dead taken with them, and her own would have invited unnecessary morale issues, Liesse would be a public relations nightmare (as I think she mentioned, didn't she?) and are probably too decayed at this point, as are the dead of Summerhold. They'd offer her a tactical advantage, but she needs to be more concerned with her strategic position at the moment – bolstering her troops would help her win a battle, but ensuring that Malicia can't attack her while she's otherwise occupied would be of greater significance, as would tying up another Crusading army, depending on circumstances. Besides, she's unlikely to have to face that many Heroes again during this war – they'll be tied up fighting the Dead King, and if they're not attacking in number, she can limit the damage they do to her forces without much trouble.

GuidingMoonlight

Drow

Siccing Drow on Praes is a disaster. You dont want The Night anywhere near thousands years worth of magic theory especially blood magic and demonology. And Praes is right next to Callow, so in couple of years Cat may end up with much more hardcore version of Wastelanders invading Callow.

Siccing Drow on Procer is redundant, because they will be busy being depthroated by Dead King.

Speaking of Dead King, If i understand it right, he bitch slapped Drow hard enough(or frequent enough) that they piss themseves just from a suggestion of fighting him. I dont think they will be very effective agianst him.(To be fair not many factions can beat late game Necropolis with expert Necromancy and Cloak of the Undead King)

Sending them after Hierachy is unnecessary antagonistic. They did swear undying love and friendship after all.

"And it's true, the dwarves might well notice what she's done, but what do they care? To them, the Drow appear to be little more than pests, and surface-dwellers aren't actually considered people."

That is exactly the kind of thinking that gets your cities burned by dwarves. You dont fuck with dwarves. If in doubt, assume that dwarves would not like it.

Court

Ok, i think we talking about different things. I am talking about several companies of immortals. Cat doesnt need ruling caste, she needs line troops to share casualties with legions. Immortals are perfect for that role. Hard to put down, resurect, highly lethal, have no personlaity and perfectly loyal based on what we saw. Cat can give Nauk and remaing original Gallowborn some titles if she really needs too(to be fair i hope she does, Nauk and Gallowborn undeservingly fell from spotlight)

Undead

Cat can teleport – mountains are not an obstacle. if she really needs fresh corpses (and i doubt that) she always can take Wild Hunt and haras Praes. Or just follow Black in Procer for some time.

More ruthless option is to let Praes refugees in, wait until they piss off Callowans and murder them all. From what we know of Callowans, they wouldnt complain much about it.(I know she would not do it but option is there)

All im saying is, she HAS options. They are not perfect but they are more manageable than Drow IMHO.

Jane

Regarding the Drow, I do agree that Praes is the most likely target for them, but I disagree that it is a danger – the Drow were not interested in maintaining a surface kingdom in the past, and do not seem to be interested now. It's far more likely that they'll take the knowledge they harvest, and go back beneath their mountain, using their newly-claimed knowledge to gain an advantage over their old rivals. They are an inherently unstable society in their current form – empowering them for a moment doesn't matter, because they'll always collapse under the weight of their internal bickering. As for the Dwarves, I just don't see them caring – they don't care about the Drow now, unless they're in the way of a mine, and they don't care about surfacers. Giving knowledge to the Drow doesn't matter, because Praes isn't a threat to the dwarves either – why would pests armed with Praesi knowledge become more than a nuisance? It's just paranoia to assume that the Dwarves would be deeply offended, based on what we know so far.

Regarding Courts, it... Doesn't really work like that, historically speaking. Whether she uses those she grants titles to as commanders or as an elite company, they're going to receive a lot of attention and be granted special privileges, because being strong and very publicly successful tends to be rewarded (usually because things start going pear-shaped quickly, when they aren't). In creating powerful individuals to throw into the worst of the fighting, they will end up influential, whether they were intended to be or not; they won't just be cannon fodder. It's important to keep such figures under tight control, either by strong ties of loyalty (something that Winter inherently erodes), or by some form of coercion (something that gives them incentive to betray you at a key moment, especially given how reliant she would be on such a strong force).

Regarding the Undead, I... Guess she could go raiding in Procer for bodies, but I think that would have the same issues that Bonfire did. Killing the refugees would create bodies, but they still need to be armed – even if they're just fodder, they're not going to accomplish anything without either swords or strong claws.

I agree that she does have other options, but I don't think you give proper weight to the value of involving an outside force – as it stands, her enemies are able to focus their attention on her, and know that if they kill her, they (functionally) end the war. By introducing the Dead King (had negotiations worked) or the Drow, she presents a threat that won't go away with her, that will split Malicia's attention. Furthermore, I believe you exaggerate the dangers of this plan – the Drow are considered irrelevant to society at large for a reason. Assuming Cat doesn't die down there (and we know she won't), she's not risking much.

Mostly, though, I objected to you suggesting that her only issues with these plans were moral concerns, when there are practical objections that can be raised.

RanVor

Stories are so integral to the functioning of Guideverse that any argument specifically excluding them is flawed by default.

GuidingMoonlight

Cat and Black don't care about it why should I? Well, they say they care but then go and do it anyway.

RanVor

If you can provide examples of situations where ignoring the narrative worked out alright for them, sure. Because

I don't remember any. I do, however, remember plenty of the opposite.

GuidingMoonlight

Ok, then.

Cat, destroy horcrux of your archenemy, or she will come back in most inconvenient time.

Nope, Akua now helpful loyal servant.

Black, don't go alone with your squire in Castle of her archenemy. It's suicide by narrative.

Nope, he literally won everything.

Cat, don't go after powerboosts. They will betray you in most inconvenient time.

Nope. She became a half-fae winter queen.

Black, don't make plans revolving around single point of failure when fighting heroes. Hero will foil it.

Nope, dropped a stone on Cavalry charge led by hero while riding a dragon.

It's just most recent I remember. All of them were described in story as Bad idea for villains.

RanVor

Example #1: The story is far from over and Akua will have plenty of opportunities to come back in the future, but it's not completely wrong. I'll grant you half a point for that.

Example #2: Funny that you mention it, I intended to use the exact same situation as a counterpoint because it's a testament to how good Black is at not ignoring the stories. The Second Llesse was Akua's story, not his. By expertly manipulating the narrative, he forced the Diabolist into a scenario that just had to backfire on her. By setting up his defeat, he used Akua's own victory to destroy her.

Example #3: Cat didn't go after power. It was forced upon her. That is a) a completely different story, and b) hell-bent on fucking her over as soon as possible. She knows it and tries not to rely on it unless she has no other choice.

Example #4: It has been established that the Heavens can only grant so many auto-wins in a short span of time without giving the Hellgods an opening to exploit. Before going on his little dragon-induced flight, Black has ensured that the Crusaders' Heroic Victory was wasted on something totally insignificant, again by observing the narrative and planning around it.

Your score: 0,5 out of 4 points.

Congratulations, the only thing you've proved is that you haven't been paying attention.

GuidingMoonlight

NO, my pride! i am slain! I would never dare to question things you like again!

1) We had Akua POW. She genuinely wants to help Cat and sees her as Empress.

2) "By expertly manipulating narative" offscreen. He did it offscreen. Akua captured Assassin, because the Narative somehow mistaken Black with Assassin. Black, somehow, walked undetected through Villain Sit of Power. then he, somehow, managed to find and capture protected and prepared VIP who based on Akua POW was most powerful not named mage. And Akua didnt notice him anyway, somehow. How did he do it? Hell if i know, i didnt see it.

3) Yees, because "power granted by eldritch abomintaion" is so much better story... And it fucked her so much that she won Arcadian war by non stop using it. Oh and when Akua caught her by scaffolds around her soul, she used this power to escape not only captivity but the "Knight-Squire" patern. Oh and she also became Queen of winter after that. What a curse.

But Cat is responsible Villain and only uses this curse if absolutely necessary, i.e. everytime she needs something.

Anyway, Cat willingly and intentionally went after winter title to get leverage in winter court. Remeber the Duke of Violent Squalls?

"To shut down Winter's invasion of Marchford," Adjutant said.

"Winter can't invade Marchford if Marchford is part of Winter," I murmured.

4) Oh right, sorry, i misread. I thought Black has always said that "Heavens are dirty cheaters who cheat and the only way to win is by not giving them any openings". You opened my eyes! now i see that he actually said "When facing a hero/crusade on a break of defeat go for standart villain escape with monologue and imidiately follow it by something even more dramatic. They will never see it coming".

to be fair i liked everything before Dragon. Slow fighting retreat, multiple landslides, Black not involving himself to exclude the Narative etc. If you forget about Augur and dont think about why she didnt predict it all, it was pretty soild strategy.

Anyway, how can i cash out my points? every bit helps, you know.

Darth.

>All roads lead to Tvarigu

Silly Sve. Such an ignoramus. All roads lead to Rome

TeK

You meant Miez, the centre of Miezian Empire.

Yotz

Miezian Ministry of ██████ is in approve of the message.

Yotz

...ahem

*Look into the silver eyes –
In the mist of dark forgotten times.*

Summon up the beast of flame,
Unchain the warlord, call her name!

Children of the Night –
Let her reign and bear your plight!
And save you from the day
In which you will be slain!

The Queen will rule with iron hand,
Through blood – she'll repossess the land.

From the dungeon to the throne –
From the darkness freedom has been born!

*Soldiers of unholy empire,
Hail the Moonless Night! – the silver eyes foresees end of light.
Soldiers of unholy empire,
Hail the Moonless Night! – make the enemy crawl!
Soldiers of unholy empire,
Let her rule, the raging one!
Into dawning Night
The time of fear will die...*

TeK

Rythm is mighty shaken. Is this a poem or a song?

I kinda made a more consistent verdion, rythm-wise at least, but may be I'm wrong. Hod you sing this?

Btw, good job as always.

Yotz

*//with eyes cast down//
Well, that's a filk, technically.
As for how to sing it*

Yotz

Also, speaking of something Night-themed, less rhythm-shaken, and more... ahem... "poem"-like – although distinctly less plot related and/or sensical...

Well, to cut blatant attempts at false modesty short – here's one more for you.

...and anyone else who had misfortune to read it, I suppose.

*'Tis not the towers – silhouettes of ships:
Their sails, and flags, and masts with broken tips –
Dark blots on canvas dark and darker still.
And yet they brighter than the starry swirl.*

*The world asleep. We stepped on deck of ferry-boat.
Reigns silence. Ferry heaves and rolls from side to side.
And like a clap of sudden thunder oar's gentle slide Caressing waves, and as if only echo from the depths is keeping us afloat.*

TeK

An interesting take on providence, Cat. I wonder if there is a similar Hero who avoid free power ups from Fate. I mean, ot's kinda obvious in hindsight that taking hand-outs from both Above and Below makes you into Stupid X. Would be interesying to see Hero turn down the golden luck so that there would not be any strings attached. Also, kimda wondering something. If help from Above brainwash you, and help from Below zombify you, how are they any different, exactly? There's a quote from the very first chapter, that some Gods sought to guide, and some to rule. But they both kinda do it. So what if the Side is actually anyone who has anything to do with Narrative, and the other Side is losing their wager badly? Wait, what if there are actually two worlds, one where everything is railroaded by gods, and another where they never intervene? Am I thinking too much? I'm thinking too much...

By the way, if I understand correctly, the Night is basically Sve's MANTLE, and I doubt those were chosen randomly (well not doubt, more like hope they're not). It's pretty obvious that she's the one who kickstarted the whole Tenets of the Night thing, so, crazy theory, probably wrong, but it'd be funny if the whole "Tenets" is a socio-cultural experiment powered by Sve. She said so herself, Tenets would hold or they wouldn't. It's a hypertrophied Darwin socionomics ad absurdum. She's a scientist! An evil one, probably.

Someguy

Hooray for Mad Social Science?

Yotz

Hip hip hooray!

Gunslinger

Not to mention that her mantle is constantly growing. It's fucked up darwinism but one that will ultimately make her immortal

shieldredblog

IS her mantle actually growing? It seems to me the Drow are failing, they spend all their time killing each other and getting massacred by The Hidden Horror, Emerald Bloom and Dwarves.

Unless it doesn't diminish, only grows, it should be getting smaller.

Darkening

It seems like anything the drow learns themselves gets added to the Night that they leave behind when they die, as mentioned in Cat's queries about drow learning blacksmithing or construction and getting killed for the knowledge. So yeah, the Night is constantly growing anytime they learn something for themselves or kill someone from one of the other races to add to it. Unless it disappears after a corpse after a while if it goes unclaimed, I can't see it diminishing in total, though it might end up spread thin through the hordes of drow. Though I suppose someone could kill a bunch of drow and burn/hide the bodies and maybe prevent the Night from being reclaimed. Which is sorta what the dwarves tried here, though they should blown the cavern or something to make the bodies inaccessible.

shieldredblog

The way I see it, the difference when it comes to the God, is that those Above shut down human growth hard, with morals and religious reasoning as well as handing out crutches instead of real and personal growth or power to heroes.

Those Below, allow the potential for growth and freedom, but do not actually encourage it. They don't want mortals to ascend or glimpse beyond the veil or whatever, they just think it should be possible. So they hand out real power and potential but never for free and with downsides that are basically traps.

Like how heroes are mortal but revivable, while villains are technically ageless but are cursed with 'opposition in all things.'

Neshamah proves its possible to leverage villainous power into true lasting power, its just really really hard on purpose and that's before the bard intervenes.

crysjal

I think that the issue with below is that people who were empowered previously "went mad with power" and the freedom it granted. This resulting is "bad" or evil events occurring resulting in the narrative that exists surrounding Evil. Good, representing order and a lack of choice evolved narratively aswell. I try to put aside the concept of "Good" and "Evil" for the purposes of this because in this universe they mean the sides of Order/control and Chaos/free will that the gods above and below represent.

Snowfire1224

I remember someone mentioning they thought Cat was being influenced by The Grey Pilgrim's redemption plot and I think they might be right after reading this chapter. I mean Cat has always had standards- it's what seperates her from Akua as well as Black- but she's kind of being ridiculous for being mad at the dwarves for their tactics. I can understand her being mad at Akua for murdering a city, but the Drow are the Drow, they probably stab each other in the backs all the time and think nothing of it.

TeK

How dare she condemn slaughtering of a sentient beings, who are already are viewed like a cattle by their own kind?

Yotz

Indeed – how preposterous!

Snowfire1224

Point taken, but I was trying to say was that she seems to be reacting stronger about it than she usually would, not that she should condone what happened to them.

1queenofblades1

Agreed. But I think on the whole it's a good thing. Cat has always been about breaking stories; I doubt she's going to die, if anything in Book 5, if the dwarves are the "final enemy", she'll have the Providence of the Heavens and the Powers of the Hell Gods on her side (through Winter)....provided of course that she hasn't ascended and become a full-on Goddess herself by then.

Also; remember how in the "Death to Malicia!" arc, Akua was siphoning off the Principle Alienation from Cat so she could draw on Winter deeply and not start spouting monologues? You'd think Cat would catch on that the larger Winter Court she has, the more she can draw on Winter while the others siphon off and share the Principle Alienation between themselves giving her not just a powerful Inner Circle of....Winter Soldiers (I'm sorry, I had to) but also a way to really cut loose with Winter Power and show Creation why you don't mess with Catherine Foundling.

Because the Night is dark and full of terrors

Yotz

Step 1: Provoke Gnomes to attack Dwarves.

Step 1: Be anywhere else.

---

Dwarves live under the most of Calernia, there's not enough of "anywhere else" to hide from the fallout.

Yotz

I hear your counterpoint, and raise you one Serenity.

Darkening

I suppose there is her whole, "the people are important, not the place/government" thing, which could lead to her evacuating Callow to somewhere not so... strategically inconvenient for them to be at peace. But going to Actual Hell where an ancient evil lich can reshape reality to his whim is not the most comforting alternative.

Yotz

That indeed so – but what prevents Cat from aping DK's achievement and carving a personal piece of Hell for her and her own?

Though, I should probably use "who" instead of "what"...

On the other hoof – evacuating Callow...

Novice

"almost like the darkness had been licking my hand. Like it recognizes something larger and meaner, and tries to make friends."

Did...did Cat just compared the murderous, self-destructive, eldritch Night to a puppy? That's kinda cute?

crysjal

She compared it to an animal or beast of some sort, like her Name, Squire felt to her. It's a good way to foreshadow the night being a Name or Aspect of some sort.

Allafterme

Implications of grandfather Neshamah had a more "constructive" dialog with Cat than mere excuse is interesting. Also, Pricks Below strikes again...

Gunslinger

Well the dwarf are scary. Reminds me of the bondmages. Kill one of them and they'll come after you with vengeance. This might explain why Black bought out the dwarf mercenaries in the Callowan rebellion rather than fight them

RanVor

You mean the ones from The Lies of Locke Lamora? I'm reading this book right now, and it's good.

Cayle

She makes good points, I'm still disappointed. Noticed everyone's quoting not consuming Energy fields bigger than their head but forgetting that Catherine's head is as big or small as she wants it to be.

Naeddyr

Please no, Catherine's head is big enough as it is!

Darkening

I wonder when she'll realize that she can make herself taller now since she's always complaining about it.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Never has catching up with something felt so bad. Now I have to wait like everyone else.

Snowfire1224

You're not alone.

DroughtBringer

Horrible point to catch up... as is almost everywhere in the guide. I still remember when I caught up...

At least we have three chapters a week now! See you at the start of the next chapter!

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Which days were it again? I know Monday.

RanVor

Monday, Wednesday and Friday.

kinigget

monday, wednesday, and friday

RanVor

At least I was lucky enough to catch up at the very beginning of this book. It would really suck otherwise.

Euodiachloris

Frankly, I'm all for the "nah – I'll watch what the energy field does to the local, first, thanks" approach. It's the Evil-Lyn approach to seeing whether others grow tentacles or turn to goop before she tries to eat that energy field herself – after extracting it from their corpses or pain-wracked and very chained-up live selves, of course.

Euodiachloris

Forgot to include "testing to see if the awesome cosmic power goes to their heads so badly they forget how to toast sandwiches without a multi-step plan involving kidnapping a baby dragon, pillaging a farm and framing the baker to ‘encourage’ the blacksmith to help in reprisal”. Because she never was into the resulting suicide- by-local-heroes consequences of that. ;P

soma

I see people complaining about Cat making justifications or caring about things. In my opinion when people are complaining about these things they are confusing wants and desires for justifications, and missing that a truly dangerous villain in many stories cares deeply about things that are reasonable to care about. People follow these types of villains because it is reasonable to follow them, to fight for them, to visit evil upon others on their behalf.

The Necessary Evil is so dangerous because it is needed by someone. Cat is a necessary evil for Callowans; Callowans would be subjugated by Praes or Procer without her. Her story arc is based on becoming this and using this to force her goals onto others. Look at her starting motivations for joining the legions. She’s become, and will continue to become, a necessary evil for others as well, seeing as that is her modus operandi.

As for why this isn’t a justification or related to justifying actions, being a necessary evil is how others view her (forced to, or otherwise), not how she’s justifying her actions. She truly has no high and mighty justifications. She simply has something she wants. Callow free, able to a place to foster humanity and compassion, and no longer a killing field where her people bleed for all eternity. Those aren’t justifications, those are goals. She took up evil because she needed to in order to get what she wanted. Want doesn’t justify evil and make it right. Wanting things that could be considered good does not justify the deaths of hundreds of thousands. In some (or all) cases Justice may simply not exist. No scale can ever be righted for the dead.

The danger of Cat is that what she wants could be considered justifications by some, though she clearly doesn’t see her wants and desires that way, and her goals draw people to her. I think that confuses people because they think the things Cat wants are justifications rather than things Cat wishes to impose on the world. They see the things Cat wants as good and so mistake them for justifications. They ignore the cost of those good things, the horrors visited upon others in pursuit of those things. Basically, the reason Cat is a villain is she can’t justify the cost, doing horrible things to other people, for a hopefully better outcome, but she’s going to do it anyway because she’s damn well going to get what she wants. A hero ignores the cost and says they’re right, good and justified.

tl;dr Cat is a villain, or evil, in this story framework created by the gods because she’ll do anything, justified or not, to ultimately get what she wants, though her wants are unorthodox for a villain. A hero, in this story, wouldn't do something they couldn't justify to themselves or the gods above, though they might take horrendous actions by refusing to truly acknowledge the cost.

Or, well, that's like my interpretation for now, man.

Xinci

A touch saddened by the Gods Below in this scene. They were a bit...disappointing? This is one of the first real mentionings of preparations by them in the story directly(as in planned effect on the story). So to compare the Gods Above monitor the flow through providence, mold and grow the heroes to create greater pawns/pieces to effect various bits of the geography/topography of reality as they see all possible timelines and decisions. As such when they cannot effect a situation they should be winning/attempting to win in some other way. Thus their orderly procession of societies for various roles are/were gradually improving over time, as mentioned by the bard herself on both bits. They improve you if you let them, make you better. Along with her mentioning of how the plan is gradually working. Below however manipulate the setting more than the narrative, they are the cause of Praes, The Chain of Hunger, etc. They manipulate through a more Darwinian approach, that which can win through all the various societies and environments they set up is obviously the answer(well possibly that doesn't feel quite right as a answer sequence). Though that doesn't seem to be an overall answer for that equally a win by their book, because Ranger seems to be used by both sides to test for weakness in various powers and she is highly adaptive. Then again the fact that she can do so through have a Refuge, may point towards Catherine's solution, given she needs some kind of force to get her outside the game or at least provide a solution for her people through her actions before her particular game board is flipped. Anyway this felt a bit heavy handed for people who could assumably see so far ahead, though maybe Cat was just unexpectedly genre savvy for them this time?

Unmaker

I am thinking both sides (Above and Below) are used to dealing with a different type of person. I am sure there are exceptions, but in general, heroes don't turn down gifts from Above. Villians given a gift from Below will try to improve it, leverage it, bargain to lower the side effects, move the side effects to victims, give the gift to someone they control, etc., but even then they will rarely turn it down. Black is one of the first to flat-out subvert story elements. I suspect both Above and Below have yet to up their general game to his level.

---

Chapter 55: Outskirts

"Over the month I spent in Atalante I witnessed no fewer than two hundred debates take place under the gaze of the pale statues of the Temple of Manifold Truths, for the people of the city delight in such exercises of rhetoric as those of Stygia delight in bloodsport. The subjects varied from the purpose of mankind to the proper shape of apples, though the true wonder of the place was that I do not believe a single speaker left the Temple believing they had been wrong."

– Extract from 'Horrors and Wonders', famed travelogue of Anabas the Ashuran

I'd come across more than my fair share of impressive fortifications, over the years. Summerholm, the river-straddling Gate of the East. Liesse, whose walls had been old and half-abandoned yet still holding sorcery powerful enough to give pause to the full might of the Summer Court. Ater, the Dread Empire's own capital, with towering walls and massive gates that had held strong under the Tower's shadow for millennia. Keter, Crown of the Dead, a haunting spire of rock beholden to no laws but the Dead King's that had turned back crusade after crusade. This, though? This was laughable. There were fortifications in northern Callow, a region that had not known the touch of war for a hundred years before Procer created the passage, that were greater than this. When Ivah had called the 'fortress' at the edge of Kodrog territory a ring of stones, I'd thought it half-poetry. Daoine and the eastern stretches of Callow boasted old fortifications called the same thing, ancient broken-down forts used in wars that predated the unification of the kingdom and peace with the Deaoraithe. Many of them had been made into the heart of small towns and villages, the hill-forts used as a guild hall or minor noble's seat. What I was looking at right now was not that: it was a literal ring of stones.

A few narrow tunnels had led us out of the butcher's yard and into what had once been the lands of the Kodrog, our first approach into another large cavern almost intimidating. There were no corpses to be found, but thrice we came across trails of blood on the stone where dead drow had been dragged. The way into the great cavern was through an angle slope, narrow as the tunnel that had led us there, and part of me noted that this was a natural chokepoint. Easily defendable with a company of crossbowmen and some half-way decent infantry. The ancient drow apparently agreed, for mere feet beyond the end of the slope the ring of stones stood. The sight of it had me raising an eyebrow in skepticism. It wasn't indefensible, really. The slabs of granite making a loose circle of upright stones could serve as a curtain wall of sorts. Or they would have been able to, without the large gap in the slabs just to the side. Anyone could just... walk right in. That wasn't a fortification so much as a decoration. The dwarves had apparently been of the same opinion, because they'd wasted no time filling it with corpses.

I'd had dinner with Baroness Anne Kendal, after ascending to the throne, and over pheasant she'd praised me for how quickly I'd reacted to Akua unleashing devils at First Liesse. Said that most would have been stricken with terror, and that my swift decision to 'conscript' everyone in the city had saved dozens of thousands of lives. I'd not quite had the heart to tell her by then I'd bared blades at things scarier than mere devils. When I came knocking at the gates of Liesse with the Fifteenth, even my legionaries no longer flinched in the face of the hosts of Hell. Masego had called it horror fatigue. The way some people beheld so much terror their standards shifted and sights that would have once horrified them grew mundane. It was apparently a common phenomenon among Praesi sorcerers. On occasion it led to diseases of the mind, he'd noted, when mages witnessed so many terrors that it was the mundane matters of the rest of the world that grew eldritch to their eyes. I wondered if I was inching towards that, one slaughtering yard at a time, because the aftermath of brutality no longer stirred any great feeling in me.

Most the corpses in the fort had not been slain there. There were tracks leading to tall piles beneath the stones, and even taller ones inside the circle. If there had been marks of fighting there, they were now buried in death. I heard Archer come towards me as I stood a handful of feet from the piled dead within the embrace of raised stones.

"The trail leads north," Indrani said.

I nodded.

"Did it betray anything about their numbers?" I asked.

"Hundreds, at least," she shrugged. "Hard to tell the difference between those and thousands on stone grounds. There's tracks though, from carts or something else on wheels. Heavy things, I'm pretty sure even the wheels are metal."

My fingers clenched, then unclenched. It had always helped me think, but there was too little to go on here to make any real deductions. It might be carts to carry whatever they'd come for back to the Kingdom Under. They could be supply wagons. They could be machines of war, as Ivah had said the dwarves sometimes used to slay the Mighty. Hells, it could be all of that. We wouldn't know for sure unless we took a look with our own eyes, and that struck me as a bad idea for all sorts of reasons. I glanced at Indrani.

"Do we know what's north?" I said.

"Ivah says it's the core territories of the Kodrog," she replied. "We're still in the outskirts of the outer rings. I'll be at least a few days of travel before we reach the first ruins."

Piecing together the lay of the Everdark from what my guide was very willing to share had been difficult, even though Ivah was trying its best. The drow considered too many things to be self-evident to be a proper informant. The outer rings, as far as I could tell, were the drow territories outside the loose web of underground cities that had once made up their empire. Those were the harshest battlegrounds of their people, and a gathering place for the strongest Sigils and cabals. The inner ring, singular, was vaguer in what it covered. From context, it seemed to mean all the territories between the old cities. There the tribes that'd been forced out of the cities fought against each other, murdering their way to enough power to try to get a foot in a city again. The cities were where the strongest of the Mighty gathered, Ivah had said, but the inner ring was where a Sigil could be wiped out in a night. Those that fled that underground sea of carnage eked out a living in the outer rings, but pickings were sparse out here. It was uncommon for a Sigil that bolted to the outskirts to make a comeback, even if they bided their time for a few decades.

Holy Tvarigu was at the centre of the madness, the handful of paths leading to it guarded by powerful Sigils who were said to rival those of the cities. We'd need to gather strength and support, before trying those.

"There's one last thing," Indrani said. "I found black blood."

My eyes narrowed. That meant a Mighty. Ivah had been clear that the more Night a drow held, the deeper the changes to their body. I had no reason to distrust that: after reaping the harvest of the cavern it had visibly changed.

"Show me," I said.

"Sure," she said. "It's not far. Want to grab our favourite scavenger in case there's a survivor?"

"Might be for the best," I agreed.

And still she did not move. I cocked an eyebrow.

"Archer?"

Her lips thinned.

"You all right, Cat?" she asked. "You've been looking at dead bodies for a while. And not that long ago you were hearing voices."

"Just the one," I sighed. "And that was the Priestess of Night, I'm sure of it."

"I'm sure you believe that," Indrani delicately said.

"I'm not quite that far gone," I reassured her. "Anyways, I'm not going morbid on you. I was actually wondering why they're not burning the bodies. Wouldn't it make more sense?"

"Not a lot of firewood down here," she replied. "And you need that or oil to get a good pyre started."

"I really doubt the dwarves ready to commit mass slaughter without tallying proper supplies," I said. "If they're really killing everyone to make sure there can be no harvest, it'd be logical to burn the dead. Can't claim Night from ashes, I don't think."

"If they're as prepared as you say, they'll have a reason for it," Indrani pointed out. "I try not to spend too much time figuring out why dwarves do what dwarves do. You'll only end up with a headache and an empty purse by trying."

"We're missing something," I told her. "I'm not gonna go digging in corpses to find out – we don't have the time to spare – but it's worth asking questions."

"Somehow I doubt our little band of murderers is going to have a good explanation for you," she said, rolling her eyes. "Come on, let's grab our minion. We're wasting daylight, even if we can't see it."

The rest of our company wasn't far. I'd learned why the drow were so afraid of coming close to the corpses, after a little chat with Ivah. It'd said it wasn't the death that scared most of them. It was all the Night that waited there to be taken. By beating them down, we'd established ourselves as higher on the pecking order. Drow who eyed Night ripe for harvest when stronger drow were around tended to end up killed just to make sure there'd be no trouble. Diabolist was keeping an eye on the prisoners, but Ivah was visibly itching to have a look at the corpses. It didn't consider itself strong enough to just harvest the Night no matter what we said, then. Good. As long as it was afraid of us, it'd uphold its part of the bargain with no qualms.

"Ivah," I called out. "With us. Archer has found a Mighty's blood trail."

"I follow, Queen," the silver-eyed creature smoothly replied.

Its eyes were brighter, now, but that was the least of the changes. Where before it had been stooped by days of travel with limited supplies and little sleep, now its back was ramrod straight and its stride had grown assured. The skin was still pale grey, but now and then from the corner of my eyes I could have sworn I saw small arcane patterns of Night shine on its bare arms. I suspected there'd been other changes less obvious, though it was hard to gauge something like senses and reflexes without actually testing them. The rest of the cavern beyond the ring of stones was a great deal less bloody. There were trails and footsteps on the dust and dirt, but little else. A handful of leather tents and fire pits skirted the edge of the walls, not enough to shelter more than a few hundred drow. There was at least twice that in dead inside the fort, which meant the corpses had likely been gathered from other tunnels and caverns. Three passages out could be found. Two heading north, side-to-side, and one towards the east. It was that last one Indrani led us towards.

Unlike the last stretch of tunnels out of the Gloom, these were not carved or sculpted. Apparently even when the realm of the drow had still been worth such a name, this had been considered the edge of nowhere. We passed through a small cave half-filled by ponds of water, though they'd all been fouled by dirt and blood, and only found what Indrani had mentioned after another stretch of winding tunnel. There was a naked body, which she hadn't mentioned, but it was easy to see why. It was a ruined wisp of a cadaver: the head had been pulped, but the rest was a ruin without needing wounding. It looked like it'd been exsanguinated, drained of all fluids and insides until all that was left was paper-thin grey skin and hollow bones. In other news, drow did have genitalia no matter how they called themselves: this one had a cock, though it was as much a shrivelled husk as the rest of it. Black blood and brain fluids formed a blasphemous halo around the wreck of the head, but that wasn't the interesting part. From the body another trail came. There were bits of blood in it, but also some sort of transparent fluid gone dry. A sticky, stinking trail led from the corpse deeper into the passage ahead.

"Another twenty feet of crawling, then whatever came out got on its feet," Indrani said. "From there it's just drip. Haven't touched the body yet, figured you'd want the honours."

"Kind of you," I drily said. "Ivah, anything to say?"

"This is not known to me," the drow admitted. "Though none but Mighty would have blood so dark."

Less than helpful. I knelt by the body, gingerly raising it. Immediately my eyebrows climbed up. The entire back was messed up, like something had ripped its way out forcefully. Almost no blood, though. At a guess, whatever had left the trail was responsible.

"Looks like our friend here had one last trick up their sleeve," I said. "Ivah, you mentioned something called the Secret of Many Lives to me once. Would this be what it looks like in action?"

"I have never witnessed this with my own eyes," the drow said. "Only heard rumours. Yet if this is true, we look upon the body of Mighty Kodrog. Or one who slew them and claimed the whispers."

"Let's find out," I grimly said.

I left the body there. There was no Night in it, and I wasn't sure I should let Ivah harvest it even if there was. We set out again, though the trip was amusingly short. Maybe sixty feet further, after the trail of dried fluids had ended, another corpse was waiting. Its head had been pulped as well. There was another trail, and we didn't stop to check the body before following this time. Apparently the dwarves hunting Kodrog has lost patience, because when we found the next body not even twenty feet further around a corner it was thoroughly demolished. No flesh or bone had been left untouched, the remains more smear than corpse. And still a trail crawled away from it. I heard a rasping breath, further ahead. Had the hunters missed the last rebirth?

"There's something still breathing," I announced, and pressed on at a pace.

Indrani snorted.

"Yeah, not surprised," she said. "Look at the fluids, Cat. It didn't crawl away, it was dragged."

Honestly the trail looked to me exactly like the others, but she was the tracker and I was the city girl. Regardless, we did not make the survivor wait long. I almost winced at the sight, after we stumbled across it. This particular body was no husk like the others, though it might wish otherwise. The naked drow had been nailed to the tunnels' wall with iron spikes through the shoulders and calves, limbs flopping listlessly. The drow's eyes were closed, but I could hear it breathe just fine. It was still rather improbably alive. Ivah breathed in sharply, and earned a curious look for it.

"This is Mighty Kodrog itself," my guide said. "The wound splitting the lip in half, it is famed. The blade of the Mighty Soln caused it."

There was a rather nasty scar and chunk of missing flesh parting the drow's lower lip in half. More interesting were the night-invisible patterns of Night covered Kodrog's face, surrounding the closed eyes like they were some sort of spider web. It looked like a tattoo of arcane symbols I was unfamiliar with, though a very faint one. Apparently the repeated rebirths had weakened the Mighty considerably.

"It's unconscious," I said. "Let's drag it back to camp, see if we can wake it up there."

"You're going to have to handle the spikes," Indrani said. "That's solid rock they were hammered into. Not sure I could pull them out."

I grimaced but got to work. The difficult part was doing it carefully enough I wouldn't rip up Kodrog's body, not taking them out, and greyish blood began pouring out the moment they were removed. No longer black, huh. Someone had had a rough week. I froze the wounds shut, which was about as much as I knew of healing, and hoisted the drow over my shoulder when it became clear the pain wasn't enough to wake it up. Ivah was looking at me carrying a Mighty like a bag of potatoes like it didn't know whether it should be amused or appalled. The walk back was quicker, though I was careful not to jostle the goods. In part because I didn't want to worsen the bleeding, in part because when strangers dangled their dangly parts against me I preferred fewer gaping wounds being involved. A rustle when through the prisoners when we returned bearing our newest addition, a few whispered words in Crepuscular being traded. Kodrog was the only word I recognized. I lowered said burden to the floor carefully and smiled at Akua, who'd silently approached.

"I've got a surprise for you," I cheerfully said.

"Joy," Diabolist drawled. "More half-dead drow. My favourite. I expect you want me to attend to it?"

"If anyone's going to know what happened here, it's that one," I said. "I need it capable of talking."

"That much I can promise," the shade noted. "How long it will remain that way is more chancy a matter."

"Do what you can," I said.

"Ugh, does that leave me on guard duty?" Indrani asked. "Because that's really tedious. You won't even let me make them fight."

"I'm sure Ivah can inform them of the consequences of acting out," I said, casting an eye at said drow.

It nodded slowly.

"Find me in what direction the dwarves went," I told Archer. "Try to find out numbers, or anything more than we have. If you run into any of them..."

"Stay out of sight, head back immediately," she said. "I've got it. How long you giving me?"

I chewed my lip.

"We'll need a while for the interrogation," I said, watching Akua begin to remove the ice I'd shut the wounds with. "We might as well make camp here. A few hours, at least, but careful not to get lost."

"I never once in my life got lost," Indrani assured me.

"Last month you told me you'd been sober your whole life," I noted. "You really should start picking better lies."

"That sounds like a horrible way to live," Indrani said.

I rolled my eyes.

"Just don't get killed," I said. "Or start another war. Gods know we already have a net surplus of those, and the year's not even over."

She waved me away in a less than reassuring gesture, but she adjusted her bow against her shoulder and got moving towards the north-leading passages. She might give me backtalk the way sparrows flew, but I knew I could trust her to pull through when I needed her. I had few worries about her reconnaissance.

"Now would be a good time to inform your fellows we're camping," I told Ivah. "They're free to scavenge tents and necessities, though they are not to touch the Night."

"As you say, Queen," the drow nodded.

I watched it walk over to the others, then returned my attention to Akua. I dropped down next to the body in a seat, watching her work Winter into dying flesh. There was Night in this one, though unlike the one in the corpses it was not reaching for me. Neither was it hostile, though. It was just there. A tool in someone's hand, firmly grasped.

"How's it looking?" I asked.

"More than halfway into the grave," Diabolist said. "Which eases my work a great deal."

I didn't need to ask her why. What instincts my mantle had granted me made me aware that Winter held dominion over death and decay, among other things. I'd dabbled in necromancy as the Squire, but I remained an amateur at the art. When Akua had ridden my body, she'd raised an army of dead Procerans without even using a ritual.

"It's a recurring pattern, with you," the shade said. "That you use and demand others use powers in way that seem ill-suited to them."

"Power's a tool," I said, repeating someone else's words. "The only limit to its use is your own cleverness."

"Spare me the Carrion Lord's lessons, if you would," Akua said. "I have heard them before. My point stands. Even as the Squire your use of your limited necromantic abilities was admittedly inspired. Never before had I seen someone kill their own flesh to better wield it."

"Desperation is a sharp teacher," I grunted.

"So it is," Diabolist mildly said. "Still, you extend this philosophy beyond the boundaries I expected."

I scoffed.

"How's that?"

"This entire enterprise, dearest," Akua said. "To be frank, I am still somewhat at a loss as to why we now tread the passages of the Everdark."

"You were there when the decision was made," I reminded her. "I _"

"Need an army, yes," she interrupted. "Surely that is not all of it? I surmised this to be the excuse you gave to mask deeper purpose."

"I don't lie when holding council with the Woe, Akua," I said. "Even when you're there."

Scarlet eyes considered me skeptically.

"Then you truly came to gather a host of drow?" she said. "That seems ill-advised."

I frowned at the casual dismissal. Still, I'd let her out of the box for a reason. She had a better grasp on the corridors of power than any of the Woe, and if she had something to say it was worth hearing. Not necessarily heeding, but at the very least listening to.

"You're aware of our military situation," I said.

"I am, to an extent," she agreed. "The Battle of the Camps thinned the ranks overmuch, which led you to seek the Dead King in the first place. There was need for the hosts of Procer to be sent elsewhere and bled. This has already been achieved, Catherine, by the Empress' own pact."

"Look deeper," I said. "What's the thing that keeps Callow afloat?"

"Farming," she replied without missing a beat. "I do not disagree with you on the implication, my dear. Your kingdom has weathered a large-scale rebellion, the invasion of the Courts and my own works. If the Army of Callow recruits as heavily as it must to be more than a border garrison, there will be lack of field hands come harvest. Which would have consequences more disastrous in Callow than most realms, admittedly, as it boasts little but fertile fields."

My own works, she'd said. Almost nonchalantly. Three words for over a hundred thousand souls. The urge was there to simply tear her in half. Pop her head with a squeeze of my fingers, have Winter itself devour her from the inside. I pulsed with the need of it. And you feared I might grow attached, Vivienne, I thought. That I might come to see her as more than the useful devil on my shoulder. I mastered myself, kept the flare of rage away from my face. Not even a slight cooling of the air betrayed it. I'd learned the ways of my mantle well. It would not do to punish her for this, no. Best she keep speaking those words, those barbed reminders of who it was I had murdered into my service.

"Then you know why I need another force on the field," I said. "One that can take the losses I can't afford."

"There are others you might have sought," Akua noted. "Lord Black still fields legions, and his fondness for you is well-known."

"Black's running a game in Procer," I said. "I don't know what it is yet, because I don't know what he's really after. If he intended to depose Malicia, his opening was just after Second Liesse. He went to the Vales instead, prepared for the crusade. He had most of a year, Diabolist. To plan and plot. It's not happenstance that the Vales were collapsed and he's wandering the heartlands of the Principate. He's trying to accomplish something. The Gods only know what it is, if even that. I'm not getting in the middle of that mess without a very good reason."

"You have ties to the sole Court of Arcadia," Diabolist noted. "Bargain might have been struck there."

"You think that's better than the drow?" I snorted. "Last time I went for a spin with the King of Winter, I got taken for a ride. I doubt I've learned enough in the last year to turn that around, and you can be sure that any pact made with Arcadia will result in the fae having a permanent foothold on Creation. I might as well start calling on fucking demons – those are easier to put away after you let them loose.”

“The Dread Empire-”

“Was a possibility I considered,” I interrupted flatly. “Of course, to get my hands on any of its armies I’d need to climb the Tower and make it stick. Which means I’ll likely have to assault a few of the most heavily fortified cities on the continent with my already mangled forces. Possibly fight Malicia’s loyalist Legions as well. Losses are certain, and even if I win I inherit a mess. Ashur’s still sacking the coasts, Akua. I can’t call myself Empress and just... leave them to it. Not to mention the dangers inherent to killing the person that let the Dead King out. Could mean he has to retreat, which would fuck over a now even more wounded Callow. We’d have to go back and negotiate, assuming he’s even willing. Or it could mean he’s loose with absolutely no leash on him.”

“I believe you underestimate the amount of support a bid for the Tower would find in the Wasteland,” Diabolist said. “There are promises that could see many flock to your banner.”

“Oh, I know all about those kinds of promises,” I murmured. “There are some prices even I balk at paying. I will not wade into a snake pit just to try turning the snakes on my foes, Akua. I have no intention of ever ruling Praes.”

“You may not have a choice,” Diabolist mildly said. “Though I shall let the matter lie. It will come to your door without any need for my advocacy.”

“You should hope not,” I replied. “If Praes is made my problem, I will not be gentle in how I solve it. Should we go over our other options? The League won’t talk with me if the Hierarch won’t, and the man is both mad and stubborn as a mule. The Chain of Hunger cannot be treated with to any real degree, the elves would shoot any envoy of mine on sight and the closest thing the Gigantes have to an ally – Levant – is currently at war with me. You think I’m stalking these fucking tunnels because I want to? I need the men and there is no one else.”

The last sentence came out in a hiss, almost like a wound lanced of pus.

“I understand,” Akua said.

“No, you don’t,” I replied. “I drew a line in the sand, after my coronation. That if all I could accomplish was make a ruin out of Callow, I would melt the godsdamned crown and go into exile. Or walk to the gallows, if that was what it took. The crusade was always going to come, there was nothing I could do about that.

But now, Diabolist, even if my armies win the coming battles the kingdom is fucked. We were already a bad summer away from widespread food shortages, when I left. How do you think it will go if the fields are empty at harvest? Either this works, or I'm done. I capitulate, do whatever is necessary for Hasenbach to offer terms that aren't complete subjugation and kill as many problems as I can before I die."

"You are what keeps this together, Catherine," Akua warned me. "If you abdicate, the kingdom collapses into anarchy. Malicia will likely invade and even the League might be swayed by such a tempting feast. Do you think Callow can weather the Dead King without you?"

"The question isn't 'will it be bad?', " I said. "Of course it'll be awful. Even if I clean up every loose end I can before going, it'll be a shitshow. The question that needs to be asked is 'will it be worse if I'm wearing the crown?'."

"The only reason Callow was more than a waypoint on Cordelia's way to Ater is that your power gave the Principate pause," Diabolist said. "This is... navel-gazing in the worst of ways. Do you think you are responsible for every disaster to plague your homeland?"

"They happened on my watch," I said. "I had a responsibility. If I'd fucking bled you like a pig at Liesse, no matter the consequences to me, a hundred thousand people would be alive today. Winter went after Marchford because it was my demesne. Summer torched a third of the south to match Winter. And the Liesse Rebellion... well, you weren't the only person I should have killed then and let's leave it at that."

"It is absurd to pretend to you did not mitigate the damage inflicted," Akua flatly said. "You dispersed the Courts yourself. To clarify, you drove back forces as older than the First Dawn at the mere cost of a few leagues of burned land. Who else could have brought the invasions to an end at even twice that cost? And let us not pretend to you were the only possible pawn for Winter's king. The Courts did not emerge in Praes, where bargains would have been eagerly taken, or fractious Procer or the squabbling lands of the Dominion. Why, I wonder? It is almost as if Callow was easiest prey, the most vulnerable locale. You ended the Liesse Rebellion on lenient terms, your mere existence enough to soften the stances of both the Carrion Lord and the Empress against those who raised banner against the Tower. Not a matter in which either would otherwise have been prone to so mild a response. Had you not been on the field at Second Liesse, I would very likely have slain your teacher and triumphed. You seem under the misapprehension that the rest of the continent fights over Callow because you bear the crown. That is disingenuous. Callow suffers because it is weak. Because greater powers can afford to make it a tool to expunge their own troubles. The Principate, the Empire, half the heroes that flocked to the Tenth Crusade. Do you truly believe your kingdom, even under a villainous queen, is greater threat to Good and Calernia than the Kingdom of the Dead? Than the Chain of Hunger?"

"There's a balance of power," I said. "The Grey Pilgrim admitted as much."

"Indeed," Akua sneered. "The Principate cannot afford too many powers sworn to Evil at its borders, is it? Yet you could have been made friend, through the right treaties. Can the same be said of the Hidden Horror? Yet is is Callow that was marched upon, and Praes beyond it. Because if the First Prince had called for a crusade against Keter, none would have answered. Because against the Kingdom of the Dead the Principate did not believe it could win, and Callow was weaker."

"You stated the very reason," I grimly smiled. "Against Keter, she did not believe she could win. And so the strategic reality was that a villainous queen in Callow was unacceptable. You're also dismissing the fact that it was your own fucking doomsday fortress, built on a massacre of my countrymen it is worth remembering, that served as the rallying cry for this mess."

"I will not defend what I did," Akua said. "There is nothing defensible about failure, and my means were abhorrent to you. Yet I will remind you that Procer loomed at the gate long before my works took place. I served as an excuse, it is true. And for my sins judge me as you will, for that is your right and privilege as victor. Yet even had you slain me long before, excuse would have been found sooner or later – Praes ruling Callow was no more acceptable than your bearing a crown, after all. You are a justification, Catherine. You are not a motive. At best, you were ancillary to the reasons forces went into motion."

"I could have gone the other way," I said. "I was made an offer, in Liesse. If I'd signed up with the Heavens-"

"You would have been slain, fallen upon by the full roster of the Calamities and your own allies," she said. "The Black Knight, deeming your existence a failed experiment, would have set to ensuring Callow was incapable of rising in rebellion when Procer came calling. I need not remind you of the manner of methodical butchery your teacher is capable of."

"So that's your fine wisdom?" I mocked. "Thousands died under your watch but it's all right, because thousands would have died either way?"

"Yourself and the Woe, the Fifteenth you assembled painstakingly," Akua said. "All of these are the only reason anyone of import on this continent considers Callow worth treating with. Gods Below, Catherine, do you think without your casting a long shadow the Empress would have waited this long to act? That the Carrion Lord would not have excised treason out of your kingdom? The First Prince may claim to despise all you stand for, yet she stills speaks with you. Because you wield power, warrant fear, and this means the land you rule over are more than a subject to squabble over after someone wins the war. Without the might you have assembled, the only Callow that exists is that which other powers allow to exist. Is this the sorrow you mull over late into the night? That your acts, though bloody, have made your homeland actor instead of spoils?"

"You don't know that," I said. "If I'd never taken Callow in hand, heroes could have risen. They have before, with reliability that borders on law."

"The same heroes the Empire repeatedly smothered in the crib for decades before your birth?" Diabolist gently said. "Or perhaps foreign heroes, from the same nations now marching on you."

"It's better to be Proceran vassals than a wasteland, Akua," I tiredly replied. "And despite my best efforts we seem to be headed that way."

"I know few things about your people, and much I thought known has been proven false," the shade said. "Yet how many of them would agree with what you just spoke?"

"A crowd has only one voice, and no wisdom to utter," I quoted. "My people aren't always right, especially when pride is on the line."

"And so now your argument is that you know better," Akua said. "That you should make the choices for them. Yet you deplore having done that very thing. With some defeats to show for it, yet also admirable successes. What brave soul do you happen to use for comparison, then? I am curious what world-shaking sage would have steered Callow unfailingly, had you not been at the helm."

"Asking for whoever would have risen not to have lost the second largest city in Callow is hardly unfair," I barked back.

"You turn blind eye to the realities of the time," Akua noted. "Another Named would not have benefitted from your relationship to the highest tiers of Praesi power. They would have been forced to rebel while under hunt of the Calamities, raising essentially the same army that was crushed by your teacher with perhaps a few additions. Likely, they would have needed to rely on help from the Principate to stay afloat, which would have begun the Tenth Crusade with Callow the midst of a bloody civil war instead of when its borders were garrisoned. It would have been a nonentity at the peace table afterwards. Perhaps I would have been slain by such a replacement, perhaps not. It is arguable at best if the resulting body count would not have been superior, and beyond debate that the destruction would have been more widespread. The Courts of the Fair Folk would then have found that deeply divided and damaged land much easier to make sport of than it was under your aegis, however flawed."

"You don't know any of that," I said. "It's speculation."

"Which does not seem to be of import, when you castigate yourself," the shade said. "Your usual hypocrisies leave a better taste in the mouth. You are not even alone in those, truth be told. The First Prince calls you a warlord, though she herself rose through war to the throne through the same means. Levant was warring against the Principate not even two years ago, and Ashur was happily trading with the Wasteland but months before the Tenth Crusade was declared. I am indifferent to the moralities of this, admittedly, but they seem to matter to you and it rather beggars belief that all these rivals must now be considered righteous merely because they march against you."

"I'm not saying they deserve to win any of this," I got out through gritted teeth. "I'm saying it's self-defeating to fight them for the kingdom's sake if the price of that fight is to break the fucking kingdom."

"The Kingdom of Callow is already broken," Akua frankly said. "You've succeeded at keeping it from falling apart entirely after evicting Praes, which is already impressive. Catherine, four years ago there was no kingdom. There were only the provinces, ruled by the edicts of the Carrion Lord. In that span, you pried your homeland out of the Empress' grip with minimal destruction and forced a semblance of order onto a realm that was under occupation for several decades. All the while fending off repeated interventions from the two largest nations on the surface of Calernia. This strange expectation you have that anyone, including you, taking up the crown would lead to miracles is rather naïve. Nation-building is not the stuff of months, my dear, which is more or less what you managed to wrest away from more powerful and experienced rulers trying to deny you even that."

"So I'm the lesser evil," I bitterly smiled. "There's a familiar tune. Been a while since it last managed to lull me to pleasant sleep."

"It is most easy to fall short of a paragon of victory existing only in your thoughts," Diabolist said. "You speak as if you believe you somehow hoodwinked an entire kingdom into following you."

"I didn't exactly ask for opinions before the coronation," I said.

"And yet Callow did not rebel," Akua mused. "The remaining highborn and your officials obey your orders. You have brought every Named of note in the kingdom into your service and called the guilds, even those calling themselves dark, to heel. Your army, which is now for the most part made of your countrymen, followed you into war willingly. You are not a Fairfax, it is true. Also largely irrelevant, as they are all dead. Considering the founder of that dynasty was a mere knight, a Named with a distinguished military record can hardly be considered lesser origin."

"Eleanor Fairfax ascended to the throne by popular acclaim," I flatly denied.

"She was a skilled and charismatic warlord with the power to make a claim on the throne and popular backing to press it," she meaningfully said.

"Also the blessing of the Heavens," I drily said. "I seem to be missing that part."

"Now we argue theology," Akua said. "Can no crown be worthy without affirmation from Above? I've yet to hear of Cordelia Hasenbach receiving this accolade. Strange that it would be required of you alone."

"You're ignoring the part where I'm a villain," I said.

"You have devoured your own Name and taken Winter in its place," she said. "You share foes with Below, perhaps sympathies with some who strive against Above. I have yet to hear you offer a single prayer to my Gods, Catherine. Even if it were so, the hypocrisy here would be a deep one indeed. Where is this outrage when a Tyrant rises in Helike? Stygia pays dues only in brimstone, and Bellerophon is a maddened altar of a city. And yet no crusade darkens their doorstep. A standard upheld only when convenient is no such thing: it is merely a tool."

"It's a pretty song you sing me," I admitted. "That I am not always right, but just enough. That my enemies are no better."

"And yet," Diabolist said, "you believe not a word of it. Why?"

I thinly smiled.

"Because it was what I wanted to hear," I said. "And you're Akua Sahelian."

It was two hours before Mighty Kodrog woke, and we spent every moment of them in silence.

---

DroughtBringer

*insert 'inspiring comment about how awesome The Guide is, how awesome Erratic is, and that you should go vote for some reason or another. NOTE: Includes heartwarming Pathos-based appeal with puppies somewhere' here*

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Yotz

*inset 'appropriately enthusiastic mindless accolade of implied awesomness, and flavourful assurances of incessant inexorable voting, with possible vague implications of immediate undertaking of a research project in the field of puppy-based vorschmacks with side of ardent ajika' here*

TeK

*insert 'obligatory discussion of Ward and Worm, where it has no business being' here*

Zia

*insert full quota for misspellings of Akua's name here*

Javvies

Sometimes the best way to gray someone to do what you want is to tell them the truth, Cat.

Akua may be a murderous, untrustworthy, psychopathic something, who is totally on board with much of Classic/Traditional/Old School Evil, but she's not entirely wrong here. She's not entirely right, either, but don't discard the entire message because of the messenger.

Yotz

Unfortunately, Ubua is too good at arguing. It's "the boy who cried 'wolf!'" situation – she is so adept and professional with her words that anything she says is doomed to be either overly scrutinized and dissected in search for several layers of hidden meanings; or just outright discarded as blatant manipulation even if it was said in sooth and from the bottom of heart.

TeK

Honest feelings and truth are the greatest manipulation techniques known to mankind.

Yotz

Ijdeed.

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

More true that you know... for those are the very tools people use to manipulate //themselves//.

Decius

Nothing Akua says is actually sooth from the bottom of her soul-container. It is all intended to manipulate. And she knows now that it will be treated cynically as manipulation.

Her next manipulation attempt will account for that. It won't be direct reverse psychology, it will be an attempt to assist at a course of action that Akua does not wish Cat to take. One example would be planning exactly how to abdicate, looking in detail at the things that will happen afterward and comparing them to each other, such that Cat sees how little Callow can benefit from it.

RanVor

DISCLAIMER: I'm going to play the devil's advocate here. Nothing in this comment is to be read as my personal opinion on the matter.

There's no way in Hells you can prove the intention behind anything Akua says. We did not have the Akua viewpoint chapter since Kaleidoscope VI, and it did not reveal anything relevant to your point. All you have is an assumption, though admittedly not a baseless one.

RanVor

ADDENDUM (the disclaimer above still applies): Your reaction is, in fact, the proof of the truthfulness of Yotz's comment – you immediately dismiss all of Akua's input as manipulation, without as much as acknowledging other possibilities.

Yotz

Hence the "even if" part, dear.

the verbiage ecstatic

... you're assuming she *doesn't* want Cat to abdicate and this *wasn't* already reverse psychology.

Ubua is always thinking one level of meta beyond your level.

Qwormuli

Sorry, a character in a narrative can't be on a higher level of insight than a reader in a work with a reliable narrator. Try to not be a batman fan.

frolamiz

Who said Cat was reliable? =)

Rook

That's the issue with Akua though. Nearly every word that comes out of her mouth is in a way the truth, framed in the right way to suit her point of view. Akua wields her words like Catherine wields steel and winter.

Here? Akua's arguments are completely correct in technical sense, and disastrously wrong in with regards to mindset. Her advice here is essentially the moral version of horror fatigue, as Masego labeled it so aptly.

She's not leading Cat's next step right into a pit – just the opposite, she's saying just what Cat needs to hear to put aside her self-doubt and get out of the current mess. But if you buy into the message in the long term, you'll look back a thousand steps later and wonder where it all went wrong. That near-flagellant level of self criticism that works against her in some fights is the safety net that keeps her from going into freefall, as she's crossing all these lines.

Cross the line if you have to. Thoroughly cross it, if need be. But the moment you get comfortable crossing it is when you win the battle and lose the war. It should an unwilling necessity borne with clenched teeth, not something made peace with beforehand.

NZPIEFACE

Out of the many issues Aqua pointed out, I have one I strongly agree with.

Why does Catherine think herself unwortht of the crown?
Her country has a history of fighting up from nothing for it.

Oshi

Because she isn't meant to rule. She knows it. Catherine is bad at it. All she wanted was to free Callow and find someone who could rule. She's accomplished only half of her goals. Let's see if she can even accomplish a quarter of the rest.

Rook

I don't see her ever being well suited for mortal rule. Cat is the emergency airbag, not cruise control. It'll save your life but it isn't meant to last forever. Even if she lost the argument here she's right in one thing, it's best for both her and for Callow if her end goal is to ditch the throne as soon as things are stable enough.

I mean yeah she's competent, inspires the people, brings them together, and leads them to lop off the heads of their oppressors. But mostly from the battlefield, not from the throne.

Generally when she's on the throne, everything throne-related goes to shit real fast and gets held together by her Deadhand sidekick. It's rather telling that he's astonishingly competent at logistics and managing mundane domestic affairs, when his major role is to shore up Cat's weaknesses.

Dainpdf

She argues for not improving because perfection is impossible. That is a false dichotomy. Cat speaks of getting out to cut the losses and Akua counters with hypotheticals. She's being intellectually dishonest, if very skillfully so.

Agent J

She's not arguing for not improving, she's arguing for staying the course. Abdication is nothing but a self-righteous way of abandoning the responsibilities Cat forcefully took on for herself.

Akua's right, no one else would've been able to end the civil war with as few casualties or put to bed the Arcadian incursions so swiftly. Neither Malicia nor Cordelia give a single fuck about Callow or her people and both intend to screw it and them viciously for their own purposes. Callowans for their part would rather be a graveyard with an army than a conquered colony. They are not a people that take to subjugation well, and if Cat condemns them to it anyways, nothing but war, death, and misery will follow.

Furthermore, let's not pretend that this entire exercise has been anything but one of hypotheticals. Cat speaks of failures and hypothetical scenarios in which they might have been prevented or mitigated. Akua gives sound rebuttal to each point and buries them with her own. And after all is said, Cat has nothing left but personal attacks to throw at her. The dying gasps of a failed argument.

Dainpdf

She does do that. Cat argues her continued rule may do more harm than good, and Akua outright responds that Cat is comparing herself to perfection.

Here she implies that, since the perfect queen is impossible, it is futile to make such comparisons and attempt to improve in that direction.

As for the hypotheticals, Cat starts from reasonable assumptions, while Akua attempts to feed her ego – she assumes the Fae invasion was inevitable on very little ground, and also says the Calamities would simply put down any and all heroic efforts (here she is wrong out of ignorance – she doesn't know about the Bard's involvement).

Agent J

Yes, that's what kick started the conversation, the question of abdication, but the perfection response came when Cat began tallying her losses and contriving hypothetical ways they could have been better addressed. Akua's response was that she handled the shitshow that is Callow as best as reasonably possible.

Her argument then, is not "don't improve, perfection is impossible", it's "so your rule hasn't been perfect, that's no reason to quit now". The difference, I feel, is clear as day.

If Cat wishes to improve and learn how to rule better, Akua seems to be in full support of that. Whatever Cat's vision of "better" may entail. But that is not what Cat's talking about. She's arguing that she should put down the crown when she deems herself to be "doing more harm than good". That's not an argument about improving on one's faults. That's just quitting.

As for how reasonable her assumptions are, we're both a little biased in this regard. You've made the case for her abdication multiples times now, and I've been vehemently opposed to it. So I don't really find her assumptions all that reasonable to start with. And she's made a poor case for it in this chapter.

Akua on the other hand has shown just how much of the problems plaguing Callow were born out of her hand and how much of an absolute disaster things would be were she not in the picture.

Dainpdf

Choosing to rule Callow, if she is doing more harm than good, is a fault to be improved.

Akua is not just arguing that Cat shouldn't quit, she's also arguing that Cat has done the best that could be done. That is an argument against examining her faults, what she could have done better. Akua argues for arrogance, as befits a classical villain – and, as we’ve seen with Black, that way lay defeat.

Agent J

Quitting is not improvement, it’s quitting. Let’s not mince words.

Yes, she argued that “you did the best that could be done” in response to “I suck, someone else would have done better”. And she’s right. Those that could didn’t and those that would couldn’t. This entire story started because Cat got tired of waiting for others to get the job done so she got off her ass and did it.

Again, Akua is not arguing for arrogance or complacency or stagnation. Akua is many things, but complacent was never one of them. Her argument is for Cat to stay the course. Keep ruling, keep defending her countrymen, keep trying to bring about the better world she envisioned all those years ago... and keep needing her service.

That she’s a manipulative bitch with ulterior motives does not make her wrong.

And no, she has not made an argument in favour of not examining faults, because that was never the topic on debate. Cat’s been wallowing in misery for some time now and has been contemplated just giving up. The price, apparently, was steeper than the warlord anticipated. If it gets too steep, she’s saying, she may just quit instead. That’s the debate. To quit or not to quit.

The thing is though, Catherine is a known flagellant and takes an almost perverse pleasure in lashing herself. This is not an honest critique of her shortcomings and ruminations on ways to improve. This is another damn pity party. Gods, am I ever sick of them.

When did our beloved Black Queen become a toddler in need of emotional coddling? Does every dozen chapters need someone to tell her to stop belly aching and get the job done? It was barely a few chapters ago that Indrani had to push her to be more decisive with the Drow captives. A few more when Hakram had to push her to be more decisive with Masego. And even Juniper had had enough with the pity sessions during the Battle of the Camps and pushed her to be more decisive with the crusaders.

The weakest rulers, historically, have always been those left incapable of making and sticking to a decision for fear of failure. Well, those and the ones utterly lacking in agency, but when you're grouped with toddler kings and empty figure heads, you're in poor company.

Dainpdf

The belly aching thing? It's called a conscience. And yes, quitting **is** an improvement if you are doing more harm than good. And Cat has reason to believe she has. Admitting you have done what you can but now you're just making things worse is basic humility. I never said anything about Akua arguing for complacency, only arrogance. And arrogant she is. Also, she's not just trying to get Cat to need her. She's trying to get Cat to fit her mold of what a villain should be. Or a ruler. And that is a Dread Empress of the classic sort. Someone who uses their countrymen as a tool for their purposes, someone who achieves what they believe is greatness no matter the cost to others.

Agent J

I used to be terrible at riding a bike, so I stopped riding altogether and would you just look at the improvements.

Improvement on a situation and improvement of ability, I shouldn't have to state, are not the same thing. You've been asserting that Akua's argument is that Catherine is as good as she'll get and there's no point in her observing her faults and trying to become a better ruler because perfection is impossible. Yes, that's arguing for complacency. No, that's not at all what Akua said.

And a conscience? That's a great and wonderful thing. It makes our society actually functional, unlike the Drow. But in our leaders? Is it really a good thing if it's crippling their decision making? I'd rather a competent ruler than a kind one, and most of Cat's senior officers would agree. The only one who puts any stock in kindness is Vivienne and she did not join Cat because she's a boundless ray of sunshine. Hell, the man she followed before her tried to enslave an entire city.

Cat used to know that there was a time and place for everything, including a conscience. She's lost sight of that lately, traumatized by Liesse as she's been. Cat is not being humble, she's being sheepish.

Dainpdf

The bicycle is a false equivalence. It's more of a "I used to gamble in the casino. Then I noticed it only ever loses money, so I stopped."

See? Improvement. Akua's not arguing for complacency. She's arguing for forging ahead blindly.

As for a conscience, it's useful when you don't wish to throw the baby out with the bathwater. At some point you get so involved with strengthening and securing your rule that you forget what you started to rule for.

Javvies

That's not what the argument being made actually is.

You're discrediting the message because of the messenger.

Ignore who is saying it for the moment – focus on the statement itself.

What I understand Akua's primary point to be is, in essence, this:

"You didn't do a perfect job, and, sure, in hindsight, maybe you could have done a better one, but in your position, pretty much everyone else would have done a significantly worse job at the whole thing. There may be individuals who could have done parts of what you did better, but they would have done the other things significantly worse, if they could do them at all."

And that's true. No other character we have encountered or heard of could have managed the entirety of what Cat did. It would have taken someone more or less just like Cat to even come close.

Dainpdf

That is actually not an easy affirmation to make – saying that, absent Cat, the calamities would have just crushed all heroes ignores the fact that the Bard actually outplayed them in the League. And she was involved in Callow.

Plus, the whole point of the discussion is that, while Cat's leadership has brought many victories, the cost may have been too great. Perhaps Callow's future will see less carnage in her absence. And saying that the amount of troubles would be the same with or without her is also fallacious – she's completely ignoring how narratives work. I'm not saying that Cat should quit, and that she has been a net negative for Callow. All I'm saying is that she needs to keep the possibility in mind. The moment she stops is the moment she becomes another Akua.

Javvies

Absent Cat, one of the other claimants – the Praesi claimants – for Squire would have gotten the Name.

William (Lone Swordsman) likely either doesn't get released by Alt-Squire or dies outright, or wins against the Squire/claimants and then runs into Black and Captain and gets murdered, or gets away before they arrive. Either way, he doesn't get the Cat-induced change to his approach. He doesn't have those altered Story-level motivational urges. He doesn't form his group of Heroes. There is no group for Bard to join. He is not in, and therefore he is not protected by, a Pattern of Three with Cat/Squire, and therefore is fair game to get owned by Assassin. William doesn't have the drive to seek out Ranger for training or to spend a year in Arcadia when she rejects him.

The Fifteenth is likely not formed or formed under Akua/Heiress or the Praesi alt-Squire.

Absent Cat, the status of Callow/the Praesi occupation of Callow, and suppression of Heroes, is more or less unchanged.

Absent Cat, Hakram doesn't get his Name.

Cat is sufficiently rare enough in perception, point of view, motivation, ability, and position, that there is a very small subset of people who could feasibly replace her Role in full. The set of people who could partially replace her Role is somewhat larger, but still relatively small, and many of them are in opposition to the others who could fill in for the parts of her Role that they can't.

Dainpdf

You underestimate the Bard, for one.
For another, absent Cat, someone else would have taken her place. A band would have been formed. Would they have succeeded? It's plausible.
You can't just remove Cat from the picture and assume everything else happens the same way except without her.

Javvies

You're the one assuming things happen the same without Cat as they did with Cat at critical moments.

William only formed a band of Heroes because of what Cat said and did to him.
Without Cat at Summerholm as a Villain-Squire Claimant, the Praesi Squire-Claimants likely either kill William in the foundry, because none of them are getting sidetracked trying to deal with Cat, or stall him long enough for Black and Captain to show up and kill him.
Alternatively, William still gets away, but without the consequences of Cat inflicting Name-level motivational and objective changes the way she did, and without the protection of a Pattern of Three, which, leaves him wide open to getting owned by Assassin, and without the motivation to form and lead a group of Heroes, far less make a deal with Procer to support a rebellion.

In addition, without Cat, or a suitably equivalent Callowan-Villain-Candidate for the right Name, who might as well be Cat, it is unlikely that Bard would have bothered to show up to join a band of Heroes in Callow – the situation would have been more or less status quo, which she hadn't done a thing about in twenty years.

Dainpdf

The Bard set up that band. It would happen with or without Cat. What she did was create a pattern of three that dragged the whole affair out and caused a lot of casualties, but the band would have popped up eventually.
As for why she would have moved, the timing was good. Malicia was reaching the final stages of her power centralization, Cordelia was fast approaching her unification of the Principate...
There was a lot of tension in the air.

Javvies

It wasn't Bard who formed the group. It was William, under the urging of Cat's Name-level influence on him, who called for heroes to join him. Bard showed up later.

Bard wouldn't have bothered to show up without Cat, or an equivalently positioned Callowan. Bard would have accepted the Callowan status quo, as she had for the last 20 years, and waited until Cordelia called her Crusade. Maybe she would've shown up for the rebellion that would've taken place in about five years if Cat hadn't pushed William into kicking it off early. But then, the Crusade might've wound up being concurrent with that. But without something or someone who is a fundamental change to the Story of Callow, like Cat, the status quo is still tolerable for Bard. I suppose it's also possible that Bard might've tried to give Hieress or alt-Squire a nudge or assistance towards replacing the Calamities and Malicia, with pushing Passes back towards classic/old-school Evil instead of the New Evil of Black.

Without William being protected by the pattern of three with Cat, he'd have been taken out by Assassin, and not been available for Bard to try and use. Without William's calling for heroes, there is no Callowan Hero who can form a group. Thief wouldn't, even if she could. Bumbling Conjurer? Don't make me laugh. Hunter would've stayed in Refuge without William calling for Heroes.

Dainpdf

How do you know what the Bard would have done? The best source we have (and it's pretty poor) is the illusions Cat had when fighting Akua, and in those there was a heroic band. Cat is not everything.

Javvies

Because of how Bard does what she does. Bard works through other people.

Cat isn't everything, but at critical moments, replacing her with someone who can fill the same Role she does, and make choices that result in the same or a similar outcome is nigh impossible.

For example, in the first and most relevant critical moment, it requires Cat, or a sufficiently similar Callowan who is a Squire-Claimant.

None of the Praesi Squire-Claimants could or would have had the kind of impact on William that Cat did. The Praesi-Claimants would have either killed or been killed by William. He would have either died in Summerholm, be it at the hands of the Praesi Squire-Claimants or Black and Captain, or escaped without the Name-level influence on him that Cat caused, and without the protection of a pattern of three, which means Assassin would have gotten him.

Without William being influenced by Cat, he's not going to be interested in calling for Heroes. Or making deals with outsiders.

He called for Heroes first, then Bard showed up. Without William, there is no one to call for a group of Heroes. With no group of Heroes, Bard has nothing to work with.

Remember, Bard plays a hellaciously long game. She can afford to wait a few years of status quo for an opportunity.

That opportunity would most likely come when Cordelia got her Crusade. It might have come in a few years, when Black predicted a major rebellion – Cat used William to kick it off early.

Besides, while waiting through status quo for the right moment, it allows Heiress and her Classic Evil the opportunity to turn on Black and Malicia. If Classic Evil wins, Bard doesn't really need to do anything else to protect The Way Things Are Supposed To Be. Also, a win for Classic Evil, or even just a strong showing, gives grounds for a Crusade.

Akua's illusions are just that – illusions and mindgames. They should not be considered evidence of what might have been.

Dainpdf

It is impossible to discuss if you assume so many things about what would happen.

Javvies

What exactly do you think I'm assuming here?

The primary assumption that I have made is that without Cat, Black doesn't have someone immediately available to fulfill the same Role she does in the same way that she does. As such, the butterfly effect takes hold, though we really only see meaningful changes at Summerholm, and since Cat's actions and the effects of her actions are significant, things play out rather differently.

Pretty much everything else is largely either directly stated, inferred from, and/or implied in the text. Since of it only much later, but there nonetheless.

Dainpdf

You assumed William could not survive the Squire meeting without Cat.

You assumed the Bard's objective is to keep the status quo.

You assumed no successful band could form without Cat.

And those are just the few examples I can cite off of the top of my head.

RanVor

I didn't want to interfere in this discussion, but I have to point a few things out.

Your first statement is an outright lie. He did not assume such a thing at all. He said William could die during the Squire meeting, but if he didn't, he wouldn't have the protection offered by the pattern of three. And this is true.

That the Bard's objective is maintaining the status quo can be inferred from her conversation with the Hierarch in the epilogue of Book 3.

Forming a successful heroic band without William is highly unlikely, considering it was attempted for twenty years to no avail. Moreover, it's not illogical to assume even the Lone Swordsman couldn't have done it without a lot of additional narrative weight from his pattern of three with Cat.

From what I see, you are the one doing all the assuming so far.

Dainpdf

I disagree with that inference. She has a vested interest in the status quo, because she wins there, but it is not her final objective.

Why would it be without William if he doesn't need to die at the Squire meeting? Also, things that have not worked before can work now – for example, no one had ever killed one of the Calamities, and yet now someone has. No (direct, at least) Cat involvement.

RanVor

William might have not need to die at the Squire meeting, but that doesn't mean he wouldn't die afterwards. And forming a successful band depends heavily on narrative weight, which William probably would not have a lot without the pattern of three.

What does it matter if the status quo is a means instead of an end? The effect on Callow is the same.

To summarize, there is a chance that Callow would be better off if Catherine didn't become the Squire, but it's an extremely flimsy one. Because that's what you're arguing about, right? Whether or not the entire plot of the Guide is one gigantic mistake.

Dainpdf

Eh. I think it's more about an imperfect woman making imperfect choices and trying to stay herself while fighting monsters.

RanVor

That she's imperfect is unquestionable. People usually are. But that's irrelevant to the argument. We're not talking about why she made choices she made, but whether or not Callow would be better off if she didn't make those choices. In other words, whether or not accepting Black's offer was a mistake.

Javvies

No.

RanVor's got the short version down nicely. Much more aptly summarized than I would've done. Wall of text version follows.

William's encounter with the Squire-Claimants goes significantly differently without Cat – all the Praesi Claimants get to focus on him, rather than splitting up, one going one on one with Cat and loosing, and then Cat turning on the rest and allying (however briefly) with William against the Praesi-Claimants. William is certainly in a worse position without Cat than with her when dealing with the Praesi Squire-Claimants.

However, William either wins outright (meaning no Squire), gets killed (because none of them are going to let him go), or escapes that fight on his own. Assuming he survives, depending on how long that took, he might run into Black and Captain, if he does and fights, he dies, though he might be able to escape.

If William survives Summerholm, he is not in a Pattern of Three, and thus Assassin probably tracks him down and kills him in short order. The Pattern of Three protection is the only reason why Black didn't send Assassin after William immediately after Summerholm – it would have been pointless.

Disregarding the high probability that Assassin gets him, William has not had the encounter with Cat, and thus has not been changed by the encounter with Cat. It was explicitly said that Cat kicking William's ass and letting him go, and what she said to him, caused Name-level changes that William had no ability to fight. That those changes were significant and largely out of character for the Name, but enforced by the Name because of what Cat did.

William, without the changes imposed on him by Cat, is the Lone Swordsman, emphasis on Lone. His Name is one that doesn't work with others under normal circumstances. The Lone Swordsman might join a group that someone else formed and leads, but normally doesn't do the forming.

William screwed with Cat's free will, but she screwed with his right back – and harder. She ultimately figured it out, albeit later, and got over it, but he never consciously did, and didn't get past the effects until Liesse.

No Heroic band forms in Callow without William doing the forming because of who the available Callowan Heroes at the time are – Hunter is in Refuge, Thief is busy keeping her head down, and Bumbling Conjuror lacks the ... everything.

Without the Name-level changes imposed by Cat, William, if he survives Summerholm and manages to dodge Assassin long enough, would act completely differently from the way he did under the influence of those changes.

Bard's objective, based on what we have seen her do and say, is to maintain the Story and, apparently to tilt things in the direction of Above.

She protected Heiress, wanted her to beat Cat. She wanted to stop the New Evil that Black believes in, because of it and he succeeded, it would change the Story in unalterable ways.

The status quo of Callow, prior to Cat becoming Squire, is one that Bard had tolerated for 20 years, plus not doing anything (that we know of) to stop the Conquest. She demonstrably isn't that concerned with a Praesi Occupation of Callow, as long as it remains an Occupation of Good Callow by Evil Praes, and Callow is still spawning Callowan Heroes. That's just part of the Story.

Also, as Ranvor pointed out, we have her interaction with Heirarch.

We also have her stopping the elves from killing Akua.

We also have Bard discussing the difference between the Classic Evil that Akua represents and the New Evil of Black that Cat is a successor to, and her preference for the Classic Evil of Akua, because while it makes a mess, it loses in the end, but the New Evil is a kind of Evil that can actually win. I believe that was in a discussion with William, possibly the one where she urged him to summon the Hashmallin.

She plays an incredibly long game. Waiting for the right moment is entirely in character for her, especially when waiting gives time for both a suitable moment for her to do things to arrive, and allows for Classic Evil to take on New Evil to the detriment of the winner, and if Classic Evil wins, the Story is no longer threatened by New Evil.

Bard is functionally immortal – she takes a longer view than anyone except the Dead King, in part because she can afford to, in part because she has to.

There are lots of unanswered questions about Bard, sure, but there are also things where we have some of the answers.

As RanVor pointed out, things pulled directly from the text aren't exactly assumptions.

Things going differently without Cat doing what she does at critical story moments? That's not really much of an assumption either. Cat's a Callowan with a Praesi Villain Name – that's not a Role that anyone else can readily fill. Critical moments going differently resulting in a different sequence of events following? That's not really much of an assumption either. The butterfly effect doesn't get entirely ignored, in some ways, it's even more important – and it's certainly easier to locate critical moments where it's clear the butterfly effect would have major consequences.

Zach

Is it really true that Callowans would rather be a graveyard than a conquered colony? Recall the state of Callow at the beginning of this story – the Black Knight correctly calculated that, as long as their basic needs were met, the Callowan people would not rebel and the number of heroes would be kept to a minimum. So clearly Callowans – or at least your average Callowan who isn't a noble or whatever – are actually totally fine with being a province of Praes or whatever!

Various characters, as recently as the past couple chapters (in reference to the Drow) have touched upon the idea that some of these cultural mores might just be the values of the nobles/elite, and that the common people primarily just care about having their basic needs met.

Agent J

That's an excellent point, but Callow was never truly peaceful. There was always deep seething resentment bubbling under the surface. Remember gallows of Summerholm (or was it Marchford?) where Cat first saw the cold Carrion Lord rather than the generally affable Black? How many average Callowans were plotting rebellion? Remember that massive rebellion? Sure, it was the nobles that lead the armies and got the glory, but down there in the mud, who held the line?

You're right. Since we can't exactly take a census of a fictitious people, my assertion is moot. But EE has been beating us over the head with Callowan pride, spite, and stubbornness. I mean, a queen split open her throat at her own coronation after naming her rebel cousin heir. That is sheer badassery to a level I couldn't even contemplate. Callowans are not a meek people. Incessant invasions from all directions tends to harden a folk. I'm thoroughly convinced they'd choose liberty over life any day of the week. Many already have.

RanVor

This trait of Callowans reminds me of my own people, the Poles. Polish history is full of people who gave up their lives for lost causes, achieving nothing but retribution and repression, forever hailed as martyrs for an elusive ideal of "Polishness". We are taught in school about the heroism of insurrectionists from the November and January uprisings, even though both resulted only in increasingly brutal repressions. Even now, many Polish people view the neighboring countries, especially Germany, as enemies and oppressors, despite the World War II ending over half a century ago.

Like those Polish insurrectionists, Callowans would fight to the last out of misguided belief that there is something noble in dying in vain. And, again like Poles, trying to divide their ancestral lands would only solidify their resistance. In the end, Procer would end up with a nation-sized graveyard anyway.

Agent J

The Callowan plight resonates with me for much the same reason. Their stubbornness and the almost impossible uphill battle they face reminds me a great deal of my own people as well.

Somalis have ever been a hard-hearted and unruly folk. Our lands were conquered and divided into five colonies, a gross injustice that's been emblazoned on our flag. A five pointed star signifying that all our lands and people are united in our hearts if not on the map. Said map only depicted two of the five chunks united, leaving large swaths of our territory and people remaining under the brutal rule of our Kenyan and Ethiopian neighbours. Somalia proper is a shattered, woeful mess gripped by a seemingly endless conflict. In our weakness, our neighbours prey on us ceaselessly, countless nations invade us for the flimsiest reasons, international corporations dump their wastes in our water while major fishing companies strip it of fish by the tons, and the greatest power on earth bombs us unendingly, failing to hit their actual targets frustratingly often, killing scores of innocents instead without so much as a "sorry, our bad". All the while, our people kill each other constantly and senselessly, spilling more of their own blood than all foreign soldiers combined.

Suffice it to say, I'm heavily invested in the Callowan plight. If they can make it out of their dreadful situation against impossible odds, perhaps things aren't as hopeless as they seem for us as well.

Decius

Such is the cost of being a manipulative, backstabbing, mass murdering wastelander. The people smart enough to murder you into servitude treat you like a manipulative, backstabbing, mass murderer from the wasteland.

SilentWatcher

Good chapter and dialog, but look how no one questions that dwarfs are good, when massacring a race and nailing someone to the wall.

MagnaMalusLupus

Umm...nobody said, thought, implied, or even remotely hinted that the Dwarves were Good. Its pretty dang obvious that they're not on the side of the angels, though I don't know that they're Evil either. It's quite possible that, like the Elves, they are aligned with neither.

Ternbugkle

Not sure anybody said dwarves were good, they heavily implied nobody lived to mess with them twice.

Massacring murderous violent slavers on the way to pick up supplies is almost a public service.

Metrux

I do think they treat it as a public service, and let the good deeders pay their taxes this way, instead of in money. Which would explain why the dwarfs are so well furnished for this, the cost is lesser :V

taovkool

Surprising that I actually agreed with the Diabolist, even if she might be doing it just to get more points on her boss's ass.

Cat's been far too harsh on herself. If the usual pattern of escalation I'm reading here rang true, She might be due another wake up call.

Agent J

And how many wake up calls does she need before she gets over her melodrama?

Jonnnney

A major problem with Akua's argument is that Cat being hard on herself is how she gets better. Once Catherine is satisfied with herself her power will have reached its peak and then something stronger will knock her out. By continuing to strive for a theoretical better solution she continues to gain strength and continues to be a player in the great game. Akua's path is a happy one that always ends in defeat. Cat's path is a sad one that doesn't end.

DroughtBringer

One of my favorite chapters.

Lots, and lots of perspective toward the events that have happened thus far, and a lot of character development for Cat, and Akua.

And although it is what Cat wanted to hear, I believe that it is mostly the truth, and tells a lot about the situation.

stevenneiman

I'm surprised that Akua didn't acknowledge that the Heavens tried to do the same thing to a major population center that she did and only failed because of Cat's personal intervention. Though I suppose that Cat might have responded by pointing out that she drove the particular hatchet man of the Heavens to do so. Ignoring that the Heavens could have gotten another one, but that's how Cat would think.

Thaumaturge

that last line was perfect.

honestly i agree with a lot of what Akua is saying – and ugh i hate having to say that – but it is a genuinely good point that she is the one saying it. Akua probably makes a lot of sense, really, she grew up in Praesi courts and was named even before Catherine, it's no surprise that she can be particularly persuasive.

but does that make her right? right now she's in a supportive role, certainly, but inasmuch as she is a supportive character?

i think Cat could do with some genuine pats on the back and some assured "you did good"s but if they only come from Akua's mouth, am i really in the right to think that?

Nguyen Hong Hai

Unfortunately, the only compliments that Cat would believe I think will only come from Black.

stevenneiman

The important thing to remember is the two things Akua's current mindset is shaped by: She needs Cat to survive, and she lost to Cat. If Cat decides that it isn't worth existing it's pretty obvious that her last act is going to be to destroy Akua's soul and ensure that she never has any kind of opening for a comeback. Also, it's just plain annoying to have to listen to the person who ruined the schemes you spent your entire life preparing moping about how useless and ineffective they are. Especially if you're trapped listening to that moping with no possible escape and you've been raised from birth with wasteland arrogance and success-worship.

limlimrevolution

I had not considered the existential horror of your lucid soul being enslaved by someone who brutally curbstomped you, only to then be subjected to them moping and whining about how shitty they are at everything. Especially when you have been raised to believe that "iron sharpens iron". Almost makes me feel bad for Akua. Except for, you know, the whole mass murdering psychopathic necromantic demon summoning ritual thing. So in retrospect, it's actually a sickeningly effective punishment.

Stormblessed

Hahahahaha! What an excellent chapter. The debate going back and forth was great and gripping, only to have the rug pulled out and subverted at the last second by Cat's final line! How fantastic!

Nima

How old cat is? 18? We all forgot she is just a young woman despite all experience and eldritch power

Javvies

Maybe 23-4 or so, depending.

IIRC, she said she was 18 when she was talking to Talbot in the dungeons of Marchford when he was offering the services of two thousand knights.

The timeskip was ~5 ish years. I think.

Reqqe

The prologue of book 4 says its been less than a year since the fey invasion.

erraticerrata

She's nearing twenty-one.

Yotz

Growing old is mandatory, growing up is optional.

NZPIEFACE

You forget she's immortal.

Both are literally optional.

Yotz

Au contraire, mon ami – since her body is a function of her mind, she will be exactly as old as she feels – unless she'll constantly extend her will to regulate her appearance, or just became detached enough from her mortal patterns of thinking. And regardless of all that – she will grow older, immortality or not. It just that her age won't be affecting her directly. That's where "growing up" part comes into play.

Imagine this – decade later Cat suddenly notices clear signs of aging on Nauk's and Hellhound's faces. This causes epiphany of sorts – full weight of her immortality suddenly becomes not only known to her as abstract thing, but completely, finally, irrevocably understood; and – somewhat – accepted. Later that day grey-haired and wrinkled Grossmeister Talbot walks into the throne room only to find a frail crooked crone on the Queen's throne, holding a half-empty cup of wine, and looking into nothingness with cataract eyes. And all this only because of one single thing – that's how Cat feels at that moment: incredibly old, frail, and half-blind. She would be nearing 31 there, mind you.

Now, under the strict mental control or absolute dehumanizing detachment that scenario would be nigh impossible – Cat will remain unchanging – or, rather, changing at glacial pace. But that's a thing to think about later – we still a in lack of several future story points to make any educated hypothesis on that particular kink.

So, "optional" would be appropriate for "growing up" only – "growing old" still will be mandatory, just less noticeable.

...Unless time shenanigans ensue.

Jane

Even if it's what Cat wanted to hear, it was certainly what Cat needed to hear. Self-reflection is necessary to avoid doubling your way down into destruction, but at a certain point, self-reflection becomes self-pity instead, and Cat's been over that line for a few months now.

Yes, the loss of Liesse was a tragedy, one that she failed to avert despite her best efforts (setting aside the dubious “Raise banner against the Empress by killing one of her governors without permission” option), but expecting to avoid loss when playing games on this scale is to demand perfection of yourself – something that no person, Named or not, can offer. And every other sin she lays at her own feet is nothing more than a reflection of that single mistake – that she couldn’t avert Liesse.

And, you know, if she wants to mourn Liesse, that’s a good thing – it demonstrates that she still has a heart. But if she lets that guilt guide her more than the facts at hand, that’s an indulgence that Callow can’t afford. Because if she lays down her sword because she genuinely believes the situation to be hopeless, that’s being a good ruler – but surrendering the kingdom out of a misguided belief that she’s failed them is just trying to soothe her own ego while making her kingdom pay the price.

Even if she has to raise the farmhands and starve Callow in order to keep fighting... Is a season of famine really worse than becoming part of the Principate? Because that’s a cost her people would willingly bear, and it’s something they only need suffer once. Accepting annexation by a foreign kingdom is something with much longer consequences, and will probably involve more than one rebellion, to say nothing of resuming the wars with Praes.

That said, I do understand where Cat is coming from – she’s comparing herself to Malicia, Cordelia, and her teacher, each of whom has played a nearly perfect game in her eyes. But someone who still a novice comparing herself to seasoned players, and expecting to surpass them on her first round is simply being arrogant. As Akua says, that she has slipped her kingdom out of their hands and not watched it burst into flames is success. To expect that success to be flawless is asking the impossible.

Listen to Akua, Cat. That she just doesn’t want her owner to be buried with her cape doesn’t make her wrong.

DroughtBringer

I’d argue that Cat did play a near perfect hand her first time through. I mean, go look at Akua’s entire argument.

A lot of what Cat pulled off simply could not have been pulled off by most other people, and with our behind the scenes looks at the others, we see that they are all in similar situations, just in such a way that Cat can not see it.

Jane

Well, with precognition or a spy network on par with Malicia’s, she probably could have acted in the extremely narrow window between [when it was politically acceptable to kill Akua] and [when Akua massacred Liesse]. But that falls firmly under the heading of “unrealistic expectations of perfection” – it was a misstep, but not one that any sane person could blame her for.

It's why I describe her guilt as self-indulgent – she's blaming herself, heavily, for not being perfect in a situation where nobody could be perfect, and the only reason she can even consider such a standard realistic is that she's measuring herself against people who built their legends before she was even born. That's not honest self-reflection – that's just a pity party, whether she realizes it or not.

Novice

I once hated Akua as a character, now I only hate her as a person. Hells, I once wanted her to be nothing more than a plot device, if at all given a role.

Casting her as a way for Cat to confront her own insecurity and then Cat dismissing her entirely without the whole thing seeming ill-contrived? I don't know how you've done it but you changed my mind EE. Well done.

naturalnuke

I always liked Akua as a character actually, she's both a foil and a mirror. She is Cat taken to her logical conclusion if Cat actually went down that slope. Akua had a goal, a drive to do something that is basically impossible, and the pragmatic and unscrupulous practical realism to clearheadedly do what she thought she needed to achieve her goal. She's literally Cat with a different set of values because of upbringing.

I mean, this whole book is a story of 'how does Good look from evil's side', what would this have looked from Akua's perspective?

A plan years in the making, progresses against all odds, until a rival appears, an up-and-comer who wins by the skin of her teeth on impossible odds. Of course you tried to put roadblocks in her way, but she always overcomes them and comes out stronger for it. She progresses to the level of skill you took years to achieve in only 1, gathering a host of competent individuals who can cover, effectively, all the inadequacies of her, and a mentor who intervenes should you ever gather too much of a lead.

But you persevere, and manage to achieve a plan that cost countless lives, resources, and time to achieve her penultimate goal. And your rival, impossibly, is there to meet you. But you have one last plan, a way to surely beat her, to beat everyone who might stop you, and at your height? When you have your rival, who you've grown almost attached too because she was the only thing that stood with you in your climb, when you have her at your mercy, planning to SPARE her, her mentor comes to the rescue.

Akua suffered Cats 'villain fighting the hero story' but instead of raging against it says 'that's life, gotta make the best of it'. I fucking respect that. I like her as a character for the sheer irony of her story and her reaction to the same injustice the MC suffered.

naturalnuke

It goes back to that quote what was it, "...you were brought up in a culture that said you can win. We don't even get that...", or something to that effect.

I think Akua is genuine in the 'Cat won so she can do with me as she will' attitude. Of course she was also raised in a culture where backstabbing is a legitimate career path. I think the attitude lasts as long as Cat is the 'winner'. Cat hasn't lost yet, she's struggling but Akua's not gonna even try to jump ship because she genuinely believes 'to the victor goes the spoils.'

naturalnuke

Because really, what does it say about you if the person you lost to is beaten? You just drop lower in the tower don't you?

DroughtBringer

This is a beautiful way of looking at Cat's story, and harkens back to something Akua said here.

The Gods Bellow do not own Cat, she does not worship them, and it creates a much more mobile story thread for Cat to manipulate, and allows her to play the Hero role in stories.

Dainpdf

She believes Cat can do anything so long as she doesn't show enough of her back for Akua to reliably slide in a knife.

Dainpdf

Akua's problem is she was trying to keep the sand castle up when the tide came calling.

That, plus she was a foil against a regular hero. Her position doesn't work as well against someone like Cat, who gets some heroic luck but also dips into villainous practices.

naturalnuke

I feel like he's been sitting on this interaction for months and was itching (and rushing) to get to it. This chapter has fewer – negligible even – spelling or grammatical mistakes on release than any of the chapters of this book so far. And it feels worth it almost, because this was a joy to read (so much so that I started reading parts out loud to myself because I felt they deserved to be spoken).

TeK

I like it when I don't know I was thinking something, until someone else said it.

Dainpdf

Akua's arguments are beautifully crafted. I tip my hat to EE. It's hard to portray this level of masterful sophistry.

wyaldriddler

And I'm going to be absurdly amused if Vivienne basically repeats the same thing to Cat. Or Hakram.

Cause that would be something of a real shock to Cat's system.

Aeon

I kind of love what's going on here. For all that Akua's manipulative, she still has a very good point here. Something tells me that Cat won't be dismissing this conversation as easily as that last line claims.

Also, I really do like what's been going on with helpful Akua. It may or may not happen, but I'd love to see her join Cat legitimately.

ahd

As noted: the smart move for the Diabolist is to behave exactly the same way she believes a competent, loyal, trustworthy follower would behave, even when Cat is not watching her, always and forever.

Not to somehow earn trust or friendship, but because if Cat keeps winning, Akua keeps this semblance of life and freedom and opportunity for happiness. Sixth Ranger ahoy.

We all know the Black Queen is never going to run out of enemies, so the Diabolist is never going to run out of runway. And Akua may be a handy target to redirect the redemption story to. (:

Death Knight

THAT'S YOUR REBUTTAL CAT?! ARGUMENTUM AD HOMINEM? Oh for fuck's sake... Diabolist was right on all counts.

*ahd*

Black Queen: "Akua is brilliant and thoroughly well-informed and so can figure out what to tell me to get me to dance to her puppet strings. I must not listen."

Also the Black Queen: "Akua knows nothing about me and is kind of a fuckup; so when she tells me that I actually did the least bad job possible, except when I indulged my squishy wannabe-hero wishcasting, I must not listen."

Within two chapters of each other. Catherine Foundling, ladies and gentlemen. She's here all week. Try the veal.

agesbe

The second opinion is something she espouses a lot more than she actually believes, because it gets under Akua's skin. In her more personal, honest moments, she acknowledges that Akua was abominable, but skilled, intelligent, and capable.

She wants absolution, which Akua is giving her, but also knows that Akua will say whatever she thinks she should say to manipulate Catherine. I don't think she's going to be dismissing this conversation as much as she pretends. Akua isn't saying anything Cat hasn't already considered herself, but at this point Cat views these as justifications, not excuses.

For my part, I feel like Akua has a lot of good points, but the mindset she's putting forth is also dangerous; it is as bad to feel like you are the best choice for your kingdom no matter what happens as it is to feel like you are the lesser evil at best. She hasn't given up yet, and I doubt she'll just surrender even if the Drow don't show up; at the very least, all of the Woe will be trying to talk her out of it, and probably most of the remaining government as well.

Dainpdf

Akua is a master manipulator and analyst, but she has heavy blinders on that limit her. That's why she lost to Cat. Also, she will use poor arguments if they are what she thinks will convince Cat to see her way.

*ahd*

Learning to see those around you as separate from their crimes is one of the skills of adulting.

<https://t.co/YzKAU4qMDP> pic.twitter.com/FULxwPUXs8

TeK

To be fair, a messenger does matter in this particular conversation. If someone as thoroughly fucked up as Aqua tells you "Good job!"...

As per Godwin law, it's quite similar to what you would feel if Hitler said to you "What an amazing way yo rule your country, keep it up!"

Dainpdf

Especially since both drove their enterprises into the ground, besides the whole "being an inhumane monster" bit. And both being charismatic but often fallacious and manipulative.

mavant

Did you mean <https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/YourApprovalFillsMeWithShame>

Dainpdf

Eh. Diabolist was misinformed (did not consider the Bard, who has been proven to be able to outmaneuver Black and was involved with the Rebellion), dishonest (argued that the impossibility of perfection is a reason not to acknowledge faults), and mostly engaged in convenient hypotheticals. Notice how, when questioning the Drow alliance, she chose the worst options to bring up before raising the idea of climbing the tower. This was her being manipulative and nothing more; her points are as empty as her arguments.

RanVor

Which options do you think she should have mentioned instead? I'm genuinely curious – maybe you do have better ideas.

Dainpdf

The ones Cat raised right after, like the Elves, the Gigantes... The ones which won't treat with her, in part because she is a villain – which is why Akua did not mention them.

RanVor

So you don't have any ideas, then. Good to know.

Dainpdf

Huh? I don't understand. All I was saying is that Akua cherry picked alliances, since Cat herself pointed out there were other options and Akua clearly "forgot" to mention anyone on the side of Above.

RanVor

So it is a convenient coincidence that Akua only mentioned the alliances that could feasibly be made, and omitted the ones that are hopeless to even try?

Dainpdf

No. It is a suspicious coincidence that she only mentioned the ones that were problematic due to being counter-productive, while leaving out the ones that were problematic due to Cat's own previous villainous decisions.

In doing so, she establishes her main argumentative assumption: that Cat's choice to go with villainy was predetermined and set in stone, and there is no point in arguing about times when she failed to do good, only in wondering how she might best strengthen her position.

This, of course, stems somewhat from Akua's own Praesi philosophy of iron sharpens iron, but is also a subtle appeal to Black's own ideal of "one sin, one grace" aka the ends justify the means.

RanVor

And you surely can prove it's not because of Black's Legions and the Fae being arguably superior options to the Drow, and because mentioning the Titanomachy, which is not an option at all, lacks any merit whatsoever.

Dainpdf

If it were an option (and it might, if Cat were not a villain – the Gigantes are known for their hate of Procer) the Titanomachy would have made for a pretty good ally.

Better than the Fae or Drow, considering both are bound to attempt to betray or swindle her.

RanVor

If it was an option, sure – but it's not, which makes it irrelevant to the discussion.

Dainpdf

It is, if considering why it is not an option can lead to making it an option or avoiding losing similar options in the future. For example, would the Gigantes aid Callow if Cat were to resign? That is just a simple idea, but it is food for thought.

RanVor

A counterpoint – is allying with the Gigantes worth losing the Liesse Accords?

Dainpdf

Debatable. But it should be kept in mind, as a possibility.

RanVor

Also, that was not the topic of the conversation at the time. The question was what alliance Cat should consider instead of the Everdark. And you stubbornly refuse to acknowledge that the Titanomachy is out of this particular picture. It's not about what could have been. It's about what is.

Dainpdf

I specifically raised the issue of how Akua's pick of possible alliances to mention was part her own biases and part a calculated choice to prepare for her main argument.

RanVor

And I specifically called you out on talking nonsense. It'd be way more suspicious if she did it your way, bringing up options obviously not applicable in this situation.

Dainpdf

As opposed to bringing up options which are actually counter-productive to the objective, one of which she has vested interest in?

RanVor

They are not counter-productive. They just have consequences Cat is unwilling to deal with. Akua wouldn't be, so they naturally occurred to her as possibilities.

I'm not suggesting Akua is innocent. She's definitely not. But you're reading too much into this, and it pisses me off for some reason.

Dainpdf

They are, considering that all of them will make the Callow situation worse. They are only viable from the "let's win battles and show these crusaders" angle, not the "let's make sure Callow is in the best shape we can by the end of this" one.

Now, I hesitate to claim things about your reading experience, but I suppose it could be because, much like me and Cat, Akua has told you what you wanted to hear (whether she has a point or not) and you dislike that being questioned.

RanVor

I think it's because I dislike overly suspicious people. You might have noticed I tend to respond in this manner every time someone starts to spew paranoid ramblings.

Is contacting Black really that disastrous? Don't get me wrong, I agree with Cat why those aren't viable options, but they're really obvious choices from Akua's perspective. She mentioned them simply because that's what she would do in Cat's place.

Dainpdf

I see. Well, skepticism and cynicism are close enough that one can fall easily from one to the other.

What I find interesting is how many people are ready to trust the words of Akua and doubt everything the Pilgrim says...
(not saying this applies to you, just commenting in general)

RanVor

I'm not arguing for trusting Akua, I'm arguing against paranoia. The moment Cat starts to fear everything coming from Akua's mouth is the moment she loses control over her.

And it's kind of hard to believe your remark wasn't directed at me, considering it was I who argued with you over the reliability of the Pilgrim as an information source.

Also, I have a personal question to you: do you ever sleep? Because while my own sleeping schedule is currently very irregular, you seem to always reply to my comments within an hour at most, no matter what time it is.

Dainpdf

So is mine! I guess we just happened to match. As for direction, I don't recall names easily, so I had not made the connection. As for losing control over Akua, that control is not one of trust, but of power.

RanVor

But power is irrelevant if Akua can't fulfill her primary purpose due to Cat refusing to listen to her. What is the point of keeping an advisor whose advice is always ignored?

Dainpdf

She has abilities that can be used. And being skeptical of someone's words and never taking them at face value is not the same as plugging one's ears and going "lalala". Plus, she has her areas of expertise. Magic, politics, even medicine, among many other things. Definitely not ethics or "how not to be a classical villain".

RanVor

You seem to be under the impression that we're discussing the entire conversation. We're not. I'm refuting your claim that Akua's choice of potential allies is a proof of her ulterior motives towards Cat. This aspect of the argument is strictly political, and therefore within Akua's area of competence. Morality has nothing to do with it. And there is a point where skepticism and ear-plugging become interchangeable.

Dainpdf

I did not state it is proof. I stated that, given the fact that she is attempting a manipulation, her choice of allies becomes much clearer. Therefore, it is evidence of her manipulation, though not necessarily proof. Politics in Creation necessarily involve morality; in fact, I wouldn't be averse to claiming that it does in our world as well, because ethics and morality dictate what is acceptable or not. In Akua's case, her political expertise is clouded by the Praesi doctrine she subscribes to, which accepts great damage or risk to one's own side in order to hurt the other guy. A doctrine which she is trying to get Cat to embrace. Her framing of the discussion in terms of pure "efficiency in hurting Procer" also helps her influence Cat towards climbing the Tower, because it steers the conversation away from both narrative and moral impacts, as well as the cost to Cat's own people.

Javvies

This is circular reasoning. You are assuming a particular slant and manipulation in a particular direction, which colors interpretation of what she says, and using that interpretation as evidence of her manipulation in a particular direction.

Or so I understand from what you just said.

Things don't work like that.

Dainpdf

It is not. It is collection of evidence through observation. One makes a prediction based on a theory, then observes the data. If the data fit the prediction, they are evidence (though not proof) of the theory.

RanVor

If politics are inseparably linked with morality and Akua is proficient in the former but not the latter, then her political expertise is no such thing and any advice she may offer on the matter is inherently flawed. Which begs a question: what is she for? If her experience on the field of politics is rendered useless by her lacking ethics, why is she still outside the box?

Dainpdf

Politics being intrinsically linked to politics does not mean that she is not skilled at them. It just means that whoever listens to her advice, or works with her, must take into account their differences in ethics, because while Akua's stratagems are great, she may not be devising them for the same purpose as what you'd want, and her readings of people are necessarily slanted by her ethics, as are everyone else's.

RanVor

Assuming your first sentence is a typo, the direct consequence of what you're talking about is the existence of different "types" of politics, and the one Akua is skilled in is not the one Cat needs, and that makes her of little worth to the Woe. And though Cat wrongly believing in her usefulness is not unthinkable, how did Vivienne come to the same (wrong) conclusion is beyond me.

Unless, of course, Akua does, have some genuinely useful advice to offer. And this is where paranoia starts to get in the way.

Dainpdf

Akua **is** useful. You just have to ponder what she says instead of trusting it blindly.

RanVor

Eh, despite the fact I repeatedly stated my opinion in no uncertain terms, you keep misinterpreting it and the discussion is going nowhere because of it, so I have to reiterate:

TRUSTING AKUA BLINDLY IS STUPID AND IRRESPONSIBLE AND I NEVER SAID OTHERWISE. DEAL WITH IT. ALSO, WE'RE NOT DISCUSSING THE ENTIRE ARGUMENT, JUST THE OPENING FRAGMENT UP TO THE WORDS "DREAD EMPIRE", SO STOP REDIRECTING THE DISCUSSION ONTO TOPICS I HAVE NO BUSINESS IN DISCUSSING WITH YOU. THANK YOU FOR YOUR (LACK OF) ATTENTION.

The problem is that you create a false dichotomy by framing my opinion on trusting Akua as in opposition to yours, while it's actually similar, just less extreme.

Dainpdf

Let's agree to disagree, then?

RanVor

Sure. It's going on for too long anyway.

RanVor

Also, we're straying from the topic again.

Dainpdf

I am sorry for reopening this chain, but I have been re-reading the Guide and stumbled upon one of the earliest chapters, where Cat attributed wavering in part to having been caught up in a redemption story – by a hero, even. That has made me reconsider some of this whole argument. It actually baffles me somewhat now, that Cat wouldn't think of that lesson when if anything she's more bound to stories than before, now.

Someguy

Akua is only correct about the realpolitik, it's her own goals, aspirations and methods in such a situation that is garbage. Cat should only use Akua for political analysis and seal her away otherwise.

Dainpdf

She's also an okay paramedic, if you don't mind the "patient has become a half undead abomination" bit.

mavant

She's aces in a scuffle.

happyhavak

Her attachment to the land the kingdom sits on baffles me. I would just round up all the callowans, move them to Acadia, bide my time whope training a massive army, then pop out a couple centuries later to fuck up everyone on my shitlist. Or their descendents. I'm flexible like that.

happyhavak

How the shit did while become whope?

Yotz

Tipo, brobbably. Ith appens.

TeK

Yeah, Cat struggles with the fact that her body is a construct, I doubt she really is willing to think like a functionally immortal that she is. Plus yeah, she doesn't know of centuries down the line would be a better opportunity. Plus people may not be as keen at leaving their homeland to live in literal fairy tales. Besides, Cat is just not someone who will bail at her country to go hide in corner. Why should she?

Oh, and also, two centuries later she will be just an otherwordly evil invader. Not a good story.

Dainpdf

Depends on how it is set up. It could be a return to reclaim the lost land, if set up correctly (which would involve it being a last resort after being pushed from all sides... Much like right now). But it's too Dead King for her, I suspect.

Someguy

Unless there's an overlap for both King in the Mountain/ Sealed Evil in a Can that Bard swings her way, I don't think it's possible.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/King\_in\_the\_mountain

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/SealedEvilInACan>

Dainpdf

Does it need to be the Bard? Cat has proven herself perfectly capable of setting up stories by herself. And well, Triumphant is basically a villain version of the King Under the Mountain

Agent J

Arcadia is not free real estate. Her treaty with the King and Queen of Arcadia only permits her to ferry her troops and supplies through. The moment they she starts setting up shop in Arcadia instead of merely passing through she breaks her treaty. Broken treaties with Fae royals is not going to end well, not to mention it opens up a new front in her many wars.

ericwinter

You know, a lot of people seem to be missing the exact point of what Ct meant by her last line. She's not just saying 'I don't believe you cause you're you.' She used Akua, because she's Akua, to remind herself of why she's fighting. She used her to remind herself that for all she's accomplished, for all the ancient monsters and older Named she's beaten, it's *Not good enough*. IT's exactly what she wanted to hear, because it would push her to do better. Because Cat has always broken the scales, proved the impossible, when she's the underdog. When people tell her you can't hope for more, *She proves them wrong*. And Akua, the woman she hates more than any other, telling her she's done more than enough? That's just gonna light a fire in her belly hot enough to burn the entire continent to ashes if it gets her what she wants.

lennymaster

Akua did not say, stop trying to be perfect, she said stop beating yourself up for not being perfect, for that is impossible. You did a better job than anyone could have reasonably expected of you, that neither means good, though her efforts certainly can not be considered to be less than decent, nor bad.

Stop being such a whiny selfrighteous asshole, nobly talking as if your surrender would make things better.

Do not get me wrong, I love this story, but I liked Cat better when she raged against Goods hypocrisy instead of flagelating herself for consistently making the best out of a bad situation.

wirelessgrapes

It's a strange philosophical argument in this chapter. Do the successes that Cat has gained thus far show proof of concept? Or is she sailing down a deceptively smooth path. Does the constant need to be 'better' result in a more well stood Cat? Or does her constant strife and turning away valid paths result in her own trappings. Was she more successful when she was ignorant to how much the world turned to shit every time someone tried to do something? Is the illusion of succeeding in something better than actually doing it? What is a story, more than a structured narrative designed to place the protagonist in the spotlight, as if they have the only real agency in the world?

I think that Akua's analysis/manipulation applies for her earlier actions. The 'greater good' and 'lesser evil' work when she genuinely believed in what she was doing, and deceived herself from what was happening. However, one cannot stay innocent to the world forever. Cat stared into the abyss, and thus she learned. She set herself upon a new stage in this Book, where she is playing the role of someone who has to fight the world. She can't afford to be believing that she's just better than the other guys, she has to constantly prove to herself that she is better than the other guys.

There is a reason each of the Books are called Books. They have a different stage, a different story. The first Book is the story of Cat stepping onto the stage, and fighting for her place in it. The second Book is her first step of agency, her first time her ideals and goals are put to the test. The third Book is about her getting what she wanted, and realizing that it isn't enough. The fourth Book seems to be about the temptation of an easy road and the world trying to break her off her true path. It's possible that we have the Story itself trying to right itself by pushing Cat off of her protagonist villain path. For the story of the protagonist villain to work, the Villain genuinely does have to be better than every Hero, and the Story is putting temptation in her way at every step.

It all falls back into her original goal of making Callow better than it was. Her Story is the Story of Restoring a Homeland. If she strays from the path, she falls. Akua's options results in Cat acting as Callow's 'Rightful Ruler' which she is not. Her Story is not to rule Callow, it is to restore it. If she tries to solidify her control, at any expenses to her people, she will fail, because she will then be the villain in someone's Story. Maybe not immediately, but years down the line, when Callow has suffered under her rule, and malcontent rises along with heroes. It will result in a similar situation to Callow prior to the start of Book 1.

wirelessgrapes

I really want to see Cat abdicate now. The more I think about it the more I think that this gambit isn't going to work. Either she's going to get rewarded for her diligence by Story intervention in her favor, or her dedication will be put to the test one more time. She's insisted that she'd abdicate if she was the worse option, and if she thinks she's the worse option, then she will. That much repetition implies foreshadowing.

That and I really want to see how that story goes.

mavant

That smells heroic.

I'd be delighted to see her abdicate in favor of a democratic election system.

Then the league might be on the side of callow after all. Or at least the hierarch.

MetruX

You do know democratic systems are some of the most flawed in the history of mankind, right? Of course the ones that came before are flawed, it's why we changed out of it through the generations. But our system right now is not any better, it's just a different flavour of bad, so I really don't think a democratic election system will do any good for her people.

To note, we only use democracy because no one has found a better alternative so far.

RanVor

Also, Catherine has expressed a disdain for democracy before. It's hard to blame her, really, considering the only democracy she might have possibly heard of is the Bellerophan one.

mavant

I didn't say I think democracy is flawless, I said I'd be delighted to see our Queen of Air and Darkness use it as a political weapon.

As for better alternatives IRL, Hanson's futarchy concept seems pretty intriguing.

Xinci

A Futarchy by would honestly be on the side of the above or some neutral power I think. The gods above regularly use their understanding of all possible timelines(story threads) and all actions to mould specific pieces to highly specific events. They would want to test this out somehow though they may have done this through the hard and early heroes in the style of levantines like the Valiant Champion instead of forming a test society. On calneria at least...

RanVor

The thought that came to my mind upon reading this comment was "there must be something seriously wrong with this story if people want the protagonist to give up".

Allafterme

Such blatant foreshadowing also has a way to hilariously subvert itself in Guideverse. We shall see which way it goes...

lqueenofblades1

I really have no idea where the story's going...and I love that. It isn't predictable; something lots of stories with an MC as OP as Cat suffer from. Sure she wants an army from the Drow; but will she succeed? And if she does, what's she going to do with it? Defend herself and the Kingdom obviously, but will she climb the Tower? Or burn it to the ground? Will she raze Salia or save it from annihilation? What is the fate of the Principate; will it endure or fracture? What's Black doing? What about the Tyrant and Hierarch? What's Intercessor up to? Where's the Grey Pilgrim? What's the Princes Graveyard? What's going to happen with the Dwarves? Will the Gnomes be relevant? What about the elves and the Chain of Hunger? How does the Dead King tie into all this? If Book 1 set up Cat as a character, Book 2 was First Llesse, Book 3 was Second Llesse and Book 4 seems to be the Tenth Crusade; what's Book 5? Will we ever get a peek across the Tyrian Sea? Is Malicia losing the plot? What do the Gods think of all this? Is Saint of Swords or Ranger a bigger cunt? Will Cat get a happy ending; or will it end all fucked up like Worm? Will Triumphant return? What's going on with Warlock and Hierophant? Are the goblins really going to rebel? Will Cat make the Drow more like Black made the Orcs more? That is, will she become to the Drow as Black is to the Orcs? Will Akua ever redeem herself?

So many questions!!!! I really hope EE hasn't written himself into a corner.

lennymaster

That is one of the things I so deeply enjoy about this story. After reading over a thousand fantasy and scify books it becomes hard to find any kind of story that can genuinely surprise me. After a certain point even the most shocking betrayal and twistiest plot twist tend to be long anticipated.

TeK

Well there were some nice "Take that!"'s for many comments. But I think that Cat has a valid reason to think she wasn't good enough – Threefold Crossing. While the realities of her visions are arguable, she knows enough of Calamities to know that they're not invincible. It just as well may've happen as follows: Cat rejects the knife, Swordsman kills every calimant on Squire, Heiress becomes Squire and everything goes downhill from here. Or any other quasilausible case that Aqua seems to be so fond of making.

Now, admittedly, I am a little to eager on selfdeprecation, so my point is not objective at all.

Also, am I correct in assuming that sigil is basically Mighty and some redshorted mooks? Will Cat feed all the spare night in here to Ivah too? Will he change his name since he's no longer cattle? I mean he already calls her Queen, she clearly need to overpower him into another treacherous lieutenant, Larat is lonely.

mavant

He could be Larat's treacherous lieutenant. Let them keep each other occupied.

RanVor

Treacherous sergeant?

Miles

I wonder if it's going to be an issue that kondrog heard all that

RanVor

It didn't. It was unconscious.

TeK

By the way. Not to notpick, but IT has a cock.

RanVor

The Drow don't care. If Ivah says it's an it, it's an it.

Agent J

I thought only cattle were undeserving of a gendered pronoun.

WuseMajor

Mighty are too Mighty for your puny pronouns.

<https://www.schlockmercenary.com/2008-07-24>

Silverking

This debate reminds me of the quote, "The optimist proclaims that we live in the best of all possible worlds; and the pessimist fears this is true." Cat keeps imagining that things could have been done better, while Akua claims that no, Cat is the best thing that could have ever happened to Callow, by virtue of the fact no other option could have actually worked. If the Heavens were capable of dropping down the Perfect Restorer of Callow, they would have done it ages ago. Instead, the Callow-born Heroes got smothered in their cribs by the Calamities, and the foreign-born heroes apparently never let "the liberation of the provinces formerly known as Callow" get to the top of their to-do list (as Cat herself called out with her first conversation with the Grey Pilgrim). And, to paraphrase King Edward, no Heroic quality is a better match for a Queen of Callow than Cat's willingness to kick Callow's enemies in the teeth with all her might.

wirelessgrapes

Well, according to the Book 3 ending, where the 3 alternate lives of Cat play out, she was that 'perfect savior'. She was probably intended by the Heavens to be the better part of the Swordsman's band, but something happens and the Guide is born out of it. Maybe it's just Cat's innate nature of violent independence that drove her from her heavenly path.

The lack of observation of something does not imply the lack of it's existence.

Allafterme

If memory serves right and Akua's shenanigans can be trusted, by the time Cat would become White Knight Callow would be reduced to land of swords, pikes & spears, remnants of a people battling out over carrion of a nation. Things may be grim but at least they are not THAT bad...

MetruX

It's what Black first saw in her. When he heard the information on her, she seemed like a Hero ready to be born. When he met her, he clearly said "I was wrong, you couldn't ever be a Hero". The thing is, in the Guideverse, Heroes strive for the status quo, while Villains strive for change, in the most usual way breaking what they don't like. Just think about it, there was no Hero shown so far that didn't strive to keep things or bring them back. Cat is not that kind of person, and as such, she would need to be different to be able to become a Heroine.

Snowfire1224

Your comment of the best of all possible world reminds me of the book Candide, that book talks a lot about both complete optimism and pessimism and reject both. If I remember correctly it was written to reject someone else's optimistic philosophy that was being used to justify a lot of horrible things

Dainpdf

I find it interesting that this wasn't just what Cat wanted to hear. It was what we, readers, wanted to hear – and what we wanted her to hear.

If we forget that this is Akua Sahelian. She talks a good game, but she ignores quite a few points, some on purpose, some out of ignorance. First, the Bard made a play during this time (and outplayed Black at least once in the process). With Cat on Team Good (or whoever rose in her place), it might be that the Calamities fell. The Bard is that powerful a player.

She speaks of the whims of the fae, but really those are hard to predict in the best of days – as Cat proved.

In any case, her main argument rests on perfection being unachievable, and this recognition of faults being meaningless. Which is blatantly stupid when put that way, as is the auxiliary "but your opponents on the side of Good also have their faults". The first one is just fallacious reasoning – she sneakily assumes the only point of improvement is reaching perfection. The second is her own brand of myopia: she only understands principles as relative to others.

NZPIEFACE

Not going to lie, this is really going to bite her in the ass.

When you don't listen to the one wise person in your retinue... well, yeah.

Starting to think that Vivi is giving her biased opinions on what good advice is and what bad advice is.

Metrux

Excuse me, the only wise one? I think you have something very wrongly misunderstood. When it comes to mind, I like to cleanly separate some parts: smarts, knowledge, creativity and wisdom. Why they are separate? Why, of course because they are DIFFERENT. Smarts is your logic, your ability to think in logical paths and come to logical conclusions. Knowledge is anything that you learn, and has no value in itself, it has value when used by the other three skills. Creativity comes not only in the artistic sense, but also in your ability to think outside the box, in the way you can invent new ways and paths to follow. Wisdom is your inherent skill to know when to employ each skill, or follow your heart/instincts. A smart person knows that tomato is a fruit. A wise one knows not to use tomatoes in a fruit salad.

If you take those skills and try to compare between all the members of the woe, you may find that Akua is great at the first three, but is the worse in the lot at wisdom. Not kidding, she loses to Archer and Masego in this department, they still know when it's worth it to just let it go for others, or when to just enjoy the little things. She doesn't. Akua is all about doing whatever is necessary for her objectives all of the time, which is commendable, but really not wise.

lennymaster

I generally agree with Akua in this chapter, mostly because Cat's self flagellation has been going on my nerves this entire book, and while I would not consider her to be as lacking as Metrux accuses Akua of, but to call her "the one wise person in your retinue" is just strange.

Also, that implies Akua harbours good intentions for Cat. Which is just plain wrong.

RoflCat

A part of me wonder.

Is Akua doing this for her own purpose, or because she's part of Winter and she's being affected by Catherine (whose soul is weaved into Winter, affecting all that drawn on it) to have a self-reflection moment?

Just instead of talking to yourself, it's your nemesis, the one person closest yet furthest away from you, speak it out.

mavant

Plot twist: this Akua is a construct, the real one never got out of the cloak. The villainy was inside you all along!

werafdsaew

I thought it's pretty simple. If Cat ever abdicates, then she would have no further use for Akua, and we know what will happen to her then, so she is simply trying to prevent that future from ever happening.

RanVor

Akua or not Akua, Cat was in dire need of a pep talk. I know from personal experience that the lack of faith in one's own abilities is an anathema to ever getting anything done.

unLuckerII

Akua the Peptalker, that would be the role for her...

NotQuiteHere

It's as if Erratic needed someone to give Cat a talking too...but all the characters who should do it were away...not that it doesn't fit or that it seemed unplanned (very well done in that respect), I just spent the entire chapter going is Akua really offering emotional support?!

Thx 4 the chapter!

Coincidence

Duck autocorrect!

werafdsaew

Foreshadowing for when she becomes Dread Empress!

Metrux

You wish xD

shimizubad

Don't we all?

Agent J

Not really. Cat's slipped the leash of the Hellgods and I can't think of anything more binding to them than the name of Dread Empress.

superkeaton

Thank you, Akua, for telling Cat to stop being a self-pitying prick. And damn you, Cat, for not listening to her. It's the same shit that Hakram's been saying, that Juniper's been saying. Damnably frustrating.

werafdsaew

Wait a minute, why is having lots of farm land a bad thing?

Unmaker

It's the 'little but' part of the statement. No iron mines, coal mines, or forges to make weapons. No war colleges or wizard colleges to make human weapons. No other significant ways to make money to hire mercenaries or train defenders. So they've got what every army wants (supplies) but no good way to defend it. At least, that's my take on it.

Unmaker

The Secret of Many Lives is almost up there with Named power. And Kodrog is only one of many Mighty, and apparently not the mightiest. And each and every power of Night is somehow connected to Sve. Can she draw them all in? Or use them, even occasionally? That could potentially make her the most powerful single being around.

gloomyMoron

"Laure, whose walls had been old and half-abandoned yet still holding sorcery powerful enough to give pause to the full might of the Summer Court."

Wrong city. Laure is Callowan's capital, correct? Liese, or however it was spelled, was what was meant. The city Akua soul-nuked. The Summer Fae never reached Northern Callowan.

erraticerrata

Yup, typo from me. Can't believe I missed that.

the verbiage ecstatic

Great, the arguments I made two chapters ago in the comments about how crazy this whole expedition is are now coming out of Akua's mouth 😊 I guess sociopathic villain mastermind is not too bad as a fellow traveler?

Exec

The way Ubua describes Callow while she's freezing the wounds of a broken, half-dead warrior inches away from the grave that has escaped death from vastly superior opponents multiple times... all because Cat doesn't have a better healer to offer...

It's like poetry, they rhyme!

burguulkodar

Lots of hollow discussion here, but I concur with Akua. I never liked Cat's disgust of herself. Seems very psychotic and obsession-based, to me. In a different way from Masego, but it has always been there.

Cat herself has noticed this trait, when she pointed out in this book that it was no coincidence she murdered her own swamp self in the Named Dream, and disliked her condescending self.

Cat is in perpetual war with herself, something that is not really something pleasant to be and is prone to mind disfunction (which, frankly, she has ever been). Her impulsiveness and outright violence as a way to solve things is the tip of the iceberg for a deep personality problems.

Jeffery Wells

I love this novel, and the world that has been built up here.

It's pretty clear to me that what takes the name of Good is not inherently good, and what takes the name of Evil is not inherently evil. The only difference between them is the strategy. One is straightforward about doing evil, the other hides it behind lies of goodness. I prefer to think of them only as Above and Below, rather than Good or Evil.

The Grey Pilgrim is the clearest example of this. He speaks platitudes of goodness and light, and even fulfills such platitudes of you are on his side, seeking to guide people to be better than they are. He preaches righteousness and goodness wherever he goes.

Yet he is perfectly willing to consign tens of thousands of innocent people to death to prop up a warlord against a queen who he knows with certainty has done everything in her power to prevent the deaths of innocents. He even used this against her to steer fate like a weapon to kill her.

All for literally no reason other than that her Name belongs to the wrong team. If that is not the embodiment of evil I don't know what is.

Also the various priesthoods of Calernia declaring the least evil villain in the history of villains to be Arch-villain, while simultaneously declaring all priests of Callow heretics to justify it. If that's not pure evil I don't know what is.

That is the evil of Above – they pretend to be good to do their evil, while the evil of Below doesn't pretend.

Figurally

Yet she isn't wrong.

---

Chapter 56: Knock Knock

"Best not to think too deeply, lest the dwarves take the thought."

– Mercantian saying

The Mighty Kodrog had been granted a blanket to wear as a makeshift skirt, because I was a merciful captor, but that failed to detract from the fact that it still looked mostly dead. It'd tried to get up, after waking, but the old Foundling response of unpleasant-smile-and-knife-to-the-throat had put an end to that real quick. Ivah had joined us without even need for summons, and spent the last few moments conversing in Crepuscular with our latest addition.

"It is done, Queen," the drow said.

Informing it that 'Lately Queen' wasn't actually my title had ended the misunderstanding, though not soon enough Indrani hadn't made it part of her vocabulary.

"It's willing to share all it knows?" I asked, not hiding my surprise.

"That was not what we conversed of," Ivah said, silver eyes blinking. "It is now agreed upon that the Mighty Kodrog is no longer so. It is named Bogdan, ispe of the lowest rung. The Kodrog are no more."

Wait, had they really been talking about this the entire time? Gods, they quibbled about this stuff even more than Praesi did.

"Ispe," I repeated slowly. "Is that higher or lower than rylleh?"

"Lowest of the Mighty, Queen," Ivah said.

Well, the silver in its eyes was full but it was admittedly quite dull. I'd have to remember the terms, or see about getting a more comprehensive list at some point. Feeling my way up the Everdark's ladder one corpse at a time might take a while.

"Fine," I said. "Then ask our friend Bogdan about the dwarves. What does he know?"

Ivah spoke to the other in that strange, fluid tongue of theirs. It was hard to read tone in Crepuscular – I suspected even loud imprecations would just roll off the tongue like honey – but Bogdan's body language was less difficult to get a feel of. It looked wary, but also less than worried. Was it under the impression it could kill us all and escape if it wanted to? My knife was no longer at its throat, but I could bury a few inches of steel into its throat before it blinked. I'd gotten used to my reputation helping things along, I mused, but it didn't mean much down here.

"Bogdan requires the clothes of another and its pick of weapons before entertaining such exchange," Ivah finally translated.

I eyed the Mighty Bogdan skeptically. It was kind of impressive it could look this self-assured a full step into the grave, but my patience had limits. I flicked a glance at Ivah.

"Ask it if it enjoys having all ten fingers," I calmly said. "And remind it doesn't need any of those to answer my questions."

The drow slowly nodded, and passed that along. Bogdan's lips quirked at an angle impossible in a human, as if its cheeks muscles were entirely different from ours. It replied softly.

"Bogdan says all you attempt to inflict to them will be returned tenfold," Ivah said.

"Will it now?" I mused.

It was quicker than I'd thought. Bogdan had seen me set my knife back into Pickler's clever little contraption, and it reached directly for the hidden sheath. It was not quite quick enough I didn't catch its wrist, though, and it was all downhill from there. There was no need for a brawl: I just squeezed and the bones broke. The drow paled in pain and tried to roll away, but I put a thumb on its collarbone and pressed. The sickening crack that followed was almost drowned out by its scream. Almost. I dropped it back onto the ground.

"Ivah," I mildly said. "Inform Bogdan that if I actually exerted myself, I could punch through its ribcage and spine without so much as scuffing my knuckles. Once that's been established, tell our friend it has ten heartbeats to give me a reason not to do that. I'll begin the count the moment you're done translating."

My guide flinched and hurriedly spoke.

"One," I said.

Bogdan, eyes clouded with pain, looked at Ivah and then back to me.

"Two," I said.

Ah, fear. There was a familiar scent. The drow spoke urgently at my translator.

"Bogdan is now willing to speak," Ivah drily said.

"Its wisdom truly has no bounds," I replied just as drily. "Ask about the dwarves."

Back and forth they went, my guide going through what I presumed from the length to be a comprehensive gauntlet of questions. Ivah suddenly looked surprised, then spat to the side. It turned a trouble look towards me.

"None who were Kodrog remain," it said. "The nerezim were many, and armed for war. They moved with slaughter for their purpose."

"How many?" I asked. "Hundreds, thousands?"

"Bogdan knows not the whole number," Ivah said. "Yet more than five thousand struck those who were Kodrog, and before that ruin came there was word that the Solya and the Mogrel were struck."

My eyes narrowed.

"In sequence?" I said. "Or simultaneously?"

Ivah questioned the prisoner, receiving one word for answer.

"Same time," it replied.

"Those two names you said were sigils as well?" I said.

"That is so," Ivah agreed.

"Stronger or weaker than the Kodrog?"

My translator shrugged.

"Not much weaker or stronger," it said. "The outer rings do not often spawn greatness."

Assuming the dwarves had used the same amount of soldiers for each sigil, and that the force that'd hit the Kodrog was not the same as either of the other two, that meant around fifteen thousand dwarves. Shit. Archer was right, that didn't sound like an expedition gone through the Gloom to empty a few mine shafts of precious metals and gems.

"Does it know why the dwarves came?" I frowned.

"The nerezim do not give reason," Ivah delicately said. "Snake does not reason with mouse."

I sighed. Yeah, a monologue neatly informing me of why there was a dwarven army marching into the depths of the Everdark had been a little too much to hope for. Still, they could have dropped a smug yet cryptic hint at least. Was that really too much to ask for?

"Does it know where they were headed, at least?" I said.

Back and forth, one that lasted longer than I'd anticipated. Bogdan might actually be of some real use then.

"Before Mighty Kodrog fled," Ivah said, "it found that the nerezim were headed north. And while in flight, found tracks of others that did the same."

"Towards the cities," I said. "And the inner ring."

My translator nodded silently. I drummed my fingers against my thigh. It could be what they were after was in a ruined city, or even the inner ring, and that was why they'd come with such a large host. The opposition would be stronger and entrenched, further in. But what could possibly be worth enough that sending at least fifteen thousand soldiers into this mess became warranted? That was too large an army for simple wealth, even if there was an old treasury buried somewhere. Artefacts, maybe? It was an open secret that dwarves stole those, let a few decades pass and traded them back to the surface as 'wonders of dwarven blacksmithing' after having slapped a fresh coat of paint over them. Still, fielding an army this side wasn't cheap. I knew that painfully well. It would have to be a massively useful or precious artefact. Not impossible, and it might even be that the pit of snakes that was drow society had regressed enough it no longer knew how to use said artefact – which would make it even more tempting a prize.

That was worrying. Anything worth sending an army for would be dangerous even in the hands of a bumbler, and the dwarves were hardly that.

"Ivah," I said. "Do you know of anything important close to the north? Old ruins, or a holy site?"

"The closest city is Great Lotow," the drow replied. "Beyond it the Hallian ways lead to Great Strycht and Great Mokosh."

That gave me nothing. I knew one of those names, from – wait, Mokosh?

“Great Mokosh,” I said quietly. “That’s where you got your feathers, isn’t it?”

“That is so,” Ivah said.

“And you mentioned the sigil there was granted by the Sve of Night itself,” I slowly continued. “Is there a passage between it and Holy Tvarigu?”

“It is rumoured,” my guide admitted. “Yet none but the Sukkla know for certain, and they speak not of this.”

I might be going too deep with this one, since I doubted even fifteen thousand dwarves would be able to get to the Priestess of Night, much less killer. But there was a simpler explanation. Ivah had implied, when we’d spoken of it, that dwarven incursions were infrequent and tended to keep to the outskirts. Odds were that the method to pierce through the Gloom either required time to take place, or a non-negligible amount of resources to implement. Maybe it was wasn’t an artefact they were after. How much easier for the Kingdom Under would it be to take regular bites out of the drow, if they had enough feathers to equip an entire army?

“How many feathers are there in Mokosh?” I said. “Is the number a secret?”

Ivah shook its head.

“It is holy duty, known to all,” it said. “At all times a thousand coats must exist, every one taken to the Burning Lands replaced. Never more or less.”

I frowned. Well, a thousand wasn’t nothing. And they could use them repeatedly, or try to make artefacts of their own that replicated the effect. But my theory had taken a blow there, no two ways about it. It could be a long-term investment, I told myself. Or I could be missing key information.

“Does our friend Bogdan have anything else to say?” I finally asked.

Ivah asked, and there was a quick exchange. My translator came out of it looking conflicted, and smelling slightly of fear.

“Mighty Bogdan offers to serve as your guide in my place, after harvesting the Night from my corpse,” it said.

“How kind of it,” I replied, rolling my eyes. “There’s no need to be afraid, Ivah. We made a deal and I intend to uphold it.”

"Your kindness is great," it replied, bowing its head.

The fear was not wafting as strong, though it'd not disappeared entirely. Drow had trust issues that would make even Praesi raise an eyebrow. I rose to my feet, dusted off my shoulders. I'd come out of this with more questions than answers, but at least there'd been measurable progress. Hopefully Indrani would find something shedding light on this mess, though I wouldn't count on it. It seemed likely we'd have to head deeper into the tunnels blind to the designs at play. The dwarves would likely clear the way, which was a mixed blessing. It'd limit the fighting, but I couldn't ally with corpses. It was starting to look like my best bet was to head to Tvarigu, where the Priestess of Night would be waiting. If I could have stolen an army's worth of drow without ever shaking hands with that particular devil I would have preferred it, but choices were running even thinner than usual.

"Inform Bogdan it is to behave itself," I told Ivah. "If not, I have no qualms in doling out discipline as harsh as the situation requires. Diabolist will have a look at the broken bones, but I'm not inclined to offer too much comfort after that little interlude of ours."

The drow bowed once more, and I left it to speak with the creature that had once been Mighty Kodrog. Gods, so many names and changing too quickly. That was going to be a pain to commit to memory. I'd have to go through Archer's stuff and see if she had parchment and ink, it might help to make a bloody list. I had the time to kill anyway, we weren't going anywhere until she returned. Two hour later, she did. To my surprise, she emerged from the same passage that had first led us into this cavern.

The surprises that followed were a lot less pleasant.

—

Archer looked exhausted, more than I ever remembered seeing her. She claimed a waterskin after dropping down on a vaguely flat stone, another surprising turn. She'd yet to run out of booze, after all. Scarf hanging loosely around her neck, she dropped her sweat-soaked leather coat to the side and fanned herself vigorously enough she could only be making the heat worse.

"Had to run," she got out.

I blinked in surprise. The tunnels had so far varied between cool and outright cold. It'd take quite a bit to get her this sweaty.

"How long have you been running?" I said.

"At least an hour," she grunted. "And we'll need to get a move on too."

"You found something," Akua said.

"There's that famous Sahelian cleverness," Indrani replied. "Sharp eyes you got there. Or, well, soul bits that look like them. I'm still unclear on the fundamentals of what you are, Wasteland Waste."

"Even Masego was pretty vague," I said. "You sound like an hourglass just got flipped, Indrani. What did you find?"

She ceased drinking just long enough to pour the liquid all over head sweat-drenched hair, sighing in pleasure.

"Right," she said, wiping her eyes clear, "So I've got good news and bad news."

"Let's start with the good news, for once," I tried.

"The good news is that there's only one bit of bad news," she replied with a winning smile.

Akua closed her eyes, looking physically pained.

"I cannot believe I fell for that," she muttered.

"What's the bad news, Archer?" I sighed.

"I went looking for the dwarves ahead," she said. "Didn't run into them, but I found clearer tracks in one of the taverns. It's not hundreds, Cat, I'd say they're numbering between four and five thousand."

"Our friend from earlier said as much," I told her. "And mentioned that another two sigils got hit around the same time. I'm considering them a conservative fifteen, at the moment."

"Shit," Indrani said, scattering her wet hair. "Yeah, that makes sense considering what I found. So the thing was, I came across a tunnel going back towards the Gloom and it had a fresh trail on it. Oil spill, still wet."

"So you followed it," I said. "You came back same way we came in."

"That wasn't where the tunnel led," she grimly replied. "Went straight through another slaughterhouse, only this one had been cleaned up. Neat piles of dead to the sides. Couldn't figure out why until I went back all the way to the Gloom."

"More are crossing," Diabolist quietly said.

"You might say that," Indrani grunted. "Interesting aside, if you were wondering how they go through the Gloom? Lamps, ladies. They're going through in massive caravans carrying hundreds of them, like a giant snake of light. Pretty sure that's where the oil was from, someone must have spilled some."

"You got close," I said, and it wasn't a question.

"Stone's throw," she admitted. "Legged it when they started getting suspicious, but then I came across another crossing."

My fingers clenched.

"How many?"

"I found six," Indrani said. "But that was maybe an hour's length of distance, walking quiet. There could be hundreds for all I know."

"You think this is an invasion," I said.

"I think the nice little corpse piles we keep finding were the vanguard's work," she said. "And now that a foothold's been secured, the real army is coming through."

"And that army's marching towards us as we speak," I finished.

Well... fuck seemed to mild a curse, for once. Assuming all three forces I was also assuming were five thousand each had crossed on a single caravan each, just the six Indrani had come across would mean thirty thousand.

"The lamps you saw," Akua said. "What did the light look like?"

"Not like a candle," Indrani said. "Sunlight, maybe? Whatever it was it felt warm as the literal Hells and I would know – I've visited a few on training trips. Didn't work every time, though. One of the lamps further in went dark just before I left a place, and what must have been thousands in the distance just... vanished. The dwarves weren't happy about that."

I wished I could say I was surprised Ranger had taken her pupils into the Hells just to blood them, but it would have been a lie. She'd done it with Arcadia, after all, and it was about as dangerous a place even when invited.

"A detail of great importance, this," Diabolist said. "The Gloom seems to have properties related to the night, and so therefore the classical element of the sun would be a natural foe."

Wait, the godsdamned sun was a – yeah, next time I saw Masego I was definitely asking him for a list.

"This will be the result of an enchantment," Akua continued. "And if it is meant to last an entire crossing uninterrupted, the materials will have to be symbolically linked to the concept. Brightwood would serve well, but deteriorate too quickly. And is exceedingly rare besides. I would hazard a guess that the frame of the lamps was gold?

"Wow, Akua," Indrani drawled. "You sure did answer that question no one was asking like a champion. You truly are the bag of uselessness that keeps on giving."

"No," I said. "This is actually important, Archer. I know the dwarves are the richest nation on Calernia, but even they have limits on how much gold they can just whip out. You said the other material would deteriorate, Akua. The gold too?"

"More slowly," she replied. "A few days, if the enchantments were laid very carefully. It should allow for a passage through the Gloom."

"But not a return trip," I said.

"Not unless the fuel itself is inherently magical-"

"Which would make this the single most expensive invasion in the history of Calernia," I noted. "Though it might very well be regardless."

"-and that would add large costs to an already costly device," Akua finished, sounding mildly irritated by my interruption. "The lamps would be extremely delicate work, the slightest mistake or corruption making them useless. They would need to be constructed in a specialized workshop, preferably in a magically neutral environment. Neither repairs nor making of fresh replacements should be possible on this side of the Gloom. "

"Still not seeing why this matters, even if you're right," Indrani said, ruffling her scarf.

"Because even lesser artefacts don't grow on trees," I said. "Particularly if they need gold to work. They have to have a limited quantity of those to draw from, and you said one of the tunnels went dark anyway. There's risks of failure too. If it was that easy to mount an invasion they would have done it ages ago. This is a massive investment of resources, probably prepared over decades. They'll have had to make a choice."

"A larger number of troops to get across," Akua said, completing my thought, "or setting aside lamps to maintain supply lines."

"Keeping the lines open means leaving soldiers behind to guard them," I said. "Who need rations too, and the broader the area to guard the more mouths there'd be to feed and the more soldiers taken from the main force. And let's assume the crossing fails... one time out of ten, which seems on the low end to me. The price escalates the longer they keep at this. It'd be more practical so send one large army through with their own supplies, then let them live off the land until they got what they came for.”

“They sent the vanguard to clear the way, so the larger army can advance without wasting time on petty skirmishes,” Indrani guessed.

“The sigils of the region were exterminated quite thoroughly,” Diabolist noted. “Suppressing word of the invasion was likely an objective as well. It would allow the dwarves to penetrate deep into the Everdark before organized resistance is mounted.”

“This is going to be a shitshow,” Archer grimaced. “Living off the land here? There’s barely enough for the drow to live on. Even if they manage to keep the ranks fed while they fight out there, they’ll have to march back through a place they stripped clean then risk the crossings again.”

“Did you see any of them carrying unlit lamps across?” Akua softly asked.

Indrani’s eyes narrowed. She shook her head. My fingers clenched.

“They don’t intend to leave,” I said, voicing everyone’s thoughts. “The army’s here to destroy whatever causes the Gloom, and then the rest of the Kingdom Under comes through to take the Everdark.”

And there we were, between the vanguard and the army. Well, I’d come here expecting a magical journey and I had certainly gotten one.

Curses were magic too.

---

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

I’m lateish... no one else comment!

Javvies

This isn’t good.

It also bodes poorly for Cat’s hopes to recruit the Drow to fight for her.

I’m also forced to wonder about the timing of this.

Someguy

Actually, this bodes well for Cat. This is an expensive invasion force with limited supplies. If she does this right and fuck up the Dwarven lamps without being found or recognised, the Dwarven invasion will collapse on itself.

GuidingMoonlight

Dwarves will find out anyway, because Cat is not and never was stealthy. They almost noticed Archer. Drow are not worth the risk of pissing off OP neutrals. And they are committed to genocide of drow.

Why is she still there? Oh right because now dwarven army blocks her way out.

Dainpdf

"Neutral" is debatable. I give 1:3 odds that as soon as the dwarves are done here they spill out onto the surface to create mining outposts.

Unless, of course, the sunlight harms them somehow.

Rook

They're neutral in the sense of being equally murderous toward everyone

Like elven neutrality. Except superior, because it's dwarven.

MagnaMalusLupus

All crafts dwarfship is of the highest quality.

Decius

It menaces with spikes of cat leather.

stevenneiman

Elves aren't neutral, they're Good. Ironically they're so extremist in being Good that it almost looks like neutrality though. Their thing is that they rarely venture out of the Golden Bloom and kill anyone who ventures in except for heroes and other elves. Dwarves I'm pretty sure are neutral, in the sense of being equally willing to screw over anyone to turn a profit. The mystery here is just why they think that invading the drow is a worthwhile venture.

Hardric62

Forget the invasion, the Dwarves as a whole will be severely crippled if things go belly up here, considering how much resources this invasion must need. The smug asstards could be looking at a lot of trouble and the beginning of the end if that happens...

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Drow are ready to become refugees in need of a new home.

therealgridlock

Even better than that... Suppose she lets the dwarves "succeed", killing the sve herself, taking her domain power, taking the remaining drow to the surface, and applying her now amped up domain powers to her whole kingdom.

Shes Queen of moonless nights, but why not queen of the Kingdom of Moonless Night?

She already has a goblin settlement, on speaking terms with the dead king, the last piece of Winter, if she adopts the drow into her fold, she could scale the tower and combine both kingdoms under the rule of a new kingdom, breaking the cycle forever and spawning an immortal ruler on par with the dead king.

Heck, add in the deoraithe power and adopt the priesthood formally into the kingdom and you would have the most widely diversified power set on the continent!

And promptly get a Red Letter, prompting her to have to get every other country on the continent to ally with her, perhaps even the dwarves, to fight off the steampunk or Technopunk overlords of the world, eventually combining every form of power under one banner, and possibly settling the grand debate of Good and Evil, since she will have masego rip apart both the universe and Arcadia and whatever else the gods have for assholes and make a new world with blackjack and hookers.

Dylan Tullos

Javvies:

There's nothing in the drow lands that could justify this kind of expense. Raids are one thing; this kind of invasion is simply impractical, given the vast costs of crossing the Gloom.

My personal theory is that this is Bard's move. I just don't see why she would have prepared a move like this decades in advance, especially since the drow are a failed Evil state that never seriously threatens the surface.

JJR

Nothing material sure.

But there is a matter of Dwarven pride. All land untouched by the sun is Dwarven by natural right. If there are some, Goblins, Drow, who think otherwise; they need to be shown the mortality of their bodies.

That being said, I wonder what the chances are that the Dwarves end up digging too deep and releasing some hidden fun stuff.

Dylan Tullos

JJR:

I like your description of Dwarven Manifest Destiny.

However, the dwarves drove the goblins to the surface thousands of years ago. Even if the ancient drow were too powerful and dangerous for the dwarves, their civilization has been in ruins for millennia; this kind of invasion has been possible for a very long time.

Why wait and do it now?

Dainpdf

Maybe it has been prohibitively expensive up until now, or the political situation back home was just right... But let's be real: it's the narrative and/or the Bard fucking with Cat.

Flameburst

Change in leadership most likely. Didn't someone hint at a dwarven civil war in an interlude? My guess would be the dwarves made an uneasy peace with the fact they couldn't get to the drow for millennia until either a militant faction gained power or a war was needed to distract from civil unrest

Ezreon

Black said that dwarves are, I quote, "in another expansion phase" to Scribe in one of the interludes when Captain killing scheme was going on. This invasion was foreshadowed!

Metalshop

Here's my theory: Population. The dwarves aren't invading for anything in the Everdark. They're invading /for/ the Everdark and they're doing it because they've run out of space at home.

bakkasama

My theory is that some random drow killed some dwarves a few decades ago and harvested Night from the corpse. Given that Night also passes knowledge, dwarves are exterminating them so there is no other nation with their tech.

stevenneiman

I don't think the dwarves are technologically advanced enough to worry about that. From the sounds of it they had some cool tricks up their sleeves and superior smithing techniques they don't share, but nothing that would be worth **this** kind of endeavor to suppress.

Certainly not when they could just tell the city housing the knowledge-bearer that if it isn't turned over alive and restrained they'll wipe out the city.

Also, I don't think drow can harvest Night from things that don't have it, it's just that Night seems to grow when anything is killed by its servants.

You might be getting the dwarves confused with the gnomes, which sound like they have outright sci-fi tech and are responsible for the permanent dark ages in Calernia. The exact relationship of superpowers is unclear, but I'm pretty sure even the dwarves don't want to get a red letter, which starkly limits their technological options.

Sylwoos

How do you run out of space when you already possess the underground of a whole continent and can create multilayered living space?

bowekin

Maybe the dwarves are running out of living space.

Rook

There's no way this is just out of pride. It's too large an investment and too high a risk. Why would dwarves risk thousands of precious dwarven lives, decades of work, and a metric ton of gold to exterminate the equivalent of silver rats scuttling around in magic rat tunnels?

There is something extremely dangerous or extremely valuable at the heart of the Everdark. Or both. I'd bet bags of gems to Proceran promises on it.

Not to mention, the practical logic barely matters. It's an ancient mysterious realm containing an ancient mysterious race living in an ancient mysterious ruin of an ancient mysterious civilization. The narrative chances of a ridiculous secret not being hidden in there are as high as the chances of a hundred-step scheme going exactly as planned.

Euodiachloris

I think they are due a dose of !fun!, yes.

Sure, the Drow aren't fantastic neighbours to have, but outright genocide on the principle that everything is yours and they're stealing some of it by existing? That's deplorable.

Dylan Tullos

Euodiachloris:

Dwarves are undeniably evil racists who view every other species on Calernia as inferiors to be exploited or vermin to be exterminated. Remember, only dwarves can own property, because only dwarves are people!

However, their power means that all of the people who despise them (which is everyone) are very careful not to do anything to offend them. If Cat antagonizes the dwarves, they could destroy every city in Callow. Any solution she finds has to avoid direct conflict with the most powerful nation on the continent.

Wait, did I just say that Cat has to find a solution that avoids direct conflict? When has that ever worked for her?

Euodiachloris

Didn't say it had to be Cat providing the !fun!...

DHDragon

More to the point. We already know that Dwarves don't believe non-Dwarves are even people. This isn't an invasion to them. This is a spring-cleaning long overdue.

Sol Invictus

Dwarves dig until they dig too deep. Could they be running from something?

Raved Thrad

"We dug too deep, and we breached hell itself. We dug so deep we released Triumphant."

NerfContessa

Nahh, hell is not down, it's to the left.

Cicero

Actually this is an opportunity to recruit Drow.

The pitch writes itself:

"Hey, the merciless Dwarves have decided to exterminate you. You have no chance to survive against them. Swear yourselves to me though, and I will help you escape and give you a new place to live."

SilentWatcher

Or cat earns their loyalty by crushing them, or disabling their lamps and gets the rest of the drow kingdom. how does this saying go again? the oriole stalking the cicada doesnt see the mantis?

Unholier than thou

That would make the dwarves her enemy, and because of some story shenanigans the elves would also take part. In the end, becoming the new battle of the five armies.

erraticerrata

The timing is not a coincidence, no.

Decius

Because nothing is ever a coincidence.

stevenneiman

I don't see why. She's in the market for expendable troops and laborers, and they're very soon going to be in the market for a place they can stay where it's possible that some of them might survive.

pieter999

Idunno, those Drow are gonna need a new home if she manages to draw them out. She can't fight the dwarves, the Drow certainly can't fight them off? So why not let them have a bunch of ruins in dank caves and take the army of murderous night-mages with you?

danh3107

Far over the Misty Mountains cold
To dungeons deep and caverns old
We must away, ere break of day
To seek our pale enchanted gold.

The dwarves of yore made mighty spells,
While hammers fell like ringing bells
In places deep, where dark things sleep,
In hollow halls beneath the fells.

Yotz

Hammers will fall on Elves under the sky,
Crossbows will scythe Drow in their halls of old,
Humans will tremble, doomed to die,
For the glory of People – so it's foretold
In the lands of Under where the Kingdom lie.

One salvo to beat them all, one salvo to flush them,
One salvo to bring them down, and in the darkness crush them;
In the lands of People where the Kingdom lie.

danh3107

I like you.

Jane

Well. At least this provides good leverage for Cat for negotiations.

"Hey, the dwarves took your homeland, why not set yourself up on the outskirts of Praes instead? I can portal you there!".

...Though, somehow this seems more likely to end in a conflict with the dwarves to me, however little Cat wants to get herself entangled with such a thing. At least it won't be likely that the dwarven army can get word of her involvement back to the other dwarves?

Decius

The dwarves are satisfied with forcing the elves to live on the surface. If Cat can evacuate them without the dwarves fighting, that reduces the amount of damage done to the dwarves' weapons. Everyone wins.

Antoninjohn

The Dwarves vanguard would need to survive Cat to bring back word of her actions against the Dwarves Kingdom

Rook

The stories are going to tell of the mighty Black Queen single-handedly crushing the armies of the Kingdom Under beneath her boot

The reality will be a shitshow where she mangles herself in the usual fashion, before accidentally finding a way to trigger a magic cave-in on them. Rocks fall, everyone dies.

haihappen

She reaches the Sve, who knows the Drow are in great peril, and seeks to save her people. Or at least survive to have vengeance later.

For this purpose, she Allies herself to Cat. And how are high-level political alliances made? Marriage, of course? Or the Drow equivalent.

And so the Queen of Winter together with her wife, the First Priestess of Moonless Night lead the exodus of the Drow people into the Burning Lands. While swearing Vengeance in black blood.

Chances of this happening are zero, of course, for an uncountable number of reasons. But this would be very traditional, in epic fantasy terms. And just a little bit Anime..

Dylan Tullos

Rook:

If the Black Queen kills a single dwarf, they could wipe out every city in Callow. It wouldn't even be hard for them.

Decius

If Cat and company could wipe out the vanguard without leaving enough evidence to identify who did it, they wouldn't need more allies.

Euodiachloris

The problem is, I don't think the Drow are big on coordination. Or the whole "ally" concept. 😊

IDKWhoitis

From the Drow perspective: "Person who I will stab last, given no opportunities come up first."

The Goblins and Drow should really just get along... (You know, stab each other less often.)

Thaumaturge

fucking oof

Scholar of Time

So, calling it now... Dead King waging a war on the Kingdom Under through an opening located in their kingdom to one of the hells, pushing them to take the Everdark. Sounds like a fine way of removing two players off the underside of an already full board.

Nima

Holy shit. The dwarves in this stories like space marines from warhammer 40k

Yotz

Oh, but they are not here just to purge and burn – they are going to squat on those lands.

RanVor

In 40k, squatting isn't something people do. It's something that is done to people.

Yotz

Well, since official stance of the Administratum is to deny any rumours about existence of certain strain of abhumans, that particular interpretation of "squatting" is indeed the only one approved by Ordo Lexicanum.

Thought of the day: Digganobz.

Skraeling

Just... no. I get the reference but you know we don't talk about them anymore. Not after the troubles.

IDKWhoitis

I guess Black wasn't kidding when he said the Dwarves were in an expansion phase.

Which makes me question if Black knew, which I do not totally discount because it is Black...

Dainpdf

Scribe probably has agents in the Kingdom Under.

haihappen

Interlude coming up with Scribe bringing Black a report from said agents, giving the reader a hint on what is going on with the Kingdom Under.

My metaphorical money is on coordinated Expansion and planned genocide. With the added bonus of getting all those fancy Drow relics that supposedly exist (I mean, there have to be relics of the once mighty Drow Empire?)

Yotz

Golden lamps nothing.

Just wait until Kingdom Under rolls out semiautomatic crossbows with bolts made from depleted caelium – a byproduct of corpuscular munitions manufacture.

Also, subterrines with corpuscular furnace engines – but we won't see that until later.

Rook

Or even worse, a really big hammer.

Similar to a normal hammer, but really really big. A testament to the superiority of dwarven engineering and workmanship.

Sylwoos

I just thought of something. Are the Dwarf safe from Gnome intervention because they can't scry underground, nor use their flying ship? Those sneaky bastard remained underground to develop their technologies without retaliation, and that's why they are now the greatest force of the continent. Probably booted the Goblin to the surface to prevent them to do the same.

Yotz

Not an impossible scenario. "Can't scry" option seems more plausible, though – unless gnomish ethics did not allow them to bomb through innocent surface population, used by the Dwarves as a living shield. I mean, given the "flying ships" thing, I wouldn't put fuel-air charges and bunker-busters beyond Gnomes. It somewhat hard to develop technologies when everything connected to the surface by even the tiniest air channels will be immediately saturated with compressed sunshine in aerosol form, and everything not connected would be subjected to constant seismic bombardment until it becomes connected.

Decius

Anyone capable of developing airships but not heavier-than-air poison gases doesn't deserve to tell others what technology is genre-inappropriate.

Gunslinger

I wonder why the dwarves would need to invade the everdark. Resources? My first guess was they they've been routed from their own place by another enemy but who would be powerful enough to do that?

This book has been giving us a splendid look into some of the other races in Calernia but I wonder how they would fit in the broader plot. Drow are unreliable allies and the Dwarves are unreasonable enemies.

Dainpdf

Well, it has been established that they are obsessed with owning all of underground Calernia, much like the gnomes are with technological supremacy.

BryceWilliam

the Gnomes are pretty much just a tool that above and below agreed to both use. The gods, for some reason, don't want people to advance to far tech wise.

Dainpdf

But the gnomes themselves have the tech?

Yotz

Probably living space and excess of dwarfpower. Also, it seems that from their point of view that's not an invasion. Merely pest control. As for who could potentially chase Dwarves out of their ancestral lands... Well, let's say – children of Shudde M'ell are plentiful indeed.

haihappen

Have any of Cat's enemies shown to be _reasonable_ before?

Decius

Fenn, from chapter 1?

haihappen

The guy she baited into attacking and nearly emasculated? That Fenn? Predicable is not the same as reasonable.

Decius

If "Being able to be baited into attacking" makes someone unreasonable, nobody in the story is reasonable, including Black.

Cicero

I think it pretty clear that the dwarves are not being pushed into this invasion by someone invading them.

This is not a hasty invasion force being driven by necessity. This is a well planned invasion with decades of preparation according to Auka's assessment of their magical devices.

This is something that was planned prior to Cat becoming the Squire.

My best guess is that it has to do with internal dwarven politics. Someone came to power and has taken up the cause of claiming the entirety of the underground for the dwarven race.

Unholier than thou

The elves would be powerful enough for that, even if it's just the Golden Bloom ones. And in a lot of stories elves are generally against dwarves.

Trickster315

Now that's a grudgin

ayon96

Is Kingdom Under sided with Good or Evil?

wirelessgrapes

They're sided with Dwarves and fuck everyone and everything else, cause anything else isn't more than an animal

grzecho2222

EE said somewhere something that they are simply too big of a nation to have people on one side.

happyhavak

Are dwarves in the same power class as gnomes? Or are they just the top of the beginner village that this whole continent apparently is? And where to the giants rank? Because people seem genuinely afraid of them too.

Dainpdf

Procer apparently went to war with the Gigantes and still exists, so that's a thing.

TeK

I'd assumed that they are isolationist like elves. I'd wager top three goes like this in terms of sheer power: KU, DK (very near), Gigates/Golden Bloom (share a spot).

IDKWhoitis

If this is true (and it seems pretty reasonable to assume so), then none of the major power blocks are part of the Crusade yet. While Procer may very well have the largest "human" armies in existence, those are mostly peasants running on a very Russian like mentality of "drown them in bodies". Are the major power blocks isolationist from core values (possible), or are they afraid of something larger and meaner coming down on them? (Like the Gnomes or the Pricks Above and Below?)

Darkening

Based on Warlock's perspective fighting the Witch of the Woods, giants are extraordinarily in tune with the world and capable of using massively powerful magics because of it, especially as they get older and accrue more enlightenment or w/e, and I'd imagine they're physically powerful as well, being giants, but I'd guess they're not terribly numerous or prolific, which means that while individually incredibly dangerous, they're manageable in a war scenario, hence, procer invading them that one time.

The dwarves haven't demonstrated any machines or guns or anything so far in the series, but it's entirely possible they have them and just don't flash them to outsiders, even when they go work as mercs. It has been mentioned that most people that aren't Praes buy their siege engines from them or just copy their designs, and they're markedly inferior to the ones the fifteenth is running around with, but that could just be them giving the surface inferior designs. I'd guess the gnomes with magic proof zeppelins going around nuking nations are stronger than the dwarves, but who knows what the dwarves have stashed away. I'm gonna guess there's a *TON* of dwarves though, since they seem to have territory under basically the entire continent, and even if most of it is just distant outposts, that's still a lot of land to occupy. So, even if you didn't have to worry about them collapsing the ground under your cities, you'd have to worry about fighting a foe that massively outnumbers you.

RanVor

It was stated somewhere that they export shit to the surface and keep all the good designs to themselves, but I can't remember where exactly.

IDKWhoitis

When discussing the quality of Dwarves or their mercs this comes up often. I would not be surprised if the Gnomes were just a non-factor to the Dwarves (and vice-versa) since Air Superiority matters Jackshit underground. Even then, to bomb a whole continent seems extremely impractical...

erraticerrata

The Kingdom Under is the dominant power of Calernia, though that's not really felt on the surface since they have very limited involvement. The Gigantes fall under the 'don't poke the bear' category, but they're not invincible. Their war with Procer ended in what was essentially a horribly costly draw matched with a political 'victory' for the Principate.

nick012000

Yeah, this is about what I'd expected. Looks like the dwarves are out to genocide the drow, and it's going to be Cat who's going to be able to save them by offering them a home on the surface.

Hinkel

Is there even a place the drow could live at on the surface? I cannot imagine them basking under the sun, when the gloom and the dark is a part of them.
Maybe Cat could relocate them to Liesse or her part of Arcadia?

Decius

They would probably fit in somewhere in the Duchy of Moonless Nights.

Euodiachloris

Why the surface? She has a whole paradimensional domain/plane where their "you are what you kill" philosophy would fit quite neatly. *shrugs*

edrey

well, cat can't run from the stories that the gods send her way, specially war related. now she is in a savior story with dwarves weapons and drow's magic

Dainpdf

Dammit, now I can't get "Down Under" out of my head.
Do you come from the Kingdom Under Where Mighty flee and Dwarves plunder
Can't you see, can't you hear their thunder?
You better run, you better take cover!

TeK

Ok, this may be seem unplaussible, but what if this invasion is an act of desperation? What if Kingdom Under is somehow fucked and in decline? I doubt that EE is so cliché as to put in a Balrog and Mines of Moria expy, but dwarves sound like a fine businessman to me: they would not go onto such a massive waste of resources, unless they expected a profit bigger than worst possible loses. And what would push them now, after thousands of years? There are two more known player underground, goblins and DK. Book 3 epilogue told about black and green figures lurking under earth. I assume green are goblins and black are drows.

gloomyMoron

The goblins were forced closer to the surface ages ago. The only deep dwellers left are Dwarves and Drow. The Dwarves might be moving into their end-game and forcing the Drow above ground now that the Dead King is on the move.

TeK

Yeah, except “green figures lurking underground” is a quote from the visions of Hierarch in the epilogue of the 3rd book. Who are they if not goblins, dwarves in carnival cloths?

darkening

I believe it's a matter of depth. Hell, could even be based on sea level, pretty sure the goblin are tunneled into mountains rather than going down.

Yotz

...for the sake of Saint Phuk...

I misread “dwarves in carnival cloths” as “dwarves in carnal sloths”...

You know, image of those little critters known as Megatherium, who – probably – had mold colonies in their fur giving them distinct greenish tinge, just like their concurrent distant relatives have; combined with “carnal” implications...

...

Eh, it's not like I was going to sleep tonight anyway...

TeK

God, now I want to play Dwaf Fortress. I want to see Cat visit great dwarfian capital Boatmurdered where everyone is drunk, mad and also on fire. Something-something she stands up to dwarves, something-something they take her to King Under, something-something they bond over their mutual love to sharp things and cheap wine, something-something Callow is now dwarven protectorate.

Yotz

She must remember one thing though – well, two things: firstly, DON'T TOUCH THE CATS; and secondly – STAY AWAY FROM CARPS.

TeK

>DON'T TOUCH THE CAT

The word “cat-plosion” gathers a new meaning in the Guide. Also, carps are nerfed. I believe sponges are new kings of beasts.

beleester

Giant sponges, yes – they have no brain, no blood, and no limbs, so it's nearly impossible to kill them. In fact, prior to DF2014 they were literally invincible. Now they're merely surprisingly dangerous and hard to kill.

Decius

Cat visits Boatmurdered.
Cat leaves riding undead elephants.

Someguy

You know how the proper non-toxic method of killing an ant colony is to pour boiling water onto an anthill? Should Cat seriously consider pouring a lake-full of freezing water into the Dwarven tunnels?

RanVor

I'm afraid a lake wouldn't be enough. An ocean might suffice, though I'm still not sure.

Yotz

So.

Here's the plan.

Dwarves have a limited supply of lanterns. With high probability nearly all of them would be used to cross the Gloom, with only a small part kept in reserve on the off-chance of the off-chance.

Now, if someone are to gain control of the source of Gloom, wait until the Dwarven army gathers in one place to commit to all-out assault, and use Source to enshroud that area in Gloom...

>thousands in the distance just... vanished.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder if those that Vanish die or just get lost for a really long time?

Yotz

Well, if they get lost for sufficiently long time, they'll ought to end up dead anyway.

On the other hand, Ranger was merely thwarted, not "lost until death".

On the other other hand – that's Ranger, by all means not your usual lost one.

Also in the kit – Peregrine, who can realistically shine his way through the darkness, and the Saint of Swords, who'll just cut it until it relents.

Decius

As an added bonus, dumping the ocean into the kingdom under disables all enemy ports by lowering the ocean level.

Yotz

It was tried, once, by certain city. They dug into the dwarven tunnels and opened the dig into the channel connected to the ocean. Now there is a hole in the ground where the city was, but the Dwarves are still there.

....

typos

"fielding an army this *side* size wasn't cheap."

" I doubted even fifteen thousand dwarves would be able to get to the Priestess of Night, much less *killer.* kill her. "

""Didn't run into them, but I found clearer tracks in one of the *taverns.*"should be caverns I think

"And mentioned *than* that another two sigils got hit around the same time

Anony

"The dwarves would likely clear the way, which was a mixed blessing. It'd limit the fighting, but I couldn't ally with corpses."

Why not tho? If Akua can casually throw around hordes of undead without even a ritual just by using a bit of winter, why couldn't she use rituals to raise them an army of undead drow?

In fact, whether they make an ally here or not, leaving probably at least tens of thousands perfectly serviceable pre-equipped corpses just lying around, seems wasteful.

TeK

OMG, I just had a thought, drawing on my experience with dwarf fortress. Dwarves technically can dig under ocean, aren't they? If so, then why do we presume that Kingdom Under is really only under Calernia? It is a world power, after all. And heck, if they can, there is no limit on the amount of resources and space. Ocean cover roughly a lot of Earth's surface, no reason to think that Creation is much different. And if they are that big and powerful, what would they want from the Everdark?

The Gloom. It makes perfect sense, I mean, what dwarves need to finalize their domain over all things Under? The way to make underground literally unenterable. Not just that, put enough Gloom, and surface nations will have to buy their way to dig even the shallow resources from Kingdom Under. Just imagine, every cave, every mine, every shaft in Calernia and beyond, covered in Gloom. And the only ones who can manufacture "keys", are dwarves. It worth all those tons of gold and dwarves.

TeK

The guy below mentioned how Cat never even considered allying dwarves and he's so right! Holy shit, she actually mentioned allying ELVES of all people. Not to mention a Dead King. Yeah, at least sending dwarves an envoy couldn't go wrong. I wonder now, what if she did send an envoy, and dwarves ask a help in infiltrating drow in order to start negotiations? And well, she is probably genre-savvy enough to actually know about Unspoken Plan Guarantee.

No, scratch that. The Dead King told her that dwarves are making a bid for drow, and, in concurrence with my previous theory, for the Gloom (although I doubt he said exactly what they were after, just that they were after something, or rather, giving her reaction, that they wanted something but couldn't get it.) but he didn't say that they making the move now. Just something along the lines of "drow have something dwarves want, get it and you'll have something to negotiate with". Maybe it's not Gloom. But she said she heard about Mokosh before, so maybe it wasn't from her talks with Ivah.

But even if that's true, there's still something. Why Diabolist didn't ask about dwarves? She didn't know Cat's reasons, that much is obvious, so, why? Is it some winter stuff preventing them from actually thinking about dwarves? That's ridiculous. And Hakram, Vivienne, Mazego, none of them thought about it? Ok, so, maybe they all were in cahoots with Cat's secret plan, but what about Ubuah? Although, treating with dwarves may have gone unmentioned for a couple of reasons. First, as Black said, they are in expansion phase, so they a little more dismissive about ground vermin than usual ("They will profiteer through weapon trade, at most."), second yeah, the whole "all who are not dwarves are no people" take, though that didn't stop her from considering elves or the drow, thirdly, no real leverage, fourth, including such a major player has consequences. But those are all cases that can be made after the possibility's brought up. I'm confused.

mordered

There might be an opening here for an exodus story. A weakened people about to be slaughtered rescued and offered sanctuary by a foreign savior. There must be precedent for something like that.

kagelupus

There is an established narrative here, but it is definitely not Cat being the foreign savior come to lead the Drow to the promised lands.

Cat joins the war college and butts heads with the Hellhound. By the end of that exchange the Hellhound joins her as Cat's general.

Cat goes to Arcadia and butts heads with the Fae. By the end of that exchange the Courts are no more and the former Prince of Nightfall has joined her retinue.

Cat goes to rule over Callow and butts heads with Diabolist. By the end of that exchange Diabolist has fallen and joins the Woe as the Ghost of Hubris Past.

Forget about the Dwarven invasion going on right now, that is just there to increase tension and push Cat towards the real story. She is on a narrative path to butt heads with the Sve of Night, and there is one historical outcome of that kind of exchange.

pietromoroni

Cat goes to the Gloom to ally the Drows and butts heads with the Dwarfs. By the end the Dwarfs use the revenues of their real estate enterprise in the Gloom to finance Callow's wars, as a way to end up their part of the deal after Cat's termination of the Sve. The Drow civilization is the baby Cat had to eat.

Panic

So I keep hearing ideas about the Dwarves actively running from something or being invaded themselves and I keep thinking that isn't that the opposite of what EE wanted them to be like. Didn't EE want the Kingdom Under and the Dwarves to be at peak Power as opposed to the remnants of a crumbling Empire, besieged on all sides. Personally I call narrative on the whole thing. Dwarves have settled their other affairs and want to finish this phase of expansion by taking out the last underground power that is not them.

That aside I am a little disappointed that things are once more going to shite for Cat & Co. You can only read so much about Cat getting shat on before you no longer care. Darkness induced audience apathy and all that. It's why I dropped The Last Angel.

And I was really looking forward to Cat interacting with the Drow society that fits her so well, with a powerset waiting for her that also would fit oh so well.

haihappen

The only difference here is that everything instantly goes to shit instead of the situation first looking good or at least "kind of good", also, usually Cat or her Minions come up with a plan or a set of plans that first look to go well and then fail and Cat and her crew have to improvise, i.e. stabbing people.

Here, they do not have a plan, at most the idea of a plan, which consists mainly of "Meet some Drow, stab some of them, ally the others."

And of course it goes wrong at the second step, as the Dwarfs smash the Drows before they can stab them...

letouriste

"Best not to think too deeply, lest the dwarves take the thought."

– Mercantian saying

ok, this one is my new favourite. that's absolute gold xD well done EE

Unmaker

Given the way Night works, that saying works much better for the drow.

Yotz

Offtopic – each time I stumble upon the mention of Mercantis, I can't but remember of certain inverted mountain. You know, of "we all must profit for peace to last" fame.

DocTao

Are we sure the dwarves are a single entity?

Yotz

Dwarves are known to the surface nations as a single political entity. Whenever they are or are not wasn't a significant point so far. I'd wager they are – at least in regards to relation with the world: they may maintain a loose confederation of small fiefdoms united as a Kingdom Under, or there may be other Dwarven kingdoms under the other continents/oceans – but they all are either unknown to the surface or act as a single entity against outer forces.

Dylan Tullos

It turns out that murderhobos are no match for actual soldiers.

I'm unsure how useful the drow are actually going to be; from what we've seen, Malicia's Legions and Procer's soldiers could slaughter regular drow with superior discipline and simply pull the Might down with pure weight of numbers.

Also, they're vicious murderhobos who would kill Callowans as happily as anyone else, and their society is so treacherous that their ruling class refuses to take oaths on principle. Which is honest, I suppose, but they're honest about being completely unreliable, which is not helpful.

Yotz

They unquestioningly obey the Sve, though. If Cat manages to extract some form of agreement from her, the Drow will obey her orders.

Martial prowess is a relative thing though – yes, Drow are basically grinded down to soylent gray, but they are against the Dwarves, of whom is known almost nothing in that regard. All Dwarves that visited surface as mercenaries were, afair, either random glory-seekers or outcasts, not professional soldiers. Also, numbers. Confrontation of five-some thousand elite storm-troopers against few hundreds of nearly powerless malnourished outcasts won't produce a fair assessment of Drow military power.

So far, Drow seems to be more of a Night Lords breed as opposed to Ultramarines, though.

gloomyMoron

Perhaps you should look into reorganizing your posting schedule to give you more time to edit and/or proofread the chapters more. The increase in (understandable but simple) mistakes and confusing/improperly worded paragraphs is really starting to take a toll on my enjoyment of this series. I don't think I'm alone, but I definitely know I'm in the minority. Maybe take a break, try to get ahead of the curve... or get a trusted friend to proofread for you or... something? Just a suggestion. I'll probably keep reading either way, but I've noticed more mistakes cropping up in the past few uploads.

DroughtBringer

A lot of the Guide, and Web Serials as a whole, is that they are first or second drafts. Sure we could have someone proofread it all, but I personally like the experience of just the very slightly edited story that we get.

(Also, breaks to any degree except between books tend to be bad for web serials and they will lose quite a few readers)

limlimrevolution

So here's a question that I've been struggling with for a while with this whole Drow interlude. We had the lovely debate between Akua and Cat last chapter going over all the options available to bolster the armies of Callow and the conclusion is that the Drow are the only feasible choice. Ok, so with that being said, it's time for an expedition underground to enlist a race that is barely known to the world at large with the vague idea that Cat will be able to bully them into allying with her. Great, it's a hail mary, but Catherine is pretty good at those by this point.

But now here's a massive army of Dwarves. Why is there no inkling of an idea or suggestion of allying with them instead? They weren't even mentioned in the list of potential allies during the conversation with Akua. I understand that Dwarves are xenophobic and elitist as far as we know from the limited information we have on them from the story, but we also know that there's precedent for them being mercenaries. Is the issue that Callow doesn't have enough money to buy the services of the Kingdom Under? If that's the problem, one possibility is that Cat can offer them the power of portals, which has huge monetary value. I'm sure there are other things that they might also be interested in, but we won't know unless they ask them.

I understand that the Dwarves are known to be horrifically good at killing things and that you don't want to piss them off per Archer, but why does that preclude trying to recruit them? I just don't know why the immediate assumption by Cat and company is that they are completely screwed by the sudden appearance of this army. They came to the Drow homeland to muster up an army and while they haven't managed to gather up a Drow fighting force, they now have the opportunity to ally with a Dwarven army that's arguably better suited to fighting alongside the forces of Callow (better equipped and more disciplined). Sure, they don't have any plan for recruiting the Dwarves, but it's not like they really had one with the Drow either.

Am I missing something?

frolamiz

Yes, it is suspicious that allying with them was never mentioned.

But it is unlikely to happen, for the simple reason that it would remove all the tension from the story. Armies of Dwarves (real armies, not mercenaries outcasts) defending Callow would make everyone (except maybe the Dead King) take a loooong look and then return home. I mean, Refuge is almost untouchable because of its status of quasi protectorate of the Kingdom Under.

Others rulers also probably already tried to get them in their war hundreds of times too over the years.

And that's not even taking into account the Evil/Good battle in which the Dwarves don't seem very invested. Or are they? We learned from the discussion between the Wandering Bard and the Dead King that there are quite a few events happening behind the scenes. Maybe the Dwarves are actually too busy underground to intervene aboveground and the Drow invasion is merely the tip of the iceberg?

Or I am wrong and Cat will manage to make a deal with them, but their help will not be substantial enough to remove the tension.

Yotz

Only one thing – Dwarves are literally impossible to ally with. Proper Dwarves, that is.

Dwarven mercenaries are indeed a thing, but they hold no loyalty to anyone bar the King Under and can be outbought and used against you in the middle of combat – of which we have in-story example. Not to mention that Dwarven units behave in a manner similar to Kender Peacekeeping Corpse – as in “anything that is not nailed down is considered lost by it's owner and a rightful property of the Dwarf; anything that can be removed from its nails is considered never been nailed down”.

Decius

I thought the kender peacekeeping corpse was the offering made by an adventuring party to atone for the thefts one of their members attempted during a formal dinner with the royalty.

Yotz

This gesture may be intended so, but it never works. Half of the time such offering ends up with missing corpse, and other half – with corpse and silver spoons vanishing into thin air.

Euodiachloris

I doubt people duck and run for cover when a dwarf goes, "Oops! Tee-hee!", however. ;P

Yotz

Admittedly, old "duck and cover" routine makes more sense around goblin sappers going "Tee-hee!", yes.

Satan

Some regions of Procer are similar to France and Spain, while Atalante reminds me of a stereotype of Italy. Callow might be a bit like the old English myths. Lower Miezan is like the modern English language while Old Miezan is like Latin. And then someone decided to throw the modern US army into medieval Europe, and they've just found oil.

Levi Kalden

This seems too coincidental to not be the work of the gods below. It seems they are still pushing for her

---

Chapter 57: Betwixt

"Come now, my lords, you started this war knowing what I'm about."

– Dread Empress Massacre the First

It was too large for a pond but much too small for a lake. A reservoir? Nah, I was pretty sure that implied spadework, which this clearly didn't have. Pool, maybe. Regardless, it was a source of unsullied freshwater and it'd been almost a day since we'd run into one of those. Tactically redeploying in the opposite direction of an incoming army was thirsty work and the drow weren't nearly as enduring as the rest of us, so it was probably time for a break. We'd need a bit to refill the skins, anyway, and if there was some kind of edible creature in there it'd be a nice change of pace from our increasingly stale rations. Indrani had taken to pouring brandy on hers, though in all honesty I wasn't sure whether the taste was the actual reason for that.

"Half hour," I called out, withdrawing the finger's I'd been dipping into the waters. "Ivah, tell your fellows they're responsible for rationing their water as well as filling the skins. They're not dipping in ours a second time no matter how thirsty they get."

I could make ice and let it melt into drinking water, sure, but at the moment we were keeping a low profile. I wasn't sure whether the dwarves had some sort of device that would allow them to sense sorcery, but if they did I was pretty sure using Winter to any great extent would be like lighting a brightstick in a dark room. My mantle could do subtle, theoretically speaking, but it'd never been a specialty of mine and I wasn't willing to gamble our remaining hidden on it. My guide nodded and addressed the rest of its kind in an even tone. Ever since the former Mighty Kodrog had been disciplined and I'd declined to let anyone harvest its Night and serve as a replacement guide, Ivah had gotten much more self-assured.

Akua had voiced opinion that since it'd functioned as a lieutenant to a violent and unpredictable entity for decades, it was falling back on those habits now that it was under my protection. Bogdan wasn't too happy about that, but I'd ordered Diabolist to get the broken bones patched up and nothing more. The message had been received, from the way it was now behaving much more carefully. I got up from my crouch and sighed. Our pace was being slowed down by the drow more than I'd like, but there was little I could do about it and leaving them behind wasn't on the table. If they weren't in my custody, they'd be in that of the dwarves. Indrani was at my side a heartbeat later, footsteps so soft I'd barely heard them.

"They're getting near the end of their rope," she observed. "Might want to give them a full hour instead, stretch out the last gasps."

"We're already crawling at a snail's pace," I grunted back. "You've said it yourself, we're probably a little more than a day ahead of the dwarven army."

"Guesswork," Indrani reminded me.

"Guesswork based on the messengers you've seen going back and forth," I replied. "We're not swinging in the dark here."

She opened her mouth, but I raised my hand.

"If what passes your lips is a pun, Archer, I will drown you myself," I threatened.

There was a pause.

"Fill my skins," she offered, sounding very casual. "I'll take a look ahead, see if I can rustle up anything."

"Ivah says we're nearing the edge of the outer rings," I told her. "If the vanguard is going to dig in and wait for reinforcements, it'll be soon. The odds of running into the army have significantly increased."

"If they dig in, it's our opportunity to go around them," Indrani countered. "Best we know as soon as possible and plan accordingly."

I mulled over that. She had a point. Half the reason she wanted to go for a wander was likely that she was starting to feel like she had a leash around her neck – I'd asked her to cut back how far she went on her exploratory trips – but she was right on the nose about the vanguard digging in. My bet, at the moment, was that when they got close to the first strong drow position they'd set up and wait for proper assault troops. If we went around them while their eyes were on the local sigil, there were decent odds we could make it through without getting noticed.

"Do it," I finally said, taking the mostly empty water skin in her hands. "As usual-"

"Tread lightly, steel stays in the sheath," she finished, rolling her eyes. "At this rate you're going to get that tattooed on my arse."

"I assumed something deeply tasteless was already taking up the space," I replied without missing a beat.

"Hey, my arse is extremely tasteful," she protested.

"You're confusing words again," I airily said. "What you're looking for is tawdry."

She flipped me off, I mimed drowning her in the pool and with the traditional rites complete we parted ways. I watched her saunter away, though with the leather coat on there wasn't much to look at, and absent-mindedly tossed up the skin before snatching it out of the air. The drow were going about their business visibly exhausted, and to my quiet amusement Mighty Bogdan seemed to have no earthly idea how to fill up a skin. I was too entertained by its struggles to seriously consider offering help. Akua was kneeling by the pool as well, though her skin – which she didn't need, or use – was full. She was staring at the far wall, unmoving. A few steps took me to her side, and in a blatant abused of my queenly prerogatives I threw Archer's skin at her shoulder.

"There," I said. "Since you seem in need of something to keep your hands busy."

The shade picked up the leathery folds between two fingers, somehow managing a full monologue's worth of disdain without speaking a word.

"It smells like aragh," she said.

"So does Archer, half the time," I shrugged. "What deep thoughts did I take you away from, Diabolist?"

"I was pondering," she said, "the nature of this invasion."

"The term is usually pretty self-explanatory," I noted, only half-serious.

"Context, Catherine," she chided. "This was a significant investment of resources, even for the Kingdom Under. The kind that would have to be prepared over the span of decades, requiring specialized labour otherwise in high demand and significant preparations of logistics."

"And you're wondering why they'd bother, given that the Everdark is a mess of collapsing tunnels filled with violent lunatics," I said. "I mean, there's the obvious answer. Drow don't mine much, as far as we can tell. Lots of wealth to claim once they take over the place."

"Over time, the investment made could be recovered tenfold," Akua agreed. "Yet we both know that kind of long term planning in the highest reaches of a nation is a rarity. The expense would have to be justified in the face of more immediate uses for that coin giving more obvious benefit."

"It's rare on the surface," I said. "Where sinking that much of your treasury into anything makes you weak elsewhere and your rivals will take advantage of it. What rivals do they have left, down here? They can afford to take the long view. Hells, they live longer than humans too. This could just be the life's work of some highly influential dwarf."

How long dwarves actually lived remained a matter of bitter and divisive scholarly debate, a matter not helped by the fact that their kind lied profusely about the matter whenever they ventured to the surface. Theories ranged from a few hundred years to a couple thousand, though most scholars agreed it was under five hundred. Considering people weren't even sure how dwarves reproduced, lifespan uncertainty was no surprise.

"And yet the invasion only takes place now," Diabolist said.

I could have replied that there was precedent for the Kingdom Under evicting other underground nations to the surface largely out of principle – the goblins were testament to that – but that would rather be missing the point, wouldn't it? Dates for the goblin exodus were vague, since the Tribes rarely gave straight answers to anything unless there was a blade at their throat, but it was a fact it preceded the Miezian occupation of Praes. Which meant at least a millennium and a half ago. If the entire point of this was to remove a rival power, however comparatively weak that rival was, then they'd taken quite a while to get around to finishing the work.

"Might be it was just that one tedious chore they never got around to doing," I mused. "They polished off the rest of the list over the centuries, now they're out of excuses not to massacre the neighbours."

"Overdue spring cleaning," Akua mildly said. "This is your theory for what drives the fate of two nations?"

"You got anything better?" I said.

"Let us assume," the shade said, "that the Everdark's continued sovereignty is the result of dwarven incapacity instead of unwillingness."

"Which is a wild guess on your part," I said.

"One that aligns with other facts," Diabolist said. "Regardless, it is fact that there was a dwarven contingent on the surface during the Liesse Rebellion."

"Mercenaries," I said. "That's not exactly unheard of. They also took the first bribe offered to leave."

"Because their purpose was not to make war, but to assess the situation," Akua suggested.

"They already do that through Mercantis, supposedly," I said. "Everyone sells information about everyone else in exchange for crumbs about what's happening down here. Why send soldiers?"

"A host of dwarven infantry would represent a significant force," she said. "One which would be worthy of courting by surface powers, as the Carrion Lord did. As the Callowan rebels did, and the First Prince behind them."

My eyes narrowed.

"So you think the point was to gauge how invested all the players were in the rebellion and the wars that would follow it," I said. "They shouldn't need to go that far, Akua. Who the Hells would be stupid enough to pick a fight with the Kingdom Under? They'll be selling cheap weapons to at least half the nations involved in any scuffle. There's a reason the Principate can throw massed levies at us without going bankrupt."

"Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return-"

"Forced them to pay tribute, sure," I interrupted, rolling my eyes. "Once, after she flooded a few of their tunnels with demons. Didn't stop them from funding and arming a continent's worth of rebellions against her a few years later, did it? They just threw gold at her so she'd fuck off and then paid for other humans to actually put her down. Let's not pretend it was more than a headache for them."

"That is still precedent for a surface power proving troublesome to dwarven interests," Akua insisted. "A cautious assessment of the situation was therefore made, yielding the answer that the largest surface powers were preparing for large scale and long term warfare."

"After which they did nothing," I said. "That was years ago, and they're only moving now. I doubt it would take them that long to mobilize."

"Indeed," the shade agreed in a murmur. "They acted only after a much more recent development."

It wasn't the Tenth Crusade. There had, after all, been nine predecessors to it. But if her argument was about a power on the move that usually remained put...

"How would they know about the Dead King?" I frowned. "It's not like he sent them a letter. We don't even know how he'll go about participating in the war, and we were guests in Keter not that long ago."

"The Kingdom Under has borders with the Kingdom of the Dead," Akua said.

"Which are, famously, tunnels they drowned in lava and molten metal until there was nothing left moving," I said.

"Your argument is that the preeminent power on Calernia has no way to observe the going-ons at its most dangerous border," Akua mildly said.

I grimaced. Yeah, fair point.

"So they see him pull back his undead for a push on the surface," I mused, following the thread. "And take that as an open invitation to march on the Everdark. Why? That's still thin, Akua. If they're that worried about the Dead King, why take the risk at all? It's not like the drow are a threat to them."

"So I wondered," Diabolist admitted. "If neither wealth nor pride are the reason, then why? It cannot be room for expansion, they could simply layer deeper. Such a large undertaking could hardly be made without sanction from the highest powerbrokers of dwarven authority. That implies, to me, a strategic motive."

"Hard to guess at those when no one knows their exact borders," I said.

She nodded in agreement. I narrowed my eyes at her.

"But you have a theory anyway," I said.

"After your distant kin settled in what is now the Duchy of Daoine," she said, "the largest threat to them was greenskin raids. Yet they did not strike directly at the clans, instead raising the Wall. Why?"

Because only an idiot would try to take the Steppes. The Miezens had done it, sure, but they'd had a whole arsenal of advantages no one on Calernia could boast of having and there'd actually been orc cities to target back then. Which was no longer the case: even after the Reforms, the Clans had remained nomadic. Rulers of Daoine could and had cleared out belligerent clans near the Greenskin Marches but there'd never been a serious effort to conquer the Steppes. The orcs would just retreat deeper in and the Deoraithe armies would have to settle in for winter in hip-deep snow with nothing to live off of and a lot of angry orcs on the prowl. Which, I thought, is Akua's point.

"Containment," I slowly said. "Ratlings don't lair deep, so they'd have a free hand under the Chain of Hunger. You think they know they can't take the Dead King, so they're trying to bottle him up instead. And for the encirclement to be complete the drow need to go."

"Should any significant drow presence remain in the region, the fortresses maintaining that encirclement would suffer sporadic assault," Akua said. "To make the sealing easily sustainable—"

"They need the drow gone," I quietly said. "Dead or far, far away."

We filled our skins in silence, after that. It was a fragile house of cards that she'd built one sentence at a time, and all it'd take for it to crumble was a single assumption proved false. But it sounded like a distinct possibility. That was always the problem, with Akua. She was a skilled speaker, one that could spin a decent story out of nearly anything given long enough. But if she's right... Either the drow drove back the dwarves — and reckless as I was, I wouldn't put gold on that — or there'd be an entire race of vagrants needing greener pastures to move to.

That, I thought, sounded like an opportunity to me.

—

Archer had returned without any fanfare, before the hour of rest she'd talked me into was even over. We stood to the side of the others, speaking quietly in tongues they would not know.

"This place is about to be a war zone, Cat." Indrani said.

"You found the dwarven vanguard, then," I guessed.

She brushed back her hair, lashes fluttering over hazelnut eyes as she did. Her longcoat was open, revealing the silvery mail beneath, but she wore the metal as nonchalantly as if it were cloth.

"Part of it, anyway," she confirmed. "If there used to be three forces of five thousand like you guessed, that's no longer the case. There were at least eight thousand preparing to give battle."

"That's too large a force of a single cavern," I said.

"Not if it's a huge godsdamned cavern," Indrani snorted. "It's at least the size of Laure. There were a bunch of lichen and mushroom farms down there, I think it might have been some kind of food centre. Water too, the largest body we've come across so far."

"I was under the impression we were still a few days away from the closest city," I said.

"Dunno about a city, but there were a pack of drow there for sure," she said. "Cavern's a drop from our current height – the dwarves found another way down, I must have missed it – and near the back there's some sort of massive stalagmite melding into the wall that the locals carved into."

"Walls?" I asked.

"Nah, nothing like that," Indrani replied, shaking her head. "It's like some sort of spiral ramp going up. Pretty sure it's flat at the top, but my vantage points was sloppy. The whole thing might be hollow, for all I know. There were tents going all the way to the top."

"That's defensible against even heavy infantry," I said. "If the ramps are narrow enough."

"Our short friends were setting up a bunch of weird siege engines," she said. "Infantry's not all the drow are up against."

Eight thousand, huh. That was more than half of what I currently believed the dwarven vanguard to number, which was promising but still meant seven thousand should be traipsing around the tunnels unaccounted for. Fighting underground like this would be different from the kind of wars I was familiar with. With tunnels it would be much easier to defend than attack, as a rule, particularly if the defender had powerful champions capable of holding a narrow area against superior numbers. On the other hand, without an open field flanking operations became a very different kind of enterprise. No plains down here, no way to see an enemy detachment until they were right on top of you. If I were the dwarves, I'd station hardened troops on the flanks to keep an eye out while I was moving against a fortified dwarf position. Assuming high-ranking Mighty were as dangerous as even just green Named bent towards combat, a single one slipping through defensive lines was enough to make a costly mess. I chewed on my lip thoughtfully.

"I don't suppose you took a look at the adjacent tunnels?" I asked.

"Not in depth," Indrani said. "Glanced down a few, though, and I got the impression most of them curve towards the large cavern."

A chokepoint? It'd explain while the dwarves were willing to slow their advance to take it. Ivah's knowledge of the region was sadly limited, as it'd only crossed it the once and under the understanding it was to move towards the Gloom as quickly as possible. I wouldn't be surprised if the Kingdom Under had maps, though, and good ones. It was tempting to try to get my hands on one even with the risks inherent to crossing dwarvenkind.

"They're going to have the flanking tunnels under guard," I finally said. "So far they've been careful to allow no runners. They'll have the entire place sealed up."

"That's my guess," Indrani agreed. "So what's the plan, Your Queenlyness? We trying to shimmy through while they're busy under a touch of the ol' glamour?"

"We still don't know if they can pick up on my using Winter," I said.

"We do know they have eyes, Cat," she replied. "I'm not fancying our chances of sneaking through a dwarven blockade without a little fae juice to help things along, and you know we can't wait this out. The real army's not far behind."

I hummed, not disagreeing or agreeing.

"So we have to place a bet," I said. "If you were a dwarf and you had devices that could pick up on sneaks – a pretty basic precaution, given who you're invading – where would you put them? With the main force, or the flankers?"

"If I were a dwarf, I'd be massively rich and drunk all the time with a city's worth of naked servants catering to my every twisted need," Indrani mused.

"If you were a dwarf, but not a complete waste of a person," I tried. "I know you don't have a lot of experience with that, but use your imagination."

She half-heartedly gestured for me to go hang myself.

"Would make sense for the shortstacks to keep the trinkets on the sides," she finally said. "The stalagmite's pretty fucking surrounded. But that's assuming they don't have enough devices to have them everywhere. And that they have those at all."

"If they do have them everywhere, we're screwed anyway," I noted. "Best we can do is play the odds assuming they don't."

"So you want to take a stroll through an active battlefield," Indrani snorted. "With a pack of unruly drow, a self-absorbed spectre and yours truly. That's not one of our better plans, Cat, and that should not be a hard hill to climb given how we got into Skade."

"Worked, didn't it?" I said. "We played to our strengths--"

"Blatant lies," she helpfully provided.

"- and their weaknesses," I finished.

"Expecting sense of us?" she suggested.

"Unorthodox approaches," I righteously corrected. "It'll be dangerous, I don't deny that, but then so is every other option on the table. I think this is the least stupid risk we can take. Unless you happen to have a better idea?"

"Aside from digging our own way through, not really," Indrani mused. "And we'd need Winter for that anyway. Shovels alone wouldn't cut it, and since Vivi left we don't even have those anymore."

I sighed and passed a hand through my hair.

"Well, let's get moving then," I said. "If this was a mistake, best to know it today."

"Hey, look on the bright side," she smiled. "If this is a horrible blunder that's going to get all of us killed, then at least I won't survive to give you shit about it."

There was a silver lining, I mused. Shame it was on a cloud raining fire and brimstone, but that was life for you wasn't it? Sometimes you just had to put on your good boots, bring out your sword and kill your way to the top of the flying fortress before you got to see daylight.

The last few years of my existence would have been a lot more pleasant if that were actually a metaphor.

---

DroughtBringer

Encourage others to take the same journey through Calernia, discovering the world of Cat and the Woe much the same as we all have!

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Byzantine

It's a shame the dwarves aren't inclined to talked. Catherine could get the drow out of their hair and save everyone quite a bit of annoyance.

Rook

Don't think it would make a difference even if they did talk. We have to keep in mind that the context of this is an unbelievably large invasion happening on what is essentially borrowed time. It's taken decades of nationwide effort to prepare, years of waiting for other powers to be distracted, and tens of thousands of their countrymen's lives are on the line. They literally have not left themselves a path of retreat, as far as we know so far.

So if you're part of the vanguard that's sent out for the express purpose of killing all potential nuisances and make sure the main invasion isn't slowed down since time is of the essence, do you choose to possibly hamper or slow the invasion by letting an unexpected, unknown variable into the mix?

One that would need time to do work, time that the whole army does not have? Hinging upon the trust that their mighty force of several people will be able to accomplish the task of emptying an entire – particularly unreasonable – race from lands that they've occupied for thousands of years?

Not a chance. You immediately nail them to the wall with your 'mighty-slaying' engines of war just to be safe, because if you fuck this up your dwarven commanders will nail your ass to the wall instead.

TeK

So. Continuing one of my previous thoughts, why can't she just talk with dwarves? Aqua said so, she is a powerhouse worth treating with. She can even offer to take drow on the surface for no cost of dwarven lives. I mean yeah, it'll give away her position, but dwarves are aware of current situation, surely, they are aware of the Catherine Foundling.

Gunslinger

All of this is contingent on the Dwarfs trusting her word that the Drow would simply leave. Most likely their tenets mean they'd rather fight to the death than leave with a whimper.

Plus I get the sense that the Dwarves are rightfully confident they can steamroll the Drow easily enough

Rook

For it to work they'd be so in awe of a single surface dweller who doesn't even have enough prestige to ward off a politically motivated crusade, that they'd risk compromising what may be the most expensive invasion the continent has ever seen.

And even then only if they were so unbelievably enamoured with her relatively mundane -Villainous- reputation as to put their faith in her ability to remove an entire backstabbing, murderous race from the Everdark.

At least it might make it easier to convince them when they see that she's brought with her a jaw-dropping host of... two people, a collar ghost, and some captured drow serfs

Seriously though I'm doubting even Catherine even has much faith in her ability to square things away neatly, let alone the dwarves. This isn't a story where everyone decides to roll over in the face of the hero(ine)'s main character aura

TeK

Well, if she crosses them, Callowan cities are getting sunk underground. Going out in the open has it's downsides, true, but also it shows that you came in the good faith. She can also offer to kill them herself if they would refuse to leave.

All that aside, it still does not answer a question of why she didn't try to treat with dwarves. Unless she did and it went horribly wrong and now she refuse to talk about it. Would make sence though.

Rook

The question isn't what reason she would have to treat with the dwarves. What reason do the dwarves have to treat with her?

If she brought all of callow, all of the woe, and every legion at her command with her she still might not have enough capital to make the kingdom under change their plans. This is a kingdom that can go toe to toe with the dead king, whom her betters on the surface dread the possibility of provoking.

But she doesn't have the kingdom of callow and all her legions with her. She's got two people and some pathetic Drow prisoners. What could she possibly offer them that would be enough incentive for them to change any plans regarding an undertaking of this scale? Why would they even bother wasting time instead of turning her into mighty kodrog 2 to be extra safe?

The answer is nothing. She has no capital to negotiate with, so she doesn't entertain the idea as a first second or third choice. The same way the king of Zimbabwe would have no place walking up to the vanguard of allied forces on D-Day and trying to negotiate.

the verbiage ecstatic

I mean, you could say the same thing about treating with the Drow... what can she possibly offer them that makes her think this expedition is worth trying in the first place?

the verbiage ecstatic

I mean, you could say the same thing about treating with the Drow... what can she possibly offer them that makes her think this expedition is worth trying in the first place?

Ravin

ah but that would ruin the story...besides there is no guarantee that these dwarves are briefed on surface events, would they need to be? i mean beyond being told that no-one is paying attention at this time

TeK

Oh come on guys, you never let me have a peaceful solution. For all we know the dwarf commander is a really kind and trusting person.

MetruX

Peacefull solution? Okay, I prescribe you to take a month of leave from the guide and go read something nice, like Eragon or Metaworld Chronicles. Then you come back, ready for the full on 24/7 world of conflict we got here XD

kelioez

Bruh, don't call eragon nice(sarcastically, I assume), it might have a happy end and not too many people die but the storyline and world building is top tier and it's pacing is smooth af.

Rook

You are a soldierdwarf. Or even an officerdwarf. You firmly believe dwarves are the best and everyone else is trash.

You have some power in the field but nowhere near the top echelons of society and the privileges/knowledge that follow. You know what your superiors deem it necessary to know and what you pick up on your own time.

You're serving as part of the vanguard in a genocidal invasion where your orders are to kill everything that moves, nothing escapes. You meet unexpected moving things while preparing to kill expected moving things. Do you:

- A) immediately treat with said unexpected moving things, contrary to orders.
- B) immediately murder said unexpected moving things, per orders

TeK

Welp, what would you do if

- A) Those tings refuse to get murdered
- B) They came under the flag of truce
- C) They just don't die!
- D) Things don't attack you
- E) And also can't be killed
- F) While trying to talk to you
- ?

Rook

The premise of the entire story has been that special named characters aren't anything close to one-man-armies. Black has made it a very specific point to illustrate that even previous Black Knights – who could wield power that made Amadeus look like a child – have died to a common soldier's blade out of exhaustion.

The kingdom of Callow's great shining prince died during the Conquest by being swarmed by fucking goblins.

Catherine isn't a pushover, but this is far more than a mundane army and she's a denizen of Calernia, not dragonball z earth. If the vanguard was a fifth the size of what it is now, she and archer would still get squashed in a head-on confrontation.

Nathan Bellis

I think it would be more accurate to say that armies matter, but only so long as they have Named of their own to back them up.

I mean, high-tier Named absolutely can destroy armies all on their own- look at Catherine freezing thousands of wights solid in an instant back in book 3. The real problem is that if you expend all your energy and narrative weight destroying your enemies army, they can just come out and kill you at their leisure once you've exhausted yourself. Thus, you end up with the fine balancing act we see in canon, where it's rank foolishness for a Named to march off to war without an army, but just as foolish to expect your army to carry you to victory.

Ravin

- A) everything can be murdered
- B) its never been mentioned whether dwarves recognise the same truce rules as the surface
- C) see A
- E) see C
- F) assuming the dwarves speak the same languages as Cat, most likely they will run into some dwarven sentry, who will attack (as ordered) and things will go downhill from there....there is nothing quite like having an army of angry people whose arms are perfectly posed at approximate castration hight.

Drd

But Cat, Archer and Akua are women, why would they worry about arms perfectly posed at approximate castration hight...? o_0

werafdsaew

She is a powerhouse compared to other human powers. The Kingdom Under won't be impressed as they're the real power.

Someguy

Well, if found out, Cat can simply claim that she's here on a shopping trip for both weapons and armies & it's wouldn't be a lie.

Gunslinger

I'm totally not surprised there's Dread Emperor Massacre. I bet Cat would have loved all the High lord's getting cut down.

Lots of Dwarven politics info in this chapter that made it super interesting. Ohh and we also get an explanation as to how the underground folk feed themselves. Good stuff all around.

On a side note I was pondering on the thought that the Bard played a part in setting the Dead King lose which set the Dwarves in motion which might lead to Cat getting her Drow army. How much of this was the Bard's play? I feel like she's become the Simurgh of the Guide verse where everything is her plot.

Javvies

It's Dread Empress Massacre the First.

Which implies that there's at least one more Massacre.

Ravin

yes, well triumphant is also referred to as "the first" (though she also gets "and only")

Rey d`Tutto

Anyone else thinking Dread Empress Massacre is Cat?

Morgenstern

"The First" is basic throne name shit. Throne name counts only ever say anything about what came BEFORE you, NEVER anything about what comes after, as you cannot know that at the time of your coronation. 😊

Example: You could be the 18th and there does not have to be a 19th (but there COULD come one in times to come, you'll never know). But there certainly do have to be 17 others before you. 😊

Morgenstern

It is something special to be "the first of their name", though, that's why people say *that*, too, even though it's kinda self-explanatory.

Mostly, if a kingdom/empire has reached some age, people will just get names from some (or rather many) predecessors.

Javvies

As I understand things, if you are the first one to use your Reign name, you are normally referred to without a number until there's a second person using your reign name, then you're referred to as The First and the new one is referred to as The Second.

Triumphant being referred to as First and Only to me implies that Triumphant is no longer considered an option to be chosen as a reign name. That the name Triumphant had been retired. Sort of like when sports teams will retire the jersey number of a great player – nobody else gets that number.

Ie, it's Pope John Paul the Second, Pope Benedict the Sixteenth, and Pope Francis (no number until there's a Pope Francis the Second).

Rook

A plan hinging on Catherine's subtlety and ability to remain undetected .

I see no possible way this could go badly.

wyaldriddler

"`The last few years of my existence would have been a lot more pleasant if that were actually a metaphor.`"

Hah!

Hahhahahahahahahahahaahahahahahah!

Javvies

That's a reasonable theory.

And the motive – containing the Dead King, is not a bad one.

Waiting for the Dead King to be distracted isn't a terrible idea either – it's certainly going to be better and easier than if he weren't distracted and decided to actively contest their attempts to contain him.

Of course, that implication ultimately saddles Cat, if she succeeds, with responsibility for the Drow. Either to find somewhere to settle them and keep them under control or to use them up until they are few enough left to kill them all.

And it isn't like the Drow are popular with anyone, which will cause Cat more problems.

Azure

Its also a huge opportunity for the DK to strike at the dwarves. Seriously I'm trying to figure out why he hasn't gone for those lanterns. They think he's distracted but meanwhile he's just waiting to take them out.

Justin

Not a huge fan of this chapter. I appreciated bringing together thus far disparate elements in the Dead King and the Dwarves but the Archer/Catherine banter felt forced and the Drow as a whole are just not that interesting. They are coming off weak and lacking in identity, which makes me regret that so much time is being spent on them.

Djinn O'Cide

"The last few years of my existence would have been a lot more pleasant if that were actually a metaphor"

Doesn't this sentence dramatically change the nature of the story as a whole? Thus far, the narrator has been using pretty much entirely present-ish tense, as if she's describing events as they unfold, or at least as they occurred in the recent past.

Now, suddenly, she's switched locations in time—and form also. She's suddenly describing events which happened in a more distant past—while implying that currently she is a being who no longer exists...but remains able to tell the story.

PapaWalrus

I think in this case "last" is not "final", "last" is being used as "previous" (see Definition 2 here: <https://www.dictionary.com/browse/last?s=t>)

Javvies

No, it works fine as is.

In this context, read "last few years" as "previous few years". Similar to "the last few days the weather has been awful for anyone on the Mid-Atlantic in the USA".

The "of my existence" would probably be "of my life", except Cat's body isn't exactly alive – or consisting of biological processes – these days.

More broadly, it's a reference to Akua's Folly having been a thing that actually happened.

Morgenstern

"of my life" always implies "of my life SO FAR". It does NOT always imply a recount via someone on their deathbed or even already a shade looking back at their life, that's just some relatively seldomly used narrative trick.

Morgenstern

I.e. it's a perfectly fine sentence for the -Cat of that very moment in her story- to say.

TeK

Oh, come on, they're like puppies. A big, dark, murderous puppies of the Night.

Euodiachloris

Whoever generated this Night thing needs a clip around the ear, frankly. Because nightlife isn't all stabby-stabby, kill-or-be-killed.

Families den up at night while their children play (in the smallest possible hours, usually making a racket); those for whom night is their main shift go about their active lives doing creative or destructive things while being safe from eagles; stories get told; crafts get crafted on by firelight, main meals get eaten; it is the best time for life in hot deserts... and so on and so forth.

The drow got majorly short-changed and should demand their money back. 😏

alvibo

If it's so bad to provoke dwarves I wonder why Cat doesn't use her powers to change the appearances of herself and others as she's done with Akua once already. Using Winter to any meaningful extent would still be a giveaway, but at least she wouldn't risk as much just meeting with dwarves somewhere along the road.

Morgenstern

Are you suggesting impersonating dwarves to get through? (Just what this comment made me think of.) Sounds hilarious... to see how it failed, of course. Because I don't see that working in the Guideverse. Or at least not without other problems arising from doing so, like being "caught" as a dwarf moving away from their line, not doing what they're supposed to do. 😏

Morgenstern

And yeah, they totally won't take THAT as (even more) offensive, if found out ^^

nick012000

Akua's speculation on the Dwarf's motivation is interesting. I just assumed they were ideologically-driven to murder all the drow for having the gall to live underground.

MetruX

Why mean... Why can't it be both?

Shaerick 68

Dwarves that flood places with !!MAGMA!! to ward off an undead threat? Wonder if they got a fortress called Boatmurdered...

Morgenstern

I instantly had to think of the Hobbit. *wistful

Morgenstern

(The movie I mean. With the "undead" in the sentence being replaced by "dragon".)

anonymous4968

Dread Emperor StarkRavingMad the First was a ride.

Antoninjohn

Procer is above ground and away from the little bearded folk so why don't you settle the Drow there then it's Procer's problem

RanVor

Because the Dead King is on the march. Procer will need everything it has to stop him and adding new threats to the mix will only increase the chances of failure. Cat doesn't want them to fail. She needs the Principate on its knees, not six feet under.

Aston

Drow get to move to Arcadia.

Best. Move. Ever.

Oshi

You joke but I'm actually thinking this is exactly what she might do.

Drd

Favourite comment, had me in stitches. :]

GreenSunLuminary

Aww, hell, I just realised, the kingdom under are practically memetic Dwarf Fortress dorfs aren't they? What with the refusal to acknowledge ownership of other races, and the ludicrous overkill responses to any slight, and tunnels filled with magma, and the only thing that ever stopped them was High level FUN being summoned into their tunnels

Decius

That penultimate sentence barely isn't a metaphor. It's at least unforgivably hyperbolic. When was the last time Cat saw literal daylight? Plus, Liesse wasn't flying when she had to murder her way to the top of it.

Me

... Is it just me, or Cat is drowning in puns?

superkeaton

Ah, the refugee ploy. Chancey, but predicted.

Morgenstern

I kinda wonder why they didn't just think of using the refugees from Praes to till the fields, seeing how they're worried they won't have enough hands left to till the fields / risk a hunger crisis... why the focus on needing an *army*? Which could do much, much worse things, if they don't behave than people on the fields could...

Nationalism?? (AKA don't let Callowans take the field, so they don't die, use other people?)

Morgenstern

I mean, as if it seems you could trust the people from the Everdark, be they "drow" OR "meat" any better than the refugees from Praes. If you're so afraid of betrayal, why look to someone who has seemingly made betrayal their shtick even WORSE (down to the last rungs of society, no matter if they lived their whole life as "meat" or not) – instead of the commoners from Praes (that Cat herself has more than once included in her thoughts about how the peasants etc. are just normal innocent people going about everyday business, downtrodden and not responsible for what the nobles do, like anywhere else), even though they are bound to have some *agents* in their middle? SOME agents versus ALL OF THEM being all about what you fear. This current plot seems somewhat forced and/or Cat thrown the idiot ball to me, considering this part of the whole thinking-through what you need to hold Callow "above water" and, most of all, FED. Because tilling the fields seemed to be the most prominent reason WHY she can't have every one of her peasants trained for the killing field, i.e. not wanting their volunteering all *that much*... or did I miss something there? oO

DD Durnell

The direction of this story will ruin Cat's plan of eventual retirement/abdication, assuming drow relocation to Callow is in the cards.

A race of stabbing murder faces must be controlled with a firm hand, lest they kill off productive, innocent citizenry. Unless they abandon their moronic tenets, Cat will need to stay in permanent control to keep them as docile as possible. Which will probably mean putting down sporadic rebellions, etc.

In the long term, they don't seem worth it for the short term gain of a handful of undisciplined troops.

Maybe if she kills off the Sve...

---

Chapter 58: Quiet

"May the Heavens strike me down if I lie. Again."

– Dread Emperor Abominable, the Thrice-Struck

No one in living memory had seen a dwarven army take the field, not on the surface anyway. Even with all the dangers swirling around us I'd been looking forward to that part. Since becoming the Squire I'd scrapped either with or to the side of most the famous militaries: the Legions of Terror, the Spears of Stygia, Helikean exiles, both fae Courts. My own people in rebellion, Akua's host of old breed Praesi. The Tenth Crusade too, though in all fairness I'd seen neither hide nor hair of soldiers that weren't Proceran in the northern campaign. There was little left to account for. The other cities of the League were hardly known for their soldiery – apparently Bellerophon didn't even have career officers, which just boggled the mind – and Ashur was primarily a naval power. The Dead King and the Chain of Hunger were the last two contenders, since the elves didn't really fight wars. I'd be facing the former sooner or later, and the latter was allegedly more horde than host. With the drow having proved to be a pack of squabbling assholes bleeding themselves over the right to be Creation's ricketiest demigods, the only force of note that remained was the Kingdom Under. Juniper, I thought, would have given her right hand to stand in my shoes right at this moment.

Indrani had led us to the same perch she'd used on earlier trip, and for all that it felt overly exposed it did give us a perfect view of what took place below. She hadn't been overselling the size of the cavern, I quickly found out. Large as Laure might, if anything, be an understatement. There were a lot more people in Callow's capital, of course. Maybe half the cavern was taken up by a lake, which to my mild interest revealed itself to be another food source for the locals. There were fish farms, walled in with stones, and what I was pretty sure was crab traps though the creatures writhing inside didn't look like any crab I'd seen before. Most of the rest was 'farmland'. Raised stones covered with thick lichen, mushrooms patches and what looked like some strange cousin of potatoes wherever the dirt was thick enough. Most of that was now occupied by the dwarven vanguard. The only drow holdout was the massive stalagmite in the back that Indrani had mentioned, though she hadn't done the sight of it justice with her short description.

At the base, it was about as thick as fortress. Archer had labelled the path up as a spiral, but the angle was too sharp for the term to really fit. It zig-zagged across the sides of the stalagmite with precision too defined to be anything but manmade, the parts of the path that passed between the stone spire and the wall of the cavern effectively tunnels. There'd been tents there before, but they'd been flattened or taken away by the drow awaiting the assault. Which was coming soon, there were no two ways about it. I could tell as much just by the way the army had been positioned. At the bottom of the stalagmite a force of three thousand was standing patiently, and I'd almost let out a whistle at my first good look. Dwarves were known for their heavy infantry as well as their lethal contraptions, but these soldiers went a step further than I'd expected. It was like looking at walking barrels of steel. It was plate, in the sense that their armour wasn't mail, but layered so thickly no a spot of dwarf could be seen underneath. Not even the famous beards: the helmets bore face-covering masks that ended in a sculpted steel beard where I assumed their actual beards lay protected. The weight of that should be too heavy for even the famously physically strong dwarves to be able to move in, so while there were no runes to be seen on the surface I assumed some had been inscribed beneath. To a dwarf, they bore long halberds with steel shafts that weighed enough even Hakram would have difficulty swinging one around.

They're weren't infantry so much as a company of walking battering rams.

The five thousand remaining dwarves were less heavily armoured, at least. Three divisions of a thousand each wore ornate but otherwise unremarkable plate, with square shields and war hammers. They all had crossbows on their back. I was classifying them as regulars in my mind, though in anyone else's army they would be heavies. The last thousand was... interesting. The most lightly armoured of the lot, with only steel cuirasses over leather and plumed helmets that left the faces bare. They attended to the three dozen war machines the vanguard had set up in a crescent facing the stalagmite. If Juniper would have given a hand to see the battle, then Pickler would have eaten her firstborn to get a good peek at those. About half the machines looked to be some kind of fat steel ballistas raised on wheeled platforms. Not even the rope was, well, rope. It looked to be some kind of woven metal chord. There were wagons full of spherical projectiles next to them, two per ballista. The remaining half of the engines was hard to classify. The basic shape was like an onager's, more or less small and portable catapults. What a scorpion was to a ballista, though my sappers would string me up for making so broad a comparison. The similarity ended at the shape, though. The steel base had been nailed to the floor with spikes almost as large as the engine itself, and instead of spheres to throw the already-loaded projectiles looked like elongated battering rams in a metal I did not recognize.

I wasn't sure what those were meant for, but I doubted the drow would enjoy it.

The last of the dwarves were maybe two hundred, including what I was pretty sure was their command staff. Their armour was closest to that of the regulars, but lined with enough precious stones to steady Callow's treasury for a good year. Unlike the grunts they were mounted. No horses, though. Best way I could put it was the unholy offspring of a lizard and an insect: the creatures were scaled and their reptilian heads had an impressive set of fangs, but their legs numbered six and were strangely segmented. They had three claws at the end of those, though they looked like they'd been blunted. Those officers were only around four dozen in number, and the remainder was unlike any other troops I'd seen so far. They wore heavy cuirasses and mail beneath them, but no helmet and both hair and beard were almost obsessively braided. Their weapons were not standardized, ranging from greatsword to some kind of chain with spiked weights at the end, but the eye-catching part was the trophies dangling down their bodies. Skulls and claws, stingers and broken weapons. Indrani caught me looking and leaned closer.

"Deed-seekers," she whispered. "Met of few in Refuge. They're after things they're not supposed to get according to other dwarves, so they're trying to earn enough glory that they become worthy of getting them. Some came up to hunt in the Waning Woods. Heard others go through the gate in Levant to have a tussle with the stuff in the woods there."

"They any good?" I whispered back.

"Ran across one who broke his hammer on a mantichore's horns so he beat it to death with his bare hands," she said. "And I'm not talking a juvenile, the thing was fully grown. They're pretty hardcore. Polite for dwarves, though. Those I met knew surface tongues and they were willing to pay for guides."

"So crazy of the dangerous kind," I grunted. "Just what we needed."

The conversation ended there and for good reason: the dwarves were on the move. There was no horn, no trumpet or warning. The ballistas just shot their first volley and the battle began. The projectiles, round orbs of steel, smacked into the upper reaches of the stalagmite. They'd been denied a better target: the drow were holing up out of sight. Rock shattered under steel and the whole spire shook. My brow rose at the sight. Those hit a lot harder than anything my goblins had ever cooked up.

"Flushing out the drow, you think?" Indrani said.

"If that stalagmite is solid rock, it'll take them a while to make a dent even with strong engines," I said.

Twenty heartbeats later the second volley hit, hitting the same places with impressive accuracy. The drow remained in hiding, which I honestly couldn't fault them for. Between the crossbows and the siege if they made a stand anywhere in the open they'd get slaughtered. Their best shot was to make the dwarves come to them and hold a narrow passage hidden away from the engines. Alas for the locals, it was not to be. Three volleys later the entire stalagmite cracked. I could see the fracture going through the side, jagged and large enough to be easily visible even from where Indrani and I were laying on the floor. The entire top third of the spire had been cracked, at least on the side facing the dwarves. Had the thing been hollow? Maybe. Still, crack or not the weight of that upper third was keeping it in place. My eyes moved to the second kind of engines, anticipating there would be answer to that. My instincts had been correct. The almost-onagers were being seen to, long steel chains being attached to the back of the ram-like projectiles. The chains led to matching cranked wheels, already nailed into the ground.

"They're going to pull the damned thing down," I murmured.
"Gods."

How? Even if they put dwarves to work the crank, they shouldn't be strong enough to apply sufficient pressure. The rams flew and sunk into the stone like a knife through butter, shivering after coming to a rest. There'd been sorcery at work, I thought. Blades unfolding inside to give greater grip? Impossible to tell. Anyhow, my first question got an answer moments later. Only a single dwarf attended to each crank, but the moment they laid hands on them the wheels lit up with runes. Not even thirty heartbeats later, the whole upper third of the spire came toppling down. They'd angled it so it fell into the water instead of on their own troops, though the great splash wet a few of them anyway. My eyes narrowed as I returned my attention to the stalagmite. It was hollow. The drow inside were swarming like a hive that'd just gotten kicked. The angle of steel ballistas was adjusted, projectiles from the second wagons loaded, and the volley arced up moments later. The spheres were stone this time, not steel. I did not wait long to learn why: at the summit of their arc, just above the hollow, they burst. Burning rain fell down, reaping a harvest of screams and death.

"Lava," I quietly said. "That was fucking lava."

"I mean, it's not like they're ever going to run out," Indrani mused. "I can see the logic behind it."

"Don't you try to make it sound like it's reasonable to shoot magic lava stones at people, Archer," I hissed. "Who even does that?"

"The dwarves, evidently," she said.

Sadly, throttling her might have given away our position so it would have to wait. Our time to move was fast approaching, though. The moment the dwarven infantry engaged we'd be trying our luck at sneaking through. Our exit tunnel had already been picked out, and we had a route across that wouldn't take us too close to the fighting. The drow had been on the defensive so far, but since it'd become clear that the dwarves had no intention to climb up and the alternative was remaining inside a hole that'd slowly get filled with molten rock they were finally coming out. It was the first time I was having a look at a drow force that wasn't already a pile of corpses, so they earned my full attention. This is not a professional army, was my first thought. Even Proceran levies had officers and an order of battle, but the drow? This was a tribe of warriors, with not a single soldiers among it. I could make out the hierarchy by the way they were equipped. No steel to be found on any of them, but there were tiers of a sort. The lowest of the low wore skins and leathers, armed with spears and blades. I winced when I noticed some of those blades were bone. That wouldn't even scratch the dwarven armour.

Higher up the ladder, and fewer in number, there were drow in obsidian and stone. The equipment was not uniform, some of them having what I'd consider decent armour while others wore essentially the same as the first batch only with dangling bits of stronger material over it. Their weapons were mostly iron, of passable make. They'd at least manage to leave a mark on the enemy before being slaughtered. The last and rarest were those I assumed to be Mighty. Only a dozen of them, but they stood out starkly from the rest. Garbed in long flowing robes of Night with shifting plaques of iron in it, they moved swift as arrows through the charging crowd. Spears were the only armament they seemed to wield, with what I was pretty sure were sharpened ruby heads. Wasn't sure how that would measure up to steel, though I did remember rubies were supposed to be one of the harder gemstones. The whole muster of the sigil was maybe two thousand. They'd get brutalized when they got to the bottom of the spire and engaged the dwarven heavy infantry, but the dwarves seemed disinclined to allow even that.

One of the mounted officers brought a horn to his lips, the first signal of the battle, and the deep call got the regulars moving. The square shields were set down to cover their bodies, crossbows taken out and the proverbial fish in the barrel got that same proverbial end. It was a relief to see that their firing rate was lesser than that of my legionaries. The range, though, was at least double. I would not want to fight those on an open field. The bolts scythed through the drow as they kept charging down the ramp, though only for the lesser warriors. The rest melded into the shadow-state when they saw the volleys approach. The ballistas had never ceased firing, slowly emptying the wagons of projectiles. Lava kept raining down into the hollow spire. The screams hadn't ended either, and I was fairly sure the only warriors in the cavern were the ones charging to their doom. It would have been interesting to see how Mighty fared against dwarven infantry, but I didn't intend to stick around until the final clean up. Their attention should be on the drow, for now, and that was our way out. I elbowed Archer and gestured towards our back. She nodded and we crawled out of sight before rising. The others were a short ways back, Akua keeping an eye on them.

They'd been waiting on us, and there was little need for conversation when time finally came to move. The plan was fairly simple. Indrani had the rope and hook to allow us to climb down to the floor of the cavern below, and the drow should have no issue managing it. The only thing up in the air was whether or not our friends would pick up on my use of Winter, and there was no real way to know that without trying it. Glamour shouldn't draw as much attention as more direct uses, so it was as calculated a risk as we could take. I returned back to the edge, and with a deep breath allowed Winter to slither through my veins. I kept it simple, erasing our presence to the senses – I wasn't sure whether the dwarven mounts could smell us at a distance, but I wasn't about to take the risk. The working wasn't too complicated, but it would take concentration to keep it going. The moment it settled, I glanced down at the battle. The dwarves had not stirred, which was promising. I gestured for the others to begin climbing down.

It was a tense half-hour before everyone made it to the cavern floor, shimmying down before Archer tugged back her rope. I'd not been certain whether or not I could keep the glamour going while having to focus on going down the rope, so an alternative solution had been required. The working should take care of the sound, and that was the important part. I glanced down and shrugged. Only thirty feet or so. I'd fallen down worse before. I leapt. Wings would make this much easier, admittedly, but they would require drawing deeper on my mantle. Besides, I mused even as the ground came ever closer, I'd been meaning to find out something. If I could turn myself into outright mist, finer manipulations should be possible as well. I landed on the stone in a crouch, having meddled with my legs, and found mixed results. Strengthening my knees had succeeded at making sure they wouldn't break, which had been my main objective. Sadly, it'd also torn up whatever smoke and mirrors passed for my leg muscles these days. Half a win, I decided, adjusting my cloak where the fall had put it in disarray. The muscles were already reforming. Next time I'd have to see if I could make the entire legs solid without rupturing my insides above them.

The others clustered around me without a word. I'd made it clear that the closest to me they stood, the easiest it was to keep up the glamour. Our way through was still open, thank the Gods. Dwarven forces had been placed to prevent the drow in the spire from escaping, not occupy the whole cavern, which was too large for that regardless. It meant that if we kept close to the wall on the left side, we avoided coming close to the battle. In a strange and silent pilgrimage we tread through moss and mushrooms until we were hugging the wall and began our way through. My control was not fine enough to erase our footsteps, I'd warned them. It took longer to go through while avoiding leaving visible marks on the ground, but there was no other option. I'd never kept a working going this long before, and now I knew why I'd unconsciously avoided it: the longer I did the more I could feel Winter's influence creeping into my mind, even if I was drawing no deeper on my power. Fortunately, Akua was there for me to shunt the influence into. It was almost tenser to stalk through unseen than take part in the fighting, I thought. Battle I knew well, but this? It wasn't my wheelhouse. It took us most an hour to get across, and by then there was not a single living drow left.

I'd not had a good look at the last of the fighting, but the dwarven heavy infantry hadn't been shaken by the doomed charge of the Mighty in the slightest. The regulars had gone up the slope afterwards, into the hollow part, and soon after the screams had gone silent. There'd never been a chance the drow would win this, and the outer rings were supposed to be the weakest part of the Everdark, but if this was a sign of what was to come... Well, I didn't fancy the chances of the drow as a whole to turn back this invasion. I allowed the thought to fade as we neared our chosen tunnel. Archer hadn't had a chance to take a look inside, but she'd noted it was the most lightly guarded. Ivah had gone through one close to it, on its way to the Gloom, and assured us that after another large abandoned cavern it led into a mess of small paths. Enough that it would be more or less impossible to keep an eye on all of them. It was a detour, taking us to the northeast when the quicker route would have been straight north, but a few additional days were well worth keeping out of sight. I was an old hand at disaster, by now, so my nerves grew more ragged as we neared the exit. If this was going to fail, it was going to fail now.

There were dwarves near the tunnel, but only a small company. Less than a hundred. It was my first time coming this close to their kind, but I did not slow to take a better look. Distractions were the enemy of this not-fight. I did note they were regulars, however. Those in layered armour might not be too common. More importantly, they were dawdling near the tunnel and not blocking the exit. We passed them by, step by step. I felt a dim spike of fear when a pair began talking loudly in some dwarven tongue, but they began brawling not long after and I let out a relieved breath. My shoulders loosened as we left them behind, allowing myself a strangled laugh. I wasn't a fool, of course. I wouldn't drop the glamour until we were much further in. But it looked like – no, I wasn't going to finish that fucking thought. Never count the chickens, Catherine, even when they're hatched. The Gods will shove them back in the fucking eggs just to spite you. Being absolutely still in the middle of the metaphorical woods, we pressed on. Archer took the lead, Ivah at her side, and they took us through a handful of short passages in quick succession. It was maybe another quarter hour until we reached the large cavern Ivah had mentioned.

Abandoned was something of a misnomer, as it was currently full of dwarves. Slightly more problematic was the way my glamour was ripped apart before we even entered. Runes shone on the tunnel walls, panes of force fell down around us and dwarven yells sounded in the distance. I looked up angrily.

"Can I really not have a single chicken?" I complained. "You tight-fisted assholes."

---

Droughtbringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote everyone! Should be fun, think of all the amazing satisfaction that you will have by knowing that, thanks to your contribution, the Guide will be on top!

Droughtbringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote everyone! Should be fun, think of all the amazing satisfaction that you will have by knowing that, thanks to your contribution, the Guide will be on top!

TeK

YEEEEEEES. THE DWARVEN ANSWER TO EVERYTHING! POUR SOME LAVA ON IT!!

Decius

There's more than one way to skin a !!Drow!!.

Antoninjohn

Cat you can shape shift into a giant chicken with the power of Winter

Someguy

No chickens Cat. The Gods Above and Below do not play ball unless you play Stupid Good/Evil on their terms.

Jane

Look at the bright side, Cat; you wanted more information on Dwarven forces, and now you're going to see them firsthand! You missed most of the massacre, so this is the perfect opportunity to make up for it!

Joking aside, it was a real missed opportunity to leave Thief behind. Pinching some of that fancy, expensive armor could totally have solved Callow's budget issues, and swiping a siege engine or two could have really advanced Callow's military science – if they were willing to risk exposing the fact that they were the ones who stole it to the rest of the dwarves, of course. Ah, well, not like they knew they'd be seeing dwarves down here...

Euodiachloris

Given that Cat's glamour got torn to shreds, I'd not bet on even Thief's dimensional pocket going unbreeched. And, getting caught with dwarven loot = whole new vistas of badness. <_<

RanVor

Assuming they would manage to sneak away with the armor, which is unlikely, nobody right in their mind would buy a stolen dwarven property.

Jane

You can pry out the gemstones from the armor, and sell those separately. Nobody'll think you were crazy enough to steal a bunch of rubies from dwarves,

It's a waste of fine craftsmanship, but it would still solve their money problems.

Dylan Tullos

Jane:

"Stupid enough to steal from dwarves" is a popular saying in Calernia.

It's deliberate exaggeration, of course, because no one is actually stupid enough to steal from dwarves. This is a people famous for their disproportionate retribution. One gemstone could cost you one town; one dead dwarf could cost you Laure.

Jane

Yes, but they're in the middle of Drow territory at the moment, a place that no surface-dweller has bothered going to in centuries (Ranger aside) – if they were to wait until the Dwarves made camp, and Thief yanked a few suits of fancy armor under cover of invisibility, wouldn't it be far more likely to for the Dwarves to blame the Drow than a human they never saw?

Afterwards, they could recut the gems (just as an additional precaution), and sell them in Mercantis, using Thief's agents in Procer for further caution.

With this much money (even accounting for the fact that Cat was likely exaggerating their value, and the consequences of unloading so many gems on the market at once), she could easily levy Callow's soldiers and import enough grain to avoid crippling the country; even better, with one of the continent's most fertile countries not producing for the year, she'd probably end up causing famine across everywhere else on the continent, and be one of the only countries in fighting shape next year.

The gold would be a more reliable ally than the Drow, and if she could return home after shadowing the Dwarven army for a single night, that would be far less likely to result in conflict than going on a long quest like she is now. Don't you agree?

I mean, setting aside the actual story for a moment and the fact that Cat's going to find some important things down there, of course.

RanVor

It's all very cool and stuff, but you're missing a very important point: it's not about money. The people who are so eager to be recruited now aren't going to be stationed in the outposts. They're going to be thrown into what might very well be the bloodiest meatgrinder since Triumphant. Even with allies, the casualties are going to be horrific. And when they die, who is going to take care of those fields? You can buy enough grain to last a few years, but it won't do you any good when your workforce is crippled for generations.

filtern

And the fact that no one would sell grain to her if she was an enemy, and she is an enemy to absolutely everyone. No one would willingly give Callow grain if they needed the supplies themselves.

Jane

There's already a ton of refugees from Praes, and soon there are going to be a ton of refugees from Procer; if Cat were to establish communities for them in her own country, she should be able to replenish the losses. Being a Villain is a bit of a barrier, true, as is the traditional hostility between Procer and Callow – but when the Dead King is claiming principality after principality, that has a way of ending up overlooked.

That aside, though, the diminished workforce isn't as problematic as it seems – Callow's ability to grow food decreases with the population she'd be sending to war, true, but so too does their demand for food. The only reason she'd need to import food at all is because not all of them will end up dead in the war. And it's true that this will hamper Callow's ability to export food, leaving them with little in the way of currency... But it's unlikely that the imports Callow would require would exceed the amount they could sell a few sets of gems for. So long as she doesn't go crazy with the spending once peace is restored, she can probably sit things out for a generation.

That said, though, my argument was tailored along those lines mainly because I know how much Dylan disapproves for seeking an alliance with the Drow, so I thought I might as well portray this as an alternative :p . They say you ought know your audience, no?

RanVor

Arguing with Dylan is a fool's errand. Trust me, I've tried.

Snowfire1224

Famine is the reason Praes attacks Callow in their so called cycle so I'm thinking that might not be such a good idea.

Jane

Eh, this is all assuming that Cat fights Praes – she won't need an army at all, otherwise. After she does, Praes won't be in any shape to fight Callow for a few years either, and the reduced food exports will hit Praes harshly, limiting their ability to invade until Callow recovers.

nipi

Also a good way to get the gnomes to look your way.

Droughtbringer

Interesting build up to next chapter as we either see the start of the Great Dwarven/Callowan war, or Cat actually learning to Negotiate. Either should be interesting.

TeK

What do you mean, "learn"? She is a renowned diplomat back on the surface, she said so herself!

Jane

Nah, Dwarves are quite famous for their love of beer over cheap wine.

Javvies

And good beer, at that.

Cheap/ bad alcohols are frowned upon, if not considered criminal.

That terrible stuff that Alaya and Amadeus were drinking would probably be considered a war crime.

Isa Lumitus

It would only be a war crime if it was actually used in war.

More likely, it would be considered a crime against alcohol, which might actually be worse.

mavant

Did you mean "alcohol abuse"

Yotz

"Greetings, fellow dwarves. We are your fellow dwarves, just like you and totally not spies, stand here doing normal dwarven things – like grumbling, and also grudging – just as we, dwarves, do. Pass along, fellow dwarves, there's nothing to see here."

Jonnnney

To be fair she is probably better suited than most. Her knowledge of the dead king's plans, origin, and defenses would be a decent bargaining chip. Plus with her sappers, her fae, and her woe she has loads of experience wrangling insane groups of people handling powers mortal men weren't meant to wield.

SpeckofStardust

...

...

I think diplomacy with dwarfs next chapter.

If only because in a straight up fight she'll lose.

Someguy

She can probably talk the dwarves into looting Levant (not stealing obviously, only dwarves can own things).

SpeckofStardust

Or they can identify her as a *possible ally of the dead king* and kill her for trespassing their rightful lands.

IDKWhoitis

I feel Catherine's penchant for rough language and roughhousing may actually be perfect diplomacy for Dwarfs. Especially if she trades an artifact or two.

Yotz

And so, after once again sifting through the Maxims, I think I have found a suitable one for the diplomatic solution to the puzzle of future short encounter:

Ravin

i actually think that no.17 is probably the best summation of this chapter though

Yotz

Quite. But we shouldn't forget №70. One should never forget №70...

Death Knight

What Maxims are these?

WuseMajor

The 70 Maxims of Maximally Effective Mercenaries, as curated here: http://schlockmercenary.wikia.com/wiki/The\_Seventy\_Maxims\_of\_Maximally\_Effective\_Mercenaries

Yotz

As Major said.

№ 17, in particular, is a variation on Murphy's Law, and № 70 goes thusly

Javvies

Ah, Cat, you know this.

On the upshot there are dwarves who speak surface tongues nearby. And Cat, Archer, and Akua are clearly not drow, so the dwarves will want to know why they're there.

sengachi

Cat clearly needs to practice her glamour more. Fae monarchs are the kind of entities who show up unannounced to parties in the freaking Tower, not who get caught with their pants down by a few hastily wrought runes.

Daemion

I don't think there were ever any fae sneaking into the Tower. That place is warded so heavily, current Cat would struggle to get in already.

Death Knight

Quadruply so now since the current Warlock is a ward specialist.

Jeff

The dwarves drink and brawl and speak in an unintelligible tongue.

They also come from a land down under.

Dwarves are fantasy Australians, pass it on.

Yotz

PS: Hey, Sheoldred!

superkeaton

Don't be a hypocrite, Cat, you've lake'd a couple thousand yourself. And justifications, after all, only matter to the just.

And no, no chickens for you.

Jonnnney

It's too bad Masego couldn't make it. Lacking would work pretty fucking well underground.

Rook

You're good at cutting chickens in half, Catherine, not sneakily hatching them.

Thief has better odds of successfully assassinating a main antagonist than a foundling stealth mission being anything but a complete disaster.

Dylan Tullos

Rook:

"Foundling stealth mission" not recognized by Autocorrect.

Did you mean "Foundling stabs everyone", "Foundling burns everything", or "Exploding suicide goats"?

nipi

You had to mention the goats. Thanks for reminding me. I miss those.

*chris S*

Lava, lots of pointy weapons.... all we need now are the war elephants, and we're a proper Dorf Fortress army.

Oui

Can somebody explain why does Cat insist that bringing the drow to her kingdom is a good idea? They are the losing side in a war of extinction and they have proven themselves to be practically useless. What kind of mental gymnastics does she do to justify angering their continent's superpower in exchange for backstabbing rabble that gets stronger by killing other races? Say, Callowan civilians? It says quite a lot about her when Akua is the voice of reason.

Cassiemouse

My thoughts that are that if Cat can beat the Priestess of the Night she could use the principle of usurpation to replace the Night with Winter which would spread through out the entire nation and turn the Drow into an army of winter.

Daemion

Each Mighty is a match for a new Named and the rest of the drow make for excellent fodder. That they are useless against a proper dwarven army doesn't mean they wouldn't be a match against humans. The shadow teleport ability they have through the Night is quite nice as well.

Cat's goal is to have enough bodies to absorb the inevitable losses of war and she'd prefer if those weren't Callowans. The drow being backstabbing assholes makes it easier for her to sacrifice them later on.

Dylan Tullos

Daemion:

Humans have armies.

Drows have mobs.

Armies beat mobs, especially when the mob's leaders spend more time planning to kill each other than they do trying to fight outside enemies.

I don't doubt that Catherine would be willing to sacrifice the drow; I also don't doubt that the drow could figure that out and find a way to backstab her first. I suspect Malicia would be more than happy to help them with that.

Yotz

Drow are warriors. Armies consist of soldiers. One warrior will kill one soldier with ease. Ten warriors against ten soldiers – half and half outcome, hard to predict. One hundred soldiers will exterminate one hundred warriors with trivial effort. Try to field warriors as a footsoldiers, and all you'll ever get will be a massacre. They are by nature incapable to efficiently function in large groups, be the reason behind this incorrect usage of them by the HQ, or plain old prideful arrogance of a supposedly superior fighters. For the examples I'll refer any curious soul to Battle of Agincourt for the former, and Battle of Shiroshima for the latter.

For less truistic approach, Drow would be ideal special force units. Single persons or small groups capable of operating with great degree of independence, highly effective in stealth and disruption, guerrilla warfare, harassment and terror campaigns. Highly specialized instrument with a quite narrow field of usage. One should never use SEAL teams nor Ranger Regiments for garrison duty and/or direct wall-on-wall confrontations.

Teel deer: basically, Drow are discount Faeries.

Jane

They've been useless against dwarves, widely considered to be a power that's completely suicidal to go against, and against Cat herself, a literal goddess. Against humans or undead, they're probably fine, though she might need to give them proper weapons first.

Furthermore, the raiding party she fought were the most worthless of the worthless, drained of all their power and sent out on a suicide mission to redeem themselves – and they still had a nifty trick that would arguably put them on par with the Doaine (butchered the spelling, my apologies), who would be considered the elite of Cat's forces. The settlement that the dwarves effortlessly destroyed were also considered the outcasts of Drow society, those who had been pushed out from the power struggles that define Drow existence, and who settled for merely surviving.

And, well, we didn't actually see these Drow fight – the dwarves pretty much just poured lava on them. They might have had some nifty tricks, or just been darned good fighters, but... We wouldn't know. They only had a few minutes in which to figure out how to stop what was, in essence, a bombardment with napalm – that they failed doesn't really speak that poorly of their skills, just of how terrifying it is to fight dwarves.

Also, she hasn't really said anything about bringing them to Callow – just noted that finding a new home for them is pretty good leverage when the dwarves are hell-bent on driving them from the underground. Also, there's little reason to think that the dwarves will care what happens to the Drow, so long as they're no longer in the Dwarves (newly claimed) caves.

All in all, now that she's come this far, she might as well see what she can salvage. I mean, the alternative is probably to wreck Callow for a generation – it's probably worth the risk, so long as she doesn't end up recognized if she ends up fighting any dwarves.

NotQuiteHere

It's cos of how the dead drow in the kingdom of the dead she fought was OP and kicked her ass.

Snowfire1224

That was an elf

Snowfire1224

She needs people who can take major losses where her people cannot because then there would be no one to till the fields and grow food.

Digitize27

Hmm, at first glance I thought the steel ballista might have been cannons, but Cat would definitely have commented on the sound they made, so I imagine they're more like giant ball-bearing slingshots. (Besides, I think gunpowder technology might be red-letter worthy)

The giant grappling hooks are interesting, in that the Dwarves brought them along at all. Seems they have some fortresses they want to be tearing down. This really is a full-scale invasion, not just an incursion.

Jonnnney

The kingdom under is the biggest dog on town, but even they aren't strong enough to fuck with the gnomes so gunpowder based weaponry isn't an option.

Aston

And Catherine manages to beat the entire Dwarven army.

In a drinking contest.

In reality she's a god who scares the hell out of them and they have been in fact invited by the Named Drow to weed out the weak.

Invited. Invaders.

Time for Cat to show her diplomacy skills.

By confusing everyone.

A young woman pretending she's not actually a God on the same level as the Dead King.

Vote for this web serial! Vote for greatest fiction!

John

Why are you being silly, Catherine? Now that the alarm's been raised, there's no point holding back on Winter, so just take a shortcut through Arcadia to the center of Drow territory.

Dylan Tullos

In a shocking surprise, the terrible plan was in fact terrible.

After several chapters of detailed discussions on how the drow were useless and the dwarves were terrifying, we finally saw exactly how the drow are less organized than peasant levies, while dwarves make the Legions of Terror look like a drunk in a bar fight.

Catherine is now risking a fight with the mightiest living nation in Calernia for the sake of an "army" with no discipline or loyalty. If she did recruit the drow, it would take Malicia about five seconds to make them a better offer and turn the Mighty against Callow.

This is quite possibly the stupidest thing Catherine could be doing.

RanVor

I'd ask if you have a better idea, but I already know you don't.

MetruX

Uhh... Guys... She is imprisoned right now, her fae powers just been 'canceled', so her only way out is diplomacy... Something no one has ever done with dwarfs... If we assume she can this time make some negotiation... Wasn't the absurdness of negotiating with dwarfs the reason they are out of the table for alliances? They are not Good, so maybe this could even end with her having some dwarven troops assisting her defences.

Yotz

I would go not with assist but with a trade of sort. Cat spares dwarves the effort of continuing costly campaign by taking all surviving drow away with her, and dwarves agree to not murderize her on the spot.

Which reminds me. We know that anything below certain depth is considered a property of Kingdom Under. But what about mountains?

I mean, would remnants of drow be able to settle inside the Whitecaps without aggravating the dwarves beyond the point of no return? Because this way Cat would be able to create a buffer state between Callow and Procer, with her and the Wild Hunt being a stick weighty enough to prod inevitable drowish (drowan?) incursions into the needed direction.

Dylan Tullos

Yotz:

The drow are murderous slavers. Even if Catherine was able to point them in the "right" direction, they'd be leveling up by murdering Proceran peasants.

The drow would inevitably get stronger, and just as inevitably turn on Catherine. Malicia wouldn't have any difficulty convincing them to backstab their saviour, and Catherine would soon find herself fighting on two fronts.

Yotz

>peasants

Same peasants who are the main source of proceran fantassins and materiels for the invading army. Who are also either murderous slavers, or murderous slaves, using your definitions. At which point such action would be acceptable, if outright evil.

>Drow growing stronger.

Just like they grew into the strongest nation of Calernia after Triumphant burned them, I suppose. Next point.

>saviour

Please, remind me where or when I ever talked about any kind of gratitude from the Drow towards Cat in the case of hypothetical "salvation".

Putting that aside – chiefly because you wouldn't be able to provide anything but straw – Malicia is far away and wields little to no personal power, only the power of institutions. To your regular Mighty she is a meat. Murderous Queen who can toy with any Mighty like it was a simple meat, and her retinue who will have no trouble in outdrowing the drow, are much closer. And they wouldn't have any difficulty convincing drow to backstab their new praesi benefactor in cruelest way possible.

In case you haven't noticed, Callow is already fighting on two fronts. Situation is dire enough that unleashing the Hidden Horror was considered an acceptable option. Arguably, Drow are better variant in regards to all things humane. Yes, their presence in the Whitecaps would lead to future conflict someday. Their absence in contemporary conflict, however, may lead to the absence of Callow, making the point of potential future conflict moot.

Their martial prowess or usefulness, though, is an open question. From the story so far, they wouldn't be able to serve Cat as intended cannon fodder. They are not without their uses, though – and, as a side boon, Cat wouldn't have much grief over the drow killing procerans and procerans killing drow – whoever dies, Callow wins.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Having just been caught by the dwarves, Catherine risks a violent confrontation with a nation that could casually destroy every city in Callow. "Do nothing" would be a better idea than "provoke the notoriously violent and racist superpower". That said, I do have a better idea.

My plan is for Catherine to start actively assisting the Grand Alliance in the coming fight against the Dead King. She might be "Arch-Heretic of the East" for now, but when the dead start coming south, I suspect that the nations of Good will be willing to accept any help they can get. Catherine can save countless lives with portals and show Procer and the Levant how Callow is still committed to fighting the good fight.

It's funny how easy it is to come up with good ideas when you're trying to help people. Catherine should try it sometime, rather than trying to recruit an entire nation of Stupid Evil murderhobos as part of a "plan" that looks dumber by the day.

Javvies

Cat tried to join the side of Good. Then her attempts at peace got thrown back in her face, and then she got declared Arch-heretic of the East over Malicia, when every previous Arch-heretic of the East has been the reigning Dread Emperor or Empress. Oh, and basically all of Callow got declared heretical at the same time.

Also, with regards to Procer, Cat's current priority is holding her borders while she goes after Malicia. Cat has to deal with Malicia and Praes in a permanent, or at least lasting, way before she can do more than hold her western border.

Even ignoring the whole Arch-heretic of the East and associated issues, Cat has higher and more immediate priorities than the Dead King invading Procer – Malicia just tried to gut the hell out of Callowan government and military institutions. The Dead King may be zombie army marching down the road towards her, but Malicia is the facehugger jumping at her now.

RanVor

Ok, some most likely consequences of your “brilliant” plan: the Callowans are bled as a living shield against the undead because it’s the only thing those dirty heretics deserve, Callow is eviscerated by Malicia with impunity, Cat is deposed and executed for ultra-heresy, Callowan lands are partitioned and turned into principalities, Callowans rebel, brutal purges to eliminate the resistance, Callow is gone forever.

Cordelia didn’t put much effort into hiding what she intends to do after pressuring Cat into fighting her battles for her. And the fate of Callow is not only hers to decide.

Dylan Tullos

RanVor:

Most likely consequences of Catherine’s current plan; Catherine is distracted fighting against the Dead King, and comes back to find that her drow “allies” have murdered half of Callow to level up. The last time she made a deal with Classic Evil, Akua killed everyone in Liesse; do you think that the drow are less treacherous than Diabolist?

Everyone is going to have to bleed to stop the Dead King. If Callow tries to avoid doing their part, they’ll just guarantee that they stand alone when Procer is defeated and the dead come for them. The living can stand together or they can hang separately.

It’s worth noting that Cordelia’s people have spent thousands of years fighting against the Dead King, and they don’t whine about being “bled as a living shield”. They’re proud of doing their duty, even if they think the rest of Procer needs to pitch in and help.

Cat’s well-being is not important to anyone, least of all her. This isn’t about her happiness or future. It’s about what’s best for Callow, and what’s best for Callow is not being a neighbor of the Dead King.

Procer can’t just annex Callow; their allies in the Dominion and Ashur don’t want to see them with more territory. And after fighting the Dead King, they won’t be in a position to annex anyone. But even if it did somehow end with Callow divided into principalities, Callowans have fought a successful rebellion against the Principate before. Callow wouldn’t be “gone forever”, because they could simply rise up and overthrow their foreign overlords.

When one group of humans conquers another, rebellion is always possible. For that matter, life goes on; Callowans could still farm and live under the Principate. If the Dead King conquered Callow, he'd kill everyone in the country and raise their corpses to join his army. That's what Catherine should be afraid of, not those mean Crusaders who don't want Callow ruled by a Villain.

RanVor

Whatever. I'm not making the mistake of getting in a prolonged discussion with you again.

RanVor

Actually, the problem of the untrustworthiness of the drow is laughably easy to resolve by dropping them in the middle of the Wasteland. Nobody expects them, nobody has any idea what they're capable of – a perfect distraction. They will have enough of an initial advantage over the unprepared enemy to inflict sufficient losses on the Legions loyal to Malicia, giving Cat time to prepare for battles against Procer and/or the Dead King. And there's no way they will survive to get to Callow, so no risk there.

Javvies

Cat isn't going to be fighting the Dead King until she's settled the score with Malicia and Praes/the High Lords. She literally cannot afford to do anything other than hold her western (Proceran) border while she turns east against Malicia. Fortunately, she has the Whitecap Mountains and decent choke points to cover the west.

The Dead King is a problem, a huge one even, but he's down the road, while Malicia is an imminent threat who just tried to gut Callow's military and civilian infrastructure. With some success.

tyizor

Cat needs to learn that subtlety is **not** her strongsuit already. Malicia's "assassination" attempt wasn't even too long ago.

Yotz

Dread Emperor Abominable, the Thrice-Struck, inventor of the lightning conductor.

RanVor

To counter all the doom and gloom that has taken over the comments, I present you my opinion:

I'm reasonably confident it'll all work out for metanarrative reasons.

Firstly, it looks to me that we're starting to get to the part of the book that contains the climactic confrontation, and Cat is still very much in deep shit. Therefore, she is bound to get some support soon, possibly after mutilating herself again.

Secondly, she already failed in negotiations once, and the Creation abhors repetition or something like that. So it's unlikely to happen again so soon.

Thirdly, she is in a hopeless situation with her back against the wall and a knife to her throat. The narrative is so obviously in her favor it's almost impossible for her to fail.

Lastly, we know there is one more book coming, so Callow obviously has to survive somehow, and no other solution has presented itself so far.

Dylan Tullos

I prefer it when Catherine makes actual plans that might work, rather than relying on Protagonist Armor to save her from the consequences of provoking the dwarves.

RanVor

You're forgetting this is a universe where relying on Protagonist Armor is a totally valid way to get on top.

vexingvision

Let's skip the silly Drow, Cat.

Let's hire the dwarfs instead.

Dreamer

This new moralistic Cat has been kinda weird to me for the past few chapters. She refuses to kill her drow prisoners in cold blood, for some reason, despite her killing those would be rapists from way back. Furthermore, she dropped a magic fae lake on people so I don't really feel like she has room to judge here either? I feel like her character's either becoming inconsistent, or it might be the redemption thing that hasn't been mentioned in forever.

Isa Lumitus

You do have a point about the redemption thing. This might be related to Cat's deal with the Gray Pilgrim.

That said, this doesn't seem that out there from my existing view of her. I'm reminded of Worm's tagline, 'doing the wrong thing for the right reason'. I'm also reminded of Akua's advice that Cat's hesitance to jump off the slippery slope might be making things worse for everyone but her.

Jane

It's easy for Cat to do the right (wrong?) thing when her back is to the wall, and she's struggling to survive; when she's the underdog, she does what she must, whether it's knife a few people who would otherwise evade justice, drop a lake on an invading army, join the Grand Alliance or unleash the Hidden Horror on an unsuspecting world.

When she's in a position of strength, though, it's a struggle for her to hold on to her humanity, and avoid becoming the greater evil that she's fought against.

In short, she really doesn't know what to do with success – whether it's reforming Callow's institutions into something new (her first plan was a dismal failure, and her current plan is literally just to hand the problem off to someone else), or dealing with really vicious prisoners of war who haven't, properly speaking, done anything wrong yet. When her options are limited, the path is clear to her; when she is free to do as she wishes, she struggles with the consequences of her decisions.

Xinci

It may be due to the fact that Cat is not "more" yet. She doesn't have enough of a presence *reality* and narrative wise to really be able to cover all the bases and make a change in the world. If she can make those changes in herself and a local area however she may be able to change (you know... construct) enough that some of her plans may work. But general thing is she has plenty of growth left if she wants to form a solution which she is still lacking in ability to do and quibbling (not entirely good, not entirely bad but a path has to be made) over the metaphysical path she has to take to get any better. The Night might help her, it in many ways is kind of like a Evil version of what the Gods Above showed the White Knight I think. The information available could be quite useful in forming her into a better... "solution"? Part of her current problem is not having enough awareness/information like Black does of what the world around her is, perhaps with the Night she will have more success doing so or at least get someone else to do so for her.

Sylwoos

Cat lost the right to be offended by a little bit of molten rock when she made burning people with inextinguishable magic fire as her go-to strategy.

sengachi

There's a big, biiiiiig difference there.

One of those is killing people you don't really know, whose circumstances you don't understand, who for all you know hate the system they're a part of (which you also don't really understand), and who might not be a threat to others if you can just find the right way to handle them. Especially when you walked onto their turf. "Killing those who try to kill you is justified" loses a lot of moral validity when you break into a khans-era Mongol warrior's tent in the middle of the night and they accost you with a sword. And yeah, sure, maybe Cat killing the drow is justified. But it's genuinely a worthwhile question to ask if it is or not.

The rapist and his enabler on the other hand ... Well, that's the thing about rape. There's **never** a justification for it. And in that chapter the rapist clearly showed that he knew what he was doing was wrong, that he was a repeat offender, that he and his enabler were willing to kill innocents to protect themselves, that they abused their authority to do so, and that they would almost certainly do it again. You could not ask for a more cut and dry case of "these fuckers need to be removed from the picture in whatever way you can manage". Which is what Cat did.

And frankly, if your conflation of the two makes Cat's actions seem confusing to you, I don't think it's that Cat's moral system is messed up, I think it's that your moral compass is a bit askew.

Isa Lumitus

I'm with the crowd that still doesn't understand why Cat thinks that the Drow are worth negotiating with. On the bright side, I can at least see some good reasons for her to continue. If she can steal whatever artifact either makes the Gloom, or the passes through it, she will have a good bargaining chip.

Either of those could make or break the dwarven plan to encircle the Dead King.

mavant

Ah, yes, that classic Dwarven ballad, "Pour Some Lava On Me".

Xinci

This is truly a exemplary chance for cat to try her code of regulation. She said what she could not break she would regulate and the drow are a prime candidate for doing so. If she can broker a proper deal with the mistress of the Night, she could refine the tenets to something more worthwhile. The night is a excellent testing, refining, and evolving tool. This also depends on narrative wise, what kind of artifact is most likely being refined over time by the Night's tenets/experiments. If Cat can properly regulate the drow and transform them into a workforce under her she could have a excellently adaptive unit of troops and workers. I will note several things, the drow are warriors because they are a composite experiment on getting skill and information into specific(the most worthy and therefore mighty) individuals...the problem is its not enough. They need more and better institutions to actually become mighty as a race...which cat(and winter) can most likely manage far better than their current testing methods.

Also suprised no one is making any theories on how to kill the dwarves, for example how well could you unsup control of their runes to make that heavy infantry collapse in on itself? How vulnerable are they to air flow, is that armour of theirs prepared for extreme cold after extreme heat?

Basic thing being=If cat finds a proper stipulation to bind the night and create new tenets she could forge the drow into something new and wonderfully effective. The main problem comes with how to properly integrate that troupe into her powerbase or at the very least to keep a good controllable area.

---

Chapter 59: Audience

"Note: bottling up the power of friendship cannot be achieved by bottling up friends. Must pursue further trials, perhaps prior liquefaction diluted the substance."

– Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II

So, runic trap. Just what my day had been needing. I ran a palm across the transparent pane of force and found it solid. A sharp rap of the knuckles told me it was probably breakable, if I exerted myself. This wasn't a ward so much a magical pit trap, although one we'd strolled right into.

"Cat," Indrani hissed. "Now's a good time to do the Winter thing."

Was it, though? The panes didn't mute sound, so I could hear the dwarves running towards us. It was hard to tell their numbers, with all that armour jostling, but I'd wager at least a hundred. I could most likely shatter the back of the trap and leg it with the others back into the tunnels. Except we'd have a dwarven company hot on our heels, the alarm would spread and there was a non-negligible chance we'd end up in more or less the same situation in half an hour, only with having attempted to escape added to our first impression.

"We're going to talk to them," I finally said.

"Or you could open a godsdamned portal and get us out of here," Indrani said. "Like, now."

"To where?" I said. "Either we go blind, which seems like a very bad idea underground, or we go back. Where the army is."

"Or we could stay in Arcadia for a bit, until they're gone," she said.

"The gate out would lead us back here," Diabolist said. "I do not believe it likely they will leave this place unguarded after the traps were triggered."

"Archer, they'll be curious enough about our presence they'll want to interrogate us," I said. "If it really does go to shit, I'll grab everyone and leg it into Arcadia. But I want to try to talk to them first, at least."

I caught movement from the corner of my eye, but it wasn't dwarves. The drow accompanying us had gone still, when the runes shone, but the conversation between the three of us had gotten their attention. We'd been speaking Lower Miezani, so not even Ivah should be able to understand us, but if they were guessing from the tones that might not matter. One of the drow we'd caught on surface said something in Crepuscular, addressing Ivah, who nodded and then turned silver eyes to me.

"They would like weapons, Queen, since we are to fight," my guide said in Chantant.

"We won't be fighting them," I replied in the same. "I'm going to speak with whoever leads them."

"Nerezim do not negotiate, Queen," Ivah flatly said. "They take what they want and kill all in their way."

"It is," I told the drow. "I am queen of a kingdom, on the surface, and powerful enough they will not seek my enmity for no reason."

"This is not true of us," it said. "We will be slain."

"You're my prisoners," I said "Until release or judgement, you are under my protection."

"They will not care," Ivah insisted.

"Ivah, you seem under the impression any you have a voice in this decision," I said. "You do not. It has been made."

"They will not accept this," the drow warily said.

"They are free to contest my judgement, of course," I said. "Though the consequences of that have already been stated."

Ivah grimaced and turned to speak, but before it could even do that the Mighty Kodrog – no, Bogdan now – made its move. The drow pushed one of its fellow prisoners away and reached for the longknife at Archer's hip. Apparently after failing with me, it had come under the impression it would have better luck with my companions. Archer gave him the knife, in a manner of speaking. It was only a lending, though, and she clamly withdrew it from the eye socket with a flick of the wrist. The other drow stepped back. Great, now I was going to meet the dwarves with a fucking corpse on the floor. Although, considering their record so far, that might actually raise their opinion of us.

"Tell them this," I addressed Ivah. "They can die now, or take a chance on the future. There is no middle ground, and I've no more attention to spare on this. Akua, if any of them tries to escape kill it."

"Any?" Diabolist asked.

I met Ivah's eyes.

"Any," I confirmed.

My statement that I had no more attention to dole out had not been theatrics: the dwarves were now close enough I could make out the individual steps. They did not come from deeper inside the cavern. The company of a hundred that spread out in front of the trap had been posted near the outer wall, to the left of the tunnel's exit. Regulars again, I noted, and since now the dance had come to end I finally spared a moment to study dwarvenkind from up close. I'd pictured them as short, stocky humans but evidently that'd been a failure of imagination. There were basic similarities: eyes, nose, brow, lips. But they were the same more in principle than practice. Their skin was so rough and craggy, enough it looked more like some beast's rough hide. The old tale that dwarves were born when a dwarf ate stones for a year and then spat out a baby fully-formed came to mind. Their eyes were almost too large for those thick faces, with coloured sclera and no irises. Owl-like, I thought, though they had eyelashes. Their strands of hair were visibly larger and thicker than a human's, their noses flat and broad. The tallest of the lot stood at five feet, though they were much broader of shoulder than any race I'd come across save orcs. The dwarves spread out facing us, shields and hammers at the ready.

"Good evening," I smiled.

A few of them spoke in dwarvish, rough accents flowing back and forth quickly, and there was a sparse wave of laughter. One of the dwarves elbowed his way to the front, attired differently from the rest. The armour was much like the one the engineers had worn, back in the other cavern, a cuirass on leather. Said cuirass was covered with runes, though, which I didn't remember the others being. The dwarf, sporting a thick black beard thrice bound by rings of bronze showing runes of their own, frowned at me and laid a bare palm on the transparent pane. His frown deepened and he barked something in his language at the other dwarves.

"I don't supposed you speak Lower Miezán," I said.

His eyes, a ring of deep gold around a pitch-black pupil, moved to my face.

"You," he said in that very language, though the accent was nearly unintelligible. "Human."

"Close enough," I agreed.

He pointed at the drow behind me, finger lingering on the corpse.

"Kraksun," he said. "Why?"

"Prisoners," I said.

He turned back to the others and spoke again. One of the dwarves spoke loudly and the entire company shook with laughter. I got the impression that what he'd said was complimentary to neither humans nor drow. Another dwarf, this one's beard russet, raised a baton of stone and silence took hold. He spoke at the one wearing runes, who shrugged and turned back to me.

"You," he said. "Prisoner."

"I want to talk with your leader," I said, enunciating slowly.

A dwarf left the ranks of the others, bearing a bag of woven reeds, and dropped it to the side of my interlocutor. Who promptly opened it, and took out a pair of rune-inscribed shackles. They weren't linked by chains, I noted.

"Wear," the black-bearded dwarf said.

"I want to talk with your leader," I repeated, forcing patience.

The dwarf rolled his eyes, the size of those making it rather eerie to behold, but he spoke to the one with the baton. Who replied with a single word. Yeah, that one needed no translation. I sighed and rolled my shoulders before plunging my hand through the pane of force and ripping out a chunk. The black-bearded dwarf drew back in surprise, the soldiers moved forward and I smiled once more.

"I want to talk with your leader," I said one last time, looking at the russet-bearded one.

His eyes flicked at the trap I'd casually ripped open, then back to me. He barked something at our interpreter.

"Who you?" the dwarf asked.

"The Queen of Callow," I said.

The dwarf looked skeptical. He pointed a finger upwards.

"Callow," he repeated slowly.

"Yes," I said.

"Angry horse people," he said, even more skeptically.

Well, that was one way to describe us. His eyes dipped down to note what I assumed to be my current lack of horse. What, did he just expect all Callowans to be mounted at all times?

"Of which I am queen," I agreed.

He translated at the russet beard who snorted. He gestured a knock against his temple, the meaning of which I felt safe assuming. Then he shrugged and added something else. Blackbeard turned back to me.

"Speak to Herald," he said. "But."

He presented the shackles again. I mulled on that, eventually jutting a thumb towards the people behind me.

"Mine," I said. "Safe. No touch."

The dwarf spat on the floor.

"No touch," he agreed. "Herald choose."

It was a start. I offered my wrists to the shackles, and the dwarf leaned forward to clasp them closed. The runes – nothing like those I knew, sharper and much more complicated – shone and I felt a binding form. Ah, meant to seal sorcery. Or at least have an effect when someone called on them. Were they assuming I was a mage? It was a flip of the coin whether or not Winter would be affected by those. My ability to call on it was uninhibited, so far. I looked back at my companions.

"Negotiations will proceed," I said. "Cooperate."

Archer looked quite displeased, but Diabolist simply nodded. She was the first to come forward when the dwarf presented another pair of shackles, sharing a meaningful look with me afterwards. They weren't affecting her either, then. Good to know. The drow came forward one after another, each of them moving delicately as if they feared the slightest sudden move would get them killed. They might not be wrong about that, I reflected. It had not escaped my notice that when the drow came forward some of the soldiers discretely put up their crossbows. Indrani was the last, and she shot me a glare.

"We could have legged it," she said in Kharsum.

"We still might," I replied in the same. "Day's not over."

She put forward her wrists, and with that last clasping we were all officially prisoners. Blackbeard drew a circle on the transparent wall then pressed his palm against the rune that formed inside it. It came down without a sound. From the corner of my eye, I'd glimpsed Akua watching him work eagerly. Never one to lose an opportunity, was she? The soldiers swarmed us after that, though at least they put away their weapons first. I was guided forward in a surprisingly gentle manner, though I stopped when I heard Indrani raise her voice.

"No you don't," she hissed.

One of the dwarves was tugging at her bow, eyes half-closed. I looked for Blackbeard as he'd melded into the crowd. Another dwarf raised his hammer when Indrani pushed away the one trying to get at her bow, speaking loudly. Every dwarf around us turned.

"Archer," I called out.

She turned to me.

"Cat, they want to take-"

"I know," I said. "Let them."

"You know they keep shit like this," she said. "And the Lady will kill me if I lose it."

"I'll get it back," I said. "I promise."

"You'd better," she growled.

Lips thinning in anger, she took out her bow and shoved it forcefully in the dwarf's arms. The soldier almost toppled, looking furious, though his companions laughed. Another one was eyeing the sword at my hip, so I smiled blandly and took it out. Hammers rose again, but I presented it by the hilt. The dwarf blinked, but took it anyway. If it'd been goblin steel I might have felt a pang, but this was just a sliver of Winter. I could recall it to my mantle at will, what did I care who held it? We were taken deep into the cavern in a procession, surrounded by soldiers. The vanguard, I saw, had made camp here. Tents of cloth that were charmingly small dotted the place, while makeshift ramparts of piled stones had been raised around siege engines and supply wagons. At the centre of the camp I glimpsed a large dais of stone, a high seat upon it. Anyone important enough to warrant that was worth talking with, I mused. The first hiccup arrived when I was taken toward that dais but the others were not. I stopped, to the displeasure of the dwarf escorting me. I pointed at Akua.

"She comes with me," I said.

The dwarf made a face, blatantly not understanding a word I'd said and rather displeased I was talking at all. He tugged at my wrist, but it would take more than a pushy dwarf to move if I did not want to be moved. My escort barked out in his language until Blackbeard returned.

"Why you not move," he asked impatiently.

I pointed at Akua again.

"She's coming with me," I said.

He shook his head.

"Prisoner," he said.

"She's my handmaiden," I lied.

The dwarf blinked, looking confused. Didn't know that word, huh?

"My herald," I said.

Blackbeard frowned.

"You human," he pointed out.

Was he implying no human could possibly be important to have a herald? Good to know the High Lords had a superior even in matters of bloody-minded arrogance.

"Human queen," I reminded him.

He still looked unconvinced, but must have decided arguing wasn't worth the trouble. An order had Diabolist taken aside from the others and brought to me.

"Your Majesty," Akua said, bowing to me.

Quick on the uptake, Diabolist. Sometimes in the wrong way, but there was a reason I wanted her with me when speaking with whatever fancy beard was in charge. We were escorted the rest of the way to the dais without any further trouble. The seat was facing the other way, so it was the dais itself that earned a second glance. Roughly hewn stone, and I was pretty sure a single piece. Handhold were carved into the sides. Had they carried this here? Lots of trouble for a seat. We were brought in front of the high chair, where a full two hundred of those heavy soldiers from earlier was waiting in silent stillness. The seat, I could not help but notice, was empty. I glanced at Blackbeard.

"... am I supposed to talk to the chair?" I asked.

Big eyes stared me down without a word.

"That's a no, then," I muttered. "I'll wait."

Not long after the rows of soldiers parted for a pair of dwarves, which seemed promising to me. The first was the tallest dwarf I'd seen so far, and the first without any armour. He wore cloth, dyed a green so dark it was nearly black, though I didn't recognize the style or the cut. It was wrapped and knotted in layers over layers, heavy enough it might actually slow an arrow. His beard was dyed as well, in the same colour, and his eyes matched. The hair was black, though, long and braided. The staff in his hand was crooked thing of wood with trinkets of some strange metal hanging off the end, softly chiming as he walked. The other was one of those Archer had called deed-seekers, and his chest was so thickly covered in skulls the armour could not be seen beneath. Some of those were human, I noted, but most too large for that. I even glimpsed dragonbone among the multitude, though that struck me as the result of grave robbing rather than fighting. There were few dragons left on Calernia, and the death of one would have resounded across the continent. Blonde of beard and hair, his face was covered with either an exceedingly thick black tattoo or pristine face paint. The shape was a rat's head and fangs, though the horns sprouting out made it clear it was not just any ratling. The two of them came to stand before the dais, though they did not touch it, and the deed-seeker cleared his throat.

"Chantant?" he asked in that same language.

I wiggled my palm.

"Lower Miezán?" I tried.

The dwarf nodded.

"You stand before the Herald of the Deeps," he announced. "Name yourself."

Akua replied without any need for prompting on my part.

"I introduce Her Majesty Catherine Foundling, Queen of Callow and Sovereign of Moonless Nights," she said, sketching a bow.

The deed-seeker cocked his head to the side.

"I am Balasi, Seeker of Deeds," he said. "I will translate for the Herald. You may kneel."

I smiled amicably.

"I do not kneel," I said. "My attendant will do so out of respect."

Akua elegantly did so under the emotionless eyes of the dwarves, rising just as fluidly. Balasi turned a bronze gaze to Blackbeard, who still stood at my side, and spoke in their language. The dwarf replied in length, then paused and quickly tacked on something. The Herald's lips quirked in amusement, Balasi laughed outright.

"I feel like I've heard that one before," I noted.

The deed-seeker inclined his head.

"Even a lizard can eat a tadpole," he said.

My brow rose.

"Guess you had to be there," I said.

Which I had been. I did not smile.

"It loses in the translation," Balasi said. "The words... even an idiot can bully a dimwit?"

Ah, charming. We were going to get along great, I could just feel it.

"I take it the dimwits are the drow," I said.

"You have taken some of the kraksun prisoner," he acknowledged. "A matter of great hilarity to us."

"I did notice you haven't bothered, so far," I said.

The dwarf bared his teeth.

"Only children pet vermin," he said.

About what I'd expected out of them, though it was still jarring to hear it spoken out loud. The casual dismissal of an entire race as pests. Not that the drow are any better, I thought. There was little difference between cattle and vermin, when it came down to it. The Herald spoke softly, addressing his translator, who then turned to us.

"His Eminence would know why you have come to the Everdark," he said.

My instinct was to answer, to establish some kind of relationship, but this was diplomacy and not an evening at the tavern. If I fielded all the questions myself, I was implying myself to be on the same level as the Herald's translator. Which was something I needed to avoid, if I wanted to be considered an interlocutor and not a curiosity. I held my tongue and let Diabolist speak in my stead. It was, after all, why she was here.

"Her Majesty sought to raise an army of drow to war against her enemies on the surface," Akua said. "We were unaware that the Kingdom Under intended to invade when we began our journey."

"You are aware now," Balasi said. "You will be allowed to depart unmolested. Your prisoners will remain, as they may know useful information."

"A decision perhaps premature," Akua replied. "It seems our interests may have fallen in alignment."

The deed-seeker fixed her with a steady look.

"Callow intends to meddle in the affairs of the Kingdom Under?" he said, very mildly.

"Callow is willing to pursue its interest so long as they do not contradict those of the King Under the Mountain," she smoothly replied. "We would consult with you to ensure such an unfortunate turn of events will not come to be."

"You're not human," Balasi thoughtfully said. "Some sort of spirit, bound in service. The kingdom you claim to come from is not known for such pacts."

"The world ever changes, Seeker Balasi," Akua smiled. "New eras demand new methods, lest we be left in the dust."

"You're a long way from home, Callowans," the dwarf said. "Stumbling into matters beyond your understanding. To presume to even speak of them is a dangerous kind of arrogance."

"You are correct, Seeker," the shade said. "We are a long way from home. With little love for those who dwell here, and a mind open to fresh opportunities. It would be a sad thing to turn a blind eye to mutual profits without good motive."

I left her to it, my eyes drawn to the Herald's staff. The trinkets, in particular. It was a subtle thing, but there was power to them. They were no simple decoration. My eyes narrowed. Not, not the trinkets themselves. Something inside them, bound.

"The shackles do not bind you," the Herald of the Deeps said in perfect Lower Miezán.

The other two went silent as I met those eldritch green eyes. I called on a sliver of Winter and tore off one of the shackles like it was made of parchment, runes struggling impotently.

"They do not," I agreed.

"You are not human," the Herald said.

"I was," I replied. "Then I murdered a demigod and stole his power."

"And so you come to the Everdark," the dwarf said. "Seeking yet more."

"I have a great many enemies," I said. "Enough it might be said we share a few."

The Herald smiled, slow and mean.

"I offer hospitality to you, Queen of Callow," he said. "Let us eat, drink, and talk of murdering gods."

Well, now they were speaking my language.

---

*DroughtBringer*

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Yotz

1queenofblades1

>Angry horse people

Lmfao now I like them.

NZPIEFACE

I mean... not *exactly* wrong and kind right at the same time, just...

Yeah.

Javvies

Could be going better, could be going far worse.
On the whole, not a terrible start to these negotiations.

Also, angry horse people. I feel like that's a hilariously accurate description. At least for some Callowans.

Dainpdf

Excuse you? They are *vengeful* horse people. Though I guess dwarves wouldn't understand that since they don't really accept that other beings can be offended.

John

Simplifying "vengeance" to "anger" seems pretty mild as language-barrier issues go.

daegone823

I like how he hit his temple to show how these people do not think before fighting. Funny how Callowan hard headedness has persisted everywhere. Fae have histories detailing it, the kingdom of the dead has immortal revenants who still hold grudges, even the feared kingdom under recognizes Callowan logic as a pure anger if you cross them so best step lightly

.

Dainpdf

Drow are traitorous, Praesi are vainglorious, Procerans are pugnacious, Bellerophans are fanatical, and Callowans are vengeful.

Skraeling

And Dwarves are assholes. All the worlds a stage and every single player is Tybalt

TeK

Or spiteful. Really more of this.

superkeaton

Oh Cat, only you could bond with genocidal molemen through a shared appreciation of butchered deities.

This makes all prior negotiation failures hilarious.

Drd

See, that's where Cat's been going wrong all this time. If she'd only started all negotiations with "which god shall murder?", she'd be well ahead of the game! : D

danh3107

I LIKE THESE DWARFS, they may not be dawī but they're speaking my language.

Fucking Impressed

See, I knew that blindly murdering everything in your way would come in handy at some point!

Cicero

Well, I guess even a human can gain the interest of a dwarf as long as you murder a demigod first and steal his power.

Dainpdf

That, plus all that smooth Akua tongue. Also, he probably feels pretty secure he has the superior negotiating position, and so can get himself a pretty good deal.

Byzantine

Yep, from his position at worst he will end up exactly where he started, as far as he is concerned. He's probably right, too. Cat is powerful, but so is he. It's a good position to be in.

Dainpdf

Plus, she needs something from him, and while he could stand to gain much from allying with her, he doesn't *need* to.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"all that smooth Akua tongue"

( ˘ ˘ )

TeK

See? They are going along just fine. Dwarfs are nice.

TeK

Are they going to conspire to kill Dead King?

Dainpdf

Or the priestess of night. Or the intercessor, because hey, why not. But most likely the priestess, with a maybe tossed Neshamah's way.

Rup

Gibborim

Has anyone else had a problem with this website on mobile? I frequently get redirected to spam/fishing/whatever websites while in the middle of a chapter here. I would assume that there is some sort of WordPress virus infecting the site.

Gunslinger

I haven't noticed anything but I use a browser that comes built in with adblockers

haihappen

Using an Adblocker, or more precisely, a scriptblocker, makes the web such a nice place.

When I am forced to use a browser without is astonishing how slow AND ugly many sites are and how obnoxious "in your face" pop-ups are. Also: ads with sound that just start playing. It feels dirty somehow.

Drawback: many sites sadly rely on scripts to build up the content. those break with NoScript...

TeK

Didn't notice nothing. Use only mobile version. Also, yeah, adblockers.

Byzantine

Ah, that has nothing to do with the website I'm afraid. At some point a redirect cookie (virus) wormed itself into your phone's cookies. They activate when certain conditions are met, but remain on the phone itself at all times. You need to completely erase your internet history, saved settings, etc to get rid of it.

Big Brother

Gibb, I'd recommend downloading the WordPress app. It's much easier to keep track of the stories and read new updates with it.

shravkabl

Nope. I'm pretty sure it's something with your phone and not the website.

Take the first stuff

I have the same issue

Death Knight

Well, that happened. To the surprise of absolutely nobody.

Dainpdf

It's not a real party until someone starts up the deicide.

RoflCat

Welcome to the Foundling Party, any mortals get stomped under angry feet of some God until one of us get drunk enough to put a knife in them.

Byzantine

A knife? Please, I borrowed Emiya Shirou so I could put *all* of the knives in them.

Dainpdf

There's no party
Like the Foundling party
'Cuz the Foundling party
Don't stop!

TheCatLord

Ah. Cat bonding with dwarfs over dinner table talk of God killing. This novel is lovely.

Gunslinger

Damn the turns this arc is taking. Quite fascinating. Though I really question Cat's confidence that they won't steal Archers bow. It seems like the very first thing they'd do

Dainpdf

Depends on how lucrative the deal the dwarves get would be, I suspect. Though they are very intent on keeping *everything* they can get their hands on, I don't think that bow is valuable enough that they wouldn't trade it back to Cat in exchange for concessions.

Plus, if anyone on the surface is scary enough that the prospect of them being pissed might give the dwarves pause, it's Ranger.

*TeK*

She is a honorary dwarf, and it's her property, temporarily loaned to this particular maggot.

*wirelessgrapes*

Yeah there's no way that they won't give it back once they tell them that it's from Ranger. Ranger is Ranger, everyone else fucks off when she's in the building. It's getting to the point where saying that matters, so either she dies or she gets her bow back

*sengachi*

Even Ranger doesn't fuck with dwarves, remember?

*Euodiachloris*

One sentence should sort it: "the bow belongs to the Lady of Refuge who loaned it to her ward: she might love this excuse to be a pain to get it back, but you won't".

Drd

I couldn't work out why they just didn't hand the Dwarves archer's arrows and kept the bow, personally. They is the sharp pointy bit after all.

Decius

How exactly does someone with the Name Archer ever exhaust her supply of arrows, even intentionally?

Yotz

Have you heard a story about Archer being locked in the hermetically sealed room, absolutely empty sans two balls of pure goblinsteel 16 feet in diameter each? In mere quarter of an hour she managed to lost one ball and broke another in half. Mind you, we know about latter purely from her words since she hid the shards somewhere in that empty room, and promptly forgot where exactly.

Decius

To be fair, she was drunk when it happened. Despite there not being any alcohol in the room.

Yotz

Quite so. Indeed, she is an enigma wrapped in alcohol and shrouded in tactical facepalms. And wooden duckies.

But really, what else one have to do in such a pickle, being trapped in the supreme nexus of inconceivable boringness...

Someguy

Well, the drow have obviously been culturaly mutilated by Bard into what they are so dealing with them in any political capacity is going to be a Narrative Trap. Trophy Hunting dwarves out to play Great White Hunter among the primitives should be more predictable.

soonnanandnaanssoon

The superiority of inferior vertical prowess truly proves to be one of Cat's key strengths.

danh3107

I wish I could figure out the confounded like system on here to like that, biggest smile I've had in a while.

DroughtBringer

You press the star and it should work.

Yotz

You'll need to have a Gravatar/WordPress/whatever account to be able to do that, though.

TeK

Since we no longer see any contemplation of that particular inferiority, one wonders if she used eldritch and terrible powers of Winter to fix her previous failures in that direction.

mavant

> "Let us eat, drink, and talk of murdering gods."

BIG FUCKING MOOD

sengachi

It ain't a proper party until gods start to die.

Forrest

There is now way she would get to forge an alliance with the dwarves... surely? That would be too good for her too early on, unless Cat's victories are actually going to start coming mixed in with her losses, which would be a nice change of pace.

Byzantine

The dwarves don't give a shit about human affairs. They will not help Callow.

They will, however, work with Cat if it results in what they want, which likely includes a war against the Dead King.

So an alliance would be very conditional, and only apply against certain foes – more of a pact to take down a mutual threat than anything else.

haihappen

First step would using Cat as a tool to murder the Sve, as this would be more cost effective than invading once the drow know they are invaded, and start employing raid tactics which that are supposedly very good at. Simply fortifying their position and wait for the Night to vanish because the demigod fueling it is dead seems like the frugal approach.

They may make a deal with Cat in that vain, but it is questionable if they feel obligated to uphold their part of the bargain.

IDKWhoitis

I don't think any of the Dwarves would survive the betrayal if that were the case. I'm betting on Cat either getting a powerup, piece of eldritch advice, or both in her fight with the Sve.

Javvies

Probably not an alliance proper, nor even protectorate status like Refuge has.

However, it's likely that the dwarves will either cooperate with Cat to deal with the Drow, possibly allowing Cat to take them over and relocate them, or steal power from the Drow. Alternatively, or possibly in addition the dwarves might make a deal to provide Cat/Callow some assistance in other ways, most likely by way of armaments or by allowing her to hire "mercenaries", likely in exchange for her helping them murder drow.

Also, the dwarves are probably not exactly pleased with the thought that the Dead King might end up taking over large swathes of Procer/Calernia at Malicia's invitation. That would render useless their attempts to contain him underground.

delspaig

Basically what everyone else said, but I also disagree that it's too early. We're in chapter fifty nine of book four of (iirc) five total, and they're the fourth group she's approached about resolving the Crusade. It's really not early by any means.

Shequi

"Let us eat, drink, and talk of murdering gods."

"Murdering" could be either a past tense verb or it could be an adjective here. Just saying.

Decius

My thought is that it was a gerund.

Either bond over the story of how you murdered a god, bond over talking about gods who murder, or plan the murder of a god.

TeK

So, the King Under is actually a King Under a Mountain (https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/King\_in\_the\_mountain). Coupled with empty stone throne, does that mean there are no King?

Yotz

May be a formal thing – an effigy of sort, metaphoric representation of Throne's leadership over this particular group of Dwarves.

TeK

Well, the throne is heavy, who do you need to be to drag around metric tons of stone as a symbol?

RanVor

A dwarf.

wyaldriddler

I expect it is a Dwarven Name like Dread Empress. It might be purely symbolic as well, but that will likely come out in the next few chapters.

daegone823

Every time I read of Drow dying all I think about is the light to harvest. Hope the drow brought the corpse of that lesser mighty. It feels like Chat is slinging Ivah to returning to greatness,

I hope he takes Bogdan's light and becomes a mighty.

Novice

Night not light. Big difference.

daegone823

My bad but you know what I mean so....

NZPIEFACE

this is reminding me about the talk with the dead king a bit

trippdup

I feel a lot better about this arc now that I see the point was not the Drow but bringing the Dwarves to the fore. Great work as usual.

letouriste

"Note: bottling up the power of friendship cannot be achieved by bottling up friends. Must pursue further trials, perhaps prior liquefaction diluted the substance."

– Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II

O.M.G you have a gift for that xD

Yotz

On the offtopic note – gonna steal that epigraph and use it in hypothetical MLP:FiM fanfic.

grzecho2222

Well, Guide does need crossovers with something other than Worm, because really guys they made 60% of Guide fanfics

Yotz

Hmmm...

Don't know about crossover per se, but...

In the once magical land of Equestria, where ancient ideals of Harmony and Friendship lie now forgotten, a new move in eternal game between eldritch inequine powers threatens to break millenia-long stalemate.

Pieces old and new set once again in motion by unseen hooves – and not only hooves.

Under the lead of new First Princess, Prancer finally emerges from a brutal civil war, bearing an unspeakable grudge against its instigator – the Dread Empire of Pygna, who used discordian state of its nemesis to finally occupy the heartlands of ancient princessdom.

Ships under the banners of Zeab Fabulocracy muster on the raising winds of trade – and conquest.

People whisper about Eldeer sightings outside of Blessed Thicket.

Deep thunder rumbles under the ground as Diamond Autocracy prepares for the new wave of expansion.

Something stirs in the North, in frozen and desolate Crystal Wastes; and ruins of Stalliongrad are covered with a blanket of roiling smog once more.

In this land, balancing on the verge of new all-consuming war, a young orphan mare struggles in search of long-lost ancient heritage.

Will she be able to find it?

Will she be able to restore peace and harmony in the world long torn by hatred?

Will she be willing to do so after paying the dreadful price for the secrets contained in the ancient book penned by the Dread Princess Twilight Sparkle (may she never return)?

Coming soon(TM)(C).

TeK

A practical guide to chaos'd be more fitting.

Yotz

A practical guide to discord, then.

One have to adhere to certain guidelines in the matter of such significance, after all.

grzecho2222

-You don't have to be Evil, you can have friends instead.-
-But I'm Evil and I have friends? -
-But, but...-Head explosion.

Yotz

That. That is a one mighty fine suggestion.
Exploring the humane and social interactions of Evil.
...Sans head explosion, most probably. At least, on the protagonist part.
Unfortunately, every oh-so-good-and-original author – and quite a few pretty good and original without sarcasm – already plowed that particular field up to the proverbial bedrock.

chris knarvik

A comment is required to follow

Morgenstern

>> Another one was eyeing the sword at my hip, so I smiled blandly and took it out. Hammers rose again, but I presented it by the hilt. The dwarf blinked, but took it anyway. If it'd been goblin steel I might have felt a pang, but this was just a sliver of Winter. I could recall it to my mantle at will, what did I care who held it? <<

Oh dear. Now, if I were a devious GM, that would just make me rub my hands... inside of my head, of course. Freely given... you really think they can't make use of it? You better wish...

frolamiz

Yeah, but it's also a very Fae like thing to trick mortals with glamor. Usually, it's Fae gold, here it's just a variant with a weapon instead.

I'm more interested by the possibility that she's becoming more of a Fae in her behavior.

Morgenstern

Murdering gods:

Uhm... Cat didn't exactly *murder* a god, now did she? She got the mantle as a result of giving the King of Winter what he *wanted* – an end to the cycle, while being the last remaining noble of said court – which she was trapped into by said King, so he could control her do what he wants...

The one how ACTUALLY murdered a god and took his mantle was the "Beast" AKA Sabah... *honorary minute*

(( On that thought, whatever happened to that heart of ice and having to xy in span of x moons or belong to him aka actually contemplating to murder him? Was that a part of what made her lose her humanity to become sth else? *musing* She must have lost that ...”bet” by now, what with all the time gone in the interval...? ))

RanVor

I think she meant the Duke of Violent Squalls. She did murder that one.

MetruX

She only became of moonless nights once she killed her “uncle/dad” of violent squalls. It was retroactive true, but minor details.

Also, when she completed her “quest” for the Winter King she actually got freed from that... Curse? It was all very strange in that part, but it was clear she didn’t have those problems anymore, though she kept winter powers, and Masego had to make a clutch so she wouldn’t be consumed by winter. When it did happen, right when she fought Akua, instead of being consumed she consumed winter, probbly because she is the last of winter.

doominator10

As a lesser consolation, she did bully an angel all those years ago. I’m sure that counts for something.

Agent J

Catherine masqueraded as the daughter (and heir) of the Duke of Violent Squalls before murdering him (a demigod) and inheriting his Dukedom/Mantle.

As for the ‘xy’s of the bet, she was supposed to defeat Summer in six months or be owned by the Winter King forever more. She did, so she’s not. Also, Winter King isn’t King of Winter anymore, and all the Winter Fae automatically joined his new court.

So yes, she murdered a demigod for his power.

SMHF

I’m enjoying this arc a lot more than the Dead King’s... mostly because even if by some miracle Cat had passed his test, Malicia would’ve had a backup plan for it. But ‘negotiating with the dwarves to evict the drow from Everdark to use as cannon fodder’, isn’t something anyone can plan for! XD

Xinci

Glad to know my theory of them being after power was probably right. Though given not much has been seen of the dwarven power structure as of yet cant know the intricacies, byplays and interplays of the power structure proper. Least we know some of how Cat may deal with her local one/her current potential allies for this war.

I wonder if Sve is planning to take action soon or if her current state of torment isnt capable of properly disseminating orders through the night to coordinate a strike against the dwarves? Maybe she just doesnt want to since she wants to see the tenets tested? Might not be able to do so for story reasons, but definitely feels like the dwarves should get punished for pushing into a metaphysical and metaphorical spiders web. Huh actually what happens to non-burned/harvested Night? A spider often keeps hold if its webbing for its entire life after all, unless Sve is not truly a spider in theme.

Well this was interesting. Even though not much was gotten on the dwarves power structure it gave a bit more of information on why Ranger is a honorary dwarf. The dwarves go for the same things as ranger (concentrations of power) and attempt to steal, destroy or control them (potentially all at once?) similarly to how Ranger seeks things worthy of hunting to understand them and become even stronger. They don't seem to like disparate networks power, which may be one of their weaknesses as such techniques properly used (a'la the Night) could probably sap their power-base begin to hurt their culture over time but only if they were focused on doing so (timeframe is iffy though). Archer is kind of like Ranger but isnt enough to go about hunting like her mentor so isn't dwarfishish enough for them to consider her worthy of being a honorary dwarf. I trul do wonder about Archers relationship with the dwarves though, is she wary of them because she hasnt figured out how to outdo them yet? Maybe its because her goals are different than her mentors?

I truly am curious about where they got that wood. Underground forest near a underground sea or lake? Depending on what kind of tempest and heat sources are in the zone such a thing may be possible (who knows could have stone exuding enough energy to act like sunlight at some point down there). I do wonder where the Dwarves get their lava, that is to say when are they getting magma vs lava and where from? I assume it may be spirits, though it being some kind of old god makes sense as well. I dont really know the floral diversity of the Deeps as of yet though I do wonder if the dwarves use mushrooms as bread for sandwiches if they have em (they keep a fairly long time and do keep food in place pretty well).

Exec

Bottled Power of Friendship is absolutely something you could buy in Skade, probably for the price of eternal loneliness.

Snowfire1224

If not Skade, I would check Mechantis

nipi

Cat! You didnt kill a god, he abdicated.

Agent J

Demigod* And yes, I suppose the Duke of Violent Squalls abdicated by way of death from stupidity.

werafdsaew

It's finally time for Cat's diplomatic efforts to pay off

Unmaker

"The shackles do not bind you,"
They only bind Night.

Zachary Burgess-Hicks

Nooo must know what happens next I just all 4 books till here!
Now I must wait. The pain....

Snowfire1224

Suffering builds character

Yotz

Useless fact of the day: there is only one word for concepts of "pain", "knowledge", and "power" in Phyrexian language.

Nafram

The master race does not dissappoint, and if by some eldritch way Cat manages to actually earn their favour, the Kingdom Under would be the greatest allies she could possibly hope for.

aran

"Let us eat, drink, and talk of murdering gods."

I think they'll get along just fine.

---

Chapter 60: Profiteers

"In the kingdom of the blind, the one-eyed man is lynched."

– Praesi saying

Since my crowning I'd found it necessary to occasionally entertain 'people of import'. It wasn't something I particularly enjoyed, but a shared meal and a bottle of wine was a decent way to take a good look at what influential individuals of Callow were up to. Most of the time it'd been members of the Queen's Council or envoys from my governors, more rarely emissaries from the northern baronies. Those dinners tended to be calm affairs, where more importance was placed on the conversation than the food. I rather preferred the dwarven take on it, all things told. After nibbling at rations for weeks, a slab of ribs lathered in sauce with a goblet of some kind of pitch-black liquor that smelled like berries and kicked like a mule were a delightful change of pace. The Herald had made a point out of being the one to offer them, even if another dwarf brought the plates, which I guessed to be some point of dwarven etiquette. The table was granite and low even by my standards, though it'd clearly been crafted with burlier types in mind: Akua and I didn't even come close to filling our side of it.

The Herald and his interpreter – not that he needed one, as it turned out – had dug into their own plates without any mannerly pretences. I followed suit, rather enjoying the meat even though I did not recognize it. The liquor was a treat though, I'd own to that much. Diabolist was more interested in the fine make of the cutlery we were using than the meal, though she made sure to eat and drink enough no insult would be taken. The dwarves polished off their plates at admirable speed, knocking back the liquor all the while, and it was not long before all were finished. There'd been no attempt at conversation while the plates were on the table, not from their side anyway. I'd followed suit, in no great hurry, and Akua had followed my example. Soldiers took away the plates when we were done, bringing bowls of tepid water to the table where the dwarves soaked their fingers clean before wiping on cloths. My brows rose. They were a strangely clean people, for a race that dwelled in dirt. Still, I imitated them and saw with mild disappointment that our cups and bottle were taken away.

"Diplomacy cannot be had over such mild drinks, Queen Catherine," Balasi told me amusedly, having noticed my look. "It would be unseemly."

"Your people have an enlightened sense of etiquette, Seeker," I replied. "The liquor, may I ask what it is called?"

"Black kasi," the dwarf said. "I will part with a bottle as gift, should these talks be fruitful."

It'd been a long time since a bribe that baldly offered had tempted me even a little, I mused.

"The stakes have been raised," I drily replied.

Soldiers returned with four small wooden bowls and set them down before each of us. I studied mine curiously: oak, if I was not mistaken. Old and rough, never varnished or sculpted. A heavy glass bottle was brought, and the dwarven soldier bearing it very carefully poured maybe half a cup's worth of liquid into each bowl. It looked like wine, I thought, but vapour wafted off the surface and it was very clearly near boiling. I glanced at Balasi and found him staring at his own bowl reverently.

"It must be allowed to seep," he told me. "These bowls have never seen other purpose than the cradling of sudra, and so the taste of old toasts mixes with the new."

"I'm honoured," I said, inclining my head.

"As it should be," the Herald said. "No such bottle has ever left the Kingdom Under. I doubt more than a dozen of your kind ever tasted sudra, much less properly served."

It was utterly wasted on me, considering my tastes in drink had moved from 'decent table wine' to 'nearly flammable' since I'd taken up my mantle. It might be undiplomatic to say as much, though, and I was curious about the taste. I inclined my head again, a little deeper this time. The Herald of the Deeps responded in kind.

"You were introduced as Queen of Callow," the green-eyed dwarf said. "Yet your second name is Foundling, not Fairfax."

"There are no more Fairfaxes," I said. "They were slain to the last, when the Dread Empire of Praes conquered Callow. I am first and only of my line."

"A worthy purpose, that will have earned no small burden," Balasi said approvingly.

The Herald turned amused eyes on him, then back to me.

"You will have to forgive my old friend," he said. "He is quite the radical, even for a seeker of deeds."

"No offence was taken," I said. "There was none to be found, in my eyes."

"I have told you before, delein," the deed-seeker snorted. "The ways of their kind may be chaotic, but they are not without merit."

"To each thing born, purpose and burden," the Herald chided. "What you seek as correction is mere revelation. Our truth is absolute."

I was missing too much context to be able to truly follow that exchange, but some guesses could be hazarded. Purpose and burden, huh. There was a weight to that, one familiar to me. Name and Role. Indrani had said that the deed-seeker were trying to win something other dwarves thought they weren't supposed to have. Considering their way of going about it was to hunt the most dangerous creatures around, their behaviour might just be an attempt to raise their 'purpose' by first raising their 'burden'. Interesting, and worth keeping in mind, but not ultimately why I was seated here with them.

"From your question I take it you're not too familiar with surface affairs," I said.

"They are neither my charge nor concern," the Herald said. "Balasi is more knowledgeable of such affairs, though it has been some time since he last journeyed upwards."

"Last I heard, Praes was trying to invade your people and getting smacked around for the presumption," the deed-seeker said. "Queen Moirin was ruling, I believe."

Queen Moiren, he likely meant. The grandmother of Good King Robert, the Fairfax who'd died on the Fields of Streges failing to turn back the Conquest. Anything they knew of the surface dated back at least a hundred years, then.

"Callow was conquered, and under my aegis was made independent again," I said. "We are now at war with most the great powers of the surface, three of which have declared a crusade on Praes and would break my homeland on their march to the Tower."

"And so you come to the Everdark in your hour of need," Balasi said. "You must truly be desperate, to seek anything but corpses from the kraksun."

"I've knocked at every other door," I said. "The Dead King is on the march, now, and there are no limits to his hunger. This is no time to be squeamish about one's allies."

"The kraksun will flee, or perish," the Herald of the Deepes said, and he spoke it not as promise or prophecy but as mere fact.

As if there could be no doubt. Gods, maybe there wasn't. What little I knew of these people was enough to have me very, very wary – and they were just the vanguard.

"Such an outcome may very well be inevitable," Akua said. "Yet the path by which it is reached remains shadowed, does it not? There is little purpose in entertaining us otherwise."

Balasi cast a look at me.

"You allow your spirit a great deal of freedom," he said.

"She has her uses," I mildly replied. "And considering the costs of her service, she will be worked until she breaks."

Diabolist bowed her head at me, without the slightest hint of displeasure on her face. It could be true, I thought. The right of the victor, she'd called it. It could also be a lie, and I would never know until the end. My very own viper, always dangerous no matter how tight the leash.

"How much do you know of this ruin of a realm, Queen Catherine?" the Herald asked.

I hesitated. Admitting ignorance here might see me hoodwinked. Dwarves were infamously disinclined to fair bargains. On the other hand, pretending to be an expert where I was not was just as dangerous in its own way. These were not people to trifle with.

"Little in most matters, yet I have glimpsed deep in some," I finally said. "My power is both kin and foe to the Priestess of Night's, in some eldritch way."

The green-eyed dwarf nodded slowly.

"I have long studied their kind," he said. "Seven wars we fought against them, two of them lost. Yet we won the last three, and the lands of their ancient colonies were swallowed in the Ninth Expansion. The echo of the last defeat saw them collapse, hiding behind the Gloom and turning their knives on each other. They are a pale imitation of what they once were."

"A ruin of a realm," I softly agreed. "And the spider at the centre of the web lies waiting in Tvarigu."

"She is more monster than woman now," Balasi said. "She devoured the Twilight Sages, it is said, and made them into the first of the Night. She has only grown since: her hand is on every knife, her lips wet with every red bite."

"A creature without purpose," the Herald said, and there was hatred in his voice. "A burden on all her kind. You surface people quibble over devils and books, but the Sve Noc is breathing blasphemy. Voices were raised, when we warred against the goblins, and Ishti's Bargain extended as mercy. Yet there was only silence in the Deep Places, when call was made for war on the Everdark.”

“I have known little but war since I was sixteen,” I quietly said. “And so I know this: annihilation is a costly enterprise. To break an enemy is one thing, to destroy it wholesale another.”

“Yet annihilation is the only path, so long as the Sve Noc draws breath,” Balasi said. “Many will die, for this purpose. It will take decades to scatter the greatest of the Mighty and lay siege to Tvarigu itself, perhaps as long as a century. We will not have that.”

“The King of Death has turned his eyes to the wars of the surface,” the Herald said. “Yet we have seen this before. It never lasts. The dead will return to the depths soon enough.”

The green-eyed dwarf leaned in.

“The Gloom must fall,” the Herald of the Deeps said. “You fled forward, I think, without seeing our host. It is not only that, Queen of Callow. We have brought artisans and tenders, masons and runescribes. Families as well as soldiers.”

My fingers clenched under the table.

“You intend to settle the outer rings,” Akua said in my stead. “To raise fortress-cities from which you can fight the war against the drow even after the Dead King returns.”

“A long and bleak exile, for hundreds of thousands,” Balasi said. “None who felt this to be their purpose expect to see their kin for many years. The Fourteenth Expansion will be a treacherous one.”

“Yet if someone killed the Priestess of Night,” I said. “The Gloom would end. No exile, no hard decades of war severed from home.”

“Slayers have been sent before,” the Herald said. “As far as we known, none lived to reach the inner ring.”

“Yet you have taken kraksun prisoner,” Balasi said. “Used them. A dwarf would be attacked on sight. A human, of sufficient power? That would be different matter.”

I took a moment to let the implications of that sink in. Not that they wanted me to traipse through the Everdark and murder yet another demigod for their advantage – that much I’d expected – but the sheer scope of what they were undertaking. Hundreds of thousands, Seeker Balasi had said. That was all of eastern Callow, I thought. All those people sent marching across some sorcerous barrier not out of fear or desperation, but because the empire of the dwarves had deemed it strategic necessity to destroy the drow. What kind of empire could do that? The sum whole of the Tenth Crusade, which had three great nations joined, could barely muster two hundred thousand soldiers. I'd read as a child that the Kingdom Under likely spanned two thirds of Calernia underground: that to the east it reached the heartlands of Praes, to the south it touched the upper half of the Dominion. To the west a gate was rumoured to exist in the coastal principality of Brus, though one scarcely used, and the Kingdom of the Dead had long been thought to be the northern border of the dwarven kingdom. I was no longer certain that was the case, to be honest.

I'd read the words stating all that, ink on parchment, but never really understood them until now. Black had once called the Kingdom Under the only Calernian nation that could be considered more than a regional power. I'd not disbelieved him, I'd had no reason to, but neither had I truly taken the words to heart. Mighty as the dwarves were, they were barely Calernian in the end. Their presence was lightly felt, more an adjacent existence one must avoid provoking than a nation we shared borders with. I supposed that was true, in a way – could an ant really have a border with a giant? And while the great nations of the surface had been tearing each other to shreds for yards of land or points of principles, the Kingdom Under had grown so great it could afford to send a few hundred thousand soldiers and settlers into the dark for a mere gamble. A possibly century-long roll of the dice that would shatter a people's spine over the knee of the King Under the Mountain if it worked. I wasn't a nobody, I knew. I'd done things that would be remembered in histories. In sheer power, there were only a handful of people on the continent that could be called my equal and even fewer my superior.

All of that was dust in the eyes of the people I was speaking with. It was worth remembering that much, before I tried to strike a pact.

"I supposed most queens would find it beneath their dignity to play the assassin for a foreign power," I finally said.

"Fortunately, I have no such qualms. You need the Sve Nocte removed and the Gloom lifted. I believe I can deliver this."

"Then we now speak of terms," the Herald said. "You will want payment, for this service."

"I will," I said. "Before that is discussed, forgive my ignorance but I am uncertain of what your title means. Does it carry the authority to make such a deal?"

Balasi's face turned stormy and he pulled at his beard, but the Herald quelled him with a look.

"I am the Herald of the Deeps," the green-eyed dwarf said, and his voice rang with power. "Promises I make will be observed by all who call themselves dwarves."

I could taste the power in the air, the sharp tang of it. My eyes narrowed. Named, I thought. That man is Named. Until now there had not been so much as a mote of spillover, which was worth noting. I hadn't seen that kind of control since Black. The dwarf was either a religious or cultural figure of some sort, from the sounds of it. Some kind of priest? Curious as I was, it was not necessary to delve too deep in the ways of the dwarves to make a deal. Asking questions now would only distract from that.

"Understood," I simply said. "Shade?"

Akua leaned in over the table. She knew what I needed, right now, and would be better at bargaining for it. Soldiers were the most direly needed. Drow would have made for useful shock troops but if I could field a few thousand dwarves instead? It was a clearly superior outcome. There was precedent for their kind warring on the surface, though only as mercenaries. After that, my desires were split between diplomatic pressure and gold. An infusion of gold would get Callow through the worst of the current troubles, at least in some respects. Trade with the League of Free Cities had not ceased, and Mercantis never closed its shores to anyone: what my kingdom lacked and could not make could be bought, if we had the coin. On the other hand, a quiet word from the Kingdom Under to any of the powers might solve a lot of my troubles. Even something as simple as declaring the Kingdom of Callow under protection for two years would free my hands to do so much. If I could actually rebuild in peace instead of sinking all the treasury into the army... No doubt the Empress would continue striking through deniable means, but Thief was becoming better hand at the shadow games with every passing month. Breathing room would be godsent, and I could ask for starker price than that.

"Her Majesty came to the Everdark to obtain an army," Diabolist said. "As the days of the kraksun seem numbered, we will need to secure another source of soldiery."

Seeker Balasi smiled.

"You can have right of recruitment among them," he said. "Any you can take into your service will be spared, so long as they depart."

That was a broad promise, I thought. If I managed to sway even a third of the drow, were they really willing to let them go? I supposed it made sense, from their perspective. So long as they left the Everdark, they were no longer a dwarven problem.

"A right we possess, strictly speaking," Akua politely replied. "As you made it clear you have no intention of pursuit beyond the span of the Fourteenth Expansion. Dwarves have served as mercenaries before, this would not be significantly different."

"It is against decree to war on the surface when the Kingdom Under seeks expansion," the Herald said replied. "You will find no purchase here."

The deed-seeker frowned, then spoke to his fellow dwarf in their tongue. They traded a few sentences, then Balasi cleared his throat.

"While not in official capacity, I could speak to a few of my fellows," he offered. "Should you deliver, we could seek deeds in your wars."

"And how many of your fellows could we count on, Seeker?" Akua asked.

"Two, three hundred," Balasi said.

"Not a significant enough force, I take it," the shade asked me in Mtethwa.

"I already have enough monsters up my sleeves," I honestly replied. "What I need is solid foot to give the vultures pause. Three hundred wouldn't make Hasenbach or the Dead King think twice."

"Their deaths could be leveraged into greater dwarven involvement," she suggested.

"We'd also have to answer for that," I grunted. "Pass."

"Then we return to recruiting from the drow," Akua said. "Shall I press coin or influence?"

"Coin first," I decided. "Best we stand on our own, if we can have that that. But try to get protection if you can. Doesn't matter if it's short so long as we can call in the favour when we need it."

It would have been polite to call diplomacy what followed, but I knew haggling when I saw it. That Akua was arguing the murder of a lesser god was not cheap instead of loudly exclaiming fresh fish for silver was highway robbery did not make the substance of what took place any different. It was a delicate line to walk for Diabolist. We were useful to the dwarves, but not necessary – there was only so far she could push. I'd learned to put a leash on my temper, over the years, but I was still glad she was the one doing the talking. Balasi was near-openly trying to screw us, first suggesting a loan to the Kingdom of Callow instead of outright payment. As was always the way with these things, what was hammered out was a compromise no one was truly happy with.

The treasury in Laure would be getting enough coin that Juniper should be able to raise the Army of Callow as she saw fit without picking clean every last copper, though after the expenses of feeding the southern refugees through the winter I suspected we'd have a rather tight belt when spring came around.

Though Akua pushed hard for a degree of open support from the dwarves, the Herald personally killed the notion. What we got was a little more abstract, though in some ways just as useful: for the next five years, sale of weapons to any nation at war with the Kingdom of Callow would end. I would dearly like to see Cordelia Hasenbach try to raise half the countryside of Procer without a steady supply of cheap dwarven armaments. Unlike Praes, Procer had no large set of forges and smithies directly under the authority of the ruler: her options without the Kingdom Under propping up the war effort were few and rather unpalatable. Our right of recruitment from the drow was confirmed, under condition that they left the Everdark without fighting. It was at least two hours before everything was settled, Diabolist arranging for the payments and announcements being carried out through Mercantis as swiftly as possible. We ended as we began, drinks in hand: at the Herald's careful instruction we raised the wooden bowls and drank deep of the sudra. It was smooth all the way down, I thought, yet no sweeter for it. There was a faint aftertaste that was almost coppery. Like blood.

A fitting drink for this pact, then.

---

DroughtBringer

I think we can all agree that Practical Guide to Evil is the best guide to evil out there on the internet, Practical or otherwise. Now, not everyone knows that this is the best guide to Evil, because The Guide is only first on the list over at Top Web Fiction.

We can do better.

We must keep rising, until Practical Guide claims it's rightful spot as the One Web Serial to rule them all...

Only not get destroyed in the fires from whence it came like the One Ring of legend...

Go vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(This has been a weird post telling you to go vote. So do it!)

mavant

In fairness it's really more of a guide to antiheroism. I think the Overlord List is still more of a guide to Evil qua Evil.

RanVor

Yeah, there's not much doing wrong right lately.

Vortex

I mean let's be real she just agreed to assassinate a demigod in order to obtain the support she needs to raise an army of cannon fodder to absorb losses for her main army.

GuidingMoonlight

No. She just agreed to help remove genocidal despot from power and liberate proud Drow men and women from tyranny and slavery. She also magnanimously agreed to provide refuge and education to any willing Drow while dwarfs restore their ruined homeland.

MetruX

Just a point: no education is to be provided xD

mavant

It'll be in education in the advisability of trusting "liberating" revolutionaries.

GuidingMoonlight

Military training is considered an education.

mavant

That still seems like doing right to me. Murder The Gods And Topple Their Thrones!

RanVor

I bet Cat wishes she was a noodle vendor right now.

mavant

She's certainly got the "terrible blade of Want" thing down.

burguulkodar

Oooh, Kill 6 Billion Demons reference? I always thought that beggar knight was a noodles' consumer, not a vendor.

Cheerless Mirth

What is this Overlord List? Googling only gave me literal lists of overlords, plus tons about the overlord lightnovel. Can you give me a link or something?

mavant

Oh I am SO happy to be the one who gets to share this with you. One of today's lucky ten thousand!

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/EvilOverlordList>

Cheerless Mirth

I'll admit, I was expecting something similar to this novel, but can't say I'm disappointed. Good stuff, much of which I had an idle thought or two about before when writing 😊

kelioez

Thanks for this gem, it was really dope, and i just shared it with 10 more peeps, so I'm doing the overlord's work too.

TeK

In the kingdom of blind, nobody can find a one-eyed man.

Dainpdf

I'm sure there is a Name trick or two for that. Or at least an Aspect.

JJR

Set off a brightstick, then follow the sound of, "AHH!My eye!"

Dainpdf

That, too.

TeK

But one-eyed man would see you preparing a brightstick, so he'll close his eye and ears, while everyone else will be deafened.

Barthumphries

I was not aware that your race is able to close its ears like it can close its eyes. This sounds fascinating – tell me more. 😊

TeK

My race has this fascinating thing called arms. It's a limb that goes from your sides and you can use to various purposes. Like tentacles, but not that pretty.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Cat's getting PAID to kill now? Might as well pay me for breathing.

TeK

Your breathing just not as useful 😊

soonnanandnaanssoon

I feel hurt. Like a dove. An injured dove.

GreatDerpression

I see your injured dove and raise you a snapped branch of olives.

Decius

Well, she's not getting paid to not breathe.

Delakar

Why is everyone set on Cat killing the Sve Nocte, all we heard she agree to was the removal of Sve Nocte. Unless clearer language was used in the terms Cat would be still be honoring them if she went off and made a deal with Sve Nocte to take all the drow away to Callow.

Is it likely no, but it is still a great idea.

TeK

The word murder was used several times.

NZPIEFACE

Because the dwarves see the Sve as a blight on the world.

That's literally what she's being paid to do.

SpacyRicochet

> "Yet annihilation is the only path, so long as the Sve Noc draws breath,"

The dwarves made it beyond clear that Sve must die. They've also established that Catherine will kill Sve Noc and become their 'assassin'. Those were her words, not theirs. The dwarves will hold her to it.

Even worse, she might actually kill Sve Noc, accidentally manage to absorb her Night and the Dwarves are going to claim she's technically still alive. Let's hope it doesn't come to that. Cath needs a solid win for once.

Death Knight

Combining her Winter Powers with the Night the Sve holds and Cat stands a damn good chance of wiping out the entire Dwarven expansion though that course of action would likely see the Great Hole being formed where Callow used to be.

Big Brother

Ooh-hoo-hoo. I love Dwarven Diplomacy.

tithin

Good chapter

danh3107

I really, indescribably love this take on the dwarves erratic. For a while they've been an enigmatic boogeyman rarely mentioned, but now we have a face to the hearsay and it's rather satisfactory. As someone who's dabbled in amateur fantasy fiction, it's impressive for me to see someone make something so common as dwarves so wholly their own. I shouldn't be surprised after the orcs, but here we are.

Thanks erratic, for making my weeks a little better every time you post.

SpeckofStardust

oh my, 5 years of no one at war with Callow getting weapons? That is going to be crippling.

Dainpdf

I assume the smart ones will think to purchase a lot, and then make war. Which is still a negative, in terms of being able to afford a war, but it's still a thing.

RanVor

But they would have to see it coming...

Fucking Impressed

Damn you Augur!

Dainpdf

Over five years? The first will not, but after a year or two they'll notice the pattern

muffin

Betraying dwarven trust seems a good ritual to summon Quagmires under your feet.

Dainpdf

Who said anyone would be betraying Dwarven trust?

TeK

"We are not at war with most the great powers of the surface, three of which have declared a crusade on Praes and would break my homeland on their march to the Tower."
That is some mighty typo.

DroughtBringer

Huh, Dwarves are interesting. I feel like the Dwarves are building up to something a bit more, we are seeing aspects of their culture that may either lead Cat to war against them, due to something happening with the Sve, or to see Cat to form a further truce with them. I know not which might happen, but either, or a third option still involving seeing the Dwarves in action, would be interesting.

Javvies

Not as much as she wanted, but still, a fairly decent payout.

Of course, this likely means Cat has underestimated the difficulty of her side of the bargain.
But, on the other hand, nobody is going to care how many drow and their settlements get broken by Cat in the process of pulling off her end of the bargain.

Dainpdf

There is the point that what is difficult for one may not be for another. The gold Cat would save them by killing the Sve easily outsets the loss incurred by not selling to some of the Calernians, and a lot of the gold she gets from them is likely to go right back to their coffers as she arms her people and no longer has as much access to goblin steel.

Misterspokes

She does have access to goblin steel, from her own tribe in Callow

Decius

Just not as much as she had before.

Allafterme

I was under the impression that only supply of Goblin Steel was from Foreman & that supply was basically under monopoly by the Tower

RanVor

That was munitions.

Dainpdf

That's still less than when she had access to the Eyries themselves.

Death Knight

It was mentioned that the Matrons are seeking audience with Cat. So acquiring Goblin Steel may not be such an issue after all...

Dainpdf

It's possible.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder what Black will think when he hears Cat managed to negotiate with the Dwarves. Especially without getting overcharged.

DroughtBringer

We don't know if she is overcharged yet. We'll have to see when the murder comes.

George Maddux

Enough gold to bring Callow from crisis to a tight belt feels like short shrift for killing a demigod imo. The Dwarves were willing to commit a force that could likely wipe out the Tenth Crusade several times over for the same purpose.

Dainpdf

She won't have to kill every single Drow in existence to get there, they think, while gold is really not a problem to the Kingdom Under.

Javvies

It wouldn't be overcharged. It would be underpaid.

And while I'm guessing Cat probably is getting underpaid for the value and difficulty of what she's offering (killing Sve of Night and transplanting some number of drow), what she's getting is close enough to what she needs that it is still quite valuable.

Someguy

Sudra is obviously the blood of hagglers.

TeK

I wonder how drow will change with the death of Sve of Noc or Nocte. Might it be that they are corrupted by Night, and what Cat can offer them is a salvation?

Gunslinger

They'd be a lot weaker is my guess.

naturalnuke

Well, if Cat devours the Power then she can parcel it out as she sees fit. What if the 'Night' was suddenly given out by standing with Cat instead of murder?

Dainpdf

Given it is apparently part of the reason the Drow have torn themselves apart, she should probably keep to her initial decision to stay away from it.

RoflCat

"Night, meet Winter, Winter, Night"
"Sve, meet Akua, Akua, Sve"

then the Drow get upgraded to (Moonless) Night Elf

ArkhCthuul

That made me laugh sooo hard. Everyone thought it, but you said it in the most funny way. Kudos.

Mr. McNoodles

Latest chapters are undeniably shorter in a wide margin compared to the first few ones. Still, a good chapter nevertheless!

Nafram

I love this deal Cat has struck with the dwarfs. There will be complications of course, but I believe that should Cat succeed at killing the Priestess of the Night, the only part that's into question is how many drow will she get to recruit. My guess is that she will get enough to alleviate her problems a great deal but not enough to truly solve them.

I don't know what an organized military force of Drow would be, but if they keep the Night beyond the death of its priestess, then they could function very well as special forces, not that the Wild Hunt doesn't already fulfill that role incredibly well

Fern

I feel like the obvious Praesi answer of turn them into light disposable shocktroopers wouldn't cut it for this conflict. Coming up the amount of logistical equipment needed to completely arm and armor these pelt wearing dipshits would be too expensive for Callow's treasury, and doing anything less would be a waste compared to the effort to raise this particular "levy." However, if Catherine (or possibly Adjutant) could make some connections with the Matrons, it would be a lot smarter for her to outfit them like skirmishers or sappers. Play to their strengths of lightweight fast moving Night users. Even if the Night disappears with the death of the head Drow woman, she'll still have a division's worth of sappers using goblin munition. That's not anything to sneer at in the hands of a person like Juniper.

Ravin

though could you imagine running the drow though legion training?

Someguy

They are undisciplined idiots broken into stone-age primitives, organized military force they wont be for centuries. Cat needs a usable force to buy 3-or-more years to rebuild the Army of Callow; I'd suggest a variant of Bonfire as Cat uses the drow as the Wild Hunt's attack dogs targeting the heirs and other claimants of the various lords heavily invested into the 10th Crusade.

Having their momentum undercut as their heirs die and succession crisis bloom across three countries will make Malicia's game with Hasenbach during the Proceran Civil War look like a house party.

Ravin

she has those three years, at least from the crusaders dead king is attacking, remember?

Fern

Also worth remembering that bonfire is an incredibly last-ditch plan, and that according to Juniper Callow will have enough of an army to successfully defend herself by the end of the year. The drawbacks of bonfire remain the exact same, and Cat still wants peace at some point.

Xinci

Hmm why are they considered primitive? The Tenets of Sve currently have them in survival mode but their technology and power are not necessarily primitive especially since we don't know what kind of configurations their technology has or what means it gives. Obsidian is naturally formed into a formation of exquisite sharpness, depending on how it takes to magic this could have many effects when the fabric of reality is relative/a illusion. Similar things when it comes to leather and cloth, depends on their methodology and role. Course they will change over time due to environmental conditions (various cities change as they come into conflict, and will have even more change depending on Cats and Sves conflict and its aftermath.). Just seems a strange judgement to think of them as such when what most of what we see is but the purpose of forming individuals by one who doesn't appear to want them to be more than that (if only because of her learning from every action they do). Personally I wonder if Sve will disseminate the information gotten from the dwarves last actions, hell I wonder how well she can see through the current prisoners eyes, eyes and skin.

muffin

I still don't like Cat giving callowan territory to so many other races.

Immigrants from the south, orcs and goblins from North, and uncivilized drows from underground.

Fern

With the right incentives to stay and a spot of light social engineering, they wouldn't really be immigrants any more, would they? It's an idiotic ruler that turns away useful labor on the basis of something like "cultural purity," when there's so useful a service to extract from them.

Alex

Is Cat dooming Procer against the Dead King by denying them weapons? Obviously we don't want a new Proceran army raised to fight Callow, but can the current Proceran armies withstand the full might of the dead? Neshamah's had centuries to raise his numbers. Plus Cat herself can shred most heroes short of the Saint and Pilgrim, while we've seen dead Names that can take the Black Queen, Hierophant, and Diabolist all at once.

TeK

Yeah, but for this war, Heavens won't just use their hand, they'll put their fat arse on the scales.

Decius

Or they could end the war with Callow.

RanVor

That would be a reasonable thing to do, which is why I'm convinced they will not be inclined to do so.

Javvies

To be fair, I suspect that Hasenbach and her uncle would be inclined to limit their overt/military actions against Callow to fortifying the Proceran sides of the Vales and the Stairway, letting Callow and Praes fight each other, while they focus the majority of their attention to dealing with the Dead King and with Black.

Unfortunately for them and for reason, the actions of the Conclave will complicate matters for them.

On the other hand, they will have the argument that with or without the Dwarven deterrent, Callow is not really in a condition to go on the offensive against the Grand Alliance, and so can be safely lowered in priority relative to the actively invading Dead King.

Alternatively, Procer may not war with Callow, but Ashur and Levant may not be as dependent upon dwarven armaments as Procer is. Though they'd still be dependent on dwarven seige, which would rather complicate any efforts to breach Callowan border defenses.

Someguy

If they want metal weapons, Procer can go kill the undead with priests and loot them off the corpses.

Darkening

Y'know, I've gotta think the Dead King has some kind of answer for that. Not sure what, but I doubt his troops just die like flies in the face of some priests.

Decius

I bet his forces simply stay dead in the face of some priests.

Someguy

That's kind of the point. The more priests the Dead King harvests, the less bullshit between Juniper and the Proceran commanders.

Snowfire1224

So my thought is when Cat kills the Sve of the Night the Drow's reaction is going to be to follow Cat, causing her to have her drow army and the dwarves promised help. Unfortunately this series being what it is I doubt that will happen because it's too convenient for Cat's cause.

Antoninjohn

Cat now strikes at blow at the heart of Procer's war effort, money. War is expensive and suddenly Procer has a lack of cheap equipment

Snowfire1224

So the question is when the dwarves say weapons does that include the dwarven made seige engines or only things like swords? Because if that includes seige weapons that's going to be devastating for anyone who doesn't make their own, and from what I can remember only Praes and more recently Callow make their own.

Dainpdf

They most likely don't sell those (at least not the super cool ones), so the ban won't really affect that.

Darkening

They don't sell the lava catapults, but they definitely sell basic ballistae and catapults to people. I'm sure the kingdom's have enough experience/examples they can mock up some of their own given time, but I doubt they'll be quite as good as professional work since they've never really had to bother before now.

Panic

I admit I was a bit worried about how this Arc was going to go but I am pleasant surprised by this chapter. I would say this was the most enjoyable chapter to read since Akua riding Cats body.

Dainpdf

It has just occurred to me that Hierophant will be besides himself with jealousy if he learns Akua got to examine Drow *and* Dwarven magic. Plus another demigod, which is in his wheelhouse, dammit!

As for the deal, the negotiations confirm a lot of what I thought, though the size of this enterprise did lend Cat more negotiating power than I thought she had.

What most interested me, however, was the Herald's talk of Purpose and Burden. The idea that the two exist in balance seems to defy the idea of Good and Evil that exists elsewhere in Calernia – in fact, the Dwarves seem to care not one whit about them. Makes me wonder whether this Good and Evil thing is as local as the Fae, and whether it would be possible to slip that particular noose inspired on Dwarven culture.

RanVor

Burden = Name, Purpose = Role.

Morgenstern

I dunno. Purpose = Name and Burden = Role would seem more intuitive to me. =/

RanVor

Maybe, I don't think it's really that important.

Decius

The Purpose is what you do, the Role is who you are.

Because it's a different ontology than side/name, it doesn't have perfect parallels. For example, the Purpose of the Empress in the current story is pretty weak,

Dainpdf

It's a different way to put it, which points at different views. For example, they believe they can increase their Burden by fighting and so obtain a Purpose, which is not how Roles and Names work.

Xinci

Actually it doesn't when you think about it. Certain names have different scopes but because of the unpredictability of reality don't grow linearly into their role. It's why names don't unlock their aspects immediately and why the knight of the dawn was built as he was. If you think of providence as a search aid for who and what to burden at one time it actually shows just how transient destiny is as a concept at least til the "end" of the question that is the guides reality. Cats in a unique transient position due to the nature of her name her role is winter and her purpose is pretty much whatever she wishes. Her ability to add on a burden is tremendous, though with her I suppose the story is all that matters til she decides she wants a new one so intricate s herself into other values mutilating and furthering her role and her burden.

Dainpdf

Cat is not Named right now. She has enough power to play on their field, but she's not Named. She has no Aspects. Anyways, they don't have anything like Deed-Seekers in other cultures, or at least not that we've seen, and this points at that cultural difference.

Dwarves seem to think about Named in other terms than the rest of Calernia – much like how Procerans think in terms of Blessings and Damnation is different from the more narrative focused concept of heroic and villainous "Named".

Javvies

No, Cat's technically still the Squire, though there isn't much of it left, and she predominately uses her Fae/Winter powers.

At this point Cat's current iteration of the Name of Squire has basically been stripped down to the skeleton, between Cat's Winter/Fae-related escapades (and the associated consequences) and the broken transition to Black Queen.

Dainpdf

Pretty sure she lost the Name when she ripped off Masego's construction and let Winter mix with her soul.

RanVor

She didn't lose it. She "killed" it. The raw power of Winter overwhelmed her Name and ripped it to shreds. She still has those shreds lying somewhere on the metaphorical bottom of her soul. She does have a Name, it just doesn't function anymore. I don't think there is a precedent for that.

Dainpdf

Going by what the Dead King says, apparently so. But where did you get that she has pieces of her name? As I understood it, she has powers of her mantle that behave like her old third aspect, but that's mostly because the third aspect was related to her mantle.

Mike E.

Well then Hierophant shouldn't have taken off to take his Father and Papa to task for withholding things from him. He made his bed so gets to sleep in it 😊

Dainpdf

Doesn't mean he won't be envious.

muffin

What's new here is the notion that voluntarily increasing your burden is the path to increase your power. This goes against the destiny notion in Calernia.

Death Knight

The way I understand it is the Purpose is your Name and Burden is your Role. Black mentioned way back in book 1 that the closer a Named plays his Role in the story the more powerful he becomes at the cost of developing tunnel vision. You can either be overtly powerful and rigid or weak and fluid. A similar thing is evident in principle alienation: the more Cat uses Winter the more she slips into Stupid Evil.

So by adding to your burden it makes sense that you become more powerful and since all Stories have a predetermined outcome for all its characters, and playing closer to your Role gives you blinders you are in effect manifesting your destiny.

Unless you have a different concept of destiny.

Clmineith

Did they remember to include Archer's bow in the deal? Especially since Cat sworn...

Allafterme

Dwarfs may be magpie assholes but I don't think they'll reduce the fighting capabilities of our favourite murder of incompetent vandals, especially when they're going to kill a demigod for them and reduce their military expenses several dozen times over

muffin

Just mentioning the rule rightful owner of the bow will be enough.

As with any law, dwarven property rights only make sense if you have the power to enforce them.

NZPIEFACE

I wonder if Cat's core ability set has to do with Usurping.

The resurrection

*Take*

The shit with the Duke of Squalls

Aqua

The Crown

There's a few examples, but she's just been taking everything.

SpeckofStardust

"The King of Death has turned his eyes to the wars of the surface," the Herald said. "Yet we have seen this before. It never lasts. The dead will return to the depths soon enough."

You know this implies that the drawfs have been in a state of contestant if low end combat against the dead king for a long time. Meaning that the dead king's army hasn't been growing completely unchecked. On the other hand he's been matching the drawfs in fighting.

Jane

I know Cat can be flexible with the truth, but that is one heck a big lie...

(Joking, I know a typo when I see one.)

superkeaton

This was a fascinating chapter.

Xinci

Well good things to be seen here. The Dwarves echo back to the days of yore when heroes were more about going out and doing great deeds to change things. They accept purpose and burden necessary/inherent in that position but some do not. They echo some of the things said about those ruled by both Above and Below. The deedseekers recognize certain parts of their system as incorrect by their views seek to correct their purpose through changing the world and seek to do so by getting a increased role by taking it from others. They seek to rectify and correct what once went wrong or perhaps is becoming wrong? While those at large(or perhaps more centralized along their religion/living conditions, do what they need to do and work with their purpose. Its interesting how they try to get the most out of what they can get...similar to Goblins actually. I can see why Ranger would be worthy to them, even if her(somewhat speciically ambiguous) depth of purpose when doing so hasnt been shown. At least the echoes/waves of her actions when doing so. I would classify the dwarves as greedy compared to the others shown so far...though given the amount of duty they also show it could just be part of their self-perpetuating system(Deep keeps them stable along with the king, while seekers rectify and self-correct whats going wrong).

darkalter2000

Pact made, now let's see to it's delivery.

Yotz

//consciousness.stream.start

Know what I suddenly was reminded of?

Lexx.

E1S3, "Eating Pattern", in particular.

So. If it is true what was said, what was the reason? Was she found lacking? Impatient? Jealous? Or already beyond the boundaries of sanity? And if so, was it the fallout of the Ninth that served as a catalyst, or the seed of the deed was already there?

I wonder...

Well, we will wait then.

We'll wait, and – maybe – it will be revealed in due time..

//consciousness.stream.over

Kel the Seer

What if the Dwarven view of Purpose is similar to name Roles, while the Name itself is the Burden? Names empower, but also limit at the same time, as mentioned earlier, they can lead to tunnel vision if one is not careful. In which case, deed-seekers are atteting to act according to some Name until they gain or align closely enough with its Role to make it become true?

I am still waiting for Cat to be pressed into a corner where she takes the next step in accepting her current Role. Perhaps absorbing Night from Sve will be enough to make her dole it back out to avoid becoming lost to overwhelming power? Granting new Court titles to a group of Mighty would allow for an outlet of pressure and could cement a Name of sorts. All Hail Cat, Queen of Ice and Darkness?

Granted that is only if Akua doesn't use what appears to be a growing connection to Winter to hijack a good chunk of that power for herself instead. She has been doing an excellent job of steadily conditioning Cat to let her use that connection more and more.

aran

Good thing she's not Bellerophan, or they would be wiping her off the walls now.

burguulkodar

I really don't enjoy that Cat is not named all this while... will she ever be again?

BarthHumphries

Spoilers. I can neither confirm nor deny that she does or doesn't regain a Name.

I can say that this post was 10 months ago and that a lot has happened since. 😊

---

Chapter 61: Remonstrations

"Beware those who peddle sweet truths, for that which cleanses is rarely gentle."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

I tossed the bow and Indrani snatched it out of the air. She ran her hand down the length, checking it for damages, and only after she'd made certain it was in pristine condition did she turn her eyes to me.

"How much did it cost you?" she asked.

"Not a copper," I said. "Restitution was tacked onto to a larger bargain."

"We're going on a hunt, then," she smiled. "It was about damned time. We've been creeping around for too long."

I wasn't all that surprised she'd caught on to the nature of my pact with the dwarves without being briefed. I had precious little to offer the Kingdom Under save for the work of my blade. I'd sent Diabolist to gather our drow while attending to Indrani myself, though that situation felt like trouble brewing. Leaving the prisoners behind wasn't on the table: the dwarves might interrogate them before breaking their skulls and throwing them on the nearest corpse pile, neither part of which I wanted to come about. Taking them with us on the further journey was trouble too, though. They'd know I'd talked with the dwarves, and there was no guaranteed they wouldn't open their mouths whenever we ran into a drow powerful enough it could give me a challenge.

I was currently inclined to let them go after pulling ahead of the army by a day or two. They could live and die on their own merits, after that. Ivah was the only one I had plans for, though I was still hesitating over pulling that particular trigger.

My mistakes had larger consequences than they used to, and nowadays there was no one to clean up behind me.

The prisoners were awaiting us at the edge of the camp, Diabolist standing among their number while a few companies of dwarven regulars kept an eye on the proceedings. More out of principle than fear, I thought. The shackles had already been removed but still the drow looked uneasy, as if they expected the slaughter to begin any moment. The way some of the soldiers were very casually playing with their crossbows wasn't helping matters, and from the way grins split their beards the dwarves knew exactly what they were doing. I did not bother to offer our escorts any farewells before leaving. Goodbyes had already been traded with the two dwarves that mattered in the vanguard, and none of the other had done anything to deserve the courtesy. To the contrary, one might argue. Ivah had carefully remained close to me from the moment I arrived, and did not give distance until we'd left the large cavern. We went through another two dwarven chokepoints before finally leaving the territory they controlled, and only then did any of the drow let out a breath of relief.

We took our first break around an hour later, when they began to tire. Where before the prisoners had offered only fear, there was now a touch of reverence in their eyes – towards me, mostly, but Akua as well. From their point of view, we'd walked into the jaws of the wolf and gotten off without so much as a scratch to show for it. They might not know why, but they could not argue with the results. Our guide approached me while the others rested.

"You spoke truth, Queen," Ivah said, and smoothly knelt. "For the offence of doubting your word, I present myself for judgement."

I tore off a chunk of dried beef and popped it into my mouth, chewing as I considered the drow kneeling before me. Even on its knees, it was of a height with me sitting. Already I was missing the dwarves and their much more reasonable proportions. I could dismiss this out of hand, I thought. I'd often done this with my doubters in the past, especially when they had good reasons to doubt me. Those who had come into my service had done so after I'd proven myself, shown I could achieve results. This, though, this was different. I wasn't dealing with a human or an orc, not even a goblin. My grasp on drow culture was still weak, but I suspected that if I made it clear doubting me came without consequences then I was giving an open invitation to do so again. Akua had been just right enough I couldn't outright dismiss her, when she'd said it was worthless to offer people mercy when mercy had no worth in their eyes. I swallowed the last of the meat, then wiped my fingers on my legs. Measured response, I thought. My hand lashed out, swift as a snake, and the sharp tips of ice I'd formed at the end of the fingers raked across Ivah's right cheek. Four bloody clawmarks began dripping blood.

The drow did not flinch.

"A reminder," I said. "When the doubt next comes. You may consider the matter settled."

Ivah rose on shaky legs, and I dismissed it with a wave of the hand after telling it Diabolist would see to the marks. Indrani slid next to me barely a heartbeat later. She'd been pretty blatantly eavesdropping, though I'd seen no need to stop her. She pressed a skin into my hands, and I did not need to take a sniff to know it wasn't water. Her breath made that clear enough.

"So what's the plan?" Archer asked.

"We go to Holy Tvarigu," I said. "And have a pleasant chat with the Priestess of Night."

"Seems to me like we'll need to have a bunch of pleasant chats to get there in the first place," she mused.

"You and I are pleasantly chatty people, by reputation," I said.

"It'll be a load off my back for us to return to the basics," she admitted. "But you've got the look."

I glanced at her, finding her halfway between amused and annoyed.

"The look?"

"The one that says you're tripping all over your morals again," Indrani said. "It's led us to some beautiful scraps, mind you, but never before a long spot of hemming and hawing."

"What do you care?" I said.

She blinked in surprised and I passed a hand through my hair.

"I didn't mean it that way," I said. "But this isn't us, 'Drani. We don't have those talks. Did Hakram put you up to this?"

"Vivienne asked that I keep an eye out," she said. "On account of your last advisor around being 'Ol Portal Dazzle. Worries were had that if you got in a bad place our little friend would be eager to give you a push over the edge."

"I haven't talked to her about this," I said. "I don't intend to, either."

"So talk to me," Archer said. "I'm here, and mostly sober."

"Do you actually give a shit about any of this?" I bluntly asked. "I'm not saying this to be an ass to you. You never have before."

"I do give a shit about you, Catherine," she sighed. "Even when you're being an utter wench to me. You think I'm down here for the scenery?"

I bit my tongue. Taking out my mood on Indrani would be underserved, even if she was pushing me and she damn well knew it.

"Why are you down here?" I finally asked.

"Because that's where we went," she slowly replied, eyeing me dubiously. "How hard was the stuff the dwarves gave you?"

So that was how she wanted to play it, huh. Dumb. Usually I'd leave it at that, play it off with a quip or an insult. It was the way we worked, leaving things unspoken. But Gods, I was tiring of that. Of just... letting things go.

"You take orders from me, sometimes," I said. "But I've never considered you my subordinate. If you'd chosen to go back to Callow with the others, there wasn't anything I could have done about it."

"Hells, Catherine," she sighed. "Do we really need to do this?"

"Don't we?" I said. "Indrani, there's maybe ten people in all of Creation I can genuinely call my friends and I can barely claim to understand half of them. I keep leading you into one ugly mess after another, and for some of you I understand. Vivienne's in this for the kingdom, and Hakram... Hakram believes. In this, whatever it's become, even when I don't. I'm not trying to throw stones at you, Archer. There's just some days where I honestly wonder why you bother."

"It's not enough that you're my friends?" she asked.

"If that's your answer," I said, "and I mean your real answer – not us laughing this off and never mentioning it again – I'll take it. But I don't want either of us to survive the other and look back in twenty years regretting we were too proud to actually have an honest talk."

Her eyes narrowed.

"So, Ratface finally sunk in," she said, not unkindly. "Was worried it might happen. You took it too well when we learned."

I flinched.

"Cat, he-"

"I used him," I said, with terrible calm. "He was my friend, and I used him until it got him killed. It's... Fuck, Indrani. He still had so much left to do. Who does she take next, Aisha? Juniper?"

How many people do I need to lose before I'm just a raving monster who just happens to lack a Tower to rave from? The utter selfishness of that thought shamed me. They'd killed him and still I'd somehow made it all about me.

"We're not going to die that easily," Indrani said.

"We're not invincible, Archer," I hissed. "We just got savagely beaten by a dead elf and a giant rat, and those were the toys of what's waiting. All we got to show for it was Malicia taking home a victory once more, and fresh off that she took the knife to Ratface. We're in this mess and I can't protect any of you. You have to-"

"Have a reason we're here," she finished quietly. "Something worth the risks."

"You'd be fine without me," I tiredly said. "Maybe even better off. I'm a fool for saying that, because I need you more than I can put into words, but it's the damned truth. You can leave this at any time and none of my enemies will follow. And let's not pretend they're not my enemies, Indrani. We both know they're not really yours."

"Sure they are," Indrani replied.

"The moment you leave back for Refuge, Malicia and the crusaders forget you ever existed," I said. "That's not arguable, that's a fact."

She flicked my forehead. I reared back, more in surprise than pain.

"That's the problem with you, Cat," she said. "You say these sweet things, sometimes, but you still can't quite get out of your head. Refuge's not my home, it's a place I lived in for a while. The Lady being there is the only reason it exists and the only reason I ever went. You have this... loyalty for Callow. I don't really get it, the place is war-torn shithole, but if it's a madness then most of your people have it too. I don't have that for Refuge, or really anyone in it. There's nothing to go back to."

"You could travel," I said. "That what you really want, isn't it?"

She laughed, harshly.

"Gods, I can't get angry," Indrani said. "It's infuriating but that's why it works – because you're such a fucking idiot it can't possibly be manipulation. You think I want to leave without somewhere to get back to, Catherine?"

"You could-"

"Shut up," Archer interrupted. "For once in your life, just shut up and listen. You're right when you say you don't understand us, because you somehow missed who you opened your home to. Do you know why Hunter was afraid of me, when I came to fetch him? Because I used to beat him in the yard. Bad enough he'd bruise for weeks even as a Named. Not because I hated him or because we had a grudge, but because seeing it happen put a twinkle in Lady Ranger's eye. I would have slit his godsdamned throat, if it had done the same. I fought everyone there was to fight in Refuge until I could crush them underfoot, and then I went out into the Waning Woods to find harder opponents. I don't need a cause. I don't need a reason. Every time I come out on top, I prove that I deserve this. That I'm not a fucking charity case, some curiosity she picked up in Mercantis along with whatever artefact took her fancy that year."

"I'm not her," I said.

"No," she replied. "You're not. I trounced your ass the first time we met just so I could prove I was better than the Black Knight's pupil and somehow that just... never became an issue. I thought you were some kind weakling, at first, too afraid for revenge or a rematch. But then you picked a fight with a demon and its minions, not because you thought you could win but because you wouldn't accept losing."

"That's not a virtue," I said. "And that kind of thinking has gotten a lot of people killed."

"You keep your eye on the horizon, always have," she said. "Makes it that you always end up missing what you actually do. You opened your home to me. Your family. Shit, Cat, we might make fun of you but there's no one that doubts you'd murder your way through a kingdom for one of us. And you just handed that freely, asking nothing. Not even an oath. And now you're surprised we're willing to kill for it?"

"That's not what I meant to do," I quietly said.

"It wouldn't work if it was," she smiled mirthlessly. "It's like you don't realize who it is you took in. You think Masego asks himself whether people should be killed because he cares about Callowan justice? You found a kid who couldn't talk to others without a chart and you told him he wasn't mad or strange, that he was right and clever and worth something beyond his magic. Vivienne was so desperate to do something that mattered she joined a rebellion of people she didn't like or trust in a place where those have the life expectancy of a fly. She fought you, stole from you, and instead of slitting her throat you gave her your trust and told her what she wanted to hear the most: that she's a decent person and that she can make a difference. Hakram used to wonder why he even got up in the morning, Catherine. He was barely even a person. Now he's got such searing purpose his own Name made it that he doesn't need to sleep."

"That was all them," I thought. "I didn't change anything. I'm not owed-"

"You try to be good," Indrani said. "Or at least decent. So you've got this idea that all of us were, before you came along. That you dirty us by making us fight, that you're somehow imposing on who we'd be otherwise. Set that aside, because it only ever existed in your head. You took in wild animals, fed them and gave them a place by the fire. Loved them, in your own terrible way."

Shadowed eyes met mine, the glint in them a savage thing.

"None of us forgot the years out in the wilds, Catherine," she said, baring her teeth. "It was cold and dark and lonely, and if we have to make a graveyard of half this fucking continent to never go there again then that's what we'll do."

I did not reply, because after that what could I possibly say? Archer snatched the skin back from me and rose to her feet.

"Gods," she grimaced. "I can't believe you made me do that. Where's Hakram when you need him?"

"Indrani," I said. "I-"

"Don't," she curtly said. "I have no idea what you're wrestling with, right now, but I'll say this: you've been running scared since Second Liesse. We've all seen how it stayed with you, but grieving is one thing and this is another. If you let it bury you, then you've failed those people twice instead of once."

"What are you saying?" I asked.

"An occasionally halfway-clever woman once told me she didn't win battles because she was the Squire," Indrani said. "Or because she had tricks and fancy mantle. You're afraid of what's coming? Then do what you need to and stand with your back straight. Let them take a swing. See where it gets them."

She strode away without another word, already guzzling away at the skin as if liquor could wash away the embarrassment reddening her cheeks. I stayed there sitting in silence for who knows how long, never taking a breath. It had warmed me, what she'd told me. But it terrified me as well, and not only because of her own words. Your people becoming warped by your presence, the Grey Pilgrim had said, old traits grown more vicious and acute. I wanted to deny him, as or all his kindly appearance he was a man very much trying to kill me.

And yet.

Archer believed all the hard edges in my companions had been there long before they came across me. That it was circumstance making them come out, not some deeper sinister influence. She might be right. Was is not, in a way, supremely arrogant to decide I was responsible for who they were and what they were willing to do? Masego had been raised by a villain and and a devil, Archer by cold-eyed thrill killer and Hakram was an orc – his people's bouts of savagery filled the pages of history books. Vivienne had been the Thief before ever hearing I existed, and had walked that narrow line between Good and Evil for most her life. Her stolen riches had never gone to feed orphans or the destitute: she'd been settling a grudge. A deeply Callowan thing to do, but if nothing else the last few years had brought out in sharp relief that my people's penchant for vengeance was not necessarily a thing of the Heavens.

The old voice in the back of my head gave answer soon enough. It would be easy, wouldn't it, to eschew responsibility for all of this? To let the comforting words wash over me, to share the burden of all the woe that had come to pass. But I'd seen it with my own eyes, decent men arguing for Bonfire. A little word that meant that slaughter of thousands of innocents simply to prevent Procer from sallying out against me. The excuses came swift and plentiful, that withholding that assault had led to the Battle of the Camps and the deaths of thousand anyway. That it was my enemies who had sought the war, not I. Justifications always came aplenty. I still felt a shiver of discomfort, when I realized at some point I'd become the kind of woman that would sow justifications matter only to the just on her own banner. What a vicious joke that'd turned out to be: even while espousing the words, had I ever really stopped telling myself what I was doing was necessary? I'd clutched that whisper tight and led my soldiers, my people, into one war after another.

The Queen of Summer had called us a woe unto all we would behold, and I felt that to be the most savage kind of prophecy: the one that called not on unearthly sight but simple recognition of character. Who was I, to take such grand decisions? Not even twenty-one, taught too little and haunted by grave mistakes. What right did I have to make decrees that might resound for centuries after my death? The fear was paralyzing, that I might botch the matter badly enough a dozen generations might pay for it. I was a drunkard playing dice with the fight of nations, compared to my enemies. I'd be damned for the disaster, and rightly. And yet, I thought with a dark smile, would I not also be damned for doing nothing at all? Maybe Black was right and I'd never been meant for grace at all, for the righteous choices of a hero's story. Maybe I'd always been who I'd told myself I had become, a deeper truth laid bare by power. Because in the end, if there was only damnation I would rather be damned out of error than fear.

And that left only one thing to do, didn't it?

I found Ivah standing along, the red marks of the blood I'd spilled dried on its cheek. It rose when I approached, but I waved that away. We settled down comfortably, out of anyone's earshot.

"It is my understanding," I said, "that you seek power. To redress what was done to you, to rise above where you once stood."

"That is so, Queen," Ivah said, silver bright in its eyes.

"Then I believe," I said, "it might be time for us to make deal."

Winter whispered in my ear, promises and imprecations, the distant howl of blizzard parted by the deep crack of great glaciers.

I let it.

---

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!!!
it's fun!

Jane

It is still National Voter Registration Day in many time zones...

mavant

Heh. Go vote, lest we get the oompa loompa again.

DroughtBringer

I am going to add to this. First post was a little late, but I feel like this is important.

The Guide has beautiful moments like this chapter here that are stunning. Please go vote, share the Guide on social media, tell all your friends to read it.

This is a work of art that is few and far between. it is said that anyone can write a book, which is almost true, but so few people are able to actually finish their book, and, if they do, there are many books that are not good – not necessarily bad, mind you- but lack the moments like this one, where dialogue is what you look forward to more than the combat, where Characters actively reflect on themselves, and try to improve. This work is beautiful, and Erratic writes at an astonishing pace. Get the word out, if you have a few dollars to spare a month then go support Erratic on Patreon (<https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>), he deserves the money.

And if you made it to the end of this text block... Thanks for reading it all! Go vote!

Yotz

James, Mostly Harmless

Guide is at the top in the weekly and monthly tallies, but Ward is ~1100 votes ahead in the yearly tally. Keep voting!

Someguy

“Beware those who peddle sweet truths, for that which cleanses is rarely gentle.”

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

What about bitter/harsh truths?

onedollargum

Most people aren't predisposed to gobble down bitter things =)

Aeon

Oh, I like this a lot. That chat with Archer was amazing. Cat's finally going to get past all the guilt and fear. And it's going to be glorious.

Rook

Not to mention, if what Archer said is the truth then there's a terrifying prospect here. Cat might've accidentally done what Dread Emperor Malignant II tried and failed to do.

She's got a Band of Villains running off the power of Friendship.

That's usually a Good-aligned storypower on the level of Justice and Selfless Sacrifices, as far as cheats go.

wirelessgrapes

Cat's fuckin Ponyboy

Yotz

I believe, technically correct term would be “pegasister”.

mavant

That is a delightful pun, but I think we’re talking about The Outsiders, not MLP.

sheer_falacy

The Calamities are already running off the power of friendship. I guess we don’t know about Assassin but Warlock, Ranger, and Captain (rip) are all straight up doing what they do because of Black. They don’t care about Praes, they don’t care about Malicia, they don’t even care about Black’s grand plans – they just follow him. The Woe really do mirror them.

Jesse Coombs

The most recent Warlock POV (that I recall at least, Chapter “Sing-we-of-rage” was pretty clear that he does like Malicia, considers her a friend. He was even going to side with her against Black should it come to it.

Euodiachloris

Warlock is actually torn. He honestly cares very deeply for both his old friends. But, he would take Praesi ideals, practices and mores over most other considerations every day of the week without blinking.

And, he holds to the ideal of the Tower as a concept well above friendship. What Amadeus proposes could well shatter the Tower as it has always functioned for Praes – tweaking and updating power structures using all the tools in the box has always been fine, but destroying what he considers Praes to be in doing so... is not. 😞

Death

Where does it say Dread Emperor Malignant II tried to do that?

Rook

Flavor text two chapters ago

James, Mostly Harmless

““Note: bottling up the power of friendship cannot be achieved by bottling up friends. Must pursue further trials, perhaps prior liquefaction diluted the substance.” – Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II”

ArkCthuul

Ducking yeah, she did it!

And finally, both partially getting behind the truly vile thought of everything being her fault AND testing her Winter Court Creation Powers.

Lovely chapter.

Thaumaturge

yessss, oh god yes.

those last few paragraphs gave me actual shivers.

DroughtBringer

More than just the last few sent chills down my spine, almost the entire chapter.

Someguy

That may be because god = Cat (Winter)

Javvies

While Archer is right – and it is a good look at why people believe in and follow Cat.

I'm somewhat concerned about that ending.

Novice

Winter is coming, boys and girls. On that note, does this mean that there's a chance for Summer to resurface? Since Winter and Summer was supposed to be different sides of the same coin; and what Winter does, Summer has no choice but to do as well.

I genuinely can't wait for the fallout.

mavant

If so, wouldn't that imply that there is already a sole remaining summer fae somewhere?

crysjal

There is in fact one Half Fae with red hair and capacity for fire spells out there who we haven't seen in a while..

Anon

Oh $#!/, you're right.

Letouriste

She also wanted to become full-fledged far too 😬 damn, how I managed to not see that until now...

Letouriste

fae*

filtern

And what happened with the previous rulers of Summer and Winter? That's right. They got married. Stories like to repeat themselves 😋

Jon Snow

Winter is coming

Raved Thrad

I'm tempted to say that you know nothing, but that would be patently untrue, despite your name. 😊

ArkhCthuul

Lol.... ^^

DroughtBringer

"It wouldn't work if it was," she smiled mirthlessly. "It's like you don't realize who it is you took in. You think Masego asks himself whether people should be killed because he cares about Callowan justice? You found a kid who couldn't talk to others without a chart and you told him he wasn't mad or strange, that he was right and clever and worth something beyond his magic. Vivienne was so desperate to do something that mattered she joined a rebellion of people she didn't like or trust in a place where those have the life expectancy of a fly. She fought you, stole from you, and instead of slitting her throat you gave her your trust and told her what she wanted to hear the most: that she's a decent person and that she can make a difference. Hakram used to wonder why he even got up in the morning, Catherine. He was barely even a person. Now he's got such searing purpose his own Name made it that he doesn't need to sleep." most: that she's a decent person and that she can make a difference. Hakram used to wonder why he even got up in the morning, Catherine. He was barely even a person. Now he's got such searing purpose his own Name made it that he doesn't need to sleep."

If I quote quote it all I would...

"It is my understanding," I said, "that you seek power. To redress what was done to you, to rise above where you once stood."

"That is so, Queen," Ivah said, silver bright in its eyes.

"Then I believe," I said, "it might be time for us to make deal."

Winter whispered in my ear, promises and imprecations, the distant howl of blizzard parted by the deep crack of great glaciers.

I let it."

One more step towards Apotheosis, one more step towards the True Mantle of Winter, one more step that you can never take back. This was an amazing chapter, easily one of the best in the Guide. It reminds me of the Akua chapter a bit back, but so much more. Archer actually matters to Cat. Her opinion was not manipulation, but something that Cat needed to hear.

And Cat's 'Justifications only matter to the Just' is either about to die, or about to becoming something more.

When the Heavens come a knocking, Cat will need something to rally herself behind, if not Justifications, then what? She is on uneven footing, pushed there by Pilgrim, and when, not if for it will happen soon, the Heavens come if she is not on better footing the Redemption will come.

IDKWhoitis

I feel like something counter-Justice, because Hanno is going to have a field day when he hears it. He is firmly established to be Cats Big Hero to kill.

DroughtBringer

Is he still, though?

Black has received a new reign on life that messed that story up. When Cat stabbed Black, it was supposed to be a death blow, supposed to send Cat into being the next Black Knight, yet she refused. She is hardly the Squire, and is not set up in opposition to Cat at the moment. If Black dies then I could see that happening, but I am much more inclined to believe that the White Knight will be Black's kill rather than Cat's.

Black is out for vengeance of a friend, a powerful story, whereas Cat has still yet to react to Hanno at all.

And, personally, I want to see Amadeus kill Hanno for what he and his band did to Captain, it would not be the same coming from Cat.

IDKWhoitis

True on the Captain part. But it's hardly Black or Cat's call to make. Black tried to force one earlier on and nothing connected. The Angel's may have *enlightened* plans for Hanno.

Unless we count the Seige where Cap died as a definite Loss (the bard called it one), the Red Flower Vales as a Tie, and a 3rd engagement will be Blacks unrelenting vengeance (man wont that be something to see).

Percula1869

They had an engagement before all that though. The one where Warlock was pretending to be in a bubble in the sky and Cap was fighting both Ash and Champion. So their pattern of three should be closed, anything can happen next time.

DroughtBringer

Their first engagement Black specifically states that he did not feel a Pattern of Three forming, and I do not believe that there will be one between them, just a good old fashioned slugging fest.

Darkening

People really get a bit too worked up over the whole pattern of three thing, it doesn't happen every single time a pair of Named get in a fight :/.

Yotz

Simple BNxWN solution would be rather ungratifying, methinks. I'd much prefer the option where Captains killer – courtesy of certain ritual involving two strongest spellweavers of their generations – inherits the Curse through the skin she is wearing and in crucial moment of Black and Hanno's inevitable duel transforms to deliver a crippling backstab to the White Knight.

But then again, variant where after her transformation White outfights her and is forced to kill one of his few friends seems perfectly fine too..

IDKWhoitis

I think the Curse is bloodline related, some thing about a ritual not having escapements.

Yotz

Sympathetic link is a pretty straightforward and simple thing, and blood is blood. Valiant definitely bled on the battlefield, and if one can link weave of Creation with that of Arcadia, can't see the reason behind not being able to link blood with blood – especially blood of killer with blood of killed in the case of hunter wearing the skin of her prey. They can be seen very much like soul-sisters from different sides – a Story in itself – and now they are linked with blood rite of greatest intimacy, old as Creation itself. Now, if one to tilt the scales slightly, and make them related not only metaphorically, but metaphysically...

Death Knight

I agree. The Valiant Champion too while they're at it.

grzecho2222

Champion killed The Old Warrior That Rised Her Children To Be Noncombatants

What chance there is that one of them pop up with "You killed my mother, prepare to die"

tmeenaks

Black is dead. The moment the Calamities were formed, Black's life was tied to them. Their his lieutenants of dread. The legend they've built up as invincible means that all of that is just backstory until the one chosen hero takes them out. The same with the dead king. All their successes are backstory to enrich the hero's feats. Black had a couple years to live and captain died to the hands of one of the five members of the hero's band. The muscle of the calamities was taken out by the young muscle of the hero's band. With Cat setting herself up to be the new big bad of the story, the old guard will prove to be too weak to stand against the new and will be the crucible the heroes forge themselves in before facing the Woe. Atleast, that's what the story looks like to me

IDKWhoitis

And so the Devil sings her song again.

It's nice to have you back Cat.

usernamesbco

Please let it stick this time. I loved the dialogue with Archer, but so many similar moments have been set aside to allow Cat to lapse back into wangst again.

The self flagellation over things out of her control is getting old. What happened to the girl who flipped off contrition?

morroian

Yet this chapter made clear this latest bout was driven by Ratface's death which is reasonable.

sengachi

Oh fuck. Oh *fuck* is Catherine crafting the drow into her winter court?

IDKWhoitis

Maybe not particularly powerful nobles, but new footsoldiers like Deadwood regiments.

Or the complete opposite, and get the current Hunt killed off so Cat can lead a new Winter aristocracy where she is the only meta-story aware.

Rook

Also Catherine is a physically offensive ice/dark type

If she attacks with drow it's a physical STAB move since drow are also dark type

It makes perfect sense

IDKWhoitis

A Winter that is both good at scheming AND at war? Well shit.

aran

I don't know the meaning of the word "STAB" in this context...

OmniQ

I'm more than a little late in replying here, but...

It's a term from Pokemon, an acronym for Same Type Attack Bonus. A fire-type pokemon using a fireball attack will do more damage than a non-fire pokemon will, even if all of their other stats are identical.

Jane

Hm. It wouldn't be the worst idea in the world – it would give her a claim on a vessel of an alien power that she doesn't wish to directly touch, whom she could proceed to pour more Night into at will. I wouldn't trust that leash too far, but she's powerful enough that she doesn't need much of a leash on it.

Of course, there are risks to bringing Winter into the world, but... It's a Drow. Unlike any of her own people, she's much more free to dispose of them when they become inconvenient to her, regardless of what form that inconvenience takes.

Thea

Let's face it: the drow could never stay underground, there's nothing Cat can do against the dwarves, and the drow immigrating into Callow would be more than one giant disaster waiting to happen. But hey, Cat has this useful parallel realm of eternal darkness waiting for new inhabitants...

Agent J

Why do people keep forgetting that there's already a King and Queen of Arcadia and that Cat can only use the fae gates because she made a deal with said Queen of Arcadia to allow her and her army to travel through the other queen's domain unmolested?

Catherine does not in fact have a parallel realm of eternal darkness awaiting new inhabitants.

Euodiachloris

She has got a domain. That doesn't mean it's in Arcadia. Dunno where it is, but... it's a very dark somewhere whenever she needs it. *shrugs*

NZPIEFACE

The domain is an extension of her own existence.

Euodiachloris

That was my point, yes. *confused* It is both a location and a facet of her Mantle, i.e. part of her. Ergo, it is also of Arcadia, but also not.

The fae are walking patterns and constructs. So is the dimension they come from. Cat is fae (even though she's stubbornly sticking to old patterns).

NZPIEFACE

No, it's not a location. It's literally an extension of her soul. Her domain is a part of her soul.

Euodiachloris

Which, when you think about it, must be something somewhere connected to her mind, identify, memory and what passes for her body these days, yes? So, it can be a location in time-space, a link to Arcadia and itself all at the same time.

A damense or a domain is always more than spacial coordinates on a map.

TeK

Thatbwas amazing. Just awesome. Tippin' my fedora off.

Yotz

M'errata.

Jane

She might have a bit of an argument about the citizens of Callow being warped by a Villainous leader (though I have my doubts, given their legendary grudges and longstanding history with Procer), but the Woe?... Yeah, no. I'm not even certain how she got the idea in her head that any of them would have been decent people in her absence. She really needed Indrani to point that out to her?

Still, I'm glad that she and Indrani had a proper heart-to-heart. Even if Indrani found it terribly embarrassing, it was something Cat needed to hear – that fighting for her adopted family was cause enough for her, and not some sort of obligation.

Someguy

I still think Pilgrim did to Cat what she did to Willy that's shaking her so.

Jane

Eh, it's a lot easier to believe that she's still scarred from Liesse, as Indrani suggested, than that this was some Narrative business. She was showing clear signs of questioning and doubt ever since that day; Pilgrim might have provided a more specific channel for some of them, but if he'd never met her, I think she'd probably just be doubling down on the "Am I competent enough to be making these kinds of decisions?" angle.

I mean, I can't dismiss the possibility out of hand until the Guide is over? But I think using both would be muddying the character arc too much – if Pilgrim were to do more than take advantage of doubts that were already there, I think it would cheapen her struggle over her decisions somewhat.

Rook

I feel like the whole moral indecision part has been part of the story from the start. She's always been about the whole born a Hero, raised a Villain theme, to put it simply.

When she signed on with Black and the legions to start, it was to try doing Good from the inside.

Few years later she's learned from and been half-raised by the biggest baddie of the century and she's using all her new nasty tricks to... defend civilians against the forces of literal hell.

She then, in her fear-inducing villainous competency, fights a civil war to defend civilians against murderous faeries and collar ghost

Few years after that she's developed into even more of a monster, this time committing the atrocity of fighting a defensive war to protect her homeland.

I mean, there's a pattern here. Bad means with good intentions, is it really that surprising that a major point of character growth is trying to reconcile the two?

mavant

She's arguably more of a hero than the Punisher is, at least.

Jury's out on the comparison with Deadpool (our other favorite immortal regenerating bisexual walking disaster).

Raved Thrad

Not to be a niggler, but wouldn't it be more accurate to call Deadpool a pansexual? I've always felt that, if it gets right down to it, Deadpool will fuck anything.

Letouriste

Get that picture out of my head!

Raved Thrad

"Oh, look, a cheese grater!" *soft music starts playing in the background*

Maginot

I read the story chapters, which are F*ing amazing. Then I read the comments which are F*ing amazing in a whole different way. Just make sure its Barry Manilow....

Yotz

Well, in some way Pilgrim's "taking advantage" may look juts so – accenting things, forcing Cat to look at them in the new context, stealing her box of failures and shames and hitting her with it until they will be forged into the blade of doubts...

Anything beyond using what she already have will make the act of redemption into an act of simple brainwashing. An while Above is not above imposing braindeath when it suits them, I am still willing to give Peregrine moral credit on not using such blunt instruments.

PS: Also, I'm secretly hoping he and the Cutter will show up. Hunt for the mark of Sve Noc's caliber is a thing for a full Five of heroes, you know...

Pipiemman

So are we to presume that Cat as started forming her own Court?

Yotz

<__>

...

Queen of Knaves and Woes?

mavant

Why, doesn't Air and Darkness work fine?

mavant

I guess she doesn't have Air much.

Queen of Alcohol and Darkness?

Milpool

Queen of Booze and Blackouts

Raved Thrad

In another world, I can see Andais of the Unseelie going, "I may be nuts, but I'm not that nuts."

mavant

Oh, I haven't read the Laurell Hamilton books – I was thinking of The Faerie Queen.

Komploding

On top of saving her kingdom, is Cat about to raise up Drow kind from the pit filled with used razors they've turned themselves into? HYPE

stevenneiman

Oh boy. Now we get to see what Cat can do with an army of titled fey who are also armed with Night. This is gonna be good. but certainly not Good.

FactualInsanity

I really liked the chat with Archer, but I really wish Cat would grow out of this kind of self doubt. It's good for a character, important even, to question their actions and always seek to do better next time, but there's a big difference between questioning your actions and questioning your whole being. To put it bluntly, I'm bored of Cat doing the latter. It does nothing except leave her more vulnerable to manipulations by her enemies.

And I really, really, really hope the story is not building to some kind of point validating those doubts. It's just my personal opinion, but that would feel like an utter betrayal.

Oshi

I don't want her to grow out of it. It would mark the loss of something integral to her. You stop doubting and you stop fearing loss. It would mean she didn't care. I'd rather see her hone that doubt and grow more adept at dealing with it.

FactualInsanity

Perchance you didn't understand me, or I didn't explain properly, because I'm not proposing she stop caring. As I said, questioning actions is fine. Doubting if having made that decision there was better than an alternative is fine.

What I want her to grow out of is the self doubt that causes questions like "Who was I, to take such grand decisions? ... What right did I have to make decrees that might resound for centuries after my death?"

That doesn't mean she should suddenly start thinking she's the perfect woman for the job of ruling, nor that her every decision is flawless. But recognizing that she has as much right to make those decisions, as Cordelia; that she actually is the woman best equipped to rule Callow *currently*; that everything happening is not solely her fault, but the culmination of decades of actions, decisions and mulishness, of which only a tiny fraction are her own would be a welcomed change of pace.

Bruno Benaković

Dunno, seems like a valid doubt to me.

So long as you look around, you'll see countless people better than you at something. And if you're on the path of changing something grand, it's seems perfectly justifiable to doubt whether someone else might be better for the job, especially if you've made a giant mistake, like Catherine feels she has.

And there really isn't an answer to those doubts, no one can tell you objectively whether you're the one for the job or not, we all have some stake in it.

How do you stop this niggling feeling then that you don't really have any right to influence so many people's lives? I'd say you can't. It comes with the responsibility you carry.

The best you can do is decide that leaving things as is is worse than you leading them toward something. Hoping it will stick long enough.

I get that it's tiring to hear her self-doubt recently, especially when we've loved her during her most confident moments, but I like this new side of her as well.

Cause confidence comes when you know too little and when you know too much. And in-between those two is doubt, insecurity and cautiousness. I'd say that is where Catherine is now and where we all are when we go from twenties to thirties.

RanVor

Cat is asking herself the wrong question. Instead of asking "what right do I have to make this decision?" she should ask "what right does anybody else have to make this decision?". Because nobody really does. Yet somebody has to. And in absence of other candidates, it might as well be Catherine Foundling.

FactualInsanity

Very much this. It's not so much about literally not doubting herself, as it is about stopping to hold herself to some form of lower station than all the other bastards that make decisions that will resound for decades after their deaths and are affecting hundreds of thousands of people.

I can't think of any decision Cat has made that has not had the best interest of those under her rule as a goal. Many (admittedly minor) characters on the so called "good side" have, in-story, made decisions that have no one but their own best interest as a goal.

FactualInsanity

I recognize that and it's a valid point, but on the other hand what does wallowing in the doubt achieve? So you make a mistake and admit someone is superior to you. Get them on board. Either offload the responsibility on them outright, or if that's unacceptable for whatever reason, make them your advisor, so that you can do better next time.

If you can't get the best person for the job, try for the second best, the third best, try everyone, until the only people you haven't tried are those worse than you. If it comes to that, well, grit your teeth and keep doing your best, because no one else wants to do it.

Caution, learning from past mistakes, possessing enough self-awareness to account for one's own blind spots, yes to all of that. More of it, even. But developing a weird inferiority complex about herself to the point where she dismisses her own actions of friendship and affectation as calculated manipulations of her friends? I don't know, I just have no interest in that kind of story. Could be other people might find it an interesting exploration of the psyche.

Bruno Benaković

Well, we may have some answers to what troubles her as our comments would indicate, but that's probably due to our experience.

Cat has none of that, she never really had a period of doubting herself, at least not for many chapters like now. I feel it is a process she must go through and work it out herself.

I think it's very human to do so as is to eventually conquer that doubt and move on.

We get enough superhuman protagonists nowadays, I'm just enjoying the fact Cat, despite her badassery and being fae still possesses basic human elements, those we can relate to.

mavant

In fairness, she is twenty. Do you remember what it was like then? The constant melodrama?

Antoninjohn

I don't think she was talking about giving out Winter though it could work but giving Ivah the Night from Siv after they kill her in return for his loyalty (enforced by Fea oaths)

Oshi

I agree. This is likely to be the thing she does. What's interesting is in how she plans to shape drow culture in the process. She is the ultimate incarnation of practical evil and the drow are very much not.

WuseMajor

I feel like it might be worth noting that she started becoming more indecisive at the same time she stopped being the Squire. She is now one of the few personally powerful people in this world who isn't drawing power from either the Heavens or the Hells.

Cat isn't a Named Villain anymore.

She might well have her free will back. And with that comes a loss of certainty.

Metalshop

Ooh, good catch. I hadn't made that connection before.

Nihilant

suggested spelling/grammar corrections:

She blinked in surprised and I passed – She blinked in surprise and I passed the place is war-torn shithole, – the place is a war-torn shithole,

I wanted to deny him, as for all his kindly – I wanted to deny him, as for all his kindly raised by a villain and a devil – raised by a villain and a devil

Archer by cold-eyed thrill killer and – Archer by a cold-eyed thrill killer and

Novice

Fuckin' finally, this is what I've been waiting for: for Cat to recognize, if not address, her own hypocrisies. Her character development is now free to go to the direction it needs to be.

That talk with Archer is one of the many things that made me stay and keep up with the updates. So good!

Novice

Since I can't edit my comment, just pretend that my last paragraph is in the present tense.

1queenofblades1

>"What right did I have to make decrees that might resound for centuries after my death?"

Because you can't die? Of old age at least and I'm sure you don't plan to be killed in battle.

1queenofblades1

You can't make decrees that will resound centuries after your death if you don't die 😊

Raved Thrad

It just occurred to me that, as a band of Villains, short of dying in some messy manner, the Woe will never grow old. It's entirely possible that in a handful of years or decades, Cat having abdicated the throne, they could be wandering the world, seeing the sights, meeting interesting people, and killing them.

RanVor

The legit best chapter in the book.

mavant

I liked this chapter a lot, but every time I'm reminded of how young Cat is I think jeez, no wonder she's whiny.

Maybe this was the real mistake of my adolescence: Not declaring war often enough to justify the level of internal turmoil I was experiencing.

Snowfire1224

I think a lot of people forget how old she is, not suprising considering how much she has achieved. Most almost 21 year olds haven't learned to Speak rather quickly, learned how to flip a story, used undead suicide goats, fought with demons and devils, been undead, bullied an angel into a resurrection, ended a rebellion, fought the fae, gained a fae mantle, forever changed the court of Arcadia by marrying the winter king and summer queen, killed a rival and then put them into their cloak, become Queen of her country despite being born a poor orphan, commanded the wild hunt, fought off a larger army and forced them into a truce with two of the oldest greatest heroes actively working against her, met the Dead King and learned of his origins, fought an undead elf, fought an undead ratling, has gone into the gloom, and has negotiated with dwarves. If I missed anything in that list please let me know.

Big Brother

Pfft, maybe you haven't. I've spent 7 lifetimes doing just that.

Snowfire1224

Well I'm an almost 19 year old so I still have time to finish that list.

Yavandir

You forgot that she have to talk to Robber and Matrons of the tribes want to openly side with her against tower.

Author Unknown

Stop it, I'm getting misty.

Barthumphries

Typo thread – ok mobile so I skipped some

I wanted to deny him, as or all his kindly appearance he was a man very much trying to kill me.
Change or to for

Was is not, in a way, supremely arrogant to decide I was responsible Change is to either it or I

Masego had been raised by a villain and and a devil Remove second and

"Then I believe," I said, "it might be time for us to make deal."
Add "a" after "make"

jacobhollander

I'm seriously hoping she steals the Gloom from the Sve and just dumps it all over the Stairway and Red Flower Vales.

Argentorum

Narratively it'll only buy her a few weeks at best. Less if she uses it offensively. Still, with the drow forces and Juniper racing through a recruitment cycle, that might be all she needs.

Snowfire1224

I'm glad she recognized that her motto is "justifications only matter to the just" and yet she is constantly trying to justify herself.

superkeaton

Finally.

Komploding

Is anyone else seeing a parallel between Black reforming the legions of terror and Cat reforming the Drow? Being that it's a defunct horde of the old style of evil being reformed into 'practical' evil?

tyizor

Finally. I admit that I was more than a little tired of Cat's moralizing chapters. Bless Archer.

Draeysine

I see a lot of things coming together from previous chapters/books here. Just some things I've noticed.

Every time I see that self doubt in Cat, trying to decide if she is the best one to make decisions, I'm reminded of one of the dread emperor quotes. "Might makes" . I think that was Akua's argument. That because she held the power to make decisions, she was the person to make them.

I think that's a philosophy the drow more than the Praesi take to the extreme, going so far as to call anyone with enough power "the Mighty" and they of course hold all decisions.

When thinking of the drow I also think of a quote from my favorite character of RA Salvatore's Novels. A person was largely influenced by drow culture "With each kill I grow wiser, and with added wisdom I grew stronger "

I think the drow would take this quote as the whole life in a nutshell

Raved Thrad

In other fora I've joked about how I like yandere girls and how sexy it is not knowing if you'll wake up or die in your sleep, but dammit I think I just fell in love with Indrani. She may not be able to say the words without immediately drinking something flammable, but I love how she managed to express her love and loyalty to Catherine (and, by extension, the rest of the Woe and even Callow, just a little) without actually using those words – it makes the declaration even more powerful, the emotion rawer and more honest.

Metalshop

Welp, I legitimately teared up.

Damn fine chapter EE. The world building and plotting and action setpieces in this story are all very good on their own, but it's these occasional character moments that really elevate this serial to be truly great.

Dainpdf

Soldiers of Under rejoice
Swing, swing, swing with me
Raise the siege and raise your voice
Sing, sing, sing with me

Down and down into the deep
All is ours we find beneath
Diamond, rubies, gold, and more
Hidden in Calernia's store

Born underground
Suckled from a teat of stone
Raised in the (Ever)dark
The power of our buried home
Skin made of iron
Steel in our bones
We can take all we want for free
Come on brothers sing with me:

I am a dwarf and I'm killing some Drow
Killing, killing Drow
Killing, killing Drow
I am a dwarf and I'm killing some Drow
Killing, killing Drow
Killing some Drow.

A shortened version of the Yogscast song (slightly modified)

Yotz

Hmmm...

*Volley hits them like a storm,
That's been kept on leash too long – They're crying.*

Some days there's nothing left to learn,
From the point of no return –
They're dying.

Hey, hey – I killed a Drow today!
Everybody's happy now –
The vermin's gone away,
And everybody's happy now –
The Dwarves are here to stay!
We're here to stay!

There's a million pests to kill,
And I've already got the thrill –
I'm smiling.

Hey!..

Dainpdf

Having trouble fitting that into the rhythm of the original.
Still, very creative!

Fern

Y'know, I think this cast we have here is the most morally evil a cast can get while still being supremely empathetic and likable. The Woe (excepting our friendly sixth ranger) are all pretty much genuine whole hearted friends. Their whole found family thing (plus Black's found family) is like the most wholesome fucking thing in this book. It's like loyalty driven to its extreme: there's literally no line they wouldn't cross for each other. I 100% believe that if it took something as horrific as bonfire to save one of the woe, Catherine would do it. Hell, Catherine's really the only one out of these two bands that would even think of blinking at a cost like that.

Consider also the fact that for all the good tropes White Knight's band (plus the crusader band) stuck to, they have far less camaraderie than Cat and her fruity rumpus murderers. That's gotta have some story implications

plantsbeans

Gratuitous heart-to-heart works quite well for these characters.

Kel the Seer

Finally glad to see Cat considering using her claimed sovereign status to refill her nearly empty Court.

Now she just needs to beat Sve, temporarily rip out Sve's power, and shunt it to elevate her newest titled Fae. Maybe make a new House of the Court for Night wielders?

Still expecting Akua to siphon at least part of that for her own power and freedom, though.

aran

Just kiss already, you two.

Rup

Um...just realised..the comments contain more words than the chapters...and it is quite diverse..just making this remark to ask..does anyone try to remember particular phrases from the chapters to use somewhere themselves...sometimes i copy text from the ch. and paste it in a collection of sorts.
...among others the adj. 'searing purpose' was good.
Ok i will stop rambling.

burguulkodar

Awesome chapter.

FINALLY we see Cat getting a little over her guilty-ridden righteous self. Do not think. Just do.

SentientMango

I'm really enjoying Ivah's story. He was the first (and only?) one to surrender. And as a result, he's just climbing and climbing the power ladder.

I bet he'll join the Woe after this campaign too.

Zachary

In retrospect I wonder if a lot of the guilty navel-gazing Catherine does in this Book is due to being manipulated by Pilgrim towards a redemption story in the same way Lone Swordsman did (that lead to her reacting more strongly than she would normally have to the hanging of the rebels).

---

Interlude: Queen's Gambit, Offered

"Do I even need to give the order?"

– Dread Empress Massacre

"Mobility is how they have survived, Your Most Serene Highness," General Altraste said. "We have easily five times their number on the field, but divided and constantly forced to march in different directions. The moment the Legions are trapped we have won the battle."

The man's long and elaborate mustache moved distractingly as he spoke, though Cordelia forced herself to ignore it. Diego Altraste had duly embraced the Arlesite practice of turning his facial hair into a spectacle, keeping it waxed and curved with near-religious dedication. The First Prince had always thought the custom made men look like buffoons, though it would not be diplomatic to voice as much. Her court in Salia had scrupulously observed the latest fervours of southern nobility, as it would have been too easy to dismiss her as a barbarous Lycaonese otherwise. She herself rarely partook. A First Prince set fashion, they did not bow to it. Watching dainty Alamans ladies weave their hair into Rhenian war braids after she'd adopted the style for a few months had been a rare source of amusement in a year that had provided precious little of that.

"I am aware of the numbers, general," she replied. "And of how they have failed to lead to victories, no matter how oft repeated to me."

"I understand you are displeased by the fall of Lutes," the man delicately said.

Quite the understatement, that. Iserre's northern border was not a heavily armed one, as its ruling family's relations with Cantal had been more than cordial for decades. Their lines had intertwined so often it was a popular jest in Procer that to split the difference between the royalty of Cantal and Iserre one would need a very sharp knife. The Carrion's Lord descent into the Principality of Iserre had only one sharp obstacle, the old fortress-town of Lutes. A remnant of the days when ancient Arlesite tribes had pushed deep into Alamans territory, Lutes was a spit of rock with tall wall and taller towers. One that boasted fewer than ten thousand souls, but unlike most of Iserre the town had been garrisoned. Bandits had tried to take it more than once in the past, and so Prince Amadis had found it prudent to station troops there after the Great War. Disaffected fantassins were but a hungry day away from banditry, after all, and there'd been quite a few of them in Procer after Cordelia ascended the throne.

None of the First Prince's commanders had kept to the illusion that Lutes would hold indefinitely, but there had been an expectation that it would slow down Praesi advance into Iserre. Perhaps long enough for the Levantine reinforcing army to make shore southwards enough it would be able to reinforce the gathering forces in the capital of Iserre, preventing its loss to the Legions. Instead the town had fallen literally overnight. The Carrion Lord had struck bargain with bandits, who'd infiltrated the fortress and opened the gates to his forces after night fell in exchange for the lion's share of the loot. The defenders were caught unawares and half-asleep, bloody massacre ensued and when dawn rose the Legions of Terror were marching south once more. Worse, the fact that the Black Knight had kept to his terms with the bandits had spread across the entire region. The temptation of treachery would only deepen, and the Silver Letters were not responding near swiftly enough for her tastes.

"I know little of matters of war," Cordelia said. "Yet it occurs to me that with the fall of that fortress, we have effectively lost the northern half of the principality. They cannot occupy it, of course, but more importantly we cannot defend it. And now you come to me with a scheme that involves abandoning yet another city to the enemy."

That this conversation even needed to be had was infuriating. A mere sixteen thousand men had escaped the Red Flower Vales to wage war on the greatest nation of Calernia's surface and yet the last four months had brought only word of defeat after defeat. Exiled vagabonds were burning a swath through the heartlands of Procer, which was a disaster in too many ways to count. Cordelia knew better than anyone how fragile the Principate truly was, at the moment. The land had not yet truly recovered from two decades of civil war, though she'd had few other choice than to wage yet another conflict – it would have been near-impossible to rebuild if the mass of fantassins left from the Great War were still there to agitate. Cantal being made a ruin had been a heavy blow, and if Iserre was put to the torch as well would mean starvation in the south-east come winter. The bloody Praesi were burning every granary they couldn't carry, after all, years of accumulated grain going up into smoke.

The most aggravating part was, she thought, that she still had armies to field but that she could not send them after the Black Knight. Now that Catherine Foundling had made it clear the Dead King's assault was imminent and not months away, the host under Uncle Klaus had to hurry north at the expense of all else. The northern invasion force under Princess Malanza was already marching towards Cleves, but the woman had made it clear that the Callowan campaign had left the army a wreck. The Black Queen had apparently assassinated almost every professional officer in it, then butchered her way through a significant portion of the most reputable fantassin companies. Malanza had described her host as having more generals than lieutenants, and the First Prince did not need to be a seasoned veteran to understand the dangers of that. If Malanza held tall walls, she might weather the storm long enough for Uncle Klaus to arrive. If she did not make it to Cleves swiftly enough, the shores of the Tomb would fall and the Dead King would gain solid foothold in Procer.

The last significant Proceran force was guarding the border with the League of Free Cities, and it could not be moved. The political consequences of that would be dire enough – if Cordelia could no longer offer protection the Princess of Tenerife would seek another patron and further damage the First Prince's position in the Highest Assembly – but the strategic ones were worse. The League had yet to declare war, but it had mustered its armies. The moment the twenty thousand soldiers in Tenerife left the south became wide open to invasion. She'd attempted correspondence with the Hierarch to probe intentions and six months past the man had finally deigned to reply. Cordelia almost wished he hadn't. The missive had been three pages long, most of which castigating the notion of inherited rule as Wicked Tyranny, Procer itself as A Rapacious Pack Of Foreign Oligarchs and her suggestion of formal truce talks as Treason Against The Will Of The People. Which people in particular, she'd noted, he had not specified. He'd at least recognized her title of First Prince, as it was the result of an election.

The Tyrant of Helike had sent a secret missive along the other letter, swearing eternal friendship and making assurances that he'd increased the size of Helike's army twofold as a 'purely defensive measure'. He went on writing of his deep regrets for the recent civil war in the League, which he was apparently trying to cast himself as mournful of after single-handedly starting and winning. The First Prince had not known until then it was possible for someone's calligraphy to come across as blatantly insincere, but her horizons had since been expanded.

"Your Highness," General Altraste said, "may I be frank?"

"I expect all my officers to offer me truth, no matter how unpalatable," Cordelia replied, and meant it.

"If we try to defend the city with every force at our disposal, we may very well still lose it," he said. "And that defeat would be the end of Iserre. I will not pretend the plan I offer is pleasant to behold: it will require ugly sacrifice. But if we do not cut the rot before it spreads, it is not only Iserre we risk losing."

Cordelia did not answer. She looked out the windows instead, watched Salia below her. The tall bell towers of the many churches, the mansions and palaces of royalty. The people still filling every nook and cranny of the largest city on Calernia when autumn was painting leaves red and gold. She thought of a cold night in Rhenia, when she'd been seven and come across her mother drinking alone in the hall. Mother had still been half a goddess in her eyes, back then, implacable and undaunted. She'd asked her why she looked so sad. Sometimes survival is an ugly affair, my sweet, Mother had told her. It would be years until she learned that her mother had just ordered a pass collapsed and every village beyond it abandoned to the ratlings. Too many soldiers had gone to Hannover to aid in turning back the warbands come with spring thaw. Hundreds of Rhenians had been left to die to tooth and claw, abandoned in the cold. The thousands that would have died had the ratling made it through the pass were spared.

"Do what needs to be done, general," Cordelia Hasenbach quietly said.

—

"Interesting," Amadeus said.

The others insisted on treating him like he was made of glass, yet for all that his body had become pale and sickly his mind had not dulled. Spreading an aspect across sixteen thousand soldiers – closer to fifteen now, he corrected – exhausted him to the extent he could barely stand, most days. Being carried like on a litter an invalid had been a private humiliation, though he was not one to let petty pride get in the way of necessity. He was currently more useful as a logistical asset than a field one. Still, the sweat and shivers had been an unpleasant surprise. He'd not known sickness in a very long time, and this was perhaps as close as a Named could come to it.

"We won't get to plunder a waystation twice," Scribe said. "The Circle of Thorns is recalling all assets in the region and the Silver Letters are withdrawing everything but observers."

Those two organizations were, respectively, the foreign and domestic intelligence apparatuses of the Principate. The Silver Letters occasionally also dabbled in assassination or a spot of sabotage in the past, though under Hasenbach they're curtailed those activities to Praesi agents only. He had great respect for the Circle of Thorns, personally. They were one of the most skillful and well-funded spy networks in the history of Calernia, and had been pursuing Procer's interests abroad with regular success for centuries. It also operated with only middling oversight from the throne: even at the height of the Proceran civil war, the Eyes of the Empire had been forced to fight them tooth and nail for every success in the Free Cities. Their information was, as a rule, reliable and delivered to the appropriate individuals in a timely manner. The Silver Letters, on the other hand, had been made sport of by Imperial agents for decades. They had connections with the gutter and the servants as well as the ruthlessness to properly use them, but they lacked the professional training and arcane tools the Eyes of the Empire had gained since Alaya climbed the Tower. Their internal squables had been exploited by Scribe's agents with relish, though only ever through careful intermediaries – they despised the Eyes to the bone.

"It does not matter," Amadeus finally said. "From what we have learned we can deduce more, and sooner or later we will succeed at getting our hands on royal correspondence."

The household guard of Cantal had burned their ruler's personal papers when it became evident the capital would fall, which was good and clever service yet somewhat inconvenient to the Black Knight. He'd personally commended the captain responsible and offered the man an officer's commission in the Legions, though sadly he'd refused. Out of respect he'd allowed the captain poison instead of the blade, though the execution had been a given. Amadeus was fond of talent, yet not so fond he would leave it in the service of his foes. Grem strode into the tent moments later, parting the flap and letting in the scent of smoke and blood. Two villages had been sacked today, though legionaries had only ever marched on one. It remained a matter of great amusement to Amadeus that the Proceran campaign was yielding a greater harvest of traitors than the civil war in Praes ever had.

There was reason to it, of course. The fresh auxiliaries gained by his host were bandits who'd been at odds with local authorities long before he ever came, and who intended to melt back into the countryside with their loot the moment the Legions left. His army was seen as a passing storm here, an opportunity to be exploited. When he'd fought to put Alaya on the throne it had been with the stated intent to crush every significant Praesi power block underfoot and have them remain in that state for the foreseeable future. That he'd been a Duni backed largely by orcs and goblins in the initial stretch of the war had only added to the perception that Alaya's supporters were hungry outsiders that would throw away all old privileges and influences in order to rise. Few Praesi of authority had been willing to lend their aid to a faction so estranged from traditional avenues of power, not until it became exceedingly clear it would win the war.

"Heard you found the letters of some Proceran spies," Grem said, striding towards a seat.

The one-eyed orc glanced at him first, lips thinning in dismay. Amadeus kept his irritation off his face. He was exhausted, not dying.

"A waystation belonging to the Circle of Thorns," Eudokia specified. "The letters were meant to be carried to Salia at least a week back, but our advance disrupted the journey."

"News from abroad, then," Grem grunted. "Shame. Knowing what the Silver Letters are up to would be a great deal more useful. That's twice we ran into bandit groups fighting over succession, now, and I don't think it's a coincidence."

"Damage control by Hasenbach, most likely," Amadeus agreed. "Yet their correspondence has been... enlightening. Klaus Papenheim is on the march."

The orc's hairless brows rose.

"He's finally willing to chase us?" he said. "I didn't think his niece's position in the Assembly was that weak. Would Iserre falling really unseat her?"

"He's marching north, old friend," Amadeus said. "The letters also mentioned that an eye needed to be kept on the Stairway in case Duchess Kegan decided to raid into Arans. It was deemed unlikely – and I agree – but the implication that there was need of a watch at all is telling."

"It means Malanza's not going to be holding the pass from their end," Grem said. "That's their two largest field armies on the move."

He paused.

"Shit," he finally said. "You're sure?"

"We are," Eudokia said.

"Then the entire north is about to be hip-deep in dead men," Grem bluntly said. "I can't think of another reason for Hasenbach to pull out. The Iron Prince only let us burn our way through the heartlands without lifting a finger because he judged toppling Callow as quick as possible was how the war would be turned around. He wouldn't leave the Vales if he had any another choice, not after committing for so long."

"That is my assessment as well," Amadeus said. "And it means our horizons have just expanded a great deal."

"Hainaut's the longer coast, and it's a maze of cliffs and passes," Grem continued, thinking out loud. "No, Malanza won't head there. Your apprentice ripped through her officers, that army's running on fumes and fantassins. If it's spread out for coastal defence half of it will bolt when the Dead King comes out. She'll head for Cleves. It's where Keter aims for, whenever they try to land a force, and it's fortified almost as heavily as a Callowan city. She'll count on the walls to hold the army together and wait until Papenheim makes it north to contest Hainaut."

"Both those forces will not return south for years," the Black Knight said. "That leaves them conscripts and Levantines. The army in Tenerife is unlikely to budge so long as the League doesn't declare for anyone."

"The Dominions has two field armies of thirty thousand," Grem said. "I'm not worried around the one going around the lakes through Salamans, it's not going to pursue unless we tweak their nose. But if we scrap with the one that just made shore, this campaign is finished."

Amadeus had, in a rare flight of fancy, called this war an invasion when speaking to Ranker. It was not, practically speaking. No territory taken had been held, and this entire affair could more accurately be termed a large-scale raid. One pursued in a manner that would shake the First Prince's position in the Highest Assembly while also aiming to damage the Principate's ability to wage war past winter, but those were deeper strategic pursuits. Tactically, the Legions of Terror were behaving as a roving force avoiding field battles and attacking only soft positions. Raiders, by any definition. That the countryside and cities had been emptied by the massive conscription preceding the Tenth Crusade allowed Amadeus' army to draw on its comprehensive siege experience to breach and sack cities a more traditional force would avoid, but that ability should not be mistaken for actual fighting strength. If the Legions engaged a Levantine army outnumbering them twofold, even a victory would be so costly his forces would be effectively knocked out of the war. That would be the beginning of a death spiral, Amadeus knew: without the strength necessary to forage his army would begin to starve, further slowing and weakening it until even thinned city garrisons would be enough to stamp it out.

"We know for a fact they've slowed down to a crawl," Scribe said. "Even if they began a forced march tonight we should be able to take the city of Iserre and withdraw before they arrive."

"It's a tempting target," Amadeus noted. "The food stores would keep us fed through winter easily and the treasury would allow us to significantly expand the ranks of our auxiliaries. Prince Milenan's capital was spared by the civil war: it's one of the wealthiest cities in Procer at the moment."

"My very point," Grem said. "If it's that good a prize, why is Hasenbach botching its defence so badly?"

"I suspect it is beyond her control," Scribe said. "The Dominion has expressed doubt that the terms of alliance signed cover the defence of Procer itself."

"They can't seriously expect that to hold up," the orc growled. "They'd be stabbing an ally in broad daylight. If they screw another crusader in the middle of a crusade their reputation is dust."

"Eudokia is of the opinion that they're shaking down the First Prince for concessions," Amadeus said. "Letting Iserre burn would make her fold quick enough, no matter her objections."

The orc's sole eye turned to him.

"And you?"

"Six months ago, the Ashuran committee liaising with the Grand Alliance formally requested access to the Thalassocracy's most accurate maps of Praes as well as the tally of trade goods compiled by its merchant captains," Amadeus said. "There can be no doubt that the signatories are already debating how best to partition Praes after the crusade. There are also known proponents of the extermination of all humans within Imperial borders in the Dominion's upper ranks, though they remain a loud minority for now. They still represent a significant portion of the Levantine armies we are facing at this very moment, which grants them leverage. The First Prince is currently losing control of the Highest Assembly, desperately in need of reinforcements to face both us and the Dead King and it's an open secret she fought against the results of the conclave in Salia and lost. If Levant was ever going to turn the screws on her for concessions, now is the time. All the stars are aligned."

"Queen Catherine is also still unaccounted for," Scribe said. "In a way she's the most immediate threat of all. She could appear on the outskirts of Salia with the entire Army of Callow, and even if the Augur warns Hasenbach in advance her armies cannot magically cross half of Procer to arrive in time. Every single plan they make has to take that under consideration."

"They can fight a better war than this," Marshal Grem One-Eye said. "I won't deny anything you said, but you both know I'm speaking the truth. There's the scent of hubris in the air, Black. I don't like it."

"So there is," Amadeus murmured. "I suppose there's only one question left to ask, then."

"And what's that?" the orc said, eye narrowed.

"Shall we roll the dice one more time, old friend?" the Carrion Lord smiled, slow and thin and utterly cold.

---

lupus7

love it alatrisme jajajajaj thank you so much ERRATICERRATA

SpeckofStardust

This is going to be one of those times where we wont have a clue what is going to happen for a long time isn't it?

NerfContessa

Wel... Kind of.

Sadly that act of pilgrim coming up, while efficient also gets rid of 2 of my favorite side characters. And is morally almost as black as blacks coat.

goliath1303

Screw. You.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

Forgive me for I am late!

25 minutes after the chapter posted I was driving, looked at the clock and pulled over as fast as I could to post the link, but alas, I was too late.

Rosadina R

You kidding? Thank you for always posting near the top, making it so easy for the rest of us to do what's right and upvote the hell out of this story.

Screwfloss

Thank you for pulling over as well! Too many people attempt driving while using their phones

jrperry1993

Dovie'andi se tovy- wait, wrong book.

Lucas

What do you think "better war than this" means
And "roll the dice one more time"?

Insanenoodlyguy

Grem is seeing the trap. He doesn't know the shape of it, but this is too easy. The people they have been fighting are smarter than this, can fight a "better war than this." But, a very tempting legit target is still a very tempting target. So the payoff might be worth the risk since A. from their perspective, it might just be an error instead of a trap after all, and B. If it is a trap, they could still get out of it with what they wanted. These are people who've beaten traps before. And Black looks like he wants to take the risk, hence "Roll the dice one more time."

boballab

The Crusaders could be trying to play a Villain/Hero story angle. One of the things Villains need to learn is to never attack someone that they heavily outnumber if there is a Hero in their midst because that gets the Gods above to knock over the scales. Grem could be suspecting that the city has a band of Hero's in it which plays that traditional story angle. There is even a famous incident where a Dread Empress ordered her Black Knight to attack a smaller group on top of a hill because it would be over by midday, and thus earning the rest of her name: The Technically Correct:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/05/31/warden-ii/>

In one of the chapters it is told the reason they lost is because there was a Hero on that hill and the Gods Above slammed the whole hand onto the scales.

Thea

There's a better saying about sudden blunders of competent enemies potentially not being blunders after all... Forgot the particular phrasing though.

Jonnnney

"If a clever opponent makes a foolish mistake," Hakram added, "it is either not a mistake or not that opponent's doing."

Chapter 36

Screwfloss

What trap is Grem seeing? Wasn't the first part of this chapter the First Prince admitting there is no clever trap and the city actually is being abandoned?

boballab

Keep in mind that the First Prince has for a lot of purposes lost control of the Crusade. The Hero's and the religious orders are running their own agenda as shown by the Gray Pilgrim and the conclave that defied the First Prince and meddled in politics. They could be deliberately setting things in motion, especially if they know she has been talking to the condemned heretic Catherine Foundling.

naturalnuke

The die is cast, it will land where it may.

Someguy

Dovie'andi se tovyu sagain

d_o_l

Blood and bloody ashes.

rangamal thenuwara

Alea iacta est

ALazyMonster

I'm admittedly enjoying the fact that black has started being hammier (even if it's cold ham) throughout this book.

Also, from the way that the Tyrant's letter was described I'm now just thinking of the Tyrant of Helike as Kumagawa from Medaka Box where he is so blatantly insincere that everything he says is in quotation marks. Which is fantastic.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, I'm loving him too.

Euodiachloris

The thought of an entirely new, flowing script with built-in double-quote serif-like qualities and spade-tail curls... XD

Milpool

He's found a way to condense sarcasm into liquid form and use it as ink

Author Unknown

Well, it's nice to see those studies with bottled friendship proved fruitful in some way.

superkeaton

Oh Black, you clever monster.

Wry Warudo

So Cordelia is sacrificing Iserre for some kind of plan, and Black is going for it?

Also, I wonder what Warlock and the other Woe are up to.

---

He's letting Cordelia burn her rival's capital and lands so she has to deal with the reputational damage from that. My bet is that he'll keep going after Amadis' allies, turning to Orne so he doesn't have to fight the Levantines, and dig his way back into Callow.

Metrux

Not Woe, Calamities. Though it has been said he asked to speak with Masego, so as much as it could be lie, he could be with the Empress right now.

Wry Warudo

A late reply, but I meant Woe. Warlock is the only Calamity other than Black plotting anything, so there really isn't much going on with them other than him, since we're unlikely to get a POV of Assassin and Ranger is doing her own thing.

Jonnnney

It seems more likely she is sacrificing the city rather than sacrificing the army that would defend it. She is keeping her options open rather than planning. Procer is never led by heroes so they don't understand how to defend against an army led by a villain. However if black pushes this advantage too far the heavens may just start anointing random heroes to throw at him until he is caught by a larger army.

Nafram

Interesting. It seems to me that Procer may be facing its end as a power player in the fate of Calernia. Its capacity to feed it's own people is being systematically erased, Principalities are being broken for decades at the very least and its military strength is dangerously spent already on the eve of an invasion from the Dead King itself, which won't be without very heavy casualties all the while they have to deal with an enemy inside, hordes of bandits all over the Principate and opportunists on all borders ready to pounce on it should any sign of weakness appear. Even if they manage to defeat Black (and with the Pilgrim unaccounted for they actually might on the likely chance he shows up on the nick of time given how invested he seems on making sure Cordelia's dream becomes reality) and save Procer from certain doom, it will take decades of peace to recover. Decades where the Chain of Hunger will be coming to attack again and again and again.

Procer quite literally needs a miracle to survive

WuseMajor

Annoyingly, they might well get one, while the Queen of Callow has to go fight yet /another/ goddess just to get enough warm bodies to put in front of her army to maybe blunt the next attack coming at her nation just enough that she can still keep some farmers out in the fields so everyone doesn't starve.

It's rank favoritism I say.

Jason Ipswitch

Anyone else thinking that the trap might be throwing Pilgrim and a band of Heroes at Black and his forces? They can do some sort of heroic last stand, and whether they win or lose doesn't really matter, because they heroes will escape unscathed while Black's forces will take enough casualties to wreck them.

MetruX

Would be a good plan not something Procerans do, though. Procerans never rely on Heroes to fight their wars, they also are not used to fighting against Villains. At most there would be a Hero or another accompanying an army of their own accord, never something elaborate as this made by 'wordly' powers. Though it is still possible that the Heroes might choose to do this by themselves... Heroes are still rare in the Principate.

NZPIEFACE

Bigger issues in the state = More heroes

werafdsaew

I think you're overestimating how much damage Black has inflicted; he really only touched 1 principality

RoflCat

Yet just by touching that 1 principality alone, he's stoking all the paranoia of the rest of them, letting them kill themselves out.

By specifically targeting Cordelia's 'enemy' and avoid fighting her, he's making the rest of Procer think he's in cahoot with Cordelia (after all, they're not above allying with enemies for their own profit)

Then he just have to watch as Cordelia try to protect them even as they try to destroy her, occasionally stoking the fire.

DroughtBringer

I get the feeling that next chapter will be Masego and Warlock, or following someone else back in Callow.

I'm thinking Abigail will get at least half of a chapter, and the rest of the Woe will probably appear onscreen at least once.

Black straining himself is slightly concerning, but also a masterful strategy, leans slightly on the Heroic idea of weakening yourself for your allies to survive which is always useful.

And poor Cordelia, she is not in the best of places at the moment, lots closing in on her, I do not see her staying First Prince much longer, and do not see her having quite enough will to earn a Name if she does lose her title as First Prince

Maginot

I think you're right. I'm dying to see what the Augur's "woe to the south" looks like with Masego and Warlock. One can assume that Hierarch and the Tyrant will make an appearance, though I'm loving the indirect reference here.

I have a theory about where we are going though. Doesn't the Crusade's whole bit about it being unacceptable for Callow to have a villain sound a great deal like the Catholic Church position toward protestant rulers before the 30 years war. Then the Peace of Ausburg and the Peace of Westphalia said each country could set the religion for their state, despite being loudly decried by the Church, the nations rolled with it.

It certainly seems like all the smart ladies have had similar thoughts. Cat and the Woe with the Liesse accords. Hasenbach and her Friendly League of Upstandings Nations, which the Pilgrim indicated were a very important vision/system for the future. Even Malicia's treatise and her willingness to do business with "Good" cities in the League. I wonder if all three got together it wouldn't be similar scripts they were working from.

God I hope she has some good and smug lines when she rescues Black...

DroughtBringer

Now let's talk about the Queen's Gambit.

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Queen's\_Gambit

The Queens gambit can be found in the link above, and is a fairly popular chess opening move set.

In the Queen's gambit, white (who I am assuming is Procer, cause Black *should* be black), is putting pieces into position, to control the center of the board.

Now Black has the option to either Accept or Decline the Queen's Gambit.

If accepted it puts black into a much worse scenario, and loses control of the center of the board, but... gives Black a potentially strong setup for the late game.

Now, due to the rolling the dice I do believe that Balck is doing that, he is sacrificing something (not necessarily positioning like in the Chess QG), for a potential to snowball him and his Legions into the Late Game.

Rook

I'm betting he doesn't accept or decline the offer. Option C, respond with your own Black Queen's Gambit

That is to say, a Foundling Gambit. Set it all on fire and run away

MetruX

It does appear he want to accept, actually, taking the food from the city, which should "Keep the man fed through the winter". If he can leave this trap without too much losses, he may very well keep the army alive all the time Procer is being hit by the Dead King, a very big advantage on the late game.

Antoninjohn

What the First Prince is doing is trapping Black by using Iserre as bait in order to have her armies encircle his, then Cat will hit her army in the back and then Gate Black and his army out

NZPIEFACE

Not enough time, I think.

IDKWhoitis

If Cat murders Sve and takes her Power, Cat may be able to twist the confines of Arcadia to do whatever the hell she wants. If the meta story allows she might be able to pull it off (Larat already hints she could do this already, and Cat has been learning it's mostly her preconceived notions that prevent her from doing the craziest Fae bullshit.)

Someguy

I think Black will ignore Iserre and aim to hit Cleves before Malanza can get there, then turn back to hit Iserre once Altraste's forces are chasing in the wrong direction on the wrong momentum. This way, south-east Procer will starve in winter and Altraste & Malanza stuck in Cleves with no fort, no granary and the Dead King able to attack in winter.

Dainpdf

Why risk being pincerred by the Malanza army (which is full of heroes) when they are committed to fighting Neshamah for the foreseeable future?

IDKWhoitis

Queen's Gambit Offered -> Queen's Gambit Declined ->Procer moves in White Knight and Grey Pilgram -> Black pulls Founding Gambit (Set fire to the board/Hit Malanza army from behind.)

Dainpdf

Seems to me like he's moving to accept... And again, why get involved with the Malanza army at all? It poses no threat to him.

Snowfire1224

Gotta love that comment about Tyrant's calligraphy being deceptive.

Berder

Errata:

Being carried like on a litter an invalid (carried on a litter like an invalid) though under Hasenbach they're curtailed those activities to Praesi agents only (they'd)

He wouldn't leave the Vales if he had any another choice (any other choice)

BartHumphries

Just call them typos so I can search for the term more quickly.

Antony444

Damn, every time Amadeus is discussed or showed, it is pure gold...

I hope you're ready to eat your words now Cordelia. What was it again? I will have the head of the man in a matter of weeks and his army decimated? Well, right now you've lost Cantal and the Black Knight is ravaging Iserre.

Even assuming the Procer plan works perfectly, judging by the devastation described it's two provinces which have been knocked out of the war.

Before the Dead King is about to invade.

Before the ban on dwarven weapons Catherine negotiated is about to come into effect.

Before the Tyrant stops amusing us by swearing everyone 'eternal friendship' and proceeds to set the south of Calernia on fire.

The sun is setting for the Tenth Crusade, and if Cordelia manages to keep her title of First Prince until next year, it's going to be a genuine miracle...

Dainpdf

Well, no one expected Malicia to be in talks with Neshamah... Poor Cordelia. I hope she manages to keep her throne – we can't afford for the Chain of Hunger and the Dead King to overrun Procer.

IDKWhoitis

I'm putting a bet down that Kairos kills Giants or something.
Or gets the Gnomes involved.

TeK

For inventing the Internet.

IDKWhoitis

Just so he can meme the hell out of his opponents and allies.

Fuodiachloris

Steady on: the guy is a bad enough troll without access to something like a magical internet to spread his smugness about.

Someguy

"Amadeus had, in a rare flight of fancy, called this war an invasion when speaking to Ranker. It was not, practically speaking. No territory taken had been held, and this entire affair could more accurately be termed a large-scale raid."

To be fair, a Home Invasion is still an invasion and this is done on a larger scale.

frolamiz

I really love the Hierarch/tyrant duo. I hope we see more of them and that they are not going to be used as the bogeymen in the south for the rest of the story.

But I doubt it, since every other power (except the gnomes) used this way has started moving.

RanVor

It would be such a waste, they're among the most interesting characters.

Novice

I feel really bad for Cordelia here. She is second only to Catherine when it comes to how fucked her realm is promising to be. I'd almost root for her since she is being practical in all her decisions thus far but alas, she's currently fighting Black. I'd always root for the freaking Carrion Lord (such a badass title).

Although, it's quite a bit worrying since Black is throwing more and more death flags this chapter. Can we at least have one last reunion between master and apprentice before he dies, if he dies?

Dainpdf

I think the Drow would disagree. Maybe Alaya, too.

Novice

Nah, the Drow has already been fucked even way before the start of the story. Malicia can still hide behind Callow when it comes to ground invasions (especially after the Conclave kerfuffle) and it looks like the enemy naval fleet has stalled after sacking a single coastal city. So yeah Cordelia and Catherine is still on the precipice way more than Praes.

Dainpdf

I thought you just meant effed up in general. If you mean specifically "how much more effed up it looks to get during the story, specifically due to invasion"...

Nah, the Drow still take the cake. After all, they're being invaded by "the only nation in Calernia that is not just a regional power" with the intent of extermination.

Novice

Thinking on it, yeah you're right. I guess I just ignored them since I don't really see them surviving one way or another. Even without the threat of extermination, they'd still be reduced to irrelevance because of what the Night does to them as a culture.

grzecho2222

She would be in less trouble if she didn't invade Callow, also she is arrogant and entitled

Novice

If she didn't invade Callow, she wouldn't be able to get to Praes. If the Crusade couldn't get to Praes, the Grand Alliance will fall apart and thus any talks about extending the Alliance beyond the current Crusade.

RanVor

Except that's blatantly untrue. They could have accepted Cat's offer and let her gate them directly to Ater. Grey Pilgrim knew the offer was sincere. But they were too arrogant and prejudiced, and now they're paying the price.

Novice

Except the Conclave would still happen and Cordelia would then be forced to treat Catherine as hostile. Which if they had accepted the gate, they would then be between a hostile Callow and Praes with no supply lines. They are arrogant and prejudiced, I agree. But they have made the right choice there.

RanVor

Did they? The Bard (because of course it was her) would have much harder time pulling off the conclave if the Battle of the Camps didn't happen, and Cordelia would be in much better position to stop it. The House of Light would have to have really solid arguments to declare Cat the Arch-Heretic of the East for nothing.

RanVor

And even if they managed to fuck up that monumentally, it would still be their own fault that Callow is hostile to them.

I just realized you're arguing that they were right to antagonize Callow because they would do it anyway eventually.

Novice

See, I think you're just lumping the entire Crusade into a single monolithic entity when we've already seen the opposite. Cordelia might be the First Prince but she doesn't have the absolute authority in this campaign. We've seen how much she struggles to keep the Crusade from slipping out of her grasp (which I believe she eventually will, if she didn't already). Treating Callow as hostile from the very start is the correct choice in the realpolitik sense.

I'm not saying what she has done is the correct moral choice. Good is not good after all. I'm just saying based on what Cordelia knows, based on her tenuous position and on her goals; she's done better than anyone else in her position could have done.

RanVor

Treating Callow as hostile from the very start is the source of almost all of their current problems. That's why I don't feel bad for Cordelia – she really has no one but herself (and her stupid subordinates) to blame.

Novice

I don't know about that. Seems to me that expecting rationality from the religious in a Crusade is more likely the culprit. As I've said, they can't go to Praes without going through Callow. And they can't go through Callow peacefully because of the fanatics braying at the edges, waiting for the flimsiest excuse.

RanVor

Nobody would mind fanatics if the Crusade was successful. Also, nobody has seen the conclave coming at the time, so it couldn't possibly be a factor in their decision making.

Novice

You don't think the leader of the Crusade treating with the villainous Black Queen wouldn't eventually set off the conclave? That the Proceran House of Light wouldn't try to fuck over the First Prince in a bid to restore the political influence they've lost in the aftermath of the Liturgical Wars?

Hells, declaring Cat as the Arch-Heretic instead of the Dread Empress is already grasping at straws. You don't think the House of Light wouldn't find another bullshit excuse to do what they want?

RanVor

You seriously think them being unable stop themselves from making enemies is a valid argument? If they're really so stupid, they deserve this.

Javvies

Cordelia accepting Cat's offer to shortcut the Crusade's forces directly to Praes – and, IIRC offering to help against the Tower and the High Lords – and in the process accepting Callow into the Grand Alliance isn't exactly grounds to move the House of Light.

The Conclave, and what came from it, is not the idea of the priests. It's the idea of an as-yet unidentified Chosen/Hero, presumably Bard.

Sure, it is entirely possible that the Conclave would still have happened and had the result it did when it did. I happen to think it would have been a much harder lift to pull off, and a lot easier to stop. Plus, accepting the shortcut to Praes likely would have resulted in Malicia expediting her efforts to get the Dead King moving, and Cat likely wouldn't have accepted the invite, which means that the Dead King probably would have invaded Procer before the Conclave could have happened.

It would be far more difficult to successfully label Cat Arch-heretic of the East when she is actively helping you against the Tower and even harder to do so when the Dead King is invading, and Cat is your best hope of getting your armies back from Praes without repeated and massive sealift efforts. Labeling Cat Arch-heretic of the East would likely need to be put on hold. At least for a while – it's still be on Bard's to do list, but it'd drop on the list for everybody else.

Novice

You've got a point. We're all just speculating an alternative here. But I still think the unknown entity that moved the current Conclave would still be able to force the Alliance to be antagonistic to Callow in this alternate history. I feel said entity has malicious intent toward Cat here. I don't think they'd give peace with Callow a chance.

Schemers be schemin'.

RanVor

The "Unknown Entity", a.k.a. the Wandering Bard (because let's be real, it couldn't be anybody but her) doesn't actually have as much influence as you seem to believe. She can manipulate people, but she needs a foundation to build upon. The Battle of the Camps was that foundation. Without it, she wouldn't have strong enough arguments to enforce prioritizing Cat over Malicia as a target, and Cordelia's position would be much stronger, which would result in her having a much greater freedom in working to stop the conclave.

Besides, if the "correct decision" resulted in the Crusaders being crushed and forced to retreat, the country being counter-invaded and the Dead King moving south for the first time in centuries, then either the Crusade leadership was horrifically incompetent, or the entire enterprise was doomed to fail from the very beginning. Either way, Procer still brought it all on itself.

Javvies

Oh sure, Bard (it basically has to be her) would still want Cat gone in the worst way. The problem for her would be that it would be far more difficult to get people to put such a high priority on getting rid of Cat when Cat has been helping them against the Praesi. And it would be even harder to pull off if the Dead King had launched his invasion before the Conclave. Remember, Papenheim and Malanza's armies would have been in Praes, with no easy way back except for Cat. And if they went and declared Cat Arch-heretic of the East while they had 100k men in Praes, they'd at best be abandoned by Cat and left to their own devices against the Praesi, which would end poorly for them, while there'd be no way to reinforce the fortified northern border against the dead.

Sure, Bard still would have tried to convince people, but you can only talk people into doing what you want them to do if they are willing to listen to you.

Dainpdf

One would hope Black would be more careful, after Sabah...

Cicero

I suspect it's the opposite. After Sabah. Black is more willing to take risks than he used to be... at least with his own life. Probably not with his remaining friends.

Dainpdf

Such as, say, Grem. Or Eudokia. Or the fate of the Empire.

IDKWhoitis

I'm currently guessing Dead King is going to pull some Black-Level shenanigans and use a still living regiment to take Cleves before the Procereans know what's up. He owns enough Procerean corpses, uniforms, banners, and has enough people who could literally be trained for such a thing. The cityguard may just buy the story at face value if a "crusader force" arrives to reinforce the city, since what sort of nutjob would betray the living for the dead?

Also, I'm betting Black is going to go straight for the city, regardless of traps, and go for a Akua's Folly gambit. Probably lure White or Grey into the city to murder them.

MetruX

That's really not something he CAN do. I keep seeing people coment that, but from the stairway to north Procer they won't come close to Black, he'd need to move at least twice as fast, maybe thrice, while not fighting for more food and leaving another army to run at their backs. Sure, if it worked would be completely disastrous for the First Prince, same as if a meteor shower destroyed their palace, but none are things Black can do right now.

Euodiachloris

Amadeus may be driving himself into the ground, but he's so obviously enjoying every minute of this active retirement gig he's got. It's scary-awesome.

Part of me hopes that just by expecting death at the end of it, he gets life just to spite him. He'd probably appreciate the joke, too – after a while. ;P

grzecho2222

Given that he seems to copy Lisowski tactics and is ill like him, because of overstraining himself, he would have to die randomly between battles

TeK

EE, I have a very important question, dunno if anyone asked that. Do Named have to poop? It's never mentioned in the stories how they do it. Well, Heroes may have to poop, Ashen Priestes did threaten some Heroes with diahrea. But do Villains have to poop, or they can use their vast and terrible powers to fix this? Ok, maybe it depends on the Villain, I don't believe Dead King or WB has to poop. Or the personal perception of the Named, like how they get taller or prettier. But does Catherine has to poop now that she is of Winter? Please, respond, this is very important, I've been holding this question for too long.

Snowfire1224

My guess is nobody poops unless it's plot important

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Cat mentioned offhand at some point that villainy stopped her menstrual cycle, if that helps. More saliently, Winter has stripped her of the need to eat, so she probably doesn't poop even if most villains do.

Yavandir

Why would Warlock bind soul of an enemy to chamber pot if he couldn't poop?

Javvies

I'm half-hoping Black diverts from ripping up Iserre and either goes to punch out Salia or to bushwhack the nearer Levantine army.

On the other hand, if Black can take Iserre without too much damage to the defenses, even if he gets trapped inside the city, the Legions ought to be able to hold the walls for a while – hopefully long enough for Cat to come pull them out.

Agent J

Honestly, I don't want Cat to have to come bail him out. He's supposed to be some Machiavellian genius, so I'm fully expecting our lovable bastard to have a brilliant end game. My personal bet is that he's arranging the board to create opportunity, y'know, that thing the Augur can't predict. Kill the Augur and the Proceran threat becomes a great deal more manageable.

If he just smashes and burns things until Cat comes to bail his sorry ass out of the fire, I'll be very disappointed in him. He's cleverer than that.

Javvies

I'd prefer Cat not need to bail him out either. I'm sure both of them would prefer that too.

Unfortunately, as good as he is, as good as the generals with him are, you can make all the right moves and still run into trouble. In addition, it seems that if Black gets significantly slowed down anywhere, he'll have trouble.

And they know he's moving towards Iserre.

Plus, he's a Villain taking a chance/ rolling the dice while invading/ raiding a Good nation.

With Bard both gunning for him and unaccounted for, and an undetermined number of Heroes with the Levantines. Oh, sure, most of them involved with the Crusade will probably be with Malanza and Papenheim, or with the Ashuran fleets raiding the Praesi coast ... but we know at least one unknown Hero (probably Bard) is in Salia.

Plus, y'know, Augur is around for providing information on what Black is doing and planning.

Black is heavily outnumbered, and even with him using an Aspect to boost the strategic speed of his Legions, there are still physical limits on how much he can dodge around the forces hunting him.

It wouldn't take much for Black to run into enough trouble that he either has to abandon his campaign in Procer or get into a situation where he'll need Cat's assistance to get out.

For that matter, with the Dead King moving against Procer, Black has a lot less that he needs to do to break the Crusade.

Indeed, there are reasonable arguments for Black abandoning his campaign in Procer, and leaving them to fight the Dead King and get the Crusade's forces gutted by the undead. If Black and his Legions left the Crusade to fought the Dead King in favor of rebuilding the fortifications in the Vales and/or fortifying the Stairway, the bulk of the Crusade would burn itself out on stopping the Dead King. The Dead King conquering a chunk of Procer is probably something that Black wouldn't look forward to – indeed, that could ultimately cause greater national cohesion in Procer, transforming them into a single nation instead of a loose confederation of Principalities.

Besides ... I doubt he'd be happy to learn what Malicia's been up to since the war started – cutting a deal with the Dead King, turning on Cat and Callow. He might not be to the point of actively turning on Malicia, but he'd likely be more than willing to actively refuse to help her against Cat.

Fern

...is black implying that the "concessions" the Dominion is pushing for include the genocide of the Soninke and Taghreb? That's not a very Good thing to do, now is it?

Novice

Good ≠ good. The whole Good and Evil (and one of the major themes in the Guide) is all about choosing between the Gods Above or Below. The Elves of the Golden Bloom for instance, genocided the original inhabitants of the forest and yet they're still considered a Good nation.

Oui

Soo, apparently stories don't matter anymore. Black is doing monstrous, classic villain things straight from the A Villain's Guide to Getting Yo Ass Murdered by the Heavens and there are no consequences at all. Hell, he's also weakening the only nation capable of fighting the Dead King, at least for a while (I'm seriously beginning to doubt that, though, seeing that everyone is walking over their armies). Sure, he's weakened but that seems to be all. Odds are so stacked against him that he should be writing a testament. Neshamah and the Bard have been playing this game for a while now all because of 'the balance', but Cat and Black's plot armour seem to be much stronger and they need not bother.

crysjal

The Narrative doesn't discriminate. When a situation is brought about the narrative flows as it ought to. As you say, Black is in a perilous position. He's trapped with no hope of escape, running a mysterious plan nobody knows while also enjoying his regained vitality. The narrative won't let him lose because:

A. He's got no hope of escape, therefore logically he will escape.

B. He has a secret plan. It's a secret and therefore must come to fruition, thereby making the suspense worthwhile for a dramatic reveal during said escape.

In addition, supporting points include:

C. The regaining of his vitality has made him more interesting, which compounds the previous two points. He's an interesting character with a good backstory which grants him a basic level of protection via the narrative in general terms.

D. The character itself is badass. Any death would have to be suitably epic and the scene set does not allow for such a death.

E. Major characters who are invested in him are not present to watch him die (Cat and Malicia). Incidentally, Black also promised Malicia to return to the tower at some point which is foreshadowing and so must also be acted out through the narrative.

Kel the Seer

The Crusade was called against Praes, it just "so happened" to go through Callow since it was on the way. "Liberating" Callow from an Evil ruler to divide it up between the Procerans and strengthen the First Prince's position while also removing the threat of unemployed Fantassins is all just a publicly unstated bonus.

It almost seems like Black is pulling a 3 for 1 with his rampage.

1) Protecting Praes by hobbling the Crusade. Even though he and Malicia are on the outs, he still has some sense of duty to the Empire he helped architect.

2) Unofficially help Cat in the short term by also blunting the Crusade so Callow can get its feet back under it.

3) Long term help Cat by making Procer into the new Callow. A weakened kingdom nominally aligned to Good that all the crusades have to march through to get to the Evil kingdoms.

Yeah, Cat gets the better deal, but Amadeus knows his days are numbered, and she is still in his mind his apprentice and the one best suited to carry on with his new way of fighting against the Gods Above.

If Amadeus being stretched so thin leads to his death in a trap, I am curious to see what will happen to Cat. Emotions inside, I think it has been intimated that there might be a few scraps of Squire in Cat that Winter hasn't bothered to devour yet. What happens when a radically weakened transitional Name gets the trigger to Transition?

I don't think she will become the new Black, but given Cat's luck, it will happen either right as she is about to win a fight, or is struggling to deal with the sheer volume of Night that will try to flood her if she kills Sve.

Rhys

I love the Hierarch and the Tyrant so much! They're just so deliciously CRAZY I can't wait to see what they do in response to everything that's coming.

That is, assuming they choose to do anything at all. But I can't imagine them taking a backseat for something as monumental as the mobilisation of the Dead King's armies.

Papalamus

Can someone remind me what was "the results of the conclave in Salia"?

Javvies

The short version is,

1. Cat got formally designated Arch-Heretic of the East – the first person other than a currently reigning Dread Emperor/ Empress to be so labeled.
2. The House of Light in Callow got declared heretical for crowning her.

The backlash from that in Callow is, in short, they (the Callowan House of Light) declared the Conclave heretical and fallen into earthly pursuits, and formally designated all Heroes that had trod Callowan soil to have Fallen from Grace (aka, they aren't Heroes, they're Villains). I think they might have declared the 10th Crusade to be not of the Light too.

There are a few more details, but that's the short version. For more details, see Chapter 36: Enchere.

Screwfloss

FYI this part doesn't make any sense: it was a popular jest in Procer that to split the difference between the royalty of Cantal and Iserre one would need a very sharp knife

To "split the difference" means to meet halfway, as in when negotiating. If I offer you $9,000 for a car that you want $10,000 for, splitting the difference means we agree at $9,500. Obviously then, one cannot "split the difference" between two people or anything like that.

Cicero

Splitting the difference between Cantal and Iserre royalty would mean taking the differences between the two, and finding the midpoint to split the difference.

For example, if Cantal royalty always wore wide brimmed hats while Iserre always wore no brimmed hats, splitting the difference would mean wearing medium brimmed hats. This analogy can be applied to more intangible traits as well.

This the difficulty in splitting the difference implies that Cantal and Iserre royalty are so alike in both tangible and intangible traits that there really is nothing to split.

sengachi

Hey so who else thinks that Black might just roll into this heavily fortified city and just, like, take it? There's been a lot of mentions of his army being a raiding party and not taking territory, and clearly Black is going to somehow subvert Cordelia giving him a city. So I think this is building up to him taking a city and just sitting there, threatening massive swathes of Cordelia's holdings by simply existing. Maybe providing de-facto shelter for bandit groups as an added insult to injury.

abao

Black remains my favorite character. I don't understand half of what he's doing, even with all the things considered, but he's the only one who despise using plot armor as much as I do.

---

Interlude: Zwischenzug

"Of course I fear my friends. If they did not scare me, why befriend them at all?"

– Dread Empress Prudence the First, the Frequently Vanquished

When dawn came to Laure it found Vivienne Dartwick already awake. She'd slept only fitfully on her too-soft bed, the sparse hours of rest broken by regular reports from her Jacks. Now that she'd returned to the capital she was like the spider returned to her web, her thieves and spies passing forward a river of whispers she had not understood how badly she missed before she could drink from it again. It'd been two months since she had last spoken with Catherine, time and distance watering her wine. She still believed most of what she'd said, but the dire state of affairs here had forced her to admit her queen had not been wrong in her predictions: neither she nor Adjutant had been able to afford a full night's sleep since they stepped out of Arcadia. The orc was a work horse like no one she had ever met, yet she knew that if he'd been forced to handle the Jacks as well as the rest he would have buckled under the weight.

Sunlight passed through the open panes of her window as she sat in silence, two scrolls unfurled before her. Neither were pleasant news. Dread Empress Malicia had sent a diplomatic envoy under truce banner and the man was reported to be riding for Laure with all possible haste. His affairs had been looked through, and he carried no letter or instructions. Whatever the Empress wanted to be said would be spoke in person. Reluctantly, Vivienne had passed along orders for the envoy to be allowed use of courier horses and escorted by soldiers from the Summerholm garrison. The second scroll was a matter beyond her own purview to settle. After refugees began pouring into Callow through the Blessed Isle, Catherine had ordered for the farmers of the eastern fields to withdraw back to Summerholm with their grain and cattle. There had been concerns that if the city garrison sallied out to force the refugees back into the Empire it would be walking into a Praesi ambush.

The farmers and villagers closest to Summerholm had obeyed. Those closer to Praesi borders, however, were digging in their heels. They were refusing to abandon their possessions to the inevitable looting from the refugees but lacked the means to carry them westward, and so they'd refused to leave entirely. Already there had been strife between Callowans and refugees, and over a dozen deaths. It would only get worse, Vivienne knew. More refugees would come, and some would carry weapons. Callowan farmers would empty their cellars of dusty old spears and swords to fight for their land and property, and the killings would escalate. The Praesi were sure to exploit the mounting fears and either arm or send troops to help their countrymen. Vivienne's own countrymen would die, and not a damned thing would be done about it. Marshal Juniper, she knew, would be adamant it was not worth risking the garrison to protect farmers who'd refused to obey a royal decree.

There was only one man in the kingdom who could force her, and Hakram Deadhand was not known to smile upon those who disobeyed his mistress.

Vivienne passed a hand through her hair, noting it was beginning to grow long again. She'd need to have it cut soon enough, and it sent a private pang of fear in her that this was the case. The thief had worked with quite a few Named, since the Liesse Rebellion, and she had not known any of them to have such issues. The largest physical change she'd seen in someone with a Role was Masego's noticeable loss of weight after the Observatory was raised – and given that the man had often forgotten to eat unless Indrani saw to it, the explanation was clear. The Hierophant had been wasting away chasing his visions, his thinning had been as much a reflection of that as his lack of meals. What did it mean, that her hair still grew and she tired almost as easily as when she'd been young? She'd never observed the same in any of the Named she'd known. The thought that she might lose her aspects, or even her Name itself, had been the fodder of persistent nightmares.

She was already dead weight as a Named, what would she be without even that?

Vivienne forced herself to breathe in and breathe out slowly, the old calming trick her thief master had taught her when he first took her roof-hopping. Yet she could only think of the pain, oh the pain when the lightning had coursed through her body. Of the searing green heat that engulfed her under the cold gaze of the Duke of Green Orchards. Of the flames that had licked at her body hungrily in the depths of the Doom of Liesse, cracking the gums of her teeth and scorching her tongue. A parade of pain, and what did she have but failures to contrast them with? How many of my victories were truly mine? Her hand was trembling with the answer, and the knowledge that followed – all of her defeats had been of her own making. Vivienne snarled and formed a fist with trembling fingers, hitting at the table.

"I will catch up," she whispered, knuckles throbbing with pain. "I will."

She breathed in, breathed out. The tremors had not left, but lazing about would not chase them away. She had had yet another losing fight to pick. She left the scrolls behind and left her rooms, grabbing the first palace servant she came across and ordering him to pass the message that Marshal Juniper was summoned to a council in the formal room at Morning Bell. Vivienne had no intention of spending time trading barbed words with the Hellhound as would inevitably ensue if she went herself to seek out the recently-arrived Marshal of Callow. The other whose attendance would be required, though, she would fetch herself. They'd not traded words in three days save through correspondences, their differing duties and long hours precluding the shared meals that Catherine insisted on the Woe having when she was there to enforce it. Honestly compelled the thief to admit she would not have taken occasion to have one even if there had been one. She'd warmed to some of the Woe more than she had ever thought she would. Masego and Indrani she even counted as friends of a sort, a notion that would have appalled her a few years ago.

She had no such conflicting feelings over Hakram Deadhand.

Adjutant was not difficult to find. The cramped and crooked room that had once belonged to some royal scribe was the orc's office, and he did not leave it unless he was needed for council or court. He must sleep in there, if he even slept. The only distraction the Jacks had found he indulged in were occasional visits from his subordinate Captain Tordis. The other orc's presence, when not required by reports, was followed by the door being locked and the captain emerging with her hair ruffled and her neck red around an hour afterwards. No other such visitors had been noted, which ran against Adjutant's reputation for promiscuity. Vivienne suspected her was simply too tired and busy to chase skirts, even those made of mail. The door to the officer was cracked open, light filtering from inside. Neither candles, as Callowans preferred to use, not the finicky magelights the Praesi were so fond of. A handful of common sprites in bottles, spread around the room. Vivienne found the soft glow of them almost soothing as she rapped her knuckle against the door before opening it entirely. The orc was leaning over his desk, brows creased as he moved his quill against parchment with almost unnatural precision. He finished penning his sentence and blew the ink dry before looking up.

"Thief," Adjutant said, nodding in welcome. "Didn't think you'd still be up."

"It will be Morning Bell within an hour," Vivienne replied, then gestured at the seat across him. "May I?"

"Go ahead," he replied, sounding surprised. "Gods, morning already? I could have sworn it was barely half a bell past midnight."

The thief carefully picked up the handful of parchment sheaths left to pile on the seat, glimpsing a grain reserve tally left mostly open among them, and set them down on the floor. She dropped down into the chair, already wary. She forced herself not to look at his hand of bones, to not remember the sensation of it wrapping around her throat and squeezing.

"You look tired," Deadhand gently said, fangs clicking inside his maw. "Don't work yourself to death."

"You're hardly one to talk," Vivienne said, painting a smile.

The kindly visage of the concerned friend, the shoulder all the Woe could lean on. That was to be his face today, then. It was one of many. Catherine's dutiful steward and second, smoothing away every wrinkle. The laughing accomplice, trading jibes and jabs with the lowliest of soldiers. The terrifying giant of muscle and steel, roaring as he tore apart foes with fang and axe. The soft-spoken, cold-eyed thing that had told her mild as milk he would snap her neck if she even considered treachery. Which is your real face? Are any of them true? She did not look at the bones. Dead the hand and dead the man, the song went. She could not put it out of her head.

"I've set an hour or two aside for the purpose next month," he drily said. "I take it there's a reason for the pleasure of your company?"

"I've word from the Jacks," she said. "The situation east is worsening and something needs to be done before it comes to a head. I've called a council with Marshal Juniper."

"Hopefully Aisha will have gotten some tea into her before she arrives," Adjutant grimaced, baring teeth like ivory knives.

She'd seen them rip into throats, more than once. Gobble down blood and flesh greedily like it was the finest of delicacies. The quickening in her pulse she kept away from her eyes, having learned from Akua Sahelian's example. Diabolist had not quite managed to hide how wary she was of the orc, and though the shade's discomfiture would usually have put a smile on her face Vivienne had been too dismayed to be sharing any opinion with the Butcher of Liesse to take any joy from it. Snakes know one another, she'd thought back then. Akua Sahelian was studying the Woe carefully, forging herself into a person they would allow themselves to like, but she'd found another had struck long before her. No wonder the shade feared him: she'd found a man whose face was as changeable as her own patiently watching her. And unlike Diabolist, Vivienne doubted there was anyone alive who knew what Hakram Deadhand truly wanted. The orc leaned back into his seat, rolling his shoulders and loudly cracking his neck with a little exhale of pleasure.

"I could eat," Adjutant said. "Probably should, too. Care to join me on a trip to the kitchens?"

"I already ate," she lied without batting an eye. "Though don't let me stop you."

She could think of few things she desired less than watching that maw at work from across a mere table's width.

"You should get something warm in you," the orc advised, rising to his feet. "You look like death warmed over. Indrani forgot some of her tea leaves in her room, I believe. I'll ask a servant to brew you a pot for the council. Formal room?"

Vivienne agreed with a silent nod. She was not surprised he'd noticed her fondness for Indrani's brews. Those dark eyes missed nothing and forgot even less. They parted ways two corridors further down, and she could not leave soon enough.

—

"So the farmers with spears are fighting the refugees with knives," Marshal Juniper grunted. "There's a surprise: there'd a damned reason they were recalled to Summerholm. The sole ingredient in that stew is desperation."

Staff Tribune Bishara had not, in fact, gotten some tea into the Hellhound before she arrived. The orc's particularly fine mood stood testament to this fact. The Marshal of Callow was of the opinion that she should be overseeing the training camps filled with fresh recruits from all across the kingdom, not cooling her heels at the capital, and had spared no pains in expression that opinion to all those even remotely involved. Adjutant was taking her spleen with at least the semblance of good humour. The constant gruff whining scraped Vivienne's nerves raw, especially when paired with the outcome she already knew was in motion.

"The farmers are defending their lands from looters," she sharply replied. "As is their right."

"Starving looters," Deadhand mildly said. "I doubt there's any great enmity or deep scheme to it. They're cold and hungry people, not a marauding army."

"Leave this alone long enough, and that's exactly what it'll turn into," Vivienne warned. "Blood has been spilled. They'll band together for the safety in numbers, and so will Callowans to deal with it. By the turn of the month it will be skirmishes all across the river banks."

"There wouldn't be corpses on the floor if they'd obeyed Foundling's fucking decree," Marshal Juniper bluntly said. "Which was meant to avoid this very outcome, if you'll remember. Last I checked someone had crowned her Queen of Callow. I'm no jurist, but I was under the impression ignoring royal decrees was some kind of treason."

She's Queen of Callow, not some eastern tyrant or a damned greenskin warlord, Vivienne thought, fingers tightening under the table. Our rulers know there's limits to what they can order and reasonably expect to have obeyed. It was a losing fight, as she'd known from the start. Neither of these two bore any love for the land they'd been charged with ruling, or the people born to it.

"There's no need to go quite that far," Adjutant said. "As Thief noted, all their actions save for ignoring the recall are legal under Callowan law. It would be a mistake to paint all that followed with the same brush as that initial mistake."

Deadhand the diplomat, now: half the friend, half the officer. Vivienne had not wanted the responsibility of the regency of Callow and found the burden of it suffocating, but the way the title seemed to be left at the door in their eyes remained galling. The difference between the authority in name and the authority in truth had grown to worry her, not for what it was but for what it might become. Catherine had come to the throne lawlessly, but that lawlessness could not keep lest the kingdom come apart at the seams. A few years of this, she thought, and it will be one law for those with swords and another for those without. If that came to be, the kingdom would burst like an overripe fruit without even need for an invasion. Callowans had long been under Imperial rule, but they were beginning to wake to the old freedoms. Hatred of Procer and Praes was keeping the peace for now, yet how long would that last?

"A decree's a decree," Marshal Juniper growled. "We start making excuses for everyone and this falls apart."

"If you start hanging farmers for defending their land, excuses will be the last of your worries," the thief coldly said. "They are not beast of burdens, to be browbeaten into the latest whim and whipped if they do not immediately obey."

The orc's maw opened, baring a row of sharp fangs. Vivienne forced her shoulders to loosen, affecting nonchalance. Perhaps even contempt. Show her fear, give her an inch, and it will be the end of you, she thought.

"You brought this to us," Adjutant spoke before the other could. "And I'm glad you did. Have you already thought of a measure to remedy the issue?"

Always so smooth, so measured. Too perfect. It made her skin crawl. It was no mystery, why she could not make herself trust this one while she'd come to rely on a Praesi warlock and a vicious pupil of the Lady of the Lake. Masego cannot curb his tongue nor his face and Indrani has never been anything but brutally honest of her indifference to the suffering of others.

"The reason for their recalcitrance to leave is simple," she said. "They will not abandon their possessions to looters but lack any method of bringing them west of they leave. If the means are provided, the matter will be largely settled."

"Not much road in that region, save for the Imperial highway," Marshal Juniper said, eyes narrowing. "You can't just requisition merchant wagons from Summerholm, the axles will break in rough country."

"The garrison of Summerholm has a large complement Legion-issue supply carts," Vivienne said. "All reinforced with good steel."

"No," the Hellhound immediately said. "That's out of the question. I will not allow military equipment to be doled out to farmers. Anyone could seize them."

"I did not mean for them to be spelled away into the countryside miraculously," she replied scathingly. "The garrison would be escorting the carts. The presence of soldiers will put an end to the skirmishes immediately, which should quicken the process enough the risks will be minimal."

"You must have been struck on the ear in Keter," Marshal Juniper growled. "I just gave you your answer. If I'm unwilling to risk carts why would you think I'm willing to risk the force holding the east?"

"It does not hold the east," Vivienne said through gritted teeth, "it watches from tall walls as the entire eastern stretch slowly goes up in blood and flames."

"All it takes is for Aksum or a pack of lesser lordships to see the garrison coming and we could lose the entire garrison to an ambush," the Hellhound said slowly, as if addressing an idiot. "They have mages, Dartwick. They have household troops and devils. The Empire's interior has been left entirely untouched by the Ashuran raids, they're fresh and at full strength. If the garrison force is gone, they can push forward to Summerholm and there's fuck all we can do about it. Half my army is spread across training camps and the rest guarding the Vales. If the enemy move quick enough, we could actually lose Summerholm itself. Walls mean nothing without men on them. All of this, for a pack of bloody farmers who refused a direct order and are now facing the eminently predictable consequences of that refusal."

"Not your army, Hellhound," the thief said softly. "The Army of Callow. Sworn to protect its people, not just turn back invasions or war abroad."

"I know the godsdamned name," Marshal Juniper snarled. "The queen of the place put me in charge of it. You sure you want to have a pissing contest over that? I don't think you'll like the results."

"Enough," Adjutant said.

The voice rang with power. Not quite Speaking, Vivienne thought, yet not too far from it. She'd never mastered that trick herself, but she'd seen Catherine employ it. Felt the ripples shudder through everyone, the air heavy like just before a storm struck. The Black Queen rarely used the tool, but when she did the casual display of power was always terrifying. The way she could snatch the will of anyone in earshot as easy as snapping her fingers, bludgeoning them into obedience with weight and power. Adjutant did not have the talent, and for that Vivienne thanked whatever Gods were listening. It was already terrifying enough to remember he'd been able to fight her before even claiming his Name. Every single conversation they held was tinted by the knowledge that the orc was now in the fullness of his power, capable of tearing apart lords of the fae. He could rip out her throat with but a moment's effort and there was absolutely nothing she could do about it.

"This bickering helps no one," Deadhand said. "Juniper, there is a difference between having a rough tongue and pouring scorn. One is your character. The other has no place in this room, or in conversation with people who outrank you."

The Hellhound lips thinned.

"There was no-"

Adjutant barked out a sentence in Kharsum, too swift and heavily accented for her to understand most of it. The words for oil and fires stood out, and the Marshal of Callow closed her maw with a loud click of fangs. She no longer spoke. Vivienne's eyes remained on the other orc, wondering if she should be expressing her warm gratitude for Deadhand deigning to step in. She found little of that in her heart. The Hellhound's open hostility was nothing new, and this did absolutely nothing to mend it.

"Juniper isn't wrong about the risks," Adjutant finally said, voice calm again.

Another losing fight lost, Vivienne bitterly thought. They did not trust her or her judgement. The worst part of it was that she could see why they did not. What had she achieved with the Jacks that required a Name, that could not be done by another spymistress? How had she proved herself the equal of the infamous Black Queen or dauntless Archer, of an orc celebrated in song or a mage who spat in the eye of lesser gods? She'd been enemies with these two, not so long ago. And even then it'd been William who took the hand now made of bones, while she'd been tossed through a window like a sack of radishes by an offhand spell. I do not belong here, she thought, the warm memories of laughter by the fire seeming so far away. She did not belong at this table, arguing over the fate of her people and losing inch by inch. She'd joined Catherine for more than this, hadn't she? For something beyond Imperial rule, and there was no mistaking what this was. It might be orcs speaking, but the words were the harsh teaching of the War College – the Carrion Lord's own.

Vivienne had not turned her cloak to keep living under the laws of the Black Knight. She tried, even now, to keep her eyes ahead. On the Liesse Accords, that single piece dream that could not be called anything but a good for the world. The lone and lonely light in this ugly sea of grey. Yet the Accord were far on the horizon, and the tide was drowning her now.

"We'll need to amend the operational plan," Adjutant said. "Leave some of the garrison behind and keep what we send out in a tight cluster with the Wild Hunt ready to gate them out if the Empire mobilizes."

Vivienne's heart skipped a beat. It was what she'd wanted to hear. What was his angle, here? What did he gain by this? What does he gain by the Liesse Accords, the old whisper came, that he would champion them so ardently?

"The Hunt is the key to our defence, Hakram," Marshal Juniper said. "If the League or Procer strikes-"

"If," Deadhand repeated. "A possibility. Is it a fact that we're losing people now, Juniper."

"I don't like it," the Hellhound said. "It leaves us fragile."

"You don't have to like it," Adjutant said. "It's an order. Now, Thief. I believe we have a map of the region somewhere around here for proper planning, but I'd like your thoughts on how we should go about the evacuation. I'm leaning towards a circular sweep, but you've people on the ground and I don't."

Vivienne Dartwick leaned forward and spoke, the council stretching for over an hour before the bare bones of a plan had been laid down and a recess was called until they'd all looked into the proper records and logistics.

The patient watchfulness in the orc's eyes never left for a moment, and she never ceased to look for it.

---

DroughtBringer

Go Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

And, believe it or not, I actually have something besides voting!
Wow! That never happens!

There is a Discord Server for the Guide, that isn't overly active, but if more people show up and start participating, it could be!

So come on, create a discord (if you do not already have one) and join the PracticalGuideToEvil Discord Server: <https://discord.gg/w5pnbqP>

(Side effects may include, but are not limited to: being stabbed by a Black Knight, learning you have Zombies inside your soul, dying, coming back to life probably as one of the zombie in your soul, killing Heroes, Villains, and anything else that gets in your way, forcing an Angel to resurrect you, becoming King Arthur by pulling a Sword from the Stone, breaking said sword, claiming part of the mantle of Winter and then messing things up to the point where your body is ripped apart by a Winter's Storm only to be reforged by Winter, destroying both Winter and Summer courts, nearly killing your mentor, fighting off Gandalf (only slightly less cool), and someone who religiously believes in Swords, having your homeland torn apart by war every other minute, dropping lakes on people, meeting with the closest thing to a True Incarnation of Evil on your continent, finding a bunch of Murder Hobo's, and constantly wondering if you've made the right decision)

warriormonk19

Murder Hobos. Yup.

Drd

If I were ever to become a boxer/mma fighter (not bloody likely), I want my nickname to be "The Murder Hobo". I feel like it perfectly encapsulates who I am, my true essence. :]

RanVor

Well, the Drow aren't exactly "hobos"...

Mental Mouse

"Murder hobos" is the nickname for the classic adventuring party of D&D and the many videogames patterned after it. Running around killing random people and wildlife, taking anything not nailed down, never having consequences for their actions....

RanVor

I know what a murderhobo is, thank you very much.

NZPIEFACE

Hey, two chapters?

mgmtheo

The first chapter of every month is accompanied by a bonus chapter. You should totally read them if you're new to the story.

Insanenoodlyguy

If you have been using the table of contents to read chapters, make sure you go to "extra chapters" and see that you didn't miss any.

I read this for a quarter of a year before I realized that ranger had an interlude I'd missed.

NZPIEFACE

Oh wow man, thanks. Can you tell me which one is the one for ranger? I only remember reading one for Archer a while back.

erraticerrata

First update of the month, and so Extra Chapter. Third and last of the Fatalism chapters, from Cordelia Hasenbach's POV. Can be found in the Extra Chapters tab, as usual.

stevenneiman

Cool to see Vivienne's perspective for once. I don't recall if we've ever had a POV chapter from her, but it was interesting seeing how much self-loathing she feels stemming from being the only non-combat member of the Woe. I notice how she carefully omitted things like the fact that she was instrumental to defeating Summer.

I also kinda feel bad for her poor relationship with Hakram, given that in some ways they're very similar. The only real difference is that he wants to help Cat as long as she spits in the eyes of the high and mighty and she wants to help Cat as long as she helps Callow in turn. It might be because we spend most of our time in the POV of the only character he really bares his whole self to, but I actually think he seems like a very straightforward and simple character. He's defined by the willingness to do whatever Cat needs him to do, whether that means brutally slaughtering enemies on the field, scaring the shit out of Vivienne, or doing paperwork 23 hours a day for weeks.

Mental Mouse

Also, Viv may be somewhat racist (while not willing to admit it), and is certainly traumatized from when Hakram threatened her.

Cpt. Obvious

It isn't that strange really. There she was, named and basically untouchable by anyone mortal. Able to walk up to someone standing alone in the middle of a plaza, pick their pockets and still remain unseen. Able to jump from a tower to land as softly as a cat and walk away unscathed. She could have used her abilities to slip a knife into the neck of anyone just as easily as she stole their valuables. Even dismissing her stealth she's stronger, faster and tougher than any purely mortal human, and still this unnamed orc handled her with about as much ease as a bulldog tearing into its favorite chew toys.

Since then he has not only been named but she's also seen him tear out enemies' throats with his teeth. She's seen him eat the flesh of enemies, delighting in the taste. Enemies just like she was not so long ago. And she realizes that she's alive because he didn't choose to eat her back then when he still lacked a name.

And now she's supposed to be his friend? She's supposed to trust this orc who's gone toe to toe with a demon battling it with shield and axe?

It's no wonder she's terrified of him. The fact that he seems to be the least insane of them is particularly disconcerting.

She would probably have an easier time handling him if he was more, orcish. If he was more of a brute she would have felt she was in control. But instead he's calm and collected, showing more restraint than just about anyone else she's regularly involved with. And he is sharp, terrifyingly so. If there's anything that scares her more than an orc that would have no problem killing her at a whim, who would have no qualms about tearing her arm off and suck the flesh of her fingers before her eyes, it's that same orc playing nice. She can't help but wonder what plans are taking shape in that green head. And every instinct is screaming that it can't end well.

soonnandnaanssoon

The zwischenzug (German: pronounced ['tʃvɪfən,tʃu:k] "intermediate move") is a chess tactic in which a player, instead of playing the expected move (commonly a recapture), first interposes another move posing an immediate threat that the opponent must answer, and only then plays the expected move (Hooper & Whyld 1992:460) (Golombek 1977:354). It is a move that has a high degree of "initiative". Ideally, the zwischenzug changes the situation to the player's advantage, such as by gaining material or avoiding what would otherwise be a strong continuation for the opponent.

<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zwischenzug>

-From Wikipedia, the true Guide to the Goods and Evils of Humanity.

DroughtBringer

You said what I was going to say! I literally had the exact same part copied to be able to post...

Although your revelation about Wikipedia greatly surpassed anything I could have posted.

NZPIEFACE

So this is to mirror the queen's gambit from the previous interlude?

Raved Thrad

Knowing Catherine, I'm fully expecting that at some point we'll have a chapter named "Flipping The Board." 🤪

NZPIEFACE

I'm expecting her to flip the whole table, not just the board.

Death Knight

And make it burn green.

Dainsleif

Stab the board, flip the table, burn the table with greek fi- i mean goblin fire, ressurect and Take the table. Cat's MO.

Miles

Looks like the theme for this arc is chess

NZPIEFACE

And the moment when Cat comes back... "Castling"

Andrei

So I was getting a feeling but seeing the name of the chapter explain confirmed it for me: Thief is the target of the Pilgrims redemption story. I expect he will appear to her at some point in the future and convince her that this whole evil thing isn't good for her or callow and she will betray Cat.

This betrayal will be one more step our dear Cat takes as she's climbing The Tower.

Screwfloss

I prefer the term intermezzo in chess contexts – it's immediately clear what it means – but obviously Zwischenzug makes a better chapter title 😊

Euodiachloris

Depends. I did German for A-level and wasn't so hot at Music, so..... ;P

DroughtBringer

I am expecting another few chess-based chapters about what's going on abroad, probably something from the Empire, something from Masego, and then something from Hakram, although Masego/Empire could be combined or just focus on Masego, and Hakram may have been covered here.

There will also probably be something on Tyrant/Hierarchy, and, if we're lucky, the Bard.

I do believe that it is too early for anything on The Dead King. Probably 2 or 3 more chapters, in all, so the rest of this week is probably some more interludes before we hit the main story again, and see the storm that Cat just unsealed.

Javvies

Thief doubts herself. That's ... realistic, but I'm not sure what options she has for the self-improvement/"catching up" she wants. Also, Hakram could manhandle you before he got his Name because he's big, strong, and a trained and capable combatant. You aren't really any of those, Viv.

Also, Hakram's wants? They're limited with his Name – his wants are linked to what Cat wants.

Cat would've wanted the farmers helped to move, thus Hakram wants to figure out how to best do so.

NZPIEFACE

She's worried about herself in a more narrative sense.

She's no longer of much importance as a Thief, so what exactly does that make her?

IDKWhoitis

Following the logic she states, a spy mistress (lower case intentional).

And honestly, I'm kinda on board for this transition if it does happen, she herself has started doubting herself to a fatalistic degree. I'm also on board for Akua getting a seat at the table, as horrifying as that sounds.

Miles

She has the freaking sun in her storage space. What could she possibly have to catch up on?

Stormblessed

Yeah Thief is both way overestimating and way underestimating Adjutant at the same time. His wants aren't very complicated. He's loyal to Cat in almost every sense of the word. If his goals end up being some kind of other plot in a way that goes against Cat I'd be more than shocked. Obviously he can have individual motivations, but betraying Cat just seems off the table narratively (except maybe if mind magic could somehow be involved, but it still feel like a bad story).

That being said, the viewpoint of Hakram's capabilities from Viv's perspective lay is incredibly interesting.

wirelessgrapes

His role as Adjutant is to make the wishes of Cat reality. He translates her desires into script and ink.

the verbiage ecstatic

Keep in mind, though, we don't really know his role. He's the first of his Name, and we've never gotten the story of what "Adjutant" symbolizes for Orc-kind. Roles can have multiple sides, and we've seen one facet of it, but do we know how it ultimately evolves? Vivienne's perspective is interesting, because she's calling out something that we should have seen: Hakram is a little *too* perfect as a crutch for Cat. In a world that runs on narratives, that's a tad suspicious...

RanVor

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/HypercompetentSidekick>

There you go.

Dancer

That's a heroic role. Hakram is a Villain.

Cat may be underestimating him.

RanVor

You didn't read very carefully, did you? It's actually more of a villainous role since heroes tend to be competent enough not to need those.

Someguy

This plan is a half-assed one bound to raise a Name if some Callowan farm boy/girl go through the portals into Arcadia and gets lost/kidnapped. Of course such stories usually end with the boy/girl being toyed with by the fae for eternity but coming out with a magic sword to slay Evil is also likely.

RanVor

What? The Fae portals are the emergency plan in case of an ambush. The regular plan is to get people's stuff to Summerholm by mundane measures.

Someguy

No plan survives contact with the enemy. Worse, no plan survives contact with stupid, stubborn people who are part of an "escort mission".

Anon

Huh. I don't recall Vivienne ever displaying so much....open fear of Hakram before, even in her own memories/past interludes.

I know she'd been quite wary of him, but this seems another level entirely.

I do like how she either doesn't 'get'/recognize Hakram's seeing the Warlord in Catherine, and/or is ignoring the possibility that Cat means different things to different people – and in every case, possible of bringing about change to the world.

I'm also a bit....curious on her feeling like she hasn't accomplished anything? She stole the sun, helped save Cat from Akua, was useful in Keter, etc....I know she's not as combat-focused, and in the time of war she currently finds herself in, thief isn't as useful as Adjutant or even Scribe would be, but it feels like she's suddenly....undergoing a bout of depression, almost?

I can certainly see it happening, mind, but it feels...perhaps a bit sudden/out of the blue?

Otherwise, were I to guess on her Name making her still get tired/grow hair, it's part of being a thief – were she to be 'stuck' in time, she might eventually end up too recognizable. (Or alternatively, potentially a sign she's not on the 'ageless' aspect that the more evil-aligned characters have)

Kingbob

I think this is the Heaven's putting the finger to the scales. the Hero turned repenting and comes back to the light is a dangerous story when you can make it work.

IDKWhoitis

She seems pretty depressed, as she can only see herself doing wrong, having done wrong, and probably only going to commit more wrong in the future. Her losing her figure and losing her "spark" is bound have a cascading effect if she doesn't succeed at some pivot.

Jane

Depression sounds exactly like what's happening, to me – she feels like she's being left behind by the power demonstrated by everyone around her, and is unable to properly understand the value that she brings to the team.

And her current impression of Hakram is probably tinted by her own depression, highlighting all of the negatives. As a spymaster, someone who can be all things to all people is probably one of the most significant threats around – someone she genuinely can't understand the core of, when her entire job is to understand others. That he's capable of crushing her in a heartbeat (and, uh, has, before), and she just had a near-death experience, probably just makes things worse – kind of like PTSD.

Euodiachloris

Agreed on the Name thing. It's hard to blend into the crowd when needed if you've forgotten what it's like to live as one of them, after all. 😞

Azure

I think Thief is missing the obvious signs that she's transitioning to another name. Doesn't it make you weaker till you get your new Aspects, as you're essentially in limbo? It's definitely some kind of information gathering web type name, Spy Mistress seems too obvious.

Also being away from Catherine seems very bad for Thief, and might be linked to her new name in some way. She pretty much gave up there at the end and only Hakram taking her side, saved the day. Something really weird is going on with her mental state without Catherine around. She feels powerless, so she is becoming powerless, like a vicious self fulfilling prophecy. Catherine really needs to return soon, or Thief might lose her name transition to despair.

Miles

You get the new name and as a result get weaker because you don't have your Skills yet, is my understanding.

Miles

But I think she's just having a bad time because she's surrounded by only the co-workers she has issues with.

She might also be a bit racist.

IDKWhoitis

She is racist, but to be fair, Hak did also threaten to snuff her out if she ever got too problematic.

Antoninjohn

It's not all bad after all soon they will receive gold from Cat's deal

Concerned

Ya know, she never actually was called Thief with a capital T except by Hakram this chapter...

Combined with her hair thing and self-doubt, that's not good.

Personally I blame Diabolist, but I do that for everything

MagnaMalusLupus

Not quite, there was one instance I noticed:

>"You don't have to like it," Adjutant said. "It's an order. Now, Thief. I believe we have a map of the region somewhere around here for proper planning..."

BLH989

That was because it was said by a character. Anytime Thief comes up is lower case except when someone is talking.

IDKWhoitis

So if I read the timeline correctly, 2 months have passed since the last movements of Cat?

I foresee a sudden and brutal interruption via the Foundling method that will end these Interludes.

Akin to the chessboard combusting into green flames mid game.

Alivaril

I'm going to agree with the theory of "Above and/or a narrative pushing poor Thief." This just doesn't seem to match with her past behavior; she was sloooowly getting more comfortable with Hakram years ago (she'd drink and eat with him even if she did sleep with one eye open) with this as a major backslide and Vivienne's analysis of Hierophant and Archer both focused on their moral failings. Depression would explain the focus on perceived failures and failings – I can definitely attest to that – but not the abrupt jerks toward Templar Good or paranoia.

This also has interesting implications with Pilgrim's whole "old traits made more acute" accusation – is it that Villainous leaders change those under them, or do they GUARD said individuals from Above's attempts at mind control?

Jane

*sigh*.

See, this is why Cat really, really needed to have a proper talk with Vivienne before she went home – Thief's repeated failures are really starting to wear on her. It's obvious why they didn't have time for that talk, but they really need a heart to heart before it starts to affect her work.

Cat doesn't need another super-Named right now. She has plenty of ways to break an army when she needs to, up to and including dropping the sky on them. What she needs is someone who can act as a competent administrator and who can ferret out Malicia's plots before they lose the other half of their officials. Being able to deal with intrigue has always been Cat's weakest point. What good is having a kingdom if you don't actually have anyone who can run it?

Besides, the name of Thief has never (so far as I know) been some ultimate killer who can take on any challenger – if she wanted that, she should have transitioned to Assassin. That doesn't make Thief any less important, however – stealing the Crusader's supplies forced them to the peace table in a way that a direct confrontation never could have, for instance. And she stole the gosh-darned sun once! She does know how they talk about that, yes?

But when you're standing shoulder-to-shoulder with much flashier legends, I understand how that can leave you feeling inadequate – especially after nearly being killed by a "merely" human mage. That's why Cat really needs to have a talk with her, to help her see her own value.

(Plus, you know, Cat really needs a morality pet given the kind of people she surrounds herself with, but... Well, I doubt pointing that out would help pull Vivienne out of her funk compared to highlighting the value of her accomplishments.)

mavant

Wry Warudo

Two months have passed? Wonder if Cat killed the Sve yet?
Maybe we'll be getting a drow army coming to save Callow in its hour of need

Someguy

I just realized that there's an army that Cat had not tried to raise...the Sentient Tiger Army.

Javvies

Weren't they invisible?

Also, just because they're sentient, that doesn't necessarily mean that they can talk or otherwise readily communicate with people.

Plus, they didn't want to serve their creator – why would they serve Cat? Besides ... I kind of doubt that they have much of a hierarchy or organization – they are, after all, based on solitary big cats.

Wry Warudo

Well, like you said, they are cats after all. They may recognise Cat as one of their named and leader.

Javvies

They're tigers – solitary big cats – not social group cats like lions.

Solitary cats aren't exactly big on the whole "leadership/following others" thing.

Someguy

You conflated the armies. Invisible Army was one project, Sentient Tiger was another, as was the Water Breathing one.

Euodiachloris

I could see any given tiger going all in on the whole "be invisible and be able to breathe both water and air" plan once given enough sentience to understand whole paragraphs of explanation. That's, like, up there with asking "would you like extra catnip with that side of mutton?" or something. XD

RanVor

Two months since the parting, not since Chapter 61.

MagnaMalusLupus

They won't be drow anymore; the Queen of Winter has started recruiting.

TeK

So, did any of you guys noticed that Thief in chapters is no longer starts with a capital T? This is as good as outright admission that she lost her name, coupled with physical changes, and tiredness. And frankly? I can buy it, yeah. Thief has little to do with both her current purpose and burdens, she is spymistress now, not a thief. I wonder to what name she'll transition now, of any at all. Any guesses?

By the way, I honestly adore the way Woe are being flashed out. Never really thought about them, truth be told. Cat, Dead King, WB, Black, Malicia, Cordelia? Yeah sure. Never much pondered how Woe feel though. Took 'em for granted. And EE now have seen fit to remedy this.

First there's Archer's perspective. And it quite simple and direct, really. She was a wild animal and she found a home. I would confess not putting much weight into her assessments of others, just like I won't be putting much in Thief's. She is drawn to Catherine like a wolf, and Woe is her pack. And her adoration to Masego comes from a same place. He has something she respects above all, strength, but he is also safe to be around. In her own words: "dangerous without the edges". For someone raised by the Edge incarnate, Lady Ranger, it is quite the reprieve.

Masego is trickier to parse, partly because he's supposed to be a genius and somewhere on the autistic spectrum, and I am neither of those things. But his explanation, coupled with his Name dream is quite important. He said that he's attracted to Cat quite in the same way the smaller celestial orbs are attracted to large. He does go on mentioning family, so that is where Archer is probably right, kinda. He is drawn to Catherine the same way he is drawn to the centre of mass, but also in the same way you are drawn to a bonfire in the cold night. He was a boy who's seen his world unmade at the age of nine, and that experience defined who he is. The only stable thing he ever had was his family, his fathers and the Calamities proper. And so he is drawn to Cat because she gives him that much needed stability, the starting point, which is what the family is to him. Also, what with Ruin and perceived betrayal of his father, his personality may've yet change. We still don't know what his third aspect as Apprentice was, so we can't even theorise it, but who's willing to bet we shall see it soon?

Hakram's a bitch to handle. Juniper confesses she thought him to be a "coldblood", basically a psychopath. Also Cat says that "what she took for absence, was just an apathy", Vivi's perspective puts a spin on this, yet again. Also, given what we know of him from his own POVs, I'd refrain from calling him such. Also, I do have my doubts now.

Thief is the latest addition and in the way, the oddest. Unlike others of Woe, she is loyal to Collow firstmost. It was very unsettling to learn about her reactions to her repeated defeats. How I just ignored them entirely. In a way, Thief joined out of desperation, not belonging. Unlike others, she already has a home, which she shares with Cat. In a way, that is adding some deeper connection between them that she lacks with others. Masego sees home in his family, Archer in her pack, Hakram, I suppose sees it like a tribe just like Juniper, although his loyalty is a great deal more personal. Thief and in a way, Cat, does not seek a home, because she already has it. And that estranges her from orcs, for she does not see herself as part of their tribe.

On a side note, we got Masego with autism, Hakram with psychopathy, Vivienne with depression. The pattern is concerning, although I've yet to figure what kind of crazy is Archer.

TeK

Godsdammit, I am bad English 😞

Raved Thrad

I looked back through the text, and you're right. It's an intriguing point, which makes me wonder if we're about to see Vivienne transition into a new Name.

Wry Warudo

For all we know Thief may not actually be part of the Woe. Iirc, the queen only explicitly mentioned Cat and referred to Masego as being part of the five. Considering how Summer was also at odds with Diabolist at the time, this may make her a candidate, since she's technically a member of their band now.

NZPIEFACE

The Woe should be filled with unaging villains fit to terrorize the lands for decades to come.

And the thief is exactly none of that.

Gunslinger

Damn that's a good catch. I fear that she's losing her name rather than outright transitioning into a new one.

Rey d`Tutto

Archer could be Mania.

Kaleih

I'm looking forward to seeing Vivienne transition hopefully.

Maybe Vicegerent to create a grey Chancellor role. Or possibly Vicereine/Viceroy/Viceregent since she is wealthy, acts as regent, and may end up in a wife type role (which is a common meaning for Vicereine, though all three words can be synonyms) and Vice twine just goes nicely with the name Vivienne.

Or Maybe Guildmistress if she takes on all the dark guilds after Ratface's death. She could have the nickname the Grey Lady or the Black Lady to match Cat.

Or it could be that her watching of Cat and Akua leads to some role like Auditor, or possibly Witness if something happens.

There's also the issue of what will happen with all the night Cat may be about to have access to. Will it all go to Ivah? Or will Vivienne end up having some part of that if Ivah ever feels powerful enough to challenge Cat and inevitably gets the night beaten out of him.

I'm so excited to see where Vivienne ends up.

Tobias

I like your train of thought RE: vicereine, but she should just be called Lesser Queen. Then, if she screws up, she can be demoted to Lesser Lesser Queen.

Cthulhu

I'm sorry thief is depressed but she has an awful job right now and isn't suited to it.

I think she's going through what Cat did when she betrayed her Name. It made her weak and depressed.

But I do have one complaint. Seems to me that Thief is going through this betrayal because she isn't using her power to steal. The task in front of her is to transport a whole bunch of shit from the East to safety.

Rather than send an army .... wouldn't it be better for her to go with some fast horses and just steal the stuff at the border?

Sure, it's a bunch, but she has an infinite bag of holding to grab the stuff.

Get the stuff. The people flee to safety with no stuff left to be lost. She saves her people and avoids using the army and gets to feel good about her power.

Why not do This? Or why not have the Dead Hand suggest it? Is she so depressed she can't even think?

Euodiachloris

That, or think of everything she needs to do as a caper. Specifically, keeping her ill-gotten title and role with the hope of future dodgy capers. That, or finding ways to fence part of the responsibility off by conning some useful pigeons into it.

Concerned

They're needed at the capital to make sure the Kingdom doesn't fall apart. She can't run off and steal shit and let the leaderless Jacks die to Malicia.

Cthulhu

But that's why her Name is rebelling. She is acting contrary to its nature.

Ezreon

This got me thinking. What if farmers refused to move even with means to do it, and Thief decided to just appropriate their stuff so they would HAVE to move? And word of it spread and transitioned her.

Luxuria Tenebris

One little thing that i only saw on when i read the chapter again is that Vivienne is never referred to as Thief with the exception of conversation with Adjutant where its more a title than a Name. At all other points it's the thief. She is not Thief in the eyes of the story anymore, she is just the thief.

sophiasmile09

I've never commented before and I've just caught up so it's possible I'm about to say things that have already been said. However, two things:

Thing the first: Does anyone think Cat is ever getting another Name? She's pretty clearly rejected the core concept of Names (dichotomy of good/evil, roles, balance etc) so surely there's just no way in hell that the Universe would "reward" her with another Name? She's sort of transcended them in a way, which is good because it means she's not fettered by them, but bad because she can't benefit from the power a Name brings to the table.

Thing the 2nd: Akua is an Africa Akan word that means "born on a Wednesday." from the rhyme – "Wednesday's child is full of woe". Ya gotta wonder how deep Akua's position with Cat and the Woe is really gonna go... (Akua also means God in Hawaiian so that's interesting too)

Anyway this story is great, I love it and I can't wait to keep up with it forever and ever. #Hakramisbae

Mental Mouse

Cat will probably be the Black Queen – or possibly the Gray Queen.

Dell

I'm curious as to why Juniper outranks Thief who is Regent. Is this a misunderstanding on Vivienne's part where she lacks confidence to order Juniper around? Thief is also a Named in the Woe, just as much as Hakram is, yet Juniper does not afford her the same respect.

I think this also stems from 'racism' on Vivienne's part and Juniper and the non human members have picked up on this and Vivienne's fear of them, so they just don't respect her.

werafdsaew

No, Thief outranks Juniper. But just because Thief outranks Juniper doesn't mean she can actually get Juniper to do what she wants.

Death Knight

So, let's tally up all the badass shit Vivienne has done:

- *Dropped an Armada on the Summer Fae

- *Stole the godsdamned sun from Summer's heaviest hitter, second only to the Queen of Summer herself

- *Has enough potential that the living embodiment of death offered to train her/take her on as an apprentice

Feel free to add more.

She has no reason to feel inadequate or inferior to the other members of the Woe. They each have their designated Role in the group and hers is soft power and indirect but pivotal actions (Cat and the rest would be ashes now if she had not stolen the Sun) as well as Cat's gatekeeper.

The fact that she's going against her Role in the story is likely the reason she is losing her Name and her hair is growing. Her self image is ruined.

Dell

As someone else mentioned she seems to have PTSD from some of the horrific consequences of what's been happening. She got lit on fire and then zapped by lightning. She felt every second of it. It's a huge difference to Catherine who can't feel much of anything anymore, which means she has a serious blind spot to what Vivienne is dealing with. So in Vivienne's mind the pain is overwhelming all the positives she's done in that she feels helpless in comparison to the rest of the Woe who just shrug it off and keep going. I mean even Masego just plucked out his eye like it was nothing. Physical pain in the Woe is not something they even acknowledge.

---

Interlude: Giuoco Pianissimo

"He who trusts no one finds only enemies."
– Callowan saying

Back when he'd been an unblooded boy in the middle of nowhere, Hakram had occasionally indulged in a game of his own devising. Tower-raising, he'd called it. It'd been a simple thing, at first, more an exercise in fantasy than anything deep. Three piles of ten coloured stones, each led by a lord or a lady, and to win one of them must accumulate twenty stones and so raise their tower. For a stone to be taken from a pile, two other lords must agree on the theft and who received the stone. Hakram had amused himself with elaborate intrigues, a web of vivid alliances and betrayals explaining every acquisition. He'd only ever played alone, in the Steppes, and never once finished a game: no rational alliance could ever last long enough for a winner to emerge, after all. His mother had mistaken his hours staring at rocks as an interest in things spiritual, and so urged him to seek apprenticeship under the shaman of the Howling Wolves clan. He lacked the gift of sorcery, true, but it was rare among orcs and not all rites and rituals required the touch. Most shamans could not actually light a torch without flint and tinder, no matter what was pretended in front of outsiders.

He'd had no reason to refuse her, and the half-hearted attempt had taught him some interesting tricks and stories before he was gently sent back to train with the other warrior younglings.

Hakram had not forgot the game, though, and after he was sent to the War College he spared the odd hour for refining it now and then. Rules had been added. Ways to gift a stone as a bribe to break an alliance or make one, promises that could not be broken and even a way to destroy one's own stones to apply pressure. And still, not a game finished. Not even to one's loss, after losing became a technical possibility. Perhaps it was because he was the only player, he'd thought, and so roped a few humans gullible or ignorant enough to believe it was an old orc game into playing with him. He'd lost coin keeping the drinks coming without any success to show for it. Hakram had first met Robber, he still recalled fondly, when the goblin had found him playing while on watch in a war game and called him a fool before baldly stealing an entire pile.

"It's not clever as you think it is," the other cadet had said. "There's no kingdom without borders, my splendidly ugly and dim-witted friend. Why are they alone building their tower?"

And so, over the months that followed, they'd tinkered with the game together. It had become an experiment for the two of them, one of the few thing that could truly keep his interest throughout the dreariness of the War College. First they'd added another pile of ten stones and called it Callow, from which any of the lords and ladies could take a stone. It'd not ended the stalemate, for as soon as one player pulled ahead the other two allied to steal away what he'd stolen. There's a fitting metaphor for this glorious empire of ours, Robber had mused after a particularly well-watered evening. No crab will ever let another leave the bucket before it does. Perhaps the issue was that Callow could be taken from with no consequence, Hakram had decided. And so he'd added one more rule: if no tower was raised in thirty turns, the wrathful Callowans would come and hang all three lords. It'd been a naïve thought, in retrospective, and Robber had been right to mock it. Neither of them ever came across a player who would rather another win than all three lose. It'd been Ratface who'd solved the riddle and given the game its final form.

"Your problem," the Taghreb had opined, "is that you two are too honest. Everything's out in the open, the rules are identical for everyone. It's a shit game for the same reason any halfway decent military strategist will laugh if you tell them shatranj is a good metaphor for war."

Robber had been mortally wounded by the assertion of honesty, and promptly demanded a duel to avenge the impugnable dishonour of goblankind. Ratface's immediate denial had been met by threats he would be first up against the wall when the Great Goblin Conspiracy took action, but even as those two bickered Hakram had amended the rules one last time. Three lords, with uneven piles. One with ten stones, one with eight, one with six. Their stones would remain hidden until they won or lost, and so cold mathematics were diluted with skill at the oldest of Praesi arts: the lie. Even then, most games ended in threefold loss and bitter recriminations. But now and then, oh so rarely, someone managed to raise their tower. Hakram had come into the habit of playing a game at least once a month, afterwards, fascinated by the little details that meant difference between victory and defeat. No one had ever won twice in a row, for example, for one victory meant the specter of suspicion would remain on the victor for a long while.

Aisha, back when she'd still shared a bed with Ratface and so often spent evenings drinking with Rat Company, was the only person he'd ever seen win beginning with six stones. She'd bided her time and kept the game going until everyone was too drunk to remember properly, then bargained her count up until she could steal a victory from the Callow stones. Hakram still thought of those evenings in Ater sometimes, of the reek of smoke and cheap drinks in that winesink they'd whiled away so many hours in. Now Ratface was dead, his grave bought and paid for by the same Empress they'd once served, and he'd spoken to neither Robber nor Aisha in the better part of a year. The game remained, though the last he had played it was years ago. In one of those little ironies of life, it had been the day before he met Catherine. He'd lost along with a roaring-drunk Nauk and an indifferent Pickler.

Callow had taken them all.

He'd put the rules to ink, not long before the Woe left for Keter, and the scroll had been left to wait somewhere in the methodical chaos that was his office ever since. Hakram had mused of writing memoirs, once in a while, as he knew Juniper and Aisha were doing. Juniper's were more commentary and chronicle of these Uncivil Wars, as the campaigns from the Liesse Rebellion onwards were beginning to be called by scholars, but then she'd always disdained everything but the military side of matters. There were days Adjutant thought he owed to all that came after him to pen a history of what was taking shape here that was true to the beliefs of the few making the decisions. On others he thought, rather ruefully, that such a work would be the very same kind of manuscript his duties would require him to order burned as a threat to the kingdom's peace. And so instead he found himself, now that he'd been able to wrestle an hour away from his work, penning a short monograph on the subject of tower-raising that was about both much more and much less.

The foundation of the game, he'd written, is the manipulation of incomplete knowledge. It is possible to win with only loose grip of the arithmetic, so long as one's understanding of their opponents runs contrastingly deep.

He'd come to see much through that lens in the last few years. It was not, he thought, an unfair way to sum up the way the fractious nations of Calernia were behaving. The rising towers differed in nature and appearance, the stones were made of a hundred different abstract details, but the underlying exchanges obeyed the same overarching rule: for someone to measurably benefit, someone else must lose. Cordelia Hasenbach had birthed the Tenth Crusade by promising benefits to all its participants, leaving unspoken that those benefits would have to be taken from Callow and Praes. Having failed to achieve that plunder, her Grand Alliance was now clawing at itself over their own stones. The Empire remained overlord of Callow only so long as it provided protection by other marauding powers who would take from it. Yet prominent elements of Praes had acted in a hostile manner at Second Liesse, with the tacit allowance of the Empress, and so Callow had pressed for independence. He still believed Malicia had made a reasonable decision in some ways, for if she had succeeded in securing the Diabolist's doomsday weapon she would have made herself too costly a target to plunder.

From that position, all that would have been required of her was to wait for the lack of benefits to break apart the Grand Alliance.

And yet she'd failed, for she had not accounted for the fact that a game was a game and people were people. One could be philosophically correct while being wrong in practice, as she had been when she'd estimated neither the Black Knight nor Catherine would turn on her after the Doom of Liesse. He and Catherine had fallen for the same mistake, Hakram thought, when they'd predicted that military defeats within certain bounds would both force and allow the First Prince to come to the negotiating table. We did not account for the heroes, he thought. We did not account for the priests and the Heavens and the hand behind the hands. And so the desperate alliances that were the heart of tower-raising had followed, reaching out for the bargain offered by Keter for counterbalance against Proceran intransigence. Which had failed, for the Empress had much less to lose and so could afford to offer better terms. And so Catherine left for the Everdark, intent on making miracle out of misfortune. She might succeed. She was, after all, never more dangerous than when no one believed she could possibly triumph. Or she might not.

If that were the case, what he and Vivienne Dartwick were building in Callow would be the sum total of their assets. He was forced to act with incomplete knowledge, and that ignorance dictated harsh terms: if this was all there was, defeat here of any kind was unacceptable. When Catherine returned, this machine must be well-oiled with every cog in a pristine state. Hakram set aside his quill, suddenly having lost taste for further writing. He blew dry the ink on the mostly-empty parchment and rolled it up before sliding it into a sheath. It would keep. There were matters that might not, Thief most immediate among them. The orc draped cloths over the bottled sprites that cast the light in his office, knowing it would lull them to sleep and so offer brighter glow when he returned. Not common knowledge, that. It was a secret Masego had nonchalantly shared, forgetting as he always did that there were perhaps ten individuals more learned than him on all of Calernia and that hundreds would cheerfully commit murder just to have a look at his most casual set of notes.

There was a guard waiting outside the door, one of his own. Sergeant Audun, who was broad and covered with tattoos like all adults of the Frost Tread clan. He had the almost-black skin common in the furthest reaches of the Lesser Steppes, where the isolation had prevented the old bloodlines and customs from thinning.

"Sergeant," Hakram greeted him in Kharsum. "Where is she?"

"Sir," Audun acknowledged, keeping his lips tight over his fangs in deference. "Last report had her headed for the Docks. As per orders, we did not tail her out of the palace."

Adjutant nodded and clapped his shoulder before heading out. Tordis kept suggesting that they send a few goblins out to shadow Thief whenever she went into the city, officially to make her easier to reach in case there was sudden council to be had. There was no point to even trying, in Hakram's eyes: in a city, Thief was impossible to find unless she wanted to be found. Assigning her a shadow she would inevitably catch on to would only be tossing another ingredient in what was already turning out to be a dangerous brew. The orc knew the tavern that was her favourite haunt, deep in Guild of Thieves territory, and even if she was not already there she'd hear of his coming long before he got there. Long enough that she'd show up to meet with him, if she was so inclined, though of that there was no guarantee. With Catherine away the pretence of amity had given its death rattle. He would still go. At worse, he'd have a pint of terrible beer and leave one of her Jacks a message before returning to the palace. Not the way he would have preferred to spend what promised to be his only resftul hour for the next few days, but preferences were always the first thing headed for the altar when the going got hard.

He declined an escort when heading out. Malicia's assassins had already emptied their quiver, and there would be few who could truly be a threat to him even if she had not. He almost wished they would try him, in truth. Laure was swimming with Jacks, and further hacking away at the Empire's roster of hired killers would be a long-term boon. He drew gazes when passing through the Whitestone, as much from legionaries as from the locals. Anyone able to afford one of the district's mansions would know him by name and description, if not necessarily by sight. Further into the city, though, the nature of the gazes changed. Hakram was not known well enough that Callowans would tell him apart from other orcs by sight, not with gloves covering his hands and his burnt plate still in the palace. Unlike Catherine and Indrani, whose Names were an invisible bonfire drawing the eye wherever they stood, his own was a muted thing. Noticeable enough, when it left the sheath, but it had not. The reception he got was, to his perpetual surprise, rather cordial. Now that the last legions in the kingdom had been folded into the Army of Callow, even greenskins who had never served in the Fifteenth found the locals had thawed to their presence.

The same could not be said for Soninke and Taghreb. The freshly-promoted Legate Abigail had passed down the order that all Wasteland legionaries on leave must carry clear indicating mark of their service in the Army of Callow, which had prevented angry killings in the streets after Malicia massacred a third of the royal court, but a handful of altercations had forced her to go even further and order such legionaries to move only in tents and avoid certain parts of the capital entirely. Enterprising Callowan merchants had made a killing by setting up stalls of drinks and food near the army's camps, allowing the soldiers a taste of the luxuries without risking their neck. The orc's lips split in amusement, baring the slightest hint of fangs. It was a rare thing for his kind to be more popular in these parts than humans, even humans from the Wasteland. He passed by a cart near the edge of Mathilda's District – known as the Usurper's Quarter to the locals – and found his steps slowing when he caught scent of the grilled rabbit skewers on it.

It was a ramshackle thing, not even painted as such Callowan carts usually were, and he absent-mindedly noted it was unlikely its owner had paid the proper dues to whatever guild held the rights to sales on these streets. The dark-haired man running it had done well regardless, he thought, for two thirds of the cart were empty and the grease stains left behind made it clear it'd not begun the day that way. Hakram made his way to the skewers and reached for the handful of coins he carried, mostly coppers. The dark-haired man smiled.

"Afternoon. You Legion?" he asked, his Liessen accent thick.

Refugee, most likely, the orc decided. Good to see some of them were making their way without needing to rely on the grain handouts.

"Fifteenth," Hakram agreed. "Since the raising. How much for one?"

The man hesitated, and there was movement behind the cart. The orc's head cocked to the side as a little boy no older than nine popped out, fair-haired and not resembling the other human in the slightest.

"Hi," the little creature grinned.

Meat, the lizard voice in the back of his head said. Soft, small, bones easy to crack and get at the marrow. He ignored it, as all orcs who left the Steppes were taught to. He'd learned well enough there was only silence around his comrades, but it was always harder with strangers. His people had been given rules by the Black Knight and then his successor, and they were good rules. The kind that ran against instinct but helped you grow further. You can eat foes, you can eat the dead, but you must not touch any other. Still, he knew the impulse would never entirely go away. The rules were taught, but the impulse came with the blood. Orcs had to learn discipline, he thought, make it as much a part of them as the blood. Or they would forever remain beasts of the steppes, good only for death dealt and received.

"Hello," Hakram replied gently, keeping his fangs behind his lips.

"Albert, get back behind the cart," the man sighed.

"But it's boring," the boy whined.

He was unceremoniously dragged back by his collar and the cart-owner offered the orc an apologetic glance. He picked out a skewer and handed it.

"On the house," he said. "They've been out for a while anyway."

Hakram inclined his head in thanks.

"Much appreciated," he said, thick gloved fingers closing around the wooden stick holding the bits of meat together.

"My husband went to enroll last month," the Liessen admitted. "Ended up sent to the training camp near Ankou."

"General Hune's," the orc said. "He'll do well there, especially if he can read and write. There's a pressing need for officers."

"We could use the pay," the man ruefully said. "The only decent rents in this city are Dockside, and even with the Guild of Thieves keeping order that's no place to raise a child."

"You seem to be doing well enough," Hakram said, eyes lingering on the cart before withdrawing.

He popped a bit of savoury meat into his mouth, swallowing it without chewing. Ah, nothing but salt and rabbit. He did enjoy Callowan cooking. Unlike the Praesi they didn't drown every dish with spices, you could still taste the meat.

"No telling how long that'll last," the Liessen replied. "Word is Legate Abigail, bless her soul, told the guilds to take it easy on the streets for a while. The guards don't enforce permits as heavily as they used to. But now the Lord Adjutant's back in the capital, so it'll be out of her hands. No one's sure when the hammer will come down."

"I've noticed she's popular in these parts," Hakram said, mildly amused at receiving a confession concerning himself.

"She got Laure through the troubles after the Night of Knives," the merchant said. "And without swords coming out or riots wrecking half the city. Mind you, I'm not cussing out the army. They do good work, and I saw in the camps down south how bad it might get if they didn't keep the peace. But there's something reassuring about having one of ours in charge, you know?"

"Lady Thief holds the regency in the queen's absence," the orc pointed out.

The man rolled his eyes.

"You don't spend much time in taverns, do you?" he said. "The old crown it got split in two, one part green and the other one too. It's not a mystery who runs the kingdom with the Black Queen gone abroad to scare the shit out of Procer."

It was not to Hakram. Giving Vivienne the regency had been, from the beginning and Catherine's open admission, been a way to avoid the perception greenskins now ruled Callow. Thief did not want the duties, and Adjutant honestly did not believe she would fare well bearing their burden. That the man in the street knew it as well, however, was not a pleasant surprise. We keep underestimating these people, he thought. Malicia and Hasenbach have, to their ugly surprise, but we do as well and we should know better.

"She'll be back," the orc said, still too taken aback to muster better response.

"Aye, she will," the Liessen said. "And maybe she'll drop a lake on the western borders, this time. Let them try to invade across that."

"We can only hope," Hakram drily said.

"Ah, but I shouldn't blabber," the man said. "Don't let me keep you. It tastes best while still warm."

"Thanks again," Adjutant said, inclining his head.

He stepped back onto the street, already mentally adding another entry to his never-ending tally. There might be others like this one, who'd trade on the streets instead of eating on the crown's dime if they could. Getting the guilds to waive their dues even as a temporary measure would be like ripping out teeth, and sure to unsettle a city still uneasy, but there were ways around it. The House of Light in Laure had full coffers, according to the Jacks, having entirely recovered from their scarce years under Imperial rule. If they could be talked into paying the dues for merchants as an act of strategic charity, the guilds might even lower their demanded cut out of deference for the priests. Yet another council would be required, he thought tiredly, and with people prone to the kind of squabbling that would make Thief and Juniper seem like beloved sisters. The boy popped out to wave him goodbye and Hakram waved back, waiting until he was out of sight to gobble half the skewer and lick his chops. His good mood did not last, for even as he chewed he was forced to admit the Thief situation was worse than he'd previously believed. If a wander down the streets had him hearing the rumour, how often would the spymistress of Callow have heard it?

Even a small wound could go bad, if salt kept being rubbed into it, and this one was not small. Pride always bit the hardest and Vivienne Dartwick had no lack of that. Sundown was beginning when Hakram finally reached the signless tavern that was Thief's favourite sink, and he'd been feeling eyes on the back of his head for at least half an hour. The Jacks had picked him out and their mistress would have been informed of his coming arrival. She was waiting inside when he entered, tucked away in a little alcove with a tankard in hand and her feet propped up on a chair. As always, she forced herself to not look at his bone hand – even covered – so blatantly she might as well have been staring. The orc lumbered over slowly, making sure to keep the skeletal limb always in her field of sight and moving slowly. He'd noticed it got even worse, when he hid it away from her eyes.

"Adjutant," Thief drawled. "Heard you were looking for me."

He sat down, the wooden frame creaking under him, and nodded.

"I was. Let's have a talk, you and I," Hakram gravelled. "An honest one, for once."

The flare of wariness she poorly hid was not auspicious beginning, but he had no choice. It could not be put off any longer. He needed to be sure they were raising the same tower, for decisions had to be made.

In the game, as in all things, it was always better to be the betrayer than the betrayed.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!

Also, if you missed it last chapter, there is a Discord server up and running to discuss the Guide!

<https://discord.gg/w5pnbqP>

Nothing creative today, gonna be as bad as Cat at persuasion... do it or I'll stab you? Or maybe I'll just stab you and then do it for you.

Whatever works.

Javvies

Hmmm. Hakram's game sounds interesting. I wonder if there's a full set of rules for it? I'd play it.

Ouch. Thief being the Regent isn't working out as hoped. That could go poorly.

Miles

Guess that's a better ending than Viv departing.

Still it took 2 sentences to go from let's be honest to thinking about betrayal

Morgenstern

I don't think the thought about betrayal was about Thief. It was about a united front against the other players on the board, imho... about their bunch betraying the others (Procer, Malicia, etc.) first next time instead of the other way round.

But who knows, I might be totally wrong. I'd be rather disappointed as a reader if Hakram turned out to be *that way*, though.

RanVor

I personally read it this way: Hakram noticed Vivienne's suspicious behavior and needs to know what game she's playing. If it turns out she intends to betray Cat, he's going to strike first, eliminating her before she has a chance to turn against the Woe.

For Vivi's sake, I hope she's not plotting betrayal.

taliesinskye

I read the comment as 'if Thief is going to betray Cat because she'll eventually be unable to tolerate the current situation any longer then Hakram needs to know about it so he can act first'. You could be right, though.

ArkCthuul

Well, I was waiting for harkam to die the whole chapter. Just seemed like one of those, especially as soon as he got the rabbit...

Barthumphries

I don't think Hakram was planning on betraying Viv. I think he recognized the mental anguish she was feeling at having the title but not the authority that went with it, and planning on offering concessions or whatever to lessen the chance of her betraying him.

And if the concessions, etc., didn't go well, then like Batman (who has plans for how to defeat every other superhero in case they go rogue) he has a plan.

naturalnuke

I am also interested in a full set of rules, this sounds like something I can get behind.

jonnnney

Not working as hoped but probably close to how it was expected. Thieves are only good at ruling other thieves and their skill at that is middling at best. I've a feeling that Abigail has another promotion in her future. With getting the rioters too drunk to actually riot she has certainly embraced the Woe's Modus Operandi of "This is just stupid enough to work". She seems like a good mix of Catherine's no nonsense approach to governance and Indrani's goal to seek personal pleasure from anything that moves. Plus she had received her position through blind luck and her own effort rather than the auspices of above or below. She might be just the person to forge a new story for Callow.

Javvies

Ehhhh ... it seems that Thief isn't even working as a figurehead Regent – this random street food vendor knows that Thief isn't actually doing the job of Regent, Hakram is, and believe that Thief has neither control nor influence on his decisions.

Thief is supposed to be the figurehead so that Hakram doing most of the work of running/ruling gets overlooked, ignored etc., by regular Callowans. That's not what's happening, and that's potentially a serious problem.

Rook

I don't think she's supposed to be only a figurehead. The other half was out of practicality since cloak and dagger work is not one of Adjutant's strengths and he would buckle under the weight of the additional burden if he tried. It was supposed to be division of labor from the start.

Thing is if the Callowans think Adjutant is in charge but actually end up not giving a shit, it's all good anyway. The issue is making sure this doesn't become a crack between Hakram and Vivienne, since it's probably pouring salt in the wound as far as her pride is concerned

Javvies

I think you're misunderstanding, Thief was supposed to be part figurehead, part spymistress, while Hakram did most everything else.

Thief is formally the Regent, but the problem isn't that Hakram's doing most of the work, it's that the average Callowan doesn't think that Thief being Regent actually means anything.

The "crown was split in two, one part green and the other one too".

Rook

The reason a figurehead was thought to be needed is potential discontent among callowans if there's to be too much non-callowan influence in the higher echelons of rule.

But if said greenskins like adjutant end up being accepted by Callowans as one of them, there isn't actually a need to have a figurehead. The concern disappears whether people know the strings are held by adjutant or not.

This is Callow, not Procer. The key is whatever keeps the populace free and happy, not legalities and customs.

sengachi

If you're interested in similar games, do some googling around game theory. You can find some really fascinating games like this one.

Rup

..this game might even have a future in the real world..

Cthulhu

Please don't kill Thief, Adjutant.

Rook

I feel like he's getting ready to have Callow strike first, rather than always being the one being struck. Not that he's considering chopping Vivienne in half.

I mean if he's going to turn his attention outwards, it only makes sense to make sure Thief's knives are covering his back, rather than being pointed at it.

NZPIEFACE

He doesn't care as long as it's not cutting Catherine's back.

taliesinskye

Hopefully he'll resolve this situation by finding a way for Vivian to reclaim some authority so that she is not Regent in name only. That would forestall her feeling like the situation is intolerable and keep her on-side.

MetruX

I got the feelin that Vivi is loosing herself as Thief, and has been a while several characters, her included, are worried for her lack of combat potential. My guess is she is going to change Names soon, or die. I hope for the first.

DroughtBringer

Very interesting. Although I greatly wish to return to Cat raising an army of Winter, it seems like that is a ways off. We probably have the conclusion to the Hakram-Vivi trilogy next, then something with Masego, although it could skip over Masego for now, and just return to Cat next Monday. Whatever happens, it was a good chapter, and an interesting look at Hakram's train of thought, and what all he has been doing.

soonnanandnaanssoon

"Giuoco Pianissimo (Italian: "Very Quiet Game", a name given by Adolf Anderssen).[12]

White aims for a slow buildup deferring the push to d4 until it can be prepared. By avoiding an immediate confrontation in the centre White prevents the early release of tension through exchanges and enters a positional maneuvering game."

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Giuoco\_Piano#Giuoco\_Pianissimo
-Wikipedia

DroughtBringer

Again?!

This time I didn't even get to refresh the page to be able to see that you had posted it!

Nicely done.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Next week I'll be a bit busier at this hour so if the chess chapters continue till next week, perhaps you could take over? I should be able to do it this Friday as well.

DroughtBringer

Giuoco Pianissimo is a slower opening in chess, that builds towards the mid game, and, hopefully, snowballs you into the late game.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Giuoco\_Piano#Giuoco\_Pianissimo

Screwfloss

I hadn't heard of the Giuoco Pianissimo before – I like to play the English opening, not the Italian ♟ ♠♠♠♠ – but it's sound, unlike the more commonly known but obsolete Giuoco Piano.

So basically, I've just spent like 30 minutes studying chess lines that I'll probably never play (as black I always answer 1. e4 with c5 (Sicilian defense), so I'll never see the black side of it either.

In conclusion, I'm a big fan of relating plot events to chess concepts!

IDKWhoitis

I don't think Hakram will want to kill Thief, and she can just keep the spy mistress job instead, but Viv's paranoia may not allow Hakram to do what he would prefer...

soonnanandnaanssoon

On behalf of the usual people who are running a wee bit late today,

Go Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

BryceWilliam

I really want a copy of the rules to this game. it sounds like it be a blast.

magesbe

Seeing Hakram's PoV, it's clear just how much Vivienne's fear... no, terror, of him warps her perception of Hakram. She's so scared in general it's sad; she's scared that she's worthless compared to the other members of Woe, she's scared that nothing she does will make Callow a better place, she's scared that she's losing her Name and what little influence she feels she has (and this perception of her being a puppet regent isn't helping), and she scared of Hakram.

She needs to shape up. I wouldn't be surprised if that's why she might be losing her connection to her name. Remember, it's been said that conviction is the source of Named power, and she has very little conviction left.

Jane

On the other hand, seeing things from Hakram's point of view really reinforced to me why Vivienne's so afraid of him. We didn't see a single feeling from him, just a detached assessment of how best to fulfill his duty.

He went to deal with Thief, but didn't have any feelings of anger or concern, or even exasperation – just dealing with it as though it were any other problem, despite the fact that he's still closer to her now than he currently is with any of his old friends. He didn't have any real feelings on how the conflict between Juniper and Thief was undermining the kingdom, or feel like either of them were in the right – just noted how that it was undermining the kingdom and affecting Thief's stability, and would need to be dealt with. He paid more thought to how he might use the church to help the refugee problem than he did his own >personal reactions to issues that normal people would have feelings about.

To someone who's near-exclusive business is in managing people, someone like Hakram must be distinctly unsettling, as he comes across as missing some very key elements of what makes a person a person instead of a tool.

And, of course, he made a point of subtly intimidating Thief as they finally met, just as he has in the past. It's little wonder that they have interpersonal issues when he's spent their entire time playing the bad cop to ensure she stays in line, and they've been left alone with each other for months.

She might need to work through her depression and recognize how important she is to the Woe, but her reservations regarding Hakram are entirely reasonable, in my opinion. He might be wholly dedicated to Catherine, but he really would snap Thief's neck without a second thought, if he felt it was for the good of Cat's vision.

SpeckofStardust

"was not a pleasant surprise. We keep underestimating these people, he thought. Malicia and Hasenbach have, to their ugly surprise, but we do as well and we should know better. "She'll be back," the orc said, still too taken aback to muster better response." This was his largest emotional response in the entire chapter.

Ali Khan

"The orc lumbered over slowly, making sure to keep the skeletal limb always in her field of sight and moving slowly. He'd noticed it got even worse, when he hid it away from her eyes."

You didn't read the second sentence did you.

FactualInsanity

If by "he made a point of subtly intimidating Thief" you're referring to the bit about always keeping his hand visible, given that the text says "it was even worse when it [the hand] was out of view", I took that to mean the opposite entirely. I.e. he was making a conscious effort to placate her, rather than intimidate her. If you're referring to something else, please point it out, because I've obviously missed it, or its implications.

Jane

Oh, hells, you're right; my mind must have skipped over that sentence. My apologies to Hakram.

FactualInsanity

I'm sure he will forgive you with characteristic stoicism.

Jane

In my defense, I was getting steadily more uncomfortable with him the entire chapter, and he did end the chapter by speaking of how it would be better to betray her before she betrayed him :p .

Screwfloss

I didn't get the creepy vibe. What's there to be creeped out by? Even the kid he had the impulse to eat didn't find him creepy!

I do think Hakram is talking about betraying whomever with Vivienne, not betraying Vivienne, though.

FactualInsanity

I thought that too, but after considering what Jane said, I'm no longer as sure whether the ambiguity is not intentional.

Someone is getting betrayed either way and Ol' Hak is just making sure he (and by extension Cat) is not it.

Jane

It's easier to understand when contrasted against the chapters of other characters; when we read a chapter from Cat's perspective as she deals with a problem, we usually feel her frustration and impatience; when we read about Cordelia, we feel her contempt for the short-sightedness of her fellow nobles; when we read about Vivienne, we feel her looming depression, but when we read about Hakram...

That's just not there. To compare it to a more conventional social situation, it's like talking to someone who speaks strictly in monotone, or keeps looking a bit to your side. They don't mean ill, but the whole thing ends up feeling off.

"Creepy" might be the wrong word for it, but it's somewhat unsettling compared to looking at the inner world of the other characters.

Leonardo Black

You should also consider that he is not human, but an orc. When he saw the boy in the stall his first thought was "PREY" or "SOFT MEAT" or something like that. For what I have read here, they might not have strong empathy on their genetic code.

Jane

Sure, but when we see things from Juniper's perspective, we still see emotion from her, whether it's affection for Aisha, irritation toward Thief, or satisfaction in commanding her legion.

It's not the lack of empathy that's offputting, but rather the lack of emotion in general when dealing with concerns that would normally elicit an emotional response.

daegone823

This is not a normal orc people.

In Hakram's chapter when he gained the name of Adjutant he first spoke about how even as an orc he was considered "weird". He spoke about how other orcs had fervor for battle and in this chapter even as a child only to appease his mother he became a shaman. When he spoke Chat and her practical plan to fix an empire he finally found a place where he fit.

This is why his name is devoted to serving her purpose whereas emotionally he does not care what she does as long as it furthers her goals he will do what he must whether that involves murder or administration work.

I think each of the Woe can be linked to Id, Ego, and Super Ego
Archer, Masego-Id
Vivienne- Ego
Hakram- Super Ego

Isa Lumitus

This chapter made me like Hakram more because of his detached, emotionless outlook. Probably because I find that easy to identify with.

TeK

Wasn't that about how his bone hand was hidden by clothes?

Azure

I agree but how much is his name shaping him into a tool to get the job done? Names may give you power but they also trap you into a set mindset of how to react and respond. The Fae epitomise that as their nature literally forces them to embody their names. Catherine gets a taste of how much Winter warps her mindset every time she draws on it. And Creation is meant to be a watered down reflection of Arcadia, so Named are definitely being altered by the drive of their names. Thief is definitely being effected as she's not fulfilling her role as her Name wants her to, so she's losing her drive and her power. It reminds me a bit of the shards in Worm driving parahumans to conflict. I think Names do the same thing to their bearers.

Morgenstern

>> And, of course, he made a point of subtly intimidating Thief as they finally met, just as he has in the past. <<

By doing what? With his hand you mean? I am very sure you misread the paragraph in that case. He states explicitly that Thief's avoiding to look at this hand – aka her FEAR – got WORSE when he tried to hide it from her – implicitly to make her more comfortable!. He is acting like anyone who does NOT want to intimidate when near someone that is totally, reasonlessly fearful – trying to project as little aggression as they can. Thus the slowly, deliberately always keeping potential "weapons" in view for the other person – to show them you do NOT mean to attack them. If they can always keep it in sight, they feel better prepared, because they would be able to see the blow coming, IF some were coming. He's doing all he can to NOT intimidate her currently. He just has no better way and the best he's got is clearly not working as much as he'd want it to. Because the other person is simply irrationally phobic.

Morgenstern

(Yeah, I know, not quite as irriational in this case, after the intimidation when she first joined.. but still. Way over the top, really...)

Morgenstern

Akh. Sorry. Somehow I did not see the response that pointed out exactly that already... =/

Yotz

Well, there is one option to mitigate the rot, it seems. Legat Abigail may be moved from the Army of Callow into, say, the Black Guard – an internal paramilitary force reporting to the Queen/Regent only, and made a member of new Council on that premise. That will balance out the power equilibrium at the top, and will allow Hellhound to do her work without wasting her time on refugee situation. Also, can be presented as Callowans watching out for Callowans, and so on.

I wonder, if Viv would find her groove, though – ultimately it all balances on her being able to prove her worth not only to herself, but to her people also.

Ah, well – we shall see soon enough.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Adding thievery as part of things to celebrate in Callowan culture aside from zealously petty time notwithstanding revenge is kinda worrying for a culture though

Isi Arnott-Campbell

That name is already taken by Black's personal retinue, but yeah.

Dainpdf

Could just recreate the Callowan Royal Guard and put her in charge of that, or make her leader of the city watch... But hells, right now I suspect she may end up being Cat's heir.

Antoninjohn

Well racial tensions between Orcs, Goblins and Callowens are nice and stable isn't it wonderful what bonds form when facing common enemies

nick012000

And soon Catherine's going to be adding Drow to the mix, too!

TeK

Sounds like that quote about Procer: "It is said that the founding First Prince spoke of Procer as a great tower, every principality a stone raising it to ever greater heights. I have found the sentiment more poetic than accurate. Procer is no single tower but twenty-three of them, and their owners constantly steal each other's stones to rise at the expense of the others."

Also, I found the game still imperfect. You see, it is not given that you really know how many stones you have. Or how many you will need. And it's not given that everyone does not know how many stones you have. So you need to add the special vessel for stones, that will show you your ammount in no clear numbers (say a random number counted from your number +/- two), and you need to add an ability to spy on the amount of stones your enemy has. And, most importantly, you need to give an ability to TAKE the stones.

"Meat, the lizard voice in the back of his head said." What is that lizard voice?

FactualInsanity

"The lizard brain" is a popular way of referring to instincts in humans ostensibly stemming back from before our ancestors were even mammals. The most primitive, knee-jerk, fight or flight kind of responses, like "weakness -> hunt", "threat/unknown -> destroy", etc.

I guess erraticerrata just wholesale transplanted the phrase to orc culture, even though it makes even less biological sense there. (Or maybe more, if Orcs in the Guide evolved from actual lizards.)

Screwfloss

The lizard brain refers to the limbic system, and it is perfectly biologically cromulent to say it that way.

TeK

Yeah, the lizard voice in the head of magical orc who did not get comprehensive biological education does strike me as cromulent.

I thought it is some deity or his Name voice.

Jane

Personally, I would also say that the game suffers from another critical flaw, one that is almost as ubiquitous in gaming – that they players know what the rule are. That performing x action in y circumstance will result in outcome z, with implication q for victory, and that action p isn't actually possible under the rules at all.

Under Tower rules, it doesn't appear possible to invent some brilliant new stratagem that overturns the board entirely; for someone like Malicia or Akua, who can deeply consider all of their possible options and work out what will most reliably take them to victory, that's perfect, but for someone like Cat who specializes in thinking outside of the box, it doesn't allow their strengths to be represented at all.

Jakinbandw

The fix would be to play with cards or something. Where some cards are worth having for raising the tower and others aren't. Say that face cards don't count for raising the tower. Everyone gets a hand of 10, and callow gets a hand of 10 as well. When someone gets 20 none face cards they win.

I might work up a rule set for this.

Euodiachloris

This sounds like something Vivienne might point out. If she were to be told of Building Towers and not too afraid to mention it. The card game might be called Building and Breaking, since it would be hands (declared and undeclared) as well as stones (your own Tower pot and the common pot of chance-lost stones from losing declared hands) you'd be trying to build, rather than just towers of stones.

Hmmm: poker meets bridge/Jass a a with the option of both permanent or temporary partnership and cut-throat soloing... Maybe some Eucre thrown in? This game could use a changeable Bauer/Joker at contextual points.

Unless trumps are needed to represent Heroes and Villans, instead... wonder if there's a bridge-like version of tarot Triumphs out there... *starts to Google*

Or, there's always Cripple Mr Onion with new pot rules. 😊

Euodiachloris

Unmentioned: personal pots would have to be rather like essential oil burners that use tea lights: the top pot that everybody can easily see into, but the "stand" under it only allowing glimpses for the other players through small patterned holes with only the player having the one access hole for stones turned towards them.

I imagine the boost in both the pottery and jewellery trades would be welcome, with the sudden need of honest earthen or precious filligree pot stands (with matching pots). Poor common-pool pots: they'd probably be whatever was lying around. 😊

Jakinbandw

How about if during the game each player could spend some stones to make a new rule? It would need some type of veto...

Hmm

Let me work on this

TeK

You can fix it by adding the three rules:

- That if you found some pebbles, painted them and persuaded everyone that those pebbles are playable they are;
- That if you persuaded everyone that those playable stones totally aren't, they aren't;
- And number of needed Tower stones to win is random everytime and you can bring some stones from a previous game into new one. And a number of turns until Callow wins is random too.

Also any rule that all three players agreed or disagreed upon is a rule in span of current game. Exceptions are the rules like: you need stones to win, only one can win, you can't stab two other players and take their stone, Callow is always angry.

sengachi

Also there's some rules masters who can take away 5 rocks from any side if they don't like who's winning. They make it kind of hard to win in perpetuity.

TeK

And the most important rule: the Game does not stop after someone wins.

WuseMajor

Yeah, Cat's response to being put into check, is to hit the other player with the chessboard. Which, technically, isn't against the rules as long as she could do it without moving the pieces, but only because such behavior is frowned upon by society in general and no-one thinks they actually need a rule for that.

Decius

To the contrary. It's a move to overturn the table and punch one of the other players, and it's not easy to predict what the outcome of that action would be.

Adjutant independently developing Game Theory from zeroth principles suggests that he would have become named even if he wasn't in Catherine's story.

knockoffnikolai

> Adjutant independently developing Game Theory from zeroth principles suggests that he would have become named even if he wasn't in Catherine's story.

I'm not sure that follows. By that reasoning, all philosophers in Guide also become Named.

TeK

It just changes into another game. The winner is now the Tyrant, and Tyrant can every  $n$  turns tax lords for  $x$  stones. The  $n$  and  $x$  are calculated based on Tyrant stones, unless the "comprehensive tax reform" is done, which is a goal of every Tyrant as it doubles the amount of stones they can tax every time it passed. Of course, the lords can cooperate to steal the stones from Tyrant. It can make for plays like making someone a Tyrant and drowing animosity to him, while slowly building up your base.

And there needs to be more players. Say, everyone who can paint stones and persuade other player to let him enter the game, can enter the game.

TeK

The game starts anew only if Callow wins and brings down the Tower.

Micke

That's every 30th turn.

TeK

Not in my game!

TeK

For you see. In my game, you can add stones to Callow, so that it wins, becomes Tyrant, and now is not raising anyone, for it is part of the Game ^_^

sengachi

Gods above and below. Hakram basically invented the field of representative game theory from scratch, slowly and carefully building it up with the life lessons he earned and the advice he received, and at the end of the day his models do not have one single solitary rule for true cooperation, only mutually-oriented defections. And apparently it's not that Hakram was unmotivated before meeting Catherine, it's that's he had seen every possible outcome of this defection-oriented madness and it **bored** him.

Gods. That's terrifying. That's possibly the single scariest thing you could have given Hakram as part of his backstory. All of a sudden I realize that Thief's view of Hakram is not an exaggeration, it's a deep, deep underestimation. This is a person who probably could have made his own bid for the Tower in due time, but saw deeper and further than others who would make the climb and said "what's the point?".

RanVor

That leaves only one question to ask: what did he see in Cat that made this entire endeavor seem worthwhile?

Euodiachloris

Cat takes time to slap both paint and googly eyes on some of her stones and turns them into pet rocks. Then she defends all the stones she can get hold of, but especially those which are her pet rocks. And, she doesn't use all her stones just to build a single Tower with: she's going for towers, keeps, cattle byers, forges and tiddlywinks.

Sure, she will spend lives to protect lives and the foundations they live on. But, ultimately, she's trying to grow more of those stone lives to do more than just build Towers with. 😊

NZPIEFACE

She simply doesn't want to play the game.

Isa Lumitus

Hakram's big revelation was that the only way to get stones was to steal them from other players. It's a zero sum game. The actual Praesi politics are even worse. After all, sometimes a summoned demon will turn a few stones into face-eating monsters.

Cat isn't playing that game, though. What she's doing is a combination of trying to ally with people to conjure more stones into the game, and stabbing everyone trying to steal stones from her.

Case 1: The King of Winter. Cat got what she wanted (invasions ended), and the King of Winter also 'won' (no longer bound to the Summer Vs. Winter cycle). There was a time when she wanted to kill him for being an asshole, though.

Case 2: Akua. She tried playing the standard Praesi way, and got her soul ripped out and bound to a piece of clothing.

Dainpdf

Not exactly a comment on this chapter, but I've started re-reading and I wonder if we'll ever get to see Cat and, say, Hakram or Indrani sparring from the point of view of a normie like we did Amadeus and Sabah way back in the first book, chapter Seven.

As for this chapter... Hakram being Hakram. Let's hope he and Vivienne can work things out.

qfeys

I took a go at writing the rules down. Let me know what you think.

1e version:

3 players, called lords (or ladies), each start with 10 stones. You have a victory when you have 20 stones.

A stone can be stolen when 2 players agree on a theft.

2e version – promises:

A lord can give one or more stones to another lord to make him agree to an unbreakable promise.

A lord can destroy any stone they own.

3e version – Callow:

A fourth pile of 10 stones is added, named Callow.

Any lord can take a stone from Callow whenever they want.

If no tower is raised within 30 turns, Callow will kill all lords (that have taken from Callow – I'm unsure about this one).

(Another variant could be: the timer only starts ticking when the first stone is taken from Callow.)

(Btw: What are turns?)

4e version – lies:

You have to hide how many stones you have.

One lord starts with 10 stones, one with 8 and one with 6.

You can not know with how many stones the others started.

beleester

3e: I think the Callow timer has to only start when someone takes from Callow. Otherwise, Aisha has only 30 turns to collect 24 stones, which doesn't match up with the statement that she's playing the long game.

(Also, Callow is vengeful. It makes sense that they don't invade until someone pisses them off.)

TeK

You misread 30 turns for 30 stones, my good friend 😊

beleester

The rules are interesting, but I feel Hakram needs to do more playtesting:

1. The lead you need to win seems impossibly far. To win the game, you have to make 20 more captures than anyone else, and possess all but 4 stones in the game! Even if you get all your opponents drunk and they've forgotten how many you started with, they'll surely notice that they've only got 2 or 3 stones apiece. Putting more stones in the game in total might help with this.

2. Callow causing an immediate time limit makes the strategy very limited – the only reason to take from Callow is if you're certain that its stones will allow you to win. But that means that taking from Callow is basically signaling "I'm about to win the game," which paints a big target on your back. It's never a bad idea to plunder someone who took from Callow.

Also, it's impossible for anyone to win **without** plundering Callow (24 stones among the lords, 30 needed to win), but for the Praesi, that's probably a feature, not a bug.

The (unseen) rules for alliances and betrayal might include a fix for these problems, since they might allow you to accumulate enough power to gather a large number of stones in one fell swoop. I'll have to think of some possible mechanics.

TeK

1. There is Callow so the total is 34, and at worst you need 14 captures.

2. No, Callow comes for you regardless. I think. It's not clear. And you pretty much have to take from Callow. If not, you're leaving the other two lords with 4 stones combined, see how that's gonna turn out.

Oh, I see your problem. You need twenty. "and to win one of them must accumulate twenty stones and so raise their tower".

Berder

Typo: "whose Names were an insivible bonfire" -> invisible

Barthumphries

I don't think Hakram was planning on betraying Viv. I think he recognized the mental anguish she was feeling at having the title but not the authority that went with it, and planning on offering concessions or whatever to lessen the chance of her betraying him.

And if the concessions, etc., didn't go well, then like Batman (who has plans for how to defeat every other superhero in case they go rogue) he has a plan.

DC

On a second readthrough, I'd propose just one change to tower-raising: Callow only hangs those who took from Callow.

---

Interlude: Zwischenzug II

"In the East they say that doubt is the death of men, but I have seen the end of the forking path and reply this: so is certainty, only for others."

– Theodore Langman, Wizard of the West

Panic blanked Vivienne's mind, for a heartbeat. Her fingers clutched the tankard so tightly she felt like it should break. Was this it, then? The conversation that took place before the Deadhand snatched the life out of her? I can run, she thought. But that would be declaring treason, or close enough, and they would hunt her like an animal. How many of the Jacks would stay loyal, if there was a price on her head? Some, but not enough. The guildsmen who'd once answered to Ratface and she'd begun to fold into her own web would turn their cloak without batting an eye. She was still Queen of Thieves until someone took the stolen crown from her, but that was more custom than law and Catherine had put the fear of her in their bones. Some would sell her out, if the alternative was crossing the Black Queen's right hand. She'd sent all her people away before Deadhand arrived, anyway, leaving the two of them alone with the hearth crackling in the corner. The thief forced herself to drink down some ale, heart still beating against her eardrums. She would, could not fall to pieces so easily. Let's have a talk, you and I, the orc had said. He'd phrased it like it was an offer, like there was a decision to make.

They both knew there wasn't.

"Honesty, is it?" she said, affecting a drawl. "I did not know you traded in such luxuries, Adjutant. Ambitious of you."

He did not smile. Unsure where to look – coldly assessing eyes, lips hiding fangs or that damned hand even when hidden under a glove – she drank again instead.

"Do you know," Hakram Deadhand mildly said, "I can't remember the last time I was genuinely scared. I've been afraid for us, in fights, but actual terror? No, not even when the Queen of Summer came down. I can't imagine what it would be like, living with that sword always hanging over your head. Colouring every sight and scent, creeping into every corner of me."

Vivienne set down her tankard, slowly and carefully.

"To be afraid of something," she said, "you have to care about something first."

And do you? Did he care about a single thing in all of Creation? Sometimes she thought he loved Catherine, though not in a way that would lead to courtship. The Woe were so often like sunflowers, turning to remain facing the burning glare hung up in their common sky, and of them Hakram Deadhand had been the first. The kind of love, perhaps, that a drowning man would have for the shore. But even that could not be the sum whole of anyone, and how could she trust in the words of a creature that treated every moment like one on the stage? Vivienne was not sure which truth would be more dangerous: that there was something buried deep beneath, or that there truly was nothing at all. The orc inclined his head, thoughtful. The gesture and accompanying visage was not common to his kind, the thief had known enough orcs to be certain of that. It was learned. Presented consciously to her eyes.

"I have been thinking of a game, lately," Deadhand said. "I will spare you the details, for they are largely irrelevant to this conversation, but there is one part of it I have been struggling with."

The thief maintained a pleasant smile, letting him speak without interruption though her mind was wheeling. A game? It was questions she had expected, not some delicate metaphor.

"Trust," Adjutant said. "That is the one element I could never quite figure out. The game cannot be won without the players hiding their thoughts, yet it cannot truly advance without trust either. I've tried to make a study of why it fails or emerges but found no success. The same answers rarely apply twice."

"A matter best left to philosophers, perhaps," Vivienne said, too wary to venture blindly into this. "Or theologians, I suppose. Faith and trust have much in common."

"Do they?" the orc curiously asked. "It is my understanding you were raised to the House of Light, but I never learned its teachings in any depth. My people, not unlike the Praesi, see prayer more as bargain than oblation."

And there it was, the itch in the wound. Not the religious matters, but the part he had casually mentioned. My people. The Praesi. As if they were two different things entirely. Perhaps they were, Vivienne thought. She'd entertained the thought often enough in the past. Why would the first orc Named in centuries subordinate himself to a human from a land that was traditional plunder and raiding grounds to his own kind? Oh, his Name lent itself well to obedience. But even if he'd ended up the Shepherd he could have returned to the Steppes and lived like a king until his death. Where was his gain, she had wondered? Her answer had been that by staying at Catherine's side, he could do more than his people than by returning to his desolate home or remaining in true Imperial service. Cat had been, by then, as good as queen of Callow even if there had been the thin pretence of a ruling council. If the Empire was broken apart from the inside, if the Clans were supported by a Callowan sovereign whose closest friend was an orc... And yet there'd been no trace of the steps that should precede that.

There was no greenskin faction at court. There'd been, as far as she knew, no suggestions of diplomacy with the clans of the Steppes or with the powerful officers of his kind in the Legions of Terror. Even when it came to the Army of Callow, he'd been one of the main proponents of investing in training Callowan officers rather than simply relying on the veterans acquired from the wounded legions who'd joined after Second Liesse. His game was not an obvious one. The assertion that he could be driven by personal ambition was laughable. Deadhand could have taken any seat on the queen's council with but a whisper in Catherine's ear, and to be frank even without any formal title he'd held authority so broad and absolute some actual kings would have envied it. How much higher could he rise without holding a crown of his own? Yet Adjutant held no noble title, no lands, no significant military force of his own. He could commandeer most of these, but he had not cultivated personal loyalties or gathered supporters – even when it would have been almost childishly easy to do so. He was, in essence, the perfect loyal right hand.

That degree of apparent flawlessness in anyone would have made Vivienne's skin crawl, but in so skilled an actor it was more than just alarming. As the silence stretched the thief realized she'd allowed the conversation to lapse, and cleared her throat.

"I'm not the best person to explain it," she said. "I never had much interest in priestly matters."

"And yet you fought by the side of a man touched by the Choir of Contrition," the orc said. "Something few priests can boast of. Callowans are a study in contradiction, sometimes. You've birthed as many heroes as the Praesi have villains, but rare is the song sung in your taverns that praises angels or Heavens. Always the kingdom, always rebellion and revenge and old scores settled."

"How often have your people been the invaded instead of the invaders, Adjutant?" Vivienne softly asked. "Curse not walls of your own raising."

"Aye," he said. "We have done that. Yet I find it fascinating, the faces nation will paint over faceless Gods. Praesi hold their Gods Below to be peerless schemers, for that is their favoured art. Goblins call the whole lot the Gobbler, a single crawling thing that will one day devour the same Creation it spewed out. Death is the only certainty they embrace as a race."

"And orcs?" Vivienne asked.

"Below is just what they teach us to call them in the Wasteland," Deadhand said. "We know them as the Hungry Gods. We've had our lesser idols, as all other peoples have. But that altar was the first and remains the greatest."

"Kings and shepherds fit the same cookpot," Vivienne quoted, tongue stumbling over the rough syllables of Kharsum.

She was the only one of the Woe who did not speak it fluently. Catherine had been raised in an orphanage and Indrani in the middle of the fucking woods, and still they'd been surprised she did not speak orcish. As if it was a given that everyone should.

"Have you ever seen an orc go without meat for long, Thief?" Adjutant said. "An experiment was made by some Soninke lord called Ehioze, a few centuries back, so the process is well documented. He grabbed three hundred orcs in their prime, who'd committed one of those crimes that is only ever a crime when the Praesi need fresh bodies, and locked them up for study."

The thief's eyes narrowed. She did not reply.

"For the first month, it's barely noticeable at all," Deadhand continued. "We'll get irritable, aggressive. Slower in thought. Then at the beginning of the second month, skin will grow tight and muscles melt away. Our bodies start eating themselves alive. By the middle of the third month, we are no longer able to tell faces apart. It's all a thick, red, pulsing haze."

Her fingers tightened under the table, not that she remembered putting her hands there.

"Ehioze was a dutiful scholar," the orc mildly said. "Just starving them would not have been enough. He sequestered parts of the three hundred and studied how different manners of feeding would affect the process. He suggested afterwards that it was possible to keep orcs at the beginning of the middle state, before muscles start going, if they are fed two pounds of meat a month along with higher quantity of other provisions. It's true, as it happens. I know this because his suggestions were used as the standard orc rations in the Legions up until the Reforms. They called it Ehioze's Measure."

"They wanted you able to fight," Vivienne said.

"But not think," Deadhand finished softly. "Or we might just question why it was never Praesi that faced the charges of your knights."

"I imagine there's quite a few orcs in the Legions, even in the Army of Callow, who have grandfathers and grandmothers that lived under the measure," she said.

He nodded. Not wary, never wary, for that was to be her curse and not his.

"There's another part to that tale, Adjutant," the thief said. "One you forgot to tell. You see, there's quite a few Callowans in the army who have kin that got eaten by orcs. Not even thirty years ago. What the Wasteland did to your people is a horror. What they went on to do to mine is a fucking horror as well, and one does not expunge the other."

"I know that too, Thief," Deadhand said. "You asked, in your own roundabout manner, what it is I care about. I have answers you won't care to hear, but this one you will. I care about seeing a world where, when I tell this story, the woman on the other side of the table can't reply the way you did. Where we're more than hunting hounds for those who measured our starvation."

And there it was. Everything she had feared – hoped? It was such a blurry line, some days – he would say. The confession that he meant to use Callowan lives to secure orc interests. How long would it be, until Catherine's fanged Chancellor whispered the right words to have her war for the independence of the Steppes? And yet... He has not prepared for this, she thought. The orc was meticulous to a fault, so where was his spadework? Where were the correspondences and the deals, the alliances made in the dark? Where were the mouthpieces for this ugliest of crusades? Part of her wanted to dismiss all the absences as him simply biding his time, but it rang false. It was fear giving answer, and Vivienne despised how seductive those whispers were. She was willing to fear for her life, for her home, but what was she if terror was the sum whole of her? Just another prisoner, yet another Callowan who'd never quite left the days of Imperial occupation. The moment she ceased looking for the truth, she was lost.

"And yet you are here," she said. "In Laure. Working for a kingdom you love not, when you could be raising banner among the clans of your kind. Why?"

"Of all of the Woe," Deadhand calmly said, "you should understand that best. I could raise rebel flag, I could give the Tower a war it would remember for a very long time. I might even win it and cast down that peerless tribute to murder. But what would that accomplish, Thief? The head bearing the crown changes, the world moves on and two hundred years from now we'll be right back where we started. You don't cure a sickness by fighting the symptoms. You go after the root, or it will linger until death."

"The Liesse Accords," Vivienne said.

"The Liesse Accords," the orc agreed. "They will not come to be unless we take a hatchet to everything that holds up Praes, beyond repair. And under those rules, that agreement of nations, we change things. Not a dynasty's name or a few battles won or borders on a map. We truly change things."

It was perhaps the only argument he could have brought forward that would have appeased her without appeasing her too much. A perfect balance struck. The thief could feel the hair on the back of her neck rising. There were devils in the deepest Hells that did not have half as silver a tongue as Hakram Deadhand.

"And so, I now worry of you," Adjutant said.

"I have been more ardent a defender of them than any of us," Vivienne harshly replied.

"So you have," the orc easily conceded. "And that surprised me, for while Callow will benefit they are not tailored for the primary benefit of the kingdom – and it is Callowans that will bleed to have it signed."

She'd run with heroes once, the thief remembered. Men and women who'd carried the broken pieces of their old lives with them just as the Woe did, and some nights she wondered how deep the differences truly were. And then there were moments like this, where the killer across from her was surprised that she would embrace salvation extending further than her own little corner of Creation. Like it was expected that the lines on the map delimited the border between people and foes and there could be nothing between. William had been a monster too, in his own way, and Vivienne had neither forgotten nor forgiven what might have taken place in Liesse without Catherine's intervention. Rare was the day where she did not curse herself for having hesitated, having quibbled. Having allowed it to happen without raising a fucking hand. But even William would never have been surprised by someone trying to do good for the sake of doing good. I discarded those hesitations, she thought, and threw in my lot with the Woe. I made a bet on Catherine, and within the year a hundred thousand innocents were dead.

"I can hate the princes of Procer, for their rapaciousness," she said. "I can hate those who allow themselves to take arms for a morally bankrupt cause and the heroes who would see us burn for a point of philosophy. I can do all that, and not hate the people under them."

"And yet there is an imbalance, isn't there?" Adjutant quietly said. "It is not equal care. Who you hesitate, if the choice was between a Callowan life and a Proceran one?"

"And that makes me a villain?" she hissed, and immediately regretted it.

Panic flared. Was this going to be it, then? The moment where he reached across the table and snapped her neck like kindling?

"You are afraid," Deadhand noted. "There is no need. You have not spoken anything I did not already suspect. And that is my worry, Vivienne. Because deep down you still believe, you still act, like you're the same girl who was at the Lone Swordsman's side. You are not."

"And so to keep my throat uncut I must kiss the feet of the Gods Below," she said. "Is that it? Shall I eat a baby to prove my dedication to the cause?"

"Your life is in no danger," Deadhand calmly said.

She laughed, right in his face.

"Is that so?" she mocked. "Why, because Catherine would be cross if you killed me? It would pass. She needs you too badly, and you'll be able to tell her you tried before I so regrettably forced your hand."

"Your murder would be seen as a greenskin coup, regardless of context," Adjutant said. "So if you cannot believe in my own intentions, at least believe in the practicalities involved."

"Spot on, Deadhand," she snarled. "There's nothing quite as reassuring as hearing one's death would be politically inconvenient."

"So that's the kernel," the orc said, sounding surprised. "You do not believe you have worth."

She flinched. That had cut too close to home for comfort. The orc's brow creased.

"You stole a sun," he slowly said. "And were instrumental in the killing of several of our most dangerous opponents."

"You do have a talent for the exact," Vivienne said, "Instrumental is precisely the right word."

An instrument, wielded by sharper minds and quicker hands. A bundle of aspects to be used as a surgical tool, perhaps sometimes a discreet pair of eyes. You are all Named, she thought. I am an artefact that breathes. And the moment she strayed from that function, what came but defeat? By the Grey Pilgrim, by fae, by a single Praesi mage. Lightning coursing through her veins, not delivered by some ancient power but a single woman with a speck of sorcery to her. The humiliation of it only deepened the echoes of the pain across her body.

"War is not your Role, Thief," Deadhand said. "Forcing the matter will only result in failure."

"Then what is my damned Role, Adjutant?" she asked quietly. "Because there's no need for a thief, here, and what else can I be used for? I do not rule, I do not lead armies, my judgement is background drone to decisions of import even when Catherine is here. Is that all? Am I just the forced voice of morality that must be sweet-talked before we take yet another plunge. Gods, I am tired of being an obstacle instead of a speaker."

The orc considered that in silence.

"Trust," he said, sounding almost amused. "Always trust. I would offer you a bargain, Vivienne Dartwick."

The deal or the grave, she thought. So it finally came to that, Catherine's little helper tidying up all the loose ends.

"You're right," Adjutant said. "You never spoke the accusation, yet you are right. I have no great love for this kingdom. I see what it takes from her, from all of us, and I wonder how it could be worth it."

The orc's eyes met hers squarely.

"So teach me," he said. "Why I should care for it. Show me."

"I can't squeeze tears out of a stone, Hakram," she tiredly replied.

He nodded, as if he had come to a decision.

"There is nothing I can say that will convince you," Deadhand said. "You are not wrong. Even oaths are just words."

The orc methodically took off his gloves, one after the other. Flesh first, and the scuttling bone. He brought up the skeletal fingers.

"Your knife, please," he said.

Vivienne's pulse quickened. Slowly she palmed her blade, eyes remaining peeled on his face, and she saw only cold determination there. Gods forgive me, she thought. Hide. The hand remained there, his eyes on hers. Hide, she thought again, panic mounting. She could touch the aspect but it refused to bloom. It was like trying to catch smoke. Gently, the orc took the knife from her sweaty, shaking hand.

"I made a promise to you, once," Adjutant said. "One I have come to regret."

The tip of the blade touched the bone hand with a soft clink, artfully moved to allow it from his grip.

"Only blood can wash away bad blood," he said. "Our peoples have that in common. I should not have forgot it."

The knife came down, hard enough to shake the table beneath, and carved into the orc's only flesh wrist. Blood spurted as Vivienne's blade scraped across bones, fear and astonishment taking hold of her.

"Adjutant, what-"

"My word is of no worth to you," Hakram Deadhand calmly interrupted her, face pale and taught with pain. "That is not unwise. Amends must be made. So when you next doubt your value, I want you to remember this: when the choice came, I judged you well worth a hand."

The orc's wrist pressed down, bone shattered and Adjutant's black blood crept across the table as his hand came fully severed.

---

Zachary

The funny thing with Hakram is that people always talk about him being a great actor, but clearly he's doing something wrong if so many people come away with the perception that he's some kind of sociopath, lol

NerfContessa

Well, most sociopaths are excellent actors. They have to, to work anywhere but as ceo s.

Still, this move?

Absolutely metal :((

therealgridlock

I think the point of the comment was to point out that sociopaths rarely get recognized as sociopaths specifically because they are good actors.

So if hakram looks like a sociopath, but isn't doing any of the things a sociopath would do, what does that make him? Why would any great actor convince others they were a sociopath?

I suspect it is to hide that his true motives are always right out in the open, just nobody believes anyone could be that honest.

Or rather, that since nobody believes he could be being truthful, they think he is a great actor instead.

TheNoremac42

God damn... Why are half the characters in this series freaking sociopaths?!

Solomon Midwinter

I mean... it's not called a practical guide to ethics and mental stability.

kelioez

I think someone should write that and give it to the them to follow, also take them to the person who wrote it for long-term psychiatric treatment.

Cotillion

Sociopaths, by definition, do not adjust to society. They are frequently practiced in putting on an act to better fit in with it, but their core nature is Other to those who work within the normal bounds. What does that describe but a Named?

therealgridlock

Jesus Christ. I mean, i get it, the only way hakram could convince thief that he actually cares about her is to make a literal sacrifice of a pound of flesh

The only way to make the kingdom convinced he cares is to make a literal sacrifice of a pound of flesh

But what the fuck man, lol.

Does he get a second dead hand? I think this one can get glued back on, the only reason the other is fuckt is because of the hashmallim sword.

aran

cut myself into pieces, this is my last resort

---

Interlude: Giuoco Pianissimio II

"A man could sift through all of Creation and never find so much as a speck of this elusive thing called the greater good. Like all the most dangerous altars, it is entirely of our own raising."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

"It looks like you shoved the stump in a fire," Fadila Mbafeno sighed.

That was, in fact, exactly what Hakram had done. Blood loss could kill even Named, and while pushing a fresh stump into a hearth fire until the flesh cauterized had been excruciatingly painful it'd still been better than dying in a ratty Laure tavern. Masego's assistant – and nominal head of the Observatory in his absence – had promptly answered the summons after he returned to the palace, and begun to work on healing his wound without quibbling. There were other mages in the capital, of course, and many priests. But Fadila was Praesi, and that had decided his choice of healer. The Soninke had been raised to understand the value of discretion and not inquiring in the affairs of one's social superiors. The dark-skinned woman leaned closer with a silvery scalpel in hand, cutting slightly into the burned flesh at the end of his stump. No pain, he noted, though that might simply be because he'd grown light-headed enough he no longer felt it. The blade came away red and the sorceress washed it in a bowl of clear water before wiping with a cloth.

"I'll need to cut away the burnt flesh before healing the damage beneath," she informed him. "Healing is not my specialty and burns are trickier than most wounds. Pouring magic into scorched flesh tends to have... unpredictable results."

"Do as you see fit," Adjutant gravelled. "I will defer to your judgement."

She nodded in appreciation.

"You've lost a large amount of blood," Fadila added. "I'd recommend poultry, fish and red meat – which are staples of your people's diets, regardless. Orcs lack the most the issues involved in human blood transfusions, so it's certainly possible if you want to accelerate recovery, but my understanding is that local mores frown upon those kinds of rituals."

"It won't be necessary," Hakram simply said.

The full consequences of his actions must be played out, lest the gesture be robbed of some of its weight. She did not question his answer, as she had not lingered on the subject of reattaching the hand after he'd declined. The Soninke passed her knife under open flame to cleanse it, and then set to the methodical business of prying away the burnt flesh on his stump before healing it. The spell she used for that purpose, he did not recognize. The sorceress used no incantation, and the shape and colour of the magic were different than that used by the Legions of Terror. The pain returned quick enough, a deep ugly throb, and Hakram only then realized she'd discretely numbed his nerves before her early examination. Kind of the Lady Mbafero, he thought. The title occasionally tossed in the foreigner's direction by servants and court officials was a source of mild amusement to him, he could privately admit. It was a Callowan courtesy title, one that would likely have gotten her killed if she'd claimed it while still in the employ of a Wasteland patron – it would have denoted the kind of ambitions Praesi aristocrats disliked finding in their subordinates.

Fadila Mbafero had, after all, once been mfuasa to the Sahelians. Servant blood, it meant, a distinction between commoners and those retainers directly in the service of the nobility. Hakram had studied her background in some detail, as it happened. After Masego had snatched her from the gallows and placed her in his service, Catherine had rather bluntly told the orc that if Fadila was a risk she would be getting into an 'accident' as soon as feasible. The investigation had led to an interesting look at Praesi customs, particularly pertaining mages. Sorcery and political power had been intertwined in the Wasteland since long before the Miezens ever made shore on Calernia, in Praes more than any other region. The lords high and low had bred sorcery into their lines with methodical precision, bringing talented mages into the fold whenever it seemed like the blood thinned, but those were ultimately limited arrangements. Both Soninke and Taghreb saw more mages born than any other human ethnicity on the continent, which meant it was effectively impossible for the nobles to keep the practice of sorcery entirely within their own ranks.

Adjutant had read the appropriate treatises, back in the College, and so he was aware that most people born with the Gift either never realized they had it or died young after an uncontrolled or untrained use of sorcery. Another significant portion had too little talent to be able to practice sorcery beyond a few tricks without extensive tutoring, though when born to wealthy families such types made up the backbone of alchemists and academics in the Empire. It was the smaller portion that had a Gift strong enough for ritual or combat sorcery that had the High Lords and their vassals regularly sifting through their subjects. The treatment those 'lucky' few received varied from region to region. Taghreb, as a rule, treated them like a sort of lesser nobility and created mage lines within their territories that could be called on when there was need for war or marriage. Soninke, as in most things, proved too complex to easily generalize. The policies of Okoro and Nok tended towards bringing agreeable mages into the fold as mfuasa and those judged unreliable forced into service with the local noble's household troops. The stubborn and the runners disappeared.

Aksum was the most traditionally hard-line, with any mages not leashed or wedded unceremoniously slain before they could become an issue. Akua Sahelian's own father, famously, had been born with enough talent he could be a threat even as a servant and no spare relative to wed him to. He'd had to flee the region with killers after him, finding refuge in Wolof. The line to which Fadila had once been sworn to, and the last of the great Soninke cities. Wolof was a centre of sorcery rival to Ater itself, and had remained so for millennia by investing heavily in raising and training mages. It was well known to 'acquire' mages from other regions in difficult situations, but Fadila had been born in the city and so fallen under the aegis of its internal policies. Like all children with promising magical talent, she'd been taken from her family while young, the parents being offered a lump sum as redress for the loss of a child, and trained at the High Lady's expense until she reached the age of twelve. Young mages who made it that far – not a given, the mortality rate was one in three – were assigned permanent service to either the Sahelians or one of their vassal families, a highly politicked process that the ruling family of Wolof used to both reward and slight their subordinates.

The loyal got rising talents, the troublesome only the dregs.

Fadila herself had been judged of sufficient prowess to enter the service of the Sahelians themselves, and cultivated as mfuasa to the family. She'd known Diabolist socially but never been in her personal circle, and been considered a likely fit for a teaching or research position after she spent a decade or two fighting as a combat mage for her masters. Her talent as both a ritualist and a theoretician had been noted in Praesi circles – she'd made some waves after proving it was possible to forge a weak artificial sympathetic link in scrying tools – and that reputation was likely the reason Diabolist had picked her as a retainer when she set out to engineer the Doom of Liesse. The amount of work required in turning an entire city into a runic array would have been massive, and she was a natural fit for Akua Sahelian to delegate the lesser tasks to. It was fortunate, Hakram often thought, that she'd been snatched from Diabolist's service before she could serve that purpose. How much faster would the Doom of Liesse have come, with such a helper?

"There," Fadila said, placing her silver knife back into the water. "That is as much as I can do. Should you change your mind about reattaching the hand, it will be necessary to cut off a sliver of the stump and a degree of functionality will be lost. In case you were unaware, limb reattachment attempted more than ten hours after the loss has at most a one in four chance of success. I can't speak for what Lord Hierophant would be capable of, naturally, or even Callowan priests. Their methods are largely beyond my understanding."

"Duly noted," Hakram replied, gaze turning to the stump.

His dead flesh had been carved off, piece by piece, and instead thin green skin now covered his wrist. Almost thin as a human's, he thought, though it would thicken in time.

"Be careful with it, it's fragile even by human standards," the sorceress said. "As it happens, the flesh reached full saturation during the process. I won't be able to touch it again for at least two days, and after that only minor touch-ups. It would be ideal if you could avoid puncturing the skin for a full month."

"I'll be careful with it," Adjutant said, and blinked.

He'd been trying to move fingers that no longer existed, he realized. That would be an adjustment.

"Thank you, Lady Mbafeno," he finally said. "That will be all."

"It was my pleasure, Lord Adjutant," she respectfully replied.

She gathered her affairs and bowed before leaving. She might not have seen the Wasteland in years now, but the manners remained with her. The angle of the bow had been the one court etiquette dictated as required for a High Lord of Praes. Though he found himself in a thoughtful mood, Hakram did not linger in the private room he'd requisitioned for the treatment. This business, after all, was not quite done. His conversation with Thief had been interrupted by the woman's obvious horror at his actions, worsened when he addressed the bleeding with cauterization through the tavern's hearth fire. That was not entirely unexpected. He'd given it better than half odds they would have to take recess while the wound was properly seen to, when deciding his course of action. Hakram usually slept in his office, whenever he could spare time for slumber, but he did have personal rooms of his own in the palace. Amusingly enough, they had once been those of the queen consorts of Callow – he was not certain whether Catherine was unaware of the fact or simply indifferent, though an alternative might be that she knew and it was actually her sardonic sense of humour at work. Regardless, they were the rooms closest to her own. He'd been rather touched by the implications of that, though he still used them only rarely.

Thief would not come to him in his office, he knew. It was, in her eyes, the seat of his power. It was also where he kept his axe, and Vivienne preferred him unarmed when she could stomach to see him at all. A place where he could be expected to go but where his presence was lightly felt would be the most appropriate setting for the last part of their exchange, and so the orc did not waste time dawdling before heading for his quarters. He'd felt eyes on him the moment he passed the threshold of the healing room and twice more while on his way, and so it was no surprise that Thief awaited him inside when he opened the door. Her informants must have been tracking him all the way to here. The personal quarters of the queen consorts of Callow had been luxurious even before Laure and its royal palace fell under the rule of Wastelanders whose own nobility was known to be ostentatious to almost absurd extents. The orc had stripped away most of the decorations, though the furniture itself had been of very good make and so remained intact. The only luxury he'd occasionally partaken in was the large balcony outside overlooking a garden, the closest to a spot of green he'd been able to find in this city. It was there that Thief was awaiting.

She looked small and thin, sitting on an open windowsill and bathed in moonlight. Even for a human. Catherine was shorter, but like her teacher she had enough presence it was barely noticeable when looking at her. Vivienne Dartwick's hair had grown longer, he noticed once more. Hakram did not allow his eyes to linger – his attention would only have worsened whatever issue lay behind that fact – but he'd noticed when it first began. Before the departure for Keter, and for it to have been noticeable even back then it must have started slightly earlier. Namelore was a muddle of imprecisions and exceptions, he knew, but where there was an effect there would be a cause. If, as Catherine insisted, the appearance of a Named was a reflection of how they saw themselves then such changes in Thief were a warning sign as to her mental state. Worrying, considering her influence and formal charge over the only spy network Callow possessed. Vivienne would not need to rebel to damage the kingdom, only withhold key information at a crucial moment. Or, more likely in his eyes, simply leave. The hole that would be a crippling blow to a kingdom that'd effectively begun being raised from the ground up a mere two years ago.

"Adjutant," she said, flicking a glance at him. "At least you had enough sense to see a mage."

"I would have survived it," he simply said.

Moving slowly, he came at her side. Large as the open window was, there would be no accommodating the both of them if he wished to sit with her. Instead he simply rested his elbows on the windowsill, leaning forward. Though he did not turn to watch, he felt her eyes looking down at the stump. Good. There had been, he'd realized early, no real chance any words from his lips could sway her. She distrusted him too much. Catherine could have a fireside chat with a stranger for half an hour and have them come out willing to murder in her name, but that had never been one of his talents. He could ease and turn currents, but not birth them. It was important for a Named to recognize their limitations, he believed. The costs of arrogance were so much higher for them than anyone else. Knowing that, Hakram had been forced to make a decision. Simply allowing things to unfold as they were was not to be seriously considered. The longer Thief was allowed to consolidate her power – and she already was, by bringing the informants who'd once answered to Ratface under her banner – the costlier her defection or betrayal would become. It might have been possible to draw the matter out until Catherine returned, if he'd had a precise notion of when she would, but he did not. That left killing her before she became an issue or finding a way to stem her doubts.

"The very devise of the Woe," Thief murmured, eyes leaving his absent hand. "We will survive. It smacks more of desperation than valour."

"Valour is the game of the winning side," Hakram replied. "If you can afford to worry about appearances, it's not a war to the death. We've known precious little else."

"There comes a time when those excuses grow thin, Adjutant," she said. "I was taught as a child that dark circumstances are a test of character. That the righteous rise above, that the wicked sink."

"I was taught as a child that killing a man for a goat was glorious affair, if done on an open field," he said. "We are more than our first lessons. We have to, or we'll only ever be what our ancestors were before us."

"There is worth in old lessons," Thief said. "In old wisdom."

"If they were so wise," Hakram mildly said, "why did we inherit such a debacle of a world from them?"

She went still.

"Those ways kept Callow free for millennia," she said.

"They failed, in the end," the orc said, not unkindly.

"To the Carrion Lord," Thief replied. "How often does Praes spawn a man like that? Calamity was the right name for his band. The kind of catastrophe born once a few centuries."

"Even before him, this kingdom was the battlefield of the continent," Hakram said. "Praes invaded every other decade, Procer whenever the stars were right. How often has this land truly known peace?"

"We have brought many things to Callow, Hakram Deadhand," the Thief soberly said. "Peace was not one of them."

"I am told," he said, "that births are rarely gentle affairs."

"And what are we birthing?" she said. "There has been more martial law than actual law, over the last two years. We've assassinated and hanged, sacrificed thousands to make deals and still we tremble in the Tower's shadow. At what point, Adjutant, does a justification become an excuse?"

"We have also fed the starving," Hakram said. "Sheltered the lost. We've built a kingdom and reclaimed its border. The good may not erase the bad, but the bad does not erase the good."

"And yet I wonder," Thief said. "Could others have done what we did, without the costs? Without compromising who they were?"

"If there were such people out there, they have not come," Hakram said. "You compare yourself to ghosts of your own making."

"We're not the best, but we're what there is," she bitterly said. "I've said that myself. To others, and while facing the mirror. That too grows thin with the repeating. Gods, if those people had come I have to ask – would we have killed them? Did we, before they ever came into themselves?"

"If they could not face us -"

"They couldn't face Malicia," Thief sharply said. "Or Cordelia Hasenbach, or her heroes, or the Carrion Lord. I know, Gods damn you. I know. And I know, too, that I might as well be shouting into the void when I say this but it needs to be said anyway: we are not the lesser evil. Not anymore, when we seek to make pacts with the fucking Dead King and move armies like pieces on a board for diplomatic gains. The only difference between us and the old evils is that we're newer at this game and nowhere as good. That isn't a distinction to be proud of."

And there was the rub, for Hakram had known this kind of talk before and never put much stock in it. He'd spoken with Juniper, once, and in her own blunt way she'd laid bare the heart of it. Callowans looked at knights and saw chivalry, honour and all those other virtues. Orcs looked at knights and saw killers on horses. Vivienne had championed causes, one after the other, that had been put aside in the name of necessity. Yet they were not unworthy, none of them. She felt discarded and ignored because, frankly, she had been. Her only victories had come by the planning of others, used as a cog in a greater machinery. Hakram rather enjoyed such a role. It was what he'd been taught, what he was good at. But he stood certain of his worth outside that boundary, and Vivienne Dartwick did not.

They had to start listening to her.

Not because they would lose her if they did not, but because she was right – or at least not entirely wrong. They'd all flocked to Catherine's banner because they liked the world she wanted to make, that she made just by being who she was. And Thief, in her own way, was perhaps the most ardent partisan of that. Because she would stick by that vision even when Catherine did not, even if it made her the only objector in a council. An obstacle instead of a speaker, as she'd put it herself. How many of those councils had been true debates, instead of a confirmation of a decision already made? Too few, Adjutant thought. Too few for what we want to be. He could feel her eyes returned to his stump, and knew the bargain had been worth it. The lessons had been learned well. Are we not all your students, Catherine? In our own winding ways. You taught us that there is always a way through, if we're willing to bleed. Words would not convince Thief, but now every time doubt came she could look at the stump and know, know beyond doubt, that she had been judged worthy.

More useful a thing than a handful of fingers.

"So tell me," Adjutant said. "How we can be different."

Her gaze met his, hesitant. Fearing. Assessing. Hope was always a most tempting cup to drink from, even when you knew the chalice might be poisoned.

Vivienne Dartwick spoke, under pale moonlight, and Hakram Deadhand listened.

---

DroughtBringer

Name: Supoorter

Aspects:

Vote!

(topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil)

Join!

(<https://discord.gg/w5pnbqP>)

Donate!

(<https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>)

Role: Supoorter of Erratic Errata and all convincer of others to do the same.

DroughtBringer

And it seems like my autocorrect hates the word "Supporter"
Well that's fun.

Jarwain

It looks like the gambit paid off, and Hakram's missing a hand for now. How will the kingdom change?

In other news, you'd better vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Here's patreon if you're into that kinda thing: <https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

ClickPause

Is he technically Hakram Deadhands now? Or Hakram Stump'n'Deadhand?

...how about Stumpy?

Gunslinger

Hmm so is this paving the pathway for a Thief Chancellor transition? Or whatever the Callowan equivalent would be.

Also quite enjoyed the surprise Fadila background. I look forward to seeing where she goes

Gunslinger

I don't expect the transition to happen anytime soon though. EE has become more stingy with the Name revelations 😊

daegone823

We are starving for new names

Javvies

A Callowan equivalent to Chancellor, without the presumed backstabbing connotations with the Praesi, would likely be something along the lines of Castellan, Steward, or Counselor.

haihappen

would Cathrine naming Vivienne her successor, like officially, make her a capital p Princess (of Callow)? Something like "Princess of Shadows" or "Black Princess of Night" (kinda redundant with Night and Black...)

But yeah, Vivi's Role in the Story about the future of Callow is very different from her Name. That may influence her deterioration.

HandyCapped

That formal successor thing seems intriguing, but "black princess of night" sounds like anime aka. bad writing.

Zachary

Welcome to web serial comments, home of some of the worst opinions I've seen in my entire life

I think my favorite is someone who commented that Catherine's third aspect (obviously before it existed) might be CHAOS

therealgridlock

I would argue that is her fourth aspect, or rather her zeroth. Insofar as that can't be an aspect, it's instead more a fact of her existence, she has brought chaos and change to the wheel. For a generation before her nothing changed, before that, everything changed in a way it had never been seen, and before that, everything changed in ways that had been seen.

Now it's time for more changes in ways nobody could have seen.

Simple Gentleman

I don't know if thief can transition because her name is not a transition name like squire, heiress, or apprentice. I was thinking her changes are more of like a back lash of her acting more evil. Cat went through the same thing after she let William go.

Then again some names are not really evil or good. For example ranger and archer are but I see them both as people that are apathetic to others concerns which is why their names don't really have a side.

This is not the case with thief. She is very much invested in the ills of the world. Her name is enough in the grey area that she can work with Cat and be on the evil side with out losing it but maybe if things go to far she becomes "weaker" or less stable.

Javvies

I believe that any Name can Transition, especially to a Ruler-type Name, under the right/appropriate circumstances. However, the so-called Transitory Names like Squire, Heiress, and Apprentice have an easier time of building towards and completing a Transition than a "full fledged" non-Transitory Names.

There are probably some Names that are sort of both Transitory and fully fledged Names – and this category would, I think, likely include many of the traditional Names for the Callowan Crown Prince(ss), prior to ascending to the Callowan Throne and getting one of the Names associated with being the crowned king or queen of Callow, and in many ways, the Praesi Chancellor Name is both a fully fledged Name and one that is intended to Transition into Dread Emperor/Empress.

And, of course, going from a Name that isn't Transitory to non-ruler-type Name would be far more difficult, especially the more different it is from your current Name.

Vivienne is likely, IMO, to have a very different sort of Name – after all, she hasn't really been occupying the Role of a Thief much lately.

nineran

Cursed > Captain

Transistions can happen. They just need a strong enough story and role.

Liliet

Cursed is a transitional Name. Its Role is to build up to whatever the Cursed can manage to become when they find a way to overcome / subdue / transcend their curse.

Kiefler

Wouldn't a Named "Thief Chancellor" in essence be "Tax Collector"?

Yardaze

Gotta hand it to him, Hakram seems to know his business.

danh3107

You get one clap.

Hakurei06

But does it make a sound?

WuseMajor

I would like this, if I had an account.

danh3107

A bit short, but still an interesting chapter. After reading this I'm not sure if Thief will transition or not, her changes seem to be from her own loss and mental deterioration rather than a transition being eminent. But we'll see.

Javvies

Hakram's hand isn't coming back the way it was. My money on his new/replacement hand is either one forged from a artificial Miracle by Heirophant, if he comes back first, or, more likely, one forged of Winter by Cat when she gets back.

If this leads to new Name for Vivienne, as seems likely ... right now, from what Hakram is thinking and doing, I'm leaning towards something like Counselor or Advisor, maybe Castellan.

Someguy

My money's on a golem hand, an animated gauntlet that he can take on & off with multiple weapon/tool functions.

Rook

Most likely artificial, leaving the stump mostly as-is might also be an option depending on how he plays it. Stories do have a tendency to make dramatic physical disabilities translate into strength or competency. The classic blind master/wounded warrior shenanigans. Eyeless master in Masego's case I suppose.

Cutting off his own hand as a blood oath? That's about as dramatic as it gets. The weight of it might end up allowing him to swing his axe with one arm harder and faster than he previously did with two, the laws of physics be damned.

Sparsebeard

Some kind of hook-like appendage perhaps?

That or a shotgun/chainsaw.

Dainsleif

How would they get a shotgun or chainsaw? Like, nothing in this universe is that advanced. Maybe the dwarfs. Maybe

daegone823

Nobody is going to make any disarming jokes, no off hand remarks I guess.

What is this guide coming to.

Faiir

Advisor was my first thought, but then we'd have two names in Woe starting with 'Ad', which I doubt.

I'm not sure whether Counselor's similarity to Chancellor is a point in favor of against. It would fit the theme of Cat doing almost but not really something Malicia forbade.

onedollargum

I have a feeling that Hakram's hand may not be coming back at all. Not if he's going to replace it with Vivienne.

Something "Hand"-related would be a good Name for her now, I think.

maresther23

Vivienne might be able to give him a new hand down the road, as a symbolic way to heal the rift between them.

Jason Ipswitch

Hand of the Queen?

Fits both the deputy and spymistress roles

James, Mostly Harmless

If Hakram is Cat's right hand, then Viv could be her Sinister Hand.

Drd

Hakram's replacement hand should be a Pickler special me thinks, sure she'd enjoy the challenge.

Javvies

Pickler could collaborate with Masego/another mage for a golem/clockwork hand, maybe.

But there are limits on how much someone like Pickler can do before getting into Red Letter territory, and that's just not worth it.

Drd

Clockwork-mage-punk hand, hmm? Certainly has its merits, and would balance the olde necromantic one from Warlock nicely. Can it charge up on the souls of those Hakram defeats, to unleash a mega combo kill when combined with Rampage? 😊

Javvies

That's certainly a possibility, but I suspect that it is more likely that Cat will make him a new hand, forged of Winter, before Hakram is in a position to get a replacement hand from Masego, and I think that it is unlikely anyone else currently in Callow will be able/allowed to get Hakram a new hand.

Miles

He's not getting a replacement hand – that's the whole point of this chapter.

Javvies

No, the point of this chapter is that he's not going to get his hand reattached/healed.

He cut his hand off to create a Pivot for Vivienne, simply reattaching his hand would ruin it.

An artificial replacement – later, after he's worked things out with Vivienne – has not yet been ruled out, and would likely be insisted on by Cat, if no one else.

antoninjohn

So he is not keeping a flesh hand, good there is no certainty in flesh only betrayal

Jane

Interesting, how Vivienne's concerns mirrors Cat's during her conversation with Akua. I wonder how a similar conversation would have gone between the two of them, instead of with Hakram and Akua? Or a conversation between Cat, Vivienne, and Akua? I can't help but think that all three would have ended up in the same place, but by different paths – Vivienne might be able to talk like this on her own, but I feel like she would feel driven to justify Cat's course. Maybe making some real course corrections if they were actually possible, but no talk of just giving up, because, as she says... There is no one else who can take their place, be it their fault or not.

Rook

I see it as Hakram being the enabler and Vivienne being the conscience. Hakram is the guy that helps push you forward when shit gets hard. Vivienne is the girl that pushes back on you when you start going the wrong way.

Both of them have their place in different contexts, Hakram could enable Cat into making a mistake, just as easily as Vivienne could cause her to flinch when she shouldn't. Cat needs to learn when to listen to whom as she grows, and Hakram isn't wrong at the end. She has been listening more to her enablers than her conscience recently. He isn't necessarily wrong in taking a step back here, although the devil will be in the details of it as usual.

The goal, after all, is to be fundamentally different than the Calamities or the Heroes or whoever else that came before, not just to be a stronger version of the same.

Azure

I think this conversation should have been something Catherine had with Thief, not Hakram, because again it's going to be Hakram pushing for what Thief wants as opposed to her doing it on her own two feet. It does not address the issue of Thief being devalued as Hakram is basically lending his influence to her. This is my main dissapointment with how this played out. In the end, she's still going to have to rely on Hakram's sufferance to be heard. It's nothing but a bandaid fix.

Jane

I don't know that I agree with that... One thing I've taken away from the last few chapters is how much the Woe needs each other; Indrani needs a surrogate family, Hakram needs to be part of something greater, Masego needs something to prod him out of his tower, and Vivienne needs people to listen to her.

Cat can provide these things on her own, at least to a degree, but it is better if they can work together without needing her; if Hakram starts to listen to Vivienne as well, if she can act as a moral voice for the group as a whole instead of just Cat, it creates a much healthier dynamic overall. I mean, if the rest of the group still tunes her out when they're talking, that's not really that much of an improvement, is it?

It's a conversation that Cat and Vivienne should have as well, but the conversation between Vivienne and Hakram was a necessary one as well.

usernamesbco

Seconded. Viv is wallowing in paranoia and fear paralysis almost entirely of her own making, and it paints her as weak and indecisive. A lot of her actions do that, actually. She tacitly allowed William's mind control angel plan even when she disapproved of it. Even after breaking from the heroes she was openly hostile to Cat, undermining her efforts without presenting a better option, but crumpled like paper during her confrontation with Hakram. Then she obsessed over him instead of examining herself or her own purpose and goals.

Hakram's grand gesture to put her mind at ease doesn't address the underlying issue. She needs to grow a spine.

She's probably my least favorite character. Zealotry is bad, but dithering is not better. All she does is dither and encourage Cat to do the same.

ayon96

Vote for the guide

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

sengachi

This story does a fantastic job handling the delicate issue of "okay so now we've (justly?ish?) murdered our way to the top for the 'greater good', how do we actually go about leaving behind a kingdom which doesn't just de-facto fall under the rule of the most powerful warlord around?". It's really interesting to read, and thought provoking in all the right ways.

muffin

It was never for good. It was only for Callow an their people. Because neither good not evil ever cared about their destiny.

NZPIEFACE

Aye, they're finally going to work on Cat's biggest issues.

Rook

A dismal fashion sense, an utter lack of subtlety, and the tendency to solve major problems by bleeding at it until it goes away?

Novice

Don't forget about her perceived height inferiority.

Fern

dismal fashion sense? if a cape sewn with the souls of your enemies was in the Gucci catalogue it'd be some hot shit. Kylie Jenner would have a Catherine Foundling Court Outfit within the hour.

Berder

Typo: "have the come out willing to murder in her name"
"have them come out willing to murder in her name"

IDKWhoitis

I'm starting to wonder about how far we are in the Book. Each book seems to get longer, so it wouldn't be weird if there was still ~30 chapters left. Story wise, I don't see an end point for this Book yet, and I'm not sure how I feel about it. Even in the middle of Book 3, we knew that Cat trying to murder Akua was really the only way that was going to end. By Chapter 47, we even knew the place, Liesse.

Book 3: Deal with Fae -> End the Fae issue -> Gather power to deal with Akua -> Deal with Akua.

I'm not quite sure where this Book is ending, is it with Cat breaking the Crusade? Maybe killing Malica? Getting the Liesse Accords signed? Like it's been 60ish chapters, and Cat still hasn't powered up from dealing with the Sve of Night, or chosen a specific direction from there. Like there's a lot of character development and movement going on, but no general current moving things along.

Book 4: Deal with invasion -> Fight Pitched Battle -> Deal with Dead King -> Deal with Drow?! -> Deal with Dwarves -> Deal with Sve -> ???????????? -> Profit! (Malica dead? Liesse Accords? Maybe Book 5? Tyrant?). This isn't even including all the side plots of what Hasenbach, Black, or DK/Malica are up to.

---

I do like Thief being Named again, but man, I hope she transitions.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Imo, with the way how the plot is progressing on the inclusion of non-human species (drow & dwarves) as well as how the Wandering Bard hasn't been set on stage as the official Big Bad yet, I think book 4 will end with Procer being defeated by the Dead King, which essentially flips the continent to Evil. This would set the stage for the Elves & Giants to come into play in Book 5 as they are considered the Elite Mooks of Good and would be Above-driven to fight against Cat in the next book. Cue the Elven King & Giant Monarch also being against the Bard because fuck her (seriously) + it seems likely that she'd somehow fuck them over before and we have the continent vs Wandering Bard kinda scenario.

IDKWhoitis

I feel like we should worry about possible Gnome involvement before Giants. Cat's reforms may be dangerous by their standards, while the Giants seem to hate the idea of working with Procer on principle. I can see Procer devolving into a shitshow with Dead King pulling out every trick and plan he has, while Cat goes to figure out how to deal with Malica.

The antagonist of this Book has been Malica, and only the threat of Procer crashing through was what kept Cat from doing something to her. Now that both Procer and Dead King are too busy to intervene, now is the optimal time for Cat to make a play. It would also fit the whole "Will Cat climb the Tower dynamic" between Akua and Thief.

I can see Procer losing, badly. The Dead King has been accumulating supplies for way too long (+/- at least 800 years.) He has probably bred at least ~20 generations of people in Hell, With a starting size of ~10,000. and if each one of those people are converted to troops (with endless morale and no need for supplies or rest) That's easily an army +1,000,000 strong. If he boosted population growth rates with incentives for larger families, and maybe efficient farming practices that the Gnomes couldn't detect or stop, that number may doubled the rate of growth.

He might have been dicking around with small raids every so often just so he could map out defenses and see defensive protocols.

Wry Warudo

After the dwarves showed up, I thought Book Five would be about the Bard, the Tyrant (and our good friend the Hierarch), the Ratlings, the Elves and the Gnomes, but it seems pretty likely we'll be seeing Neshamah as well since it's seriously doubtful Cat or the heroes will beat him by Book 4.

Yeah Nah Yeah

If I recall correctly, I read somewhere that EE intends book 4 to be 7 arcs, with the Drow arc being the third (Camps, Keter, Drow, ...). So strap in, we're in for the long haul.

Allafterme

My body is ready...

Yotz

Tangential as always my RAC (random associative comments) go, but once I stopped following a series after the author declared that next month the next book will be published. The second part of the third tome of the fifth book of trilogy. First trilogy, it seemed.

Me quitting was more related with quality of the writing in the said series dropping to overblown shite of distinctly ultra-purple pseudophilosophical kind than amount of words spewed, though – and that's coming from someone who thrives on purple prose and ice-cream kōans.

But then again – I consider Leo Tolstoy a talentless graphomaniac, so there's that, and a grain of salt.

Then there's Jordan, who once remarked that WoT would be a decalogy, for he knows only how the story started, and how it will end, but not what happened in between. But ten books would be more than enough to find out. Funny how it went.

And then was a rebirth of serialized literature with the spreading of Wild Weird West, which will be tamed all too soon...

What I am leaning to.

Different mediums, different ways to tell stories.

In the print form, end of the book would be with Cat deciding to venture for Keter, with it, Everdark, and so on being the next book... Maybe, mind you, or maybe not – professional editor is not I am.

So long as writing is to my taste, I honestly do not care for the standard template constraints beyond those that were implemented directly by the author for the benefit of the story.

For everything else – we shall see in due time.

Nafram

This looks like a turning point to me. The kind where things start to take a turn for the slightly better.

Despite everything that The Woe has done, Callow and its people have repeatedly been struck by disaster after disaster, danger after danger, and in the face of that they've barely managed to keep it standing.

Its finances are in poor shape after having to sustain war after war and rebuilding in between, its people hungry and its armies spent time and again. Public sentiment divided in regards to Catherine, her policies, the Greenskins, etc, and enemies and false friends everywhere. In a few words, they just can't catch a break.

But now, maybe, just maybe, the use of the added perspective from Vivienne will help make things a little bit better, and those little improvements will pile up until Callow finally knows peace and prosperity. For Vivienne Dartwick knows the heart of the Callowan people, and while the Named may lead the stories of kingdoms like a sailor might lead a ship, the sailor cannot sail without a ship. And so, now The Woe is finally in a position to properly steer the ship that is Callow.

Fern

It's all about building the kind of infrastructure that will let Callow become a regional powerhouse, not the battlefield of the continent. At the top level are partisans loyal to Callow and Cat, with Named assisting with matters both military and domestic. Juniper, the finest strategic mind of her generation, is creating an army that will secure all Callow's interests for the foreseeable future. Ratface was working on constructing the kind of beauracracy that would let this monolith even function, but it looks like that weight has fallen to Thief now.

In this world especially, great change cannot come without great power. They have the power, now it's time to see what changes they'll make.

FactualInsanity

Well, I stand corrected.

Both about not getting the resolution to this interlude arc for a while and about Thief making Hakram fix his hand. I wonder if Adjutant will be sporting a stump permanently, or get some sort of prosthetic replacement.

Storm blessed

You probably noticed, but the names at the end switched from their titles, their Names, to their actual names. It shows that they are moving past that boundary between them solely by name and Catherine's band, to understanding each other.

fbt

great bit. I do want to see more of abigail, i really liked her and now she's been hoist by the peter principle at it's finest..but this was a fabulous bit. TY

Someguy

There has to be an Underwater Empire of Merfolk/Cecaelias/Locathah/Deep Ones for Cat to “negotiate” with to counter the Invaders domination of surface Naval Combat right?

Yotz

Wgah’nagl?

Nafram

Does Callow even have port cities?

IDKWhoitis

If we are not counting Rivers/Lakes, then no, not really.

There are ports on the Lake, but it’s also been established Callow does not know how to Navy.

grzecho2222

Icebergs manned with undead

IDKWhoitis

Icebergs with hidden undead.

Imagine hitting an iceberg, you’re sinking, then zombies start boarding, one hell of a way to go.

Yotz

Dungeon Keeper Ami?

Letouriste

Uh, I was wrong last chapter. Vivienne will not give him a hand back later in the story, I guess now she will become that hand somehow.

Hakram was a frontline combattant until now but his role was all about support so there is a little contradiction, he could be stronger if he relie more on team play,metaphorically.

Yotz

My guess would be – she was kind of shell-shocked with his actions to act on spot, and by the point where she would muster enough will/trust to force him into that option, it would be too late. A prosthetic is still on the cards, though. Probably, some form of automatic scribe with a place to hold scrolls – a form of PDA to replace the palm.

The pen is mightier than the sword, as one extremely lewd punmaister once said.

Novice

"A man could sift through all of Creation and never find so much as a speck of this elusive thing called the greater good. Like all the most dangerous altars, it is entirely of our own raising."

I see that Terry Pratchett reference. And if it's not, well kudos because this reminds me of Death's speech in 'Hogfather'.

Snowfire1224

About how one can't find a molecule of Mercy, justice, hope (I think it was hope)? Interesting that the quote in the guide takes a more cynical look at it (that the idea of greater good can be dangerous) and Hogfather takes a more optimistic approach (that we need these things be human.)

ChillyPepper

Love the diskworld reference at the beginning. 🤪

chrono17

This makes me really happy. Now Catherine just needs to not screw it up bringing a horde of Drow back home with her.

IDKWhoitis

If Cat either "negotiates" with the Sve or flat out murders her for a greater hold on Night, she might not need much Drow if she could empower Callows to be the same level. Imagine a whole army with Eldritch abilities like the Watch on steroids.

I mean it could backfire horrifically, or it would be the laying of a winning hand. Cat always walks the line between those.

saiman92

Nice chapter! I didn't think the loss of the hand would be permanent... Also there's a typo in the title: it' giuoco pianissimo, not giouco pianissimio.

superkeaton

The background on mages was unexpected, but not unwanted, and it's nice to see them finally getting alone.

Death Knight

These interludes have been very boring.

May we please return to Black v Cordelia, Cat v Sve or if another interlude has to be delivered, Masego v Wekesa.

Thank you.

Jane

I really can't agree at all when you describe them as boring; these interludes have done a wonderful job of developing Cat's supporters as characters with their own concerns and goals. And as those closest to her, I would think such development is quite necessary.

Kel the Seer

I could see Thief transitioning into a name like Viceroy in a "Master of the Queen's Vices" sort of way. Something straddling Scribe and Chancellor without the same level of unobtrusiveness of the former or the ambition of the latter. If she is taking over Ratface's people, she would be in charge of those things, wouldn't she? It also doesn't rule out her keeping up the spy network to also enforce the Queen's law as part of her duties.

Also allows an easy pivot for the more accepted meaning if she takes over any satellite areas that Cat claims later.

Plus Viceroy (or Vicereine) Vivienne is alliteratively pleasing.

JJR

Did someone say 'viceroy'?

Screwfloss

Hope was always a most tempting cup to drink from, even when you knew the chalice might be poisoned.

Aha, you've captured what it feels like to root for a doomed sports franchise, like the Washington R-skins

NotQuiteHere

Can Cat still use her aspects? Or has she just lost the name she had in exchange for Duchess Of Moonless Nights? Is she the Black Queen? What's her Role right now?

(Sorry if I missed something obvious just kinda forgotten)

Javvies

It's unclear as to Aspect use – Cat has something very much like Fall still, but we haven't seen her use Take or Break since Liesse.

However ... she also has something similar to Take, in that she can, at least, take fallen enemies and turn their aspects into items.

As for Cat having a Name, technically speaking, she still has the Name of Squire, but it's largely been subsumed by Winter and two broken/failed/rejected Transitions from Squire. IIRC, the Name of Squire in Cat was said to be little but the gnawed on bones of a Name.

NotQuiteHere

Thx

Mike E.

That last line evokes images from King's Gunslinger series:

"Vivienne Dartwick spoke, under pale moonlight, and Hakram Deadhand listened."

"The man in black fled across the desert, and the gunslinger followed."

sport102blog2017

this and the previous one were really powerful chapters :0

---

Interlude: Queen's Gambit, Declined

"Fifty-nine: it is always better to interrupt a plan than carry one out. Your finest successes will always be the failures of your enemy."

- 'Two Hundred Heroic Axioms', author unknown

"You're in a damned fine mood, for a man who can barely stand," Ranker muttered.

Most would not have been to pick up on it, Amadeus thought, but the goblin marshal had been his friend for a very long time. Longer than the common understanding of goblin lifespan should allow for, but that was one of the subjects they did not speak of. Ranker had a right to her secrets, as he did his. The Black Knight tightened the woolen blanket draped over his frame, looking up at the night sky with the barest trace of a smile on his face.

"It's nostalgic, isn't it?" he said. "The few of us huddling in the dark, surrounded by a realm that would kill us all."

His detached force numbered two thousand, with Marshal Ranker in overall command as her sappers and scouts would be more valuable to their purposes than regulars or heavies. Cooking fires had been judged too much of a liability to be allowed even after a days of marching under his aspect that should have left any would-be pursuers in the dust: the legionaries had dropped their kits and made their beds on rough ground, not even bothering to raise fortifications beforehand. Ranker's decision, and one he'd approved of. Their pace was already taking the soldiers dangerously close to their breaking point, aspect or not.

"It hasn't been like this since the civil war," Ranker conceded. "The Conquest was orderly campaign, nothing like this one. Feels like we're making it up as we're going along."

"Planning too deep will be seen through by the Augur," Amadeus reminded her. "We stay a step ahead so long as we make short-term decisions backed by superior pace."

It was a little more complex than that, in practice. Thrice now the First Prince's fresh mage order had passed along auguries of where his legions would be headed, though their very interception meant that they were effectively worthless. Prediction and prophecy were different matters, after all. The former was very much avoidable, if known, while the latter tended to be like a sandpit: the harder you struggled, the swifter you drowned. Even those could be broken, of course. Prophecy was only ever the writ of one side of the Great Game, and if outcomes were so absolute there would be no need for Creation at all – according to the Book of All Things, anyway. Still, even the predictions of the Augur were an exceedingly dangerous tool for the opposition. Considering how sparsely it had been used and the recent revelations as to the forces stirring up north, Amadeus suspected that if the Dead King had not been on the move and requiring the soothsayer's attentions this campaign would have been much more troublesome.

"I'm aware," she flatly replied. "And I have some fond memories of the old days, do not misunderstand me. But back then we were still young. To our places, to our powers, to our stories. It's been a long time since we were any of that."

"Sing we of foe," he softly hummed. "Of victories won, and that first woe, tyranny of the sun."

"You know I hate that song, Amadeus," Ranker grunted. "It's the anthem of old defeats, a ballad of ruin."

"It was a cold, clear look at what we were when it was written," the Black Knight said. "We are no longer that, yet I suspect we never truly outgrew the sentiment."

Like a poisonous old friend, it had been clutched tight even as the fangs sunk in and venom spread. The Tyranny of the Sun, for the most famous verse of the song was the title as well, had been written near the end of the Sixty Years War. Arguably the most brutal slugging match between two sovereign powers in the history of Calernia, and it had left both Callow and Praes smoking ruins in its aftermath, peace coming largely because neither side was still capable of continuing the war. Dread Emperor Nihilis had retreated to the Blessed Isle with his armies and ended it without ever signing formal treaty, but he'd died failing to rebuild the Empire and a hundred years of murderous mediocrity had followed until Praes recovered enough to embark in its disastrous waging of the Secret Wars. In some ways he suspected the Sixty Years War had been more traumatic an experience to Praesi culture than the collapse of Triumphant's empire a century and a half earlier. Triumphant had known success before meeting her doom. The parade of Emperors and Empresses who'd waged war on Callow for sixty years had known much of the latter and little of the former.

"We," the goblin chuckled. "There's a word growing thinner by the year. We are exiles in more way than one, Amadeus. You saw to that after Akua's Folly."

"It is not the first time I've been told I should have tried to climb the Tower," the man shrugged. "It will not be the last, I expect. It would have been a self-defeating enterprise to wage civil war in the Wasteland with Procer assembling its armies just across the border."

"The Clans would have come out for you," Ranker said. "Most likely the Tribes as well. The Matrons smell weakness, Black, and there's only ever one way they react to that."

"I can think of few things more foolish than to underestimate Alaya," he quietly said. "Even now. She's never been one to act without a plan, and that we do not understand her moves should be source of fear and not contempt."

"Odds are she's the one who made a pact with the Dead King," Ranker said.

"It could have been Catherine as well," Amadeus frankly admitted. "She thrives in chaotic situations. It's led her to the bad habit of creating them knowing it improves her chances of victory even if it significantly increases collateral damage as well."

"The Black Queen," the goblin mused. "There's another trash fire of a situation. One you've stepped lightly around."

"The Conquest was a way to achieve objectives," Amadeus said. "The annexation was ultimately a consequence, not the purpose itself. I hardly mind surrendering unnecessary gains if the actual objectives are met through the gesture."

"The arithmetic holds," Ranker sighed. "It always does with you. But there's more to this than the numbers, old friend. We made an order of things, and now it's crumbling."

"And now you wonder what will replace it," Amadeus said. "And if in that new order, we will still have a place."

"Some might say it's too early to start thinking about after the war," she said. "You and I know better. No point in even seeking a victory if when achieved it leads nowhere."

"A better world," the Black Knight murmured, looking up at stars that were not those he'd been born under. "Oh, I have wondered. What it might mean, what it would look like."

"We made one," Ranker said. "It's on fire now."

"And who set the flames?" he smiled. "Cordelia Hasenbach. Catherine Foundling. Kairos Theodosian. Children, in our eyes. Yet is it not the right of the younger generation to look at the work of that which came before it and judge it insufficient?"

"So they're right, and we'll be swept away like dust by the new age," Ranker said, sounding distinctly unimpressed.

"I still do not believe," Amadeus of the Green Stretch murmured, "that I am wrong. That our methods, our works, are to be so easily discarded. If these younglings want to prove themselves worthy of shaping the world, well..."

He bared his teeth.

"Let them come," he said. "Let them earn it. If they can surpass us, then the sin is ours."

"And if they can't?" Ranker asked.

"Then they fall into line, or face destruction, and we fight one last great war," he said. "The one that will matter."

The two of them remained silent for a long time, seated at the edge of the camp. In the distance, the barest glimpse of the town of Saudant could be made out. Just a lakeside township, one of hundreds in the region. Amadeus doubted the name of it would be remembered as more than a footnote in histories, for no battle would take place there even if he'd been wrong. Under the light of the stars, the Black Knight pondered Providence and the coward's wager that was Fate. He did not sleep, even tired as he had become.

With dawn he would know if he had once more cheated the Heavens at dice.

—

Gauthier Legrand had served as ranking captain of the guard of Iserre for thirty years now. He'd served Prince Merlaux before Prince Amadis ascended the throne and been appointed to his title by the old prince, but there'd been no talk of having him replaced even when the young prince took over and began inserting his own partisans in posts of influence. This he attributed to the fact that he'd carried out his work steadily and honestly, avoiding court politics and the intrigues intrinsic to any of Procer's royal seats. He was not unaware that his occasional bluntness and refusal to earn favours by offering plum positions to the kin of the influential had led some to consider him simple, though the more polite phrased it as him having 'a soldier's spirit'. Gauthier did not mind. As long as they considered him an idiot they would not attempt to involve him in their little schemes, and he rather preferred it that way. Iserre had only grown larger and wealthier under Prince Amadis, but that rise had come with the troubles inevitably associated with a city expanding. Maintaining order and the rule of law was toil without end, especially in a land where both could change face at the whims of the ruling prince.

Amadis had done well by the city, he'd always thought, and the principality as well. Their prince had kept them out of the worst of the Great War with cunning diplomacy and duly reaped the benefits of Iserre's rising prominence when the steel returned to the sheath. Old Prince Merlaux had shown a better touch with the commons, that much was true, but his son was a much more able administrator. The guard's funding had swelled under Amadis, and their equipment was now match for many of the fantassin companies out there making a trade of war. It'd seemed an unquestionable boon at the time, but now Captain Gauthier was forced to question. Not a state of affairs to his liking. The principality was under assault by wicked Easterners from the Wasteland, and to everyone's dismay the general levies that had preceded Prince Amadis going on campaign had bled the land dry of men in fighting fit. Iserre itself was the capital of the eponymous principality, and so had kept a garrison of two thousand professional soldiers, but the guard's equipment was only marginally inferior and it numbered five thousand.

In principle the defence of the city was the responsibility of the commander of that garrison, Antonine Milenan. In practice, their leader was middle-aged drunk whose entire experience with martial life was a span of three years with a fantassin company that had never left Iserran borders during the Great War. She had, allegedly, commanded a victorious skirmish against bandits. Rumour had it they'd actually been terrified refugees from Salamans but that in her drunken rage she'd refused to see a difference. There was a reason that Antonine had not been given a command in the crusading host, and Gauthier supposed that a few months ago giving her command of a garrison that would never see combat had seemed a discreet way to set aside a cumbersome relative for his prince. Now that the Wastelanders had come, however, it meant that the woman had been quietly placed under guard in the palace where she could make no trouble. An unfortunate measure prompted by a well-lubricated evening where she'd decided to order the garrison of Iserre to sally out and 'disperse the foreign rabble on the field'.

And so Captain Gauthier Legrand now led the defence of Iserre.

The responsibility alone would have been difficult to bear, but as the effective commander he'd been the one to receive the secret orders from the First Prince of Procer. Penned by a scribe, most likely, and the content would have been decided by her officers – Hasenbach was a well-known oddity, a Lycaonese with little taste or affinity for war. Gauthier saw the cold sense in the letter he'd been delivered. With only two thousand soldiers, his guardsmen and whatever peasantry he could arm and send to stand on the walls his defence of Iserre was a risky enterprise. The easterners might be impious demon-worshippers, but the Legions of Terror were known to be one of the finest armies on the continent and their generals were of high renown. The captain knew himself to be no great tactician, and hardly a soldier besides. He had dwarven engines on the walls, due to his prince's foresight, but few and few men trained to use them. The devices were well-known to be finicky and prone to breaking anyway, rarely lasting more than five years under regular use. Rough handling might see a few unmade before they could even be properly put to work.

And yet here he was, reading a report stating the Legions were but a day's march away and considering treason.

There were no two ways about it, disobeying the First Prince's orders would be high treason. The Principate had declared a crusade, her authority in military matters was absolute. Gauthier was not a soldier, which in different times might have provided him a way out, but as the commander of the city's defence he was charged to obey any and all orders bearing the seal of Cordelia Hasenbach. The actual text of those was delicate and regretful, but the heart of it a brutal thing: after short defence on the walls, he was to draw the Praesi inside Iserre and set the city on fire around them. His troops were then to evacuate and join the relief forces sent by the Dominion, to fall upon the easterners while they were freshly bloodied. Iserre, as of Prince Milenan's last royal census, counted over a hundred thousand souls between its walls. Gauthier knew it was more than that, perhaps as much as ten thousand more who were foreigners and so unrecorded or too estranged from the law to want their presence noted in anything as official as a census.

He would not be allowed to evacuate them. Their panic, the letter noted, would prevent the Praesi from pulling out their forces in time by clogging up the streets.

He wrestled with the decision throughout the night. Handpicked men discretely prepared the blazes, for he did not give the order now it would be too late afterwards, and when dawn came Iserre had been turned into a pyre. It was the arithmetic of it that stayed with him. There were, according to reports, perhaps fifteen thousand easterners and not even half that many bandits with them. A host of twenty thousand at most. And his orders were to burn alive five times that many to wound the Praesi. He would be damned in the eyes of the Gods, if he did this. Yet how many more would die in towns and villages, if he did not? Not merely in Iserre, but all over the realm. Duty and faith tugged him different ways. Midmorning saw a Praesi envoy reached the city. The offer made was as brutal as the orders of the First Prince: should Iserre surrender its granaries and treasury, the city would be spared a sack. If it resisted, all armed inside the walls would be put to the sword. Gauthier rode out himself to speak with the envoy, to the gaze of Evil with his own eyes.

The thing across him was green of skin, one of those creatures they called orc. A barbarous monster that ate human flesh and lived only for blood and rapine. There was nothing in its eyes but hunger, Gauthier saw. A small woman with ink-stained hands and the colouring of the Free Cities stood by its side, though she remained silent. Some kind of servant, he suspected.

"The terms will remain as offered," the orc said. "Negotiation is not on the table."

"You're a long way from home, greenskin," Gauthier said. "Fighting the wars of humans."

"We go," the envoy said, "where the banner goes."

"Your banner has come to the Principality of Iserre, Gods take you all," the captain said. "We do not bow to foreigners. We do not bow to servants of the Hellgods. If you want your fucking loot, come and take it."

"A respectable choice," the orc said. "But you may come to regret it."

"Tell your masters this is Procer, not one of their slave cities," he spat out. "Test our walls at your peril. We were there, when the Tower fell. We will be again."

The words, though defiant, were as ashes in his mouth as he rode back to Iserre. He'd just ensured the city he'd spent his entire life guarding would either suffer fire or a bloody sack. The Legions of Terror arrived past noon, and he watched them spread out from atop the walls. Dwarven engines stolen from other cities and armories were brought to the fore, their shapes changed by the devious goblins – which rumour said were dwarves corrupted into foul form by the touch of the Gods Below. The easterners and their traitor auxiliaries built their camps and only began bombardment under cover of nightfall. The city's walls had been rebuilt fully early in the Great War, and so they suffered but did not break. Gauthier feared not the stones, only the assault of the steel-clad soldiers. Two more days passed, with only one breach to show for it – quickly filled by sacks of sand and gravel at his order – but time was running out. The assault would come soon, he knew, and the decision he must make with it. Duty or good? Gods forgive him, but as the fourth night fell Captain Gauthier made his decision. Better he be known a traitor than a butcher. When the assault came, he would empty the city and ride to Salia for his trial.

Then dawn came, and with first light came the realization that the Praesi were gone.

—

"Steady," Amadeus ordered. "I want no incidents."

The town of Saudant's entire defending force had been a sum of thirty militiamen, who immediately folded when they realized how heavily outnumbered they were. There'd been actual soldiers behind them, though, who had fought: the Levantines had left four hundred soldiers to guard the fleet of barges that had ferried them across the lakes at the heart of Procer. None had surrendered, even when such an outcome was offered on rather lenient terms, and five barges had been lost to fire and fighting before they could be eradicated. A regrettable loss, but Amadeus had burned ships himself not a day later. The barges had carried thirty thousand Dominion infantry, while he would at most move twenty thousand soldiers himself. Having no intention of leaving Procer with any ships after he passed, the surplus had been put to the torch.

The sailors and captains to which they belonged had been furious, but they were not armed and so in no position to contest his orders. The First Prince had assembled this fleet by requisitioning merchant trade, not building warships, and considering piracy was night-inexistent in Proceran waters the merchant sailors had rarely carried anything larger than a knife. They were also less than eager to die for the sake of the Lycaonese ruling Salia who'd pressed them into service, which meant his assurances that the sailors would be released unharmed after ferrying his own troops where he wished had been received with more gratitude than hostility. Amadeus had taken pains to be accommodating with them, as Praesi were poor sailors as a rule and the Legions largely unfit for sailing ships. Some Thalassinans in the ranks had middling experience at sea, but too few and those few had too little practical experience to properly captain barges. It might be possible to proceed without the sailors, but only at a snail's pace – which would rather defeat the purpose of acquiring the fleet in the first place.

The legionaries he'd called out after nodded at his order, moderating the language they used when speaking at the locals loading the ships. Finding out there were still supplies in the town meant for the already-departed Levantine army had been a pleasant surprise, implying he'd caught the very end of the enemy supply train without meaning to do so. He was not a fool, of course, and so he'd checked the grain and foodstuffs for poison. Hasenbach might have grown desperate enough for such a stratagem, even if the Levantines were not. None had been found, and he'd been pleased enough at the discovery to dole out a portion to the inhabitants of Saudant as incentive to load the rest more quickly. Barely more than a thousand people overall, and so easily appeased by the notion of being assured of plentiful stores throughout winter. Sadly the general levy by the prince of Iserre had meant few capable of hard labour remained, but he'd assigned a few legionary companies to help matters along.

Leaving the docks – and the friendly shore around them, where lack of space had dictated most barges would actually end up – Amadeus found Ranker awaiting him at the nearby tavern he'd appropriated as temporary headquarters.

"They have fishing boats," the goblin marshal informed him immediately. "At least a dozen."

"Not enough to ferry a significant amount of men," the Black Knight noted. "Sinking them brings little profit and antagonizes the locals. Leave them be."

"At least order them beach for a few weeks," Ranker said. "Otherwise some enterprising soul might try to find out where we're headed."

He nodded after a moment, though in truth he doubted their destination would be much of a mystery. Even if the Augur did not divine it, the strategic situation would make it obvious. By now Grem and Scribe should have lifted their 'siege' of Iserre, having remained there long enough to draw in whatever forces had been sent to relieve it. They'd hurry towards the nearest shore, where the fleet Amadeus has just seized would be awaiting them. From there, they could leave their pursuers to stew impotently on the wrong side of the Principate while they struck at easier targets.

"Have you decided where we'll be headed, after?" Ranker asked.

"Still a matter of debate," Amadeus admitted. "Segovia would allow us to finalize our savaging of the First Prince's opposition, properly damaging her position."

"But you're thinking of Salia," the goblin said knowingly.

"We can't take the capital," he said, stating the obvious. "Even arming a third of that hive would allow her to drown us in numbers. But if we torch our way through its outlying territories, the sheer loss of prestige might see her unseated."

"Grem will call it risky," Ranker predicted. "I don't disagree."

"And so it remains a matter of debate," the Black Knight said. "We will discuss in depth when reunited with him and Eudokia."

There was a beat, during which the goblin studied him thoughtfully and openly.

"It's been two days since you last used an aspect," she said. "I expected you to be in better shape by now."

"I drew deeper than I have in decades," he candidly admitted. "And you know my well is shallower than most. I expect within a fortnight I'll have recuperated."

She nodded, after a beat.

"Gods, at least it worked," she sighed. "I half-expected a band of heroes to be awaiting."

"There are over a hundred thousand souls in Iserre," Amadeus said, avoiding even the slightest hint of smugness. "Souls at risk of slaughter, if left unprotected. So long as we were willing to carry out that ugly work, it was possible to dictate where the heroic intervention would take place. I expect Grem found the place swarming with their like. It would have been a beacon lit for every sword of the Heavens not gone north to fight the Dead King."

"There's no need to get smug," Ranker told him, eyes squinting.

Alas, sometimes there was no winning a battle. By the fourth day, they'd departed the charming little town of Saudant on surprisingly good terms with the locals. Legionaries were spread too thinly across the fleet for Amadeus' tastes, but there were enough mages along that any sailors with notions of patriotic resistance would be forced into restraint by their more fearful fellows. The fleet made good pace, for the first three days.

Then the sickness started.

It showed in the sailors first. Fever, sweat, weakness of the limbs and after twelve hours they were dead. Amadeus ordered any with the symptoms thrown overboard as soon as he first saw the disease. It was too clean and too sudden: there had been no sign at all before the fevers, the sailors being in perfect health. It was not a natural disease. Reluctantly, he ordered every Proceran sailor disposed of after the first legionary showed symptoms. It was too late, by then.

On the sixth day, Amadeus of the Green Stretch found he was the only person left alive of the entire fleet.

—

Tariq let out a panting breath when the last of the victims died.

There were Choirs, he knew, that treated their relationships with heroes as a sort of subjugation. The Hashmallim of Contrition, in particular, were known to be heavy-handed – though to this day he was uncertain whether it was because they bestowed upon only the desperate, or because such was their nature. As a young man, the Pilgrim had found that the Choir of Mercy demanded nothing of him. He'd simply been found to be of a like mind with the Ophanim, and so found them at his side. As if they had been there all along. They were more like old friends than patrons, never far from his thoughts. Always there with a whisper of comfort in hard times, a reassurance when the world seemed dark. They shared, after all, the same mandate.

The alleviation of suffering.

Tariq had no longer been a young man when he'd understood the frightful depths of that simple sentence. He'd thought, as mortals often did, that angels saw through his eyes. Understood his thoughts, his beliefs and his choices. The first, he thought, was perhaps true. The rest was not. The Ophanim were absolute, in nature and mandate. There were no shades to their perspectives, and while they might fondly tolerate them in one sworn to the Choir of Mercy that indulgence should never be confused for approval. The Grey Pilgrim had first understood this when he'd smothered his young nephew in his sleep, knowing the boy was charismatic enough to unite the Dominion and lead to war against Procer. He'd tried, first, to reason with him. To show him the pursuit of old grudges through blood could not redeem a single thing.

The young never listened, he'd learned. And so old fools like him had to smooth out the sharp edges of Creation.

Praesi, he'd been told, believed that Good only came in certain shapes. That it must obey strict boundaries and rules, that it must rely on little tricks like Providence or angelic intervention. An understandable misunderstanding. For all that the raving Tyrants who climbed the Tower liked to style themselves anathema to all children of the Heavens, they'd rarely fought opponents beyond Callow – where heroism was so deeply linked to war that a villain waging one was now seen as good. Praesi had learned to bury and defeat a certain breed of stories, after millennia of butting heads against them. But oh, that was such a shallow understanding. The world was large, and so few ever saw more than a speck of it. There were as many stories as there were peoples, and to build one's understanding on but a fraction was to raise a tower on quicksand. The Black Knight, Tariq thought, was not a stupid man. But he'd been arrogant enough to think he saw all the rules of his world, and arrogance was ever the death of villains.

Crafting the plague had been easy as snapping his fingers, and mayhaps that was the most distressing part of it. The Enemy delighted in displaying its power, raising massive contraptions or weaving elaborate schemes to praise its own cunning and cleverness. Like it was the only side capable of doing those things, like it wasn't a choice to turn away from the unsightly means of the Gods Below. The Grey Pilgrim could have birthed diseases and disasters that would raise the hair on the Warlock's neck, if he so wished. But power had to be used responsibly, turned to moral purpose, else it could only ever be a form of tyranny. And so Tariq had wept, and asked for the guidance of the Ophanim to create a disease that would undo the Black Knight and all his murderous designs. It was not so far removed from healing, to make someone's body turn on itself. To allow it to spread had required learning deeper than his, but as always the Choir had provided.

At a small price, a reminder of what he wrought. He would feel the agony of all taken by the disease.

He'd come to Saudant a stranger on a dark night, and seeded this foul miracle in a single man before taking his leave. Ten days and ten nights it would wait, before beginning to kill. That the Black Knight would come to the sleepy little town had never been in doubt. By the man's perspective, heroes could only go to Iserre. He was making sport of decency by forcing their hand with a threat before stealing away a fleet to spread even more death. Where was it written, Tariq had thought then, that Evil will have monopoly on ruthlessness? He'd awaited close, with Laurence and four other heroes for company. Far enough such a small party would not be noticed, close enough he could ensure none of the sick would leave Saudant and spread the sickness to the rest of Procer. The Praesi had come, the Praesi had gone, and he'd followed in their wake. Laurence, in her own kind way, had offered to purge the town for him. He'd refused, and offered the Last Mercy himself.

This would be his own sin, from beginning to end.

They followed the villain after, taking fishing boats. No need for anything as gaudy as a barge, when they were only a handful. It was not difficult to find the Black Knight. He was at the centre of a fleet of dead men, a ring of ships adrift in the lake. Tariq was the first to climb aboard, though Laurence was not far behind, and they found him awaiting on the deck. Standing straight-backed, armoured in old plate without having bothered with a helmet. He watched them approach in silence, pale green eyes emotionless.

"We finally meet, Black Knight," the Grey Pilgrim said.

The man did not reply. He was eyeing the others, gaze lingering on armaments and armour. Guessing at Names, guessing at powers. Already planning the span of his last stand. Yet Tariq felt no power coming from him, no presence. As if his Name had been snuffed out. It might very well have been, the old man thought. The Gods Below reserved only one fate for a lame horse.

"Surrender," the Pilgrim said. "This will not end well for you."

"It was never going to end well," the green-eye man smiled. "That was rather the point."

His sword cleared the scabbard with a ringing sound.

"Let's see," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said, "if I can at least leave a mark."

---

JD

So, I'm quite impressed by Grey Pilgrim's plan here, but is it possible that this is another fetch of the Black Knight? Similar to how he fooled the White Knight?

Like seriously, what are the odds that Ranker was the traitor (arranged for the killing of the generals at the end of Book 3), and so when Black saw the potential for this plot he took his "surplus" marshall, enough troops to spring the trap, and sent a fetch that Ranker didn't know about?

NZPIEFACE

Low as shit

tizzio caio

if he goes i want this all conflict get serious with all rest creation/continents involved, or at least time to kick on some hive ass myth creatures like gnomes

Javvies

No, my money is on Malicia for the killings of the generals at Liesse.

It weakened Black and the Legions, preventing them from carrying out the final purging of the High Lords. In addition, Malicia was planning on capturing Diabolist's work intact and useable, if more limited, by Warlock. She expected Liesse to become her nuclear weapon/enforcer of peace through superior firepower/superweapons/Hellgate generator, rendering the Legions (and Black) irrelevant to the strategic security of Praes.

Anonymouse

Or maybe it was Catherine all along, killing Juniper's mother so she wouldn't have any second thoughts about going against Praes

Javvies

...

Cat as a suspect is a ridiculous hypothesis. On so many levels. I'm not even sure where to start.

I must therefore assume that you're trying to be funny for some reason, and must inform you that your attempt at humor has failed rather miserably.

Barthumphries

We must suspect Cat at least so we can better see how someone might attempt to frame her for it.

Javvies

Except nobody who could've done it is dumb enough to try to frame Cat for it. Especially when an obvious suspect like Akua is available. For that matter, Akua would've been the prime suspect and stayed the only real suspect without the break between Malicia and Black.

Hell, framing Cat for it just makes it obvious that somebody deliberately assassinated Istrid and the others and wants to point blame somewhere, instead of it being the misfortunes of combat.

kelioez

eeeeee

Author Unknown

It was stated in an earlier chapter that Grey Pilgrim has never lost a fight, and here we see why: He is perfectly in tune with his choir, not letting mortal morality color his actions.

Outsomniac

There's nothing above loves more than a very high body count.

How can Tariq claim any kind of moral highground when neck deep in a diseased swamp like this without realising "well I didn't murder many innocents" and "I'll feel everyone's suffering" just don't cut it?

Dancer

Is he really trying to claim a moral highground? That's Black's conception of the world- a narrow and simplistic one, as suggested this chapter.

He's the "Grey" Pilgrim.

Jeffery Wells

He claims to do it for moral purposes. That is claiming the moral high ground.

To my mind, he and Laurence are at least as evil as Malicia, if not more so. Above is just as evil as Below, they just go about their evil in a more palatable way.

mavant

N0000000

tizzio caio

Fuck NO, dont you dare there to do it like this!

edrey

i would rather l8ke see cat saving him with the power of night, after all the middle of a lake is perfect for the queen winter but that doesnt look likely, that should be the reason for malicia envoy to callow

Novice

Gods damnit, of course Black dies without that last reunion with Cat. I don't even know why I expected otherwise.

SilentWatcher

Assuming Black dies, what are the consequences? a whole lot of angry villains like Cat, Ranger, Scribe, Warlock maybe even Malicia. This could lead to a "Lone Swordsman Truce" between Cat and Malicia and lets not forget the Curse of the dying Breath when a villain dies. They would doom themselves with killing Black.

Still i hope he fights an epic Battle and escape to Grem and Scribe. His Chances should be good, because hes facing 5 heroes ("Heroes" which sacrifice a Town to kill an enemy LOL)

SilentWatcher

Where is that guy who always urges you to vote? Probably did not like this chapter. Go vote!

Allafterme

I think he is traumatized like the rest of us...

ArkhCthuul

Likely.

I mean that was so much anticlimax for black its almost insulting.

And Grey. A pilgrim is the more. Ruthless and deadly of the 2. And Sword Saint the kind one.
Ouch. Choir of mercy...

MetruX

cat and Malicia won't make peace especially with his death, both will be blaming the other for what happened after the doomsday device. And if the curse was trully that powerfull both the Pilgrim and the Saint would be dead already, they have killed plenty of Villains.

But more than that, being a Hero in this setting is merely conforming with Above, it really doesn't matter anything else. They only like to say they are better people.

Fern

oh shit, I never thought about that. If the hated enementor kills Black he's probably going to have a hopped up and pissed of Ranger on his tail on that note, could the Saint take on Ranger? I remember Cat mentioning that her power reminded her of Ranger's, but I don't know if that was guesswork or if they're actually in the same league.

Javvies

Cat called Saint just like Ranger, except with a somewhat more socially acceptable reason for killing and a shinier coat of paint/ better PR. And as such, there was no point talking to her. It was one of the parley attempts. I think either the one before the first battle, or the one after Cat woke back up.

That said ... while Saint could, perhaps, hold her own, at least briefly, against Ranger in a straight swordfight, if Ranger goes after Saint for vengeance for killing Black, it's not going to be a straight fight, it's probably going to be more akin to an assassination/execution. Plus, Saint is old, and no longer in her prime – she doesn't have the endurance to last long against Ranger, even with a heroic second wind. Heroes don't get the non-aging benefits that come with a Villain Name.

Ranger is both a Villain, so she doesn't age, and she's a half-elf, with literally centuries of experience, and remember Ranger's Aspects – Learn, Perfect, and Transcend. Saint is good, sure, and has Hero-cheats, but if Ranger wants Saint dead for serious, rather than just a good fight, Saint is dead meat waiting to happen.

eaglejarl

I really, really hope that Ranger takes notice and makes the Grey Pilgrim eat himself.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Outplayed. That was the only way it was going to end, eventually, for Black and he knew it. I thought this might happen when the dice metaphors came in – you can only beat the odds so many times after all. I only wish Black had managed to take a bigger chunk out of Procer before biting it as one final F*** you to the Heavens

Metrux

There is still a Scribe, a general and a dragon on the loose, I rather think they can do some destruction after Black is gone.

Euodiachloris

Taking a chunk out of the Heroes will have to do. Hopefully, a chunk Bard wasn't calculating for. <_<

NerfEidolon

Hello there fellow name brother.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Brilliant, brother. I see you are a man of culture as well.
Now we only need NerfContessa to show up and we will be complete

NerfContessa

You called for a Door?
^^

shieldredblog

I feel like this whole plague thing might be a mistake.
Especially considering the grey Pilgrim doesn't actually control it.

Black: Sends infected zombies underwater to major Proceran cities.

Dead King: "Oh, hey. Free plague."

Exec

Procer: *exists*

Dead King: It's free real estate.

Greg

That seems like a fitting last "screw you" from the chief Calamity, "forcing" the heroes to give him a tool to murder a country with.

Bonus points for his last words being something that throws Tariq's musings on how Above is just as good at being ruthless back in his teeth. "You finally showed your true colors ... pity you forgot how much more practice than you we have at swimming in the deep end."

I hope this isn't actually Black's end, but if it is, well, they provided him the power his Name lacked to make a fitting dying curse.

werafdsaew

Thief's admonition of Lone Swordsman in Book 2 comes to mind: you cannot win by fighting Evil with evil because Evil is a lot better at it than Good, and Good wins by being the underdog anyways.

LM

This is a satisfying death for the Black Knight. I didn't think it was possible to write one, great job!

Morgenstern

Really? I would feel overly UN-satisfied if THIS were "it".

Letouriste

Same. Pretty sure this is not the end. These opponents don't have any drama with black. There is no real story here and I doubt this fight is not in black plan

TeK

Hey, chessmasters. I'm more of a Go guy. So tell me. Queen's gambit is declined and the white bishop threatens the black knight. What's the next move by Black?

Itaywex

I'm not much of a chess master, but I did read a bit about this specific state.

The Queen gambit has been offered by the first Prince (presumably taking that city), and has been declined by the black Knight via trying to manouver around.

If it is indeed a chess move allegory it means that now it is Black's move with the black Knight between a white Bishop and the black queen.

If the black Knight moves out of the way, the Bishop can take the queen. But if he doesn't, the Bishop takes the black Knight, but will be taken by a pawn a turn after that.

It seems like black is allowing himself to be taken. So does it mean he has a plan for the rest of his armies to hurt the first Prince (or the grey pilgrim's group) another way? Or does he have another (mundane) tool up his sleeve that can count as a pawn that would take out the grey pilgrim and his group?

Dainsleif

Mind you that the Black Knight is supposedly guarding the Black Queen in the chess move, funny how despite his "Let the younger ones try" comment earlier, he would (i assume) rather see to his own death than let Cat fail. Fucking Amadeus, bitch all you want about how adresssing the parental relationship between you two would be bad, youre an awesome father to the fucking end.

Morgenstern

I wonder if the sickness GP send can actually take him and the other heroes, too.... if that's truly according to those chess moves. Which would still be rather disappointing imho. I've come to much to hope for seeing Black living out some mundane remaining years, aging to an old man, peacefully, after Cat has turned over the whole board.

Zachary

I don't know if it's intended, but this metaphor is actually remarkably accurate.

Daniel Gazizov

Semi-slav defense is a continuation of Queen's Gambit Declined, and ends with the black knight trapped.

beleester

The Queen's Gambit Declined is so early in the game that the bishop and knight aren't developed yet, so the answer is basically `^_( )_/`.

Although Wikipedia does list one common variation of QGD that ends with a white bishop taking a black knight and then getting captured in turn.

Barthumphries

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Queen%27s\_Gambit\_Declined

It would depend on how the Bishop threatened the Knight because in that initial position the Bishop hadn't been brought out yet.

Euodiachloris

Flip pieces, flip the board, flip Pilgrim and Bard the bird...

Mike E.

Damn. RIP Ranker.

I refused to believe Black is gone until it is confirmed elsewhere (though I don't see GP and Regicide going out like this...)

KageLupus

That was honestly the hardest part of this whole chapter for me. Ranker had been through so much and lived so much longer than any goblin should have. Then she doesn't even get mentioned by name when she dies, just lumped in with everyone else who wasn't Black.

This chapter is also a really good example of how the forces of Good are not actually good or nice. Everything about the Pilgrim shows him to be a tool for things that do not care about humanity at all. Infecting even a small town with a plague just because it is convenient sounds very much like something that the other team would get condemned for, but since the Pilgrim felt bad about it it ends up just being a ruthless necessity.

It really is no wonder that Black and Cat are both so jaded and disgusted by the whole system. The “good” guys get to do the same things that the bad guys get called out for, but they do it without half the effort and still think they are on the moral high ground.

Passing_Through

It's not coincidence that the other half of the chapter is about an average Joe refusing to do the same thing. You could point out that the exact numbers are different, that Legrand refuses to burn a major city to damage the army while the Pilgrim infects a small village to destroy it, but it's still quite explicitly described as a decision between the right choice and the arithmetically prudent choice.

Decius

It's a victory for Evil that the order to burn the city was given.

It's a greater victory for evil that the plague was used.

It will be a victory for Black when the heroes learn that the order to burn the city was given, and that a village was given to the plague to infect the army. Maximum points if, the day after the siege is lifted, the presence of the preparations to burn the city is revealed (either by an accidental fire or by a fire marshal who isn't in on the order).

Dancer

It's almost as if it's not Heroes vs Villains – it's free people vs the people taking the easy route to power.

TLDR: I'm on Cordelia/Procer's side, and have been for a while.

John Galt

In the initial introduction, the Book of All Things states that the fundamental disagreement between the gods is whether mortals should be allowed to govern themselves/dictate their own actions. Quick hint: Evil/the gods below are the pro-freedom/choice camp. The heavens want automatons (just like their angels). “Good” and “Evil” are just the names that get assigned. That's right boys and girls, for those of you that haven't already realized it, "Good" is pro-slavery.

Dylan Tullos

John Galt:

Evil stands for "freedom" in the sense that they support the freedom of wolves. The strong will be free to do as they like with the weak.

Decius

The strong are always free to do what they want to the weak. That's what being strong and weak actually are.

Freedom is the right of the weak to try to oppose the strong; to rebel against their slaveowners and climb the tower.

Dylan Tullos

Decius:

"Climbing the Tower" simply means setting yourself up as the new tyrant. The oppressed become the oppressors, the subject becomes the master, but the Tower remains the same.

Evil basically involves worshiping individual "freedom" to the point that you become more important than anyone and everyone else. Good is not Good, but let's not pretend that Evil isn't evil.

Mike E.

I think that was done to emphasize that for all of the baddassness that Ranker embodied, in the end there are only Named, and everyone else.

Styn

Yep same ole same ole with the offscreening of beloved supporting characters. I'm once again appalled and disappointed.

Morgenstern

Me, too. If Ranker really shouldnd't get some continuation / fade-out in another chapter, revealing more of the background to the last situation in this chapter.

JackbeThimble

I'm honestly not sure if Ranker counts as 'Alive'. Anyway someone has to set off the goblinfire and give The Carrion Lord a badass funeral pyre.

grttt

I mean, Ranker wouldn't be a "man" so perhaps she's still about.

Euodiachloris

"No man of woman born: because female, because goblin, because you can go die in a fire." ;P

James

We don't know if Ranker is dead. It's confirmed that she has lived longer than a goblin's lifespan. So could be a goblin with a Name...since they don't dies from old age.

Miles

I think the point of that was that she's of a matron line (which live longer) or some other goblin secret like that

werafdsaew

We haven't seen her corpse yet, and there's no indication that she boarded the same ship as Black, or that she boarded any ship at all. There's still hope.

sugarrollblog

I don't think the Black Knight is going to die here. This is him cheating the heavens again with an Assassin clone and a small sacrifice of troops. We've seen this tactic from them multiple times already and it's in line with the narrative.

This is just like the Black Knight—taking a tactical loss for a bigger strategic gain. Grem's instincts were tingling before the attack on Iserre and it would be disappointing if Amadeus, a person known for his craftiness, dies by ignoring his most decorated general's intuition. This should have been obvious to him from where he stood.

The title of the chapter is also a clue. This is a gambit and the Black Knight is declining a major confrontation and is concentrating on the bigger picture.

Amoonymous

Agreed. The lack of name power coming from him could be as he said (running dry), or he could be playing another body-double style trick. It was also said Black wasn't using his Aspects for 2 days, so that's 2 days of time he could have slipped out.

I'm honestly like 50/50 on which happened and suppose we'll find out later. I'd be surprised if it's revealed next chapter; this seems like the kind of cliffhanger where it's only revealed in like 15-20 chapters whether he actually died or survived.

JackbeThimble

I think Black probably does die, but not without a parting fuck-you to the heroes. Either they're all about to go up in Goblinfire (who would have expected Black to take Triumphant's way out?) or he sent Ranker off with some plague samples and she's going to poison Salia's water supply or something similar.

maresther23

Leave a mark, go vote. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Dainpdf

You know, when I read this my first thought was "oh man, this is going to complicate the truce between Cat and Procer."

Because Black was like a dad to her.

Then I thought "Oh man, Scribe is going to have a fit over this. I hope dear Pilgrim is prepared for an angry Eudokia."

Because she is to Black what Page was to the Exiled Prince, in a way.

Then I remembered Warlock, and oh man all the shit in the Dark Day protocol. Pilgrim thinks his plague is bad, wait until Wekesa gets started.

I mean, he was ready to throw Cat's soul into some sort of timeless abyss if she betrayed the man.

And that was it for a while. I went about my day.

Just now, though, a single thought crossed my mind. "Oh shit, Ranger."

Farewell, Pilgrim. I shall remember you, everyone you love, your country, and the surrounding areas fondly.

PS: Poor Ranker and One Eye. They deserved better than to die offscreen. Or did I misinterpret and they escaped?

Novice

I believe Grem and Scribe was with the part of the Legion that was 'fake' sieging Iserre.

Dainpdf

Yeah, I wasn't sure if they had rejoined Black by then. Well, maybe they get to come back and rescue Amadeus =)
...yeah right. None of them are heroes, and Pilgrim has a full retinue. No such luck.

*frolamiz*

Yeah, what a good idea to use an uncontrollable plague in the middle of allied territory.

We know the Dead King is experienced with them and he could probably easily make use of it, but it may also be a trap from the Wandering Bard against him. I doubt she didn't know the Grey Pilgrim was planning it, and remember, she has her greasy hands everywhere.

Anyway, if I were Black, I would reanimate as much undeads as I can and send them in every directions (ok, maybe not into Callow's direction) to spread it. Remember, the Grey pilgrim did not feel any power from him even though he had some time to recover, so he had to use it before they came.

beleester

The Pilgrim's monologue specifically mentions that he kept the other heroes close to the town, so that anyone who left would be caught before they could spread the plague further. He has a plan to keep it contained.

Amoonymous

Black also threw a lot of corpses and living infected off the ship. Who knows where the currents will take them, or if when the numbers started dwindling he made zombies from the infected and sent them out (as frolamiz said).

Morgenstern

Yep, that, too...

*frolamiz*

Yes, they cleaned the town to prevent spreading. The thing is that Black has left it for days and the lake is really big. Around the size of a principality. And in the scenario I spoke of, Black would send undeads from his fleet, not the town.

Dylan Tullos

frolamiz:

Praes has tried to use magical plagues as weapons before.

It never works because priests have supernatural healing powers granted by the Gods Above, and they can simply cure the disease. Black's Legions were only vulnerable to the plague because they have no healing priests.

Metrux

Actually, I don't think this applies in this case. There has been countries destroyed by natural plagues before, only the ones made by Bellow have ben stopped by priests. And this one was made by divine intervention, Pilgrim himself said he needed the choirs help. I don't think the priests can stop this if they wanted to, which is why Pilgrim had a containment prepared. I mean, he has priestly powers, he could've cleansed them after the boats left, if it was that easy.

ketura

This one has no symptoms until you keel over ten hours after exposure. I'm not sure that Procer has enough priests to be able to just heal every single person as a matter of course.

ketura

* ten days

Shaerick 68

And once more we see that the only real difference between Heroes and Villians is a superiority complex and the names of their Gods.

SMHF

Losing all your men and being surrounded by a band of heroes; two of which are Pilgrim and Saint; when you've ran out of Name juice (is that the correct term?) is scary!

But what I find more scary is giving Black six days to plan...

Switch

I still don't see why Pilgrim and Saint are dumb enough to push this fight. A weaken villain surrounded by heroes is the story of the villain escaping and most likely taking one of the stronger heroes out first.

Letouriste

Uh what? I can't believe that wasn't part of black plan all along. I don't Think he will die, not to the hands of these guys at least. Storywise, i expect him to die after taking revenge for Captain or against someone like the white knight who has fate with him. The Grey pilgrim and the saint of stupidity are outsiders to any story related to him and I seriously doubt black can be brought down without a story. I expect the whole fleet to be a trick, that's a little too big and flashy by black standards... maybe that's not black but Assassin? Scribe never leave his side after all and she is with grem

stevenneiman

The whole point of everything he's been doing since at least when he met Cat was getting her ready to stand on her own once he was out of the picture, and it's pretty well-established that he regards his own life as a lower priority than his goals. If he's nearing his endgame it's entirely likely that he would arrange to sacrifice himself in exchange for doing something useful with the Grey Pilgrim, the Saint of Swords and their three cronies. That thing he does to them might be taking them with him, or planting a crippling weakness that Cat can exploit later, or even planting an idea that will manipulate their future behavior, but I'm sure he's up to something. Also, I'd say that the Grey Pilgrim is his closest equivalent, and he safely discharged whatever fate he had with Hanno with the "cheat providence at dice" showdown. Of note, the Queen's Gambit Declined is a move in which Black starts a slugging match at the center rather than ceding control to develop the rest of the board. Considering Cat's nickname, it would fit the analogy as well as the situation that it's to her advantage to clear off blocking pieces to give her greater personal freedom.

Letouriste

Black tricked them there. That was part of his plan, i'm sure of it. Weird we got to see that from his perspective tho. I really hope ranker is alive and well and...UNHOLY SHIT I GOT IT, black said he drew way deeper than he did for decades on his pool of power and i think he could have used it on something else than raising the troops speed and stamina...yeah, just a theory but maybe the whole army who stole the boats is fake? Some shadow power than black can only use in war situation, when all his aspects are in full burst! ...or maybe only the officers are protected

stevenneiman

My personal bet is goblinfire. Once they're all grouped up he sets off a mess of the stuff, and possibly arranges things such that Tariq has to choose between saving himself and protecting the three minor characters. To keep with his own story, he has to make a sacrifice, and even for someone with his skill and experience, goblinfire means even an unavoidable mistake means death. Of course, Black himself would go down in the blaze, but if it meant bringing down the two heroes who can match Cat's power AND forcing Levant out of the alliance (basically starting a chain reaction which will disintegrate the whole Crusade), I think Amadeus would happily take that trade. Assuming he wants something like the Liesse Accords, this (plus Cat returning to the surface with Drow fae troops, her cut of the Svae Noctis' power, and the partial support of the dwarves, will mean that she has the power to dictate them.

NotQuiteHere

And everybody dies.

Hastien

Welcome to Uncle Maddy's Pleasure Cruise, the most restful ferry this side of Salia. Entertainment lurks in every cargo hold, and our attentive staff of repurposed corpses will never be far. We have the best fireworks displays of the Grey Eyries brought to you when you least expect it. Be sure to try our one of a kind Goblinfire Baked Alaska, and end your days in our luxurious cabins at the bottom of the lake.

It might just be that I refuse to consider the alternative but I'm fairly confident we'll see Black rowing away from a flaming wreck with a donkey and jug of wine. If not could we at least have a on-screen death? A chapter of our merry band of heroes being brutalized by whatever he prepared for them would make me feel a little better about losing such an excellent character.

Switch

A rowboat, a donkey, and a pair of broken shovels.

Feanor

Gray Pilgrim just went full retard. What could possibly possess a man to literally hand a heaven sent biological weapon of mass destruction to THE CARRION LORD of all people? The Black Knight's whole point of invading Procer was to destabilize and wreak havoc inside the borders of the Principate. I think an unstoppable plague might just accomplish that better than an army of 20,000 legionaries. And it's pretty telling that one Ranker wasn't mentioned. She's probably leading a small group of barges to shore to unleash the Gray Pilgrim's Folly. And two, the quote at the top says wait for your enemy to lay a plan and then just throw a spanner in the works as every hero somehow innately knows how. But the Gray Pilgrim was without a doubt not the hero in this chapter.

NZPIEFACE

I just realized his name has fucking "carrion" in it. Ahahahahah, the GP is such a fucking retard. Sure, this worked, but at what cost?

Also, pretty sure Ranker is dead. No one escaped the plague.

Morgenstern

Yeah, it does feel like he should be fully powered up now. Or rather even over-powered...

LuL

Was there anything stopping them from going to the land and spreading the disease to Procer out of petty revenge?

Cause this seems like the obvious next step;
Take those that are still ok to the land.
Use Blacks aspect to make them march faster and split them into small forces.
Make each small group find a village and blend in and live normally, make a few other teams dress up as civilians and make them rush into big cities and spread it.
Sit back and enjoy the apocalypse.

Hey if that's not possible resurrect their corpses as undead give those undead to the few mages still alive and make them attack villages and cities instead, contact with diseased corpses would still doom Procer.

Miles

That's probably how they take the capital.

Send in infected soldiers or zombies, and let the infection spread to the general populace. The priests can't stop it because it's an act of the choir of Mercy

Tohron

Given that Black has avoided attacking civilians, I think the Pilgrim has now killed more Proceran civilians than Black did across his entire campaign.

Dylan Tullos

Tohron:

Black's Legions burn crops and granaries everywhere they go.

He's already killed thousands of peasants through famine. If he was allowed to reach central Procer, that number would grow to the tens of thousands, if not hundreds.

Goobinator

AFAIK, Procer was already playing with fire by conscripting so many able bodied peasants to begin with. It was already predicted that Procer would suffer food shortages because they went all in with the Tenth Crusade, thinking it would be a relatively easy and short term affair. Starvation was already going to happen, regardless of Black's actions.

Dylan Tullos

Goobinator:

You are correct. Black's actions were meant to make the situation much worse, turning a major food shortage into a famine.

If his Legions weren't stopped, they would have burned their way across Procer and left hundreds of thousands to starve. Grey Pilgrim's decision to sacrifice one town makes sense when we consider the alternative.

Miles

The town militia was 30 people. The full population can't be more than a hundred or 2 with a militia that small.

Morgenstern

The text said one thousand.

Morgenstern

The small number of militia was meant to show how Cordelia has ordered everyone into the army for the Crusade.

Anony

I'm gonna have to press X to doubt on this one. Black is slippery as fuck. He fooled White Knight with a distraction, seems likely he would pull the same ploy again. Especially with the whole Pilgrim not feeling any power from him thing.

What I find weird is that Grey is just going in there seemingly convinced he has won. Unless his contingencies are only to be revealed later I guess, but that's a bit cheap considering this was his pov.

If Black really dies here that will be seriously disappointing.

Cthulhu

Hi, I've spent the last three decades cheating against The Powers that Be, and then there's a fast-acting plague which kills my troops in 10 days and leaves me with no options and I can't do anything to try to escape.

I don't try to use my mages to call any of my allies or even people who will help me.

I don't try to contact Scribe. who could get a message to anyone almost immediately.

I don't trap the boats and blow everyone up.

I don't scatter my forces so that the disease hits everywhere.

I don't just try to flee.

Nope, instead I calmly split my forces, sail myself into a dead end, take no steps to protect myself, don't get help from any of the Calamities, and then try to kill six heros one-on-one.

This is a shit ending for Black. I hope there's an explanation.

Euodiachloris

More like "don't give Amadeus a good six-to-eight days of warning as the symptoms showed up during which he can plot".

Sure, Pilgrim might kill the guy. Maybe. But... his game won't have finished playing out.

Alivaril

I actually think Black is going to die here, barring that being a decoy (which is itself likely), but I certainly hope he at least spreads the plague if he does go down. Leaves a mark, as it were. I assume priests only have so much power to burn, and a disease with a longer incubation time means more carriers and more time to spread before it's noticed.

To quote the Dead King, plagues are not a valid strategy.

frolamiz

Well, plagues from Bellow. This one is from above, it may work =)

d0m1n1c

Pilgrim enacts overtly villainous plot that kills a city in order to get the black knight alone, then ambushes him with four other heroes.

If this is something that can work for "Heroes," then "Villains" shouldn't exist; why hasn't the pilgrim released a plague on the tower, or to prevent Callow from turning evil.

I think the pilgrim has grown a little big headed, and his choir is using Black to clean house.

Anony

Personally I'm hoping it spreads and Pilgrim gets functionally crippled by it as millions die in procer.

You know, the exact think that would happen if a villain unleashed an OP plague with such an obvious drawback.

grzecho2222

So nobody will talk about that even if Black dies, there is Someone Who Will Return and who says that She will return alone and not with something like Every Praesi Dead Villain Ever

Dylan Tullos

grzecho2222:

Black hates Triumphant and would never work for her.

grzecho2222

Not working under Her, but more like "Hey guys there is nice Hellgate over there, who wants to escape Hells and wreak havoc?". Less like one army, more like horde of them.

Dylan Tullos

grzecho2222:

A group of Heroes is called a "band". A group of Villains is called a "murder".

Most Villains murder each other in endless power struggles, even when they're supposed to be fighting Good. It's probably the single biggest reason why Praes practically always lost to Callow.

Pantasy

I hate to say it, I love Amadeus of the Green Stretch, but I think that's the end of the Black Knight. Pilgrim didn't use a story to enact his plan – just cunning and god-given gifts. It's as much a subversion of story as the previous Black Knights dying in anti-climactic ways.

It bothers me, because it feels like a prelude to the way the characters I/we've come to cherish are likely to go. Ratface died in the night of knives, Nauk's buddy died in ordinary fighting – sometimes Named die in a storyline, and sometimes they are just ended. The same goes for other named characters we like.

T_T

Goodbye, Black.

Switch

Except there is a story here. The story of a weaken villain confronted by a band of overconfident heroes. The kind of story that ends with the villain escaping and taking out one of the stronger heroes, most likely the wise old hero aka Pilgrim.

Miles

How does Pilgrim not see that?

Miles

Maybe he plans to be defeated and then come back as the Pilgrim of Many Colors

RanVor

Are you saying he secretly wants to be a bad guy? ...Yeah, that would fit alright.

Stuart Bernholc

If this is the end, it's too stupid for Black.

That's what this boils down to. He had tons of time to plan. He had mages that can scry. He can swim. He can raise the dead. There are all sorts of things he could have done to get away. It doesn't even require him to be that smart. He realized that this plague wasn't natural. If he's just one more in a sea of thrown-overboard victims, how are they gonna check every body.

There are hundreds of ways he could get away, put up a good fight, or both with his capabilities, even not knowing what's coming. This is too stupid a death.

Stuart Bernholc

It's out of character besides, so I hope that this isn't one.

warriormonk19

You're not wrong, but Black is far from invincible and he knows it. He knew that he would likely die in the hands of a hero, and very few heroes are as well traveled and versed in the ways of the Game as the Grey Pilgrim.

Also, Black has been exhausted this whole time, having had to stretch out his aspect over 15,000 freaking soldiers and prancing around Procer wreaking havoc on one of the greatest empires on the surface of Calernia singlehandedly. Necromancy at any scale that may have mattered may be beyond him at this point, and him getting caught in the plan of the Grey Pilgrim may have damaged his favor with the Gods Below, which in turn may have damaged his ability to draw on his Role or Name, as described by the Grey Pilgrim himself.

I will also be sad to see Black go, if he does. I guess we'll find out soon enough.

Thanks for the great chapter erratic!

NZPIEFACE

What's the point though? Even if he scries his allies, they'll just get infected by the plague. Even if he runs away, they'll just catch up.

They fucking got him. Might as well stay where he is and blow literally everything up.

Cthulhu

No, I don't think so. Scry W. Say, "Hello Old Friend? I've gotten hit with some sort of fucking plague. No, I'm OK, just worn out, but everyone else is going to die and I need to get the fuck out of here. Could you please come get me"

It cannot be that disease is a trump card that no one on the Evil side can cure. If that was the case, the Empire would have fallen ages ago. Hell, the mages were able to cure Cat with blood magic when she got stabbed. Sure, its not as clean as "divine" healing, but it works well enough.

NZPIEFACE

I have a feeling Praes is the type of place to burn the whole city to the ground to stop the spread of the plague.

And yeah, that might work, but Warlock is pretty preoccupied, otherwise he'd be with Black anyways. Also, what's the point of leaving if the only thing left is Black?

Jarthon1

Sve of night lay broken before her, power oozing and coiling like a snake. Cathrine turned and began to walk away. That power could be used, taken if she wanted, but the cost of dealing with the gods below was never cheap.

As she began to step down the delicately carved passageway a shudder ran through the world and it hit her harder than the corpse behind her ever could have. Black was dead.

Not believing it, even as she felt it in what passed for her soul, she whirled around, world moving for her rather than she for it. Night was ripped away from the corpse and woven into her mantle in a heartbeat. She barely felt it.

Half an eternity spanned the second that it took her to open a portal. Archer was calling out to her, but words were meaningless now. A giant hand of ice and glamor grabbed her companion and dragged her into Arcadia with her. The ice that should be locking her mind to that of a fay burned away in the face of her rage. The queen of winter demanded that her domain obey, and obey it did. Leagues fell away like footsteps and in seconds the gate was ripped open once more.

There he lay. There were heroes around him, and dangerous ones at that, but she could see nothing. Nothing but the face of the closest thing she had ever had to a father, cold and slack upon a boat deck. She sunk to the ground and cradled that face.

"I'm sorry child, but it had to be done." Said the gray pilgrim in a weary tone. "You shouldn't have come here. Now his fate must be yours as well. Grace is so often a heavy burden"

She whispered something to the wind.

"What did you say, child?" he asked

"Don't you know?" She whispered, voice hoarse "There is only one sin . . . One grace . . . And what I do today shall be nothing but grace"

Then she rose, and every body that had ever sunk to the bottom of this lake rose with her, eyes burning cold and blue.

Angel Botha

Actually gave me the shivers. 8/8

Skeptical Silver

I don't think Black is getting out of this one.

There's tons of foreshadowing that it's the end for Black, no matter how much we liked him. The quote at the beginning hints the best way to take down a villain is to interrupt their plan (exactly what Pilgrim did). Black tells One Eye and Co. he wants to "roll the dice one last time" (emphasis on last). There's also the talk with Ranker about how the "Tyranny of the Sun" song doesn't apply to them anymore. Lastly there is all this talk about how the "children" like Cordelia and Catherine will succeed them.

While it is possible its another Assassin clone, I just don't see it happening...using the same trick every time is lazy storywriting. Finally, I definitely don't see either Grey Pilgrim or Saint dying from this encounter-they have a much more important role in the larger story, hinted at several chapters before, where they will fight in one big conflict with the side of Good being led by the White Knight. Storywise, they can't die here. However unsatisfying this may be, its likely the end of the Black Knight, even named may not get satisfying deaths-just look at Captain.

Helirous

Not completely true. The saint received the call, the grey pilgrim however did not. So the pilgrim could have a potential red flag

Javvies

I kinda hate to say it, but Pilgrim is surviving this one – he still needs to have a reckoning with Cat for violating their deal and the oaths he swore.

Also, there will need to be some sort of internal reckoning amongst the Heroes/Crusaders – those who would prefer to win and by extension preserve the current status quo/Procer and “liberate” Callow from Evil, and those who want to set fire to the board and go for a Heavens-induced reset of Calernian power structures however far down the line it takes to get out from under the Dead King like Laurence and apparently Bard. Pilgrim will probably be needed for that too, since he claims to want to preserve Procer and the status quo.

That said, there are a number of unidentified Heroes with Saint and Pilgrim – those guys are in serious trouble. Although, since Pilgrim can resurrect them, they might not stay down permanently.

Plus ... Black would have had more than enough time to rig the ship he's on to blow with goblin munitions.

I expect that there'll be a couple bodies (unnamed Heroes), but Saint, Pilgrim, and Black will either survive outright or be missing presumed dead (and therefore definitively alive somewhere) after the inevitable explosion.

Goobinator

I don't think anyone should panic yet, I can't put a finger on it but this encounter doesn't **feel** right. I don't think Black is going to die here. Even if he does, I doubt his killers would have the last laugh.

sivarajan

Next time: Hey, I bet you're all wondering what Abigail is up to, right?

Berder

typo: But power had to used responsibly (had to be)
The Praesi had came, the Praesi had gone (The Praesi had come)

Kel the Seer

Ten will get you twenty that the “envoy” was Black in disguise. Why else would Scribe be standing next to him silently during that exchange?

After all, baiting all the heroes to one location gaurantees that the Heavens will smash a meaty fist on the scales to get their way. Hence Black actually being at the supposed distraction in case the Choirs get wise and have one of their heroes there try to take out the army. Grem is good, but pitting him and half the army against almost all the heroes isn't a winning plan.

Putting Ranker, a likely traitor with the group that will draw the Heavens wrath is just two birds with one stone.

DocTao

Wow, outdone yourself once again, I'm shocked and amazed and still(!) hopeful, amazing storytelling! Thanks so much!

Komploding

I'm sure it's significant that he hasn't been able call on his name for days and at the very end he is referred to as Amadeus of the Green stretch rather than the Black Knight, of what I don't know, it suggests that he's lost his name but we've been given no examples of that happen ending anywhere, other than when cat brought herself back from the dead, that seems unlike as it was lost due to the battle royale between claimants to that name, here it suggests either that below has abandoned him and he has been stripped of his name or that Amadeus and Black are two different entities

Komploding

Something possibly relevant could be when Winter king was transformed due to the story, but that was more of a metamorphosis, and Amadeus was not referred to as a different name just Amadeus and his place of origin

Jim

It never said Ranker was with him. It says they departed after 4 days and the legion is spread thin among the ships. The Black knight has made it a point to manipulate the story itself to create circumstances with which he can win. Alone on a boat faced down with by heroes aspect having possibly abandoned him (or one of his clones that his power allows him to create) is exactly the kind of Gambit that would allow a villain to triumph killing the old heroes off (the ones that have done things to fall from grace) and wounding the other heroes that they have to retreat and come back later. I would also like to point out we have heard nothing of Masego and Wakesa. How better for the powers from below to put their hand to the scale than a sudden intervention by the heirophant AND the sovereign of the red skies to show up at an opportune moment?

Nobody

Has anyone thought that maybe Black dies and the DK resurrects him?

Barthumphries

The Donkey Kong?

desuworks

Irony. The Black Knight was killed using the most valuable lesson he taught Cat. When she asked how do you beat someone who's better at the game than you while she was trying to beat Juniper and he responded with something along the lines of don't play by the same rules. Here the Black Knight set up the game and rules for his pillaging of Procer and everyone played by the same rules until the Grey Pilgrim decided to cheat. If you know you can't beat someone in a straight up contest but you need to win, Cheat, Lie, Change the nature of the game. This was the Black Knight's most valuable lesson to Cat. And it's the same one that killed him.

Barthumphries

Black dumped all the dead bodies overboard, where they infected the fish. A week from now, all the fish will die and the lake will turn into a stinking morass of dead things. Far more people will die because of the resulting famine.

Meanwhile, just as he's about to die, Black will jump overboard. His body will never be recovered and he'll be a Boogeyman for Procer for the next hundred years.

Tek

Holy fuck that is many comments.

Tab

I bet that Black passed his Name onto Grem or something along those lines so while he may die the raid of Procer will continue.

Aotrs Commander

Grey dead man walking; you ain't good, sunshine, no matter what lies you and your equally not-even-remotely-good bosses tell yourselves.

Somebody really needs to go invade a few heavens and raze them conceptually to the ground.

burguulkodar

Grey Pilgrim is too OP, plz nerf.

But seriously, if he could plague and destroy whole armies like that, then he could've just do that freaking miracle with Cat's army and it would have collapsed and they won the war. Which means he can't do that SO easily as he claims. Or the plague can somehow escape his control easily and spread to a whole country, killing hundreds of thousands.

I don't know, I don't like it. This guy feels like he has god-like powers, and we still have NO idea about his aspects, besides the one that he used to destroy cat's portal.

Zachary

He mentions that they had to stand watch to make sure no one left and spread the disease. This would have been impossible with a group of people as large as Cat's army.

There are also likely story reasons that wouldn't have gone over well.

Olisch

You can only win at dice so often before your luck runs out. It's hard to believe Black dies, but we've been shown he's not part of the same league as the true Horrors and doesn't have a purpose in that coming war, so I say he dies.

The bodies have been racking up lately, with Ratface dead and now Black and Ranker.

I wonder if the Pilgrim killing Cat's mentor could become part of a story, though probably not so easy one for villains to come out on top. Any chance they take Black Hostage? Probably not, those Heroes seem to deal in absolutes only, though the more I think about it the more the emotional fallout of his death strikes me.

Also, we haven't heard about Masego in a while and that worries me.

charl X

Ranker should have gotten a better death than this, all the interesting side characters from before seem to fade into unimportance or just... die

The veterans other than amadeus all dying in pathetic ways off screen, no one last scene of defiance against the gods and fate that they deserved

The fun of this story in the beginning was how personal it was Now it seems clinical and nihilist

vuthuha912

You know this whole march has been a suicidal run. He was obviously risking the consequence of doing evil to deal a blow to the entire Crusade. Burning crop is such a great tactic to deal with Miss "getting rid of her unemployed workers by a Crusade"

Cordelia. Now, she has to get the army back from Callow and start boosting the agriculture sector fast before her emergency grain reserve run out. And the fact that Amadeus just burn her opposition granaries means she needs to use the grain from her allies to save the one opposing her. It is great. Aside from that, she would lose a ton of money buying up land just to pass it to the unemployed workers that she is trying to get rid of. The negotiation for land is going to take a long time – time she doesn't have due to the bomb that Amadeus just set.

This entire Crusade is a poorly done rush job. It is exactly like the Joseon court during the fight with Japan. Unfortunately for her, she has no Yi Sun Sin to bring miracles.

---

Chapter 62: Impulse

"I don't care if they've been training, it's only been two months. What could they possibly have learned that would threaten me?"

– Dread Empress Sinistra IV, the Erroneous

"The Mighty Berelun is willing to allow passage, but only for a tithe," Ivah translated.

The Mighty Berelun was full of shit, I decided. That it had accepted an envoy instead of sending a warband the moment we entered its territory had been an auspicious start, especially when it'd proposed one of the large caverns of the region as a meeting place. The Mighty, I had learned, preferred to lay their ambushes in small passages where they could best leverage their superior speed and reflexes without the risk of being swarmed by 'lesser' drow. Sadly, it looked like this was going to be a repeat of our aborted talks with the Purka Sigil. The cavern surrounding us might have been broad and high-ceilinged, but there were discreet little paths on an upper level where I could hear drow scuttling around like rats. Berelun had been smart enough to listen to the rumours already making their way through the outer ring but not quite smart enough to decide picking a fight wouldn't be in its favour. I was almost insulted by how few it had mobilized for the ambush: by the sounds of it, there couldn't be more than twenty.

Most of those would be ispe, the lowest rung of the Mighty. In practice, those were fighters with a handful of interesting tricks but none of the dangerous Secrets out there. As dangerous in melee as your average fae soldier, if much less mobile for the lack of wings. They were the kind of enterprising souls that joined up with a sigil as much for the protection as because the quickest way for them to grow in power was to slay and harvest other ispe – either those of an enemy sigil or that of their own. Mighty Berelun itself had prudently shown up with an escort, a pair of rylleh. Ivah's old rank, and one I'd begun to understand was higher up the ladder than my guide had previously implied. Rylleh were the drow just beneath whatever drow the sigil was named after, called the sigil-holder, and considered the most likely contenders to eventually run through their leader and take the clan for themselves. They were also usually the heavy hitters in a sigil apart from the chief, which meant Berelun was taking us seriously. It would not have brought both its most dangerous rivals and strongest fighters to meet with us on the ground floor otherwise.

That had seemed promising, until I'd heard the ambush setting up.

"What kind of tithe?" I asked.

I had no intention of paying anything of the sort, but stringing this out a little longer would allow for a cleaner resolution. As if prompted by my thought, my ears caught the sound of a blade slicing open a throat. There was a muted gurgle and a body was quietly lowered to the ground. One down. Ivah addressed the Mighty in Crepuscular and I kept my eyes on its own. Deep, perfect silver set in a dark grey face that looked like it'd been carved with a knife. Berelun was larger than most drow I'd seen, broad-shouldered and heavily muscled. The obsidian blade strapped to its back could not be called anything but a greatsword.

"One in ten of your sigil, my queen," Ivah said. "With no fewer than six ispe among them."

My sigil, huh. That was one way to call the gathering throng of the desperate and the ambitious Akua was keeping an eye on. Two thousand, by now, though we were still thin on Mighty. Few of those were willing to take my bargain when it was extended. I'd already made my peace with the fact that we'd have to grow our own pack through harvest, and truth be told that might make them slightly more reliable in the long term. Another gurgle above, another drop. Berelun had dispersed its ambushers to make sure they'd be able to fire from all angles, looked like. It would have been decent tactics if I hadn't seen it coming. But I had, and their isolation meant they were easy prey for my own hunter on the prowl.

"Ivah," I said. "Ask the Mighty Berelun if it heard what took place between us and the Purka."

My guide's deep blue eyes crinkled in amusement, but it nodded. The exchange of words was swift, but not so swift that I did not hear another two throats cut.

"The Mighty knows of the destruction that was delivered unto the Purka," Ivah said. "It cautions you not to believe the Berelun to be weak or lacking in cunning. It says tithe will be paid, one way or another, and that pretending otherwise is foolish."

"So it thinks I'm speaking a threat," I mused. "When I was, in fact, delivering a warning. They might have been sloppier about their ambush, but the plan was quite similar."

Fifth death, then a pause. The sixth and seventh were nearly simultaneous. She was having fun with it, if she was getting that fancy.

"Is there to be fighting then, my queen?" Ivah asked, sounding less than worried.

"Eventually," I agreed. "Let's keep stringing them along for a bit longer. Quibble over the numbers, make it look like I'm considering the offer."

"By your will," the drow agreed, head inclining in deference.

By my final count, there were eighteen ispe who'd been hiding upstairs. My eyes remained on Berelun all the while, and I saw it getting increasingly impatient as moments passed. Not because of the negotiations, I thought. We both knew those were going nowhere. Most likely it was awaiting a signal before attacking and growing restless because it wasn't coming. After thirty heartbeats passed without another throat being cut, I elected to call down the curtains on the farce. Ivah was in the middle of a sentence, but paused when I raised my hand.

"I will offer them the same terms I offered the Purka," I said. "And the Trovod, and the Hilaron. They can kneel and take oaths, be granted power as you have been. Their forces will be folded into mine. Or they can be unmade. There will be no middle ground."

"They will refuse," Ivah said.

"I expect they will," I replied. "So here's a gift to help them understand the situation – Archer!"

My voice sounded loud and clear in the cavern. A moment later there was a mocking cackle and Indrani kicked down a drow's corpse from the upper levels. The throat was still bleeding, and after the cadaver landed with a dull thump blood pooled around it. Berelun and its bodyguards stilled, eyes moving back and forth. Ivah spoke to them, slow and cadenced. I'd heard enough Crepuscular I could begin to make out individual words, and knew the meaning of a few, but even spoken so slowly the language was difficult. Unlike any other I'd been taught on the surface. No matter: I'd set Diabolist to learning it, and when she was done I'd rip the knowledge out of her mind.

"The Mighty Berelun refuses your offer," Ivah said. "And demands your submission. I've also been offered admittance as fourth under the Sigil, should I turn on you."

"Well, it's a tempting offer," I drawled. "Have you duly considered it?"

"Alas for the Mighty Berelun," the drow said, "I much prefer being your Lord of Silent Steps."

The title rippled in the air, after being spoken, and Ivah no longer seemed to be Ivah at all. I could feel the shard of Winter in its soul, the way it spread through its veins with every breath and intertwined with the Night. It was not fae, but oh how close it had become. And all it'd taken was will and oaths, traded in the dark. Berelun caught on to the fact that negotiations had come to an end, ripping its obsidian greatsword free from leather bindings, and the attending rylleh followed suit. A steel-tipped spear to the left, a long ornate stone knife to the right.

"The usual arrangement stands," I calmly said. "Anything you kill is yours. The rest goes to auction."

The curved obsidian sword the Lord of Silent Steps had wrested from the corpse of the Mighty Trovod left its sheath with a pretty little flourish.

"May my hunt be fruitful, then," Ivah grinned. "I yet hunger."

Without another word, it vanished. Glamour, which of all the fae arts the drow seemed to take to the easiest. There were ways to use the Night not too dissimilar. I turned my eyes to the Berelun, whose earlier confidence had been shaken by the open use of power they did not recognize. It would be the least of their surprises today, I thought. They opened the dance with what I'd come to call the Hunter's Triangle. It was a tactic Mighty seemed to favour when facing an entity they suspected to be stronger than themselves but not by too broad a margin. Berelun itself advanced fluidly, greatsword raised above its head, while the other two flickered and dissolved into shadow. They would slither across the ground to flank me on both sides from the back while their chief kept my attention, all going for crippling blows instead of an outright kill. It was a tactic meant to get me slow and bleeding, not take my head. Drow fighting tactics were heavily influenced by the fact that the one amongst them to make the kill had the best claim to the body and Night therein. In single combat they immediately went for the kill, but when in a group they tended to go for the legs or the arms first.

The two rylleh flickered back into silhouettes with admirable timing. It was easy to see the three of them had fought opponents together before: the coordination was impeccable. The spear, knife and greatsword struck within a heartbeat of each other. They passed through mist, dispersing chunks of my body, and only then did I act. I returned to entirely solid form and my hand snatched the extended arm of the spear-wielder. My physical strength might have grown beyond natural boundaries but laws of momentum still applied to my action, which had required an adjustment I was only now beginning to get a handle on. My footing shifted, my torso pivoted and I swung the drow at Berelun's head. Silver eyes widened in surprise and I merely clenched my fingers before releasing the rylleh's wrist, crushing the bones in my grip. The last drow had kept its wits, and flickered back into a pool of shadow before I could strike it. Scoffing, I shaped and released a spike of ice that nailed the tendrils and forced the drow to flicker back into a silhouette. Wounded to boot, as the spike had gone through its leg, but Night flowed into the wound and the ice was forced out as the flesh beneath reformed. Neat trick, that one, but I'd seen it before. I backhanded the rylleh and sent it tumbling away, turning in time to see the other two drow extricate themselves and rise to their feet.

"Come now," I said. "Show me a few Secrets worth stealing."

Berelun snarled something in Crepuscular, the other grimly nodding. The Night pulsed and a supernatural darkness fell over me.

"Disappointing," I said. "Hilaron did it right at the start and it was much more effective."

The working was anchored around my neck, not a veil of darkness but a bubble meant entirely to blind me. It required flesh to be anchored to, however. I stepped back, feeling myself... slip. Grow vague and muted. The mist thickened back into myself one step removed from the now-pointless bubble, revealing the sight of the two of them slithering along the floor in shadow-form. Irritated, I smashed my boot down. The ground shook, stone splintered and the two of them were thrown out in drow-shape. I saw fear in the rylleh's silvery eyes as it realized what its chief had not. This was not a fight, not for me. It was a spar through which I was mastering the use my mantle. This entire cursed ruin of an empire was. The last drow had already gotten back on its feet, but it had other troubles. The Lord of Silent Steps had cut through the muscles on the back of its knee, and was now weaving one glamour after another to keep it striking at illusions while it methodically ruined its arms and legs.

The Night, it had once told me, felt deeper when taken with an enemy's last breath.

Berelun snarled once more and I rolled my eyes. It had yet to impress me. Six tendrils of shadow rose from its back, each forming a few fingers at the end that took obsidian knives to wield, and with its sword raised high it came for me again. The other drow actually bothered to be interesting, flickering into shadow-form but remaining a silhouette. That was a new one, and worth exploring. I formed a blade of ice and set out against the rylleh, ignoring Berelun. The shadowed drow shot forward, and only then did I notice the shadow had extended to its spear as well. Promising. I ducked under the tip of the spear and scythed through its ankles, but parted only shadow that reformed anew the moment my blade passed. It spun and smashed the butt of its spear against my armour, hitting above where my spine was. An exertion of will had frost keeping it stuck and when I turned the weapon was snatched out of its grasp. Curious, I plunged my sword through its throat and left it there. The drow panicked, wrenching it out, and my brow rose. Behind me I heard Berelun howl in pain when Archer's arrow took him in the back of the knee. Simply because she hadn't deigned to come down did not mean she was not keeping an eye on the proceedings.

I caught the rylleh's left shoulder but the shadows wriggled out of my grasp and it kicked me in the stomach. My plate took the blow without trouble and I frowned, punching it in the face. It rocked back, though with no visible damage. Shadows are constantly moving and distributing any impact or cutting force across the entire body, so anything that doesn't last is ineffective, I thought. On the flipside anything that lasted would do a lot more damage than it should. Too flawed a trick to be worth replicating, I assessed. The ice blade still in its hand turned to mist and formed again as a collar around its neck, tightening with but a thought. I left it to choke, returning my attention to Berelun. The Mighty was bound to have a few Secrets it'd yet to pull out. Archer's arrow had gone straight through the knee, steel tip coming out bloody, and it appeared that pain was enough to get rid of the shadow tendrils it's been wielding earlier. No great loss there. I could already do the same thing, more or less.

"So," I meaningfully said. "Bleeding and desperate. Now's about time to pull out the fancy tricks, don't you think?"

It replied in Crepuscular.

"I don't speak that," I said, and shot a spear of ice at it to hurry things along.

It dodged effortlessly. Drow with that much Night swimming around their bodies had reflexes far beyond anything a human could muster even on their best day – even the Watch. I closed the distance, noting it'd ceased retreating and learning why a heartbeat later. Shadows roiled across its entire body and sprouted in seemingly solid spikes.

"Seen it before," I sighed.

I hardened my hand to be solid as stone and struck at the spikes, shattering them and sending the drow reeling back. Berelun's face was the picture of pained surprise, but it gathered its bearings long enough for one more trick. Night dripped down its body in thick rivulets, then shot out like arrows. One would have gone through my chest, but that was seen to with a half-step to the side. Yet the Night was hovering in the air all around us, I saw, forming some kind of spotty dome. Berelun smirked and stabbed its sword into the closest spot of Night. To my surprise, it came out behind me and carved into my plate. I moved forward, ensuring it wouldn't bite too deep, but that'd been rather unexpected. I felt it safe to assume a blow could come out of any chunk of Night, which left him quite a few angles to attack from. Interesting. I wove glamour over myself, leaving my illusion weaving around blows even as I left the makeshift dome myself, and reached for Winter. Perfectly reproducing this was probably beyond my ability. Maybe by using my domain I could do something similar, assuming the Night really was Sve Noc's own domain manifest, but it would require too much concentration to be worth it. If I was to wield my domain in combat there were better alternatives.

Using purely Winter, thought? This was a trick worth stealing.

I went about it methodically, since it was my first time. I formed frost at regular intervals around it on the ground in a loose circle, slight marks I could strengthen with barely a thought. Making frost marks that hung in the air proved trickier, until I started weaving them the same way I did platforms. Not trying to hang them up on something that did not exist, but interposing them between layers of Creation. Even then, I saw with mild irritation that the moment I tried using one of the hovering marks again it fell. The sound of frost breaking on stone caught Berelun's attention, and its eyes widened in fear and surprise when it saw the other marks. Time to wrap this up, then. I let Winter loose, shunting off the alienation into the others who drew on the stuff of my mantle – Diabolist, as always, but now Ivah as well. Spears of pure ice shot out from over thirty directions, puncturing Mighty Berelun's body like a rag doll. I withdrew them with a flick of the wrist, forcing them back into the initial marks, and the drow dropped to the floor listlessly.

Then an arrow went through the back of its neck, because Archer had a horrid sense of humour.

"That one was mine," she called out from above.

I gestured obscenely at her, earning only laughter in response. A glance told me that the rylleh I'd left a collar on had choked to death and Ivah was already harvesting the other's Night, kneeling over the dying body. Indrani came down, leaping from handhold to handhold on the cavern wall like some sort of demented grasshopper before landing in an unnecessarily elaborate roll.

"Diplomacy's a lot simpler than I used to think, Cat," Archer noted. "I'm finally getting the hang of it."

I sighed.

"Keep an eye on the corpses," I said. "Ivah will stay with you. We're moving in on the Berelun camp after Akua's people pick up the bodies for an auction."

"Sure, sure," she dismissed. "Look on the bright side, this isn't the kind of neighbourhood where people will ask questions if they run into us standing over a bunch of corpses."

I refused to dignify that with a response and left them with dead drow, beginning the trek back to what their kind had taken to calling my sigil. The auction would delay us by an hour or two, but no more. We'd crafted the system with our time constraints in mind.

It'd been Diabolist's idea. There'd been no issue at first, as the first sigil we'd run into was the Trovod. Ivah, fresh off its title as my first Lord of Winter, had single-handedly slaughtered the sigil's upper ranks and harvested all of them. It'd later admitted that even the sigil-holder would barely have qualified as a rylleh outside of the outer rings and it'd been more an execution than a battle. The two hundred meat – nisi, in Crepuscular – who'd belonged to the drow of the Trovod had been eager to follow us even before I made clear that the dwarves would be close behind. Nisi that were not under a sigil were fair game for any drow looking to accumulate a bit of Night, and all it would take was a single Mighty coming across them for a massacre to ensue. At best they might end up taken by another sigil and any among them with useful skills harvested. But then we'd run into Purka territory, and those had been tougher meat. Ivah had partaken, but eventually admitted it no longer gained much out of harvesting Night from lower rungs of the Mighty like the ispe. To continue feeding it the corpses would not significantly improve its combat capacity.

That revelation came right on the back of the fact I now had about one thousand nisi who wanted to follow us on our journey, along with a smaller contingent of two hundred dzulu – meaning person, more or less – which was what drow were called when they had enough Night to no longer be meat but not enough to qualify as even the lowest of the Mighty. Most of the dzulu were smart enough to surrender when people still covered with the blood of their overlords strolled into their camp, but they tended to be the ones that chafed under my rules the most. The prohibition on killing each other in particular: now that the old order was gone, they believed it was their chance to rise. I'd been inclined to just cut them loose, but Akua had talked me out of it. She'd pointed out that the nisi were largely incapable of fighting, but that the dzulu usually knew their way around a weapon. If I was to recruit an army in the Everdark, it would not be from the Mighty or the nisi. It'd be from the hungry dzulu, who'd be willing to take oaths in exchange for enough Night to no longer be arrow fodder. They'd spent long enough near the corridors of power to be willing to do quite a bit if the deal allowed them to walk those corridors in their own right.

And so we had created the auction.

We took the corpses of the Mighty and allowed any and all to bid for the right to harvest their Night. Akua had been inclined to limit bidding rights to the dzulu so that a warrior class would be created quickly, but I'd been of a different opinion. The nisi were, in my eyes, the closest thing to sane people that could be found among the drow. Most of them had spent their lives being slaves in all but name and while they paid lip service to the ways of the Everdark their hearts weren't really in it. It was hard to love customs that saw you used as tools and beasts of burdens, killed at a whim. I'd rather have slightly less effective soldiers that weren't ardent partisans of metaphysical cannibalism. What would be bid, however, had never been in doubt. Coin would be useful, if I could bring it back to Callow, but drow society ran on barter and somewhat communal slave labour – nisi were the property of the sigil as a whole, not individuals, but what they made was distributed at the discretion of the sigil-holder. There were precious few easy riches to be had, down here, and unlike the dwarves I didn't have a legion of workers to mine every shaft full of metals and precious stones we came across. I'd not come to the Everdark for wealth anyway. I'd come here for an army, and so the bidding was done with oaths. Years in my service, enforced by blood and Winter. I was willing to empower the drow if it was on my terms. Two more sigils, I thought as I made my way through the tunnels, only two more sigils and we'd have enough numbers.

Then we'd hit the city of Lotow, and the boulder would start rolling down the hill.

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Cold Cyberia

Here's a link to the guide discord:

<https://discord.gg/CQRZBFM>

James, Mostly Harmless

Guide leads in the week and month rankings, but is still about 1000 votes behind Ward in the year rankings. So keep voting!

Barthumphries

Where do we see the year rankings?

Yavandir

you've got the option list thingy on top of the ranking
soonnanandnaanssoon

Thank you EE for not making this chapter a Masego interlude or we'll be getting blue-balled by another cliffhanger.

Gunslinger

But I want to know what happens to Masego ...

Dainpdf

I wanted the Pilgrim interlude when Ranger comes knocking...

Wooper

I would've preferred more information on Ivah's change.

naturalnuke

Next comes the landslide.

Jane

Leave it to Cat to end an ages-old empire as a training run.

naturalnuke

No no no, it's all about framing. This isn't a training run at all! No no, this is an experiment on the destruction of empires and the usurpation of a culture for one's own benefit.

The Tower would be proud.

Javvies

To be fair, the Drow are basically a failed state devolved into petty town-state (can't honestly call them city-states) warlordism, not a proper empire.

They're less unified than Procer at the height of the Proceran Civil War or the League during its internal warfare.

Presumably unless/until the Sve gives clear, unambiguous orders to do something.

Dainpdf

She's not just training, she's stealing their knowledge.

haihappen

And people. Or what counts as 'people' for Drow. She is also collecting an army. Or a warband of oathbound warriors. They are basically her new Forlorn Hope, just on a different footing.

Funny thing is that her recruitment drive will probably be the last remaining drow after the dwarfs are done.

Wooper

Maybe she can make a friend colony in Callow.

Dainpdf

Well, yeah, but that was the original intent.

:)

Where else is the black queen supposed to gather a black pawn for declination?

Xinci

Hmm does it count as a empire though? This is but a gestalt of various microcosms kept that way to get that power into a select few individuals bound to a single..."unit(Sevi, still unsure on what one might call her interconnected state at the moment)". If she started to figure out how to properly deconstruct the dwarves I would consider it as such though. This is more of plain ol'cultural usurpation, a choice as old as her name.

Javvies

Heh.

That's an effective way to bind drow minions. Binding oaths in exchange for power.

Also, the Dead King definitely had a hand in Cat going to the Drow. It's part training exercise, part learning experience, part source of the troops and bodies she needs to survive the Crusade and Malicia and have the opportunity to continue playing the Game as a functional immortal, one step closer to the true apotheosis that is her potential.

Also, Winter empowered drow are going to ruin a bunch of plans for everyone except the Dead King, and possibly Bard, but I'd like to think this will be a move Bard didn't see coming. At least, when Cat started. Of course, by the time Cat gets back to Callow, Bard will probably have gotten an update from Upstairs.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's the best kind of slavery as well: Voluntary indentured servitude. They literally are competing to serve her longer. And since she delivers everything she promises in the deal, they are the types that, like Ivah, will more or less find they enjoy the price paid. I doubt she can make them too unlike Drow, in that they would still stab her in the back if they thought it would A. Take and B. would benefit them enough, but they'll spend a lot less time and energy looking for that sort of opportunity than they might otherwise.

Rook

The genius of it is that it's not slavery, it's servitude. The whole system is set up so that the drow that get to harvest the most Night are the same ones that are more willing to kneel.

The key is in the willingness to be bound under the oath, not the oath itself. Making it voluntary automatically picks out the ones with the least pride or the most cunning to sit at the top of the food chain, since that's essentially the factor that decides how many 'years of servitude' a drow is willing to barter. The supersoldiers that float to the top end up loyal, dangerously competent, or both.

Even better is the fact that the currency is time. There's little risk of overinvesting into a turncoat for the cream of the crop, because after enough years the oath barely matters. Side characters that stand in the influence of a Charismatic Main Character for a long enough time almost inevitably become bound to them in an entirely different, more fundamental kind of way.

Dainpdf

Well, the Gallowborne are always recruiting. And I guess she is saving them from a noose of sorts, if the dwarves won't kill me for comparing them to death by hanging.

Alivaril

It's also worth remembering that the Drow don't normally do oaths. So I expect there will be treacherous little buggers those who think they can just blow off the terms and vastly overbid in the pursuit of easy power. They will serve regardless of their original intentions.

SpeckofStardust

At this point Bard might get updates from downstairs to. She does after technically work for both.

crysjal

You're assuming the Dead King is actually interested in seeing Cat actually grow and interfering with it himself. He didn't indicate he had any interest in any of the other potential immortals. Beyond his initial interaction with Cat there's nothing to say he's interested in her beyond an initial curiosity. He outright stated he's pretty ambivalent towards her and not to take stuff personally down the road.

Javvies

The other immortals are elves, Bard, and Ranger. Oh, and probably Drow and the ratling elders. Elves, drow, and ratlings aren't exactly peers worth friendly conversation.

Bard is Bard, and Ranger only drops by periodically to break in, kill some of his (irreplaceable) undead Heroes, and drink his booze.

And they've been around for centuries.

Cat is new. And she managed to impose a permanent alteration on the the Cycle of Arcadia – ending it. She's going to be an interesting addition to the Game, if she lasts long enough.

He's not personally invested in Cat or in her success, but my impression is that he wants her to succeed in reaching/attaining apotheosis – if she can prove herself worthy and earn it.

To that end, I see no reason to think that he wouldn't point her in the direction of something that would serve to challenge and test her, but also advance her on the path to true apotheosis and strengthen her position if she were successful, but would have serious negative consequences were she to falter or fail.

For that matter, he probably did not need to pull pull troops back from his subsurface border regions to invade Procer.

I don't think he needed to give the dwarves the opening to move on the drow that he did. But the dwarves moving on the drow are a test for Cat to deal with – and I'd say Cat has done rather well in her encounters with the dwarves.

And it costs the Dead King nothing, just some internal troop movements.

lupus7

terror queen invictus

Jack

Dread Empress Victorious

Antoninjohn

Cat's army is bound by Fea oaths and so counts as a Winter force not God's Below so if the Heroes get support against it from Above the God's Below can skew with them elsewhere

Euodiachloris

I almost feel sorry for the next white mage type who tries tossing blessings about. Or the less white ones who try binding those they perceive as being pure fae, for that matter.

It'll not go well.

Nafram

And back to Cat. I imagine it'll be a while before we see what was of Black's last dance, and what nasty surprise he left behind as a final act.

The auction system is clever, that way the Drow that will become her army gain power directly proportional to how much they bind themselves to Cat through magically enforced oaths.

I also like that Cat, despite refusing to allow herself or Akua to absorb the Night, is still profitting and becoming stronger as she goes. She's had immense raw power comparable to the strongest characters in the setting, but she lacked the know-how to properly use it. Now, that is changing, and if they meet again, Laurence and the thrice damned Tariq will find her more than their match

Gunslinger

Jesus Cat you're being scary. I have to admit after coming this far I love seeing Cat wreck shit on these sorry mobs. All the joy and promise of the Epic Levels. The Night too has a lot of promise as an interesting power source, so the stronger Mighty fights will be one hell of a thing to read.

SMHF

It's a nice parallel between what Cat's doing to the Drow and what Black was doing to Callow.

She's an invading force... using heavy handed strategies to make them fall in line, changing their culture in the process. And while you can argue she's improving their lives in doing so, Cat's just doing this so she can use them for her own purpose... Black would be proud(er)!

NZPIEFACE

No, she's reforming the Drow into a respectable race like the Orcs.

taliesinskye

Come to think of it, she's doing to the Drow what Black did to the Orcs when he taught them how to fight as legions, isn't she? In the end the Orcs loved Black for it, too. Perhaps the Drow will one day be her most fervent supporters.

Euodiachloris

"We thought we knew the meaning of darkness and night, she showed us deep polar winter nights with no moon, but all the many cold, distant stars. And, how to snuff out, bend or use the aurora and heartbroken according to our wills."

Euodiachloris

Meant hearthfire... But, hey. Sometimes, the autocorrect throws you a bone, nè?

Yavandir

Army of moonless night

Someguy

I have to wonder if the Winter Drow will be useful enough to be Canon Fodder to "assist" Duchess Kegan in seizing the Golden Bloom from the Elves? Having Fae Titles now mean that even if the Elves phase into Arcadia, there is no escape.

A land-swap deal to trade Daoine for their ancestral homeland. Cat can then trade Daoine to the Orc Clans for ownership and legal recognition of Lordly Titles to give them what the Tower would not, undercutting Malicia's hold on them.

Unknown

Seems unlikely since the Elves are outside normal space right now. I suppose Masego could force them into normal space but eh not really in a position for another fight.

IDKWhoitis

I'd like to think the Orcs would almost do it for free given how shit they are treated. Giving them land and lord titles would really just be glazing on the lamb.

Javvies

Not happening. The Duchy of Daoine is the last bit of the Deoraithe ancestral homeland under their control.

That said, they may well be useful assets against the elves, but at the moment, invading the Golden Bloom to liberate it from the elves for the Deoraithe is pretty far down the priority list for Cat and everyone else on her side, including the Deoraithe themselves.

The Elves will keep – with as long as it's been, reclaiming the Golden Bloom is not a time sensitive matter.

The Deoraithe rather dislike the Procerans, and seem to be relatively on board with Cat being Queen of Callow – she's certainly far more preferable than whatever the Crusade would have left in its wake, plus, the Conclave in Salia just declared them heretics.

Also, the Dead King is invading Procer after making a deal with Malicia.

The Deoraithe are more than willing to hold off on their desire to reclaim the Golden Bloom – they have more immediate matters to attend to. Like the Crusade, the Dead King, and Praes/Malicia.

That said, Cat doesn't need to give Daoine to the orcs to get them to follow her. She has Hakram – the first Named orc since the Miezian conquest – and he got his Name through her, in large part. And she wants to kill the High Lords and their allies. She's Black's de facto chosen successor.

She's a proven and capable fighter, not some talker with soft hands and soft muscles.

She's got about as many of the qualities orcs look for in their leadership as someone who isn't an orc can.

Euodiachloris

The orcs are kind of gaining all of Callow as it is: the population is slowly learning not to see them as the half-starved machines the Empire once turned them into, but people. People you can deal with and even call neighbour, should some move their businesses (and homes) nearby.

That's big.

Javvies

While becoming accepted as citizens in Callow is a big deal – and definitely a positive development – that's orders of magnitude different from what Someguy was suggesting. What was suggested was giving the Duchy of Daoine in its entirety to the orcs. I think it's fairly safe to say that the difference between the two positions is not insignificant and is a distinction that matters.

Euodiachloris

Yeah, I know. Which is why I said what I did: there's no need to cede any land to a people who already have their own. The Steppes are where the orcs come from, and it is already theirs (whatever the Tower thinks).

They really don't need any more, particular not any taken from an ally/ a rather critical part of Callow.

Rights to trade within Callow as just normal people? Priceless – for the chickens, ducks, geese, cows, pigs, sheep, deer and horses Callow grows taste good. Not sure what orcs think of pike, but I'm pretty sure salmon would go down well. 😊

nick012000

I suspect that the Elves are basically just Fae that moved to live in Creation on a permanent basis. If that's the case, then it's possible that Cat might be able to turn the Deoraithe themselves into elves and regain the Deoraithe's homeland through peaceful means (possibly a political marriage to the Elven king).

Or that she can turn the Deoraithe into elves with a better claim on the forest than the elves who currently live there, and get the forest to evict said elves in favor of its old masters.

Rook

"Lord of silent steps" huh. I guess she's making her own Assassin? Even has the whole "I'm actually a thousand different people at the same time" thing going on, what with all the Night it's going to be eating.

Although in a very Catherine type of way, it seems like it's only going to be an assassin as far as sneaking up quietly before breaking into the inevitable brawl

NZPIEFACE

So uh, what's thief now.

Rook

New Thief, shit at killing. Same as old Thief, but less insecure.

Javvies

Vivienne might be headed for a Transition to a new Name – she has not, after all, exactly been doing that much of the Role that contributed to her getting her Name originally.

The question then is, what would her new Name be. Her current Role, were she to be properly doing what Cat sent her to Callow to do, would likely send her towards a non-combat Name in the vein of Regent, Castellan, Steward, Counselor, Councilor, etc., or something along the lines of Spymistress, Spy, etc., or maybe a Thief evolution to something like Thief of Knowledge or Queen of Thieves, etc. At any rate ... we will likely have to wait until Cat gets back to Callow to learn what happened with Vivienne, Namewise.

Argentorum

My guess?
The Queen's Hand.

Hakram's gesture was just that thematic. Plus, it plays into her taking a more active roll as the ruler of Callow in Catherine's stead, which allows Adjutant to be, as his name suggests, an administrator again.

Wooper

She isn't Barristan Selmy

Euodiachloris

Good. He's one of the best that Dany has, but he's out of his depth in both politics and Essos. It's likely to get him killed.

mavant

Speaking of which, is he getting another dead hand mechanism or are we just gonna graft a boomstick on the end of it?

JJR

No Boomsticks.

Boomsticks make Gnomes angry.

mavant

It'd be so groovy, though.

Andrew Mitchell

I can't see that happening. Not for quite a while.
Otherwise the sacrifice loses its power.

Rey d`Tutto

Goblinfire Flamethrower.

GuidingMoonlight

Blue balls, we meet again

IDKWhoitis

I foresee a moment in the future where Anti Fae measures are just laughed at and stabbed in the throat.

Dainpdf

I assume she's still not got as many tricks as Larat had as prince... But who knows, fae are static.

IDKWhoitis

I mean this applies for both Cat and her Army. If the crusaders or Malica deploy anti fae weapons and tactics, the Drow shock troops will just crash through. If they try to contain Catherine through a ward, I imagine the fire in a box metaphor will return. It'll look like it's working until the whole box catches on fire.

Dainpdf

Malicia has proven she can contain Cat. I imagine someone with access to priests can likely achieve something similar. As for the army, well... I assume it'll work like any other army: weak to goblin fire.

crysjal

Yeah but as the premise goes. Trying to imprison a powerful foe is just asking the Narrativr to let them escape and fuck you up somehow. Unless the capture is a direct product of a significant victory then the longer you actually succeed the worse the outcome when said box burns down. Or in Cat's case, freezes and shatters.

Dainpdf

Depends a lot on what the story is. There are stories about mighty otherworldly beings being bound and spent.

I mean, if binding something always ended in it escaping the Tower would never have stood as long as it has. Nor would Akua's weapon have been completed.

Xinci

Well there are multiple ways of getting out. Rhetoric is important..for example I "free you...from your shoulders". Technically the tower was possibly free during the few times it got taken down but it came back. Generally if you cage something it gets out one way or another, now if and how it comes back are more due to its circumstances. Most otherworldly beings get freed just in a different time-span than their prisoner. Just read some stories about sealed demons and devils(Theres a nice example in a Twilight Zone episode actually).

Dainpdf

Well... There are stories of things that just get bound and don't escape, or don't until the end of the world. First that comes to mind is Merlin, but there's Lucifer in the original version, Fenrir, the Greek Titans...

JackbeThimble

I bet when she meets the priestess of night she discovers that she's actually a Behavioral Economics grad student whose pHd thesis went badly out of hand.

soonnanandnaanssoon

I laughed at this more than I should have.

haihappen

thats the thing: Scientists always insist that you prove your hypothesis with experiments... but nobody is happy if the economics people actually DO it. I imagine the world of Hunger Games started out as an economics model like "wouldn't it be very efficient if you gave a small number of people all the power?"

Euodiachloris

That's why you snooze the developers of MMOs and data mine those puppies.

Also, it's cheaper than growing an actual banana republic.
;P

Euodiachloris

Smooze – seriously, autocorrect? What have you got against wine and cheese?

lol

I think it's schmooze

Andrew Mitchell

Agreed.

Shequi

They actually did that with Eve Online, which to all intents and purposes is an economics simulation for proving that completely libertarian economics doesn't work.

BarthHumphries

I'm curious about this. Where can I read more?

Rey d'Tutto

And the sample size has now much to do with the results? A teacup full of ocean water holds no whales.

Unorginal

In 2013 Eve had 500000 concurrent subscribers, its only gone further up.

It is also a true no holds barred player driven economy. There are no NPCs no banks but the player made ones, delivery services are just trusted guilds with blockade runner ships etc.

Unorginal

Actually there are safe systems in game protected by Concord ships who are the only NPCs that you ever have to interact with but mostly they are there to protect newbie players from being sniped by large player companies

Unorginal

Also hostile takeovers of player companies (guilds) is an encouraged part of gameplay result in overnight disappearances of major players occasionally.

mavant

#gladidroppedoutofgradschool

Xinci

She has been successful as far as I have seen. She just hasn't done enough to reform her classes. The lower portions need reforming and their relationship entangling them with her highest tiers also needs some reworking. A new leader is totally capable of making them into something more(a'la Cat). Well long as she doesn't waste them...and if she can manage to keep them flexible though this next transition(metaphysically and physically).

JackbeThimble

Hakram (Seeing Cat arrive from Arcadia with her drow host trailing behind): Where'd you get all the scimitars?
Catherine: Oh the Dwarves offered me a discount on a shipment they had to unload. Something about them being nerfed in 5e. Last I saw they were haggling with an envoy from Helike for a rapier.
Hakram: And the Panthers?

Daemion

Hahaha... Drizzt...

... but these drow will still be evil. 😊

danh3107

Scimitars being a d6 is so dumb.

beleester

They trade damage for a larger threat range. If they were 1d8 18-20 they'd be strictly better than longswords.

mavant

Don't longswords have versatile in 5e? The offhand dagger is pretty useful.

JackbeThimble

Yeah but that's why they were 'nerfed' in 5e- they took the whole concept of threat ranges out. So scimitars are now essentially just shortwords that do slashing damage.

Berder

Can't wait for Cat to fight The Mighty Boosh.

Typo: methaphysical

Rey d`Tutto

Just say No to Meth.
It's a he'll of a drug.

Dainpdf

Interesting. Trick stealing is a great idea. It's a way to improve from this incursion without taking the obvious (and trapped) shortcut of taking Night.

werafdsaew

Aw... I want to find out what happened to Black

---

He's getting offscreened the same way Capitain was. It's scary, really, how a single tidbit of reliable information (Catherine's "My teacher dedicated his entire life to breaking this game, but that's a reflection of his flaw – he can't conceive a world where he doesn't win") allowed the Grey Pilgrim to come up with an Amadeus-proof plan where hero-collected intel of White Knight failed.

werafdsaew

I think you're reading too much into it. Also until there's onscreen confirmation, he's not dead.

RanVor

"Alive until proven dead" is a new rule in Guide.

Barthumphries

That's always true for Named.

RanVor

Black has too many unresolved plotlines tied to him to die now. EE isn't a writer who wastes potential like that. Besides, his death has been "ensured" for so long I don't even believe he's going to die anymore.

Snowfire1224

Interesting, but if Ivah is a lord of winter is he admitting that he has a gender or did it simply accept the title of Lord because there was no gender neutral term for lord/lady? I mean that is a big part of the drow culture, having no gender.

mavant

Ey's really saying "Radchaai of Silent Steps", but it doesn't translate well.

sengachi

A+ reference

mavant

That was such a good trilogy. I still want to know what's going on with the Presger.

crysjal

I think as a Drow you don't have a gender until you acquire enough Night to earn/deserve one. Somewhat like having a name at all or being seen as a person.

NZPIEFACE

Wait a fucking second. Instead of stealing the Night, she's slowly torturing the people who won't follow her into letting them reveal the secrets of the Night so she can appropriate it for herself?

Novice

Yep. She's following her time-honored philosophy. Dear ol' Cat takes what she can't break and breaks what she can't take.

mavant

I suppose her objection to taking the Night was not a moral one so much as a practical one.

22. No matter how tempted I am with the prospect of unlimited power, I will not consume any energy field bigger than my head.

ftaku

Torturing implied she is strapping innocents to a table to cause pain. This is her fighting people who planned to attack her first and drawing out the fight to learn.

Rey d`Tutto

Otherwise known as playing with your food...

taborask

I think Dread Empress Sinestra might be in strong competition with Traitorous for favorite tyrant

Euodiachloris

*clutches pearls* How can you even say that?! ;P

Anonymouse

What about Irritant

mavant

Irritant is rather fun as well.

SMHF

Also it's a nice change to watch Cat use Winter in creative ways rather than her old strategy of "burying them under my severed limbs till they give up"!

ereshkigala

At least Cat is learning to use Winter. Akua curbstomping a dozen heroes at once with her own power must have showed her just how stupid she was being not training with it.

NZPIEFACE

I think what motivates her here is the fact she almost died to a giant pet rat.

ChillyPepper

So... when's Larat taking Catherine's cloak?

Aston W

Cat now has minions.

She is officially a Bad boss.

Love how it's all a training routine.

Author Unknown

Traipsing through the Underdark with a bunch of (literal) murder hoboes. Good Times.

Decius

When none of the buyers at an auction has literally any maximum allowable bid, but can just bid "more", the prices for motivated buyers will be quite high.

Cat doesn't have to worry about the oaths running out. After all, the bids for the top night are going to start in the eons and go up many orders of magnitude from there.

The bids for the trash are going to start in decades, because the alternative is /not getting ANY/.

fbt

great, great bit, lovely to see cat chewing gum and kicking butt..and growing. And i love the snark, as always. "That one was mine!" lol. good comments and a lot of interesting hints in this one, I enjoyed it very much. I do worry about Black, he's one of my favorite characters in any series. He reminds me of Kerr Avon, who I loved. If GP did indeed off Black, i hope Cat makes a legendary example of him (he's certainly earned it, in many ways).

WuseMajor

So... No comments on the whole "Mighty Berelun used to be a sigil holder until he took an arrow to the knee" thing?

How about comments on just how often "Akua did this helpful thing and I don't really even think about how much leverage it's giving her anymore" came up? Admittedly, right now, Archer is the only lieutenant who isn't dangerously treacherous that Cat has with her, but it seems like Akua might have gained a worrying level of trust from this one.

Daemion

Akua is trusted to behave according to her nature, which means Cat fully expects her to try to weasel out of the situation even if that means lies, betrayal, murder and unspeakable horrors unleashed upon the innocent.

I doubt anyone trusts Akua to have Cat's best interests at heart, she's a very selfish creature after all. But as long as her desires line up with Cat's goals...

NotQuiteHere

Where does it explicitly say that Bard is working for both side?

crysjal

It's indicated during the history scene during the journey in Arcadia to TDK when Bard is discussing her empowerment with him. She indicates she was the first empowered individual and that she was given power by both sides. Her original role was to maintain Calernia as a vehicle for the God's argument about free will. Exactly how she goes about that or whether she actually still is following her role is anyone's guess.

fbt

in the visions of the past on the way to see the dead king, tdk asks which side she's working for at the moment when she visits, implying she does both. there are quite a few other important seeming hints in that bit, worth a re-read.

sengachi

There's no way Cat coming to rely on dumping the principal alienation on her minions isn't going to backfire horribly one day.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, we'll need to keep an eye out for that and try to guess when & where it's going to happen before EE shows us.

Anony

"methaphysical cannibalism".
Now that's something I can get behind.

Xinci

Its a start. Theres a huge amount of potential in their structure, they only serve like they do now because of their ruler. She can shift them into something more in many ways. Grafting them into various metaphysical concepts to learn and become more herself. It'll be a while before she makes such a decision I suppose though, she doesnt have the perspective or the love right now. Doesnt understand the Night enough.,,

---

Chapter 63: Initiation

"Blood sacrifice is such an ugly term. I prefer to think of it a 'blood redistribution', a thriving new form of Imperial enterprise."

– Dread Empress Sinistra II, the Coy

"One hundred and sixty years, subjected to the full breadth of lesser and greater oaths," Akua said.

The nisi at her side, a one-eyed drow named Centon, repeated her words in Crepuscular loudly enough all those assembled below would hear them. Nearly seven hundred drow were seated respectfully on their knees, packed tightly on the cavern floor, but they were the most orderly crowd I'd ever seen. That many humans in a room would carry out hushed conversations among each other, even if there was a devil looking over them, and neither orcs nor goblins were very different. Goblins, in fact, might try to talk with the bloody devil. Not a single one of the drow had so much as let out a grunt except when bidding. The difference here, I thought, was cultural. Most surface people had an expectation they would not have their throat cut on a whim, while drow had lived their whole lives under a different set of unspoken rules. Life was the cheapest form of currency in the Everdark. Centon's words were not followed by another bid, though in truth I'd not expected one. One hundred and sixty years was fairly high for a rylleh. A sigil-holder's corpse could easily fetch as much as five centuries, but then it came with the understanding that a drow harvesting that much Night should easily be capable of living that long.

Diabolist and I both knew why the bidding for lesser corpses had risen. After it'd been made clear that titles like the one bestowed upon Ivah would only ever be considered for people who'd fought under me and sworn the full breadth of oaths, interest in even the lesser Mighty had significantly increased. The most ambitious among the dzulu wanted to be worth bringing along for the fight when we hit Great Lotow, judging the comprehensive oaths an acceptable shackle if it could lead to that greater ultimate payoff. The Lord of Silent Steps had made something of an impression when it'd gone through the upper ranks of the Trovod like a hot knife through butter, and the lingering tales of that had led to regular polite inquiries on the subject of titles from both dzulu and the occasional nisi.

"Then Sekoran may rise to take the oaths, and this auction has come to an end," Akua said, after the silence continued for a full sixty heartbeats. "You may disperse."

Centon translated her words, and without a sound the drow below us knelt forward until their foreheads touched the floor. Not one rose before the winner – named Sekoran, apparently – was climbing up. They left in orderly files after that, neither jostling nor hurrying. Even though I'd made it clear that as far as I was concerned all of their kind were equal under my rules, the nisi still allowed the dzulu to leave ahead of them while expressing deference through tilts of the head lowering their gaze to the floor and presenting their neck. It meant, Akua had told me, that the nisi in question were offering their life and Night for harvest should their social superior wish it. Mostly a courtesy, as nisi were communal property of the sigil and not to be touched unless allowed by the sigil-holder, but here in the outer rings those customs were more loosely kept to. When the difference in power between rylleh and sigil-holder was thin, order tended to break down and killing nisi was often used as statement of rising or descending influence. The drow, I'd learned, made the Praesi fondness intrigue and blood sport look positively mild in comparison. Sekoran climbed up the rocky outcropping that'd served as our seat for the auction with poorly-hidden eagerness.

It was young, though it was hard to tell with drow. Sekoran did lack the kind of agelessly young look most Mighty had, though, its features still soft and lacking the harsh angles of a mature drow. The lifespan of their species was a headache and a half to understand. It was known that those who held no Night save that which they were born to would live exactly sixty years, much too clear-cut a lifespan to be natural. They called it the Three Faces: drow reached maturity at twenty and began their decline at forty, their bodies breaking down over those last twenty years until death took them at the exact age of sixty. Dzulu, like Sekoran's silver-touched eyes betrayed he was, could expect to live over a hundred years old. It was unheard of for even the lowest of the Mighty to die of old age, but some of the worst monsters in the inner ring were alleged to have lived over a millenium. The kid bowed after finishing the climb, first towards me then towards Akua. It allowed Centon to speak to it with contemptuous patience, though more than once I caught it glancing at the banner at my side while the nisi spoke. It'd made an impression, as it'd been meant to.

Drow did not take oaths, or make them, and so a few of the first dzulu to secure a corpse in the auction had treated their word a little too lightly. Three, to be precise. They'd tried to slay other drow under my banner, or hurt them. Their hideously twisted and frozen corpses had been hung from the long metal pole at my side, dangling softly back and forth. I'd not had to lift so much as a finger to see them die. The oaths had seen to that, the sliver of Winter I'd put inside them devouring their bodies from the inside the moment they acted in a manner breaking their word. The Night they'd taken was still there, stirring as they dangled.

They'd started taking the oaths seriously after that.

"It is ready for the ceremony," Akua said, breaking me out of my thoughts.

I glanced at the shade and nodded. She'd helped me with both the ritual and the wording of the oaths, putting her extensive experience with diabolism to slightly more acceptable use. As a sorcerous discipline, diabolism was as much about wordcraft as it was rituals: a binding could be technically flawless and still turn out to be completely worthless if there was a loophole in the protections it carried. There was a reason Praesi preferred summoning lesser devils when they could get away with it: the risks rose sharply when the devil was capable of thought. I'd agreed that making the oaths in Lower Miezana would be to our advantage, since neither of us mastered Crespuscular well enough to be able to understand all the nuances – or, to be frank, trusted any of our translators enough to let them shape the oaths in our stead. Centon would translate the words as well as it could, but the oaths and answers would be in my own native tongue. The ritual tools involved were, to Akua's open despair, rather crude and simple. A sharp obsidian knife, unadorned save for the leather grip, and a rough bowl of sandstone. More than once I'd caught her complaining under her breath that only a Callowan would 'try to subvert an entire civilization with kitchen utilities', but she'd get over it.

Or not, I didn't care either way. Her continued genteel horror was always good for a laugh.

The ceremony, if it could even be called that, was rather simple. I sliced the knife across my palm – normally I'd consider that horribly inconvenient, but my unusual physiology allowed me such dramatic liberties – and let the blood flow into the bowl. I handed the knife to Akua, who then passed it on to Sekoran. It followed suit, cutting too deep in its eagerness. There was no need to slide a piece of Winter into the mixture. My blood itself, I'd been forced to admit, was the stuff of Winter manifest.

"Sekoran of the Everdark, under this name and any name you have ever borne or will ever bear I bind you by these oaths," I said. "May they hold true for one hundred and sixty years, lest the power now bestowed devour you whole."

"I so swear," Sekoran spoke in heavily accented Lower Miezani after Centon translated for it.

"You will never slay nor harm nor hinder any in the service of the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, or dwelling within Callow, save in your own defence or the pursuit of its laws," I said.

"I so swear."

"For the duration of one hundred and sixty years, you will follow the orders of the Sovereign of Moonless Nights without intent to subvert or pervert the spirit in which they were given," I said.

"I so swear."

There were sixteen lesser oaths, all in all, and we moved through them briskly. Most of them were practical boundaries I needed to set before turning loose the murderous drow equivalent of the Watch on the surface for my campaigns. There would be no rape or wanton slaughter, protection of civilians would be enforced by magical oath and standards of decent behaviour thrust upon them. Akua had called it forging a facsimile of Callowan honour through threat of death. I called it refusing to create another batch of fae nobility if they weren't bound to behave the way nobility supposedly did. The greater oaths were only three, and it wouldn't be inaccurate to call them my contingencies. Black had taught me that there was always a point of failure hidden away in even the most stringent of plans, something unseen and unexpected that would come back to bite you at the worst possible time. Given the scope of what I was undertaking here, the sting of that bite would be equivalently brutal. If – when – this turned south on me, I needed levers to either sideline or end them. Fortunately, this time I was not negotiating with the most powerful woman on the continent while she was arguably at the height of her power. I was dealing with eager, desperate drow who craved what I had to offer so badly they could taste it.

The kind of people willing to make dangerous bargains.

“Until death, you will obey and enforce any and all terms of the Liesse Accords,” I said.

“I so swear.”

“The Sovereign of Moonless Night will once name a foe you must fight until it and all it commands is utterly destroyed,” I said.

“I so swear.”

“The Sovereign of Moonless Night will have right to ask one boon of you, to be carried out at all costs, and that right if unused can be passed down to others at its discretion,” I said.

“I so swear.”

Help, long-term plan, insurance. It was not fool-proof, but it was the best the finest diabolist of my generation had been able to help me craft.

“Then Sekoran of the Everdark is granted right to the corpse bargained for, and all Night held therein,” I said. “By this compact we are now bound, and will remain bound.”

The young drow shivered, and it had nothing to do with the coolness of the cavern air. There’d been power in the air, power running through its veins. Through mine as well. I glanced at Centon and nodded. The nisi spoke in Crepuscular, and guided the other drow towards the rylleh’s corpse. Akua lingered, to my complete lack of surprise.

“Diabolist,” I evenly said. “Report.”

She sat at my side without need for an invitation.

“The food situation is out of control,” Akua said. “We can last two more days, three if we ration even the children.”

“We’ll be seizing the Berelun reserve today,” I said.

"And the Berelun themselves with it," she pointed out. "The speed at which we accrue bellies to fill vastly outstrips the quantity of food we're acquiring."

I nodded slowly. She wasn't wrong.

"I expect you're leading to a suggestion," I said.

"You were intent on hitting another two sigils before moving against Great Lotow," Diabolist said. "We cannot afford that. Perhaps one, if what passes for their granaries is large enough."

"We're still weak," I said.

"Our drow contingent will not be the cause of victory or defeat in Lotow, let us not pretend otherwise," she said. "A few more Mighty sworn to you will not make a significant difference either way."

Time and empty bellies. Along with coin, they were the enemies that most often imposed on my plans.

"Agreed," I sighed. "I'll send Archer to see if the Delen are more inclined to fighting than fleeing, we can decide from there."

"Sensible," she conceded with a nod. "As for the situation in the camp, it remains... fluid."

"Rarely a good word, when passing Praesi lips," I said.

She seemed amused by that, and did not deny it.

"The nisi remain cautiously grateful for the rules of behaviour you have imposed, though skeptical it will last," Akua said. "The situation with the dzulu, however, is fast reaching boiling point. The auction has worked, to an extent, but I would expect betrayals in the camp from ambitious elements the moment we run into solid opposition."

"You have names?" I asked.

"I am in the process of gathering them," Diabolist said. "Which remains difficult, as I lack eyes to watch on my behalf. I must rely almost entirely on rumours and observation of social currents – observations, I will remind you, made without appropriate cultural context."

"Still angling for your little death squad, I see," I said.

"There is no nation or large-scale organization on Calernia that does not have individuals charged with internal surveillance," Akua said. "Including Callow under your reign, Catherine. Drow being notably more fractious than humans, to establish such a measure is mere common sense. We both know the longer we wait the larger this will become and the harder it will be to track would-be traitors. It must be done, and done quickly."

"Not to revisit our last argument, but I still don't trust dzulu to keep an eye on their own kind," I frankly replied. "And for them to have right of life and death inside the camp would carry obvious dangers."

"I have come to understand and somewhat agree with your perspective in this," Diabolist said. "Which is why I would amend my previous request. I would like ten ispe corpses from the next... acquisition to be set aside for raising nisi of my own picking. They can be charged with the duty, after being subjected to a strict set of oaths."

"That'll take the wind out of the next auction," I said.

"It will also make it clear that there is more than one way to rise in your service," Akua said. "A useful tool, if the notion is properly conveyed."

I clenched my fingers, then slowly unclenched them. She was right about the risks of leading a pack of drow without anyone charged with keeping an eye on them. Knives pointed at our back weren't just likely at this rate, they were inevitable.

"Agreed for the corpses," I said. "We'll discuss the hierarchy of that fresh batch of spies and assassins after the Berelun have been brought into the fold."

I was disinclined to let Akua Sahelian head what would effectively be my equivalent of the Jacks down here, but I might not have another choice. Ivah was another possible candidate, but I might need it on the frontlines and my leash on Diabolist was arguably tighter. In the end I could dislike it all I wanted but who else was there?

"One last subject, if you would," Akua said.

Evidently she'd noticed my attention was waning.

"I'm listening," I said.

"I would ask for one more ispe to be set aside," she said. "For Centon to harvest."

"Your assistant," I frowned. "It should have enough status from that position alone, and I can't think of another reason why you'd want to empower it."

"It is being treated as a nisi favoured by one of higher status, not an individual to be respected outside that very narrow boundary," Akua noted. "The casual disrespect it is still offered grates me and hinders its work besides. Status as one of the lesser Mighty would neatly remedy that."

And also allow her to sink deeper hooks into the rest of the drow through Centon, a notion I was much less pleased about. Keeping Diabolist useful without giving her too much power was ever a delicate balancing act.

"If you were serious about promoting for reasons other than martial talent, you will hardly find a better candidate," Akua said. "It was careful enough to hide it held the Secret of Lower Miezan for more than twenty years."

"No one's born with a full Secret," I grunted. "Not even literacy, and that's the most common there is. It whet its blade a few times to complete that."

"You might as well chide a Praesi for diabolism," she replied amusedly.

My brow rose.

"How's your heart, Akua?" I said.

"Ever in your hand, dearest, in more ways than one," she smoothly replied.

I rolled my eyes.

"I'll see if I can spare an ispe, but that's unlikely until Lotow," I said. "Make do until then."

"By your will, my queen," she said.

"Because that's not getting old," I muttered.

I rose to my feet. Time to finish cleaning up the Berelun, then. Archer would be getting restless by now.

—

"You're angry," Indrani said. "It told Ivah you'd be angry."

"First off, I very much doubt that," I replied.

"That's fair," she mused. "I mean, I was lying."

"Yours is the laziest, sloppiest form of treachery I have ever countered," I said. "I can't believe that's a mark in your favour, but Gods help me it is. Anyhow, I'm not angry. Surprised? No, surprised is too weak a word. Befuddled."

"I mean, you left us alone without supervision so when you really think about it who's really at fault?" Indrani said.

There was a pause.

"You. You are that fault. That was what I was implying," she revealed.

"I left you two alone for two hours and a half tops, Archer," I complained. "How the Hells did you end up 'accidentally' taking over another sigil?"

What the Berelun called their stronghold was, practically speaking, a plateau inside a tall cavern with a passage through drilled under it. To reach the part where the drow had actually lived – the top of the plateau, more specifically a knot of descending stalactites and stalagmites that'd fused into some sort of stone tree around which all the Berelun tents and structures were centered – would normally have required climbing a sheer cliff, but there were benefits to being made of smoke and mirrors. Like growing wings at will. When I'd first realized that Archer and Ivah had proceeded ahead of me I'd expected to find the stronghold cleared of the last Mighty and terrified drow awaiting instructions. The second part of that, at least, had come true. The first had not, since I was currently looking at around thirty Mighty of varying ranks kneeling on the stone with their hands behind their necks.

"There's a very good explanation for that," Indrani assured me.

My brow rose, and I gestured for her to speak. Silence persisted.

"I can't think of a believable lie," she admitted after a moment.

"Have you considered giving me an actual truthful accounting?" I suggested.

"What is this, a bloody House of Light?" she complained, then her eyes brightened. "Although, if you're willing to wear ripped up sister robes I'm more than willing to give you my confessions."

"Just give me your godsdamned report, Archer," I said, rubbing the bridge of my nose.

"Fine," she pouted. "So I was, like, making small talk with Ivah while surrounded by corpses."

"As one does," I said.

"Right? We never go anywhere without there being corpses around, we should work on that," she said. "Anyways, it was all like 'Archer, you peerless beauty whose charm has moved me, I'm going to brag so you become interested me'."

"Classic Ivah," I agreed.

"And so it mentioned that Bere-whatever tried to convince it to stab you," Indrani said. "Offered it fourth place in the local pecking order."

Probably the only accurate part of what she'd reported so far, though I would not hold out hope for that trend to continue.

"So then, I was like all 'Ivah, please, don't be so obvious it's just embarrassing'. But then I figured – wait, fourth? That's pretty high up. Burley-whatever brought two rylleh with a bunch of mooks and Ivah hadn't done much to show power at that point. Unless it was real bare back on the home front, Shirley-whatever was full of it when it made that promise."

The worst part, I thought, was that she was perfectly aware that the name of the sigil and sigil-holder had been Berelun. She was yanking my chain. I knew that. She knew I knew that. And I knew that she knew I knew that. Yet if I actually corrected her I would lose, and that was just unacceptable.

"So you went on a walk," I prompted.

"Well, technically you said to keep an eye on the corpses and the corpses were gone by then," Indrani said. "So really you have only yourself to blame."

"Oh I wouldn't worry about that," I grunted. "There's plenty of blame to go around."

"Look, when we found the Troubadours they were already under attack by this other bunch of drow," Indrani protested. "So you know, I defended the innocent. As is my custom."

"I don't suppose you bothered to learn the context for all this," I tried.

"I knew you'd say that," she crowed. "So I wrote it down."

She pulled back her coat and mail sleeve, revealing red scribbles. I blinked.

"Archer, is that blood?"

"Which do we run into more often down here: dead bodies or inkwells?" she pointed out. "It's like you don't even think, sometimes. Anyways, here it is. The Dubious-"

Delen, I mentally corrected, which was the nearest sigil to this tone.

"- have been all warlike recently, and slapped the Henries in the face in a skirmish a while back, a defeat bad enough that it cleaned up most of their Mighty."

Had we really gone from 'Bere-whatever' to 'Henries' in the span of thirty heartbeats? I was in dire need of a way to exact pretty revenge on Indrani, it was the only language she truly understood.

"When they heard the Henries were moving out to speak with us, they decided it was a good time to attack," Indrani continued. "But they're blind and their timing is shit-"

The stronghold of the Berelun was difficult to access and finding out precisely when they'd gone to ambush me was difficult, I mentally translated.

"- so they were only just getting started when me and Ivah showed up," she said.

"Ivah and I," I said. "You ignorant wench."

She flipped me off. My gaze returned to the kneeling drow, who'd been watching us talk back and forth very carefully.

"And you what, killed enough of them that the rest gave up?" I asked.

"We protected the innocent until surrender ensued," Indrani proudly replied, then spoiled the way she'd kept her face straight through that by badly winking.

"Fuck it," I sighed. "We'll offer them the usual 'oath or sword' bargain then loot everything before we get back on the road."

"Yes sir, your queenliness ma'am," Archer grinned. "We decided on where we're headed, then?"

"Great Lotow," I told her. "I hope you're in a fighting mood, because we're about to declare war on an entire civilization."

The smile she gave me at that was terrifying in more ways than one, but at least she was on my side.

The drow wouldn't be so lucky.

---

DroughtBringer

Go vote!!

Please

It would mean a lot to me.

topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil

Raved Thrad

Link doesn't work. Does an a href tag work?

Vote for the guide here!

Raved Thrad

bleh, that didn't work. 😞

Miles

<http://www.topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Keep trying eventually one of us will get it right (Or click my name)

Raved Thrad

That worked! How'd you do it?

Cold Cyberia

Citizens!

Join The People In The Bellerophon Discord, The First And Mightiest Of All Discords, Peerless Jewel Of Freedom: <https://discord.gg/rpVW3KS>

Solfadore

ATTN: ALL READERS

Hey all,

RL friend of ErraticErrata here. A few others and I were debating Guide characters recently, and it dawned on us that there is truly no other way of settling any debate than by the laws of Bellerophon, Peerless Jewel of Freedom.

That's right – we're organizing a PGTE Character Contest!

Mostly because we're curious as to which characters The-People-Who-Can-Do-No-Wrong (that's you) prefer. Getting to hear your opinion of each character is valuable, so don't hesitate to share!

Before you ask, we did manage to talk EE into letting us do this, and with only a minimal number of threats.

- The contest will start with next Monday's chapter (October 22).
- One match per chapter – the link to the poll will be in EE's first comment in response to the chapter. We'll also publish it on PGTE's subreddit if you don't read any of the comments. Like the one you're reading right now. I'm helpful.

– It will be a series of head-to-head matches between 32 PGTE characters. Just vote for your favourite!

We promise lies, violence, more lies, and even the clenching and unclenching of fists. Or maybe none of that and just a series of polls. We're still figuring it out.

I'll publish the bracket on Wednesday, so stay tuned!

soonnanandnaanssoon

As honorary citizen of Bellerophon, Peerless Jewel of Freedom, I shall comply to the Laws.

Novice

Hmmm... Your statement feels like you're implying you actually have a choice in whether or not to comply to the Laws As Penned By The People. Have you something to say, Citizen?

Barthumphries

I feel that citizen is expressing their complete desire to choose to follow all of the laws, even those that they do not have a choice in which to follow, as is right and proper.

Death Knight

I predict it's going to be a tie between Black and Anaxares.

papapok13

As the only rightfully elected member of the cast, our Hierarch is to win. Any other outcome could only be the result of foregin tyrants' treacherous manipulation.

burguulkodar

I laughed out loud at this. Genius.

JankTankJoe

Sweet. Let the best(worst) character win!

Fern

god finally, the only waifu wars that have ever mattered lets just all agree that brandon talbot is best girl and move on. I've never fought to the death for a bear before but i sure as hell will give it the old college try

Agent J

Your waifu is shit and your existence has proven a failed project.

Robber is Best Girl. Always was. Always will be. The quality of the series has declined starkly with his prolonged absence.

Novice

Traitorous will always remain as Best Girl. In fact, every contestant turns out to be Traitorous all along!

Cap'n Smurfy

Traitorous is fine for thrills and to look at, but we need a waifu who'll stand by us through thick and thin. Bad boys like Traitorous are no good for us. Reliable Brandon Talbot is clearly Best Girl.

benthelynx

Robber is not best girl. Robber is not even best footrest. Dread Emperor Revenant is best girl.

Someguy

"Blood sacrifice is such an ugly term. I prefer to think of it a 'blood redistribution', a thriving new form of Imperial enterprise."

– Dread Empress Sinistra II, the Coy

She should have been in PR and Marketing.

Antoninjohn

Well we do have blood banks today so I suppose Empress Sinistra II the coy was just a great visionary

happyhavak

I love the way this band of villains functions. I really do.

Gunslinger

At this rate her next name will be The Drow Butcher. She's basically auctioning premium cuts.

Someguy

Akua with a Secret Police is a "NO!". Akua with any form of authority is just Mazrim Taim/Starscream shenanigans waiting to happen.

Raved Thrad

Mentioning Starscream had me picturing Akua shouting at someone, "I am Akua Sahelian! Finest product of the Praesi Empire!" 🤪

SlyMcFly

I forget the details, but didn't Akua go on a huge "I'm the culmination of centuries of Praesi High Lords breeding their offspring for beauty, brains, and magical brawn" spiel at some point?

Soma

Yes.

Raved Thrad

If that's the case then they can't just leave things as they are. There must be a big showdown between Megaliciatron and Starsakuascream.

Dainpdf

Would that Akua were as buffoonish as Starscream...

RanVor

Maybe she'll become when she gets her secret police...

Micke

As long as the oaths are the same, the risks should be Cat, neither more nor less. We know Akua's interest is making Catherine Dread Empress of Praes, not backstabbing her allies for shits and giggles.

RanVor

Exactly. Why people keep believing otherwise is beyond me.

Allafterme

Because we know before the end of this book things roll downhill so hard that when you yell "the underdog" to a fountain of knowledge, words "Catherine Foundling" will appear. And Akua is, well, Akua.

RanVor

Isn't it the case now?

I mean, Akua is many things, but dumb isn't one of them. She will not betray Cat unless it improves her situation considerably, and so far none of Cat's enemies can offer her anything that would beat what she already has under Cat, and what she would lose if she turned against the Woe.

Decius

Because the reason that Akua wants Cat to be Dread Empress is so that she (Akua) can either run everything under Cat's nose or rule everything over her dead body.

RanVor

How does that contradict what Micke said?

Euodiachloris

Give Akua some credit. She wears her seething treachery rather better than Taim ever could.

Yitzi

I'd be more concerned that so many oaths (written by Akua) specify loyalty to the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, and not to Catherine personally.

benthelynx

I noticed that too. It's possibly a limitation as that's the part of her that allows her to bind those oaths, but even then it's going to come back and bite her.

I'm kinda disappointed that Akua isn't suffering the fate of her folly yet.

RanVor

Actually, no. The sad fact is that Cat can't do everything by herself, and can't relegate any sensitive tasks to Archer. That leaves only Akua and the Drow, who are equally untrustworthy and much less predictable. Now, granting any kind of independent authority to the Diabolist would be an utterly moronic move. But authority on behalf of Cat that can be easily overridden if Akua feels like being stupid? That's not a bad idea at all, as long as Cat can ensure the secret police are loyal to her before the Diabolist, which shouldn't be hard with all the oaths and Winter shards.

Javvies

Might need some sort of recall/abort command/option on the second greater oath.

Though, since it appears to be a one-shot, it's unlikely to be lightly used, so maybe not.

But oath-enforced behavior? That's going to work as long as the oaths run for, but I'm dubious about what happens after the term of the oaths expires. Unless she uses the third greater oath on a permanent/indefinite extension of the other oaths, lesser and greater.

Oh, that first greater oath is sneaky – she brings a host of oathbound enforcers to the Liesse Accords ... if she can ever bring the Liesse Accords into play.

Akua gaining more power – especially as head of an internal security service – is trouble waiting to happen.

I bet "Callow" is going to be a lot larger after the Uncivil Wars. Don't want drow marauding on your territory? Become part of Callow, and then they can't or their oaths kill them (until the term of the oaths expire).

—

Hah, Archer is hilarious "we accidentally took these guys over while you weren't watching us".

Leaving Ivah and Archer together and unsupervised is a bad idea Cat, and you should know better.

At least they're about to be causing problems for somebody other than Cat shortly.

—

These oaths demonstrate just how bad an idea it is to make and then break oaths with Cat. As it should be when dealing with powers linked to the Fae.

Pilgrim broke his, though that presumably wasn't anywhere near as one sided. It should still cause him serious problems dealing with Cat in the future.

SpeckofStardust

He did not break an oath with Cat.

Novice

He did, when Pilgrim promptly disappeared after promising to accompany what's-his-face (the Proceran prince heading the Callowan invasion, forgot the name) after the Proceran army agreed to a truce.

Drunken Dwarf

Pretty sure protecting that Prince wasn't actually oath bound. Yes ditching him spit in the face of the Prince, the Northern Procer Coalition, and Callow but it wasn't Story breaking. At least not oath wise, redemption story wise yes but that story sort of got nipped in the bud when she was labeled the archvillian by the Crusade.

Novice

I don't know, man. Agreeing to a truce IS an oath. But I'll concede that it probably won't be a major issue at this point, if at all.

Javvies

While accompanying the Prince of Iserre was one of his official reasons for wanting to accompany him back to Laure (really to work on the redemption arc for Cat), his presence as a "guest/hostage" was negotiated as part of the deal that got the Proceran army and its attached Heroes. Oaths would have been involved, otherwise Cat would never have accepted a Hero walking into Laure. Sure, they're mostly going to be about good behavior and upholding the terms of the truce. And, sure, there wouldn't have been the sort of Winter-enforced kill clause for violating them that the Drow are getting. But they still would have been required – and there be nothing for him to stand on objecting to swearing said oaths. And since he would've needed to make them, there are likely going to be consequences for breaking them – despite the Conclave declaring Cat Arch-heretic of the East nominally freeing him from oaths sworn to her. He made a deal with a Fae power (Cat) and then broke his end of the deal. Such things have consequences.

Cicero

Actually... as I recall, Cat wanted oaths, but it was a deal breaker, that none of the heroes or nobles would risk giving oaths to Cat since if the Crusade ruled she was an nonredeemable villain that would trap them.

So instead they agreed to hostages instead of oaths.

Javvies

So he didn't swear a binding oath.

He still agreed to a deal with a Fae power and violated his end of it.

Breaking deals made with Fae never ends well.

benthelynx

Pretty sure that's not a deal he explicitly made- he was an observer to the truce talks not a signatory to them. Also, if I remember correctly the prince was the hostage not pilgrim – pilgrim was accompanying the prince but not a hostage by the terms of the truce.

SpeckofStardust

He didn't do anything that went against his agreement to be allowed to be an observer for the Prince's safety.

He didn't have to stay as part of the truce, Cat had to let him be there. (As long as he didn't cause trouble while staying, which he didn't)

Dainpdf

Pretty sure Pilgrim did not, **would** not, enter any kind of blood oath with Catherine. Especially not one bound with a ritual constructed by Diabolist.

Javvies

The same grade of penalty or enforcement, no, certainly not.

But ... Pilgrim was one of the guarantees of good behavior. He would have needed to agree to swear oaths to abide by his end of the deal as long as Cat and Callow did the same.

In fact, he would have been required to swear more oaths than those staying with the army and leaving Callow.

Sure, mostly he would've been swearing to things in the nature of good behavior, not escaping, no sabotage, etc. But he still made a deal with Cat (a Fae power) and violated his end of the deal. That's going to have consequences.

Making deals with the Fae is something you don't do lightly, and you certainly don't go anywhere near violating your end. Those stories never ever end well for the dealbreaker.

Dainpdf

Well, I'm not sure he did swear such oaths. Do we have confirmation? Plus, if just swearing were enough Cat wouldn't have bothered with all of this.

Also, he's a super old hero. Bet he has a way to dodge whatever consequences may or may not come.

Cat might be able to turn this into a story and capitalize, but I doubt it will do anything by itself.

Javvies

Pilgrim might not have formally and officially sworn binding oaths (and certainly nothing like the ones that the drow are making), but he would have needed to actively and affirmatively agree to abide by the terms of the deal and to terms of behavior and conduct. Ergo, he de facto made a deal with Cat – a Fae Power. And then he broke it.

There are no stories where making, and then breaking, a deal with any Fae, much less a powerful one, ends well for the dealbreaker.

Smart people don't make deals with the Fae if it is at all avoidable, but only those who are too stupid to live make and then break a deal with the Fae.

Oh, sure, there are some stories about getting the better end of a deal, if you tricked the Fae in the making of it, or if it's some sort of wager or contest, sometimes you can surprise the Fae with an unexpected display of skill or luck. And the Fae will often leave themselves loopholes through wordplay, but that's for them, not the mortal.

But outright breaking a deal you agreed to? You are all kinds of screwed, until/unless you can somehow make it right, appease, and apologize to the Fae who you broke faith with.

Pilgrim just broke the deal he made with Cat in order to kill (or at least come terrifyingly close in the attempt) Black (aka, Cat's surrogate Father-figure/Mentor).

I'm dubious about Pilgrim being able to grovel his way out of doom for breaking the deal and going after Black.

If Pilgrim had gone north to face off against the Dead King, sure, maybe he could find some way to appease Cat (probably by throwing his full public and private support behind the Liesse Accords).

Dainpdf

Would he? It's been a while, so I may have forgotten, but I don't recall any such oaths. Plus, he was there to guarantee the safety of Amadis, and he hasn't attacked Cat's people or Callow. It may be that he has abided by his part in it.

Javvies

He didn't swear the sort of binding oaths to support the deal that Cat wanted to get out of the Crusaders, no.

On the other hand, he was one of the negotiated guarantors of Crusader behavior, not just an observer.

There would have been terms negotiated on movement, activities, behavior, etc. – that would have been required by both the Crusaders and by Cat before a final agreement. Also, terms for enforcement/penalties for violating the rest of the deal. Cat would have required that both the Crusaders leaving with the army and both the Prince and Pilgrim to actively and affirmatively agree to the deal. Pilgrim especially, because he could do all kinds of damage in Laure if he decided to misbehave – far more than Milenan could. And they'd require that Cat do the same.

That's still making a deal with a Fae, even if there were no oaths covering the conduct, treatment, etc.

Also, in 36 Enchere, when Juniper tells Cat that Pilgrim has booked it, it is said that Pilgrim's disappearance was a violation, though there wouldn't be any point in using Pilgrim's violation to invoke the negotiated penalty terms against either the Crusaders or on Milenan.

Dainpdf

I was looking at 21 and 22, and while Cat did say a random promise to her **would** come back to haunt people, the whole hostage thing was done to avoid oaths.

As for 36, I could find no mention of the Pilgrim, though it did mention that as arch heretic of the east all oaths to her are declared void by the Heavens.

benthelynx

De facto deals definitely don't count with fae in many stories. Usually it's the fae taking advantage of implying something, but in most stories it's the exact spoken words that matter. As indicated in this chapter by the attention placed on the language of the oaths.

werafdsaew

Read chapter 22 again; the whole point of leaving Amadis behind as hostage was because the crusaders didn't want to make an oath. Now Cat is a fae and GP did break his words, so it would have consequences, but they are not oaths.

Euodiachloris

Every tale ever: be careful of your promises and expressed wants or wishes, as even casual words are oaths to the powers of land, fire and water, be they god, djinn, fetish or fae.

Also, never piss off Hera.

Excited

He promised not to be a smug sanctimonious prick and, wow, look at him go!

Raved Thrad

I really like the Archer-Catherine dynamic, too. It's like watching a yandere and a tsundere, locked together in the same room, and slowly watching the tsundere go bugfuck.

agumentic

Pilgrim was freed from his oaths by an official Great Conclave, which is fairly narratively important. I expect it to take most of the backlash.

Javvies

Sure, he may think that works. And for regular mortals, even regular Named, it probably would.

Just a slight problem with that, ignoring the fact that the Conclave were declared heretics, and Pilgrim was declared a Villain, not a Hero, by the Callowan House of Light.

You don't get out of deals with the Fae so easily. And violating a deal you made or agreed to with one always has consequences. Severe consequences, at best.

Anonymouse

He'll get some help from Above or from the Bard

Javvies

When you break faith with a Fae you made a deal with, there are no stories that end well for you. And all kinds of stories demonstrating just how bad an idea doing so is.

Above is specialized against Below and it's substantially less effective against the Fae – remember when the priests tried to use “holy power” as a countermeasure against the Winter Dead in the Battle of the Camps?

Sure, Pilgrim isn't going to be going solo against Cat. But failing to uphold his end of a deal he made with a Fae power is going to have consequences that he can't just walk off or ignore.

AVR

The drow oaths aren't going to expire all at once. Auctions, remember? For the truly dangerous drow Catherine (or her successor) is going to have decades to convince them not to go on a rampage, to make examples of lesser drow with shorter oaths in front of them, or to plan for their inevitable betrayal in the worst case.

If the Grey Pilgrim survives his current encounter with the Black Knight then a stabbing by Catherine looks likely to be a part of his future before the Tenth Crusade is over. Losing a reason for her to negotiate with him is probably the biggest consequence.

SilentWatcher

Guys! Did no one consider the possibility of these oaths being the powder keg blowing up in Cat's face? especially the second, what stops Akua, when she is in Cat's body again, from telling the drow Cat's name? massacre in Callow ensues.

RanVor

I like this logic. It makes me laugh. If you take it far enough, you'll come to the conclusion that Cat shouldn't do anything ever.

NZPIEFACE

She really shouldn't, but then again, if she doesn't, who will?

nimelennar

I doubt Callow is going to get any larger. It's the country of "You tried to annex us, and we're going to make you pay for it for centuries." Cat would know better than to expect for things to come from trying to occupy hostile territory.

nimelennar

*expect good things

Allafterme

I expect Callow & Praes to unite at the very end, not in a conqueror and subjugated relationship, but truly condense in a single nation

Rup

Which do we run into more often down here: dead bodies or inkwells?.....

Exactly the type of logic that The Lady Of The Lake would term CommonSense

Raved Thrad

Archer's on a roll here. I pictured her bright-eyed and bushy-tailed in the previous chapter, playing knife games with the drow, but here it's like she's building up to one huge deathgasm. She just basically killstole an entire encounter away from Catherine.

Rook

Archer is kind of like a goblinfire bomb. You don't actually control it, you sort of throw it in the general direction of your opponents, then look the other way as everything goes to shit for someone else for a change.

Dainpdf

Cat did once compare Archer to a building in flames or something to that effect (back when invading Old Dormer).

fbt

rotfl! this, exactly.

habu987

So, basically Indrani is the Harry Dresden of this world.

Raved Thrad

A goblinfire bomb that, if you poke it hard enough, shyly tells you, "I wuv you! Toss me at your enemies so I can make them die!"

Cicero

Starting to feel like things are going too smoothly for Cat. Waiting for the other shoe to drop.

Although I suppose the other shoe could be Black's death. Cat comes back from the Drow all full of a success that worked well and without significant setbacks only to discover her father figure got killed while she was off playing Drow Queen.

Javvies

Don't forget – she still has to deal with the strongest drow sigils.
And take care of the Sve of Night.
That's going to be plenty hard.

She's still dealing, for the most part, with the trash mobs, and only a handful of not as bad ones, of the Drow. This has been the easy part.

Dainpdf

First part of the plan always works.

nimelennar

Which is why you should always have as many plans going as possible. -Irritant.

Raved Thrad

"The man I loved as a father is dead, killed by heroes in Procer, and I will have revenge! Go forth, my treacherous minions! Burn Procer and Ashur to the ground! Build my father a funeral pyre on the ashes of the homes of these crusading bastards!"

AVR

Black's a master of making the apparent situation be different to the real one. Don't count him out just yet. Though if he thought that it would make a story where Cat could and would do that he might consider it acceptable losses, he has been a bit suicidal of late.

Dylan Tullos

Make Akua your Chancellor and be done with it, Cat.

Raved Thrad

Can the dead gain names, as opposed to retaining them (like the undead Named enslaved by the Dead King)? If so, then she might be up for "Demonic Advisor" or something similar.

Dainpdf

The revenants don't quite keep Names. They keep slivers of them.

Yotz

Akua is a wee bit different now, it seems, the question here being – does her soul interweaving with the Mantle would be enough to alter her /quote/ undead /unquote/ state. She was able to gain a weight once, which implies, I presume, temporary gaining a body of sorts. Would it be enough to gain a semblance of life, or life in full – albeit not a status of “living” in conventional sense, maybe – only EE could answer.

What tickles me in a fancy way, though – her apparent genuineness in the heart matters. Not that it would make it wise to give her even a bit of command over the newly minted Schutzstaffel, but here’s the crux – I doubt she will betray Cat unless Cat undergo radical personality change, essentially eradicating everything she is at this point, but...

Imagine a high-functioning psychopath, megalomaniacal, machiavellian in its worst, utterly unrepentant, and utterly loyal to you. Unfortunately, said psycho also considers you to be a bit of a naive numbwit somewhat, and is convinced that in some aspects she knows better. Now, give her an channel to realize her good intents – good for you, that is; from her point of view, that is...

In two days everyone will be prosperous, happy, and smiling. And if someone would not, I will smother them down, crush them into fine powder, and feed that powder to the devils!

Dainpdf

Cat did swear she doesn’t get to come back, so if she starts to seem like she’ll get to anything like that she’ll be bound to destroy Ubua.

In any case, she’s too traitorous to ever be trusted with anything. It’s religion, to her.

RanVor

Not really. That she has no qualms to betray someone when there’s something to gain by it doesn’t mean she feels compelled to betray people at the drop of a hat for some ridiculous reason. She’s much better off at Cat’s side and she knows it. She’s going to stay loyal at least until the situation undergoes a drastic change.

Dainpdf

You forget that “betrayal for no good reason” is exactly where “iron sharpens iron” leads. Hell, Praes has a Name dedicated exclusively to knifing the Tyrant in the back.

That, plus look at their version of ‘The Scorpion and the Frog’, which praises the scorpion for exactly betraying the frog for no good reason.

And Akua is Praesi if she’s anything.

RanVor

Name one time Ubua did something that didn't further her agency in any way.

Her insistence on sticking to tradition may make her inefficient, but that doesn't mean she's dumb or doesn't know what she's doing.

If she actually did betray Cat for no good reason, it would be the most disappointing plot development in Guide, period. I hate seeing a well developed character being cheapened like that just for the sake of a twist that wouldn't even surprise anyone. It would be much more interesting if she didn't betray Cat at all, simply because too many people expect the betrayal to happen.

Dainpdf

People expect her to betray Cat because that's her character. Her not betraying (or at the very least attempting to lead astray) Cat at all would be out of character for her. Calling her betraying Cat a twist is like calling Vivienne stealing things a twist.

As for one time Ubua did something dumb due to her blinders? It's known as Ubua's Folly for a reason.

RanVor

People oversimplify Akua's character all the time. She's opportunistic as fuck, but she needs fucking opportunities to take advantage of them. I'm not saying she will never betray Cat (why do you keep missing my points?), I'm saying she will only betray Cat when it's actually beneficial for her to do so. She's not going to betray Cat when it's counterproductive and suicidal just because she's Praesi or betrayal is her religion or some other bullshit. She's smarter than that and it honestly baffles me that people think otherwise while simultaneously believing she's a brilliant manipulator who can wrap Cat around her finger whenever she wishes. Right now she has much more to gain by corrupting Cat than by breaking free of her control for five minutes or so (because that's how quickly she would be crushed if she tried).

Akua's Folly wasn't really dumb, and definitely wasn't counterproductive. It was actually a solid plan that only failed because she underestimated Black's ingenuity.

Dainpdf

There are ways and ways of betraying someone. I'm not saying that Akua is just going to rebel randomly. Just that as soon as she gets what she thinks is a window, she will use it.

Much like, had Cat not had contingencies when she was asleep from lake dropping, she might just have stayed out for a way longer while.

As for manipulating Cat, she'll have a hard time doing it for now, since she still has her blinders on and Cat remembers who she is.

About Akua's Folly: It was a plan that would have gotten her drowning in heroes in a heartbeat. The Bard didn't even take her as a threat.

RanVor

"I'm not saying that Akua is just going to rebel randomly"

But you make it sound like she is.

"as soon as she gets what she thinks is a window, she will use it"

If it actually had a solid chance to get her what she wants, then yes, she would do it. But I don't see any situation of this kind coming up in the near future.

"It was a plan that would have gotten her drowning in heroes in a heartbeat"

Sure, but one does not become one of the most influential villains on the continent without attracting unwanted attention from the other side of the fence. Also, the Heavens don't work that quickly. It would be months before the really dangerous ones got to her, and by that time she would have already won. Besides, she would likely be drowning in heroes anyway. The Crusade, remember?

"The Bard didn't even take her as a threat"

That's because the Bard's definition of a threat is quite unorthodox. Ubu was not a threat *to her*, because she would benefit from the Diabolist's success. Cat is much greater threat to the Intercessor, despite being less of an actual threat.

Dainpdf

"But you make it sound like she is."

Now you're just putting words in my mouth.

"If it actually had a solid chance to get her what she wants, then yes, she would do it. But I don't see any situation of this kind coming up in the near future."

It's more a question of whether she thinks she can get away with it. Plus, there is bound to be an opportunity at some point.

"Sure, but ... The Crusade, remember?"

This is why Neshamah lasted millenia and Triumphant did not."

"That's because ... an actual threat"

The Bard dismissed her saying she would take care of herself. That 'that kind' always ends like that. She dismissed Ubuah not only as a threat to her plans, but as a threat to Good as well.

RanVor

"Now you're just putting words in my mouth"

As you in mine. Now we're even.

"Whether she thinks she can get away with it"

Except it's not really possible anymore. This time it's an all-or-nothing situation. And the reason for that is the Winter Mantle.

People keep talking about Akua usurping Cat's power, but I don't think they realize how it actually works. Cat is Winter. It can't be taken away from her any more than your brain can be taken away from you, except the consequences would be many times more severe. Her body doesn't exist. It's an illusion made solid by the power of Winter. Her very existence is anchored to the mantle, intertwined so closely that anyone drawing upon Winter is automatically drawing upon Cat as well. To sever that bond, Akua would have to erase Cat from existence, lest she turns into Cat the moment she tried to use her newly acquired power. Of course, she herself would end up erased from existence if her plan failed. That's why Akua has become more cautious than ever before – because the price of failure is utter annihilation, and she's not going to risk it lightly.

"This is why Neshamah lasted millenia and Triumphant did not"

This is also why Triumphant is revered in Praes and Neshamah is not. Praesi perception of victory is rather warped. They don't really care about how long they would last. What matters to them is how they're going to be remembered by future generations. If Akua's hellgate machine succeeded, she'd be able to quickly generate a level of infamy rivaling the Dead King, surpassing almost every other villain in history of Calernia. That's a perfectly valid win within this mindset.

"She dismissed Ubua ... as a threat to Good as well" Because she wasn't, really. Save for Black, no villain is a serious threat to Good as a whole. She was a representative of Classic Evil, and those always lose in the end. She was a huge threat to *people*, but since when does the Bard care about those?
It's also worth remembering that not only the Intercessor didn't actually take care of Ubua, but actively hindered others who tried to do so.

Dainpdf

I am sorry I put words in your mouth. I did not intend to. Please tell me where?
As for the mantle being usurped, it has been mentioned before. It would be hella difficult, but if anyone can try it's diabolist. The Dead King did mention Cat hasn't finished her apotheosis yet.
As for Triumphant, that's precisely my point. Ubua's culture is Praesi, and it stimulates certain behavior even at one's own cost. Grabs for quick power are one, betrayal and shifting alliances are another.

Yavandir

Tell this to Dread Emperor Revenant...

Dainpdf

I meant the KotD revenants. But I'm sure you knew that.

Javvies

Never going to happen.
Malicia was entirely right to seek to exterminate the Chancellor Name and role.
Chancellors traditionally betray their overlord.
Betrayal of Cat is not something Cat wants to encourage.

taliesinskye

Plus, the position of treacherous lieutenant is already taken.

---

Although, if Catherine raises enough treacherous lieutenants, she may irritate her way out of it.

Allafterme

I'd actually shill out good coin to see that happens from the first row...

JackbeThimble

I think book 4 needs to be named 'How Catherine Got her Mojo Back' and it will end with her ascending to the Name of 'Queen Bitch of the Universe.'

Also Cat and Archer should just bang already.

Novice

Brood War Kerrigan would contest that title, and rightfully so. That infested girl was a badass.

benthelynx

Nah archer is just flirting. She's fallen hard for masago.

Rook

"at least she was on my side"

That, right there, is everything about Archer as a person in seven words. She's an inconvenience at best when she's trying to help you, but gods, imagine how much worse it would be if she wasn't.

Ahoy Matey!

i spy with my little eye a point of failure ; Akua usurping Cat's title "Sovereign of Moonless Nights" along with all the oathbound drow and most of Winter.

oongawa

Yeah, I was reading those thinking "well that's going to be something you regret when Akua steals the title, which she obviously already has a plan for."

That's ok through, Akua winning in the end would be hilarious.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, indeed. This may be made more likely because Cat is shunting off Winter's effect onto Akua.

RoflCat

>The smile she gave me at that was terrifying in more ways than one, but at least she was on my side.

So...this?

<https://knowyourmeme.com/memes/mirai-nikki-yandere-face>

Josh

I'm a little worried that the oaths were made out to the Sovereign of Moonless Night, as opposed to Cat specifically. That seems like a recipe for Akua usurping her title. She's already got the body of a fae, and Cat keeps dumping the power bleed off onto her. Could be trouble.

---

To be fair, when Catherine stabbed her supposed "father" she didn't become a Duchess of Violent Squalls, though that might have been King of Winter rigging her title to destroy himself.

Dainpdf

Thought the same. Could also be that this creates greater stimulus for other usurpation, eg by Larat. On the other hand, could be it's the only option – their oaths are made on her mantle and upon joining Winter, and so it is possible they can only be made to the Sovereign.

IDKWhoitis

If she wants Winter to enforce the oath, she might be obligated to tie the oath to Winter by using her Winter Title. Same way how Cordelia uses her different titles in procer for different purposes. No prince in Procer follows Cordelia Hasenbach, they follow the First Prince.

Likewise, if Catherine want to eventually Retire, she might want to be able to shunt off the responsibilities.

Berder

Absolutely. It apparently wasn't even necessary because the first oath refers to "my service" and "my laws" (Catherine's) instead of the Sovereign of Moonless Night. I get the feeling that Akua could usurp Cat's title at any moment, she's just waiting for the right time when she's sufficiently insinuated into everything to take over.

werafdsaew

I'm thinking that's exactly why the full oaths is to the Sovereign and not to Cat. Back when Akua was controlling Cat's body, she was subject to all the oaths that Cat swore to. Conversely this means that as long as she controls the construct, she is Cat for purposes of oaths to "I". Given that the Sovereign is the full mantle itself and not the construct,

I'm thinking that it works differently for oaths to the Sovereign.

Onyavar

Spotted the same thing (in my first read-through) and became worried until I saw your comments from one year ago when this was still fresh. This is something that readers are supposed to notice, and it will be a topic soon (within this same book is my guess).

This wording is likely not an oversight of Cat. Cat knows that Larat and Akua are the embodiment of the "untrustworthy lieutenant", and there is likely a plan that deals with usurpation.

On the other hand, if Cat names an inheritor for her title, the oath binds the drow not to her person, but to the Heir. And hey, can cat inherit power from her successor? Is Cat the next Heiress?

Dainpdf

Can I just say that this is just hilarious as the recipe for the harem that will never be?

Cat and Akua are delightful – until you remember that Ubua is a monster and should probably be dead.

Cat and Indrani is cute – but they've made it quite clear they're happy as friends, and Cat doesn't even feel lust for her anymore. Still, I'm firmly in the "Cat should get laid" camp. Might help her unwind a bit.

wintersprite

Too bad Thief would probably be pissed off when she hears about Ubua's drow spy/death squad... Plus, Cat's body is already made out of fae stuff, can she even get laid? Winter's not coming any time soon.

Dainpdf

I'm sure Hierophant can come up with something. Cat is already learning how to shunt the worst of Winter on her minions.

Berder

Typos:

I'm going to brag so you become interested me (interested in) the nearest sigil to this tone (to this one)

Definitely Akua is getting too much power here by being liaison with the Drow, and this is going to bite Catherine hard.

Barthumphries

The drow, I'd learned, made the Praesi fondness intrigue and blood sport look positively mild in comparison.

Add "for" after "fondness"

Redlaw

Who watched code gueass where at the end lelouch enslaved his brother to "zero" and not him exactly. Here i think it's the same. The oath are to the sovereign of moonless night not cat. So what happen if she lose her title ? What happen if a certain shade who worded the oath and is able to tape in the power of winter managed to steal all the power ? After all this story is about tropes and a protagonist having all his power stolen by an "ally" is a trope used many time in many story.

crescentsickle

Comment on recent chapters, since I just got caught up:

Viv paranoia'ing at Hakram is sad. She sees Akua eye up Hakram and conclude it's because Akua recognizes a fellow schemer. The truth is that Akua aims to be Chancellor at the moment, to grab that name in order to aim for Empress once Cat claims it. The Chancellor is an extension of the Empress, and though Akua's existence is a literal physical extension of Cat, Hakram is an extension of Cat in so many ways his Name represents the fact. He exists as a force poured into the mold of whatever tool Cat requires and is thus the ideal candidate for Chancellor to an Empress, especially one that doesn't believe that 'Steel strengthens steel' and so doesn't care for treachery as an open secret in her underlings.

Akua has been trying this entire time to emulate Hakram and serve Cat in all the ways Hakram can't; to be that same force poured into whatever mold is desired, but a force composed of very different things. Arguably more useful things, she whispers to Cat in every action she takes in her service.

The problem is that she has to either make Cat fall far enough to accept her over Hakram, or Hakram has to die in a way she has to be so far removed from suspicion that she can't actually be involved. I wonder if she's been manipulating things with the woe in the hopes that Viv and Hakram will either have a falling out or one of them kills the other. If they do, her position is elevated. If they don't, she gets to continue to woo Cat without supervision.

Ravenfrost

Everyone here pass on the most important piece of information delivered in this chapter, the discipline of the nisi. I think cat will make an army of those nisi that follow her. And by empowering them will effectively change drow society.

After all, named do not hold ground, a teaching that this guys have forget...
Sorry for bad english

Screwfloss

"Black had taught me that there was always a point of failure hidden away in even the most stringent of plans"

It's a good practice to set aside a team (if possible) and give them a hypothetical: imagine it's the future, and our plan has already failed. Your job is to explain why it failed.

This is a proven way of rooting out those unseen weak points.

RanVor

If Cat ever loses the title of the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, I expect all kinds of awful shit happening to everyone except her, because I'm not sure if she can even exist without her mantle anymore.

Metalshop

This chapter makes me really want a chapter from the point of view of the Drow.

leahvad

leahvad a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/BR7CoEpaV6nHqGLkvUzpR>

---

Chapter 64: Momentum

"When in doubt, attack. When doubtless, attack as well."
– Bastien de Hauteville, Proceran general

Great Lotow was nothing like I'd expected.

All I'd seen of the drow so far was raised stones and the occasional clever exploitation of natural features, and so my expectations had been rather low before I took my first look at one of their 'cities'. I'd believed it would be a few half-ruined structures and perhaps a surviving set of walls, but the Lotow I was looking upon served as a reminder that the Everdark had once been an empire in its own right. I'd thought of the term city in the Callowan sense, a gathering of houses and streets with marketplaces and maybe a decent set of ramparts. But that was a surface way of looking at things, wasn't it? Up there, cities were built in breadth. Spreading when the population rose. The drow had instead built in depth, in a way that would have been impossible in the land of my birth.

Great Lotow was built in levels, that was the easiest way to describe it. The heart of the city was a massive pit with a spire of stone in the centre, from base to summit large as a small fortress. From that tree radiates branch-like bridges leading to districts carved directly into the rock across the chasm, their sizes variable. Closer to the bottom I could glimpse districts large as Summerholm itself serving as farms and lakes, while closer to the centre the holes in the rock were more like neighbourhoods of carved houses. At its peak, I thought, Lotow must have had several hundred thousand drow living in it. Now, though, most of it was abandoned. Some of the bridges linking the spire to the sides had been broken and though some were replaced by rope bridges made of some kind of pale weed many more had simply been left gaping, the districts they led to now empty ruins.

It was a moving sight, I would admit. The structure of the city alone would have been impressive, but the ancient drow had made of Lotow a work of art. There was hardly a wall or floor that was not filled by a mosaic or bas-relief, stalactites and stalagmites had been carved into painted statues of drow and animals. Entire spans of ceiling had been set with coloured stones and gems to create a sky, and there were tall steles showing spindly sentences in Crepuscular reciting old stories and ballads where my people would have placed street signs instead. Ivah had told me that last detail was an old drow custom: streets had once been known by the never-mentioned titles of the written work on the stele, every drow expected to be well-taught enough to know it at a glance.

Now, though, those old stories were painted over with blood red runes to mark where territories began and ended. Metal and precious stones had been ripped out of statues and mosaics, carvings older than Callow left to erode under the depredations of elements and time. Stone houses that collapsed were not raised anew but covered with skins and leathers as half-tents while ancient temples and mansions lay cracked open, their heavy stones used to make walls of piled rock. And still, after centuries and millennia, Great Lotow endured. Long winding aqueducts rival to any of Miezana descended along the sides of the pit and provided water to cisterns and fountains, sewers unlike I'd ever seen sent filth towards the lower farms without overflowing or clogging after what must have been centuries of disrepair. There was no city like this in Callow, I thought. Not even in Praes, who had been under Miezana occupation and so benefitted from that empire's fondness for great civil works. Great Lotow would have been the crown jewel of any surface nation, the envy of the continent.

Down here, it was just one more decaying corpse in the pile. It was a sorrowful sort of awe that I felt. Would we have raised cities like this, if we were not always at war? I wondered. Callow had little to boast of save for cathedrals and fortresses. The bridges linking Summerholm were a wonder, to be sure, but a Miezan one. Sometimes I could see why the rest of Calernia called us backwards peasants. We were so much less than we could have been. Praes too, I thought. There was so much potential in the Empire, if it would just cease devouring itself every other decade. So much knowledge and skill, always turned to acts of self-immolation that took chunks of the continent along with it.

"You're being quiet," Indrani said.

"It's a lot to take in," I replied.

"Eh," my friend shrugged. "After Keter the bar's been raised. Gonna take more than pretty ruins to impress me."

"We walk through the grave of an empire," I murmured. "That's worth a moment of contemplation."

"Oh, there's still people down there," Indrani mused. "For now. I don't see this lot surviving a firm assault from the dwarves, if we don't get them moving."

There were still drow, it was true. A mere pittance compared to what Lotow must have kept in olden days, but our new acquisitions from the departed Delen Sigil had estimated twenty thousand people here and I believed that was a conservative number. The larger sigils reigned close to the bottom, where the old farms could be kept going and so allow for more nisi to be held, but that didn't necessarily mean the deeper sigils were the most powerful. Mighty Delen and its tribe had been intending to have a go at claiming territory on the outskirts of Lotow within the decade, and so interrogation had wielded more information than I'd expected. The central spire – called an overly-long word meaning 'column' in Crepuscular – wasn't the territory of any single sigil, as whoever held it would have a massive advantage over rivals, but the rest of the inhabited city had been carved up between the ten sigils that inhabited it. The weakest, and the one we'd go after first, was the Urulan Sigil. They'd once ruled a few of the central districts, but after being evicted by a stronger sigil they'd moved upwards and devoured the sigil that had previously ruled the part of Lotow called the Crossroads.

If the city was a cylinder from which districts sprouted, then the Crossroads was the circle atop that cylinder, connected through the central Column by four broad bridges. Nearly every tunnel in the region led to the Crossroads, including the one where we currently stood, though the Hallian ways that had once been the highways of the drow empire were linked to Lotow's bottom level instead. Which was unfortunate, since I intended to go through those. The Crossroads were arguably the city's second most important strategic point, but highly unpopular territory for a sigil to hold: since near every tunnel led to them, any ambitious sigil trying to get into the Lotow scrap would begin by taking a swing at whoever held them. Word was that a sigil holding them could expect slow and steady decline through constant conflict until either a sigil of the outer ring managed to mount a strong enough assault or a sigil on the losing side of a conflict deeper down moved up and evicted the latest occupants – much as the Urulan themselves had done.

Sadly, the Urulan Sigil had been forced to migrate less than twenty years ago. They might be a wreck compared to any of the deeper sigils, but they would have maintained enough strength they'd make any of the fights I'd picked in the Everdark so far look like child's play.

"The city will be tricky to assault," I finally said.

"Gotta take the Crossroads before we go at it seriously," Indrani noted, squinting down. "That'll be ugly fighting, mark my words."

I did not disagree. Though that section of the city was a single ring going around the edges of the pit holding the Column, it wasn't flat grounds. Large rectangular halls were tightly clustered, with small streets and broader avenues between them. Easy to defend, to force the attacker in a bottleneck.

"We'll have to split our force in two," I said. "Sweep the ring from both sides. I'll need you to lead one of the assaults."

She shot me a curious look.

"Who am I getting as a lieutenant, Diabolist or Ivah?"

"You get Akua," I grunted. "I imagine I'll need a translator more than you."

"Sure," she snorted. "Let's pretend that's true. We certain we want no one keeping an eye on the bridges?"

That was the large risk here, I thought. The odds that a deeper sigil would be willing to send its Mighty against an attacker it hadn't properly looked over were low – sigils prone to taking those kinds of gambles didn't tend to last long. They weren't non-existent, however, and it might change the situation if they learned that it was a human leading the charge. Still, I couldn't afford to let the Urulan run or concentrate their forces. But can I afford to be flanked halfway through? Not really, no. After Archer had 'acquired' the Delen Sigil and we'd gathered the people from both them and the Berelun, our numbers had doubled: a little over four thousand drow were now under my banner. Of those, I counted three hundred and change dzulu and twenty-three Mighty of varying ranks. It wasn't a small force, by the standards of the outer ring, but all the real players down here were either in a city or the inner ring. We wouldn't be fighting dregs, this time. If we ended up going against two real sigils at the same time...

"Fair point," I said. "Change of plans. I want you to sweep a quarter of the ring, then stop in front of the bridge and keep an eye on what's happening."

"To put arrows in the curious and the runners, if there happen to be any," Indrani sighed. "Ugh, I always get the shit jobs."

"You'd get bored scything through dzulu," I countered. "Besides, feel free to take shot from your perch at anything getting in my way."

"Slightly better," she conceded.

The two of us remained standing there for a while, strangers in this broken land looking down at a once-great city. I would have called the moment solemn, if not for the fact that Indrani was pulling at a flask of liquor. She sighed in satisfaction, then rolled her shoulders.

"All right," Archer said. "We doing this or what?"

"Don't get yourself killed," I reminded her, meeting hazelnut eyes with my own.

"Never have before," Indrani drawled. "So, you know, if we go purely by precedent it only makes sense that I'm immortal."

While pushing her over the tunnel's edge would have been deeply satisfying, we did have a battle to win. I settled for freezing her flask solid instead, grinning at the muttered imprecations that followed.

—

Steel-clad boots hit the ground, and I slowed long enough to have a look at my warriors – and they were definitely that, not a soldier among them. One hundred dzulu, moving like large hunting cats with their spears and swords in hand, barely a dozen shields among them. Thirteen Mighty, most of them ispe with only a single jawor and a pair of freshly-harvested rylleh to serve as heavy hitters. My Lord of Silent Steps led the pack from the front, and they slowed along with me without a word.

"Ivah," I said. "Translate. The old terms apply: nisi are not to be touched save in self-defence, surrenders are to be accepted and observed. Anyone they kill, they can take. Corpses of my own making go to auction, and I will personally execute any who reaps their Night."

Not exactly the most inspirational of speeches, but then with drow I'd found it more important to lay down rules than tug at heartstrings. They had precious few of either, and the latter was beyond my ability to fix. The words were repeated in Crepuscular, and within a heartbeat of the sentence ending the first shot of the battle for Great Lotow was fired. A javelin, thrown from a rooftop maybe half a hundred feet ahead. Aimed towards me, which meant either it was a warning to the drow or they'd already caught on to the fact I was running things. I could have simply stepped aside – it was aimed at my centre of mass, well-thrown but barely any better than a mundane human could have – but sometimes it was necessary to make an impression and... set the tone. I let it arc downwards, and at the last moment caught the shaft. Less than an inch stood between the sharp stone tip and my plate. Casually, I spun the javelin around between my fingers and gripped it correctly. One step, lowering my body, then rising up I threw the javelin back.

It, uh, wasn't something I was trained in. I had better aim and certainly more body strength than I'd used to, but that didn't translate to skill. It flew like a damned crossbow bolt, in a straight line, and was easily dodged by the silhouette on the rooftop. Still, at least no other projectile had followed. It was a start. I flicked my wrist, forming a blade of frost, and advanced.

"Forward," I ordered, Ivah translating a heartbeat afterwards.

Archer would begin her own sweep the moment we engaged the enemy properly, so all I had to worry about was the world in front of me. I went down the slope at a pace, and entered the avenue briskly. Already the Urulan had prepared a reception. A dozen dzulu led by a drow roiling with Night – Mighty, and stronger than ispe – were spread out in a loose crescent with with Mighty at the tip. I'd missed this, I realized. The simplicity of it. Enemies ahead, allies behind. No tricky little shades of morality, no debate over right and necessity. It was like I'd been whisked back to the Pit and its much less complicated time. I felt a savage grin split my lips, and for the first time in ages I could savour the air in my lungs. The glorious burn of it, illusion that it was. I'd keep it going as long as I could. I darted forward, dashing around another javelin and closing the distance in mere heartbeats. The Mighty yelled and Night flared, the sound reverberating, but instead of ducking I plunged into it. My eardrums burst and reformed in the same moment, and the last I saw of that drow was the look of utter surprise on its face when my sword carved through its throat.

The dzulu immediately began retreating, faces gone pale, but I was having none of that. I moved faster than them, and the first I caught before it could even turn to strike me. My hand went through its back and I snapped its spine, withdrawing bloodied fingers. The next struck at me with spear, but I let the stone tip bounce off my plate and slapped its cheek hard enough the neck broke. The third tried to parry my strike, but while the blades were at the right angle the difference in strength made it pointless. Its arm was forced down, and a flick of the wrist had its head rolling on the floor. My own drow joined the fray eagerly, falling on the survivors like wolves on the fold, but I pressed on. I'd not come here to make sport of dzulu. Archer would be going to the right, so my charge was to sweep by the left. Already yells were sounding in the distance, the Urulan gathering for war, but I did not intend to give them the opportunity of mustering a proper resistance. Through halls and houses I strode, ears sharp, and caught my first ambusher. Atop one of those long halls, pressed closely against the roof. Laughing, I struck at the wall and tore through the stone. It rose, alarmed, and I leapt up.

Just a dzulu, I saw, eyes barely touched with silver. Disappointed, I snatched it by the neck before it could bring up its weapon and tossed it further down the avenue. It hit stone with a loud squelch, head pulped. I leapt back down, noting my forces were beginning to catch up. The first enemies had been too heavily outnumbered to put up a real fight. I took the lead, moving down the avenue. We hadn't even taken a fifth of the circle yet, but I found the resistance to have been too lukewarm. Someone had sent expendable to probe out strength while they prepared a response. My instincts proved right maybe sixty heartbeats later, when I found the length of the ring had been walled up. Thin walls of hide held by a framework of glue and stone, but they were decent makeshift fortifications to block off the streets and avenues. Atop the roofs drow with bows and javelins were awaiting, while the streets behind the hide blocks slowly filled with reinforcements. The first chokepoint to break, then. They'd made a kill zone at ground level – the hide panels were likely movable to let through their own warriors – so I'd go at it from a different angle.

I leapt back up on the nearest rooftop and broke into a run. Best to soften up this lot before my drow ran into them. Arrows and javelins streaked the air, which bothered me little – they were loud and slow and my body was mist whenever I wished. They might as well have been shooting at a ghost. I closed the distance and then streaks of Night began lashing out towards me, which was more dangerous. I suspected the mist trick would fail against sorcery, and this was as close as drow could get to magic. There were, by the looks of it, seven casters. I could take the hits and barrel through, most likely, but the knowledge that my body was exceedingly difficult to permanently damage nowadays had not whisked away Black's earliest lessons. Never take a blow unless you have to, much less if you do not know what it will do. A platform served as anchor for the push that sent me to crash into the house beneath which the archers and casters were standing. Momentum alone would not get me through that wall, even in plate, so instead I formed a spike of ice at an angle and caught it with my free hand. A spin had me leaping back upwards, the looks on the faces of the drow when I came of height with them most amusing. Another platform – just in time to avoid a second set of Night streaks – had me landing in a roll among them.

The dzulu, for that was what most of them were, scattered immediately. I didn't have the time to go through them one at a time, so I dipped into Winter and let loose a working. The rings of sharp ice spears formed around my abdomen, lingering for a moment before shooting out. Blood, screams and shredded flesh followed in their wake. I had to throw myself to the side when looked like a snake made of Night ran through where I'd been a heartbeat earlier, jaws snapping. Another two follow suit, keeping me dancing, and to my distaste a streak of Night clipped me on the shoulder as I landed in a roll. It went straight through the plate, though at an angle that meant it hit air instead of flesh after punching through. Seven casters, I found, the only ones not dead or running. The snakes were coming out of their bellies, coiling and releasing at their will, while the other four drow were shooting shorter bursts to keep me from closing distance. Irritating. If they were Mighty, which was likely, they weren't far up the ranks. I didn't have time to waste on these when the real threats were still on the loose.

I sidestepped another streak, ducked under a snake and exerted my will. The drow guiding the snake found its throat filled with ice and began clawing at its skin impotently. I caught another snake-charmer and one of the shooters before being forced to move again. Darting around a snake extended sharply like an arrow shot I ran forward, rolling under another streak of Night and responding with a collar of ice around the second drow's neck that tightened and immediately choked it. They'd needed the numbers to keep me busy, they realized too late as I carved through the throat of the last snake-charmer. The remaining two tried to make a run for it but I pursued, shaping my sword into a spear and tossing it in the first's back. The last survivor leapt down from the roof and I sighed. Its throat filled with ice a moment later and it dropped. The whole of it could not had taken more than seventy heartbeats, and now my own sigil was assaulting the barricades. I casually formed an anvil of ice and dropped it on the nearest hide wall to make an easy point of entry. I supposed I could clear out the dzulu a bit to make it easier on my warriors.

Then the roof under my feet turned into Night, and the Mighty of the Urulan Sigil entered the fray.

---

Solfadore

Dear readers,

Reminder that starting on Monday, we'll be hosting a PGTE Character Contest. All readers and most varieties of lesser footrests are welcome to vote!

– The bracket is out: <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805>. Follow the link to find out who will be facing whom.

We had to limit the field to 32 characters, so if your favourites didn't make it in, well... know that it could be worse. You could be a Lesser Lesser Footrest. (We don't let those vote. We have standards.)

– More info on the Guide's subreddit (r/PracticalGuidetoEvil) because I don't want to spam the chapter thread.

Watch out for a comment from EE on Monday for the link to the first match. Votes will remain open until the Wednesday chapter is uploaded, and so on.

Jane

You're pitting Akua against Killian D: ? You monsters!

Well, at least Killian's been out of focus for long enough that I guess it isn't a hard decision anymore...

d_o_l

I think it's kind of fitting that Cat's old girlfriend is up against her new girlfriend.

Jane

The logic makes sense, true, but it's also really the only first-round match that gives me any kind of pause 😊. Well, except Hanno/Hye, I guess, but for completely different reasons.

stevenneiman

Personally, I'm having trouble deciding for Malicia/Anaxares (impressive vs. funny and surreal), Aisha/Ratface (meh), and Juniper/Wekesa (substance vs. style). I'm probably siding with Hakram against Larat, but that one's a tough call. I also notice that the listed title is incorrect, as he resigned his principedom. I think the only title appropriate to him would be Larat of the Wild Hunt.

RoflCat

Technically the new potential girlfriend would be Vivi.

Akua is...the yandere stalker, whose plan previously was to brainwash Cath into her servitude to keep her forever. i.e. She's probably quite happy at the current situation, even if the position is reversed from her initial plan.

RanVor

You make Akua sound like an S&M enthusiast.

WuseMajor

Aren't all Praesi?

stevenneiman

Nah, Indrani is the potential new girlfriend. That's my chosen ship at least.

And Akua never really seemed to have romantic plans for Cat, just plans to control her. Though she definitely did win the philosophical battle with Cat even as she lost the practical one, since she was only defeated because Amadeus proved even more heartless, and for all Cat's moralizing Akua escaped justice by being useful.

Cheerless Mirth

Indrani would be the best but, apparently, she's got a thing for Masego, for whatever reason.

the verbiage ecstatic

But Aisha vs Ratface... harsh, man

RanVor

It kinda seems to be set up for the purpose of pitching Black against the Hierarch in the final round.

Jane

...Huh. That's odd, I would have sworn people would be predicting Klaus against Rafaela.

RanVor

I mean it looks like they're intentionally placed on different branches so they" have no chance to meet before the finals. They're expected to win.

RanVor

*they'll

Nordvegr

From where I'm standing, it looks like Robber and Hierarch. Just goes to show, we expect other people to think like us when we are all individuals.

Inb4 plot twist: Final winner gets killed. Tournament was real all along.

Agent J

I really don't see how that's possible. Anaxares' first opponent is Malicia, who's an absolutely delightful character in her own right. If he beats her he'd likely be up against Masego next. And let's be honest, Zeze is just adorable. Hells, even Indrani fell in love with him.

And even if he beats both Masego and Malicia, his next opponent would either be Sabah, Wandering Bard, or Akua Fucking Sahelian.

Our beloved Heirarch is up against some seriously stiff competition. While I do believe he'll make it to round too, it's a toss up if he'll get to the quarterfinals and extremely unlikely he'll make it pass them.

Sabah is still mourned for, Wandering Bard is the second best hero so far and unquestionably the most effective. Zeze needs to be chibified and made a plushie of (get on it Double-E!) And Akua is Bae.

RanVor

I would (and will) vote for Anaxares every time.

Agent J

Well, personally...

Akua is Bae. Robber is Best Girl. And William Did Nothing Wrong.

Everyone else will be voted for on a case-by-case basis.

Unfortunately, Akua is still reviled and mistrusted by many, Robber is a minor side character at best, and William is mostly forgotten by now. So it's unlikely my favourites will come out on top. No clue how Anaxares will fair as I've mostly just seen him as an interesting curiosity.

RanVor

Ah, but Anaxares is the representative of the Mighty Bellerophon, Peerless Jewel of Freedom! Anybody not voting on him is clearly a servant of some Wicked Foreign Despot!

RanVor

Also, he's the only character in the Guide who has successfully stood up to the Bard (Neshamah doesn't count, he's on the same level as her).

Rustndusty

Robber might have a chance at beating Black too. If this had happened earlier I'd actually give Robber better odds than Black, but he's had lamentably little content this book.

RanVor

I've never really understood the popularity of Robber. He's fun, but there's not much more to him. All things considered, he's just a glorified comic relief.

crysjal

He has his backstory in an interlude. It's a really interesting exposition on the goblins as a race and shows how Robber struggled to get where he is. It was pretty gritty and cements him in the "underdog" role. It also hints that he's named, or the Goblin equivalent.

RanVor

Yes, I know. He's a glorified comic relief with a gritty backstory.

Agent J

Oh, so you do understand the popularity of Robber. That's fantastic. Welcome, brother, to the Lesser Lesser Footrest Tribe. Meetings are on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. Snacks are by the corner.

RanVor

What? He's a fine character, but he has no role in the story beyond being a funny psycho. How can he be considered a better character than Black is honestly incomprehensible to me.

NerfGlastigUaine

So is this a popularity contest or a who-would-win-in-a-fight contest?

Agent J

Popularity contest. The inevitable results of the latter are rather self-evident.

NerfGlastigUaine

Dunno about that, The Dead King and The Bard seem to be in a similar weight class and if we're talking about pure martial strength than The Ranger cannot be discounted. Admittedly it'd mean only 2-3 individuals would contest for the top but it's hardly a done deal.

Fern

At first I thought "oh man, those two are so good! why would they be up against each other in the first round?!" before i realized that all the characters are good. sometimes i forget how fucking phenomenal the characterization is in this story.

trippdup

Top 4: Catherine, Black, Masego, Robber. Black on top in the end.

Death Knightt

Black wins. A thousand deaths to anyone who disagrees.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder how far behind the Dwarves are. Are they just watching this, ale in hand? Or are they slowly clearing empty caves, and building up forts, expecting Cat to fail?

Misterspokes

Yes.

Byzantine

They likely have a scouting party following her, with their main force continuing at a languid pace, making sure to mop up anything and everything Cat misses.

This way they keep aware of what she is doing, and their main force stays far enough back they won't unintentionally get caught up in a disaster if some kind of extreme working is used, like the lake-drop.

Byzantine

Ah, and the heavy hitters are likely waiting for Cat to engage the Mistress of Night, at which point they will ensure they are nearby – to take advantage of any damage Cat manages to deal if she fails. (Aka be there to finish off the wounded and probably exhausted enemy, rather than giving them a chance to recover.)

Drunken Dwarf

Depends if you mean the vanguard/scouts, the main army, or the Herald. Cause ya I expect the Herald is just watching the show.

Jane

I wonder if any who know the Secret of architecture still remains? Callow could use this kind of deep city construction, especially if they keep picking up strays like the Drow and the Goblins. They've got plenty of empty land, sure, but why not make Callowan cities something special?

...'Course, regardless of the techniques, it'd probably involve a lot of slave labor, which isn't something Callow's too keen on. But Cat would still have a lot of Nisi under oaths to her, so maybe she could make use of those instead.

...Assuming that it's even possible to build down like this while working with that much dirt instead of stone, and assuming it wouldn't take them so deep that the Dwarves would have words for them.

Look, it would just be cool, okay? Sure it might not be practical, but it's not like the name of this work is A Practical Guide to Evil or anything!

Dainpdf

Even if Cat for some reason used slave labor to save on costs, there would need to be a lot of money spent on materials. Plus time and money spent training the workers...

Jane

Based on the description, it sounded like the basics only really required tools (which would wear out extremely quickly, admittedly), as they primarily worked with the stone that was already present; the decorations and perhaps the bridges would require outside materials, but for the most part, it was a matter of taking stone away rather than putting stone in place. Of course, I could only think of a few sites in Callow where that could be remotely practical, so building a city like that in Callow would probably require some modifications.

Regarding skilled labor, they'd certainly require a lot of stonemasons, that's for certain. It would be quite the project.

Dainpdf

Well, I assumed you intended for such works to be done above ground, which would require a lot of materials to be obtained, starting by whatever specialized tools would be needed...

Someguy

The labour may involve slaves but the Architecture Techniques, Mathematics and other Secrets can simply be written down and studied. Not all education involves mind/soul rips.

Jane

While this is true, I was wondering more about the possibility that Drow civilization has degraded to the point where literally nobody knows how the cities were first made anymore; with the Dwarves marching to claim the place for themselves, it's not as though surfacers could send a team of archaeologists down there, and I don't know how much thought Cat has given to collecting what written works might remain.

Any Drow knowledge she walks away with is probably going to be locked in the minds of one of the Mighty she creates/recruits, I imagine.

Someguy

I mean Cat herself just mind/soul rip the Secrets from whomever has them and writes them down to pass on the knowledge instead of the nonsense called the Tenants of the Night.

IDKWhoitis

Well it has been established that the Goblins do still own tunnels that do not conflict with the Dwavian territory.

However the new worry is how to hollow out the earth that is supposed to be your foundation. Although Callowan cities dont have skyscrapers, undermining your own walls and buildings seems like a recipe for disaster. Unless you go deep enough, but then we return to the Dwarf probelm...

Jane

Ah, I had been thinking of the establishment of a new city altogether, such as in the mountains of the Vales, rather than expanding on a currently existing location.

Shequi

Or building a city where Liesse used to be?

Someguy

The Dwarves claim deep under bedrock I think so the Mountains should be fair game. Plus since the mountains are used by most countries as border markings instead of territory because as far as they know "no one lives there", being the first to plant the flag and claim it would net Cat a bigger chapter in Callowan history books since it would involve "expanding the territories of the Kingdom for settlers" instead of endless battles. Also, high ground to rain rocks on anyone trying to kick them out after doing the groundwork.

Fern

IIRC the goblin's were extended a deal where they were allowed to keep their tunnels as long as they didn't expand into dwarven territory; it was mentioned in the negotiations earlier, something bargain? I do recall it had to do with mercy on behalf of the dwarves, which if true frames their morality a bit better. Hardcore jingoism but no genocide unless you're a drow is basically all we've got so far.

Antoninjohn

With the way Cat and Callow hold their grudges I wonder if the Great Book of Grudges will pop up

Shoddi

Cause I've got a blank space, baby.

*click*

And I'll write your name.

Javvies

Ah, back to one of Cat's strong suites – murdering the crap out of an enemy army.

I wonder how long Cat's going to take in between taking the Sigils of Lotow.

Hmmm. I think the drow are going to be complicated to train up into an organized and disciplined force when Cat gets back to Callow.

Rook

Complicated? That's like calling the ocean slightly damp.

It's going to be an utter logistical nightmare is what it's looking to be. Trying to absorb the drow into any single existing surface nation is enough of a headache that even Hasenbach would likely be in tears; let alone Catherine "fuck it, let's wing it" Foundling.

An estimated twenty thousand drow in great lotow alone. One. City. What was the size of the – entire – army of callow again?

Even if she murders three quarters of the Everdark in the process, the leftovers alone will likely dwarf any single army she's ever lead in her life.

Its not just the numbers either. This is an undisciplined force with no common language or culture with anyone on the surface, and customs so treacherous that it makes Praes look downright civilized. One with shit for leadership structure and every elite soldier or officer-equivalent wielding murder magic on par with a minor fae noble. All of which needs to be immediately fed and housed. Where does the food come from? The management? The equipment? The gold?

If Catherine is even partially successful in her venture here, she needs to pull a magic solution out of her magic Fae ass before even attempting to bring this shitstorm to the surface. Otherwise it sure as hell is going to be Woe to everyone on every side within marching distance, and then some.

Javvies

It's hardly the biggest force she's ever had under her command, even if she got all 20k of them. Though, admittedly, individual for individual, 1 drow (if properly equipped) is likely to be worth a bunch of regular troops.

Equipping them is going to be a noticeable problem as well.

But more to the point about training, pretty much all of Cat's people with applicable skillsets/experience have an entirely different paradigm for training troops up. It's not like regular Legion-style training is going to work the same, or that it would even be an effective use of the drow. And the closest thing she has to people with something like the right experience are the relatively few people responsible for training members of the Watch. Unless one or more of the Fae who joined the Wild Hunt in her service have experience at training troops, which seems unlikely.

Rook

There's an estimated 20k in just great lotow. One city in the Everdark, not the entire Everdark. Not even counting the thousands outside of the cities. The largest army she ever fielded was the army of callow which was under thirty thousand even before bleeding itself against the Crusade.

If the entire kingdom of the drow has even one more city, which we know it does, that already puts the estimated total at nearly double anything she's ever handled before. That's assuming the remnants of an entire ancient empire are limited to two cities, which is unlikely at best.

Training them even if you could handle the numbers is entirely different from training Callowan farmers who share the exact same culture and language as you to swing a sword. It's another thing entirely to try training a different race so alien to yours that they find your common sense utterly incomprehensible to begin with.

Especially if not a single person that would be training them can actually speak their language, unless the monarch is going to personally train several thousands of drow.

She doesn't call the drow 'it' because she can't tell the difference between male or female. She calls them 'it' because they're not just dark skinned mean people, they're fundamentally different from anything above ground in every practical sense. It took her several days with Akua's help to even begin to comprehend the basics of their social structure.

Even ignoring all those problems, she's currently the ruler of a country trying to rebuild after getting burned down twice in a few decades, with not enough hands to work the fields, one major city completely gutted, major leadership completely gutted, and a treasury so empty that its a viable option for Praes to attack them by devaluing their currency, because there's that much Praesi gold that can't be taken off the streets.

So, with a country so in shambles that a Named sidekick specializing in administration that doesn't sleep is already on the verge of breaking down, where do you get the manpower or resources to train an alien race that'll likely significantly outnumber your existing standard army (which you can barely handle right now as is)?

werafdsaew

I think the problem is smaller than you think. The nisi would not be doing any fighting, and they're the bulk of the people. The people doing the fighting have some Nights in them, which gives them combat knowledge.

Micke

It gives them individual combat power. In a battle discipline, coordination, and being able to manoeuvre in formation are each an order of magnitude more important – and neither is worth anything without a structure for crafting, distributing, and executing orders. The Mightiest of the Drow could be useful against Named champions; the mid-levels would be useful skirmishers and raiders if they could be taught to distinguish between enemies, allies, and civilians; the lessers would, at best, be equal to peasant levies – far better to use them for building a support structure.

Logistics and camp hygiene, in turn, are each an order of magnitude more important than being able to win individual battles; campaigns are won on the march. I've no idea if Drow can become ill, but far more campaigning soldiers have succumbed to disease, malnutrition, and harsh weather than to the enemy.

Of course, this is in the real world, not in a storybook where one might gain an advantage by sending one's elites to certain death to obtain some underdog power in the rematch.

RanVor

You somehow missed the fact that Cat calls the Drow "it" because they call themselves "it". Otherwise I agree.

Anonymouse

If she manages to secretly get the Sve of Night on her side it would be hell of a lot easier.

ALazyMonster

You say complicated but I feel like it could be fixed with "Ok you murderous twits, listen to everything Marshal Juniper tells you" and one month later the Hellhound has made the Drow legion. Yes, I'm over simplifying but I feel like sending them through her boot camp would sort them out quick considering that Archer and Masego both buckle under her glare as shown in that conference before they went to Keter.

Fern

As long as the majority are nisi and the oaths hold, i don't see much of a problem in force organization and logistics. The real problem is going to come from the stronger might trying to rules-lawyer their way thru the oaths, which could cause Cat a fair few headaches in the future.

Dainpdf

Felt a bit like filler... I guess it's nice to see the Drow really were all that, before devolving into their current state, and good on Cat for finding that brawl she'd been waiting for.

sengachi

Just a comment about the throwaway line about the Meizan occupation. I really love how this story doesn't have an empire based on the Romans, but an old, old historical empire based on the Romans. It's a nice little subversion on the trope of "ever epic war fantasy has a Roman Empire" and you do some cool stuff with it.

Rook

I thought Praes was the Roman Empire though? I mean, looking at the birth of the Roman Empire you get:

A nation embroiled in civil war with repeat assassinations of the leader until an indisputable dictator finally comes out on top, birthing a new empire and ushering in an age of unprecedented stability.

Which then proceeds to immediately invade and conquer Callo-er, Britannia. A nearby land that was already prone to being targeted by its neighbors in the past.

Using a professional standing army called the *Legions*. Which derived most of its superiority from being well-equipped, highly disciplined, and extremely organized. Even the title of legate was something the first emperor of Rome formalized as a designation for an officer in charge of a Legion.

Allafterme

Praes is what would happen if Rome took Eastern Mediterranean instead of Africa first, somewhat assimilate it... only to be bitch slapped back to Italia by Carthage in the middle of the process

nick012000

What I find interesting is that the Drow seem to have the highest density of Named-equivlanents among any of the mortal races of Calernia among them. Even by this early point in her conquest of them, Cat's already accumulated nearly two dozen of them.

GabrielTosh

I think you overestimate the Mighty Cat has. They are probably closer to the weakest fey at this point or skilled Knights with some magic since they are of the lowest tier. The only one I consider on par with a Named is Silent Steps since he has both a title and probably the most night out of Cat's force. I will agree that the Drow appear to have a lot of extremely powerful individuals but Named are just about always a cut above any mortal, simply because of narrative weight. The drow probably only have 1 named and that is their high priestess that has given them the Night.

jonnney

Well all of the Elves are named equivalent simply due to their age, but I guess they might not count as one of the mortal races.

RanVor

Then what are Named Elves equivalent of?

Drunken Dwarf

They might all be "Named" or at least given a similar power at birth. Problem is it takes them ages to gain power and solidify it, like the Spellblade.

Sylwoos

Not sure all mighty could be considered named. No story weight and a few night tricks would just put them on par with Praesi mage.

MetruX

In a sense, any of them are individually stronger than any mage, praesi or otherwise, with rare exceptions of people who could go for a Name. But they can't unite their powers into truly great workings, and most of them have different powers. Powers, not tricks, that's where the difference derives from. Most of them are incredible combatants, and the powers of the Night allow them to fight better, or in a way different from how they could before, so if you look at it carefully most of them CAN'T be considered special units like mages, they are more alike elite soldiers.

But I agree they can't be considered Named, even though they are nothing alike mages.

Not a robot

...I have to build this city in Dwarf Fortress. I just cannot not do that. Brb gimme two weeks

sengachi

Would you mind using one of those 3d dwarf fortress modeling programs and showing it to us when you're done, if you can? I'd love to see how it comes out.

Shequi

At least the Drow don't use Magma.

---

Chapter 65: Impact

"'lo and behold, I have brought peace to the Empire."

– Dread Empress Massacre, after ordering the Burning of Okoro

Three things happened in swift succession.

The first was that I formed a handhold of ice to hoist myself up. I wasn't sure what would happen if I stayed standing in the middle of a blanket of Night, but it was unlikely to be pleasant. The second was that, even as my fingers closed around the handhold, it began vibrating and exploded with a scream. The third thing, unfortunately, was that I fell back into that same blanket of Night spread over the roof. Feet first, which turned out to be a stroke of luck. The moment they made contact with the Night they... dissolved, like they'd been dropped in acid. I dimmed my mind, turning into mist, and slithered away towards the edge of the roof. It was difficult to think, in that state, and my situational awareness was shit – as was made clear by the fact that I neither saw nor heard coming the spear of Night that caught me in the side. Or as close to a side as I could have, while made of mist. The second unpleasant surprise of the day – night? – unfolded as the spear forced me back into solid form where it struck and sent my human-like silhouette to go tumbling over the side. Into a pack of dzulu, though that didn't prove to be much of a problem.

Night spread over the street with a soft whisper and they dissolved screaming even as I fell.

I formed a spike of ice jutting out of a house's sidewall and landed on it for exactly a heartbeat before it broke with a scream, but it'd been enough to allow me to situate myself. A pair of translucent blue wings ripped out of my back and I flew upwards, finally getting a look at the drow that'd ambushed me. There were three, all holding so much Night within their thin frames they darkened their surroundings just by being there: the air around them looked like near-invisible wisps of smoke was spreading through it. The two on the sides looked like they could have been twins, their deep grey skin and whip-like faces identical save for the crescent scars they had on opposite cheeks. Their eyes were pure silver, save for the black pupils. Long curved blades in hand, they watched me rise with identical bored expressions. If those two were strong, holding enough Night to fill a pond, then the drow between them was a lake. Taller than either of them, its faces was covered with thick burned flesh in a horrid mask that denied even the appearance of lips. There was no trace of anything but silver in its eyes, the pupils merely a darker shade of it.

"Urulan?" I called out.

"Cattle," it mildly replied in Crepuscular.

Well, that took care of the introductions. I'd go out on a limb and say the flankers were rylleh, because with that much power they could hardly be anything else. Mighty Urulan wielded a long staff of glass, and without bothered with any more banter pointed it at me. Droplets of Night formed around me in a ring-like pattern, rippling with power, and I definitely wasn't sticking around to find out what that did. I'd already noticed that the flesh dissolved by the earlier blanket had taken longer than usual to reform after I'd returned to physical form, and that'd been the opening volley. It could be it'd opened with its strongest trick, true. But when had I ever been that lucky? The wings folded against my back and I dropped like a stone, which didn't help nearly as much as I'd wished. The Night droplets rippled, and every single one of them lanced out with a beam of the same stuff downwards. The firing angle had been well-judged: I'd be falling right into the thickest knot of beams if I didn't act. My wings spread again, but I held back a curse when they both began vibrating and broke a heartbeat later. Neither the rylleh had moved, but their silver eyes shone brighter. Time to improvise, then. Mist-form wasn't getting me out of this, so the time for delicate works was over.

I formed a large cube of ice under me, feeling Winter's influence begin to creep and promptly shunting it off, and even as the beams of Night tore into the frost I parted it around my falling form to go straight through. A whisper came to my ears, the sound of another Night blanket forming below me, and the cube began to vibrate. Distraction first, I thought. I ripped out a chunk of ice from the bottom of the cube with an exertion will, transmuted it into mist and sent it slithering to the left. The ice ceased vibrating a pair of Night spears shot out, and there was my opening. I fell under the itself-falling cube as the beams of Night shot through it, muscles tightening as I caught it with a grunt and tossed the entire thing at the drow. I couldn't spare the time to look if I'd made impact, instead forming wings again and plunging into a somewhat-controlled descent that had me landing in front of the three drow. And, most importantly, away from the Night blanket. They'd already shown me it did not discriminate in its effect, they shouldn't be able to use it when I closed distance.

By the time my bare feet hit the ground – my boots were sadly gone for the foreseeable future, again – all that was left of the ice I'd thrown was a rain of mist and shards. I'd not even seen how they'd gotten rid of it. With me in the open, the earlier distraction had come to an end: all three drow had their eyes on me. The rylleh first, I thought. Urulan would be less dangerous without the backup. I darted towards the left one, body centre low, and made it three feet forward before they unleashed their arsenal. Darkness fell like a curtain, robbing me of my sight, but my ears still worked just fine. It was the only reason I heard the low whistling sound of Night on the move, dropping to the floor and feeling something scythe just above my body. I rolled forward just in time to avoid the spike of Night that came down in the other working's wake, letting out a sharp breath. If they'd timed that just a little better, I would have taken it right in the spine. Another step saw me coming out of the curtain of darkness, which was no comfort as I saw my foes for only a heartbeat before a whisper sounded and a globe of Night began forming around me.

If that was the acid trick again...

I realized, dimly, that if this went through entirely I might actually die. I'd treated the Everdark like a training exercise, sometimes almost a game, but I'd been swimming in the shallows of this sea. There were monsters in the deeps that would make these look like imps. I close my eyes and let Winter loose. Frost formed all over my body, rapidly thickening and then shooting out. They had a globe of Night, I had a globe of ice. In a pissing contest of raw power, I'd bet on me every time. The Night ate into the ice but I kept pouring out Winter, its delighted laughter sounding softly in my ears. At first it devoured quicker than I made, but I dug in my heels and truly let loose. It became even, and I felt my blood turn cold as I dug even deeper. Like skin bursting for being filled too much, the globe of Night came apart under the pressure of the ice and I launched out through the opening I'd made. For a moment I hung in the air, seeing two curved swords rising to point at me and Urulan itself leisurely leaning on its staff. I shaped an ice javelin and threw it at the sigil-holder, just quick enough to loose it before shackles of Night formed around my wrists and ankles. I turned to mist, or at least tried to. The Night shackles thickened and nothing happened. Urulan gently tapped its staff against the ground and the javelin shattered into mist, the rylleh moving as it did.

Their stances were perfect, muscles coiling as they simultaneously thrust their blades into my sides. They went through the plate, bit into flesh, and then I felt my organs began to vibrate. I grit my teeth and hardened my insides, but that actually made it worse: it was like a sharper full of metal scraps went off in there. Everything was shredded, and chunks of my ribs and flesh splattered the floor as they withdrew their swords. Urulan pointed its staff at me, and tissue already knitting itself back together stopped. Stupid, I thought. Stupid, stupid. I'd already known there were drow who could heal themselves like I did, but I'd never entered my mind that the Mighty could have tricks that would inhibit my own ability. They just needed to keep taking me apart, and sooner or later they'd get me into a state I wouldn't walk away from.

Then an arrow went through my left wrist, breaking the shackle holding it on the way, and I promised myself I was going to kiss Indrani next time I saw her.

"My turn," I growled.

My mangled wrist flicked, forming a blade of ice, and I carved through my other shackled wrist before offering my ankles the same courtesy. The rylleh wreathed their blades with Night and stabbed into my open torso, pinning me down with what felt like a similar trick, but they really should have gone for the arms. I caught the flat of one sword and ice crept up it, shattering three fingers before the rylleh dropped it and retreated. There was a whisper and another globe of Night began forming around me, which given my current lack of feet was something of an issue. So I took care of it, forming feet out of ice and throwing myself out of the jaws of death. The second rylleh was not so lucky, and died screaming as it dissolved inside. I picked its blade out of my ribs, dropping it down, and finally my torso began putting itself back together. I stomped down and mist billowed out, covering all three of us, though not before I noticed the rylleh who'd lost fingers had already regrown them. Still, I'd learned another weakness to the Night-acid trick. When it began forming, it could not be stopped. Urulan would not have lost one of its lieutenants otherwise.

I shed off the last of my ice-forged feet and padded softly on the stone, feeling the drow through their warmth where my eyes found no purchase. The sigil-holder had only barely moved – it'd retreated a bit, nothing more – but the rylleh was circling around me. Could they sense Winter, as I could sense the Night? The powers were not so different. No, I decided. They would already have struck otherwise. Their senses might be sharper than those of other drow, though, so I'd have to be careful. I'd begin with Urulan's last helper. I crept forward quietly, circling it as it believed it was circling me, and only struck when facing its back. I could use mist, I had learned, if it was of my own making. It was just another facet of my mantle. And so I condensed it into ice over the rylleh's body, spooking it enough it dropped down into a puddle of shadow – and that was when I struck. A spear of ice forced it back into drow-form, and by then I was upon it. That transient moment where it stopped being shadow and started being a drow again? They were nearly blind during that, having to reorient all their senses. I didn't give it the time: my blade went through its throat, severed the spine, and I ripped off the head afterwards just to make sure it wouldn't heal. Amusingly enough, it did. Both separate parts closed up with fresh skin, though it remained quite dead.

Urulan spoke a single word in Crepuscular, and just like that I was back in the deep end.

I'd wondered why it was being so prudent, after being so aggressive since the start. Because it was preparing a major working, as it turned out. The mist had robbed my enemies of their sight, but it had also given the drow materials to work with – something I only realized was a very bad idea when my own mist began burning at my flesh. It'd turned the whole fucking thing into acid, hadn't it? My eyes were the first thing to go, but I could feel the mist eating at me all over. Worst, I couldn't just reform my way through it: the Night slowed that down, and the acid was eating at me quicker than I healed. This was worse than fighting Praesi mages, I thought. Those might be able to make wards, but they weren't nearly this quick or vicious. Considering Urulan had likely been at this for centuries it only made sense, but that absent-minded consideration did nothing to help me out of my current predicament. Hardening my flesh, which was difficult when not contained to smaller body parts, did little to stop the problem. Slowed it some, but not enough to turn the tide. Gritting my teeth, I turned into mist myself but was forced back into human-form not even a heartbeat later. With fresh acid burns all over to show for it.

Fuck. Right, if I couldn't flee it then I had to move it. I'd lost all of my plate by now, which was infuriating but not as much as the fact that most my face muscles were bare and falling apart. I was melting like snow in summer sun. I formed of ice a large windmill and set it to spinning, which drew back the mist closest to me and bought me a moment until Urulan clapped down its staff and broke it without a word. Still, thinned was good enough for what I'd intended. Wings ripped out of my back for the third time today and I rose out of the mist. The problem, now, was that I was literally flying blind with someone waiting to take a shot at me. I couldn't just keep rising, that'd be painting a target on my back, so I zig-zagged erratically as my face slowly grew back. Even if I got hit, I thought, by the time I got back on my feet I'd be ready to fight again. Unfortunately, Urulan agreed. The sound of mist billowing forward came to my ears, and I realized it was pursuing me with the cloud. All right, desperate measures then. I flipped directions and went crashing straight towards the ground, hoping to... ah, there it was, a rooftop. My blood and flesh made a mess on the tiles, but I punched my way through and landed in a sprawl below.

Screams, people running away. Nisi? They hadn't tried to fight anyway. I wildly sprayed ice where I'd crashed through and crouched close to the floor. I just needed to wait this out, I thought, though every passing moment where the mist hadn't caught up was ratcheting up the tension in my frame. My eyes finally formed again, and I let out a relieved sigh. I'd made it. Through the ice-patched hole in the roof I could see the acid mist was surrounding the building, which was my first warning sign. Urulan wouldn't have bothered unless it intended to flush me out. Night flared above me, a beacon to my eldritch senses, and I cursed under my breath. It wasn't just going to flush me out, it was going to shattered the damned thing and drown me in acid again. I wouldn't be able to dodge that. I had to convince it to strike elsewhere instead. I wove glamour, two separate workings. I sent an image of myself through the ice, wreathed in a blue halo that would serve as cheap explanation why she wasn't melting. Too cheap, too obvious. A look to the side revealed there was an open door to my left, with five corpses where the nisi had tried to flee and been caught by the mist instead. Through there I sent another illusion of me, this one discreet and melding with the shadows. Almost invisible. She ran for the other on the other side of the street.

It evaporated a moment after she entered in a burst of Night that shook the entire Crossroads and collapsed the wall of the house I was really in.

The glamour had been dispersed by the hit, and I dispersed the one above as well. Crouching low behind loose stones, I wove one last glamour: my own skeleton, slowly growing back its flesh. Spikes of Night fell down around it in a circle and there was a swell of power. Biting my lip, I slowed the regeneration to a crawl in the glamour. I wasn't sure if that had been what the trick was intended for, but I'd have to guess. Urulan approached slowly, its glass staff pointed at my fake body and quietly I formed a sword. I waited until it was standing over my illusion, staff raised, before I attacked. Had it been its senses or a discrepancy in effect that tipped it off? I might never know, but when I was a mere ten feet away the sigil-holder turned and cast a silvery gaze towards me. We were done with the posturing, and so I struck. Step forward, feint low to the left and then a spin – its staff my sword and I smiled. It went away quickly, when the staff did not break and its arm did not lower. I was, I could feel, slightly stronger. But not enough to hammer it back, and then the staff rippled. My sword blew up, shredding a few fingers with it, and the tip of the staff hit me in the stomach.

I rocked back and it struck upwards smoothly, breaking my chin before whipping back down and going for a thrust into my throat. I spun on myself, feeling the staff pass a hair's breadth from my neck, and formed another blade to swing at its extended shoulder. It spun with me, as if the two of us were dancing, and fluidly stepped away when my strike at reached the apex of its arc. The tip of the staff lightly touched the sword, and just like that it fucking blew up again. The fingers I'd just bloody grew back were shredded again, to my mounting irritation. I made a third blade along with what was clearly more than my third set of fingers of the fight. Irritating as this was, it was likely better than what would happen if Urulan pulled the same trick on my actual body. The drow spoke something in a language other than Crepuscular, sounding amused, but I didn't recognize the language. It sounded close to Reitz, but the vowels were even more of a debacle. Some older form, maybe? Some Secrets floating around the Night were much older than the current Calernia. Most of them, actually.

"Didn't catch that," I said, and attacked.

I didn't start with a feint, this time. It was clearly a better fighter than I was, the only way I'd win was by cheating. I angled my sword for its throat and swung with brute force and speed. It withdrew just out of reach, bending backwards, and then bent forward. One hand came off the staff to tap my side and I had to bite back the scream. It'd found a vein, and was pouring the Night-acid in it. I did the only reasonable thing, and froze my own blood so stop it from spreading. It caught the wrist of my sword hand and forced it to continue the arc as it drew back the staff to better bring it down.

"Mistake," I calmly said.

I turned the wrist it held to mist, and wrenched it out. The wisp of wrist moved under my will, slithering up its nostril and sinking into the brains behind them. All it took after that was a twist of will, and I shredded what lay inside its skull. Mighty Urulan dropped the ground, and I stood panting. I'd didn't bother recover the flesh I'd turned into mist, making another hand instead. Didn't want the old one back, after where it'd been. My flank still felt like it'd been lit on fire, but I carved out the infection and breathed a sigh of relief. It was only then, covered in blood both my own and that of my enemies, that I realized I'd been naked ever since the acid mist trick. I'd just been too angry to notice, and it wasn't like I felt the cold anyways. I looked down at the drow's corpse and shrugged. Might as well steal its clothes before I cut its head off, then.

Throwing Mighty Urulan's severed head in the middle of its own warriors ought to have a slight effect on enemy morale.

---

Lucas

Great chapter.
Haven't read it yet but I trust it's awesome.
Have a good night everyone 😊

Ahoy Matey!

TL;DR Cute teen goes naked in public and takes a pounding from three black man.

taborask

I wish I could like that twice

Kirook

Catherine is twenty now, actually.

kelioez

Im feeling proud that this is the most liked comment as of this this chapter, I'm so proud of this community and of humanity.

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
Go vote!

Javvies

Throwing the head of your defeated enemies before you to unsettle the ones still fighting. Good job.

Overconfidence will screw you every time. Just as well you got reminded of that before anything too terrible or permanent happened. Again.

Stealing the clothes of the Mighty?

Did you forget that you are short and they weren't, Cat? It isn't going to fit properly.

But, good job on the murderhoboing.

You aren't murderhoboing right if you aren't wearing stuff looted from dead enemies.

Dainpdf

She could theoretically just make clothes out of winter. Heck, couldn't she make herself taller? It worked with Ubua, ought to work with her. And then she'll be even closer to apotheosis.
Mwahahahaha

Anonymouse

Name shenanigans will prevent that

Yotz

Or allow. Self-image of the Named one postulates the physical form. If Cat would be able to shift her self-perception to see herself as a slightly taller person, she will grow. Doubly for the Fae stuff, for it is a concept first and a matter – second.

Problem lies in the peculiarities of flesh – you kinda grow in in the body you were born with, and your psyche usually molds in accordance with it, not other way around.

Dainpdf

Not necessarily. Both the Dead King and the Intercessor are, as he once said, “more essence than form” (or something to that effect). Name shenanigans only keep your appearance fixed if how you perceive yourself includes your appearance.

John

Clothes formed out of winter would probably mean drawing more power, meaning more principle alienation. Battle’s not over yet, makes sense to avoid wasting resources on vanity when possible.

Yotz

If they would be akin to active camo or streith, yes – but if Winter would be used only to create a sheet of flexible ice that can exist without further power infusing, then alienation would be of not issue. Presumably.

Hoarfrost body-paint, as a less reality-breaking clothes – something akin to skin-suit, maybe even with a touch of artistry in form of microprisms to form a rainbows in key areas instead of a palatine or a cloak.

Imagination is the only limit in this case.

Yotz

*”stole”. Not “palatine”.

Dainpdf

They would probably draw way less than a whole body – by that token, Cat should also make her body smaller to save power.

Snowfire1224

I don't know. I think occasionally joking about how short she is so part of the story that it's not going to happen

Dainpdf

I guess. She could still outgrow it, though.

Sethur

What was the official motto of the Fifteenth again? "Kill them! Take their stuff!" Or was that just the goblins?

Rup

....stab the kidney..loot the corpse....some goblinspeak

tithin

This was an incredibly brutal chapter in a lot of respects.

... please tell us what happened to Black.

ahd

Bet you five quatloos that's gotten skipped over and we'll never see the scene.

tithin

No deal!

We may not see the scene, I just want to know if he survived

ahd

His protege would know if her mentor were dead. <sup>TM</sup>

JJR

I'll take that bet. And then as is customary reveal the details of my evil plan. For you see the term used was that we "never" see the scene, in order to determine that this has come to pass we would have to wait forever! Even the author telling us that they were definitely not going to write the scene is not enough to resolve the bet as they may change their mind about such a decision in the future and write it anyway. So the only two outcomes are that we do see the scene in which case I win, or we don't see the scene in which case you don't win as we have to wait some more time to determine whether or not the scene is just coming later.

I literally can't lose!

And writing that makes me feel like I'm channeling Dread Emperor Irritant, The oddly Successful.

FactualInsanity

Irritant always seemed to me like accidentally successful more than anything. This is clearly premeditated. In fact, it strikes me as only a single reveal away from a Traitorous plan. Are you perchance also ahd?

Sylwoos

Like we never saw Captain last moment. Wouldn't be surprise if all calamity have the same treatment...

Dainpdf

I just want to see the plot moving again. Last real plot event was swearing in the drow, and before that meeting the dwarves.

JJR

So the Mighty did not realize how Cat's Winter tricks would let her slip from his grasp, and he got a brain full of hand to show for it.

Truly, it was a terrible mist ache on his part.

taliesinskye

*sigh*

Take the damned like and go home to think about what you've done.

FactualInsanity

Booooooooooooo! Booooooooooooo!
You should be ashamed of yourself!
I'd upvote if I had an account, but booooooooooooooooooooooooooooo!

Wry Warudo

Oh no, it's the Pundering Bard

SilentWatcher

As for Winter tricks, will Cat also turn into Liquid? We already got the Solid and Mist trick. Would be great against that vibration attack of the drow and/ or for impossibly flexibel moves.

Novice

Gotta admit, Cat with that Black impression right before the finishing blow was badass.

Dainpdf

Black was cooler. He only said "mistake" in his mind. Also, I wonder why Cat took so long to do the "breathe the mist in" trick? She had them in the mist in the middle of the fight. Not like this specific moment opened her enemy to it somehow. Unless I'm missing something.

Hellspirit

Yeah, the time it takes to say "mistake" would undoubtedly be the opening for a heroic asspull.

Novice

Of course Black was cooler. It's the mfing Carrion Lord. I just like this because of the whole 'like father, like daughter' thing ya know?

Rook

This is Catherine Foundling. Taking hideous injuries before beating a boss is basically her trademark.

I mean what kind of self-respecting warlord ends a fight without at least getting naked and covered head to toe in blood? Let's be reasonable here.

Metrux

Don't forget the scars to show to all your concubines.

Metalshop

Holy shit that was amazing. And Urulun is supposed to be on the weak end of the spectrum. Cat's back in the underdog slot of the title card again.

Gunslinger

She's fighting without using her domain though. That's a secret she'd be saving for later, but there might very well be some Night secret that dissolved domains for all we know

Quite Possibly A Cat

I really, really hope that with one part of a body, you can't collect Night from all of it.

IDKWhoitis

Night seems to reside within an extra organ (it looks like a grey heart).

Dainpdf

Cool. A pity she couldn't take the time to learn some of these Night tricks. I bet the acid mist would be great against all sorts of enemies, and would regeneration inhibitors. Priestbane, anyone?

Someguy

The acid trick would work better with her Fall/Moonless Night Domain than Winter I think. The vibration damage-disruption and droplet shooty trick would work very well with Winter.

Dainpdf

She can still do Fall, to some extent. She's just not done it offensively in a while. Last time was against the Thief of Stars back in Keter.

Anonymouse

That would make it so the Sve of Night could use it against her

Dainpdf

I assume the Sve can already use all these tricks against her. It's her domain, after all. She can probably use every Trick and Secret.

Swishy Sword

For whatever reason, I'm starting to feel like the Guide would make a good setting for a DMC-style game.

Jane

I hummed a few tunes from Bayonetta in my head as she dodged through the spears of Night to fly at her foe.

Though if they keep it up with these full-screen attacks, something out of Touhou might become more appropriate soon...

nick012000

Rules of Nature goes with everything. 😊

Faiir

Every time, EVERY TIME
I read that as
Detroit Metal City

Gunslinger

That's pretty fitting too considering Cat's speciality in killing everyone.

limwanya

So this guy is one of the weaker mightys in the city?

JJR

If I'm understanding the situation correctly, he's not even one of the Mightys of the city any more. I think these Drow were the ones that lost their foothold in the city and got pushed outside. If I'm reading the last chapter correctly this one was literally too weak to stay. So, yeah, weaker than the ones down in the city.

MetruX

Uhh... No. The guy at this spot is the weakest IN the city, he has a territory that allows passage for most of the other mightys territories. The problem with this spot, and why people don't want it, is two: it has few resources, and it is the entry point for any other Mighty coming from outside, so he was attacked frequently. Though he is still a Mighty from the city, and was even from an inner part until some time ago, when he got pushed back to this spot.

Jane

Hm. You know, with tricks like the "Turn the ground into a pool of acid", maybe the proper Drow could have handled the Dwarven invaders more effectively than the dregs they crushed made it seem. While the logic of the story did make it seem like they were doomed, they only had to deal with a small expeditionary force (relative to what the Dwarves would be able to muster without the Gloom), and it wouldn't take that many ugly surprises to deplete their numbers to the point where they couldn't hope to succeed.

Of course, the fact that the Dwarves were prepared to spend a very long time here does suggest that they weren't going to rush in the way Cat did, making it much less likely that they'd be caught by a power like this...

Oh, c'mon Cat, you don't know where those have been! Just make your own clothing out of Winter. Ice Armour is tres chic.

*taliesinskye*

Ice armor may be convenient and fashionable, but it's also transparent, and I think the only thing Cat really gets out of clothing is modesty anyway.

Jane

It can be frosted. And frosted ice armor is all the rage with Evil Winter Queens at the moment! She might as well look the part, since that literally is one of the things she is now.

Someguy

Just let it go.

Jane

...Cat, Disney Princess. No wonder everyone says she's aligned with the Gods Below.

Raved Thrad

You know you've reached the pinnacle of Evil when Disney's bought your franchise.

JN

More importantly, she just found out that her opponents can shatter her ice at will.

FactualInsanity

The Dwarves are also not squeamish about essentially carpet bombing any fortified position ahead of marching their infantry into Night range. An organized and united Everdark could probably fight them on a more or less equal footing. A few Mighty? Not a chance.

Jane

While this is true, it strikes me as similar in ways to when Cat dropped a lake on her foes – just using that for a few seconds nearly broke the Crusaders on its own, despite dozens of Named and a far larger force. The Dwarves can overwhelm the Drow in anything remotely approaching a fair fight, but a few figures like these would still be able to inflict devastating losses if they were able to find an opportunity to act.

The Drow are crippled by their inability to ally with each other despite the dire need, true, but the Dwarves aren't getting any reinforcements – any losses they take clearing out a Sigil won't be replaced. It shouldn't take more than a few nasty losses to a Mighty whose trick they couldn't protect themselves against for their numbers to fall to a less dangerous level.

'course, it doesn't look like they could capitalize on that win. Even if they have army-killing tricks, unlike at the Battle of the Camps, they don't really have the lower-level soldiers necessary to follow through afterwards. They can't drop a pool of acid on everyone, probably.

FactualInsanity

There are some key differences though.

First, there's the issue of morale. The Crusaders were close to breaking, because breaking simply means, running back home. The Dwarves are stuck. There's no getting past the Gloom without Drow obsidian shards, or the magic lamps and it's unlikely either of those are present in enough numbers/easily obtainable for the common soldiery.

Second, unlike the lake trick which was done from accross the battlefield, every use of night so far seen has been within relatively close quarters. If Urulan could sling the acid-Night from halfway accross the city, he wouldn't even need to be where Cat could see him and strike back. (Unless it's a cultural hangup about being seen dominating foes and/or things like line of sight requirements, but those work out to "unable to strike from range" anyway.) If the Drow could approach the dwarven army safely, that wouldn't matter, but so far their shadow form has not been seen making them invincible. Any damage (like say, from an exploding projectile) just shunts them into their corporeal form, where they're vulnerable to further damage (like say, from further exploding projectiles).

Third, while saying "These are all the tricks the Drow have." is clearly wrong, it is equally wrong to assume thesame thing about the Dwarves. They clearly have strong magic. They've been preparing for decades if not centuries. And even before that Drow have considered them something you survive, not something you fight.

I think a Winter/Summer comparison is apt here. Drow are dangerous predators and hunters, sure. But so are Winter and they still always lose to Summer in matters of war.

Jane

While the Dwarves do have a considerable range advantage, we also have to consider the terrain – with everything taking place underground, there are many places where that would be less decisive than it was in their first encounter. The trick used in this fight, at least, seemed able to operate at least at a moderate range, which would be enough to neutralize their siege weapons. Of course, if things close to actual melee range, only the stronger Drow have any hope against them, so the terrain doesn't favor them too much.

The Dwarves do have a terrifying reputation, true, but we also have to consider that it was the dregs of their society speaking – no Mighty would be interested in going to the outer edges of Drow society to pick a fight with Dwarves who will leave on their own, especially not when that means coming back to find someone else stole your territory from you.

We also have to consider that the Dwarves seem to be a proper army, rather than a rabble of warriors – this is usually an advantage, but it does mean that they are likely more specialized. If they lose too many of their heavy soldiers, or their engineers, it could represent a much more significant loss of capability than the loss of any given non-Mighty Drow.

As it stands, I'm pretty sure the Dwarves could do a lot of destruction, but I'm not as certain that they could actually reach the Priestess with enough soldiers left alive to kill her. Setting aside the question of what unmentioned tricks they have of their own, of course. ... Speaking of which, now I wonder if they have some kind of Goddess Trap they were saving for her, but will instead end up using on Cat when their friendly-ish relationship breaks down.

FactualInsanity

Time, patience and the willingness to collapse entire sections of the underground, if the cost in lives is prohibitive?

But that would make me so sad, if it happens. I like the Dwarves (I like dwarves in general, though appeal varies with portrayal) and unlike virtually everyone else, they have zero interest in being anything but straight with Cat. Plus, I'm really eager for her to start making headway in the political diplomacy department.

taliesinskye

The dwarves have enough magic lamps for everyone, that's how they got in and the lamps haven't gone anywhere.

FactualInsanity

They got in in organized groups. Not the same as a broken force routing.

MetruX

The lamps are temporary, you should read it again.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I think that if a Mighty starts slicing through the Dwarves it won't need lower level soldiers to follow up. If the dwarves break they stop being a real threat and start being food for the more powerful mighty. Plus if the dwarves can't defend the Drow corpses they kill any Drow essentially undo their victories. Or even worse, you can end up with a situation where one of the Mighty starts snowballing and eating through the entire dwarven force.

It is entirely possible that the dwarves have simply badly miscalculated. As far as we know the dwarves have only penetrated the edges of the Gloom before this raid. They have almost certainly never had to deal with one of the more powerful Drow. Hell, what if Sve Noc can shift the Gloom? Once the lights are exhausted she might be able to just reap the dwarves wholesale.

MetruX

People, this discussion seems to forget a really, really important thing about this dwarf army. They are not here to push eternally and win the battles. They are here to push the Drow out of the underdark, which means it's not something you win like a war. They will bide their time, kill any who gets too close, advance slowly and GROW. Yes, the dwarfs will grow in here, they will take decades or even centuries to finish this conquest, and be assured, if they can take out the Sve, with it the Gloom, the drows are ended, for all the rest of the dwarfs will be able to come as reinforcements. So, to summarize: this is the last people still underground near dwarf territory, and the dwarfs have no need to push too much or stay in battle if they find something they can't immediately destroy.

sengachi

Okay but imagine the dwarves take the city, but some of the Mighty escape. Or they just catch wind of what's coming and bail. And having escaped, some of the Mighty decide that their best course of action is to sneak around to the dwarven flank and go on a power-up spree by slaughtering a few thousand dwarven civilians. Or just doing hit and run in general.

The dwarves can out-muscle the drow in any scenario and crack any drow fortification, sure. But that doesn't actually mean that much. Just look at the real world example of the US' wars in the Middle East. There's absolutely no power the US has been fighting whose military might holds a candle to the US military, but the end result has most definitely not been a US victory. This isn't because the people fighting the US can take them in a fight. It's because they don't have to take the US in a fight to deal unsustainable losses. And that's with the war fought half a world away from any soft US assets. Can you imagine what the situation would look like if the US military was trying to defend a small nation's worth of its citizens at the same time?

Oh the drow are going to suffer during the war, there's no doubt. The dwarves will crush every stronghold of resistance and scatter every army. But the dwarves are going to take losses with a capital L. Guerrilla warfare in the Underdark will make guerrilla warfare in the mountainous deserts of the Middle East look positively quaint. There will be booby traps and assassins and ambushes and hit and run strikes and dwarves will die.

The dwarves might win in the end. They seem like they've really thought this out and are truly willing to commit on a massive scale here. But just because they can stomp all over drow cities doesn't mean it's going to be easy.

FactualInsanity

If some Mighty decide to bail and flank, they just run into the dwarven fortifications and defenses. This isn't open terrain. It's a network of caves and narrow passages. Chokepoints where the dwarven capacity to drown the opposition in high literal firepower is just further capitalized on. It's not like the dwarves have any incentive to leave their flanks exposed.

lorelord

Ah, but you have to remember that the US was never trying to kill every man, woman, and child. The dwarves are not here to "liberate" the drow, they are here to exterminate the drow. Meaning that most of the advantages of guerilla warfare are gone. The drow cannot attack and then vanish into the populace. They can't even sneak into dwarven towns and the like, because the dwarf garrisons will just kill them.

agumentic

It bears remembering that Dwarves didn't send an expeditionary force, they sent a colony. Faced with casualties, they would dig in in already conquered territory and just rebuild their army old-fashioned way.

TheCount

Thanks for the chapter!

Well, even if the head isn't working as well, I'm sure the leader's stuff on someone else will do.... unless they are made of night, ofc.

Berder

Too close, for a lesser Sigil-holder in a decaying city! He was almost her match. Cat has got to get way tougher somehow, and quick, if she hopes to challenge greater Sigil-holders and the Priestess of Night herself.

Berder

Or, perhaps it will turn out that Urulan was actually a lot stronger than a lesser sigil-holder. Maybe he had the direct attention and backing of the Priestess during that fight.

Jane

I don't think it's a matter of toughness – I mean, how many times did Cat remake herself during that fight? And I don't think it's a matter of power, either – he went down pretty quick, once she was actually able to get close to him.

What she needs is essentially what she's been doing (and how she eventually won this battle) – expanding her bag of tricks, and looking for new solutions to her problems. Her opponent this time worked with little more than a single trick and some backup to hem her into it, and came closer to killing her than anyone has in quite some time – not by overwhelming her, but just by finding new ways to try to burn her with it.

There's a lot of lessons for her here, if she can find a moment to review it.

Berder

Agree, she needs a strategy session to figure out some more tricks and counters that would have made the Urulan fight easy.

Anonymouse

The moment she comes out of the Everdark with an even more huge bag of tricks and an army of drow she'll be OP

Argentorum

The funny thing, is that the Everdark is training her to beat Hanno. Every time she wins she gets better at turning her foes gimmick against them, and the White Knight is 100% gimmicks (in order to match and defeat Black).

It's looking like the Gods Below played the long game on this one.

Antoninjohn

With all the xp Cat's getting she is probably going to level up a lot before she gets to the boss fight with Siv

sengachi

Cat is learning to fight like Akua, but I think she needs to get back to the basics and fight more like Black. This isn't the kind of fight you can throw yourself into and walk away from a hundred times. Once, sure. Twice, probably. A dozen times? Ehhhh. But a hundred, no. Eventually one of them will kill you. Pitting power against power like this is only a surefire win so long as providence is on your side, and that's a fickle force to play with.

What Cat needs is to be more practical. She needs to fight with a squad of ice dummies like Black uses undead, with glamoured traps and careful terrain control, with an exit strategy **always** an exit strategy for every move she makes. She still does need to learn how to use her power to better effect, yes, but not at the expense of the brutal practicality which has gotten her this far.

Which, I'm guessing, is the lesson she's going to take away from this fight. Immortality is all fun and games and unstoppable violence until your enemy whips out a perma-kill and you haven't bothered to think out your next move.

FactualInsanity

Preach.

I know Worm comparisons are tired, but I kind of want to see her do it like Taylor and utterly destroy and terrorize her enemies with ice constructs, while sitting in the warm comfort of her own tent with a tankard of (forgive the misspelling, if there is any; it's been a while since a chapter included the name) aragh in hand.

Greg

This kinda feels like filler.

It's well-done filler in terms of magical fight scenes, but it's still largely irrelevant to the main story. Yes, Cat has to fight her way through to Sve. No, Cat will not be defeated by some random Mighty. The stakes here are fairly nonexistent (for me, I should add). She is not in any danger, Hunter is not in any danger, Akua is not in any danger (much as I wish she was), and there's no other characters here we truly care about at all yet. There's barely even a Story going on.

She is level grinding. And level grinding is not even that fun to play yourself, let alone watch someone else play. This entire chapter could be handled by a paragraph explaining what Cat learned, as it doesn't even particularly matter who she's beaten.

More power to you if you're enjoying yourself, but for me, this has ground the story to somewhat of a halt.

Andrew Mitchell

I can see where you're coming from and agree to an extent. Personally, I enjoy interesting fights with new tricks and lessons to be learned. But I don't more than a couple in a row. I expect EE will skip a lot of the action required between here and Sve.

*crysjal*

I think this chapter is more to illustrate that things are going to actually be difficult from this point. Cat has left the player friendly teaching zone and entered the actual boss dungeons. This was just to illustrate that aswell as her growth in using her power.

JJR

I have to wonder, given the jump in night power that Cat just ran across, is night distribution follows a sort of Pareto Principle Power Law distribution. Basically 80% of the night expected to be owned by 20% of the Drow. It's a thing that happens all the time apparently, there's a video by Vsauce about it too

If this is the case then the enemies Cat is about to face are about to get a heck of a lot stronger. The priestess of night, Sve Noc is probably like an ocean of night all by herself.

*NZPIEFACE*

I'm pretty sure the Sve **is** the Night.

IDKWhoitis

I foresee a time skip, or a very long arc of Cat murdering her way down the City. I normally hate timeskips, but this might take a while as Cat goes through the tutorial of "How to be a Proper Eldritch Monstrosity."

Because we just got to the part in the tutorial where the first serious enemy has been thrown at you, but there's probably going to be a lot of grinding until we get near the bottom of this pit.

Anony

So if her mist can be used to kill, and the mist she spread earlier in the fight is just an extension of her, she could have just killed all three of them back then without much struggle at all.

Might not have thought of it or not wanted to reveal that ability I guess.

nimelennar

"I formed of ice a large windmill and set it to spinning, which drew back the mist closest to me and bought me a moment until Urulan clapped down its staff and broke it without a word."

I just want to say: huge fan.

Forrest

So here we are again with Cat being the underdog despite being *all* of winter, and she is yet again fighting without strategy. Hell, I feel like Cat was more strategic in book 1 than she has been recently. And no, her expanding her bag of tricks for personal combat is not a strategy, it is something you form your strategy around. Oh well, hopefully we get some story manipulation shenanigans when it comes to the sve of night at least.

Drunken Dwarf

To be fair, she's no longer fighting human rebels, young Named, and Name qualifiers. Not to mention these enemies are not only strong, but have centuries of experience in fighting random Night powers. But ya I do hope to see some story manipulation as well for Sve, which should happen considering Cat has now realized she needs every advantage as she can get.

Mike E.

Personally, I'm waiting for Cat to deliver that kiss to Archer 😊

SMHF

You know if Cat keep going like this... Her first new aspect is gonna be Pants!

Barrendur

In addition to this chapter feeling like "filler", it reinforced the emerging theme of "Catherine wins just 'cause... even though she she's got all the tactical prowess of a bull with both horns stuck in a tree."

Barrendur

It doesn't feel to me as if Catherine *deserves* to win; she kills for convenience now and is largely indifferent to it... but more tellingly, she hasn't done anything clever/ingenious in a long time. Catherine's not *earning* her wins anymore.

NZPIEFACE

Not much point in thinking about it when you have literally unlimited power at your disposal.

Hydrargentium

Interesting. So, Urulan lost because it never realized it could lose. It must've been stronger than everyone else around it for a long time. Or perhaps one of its Secrets was a zen-like ability to stay cool. It was clearly confident and feeling calm and in control the entire time, right up until the moment Catherine blenderized its brain.

Hg

Miles

Throw the head into the middle of a bunch of enemy drow, fight with whomever survives to harvest it, and repeat. Great thing to do if it's just a training exercise.

benthelynx

Not the strongest chapter. But I want to add to that that I love this story and please don't let criticism get to you.

JJR

Right, time for some silly speculation.

This chapter is called 'Impact'. Perhaps it will soon be followed by one called 'Second Impact' involving an even more powerful mighty that kills about half the Drow.

These two chapters would really be to set up the chapter where the Sve is confronted directly, called 'Third Impact'.

Viconr

Mighty Urulan wielded a long staff of glass, and without bothered with any more banter pointed it at me.

Without BOTHERING maybe?

burguulkodar

I do wonder who will get Urulan's night on auction. I mean, if I was a drow I would auction a thousand years or more for THOSE TRICKS. If Cat was flesh, she would have died a dozen times in that fight.

Archer, I believe, would die too against those three. They were way too strong for a non-hero mortal to face, named or otherwise.

Max Scherer

I hope she hold back in this fight, because it was actually pretty underwhelming. I dont know why people liked this fight... If this is all what Cat has up her sleeve(without her Domain) Then her Power is way too low. I mean this guy is on the low end of Drow and she had Problems. How the Hell is she going to fight the other Powerhouses? I am really disappointed right now and hoped that she for once wouldnt be the 'weak' one.

---

Chapter 66: Tremors

"It is a small-minded man who needs a reason to create a ritual that would crash the moon into Creation."

– Dread Emperor Malignant III, before his death and second reign as Dread Emperor Revenant

The Urulan Sigil broke within an hour of its chief dying at my hands.

It was a valuable lessons as to how I should handle drow in the future. Decapitating a Proceran or Praesi army, for example, wouldn't necessarily take them out of the fight. The Legions, after the Reforms anyway, had been built with the notion in mind that the highest-ranking officers were natural targets for heroes or resistance fighters. Redundancies and a clear order of succession for the chain of command had been set into their framework. Princes of Procer, on the other hand, might be the undisputed rulers of their hosts but they also tended to delegate the practicalities of campaigning to trained career officers. In both cases, putting the head of the army's leader on a pike would be damaging in many ways but not outright scatter that same army. Sigils weren't armies, though, they were tribes kept together only by the strength of the sigil-holder. When I'd tossed Urulan's severed head into the middle of the battle, the glue keeping the sigil together had crumbled. Their kind, when it came down to it, let their actions be dictated by the invisible balance of martial strength. If the attacker was capable of killing the sigil-holder, odds were that the individual who'd done it was capable of wiping out the rest of the sigil on their own. Best to bargain, if possible, or flee if it was not.

Unsurprisingly it was the Mighty that kept fighting the longest. Dzulu could afford surrender more easily, knowing that they weren't worth harvesting to the enemy's upper ranks and that whoever was in charge there would always be a need for warriors to send into the meat grinder. What did they care under which sigil it happened? Drow did not fight for plunder in the way that most tribes and clans would, not exactly. To amount to anything they needed Night, and war was certainly the easiest way to accumulate that – but when there was a clear winner, doubling down on a losing fight was not to their advantage. Mighty, on the other hand, knew they'd be hunted and harvested after a defeat. Used as spoils instead of coin or food. Surrender might be feasible if assurances were made, but that was not custom. Drow, for obvious reasons, preferred to raise the strength of their own Mighty rather than bring into the fold those defeated. I was part of a broader trend in their ways, one I was only now beginning to really grasp: as far as the drow were concerned, maybe nine tenths of their own kind were essentially irrelevant. Matters of life and death were settled by a handful of Mighty on both sides, with dzulu and nisi serving as tools and ornaments to whoever came out on top.

What that meant, practically speaking, was that the moment Mighty Urulan died this stopped being a battle and started being clean-up. It could still have turned south on us, if we hadn't been careful. The Urulan had outnumbered us three to one in Mighty and if they managed to cull my own numbers the idea of continued resistance might have taken hold. Corpses would have been harvested, fresh demigods raised and sent after our 'champions'. Our saving grace, in this case, was Ivah. My Lord of Silent Steps had no real interest in fighting minions, and had gone after the enemy's Mighty relentlessly. It would have been one thing if those had been allowed to gather together, but instead they'd found themselves ambushed and taken out one by one by a titled drow who was no stranger to these kinds of fights. Archer's sweep on the other side had met with only cursory resistance before she stopped as ordered. When it became clear neither she nor her escorts were inclined to advance any further, the forces sent out to meet her had doubled back to meet my own assault. Too late, however, to turn the tides. Their sigil-holder was already dead.

A few had tried her flank anyway, but after the second time she shot a jawor in the throat the moment it left cover their enthusiasm had mysteriously waned.

I spent the rest of the battle watching over my forces like a hen watching her chicks, not exactly holding their hand but ensuring that if they got in over their heads I could swiftly step on the opposition. To my surprise, even when we began taking sections of the Crossroads holding mostly nisi I never found the need to call my warband to order. My Mighty were oath-bound to decency, but the dzulu were not. Still, it had been made clear to them that wanton slaughter would not be allowed, or rape – though apparently that latter crime was near unheard of among drow, who treated sex as more a chore than a pleasure and rarely bothered unless they were nisi – and in the end they did not test my laws.

I wondered if they would have pulled at the leash, had I not personally slain Urulan and its strongest rylleh. My general distaste for what passed as drow nature whispered yes, but I might be doing them injustice. I held no illusions about the moral fibre of a people whose main occupation was murder, but there was something about them that brought old words from Black to mind. If you have the ability to accomplish something, it is your right to do so. I hadn't understood back then how deep a look into him that little sentence offered, or how close to the same Praesi philosophy he disdained it was in practice.

But there was a ring to it, an underlying sense that I saw mirrored in the way drow thought. The pragmatic monsters who'd shaped the woman I was today – and the plural was not a mistake for Malicia had been a teacher too, if not a willing or gentle one – kept to a faith worshipping only ability, the capacity to carry out one's will. That was a face given to their beliefs by the complicated games of the surface, though, where every little act was part of a broader war of growing sophistication. Down here the varnish of civilization had been stripped off, and the face given to that god was rawer: power. Just power. If you were strong enough, your rules were the only rules there were and they would not be questioned or disobeyed unless someone stronger than you contradicted them. I might be ordering them to act in ways that broke their customs, but as long as I remained the larger monster those orders would be observed for that, too, was custom. And perhaps deeper one than the rest.

"So is it me or do you always get all silent and philosophical after a big fight?" Indrani mused.

She swaggered in, her coat flecked with blood and a satisfied smile on her face. For someone who disdained the trappings of civilization, Archer had taken well to battles. Grown to enjoy them more than I'd thought, her sense of what victory being so personal it should not lend itself well to a clash of armies. A reminder, I mused, that people could continue to surprise even when you believed you had the measure of them.

"I never liked this part," I admitted as she came to stand beside me. "The clean-up. When the blades are out and shields collide I can almost feel what the songs sing of, but the aftermath spoils it. The return to the bare realities of what took place."

It'd barely qualified as a skirmish, by the numbers. More soldiers had been involved in the war game that'd won me command of the Fifteenth, and arguably much more complex tactics. How many people had actually fought today? Five hundred, maybe. And of those less than a hundred had actually had an impact on the outcome. There were not even two hundred dead in the aking of the Crossroads, though the way their corpses had been dragged and laid down in rows along the largest avenue made it seem more than it should. Most those bodies were already bereft of Night, their killers have wasted no time claiming their due, but enough remained that the auction to come would be the largest yet. Indrani sighed.

"It does get on my nerves, that the best parts of you are also the most irritating," she said.

I snorted and left it at that, the two of us sharing a rare moment of comfortable silence. She tended to fill those religiously, almost as if she were afraid of the absence of noise, and so I savoured the rare respite.

"Should I ask why you're wearing clothes too large for you?" she finally asked.

"No," I grunted.

"Well, the pants are tight enough they make your arse look amazing," Indrani said. "But the whole long sleeves thing makes you look like a Mercantis trader."

"You know what, I'll take it," I said. "Still going to need to change before speaking with whoever comes up, though."

"Talk with Diabolist first, maybe," she said. "It's not like she's wearing real clothes, but she is disappointingly not naked all the time."

Thank the Gods for that. Indrani would never get anything done if Akua's admittedly impressive assets were permanently on display.

"I will," I replied. "Not right now, though. She's still taking count of our acquisitions."

"Of course she is," Indrani drawled. "It's almost like she's maneuvering herself into being the obvious pick for who ends up stuck watching over the drow when we get back upstairs."

It was easy to forget, sometimes, that Archer's lack of manners was more choice than inability. In some ways she was as sharp as Hakram when it came to reading social currents.

"She can manoeuvre all she wants, she's not getting the job," I said. "I'm still debating who'll oversee when I'm not around, but she's not in the running."

"Vivienne?" Indrani suggested.

"She doesn't have the right edges," I reluctantly admitted. "They'll challenge her. I'm considering Larat."

"Now there's a real philosophical question," Indrani drawled. "How many treacherous lieutenants it too many treacherous lieutenants?"

"One, but we make do with what we have," I sighed.

"We make do with what we have," Indrani repeated grimly, squinting forward in a poor imitation of a frown.

"I don't sound like that," I protested.

She hunched her shoulders and raised her chin, trying for noble sorrow but mostly looking like she had stomach cramps.

"I beat up empires but I'm real conflicted about it," Indrani declared. "A fairy queen named my crew the Woe because I'm so tragic and misunderstood."

"Screw you," I grinned. "You're part of it too."

"I once finished the last of the stew even if I don't really need to eat, because I'm just the worst," Indrani solemnly added.

It surprised a splash of laughter out of me, and once it started it didn't stop. The two of us ended up standing there like fools, sniggering at nothing much at all. It was a release I hadn't known I needed, and I could not help but be grateful for it. I'd thought before that Indrani was most beautiful in fleeting moments, when the part of her that was more glorious alive than anyone I'd ever known came to the surface and it was all you could see. I'd not been wrong, I decided. Strange as it was, she more attractive to me now – laughter glinting in hazelnut eyes, slightly breathless and making sport of all the world – than she would have been half-naked on my bed wearing little but lace.

"I did make a promise, while fighting Urulan," I teased.

"Oh?" she said. "What-"

My hand slipped around her waist, beneath the coat, and she allowed herself to be dipped down. Her eyes wide, I watched her lips part and leaned down to kiss her. She tasted, I thought, like spices – but soon enough all I could think of was the hungry heat of her lips against mine, the way our teeth clicked together awkwardly before she teased me with her tongue. She threaded her fingers into my hair, forcing me closer, and when we finally parted she was flushed and out of breath.

"Gods," she said, "you are so short."

Naturally, I dropped her. She fell into a sprawl with a loud yelp, perfectly capable of landing on her feet but never one to allow practicalities to get in the way of theatrics. I wiped my lips, then shrugged.

"There, promise fulfilled," I mused. "Back to work."

"Really?" she whined. "You're going to get me all worked up and then just leave?"

"I'm sure you'll get over it," I grinned, and turned my back to her.

She cursed me loudly as I sauntered away, feeling more human than I had in a very long time.

—

I found Diabolist seated like the queen of an industrious grey-skinned hive, drow gravitating to her and Centon for translated instructions before darting away to carry out her bidding. They were getting in the habit of obeying her, I saw. Not the Mighty — they saw her, I suspected, more as an obstacle to climb than a superior — but the nascent pack of dzulu officers and supervisors had grown used to taking her orders. They saw little of me, on a daily basis. Primly perched on a flat stone, Akua was a vision in her long dress of silver and blue. While high-necked and seemingly conservative, her clothes were cut to be rather flattering to her frame: they suggested rather than revealed, but the suggestion was not mild. Scarlet eyes remained on me as I strolled at her side, plopping myself down next to her. I glanced at Centon.

"Dismissed," I said in Lower Miezán. "All of you."

The nisi, though that status might just be remedied to today, bowed low and repeated the order in Crepuscular. Within five heartbeats we were entirely alone in the avenue.

"Catherine," Diabolist greeted me. "Another victory for your tally."

"It was the opening measure," I replied. "The real pivot comes when the deeper sigils decide on their response."

"There have been scouts," she noted. "No Mighty yet."

"It's coming," I said. "They can't afford an unknown her for long, not when we control the top floor of the Column."

"As you say," Akua murmured, inclining her head. "I had the privilege of witnessing your duel with Mighty Urulan, from a distance."

I hummed.

"And you have thoughts," I said.

So did I, and I was curious to see if they aligned.

"If I may speak frankly?" Diabolist said.

"Never too late to start," I drawled.

"Yes, yes, very clever," she sighed. "I have begun to worry, Catherine. Urulan was perhaps in the twenty strongest drow of Great Lotow, and likely close to the bottom of that division. It fought... better than I expected. You came close to death more than once."

"It was a wakeup call," I softly agreed. "We haven't been taking them seriously enough, have we? Lotow's not one of the big cities when it comes down to it. There's leviathans lurking ahead."

"You have grown used to being able to walk away from wounds that would kill even Named," Akua said. "And so developed what I can only call sloppy habits. I've heard descriptions of your encounters with heroes at the Battle of the Camps, the Saint in particular, and cannot help but think this is a trend and not an instance."

"In that, we are in agreement," I said.

Some of the fights I'd been in, lately... Black would weep to see them. I'd always been more inclined towards brawling than finesse, but I was starting to realize there was a reason my teacher had never seen his relative lack of power compared to his predecessors as a weakness. When you had a good enough hammer, everything started looking like a nail. That was a lot more likely to get you killed than lack of juice. I'd begun to rely on abilities that I should only ever use as a last result, and at some point I was going to run into someone who'd kill me for it.

"You use only the thinnest slice of what Winter is capable of," Diabolist said. "Perhaps exploration in depth is in order."

"You want me to fight like you," I smiled. "Distance, control, never committing."

"Not your usual fare, I know," she said. "But you are no longer the Squire in any significant sense. Your repertoire has expanded."

"Tricks are useful," I admitted. "And I do need to learn how to use the kind of great workings you threw around when riding my mantle. But you're wrong about the rest."

Her eyes narrowed.

"You intend to take the opposite path," Akua said.

"The basics," I mused. "I've been neglecting those, since I took my mantle. Thinking it was all right to get into fights because I'm hard enough to win them. But many of those should never have been fights at all."

"Fight no battle save that which you must, for war is best won away from the field," Diabolist quoted thoughtfully.

"Theodosius?" I asked.

"Terribilis the First," she replied. "You intend... contingencies for the coming meeting with the drow, then."

"They're useful things, contingencies," I muttered, looking up at the bare stone of the cavern ceiling.

It was about time, I decided. The opening was there.

"Marker," I said. "It's time for us to have one of our regular little chats, Akua."

"Is it?" Diabolist said. "I cannot recall-"

She paused. Her face went blank and I smiled ruefully.

"I compel you to answer my questions and do so truthfully and completely," I Spoke.

The shade shivered, the order sinking into her.

"We have done this before," Diabolist said.

"We have," I murmured. "Have you walled off any memories or knowledge, or considered doing so?"

"I have not," Akua replied.

"Do you have any hole or holes in your memories?"

"I do not," she said, then cocked her head to the side. "I do not. Oh my, you have been thorough."

I had. I'd known from the start that I wouldn't outplay her with words, she'd always been better at that. But I had other ways to even the scales.

"Have you plotted or acted against my interests?" I asked.

"I have not," she replied, sounding amused.

"What are your current short-term and long-term objectives?"

"I seek to prove myself as necessary to the running of your sigil," she said. "And in doing so, remain undeniably useful so long as you have use for the drow. My only long-term objective is survival."

"How do you intend to secure your survival?"

Her lips thinned. She never enjoyed that one.

"I must first learn the exact wording of the oath I believe you gave Thief, to see if it can be escaped through a technicality," Akua said. "I must then prove myself invaluable to your own objectives so that you will allow me to do so. I must be reconciled to Vivienne Dartwick, or she must be removed from the situation. If the wording is without flaw, I will seek to obtain a manner of resurrection that preserves most of what I am."

Nothing new, then. Good.

"Have you manipulated the greater or lesser oaths, or both, so that you can exploit them in any way?" I asked.

"I have not," she said.

The same answer as every time I'd asked the question, but it was worth checking to be sure.

"Do you know why I insisted the oaths be sworn to the Sovereign of Moonless Nights?"

"I do not," she said.

Ah, too broad.

"Do you have theories as to why I did?" I asked.

"I do," Diabolist drawled. "Shall I save us the time and elaborate?"

I ignored her. If not prompted, she could lie.

"What are these theories?"

"I believe you intend to divert yourself or your mantle in the future, and so dissociated oath-keeping from your personal identity," she said. "I am not certain if the beneficiary would be an object or an individual, but suspect it will be the former Prince of Nightfall."

Wrong, but she didn't have to know that.

"Is there any other part of my soul you would like me to bare?" Akua asked. "You must have other questions."

I had to keep it short – too long and the risks increased she might notice – and I usually used my last question to make sure she hadn't picked up on anything. I could do that tomorrow, though, at no great loss. And there were some things I'd grown curious about.

"Why do you flirt with me?"

She laughed, full-throated.

"I know you have difficulty remaining emotionally uninvolved when in a sexual relationship, and you have a known weakness for powerful women," she said. "I also believe that contact between us would temporarily allow me to regain full physical senses, which is promising as I find you attractive enough sex would not be unpleasant."

I waited for a moment.

"It also infuriates Thief when she overhears," Akua added reluctantly, forced by the order. "Which I deeply enjoy."

"That might be the most human I've ever seen you act," I said.

She languidly shrugged.

"And now?"

"From and including the word 'marker' I spoke earlier today, you will remember this conversation as idle chatter from the moment this sentence ends," I Spoke.

Her form rippled and a heartbeat passed.

"Amusing as this was, I believe there might be more pressing matters at hand," Diabolist said.

"You're right," I said. "Let's talk contingencies, then."

Still under control for now.

I'd ask again tomorrow.

---

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
Go vote. You know you want to.

Cold Cyberia

<https://discord.gg/CQRZBFM>

All paths lead to the Guide Discord. I await you beyond the reach of dawn, in the realm of ceaseless shipping and revolutionary baby cuisine.

NerfContessa

Looking back at this during a reread.

Oh my, how much this chapter foreshadowed is insane...

erraticerrata

For those of you who've been following the comment section here or checked out the reddit, you'll know there's a character popularity tournament going on for the Guide, organized by a good friend of mine! It'll keep coming out update by update, with the link below leading to the first matchup. Check it out and vote!
https://www.strawpoll.me/16692414?fbclid=IwAR1MTfBI8pLDLkMAU429g0LWgS6RtUUqRIp\_kFKcD8ZG8a3QaYZEhs7a2QI

stevenneiman

Starting with an easy choice, I see.

naturalnuke

Poor Klaus xD

stevenneiman

Obviously everyone's going to vote for the noble and wise leader of the armies of Good rather than some sort of fae abomination.

RanVor

I am genuinely surprised that Papenheim has any votes.

letouriste

same. that's quite a feat. the guy is more popular i thought

Jane

Someone confused this for a "who should we eliminate" style contest, a couple of weirdos really hate the main character, and a few dozen people's mouse slipped while voting, I guess?

TeK

I personally, knowing that Cat will win, gave my voice to Klaus to support him, despite overwhelming odds against him. It is exactly the reason that I see no way for him to win, which compelled me to be graceful in victory, even though he would not be my first pick. However, it is my understanding that those rankings are used for purposes such as judging overall character respectance by the audience, and I do solemnly apologise for throwing the data into a turmoil, however insignificant my voice may be.

Also, I believe there is small, but vocal, groupe of readers who stand vehemently opposed to Catherine Foundling and her accomplices, who vote for Klaus out of principle, since he does represent the "Good" side of the conflict.

eaglejarl

Who is Klaus?

kelioez

U...u monster

stevenneiman

I'm not surprised that there exist people who like Klaus better than Cat, but I am surprised they would have stuck with the story long enough to see this. I guess they might be in it for the side characters, given that Hakram and Juniper between them have a lot of Klaus' personality.

Ethan Smith

Side characters are pretty great to be fair

DroughtBringer

Huh. I'm wondering how long she has been doing that. Also, if that is Speaking as we have seen it before, that ability there could be terrifying. Find people, Speak something to them, and then make them forget what you Spoke to them. Has interesting potential, but would probably run into flaws quickly. It is nice that Cat has taken this precaution though, although I feel like Akua is a bit too smart for that to keep working for too long.

Byzantine

That is the exact reason anyone in their circle who was ever in direct contact with malicia was killed by Praesi highborns: she can give an order they will be unaware of and that cannot be detected until it is already far too late.

Novice

It's probably the combination of the strength of Cat's Speak and the fact that Cat has full ownership of Akua's soul that makes this type of contingency possible.

NerfContessa

Still, very very well done this... Contingency.

I approve.

IDKWhoitis

Black uses a variation of this trick regularly, as noted in the Free Cities Arc.

NZPIEFACE

Remember Lelouch?

Miles

I wouldn't be surprised if that's how Black started this story in ch 1.

**Kill him, but remember it as your own decision****

agumentic

That would be just asking the whole thing to backfire horribly somewhere down the line, so I doubt it.

Concerned

That would have come back to bite him by now, we all know how fucked tricking your apprentice makes you

Someguy

She forgot to ask what Akua's interpretation of Cat's interests is.

By deliberately interpreting that it is in Cat's interests to walk down the Stupid Wasteful Evil path, it may open an opportunity for Akua to reverse the "Caged Monster" Storyline on Cat or Starscream her way free.

stevenneiman

My understanding is that Speaking only works when narratively you are the one who is expected to be in control of the situation. Otherwise the only combat ability worth having would be to Speak and command the opponents to kill themselves. Except for Malicia, but she was dealing with minions she had plenty of time to mess with and in a situation where the narrative was set up for her to swat aside an assassination attempt or two

Most of the cases of Speaking we've seen have been between two characters with an explicit command relationship, and in most of them the one Speaking only short-cut a process that they could have done the hard way. The only exception I can think of was shutting up the Bard, and the Bard's whole design is built around a lack of explicit power. For example, Black could have simply ordered Akua to stab her own hand that one time and she would have had to do it. Cat has incredible power when she Speaks to Akua, because right now Akua is as much one of Cat's special abilities as an actual person, and there is certainly no question of who has the explicit power in their relationship for all that Akua might be trying to change that state of affairs.

I think Speaking is basically a mechanism by which reality forces to plot along, so the more out of line your command is with Fate's current trajectory, the less likely you are to be able to control someone by Speaking.

Cicero

Well... glad Cat is taking precautions.

letouriste

saying it that way is a bit...xD

Javvies

Ah, good. Enforced Interrogations of Akua that she can't remember to keep an eye on her.

Clever. Nicely done, Cat.

Brute force only gets you so far. Skill and finesse backed by force is better.

And a liberal application of shooting/stabbing first from surprise doesn't hurt either.

Allafterme

Perhaps too clever for her own good. One does not simply con the conman...

SilentWatcher

Would it not be best if Cat goes back to the basics, but also takes a trick or two from Akua? If not she has a obvious weakness in distance fights

SilentWatcher

And I hope cat doesnt lose her mantle. It always pains me when the MCs lose Power in the stories, just so they can be back in the "Underdog" position. an Extrem example is: " The sword of Truth". Growth is always more satisfying.

SpeckofStardust

""
I already see the flaw in this but no one in story has spotted it yet.

"From and including the word 'marker' I spoke earlier today, you will remember this conversation as idle chatter from the moment this sentence ends," idle chatter is not always unimportant to remember when it comes to understanding something.

Dainsleif

While i agree with you, she has done this before for who knows how long, and her questions to Akua shows that she doesnt remember any of these interrogations. Which means that Akua would not, as a character trait, focus on idle chatter. Also one may say that since she is FORCED to remember it as a idle chatter her brain would not save it unless she had photographic memory, which we know she dont.

Mental Mouse

The problem comes when she tries to review the "idle chatter" to extract further insights about Cat, as she certainly would. But that just tells her that *something* has been covered over, and this is something Akua would take in stride as Cat actually being kinda smart for once. Of course, the substitution also allows her to truthfully report that there are no holes in her memory.

Sulomund

Typos!(?)

"I'd begun to rely on abilities that I should only ever use as a last result [resort], and at some point I was going to run into someone who'd kill me for it."

Well that's actually all I saw. Any more? Great chapter, as ever.

Morgenstern

to divest yourself of your mantle. not "or". I guess.

Berder

There were not even two hundred dead in the aking of the Crossroads (taking)

How many treacherous lieutenants it too many treacherous lieutenants (it/is)

They saw little of me, on a daily basisl (basis)

The nisi, though that status might just be remedied to today (remove "to")

They can't afford an unknown her for long, (her/here)
If the wording is without flaw (second if should be is)

Gunslinger

A lot of answers this chapter to regularly asked questions. The daily interrogation of Akua bit was probably the best. I still fear Akua is going to be a threat again (an extremely annoying one) but her addition to the Woe has been quite fruitful.

Also poor Archer. The guy she loves is ace and the girl she hits on leaves her with only a kiss

IDKWhoitis

Archer, playing the part of the audience.

Never Change.

tyizor

Seriously. Gods above and bellow, bless Archer

edrey

i really can see the bard using this to fuck cat in several ways

Agent J

Well, tell her to get in line. Indrani and Akua clearly have dibs.

Dainsleif

I think Vivienne would like a word with you about that dibs stuff.

tyizor

Well, this chapter was interesting, but Idk what Cat is really expecting from this. If this actually kind of works, imma call horseshit b/c this isn't "Cat". Cat's never been particularly stealthy or smart on the pedantic side of the spectrum before picking up the mantle. Things never go well for her when she tried to fulfill a role that's *not her*. Like, how well did her last few stealth missions go? The hell is she thinking right now?

Maybe erratic is pushing towards Cat being affected by some kind of meta-story of a warlord invading the country of a big-bad, but I still have no clue how we got here. Everything leading to the drow arc has seemed kind of... loosely thrown together. Things have just kind of... worked. She didn't even have a plan for how to bind the drow until Akua mentioned it in the *after* they dived into what seemed like unnecessary danger. Things are working out so easily it almost makes Cat seem heroic (which has been kind of annoying to read).

IDKWhoitis

I wonder if Cat is getting Meta-Storied by the Winter influence she thinks is getting shunted off.

werafdsaew

Cat can learn, and she does have friends that is good at this, like Masego and Hakram.

---

Hey, she's the girl that almost got Path to Victory as an Aspect, only botching it because she rushed the aftermath of its acquisition (something that happened to the original, too). Hiding a deeper plan under reliable conflict and advisors who would pick up her slack is almost as much her thing as it's the Tyrant's.

Rook

She's actually seriously talented when it comes to mundane tactics and playing the story. It's easy to forget in the wake of all the recent Winter shenanigans that her very first major victory came about as a result of some clever wordplay and a bit of theatrics. It let a fledgling squire rip resurrection out of the hands of an entire Choir, then stomp her foremost heroic rival's head into paste without so much as a squeak of resistance. The same one that completely overpowered her and cut off her head, earlier the same day.

The same kind of tactics Black uses are her foundations to begin with.

Her strength is improvisation, but the key has always been to use it within the framework that her teacher taught her. Set up the scenario first, and when her Villainous plan inevitably unravels, that's when her affinity for improvisation comes into play to give her that little edge needed to win. It'll just get her killed if relied on from the start.

Her instinct to go back to basics instead of playing for more raw power is the difference between wearing your enemies as a fashion accessory vs becoming a fashion accessory. The victory there was more Black's than anything, and he did it without even being in the same room. Using some clever wordplay and a barrage of crossbow bolts to a certain mage's face.

Dainpdf

Well, I guess that's why she says she knows she can't outword Akua. I assume she has a great number of contingencies, as Black once taught her (since one big plan is a terrible idea).

Dresden 67

What are you even saying? That Cat isn't a planner? She's no genius, true, but she's beaten Akua before, at First Llesse. Her plans have worked more often than not, though often at a cost.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Wait... she's never considered walling off part of her memory or knowledge? Not even during the little chats? Like I would think that would instantly trigger consideration of walling off bits of herself. Never as a method to beat interrogations while she was still alive?

IDKWhoitis

I'm absolutely sure Akua is aware of these conversations. With so many Wasteland horrors and seeing Cat pull that memory block gambit with the Dead King, I would be legitimately surprised if Akua does not have a countermeasure.

Byzantine

I'd suspect she knows she is being interrogated, but nothing more.

Right now it is better to minimize her knowledge of things in case Cat gets smart and asks. And following Cat really is in her best interests, at least until she has the information she requires to slip free.

Byzantine

As to countermeasures: The Praesi Highborn considered anyone who ever had a direct contact with Malicia lost. ...She can Speak so powerfully that she can give orders to an entire room and have no one in room aware of it. And there were no countermeasures to it. I believe we saw them kill an asset, annoyed by the loss but considering them irreparably compromised just from casual contact.

And Cat has even greater control over Akua, due to her nature as Fey.

Dresden 67

I wish people would stop assuming that Cat is terrible and wrong about everything.

werafdsaew

Maybe she did, and that's why she doesn't remember it.

Dainpdf

The issue is she'd have to do it so well she wouldn't notice it when Cat asks. And she'd have to do it immediately or have to admit to considering it on their little session.

IDKWhoitis

The thing that has me on edge is that Akua PAUSES right before Cat asks her,

"She paused. Her face went blank and I smiled ruefully."

There is so much bullshit that Akua could pull at that moment, and it seems like this has become a daily occurrence. Cat is so much more vulnerable if she thinks she's holding all the cards, and we can't trust her to have every contingency planned out if she is possibly under the influence of Winter or some meta-story.

Dainpdf

This Cat doesn't sound like Winter Cat; plus, Catherine has been able to tell when Winter was creeping up before. In any case, I believe Akua's face went blank because the Speaking made her fetch all those memories of "idle chatter" and recontextualize them. It's a given that she will eventually be able to use these times when she can remember to plan something, but hopefully Cat has enough small plans that she can stymie the treachery until she's ready to pass the mantle around. And/or snuff Akua.

Dainsleif

However that specific line of narration happens BEFORE Cat Speaks. My take on this, is that Cat knows that these jabs on memories that should be inside Akua's brain triggers them back. After she was surprised by the first time it happens she probably started taking pleasure in seeing Akua react. Which makes sense since Diabolist's reaction doesn't change after Catherine Speaks.

Dainpdf

You're right, except for one point: Cat says she smiled "ruefully". That's not an indicator of pleasure.

NZPIEFACE

wtf cat thats terrible and i absolutely *love it*

holy shit she's plotting things that even the readers dont know about

RanVor

On the other hand, she's not plotting things the readers thought they knew about...

JillyBean

Well, not particular things. Possibly other things.

Walter

Haha, I was thinking Akua's endearments were part of some deep scheme or cunning plan, and the answer is just that she finds Catherine attractive and wants to have sex with her.

d_o_l

Well, also that she thinks it'll improve Cat's feelings towards her. Great multitasker, Akua.

Dainsleif

Nor surprising. One of the first things she teaches Cat is to never do something for a single reason. A action must return several rewards. Its the same idea of the multi plan.

Dainpdf

She did mention that Cat has difficulty not getting emotionally involved. She's bound to speak the truth and she only said the sex would "not be unpleasant".

Insanenoodlyguy

I always got the impression that Akua is heterosexual, but her attraction to power is held above all else. So her being a girl isn't a plus, but the fact she murdered her and tortures her soul is. It's certainly enough for her to work with.

Dainpdf

IIRC we don't really know much about Akua's love life, except that she slept with that Fasili guy before Second Liesse.

naturalnuke

I think I enjoy the little peak into Akua the most, this confirms she does truly believe her rhetoric of 'to the victor goes the spoils' and as a 'spoil' is being as helpful as possible to not die.

Dainpdf

That's one way to see it. I see it as her biding her time to get out of this situation as soon as possible.

Yotz

One doesn't contradict the other. "I'll serve you in sooth and good faith for one year and one day", and all that jazz. If her survival first, and new body second would be assured, she would have no objections with her current subservient status, it seems. For the time being, yes – but the time in question will be measured by the Catherine's nature. The moment she stops being the person who crushed Akua Sahelian would be the moment the 'victor' is no longer is, and so the 'spoil' would be set free again. ...If only to reshape Cat in the form that can be considered 'victor' once more.

Dainpdf

They sort of do. One is honest subservience while the other is laying low, waiting for the time when one can flip the relationship and gain independence (hopefully killing and/or dominating Cat while at it). One implies she's serving Cat out of respect for her winning, the other that she just thinks this is her best way forward for now.

JackbeThimble

Catherine finally got her prescription in for a fresh pair of Dresden Goggles I see. Her old ones seem to have been wearing out a bit. Presumably the Liesse accords will have an appendix that properly accounts for releasing pent-up sexual tension like civilized foes.

Dainpdf

And so we see why Cat trusts nothing that comes out of Akua Sahelian.

Damn... I hope Cat has ALL the contingencies for this one djinn in a bottle.

As for Cat going back to a more controlled fighting style, that's great to hear. She's been depending way too much on just throwing power around these days, and that is something Praesi have tried over and over.

WuseMajor

I think she might be headed back to a more diplomatic form actually.

Dainpdf

That, yes, but Cat also used to fight smarter than this. Never as well as Black, but she still used to have all sorts of tricks and plans when fighting.

Cold Cyberia

Cat seems strangely possessive of Ivah. Calling him "My Lord of Silent Steps" every time she refers to him by his title... kind of worried about it tbh.

I'm eagerly awaiting the point where her forces reach critical mass. If she's smart and the sigils underestimate her, she'll be able to take them over one by one and at certain point the drow under her command will be powerful enough to steamroll through any of the lesser sigils. I suspect the Sigils in Holy Tvarigu will be a different beast altogether.

Yotz

-Dodo. Urulan. Papenheim. Apricot. Enter supervision, stealth mode. Execute Sitrep One, Akua.

-Subjective integrity maintained. Subjective continuity maintained. Subject observes no tampering.

-Good. Now execute Sitrep Two.

-Very well. Exit supervision.

tithin

Damn you, Angleton.

Yotz

Unfortunately, TEAPOT was decommissioned [REDACTED] ago. Although, [EXPUNGED BY DEEP CONTINGENCY]

IDKWhoitis

This comment reminds me of an SCP report or something.

Mental Mouse

It's a reference to Charles Stross' Laundry series, which is well worth reading.

Mike E.

Thank you for a follow up to the promise of a kiss...Archer's reaction to being left with blue balls (or whatever women call their equivalent condition) was awesome.

Djinn O'Cide

Pretty sure its "pink balls"

burdi

cat want to make a story, about "sovereign of moonless night" who change the drow civilization forever, it is just like akua when she tried to get Diabolist Name so i think cat want to make sovereign of moonless night a Name, by making drow swear to it

Morgenstern

" I will seek to obtain a manner of resurrection that preserves most of what I am "

Why, just why, did this make me think again about Heroes, Akua trying out (faking) being a hero, and the redemption story the Pilgrim angled for or did not angle for that everyone was wondering about...

---

I remain of the opinion that the weird OOC dialog between Akua playing Catherine and the Grey Pilgrim was her negotiating for a resurrection and him establishing the conditions on which she could obtain it.

Dresden 67

The Pilgrim can be ruthless but I find it hard to believe that he would help an utter monster like Akua walk free.

Steve

Possible dangerous loophole:

Cat tells Akua to forget back to the utterance of Marker earlier that day.

They are deep underground, how is Akua supposed to know when the days roll over?

Walter

I've been modeling Cat's mind control stuff as body control, for the most part. This update muddies the water a lot though. Like, why not Speak "Take the slave oaths" to her new followers, why bother with the auction? Why not tell Akua to forget her ambition to be free?

Javvies

Because that's just asking for something to go wrong. If she mindcontrols the drow into taking the Oaths, that's just asking for some hero to break the mind control at some point, and then for the drow to maliciously comply with the Oaths – rather than willingly volunteer and comply. This way, the most loyal and subservient drow get the most power. That means they are less likely to cause trouble for Cat.

Also, there's a fair chance that taking the kind of Oaths that are being taken requires the oathtaker to not be mindcontrolled into taking them.

Besides, Cat is relatively pro Free Will.

Akua's ambition is not freedom. It is survival. Wanting to survive is fine, within reason – it is a motivation to prove useful, competent, and loyal.

Free, Akua is without allies or protection from basically everyone.

Dainpdf

Since the mantle seems to be able to tell names given from those taken, that latter hypothesis is quite likely.

As for survival, Ubua knows Cat will kill her once her usefulness has stopped.

caoimhinh

I wonder if Ivah will be Cat's version of Assassin, you know, with that whole Lord of Silent Steps title.

Stevedace

I like this novel.

jjffjhjf

So, I notice that no one else seems to have given a theory as to who she plans to abdicate her fae title to. I'm putting forward its her Ex, the half-fae lady who she got in a fight with over her desire to use a blood ritual to gain power via her fae blood. She gives it to her, likely under the stipulation of loyalty to Callow. She's got a fae monarch on her side, her ex is happy with her, no longer needs to do a blood ritual. Its really a win all around for her.

Steven Casort II

"If the wording is without flaw" I believe you meant "is without flaw"

Isa Lumitus

Black's words, "If you have the ability to accomplish something, it is your right to do so." Probably deserve to be a chapter opening quote.

Maybe I'm a bit biased, though. Mostly because that exact sentiment was one of my epiphanies when it came to understanding how the world actually works. In my head it was phrased as "I have the right to do anything that I am capable of doing." With, of course, the unspoken implication that everything else also has this right.

Dresden 67

So your philosophy is 'appeal to force'? You do realise that in real life that results in chaos, death and not much else right?

Mental Mouse

Actually, in the real world, it also leads to a lot of negotiation, basically because fights are risky.

Rup

How many treacherous lieutenants it ...takes to change a light bulb.??

burguulkodar

Two. One to change the light bulb and the other to make the first to be seen like lighting the bulb was an act of treason, punishable by death.

maxwell wearing

FUCK. YES.

This WHOLE time I've been wondering why Cat didn't do this (Speaking to interrogate Akua) and now I finally have an extremely satisfying explanation to fill that seeming plot hole.

Good job.

burguulkodar

I find Akua's answers interesting, but I also do find the Speak power to be much more OP than previously assumed. We should be aware of limits within it, for it seems as OP as the Pilgrim's unstoppable plague.

Cat could just ORDER everyone to either obey her, make oaths to winter or to kill themselves.

---

Chapter 67: Breakthrough

"With great madness comes great possibility."

– Dread Emperor Malevolent I, the Unhallowed

It took three hours before the first envoy showed up, requesting the name of the sigil that had displaced the Urulan and politely inquiring as to its intentions. Some poor dzulu bastard who'd obviously been sent because it was expendable. It wasn't allowed entrance into the Crossroads, not that it was eager, and I sent Ivah to meet it halfway through one of the bridges instead. Our diplomatic approach, if it could be called that, was rather simple: I wanted a meeting with the nine remaining sigil-holders in Great Lotow. In exchange I would provide information about a great common threat approaching, which Ivah had been instructed to make sound properly dire while remaining light on the details. Given the scope of the dwarven invasion, that was hardly difficult. Decapitating Mighty Urulan had earned me the attention of the city's power-brokers, but I hadn't made enough of an impression I could simply browbeat them into following me. To get an audience, I needed a gift.

A warning about the dwarves invading ought to do the trick.

The sigil that first approached us was the Slaus, who held the territory directly below the Crossroads. They'd been on decent terms with the Urulan, who usually had higher priorities than raiding their downstairs neighbours, but their envoy made it clear they weren't all that broken up about a replacement having taken up residence. A stronger cork atop the bottle that was Great Lotow was a good thing, in their eyes, since weak Crossroads meant an open door for raids into their own territory. The dzulu provided names along a bare – and probably highly biased – lay of the land to my Lord of Silent Steps even as Akua and I settled the auction. The report I was given afterwards was illuminating, though I'd already known some parts of it from earlier interrogations. Aside from my own sigil, there were nine others in Lotow. The Slaus Sigil, my new 'friends', were fighting to rule the upper levels against the Kanya and Losle. Along with the Urulan, those three sigils had made up the 'weaker' tribes forced closer to the top of the city and denied the room and resources of better districts.

There were two sigils at the very bottom, the Orelik and the Vasyl, who were the largest of the city and had tacitly been allowed to monopolize the larger farms and lakes so long as they kept trading with the others: the balance there was a delicate one, where other sigils kept them weak enough they couldn't refuse but didn't want to damage them so badly the food would stop coming. That left four sigils to squabble over what had once been the core districts of Great Lotow: Sagas, Nodoi, Soln and Zarkan. From what I understood they'd been at war for the better part of a millennium and played out enough heroic alliances and wicked betrayals to fill a dozen epics, taking and losing territory to each other with every passing year. All four raided other sigils, but usually only to strengthen themselves against their adversaries in the centre. The rest of the city enabled the centuries-old feuds cheerfully, well aware that if one ever became strong enough to devour the others the remainder of Lotow would follow in short order.

Mighty Soln was a name I'd heard before, actually. It was the same drow who'd famously beaten the now-dead Kodrog so bad it had fled into the outer ring, where it'd had the misfortune of running into the dwarves and then myself. Soln was the most promising of the city's Mighty, in my eyes, as it had a reputation for fair dealings. Which mostly meant it formally broke alliances before turning on its former allies, but that was already a cut above the rest. Willingness to make bargains in the first place was what I needed the most.

"I believe a cabal is the way to unite these Mighty under your banner, my queen," Ivah said. "Outright subjugation would be long and costly enterprise, given our current strength."

It had changed again, I thought. There was no trace of the original green or the grown silver in its deep blue eyes, but that was the least of the changes. My Lord of Silent Steps was still tall and blade-thin, but there was a sense of strength to its frame that'd previously been absent. Fae could be skinny as a goblin and still be strong enough to wrestle down an ox, and the bestowal of the title had brought that power to Ivah. That unspoken impression that its body was a disguise, that physical abilities were estranged from its flesh. It walked upon Creation like something not born of it, a transient guest. Its presence had bloomed to my senses, though I'd expected nothing less when I'd offered it the harvesting of Mighty Urulan. I had need of a strong right hand among the drow, and it had proved useful enough to deserve the reward. There were risks to that, but benefits as well.

If it came to a fight again, it'd be my side that fielded Urulan's tricks.

"A cabal," I repeated. "Those are a kind of warrior honour societies, no?"

"It is a nuanced matter," the Lord of Silent Steps said. "In olden days cabals were formed along the twelve purposes and three duties, but this practice has been abandoned by all save the most traditional of my kind. There are cabals that, as you say, are honour and recognition. Only Mighty of renown are invited to them, and their name swells from the joining. Yet this is no longer the accepted custom."

"Which is?" I prompted.

Ivah hesitated. I'd give it a pass on that, I thought, since I was pretty much asking it to summarize what was beginning to sound like a fairly complex matter simply enough an outsider like me could understand it

"One might say a cabal is a compact of Mighty who share a single desire," the drow finally said. "This desire can be near anything, my queen. The legendary Red Hunt formed when Mighty undertook the annihilation of the Fagran Sigil. The Hour of Twilight was raised when the strongest of Great Albenrak desired the conquest of Great Telarun – and a hundred cabals were born to sow the seeds of the Hour's own destruction. The Old Vigil guards the temples and libraries that once belonged to the Sages, while the Wayfarers still keep the northern Hylan ways open for all who would travel them."

"Mighty but not sigils," I slowly said. "It's on an individual basis. If a sigil-holder's part of a cabal, it doesn't mean the entire sigil is."

Ivah nodded.

"A cabal may hold individuals of many different sigils, some at war with each other, and so long as they act in the fulfilling of the compact they will not turn on each other," the drow said. "It is a separate matter, not to be spoken of."

Which did explain, at least in part, why the Everdark didn't currently consist of half a dozen lesser gods sitting in their own city with the rest of the race long gone. If a sigil started pissing off all its neighbours, half the region's Mighty would form a cabal and put it down together. Gains had to be weighed against the risk of backlash.

"It would not surprise me, for example, if many of Lotow's Mighty were part of a cabal ensuring the farms of the bottom levels remain unspoiled," Ivah elaborated.

"So we make our own cabal," I said. "One that desires evacuation in the face of the dwarves."

"Mighty are proud creatures," Ivah said without a hint of irony. "Stating it differently would be more palatable."

I snorted.

"I suppose calling ourselves the Get Out Ahead Of The Dwarves Cabal wouldn't be all that impressive," I said. "We are, let's say... seeking out Sve Noc for instructions on how to answer the nerezim threat."

"That would be acceptable," Ivah noted. "The Sve speaks only when it wishes, but this is a great crisis. Custom can be bent."

"And you think that'll be good enough an offer they'll take it?" I asked.

"The upper sigils, perhaps," the drow said. "They will know that if a cabal is formed for the defence of Lotow against nerezim encroachment, its first act will be to devour them to strengthen ahead of the battle. I do not believe the others will enter your service."

"And if I make the taking of oaths a requirement to entering the cabal?"

"None will bend," the Lord bluntly said. "Exile would be more acceptable an alternative. Cabals to answer the threat can be formed without us, regardless. We will be seen as useful addition yet no requirement."

Yeah, about what I'd expected. Even with a bearded apocalypse at their doorstep the drow would have issues with my rules. My sigil was just a droplet in the sea of the Everdark, and even in a border city like Great Lotow we weren't the biggest stallion in the pen.

"We'll try anyway," I said.

Ivah's blue eyes watched me closely.

"And if we fail?" the Lord of Silent Steps asked.

"Then I beat them with a stick," I said. "And ask again, much less politely."

—

It was not an auspicious beginning that I couldn't even get every sigil-holder in the city to attend. The Losle refused to show if the Nodoi did, and the Zarkan boldly required both a tithe of dzulu from my ranks and an alliance against the Soln if they were to deign attending. Both the bottom sigils suggested in strong terms that the meeting should be held near their territory, at the lowest level of the Column, which essentially everyone else made clear was unacceptable. I chose the Nodoi over the Losle – the latter were angry they kept being raided by the former, which was reasonable, but the Nodoi were stronger and I needed them more – while Archer returned the Zarkan envoy to its sigil by throwing off the bridge in their territory's direction after it got unruly. Seven out of nine would have to do, and I'd never seriously considered following the suggestion of the bottom sigils. Aside from how unpalatable that'd be to everyone else, it would screw with my contingency. Not make it impossible, no, but it would mean a significant increase in collateral damage if things went south.

Envoys went back and forth for most of a day until the cats were finally herded. It might not have taken as long if the spurned sigils hadn't started ambushing them, but Mighty Soln seized the central levels of the Column for a few hours and guaranteed safe passage. I sent a polite message of thanks, it replied with a hint that the courtesy could be returned more materially and so I sent it back a single word: nerezim. I was not above playing favourites in the slightest if it any of them were willing to behave halfway-decently. It was about an hour before the meeting that Ivah came to me with a problem that hadn't thought was one. If you are to stand among them as sigil-holder, my queen, you must have a sigil, it informed me. Though some of my drow had taken to calling our band a sigil, it was true I'd never really considered it that. I wasn't a drow myself, and had no intention of remaining their equivalent of a noble when we left the Everdark. But Ivah insisted, saying it would be disrespectful to arrive without the proper apparel and would lower my prestige in the eyes of the others. I gave in, not willing to dig in my heels over something this minor.

There was a slight issue, in the sense that a sigil's, well, sigil was usually the name of the sigil-holder in stylized Crepuscular with the colour of the cloth it was on denoting a creed. Black for the seeking of Night, red for ambition, different shades of blue for those espousing specific virtues and Ivah might have gone on describing for an hour if I hadn't interrupted. The closest equivalent to 'Catherine' in Crepuscular was apparently Katarin, the symbols making it up possible to accentuate to mean either 'elegant snake' or 'delicate dark pearl'. I was rather glad Archer wasn't around to hear the second one, though Akua got rather smirky regardless. 'Foundling' had no real equivalent, though after conversing for a while like two deaf people shouting across the language divide I got the sounds and meaning of it in Lower Miezan understood. Losara, Ivah finally said. The characters of it meaning 'lost and found', and when drawn on the dirt resembling a tree with twin incomplete circles under the branches. Painted in silver over purple cloth, which symbolized seeking a higher purpose.

The irony amused me. Upwards was where I meant for them to go, after all.

A nisi with some aptitude for painting that hadn't been slain for the talent was rustled up and a sigil produced, barely dry by the time I set out alone. I had need of Diabolist and Archer elsewhere, and given the nature of my plans bringing a retinue would be a waste. Besides, the agreement was for a meeting between only myself and the sigil-holders. A solid third of the debate through envoys had been settling on a language for the conversation, which had ended up being Chantant. It got stuck in my throat that odds were good people had been killed so all the sigil-holders would be fluent in the Proceran tongue when they arrived, but Indrani's words had stayed with me. I'd not come here to save the drow from themselves. I wasn't sure if I could. Or even if I should. I came to the Mighty of Great Lotow without my cloak, draped instead in the cloth of my sigil over my clothes. The glamour I wore had been anchored in a stone I'd made myself swallow, carefully crafted over hours to be flawless. There was no room for mistakes today.

The meeting was to be held in the Column, my first venture into the dead heart of this ruined city. The structure itself was a broad pentagon, every side measuring exactly sixty-five feet and seven inches. Given the Column's ridiculous height – it had to make up most of a mile – simply stacking stones wouldn't have been enough for it to hold up. The ancient drow hadn't done that, anyway: masonry was a different business when you lived underground. The Column itself was the remains of what had once been solid ground before a pit was excavated around it, further reinforced by five spines of some red metal going all the way up and a plethora of bridges linking it to the surrounding districts. I'd actually thought the metal was just rust steel, when I first took a look at it, but it was oily to the touch and perfectly preserved. If not for my suspicions it was the main thing holding up the structure, I would have ripped out a few chunks to bring back home to Callow: I'd never seen an alloy like it, and if it could survive a few centuries without regular touch-ups it was heads and shoulders above anything my people had ever used.

The inside was surprisingly elaborate. Most everything that could be pried or hammered off had been, including entire spans of mosaics and anything even remotely shiny but every single floor was a book in Crepuscular, beautiful curved characters spreading out in rows and swirls. Historical chronicles and stories, songs and poems and every written thing that made up the lifeblood of a culture. It was a stark contrast to the stumps left behind by stolen statues, the dusty holes of ripped out mosaics and the spider webs woven into the complicated arrays of dead magelights and absent mirrors that must have once cast light all over the Column floors. The structure had not been the administrative centre of Great Lotow, or its religious one – temples and palaces were in the middle districts – but it had been the heart of the old city. I walked through empty marketplaces and riots of now-dry fountains, gardens of dust and the wrecked stands of what must have once been a public playhouse. It was the grave of an ancient people, still haunted by the last remnants of it. I allowed myself awe, but not too much. Past glories were a little thing in the face of breathing dangers.

Having Masego along for the calculations would have been preferable, but admittedly Diabolist was no slouch when it came to numbers. She'd counted the bridges, figured out the weight and given me the correct floor. I hoped, anyway. There would be no second chance if she was wrong. Ten floors deep, that was the sweet spot, but I'd had to compromise and go to the eleventh. Most levels of the Column had multiple access points aside from the two sets of spiraling stairs every single one boasted, but the eleventh floor had once served as a court where lesser offences were settled. There were no bridges leading to it, and the heart of the floor was a large courtroom whose only point of entrance and exit was a set of massive stone doors. Given the temptation of ambushing this large a concentration of Mighty in one place, this floor had been judged the most fitting place for a meeting. Time was fluid in the Everdark, not in the way that it was in Arcadia but because there were so few devices that measured it. No bells, down here, and so I was not overly surprised I'd been the last to arrive. I'd taken my time to ensure as much, after all.

The doors were slightly ajar, just enough a single person could pass through, and seven Mighty seated on high thrones beyond them. For all that power swam around them like currents, I could not help but think they looked like children. There were nineteen seats set against the walls, and the sight of the sigil-holder failing to claim even half of them made it seem like they were just kids wearing the regalia of adults. Playacting at empire in a pile of ruins. None rose when I entered, remaining seated on the thrones of stones where they had draped their sigil's banner. Without a word I leaned forward and clasped the red metal rings set into the stone doors, closing them shut behind me with a clap as my bones creaked under the weight. Seven pairs of eyes studied me in silence as I wiped my now dust-coated hands on my pants and strolled forward. I didn't overthinking my sitting position, simply claiming the throne to the left of the doors and putting my banner over it.

"Losara," one of the Mighty said. "And so we finally have a name."

The Chantant it had spoken in was a strange mixture of Crepuscular pronunciation and an ancient Alamans way of speaking, but still perfectly understandable for all that. I eyed the banner behind the speaker, having memorized the names going with the symbols. Orelík, I thought, recognizing the swirly fish-like pattern. One of the two bottom sigils, those that held the farms. It was the first fat drow I'd ever seen and the sight was jarring. The loose hide tunic failed to hide the folds of grey skin, though its pure silver eyes served as reminder that fat or not it was accomplished in the art of killing.

"Mighty Losara, you bloated old slug," another drow replied. "Urulan would speak to that truth, if it still spoke."

Its symbol looked like eyes over three fangs: Slaus, my downstairs neighbours. That sigil had the most skin in this game, as they were both sharing a border with me and the next in line if an outside threat came muscling in. I settled into my throne, comfortable allowing the byplay to go on without me. Which it did, hissed sentences in Crepuscular starting to go back and forth as the Mighty began what sounded like an old and bitter argument. They were interrupted by the sound of stone shattering. The Mighty who'd struck its throne and powdered a chunk of it rose to its feet, face twisted in irritation. The sigil behind it was one I easily identified, as I'd paid particular attention to it: a ring of swords, with an open mouth in the centre.

"You spend the time of your betters frivolously," Mighty Soln said. "Be silent."

Both the other drow looked furious, but they did not argue. I cleared my throat.

"If we're quite done," I said, eyebrow rising, and none gainsaid me. "You came here because I promised information. As it pertains to the conversation I wish to have afterwards, I'll begin by laying it out in full."

Silver eyes all turned to me, and I shifted in my throne. The fucking thing had been carved for someone Hakram's height, not mine, and so my legs were dangling off of it like I was a kid in her father's seat. It was adding insult to injury that I knew for a fact I fit in dwarven seats just fine.

"As of two months ago," I said, "the nerezim have begun an invasion of the Everdark."

You could have heard a pin drop in the silence that followed.

"Allow me to be perfectly clear," I said. "I did not misspeak. This is not an expedition, it is an invasion. At least a hundred thousand soldiers came through the Gloom, their vanguard led by a Named. They bring with them civilians because they intend to stay. Even as we speak most of the outer ring has fallen into their hands. They aim for nothing less than the extermination of your kind."

One of the Mighty scoffed. Its sigil looked like a wall broken through. Sagas, I thought, one of the strong sigils in the centre.

"Burning words," Mighty Sagas said. "Yet what proof do you bring?"

"I have witnesses, if my word is not sufficient," I said. "They saw the vanguard with their own eyes. Saw it slaughter an entire sigil of the outer ring."

"I doubt not the word," Mighty Orelik said. "It has been delivered. You have done service, human, and may now leave."

"That won't be happening," I mildly said.

"Do you think aping our ways gives you seat here?" the drow hissed. "You are interloper, not guest. Know your-"

"Be silent, Orelik," Mighty Soln said softly. "If I must ask you a third time, there will not be a fourth."

The first Mighty opened its mouth, but Soln rose from its seat and the lips closed. I nodded in appreciation, though got only indifference in response.

"I came here today to propose the founding of a cabal," I said. "Not to defend Great Lotow, for it is already lost. It was the moment the nerezim crossed the Gloom in force. But to seek out Sve Noc and ask instruction."

One of the Mighty snorted. Nodoi, I saw, the last of the central sigils in attendance. I needed those the most, if I was to make any progress at all.

"The Sve speaks when it wishes," Mighty Nodoi said. "That is custom. To request words is to beg for a curse."

Mighty Slaus sneered.

"Are we inner ring darkskins, to prattle of tradition?" it replied. "Mighty Losara speaks sense. Extraordinary times demand extraordinary measures."

I would have been more moved by the support if I hadn't known it sprang from the fact that the Slaus would be on the chopping block the moment the central sigils decided to band together to defend the city. It was less belief in my solution that bade it to speak than the urge of self-preservation.

"Do we know when the nerezim will strike?" one of the Mighty said, staring at me.

Vasyl, the symbol said. The other bottom sigil, and noticeably less hostile than the Orelik so far.

"At least two weeks," I said. "Perhaps more, if they spread their forces to completely clear out the outer rings."

"Then this is no time for quibbling," Mighty Vasyl grimly said. "Defences must be seen to, or the city abandoned. There is no middle path."

"I'll be frank," I said. "You can't hold Lotow. They'll bring down the city on your heads and drown the districts in molten stone without ever engaging. They have the engines for it. This is not a war like those you know. They will not harvest or take prisoners: their intent is to claim the Everdark without any of you in it."

"You know nothing, child," Mighty Orelik sneered. "We have fought wars, turned back the Hylvian Dogs when they tested our borders. You—"

"— have commanded armies larger in number than this entire city," I flatly replied. "I've slain heroes and tricked fae, walked the streets of Keter as a guest and pried life out of the hands of the Hashmallim. You're just a rat in a hole, Orelik, and if you try my patience once more I swear on all the Gods I will feed you your own fucking limbs."

It flinched, and murmurs spread across the room. They might not know much about fae or heroes, down here, but the mention of the Dead King's capital had made an impact. Him they remembered.

"It is said you make even Mighty take oaths," Mighty Soln said, voice cutting through the whispers.

"I have rules," I said. "They bring power as well as bindings. Many have thought this a worthy trade."

"And these rules," Soln said. "Will you seek to impose them on any that join this nameless cabal of yours?"

I rose to my feet, hand going through through my clothes and taking out a parchment scroll. I tossed it at the Mighty Soln, who easily snatched it out of the air.

"I will," I said. "These are the oaths, written in Crepuscular, though they will have to be sworn in my own native tongue."

The drow unfolded it, silver eyes studying the contents, and didn't even get halfway through before it snorted and tossed the scroll at Mighty Vasyl.

"This is subjugation, not alliance," Mighty Soln said

"They are standards of behaviour," I replied calmly, "enforced by my mantle."

That did nothing to move it, so I moved on to the larger audience when I kept speaking.

"Are none of you tempted by the thought of an alliance that you know will hold?" I said. "That will lead to no betrayal, for going back on the oaths means death. How much could you actually accomplish, if you were not always watching your back for knives?"

"A cabal is a worthy idea," Mighty Soln said. "Yet this is not a cabal, Losara. It is... queenship, your kind call it."

"It would make me warlord," I said. "Until the war is over. An extraordinary measure for an extraordinary crisis."

Mighty Vasyl had passed the scroll to Mighty Nodoi, who outright laughed.

"You give terms like a victor," it said. "You are not. This is overreach. To obey your orders without fail? Madness. Arrogant madness."

"You've overplayed your strength, child," Mighty Orelik said.

This time no one chided it.

"I'm sad to hear you believe that," I said. "Should I consider this to be a refusal for all of you?"

"Obedience is not our way," Mighty Slaus said. "The terms must be changed."

Mighty Soln laughed.

"Look into its eyes, Slaus," it said. "Do you see compromise there? No, this was not request. It was an order."

Slowly, I sat back down on my throne.

"Is there nothing," I asked, "that I can do to change your minds?"

"If you seek the terms of a victor," Mighty Soln said, "prove yourself one."

The challenge rang loud and clear in the room. There was only agreement on the faces of the others, and so I tugged at the chains that bound Akua to me. Our signal.

"I considered that," I admitted. "But what would be the point? I've no need of corpses and chaos. It's you I want. The whole lot of you."

The Column shivered under our feet and every single Mighty had left their throne within a heartbeat.

"Ambush," Mighty Orelik said. "Your last mistake, human."

"I'm not going to fight you," I calmly said. "That would be wasteful, and I was taught better than that. This is a... counterargument."

The sound of stone shattering sounded in the distance, and half the Mighty began boiling with Night. It was pointless. The moment the shiver had been felt the gate had opened. Akua and I were not without cleverness, and so we'd planned to have it unfold right under the ceiling of the floor below. Unfelt until it cut through the walls, and by then it'd be too late. The bridges had snapped under the weight, and the Mighty that would have fought me found their footing failing as we began to impossibly fall. The conclusion was appropriately impressive: our chunk of the Column hit the ground with a massive impact, and the gate sliced right under the ceiling above us as it closed. I fell from my throne, ankle bone snapping from the bad angle, but forced myself to rise.

Midday sun shone down on us, bring a cold breeze with it.

"What have you done?" Mighty Nodoi howled.

"Welcome," I calmly said, "to Arcadia."

"This is not the Everdark," Mighty Soln said, tone confounded.

"No," I smiled. "And if you ever want to return there, well, you have the scroll. All it'll take is a few oaths."

"You will not survive this," Mighty Orelik screamed.

"I will return tomorrow," I said, ignoring it, "to see if any of you have reconsidered. Try not to die."

Without bothering with goodbyes, I abandoned the glamoured drow corpse I'd been controlling and left them to stand alone in the outskirts of Winter.

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evilerraticerrata>

Second match up for the popularity contest, Dead King vs First Prince! Vote for your favourite through the link below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16703965?fbclid=IwAR2B4-UUFUtQKiiJ4eml\_vymSVtQJReTK0YSU4-pWf\_MzqTQeDk06DmV2o

Solfadore

Results of the previous match: Catherine utterly crushes Klaus by 945 votes to 76 (92.56% of the vote). No surprises there, but today's match will likely be closer – though how much is anyone's guess.

Link to the (updated) bracket: <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805>

stevenneiman

I'm thinking it'll go for the Dead King. They're both major but somewhat distant antagonists, but the Dead King is more honest about his nature, and has this sense of grandeur about him where Cordelia just seems like William except with tact. That's just my thinking, but it looked like the votes agreed, with Neshamah leading by about a 2-to-1 margin. Still a lot better than Klaus vs. Cat, but Cat's a good part of why a lot of people keep reading.

Jane

I'm hoping Hasenbach can rally, but... Realistically speaking, they're just competing for the right to lose to Cat anyway. Neither is going to make it past the second round.

Aston W

The welcome to Arcadia paragraph just made this the best chapter in ages. Brill writing!

Rup

...oh, how the Mighty have fallen...er...gate-ed 😊

NerfContessa

That was really excellent.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, but there's absolutely no chance Cat will kiss the Dead king. There's a very small but still more than 0% chance of Cat engaging in something with Hasenbach, though I suspect it would be in this sort of manner.

JackbeThimble

I'm not sure what you're basing this assessment on. The Dead King's a gentleman with some serious prospects, not to mention a more than passing resemblance to the Father figure that Cat doesn't know she's lost yet. Plus they both like to spend time inhabiting reanimated corpses so they've got that much in common.

letouriste

not really close. Apparently, the shares are around 2/3 1/3

Shequi

I'd suggest next time linking to the poll page, not the /r (results) page. It takes some of the fun out of it if you see how the vote is going before casting your own vote, IMO

Morgenstern

Second that. It actually made me reconsider my first choice, if just for a moment until voting for it anyway.

NerfGlastigUaine

God, I love both, they're two of my favorite characters, but I have to give this one to the Dead King. He and Bard are the two greater scope characters in the entire story and every one of his lines is just so perfect

Javvies

Oh snap.
Try not to die indeed.

And Cat can pilot at least individual Winter Dead like an avatar.
Nice.

stevenneiman

Every part of that trick has been shown before, it's just the combination and the coordination that are remarkable. She's woven glammers, puppeted whole armies of corpses, and sensed through her constructs before, she just put those all together in a clever way.

Javvies

She's puppeteered individuals and directed large numbers previously.

She's never before shown the level of fine control over one of her undead that she displayed here.
And as far as I know, this is the first time she spoke through one at all, far less used one as an avatar.

naturalnuke

No when she was traversing Abua's doom castle she had dead mages talk to her. Don't you remember 'Surprisingly A Bleeder' and 'Should Have Ducked'?

naturalnuke

And there's nothing that said she directly spoke through one, none of them had ever heard her voice before after all. And even if they had she can glamour sounds.

Morgenstern

Those undead mages were speaking *on their own*, not directed by her. She enquired, they answered to the best of their previous knowledge that they'd retained. That's not the same as controlling and speaking through another corpse on her own. She only controlled her Zombie horses and gave some controlling commands to an army of corpses, but never outright took one over, as far as I can remember.

Javvies

That was her making the consciousness of the Winter Dead speak about memories of the body from life.
Different thing.
She told them to answer questions, she wasn't speaking through them as though they were her.
It is the difference between Speak With Dead and possessing the corpse.

Morgenstern

What Javvies said. Saw that comment too late.

naturalnuke

I get that, but we know she can control her undead with mental commands, and we know that her undead are capable of speech when prompted. It's a logical step that she'd be able to at least feed them lines to say.

Snowfire1224

Perhaps she's using winter to speak and cover up the jerkiness of the corpse that comes from puppeteering it?

naturalnuke

That's probably one of the things the glamour stone covered.

Antoninjohn

I wonder if they can take Night from Fea, still it probably would do them no good the Fea will beat them up badly with ease

Darkening

Depends on the Fae, Urulan was supposed to be one of the weakest of this lot and he nearly killed Cat. Granted, she's not using her power to the fullest extent, but she is still a lot harder to kill than your average fae noble proved to be.

Andrei

True but as far as we know only Winter has similarities to Night. Since the winter court is no more the mixed court may not have enough common ground with Night for the mighty to be able to harvest the fae. In addition to that this seems like such an amusing ploy I don't see the gods throwing a hand on the scales and allowing the mighty to harvest fae just to see what other funny things this Catherine-monkey does.

Rook

Gotta keep in mind that Catherine's threat level varies wildly based on narrative context, rather than anything concrete. She has a history of nearly (or actually) dying at the hands of minor characters, then later kicking the shit out of antagonists several orders of magnitude more dangerous, all with very little concrete powerups in between.

She almost got bopped by bog-standard winter fae at the start of the Arcadian war too, and ended up going toe to toe with the highest levels of Summer nobility by the end. William waltzed through everything she could throw at him and beheaded her back when he was the main antagonist. A few hours later she literally squished him underneath her boot, solely because that was her moment of triumph.

RandomFan

I think that's a named thing, not a Catherine thing. The prince of silver swords nearly upended the status quo- and got killed by a single arrow to the throat from an orc.

Also William was bullshit not just because he was a hero- for all that novice heroes wind up being plausible threats no matter how unfair a mundane-oriented villian like Black might feel that to be- but also because he had a pattern of three going. That's two hands on the scale pushing in William's favor. Even if Catherine is literally being given capital G godly support from something on the other side of the scales, that's going to push hard enough that she'll still lose that fight itself.

But with the sword, she basically stole his plot, and conservation of ninjutsu made it that Catherine was probably stronger- after all, Akua and William teamed up against her, and as you mentioned, it was a moment of triumph. Both give the edge to Catherine.

Is my thoughts on the matter. That every named has an approximate power level, but swings all over the spectrum as needed.

Novice

The only fae that has Night is the Lord the Silent Steps. Night came from Sve Noc.

Novice

I really hate that we can't edit our posts.

DroughtBringer

Ooooh...
Nicely done.
So very nicely done.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I remember a plucky band of people getting trapped in Arcadia. How did that end exactly?

Seriously, the Drow should just go a looting. Faerie a rich environment for them to get power ups. Then they can beat a Fae into making a gate for them.

Javvies

This is Arcadia. The Drow, even Mighty, are not the big dogs they are at home in the Everdark.

The very land is their enemy, especially since they got dropped on the edges of what was Winter. They aren't dressed for the cold, and probably don't have an environmental adaptation power.

Plus, the locals aren't exactly friendly and welcoming.

Novice

Plus the fact that there's only seven drow there. Mighty but still completely outnumbered and outclassed.

Dainpdf

That plus fighting groups of millennia old Fae in Arcadia is quite different from fighting a single Catherine in Creation, especially one who's still figuring out her powers.

Geoff

I don't think there's a single fae in winter for miles on miles.

They're all in other lands.

She dumped them in a barren wasteland.

Rook

The locals are only half the problem with Arcadia anyway. The other half is Arcadia itself.

Time doesn't even make sense there. If she weaves the story well enough, she could in theory re-open the gate five minutes later in Creation proper, and fifty years of wandering a wasteland could've occurred on the Arcadian side. Reality will bend over backwards to enforce the stories.

Cpt. Obvious

Necro posting... Wheeee!

Reality bending over? Arcadia is a tale. A story being told. It knows no boundaries but the imagination of the storyteller. The fey are a part of the tale, that's why they were locked in a ever repeating pattern until Cat broke it. Currently the story remains fluid enough to give the fey a semblance of free will, but in time it will settle down into a pattern again.

The murder hobos she dropped in Arcadia are at a severe disadvantage. Even if they have some knowledge of Arcadia it will be out of date. Also not being part of the tale they're effectively mortals in a world of immortals. They could burn winter off the map kill every being in Arcadia and the only thing they would have to show is a lonely place to die. And the moment that happens Arcadia would reset ready for another telling of its tale. Only this time it would be different as there most probably wouldn't be another group of outsiders matching these mighty thrown into Arcadia to repeat the story.

Not that a few murder hobos would be able to actually do all that. What I expect them to do is freeze a lot and possibly create a cabal to neutralize Cat when they are safe from the dwarves. It's not like they know she has plot armor...

Byzantine

If the Drow were heros there would be a problem. They aren't. Catherine is trying to enforce some degree of heroism on them. That story gives Catherine quite the edge in Arcadia.

onedollargum

I imagine that the main difference is that the plucky band was a young cohesive group who invaded by choice, were invited by the monarch and were plastic enough to mould themselves around a story that favoured them.

In this case we have a handful of ornery individualists who are taken unwillingly, being held prisoner by the monarch, and who were rigid enough that they couldn't take the bargain that would have spared them in the first place.

The odds are good that some of these mighty will be fractured by the experience, and that at least one will die and be consumed.

Metalshop

The first thing that popped into my head reading this was 'The enemy's gate is down.'

Jane

Planeshift, an age-old solution to troublesome encounters you'd rather just bypass.

...Incidentally, if even this isn't enough to get them to swear, it'd probably still make it a lot easier to take the rest of the city without the Mighty there to fight or give orders. I don't know that it would be take-the-city-in-two-weeks-and-get-out easy, though...

Darkening

Yeah, she could probably take the city at this point with them gone. Losing out on their Night for her army would be a shame though.

Dainpdf

She could also probably lake the city and get whoever swims up from it. Pity Masego is not there to enable it, but maybe Akua could help? If Cat ever trusts her enough to weave magic with her, of course.

werafdsaew

There are still 2 Sigil holders left in the city.

Jane

But if she swoops in and takes the territories lacking their sigil-holders, the two remaining Sigils can hardly hope to challenge her – and even if they tried, it'd be two relatively straightforward, if stiff, fights, as opposed to having to slowly chew through nine difficult fights while hoping that none of the other Sigils attempt to flank her while she's busy fighting. Even if it wouldn't be ideal, it would still dramatically simplify her problem.

Rook

They'll be doing a LOT of swearing. Maybe not oaths, necessarily, but swearing nonetheless.

JackbeThimble

That was probably Cat's most Dread Empress moment yet.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Humans and non-humans love swearing oaths to me. Especially after I gate them to a parallel dimension containing vicious, sadistic human-like caricatures who toy with bodies and lives like we do with clay.

– Extract from A Guide to Being Loved by All by Dread Empress Victorious Catherine Foundling

JackbeThimble

'Before you decide whether or not to make me the happiest Dread Empress in the world you should know that I've always booked our honeymoon.'

– Dread Empress Precipitous, formulating what is now a traditional Praesi wedding proposal.

JackbeThimble

*already booked
lol

Insanenoodlyguy

"I don't always portal my foes and potential foes to another plane, but when I do, I portal them to Arcadia." -Dread Empress Most Interesting.

ALazyMonster

I love this, we're back to Cat playing the players rather than the game and it is glorious!

Also, I'm wondering if the area of Arcadia she dropped them in is specifically under her control as she stated that Arcadia on the way to Keter wasn't really winter anymore (I'm talking before the whole broken flashback world stuff) and this area was described as being winter. Which as the queen of winter means her sticking them in her personal prison also goes great narratively since Drow aren't heroes, they're the attack dogs for bigger nightmares. This is them learning their place.

Dainpdf

No area of Arcadia is exactly Winter anymore. First, it's not the season (the Hunt exists right now), and second, Winter and Summer don't exist in Arcadia anymore. It's a single Court now.

Javvies

The Wild Hunt that answers to Cat is always in existence. They do not care about the Season.

At any rate, Cat specified she dropped the Mighty on the outskirts of Winter.

Plus ... the lands that the Duchess of Moonless Nights inherited from the Duke of Violent Squalls would have remained hers, and thus remained of Winter after the King of Winter married the Queen of Summer and the Courts merged. Besides ... we don't know the extent of the changes.

Dainpdf

Did she? I know she inherited the title of Duke, but I don't know about any lands. Cat is not a member of Arcadian Court anymore, so she most likely has no holdings there even if she inherited some.

As for the Hunt, where did you get that they're always extant? It might be that the end of Summer and Winter means eternal Autumn/Spring in Arcadia, or that by swearing to Cat these fae have broken out of the cycle, but I've seen no indication of that.

ALazyMonster

It was implied by the conversations with Larat and referencing his story about foxes escaping traps that the hunt had slipped out of the normal fae cycle.

As far as the courts not actually existing that was kind of my point since winter doesn't exist anywhere other than Cat, then theoretically as Javvies mentioned if she inherited land/ territory from the Duke of Squalls, it would technically be a domain of winter. It would in theory simply be like an independent nation due to her separating from the courts. However, this is more or less just speculation and I have no idea if this rabbit hole is really going anywhere. It is just fun to consider though.

Dainpdf

I believe the words of Larat referred only to the cycle of Summer and Winter fighting ending. It's most likely that there is a new state to which things transition during the Summer/Winter season, instead of just stopping at the Spring/Autumn stage.

As for lands, nothing was ever said of her inheriting lands – in fact, she'd have probably gotten rid of any she did inherit, since it's a connection of Arcadia to Creation (specifically Callow) she couldn't afford.

Antoninjohn

The Winter King at the time gave the Fea rights to her land in creation not Arcadia, it was the entire plan to change the story "we are now part of the dream you call Callow"

werafdsaew

The Winter King also recognized Cat as heiress to the Duke of Violent Squalls, which means she gets all the Duke's holdings without any additional bestowal

Anonymouse

Don't forget that the unification of the Courts only applies to Arcadia that is accessed from Calernia. The Everdark may not be included.

Dainpdf

That is true. Then again, Drow are still somewhat active in the surface, and were even more in the past. Courts in other places would also not need to be season based.

Agent J

The Everdark is part of Calernia. It's right there on the maps.

Someguy

Ah, the Foundling/Losara Gambit: Kidnap the interlocutor, isolate and beat them up until they submit.

Rook

Even if they don't submit, she doesn't theoretically have to fight them herself. She could just assimilate what she can, leave, and rig a gate to dump them in front of the dwarves when they come knocking. Hell, it could just pop them back into the pillar as the city is getting glassed with molten lava.

Dainpdf

Once again, Cat was playing a completely different game from everyone else.

She should be glad no one had the "Arcadia Portal" secret, though. I mean, powerful spellcasters can cut through Arcadia (see Warlock), so Drow with enough Night might have been able to... Also, she should take some of that metal back for Masego. I mean, you know the dwarves are just going to take everything they can and destroy everything else, so why not bring her favorite Hierophant a souvenir?

It also ought to be good bait to bring him back from his parents' company.

Andrew Mitchell

A treat for Masego is a very sensible idea.

Rook

A treat for masego would be vivisecting Ivah in four dimensions to study it. A distraction is the word you're looking for. That or coercion, in the form of several poorly-carved wooden ducks thrown at his head.

sengachi

Now *that* was how Black fights! Approach your enemies with a corpse puppet, and engage them by removing their ability to engage you. Use the awesome power of Winter not to fight, but to control the battlefield in a way that makes fighting unnecessary. And layer it all with a studied understanding of your opponents and a full exploration of the options your power gives you.

A+, Catherine is piecing together Black's lessons very well indeed.

Cold Cyberia

Oh cool, the drow have magical weathering steel.

Not gonna lie, I'm disappointed Cat hasn't killed the rest of the sigil-holders and absorbed their forces underneath her banner. It would be more difficult in the short term but in the long term having direct control over a large force would be better.

She's placing a lot of trust that the oaths will hold and can't be undermined and I think it will bite her in the ass.

RanVor

Even if the oaths can be undermined, she can still kill any Drow who swore to her with a thought thanks to Winter she has put in their souls. She's in no danger.

Owyn Beleforte

"It is said you make even Mighty (missing) oaths," Mighty Soln said, voice cutting through the whispers.

nimelennar

Mighty Soln, after being gated to Arcadia: "I need to learn that trick."

Mighty Soln, after Cat abandons the drow corpse: "That trick, too."

Morgenstern

I'm banking on Soln being the first to swear to her, as he basically asked her to show the benefits that come with it and that she can really hold up her end of the bargain, that she has enough power and that she can go up against other, bigger foes they'd be going against by showing them she can at least trump the ones she tries to "bargain with" here. Displaying such powers, dumping them in Arcadia, and taking over the city (or at least the sigils that they "left" rather involuntarily) while they're gone should count as enough of a victory.

Morgenstern

Enough of a victory to be counted as "victor" who can impose such terms, I mean. He **seemed** rather reasonable, in a Praesi way of thinking, I mean. To the victor go the spoils and all that...

Tohron

Given that most but not all of the sigil-holders just suddenly disappeared for a day, I get the feeling that the ones who didn't attend will move to take advantage of their absence. Wonder if Catherine will do anything about that.

Snowfire1224

"You want me to play by your rules? Screw you and your rules! Speaking of places that regularly screws the rules, have you ever heard of a little place called Arcadia? Lovely weather this time of year. As someone who has been there, I can only describe it as an experience like no other. Oh look we're already there, I wonder how that happened, hmm? Too bad you wanted to play by your rules instead of my own, perhaps this time out will help relieve your stress, I'm sure being a Sigil Holder is a very demanding occupation after all and stress, I'm told, causes one to make stupid decisions. By the way, I was never here, have fun surviving" —basically Cathrine to the Drow Sigil Holders.

On an unrelated note could enforcing the rules on the drow perhaps be a warm up to enforcing the Lisse Accords?

Javvies

Maybe, or maybe it's a warmup/practice for bringing the other Named and nations into the Accords, but one of the Oaths she's having the drow make is to enforce the Lisse Accords.

Fuodiachloris

I'm sure Oaths can be kept in reserve. For the chronically intransigent. Or the really, really dense. Because you can never underestimate the number of people who will refuse to see the benefit to new ways, even if the potential rewards are pretty obvious.

crysjal

So Black dies and shortly after Cat starts really applying Practical Evil once more as opposed to the "throw my power at them and watch them die" approach.

Good use of the inheriting the teacher's spirit trope, which isn't an actual trope apparently. Surprising, considering Naruto is a thing.

Berder

This chapter made me happy.

NZPIEFACE

Man, Cat is a creative bitch.

StabBacker

This is foreshadowing/(sideshadowing?) of what Capn Black did on his armada of rafts – possess a body to expose the flank of the opponent.

Possession is nine tenths is the lore – Masego the Distracted

plantsbeans

Wow.

Deviant Loader

Cat: I have commanded large armies

Mighties: We can do it too

Cat: I've slain heroes

Mighties: Meh, we don't care...

Cat: I have tricked faes and angels

Mighties: What's that?

Cat: I walked the streets of Keter....

Mighties: Oh Shit! She's the real deal!

asnpn

Slavery at it's finest

---

Interlude: Heretics

"It is common practice among the lower classes of Praes, who lack surnames, to name their children after themselves in the hopes of confounding any devils coming to collect on debts."

– Extract from "Horrors and Wonders", famed travelogue of Anabas the Ashuran

Masego had not missed court.

At least this was not Ater, where a formal session would be held in the Tower with corresponding pageantry, but Thalassina was wealthy enough its ruler was near as indulgent. The floating fountains and illusory interior garden were proof enough of that. High Lord Idriss Kebdana was, he'd been told, an old ally of the Empress. Two years ago that would have made him Masego's ally as well, but things had since changed. Catherine and Malicia were enemies now, and he'd already had to give thought as to how he would attack the Tower's vicious set of protections when that enmity finally led to blows. He'd considered killing High Lord Idriss, since he was already here anyway, but he was a guest. It was apparently very different to kill someone on the battlefield compared to killing them in their bed – which was irksome since practically speaking the end result was the same – so he'd eventually decided against it. Still, he'd made a note of the weaknesses in the city's wards. If the Army of Callow ever had to assault Thalassina, he was confident he could collapse the central array with the right ritual.

"A glass, Lord Hierophant?"

His eyes moved under the cloth to study the pair who'd approached him. Twins. Soninke, or close enough: native Thalassinians tended to be mixed blood, taking in appearance after the last infusion from either side. The man had the Gift, and heavily enchanted robes. An utter waste, he thought with disdain as he took them in. Silk might be costly and take well to sorcery, but it also dispersed it at an unusually high rate. The Yan Tei supposedly had their ways around that, but secrets from across the Tyrian Sea were not easily obtained. Those robes would require regular maintenance just to keep up... warmth, shifting patterns of gold and a lesser illusion anchored in the man's face? What a waste of the art. Three different workings in this difficult a material: they were throwing away a skilled mage's time just by owning it. The woman of the pair was offering him a delicate transparent glass filled with wine. His eyes narrowed in on it, finding no poison within. Unusual. They put poison in everything at events like this.

"That won't be necessary," Masego replied.

He belatedly remembered to add a slight inclination of the head as thanks, as was polite.

"I would have thought you eager to taste a proper Wasteland vintage, after your years abroad," the man said with a friendly smile.

"I usually can't tell where wine is from," he admitted. "Not without alchemical tools."

They both laughed, which surprised him. Had someone told a joke? He should pay closer attention to the conversation then. The woman laid a hand on her brother's arm and leaned forward as she laughed, the elaborate straps of her dress shifting. It was a strange apparel, he thought. Thalassina was known for its seaside breeze, would she not get cold walking outside attired in this way? Maybe it was a dress meant purely for receptions like these.

"Still, it must be pleasing to have returned home," the woman said. "The provinces are not known for their... comforts."

She was leaning forward again. Must have a bad back.

"I usually sleep in the Observatory," Masego noted. "So I wouldn't know."

"Ah, the famous Observatory. I have heard much of it, lately," the man smiled. "Your own work, it is not? Would it be indiscreet to ask how it functions?"

The blind man cocked his head to the side.

"Have you read Serebano's ten volumes on scrying?" he asked.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"I have not," the man said.

"Then there would be no point in telling you," Masego replied. "You lack the necessary grounding to understand the basic underlying tenets."

The man's smile grew stiff, though his twin seemed amused.

"Then I will obtain copies, my lord, and perhaps we can pursue that discussion at a later date," the other mage said.

"If you'd like," Masego said. "Although I've been told I should kill anyone who tries to figure it out without permission, so that seems counter-productive of you."

"Is that so?" the male twin blandly said.

His face had gone blank. Ah, I offended him, the mage realized. It must have been that he'd made it clear the man was ignorant. His friends kept telling him it was impolite to do that, though they might as well ask him to stop remarking that the sea was wet. Ignorance was everywhere.

"I am told you've never visited Thalassina properly," the female twin said.

Masego wondered if it was too late to ask for their names. It probably was. Father had provided him a list with names and descriptions, but he'd needed something to wipe an acid stain and he hadn't felt like getting up to fetch a cloth. That might have been a tactical mistake of sorts, he reluctantly conceded. In his experience, if you asked people their name after conversing with them for more than four sentences they tended to get angry.

"I am uncertain what you mean by properly," he said. "But I have only ever seen a few streets and parts of this palace."

"There is much I could show you, then," she replied smilingly. "It would be a grave sin if I never offered to escort you to the seastone walls or the corals."

He was uncertain what religion had to do with sightseeing, but Thalassinians were known for their strange practices.

"If my work allows," he said.

By reputation, the corals were rather beautiful. Also filled with old wards and traps for any seeking invasion through the sea, which to be frank interested him rather more.

"My sisters knows the city well as any native," the other twin said encouragingly. "And I've no doubt the company of your own kind will be a balm after your time amongst the savages."

"Most legionaries are actually well-behaved," Masego noted. "And I spent little time with them regardless."

They laughed again, to his growing confusion. He went over the spoken words carefully. His own kind? He'd thought they meant humans, which was rather odd since as far as he knew the Army of Callow was human in majority. Assuming they were not idiots, which he almost never did in situations such as these, they might have meant 'his kind' as Praesi instead. Oh. Was he supposed to be feeling patriotic since the Empire was at war? But then he was technically at war with it, since his friends were, so the logic was not sound. Baffling.

"You meant Callowans," he tried.

"I suppose some are barely civilized," the male twin mused. "They did spend a few decades under our rule, after all. And they are now led by the Carrion's Lord castoff, no doubt thanking all their Gods for her Praesi education."

"I was not aware my uncle had cast off anything," Masego noted. "Except scruples, but he's always insisted he was born without those."

Which had led to a thoroughly wasted evening when he'd been nine and trying to find those in his anatomy charts, worried Uncle Amadeus was missing an organ. The woman smiled over the rim of her cup.

"There is no need to be coy, my lord," she said. "We have kin in the capital. The breach between the two is common knowledge in the right circles."

Who had Uncle Amadeus been arguing with recently? The Empress, he remembered, but that hardly fit the rest of the conversation. Did they mean Catherine?

"It must have been tedious to humour the fools," the man drawled. "Yet you did benefit: an unprecedented Name. Your foresight is to be praised."

Oh, they'd been insulting his friends the whole time. Maybe. He should check to be certain, Hakram had noted it was important.

"By the fools, you mean the Woe," he asked.

"What greater fools are there?" the woman laughed.

So now the list. They were nobles, since no one else would be allowed here. They weren't visibly being forced to speak to him.

There'd be no collateral damage to innocents. Was it legal? Probably. Callow had some kind of treason law about insulting the queen, didn't it? It counted.

"Right," Hierophant smiled, and raised his hand. "Boil."

Casting without proper incantation had become much easier since his transition, save when he was molding miracles. As a rule Trismegistan sorcery put greater emphasis on precise manipulation of magical energies than the use of mediums like incantations and runes – they were a crutch to visualize and measure, not a requirement – but that same precision made it difficult to actually dispense with those mediums. The acceptable margin of error before collapse in a Trismegistan spell formula was barely a tenth of what it would be in a Petronian equivalent or, Gods forbid, a Jaquinite one. As a result Trismegistan sorcery usually produced superior results for inferior costs while serving the same purpose, but also required greater skill and longer practice from of the mage using it. The portion of practitioners that could transcend those limitations was small, and even among those such transcendence was usually reserved for a few especially well-studied formulas. It was possible to lower the bar so badly any blunderer could tinker with the spell, of course, as the Legions had done with their own arcane roster. But only at the expense of every single boon save flexibility.

Fortunately, Masego's sensitivity to the forces he manipulated through his will had greatly increased since transition. He'd initially been disinclined to rely on anything as fallible as senses when using magic, but he'd overcome that reluctance after proving he could reproduce that sensitivity through adjusted measuring tools. Indeed, he'd since come to theorize that aside from magical capacity – one's inborn talent to use sorcery – there might be a second, more discreet aspect to the Gift. Sensitivity to those same energies, which he'd ventured on parchment might be what distinguished mages capable of using High Arcana from those who could not even after a lifetime of dedicated study. It might even finally solve the mystery of why the Taghreb produced fewer mages than Soninke stock but a proportionally higher amount of mages capable of using the higher mysteries. Many Taghreb lines had twined with creatures, after all, wick were said to have a natural grasp of magic humans did not. The paired screams of the twins as their blood boiled in their veins and began to waft out through their eyes and nostrils shook him out of his thoughts. Ah, yes, that was still happening.

The spell had been crude, its formula still fresh and untested, but being able to affect blood without a sympathetic link or a ritual whose sheer power would make the matter irrelevant was excitingly new grounds for him. He paid close attention to the rate at which their blood evaporated, committing the numbers to memory, and was rather irked when they both only died after ten heartbeats. Much too long, it meant part of the heat was being dispersed into the broader body. He'd have to scrap the entire containment vector, and since that was tied into almost every part of the formula that effectively meant scrapping the entire spell and starting from scratch.

"Masego."

Papa's tone was chiding, and there had been a time where that would have given Hierophant pause. Before Keter. Before he'd seen Tikoloshe walk the grounds of what had become the single most significant magical phenomenon in Calernian history without speaking a single word of it to his son. Much had been cast into doubt by that revelation. If Papa had been human there might have been uncertainty about his motivations, but unlike humans devils were... direct. Unequivocal in what drove them. There were only two reasons that Tikoloshe would have failed to fulfill Masego's desire when he so easily could, and both were ugly things. So which are you, father – a stranger or a slave? Either was betrayal, if owned by different pair of hands.

"Father," he simply replied.

"That was unwise," Tikoloshe said, eyeing the corpses.

Masego frowned.

"It would have been better to test the spell on animals beforehand," he conceded. "But pigs are expensive and the physiological differences really are rather minor."

Whispers spread across the hall in the wake of his words. No doubt they were agreeing with him. Apes were even better for experimentation, admittedly, but those could only be obtained from across the Tyrian Sea and they were ridiculously costly to import. Even the small ones that didn't know any tricks. He'd asked around. Well, asked Vivienne to, which was basically the same thing. Papa sighed. More than a few nobles flushed at the sight.

"That is not what I meant," he said. "You should apologize to High Lord Idriss for disrupting his reception."

Masego's brow rose. Wasn't it already enough that he hadn't killed the man? He'd been very courteous so far.

"Will he apologize for them insulting my friends?" he asked peevishly.

"He is not responsible for their words," Tikoloshe said.

"Then it has nothing to do with him" Masego said.

"Mas -"

"Enough," Hierophant hissed. "Father asked for my help and so I came, but my patience is running thin. I agreed to lend my time, not waste it. There is work to do, and none of it takes place here."

He could be at the Observatory right now, plumbing the depths of a hundred Hells. He could be with Catherine, taking apart drow sorcery and learning from ancient secrets. He could be picking at the minds of the Wild Hunt to understand what set them apart from the other fae but no, instead he was at court, talking with blind children who – Masego took a deep breath. He would not get angry. Not over this, when the true source of his anger was other. He would be fair, and hold only the responsible to account. They'd shown him. It was better when the world worked that way. And when it didn't? You just had to make it.

"Enjoy court, Father," he said through gritted teeth. "I am done with it."

—

Wekesa watch his son stride away in a swirl of dark robes, leaving silence behind him. A few heartbeats and then whispers bloomed, even as servants took away the corpses of the Serali twins. Their father was stuck halfway between terrified and furious, his little gamble to curry favour having proved rather costly. But this was court, in the end, and so the conversations moved on. Lord Hajal Serali's blunder would be the talk of the city for a few weeks and that would be the end of it. The man was not so influential as to risk taking revenge on a Named, not unless Alaya tacitly allowed it. Which she would not. Warlock had set this as a condition with his old friend before sending for Masego. So long as certain boundaries were observed, the Eyes would disappear anyone even considering raising a hand at his son. Tikoloshe returned to his side, and decades of marriage told him his husband was feeling rather irritated even if his face betrayed none of it. The two of them were given a wide berth after they reunited, the implicit courtesy nothing less than his due. He and his son were the only thing that stood between Thalassina and a sack, after all. Idriss might get snippy about the dead bodies, but he would not forget that.

Wekesa was not above simply leaving if he felt like it, and had made that much abundantly clear.

He was here on Alaya's behalf, not the High Lord's, and she knew better than to ask to tedious a favour of him. Wekesa had not thrown away his hours teaching imbeciles when Amadeus had requested it, and he would not do the same fighting this chore of war if he had to watch for knives aimed at his family's back. Not even for a single battle, however interesting in nature. If Procer and its crusading fellow insisted on testing the Wasteland he'd discipline them appropriately, but what did he care if Nok and Thalassina burned? He had no laboratories or correspondents in either: there was nothing to defend. If Kahtan or Okoro were on the line it would be a different story, but they were too far inland to be threatened by Ashuran raids. Tikoloshe came to stand by his side, almost close enough to touch, and Wekesa idly brushed his fingers against the rune-carved jewels on his belt. The contamination ward bubbled out a heartbeat later.

"He used to be such an obedient child," his husband mourned.

"He's an adult now," Wekesa said. "With the opinions of one. He won't always agree with us. He's no longer the little boy that used to chase the hem of our robes."

The incubus made a moue. It was a wonder, Warlock thought, that even after all these years the sight of that could cause a low stir of desire in his belly. He'd never taken another lover after wedding his husband – how could any mortal man be half as good in bed as a creature born of desire itself? – and still it amazed him he'd never felt the need to seek a partner outside their marriage. It wasn't like Tikoloshe would have minded, though he'd certainly gotten more possessive over the years. Love, Wekesa thought, was a strange thing. For what else could it be he felt, when other desires failed to move him?

"In public, 'Kesa?" Tikoloshe said, sounding flattered.

"It's nothing they've not speculated about," he replied, sliding a hand around his husband's firm waist and bringing him close for a kiss.

There was little chaste about it, but they did not linger.

"You're attempting to distract me," Tikoloshe sighed. "It won't work. This is more than growing up, Wekesa. He is angry with us. Which one I cannot tell, but-"

"I know," Warlock admitted. "And while I dislike Foundling, she has done wonders to keep him even-keeled. He would not act so sullen without a reason."

Amadeus' apprentice might be a little twerp as arrogant as she was ignorant, but she'd done right by his son. He'd seriously considered asking Alaya to keep her alive just for how she benefited Masego, but the situation was too far gone. It'd become a mess between her and Amadeus, and while those were rare they also tended to get exceedingly nasty. He should have adopted some orphan years ago and settled the paternal urge, Wekesa thought. More than once he'd hinted fatherhood might do his friend some good. He and Alaya acted like they were married half the time, a shared child would only have served to channel that tension more productively.

"Then he's learned something that angered him," Tikoloshe said.
"While he was abroad."

And there was the trouble, for while Wekesa knew neither of them had been perfect fathers he was genuinely surprised anything he'd done would wound his son this way. He should have spent more time with Masego when he was younger, instead of studying. That was one of his great regrets, for he'd not truly understood back then that those days would never come again. All those he cared about, save for his husband, were Named. He'd gotten in the habit of treating long partings as being of little import. Yet where would his son have learned to resent this? None of the Woe were close to their parents according to the reports, save for the Thief, and her father hadn't even known she was moonlighting as an apprentice to a member of the Guild of Thieves. Trust and closeness could be different matters, true, but it was still baffling.

"I cannot think of what would have led to this," Warlock admitted.

"He's been to Keter," Tikoloshe murmured.

"That matter is long buried," Wekesa frowned.

"The Dead King-"

"Would not deign to indulge in games with a mortal mage, however talented," Warlock flatly stated.

"Then it might have been the journey," his husband replied.

Wekesa did not contradict him. The reflection of Keter in Arcadia must be highly perilous, but he knew little of it. Hye had passed through there once, but getting anything useful out of her was near impossible. It wasn't that she lied. That would have been of some use, as even boasts and exaggerations would hold a kernel of truth. No, it was the opposite: she was concise to the point of uselessness. I walked through Arcadia and then cut my way out and then I beat up dead people all the way to Hell. That was the whole sum of how she'd described her experience assaulting Keter through the realm of the fae, to Warlock's despair. Trying to tease more information out of her inevitably ran into the wall of Ranger genuinely believing she'd given him all she needed to and getting irritated if he implied otherwise.

"Perhaps a conversation is in order," Wekesa finally said.

"Perhaps," his husband gently mocked.

He grimaced. It would be a delicate matter to approach, even more so if it proved to be a correct guess. Warlock was not unaware that decades of being able to dictate on what terms he interacted with almost everyone else had atrophied some his former social finesse. On the other side of the room, Lady Gharim dropped to the floor screaming and clawing at her face. Her veins had turned dark, thick with rot. Sloppy spellwork.

"People," the Warlock said loudly enough his voice could be heard by all attendees, "should be aware of their own limitations."

His gaze lingered on the dead woman, who might still be alive if she hadn't tried her hand at an eavesdropping spell. Contamination wards were not forgiving.

"I believe we will take our leave, High Lord Idriss," Tikoloshe smiled. "And let that particular reminder linger in our absence."

The hall was silent, at least for now. Whispers would resume as soon as they left.

It was not the first death of the night, and it would not be the last.

---

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Or else I'll...

Through you into Arcadia until you do!

DroughtBringer

Throw*

Storming phone autocorrect.

soonnandnaanssoon

Hmm you could also be thorough with someone until Arcadia comes

stevenneiman

They'd be stuck there a while. Place has terrible cell reception and I haven't been able to find any ISPs that offer service out there. Apparently their accountants haven't figured out how to bill for the relative time or something.

Yotz

On the general account of "what to do in the case 'or else'", oathkeeping, and the season of Pooptober – let me axe you a question:

NZPIEFACE

Been waiting for this one.

And does EE always upload at this time of the day?

Byzantine

Yes, Midnight EST Monday, Wednesday, Friday.

Sometimes a few minutes late if something sticks up.

TeK

Yeap.

taliesinskye

The upload time is midnight on the East coast of the US, so that's probably why.

NZPIEFACE

5PM for me, so nice.

Snowfire1224

I get it around 9:30 the day before

erraticerrata

Round three of the character popularity contest, Tyrant vs Nauk!
Link to vote below.

[https://www.strawpoll.me/16716277?
fbclid=IwAR03RBPam5PwLy1DwBaIywoqies7I6Zz6c72jNnHcpBu7FVmw5N\_DLYMEY4](https://www.strawpoll.me/16716277?fbclid=IwAR03RBPam5PwLy1DwBaIywoqies7I6Zz6c72jNnHcpBu7FVmw5N_DLYMEY4)

HandyCapped

Yup, this was the most difficult vote yet. Possibly the only really difficult one along with the second and third last ones in the first round.

NZPIEFACE

btw, what's nauk doing right now in the story? I think he just fell off the radar after the Fae campaign.

darkening

He's an officer in the army still now that he's healed, but most of his personality got burned away and left him cold and savage and just not really the same person.

daegone823

Please give Hakram Berserker Name he has earned it, born from fire, betrayed by his friends, all that is left is rage and serving the Queen. He could almost inherit the Captain name, since it is a Paresi name. Serving a master, relinquishing control over one self to a much more sinister force

goliath1303

I know it's late to comment, but I'm gonna do it anyways lol. I'm trait not expecting you to answer, but I am hoping somebody else who comes along will be able to answer my question. First off though, I'm assuming you meant Nauk since Hakram already has a Name, he almost died from fire before being naked by Warlock, and he's a berserker. Either way though, what friends betrayed him? I don't remember Nauk(Or Hakram.) ever being betrayed, especially by friends. Please, somebody point out what, if anything, I missed.

Yavandir

The most difficult one will be Robber vs Assassin

TeK

Not really much of a choice. Tyrant is best girl, hands down.

letouriste

i'm surprised Nauk don't get more votes. Guys, you already forgot him? i mean, this is one of the most interesting character in this story 🙄 my favourite greenskin after robber actually (even now).

knockoffnikolai

Speaking as a Tyrant voter: You're not wrong. But while I have not forgotten Nauk, I giggle uncontrollably every time Tyrant does something. So my vote is spoken for.

Dainpdf

He's not nearly as entertaining. And his arsenic is not nearly as good. Also, he has yet to pull a fast one over the Bard.

caoimhinh

When I saw Interlude, I hoped to see more of Black, but well, this is also an interesting development worth reading about.

JackbeThimble

I fear we may never see more of Black again.

caoimhinh

It's possible, but he is far too important to be simply discarded like that.

I am of the opinion he was using some trick when the Gray Pilgrim found him, it's strange how Pilgrim couldn't feel Black's Name on him.

He was also surrounded by an army of dead legionaries from which he could use the corpses, that battle could go in many ways.

Also, if Black died Catherine would be the first one to notice due to her connection with the Name, she might be very disconnected from the Squire Name, but she still holds it, so the Name of Black Knight would come to her if Amadeus died.

DroughtBringer

Cat commented when she was speaking with The Dwarven Herald that Black doesn't let any of his Name out.

JackbeThimble

In reverse order:

1) Catherine definitely does not hold the Squire Name as has been explicitly stated multiple times, it's been years since she's had anything resembling name dreams or anything else and she actively renounced the Black Knight name already.

2) Black was never particularly good at Necromancy, rarely using it in combat and even if he was as good as Akua, Tariq would almost certainly be the perfect counter to undead.

There are avenues that Black could have used to do some serious damage going down- he might have rigged the ship with Goblinfire or possibly used Ranker to spread the Pilgrim's plague into a Proceran population center- but it's difficult to think of any that would allow him to actually defeat Pilgrim, Saint and half a dozen other heroes in combat, and if he had the means to escape he presumably could have done so before they'd arrived at the fleet. Black's own last words indicate that he does not expect to survive.

3) Black had been abusing his name pretty badly, including temporarily discarding it during the battle in the Red Flower Vales and running himself ragged on the march. It's true that there are many possible interesting reasons why Pilgrim couldn't feel Black's Name but at this point it seems unlikely that the Pilgrim would fall for it if this was simply a ruse.

Javvies

1) Cat definitely does hold the Name of Squire, or rather, what's left of it. Between Winter and two rejected/failed/broken Transitions from Squire, the Name is pretty much down to the gnawed on bones.

2) Black is the one who taught Cat Name-based necromancy. Akua was not a necromancer specialist, though she was doubtlessly proficient at it. She had minions for that. Though, true, undead are of limited value against a Band of Heroes in a direct engagement, and Black will have had something else up his sleeve.

3) Pilgrim might not have been looking at Black himself that hard – I think he'd expect something other than Black just waiting for them to have a straight fight with no tricks. Besides, one of Black's strengths is working with time to plan – whatever you think you see, something else is going on too. Akua never does anything for one reason; Black never has just one plan or one reason.

Dainpdf

She has a loose grip on it, yeah. I assume once she transitions or gets a new Name it will be free to be whole again with a new holder.

JackbeThimble

Black taught Cat how to raise and control a single zombie at a time. As far as I know we've never seen him animate more than one or two corpses at a single time and I don't recall ever seeing him actually use undead personally combat except as a mount. Even if he did have the skill and wherewithal to animate and control several hundred or thousand undead most of what we've seen indicates a) he probably doesn't have the raw power to do so and b) considering the opposition he's facing that would probably be an extremely inefficient use of his resources.

nick012000

Black used undead in his fight with Hanno. It was basically Cat's zombie bomb trick, but with human corpses instead of dead goats.

caoimhinh

1) It has always been said that Cat still holds the Name Squire, but she "holds it by a thread" or that "the Name is gnawed on bones", she has mutilated it due to her transformation into an incomplete Fae, right now she is a contradictory existence, a Villain doing Hero works, a human wielding Fae powers and holding a Fairy Title, and also being Named without having a full connection to her Name.

2) Black has been shown using Necromancy in all his fights, manipulating undead to disguise as himself, to attack at range, to pretend to be a hostage and actually having bombs inside, etc. so while he might not have the power to use hundreds and thousands at the same time, he definitely can use them and can even see through their eyes. Also, he doesn't need to defeat the heroes there, he just needs to escape/survive, and for that purpose there are many things he could do.

3) It might be a meat puppet like last time, or it could be that Black is exhausted from using the corpses to spread the plague on Procer, we don't know yet what plan he has prepared. Black didn't lose his name temporarily, he ran out of power like a mage running out of mana for spells.

Bhale

From Pilgrims perspective, I think Black is worth more alive than dead. Well, alive but captured rather. He's seen Catherine's modus operandi and could be expecting that she'd try to negotiate once more. What better way to swing the pendulum your way during the negotiations than having something your opponent desperately wants.

From Black's perspective, after reading your comment, I think he got inspired by Catherine losing her Name. It doesn't make much sense to me that Black would feel that much weaker by using his name. If anything, he should feel more powerful. After all, he's made it clear as far as the first book he's not exactly a typical Black Knight and seeing what happened to Catherine when she contradicted her name, it stands to reason Black has weak powers only because he isn't using them correctly. He was during his march, so why would he feel weaker?

I believe he was intentionally leading them into a trap. I mean, what else could you expect but death when you march all over Procer without any plan or reinforcements. Maybe he wasn't aware what kind of a trap it was, but it didn't really matter. A Black Knight leading his army into what he knew would be death? Why, that's reason enough to strip him off his Name. And when his army died, his Name died therefore with it, making him nameless. It could be what he referred to when he said he “wanted to trick the heaven’s dice”.

naturalnuke

Oh shit I didn’t think about that. Huh.

caoimhinh

Now, that’s an interesting theory, I’m not sure how it could work but if he loses and gains his Name again he’s going to become OP.

FactualInsanity

Not only did Pilgrim not feel a Name on Black, the text itself referred to him as Amadeus of the Green Stretch, instead of Black Knight for the first time in ever. I think that’s pretty telling.

Don’t get me wrong, I want him to be alive, but I highly doubt it. Realistically the best we could hope for, in my opinion anyway, is that he managed to leave a mark after all.

And I’m curious where you got that about Catherine becoming Black Knight if he dies. Or her still holding the Squire Name, even.

Javvies

Carry still holds the Name of Squire, or rather, what’s left of it.

Between Winter and two rejected/failed/broken Transitions from Squire, the Name is basically down to the gnawed on bones.

Javvies

*Cat, not Carry, damned autocomplete/correct.

FactualInsanity

I know that Cat’s fae powers are heavily influenced by her preceeding Name powers, but I can’t recall any bit of text that actually explicitly states she still has a Name. Given that she’s more or less an actual fae now and it was heavily implied that fae can’t be Named, because fae are more or less anthropomorphic Names themselves, I just don’t see it.

I’m open to being wrong, but I don’t think there’s enough actual evidence to suggest that I am. 🙄

Javvies

It hasn't been mentioned in text recently, but the last time it was talked about, it was after Cat was the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, and she described her Name of Squire as being gnawed on bones. Slightly different wording of course.

And at one point in the comments – no idea where offhand – EE dropped some Word Of Author, and mentioned the two failed/rejected/broken Transitions from Squire having damaged/ weakened the Name of Squire in Cat.

Cat having the Name of Squire is really more of a technicality at this point, since she's using her Winter and Fae powers for basically everything the Name could have given her and more.

Basically, the only thing that the Name still gives her is that she has the Name and so nobody else can become the Squire until/unless she dies, gets a new Name, or otherwise releases her possession of the Name of Squire. Probably makes opening the door to a new Name a little easier than it would be for a non-Named.

FactualInsanity

Fair enough on the WoE. I have only really paid attention to comments after catching up with the story and that was pretty recently chapter-wise.

Rook

I think it's also up for debate whether she's still considered the successor of the Black Knight. Which is imo an entirely different issue than whether she's still the successor of Amadeus of the green stretch.

In many senses she's still Amadeus's successor, regardless how miffed she is at him right now. Stabbing someone once does little to change that when you do it while declaring you still love them as a kind of surrogate parent, and continue to derive nearly all your fundamental tactics and strategies from their teachings. Said stabbee didn't really mind it too much in the first place, which further takes wind out of the dramatic sails.

Her role in the the story though, has shifted far enough away from being the Squire of the Black Knight that it's highly debatable whether that's still the transition. Or if there even will be a transition in the traditional sense. The effect of a major Fae mantle on the process is also pretty poorly understood as well, considering there's zero known precedent for it.

Javvies

When Cat stabbed Black without killing him, she short-circuited the automatic Transition from Squire to Black Knight.

That damaged/weakened the Squire Name in Cat, but it also released Black from the Narrative Doom of having a Chosen Successor/Heir/Student.

Rook

Again, still highly debatable considering her transition was left a hanging thread and how she still holds onto the bones of the Name.

We know for a fact that in extreme circumstances, the Name will readily abandon her if the connection to it is thin and a better candidate exists. It already happened once.

The fact that no one else has claimed or even attempted to claim the Name – despite her relation to it being a bare thread – speaks volumes when discussing whether she's still considered Amadeus' successor in any practical sense.

RanVor

That's untrue. He's been referred to as Amadeus of the Green Stretch before, like right after his "duel" with Hanno for example.

FactualInsanity

I don't remember that. Can you point me to the relevant chapter?

RanVor

It was at the end of the Interlude: Sing We Of Rage. Posting the link on my phone is too much of a bother, but I'm sure you can find it easily enough.

FactualInsanity

Right, I was clearly factually incorrect in my statement, however upon rereading the end of that chapter, I feel like it kind of reinforces my point.

The Interlude refers to him as Amadeus of the Green Stretch at that point, because, as he himself points out a sentence or two after that, the Black Knight fell at the hands of the White Knight. He chose to put most of his Name somewhere else in order to cheat the story. At the end of Queen's Gambit, Declined the implication is the opposite (before going into details about what sort of benefit could be derived from willingly discarding his Name in the face of a whole band of Heroes).

Also, a notable difference is that Sing We Of Rage, shortly refers to him as Black Knight again, whereas Queen's Gambit, Declined closes on him as Amadeus, not Black. The only way I could see him alive, is if for some reason one of the Heroes gets it in their head, that having him as a hostage would be of some use against Cat. Which is a horrible idea on many levels, but would gel nicely with the theory that the Interlude Arc was about the Heroes' fall from grace.

RanVor

There's so much bullshit in this reasoning I can't even. Hakram is referred to as Hakram all the time and nobody screams he's not the Adjutant anymore. The only difference is that Hakram doesn't have a fancy nickname. No, wait, he has. He's obviously losing his Name, so where's the outrage?

FactualInsanity

That is exactly the thing though. Hakram is referred to as Hakram by the text constantly. It is not significant. Black is very rarely referred to as Amadeus, even in dialogue. When the narrative text refers to him with his full name (not Name), literary sense implies that has significance.

RanVor

I dunno, last time it was rather insignificant. Sure, people were freaking out over it like no tomorrow, but it ultimately amounted to nothing. I'm pretty confident it's still the case this time around.

Honestly though, if Black died now, I wouldn't even be sad. I'd be just disappointed. It would be such a waste, still he has so much to do in the plot. This is not even the climax of the storyline of any real importance. It's the middle of an insignificant subplot with little meaning in context of the overall plot. The most dangerous villain of the generation should go out with a bang, not disperse quietly like a fart in the air.

EE has never disappointed me before, and I'm sure as hell he won't do it now.

FactualInsanity

(I didn't even know there was a reply limit.)
I disagree with the first bit. I think it was significant, just not in the way the people that freaked out assumed. It showed how and why his story-screwing worked. (And really given that like I said he's back to being Black Knight within a few sentences at that point, jumping to "ohmigodheslosingName" seems a tad premature.)

I tend to agree that if Black is to remain in the story he has the potential to achieve a lot more, but I take the opposite view on whether he should stay in the story after his meeting with the Pilgrim and his merry bunch under these circumstances. If he had never fallen in the Heroes trap, sure. But he was legitimately outplayed. If he survives this, while implicitly being stripped of everything he usually relies on, it would destroy what was great about his character for me. That he wasn't infallible.

In my opinion, and I can't stress enough that it is simply my opinion, the best "bang" for him would be if the next time Pilgrim is on stage, his pack of Heroes is permanently missing several of them.

RanVor

It's as if you didn't know Black at all. He always knows more than he lets on. The last part of that interlude was from Pilgrim's POV specifically not to show whatever Amadeus might keep in reserve for the occasion. Black comes off as outplayed because Pilgrim assumes him to be. But Pilgrim doesn't really know him, does he?

Anyway, I could be inclined to agree with you if not for the fact that Black's death would leave at least two plotlines much more important than this silly little raid unresolved. It would be bad for the story, and I wholeheartedly believe EE to be beyond this kind of mistakes.

Javvies

Black had the better part of a week to expect inbound Heroes, and to make plans and preparations.

Sure, it looks like they trapped him. But never back a Villain (or any Named, really) into a corner – bad things happen when you do that. Also, Black is really good away making plans and contingencies within contingencies. He had plenty of time to set all kinds of things up.

For that matter, he could have left an avatar to face the Heroes and set off the stocks of goblin munitions, while he took off in a boat and a couple undead oarsmen.

Besides, unless the Heroes somehow beat Black before he even sees it coming, there's goblin munitions to blow up the boat and make sure that there's no body to see, find, and recover – no body and a "certain death/no way somebody could survive being in the middle of that" type event means they aren't dead, just escaped somehow.

The plague was not in Black's plans when he left shore. But he had several days to rework existing plans and to make new ones.

He has plans for the situation he wound up in. And there's no way he's going too go out quietly. Plus, I'm pretty sure he's too important to just get offscreened like Captain, who while likeable, was not personally all that important in her own right.

caoimhinh

FactualInsanity, Black has been called 'Amadeus' and 'Amadeus of the Green Stretch' by the narrative many times before, not as many as 'Black' but still many times, during his conversations with Malicia, during his fight with Hanno, during Catherine's Name Dreams, etc. And it has also been said many times that Catherine still holds the Name of Squire, but not in a significant proportion, she has described it as the Name being "at the bones" and "connected by a thread to her". Remember that Catherine is a singularity in many aspects, a paradox of sorts, as she holds the power of Fae but it's not a Fae, and she holds the Name of Squire without being tied by it, both her soul and the Name are mutilated by her actions, so she is doing what should be impossible.

As for the fight between Black and the Heroes (Pilgrim, Sword Saint, and co) he doesn't need to win, he just needs to survive, and there are many ways that battle could go for it to happen, keep in mind they are in the middle of a river, one of the favorites escape routes in stories along with precipices, and given how Amadeus left in good terms with the villagers while Pilgrim massacred them, Black has a decent chance at twisting things to his favor to at least survive.

Loud Buzzing

@caoimhinh

I mean that's more or less the thing though. Alaya talks to Amadeus, but the Dread Empress talks to the Black Knight. Amadeus is separate from the Black Knight, because Amadeus of Green Stretch basically refers to the kid watching the stars that the Black Knight once was. It's the person behind the role.

RanVor

And there were similar theories back then, too.

maresther23

The other Named that died an understated death was the Ashen Priestess, when Bard used her death to get narrative weight to break Black. Black learned. He may or may not be dead, but his weight is still impacting the story.

Letouriste

I don't believe it one second.
There is too many reasons black can't die right now, storywise.
EE doing so would probably be a mistake

Dainpdf

That's precisely why EE will do it, then consume our tears for sustenance.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm more convinced then ever he's alive. Remember what he said about Warlock himself? If he was dead, he'd know? I think that flows both ways. Warlock and Black appeared to know immediately when Captain was taken out. The fact that Warlock is this chill and acting like his friend is alive means his friend is alive. I'm not saying he's happy, or in anything like a good condition right now, but he's not dead. Which is plausible, Pilgrim asked for his surrender for a reason. You don't take a narrative hijacker like Cat and give her something like a dead father to work with on top of everything else.

RanVor

I thought the same thing. If Black was dead, Wekesa would be flipping his shit right now.

soonnanandnaanssoon

Pros of having two dads besides the overprotective, impossibly intelligent evil mentors ?

Masego is immune to Yo Mama jokes.

Agent J

And is so joyously oblivious that he'll be genuinely confused as to why people would still make them after being informed he doesn't have one.

Antoninjohn

I like how well Mango insulted them without meaning to, the difference between them and pig is too small to really matter

Quite Possibly A Cat

No, he clearly should have tried the spell on a pig first. Gosh, he must have come across as such a villain there. The best part is he was relatively justified. They were enemies, evil and insulting his friends! That's like triple the justification a hero would need.

Vote Masego for hero... umm... what year is it again?

Argentorum

Neither stranger nor slave, Masego. "Parent" is the word you were looking for.

muffin

Papa lied to him. He either couldn't or didn't want to answer.

sengachi

I'm guessing it's the kind of knowledge which the Heavens do not brook being spread, which would have endangered Masego to even know of its existence when he was younger.

Someguy

Maybe Tikoloshe can't remember Keter because he was Bound to forget?

---

Yeah, Masego doesn't take the peculiarities of the situation into account. There could be anything, from the backlash altering the bindings to Tikoloshe making the mistake of crossing into Dead King's domain.

Jane

Three dead, just from bad manners. No wonder Praesi courts are so polite, normally.

Letouriste

Oooooh masego! Thank you so much EE, I needed his pov more I thought.
That was a real treat xD

SpeckofStardust

Those 2 decided to insult a mage's friends to said mage's face...
A mage that had been raised by the a top tier villain.
Lets be honest the pigs are actually intelligent enough to moon a goddam dragon equivalent.

SpeckofStardust

*not moon

TeK

To be fair, his "friends" are just some Callowan untermensch, a Greenskin, and a slave, albeit former.

Javvies

Being fair, they probably assumed that Masego was more like them, ie, traditionally Praesi, than he has ever been in his entire life.
Unfortunately for them, they ran into the ultra literal, socially uninformed and indifferent, probably mildly autistic, and incredibly loyal to his friends and comrades, Masego.

This indicates that they didn't know a damned thing about his longstanding personality traits that would have been apparent at all the Praesi social events he had been dragged to as a child. Somebody failed to do their research before sending the twins in.

Though, he probably wouldn't have killed anyone for talking to him as a child.

Andrew Mitchell

He probably would have killed someone as a child if he could have (and had the desire to).

Decius

It's Praes. The twins had either instructions or encouragement to annoy Masego, from somebody who wanted them dead but couldn't do it themselves for some reason. Or possibly they were just expendable assets being used to find out which buttons work.

Javvies

According to Warlock, they were sent to "curry favour", aka, make friends, with Masego. And that their father blundered in doing so.

RandomFan

Warlock may humor the motions of the court, but I doubt he is the best informed on the matter. He could be right, he could be wrong.

It would not surprise me if this is an example of the folly of youth and nothing more, abet particularly dangerous folly. It would not surprise me if Warlock is correct- I suspect not all praesi have had the chance to observe enough to reach the right conclusions, and it isn't likely to be public knowledge- or shared with potential enemies without cost. It would not surprise me if it was an assassination attempt that succeeded. It could be multiple of the above, even.

Euodiachloris

The Ankh-Morporkian definition of suicide stirs and rears its head, blinking helpfully...

Rup

Thank you for a cheering morning read...as i had no idea..looked it up in the wiki (Ankh ; Discworld)

Euodiachloris

I recommend starting with Small Gods or Pyramids to get a taste of what's what. Then finding a recommended order of reading online for the rough map of the timeline. 😊

Abrakadabra

Eh... Dickworld does nothing for me. Wathever happens is undone by the end of the book, so nothing changes ever on the discworld. After some eleven books I grow bored with it since it went nowhere...

Mental Mouse

Not to mention that Masego himself is considered one of the Woe. So they were insulting him directly, and his friends. Not a survival tactic in Praesi. Especially when his parents are also untouchable, and his friends are out of reach.

Javvies

Ah, Masego, never change.
Only you could get distracted from the fact that you just killed someone before they finished dying.
And consider smiting the city when you leave for Callow.

It seems Warlock doesn't know about Tikoloshe's connections to the origins of the Dead King and the Doom of Keter.
Wonder how he'll react when he finds out.

Hmmm.
Going by Warlock's thoughts, he might not avenge Malicia if Cat managed to take her out before Warlock got involved in that fight, if he bothers to become involved, which he might not, if only for Masego's sake.

Drunken Dwarf

From the text it seems like Warlock does know, but only from what Tikoloshe's told him. And I do agree, seems like Warlock isn't really interested in involving himself with the fight between Malicia and Catherine. For some reason I feel like she is gonna betray him anyways.

Letouriste

The best part is probably they were BOILING from the inside JUST BEFORE him and he still completely forgot about it in two seconds...until the too loud screams comes out and rudely distract him from his superior musing xD

wirelessgrapes

That was a given for the most part, so long as Masego grew under Cat. That was pretty much the stipulation for bringing him. Make sure he doesn't die, and make sure he makes something of himself.

Dainpdf

The Red Skies interlude indicates that he does know. He was told about Tikoloshe's summoning by the Queen of the People of the Wolf. If Masego could get from there to his presence at the Fall, then so could Wekesa.

Soronel Haetir

Warlock was never a supporter of Malicia for her own sake, it was always Black who brought him (and Ranger and maybe even Assassin for that matter) along.

Byzantine

Warlock knows, but I suspect he only knows a bit. I don't think anyone really knows more than a bit. The Gods stamped that knowledge down *hard*.

muffin

Masego's diplomatic skills have increased a lot.

Euodiachloris

His dads are not wrong; the Woe have helped their lad no end. He now quips properly before murder, and everything. Sure, he doesn't quite realise how the wit is witty, but it's a vast improvement of not doing either the quipping or the murder in court at all.

IDKWhoitis

Im really curious about what Warlock would feel about Archer liking Masego. Like would he be chill? Would he find the concept of having Ranger as a co parent in law horrifying?

Like I don't think he would do anything to push for or against the relationship, but I wonder what his opinion of her would be.

JackbeThimble

From what I've seen of Warlock I'm not certain that he would recognize an asexual/platonic relationship as an actual thing. Like not that he would be angry or disapproving or whatever just that he wouldn't understand the concept. This is a guy who can literally only define love as 'I don't want to fuck anyone else'.

WuseMajor

Eh, I think he could get it as "Archer wants to fuck Masego, but Masego isn't interested, which causes her to have some weird behavior."

Andrew Mitchell

Loved this chapter. Brilliant characterisation of Masego when he made sure to check his list before casually biking the couple's blood and using it as a learning opportunity. I laughed out loud.

nick012000

Well, at least now we know that Alaya didn't just send Masego there so that she could have assassins murder him.

Javvies

That was never seriously considered, I think. Any assassination attempt (successful or otherwise) against Masego would have Warlock seriously pissed off and ripping apart souls to find the responsible party and turning the section of Calernia within several miles of them into a brand new lava and hellfire filled crater. And then he'd get brutal. There is no sufficient term to adequately describe the kind of overkill Warlock would unleash on someone for assassinating his son.

Far more likely is some sort of attempt to keep Masego from returning to Callow, the Woe, and Cat. Whether that's by Malicia's hand or Warlock's is still an open option, though nothing here suggests that Warlock is planning anything that could be construed as involving himself in the Cat vs Malicia fight, indeed everything here suggests he wants no part of that particular fight if he can avoid it.

letouriste

Actually, he think the conclusion is obvious (malicia win). He is WAY more concerned about Black vs Malicia

GabrielTosh

Without a stupid amount of story behind you, like already being fated to kill Warlock, whoever kills Masego will be obliterated, possibly including any nearby settlements. The amount of story behind that spell would make even people like Grey Pilgrim stay dead.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm thinking it's an observation of her friendship with Warlock. Whatever Malicia is planning (and it's obvious it involves Cat being dead, since Warlock considered asking her to do otherwise), it's happening reasonably soon, as i doubt a few assassinations of Cats people coordinated to happen at once would be anything more then the opening of her larger plan. Whatever it is, there's enough risk of collateral damage that Masego could end up getting some of it, and/or being an obstacle to it. So, she lets Warlock know it's a good time to have his son be a bit closer to home, and here we are. No fuss, no muss, no insanely powerful forces of magic being aimed at your tower because your childless magic friend doesn't think your friends anymore.

ahd

Alternative hypothesis:

Warlock is too much a friend of Black, therefore Dread Empress Malicia wants him gone, does not want to hit the Warlock and miss the Hierophant lest she get laked, so she has arranged to have both of them in the one ground zero.

Story logic implies both the Warlock and Hierophant will survive, and shortly afterwards Praes will need to build a replacement Tower again.

sugarrollblog

Props to the female twin's attempts at seduction even if it failed. Masego is not a simple man—breasts doesn't have the same effect to him than it would have on other men.

letouriste

no effects you mean. Actually, many men would also not be affected at all. This is a cliché treating men as virgin young boys and don't reflect the reality. Of course there is many people out there liking breasts to an unhealthy degree but they represent just a low percentage of the grown up men. Most would just look out of reflex because the woman put them in evidence and we have an animal part of our brain picking up details when they are moving or put in front. That doesn't mean interest tho.

Dainpdf

Well, honeypots are a thing for a reason... For both sexes, one might add.

Insanenoodlyguy

She wasn't just showing some cleavage. She was very strongly suggesting they go do something alone. She was sending out signals an "average" man would have picked up on. And yes, while most of us keep from becoming drooling morons every time we see a hot girl, a hot girl who's making it very clear she wants to have sex with you? That can leave you a bit more discombobulated.

Mental Mouse

But Masego isn't even close to average. While the word isn't used in-world, he's written with the social deficits and attention issues of a severe autistic. He doesn't seem to have a real-world autistic's usual vulnerability to sensory overload, but I assume that would be easy to deal with via magic, as would many of the other usual "tells".

Metalshop

I love this look at Praesi party life. Really brings home what a society run by villains would truly be like.

"Ah, yes, that was still happening."=My new favorite line.

Redlaw

What make me laugh in this chapter wasn't masebo but how warlock still see cat as the little girl he can easily kill whenever he want

Dainpdf

Gotta remember his specialty is in wards. If any of the current Calamities can put her down it's Warlock.
...that feels like I'm underestimating Assassin and Black.

Redlaw

Neither black nor assassin can kill cat. At least not directly. After all black was never the strongest but those he put down... as for warlock. I don't doubt he could kill the current cat with enough preparation, ward and trap but if he go and underestimated her (like many many dead villain hero drow and fae ).. well he will only live because he is the father of zeke

Dainpdf

Eh. Careful about Black and Assassin. Assassin's whole Name is about killing people, and Black has a history of killing way more powerful people he has no business killing.
As for Warlock, yeah, mages do better with preparation and his kind of magic is especially inclined to it. But if you recall, out of Cat's three most recent losses (controlled at Second Liesse, Pilgrim cutting the portal, getting boxed at Keter), two were at the hands of mages.

Mental Mouse

The portal cut was at best half a loss, but Keter also included Cat getting completely owned by Malicia without even realizing it. That said, she's leveling up in her own story, including picking up an army (unless she loses it in the finale there).

Trebar

"Taylor/Cat? Eh, I can take her"

Dainpdf

I wonder how Catherine would react to Masego's parents (well, parent – we don't get to see inside the devil) thinking she's been a stabilizing influence on him. Enough that Warlock, of all people, would want her to stick around him.

This somewhat flies in the face of that whole "corruption by association" bit... Not by much, of course, since Masego was already deeply associated with the Calamities, but still.

By the way, I 100% expect the finished version of the "Boil" spell being "Twig".

usernamesbco

Warlock is making him attend court, i.e. forcing him to socialize with stupid people playing stupid games for stupid prizes.

Catherine makes him attend family dinners with the Woe, built him an expensive magic playhouse with cool toys so he can better dissect Creation, and gave him minions to help him Do Magic.

I think she'd agree her handbook is more up to date than his.

Snowfire1224

Masego is the best at parties and small talk.

I find it funny that Warlock thinks it would have been good for Black to adopt a child with Malicia to raise platonically. I don't know why but the notion amuses me.

Redlaw

Lol.From a certain view point. Cat is the child of black and malicia is the step mother who try to control the child(cat) her husband(black) had in another marriage

Snowfire1224

So then if Black is the Dad and Malicia the step mom, then practical guide to evil is just a revamped version of Cinderella in which Cat is forced to clean up Malicia's messes with ample amounts of Goblin Fire. Additionally Akua would be the step sister and the Winter King is her Fairy GodMother.

Agent J

What the hell have you done? What dark sorcery did you use that that actually makes some modicum of sense? Monster.

ethericsentinel

It's "fairy godfather." He even tries to make Cat an offer she can't refuse.

Snowfire1224

Took me longer than I should have to get that pun.

Mike E.

And another example of how OP/badass Ranger is:

"I walked through Arcadia and then cut my way out and then I beat up dead people all the way to Hell" That was the whole sum of how she'd described her experience assaulting Keter through the realm of the fae...

burguulkodar

Short summary of Ranger's chapter book 1 or 2...

Actually a previous attempt, since now Arcadia doesn't lead to the inside of Keter (as Cat found out, it leads only up to before the abyssal gates)

crysjal

Masego has a bloody checklist to tick of in order to decide when it's appropriate to kill someone. That's fantastic.

plantsbeans

> The incubus made a moue
What's a "moue"?

HandyCapped

A pout, if i'm not entirely wrong.

Agent J

A petulant pout. So sayeth Professor Google.

Zaver SaintCloud

I'm actually on chapter 25, but wanted to post here in the latest one. Somebody linked this in the Dwarf Fortress reddit, and I just wanted to say how thoroughly I'm enjoying this story. The quotes at the beginning are especially amusing. Any chance there is a handy PDF available?

Thorsten Rapp

"He was here on Alaya's behalf, not the High Lord's, and she knew better than to ask ~~to~~ too tedious a favour of him"

*ahd*

Where. Is. Black?

Rup

..with us..hanging on a Cliff..

Raved Thrad

Power Word: Boil. Not quite Power Word: Kill, but apparently it can be used selectively on multiple targets.

burguulkodar

Awesome chapter of my favorite character, as always.

Letouriste

Masego pov is always such a delight, must be a hell of a work to write it.

Satan

Masego could easily commit just as big of an atrocity as Akua if he thought he could learn something from it. I guess it's hard to hold him to the same standards when he isn't very cunning.

---

Interlude: Dreadful

"And so Sinistra said: 'What we cannot grow we will take by dread, and damnation on all who deny this.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Misfortunes, thirteenth of the Secret Histories of Praes

The Windless Salon was an indulgence.

Not hers, originally, but that of Dread Emperor Sorcerous. The infamous warlock-emperor had been fond of ambitious experiments demonstrating the superiority of Praesi sorcery over all others. His in particular, and he'd never been shy about denting the treasury for his latest fancy. The Salon was one of his earlier projects: an entire floor of the Tower, well above the clouds, made into a single room. The stones of the walls and ceiling were enchanted to make it seem as if it were entirely outdoors, revealing a staggeringly beautiful view in every direction. Nefarious had despised it, for he'd spent the better part of a decade trying to puzzle out its secrets with only failures to show for it. In truth, few save for Sorcerous himself had ever used the Windless Salon. Alaya and her predecessors disliked allowing the lords and ladies of Praes access this far up the Tower, and there was no lack of other wonders within the walls to strike a particular tone when receiving guests. The Empress had, instead, turned Sorcerous' costly vanity into an office of sorts.

The seats and sofas had been removed, saved for her own luxurious cushioned armchair, and the ornate banquet tables had been replaced by two bureaus and a writing desk. Access here was restricted to those she'd given token to, and with good reason. The transparent walls of the Windless Salon had been adorned with a maze of secrets and faces. Painted mosaics representing every Praesi noble of import hung over apparent air, tiles written over in chalk noting their latest schemes and objectives and alliances. Lines had been drawn to connect conspirators and foes, weaving a tapestry of treacheries and interests that spanned the whole of her empire. It was not all exact, of course. Believing this to be untouchable sanctum merely because she had the minds of everyone with access searched at random intervals would have been arrogance. The tiles were incomplete, sometimes incorrect information added to fool a would-be spy. The only complete and truthful version was in Alaya's own mind.

Years of practice meant she had only to close her eyes to see the whole of it, but there was something oddly soothing about seeing the Wasteland's plotting laid bare against the backdrop of Ater's sky. In the last few years, a fresh section had been birthed. A small cluster of names under a chalk-drawn crown. Such a small representation for a handful of people who'd shaken the foundations of Calernia. A half-full cup of wine in hand, Dread Empress Malicia allowed her gaze to linger on the foremost individuals of the Kingdom of Callow. Some names were followed by only sparse writing. Hakram of the Howling Wolves, the Adjutant, remained opaque in intent and motivation despite her best efforts. It was tempting to study the Woe through the lens of what she knew the Calamities to be, but it would be an overly simplistic view. Oh, most of them had ties to the old guard: Masego was Wekesa's own son, the Archer had been the favourite pupil of that rabid dog in Refuge and Catherine had been the only apprentice Amadeus ever took. The Adjutant himself was often dismissed as Captain's legacy in green, which had always amused Malicia greatly.

The boy had more in common with Scribe than he'd ever had with still-mourned Sabah, and even that was overly simplified. His Name, as far as she could tell, had been shaped since inception to serve as shield and empowerment to Catherine Foundling's own role. The Woe were not their predecessors, and that was a shame: Alaya had spent decades learning how best to work with and around the Calamities. Dealing with a younger and cruder version of them would have been mercifully easy. No, instead she'd been forced to learn to navigate an entirely different river of desires and drives. Changeable things, these, especially in individuals so young. The girl who was now called the Black Queen had little in common with the child who'd chased Black's shadow as his Squire. Still, she'd begun to understand the lay of them. Where pressure could be applied for the correct effect. Vivienne Dartwick was the weakest link. Archer had been the obvious guess, but much like Hye the girl was simply too apathetic to be influenced. It was hard to leverage someone who cared about nothing save a few earthly pleasures that essentially any major city on the surface of Calernia could provide.

Thief, however? She was a Callowan nationalist, the kind that kingdom bred by the thousands. That was an old foe to Praesi, one made almost predictable – though no less dangerous for it. People like Vivienne Dartwick had broken Wasteland invasions for a millennium and a half with only two major failures to show for their toil. Patriotism was a set of blinders, Malicia would not speak otherwise, but however narrow the perspective it had proven exceedingly skilled at frustrating Praesi efforts. Fortunately, central tenets of it ran contrary to the kind of nation Catherine was trying to build. The Black Queen had failed to realize, she often thought, how deeply she'd taken after Praesi culture. Callowans tended to think of their own ethnic group and their nation at the same thing, unlike Praesi. The Dread Empire had, since the Declaration, been made up of disparate and often opposed forces. Guiding the refugees from the sack of Nok into Callowan territory had been killing two birds with one stone, in that light.

It eased the pressure of Malicia's own granaries by displacing individuals who would have turned to banditry or rioting if left unfed while simultaneously forcing onto Callow a problem that could not be solved with a sword. Well, she conceded, that was untrue. If Thief and Adjutant had sent in soldiers to slaughter every refugee crossing into the kingdom's territory the flow would have abruptly stopped and there was precious little the Empress could have done about it without loosening her leash on the High Lords – which would be ill-advised, at this juncture. On the other hand, if the Woe were truly that ruthless this would be an entirely different situation. As things stood, Vivienne Dartwick must be chewing on the fundamental conflict between doing something good, namely not slaughtering desperate peasants, and seeing the immediate costs that good action imposed on her countrymen. It would fester, Alaya thought. In her and in the farmers displaced at Catherine's orders. The Black Queen might think of her land as more than the territory of tribes-made-kingdom, but few in even her closest circle shared that view.

The seed had been sown and conflict would grow from it. Enough, Alaya had judged, that it would weaken the fabric of the kingdom without collapsing it. At some point a compromise would be forged that pleased no one, slowly dragging back Catherine Foundling to the position Malicia preferred her in: that of an unpopular but unopposed necessary evil. If that strife could be carried to the heart of the Woe, so much the better. That band of children had already proved they could unmake the designs of empires, if allowed to run rampant. It was a private delight of the Empress that the results of her offensive must have Cordelia Hasenbach a throbbing ulcer.

"And yet," Dread Empress Malicia said, eyeing the walls that were not there.

She sipped at her wine. Beneath Catherine Foundling's own face, a blank space had been made. It was not that the girl's designs were unknown: Malicia was thoroughly well-informed of what was unfolding in the kingdom, despite Amadeus' best efforts. But there was a question, she thought, that must weigh heavy on the mind of every ruler on this continent.

Where the Hells was the Black Queen?

Callow might be somewhat stable, but it was one bad winter away from effective collapse. If Alaya ordered most royal granaries torched, starvation would afflict half the realm after the snows came. And yet, fresh off her failure in Keter, Catherine had disappeared into thin air. The Adjutant and the Thief had been sent back to Laure to settle affairs, but neither had the legitimacy to truly keep things under control. Was it mere negligence? Alaya was self-aware enough to acknowledge she disliked the girl on a personal level, and so was inclined to match perceived mistakes with personality flaws. Yet the Black Queen had proved surprisingly adept at the diplomatic game. Blackmailing the northern crusaders into leaving under treaty instead of risking extermination had been inspired, as had been the request to join the Grand Alliance. Had the First Prince's grasp on Procer been stronger when the offer was made, Hasenbach might actually have gone for it. Not without losing a few feathers in the process, but the First Prince had already proved capable of cold pragmatism when the situation demanded it.

It wouldn't have mattered, in the end. The Dead King would have upended the board regardless. Yet the skill was there, however raw, and it meant the girl had learned. If she was capable of shaping a military campaign so it would lead to the kind of peace she desired, she should be able to recognize Callow without her was a house of cards. Something had forced her to seek another path, and the only true contender for that was what had taken place in Keter. The Black Queen was, at heart, still a soldier. In times of trouble, she would reach out for military force. It was the solution she was best versed in. Her options, however, would be few. The League would refuse out of hand, as the Hierarch was the mad puppet of the Tyrant of Helike – who'd sent her a lovely letter professing eternal friendship but was a man made from a mould rather familiar to Praesi. The Everdark was a mess of primitive warring tribes, effectively impossible to mobilize quickly and highly unpalatable allies regardless, which left only two real options: the Kingdom Under and the fae. Malicia had been made aware that the dwarves were in yet another expansion phase, meaning they would refuse to get involved with surface affairs.

That left the sole remaining Court of Arcadia, to which the Black Queen already had ties.

There was a very real chance, Alaya admitted to herself, that within the next six months a horde of fae would come pouring out of gates after Catherine struck bargain with them. It was madness, of course. Giving their kind stronger foothold on Creation was a blunder all living souls would pay for. But fighting fire with fire was Catherine's signature, and the Dead King's entrance in the melee might very well have been enough to quiet her doubts. Of all the nations currently involved in the Tenth Crusade it was the Empire that would find it easiest to defend against such an incursion, given its heavily warded cities and high number of skilled mages, but Praes was already under assault by the Ashurans. Deep raids into the Wasteland that left the forces of the High Lords untouched could become a catastrophe, and there was no doubt the Black Queen's advisors were learned enough of Praesi affairs to know this even if she herself might not be fully aware. Thalassina, then, had become the crucible on which her reign would be decided. If Ashur could be removed from the equation, an attack on the Empire became a very different affair. Wekesa and his son's preparations were of the highest import.

It might be necessary to arrange a failure to protect Hierophant from vengeful nobles after it took place, even if the consequences would be dire. She'd mull on it. She was fond of the young man, personally, and had found him a breath of fresh air on the few occasions they'd met. He was also, unfortunately, one of the most dangerous war assets of the Kingdom of Callow. A compromise might be possible through Warlock, she thought, who'd certainly prefer his only son be imprisoned for a few years rather than involved in a brutal knife-fight between the Woe and the Empire where death was a real possibility. Wekesa had made it clear he was willing to break a few pots if it meant return to normality would follow. Like her, he knew that disposing of contentious elements would lead to recriminations in the short-term and reconciliation after the storm had passed. It would be the ugliest disagreement they'd had, and one that would taint their relationship for decades, but Alaya was nothing if not patient.

There was no knock on the door. Anyone requiring such announcement would have died to the wards in the hallway. The sound of the steps, though, could allow Malicia to discern the identity of her visitor. The four servants allowed access here had different strides, as did the sole other person with a token.

"Ime," the Empress said, greeting her guest without turning. "An unexpected pleasure."

He spymistress observed the niceties, coming before her to kneel before rising. Not quite as fluidly as she used to, Alaya noticed with grief that half-surprised her. Ime had grown old, though her body's appearance did not betray it. Yet rituals could only accomplish so much, and eventually a cloth stretched too far would snap. It might be twenty years yet before that happened, but it was as inevitable as the sun rising.

"My Empress," Ime said.

She remained standing. There was no other seat here, entirely by design. None save her should be encouraged to linger.

"I take it there has been a fresh report from the Eyes," Malicia said, brow quirked.

Her little retreats into the Windless Salon were, while not exactly forbidden from interruption, not to be lightly trespassed on.

"Our agents in the Principate managed to get urgent news through the scrying relays," the spymistress said, then hesitated. "Lord Black's legions are in full retreat through lands they've already pillaged. The Dominion's armies are in pursuit."

Alaya hid her surprise. She'd believed she'd grasped Maddie's intent when she'd seen what principalities he was targeting – namely, the loudest opposition to Hasenbach in the Highest Assembly. But he should have been heading south or across the lakes, not doubling back. It was the hesitation that gave it away.

"Ime," Alaya said quietly. "Tell me."

"We're not sure what happened," the spymistress admitted. "But there's a town full of corpses where he allegedly stole the Proceran fleet and there's been orders out of Salia to reclaim the barges."

Her mouth, she found, had gone dry.

"He won't have stolen a fleet alone," Alaya said. "The legionaries with him?"

"The orders from Salia did not mention opposition," Ime grimaced. Her stomach clenched.

"I don't believe he's dead, Malicia," her spymistress softly said. "I know it's not much, but Hasenbach has sent people to speak with the shopkeepers on the central avenue of Salia."

Alaya's lips tightened. Her teeth clenched so tightly it felt like they would shatter.

"A parade for the heroes," she forced out. "Celebrating his death."

"A triumph," Ime countered. "As the Miezans once held. Displaying a foe taken prisoner. He would make for a very useful hostage. He has influence with every single force on their eastern front."

"Do not," Malicia quietly said, "coddle me."

"This is my professional opinion," her spymistress assured her. "They have to know that outright killing him would get the Ranger to come out swinging."

She grit her teeth. Unpleasant as it was to her, it was not untrue. The question was if they'd care, given the number of heroes on the field. Hye was dangerous but she was not invincible and her draw with the Queen of Summer had caused her heavy wounds she'd yet to recuperate from.

"Mobilize the Eyes in strength," Alaya said. "I want answers."

Ime's lips thinned.

"My Empress, moving so openly would-"

"I don't care if we have to out every agent in that misbegotten fucking hole they call a country," Alaya hissed. "Find out if he's alive."

Ime nodded slowly and the Empress forced her hands into her lap, where her fingers could not be seen to tremble.

"And pass this along to Wekesa," she added tiredly.

Ime hesitated once more. Alaya's fury spiked, though she mastered it.

"He might leave Thalassina," she said.

"If Maddie's..." she began, then faltered. "Warlock would know. They have arrangements. And he'd know I kept it from him. Besides, whether it is revenge or rescue he will not act until Scribe contacts him. Keep an eye on that, she may know something we don't."

"I will," Ime said.

A heartbeat passed.

"And yet here you stand," Malicia said.

"We must prepare," Ime said, "for all eventualities. If he is truly dead, the balance with Callow has shifted. If he has been captured, perhaps some matters should be considered with a fresh eye."

Calm, she thought. A pond without a single ripple, so they only ever see their own reflection.

"The Callowan situation has changed already, simply with what you've told me," Malicia said. "Get in touch with our envoy in Laure. The full terms of my pact with Keter are to be revealed."

"The initial plan," her spymistress carefully said, "was to wait until the Black Queen's return."

"It also relied on him being a restraining influence against the notion of war on the Empire," Malicia said. "That can no longer be counted on. We need a new guarantee that she won't gate in and burn a few miles of farmland to the ground every time she's provoked."

Ime nodded.

"I know you might be reluctant to explore the full spread of options, if he has been captured," she said. "But it is my duty to speak."

"Then do so," Malicia flatly said.

"If he's jailed in Salia, it might be best to simply leave him there," Ime said. "Temporarily, at least. It would be an opportunity to bring his legions back into the fold, and he can be freed after the situation in the Wasteland is made less volatile."

Malicia forced herself to consider it with cold eyes. While the legions who'd followed Amadeus to the borders and turned back the invasion at the Vales were not exactly in rebellion, it was undeniable they'd acted against her intent. She'd long known that if there ever came a day when call was made on the loyalties of the old guard, it would not be her most of them chose. The urge had always been there to dismiss the issue as a mere theoretical, but a Dread Empress of Praes could not afford that kind of hopeful thinking. She'd had measures in place for decades, telling herself it would no matter if she never used them. She still had not, and would not unless she had no other choice. Yet much could be accomplished by the more mundane leverage was speaking of – presented with a fait accompli after his release, Black would likely be forced to abandoned his most recent designs. Dangerous as he could be, without an army he was just a man.

"No," Alaya said.

"My Empress-"

"I will not repeat myself," she said. "The risks are too high he'll be executed if he's allowed to remain in their grasp for long. He is to be freed at first opportunity."

"You are not thinking about this clearly, Malicia," Ime softly said. "I know you feel like you owe him. I do as well. But there comes a time when debts have to be weighed. A life spared – or saved – is not a life owed."

The laughter that ripped out of her throat was not kind.

"Is that what you think this is?" Alaya mockingly said. "He spared your life after you helped butcher his kin with the Heir's, and because he withheld the blade you understand us."

The spymistress grew stiff in her stance, but did not disagree.

"I wish this were about something as petty as debt," Alaya murmured, knowing it a lie. "How easy that would be."

How could she tell this familiar stranger that they had been one for so long some days she could hardly tell where she began and he ended? Maybe debt could have been the sum of them, if after the civil war he had treated her a figurehead – as was well within his power. If he'd proved himself yet another cage, this one gentler than the last but no less a prison for it. But he'd understood, that it was not comfort or a furious avenger she craved. Kindness, consolation, all the sweets words their tongue could offer. Those things she could have measured and paid back in full. But instead she'd been offered something priceless: a world of endless paths, and someone to walk them with her. Debt? She might as well try to weigh the worth the breath in her lungs, the blood in her veins. She was not Catherine Foundling, to carve out pieces of her own soul at a whim.

"I have your orders, Lady Ime," Malicia spoke into the silence that followed. "See to them."

Her spymistress was not so gauche as to show even the slightest hint of disapproval after being dismissed, though there was no doubt it was there. It did not matter. She had been taught better than to overreach.

"Your Most Dreadful Majesty," Ime said, bowing low.

Her steps whispered out of the room, leaving the Dread Empress of Praes alone with her thoughts. Her carefully woven surroundings seemed mockery now, a reminder that no matter how orderly she made her world chaos would always crawl in through the cracks.

"I warned you," Alaya spoke into the empty salon. "Gods, I warned you. That it was not sustainable, that one day you would make a mistake and that'd be all it took."

And yet she had not acted on it. Because he'd been so sure, because it would have killed the heart of him to be made to sit at her feet. Caged. And he'd won, hadn't he? Again and again and again. As so she'd not spoken the words. She should have. Better to wound him than to sit on the other side of the continent, wondering if his corpse was floating face down in some foreign lake. Mistake, she thought. It was too bitter a word to be called rueful.

"We will survive," said Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name. "You and me and the others. This empire we raised. We will survive this, as we have all other dooms."

But if Cordelia Hasenbach and her pack of pale-clad killers had done it? Oh, she was not seventeen anymore. She was not bleeding from the mouth, incapable of rising as the Sentinels nailed her father to the floor.

If they'd killed him, Alaya would give him an empire for a pyre.

---

*DroughtBringer*

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

I don't need to say it! Do it!

*TeK*

Do what? Please, elaborate.

*greatwyrmgold*

Information Technicians, of course.

erraticerrata

Popularity contest continues: Archer vs Saint. Link to vote below.

<https://www.strawpoll.me/16735751?fbclid=IwAR1YhNZ7GdbFNVi77bF79Z0zs4MxDVIFhkpSUvZ2ti0x7nhivmiWWK3h4Y4>

Dainpdf

The worldly warrior versus the knight templar. Let the games begin!

Dainpdf

And you just know Archer won't let anyone she beats ever live it down.

Someguy

Archer vs Saint still results in Unlimited Blade Works.

---

Saint is more Saber, power-wise.

Jane

Hm. You know, when I first saw the brackets, this was an easy choice, but now that I think about it a bit more, the Saint's vicious drive to purge Evil from the world is kind of endearing in its own way...

luminiousblu

It's endearing only insofar as a first-time D&D player who chose the "stick in the arse" interpretation for his LG Paladin. Yeah, she's more or less on-the-nose Lawful Good, and she's undeniably a pure and good person if you subscribe to objective morality (which remember, this world does). She's just also kind of an ass, especially if you're trying not to go full murderhobo or play a character with some nuance.

Jane

Oh, she'd be unbearable to actually know, but as a "Good" antagonist, she's great; how many other characters can half-gloat as she tells a leader that she's deliberately engineering the sacrifice of their country so that a country more faithful to the ideals of Good can one day take its place?

That kind of zealotry is hard to write well, especially with that sort of jaded edge to it that she has.

boballab

Not really. Saint is a puppet whose strings are easily pulled by the Bard and that mono mania is all there is to her and is the reason Saint got so mad at Cat when she basically called her a cheap Ranger knockoff, because she knows she is a cheap Ranger knockoff. Ranger also has a mono mania but as seen in that interlude where she went to Keter she has a personality to it and you can't use it to puppet master her. In a way I hope they do kill Black just so Ranger, even an injured Ranger, would show up and beat the crap out of Saint.

stevenneiman

Personally, I find her to be kind of a hypocrite. She wouldn't have thrown a fit when Cat compared her to Hye if it wasn't true, and she doesn't have too much more going for her.

Both in and out of meta-narrative I feel like Cat did a wonderful job of stripping her of audience sympathy. All it took was a few words and her own thoughtless response and she went from the mighty and noble champion of Good to a self-righteous bully who isn't even impressive compared the other people Cat's met.

luminiousblu

She's not really a hypocrite when she lives in a world where Good and Evil are very clearly delineated. She's a Good version of Hye (but less fun and probably old and busted unlike the half-elf, who's still fresh and looks like she's still a senior girl in university) – alright, but that doesn't actually bear comparison because the fact that she's a Good version of her is the salient difference.

naturalnuke

The saint of swords is a horrible person. And archer just got shipping, this round isn't even a contest.

stevenneiman

Yeah, this one was the most one-sided so far when I was voting.

caoimhinh

2 Typos found:

– He spymistress observed the niceties should be: The spymistress or Her spymistress.

– Her teeth clenched so tightly it felt like they would shatter should be: clenched so tightly that it felt like they would shatter.

Also, Archer FTW!!

cookiehunter

please change rankers name in chapter 48 in this volume to sacker ranker doesnt make sense

Big Brother

Sacker and Ranker are two different people, I thought.

cookiehunter

yes they are which is why it should be changed because ranker is off with black in Procer and dead as off a few chapters ago

superkeaton

I know I'll lose my vote in this. But I can't help it, I always love a villain.

Agent J

How? The villain's leading by a mile.

smh

Stop teasing us so hard. Fantastic Chapter!!

SMHF

First part of the plan... get captured alive.
The first part never fails.
Yeah this is gonna be fun!

Dainpdf

Black is going to pull a Cat and join the Pilgrim's hero band. ...yeah, it's not in his nature to do that. I just wanted to read about the face the Saint would make at that.

Insanenoodlyguy

Actually, I can kinda see it. I was theorizing before when the whole "redemption" angle was raised that Cat was going to end up the Token evil member in the band of 5 that would form in response to the dead king. But what if it's Black? He's right there after all.

Anon

Well, we know villains don't get capture alive unless they are turning cloak... or if it was part of the plan all along.

Dainpdf

Bit hard for Black to join up when the whole core of the man is to spit in the eyes of the Heavens. Who knows, maybe he sees some way to further defy them from the inside, but I wouldn't bet on it.

Euodiachloris

This is the guy who uses eldritch, Name-wrought shadows to saw at the legs of a chair for a prank.

I can see him pulling something like a more or less genuine attempt at redemption that he'd know full well would be thrown back in his face... all just to make the other side jut steam from their ears and start throwing chairs around. 😊

Dainpdf

Inb4 all those bodies in the barges were rigged with munitions.

Insanenoodlyguy

To be clear, I was envisioning less of the "okay, guess I'll reform" and more of the "So hey, your desperate and clearly about to die, and if you let me out of this cage we both know I'm bound to see this thing through with you. So I'm going to sit here with an evil grin while you reject me till the last moment and oh look, the dead king's army is here and now you are surrounded and everything is on fire and sure I'll make this hasty oath that has no loopholes at all and yep here we go."

Lark

"The Everdark was a mess of primitive warring tribes, effectively impossible to mobilize quickly and highly unpalatable allies regardless, which left only two real options: the Kingdom Under and the fae."

While I am of course heavily biased due to the information I have as a reader, it still seems weird to me that Malicia would dismiss the Drow so quickly, especially as she's aware that the Kingdom Under are expanding *somewhere*. Is this her "one mistake", to match Black's?

Dainpdf

Well, it has been pointed out that expanding into the Everdark makes little sense for the dwarves outside the Keter situation. Very costly, with benefits unlikely to see the light of day in timely manner, and they can just expand in depth (as they probably did in most previous expansion phases). The only reason Ubu and Cat even arrived at why the dwarves were invading the Drow was because they already knew the dwarves were invading, and how.

luminiousblu

The funniest thing, I think, is that Malicia basically is the one who made it possible for Catherine to try negotiating with the Drow in the face of a "bearded apocalypse". The Dead King extended an invitation to Catherine in response to Malicia trying to hammer out a deal with him, and the end result of that is that no matter who got the upper hand, the Dwarves would be on the move.

Someguy

Also, no matter what the moves the Dead King benefits.

Jane

The Drow fundamentally don't understand the concept of binding agreements – they should be impossible to use as allies, at best a sort of living weapon that you point in the direction of your enemy. It's only Cat's Fae nature that makes this possible at all; she's turning conventional wisdom on its head, something that's hard to think around unless you make a deliberate effort to do so.

This setting aside all of the other problems (you need dozens of different agreements normally, most of them haven't been out of the Underdark for centuries, they're badly equipped, their tactics aren't suited for modern armies, etc...) that they present as being effective allies, even if they were to agree.

Really, the Fae would make a much more logical ally, so long as you assume that Cat is willing to invite that much collateral damage, which... Well, she was willing to strike a bargain with the Dead King.

Anonymouse

The Dead King could be more or less controlled, the fae couldn't.

Cold Cyberia

I just want to point out, it's Everdark not Underdark.

mavant

I'm sure Jane is just mixing the two up for the lolth.

*rimshot*

Drunken Dwarf

That is what the Drow are though, at least the very outskirts of the Gloom and those that leave it. No one except the Dead King, the Dwarves, and the Bard know about the sheer amount and quality of power that the Drow are hoarding. As for the Dwarves, well they could be expanding anywhere (even further down) so she can't just assume it's the Everdark.

Quite Possibly A Cat

It makes perfect sense to dismiss the Drow. We as the reader know the Drow have stupid levels of power. But all anyone else has seen is total rubbish. Up until we saw what a real city-tier Sigil holder could do, we thought the Drow were a joke.

I'm not sure what knowing about the dwarven expansion has to do with it. So what if the dwarves are expanding into the drow? Why would that make the drow any more worthwhile to get? They still all suck as far as anyone on the surface knows.

If anything she's underestimating what Winter can do. (Hopefully.) Winter is what allows Catherine to recruit Drow. Without that oath trick Catherine wouldn't be able to get squat from the Drow. The other possibility is Catherine is doing something that's a bad idea. (TM) Which would be really bad.

King Salmon

It's a case of having justified historical bias. Catherine, for all of her experience, is still "fresh" – she considers things other people dismiss out of hand, such as the entry into the Grand Alliance that even Malicia praised. In this case, the Drow being ridiculously hard to control is a self-evident fact. You don't actually consider the Drow a potential ally any more you consider the Chain of Hunger a potential ally in the same way that (to use a historical, real-life example) many civilizations didn't consider the idea of autarky to be anything but a good idea. It's just common sense – the Drow cannot be treated with, so you don't even try.

The Drow are well-known to be both so prone to backstabbing that it's literally what they're known for as well as being so fractured that trying to treat with them would be a lot like trying to treat with "The Celts" as a classical Mediterranean power when you only have access to Iberia. They're also not all that powerful in a fight, so it's a hell of a lot of work for allies both weak and unreliable compared to the Dead King or the Kingdom Under.

The Kingdom Under being in an “expansion phase” could mean many things but the Dwarves themselves did not expect it to be easy or immediate. They intended to drag this war out for decades if not centuries, so Malicia is by conventional wisdom safe in assuming there would be negligible surface results – after all the only actual time we know of where the Kingdom Under’s expansions led to anything at all happening on the surface was when the Goblins got kicked out ages ago, and that time the Goblins only got out because the Kingdom Under decided to ask them nicely first.

I think something else to note is that Malicia and Black have not (to my knowledge) demonstrated their knowledge of Akua’s existence. Malicia saw Akua in disguise but hasn’t shown that she realized who it was, especially since it’s a believable lie – a Duchess of Winter brought along a fae negotiator from Winter, the land of backstabbing and plots, and later summoned the Wild Hunt lead by a former Prince of Winter when she was in a jam. It’s perfectly believable that she managed to get her hands on a fae, and it’s doubtful that Malicia even realizes it’s possible for Akua to have basically become part of Catherine’s Winter mantle if she considered it at all or even realizes Akua hasn’t been crushed into pieces.

The fact that the Diabolist, whose mind games are in my opinion close to or even on Malicia’s level (she effectively opposed Malicia outright, and would’ve won if not for the combination of Catherine and Black, with a terrifically shit hand compared to Malicia), is not only on Catherine’s side but is actively doing her best to help her achieve her goals is a mountain-sized wrench in judging how much negotiating power Catherine has. In Malicia’s eyes, Catherine has Archer and herself, plus maybe a fae or a captured drow. That’s not the most promising picture for a negotiating team or even knowledge of Drow customs and magic. Akua, though? Akua’s been at the game since Catherine was born and she’s good at it. It fixes many of the ‘team’s’ blind spots.

luminousblu

It’s a case of having justified historical bias. Catherine, for all of her experience, is still “fresh” – she considers things other people dismiss out of hand, such as the entry into the Grand Alliance that even Malicia praised. In this case, the Drow being ridiculously hard to control is a self-evident fact. You don’t actually consider the Drow a potential ally any more you consider the Chain of Hunger a potential ally in the same way that (to use a historical, real-life example) many civilizations didn’t consider the idea of autarky to be anything but a good idea. It’s just common sense – the Drow cannot be treated with, so you don’t even try.

The Drow are well-known to be both so prone to backstabbing that it's literally what they're known for as well as being so fractured that trying to treat with them would be a lot like trying to treat with "The Celts" as a classical Mediterranean power when you only have access to Iberia. They're also not all that powerful in a fight, so it's a hell of a lot of work for allies both weak and unreliable compared to the Dead King or the Kingdom Under.

The Kingdom Under being in an "expansion phase" could mean many things but the Dwarves themselves did not expect it to be easy or immediate. They intended to drag this war out for decades if not centuries, so Malicia is by conventional wisdom safe in assuming there would be negligible surface results – after all the only actual time we know of where the Kingdom Under's expansions led to anything at all happening on the surface was when the Goblins got kicked out ages ago, and that time the Goblins only got out because the Kingdom Under decided to ask them nicely first.

I think something else to note is that Malicia and Black have not (to my knowledge) demonstrated their knowledge of Akua's existence. Malicia saw Akua in disguise but hasn't shown that she realized who it was, especially since it's a believable lie – a Duchess of Winter brought along a fae negotiator from Winter, the land of backstabbing and plots, and later summoned the Wild Hunt lead by a former Prince of Winter when she was in a jam. It's perfectly believable that she managed to get her hands on a fae, and it's doubtful that Malicia even realizes it's possible for Akua to have basically become part of Catherine's Winter mantle if she considered it at all or even realizes Akua hasn't been crushed into pieces.

The fact that the Diabolist, whose mind games are in my opinion close to or even on Malicia's level (she effectively opposed Malicia outright, and would've won if not for the combination of Catherine and Black, with a terrifically shit hand compared to Malicia), is not only on Catherine's side but is actively doing her best to help her achieve her goals is a mountain-sized wrench in judging how much negotiating power Catherine has. In Malicia's eyes, Catherine has Archer and herself, plus maybe a fae or a captured drow. That's not the most promising picture for a negotiating team or even knowledge of Drow customs and magic. Akua, though? Akua's been at the game since Catherine was born and she's good at it. It fixes many of the 'team's' blind spots. That, combined with the fact that Catherine is enforcing oaths with Winter (which is hardly something you usually consider) means that she's in a position to do the impossible and make deals with the Drow.

Darkening

To be fair, Malicia could have stopped her early, she just wanted the super weapon, so she let her get away with a lot of stuff and even cleared some obstacles iirc, because she was sure Black could defeat her in the end and acquire it for her. Still, Akua is very talented.

luminiousblu

But isn't that just the thing when it comes to mind games? Malicia miscalculated horribly when it came to Akua. The only reason Black managed to win was because of the Fae incursion that had Catherine made into a pseudodeific being, which was completely out of left field for just about everyone. Hell, even before that, Akua came very, very close to outright claiming Liesse and a Hashmallim's corpse, only defeated because Catherine turned herself into basically a wight to keep going. And unlike Malicia, Akua didn't have the Eyes or Black on her side. Malicia almost got her bacon toasted twice because Akua managed to keep her in the dark of what she was really after and what she was really capable of, and the second time it would've been game over if not for a literal chance occurrence.

Insanenoodlyguy

Worse, she can REFORM (not in a moral sense so much as a practical/tactical one) them. Backstabbing is why you can't get that many drow in the same place doing the same thing... but thanks to Winter Deals, the most powerful Drow are the ones who keep to their words and loyalties. If she starts handing down more Fae titles, that's only going to become more and more the case. They'll think of it much differently than a "moral" culture might, but the end result is the same. If the strongest keep their words and the strongest are what matters (the strongest, Cat, being so absolute that she must always keep her word, and YOU must always keep yours to her or she kills you wherever you are on the spot) then integrity is going to become a sign of strength. If they live long enough, then in a few generations, Lying? Oh hell no you would never lie, you aren't weak! Sure, fae doublespeak and exact wording trickery will become a thing, but that's just being clever. Not on you if you were made to give your word and the other schmuck chose the words poorly.

And once you have cohesion and integrity, you have the bedrock to make them start coordinating and actual tactics can be drilled into them. And as much as the power encourages discord, I'm going to bet an army with night power working together is going to be scary.

luminiousblu

Exactly, in time what will happen is that the culture will reshape itself around the fact that those who keep their words are strong and influential for it, and so honesty is associated with power and prestige. Lying ends up being something you're ashamed to do because it's a sign of the poor and weak, while honesty ends up becoming something children aspire to because all of their folk heroes are honest.

Oshi

The quieter (read deadlier) possibility is once they stop murdering each other at the drop of a hat stories will actually be able to form. The Drow will come closer to what it means to be fae on the material plane without much of the handicaps.

nimelennar

They'll actually be dark elves.

Insanenoodlyguy

Come to think of it, whole thing works into the "integrity = strength" angle as well. Named? People who get great powers from roles. The greatest of winter? The first Sovereign was an ascended name who became something that told even less lies as she gained more power. Drow will want names bad, and narrative will let them get some. More bound to oaths least consequences, more power. It will work exactly how it should work based on this new framework of what it means to be Mighty. We'll probably see them have a flavor of bryonic stories about people tragically having to keep or foolishly breaking their word, if the emphasis holds up.

Probably will make them even more elf like in that Heroes (though also Villians, considering) will be the people that get the most respect. Outsiders on the whole? They have a tendency to lie and break oaths. Won't even have to shift their "all others are near worthless" cultural perception all that much, it'll just go from "no night: weak, less than the lowest elf" to "they lie: weak, they could never hold winter." Named are the exception because their word can be trusted, after all they are strong.

Jago

The Drow had an Empire and an advanced culture, capable to fight the Dwarves and win at least some of the time. Then something or better someone, the Sve, broke it from within.

If the Sve night and knowledge can be recovered probably it will become possible to start reforging it, as that knowledge should include something of how the transfer of night was done without the need of harvesting it from the weak.

I suspect that the real power of the immortals like the Nameless Bard, the Death King, and (probably) the Sve is that they can change the paradigms of a whole culture.

The Bard is probably the one that changed the Blessing to the more constricted Names in Celernia;

the DK completely changed his people to undead and people living in the Serentity;

the Sve broke the Drows;

Cat will create a new paradigm, a nation made of different people. Not a hodgepodge of different nations, but an alloy of them, made stronger by the mixing of the different components.

Byzantine

Yep. Selective pressure is an amazing thing, both genetically and culturally. There is a reason these days we can domesticate foxes in a few decades, while wolves appear to have taken centuries – the right pressure applied the right way and things change amazingly fast.

jonnnney

Well she is not wrong about how long it would take to mobilize them, but Malicia does not yet realize that Catherine can bestow Fae mantles nor does she realize the strength of oaths made to Catherine. The 100+ oath to the kingdom of callow makes that unpalatable allies part a non issue. Honestly, unless the author is being coy, there is a good deal that Malicia doesn't understand about Catherine's control over Winter. She doesn't mention Akua when considering the Woe which means she either doesn't get that her soul is bound to Catherine or thinks that Akua is merely being used as a tool of war rather than a magic expert and political adviser. Heck the fact that she thinks Catherine would need to make a deal with with the combined winter and summer courts in order to get backup shows how ignorant she is of Catherine's abilities as the Last Queen of Winter.

Dainpdf

Interesting. I guess Malicia could get the Start of Darkness if Black is dead. Somehow, although she's already evil and has a tragic backstory.

Even more interesting? In a way, turns out she's actually Amadeus's most loyal follower. Scribe and Captain are also contenders, of course, but this? All of this makes Alaya quite the fan.

It also makes her human. And humans bleed. Seems to me like we'll be seeing the calamities drop in the not too distant future.

Also interesting: Malicia has different opinions from the Hellhound regarding the feasibility of ambushing the Summerholm garrison. Plus, she got outplayed **hard** by Adjutant – who even she can't read, point for Vivi's paranoia – and all it cost him was a hand.

TeK

I don't think she thinks about feasibility of ambushing Summerholm garrison, rather about feasibility of escalating her conflict with Callow.

Dainpdf

She seems very focused on the feasibility of letting High Lords act independently. It's a dangerous thing to rely on, especially in the eyes of someone who craves control as much as she does (plus it would actively wear at all the work she's done to rob the High Lords of agency).

luminiousblu

Hakram is unreadable because, for all of his characterization, his actual goals amount to "Catherine". He's a rare breed of right-hand man where his goals amount to supporting the person he serves. He doesn't have any real ambitions beyond it.

muffin

>>>>

"The Callowan situation has changed already, simply with what you've told me," Malicia said. "Get in touch with our envoy in Laure. The full terms of my pact with Keter are to be revealed."

"The initial plan," her spymistress carefully said, "was to wait until the Black Queen's return."

"It also relied on him being a restraining influence against the notion of war on the Empire," Malicia said. "That can no longer be counted on. We need a new guarantee that she won't gate in and burn a few miles of farmland to the ground every time she's provoked."

<<<<

So, Malicia isn't outright for killing Cat. What was the original plan then?

I don't get it, why is she constantly antagonizing her?

Why was she bleeding Callow an Black forces.

Why the killing of Callow administration?

luminiousblu

Because the best way to keep a place under your control is to make sure it literally cannot oppose you in any meaningful way.

Killing Callow's administration means that it can't be its own power bloc, since it lacks functional talent, while bleeding out "allies" you expect to turn on later is a ploy old as dirt.

Jago

Maybe I read too much into it, but I think she is jealous of Cat, even she doesn't realize it. Cat is taking away some of the affection of Asmodeus and Ayala doesn't know how to react to that, so Malice the Tyrant is acting for her, without realizing that it is a bad way to resolve the problem.

Cold Cyberia

Killing Callow's ruler's class either immobilizes the kingdom, leads to centralization of power which can be toppled with a death of the ruler or to replacement with new people, many of whom will likely be Malicia's agents.

FactualInsanity

I think that's selling him short.
It's not that he has no ambitions beyond supporting Catherine. It's that his ambitions match hers, more or less.
In my opinion anyway.

luminiousblu

Well yeah, but Hakram sees his place at her side, not unlike how Black saw his place, for the longest time, at Alaya's side, or how Scribe sees her place at Black's side. He's not a slavish hanger-on, and he supports Catherine because he agrees with her, but the difference is almost moot – he supports Catherine because of her goals, and her goals are what they are because of who she is. Hakram supports Catherine because of who she is and what that implies.

Insanenoodlyguy

This. And if she ever turns from those goals, he's likely to go Klingon about it, and put them in a situation where they are fighting to the death. Not to kill her, but to have her kill him in such a way that she remembers what she's doing this for. (Coin flip on if he actually dies or if the fight ends with one of them over the other but both of them thinking the same way again).

Stormblessed

I agree with you... Mostly. My disagreement falls that I don't think he supports Catherine's goals unequivocally without any goals of his own, I think he believes in Catherine and believes in his goals and dreams for abetted future. While the might squabble a bit on what that would mean, he takes Catherine's side and position in the end and is most certainly the 'right hand man'.

In a sense, the dread empress can't understand Hakram because she underestimates and dislikes Catherine. Basically, their relationship is similar to the one between her and Black in that they work as a unit. Hakram and Cat's relationship might be best described as a mix between that of Black and Squire and Black and Malacia. In my opinion obviously.

Dainpdf

He does. Remember the night, ages ago, when he swore to follow her. He dreams of a better world, where his people aren't limited by their baser instincts, treated by the other peoples of Calernia as brutes and grunts. Or at least that's what he's said he wants.

Byzantine

And worse the way he does it always leaves you thinking there **has** to be something you are missing. He never does anything for just a single purpose. So obviously his devotion to Catherine can't really be that single minded... right?

grzecho2222

Start of Darkerness

Jane

And this chapter is why I love Malicia's character so dearly; the cold logic hiding behind a dozen different masks, all tied to a character who still fundamentally feels, and cares deeply about the things she wishes to protect.

Incidentally, it's amusing to see her apply that logic to come to a perfectly reasonable conclusion (Cat will go for the Fae – it's her only option, and it would be devastating), and be completely and thoroughly wrong about it (Wait, what do you mean, she was actually able to unify a decent portion of the Drow?). At least she's in the right ballpark? I mean, Cat's less-informed enemies probably think she's off preparing some dire ritual or something...

Dainpdf

I found it interesting that she associated keeping those feelings and loyalties to **not** being Cat – by her own admission, Malicia is biased, but still this says something about what the Black Queen is.

Compare this to the Nauk situation, for example.

Jane

Cat's capacity for self-sacrifice certainly is becoming a legend, isn't it? From the Saint of Swords disgust at what she's done to her own soul, to Malicia's quiet disdain for how she cuts out portions of herself, to Akua's presumption that self-mutilation will be Cat's first resort... She really has quite the reputation, though for different reasons across her various foes.

In many ways, she has more in common with Akua than one would assume – her dream comes before all else. In Akua's case, before the cost to the world, in Cat's case, before the cost to herself.

naturalnuke

I've said it before and I'll say it again. As horrible a person Ubua is, she is a reflection of Cat and the perfect foil. She's Cat if Cat reacted inversely to the way she did.

Dantalian

No one foresaw Cat's deal with the Kingdom Under too. That's probably going to result in a HUGE shift in the balance of power in Calernia.

Oshi

No. The Kingdom Under makes plenty of deal with the surface. This is just one more in a long line of diplomatic maneuvers on the Dwarves part. There is a reason that Malicia knows about the Dwarves expansion after all.

frolamiz

Yes, they made deals with others, but most of them should be limited to "we sell you weapons for x" or "we can't send you mercenaries because we are in a period of expansion".

Cat's deal will be perceived VERY differently when all the member of Hasenbach's alliances are are refused because they are at war with her. There will be a lot of speculations about what is going on between her and the dwarves and how much they are willing to help her. At the very least, refusing to deal with people at war with her will be seen as approving her.

Javvies

Yeah, depending on how long it's been ... Cat seemingly disappearing off the face of the planet should have everybody who knows about it in the Grand Alliance worried. Heck – Malicia's sort of worried, and she thinks she knows what Cat is doing and why. I mean, Malicia's wrong about the who, where, and why, but sort of right on the what.

As far as the Grand Alliance is concerned, Cat's the Archeretic of the East, who dropped a glacial lake on an army, seemingly because she could, can mass produce undead that Holy power is useless against, and disappeared shortly before the Dead King invaded. At best, she's in Keter, at worst, she's up to something else horrific and Evil.

Okay, Cat kind of is up to something horrific and debatably evil, but still, Cat's up to something she thinks is more important than the problems in Callow – nobody on the side of Above is going to think that could possibly be a good thing.

Javvies

Hmmm. That Malicia seems to think that her deal with the Dead King is apparently some sort of counterweight to Cat acting against Praes is not good.

Black captured ... I can see that as being more likely as an offscreen event than him getting killed offscreen.

Going to backfire all kinds of horribly on them when Cat finds out.

For that matter, breaking Black out is something she, the Woe, Scribe, and what's left of the Calamities would be wrong to work together on.

Would not want to be on the wrong side of that group when they're all working together.

Hell, for getting Black back, Malicia might even stop screwing with Cat, at least for a while.

Hah. Cat going to the Drow is something Malicia has discounted, thinking she went to Arcadia and the Fae. That's probably a good thing for Cat.

Malicia, fucking around with Masego/Hierophant is a terrible idea. Imprisoning him is simply a very bad one. Letting him die will end Praesi cities. At best. And that's only if Warlock and Cat don't find out you let Masego get killed, then they'll both turn on you, and that just plain isn't particularly survivable, at least, not in any sort of condition where survival is desirable.

Dainpdf

Malicia stated it herself, she can work around regular debt. Even the "saving Black's hide" kind.

IDKWhoitis

I think in the case of Masego, Warlock would blame her without any proof she did anything. If she failed to protect him, with or without intention, he will be at best neutral in the ensuing shitshow, and at worst will work with Cat to topple the tower. Malica promised she would protect Masego.

caoimhinh

My bet is that "Amadeus Prison Break Arc" will have at least 4 chapters named X person's plan, each showing us the different teams carrying out their plans to rescue Black. It will be interesting to see it play out. I just don't want it to end like the Ace Rescue Arc in One Piece.

Oshi

How did it end (not a One Piece reader) ?

Yeah

Dead ace

Novice

SPOILERS:

Ace, the one they're rescuing, died.

caoimhinh

SPOILERS:

The whole Arc was about Luffy (the MC) and others rushing to rescue his brother Ace who was sentenced to be executed publicly in the Marine Headquarters.

This ended even setting off a war among some of the strongest powerhouses of the world in the Marine HQ, issuing a huge battle involving the top forces of the marines and all divisions of White Beard Pirates.

Luffy even managed to release Ace from the shackles that bound him to the scaffold, but Ace died at the hands of one of the Admirals while protecting Luffy during their escape.

A very sad ending for that arc that made their efforts be in vain and leaving thousands of dead as the aftermath.

grzecho2222

My guess is that Hierarch and Tyrant will save him since he is:

- a) of Common Orgins and tries to change Praes into place where People (institutions) not Lords have power
- b) mad with Kairos and kidnapping him will make everybody go after them (thus creating too many opponents for Fate to choose)
- c) other reason

jonnnney

Reason C with Kairos is always "for the lols"

Mental Mouse

Might end up with Black saying "what do you think you're doing? Aside from messing up my scheme?"

TeK

So, Black is alive, but captured, alledgedly. All theories are once again in the air.

Nice to see Cat's drow gambit is too insane even for Malicia to consider. I guess this is one of the boons that come with it: nobody will expect for you to get drow army, it's like getting elf army as a Hero.

Dylan Tullos

TeK:

Try as I might, I cannot come up with a single reason for the Heroes to capture Black instead of killing him. Leaving him alive means that he can escape or be freed, while dead is dead.

I think there are obvious problems with "so crazy they'll never see it coming", like the fact that the plan is actually so bad that Malicia immediately dismisses it.

Javvies

Because Cat's too good at manipulating stories to hand her the "we killed her mentor" card.

Also, taking Black alive is a huge triumph – and proving it is a huge morale booster.

Plus, they can try to get information out of him if he is alive. Lot harder to do that when he's dead and you don't do necromancy.

Also, Black alive is potential leverage against Cat, the Calamities, and Praes.

Then there's the fact that the Heroes probably don't want to do anything they don't have to do that could pull Ranger into wanting to kill them.

Or ... Black was tricky and surrendered at some point. And Heroes don't/can't kill somebody who had clearly surrendered.

Drunken Dwarf

Not to mention it would officially open the Name spot for the Black Knight. While I doubt they'd expect Cat to take the Name, there is the possibility of another being risen before the Dead King is pushed back.

Jane

...Isn't the "Holding The Beloved Mentor Figure As A Hostage" card even worse, from a Narrative position? Though a bit easier to direct, I guess... I can think of many stories where that's gone horribly wrong, and not very many where it works out well for the hostage-taker. At best, it's setting up a heroic (villainous?) sacrifice on the part of Black that does significant harm to their plans, and puts Cat on a path to greater growth.

Javvies

The "Hostage Mentor" card, while not a good one to give somebody, is less targeted than the "Killed Mentor" card. The "Hostage Mentor" card, will give Cat the most advantage against whomever is actually holding him prisoner.

The "Killed Mentor" card would give Cat an even bigger boost against the very Heroes most likely to be able to stand up to her in a fight, even kill her – namely Saint and Pilgrim, plus the other Heroes involved.

Giving Cat a specific advantage against those who pose the greatest threat to her is not a good plan.

Plus, the "Hostage Mentor" gives them a known point where they can prepare the area against Cat, whereas "Killed Mentor" means she can strike anywhere at any time. Now they can set up against Cat's rescue attempt. Still don't know when, but they'll know where.

Jane

Ah... So you're saying that Pilgrim is setting up Hasenbach to take the fall, while hoping that Black ends up killed during the rescue and they inflict a bit of lasting damage during the attempt. Yes, that would make sense, though I'd still be a bit concerned by the promise of greater growth such plotlines usually enable. Then again, with how strange Cat's arc has grown, who's to say that the plotline would still offer that kind of payoff for her? She's not the Squire anymore, after all.

Javvies

No, Cat still holds the Name of Squire, or, rather, what's left of it. It is in bad shape, down to the gnawed on bones between Winter and two failed/rejected/broken Transitions from Squire, but she still has it.

Might not be Pilgrim intentionally setting up Hasenbach – from what we've seen of him, he appears to want to protect the status quo, rather than burn everything and start over like Laurence.

Pilgrim might be using the captured Black as bait and/or leverage against Cat, the Woe, and the rest of the Calamities – if they want Black back, they have to play into his hands, either going after where he's being held, or trying to cut a deal. If they try to break him out, they're walking into a trap, if they try to cut a deal, it's going to be expensive.

Alternatively, if that don't try to get Black back, that's going to cause divisions and gut morale amongst their forces. The Legions would not be happy about Black being left in Proceran/Hero hands, and decidedly disappointed with those responsible for making that decision. Could cause a serious problem.

Lot of it depends on what actually happened to result in Black being captured. And on whether Black captured is part of a Hero's plan, part of Black's plan, or some fluke that just happened.

We don't know enough, frankly, to do much speculating about what's going on with Black presumably being captured.

caoimhinh

It works if you don't look at it as "the hostage mentor" but rather "the villain sentenced to prison".

Keep in mind there are narratives that overlap with each other, and the 2 sides from a story might be very different while telling the same tale.

Jane

But this conversation line was concerned with what Stories this would enable Cat to take advantage of, on the premise that Cat would deliberately manipulate the Narrative to her advantage; how Pilgrim (or other Heroes) would represent the situation and manipulate it to their advantage is a side concern to what Cat would attempt.

Though I'd note that "The Villain Sentenced to Prison" can all too often be reframed as "Sealed Evil in a Can", and we all know how that ends – with the Dead King on their doorstep, it's unlikely that such a seed would sprout, but how many stories begin with a Villain breaking out of prison, exactly?

Yotz

One thing they should be especially careful with in the case of Black's imprisoning, is the place. I mean, if you throwing someone in the local analogue of Elba or, Gods forbid, Château d'If – you simply asking for it at this point.

caoimhinh

Yes, but also many stories for a villain end in him being captured, deprived of power and ending life in prison, it's also stronger than the "rescue the imprisoned mentor" narrative because it's an end of narrative not the plot of one AND because Cat is a villain, not a Heroine fighting to rescue her teacher who is held as hostage.

Of course, we the readers know that it can horribly backfire for Pilgrim and co. since Cat has a knack for bending narrative in her favor, but Pilgrim might not know that or rather, he might think he can outsmart her in this, as have been his attitude when facing her during the Northern Campaign and the peace treaty; the bit of insight we got from him when he planned the plague trap against Black also shows us he believes himself to be above the others in the knowledge of narrative, such arrogance will kill him when facing off against Catherine.

SilentWatcher

i dont think pilgrim would do such a foolish mistake. it could be "it was a trap all along" they must expect the calamities to rescue him. Even malicia is now emotional in her decision making.

Even crazier, maybe Black planned to get captured, because he is a weakness of Malicia

Dylan Tullos

Javvies:

You know what would be good for morale? Killing Black and displaying his body. That would be great for morale. The Carrion Lord would be dead and gone, the most feared Villain alive would be vanquished, and all Good people could sleep soundly in the knowledge that he was never coming back.

It would be less great for morale to capture Black and have the Calamities break him out a week later. However nice it might be in theory to have him as a hostage, there is no jail anywhere that could keep him safely.

Grey Pilgrim is allowed to use a plague to kill innocent villagers. He's allowed to smother his own nephew with a pillow. His Choir obviously isn't going to care if he kills a Villain after they surrender.

The Saint of Swords did not strike me as the kind of woman who refuses to kill Villains because she's scared. Heroes die as part of their job, and there's no better way to go out than as a result of killing the worst Villain since Triumphant.

Javvies

If he's not alive, what proves it was actually Black's body? Remember, he's relatively unassuming, and not at all like what anybody thinks of when they think about him. Plus, he's Duni, and so is light skinned like a Callowan (and Proceran?), not the stereotypical darker skinned Praesi. The average person would just assume they don't actually have the dreaded Praesi Black Knight.

Plus, as noted, while he is alive, no one else, such as Cat, can pick up the Name of Black Knight. As a prisoner, one of the few standard Names available to Praes is off the board and staying off.

Dylan Tullos

Javvies:

The benefit of killing Black is that Black will be dead. This is an advantage that does not go away or lessen over time.

The benefits to taking Black prisoner are that he can't fight you and that your morale improves. These advantages can go away in five seconds when the Calamities arrive to break him out. Taking the Black Knight off the board only helps you if the enemy can't bring him back.

It's better to take a permanent win over a temporary boost. As for the danger of another Black Knight, that Black Knight would be a rookie, without Black's decades of experience as a Hero killer, his skill as a general, or his relationship with the Calamities. Heroes aren't scared of a random Black Knight, like the dozens or hundreds who have fallen and failed; they're scared of Amadeus of the Green Stretch, who actually succeeded in conquering Callow. Killing him is worth any cost, and failing to do so is an act of pure idiocy that leaves Evil's most dangerous general to live and fight another day.

Javvies

The Calamities showing up to break Black out of prison is them showing up on ground that should be a place chosen and prepared to trap and kill them. I don't know about you, but fighting the Calamities at a place of my choosing that I've prepared to have them, even if I don't have much control over the timing, sounds like a better idea than letting them choose the time and place, far less digging them out of Praes. And you can control the timing some – announce a date for an execution or trial, public or otherwise, or transfer to a place of execution or trial.

Also, it is within the realm of possibility that killing Black would free his soul to get installed into someone else. Nermcromantic practices are the realm of Evil, after all.

Sure, a new Black Knight won't be Amadeus, but it could easily be Cat, as far as the Heroes know, and that would just be a disaster. Or maybe it's somebody else – someone whose identity and capabilities are unknown. It could easily be someone more dangerous in a fight than Amadeus – probably would be, in fact.

caoimhinh

Yeah, they probably mean to use him as a temporal prisoner and execute him in a later date.

That would give them the benefits of:

- boosting their own morale while damaging the enemy's morale
- sowing hesitation, unrest, and tension between their enemies (Praes, Malicia, Cat, the Calamities, the legions, etc) because every faction will react differently
- gaining some time before the next offensive, because while it can be expected that the many factions in Praes and Callow's side would join hands to break him out, they won't do it immediately.

Of course, it is a risk, but Black can be contained temporarily, and executed later on when preparations are in place, while killing Black would effectively make Cat, Malicia and the Calamities join in a vendetta against Procer; Saint might not care, but Pilgrim would, and will plan more carefully to take advantage of the other's agitation, hesitation and haste on rescuing Amadeus, setting traps and countermeasures to deal with them.

We know it will probably backfire to Procer, because Catherine is the MC, but that's us the readers, the characters don't know that and thus can make those mistakes.

jonnnney

The good guys are currently planning to set out a few million innocent people as lambs to the slaughter because they lost an election. I doubt they care about morale. The benefit of keeping Black alive is Warlock and his Son don't get a chance nuke the Ashuran fleet which is the only military around that is currently attacking the Dread Empire itself.

Mental Mouse

You know what would be really bad for morale? "Killing Black and displaying his body" – and then he shows up to kick the snot out of the nobles and lesser Named. 😊

Rook

The problem with Black isn't that he isn't a clever enough mastermind. The problem is that he treats himself as just another piece on the board. An important one, yes, but still expendable given the right conditions.

I think the question of his survival isn't whether things are going according to plan, so much as whether his plan actually involves his own survival. The fact that killing Black may be far too costly for the Heroes or Procer to weather is worrying, not comforting, because Black himself has so much to gain from sacrificing his own piece here. It may, in fact, turn into a farce in which the Heroes have to save the archvillain while said archvillain attempts to off himself on their swords.

The thing is that if he actually forces them to kill him, he wins. All the old Heroic monsters have crawled out of the woodwork, placing themselves in Procer's camp and openly taking the field to put him down. The sharpest swords that the Heavens have to bare, the ones that would normally come screaming out of a clear blue sky to save the day, are in the open field and targetable along with the Crusade and Procer itself. All at once.

If he dies here, he gives the deadliest monsters that Praes has spawned in tens of generations a clean swing at them under the guise of a classic, typically Heroic, motivation – retribution for a loved one lost.

The end result? He breaks the last remaining madmen of Praes against the last remaining Heroic nation close enough to be a threat, and simultaneously wounds or outright shatters most of the Legendary Heroes that might ruin all his plans. The snake eating it's own tail is ended, procer is ended, Callow is under the iron fist of his own apprentice, and a massive power vacuum is created that can now be filled by mundane institutions.

TeK

Oh yeah, why would Peregrin leave Maddie alive? What about a bait? Praesi had consistently proven that being on defensive is a preferable position. Now instead of trying to invade Callow (which is impossible giving an upcoming undead incursion), you can dictate where Calamities'll struck. And you'll get a "Good country besieged by various forces of evil" bonus, which gives +2 defensive roll. I think, the most important thing for Good is to get every monster into action there. They don't really care about backlash or casualties, as long as they will be the ones left standing. It's a nice trade, me thinks, making Praes go on offensive.

About "so crazy they never see it coming", Malicia does not judge which plan is better, cause both are different yet similar shades of godawful, she judges what she thinks Cat will do. And I think whatever advantage giving fae permanent foothold in Creation has over herding a bunch of backstabbing demigods into an army, it's worth it, as long as your enemies won't expect it.

Also, while we consistently overlook nisi and dzulu in favor of Mighty, what Cat told us, time and again, is that she doesn't need monsters, but rather numbers. And think of it this way: if Kingdom Under can't sell weapons to any side in Calernia that is at war with Callow, whom they can sell those weapons? Give "cattle" drow cheap dwarven armaments, and you got yourself analog to Proceran levies, for your professional core Army of Callow.

Yotz

Cat may still get herself an army of slightly less backstabbing lesser demigods courtesy of her auctions – on which nisi are the main buyers, afair, since most of the dzulu are waiting for a shot on the Titles. Yes, some of the dzulu may be lured in by the promise of draining a Mighty – but with Cat's last gambit that would be one with no guarantee on getting more in foreseeable future. So the bulk of dzulu and – presumably – all the Mighty in Cat's thrall will wait on a chance to prove themselves enough to gain a Title, making (slightly) empowered nisi Cat's main footsoldiers. Which, depending on the amount of Night drained and Secrets obtained, may place some of them on the level of elite troops of other nations, or even higher. I mean, if your meatshield is capable of nearly instantaneous regeneration and is highly poisonous for anyone who dares to chomp on it...

werafdsaew

How about the reason given in this chapter? They want to parade him around in a triumph, and they don't want to piss off Ranger. Or maybe one sworn to Mercy, GP actually cannot take a life unless it saves another life elsewhere, and he judges Black to have been sufficiently neutralized. I'm sure I can come up with other possible reasons.

Death Knight

No, the reason Mercy is one of the most feared choirs is because of their core ability "The FINAL mercy."

Life is horrible and difficult, full of suffering and anguish. You are doing your choir's will when you alleviate another person's suffering by killing them.

There's a reason Saint (rancid sack of vinegar and piss discount Ranger) shuts up when Pilgrim tells her to.

Mercy's creed permits killing of ANYONE for the paltry price of merely feeling their suffering.

werafdsaew

I don't agree with your interpretation of GP; I see him as a utility maximizer.

Morgenstern

Well, one thing you do achieve, when taking someone captive is making other people come for them. That just MIGHT actually be something worth angling for (making a trap for them). And, if the person(s) in question do/es have enough tricks (known to the maybe-captors!) up their sleeve that they would see you simply CLAIMING to have taken the other person, but actually killed them... there would be no way, but to actually do take them prisoner, if that were indeed your angle.

It would be a funfest for Black, of course, being taken prisoner to the main city, where he can spread the plague that he has probably caught, his Name simply not letting it kill him...

But. There is at least a third avenue: Those shopkeeper-talks? What if it is NOT (quite) a parade of victory at all? It might actually be about mourning some lost hero(es), less about victory...

Morgenstern

...that would let them see through you just *claiming*...

hmpf. once again i overly miss the edit function here. --

Morgenstern

(Far away sidenote: Black might, of course, simply not have contracted the plague at all, due to Name shenanigans, which changes a lot of the perspective of what Black's plan might be.)

caoimhinh

I still think the theory of infected undead going down the river to spread the plague in Procer is a high possibility, and I particularly like it, since it would come to hit the Pilgrim in a few days time and hit him hard (he must feel the pain of those infected until they die) due to the sheer amount of people infected. It would also be a huge "fuck you" and spit in the eye of the heavens if Black managed to do that.

---

The Pilgrim might be actually going for the "install Amadeus as the new Dread Emperor" plan Catherine suggested, believing that the divide it creates in the Legions will make the Wasteland tad bit less impossible to campaign in. Remember, they are already waging war on three fronts, with the fourth about to be opened in the Free Cities and the fifth whenever the critical mass of hungry ratlings is achieved. A currently nameless claimant to the throne might be too good to pass up.

vuthuha912

My gosh. You are right. They should have killed Black. The man wants it himself, his defeat was meant to be a price for a ticking bomb around Cordelia's head. Now that the south of Procer is on fire surely they should just kill him. It will not be a worthwhile price but killing him will weaken Malicia.

IDKWhoitis

I do have to wonder how much of a weight Ranger could place on the scales in favor of Praes if she just tore a hole in Procer. Like could she mobilize Refuge? Would the Saint and Ranger just duke it out and wreck a city? I kinda wish Ranger gets involved anyways, an old monster reawakened because someone decided to poke its tail.

Regarding the Drow gambit, I think they might be much worse than Fae, as wards and spells may not be as effective. Even accounting for Winter influence, they are fundamentally of this plane of existence, so a Ward cannot banish them as easily.

Regarding Magic, Would Warlock use Combat magic to suppress Masego (and better question, would he win?). Like that path leads to either a city being lost in the aftermath or an emotional showdown between Masego and his father.

ahd

Ten quatloos on the Hierophant.

Cold Cyberia

A lot of people think Ranger would just tear through the crusade but I disagree. Part of why she's so powerful is that she doesn't step into any narratives. We've seen her fight against the Dead King's Revenants, we know she's been scrapping with the rattlings and the drow but it's never as a part of a bigger story – it's just her hunting the foes she finds worthy.

In fact, the moment she steps into a story bigger than her, like when she fought against the Summer Queen, she gets seriously injured. So yeah, I'm sure she would do some damage but I doubt it would be very significant.

Death Knight

We've only seen Ranger fighting foes head on and we've been led to believe that she does not have any other tactics.

That is a mistake.

Recall in the interlude Apprentice in book 3, Archer uses arrows that are made of naturally enchanted wood. These arrows fly straight through most mage shields.

They're mage killers.

Now I'm not saying Ranger invented them but she has centuries of experience fighting Named from all walks of life. From Sorcerors to Knights to Puglists and everything in between.

If she actually hunted those heroes, as in be as pragmatically cold as possible. Making use of traps, magical trinkets, specialized arrows etc. that an actual hunter uses in real life, well, as the Calamaties have proven repeatedly you can kill anything bullshit heroic Named included with enough preparation.

Also, Ranger's role is hunting strong opponents. That's her Role in the Story. Now, wouldn't you say a team of Old Heroic Monsters qualifies? Especially ones that managed to kill the most feared Villain in recent history? Her lover too?

No as long Hye does not face all 5 of the bastards head on she can kill the lot of them.

Javvies

More to the point, we've only seen Ranger looking for a fight for the sake of a fight to push/improve herself. There's a distinct difference between wanting to fight with someone for the sake of a good fight and wanting to kill someone so that they're dead.

The former is ultra-hardcore sparring with live blades, the way Ranger does it. The latter is an ambush opened with lethal strikes, if it's not just a headshot from behind cover.

In other words, the former is the Exiled Prince challenging Cat, the latter is Cat telling Nauk to just shoot him instead of answering the challenge.

---

Masego mentioned that miracles and wards don't have much overlap (which is why he couldn't contain the Heavenly Fences). I think Warlock may find out that his defences aren't enough to hold Masego, or to protect himself.

IDKWhoitis

It will make for a very funny story of Masego gets "Grounded" and can't go to the murder party in Callow (or Tower) and sneaks out anyways.

octopusfluff

The degree to which Alaya fails to comprehend Catherine verges on comical.

Her reaction to Cat's current gambit is going to be precious.

Sylwoos

As will be everyone reaction if killing the Sve doesn't destroy the night. She'll show up with a army of named able to put to shame the Hero's gathering of the tenth crusade.

Jason Ipswitch

I will be very surprised if the Night does not survive, given that the woman gunning for her is The Queen of Moonless Nights, who at least in theory still has an Aspect called Take. (And a history of taking things like resurrections and leveraging them in her own favor.)

jonnnney

Well Sve didn't create the night she stole it when she killed the twilight priestesses or whatever they were called.

Euodiachloris

One thing she still can't get her head around: Cat isn't inclined to kill Amodeus, nor is she particularly willing to attempt climbing/levelling the Tower. But, if Malicia keeps pushing Cat because she fears she might become a real threat... self-fulfilling prophecy may occur.

Everything Malicia dislikes about Cat stems from the rock-hard belief that Squires will always try to kill Black Knights to get power coupled to "Callowans hate Praesi unconditionally".

IDKWhoitis

Villains create their own demise, and Malica is slipping into some bad villainous habits lately.

She's gotten used to holding most of the cards, and now that someone stole one, the house of cards is toppling.

caoimhinh

Nice chapter from Malicia's POV.

Good to see her assumptions and plans directly from her, she is going to be VERY surprised when Catherine emerge with an army of Drow and a pact with the Dwarves.

Come on, Amadeus, be alive.

It will be interesting to see Wekesa's reaction to the news too, he will probably get them right after or in the middle of talking with Masego.

I wonder who will handle the rescue operations, it might even be 4 different teams with plans to free Black.

Mental Mouse

It's worth noting that the pact with the Dwarves may become visible on the surface even before Cat herself does.

caoimhinh

Indeed. And to the annoyance of everyone else, the Dwarves don't give explanations. Hahahaha.

Gunslinger

Evil chapter this, dangling us all the hope of a still alive Black. Though I have to say I laughed when Malicia didn't even consider the Drow as a possibility given how monumentally stupid it originally seemed

Xinci

Truly another interesting and informative chapter. Malicia is still non-the wiser on the Tyrants plan as like many others strangely ignores the Heiarch. Well I suppose few know what he has seen, he only needs the right pivot to have some fundamental impacts..truly he would work quite well with Cat.

In this case props to Hakrams musings in previous chapters for he foresaw the way the game would go and is working to support the fabric of the kingdom more now. We shall of course have to see how it plays out but the pivot is there and change comes. Cat getting a highly adaptable force that can help her fill in the various roles of her kingdom is rather important, but as mentioned she is *raw*. She will need several more lessons or inspirations to learn how to mold them into the proper role and actually keep that adaptability intact. A big question right now is how Cat will mold her people as a whole once she unifies them or if she will act as a unifier at all, given I am still unsure if Cat is still in a foundational stage like Archer is.

soonnanandnaanssoon

"a world of endless paths, and someone to walk them with her"

This. Damn I can't believe a Dread Empress & her Black Knight could best describe my relationship goals.

caoimhinh

I know, right? It's a pretty awesome phrase, the best of this chapter in my opinion, with second best being the ending sentence "If they'd killed him, Alaya would give him an empire for a pyre."

And both of those phrases come from the same source: their relationship and the love and dreams they have shared for over four decades.

Jessica Day

I find it interesting how she correctly identifies Vivienne as the weak link but misunderstands her as simply nationalistic. But then, I don't suppose there is anyway for her to have heard about Cat's plans with the Liesse Accords?

IDKWhoitis

WAIT, MALICA DOESNT SEEM TO KNOW AKUA IS STILL ACTIVE.

OH &!@#.

caoimhinh

No one outside the Woe knows that.

IDKWhoitis

Malica seemed very well informed about many things. Akua was in Keter, Malica was in Keter, DK is Malica's ally. I thought Malica knew this whole time, and allowed it because Akua is worth more alive than dead.

When dealing with Black or Malica, I feel like its a better assumption that they have more information than they are letting on.

caoimhinh

Hmm, well, she might know and simply not mention it during this chapter, but a higher possibility is that she doesn't know. Malicia had a meat puppet disguised as a servant of the Dead King who spent the most time with Cat's group, but Akua was disguised as a Fae, one thing I find strange is that it was never really mentioned how they presented Akua, since giving her a new appearance would only works if they gave her a different name, but we don't know about that, so far it's only in conversations between them that they say her name.

Akua was called 'The Shade of Splendor' by the announcer when they were in the Dead King's audience, but that's ambiguous since it means that Neshamah knows she is a shade, but doesn't specifically states that he knows her real identity and isn't just calling her Splendid because her appearance is that of a Fae.

But, the Dead King is not Malicia's ally, and he doesn't need to share any information with her, he does what he pleases. If anything, he is more likely to see Catherine as an ally rather than Malicia, though he is not beyond making things very hard for her and even hurting her and her closed ones badly, he even admitted head on that he might betray her and wouldn't be offended if she betrayed him.

IDKWhoitis

I think part of the reason Malica thinks Cat is going the Fae route is that she had a "Fae" with the Woe, and confirmation bias is making her draw conclusions that sound pretty decent.

The Dead King is a mercenary, who is friendly with Cat because she is new to the whole "Immortal" thing, and he might be able to glean the whole Breaker of cycles thing that other powerful entities have just mentioned offhandedly about Cat. He is just trying to game another variable, and treats her as more than disposable or passing, because she truly has the possibility of staying "On the Board" for the foreseeable future.

jonnney

If she does know about Akua she likely thinks that Catherine is only using her as a weapon rather than a weapon, a magical expert, and a political adviser. She certainly doesn't understand how much power and control Catherine has as the Last Queen of Winter. Honestly the fact that Malicia always has more information is a big problem with Catherine because she makes far too many assumptions about Cat even when she has little concrete information.

Fern

Jesus crimminy what a fucking look into Malicia's character. This whole time we thought she was going to betray him if it meant keeping Praes together, but that was never in the cards, was it? Sure, she planned for it just in case, but that betrayal would only come from him, not her. Calernia's mistake has been seeing these two as the Big Bad and her Dragon, when it's really a dueteragonist situation in the hypothetical "Maddie Alaya and the boys take over the world" story. Just as well, we have a pretty good idea of what makes Black tick: like a much less deplorable version of Griffith, his dream – of stopping the cycle of war and plunder between Callow and Praes so that they can buckle down and finally fix the damn place – comes before everything else. At the same time, he's wise enough and has a good enough group of people with him to know that if he took control of Praes from Malicia it'd cause more problems than it solves.

The crusade won't know what hit em.

SMHF

Reading this chapter again, I think I figured out Malicia's terms with The Dead King...
He can attack any land on the continent that is not at peace with The Tower. Giving an east out to anyone in league with Cordelia when though gets going... and keeping Cat at bay, because she wouldn't risk her people as long as he's out and about.
It just sounds like something she's go for.

letouriste

pretty sure cat would go to war either way and strike a deal with the dead king on her own

sugarrollblog

Or possibly an alliance. Either way, Cat already foresaw the confrontation with the Dead King and is preparing for it now. She'll be ready when she comes back with an army of Drows and with enough coin from the Dwarves.

Malicia is shooting herself on the foot by jumping the gun on exposing her deal with the Dead King. Unsurprising since she's not aware of what Cat is doing.

RanVor

Is she? I mean, she can't get much more hated than she already is, and besides, Hasenbach knows anyway and has surely passed the information along to her allies.

Agent J

She knows that she made a deal with the Hidden Horror, but not what the deal entails. Malicia is of the opinion that exposing the details of her Dead Alliance, it would make the rulers of Callow less likely to be openly hostile.

RanVor

Yes, I know. That's not what I was talking about. Sugarrollblog stated that Malicia is risking a lot by revealing her deal with the Dead King, and I was wondering what she might possibly lose that is not already compromised.

caoimhinh

Because Malicia is rushing to conclusions and acting up before the correct, planned time.

She is exposing to Cat's friends the true and full extent of her deal with the Dead King, which means showing exactly how long and tight is her leash on him, to what extent he can act, invade and attack, and allowing to look for loopholes to exploit.

So long as the terms of the deal were a mystery there would be uncertainty and hesitation when taking decisions for Cat and the rest, now they will know the game rules and can make countermeasures, which is why Malicia's initial plan was to wait until Cat returned to reveal it, because Malicia wanted to first see what were Cat's cards at hand before making a decision and playing her own.

RanVor

Oh. Right. I haven't thought of that.

crysjal

So Black is confirmed as captured. There's a lot of speculation about the "hostage mentor" storyline and how Cat will work to rescue Black. A few mentions about caged Evil aswell.

There's another potential way this goes though. Where are they going to keep Black? Their primary stronghold? The capital of Procer, where one queen who is rapidly losing faith in the heroes has just realised the threat her empowered allies pose to her people.

Now a mentor character is going to be key prisoner in close proximity to a leader who is in desperate need of help and advice from a friendly(?) teacher who will be quite happy to provide some insight.

Morgenstern

I would definitely like to see that. Although it doesn't quite feel like that is what actually happened or is going to happen atm, to me.

crysjal

Considering the scene with Hasenbach there is definitely potential. Aside from the obvious tropes of a captured mentor which is no doubt what GP is thinknig regarding this (thinking like a Villain). I'm just looking at "good" narratives that Black is going to be more than happy to insert himself into. After all he himself is a manipulator of the narrative and it's something the Good guys won't expect. Cordelia is supposed to just sit and watch her country be destroyed, it's for the Greater Good after all and it's notl ike she'll be able to do anything on her own.

Byzantine

Yep. Black is Evil because it is what he needs for the job. If being Good does the job? He wouldn't hesitate to use it too. He does not care at all about the sides. He wants to break the board.

Confused Tortoise

This smells an awful lot like a trap, and with that final line, I suspect Malicia may be stepping into it. For all we talk about vengeance stories, we've already seen how trying to play into those works out for villains against heroes when the Champion was paraded in front of the Black Knight at the Vales [Lest Dawn Fail]. If he had taken that bait he would have been stuck in the field, already committed, when the White Knight miraculously returned. Even the Black Knight believes this would have killed him. Unfortunately, Malicia and Warlock don't seem to be as adept at Story-Fu. If the Black Knight dies, Malicia seems to be planning to throw every superweapon and horror at her disposal at those she sees as responsible. The problem is that Dread Emperors/Empresses have been throwing superweapons and horrors at the Good nations for centuries and it has always ended the same. Not even Triumphant managed to las (Note the current similarities of Malicia to Triumphant what with the alliance with the Dead King). I suspect the capture may be intended to make sure Blacks allies and friends are paying attention when he is executed, so whoever is running this scheme may better control exactly where the vengeance will be directed. Pilgrim would rather he die than any of the young heroes predicted in the chosen band of five [Kaleidoscope II] and the Saint of Swords also seems quite willing to make sacrifices [Fatalism III]. Note the conspicuous absence of any mention of the other heroes predicted to make up the chosen five in the goon squad cornering the Black Knight [Queens Gambit Declined]. Perhaps this is intended to keep them clear of the vengeance, allowing them to swoop in and slay the villain? Or I could just be being paranoid.

Yotz

...on the small table near the fluffy atrocity that Sve Noc called her bed was an opened letter from a Tyrant of Helike, evidently professing eternal friendship to the Night...

Euodiachloris

Well, yeah. And, it'll have sufficiently sophisticated (yet sarcastically cute) spiders printed on the envelope, and everything. 😊

Nash Equilibrium

Is anyone else noticing the parallels between what Cat is doing now and what William did after his defeat in book 1? She has run away from the storied war and is taking time to have a training montage before returning bigger and stronger (or in Cat's case just stronger, she'll always be short).

And since Malicia and the hero's are still pressing Callow, mostly Malicia, now when she returns it'll be the timely return of the hero.

crysja1

This book so far has heavily demonstrated how the narrative roles of good and evil are swapping between the sides of Good and Evil. The Good named are following plot lines that are traditionally villainous. Hell, Grey Pilgrim basically acknowledged that he was pulling out the "bad" stuff when he captured Black and is quickly taking on the role of a major antagonist. Plagues and mass slaughter are not the stuff of the good guys.

I wonder how they'll react when the shoe finally drops and they realise exactly what they have become.

Agent J

He asked when was ruthlessness strictly the purview of Evil. I absolutely loved that quote. Employ their methods, earn their results. It's not a coincidence Cat's been leaning harder towards anti-villain than actual villain.

mavant

At the centre of the Light there is a cold white flame...

Byzantine

Or more accurately when they realize that Bard's millenia-long plan has finally come to fruition. because let's face it: she's been setting this up for a very long time. And I suspect she hates *all* of the Gods for what they have done to her.

She wasn't mocking Black because he was out of his league. She was mocking Black because his plan was so small.

Wry Warudo

So Amadeus is still alive...and Cat has implied she's passing down the mantle to someone.

Are we going to get the King of Black Night?

mavant

I think after this adventure, Amadeus is just going to go back to the Green Stretch and take up cricket.

He's always wanted to be batsman.

Antoninjohn

What did the Bard say about using plagues in a scheme to bring about one's goals, something about it backfiring really badly every time it's used

Tohron

So, seems Sorcerous came after Triumphant. I'd thought he was one of the earlier Dread Emperors, but if his vanity project in the Tower is still around he clearly came after Triumphant brought the whole thing down.

Snowfire1224

Is it just me or has Malicia miss read the situation. She talked about Theif grappling with killing the refugees or solving the problem in other ways, but in the chapter before Theif didn't even consider killing them. Unless I'm remembering it wrong.

There's also the fact that she completely dismisses the Drow, which I honestly don't blame her for, but she also treats Cat as if she's incapable of not learning how to be less reckless after pointing out the girl can learn.

Also I think she misunderstands Black, she can tell him all she wants that he's going to lose and get himself killed. For Black it doesn't matter if he dies as long as it achieves his goal. She can warn him all she wants, he'd still go out there with his sword raised high and fight to his death knowing that it's one more step towards his larger plan to fight the heavens.

werafdsaew

She has blinders on like everybody else, and Villains raise their own gallows.

mavant

I must say, even though I don't much care for Malicia most of the time, I love her BFF situation with Amadeus. It's nice to see this deep, decades long friendship without romantic undertones. I mean, all the Calamities care for each other, and I love that in an "even bad men love their mothers" sort of way, but something about these two just warms my little Grinch heart.

Joshua Sills

"I wish this were about something as petty as debt," Alaya murmured, knowing it a lie.'

The first step is hardest, they said to her.
You will have to walk through fire.
It will burn away what you once were,
And always devour whole a liar

These may be really simplistic of an analysis, but looks like Malicia is out, and it's just a matter of when Cat is ready to climb.

Ernest Tsui

It took over 2 weeks but I have finally caught up!

Rup

1. ..fighting fire with fire was Catherine's signature...
Uh...that should be.. fighting fire with Goblin fire & Winter ice...
2. ...her fingers could not be seen to tremble....some days she could hardly tell where she began and he ended...
....Wow...i am speechless
3. ...and Maddy...perfect nickname for the ultimate rationalist
(ya..short from Amadeus...but still nice pun)

Rup

Oh...this comment is about a previous chapter....the way the sigils in that everdark city contended with each other...seemed so close to the "raiding the tower" game of Hakram

Rup

..ugg...raising

Walter

It weirds me out that Malicia thinks Cat won't ally with the drow. Like, it seems mad obvious that she's going to enslave them. Cat has used the Gallowsborn. She binds souls to her banner. She compels Akua, whatever other people may think she is. Heck, back when she had a real name it was all about stealing other people's power. She takes the souls of Heroes and makes items out of them. She has broken the Wild Hunt to heel. The people she defeated in her freaking classroom battles ended up in her army.

Like, Cat's soul or story, or whatever you want to call her modus operandi is fundamentally that of a slaver. The idea that she's not going to be able to keep bodies in line is ridiculous. She can *speak* and make people obey short term. Tell them to take Fae oaths, and now they die if they disobey, without her expending any power.

Malicia... *sigh* He wants that defeat. He planned for it. Even with the 2 of them fighting, he still tried to protect her/buy more time for her. He does love her as much as she loves him. Malicia is always at the center of his plan for Praes. She was meant to outlive him in all of his plans. Now that he is captured and Malicia starts falling into Dread Empress's Madness. It will be an extra cruel outcome if he ended up surviving while his dearest friend died.

Malicia darling. You two could have been an unstoppable force and be the couple that finally drag the Empire out of the pit it dug itself in. If you just ... work together ...

---

Interlude: Apostates

"There is greater power in severing than binding, in releasing than capturing. The most fundamental act of will is to cut."

-Translation from the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King Thalassina was old.

Some scholars believed it to be the first Praesi city, though Wekesa's own studies had hinted at Kahtan holding the title instead – the three oases of its site had been a natural draw on the nearby Taghreb tribes of the Devouring Sands. Still, it had undeniably existed longer than Ater or Wolof which in these modern days tended to be considered the two greatest cities of the Empire even though Thalassina's population was near the double of Wolof's: three hundred thousand inhabitants, give or take a few thousand. The city's fortunes tended to rise and fall with the state of the sea trade that was its lifeblood. It was almost absurdly wealthy when there was peace with Ashur and the League, growing fat off tariffs on grain and luxuries imported from foreign shores. When the ships ceased coming, however, its revenues dwindled and the large population became a stone around its ruler's neck. As it was the Empire's primary sea port, Emperors and Empresses had meddled with its ruling line's affairs more than they had any other's. Most of that meddling had proved to be costly blunders. Thrice there'd been attempts to raise an Imperial Fleet, two swatted down by the Ashurans sailing in to torch everything and the last made a failure by one of the foremost captains rebelling and going pirate. On occasion, however, reasonable notions had emerged.

Shatha's Maze was one of that rare breed.

Named after the ancient Warlock who'd built it, it'd been raised at the order of Dread Empress Maleficent the Second. She had prudently assessed that the victory she'd won against the Thalassocracy at sea had forged a very fragile peace, and that improving the defences of Thalassina before hostilities resumed was necessary. She'd set her Warlock to the task, opening up the treasury without qualms at one of the high historical points of Praesi wealth. The Maze was therefore unsurprisingly rather extravagant, but also one of the finest ward-based defensive arrays Wekesa ever had the privilege to witness. It had only failed twice over the last six hundred years, both times to treachery instead of superior sorcery. Naturally, knowing this, the first thing he'd requested of High Lord Idriss was a thorough purge of any uncertain elements in the city followed by heavy restriction of who would have access to the Maze from now on. The ruler of Thalassina had taken the opportunity to thin the ranks of his vassals with imperial permission eagerly, and though Wekesa suspected most of the dead had been rivals and not liabilities as long as the liabilities were dead he hardly cared. With that preventative measure taken care of, he'd sat down with his husband and his son to plan how they would turn a defensive ward array into a death trap.

It was a fascinating problem. Shatha's Maze warded the waters to miles out of the city, except of course it didn't: it was, after all, one of fundamentals limits of sorcery that wards could not be made over water. Shatha's solution had been to anchor the workings in corals, artificially raised to crest over even the tallest waves. The Maze was not a single array, though it might seem like it at first glance. It was over three hundred small, self-contained wards extending only over their coral tower. The ancient Warlock had been brilliant, Wekesa would admit. Aware that she could not cover the waves with sorcery, she'd made it instead so that the effect would come from people looking upon her works. Some wards confused perception, leading ships to crash into spikes of rock beneath the surface. Others attacked minds directly by sowing madness and uncontrollable fury into all who saw them. Yet more contained direct sorcerous effects like flame and lightning, triggered by will or proximity. The full lay of the Maze was known only to a few, though he'd obtained a version when agreeing to Alaya's favour. It had been illuminating, teaching him that sufficient time and manpower could create what was effectively an array with no single element linked to another. There was, naturally, a catch. Thalassina was a trade port: it needed foreign ships to be capable of passing through in peace time.

Shatha's Maze needed to be activated, from twin underground facilities dug beneath the banks the adjoining coasts. The rituals involved were both long and expensive, as they essentially required three hundred separate ward empowerments done in quick succession. The Kebdana had been rulers of the Thalassina for the better part of five centuries and so ensured that they had a contingent of powerful and well-educated mages ready at all times to carry out that onerous duty, but those practitioners were unfortunately highly specialized because of it. Useless when it came to the kind of theoretical legwork needed to design a ritual meant repurpose the Maze, and Wekesa had neither the time nor the inclination to educate them. So be it. They'd chosen to waste their Gift on being beasts of burden, he would treat them as such. With Masego and Tikoloshe at his side, he hardly needed the help anyway. His son was arguably the finest magical theorist of his generation, now that Akua Sahelian was dead, and his husband had at least three millennia of first-hand observation of sorcery to call on. Even a devil as ancient as 'Loshe had difficulty proving truly creative, but his treasure trove of knowledge was priceless.

With such aides he should have no trouble, or so theory went. The practicalities proved to be slightly different.

"Sueton was a hack," Masego insisted. "Barely half his experiments are reproducible."

"This particular phenomenon is one of them," Wekesa replied flatly.

"Under controlled circumstances," his son objected. "If his results are this shoddy, the theoretical framework behind them can only be called flawed. There's no guarantee the explosions will cascade if we can't accurately predict the nature of the release."

"Petronian sorcery has a degree of unpredictability," Tikoloshe noted. "Not a subtle folk, the Miezans. Never prone to using a dagger when a spot of genocide would work."

"We cannot use Trismegistan formulae for this large a spell," Warlock said. "The precision required is beyond our workforce, and to be blunt we lack the power."

"Then make a master array and feed it with secondary rituals," Masego said. "If we begin accumulating power now and centre it on our own manipulation, Trismegistan sorcery remains feasible."

"That'd require at least six straight hours of direction on both our parts," Wekesa said, frowning as he calculated. "With absolutely no margin of error either individually or in concert. That's even riskier than going Petronian."

"It puts the possibility of failure in our hands instead of leaving Creation to roll the dice," his son grunted. "That can only be called an improvement on that abomination you call a plan."

"Perhaps a more diplomatic word could have been chosen, Masego," Tikoloshe chided.

His son's beautiful glass eyes swivelled under the eye cloth, brow raising.

"A thing that causes distrust or hatred," Masego quoted. "That is the definition. I assure you, it earned both from me."

"Redundancies," Wekesa said, ignoring the salvo. "If your issue is with the unpredictability, we set several triggers. It will make it difficult to predict the exact sequence, but-

"- it won't matter if their fleet is deep enough in the Maze," his son finished thoughtfully. "Perfection is the enemy of functionality."

Wekesa blinked in surprise. Where had he learned that?

"This all rests on the Ashurans being unable to interrupt your little game," Tikoloshe reminded them. "They will have hundreds of mages trained from the cradle."

"Trained in Sabrathan sorcery," Wekesa said, the sneer implied.

Oh, there was no denying that the Thalassocracy's practitioners were the foremost in their fields. It was simply that those fields were so very narrow. The Gift was only cultivated two ways in Ashur: healers and ship mages. Ashuran mage-doctors could take the slightest ember of life and turn it into haleness, making Praesi attempts at healing look like the fumbling of children. Their sailing-mages could quiet storms or craft them, steal sunken ships from the depths and ride the tides. Yet outside that particular set of specialties, they were rank amateurs. Unlike Praesi they'd never outgrown the sorceries taught them by their forebears across the Tyrian Sea. They refined but did not innovate, in large part because the Sabrathan theory of magic was so badly antiquated. Victory was the mother of stagnation, and after wiping out the Miezens in the Licerian Wars the Baalite Hegemony had gone from triumph to triumph. Embracing stagnation just as deeply as the empire they'd overthrown. They'd not been forced to revisit the foundations of their sorcery for centuries, after the rest of the world had moved on. No, Wekesa thought little of Sabrathan magic. Or of any other that emphasized something as mundane as natural talent over skill and intellect.

"Narrow in scope, yet no less effective for it," Masego said. "A hundred oxen cannot raise a pen but they can trample it."

"At best they'll be able to save a third of the fleet by submerging it," Warlock flatly said. "Most of their practitioners lack the ability to use the spells, and their methods are ill-suited to rituals."

"They could interrupt the sequence by detonating parts of it in advance with their own sorcery," Tikoloshe said. "It has been done before."

"Then we harden the wards from the outside, thin them on the inside," Wekesa said. "It will be tedious, but as an additional safeguard it will serve well enough."

"Someone will need to be among the corals," Masego disagreed. "To start the sequence again if it stalls. Your schematic works in principle, but only if the possibility of Ashuran intervention is removed."

Warlock's lips tightened. He was not wrong. Much as he held Ashuran sorcery in contempt, dismissing it outright would be a blunder. There were no heroes here to muddle the mixture, but mortal ingenuity could be just as dangerous. The trap could not be sprung twice, it would wreck the Maze. Which meant if too few Ashuran ships were sunk, Thalassina was stripped of its finest defence while the enemy remained on the prowl. Alaya had made it clear that if the city fell there would be major unrest in the Empire. Nok being put to the torch was one thing, its ruler was by far the least influential of the High Lords and a former Trueblood besides. If the Dread Empress of Praes failed to shield even her oldest allies, however, there would be waves. Much as Wekesa despised the notion of having to stay in this city to protect idiots, he despised even more the prospect of having to put down a rebellion against the Tower.

"Agreed," he finally said.

"Good," Masego said. "I'll require some accommodations on my perch, which I assume will need the permission of High Lord Idriss before being made."

"No," Tikoloshe immediately said, before Wekesa could speak the word himself. "Absolutely not."

His son cocked his head to the side.

"Father is the best fit to oversee the ritual from the city," he pointed out. "It is primarily his design. What follows is obvious."

"The risks are much higher out there," Warlock said. "If the sequence fails-"

"- I will handle the matter," Masego interrupted. "If you believe your plan to be sound, any risks posed to me are irrelevant. If you do not believe your plan to be sound, this conversation is an exercise in pointlessness."

"You are perfectly capable of overseeing the ritual yourself," Wekesa said. "There is no need to discuss this further."

"I am capable," his son agreed. "But I am not the most capable. Logically speaking-"

"Enough," Warlock bellowed. "I will not allow you to stand in the middle of a fucking Ashuran fleet while we turn centuries-old wards into munitions. You are staying in the city, and that's the last we'll speak of this."

Heat spread across the room, carrying the faint scent of brimstone. His temper had loosened his hold. Slowly, Masego straightened in his chair. He's almost as tall as I am, Wekesa realized with muted surprise. Grown slender from his stay abroad, though his long braids and the trinkets woven into them made him seem larger. Robes stark black, eyes veiled, he looked like a stranger. A man grown instead of a boy.

"There has been quite enough of not speaking, I would think," Hierophant coldly said. "And my patience has officially run out."

—

They did not react to his words, not visibly at least.

But Masego felt the weight of what he'd spoken fall over the room and was glad of it. He'd hoped they would tell him themselves. That he wouldn't need to drag it out of them, that maybe they had a good reason. He'd grown, since leaving to fight in the Liesse Rebellion. Learned so much about himself and Creation around him, so much the revelations had carried him beyond the Name of Apprentice. If they'd recognized that, acted on it... It wouldn't have bound the wounds, no. Not entirely. But it would have mattered. Been measured on the scales of the betrayal. Instead here he was, expected to sit and pretend like they'd not lied to him his whole life. No, worse than a lie. They had hidden the truth after raising him to seek it above all else. What possible justification could there be for that?

"Masego," Papa said cautiously, "I do not know what-"

"You know," Masego said. "Or suspect, at least. I have been to Keter, fathers. And oh, the things I witnessed on that journey. The secrets I glimpsed."

"The Dead King lies," Father calmly said.

His eyes were dark mirrors, revealing nothing.

"So do you," Hierophant hissed. "He, at least, does not pretend otherwise."

"You don't understand," Papa sighed.

"A common consequence of being kept in the dark," Masego harshly replied.

"The dark," Father murmured. "The right term, used incorrectly. You were kept from the dark, my son."

"There is nothing in this world to fear save ignorance," the blind mage said. "You taught me this, once. The lesson should have been tailored to your deeds, if you did not want to be called to account for them."

Father leaned back into his seat, then drummed his fingers against the tables.

"What do you think death is, Masego?" he asked.

"Religion, now," the younger man snorted. "The resort of those without answers of their own."

"Let us speak of two Dread Emperors," the Warlock said. "One called Malignant, third of the name. The other called Revenant."

"The same man," Masego said. "Famously so."

Malignant the Third had killed himself through ritual and risen from the grave a year later, dethroning his successor and reigning again under the name of Dread Emperor Revenant. There'd been some rebellion when it'd become clear he intended on reigning forever, the first of the Wars of the Dead. He vaguely remembered Revenant being used as the basis for the legal argument that later excluded undead from claiming the Tower, though there'd been some other barely more interesting wars in between.

"I knew both," Papa said. "And believe this to be untrue."

He watched the incubus, looking for a lie and finding none. But they were both much better liars than he'd thought, weren't they?

"What came back shared much with Malignant," Papa continued.

"Memories, thoughts, opinions. It was also fundamentally other. It was... a tracing of the man. A prefect imitation, yet still only that. An imitation."

"An interesting matter," Masego said. "Yet utterly irrelevant to this conversation."

"No. No it isn't," Father quietly said. "Because in one of the deepest vaults beneath the Tower, there is the most complete version of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness in existence. A third of the full text, and not contiguous. And it was there Malignant learned the foundations of the ritual that turned him into Revenant."

His fingers clenched. All these years, the knowledge had been there. In his father's memories, yes, but also written on parchment. And they'd kept it from him. The oldest, most important instance of apotheosis in the history of the continent and they'd hidden it away. His teeth clicked together so strongly his mouth almost bled.

"If you were under the impression this helped your case," Masego replied in a furious whisper, "allow me to disabuse you of that notion."

"You would have embraced the teachings," Papa said. "No matter what we said."

His Name flared, like a morning sun, sheer power wafting from his frame like smoke.

"And so Father bound you not to speak of it," he hissed. "So much for free will."

"I did not," Warlock said.

"Liar," Masego spat out. "You should not have taught me diabolism if you wanted to maintain that pretence. Papa is driven by desire. He had answers I wanted, what could possibly silence him except a binding?"

Gods, how many other hidden bindings were there? Had Father forced love as well? How could he tell if a single thing he'd seen or heard or felt was genuine? Had Papa baked because he enjoyed it, or because there was a rule that made him? The most sophisticated set of oaths in existence bound the incubus, decades in the making. Free will made by mortal cleverness, they'd called it. Could you really call it that, if there were exceptions?

"A greater desire," Tikoloshe said. "Of my own."

Hierophant bitterly laughed.

"Did you want me ignorant so badly?"

"I wanted to keep my son alive," Papa softly said. "Even if it hurt him. Even he hated me for it."

Masego flinched.

"You can't just-"

"You should have noticed by now," Father said, tone calm and even. "I'm told you've studied her physiology in depth, both physical and metaphysical. The signs must be there."

"No," Masego said.

"Catherine Foundling died at Second Liesse," the Warlock gently said. "What walked out of that fortress is an impression of the young woman made on the fabric of Winter, no more and no less. I'm sorry, Masego. I really am. I know you liked her. But even if the Black Queen believes she's the same person, she is not. Amadeus didn't realize it either, he doesn't have the learning. But he described what happened in the city to me. There can be no doubt."

"We hurt you," Papa said. "And for that, I will apologize. But not regret. Not if you are still alive to be hurt."

He didn't want to think about it, but he couldn't not. He'd been told a theory and so it must be considered. He had observed a certain stiffness in thought in Catherine, an inability to deviate from goals even if it meant employing means she would have once dismissed out of hand. Believed it, back then, to be a consequence of the mantle becoming one with her soul – it would retain certain properties, which would be made inherent to her. It had been a reasonable theory. Or it could be that the imprint on Winter was limited in nature, and that the creature playing at being Catherine was incapable of deviating from it. He'd already known that her body was a construct, proved it.

Was her mind as well?

"Oh, child," Father sadly said. "It will pass. The first one is always the worst. But you do yourself no service by denying the truth."

Masego could no longer close his eyes. The closest he could come was to cease paying attention to what he saw. It was not a release. An effort of will was still required, and he abandoned the attempt after a moment.

"No," he said.

"Masego, I understand you don't want to-"

"This is not sentiment," Hierophant said. "I disagree with you on rational grounds. Even if what you say is true, it is irrelevant. She remains the same individual."

"You know that to be untrue," Father said.

"I am not the same person I was this morning," Hierophant said. "I have learned and changed. I am still Masego."

"The degree of change is different," the Warlock flatly said.

"And how does one decide on the appropriate degree?" he replied. "If I removed all my memories from age five to fifteen, I would behave differently. A part of what makes me would be absent, and yet I would still consider myself to be the same person. Assuming your theory is correct, the changes she went through are lesser than this. It is, therefore, irrelevant."

"You're being willfully-"

"Furthermore," Hierophant said, raising his voice. "If your theory is incorrect, you both kept me ignorant out of petty fear."

"Petty?" Papa repeated softly, and there was a rare thread of anger in his voice.

"I am no great scholar of niceties," he replied. "But even I know an apology that is not apologetic rings empty."

"Consider it withdrawn, then," Papa tonelessly said.

His heart clenched, but he would not bend in this.

"You could have told me," Masego said. "What you believe, why I shouldn't do it. But you didn't. You made the choice for me."

"That's what parents do, Masego," Father said.

He swallowed.

"I love you," he said. "Both of you. But I disagree. You didn't learn anything, you just... flinched. And apotheosis is not for the faint of heart."

"There are journeys," Father said, "that you can never finish. Because the person that left is not the same that arrives."

"There is nothing in this world to fear save ignorance," Masego replied, eyes burning bright. "And whatever may come, I will not flinch."

Ahahahaha, so that's why the Dead King took so much interest in Cat.

She's already died and came back.

NZPIEFACE

Also, did everyone forget how she took a resurrection straight out of an angel's hand?

Switch

I mean it's not the first time she's done it.

TheLiesseAccordsSuddenlyLookThreatening

Damn, yeah, that makes Liesse 2, Cat 0

If Akua ever suggests that Cat should name another city Liesse, then we know for sure she's playing the long con

sport102blog2017

ahhhh

Sulomund

Our glassy-eyed boy has grown so much... *sniffle*

Hey would we consider these his teenage years, since he's finally getting into rebellion? Poor papas.

Aston W

I actually think Black killed her the first time with a sword. So that's loads of times she died.

WuseMajor

Honestly, every meaningful journey is like that. If you haven't learned and grown along the way, then you haven't really traveled. If you have, then the person who arrives at the end is different.

Snowfire1224

Apostates. Funny. I just got into playing Dragon Age games

Styn

Masego is defiantly my favorite supporting character. I've really enjoyed watching his character arcs.

sengachi

Very few journeys worth taking return you to the place where you began. The question should never be "will I stay the same?" but "do I want to be the person I'm becoming?". And while it seems that Warlock doesn't see that, maybe Masego does.

Good on him. Our mad science boy is growing up.

Zaver SaintCloud

This strikes me as very similar to the discussions of what truly happens when you use a Star Trek teleporter. If life is the continuation of consciousness, then we die every time we go to sleep.

Snowfire1224

Not really because sleep isn't actually a lack of consciousness it's actually an altered state of consciousness. Other altered states include meditation, hypnosis, and any time you take drugs.

Dennis Muleri

Holy crap this is my first commenting but holy crap didn't see that ish coming

NerfContessa

Very nice turnabout. And really, a Warlock that doesn't believe IN apotheosis, that's.... unlikely.

therealgridlock

Not gonna lie I was kinda hoping they'd actually explain their fears, not just dance around them tentatively

They say everyone who dies comes back a different person... But are they implying demons? Are they implying automata? They never say why that's a good or bad thing.

Good wants to rule over their subjects and evil wants to guide their children to greater things, it makes sense that everyone who dies and is resurrected by good remains the same, and everyone who dies and comes back under evil changes as a person.

One cannot become greater if one remains the same as one was before.

I think masego might be right, if the soul is still there, and she's still making free choices, of course she's a bit different, she's turning into a god slowly piece by piece, and since two things that are different can't be the same, she can't remain what she was and still be something else.

burguulkodar

Interesting!

aran

The sanctioned action is to Cut. To Cut means division by the blade of Want, that parer of potentials that excises infinities.

ishouldsleepc104

Pretty much agree with the warlocks assessment. It isn't a ship of theses problem it is straight up replacement. Chatarina was copied, the original died and the copy remained unaware of the temporal and physical interruption

DC

Y'know, Tikoloshe's theory makes me a little less sanguine about the fragments of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness that keep appearing at the top of chapters...

DC

...this should have been posted on the next chapter >_>

---

Interlude: Apogee

"It is a bitter truth that in trying to escape the flaws of our parents we inevitably inherit the worst of them."

– King Pater of Callow, the Unheeding

After they entered the second month of hard labour and sleepless nights, Wekesa jested that if he were a god he's snap his fingers and put them all out of their misery. Neither his husband nor his son graced him with even a perfunctory chuckle, which he found rather cold-blooded of them. Warlock had hoped that even disagreements, after being aired, would lance the wound festering in his family but it had been... overly optimistic of him. Tikoloshe was still furious that Masego had spurned his good intentions so fully, and their son had made it exceedingly clear that he'd be leaving Praes the moment the city was safeguarded and did not intend to return for many years. There'd been no talking him out of that, or even a way to broach the subject of the Black Queen again. His boy had learned to keep his own council, and while the way he'd grown stirred some embers of paternal pride in Wekesa it was also highly inconvenient. Message came from Ater within the first month, word of the war in the west.

It was not good news.

"He's not dead," Warlock told Alaya's envoy. "I am certain. Beyond that I cannot tell. Wherever he is cannot be scried even through his blood."

Which meant he was either underground or, more likely, in the presence of priests or heroes. It had slowed the work in Thalassina by a whole week to craft a ritual that would scry even through such distance and natural barriers, setting up relays and contingencies, but there'd been no question of doing otherwise. The silver of Amadeus' soul in his possession was still called to the remainder of it somewhere in Creation, but aside from determining death that measure was essentially worthless. His old friend's soul might not even still be inside his body, he knew, though that breed of meddling was rare among heroes. The Saint of Swords might be capable, though. Hye had told him, years ago, that Laurence de Montfort had grown skilled enough to rip a soul from its body with a swing of her sword. Was that what they'd wrought on Amadeus? Was he now a shivering shade in a bottle sealed by some priest's power? Tikoloshe chided him for the thought.

"You are casting fear as fact," his husband said.

"We're not dealing with shepherd boys and rebels anymore," Wekesa murmured. "I've heard things about the Pilgrim, 'Loshe. The Saint might be the executioner for Above, but he's something rather more dangerous than that. He... smooths away wrinkles. His is a thinking man's Role."

"Scribe will find out the truth of it, and the Empress will put her weight behind the retrieval," Tikoloshe said. "Worrying any further is without purpose."

"I could leave," Wekesa said. "Head out right now."

"And do what?" his husband gently asked. "Traipse around the Proceran countryside with target painted on your back?"

Warlock sighed. Tikoloshe was right, of course. Moving prematurely was just asking to get into a fight with whatever heroes had not gone north to prepare against the Dead King.

"Gods, why would he wander around the Principate like that?" Wekesa bit out. "We're not twenty anymore, the wind's no longer at our back. And there's at least half a dozen Choirs embroiled in this mess, he was bound to run into someone he couldn't cope with."

"Making virtues of one's flaws does not mean those flaws are gone," his husband delicately replied.

Warlock sighed and left it at that. The two of them had never gotten along. Amadeus remained, even after over forty years, of the opinion that Tikoloshe was an unnecessary risk that should have long been dispensed with permanently. He was polite enough not to mention it anymore, but the years had not changed his position by an inch. 'Loshe had frankly admitted that the sheer bleak intensity of Amadeus' desires, coupled with utter disregard for the incubus' existence, made him uncomfortable just to be in the presence of. Like putting fingers over a candle: tolerable for a pass, but painful if continued. Masego spent several hours conferring with his comrades in Laure when he was told the news, weaving some particularly vicious protections on his scrying spell. Woe unto whoever tested those, Wekesa had mused. There'd be a few more dead Eyes in the city by the time that conversation was over. Not his issue, regardless. While he recognized that Alaya had right to try eavesdropping on the conversation, his son also had right to privacy. The victor of that skirmish would be theirs to determine, and he saw no need to intervene so long as no harsh feelings were incurred on either side.

They returned to the work with renewed vigor afterwards, but as the weeks passed tensions never fully put to rest reared their ugly heads again. It was not unexpected, truthfully. Long hours of mentally exhausting work with little rest or company save each other – Masego had bluntly refused to attend court again – made small irritations seem large, and when the bottle was uncorked there was no preventing the spill. It was darkly amusing, Wekesa thought, that it was an attempted olive branch from Tikoloshe that'd been the spark to light the fire. His husband made an offer to discuss his time in the Kingdom of Sephirah, should Masego promise not to delve in that branch of research afterwards. Warlock had given it even odds that it would lead to either the beginning of reconciliation or a blowout, but his predictions proved inaccurate. In both cases, he'd believed the impetus would come from their son.

"That won't be necessary," Masego simply said.

The three of them had gone to the Maze with dawn, and it was now midmorning. Both mages hung from their spits of coral by leather harnesses, their engraving tools made to hover by their side by a quaint little Taghrebi spell. Tikoloshe was perched atop Wekesa's own coral, comfortably seated and keeping an eye on their work for mistakes. All of them were under illusion, naturally. High Lord Idriss might have purged the city, but Warlock would not rely on the man's work when his family's safety was at stake.

Their modifications to Shatha's Maze would remain hidden until the very last moment.

"It is not the Book of Darkness," Tikoloshe conceded. "Yet my remembrance is likely more than you'll ever learn otherwise."

"I would not be moved even if you offered the Tower's own text," Masego replied, placing back his carving knife into the floating set and picking up a chisel.

"Surely you don't mean to bargain with the Dead King," Tikoloshe frowned.

"Unnecessary," their son said. "I've already harvested sufficient knowledge from his echoes."

"Pardon me," Wekesa said. "Did you say his echoes?"

"His apotheosis left a reflection in Arcadia, yes," Masego replied absent-mindedly. "I took from him twice, at a pivot and later from his final moments as mortal. Vivienne was displeased about the delay on our trip back, admittedly, but the Hunt would not move without all of us."

There was a soft sound as he angled the chisel against an accumulation rune, bringing down his hammer to connect it with the fresh additions. The only sound for a long moment was the waves around them.

"You stole memories from the Dead King's reflection," Tikoloshe quietly summarized. "Child, have you gone mad?"

"Debatable," Masego mused. "I am not certain if operating on a different set of logic should truly be called that."

"Don't you give me lip like this is some trifle," 'Loshe snarled. "Get rid of them this instant. It's an infection."

It went downhill from there. Wekesa could not stay out of it, for he shared some of his husband's worries in this, but he could not serve as a mediator if he was also arguing. That proved to be a mistake. Tikoloshe had become emotional. That never worked well with their son. It was bad enough they ceased working for the day, walking back to the shore in fuming silence. Warlock ran into a wall when he tried to tease out details during the afternoon, Masego stubbornly refusing to speak more of the matter. Against his better judgement, he offered his son a concession: he'd get to participate in the ritual from inside the Maze instead of the city, if the subject was opened again. It worked, or close enough. Masego remained vague on details, but it was clear his son could probably transcribe half the Kabbalis Book of Darkness from memory if he were so inclined – and that was the least of it. It was not the diluted knowledge put to ink he'd gotten his hands on but the thoughts of the Dead King himself. Secrets known only to one, until now.

"Take it out," his husband said later that night, when they were alone in their room. "By force if need be."

"I'm not going to fight him, 'Loshe," Wekesa replied with genuine surprise. "Obviously we need to reconsider our approach, but-"

"You don't get it," Tikoloshe said quietly. "It's a trap. I don't know for sure, but I've seen the lay of it over the years and..."

"You've never spoken of this before," Warlock softly said.

"I don't know for sure," his husband repeated. "And it was never an issue, with the mere fragments of his work Praesi possess. But I think he's been killed before, 'Kesa. The Dead King. With that many heroes having fought him over the years? At least once, one will have slain him."

Wekesa was not without cleverness, and he'd been married to the man for a very long time. The implication was not difficult to divine.

"You think the Book is a lure," he said. "And anyone that follows its teachings deep enough..."

"He can inhabit different bodies, he could even as a mortal," Tikoloshe said. "But how useful would it really be to wear some farmer's skin? No, he'd need mages. Talented, ambitious, well-trained in the use of their powers. And to ensure they made their way to him, seeds were sown."

"Never the complete book, because then they might realize the purpose of it," Warlock murmured. "There'd be risks, 'Loshe. If Amadeus is right about the Wandering Bard-"

"Black isn't even a hundred years old," his husband hissed. "And he thinks he can grasp the nature something like the Bard? Last time he followed that conceit Sabah was killed. Do we need to lose our son to his pride as well?"

"Peace," Wekesa said. "You've said it yourself, this is only a theory."

"I will not gamble with his safety, Wekesa, hear me well," Tikoloshe said. "Not when the stakes are this high."

"If I raise my hand against him, we lose him for good," he replied. "Think about this clearly."

"We lose him deeper still, if we do nothing," his husband said.

Gods, what a mess this had become. Maybe if memories were modified... No, he'd find out eventually. Masego had been taught to assess the state of his own mind before he'd even reached puberty, he'd notice sooner or later. It was only pushing the issue back by a few months or years. Part of him insisted this was only a theory, but he could not refrain from considering it. 'Loshe would not be this incensed if he did not genuinely believe in what he'd said, and he knew better than to dismiss the thoughts of his husband out of hand. It would be easier if he was wrong, but he could not put weight on something simply because it would be more convenient were it false.

"Tell me everything you know about this," Wekesa said. "Every single detail, no matter how insignificant."

Tikoloshe's eyes met his.

"And if you agree I'm right?"

Warlock grimaced, but went on.

"Alaya has made inquiries about putting him under house arrest until this Callowan mess is over with," Wekesa admitted. "I might have to take her up on them, until we've found a permanent solution."

"After the Ashurans are dispersed, then," Tikoloshe said.

Warlock reluctantly nodded. He'd need at least that long to prepare, if it was to be painless.

—

It'd been easier when Catherine had been there to provide ice. Winter-forged substance had a keen affinity to scrying spells, especially those involving the Observatory. Less than surprising, given that she'd provided quite a bit of the power involved in the raising of it. Without her around, Masego had been forced to rely on the more traditional methods of a water-filled bowl. The link was rather solid, given the distances and likely interferences involved, which warmed his heart. His work in Laure had proved fruitful. The waters shivered and a pair of silhouettes greeted him, both familiar. They must have been standing in front of one of the pools, he thought. Hakram looked exhausted, his face tight and the ridges around his eyes standing out — the orc equivalent of dark circles in a human. Vivienne, on the other hand, was flushed with good health. She'd grown out her hair, Masego noted. It suited her, made her seem almost regal.

"Hierophant," Hakram said, showing just enough teeth to be respectful.

There was a pause as Masego's eyes took in all of him.

"You seem to be missing a hand," the mage observed.

Vivienne snorted.

"Literally the first thing," she said. "I told you he'd skip right over greetings."

"Already was when we last spoke, the bowl simply did not show it. And I still have the one," Hakram told him, ignoring the Callowan. "It serves well enough."

"Two would objectively serve better," he pointed out.

"If we're to have this conversation, it will be in person," the orc said. "And over drinks."

Ah, one of those complicated matters then. It should prove a learning experience.

"You've made contact days before I next expected you," Masego said. "I take it something happened?"

"You could say that," Vivienne grimaced. "The Empress' envoy sung us a pretty song, and we need to pick your brains over it."

"I do not know much of singing," he admitted.

"I mean-" she sighed. "Never mind. Look, we were made privy to the full content of Malicia's pact with the Dead King."

"Does it matter?" Masego asked, mildly surprised. "I was under the impression we would oppose both regardless of the technicalities involved."

"I believed that as well," Hakram gravelled. "Before he finished speaking. She effectively sold out most of Calernia."

"Which seems ill-mannered, considering she does not own it," Masego offered.

"The definition of 'most' is what matters, as it happens," Vivienne said. "There's a clause that exempts Praes and Callow from his attentions."

"Which is good," he tried.

"Somewhat," she said. "Unfortunately, it only applies so long as she's alive."

Huh. Which was not good, because Catherine had admitted some months ago she would most likely have to kill the Empress before the war was over.

"We've asked some of our mages, but it's not their specialty," Hakram said. "We need to confirm – is it theoretically possible for a magical contract to have a clause like that?"

"It is exceedingly dangerous, but yes," Masego replied.

"Shit," Vivienne said, with feeling.

"I do not see the issue," he admitted. "Considering we were planning war against the Dead King regardless we have lost nothing."

"She's kept it secret for now, but it's likely she'll make the terms openly known when she judges the situation ripe for it," Hakram said. "That's going to make a mess."

Masego's brows rose. Would it? He failed to see how.

"Public opinion, Zeze," Vivienne said. "It'd be bad enough if we came out on Procer's side after they took a swing at us, but if on top of that we have a guarantee Calow will stay safe? War will be highly unpopular. Even war against Praes, if the Empress stays quiet from now on, and she's too clever not to."

Ah, politics. Hardly his specialty.

"If you could provide me the exact terms, I'll study them for weaknesses," he offered.

"We will," Hakram said. "But there might not be a point. There's no guarantee she gave us the real phrasing. And if she has, she'll have had every good diabolist in her employ look it over first."

"I have time during the evenings," Masego shrugged. "And without my library and my laboratory, only so much to spend it on."

"There's nothing to lose in trying, at least," Hakram said.

He nodded.

"If I may ask, do you have news of Uncle Amadeus?"

Vivienne wiggled her hand in a manner that presumably had meaning, though he was not certain what it was.

"Getting word from the Jacks quickly has been harder since the Vales were shut," she said. "The best I can give you is that Hasenbach's agents from her internal spy network are out in force in Salia. Turning over every vaguely suspicious stone. I've had to recall quite a few of my people."

She frowned.

"Still, if she's cleaning up the capital that thoroughly it adds weight to the Empress' take in my eyes," she continued. "They might be bringing in the Carrion Lord for a good spot of jeering and rock-throwing. Gods know he's been hated like poison there ever since he started setting fire to everything."

It was a relief to hear it, and Masego felt a knot in his shoulders loosen. He'd lost enough family to wars already. If Uncle Amadeus had followed Aunt Sabah into the grave so quickly... No, it couldn't be allowed to happen.

"Which is worrying," Hakram said. "They have to know if he's kept prisoner there will be rescue attempts. If he's not dead it is for a reason."

"It does not matter what they want," Hierophant calmly said. "They will not keep him. Catherine will agree with me on this. So will Father and the Empress. We will lack no resources for the rescue."

"My precise worry," Hakram replied. "Procer cannot afford war on two fronts if one of those fronts is Keter. To execute Lord Black and break his legions makes sense, but to capture him? I can think of only one reason for that."

It took a moment, but he came to the conclusion.

"Bait," Masego slowly said.

"It neatly takes care of what they fear most about Cat, namely her ability to gate anywhere with an army," Vivienne said.

"More than that," Hakram said. "They'll be dragging the Woe and the remaining Calamities onto their chosen grounds. The full villainy of the east where they want it, when they want it. They're clearing house before turning their full efforts to the north."

"It has the Peregrine's fingers all over it," Vivienne darkly said. "The man's dangerous enough on the field, but if he has a few months to prepare? It's going to get ugly, Masego."

"She'll have a plan," he said. "She always does."

"Well, we haven't run out of lakes yet," Vivienne half-smiled. "So there's always that."

Masego's lips quirked in answer.

"Still no word from her?" he asked.

"None," Hakram said. "But she'd have returned by now if she wasn't making gains, it's been near five months."

Or she could be dead, Masego thought but did not say. Precious little was known of what would await their friend in the Everdark.

"And on your front?" Vivienne asked. "No sign of the Ashuran fleet?"

"They've either found countermeasures to scrying or they keep priests on their ships," he said. "It makes finding their whereabouts difficult. The raids have not ceased, but Father says they'd have to be fools to give that obvious a sign they were about to strike. There's no telling when they'll attack until they're visible from the coast."

"I'll spare no tears for that lot if you manage to bruise them," she said. "But be careful, Zeze. Don't risk yourself for a Praesi city."

He decided, diplomatically, not to mention his agreed-on position when the Ashurans would come.

"And it's going well with your fathers?" Hakram asked. "I know what you found in Arcadia shook you."

"It has been... difficult," Masego admitted. "There have been arguments."

Vivienne's eyes went sharp.

"Do you need a way out?"

He shook his head.

"I suppose you could call it a religious disagreement," he said.

"Coming from the average Praesi, that would worry me," Hakram mildly said. "Coming from you, I will confess to something sharper."

"It will pass," Masego said. "They simply need to accept I will not forever live on their terms."

His friend shared a look, but did not comment. He licked his lips.

"Hakram," he said. "Before Catherine left..."

He trailed off.

"Yes?" the orc encouraged.

The mage folded his arms together.

"No," he finally said. "It doesn't matter."

Adjutant's keen eyes appraised him.

"Are you certain?"

"Faith," Masego mused. "It is had or it is not. There is no middle ground."

"So I've heard," Vivienne murmured, eyeing the orc at her side.

"Then let's cut this short before the Empress succeeds at listening in," Hakram said. "I'll scry you again in an hour with the text we've received, Masego."

"I will be here," he honestly replied.

A round of farewells, and then he was looking down at simple water. A strange sadness lingered in the room, and he turned towards Indrani to comment on it before realizing she was not here. Masego frowned, brushing back a braid. It was not the first time he'd made the mistake, and he was growing increasingly uncomfortable over it. The sooner he was rid of this city and its trouble, the better.

In the end, however, it would be another month before the Ashurans attacked.

---

esryok

You! Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

Thanks for covering it.

erraticerrata

First update of the month, and so extra chapter in the corresponding tab. This one is titled "Ye Mighty", and is from Ivah's POV. Character contest continues with Bard vs Captain, link to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16761696?fbclid=IwAR3AUU1z4pB60e-iDWjQklTR-RI5nxAC18xI3kvcrQW\_w90K2PPePMewUc

Dainpdf

Gee. This is the hardest one for me, yet. The Bard is such a mysterious antagonist, but Sabah is so complex with her empathetic and wild sides...

Someguy

I'm more curious about how Sabah romanced her husband.

Dainpdf

I suspect it may have involved surprising amounts of soppy romance. And perhaps a couple blood sacrifices, because it's Praes.

BartHumphries

I figure Bard will win because she's had like x5 the screentime that Captain has had.

Big Brother

Aw, poor Zeze. He's actually growing to miss Archer. Is that a seed of first love budding?

luminiousblu

Well, she was beautiful in his mind when she drew back the bow.

caoimhinh

That much was obvious when Catherine saw him touching Indrani with a care she had only ever seen him use with books.

Those 2 are a firmer ship than CatxKillian.

Atagan

>>Those 2 are a firmer ship than CatxKillian.

CatxKillian was broken over a ew blood sacrifices, is not that high of a bar

Anonymouse

We still have CatxUbua

SpeckofStardust

Its sad that we know the dead king cant be inside of creation fully without a agreement.

Otherwise the idea that he left everything behind to trap people into becoming his means for returning would hold a lot more merit.

Gunslinger

They could be contingencies or maybe it gives him a new body but shunts it back to his personal hell. I really like this theory as it answers the question question of how he's managed to survive this long.

Speck of Stardust

True, still I think the idea of the dead king being perfect (along with bard for that matter) in terms of setting up to never leave an opening fails hard, Bard has once failed in story (aka she set up the lone swordman) and got F-over at another point (Hierarch) The dead king for all his power, is still below bard's level (going by his conversation with her) his reach is not wide enough to have done major workings in arcadia, just for the off chance of it paying off when someone might travel though it at some unspecific point in the future when they're going to meet him.

Considering it all he could simply full control every body he has ever raised into undeath, including all the people that followed him into his control of hell....

ohhhh.

Shit.

He went off and did his own thing in an out of the way place to gain unimaginable power bound to his oaths. How is that any different to what Cat is doing?

He became a king of death just like cat became a queen of winter. Why has nobody pointed out the additional common points between the 2 yet? They didn't just become gods they are doing the same things they did after achieving it. Of course if cat was doing the same thing she likely would have gone after the Fae which likely would have ended up with her being trapped their like they are... New, a new twist to an old game.

---

Not to mention the staggering parallels between Neshamah's avoidance of story openings by goading the invaders into doing the dirty work for him, and Catherine's own takeover of the Everdark being propelled by the dwarves, up to and including creating a narrative alignment through granting powers without much personal investment into the results.

???

The thing I find interesting is threefold.

1.) The Dead King thinks Catherine is interesting. An 'Immortal' like him and the Bard. Yet, as we know, all Villains are 'immortal'. What's special about Catherine's state as a pseudo-fae? Is it simply her Domain? Or is it perhaps... the fact that she's a 'villain' with no name....

2.) The Everdark and the Drow are an entire culture that's been empowered by the Sve of Night's Domain. Meaning it's entirely possible to grant power through a Domain to unrelated people. And judging by the Sve's personality it's likely possible to manipulate the way that power is gained.

3.) Doesn't the above sound an awful lot like Names? We know the Wandering Bard has some manner of attachment to the Narrative. What if Narrative is her Domain, and Names are simply the way to gain power within that Domain? What if the reason Cat is interesting... is because she's gained power of her own, OUTSIDE of being a Named, and thus the Bards/Narratives plaything?

Taltos Dreamer

My guess is that either

- 1) he gets "pushed" back into his domain if he escapes this way, so he can take the body, but has to return to his domain right away
- 2) there is some text that isn't being shared in that agreement allowing him to take a vessel of his choice...something that would cause untold amounts of rage from warlock, necessitating he be taken out during, say, a random high ritual to destroy a ward array that has only been defeated by treachery and has kept the city safe for a very long time (thus there being no real reason for it to be used in this way)?

Byzantine

>Its sad that we know the dead king cant be inside of creation fully without a agreement.

Do we? He isn't willing to be, but Catherine had the thought that it was part of a Story: He's ensuring he is never the big bad, because there is always someone else that let him out. The monster can survive the story, if it plays things smart.

I suspect they are wrong simply because the Dead King wouldn't leave it up to others to unintentionally copy him, especially when there is a risk they could find a weakness in what he left behind and use that to trick him into a broken shell. No, I suspect the Dead King handled things in a much simpler manner: The Hell he invaded is the one his soul is destined for (It explains both the invasion and Hell and why he chose *that* particular hell). Killing him accomplishes nothing but sending him back there, at which point he just calls a spare body he probably keeps lying around.

burguulkodar

WOW! That... actually makes sense. And explains why Ranger "can't kill him".

Amazing, whether or not it is true.

tmeenaks

By this theory, the man went and made an entire hell his phylactery. Well, guess that atleast solved the issue of the heroes always getting the mcguffing that kills the villain. Don't think the heroes can steal an entire layer of hell

Javvies

Hmmm.

Depending on the definition of "Alive" in use ... that could go very poorly for Malicia. There are states of being where dead would be preferable to alive. Ie, that Hall of Screams in the Tower. Or Akua, before Cat started letting her out for walks.

Another month before Masego is at risk. Good, hopefully Cat is back by then.

The fragments of Book that the Dead King let loose might well be a trap of sorts. But I don't think the impressions in Arcadia are – those would probably have been an unplanned side effect. Also, I'm not sure that Tikoloshe is right when he says that the Dead King must have been killed before by a Hero. Besides ... even if Tikoloshe is right, it'd be far more likely that the Dead King would have a breeding program to provide suitable hosts in Keter/his private Hell, rather than being dependent on finding one when he needs one somewhere in the rest of Calernia.

Dainpdf

He may have known about the side-effect and planned for it, or noticed it afterwards and... "cleaned up" the reflections so they show exactly what he wanted.

Javvies

If he's trapped in Keter/the attached Hell without an invitation, as many seem to think, how could he have done so?

At any rate, I'm inclined to say that the impressions in Arcadia are far less likely to be an intentional trap, and even if they were, they'd likely be easier to notice (at least for Heirophant/Masego), than the known fragments of his Book.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I was under the impression that Dead King wasn't trapped, but he didn't like leaving Hell without an invitation. If he has an invitation there is another big villain to be defeated. He's being used like a scary weapon and the "real" villain gets stepped on by Above. Malacia is being used as a lightning rod or fall girl essentially. And when Heaven squishes her, he goes screaming back down to Hell.

I might be totally wrong though. Of course, that the clause were the protection goes away if Malacia dies doesn't really matter. If Malacia dies the Dead King goes screaming back to Hell.

SpeckofStardust

Reread the conversation between Him and bard in Interlude: Empires it is from his point of view and these lines confirm it.

"Neshamah's foot scuffed the stone.

Such a slight sound, barely more than a whisper. He'd not heard it in a very, very long time."

and

"“It has been too long,” he said, voice pensive. “The Serenity remains a lacking imitation. There is a... taste to Creation. A skilled pupil I may be, yet a pupil still.”” Or at least he needs conditions for him to even be outside of Serenity or even be in keter fully, and they are rare to happen.

Dainpdf

Nowhere does it say that he needs an invitation. Only that he doesn't come out without one (or at least still only comes out very very rarely).

Dainpdf

Mayhap. We do know he has gone outside a few times, however, and he could always have done it through agents. He has plenty of those.

Heck, maybe he got Triumphant to do it as part of that pact they had. Who knows?

Neshamah is millenia old and he either invented or advanced trimegistan sorcery beyond what was previously conceived back when the continent didn't even know what Arcadia was, exactly. He might have the expertise to pull a fast one over Masego when the latter examines a phenomenon he hasn't encountered before (or at least, not frequently).

---

That may actually be the reason he invited them, knowing Catherine would go through Arcadia. Especially since he provided them with instructions on how to reach Keter, which would presumably include the shards he needed.

Dainpdf

He also seemed to have been interested in providing Cat with a small bit of guidance – basically a safe bet she'll be a lit sharper on the Bard's backyard.

luminiousblu

We already know that you can rip out a person's soul without killing them, that's the loophole Cat used to get at Akua's retainers after First Llesse.

Richard Gallivan

I suddenly realize this could end with Akua in Malicia's body. Cat doesn't climb the tower, she stands atop it's rulers shoulders.

I mean, this could work. Akua has to serve cat same as she always had. But she's in charge, and since she's a puppeted puppeter even if some high lord gets the knife in she rolls her eyes and turns his blood to ice. Iron finds itself shattering against steel. Ivah rules the Drow, Akua rules Praes (which she really was born to do, and so in wonderful villian narrative she gets everything she wanted, just not the way she wanted it), and both bend the knee, for the Soverign of Moonless nights and Dread Empress still must serve the Black Queen, a name delayed that re-emerges far more powerful for it's delay.

Ezario Gerion

I absolutely LOVE when cast have discussions and plans without the main character.

Dainpdf

Interesting. So Revenant's loss of self may be more from the Dead King's method being tainted than any actual problem with Apotheosis. Interestingly, Cat did something kind of similar with weaving herself into Winter for Akua to bring back. This might mean Cat is not Fakerine, after all... Though really, when has Creation not gone with the "screw Cat" option? Also the Gods sound like the sort of people that would have made mortals incapable of surviving apotheosis.

Gunslinger

Ohh I like the connection between Cat weaving her soul into Winter. So does this mean that the Dead King did the equivalent for undeath? Bonded his soul with necromantic energy in the fullest so any powerful use of it brings him back

Dainpdf

Maybe only for his specific form of undeath (rituals based on his methods)? If he effectively called dibs on lichdom, I will be very, very impressed.

---

His mantle may have been the thing Catherine felt she was touching when she first learned necromancy. It didn't feel unnatural, just alien.

Javvies

I think that might have been a temporal echo of Winter-yet-to-come.

Remember, when she beat the Duke of Violent Squalls, her victory terms made it so that she had always had the signet ring – making her always the his Heir and thus always touched by a Winter Title.

Wouldn't have worked anywhere but Arcadia, but Arcadia doesn't have all the same rules as Creation, and especially cheats when it comes to Time.

Byzantine

Which explains why her necromancy was always... different. Including being able to do things it shouldn't, like help her control her own body.

usernamesbco

It sounds like either his writings or his specific method of apotheosis have been seeded with a memetic hazard.

That doesn't mean that the Arcadia echoes weren't seeded.

Skaddix

I mean Malicia is smart enough to leave the obvious holes that Akua left but the Dead King has been in the game for a long time.

Oh the Archer and Masego relationship might actually go somewhere and does Masego lines imply he actually gets to sit in the center of the fleet now.

I am inclined to trust are resident Incubus it seems weird to me the Dead King runs into a powerful mage and doesn't talk shop directly at all. Increasing your power by taking control of others does make a degree of sense to me.

I suppose though the Calamities and Woe should wait for the rescue attempt, Ranger needs time to fully recover and Cat needs time to get back with Archer and the new recruits sadly the Drow takeaway the element of surprise for her if she uses them to help save Black. Even if this gives the Heroes time to prep it should mark the meeting between Cat and Hanno though and I am interesting to see how that goes.

Dainpdf

Terribly gauche to leave a second comment, but I came upon two ideas I hadn't before...

First, Warlock did not think he could alter Masego's memories without him noticing within a few months... How long can Cat alter Diabolist's? It has been five months. Though I guess her indirect method might fool those who expect sorcerous shenanigans, it's still a cautionary point.

Second: so the Dead King (allegedly) takes over someone when he dies – specifically mages who have studied and performed rituals he deliberately leaked. That is, in a way, similar to the Bard. It raises the question of what opens one to it in her case. Is it inborn? I wonder if she takes over other Bardic names? Here you are, random Bard, suddenly you're the Intercessor.

Might explain why Neshamah and Cat's bodies are simulacra while the Bard's doesn't seem to be – he takes over undead, Cat takes over Fae, the Intercessor takes over Named.

...or maybe she just springs fully formed from Nowhere.

Dainpdf

Uh... I did not intend this to be a reply. Terribly sorry.

Javvies

As for the memories front ... Warlock would be removing memories outright, and not insignificant chunks of memories, but extended periods of time.

Also, it's only a matter of time before someone who knows what Masego did asks if he has made progress.

Cat's not so much removing as blurring/obscuring relatively short periods of time with similar content.

Warlock is deleting the entire playlist, Cat is switching out one song for a similar one (different group covering the same song).

Or, in other words, Warlock is removing all the Pink Floyd, whereas Cat is replacing one Pink Floyd song with a Brit Floyd version of the song.

So to speak.

Dainpdf

I thought Warlock's idea was to remove the knowledge, then alter the memory of the removal, but yours makes more sense. Thanks.

Jane

Given that Hierophant harvested the Dead King's thoughts as well as his words, wouldn't he be the best informed as to whether it's a trap or not? I don't deny that the Dead King may have laid an exceedingly careful trap for someone like Hierophant, carefully editing his own thoughts to hide his intent, but it seems less likely to me. I mean, even if he was capable of such a thing, wouldn't the fragments of the tainted book be enough for his contingency?

I can't dismiss the idea out of hand, and Masego should be informed of the possible danger either way, but I think Masego would be the better judge here, despite his inexperience.

Skaddix

Hard to tell we don't know enough about the Magic System. But I think the idea of the book is not to possess people persay but to bring people to the Dead King. Beyond that the Dead King probably only tries to take over the best of the best. If Masego or Akua read the book they are worth taking. If the standard Imperial mage reads the book, I doubt the Dead King cares.

As for memory manipulation, Dead King has what 3 Millennium of Experience, Masego has a dozen or so years? It could also be the Dead King cannot actively use his possession unless he is allowed to move freely on the Material World ie until the he made a deal with the Empress he was contained.

---

Well, so did Catherine, and she didn't know about the mind bleedover beforehand. It might have been an unintended consequence, like being trapped in hell.

Speaking of Catherine, is this a foreshadowing as to what will happen when she'll try to transfer her title? I though the idea of making the Sovereign of Moonless Night an item was weird and came out of nowhere, but considering that Neshamah had been called a lich before, and phylacteries are a thing, this starts looking more familiar.

lennymaster

Making the title into an object actually makes a lot of sense. For example a crown.

Imagine it, the crown of Callow, or maybe a sword, throne, staff, orb, the very mantle she is wearing, simply handed over to the next in lline after a predefined span of time that actually turns the (legitimate) owner into the holder of the title.

WuseMajor

Yeah, I'm inclined to think that a frank discussion with Masego about this theory is probably a better idea than trying to trap him somewhere and extract the knowledge. Masego is not as above emotion as he thinks but he usually reacts better to a logical argument than ...well anything else.

SilentWatcher

Finally someone who speaks my mind. Masego was only angry with his fathers for denying the knoweledge whitout even involving him. Now they try it again? Did they learn nothing? That is the start of a story where Masego becomes his enemy. I doubt the memories Masego harvested are trapped. Firstly he needed an Aspect (Witness) to even acess the Echo so tampering of the echo is probably out, second when the Dead King created the Kingdom of the Dead, he couldnt have concentrated on a Trap for someone else, because the ritual seemed highly complicated. The Book of Darkness on the other hand could very well be a Trap, as its highly suspicious Neshama would record his Ritual, which gave him so much power.

Antoninjohn

I would not be surprised if Black were captured that he is a plague carrier as in he stored the plague in his body and will release it when he is in Salia

Skaddix

I mean the Pilgrim made the plague and it has an incubation period so it seems weird that Black could pull a fast one on the Pilgrim with his own plague.

Taltos Dreamer

Right? Oops, you villains totally saved the Black Knight. Silly us...heheh

NerfGlastigUaine

Damn, this Fathers-Son argument is really coming to a head. Masego will not take this lying down – whatever happens it will permanently burn bridges. Whether Wekesa and Tikoloshe succeed in detaining Masego and excising his memory and whether Masego will cut ties entirely with them remains to be seen.

Loving the interludes and all the important revelations, theories, and developments, but really hoping you get back to Cat's perspective. You left us on something of a cliffhanger after all.

sugarrollblog

The next time we see Catherine, she may be coming back out to the surface already. It's been 5 months according to this chapter and the way the last Catherine chapter went, it's very easy to imagine the whole of Lotow fell under Catherine's control.

I mean, I want to know what will happen between her and the Sve Noc but I wouldn't be surprised if it gets skipped and story just gets told later.

Javvies

If there's a timeskip in the middle of annexing the drow, I think we'd still see Cat and Sve of Night's initial encounter/discussion, even if we didn't see the how the whole thing went and ended.

werafdsaew

The way the story is going, there will certainly be a Masego rescue arc.

Javvies

Ah, but who will he be in need of rescue from? Warlock/Malicia? Or Unexpected Heroes?

Also, there's already an inevitable Rescue Black/Amadeus.

Is Cat going to be forced to choose who to rescue? To save Masego or to save Black? Presumably with dire consequences for the one she doesn't save first.

That's totally a Heroic story arc, not a Villainous one.

werafdsaew

Faith in what? What is he talking about?

Nafram

He probably refers to the fact that he told Cat that Wekesa wouldn't act against him, even at the behest of the empress. He is essentially saying that he either has faith in Wekesa or he does not.

Javvies

I'm pretty sure it is Faith in Cat, that Cat is still Cat.

Morgenstern

Second what Javvies said. My impression as well.

Nafram

Again, they make the same mistake. Masego is not a fool, if they shared their misgivings and that theory, then perhaps Masego would listen. But instead they choose to act behind his back and decide his fate without consulting him.

And the worst part about it is that if they go through with it, then they lose Masego one way or the other.

burdi

its still big chance you now, that black getting caught is part of his plan to end the empire.

when on red vale war he said to grim that the empire not worth saving, and in this chapter wekesa pretty much wondering why black wandering in proceran land. black not care about his life as long his goal obtained.

Seabornia

Am I the only one to think Tikoloshe is a traitor? It seems suspicious that he was with The Witch, who indirectly helped DK come to power – if DK doesn't leave openings, he should have controlled it. Hence, now he can be trying to protect his initial master knowledge – it doesn't mean the books aren't a trap, but I doubt anyone could hack aspect before it came to power

Azure

So Masego is seeing Vivienne as almost regal. Interesting. I think that might have some interesting implications for her name. I miss the rest of the Woe. I hope they aren't separated from Catherine for too much longer.

Novice

Right? I'm sensing some kind of ruler-themed name.

*Tek*

"He can inhabit different bodies, he could even as a mortal," Tikoloshe said. "But how useful would it really be to wear some farmer's skin? No, he'd need mages. Talented, ambitious, well-trained in the use of their powers. And to ensure they made their way to him, seeds were sown."

The year is 2018. We finally got a character who is a literal meme.

Raved Thrad

Did Wekesa just indicate that the Black Knight has a horcrux somewhere? 🤔

Barthumphries

Typo thread

Noticed several typos. On mobile, will go back later looking for them unless someone else posts them first.

Michael

In the earlier chapters people always make a fuss about how bad it would be for the Fae to gain a foothold in Creation. Cat, in her conversation with Ubua even compared giving them that foothold with summoning Demons. Why is that?

Barthumphries

They're not real. They're story-bound monsters who could drag all of us into their literally amoral never-ending wars.

Cold Cyberia

It's an alien power source that warps people and allows immortal demigods to have a presence in Creation. Not advisable.

Rup

...if operating on a different set of logic should truly be called
..mad
..the insanity of genius

Dylan Tullos

Impossible stupidity confirmed!

Instead of killing Black, they've decided to use him in an overcomplicated trap that everyone sees coming. There's no possible way for that to go wrong.

Cicero

Ehh... using Black as bait in a trap in order to negate your enemies massively superior mobility actually strikes me as quite smart and not stupid at all.

Byzantine

It's tactically smart.

It's story stupid.

Which is more important?

Javvies

It's story stupid when fighting a Hero, or, someone playing a Heroic Role.
They're fighting Villains. And don't realize or are disregarding Cat's tendency to utilize Heroic Roles in the Narrative.

The Story slants things towards Heroes, not Villains, and most never step into the Roles of the other side.

When it comes to Villains, the Story won't give them an edge against superior tactics the way it would a Hero.

So as far as the Heroes are concerned/thinking, the tactical value for them (Heroes, so significant) exceeds the Story value for the Calamities and the Woe (Villains, so minor at best).

The thing is, they should not be disregarding Cat's usage of Heroic Roles and Stories so lightly, they should know about it and be terrified about what they're calling down on themselves. Ignoring the fact that they (and everyone else) should be fucking terrified that Cat has been MIA for months.

caoimhinh

I wonder if Catherine being MIA was a factor that influenced their decision of letting Black live and set a trap.

The unknown is a scary thing when making plans, and when Cat reappears with an army of Drow they will shit themselves in panic and disbelief.

Javvies

Maybe for Pilgrim. He might have wanted Black alive as leverage against Cat/Callow/Praes/etc.

Cordelia Hasenbach is probably similar in outlook here (plus she likely doesn't want the repercussions of killing Black being tied to her).

But Saint (and Bard) apparently don't give a fuck and want to burn the board and start over. It's possible that they want Black as a prisoner solely for the sake of drawing out Cat, in order to get rid of them both before starting over. On the other hand, Bard, at least, should know better than to rely solely on the Heroes vs Villains Narrative when it comes to Cat.

Javvies

Eh, it's not exactly a bad idea, objectively speaking.
The point is to draw in the Woe, remaining Calamities, and whatever other Praesi resources they can manage, into attacking on ground prepared for them. And preferably leverage news of an execution or something into bringing them on at a known time frame.

Unfortunately, this really is more of a Villainous ploy than a Heroic one. That probably won't matter for the Calamities and whatever Praesi resources they bring. That's a Villain vs Villain story at worst for the "Heroes", and Creation won't help the Calamities, turning it into a question of who prepared better, and they're on the Heroes chosen and prepared ground. But against the Woe? And Cat – who has a habit of riding the line between Heroics and Villainy? Who has repeatedly taken on Heroic Roles? And considers Black a Mentor/Father figure? The plan to use Black as a Hostage is automatically Doomed against Cat and the Woe.

The Heroes likely discount Cat and the Woe playing the Roles of Heroes and the attendant hazards of that in this story as far as Creation is concerned because they're Villains and nominally on the side of Evil. Though Pilgrim and Saint really should know better based on what happened with Cat in the Battle of the Camps.

Cicero

You know Warlock, maybe instead of imprisoning your son you should just... I don't know, warn him about your fears that this is a trap?!?

caoimhinh

Yeah, this is going to backfire horribly to Wekesa, and burn the bridge between him and his son.

Worst thing is, Warlock will probably weep like a father that was abandoned by his beloved son, and not realize he actually did a stupid thing based on personal fears and assumptions. It's their own damn fault that Masego is getting further away from them.

Antony444

A very interesting chapter overall with plenty of reactions making me wonder how many heads are going to roll to accomplish these objectives...

The more I hear Wekesa and Tikoloshe speak, the more I am convinced the two survival in Creation was entirely due to Black making them avoid the major pitfalls. Amadeus would have known the possible neutralisation of Masego was a monumental bad idea both narratively and strategically and shouted NO! the moment after it was proposed. Sabah would have also likely objected. But there's only Warlock now, with Malicia as his ally. Sabah is dead. Hye is implied to be heavily wounded after battling the Summer Queen. We don't know where Assassin is and he never fought in the open. Scribe was never considered to be a 'real Calamity.

There are no heroes and Wekesa is overconfident. Moreover, he's taking the position of danger while he has himself agreed the times are past for his generation.

This is a lot of death flags, especially as Malicia has made this battle a pivot for the entire war.

I am wondering: if Warlock dies, is Trikoloshe banished from Creation too?

Malicia selling Procer and almost all of Calernia is not something I saw coming. Half of Procer was already bad, and Cat was definitely right she could afford to bid more, but why give the Dead King everything save Praes and Callow? There's something fishy going on...

Cat has been gone for five months? Well, a lot of people must have very bad nights, thinking where she might have gone...

Javvies

Selling out all of the rest of Calernia is a way to protect herself. Especially if she doesn't further attack the rest of Calernia and just digs in and fortifies what she's got.

After all, the Dead King has been making minions out of Heroes who attacked him for centuries, if not millennia.

It would turn the Dead King and Keter into an active Hero Magnet, rather than Heroes going after the Tower.

If her gambit works, I think she gets a functionally quiescent border. After all, even the Lycaonese aren't trying to flip on the offensive against the Ratlings, and certainly no Heroes are spawning to do so either.

By promoting the Dead King to Active Big Bad status, the Tower drops in the priority for Above, and doesn't need to deal with a Crusade or as many (if any) Heroes being focused on it.

Or she's got some other plan going on.

Or she lied about the terms she made with the Dead King.

RanVor

Assuming Neshamah is going to respect the terms after taking over the entire continent.

Javvies

One, Hakram brings up the possibility of a magical contract. A magical contact likely has magical means of enforcement, or magically enforced repercussions for breaking it. In other words, either it cannot be broken, and/or bad things happen if you somehow do.

Two, I'm not sure she thinks he'll succeed to that extent before Above starts raining Heroes on him. Besides, if he gets too close to succeeding, it's likely that Bard would try to bring in the Titanomachy and/or the Elves, if not people from beyond Calernia. Also, at that point, the Dwarves might get involved, since if he expands beyond Keter on the surface, their plan to contain him is worthless. No point blocking off the subsurface of Keter if he owns Procer too.

RanVor

Ok, that's pretty solid ground for this kind of assumption.

Cicero

Something I thought of.

Doesn't Cat's ability to Speak suggest that she is in fact still alive as Cat after apotheosis?

Since Speaking is an ability she gets from her gnawed on Squire Name, and does not come from Winter.

lennymaster

My opinion is that Cat is Cat, that apotheosis demanded its price from her, but that it did not change fundamentally enough to make her stop being the same person, or one that developed from her instead of merely being a slightly imperfect mirage. Nonetheless, there is nothing that suggests that Speaking is not merely an expression of power and or mindset. Or perhaps a skill she developed and intuitively figured out how to use by merely reaching for a different source as fuel.

Death Knight

All I'm saying is if the Pilgrim kills Black the Titanomachy will become a fucking peninsula.

Javvies

Oh, I don't know about that.

Remember, Warlock links to Hells that rain hellfire and burning rock. Instead of burning down below bedrock, he might resurface with a few hundred feet of precipitate from those Hells.

Masego ... not enough info to work with, though he might cooperate with Cat to pull a Fimbulwinter instead.

Snowfire1224

Something I just noticed, Masego mentions that Vivienne has grown her hair out and that it makes her look more regal. Perhaps she's going to transition into a name related to nobility of some sort?

caoimhinh

I thought about that ever since she first mentioned that her hair was still growing while for any other Named it would have stopped. Vivienne believed it was due to her approaching to losing her Name, so she was scared and stressed over it, but I believe it's fairly possible that she is in a transition to another Name, due to both her desire to be stronger and her new role as something bigger than a mere thief, let's keep in mind that Names change their holder's appearance to match how they see themselves deep down.

Whether her new name has something to do with stealing is unknown (though chances are that it does) but it will be very interesting and she will finally get rid of her inferiority complex. I really look forward to it.

hikiller123

stupid questions. What is the difference between a Name and Fey Title. Does the Fey Title Kat has "contain the squire Name". So if there is a Squire candidate do they have to kill her and if she gets a Name does it need to be based on the Squire Name (i.e Knight of some form) or is it like having no Name. Lastly does the Fey Title prevent/supersede/subsume a Name if it is upstaged

DocTao

Are we all forgetting what the Saint said? The heroic plan is not to win, it is to reshape Procer. What is the intended shape and how does this fit?

Javvies

It's not to reshape Procer, it's to burn the whole thing (continent) down and start over from zero.

I think the plan is to turn all of Good-aligned Calernia into something like the Lycaonese and/or Pre-Conquest Callow.

---

Interlude: Inheritance

"Dearest Edda, beloved daughter. I would offer you words of wisdom or comfort, but after a lifetime of ink I find my hands have finally taken leave of me. I have written of good and evil for many years, seeking truths, but in the end I have no answers to offer. All I have, my heart, is a prayer. That you be kind. That you leave the world a little better than you found it and teach your children to do the same. And maybe, just maybe, one day we will be what we pretend we are."

– Last will and testament of King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

Wekesa had fought three wars in his lifetime, and had slowly come to realize that the Tenth Crusade was nothing like the others.

There'd been so many skirmishes over the years he could hardly recall all of them, so many faces and names and defiant – or accusatory, or castigating, or a hundred different tones only ever hiding the same fear – speeches. Enough dead heroes to make a mansion of the corpses. There was no glory in it, Warlock had known from the start. How many of those young men and women had soft faces, barely into adolescence? Those fights had not been part of a war, though Amadeus fancied otherwise when he murmured of his old argument with the Heavens. It'd been... ratcatching, Wekesa often thought. Trapping and killing vermin before they could grow to be a true problem. Even using the word execution would have implied a sentence, an act of judgement. There'd been none, though. Nothing behind the slaying save the decision never to allow those rats to grow and spread. It sometimes amused Warlock that for all his old friend's talk of the fundamental disparity between the lot of heroes and villains, when given the opportunity to deal out the same treatment he'd not hesitated for a moment.

It was not a deep argument, he knew. The differences were many. Amadeus' high-minded distaste was for a perceived imbalance between what heroes and villains as a whole were allowed to achieve by their stories, not particular cases, and the Black Knight would likely argue that even similar actions would have different meanings when carried out by mortals instead of Gods. Wekesa could and had appreciated, even when they'd first met, that Amadeus was driven by what could be called a philosophical principle rather than mere lust for power. It'd been a refreshing change, after the then-Apprentice's years spent rubbing elbows with the nobility of the Empire. It was a deplorably limited understanding of the world, perhaps, but a notch above what any of their contemporaries had been able to contemplate. In the end, though, it was still missing the forest for the trees. Seeking redress for scales uneven was still putting stock in the scale itself, when it was that thing's very existence that should be questioned. There was no fixing Creation, Wekesa suspected.

And if by some miracle it was, the Gods would promptly break it again.

And so Warlock had put his energies where they rightly belonged: his research, his family and his friends. Disappearing into some remote locale to study in peace would have been short-sighted, unfortunately. An old monster alone in the mountains, meddling in things man was not meant to know? He would have been the proving grounds of a dozen heroes. Besides, keeping strong ties to Alaya and Amadeus' empire had secured to old libraries and a steady source of income and materials. If that meant occasionally making an appearance at court, disciplining a few ambitious sorts and smothering nascent heroism when it sprouted? Well, it was a decent bargain. He did not regret making it, not even now. There'd been some frictions before the understanding was properly reached, of course. Amadeus had wanted him to found some sort of mage academy that'd supplant the teaching cadres of the High Lords, and not quite understood why Wekesa had refused. He'd tried to lower the years Warlock would have spent as headmaster of the institution, before Wekesa flatly told him there was nothing to compromise over. Warlock had helped to create this 'modern empire' of theirs because it mattered to them, not because he himself particularly cared about the state of Praes. The country could be an empty desert and it wouldn't matter to him.

He'd fought the wars that saw them rise on personal grounds, not principled ones.

It was the worst argument they'd ever had and for that Wekesa blamed Hye, who'd left before the Conquest even ended, and managed to both cut Amadeus to the bone and leave him twice in love as before with the same sentence when she walked away. The wound had never entirely healed, and Warlock had ended up paying the price in a deadbeat Ranger's stead. Typical of her, really. She never stuck around for the parts that weren't thrilling, the sometimes tedious spadework of building and maintaining relationships. Tikoloshe had noted it was almost mythically hypocritical of him to blame someone for having bonds only on their own terms, but his husband was wrong. He'd put in the work, afterwards, to clean up the mess between himself and his oldest friend in the world. Hye, on the other hand, simply made do with visitations every few years that Amadeus came back from split halfway between longing and chagrin. Wekesa's long-standing reservations about that arrangement had been the tide that carried him closer to Alaya, as it happened.

When they'd first met her in the Green Stretch all those years ago he'd not been as close as Amadeus to the woman who became Malicia: he and Sabah had shared the seat of designated third wheel as those two strange youths gravitated around each other, everything else falling to the wayside of their long conversations. Still, he'd found he well-educated for a peasant – her mother had been a tutor to a minor noble line, once – and as charming as she was intelligent. He'd considered her a close acquaintance, and been quite infuriated to hear she'd been unceremoniously abducted by the Sentinels because the waste of skin holding the Tower was hungry for seraglio beauties. It would be years before they met again, after bloodily climbing the ladder of influence, and when Wekesa next saw Alaya there were only shards of the girl she'd once been remaining. He'd grieved for that, but the woman she'd become had been fascinating. Broken, perhaps, but all the more brilliant for it. But there'd been a war on, soon enough, and though they'd fought for her claim his reasons for supporting it had been largely selfish. If Amadeus had been the one aiming for the throne, there would have been decades of war instead of years.

Praesi would have been violently disgusted at the notion of a Duni claiming the Tower, much less one inclined to eradicate the aristocracy.

In the years that followed, however, his opinion had shifted. Alaya was undeniably more fit to rule. She was Praesi in a way none of them were, understood the people she reigned over where Amadeus would have messily carved away at them until they were more to his liking. And though Malicia used the Calamities, she did so sparingly: she preferred to rule on her own merits, without other Named propping up her crown. She asked little of them save friendship and the rare favour. It was an ideal arrangement, in his eyes, and he'd frankly told her as much. The confluence in their opinions had only grown as the years passed, and while Amadeus busied himself with his Callowan projects Wekesa had spent long stretches in Ater for his research. Seen the harsh demands authority made of Alaya, and admitted to himself that Black would not have weathered them so well. The Tower... it magnified what you were. Your virtues, but also your flaws. Malicia had mastered hers, but the same influence would have made something ugly of Amadeus. Perverted his best qualities. Scribe disagreed, of course, but Eudokia had stark blinders. She'd only ever seen herself as a tool, Amadeus as worthy to use her, and so to use everyone else. There was no place for nuance in that perspective. That Sabah had never weighed in on the matter had been telling, he'd thought.

She was ever only so circumspect when coddling one of them.

And now Sabah was dead. Killed by some murderous vagrant from the Dominion at the behest of the Wandering Bard. Wekesa had wept for it, after. For the loss of such a beloved friend, for the hole she would leave in all of them with her absence. It'd not been the same since. Amadeus had become reckless while telling himself it was calculated risk, burning one bridge after another until it'd left him stranded in the middle of fucking Procer with heroic wolves baying at his heels. Alaya had been forced to become increasingly heavy-handed to keep it all from falling apart while simultaneously the particulars of the Woe prevented her from dealing with them as she legitimately should. Warlock had made it clear that Masego was off-limits, of course, but was increasingly coming to sympathize with her situation. Wekesa and Amadeus had dropped a mess into her lap and then heavily restricted her means to deal with threats not of her own making. It was unfair, and the private admission of that had done much to reconcile Warlock with the necessity of putting his son under house arrest for a few years.

As for the Black Queen, well, Warlock had washed his hands clean of that. He'd help Alaya deal with the aftermath by making it clear to Amadeus that Catherine Foundling had been dead for over a year now, but he wouldn't have the imitation's blood on his hands when his old friend returned. He could hardly serve as a mediator if he'd taken part in the matter in need of mediation.

It'd all grown so complicated, hadn't it? This war was so different from all the others. The civil strife that had seen Alaya rise to the throne, the Conquest itself – they'd been of the same mould, in a way. They'd all been young or in their prime, and still making their mark on Creation. But now that mark was made, and they were being forced to defend it. They'd spread out too far, Wekesa often thought. Sabah had died thousands of mile away from the Wasteland, fighting over some League shithole they'd never seen before and likely never would again. Amadeus had been caught in Proceran heartlands while prosecuting a war that should have been the Black Queen's by right. That there was a Black Queen at all was a reminder of how badly the Callowan situation had been blundered over, and for all that Wekesa sympathized with Alaya she'd hardly handled the Wasteland better. Akua Sahelian should have been abducted year ago, every bit of knowledge wrung out of her mind before she was butchered so thoroughly not even devils would be able to get their due from her. If Malicia had needed a doomsday weapon she should have asked him, not tried to get clever in house already visibly on fire.

And the damned fire had only spread since. Wekesa was not pleased he had to intervene, but who else was left? It'd have to be him. The Ashurans would be broken here, and afterwards he'd free Alaya's hands to deal with the rest of the situation. Feelings would get hurts, cities would burn, but in the end the only people involved who mattered to him were pragmatists. There would be eternity to get over this little scuffle, as his friends had all the others before them.

It was a month full of long silences that passed before the Ashuran war fleet finally arrived. His son and husband remained at odds, though thankfully neither were the kind of men to trade barbs or seek out screaming matches. The work proceeded at a faster pace now that conversation had effectively died out. Wekesa occasionally felt a pang of regret at turning what was one of the greatest achievements of Praesi sorcery – in his own chosen field of study, to boot! – into what was effectively a pack of munitions, but he could think of no other way. Shatha's Maze had been the main sea defence of the city for too long. There'd been centuries of opportunity for the Thalassocracy to study it, and though last time they'd struck at Thalassina it had been treachery that'd been their means of passing it that did not mean the Maze was unbreakable. That pack of greedy sailors wouldn't be risking an assault at all, if that were the case, and Alaya was certain that they were coming. She still had agents in Ashuran ranks, though entire swaths of her network had been purged before the Thalassocracy declared war.

The ships came under cover of night.

That much had been expected. With scrying being blocked off, it was now watchtowers that served as the city's first line of defence. Considering the nature of Ashuran sorcery, sailing at night even in treacherous waters was hardly difficult and afforded some element of surprise. What had not been expected was that the fleet moved under illusory cover as well. Some kind of sea mirage, Warlock found out, closer to natural phenomenon than Praesi illusions or fae glamour. Much harder to detect than either, though also likely much more difficult to maintain. That bought the invaders two days of unseen advance before they were caught out by a Thalassinan mage attempting to scry the weather ahead of their fleet and finding it impossible to do so. It alarmed High Lord Idriss enough that the man ordered a ritual strike at the area, calling down lightning from the sky, and though the sorcery impacted Ashuran defences harmlessly it did shatter the mirage. Ashur had stolen the initiative, and there was barely a day and a half to organize before they were on the city.

The work on the Maze was mostly finished, but not entirely. It would have to prove sufficient. Mass rituals by High Lord Idriss' mages lent a finishing touch to the trap while allowing Warlock and his son to remain at full strength. Masego's perch out in the corals was fully accommodated with defensive wards and the few creature comforts his son had requested, and he left for it half a day before the Ashurans arrived. The solemnity of the parting eased the tensions between them some, though not as much as Wekesa would have liked.

"I'd still be more comfortable with your father taking the position," Tikoloshe admitted, smoothing away nonexistent wrinkles on their son's robes.

"I see no need to revisit the matter," Masego bluntly replied.

Wekesa discretely shook his head while meeting his husband's eyes. Now was not the time.

"Be careful," Warlock said. "They might be meddlers but there are a great many of them. If it gets out of hand, I'd rather you retreat and we fight over the city itself."

"I've no intention of risking my life for Thalassina, I assure you," Masego said.

He nodded in approval. In this, at least, he had his priorities straight. Wekesa hesitated, then pulled his son into a tight embrace. Masego stiffened but eventually returned it, their clutch on each other growing tight. There were no guarantees, in war. They both knew that all too well.

"Come back to us," Warlock whispered.

"I will," Masego whispered back, voice little more than croak. "You two stay safe as well. I know you'll have walls in between, but rituals-"

"-are never a toy, always dangerous," Wekesa finished softly.

One of the first lessons he'd taught his son. Magic was beautiful and wondrous, but it should never be taken lightly. Great mages had believed themselves to have mastered their powers fully, and always paid for that presumption. There were no exceptions. They released each other and Tikoloshe kissed both their son's cheeks, fingers lingering on his shoulder. Masego was so thin, now.

"We'll have a family supper tonight," 'Loshe said. "Just us. It's been too long."

Masego nodded before heading out for the docks, where a ship would await him. They both watched him leave, standing together.

"He will not be that tender with us again for a very long time," Tikoloshe murmured.

Wekesa grimaced, but did not deny it. After today they'd have to bind his powers and take him into custody. He would not forgive them that for a very long time.

"Preparations are done," Warlock said. "The rest we can worry about tomorrow."

Work mercifully took away his mind from it all, for there was much still left to do. The set-up was not particular complex – Petronian sorcery was a straightforward as the Miezans who'd created it – but it was rather laborious. Two-way scrying panels were set up along the city's outer battlements so that Wekesa would have good overview of the Maze and the Ashurans, then anchored in a crescent moon around him as the last touches were put to the circle of power where he'd direct the rituals from. That the defence was taking place on a High Lord's dime meant the very finest materials had been acquired for this, obsidian from the Grey Eyries and Callowan limestone mixing with half a dozen other substances that put together could have easily bought a luxurious mansion in Ater. As Warlock sat at the heart of the array, four more circles were initiated. Every practitioner in the city had been pressed into service for the purpose, which was rather simple: they were to release sorcery into their attributed circle, where Wekesa would be able to take it and use it for his own purposes.

The recent labour of activating the wards of Shatha's Maze had left too many mages exhausted and on the edge of burning out, sadly, which meant that to make up the losses two thousand criminals had to be slain and their life force provided instead. Wekesa disliked using such primitive means, but it could not be denied that the power resulting was pure and plentiful. If they'd had another week it could have been avoided, but as things stood he'd have to make his peace with it. It was late morning when the preparations were complete, and from that point forward Warlock sat with his eyes closed. Keeping mastery of four circles beyond his own while not actively using the power within required a great deal of concentration. Tikoloshe sat next to him, idly paging through a rather lurid Proceran romance, and though his husband remained silent his mere presence was soothing.

The Ashuran war fleet came into sight halfway past Noon Bell, and so finally the battle for Thalassina began.

It was said that the Thalassocracy had more war ships than the rest of Calernia put together, and it was easy to believe that while looking upon their fleet. More than three hundred ships, flying the colours of the Baalite Hegemony with the masked sun of Ashur set on them. It was not even the full muster of Ashuran might, Wekesa knew. There were still ships out raiding, and smaller defense fleet left to anchor in the Ashuran home isle.

"Around third of those are repurposed merchant ships," Tikoloshe noted, his practiced eye picking up on the signs. "No ballistas on them, they'll be serving as troop transports."

"It won't matter, if they never make shore," Warlock replied.

Ashur took the offensive, as was only to be expected. By now they'd have realized that Shatha's Maze had been activated, though they should still be unaware of the... modifications added to it. Wekesa kept the four pools of power close at hand. Two of those, he'd already decided, would be kept in reserve to detonate the Maze. Only one was necessary strictly, speaking, but best to be prudent. The other two were his to shape in answer to Ashuran assaults, however. After that he would have to draw on his own power, which would be difficult. His preferred field of study was useless on water, and his knowledge of Sabrathan sorcery was limited. There would be no turning the spells around here as he had done when duelling the Witch of the Woods. It would have been madness to attempt the same tactics against an army that he'd used against a single Named, regardless. One Gifted he could account for, no matter how talented, but hundreds on hundreds? There were too many variables, even if they resorted to rituals. The waters ahead of the war fleet rippled unnaturally, and Wekesa learned forward.

"So it begins," the Sovereign of Red Skies murmured.

It was a ritual, that much was obvious. The limitations of their practitioners were fully displayed as massive amounts of sorcery sunk into the waves but moved only sluggishly: Ashuran mages were known used to working in concert.

"Strike?" Tikoloshe said.

Wekesa studied the sea's surface. The ripples were gaining in strength, but not forward. Splitting to the sides? Ah. He smiled.

"They believe the defence is being directed from the underground facilities on the shore," he said.

"We never took down the wards on them," Tikoloshe noted. "There was no reason to."

"Let them waste their first blow, then," Warlock said.

It was an interesting working, he had to admit. Tendrils of water rose from the sea and began spinning like gargantuan drills, impacting the shore with thunderous crack and going straight through the rock. Quicker than simple water should, even rotating. A hardening effect, perhaps? He could see no trace of it, but there was only so much he could find out at this distance. If there'd been anyone underground, they would be dead by now. Eventually the Ashurans released their ritual, the water collapsing. It was either drunk by the earth or remained in large puddles, save for the parts that trickled back into the sea.

"And now they see there are no issues with the Maze," Tikoloshe said. "Meaning it was either never overseen or they struck at nothing."

"Even if they'd wiped out our mages most the wards would still be working," Wekesa noted. "That cannot be their strategy whole."

His statement proved to be correct when ritual began again. It had similar effect on the sea as the previous one, though Warlock noticed the sorcery was going broad instead of sinking deep. Interesting. Not tendrils this time, then.

"They're going around it," his husband suddenly said. "They don't need tides if they can make their own wind, 'Kesa. They're going to spread sea over shore and bypass the Maze entirely."

"They will try," he shrugged, and reached for the first pool of power.

If the ritual was allowed to proceed and stretched out the waters on both sides it would be difficult to deal with – he'd either have to split the power and pit himself against the enemy on both sides simultaneously from a position of weakness or strike twice, which would waste his entire offensive power. Yet Wekesa still allowed them to pour sorcery into the sea. He had to make every strike count, to letting them get to the point of no return would be more efficient. Eventually he had to make a judgement call, being uncertain of the precise tipping point. Closing his eyes, Warlock shaped the power and released it. It came out as pure kinetic force, angled in a loose triangle and impacting the sea with all the strength he could put out. The dark-skinned man sighed as he opened his eyes and witnessed his work. It would have worked better as a Trismegistan formula, he had to admit. Still, even in this manner the strike was massive enough to begin a tidal wave and send it tumbling towards the Ashuran fleet. While the wave hid the enemy from his sight there must have been panic when the enemy mages realized they had to abandon their ritual after investing so heavily in it.

The backlash ought to kill more than a few.

"Something's wrong," Tikoloshe murmured.

Warlock's brow rose. It was true the enemy were slow on the answer, but that could simply be the result of their mages fearing the backlash. And yet... He adjusted one of the scrying panels. Was part of the Ashuran fleet missing?

"They went into it," he realized. "Underwater."

Absurd, unless... The tidal wave slowed. Stopped to a standstill. And then it turned around.

"Merciless Gods," Wekesa murmured. "Have they been using only half their mages this whole time?"

If that were true they wouldn't be simple hundreds, they would be thousands. There shouldn't be that many mages in the whole of Ashur.

"That's a repurpose of structure, Wekesa," his husband said. "Slow and horribly sloppy – they brute forced it, I'd wager – but it is. Which they shouldn't be able to do."

Sabrathan sorcery wouldn't be able to handle a ritual that delicate and abstract, the mages would start losing control halfway through.

"Jaquinite," he said. "That was Jaquinite sorcery. They have Procerans with them."

Hells and Damnation. The Principate's mages might be backwoods savages, but they were a lot more flexible than the Ashurans. The scope of rituals available to the opposition hadn't just doubled, it was... Hard to calculate, and there were more pressing matters.

"They want to tear down the Maze," Warlock hissed. "And get ships through to assault the remains from both sides."

Which he could not allow, not when his son was in the middle. The wards around Masego should allow him to survive the tidal wave, but he'd be out there alone and surrounded. He reached for the second pool of power without hesitation. There was no time for subtlety: he made a wall of force and smashed it into the waters. The backlash had him flinching, and he felt his nose start bleeding. Fuck. The mages keeping the wave going weren't powerful, but they were many. Slowly, his grip on the sorcery began to slip. It'd break, and then...

"Link," he croaked out, blood in his mouth.

The relief was almost immediate. Thalassina had old wards anchored around it, and linking them to his working had taken the pressure off his will. The city itself groaned, parts of its walls shattering, but his workaround succeeded. While he no longer had control of the power he'd released, he did control the connection his aspect had forged. It was only cut when the tidal wave broke and collapsed back into the sea, and Warlock let out a long breath.

"My turn," the Sovereign of Red Skies hissed.

He took a third pool of power in hand and let another aspect loose. Ships had been shattered and the Ashuran fleet put in disarray, and that was close enough for his purposes. Imbricate shivered across the length of Creation as he matched the sea to the nine-hundredth and thirty-third hell: the sea of blood. The waters began to turn red, bubbling and rising to a boil. It would not be long before the acidity began eating at the hulls. Halos of light bloomed over the ships, one after another. Tikoloshe shivered.

"Speakers," the incubus murmured.

They were not fighting him, Warlock noted. The imbrication was proceeding without being hindered, and the ships were not unharmed. No, it felt like something else. A prayer? A call, he thought. Slowly, something answered. He saw it in his mind's eye. It was not a face, it was too featureless for that. Of what it was made he could not tell, but the glare was blinding. Flesh smoking, Wekesa bared his teeth. He would not bow to priestly meddling. If some entity had come to trouble him, it best be prepared for the consequences. The imbrication he took in hand, abandoning the fleet, and lashed around the not-face.

"Come on, you wretched thing," Warlock grinned nastily. "Let's see how you fare on my own grounds."

It sunk into the depths, the radiance slowly drowned by the sea of blood, and he laughed. Laughed until it evaporated in a storm of blood mist, the thing full and untouched. Not a face, he thought again. It was a mask. Heartbreakingly, impossibly perfect. He looked upon the visage of a god, and that god spoke.

BEGONE.

His bones creaked, his eyes burned and his teeth shattered. His husband was speaking but his ears were ringing. Blinding light came again, not of the creature's making. He'd lost control of the last pool of power and it had gone wild, raw sorcery devouring all near it and shattering the ground. The mask's lips opened to speak once more, a great weight settling on his shoulders.

"Shut up," Hierophant said.

The thing rocked back.

"Seven pillars hold up the sky," Hierophant sang, thrumming with power. "Four cardinals, one meridian."

The pressure vanished and Warlock came back to himself. Through the panel he saw a mask of Light in the sky above the Maze, a terrible radiance surrounding his son. Masego stood alone on his spit of rock, black robes fluttering as he raised his palms. The warded corals around him began melting like snow in summer sun.

"The wheel unbroken, spokes are that not," Hierophant said, voice resounding across the waters. "Thou shall not leave the circle."

Wekesa closed his eyes just in time. It'd been only the smallest possible sliver of attention from Above, he realized. It could not be bound, not truly. But the attempted binding had forced it to retreat, and it had made its displeasure known beforehand. It had swatted down his son, shattered the coral and the wards alike. He was in the sea now, floating. Still alive. Warlock tried to rise but could not.

He was dying, and the Ashuran fleet advanced.

"No," he got out. "Not like this. Not my son."

Tikoloshe held him up, but his husband could not heal.

"I've paid my dues," Warlock hissed. "A lifetime carrying the banner. I am owed. I am owed, do you hear me?"

It came like a whisper, slithering across his body. Taking away the pain, leaving dull absence behind.

Below listened.

Below remembered, and paid the debt back in full.

Wekesa stood and knew what he must do. He'd been shown. A gurgled word had rows of runes appearing in the air, the most sophisticated binding on Creation, and with fingers like claws he ripped through them. Scattered the runes, broke the contract beyond repair.

"Wekesa?" his husband said.

"Go, Tikoloshe," he said. "Run. Return home."

His husband's face, so handsome and untouched by time even after all these years, creased in a frown.

"No," the incubus said.

"It will kill you," Wekesa whispered. "It can't. I can't let it. There has never been a devil like you. There may never be again. You are unique."

"So are you," Tikoloshe said. "So is he."

"Run," Warlock snarled. "I order you."

He laughed.

"And yet here I am," the devil said. "I have been myself for a very long time, 'Kesa."

"Don't waste it," he implored. "After you're dispersed..."

"What comes back will not be me," Tikoloshe softly agreed. "A blank slate. Tabula rasa."

The incubus looked up at the sky.

"I decide this," he said, tone full of wonder. "Of my own free will."

His smile was blinding as the sun.

"Isn't that something?" Tikoloshe murmured.

Wekesa could feel it thinning in his fingers with every passing heartbeat. It would not be granted to him twice. And yet all he could look at was his husband's eyes.

"I love you," he said.

"I love you too," Tikoloshe replied, and threaded their fingers together.

Wekesa looked up at the sun and breathed out. He thought of the others, suddenly. Sorry, old friends. I'll be going on ahead, so it'll be up to you to snuff the candles on your way out. I'll be waiting with Sabah. He reached out for it then, what they'd shown him. The barest glimpse of the godhead, but oh so gloriously full.

"Reflect," he whispered.

For a moment, for an eternity, Wekesa was unto a god.

He snapped his fingers and the world broke.

—

Hierophant woke up among a sea of corpses and driftwood.

He screamed, but did not flinch.

---

Printemps

The goosebumps I had when Masego just told a God to shut up (and it did) reminded me of that unforgettable moment when three horn blows were heard and, I think it was Ranker, thought "oh no she did not..." before the knight army appeared out of thin air!

BarthHumphries

I'm just commenting so that I get an email update with new comments

sivarajan

The Warlock is dead; long live the Warlock?

ereshkigala

That was kinda dumb of Wekesa.

I mean, crusader invasion in a place he has to defend, where his magic specialty doesn't work, with his loved ones also in the battlefield? That's, like, a bazillion death flags right there.

He should have invoked Red Skies over the largest island in the Maze in advance, then let the mass from the meteors slowly spread to turn the narrows into land.

Fern

Just another subtle-ish clue that the Calamities really don't have as good a handle on everything as we might have thought. Wekesa is absolutely right, Malicia has bungled this fucking rodeo to shit. Who picks a fight with an entire continent when they don't even have a navy to defend vulnerable ports? In a nation that literally lives and dies on trade? It's automatically allowing the enemy to dictate too much of the engagement. It would have been much smarter to send Black in to the privateer islands and murder his way through the offscreen cast of Pirates of the Caribbean and use what was left of the privateers to harass the enemy fleet. Instead Malicia used up all her political capital playing "who dies first" with the salacious sahelans.

Barack Obama

Who dies first, What dies second, and I Don't Know dies third

Bart

He had to leave the sea there for them to sail through so that the city could continue to be a thriving port city.

therealgridlock

I mean he literally said "powerful mages believe they have mastered their powers, there is no exception"

And he thinks he has it under control, "i mean one is enough but two will be fine just in case"

>Ends up using 3 and losing the last

"Well shit"

Huge flags right there, was just too short sighted to see his own advice.

Unmaker

(Un)Holy shit! A demon with free will. Does making him that way qualify as doing a good deed?

So Hierophant, does scaring a good god equal Catherine's stealing resurrection from an angel?

But really, is there such a thing as a Good god in this situation? I thought the non-Above / non-Below gods were neutral.

NZPIEFACE

Good = Above
Literally.

Jonnnney

If it's not above or below it's a lower case god in which case their good vs evil is dependent upon how they came into being. The god that Sabah killed to gain the Name Captain was the chaotic evil bloodlust of the orcs. The god that the Deoriathe crafted was vengeful good.

Rup

"Seeking redress for scales uneven was still putting stock in the scale itself, when it was that thing's very existence that should be questioned"

..yeah "The Gods are Bastards"

...has such close parallel to the 'scales of justice' in our own world

"Great mages had believed themselves to have mastered their powers fully, and always paid for that presumption"

...reminds me of the old quote:

'there are old pilots..there are bold pilots...there are no old bold pilots'

...lastly...what a magnificent chapter..the calamities-exeunt ..bit by bit

Nivek

That's a lot of souls that Warlock sent to their makers. Can't help but wonder if he grabbed some while he was leaving, those would be pretty valuable trade goods in the hells and he did sorta turn into a God (not god, God) for a few seconds.

Also, better luck next time on the God-binding Masego (and you know that there's going to be a next time)

dugasX

Nah, Zeze's going to use that binding to bind god-Warlock. did say the Gods Below gave Wekesa enough power to become a god temporarily. Once bound, Warlock ascends to become Masego's god-father. hehe

NerfContessa

That would be a really fun turnaround.

But I don't think so. After all this is the first calamity we get in detail. It's bound to be final...

Rup

...just to check

The list of chapters at the end below is missing "Ye Mighty"

Yeah Nah Yeah

Nah, Ye Mighty is one of the monthly bonus chapters. You can find it under "Extra Chapters".

Josh Brooks

I find myself coming back to this chapter again and again during my reread just to remind myself this evil pos finally did die. Shame it couldn't have been more painful. Physically I mean. Emotionally it was great.

dadycoool

Zeze really did inherit all his good traits while missing his worst ones. Good thing Cat was there to teach him some more good traits and turn him into a well-rounded individual. One that has an unholy obsession with turning pigs into different things, but still.

---

Chapter 68: Poised

"Obviously you can't kill me now: your enmity is with the Dread Emperor of Praes, and I've already abdicated. I am now but a humble shoemaker, and what kind of hero slays a shoemaker?"

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful. Later noted to have made surprisingly nice shoes during his three abdications.

"So is there, like, a branch of sorcery all about lakes?" I mused. "Because if I'm going to keep using variations on the same trick it feels like there should be."

Akua's brow arched, expressing a monologue's worth of disdain without her speaking a single word.

"Lakeomancy," I suggested. "Catherine Foundling, foremost lakeomancer of her age. I could get a stele done like the old emperors – you know, basically a whole monument's worth of bragging."

"It would be lacusomancy," Diabolist sighed. "And there is no such thing. Even hydromancy is not a true discipline, properly speaking. Like most physical effects it falls under the broader aegis of manifestation."

"That just means we're pioneers, Akua," I grinned. "Look at us, bravely exploring the many ways you can steal, drop or otherwise move lakes."

"Stolen is something of a misnomer," the shade noted, looking down. "We've only borrowed it, practically speaking."

Well, she wasn't wrong. Great Strycht had proved as much of a wonder as Great Lotow, in its own way. It was, well, the easiest way to put it was that it'd been a port. Not unlike Mercantis the city had been raised on a large island, though instead of a river it'd been a lake that surrounded it. A lake that was about as large as half of Daoine, which was rather impressive. Useful, too. It hadn't been this large originally: the basin had been artificially deepened and broadened before tributary rivers were dug into the stone to feed it. Tunnels and waterfalls, some coming from underground sources but others from the surface peaks of the Everdark. Lake Strycht was the freshwater source for an entire third of the inner ring, feeding a complex array of canals and sluice gates that were constantly fought over by sigils. The city itself was a bloody mess – scraps between sigils had sunk entire chunks of what'd once been a single island, leaving some sort of demented urban archipelago instead – but it was full of old sigils and would have been horridly difficult to assault. Drow ships were pretty much either rafts or small woven reed boats relying on oars. We'd seized a few, but it would have taken weeks of constant back and forth to get even a small army across.

Besides, the good people of Strycht had made it clear that we were not only unwelcome but currently at the top of their 'murder and harvest' list. I'd sent a few of my lords – the Peerage, Akua had taken to calling them, and the name had kept – to make polite inquiries about holding a council to discuss the dwarven threat and the cabal founded to answer it. They'd, uh, not taken well to that. Long story short, Soln and its fellows had harvested a few Mighty in a spurt of traditional drow diplomacy before making a tactical retreat back. They'd made enough of an impression that all seven cabals dedicated to maintaining control of the waterways had been called upon. Strycht was going to be swimming in old monsters before the month was out, and until then they'd taken to raiding my sigil's camps on the shore. The damage had been limited and we'd mostly come out on top due to sheer numbers and Winter fuckery, but after the initial probes they'd identified the weaknesses in our defences and begun concentrating on those. My sigil had taken the Hylia ways out of Lotow after stripping it clean of everything remotely food-adjacent and absorbed another six sigils on its way to Strycht, but while it'd massively swelled it was still a far cry from a real army. It was a confederation of tribes, if anything, bound to me by oaths and fear. Not exactly the kind of troops used to maintaining proper watch rosters and fielding patrols. So with the situation steadily worsening and the opposition refusing to talk, I'd decided a rebuttal was in order.

So I'd confiscated Lake Strycht.

It'd taken about two days to empty most of the basin even with two gates as large as we could make them. Taking every last drop had proved impossible: the tributaries kept feeding it and the basin wasn't even so there'd been pockets of water remaining. Still, in my estimating about nine tenths of the initial lake had been shunted off into Arcadia. What had once been water was now a stinking marsh of mud clogged with drying weeds and fish. It was a good thing we'd never attempted a crossing, because when the lake ebbed low some creatures were revealed that even Praesi would flinch at. Some kind of massive oily octopi with barbed tentacles, blind pale lizards the size of houses and long eels with an inexplicable amount of teeth. Most the monsters had gone through the gates, those that didn't either settling in the larger puddles or going wild as they died stripped of water. It'd been a display of power meant for the recalcitrant inside the city, now perched atop hills or small plateaus surrounded by mud, but it'd also been a form of diplomatic pressure. I'd just killed half a dozen rivers crucial to keeping an entire chunk of the inner ring from going thirsty and done a great deal more damage to Strycht itself.

That lake had been their granary. They lived off the creatures swimming in it, of the weeds and plants now dying for lack of irrigation. The city's drow had wells and cisterns, but the population here was easily triple of Great Lotow. They'd be beginning running out soon, and after that they'd be forced to sally out for puddle water with my Peerage waiting in ambush. The Mighty would be able to stick it out until reinforcements arrived, sure, but what about the rest? Nine tenths of their people were going start withering on the vine. Even if the cabals proved victorious against me in a few weeks, sigil-holders would lose most their sigils to thirst. And they had to know that even if they got my head on a pike, there'd been no guarantee of getting the lake back. How many years would it be until the tributaries filled back even half of Lake Strycht? So I'd sent a handful of my Peerage forward again, to revisit the subject of a council. I'd instructed Ivah to make it clear that if they really pushed me they might just get the lake back directly on top their heads, which ought to make at least a few of them reconsider. Once we had a foothold in the city, well, if the rest dug their heels in I wasn't above ordering an assault. I'd glimpsed what my Peerage was capable of, during our passage through the ways.

I was glad of the oaths, because I wasn't sure I could win the fight if it ever came to that.

"I don't know about borrowed," I said. "I'm considering keeping the lake, or at least a portion of it."

The slight shift in Akua's stance indicated surprise, though I knew better than to think she hadn't allowed it consciously.

"There is no lack of usable geographic features in Arcadia," Diabolist said. "Archer has brought forward the interesting notion of-"

"Yes, Indrani wants me to start dropping mountains," I sighed. "I'm well aware."

"There are also volcanoes in what was once Summer," the shade reminded me. "Actually triggering an eruption when we need it would be significantly more difficult, but not outright impossible."

"There's basically everything in Arcadia, if you look long enough," I grunted. "That's not why I'm thinking of redeploying the lake."

"Decoration?" Akua drily suggested. "I suppose it's never too late to acquire taste, though I must warn you 'monster-infested underground lake' is rather passé. Very sixth century."

Ugh, and she probably thought she was actually funny.

"Well," I brightly replied, "as the foremost lakeomancer of my generation-"

"There is no such thing," Diabolist insisted.

"- it occurs to me I've been mostly, um, dropping large bodies of water on people," I said. "For tactical purposes."

"As one does," Akua agreed.

"It seems like a very narrow use of the ability," I said. "When I have an entire region of Callow that, between you and Summer, was effectively ravaged."

Scarlet eyes narrowed.

"You want to move the lake to Callow," she said.

"I'd have to consult governors and landowners," I noted. "And someone familiar with farming practices. But it occurs to me that Summer-torched land might benefit from fresh irrigation. Hells, there might even be enough fish left for actual fishing."

"And you want to use a lake born of Creation. because moving an Arcadian body of water might very well have... unforeseen consequences," Akua murmured. "Wise."

I passed a hand through my hair.

"Look, there's so many problems I can't solve with killing," I said. "So it might be time to consider other solutions. One of the reasons Praes has been such a murderous shitshow play of correspondingly shitty and murderous thespians is that the Wasteland is exactly as termed. If I take a lake from somewhere else and sell it to whoever's holding the Tower, it could tip the balance the other way. The Empire wouldn't start starving its way into an invasion every other decade."

Horrifically enough, Diabolist was beaming.

"You want to steal pieces of Creation and auction them off to nations," she said. "Dearest, this might be the first of your designs I can say I wholeheartedly endorse."

"It's not stealing," I protested. "You can't own a lake. I mean, legally yes and nobody better take mine, but when you think about it in a religious sense--"

"You are preaching to the choir, my heart," Akua intervened. "Admittedly the choir is made of damned souls, but let us not pretend talented singers are usually headed for the Heavens."

"Why am I talking to you about this?" I muttered. "Of course you'd be on board, this is basically Dread Empress Sinistra's plan only with riches instead of hero-delivered death at the end."

"It could be useful to mark some mountain peaks rich in ore, when we return to the surface," Diabolist suggested. "Mercantis would pay a fortune for access to mines where there can be no dwarven claim. And Callow itself is famously poor in precious metals: acquiring a source of mintage would be quite useful."

The worse part was that it wasn't actually a bad idea. Gods knew my kingdom could use the coin and the mines both. What I hated most about Akua was how useful she could be when she put her mind to it, which was always.

"Something to consider in the future," I said.

She studied me carefully.

"There is more," she noted.

"Someone broke one of my cities last year," I frostily replied.

"And so you have hordes of refugees in need of shelter," Diabolist said, delicately avoiding the subject. "As well a myriad of standing structures about to be permanently vacated."

Not to mention a treasury that'd effectively be a glorified war chest and granary until the Tenth Crusade ended, which meant no funds for the kind of reconstruction that southern Callow badly needed. Hakram had produced miracles in keeping the tent cities clothed and fed, but come winter things were going to get ugly. The Waning Woods were too far, and absurdly dangerous to take lumber from if you went any deeper than the very outskirts. I'd seen it coming, of course, and we'd set aside wood and coal for fires, but it wouldn't last all the way through the cold season. And Great Strycht was now a pack of very nice stone districts set atop hills and plateaus, many of which would fit inside a gate. It'd be tricky to get them through without wrecking them, of course, but not impossible. And even ruins would make great building materials, if worse came to worse. There'd be more cities ahead, too. I'd be leading the drow to the surface and until I could settle them where I wanted them to be there'd be a need for something to host them, but it didn't all have to be used for that.

It was a little ironic that I'd waited until Thief was gone to start thinking about stealing cities.

"There is merit to the notion," Akua said. "And though you now seem intent on civilian use, there is another side to the coin. If you can take a fortress..."

I could just leave it in Arcadia for later, then plop it out as field fortifications while on campaign. Near instantly. Juniper might just forget to hate Diabolist to the bone for a few heartbeats, if she heard about this.

"They're not heavy on fortifications so far," I said. "I wouldn't get my hopes up."

"We've not yet penetrated deep into the inner ring," she replied. "There may yet be opportunity."

I didn't disagree. If I could get my hands on even just a fort, it'd be a nasty surprise to pull on my foes down the line. Field battles against the Dead King would be a chancy gamble even if the entire Grand Alliance was mobilized, this kind of sudden upset might be able to turn the tide. The first time it was used, at least. Neshamah wasn't the kind of enemy that'd fall for the same trick twice. We stood there for some time in silence, the mood shifting as the conversation ebbed. The sight of the cavern before us wasn't something a few days could get me used to, I silently admitted. The sheer size of it was staggering. It had the length and breadth of a province, the walls so distant even my eyes found them hard to discern, but the ceiling was what awe me every time. It was uneven, betraying that this was no singular cave but hundreds of them carved into a single place by what must have been decades of hard labour. I'd never seen anything taller save for the Tower itself, and the Tower was millennia of Praesi madness made into edifice. What kind of people had the ancient drow been, to make this?

What had broken them so deeply they'd become a pack of rats scavenging their own ruins?

"Not even Keter is match for it in scope," Akua softly said, gaze following mine. "Fitting, I suppose. The Crown of the Dead is a mere gate to the Dead King's true realm, impressive as it is. This must have been one of the beating hearts of their empire."

"Don't you have a bureaucracy to run?" I said.

"Subordinates must be assessed," she replied. "At my behest you granted Centon much power. If it proves incapable of discharging its duties without my constant supervision, replacement must be found."

And by that we both knew she meant Centon would be harvested and another drow raised in its place. Not killed, I'd set down rules about that, but Night could be taken without killing. The disgrace would probably cut deeper than death, though. Ivah certainly hated speaking of how it'd come to have that name in the first place. It was cold-blooded of Diabolist, but then I expected nothing less from her. Your average Wasteland aristocrat made lizards look warm in comparison, and Akua Sahelian had remained on top of that pack for years.

"Sometimes I wonder what it takes to make someone like you," I said. "But then I remember all I heard about your mother, and I stop wondering."

Her lips quirked.

"And what exactly did you hear, dearest?" she asked.

"Black called her brilliant," I said. "Said that she'd managed to survive Malicia's rise while supporting her enemies with little loss of influence. He was wary of her."

"High praise, coming from the Carrion Lord," Akua noted. "Mother was a creature of nuances."

"You must have hated her," I said. "That story you told me about your friend. No child should have to live through that. Not even you."

"I suppose I did," the shade murmured. "But not in the way you mean. You – your people – marry personal hatreds with your actions in a way we are taught not to."

"Praesi keep grudges too, Akua," I said. "Take revenge. There's an entire hall of screaming heads in the Tower speaking to the truth of that."

"I do not explain myself well, I think," Diabolist said. "I was raised to treat Akua Sahelian and the heiress to Wolof as different persons. I could hate, and take revenge, as the first. The second must be a creature suborned only to ambition. Those among my people who do not learn to separate one face from the other die young."

"That's absurd to me," I admitted. "I can understand necessity dictating your actions. I leapt down that slope years ago. But you can't just pretend it's two different people, Akua. It's still you. Your actions. I didn't somehow fight the Diabolist and spare you. It's all on your head, like it's all on mine."

"Perhaps in Callow that is true," she mused. "But in the Wasteland? We must clasp hands with those who've slain our kin, stabbed our predecessors in the back, stolen riches and appointments. It is a necessary distinction, Catherine. We can make sport of each other, so long as it is that. We would all lose for the stripping of that veil."

"Then shouldn't you?" I said. "Lose, I mean. Your entire philosophy is that conflict breeds strength, yet I can't call what you describe anything but fragile."

She quietly laughed.

"How harsh a judgement you cast on my people," she said. "Will you hold all others to the same standard? The severe Ashurans, strangling their own kind with a rope of rules and tiers. The quarrelsome Procerans, who war with all under the sun out of hungry ambition. And even your own, Catherine. How many teeth-clenching grudges has Callow followed to dark endings?"

"None of the others wound Creation bartering for power," I said. "Or bleed thousands upon thousands in rituals. I have axes to grind with my enemies, Akua, but I know what they are. Where their limits lie."

"Then the issue is of means, not philosophy," Diabolist said. "And so for the greatest monster of all, you need look no further than your teacher. What limits does the Carrion Lord have?"

"And he, too, will be held to account," I quietly said. "For what he has done and may yet do."

"Ah," Akua smiled. "And are these the words of Catherine Foundling or the Black Queen?"

"That's my entire point," I said. "They're the same person. That's what responsibility means."

"And mine is that your decisions will always be a choice," Diabolist said. "Between what the woman wants and what the queen requires."

I waved a hand dismissively, tired of the argument. Her logic only held up because it was a closed circle.

"But since you asked," Akua said, looking at the distant city. "I despised my mother. For what she did. For what she wanted from me. But it was Tasia Sahelian that was my enemy, and her I admired until the day she lost."

"Because she was brilliant," I said.

"Because she was everything I was taught to want," she mused. "Powerful and cunning and every bit the match of our Empress."

"Until she lost," I said.

"I severed our relations before I could be dragged down with her," Akua said. "But I would not call that revenge. It was not a matter between us but between the Diabolist and the High Lady of Wolof."

"And do you regret it?" I asked. "Leaving her behind."

I wasn't sure, I thought, what I was looking for. Humanity, maybe. Some speck of a person who had more to her than Wasteland iron and villainy. But what would I even do with it, if it was found? There was no saving someone like Akua, and I did not want to try. A hundred thousand souls demanded otherwise. The shade's face was distant, lost in her thoughts.

"I do," Diabolist finally said. "What a strange thing that is."

"She was a lot of things," I said. "But your mother was one of them."

"She was," Akua Sahelian agreed.

Her lips quirked.

"I should have killed her myself, mother to daughter."

---

DroughtBringer

Guys we are so close to one thousand (1000) votes. Go vote and we can hit 1000!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

NerfGlastigUaine

Forget the weekly, we're less than 800 votes away from PGtE beating Ward as top webfiction of the year! Everyone vote!

Michael

1023 after my vote. Also, does anyone else hold Dread Emperors Irritant and Traitorus to be the literal best ever? I crack up and laugh like an idiot over each quote of theirs.

Lokesh

It turns out irritant was just traitorous in disguise. And someday I will claim that even revenant was just traitorous who betrayed death.

erraticerrata

Character contest continues, Hierophant vs Hune. Link to vote below.

<https://www.strawpoll.me/16794917?fbclid=IwAR07-zJQGBZfft87vMfWiq0tpZ7FiilSEbg8yPc3apfD1C98wtNJjih7ub8>

SMHF

Let's face it. This is just a mandatory confirmation for Masego! ^_^

Dainpdf

This will be a duel for the H's.

Puns aside, we have best mage vs best ogre. On one hand, the very talented and interesting Zeze, coming off a very emotional chapter. On the other, Hune, one of the only characters to tell Catherine to her face that she doesn't believe in her.

NerfGlastigUaine

Honestly, I'm surprised Hune even has five votes. Guess there'll always be contrarians.

Dainpdf

I voted for Hune. Honestly, I think she (or other contrarian characters) should have more screen time. So far, IIRC, we've had Hune, the Pilgrim and Wekesa tell Cat off for what she stands for. And mostly only Hune from the side of the oppressed.

stevenneiman

A good number of characters have called Cat out about specific things, but Hune was noteworthy as the only one who was speaking truth to power rather than speaking opinion from power when they did so.

Dainpdf

The Pilgrim sort of kind of counts, having refused to get involved in his country's politics because he knows it would lead to unnecessary bloodshed. The issue, of course, is he is a powerful Named and has the influence that gives whether he wants to or not.

stevenneiman

Pilgrim gets some credit for speaking frankly in the hopes of avoiding bloodshed, and more for being willing to compromise to avoid warcrimes even when he couldn't get a surrender, but he was still speaking as an equal, with the assurance that he couldn't make things worse because he was already dealing with an enemy. Hune could probably have gotten Cat to like her without too much effort, but she chose to tell her unpleasant truths and refuse to get swept along in her will. That took a lot of courage, because Hune herself pointed out that Cat could have her punished arbitrarily.

Dainpdf

You have a point, though I'll add that with what we've since learned the Pilgrim has in his arsenal he may have some credit for speaking to Cat as equal when he may have been her superior.

goliath1303

Wow. I literally feel like we've read 2 different books if you think well of the Grey Pilgrim.

"He spoke frankly to avoid bloodshed"

Then refused to use his influence to end a pointless series of battles because it would hurt Cordelia's position. Even though, due to his truth-sensing power, he now unequivocally that Cat was telling the truth when he spoke to her. Cordelia's hope was worth more than all those lives lost in northern Callow.

Arguably, the whole crusade actually. If he spoke up the entire crusade would have probably been smothered then and there. If he had given her the slightest opening, Cat could have told him about the Liesse Accords. He would have been able to see an arguably better potential possible future that would have left everybody, except maybe Praes, stronger and better positioned to attack the Dead King, Chain of Hunger, Everhart, etc. With the 10th crusade dismantled early on, an undamaged Procer, Callow, Levant, etc could have worked together against those threats and more. Plus they wouldn't have to devote troops to watching their shared borders while doing so.

"He was willing to compromise to avoid warcrimes even when he didn't get a surrender"

Which is only right. Agreeing to mutual codes of conduct when the country you're invading doesn't roll over and let you conquer it unopposed definitely doesn't make you the morally superior side. Really this whole thing says better things about Cat, than Pilgrim. Let's not forget, the terms were not only offered by her, she actually offered BETTER terms. She was refused prisoner exchanges and GP tried to limit her to no devils & demons while arguing that they should get to use angels. He only agreed because Cat made him. It's also not like he gave up anything extra to stop Cat's side from doing something monstrous. He agreed to a reciprocal limiting of extreme options. And he did this from the position of invading army that had turned down an honest offer(which again, he knows sure to his powers) to help them achieve their stated goal. Cat would gate the army of the crusade, and probably done even more to help honestly, straight to Ater. Instead they just wanted to conquer Callow again and divide it amongst themselves. Basically what I'm saying is, you don't get credit for agreeing to terms with the country your invading, especially when they honestly restrict your victim(and that's what Callow is here if we're honest) more than they do you. I actually think you lose all right to be patted on the back for things like that when you're not only the aggressor, but show how thin your justifications really are by turning down the multiple attempts and offers Cat made to try and end the unjust war you insist on prosecuting. All that's one thing though, but did let's not forget that he ran away at the earliest opportunity, and what was his very first action upon doing so? Here's a refresher since you seem to have forgot: he committed the worst(and only that we know of) war crime since Akua's Folly. He used biological warfare that targeted military personnel as well as civilians. He doesn't get a pass because he's "Good" when his actions are evil.

P.S. This isn't really germane to the story at hand, but there's 1 more action we should think about in the context of GP and war crimes. He smothered his nephew in his sleep to prevent him from uniting Levant against Procer. Whether Procer and Levant sound be at odds or not is irrelevant. There's no 2 ways about it, the Grey Pilgrim is just as bad as, and in some cases worse than, the Evil he fights. I think with just the info we have, it's safe to say GP is a bigger monster than Cat, hands down. Add that to what's definitely happened offscreen, plus everything he surely did in the past without us hearing about it, and you're left with just somebody whose as much of a monster as any who've held the Tower.

"He was still speaking as an equal, with the assurance that he couldn't make things worse because he was already dealing with an enemy."

Except he made it worse. The armies on both sides could have walked away if he had taken Cat's offer.

Basically my stance bike down to: Screw the Grey Pilgrim and the sanctimonious, hypocritical, self-righteous horse he rode in on. He gets no passes for his half-assed attempts at conflict resolution and limiting collateral damage. Not after not only spurning offers made in good faith to give the crusade exactly what the leaders claimed it was after, but resorting to warcrimes while still thinking his side is morally superior. Between him and Saint we see that heroes can be just as bad as, and sometimes worse than the villains. You're not better than the other side just because you kowtow to Angels instead of worshiping Below. Especially not when some of your enemies barely, if at all, pay lip service to the Hellgods while someone the people on your side manages the mental gymnastics needed to be the Heavens axe-man, but mentally absolve themselves off wrongdoing and even responsibility for their actions with "the Heavens willed it". Every human, barring that one radical outlier, is guilty in the angels eyes. Hanno knows that, so every time he clips that coin he's making a choice. He knows that if hhe flipped it for any priest, innkeeper, or beggar he would be forced to kill them. He doesn't do it with every person he meets though, does he? No, he reserves it for the people he want to kill.

Therefore, his whole "I don't judge" shtick is bulkshit.

In my opinion, Hanno and Tariq – the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim – are the most hypocritical characters in the story. Are there ones who are more bloodthirsty, unrepentant, and morally bankrupt? Yes. There aren't, however, any characters that are more hypocritical, deluded, or undeservedly self-righteous. I hope they, mostly GP though, don't get to go out in a blaze of glory, holding back the tides of evil and cursing the hells with their last breath. I want them, him, to die powerless, alone, far from home, and knowing that their death means nothing and everything they accomplished in life will be either forgotten or swept away. It honestly shouldn't be super hard to be on the morally superior side when opposition is people called the Black Queen, Dread Empress, and Black Knight. Somehow the fall short of that though.

RanVor

The bar representing votes for Hune barely registers on my screen.

stevenneiman

Hune was interesting in her own way, and she might have actually had a real shot if she'd ever had more than one genuine interaction on screen. And since everyone knows that this particular vote is a foregone conclusion, I think a fair few people who liked that one interaction voted for her, not because they think they can get her (I think hune was female? could be wrong, too lazy to go back looking for pronouns) a victory, but because they want to see more of Hune. Still though, Hune's probably the least important character (except *maybe* Nauk) to get on the roster, as well as being against a much stronger candidate (in my opinion, at least), and that shows in the results of this vote.

mavant

Hierarch. Hye.

NZPIEFACE

How is this fair at all when all you've been doing lately is writing Hierophant interludes.

stevenneiman

Let's be honest, Hune was probably just there to pad the roster out to 16. The innkeeper Cat used to work for got more screen time, and I don't even remember his name. Hune's one focal scene was pretty memorable, but it's all she really got.

Cold Cyberia

Wasn't sure if I should vote for Hierophant, but in the end I will not flinch.

taovkool

Who, in all the holy hell and damned heaven, is this Hune person?

Nuke_The_Earth

Ogre, doesn't like Cat much and wasn't seen very often.

Clmineith

Not fair.

I mean, Masego is one of my favorite character, but I LIKE Hune! More than some characters for whom I voted before

Snowfire1224

After we finish this voting bracket with main characters, we should start another made entirely out of past dread enperors and enpressess who have page quote.

NerfGlastigUaine

Irritant or Traitorous will definitely take it.

RanVor

Irritant would win by working winning the contest into the first part of his plan.

WuseMajor

And then it would be revealed that everyone participating in the contest was secretly Traitorous.

Michael

Ha. Hahahaha. Ha. Fell for it again! A band of heroes are after the winner of the tournament. You just saved my life! Another victory for Irritant 😊

Cap'n Smurfy

It's taken a while but Catherine is finally starting to Think with Portals.

Dainpdf

She even has her own GLaDOS. Except, you know, more evil.

Euodiachloris

I'm not entirely sure about that. Think about what GLaDOS routinely puts bushels of fully sentient cores through for a few minutes...

Dainpdf

There's still some good in GLaDOS... Well, there was, she claims she deleted it.
With Akua, one digs and digs and digs and it's turtles, I mean evil, all the way down.

Javvies

Sufficiently enlightened self-interest can look a lot like altruism.

Dainpdf

Until one starts talking about the superiority of killing tens of thousands for a zombie army. Or how one's greatest regret with regards to their mother is not killing her. In an affectionate way.

Anony

I think that's part of what he's getting at. That obviously wasn't sufficiently enlightened self interest, or it wouldn't have ended with her heart ripped out and her soul stiteched into a cloak.

Quite possibly a cat

Think of what would have happened if Akua stabbed her mother instead of her friend.

Dainpdf

If she'd tried? Disappointed mother, punished Akua. What would have happened to the friend is harder to predict, but most likely either executed or left for Akua to kill later. Probably the former.

Mingablo

It was also a continuation of the Pratchett (mis)quoting.

Dainpdf

Oh. I have brought shame myself by not catching the quote.
Please excuse me.

Akuabestgurl

Akua is like an onion!

She has layers!

But every single one is the same and if you try to dig deep you start crying

Dainpdf

She's great as a condiment when fried in a bit of olive oil?

Big Brother

And again, Akua shows a line of thought about family I can approve of. If a family member must die, it's better to be done by a relative's hand.

Dainpdf

Is it? Why? I'd have a professional deal with the euthanasia, if it has to be done. Preferably let the person do it themselves.

Big Brother

From a Medical standpoint, yes have a professional do it. But in the manner Akua speaks of, do it yourself.

Dainpdf

Let them take it into their own hands. It's their life, it belongs to them. If they ask for help, then sure, but don't take this from them.

Two __

I believe the op is not referring to medical euthanasia, but to grudges and family members that have stabbed you in the back and abused you.

Dainpdf

Since I don't believe in a death penalty, if there isn't some major reason the person HAS to die I still think they should be given the option of offing themselves.

NotQuiteHere

Isn't that the worst thing you could possibly do to a person? Let them kill themselves? Don't virtually all the religions say that killing oneself results in bad things? And therefore if there is even a chance of a good afterlife why get rid of it for them? Kill them yourself before they get the chance. 'Tis kinder.

Nuke_The_Earth

I maintain that killing somebody is wrong, but letting them die is acceptable, so long as they want it and it ends their suffering. Of course, this is very much dependent on the situation.

Dainpdf

What does religion, especially IRL religions that don't exist in Creation, have to do with morality, tho. If someone **has** to die, I'd rather empower them to go into oblivion by their own hand, unless they ask for help. Of course, if they don't have to, I would rather they don't die, but that's not the question that was posed.

TeK

That does remind me of Taras Bulba: "Stand still, don't move! I gave you life, I will also kill you!" said Taras, and, retreating a pace, he brought his gun up to his shoulder. Andrii was white as linen: his lips could be seen to move softly, and he uttered a name; but it was not the name of his native land, or of his mother, or of his brethren; it was the name of the beautiful Pole. Taras fired.

Nobody

An even earlier version of this can be found in Euripedes' Medea!

"No! No! No! By the Furies of Hell,
I'll not abandon them to my enemies and their violation.
It's all done now, anyway, there's no escape.
They must die too. And since they must,
The one who gave them life must end it"

Javvies

Hah. Looting natural resources to sell off. And sounds like she's planning on stealing a city or two weeks she's at it.
Nice.

Lakeomancy.

Cat, this habit is more likely to lead to a title, nickname, or cognomen than a branch of magic. "The Lakedropper", "Lady of the Falling Lakes", etc.

Decius

Stolen City.

Rook

If she ever fights Ranger, it'll be the Lady of the Lake vs the Lady that throws Lakes

Akuabestgurl

Lady of Get Laked

HandyCapped

'The lady of Yoink!', definitely.

AVR

Other fun things about stealing gigatonnes of water would be the resulting earthquakes & landslides, introduction of foreign and possibly invasive species and, yes, messing with weather patterns. You really could mess up as badly as the Dread Emperor who tried to steal Callow's weather.

With this underground lake she's incredibly lucky not to have had the quakes & landslides already. It's probably noticeably saltier than most surface lakes what with all the cut stone exposed to the water, and even Cat saw some of the monsters. Most of those probably wouldn't enjoy the sun but you never know what would do well outside its native environment.

werafdsaew

Hydrology is not my specialty, but why would removing a lake cause earthquakes and landslides?

Ekmo

Lake bed dries up and shrinks. Pressure holding the lake sides disappears. Lake sides collapse inwards. Landslide happens.

Considering that lakes can seep kilometers deep into the ground, causing a collapse due to disappearing pressure down there can lead to a domino effect radiating upwards and outwards. Thus, localized earthquake.

Euodiachloris

Pressure suddenly not being there has a habit of leading to push-back. See all of Northern Europe slowly springing back from the weight of the glaciers being taken off its landmasses... and southern regions sinking a bit as it tipples in response, too.

Mud and rock: more dynamic than you'd think; more fluid dynamics involved than my poor brain like a to cope with. ;P

imagesbe

Catherine is channeling her inner Black, seeing as she's taking entire cities without a fight.

And dammit Akua, WHY DO I LIKE YOU SO MUCH. And not even in the way that I liked her in book 3, where she was an amazing antagonist I loved to hate.

NerfGlastigUaine

Because she's likely crafting her entire persona into someone that Cat, and by extension the reader, can like.

mavant

Akua's new Name is going to be Parfit's Hitchhiker.

luminiousblu

Because she's reasonable.

Faiir

This chapter makes me doubt Akua again. Her talking about Akua and Heiress as almost split personalities makes me think that Cat's questions can be answered by Akua who likes her and not Diabolist who's actually plotting the betrayal.

RanVor

Except that's kinda bullshit, and as such shouldn't be enough to fool Speaking. What Akua is talking about is not split personality or anything like that, but separation of the needs of her social status from her personal desires.

Faiir

That's what she wants you to think! 😊

Cicero

The problem is not that Auka is secretly planning betrayal. The problem is that she will serve faithfully and loyally right up until the moment that it benefits her to betray Cat, and then she will betray Cat regardless of having been sincerely loyal up until that moment.

Javvies

Nah. Per Akua's discussion with Ivah/Lord of Silent Steps in Ye Mighty, Akua has realized that a perpetual cycle of backstabbing and betrayal is fundamentally flawed.

Also, per Akua, her highest priority is survival. Survival only comes through continually proving herself loyal, competent, and useful to Cat – and doing so to such an extent that Cat decides to agree to finding a loophole in the Oath she made to Viv regarding the utter obliteration of Akua's soul.

Permanent escaping/freedom from Cat's hold over her soul is not actually in Akua's interest either – without Cat's aegis, Akua is an instant target – and nobody else is going to keep her soul around in any sort of state remotely acceptable to her.

RanVor

If so, then I believe Cat is quite safe, because I have no idea what would have to happen to make Akua's betrayal of Cat not immediately lethal to the shade in question. Nobody, and I mean nobody, is going to allow Akua to roam the Creation unchecked again. If such situation ever arises, Cat is probably going to be ultra-fucked anyway so it doesn't really matter that much.

soonnanandnaanssoon

I vote for the second name of A Practical Guide to Evil to be :

soonnanandnaanssoon

An FAQ on Tribute, Tributes and Tributaries.

Euodiachloris

And tridents. Probably. 🙄

RanVor

And trinities. And triceratopses. And...

caoimhinh

And Trebuchets that throw TNT-like Things.

Euodiachloris

That's selling the green napalm of doom and devilry a little short, don't you think?

Antoninjohn

Attacking Procer will get the heroes to kill Cat but to Take the silver mines will not and Callow could use that silver better than Procer can anyway

Someguy

I'd also suggest stealing all the Houses of Light from every Invading Nation and "donating" them to the Callowan House of Light one by planting them as pseudo-fortresses around the Ruins of Lisse as anti-undead measures. You can't tell me that there wouldn't be hordes of undead crawling out of there years down the line.

Lark

Akua has slowly risen to be perhaps my favorite character in the serial, except possibly Masego or Robber. Such a delight to read – I absolutely love how her philosophy is written, and how it forms her character.

It doesn't hurt that her dialogue is reliably fantastic.

letouriste

you reminded me i miss robber. I miss a lot of characters actually: Nauk, robber, aisha, ratface (i can't believe he got out without chara development:/) and a few others more minor characters;)

Metrux

I honestly don't miss Nauk, but I can understand why some would. Aisha and Ratface needed more screen time, though, so much time in the back, not enough limelight...

luminiousblu

To be fair, Ratface and Aisha are strictly background players when you consider the story follows the adventures of Catherine, not Callow. In Callow I imagine both Aisha and Ratface are far more important than everyone but Hakram, including Vivienne, but Catherine, ironically for all her talk about saving Callow, doesn't really interact with the country besides shouting HAKRAM GET THE CROSS

Excited

This shit is so fucking surreal and I love it

Novice

So uhh way back in the past I may have argued in a previous chapter that Dread Emperors do not get to abdicate. I hereby retract my statements and apologize because of course Irritant would not only abdicate and remain alive but also do it three fucking times. How in the hells did he manage to convince the High Lords to reinstate him again and again is beyond me.

The tyrants of the tower are all mad. Every single one of them.

Javvies

He was just that good at his job.

Also, the Heroes that came for him to find him abdicated probably took their frustrations out on his successor.

None of the High Lords would have pushed back against him too hard, lest he name them his successor when he abdicated to dodge Heroes.

Someguy

That makes so much sense. I'd be surprised if Traitorous did not something similar. Fastest way to get rid of a political enemy is to foist the job on them when Heroes come knocking.

Novice

The only time the High Lords dreaded to be named successor. What a madman.

Dainpdf

You see, after the heroes were gone, getting back on the throne was just the first step of his next plan!

Euodiachloris

Well, plotting while taking time out for yourself to do a little of your hobby is only healthy.

But, seriously... leatherwork? Possibly satin, too? Well, so much for my thoughts along the lines of hunting, shooting and fishing. Should have known, really. *rolls eyes @ own naivety*

Dainpdf

I mean, evil typed tend to work well with satin.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm imagining at least once, during some betrayl or attempt at succession, some high lord yells at him "You should have stayed a shoemaker!" and irritant just sighs and wistfully looks out a window, murmuring "I know."

Novice

It all makes sense now! But for real though, he rightfully deserves his moniker "Oddly Successful".

medailyfun

>How in the hells did he manage to convince the High Lords the shoes he made were that good

MetruX

You, sir, deserve more likes. Too bad the system here won't let me give you likes.

nick012000

What I want to know is what Irritant's Name was when he abdicated. The Retired Emperor? The Cobbler?

Dainpdf

The Dread Emperor?

Someguy

The Cobbler formerly known as Dread Emperor.

nimelennar

The Tread Emperor?

letouriste

i doubt he kept a Name. He probably can take the throne back without one. The heroes kill his successor each time after all so there is no real Named in his way

ALazyMonster

The whole terraforming the continent with stolen lakes and mountains, is downright beautiful. It sounds like a straight up evil plan from a Saturday morning cartoon villain but it is so casually practical that it is glorious.

I also think Irritant might be my favorite dread emperor.

Dainpdf

Catherine Foundling, Captain Planet villain extraordinaire.

Dainpdf

Man... Akua is the gift that keeps on giving. And I mean "gift" in German.

Cat was right, Akua just keeps reminding us how effed up she is. Also, stealing landscape: good idea. Trying to solve Praesi hunger: maybe not the best. Recall earliest lessons from Black.

Javvies

Ah, but she's not (yet) Dread Empress.

Also, her method would be selling water and fertile soil to the Praesi High Lords that wanted it, not telling them to do things. No room for them to launch a rebellion in protest of her policies if they choose to buy what she's selling.

Plus, she's a lot harder to kill off by (arranged) accident or assassination than the typical Dread Emperor/Empress.

Dainpdf

So it won't go wrong in those ways, but it turns out that the mountain she stole had the grandparents of some kid who goes on a journey with the blessing of the Heavens and offs her. Or maybe one of the High Lords gets enough power from this to overthrow Malicia and negotiations break down, with the war to depose Malicia creating even more Wasteland.

Or, hell, they don't depose Malicia but the war still happens and destroys large chunks of fertile land.

Decius

Just steal fertile land and dump the wasteland on your enemies.

If you can make a portal the size of a fortress, you can either steal the fortress or cover it in dirt. Only do a couple hundred feet or so, wouldn't want to accidentally drop any dwarves on the bottom.

RanVor

Everything can go wrong when you're a villain. There's no helping it. Logically, they should never do anything, for everything is too risky to try.

And yet they do things all the time, and not all of them backfire. Amazing.

Dainpdf

It's more of a "don't go against the full narrative weight of the Empire by yoursel" than "don't do anything as a villain".

"Fixing the weather of the empire never works because it goes against immense narrative weight" was one of the first things Black taught Cat.

Someguy

She also does not need to sell geographic features if "gifting" them could set off political strife.

Transplanting the income generators of the Crusaders into each other's "pockets" near their borders and setting of a bidding war to deny the other access to Cat's logistics services will be enough.

werafdsaew

Except that it's the erratic weather that makes the Wasteland the wasteland and not the soil. The water probably can be used to make the Green Stretch more productive though.

ALazyMonster

If a large enough body of water is introduced to an environment, and from the description this lake is massive enough to constitute a small ocean by some definitions, it would also shift weather patterns as the evaporating water would alter where rainfall and other precipitation occurs. The wasteland was also described as desert, which I'm assuming is less sand and more large swaths of dried out earth if she is speculating a lake could change things. Also, from the way it was described the lake she currently has in Arcadia also contains the aquatic life and plants which would slowly make the ground more fertile over time.

There are a lot of assumptions that go into this like assuming weather shifts enough that the lake will replenish, the animals and plants can survive in sunlight, there is a basin dug that will actually hold the water, and so on, but the guideverse has narrative smooth over the little details from time to time so these assumptions may just be kinda handwaved in.

For an idea of how stuff like this works you can google draining the entire Mediterranean Sea, which was an engineering thought experiment for doing kinda the reverse the make more building space, I think that was the idea anyway.

Snowfire1224

The only thing though is while that is true that would change the weather under normal circumstances, we have to remember that the wasteland was magically induced when a dread empress tried to steal Callow's weather. It might not be that simple, unfortunately

AVR

Other fun things about stealing gigatonnes of water would be the resulting earthquakes & landslides, introduction of foreign and possibly invasive species and, yes, messing with weather patterns. You really could mess up as badly as the Dread Emperor who tried to steal Callow's weather.

With this underground lake she's incredibly lucky not to have had the quakes & landslides already. It's probably noticeably saltier than most surface lakes what with all the cut stone exposed to the water, and even Cat saw some of the monsters. Most of those probably wouldn't enjoy the sun but you never know what would do well outside its native environment.

grzecho2222

She could steal the Wastelands weather and dump it Keter. Both sides would be happy

Dainpdf

Right! Plans involving the Wasteland and weather theft have worked great in the past!

grzecho2222

But the Empress was stealing from Callow, which means Heroes, Evil vs Evil plans work out better and who would be opposition in this operation? And what could be worse than weather that actually destroys country without instantly killing it that doesn't insta-kill it, because Narration won't let Praes randomly disappear

Dainpdf

The Narrative also won't let Praes's hunger problem be solved, so something will go wrong.

Yotz

Was going to mention portalling stuff from the inside of pressurized containers to emulate high yield explosives – but that was already in the recent noosphere strata thanks to certain anime, and before that – to last book of WoT.

So, let's up the ante for the future Magistress of Borrowwithoutexplicitconsentomancy, shall we – how about stealing Callow itself? Gonna wager Crusaders and other neerdowells will have one hell of a time looking for a way to invade a kingdom currently residing somewhere in Arcadia...

From other branch of thoughts – of slicing and dicing, primarily: if someone would be able to used portal technique to cut out a slice of Arcadia, and splice it into Creation as a wall on the border of Callow – that could pass as a decent Curtain, depending on the contains of the spliced part of course.

Also

Insanenoodlyguy

Leaving ruins or empty cities in Arcadia is one thing, a world like that LIKES that sort of mystery.

Putting a living city there is a different story. At the very least, prolonged life there will make residents... change.

Euodiachloris

One reason to worry about the critters in the lake. Lovecraftian subterranean horrors + old school fairy tales = yikes.

Yotz

Now image the stories that would be told about thouse insane Callowans, who regularly fish for thouse creatures.

Insanenoodlyguy

Years ahead in the story, Dread Cthulu comes to creation, for he is not bound to one dimension. The time of doom is upon the land. All will go mad at the sight and laugh and find new ways to kill and to die.

Well, in some places at least. In another, the Callowans look up at the mountain that moves and have different thoughts. "Huh" says Marshall Abigail. "That thing looks an awful lot like last weeks dinner. Bigger though"

"Bet they'd let us keep a piece" said General Krolem.

Abigail shook her head "That thing was Chewy as all hell. Bet this thing is even worse."

Krolem nodded. "No bones. It's not right, biting through something that doesn't crunch. But this one we probably can't cut a big enough piece off to reach bone anyway. We have to at least try it once it's dead Marshall. I will be sure to get you the best piece"

Once again, Abigail wondered how she'd come to marry this consumption-obsessed orc. Still a vast improvement over a ferret cousin, though.

MetruX

The only mortal people to ever live in Arcadia without being Named were the elves of the Golden Bloom, not even the main elves did that, and all elves are practically Named. So... Not the best idea. Taking them there for a while and then coming back? Now that could work.

Mikasi

Which anime did that recently? Also WoT?

Someguy

Goblin Slayer uses a Gate to the bottom of the ocean as a water cutter.

In Wheel of Time, Androl Genhald uses Gate creatively.

http://wot.wikia.com/wiki/Androl\_Genhald

Euodiachloris

Um... Androl can pretty much only use Gate without accidentally burning himself out or having the weave fizzle out on him, though. A restriction like that quickly teaches a guy to get highly creative. 😊

Also, it's handy to never need to carry scissors ever again. To use on anything.

Yotz

***SPOILERS ABOARD***

Goblin Slayer, end of episode 4 – titular Slayer uses a modified Portal Scroll to gate in a continuous stream of water from the bottom of the ocean to use it as a form of a water cutter.

WoT – Wheel of Time, in one of the endtail books an asha'man uses portal to gate in a torrent of pressurized lava on the battlefield, using it as impromptu liquid-thrower to eliminate a troublesome army of significant size. Also featured – moving autonomous gates of erratically changing dimensions, swallowing wide swaths of enemies; minuscule gates opened high above the battlefield to use it as observer drone-cam; hidden in a safe place cannons shooting through a gate which closes afterwards, giving the cannoneers time to reload their weapons and protecting them from harm – and also allowing them to shoot anywhere the gates can be opened...

Euodiachloris

You left out the precision leatherwork. He and Irritant would get on, maybe. Just saying.

iman

Portable cities and fortress. I like it! Another! *thor destroy cups*

eh

Hi there, Catherine Foundling here with a deal so great I have to be crazy to offer it, and with all I've been through since I was 16, who can blame me?

Anyway, I've got everything a nation could possibly need. Stuck in the middle of the desert with no water? We'll get you a lake for $29.99, and if you scry now to the Observatory, we'll throw in another, absolutely free!

No gold in your treasury or iron for steel? We got your back, Peak Mines, mines on mountain peaks are free of those pesky dwarves, allowing you to mine to your heart's content. $49.99 apiece, and if you scry now you get 25% off, what a steal! But wait, there's more! Order now and we'll throw in a second, absolutely free!

And now on today's biggest seller, Fort-in-a-Pocket! Fighting a battle on an open plain with nowhere to muster your troops? Just drop one of these bad boys in and you don't have to worry about bad weather or outriders torching your supplies! Scry now and we'll deliver it to you, free of charge!

Arcadia delivery takes no responsibility for any collateral damage that may result from is limited to one(1) time only. Terms and conditions apply

Onyavar

Before, all gates to arcadia were topological fixed.

I was under the impression that every point of Arcadia had a corresponding point in creation – and now, arcadia is serving as a plane of holding? Where Catherine has immediate access to the point she aims for?

That shouldn't work, should it?

Letouriste

More like a gate correspond to an exact point in both creation and arcadia. So you need to calculate where exactly you want to form a gate.
Everywhere can be gate-ground (even fae cities)

Shequi

Great last line 😊

For some reason, all of the Praesi remind me of the Sniper's Creed from TF2

Be Polite.
Be Efficient.
Have a plan to kill everyone you meet.

Yotz

...ahem...

*Benighted drow, your Queen is here –
My Power holds you, it's too late to fear;
All your lives long ago went wrong –
Let me sing you a little song:
We'll take the Sve as I can take a form,
And all of you will form a mighty swarm,
You will kneel, or 'll be brought down low,
Crushed and chained by the will of Woe.*

*But worry not – for your Queen has a plan:
We will go up, and claim you a new land!
Strength in numbers we'll have on staff,
So we will have the final laugh.
Now listen close to what I have to say:
Prepare to fight, and we will win the day!
If you're patient – you'll carry on,
And our foes will all soon be gone!*

NZPIEFACE

Wait, is Akua using positive reinforcement on Cat to make her more of her ideal leader?

She's been using "Dearest" and "My heart" whenever she's even slightly pleased with how Cat's going.
I think.

superkeaton

Would that be positive, or negative reinforcement?

NZPIEFACE

Positive.

RanVor

Positive for Ubua, negative for Cat.

Cold Cyberia

>Cat looking over Everdark

"Hmmm. I'm gonna have some of that."

The funny thing is, she could totally sell some of the drow shit through Mercantis. The type of stuff they sell in the Closed Circle auctions include: written invitation to Skade, the original piece of the Tower and the materials Akua used for the Second Liesse.

Zim the Fox

"Horrifically enough, Diabolist was beaming."
Oh man. This line had me laughing. It was wonderful.

And yes, Cat, I did find Diabolist funny earlier 😊

luminiousblu

"I waved a hand dismissively, tired of the argument. Her logic only held up because it was a closed circle."
Catherine really needs to learn to stop dismissing or avoiding arguments she can't think of a retort to, it's one of her biggest flaws. Half of her confession episodes amount to "I knew I was wrong but I didn't want to admit it half a book ago".

Dresden 67

Except she's right here. Akua's philosophy is insane. Praesi nobility is totally ineffectual at everything except infighting. Not to mention when you're dealing with a known manipulator who is smarter than you the best thing to do is disregard everything she says that isn't related to practical matters.

Jessica Day

I don't know. A circular argument is a logical fallacy I think warrants dismissal.

luminiousblu

1. A circular argument is a logical fallacy, but unlike formal fallacies, informal fallacies don't necessarily mean the argument itself is wrong. "Humans walk on two legs because walking on two legs is what people do" is a partially circular argument, but that doesn't mean that people don't walk on two legs. Dismissing an argument that comprises entirely of a logical fallacy is alright. Dismissing its position isn't unless you can refute it, and Catherine is pointedly just refusing to engage.

2. Akua's statement isn't circular. It's actually pretty weird that Cat thinks that the argument is circular, and I suspect it's because she really hasn't come to terms with the fact that the private and public spheres aren't naturally unified, and that a genuinely nice person can do monstrous things because it's the best way for his country and vice versa. The argument being made is a pretty basic one in statecraft – the King does what is necessary for his country and people, the man wearing the crown does what he thinks is right, the two don't always coincide and you'll have to choose (in fact, Catherine already has). The simple example Akua used of her mother can be flipped to "you find your (beloved) brother has committed a crime worthy of execution, do you execute him?". Catherine's position of responsibility is a non-sequitur – it's got nothing to do with responsibility, it's about what you need to do and what you wish you could do.

Yotz

Points of view.

Akua posits that Ruler and Wearer of the Crown are two different persons, and it is how it's done, because they are two different persons.

An institutionalized form of artificially induced schizophrenia.

Cat thinks this is wrong, and Ruler is the Wearer of the Crown, or at least must be – ergo, to wear the Crown rightfully one must change to become a Ruler, otherwise the whole country will suffer consequences; and if one separates two roles – that person must be kept as far away from the Crown as possible.

Usual separation of a Person and a Crown is caused by the inherent conflict between the inhumane prerequisites needed to wear the Crown, and inescapable humanity of one who wears it.

Person who without a shadow of doubt or hesitation will answer "yes" to your flipped question is the only one who is worthy to be allowed to rule. That person also will be universally despised – if not outright hated by the populus due to the utter unconcealable inhumanity. But only utter inhumans can rule humans properly.

There also are several major pit-traps on that rout due to parasitic feedback chains skewing the perception of the Ruler, and regulatory capture eventually distancing ruling class from the people they are supposed to rule to an impermissible degree. By strict sets of imposed rules *ghm*Constitution*ghm* a rigid cage can be formed to contain the metastasis – or, rather, suppress; by regular pruning of the ruling apparatus with a proper instrument a-la NKVD administrative evolution can be shaped – but only to a degree. All this can be mitigated, of course – all but the inherent nature of the people, without error eventually leading to rise of sun-kings and caligulas regardless of amount of contingencies and type of political structure.

Cue the schism.

luminiousblu

>Points of view.

Catherine insists on bringing her personal morality into play where it neither belongs nor has historically been relevant, and where the setting actively works against her. This isn't a point of view, this is Catherine being pedantic because she's obsessed with self-flagellation. Akua isn't literally saying that there are two different people involved. Akua is saying that you need to put aside what you want in order to do what you must.

>ergo, to wear the Crown rightfully one must change to become a Ruler, otherwise the whole country will suffer consequences; and if one separates two roles – that person must be kept as far away from the Crown as possible. A ruler isn't a person. It's not even a group of people. It's an entity that has nothing to do with humans and so pretending that you can morph into one, even in your private life, is beyond stupid, and Catherine has already been confronted with that in the form of Kilian and Akua's continued existence.

>That person also will be universally despised – if not outright hated by the populus due to the utter unconcealed inhumanity.

Says who? Historically, many “inhuman rulers” who were very capable leaders were beloved by the populace.

>There also are several major pit-traps on that rout due to parasitic feedback chains skewing the perception of the Ruler, and regulatory capture eventually distancing ruling class from the people they are supposed to rule to an impermissible degree.

Which is ironically what Catherine hates the most yet is also what Catherine thinks is necessary.

>By strict sets of imposed rules *ghm*Constitution*ghm* a rigid cage can be formed to contain the metastasis – or, rather, suppress; by regular pruning of the ruling apparatus with a proper instrument a-la NKVD administrative evolution can be shaped – but only to a degree. All this can be mitigated, of course – all but the inherent nature of the people, without error eventually leading to rise of sun-kings and caligulas regardless of amount of contingencies and type of political structure. I don't know what you're trying to say here. I imagine it's just promoting some constitutional structure or whatnot, though it still doesn't matter.

My point is that Catherine isn't actually thinking about the argument, she's dismissing it. Someone dismissing an argument without engaging with it means they're either convinced they're right or they know they're wrong, and I really do doubt Catherine is as self-confident as she's putting on.

RanVor

I've just remember the scene in which Cordelia holds two different positions in an argument in the Highest Assembly – one as the First Prince, the other as the Princess of Rhenia. That doesn't make her schizophrenic – it means she has to separate the affairs of her two different social positions for practical reasons. This is the perfect example of what Akua's talking about – the separation of affairs. And she speaks sense, too – if the Praesi didn't do this, they would quickly descend into the same murderfest that destroyed the Drow. Cat of course misunderstood, partly because Akua explained it rather poorly, but also because she didn't want to understand.

Yotz

While that scene doesn't make her schizophrenic, it also only tangentially related to demonstrating the separation of Person and Crown. In that particular example she is a Person wearing two Crowns, and taking actions from behind, making that construct a singular entity.

Now, if she was to enact her duties related to each of the Crowns in full and sooth, and such duties would go counter to each other – that would result in an early onset of the illness in question.

Throw into that mix a notion of “what needed to be done” antithetic to her interests as a living woman, and most of her will would go into mending the schism that will break and devour her otherwise. “Woman wearing a Queenly mask” trope was born not out of idle speculation.

Now, as for separation itself. Pragmatic reasons, you say. Well – yes. While it is, indeed, crucial to proper functioning of the Seat, it is also unreachable due to inescapable inherent nature of the ruler. Without the separation, Person would be unable to wear the Crown properly, with separation the Crown will break the Person. Schism between the "want" and "need" will break a person, make no mistake. But as people are generally pretty malleable, some compromise between the Person and a Crown is struck – usually with some supportive measures like the codes of honor and laws, or external regulatory organ with proper mandate, be it overly-enthusiastic Cheka commissars, or random impotent qahal a-la constitutional court.

Cue the artificially induced schizophrenia. Its host may be high-functioning, but it still is there. And if there are none, that would mean that there are no separation, and – usually – needs of the Crown are dominated by wants of the Wearer, with corruption train inbound. Outside of that stream of nonsense, person routinely separating its two personalities of, well, the Person and the Crown-wearer is prone to fall into "it's not me" pit-trap, when selfish "needs" of the Person bleeds into the domain of the Crown without conscious intent to do so – which is usually explained away as "I hate you personally, but this is of no consequence – for the King is not me, so you will be executed for totally unrelated crimes before the Crown".

Outside regulators are not panacea, as it is, for they are bound to suffer from regulatory capture, becoming completely useless; or – depending on their mandate – either displacing the ruling organ in all but name, or creating a political machine(s) to puppeteer it.

All this is mitigated in modern structures by limiting time allotted for the Crown-wearing to alleviate the stress, or/and breaking the Crown into little pieces and creating bureaucratic institute complex enough to make the ruling organ useless, therefore delegating the process of decision-making to lower level positions where stresses caused by the schism between "need" and "want" are significantly less profound.

There is a way, however, to eliminate the need for such schizophrenic measures completely. It is optimal and efficient, if overly idealistic.

It is, also, completely inapplicable in concurrent human society due to the inherent nature of humanity being, well, inherent.

I am talking about person changing to such a degree, that Person's "wants" will become Crown's "needs". As long as humans remain humans this solution will be unfeasible and unapplicable in any way, shape, or form – and currently implemented artificially induced schizophrenia will remain implemented simply because it works and we have no better working solution.

Teal deer: for all her pragmatism Cat comes as highly idealistic in this exchange. She doesn't "does not want to understand" – as I see it – but rather "doesn't want to accept". Would she be able to do it, finds a way to remain idealist, or there will be something compleately different – only time and EE know.

Also, you saying "schizophrenia" as it is something bad. Artificially induced paranoia is crucial for the proper functioning of any regulatory organ, mind you. Why other mental mindphuks must be subjected to such prejudices?..

Yotz

Also, "what you need to do" versus "what you wish to do" is the question of responsibility.

Jessica Day

I loved reading your reply.

I think it's worth noting, this argument didn't take place in a vacuum but between Heiress and the Queen of Winter. This does imply a certain regidity of thinking you would not have with say two moral philosophers.

But regardless, I am still of the opinion that Cat was justified in dismissing the argument. Consider the context, the reason they are debating the nature of rulers is that Akua is defending the Praesi. A people who find it normal to follow mad men and summon reality corrupting demons. Further, Akua has suspect motives in this situation.

Considering this backdrop, any fallacy in an argument makes the already suspect words fall apart. Akua sacrificed an entire city full of people for power after all.

Out of context, simply looking at the idea separately... Well, I definitely appreciate your point. I still find I agree with Cat's side in this discussion but it does take further thought to reach that conclusion.

Yotz

Why, thank you, dear.

Also – yep, outside of pure speculation nothing exists in vacuum, and if someone wants to interpret words in a certain way – it will be done, be the fallacy real or perceived. Especially in ideologically influenced arguments.

>it does take further thought *silently tips budenovka*

Aotrs Commander

Lakeomancy.

Perfect.

I love the idea of Cat just casually stealing half the continent, just to sell it back to the other half.

OutspanFoster

I think we can all agree that D.E. Irritant is the best character?

Naeddyr

Cat better hope Irritant isn't part of the character poll tournament.

letouriste

i doubt cat will win anyway. Hakram, robber and Black have more chances in my opinion

letouriste

AND MASEGO, HOW THE HELL I MANAGED TO FORGET HIM????

Metrux

I really disagree on those 3, all of them are what they are through her, and would be diminished without her. Yes, even Black. Though I see the possibility of she losing to one of the big monsters, like Ranger, Masego or a Dread Emperor... To bad we don't have a dread emperor competition :V And I'd really enjoy studying history at Praes, full of strange and interesting occurrences.

RanVor

The fact that some characters' arcs are dependent on the protagonist doesn't automatically make the protagonist more popular than them. Characters don't exist in a vacuum – the protagonist is shaped by those around them as much as the other way around. It's true that Hakram and Black would be diminished without Cat, but at the same time Cat would be equally diminished without them.

RanVor

Not to mention that without Black there would be no plot.

adam1

No, Dread Emperor Traitorous for life (and death by betrayal)!

Rustndusty

I wonder if Cat could "borrow" part of the Tower. Just cut the top half off and drop it near Liesse. Maybe make Malicia buy it back, or offer it to the Tyrant and the Dead King.

Snowfire1224

There's a book, I believe it's called Guns, Germs, and Steel, I haven't read it but I had to watch a documentary about it one of my history classes... but I digress. Basically it explains why we have the world powers we do based off of the resources, basically how much food we can grow in an area, what kind of domesticated animals we have been exposed to (which includes what diseases we have been exposed to since many come from animals), and what metals we can mine in the area. It's what the book claims to separate the haves and have nots of the world.

But imagine the kind of world Cat could make by moving all those resources around?

luminiousblu

Just so you know, Guns, Germs, and Steel is a lot of repeating things we already knew and a good amount of shoehorning (it tries to fit China to the pattern at one point and immediately ignores the fact that it doesn't really fit the pattern after the 1400s) and desperate preemptive refutations of racism (way too much of the damn book is taken up by his gushing over Papua New Guineans and how they're actually super intelligent possibly more than everyone else, it makes you feel like he's never been to a rural area). Diamond isn't a historian and it shows quite a damn lot. It's not a laughingstock book since its claims aren't straight up false, but it's looked upon poorly in historical scholarship.

>But imagine the kind of world Cat could make by moving all those resources around?

A world with trade? You know like what happened historically? That's what it amounts to, really. That and large-scale irrigation projects with knock-on effects that will make Anthropocene climate change look glacially paced in comparison.

Jane

In fairness, though, it's one of the better pop history books that a person can cite – most other books talking about history targeting the general public are... Of unfortunately low quality. Either reinforcing popular myths, obsessed with debunking popular myths to the point that they forget to talk about actual history, or pushing some kind of personal agenda. It's not great, but a layperson would still gain some useful insight after they read it.

I wouldn't bring up GGS when talking to an actual historian, mind you, but I also wouldn't start cringing the way that I would if someone brought up certain other books...

nipi

Is Cat sure that the fortresses she stores in Arcadia won't be occupied by fae by the time she recalls them?

Also is Akua filling in for Masego for the portal tricks?

ironvale

Dread Emperor Irritant, is he returning again?
The proper response when his name is mentioned.

Also, Akua is pulling a Jorg Ankrath.

grzecho2222

I think that all Calernias Villains will return along with That One Empress in some kind of All Hells Break Lose moment, partly because Below isn't doing a lot and that would screw over literally everybody on continent

HannaB

Cat, don't pretend you know anything about having an abusive parent, the only one you ever had is like the furthest opposite from that possible 😡

Akua's opinion is... very person-like

nipi

Umm... Cat. Couldn't Thief "summon" fortifications too? Maybe to a lesser degree. I mean she did produce a whole fleet in an instant.

Im wondering why no-one has considered all the ways that aspect of Thiefs could be abused.

Zourath

How unfortunate. Cat is making such incredible advancements in new fields of magic, and yet Masego is nowhere nearby. She'll have to tell him all about Lakeomancy when they reunite.

lucas

Anyone knows if cat is getting a new name? Or she will only have the mantle now?

RanVor

How are we supposed to know that? The only insight we have comes from the chapters, which I assume you have read. We know as much as you.

Xellos^_-

Catherine, Lady of the Stolen Lakes, Mountains, cities, fortress and anything not under a magical shield.

Alegio

After some thinking I realized that they most frustrating job in existance is to be a hero that has to kill Irritant. May the Gods be mercyfull with them, couse clearly wasnt

---

Chapter 69: Peerage

"Traitorous's Law: while redemption is the greatest victory one can achieve over a villain, to function it does require the villain to have at least a single redeemable quality.

Addendum: Yes, even if a Choir is involved."

– Extract from 'The Axiom Appendix', multiple contributors

Some days I wondered what it said about me that I much preferred holding court down in the Everdark than back in Laure. Sure, odds were good that every single member of my Peerage – even Ivah – would turn on me in a heartbeat if their oaths allowed for it, but for all that there was a simplicity to the proceedings that I enjoyed. Callow's royalty was known for a certain lack of pageantry compared to its much wealthier neighbours to the east and the west, but even that relative lack of ceremony could feel stifling at times. I'd spent most of my times prior to the crowning on one campaign or another, and while it was true that the Legions were strictly regulated I'd had the benefit of being a Named in a Praesi institution. Which had meant, more or less, that rules had only ever applied to me if someone higher in the Empire's pecking order had decreed that they did. Considering Black had been the very definition of hands off and Malicia had largely considered me his problem early on, I'd been allowed to run free.

It might have been for the better if I hadn't. I'd learned a lot from my teacher but in many ways my apprenticeship felt only half-finished. Though I had long disdained the kind of aristocratic someone like Akua brought to the table, I'd since felt the costs of lacking that kind of education. Dealing with Wastelanders and Procerans I'd often been on the backfoot while they turned etiquette and custom into armaments. Much as I hated to admit it, treating with Cordelia Hasenbach without Diabolist whispering in my ear all the while would have seen the First Prince playing me like a fiddle. She'd called me a warlord, in one of our little talks, and she had a point. On the surface that was a stone around my neck, but down here? It was the wind in my sail. I was dealing with other warlords, and even before I'd stolen Crepuscular from Akua's mind I'd known how to speak the language of these people. Seated comfortably on a stone bench perched atop an inclined that less-than-subtly set my Peerage below me, I struck a match against my sleeve and lit my pipe.

My wakeleaf stash was running low, so I'd had to ration the vice, but there was no point in letting the herbs go to waste. I puffed at the sculpted dragonbone shaft, inhaling the smoke and letting it stream out of my nostrils with a pleased sigh. It was gladdening that Winter had not stripped me of all my petty pleasures.

"Evening," I drawled. "I see none of you are missing, so I'll take it that negotiations didn't go too badly."

My court of murderers offered up polite amusement at the admittedly weak jest. The Peerage now numbered eleven Mighty, every single one titled by Winter. Most of those had come from Great Lotow, reluctantly bending the knee after wandering around the outskirts of Arcadia for a while and finding no way out save the one I'd offered. Slaus and Sagas had been the first to fold, remaining where I'd left them and taking the oaths after a single day. The others trickled into my service over the following week as my sigil settled our other affairs in the city. Nodoi and Vasyl had held out for three and five days, respectively, finding no trouble living off the land but no way back to the Everdark either. By then I'd already bullied Losle and Zarkan into oath-taking after a few demonstrations of how dangerous living in places with only one entrance and exit could be when that space could be closed off by gate. Kanya and Soln had refused the longest, the full seven days, and they'd only changed their minds after Mighty Orelik vanished without a trace. Sooner or later, those treading the domain of the fae were found by them. Including Ivah, I'd left Great Lotow with nine titled lords. The last two we'd picked up on our way to Great Strycht, the sigil-holders of the Lovre and the Vadimyr.

Practically speaking, those sigils had been roving bandits and raiders living off whatever they could take from the weakest nearby territory. They'd had almost no supplies to throw into the pot, which had been something of an issue, but the sigils were also the most battle-hardened I had at my disposal. They'd had as many dzulu as nisi in their ranks, and according to Akua they were the tribes finding it easiest to live under my rules. It made sense to me: with low numbers, they simply hadn't been able to afford the casual cruelties of larger and more established sigils. The other sigil-holders we'd come across on our way to Strycht had been less inclined to bend the knee when presented with overwhelming numbers, so they'd ended up feeding my nascent Peerage instead of joining it. Their lesser Mighty and dzulu had not been so obstinate, so they'd been folded into my own Losara Sigil where Ivah could keep an eye on them. It'd had the added benefit of swelling what could be considered my personal tribe larger than any of the others, always a good card to have in hand when dealing with other warlords.

"Reports, then," I said. "Lord Soln?"

The Lord of Shallow Graves smiled, which was promising. I'd been careful not to play favourites with my Peerage, but I would privately admit that Soln was the Mighty who'd most grown on me. It had taken to its title better than any drow save Ivah, and its continued knack for producing results was a very large feather in its metaphorical cap.

"Talks with the Jindrich have been fruitful, Losara Queen," it announced. "Mighty Jindrich is willing to take the oaths, in exchange for certain considerations."

I puffed at my pipe, impressed but trying not to show it. The Jindrich weren't top dog back in Strycht, but they were widely considered the runner-up to the sigil that was. In large part because Jindrich itself was apparently a fucking terrifying savage that went berserk when fighting other Mighty and sunk entire chunks of island in the throes of uncontrollable rage. I'd expected them to be holdouts, not in the first batch of collaborators. Letting out a stream of acrid smoke, I let out a pleased hum.

"Considerations?" I prompted.

"Jindrich territory holds the largest cisterns of Great Strycht," Lord Soln elaborated. "This is well-known. They would outlast all others when thirst takes the city, and so cabal was forged among lesser sigils to take the water from them by force. Mighty Jindrich requests assistance in scattering the scavengers before oaths are taken."

Ah, these charming drow. You could always count on them to turn on each other even when the enemy was at the gate.

"And Jindrich will fight at our side, when the time comes?" I asked.

"That is so, Losara Queen," Lord Soln replied.

"Then the bargain is struck," I said. "Centon?"

Akua's secretary had been standing in my shadow all the while, stone tablet and chalk in hand, and approached when bid.

"My queen," it murmured.

"Add five auction seats to the due of the Soln," I ordered.

The auction system had not lasted long before needing revision, though we'd never expected it would. Considering we now had almost forty thousand drow on the march, allowing everyone to bid would have been difficult. The simple logistical difficulties of fitting that many people in a single cavern aside, I'd needed a carrot to keep my growing army happy. Oaths bound them regardless of preference, but willing soldiers tended to be a lot more useful than conscripts. The right to attend the auction of Night-filled corpses was now restricted to a smaller number of people, currently four hundred. My own Losara Sigil owned a quarter of that, most of it attributed by lottery so more than dzulu and Mighty might rise, but I'd given every sigil under my banner a certain number of seats and kept the last hundred as rewards to parcel out. Lord Soln would have the right to grant those seats to whoever it wished, both reinforcing its authority over its sigil and giving a reminder that the power's ultimate source was the Queen of Lost and Found.

Diabolist might be a bloody viper but there was no denying how godsdamned useful she was.

"Honour was given," Lord Soln said, inclining its head.

"The worthy rise," I replied, the cadenced sentence in Crepuscular rolling off the tongue.

My gaze swept over the rest of the Peerage, and I could almost taste the anger and envy some displayed. But not directed at me, I thought. Not for now, anyway. It was an ugly little bit of irony that some of the Praesi practices I despised the most worked so well with the drow. Keeping the blades of my subordinates pointed at each other was an old Wasteland game I was beginning to be a fair hand at. But they will not fight each other, I reminded myself. The oaths have seen to that. The violence would be turned outwards, and put to my purposes.

"I await other fair news," I said. "Lord Vadimyr?"

The most recent addition to the Peerage shook its head. Vadimyr had actually answered a few questions I had about drow and the nature of the titles I was handing out without meaning to. The Lord of Fading Echoes was, well, the owner of a womb. It had risen to prominence late, and birthed a child when it was nisi. I did not choose the titles I gave out when empowering my lords – Winter provided them – so it'd been interesting to learn that my mantle would likely never hand out a title of Lady to a drow. A matter of perception by the beholden, Akua had theorized, and in Masego's absence I had no reason to gainsay her.

"Mighty Karmel founded a cabal with three others to share their water," Lord Vadimyr said. "Together they may well last until the great cabals of the inner ring come to war against us, and so will not consider the taking of oaths."

I nodded.

"Lord Slaus?" I tried.

"The fortune of Mighty Soln was my own curse," the drow ruefully admitted. "For the Hushu are of the cabal besieging the Jindrich, and so have undertaken salvation by strife. They deny any other ending."

Yeah, there were two sides to that coin. For every cornered sigil they'd be twice as many sigils cornering it, and those would be less than inclined to make a pact with an interloper like me. I suspected that if I allowed the internal skirmishes to play out I'd get a willing accomplice out of every major defeat, but I had constraints of my own to consider. My own camp might be fine when it came to water – I did have a lake to parcel out – but food was another story. I had over forty thousand drow to keep fed nowadays, and no supply train to speak of. Considering I'd refused foraging raids in favour of assimilating the same sigils we'd be pillaging, the state of our food reserves was essentially a downwards slope with the occasional uptick when we brought in a sigil. Of course that same sigil also brought additional bellies to fill, so the relief was short-lived and followed by even sharper descent. We had maybe another two weeks left in us before emergency rationing started, and after that maybe a third before the stores ran empty.

There'd been cattle in Great Lotow, great lizards and some sort of giant moles whose milk Indrani assured me was utterly disgusting, but Lotow was an outskirts city. The wealthy sigils with full stores were further in, and meanwhile we'd already butchered most of the lizards for meat. Several times, actually. The younger ones were smaller but they grew back body parts over several days as long as they didn't lose too much flesh and die from the effort, which had strung out their use some. Strictly speaking I could afford a week of sitting on my thumbs before matters became urgent but it would be risky. We'd have to take Strycht and its entire stores immediately afterwards or risk circling the drain of our personal reserves while hammering down the last pockets of resistance. Archer had half-seriously noted that since corpses were currently our most common form of loot perhaps grey meat should be put on the table, but cannibalism was a little too far for me. Akua had noted that it was strictly taboo in drow culture regardless, as eating their own kind's flesh was believed to cause rot in the soul and cause Night to seep out.

No, in my eyes were needed to take Great Strycht within the next few days. It'd give us enough of a margin that we'd keep our head above the water while resuming our march into the inner ring, racing ever more harshly against the bottom as we went. It wasn't sustainable, but then it didn't have to be: this was an exodus, not a conquest. Unfortunately that meant attacking soon, and that would be risky business without allies on the inside. Which proved to be in rather short supply, I discovered as the Peerage continued giving me their reports. There were a few offers to help against other sigils but not take oaths, in exchange for water, but the lords who'd held those talks admitted betrayal was more than likely the moment water was supplied. Lord Zarkan, who'd yet to bother hiding how much it despise my very existence, brought a second success with a minor sigil that'd apparently been evicted of its territory by a cabal and was now furious enough to turn its cloak. Five auction seats went to the Zarkan for the success, though that one did not thank me for them afterwards. Lord Nodoi had failed in talks with the Strycht sigil it'd approached but found another settled near the western sluice gate that was desperate enough to take the full oaths in exchange for survival. They were already on their way, and for that the Nodoi earned six seats.

It was Ivah's own report that turned the mood grim, for it'd been sent not to bargain but to gain information.

"Over the last two days I took five Mighty from varying sigils," the Lord of Silent Steps informed me. "As of an hour ago interrogation of four of them has been carried out. From this, two matters of import were discovered. The first is that we have drawn the attention of the Longstride Cabal."

The drow were always eerily well-behaved, at least when I was present, so there was no ripple of murmurs as there would have been with humans. But several of the lords visibly stiffened, which for their kind was a glaring warning sign.

"This is certain?" Lord Vasył pressed.

"Mighty Leslaw is of the Swooping Bat Cabal, of which a lesser member of the Longstride is also part," Ivah said. "It is my understanding that is the path by which word of our arrival spread. When the cabals of Great Strycht put out the call to war, interest developed."

"You'll have to fill me in on the particulars of this Longstride Cabal," I said.

Ivah grimaced.

"Hunters of hunters, my queen," the Lord of Silent Steps said. "A great and ancient cabal."

Lord Soln nodded, catching my eye.

"They fight only for the glory of the Night," it added. "Only the sharpest blades are invited into the fold. They hold no territory, protect no temple: their only purpose is the death of those they deem worthy."

So not so much dwarven deed-seekers as a bunch of Night-powered Ranger equivalents. That was just lovely.

"How many?" I asked.

"Two hundred," Ivah said. "Never more nor less. One invited must take another's place."

By which it meant murder their predecessor. So I wasn't just dealing with thrill-killers, I was dealing with a full cohort of hardened Mighty who'd either been dangerous enough to kill one of the old monsters or remained sharp enough to kill the young ones.

"How long before they're mobilized?" I asked. "If they're this picky about members, they have to be widely spread out."

"It is hard to say, Losara Queen," Lord Lovre told me. "For while they range far and wide, there are those among them who know the Secret of shadow-striding. That is the source of their name."

"Shadow-striding," I slowly repeated. "Is that what I think it is?"

The drow sharply grinned.

"Wherever there is shadow, their strides may take them," Lord Lovre agreed. "It is a gift from the very hands of Sve Noc."

"And this is instantaneous," I said, disbelieving.

That sounded like teleportation through shadows, which was a bit much even if the Priestess of Night had her fingers in it. Even the Miezans had to sacrifice a city's worth of captives to move their armies like that. Masego couldn't fucking teleport, and I'd seen him order a Princess of Summer to go sit in the corner like a petulant child.

"Not so," Lord Soln said. "It is a lengthening of stride. Not unlike the stories Mighty Archer speaks of your journeys in the Garden of the Splendid."

So cutting corners, not snap-your-fingers-and-it's-done. If the Gloom and the Night were really part of Sve Noc's domain, as I'd come to suspect they were, shadow-striding might just be taking a shortcut through the original domain from which all the rest spawned. Or it might just be an improvement on the shadow-tendrill trick almost every drow with Night could use, only with a difficult relationship with its father and something to prove. Regardless, that meant we were about to be up in our neck in veteran old guard killers.

"A week?" I tried.

"Less," Ivah said. "My captive had no precise day, yet believed they would arrive before assault was made on Great Strycht."

"They don't know when we're going to assault," I pointed out.

"Speculation abounds," my Lord of Silent Steps drily said. "Most common is the belief that within five days there will be battle."

"So four days," I frowned. "Give or take."

This was starting to take shape, slowly but surely. This would be fought in waves. My army had to strike within a few days. The Longstride Cabal would arrive within four to hunt us for sport. The earliest reinforcements from the inner ring cabals would start arriving within a week. If I took Great Strycht before the Longstride arrived, I could lay an ambush for them. Which would pay off massively, if I could tittle even a few of those drow. The shadow-striding trick would allow us to spread exponentially fast, and we'd be able to eat up the reinforcements as they arrived. That would be a tipping point for this campaign, I thought. If I had a Peerage that large and powerful? We'd trample everything in our way towards Sve Noc, swelling with recruits as we did. On the other hand, if we botched the invasion of Strycht we were fucked for good. We'd lose strength in the attempt, and then we'd get hit by the Longstride and the reinforcements in quick succession. It had downwards spiral written all over it. Bold strokes would either win this or end this, depending on how it all fell out. Waiting was essentially giving up the game, and so not even worth considering.

"There is a second matter of import, Losara Queen," Ivah reminded me.

I rolled my shoulder, reluctantly emerging from my line of thought.

"I'm listening," I said.

"One of the prisoners I obtained was a jawor of the Rumena Sigil," my Lord of Silent Steps said. "Privy to intent of Mighty Rumena itself."

My brow rose. If the Jindrich were the runner-ups, then the Rumena were the local hegemony. Their sigil was twice the size of anybody else's, their rylleh were said to be a pain to even sigil-holders and Mighty Rumena itself was rumoured to have died once, gotten rather angry about it and promptly gotten up with a severed spine to smash in the head of the offending Mighty. The only drow in Strycht it was even remotely wary of was Jindrich, and there was cabal essentially every other sigil-holder was part of whose entire purpose was making sure the Rumena didn't eat everyone else. If it was making a move, it would have major consequences on how this battle unfolded.

"And?" I said.

"The many sigils of Great Strycht are turning on each other," Ivah said. "Cabals have split, or been reformed to address more pressing concerns. There is opportunity in this."

"It's preparing to take a swing at claiming all of Strycht," I said.

"Malcontent rylleh were approached, I am told," Ivah smiled. "And the jawor I took was looking for weaknesses in the defences other sigils."

I closed my eyes. This... It might work. If they struck hard and quick while other sigils were already fighting. If they kept the fighting out of sight until they'd harvested enough Night, they could just retreat for a day and let their Mighty digest what they took – after that they'd have enough power to bring to bear that even allied opposition wouldn't matter. That was an additional beat to the dance ahead, and one I could use. If I had eyes in the right place. If I was careful and fast and lucky. I opened my eyes and brought the pipe back to my lips. The fire had gone out, since I'd put talking above smoking, but there was still some wakeleaf not entirely gone to ash. I took a match out of my cloak and struck it on my arm, puffing at the pipe until it lit up again. Waste not, want less. Meeting the eyes of my Peerage, I spat out a mouthful of smoke and let it curl around my face.

"Are any of you," I smiled, "familiar with Irritant's Law?"

---

erraticerrata

Character contest continues: Black vs Champion. Link to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16807270?

fbclid=IwAR3J1fsB85Ln1W9rxMPyboJA3eQftQC6jBBINFdxE0jfy\_JwcB4K965cwEk

---

Erraticerrata, sorry if I bother you, but this week all the updates were posted an hour later than usual, so I wanted to ask whether you have daylight savings or something (for practical reasons: it's 8 AM here in Russia, so I need to know when to get up to post the links on Reddit).

sivarajan

Yeah, daylight savings time ended on Nov 4.

Argentorum

It is Daylight Savings time in the US now. As I haven't noticed the updates being an hour later and I'm on Daylight Savings, I would assume Erraticerrata is as well.

Dainpdf

Daylight savings has ended in the US.

<https://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-5382983/Daylight-Savings-2018-clocks-change.html>

Soronel Haetir

Well this is gonna be a lopsided blowout.

Agent J

So par for the course? Save for Bard vs. Sabah, they've all been horrendously one sided matches so far. It's the next round that'll be the interesting one.

SMHF

I know some people have issues with Black ... but srsly? 10 people voted for the person that killed and skinned Sabah?!!
0_-

Raved Thrad

Maybe this means Black gets to kill and skin Champion? I would dearly love to see (or read about) that.

Dainpdf

Eh. The champion is entertaining, and she **has** eaten less people. Plus, Sabah had way less presence (including references) than any of the Calamities.

stevenneiman

She might have killed off a likeable character and desecrated her corpse, but remember that most of the major characters, including Black and probably Sabah herself, are pretty amoral. And Rafaella did have a sort of hilarious, gung-ho honesty to her. I actually quite liked the way that she forewent the usual ranting about honor and Good and instead talked about getting free drinks and impressing lovers with Kairos' skull.

RanVor

Well, that was a no-brainer, wasn't it?

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

imagesbe

Is that the one about the first step of a plan can't fail so always be on your first step?

Two ____

No, it's

"Irritant's Law: inevitable doom is a finite resource, and becomes mere doom when split between multiple heroic bands. Nemeses should never simultaneously engage a single villain."

Byzantine

Aka Catherine is going to make sure **everything** happens at the exact same time. The inevitable doom gets split up and lets her prevail against, well, everyone.

caoimhinh

Lo and beware, for when Doom is spread, the Woe descends upon all and the Sovereign of Moonless Nights stands victorious.

Faiir

Let me just spread some doom on my morning toast.

haihappen

Doom(TM), now with double the flavor and easy spread guaranteed, no matter if refrigerated or not.
Enjoy Doom(TM) today! And share it with your enemies and friends alike *wink*

Yotz

Sylwoos

Cat good old strategy. When in deep shit, just keep creating more chaos until a opportunity appears.

d0m1n1c

When in deep shit, just keep shitting, and eventually, you'll be able to swim your way out.

onedollargum

Ah, conservation of ninjutsu. A single ninja is an ineffable warrior, a crowd of ninja is a bumbling mob.

RanVor

They get in each other's way.

Raved Thrad

Does that mean that as you kill the faceless ninja mooks, they eventually get harder to kill, culminating in a fight with a boss or mid-boss?

Dainpdf

Depends how much you let the tension build.
You can generally dispatch all of them without much hassle if you keep the encounter casual.

Ezario Gerion

And tension usually builds up between fights. So if you kill them all in one encounter you are gucci. But if you let one enemy survive, he will gather narrative weight, maybe show a flashback, swear revenge etc.

Shikkarasu

Headcannon accepted.

Fern

just another reason why i fucking adore this serial: the conservation of ninjutsu is a fucking natural law that you risk running afoul of if you fight with too large a group. Hell, we saw that earlier when the crusade invaded Callow: Twelve versus two? They were doomed from the start, the sorry bastards.

onedollargum

It depends. If you can play it off as a buddy-cop back-to-back battle with your rival where you're forgoing differences to team up against a more numerous foe the narrative weight is towards your winning.

Decius

There are no heroes here. But it is villain on villain, so the question is: whose inevitable doom is coming, and is it better to dilute it to have a single chapter of multiple doom or to have a few chapters of inevitable doom?

nick012000

This chapter's got a lot of interesting details in it about how the granting of Fae titles works. I guess that the former King of Winter didn't choose to make Catherine the Countess of Moonless Nights; it was a reflection of her own self-image. Presumably it took into account her identity as the Squire of the Black Knight, as well as the fact that she was the Lady of Marchford, and that the Praesi title of Lady was equivalent to the Callowan title of Countess.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but you have one error there, she was Duchess, not Countess.

Allafterme

Well, she made herself forever successor of a Duke...

---

Actually, we've only seen the Praesi titles of Lord and High Lord (with only seven of the latter, each in their own city), so it stands to reason that the former is rather fluid and dependent on the political situation for any given lord. Also, you forgot that Cat declared war on the King of Winter mid-conversation, which is probably the biggest influence of them.

Dainpdf

The King may have chosen what he made Cat – his carving a moon to put in her chest indicates he could at least sense what she was about to become, and he'd had a few millenia more experience with Winter than she has now.

Rup

...on a realted note ..out of 11 we have Lords of Silent Steps
Shallow Graves
Fading Echoes
...would dearly love to know the other 8 Peer names

byvectron

King of Winter was trolling-> Moonless Night = black night = Black Knight...so yeah, that makes sense.

Two ____

Irritant's law, for those that don't remember it:
"Irritant's Law: inevitable doom is a finite resource, and becomes mere doom when split between multiple heroic bands. Nemeses should never simultaneously engage a single villain."

Walter

" if I could title even a few of those drow."

Man, Cat's ability to not admit that she is a slaver is approaching Praesi levels.

wirelessgrapes

Eh, it's more of forcible conscription. They do have timed contracts after all

Skaddix

I mean its indentured servitude but that is not much better. Seems more semantics but Cat does a whole lot of that so she can feel good about herself.

luminiousblu

Remember that Akua got called a slaver back in the day for retaining the right to execute people below her at whim, even if the soldiers were paid in kind and loot instead of coin (an actual way people were paid in ancient armies). Cat has basically the same thing, they're being paid in Night and she has the right to blow them up at any time with Winter.

MetruX

Well, not really the right to blow them up, it's an automatic process for when someone goes against the oaths. Still a kind of slavery, but we must have our points clear.

Morty

Well that just sounds like slavery with extra steps.

Letouriste

A man of culture, I see:)

Snowfire1224

I thought it was because she bought slaves and freed them, but it was mention that the kind of slaves she bought would have no concept of freedom.

d0m1n1c

Which is why it's different here.

"Employing" slaves that you bought and "freed" is different from capturing already free people, and giving them the choice between being harvested or taking Winter back Oaths.

I'm not sure which is worse; Cat is essentially a home invader who's home-invading for the sole purpose of stealing the homeowners.

Rup

...and justifying by saying it is an Exodus not a Conquest... as bigger home invaders aka dwarves are coming

Dresden 67

Um, Akua was called a slaver because she owned slaves. Remember the Stygian slave-soldiers William freed?

Walter

Right, right, the 'prisoners with jobs'.

Vortex

In all fairness, few slavers grant their slaves the option to opt out of the contract, or empower their slaves with aspects of winter.

Vortex

I also want to point out that since the alternative to following Cat is being genocided by a massive dwarven army, there is an element of capturing an endangered species for their own good in Cat's agenda. At least the Drow following her have a chance at survival up on the surface.

Truthhut

Sometimes you just want to throw dispensable bodies at a problem until it goes away

Skaddix

I guess but didn't the Dwarves force the Goblins to the surface? So there is a high probability when the Drow know they are losing they just leave the Underground and go to the Surface. And considering the powers the Mighty have seems like they be able to carve out a Kingdom on the surface by themselves.

Forrest

Other than the fact that when they talked with the dwarves, the talk was of genocide and that the ones that got to survive were the ones Cat took with her.

Walter

I don't think it is fair to call the choice to die of thirst 'opting out', but I guess technically it is there.

MagnaMalusLupus

"There is always a choice."

"You mean I could choose certain death?"

"A choice nevertheless, or perhaps an alternative. You see I believe in freedom. Not many people do, although they will of course protest otherwise. And no practical definition of freedom would be complete without the freedom to take the consequences. Indeed, it is the freedom upon which all the others are based.

-Terry Pratchett,

Walter

That's, uh, certainly a hot take. From that perspective I guess it IS all the victims' fault. They did after all, freely choose to be chumps who need water to live. Only right that they suffer the consequences of this dreadful decision.

Oshi

No they chose to be chumps who can't look outside and notice thier house is burning and the person offering them a way out doesn't want to die the second you get out at your hands.

Dominic

I'm going to go with... enslaving the drow in this way is the only way to ensure that crazed, bloodthirsty killers who live only to obtain power don't get free rein to do whatever they like, while also not allowing the more innocent (albeit still totally amoral) lesser drow to be slaughtered helplessly by the dwarves.

Or if it isn't the only way, the other way is killing all the strong drow – I suspect they much prefer this way of doing things.

Euodiachloris

And, they won't accept cultural reconditioning any other way.

It's very hard to say that the Drow have the full capacity to choose freedom right now – they've been hollowed out and enslaved to the Night drug for how long, now? You can't reason with junkies about how they'd be better off without the drugs until they realise by feeling it that they've hit bottom.

Cat is handing them a way to hit bottom without becoming genocided into the bargain. It ain't pretty. It ain't moral. And, the ethics are shaky beyond belief. But, it might be workable.

And, at the end of this, some Drow may survive to become a form of Drow capable of dealing with wider social groups without being totally ended in the process. 😊 Who knows, they might recover some of what they were before Night came, but if not... They've been unwittingly enslaved before. Indentured servitude looks almost good by comparison to how they got wrecked the last time. 😞

Forrest

Yeah, a lot of comments seem to be assuming they are 'free' now, when what I'm seeing here is not freedom remotely. They are in an eternal murder ring that even has a super group that comes by and kills anyone that looks remotely interesting. They are enslaved to the power brought by murder due to this Sve Noc wrecking what was once an actual society and is now just everlasting violence with a slight emphasis on group mentality.

The Drow seem like they're living in the world of Fallout compared to everyone else's Cyrodil. Maybe a silly comparison, but still.

Akuabestgurl

That just sounds like slavery with extra steps...

Xinci

Eh, shes barely using them to their starter potential at the moment. I would probably go with it being due to Cat not yet thinking of them as "hers" in full.

Truthhut

I have to be honest, one of the reasons I would go villain is for the minions. Heroes never get minions.

RoflCat

They get the comic relief, which have insanely high survival rate against traps.

Minions? Dead. Every. Single. Time.

MetruX

So what? As long as your minions are not the people you care about, that's par for the course. Like, you can't consider Hakram a minion, even though he's 100% loyal and willing to take on basically any order.

Euodiachloris

... If Bard is included in "comic relief", then reasons to go Villian increase.

The Wandering Bard gets all sides more dead. <_<

Raved Thrad

Unless you're the Bumbling Wizard (or was it Conjurer?), in which case, minion or sidekick or no, you get killed in your first major encounter. 😊

Rup

...not if you are "Despicable Me" 😊

Dainpdf

Heroes can have Redshirts, though. And plucky sidekicks!

Wry Warudo

Traitorous at the start and Irritant at the end? This has to be one of the greatest chapters ever

Valkyria

Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successfull and Dread Emperor Traitorous are just my favourite two Dread Emperors, hands down.

Dainpdf

The coming extinction of that class of Dread Emperors almost makes one agree with Akua that the New Order needs to go, NOW.

SpeckofStardust

Laws named after dread emperors are just the best laws in 'The Axiom Appendix'

---

Well, yes, they're the only laws in 'The Axiom Appendix'.

eh

So, is Catherine's League of Extraordinary Gentledrow a thing? Should we make it a thing?

GreatDerpression

Can't just be drows mate, we still need loli's in man sized mecha's, dwarves, gnomes that subscribe to the art explosions. Loli grannies, streakers, and one being who shall not be named whom encompasses all that can be considered 'love'.

Forgotten One

Beifeng is that you?

Antoninjohn

Winter was shown have the moon as a major part of it in Cat's Winter dream but her nature was that of Moonless Nights, that is probably very significant

Dainpdf

Maybe Cat just needs someone to moon her. I bet Robber would volunteer for the job.

RanVor

I'm sure he wouldn't mind becoming a lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser lesser footrest.

darkening

Y'know, before champion killed captain I could see people maybe voting for her since she was pretty funny in what we saw of her, but with black being such a great character and the backlash from the whole skinning thing, I doubt she'll get more than a handful of people that dislike black.

Andrew Mitchell

Can't wait to see how this coming battle plays out. Those shadow-striders are totally hardcore.

So, 40K troops with a lot more to come. These will be significant numbers back on the surface. And no one (except the bard and the dead king, maybe) is expecting them. And Cat can just March them back through Arcadia wherever she likes.

Javvies

Dead King, yes. Kind of. He probably didn't know about the numbers she's managing to get, by which I mean her success rate in converting drow to her minions. I mean, she's already up to 40k and she's nowhere near done – and it's worth noting that Cat's likely taking a relatively direct route, and probably isn't going to get to a lot of drow cities before getting to the Sve of Night. I'd like to think that Cat is being more successful than he thought she would be.

I don't think Bard anticipated Cat going to the drow, far less Cat being as successful as she has been. But by now, Bard probably suspects something is up with Cat being MIA for as long as she has been. And it's not like Cat has many options to disappear to. So Bard probably suspects drow is over of the options, and knows that Cat is having at least enough success to be worthwhile.

Dainpdf

One assumes the Dead King has a way of observing the surrounding underground. At least considering how hostile to him the dwarves seem to be.

sengachi

Yeah if the Dead King doesn't have scrying capabilities at *least* on par with Masego's Observatory (replicated a dozen times for redundancy and staffed by thousands of specially bred mages) I will eat my hat.

frolamiz

Don't forget what The Dead King said to The Wandering Bard:

""Were you watching?" he teased.

A little jest, just between the two of them. She was always watching."

She may not have seen her going for the Drows before, but now that she has struck a bargain with the Dwarves and started to recruit an army of Drows, I doubt she is unaware of it. After all, she get to see the script.

Javvies

Yeah, Archer, eating the corpses of drow is not a good idea. Even the doe think it's a bad idea, which is saying something.

200 top tier Mighty in the Longstriders.

That's going to be a lot of Night.

Wait, what if Cat manages to flip some of them to her side. She can offer hunting Named and mages and so on, maybe even Elves, as bait.

Cat, never stop murdering people with the box instead of thinking inside (or outside) it.

GreatDerpression

What box? There was a box? I simply thought that Cat left the box behind because the corners weren't sharp enough to properly convey the right amount of 'incentive' that she required. So she decided to just bludgeon her enemies to death with reality itself.

Javvies

In one of the chapter opening quotes, somebody, Juniper maybe, says something to the effect that Cat doesn't so much think outside the box as pick it up and beat people to death with it.

Ah, found it. Book 1: Chapter 27: Callow's Plan:

"What Foundling does isn't think thinking outside the box so much as stealing the box and hitting her opponents with it until they stop moving."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of tge Red Moon Clan

Nivek

Did Traitorous really pretend to be “redeemed” by the power of an Angelic Choir just so that he could betray them?
I honestly couldn't help laughing at the addendum for Traitorous' law.

Byzantine

Somehow I suspect it was even more convoluted. This is Traitorous we are talking about.

sengachi

Yeah that sounds like him.

Agent J

No, no, no. This was a two-parter. The mention of the choir is an addendum. It was added in later to clarify the earlier law.

What happened is that Traitorous was redeemed by the heroes to suddenly and shockingly betray them at a moment most inopportune. And so, to prevent future heroes from making the same mistake, Traitorous' Law was written.

Then, he was redeemed again, under the brilliant gaze of the angels of some choir or another. Only to then, suddenly and shockingly betray even the Heavens themselves. And so, an addendum had to be written beneath Traitorous' Law.

The take away here is that somehow, people continuously find themselves trusting a man known as Traitorous and are both surprised and shocked when he betrays them. Even the Heavens, apparently.

MetruX

I mean, the title usually comes after the emperor's death, at the time he should be known by name, like Malicia. Also, he wouldn't be worthy of the name if he couldn't convince people again and again that he is trustable XD

RanVor

What? No. Malicia is a reigning name, the same as Traitorous. Her real name is Alaya. Afaik, reigning names are chosen by the Emperors when they claim the Tower. He was really known as Traitorous all along.

Naeddyr

The treason was inside your heart all along.

Mental Mouse

"Malicia" or "Traitorous" are regal names, chosen by the ruler themselves. Descriptors like "The Oddly Successful" or "The Erroneous" are epithets, chosen by the people they left behind to write the histories. For Praesi, an epithet of "Traitorous" would be pretty much redundant.

RanVor

Why are you explaining my point to me?

Mental Mouse

Expanding on your point, replying to the comment you had replied to. I suspect I'm still getting the hang of reply-etiquette at this forum, I've been blasting through the Guide over the last three weeks or so.

RanVor

Welcome, then.

Dainpdf

I mean, he apparently took pseudonyms for a bunch of those betrayals, so the non-Choir time may have been a little less blatant.

Oh, and I think that he may have done it more than once, for it to have become an axiom...

By the way, angelic redemption didn't stick on Cat either. What's that say about her?

Agent J

Cat wasn't redeemed, she rejected the notion entirely. So it's less that angelic redemption didn't stick and more that it failed outright.

Dainpdf

Didn't work on Traitorous either. Difference is he pretended it did. In any case, the axiom says it doesn't work on people who have nothing redeemable about them. Still wondering what it says about Cat that it didn't work on her.

RanVor

The real difference is that Cat had to actively fight off the influence of the Hashmallim, while Traitorous probably didn't even bat an eye.

coloursofdespair

"Irritant's Law: inevitable doom is a finite resource, and becomes mere doom when split between multiple heroic bands. Nemeses should never simultaneously engage a single villain."
– Extract from 'The Axiom Appendix', multiple contributors

Smoloney

Wait does that law imply that traitorous betrayed a choir because that's fantastic if so

Euodiachloris

Well, Cat swindled then mugged one, so... We know Choirs are fallible. 😊

OutspanFoster

You know how Irritanr became a shoe maker? Do you think Nihilis, the Tanner, got a boot made from him?

Antony444

Good to see the Drow have at least an anti-cannibalism stance... though we don't know if they have the same opinion concerning humans, goblins and orcs. I mean, there must be a reason they're calling them 'cattle'...

A new big battle is in preparation, and it looks like it's going to be betrayal, lies, violence and plenty of big Night powers unleashed...Catherine has now 40 000 drow and eleven Noble-titled Mighty to her sides...and unless my count is off, she has not been two months in the Everdark, so what she has is just the beginning...

I want to have a look at the Grey Pilgrim's face when he will be informed the Black Queen is back with the hordes of psychotic killers in tow...

So far the Peerage is consisting of the Mighty Ivah, Soln, Slaus, Sagas, Losle, Zarkan, Nodoi, Vasył, Kanya, Lovre and Vadimyr.

Ivah is the Lord of Silent Steps.

Soln is the Lord of Shallow Graves, like in the songs.

Vadimyr (female) is the Lord of Fading Echoes.

Chaoes and cataclysm are coming...

Yotz

Since cannibalism is explicitly "the act of one individual of a species consuming all or part of another individual of the same species as food", any non-drow is a fair play for a drow.

Recognition or non-recognition of attempts to broaden the definition of cannibalism in regards to other thinking species is a question of deep philosophy and ethics.

There are some more practical reasons behind the taboo on consumption of flesh of your species – which can easily be broadened to your, closely related, or even simply reasonably similar from biology standpoint.

Like, say, prions.

Which were original reason behind this taboo anyway.

Novice

So apparently heroes tried to redeem someone named Traitorous and failed. Twice. And on the second time used a Choir. That's mah boi.

Sylwoos

Knowing the guy, Traitorous probably tricked the heroes into trying to redeem him with a Choir.

Just because.

Dainpdf

Cue catchphrase:

"My dear friends, I have a confession to make. Some creative reframing of the truth may have taken place during the planning of this redemption."

GreatDerpression

Prior to an ultimate showdown of Good Vs. Evil, a rope ladder falls down from what now appears to be a Floating Fortress of Evil and DOOM that was previously disguised as a thundercloud. "My dear friends, it is with a heavy heart that I must inform you that I must now take my leave from this Band of Cohorts. Also I must sorrowfully regret to inform you that someone may have potentially 'borrowed' the Scrolls of Sealing required to banish evil from these lands. And said someone may or may not have exchanged them in order to acquire the capital to build and maintain a cloud shaped mobile fortress. Maybe... Probably... Assuredly. Most Assuredly."

Dainpdf

"I assure you that I, and my conveniently cloud-shaped flying fortress, will spare no measure in hunting down this thief. Meanwhile, feel free to await my return."

Screwfloss

"but in many ways my apprenticeship felt only half-finished."

Foreshadowing?

Metrux

It's a common trope for a master to impart a last secret/teaching before dying, so why not?

Raved Thrad

...except that in Black's case I'd expect him to be a bastard about it in ways only he can.

"Now, Catherine, mind me well: the secret of the Black Knight's Final Attack is that there is no final attack."

Setrak

That is actually really good advice for a villain. Because your Ultimate Attack™ is guaranteed to either fail, only work nice, or worse, backfire. If you constantly have The Black Knights Secret Attack in your back pocket and let people know about it you can use every other attack you have because only that attack gets autocounteted.

sengachi

"The secret of the Black Knight's Final Attack is to lie and tell everyone it exists so that your opponents keep their best counter in reserve the whole fight without ever using it. Well. Really the secret is to keep it a secret that's carefully calibrated to only be available to the heroes because they valiantly redeem your Treacherous But Not Morally Repugnant Lieutenant #3 with three acts left to the climax so it's not obvious you're baiting the heroes, but those are the kinds of details for Adjutant and Scribe to handle. Your part in all of this is to just not have a final attack."

Iconochasm

"Is this the part where you impart your Final Technique which I don't fully understand until the most dramatic possible moment?"

"Well, I'm not going to *now*."

Snowfire1224

Which him not telling her would probably keep him from dying storywise, because as soon as he imparts that secret he is going to die.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Heh. 69.

Yotz

Which act henceforth would be known as “peerage” among the scholars of the matter.

Aston W

I feel this Sve Noc was the same as Cat once.

Then her domain expanded etc and she’ll become Summer or Winter.

Still a training exercise by the Dead King. Thanks EE.

Aotrs Commander

I just love the implication from Traitorous here.

He was clearly just THAT good at his job.

I bet he could fool Pilgrim, even.

Yotz

“Ha – and this is where you are mistaken, for the Pilgrim was me all along!”

SMHF

For some reason I keep imagining there is this one dwarf in the invading army, that has a real personal gripe with the Drow and been waiting for this expedition his entire life. And every time the dwarven army reaches an enemy fortification he runs forward, kicks in the door and goes...

“Hello, my name is Inigo Montoya. You killed my- OH COME ON!!!!!!”

Zaver SaintCloud

If there is ever a 1-shot of anecdotes or other history, I would absolutely love to see ‘The Life & Times of Dread Emperor Irritant’.

Dainpdf

I’d take Traitorous. He’s just the best.

sengachi

No no, we need a story of that time Warlock the Unfathomably Stupid brought back both of their undead shades for a teamup mission.

Dainpdf

So... Is it just me that has considered Cat has a whole freaking lake to take not just water, but fish from? Sure, she can't spare the manpower to feed her entire army with fishing, but she can at least extend her supplies' life by feeding the army with fish. Also, they could have stored the giant carcasses of the lake monsters in the Winter icebox for eating later. I had assumed she'd done that, TBH.

Yotz

Fishing for them in Arcadia would probably be quite dangerous thanks to the local clowns, and gating them – fishes, not clowns – in with a daily doze drinking water may give erratic results; to that, we know too little about relative farm and fishery outputs and nutrient consumption of the average Drow to make projections about time.

Good point on carcasses – though, this bunch of supplies are currently in the hard to traverse open contested terrain, and any foraging team would act as proverbial sitting ducks waiting for a counterstrike from opforce.

Dainpdf

Cat and her subordinates are protected from Fae persecution by her boon, so fishing and not-too-long-term storage of food should be okay. The Wild Hunt isn't likely to frag Cat's people at random either, since their last discipline session... And if they do Cat can put them in line without much trouble.

Jane

...So, if she can barely feed her army now, what's she going to do once she takes them out of the Underdark? I mean, Callow has a bit of a food crisis of its own at the moment, no?

Is she going to immediately strike at an enemy city to seize their food stores, or something?

Oshi

You're assuming she doesn't just march them into a region of enemy territory like say a place with Black in it.

Barrendur

Many posters here are making excuses for Catherine's lack of ethics. I shan't, because there's no need: Cat's been making excuses **for herself** for most of the story.

Yotz

Justification matters to the just.

Yotz

Well, since despite all the doom premonitions, foundation-laying, and being quite in good in general this chapter is a bit slow on action...

Yeah, this will do nicely

Bruno Benaković

I'm just waiting for the moment Catherine realizes she can rip others abilities if they're under her cloak. If she could take Akua's knowledge of language, why not the abilities of the drow she titled and put under her cloak. She would get the powerup she needs for future battles without taking the night for herself. It would imply, since night and winter seem similar, that it's possible to convert one to another.

Actually, this leads me to another theory I have that I think was mentioned already. Calernia is not the first wager of Fate to exist, rather it's the second with Arcadia being the first. But over billions of years, the patterns in Arcadia became so strong that their entire existence basically became predetermined. Night and Winter and Evil and Villain and Treachery all became one concept that fought an eternal battle against Day, Summer, Good, Hero, Nobility. Like smaller rivers that dug into the earth these concepts surged and merged into two huge rivers that went into opposite directions. It would explain why the very concept of Night in Calernia is attracted to Winter, as if it's its mother. And Catherine has already broken the stalemate by merging Winter and Summer in marriage in Arcadia. That same marriage should be achieved in Liesse Accords in the same way, thus ending the wager of Fate in truce.

Redyls

Please write a book on irritant and tratorus. I'd defiantly read that

burguulkodar

There's nothing to be so defiant for, my good fellow! Simply read it.

Anony

"Traitorous's Law: while redemption is the greatest victory one can achieve over a villain, to function it does require the villain to have at least a single redeemable quality.

Addendum: Yes, even if a Choir is involved."

– Extract from 'The Axiom Appendix', multiple contributors

...

.....

.....

.....

...

You wouldn't....

...

Would you?

Naeddyr

Sidenote, is it just me, or does the Longstride Cabal sound like a drow version of the Wild Hunt?

The Hunt that Cat happens to be the ruler of at the moment?

Andrew Mitchell

In a way, I agree. But Longstride also seem a LOT more badass than the Wild Hunt.

werafdsaew

So why did Cat decide to start handing out fae titles? Her fear of some sort of response from heaven is still valid.

burguulkodar

So, Cat unconsciously proves here that the Tower's way is very effective, AS LONG as they are oath-enlaved into not doing lots of things she doesn't find acceptable.

I wonder why other Dread Emperors didn't try that before. Probably magical oaths are insufficient, and fae ones can't be broken as easily. That would cut it.

I still kinda wonder if the dwarves could TRULY bring down this whole drow society, even if they are not as powerful and strong as they once were. It would take maybe hundreds of years, if not thousands.

Cat definitely should have asked for a higher price. What she is trying to do here in this timescale is... ahem... **almost** inevitably doomed to fail. But then, plot armour

---

Chapter 70: The Calm Before

"Own what you are, no matter how ugly the face of it. No lies are ever more dangerous to a villain than those they tell themselves."

– Dread Emperor Benevolent

"So this is going to be the big one, I hear," Indrani said.

It would have been inaccurate to call... this a habit. It didn't happen regularly enough for that, given the demands on our time. But once in a while, when the silent clamour of a thousand duties and foes became too much, I found there was a fire in a nook tucked away from my army and that Archer was waiting there, feet propped up and bottle in hand. Ironic in a way, that a woman who'd been raised in a place called Refuge had become so apt at providing the same. Like all of Indrani's kindnesses, the seemingly careless granting of them belied the keen perception behind their nature. I tended to think of Akua as the most skilled manipulator among us, capable of spinning exquisite lies at the merest prompt, but some days I wondered. Diabolist was known to get her way, by hook or crook, but I'd had different lessons from her. The most useful talent is that which no one knows you have, Black had once told me. Archer drank like a fish, was largely led by her whims and professed indifference as to much of what went on around her. The very last person, in a way, that you'd expect to nudge events the way she wanted them.

I forced the thought away. Suspicion, once entertained, was like a drop of ink in water. No matter how thinned, it would always cloud the brew. I did not have so many friends left that I could afford to start ascribing them hidden motives. The colder part of me noted that willing blindness led to dark surprises and that the duties of queenship demanded vigilance regardless of costs to myself, but for once I turned deaf ear to it. Trust had seen me through the storms so far, and though it had brought me some disappointments it had brought me wonders as well. In this, at least, I will indulge sentiment, I thought.

"The Battle of Great Strycht," I agreed. "It will decide the campaign, if not the outcome of our entire stroll through the Everdark."

"Sve Noc, huh," Indrani mused. "She's allowed us our fun so far, but that won't last. It's one thing to throw a rabid hound scraps when there's a bear coming, another when the hound takes a hand."

"We've observed the rules of her game," I said. "What we wield, we took."

"And that'll matter why? This entire place reeks of Below, Cat," she said, and raised a hand when I began to object. "I'm not talking about dusty shrines or red-slick altars. Not even about prayer, really. It's the way this place was made. Kill and rise, kill and fall: every single drow spends their time either clawing for power or slowly dying."

I studied her in the flickering light of the flames, the shadow cast by the twisted rock around us dancing across her face. Halfway between tattoos and feathers, I thought.

"You're saying it doesn't matter if they pray," I frowned. "They pay the dues regardless."

"I'm saying this entire place is a prayer," Indrani quietly said. "And we both know whose it is."

The Priestess of Night. Sve Noc. We'd not crossed paths since that last probing look at each other, but I knew she was everywhere down here. In every custom, every ritual. Maybe even every drow.

"That sounds," I murmured, "like a recipe for apotheosis."

It wasn't the first time I'd considered that, truth be told. After crossing the Gloom and realizing the Everdark was a kingdom turned towards itself, ever only sending dregs to the surface, I'd wondered as to the purpose of that. An entire civilization whose foundations had been ripped away and replaced with codified murder and infighting – what sane person would want that? It might have made sense if the entire purpose was to cultivate demigods and send them out. I'd not forgotten my fight with Mighty Urulan, how what could only be considered a second-stringer by drow standards had batted me around and come close to killing me more than once. Me. I could, without too much arrogance, claim that among the Named of Calernia's surface I ranked in the ten most dangerous. If the likes of Urulan had been sent to rampage across Procer or Callow, it would have been bloody mayhem. If a cohort of Mighty that powerful had gone? Half the heroes on the continent would have needed to mobilize to end them, and there'd be casualties. I could not deny that Sve Noc's orchard of killers had grown some particularly murderous peaches. But they'd never been used, had they?

Night could be grown from harvesting other peoples, but when had real raiding parties last troubled Calernia? Long enough ago the Everdark was just a footnote in the histories of nations, either a pointed lesson in the dangers of following Below or the subject of casual contempt from more 'successful' villains. Which was madness, because if I'd led the army I currently commanded against Diabolist at Second Liesse we would have ripped her to shreds. Hells, unless the Lone Swordsman had a very good story at his back Urulan would have torn through the poor fucker in an hour's work and gone for a drink afterwards. But Sve Noc had never sent her apostles out of her realm, and there had to be a reason for that. At first I'd wondered if it was as simple as where the Everdark was. Surrounded on three sides by the Golden Bloom, the Chain of Hunger and the Kingdom of the Dead. The rattlings were arguably the weakest of those powers, but even Triumphant at her peak hadn't managed to exterminate them wholesale. And if there's one thing out there I'd bet on against Mighty, it would be Horned Lords, I thought. Had the Gloom and the Night been raised as a moat and garrison?

The issue with that was the dwarves. It didn't take a genius to guess that effectively surrendering the entire underground to a rival and highly expansionist power before wrecking your own capacity to wage war except through Name-imitations would have long term consequences. Sve Noc, assuming she really was behind all of this, had to have known the moment she put out the Gloom and Night the hourglass was flipped. The Kingdom Under would keep growing, keep expanding, and eventually they'd find a way through. At that point, well, it was only a matter of time until the drow were done. Even if they were beaten back the first time, the dwarves would keep coming with better methods and larger armies every time. Even just putting all the nisi they encountered to the sword would allow the dwarves to send their enemies into a downwards spiral while they swallowed their own losses with a shrug. Evidently Sve Noc's game had worked for a few centuries, but she'd had to know it was a delaying measure and not a solution.

But it'd make sense, wouldn't it? If the Gloom had been exactly that, a delay, and the Night was the actual solution. Centuries of willing sacrifice, swelling the invisible altar as the Priestess of Night remained cloistered in her temple and shaped her own ascension. It was one thing to fight a Named, but a god? Neshamah had called himself that, and he had broken enough crusades the claim couldn't be summarily dismissed. If I was right, if Archer was right, then there was only one question left to ask. Was she ready? Had the dwarves come too early, while she was still gathering her might? Or was this entire invasion a trap, the prelude to her ascension? There was no way to know, and I was not too proud to admit that scared me.

"We have no stories, down here," I finally sighed. "I am not used to missing that."

"I'm not so sure," Indrani said. "We've had our share of coincidences, haven't we?"

I cocked an eyebrow at her in silent invitation. Archer glanced at my now-empty cup and I willingly offered it for filling. Drow liquor, this, called senna. Made from some sort of giant mushrooms and used to induce lucid dreaming when drunk in small quantities before sleep. It kicked like a mule and taste kind of like mud, but we were running out of surface booze so this was no time to get picky. The good stuff we'd want for celebration, assuming we live through this. I grimaced after knocking back half my cup. This was going to take some getting used to.

"Right, so coincidences," she said. "We ran into Ivah pretty early. Good guide, former bigwig from an inner ring sigil, full of information. That's one."

I almost objected that we'd come fairly close to killing it during our introductory skirmish, but held my tongue. Almost was the domain of coincidence, I wouldn't deny that.

"Then we snuck through between the dwarven vanguard and the main army," Indrani continued. "If we'd been ahead of the vanguard, we would have run into entrenched drow before we had their measure. If we'd trailed behind the army, there would have been no one to take. That's two."

In the first instance we also wouldn't have had the spectre of dwarven invasion to hold up as a banner when bringing in Mighty, which would have massively complicated the process. Much as I disliked what I was hearing, she had a point.

"And then when we run into the vanguard," she said. "Which happens to be run by Named dwarf who can strike a deal with you in his people's name. Three."

"For all we know that's common practice in dwarven armies," I pointed out.

She clucked her tongue.

"Fine, I'll withdraw that one," she conceded. "And replace it by 'we came into the Everdark specifically when the Kingdom Under was invading'."

I winced. Yeah, that was a little harder to argue about.

"We can get lucky too," I said.

"Sure we can," Indrani said. "Once. Twice gets suspicious. Three times is a nudge."

"We wouldn't even be down here if we'd had alternatives," I said. "Hasenbach wasn't willing to deal, Keter got turned on us and the fae would have been... costly. More than we can afford."

"Good timing, isn't it?" Archer mildly said. "Stripped from all palatable options save for the Everdark, then thrown here when shit comes to a head."

"No, I get what you're implying," I said. "We got nudged into this. I disagree because there were just too many moving parts, but even assuming you're right I don't see is what Below gains from this. If Sve Noc's getting her god on, we're the fly in the ointment. They lose a discount Dead King to what, improve my military situation? And you know where I want to settle the drow long-term, Indrani, it'd fuck up a good thing for them."

"You're still thinking with your crown, sweetcheeks," Indrani said. "Lady Ranger used to limit how many her pupils could follow her on a hunt, did you know? Not because more of us would have been a problem, most of the time we were pretty decorative."

"She made it a prize," I frowned.

"And so we fought for it," she agreed. "Kept us sharp, because there was a lot to gain from trailing her on those and nobody wanted to be left behind. Hells, Cat, you got your start in pit fights didn't you? You should be able to feel when the audience is placing bets."

I would deny her, but I still remembered the days before I'd become the Squire in full. When, even with Black's accolade, I'd still been a claimant. We'd fought for a Name bound to Below, and Below had only wanted one person left standing when the dust settled. The similarities were there.

"They still lose out," I said. "She could get her apotheosis and I could get desperate upstairs without allies. That'd be a win in their books."

"Would it?" Indrani mused. "How long has she been at this play, Cat? Long enough even the dwarves ran out of other shit to conquer. That doesn't sound like victory on the horizon to me, it sounds like somewhere somehow she fucked up. And you, well, when's the last time you had a good kneel in front of the altar?"

"Black didn't pray," I said.

"Black toppled a hero-led kingdom and spent decades smothering heroic cribs," Indrani said. "You, on the other hand? You meddle with the methods, but you're also making deals with heroes and trying alliances with crusaders. You're not exactly flag-bearer for the Hellgods."

"And this gets me under the banner?" I replied, skeptical.

She shrugged.

"Look, I'm not going to weep for the Everdark," she said. "It's a fucking mess of murder and slavery and if you'd decided to drown the damned place instead I would have clapped your back and called it a good day's work."

Archer paused.

"But we're crossing some lines, here," she said. "This shit with the oaths? It's the kind of thing the old madmen would have tried if they had the right tools. It's a little to the north of slavery, I'll give you that, but it's in the same kingdom and we're not exactly intending to make exceptions. They're all going upstairs, aren't they? Kids'n all. There's going to be a lot of dead people for you to get an army, and a lot more when you actually use it."

"The alternative is the dwarves slaughtering them wholesale," I flatly replied.

"Sure," Indrani said. "But that's not why we're doing it, is it? We came for an army and we're doing what it takes to get one. I've got no issue with that, Cat, don't get me wrong."

She leaned forward, eyes alight with the reflection of fire.

"But let's not pretend we're not sending dues downstairs, by doing our do," she softly said. "That's the kind of lie that ends up costly down the line when someone calls you out on it."

I winced and polished off the rest of my glass before extending my hand for a refill. She obliged without a word.

"I tried to make it fair," I said. "But there had to be a punishment to breaking the terms, or they would never have followed them. I tried..."

The smile that split my lips was rather bitter.

"To make it a good thing," I finished. "To set down rules that would make them better until they were on their own. But I'm using old arguments, aren't I? The same every Proceran and Praesi who stole a chunk of Callow used. I'm civilizing the savages."

Indrani gently nudged me with her elbow.

"They're pretty fucking savage, no two ways around it," she said. "But let's keep this in mind, before we start using that trick elsewhere. I'd get over it, but I'm guessing you're going to be chewing over this for a while."

"What does it matter if I mourn it, when I do it anyway?" I muttered.

I might not be bosom friends with Cordelia Hasenbach, but she was right about that much. It meant nothing to weep at what I did if I kept on doing it. You can stop, or you can own it, I thought. Anything else is hypocrisy. But the thought of the drow loose on the surface, without rules to bind them? No, there was no brooking that. And so monster it is, I grimaced. I drank again, the foul brew spectacularly failing to grow on me. I extended my arm across Indrani's lap for a top-off.

"So it's a pit fight," I sighed.

"Where there is coincidence, there is story," Archer said. "Now, we know what happens if you come out on top."

Veins of Winter spreading into darkness, an entire kingdom oathbound.

"What happens if the ol' girl does, though?" she mused. "That's the part worth worrying about."

"Dog eat dog," I murmured. "That's how Below works. If my belly's full, I can shake the world. But if she's the one who devours?"

I'd threaded Winter in Night and forced rules through it. It had come easy as breathing to me, even if the oaths themselves had required thought. Because I was the last of a court unmade, the Sovereign of Moonless Nights. I was that court, practically speaking. It's wasn't impossible to throw around the kind of workings I'd seen fae royalty employ, it just wasn't possible without going fucking crazy. For now, anyway. How long before my Peerage grew enough the alienation no longer mattered? But there was a sea of power, somewhere in me, and if Sve Noc got her hands on that? No, apotheosis would not be an issue.

"She'll make a play in Strycht," I finally said. "If it's my pivot, it's also hers."

Archer toasted to that, grinning.

"Lies and violence," she offered.

"I'm not knocking to that," I sneered.

"If you do, I have a gift," Indrani tempted.

"Is it booze?" I asked. "Is booze the gift?"

"No," she proudly announced.

"Then it's you," I said. "I'm not falling for that."

"Please," she snorted. "I'd ruin you for all others. Besides, I actually went and picked out something for you."

"Stole," I corrected. "You stole something you are now pawning off on me before you're caught."

"Well, Vivi's not around," Indrani mused. "So someone's got to pick up the slack."

I narrowed my eyes at her, reluctantly curious.

"To absent friends," I said, meeting her toast.

She pouted but we drank on it. She went ruffling through her cloak afterwards, setting down her cup. It was a cozy little nook she'd found, barely large enough for two people, and so she'd set down a thick blanket in an incline and we'd both settled there close to the fire. It was comfortable, and the combined warmth of a friend and a camp fire was oddly soothing. I eyed her curiously as she kept going through her cloak, leathers pulling close on her frame. They were tight, though sadly not all that revealing. Good armour tended to be that way.

"There," she exclaimed, and produced a bit of stone before pressing it into my palm.

No, not just stone I realized. It was a sculpture, though not a very elaborate one. I was admittedly not great connoisseur of the arts, but even to me the work seemed rather bare. Skilfully done, though, I conceded. The androgynous face of a long-haired drow occupied one side of it, the hair growing into the locks of the identical face on the other side. The eyes seemed little more than notches at first glance, but I could barely make out the contours of a character in Crepuscular in them. For one side it was 'all', for the other 'night'. The bottom of the little sculpture had clearly been pried off by blade, I noted with mild amusement.

"... thank you?" I tried.

"Dunno if you noticed, but the deeper into the Everdark we go the more often it comes up," Indrani said. "I asked Soln and apparently it represents Sve Noc."

My brow rose. A two-faced goddess, huh? The term was considered an insult in both Praes and Callow. In my homeland for the implied accusation of hypocrisy, in the Wasteland for the implied single layer of deception. Probably not down here, though.

"What are you up to, I wonder?" I murmured, looking at the stone face.

"And I was going to say we've come so far," Indrani said. "But there you are, talking at stone."

"We were already hunting demigods when you joined up," I replied.

"Sure, but back then we were dealing with everybody's messes," she said. "Now we're everybody's mess."

"Truly, you are the great philosopher of our age," I drily said.

She flipped me the finger.

"I do wonder what the rest are up to," she admitted.

"We're not doing that," I said.

She eyed me with surprise.

"Night before the battle starts, going all reminiscing about the old days and what they might be doing?" I elaborated. "For shame, 'Drani. You should know better."

Archer went very quiet, all of a sudden, and her face was unreadable.

"I sometimes forget," she said, "that you don't realize it."

By brow creased.

"Realize what?"

"That no one thinks like that, Catherine," she said. "At least not all the time, like you do."

"Black does," I said.

"And he is an irredeemable madman," Indrani murmured. "To think like you do, it takes... something. Stepping out of yourself, of who you are, and making a story of it. Like all the world is a stage. How strange it must be, to always act like there is an audience. I can hardly imagine the weight of it."

My fingers clenched in my lap.

"You were something else long before the fae made a title of it, weren't you?" she said. "Mad to the bone."

"I don't-" I tried, but what could I say to that?

What could anyone?

"It's all right, Cat," Indrani said, and patted my hand. "We've always known. Sometimes I just forget."

Slowly, my fingers unclenched. She scuttled back and rested her head on my shoulder. It would have been easier for me, given I was the one a foot and a beard short of being a dwarf, but I didn't protest. I leaned back against her, chin atop her head.

"It's how we survive," I finally said. "By watching out for it."

"I know," Indrani said. "But it's all right, you know? To leave it at the door once in a while. Just for a few hours."

"I'm not sure," I quietly admitted, "that I remember how to do that anymore."

There was a long pause and she raised her head, eyes meeting mine. It was slow. I could have leaned away and it would have been the end of it. We'd go back to drinking, and not speak of it again.

I did not lean away.

Her lips moved against mine and it was nothing like the kiss in Lotow. No awkward clicking of teeth, no surprise. Only the taste of liquor and smoke and hands so warm, claiming the nape of my neck as she slipped into my lap and dipped me back. My fingers slid under the edge of her leathers, cupping her arse, and if this was all an illusion it was one I was willing to believe. I came to myself flushed and hard of breathing, my hands pinned above my head as she pressed a kiss against the crook of my neck. Smirking, I could feel it against my skin. It was an effort of will to speak.

“‘Drani,” I said, lips bruised. “Masego. I don’t-”

Want to ruin something good, I thought, just because I want this.

She leaned back, hazelnut eyes considering.

“That is that,” she said. “This is this.”

Deft fingers unmade my belt and I guilty leaned into her touch.

“Just for tonight,” she assured me.

“Just for tonight,” I murmured, and gave in.

---

DroughtBringer

Guys! We have hit over 1000 on top web fiction! Currently we're at 1,212 which is amazing! Thank you guys for all of your votes, and keep your votes up!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Raven

Our name is legion, for we are many

NerfGlastigUaine

647 votes till we beat Ward in yearly. We will make it happen for the Gods Below deserve the top of EVERY metric

erraticerrata

Character contest continues, Aisha vs Ratface. Link to vote below.

<https://www.strawpoll.me/16826350?fbclid=IwAR0Zd-WBtLLzJTQAHIGskEw24B4Ff4Me4UEs18EI98d3JQk5RigM-6Hw4Zw>

TeK

Ratface scores a technical lose due to unaccessability.

naturalnuke

I miss the Bastard Lord 😞

Someguy

I miss him too. With his planning and Vivienne's Aspects linked with Cat's Cates by Zeze, they could have re-mapped the surface of Calernea and swam in nigh-endless wealth.

ClickPause

We will pay tribute to the dead.

RanVor

Frankly, I didn't expect it to be that one-sided.

stevenneiman

Yeah, I'd figured that if anything the Bastard Lord would be slightly in the lead. I guess that in this kind of contest, being in the same order of magnitude might be as close as it tends to get. I don't think we've had any closer than about 30/70, even for ones I expected to be tight races.

I think it's because politics has some built-in catch up mechanics because a victorious party has the best chance to disgrace itself, but here it's just people selected for a degree of similarity (because we all like PGTE enough to read this far and vote in the popularity contest) deciding who they like best. No real catch-up mechanics or second chances.

letouriste

there was a close race before. i forgot which one...nauk maybe?

Javvies

Heh.

Villain versus Villain in the Everdark.

Sve has the experience and plenty of power, but hasn't done squat with it in centuries – for so long that the drow are basically just a footnote in Calernia.

Presaging Cat versus Malicia?

Actually, I think they might be wrong when they think that the Accords are a loss for Below. Sure, they're imposing limits, but they're limits decided upon by the mortals with the power to impose and enforce those limits. I.e., those with the power are making a decision (free will) to enforce limits on everybody who is unable to prevent them from doing so. In a way, the Accords could be a kind of ultimate victory for Below. Showing that the people don't need to have Above telling them what to do.

Someguy

Or the Accords could be the prelude of a 2nd screwup for the Gods Above & Below. Arcadia an unending cycle that went nowhere resulting in failure, Creation shutting out both their influences once Cat implements the Accords worldwide (instead of continental that she's currently aiming for).

Skaddix

I doubt these over go worldwide since I believe our dear writer has said we don't leave the continent in this story. Not to mention Arcadia is infinite and not the same everywhere ergo Cat's mantle of Winter might very well be meaningless outside of this continent.

MetruX

Winter could be meaningless, but the story is the same in Arcadia, only in different mantles. no matter where. Also, there exist different infinities.

goliath1303

It was stated by Masego at one point that in another continent Arcadia would be unrecognizable in comparison to what we've seen and be unaffected by what happened to "our" Arcadia.

Javvies

Except Below doesn't actually do much of anything to influence those on its side – Below let's those who follow its philosophy do whatever they want.

It's Above that actively and regularly exerts influence on Creation.

Creation locking out Above and Below would serve as proof of Below's philosophy, thus being a Win for Below.

stevenneiman

The Accords are, as far as I understand it, a victory for Below and not a tie. Assuming we're all right in assuming that the Accords are an effort to get Gods out of mortal affairs, that means a power vacuum which ambitious mortals can fill. The Gods Below claim that the fate of humanity should be decided by people with the ambition and the wherewithal to shape it, while Above claims that its influence is necessary for humanity to function. This is reflected in their intervention styles and their Named. Good interferes whenever it can find a suitable pretext, and sets that interference up as a goal for heroes to attain. Their champions are people handpicked by the Heavens because they can do the job, and given the Name the Heavens think best suits them. Evil rarely interferes, and does so only as a counter to the most blatant of cheating by the Gods Above or as a reward given to a mortal who has earned it. The champions of the Gods Below are people who are ambitious enough to reach for a Name and capable enough to defend their claim against anyone else who wants it.

Javvies

They're kind of a Victory for Below that looks like a reasonable compromise/settlement/tie, if not something of a Win for Above, for the average person who doesn't realize the actual dispute is not actually between what normal people think of as good and evil, but between "do what we tell you to do" and "do whatever you want to do if you can deal with the consequences/ have some free will".

Which means that the non-Hero Crusaders, and maybe even some of the Heroes, are probably mostly going to like the Accords, and have serious questions for anyone who would rather stab it out.

At least, if my impression of what's in the Accords is reasonably accurate.

Rup

...thank you for summing it up nicely:

between "do what we tell you to do" and "do whatever you want to do if you can deal with the consequences"

Cpt. Obvious

Necro post... I know...

I'd argue that "and deal with the consequences" would fit better than "if you can deal with the consequences"

After all the Gods below doesn't care if you can or can't deal with the consequences. Either you succeed or you fail, either you gain or you lose. The capable will rise and be stronger for it.

They are Darwinists.

Dainpdf

Can sort of see that. We suspect Winter was the draft of Evil, and Winter always wins through diplomacy followed by scheming and treachery.

adam1

Actually, I no longer think that Summer/Winter was meant to shadow Good/Evil.

I think the Fae were meant to balance out the Elves. The Elves are a force for Good, as has been mentioned. I think both sides of the Arcadia fight represent Evil striving against itself. The Elves/Fae weren't in direct conflict, but they represented different pulls on mortal forces. Even Summer Fae were a trainwreck for the regular world.

Dainpdf

Well, that hypothesis was put forward by Malicia and Warlock. I think they know what they're talking about. Plus, Fae are not of Creation. Kind of makes sense they don't do much good to it.

Andrei

To me the Accords seem just as brutal for Above as they do for Below. Below gets a hardcap on the amount of madness they can unleashe but the faith of their followers doesn't really get tested. When you think back to Cats first meeting with the Pilgrim he said that Above's help isn't always requested, so what happens when the hero gets a divine intervention that is against the Accords? Either he uses it in which case Above breaks the deal and gives more narrative weight to Below or the hero discards said help and everyone looses just a bit of faith. In my opinion its a harder deal for Above who are used to last-second bullshittery than it is for Below who just need to lower the madness cap from "Willing to kill 80%" to "Willing to kill 50%"

RanVor

I think that if the Accords will end up succesfully implemented, the narrative definition of a hero will change. Instead of the ones going after Evil, they will become the ones going after those who break the Accords.

Of course it will take some time, but I can see it happening eventually.

Rup

..willing to kill 50%..??
Sounds like Thanos 😞

Jane

I don't particularly want to be suspicious of Indrani, but something about this is sending up a little chime of alarm.

Eh, I'm probably just reading too much into things. And am being a bit too jumpy because things have been going too well for Cat again.

Decius

Don't be suspicious. But she is going to die now.

Jane

But how could a character actually be considerate and thoughtful for someone they love???

Clearly, this must be the prelude to some shocking betrayal instead!

Fern

Hah, I wish it were that simple honestly. Maybe it is, though? After all, Cat and Black had their small father/daughter moment and he managed to make it thru Liesse just fine. Hell, if you wanted to narrow it down to romantic relationships, Killian is still alive and kicking up in Callow somewhere.

We aint bury no damn gays around here SON

Still, you can't blame Cat for being careful. Having control over the story is how she's eked out all her important wins so far, she's just trying to make sure there isn't a relationship based pivot that'll fuck her day up.

RanVor

But a pair of gays just died three chapters ago...

Andrew Mitchell

Well said.

SpacyRicochet

Yup... giant death flag, right there.

Dammit, Indrani! Why did you go all sentimental on us the night before the big battle!

usernamesbco

I'm suspicious af, but not of Indrani. After that fireside conversation I'm seeing waving flags, burning flares, and blinking runway lights spelling out "THIS IS A TRAP" in story narrative.

This entire Everdark debacle has been as bad as Black's decision to invade Procer.

taovkool

Well, the self reflections part was nice. Dues to Below doesn't really mesh with Cat's Callowan sensibilities isn't it? And hypocrisies are just so fun to mess around in.

But we all know what the real big news here are, there goes that ship!

Unless it's a 'friends with benefits' kind of arrangements. In which case, awesome.

caoimhinh

It's probably going to be the friends with benefits kind of deal, at least until they go back to the surface and reunite with Masego.

Those two had been oogling each other for a looooong time, so now they are scratching their itch. ( ^ ° 3 ^ ° )

Dainpdf

I just wonder how huge the Sve Noc's dying curse will be with this large an accumulated service.

taovkool

What dying curse are you talking about? Did it get mentioned somewhere previously

IDKWhoitis

Villians dont get resurrections, at best, they get to curse their killer with their dying breath.

(Paraphased)Mentioned by Black Book 2, used by Cat to kill Lone Swordsman at end of Book 2.

Dainpdf

I think Cat refers to learning about it from Black, back in First Llesse, but I couldn't find the quotation.

I know he says "We get to cackle on the way down the cliff, or maybe curse our killer with our last breath." in 36 – Madman.

We also get to see it happen in the Hanno interlude, when his mother curses people while killing herself, and in the latest Warlock interlude, where he gets a large payout in the form of divine intervention.

Dainpdf

Oh, also Triumphant used it to destroy a good part of the army that killed her, bringing the Tower down on their heads.

Javvies

Depends. While, sure, the Night and the drow are effectively paying dues to Below for the Sve, they're all firmly on the side of Below anyways.

Sve hasn't (so far as we know) done anything with respects to opposing Above/the Plans of Above. At least, not recently.

Also, it depends on who Sve aims at/what Sve asks for with their death curse.

Going after a victorious Cat might be met with rather less favor than Warlock's blowing up the Ashuran fleet to save his son from the Crusaders. Cat, after all, is definitely more likely to punch Above in the balls again – and otherwise be an actively involved part of the Game/Contest between Above and Below. Sve had tried to pull a Dead King and not be involved, but did so poorly/incompletely.

Plus, Cat's got a respectable and recent kill count of Heroes and Above's Crusaders, and is going to need to kill more, is going to be bringing the drow back into play.

Assuming at the dwarves is likely to be more effective

Dainpdf

True. I don't think the Sve Noc would be able to get Cat decimated like Warlock did to the Ashuran fleet, but she still might hit her with something fierce.

I was actually thinking whether the Priestess would have more or less favor than the Warlock, and I honestly don't know. I guess we get to find out.

What I do know is I expect something as well established as villains' dying curses to pay off again and again.

Nairne .01

The two faced goddess is such an obvious hint at what might happen (though I may be inclined to believe that because I've read the Claymore manga).

Euodiachloris

Yet, I suspect that she is also a candidate for being the baby that the Wandering Bard suggested to the Dead King would need eating, since she's a nascent candidate for apotheosis who seems to have stalled in the crib.

Having said that, Cat is also a squalling brat when it comes to this... The older monsters have deliberately pitted the babies against each other. So, part of me kind of hopes the two get together to bash the pair in the face, toddler-style. 🤪

Dainpdf

Eh... That seems like a stretch to me. Especially since Neshamah seems to have some sort of interest in cultivating other demigods (probably in hopes that they'll tilt the balance between him and the Bard in his favor).

Morgenstern

The "baby" is obviously Procer that both sides want to destroy... the heroes angling for more belief in Above and more heroes cropping up instead of corrupt worldly lords, of course, Bard and Dead King angling for quite different things.

Jonnnney

I'd say the Above is angling towards a nation led by heroes rather than one that produces more heroes. Honestly looking at the 12-14 heroes with the army drowned by the Arcadian lake and the 9 or so heroes with the army drowned by the mountainous lake there is no lack of heroes popping up in procer, but the nation or even most the principalities aren't guided by the servants of above. That's what Above wants, the ability to control or "guide" a nation to serve a greater good.

Thea

But Cat, Akua and Sve Noc make for 3 claimants for 2 faces...

Dainpdf

Fusion? That may have happened if Cat had taken Night for herself. As it is, I doubt it will happen. As an aside, I have also read Claymore! That was great, wasn't it?

adam1

I think at the end of the fight Cat will need to absorb the Night into Winter to keep it around at all. If the Night fails utterly, then all of her Mighty might lose their power.

I also think Sve Noc stalled in apotheosis because she didn't absorb an extra-planar power. The Dead King is linked to a Hell, Cat is linked to Winter, and it looks like Sve Noc tried to create a power source with the Night, and it isn't complete enough to fully function as her source of immortality so she has been trying to grow it. Every Drow is born with some Night, and Night can be harvested from other species, so the Night gets more powerful over time, but it isn't ready yet.

Dainpdf

Is every drow born with some Night? I don't recall that anywhere. The Night just allows you to gain Night by killing others, and take theirs if they had any.

adam1

It is mentioned in chapter 63 that drow die at the age of 60 if they don't harvest more night than they are born with.

Dainpdf

True. I guess it passes from mother to child. Quite the dangerous contaminant.

nipi

I doubt Masego minds. Probably feels a bit relieved that someone that isn't him will be taking care of that itch of Archers.

Morgenstern

Second that. Unless there were some fear of losing Indrani to the person who can give her everything she wants and not just part of it involved. Seeing how the emotional scales weigh out, I don't think that's gonna be a problem, though. There just isn't enough of anything lovey dovey emotionally between Cat and 'Drani, especially from Archer's side, as was made abundantly clear when they had their talk about Masego.

Jonnnney

I'm definitely seeing the makings of a polyamorous relationship between Catherine, Indrani, and Masego with different kinds of real love and affection between them. I've had friends that have achieved something similar platonic life mate primary with occasional or long term sexual secondaries.

maresther23

Your significant other doesn't need to be the person you have sex with. Masego is asexual, Cat isn't. This way Indrani and Masego can do the whole in love thing and both Cat and Indrani get sex. The three of them love each other enough for it to work.

Morgenstern

I'd pose it a bit differently: They love each other in two different ways enough that it works. Aka Masego need not fear to lose Indrani's love to Cat and Indrani does not need to fear what havoc jealousy could wreak. Because it's just "friendship (with benefits)" for Cat and Indrani, nothing more. That's what truly makes it work. Same kind of lovey dovey might work, too, in general, of course – but that's just not how it plays out here.

Metalshop

This whole Everdark chapter has been fantastic, but what I'm really appreciating the most are these little glimpses of Catherine from the outside. Indrani's way of looking at her, the way things are limping along in Callow as a result of her absence, Malicia pondering her disappearance from atop a tower, Masego's bitter philosophical arguments about her with his father; it's all hammering in the point that Cat is significant on a continental scale. Combined with Cat's musings as she starts coming to terms and this is some tip top stuff.

Nairne .01

I agree. She rose so much they have to consider her moves. She is not the local villain that's supposed to get slain by an upstart hero candidate anymore.

*OutspanFoster*

As soon as Indrani started reminiscing I was screaming "Staaaaahp!"

Then Cat said it for me

sengachi

Oh wow, that line from Indrani about the toll such narrative vigilance must take was hard-hitting.

I'm also coming to love Indrani as a character more and more. She's really something.

Rup

"narrative vigilance"...nicely put

eh

"For one side it was 'all', for the other 'night'."

'All Night'

Plus Ultra?

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Live in fear,
'cause I am here.

---

"Splendid, have you ever heard these words? Go Below! PLUS...
ULTRA!"

Antoninjohn

Another Apotheosis for Cat to go through, Cat in the talk with Maogo about Winter Winter was shown to be a type of cloak and we all know that Cat's story about her cloak is that she adds the banner of her fallen foes into it. On the good news, well at least she's getting laid

Dainpdf

More like another step in her apotheosis. She's not quite there yet – Neshamah mentioned he gave her the most basic of inklings.

Nairne .01

I mean, the "Two"-faced goddess.
Sovereign of Moonless "Nights"....

Do I need to add more hints?

lennymaster

No, I think a melding of the two would have happened if Cat had taken Night for herself, instead of creating the peerage as a buffer. now I think Sve gets consumed as just one more aspect of Winter.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Well said. That is the way this path looks.

JJR

"My brow rose. A two-faced goddess, huh? The term was considered an insult in both Praes and Callow. In my homeland for the implied accusation of hypocrisy, in the Wasteland for the implied single layer of deception. Probably not down here, though."

"How many levels of deception are you on my dude?"

"Like 2 or 3?"

"You are like baby, watch this." removes mask "behold it was I Dread Emperor Traitorous the whole time."

Dainpdf

Traitorous is on  $n+1$  levels of deception, where  $n$  is the most levels anyone else thinks he is.

FactualInsanity

I need someone to draw Traitorous, so I can 'shop his image on top of that one "It was me, Dio!" screengrab from JoJo.

Or better yet, whoever is drawing Traitorous can just draw him like in that grab.

JJR

I think you're underestimating Traitorous' ability to deceive with that "else".

To borrow from Horry Patter.

How many levels of deception can Traitorous have at a time?

At least one more than he knows about, of course.

Dainpdf

Did you not read the chapter quote? A villain should not lie to himself. Being the foremost expert on deception, Traitorous would, of course, never deceive himself.

Or that's what Traitorous would want himself to think!

sengachi

You know, it wouldn't surprise me if Traitorous sold his soul at some point (to multiple parties even) *just* so that when he died he could 'betray' all of the people who bought a piece by coming back to life and cheating them of their due. That seems like the kind of bullshit Traitorous could pull off.

Javvies

Nah. Below doesn't do resurrections, just necromantic reanimations as variations on undead. Traitorous was good, but I don't think that even he could have finagled his way into an Above-empowered resurrection.

However, I think it's quite possible that Traitorous sold quantities of his soul in excess of how much soul he actually had. That is, he sold more than 100% of his soul (probably more like full order of magnitude or more of sales in excess of his actual soul) .

And so nobody managed to get any of his soul. And/or he arranged to obtain other people's souls and use them instead – after all, what is more quintessentially Dread Emperor Traitorous than making cultists sell their souls to bring down Dread Emperor Traitorous but actually using those souls to pay off sales of his own soul?

Morgenstern

*ahem

I quote from just the very last chapter before this one:

"Traitorous's Law: while redemption is the greatest victory one can achieve over a villain, to function it does require the villain to have at least a single redeemable quality.

Addendum: Yes, even if a Choir is involved."

– Extract from 'The Axiom Appendix', multiple contributors

Morgenstern

If a Choir was involved for a redemption play, why not resurrection? It's what Choirs do, after all, and the obviously DID finagle a Choir one way or another... Just sayin. 😊

Morgenstern

the = he -.-

Javvies

Because you don't resurrect Redeemed Villains, you either keep them alive in the first place to atone in life or let them cement their Redemption with a Heroic Sacrifice, and you don't get resurrected after a Heroic Sacrifice.

Rup

sold his soul at some point (to multiple parties even)
...dunno why...reminded me of jack sparrow

Novice

"A two-faced goddess, huh? The term was considered an insult in both Praes and Callow. In my homeland for the implied accusation of hypocrisy, in the Wasteland for the implied single layer of deception."

I genuinely laughed at this. Oh, Praes.

caoimhinh

Ok, I can only say this:

( ͡° ͜ʖ ͡° )

onedollargum

Just for... All Night. ;D

Skaddix

I don't get it...Cat is like reminiscing before a major Battle is bad luck but having sex before the last battle is okay? I mean I guess...

Nguyen Hong Hai

Yo it is NNN EE, stop corrupting your reader.
Also the blue ovaries Archer got through... Finally!

Dainpdf

Well, Cat is correctly reading this as Action instead of Horror. Genre Savvy pays.

Someguy

The sex before battle ensure that both of them will live, more drama fodder for the Zeze/Indrani/Cat triangle since the gods are obviously soap opera addicts.

Snowfire1224

Don't forget Cat's crush on Vivienne and Akua's constant flirting with Cat.

It seems the only person in the Woe who is not in anyway romantically interested in another member of the Woe is Hankram.

Nairne .01

He is the secret ingredient to that dish...

Metrux

Yet we all know he's a flirt go sleeps around, so... As much as Hakram doesn't go with the dish, he's a pretty well known side dish :V

Jonnnney

He is the slut of the group

Zarquon

Not gonna lie, I expected this to happen on Chapter 69.

caoimhinh

Chapter 68 shouldn't exist, then we would get this scene in Chapter 69 :v

But seriously, that chapter felt like filler for me because that conversation between Akua and Cat talking about Lakes and about how Akua wanted to kill her mother could have happened within any other chapter easily, instead of using a whole chapter for that.

Now the sex chapter between Cat and Indrani is not chapter 69, that was the Evil Plan of ErraticErrata T_T

Faiir

I nominate you for the best comment of the chapter award!

JackBeThimble

It will, with how long most arcs are going we can expect the act itself to stretch out over at least 2.5 chapters.

Cthulhu

Ok. I've held back but I'm now going to offer my wild eyed speculation

I think Sve Noc is Dread Empress Triumphant (May she never return).

The timeline is about right. The story structure is about right. The perversion of the ubderdark is about right.

Jonnnney

It is a fun theory, I don't see triumphant laying low for centuries. I mean she conquered the continent in a decade she doesn't seem to be the patient type. It would explain why the dead king didn't have any drow named, but then again he didn't have any dwarves either

Dainpdf

Wow.

Love the quote in the beginning, plus the whole inner reflection bit. Contrasts so well with the temptation provided by both Akua – and by Archer herself, interestingly enough – to just believe that pragmatism justifies evil. A callback to “justifications matter only to the just”, if only in spirit.

Also very interesting, the whole thing with the pit fight and Sve Noc. Iron sharpens iron, you keep what you kill... The Gods Below really like ascendancy through slaughter.

I wonder, however: how large is the Sve Noc's dying curse going to be? On one hand, she's basically erected a giant altar to the Gods Below. On the other, she's been passive and achieving much nothings. How much cred does she have?

Have also been thinking about the “too many moving parts” thing. Cat doesn't know exactly how outclassed she was back in Keter, or how the Dead King didn't *really* plan for her to win. Also hasn't thought much about how the Keter thing (with her being desperate) is directly related to the dwarves invading, taking advantage of the Dead King marching.

Finally: noooooooooo! My battered, mostly sunk Cat X Vivienne ship! Come baaaaaaack!

Dammit EE. Why do you do this to me?

caoimhinh

Something that I wonder is this:

Is Sve Noc actually in charge of the Drow right now?

What was discussed now pointed out to the scenario questioned by Cat a few chapters ago, “Why hadn't the Everdark reduced themselves to just a dozen of demigods holding all the Night to themselves?” and Cat and Indrani now theorize that's what Sve Noc tried to do, spreading her domain, the Night, among the populace and then they would make it grow and she could harvest them all when the time was right and by absorbing back all the Night she would reach Apotheosis.

BUT, remember Cat's conversation with Sve Noc? What Cat saw when she peered into the Night wasn't the Sve Noc sitting in a throne or praying in an altar; what she saw was “A colossal silhouette, limbs outstretched and shivering in pain” so maybe Sve Noc is prisoner of the top Drow now?

Yotz

There is an option of her being hooked up on a parasite feedback. Like Peregrine was forced to relive every moment of suffering of people he killed with Angel's Kiss Fever – hey, forced meme – so is Sve Noc forced to relive every death caused in the name of Night, for she is it. She remembers every dying whisper, every desperate murmur; she remembers death of every victim with acute precision; she remembers... And so she can't go further, for it will be her undoing, nor she able to stop the flow of power, spider trapped in a web of her own making

Which leads to curious option of Gloom being not the moat and walls, but rather cage – with initial plan being goading all the Drow into sacrificing themselves to the Night to initiate the Apotheosis, with point of failure being Sve unable to drive them all to suicide. They managed to establish some resemblance of stable social structure even under the pressure of Tenets, with side effect of her being unable to do anything until the apotheosis would either be completed or fails entirely.

There's also a possibility of Sve and Noc being two very different people...

Euodiachloris

If Sve and Noc are the two sides of Night and therefore the two faces of it... both girls missed a trick. The moon might wax and wane, but it also has a completely black phase that allow the cold stars and aurora to really show off.

They're... kind of missing a face. *glances in Cat's direction* 🙄

Hellspirit

Interesting

MetruX

I have to disagree with the thrww of you, Sve Noc has no need for the death of all Drows. She is the Night, in the sense that it's her domain, it's part of her, even if others make use of it, at any moment she can call upon anything that is in the Night, so the plan was simply for the Night to grow while she "prays" to Below.

The most interesting part, though, is the thing of villains dying breath... Not all villains get that. Especially when villains get offed by other villains, like when Wekesa killed the Warlock of the time, or when a Dread Emperor is toppled by another villain, they don't get curses, probably because the cursed dying breath is a purely anti-Above thing. Sure, I could be wrong, but this seems to be the most accurate with all we've seen.

Yotz

My notion of hecatomb of the Drow springs from the idea of the apotheosis through concentration of power. While the plan to grow the Night through growing of the Drow is sound, in the core of the Tenets – as little as we were shown of them – is the principle inherently self-destructing for a society. I posit that without bonding influence of the Cabals ryllehs would grind themselves into the extinction long ago.

Now, what that would mean for the Night? It would be concentrated in few nearly-omnipotent beings, remnants of Drow race, forming a new Pantheon for the new All-Highest, Goddess of the Night. Ultimately, they will be dissolved in the Domain of Sve, or sacrificed for the glory of the Night to serve as a spark, jump-starting true Apotheosis.

In essence, what Sve seems to practice the method opposite to the Neshamah's preferred. He builds his own parish to become a physical god, she tries to become a concept. While he wouldn't need such drastic measures as extinction-level hecatombs to sustain himself as a deity – so far as we know, that is – he is also nearly powerless outside of his small pocket universe. Would Sve actually succeed in her hypothetical plan, she will be a concept of Creation itself, for She is the Night, and the Night would be She. Eternal, powerful, free from intervention of Above or Below beyond already woven in the Weave of Creation. And only thing she ought to do, is to sacrifice her race. To the last of them. Pittance in the face of Eternity.

...

Come to think of it, I now have a sneaking suspicion, that Cat's wonder into the Underdark was caused not only by obvious reasons and crypto-obvious DK, but also by certain chronic alcoholic. Who once sicced two Kings, Eternal and Dead, on each other to give them both a valuable lesson – quod licet Iovi, non licet bovi, specifically.

mavant

I see what you did there, claims medic.

Yotz

/)

Dainpdf

That sounds unlikely to me. A Domain seems to be something deeply personal, that one owns. The idea that someone (especially someone with no powers outside the Night they possess) could wield the Night against the Sve Noc is a bit like the idea that someone could wield Winter against Cat. I rather suspect that something went wrong with some form of metamorphosis that she was attempting and now she has a deformed body that causes her constant pain.

caoimhinh

But it's still possible to bind her using sorcery, and powerful 'demigod-level' beings are susceptible to the bindings of High Arcana.

I don't think they used Night against the Sve Noc, but if she thinned her domain so much by spreading it in the whole Drow population, then she would be left vulnerable to a treason and the use of sorcery to trap her and use her as a source of power.

Many comments have been talking about any villain being capable of using Below to give a curse to their enemies with their last breath, which I find unlikely but ok, let's consider this: what if the current state of the Everdark, after Sve Noc was betrayed and bound, is her 'dying curse' out of spite towards those that took her gift and condemned her to eternal suffering?

Dainpdf

Cat is vulnerable to High Arcana because she's not got just a Domain, she's got Fae in her, and Fae in general are vulnerable to bindings.

As for the Sve Noc being vulnerable, the issue is that, in the end, all the Night belongs to her. I wouldn't find it odd if she could rip it out of someone, or use it to control them (or at least nudge their perceptions or actions).

Plus, the Night is the basis of most if not all power in the Everdark. What else would these drow use against her?

Lastly, I find it unlikely that this is a dying curse, because one, it has affected the entire drow population for centuries, which is a lot. Two, the Sve Noc is capable of communicating, and therefore alive in some capacity. Not that this has stopped, say, Cat before, but it's still a point against especially if the effect is still going. Third, it seems pretty certain that this is the Sve Noc's domain, and it would be very odd if her domain is fulfilling some dying curse while she's still alive. Instead of, you know, helping her.

caoimhinh

Fae are not the only beings that are vulnerable to bindings. Demons, and Angels too, even the Dead King, seeing as he even needs an invitation and a contract to cross into Creation. The higher power a being has within themselves the more they are bound by rules, the ultimate example being the Gods, who can't step directly into Creation.

Also, don't forget that we have barely seen the outskirts of Drow society, the weakest of the Everdark, and if Sve Noc was betrayed and bound, then that happened centuries ago, we do not know what kind of powers and sorceries the Drow had in the pinnacle of their civilization, before their empire collapsed. My hypothesis was Sve Noc being vulnerable right after spreading her Domain into the Drow population, thus thinning it and weakening herself, think of it as a mage being weakened right after performing a big ritual, there's a window of opportunity there.

We do not know exactly in what state she is, she could be dead and her soul bound to Tvarigu, or she could be in the center of a ritual site that spread her Domain and if she leaves it she dies.

Dainpdf

Except we know she talked to Cat in chapter 54, and she seemed pretty okay with the whole Tenets business. We also know from that chapter that she is Named.

We do not know that the Dead King needs an invitation to come into Creation. It may be that what he needs is to not be the center of any story where he takes the offensive, so he does not **want** to come out without invitation.

As for the Gods, it's also not that they can't come in, it's that they don't because that would spoil their game.

Finally, we know that the Sve Noc(or those she converted) killed the Twilight Sages, those who would have been the greater powers of Drow civilization.

After that, everyone of consequence has Night in them and so can't really go against her.

Morgenstern

What about she IS "all Night", the giant silhouette being the NIGHT = her spread out over all the "Gloom", all the Drows, in constant pain because of the constant dying and suffering everywhere? Like, she tried to claim them all, but instead she spread herself out over them all and it's just not working.

Dainpdf

Could be. Doesn't mesh too well with the way she speaks in ch. 54, though.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Yes. Save Noc being trapped in the system would explain why she failed to harvest them all or focus and wield them all

superkeaton

eh, not particularly fond of this pairing.
it feels too "Generation Xerox", the apprentice of the Black Knight and the apprentice of the Ranger, snogging? Predictable. I do like someone else pointing out that Cat's constant thinking of things in terms of stories and their outcomes is just a little insane, even if it's a practical sort of madness.

caoimhinh

Well, they had it coming for a long time, Archer's constant innuendos and insinuations to Cat, and Catherine constant leering of Indrani, now put those 2 people with sexual tension between them and desires into a series of long months of battles underground, and this is what happens. I doubt they will be a couple, and they said this would be a one night stand (though knowing those two, it's probably a lie, and IRL you can't trust promises made when one is horny anyways), casual sex is likely to happen at least until they go back to the surface.

caoimhinh

Also, Catherine was taught that learning stories and thinking in their terms and outcomes was key to understanding how Fate worked and was vital in Black's victories, and it's also what has kept her alive through many things, so she's not really insane, it's no longer madness when it's how reality works.

Nairne .01

I think insanity is the term society applies to people who don't follow it's rules.

Hellspirit

That would be criminal ^^

But seriously, I'd rather say that "insane" are what people call those who follow rules the people can not understand.

luminiousblu

I'm more interested in the fact that at this point, Cat's "bi"sexuality is an informed attribute.

Skaddix

I mean Wesaka made her horny. But the Warlock is suppose to be super hot (2nd only to Malicia so far) so saying it takes a Super Hot guy to get Cat horny for guys definitely makes her more Lesbian then Hetero on the scale.

MetruX

Bi, hetero, lesbian... As Skaddix said, it's a scale, not a trait, and not even a fixed scale (although it won't ever swing full to the other side, or even too far away). Yes, she seems to have more relations with girls, so she probably likes more girls, though her first was also a boy, and she did wonder before how it would be with Hakram, even if she herself doesn't feel that attracted to him. It's probably more because most of the males around her are not to be touched or not of her liking, while the woman are more of free types ripe for the taking.

luminiousblu

He's super hot in an informed way, to be fair. Sort of like how we're constantly told that Ratface was (;_;) incredibly hot with a body like a Greek statue and a dick five times as large, but it was never really shown.

Skaddix

Well it is lit it will always be informed

Snowfire1224

I think she mentioned way earlier in the story that when she was still in Laure she had dated a few guys. I think she mention one to Killian when she had asked Cat if she had ever been with someone. Hasn't really been brought since.

Darkening

To be fair, the men she spends time with are either, not human, significantly older than her, or Masego, so she's not exactly swimming in options. She's expressed attraction to both ratface and warlock, and claims to have lost her virginity to a fisherman's son, so while yes, she hasn't had any romantic entanglements with men in the course of the story, it seems to be more due to a lack of available options than a lack of interest.

Insanenoodlyguy

She has expressed attraction to both Masegos parents, and once mentioned that if creation wanted her to be a virgin it shouldn't have made the local sailor boys so hot, so there's that.

Akuabestgurl

The wheel turns, history repeats itself and the grooves are carved deeper.

It's be weirder if they didn't bang

RanVor

To be honest, I didn't even remember that Archer used to be Hye's pupil before you mentioned it. She's grown so much her apprenticeship under Ranger has become a mere footnote in her characterization.

superkeaton

That might say more about Ranger's lack of relevance to the story than anything else. Though I seriously suspect that the Pilgrim and his friends might be using Black as bait to draw Hye out and kill her once and for all, so she may become relevant soon.

RanVor

You might be right, but it applies to Catherine as well, although to a much lesser degree; I don't really see her as Black's apprentice anymore.

As for Pilgrim's plan, I think his target might actually be Cat, not Ranger. He has reasons to expect her to come to his rescue – freeing a captured friend is a heroic story after all; it fits her modus operandi perfectly. I think he's counting on exploiting her bond with Amadeus to kill two birds with one stone.

Snowfire1224

I had a thought earlier today, about Cat and the story in general.

It started with the comment Archer made a while back about how the Woe are wild animals that she basically let in and tamed (although not completely).

You can say she did the same thing with the Wild Hunt, imposing rules on them, same with what she is doing with the Drow now.

There is also, something I recently remembered from early in the story, about how her name felt like a living breathing animal. With how Cat mastered namelore and had to deal with weakening due to a redemption arc one could say she had to tame her name as well, learning how to use it and how ignore it when it lead toward classic villainy.

This also fits with her ultimate goal of the Liesse Accords as they are intended to tame the battles between heroes and villains so that the common people are not harmed.

IDKWhoitis

So Cat breaks Stories and Chains, and fits them with nice Leather collars instead?

I like this line of thought for what Cat does, and I don't really see any counterpoints.

caoimhinh

Yeah, Cat is the breaker of patterns and reshaper of stories, even a maker of them to some extent. She is carrying Black's legacy of not taming Evil, but directing it, putting order and pragmatism to the chaotic madness that was going nowhere due to blind ambition.

Now they actually hold a real chance to an everlasting victory.

IDKWhoitis

Personally I see it more of a change of game more than an end to the game. The Calamities and Woe have transitioned this a game of checkers to one of chess. Parallels can be drawn with Medieval Age politics transitioning from religion and personal feuds to the modern struggle of power between nation states.

The game could technically be seen as "ending", only for a new one to begin immediately afterwards.

Nafram

An interesting conversation between Cat and Indrani. I must confess that the question of what purpose did Sve Noc have for the Everdark never crossed my mind

Nairne .01

It is a good question.

I wonder, did Sve Noc start before the Dead King and was overtaken (as in a race for apotheosis and power / due to below) or did she try to imitate the Dead King or did she not know of the Dead King at the start?

werafdsaew

Sve Noc is likely after Dead King. Remember in one of the Keter shards, when the Intercessor was talking to Neshamah, she referred to the Twilight Sages as contemporary.

Evgeny Permyakov

Well. Finally.
Someone called Cat mad.

Dresden 67

All Named are mad.

Metrux

Seconded. It's part of what makes them Named, especially villains, though Heroes are still definitely mad.

Jahfan

Lmao. Only in Praes would calling someone two-faced be analogous to calling them a basic bitch.

JackBeThimble

The narrative arc of Creation is long. But it bends towards femslash.

lqueenofblades1

RIP Cat. You are now ruined for all others. You fool! Did you not see that this was Indrani's evil plan all along?!

Also, Masego and Cat fighting over Archer would be bad. I really hope they figure stuff out.

HannaB

Considering Masego is aro ace, I doubt it would even occur to him that there's something to fight over. As long as Indrani is at his side every time he turns to look, that's all that matters. And Cat would do anything to make sure that lasts, even if her own arrangement with Indrani sticks around. This could become a very nice and stable poly angle very easily.

Skaddix

I mean he is highly disinterested in sex but Malicia can still impact him you think if he had zero interest whatsoever Malicia abilities would have nothing to prey on.

Euodiachloris

Strangely enough, that's not how asexuality or demisexuality works: because, you know – still got the human. An asexual can get horny. It just takes special circumstances to pull off a phase shift, it'll only be situational and it is not ever going to be their baseline state.

Malicia has spent how long refining how to muddle other people's baselines with pheromones, hormones and all sorts of shenanigans? Yeah: Zeze felt it – hadn't a clue what to do with it, mind. Typical Spade. XD

PS – Am Ace of Clubs. Or Diamonds. It can be hard to tell, and what you are can change over time as you learn more about yourself. 😊

mavant

Wait, are the suits of cards used as classifiers for different kinds of asexuality?

Euodiachloris

Yup. Although, people tend nit-pick over the Diamonds/ Clubs a bit, Hearts and Spades are pretty cut-and-dried: Hearts = romantic asexuals; Spades aromantic asexuals. Diamonds and Clubs... semi-, demi-, hemi- arguments with cheese. Generally, it is agreed that Diamond-types trump Clubs in seeing the point in romance and cuddles, but both can be situational romantic and situational sexuals – with a running jump and/or a push start involving factors they might not even be aware of. God help the gender fluid diamond/club with very occasional bi tendencies – all the between stools. 😊

IDKWhoitis

Malica captures fascination and attention, of the sexual variety yes, but it's not the only tool in her set. If anything, Malica's wards and spells (that she has been noted to be using in public appearances), may capture Masego's attention for a different reason. Like a fashion designer more interested in the materials and procedures used rather than the actual model.

Aston Whiteman

Ave Nov becomes Summer Queen.

Escapes from the Under dark, becomes a God and gives Cat a power up and an army. Yay. Thank you EE.

WuseMajor

Given how Archer has been drinking out of a flask that seems bottomless, she's taken carousing to new levels, and she tends to do that whole obfuscating stupidity thing, I am honestly rather worried that Bard has gotten to her somehow, taking over her body as she does.

WuseMajor

"Archer drank like a fish, was largely led by her whims and professed indifference as to much of what went on around her. The very last person, in a way, that you'd expect to nudge events the way she wanted them."

That could easily describe the Bard. I'm worried.

Nairne .01

Not the first nor second one to worried about that.

nipi

Or maybe below has their own "Bard" silently nudging things along.

Metrux

1. She can't be the Bard because she can fight, a problem admitted by the Bard itself.
2. The Bard is not of Above, she plays for both teams, that has been well documented.
3. It's possible that Bard has gotten to her head... But I find it incredibly unlikely. She is less disinterested and drinker since she joined the Woe, and is only now showing more of it because of the lack of Masego nearby. They both feel it, but she hides it better.

All in all, don't worry too much. Whatever is to come, will come in the story.

nipi

Not "The Bard" but perhaps an analogue to her. Although I'd say that's probably unlikely.

As for the Bard. I got the feeling that she is of Above. It's simply that she plays the long game, keeps the big picture in mind and similarly to the Pilgrim isn't afraid to employ the other side's tools.

Jonnnney

Archer and The Wandering Bard merely share a Role of the drunken comic relief party member.

NZPIEFACE

"I can hardly imagine the weight of it."

Well, gets you thinking when you realize the Below still haven't shoved another name onto her yet.

Aston Whiteman

Pretty sure the whole Under Dark was a trap for Sve Noc. Or became one. Are there any God vacancies? Maybe one Masego and Cat made.

Oh and an unlimited new realm to explore. Hmm.

Cat won't win this through Godhood. But someone else might...

Aston Whiteman

Thanks for your hard work EE. Best story ever.

Matthew

Well, Indrani going to die. She literally just walked up and planted a death flag. Which maybe she knew she was doing as Indrani's death would be a meaningful sacrifice which would entice the Gods Below.

HannaB

GODS BELOW I HOPE NOT

HannaB

...maybe we the comment section should also take Indrani's advice and lay off the meta a little 0.0

Nairne .01

This actually feels like a prelude to another selfmutilation for Cat in Warlock-like manner ("No not my son..." from last interlude.)

Byzantine

She tried to plant a flag but Cat kicked it and set it on fire.

Thankfully pre-battle sex is not a death flag in Action. (Now if this was horror...)

MetruX

I'll have to disagree, she was stopped before it could become a death flag, and the serious talk with sex in the end is more of a hero trope than villain, and one that comes usually before someone is kidnapped or otherwise needs saving, if it's done before a battle. Yet, those stories commonly end with both alive and happy together.

Aotrs Commander

I mean, like... Action movies aside, almost all of the video games romances (such as they are!), heavily fall into the "sex-before-climax" (pun unintended *headdesk*), often with a party member/companion... And, to be fair, a lot of those *cough*Bioware*cough* can have the protagonist be... Praesic Evil (that's a new word I just made up, shut up), so it's not even necessarily even just a hero thing.

Snowfire1224

Morrigan approves

nipi

Cat. Wonder what the consequences of doeling out fae titles is going to be? Above escalation? Callowan nobles demanding some of their own?

Wonder if Cat will be pruning her winter court a bit before leaving the Everdark?

*ahd*

...Callowan. Nobles. Going up to the Black Queen and *demanding* something. On pain of being balky and uncooperative.

That'll be good for a brief instant of comic relief, at least.

nipi

You are forgetting the recent death spree in Callow. She needs the nobility more than ever – there simply arent enough others that could fill administrative roles, that are even literate. Remember that talk Talbot had with Hakram – if Im not mistaken that was before Malicias assassins happened.

And I doubt the rest of Callow would be thrilled with only outsiders being empowered.

*ahd*

"Yes, I could take up a lucrative and powerful office under the crown of Callow as a human being, helping keep this country which you love so much running, but you won't turn me into an eldritch monster and enslave me with oaths to Winter in addition, so imma turn it down."

And neither a) a hilarious beating ensues, nor b) the aristocrat just to the left of this one grasps eagerly at the opportunity of office instead, nor c) the aristocrat being asked stops and thinks about what they've just asked for, then takes it *all back*.

Well, it's a theory. I don't think your theory will pan out in canon, but one of the Roles of the name of Author is to mess with the audience.

nipi

Well we already know from Malicia that it was the Dead King that last influenced their "development."

Skaddix

If Indrani dies now wow the Gods are really hating on Masego. The three people he cares about the most in quick decision and Black on the chopping block they deserve him slaughtering the Gods at that point. Brought it on themselves especially since a fight in the Underdark is purely the purview of the Gods Below.

Still i think its too early for a Woe to Die for good. Especially with only Cat around to see it.

Jonnnney

Death is unlikely, but I could see some trauma stealing away her carefree nature

Azure

Warlock kept insisting Catherine is a simalcrum and not real. She's basically creating herself using Winter and story narratives, which Indrani just pointed out to her. I wonder how much giving in to sex with her, was Catherine trying to feel a bit more like a real girl.

Not a huge fan of both of them together tbh. It's just frivolous and meaningless sex, that's basically put a death flag on Indrani's head. They're in a horror movie and the two horny teenagers just had sex. What's next they split the party and go off alone?

Morgenstern

All I see is an action movie, not a horror movie. 😊

Morgenstern

So, well, who knows? *shrugs
I guess it could be either.

Suprime

So the two faced goddess statue meant to represent the sve of not... errr anybody notice that it fits cat as well? There's cat as we all know and love her... then there's her other side Akua... and akua has taken over her body before leavening a bit of weight to the whole two faced thing...

Zaver SaintCloud

The mention of a Pivot here got me thinking; Cat doesn't really have a Name now, in the traditional sense. She has the powers sure, but went way beyond Squire when she took on the Mantle of Winter. Is Winter going to be her gimmick forever? I can't see any Named abilities, no matter how strong, even coming close to the versatility offered by Winter.

Aston W

And what about Summer?

MetruX

What if her Name is *about* Winter? We saw fae Named before, she could very well get a Name that allows her to better use her Winter powers, just like Warlock's aspects weren't what gave him power, but empowered his already existing magic. Or she can get something from "outside" to help balance and smooth out her Winter, like Masego, whose Aspects have nothing to do with his main ability, Magic, but complement it incredibly well, with miracles.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

If she defeats Sve NOC and Black finally dies she may well become the Black Knight in more ways than you might have expected.

Morgenstern

Still against the notion of Black dying at al... =/

Skaddix

I assume she gets a Name if she wins. Winter is powerful but with Cat's may self appointed limitations, it doesn't seem to make her any different then your average powerful spellcaster. Cat is a mage now she just doesn't have the formal training which is why Akua was doing way more impressive stuff while in charge. Named Abilities are pretty awesome in contrast.

TotesOlive

Archer better not die. Masego is going to need someone to bring back his sanity after he commits genocide on an entire country...

doominator10

Just a thought, when Cat comes back with a horde of Winter titled drow at her tail, how are the Wild Hunt going to interact with them? I can imagine those fae bastards liking the drow like a playfully curious but too dangerous dog does a cat.

Morgenstern

Yeah, and then the vicious cat sets the dog running by scratching its nose open to bleeding...

Vhostym

Poor Masego, he's really missing out here. Not only does he watch his father and dad die, but he misses out on an excursion that relates to yet another Apotheosis (either attempted or actual). I mean, killing Warlock and Tikoloshe was cruel, but now when Cat returns he'll learn that he also missed out on the chance to witness another miracle, this time related to his personal obsession.

caoimhinh

Not to mention he is missing the Girl to Girl action between the two most important women in his life. ( ^° 3 ^° )

And yes, I know he's got no sexual drive, but still. Besides, Indrani will teach him to appreciate such activities.

Clay

"I studied her in the flickering light of the flames, the shadow cast by the twisted rock around us dancing across her face. Halfway between tattoos and feathers, I thought."

I feel like something's going over my head.

Xinci

So some thoughts

Archer has suprised me once again in two ways 1. Being she doesnt think of her self on the stage of life

2. She is much more patient than I thought, though this helps to explain her wide interest of behaviors and checks. She is slowly but surely building up to be something better. She isnt like her master in straightforward brashness towards greatness, or perhaps some of her Masters patience was learned by her. She has always been patient given the things the wide range of subjects she has learned to understand, quite masterfully done really. After her first heart to heart in the Everdark with Cat, where she proved that her goal is Mightiness and Proof of worth rather than outright "Being". I thought of her goal as smaller than what she professed at the beginning. That she wanted to be "big". The true momentousness of that would be aligned closer to her mentors current role(She appears to be a tester of the forces of everything old and powerful on the board, a occasional checker of their situation). She is rather whole as a being due to growing patiently through all these collected experiences. Slowly growing stronger til she becomes a piece too big to ignore I suppose. I am impressed, I thought she was going through a resting phase with the Woe til she transitioned but I suppose she shall simply have a greater pivot with them.

Now onto Sve, I was wondering at the system Sve created and amazed by its potential. I now at least understand how she could have become a god properly, though unsure of how she would get her sacrifices in. Her peoples ability of the Night can allow them the portions of power,culture,skill,knowledge and inheritance of the people they take from. She could have organized specialized bands to pass on their knowledge wrapped up in a "form" and then integrated into the rest of the Drow as a Path( Similar to the current Sigils). Each path being a specific branch of configurations of the current integrated Night. As long as each form is splintered enough to be separate but still extrinsically connected to the whole(thus potentially needed a resting phase for properly disseminating the right amount of new power to each branch along with the central tenets of the Night). By doing this she could gradually make a interconnected networks of cultures. And eventually each Path of the Forms would develop Named. And all of them would be connected to Sve by the Tennets she set up. She truly could have conquered quite well after that combining different Mighty into different teams to bring in more parts of other cultures so as to make her people more whole. She would have been a goddess quite easily depending on what she took. The only things being a issue would be dues, heroic stories of things stolen and sought, and keeping the Night vitalized and connected among all those different fractured bits of power.

XML4ever

Looks like things in the Everdark are coming to a head... Thanks a lot, errata, for the chapter! I'm really looking forward to how this finishes, since I'm guessing it won't all go Catherine's way easily.

Insanenoodlyguy

Aww Cat, you should know better. You resolve sexual tension AFTER a big fight, not before! That's a death glag!

Vivid

Holy shit I was playing league, and I just noticed that ionia is a lot like callow, noxus to praes and demacia to procer.. mind=blown

---

Chapter 71: Ozone

"A ruler must consider all necessary injuries before beginning to inflict them on an enemy, for through repeated opposition they will learn your virtues and your faults. Strike once, thoroughly."

-Extract from the treatise "On Rule", author unknown (widely believed to be Prince Bastien of Arans)

Nefarious' own Dark Council had once held session in this room, though in practice it had been the Chancellor's council and not the Emperor's. Amadeus had sat at this table before, when nominally in the service of the Tower, but he much preferred the current circumstances. It was only the two of them here today, as if often was: only Tyrants losing their grip on Praes regularly called full sessions. Those who felt secure in their rule did not bother with the pretence of seeking the opinions of others.

"We can't keep this up much longer, Maddie," Alaya said. "The last time taxes ran this high for more than a few years Pernicious lost his throne."

It would have been easy to engage on the basis of technicalities, Amadeus thought. Dread Emperor Pernicious's reign had been plagued by constant rebellions for reasons broader in scope than mere tax rates: his attempt to raise a new capital replacing Ater in the heart of the Wasteland, his inability to keep a Chancellor loyal for more than a few months and his failure to take the Blessed Isle back from the Kingdom of Callow despite three sieges. Still, it would have been beneath the both of them to play that particular game. Allie would not have begun the conversation were there not a true threat looming out of sight. Not for the first time, Black wondered how many such messes might have been avoided by putting the nobility of the Wasteland to the sword after the civil war.

"I understand the burden is most keenly felt by the most influential among them," he delicately replied. "But the Reforms have produced tangible results, Allie. We're building an army truly capable of winning the wars to come."

She leaned back into her seat, and even after all these years that she allowed herself such weaknesses in front of him warmed his heart. She'd come in formal dress, today, but left behind her proper regalia. As in everything she did, there was deeper meaning to be found. Formal attire for matters of state, lack of crown to make it clear this was a discussion between partners.

"I know that," Alaya said. "You know that. But in court, they can speak of the fortune being sunk into the Legions of Terror without conquest to show for it. The Truebloods are pushing for either immediate war or dismissal of the military taxes."

"That would be disastrous," Amadeus bluntly said.

"The amount of professional soldiers we're fielding is nearly without precedent in Imperial history," she mildly pointed out.

"It's not about winning the battles, Allie," he sighed. "Our core legions under Grem would have been capable of evicting the paladins from the Blessed Isle as early as two years ago. It's the aftermath that's the issue."

"I understand you have worries about heroes," Alaya frowned. "And I don't agree in the slightest with the time table suggested by the High Lords. Yet I do have to wonder if your level of caution is actually warranted."

"We can't leave them banners to gather around during the occupation," Amadeus said. "Not the Order of the White Hand, not the Fairfaxes, not even the knightly orders. It's not a question about the practical power of those entities, it's what they represent. The Principate had massive city garrisons during its own occupation and they changed nothing. As long as there was a Fairfax loose, Callow still had fight in it. From there it was a question of what would give first: Callowan stubbornness or Procer's willingness to bleed."

"One rarely takes the pot when betting against Callowan spite," Allie conceded, tone darkly amused.

"We're not just planning the war, Alaya," Amadeus said. "We're preparing for the peace afterwards, and moving before the pieces are in place for that is wasting the entire effort."

"Concessions will have to be made," Allie said. "I know you have your doubts about the Imperial governorship system-"

"It's ripe for abuse," he flatly said. "And abuse unmakes all of this. The rule we bring must be, if not just, then at least fair. I trust not Wasteland lords to know even the shadow of that."

"Then I'll wrangle a role as overseer for you," Alaya told him. "If nothing else, we can use the limits we place to weed out the ambitious when they overstep."

Amadeus rose to his feet, pushing the chair back.

"This is the moment where I agreed," Black said, turning towards me. "The first mistake I made after the war, though it would not be the last."

My feet were on solid ground. Stone, the Tower's own. I scuffed my boot against it and flinched at the sound. It felt too real. I'd had Name visions before, but this was... different. I'd never had any agency in them before. I glanced back up and found him patiently watching me.

"Black, what is this?" I asked.

"Remonstrations," he said. "Old favours were called in."

My fingers clenched. I did not like the sound of that in the slightest.

"What happened?"

"Unimportant," he dismissed. "It is your latest campaign that we must speak of, Catherine."

"You shouldn't know I'm here," I frowned.

"I know a lot of things I shouldn't," he smiled, but the trace of mirth vanished quick enough. "You head towards a debacle. I am ashamed you cannot see as much, for I must have failed you deeply for that not to be obvious."

"I came here because everywhere else was a dead end," I bitterly replied. "Even you, playing your games in Procer. How'd that turn out for you?"

"My flaws are many, but no excuse for yours," Black chided. "This scheme is flawed. Oaths can be broken, and bereft of that why would any of them obey you?"

"It's a blinking game," I told him. "If the Heavens break the oaths, there's a nation's worth of drow loose in the middle of their backyard. They can't afford that."

"There is no win condition to your plan," he bluntly said. "Only different ways you can lose or put off those losses. You cannot even claim a purpose for this army you'll mass beyond the current wars."

"That's not true," I bit back. "I know exactly where I'll settle them."

"And where would that be?" he skeptically replied. "Your kingdom would not survive the process."

I paused. It was an effort to keep my face loose.

"It's fated," I said. "I doesn't need to be me who does the heavy lifting."

"Fate is a useful tool," Black said, tone irritated, "but it does not-"

I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth, interrupting him.

"So that's what this is," I mused.

His face blanked. He'd always been eerily pale, but as blood-red lips split into a fanged grin I saw he'd become pale as driven snow. Our surroundings broke apart, ripped away by howling winds – entire chunks of not-Tower whisked away by the raging blizzard. The two of us stood ankle-deep in the snow, facing each other. Above us there was only an endless pitch black night, unknowing of moon or stars. There was only one source of light in here: the burning blue eyes set in my teacher's face.

"And so we resume the lesson," he said, voice echoing of Winter.

His sword left the sheath with a quiet hiss and he advanced. Around us I felt other silhouettes rise and there we no need to look to know whose they were. It would be the Woe, at first. Then Juniper. Aisha. Ratface. Nauk. Robber. Pickler. Kilian. Everyone I'd ever shared a laugh with, everyone I'd ever given the smallest speck of affection to. Anyone I'd ever loved, no matter the manner of it. This was not an unfamiliar sight. While my armies struggled through the Battle of the Camps, Masego and I had been... otherwise occupied. I'd visited his own fever dream, taken him out of it. Mine though, I'd never spoke about. With good reason. They would come for me, swords high. They'd curse and scream and die and poison everything we'd ever shared with their last words. Then I'd stand alone, for a heartbeat.

And it would start again.

The backlash from our broken gate had entrapped Masego in his own desires. Mine, though, had ground away at me one murder at a time. Winter did enjoy matching its torments to the disposition of the tormented.

"It would be capable of doing this, it's true," I spoke out loud.

The raging winds drowned out my words to even my own ears, but that hardly mattered in here.

"But it would also have known about Black," I calmly continued. "You could only reach old Name dreams, couldn't you?"

I paused.

"No, more than that," I corrected. "I've never had one of those with the Dark Council room featuring. You're riding a vision I could have, if my Name took the fore. You can probably look at most of what I've dreamed before as well. But for the personalities, you had the bare bones that gives you with guesswork grafted on."

The fakes ceased marching towards me and I took a deep breath before raising my hand. Will against will, that was all there was to it. I ripped away the veil and met my enemy's eyes. Deep and perfect silver on pitch-black skin. The last time the glare of them had blinded me, but we were in my head now. My rules ran deeper than hers.

"I've gone rounds with demons and fae, Sve Noc," I said. "If you want to fuck with my mind, best sharpen your game."

The drow's long hair flowed endlessly behind her, turning into gargantuan strands of Night the further they were from the silver light. She did not seem pleased.

Child, she said. Your arrogance beggars belief.

"Mine?" I laughed. "You think you get to win this because I'm close to your domain? I carry mine with me, Priestess. And you stepped in it of your own free will."

Your doom comes, she said. You will drown in despair, alone and lost.

"And we got off to such a good start," I drawled. "Whatever happened to 'I await you in Tvarigu'?"

Sudden rage suffocated me. A wrath beyond understanding, beyond any single person's capacity. I buckled under the weight of it, but there was something behind. Small, almost like a whimper. Fear, I thought. There was fear.

And wasn't that interesting?

"That wasn't you," I said.

Sve Noc snarled.

All is Night, she proclaimed.

"Which are you, I wonder?" I grinned, slow and mean. "The rider or the horse?"

She did not answer with words. The pressure should have crushed me. Would have, if this was her realm and not mine. But old words echoed and rippled, the whisper of a pair of crows surrounded by a sea of birds of paradise, and it washed over me like rain. It was not my truth, but I had partaken in it.

"Uninspired," I said, and the dream shattered.

—

My eyes opened with perfect clarity, lacking the transition between sleep and not.

"That's a little off-putting, I'll admit," Indrani sighed.

I wiggled out from under her arm, already missing the warmth, and sat up. The blanket slid down, baring the upper half of my body, but Archer didn't even bother to leer. She just snuggled deeper into the covers, to my mild offence.

"Dare I ask?" I said.

"The heartbeat thing," she elaborated. "I got used to the cool and skin and stopped noticing when it wasn't there, but it started up the moment you woke up. How does that even work?"

"Fuck if I know," I admitted, passing a hand through my tangled hair. "Zeze says it has nothing to do with pushing blood anymore, so it might just beat when I remember it should."

The fire had gone out while we slept but that changed little for me. The sensation between different temperatures still came to me, it just... didn't matter. It was more like a colour than a feeling. It wasn't the same for Indrani, though, because my toes informed me she'd put on pants at some point I definitely remembered taking off. Among, uh, other things. I cleared my throat awkwardly. Indrani cranked open a bleary eye.

"You're not gonna get all skittish about this, are you?" she said. "Considering how enthusiastic you—"

"I remember, yes," I coughed. "It'd been a while, 'Drani."

She laughed musically.

"Yeah, well, it shows you've been mostly with women for a few years," she said. "You're a lot better than I thought you'd be at giving h—"

"If you keep dishing it out, it'll burn out the embarrassment," I tried.

She mulled over that for a moment.

"True," she said. "I should probably ration it out."

She finally deigned to rise, pushing herself up and stretching out like a lazy cat. Considering the blanket had completely fallen, that did rather interesting things to a frame I was now intimately familiar with. She caught me staring and grinned.

"Already?" she smugly said.

"Any port in a storm," I sneered.

"Ouch," she said, putting a hand over her heart. "That one drew blood, Cat."

Not really, if her deeply amused tone was any indication. I rested my bare back against the stone and closed my eyes to wallow in this passing moment of peace. Soon enough I would have to arm myself for war and strike the first blow of the Battle of Great Strycht, but just for a little while I could enjoy this. The world outside our nook could remain a faraway abstract a little bit longer. If I'd done this with someone else I might have feared that it would change what lay between us, but not with Indrani. She had a rather cavalier attitude towards bedplay, as a rule, even if she'd largely refrained from indulging since becoming part of the Woe. That'd been a choice on her part, though. She was attractive, a well-known war hero and Named besides: if she'd actually sought out company, she wouldn't have spent a single night alone since Second Liesse.

"And what great thoughts are we having?" Indrani said, sitting up at my side.

I opened my eyes and found her looking at me with fond amusement.

"I was wondering about the self-inflicted nature of your dry spell," I admitted.

"Was trying something," she shrugged. "Still on the fence about it. Besides, you're one to talk. When we first met you could hardly keep your hands off the redhead."

Kilian, I thought, but no pang of blurry regret came. It'd been a while since it had ceased to. It'd seemed so much more important when I was in the middle of it. But now my hours were filled bargaining with empires and waging desperate wars, when the stewardship of Callow did not swallow them whole, and the intensity had faded. It seemed such small thing, compared to what was behind me and what still lay ahead.

"It was new for me," I admitted. "I'd never stuck that long with anyone before. Never wanted to, either."

"Heartbreaker, were you?" Indrani snorted.

I shrugged.

"I knew I was going to leave someday," I said. "So there was no point."

"I can't imagine you married," she admitted. "Or even settled down."

"I was kind of proposed to the once," I mused.

She grinned.

"Now this I've got to hear," Indrani said.

"I used to work at this tavern in Laure, the Rat's Nest," I said. "The owner hinted pretty heavily that if I married his son I'd inherit the place after he died."

"Truly a love story for the ages," Archer commented gravely.

"He was kind of an ass, and pretty busy ploughing our bard," I noted. "Harrion didn't push when I made it clear it wasn't happening, he was a good sort. Now if Duncan Brech had gotten on his knees, my tender maidenly heart might have skipped a beat. That boy was fit like you wouldn't believe."

"And no one else has tried since?" Indrani said, sounding genuinely curious. "I thought popping out heirs was the queenly thing to do."

"Talbot mentioned it once or twice," I agreed. "And everyone influential with spare kin paraded a prospect at court. But I've no intention of staying on the throne, so why bother? I was only ever a temporary measure."

The Foundling dynasty would be short-lived, which was probably for the best. If a successor bearing my name got into even half the messes I had, they'd be more curse than king.

"We children of dew and lightning," Indrani murmured. "Transient and terrible in our passing."

She did say beautiful things, sometimes, for all her cheerful crassness.

"Where's it from?" I asked.

"Some poem the Lady taught me when I was kid, from far across the sea," she said. "Her father loved it."

"It's a big world, isn't it?" I said. "We've seen more than most on this continent, the two of us, and it's still such a small fraction of it."

"It's not about how long we last, I don't think," Archer said. "Who could possibly live long enough to see it all? We just have to make the most of what we get."

"We're probably the first humans to walk the Everdark in a few centuries, if not more," I offered.

"Oh, we'll do a little more than just walk," Indrani said, lips quirking.

The certainty in her voice forged a smile of my own, though it faded after a few moments.

"I dreamt, while I slept," I said.

"Winter again?" she asked. "Hakram said whatever you're seeing must be pretty fucking grim, if you're not even willing to talk to him about it."

"Yeah, well, Winter doesn't do nice as a rule," I muttered. "But it wasn't that, at least not tonight. I got an important visitor."

"No shit?" Archer said. "Our old buddy Sve Noc showed up? What did she want?"

"They, I think," I said. "And I don't mean it the way it's usually meant for drow."

"A two woman show," she frowned. "Didn't see that one coming. They tend to watch each other's back the same way Praesi do – considering where to plunge the knife. Did she drop in for a bit of trash talk? It's only traditional before villains throw down."

"She wanted me to believe that real bad, by the end of it," I said. "But she played tricks early on trying to get me to answer questions."

"O Mighty Catherine, would you pretty please tell me your battle plans?" Indrani mocked in a high pitched voice.

"That I wouldn't have minded," I admitted. "It'd mean she thinks it could go either way. But what she was actually asking was where I intend to take the drow down the line, and I mislike the shape of that. It feels like she's playing a different game."

And Captain's death was proof enough of how costly that sort of disconnect could be.

"We're the outsiders here," Archer said. "It was given we'd have to go in blind. But two heads, huh. Wonder how that came about."

"I'm more interested in how it can be used," I said. "The first one I spoke with had a fairly different take on this mess than the other."

"Think there's an angle there?" she asked.

I breathed out slowly.

"There was a story I used to love when I was a kid," I said. "The orphanage was an Imperial institution, when it came down to it, and the tavern I worked that was heavy on Legion clientele. Neither was in the habit of peddling Callowan stories to impressionable young minds."

I half-smiled, thinking of those days where the trifling had loomed so tall.

"But I got my hands on this old book at the Rat's Nest," I said. "Called Stirring Tales of Chivalry."

"Was it all about lances and ladies?" Indrani asked, wiggling her eyebrows.

I rolled my eyes.

"It was water damaged, so most of it was just blurry ink – probably why the family never managed to pawn it," I mused. "But there were a few stories in it that were readable, and one I must have read a hundred times. It was about this giant ogre, you see, that lived somewhere in the south of Callow. It had two heads and it could do magic, so even though knight after knight tried to slay it all that happened was that it made a house of their bones."

"They call their city in the Wasteland the Hall of Skulls, right?" Indrani said. "It holds up."

I imagined General Hune would have some issues with the story if she ever heard it, but then most my high-ranking officers would have problems with Callowan folk tales. They, uh, tended to get killed in them. To popular acclaim.

"So there's these three knights that head out to slay it," I said. "One's strong, one's quick, the last is clever."

"Clever survives at the end," Indrani immediately predicted.

"The last one listed always survives, you're not impressing anyone," I grunted. "Anyway, they go up to the ogre one after the other. Yes, bad tactics I know so don't even start. Strong and quick get fried, because magic is perfidious and all that. Each of the ogre's heads eats one of the dead."

"I thought it was using the bones for its house," Archer said.

"Look, I never said it was high literature," I said. "Clever knight goes up, and then says 'I surrender', flatters them and says they're invincible."

"And then it asks which head is going to eat him after he dies," Indrani said.

"Exactly," I said. "The heads start arguing, the clever knight makes it worse, and eventually one head clubs the other in anger and they both die."

"I thought it was a mage ogre," she said.

"It also had a club," I sighed.

"This is why people make fun of Callowan literature, Cat," Indrani said, not unkindly.

"My point," I said, valiantly pressing on, "is that creatures with two heads can be of two minds."

There was a pause.

"Was that all?" Archer asked.

"There's another version of it that I came across later," I said.

"No doubt it will be as stirring as was promised by the title," Indrani replied, smothering a smile.

"In that version, the third knight is a young Elizabeth Alban," I said.

"The Queen of Blades herself," she said. "She plies a clever trick as well?"

"No," I said. "She straight up murders the ogre, because that's what Elizabeth Alban does."

That surprised a laugh out of her and so I left it at that. We shared a comfortable silence for a little while longer, until I could no longer even slightly justify lingering. Reluctantly I rose up, somewhat pleased she was finally taking the time to ogle my nakedness, and picked up my clothes. I shimmied on my trousers as she reached for her leathers and I was surprised by the muted intimacy of getting dressed together. It wasn't domestic – the word would never feel anything but forced matched to Indrani – but it was a kind of closeness we'd never shared before. There was, I thought, nothing to regret about last night. Belts tightened, weapons at our hips, we left the dead fire behind us. There was a war to wage.

---

erraticerrata

Character contest continues: Thief vs Lone Swordsman. Link to vote below.

<https://www.strawpoll.me/16839911?fbclid=IwAR3lvqMjH3TRFfJSGrHAXDKMBcjIvJvLQU33fTuSMnesDob7F3lUXvqUNQ4>

Novice

Oof, this is a hard one. Ol' Willy was a great first antagonist for our Cat showing how heroes can be such bastards early on while Thief is currently showing great character development.

taovkool

Vivi, absolutely no contest this one.

'Yoink', remember? That one was awesome.

Dainpdf

Dark and stabby vs Light (fingered) and sneaky. I'm taking Vivienne. William was fun, but in the end he didn't get enough camera time to beat Thief. Plus, Yoink is still one of the best scenes in APGtE to date.

Novice

To be fair, Thief couldn't stab shit.

Andrew Mitchell

True. More 'stealy' than 'stabby'.

Decius

Why stab shit when you can steal it and then plant it in your enemies' boots?

goliath1303

It's a good thing that Lone Swordsman was described as dark and stabby, and Vivienne as light(fingered) and sneaky then. That could have gotten confusing otherwise lol.

NerfGlastigUaine

Going for Lone Swordsman. He's just... he's so fucked up yet so compelling. He's a terrible person, he's racist, he's shortsighted, his end game was horrific on the scale of Second Llesse, his greatest regret was entirely his own fault, and yet... there's something so human about him. He starts a caricature of stupid anti-hero good, but his interlude chapters flesh him out without changing him. They do nothing to redeem him, and yet I still agree wholeheartedly with Bard

"Oh, you poor Contrition fools. You break my heart every time."

stevenneiman

I personally feel like Thief just seems a little bit more well-rounded. William honestly always felt kind of like a badly-written D&D character more than a person to me. Thief always felt to me like her flaws and anxieties were more real, where for William they seemed like they were just a particularly fucked up generic tragic backstory tacked onto a mindless drone of the Heavens. I found Hanno a much more interesting take on the same idea, because he felt much more like he had actually made a choice rather than being a victim of the Hashmallim, and even if he was just as much of an obedient drone he owned it.

Metrux

That's probably the diferent between Contrition and Judgement. Just like the pilgrim's story is diferent, cuz he's from... Uhh... Don't remember the right word. Anyway, each of those seek out not only diferent types of people, but diferent ways to interact with them. Contrition is all about "you have no choice, just accept and contrite", which gets melodramatic easily.

HannaB

Grey Pilgrim is Mercy. And utterly terrifying.

Euodiachloris

Ain't no mercy like a cruel mercy. 😊

stevenneiman

All of the Choirs are variations on the theme of a virtue taken beyond the extreme of madness and further corrupted by the dictatorial nature of Good. Contrition twists a victim's conscience until their own mind is a torture device, and further fails to recognize any virtues but its own. Judgement claims to have be the only justice, never mind that it just decides who serves Good and then kills anyone who doesn't. Mercy seeks to minimize suffering, but it doesn't recognize that suffering can be the best option or that serving Good can cause unnecessary suffering. Of note, for all their talk about alleviating suffering, Mercy basically tortured Tariq because he couldn't come up with a more elegant solution to the problem they gave him to solve and because it knew he wouldn't call bullshit. We don't know too much about Endurance, but I suspect that it drives its adherents to persevere long past their mental breaking point, and to persevere even when it becomes clear that they're on the wrong path, not that they have exclusive rights to that particular failing if William is any indication.

As a sidenote my personal headcanon is that the Pilgrim has become addicted to the power rush he only gets when he's protecting heroes. He doesn't recognize it, but he actually chose to go to war with Cat rather than accept her offer to gate the Tenth Crusade straight to the Tower because he wanted to protect heroes when the war he could have avoided put them in harm's way.

NerfContessa

That's a very astute view, methinks.

Thx.

Sen

I'm not trying to sway the votes or anything, but before we forget about Will, here's the throwback: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/02/10/heroic-interlude-riposte/>

Start from "You know what it means, right?"

:')

RanVor

I meant to vote for Willycakes, but Thief yoinked my vote.

Morgenstern

Second that..

stevenneiman

Huh. Looks like Ratface made a comeback. He was at about 30% when I voted but it looks like he won.

Darkening

Man, he was winning two to one from the moment I saw it.

superkeaton

Oh William, a failure to the end. But a third of the votes ain't a bad showing, so cheers to that.

I hope your sister forgave you and I hope that Hell was worth it.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

I like the version with Elizabeth Alban.

Playing games inside Cat's head never ends well.

Huh. Sve is playing games with themselves.

I wonder how Sve has differentiated its component selves. Perhaps one closer to the original pre-spreading of Night Sve, and one closer to the Night Sve created.

Someguy

Just killing Sve Noc works. the problem is the how. Using Winter to eat Night is obviously a "Bad Idea" so I suggests bashing both heads together brutally.

Dainpdf

Other question is "can they be killed while the Night exists?"

Their interest in Cat's use for the Drow post their apparent demise indicates this is at least a "not easily".

Rook

Sure they can. The same way the king of winter and the queen of summer were killed without shedding a single drop of blood or damaging their mantles.

This isn't a street brawl, this is a war of domains. Specifically, domains that make a statement out of endlessly devouring whatever it defeats. Two snakes trying to swallow each other.

You don't win this fight by shoving steel through a mortal throat or stopping a heartbeat. It's won by superseding the other player.

Dainpdf

A dangerous assumption to make, considering how Cat made specific mention that assimilating the Night was a trap.

Also, the Sve is Named, not Fae. Their nature is less fluid than a fae's. Plus, the King of Winter may have been no more, but he left behind a King of the Fae. Something tells me we want nothing of the Sve left behind.

Decius

Why kill them? Surely the *Duchess of Moonlit Nights* can easily vassalise Night.

Dainpdf

*Moonless?

And Cat already has Diabolist... Taking the Sve sounds like one (two?) monsters on a chain too many.

Let's not forget how Cat killed Akua herself... That's not a story she wants to be on the other side of.

werafdsaew

Irritant's Law

Dainpdf

That only works if there's no collective story – a band of heroes, for example, don't get in each other's way.

Unfortunately, there are stories about keeping multiple things caged – Kairos even told one, of one of his ancestors who kept a bunch of animals.

Antoninjohn

Why kill when she can be made to take the Oath

RanVor

Forcing Sve Noc to take oaths would be the most complete victory Cat could ever hope to achieve in the Everdark... Except the Dwarves might consider it a breach of the contract, and I don't have to say how bad would that be, do I? It's safer to just murder the shit out of her.

Antoninjohn

The deal was that any Drow she picks up are to be unharmed by her when she leaves and for yet to get rid of Sve noc

Morgenstern

Sve Noc said it themselves: Oaths can be broken. That's why.

Morgenstern

Although Cat is right, too, if you look at it from another way – she would dearly pay for breaking the oaths...

Aston W

Why kill when you can dump both of them in Arcadia as Summer and Winter Gods?

Morgenstern

I don't see that working as long as Cat still needs the Winter mantle for herself. Also, she wanted to give it to someone else...

Dainpdf

Well, Sve went into Cat's Domain and didn't get frozen and snuffed, so I think she's been the most successful invader yet.

I guess invading whole she's dreaming may have helped, as may whatever immense power the Sve's Name gives them.

WuseMajor

I suspect there's a Priestess of Night and the Night itself. And I don't think the Priestess is in charge anymore.

In fact, That might be why Cat is down here. Two potential immortals, two queens, one lost in her Mantle, one mostly supressing hers. The one who manages to take real control it is likely the one who wins and becomes a true immortal Villain.

I hope Cat spots that and manages to carve a way around it, because it looks like Below is hoping to combine them together into a really powerful pawn.

Jessica Day

I was just about to write something like this when I saw your comment. Now I don't have to. 😊

Nash Equilibrium

Darn, I was kind of hoping this would be a new name coming to the fore, but I can't say I'm surprised or disappointed. That said, there being two minds involved with Sve Noc seems almost too literal. Though it does lend itself to some interesting ideas for how the current ascension play might have stalled.

Dainpdf

Well, a new Name wouldn't have been Black's successor, so Name dreams wouldn't be likely to involve him.

FactualInsanity

Yeah, but tell me honestly you didn't think it was Black making contact in his dying moments to pass on a few final lessons to his pupil. It was a beautiful bait and switch, for the first few paragraphs.

HannaB

I thought it was him... but I didn't think he was dying because I'm stubborn like that XD

FactualInsanity

Well, I didn't mean literal "head on the chopping block, sword already swinging down" dying moment. Just, you know, aware the end is nigh, so cashing in all the chips. :3

Morgenstern

No, nothing like that. Just him realizing most his own plans failed and how, thus having to rely on his plan for Cat and thus contacting her because he thinks she, too, might fail. But only for a the first remembrance. It became clear VERY quickly during that talk following the cursive that nothing fit together...

Dainpdf

I wasn't sure about dying moments, but yes, I did get jebaited.

JackbeThimble

This could easily be interpreted as Cat starting to reach for the Name of Queen of Blades, it wouldn't be the first time she's drawn parallels with Lizzie.

1queenofblades1

For the 100th time Queen of Blades isn't a name lmao. We already have WoG that Elizabeth Alban was simply called that because she was just that much of a badass.

Morgenstern

To be fair, that doesn't mean that nickname couldn't ever be turned INTO a real Name somewhere down the line. We have enough proof that new names DO crop up (aka Hakram and Masego).

Morgenstern

I don't either think that one likely, though.

HannaB

Names are more literal than nicknames. Cat would actually need to be famous for using blades in some prominent and notable fashion, for that to be a Name for her.

goliath1303

I'm so glad somebody else gets this! When I read these comments I can't believe how many people think they're being soooo clever with Names like:

Warlord Catherine the Squire, Queen of Callow, Duchess of Moonlit Nights

Protagonist

Wraith Queen

The Dead Queen

Skeleton Queen

Queen of the Winter Night

Queen of Ruin

Winter's Knight

Bleak Queen of Callow

Winter's Regent

Bleak Beast

Warqueen

Slayer

Queen sword

Eldritch Knight

Those are all actual names people suggested in the comments of the carriers surrounding Second Llesse. I truly don't understand how people haven't grasped that a Name has to, first of all, be something that you would actually call somebody in a story. Who has heard a story about "Protagonist", "Queen Sword", or "Winter's Regent"? Second, most Names are more of an archetype than a proper noun/title.

Then, there's things like "Warlord Catherine the Squire, Queen of Callow, Duchess of Moonlit Night" just don't work(I've seen so many variations of something similar to this.) It's way too long, Warlord has no cultural significance to Callowans, WoG is Warlord is an orc only name, Squire is a Name on its own, and no part of it other than Queen of Callow(We know that Callowan monarchs weren't Named by default. They would have a name in addition to their title.) and Squire, had any significance to Cat's people. Why tf would she be called "Bleak Beast"? I'm not even gonna elaborate on that one.

Actually, I'm just gonna end there. Sorry for the rant, it's just something that has bugged me for a while lol.

Na

While I doubt Cat will end up with a name like that, for queeny reasons rather than bladey ones, it might not have been a name *then* but maybe Lizzie managed to carve a deep enough grove into fate for it to be one now.

Euodiachloris

When you get a queen whose first choice is "slash and slice the thing" and they come with enough determination to slash and slice a lot of things, well... *shrugs* Get another queen like that, and you're getting a pattern started.

Third time is probably the charm.

Aston W

Feels like Cat needs to lose Winter soon. Or give it away.

Darkening

Considering her body is an artificial construct created out of Winter magic and her soul is threaded pretty firmly into Winter now, that feels unlikely.

Skaddix

Ah two heads, two minds, this will be an interesting trick although Cat is right Captain went down because the Calamities rolled into a land when they didn't fully understand the stories they be dealing with.

Dainpdf

That, plus Black didn't know what the enemies' objectives were. He misread both Tyrant and Bard.

Rook

The problem is that Cat doesn't have any inkling of what stories Sve Noc is working with. Even the skeleton of a drow story is going to be exceedingly dangerous. This might be a grave, but it's the grave of a giant that makes the Kingdom of Callow look like a newborn babe in comparison.

The only way I can see her avoiding the same pitfall Black ran into with Bard, is to start utilizing her peerage properly and draw more knowledge from them. It'll be near impossible for her to make the right moves unless she at least understands what game her opponent is playing.

Morgenstern

Yeah, if she can rip knowledge from Akua, why not from her "Peerage".

Euodiachloris

Leaves a question open... Do even the current Drow know enough about the older tales and tropes? Or has Night carefully extracted important aspects from their collective memory?

Me

What a "coincidence" that Cat and Sve "mirror" each other so much. Both can enter each other Domain, both soon will gain a rank up, Sve has someone else within it's Night, Cat has a Villain within her Winter.

Dainpdf

Cool to get another piece of dialogue with Sve Noc, nice to know what Cat's dream was. Also fun to get a bit of interpersonal relations going.

In terms of theorizing, I guess the dual nature of Sve Noc is an interesting bit, though I find it hard to go anywhere with it; the fact that she wants to know what happens to the Drow after is very worrisome and might be reason enough to just execute all of them, need for an army or no.

Oh, and thank you for the chapter!

Now that I'm done being nice...
This is filler! Filler night!
And no one's gonna save you
From the two-day wait to write!
You know it's filler! Filler night!

Morgenstern

Sve Noc wanting to know what will happen to the drow could either be VERY worrisome – or, actually, not worrisome at all. Some part of her might be rather willing to hand over – if only the terms are right and her people stay protected. *shrugs (Nah, probably not very likely... but still. There's something about that fear. And also the acknowledgement of the first pieces of Night Cat encountered that Winter was "akin", but not quite the same – AND more powerful at that. Squirming like an Igor to please its master / soothen a more dangerous predator into letting it live...)

Dainpdf

I don't think the Sve care a whit for their people. Not with what they've reduced the Drow to. Not as anything other than tools.

Now, if, similarly to Cat, they have found a way of imprinting themselves into their Domain, I could see it. Could also be some other sort of trap.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Anyone saw how Cat copied Black's retort from Liesse?
"Uninspired"
And it's been really long since we have Name dream now.

Antoninjohn

What has Cat become that the breaker of the Twilight Sages feels fear?

Novice

It's not that she's fearing Cat so much as she's fearing her other self.

RoflCat

Probably this really, heck Sve Noc might literally be Sve (Priestess) and Noc (Night) in a sort of the Holy Trinity... Unholy Duo? way where they're both the same and separate entity at the same time (a theme that's been mentioned with Cordelia before)

Noc saw Cat does her murder thing, and welcome her, even if it'll results in the story Akua told Ivah, because worthy rises and here's Sovereign of Moonless Nights.

Sve, on the other hand, either see what Cat's trying to do, or is afraid for her position, and is trying to deal with that.

FactualInsanity

A Blasphemous Brace? A Profane Pair? A Corrupt Couple?
I don't know why I felt the urge to look up aliterations.
Not like Holy Trinity is aliterative.

Halinn

Dammed Duo?

Euodiachloris

Alternatively, Akua is going to get a wonderful chance to see what happens when you reach for apotheosis while firmly clinging to a compartmentalized life-style to cope with, you know, ruling without coping with personal responsibility for what you do.

The woman as a private person and her public persona as the priestess might... have become two actual beings sharing a single space thanks to the influx of power. Which could well then have stymied the attempt to complete going all godlike.

edrey

also, two selfs could be 6 aspects, that would be unholy crazy

Snowfire1224

I freaked out in the beginning and thought she was having a name dream, until I thought about it and then realized she wouldn't be having one until she got a new name, if she ever gets a new name, and nothing climatic enough has happened yet for that to happen.

Wonderful ogre story, it seemed to me to be making fun of a stock fantasy story side quest.

medailyfun

What do you mean "nothing climatic"? She slept with Archer! That deserves a Name

Snowfire1224

When writing my comment I thought about trying to make a joke around that but decided not to.

Not sure I want to know what kind of name she would get from sleeping with Archer.

Raved Thrad

How about "Fuck Buddy?" At some level, Cat doesn't really want to have to fight her way through all of Calernia, and ascending to heroic (or villainous) office as The Fuck Buddy just might help her not have to do so. I mean, seriously, who wants to kill their Fuck Buddy? I'm betting even Pilgrim wouldn't be able to say no to her, and once she's slept with a couple of the more influential heroes Callow might not only be safe, but it would have heroic defenders wanting to make sure their queen, and by extension her kingdom, are safe. I'm sure Champion would love to jump on that.

Not Hanno, though. He's such an emotard no fuck buddy will ever be able to turn him into anything other than a self-hating whiny turd. He needs to die.

sengachi

I really, really love how Indrani and Cat's night together and the morning after have been written. It's just really good and sidesteps all kinds of cheap tropes and drama for some really genuine connection of a classically unusual sort.

sengachi

Also, a bit of meta commentary:

Authors redefine and create new tropes every time they write. What stories are is changed a little with every new word. Erratica, the way you're redefining and adding to the body of relationship tropes with this character interplay is something very worthwhile, and I'm genuinely grateful to see the little marks you're helping whittle into our collective consciousness of stories.

HannaB

and is this first time in this story that erratic has actually managed to have two characters have chemistry past their first sleeping together no consent issues this time, no dissolving one's personality in favor of just being 'the one to sleep with'
nice

OneConfusedChild

Agh, I need someone to clarify for me. This whole time, iv'e been under the impression that Cat isn't named anymore. Is that wrong??? What I thought was that Winter just put itself into the general shape of a name because that's what Cat was when it did its thing.

But now we have name dreams going on??? I sort of figured that kind of thing had stopped.

Send help, very confused.

Snowfire1224

I she said it felt different frok a name dream and from her conversation from Sve, I think Sve Noc was recreating a name dream to mess with her head

Yotz

Sve Noc using an unborn vision that Cat would've had is her Name was still with her. Since Cat's Name was replaced by the Mantle those visions remain unrealized. Sve Noc called in some favours to hijack one of such visions being under the wrong impression that opposing actor is one of the usual Named. Which leads to following:

>You're riding a vision I could have, if my Name took the fore.

Have Sve been better prepared and wore the flawless image of Black, she would, probably, still be caught by Cat cause to her current inability to experience Name Visions.

RanVor

Wait a sec.

Sve Noc (whichever one it was) has went into Cat's dream disguised as Black. That means all "Black" said wasn't actually backed by real Black's narrative expertise. Does that mean that the "oaths can be broken" thing is a legit threat Cat needs to prepare for, or was it just wishful thinking on Sve Noc's part meant to poison Cat's mind with doubt?

HannaB

the second, most likely

Black doesn't think that way, actually. Oaths can be broken, everyone can betray each other, but he doesn't think love is a weakness and he's ridden this far on Power of Trust and Power of Friendship. This is not a particular issue he'd have gone for, I don't think

Cicero

It seems to be some matter of argument as to whether whatever remains of the Squire counts as a name anymore.

It's sort of like asking if a person is wearing a cloak, and that cloak is ripped to shreds, but the person keeps on wearing those shreds, is she still wearing a cloak?

Na

I don't think the metaphor holds up unless you stitch those threads to a new cloak and start wearing that. The whole thing seems kinda ship-of-Theseus-y; she's not the Squire, but also isn't not the Squire either.

Dresden 67

We got clarification on this back in Chapter 10: Alegro:

'It would have been a lie, though, to still call myself the Squire. No one did anymore. I could still feel the bare bones of that Name, some days, but the flesh and muscle over them was Winter's. Whatever I'd done in Liesse, when I had broken Masego's scaffolding, it had ended my tenure. I had no aspects anymore'

JackbeThimble

Yeah Cat's totally in love, you can tell by all the denials.

HannaB

Well, she loves Indrani as a friend already.
I think this is a start of a wonderful poly thing ♥

sengachi

Queerplatonic relationships are A+.

Raved Thrad

Well, whatever else he might do, we know that if they reach out to Masego, at the very least he'll watch and not flinch.

SilverDargon

too soon

Cassandra Riordan

They are super cute and I hope things work out for them.
Romance is good for her. 😊

eh

Sve Noc, a.k.a Trust Nobody, Not Even Yourself: the character.

haihappen

Trust is a weakness.
Or: An entity divided in itself cannot stand!

Two minds in the entity of Sve Noc could be the whole reason why Drow society is fucked: If they struggle for dominance inside the domain, trying to devour each other, this may influence all of the Night, and the Drow with them. The whole society collapsed because the conflict, however minor, spread with the domain, consuming their ability to work together.

The only solution to this would probably be to BREAK Sve Noc, TAKE the now loose domain of Night, and let it FALL into her own domain of Moonless Night.

medailyfun

maybe not break but split?

NZPIEFACE

Ok so...

Sve Noc -> Winter Dream -> Amadeus council room -> Amadeus memory.

boi that's a long rabbit hole.

Jay

So, I really want to get into how much I loved the last chapter and the morning after portion of this chapter, cuz I've definitely had of minor ship going on for them at least although I definitely ship Archer with Heirophant more. BUT i have been fucking WAITING for a 3rd court of Fae to form EVER SINCE Cat's Apotheosis. The aftermath of the previous courts merging hinted (to me) that they had essentially become Spring Court (although they could be Fall.) And ever since Akua has been around as a shade ive been waiting for the shoe to drop and become the new Summer to Cat's Winter. With the tones being set throughout the Drow arc, i FULLY expect Sve Noct (or at least the Night) to become Fall.

HannaB

Spring and Fall courts already exist

Dresden 67

It was clearly stated that Summer and Winter became the Court of Arcadia.

Ermanti

The only issue with that is Cat still having access to Winter, and her ability to make a new Winter court. The Court of Arcadia will become, inevitably, the new Summer court, only with vastly more Fae in its ranks. This whole arc has been about the creation of the new Winter court. To balance out the vastly more powerful Summer court, Winter has to subordinate Night. Conversely, should Night win, then the current Court of Arcadia will become a Day court to counteract it (Same principles apply really). with corresponding Dawn and Dusk courts. The WInter King knew this, which is why the his gambit left all the power of WInter in Cat's hands. The purpose wasn't to end the cycle, but rather leave a way for the courts to absorb new stories, so it can mirror the way Evil has been changing since the ascension of Malicia and the Calamities, and now the Woe .

Now Arcadia has access to all of the stories of Callow and the Drow, leading to a very different Winter and Summer dynamic when Winter inevitably returns to Arcadia.

Jay

“four Courts of Arcadia – one for each season – but the delineation between them isn’t clear. They don’t all exist at the same time, either.”

Interlude: Gate; book 2

Aston W

Thank you for the chapter EE.

Look forward to no filler Friday.

Yotz

So, I- -w-a-s- -b-e-i-n-g- -l-a-z-y- -t-h-i-s- -M-o-n-d-a-y- I undertook a quest for a poetic inspiration – which was, admittedly, for naught since I couldn’t find a vid of Es Y’Golonac online for the life of me. T_T

...oh well, here’s something romantic for our lovebirds

And – as a special “two-for-one” for the world that waits for their wake

Antony444

So the Priestess of the Night has two heads and it’s not a metaphor...pity for her at least one is going to roll, if she continues to bungle things so badly. Challenging Catherine in the heart of Winter...tsss...

Looks like the chaotic battle is for Friday, can’t wait for it...

1queenofblades1

So basically what that story told us is that Cat will just straight up murder Sve Noc instead of fucking about with elaborate tricks. Because that’s just what Catherine Foundling does. She murders the hopes and dreams of hundreds like a good and proper villain. Then she skewers them like a kebab and plants their corpse by the side of a road.

Drunken Dwarf

Huh so Sve Noc’s failed apotheosis might stem from the fact that she tried to preserve her old self to avoid what the Warlock feared and in doing so ended up as a broken monster with both a new and old Sve controlling one source of power. It certainly doesn’t help that the other Sve seems more story bound and aloof of mortal matters like the fae are.

spencer

> the whisper of a pair of crows surrounded by a sea of birds of paradise

This is a pretty metaphor. Hopefully it becomes clearer as we get a better picture of Sve Noc's abilities. Are the two faces the crows, and the birds of paradise their domain?

Also, "birds-of-paradise" can refer to lots of things, from a flower (<https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Strelitzia>) to a startling variety of bird species (https://juanvelascoblog.files.wordpress.com/2013/02/birds-of-paradise\_final.jpg).

tyizor

It's funny that the most common one (the swan and the dove) aren't listed. Notably the swan was known in a lot of Anglo Saxon mythology for being the bird of heaven. (Bird of paradise)

Shequi

This is Cat's recollection of the Court at Ater, IIRC. She and Black are the Crows. The Court are the Birds of Paradise, and the whisper is Black's Arc Words: "We Do Not Kneel"

Hellspirit

Does one have to be named in order to ride stories? In the way of beating an enemy that is so much more powerful? With named the stories tend to even things out to balance out the narrative, but would this work in Cat's current state?

RanVor

It's the matter of narrative weight. The more narrative weight you have, the more the story pulls you along; whether this is good or bad for you depends on what you're trying to do. The Names are, in essence, signifiers of the narrative weight – they codify your place in the story. That's why people with enough narrative weight usually become Named. Cat's mantle, coupled with her position as the protagonist, gives her enough narrative weight to qualify as a Named for narrative purposes, even though she's technically not.

Wolper

Cat's fae title is Name-adjacent – and is powerful enough without aspects and a specific Named story, that universe is giving her the narrative attention a 'main character' gets that is normally reserved for Named without actually being one.

A Name is an attempt to shape a person who is close enough to a storybook ideal into the actual ideal itself – if a person is already fitting that ideal as good as any Named, then the fact that she doesn't or possibly can't have a name right now doesn't matter – she's still filling the role a Named person would in the story. It's possible she has more flexibility than someone with a true Name, in that the world is not trying to make her go down the specific paths that a Squire would.

If she changes her plans and attitude and behavior to fit any random villain name that would fit with her powers/resources, then her stories would probably fall into similar lines as those names.

crysjal

Having a Name is a sign that you are important to the Narrative and influence it. Without having a name you can still have influence but whether you're aware of the narrative and your impact on it as a whole is a separate thing. It's been shown that the many generals don't understand the narrative. It might be that only Named can perceive it.

RanVor

Well, not really. I think it's more like Named learn to work with narratives through experience because they directly influence the outcomes of their actions. As we've seen with Archer, they don't have any inherent understanding of narrative patterns. I believe everyone can learn to recognize narratives, but most people don't because it doesn't affect them directly.

crysjal

Pretty much every Named character has admitted awareness of the narrative at this point, whereas non named either do not acknowledge it or just are not aware of it in what looks suspiciously like some sort of mental interference with non Named characters just putting it down to Named shenanigans and simply rolling with it. Just because some refuse to accept or act within the narrative doesn't mean they don't believe in it. Archer admits it exists but she doesn't want to let that affect her worldview as she states to Cat. Cat does the exact opposite of that, acting constantly within the narrative and trying to control it.

So essentially my point is that Named have a significant impact and in turn have a greater awareness of the Narrative. The only major non Named players currently are Cordelia and Juniper at this point and they haven't demonstrated any thoughts towards a narrative weight. Cordelia has set into motion the crusades but she clearly had very little if any at all awareness of the narrative and it's impact (as Saint told her in a roundabout way).

Unless you can demonstrate a conversation where non Named discuss the narrative outright and it's not brought up indirectly by Named?

RanVor

The very existence of the Names makes narratives common knowledge. Most people don't acknowledge the narratives because they have no direct influence on their lives, not because they're unaware of them.

Named have greater awareness of the narrative because they're much more bound by it. I'm not denying that. What I'm saying is that this knowledge is not inherent.

The wording of your last paragraph is unfair because it excludes the scene back in book 1 in where Juniper explained pivots to Cat, which disproves your point in rather direct manner. We were clearly shown that Juniper had much greater awareness of the narrative than Cat, who had been Named for months by then.

BarthHumphries

Your character contest had some sort of invisible box that links to an ad. I tried to "verify that I was human" and when I went to click a square it took me to some ad page that wouldn't let me back out.

Android (latest), Samsung.

tragicsuburbanite

She is Sovereign of Moonless Nights, and will not allow any silvery orbs in her domain.

Rup

"if not just, then at least fair"
..the very heart of 'Practical' Evil...

We children of dew and lightning
Transient and terrible

... 🙌🙌😊

---

Chapter 72: Outflow

"For though these armed men may carry banner and obey a prince, without justice they are only bandits."

– Extract from "The Faith of Crowns", by Sister Salienta

It'd be the first battle in a few years where I wouldn't have Juniper to run my army for me. I hadn't quite realized how much I'd come to rely on the Hellhound even before the blades were out, when it was all words and maps and trying to figure out how not to get your people killed. Not that map were all that reliable down here. I had four different tracings from mosaics, each contradicting each other on pretty major points and one insisting rather boldly that this entire cavern was actually three dozen miles to the west and I was sadly mistaken about what my eyes were seeing. I'd settled on having a chalk outline of the former islands and lakebed drawn on a slab of polished granite, well aware it would be imprecise and actual distances would be a guessing game. It'd been strange, though, looking down at a battlefield and not having Juniper leaning over at my side. Frowning over the latest imperfection in the war engine we'd raised together, muttering under her breath about Ratface being a tight-fisted twerp. She never would again, I realized with a start.

Ratface was dead.

There would be a reckoning for that, one day, I thought. It seemed a small sin when compared to all the many injuries levied unto Callow by the Empress, some likely to become actual legend in years to come, but it counted to me. As Diabolist might say, a hatred belonging the woman instead of the queen. Won't matter if I don't make it through this, I reminded myself. It wouldn't either, I knew, if I survived in failure. Only victors ever got to truly settle their grudges. The grim thought called me the order. Perhaps, I decided as I studied the chalk battlefield, it was for the best that my marshal did not hold command for this one. Juniper's art of war was one of discipline and manoeuvre, of bold tactics and vicious traps. It was the bastard child of the way the Legions of Terrors had won their wars, and for all that the faces of my legionaries had grown paler over the years the heart of it remained forged out of the Reforms. A core of well-trained infantry empowered by specialists, professional soldiers costly to train and equip but who could usually beat significantly larger enemy armies.

Like much of what Black had wrought, for the three Imperial marshals might have been deep contributors but there was no denying the central architect, it prized skill over power. It was almost more a set of tools a brilliant mind could use to produce spectacular results than a proper army – it was fortunate that there'd been so many promising generals to be found when the Reforms first took place, and in retrospective the number of them that wasn't human did much to explain the sudden gains of greenskins and ogres in what had once been a very human institution. At least near the top. Few of the old Black Knights had balked at sending orcs and goblins into the meat grinder to the west when campaigns got going. It was a good model, I thought, though to maintain it in the long term Callow would have to build a War College of its own. Talented officers did not grow on trees. It had its limits, though. Procer had made that clear when it'd tossed a sea of conscripts at the two passes defending Callow and effectively accepted every trade in soldier's lives, knowing they could afford the most spendthrift or rates and still come out the victor. The Legions, and even the Army of Callow, were armies built for a certain kind of war.

They would be lost, down here, so it was for the best Juniper was not here to go mad over the coming mess.

I would have liked to claim I had something as neat and pretty as a three-step scheme, that I'd read the opposition and would make them dance to my tune, but the unfortunate truth was that I was an outsider down here. Even now that I'd stolen Akua's fluency in Crepuscular and I could read most runes as well as speak the tongue, a lot of what was taking place was beyond me. I didn't have the Jacks and the Eyes feeding me reports of about who despised who and why, I didn't have histories or supply assessments or even more than bare bones scout reports about enemy strength and position. The traitor sigils we'd approached had provided information, sure, but how much of it could really be relied on? They had objectives of their own which didn't necessarily entail my own army coming out on top, no matter what they said, and without an easy way to independently confirm what they'd told me I'd had to make some choices half blind. At first, I'd tried to get as many solid numbers as I could and work from there. I had a good idea of what the Rumena Sigil could bring to the table, for example, because a lot of people in Strycht hated them and wanted them dead.

But then I'd tried to get a solid notion of what the Jindrich could field – the Rumena were the most powerful sigil by far, but there was a reason the Jindrich Sigil was the undisputed runner-up – but all that accomplished was making clear the scope of the problem. Mighty Jindrich's envoy, fresh off the pact we'd made behind the back of the rest of the city, had informed me they had around one hundred and fifty Mighty of varying ranks they could bring into the fight when time came. We'd bribed three lesser sigils going thirsty with blocks of ice for information on the same subject, since ice was a lot easier to transport and didn't require a highly visible fairy gate to deliver, and we'd gotten three different numbers between one and four hundred. Now, at the scale of the kind of battles I'd fought on the surface, a variation of a few hundred wouldn't mean much. But down here?

It'd made no sense to me. All the sigils had small territories, were bound to keep a vigilant eye on each other and constant raids should give them a good idea of enemy strength.

Diabolist figured it out first, because we had gotten some very precise out of those bribes that was the same over all three reports. Small details, like the first rylleh under Jindrich being able to shapeshift and the four shapes it could use, or that the third and fourth under Rumena usually fought as a pair. It wasn't that the drow were shit at spying, I knew they weren't. There was a Secret that was pretty close to fae glamour, after all, which was why Ivah had taken so well to it in the first place. It was just that, in fights between sigils, usually the only people that actually mattered to the outcome were the ten, fifteen strongest Mighty. Raids succeeded or failed depending on who was leading the attack and the defence. Why would anyone bother keeping track of how many dzulu there were when a single rylleh could tear through an entire cohort without even working up a sweat? We could and had gotten mostly reliable information on those particular individuals, but getting irritated that no one could give me good troop assessments was rather missing the point.

I wouldn't win or lose the Battle of Great Strycht through dzulu and lesser Mighty, so instead of getting lost in a maze of unreliable reports I needed to focus on the aspects that would actually make me come out on top. Namely, that most of those people were at each other's throats if not actively trying to kill each other even as I planned. When you looked at it through that lens, the situation was a lot less grim. For one, my own army was larger than the Rumena Sigil's and I'd bet on my Peerage over their Mighty any day. My lords had lost nothing of their old prowess and gained much from Winter. Considering the Rumena were the most powerful tribe in Strycht, that meant I could expect that if it came to a slugging match I could come out on top against any one sigil – barring an unexpectedly powerful Mighty fucking up my day, which was admittedly quite possible. The crux of this, then, would be preventing the sigils of Strycht from actually unifying against me. Which wasn't nearly as hard as it should have been, given that I was an eldritch invader of dubious purposes and origins. Unfortunately, there was also the Longstride Cabal to account for.

Two hundred of the most dangerous Mighty in the Everdark apt to pop out at any moment to come straight for my head, and probably the Peerage's too for good measure. They weren't here for territory or wealth, all they wanted was the glory of crushing me. Which meant negotiating with them in any way was effectively impossible unless I could punctuate my offer with 'or you will immediately die', and even then it might be a toss-up. I'd picked the brains of my lords for a little more on the Longstrides, wondering if the angle of promising them a battle at a designated time and place could get them off my back long enough to deal with the Strycht sigils. I'd gotten some pretty heart laughs in response, as my Peerage assumed that I was actually joking. Cultural divide, I decided. The whole glory in battle thing was tied pretty heavily to honour, back home, but in the Everdark was the word was only ever used in the sense meaning 'respect'. The whole rules of behaviour part of drow culture had been pretty much ripped out and replaced with the Tenets of Night when Sve Noc decided it was time for a regime change... however long ago that'd been.

Since sidelining the Longstride Sigil wasn't an option, I had to either secure the city before they arrived or make them part of the plan somehow.

The clean play was taking care of Strycht first. Ivah and my Peerage had found me the right tools to get that particular pile of dry burning, which would weaken the opposition before we struck and allow us to take it with moderate casualties before they realized what was happening. Give or take a few angry sigil-holders. Then before the Longstrides arrived we'd consolidate, harvest Night and title the willing before the enemy struck. Most my Peerage had been proponents of that course of action, betting on a proper ambush laid in Strycht to take care of the problem. I had issues with that plan, though. I'd taken enough cities in my time to know that soldiers walking through the streets wasn't enough to actually establish control. That held twice as much for a place like the Everdark, where the nisi might not make the kind of mess an occupying force would have to deal with in Callow but millennia of tribal rule ensured there would be significant resistance among the drow 'upper class'. In essence, anyone with a speck of power not under oath not to stab me in the back would the moment it looked like there was a chance it might pay off.

Wouldn't be much of an issue if I did put everyone with a speck of power under oath, but practically speaking that'd take days we didn't have. Establishing order after a battle always took longer than the fighting itself, and the margin of manoeuvre was thin enough as it was. I could have put the finest minds at my disposal to work on solving that – well, mind, Archer tended to solve her problems only one way – but there was a larger problem behind. Aside from the shaky foundations we'd be making our stand on, when the Longstride Cabal showed up we'd be the only enemy on the field. The totality of their efforts would be dedicated to killing me and wiping out my Peerage, with everything else a minor distraction at best. Sure, I could try to drown them in fresh recruits. Send every dzulu and Mighty I had after them, in warbands led by the Peerage, but casualties would be brutal. And when they converged on me, because they absolutely would, the kind of workings I'd need to pull out to stay alive would probably level Strycht and the people living in it. Evacuating the city in advance was certainly possible, but it'd also be hanging up a sign warning them of the ambush.

So either massive civilian death toll or the cohort of hardened killers drunk on Night came in forewarned. One I refused out of principle, the other had decent odds of leading to a rout.

Which brought us to the other option. That one had been cooking in the back of my head since I'd first gotten Ivah's reports. The sigils in Great Strycht were, well, at each other's throats to put it mildly. Starting a city-wide fight in there would be about as hard as starting a fire with a jug of oil and a torch in hand. Once hostilities erupted, there would be no banners and uniforms: only a lot of scared and angry drow attacking everything looking remotely like a threat. That was the thing with civil wars, wasn't it? It was hard to tell who the enemy was. Sure, infighting within actual sigils would probably be minimal while they were in the middle of a battle. But cabals would split and even nominal allies would have to wonder what was going on and if the other ones were in on it. A very volatile mixture that could be made much worse with a few nudges, personified by a cheerfully murderous Indrani. For once, her ability to pick fights with anything sight could actually come in useful! Deep down I'd always known there would be a payoff for that eventually. This part, in and of itself, wasn't significantly different from what an attempt to seize Strycht would be like.

Which was where the... interesting part came in. The Longstride Cabal, as my Peerage had noted, were not exactly the diplomatic kind of crew. Oh, to have survived this long they probably must have some degree of moderation. Otherwise another band of old monsters would have put them down by now. But while Great Strycht was further into the inner ring than say, Lotow, it was far from the heartlands. I tended to compare it to Marchford, in my mind. An important city, given the lake if loomed over, but not a major player – like Laure, Liesse and Vale had once been in Callow. The Longstrides could come in here and expect to be the biggest kids on the block because, well, they actually would be. Now, combine that with the way drow usually behaved whenever they stood even an inch over another drow and throw in that their cabal hunted powerful entities for sport? The moment someone gave them lip they'd answer with blades, and from there it would escalate. Sigil-holders would know what they were dealing with and likely withdraw if given the chance, but to be able to do that they'd need to have a clear idea of what was going on and the presence of mind to make that decision.

Both were pretty rare things, when in the middle of an all-out battle that would determine whether you and your tribe survived the night.

Akua had called it fighting fire with fire, when I'd put forward the notion, but I disagreed. That implied a degree of control we wouldn't have after the blades came out. It was more like... fighting a battle by starting another half-dozen battles. I didn't have to win, not exactly. I just had to lose less than everyone else. Just enough that I got to take home the prize when the dust settled. We'd used our last few days to put the pieces in motion for what Diabolist scathingly named Operation Damage Control, all coming to a head on the day we believed the Longstride Cabal would arrive. Spending the last night with Indrani should have cleared my mind, but instead when the hour came I had a fresh worry to chew over. I still believed that the plan, if it could be called that, would serve its purposes. There would be setbacks, but I still had cards up my sleeves. I hadn't wasted my days since Great Lotow, or forgot the hard lesson the duel with Mighty Urulan had taught me. If I fought the same way I had since claiming my mantle, I would lose. Badly. Preparations had been made accordingly. But that wasn't the worry, was it? There was only one thing I knew this morning I hadn't last night.

Sve Noc would act. Not down the line, not through intermediaries. She'd strike, today and straight at me. If this really was a death match for Below's favour, then the chosen would have to bleed. And that changed the nature of this battle, didn't? I did not feel like a coincidence, that's she'd shown her hand only this late. When the wheels were already turning and it was too late to stop them.

"A good morning to you, dearest."

I did not turn or reply. Behind me the camp was stirring for war, preparing to march. Below me plains of half-dried mud stretched out all the way to the distant plateaus and hills of Great Strycht. My fingers drummed against the hilt of my sword, the gesture failing to settle me. Diabolist was not offended by my lack of reply, simply coming to stand by my side.

"Did you enjoy yourself, at least?" Akua drawled.

I glanced at her, eyebrow rising. Did she... Well, I supposed it hadn't been the most discreet of trysts. Drow senses were shaper than those of humans, even those that weren't Mighty, and the shade's were sharper still.

"Sve Noc paid a visit to my dreams," I said.

I had no intention of discussing how I spent my nights with Akua Sahelian. She was not the Scribe to my Calamities, part of us in her own way. I would not forget how she had come into my service, no matter how useful. Or how tiring. That was the part that surprised me, how tiring it could be to hate Diabolist. The Doom of Liesse was reminder enough, but sometimes it felt like I was flogging myself with the memory of it.

As, no doubt, she intended.

"Her purpose?" she asked.

Whatever whimsy there'd been was gone. She understood perhaps even better than me the seriousness of that.

"Information," I said. "About what I'd do with the drow, if I led them out of the Everdark. About how I'd deal with the Heavens if they meddled."

Scarlet eyes tightened.

"That such an entity would consider surrender is highly unlikely," she said, pausing to allow me to contradict her.

Both assessing and fishing for fresh information with the same sentence. Fucking Praesi, I thought half-admiringly.

"She was definitely hostile," I said. "And tried to overcompensate when I caught her out. All doom and damnation. But she slipped up – there's two of them, I'm almost certain. And they're not necessarily aligned in their opinions."

"Now that is rather interesting," Akua said. "I had previously assumed that her lack of action was the result of either rules or indifference. Power akin to a god's does tend to come with the limitations of one."

I raised a skeptical eyebrow at her.

"I got a pat on the back and a badge from that order's grandmaster and I'm not feeling all that constrained," I noted.

"You've only ever used a fraction of your power," Diabolist said, and raised her hand to prevent me from replying to that. "For good reason, I am aware. The alienation would endanger you. Yet that is why such entities have seats of power, Catherine. The Dead King rules the Serenity. The Priestess of Night rules the Everdark, or close enough. There is a reason my ancestors raised pyramids to gather power, darling one. The summit stands on the steps, and is greater for it."

"I do rule a kingdom, Akua," I reminded her. "You know, little place between Praes and Procer? There was a coronation a while back, in between the constant fucking wars."

"Ah, but do you rule it as Sovereign of Moonless Nights?" she said. "Hardly. Even the Wild Hunt are merely in your service, not true vassals. You bound neither the Woe nor the realm to your mantle."

"Making Arcadia but worse out of my home isn't exactly in the works, yes," I flatly replied.

"And so you have not grown roots," Diabolist said. "An apotheosis incomplete, so to speak. Did you not wonder why the Grey Pilgrim and his ilk are so desperate to remove you from the throne?"

"I'm a villain ruling Callow," I said. "I don't believe we need to revisit the whole Calernian balance of power argument, Gods know I'm tired of hearing about it."

"The Carrion Lord ruled it for decades," Akua said. "And, to be frank, the legitimacy of your rule is only marginally better."

I frowned. It was a pretty sparse forest she was describing to me, and as a rule I tended to think I understood heroes better than she did. But she was a villain, in a way I'd never really been. From a people who'd been fighting heroes for centuries. She might not always be right, she often wasn't, but once in a while her perspective did allow her to see things I didn't.

"Roots," I said. "That's what you're implying. The Peregrine worries about me growing roots in Callow."

"It is one thing to slay a villainous queen of Callow," Diabolist said. "Quite another to seek the destruction of the immortal Black Queen, the wintry personification of centuries of her people's grudges. The first is a threat. The second is another Dead King, one whose armies can march through the realm of the fae."

"He knows," I said, then hesitated. "Or at least suspects that I intend to abdicate."

"And so you were handled with gloves," Akua said. "Deals and stories, marching armies instead of a Choir unleashed. You ascribe this to the man being reasonable, but he is a hero. If that decision was made, it was made because he feared that cornering you would see you tumbling through the threshold of apotheosis complete."

Or he could have been genuinely trying to limit the damages the country would suffer. If he had started calling on Choirs, I'd have needed to escalate accordingly. But when the pivot came, I thought, he backed Hasenbach. Backed the crusade victorious at all costs. He was willing to play within certain boundaries, but only so long as he'd win. The trouble with Akua was she would be convincing even if she was wrong, because she was a persuasive person period. I was unwilling to put any stock in it before I had Hakram and maybe Masego serving as advocated for the opposite thought.

"Doesn't matter," I said. "For now, the war is down here. And it's Sve Noc we're facing."

"Part of her, at least," Diabolist mused. "I wonder if the simplest answer is truly the correct one."

"Simplest?"

"One is the pyramid," Akua smiled. "The other standing atop it."

A rider and a horse, I thought. I'd considered that as well.

"It would explain why we're not fighting the Night," I said. "Just something using it."

"Strife, mother of a thousand opportunities," she quoted in Mthethwa.

An old proverb I would have been able to name the home of even if she'd spoken it in Lower Miezana.

"I need you to do something for me," I said.

She turned to face me completely. In Masego that would have been a notice I had his full attention, but with her I always had that. Even when she pretended otherwise.

"I had role given in the battle to come," Akua said.

"I know," I said. "But this is more important."

"And what exactly do you need of me, dearest?" she asked.

There were a lot of ways I could have answered her. Some true, others euphemisms or a hundred different shades of flippant. It'd helped me over the years, the quips. Allowed me to make it a joke or a game, anything but a reality so often ugly. But if I was to let the monster off her leash, then she should be given her due.

"Folly," I said.

Akua Sahelian smiled, and in that smile lay the promise of things great and terrible to behold.

---

*erraticerrata*

Character contest continues: Juniper vs Warlock. Link to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16852975?fbclid=IwAR3UaE1yMW0pBbz0L0LjGzBa9oVsmblpwYophs1BZTZj\_JYmeDs3ElAXbE

Dainpdf

Poor Juniper, having to fight Warlock just after we had a fond send-off, with her having been offscreen for quite a while.

Oh, and could we have a link to the updated bracket, please?

Dainpdf

Huh. Surprisingly tied, as of now. With Juniper winning. Unexpected.

FactualInsanity

Not really. Warlock was cool and powerful, and ooohh, and aaaaahhh, but he was never likable. Now if it was Juniper vs 'Loshe, given the development his death revealed it would probably have been a landslide, but Wekesa? The end was flashy, but didn't reveal much more substance than we already knew he had.

Dainpdf

Eh. I liked the insight we got into where his priorities lay. In the end, the thing that most mattered to the man who had all that power at his fingertips, who cared so little about any morals and any laws of man, who always said none of the wars really mattered because the true concern was the nature of Creation, was his son. Family.

If that is not a great humanization of a character we were introduced to as a monster, ineffable, alien in his thinking and completely evil in his actions, I don't know what is.

Compared to that, Juniper has mostly been in the background since the College, and even then we really got her mostly through her function: she's the general.

FactualInsanity

If that had been a revelation at the end, it would have been a poignant point. But we knew that about Wekesa practically since we were introduced to him. It was implied in everything stated about the backstory of Masego. In how he threatened Cat if his son should ever come to harm. Etc. etc.

So it didn't change my opinion of him, because it didn't reveal anything new. He was human and relatable from the get go. He was also a jerk, to pretty much anyone who was not part of his family, from the get go. Even before he casually stranded who knows how many legionaries in a Hell without notice, because he couldn't be bothered to think of them as living beings and at least warn them about it.

Yeah, Juniper is more background noise than fully fleshed out character, but at least she's likable.
:shrug:

FactualInsanity

I don't know what happened to the bold tag there. Only the initial "If" was supposed to be bolded. My apologies.

Dainpdf

Being likable does not figure into it so much as being interesting, for me. It's much easier to make a character likable than believable.

As for Wekesa caring about his son: yes, we knew about it, but not necessarily the extent of depth. Masego was almost all he could think about the whole chapter; we finally see Warlock a bit unsure what to do, and it's when deciding how to talk to his son after all that's happened. Plus, he arguably died due to how muhh effort he expended looking after Masego.

FactualInsanity

Well, the poll asks "who is your favourite character", not "who is the most interesting character." So you're bound to have wildly differing voting priorities. At the end of the day for me Wekesa wasn't as interesting and impactful as he was for you. Which is fine. That's exactly what we're voting for! 😊

HandyCapped

It was pretty much revealed in it's fullness at the trap of diverging paths or whatever it was. Remember how his death was described?

Dainpdf

In a way? This did not include the point about just how much thought and effort he's constantly putting into his family.

Screwfloss

I'm not sure you understand what a "popularity contest" is.

You do get how worthless a metric it is, at least.

Dainpdf

The thing is, at least as I interpreted it, they meant "likeability as a person" – which doesn't really matter, because I'm not looking for a friend, I'm looking for a character.

I don't really decide on whether I like a character based on whether I'm rooting for them or whether I'd like them if I were to meet them.

Granted, the fact that a character can get one to root for them can be an indicator that the character is deep and interesting, but it's still an associated symptom and not the actual qualities.

stevenneiman

Juniper has a realistic but simple character. All she has ever cared about is the study of war, and everything she's done has been a reflection of that. We've been introduced to her through her function because her personality in a very real way IS her function.

Dainpdf

And so she is... Not one-dimensional, but close. And while that may be realistic (is it?) it certainly does not make her very interesting or... I'd say human, but then I risk confusion because she is not a human. I guess person-like will suffice.

Shequi

That's not true though: She cares about family; see her questions to Cat about her mother when the idea of open rebellion against the tower were first raised, and her reaction to her mothers' death.

goliath1303

Tied but with a winner is definitely a situation I've never heard of before...

stevenneiman

Not actually unbelievable that Juniper is winning. I think there's a degree of tribalism among the fans, so characters in her faction have a distinct advantage even if the other character is cool. Still with the similarities I noted and the Cat-support offset by the tragic death, it's really anyone's race at this point.

Also, assuming the link works properly,

<http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805>

Dainpdf

To be expected. We're seeing this from Cat's side, so we naturally identify.

Rey d`Tutto

Do we have any Anthropologists inna house?
'Cause y'all (and myself, but not me or I) tend to try to dissect & discern the folks that populate this here Fiction, attempting to figger out motives and aspirations based on what they sez, either within Cat's perception or from an Interlude of some other character's perspective... This here Work is populated by characters a bit more varied than the population enjoying reading and either applauding or denigrating the Author's style, intent, depiction, characterization, world-building, etc..., But we all get along, even if we disagree. I like that.

lennymaster

We simply all agree that minor differences in personal preference aside Guide is quite simple the next best thing since sliced bread.

My kindle library holds more than a thousand books and I have read or am still reading more than a dozen webserials, but none, not Legion of Nothing, Metaworld, Mother of Learning or even Super Powered when it was still going has captivated me even remotly as much as Guide does.

There are books, that surpass Guide in specific elements, such as worldbuilding (Honor Harrington), character development (Anita Blake), humor (ChaoSeeds) or magic/skill/tech system (Schooled in Magic). But none have such a cosistendly high level in all these and more aspects.

AVR

It doesn't matter a whole lot whether Warlock or Juniper wins anyway; the winner just gets to lose to Vivienne.
Thanks for the link BTW.

stevenneiman

ooh, this one's tough.

The interesting thing is that in many ways they're very similar, aside from Wekesa's tribalism. They each have a single interest and everything they do is either in pursuit of that interest or else a way to get distractions and wastes of time out of the way so they can return to their interest. Both are cultivated as allies because that interest is very useful for war, even by the few people they consider friends.

naturalnuke

I mean, Wekesa gets my vote for both going out with a bang, and doing it to save his son.

And that was a hell of a bang...

stevenneiman

I voted for him because he's more interesting, and I tend to vote for the character I consider more nuanced and interesting (which is why I supported Vivi against Willy). but it was a tough call.

sutortyrannus

More of a snap than bang, I'd say. 😊

Ternbugkle

Looking forward to his Son finding out, I expect great and terrible things.

Lightning splitting the very atoms of water to make a hydrogen and oxygen cloud that explodes leaving heroes briefly on a dry sea bottom before it collapses back on all sides leaving them crushed by the depths.

HandyCapped

Would require a metric fuckton of magical juice. Considering that the separation is more costly and assuming that in using magic there is inefficiency, it's better just to conjure up some kind of magical bang.

mavant

It's not even clear that our molecular chemistry applies in this world, really.

Nordvegr

I don't suppose convincing can be done to keep polls open for longer? I work long shifts and have missed several despite my desire to vote, and I don't get my two hours off work unless it's a government election.

ruduen

Something Something Vote Something!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Hooo, boy. Hard to say if there's going to be a city left afterward, if Diabolist's getting to play around that much...

warriormonk19

I'm hoping to see us beat Ward in the yearly votes as well. We're only ~700 votes behind!

NerfGlastigUaine

Yes! As I've been saying last few chapters, we must dominate ALL categories! Come on guys, we can do it!

Nuke_The_Earth

Interesting bit about voting, if you constantly refresh your vote it only counts as one, whereas if you let it expire then vote again, it'll count multiple times.

Aston W

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Antoninjohn

You win the battle by starting another dozen battles

beleester

The Foundling Gambit – set everything on fire and hope that you're less flammable than your opposition.

mavant

Credit where it's due, I think this is the Dan McNinja gambit.

Rey d`Tutto

I thought it was the Dr. McNinja method?

mavant

IIRC it was his father who suggested it and did it first.

Javvies

Letting Akua off her leash seems like a terrible idea, even loosening it seems like a terrible idea.

On the other hand, collateral damage isn't going to be a major issue, and there aren't really any noncombatants or anything Cat cares much about keeping safe or avoiding damaging.

Huh. I wonder if Akua's right about the possibilities if Cat were to more fully embrace her position.

Dainpdf

Well... as Akua herself said, there is good reason Cat isn't doing that. I suspect there is also more to it. The form of apotheosis Akua described, where alienation turns Cat into a glorified fae queen, essentially puts her back within the schema of the Gods.

As for letting Diabolist loose... Yeah. If I were to play devil's advocate (sounds appropriate, considering who we're discussing), I'd say that maybe this redirects stories about Akua being let loose into one's where she destroys Cat's enemies, but at a terrible cost, instead of ones where she destroys Cat.

naturalnuke

Familiarity breeds ambivalence!

Or was it contempt?

Dainpdf

Familiarity breeds exhaustion.

Dylan Tullos

Javvies:

Thief just woke up screaming "Don't do it, Cat! Don't do it!".

She has no idea why.

This is pretty much the exact opposite of what Cat promised Thief. Instead of keeping Akua firmly under control, she put her in charge of the drow. Now she's instructing her to do a Llesse on a drow city.

At this point, I think Akua is probably the most important member of the Woe. She's constantly with Catherine, she advises her on everything from magical rituals to affairs of state, and she's basically Cat's Chancellor.

Notably, Cat has become much more Evil while working closely with Akua. She's forced Mighty into contracts that are slavery in all but name, drowned thousands of lesser drow, and she's currently planning to unleash the Butcher of Llesse. When Thief finds out about this, she might justifiably conclude that Catherine isn't listening to her at all, and start looking for alternatives to a Queen whose closest adviser is Akua Sahelian.

daegone823

She has protected drow from the dwarves
-is removing a tyrant who caused the downfall of her own race just for power (effectively stopping another dead king from rising)
- managed to curry yet more war assets and possibly a contract with dwarves who never work with evil empires
-All while keeping her fae side in check

Letouriste

Both your comments show clearly how facts can be shown in completely different ways. All depend of the narrator

Euodiachloris

Funny how subjectivity works. 😊

MetruX

And even funnier how people tend to ignore the subjective nature of some things to say their own perception is better... We all do it, especially when we don't notice x)

NerfGlastigUaine

We all say our own perception is better, the question is whether we back up our perceptions with facts and logically sound arguments while also acknowledging the subjectivity of the matter or we ignore every argument we don't like.

HandyCapped

Not solely narration. Press armies have always been common, both in our universe and in-universe. This is practically a voluntary press army(which already wars against the idea of a press army and alleviates the situation), where they get their most sought after recourse in spades as a trade. This all has a nice extra of saving their race from fire sure extinction. It's arguably not very nice, but make no mistake, despite Cat's philosophical flagellation, this is **very** far from slavery. Indentured servency at worst, something a lot better at best.

Now, letting the butcher of Liesse run free for a while is probably against their earlier agreement, but the reason and situation is completely different, too. That's important in a world extremely dependent of setting. Only future will tell on that one.

Dylan Tullos

HandyCapped:

You can make a case for Ivah and the lesser drow who volunteered to take oaths in exchange for power. I agree that's indentured servitude rather than slavery.

But the Mighty that Cat trapped in Arcadia didn't "volunteer" at all; she stranded them in Arcadia until they agreed to take oaths. Cat trapped them in a dangerous situation and offered to "rescue" them if they accepted her nonnegotiable terms. That's the very definition of slavery.

Before Thief left, she told Cat not to trust Akua and not to let her off the leash. Akua is now running the drow for Cat, and she's about to carry out another Llesse for Cat.

RanVor

You know, it all sounded very reasonable until I remembered how you argued for genocide of the Praesi some time ago. The Drow are basically Praesi High Lords, but more overtly murderous, so do they deserve to be exterminated or not? Or does it depend on who's doing the exterminating?

daegone823

I thought the Woe's whole motive was to break apart systems in place "a woe unto all", whereas the Calamities were to subjugate and exert pressure on systems through might makes right. Whereas one is meant to control a system already in place ushering in a sort of forced peace the other is throwing an explosive at a machine that while old has functioned for eons.

In this respect the Black Queen has not deviated from the modus operandi of the Woe and has kept to there breaking of systems through the most efficient means.

There is probably a fallacy in here somewhere though.

RanVor

What are you even talking about? I was just pointing out hypocrisy, that's all.

TeK

Well I was waiting for a battle, but got a cliffhanger. Still, interesting chapter, especially the perspective on Peregrine.

ALazyMonster

The weekly formula is that there is almost always a cliffhanger on Friday, sometimes an interlude is in its place, you can kinda predict where the breaks are going to be because of that. Behold the meta-story of the book about people who try and meta-game fate/stories.

TeK

Nah, I'm just salty that I'm going hiking for the next week or so, and I wanted to leave on some satisfying moment, I dunno. It's personal stuff.

Oshi

Its not news about the Peregrine though at least not to anyone but Cat. We were shown from the beginning just what he is and what he will do. He told us so himself when he spoke to the Cutter of all things.

IDKWhoitis

This isn't so much breaking the chess board over the head of the opposition, as really setting fire to the opposition then stabbing them in the eyes with their own queen and king.

I wonder if Akua's reasoning is why Grey freaked out when Akua was inhabiting Cat's body. Did he think that he had failed, or that Cat had taken another step further down the ladder? Like can he see Akua's soul or did he only notice a change in Cat's?

naturalnuke

Well being that Cat's soul was so fucked up that Cat's mind shattering like a glass under pressure just made her feel refreshed(refer to Masego giving her knowledge from Shard), I find it hard to imagine the Grey Pilgrim would notice that any one of the many patchwork stitches of her soul having more control than another.

---

I'm pretty sure he knew it was Akua from the fery beginning. Consider their exchange in interlude Kaleidoscope VI (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/06/04/kaleidoscope-vi/>):

Catherine's body isn't looking any different from usual, here, so the Pilgrim must be looking at the soul. There's a chance that he meant that Catherine's transformation when so deep into Winter is troubling, but he's already shown he can ignore this if necessary. In contrast, Akua's soul being long extracted, bound to a cloak's collar and then shoved into Catherine's body is definitely something that would catch his attention.

"What needed to be done," the Black Queen calmly replied. "My side doesn't get to walk away clean, Pilgrim. I see you've been tossing around resurrections like they're godsdamned solstice treats, too. Charming. Not going to have any long-term ramifications at all."

The monster paused, then leaned forward.

Akua's response may be interpreted both as telling the Pilgrim that him putting his hand to the scales was a narrative invitation for her to get "resurrected" as well, and as offer for him to think about actually resurrecting her at a later date.

"Surrender," the Great Elder said. "Abdicate. It is not too late."

Tariq replies with pretty much the same conditions that were constantly offered to Catherine, confirming to the Diabolist that a redemption into a Good name is still an option, and gets the same kind of retort.

"You would argue this, after slaying thousands?" the Pilgrim asked.

"I feel like we might need to revisit the concept of foreign invasion," the villain noted. "Specifically the part where it has fucking consequences. Like, you know, people dying. You'd think that one would be a given, but apparently you're slow learners. Wahwah, my attempt to conquer a – sort of – sovereign nation wasn't met with flowers and a godsdamned parade. It's almost like we're not happy about the whole thing. Go figure."

I'd like to point out that the phrasing "You would argue this, after slaying thousands?" implies that casualties inflicted by Catherine personally are significantly larger than the ones inflicted by the armies, which isn't true. However, if he's addressing Akua, then this turns into a reminder that he can't simply leave alone a mass-murderer who killed more people than the both present armies combined. When hearing an extended (and roundabout) explanation of why she considers herself already having suffered consequences of her failed conquest, he responds with understandably sceptical "And you think your reign a better alternative?"

"Hells, Pilgrim, I was born to rule," the Black Queen replied with a toothy grin. "But I'll settle for getting you fucks out of my backyard, this once. Any takers?"

The monster's gaze swept across the crowd of Bestowed as she idly emptied her pipe and put it away within her cloak. The only answer was Light blooming and weapons raised.

Akua straight up says she was born to rule Hells. I know she kicks ass in this chapter, but I can't wrap my head around everybody in the comment section missing it. At best some people remarked that this phrase is out of character for Catherine. But after Akua realizes he wouldn't budge on the subject, draws the line of what she considers her due and effectively closes the negotiation, she doesn't harm heroes that much either! Her section of the interlude starts with her musing about playing a hero herself, and then she proceeds to throw around attacks an average hero would easily shrug off. The only serious attacks are on people who have a healer on hand (Silent Guardia, Forsworn Healer) or heavy hitters (Saint of Swords).

NZPIEFACE

Holy shit, I didn't see that "I was born to rule."

- 1) She's letting her Akuaness flow out into her disguise, I find that highly unlikely.
- 2) She's trying to make Catherine a permanent fucking sovereign. Seeing this chapter...

medailyfun

Nope, trying to view Pilgrim's words as directed to Akua is just like trying to view Cat's words to Athal as directed to Malicia. A doubt he would try to appeal to Akua's conscience.

>Akua's response may be interpreted both as telling the Pilgrim that him putting his hand to the scales was a narrative invitation for her to get "resurrected" as well, and as offer for him to think about actually resurrecting her at a later date

It just does not make sense, she did not need resurrection at that moment and I doubt she implied herself being killed any soon. I believe the ramifications that would disturb Pilgrim's dreams were about his resurrection leaving people 'different', that was mentioned somewhere later in the text.

---

> Nope, trying to view Pilgrim's words as directed to Akua is just like trying to view Cat's words to Athal as directed to Malicia.

Now see here, take a look at these quotes and tell me, who are they directed at: a random servant that is irrelevant in the greater scheme of things (by his own admission) or an ally that she regrets moving from "unreliable" into the "has to die for any of this to work" category.

"Negotiations can fail," the dark-haired woman replied. "I knew it was one of the possible outcomes even before I learned there'd be opposition."

"Now you sound like him," the Black Queen said, rolling her eyes. "I can realize when I've been outbid. Malicia was always going to be willing to go that extra mile I'd balk at. We'll see in a year whether the Dead King feels like riding a different horse."

"I'm freeing you as of right now," the young woman said, and clapped his shoulder gently. "That should be within my rights, I think. And you're certainly welcome to tag along, if you want."

"Callow," she said. "Back home."

That'd been a lie, he thought. The tells were there, though much harder to pick up on than before. There must have been more to her short conversation with the herald of the Crown than a mere dismissal.

"I'm not going to make you, Athal," she said patiently. "I genuinely think you'll be better off with us, but I can see why you wouldn't want to leave and I'm not going to force you. I meant it, when I said you're free. You can decide for yourself."

"I guessed that'd be your answer," she said. "You were a kind and pleasant host, Athal. I hope you'll be treated as you deserve here."

Morgenstern

Totally out of character for Catherine to be that scheming...

AKA To me, she totally talks like someone who would have liked a slave that was gifted to her to go free, one she liked at that (and, as an only scheming notion for a NOT-schemer like Cat, one who might have important information about the Dead King and his realm after all, even if he himself does not see how he, the menial servant (who gets around very much) could be that important). Nothing in there hints at her having understood she was talking to Malicia herself. Being Cat, she would otherwise directly have CALLED HER Malicia. And not spoken to said servant OF Malicia.

If we would have to interpret that as you suggest – that would be AKUA talking there and not Cat. It simply does not fit Cat's character description to the reader at all to be talking like THAT if she had understood it was Malicia. What she WAS thinking, though, was that she might be talking to the DEAD KING himself. That HE was taking over Athal (at least at times). And that suspicion was made rather obvious as one Cat DID have, directly in the text... Thus, Athal has more importance than he implies, aka, yes, she IS speaking to someone who is of more import (through either the knowledge he was, unwittingly, or contrary to what he claims – or him being the Dead King or being an earpiece for the Dead King that He listens through) – but it not's because she somehow suspects *Malicia* behind that.

Morgenstern

Second that one. I also view it as a direct reference to him talking about "what have you done to your soul" -> she basically replies "hells, what have YOU done to OTHER PEOPLE'S souls".

Morgenstern

Ehrm... Shows strange and not quite as visible as it should have been here... that (first!) comment starting with "Second that one" was related to medailyfun's post.

Whereas, the second one (starting with "Totally out of character for Catherine to be that scheming..."), which is shown above the actual first one... is related to .. ehrm.. the post from the person with a blue something and no name (I guess the dashes are supposed to be the comments nickname?)..

Drunken Dwarf

The thing is though if the Pilgrim had noticed it was Akua, or even someone else controlling Cat's body, he would have destroyed Cat story wise. What I got out of this dialogue was that the Pilgrim was trying for a story set up where the hero's go into the villian/monster's domain and slay it. Akua was defending Cat's war acts and her position of rule to muddle the monster story he was going for. Even Akua's leak at the end, which really was a cheeky play on words against the Pilgrims truth telling, would fall under defending Cat's rule. It's honestly scary how well Akua played the Pilgrim's story, while acting as Cat, so much so that he decided it would be better to let the Saint do her thing rather than speak.

Although I do have to agree that it looks like Akua might be going for a redemption story herself, maybe even trying to steal or benefit from Cat's.

Jane

I'm reminded of how Ivah already views Akua... The story of how a vicious shade leveled a city in the Underdark is going to be a particularly dark Drow legend for ages to come. Or it would, if the story of how the Drow left the Underdark wasn't already going to be filled with legends.

Incidentally, "The immortal Black Queen, the wintry personification of centuries of her people's grudges" sounds like the perfect description of Cat already. Pilgrim is right to be worried, and probably should have called down a Choir on Cat's head. Not that it would have helped, given that she's the main character, but at least he'd have felt he'd done everything he could.

Dainpdf

Well, the issue is that, on one, Cat is **not** a personification. And that's good – means she's still reasonably human and thus has free will. Unlike the Fae.

As for calling on choirs, it is inviting Cat to escalate as well, with catastrophic collateral damage to both the country and the army, which they need for the Crusade. And/or put Cat against the wall, from whence she can rise as a demigod.

daegone823

Pilgrim called on a plague was that because Black was using his aspect of lead so much or did black during the time he was waiting on his ship with all the corpses figure out the Pilgrim's trick and think that he can also do an equal trick as the below can interfere when good interferes.

Dainpdf

I think that only applies to direct intervention. The plague was just the Pilgrim revealing that he's more than a single trick – he's the Good side's Wekesa. Or Zeze, as you will.

Jonnnnz

I am still not giving Pilgrim any slack for using biological weapons. I get that good in this world means

"advances the plan of the gods above" rather than anything to do about behavior (else Champion would be a villain for basically murdering whoever she feels like, and Adjutant would clearly be a hero for a Name that is all about helping someone else)... But straight up mass murder outside of combat in order to improve his chances of winning is basically Liesse with heavenly approval

Dainpdf

Not disputing that. One may argue he killed less people and the objective was defense, or that Black was already harming civilians and so this served the greater good, but the act was still abhorrent.

Nafram

Well, this should be interesting. This confrontation could see our time in the Everdark come to an abrupt end, should Sve Noc be slain here and not in the seat of her power. It fits, in an odd way, the Longstride Cabal is the strongest force Drow have to offer save for Sve Noc herself, and they are coming to play on the decisive battle, furthermore, if Cat's certainty is to be believed, the Big Bad herself is coming to the party too. Should Cat win, then the Everdark has no more cards to play, and that means an endgame is upon us. Of course, it could be that Sve Noc escapes with the greatest among the Longstride Cabal and unifies the rest of the Drow under her banner for a final battle, so there's that

Dainpdf

I assume this is only their first clash. There could be up to three of them.

The meta reason to end it abruptly, of course, is the fact that we're 70 chapters into this book, but given the amount of chapters we've had that didn't really move the plot forward much I don't think EE is much concerned about that.

Kirroth

So the battle plan is intended to follow Cat's usual pattern, as other characters have often commented on. To cause as much chaos as possible with the expectation that her foes will suffer from it worse than she and at the end she'll be bloodied but standing at the top of the heap. It plays to her strengths but is getting a little predictable.

Or should I say, that WAS the battle plan. Now there's a new one. One that calls back to Akua's Folly in scope or intent. Which is a frightening thought even if it means her chances of success have gone up. Being too repetitive is a bad tactic and a worse narrative.

Dainpdf

When "causing chaos" becomes predictable, there are two options. Cause order, to surprise the enemy... Or ramp the chaos up to unprecedented levels.

I think we know which one Cat has chosen.

Skaddix

Hmm makes me wonder if Akua will try to take the power of Sve... assuming her Pyramid theory is correct. Not exactly impossible since Cat really doesn't understand much about magic although Archer does but if Archer is not close enough.

Dainpdf

She **has** been forbidden to partake in Night. We can only hope that impedes or at least stalls such a plot.

I have also considered that the Sve may have or will visit Akua's dreams and propose treason in exchange for... Well, probably just a change of master, but then Akua gets to pull a Kairos and backstab the Sve as well.

NZPIEFACE

She's been forbidden from partaking in it, but what about literally being it?
What if her plan here is to turn herself and Cat into a new hybrid Sve Noc of both Winter and Night.

Sovereign of the Moonless Night, after all.

Dainpdf

Hopefully she needs to imbibe it to become it? Or the inability to do so makes it harder?

As for becoming a dual being... I guess? It doesn't seem to be exactly how the Sves work, though. Seems like one is the Domain itself, or something like that.

NZPIEFACE

Dunno man, might actually make it easier. Like, imagine if Akua took part in Night. Sve Noc would have influence over her.

Since she doesn't, it would mean that Sve Noc can't intervene with Akua from the inside.

Aston W

Winter is coming. Twice. Or Death City. 2.

Aotrs Commander

No, she did that last night.

I am not sorry.

Dainpdf

Well, we do know the Pilgrim does not mind a little civilian slaughter to make his omelets.

However, it does not mean he didn't also wish to limit civilian slaughter. After all, when he argued for moderation it was never by saying Cat would escalate, always by pointing out her well-intentioned core.

I suspect that Above certainly has weighed things the way Cat thinks, and that it was a factor in the Peregrine's thinking. He has the learning to know of apotheosis.

But that does not mean that sparing lives did not also figure into it.

Besides that... Cat is crossing a lot of lines, here. Indentured servitude, shaking hands with genociders (and helping them), and now Folly? Below must be happy.

Dylan Tullos

Dainpdf:

Have you noticed that Akua agrees with pretty much all of Cat's decisions lately? That's a red flag.

Dainpdf

Her approval **should** fill Cat with shame. Also worry, because she made her career on exploiting that kind of thinking.

nipi

Aaaand we are seeing a lack of such emotional pangs.

Dainpdf

The slippery slope is noticeably slicker when you get ice involved.

Skaddix

Well Archer also made this point. Sure Cat likes to think of herself as pretty Neutral but there is no true Neutral in this World. You either High With Above or Down with Below. Sure you can be less or more in either Direction but I don't the Gods lets you play it that neutral when you are a major player. Ranger gets away with it because she is small time player so even if she is slightly on the side with Below, she is not doing enough for Below or Above to care. By small time I mean ambition wise not power wise. She is like Goku, she only really cares about training and fighting the Best and her friends. The wider picture doesn't matter to her.

Cat though doesn't get to play neutral, she is taken the Mantle of Winter and Runs a "Good" Country. Its not really a shocker that Cat is slowly sliding to Villainy due to the Gods Below forcing her hand and having Akua whispering in her ear. Vivienne was the counterbalance against Akua but she is gone. Archer doesn't really care. Hakram and Masego are decidedly Evil. Just look at how hard Cat is struggling to convince herself she needs to get rid of Akua. Now that is not to say she won't because Akua will probably make a play to get free eventually but if Akua just stayed as useful advisor probably not. Especially since Akua is the only one Cat has on her team with a knowledge of Politics. And that is honestly why Vivienne is in trouble in my book long term. Cause Long term she doesn't really do much. Her spy network someone else can run and her combat utility is useful but limited. Maybe her recent change will fix that but I am not sure a clash is inevitable with her as the only Goodish character surrounded by Evil or Neutral at Best.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Uhm... The Hierach just pick the 3rd option so there are choices between upstairs and downstairs.

Skaddix

Did he the way I see he forced the Bard out but the Bard did get him off his behind and into the game.

Morgenstern

Uhm yeah... and his reply in getting off his ass was not to *chose* any of the sides, but a big fat FUCK YOU to BOTH sides...

Morgenstern

Choose... *sigh

Dainpdf

Archer is pretty firmly on the Neutral side of things. She's not got a stake in the game of the Gods, nor does her Role bind her to either side.

Cat doesn't seem to have issues with arguing she needs to kill diabolist. She's just getting tired of the constant mental vigilance necessary to live with an adversarial master manipulator right over her shoulder.

As for Vivienne, she did contribute quite a bit in the past... And if the chess interludes were any indicator, she's going to get even more involved from now on.

Skaddix

I believe its been stated no Names are truly neutral by our writer. Some are simply closer to the middle line then others. But I agree she doesn't have a real stake in the Gods Game beyond being a Woe Member.

I am more saying the fact that Cat has to keep telling herself that and complains about the constant vigilance means in my book said vigilance will eventually slip up.

Eh no. Her biggest move was stealing the Sun combat wise. Beyond that even she herself notes that anyone non Named with skill could run the Spy Operation as well as she can. So her primary role has been the Good Angel on Cat's Shoulder. But in terms of overall value to the Woe when it comes to Military, Magic and Politics she doesn't really contribute much hence her crisis of faith with Hakram. My point is I don't think she is the least important Woe member as of now and I don't see that changing any time soon.

Dainpdf

I am not sure it will slip up in the sense I think you mean. As Cat said, she has an excellent reminder. She won't find herself liking and accepting Akua.

She might, however, lower her guard in the heat of the moment and get stabbed in the back.

As for Vivienne, she has a distorted view of her own usefulness – the crisis of faith with Hakram shows he valued her work more than she did.

Javvies

No instance of a given Name is neutral, but there are Names that can be a Heroic or a Villainous Named in different instances of the Name. I.e., Squire can be a Hero Name, usually leading into White Knight, or a Villain Name, usually leading into Black Knight. Likewise, the Names of Thief, Archer, Ranger, etc. are not alignment-locked. For that matter, I'm pretty sure Adjutant and Hierophant could end up being alignment-independent Names as well.

luminiousblu

"If Bai Qi [the guy who executed 200k surrendered prisoners of war effectively out of spite] agrees with your battle order, it should fill you with shame and is a red flag." That's basically what I'm hearing right now. It's a bad person with no moral fetters, so if you have his/her approval that means you're making a huge mistake. Note, however, that I haven't mentioned that he's the only general in his historical era to have not lost a single battle and died to political intrigues with almost a hundred victories under his belt.

You can call Akua evil – the Chinese called Bai Qi "heartless and without human decency". You can call her a monster – the Chinese called Bai Qi "the Butcher of Men". But you can't just not acknowledge her area of expertise and pretend that her plans are always bad simply because you don't like her, because even though everyone hated Bai Qi, people still honoured him as "Mars". Just because Akua agrees with a plan doesn't mean it's bad – I would argue that most of the time, if Akua thinks your plan is bullshit for reasons other than her values, then it's probably bullshit and that if she thinks it's good, it's probably at least decent.

This is the woman whose spellcraft is on par with Masego, whose acting nears Malicia, who played fucking everyone up until the very end of Second Liesse and who needed [four] named directly involved (Catherine, the Squire; Amadeus, the Black Knight; Vivienne, the Thief; and the decoy Amadeus, Assassin) to bring her down, one of which was also a Duchess of Winter, not including the bullshit she assembled outside which took on multiple legions, Warlock, Hierophant, Kegan, so on so forth and just about fought them to a standstill.

Dainpdf

You forget Akua did lose. And yes, she had all of those people take her down... because her methods ensured that many people would come to take her down.

It's called Akua's Folly for a reason. Because it was foolish. Plus, what Diabolist views as "effective" often translates to "diametrically opposed to Cat's whole life objective".

Getting approval from Akua is not like getting approval from Bai Qi. It's like getting approval from Napoleon when fighting for democracy in Russia in the winter.

You know he was great, but he also failed catastrophically, and his methods were adapted to his view – that of concentrating power in himself.

luminiousblu

I'm not denying she lost. I'm denying that her plans are bad. You have to remember that she lost, essentially, because of something not even Malicia or Black saw coming. Even then you basically needed a bunch of other bigwig Named to help. She lost, but she lost narrowly against overwhelming odds, which says something about what she can pull off when she set her mind to it.

>because her methods ensured that many people would come to take her down

And they still would have failed, had Winter not shown up out of nowhere and had Hierophant not evolved into Hierophant during the experience.

>it's called Akua's Folly for a reason

Because she lost and therefore it was folly, yes. But if anything is consistent in this work. it's that folly isn't folly until you actually lose. Winning is what matters – Akua lost, so her plan was foolish. It doesn't, however, negate all the other plans she put up, nor the sheer effectiveness it had in evening the otherwise overwhelming odds.

>diametrically opposed to Cat's whole life objective

If Catherine has such a poor grip on herself that she can't measure her own life objectives then she doesn't really deserve to make her own decisions. She has a relatively strong grip, though – which is why she views Akua's advice as something to be heeded carefully, but weighed against her own values. The entire point is that unlike the posters in the reply chain, Cat realizes Collar Fairy isn't stupid, and while she makes a few poor decisions once in a while, most of them are incredibly sound.

>Getting approval from Akua is not like getting approval from Bai Qi. It's like getting approval from Napoleon when fighting for democracy in Russia in the winter.

No, it isn't. It's like getting approval from Napoleon in a war situation. The only thing you'd take with a grain of salt is when he recommends invading a large land territory in the winter. Napoleon was a legendary general. He fucked up once and it was the end of him, but that doesn't mean that he wasn't the guy that entire nations avoided fighting. Akua's advice should be taken with a grain of salt. Disregarding her advice, or avoiding what she advises, is beyond stupid, because if Napoleon tells you that you should put your cannon on the left he's probably goddamn right.

Dainpdf

Akua would have lost anyways. She might not have lost to Cat, but she would have gotten pwned by the Pilgrim or some equivalent in short order.

Akua is a representative of the old breed of villain. A good one (whether as good as Kairos is up to debate – I think not), but still limited by that.

Oh, if Cat hadn't managed to kill her, and she had gotten through Black and the eventual Wekesa (which is not certain), she would have done a bunch of damage before Above put her down. But she would not win. She can't.

Also, Akua's plans only work if one cares exclusively about one's own power, or maybe something like the old Praesi customs. Something like what Cat wants, the preservation of lives? Using Akua's plans without curation would result in throwing the baby out with the bath water.

RanVor

Isn't it the entire point that the game is rigged and villains can't win no matter how good they are? This doesn't tell us anything about a actual quality of Akua's plans, only that the Heavens are unbeatable. But you're disregarding the fact that this is Evil vs. Evil situation and the Heavens are not going to interfere. In this case, Akua's plan might actually work very well and have relatively little long term consequences.

Dainpdf

No long term consequences? That's not how summoning at least three demons and opening a Greater Breach works.

As for whether Akua would have won, that's exactly my point. She might have won victory against Black and Warlock (though I doubt it), but she was charging headlong into all the stories and roles that saw her head on a Crusader's pike by the end of the month.

Taken overall, her methods do not succeed at reducing collateral damage, effecting lasting change, or keeping her alive.

As Cat said on chapter 54: "Fine, I didn't mean to impugn your talent at short-sightedly endangering the very fabric of Creation to try winning battles you ended up losing anyway on account of being kind of a fuckup."

RanVor

I'm sorry, but I can't honestly discuss anything if you keep changing the context of my argument to fit your your position instead of actually addressing it. This is not Second Liesse and you know it. The conditions are completely different. The Heavens won't defend the Drow. Also, Akua won't be completely free to do whatever she wants. That means no demons and no greater breaches.

Dainpdf

Well, you were the one who brought up her past as evidence of her effectiveness. My point was that Diabolist is good at a specific type of game, and that playing that game in itself is already a mistake. Cat has a lot to learn from Akua's toolbox, but to learn her outlook or general strategic sense would be disastrous.

RanVor

NOPE. You were the one who brought up her past as evidence of her ineffectiveness. I said her past is evidence of nothing. Second Liesse doesn't give us any indication whether Akua's methods would be effective IF THE HEAVENS WEREN'T A FACTOR, which is the case here. But you had to warp my argument into defending the Second Liesse. Again. I'm starting to think you're doing this on purpose.

Dainpdf

The point is that Akua's way of thinking wins battles and loses wars. Cat wants to win in the end – she wants to build something lasting.

Her thinking is also one that eschews mitigation and ignores collateral damage in favor of brutality. Also not something Cat would want to get in the habit of doing – she generally wants to keep at the very least her army, but normally also the battlefield.

Additionally, it's not about the Heavens. It's about the sort of story and Role into which Ubua naturally casts herself. Stories and Roles that end with her dead and her goals destroyed.

RanVor

And why those stories end like that? Because of the Heavens. Unless you honestly think Akua is now in charge (in which case I see no point in continuing this discussion), you have to see how far removed the current situation is from that. So why do you keep insisting it's relevant when it's not? The Second Liesse would have failed anyway because its ultimate target were the servants of the Heavens, and you just can't beat the Heavens. Fortunately, Cat has enough common sense not to use superweapons against the Heavens. Against the Drow, however? As long as Cat doesn't suddenly go batshit crazy, it's fair game.

Dainpdf

Stories are a thing, beyond the conflict of Good and Evil. Evil vs Evil has its stories as well. And, again, it's never about just this one battle. It's always about the war. Sure, the Heavens and their servants are unlikely to intervene in the Everdark, but narrative momentum gained down there still applies once Cat goes back to the surface.

As I said, this is the kind of thinking that contaminates. It looks like a good option because all the best poisons do. Much like absorbing the Night way back was a perfect solution and Cat didn't trust it, the old Praesi ways aren't something one should seek to emulate.

RanVor

Wrong. Stories are MADE OF Good and Evil, FOR Good and Evil, BY Good and Evil. They are literally patterns that have been repeated until they started to enforce themselves. Good always wins at the end not because that's how it should be, but because it's been happening for so long Fate has accepted it as a default state. Mainly because the Heavens have been cheating since the dawn of time.

Sure, the narrative momentum will at least partially carry over to the surface. But it will be narrative momentum of a different kind, because the conditions are much different and so is the story. Obviously you have no trust in Cat's ability to detect narrative pitfalls if you think she would not just approve of, but come out with such an initiative without seriously considering potential consequences first.

Dainpdf

There are stories involving Evil alone, and also stories involving more than one evil. There are stories involving Good by itself, and others involving neither party necessarily.

For one example, one might recall the stories that appeared in Second Llesse. No real Good side there. The stories in Arcadia didn't feature the opposition of Good and Evil but Summer and Winter... Stories are more than just that one conflict.

As for trusting Cat's ability to avoid bad narratives, I trust that she will dispose of Diabolist eventually and not go too far into her views, although it may take a loss or two. No one is perfect, but Cat seems very capable of learning from past mistakes.

RanVor

This discussion is getting increasingly pointless. Let's just agree to disagree.

Dainpdf

On the last point: Akua's overarching ideals, the first principles from which she builds her thought, are the problem. They sabotage her at the root, so that she is useful for her skillset as a toolbox, even for tactics, but not for strategic thinking.

Cat can use Diabolist to cast, word oaths, read people, or even make specific plots – and even in those cases curation is advised – but to have her advise the overall strategy is just a bad idea.

Hakurei06

Akua and Folly. Well this should be fun.

Someguy

“For though these armed men may carry banner and obey a prince, without justice they are only bandits.”

– Extract from “The Faith of Crowns”, by Sister Salienta

Incorrect. Without taxpayers giving them salaries they would just be bandits. “Justice” is the bullshit propaganda of whomever shouts the loudest at whichever period of time is politically profitable to do so.

FactualInsanity

While I am inclined to somewhat agree, a protectio racket would fulfil the salaries condition, but would not make them not-bandits.

I.e. it's somewhat more complicated than that. Justice may be a delusion, but the important bit is that it's a shared delusion.

Unorginal

Who are you preaching to here? You can debate the foundations of government elsewhere in a fic that isn't about there objectively being good and evil even if that good and evil don't exactly conform to human perception?

Kail

It's from an extract written by someone from the House of Light, they would obviously believe in their so-called “Justice”.

luminiousblu

Salienta is the poster girl for moralistic stateship. Her rival is the person who wrote this place's version of The Prince.

Rey d`Tutto

That would be the Dead King, the Hidden Horror, etc.

NZPIEFACE

I'm still wondering who she's going to give the throne to. I find Talbot a very unlikely candidate.

So she needs to find a candidate that can be a proper "Good" King/Queen for Callow. I feel like she'd have to weave her death into a narrative like that for it to be a proper story.

NZPIEFACE

I just realized she's probably going to fuck off to the Whitecaps after all this Callow stuff.
Natural defence for Callow. Snow. No one really claims it.

HannaB

she could be another Ranger: her own little circle that nobody is stupid enough to fuck with, the country she helped make off to the side keeping up diplomatic relations would be nice

medailyfun

I can see the parallels between Abigail story and one of Cat's alternative lives shown in four-fold something in Book III thus story-wise she becomes a good candidate

NZPIEFACE

I mean she'd be a Good queen, yeah, but I'm not too entirely sure about her ability to govern people.

WuseMajor

I'm betting Thief's name transition is to Queen.

NZPIEFACE

Is Queen even a Name? Names usually are long set into tradition, or come about as some unbelievable weight upon the world.

Rey d`Tutto

Queen of... Theft, Yoink, Spies, Grudges?

RanVor

That would make no sense. Callow already has a queen. Vivienne getting the Name of the Queen would send her on a narrative crash course with Cat. And no, it doesn't matter that Cat intends to abdicate. She's the queen NOW, and that's the only thing the narrative cares about.

Mental Mouse

Probably Viv, possibly Abigail. Or most likely, she learns to accept that the throne is her proper place.

TotesARealPerson

Anyone else worried that finally getting the Archer x Cat sexytimes payoff right before the big battle might have just set Archer up to die?

Zaver SaintCloud

Under normal circumstances, the rules we have seen regarding Stories would see that as a possibility. However, given that The Woe are slowly but surely replacing The Calamities, the death of any major Named in Cat's group seems highly unlikely (at least until the very end).

Exec

This chapter felt a bit less focused than recent ones, like a stream-of-consciousness ramble, but it was still interesting to see Cat's perspective on the battle ahead in full.

Hopefully the next chapter is "The Storm"!

RanVor

Oh man. Oh. Man. I can't wait to see how the Catherine's Folly plays out.

IDKWhoitis

My guess (probably far off the mark) is that Cat is about to imbue the Ice she is handing out, and the water around her, with "Still Water" magic to turn the whole city into a roving madhouse of death. With everyone dying and reanimating, no one is going to truly know the true scope of the attack.

Every Sigil is just going to think that another Sigil has allied with Cat and is attacking them with a "touch of winter", which while not wrong, probably wouldn't understand the practical differences between Winter fueling someone's power, or winter using someone Corpse as a construct.

The city will eat each other alive, and when Sve or Longstride shows up, they might try to slaughter the city wholesale as it seems like everyone is tainted by Cat. Thus forcing the city to their knees, and onto Cat's side by force.

Has just the right mix of Necromancy, Mass-Genocide, Chaos, and Psych-Warfare to qualify for a Catherine's Gambit or Akua's Folly depending on the angle.

Rup

immortal Black Queen, the wintry personification of centuries of her people's grudges.....

Now THAT sounds right for Cat. ..but she is dead set against it 😞

Euodiachloris

The fairy queen Callow didn't think it needed and certainly never wanted... But, once they got her, had to admit they paid for her in instalments over many, many generations because, well, she does fit like a glove. Also, nobody pays a grudge back quite like the Black Queen does.

---

Chapter 73: Feeder Bands

*"The rat it bites the rat
On the tail, the tail, the tail
The rat it does grow fat
And swell, and swell, and swell
But a rat will bite the rat
On the tail, the tail, the tail
So we'll sing the chain again."
– "Growing Horns", a Lycaonese nursery rhyme*

The first blow struck in the Battle of Great Strycht was an illusion.

Glamour, to be precise, woven by my own will. I'd seen no need to waste strength by making it too elaborate, so it'd remained a simple streak of blue light high up in the 'sky'. In of itself it did nothing, but it didn't have to: it was a signal. If my army stepped into the city uninvited, we were the enemy. The ones everyone would be aiming at, and even the few sigils who'd struck pacts with us would think twice before coming out on our side. Whether it was to see if we could match the opposition or simply to bleed us a little first to have a better position after the battle didn't matter, since I couldn't afford those kinds of losses. No, I needed blades to already be out when we struck. Thankfully, Ivah had provided me with the means to ensure that. The Rumena Sigil, Gods bless their ambitious souls, had decided that the barbarians knocking at the gate was the right moment to make a play for the control of Great Strycht. My Lord of Silent Steps had learned as much after grabbing one of their lesser Mighty and interrogating it thoroughly. Not so thoroughly, though, that it had died from my lieutenant's attentions.

So we'd made the songbird sing a second time, this time in front of the inner circle of the Jindrich Sigil. They'd been the natural targets for sowing dissension, and not just because they'd already made a deal with me. See, the Jindrich were the second most powerful sigil in the city. They'd opened negotiations because they were under attack by a cabal of lesser sigils going after their water reserves and agreed to take oaths under condition of those enemies being humbled, but they weren't bound to me. Not really. It was an alliance of convenience for them, and those were not to be relied upon. But this changed things. As the second best, the Jindrich would have to be annihilated if the Rumena were ever to fully take over Great Strycht. More than that, we'd hinted that the sigils attacking them were doing so at the invitation of Mighty Rumena – which, for all I knew, could be true. It didn't matter if it was false, though, because from the perspective of Mighty Jindrich it made sense and confirmed its worst suspicions. It was not hard to get people to believe the worst of each other when they'd been feuding cyclically for a few hundred years.

So my alliance had become a little less shaky, and I'd put it to work. The Rumena had been the kings of the island for a very long time, and never been all that nice about it: to the extent that there was technically a cabal including most everyone else dedicated to keeping them from devouring the rest of the city. That meant they had a lot of enemies, and that the Jindrich had... well, allies was a bit of a stretch. Sigils they'd fought with more than against for the sake of keeping the Rumena in check. Mighty Jindrich had reached out through envoys and warned them in advance of the plot, which was exactly what I'd needed. If my people had done that, it would have been taken as naked plot to incite civil war. Which, dues where they were due, it was. Coming from Mighty Jindrich, though? It had a reputation as an implacable berserker, not an intriguer. Put that together with our songbird, and you had all the necessary ingredients for a discreet coalition. Once it'd been assembled, the hard sell had been making it wait. Understandably, the drow preferred being on the offensive if there was going to be a battle: Mighty were no strangers to collateral damage, and they'd rather it happen on Rumena territory than theirs.

So Mighty Jindrich had 'tricked' me. It had assured its allies that it'd managed to convince me to send a force into the field to back them up, small enough the risks of it turning on them afterwards was minimal. But there was a catch. It'd only managed to wrangle that loan on a specific day. Namely, the one where the Longstride Cabal was suspected to be arriving – not that they knew that. The rest of the coalition had reluctantly agreed to the delay, weighing that my own people sharing the losses was worth the risk of discovery implicit to sitting on a plot like this for a few days. I was pretty sure that when the time came, Mighty Jidnrch would actually turn its coalition on us if it thought we'd been weakened enough to be beaten. That was fine, though, because I'd betrayed it first. Ivah had dug up from the prisoner that the Rumena had approached ambitious rylleh instead their target sigils and we'd helped clean up those leaks by providing the names we have. Not of the exact rylleh, sadly, since we didn't have those – the prisoner hadn't been that high up in the Rumena Sigil. But sigil names had been given and their sigil-holders had picked out the most likely treachery candidates for killing before they joined battle.

But we'd held two names back. Akua had removed them from the head of the prisoner just to be sure it wouldn't sing an inconvenient song even if prompted. I'd been inclined to think that even if we did nothing the enemy would find out, but best to be sure. It was now a certainty the Rumena knew there was an attack coming, and that meant they'd be intercepting it on their own chosen grounds. And so an illusory streak of blue light got the first round of betrayals started even as my army moved out. It was the signal for the coalition to begin its attack, for the Rumena to begin their counter-attack and my own plans to begin.

The drow were a fair hand at betrayal, but I had the Fairy Godmother of Treachery in my service.

My drow set out in warbands, treading the half-dried lakebed quietly. Soldiers would have moved in formation, according to precise orders, but I had none. Only warriors, and those couldn't be made into neat companies with designated officers. They'd move and fight as tribes, led into battle by the members of my Peerage. I'd studied the grounds for days and spoken with drow better learned in Everdark warfare than I, ultimately coming to the conclusion that there would be four different skirmishes that would dictate the outcome of this battle. Two would take place to the east, near the islands-turned plateaus of the Jindrich and the Hushu – respectively our main allies and the leaders of a cabal of four mid-tier sigils that'd remained aloof from the intrigues unfolding across the city. That sector would be the most volatile, since the two different skirmishes could easily turn into a single broader pitched battle if we weren't careful. That the Hushu and their allies would get involved was a given, but on what side they would fall in this was anyone's guess. Those fronts had been named, respectively, Spear and Dice.

One would take place to the north, in what had once been a lake-within-the-lake. The drow called it the Flowing Gardens, as it'd once been an entire district of small stone islets covered in sculptures and greenery. A place of leisure for the ancient drow, where pleasure ships had lazily drifted between enchanted metalwork that sung songs when touched by the breeze. It'd been centuries since those days, though, and now the Flowing Gardens were an eagerly fought-over battleground. The district had both water and food, after all, and the entire thing had been fed lakewater through a complex system of canals and sluice gates: holding those was a sign of power among sigils. My confiscating of Lake Strycht had lowered the waters within until the majority of the sections had become little more than large scummy ponds whose dirty waters were still fought over brutally by the minor sigils occupying the district and its outlying regions. Most members of my 'allied' coalition under Mighty Jindrich were from there, and my assessment was that the Rumena were going to hit them hard and early to keep them from assembling. Which would draw opportunists from the warlike sigils in the region, making it a beautifully chaotic mess. As a front, it'd been named for what it was going to turn into: a Pit.

The fourth and final front would be in the centre of the city. It would be the slowest to come into being, and at the start wouldn't even exist. The Rumena Sigil's territory was to the west, a five large and comparatively rich islands serving as the heartlands of their tribal possessions, but the fight would never get that far. The forces going after Mighty Rumena and its warriors after being freed from other fronts would pass through the central district of the city, since it was the quickest and easiest path, which meant that was where the ambush would be waiting. It was good grounds, I'd been told, for that kind of fighting. The centre of the city was filled with old temples and administrative complexes, set on a massive plain of solid rock. Every single building was separated from the others by deep grooves carved into the stone, more or less small canals, and the drying of Lake Strycht had turned the place into a labyrinth of bridges and corridors on three separate levels. A good spot for the Rumena to await an enemy force, after they'd devoured the sigils currently occupying it. It'd be hard to concentrate troops there, and either attacking Mighty would stick together and risk lesser warriors being casually wiped out or they'd separate and a hundred small duels would erupt on bridges and alleys.

We'd called that front the Woods.

I stood on a promontory as my army moved out, beginning the trek to the battles, and below me stood those that would lead them in battle. There'd been a fresh addition to my Peerage, a twelfth member. The Agus Sigil weren't part of Strycht proper but they'd held territory close, and been half-mad with thirst when Lord Zarkan found them. Mighty Agus had not been difficult to talk into becoming Lord Agus, though it seemed uncomfortable with its new role and wary of the rest of the Peerage. With good reason, I thought. Before oaths were taken, most of those drow would have wiped out its sigil in an afternoon's work and done so without batting an eye. It was the weakest of my lords, and knew it. The others did not share its mood, though. There was the scent of eagerness in the air, like they were itching for the fight. They probably were, I admitted to myself. Drow were not the kind of people to leave power unused after it was gained, and they had gained much from bargaining with me. I took a moment to gaze down at them in silence, wondering how many would survive the day.

"Today," I stated, "we take Great Strycht."

There were hard smiles at that, but no cheers. That was not the drow way.

"I won't waste your time with a speech," I said. "You all know what I'm about – we'll be dancing on the edge until the last beat."

I had their attention, though not because of any eloquence on my part. What came next was what they'd waited for all this while.

"And now what you actually want to know," I smiled. "Lords Nodoi, Losle and Zarkan: yours is the Dice front."

Zarkan was hard to read, because it hated my guts and that was usually the main thing to be found rather than anything more nuanced, but the others were easier. Relief. They knew their job would be mainly containment.

"Lords Slaus, Vasyt and Sagas, yours will be the Spear front."

Nods, poorly-hidden surprise. Given that Mighty Jindrich would be there, the expectation had been that either Soln or Ivah would take the lead there. They were, after all, the two most powerful of my Peerage. And those I trusted the most, though that was not a hard hill to climb. I had other plans for those two, though.

"Lords Soln, Lovre, Vadimyr and Agus, you will be serving as our strategic reserve," I said. "You'll be hanging back for the initial stretch of the battle."

Disappointment from Lovre and Vadimyr, I found. They'd been the most recent additions until Agus, and were eager to prove themselves in a battle that wasn't waged against my own army. Agus was pleased, unsurprisingly. Soln, though? Soln understood. It knew I wasn't finished speaking.

"For the duration of the fight, the three of you will be under the command of Lord Soln," I said. "To be deployed as it judges necessary depending on how the fronts unfold. Unless I give an order otherwise, Soln's words are good as mine."

That they liked a lot less, save for Soln, since it was the closest I'd ever come to raising one of them above the others. They'd have to get used to it, I thought. This was not the last large-scale battle we'd fight, and some order would have to be forced onto our manner of warfare.

"Honour was given, Losara Queen," the Lord of Shallow Graves smiled.

"You know my intent," I simply said. "See it done."

It wasn't a coincidence I'd picked those four. Soln had the closest thing to battlefield acumen there was to be found in my pack of warlords while Lovre and Vadimry had led raiding sigils. Their Mighty were the most battle-hardened I had at my disposal, and the most used to fighting in a group. Agus would be a weak link wherever it was sent, but putting it on the roster would allow Soln to send warm bodies into a growing mess without committing my best troops.

"Lord Ivah," I finally said.

"My queen," the Lord of Silent Steps replied, inclining its head.

"You'll be with Archer and myself," I said. "We're taking the Pit front."

"By your will," Ivah smoothly replied.

I gave them a last look.

"They'll remember today," I said. "What part of that story you end up being is up to you, my lords."

They bowed, and to war we went.

—

They army marched together most of the way before splitting up front by front, sneaking through mud and reeds. We stayed out of sight, as much as could be done on largely open grounds, and my own sigil was the last to part with the reserve under Lord Soln. I came out of that journey pleasantly surprised. I'd never considered drow to be proper soldiery, but this kind of business was well suited to their skills and I'd underestimated them in some ways. Oh, I still winced at the idea of them in a shield wall. But the march we'd just done in an hour would have taken half a day for legionaries. Even dzulu could keep up a pace that would exhaust humans and orcs for hours without tiring, and they'd walked across mud like it was solid stone. Never a step missed, or a boot stuck in a mire. More interestingly, they'd done this so quietly I could hardly believe they were an army on the march. My Peerage would be a threat on the battlefield, but I was beginning to grasp how dangerous lesser Mighty and dzulu could be out of it. They climbed up slopes like spiders, leapt from stone to stone with the grace and easy of hunting cats.

How hard would they find it to climb a wall in the dead of night?

But those, I told myself, were thoughts for another day. Ivah guiding our warriors, we circled around the eastern fronts to get to ours unannounced. Going through the territories of sigils would have been quicker, but also risked skirmish. I did not want to start spending lives before we even got to the Flowing Gardens. The war had begun without us, it was plain to hear. The sounds of fighting carried across the void and echoed, making it hard to tell who was winning – if anyone at all – but it was too early in the day for anyone to be trying for knockout blows. For now the sigils would tentatively send out their lower ranks to probe the waters, hesitant to commit their most powerful Mighty until they had a better idea of what the opposition had brought. The main force of the Rumena should be busy taking over the central district, too, with only traitors and hunting bands out on most the other fronts. Save, I had guessed, the very front I was headed towards. Here they would want to break the core of the coalition early, before wind could touch its sails and they got a real battle on their hands. Still, with a little luck the fighting here would be limited between the two sides while the undecided local sigils watched on.

As it turned out, I was not going to get lucky.

My sigil crept through the mud quietly until we reached what now looked like a stone wall but must have once been the edge of a constructed island. Ivah had been ordered to lead us to the outermost edge of the district, close to one of the smaller sluice gates, and it had delivered. Its days spent marauding in the dark had given it a good notion of Great Strycht's layout. I left my warriors at the bottom of the wall, going ahead with Archer and Ivah. The masonry here was fine and the stones polished by centuries of water, but I would have been able to climb this without too much trouble even before I'd become the Squire. We went up without a sound, Indrani disdaining my offer of a palm to jump off of in favour of a running leap. The top of the wall was a long rock pier, flanked by a structure where the sluice gate could be raised or closed, but it wasn't either of those that drew our attention. The sound here hadn't carried well, I decided, probably because all the sectioned parts and the ponds had broken it up. But now that we were up here, we had a decent look at the battle unfolding in the Flowing Gardens and it was a fucking mess.

"I'm counting at least eight sides," Indrani murmured, kneeling behind a large stone cleat.

"More," Ivah said. "Some sigils have yet to intervene. You can see their lookouts lurking at the edges of the fighting."

It discretely pointed a finger and I followed the direction. Yeah, it was right. I could make out the silhouettes hiding within giant glowing ferns. I hesitated, just for a moment, because the place was a bloody nightmare. It was hard to tell where sigils began and where they ended: every islet was a melee, most fought between several sigils. There were two pairs of warbands going at each other with what had to be rylleh that I knew for a fact weren't part of the coalition. They'd just... seen an opportunity, I supposed. The Rumena I could make out from the rest, mostly because they were slightly organized and winning most their fights. Either they'd come with some of their finest, I thought, or their lower ranks of Mighty were heads and shoulders above everyone else's. It took me a few moments to figure out who was leading their expedition, since their forces were split. But near the southern edge of the Flowing Gardens there was a warband of maybe two hundred drow everyone was avoiding like the plague, and a triumvirate of Mighty positively reeking of Night that stood atop an islet while overlooking the mess. I got confirmation of my suspicions when one of them faced down and spoke at one of its warriors, a runner leaving immediately towards one of the detached Rumena warbands.

These were their officers, then.

"Archer," I said. "Find a perch."

"Gotcha," she shrugged. "At will?"

"Try to draw in the bystanders," I said. "Clip their lookouts, see if that gets them moving. After that..."

"Yes ma'am your queenliness," she grinned.

She legged it, already stringing her bow as she went.

"Ivah, reach out to our beloved allies," I said. "I don't want to get in a brawling match with the people we're supposed to be propping up."

"As you say, Losara Queen," the Lord of Silent Steps murmured. "And after?"

"Return to the sigil," I said. "I'll be busy making friends."

That got a hard grin out of it, all teeth and malice. You learned that from us, I thought, and it almost troubled me. We were not teaching the drow kind lessons, and one that there would be a reckoning for that. It vanished into thin air, the glamour fine enough even I lost track of it, and slowly I rose to my feet. I looked down at my awaiting warriors, still at the foot of the wall.

"Over the top," I ordered. "Forward, Losara Sigil."

Even as they began to climb behind me, I cast an eye at the Rumena officers. Good, they hadn't noticed me yet. Time to make my entrance. I let Winter loose and smiled, inhaling deep of the smell of blood and fear wafting from the battlefield.

---

*erraticerrata*

Character contest continues: Robber vs Assassin! Link to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16873146?fbclid=IwAR3tTPRZZjgukGZCzDy6TIYgpUG1wKTg7wZk7InDNzuZbljY\_wETuWd0HZQ

Andrew Mitchell

No contest IMO. How could anyone vote against the Lesser Lesser Lesser Footrest?!?

RanVor

I could.

sutortyrannus

Nobody even likes you anyway.

RanVor

Thanks.

stevenneiman

I'm not criticizing you for having a different opinion than me, but I'm genuinely curious. Why did you pick Assassin over Robber?

RanVor

Then prepare for disappointment.

The main reason was that I was annoyed by some more hardcore Robert lovers, and I figured he's going to win anyway. That was the decisive factor.

Other than that, well, Herbert's a fine character, but he's more hilarious than interesting. And although I tend to laugh every time he appears, he doesn't really bring much to the story by himself. Assassin, on the other hand, has this aura of mystery that makes every scene he's in incredibly thrilling.

Ok, Robber fans, you can lynch me now.

NotQuiteHere

Robber looked up at the Duchess Of Moonless Nights, then pointedly around for any signs of pursuit. The Mighty they'd escaped from were gone, it had been foolish of him to come here, but he had to tell her.

He said, in the most solemn uncharacteristic way possible;

"I have something to confess."

"What?"

"Actually, I'm Assassin."

RanVor

That would be very funny in the context of this particular poll, but Robber and Assassin were both present at Second Liesse.

Tsura

Pretty sure it's been stated that Assassin has some tricks that would allow that to work

stevenneiman

That's reasonable. Our dear Lesser Lesser Footrest is certainly entertaining, but there's not a huge amount more to him. I honestly think the most interesting thing he's been involved in was the revelation that he's basically the goblin version of macho, and that was more of a lore/culture thing than something about Robber himself.

stevenneiman

I'm honestly surprised that Assassin did better than Hune. I guess that the mystery of Assassin and the long time since Robber's been on screen making mayhem must be having an effect.

Darkening

To be fair, Assassin's been pretty interesting both times they've appeared on screen, whereas Hune has had like, one scene where she was kinda interesting.

stevenneiman

True, but Hune was actually the focus of a scene where all Assassin's ever been is an aside in someone else's scene. The badass of the Tolltaker was enhanced when it mentioned that she managed to kill them for real, and most of the other scenes they've had any part in they were just a part of Black's schemes.

The paradox is that there's too little information for me to find the Assassin interesting, but if more was revealed it would detract from what makes them interesting at all.

Aston W

Thanks EE

Vote:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

DroughtBringer

We were up at 1,000, and now we are down to 700. Guys! Keep voting!

(Link for redundancy)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Nuke_The_Earth

Reminder that letting your vote expire before re-voting makes it count once per week instead of just once. Smells a bit cheesy, but it's the way the site works.

SpeckofStardust

This feels like a filler chapter to be honest.

Whisperings of dawn

This feels like a filler arc to be honest

JackBeThimble

You're entitled to your opinion. To me the entire third book felt like filler and this is the best this series has been since Willie Angels went got his.

Stormblessed

It's hard not to have no 'filler' chapters in a work of fiction at all.

I'm not sure I 100% agree with the word filler here. Perhaps lower energy, or just less happened.

That being said, this sort of chapter is necessary; it's just more noticeable in a web serial vs a completed work.

Andrew Mitchell

Not action-packed, sure. But, "filler"? Not IMO.

A very necessary chapter that will provide crucial context for how this battle will unfold over the following (five? I guess) chapters. I loved hearing the details of Kat's plan.

Dragrath

Yep without knowing the plan how can we know how much it will fall apart without being told given this will be a pivotal battle 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Great point. Because OF COURSE it's going to fall apart.

Aston W

But still great fight scenes.

Skaddix

Yeaeh the Masego & Warlock Interludes and the incoming Black Rescue Arc have really taken the wind out the sails of the Underdark for me. I note those two things cause they are recent. But also I kinda want to see what eat the Baby means for the Dead King. Basically just more interesting stuff is happening or about to happen elsewhere.

Especially since the final clash is coming so early Cat really hasn't gone that far into Dark Elf Lands but Sve Noc going to show up for final clash already? Which is good I guess means we get out of this arc as fast as possible but it does make this arc feel pretty Filler. I mean I like the Ladies but eh the material and foe they are going up against are just not entertaining and they get along too well as well so no real internal tension. Just don't feel the tension at all especially since it just feels too early for Indrani or Akua to die especially after Masego just lost his parents.

Metrux

I think you got confused, this is not a final confrontation. This is Sve's first strike, the first time she is actually getting directly involved, which still doesn't mean she'll be here in person. The way she was depicted I expect a series on increasingly stronger moves on her part, until she can't simply throw her weight and needs to go in person.

Argentorum

Cat and Akua have named great Strych as Cat's Pivot in the Underdark. Either she succeeds here, fast enough and with enough remaining forces to deal with the followup attacks from deeper Sigils under Sve Nocte's control and the Longstrider Cabal, or she doesn't and she dies.

Meanwhile, Sve Nocte has been at the business of ascension for centuries now, and that she hasn't succeeded means she's **failing.** So, Strych is her pivot too. Either she eats Winter here, or she will be eaten by it.

Either way, Strych is shaping up to be the climax of the arc, as far as we know in universe. It could be a jebait, but given the Masago and Black interludes foreshadowing much more interesting things going on up top? I don't think we're gonna be here for another three cities and then Holy Tvarigu. At most, from here's it's a straight shot to the end and the Sve's last stand.

Skaddix

Thanks you explained that better then I did.

But yeah basically this arc feels filler because far more exciting things with more relevant characters is about go down elsewhere. Obviously Cat, Indrani and Akua are important but the foes they are fighting and the characters meeting don't really compare to the possibilities elsewhere.

This arc reminds of something like Mass Effect where you can go recruit all the races but you don't have to.

HannaB

Okay, but Cat popping out of the Underdark with 40k+ drow?

And a deal with the dwarves which means the Tenth Crusade is going to run out of weapons unless it stops fighting her?

And enough money to allow Callow some stability?

This is the game changer that's going to fuel Cat's next leap in status for the fifth book.

Aston Whiteman

You forgot the 100k Undead Drow Akua brings along.

KageLupus

Give the shape of the battle that is about to unfold this chapter was pretty much a necessity. Cat is going to be juggling a few dozen fights on multiple fronts, including the expected surprise visit by the Longstriders.

In-universe, Cat and the rest of the group have had days to really plan this fight and know all about the different factions they are playing against each other and how to best position them. But for us the readers, this whole complicated plan would quickly turn into nonsense without an info dump giving us the necessary context.

Filler implies something that was added to take up space but does not contribute to the overall story. This is as far from that as you can get. This is the chapter that is going to make the next three to five chapters actually make sense.

Metrux

I agree, this here is like the training chapter right before a new power is shown on-screen. It may seem to be preparations only and not that exciting, but it's exactly what's needed for the more action packed parts to go smoothly.

Antoninjohn

An hour over a swamp what would take professional Army of Callow/ Legions of Terror half a day on flat and the Legion of Terror move fast compared to Procer, now add the magic Gates and you get a Nightmare to fight even if you see their move a month in advance

Gunslinger

So powerful in fact that I expect them to be thoroughly nerfed when they reach the surface. Maybe they'll be weak outside the gloom or weak against light or something.

Either that or Cat's next enemy are the elves

Skaddix

Yeah basically Cat is just winning too much and has too strong of a team. Its one thing when the Named Woe Members are so good and her army is strong when its a normal enough army. Well trained core sure but it wasn't supernatural.

But not she is got Fey and tons of Winter Enhanced Drow on top of that and Epic Teleport to strike anywhere at anytime..she is the overdog now not the underdog. Yeah sure the Crusaders might have numbers on Cat but do they have enough numbers to fight the Dead King and Procer when all their opponents have armies that are simply on solidier per soldier basis way better?

Hastien

I think a disaster or betrayal at the end of the arc will see Cat lose most of her army or she'll use it almost exclusively against the Dead King or Praes. If she uses it to fight Procer the heavens will one up her in a heartbeat. They were willing to pull a literal manifestation of God to spearhead an invasion fleet, they'll come down hard at the slightest excuse. In the form of the heroes following the Grey Pilgrim suddenly becoming Ranger Tier if I had to guess.

I'll bet Cat breaks the armies of the dead shortly after Klaus dies, then goes the the Grey Eyries to subjugate the goblins and capture Foramen. That's maybe my favorite part about this story, you can make the wildest speculation and still be surprised.

Andrew Mitchell

I like your speculation. Mine is that the goblins are going to come on board without fighting Kat, because she'll offer them more freedom/respect/land/whatever than they every have had under the Tower.

HannaB

Cat's next enemy is the Dead King. She's going to back Procer up against him.

RanVor

Frankly, I don't see it happening. She is probably going to face Neshamah somewhere down the line, but Malicia is a much more pressing concern right now. Also, if she helps Procer now, the Crusaders will just turn around and invade Callow again. There's no time for gratitude when you wage a Holy War.

Jane

Ah, preparing for the classic Cat "Betray Fucking Everyone" ploy, I see.

Morty

Isn't that the traditional Praesi ploy though?

MetruX

Oh no, Praesi just are always prepared for any betrayal, and for being on any side of the betrayal. When an opportunity appears, they just go for it. Cat actually creates the openings explicitly so she can maneuver others into a better position for her inevitable betrayal.

taovkool

A good overview of the Losara Queen's Sigil. That Soln is going to be trouble in the long run, I can tell. Battlefield geniuses with insufficient loyalty tends to be a pain in the ass to deal with.

Wonder what happens next after Cat won over the drow.

HannaB

as I understand that's the cabal, not the Sigil. Those were leaders of different Sigils, all sworn to Cat

Caine

Have you ever thought about publishing chapters in parallel on RoyalRoad or similar, as a way of reaching out? Keep the chapters outside of here a month or so behind, draw some more audience to your story?

Aston W

I'm guessing that's not actually Cat.

Not yet anyway. Until an excess of power is used.

Well done for the top web serial EE.

So another 20 chapters until the Night Arc is done. And interludes.

When no Heiress Ghost appears in the chapter... brawl changer.

Javvies

Interesting.

Yeah ... changing the drow culture away from chronic betrayal and teaching them to be smarter in battle and strategy is not going to be without side effects.

On the up side ... if you have them under oath for long enough, you might be able to make a lasting deal with them that they won't reflexively double cross you over.

Five or six battles – the four fronts, the Longstriders and whatever play Sve makes.

MetruX

I think the Longstriders are already part of Sve's play, but that's just personal opinion and not really supported by anything shown. Yet, this wouldn't be all one way or another.

JackBeThimble

This whole arc almost feels like a reconstruction of The White (or light-brown Iroqirish) Savior trope. Sure she's bringing order to the savages and ending the hobbesian war of all against all but only in order to harness them for her own selfish ends with any benefits that accrue to the conquered being ultimately incidental (i.e. just like real empires).

doominator10

Theirs is indeed the business of empires.

Ternbugkle

Have you heard of Gurkha?

All she needs now is a suitable wasteland to resettle, perhaps in the roots of the mountains south of her country.

fbt

i liked this bit, tyvm! I mostly skim the comments for the occasional posts from the author or Jane, but i'm enjoying the story very much.

Antony444

Procer should throw themselves to the ground and pray Catherine will never try the strategy Black used to burn several provinces. They think it was bad? Amadeus had at best twenty thousand, most of his force was humans, orcs and goblins, and he needed to weaken himself fatally to increase their speed. Cat has several thousand drow marching at least three times faster, she has portals and she can put massive illusions.

In a war of movement now, Catherine can refuse to engage any host of the Crusaders, and decide where and when she will deal with her enemies. Good luck defeating that, especially as she has manifested her intentions to transfer fortresses for tactical support...

Wry Warudo

In a way, Cat has already decided against that. I mean, Bonfire was basically her gating around burning provinces in Procer, which she vetoed since it would cause the rest of Calernia to see her as a bigger threat as well as the heavens escalating against her.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a good point. It hasn't stopped the heavens from escalating though, so perhaps the idea will be revisited. Maybe.

werafdsaew

Black explained it very well: the difference is between AN opposition and THE opposition. Same reason as why the Dead King think that conquer ing Procer will lead to his doom

Big Brother

This is the Grand Melee all over again. Betrayal after betrayal!

Darkening

Yeah, it reminded me of that immediately. And there's no Juniper here to be a better tactician than her.

Euodiachloris

If you throw a pebble in the Everdark, how many betrayals can you precipitate before it lands on the ground?

Someguy

All of them.

Metrux

Define all. I think some of them can be started more than once.

Byzantine

$2^n$ . Where  $n$  is the number of living, nonliving, and nonconforming entities that have, do, or will exist in the entire history of the world.

RanVor

No wonder the Lycaonese are so grim, considering they have to listen to this creepy shit throughout their early childhood.

Euodiachloris

A childhood isn't complete without a good baker's dozen of nursery rhymes that scare you witless. And, a good score of them that later trauntise you as you revisit them with your own kids, thanks to now having a better idea of what they're talking about. 😊

Daemion

You should read the traditional German fairy tales and morality stories. They have everything. Crime, death, torture, body horror... and the end is rarely happy. ^^

Aston Whiteman

Once Cat unites the Under Dark will she travel to the Chain of Hunger next?

Winter is hungry. Always.

Darkening

I doubt it for many reasons. The Named rat she fought in Keter seems to have given her some wariness towards them, given her earlier comment about betting on Horned Lords over Mighty, they're even more feral than the drow, so they'd be almost impossible to control and organize even with oaths, and she's already got her drow army, she doesn't currently need more than that to keep Callow afloat long enough for Juniper to get the Army of Callow ready for war.

Aston Whiteman

Yeah but there needs to be a Chain of Hunger chapter arc..

Valkyria

I don't really like how so many talk how all of this is "just filler" and "has not much to do with the main story" or something along the lines.

For me this just makes the story more realistic.

I mean come on, life is not just about day long battles, fighting your arch nemesis and taking the heads of bothersome heroes. Sometimes you just gotta lay low, take a bit of your own time and casually evade the everdark for some sparkly new recruits.

Valkyria

argh i meant invade... someone please let us edit these comments!

MetruX

Denied, please enjoy our suffering! :V

Valkyria

This, right there is True Evil. May the gods Below take this tribute you send them xD

HannaB

^^ this

I don't think people who say that understand fully how much there's going on in this arc.

1) Cat's going to end up leading a host of at least a hundred thousand drow. That's bigger than Callow's and Praes's armies put together, and will be a game changer for the next book on a level compared to Cat going from a solo Named to leading a legion between books 1 and 2, going from leading a single legion to being in charge of the Ruling Council between books 2 and 3, and going from putting out Praesi fires to just being fucking crowned Queen of Callow and flipping off Malicia between books 3 and 4. That needs to be EARNED. So far, the last 'third' (structurally) of each book has been a lead up to this leap in influence: the melee, First Liesse, Second Liesse. True, this time Cat isn't actively in the center of where her interest lies, but this structural buildup is still the biggest plot thing in this entire book.

2) Cat is going to murder a goddess. Like, she's been told that she's basically a nascent deity herself, and now she's going to put that theory to test by killing Sve Noc. Considering dwarves have hired her to do that, I doubt she's going to straight up fail, erratic doesn't trip up the setup that much – this is a Practical Guide to Evil, not A Story Of Failure. Cat is going to change the status quo on the entire fucking continent and set herself up as an entity on the level with Sve Noc, proven by murdering her and taking her place. This is not only a huge plot thing, but also a huge internal change in how Cat views herself and her place in the world, and that's why we're getting so many thinking/feeling/talking chapters lately.

3) Whatever the fuck is going on with Akua. She's a character in her own right, even if she hasn't been getting POV lately, and her arc and development did not stop at her death. She died at best in her early twenties, more likely a teenager, and there's a looooot of room for her to grow. There's definitely SOMETHING going on in her head, and us not getting to see what is no accident.

4) Indrani! Is Cat going to have a love interest she has actual chemistry with? Is this story going to have a healthy and adorable poly relationship? How does Cat's party function anyway? All of these questions, and more!

5) So where DOES Cat stand in relation to Good and Evil? Winter is nominally narratively linked to Evil, but we've seen Summer which is nominally narratively linked to Good – this link is just a vague association, it's not actual alignment. Just being a Sovereign of Moonless Nights does not make Cat a servant of the Gods Below. Her Name, for whatever its remains are worth, is still transitional, and she's rejected her status as Black's successor which was what linked it to Evil to begin with. Neither Adjutant nor Hierophant, the new Names Cat's party spawned, have anything inherently Evil to them, and Archer and Thief are explicitly neutral. The Gods aren't okay with this uncertainty, and we're going to be finding THAT out. Which is of course inherently linked to the question of what the fuck Cat is going to actually do with the drow, and how what she's doing with them right now is going to shake out, because Good and Evil aren't just labels to sides in chess, sorry shatranj. This is a pretty Big Thing going on.

What people who complain about filler mean is that they want to know what's going on in Cat's actual sphere of interest – Callow. This definitely is different than usual, but well... proactive, not reactive 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Yes! So much going on. Thanks for the explanations/reminders.

Skaddix

The issue is multiple.

I think a good deal of people don't find the conflict interesting or with much tension. As I said above the proverbial wind has been taken out of this arc by the Interludes. Masego's Parents dying means its extremely unlikely Indrani or Akua dies here so people want to see his response. The Save Black Arc is also incoming featuring a trap by the Heroes and should feature a clash of the Big Names on both sides which is naturally more exciting.

That point goes into the second. The Underdark been a bit too easy for Cat so far, she has not met many memorable characters and is building up a massively overpowered army in terms both size and average power level. People tend to prefer their protag to work for it and be an underdog. Cat is looking like a massive Overdog with 100,000 Winter/Night Enhanced Drow that is the biggest army on the continent with an average power better then anything but maybe the Dead King.

Third, A Hero is only as good as the villain or in this case the protagonist is only as good the antagonist. Sve Noc has so far been mostly absent and not especially interesting in comparison to The Bard, The Dead King, Tyrant, Empress, Grey Pilgrim, etc. Yeah she hasn't much time to make an impression but that is the disadvantage of being introduced so late in the series, you got come out of the gate swinging. It also doesn't seem like she will be reoccurring either so feels like a one and done which adds to filling of filler. It doesn't help that she is coming out early to face Cat. Cat hasn't gone that far into Drow Lands and the Big Boss is already coming out for the Pivotal Clash? That adds to the filling of filler.

Fourth, yes there has been some interesting relationship dynamics sure. But the more interesting part that quite frankly is the Masego reaction which we cannot get to until he gets back in the story. Also split the party arcs have a tendency to fill like Filler.

I am interested in Akua making her move though.

Mikasi

See, my problem with the idea of a Save Black arc is whether or not Cat will bother. She did kinda stab him and tell him the results would be dire if she ever saw him again. Will Black being captured play into next arc? Probably, but I doubt it will be the main theme.

Masego's dad's dying was kinda coming. I was less surprised by that, though it was a great chapter regardless of all of the preceding death flags.

Note, I'm also coming from a position where I started with not caring about the drow, and now I'm interested to see how Winter changes them once the Night is gone.

Skaddix

I don't see why it wouldn't since it will bring all the major players besides the Dead King together at one location. Cat probably won't have much of choice. Masego has made it clear he wants to save Black and he should be even more resolute with his parents dead to save Uncle Black. Ranger is going to want save Black ignoring the Masego/Archer/Cat Triangle is she going to say no? 40% of the Woe have reason to go and the member who do constitute most of Cat's Named Firepower.

I am not saying it was a surprise. I am saying it was a significant game changer as it shifts the balance of power to the Woe and should lead to some great development for Masego. But mainly it reduces the tension by making it less likely anyone important dies in the Under Dark. Especially with the aforementioned Save Black Arc coming

HannaB

I'm just sitting here like "people dying is not the only OR the most interesting source of tension" meditating on Cat's position wrt Good and Evil y'all have fun

Mental Mouse

I'm not wild about the battle scenes, but Cat is leveling up on several counts (Winter, troops, strategy), and she needs to. We're also seeing more development of her relationships with two of the more cryptic characters in the plot, Akua and Archer. Akua in particular... I don't trust her containment at all.

Aston Whiteman

+1

ironvale

Nice setup chapter. Time to flick the dominos.
Some people don't know what filler chapters mean.

Brett

I get the feeling Kat's going to pull a fast one on the gods below. She hasn't really dealt with their manipulations to much. The story has been set that two evils will clash and whoever wins will be even more powerful (and more tied down to evil). Not w/ winter powers or Kat w/night. Kat knows this, and I think will use Akua to bait and switch the story. Evil fights evil and whoever wins, Kat can finish off. Akua wins, tries to take the power of night and backstab, Kat triggers a contingency oath that kills off Akua. With both evils gone, she can slip out with her army.

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting theory, thanks for sharing. Let's see if you're right over the coming chapters.

NZPIEFACE

Doubt it's going to be that. That plan sounds like it has so many flaws that it would never work.

Shaerick 68

Oh, Cat, what monsters are you making...

Barrendur

When commenters refer to something as "filler", their meaning may simply be that they find the material boring or tedious, something to plough through, skim over or skip outright. By *that* definition, the entirety of the Underdark section seems like filler to me; something tedious I plough through or skim over.

Exacerbating this problem for me is the way Catherine becomes steadily less interesting as she becomes ever less sympathetic/comprehensible/believable. I'm reading the story now for every character who *isn't* Catherine, whom I'll admit I've always found a pain and now find a bore.

werafdsaew

That's not what "filler" means. Filler is something that does not advance the plot, so therefore can be cut out without affecting the story.

NZPIEFACE

I get it when people say this arc is filler, not this chapter in particular.

Personally, I feel that this arc can be considered “filler” as it’s set-up for something much larger when all the Woe is back together. We could end this after the next battle and just go through a time skip I figure that everyone would be all fine and dandy with the result.

RanVor

So am I to understand I’m the only one who actually likes the Everdark arc and wants to see more of it?

Andrew Mitchell

No. I’m enjoying it too!

Euodiachloris

You’re not alone, mate. It’s just that the vocal minority of readers are het up and vocal.

HannaB

No, it’s just that people who do don’t complain in the comments as loudly!

daniel young

I too enjoy me some crumbled ancient empire looting:)

Aston Whiteman

Free. Quality. Story. Every. Week.

Complaints?

Minimal.

Isa Lumitus

“The Fairy Godmother of Treachery”

Any chance that will become Akua’s official title? It’s an awesome description.

---

Chapter 74: Eyewall

"My husband thought himself a cynic for believing that men so often race towards the bottom of the barrel. I found it charmingly idealistic that he believed there was a bottom at all."

-Queen Yolanda of Callow, the Wicked (known as 'the Stern' in contemporary histories)

Leaving the gate open wasn't an option, not really. The more my opposition saw that trick in action, the higher the chances they'd figure out how to counter it. Rubies to piglets there was some Night equivalent to the Pilgrim's miraculous beam o'death, and I could not afford to be knocked out of the battle literally moments into it. I'd adjusted my tactics accordingly, and so after five heartbeats I closed the opening. Gravity and mass turned the water into a massive hammer blow coming down on the Rumena, but I wasn't dealing with amateurs: of the three 'officers', two immediately fled in shadow form and the third was swallowed by a hulking shape of Night moments before the impact. Neither would have been a bad answer, if water was all I'd brought to the table. Instead I strung Winter and loosed it again, turning the entire ploughing mass into ice just as if fell on the drow. There'd been two hundred of them, when I'd opened the gate. The vast majority of that had been dzulu, and those died instantly when the water hit. The lesser Mighty were crushed by the ice, and the two officers who'd fled in shadow form found themselves stuck in it.

The last, though, I knew to be untouched. The Night construct had taken the impact without flinching, and was now tearing its way out. It'd been too much to hope for to take out the enemy commanders with the first blow even if it'd been a sneak attack. Didn't mean I was going to make it easy on them, though. Even as my sigil flowed around me, heading into the fray without a single battle cry, I seized the reins of the ice I'd crafted and slapped my palms together. The entire construct contracted around the Night-shrouded drow at the centre and I felt its defense flinch. My lips stretched into a grim smile when I realized I'd forced the other two officers back into drow-form as a side effect, bloodying them in the process. There was another pulse of power and the Night-construct began pushing back. I could make this a slugging match, I thought, but that would be missing the point. I didn't want to annihilate the Rumena, I wanted to drive them back to the central district after weakening them. Their sigil was, after all, a part of the force I intended to put between myself and the Longstride Cabal.

Another exertion of will had the ice collapsing into mist, a thick fog that would blind them for a while. Good enough that I could move on, I decided.

A quick glance told me that the Losara Sigil had added a fresh current to the mess in the Flowing Gardens but hardly affected the entire lay of the battle. At our angle of entry, we were taking the pressure off one of the coalition sigils – making a semi-stable line of battle on the northwestern side. I didn't intend to meddle there, since Ivah had been ordered to return and drive away any Mighty that were too much for them to handle. No, I'd go make friends of my own. The half-dozen islets in the middle were so chaotic a melee I couldn't even tell exactly who was fighting, but to the northeast a Rumena detachment was tearing through a mix of sigils both 'neutral' and allied. A good place to start. Wings of shining light burst out of my back and I took flight, rising above the mess to hurry things along. I went high to avoid distractions, but even then I still had to dive out of the way of a javelin roiling with Night some Mighty tossed in my direction. I could have batted it away, but why take the risk with a trick I didn't know? My brow rose, however, when after arcing a dozen feet above me the javelin finished the curve and flew in my pursuit. Someone had it out for me, huh.

Evidently I'd made an impression.

I was quicker than the projectile, so I was less than worried, but I slowed my flight to allow it to catch up. Not close enough to hit, or even explode if that was how that was supposed to end, but close enough the Mighty controlling it might think it had a chance to clip me. I angled my flight downwards after reaching the battlegrounds I'd picked out, javelin howling behind me, and landed in a crouch. The two Mighty in front of me, who'd been hacking at each other with obsidian blades, paused and turned towards me.

"Surprise," I said, and turned into mist.

I took solid form again half a dozen feet to the side, just in time to see the javelin strike them. It did not, to my surprise, explode. In the heartbeat where it hung in the air between them, tendrils of Night came boiling out and wrapped around to the Mighty. Almost instantly they were dragged into the projectile, leaving behind only half-finished screams. No trace of a corpse. Whoever had tossed that, I thought, wasn't fucking around. I checked if there was another flying towards me just in case, but there was nothing coming so I pressed on. It wasn't difficult to find the Rumena: I just had to follow the screaming and the runners. A crew of four stood in a loose diamond formation, steadily advancing through the opposition. I ran through the melee, drow parting around me cautiously, and leapt on the one at the front. Even as I swung my sword towards its throat I saw it begin to turn, surprise passing in its silver eyes, and I could tell exactly when it realized it wouldn't be able to raise its own sword in time. And yet there was no fear to be found. I learned why a moment later, when the strike that should have carved through its throat instead shattered my blade. It'd been like throwing an egg at a wall, I thought.

It countered smoothly, blade coming down to hack between my shoulder and throat, but I kicked at its side and used the momentum to throw myself backwards. The tip of the iron blade came within an inch of my nose as I landed on my feet, and immediately I pushed forward. I couldn't allow the four of them to strike in formation, it was bound to get messy. Shifting its footing skillfully the drow began a backswing. Unfortunately for it, I slid down between its leg and grabbed its left ankle as I did. Hoisting it up was easy as lifting a feather, and I rose even as the other three Rumena watched me with visible surprise.

"Look," I said. "It's just really hard finding a weapon that won't break. Bear with it."

"You-" the Mighty at the back started, Night blooming around its wrists, but it was interrupted.

I took my angrily flailing mace and smashed it into another drow. Bones crunched, though they snapped back into place with a hiss – jawor, then, since they had more than a single good trick – and the drow went flying. The other flanking Rumena tried to slide around and ram my back with a spear, but I caught my drow-weapon by the throat and used it as a loudly protesting shield. The spear pinged off like it'd hit steel, just in time for me to sidestep two hissing whips of Night wielded by the fourth. They snaked back around towards me, but I batted away their tips with my drow after releasing its throat. My mace screamed in pain as the Night punctured its flesh, dropping its sword. In a show of good drow sportsmanship, my disruption of the Rumena advance was followed by an opportunistic attack from other sigils. The left side of their force was swarmed by an angry sigil so thin on Mighty it must have taken a brutal beating before I arrived. Sadly, drow opportunism applied to everyone. An arrow flew at my back, the head of it glinting with shadow, and I had to pivot so my mace could take it in my place after I seized it by the crook of the neck. Heat licked at my fingers as the arrow failed to pierce through but dark flames charred the Mighty's skin.

I was kind of impressed it hadn't passed out yet.

My drow weapon was beginning to try wrestling my wrist into loosening, so our love affair had sadly come to an end. I crouched low and spread out my stance, heaving it in the same direction the arrow had come from. Halfway through it flicked into shadow-shape, but to my amusement our friend with the bow shot it and it fell to the ground with a scream. Well, no longer my problem for now. The Rumena had identified me as the person whose head needed to be on a pike before they got their footing back in this section, so I found myself swimming in Mighty soon enough. We played for a while, my frown deepening as we did. They were outclassed against me, but the longer I got them striking at each other by weaving into their midst the more I realized these were bottom feeders as far as Mighty went. Maybe there were a few jawor in there, but not a single rylleh. Most of those were ispe, the lowest kind of Mighty, with maybe a few pravnat – practically speaking those were just ispe showing promise, but drow were touchy about titles – thrown into the mix. But they'd been wrecking the opposition, and I could see why. My own sigil had ispe, and the Rumena Sigil's made them look like bumbling amateurs. The fact that I'd yet to fight dzulu here was telling, too. I'd been told that the Rumena made up almost a third of Strycht on their own, but I hadn't though they had quite that many Mighty to spare.

The quality of the opposition was going to be a problem, if these were their third-stringers.

As if to reinforce the point, I got a lesson in why Mighty Rumena had judged that three officers were enough to take care of this front. Three falling stars impacted the battlefield, less than a breath of delay between them, and as stone and drow went flying the Mighty I'd ambushed earlier made their entrance. Steam drifted off their frames as they rose in unison, unbothered by the fact that most casualties resulting from their landing had been of their own sigil. The Night construct from earlier flared, and I finally got a good look at it. It looked like stylized panther, though one vaguely humanoid and standing on its forelegs, and its eyes were empty sockets. I could feel the power coming off of that, and to be frank I did not want to find out what'd happen if I got hit with it. The other two advanced with long tridents of bones held in loose grips, fanning out in a circle. I could fight them, I thought. The collateral damage from it would hurt their sigil more than anyone else's. But I'd already accomplished what I'd come for, disrupting their success in this sector. There was little to gain from an all-out brawl with these three.

"Well put," I said, "But if I may retort?"

I opened a gate behind me and retreated through it. The cold breeze of Arcadia scattered my hair as I strode across the waters of what had once been Lake Strycht, ice forming under my feet. I cast a look back to see if they were following, and to my pleasure they were. I quickened my steps as they followed in hot pursuit, one of them stretching out its shadow for the others to walk on as if it were a solid thing. The exit gate beckoned, and I called it open with a thought before leaping through. The one we'd entered through was already closing, so my pursuers wasted no time in following suit.

All four of us started falling, because why would I make the gate lead to the ground when I could fly?

Wings burst out of my back again and I left for greener pastures as they fell impotently back to the floor, landing in the middle of the bloody central melee. None of them would die from it, but they'd be stuck in another fight they had no time for. Another arrow flew towards me, this one without Night woven into it, and I almost struck back blindly where it'd come from. Luckily I glanced first, and found it'd been Archer who'd fired the shot. Frowning, I crafted a platform of shadow under my feet and landed. Indrani was, rather unsurprisingly, surrounded by corpses. It'd take too long to make my way to her, so I closed my eyes and took a shortcut.

—

The corpse rose, the lingering warmth chased away by Winter coursing through the veins. Archer eyed me skeptically, nocking an arrow.

"Cat?" she asked.

I spat out a glob of blood and phlegm.

"You have my attention," I croaked out.

"Left corner, three sigils massing," she said. "Tickled their lookouts, but they're playing the waiting game even under provocation. Should I start shooting leadership or do we leave them be?"

The dead drow's neck was horridly stiff, but I forced it to turn with a snap and followed her pointed finger. Couldn't make it out from here, I wasn't high up enough, but from up in the sky it'd be no trouble.

"I'll handle it," I said. "You should- oh shit!"

—

Height was no guarantee of safety, in a fight like this, even if my distraction lasted only a few moments. I didn't see what broke my platform but it vaporized my right foot with it and I began falling again until my wings slowed it to a halt. Which was exactly what my enemies wanted, as it happened. If it'd been the three Rumena from earlier going after me that'd have been fair game, but it wasn't: four Mighty from a sigil I was pretty sure I was theoretically allied with stood atop long pillars of Night and were forming a globe of the same around me.

"Really?" I said. "Fine. Have it your way."

I snuffed out my wings, opened a gate under me and fell right through. Arcadian air howled around me and I crashed into the water, ripping open a gate under me. The sudden whirlpool drew me in and I fell along with a mass of water more or less over the sigils Archer had pointed out to me. Streaks of shadow immediately flew up but a flick of the wrist had the water around me turning into a large spike of ice I casually tossed into the midst of the gathering warriors. I landed among screams and fleeing dzulu, brushing off my shoulders. The sigil-holders would be on me soon, but my eyes were drawn to the corpses I'd just made. There was Night in them, though like with all dzulu not much of it, but it was fading. Going away, and I could quite say where. I tugged at the chain binding Diabolist to me, allowing her to see through my eyes. I felt the trace of her presence come, lingering only a few moments before disappearing. She tugged back one, a message received. Had she already known? Quite possible, if this was happening all over the city instead of just here. Then the Mighty were on me, and the time for musings had passed.

Three sigil-holders, each with a pair of rylleh backing them. Difficult to deal with, if I'd intended on fighting them. Instead I tossed a few spears of ice at them to get them riled up and began a retreat. They followed, and our merry chase began. I could have called the Flowing Gardens the stuff fairy dreams were made of, but I'd had fairy dreams – and this was much more surreal. We danced through canals where vines had grown thick and sprouted thorns and hooks, bursting through faded poems carved into stone. Tortured sculptures of bronze and obsidian sang dissonantly as shards of Night were tossed, stirred by the wind in their wake, and towering trees whose only produce were leaves red like blood shook as Mighty rode shadows in my pursuit. A sluice gate of oily metal was torn open like parchment as I leapt over it on translucent wings, the sigil-holder who'd done it looking like a creature of nightmare in the light of the glowing flowers and ferns it'd torn through in its haste. And everywhere we went, drow fought and ambushed and bled on stone and water. There were Hells, I thought, not even half as grim as this. I stoked their anger with darting strikes followed by vanishing into mist, clipping a few with ice spears to little more effect than mounting frustration on their part.

They didn't realize what I was doing until we'd barrelled into the central melee, and by then it was too late.

It was such a mess down here that another few Mighty in the crowds hardly made a difference, the fight ebbing for a moment before forming anew around them, and just like that my job was done. The Rumena were losing here now, though the situation was slowly turning around as the warriors from the section I'd flipped earlier joined up with their fellows. It must have gone quite badly there after I'd left for them to outright abandon the fight. Good. The cauldron was near the boiling point, a little more and they'd be ready. In my absence, the Losara Sigil had pushed deep. Moving as a cordon along with our allies, it was moving slowly but surely towards this mess. Seeing my sigil's symbol as war paint and adornment was surprisingly moving, but it ended up costly. By now, my identity was no mystery to the people I'd tangled with. And if they couldn't pin me down themselves, then there was one way they could force a fight.

Three falling stars hit my sigil, and in the span of a single heartbeat I lost at least two hundred warriors.

Gone, in a shred of flesh and bone and stone dust. People it had taken me months to bind and empower, dead in the snap of a finger. I clenched my fingers, pushing down my fury. War could not be waged without losses. I rose in the sky and dived for them, deciding that gating close to them was too much of a risk. In the time it took me to arrive, I lost another hundred drow. The Rumena officers slaughtered them with contemptuous ease, be they dzulu or Mighty, and only ceased when I landed at their back. I rolled my shoulder, weaving a glamour without missing a beat.

"All right," my illusion said. "You got me here. Now what?"

"The worthy take," one of them said. "The worthy rise, Losara Queen."

I circled around them, footsteps muted, but one of them must have had a trick to see through that because the two with bone tridents ignored my glamour and turned towards me. The Night construct erupted for a third time tonight, the blind panther roaring out, and they charged. There was, of course, one thing they hadn't accounted for. The leftmost drow ducked under an arrow, batting it aside, but there'd been a second shot hidden in the curve of the first and that one took it in the throat. It gurgled, unsurprisingly still alive, but then its throat began burning green. Indrani had spent quite a while with Robber and his miscreants, hadn't she? She'd been due a few new tricks. That one I immediately discounted as dead, flesh reknitting or not, and that left me two to deal with. Or it would have, if Ivah hadn't cut into the dance. My Lord of Silent Steps moved with unnatural agility, waiting until the bone trident had struck out before... moving. The description failed to convey what had taken place, though. One moment it'd been standing in the way of the weapon, the next it'd been behind the Mighty and striking with its own glass staff. Afterimages followed a heartbeat later, revealing how it had moved and the whole affair reeked of Winter.

It'd skimmed the edge of Arcadia, I realized with a start.

Move along the boundary between it and Creation, steps silent and sudden until struck. Merciless Gods, I couldn't do that. Was it the true face of its title? Or was it just better at using power, after its centuries as a rylleh? It'd didn't matter, I thought, at least not right now. Its opponent was far from dead, even after taking the blow, and I still had one to contend with. The shaped Night pounced, carrying the drow within as if it were lodged in the belly, and if I'd not batted wings to hurry my retreat it would have hit me. As it was, the panther's claws tore through the stone beneath us and it turned to face with as its tail swung. As suspected, I did not want to get touched by any part of this. The thing was, I couldn't really afford a slugging match with a rylleh when I was supposed to be getting this cookpot off the fire. Not even an obviously powerful one. There was a part of me that found it only natural to get down in the mud and brawl, but I couldn't afford to fight that way anymore. Not with the kind of opponents I had, these days.

I'd done it at the Battle of the Camps, and what had that gotten me? Nothing I'd done there had actually mattered until the gate had been opened, and the Saint of Swords had batted me around until I fled. Keter had been more of the same, struggling through one messy gambit after another while a dead elf and a Horned Lord made sport of my best efforts. All this had happened while the fucking Dead King as good as named me a peer, while he'd be able to handle those matters easy as picking apples. Not because he was more powerful, because terrifying as Neshamah was Winter's abyss ran just as deep. But because he knew how to use that power, while I muddled along using only the barest portion of mine. Akua was better at using these powers than I was, and she didn't even have a title. So what did I have that neither of them did? Because that was the question, wasn't it? If I was going to sit at the same table as Sve Noc and the King of Death, then I needed to prove I had the qualifications to claim a seat. Catherine Foundling, the woman who brawled with rylleh and lost limbs by the dozens before finally putting it down, did not have those qualifications.

I looked at the Night construct, watched its legs bend as it prepared to pounce, and I shaped it in my mind. I'd never done it simultaneously before, but why couldn't I? Maybe I wouldn't have been able as the Squire, but the Squire was dead. Devoured by a harsher mantle. How many of my limitations, I thought, are self-inflicted? I could be mist or hard as steel, I could grow wings and walk away from the loss of half my body. Lies and mirrors, and what was this but a different kind of lie? The panther skimmed across the ground, unnaturally swift, and I let Winter flow into me. Fill my veins and my lungs, steal away my breath. I embraced it, as I had in Liesse, and formed what I had shaped in my mind's eye. The first gate opened in front of the Night construct, and it slowed by a fraction as it prepared to leap over it. That was enough. Another two, caging it in a triangle. Another two, above and below. All of them leading to the bottom of the Fields of Wend, that depthless glacier lake at the very heart of Winter. How many miles of water were there in it? I didn't know, not for sure. But water came out from all sides, and in a heartbeat Night and drow were crushed like a bug by the gargantuan pressure. I breathed out and the gates closed as one, leaving behind only water and flesh made into paste.

No, Catherine Foundling had no place at that table. But maybe the Black Queen did.

I looked back, found the battle had gone on uncaring of what'd just taken place. Just another current in the sea. It was time to get them moving, I thought. Soon enough the Rumena would have taken the central district, and the madness in Great Strycht needed to be brought to its climax. I couldn't get all these drow moving with my own power, it was true. It'd take hours to go around killing every sigil-holder and asserting command, assuming it was even possible at all. But I'd been taught by a man who had been an artist in the ways of ruling through fear, and his lessons had not all gone to waste.

"Retreat," I called out to my sigil. "As planned."

I left them to the grisly business of disengaging from a furious melee while I reached for my power one last time. Terribilis the Second had once said that a threat was useless unless you'd previously committed the level of violence you were threatening to use. I didn't agree, though, not exactly. It was useless if the level of violence you were threatening wasn't believable, I'd say instead. And I'd stolen a lake in front of these people, used it as a weapon and bribe both. They would believe quite a bit, coming from me. Even as my sigil began fleeing towards the heart of Great Strycht, to the surprise of their foes, I wove a glamour. A gate facing upwards, and through it came a deafening rumble. Illusory molten stone flew out, landing on the muddy lakebed and the edge of the Flowing Gardens, smoke and lava following as the glamoured volcano erupted in full.

The Losara Sigil fled, and every godsdamned drow in the north followed close behind.

---

*erraticerrata*

Character contest continues: Grey Pilgrim vs Scribe! Link to vote below.

[https://www.strawpoll.me/16885880?
fbclid=IwAR0RBzeixuUpXME\_JMLA906Fvsts47y2fXQAXd\_UHqpzuVT5B\_q8BT3t0KQ](https://www.strawpoll.me/16885880?fbclid=IwAR0RBzeixuUpXME_JMLA906Fvsts47y2fXQAXd_UHqpzuVT5B_q8BT3t0KQ)

*DroughtBringer*

Well, because I'm late, I'll just comment here.

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Antoninjohn

All that xp that Cat's been getting has paid off, Cat has leveled up

Javvies

Hmmm. She rejected the Name of Black Queen once before.

Most of your limitations are a mix of self inflicted and inexperience/ignorance, Cat.

I do like the gate cage of doom.

Ah, illusory volcanic doom. That one might be worth remembering for fighting on the surface. I mean, you already dropped a lake on an army – threatening to gate in a flood of magma/lava instead of water might be effective, too.

sengachi

The trick's only working here because of the drow's lack of cohesion though. We literally just saw that there are Mighty who can casually see through Cat's glamours, clearly the glamour isn't working on everyone. But it's working on enough drow to have the desired result.

The problem with surface-side coordinated armies though, is that if one good mage or one hero with decent eyes sees through the glamour the whole army will know within thirty seconds.

HannaB

Depends on the size of the army, imho.

ClickPause

Nah, it saw through her quiet steps, not through the glamour itself.

daniel young

The difference between glamour and reality for a fae is very thin so a good army ignoring the glamour may soon find themselves being stabbed in the back by conjured fae troops.

Quin

Thirty seconds can do a lot of damage at the right time. Just ask any operation that involves scattering the infantry to decapitate the head of their army of to create a key weakness you can exploit.

Sparsebeard

She rejected the Black Queen, but she can still be the Back Queen :).

naturalnuke

The true Back Queen is obviously Akua 😊

haihappen

Akua is no Black Queen, she is the Shade of Doom and Treachery, the Architect of Folly, the Usuper of Power.

Rup

...Fairy Godmother of Treachery

Akuabestgurl

Also the collar fairy.

RanVor

No, Akua is the Backstab Queen.

Miles

Heiress to the throne of Callow and her drow armies of all things.

sugarrollblog

The typo has been corrected but the Back Queen will be remembered.

Byzantine

She didn't reject it. The rug got pulled out from under the transition by Black's actions.

Satyr

This one always confused me. Why would Black scattering an ancient artifact make her less of a black queen? Black was never under her command so it shouldn't matter that he didn't obey her.

Argentorum

It's because the Doomsday Device, and Cat accepting it's continued existence and use, was her Pivot into the Black Queen. It was also the first time that Cat aligned herself with Malicia over Black on this choice, making the pair of them into the Dread Empress and the Black Queen.

When Black destroyed the device, the narrative weight of that moment shifted. Instead of it being Cat's choice, it was Black's so her Pivot was stolen in that regard. In addition, she no longer had any reason to be on Malicia's side so the narrative importance of her siding with Malicia over Black vanished as well. No pivot, no weight, no name.

HannaB

Oh NICE. I'd missed the "siding with Malicia over Black" implication.

IMHO, another thing it did was enable a shift in Cat's own thinking. She'd been getting invested in Sunk Cost Fallacy courtesy of Malicia, believing the weapon would be useful in part because of how much it cost to get it. With the weapon gone and the decision out of her hands, she can take a step back and acknowledge that using it was, in fact, a terrible idea to begin with.

I don't think Catherine herself liked, or would have liked, the person this pivot would have made her into. Black did her a huge service.

...and on that note, I do wonder what to make of this.

Necronomist

It wasn't about Black obeying her, he just broke the story of an independent Callow allied with Praes that would have given her the name Black Queen.

MetruX

A problem to that might be that surface dwellers know what is winter, and that this is her mantle. So she would quite nicely see this as "not part of her mantle". If she had both Summer and Winter, this could be quite possible for her, however, and I'm sure Winter has an equivalent to be used, so why she didn't use, and instead made a Glamour... Seems like part of a plan.

Michael

But dropping lakes and stuff isn't a Winter thing. The only reason she isn't dropping volcanoes yet is that she still has to do some prep to make them erupt. Lakes are just so much more convenient.

Darkening

I mean, if she knew where a volcano was in Arcadia I'm pretty sure there'd be no problem with her doing this. Might be worth exploring Arcadia a bit at some point for useful gate locations once she actually isn't pressured on all sides.

Byzantine

She could do this. Even if she can't steal an arcadian volcano she can just use two gates: One from a volcano into the sky in arcadia and one in arcadia below that that opens in the regular world.

Probably not worth the effort, but meh.

sengachi

Cat's still got a long way to go in terms of fully utilizing her power, but it's really something to see her finally thinking in terms of 'what are the upper bounds on this power?' rather than 'how can this improve my fighting style?'. I'm loving this progression, the time and care and thought it's taken her to get here, and each individual step has been so engaging to watch.

NZPIEFACE

Normally I'd say the moon's the limit, but uh...

Skaddix

Yeah although Cat's Problem compared to the Dead King for instance is the Dead King is Sorcerer by trade ie he knows what Magic can and thus has a way better understanding of the powers.

Similar to Akua when she takes over she does way more impressive stuff now part of this she has less morals and thus self inflicted limits but also she has more understanding of what can be done.

Basically I am saying Cat could stand to learn more about magic.

Someguy

>'how can this improve my fighting style?'

Well, currently Cat has integrated the use of [Drow-Chucks] into her repertoire and has proficiency in [Projectile Defence].

As for the 'upper bounds of this power', I prefer creative uses of limited power to "Throw Bigger Rocks".

eh

All Ivah needs now are a fedora, a trench coat and a katana and he's all set to be Lord of *teleports behind you*.

Also, it seems lakeomancy is a lot more potent than the old snake in the collar gave credit for.

daegone823

Kind of hyped to see the wild hunt leader see the new lord of silent steps. Wonder if they will have a fight or other fae things. I mean one is indebted to Chat by oaths and is treacherous the other is a vulcan who sees his dead compatriots as food. They should have a lot to talk about.

Of topic: Speaking of you think the fae are like living it up now that they broke the cycle of drama that they have been living in or our they depressed.

HannaB

Probably living it up, making new shitty stories to promptly get locked into for cycles and cycles

superkeaton

Finally, Cat's starting to actually use the incredible power at her fingertips. It's take her too long to really start experimenting with it. I look forward to weirder body morphs and trickier portal usages.

Vhostym

I wish I could feel the same way about that scene as you do. To me it kind of fell flat, because despite the internal monologue the actual use of the power was more of the same portals she's been using all of book 4. It was an improvement on the usage, certainly, but only really in the case of a change of precision, not of kind.

I'm hoping that she eventually does more in the way of either body morphs, or general winter usage beyond mere glamours and falling lakes, because while she definitely has a neat trick up her sleeve, I wouldn't say she's currently leveraging her mantle in as varied a manner as what an experienced Named could do. Especially the cheating sorcerous Named. Seriously, 2 aspects in and Masego has not one general combat aspect (though maybe Ruin can be used in that fashion) and yet is the greatest heavy hitter of the Woe.

usernamesbco

Catherine's approach to problem solving has been stabbing problems until they weren't a problem anymore for awhile now.

But pulling her punches because too much violence is bad.
Then angsting about it.

I liked her better when she was being clever. I hope the Everdark arc almost over.

TheRingLord

Do the thing...

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Jacob Hollander

I did the thing

Novice

Akua once used devils and demons to acquire the name of Diabolist. Now Cat is slowly being known for bending water to her will. Step aside Akua, hydromancy is now a true discipline confirmed.

P.S. Cat is now adept at making people wet. Just ask Indrani ( ° 3 ° )

eh

Cat is Evil!Korra confirmed.

Euodiachloris

Evil!Katara, more like. Bloodbending (for a given definition thereof), necromancy, icebending, lakebending, spirit-style illusions, darkness and occasionally brawling, stealing, stealth and running... Cat's the most worrying kind of polar waterbender and shaman there is.

daegone823

Random Fae in Arcadia: Out on a stroll to visit my family and do some fae stuff maybe go fishing.

1st episode

"Oh shit what are all these drow doing here"

"Did she trap a whole kingdom of drow in Arcadia"

2nd episode

"Is that the winter queen, why is she being chased by drow, shes a queen and they are drow"

"I am definitely telling the other fae about this"

3rd episode

"Where are all the lakes going!!!"

NZPIEFACE

Cat finally realized how she's been fucking up, yeah?

I always thought it was weird that she kept brawling, now I know she truly doesn't need to.

Aphorism

All hail the Back Queen! May her lumbar ever be supported!

Aston W

And Akua gets her undead army..

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. I think so too. Lots and lots of powerful drowning corpses

Letouriste

I wonder what she will do to that sigil betraying her so early...

Rook

Nothing different from the rest, most likely. The drow are all so utterly transparent in their treachery that it's honestly kind of refreshing, you know?

IDKWhoitis

Are we all just going to gloss over Cat just taking over a dead body she had no prior contact with and taking through it? Because this could lead to officers in the Army of Callow carrying around dead heads as a "radio" to give field reports. Imagine Robber just talking to Cat directly, in a way that anti scrying spells cant stop or detect?

Like oh shit.

NZPIEFACE

Can't detect? Oh boi, you obviously haven't heard of the trope where priestly heroes can sense undead.

Gunslinger

Didn't priests have a problem banishing her (Akua's) undead during the Callow battle.

NZPIEFACE

They couldn't kill it, but they sure as hell sensed the undead.

i think

IDKWhoitis

They knew Undead Necromatic constructs were a factor when dealing with Catherine, but were hilariously unprepared as to how to deal with them.

While the Named priests and other names may be able to detect undead, the heads in question wouldn't be UNdead until Catherine calls in for a field report. A semi-consistent schedule can be set up with Robber retreating away from the enemy and awaiting the call. Then once the call is over, the head stops being an UNdead and returns to its inactive normal dead state.

Swishy Sword

I'm betting that it's because the priests normally banish the powers of Below, which are usually used to animate. Buuuut if you happen to animate them using some other power such as, say, the Fae energy of Arcadia... well, there's a lot less the priests can do then. Maybe.

Andrew Mitchell

She had to see them in this case, I think. But maybe that's not a limitation.

NZPIEFACE

Why would Cat need to see them at all? Have you forgotten that sight is just a byproduct of the construct which she bound her mind to?

HannaB

Yeah, well, her mind is still bound to it. She does not seem to have effective perception of the outside world when she dismisses the construct (I think she refers to her eyesight returning after reforming from mist). Just because breaking the camera doesn't break the computer it's feeding the data to, doesn't mean the camera isn't essential to its ability to work with that data.

Hastien

The theory does have precedent, during Black and Hanno's 2nd battle Hanno had an amulet that blocked scrying but didn't interfere with necromancy. I wonder though, it used to be that she needed a mostly intact corpse to work with, just a head would be convenient. If it works at great distances or through the ground it could be a game changer in communication methods. It'd suck to relay hundreds of messages a minute though, better have Akua do it.

HannaB

Yeah, the downside of this is that Cat would have to do it personally. It makes a great radio for a small team, like this, but when commanding an army delegation is key.

Snowfire1224

I'm picturing Robber in a Hamlet pose talking to cat through the dead head now. Thank you.

RanVor

If you think you've found a new method of doing anything that is completely hero-proof, think again. They may not have the counter right now, but they will inevitably find it soon because you just can't out-bullshit the Heavens.

MobyJunk

Headphones?

Antony444

Reading this chapter and comparing it to the Battle of the Camps... Well, I don't think the Crusaders are going to be happy the Black Queen is happy to be back.

This battle is pure chaos and humans in this mess would be lambs to the slaughter.

Frankly, with the level of manipulation Cat is learning battle after battle, Above will need each time to muster a considerable group of heroes to stalemate her, preferably with the Grey Pilgrim, the Saint of Swords, the White Knight AND the Witch of the Woods leading them. Which is of course more or less impossible, if the Dead King is busy ravaging Northern Procer.

Interesting strategy with the illusion volcano and a particularly ominous thing to say when Cat admits she needs to be the Black Queen. Can't wait for Friday and Sve Noc's intervention...

benthelynx

But above has decided that Cat is more the threat to stop than the dead king. At this point at least.

werafdsaew

Don't forget that the Giants (or Titans?) and the Elves still exist. In fact I think one of them will be unleashed since Cat is basically unleashing the Drows.

ALazyMonster

I'm liable to believe that the elves will remain on the sidelines as they do perpetually since intervening could piss off the bard even if they genuinely did want to help, which everything we know about them claims otherwise.

The giants might be a possibility but we don't know much about them other than they might be a vaguely good race. I'm inclined to believe that they are closer to true neutral than anything as what we do know has shown that they hold grudges, are in tune with nature, and helped protect the independence of Levant, which more just shows they are on their own side and might help others if the mood strikes them. Maybe. We really don't know much about them to make these calls so all this is shots in the dark.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think the Elves will remain on the sidelines. Above is going to need something extra to counter Kat's Drow horde. I'm looking forward to seeing Elves vs. Drow. What we've seen of Elves is OP, but the new, improved Drow should be a good match.

Maybe that then means the Giants are going to come into play? As you say, we really don't know much about them. But we do know enough about them for me to think that they are going to be significant.

You're absolutely right that this is all shots in the dark. I think that's what makes this so much fun.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Especially because the dwarves drop molten lava on things.

Though are we getting a discussion of the night being sucked out of the dead rather than harvested?

ByVectron!

My thoughts, exactly- with what the Queen is learning, by the time she gets back, even if she adds no new drow to her army, she could likely roll through the Crusade with ease.

Generals? Portal squish.

Troops? Flash flood and shadow swarm.

Stubborn Named? Flood, freeze, portal drop from a mountain.

Andrew Mitchell

Thoroughly enjoyable chapter. Nice to see Kat discard some of her limitations. Loved the scene where she was using one of the Mighty as a mace and then as a shield.

Andrew Mitchell

Does anyone have any theories on the bit with the disappearing Night and Kat pulling Akua's leash so Akua can take a look?

Darkening

Could be Sve Noc stealing all the 'free' night in the area to empower her chosen champions to fight Cat? Dunno.

Rup

...or..Sve Noc needs it for Apotheosis...but then she could just take from the living drow...so i am confused

stevenneiman

I think that Sve Noc can take back all of the Night any time she needs to. Her current setup was intended to distract everyone from the threat she poses by making her not look personally powerful and keeping her Mighty out of the way sufficiently that everyone would just write off the Underdark while she slowly amassed enough power for apotheosis.

Someguy

The same plan Father used in Fullmetal Alchemist, the whole city has an array under it powered by Night that uses everyone in it as a sacrifice.

NZPIEFACE

That's actually pretty clever and makes a whole lot of sense which means it's going to fail at the last step.

SilentWatcher

it was a "loudly protesting shield" ^^

daniel young

Well damn that was awesome. I'm glad cat is finally being to grasp just what she has become. The soul of winter need naught bow to deepest night, for chill cares not from whence you come as all things freeze in time.

Shaerick 68

With the rapid power Cat is gaining in this arc, I can only imagine what horrors she's going to face back on the surface.

HannaB

My guess is "oh that whole thing with the Dead King invading Procer".

I don't think the crusaders are going to be able to stop him on their own.

Aotrs Commander

The funny thing is, if Cordelia and the Grey Pillock hadn't pushed her, she wouldn't be skyrocketing up to make the Dead King nervous. But no, "Good" always has to have its own way, and now they're going to pay for it – with luck and time, by the end of the series, possibly permanently.

Also, using enemies as mace.

Class.

Finally starting to push the boundaries of what she can do without human limitations?

Classier.

Cat is the best.

Euodiachloris

You can imagine the new "keep in line, or else" threat: "do you want to be her next club?". XD

Skaddix

That seems like some projection when has the Dead King shown he is worried about Cat? Heck he helped push her in the direction of Apotheosis. He has shown he is worried about the Bard because he doesn't understand her but Cat nothing of the sort. Probably helps he is the strongest Sorcerer on the continent and should have no trouble containing a Fae. Akua managed it well enough.

Now Cat bringing a Drow army kinda is on Cordelia although you could make the case that the Bard, Saint and whoever is next up after Cordelia would have gotten a Crusade going no matter what. And Malicia would have brought the Dead King in no matter what in response to the Crusade. Honestly, the simple issue for Cordelia is her political situation would have made it impossible to make a deal with Cat.

Aotrs Commander

I was being hyperbolic in the suggestion that if Cat continues to advance in power that she would achieve a level that would make the Dead King (the current arguably top tier opponent we know of) concerned. With the implication that "Good" would by that point, be Well Screwed.

...

Cannot... resist.. urge...to... make... dubious... crack...

...

Like Indrani was last night!

...

I'm so sorry.

...

(I am not sorry.)

stevenneiman

I agree. I don't think the Dead King was all that concerned about Cat, he just wanted to get in on the action and not let the Intercessor be the only one working to manipulate her. Also, I think he knows that if she reaches a similar status she'll be more effective at diverting the Heavens' attention and giving him a free hand than actually opposing him.

Switch

Sometimes you just have to beat a motherfucker with another motherfucker.

stevenneiman

Now both her allies and her enemies are joining the club.

Imtiaz Ayon

Frowning, I crafted a platform of shadow under my feet and landed. I think instead of shadow its going to be ice

Moginheden

The Black Knight used platforms of shadow, and the Squire used shadows a bit too. Cat is starting to transition to Black Queen so she might use a shadow platform instead of an ice one, (but she has been using ice platforms recently.)

It's always been weird to me that both characters create a platform with no supports, but can't just make themselves not need a support.

ayon96

She doesn't have a NAME and nothing in the recent chapter suggests that she is beginning a transition. Her mantle makes ice. She made platforms of ice in the past. This is probably just a typo

Xinci

Winter is Ice and Shadow. Cold in the Dark. There is no problem here. She has used them cojointly before.

Moginheden

She is thinking of herself as the Black Queen in this chapter. That's part of a name transition, (and others already call her that.) This chapter is looking like a Name pivot to me, using shadow would be another flag since it's something she hasn't been doing for her platforms since she got ice.

RanVor

While I'm pretty sure it was a typo, what you're suggesting here makes a lot of sense.

Snowfire1224

Everything about this is great.

I think thw highlight was Cat's living weapon.

ironvalei

Welp, Kat just started her involuntary drow club. The first member was helplessly hanging around, not knowing its duty. Such an epic flail.

Pantasy

Considering drow values, it's an effective way to start off on the right foot and have them put their neck on the line for her.

mavant

We do what we must, because we can

Andrew Mitchell

Reference acknowledged. 😊

HannaB

for the good of all of us!

RanVor

Except the ones who are dead.

stevenneiman

One thing I've never gotten is why there are so many drow with any real power. Sure, there's a lot fewer important drow than any normal culture, but that's still thousands upon thousands of them. There's pretty much one process by which Night gets transferred, and that process almost exclusively goes to a single drow who already has Night. In a normal society, many people are allowed to exist even under the most uncaring of tyrants because a leader's power is proportional to the number of followers they have. Not so in the Underdark, where a leader would be better off harvesting all of their Mighty and killing anyone who isn't vital to feed or equip them personally to increase their own power and reduce the threat of competition. The most sharing that would make sense would be a few people expressly intended to harvest Night and give you more of it than they keep for themselves. The idea of attrition in particular seems baffling to me. If a Sigil gets into a fight, they don't get worn down bit by bit. Whichever side keeps the ground after a fight ends recovers ALL the power lost by both sides in the course of the fight. The closest thing a sigil could suffer to attrition is crushing defeat which they escape from in a much reduced capacity. For a sense of what it should be like, consider America. We have fairly weak laws limiting the power of businesses and very rich individuals, and as a result a lot of wealth is concentrated in the equivalent of Mighty and Cabals, but there are unarguably still restrictions on what the rich and powerful can do, both legal and practical. Now imagine what America would be like if rich people had no need for accountants to manage their wealth, no need for an economy populated by other people to spend that wealth in, no fear except that someone richer would pick a fight with them and take their money, and it was legal, possible, and socially acceptable for rich people to murder anyone and take all of their money. Now imagine that the more money they had the easier it got for them to do all of that. Pretty soon America would have a population of one all-owning god-king and maybe a few powerless favored servants who amuse them enough to be allowed to live.

Andrew Mitchell

I can see where you're coming from and you've made me consider why Night isn't more consolidated than it currently is. IMO there are a few factors that may play a role in preventing more consolidation than we see.

1. There's already a lot of consolidation. The Mighty and Rylleh are getting more powerful as we get towards the centre where Sve Noc awaits. Maybe the process you outline is correct but it's still ongoing. Maybe it just hasn't had enough time yet.

2. All Drow need food and water, and maybe have some social needs as well. This applies to Mighty and Duzzul alike. The Drow social hierarchy provides Mighty with others to do all these menial tasks and to meet the social needs, even if it's just a Duzzul to murder whenever you feel like it.

3. Even powerful Mighty are not totally without competitors. It's a pyramid with Sve Noc on top. A band of slightly less powerful Mighty can (given the right circumstances) form a Cabal and bring a more powerful Mighty down.

4. Even if a particular Drow was too powerful for anyone else to topple. What would motivate them to take the time and effort to exterminate all other Drow? We know that powerful Mightly don't get any value from harvesting Drow who are too far down the power hierarchy from them.

Any or all (or none) of the above could play a role and others can probably think of more reasons. Interesting thought exercise!

sengachi

No one rules alone. No one can coordinate a whole society alone. You have to delegate to someone. But in this society, if the person you delegate to is too weak they'll inevitably be killed. That means to avoid untenable turnover you need to give up at least some power to your minions. And if you give them some power, it had better be enough that they can really hold their own, because otherwise they're now just juicy tasty targets instead of targets.

But then it gets worse. Say you've got enemies. Enemies who would love to raid your flock of harvestable drow who do stuff like feed you and clothe you and maintain your quality of living. Well you can't be everywhere at once and you probably need to sleep (or at least would like leisure time to enjoy all that power you've gained). So you need multiple someone's who can stave off enemy incursion while you're not around, or at the very least make such incursions costly and/or delay them long enough for you to get your pants on and get out the door. Or maybe you want to be able to raid multiple places at once or execute feints. Two vs. one combat is also just a godsdamn nightmare, so by giving a minion some power you can get a return on combat power versus a solitary enemy that's much greater than what you've given up.

And then while a super drow could just not rule and instead wander around raiding and enslaving random drow to get by, such a solitary super drow would be a big obvious target for a cooperative cabal looking to score some easy Night. I don't care how good you are, if you're alone and you need to take a shit and two dozen enemies with reasonable power jump you when your pants are down, you are going to have a bad day.

So yeah. There are plenty of logistical and tactical reasons why a drow sigil holder would need a variety of powerful minions under their command to operate.

eaglejarl

Things Cat could be doing with her stated powers:

Open a small portal immediately in front of herself and another immediately behind her enemy. Stab forward and into their back.

Same as above, but time the portal creation such that the enemy punches itself.

Portal cuts.

Does Arcadia have outer space? Can you portal someone into a vacuum, or into the sun? (Which canonically exists and is a thing that can get stolen!)

Open your lake-blaster portal directly under their feet, facing up.

Exactly how real is a glamour? Will a glamour of toxic gas kill someone? Will a glamour of goblin fire burn?

Unfortunate that Cat's world lacks the chemistry to know about F00F and ClF3, but such is life.

Cat's shadows can replicate physical objects. Can they replicate moving parts, like a loom, automatic drill, etc?

If she can create shadows, that means she can move light around. Can she grab all the light from a huge area and use it as a super magnifying glass? Or perhaps a laser?

She could portal-drop corpses into random areas, then animate those corpses remotely. All the fighting, none of the vulnerability of your own body. (Obviously, still subject to some kinds of magic.)

What is Arcadia's sun made of? If she opens a portal that leads directly into it, what comes out? Heat, light, plasma...?

She can transform her body. Can she do all the Mr Fantastic tricks? Using herself as a slingshot, making her arms longer to punch from farther away than expected, running faster because of longer steps, enveloping (and crushing?) someone...? Making her arm super long and thin so that she can send it down someone's throat and into their lungs, then make spikes shoot out to rip the person apart from the inside?

She can create shadow constructs and glamour at range. Can she do what I just described with shadow / glamour instead of her own body?

Can she create constructs inside someone's body?

Can she turn to mist and get into someone's lungs? Interesting way to accompany a friendly without being observed, and an easy way to kill enemies.

NZPIEFACE

Why would Arcadia have an outer space? It's not based on any laws of physics.

Pretty sure the glamour isn't physical in any way.

I think the "shadows" thing is her ability from when she was Squire.

The sun in Arcadia isn't a "physical" physical thing.

The Mr.Fantastic stuff kinda requires her body to have properties of rubber. I thought she was ice.

Andrew Mitchell

Love the creativity here. It reminded me of HPMOR and the Two Year Emperor. And then I looked at your username. 😊

Xinci

The most intruding things in this chapter are the cost/cause and effect relationship of the portals. Surely other beings can sense the gates in Arcadia, maybe even are attracted to it if they are of Winter. Each portal may go to a different part of the boundary between creation and Arcadia, and between it and those places seems to have differential distance to that boundary. Power echoes out through Arcadia from Creation, depending on the story/current state of the area the gate opens up to. I wonder if any creatures still exist in Winter's Arcadian lands and if so how they have changed with time. Truly I wonder what kind of things a glaring beacon of Winter might attract if you have multiple such beacons opening up holes to creation. So I wonder what she could effect with multiple gates, with multiple boundaries. Could she make them vibrate/move in different patterns and open up different gates at different times? What would happen if she kept maintaining them? Could she play dimensional music with gates to weaken or strengthen boundaries and Call and Shape things that went through them? What is the effect of making so many gates, how does it echo through Arcadia? Cat still needs to become *more* but this has a lot of potential for breaking the world if she does it right.

beginner fishing tips

Thanks for the chapterLikeLike

Satan

Can we get a Rylleh?
Then Cat's new Name can be Cthulu.

---

Chapter 75: The Eye

"There is more power in blood spilled willingly than unwillingly. The latter is simply a great deal easier to obtain."

– Dread Emperor Sorcerous

I would have compared it to herding cats, but as far as I knew those didn't take time in the middle of a rout to backstab allies or enemies, depending on who didn't watch their back closely enough. Well, maybe Praesi cats. You never knew with Wastelanders. I kept the drow moving even after we'd cleared the area that was being affected by the 'volcano' by more or less stomping out any knot of bravery that formed. After the second time Mighty who tried to stand their ground and rally their warriors got a gate opened above their heads the message was received. I was sinking into Winter at a prodigious rate, no to ways around it, but nowadays I had more than just Akua to dump the principle alienation into. Twelve hardened former Mighty on top of Diabolist meant I could keep this up for quite a while without going all monologue-addicted, and if it came down to it I could try to disperse some of it into the drow who'd simply taken oaths. There were shards of Winter in them as well, after all, put there to enforce the terms. It didn't quite feel like I'd be breaking our bargain if I did that, but somehow I suspected it was close enough I wouldn't like the ensuing backlash. A desperate measure, if need be, but not to be used before that.

The front we'd named the Pit was effectively finished, the chaos within being poured into the dawning mess at the centre of Great Strycht, but while fighting there I'd taken my eye off the two fronts to the east. There were risks in that, which was I'd put Lord Soln in command of the reserve to hedge my bets. It had authority to intervene as it deemed necessary to keep the wagon on the road. It was about time to see how that'd worked out. I remained with the retreat until we reached the outskirts of the central district before putting Ivah and Archer in charge of the situation and dismissing the glamour and taking flight. The false sky of the cavern was mercifully unburdened by fighting, and the height allowed me to gauge how the situation was unfolding over the entire city. There'd been two battles planned in the east, fronts named Spear and Dice. The former I wasn't overly worried about, since the Jindrich would be taking the lead there and their sigil-holder was infamously destructive. The latter was a different story, as it involved a cabal of four sigils informally led by the Hushu, which presumably weren't in on any of the plots coming to a head. If they pushed into the other eastern front, that whole section of the city would become a massive melee I lacked the tools to properly handle.

Considering the 'plan' for the Battle of Great Strycht was to drive everyone and their genderless sibling into the centre before the Longstrides arrived, there was a lot riding on Lord Soln's ability to cope with the situation.

What I took in from above was a mixed bag. The reinforcing Peerage I'd sent to back up the Jindrich had been enough to punch through the delaying force sent by the Rumena on the Spear front, by the looks of it. They were in full retreat, harassed by coalition and Peerage drow as they made for the centre. Considering the amount of Peers I'd sent east I was rather surprised it was harassment and not annihilation I was looking at, but the explanation was not difficult to find. The Hushu and their allies had taken the field and decided to be clever about it. Instead of launching a hard assault that would see my Peerage diverted from the pursuit to deal with the situation, they were marauding around the flanks and striking fast before withdrawing. The Peers and sigil-holders in command were hesitating, reluctant to allow the Rumena to retreat unimpeded when the Hushu attacks were so lukewarm. The three lords I'd assigned to that front had gone with the understanding that containment was their main objective, so they were tacitly allowing it to happen even if it thinned their ranks. Presumably judging that the overall losses would be greater if we fully engaged. The reserve under Lord Soln was closer to the centre, in an incline between two islands-turned-hills, and so hidden from view. There'd been four sigils assigned to the reserve, before hostilities erupted, but only two were still hidden down there: the Soln and the Agus, so at least the overall commander was there to answer my questions.

Instead of staying up there and drawing attention, I landed next to the reserve and dismissed my wings. The drow parted around me, many of them bowing as I passed, and I returned the gesture with a silent nod. The Lord of Shallow Graves awaited me with Lord Agus at its side, gravely listening to dzulu giving reports. The conversation died as I strode in, the two Peers inclining their heads in deference.

"Losara Queen," Lord Soln said. "I heard word of your success to the north."

"Drew in everyone I could and sent them running into the central melee," I agreed. "I'm more interested in the situation around here. Have the Hushu and their cabal declared for a side?"

"Their own, presumably," Lord Agus sighed.

"They attacked the coalition and the Rumena both," Soln calmly replied. "Though with the retreat of the Rumena, we are now the only blood left to be shed."

"I take it you've something in the works," I said, glancing around pointedly.

There were, after all, two missing sigils.

"I sent the lords Lovre and Vadimyr to circle around Hushu positions," Lord Soln agreed.

"That'll open another front," I pointed out. "Instead of push them into the centre, which is what we're actually after."

"So I said, Losara Queen," Lord Agus muttered. "So I said."

"I intend to launch an assault myself as they do, my queen," Soln explained. "Along the ridges of the southeast."

I frowned, trying to remember what I'd seen of the battlefield from above. It would make a corner connected to a line that led straight to the centre, more or less, if you counted the forces currently pursuing the Rumena. If I had to guess at the intent, it'd be forcing Hushu and friends to head towards the centre to avoid being assaulted from two sides. If we'd been fielding a disciplined army I would have given it decent odds of working out as Soln wanted, forcing movement through pressure, but as it was we'd be compounding a gamble with another gamble. And even if it works out, we're wedging the Hushu and their allies in between the Losara Sigil and the rest of our forces, I thought. Considering my sigil had already taken harsh losses at the hands of the Rumena, if the Hushu went all-out against them they might outright collapse. That'd be... bad. Without my own forces out there to stoke the fire, there was a decent chance the 'neutral' sigils there would rally and retreat rather than remain participants in the bloody melee. Soln, I thought, had good instincts. But it was trying to fight with an army we didn't have, and its core mistake was trying to maintain control over a situation that was already too chaotic to handle.

"How long ago did Lovre and Vadimyr set out?" I asked.

"Less than half an hour," Lord Agus said.

"Right, so we've still got time to manoeuvre," I frowned. "All right, here's what we'll do. The entire force holding back the Hushu and their cabal is to collapse immediately and flee towards the centre."

The two drow stiffened with surprise.

"The casualties-" Lord Soln delicately began.

"Will sting, I know," I said. "But your way is as likely to lead in a slugging match we can't afford as it is to drive them to the centre. So instead of forcing them, we'll bait them. That many sigils in a rout? They'll come after them with everything they have, eager for the harvest."

"And we are to simply look upon the situation and wait?" Lord Agus asked, with what I suspected to be a hopeful tone.

Not the fiercest of fighters, this one.

"No," I said. "You two and the two sigils Lord Soln sent out are to attack them from behind once they've committed."

I paused, meeting the Lord of Shallow Graves' blue eyes.

"Lord Soln, force them into the centre," I said. "With everything you have."

The drow softly laughed.

"And I believed myself to be ruthless," it said. "It will be as you say, Queen of Lost and Found."

Lord Agus was a lot less sanguine about essentially throwing both our 'allies' and several of our sigils into a boiling broth, but kept its dismay largely off its face.

"Will you be accompanying us in this, Losara Queen?" it asked.

"Sadly, I suspect I'll be needed elsewhere," I said.

If only because the last thing I wanted was to be surrounded by my own warriors when the Longstride Cabal showed up.

"Do either of you know where Mighty Jindrich is?" I continued.

"The Rumena angered it enough it grew wroth before they were driven back," Lord Soln said. "It was last seen heading out in their pursuit, its mind lost to rage."

"Find the largest concentration of wreckage and corpses, it shall not be far," Lord Agus noted.

"And Mighty Rumena?" I asked.

"Has yet to take the field against us," Soln said. "Though there is word it might have participated in the taking of the central district. It is largely under that sigil's control by now."

"So the dance awaits me in the middle," I mused. "Fitting. Lord Soln, I trust you'll be able to carry out your orders here?"

"That much I can promise," the Lord of Shallow Graves smiled.

"Then wade in their blood, my lord," I said, and translucent wings burst out of my back.

I was thousands of miles away from any orc, but their traditional farewell had hardly ever been more appropriate. I shot back up into the sky and wasted no time before heading out towards the front we'd named the Woods. That district had been the centre of ancient Great Strycht in senses more numerous than the geographical one, even a swift glance made that clear. It was a labyrinth of temples and great halls, each its own little island surrounded by a deep canal and tied to others structures by curved bridges and arches of stone. The sheer vividness of it startled me, for until now I'd seen drow tastes run towards mostly colours grey and dark. Here though, strange and half-faded patterns of blue, red and white covered every surface. Orange and gold served as the colour of the sky in sprawling mosaics where the moon was depicted as a feathered wheel of white-tipped red, the stylized heads of snakes and drow gazing down at the bloodletting from every corner. The depredations of time and abandonment were easy to find, collapsed roofs not since repaired and broken walls serving as makeshift doors, but I was surprised to see some of the paints had been freshly touched up.

Some of those mosaics were splattered with greyish red, though, and that wasn't paint.

A square tower with colourful turrets on the corners burst open at the base, and just like that I'd found Mighty Jindrich. The drow was massive, the largest of its kind I'd ever seen, and covered from head to toe in a featureless carapace of pure Night. I watched, reluctantly impressed, as its fingers sunk into the sides of the same tower it'd just ripped up and it repeatedly smashed the whole thing down on a pair of Mighty until there was nothing left but bloody paste. Then it tossed the whole thing into a temple and screamed monstrosously before leaping into another fight. This was, I thought, my primary ally in this battle. I sure knew how to pick them. I was almost distracted enough that I didn't see the javelin coming, but not quite. There were fires all over the district and trails of smoke going up into the sky, but as the projectile sailed through a large plume I caught sight of the stir it caused and dipped below with a bat of my wings. I raised a brow when I realized there was no hint of power in the toss, save in how far it'd been thrown, and that even if I'd not moved it would likely have missed me. Had some enterprising dzulu decided to bag queen and glory with the same throw?

I'd be sure to praise their guts, before the messy retaliatory murder.

I flew around the plume of smoke and found where it should have come from, eyes landing on a single drow standing atop one of the tallest towers in the district. That was strike one. Even far as I was I could make out the looks of it. It was, well, old. Its grey skin was deeply creased, its pitch-black veins visible through it and though tall it had grown visibly stooped. It held no weapon, attired in a strange belted tunic of obsidian rings. Almost like mail, I thought. Its hair was long and white, going down almost to its waist. That was strike two. Its dim silver eyes met mine all the way across the distance, as if it could see me just as well, and I could not feel a single speck of power from it. That was strike three, and so the drow might as well have 'dangerous, take caution' tattooed glaring red on its forehead. It did not attack a second time, simply waiting. Not an attack, I corrected. A way to grab my attention. My eyes dipped to the large cloth belt it wore, and the Crepuscular I read on that only confirmed what I was already suspecting. Wings narrowing behind me as I dove, I landed smoothly in front of the Mighty Rumena.

Mantle of Woe fluttering as I rose to my full height – which was, rather unfairly I felt, still shorter than the bent old drow – my wings folded behind me. I wasn't dismissing those before I got a clear idea of what was taking place here. I'd read a lot of faces, in my time. I'd watched humanity slide off my teacher's true face like water off clay, the utter blankness of fae bereft of stories. Shades of contempt by the dozen, angers both principled and personal, too many flavours of hatred to count. Irritation from creatures considering me an insolent child, pity from the likes of the Grey Pilgrim and even casual dismissal from the Saint of Swords. Mighty Rumena stood out from that multitude, because all there was in its gaze was attention. Pure and unfettered, as if the weight of it left no place for anything else. It was uncomfortable, to have someone take in all of me so deeply. It didn't feel like scrutiny, and I realized the source of my unease a moment later. I'd seen that look in another pair of eyes: Masego's, when he'd come into his aspect in Arcadia. When he'd witnessed it all with impossible clarity.

"Mighty Rumena," I said. "Your invitation was received."

"Losara Queen," my foe simply greeted me.

It had a calm voice, I thought. Unruffled, unhurried. Like nothing could really affect it. It was old and powerful enough it might not even be wrong about that. It glanced down at the messy fighting below, the screams and blood and fire swallowing up the district.

"I remember this city," Rumena said. "From when it was at its height. The jewel of the south, second only to Tvarigu in beauty. It brings me no pleasure to layer ruin over ruin."

"And yet," I said, "here we are."

"There are only a few of us left, Losara," the Mighty said. "Those who knew this land before Night fell upon it. In Strycht, Jindrich is the only other – and it was young when we lost the wars. Too young to understand the true depth of the loss."

"But you weren't," I said.

If it wanted to talk while my designs unfolded, I had absolutely no objection to that. If we engaged it was going to be the kind of mess that'd make devils blush, and while my forces below weren't winning exactly they were carrying out my plan perfectly. It was hard for them not to, when the entire plan was to create chaos and that was the natural state of the Everdark.

"I was a general, honoured twice for victories won in the Burning Lands by the Twilight Sages themselves," Rumena said. "One of them, I think, against a people whose blood you hold. The look has little changed since those nights."

My fingers tightened. It was implying it'd fought the Deoraithe, at some point, and there was a little problem with that: neither the Kingdom nor the later Duchy of Daoine had ever come under drow assault in recorded history. There was the Golden Bloom in the way, after all. Which meant I was talking to an entity claiming it'd been alive before the elves arrived on Calernia. Three thousand years old, I thought, at least. Gods. It might be the single oldest thing I'd ever met save for the Dead King.

"And now you're a sigil-holder in the remnants of the old empire," I said.

"My army followed me," the Mighty said. "Already they were rylleh and jawor, though the titles had different meaning then. None of them survived the passing of the years. The Night is not a forgiving sacrament."

Sacrament, I thought. Not just a domain, some Name's power manifest. It'd always felt too large, hadn't it? And I had wondered why no drow seemed to be born a mage. This whole time, had I really been looking at an entire people wielding Below's equivalent of Light? Miracles of the darkness, purer in nature than even the stuff devils were made of.

"You saw it happen, then," I said. "What Sve Noc did."

"I knew one of the sisters," Rumena said. "And now know her better still. She is in my blood, in my soul."

Sisters? My eyes narrowed. And it'd called the Sve her. There was something significant about that, I thought. A detail I was missing.

"They broke you," I said. "Your entire civilization."

The drow shook its head.

"Not them," Rumena said. "The Twilight Sages, in their wanton arrogance. How tall stood their pedestal and proud they were of it, until the nerezim cast them down. Only then did they regret the height."

My blood ran cold. For a creature that old and powerful to call something wanton arrogance, how terrible must it be?

"What did they do?"

"They sought to kill death," the Mighty said. "But leashed it instead. We were to live forever, you see. As gods. And we did, for a time."

The old drow's lips twisted into a bitter smile.

"Then we lost the wars," Rumena said. "And while we raged and wailed of wealth lost, of glories unmade, the wise Sages knew terror. For the nerezim put entire cities to the sword, and our immortality narrowed. They had borrowed from what would never be. And with every defeat the debt grew closer to that moment where it could no longer be repaid."

"They didn't make you immortal," I spoke slowly, piecing together what'd been laid out for me to find. "Did they? They stole years from children not yet born. That would never be, because their parents were slain by the dwarves."

It was one of the fundamental laws of sorcery, wasn't it? That you couldn't make something out of nothing. I had not forgotten that glimpsed conversation between Neshamah and the Bard, where she'd implied the Twilight Sages had been mages.

"And so our end loomed, Losara Queen," the Mighty said. "The balance dipped closer to irredeemable disaster with every fallen city. Until the two of them took action."

"The sisters," I said. "They made the Gloom. They made the Night. Before the point of no return was reached."

There was a long moment of silence between us, as the sounds of the slaughter below drifted up to our ears.

"Before?" Mighty Rumena smiled. "O Queen of Lost and Found, did you not come here to rob a corpse?"

I shivered. The old creature laughed.

"Dead, every last one of us," the drow said. "You thought Sve Noc the cause of our ruin, and you were wrong. You thought them the cure to our disease, and you were wrong again. Our most beloved betrayers did not save a single soul. They... delayed."

"It makes no sense," I said. "The Gloom yes, but the Night? It incited slaughter. If instead they'd encouraged childbirth, raised your population, you might have gotten out of it. You've had centuries to recover since those wars, you could have evened the scales."

"You do not understand," the Mighty said. "It was too late, Losara Queen. We were already dying. But those clever sisters, the wicked and the merciful, they struck a bargain."

And I grasped it, then, what it was that I was being told.

"The Night is the only thing keeping any of you alive," I whispered hoarsely. "And the slaughter isn't a mistake or an unforeseen consequence, it's the entire point. Every kill is a sacrifice. Willing. Eager, even. Merciless Gods, Archer was right – this entire realm is an altar."

"The greatest in all of Creation," Rumena said, ruinously proud. "Witness and weep, Losara, the glory of the Firstborn: we alone, of all peoples in the world, have cheated death twice."

"But it couldn't last," I said. "You had to have known that. The dwarves were going to come sooner or later and it was all going to fall apart the moment they did."

"The Night was not an answer," the Mighty said. "But it could be understood as a question."

And another part of the puzzle fell into place.

"Apotheosis," I said. "Through brute force. Trying every possible application of power through hundreds of thousands of Mighty so that a path out could be found."

And I had thought myself inelegant, for merely blundering my way into my mantle. The sisters were trying to force the lock by trying every possible key.

"Was it?" I asked. "Did they find a path?"

Pale silver eyes considered me calmly.

"Come now," Rumena said. "Why would the Shrouded Gods grant such a boon, when our base terror kept their altars slick with blood?"

"So they failed," I said. "Rumena, there's another way. I can help with this. We don't need to fight. Winter-"

I bit my tongue.

"You knew that already," I finally said. "And you still struck."

"You are right, Queen of Lost and Found," the Mighty said. "You can help with this."

As a sacrifice, one last to finally even the scales. And I'd been a good sport, hadn't I? The Everdark entire might be an altar, but I'd consecrated Great Strycht with thousands of dead just so Sve Noc could properly open my throat over its ashes. Even as my alarm mounted, part of me could not help but admire the game of the Gods Below. They'd played their hand flawlessly, hadn't they? It didn't matter to them whether the drow rose from the dark as the Winter Court reborn in shadow, or if the Priestesses of Night devoured my mantle whole and unleashed madness on Creation as a two-faced goddess. No matter who won, they won as well. That was their way, I was beginning to understand. They didn't move like Above, trying to force a victory in every fight. They only ever fought when they couldn't lose.

"Why tell me any of this, if we're going to fight?" I asked, warily backing away.

"To give them time to surround us," Mighty Rumena said.

The roof exploded beneath our feet, and the Longstride Cabal entered the fray.

---

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Our votes are dropping low! Make them not!

NZPIEFACE

"And I had thought myself inelegant, for merely blundering my way into my mantle. The sisters were trying to force the lock by trying every possible key."

So Cat but worse? Damn.

JJR

I've brute forced things in video games before. 4 digit combination locks are the limit though, longer than that I'd probably get bored and give up. And the sisters have been at it for how many centuries? Well, whatever else you can say about them, their not quitters.

NZPIEFACE

When you've got an eternity to make eternity last for an eternity, you tend to have patience.

Dainpdf

Eternity is not so much itself when the dwarves are after you.

---

Ye Mighty, we heard you like immortality so we liquified all your experiences, so you can backstab everything while you try to escape entropy.

.....

***WORM SPOILERS AHEAD***

Reminds me of the entities in worm, giving powers to humans and encouraging them to fight one another so they can harvest intelligent solutions to problems and novel applications of their powers and technology.

therealgridlock

Well the worms had the end goal of reversing entropy, so all their powers still obeyed entropy, even if it stole from another copy universe to give to this universe, since the worms exist across all of time and space and just sorta run all possible copies of a thing til they harvest enough conflict, their main goal is to steal novel tech from species and recreate it themselves.

There's a reason Ward doesn't talk about beating the cycle, the worms have to face an unwanted truth, that entropy comes for us all, and humans will never stop fighting.

Dainpdf

Well, they had a couple hundred thousand Mighty helping...

NerfGlastigUaine

A 4 digit lock still has 10,000 possible combinations. Your patience is still amazing.

Levi Kalden

It seems to me a lot like evolution in its principle

erraticerrata

Character contest continues: White Knight vs Ranger! Link to vote below. (As a side note, I have an internal betting pool with my friends and I'm rather amused by how badly I'm doing in it.)
https://www.strawpoll.me/16898889?fbclid=IwAR0uD9CG0wdL8IGWT30t-A8GRbrq29gZWym1LwzirgdLTWHYL\_nR\_icoWqA

luminiousblu

So is it canonical that Praesi cats will backstab allies? Cats already act like nobility in our own world...

Someguy

I thought that was already proven with the Sentient Tiger Army?

Digitize27

I thought it was an invisible tiger army?

Cap'n Smurfy

No the invisible army was a different one. The sentient Tiger army was the one that backstabbed the current Emperor.

NerfGlastigUaine

#7 on Top Ten Sentences no one ever thought would be written

CipherSKT

i thought it was sentient Tapirs

the tiger army was the invisible one

Javvies

No, the tapirs ate an Emperor, and the precedent of the tigers committing treason was applied to the tapirs. As such, they could be executed for treason, but they were found ineligible to seek a claim of succession by right of killing the Drad Emperor.

Darael

... because, to be precise, they were sentient (like the tigers, and therefore legally capable of treason) but not sapient (and hence not eligible to claim the Tower by right of conquest)

NZPIEFACE

You know, if you want your character to win, you can place them as the first option. I think there's a paper somewhere talking about how that's the more favoured option when people are unsure what to pick.

luminiousblu

That's only the case when you're unsure who to pick. There's basically a single head-to-head so far that wasn't a landslide victory, so it wouldn't have made too much of a difference.

James, Mostly Harmless

The brackets are at <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805>.

Dainpdf

Would love to know your bets once the voting is done. I have made several wrong predictions, myself.

The Verbiage Ecstatic

So far, betting based on seed has been a pretty good strategy: only two upsets so far, and both of those were close seeds: 9 beat 8, which barely counts as an upset, and 10 beat 7 (Victory over Foreign Despots!). Looks like it was a well-seeded tournament!

luminiousblu

"Well, maybe Praesi cats."

Ah yes, Praes, where even the housepets are looking to further their political career and gain an upgrade to sweetened milk for dinner, every dinner.

naturalnuke

Unlike man eating tapirs cats can prove sentience and claim the Tower.

wirelessgrapes

I feel like we now have a Law of Conservation of Ninjutsu on our hands. The enemy bringing in the group of nameless, faceless ringers who will ambush Cat, who is now taking the place of the hero.

Byzantine

Oh yeah, definitely. This is not going to end well for the Drow.

naturalnuke

There is only a finite amount of doom after all. 😊

lennymaster

God I love conversations like this! It shows just how much effort an author puts into their story, by the readers being able to make predictions, without the story becoming the least bit boring. There is predictable, or as Black would put it; Uninspiring, and there is predictable, because the author showed the readers so much of the world it becomes alive and understandable to people that did not think it up themselves.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for explaining so well what was, for me, just a half-formed thought.

Dainpdf

Let's hope that ends up weighing more than the sheer numerical disadvantage. Black did make a career of showing logistics *can* overturn story and sorcery both, in enough quantity.

Andrew Mitchell

And planning. Black was very strong on planning.

Thor

I think it was less that logistics could overcome story and more that if you fulfill the requirements of a story in a way that doesn't cost you too much good logistics and planning can make up for the loss.

Dainpdf

Even a good story will not let someone beat off a sufficiently more numerous/well armed/well trained army. That's basically how Black conquered Callow. And part of why, for Cat, fighting Summer in Creation was very different from in Arcadia.

Byzantine

Ah, but that isn't what Black showed.

He showed that logistics and a knowledge of the stories can be used to turn the story on its head. The second part of that is a requirement, not a suggestion, in this world. Problem here is if anyone present knows stories, it's Cat. The drow are in way over their heads. They got to cheat death twice: The first was on their terms. The second was on Below's. To follow the pattern the third time they will cheat death? That will be on Cat's (Winter's) terms. It wouldn't do for them to cheat death on their own terms for the third time. That would be boring.

Dainpdf

I can't spare the time to find the quotation right now, but I am pretty sure it was said at some point that Black had demonstrated that stories must bow to sheer logistics, if there is enough of the latter.

Actually, I'm pretty sure Cat said the same about fighting the Fae in Creation (as opposed to in Arcadia): logistics matter on this side.

Also, I don't think it's as set in stone as you say. If it were, there'd be no tension to this moment.

HannaB

I mean, Cat always has the option of just bailing to Arcadia, and can fly where Longstriders can't. Logistics kind of favor her here, imho.

...admittedly we don't have any proof Longstriders can't fly. Now THAT would be epic

Dainpdf

That, plus bailing to Arcadia assumes they can't hamper her movement into the portal somehow. Also means she'd need to get Indrani, and give up on her Drow army...

Javvies

The sentient tiger army one of the Dread Emperor's created committed treason, and I suspect they count as Praesi and as cats.

Damn, that's a long time.
And that suddenly makes things a whole lot clearer about the "Why" behind the current state of the drow.

This is not according to plan. Rumena is working with the Longstriders and Sve.

Fortunately, Cat is very good at improvising her way to victory, usually via murdering the everliving fuck out of her enemies.

IDKWhoitis

Alright, so the drow need to repay the debt of life. And theoretically Winter is enough.

So we have a rough measuring stick to measure Cat up to. Cats power is worth nearly 3000 years worth of drow lives.

So assuming there are roughly 500,000 Drow alive, across the entire Everdark, and the normal lifespan is about 60 years, that's 50 generations. So Cat is worth millions of Souls in terms of magical power. Going full tilt, she could recreate Keter several times over and still have some power left over.

Someguy

So when dealing with Below you need proficiency with Contract Law, Financial Systems Management and "Creative Accounting".

Letouriste

Seems like hell alright

naturalnuke

Ah yes, Creative Accounting, the byproduct of Vague Graphs and Approximate Estimation.

haihappen

I never doubted economics classes should feature bloodletting...

Luminant

I'd say it's more along the lines of practically infinite. She is an Immortal, the ruler of half of the prototype of creation. She just doesn't know how to bring it to bear.

WuseMajor

She knows how to bring it to bear, she just doesn't want to pay the cost of doing that.

lennymaster

More like; does not know how to skirt the edge of what she is willing to pay.

sengachi

Their normal lifespan is, I'm guessing, more than 60 years. The unnatural precision of their Nightless lives is because any years past 60 were sacrificed in the original ritual.

taovkool

This Mighty Rumina person might be an old asshole and a dickish one at that.

But damn it all, you have to admit, the old man had style.

Agent J

Wait, old man? Rumena is a female "it", right?

taovkool

One of the dialogue mentioned it was a 'he'. So I just thing of him as a guy.

Antoninjohn

Well Cat does have Akua as a back up plan and she did know that Sve Noc would be making for Winter now

edrey

i cant help but think in the song, the girl who climbed the tower " to join them and rest in the shadows," that's just too fucked

Xreno

That song is basically a summary of the whole story of Practical Guide to Evil.

NerfContessa

Indeed.

Another thing that shows how incredible the setting is.

Just needed to be said. 😊

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Well... Shit.

werafdsaew

Well it looks like Cat's rolling-over-her-enemies arc is over, and some readers have complained about that being unexciting.

Aston W

Time for interludes?

The Drow are going to be very dissatisfied when they find Cat has no power and dumped it already..

Akua Time.

HannaB

So Rumena is the one who's been trying to keep old paints fresh, huh.

I really hope they survive this. Or anyone else from their time who still remembers the old drow culture, so they can rebuild it in the new realm Cat brings them to, whatever that is.

This culture deserves to be reborn, one way or the other.

luminiousblu

Does it? Deserve to be reborn, I mean. Part of the point of a culture is that it is the product of the time and the circumstances that created it. Circumstances which no longer exist. Some things pass, and bringing them back for the sake of nostalgia is pretty senseless.

HannaB

Yeah, I picked the wrong word.

It deserves to be rebuilt. To be remembered. To not be forgotten. Drow deserve to have their culture, their history, what they'd lost.

Dainpdf

Also, considering their culture was what birthed this whole mess, I'm not sure there would be any good in bringing any of it back.

TeK

I would not consider blunders of a bunch of demigods to be a culture. Otherwise, Callow needs to add goblinfire to their cooking in the list of their worst cultural achievements.

Dainpdf

It sounded like their culture was already somewhat focused on raiding and sacrifice before the fall, though...

And, well, Cat got the goblinfire thing from Praesi. No fair pinning that on Callow. You can probably say "a sword in every attic" is part of their culture, though.

nipi

Wonder if Cats going to end up the same for the drow as Black is to the orcs?

Andrew Mitchell

At least equivalent, probably more.

Aston W

Three times cheat death. Winter.

Shequi

Third time's the charm...

Vin reisling

Fell for the monologue cat.

Andrew Mitchell

A conversation, not a monologue. But yeah, she certainly fell for the trap which was cleverly set with just the right bait. Juicy information that Kat really needed to piece things together.

Shoddi

This would fall along the lines of "Never give a mage time to cast".

SMHF

Is it still a trap if it doesn't change anything about her plan?

She wanted to lure every major sigil into the fight in the middle of the city... which she did.

She wanted to start her fight with Rumena away from her own army... which she did.

And she wanted to do all that before the Longstrides showed up... and they just did.

So maybe I'm missing something but I'm not seeing a "OH SHIT" moment here!

Andrew Mitchell

You know, that's a really good point.

The only 'oh, shit' I can think of is that she's surrounded by the Longstride Cabal. I'm pretty sure that wasn't expected.

RanVor

Do I understand it correctly that the Night is pure power of Below?

Oh boy, Masego's gonna be pissed that he haven't come along.

Cap'n Smurfy

The Hierophant, vivisector of miracles, missing an entire race wileding Belows equivalent of priestly miracles in order to forge a goddess? Oh he'll be furiously frustrated.

Ephemeral

Not to mention that this is probably the largest long term Ritual ever performed...

Dainpdf

Cat will have to bring some back for him to examine.

Rup

.."furiously frustrated"..???
..that's a nice turn of words...Cap'n 🍷

Andrew Mitchell

Ooooooh, good point. But I think he'll be able to catch up because there's no way Kat's not coming out of this without Night added to her arsenal. If not personally wielded then certainly via Sve Noc, Akua, or the Lord of Silent Steps.

Dainpdf

That was a great chapter quote. One of the most appropriate yet.

And so the mists part. We see, now, the shape of things – at least in part. The Drow are, in a way, exactly what Below wants – servants so deep in debt they can't afford to stop paying, even as the interest compounds the amount owed, if anything, faster than they can pay.

As for the end... It seems the Drow knew what Cat was planning and had a counter ready. She didn't want to fight the Longstrider Cabal but now she has to face them, plus Mighty Rumena, apparently without Archer. Let's hope she has a plan.

On another note, the true nature of the Night sheds some light on that "offering" Cat was made when she entered the Everdark. Good on her, not acquiring that sort of ugly debt. It's interesting, how Above gifts miracles to basically all their priests and a lot of heroes, while Below does it only to those they own.

RanVor

Above do give their miracles to their priests and heroes, but don't they own every single one of them, in a sense?

Dainpdf

Not in the literal one that Below owns the Drow. While Above has the Good guys eating straight from its hand ideologically, the Drow literally depend on sacrificing their own to Below to survive.

Although, now that I think about it, the Heroes that get the most Light are the choir-touched. And they have all been essentially hollowed out and filled with Above's purpose...

Still, Heroes and even angels can fall. The Drow can't renege on Below. And, actually, the demons can't either. Don't know about devils. Interesting thing, that in this way Above is more permissive than Below. Weird inversion.

benthelynx

Can't they? Wouldn't that be Cat's ideal endgame – to steal the drow from below?

Dainpdf

Considering they owe them more lifespans than they have?

The only reason any Drow lives any length of time is the Night. And since they mostly kill each other, the amount their civilization as a whole pays back each year is most likely inferior to the amount they borrow via births.

benthelynx

Debts only matter if you have to pay them – and fae trickery with contracts is an old story, as is Cats approach to Gordian knots.

Dainpdf

Fae contract trickery is generally them swindling someone, not them helping someone get out of a Faustian deal.

benthelynx

Not that the most recent chapter seems to be going that way.

Dainpdf

No one here is an oracle. I hope.

Tohron

Next line:
"All according to plan."

caoimhinh

Remember Cat's famous words in her first trip to Arcadia:

"We're going to bullshit so hard it becomes a prophecy."

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I hope not. She can't have prepared for this exact situation. But I'm sure she's prepared some contingencies that will be useful.

Stephen R. Marsh

Exploded into the fray and into Arcadia.

...

At least that was what has been telegraphed.

I'm curious to see what really happens.

Nairne .01

Honestly this is a very annoying move EE. Now that place in me that craves for awesome chapters has stirred and it hungers for what kind of resolution you will give us.

Andrew Mitchell

Given how well this series has unfolded, I'm 95% sure EE will deliver an awesome resolution to this crisis.

lennymaster

Does anyone know where I can find as much of the song as has been revealed?

simeraz

if you are talking about the girl who climbed the tower there

http://abridged-guide-to-evil.wikia.com/wiki/

The\_Girl\_Who\_Climbed\_The\_Tower

if not sorry do not know

lennymaster

Thanks!

Zaver SaintCloud

I suppose this should be a given, but.. the Gods Below are dicks

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, they are. For the first time, I'm now thinking of them as active agents in all this.

sengachi

I like how Cat uses the lowercase possessive 'my lord' instead of the honorific 'my Lord'. It's a nice touch.

superkeaton

I am now quite fond of Mighty Rumena.

Kletanio

I don't quite understand the nature of the deal with Below and where it went wrong. Further, why Night is holding this at bay. Can someone help explain it to me?

NZPIEFACE

So the Twilight Sages fucked up. They tried to make drow immortal. That worked for a time, kinda. Then they realized the immortality came from killing a fuck ton of drow. To stop all drow from dying off, Sve Noc made a deal with Below kinda, and took a massive loan with no intention of ever paying it back. She's keeping the whole drow population alive with Night, as well as researching how to make them immortal without it.

Komplode

Do I regret staying up all night waiting for the chapter to come out? Guess I'll find out tomorrow at work

Tirion

Rumena: "I'm distracting you, you big turd blossom!"

---

Chapter 76: Storm Surge

"Quite literally not what I was aiming for, but I can work with this."

– Dread Empress Regalia II, as her flying fortress began falling on Laure

Why was it always explosions?

Everybody always tried to blow me up. Akua, Pilgrim, too many Summer fae to count. Even William, and he didn't even have powers that made it easy for him – he'd used godsdamned munitions. Was there some manual you got when you became Named that set it out as a preferred tactic? Just once, for diversity's sake, someone should start with fire. Or ice, or even bloody lightning. Sure I'd dabbled in the explosion method myself so some – viper tongues one and all – might call me a hypocrite for complaining, but in my defence this was reaching a point where I'd received a lot more explosions than I'd dealt out. Once more, this savage world of ours was proving to be deeply unjust at its core. I was probably going to be blamed for this too. This tower would prove to be some deeply holy place to the drow, and good ol' Catherine Foundling would be charged with desecration of some fancy Night temple. It was getting as bad as the goblinfire, which for the record I didn't use nearly as often as some people implied.

Thinking of you, Hakram.

"Would, like, shadow snakes be too much to ask for?" I said.
"Sure there's a lot of phallic symbolism involved, but-"

A hole the size of a watermelon formed in my torso, scattering my organs in a shower of gore even as I fell. The Longstrides either had a very dark sense of humour or they weren't the most stirring of conversationalists. There were six – no, seven, one was half-veiled by an illusion of Night – drow below and they went about their assault with calculated professionalism. The explosion that'd made an abstractly-patterned portrait of my insides all over the stone had blown me back towards the wall, where a blanket of shadow was already awaiting me. The acid trick again? Best not to test it out, I decided. My wings were smothered in strands of Night the moment they tried to move and take me out of freefall, but I had other options. The gate opened under me, and after a few heartbeats of falling through Arcadian sky I gated back out atop the now-roofless tower. Mighty Rumena was still perched at the edge of it, standing unruffled with its hands folded into obsidian-ringlet sleeves. I killed my wings and formed them out again, getting rid of the interfering Night, and landed on the opposite side with largely accidental grace.

"You seem irritated," Rumena noted. "Is your attempted enslavement of my entire race proving too troublesome for your tastes?"

"That one was a fair shot," I conceded. "Are you not taking part in this kill-a-queen festival?"

"Humans," the Mighty sighed. "Such impatient creatures. All in due time, Losara Queen."

I liked to think I wasn't so much of a fool as to fall for the exact same trick twice in a row, so even as we spoke I'd started moving. Just because I'd found seven of the Longstrides so far didn't meant that was all of them. The sudden attack had not been a pleasant surprise, but my plan was still working out at the moment – as made clear by the fact that I'd been ambushed by a small pack, not the full roster of two hundred. I learned why this particular lot had been the vanguard the moment I leapt down to temple's roof a few dozen feet below and to the side, when they smoothly walked out of the shade cast by statues. In a loose circle of which I was the centre. I was going to get surrounded no matter where I went, wasn't I? Shadow-striding, my Peerage had called it. I was kind of a pain I was no longer the only one on the field with an unfair mobility trick.

"So, you're Longstride Cabal," I said. "Are we not even going to have a round of introductions? Pretty rude of you, I have to say."

I didn't have eyes in the back of my head – although I could actually grow those, I'd found out, I still hadn't figured out how to make them function properly – so I could only make out the appearance of the five relatively in front of me. Not unexpectedly, there was little common to their armaments and looks. Most of them were ageless in that way the Mighty were, but there was one looking even older than Rumena and one I'd have called a teenager if not for the too-sharp features. Spears, swords, one had a nifty steel hammer and there was even one wielding some kind of chain with sharp spikes at the end that had to be a nightmare to actually use in a fight. Armour varied from half-naked to a set of full plate in what I was pretty sure was rune-inscribed granite. Tactics were going to be tricky here: the weapons were probably the least dangerous thing about them, but if they still bothered to bring them into a battle it would be with the expectation they'd have some use. The one in plate, which also looked like it'd been made from grey leather left too long out in the sun, was the only one to reply.

"Full account of your deeds will be taken from a follower after the hunt has come to an end, Queen of Lost and Found," the Mighty said. "There is no need to worry they will be forgot after your passing."

"Not exactly what I was getting at," I replied.

There was a soft sound near the back of the roof and I pivoted slightly so that section entered my peripheral vision. My brow rose: Rumena had joined us, making the leap down effortlessly. The Longstrides parted around it, allowing it to stand among the circle surrounding me. Allies? I hadn't thought this lot, or even drow in general, the kind of people to stick to a pact past its immediate purpose being fulfilled.

"You are seen, Rumena Tomb-Maker," the drow in plate said. "Out of respect for your past office, you will not be hunted this night. Depart without strife."

Tomb-Maker, huh. That was the kind of epithet only people you didn't want to fuck with ended up earning. The drow, stooped old creature that it was, straightened its back with a nasty crack.

"Make me," Mighty Rumena said, voice utterly serene.

Damn. Sure, it'd baited me into a pretty bad situation and it was most likely after my head. But I couldn't deny the old monster had class.

"Are you sure I can't recruit you?" I felt compelled to ask. "I'll be honest, I would spend good money to see you punch Saint in the face."

"So be it," plated-drow shrugged, flatly ignoring me. "Under auspices red I declare-"

"Drown," I shamelessly interrupted, and ripped open my gates.

Three of them shaped like a dome going over all of us. Why not? I had nothing to fear from the waters. And I certainly didn't owe them the courtesy of allowing them to finish whatever murderous ceremonial phrase they'd wanted to speak. It took three heartbeats for the mass of water to hit the rooftop, and by then I was the only one left on it. A thought had the gates closing as the temple under me collapsed, icy waters tearing through the roof with a thunderous crash, and the weight of it had me crushed against the ground beneath. It didn't matter: I formed a globe of ice around myself and gated out heartbeats before some spike of Night ripped through where'd I'd been, leaving Arcadia to tread on the wet grounds outside the temple. I could have gone further out, but the whole point of using the lake-gates as an opening volley had been giving me materials easy to work with. A flick of the wrist had the lakewater turning into mist, billowing out and swallowing our surroundings. I pricked my ears, but could not hear a single one of them moving. Silencing their footsteps was too basic a use of Night for it to have been reasonable to hope otherwise, I conceded, but at least the mist would hinder their vision.

I felt Night flare above and looked up, quietly climbing a large hall's roof to get a better angle, and what I found had me frowning. They'd put us in a box. Using the mist as delineation for the area, one of them had slapped down a rectangular box of roiling Night – with all nine of us presumably inside it. It should be useless, I thought, since I could gate out anytime. But the dawning itch on my skin told a different story. It felt like a ward, or at least something to the same effect. I kept moving, since staying in the same place for too long was bound to get me discovered and then surrounded in swift succession. I glamourised out the sound my footsteps, unwilling to rely on my own limited sneaking abilities to keep me out of trouble, and dropped in a low crouch when I heard the sound of stone shattering in the distance. I couldn't see anyone, at the moment, so I carefully began heading into that direction to see what'd happened. Had Rumena and the Longstrides begun fighting? I got the answer before I finished making my way there, when a temple to my left was brutally flattened by another massive spike of Night. Ah, they weren't fighting. They were methodically getting rid of anything I could use for cover.

If they kept this up, I'd end up on flat grounds with nothing to manoeuvre around. After that, all they needed to do was get rid of the mist and it was all going to eagerly proceed downhill. Clever enemies were the worst, I thought.

Still, I wasn't without an arsenal of my own. I reached for my domain – not to call it down, but to use the substance of it as a tool. One, two, three. I continued forging long chains ending in hooks out of Moonless Night, making them come out of my palms, until I had enough of them for every structure I could make out around me. After that it was only a matter of tossing them at the temples and towers and making the hooks sink into them. I broadened my stance, more out of habit than true need, and after grasping all the chains tightly began to turn. My muscles might be make-believe, nowadays, but the strength was real. With one snap after another I ripped out temples and towers, sometimes mere walls but on occasion the whole thing when the foundation was weak enough. With a grunt I put my whole body into it spinning the entire mass of ripped stone like a giant mace. I didn't need to actually find the drow if I hit everything. Tearing through other structures slowed the momentum, but I kept spinning and so did my makeshift weapon. Had I hit any of them? Maybe, maybe not. I wouldn't have been able to feel it if I had, given the weight difference. Given the nature of my improvised weapon it wasn't hard for the drow to guess at my location – there were chains leading straight to it – and that was things got interesting.

Odds had always been low I'd actually kill one of them with the whirl. There'd been another reason for the move, and I showed as much when a pair of Longstrides emerged out of shadows and I picked two chained temples to send smashing down at them. Both dispersed, shadow-illusions broken by the impact, and it was from behind me they struck. One spear from the left, one from the right, and when I attempted to move forward out of their reach I found a large snake of Night striking out. Yeah, they'd definitely heard me complain. And they had a truly terrible sense of humour. I had only a heartbeat to react, my chained weapons too far to recall in time, so I dropped low. The spears and snake followed my descent flawlessly, but that moment of readjustment bought me just long enough to encase myself in ice. It shattered under the spear tips while the snake went straight though, but I'd left a hole at the bottom and turned into mist. I went back into human shape behind the snake, swinging a wall at it that caved in the shape and broke it apart. Night pulsed like a heartbeat on the other side of the mauled ice structure, and I backed away expecting an assault.

It wasn't, I grasped a moment too late. It was a beacon.

The full seven Longstrides were on me in moments, shadow-striding into the scene. The chains were getting too unwieldy for our combat range, so I drew them back into my domain. Just in time for the enemy cabal to prove they'd come by their reputation honestly. The two fighting me hadn't been going at it seriously, I realized. They were just pinning me down until the other hunters arrived – and when they did, the gloves came off. The sheer variety of Secrets caught me off-guard. One turned into a mass of shifting shadows not even remotely humanoid, tendrils and clawed limbs sprawling out. Another knelt and pressed a palm against the ground, Night spreading from it like a tide of rancid oil. One's own shadow slithered out to connect to mine as another touched its shoulder, and immediately I felt my blood turn into a muddy sludge. A ball of shadows formed over my head, casting impossible stripes of darkness down around me, and drow flickered out of those like they were passages. The entire thing had taken, at most, two heartbeats from the moment they'd gathered here. I'd fought heroic bands that were not nearly that skilled at working together. Shit, I wasn't sure the Calamities would be that good at it.

If this turned into a brawl I was dead. Winter or not, apotheosis or not.

"Let's try it, then," I said. "Your Night against mine."

Darkness fell over all of us, my kingdom manifest – for I was Sovereign of Moonless Nights, and here even Mighty were but troublesome guests. Cold beyond cold enveloped the Longstrides, coating their bodies with frost as their feet bit into supernaturally pristine snow. Not a speck of light here, though it mattered not to my eyes. Something deeper than vision was my due in here. Their Secrets broke like kindling, hollowed out by Winter, but the drow did not flinch. I'd seen my domain make sport of sorcery and devils, turn men into trifles, yet the seven Longstrides shook it off with seemingly little effort. Even bereft of their Night they moved, weapons in hand, and fell upon me. I could feel my power slithering through my veins, pure and untethered, and words were on the tip of my tongue. I swallowed them, familiar by now with the touch of alienation. It was growing in me faster than I could shunt it off. With flawless timing the seven struck together, but before their blades could bite into me I bit into them. There was warmth at the heart of them, flickering candles, and with a pluck of my fingers I smothered the flames. One after another they dropped, puppets without strings.

"Oh, but we are far from done," I murmured as the last fell. "I have a use for you."

If I was forced to use my domain this early, then I would at least get the full value out of it. Silver eyes turned blue, a brilliant droplet spreading and devouring the irises whole. My Longstrides rose to their feet. There was still Night in them, but it was cowed. Tamed by the looming power of Winter holding primacy inside them. How many Secrets would they retain, I wondered? It would be interesting to find out when I sent them out to war. There were still one hundred and seventy three to add to my cohort of monsters, after all. The one wearing plate – Segur, my mind whispered – suddenly shivered. Surprise stilled my hand, just as I'd been about to shatter the domain and return to a marred Creation. It was no longer living, I'd killed it myself. So why did it feel cold?

"Glorious," the corpse laughed. "Deeply, unspeakably glorious. You stole half the Garden from their hands, Losara. It is all there."

Tendrils of silver spread through blue eyes, clawing back ownership.

"You have no power here, Sve Noc, save that which I grant you," I said. "And I grant you nothing."

Will against will, we struggled. I would have been crushed in an instant, were this Creation. But here she was trying to thread an ocean through the eye of a needle. I drove her back, inch by inch.

"But you did," the corpse said. "You let me in. You gave me an anchor. And so I stand, within and without."

Only the smallest sliver left. She was desperately trying to keep it in her grasp, but she did not belong here. I did not simply rule this place, it was me. My soul, or whatever was left of it, given shape. The dead drow turned to face me, the last pinprick of silver dying.

"Let it be one and the same," Sve Noc laughed. "All is Night."

I won and lost in the same moment. Chased her away just as she struck. My world of moonless night screamed, a cut appearing in the endless sky. It spread quick as lightning, splitting the starless firmament in half, and I screamed along my domain at the inhuman pain of it. A touch like fingers whispered through the opening, grasping the sides, and like curtains being opened the sky was pulled back.

I stood kneeling, forced back to Creation, as the whole of Winter was unleashed upon Great Strycht.

It was merciful thing when the darkness took me.

—

I woke up in a monstrous amount of pain, shivering.

My eyes opened to a moonless sky and a scream ripped itself free of my throat. It was wrong, wrongwrongwrong. It should not be there. There was no ceiling behind it, only an endless void that was no longer mine. My limbs were numb from the heinous throbbing that had claimed every speck of my body, feeling nothing but the pain. My fingers clawed at the ground and it gave. Were they bleeding? It was like they'd been scraped raw. I forced myself to sit, but my arms were shaking and I fell back. I swallowed the scream, but my throat bulged and I found myself spewing on the ground. I had to crawl away not to drown in it, nothing but clear water leaving my mouth. But the taste of it... Gods, nothing tasted like that. It was like life leaving my wretched body. I was surrounded, I finally saw, by ice and snow. As if some divine blizzard had ripped through the city, sparing nothing. I could not hear a single living soul. I couldn't... My body seized up and I twisted like a worm against the frost. I could hear only my own breath. I couldn't hear faraway, not anymore. I could no longer sense the heat of living things, or see flawlessly in the dark. She's taken all of it.

I was just Catherine Foundling, and might as well have been blind.

I could feel my heart beat, my real heart. My blood flow from my veins. I had never in my life felt so vulnerable as I did then, stripped of every bit of power I'd clawed my way into owning. Made just a bag of blood and meat, one wracked with feverous shivers. The pain was going away, replaced by a cold numbness, and that was when I realized I was dying. Gods, I was tired. I tried to crawl again but my leg flared with agony even through the numbness. My limp, I thought, almost drunkenly. My bad leg. The wound I'd cheated my way out of so many times, but it seemed that dance could only be danced for so long. I fought to keep my eyes open, but the entire world was forcing them to close. I had lost. Some part of me rebelled at the thought. The same voice that'd kept me going through butcheries and catastrophes, through every dark hour I'd ever faced. It shouted, but the sound was dim. Muted. Dying, like the rest of me. The thought came guilty, but it would not go away. It would be a relief, wouldn't it? To sleep. To finally rest. I tried to think of Callow, but found nothing there to make me stand. I had brought so much destruction to my home, every day claiming I was saving it.

I'd given so much, without a single clean victory to show for it.

I wept into the snow, tears and dark laughter choking up my throat. Snot dripped down, to my visceral disgust. How long had it been, since I'd had snot? The thought startled me by its inhumanity. I'd died long before today, perhaps that was the harsh truth of it. My eyes closing here would just be a formality, a final curtain. I buried my face in the cold and waited. No footsteps came. No sharp memory drifted to the surface of my fevered mind. No vision filled my unseeing gaze, some mentor or foe chiding me or raising me up. Not a single damned thing. I was dying, and the world answered with resounding silence. But we all died alone, didn't we? That was the secret at the heart of Winter. I had worn grandiose plans in place of the regalia I disdained, and a single defeat was enough to shatter all of them. Was it like that with everyone? Or had I simply been building on sand all this time? There were no answers to be found, I knew. And the questions rang empty when I asked them. Would they mourn me? Some, I thought. Few, I admitted after. It would hurt the handful I'd found it in me to love, but that knowledge did not stir me as much as it should have. I was in pain as well, and for all that I had tried to be a better woman in the end my own pain mattered most to me. I'd stood for hours at the edge of the roof, as a child. Back at the orphanage. Because I'd been afraid of heights and hated it. Maybe there had been wisdom in that fear, I now thought. Maybe deep down I'd known there would always be that voice whispering taking the drop, oh so temptingly.

I waited and did not die. My face was warm again, I realized. I'd melted the snow enough I could breathe. I laughed. I couldn't help it. Even through the painful convulsions I laughed, until a spasm had my cheek lying against a snow.

"Do I have to do everything myself?" I croaked out.

I fell into another fit of laughter at that. The sound of it was ugly to my ears, but then everything was. Gods, this entire world had gone from a master's work to a child's scribble. It almost felt beneath me to stay in it. But no, they wouldn't get to have that.

"That was your chance," I said, to no one at all.

I was already dead, wasn't I? Or close enough. A goddess had ripped open my soul and let the contents spill out. I was mortal as an insect, and there was no changing the ending striding towards me. I should have broken me, that knowledge. The inevitability of it. But it didn't. It was liberating. There were no stakes now. Nothing left to lose. Whether I rose or not would make no difference. So why bother, a voice insisted.

"Why not?" I whispered.

My arms gave again. Twice I fell back into the same patch of ice, stuck there watching it until the pain ebbed low and I could stomach moving again. But I managed to sit the third time, and that felt like something. My bad leg folded like parchment when I tried to stand and the fall that followed had me weeping like a child for the ache, so instead I crawled in the snow until I reached a broken wall and slowly hoisted myself up. To my hilarity, there were only about four feet of wall left to prop myself against until I'd have to stand on my own.

I had crawled to the wrong fucking wall.

I was choking on a mouthful of laughter – and bile, I was still dying – while considering where I should crawl next when a silhouette walked out of the dark. I couldn't make it out, at first, or hear it move. But eventually the face swam into focus and I found the pale silver eyes of Mighty Rumena watching me.

"Ah, finally," I drawled, regally flopping my wrist at it. "I was getting bored. And crippled, but that one's admittedly not your fault."

Choosing my words with great care, I grinned and met its gaze.

"Take me to your leader," I ordered.

---

nipi

Akua might be forging a story for herself with that "friendship" bit. One that makes it hard to keep her in the box. After all friendship is notoriously hard to keep bottled up.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a good thought. I think your allusion to an AI in a box is very apt.

NerfContessa

It should not have been possible to remove winter from her while still alive.

I call cheating! :p

Though her way of acting is heartwarming

MiamiMagus

Found this blog completely by accident when looking for another blog. I'm going to start reading this at the beginning. That quote at the very top is awesome! Pleaee keep doing this.

– M

Anaspides

Cat's power has changed so much, I wondered where it would go next. I think this has been my favourite chapter so far! What a fantastic story. On to the next chapter!

---

Chapter 77: What Goes Around

"In trying to beat a fool at her own game, I have only made another."

– Theodosius the Unconquered, after the Maddened Fields (apocryphal)

"Not to nitpick," I said. "But being carried this way is doing great injury to the inherent dignity of a woman of my station."

Mighty Rumena had, after sundry misadventures, hoisted me over its shoulder and was now lugging me around like a sack of cabbage. I got the distinct impression the old bastard was having a lot of fun with this.

"If I allow you to lean against me instead," Rumena said. "Will you cease attempting to strangle me?"

The drow was a tyrant, truly. It was my Gods-given right as a Callowan to rebel against foreign powers regardless of context or feasibility.

"Yes," I lied.

Mighty Rumena fluidly leapt over a canal, landing on the other side with barely a sound. It jostled my body enough I had to bite down on a scream.

"So," I got out. "We doing this or what?"

"No," the Mighty said. "I merely wanted to see if you would lie."

That prick. I'd gotten my hopes up, thinking of looking for something sharp to stab it with instead of having another fruitless go at strangulation – my fingers were too shaky to have the requisite strength, and to be honest I wasn't sure it actually needed to breathe.

"Fine," I said. "Obviously you're a man – drow, I mean – of deep cunning and perception. I'll level with you, Rumena. I was going to try to murder you again."

"I am aghast at this unexpected turn," Mighty Rumena said.

Oh, so Crepuscular could do sarcasm. This was a day for revelations.

"Since murder doesn't seem to be working out for me, I'll try bribery," I continued. "Betray... who is it you're working for at the moment?"

I probably should have inquired as much before beginning the process, I mentally conceded. Hindsight was a harsh mistress, as the effective evisceration of my soul and mantle had made clear.

"Arguably my kind," Rumena said. "Practically speaking, the youngest sister."

"That the murderous one, or the one that's basically suffered a few millennia of torture by Night?" I squinted.

"The former," the Mighty replied.

"That's fine then," I mused. "So, betray her drow ass and I'll give you half of Procer."

"I know of no such place," Rumena said.

"Right, it's pretty recent as far as nations go," I muttered. "Think the central chunk of western Calernia."

"And you currently rule these lands?" the drow asked.

"Sure," I said. "I mean, in a manner of speaking."

Lies were, technically, one of those.

"Fertile fields?" the Mighty asked. "Peaceful neighbours?"

Well, half of that was true. There was that unfortunate thing about the Kingdom of the Dead and the Chain of Hunger bordering it, but nowhere was perfect.

"Absolutely," I answered without missing a beat.

"You are a surprisingly terrible liar," Mighty Rumena said, sounding impressed in the worst way. "How have you managed to survive this long?"

"Good officers, luck and the ability to walk off lost limbs," I replied, more honestly than I'd meant to.

Of course, in a sense I hadn't. Survived, that was. I'd died at First Liesse and then kind of again at the Doom. The whole Winter-eats-your-soul thing had felt in the general wheelhouse of dying, anyway.

"Luck always runs out," Rumena said.

"What a deep philosopher you are," I sighed. "Any more profound truths you'd like to share?"

"You warred against an entity older than the civilization that birthed you," the Mighty said. "Wielding weapons in which it holds superior mastery, following a plan laughably straightforward and fielding armies which owed you no true loyalty. All this, and somehow you believed you would win."

"Ouch," I said, not particularly offended.

I'd already lost, what was there left to be offended about?

"We going somewhere with this?" I asked after a heartbeat of silence.

"Nowhere, evidently," Mighty Rumena said.

The Secret of Scathing Retorts was unfathomably deadly, I mused. The half-blind pieces of meat that were now my eyes took in our surroundings as well as they could as the drow carried me through the ruins of Great Strycht – and there could be no word for it but ruins. Winter had blown through mercilessly, upending temples and halls like children's toys. We must have still been in the central district when it found me, because our surroundings were vaguely familiar. They lay off the canals, at least, since the city looked like it'd been smashed to pieces by an irritated god. In a sense, it had been. It wasn't hard to find the dead, though it certainly was to tell which side they'd belonged to. Frozen silhouettes of drow, many seized halfway through a motion, were scattered all over the district. Some had tried to run, I saw. It hadn't done them any good.

"Is everyone in the city dead save the two of us?" I asked.

"You were not so powerful as that," Mighty Rumena said. "Many of those who fought under your banner remained, before they were made to kneel. And Sve Noc preserved her own when the heart of you was ripped out."

"Soul," I corrected mildly. "The soul of me, Rumena. Come on, it's not that complicated a concept."

I was mildly surprised having that ripped open hadn't killed me, but then maybe I shouldn't be. Akua had walked around without hers for years before our little heart-to-hand. She'd also been soulless in another way entirely long before that, but that was a different story.

"Not complicated," the Mighty slowly repeated. "Are you chiding me for considering the process of apotheosis a complex matter, Losara?"

"I mean, Praesi know about it," I said. "How complex can it really be?"

"I will cherish the memory of our little talks, after your throat is slit," Rumena said. "I believe you might be the single most aggressively ignorant creature I've ever encountered."

I spat out a ball of phlegm and bile, aiming for its leg and missing narrowly. So, interesting information there. I was being carried to a sacrificial altar, which I'd already kind of suspected but hadn't known for sure. Added to the bit about my former forces being 'made to keel', I now considered it a safe bet that Ol' Sve herself had come down for a bit of ceremonial knifework. Strange she hadn't killed them outright, though. Was it because she couldn't, or because she had a better use for them? It'd be a splendid little bit of irony if she ended up using the framework of oaths I'd built as the model for the army she'd be taking to the surface.

"I'm flattered, really, but I'm not in the market for a nemesis," I replied. "There's probably a line and it'd be unfair to all those angry heroes for you to just skip ahead."

"It is admirable that you refuse to compromise your principles even moments away from your unmaking," the Mighty said.

"I can't tell if you're being sarcastic right now," I said. "And I think my hearing might be going, because there's this weird screaming sound that-"

I paused, then swallowed. Oh, so my hearing wasn't going. Nice to know. Slightly less nice was the patchwork of rippling Winter I was looking at. Ribbons of shimmering blue storming about uncontrolled, eating away at an obsidian tower like the King of Winter had suddenly said 'fuck this building in particular'. My vision dimmed and I looked away blinking. It stayed dim, like a shadow had been cast over everything I saw.

"You could have told me I'd go blind looking at it," I screamed through the ruckus.

Rumena made me wait until we'd left the immediate area before answering.

"Did you?" the drow curiously asked. "Interesting. It should have driven you mad as well, then, and you sound no less coherent than usual."

"I think we hit the bottom of that barrel a few years back, buddy," I said.

That had been a knot of pure Winter, I thought, and it had been running wild. The power had never done that while I held the mantle. The – I avoided thinking of the word, knowing it would send me into another episode – nothing above our heads was the same as my domain's, so I'd assumed that Sve had devoured the whole thing. Or at least bound it somehow. But this was an interesting twist, wasn't it? Even if was in her belly, it looked like she was having some issued with digestion.

"So, how strong is your boss' stomach?" I casually asked.

"As strong as it takes," Mighty Rumena soberly replied.

"Gods, is that what I sound like when I talk that way?" I asked. "Someone could have told me it made me sound like an asshole. I'd have stopped."

"I assure you, there is no need to rely on specific sentences for that effect to be achieved," the drow smoothly replied.

"So much sass, Rumena," I grinned. "But was that uncertainty I detected? Someone's worried Sve bit off more than she can chew."

"A passing thing," the Mighty said. "In a sense, much like you."

Ah, and there it was. The reason it hadn't just nonchalantly torn off my head back when it'd first found me choking on my death in the middle of a broken wreck. I was still of use somehow. A sacrifice to cement Sve Noc's hold on my domain? I'd earned the mantle through murder, back in the old days of about two years ago. It might be that proper succession required the same deed by her hand.

"So, are we there yet?" I asked.

Rumena sighed, and I took perverse pride in the way I was managing to get under the skin of a creature a few millennia my senior. Unfortunately it then shook me on its shoulder, letting me slip back a little, and the fresh pull on my abdomen had me howling. The throbbing pain brought unwilling tears to my eyes, and to add insult to injury my throat began heaving. The droplet that tipped the cup was that even as I began spewing out clear water and bile the Mantle of Woe fell down over my face, smothering it all over my face. The Mighty left me like that for quite a while, until my stomach felt empty once more, and only drew me back up when left the district. The vomit-strewn cloak remained draped all over my face.

"That was genuinely cruel," I rasped out.

"Possibly why I enjoyed it so much," Mighty Rumena noted.

It was not far before our magic journey together came to an end, though of course I had no idea. The Mantle of Woe was still covering my face. I was carefully set down on solid ground, propped up against something that felt like stone. My legs didn't pain me at all, which I took as the opposite of a good sign. I was metaphysically bleeding out. Rumena's fingers closed around the hem of my cloak and pulled it back, finally revealing my surroundings to me. It was a hill of barren stone, one that must have once been an island. My Mighty friend was at my side, but we had other company: over a hundred drow were scattered around us, weapons in hand. The rest of the Longstrides? Without my otherworldly senses, I had no way to tell them apart from any other drow. Ahead of me lay a broke stele of obsidian, the symbols on it faded and the better part of it laid down as a makeshift altar. All of that paled, though, in comparison to the silhouette standing over it. A perfectly androgynous face larger than my entire body stared down at me, descending into a neck that melded with the robes of pure Night beneath it. Eyes of unbroken silver shone bright, but it was the hair that drew my attention. Long strands of darkness that went up into the nothing above like puppet strings.

"Sve Noc," I said. "Good of you to finally show up."

I cleared my throat, spat another bit of bile to the side.

"You may kneel," I allowed.

There was a heartbeat of silence, and then I was drowning. Thick, cloying terror buried me – the kind I had not known in ages, that screamed so loud it drowned out every thought. It was a primal thing, old as the nights where mankind had first huddled around fires for fear of what prowled outside. It was, I thought, almost religious. I began laughing in delight.

"That's the stuff," I grinned, body shivering uncontrollably.

"Gods, you wouldn't believe how long it's been since I felt this much like a person."

Did she think this would break me? She had ripped open my soul. There was not a godsdamned thing left to break. The sea around me ebbed, and still the tinkling pleasure of real emotion stayed in my every extremity.

"Alone and lost," the Priestess of Night said. "As promised, Catherine Foundling."

"Please," I said, waving a shaking hand. "Call me 'Your Majesty'."

My half-blind eyes drifted around her... well body, was the closest word to it. And the revelations of the day continued, for there were threads in her robes that seemed more solid than others. Whatever she was doing, it wasn't finished. Considering the altar in front of me, the shape of the conclusion was rather obvious.

"Queen of Nothing," Sve Noc said. "And so no queen at all."

"Am I?" I mused. "Then why bring me here at all?"

"Tools wear no crowns," Sve Noc said.

"Clearly you've never met Cordelia," I said. "From the fact that my throat has yet to be slit, I take it we've a little while still before we get to the good stuff?"

"Your doom is writ," the creature said.

"Yes yes, very ominous," I snorted. "Rumena, be a dear and find my pipe will you? No point it making this uncivilized."

The Mighty had moved a few steps away from me while I traded barbs with its goddess, but not entirely left. It glanced at Sve and found no answer there – she seemed a little miffed by my refusal to take this seriously – so in the end it strode forward to rifle through my cloak pockets. I took the opportunity to clasp its ringlet tunic and wipe my face somewhat clear of vomit. You know, for appearances' sake. Rumena stuffed my pipe half-heartedly and offered it. I clasped it between my teeth and leaned forward.

"A light?" I asked.

The drow's fingers lit up with black flame and within moments the wakeleaf was burning. Black flame, really? Did every single application of Night have to colour appropriate? There was such a thing as taking an aesthetic too far. I breathed in the smoke with a shiver of pleasure, letting it stream out of my nostrils.

"Oh," I murmured around the shaft. "So that's what it used to taste like. I'd almost forgotten."

To my utter delight, the little moan I let out after made Rumena visibly uncomfortable. I leaned back against my stone.

"I don't suppose any of you folks have a decent bottle of wine?" I called out at the Longstrides. "It's been ages since I could properly enjoy one of those."

There was some confused shuffling, but no answer.

"And they call Callow a backwater," I sighed. "You all make for terrible hosts."

"No guest are you," Sve Noc said. "A bird of misfortune, headed to grim ending."

"Bold words, coming from a woman visibly fucking up her apotheosis," I replied. "How's Winter taste, Sve? A bit too much to swallow?"

It was a true shame Indrani wasn't there to make a ribald joke out of that, I thought.

"All will be Night," the Priestess thundered.

"You're just a pile of disappointments, aren't you?" I said. "At least Rumena knows its way around a phrase. You're just yelling threats and platitudes. It's pretty common with old monsters, you know? You haven't talked like a person for too long, so you don't know how anymore. Even Neshamah has touches of that."

"You think to threaten me with the King of Death?" Sve Noc laughed. "You know nothing."

I pulled at my pipe, eyes almost rolling into the back of my head at the pleasant sensation. I'd become so much less, but what I had left was so much more alive. Something as simple as the burn of smoke in my throat felt like the finest of wines.

"I know some things," I retorted mildly, spewing out the smoke. "Like, for example, that Winter is a hard stallion to break in. It's not really meant to give, you get me? It's not flexible the way a Name is. Now, if I had to guess, you're too far gone into whatever the fuck you actually are to worry about something as paltry as alienation. So the issue would be that you're just as... static as the power you're trying to eat. You can't change to match it, like I did, so you can't align either. You have to bludgeon it into obedience, and that's proving a little trickier than you'd like."

"Crawling, wretched thing," Sve Noc said. "Still trying to escape your fate even now. Stripped of every ounce of stolen power, tumbling through death's door."

"Oh, Sve," I said gently, a grin tugging at my lips. "You poor thing. It's already too late. You see, this was all part of my plan."

In the absence of an actual scheme, it seemed like I was going to have to bluff a living goddess. Odds were I was going to bite it regardless, but if I was going to die I was at least going to shit talk the opposition on my way out.

"Your deception is feeble," the Priestess said. "Your plans are known to me."

"Convenient, isn't it?" I mused. "That you knew them all. That you crushed me so easily. Almost like I let you."

"Mad and desperate," Sve Noc said. "You resort to flimsy lies."

I inhaled the smoke, closing my eyes, and let it out. The acrid tang stung my nose, beautifully so.

"Why so many warriors, Sve?" I asked, opening my eyes.

"Witnesses, honour guard? Nah, this is best left quiet. Not the kind of knowledge you want floating out there. I think it's a statement of power. A reminder of hopelessness, to break me down. But if that's the case, why these warriors?"

I croaked out a laugh.

"If you really wanted to stick it to me," I said, "you wouldn't have used people you already owned body and soul. You would have had my own army standing in submissive silence. But you don't."

I met eyes of blinding silver and smiled.

"I wonder why that is?"

"They have knelt," Sve Noc said.

"I think you broke them," I said. "I think you hurt them. But that you don't own them, not yet. Because this is still my soul, even splattered over the countryside, and you need a little something to take you over the top. Queen's blood, queen's death. A passing of the torch."

I cackled.

"How does it feel, to fall short even after millennia of scheming?" I asked. "It stings, I bet."

Gods forgive me, but I had missed this. Teetering at the brink of annihilation, knowing if I was struck down I would not rise again. Dancing with death bereft of anything but wits and lies, knowing the first mistake would also be the last. It was terrible and treacherous, the kind of recklessness that had left a trail of ruins in my wake, but Merciless Gods I had missed this. I'd grown dull, under the sway of my mantle, and now I felt sharp again. Maybe I was drunk on the feeling of my own mortality, on the truth that there was nothing left to lose, but I felt like myself again. Finally, just as life left my body.

"And all you fine Mighty," I called out. "Will you just stand there like silent statues as your fates are thrown like dice? Do you not have a stake in this?"

"Be silent, Losara," Mighty Rumena hissed.

"Come on, be someone," I grinned. "Act. Sure, I would have made you servants. For the span of a cosmic breath and no more, but I'll own to that. I never thought much of it, since that thing in front of me has already made slaves of you."

"We are Mighty," one of the Longstrides replied. "Your words are empty."

"That might be true right now," I said. "But will you still be, when she's done eating Winter? Hells, I would have required service for a decade or two but her? She'll own you wholesale until the Last Dusk."

Rumena struck me across the face, and the only thing I could think was that it'd just made a mistake. If it'd let me keep talking unworried that would have been one thing, but trying to silence me? That gave my words weight. And theirs was a path of betrayal, wasn't it? They watched for the knife in everyone's hand. Even their own goddess. I couldn't make out what happened, but a moment later Rumena was thrown back and two silhouettes stood between it and me.

"Speak your piece, Losara," one of them ordered.

"Enough."

They screamed, the two drow, and fell as Night ripped its way out of their bodies like smoke. The same happened all around me, every Longstride messily collapsing. The tall shape of Sve Noc drifted forward, tendrils of darkness wrapping around my body and dragging me to the altar. She was looming over me in a way that was not physical, her... presence enveloping me whole. As if I was being devoured.

"Trickery is no match for real power," Sve Noc said.

"Then fear me, drow," Akua Sahelian announced, "for I wield the power of friendship."

I turned right in time for the shade, grinning gloriously with half her body emerging from my cloak, to bury her arm into my torso up to the elbow.

I'm placing my bet on Akua being the final boss fight. A couple books later, when all is set and done, she's going to be the 'fate of the world' conflict.

Cheese

Mmm. I like the shape of it. "There is no greater foe than one's closest friend". Or something.

Shequi

I like Rumena. This story has been needing a Deadpan Snarker and I never realised it until one showed up.

JunkerZone

Masego, Robber, and Hakram did deadpan snark pretty well

Oshi

All three of whom have been carefully removed from play for the moment. I missed it too.

stevenneiman

Human Catherine as well. She did have a few good snarks as the Sovereign of Moonless Night, but not as many as she did as a mortal. I love how she literally gave less than no fucks about getting blasted with mind-rending terror. Puts even her performance with the Saint of Swords to shame, and that was enough to hobble the Saint down to Archer's level.

HannaB

"I think we reached the bottom of that barrel some time ago"

Catherine is not above self-burns for the sake of a good line and that's what makes her the best at it ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Yes!

I love it that she has a pretty realistic perspective on herself.

HannaB

My forever favorite remains "Gods, is this why Black never accepted my reports without a bottle of wine nearby?", but "we reached the bottom of that barrel a few years back" is a strong contender ♥

stevenneiman

Where were those two? I like both, but I don't remember either of them. Personally, my favorite self-burn from her was "My soul is full of zombies. Maybe I do need to make some friends."

Andrew Mitchell

The first one is from <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/11/08/chapter-42-plateau/> and the second is from this chapter.

stevenneiman

The thing I kinda wonder is if he actually did kill someone to claim their sass. Probably not, given that Sve Noc didn't have it.

Adrian V

Oh God i am wanting more and more for Cat to not get back her mantle or powers or whatever, i hadn't realized how much she had changed but this chapters brings back the old Cat we loved when starting the guide, she is right she may be less but at the same time she is so much more now (think quality over quantity, although that may not be a perfect comparision), i hope there is some change or mutation to the power, hell wouldn't it be funny if she steals Sve's heart? xD

And maybe i am just grasping at straws but this whole Losara is starting to sound like a posible name, think about it "Queen of Lost and Found" sounds like a name and may be even more fitting for her role int he story than black queen, she is like Sheppard in ME2!!! (the whole finding lost assassins instead of lost puppies xD)

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm actually really liking "Queen of Nothing" myself. For somebody who's going to conquer Praes for sure (she knows the song) and probably Procer after but has stated her intent to abdicate her current kingdom, it works. Always the conquerer, always giving the throne to another after. And Regent Vivienne of Callow, Dread Empress Akua of Praes, and maybe even Cordelia of Procer (who in my little ficlet has become the Damned known as The Fallen Prince in the process of shunning the Heroes and their goals to ally with her once enemy), all fully aware that should the accords ever be broken, the Queen of Nothing will come back with the backing of the Sovereign of Moonless Nights and her oath-bound army to see that they are upheld and the offending party educated very thoroughly that they have fucked up.

HandyCapped
crescentsickle

That is one of the single greatest lines in this story. It is so maddeningly, terrifyingly wrong, and yet it makes sense.

Akua Sahelian wielding the Power of Friendship to defeat the dread Sve Noc.

Djinn O'Cide

Nothing beats "Yoink", but that comes close. By the way, Rumena is now my favorite character in the entire series. Only Archer even comes close.

stevenneiman

Yeah, it's a pity he wasn't established in time for the popularity contest. I don't think he'd win, but after this chapter he definitely deserves a chance if there's ever a second contest.

philosophize70

The first thing I thought when I read it was: "when did this become a My Little Pony crossover?"

jonnnney

Personally I blame the goats

Euodiachloris

Always a solid move. *nods sagely*

stevenneiman

It was totally forshadowed. All she wants is power, and she noted that Cat's methods, though occasionally a little twee, were able to actually beat her.

And yeah, I think that's actually my favorite line so far. "Yoink" was pretty good, as was "I hear you want to throw down", but for me at least this blew them out of the water. I was laughing so hard I could barely breathe for a good 30 seconds.

HannaB

She has also commented that playing hero was surprisingly entertaining.

Akua's going to stick to this side, in this my prediction is certain ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Certain? Really? 100% chance, for sure?

Certain enough to stake your whole bank account on it? Your life?

HannaB

I don't have a bank account with any money in it, so sure!

the life part though, hmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmmm

I would like to revise my prediction to "she is getting a redemption arc, but in the middle of it backstabbing shenanigans are fully possible" for clarification

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahaha. Perfect! 😊

NerfContessa

Indeed. We shall give her a pony name then.

Dusk glimmer?

Midnight sparkle?

:p

doominator10

This was the hardest ice laughed in a chapter all book save for when Akua borrowed Cat's body. Great job XD.

HannaB

Akua is wonderful, isn't she just ♥

Decius

The last thing Akua is is just.

HannaB

"Fuck off and die" – Akua, getting really into method acting

Overneath

I think that power of friendship line is my favorite one of the whole series so far

d0m1n1c

And I thought Storm Surge ended with a sheer cliff.

Nif

Well they're pulling a irrant the odly successful as they stated a few chapters back

Argentorum

Other fun thing, this proves that Wekesa was wrong about Cat. She's still herself.

Yes the Mantle changed her, but underneath, she's still the same old Cat. If she gets winter back, this time, then she'll be ready for it.

I hope she does. I want to see a Cat that is still herself even in Winter. Here's hoping Akua didn't just kill her and there's some deeper metaphysical bent to the whole arm through the chest thing.

Insanenoodlyguy

Was she? She implied herself she might have died twice now. At the very least, it seems she likes this version of herself better.

I do think however that she's going to be okay now. I think Akua is doing the same thing Winter King did to her before. She was still mortal at that point. Less power, overall but we knew she was barely scratching the surface of winter so all the tricks she learned she can probably still do, just with a bit more effort needed and a bit less durability and immortality. Which means she won't be able to rely on them as much, which might actually be a good thing considering how it'll force her mind to stay sharp. Akua is really better equipped to handle all the big winter shit anyway. She will make an excellent Sovereign of Moonless night. Best of all, because she's now even more fae-powered then before, her need to obey her current master has only increased, and she probably is what is keeping Cat alive in the bargain which means she's got a pretty good lease on life for the moment.

matesbe

That... is an alternative I genuinely hadn't thought of, and it's possible (though if Akua does eat Winter and become the new Sovereign, Cat's going to need to at least pick up a Name to remain competitive in the story).

I still think Cat's going to get Winter back though; otherwise... how's she going to survive an arm through the chest? Also, it's implied that even as she's bantering she's also dying from the way her soul was cut open, just slowly.

Author Unknown

Interesting you should mention Cat getting a new name. Squire can't advance while her mentor is still alive and we still don't know what is happening with Black.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat isn't Squire anymore. Hasn't been for some time. whatever she does or doesn't become, she's not locked into that.

stevenneiman

Not true. Squire traditionally moves on to Black or White Knight, but Apprentice almost certainly has the same tradition with Wizard of the West and Warlock., and look at the previous Apprentice now. And for all that she retained of her lessons from Amadeus, Cat hasn't been anywhere near the track to the Black Knight for a long time. Besides, she isn't even the Squire right now, as whatever was left of the Name seems to have been torn away along with Winter. Otherwise she would have been faring a lot better in the Winter Wonderland, at least until Rumena found her.

Insanenoodlyguy

It Cat doesnot become Soverign again, I am 100% sure she'll end up with a name of some sort. 90% sure that name will have "Queen" in it.

Nairne .01

Remember that Aqua is basically a projection? Soul-arm through chest doesn't sound as wounding (physically at least). I'm thinking Aqua is giving her back the fragment of Winter, or at least giving her access to it, and via it, the rest of winter.

Plaguehunter

Of course there's a deeper metaphysical meaning to this, remember, she's already been technically killed twice and everything happens in threes.

Oshi

Yes! Someone else caught on. This is the old pattern repeated. She has died twice now. Each death leading to ever increasing power until she achieves the ultimate gift.

HannaB

That's also not counting the time Black stabbed her through her chest. Like that was apparently just him being dramatic for the hell of it, but Cat's first gain in power came through at least a symbolic death as well.

I agree with you that this is the third in a pattern though.

Bart

WTF? 😊

This is a glorious chapter in which I have no idea what is going on but it sounds great and I'm sure it'll all be explained in the end.

So Catherine is back to being a normal human? No powers at all? No Name, no Winter...

And what's up with Akua?

NZPIEFACE

One of my favourite quotes from this series:

"Who should be truly afraid? The dragon or the peasant with the sword?"

daegone823

Why because peasant can be gobbled up by dragons or that dragons can be gobbled up by heroes (archer named especially)

I wonder what that is like being a great and prideful dragon living for hundreds of years seeing the passing of time the rise and fall of empires. Gorging on peasant after peasant, hoarding riches that serve no other use than to cement that you take and keep what you please. Still there is a vein of fear that creeps for each village you destroy for each maiden you abduct all it takes is one soul who feels it is their destiny to destroy you to end you, and they will develop powers that defy you.

Whether it being impervious to injury, an almost impossibly lucky fool that seems to fail his way to success, or a mighty sword forged by something or other that can pierce your scales.

Gives me the creeps TBH.

RanVor

I think you've just nailed how being Evil in Guideverse feels like.

daegone823

I wonder what the Sve Noc is thinking though, like for the longest she had this plan and it was all going well, even the dwarves massacring her people was not really a big problem as she can clearly absorb night from her people remotely.

Then out of nowhere some half god half human thing suddenly pulls the rug from her feet. The conversation where she impersonated Black(dream) even shows that she has considered if she were defeated what would Cat do with her people.

I think the Sve knows her days are numbered even before she initiated the ritual that gave her people the powers of the night. I think that being a villain is not about surviving in this world even if they have technical immortality. I believe that they are given names similar to candidates for campaigns, except more evil. The Sve is so close but her plan has been doomed from the start because her methods are outdated, not practical.

Cat's the new fresh face and the Sve is old news. Below is now backing villains with heroic charm, who can dance on both sides of the line. Cat has proven that adaptability while a weakness when it comes to the power of her name(Squire backfiring during her White Knight battle), allows her to use heroic powers. I mean look at it from the below's view Cat accomplished what the Sve tried in the span of years what took the Sve evil I mean that is god damn efficient even if she had alot of help.

She learns from her failures sort of and from her enemies like how she usurped the forces of a slave army, similar to the White Knight William who took control of Akua slave soldiers. The Sve killing those soldiers thematically has put her as the villain and Cat is the hero, the savior. Even though what she offers is "almost" just as bad.

Still evil just no as evil.

Author Unknown

Cat breaks out her most powerful skill: the ability to piss off absolutely anything.

Euodiachloris

It's both a bug and a feature. 😊

Barrendur

_Oh, yay, great update. That certainly clarified things_ ... too bad I don't have a font for facetiousness.

Miles

Apo-Ubua as an ally? Now that would be something to see.

Though the drow follow whomever holds the mantle which is an issue.

Unmaker

Sve Noc cannot subsume Winter because she can't change. But Akua has changed, so Akua can possibly wield Winter.

Villain monologues against villains don't automatically incur a story penalty. Thank you for the entertainment Cat. And thank you Rumena for being a good foil.

The fact that Cat believes she has no plan left earlier in the chapter suggests memory tampering. She hadn't forgotten about Akua but she certainly forgot what Akua's part of the plan was.

stevenneiman

That would explain why we never heard anything about folly. And it would mesh well with the fact that Akua just popped up, quite clearly up to something.

Edward Ryan

i wonder if the dwarfs knew how powerful or even had a vague idea how strong some of the Drow are?

Andrew Mitchell

I doubt they knew very much. They hadn't penetrated the Everdark very far IIRC.

stevenneiman

The thing that bugged me was the arrogance of leaving intact corpses behind. Sure, they might not have been having much trouble in the early stages of the invasion, but all it would take is one member of a race whose powers lend themselves well to stealth getting behind their lines and staying there hidden for long enough and suddenly they have to do the whole thing over again all at once. Repeat ad nauseum if they didn't learn the lesson the first time.

It's extra baffling because they seemed to have a strong enough idea of Sve Noc's power to suggest that they were well-informed.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a good point about the corpses. Maybe Drow can't be made into undead due to Night? Just a guess.

stevenneiman

I'm not talking about undead. As long as the Dead King doesn't get involved, Cat is the only one who even uses undead, they aren't nearly as dangerous as the living drow were, and she's closer to being on the dwarves' side than against them. I'm talking about some drow getting behind their lines and absorbing all the Night from all the corpses. They wouldn't need an undead army if they had that much Night. There's been some disagreement about the linearity of Night growth vs. power growth, but even if the growth isn't efficient it's still going to be a headache when somebody gets back there and comes swinging and their supply train with all that abandoned power. What the dwarves should have done was figured out some way to destroy the corpses and render the Night inert, or at least contained.

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, gotcha. Thanks for the additional explanation and sorry for misunderstanding. I agree that was (actually, is) a potential issue for the dwarves.

Lucas

That was the vanguard, not the army. I guess that they are either too strong/ arrogant to care or it's the army who can do something about the corpses with runes and whatnot

Decius

Which is why most of the corpses are encased in obsidian.

Decius

One of the themes is that armies of soldiers beat warriors. I bet they have some kind of runic counter to the shadow-stepping, for the dwarven elite who have not yet been shown to take the field.

Dresden 67

One thing I've noticed is that the Mighty's abilities all seem heavily focused on individual duels or fights between small groups. Some of them are powerful and skilled enough in those areas to pose a threat to Cat. And yet none of them have had any equivalent to Catherine's mass-destruction capabilities. They had no answer to floods of water or mass illusions.

Which means that their usual tactics are likely very poorly suited to fighting an army of super-heavy infantry backed up by lava shooting siege engines and Named.

WuseMajor

That line about the power of friendship....

Honestly, her wielding that is rather akin to Black Mage wielding the power of love

...By which I mean he siphons love out of the universe and turns it into a beam of firey devastation. Every time he fires it the divorce rate increases.

byzantine279

I assure you, every time he fires it the divorce rate *decreases*. See, it isn't evil for people to part. Forcing them to stay together in spite of their misery on the other hand...

Aran

"Then fear me, drow," Akua Sahelian announced, "for I wield the power of friendship."

My little pony, my little pony
I used to wonder what friendship could be Until you tore my heart out of me

burguulkodar

One of my favorite chapters, because of that last Akua's line.

It was MAGNIFICENT.

Galileo

Fuck. What a glorious chapter.

Joan

I guess Cutie Marks are kind of like visual Names, aren't they? Of course that makes Equestria an entire society of Named. Maybe Cat should look for an army there.

---

Chapter 78: Comes Around

"The finest summation of Traitorous's reign I ever heard came from an illiterate peasant from the outskirts of Ater, who described it as follows: 'Like watching a snake eat its own tail, only the tail was fake the snake was an angry badger and also you are poisoned.'"

– Introduction to 'More Art Than Act' by Hakim of Kahtan, the Haunted Scholar

And so the sound of my fragile mortal shell being ripped into signaled it was time for everyone's favourite Wasteland game: backstab, help or both. Akua had grown on me, rather like the bubonic plague, so I was going to give her the benefit of the doubt and put my money on 'both'. It was mildly surprising she'd stuck around at all, to be honest. I'd expected her to be halfway back to Praes by now, considering I'd lost my leash on her along with my soul. The unsettling sensation of fingers squeezing around my beating heart was coloured by the unspoken acknowledgement this was a dark mirror to Second Liesse's ending. And to think they said Diabolist didn't have a sense of humour. The sheer shock of being torn into this brutally and suddenly was tipping me right over the edge and straight into the grave, my vision dimming, but in the darkness power awaited. Not owned, no. Sve Noc's victory had been too deep a cut for that. But Akua bestowed upon me a chord, an invisible string, and through it my fading senses expanded.

"Both it is," I muttered. "Called it."

Winter as an independent entity was dead. I knew that instantly and instinctively as my mind glimpsed the web of power spread over Great Strycht. There would be no restoration, it was too far gone for that. Sve Noc had clumsily melded Night and Winter where she could, though the merging was far from complete and my old mantle had reacted violently to the attempt. Knots of raging power had erupted all over the city, like too-large insects caught in a web of Night: wherever they stormed they weakened the weave around them. The Priestess had been hammering them into submission, I thought, one at a time. A time-consuming process, and a difficult one – like trying to smooth out wrinkles on steel. I could feel the gargantuan weight of her presence gripping one of the storms, fingers pulling out the threads one after another and releasing them accalmed. She had barely a sliver of her attention on me, I thought. Broken thing that I was, I'd been judged harmless and only a cursory eye had been kept on me. Bad form, that. It would remiss of me not to make her pay harshly for it.

"You forced her to act early," Akua said.

Diabolist felt like she was at my side, but she couldn't be. I wasn't really anywhere, practically speaking. Just a ghost haunting the labyrinth, and her barely more than that. And yet if felt like her breath was whispering against my ear, like she was not even an inch away.

"So, the power of friendship," I said. "Feels a bit ungrateful to say as much after such a touching interruption, but we're not really friends. Acquaintances, at most, and that's being generous."

"You break my heart, dearest," Diabolist drawled. "Again."

"And I didn't even need to punch through your ribcage first this time," I replied, genuinely pleased. "I am getting better at this."

"So is she," Akua said.

She didn't point – we were presences, not flesh – but like a feather's touch her attention moved towards Sve Noc. My not-eyes followed.

"She wanted to bleed me after smoothing out all the knots," I said. "Like a coronation."

"Baptism in queen's blood, yes," Diabolist said. "Quite properly done, if a mite archaic. Queens are not as easy to acquire as they were in olden days."

"But she doesn't need it," I said, feeling out the web with a thought. "She's already winning, Akua. The Night is absorbing Winter, slowly but surely."

"This situation should feel familiar, my heart," she replied. "You are a claimant once more. The lesser one, certainly, but a claimant still."

"For what?" I asked.

"That rather depends, I think, on which of you successfully presses her claim," Akua said. "Before, I would have wagered it was sovereignty over night. But now... who knows?"

The shade laughed.

"Interesting times, dearest Catherine," she said. "Interesting times indeed."

"Interesting," I repeated. "That's a word for it. Especially considering I don't see your hat anywhere in the ring. This was your chance to get back on top, Diabolist. There will not be another no matter the outcome."

And if she hadn't stepped in the game would have come to an end. I could still vaguely feel my body in the hands of Sve's manifestation, but she'd yet to kill it. There'd be no point, I thought. What she needed on the altar was me, not a mangled empty corpse. If Akua had no chance of claiming this mess for herself I would have called this pragmatism, denying the Priestess her victory at the last moment, but she'd had other options. She could have fled, she could have fought. And yet here we were.

"Am I not in your service?" Akua said. "Bindings are formality, not essence."

"Don't waste our time," I said. "She's nearly done with the knot."

I felt the shade press close to me, almost like an embrace, and I saw Akua Sahelian whole. Not the shade with the bloody hole in her chest, not the semblance of fae I'd turned her into. The same woman I'd met under the Name of Heiress, who'd schemed her way into becoming the Diabolist and vaingloriously raised her banners against the entire villainy of the East. Golden eyes set in a sculpted face, her long tresses falling in a curtain behind her. Adorned in a crimson gown set close against long legs, belted high on her waist in rubies and gold. She'd always been gorgeous. Even when I'd first met her, before I'd learned to truly hate her, I'd thought as much. This was not Akua as she was, but as she still saw herself, and I could not call her anything but the culmination of centuries of Wasteland breeding: as beautiful as she was terrible.

"I have grown tired," she said, "of iron."

"There's no walking back the Folly," I told her. "Not even for this. I'm one life, Akua. That's the weight I have on the scales."

"I consider myself something of a theologian," she said. "And yet I still lack the answer to one question. Perhaps you can answer it for me. Which matters most, Catherine, when it comes to doing good – the conviction or the act?"

There was a beat of silence as the enormity of what she'd just said sunk in.

"You can't be serious," I said.

I was not sure whether to be amazed or appalled by what she was implying. Akua might be the single most amoral person I knew, which was saying something considering I was acquainted with the fucking King of Death. And she was talking of redemption? No, I realized. Not redemption. The conviction or the act, she'd said. I hated to even think it, but it fit with how she'd always done things. I used stories as an arsenal, taking up and discarding what was of use to me, but Akua? She rode them into the storm like a warhorse. It had killed her, in the end, the flying fortresses and the monologues. But before it had she'd matched an entire empire blow for blow.

"But I am," she smiled. "I shall be, Catherine, the most terrifyingly heroic woman in the history of my kind. And in the end, together we will learn the answer to my question."

"It's not the Gods you have to convince," I hissed. "It's me."

"Would you snuff me out for observing your own principles?" Akua asked. "I will do nothing but what you have demanded of me."

"They won't take you in," I said. "You have to know that. You can't fake being a good person."

"I have learned much from you, darling one," Akua Sahelian smiled. "I may fail, true. In my hour of judgement I may – most likely will – be unmade and cast into the deepest burning pits. But until then? Oh, what a glorious ride it will be."

She spun away from me, presence parting in full.

"Now, my dear Catherine," Diabolist said, and there was joyous laughter in her voice. "Shall we save some innocents?"

I would have argued still. Done something, anything, to deny this. But the last string of Winter was untangled, made docile, and even as the Night spread through it Sve Noc finally turned her whole attention to us.

"Clever little rats," the Priestess of Night said. "You have earned death at my hand."

It felt like the tide pulling back before the wave. Something unspeakably massive gathering before release, preparing to crush everything in its path. I called on all that I was, too, but I was no longer Sovereign of Moonless Nights. There were no bottomless depths of Winter to stand behind me, no stolen mantle to make me anything more than I was. In the face of a living deity, I stood a mere mortal – one with a claim, perhaps, but no less frail for it. If she crushed me here, I thought, would die. Unmade so thoroughly there might not be enough of me left for the afterlife. And so we began the dance one last time, for keeps. Winner got to be Queen Bitch of Night forevermore, a victory almost as terrible as defeat. I didn't want it, I realized. I didn't want to go back to the thing I'd turned into, that pale imitation of myself. A creature playacting at being a person, more a pack of lies and ambitions than anything remotely human.

I'd feared alienation as the consequence of drawing on my mantle, all the while too far gone to realize I'd already estranged myself from everything that'd made me Catherine Foundling. Better to die than go back to it, I thought. To be nothing at all rather than be that. I closed my not-eyes.

"Mortal," I whispered. "To the end, whatever that may be."

A savage joy took hold of me, sweeter than wine, and I almost laughed. Even if it was doomed, even if all was lost – I would not go quietly into the night. I would go out kicking and screaming, making an unholy mess of it. Not-lips splitting into a grin, I took hold of what remained of my mind. If you are the sea, then I am a needle, I thought. Slender and piercing and too slight to catch. Hold and release, and then the impact of our wills shook the entire web. I went through like a needle through silk, and sunk into darkness. The pressure of it was crushing, a mind so much greater than my own bearing down, and I balked. I am stone, I thought. The pebble beneath the coursing river, smooth and unmoving. I crashed at the bottom, but there I remained. Unbroken. I could do this, I thought. I was so much less, but what I was could change. Adapt. She was too large to be able to do the same so easily. The sea withdrew and I let out a relieved breath. The web was frittering, I saw. Parts that had been calmed grew riotous as Sve Noc exerted herself against me. Winter was not so easily tamed.

"Fumbling child," the Priestess of Night said. "You but delay the inevitable."

"Hells, Sve," I grinned savagely. "That's my life in a sentence."

I had become unto stone, and so she became a chisel. She struck down, lumbering and unstoppable. She had become a chisel, and so I became wind: shapeless, coursing around the might of her. The chisel broke into a storm, taking hold of me, and so I became a bird. I rode the winds, and she turned into a hand. Fingers closed around me, but I was smoke and slipped through them. It was a game of riddles, where the first mistake would be the last. Smoke was inhaled by gaping maw, the maw escaped by a scuttling rat, the rat crushed by boot only for mud to stick at the bottom of the sole. Shape to shape we went, ever changing and never twice the same. I knew, instinctively, that repetition would be barred to me. Always forward, or there could be only death. I had become a snake, coiling around a narrow spike, when Sve Noc screamed. There was a flicker, and I saw her long-haired silhouette again – with Diabolist stabbing away at her neck, dagger in hand. Taking your eyes off the Praesi, huh. Always a mistake, that. Akua was swatted away angrily, her shape shattered by the sheer force of the blow, but I was already moving.

"I am a sword," I murmured. "Sharp and merciless, I cut."

My will struck out against hers and finally I drew blood. And here was the pit fight Archer had promised, I thought. Two beasts in a hole, tearing at each other. Devouring. I was to eat what I had carved out, grow stronger from it. Ascend through this hallowed cannibalism and strike again, until one of us had consumed the other whole. That was Below's game, its promised and certain victory.

"Mortal, you meddling fucks," I snarled. "To the end."

I crawled into the gushing wound, spite warming me down to my petty core.

—

"It is forbidden, 'Mina. The vigil must be held alone."

The suddenness of the sound had me twitching. There had been the warm darkness of blood, until I crawled out dripping onto a floor of stone, and immediately the woman had spoken. I rose to my feet, eyes wary. It looked like a temple, that was my first thought. The ceiling was tall and curved, held up by arches and columns. The stone beneath me covered in strange scriptures similar to Crepuscular, but only in part. Older, I decided. What few words I understood among them seemed to be in the vein of astronomy, about celestial orbs and their movements. On all four sides arched thresholds led into nothing: I could glimpse a sea of lights below, and only then did I realized I was standing atop a tower. There were no stairs, no visible way into the room save the arches. Rich laughter drew my attention sharply, and my eyes moved to watch a pair of drow. Both young – truly young, not like the Mighty were – and long-haired, though their appearance was starkly sexless. One sat with her legs folded, in the centre of the room, while the other lounged against a pillar. She'd been the one to laugh.

"So many rules," the drow called 'Mina gently mocked. "Why apprentice to the Sages at all, if you intend on following all of them?"

Neither of their eyes were silver, I realized with a start. Both a deep amber, identical in every way. As if sisters. My blood thrummed with excitement. I'd been right, then. It was Sve Noc's soul I had cut open, and it was her memories I'd crawled my way into. And if I got to the bottom, found the right path... My way out. The victory denied.

"We are the enemy of death," the sitting drow replied, almost chiding. "It is great honour to be chosen to stand among those who hold back twilight."

"Shrouded Gods, Andronike," her sister said, rolling her eyes. "You could at least wait until after the ceremony to start with that. If I wanted to get preached at I'd prostrate at temple like a good little zealot."

"There will be no ceremony at all, Komena, if you are caught up here," Andronike sharply replied. "I will be sent home in disgrace and Mother-

"- will have to take the war oath or be forever disgraced," Komena interrupted. "I've heard that song before, sister. You say that like it'd be such a disaster. I'll be taking the very same oath this year, and it'd be nice to have kin at my side."

The other drow's face softened.

"You know I would follow you," she said. "If I had not been called to higher purpose."

"All hail the mighty Twilight Sages," Komena said, smile too serrated to be genuine. "May we forever kiss the hem of their robes."

"I didn't meant it like that, 'Mina," Andronike feebly said. "There is great honour in war service."

"Just not quite as much as in this," her sister said.

The other drow's eyes tightened.

"You have the talent, Komena," she said. "Our fathers both have sorcerer blood. Do not blame me simply because you never had the discipline to sharpen your skills."

"Much good they will do you, these precious skills," Komena said. "Cloistered in some hidden shrine, debating magic with crazed half-corpses. At least my lack of discipline will serve the Firstborn against our enemies."

"Fetching human servants for the rylleh?" Andronike ridiculed. "Squabbling with the nerezim over some empty tunnel? How well you would serve our people."

"How gladly you mock the same blades that keep our mines full, that keep the nerezim from making goblins of us," her sister snarled. "At least we act, inglorious as our lot is. Provide for the Empire Ever Dark."

"You talk like a colonist," Andronike said, wrinkling her nose. "The King Under the Mountain will slay us all, every Firstborn must take the oath! There will be peace, sister, as there has been for over a century. War is only ever waged for petty glories."

I coughed into my fist. Well, you couldn't get them all right. Probably the single worst thing she could have gotten wrong, but in her defence she didn't seem alone in her assumption. If the drow in charge had really all believed that it was no wonder the dwarves had wrecked them in the following wars. That did not sound like an empire ready for a hard fight. The two sisters continued to argue, but I let the noise wash over me. There was something... There it was again. A tremor. I knelt, wincing as my lame leg flared, and pressed my ear against the stone. It came again, louder, and my fingers clenched. Not a tremor, a footstep. And one getting closer. Time to move on, then, I'd learned all I could from this anyway. There was no obvious way out, I thought, save the one I'd rather not take. I breathed out and got up.

"Oh Gods, this better work," I muttered, and took a running leap off the tower.

—

I thought I'd failed, at first, because I stood in utter darkness. But then there was movement, Komana sweeping out her arm and causing globes of glass to light all over the room. She'd gotten older, I saw. There was a nasty scar on her neck, but it was the sharper features and braided hair that drew my attention. She wore armour, too: good steel mail, with pauldrons of sculpted obsidian. The sword at her hip was without a sheath and glinted cold blue. Enchanted, for sure. As she began unstrapping her armour I allowed my gaze to sweep our surroundings, reluctantly admitting that the woman who'd become Sve Noc had taste. And coin to burn, apparently, because much of the furniture in here was wood instead of stone and that was a rare thing in the Everdark. I froze when she did, only noticing that there was someone seated in the corner. Who it was I could not tell for sure – though I had a decent guess – because they were masked and covered by a thick cloak. It was an ornate thing, the mask. Forged iron, the upper half of it a sun setting while the bottom was half the moon. Komana drew her sword without hesitation.

"I know not your intent, Sage, but I am a jawor of the Southern Army," she coldly said. "I will not be disappeared so easily."

The Twilight Sage slowly raised a hand and took off the mask, revealing the very pair of amber eyes I had expected. Andronike hesitated, worrying her lip.

"Mina," she quietly said. "I know we did not part-"

The sword clattered against the ground, and I had to admit I was touched at the sight of Komana embracing her sister without the slightest hint of hesitation. The two drow remained like that for a long moment, and I saw their arms tightening against each other like they were afraid of letting go.

“‘Nike,” the younger sister said, after finally releasing the other. “Gods be kind. I have regretted many things since taking the oath, but none half as much as the last words we spoke.”

“I’m sorry, Komena,” Andronike whispered. “I was too proud to reach out, after. I have sown sorrow where there needed be none.”

The other drow touched her shoulder, almost shyly.

“It does not matter,” she said. “It could have been a hundred years instead of twenty, and still it would not matter. Heart of my heart.”

“Heart of my heart,” Andronike whispered back, voice shaky.

Komena shook herself, as if trying to wake. She smoothed out her already pristine armour out of nervousness.

“I am being a frightful host,” she said. “I have senna, if you would like a drink – or! I have this bottle of this drink they call wynneh, from the Burning Lands. Very exotic, you wouldn’t believe how many fingers I had to break to get it.”

Andronike took her sister’s hand and shook her head.

“Sit with me,” she asked. “This is... better spoken sober.”

Komena’s eyes tightened.

“You worry me, sister,” she said. “Are you in danger? I now striking a Sage is sacrilege, but I will not-”

“We are all in danger, I fear,” Andronike croaked. “‘Mina, what I want to tell you, it is a crime for me to speak it. Even if all you do is listen, they would-”

“Heart of my heart,” Komena said, voice like steel. “Your woe is my woe. No soul can change this.”

Her sister smiled, for just a moment, and it felt like dawn breaking over the room. Andronike tugged her down into a seat and they settled together while the Sage sister chose her words. The ritual, I thought. This is about the ritual when they tried to become immortals.

“They’re going to kill us all, ‘Mina,” Andronike murmured, sounding genuinely terrified. “The Sages, the elders among them – they’re afraid of dying. The alchemies work a little less every year and their minds have begun to fray. So they now plan a ritual.”

“A ritual,” Komena repeated slowly, trying to understand her sister’s fear.

And failing, though I thought she was a decent hand at hiding it.

"They will borrow from the years of every Firstborn yet to be," the drow said. "They say they have it charted – they've used oracles, the old rites as well – but they're wrong Komena. There are too many uncertainties."

"There will be revolt, if this comes out," Komena said face gone grim. "I can reach out to other officers-"

"You don't understand," Andronike said. "They are proud. They through it we will all be made immortal. With the turn of the red season they will announce it themselves."

"But you don't believe it will work," the younger sister said.

"All it takes is a single mistake, and our entire people will pay for it," the other drow replied, shaking her head. "There is always a mistake, 'Mina. Always."

Her sister slowly nodded, and I watched her thoughts flicker through her face. Hesitation, first, then reproach. And after that only determination, cold and relentless.

"So what," Komena said, "are we going to do about it?"

Pivot, I thought. They were not Named, not yet, but that sentence and that moment were the beginning of a very dark road I already knew the end of.

"In that moment, I loved her more than I have ever loved anyone or anything."

I froze. She'd not made a sound, until the moment she spoke. Not a breath, not whisper of foot on stone. I turned and there she was, standing at my side. The cloak I recognized, for she wore it in front of me as well, but there was no mask now. She had grown, I thought, beyond such petty symbols.

"Strange," she said, head cocked to the side. "That even after all these years, I grieve that more than all the rest."

"Andronike," I said, meeting eyes of pure silver.

"Catherine Foundling," the other half of Sve Noc greeted me calmly. "I believe you were looking for me."

Character contest continues: Hierarch vs Masego and Black vs Ratface. Links to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16945396?fbclid=IwAR34RCp9DQXzkZJM0JEkleqF3\_hXPQjoDvyEHsH250quzv9p2N1oziP\_I\_Co

https://www.strawpoll.me/16945399?fbclid=IwAR223q3kq5lMyjYwGy70jFoe530SnbLt2dA7\_SU\_wBlF-BqAjg0gcUoyy8c

NZPIEFACE

... I've been voting for the top character for a while now.

stevenneiman

Honestly, most of these aren't controversial at all.
My bets: Masego, Black, Vivienne (?), Robber, Hakram (?), Cat, Akua (?), Black, Robber, Cat, Black, Cat.
I'm curious to see whether I even got the ones I'm confident in right.

RanVor

Yeah, turns out that Guide readers are, unfortunately, very predictable.

Sulomund

Just because the destination is assured doesn't mean we can't enjoy the journey.

And besides, there still is the chance for upset. :3

RanVor

Theoretically, but it's kinda hard to get enthusiastic when you know exactly when your favorites are gonna lose.

Jane

I'm about 50/50 so far; the votes I've lost are... Cordelia, Nauk, Laurence, Sabah, Malicia, Aisha, Assassin, and Eudokia.

JJR

The first one was tricky, with neither one showing up. The Hierarch claiming the ranking individuals was Against the Will of the People and Therefore Forbidden. Masego, probably too occupied to even notice such a thing happening. I had to give it the the Hierarch though.

Second one was much easier. Amadeus was always able to play my emotions like a violin.

mavant

I'm glad you voted for Hierarch, because I voted for Masego, but I was torn by the decision.

mavant

It grieves me to have to vote against Ratface in this. He should have died hereafter. There would have been a time for such a word.

James, Mostly Harmless

The bracket chart is at <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805>.

Letouriste

Damn. 4 of my favourite characters at once and I need to choose...

I like black too much so I guess ratface is a no:/
Hierarch vs masego tho... how could you make us choose, you demon!

Chose masego at the end but broke my heart

RanVor

Two of my favorite characters vs. two guys-I-like-but-not-as-much-as-the-other-guy.

Since the Hierarch will obviously lose now (which sucks, but what can I do?), I can only hope that Akua tears Masego apart in the quarterfinals (I'm sorry, Zeze, but it's not my fault you have this kind of opponents).

NZPIEFACE

"The finest summation of Traitorous's reign I ever heard came from an illiterate peasant from the outskirts of Ater, who described it as follows: 'Like watching a snake eat its own tail, only the tail was fake the snake was an angry badger and also you are poisoned.'"

Bloody hell, that last bit is the most accurate thing about Praes ever said. No matter what, you're always poisoned.

NZPIEFACE

"Which matters most, Catherine, when it comes to doing good – the conviction or the act?"

Fucking hell Akua, you can't be serious.

I read this really interesting suggestion recently (actually, calling it a suggestion would be a bit much) relating to the missionary that died on that island near India. Basically, the idea was "What if he did this as a form of suicide?"

The logic of it went something like this:

As a man who had faith in God, suicide was forbidden and he would be cast into Hell.

There's a group of people in the world who are violent towards all outsiders and do not believe in God. If he was to act as a servant of God and deliver his message and blessings to them, if he were to die during it, he would go to Heaven.

The counter-argument I saw was that God was omniscient and would know about his intentions from the get-go. Quite interesting how I see the parallel here in this story.

HannaB

This doesn't work because neither the -intent- nor the -result- are positive. "What it looks like he was trying to do" definitely doesn't cut it.

NZPIEFACE

What do you mean the result wasn't positive?

HannaB

Well, I mean, the guy died, right? Not achieved his stated goal.

Although I can see your point as well 😊

NZPIEFACE

The whole point of the hypothetical was that his goal was to die while acting in the name of God.

NZPIEFACE

"I would not go quietly into the night."

"Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light."

– First stanza of "Do Not Go Gentle Into That Good Night" by Dylan Thomas

Gunslinger

Most likely that peasant was Traitorous too.

MetruX

Exactly what I thought.

IDKWhoitis

Otherwise, how the hell did he know about the true nature of the shitshow that was Traitorous?

HannaB

I do get the impression that the entire continent was sitting with popcorn on that one

Thea

No, the Good guys were busy being appalled little drones because he no-sold even their redemptions and angels.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah but this was a peasant. Though I would propose as head canon that while this man was not Traitorous, he had bought shoes from him. The shoes were usually not poisoned. Usually.

Insanenoodlyguy

Aw crap that was irritant. Dammit.

Okay, head canon revision, Traitorous also made shoes that one time as his cover while working with the rebellion to overthrow Dread Emperor Traitorous. Irritant used a lot less poison so overall is remembered as the better Cobbler.

JJR

Did anyone else, when they first read that, think that the so called peasant was actually Dread Emperor Traitorous the whole time. And that last bit was actually him telling Scholar that he was poisoned, as in just now?

Well the guy did manage to write the rest of the book. Maybe Traitorous was off his game that day.

MetruX

Traitorous is not know to have killed all who opposed him, he's known to have betrayed them all. Surely he can betray someone and the guy still leave alive.

Antoninjohn

No, it was the scholar who was Traitorous

Jane

C'mon, people, the answer is obvious here.

The reader was Traitorous.

Traitorous

i am TRAITORIOUS

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. But he was in your heart, all along. Also he was the paper the scholar wrote on. The paper has been poisoned.

Aotrs Commander

I think that one quote from Captain Kirk in Undiscovered Country is appropriate here.

"Spock, you want to know something?, Everybody's Traitorous."

NerfContessa

Fitting.

Also nice to see you already posting good comments so shortly after being brought to this marvelous story (from the playground) ^^

nipi

Or maybe he assumed the scholars identity afterwards.

Charles

"that keep the nerezim from making goblins of us"

Literally or figuratively, I wonder?

Cap'n Smurfy

Considering the Goblins were forced to the surface by Dwarves, are small, green, short-lived and an entirely different species I think it's safe to say it was meant as a metaphor for defeat/exile to the surface.

mavant

Well, in Arda you can make orcs out of elves with careful torture and selective breeding. I forget if it was Morgoth or Sauron that did so – probably the former.

Maybe in Calernia a similar rule applies for drow and goblins.

What I'm really concerned about are the MIND FLAYERS.

loimprevisto

Mind flayers? We can handle that. Aboleths are the real problem...

daniel young

Hard to mind control undead though. Be hilarious if the good guys had to ask villains for help because all of there troops kept getting mind controlled

Cap'n Smurfy

No. That's silly. The Guideverse is, as the name might suggest, a practical place. Drow and Goblins are in no way related or created from another.

Gunslinger

Figuratively I assume as it's stated that the goblin were driven away by the Nerezim.

danh3107

I used to hate her, I still do somewhat, but I love Akua fucking Sahelian.

Gunslinger

Lots to unpack here but for once I actually believe Akua. Holy hells how did it get to this point!!

The chapter does reveal thought that Catherine didn't plan for Akua's betrayal/help. What then was the Folly in the original plan?

NZPIEFACE

Eh, I've always believed in Akua, you know.

When was the last time she actually betrayed someone?

JJR

It kind of seems like she's betraying herself here. The whole, "I tire of iron line." Basically throwing away everything she was taught to believe. To be a hero I think? Not a Hero with the capital letter surely, the Gods above wouldn't have her. But some kind of hero.

MetruX

You sure they wouldn't? The Peregrin has done just as bad as her, and he is one of the most pious. To me, what William would do was worse than what she did, and he was never doubted of Heroism. No, the God Above would have her, if she really went that path. But I don't think she will.

Dresden 67

No he hasn't. Come on. What the Pilgrim did was horrible, but let's not pretend he didn't save far more lives than he took by stopping Black. The Grey Pilgrim killed two or three thousand innocents as collateral damage to stop a murderous rampage across Procer. Akua murdered a hundred thousand civilians to use them as meat shields in her personal rise to power. The two aren't at all equivalent.

Jani Nyysönen

There's a very important difference between what is Good and what is Effective.

Once we accept biological weapons and child murder as acceptable tactics, moral high ground is lost.

Pilgrims side would, probably, be better winners and/or rulers than the villain side, but they have little room to argue about morals to Cat considering the things hey have done.

RanVor

B-but muh Greater Good!

TeK

And William wanted to brainwash and effectively kill the very same hundred thousand civilians, and use their bodies to throw into the meat grinder against the East. Totally not comparable, how could he.

Dresden 67

I'm not talking about William. I'm talking about the Pilgrim. Saying that the Peregrine is just as bad as the Butcher of Liesse is simply ridiculous.

Although now that you bring it up, no, I don't think what William tried to do makes him as bad as Akua. Trying to brainwash Liesse was an unforgettable crime, but at least he wasn't doing it for personal gain, he was doing it to free his kingdom from oppression, and at least some of his victims would have survived. Not to mention the fact that Akua thought it was ok to use demons that permanently damaged reality. I honestly can't imagine a crime worse than that.

HannaB

I don't think there was a chance any of his victims would have survived 😡 the problem is that Akua intended to open MORE hellgates than just one and not have them contained by Warlock

Still Water is just the part of her scheme that succeeded so no, in sheer mass slaughter she still wins out 😡

Dresden 67

I actually wasn't referring to the Hell gate, I was talking about the four demons we saw her use over the course of the story. You know, the things whose mere presence in Creation permanently damages reality?

NZPIEFACE

You mean the Demon of Absence that everyone forgot about?

Aotrs Commander

Really?

You really can't imagine a crime worse than that?

You can't be trying very hard.

Without even going outside the Guide:

The wanton slaughter of countless thousands if not millions over centuries to win a pissing contest, not to mention the action of creating the stage itself to do that and to cap it all, then punishing the creations you made able to chose for the explicit purpose of facilitating this pissing contest for not not always choosing you AND ALSO for not being perfect?

Or tacitly murdering your entire species future children to attempt to give yourself immortality?

Actually, I would say William is far, FAR, *FAR* worse than Akua ever was. Hers was "only" mass murder, whereas as his was (attempted) mass mindrape/soul-crime AND murder (and I rank the former two (among one or two other things) as being way more heinous than mere death). William might only be only "lesser" in the sense that he didn't actually manage to do it and only *then* if the answer to Akua's question is "act" not "conviction."

What we've seen Pilgrim do over the course of this story is very likely just the tip of the iceberg. The way he treated it seems like this is the first time he's pulled that crap. I shudder to think how many times he's done similar things over the decades in the name of so-called "Good."

Aotrs Commander

Dang lack of edit function: Clarification: Akua likely would have gone on to be worse than William if not prevented; my assertion (if I was not used to being able to go back and re-word my posts on a second pass and tidy them up!) is that, *at the time of respective deaths,* I would hold that William's (attempted) crimes were worse than Aku's actual ones..

Dresden 67

I was exaggerating a little when I said I couldn't imagine anything worse than that. However I do think permanently damaging the fabric of reality is something truly, objectively evil. It makes things worse of absolutely everyone for the rest of time, and benefits no one

Dresden 67

Soul-crime? What on earth are you talking about?

Come on. You can't be seriously arguing that the Pilgrim is worse than Akua. You can't just make up previous crimes and declare that they make him worse. We can only judge them based on what we see, and on those grounds Akua is far, far worse.

Aotrs Commander

I was referring to William's attempted mind-rape[1]; the attack on self/soul, in a such permenant way, I find vastly worse than murder.

Though yes, not related to that specific instance[2], but I *do* find Pilgrim infinitely more objectionable, vile and loathsome than Akua on *every single level.* (Even when Akua was just the antagonist I wanted to see disembowled.)

[1]Or, though I will NOT debate any further than this single in-passing mentioned, because NOT the time or place, physical rape/

[2]That we know of; I would not even be remotely surprised to find Pilgrim lending a hand to Contrition Heroes in the past nor shedding a real tear (as opposed to a self-deluded one of actual, true compassion) over it.

Aotrs Commander

Again (dang no edit, fraction of a second too early with click post): clarification footnote [1] should be at the end of that sentence, not where it is, not implying or asserting Willy did that.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"[A]t least some of his victims would have survived."

I would argue that, philosophically speaking, they would all have died the moment he Contrition'd them. What would remain would effectively not be the same people, but gross parodies of them.

daegone823

Okay I think a decision would have to be made if you were a citizen.

Is mind rape with holy might attached worse than literal demon rape?

Now I don't care which is more evil one of these outcomes leads to death while the other will leave you with a chance of possible life.

Euodiachloris

Both corrupt who you are to make a mockery of a person.

One side lies about it; the other wears the grotesque nature of what it has done like a feather boa.

Both are appalling in an "equal and opposite" way, making neither one of them better or worse.

The real question is “is it possible to stop both sides from mutilating the fundamental essences of people in their bids to win this pissing contest of theirs”. Because they’re both treating thinking, feeling beings as NPCs they can use and abuse like young kids mutilate their least important toys.

TeK

Of fuck that. And Hitler genuinely cared about German nation. Do you hear yourself?

NerfContessa

That’s a big IF.

Though it would truly a terrible hero make, our dear Ubua.

Rook

I think she might be staying true to what she is, actually. We may all have had the wrong impression of her from the start.

I think She’s not about being a Villain. She doesn’t want to be a Hero now, either. I think her motives, at the very heart of it, are neutral. She just wants to be part of the biggest, most momentous story she can get her claws on.

Think about it. It was always a bit strange why someone clearly much more intelligent than Catherine – let’s be real here, Akua is as smart as she is a total cunt – fully versed in history and the best education money can buy, would so stupidly engage in theatrics known to have miserable ends without fail.

Maybe she was never being stupid, maybe she never really gave a shit about Winning or Evil or Good. Maybe what she wants is exactly what her actions have always lead her towards. That even in the future when Praes and all its works have been reduced to dust, people will still remember that Akua Sahelian existed. Glorious, terrible, and magnificent.

NZPIEFACE

Oh, I see what you mean. She wanted to be Traitorus.

Luminant Azurefyre

Remember in the earlier chapters back when she was the Heiress? At one point she said something super grandiose along the lines of “I will inherit all of Calernia/usurp the will of the gods.” I don’t remember the exact quote, but I think you're onto something. At the time I just thought she was being a total idiot but in light of her current character it could just be that she wants to live her life with a bang, even if she goes out early because of it.

HannaB

Yes!

Akua believed in Old Evil as the most theatric and fun ride she could possibly have. And now she's getting to hitch a ride on something even more amazing.

She's Praesi to the core, and at the core of Praes is the same idea even Black ended up holding on to: you always lose at the end, but the end is not what matters.

She's true to herself, to the herself that said that learning from history did not mean rejecting change. She respected 'iron sharpens iron' because she believed in it and gambled on it, and now that it's lost, it's only natural for her to switch to the other philosophy to follow. Iron sharpens iron on a more meta level.

Stephen M (Ethesis).

She wants to take possession of Night.

Haihappen

She is not the Hero we need, but the hero we deserve.

She is not a Redeemed Villian, for this trope is full of shit, but more of a Fallen Villian, who "is just tired of that shit"(paraphrase), and decides defy all tropes, to not seek redemption, but a change of pace, to act philosophy, instead of contemplating it.

Difficult to come up with a Name, though, if that was where the journey is going

HannaB

Yes!

Fallen Villain ♥

Euodiachloris

More like a Villain who has sauntered vaguely upwards looking for the bar with the best acoustics, stage, selection and karaoke machine set-up. 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat's been doing a pretty good job being a hero while still being Evil, and Akua's had a front row seat and is known to be able to learn quickly. To steal a quote from Girl Genius and the character therein that's the most Akualike: "Besides, they always win. There must be SOMETHING to their [heroic] philosophy."

Plus, we know from the last time we saw it from her perspective, Akua finds being a hero refreshingly FUN. And now, as she's reasoned correctly, she's going to be immortally famous. Consider her philosophy before: She truly honestly believed that she'd still die. That she wasn't going to live forever and would be the Empress until the next Akua overthrew her. Somebody who goes into it knowing it ends badly for them is about the ride. Cat may be the first Evil Hero, but Akua will be the first PRAESI Hero, at least since the land and people have been called that. And what she's doing may well save Praesi. That's a pretty good alternative right there, if you are about doing something extraordinary. Plus, she's already gained the unstoppable power of friendship!

Euodiachloris

Praesi rainbows and cyanide-laced marzipan fancies! Accept no substitutes! XD

James, Mostly Harmless

But Darling, cyanide is so last millenium! Akua would only use a poison that was in season ...

Euodiachloris

Some traditions are worth keeping (as a smokescreen to hide the niacin). Also, cyanide enhances the almond-flavour if done right. Plain marzipan or nougat is just boring. 😊

burguulkodar

Wtf? I take Niacin (also known as vitamin B3) every day! Have I been poisoning myself?

Are you traitorous?!

HannaB

Yes!

TBH, taking a step back, Akua is a fucking teenager. Well, a year older than Cat, so not literally, but like, when she was doing the demon thing at Marchford and setting up Liesse? She was. Everything she did was set up by others in some way, between Tasia and Malicia. She wouldn't have either gotten the idea or the means of going through with it without horrible adults who should have known better yet didn't.

If anyone deserves a genuine redemption arc and character development, it's her.

SilverDargon

First of all, I think her last betrayal happened when she tried to possess Catherine during the fight with the 10th crusade when she was still knocked out after having her portal Pilgrim'd. Not too long ago at all. Possibly less than half of a year, though I haven't checked the timeline. Certainly no more than a year prior to this.

Secondly, the only reason for this so called, "Change of heart" is because Akua thinks she can get away with it and come out in a better position than before. She says she tires of iron, less because she actually has grown morals, and more because she knows that she has to renounce something about her previous self in order to get on the heroic bandwagon.

Also, from what it sounds like, Akua wants to know if Above would even accept her. She proposes that Above cares more about doing good acts regardless of the intent behind them, as supported by the existence of Hanno, who goes around doing good acts, with literally no personal conviction save service to Above. Catherine thinks that Above cares more about heroic character and convictions than deeds, and that because of that Akua will fail her attempt to become a hero. At least part of her reasoning for doing this is to answer that question.

Rook

I'm on the verge of believing her too. Not because she's likeable, but I think we might have misjudged her base motives from the start.

I think she isn't, at the core of it, all about villainy, or prayed, or team evil. That's a Catherine and Black way of thinking. They're all about the end goal, the practical consequences.

Akua might actually be along the same vein as Ranger or Archer. All about the journey, not the goal. Being all you can be, doing all you can do.

If you look at it that way, it makes sense why she's so completely unafraid of failure, so utterly unconcerned about her previous loss, and why she didn't take the most pragmatic approach for her personal gain when no one could stop her from doing just that. Because she never cared about winning from the start. She just wants to matter, in the big scheme of things. Go down in the history books as a name no one can forget for a thousand years.

Remember the fourfold crossing? She wasn't Dread empress Powerful, nor was she Dread Empress Diabolical, Wicked, Clever, or Beautiful. She was Dread Empress Magnificent, first of her Name.

Of course she didn't stab Cat in the back, of course she didn't run. Why would she? The possibility of becoming a part of the rise of a new deity is everything she ever wanted. This is her chance.

A chance to be Magnificent.

HannaB

Yes!

mavant

Akua's thing is Pride.

Pride is not a virtue, but it is the parent of many virtues.

HannaB

Or possibly, Akua's thing is YOLO

mavant

Also acceptable. Tbh I just wanted an excuse to use that quote.

HannaB

It is a good one, and does fit! ♥

werafdsaew

My read is that Folly hasn't been triggered yet

Lark

Akua as a hero. This will be fun.

It's also delightfully elegant – it seems the Liesse Accords needed someone on the other side of the fence to have a chance, and while I don't doubt Pilgrim and his allies will fight it, "prior nemeses coming to an agreement in the face of a greater threat" has the shape of all sorts of stories to it.

Plans like this are part of what make Akua such a wonderful character to read.

NZPIEFACE

"The Liesse Accords needs a hero to reinforce it as well. So I thought it would be a good idea to get one of the worst villains in modern history to act as that role."

byzantine279

More, "So one of the worst villains in modern history thought it would be hilarious if they got to join as a Hero."

NZPIEFACE

I mean, it is hilarious.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh man, yeah. That could work. It's a perfect Yin Yang.

Cat, an Evil Hero that has good intent, and does bad for them.

Akua, a Good Villian that has bad intents, and does good for them.

The Evil one will always hate the Good no matter what, even though she's warmed up to her alot, where the other fondly cares for them despite all the abuse thrown at them.

But what the shit is down and the accords need to be held, both team up and get shit done in glorious snarky flirty fashion.

It's one of the most unstoppable forms the Power of Friendship can take: the dual-foil-at-odds-but-cooperating BUDDY DUO.

They will be unstoppable, at least until one of them finally gets too old for this shit.

Kirroth

Akua always wanted to escape her cage and always found a larger one outside. Now she's going to take a turn at breaking out of the cage of "Standard Bearer of Praesi Evil". Best of luck to her with that.

NZPIEFACE

Akua has always been riding the wave of megalomaniac super genius villain. Now she's gotten bored of it.

Euodiachloris

"I discovered the key to my cage was the ignition key for the electrified bars of the next one. OK – time to try beating the cages to bits with each other, then."

RanVor

Truly she has learned a lot from Cat.

Anon

And so winter fades – not with a bang but with a weak gasp.

Sad to see the power (seemingly) clumsily go out like this – while it was admittedly too absurd as a power-up, Cat losing in such a half-assed way doesn't necessarily feel better.

Cat's entirely at odds with herself, and self-realization of the mantle's bastardization of her humanity or not, it feels like a tonal shift unearned – especially in the context of the whole conversation with the dead king on being immortal and the like.

And while maybe that's the point, something feels....different here, than in previous books' pivots. And while I can't quite put my finger on a defining specific sentence or idea, it just...feels off, to me.

Cat definitely didn't care for parts of the mantle and how they changed her life, but she seems too....vehement here, about her mortality, and how it (may or may not) ties into her plans, and/or being 'good' or 'evil'.

(Admittedly I can see the over-arching meta-narrative desire to get cat 'Back' to being mortal, but....have to wait and see to be sure)

Nothing about Akua's 'help' feels 'earned' enough to secure Cat's pivot to a claim, here (like, is she REALLY thinking going out with a heroic bang will save her from the gods below?), and for how easily Sve Noc literally tore Cat apart (and Cat's seeming desire to die just recently), Cat coming 'back' in time to stake her claim feels wonky because of it, just because Sve Noc waited to double tap./

And while having a 'reversal' of Cat's playing with her own soul now resulting in her snooping around in someone else's is interesting, I just....I dunno.

Some of it's probably not knowing exactly what parts of 'winter' and/or 'Catherine' are going to result from this (and to be honest, not really sure how the whole Sve Noc claiming winter with night [when previously, it was explicitly stated multiple times that the 'night' was subservient to Winter] even really was done so neatly as to rip Cat's 'winter-ness' in twain), but even so, I'm past ready to see the Drow business come to a close.

NZPIEFACE

I honestly think Akua just got bored and wants to have some fun.

Anon

I'd believe that if she hadn't already told Cat (while mind-whammied) that she knew Cat made a deal with Vivienne to end Akua's 'life' when she was no longer useful.

So as a bargain to live a little longer it maybe works, but as a pivot I don't see the narrative weight behind it – she's been useful, but even 'faking' a pivot would require some onus I haven't really seen Cat give her.

Certainly not any impression of contrition or repenting.

NZPIEFACE

Who said she was ever repenting? She said it rather implicitly that she doesn't have any intention of actually being good, just "playing the hero".

Haihappen

Her whole argument is the question that, to be a hero, is it more important to "do good" or "think good", conviction versus act. Her reasoning is on the act: It does not matter if I am not thinking "good", if my actions are "Good", how can she be denied the mantle of a hero. It is challenge, something that is outside her "iron sharpens iron" mindset that had been instilled into her since her birth to her death.

I think I have one aspekt of Akua figured out: She desperately wants to DO stuff, SHOW people of what she is capable. She wants to be LOOKED at, it does not matter if people fear or admire her, as long as they need to look upwards.

HannaB

Yes!

Akua wants to matter and to show off, and she doesn't care if there's a painful demise at the end of the ride. She wouldn't have deliberately modeled herself on Triumphant if she had.

Insanenoodlyguy

She outright said she expected some other Akua to come along and kill her some day. I am 100% sure she'd have reinstated a Chancellor knowing that'd be the most likely person to do it. She was going to be Dread Empress Magnificent. She didn't intend to do it all, just to do it all well. Now a new path has opened and she's taking it.

HannaB

Exactly!

HannaB

Akua is a villain. A Praesi villain. All of them always know that the end will be terrible. Cat's deal with Vivienne means that it will be a little more terrible than possibly expected, but ultimately, it's still the same deal: paying for everything at the end.

Akua did not make Liesse because she was afraid of paying due.

Myatt22

What happens though if she is no longer akua or if she sets herself up as the necessary hero for the accords those are the only 2 ways out of cats and vivs deal that I can see unless of corse it's no longner binding as cat isn't fae anymore

HannaB

The only narratively valid way out of Cat's and Vivi's deal is to make it so thoroughly obsolete Vivi will take her request back. This isn't about wiggling through loopholes, anymore, this is about changing the tides of stories. Akua always loved the grander approach, after all.

Jane

Eh, I imagine she'll walk out of this without too much of a power-down – maybe with a Goddess-on-a-Leash, maybe with the shattered remnants of WinterNight being a less overwhelming power to absorb, or maybe with something from a completely different direction. Losing it all just doesn't fit with the tone, plot, or direction of the series, to say nothing of how it would waste the way she'd been studying how to use her power properly.

That said, her vehement rejection of Apotheosis makes sense when she's able to experience mortality again, after months of having everything around her dulled and her mind made rigid; it's like finally being sober after years of alcoholism. Once you get a taste of what you should be, you feel revulsion at what you had been trapped in.

As for Akua, well... She's been building up to this for a while, now, expressing a desire to step away from her old self and embrace a more successful direction. Saving Cat instead of just walking off is the payoff for that, as well as a reflection of the fact that Akua does genuinely like and respect her – at least, as much as Akua can be said to have such feelings for anyone.

As for Sve Noc not bothering to kill her while she had the chance... Eh, she was so trapped in her enforced behaviors, it doesn't seem odd to me. I mean, she couldn't even hold a real conversation anymore, just throw out cliched lines; she really wasn't capable of sensible precautions anymore.

That said, I do feel that the last few chapters could use a bit of restructuring at this point... The flow just feels wrong at the moment. We go from laying out an outline of a plan for the big battle, to seeing it start to play out, to a sudden enemy trap, to... Having her soul cut open, taken in front of a goddess as a sacrifice, and a soul battle for their mantles. It's just too abrupt, like this; there should have been an interlude for someone else noting how everything went to hell, to clearly signal the end of the battle and the beginning of the more personal struggle.

But, well, pacing issues are to be expected with the format, which is why I haven't been too critical about the arc as a whole; the editing to make everything flow smoothly is something that can really only happen once a book is actually finished.

mavant

The usual rule: Spoken plans always fail, unspoken plans always succeed.

The only thing that was weird here is that there WAS an unspoken part of the plan – the details of “Folly” – and yet it still didn't succeed. Unless it did, and memory shenanigans are involved, in which case I guess we'll find out soon.

Jane

Maybe I just missed the plan, somehow?... It sounded to me like they were going to gather everyone into the center of the city, and then... Something.

I was kind of expecting that “something” to either happen, or be explained, which is why it took me a while to acknowledge that yeah, that’s probably not going to happen after all.

HannaB

The ‘something’ was ‘have as many people as possible fight each other instead of Cat’. There were no details, because detailed plans fail.

Tom

Re: the flow of the last few chapters:

Sve Noc’s involvement in the battle was expected after she showed up in Cat’s dream beforehand. Since Sve Noc is at the heart of all this Night business and the Night is kind of critical to the usefulness of Cat’s Drow recruits (not to mention Drow survival as a species?), it makes sense that a tangle with Sve Noc would trump all other engagements. And ultimately some change in the nature of Cat’s powers was expected by the end of this arc because her powers had been relatively static for a while. A straightforward physical brawl doesn’t grant you new powers, plus Sve Noc is kind of a demigod so a straightforward physical brawl isn’t gonna end well, so you need weird mumbo jumbo to sort out the confrontation between Cat and Sve Noc.

So... everything is going according to plan 😊

Jane

Aw, but it was always so much fun to note how Cat was a literal goddess (albeit a comparatively minor one), defending her country against petty mortals... Well, at least she should stay sane at the end of this. I did always like the Winter motif, though...

I’m... Going to decline to comment on Akua’s ambitions, here, for fear of my brain blue-screening. I do recall once hearing about a character in a pen-and-paper RPG, though, about a young demon who wanted to try her hand at being Good, despite not understanding what that actually was... I guess Akua might fare a bit better in a world running on Narrativium, though, where holding the proper form of a thing is enough to compel its success. And a lack of Vile feats claiming a price on the soul she does not have, admittedly.

You know, I kind of thought last chapter that this whole thing would lead to Cat becoming “Queen of Nothing” to a goddess no longer living, but finding something possessed of a bit of rationality in Sve Noc opens a distinct possibility that Sve might actually survive this somehow. Half of her, at least.

Still, I wonder what the effects of stitching a part of a deity to your cloak does to the cloak...

NZPIEFACE

Saint of Blades doesn't have a single lick of justice in her, yet she's one of the best heroes around.

Who says Akua can't be like that?

Big Brother

It's kinda like having Divinely Gifted Armour, albeit Forcefully Enchanted instead of Willingly Blessed. And that distinction can cause a MASSIVE difference in power granted by the Armour.

Take a God(dess) of Life. Her Willing Blessing could give extreme regeneration, able to regrow limbs in milliseconds. But Forcefully Enchanting her into the Armour could cause Cursed Immortality, an inability to die, no matter the state of your body. You could live eternally as a severed head if the Armour is an ear or nose piercing.

Jane

Well... On the other hand, Sve Noc is an Evil goddess; those kind of artifacts usually come with nasty costs attached, like trading away your soul, demanding horrific sacrifices, or stealing your life with every use. Meanwhile, stealing and repurposing things associated with them tend to come without most of the drawbacks – though usually with a bit of evil flavor and/or need for self-sacrifice associated with them...

Using the bones of a god tends to be a bit more neutral, but that's just the body; messing around with the soul seems like it would be a different thing...

Hm. A tricky question, though I don't think Cat's aware that her cloak has become an artifact (Akua's binding aside).

lennymaster

She sure as hell knows! She herself mentioned that she noticed how magic just seemed to pearl off of it, like water from a leaf. She even used that effect several times, the last time if I remember correctly during second Liesse.

Shoddi

The cloak becomes wrinkle-free, stain-repellent, water-resistant, reversible... and the pockets become capable of keeping of the souls of your enemies securely tucked away.

Jane

...Wait, that sounds a lot like what Cat's cloak can already do. Is this one of those "You waited too long, so the upgrade is already obsolete" kind of deals?

Decius

Stain-repellent, except for bloodstains for blood you are responsible for shedding, which it soaks up, becoming heavier and heavier as it turns red, then black, then green, then Oh My God what color blood do Dwarves even have?

Insanenoodlyguy

The demon makes me feel like that one time in Comics when Carnage became good. For those that don't read: Magic Shenanigans made a big Multi-Hero Villian fight result in a mass AOE alignment swap spell both sides got caught up in. Serial Killer Carnage suddenly was filled with a desire to be on the side of good, though didn't actually stop being an insane homicidal manic, which had... interesting results.

<https://imgur.com/gallery/PKSwn>

NZPIEFACE

"You can't rob a bank if it burns down first."

Um... Is that Cat?

naturalnuke

Ooo I think I know where this is going...

Andrew Mitchell

Do tell. Please. 😊

nick012000

Looks like my prediction of Cat merging with the Sve Noc might be coming true, at least temporarily.

Also, shapeshifting battle! Those are always fun.

JJR

Wit repetition explicitly forbidden. So that's why they never just get caught in a loop.

sugarrollblog

"It's not who you are underneath, it's what you do that defines you"

HannaB

Exactly!

If Akua manages to not fuck up, she has a genuine chance there.

Wry Warudo

So if Winter is gone, what keeps the Hunt bound?

Anon

Theoretically, if Winter as an 'entity' is gone and is merged/merging with night, then the hunt has either been forced to join up with whatever other faction the rest of the fae now are, or has been subsumed into allegiance with whatever the winter-night combination is.

Also, they could be running rampant, but Cat seems to have been too completely decimated (and Winter gobbled up too quickly) soul-wise for them to act out the whole 'traitorous opportunists' aspect.

mavant

It's unclear whether the Hunt is a bound part of winter; it might just go back to being unaffiliated without a real winter court member to swear to.

HannaB

It's entirely possible they've sworn to personally Cat and nothing's changed.

let me check

...no, sovereign of moonless nights they're sworn to whoever that is not to winter, to moonless nights we shall see

Andrew Mitchell

Great question, and one I'm sure we'll get an answer to.

I can't even remember what have the Hunt been up to while Cat's in the Ever Dark. Are they currently working with Hakram & Vivienne?

HannaB

With Juniper, I think 😊

Javvies

Intriguing.

Backstory on the drow and Sve.

"There is always a mistake. ... Always."

This is so very true. And will probably affect Cat's attempt to dodge apotheosis and remain mortal.

Hmmm. I wonder how Cat's new Name/power is going to express itself.

Also ... I'm more convinced than ever that her new Name isn't going to be a title, it's likely to be a variation on her own given name of Catherine Foundling.

Yeah, Akua is seriously going for a redemption play. That's going to complicate things with Viv.

Daemion

Redemption stories end in death, usually.

Akua knows her days are numbered and instead of wheeling and dealing, instead of trying to trick and betray... she decided to go out on her own terms. She chose redemption as her way to die because before she does she gets to burn brightly, be a hero, be admired and most likely, make sure she isn't ever forgotten.

Vivienne has nothing to complain about. Cat made a binding promise and now Akua doubled down on it. At this point it would take a miracle for her to survive... and... you need to be a hero for that... oh, I see. Clever girl.

sugarrollblog

Akua is already dead. Her redemption story will start in death and maybe end with her being alive.

Novice

As Akua herself admitted, damnation is far more likely to be her ending than resurrection.

HannaB

But it's going to be fun along the way!

Euodiachloris

Go big or go home. That's pretty much always been Akua in a nutshell. 😊

HannaB

Akua's play here is so blindingly amazing the practical way to be Evil in this 'verse is to not be, after all

Insanenoodlyguy

Dunno about that, but Cat has proven time and time again that some of the best Evil can be done without all that much evil. The capitalization is important.

Kirroth

I think I'm seeing the shape of things to come. Winter merges with Night and gets passed off to Andronike, who remains an ally. The throne of Callow is abdicated and the crown passed to Vivienne, who also remains an ally. Everything that's been weighing Cat down for all of Book IV is shed and she's free to be herself again. Cue her Pivoting to a new name and going on a rampage with her new sidekick Akua as she upsets the plans of both Above and Below.

This has been the dark period, the middle bit where the protagonist is misled and distracted by a path they're not suited for. Now we're seeing Cat starting to do what she does best again, now that she's rediscovered herself.

Aston W

Kill the Gods and break the storyline?

Anon

Cat made a solemn oath with Vivienne to kill Akua – and while the 'when' of that promise is a little vague, even if Vivienne name-transitions, she sure as shit is not going to be okay with Cat palling around with Akua doing 'heroic' things.

HannaB

Ah, but Akua isn't asking Cat to break that oath. Even if Cat were to shed it with the mantle of Winter and no longer be literally bound, it's still standing between them. After all, Akua surfing on the tsunami of heroism doesn't have nearly as much oomph to it if she does it to save her life/unlife, or even to escape torment. Akua's bet has always been 'bad ending but a hell of a ride before it', and this is basically the ultimate expression of that. The greater the sacrifice, the greater the payoff 😊

Xvyz

Cat can also make it so Akua becomes the Dread Empress of Praes, with that she'll have her own people in places of power for the war against the Gods.

Daemion

I think it needs to be pointed out that Cat never owned or controlled all of Winter.

She took over one half of one of the Fae realms. As mentioned in the story, there are lots more (possibly infinite?). She didn't really earn it or conquer it or claim it, she simply got left with it because she was the last Winter noble remaining. I think that contributed in her never being able to use the power properly.

Which means... the Winter she was using until now was not infinite. It was limited, probably in more ways than one. She had a lot, but it was never without end.

This is supported by the fact that Sve Noc managed to meld Night and Winter. If Winter had been unlimited power, then the Night would have been a drop of oil in the ocean, not something that can be used to take control.

I believe becoming immortal isn't all that difficult, staying yourself and keeping your power intact for millennia is the challenge. Neither Winter nor Night seem to be solution here but perhaps the combination of them does? Maybe with some additional souls thrown in for stabilization?

What I'm most curious about is how Akua becoming a hero will help. She's dead. Just a soul bound to an object and keyed into Winter, which is dead and broken now too. She has no claim to either power and simply no power period. At most she can annoy people but that's already Cat's shtick.

IDKWhoitis

There have been plenty of non-coporal entities that have aided heroes in all sorts of stories. Talking Swords, helpful fairies, friendly ghosts. Akua was always powerful and fearful for her mental prowess and story meta-knowledge, not her bench presses, so this is hardly a problem.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat did some of her best work when dead. Akua just saved Cat while dead. Don't count em out just cause they stopped having a pulse.

Don't think of Winter as infinite in the omnipotent sense, but rather in terms of stamina. Using winter, while it can cause changes, doesn't wear out winter. It doesn't tire, it doesn't get "drained" merely from use. You can use winter for infinite uses infinite times, up to the whole of winter, and at no point does it lessen in the process. It doesn't have to rest, it doesn't need sacrifices or rituals to regenerate, and giving it to more people actually makes it easier to use. The more cannibalistic night fused with it should work very well now that it has a sustainable power source.

That does not mean, as we've seen, it can't be hurt or otherwise defeated. Cat, far weaker but more innovative, was able to hurt it. Part of this is the same reason I think she did so horribly with the power: She's a god fighter, ill suited to be a god herself. She fought to maintain what humanity she could even as a self-proclaimed shell of herself (whereas Akua, willing to throw herself into it, did much more much faster). For example, the previous Akua, given the same power, never would have kept having a heartbeat. Cat's an innovative, ever changing person (commented on more than once, both Malicia and Cordelia have only ever been able to fully figure out who cat used to be and keep encountering somebody different the next time), a horrible choice for a mantle that makes one an unchanging part of the fabric of reality. She owned it, but she was one of the most ill-suited people to do so. I imagine she'll still have some measure of power at the end of this, if only in a new name, but what's most important is that we have back a Cat who, even if weaker, is far, far more dangerous.

HannaB

This!

Catherine Foundling is bloody terrifying, and Winter only dulled that.

daegone823

Am I the only one that had a flashback to the sword and the stone when Merlin and Madam Mim are having a fight the rules are set out and Mim keeps cheating and turning into predators against the shapes that Mim is. (chicken for caterpillar, cat for a mouse).

Similar to Cat he changes into a small germ that attacks Mim internally like how Cat turned into a small shard and plunged into Sve.

I was dare I say giddy.

HannaB

Yes!!!

IDKWhoitis

I, for one, would happily embrace Akua if she turned her cloak.

Not only because it would shut down potential redemption bullshit from the Pilgrim, but because Akua is one of the most well developed, multi-faceted characters I've read in a while.

I know Viv may never truly forget what happened, but if Akua brings back an intact Cat, she maybe able to forgive. Because let's be real, everyone was worried about Winter Cat, and Cat wouldn't be able to return to Callow without Akua's help. She would have been unmade and ended long ago in the Underdark, especially just now with that Kill Steal from a god.

Also, I'm still hoping for Cat to go after Akua, as insane and unlikely it is to happen.

Anon

I'd say Cat's still more likely to go after Vivienne than Akua – not only does she have an actual body, but she doesn't have the emotional guilt of lusting after someone who murdered thousands of her countrymen.

Also, Vivienne was willing to fuck Akua over 'almost' to the point of letting Callow burn by leaving Hakram by himself. She swore a solemn oath with Cat on Akua's eventually being killed off for good by Cat. That isn't really something you walk back.

IDKWhoitis

Oh I know Viv is more likely than Akua, but one can still dream.

Also, Akua and Cat have hella a lot of history. The MADE each other, forged their names and positions off of each other. I would also say Akua is certainly more close to Cat than Viv probably will ever be, and understanding on some level what Cat is made of. While her replication of Cat's personality in the Crusdae arc wasnt flawless, she did come a lot closer than Winter Cat did.

Jane

You know, with the number of good romance options Cat has, it wouldn't be that hard to make a romance-focused VN as a spin-off of the Guide...

Jane

I mean, some might say it's a bit too action-focused for that, but it worked for Hakuoki, no?

(Hit Submit a sentence too early before >_< )

IDKWhoitis

Some of these routes would be one hell of a ride

Jane

I can only imagine how much controversy a well-written Cat/William route would create – because people love a good romance, but seeing Cat go Hero for it? It'd be a vicious fight every single time someone brought it up.

Then again, as obvious a spot as he fills, his arc might be too early to appear in a VN... Same with Killian, though it'd feel weird to leave out her one girlfriend who appeared in the work.

I guess it would have to feature Akua, Vivienne, Indrani, Masego, and Hakram. Balance really calls for one more male love interest, but if we're including Akua and Vivienne, it would really have to be post-Liesse, and there aren't really a lot of men who have been that close to her (be it in a positive or negative relationship) after that..

Of course, we could still start introduce them as side-story DLC afterwards – or maybe even go beyond that to include some really eyebrow raising love interests, like Cordelia, Kairos, Malicia, and Larat; characters that don't have even the vaguest hint of a spark implied in their relationship, even with shipping goggles on, but who would no doubt be entertaining to see and explain.

...Aw, now I really want to see such a game 😞 .

NZPIEFACE

We've literally seen a branching path in this novel before. Why are they all complaining?

IDKWhoitis

I think it would depend on how long or deep one would write it. It could start Pre-Liesse, and then play around with the four storylines that we glimpsed there as potential outcomes that would set Cat on some very different routes.

I wouldn't want Winter Cat to be the protagonist of it, as she's emotionally deep inside. However all that waffling about what to do certainly does remind me of a MC of a VN.

Jane

In terms of structure, I think it would be best if it covered roughly the events of a single book in length, with most of it tied to a common route but with Cat choosing to spend time with a given love interest after every major story beat, where they talk over what just happened and grow closer to each other; the storyline should split in the final arc, though, as Cat makes some big decision, either concerning the plan or concerning her goals depending on the route, that focuses on the particular synergy she has with the person she's closest to. This should strike a good balance between the romance and an independent plot, I think.

I think if we warped the plot a bit so that Vivienne joins up a bit earlier (or just starts trusting the Woe a bit earlier, though that would be harder), Book Three would be a suitable Cat to adapt – her personality isn't Winterfied, all of the Woe are with her, but things are still in flux enough that their interpersonal dynamics could go in a lot of different directions. It means no Akua (well, it could be done in a very different form, I guess, but... Pre- and post-Fall Akua are very different things in this context.), but it would also allow us to include Killian.

IDKWhoitis

Personal preference, but I never really liked Killian. Never particularly disliked something, but I kinda always felt they were on the periphery of things. She was Cat's first love, but the way she exited stage left lacked much grief on my end.

I do agree Book 3 is probably the best to adapt, and instead of forcing Viv into the position quicker, we could just slightly augment the ending of Book 3 to make Winter a bit less static and all consuming as we know it. Alienation being always on is what made me dislike Winter Cat, but having more of a gradient on Winter's influence would allow Book 4 events to be part of the plot.

Jane

Mmm... It's just that stopping Akua's plot (or not) would make a very tidy ending for the VN, and one that could be adapted to a number of unique routes. If we were to go into Book Four, I can't really think of a good place to end things – and even if there were, it could easily make things too long.

Insanenoodlyguy

Thing is, Vivienne has no interest in having sex with Cat. Cat seems very sure she's straight and not into girls, which likely means she's already taken that swing and missed. Akua, on the other hand, has repeatedly expressed interest in having sex with Cat. That puts her ahead by a pretty good margin, especially now that Cat can no longer simply shapeshift into a man if all else fails. I'm not saying she ever would have, but it was theoretically possible before.

HannaB

I mean, shapeshifting doesn't change your gender. That's not how orientation+gender work. That was never an actually valid option.

So, uh... yeah.

Insanenoodlyguy

Depends really. I am not getting into trans/generfluid politics or personal identity issues here. Rather just going with something that, problematic or not, has been in stories before.

Namely:

"I am into you. Wanna hump?"

"You are the wrong gender for me to have interest in that."

"I am also a shapeshifter. Bam! I'm now in a body more appealing to you, yes?"

"..." (various levels of interest/horror/revulsion/ here depending on story)

I'm not saying that Cat see's herself as a man, just that she could be one for a night if she wanted to.

daegone823

Is it possible that in a world where Cat is carving her soul she could consume Akua and have her as some sort of symbiotic component keeping her humanity intact as a sort of life support system for the fragile being that is Cat. We are missing the point that AKua like Cat is breaking away from her bonds and becoming more fluid.

She could died like Cat and be born anew.

She would walk away a ner being muttering "Akua made her mark, it is time Abua no makes hers"

HannaB

Cat/Akua is approximately 100% more likely than Cat/Vivienne. Because Vivienne is straight.
And Cat and Akua both have what can only be described as a crush on each other, and sexual tension has to be cut with a knife when they're up close.

One of these is already canon, the only question is 'will Catherine ever actually SLEEP with her'. The other is one-sided pining after a best friend.

Daemion

Cat/Indrani/Masego are the best pairing. Especially if Cat is mortal again.

HannaB

That is objectively accurate.

However, Cat/Akua remains the best kismessitude I have ever seen 😊

mavant

OT3

Euodiachloris

Looking forward to the day when Akua wags a finger in some Hero's face because, while she, like, totally is on board with the spreading of sunshine and the fostering of puppies, the whole painting smiles on other people's souls Is, like, really bad, you know?

I should know, dude/tte: I was a Villain, remember. I know bad when I see it. *smile sweetly*

HannaB

OH HELL YES.

Akua WOULD be able to lecture heroes on finer points of morality ♥

Insanenoodlyguy

"Oh, are we all falling into Evil villiany? Unexpected at this point, but I've been on this horse before. I can teach you all how to do the laugh correctly."

"We are not falling into Evil Villany at all! The angel's benevolent aura wll..."

"Rape souls. It will rape every soul it falls upon. I've mutilated quite a few souls myself, trust me, there's no appreciable difference what way that soul is reshaped. Now your laugh is entirely too soft, so we need to get started right away, if we are going to have you stand on the tallest tower in the city cackling when your evil plan comes to fruition."

Euodiachloris

"I keep telling you, you'll get nowhere until you really work your diaphragm and intercostals."

RanVor

Headcanon accepted. Akua's first aspect as a hero would be Criticize.

Aston W

Dead King and WB will be in for a shock..

No more god Cat.

Daemion

Who is WB?

Anon

Wandering Bard.

Honestly, with the way Cat is insisting on staying Mortal, I imagine the Gods below will stick it to her via making her unaging as a last laugh if (when) she wins, even if she doesn't get all the winter-night power.

Unless she manages to somehow pull off the 'gain the power with none of the drawbacks' via having Sve Noc become an ally without one of them dying, but that seems both out of character and not where the story is going – the gods below have too much at stake riding on this.

Insanenoodlyguy

Evil Named are already relatively unaging. I really doubt she's about to get a heroic name now. But she'll still be just a life-prolonged mortal, and there's a lot of differences there, namely in how easy it is die, and according to cat, how much more you actually live.

NZPIEFACE

Evil Named are immortal. Well, none have ever reached the end of their natural lifespan.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not true immortal, just unaging. In theory immortality is poor by comparison, especially since, as you've said, most don't even live longer than a regular mortal would. Because they are lacking an answer for all those other ways you can die, and are more likely to be introduced to said ways because of their life choices. Named Cat would have died several times during this story arc alone. Winter Immortality picked up a lot of slack.

RoflCat

The Wondrous Beard

Which is actually Traitorous disguising as a disguise kit, to fall off the hero's face in perfect moment to reveal them to their enemies.

Nif

Wandering bard

NZPIEFACE

This is getting me thinking, will her new name be "God-Killer" or something?

Aston W

You mean God-Brawler.

She punches them until they give up and make a new world.

SilentWatcher

That would be terrible. again having Cat Mortal is a mark of bad writing, to make the main character weaker so he can be again in the position of the Underdog. The sword of truth is such an example. Even when she ends up with a god on her leash it would be even worse, because borrowed power is even more unsatisfying to read than no power at all. Also narrative Concerns, everything dangerous, which was leashed, will sooner or later break free.

If she manages to claim everything back, the question remains, if the night part of her power makes her weaker against powers of Above. Winter was not affected before (The undead could not be banished with holy juice)

HannaB

Don't forget narrative power! If Cat becomes mortal again, she'll get back a lot of oomph she was actually LACKING as a deity.

Insanenoodlyguy

What are you talking about? That sword was clearly dangerous and she was right to do what she did to it. It would have killed her. Her cloak just did, since it managed to be a subversion, but it's been clearly stated that magic artificats are a really fucking dangerous thing, at best being unavailable at a time of great need and at worst being the reason for the trouble. A villian wielding an angel-forged sword of a hero that can cut anything? That thing would have killed her during or before Kaleidoscope.

As to her being mortal again: she's never been more dangerous. Weaker is an acceptable trade-off to be more dangerous. That's not bad writing, that's sensible character progression. She never liked Winter. She now has an out, and she's taking it. Whatever she becomes, it's going to be mortal. There's no way she could take it back simply because she wanted to once she became immortal, stories dont' let you take life-altering decisions so easily. But Cat is doing here what she's always done: using the stories to her advantage, including the ones that should be her doom. A great evil has supplanted another great evil and taken the power! But now Cat keeps saying "Mortal no matter what." Even if she takes the power back for herself directly, it will be in some way where she uses it instead of being it.

The key here is to NOT leash it. It's not a leash if the power/monster is okay with what's going on. And how interesting, Cat is making nice with Sve Noc's other half..

HannaB

n i c e

Antoninjohn

When Cat took Winter for the first time the Winter King said that she was apart of the Winter court till "her last dying breath, clawing at the dark", Cat's not going to lose Winter that easy

Metalshop

She's literally dying in the darkness here, so if there was ever a time to slip that particular noise this would be it.

mavant

Ooohh, GOOD FORESHADOWING

Nickyd5

Well that probably wasn't the best decision, in fact I would say it's a stupid one. I mean "mortal to the end" is a nice sentiment everything, (except not really) but I don't see how all that power she let go was the best decision. Just being nearly human and mortal, isn't going to help her when the grey pilgrim, the sword saint, and everyone else they can gather up, come to kill her, everyone she knows and even remotely cares about, and then proceed to carve up Callow again, because she was too weak to stop them, and because she wanted to feel human again. She was barely strong enough not to die instantly when she first fought the sword saint, and even then she was smacked around like she was an unruly child, and was losing limbs left, right and center, and that was with Winter's mantle, now she doesn't even have that.

This isn't even getting into the fact they have black, the closest thing to father she ever had, locked up and are probably going to execute him soonish, and she will probably be too weak to stop it, and maybe not even get there in time because she maybe doesn't have access to the fay gates anymore. Hopefully she can get some measure of power back, so she can at salvage something from this catastrophe, and remain somewhat relevant.

Sablonus

You're forgetting one it'sy bitsy teeny weeny micromolecular but ever so crucial detail.

Cat's world runs on waves of literal narrative and deus ex machinas out the ass.

Jane

On the one hand, yes, she did give up literally goddess-like power. On the other hand, though...

She realized that she was being far more affected by the principle alienation than she had realized, and that it was dulling her mind – her single greatest asset. When she faces the Heroes, the Gods Above are going to be putting a lead weight on the scales; when she faces the Dead King or Malicia, she'll be facing someone who already outplayed her. Matching power for power isn't how she's going to get through this mess – but that's the kind of thinking Apotheosis forces on her.

How much value is there really in taking the power to win today's battles when it guarantees losing the war? That's the kind of reasoning that caused her to reject Bonfire earlier, and which justifies rejecting Apotheosis today.

Even if she walks away with nothing but the Drow (who don't actually have to follow her if she's no longer Sovereign of Winter, but I'm assuming that's going to be resolved somehow), they have enough tricks to make up for her powerdown – and are diversified enough that Pilgrim can't just knock her out by disrupting a single (awesomely powerful) spell. It's enough to keep her in the game.

Of course, I expect she'll still walk away with some personal power, somehow, but... Even without going meta, I think from her perspective, it was still the right choice. So long as she has some reason to think she's keeping the Drow.

SilentWatcher

Doing the right thing regardless of negative consequences just so she can masturbate to her principles is a hero thing. get over it Cat and grab that power of Damnation

Insanenoodlyguy

But doing the smart thing regardless of story impulses (which for Evil's side is always "grab more power") is a Cat thing.

Aston W

Take the power but remain in the game.

Cat's insane enough to want to break the game. In Callow. Break Names etc.

That's her purpose as a main character. She IS Meta.

Time for a reset or time skip. Thanks EE.

Novice

If this was any other universe I would agree with you but this is a universe run by narrativium. A mortal going against powerful beings can pack a hell a lot more punch than they rationally should have depending on what story is currently running. This arguably can even have a better chance than matching power for power against demigods/minor gods/demons/angels. It's all about the right story, as insane as it is.

HannaB

Exactly!

So far, Catherine won every time by being /right/. She did the right thing in every major conflict she had (no I am not counting the Lone fucking Swordsman in first Summerholm as a major conflict). She forced out the invasion of Callow despite it being backed up by two strongest heroes the crusade had because of what Tariq and Laurence noticed: she came back at the last moment to help her cornered allies, and it is a hero story, one where the hero wins. She genuinely

WAS defending Callow from a foreign invasion motivated by territorial gain, and that was what tipped the scales.

Refusing to play Below's game here is the only winning move, on the broader game board. The practical way to be Evil is to not be. She was only ever going to pay for gaining power, more and more, and rejecting it gives her back the hold on the 'underdog scrappy orphan' story, which is what had allowed her to grab hold of Winter in the first place, way back when.

Iconochasm

There's even a quote about that, from somewhere in the Guide, something like:

"Who should really be afraid, between the dragon and the peasant with a sword?"

HannaB

You forget that this is a story-driven world.

Between the dragon and the peasant with the sword, who should really be afraid?

Aston W

The sword.

Aotrs Commander

Problem with Winter was, it was making her Story-vulnerable the more of it she used. I didn't even really notice myself until last chapter how much Cat had become... Slightly less Cat since Winter.

...

Shit.

I just realised the points – the only couple of points – I found myself at odds with Cat were while she was under the mantle; around Second Liesse – and just after Winter unlocked. So now I wonder how much of that was Cat and how much of that was the influence of Story via Winter, unconsciously, before she got bit of a handle on it.

So, er, yeah.

While going back to mortal is not a good move, it may be, ironically, a move which gives her better chances than the alternative. She'll likely have to work harder, though, since she's managed to attract all the attention and there comes a point all the cunning in the world can't match a certain level of raw force.

Maybe hero!Akua will get WinterNight and be Cat's new attack... I was going to say "dog" but that hardly seems right.

(That'll piss Viv off no end...)

Insanenoodlyguy

Except narratively It is exactly what is going to help her with them. You are thinking in terms of a direct fight. This less alienated Cat is likely just going to not have one of those.

RanVor

On the other hand, the more Cat tries to avoid the direct confrontation, the more likely she's going to be forced into it. I mean, when was the last time things went the way Cat wanted them to go?

HannaB

Let's see.

- Callow not, in fact, getting invaded on two ends, as Cat made a truce with the crusaders and Black held the Vales
- the Dead King drawing crusaders away from chipping away at Vales without plunging Cat's narrative karma into negatives by having it be her doing
- the dwarves making an agreement with her to fund her and refuse to sell to her enemies
- the drow actually congregating around her
- Akua's sudden yet inevitable un-betrayal

Catherine has things go her way more often than not when she plays hero, and she plays hero more often than not.

She's only going to get better at it without principle alienation, even if she has to bleed for it.

RanVor

Yes, but how many things have gone wrong in the meantime? Cat might usually manage to win at the end, but she never wins cleanly. She might find a way to survive the confrontation, but to outright avoid it? That's not how the Guide works.

HannaB

True!

And wouldn't that be fun?

Burdi

"But Akua bestowed upon me a chord, an invisible string, and through it my fading senses expanded"

i thought it is maybe the key to apotheosis, the secret how akua rip off her own soul yet fully functioned as named with all her aspect intact. (refers to book 2 after first liesse) even masego marveled at her working.

she maybe already learn from the Kabbalis Book of Darkness how to turn herself to an essence with clear mind without dying, she already free of immortal flesh from the beginning minus great mantle of power with immortal existence to anchor her soul (she used obsidian cylinder). neshamah anchor his soul to the hell, cat to winter but still with her mortal body so its incomplete. now she bestowed that to catherine, freed her from her mortal flesh so her apotheosis will full complete.

so the key to apotheosis is get out of your body without dying then bind your soul to something that has immortal existence. Akua taking great risk here, chose to risk brutal dead in the end provided that she got her philosophy answer, trying to free herself from her old cage, live fully and died gloriously

HannaB

I think it's not a risk, it's a bargain. Akua is not assuming she can slip the noose, she's stepping into it willingly because to her, the payoff is worth the price.

Nafram

If this is really a crucible set forth by the Gods Below, then whatever it is that happens, the victor will come out greater than she was before their conflict began (we assume Cat is taking the win here). Even if she remains mortal, she will still be in a more powerful position than before

HannaB

Definitely!
Whatever shape that might take 0.0

SMHF

It's good point Akua brought up!
I mean the end goal for Cat is pretty much "World Peace". She just uses Villainous methods to twist people arms to achieve it. But even though World Peace is as heroic a goal as it gets, she's still technically a Villain.
So who knows, maybe Akua can technically become a Hero by saving puppies all day even though her end goal's gonna be to Rule The World!
Hey if anyone can do it, it's this crazy bitch!

HannaB

Is Cat even really going to be a villain after this? Her meta-story already was one of a hero, as Tariq and Laurence had noted, and she's spitting in the face of Below by refusing their bargain, here.

There are two levels on which the hero/villain distinction works in Guideverse. The first is the straightforward magic power one: what empowers you, Above or Below? The second, however, is more powerful: what story are you a part of? What effect are you having on the world? How are people going to remember you? Above and Below are matched in their pissing match, but in the narrative, the hero always wins.

Oh, usually it's the Above's champions that are doing what's right and claiming the hero mantle in the narrative as well. But doing the right thing has been Cat's signature since Marchford (where it did not even give her an advantage as demons don't care about narrative), and so the narrative is backing her.

Akua is hoping to hitch a ride on that as well, and I don't think she's wrong. As long as she stands with Cat, at the very least she'll get a glorious view.

KageLupus

Cat and the Woe have always walked that fine line between sides. For the longest time Cat was simply the Squire, which was repeatedly stated to be a transitional name that could either go Good or Evil. She never actually transitioned into Black Queen as a Name because of Winter fuckery, and while you can argue that Winter is a prototype for Evil I think there is room to argue, especially since she also never fully embraced the mantle.

Same thing with Zeze being the Apprentice. Transitional name that could normally lead to something like Warlock or Good Wizard, but instead he gets to be Heirophant. A Name which is either new or very rare, and which focuses on studying Creation as a construct. I don't really think that it falls into the Good or Evil camps. If Masego had his way he would dissect the Gods Above and Below just to see what made them tick.

Archer, Thief, and Adjutant are all Neutral names as well. Thief hung out with Heroes, but William was an asshole and she readily admits that his plan was as bad as anything Cat pulled off. Archer is here for a good time, not a long time, and the Woe have nothing but interesting fights lined up in their future. And Hakram would follow Cat through every hell and back because he believes in the world she wants to make.

The thing that makes Cat and the Woe so dangerous is that they are actively throwing off the status quo. None of them care about Above or Below, and their Names all reflect that. Cat wants to break centuries of narrative by making Callow truly free instead of a vassal of Good or Evil nations. The simplest way to do that seems to be picking a fight with both sides and then making up the rest as she goes.

HannaB

Mm!

Aston W

+1

spencer

This chapter was so well written! The battle of mutual adaptation, the reveal of Akua's redemption push, the dive into Sve's past...

Thanks David!

Gazing Rabbit

I would like to remind people that Cat is The Queen of Lost and Found.

Losing her source of power is a recurring theme in this story.

Antony444

And jsut as I was thinking Cat was on her way to become the immortal Dread Empress Irritant, our beloved author pulls a chapter like this...

Go, Akua and Traitorous!

My God, what have I said?

More seriously, that promises a return to the Cat we loved to support in the first books, the one who killed, betrayed and screwed everyone one way or another.

The Crusaders felt terrified by the Battle of the Camps? I think they may need to change their pants for the woman who was once the Squire is back and ready to kick the teeth of the opposition... Yeah, no wonder there's going to be a battle named the Prince's Graveyard...

Nice twist of preferring mortality over immortality...Catherine Foundling may very well be the first soul to refuse apotheosis and unlimited power, screwing the plans of the Gods Below...

Maybe there will be a new name...like Night Queen...

HannaB

I'm betting on Queen of Callow: nice, tasteful, accurate and neutral ^^

mavant

I have no mouth, and I must grin.

mavant

Also, happy to see the riddle game from Sandman played out once more.

Aotrs Commander

Oh my fracking Lichmemaster!

Akua IS serious!

*Ahahahahahahahahahahaha!*

Wow.

I mean, just wow.

That is priceless.

I have seen people backed into the corner and go "fuck it, Evil."
(I can even relate to that.)

I have **never** seen anyone just go "fuck it, Good" before. (For a given value of good... Which alarmingly is arguable whether or not it is more or less Evil than the current "Good.")

This is just... Amazing.

HannaB

I know right!

In a world where Good always wins... there is a pragmatic thing to do 😊

TheTime

About all that Akua redemption thing – remember Traitorous's law especially the addendum

HannaB

I mean, we know Akua is capable of genuine affection, between Barika, Zoin and her father. Tasia did her best to destroy that, but Akua has some fight left in her still

KageLupus

So, here's a question:

What happens to all of the Drow Cat has been collecting, and especially the ones that she has given titles to? We were told very specifically that they all swore their oaths to the Sovereign of Moonless Nights and not to Catherine Foundling. She had her own long term plan for passing the mantle on but that kind of presumes that the mantle actually exists. Sve Noc seems to have put that presumption on shaky ground. Catherine admits she is no longer the Sovereign and that Winter and Night are currently being melded together. Even if she comes out of this with the full power of the new domain behind her I doubt she could get her title back. And Cat explicitly states she doesn't want to play that game again.

Let's assume that the ending here is Cat staying mortal and freeing the other half of Sve Noc. The new Sve then owes Cat one or something and gives her a contingent of Drow to take back to the surface. That still leaves her titled Drow in a kind of limbo. They swore to obey the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, a title which no longer exists. They also agreed to follow the Liesse Accords, but unless Cat has those written down somewhere that is just a vague future guideline. And even if they are codified somewhere does that really count if they aren't put into practice?

Cat kept her hold on Winter even after that court was dissolved. Would a lesser title like Lord of Silent Steps be able to do the same, or would that power just slip away? Or would the titled Drow keep their power but have it shift around since they were already mixing Winter and Night? It would be interesting to see Ivah become the new highest-ranking member of the Winter Court, just like it would be interesting to see it keep a title but have it change to something else.

Cat killing proto gods is cool and all, but I feel like I have more in common with Masego after this chapter.

Insanenoodlyguy

I feel like considering the other power is called "Night" it's ruler still being called "Sovereign of Moonless Nights" could still work and still take. It's conveniently unnecessary to change the title.

Letouriste

"You break my heart, dearest," Diabolist drawled. "Again." That was such a clever piece of writing i'm starting to envy you;)

Kel the Seer

I am excited to see where this lands for Cat.

Will she remain "mortal" but Named? Maybe the Grey Knight who owes no allegiance to above or below and regularly skews all of their plans?

Will she be forced to once again bind the now larger power of Night-bloated on Winter as a sacrifice to protect something bigger?

I am still rooting for a Queen of Air and Darkness out of this one, though it need not be Cat. Akua could still steal this at a critical and dramatically appropriate point while staying true to herself. I'd also accept a sane Sve with an army of Drow relocating to protect the borders of their new homeland, Callow.

HannaB

Grey Knight is still not a possible Name on Calernia. And all the other elaborate things aren't something anyone actually calls her.

Queen of Callow, now... 😊

RanVor

The thing is, the Queen of Callow is a heroic Name, and that's very bad. How bad? Well, everything-Cat-has-strived-for-since-the-beginning-goes-up-in-smoke bad. To take up a heroic Name, Cat would have to surrender her agenda and subordinate herself to the Gods Above, who are very much anti-Liesse Accords and pro-Let's-have-the-bad-guys-invade-Callow.

matesbe

I'm going to theorize that Cat will leave here with a Name like "Queen of Night," or "Ruler of Night," or (less catchy) "Night Queen." I'm not positive by any means, but it would fit. Heck, it might even give her enough of a connection to her last title "Sovereign of the Moonless Night" that the Drow can't just fuck off and leave.

Burdi

Or she became The Dark Knight, that will be awesome....first of its Name, because her nature is that martial arts

Andrew Mitchell

Or "Night Knight". 🤪🤪🤪

grzecho2222

Funny thing that Noc (or Noč or Noć) literally means Night in several languages

grzecho2222

And Sve means All

(edit)

byzantine279

Yeah, that isn't an accident.

byzantine279

My bet: Cat is going to beat the Night-Winter Mantle over the head with a hammer until it gets absorbed into a Name she transitions into.

HannaB

Oh that would be AMAZING.
She'd probably have more limited / narratively regulated access to it, but it'll only work out in her favor with how narrativium works in this universe

ahd

Queen of Air and Darkness. Aspects: Night, Winter, and Rule. (:

crysjaL

Cat's plan is even smarter than you might think. Exactly how can you justify a crusade against someone who ISN'T a villain? If Cat goes back as a mortal with no name The Grey Pilgrim will be grasping at straws to justify invading and destroying Callow. Every refusal and condemnation thus far no longer has relevance against Cat and her ideals.

HannaB

Actually, Grey Pilgrim will not just lose his /pretext/ but also his /actual reason/ for opposing her. He wants to support Cordelia, but at this point I think her and Cat are natural allies in this bullshit.

The crusade is collapsing on itself, one way or another, and Cat no longer being a villain will rob it of its last remains of narrative momentum if it even had any left.

werafdsaew

Several thoughts:

1. Winter is dead, long live WinterNight.
2. Significant portions of this arc focuses on Cat's increasing mastery over Winter and her new Court of Winter. It would be extremely unsatisfying if all that becomes obsolete, either because Winter knowledge doesn't transfer over to WinterNight, or if Cat never gets WinterNight.
3. Is Cat with WinterNight still SOMN? If not, or if she gets a Name instead of WinterNight, then swearing the oaths to SOMN instead of Catherine Foundling is a huge mistake. Again unsatisfying.

SilentWatcher

Yes your speaking my opinion. She cant be mortal again, as mortals dont pick figths with ancient gods after their mortal shell dies.

HannaB

She can be mortal by definition of 'soft, warm, changeable and breakable' without being a mortal in terms of power at her fingertips.

I'm just saying.

Nairne .01

I too would like her to be something that I'd call an "unfettered god".

fbt

as much as I like the series, and characters, something has been on the back of my brain lately. Cat isn't particularly brilliant, doesn't make great choices, doesn't have any intrinsic advantage, nor does she create such in any way that can be viewed as a reliably knowable & workable mechanic. She mostly messes up/fails yet comes out more powerful via rationalizations that were not obvious/necessarily true. Over and over. Honestly, it sometimes feels like Cat's only strength is Plot Armor; she benefits for no apparent reason other than because she's the protagonist? Idk, maybe just a mood of mine! I do like the series, and love many of the quieter bits in particular (i'm partial to relationship bits) and snarky interactions. Ignore this freely, I'm probably being an idiot! It happens a lot. It's great writing, and I really do like it.

HannaB

Oh, you're not wrong!

Cat definitely has gotten through things so far mostly by power of Plot Armor.

Literally.

In-universe.

This is my theory: providence can be granted by Heavens to those who serve them, but it is trumped by the providence granted by the narrative to those who actually really are doing the right thing.

Cat's real power is being on the right side of history, which is how she gathered her allies. Akua here is the purest demonstration of it, changing sides to be on the winning one. She sees Catherine as a hero, and following her as a possible path to redemption, and I don't think it's because she's bad at evaluating stories 😊

NZPIEFACE

What if she's been getting plot armour from Above the whole time cause she was saving Callow.

crysjal

That's incorrect. Good does not have any real control over the narrative. Good's supposed narrative strength developed as the "good Good guys beat the bad Villains", who did unquestionably bad things as Villains in this world demonstrably do (flying castles, plagues etc). The narrative doesn't discriminate between sides. The weight of actions can skew the other way as demonstrated by the functionally Evil Cat in book 2 drawing the sword from the stone and getting her resurrection which is established narratively as a reward for "saving the day", as Cat observed, the angels had to give her her resurrection because that is what the Narrative demanded of the angels. This was perhaps ironically because that was how the narrative developed because the angels had done that previously. Above doesn't have any real influence on the Narrative, in fact nobody has demonstrated an ability to change the narrative outside the Bard which is its own entity and has only ever demonstrated the ability to establish narrative weight as she did vs the Dead King.

The higher an entity appears to be in the pecking order of power the greater the power the narrative seems to have on them. It might be that the narrative is in reality a side effect of attempts to prevent the Gods above and below from directly interfering with the world and thus ruin the entire point of the question the world was created to answer.

Consider the Narrative and the providence that surrounds it to be a piece of clay that is slowly moulded over time as different stories (shapes) are pressed into it. Over time it gains a form and structure and as it does so it hardens.

Eventually similar stories are forced to follow the mould instead of shaping it themselves. That is what the Narrative is. The Dead King and Interlocutor commented that the Narrative was not what it is currently back when they started out.

The Black Knight and Cat both use this to their advantage, finding the "shape" of certain stories and trying to manipulate and change them to fit certain narratives which would lead to certain outcomes. For example, the Champion vs the Monster is an ancient story that has been established via many myths and fairy tales such as Heracles, Beowulf and Sigurd. Captain was fighting a figure whose identity and origin embodies those old heroes and so could only lose in that fight once she transformed and became the monster to Champion's well, champion.

HannaB

Yes, I suppose it's not so much 'heavens granting providence' as it is 'providence normally favoring heavens'.

This supports my point.

Unmaker

Refusing a second apotheosis. Spitting defiance in the face of a monstrous evil while fighting the very schemes of the Gods Below. Sounds suspiciously like Good acts. And none of Catherine's Named followers have explicitly Evil names. Going truly Good would be almost impossible, but taking a mostly-neutral Name seems like a possibility. The Gods Below wanted the only option to be who won because that would continue and expand Evil no matter what, but if Cat doesn't take up the mantle of the Coldest Night, there's a whole lot of power out there waiting to be claimed. A new Name that didn't tap that would be surrounded by enemy power. I am looking forward to seeing what happens.

Unmaker

Another thought: What is Neshamah going to make of an immortal who gets it taken from them and then refuses to take it up again? He will certainly think less of her, but does the precedent alone give him any sort of fear? When the first god dies, the rest learn fear.

---

Chapter 79: As Above

"Hubris and wearing a helmet are not mutually exclusive. Here, allow me to demonstrate."

– Dread Emperor Abominable, the Thrice-Struck

"I'll be honest," I said. "I kind of expected to get to the bottom of memory lane before we ran into each other. You, uh, took me by surprise."

Andronike – Sve Noc's slightly less unreasonable half, or at least that was the hope – did not lean into the feeble attempt at defusing the tension. Fine, I thought, be that way. We can be all grim about this, and not even mention that right now in a very real sense I'm inside your sister. There was room for an even filthier joke in there, and really where was Indrani when you needed her?

"I expected you to move from shadow to shadow until you reached Tvarigu," the entity mildly replied. "Not to raise an army of slaves and declare war upon my entire race. This has been, one might say, a year for surprises."

I was really taking a verbal beating on the whole slave thing tonight, huh. Was this what it felt like to be the Akua of a situation?

"Subtle has never been my strength," I admitted. "It was a bad habit even before Winter filled my veins with pure 'walk off dismemberment' juice. Not sure I can shake it at this point."

Or even that I should, to be honest. I'd run into one dead end after another since I started trying to play queenly games with my opponents. It wasn't that I was awful at those – with the Woe at my back, I'd made sport of my opposition within Callow – so much that my enemies were just outright better at them. It was no excuse to cease learning, but on the other hand had it not been a kind of arrogance to believe that with so little schooling I could stand on equal footing with the likes of Hasenbach or Malicia when it came to their preferred methods? My own were brutish and clumsy things, but in the end I'd accomplished more with bastard ways than proper ones.

"It seems like tonight it is your flaw that will be doing the shaking, then," Andronike indifferently commented.

"Night's not over yet," I said.

"Fascinating," Sve Noc said, though she didn't sound fascinated in the slightest. "Even knowing that my sister pursues you, you would still waste your time on idle banter. You are quite peculiar."

My fingers clenched.

"You're not stopping her," I realized. "Or stopping mind-time, whatever the Hells this is. She's still coming."

"And will annihilate you the moment she finds you," Andronike agreed. "It is inevitable. Even if you flee, eventually there will be nowhere left to run."

"Could you not, uh," I eloquently said, gesturing vaguely.

Silver eyes flicked at me, unamused.

"Why should I?" she replied.

The memory was still unfolding in front of us, the two sisters speaking conspiracy in hushed whispers, but that wasn't the fire I needed to be paying attention to at the moment.

"I want to make a deal," I said.

"So I assumed," Andronike said. "That is usually the way, when one is staring defeat in the eye. What I wonder is why you'd presume I would be willing to indulge you."

"This isn't going to go like you think it is," I said. "If she eats Winter-"

"The sum of your knowledge on this matter is animal instinct and second hand crumbs of understanding from the heir to over a millennium of abject failure," Sve Noc cut in. "While your fumbling attempts to sow discord in ignorance might amuse another, I am not fond of such crude forms of humour."

I grit my teeth.

"First off, Hierophant is a fucking treasure," I said. "Sure he's not perfect, but he's kind and smart as a whip and he tries his best. Don't shit talk my friends, it's rude."

Andronike simply stared at me, then shrugged.

"The hourglass is emptying," she reminded me.

"I'll be expecting an apology later," I said, equally unmoved.

"As for the other thing, it's no secret I'm not the most learned in things sorcery. But you know what I do have a knack for?

Stories. And we're treading one right now, Andronike. You want to guess how it ends for the two of you?"

"This is puerile," Sve Noc noted. "You are the one who sought me out for conversation."

"It's been a long my whole life," I grunted. "Humour me."

She did not reply. I sighed and was I about to prod the conversation forward when I felt the reason she'd not spoken up: a tremor shivering across the ground. The other half was catching up.

"We'll finish this later," I told her. "I need to strategically manoeuvre out of here."

There was no open stretch to leap down this time, which complicate things a bit, but the room was splayed before me in full. Including, luckily, the door. I hobbled forward, trying to spare my bad leg, and tugged it open before going into the dark.

—

"Come on," I muttered, limping forward. "Give me what I need."

There was no winning this with power, I knew. The moment I was caught I'd be swatted into oblivion, Andronike watching with mild interest as my soul was obliterated by her incensed sister. Even our thrilling little chase earlier had seen me on the defensive almost the entire time, only Akua's intervention giving me an opening to strike. Even if I returned to the pit fight, even if I somehow managed to defy the odds and devour her before she devoured me, it would be an empty victory. I'd go right back to being an imitation of myself, only with a second kind of poison running through my veins. I needed to mold the situation so that at least half of Sve Noc wanted me to win, and so far on that front I was swinging at mist. I didn't have good enough a grasp of what moved the sisters, and it wasn't like idle chatter was going to get me here. Somehow I doubted the legendary power of stilted small talk would allow me to turn this around. Fortunately, I could skip the middle man and have a direct look at their — hers, maybe, for I was not sure if these were shared or purely Komena's — memories. I'd been hoping for another pivot, hard decisions taken behind closed doors, but what I got instead was a battle.

The end of one anyway.

Komena was easy enough to pick out from the rest of the soldiers, as her pauldrons were a different set of sculpted obsidian but the rest of her armour had not changed. She was standing among a small band of drow officers, the lot of them idling behind another drow at the edge of a steep promontory overlooking a city. One I did not recognize, it bore saying. The signatures of drow architecture were there, the bridges and complicated segmentations in height, but it wasn't anywhere I'd been before.

This looked like a victory, I thought, yet the mood among the officers was grim. Unlike any other drow city I'd seen this one had walls – four interlocking sets of them, with tall bastions towering over – and beneath those there was a thick carpet of corpses. Many of them drow, but there was no small amount of dwarves to match them. Given that the city still stood and the likely invading dwarven army was nowhere in sight, the Empire Ever Dark was master of the field. Yet below in the winding city streets I could see soldiers retreating in haste, forcing aside panicking civilians to make their way out faster.

"Jakrin, Soliva," the drow closest to the edge said. "Have your javelineers scatter the crowds of the outer district. The delay is dangerous."

My eyebrows rose in surprise. I knew that voice. Not so long ago it'd been mocking me mercilessly. Under the helm and ornate armour it was difficult to have a look at the drow, but the voice did not lie: I was looking at a younger Mighty Rumena. Was that what it'd meant, when it had said it knew one of the sisters? Komena had actually served under it during the wars? Rumena's orders drew no enthusiasm, but two officers peeled off to see to their ugly duty.

"The rest of you, see to your sigils," Rumena said. "Prepare for the retreat north. Dismissed."

The drow scattered without a word, all save for Komena. She strode forward instead, coming to stand at Rumena's side, and I limped forward to flank it on the other side. The three of us looked down at the city eating itself alive, silent for a moment.

"Great General Who Shook The-" Komena began.

"Enough, rylleh," Rumena tiredly replied. "Today I held command over the single greatest military disaster in the history of the Firstborn. Spare me the titles, they now have the ring of mockery."

"It is not of your making, this war," the woman who would become Sve Noc said. "I was there when you protested the deep raids. As were all the others."

"It might not have been such a disaster, had we kept to the humans," Rumena mused. "But they were too few, too far. We needed nerezim slaves if the hallowing was to happen in our lifetime."

I let out a sharp breath. It'd been the drow that started the wars with the Kingdom Under? Deep raids, Komena had said, and all the greatest of Praesi horrors had been forged of human sacrifice. Gods, they were fool enough to attack the dwarves for ritual fodder, I realized.

"We had no idea, did we?" Komena murmured. "What they could bring to bear in their fullness of their wrath."

Rumena stiffened, though not because of her words. It leaned forward, staring intently at the city, and I followed its gaze. It was gazing at some open-roofed temple. The structure was no great wonder, but its floor was glowing red and orange. No, not glowing. Melting. A massive creature with stone-like skin, horned and clawed, ripped free of the floor. Lava poured out in its wake, erupting like a fountain.

"I am told," Rumena said, sounding darkly amused, "they use the creatures to heat their forges. They are not even soldiers, Komena. They are exterminating our kind with smithing tools."

Red and orange bloomed over the city, smoke and screams filling the air, and I felt nauseated. Merciless Gods, was this the true face of dwarven warfare? No wonder the drow were still terrified of them after so many centuries. Still, interesting as this was it wasn't getting me anywhere. Even as the two began discussing how much of their army they'd lose in the evacuation, I stepped forward over the edge of the cliff and embraced the fall.

—

"Now this is more like it," I said.

The room was a barely-contained riot of scribbles. Every surface was covered with long equations in numerals I did not recognize and incantations in that near-Crepuscular I'd glimpsed in the first memory. There were piles of some strange string-like parchment scattered over what sparse stone furniture could be found, and Komena was going through one patiently.

"There," she said, handing it to her sister. "The full transcription."

Andronike took it absent-mindedly, a brush wet with red paint twirling between her fingers. On the wall in front of her scattered equations had red lines through them, others hasty corrections. The older sister finally glanced at the parchment she'd been given and frowned at what she found.

"It is as you said," Andronike sighed. "It cannot be sacrifices. It would only worsen the gap."

"It has to be the molten earth currents," Komena said. "When we campaigned against the forest humans, they used the very land against us without relying on their own sorcery. The underlying principles should be the same. If the nerezim can master—"

"We are not the nerezim, 'Mina," her sister replied, sounding irritated. "In theory you are correct but it would take decades if not centuries of deep study before we could even begin to imitate their mastery."

"We can't wait forever, 'Nike," the other drow reminded her. "If you're right, the tipping point was reached last year. The moment inertia ceases carrying us..."

"I know," Andronike sighed. "I know."

The second instance had been whispered and on the wings of it all semblance of vitality left the Sage. She looked afraid, tired, and so terribly young. I could sympathize.

"They're still settling our former colonies," Komena said quietly. "But it won't be long before they start advancing again. They're refused the latest peace offerings."

"We have greater worries than that," Andronike murmured.

Her sister's eyes narrowed.

"You said we should still have five years, before we start dying," she said.

"And that has not changed," the older sister replied. "But the Sages are terrified, 'Mina. They know the consequences of so many lost lives, and they have found no remedy in our lore."

"Then there is none to be found anywhere," Komena said. "Who else is there?"

Her sister looked away.

"'Nike," Komena repeated slowly. "Who else is there?"

"They have," the other drow said quietly, "sought the advice of the King in Keter."

"Shrouded Gods," Komena snarled. "Have they gone mad? That thing destroyed an entire human realm."

"And survived," Andronike said. "Conclusion was reached that our kind as a whole can no longer be preserved. Yet the eldest of the Sages believe that is no reason for them in particular to perish."

"How many times can a single band of fools damn an entire race?" her sister cursed. "They have to die, heart of my heart. I know you hesitate but we can no longer mass support in the dark. We must strike before they do."

"If we kill them before we have our remedy, we have slain the Firstborn through them," Andronike said.

"Gods take them all," Komena said, passing a hand through her long hair. "As if they hadn't done enough damage already."

Her sister paused. After a long moment, she put the parchment back onto the stone table and refreshed her brush with red paint from a pot. Striding forward under Komena's bemused gaze, she slashed through another few equations and then from that drew lines leading towards a rare empty spot on the wall. On it she wrote a single word in ancient Crepuscular, and this one I knew well: Night.

"We had never considered it before then," Andronike said. "Neither of us were all that pious, and the Shrouded Gods have even been a capricious lot."

I didn't freeze this time. I'd expected her to show up from the moment I'd realized this particular memory would actually be of use to me. She seemed fond, I noted, of standing at my side. As if we were companions, the two of us watching some play unfold together.

"You needed a miracle," I said. "And the hour had grown too late to quibble as to the source of it."

Sve Noc blinked in surprise.

"An apt summation," she conceded. "We did not grasp the full consequences of the bargain, then. We still believed it was a cure we would wrangle."

"But what you got was a stay of execution," I said. "The Night keeps them alive only so long as you keep feeding it fresh sacrifices."

"As a young girl the notion would have disgusted me," Andronike said. "But we'd both lived through the wars by then. Still, it amuses me in retrospective that it was her who balked at the terms when they were given. She cared for our kind in a way I never truly understood."

"Why tell me this?" I frowned.

She'd not exactly been forthcoming with details so far.

"You do not understand the scale on which we operate, Catherine Foundling," Sve Noc chided me. "How intentions fade in the face of eternity. The unmaking is in the details, you see. Allow me an example. I was of the Sages, and so unlike other drow allowed to learn of their history. They were once a great boon to my kind."

"The same crowd who doomed you once and then tried to have another go at it," I skeptically replied.

"They were necromancers, at their inception," Andronike faintly smiled. "Not for conquest, but for peace and learning. They called on the wisdom of our ancestors, allowing the spirits to speak through them. Death, in their eyes, was the only sin – for it robbed the living of the wisdom of those departed."

I'd seen the later meaning of those words with my own eyes and it had little to do with that gentle sentiment. Justifications only matter to the just, I mockingly thought. Sometimes you looked back and wondered what kind of madness had moved your lips.

"You wonder why I burden you with such tedious history, no doubt," Sve Noc said. "I lead to a question – you held great power for years, Catherine. What did you build with it?"

Silver eyes studied me.

"What shape will your creations take, after your passing?" she said.

My lips thinned. Legacy. She was speaking of legacy. And what would mine be? Some things transient, other less so. I had changed the face of rule in Callow, left the old nobility to lie in the grave Black had dug for it, but there was no guarantee it would remain there in the decades to come. Tradition had a stubborn pull on my people. The Army of Callow had learned the Wasteland ways of war, but that was Juniper's work more than mine and without a War College of our own to keep the torch lit the reforms would die with our generation. I'd fought wars, and liked to think most had been worthy of being fought. But that was to preserve, was it not? It was standing still, not advancing. I'd tried to bind more than humans to the Kingdom of Callow, more than born Callowans as well, but the numbers were few. A single goblin tribe, a few legions' worth of foreign soldiers and officers. Not enough, I suspected, to truly change the threads the Callowan tapestry was woven from. Unpleasant as the thought was, perhaps the most consequential change I had brought to my home was receiving the oaths of the Wild Hunt. And that will die with me. Andronike, I thought, had been inviting me to ponder how what I'd created would twist and turn with time.

Instead I'd found I had created little and less.

But there was one thing, I thought, that I would count as legacy if I could – though it was so very far from done. One dream I was trying to bring into the world.

"I imagine the Accords will grow warped, in time," I said. "And yet I have faith that even in their worst incarnation they will be better than the current face of Calernia."

"Faith," half of Sve Noc said, "is ever a costly affair."

"Is that how you live with this?" I asked. "You tell yourself you were had, you were beaten, and that's all there is to it?"

"You should choose your words more carefully," Andronike coldly said.

Ah, was that emotion peeking through? Finally we were getting somewhere.

"You seem under the impression I'm afraid of you," I said. "Best discard that, it'll make this easier on both of us."

"Do you believe your little shade will save you?" Sve Noc said. "It has hidden well, but not flawlessly. Whatever her scheme it will end, and there will be no salvation through her bloody hands. Not half as clever as she thought herself to be, in the end."

"Now, there's a lot of harsh stuff to say about Akua Sahelian," I said. "Believe me, I've covered a lot of that ground and I'm still discovering fresh pastures. But I'll say one thing for her: even at her very worst, at least she wasn't a spineless sack of whining like you."

This, I reflected, was not my finest attempt at diplomacy. Well, too late to take it back so I might as well roll with it.

"Are you truly so arrogant as to believe I cannot destroy you here?" Andronike said.

"That's beyond my control," I shrugged. "You're pretty much a goddess at this point, you could snuff me out like a candle at any point and there's nothing I can do about it. But hey, not even an hour ago I lied down to die in the snow. As far as I'm concerned every moment from now on is an unexpected turnout, so if I'm about to be sent Below I might as well speak my mind first. You're getting on my nerves, y'see, because behind all the bluster you're a coward."

"Your opinion is less than dust," Sve Noc frigidly replied.

"So you got screwed by your deal with the Gods Below," I said. "Surprise, who could possibly have seen that coming except literally anyone who ever read a history book not written by the violently mad. Still, I'm in no position to cast stones for bad bargains, given my record, so there you get a pass. Where you don't is that over a thousand years have passed and the Everdark is still a murderous clusterfuck. If anything it's gotten worse with the years."

"It is as it must be to maintain the Night," Andronike said. "Every grim beat of it."

"And you're proud of that?" I said. "Of maintaining this? It's one thing to make a desperate mistake, but you've kept it going ever since."

"Until today," Sve Noc harshly replied. "Until you delivered yourself into our hands."

"Can you not learn?" I hissed. "The Gods Below helped you into this mess in the first place and you're still doing what they want."

She rocked back in surprise.

"How do you think this goes for you, Andronike?" I pressed. "They throw two bears into pit, you come out with your teeth red and it's all over? You do this, you give them the victory they want, and they own you all twice over. There's no slipping a noose you tightened yourself."

"The debt-" she began.

"- isn't even the point," I interrupted heatedly. "You think Winter is going to make things better? Its fae were almost as bad as devils, Andronike. Devils. Let that sink in for a moment. They'll still have their hand up your ass, only this time it's permanent instead of a ritual and you will never, ever be rid of it."

"And being made into your pets is better?" she snarled. "An army of slaves to die for your cause, then sent away in some remote corner to rot when the usefulness has passed."

"You're right," I said.

For the second time tonight, I took her by surprise.

"You're absolutely right," I admitted. "If I still bore my mantle I might be ranting about how it's the lesser evil and at least with a leash on you'd be doing some good, but that's honestly disgusting. So is what you made of your people, but it doesn't excuse what I planned to do in the slightest. I was wrong, and it might mean dust to you but I apologize. I treated you like rabid animals in need of shackles instead of a people brutalized by circumstance and I can only be ashamed of it."

"You are mad," Andronike said.

There was an undertone of awe to the statement.

"I am angry," I correcting, baring a grin that was all teeth and defiance. "Truth is, Andronike, I've been angry all my life. At the Praesi for owning my people, at my people for being owned. At my father, for being so much less than he could be. At my friends, for even needing someone like me. At myself for the trail of smoking ruins I've left in my wake. At my enemies, for just refusing to listen. I've been angry for so long that without the anger there'd be nothing left of me. It's who I am."

I bitterly laughed.

"And most of all, I'm angry I never left the fucking Pit," I told her. "Because you and I, we're not saviours or monsters or anything half as grand – we're the entertainment, Sve Noc. We take out our pain on each other and their tally moves with the groaning weight of the dead."

"There is nothing else," Andronike said.

"There is," I quietly replied. "We don't claw at each other like animals. We help each other out of the pit instead."

Eyes met, silver to brown.

"They can't play shatranj if the pieces don't listen," I told her. "So I could say I want to make a deal, but that's the wrong way isn't it? This isn't a competition, it's not about winning. There doesn't need to be a loser."

I offered her a hand.

"You have my help, if you want it," I said. "And there are hardly words for how very badly I need yours."

Slowly, her arm rose. Then she struck like snake and seized me by the throat.

Damnit Akua, I thought, you broke the power of friendship.

---

*DroughtBringer*

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

*erraticerrata*

First update of the month, so extra chapter in the corresponding tab! This one is titled "Peregrine I", from the POV of the young Grey Pilgrim. Character contest continues, with the extra chapter adding a third matchup to the round: Ranger vs Adjutant, Robber vs Pilgrim, Thief vs Juniper. Links to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/16966329?fbclid=IwAR3x27dSnq3zTclLXDAhcVc44\_Kh-0RWD82h30vZAbl7a7tKJ9N-PJHVBis

<https://www.strawpoll.me/16966326?fbclid=IwAR0FM3Bg0PsFnCws04wH73fLJcByEcp0VTeebyGlS7YMr16dQDe-b6uvoWM>

<https://www.strawpoll.me/16966323?fbclid=IwAR0Z37BdZRqwXVeC2lZ9EdYqZf0PcufYI-Tfe-BN-YkgoxmXA86ky4SEoYQ>

taborask

Where's all the love for Tariq? I feel like this is going to end up as the meme showdown between Hierarch and Robber

RanVor

It will not. The Hierarch has already left the contest.

C_B

Hah, that's what you think! That was just the first part of his plan!

Jonnnnz

Tariq is at best a hypocrite. He lets people call Cat a butcher for dropping a lake on people in combat where he lasers down the opposition, and then creates a plague that kills over fifteen thousand outside of combat. He is sad about it, but that doesn't change what he does. He is critical when others do bad things, unless they're on the side of Above. He literally refused a deal that gave him everything he asked for because he wants Evil to lose, not just to win. He is Tyrant, only dishonest with himself in a boring way

HannaB

Tariq didn't refuse Cat's deal out of principle, he was supporting Cordelia.

Nairne .01

Which makes it even worse because that would have led to occupation or straight up annexation of Callow (which I suppose he would see as a good thing all things considered because Callow would still be a part of "Good").

HannaB

Callow is one country. Tariq was talking about peace for literally the entire rest of the continent. Yes, sacrificing Callow for the rest of them is exactly the ugly thing that Catherine's mad at. But sacrificing Procer and Levant for Callow isn't exactly the better answer.

Tariq couldn't see a way he could have acted without breaking SOMETHING, so he stuck to what he saw as the least worst option. That happened to not be the one the protagonist was championing. Doesn't make him despicable.

RanVor

It's not that Callow is to be the Good's meat shield now, it's that Callow has always been the Good's meat shield and is to become the Good's meat shield again. That state of things has been taken for granted by the side of Good for a long time and suddenly everyone is super upset when it's no longer true. Nobody gives a shit about Callow beyond sacrificing it for their own safety, and that's what Catherine is mad at. Or at least that's how I always understood it.

Quin

It's not so much good, but circumstances. If you play by the hero book then tales have weight. Having a princess fighting food good to avenge her people against a terrible evil gives strength. Allying with those who work with evil weakens you.

Cat worked with Black and she is essentially his pupil. Story wise that villain side... Moral wise that's a group that was left to the wolves and doesn't want to be put on the chopping block again just when they gained some measure of freedom.

Story wise the kingdom will get better when the rightful heir retains the throne. All good princess needs is to marry a random noble. Reality wise it's chopped into pieces for her nobles to claim just under a new label for the corrupt occupation.

Story stands strong with placing Callow on the chopping block... This the story bound heroes will hack, slice, and kill... Because they are story bound. The current villains are the exceptions because they do not use stories and tales to guide their blades or dictate their actions.

They learn from their mistakes and strive to do better.
Something which we see most other groups fail to do...
As even seeing the trap before them and knowing how to escape... They can't help but follow the story and leap to their doom.

Jonnnnz

Except he is ignoring that Villains will continue cropping up, and that Callow left to the will of Above will continue being wartorn as Praes and Procer continually bleed them. His goal is a Hero in charge, and that matters more to him than the sea of corpses that would cause. He is sad about it, but ultimately doesn't care enough to not commit war crimes on par with the worst Warlock unleashed.

HannaB

I think the thing is, you're assuming everything Tariq does is a part of some big master plan.

But I think he reacts, not acts. He's kept on the backfoot by all the SHIT going around, and that's where the discrepancy in what he says and does at different points comes from, not hypocrisy.

MetruX

You should remember a very nice conversation between Cordelia and Cat. It wasn't too far ago, at Keter, when she remembered it for a simple reason: what is it truly worth if you feel bad but don't change your act? The Peregrin (and I refuse to call him by his "human" name) is not a person, not anymore. He gave his all to Above, so even if he does believe what he preaches, he will never follow it, because as you said he reacts. You know who is always reacting until the final act? Heroes. Controlled by Above. Who are murderous amoral fuckers that don't really care about life, comfort or good feelings, as long as people follow them. So, the true question here is: can you like a willing paw to heartless monsters? If your answer is yes, then feel free to like him. I unfortunately can't.

RanVor

Also, Tariq isn't talking about peace for the rest of the continent, just Procer, Levant and Ashur. Even the Good cities of the League are beyond his willingness to care.

Styn

Just glad Juniper is making it a close match, most of the jobber characters have made their way out of the contest.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes! Juniper deserves to do well. I found this the hardest of the votes so far. And ended up choosing Juniper.

James, Mostly Harmless

The brackets are at <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805> .

Morgenstern

The “Next” button below the next offers no link to the extra chapter as of this moment.. =/

Andrew Mitchell

Here it is: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/12/03/peregrine-i/>

Javvies

Harsh, but true.

Although, I don't think Akua really broke the power of friendship, Cat's just not quite there yet.

Morgenstern

My bet is that Komana listened. And SHE is the one that cared about the drow like Andronike never did... So my call is: Andronike is out to kill Cat, because she is simply arrogantly furious about the names Cat called her, because she would never admit the truth. And it's “surprisingly” *Komana* who will come to Cat's rescue and take her offer, even if it means getting rid of the her sister. Because her beloved sister has died long, long ago – and she realizes this, if only now. She simply needed a push, to be able to choose her people over her sister, because all the time she was seeking for a way to keep both. And this is the final straw telling her that this is not possible. She has to choose. And her choice will be her people.

Morgenstern

And Cat be damned should she go against what she just said and return to her slaver's ways. She'd suffer an eternity for that.

taovkool

Catherine Diplomacy strikes again!

And thus the power of friendship was broken.

RoflCat

It's not broken yet, Cath just need to remind herself she's more on the White Devil's school of 'Friendship'

i.e. beat them into a bloody pulp THEN you're best friends, best when giant, strangely non-lethal laser is involved. (rainbow color and exploding spaceship optional)

NZPIEFACE

OH I COMPLETELY FORGOT ABOUT THE FACT WE HAD EXTRA CHAPTERS ON THE FIRST RELEASE OF A MONTH.

FUCK YEAH.

Truthhut

Where is the extra chapter?

Andrew Mitchell

Here it is: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/12/03/peregrine-i/>

Antoninjohn

Well its not like Cat had a knife in the other hand which she will use to kill Nike and take the night from her corpse, or maybe Cat will skin Nike and wear her skin pretending to be her and then stab Sev

Dainpdf

Doesn't really help on the "make half of the Sve want her to win" side. It'd be going back into the Pit.

ClickPause

She most likely would have beaten Sve within her soul given the time and the Story, but that's not what she wants. That's what Below wants.

Pipiemman

Father?

Daemion

The Black Knight.

Bravo

Black.

NerfGlastigUaine

Yup, a loaded word/term if there ever was one

Letouriste

Seen her casually say THAT word is a amazing:o

HannaB

Especially in context of how fucking pissed she is at him ♥

spk

First

NZPIEFACE

Wait. She's the fucking Hulk.

NZPIEFACE

I just realized something. Hakram will be able to immediately tell when Cat ever truly dies.

SpeckofStardust

I'm just going to place the bet that she's killing Cat in order to move themselves elsewhere so that the conversation wont get interrupted.

Xvyz

It would be too anticlimactic otherwise.

Xinci

Well then several excellent things to note this chapter. I was wondering and still am, ways to break the dwarves. The power of the dwarves bathes in earth and fire, so kill their beast, kill their fires and devour their knowledge of movements of the earth if you have Night. That would be the thing to do, to reverse inertia/to get a greater role out of the fight with the dwarves. Turn their knowledge against them with a adaptable force to get new power and new sacrifice. Relying on the beating heart of the earth and its cycles for power does provide a excellent story for self-destructive revenge too(in the area of blowing up the moon, and becoming it).

I do wonder what they burn for most of their fire(what is fed to their beast, how do those beast go about their life cycles, etc. What makes them strong enough to survive?). At least if one wanted to outdo their doom somewhat and achieve a better purpose. They might have trees and maybe some sulfuric stormy seas down in the depth maybe. Or stolen a spirit of the land and bound it to the deeps.

Coordination to set up greater things definitely seems one of the best results of Below's environmental engineering, at least if one wants greatness out of it. After all that infighting, adaptation, and suffering using all that accrued experience to then coordinate with other subjects gets new, possibly positive results. Indeed working together to get out of their control/box if only temporarily is a great thing to attempt. Only way to get out is to create something new with the weight of all that pain and suffering...together.

Andronike seems to have made one of the saddest and most important mistakes one can make as a villain. Giving up on change, the Gods below so far have shown a fairly good propensity to setting up the environment with opportunities to change ones own society from within and without. The moment one stops, the moment one calcifies, is the moment they must be switched to other targets, generally with bad times for the Villain being moved.

Good also for Cat to realize how little of what she had done has effected the wheel as of yet.

Dainpdf

Below wants people in the ring, fighting and fighting but achieving very little besides helping prepare Below's Gu.

mavant

Gu?

Yavandir

Chinese bug shit you throw everything poisonous into the jar and the last thing standing supposedly eats everything else and is the most poisonous shit

RanVor

Praes in a nutshell.

Dainpdf

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gu\_%28poison%29

Guess I shouldn't make vague references without citation.

NerfGlastigUaine

Everyone talking about the drow and Gods Below and Cat and whatever, meanwhile I'm just loving that dwarves have domesticated lava lizards. Multipurpose lava lizards. Oh those wacky dwarves, what will they come up with next.

Also damn, the Dead King terrified the drow before the drow as we know them existed. He really is the only human or former human to make it into the big leagues

Dainpdf

This side of the sea, at least. And maybe besides the Bard.

Javvies

I'm not sure Bard truly qualifies as human.

ClickPause

I picture her as that one immortal chick in Gunnerkrigg Court. Just kinda there, with possibly hidden motives.

Andrew Mitchell

Jones?

Insanenoodlyguy

Eh, she's the antithesis of Jones. One is stoic, unchanging, true immortal, who intentionally does not pass on knowledge and changes as little as possible, and having been born into her apotheosis and left her with blunted emotions, and just a little incest.

<https://www.gunnerkrigg.com/?p=1117>

The other is a resurrector/body snatcher who's problem is she feels EVERYTHING, who is one of the big game-piece movers. It occurs to me though, through your comparison, that Bard's "die and resurrect" immortality is probably intentionally there to prevent her Apotheosis. She can make so many changes because unlike other immortals she's always changing.

Dainpdf

Close enough Neshamah can't find the seams.

Aston W

5th rate god on a tiny 12 rate island. That's the Dead King.

This ain't the worldwide yet..

WuseMajor

He hasn't made it out of the pit yet, but he has claimed the status of boss monster/epic class piece that you only pull out of the box rarely. Which is something.

Dainpdf

More of Cat realizing just how much Winter screwed her mind. And more her realizing how rigged this game is.

I find it nice to recall how she hesitated to bring in the Night back when she first encountered Drow, which shows she at least wasn't **that** far gone yet.

luminiousblu

It seems contrived to me, like EE decided Cat was too far gone for his liking and needed an easy way to bring her back. Cat was sliding down the scale of the lesser evil long, long before she became a fae so now this weird about-turn just comes off as forced and completely, utterly unnatural.

Hell, Catherine has always since the beginning thought of herself as a tool to reach a better ending – not in the way Black did, no, but slightly further, because Black didn't truly view himself as disposable – he wasn't a martyr – but Catherine was willing to die for the things she wanted. That she balked at becoming a fae instead of a human seems really off, especially since the most tangible difference – that she had no real sense of taste – can be shrugged off by giving herself the illusion of taste. She can make wings grow out of her back and disappear, I'm not convinced she can't grow herself some human taste buds.

Aston Whiteman

EE Reset for Cat.

HannaB

"Black didn't truly view himself as disposable – he wasn't a martyr"

I'm sorry, are we talking about the same guy?

""Do not try to become me," he said. "I was a tool that served a purpose, and that purpose is coming to an end. This Empire will outgrow me and so will you. To linger beyond that would be to become a crutch, and do disservice to us all.""

(Book 3, Chapter 55 "Reunion", and that's just the literally out loud contradicting quote in his own words)

luminiousblu

Black has a huge spergout about how martyrdom is stupid in the very same book, because the thing that distinguishes martyrdom is to die for something bigger than yourself. Black isn't ready to do that, ever, if he dies he dies on his own terms, for himself.

HannaB

He just counts "for Praes" as "for himself", mysteriously.

Black is just a huge hypocrite is what I'm getting at.

Dainpdf

Black didn't see himself as disposable? He had a Thanatos Gambit all set up before Cat denied it! He isn't a martyr, but not because he values his own life that much. He just also doesn't see dying for the cause as particularly noble or deserving of praise.

As for Cat slowly sliding, she has been under fae influence for a very long time. And it is hard to contend that she burned a lot more principles in this meantime than before; also, she doesn't have the excuse of not fully grasping the consequences (as with releasing William) anymore.

Personally, I don't think it was particularly contrived – especially with all the setup regarding Cat struggling with both morality and fighting style.

As for emulating senses... I'd hazard a guess that either Winter refuses to do it, or does it in such a way that ruins it?

luminiousblu

>Black didn't see himself as disposable? He had a Thanatos Gambit all set up before Cat denied it!

A Thanatos gambit isn't viewing yourself as disposable, it's knowing that despite your best efforts you might end up dying anyway so you may as well find a way to win beyond it. The man wasn't literally planning to die, he knew (or believed) that he was going to die soon after he fought the White Knight, so he wanted to get what he could out of it.

>As for Cat slowly sliding, she has been under fae influence for a very long time. And it is hard to contend that she burned a lot more principles in this meantime than before; also, she doesn't have the excuse of not fully grasping the consequences (as with releasing William) anymore. In my eyes, Cat has only been "slowly sliding" to any extent worth mentioning after she took the throne, not during her time as Duchess of Moonless Nights. While this also coincides her ascension as the Sovereign of Moonless Nights, it is at the same time also the time during which she's explicitly managed to shove off most of the principle alienation, has managed to hold back her wroth at Callow getting Callowed about six or seven times, and come up with her precious Liesse Accords. To me, the sliding comes from the fact that she was a sovereign and thus had to do things that sovereigns need to do.

>Personally, I don't think it was particularly contrived – especially with all the setup regarding Cat struggling with both morality and fighting style. The fighting style problem itself was contrived. Cat is shit at using Winter not because she uses too much power but because she doesn't actually know how to use it – Akua all the way back in Kaleidoscope used Winter more effectively than Cat does all the way up to the quadruple abyss gate trick she pulled against the Longstriders, because Akua has imagination and doesn't try to use Winter like it's just a way to augment Catherine's lacking sword skills. She constantly grasps for power but once she gets it she, like always, is terrified to use it for any reason, and that's what frustrates me the most about her. It's not the mark of a prudent ruler, it's the mark of an ineffectual one to hoard power and yet not use it. The only reason she didn't collapse is that she has had the very good fortune to be propped up from all sides by those far more competent and far more comfortable with using their abilities, even during combat. That, to me, has always been her biggest problem – that she has power but she doesn't want to use it even when she should, and that while she chases power she has a tendency to not want to get it the normal way. Black says he's teaching Catherine to kill, but swords of swordsmanship existed for a reason and in the age of killing each other with blades it wasn't for show.

The morality was honestly even worse and it sounds to me hilarious that we went from Justifications Matter Only to the Just all the way back at the beginning of Book 1 to all of this baaaawing about basically nothing. While back then it was quite honestly probably her being an edgy teenager, she's now acting like an innocent kid who's been tossed fresh into the halls of how human power works and is shocked at how disgusting it is, instead of acting like the woman who clawed her way up and has poisoned people to their face without blinking an eye.

>I'd hazard a guess that either Winter refuses to do it, or does it in such a way that ruins it?

I'll wait for a canonical explanation for that but that sounds very, very odd to me. Catherine is the ONLY titled Winter Fae in existence save for those who are her explicit vassals, which sounds a lot to me like a Sovereign of Winter. She might still technically be a Duchess, but an independent duchess in a land with no other titles may as well be Empress. I'm inclined to believe that Catherine, with her trademark lack of imagination, simply hasn't thought of it – she didn't even realize she could grow wings or turn into mist until recently which is ludicrous to me, I mean when someone tells you your body is an illusion and you can do anything you want to it, proven by how you just grow a new arm if your old one gets lopped off, how is achieving flight not the first thing you try to do?

Obviously I understand why EE isn't doing it, the story disappears and that's probably why he's also getting rid of Winter as far as I can tell – if you don't, Catherine quickly becomes a deity and it seems he's not comfortable writing such a story (or is just throwing a curveball). It still doesn't, however, actually justify Catherine's illogical development.

Dainpdf

You may wish to re-read the Thanatos Gambit page. You seem to be mistaking it for a Xanatos Gambit where death is one of the outcomes.

Cat **thought** she had thrown off alienation. She still opened herself to a lot of things she would not have, otherwise, including but not limited to attempting to be a plotter and letting Akua live. That she held on this well is testament to the solidity of the patterns her double was pantomiming.

The issue with Cat vs Akua in using Winter is that even Fakerine retained enough narrative awareness to know Winter was a trap. As recently mentioned, Akua rides suhh stories, while Cat uses them. Winter is only a manifestation of that. Remember that Black himself noted that his lack of power may have been more blessing than curse. People who come to rely on raw power always have it fail them in the end.

You say Cat has gone back, but she hasn't. She's just shedding poisonous thought. She's peeling back the blinders Winter and Below have put on her for so long. She already had some that clarity in her, from the beginning.

As for the wings and such, and lack of creativity... Yeah, that's how fae work. Not really capable of creativity. Way back, Cat had the ability for creative power use – exploding goats, for one, or her ability to trick a fae into playing the villain. Winter took that from her, in great measure. And it started from meeting the Winter King – you may recall she felt hatred for the moon as soon as she saw it back on Creation.

Aston W

Cat is actually Assassin with a memory wipe. All theories valid. EE makes the rule.

Flobert

Just caught up. Amazing chapter as usual.

IDKWhoitis

Well, Im a bit confused as to what happened at the end, but at least things are progressing? Like Cat has her foot in the door, and she's done more with less, so it's looking up hill.

I seriously wonder what Archer has been upto while Winter hit the fan.

Andrew Mitchell

I think Cat moved too quickly with the conversation and tried to close the deal before Andronike was ready. She's going to suffer a bit more before Andronike agrees to work with her.

IDKWhoitis

Or the Sister pretended to be the Nice one to lure Cat in. It's another of the theories I'm running with right now.

Letouriste

Same for me:)

pagesbe

I'm not sure I agree, because she doesn't need to. The sister's have all the advantages, the only question is when, not if, they'll come out on top. Cat can avoid them temporarily, but she can't fight back. They don't need deception.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, good point. I hadn't thought of that.

Skaddix

Plus Nike probably wants something more than a handshake deal.

Jonnnnz

Ivah said, at the very start of the arc, that shaking hands is a strange custom. Perhaps it's Drow for something else?

Antony444

I would argue the Twilight Sages deserved to die ten times over for what they did...God, they raided the dwarves because they wanted sacrifices for their altars? How stupid were they? by comparison, most of the Dread Emperors and Dread Empresses are geniuses...

First rule of warfare in Calernia: don't declare war to the dwarves. Never.

Catherine is really back, and it's good to see her be 'diplomatic' and try to change the rules...pity it didn't seem to work in the end.

And it looks like Triumphant was far from the first to ask for 'help' of the Dead King...

Andrew Mitchell

> First rule of warfare in Calernia: don't declare war to the dwarves. Never.

To be fair, this may not have been a rule yet. Maybe the Drow experience was pivotal in establishing the rule?

magesbe

Am I the only one who doesn't think that this means a complete breakdown in negotiations? I'm half expecting something like Akua's sudden but inevitable betrayal where this isn't actually a bad thing.

Andrew Mitchell

I agree, this can't really be the end. I'm not sure what's going to happen though.

werafdsaew

Andronike said that negotiations are for when "one is staring defeat in the eye." So I'm expecting Cat to negotiate successfully on the verge of winning. It's very story-esque, and neatly combines the methods of both Above and Below.

Cold Cyberia

The whole “I’m finally human and thinking straight” feels... off? Beyond her full fae mode, there wasn’t ever a point where I thought Cat wasn’t herself or was influenced into being more Evil. All of her actions were fairly reasonable and all of the Evil decisions (Dead King, Everdark) were made out of desperation.

One of the biggest complaints about when she broke her soul barrier was that there wasn’t a noticeable change in her behavior. She did it, and remained largely the same. Cat’s making this point of how she can finally think clearly and how her past self was just a construct wearing her face but it falls flat because all that’s different is that she’s mouthing off more now. There’s no real difference that I can see, that can’t be explained by her loosing to Sve and not giving a fuck anymore. And that... well, it’s a problem.

It’s tricky because Winter is supposed to be a slow and insidious killer. There’s not supposed to be a break off point – Catherine is meant to slowly change into a cold and merciless creature. We didn’t get to that point however, so when Cat makes her point it doesn’t feel substantiated by the text.

Maybe I’m just not reading closely enough but I think making a clearer distinction in her thought process between would make that point more believable. EE, If you’ll do an edit after the series is over I would advise for having Cat muse about how she’s falling into particular thought patterns in some of the older chapters.

HannaB

The difference is not in how her POV is framed, it’s in how she’s looking back on her decisions. She’d been worried the entire time she had Winter that she was losing her grasp of her moral principles because the core thing that drove them was anger, not pragmatism, and she was finding herself left with just that.

Pragmatism accepts the easiest solution it can find. Anger sees new problems to solve. As Catherine expanded her scope of influence – from just Callow to all of Calernia – she would normally have found new things to be angry at, but instead she stuck to just ‘my country, my people, my duty’ because Winter numbed her to everything she wasn’t /already/ passionate about.

Catherine is rediscovering her ability to rage at injustice, and that’s what makes her look back on herself in horror.

Truthfully, the way Catherine was handling the Wild Hunt, or her last round of negotiations with Cordelia, were already creeping me out. She didn't seem to /care/ the way she used to, not about those she hadn't already declared to be under her protection, and... yeah. That's how Winter rigidity works.

This Catherine is 100000% more awesome than the construct one, and boy is she glad to be back! And pissed. Very, very pissed.

Cold Cyberia

Cat's always been very Callowan in her outlook and part of that is putting her nation first. As the battleground of the continent, Callow holds a lot of resentment towards other nations and it's especially true of Procer which occupied it for a decent chunk of time after the Third Crusade. The fact she cares about her country first and foremost is completely natural and in-line with her characterization prior to Arcadia arc, it's just more visible now that she's the queen and has to compete on the international stage.

Negotiating with Cordelia is actually a perfect example of how Cat still had a strong moral fiber even when she was a Sovereign. She proposed to abdicate under very lenient terms. She warned Procer about the Dead King's involvement despite the fact they were invading her. Hell, going to Keter was partially so she could limit the number of casualties he would inflict on them.

I don't see how any of it points to Winter corrupting her when by and large, she's been acting like the old Cat.

HannaB

I've been rereading, and the difference is visible. Cat had been holding onto her morals and principles as she remembers them, but she'd lost a lot of her fire 😡

luminiousblu

We call that growing up the fuck up and learning to do what you can instead of constantly seething at what you can't, in the real world.

If I were angry about everything that would actually make me angry my heart would explode and I'd die having accomplished shit-all. That's exactly what happened to Catherine multiple times had she not been saved by entities and organisations far more powerful than she was.

Insanenoodlyguy

It can be. or it can be alilenation from a creeping eldritch power that consumes all before it into a cold void.

Turns out it's that second one. Cat might well have matured into a similar mindset. We don't know because she became a static creature. Only now when the vine will eventually rot or be severed can it grow and bear fruit.

Quite possibly a cat

Winter Cat was basically running head long into Classic Evil Villain territory. I mean, enslave a race? Hijack a vast forbidden power. Hell even handing out titles was bizarre. If she's willing to title people, she doesn't need the Drow desperately.

And it none of the steps seem that bad since it is all bit by bit. Winter is insidious.

But when Cat got a look without Winter all she sees is herself breaking every rule she learned from Black.

HannaB

"If you can see a hero rising to avenge what you just decided to do, stop and reassess"

luminiousblu

"Enslave a race?"

A race quickly going extinct anyway. I don't know how the oaths were actually worded, but it's easy enough to basically make them mercenaries (selling service in exchange for greater power). "Bend the knee or die" is not exclusive to villains, or rather it's exclusive only insofar that heroes are wont to say "just die, whether or not you bend the knee".

"Hijack a vast forbidden power"

Was she actually trying to hijack Night? I don't think she was. She just needed to get rid of Sve Noc, and in the process she'd gain a temporary ally in the Dwarves. The only real problem is she overestimated herself, and Catherine's been doing that long before Winter was a thing.

"If she's willing to title people, she doesn't need the Drow desperately."

Yeah I wasn't sure how that happened since just half a book ago we were talking about how titles weren't happening. Here's the thing though, I'm extremely unconvinced that Winter has magical influence over your brain like that. It's literally just Catherine. We've seen what happens when Winter takes hold, and it doesn't look like what she's doing. If I were her I'd do the exact same thing, hell this entire "make an oath to go and grant free reign to a group of dangerous lunatics to help you in a war you're losing in exchange for salvation (?)” thing is what Aragorn pulled with the ghosts in Return of the King and I don’t think anyone is going to argue that he’s Evil.

Javvies

Hang on, there. Aragorn didn’t make the oath – he was the heir of the one the oath was sworn to. The Kingdom of the Dead became that way because they broke the oath they swore to Aragorn’s ancestor (or possibly ancestor’s cousin, depending on the exact genealogy and exactly when the oath was sworn, can’t remember offhand and away from my LotR books). Aragorn gave them a deal to fight in one battle and be released from the oath, being considered to have fulfilled it. And, in the books, that battle wasn’t even the one outside Gondor – it was the one at the mouth of the river – and a couple days before Aragorn got to the Fields of Pelennor outside Gondor; and IIRC, it happens almost entirely offscreen in the books. By rights, Aragorn could, and arguably should, have required the Dead to help him break the Siege of Gondor at Gondor, and even go with on the march to the Black Gate.

luminiousblu

You’re right of course, but my point remains unchanged. Aragorn basically pulled the same trick – an entire group of people with no way out due to old, old mistakes they can no longer undo, and a stranger comes along promising them release in exchange for limited service. I mean alright, sixty years is different from a single battle, but the idea is the same and Aragorn is presented as heroic (and not a little clever) for trying to get them on his side. Catherine doing so might not be HEROIC because of how it happened but I wouldn’t say it’s the same as “enslaving an entire race”.

And anyway Julius Caesar did the same with Gaul and he was a good boy so who the hell cares, this is what war is.

Javvies

Oh, absolutely. Oath of service for a clearly defined term in exchange for personal benefits? That’s a far cry from Cat being some sort of slaver, even if the magical enforcement of the oaths is a nasty one, even if Cat is taking advantage of the situation to pressure some of the stronger drow in her path to sign on – that’s essentially a variation on a judge giving somebody the alternative to go into the military instead of what the regular options are. Better, really, since real life military service isn’t exactly a lucrative career. Ö

Heck, I'm not actually sure that long term oaths were even being required by Cat in order to go with her and be saved. Oh, sure, following the Lesser Oaths is still a good idea if a drow wanted to follow Cat but not make longer term commitments. They were ... a sort of currency traded for increased personal power.

RanVor

I might need to reread to confirm it, but I feel like Cat is being more moral right now than she has ever been since the first chapter. It's as if the pull dragging her towards evil disappeared and she was hurled to the other side.

luminiousblu

Which is horrible, because that's not how characters work unless you're trying to write someone who's had a mental breakdown and is hurtling well through schizophrenia. Well, if that's what EE's trying to do it's perfect, but I doubt it.

HannaB

aaawwwwwwwwwwwwwww

but at the part where Catherine casually said 'mad at my father for being less than he could be' I died I think

Nairne .01

This damn cliffhanger. I should have seen it, its not the first time this happens 😞

RanVor

You must be mad if you expect a chapter to end in anything but a cliffhanger.

Nairne .01

One can always dream, though now that I think about it, cliffhangers are currently the main tool for keeping up hype/interest (in any book).

SMHF

I'm gonna be honest, I'm a bit conflicted about the last two chapters...

It's not just the fact that Cat and Sve's confrontation has made the whole gathering an army part kinda pointless... because you could argue we got a lot of character developments and Drow lore through it and she did force her hand earlier this was than just sneaking her way to Tvarigu.

My problem is this whole "My Mantle made me do it" part... because it goes against a whole book of what I thought was character development.

Assassinating generals... dropping lakes on a bunch of enlisted farm boys... trying to make deal with The Dead King... binding an entire race to her will through oaths are all things the Book 1-3 Cat would've never done (Okay she probably would've minded the first one!), but I thought after the Liesse she's learned that sometimes you have to do something Evil to stop a bigger one from happening...

But now she's saying what she was doing to the Drow was disgusting... I mean forcing the last surviving members of a dying race to throw themselves at The Dead King is a shitty thing to do, I wasn't happy about it then and I'm not happy about it now, but it's stupid not to take precautions when you're bringing a race of people to the surface with more frequent and more literal backstabbing than the Praes nobility!

The entire Liesse Accords is something she came up with while she had her Mantle. Is she gonna realize that's not a good idea either?

Still, it's kinda early to judge since we have couple of chapters to go. So I'm looking forward to see how this wraps up! 😊

Jani Nyysönen

Not very happy with the recent developments myself either. Might be just my dislike of the "humans are special" outlook we've been seeing, and not really buying that the mantle was somehow making Cat a worse person. This "loose mantle, become human" feels too much like a Deus ex Machina to escape paying the price for the power Cat has been wielding (and pulling back the power levels story is working with to make the struggle easier to write).

Just remembering first Liesse campaign, let alone Cat's first encounter with William, makes it pretty clear that she was never all that nice when pushed, everything she has done so far (except maybe talking to Dead King) has been pretty in line with the character we followed from the start of the story. Even dropping the lake on her enemies was, to me, pretty measured response considering how far backwards she was bending to save the lives of enemy soldiers at the cost of her own.

Cat is fighting people willing to wipe their own villages with plague to win, she is not the heartless monster in this equation, and never has been.

SMHF

Yes. The scales had changed so Cat had to change with it... that's kinda the point of character development!

But now she's like... nope! That was all my Mantle!

Don't get me wrong the old crazy Cat is a blast to read (in moderation!) but if she's just gonna be factory resetted after an entire book... then what's the point?!

But like I said story's not over yet, so I'm really really hoping to be proven wrong on this!

Aotrs Commander

Of course, this assumes that Cat is, in fact *correct* and that she is not, in fact, using the separation from her mantle to (probably subconsciously) blame her actions on it, because (again, subconsciously) it didn't work and she doesn't have that power now and it trying – still – to justify herself *to* herself.

Reality probably lies somewhere between the two.

Albatross

I'm gonna be pretty upset if she can't follow through with the 'stealing and reselling landmarks' gambit too, that sounds v. fun

luminiousblu

I'm honestly tempted to say that she's just running from her actions and like she's wont to do blaming everything on an easy target. People say she self-flagellates a lot and she does, but in Book 1 and early in 2 or so she was actually really good at deflecting responsibility for her actions because she wanted to believe she was actually somehow the good guy instead of just owning up to being the bad guy. I mean even the fact that she thinks she can choose to be the bad guy itself is the hallmark of a bad guy – the entire thing that differentiates the good guy from the bad guy is the bad guy thinks in terms of himself.

PhadosZahn

This pretty much sums up my hesitation of the past few chapters. I've personally enjoyed watching Cat's development in this book because she's contending with world changing figures and the large stakes have changed how she looks and reacts to things. I don't even really have a problem with her handling of the Drow (I know that point's been argued back and forth at this point) but these recent chapters feel like EE is walking back on all of that. The fact that we're showcasing how different Mortal Cat is to The Black Queen is interesting and it COULD be a subtle alienation effect of her mantle but...i don't really buy it. All of the decisions she's made thus far feel like a Car that's dealing with continent shifting decisions and is trying to learn the best way to save her people the least amount of casualties. It's the ever slippery slope of moral greyness that she's always been on and I've loved it. I don't want it to be undone 🙄

Kirroth

The biggest difference I can see is that the Sovereign of Moonless Nights thought in terms of Power and Cat thinks in terms of Story.

Take a moment to really look back on it, now that the contrast has been highlighted. Everything the Sovereign did was about using power to force people to do what she wanted. Break the Procuran invaders enough that they retreat, but not so badly they won't negotiate after. Twist arms to get the Accords signed. Recruit muscle from the Dead King or the drow. Even at the very start, when she was going to agree with the Empress about keeping the doomsday weapon around. It was always about POWER and using it to get your way.

Now Cat's back and we can see what that really means. She's already thinking in terms of Story and Pivots again. She's trying to build alliances instead of bullying people into line with force. She takes one look around, sees a people treated unjustly and Gods meddling for their own benefit, and immediately rebels and tries to find a way out.

The hints have been there all along. They were practically shoved in our face by Warlock. The Sovereign wasn't Cat. She wanted to accomplish Cat's goals and valued what Cat cared about, but it wasn't her and didn't think like her.

Cassandra Riordan

I hope if we get to see the Liesse Accords then at least have Masego round up a bunch of sorcerers and write them into the fundamental laws of reality such that they can never be disobeyed. I want Cat to change things, rewrite the nature of reality and permanently end the war between Good and Evil. And killing off the Gods of Above and Below would be a nice side benefit.

Jani Nyyssönen

I don't really see a way for Cat to beat the Above & Below in a way that does not come off like an asspull, maybe there is, but i'm not really seeing it.

Same for forcing creation to have somekind of inbuilt geneva convention, neither side wants that, and any rule changes Masego can do, someone else can undo.

The way i see it, Cat can't win, can't kill the players, and can't rewrite the rules.

But, if she remains a god, she might become a player, or atleast enforce a no conflict zone in Callow that remains mostly untouched because touching it is too costly for both sides.

Here Cat realized that all the changes she made, are unlikely to outlive her, and she is right in that, partly due to weight of history, but mostly because she has 2 sets of gods enforcing the status quo of constant conflict, and both of those sides are evil (if for different reason and in different ways).

Only real way around this is to not die, and if the price of that is not being able to enjoy narcotics, well, sounds like a pretty small price to me, pick up painting or something to pass the time instead.

magesbe

If you think that the only that the only reason Cat wants to remain mortal is so she can enjoy weed... you really peaced out of this latest chapter. She states explicitly here that Winter had forced her into a different thought process, and she was so affected by Winter that until she was separated from it she didn't even notice there was a difference. Cat doesn't want to go back to being Winter, she feels that dying is better than going back to being only mostly a person.

Whether you feel like this is a compelling motivation is up to you, but don't trivialize it either by saying that clearly the only reason is so she can enjoy smoking better.

Jani Nyyssönen

Here's the thing, lot of us did not notice any change of the thought process either.

It feels like this comes out of nowhere, the only real change easily noticeable is the ability to enjoy taste and effects of weed.

Her morals did not get worse, she did not become any crueller, she was just as flexible when situation required/ allowed it.

The story failed to emphasize any loss of personhood for Cat sufficiently, yes, she was not as human, mainly because humans get killed when beheaded, but the alienation, beyond inability to enjoy stuff like weed and wine, was insufficiently remarked upon.

Hell, people have complained that Cat remained too human after becoming the Duchess of Moonless Nights, and i'd agree, so this sudden "yay, i get to be mortal, enjoy weed and die" is kinda jarring even if you dislike having the protagonist disempowered.

doominator10

I wonder what EE is thinking of when he/she/it reads these comments from people unsure of how Cat's been developing. However, I know the truth. Catherine was Dread Emperor Traitorous this entire time! That makes everything she's been going through all part of the plan. It all makes sense! I'm onto you EE.

Argentorum

Can't wait for so below. This is gonna be epic.

Fern

Has Cat lost her blessed mind? "Oh I fucked up once at playing this smart so I better go back to brawling with every motherfucker in a 8 mile radius" bitch did you forget the part where you nearly died fighting a basic bitch Mighty? One loss does not mean you're on the wrong track, it means you need to adapt your fighting style and information gathering apparatus. Local intel here was on point, you knew about every faction fighting in the city, their short and long term strategic goals, AND you knew your timetable down to the day!! The fact that the Longstrides and the Goddess Apparent came knocking a week early is a failure of intel, not of the method you're using here.

I might be a little mean criticizing her fighting style though. It's been said that the role of named on the battlefield is to fight in the pivot, usually against another named. When you take into account that each side here is deploying a ludicrous amount of named-level fighters, though, that objective becomes a lot harder to achieve. Add into this the fact that there was a huge disparity in Mighty between Losara and Rumena...

Well, it'll definitely be fun to watch how this plays out. This arc has been outstanding so far, so we'll see how As Below goes.

magesbe

I'm confused... it feels like this comment should have been written two or three chapters ago. It's not very relevant to the current situation.

Fern

““Subtle has never been my strength,” I admitted. “It was a bad habit even before Winter filled my veins with pure ‘walk off dismemberment’ juice. Not sure I can shake it at this point.”

Or even that I should, to be honest. I’d run into one dead end after another since I started trying to play queenly games with my opponents. It wasn’t that I was awful at those – with the Woe at my back, I’d made sport of my opposition within Callow – so much that my enemies were just outright better at them.”

She does follow this by saying she shouldn’t stop learning, so maybe i was a tad off base. Still. she can’t expect to win fights by walking into enemies and left clicking. That’s been drilled into our heads since book 1.

NotQuiteHere

I’m confused...what just happened? Why did friendship break? Akua? What?

Burdi

i think its just a joke, remember she like to speak to herself with sarcastic joke even when her life at stake

Follower of Mania

I just got caught up and wow... just wow.

A+ Catherine for stealing back the power of friendship line.

Burdi

at this point, we can’t predict what catherine plan actually is, she is just dancing with the story...maybe she somehow convince andronike and two head fight each other or she somehow eat komena’s memory and gain a bit of power or she pissed andronike so much that she blind (make her see wrong direction) then akua struck or she died and meet below..make some shit deal and go back to creation or they all became four face goddess (unlikely) or sve noc give cat a Name (maybe possible) or cat somehow find a way to instead sacrifice sve noc and all winter night to achieve different ending or she taunt komena and make her so furious then trick her somehow to struck at andronike then destroy her with her guilt.

or black died and she became the black knight then stuck hard with Destroy and became queen bitch of night forevermore. i think its still possible for her to became black knight, she lost Squire name because she became winter incarnate that change who she is..now she is back free of winter...and she is right now is a claimant one more, what is needed of her is to claim something, just like when she claim the Squire name or claim as heir to king of callow (first llesse) and right now she can't claim anything at all, not winter (because she already lost fight), not night (because it is not hers), not a Name (because what is to claim when she lost soo badly except a Losser)..her only possible claim i think is to became a Savior for sve noc and all the drow so they won't fuck themself twice..but she need to build story first, the ending is maybe she got winter night as passing torch (by tricking them of cource) or became something that unheard of

Nairne .01

The thing some other commenters said about the next chapter being named "As Below".

It may be a good prediction, she tried the good hand to make friends and was spurned/wronged even (that may be a stretch). So she will try the evil hand next, that may work, or her evil hand will be the grab from the flank, something extraordinarily evil in its roundabout way that just won't let her grasp the victory she wants, just "a victory".

Aston W

I really want Cat to die.

Semi-permanently.

Then EE can write the next level of her meeting Gods Above or Gods Below as she fucks up their game.

It's a drawn out 'Cat Wins again without making much difference' the last few chapters.

Use the power of story to win. Meta Time.

Aston W

Pretty sure Cat needs to pull the Good card. Heroes are mortal.

Redemption storyline. You can be insane but Good right?

Look at Saint...elderly creation cutting powers.

Just realized all our comments are food for Gods Above and Below.

We're trapped in the narrative.

pagesbe

Honestly, I have a lot of problems with how this arc is going, but since almost all of them are technically fixable depending on how the next few chapters go, I'm not going to say anything just yet. People can expect a pretty big rant post on the last chapter of the book if it's not cleaned up well though.

darkalter2000

The next button of this chapter skips Peregrine I, and Peregrine I is also not listed in the chapter list on the side. This makes it very likely that it could be overlooked by anyone who doesn't get email updates.

magetite

Sigh,

I know the mantle of winter wasn't perfect for her,

But ripping her down to mortality sucks ass

---

Chapter 80: So Below

"I speak today not for humble man-eating tapirs but instead for the most ambitious specimens their kind has ever known. Is it not the sacred duty of all Creation to seek to claim the Tower? How, then, could it have been a crime for these tapirs to follow this same dictate by devouring our late Emperor?"

– From official transcript from the Trial of Unexpected Teeth, opening speech of the defence

"What a silver tongue you have," Andronike said. "But not quite silver enough. Your ignorance shows once more, Catherine Foundling."

I tried to respond 'when does it not?', but I was currently being choked so it came out as more of a plaintive gurgle. So, this was how it ended: literally choking on my own words. Had to give her points for the irony, if nothing else.

"Allow me to educate you," Sve Noc said, and threw me like a bloody rag doll.

Well, I thought, there's a bright side to this. I'm currently not dead. Or at least not more than I was when this delightful interlude began. The slightly less bright side was that I was flying through flickering scenes, memories I could only glimpse the barest pieces of, and soon enough I would... Ah, there it is, I mused, managing to keep a semblance of mental calm as my leg snapped and my throat busied itself screaming. That utter asshole, I bet she'd aimed just so my bad leg would be the one getting the worst of the landing. I tumbled listlessly against the floor, my magical journey ending in the close acquaintance of my forehead and a stone wall. Still not dead, admittedly. I wouldn't be in such an excruciating amount of pain if I was. My forehead was going to bruise, if I still had a body by the end of it. I moaned and flopped around until I was looking upwards, feeling out my knee and finding it only mostly broken. Could I still move on that? Maybe. There'd be a lot of howling involved, but it shouldn't be impossible. I still stayed down for a while, lying uncomfortably on the floor.

In the distance people were dying.

"Educate me about that, would you?" I sighed. "Like I haven't strolled through a dozen butcher's yards."

Might as well find out what had her tossing me around, I eventually decided. At this point I'd taken my swing and missed, I might as well die slightly less ignorant than usual. My good leg supported me as I forced myself up using the wall, taking a proper look around at my surroundings. Yet another drow city I'd never seen before, though I had a decent guess as to where we were: I was standing among a city-sized temple carved out of massive stalactites. The streets here were not interrupted by 'canals' that were effectively sheer drops, and hobbling to the edge of one told me there was an actual city below. If this wasn't Holy Tvarigu, I'd eat my fingers... again? No, first time. I'd made other people – insofar as fae were people, anyway, – do it, but that hardly counted. I flinched at the vivid memory of it. Gods, I'd made people eat their hands. It'd seemed reasonable at the time, and damn me but I could still see the sense in it, but I couldn't remember even hesitating for a moment. Not that hesitation would have made it better, I silently conceded. Cordelia Hasenbach's passing comment had cut deeper than she knew.

What did regret matter, if it changed nothing?

The temple-city was strewn with corpses as far as I could see. Whatever battle had taken place here had ended, or at least near to it, and now this place was little more than a freshly-bloodied mausoleum. By Andronike's passing mercy or a stroke of luck, I'd landed near the heart of the temple. I could only be thankful for that, I thought, as I eyed the mind-bogglingly complex web of stairways and bridges connecting everything. Some ways in front of me a wide staircase progressively narrowed in rising to meet a passage lightly sloped. On both sides it was flanked by a very short wall of painted stone topped by striking sculptures. It was a chain, I thought, as I began the painful climb. At the head of the stairs two androgynous drow of marble painted red and yellow roared out with curved blades in hand. From their back sprouted more drow in different colours, wielding whips and daggers, and facing those drow in hooded robes offered a supplicant's kneel. The whirlwind of colours and faces and poses continued all the way to the end of the passage, where the heart of the temple-city awaited.

It took me far too long and far too many bouts of yelling to make it up the stairway, but the view when I did was almost worth it. Wouldn't keep me alive, but that was probably asking too much. The riot of vivid pigments should have turned it ugly, but there was something almost hypnotic about the sight before me. More ziggurat than pyramid, though that failed to truly catch the essence of it: it was almost a stairway of giant steps, but a triangular mouth going all the way to the summit struck out from the rest of the structure – which was roofed, at that narrowest point, by some sort of cylindrical tiled pavilion. At the four cardinal directions pale or red stone made up the life and death of celestial orbs: sun on the rise and fall, moon ascendant and passing. It was like looking at a hundred rainbows made into stone and woven into a single tapestry. There was hardly a trace of such wonder left in what I'd seen of the Everdark. The thought shook me out of the trance and I resumed my advance. Halfway through the passage I finally noticed I'd not been alone for some time: hidden among the statues were drow, armed and armoured. They'd been so utterly still I'd never noticed. I continued limping until I entered the heart-temple, and there I found what Andronike had meant for me to find.

Inside were burned made of what must have been all precious materials in existence, from ivory to a massive hollowed out emerald, and every single one of them was wafting thick trails of scented smoke. At the centre of the shivering columns the two sisters were kneeling in front of simple carved piece of obsidian. A star map, by the looks of it. Andronike finished unfurling a large scroll filled with equations and incantations I'd already seen before, then passed her fingers over to smooth it out.

"Ready?" Komena asked.

"How could anyone be?" her sister replied. "Yet here we are."

She breathed in loudly.

"We request audience," Andronike said.

"We request bargain," her sister said.

I hobbled forward with an expectant gaze, strangely eager to see the moment where they'd sold out their race with the best of intentions, but nothing happened at all. Stillness held the room.

"Damn me," Andronike said with quiet horror. "I have killed us all."

Her sister opened her mouth to answer, but was interrupted by an unholy ruckus. A dozen burners had been tipped over, by the sounds of it, and for a moment I thought it'd been me. But no – I turned, and there was someone in the middle of a set of spilled burners who'd quite evidently tripped on them. A drow, I saw. It rose hastily, pretending nothing had happened, and retched a little before slapping away the thick smoke.

"Gods," the drow retched again. "That stuff is foul."

Both sisters went still.

"O Shrouded God," Komena said hesitantly, but the newcomer's hand rose.

"Give me a moment, girls," it rasped out.

It patted at its dirty robes and produced a flash of polished copper. My heart skipped a beat. The Wandering Bard uncorked her flask and took a deep drink, before gargling it and spitting out the liquor. The sisters traded an appalled look. A little less godly than they'd been aiming for, I supposed. The Bard took another swallow of liquor, wiped her mouth and went looking through the tipped burner before triumphantly snatching out a broken lute. Apparently she'd mistakenly spat some liquor on it, because with a shoddy attempt at discretion she began wiping at the wood with her sleeve.

"Good enough," the Bard announced. "Right, so onto business."

"You are no deity," Komena flatly said.

"Well spotted," Bard cheerfully replied. "And to think they told me you were the stupid one. For the purposes of this conversation, you might consider me an envoy of sorts."

"You claim to speak for the Gods," Andronike frowned.

"Oh, I wouldn't go as far as that," she said. "I've never been quite that much of a fool. But you called and here I am."

"Are you a devil?" Komena pressed.

"Would it matter if I were?" the Bard shrugged. "Regardless, I hear the two of you are looking for a loan."

The sisters stirred, Andronike picking up the scroll she'd unfurled.

"A miracle is what we would bargain for," she said. "The specifics-"

"Are known to me," Bard replied, waving the words away and accidentally sloshing some booze onto the floor.

One of the burners caught fire, and everyone delicately pretended it was not actually happening.

"Even the parts you got ambitious with," she continued, lifting a finger off her flask to wag it chidingly. "Making it reusable? Now now, that's trying to inflate the value. Just because you shove old skills and power into new heads doesn't mean the following deaths are worth as much as the first."

"We sought only to offer the finest possible tribute," Komena baldly lied.

"I can't believe I'm rooting for you right now," I muttered.

Still, if the opposition was the Wandering Bard then 'All is Night' was most definitely the banner of the moment.

"More need than brains, huh," Bard drawled. "No wonder you're in good odour with the old crowd. Still, you two are a little late. They've been a lot more careful about where they put their money since Nessie ate the hand that fed him."

"We offered all we have," Andronike gravely said.

"Yeah, but you don't have enough," the old thing said. "I'll level with you two, since you seem slightly less awful than your average drow. This? This whole thing? It's not anybody's plan. No one thought you'd actually fuck up so badly you'd obliterate yourselves. The folks upstairs are watching like hawks, and the other side's wondering if it's worth it to intervene given the... costs of such direct action."

"We offer fair bargain," Komena insisted.

"Fair is for children," the Bard said. "They're not interested in it."

"Yet here you are," Andronike said, amber eyes narrowing.

"Killing the Sages and calling Below in the middle of their seat of power was a nice touch," she replied. "Got you the audience and a consideration. But the terms are going to need to change a bit."

"This is an exceedingly delicate arrangement," Komena said. "We can't simply-"

"You will," the Wandering Bard gently said. "Or you'll die, every last one of you."

"Speak your terms," Andronike replied.

It sounded like a surrender, because it was.

“‘Nike-” her younger sister began.

“We are in no position to negotiate,” the older drow tiredly said.

“Debt isn’t wiped,” the Bard spoke softly into the silence that followed. “The Night will keep you all alive, but you two will need to keep it going. And if you stop...”

The ancient entity grimaced.

“Well, they’re not above cutting their losses,” Bard said. “Let’s leave it at that.”

“Should we even bother to accept?” Komena harshly replied. “Or is even that formality unnecessary?”

“I wish you wouldn’t,” the Wandering Bard murmured. “There are some things worse than death, and what this will make of you is one.”

She drank once more, then offered a sharp grin.

“But we all know better, don’t we?” she said.

I’d known how it would end from the start. I’d seen what had become of the Everdark and the two sisters, after all. And still, watching the light dim in the eyes of the two true drow in the room, I felt my stomach drop. Was there a single horror in this continent’s history the Wandering Bard did not have a hand in? The thing was, I understood why they’d made this choice. It was uncomfortable to even think it, but if offered the same terms with my own people on the line I would very likely make the same choice. Passing a hand through my hair, I gingerly lowered myself down to the floor while leaning against a pillar. So which part of this had it been that Andronike wanted me to see? Even odds it was either the Bard’s very presence or that threatening little bit at the end. They’re not above cutting their losses, the Intercessor had said. Was a gentle way to speak of genocide. Was that what Andronike was afraid of? That the moment she and I made common cause, a snap of the fingers Below would destroy her entire race? But it shouldn’t work out like that, I thought with a frown. The Gods were, well, exactly that. All-powerful. They could probably end the Night and likely Winter itself. But there was a story unfolding, and if they did anything of the sort they’d be directly meddling.

They couldn’t do that without opening the door for Above to do the same, and the Heavens should be taking a brutal beating right about now. The Dead King was on the march, the last thing Below would want was Above getting a free swing at him.

"So it's the Bard you wanted me to see," I said, raising my voice.

"The Bard," Sve Noc repeated, walking out from behind the pillar. "What a quaint name. We knew her as the Envoy."

"Neshamah called her the Intercessor," I said. "And I suppose if anyone's got her number it's him."

"The King in Keter wears a crown of lies," the silver-eyed drow replied. "No creature born of this land has ever been half as skilled at the art."

She moved to lean against the pillar I was sitting back against, standing above in both the physical and metaphysical sense. Well, at least one of those was new.

"He's her enemy," I said. "Trusting him would be foolish, but he wants her to bleed. That much can be believed in."

"Trust is always foolish," Sve Noc smiled. "It is faith writ small, and almost as dangerous."

"So did you throw me here for a game of riddles?" I drily replied. "Because I can roll with it. The more you make, the more you leave behind. What-"

"Footsteps," the goddess said.

"I might not win this," I reluctantly conceded. "I only know, like, five riddles and that one was the best."

If we made this about bawdy jokes instead my years at the Rat's Nest would finally pay off, though. Worth a try.

"A riddle of my own, then," Sve Noc said. "Why share what can be taken in full?"

I frowned, twisting to look up at her.

"You're not Andronike," I said.

"I never said I was," Komana calmly replied.

"I've been over this with your sister," I said. "But what the Hells, maybe the second time's the charm. Just give me a moment to think of an insult to get you angry before this gets going."

"Your offer has been made known to me," Sve Noc contemptuously said. "There is no need to reiterate. I was partial to the notion of immediately crushing you underfoot, but request has been made that you be allowed to speak your piece first."

Well, wasn't that promising. I gazed ahead, honestly at a loss as to where to begin, and only now noticed the memory had stopped. Frozen. Maybe it really was only Komena's memories, I thought. She certainly seemed to have greater control of our surroundings than her sister had. My eyes lingered on the Wandering Bard, the flask halfway to her mouth as she opened her mouth.

"She can be beaten, you know," I said.

"You have not," Sve Noc said. "And yet would demand that we throw in our lot with you."

"I haven't, it's true, but there's a villain down south called the Tyrant," I said. "I have it from two rather reliable sources that he screwed with her plans in a major way last year. It can be done."

"I lacked fear, once," Komena said. "As you so foolishly do. I have since been taught better."

"I just heard a woman try to lie to what she knew to be envoy from the Gods," I said. "Brazenly so. She had a chance at getting her people out of this mess, I think."

I smiled thinly.

"Now though?" I said. "You won't even try. My opinion might be dross in your eyes, but I wonder what she'd think of you now."

"Petty sentimentality," she mused. "Is that truly the sum of what she brings, Andronike? This is what shook you?"

The other sister walked out from behind another pillar, this one in front of me. For terrifyingly ancient creatures, they did enjoy their petty theatrics.

"When have we last been called to account for our many sins, sister?" Andronike said. "There is worth in such a thing, even coming from her."

"That last part was unnecessary," I noted. "I mean, not wrong, but definitely unnecessary."

"If you felt the need for a pet there are better choices," Komena said, eyeing me darkly. "This one has been beaten too harshly to still be amusing."

"I'm not even going to grace that with a response," I indignantly said.

"A goddess has no interlocutors," her sister said. "Only supplicants."

"Judgement only has meaning coming from one worthy of casting it," Komena said. "This one hardly qualifies."

"I'm not going to claim I'm a saint," I said. "And I've definitely crossed some lines, but-"

"Is this where you claim influence by your mantle once more?" the younger sister asked. "You could, at least, attempt a believable lie. 'Nike, she's not even held her half of the Garden for a decade. The drift would be negligible. It was still her. The only difference was that she had power enough to cow her foes."

My fingers clenched. I didn't want to believe that, and I wasn't sure I did. But this was the Pilgrim all over again, wasn't it? If there was anyone learned on the subject of mantles in Calernia, it would be the two of them. On the other hand, she'd already confessed she intended to kill me. Believable lies from enemies were a deadly thing.

"Humans are notoriously weak-minded," Andronike replied. "Arguably the ease of their swaying is their defining characteristic as a species."

I grit my teeth. Insulting as this was, I wasn't exactly in a position to contradict her. I only had the one crossbow to wield and it was currently pointed straight at my foot.

"This didn't have to get racist," I still protested.

"Then let us see," Komena said, ignoring my perfectly valid complaint, "the stuff Catherine Foundling is made of. Grant me the power, sister. I will not destroy her yet."

Andronike considered me for a long moment, then inclined her head. My mind was racing at the implications. Angry Sve couldn't kill me without Calm Sve's say-so, then. Andronike owned the floodgate even in here.

"Done," she said.

Komena pushed herself up and came to stand over me. Well, it wasn't like I was capable of stopping her. Might as well do what I did best: mouth off to entities beyond my comprehension.

"Please be gentle," I shyly said. "It's my first-"

"No," Sve Noc cut in.

What followed lived up to the word. Before the Battle of the Camps, I remembered, I had gone looking through a Deoraithe soldier's mind for bits of useful information. If it had felt anything like this I owed the man apology and restitution. The sensation of cold fingers prying through my memories had me regretting the jest I'd just made. It was an intrusion, on some fundamental level, and there was no hiding anything from Sve Noc's piercing gaze.

"There," she said. "We begin with blood."

For what he said and what he'd done, I'd decided he deserved to die – my hand had done the rest without any need for prompting. Edge parallel to the ground, slicing across the major arteries just like the butcher did it to pigs in the marketplace.

I gasped out weakly. She'd brought that to the fore, but her grasp had not slackened. I could still smell the blood in the air, the taste of the first life I'd ever taken. I could almost feel Black looking on, face unreadable.

"Humans killing humans," Andronike commented. "Nothing of import."

"A child arrogating powers beyond her due," Komena contradicted her. "The birth of a recurring pattern. And see how quickly it comes again-"

I let what I'd just done sink in, closing my eyes. With a life spared, I'd just killed thousands. I'd just promised cities to fire and ruin, sown the seeds of a rebellion that would rip the land of my birth – the very same land I wanted to save – apart. But I'd also bought the war I needed. Damn me, but I'd bought the war I needed.

The Lone Swordsman, granted his life so that I may rise through the deaths it would bring. My throat clogged with old disgust. I'd never gotten over that quite as well as I liked to pretend. I'd just had darker things to my name, usurping the place of that early sin when it came to the litany of my regrets.

"Her own kind, thrown into the flames," Komena said. "There are no similarities, Andronike, only lies she made herself swallow."

"Not done without purpose," I croaked. "Not for the sport of it. Because I thought it had to be done."

"You were wrong," the silver-eyed drow said.

"I was," I got out. "And I will be again. But it still matters. If I stand judgement then judge me for all of it. Not just the parts that suit you."

"Not desperation, sister," Komena said, turning to address our audience. "It was ambition that held the knife. Best not forget that."

"Not always," Andronike said.

I couldn't beat the monsters by being better than them. I'd never had that in me. Too much impatience, too much recklessness. That was all right, though. There was another way: be the bigger monster.

Akua on the Blessed Isle, a false victory. The two of us under moonlight, the beginnings of a dance that would see us both spinning for years. The moment I'd first admitted to myself I could live with being a monster if I still won.

"Pride," Komena objected, shaking her head. "Refusal to lose even at the cost of principle. Must I bring out every example of this?"

The duel against the Duke of Violent Squalls, the Arcadian Campaign, Second Liesse. More recent, after that. The Battle of the Camps, Keter. The moment I bestowed a title on Ivah and bound it by oaths.

"Always another sliver shaven off," Komena said. "Another compromise. How long would it take before we became the sacrifice?"

Andronike did not answer. She was, I thought, being convinced.

"This is most irregular."

Both halves of Sve Noc jolted in surprise, and the younger sister's grasp slackened for a moment before tightening twice as hard. I craned my neck to look at the source of the sound and winced.

"Finally you crawl out of your hole, shade," Komena smiled. "I will enjoy this a great deal."

Akua Sahelian stood among us, her scarlet dress flowing down to her feet, and managed to convey utter disdain without ever significantly moving her face.

"There are proper forms to observe, you grasping savages," Diabolist scoffed. "This is not at all how a rigged trial is held. I see an accuser yet no defence – you can, and indeed should, bribe the defender, but you cannot dispense with the office entirely. It is simply not done."

"Sister," Komena began, but the other raised her hand.

"She is less dangerous here than out there, stirring trouble," Andronike said.

"I find the shallowness of your understanding deeply offensive," the shade retorted, wrinkling her nose. "This is the finest your misbegotten race has to offer? Even the least of Tyrants would have made matching cutlery sets of you."

"I know you think this is helping," I began, then paused. "Wait, do you? Are you trying to help?"

"You test my patience, shade," Andronike warned.

"You test mine, chattel," Akua replied. "Even a devil is owed an advocate."

Komena laughed mockingly.

"And you would be hers?" she said.

"Why," Diabolist smiled, extending her arms, "I only want to see justice done. Shall we begin?"

There should be a rule, I decided, about last moment rescues not being allowed to make a situation worse.

---

NZPIEFACE

"How, then, could it have been a crime for these tapirs to follow this same dictate by devouring our late Emperor?"

It's never a crime to kill the Dread Emperor.

NZPIEFACE

Actually, iirc, there was a bunch of legal mumbo-jumbo later for this case to see if the tapir was legible to be the Dread Emperor, right?

Javvies

The court found that while the precedent of the sentient tigers meant that the tapirs could be found guilty of committing treason, the tapirs were also ineligible to become Dread Emperor, and as such, could not get out of the treason charge by right of ascending to and claiming the Tower. IIRC, anyways.

Tohron

I believe the actual verdict was that the tapirs were non-sentient, which meant they couldn't be considered guilty of treason, but were also ineligible for the Right of Usurpation.

RanVor

Nope. They were ineligible for usurpation, but that didn't stop the Praesi from executing them for treason.

NZPIEFACE

"Why," Diabolist smiled, extending her arms, "I only want to see justice done. Shall we begin?"

I can see how this ties in with the quote at the top.

daegone823

Power of friendship, sacrificial saving of main character, last minute call to arms to defend the underdog(Scent of a Woman Al Pacino look it up) saves Akua is literal taking a squat on the heroic Axioms.

The Gods Above wants these two gone and now. If Cat survives this battle though who could stand against them
She gets the aid of angels and stopped a godzilla fight between two gods of evil by allying with her enemy.

Above/Bellow must be furious right now. While Black rolling laughter in the deepest depth of Below.

stevenneiman

Black is still alive. The heroes took him prisoner for... reasons.

WuseMajor

I'm pretty sure the heroes are aware that Black alive and contained means the two main villains they're fighting will do stupid things to rescue him, but Black dead will cause them to lose their shit and do some crazy stuff.

Though, hmmm. If they actually want to destroy Procer, then Black dead would help that wouldn't it?

Rup

This is not at all how a rigged trial is held. I see an accuser yet no defence – you can, and indeed should, bribe the defender, but you cannot dispense with the office entirely. It is simply not done.....
I see that Akua would be perfectly at home in our current legal system

erraticerrata

Character contest continues: Diabolist vs Hireophant, Cat vs Archer. Links to vote below.

[https://www.strawpoll.me/16980113?
fbclid=IwAR1Jv3p0HipJtBihf7tHx8p68rg6nX8nQ5x57y3GMvS3s91EoEEB8UbDRWU](https://www.strawpoll.me/16980113?fbclid=IwAR1Jv3p0HipJtBihf7tHx8p68rg6nX8nQ5x57y3GMvS3s91EoEEB8UbDRWU)

[https://www.strawpoll.me/16980110?
fbclid=IwAR02kQyImwZAb0awi7kj2br10bqvY3wmpYMS1YS38AP7rC4x\_vNi503vGLo](https://www.strawpoll.me/16980110?fbclid=IwAR02kQyImwZAb0awi7kj2br10bqvY3wmpYMS1YS38AP7rC4x_vNi503vGLo)

Andrew Mitchell

Is it wrong for me to vote before reading the new chapter?!?
Honestly not sure why I'm fascinated by the contest.

NZPIEFACE

Cat vs Archer
Akua vs Masego

I kinda want to see Akua vs Cat

magesbe

It's going to come down to that, probably.

Flameburst

Nah i think ubua will lose to Masego

RanVor

Not really, considering that Zeze is winning.

Barthumphries

I hope we see the whole glorious March Madness face-off after it's done.

Panic

This Contest is turning out kind of ehh. Main characters win and the more interesting characters we've seen are pushed out due to not being main characters.

Screwfloss

Well, that's how popularity contests work. I don't think it's very interesting either, but how else could it have possibly turned out?

the verbiage ecstatic

I've been mostly voting for Cat's antagonists over her allies because they're generally great characters and make the story more interesting, but it's been tough. Tariq's defeat was tragic, and unless Akua makes a comeback, my last horse will be out of the race (Masego is great character, but every scene Akua is in is just SO MUCH FUN)

Styn

I've been more bothered by interesting side characters losing to less interesting side characters just because the winning character had more recent screen time.

luminiousblu

Jesus Christ Masego and Akua

Mawbey

Closest one I've seen so far

James, Mostly Harmless

The bracket chart is at <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805>.

Switch

Damn. This ones difficult.

DroughtBringer

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

taovkool

So, power of friendship? Is that thing still on right now? I can't really tell.

NZPIEFACE

It's the power of "justice".

Just very loosely defined justice.

KageLupus

Akua just wants to see justice done. But regardless of what Sve Noc decides at the end, we all know how Catherine feels about justice...

Argentorum

So it's a rigged trial, but just swung the other way? That would be something.

Andrew Mitchell

I **hope** so, but we're just going to have to wait and see what happens.

Javvies

Hah.

Akua Sahelian for the defense. That's going to be a conflicting mess.

The Bard totally needs to go. Perhaps she can't be properly killed, but if you rip her soul (or the equivalent) out and bind it to something, that should take her out of play for a while.

Skaddix

The Dead King, Greatest Sorcerer on the Continent had her strapped to a table and couldn't figure it out. So I seriously doubt its that easy to rip out her soul and bind it. The Bard is not normal even compared to other Named.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point. Older than the Dead King, too. I'm hoping that Masego is going to be able to do something about the Bard.

Xvyz

The Bard is probably a God or an avatar of one.

SMHF

Nah, long hours, not a lot of pay. She's middle management, and seeing as how Gods, Angels and Demons aren't too bothered to watch all the creation burn; a very competent one!

Rup

..don't remember the exact quote...

In Wildbow's Pact...a lawyer in similar "employ" is threatend with death and replies "my employment contract precludes death"

The Bard is like the Writer's Rep

Flameburst

She is probably the Arbitrator of the contest between above and below, charged with keeping it going. In recent years below got ahead so she assists heroes. Back then a power base for below self-destructed, so she acted on belows behalf

stevenneiman

I'm not so sure. I think that she's on the side of Above, and so she make sure that things continue along a path that leads to Good victories. In the incarnation that exists today Sve Noc as it (she? they?) is a kind of Evil which makes for a suitably dramatic story but ultimately stands no real chance of defeating Good, and the Bard knew that, so she nudged things towards the current setup.

Everything the Bard has done so far has been an effort to either keep the stories flowing, foil villains with a chance of accomplishing something meaningful, and prop up villains who she believes will keep to the self-defeating status quo.

TeK

Nah, she was playing for both sides 'fore Neshie screwed the system.

stevenneiman

If anyone can do it, our dear vivisecter of miracles can,

luminiousblu

You can't kill the Bard. She's the DMPC, the plot device, the person who moves the McGuffin, the kick to the status quo that has people crying for adventure and for a new party of level 1s to be rolled up. If she loses, that's only if Above and Below think it's time for her to sit out for a while, and she sits out all the time anyway.

RanVor

More like nobody has found a way to kill the Bard *yet*. Never underestimate the ingenuity of players determined to break the game.

luminiousblu

The ingenuity of players has a corollary, which is that it's only relevant for as long as the DM is willing to indulge it.

RanVor

I guess you haven't seen much ingenuity, then.

luminiousblu

I don't think you get the point, which is that the GM can be caught off guard, but he is also always within his right to say Rocks Fall or even to constantly roll 20s behind his screen and make "judgement calls" that swing things back.

You can't kill a GMPC, it doesn't happen – they're not stated out and even if they were he can just fudge the rolls. The Bard is a classic GMPC, who shows up to drop plot points and begin the main plot and promptly disappears, when you go look for her the GM smiles mysteriously and says "You follow her, but she's disappeared into the crowd."

The main reason you can outsmart the GM is because the GM usually wants to be outsmarted, he's not playing against you or anything, and also because he'd rather not end up with an empty table. You can't, however, "quit" Creation.

RanVor

You can't quit Creation, but you can make the gods wish you could. The gods too are bound by rules, and all rules can be exploited, if you know how to do it. Besides, you don't have to fight them – you just need to ruin their campaign beyond repair. If they have to resort to killing you, you've already won.

Metrux

Point of interest in this discussion: The Gods are not the GM in this story, as you mentioned, they are also bound by rules, which means they are not omnipotent and can't be the true source of everything, which a GM is. So, what if the Bard works for the game because she's actually working for the GM, instead of the Gods?

Insanenoodlyguy

You need to google the story of Old Man Henderson

broadaxe

Binding her soul to something seems kinda useless, she is routinely jumping her soul around to different bodies, wouldn't she just jump out of whatever you bound it to? I'd say you'd have to mangle her soul, so that she is essentially dead no matter what body she jumps in to :3

RanVor

The word "binding" implies that there would be something making her unable to escape.

stevenneiman

I don't think it actually is her soul. I might be wrong, but the sense I got is that the the Name takes the inherited memories and personality alterations so far that whoever takes on the Name behaves exactly like the original, despite the fact that the soul doesn't actually transfer. You'd need to bind the Name and do it in a way that whatever you bound it to couldn't have the same effect as the normal Bard.

Na

I'd gotten the impression that the Bard was literally appearing/vanishing out of nowhere, rather than a Name riding already-extant bodies.

MetruX

When she is in the same body, yes, but when she changes bodies, we've seen already the person existed beforehand, and she got all the memories from it. So at the very least she's a body stealer, if nothing else.

Liliet

Did we see that the person existed beforehand?

tithin

not how i saw this chapter going, but that basically confirms my personal theory the bard represents neither above nor below, but both? a sentient mechanism to ensure the story continues for the amusement of the audience (in this case, being the "gods")

Andrew Mitchell

I agree. She's a mechanism put in place by Above AND Below to keep the story going.

Nairne .01

Like the Hierarch said, "servant of stillness" and all that.

Cap'n Smurfy

You know you've hit rock bottom when Akua Sahalan, Diabolist herself, is the one defending your character in court.

NZPIEFACE

Not really. She's known to have a silver tongue even better than Catherine.

Kennator64

The only silver in Cat's tounge is fulminated.

Flameburst

The defense calls the only character witness: a woman who murdered a six digit figure of civilians!

Cap'n Smurfy

I would say that would be considered a flaw, but only because the Sisters would consider her an amateur mass murderer.

Skaddix

So the Bard works for both sides as a kinda of Game Master that is interesting.

This might end more equitable then I thought.

Metrux

I think you don't understand the work of a Game Master if you think like this. The GM is never working for ANY side, he is there to tell the tales and present the situations, so that the players can better enjoy the game. None of this has anything to do with what Bard does, unless you count her as a pawn to the GM.

imagesbe

Akua makes everything better. EVERYTHING.

I know that the pacing hasn't actually slowed down too much... heavens knows there have been several past chapters where almost no actual events happen and it's all setup for the climax, but this bothers me a lot more.

Probably because I've never approached a climax as apprehensive as now. Oh I've been worried about Cat and co, and worried that a character I liked would die, or something bad would happen to them, but this is the first time I'm genuinely concerned for the quality of the story. I think the next few chapters will decide whether the Drow arc more or less works or was a huge waste of time and writing.

Thea

While the pacing of the story may not have slowed as such, as you said, you're right that the flow is dead. Akua to the rescue with the power of friendship was amazing. Empowered Catherine giving no shits was surprisingly nostalgic and great writing, too. But that disrupted the flow and it hadn't started up again. It's just crabbing around. Catherine leaving the mantle with the drow wouldn't feel satisfying to me. And we get Akua to the rescue *already again*. Matters just ate coming together smoothly, especially compared to previous climaxes.

Argentorum

I agree. I think we could have skipped the metaphysical concept battle at least, getting right to memory lane with a rush to the center, maybe. Akua saying she'll meet Cat there. The one thing is I'm not sure the jaunt down memory lane is skipable, it adds so much necessary context, even though it breaks the pace of the climax and sends us back down for a bit before we get to the trial.

superkeaton

Oh goody, a trial. This should be amusing.

Wry Warudo

Hm I would have thought the memory of Cat bullying a Choir would be significant to Sve Noc, since it shows that she can in fact beat the gods

matesbe

Beating a choir isn't anywhere close to beating the Gods Above, in the same way that beating a Demon doesn't mean you've beaten the Gods Below. That isn't to say it might not win her bonus points, but it's not evidence of being able to beat the Omnipotent. More relevantly, it's not even evidence of being able to beat the Bard.

tithin

Asides from the fact that this has somehow become a trial with regards to the fate of the Night / Winter mantle vis a vis Cat's actions over the course of the story, the bullying of the hashmalim doesn't matter in this context because the Hashmalim are irrelevant to the drow, they're not a series of beings that the drow have ever interacted with as their stories explicitly avoid heroes.

Laying aside the fact that the distinction has never been made around Hashmalim themselves being gods, or merely extremely powerful messengers thereof.

MetruX

1. At the time Drow were in power Villains and Heroes were not even defined as so.
2. The Hashmallins, as all other angel choirs, have been defined as instruments left by the Gods Above, explicitly bound to so much rulings and specific acts, that they can't even be trully considered sentient. So yeah, no gods.

Skaddix

Cat only won that cause the Choirs still have to play by the rules of the story and Cat cause Akua was the opposition was the Hero of that story.

That has no bearing on the Gods.

daegone823

I am so confused what does Cat win if she wins the case, loss equals death.

Does she get her mantle back?

Does she share her body with three souls not including her own?

Does she give the power to this new entity, while she assumes whatever new name?

Now that Cat is humanish again she realizes that she does not want or need power. It was easier to be herself when she had limitations, easier to fight, easier to enjoy life. Now that she can choose what she wants instead of being chained to a mantle since she was the last fae standing.

Cat is still integral to the story unlike the first prince who I realize never attained a name because as the Peregrine and Saint said her involvement is just for appearance sake and that her fight was just a cliff note. Cat is a mover and shaker so she could still attain a name, "Oathmaker".

What does she want from winning the case?

Does she want winter back(a hanging sword for any foe)

Will the dead king still respect her if she gives up the power?

Andrew Mitchell

I think we're going to get answers to most of your questions. And some will come in the next few chapters and others may need another book or two. Until then all we can do is speculate; I'll go first.

What does she get from winning? My guess is that she'll get some sort of deal with the sisters that means that the drow will be allies in Catherine's surface battles. In addition, her experience reliving those memories is going to have a big impact. She's going to work a lot harder on not being a monster. I don't think she'll get Winter's mantle back and I don't think she's going to come into a new Name anytime soon.

So that's my speculation. What's yours?

matesbe

If she loses Winter and doesn't get a Name out of it... she's useless. She basically becomes unnecessary for Callow. She isn't the best general, she isn't the most charismatic leader (and a lot of her charisma was influenced by her Name), she isn't a great administrator... she's story savvy, but if you're not a Named, that really doesn't mean much. There wouldn't be anything about her that's necessary for... anything. Unless you count loyalty from those who do have power.

It's all about power. Without power, she would never have gotten anywhere, and if she loses it here, on the eve of a war... bad things will happen.

I admit it's a possibility she loses all power... but I would be really pissed off. Like, drop the story for awhile pissed off. After shooting off a rant about how completely unnecessary that would make 60% of this entire arc (because if she's going to lose all power, why would there have been a lot of focus on her learning to use and refine power? And if enslaving the Drow was ultimately not going to matter, why write her fighting her way through cities and not just sneak up to Sve Noc, get caught, and then the same thing happens but in 1/4 of the written space).

Sorry if this is snappy or abrasive, but it's really been bothering me. I keep telling myself it probably won't turn out like that because it would be bad narrative, but I can't bring myself to completely discount the possibility as well, and it's aggravating me.

burdi

i think its impossible for catherine to loss all her power, its just not possible she is one of the great enemy of the heaven, and she is former named, you cant became a named then became nobody.

she is a Villain, her only fate is either turn her cloak or croak/dead, there is no possibilities for her to became normal again

Jani Nyyssönen

My question is, how does Cat even exist?

Her body was smoke and mirrors, winter made manifest, a physical projection made by her power to a point that she only had heartbeat when she remembered to have one.

Hell, Pilgrim knocking her out after lake drop incident made her body keep reshaping itself constantly.
What is there left to form a body for her if the power of winter is drained away?
I may have missed something, but so much of this seems completely coming out of nowhere.

burdi

she never loss her body, its just changed by creation because she bore the full mantle of winter so she must not human, creation changed her body to constructure to match it with full mantle of winter her real body still there all this time but this time she really out of her body..gone to mantle of winter night

medailyfun

Add here the limp leg 😊

Rup

...how about this..
Sve Noc gets both Night AND Winter..but has to ally with the Black Queen Cat as protector or something

Enjou

Cat winning likely means alliance with the sisters in some form or another. My personal guess is that the sisters, along with both Night and Winter, will merge with the Mantle of Woe. This will allow them to empower Cat with the abilities granted by Night and Winter, but without it directly influencing her personality. Part of the merge will include them making oaths to enforce the Liesse Accords. In exchange Cat will have to work with them, because while she's in the driver's seat she can't just outright to ignore them because if she does they turn off the flow of power, and they'll ensure that she doesn't just use the drow as a disposable tool that she can throw away once done with them.

Cat gets her mortality while keeping the power of her mantle, her army of drow, and something that will ensure the Liesse Accords will be enforced once she's dead and gone. The sisters get to ensure that their people won't just be killed off.

The whole arrangement sort of violates the "don't rely on a magical artifact as a villain because it will fail you at a critical moment" axiom, but since the failure in question is related more to the axioms regarding "don't abuse your chained up monster" and "don't break oaths with the fae" the pitfall can be largely avoided.

As far as Akua goes, she'll likely ensure all the wording is neat and proper. If she survives... well, being forever bound to an artifact that enforces a treaty that is meant to prevent atrocities like the one that she caused would be delightfully ironic.

Andrew Mitchell

I like the way you've laid this out.

Metrux

It does sound good... For the end of everything in this story. Really can't see any of this happening right now, would simply disrupt everything that is still to happen, in the same way we see animes doing... They tended to be good, then it just became more of the same because power overwhelming, and that is a thing people have already been complaining about the Winter mantle. No, she won't have the two in her mantle, just not happening.

Novice

The choir are not the gods.

werafdsaew

Ok I genuinely have no idea where this is going.

nick012000

>"Pride," Komena objected, shaking her head. "Refusal to lose even at the cost of principle. Must I bring out every example of this?"

There's something to be said for Cat's impressive trail of victories, though. She's never lost a battle so far.

tithin

She lost the last one she fought.

Bravo

Not if she wins.

magesbe

It can be argued that Akua beat her. Temporarily, but to be honest it wasn't her own ability or planning that got her out of that one. Also, William did kill her. She just didn't stay dead.

RoflCat

Well, she was still dead, she just didn't 'stay still' as a dead.

Wil "I killed you!"

*stab*

Cath "Still dead, remember?"

pagesbe

Willycakes: "I killed you. I cut off your head."

Cat: "Eh, I got over it."

Liliet

Catherine trusted Black to help her plan out that one. IMHO, if Cat had been planning that one alone, she wouldn't have let an opening THAT big on accident. It wasn't her own ability or planning that got her out of that one, but it also wasn't her own ability or planning that got her INTO that one, so the point is moot. She trusted Black to make a plan that would work... and she wasn't even wrong, in the end, it, er, did.

Draeysine

I agree, she has never lost a battle before. At worst she merely took a break in the middle of a few to come back and finish the job.

Skaddix

Honestly, EE might actually make a creative ending for this one I fully expected a repeat of the King of Winter and Queen of Summer and Cat leaving with a Slave Army but if she walks out with an Alliance with Sve Noc instead well props that is a more interesting direction. As compared to Cat simply killing Sve Noc adding Night to Winter and leaving with a massive Drow army.

Jani Nyyssönen

I may have had some, complaints, about last couple chapters, but this, this has been pure gold.

So much for the "Mantle made me do it" defense, self awareness, thy name is most definitely not Catherine Foundling.

And dammit i especially love Akua giving us insight on the role of the defense on Praesi culture.

There needs to be one, you can, and are expected to, pride it, but there must be a defender for the accused, this is a society that, when seeing their ruler being eaten by man eating tapirs, goes to court over whether or not the tapirs get to be the next ruler.

Seriously, Praesi may be evil fuckers in general, but i love how self aware they are about it.

IDKWhoitis

Lawful Evil must follow the letter of the law after all, if not that, why bother with rules and rulers at all? Praes is built upon this rigid hierarchy, and they must follow all the expected forms of malevolence. This is the same empire that has forms to kill bureaucrats and has laws of inheritance regarding undead and claimed souls.

IDKWhoitis

So is Akua dragging out what remains of her name now that Winter has subsided? Is the Diabolist about to get a second act? More importantly, we see that Cat is just waiting, and being quiet. Ok, well more quiet, as she lets the chaos between several semi-malicious entities talk it out.

I still don't believe this is a betrayal of Cat, since the "Power of Friendship"™ is still in play.

burdi

everything that sve noc said was meaningless, the show of memory just to guide cat's mind, to make her surrender. by making her see in their way, that what they did was not wrong..its just tactic to herding cat to her butcher place like a sheep that is why akua with the power of glorious friendship came to rescue..because its the time, the only condition they can beat the odds.., by compare catherine and sve noc..who is better. without someone to help her, catherine is guaranteed will loss..cant argue for herself, she already loss her words after they showed her their memory .its their plan its akua moment..to show sve noc and below or and above that catherine is better

Jani Nyyssönen

Catherine has a problem in that she thinks of herself, in some ways, as a good person, that her cause is just, and that she should be better than the worst.

Her claim of "Justifications only matter to the just" is a pretty snappy one, but i don't think she truly believes in it. And here, that is a weakness she can't afford. Sve's will keep knocking her down with all of her more brutal actions taken out of context to try to convince her that she is not a good person (and i'd argue that she is not), that she should not have power because she can't be trusted to wield it (i think she can).

So here comes Akua, who can argue against Sve's claims, who can bolster Cat's side and argue that what Cat did was necessary and/or justified.

I think the current fight is about willpower and conviction, who truly believes themselves to have the right to rule, to wield power, to win. And Cat has always had self doubts, it's one of the things keeping her from becoming the monster some fear she might be, but here, those doubts can kill her.

But Akua, she is nothing if not certain of herself, here, she is possibly the best ally Cat can have from all those who follow her. Provided she does not stab Cat in the back, which i don't think she will, but is never really certain, this is Akua after all.

BarthHumphries

Few typos

Antoninjohn

Cat has changed the story from one of Moonless Nights vs Drow Night to a trail of justice, Sve Noc may have had "All is Night" to let her win the battle of Nights but Cat has "Justice only matters to the Just" which will let her win now, Sve Noc lost the minute Cat changed the story

magesbe

Except does Cat really still buy that? The first quarter of this arc involved her waffling around feeling terrible about herself and what she's done to Callow. That is not the action of someone who feels like she doesn't need justifications for her actions.

Liliet

Well, Catherine would very much like to be just.

But to get justifications from her, you need to also hop on the just bandwagon...

agumentic

"Why," Diabolist smiled, extending her arms, "I only want to see justice done. Shall we begin?"

<http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=FnmEnjWy288>

I can't wait for more of Akua Sahelian: Ace Attorney.

Euodiachloris

Akua Sahelian: better at white-infighting than the White Knight.

Because she spins the evidence, doesn't rely on coin flips and always has an angle when she comes charging to the rescue.

sutortyrannus

Akua as legal defense really only merits one response:

Hier Kom Groot Kak.

Andrew Mitchell

It's great to find out that EE can still surprise me. I was NOT expecting this to become a mock trial with Akua on the defence.

I can't wait to see Akua in action. This is going to be so, so good.

letouriste

theories: cat asked akua to do something about sve noc before the battle and we didn't really see what that was yet right?

i guess the plan is still there but cat is clueless about it given she decided to let akua do the plot.

I doubt she planned to lose her mantle but her plans involve a lot of room to improvisation.

the whole chapter was still confusing to me tho

Andrew Mitchell

I think all this is being improvised and there is nothing left of Cat's planning. IMO this battle isn't going to be won through force. Now she needs the sisters' willing cooperation.

Someguy

>"This is not at all how a rigged trial is held. I see an accuser yet no defence – you can, and indeed should, bribe the defender, but you cannot dispense with the office entirely. It is simply not done."

If a rigged trial involves the Defence being bribed you have already failed. The practice of Law involves the Prosecution & Defence actually practicing with great effort and vigour. The Judge has already been bribed/in bed with whomever profits most from the result, the Prosecution & Defence exist only to practice.

*crysjal*

She's referring to how you hold a "rigged trial". You don't hold a rigged trial without at least providing a defence even if the defence is bribed. It's about appearances.

Novice

Which goes back to her whole going through the motions of being a hero without have any heroic motivations/intent.

NerfGlastigUaine

The opening quote always mirrors/foreshadows what happens in the story. Thus, I knew after reading the stirring defense of the ignobly executed man-eating tapirs that this chapter would be a gem.

Also, Trial of Unexpected Teeth? Really? You created man-eating tapirs, bragged about it, and asked "who's the real loser here," and they were unexpected?

Euodiachloris

Shocking, right? I mean, the signage must have been a good 15 metres tall. In night-safety white. And with disco rotating spotlights.

Rup

...this name is pure Gold: Trial of Unexpected Teeth

Nairne .01

Eh, is Aqua going for "justification matters only to the just"? Does she even know about it? Did Sve get that information yet?

I don't know why but I was under the impression Cat didn't have a third moment like that one with justification yet.

luminiousblu

The first time Catherine ever said that line was to Akua.

RanVor

Not exactly. She said it after Akua left, iirc.

Nairne .01

Uhm, she said it just before she got her resurrection, and that was to the choir. That's why I'm confused.

NZPIEFACE

She said it to Akua on the Blessed Isle.

Nairne .01

Eh no,

Book 2, chapter 47:

"Repent, Queen of Callow.

I gurgled out a wretched laugh. You can't ever lose, can you? Even when you're beaten I have to become one of yours. I forced myself to remember something else. They tried to struggle but it was just as much a part of me as the rest had been. You don't get to pick and choose what I am. Two silhouettes cloaked in black, standing alone in front of the throne.

We do not kneel.

It wasn't enough. Those were not my words. I had borrowed them, and in borrowing lessened them. They demanded contrition. They demanded justification, for all my many sins. I had none. I clawed desperately into the depths of myself. Looking for something, anything. What I found... was a starry sky, in ruins that moaned in the wind. A dark-skinned girl, tempting me with a way out. Four dead on the floor as she fled. A lesson learned, a question answered.

Justification only matters to the just.

They flinched.

"I swore it," I croaked. "Whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation."

I no longer saw a crown on my brow. They hadn't liked that at all, had they? So much for being Queen. The fires withdrew, leaving me empty. Still dead. Unlike their trap of a Name, this I took umbrage to.

"You can't cheat me," I laughed. "You're not the Gods. You're part of the story too. You have to follow the rules."

I opened my eyes, looking up into the perfect blankness.

"And if you won't give me my due," I said. "I'll Take it.""

NZPIEFACE

Huh, must've remembered wrong.

Well, Akua's not directly quoting it, so I don't really see any big issue with it.

Aston Whiteman

Cat dies still.

mavant

No, Cat dies moving.

SpeckofStardust

"They've been a lot more careful about where they put their money since Nessie ate the hand that fed him."

Best name for the Dead king right here, Nessie.

RanVor

What I find interesting here is that Below are somehow not happy with the Dead King. I wonder what they expected from him.

Andrew Mitchell

That's an interesting thought. I think Below want the Dead King to be more active and involved because Below (like Above) want the story to ebb and flow. A Dead King who just sits on the sidelines gathering more and more power is wasting story potential.

RanVor

Well, I guess that's possible, but it doesn't sound like "eating the hand that fed him".

Tohron

He made a deal with devils to power his ritual, but then figured out a way to backstab the devils and take over their hell (converting it to his purposes). I'm pretty sure it's the latter part that they're unhappy with.

RanVor

Sure, but wasn't he following their own philosophy?

Javvies

I think it might be more because he doesn't do all that much proactively with all the power he's gotten.

I mean, he's been more or less content to sit there for centuries, if not millennia. Oh, sure, he'll smack down anybody going into his territory, but he's never seriously tried to expand what he controls.

He never finished off the ancient enemy of his people, either, and so the Lycaonese are around.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Are you suggesting that the gods aren't hypocrites? I find this implausible.

RanVor

They could be, if they were stupid and didn't mind losing. Otherwise, I don't think they can afford hypocrisy in this particular matter.

MetruX

RanVor, just reread the story. Everything points to the Gods, both Above and Below, to be utterly foolish and filled with hypocrisy. Besides, there's nothing they "can't afford", since they're Gods, and the only reason they can be so foolish in the first place is that they have enough power no one can do a thing about it.

RanVor

You're missing one important detail – the Gods Above are watching Below's every move, and would never miss a chance to take advantage of their dumb mistake. And of all dumb mistakes a god can make, punishing its followers for sticking to the principles it taught them is undoubtedly the dumbest.

TeK

I believe it has something to do with Nessie saying that he is a god.

RanVor

Well, but of fucking course it was the Bard. I can't believe I haven't seen it coming.

Aotrs Commander

Yeah.

Lets us hope, that if by the end of the series, Cat can't kill both sets of Gods outright, she will at very least, be able to set Bard's conceptual everything on retroactive fire forever...

broadaxe

People talking about "justification only matters to the just" you guys realise that just a few chapters ago cat was chidding her self for saying something so stupid as that right? :3

Nairne .01

I know.

If we are to believe the queen of Summer and her prophetic naming of Cat's band of misfits then I wonder what kind of Woe will befall Sve and possibly Cat as well (as misery loves company).

Nairne .01

P.S.

I still want Cat to ascend to the same level as Neshamah. I do love how she warps stories for her benefit though it would be unnatural for her to keep to a level or two below the DK and Bard.

I admit I love the idea of OP characters my desire stems mainly from that, but I'd also love to prove the Bard wrong and have Cat not "burn out" like she said.

Aotrs Commander

Huh. Guess I was right about Cat using the mantle as an excuse to wag her finger at herself. Little bit surprised, but pleased, actually. (Since I am very big on personal responsibility, and one of the reasons I despise the gods, bard and the choirs with a blazing intensity...)

Cat, duck, you kind of need to stop pretending to yourself on a bad day and just run with it and accept you are what you chose yourself to be. Everyone (that matters) will still love you anyway..

Nairne .01

Indrani already told Cat about that. Cat is Callowan deep down so up until now, she had to believe deep down that she was doing good.

I think her character development since she became the Squire was more linked to her Name (or in other words the part of her soul that was her Name) and then when it got swallowed to Winter. She became more accepting of cruelty and more radical means even as Squire and it continued when she became the Sovereign. The reason she didn't revert to her old self like this time was because Winter or more likely her domain swallowed her Name (or at least that part of her soul).

This entire arc may basically be an opportunity to reflect on that and maybe start over.

The biggest thing I think both Komena, Andronike, and Cat may be missing at this point is the simple truth that power – no matter its nature – wants to be used.

So if one assumes that whoever gets this pot of dubious gifts of comingled Night and Winter will be immortal then there will inevitably be a time when they use this power, and in this argument both or one of them is pretending to prove who can use it better (or to do more good) and both or the other is arguing who has more right to this power.

I'm probably wrong or may have expressed myself wrong (or both), but I'd love to see your (all of you) outlook on what we had in this whole arc up until now.

mavant

He that troubleth his own house shall inherit the wind, and the fool shall be servant to the wise in heart. – Proverbs 11:29

Personally I'm delighted to see Akua taking on the role of Clarence Darrow. Let's get this Monkey Trial started!

Zaver SaintCloud

What gets me about the last few chapters is that for all the drama & backstory (which are fantastic btw), we must remember that Cat came here for the purpose of securing an army to supplement Callow's forces in the Crusade. Having her walk out of the Everdark with a large contingent of Drow seems almost inevitable, and thus takes away some of the spectacle that is her confrontation with Sve Noc. Though she might also get a few of those Dwarven thrill-seekers to join her, so that's a plus.

Metrux

If she gets rid of Sve Noc, she might very well get an army of DWARFS to fight with her. So no, she can leave here without Drow in the end, though would be kinda anti-climatic. Also, if she makes a deal with the sisters, unless it takes them out of the underground and destroys the gloom, those very same dwarfs will come for *her*. Yeah, this just isn't ending well for everyone, and your argument... You could say so for any story. We all already know how they end, the MC victorious in some manner, so why bother? Well, because we like the way it is told, the details of the world, the tale itself in how it happens, instead of where it goes. After all, you can enjoy a story you already know, why is it such a different concept to enjoy one still filled with mysteries to unravel?

naturalnuke

"Even the devil gets an advocate."

Fair enough.

RanVor

Wait a sec. If Cat loses Winter (and, by extension, fairy gates), how the hell is she going to get back to Callow?

SMHF

Well Sve'd taught this neat trick to Longstrides that hasn't seen much use yet... so my money's on that.

broadaxe

So i was reading some old bits and peices of the guide, to get up to date on Abigale, as i am curious what she has become in cathrines absencens.

When i realised why Cat bound akua, why she kept her around, and in heinsight it is so obvious its kind of astounding. We were all screaming it was a terrible idea becuase she would betray her, take over her body, take over winter, yada, yada. Because, essentially, she would be a treacherous lieutenant, just like Larat. Suddenly neither of them feels nearly as dangerous, one is a danger but 2? Suddenly irritants law just makes it a mere problem. That, i believe is real reason she kept her :3

RanVor

My theory is that she intended it to be a fate worse than death. Needless to say, it backfired.

Jani Nyyssönen

Basicly this.

First binding Akua's soul was a punishment, then she became a dangerous weapon for desperate situation, later a tool too useful to discard, then a treacherous advisor, and now, she's a borderline (untrusted) friend/ally.

I used to hate Akua, she was in many ways the worst example of what Praes was.

But, overtime she grew on me, yes, she was evil treacherous asshole right up until she had he heart ripped out, but afterwards, she did not moan or complain. No matter how much i hated her, Akua accepting her fate, and straightforward and self aware way of dealing with it since has made her possibly my second favorite character after Cat (kinda tied with Thief and Hunter, can't really decide between them).

Nairne .01

Hunter was a childish prick, wet with his mother's milk behind his ears and dreams of being a hero when he really wasn't anything special (a sidekick maybe).

Jani Nyyssönen

I meant archer.

For some reason i keep mixing Archer, Ranger and Hunter.

Liliet

Akua is absolutely amazing, and yeah, her reaction to losing has made her come pretty high up on the list of my favorites

♥

Amadeus and Masego though. Amadeus and Masego ;u;

NZPIEFACE

If Ivah could be backstabbing...

nipi

Seems to me like the sisters and Cat have done pretty much the same things.

“Хотели как лучше, а получилось как всегда.” (“We wanted the best but it came out like always.”) – Viktor Chernomyrdin

I wonder what the “reasonable” sister is fishing for. Plot armor aside it seems like she is waiting for Cat to realize what she needs to offer to get a deal.

Liliet

I love you for this translation forever I am going to be using it ♥

nipi

“A child arrogating powers beyond her due,” Komena contradicted her. “The birth of a recurring pattern. And see how quickly it comes again-”

Ok its official Cats just ramping up towards becoming OP. Then again we already knew that.

Jani Nyyssönen

This has become something of a pattern, Cat is taken down by an enemy, enemy fails to immediately utterly destroy her, Cat gets up and becomes even more powerful, defeats her enemy.

It kinda happened with William in their first fight.

It happened with William in their third fight.

It happened with the winter fae (i think, don't have perfect recollection of the fight).

It happened in second Liesse with Akuwa binding her.

It sorta happened when Pilgrim managed to knock her out after the lake thing. Even if the power up was starting to use Akua.

And now it seems to be happening again.
As long as there is anything left of Cat, body, mind, or soul, she is going to get back up, and kick your ass.

broadaxe

The pattern of the protagonist :3 also the pattern of a hero
^^

Jani Nyyssönen

Or a recurring villain.

Nairne .01

"The birth of a recurring pattern. And see how quickly it comes again-"

I don't know whether to be impressed or laugh at the observation. Isn't that exactly what is happening now?

Moginheden

The previous/next links seem a bit messed up here. Normally the interludes get put into the order properly. This time the "next" button from "As Above" comes directly to this chapter, but the "previous" button from this chapter goes to "Peregrine I" also the interlude doesn't seem to show in the sidebar chapter list.

RanVor

Because it's not an interlude. It's an extra chapter, and as such can be found in the extra chapters section. If it was an interlude, it would have "Interlude" in the title.

NZPIEFACE

You know, I've been reading the Tyrant chapters. Absolute joy.

He literally said "We do not go gently into the night."
"First step always works, so always have a first step going."

His views on villainy are as pure as Akua, and presumably the arsenic he employs. It's fucking amazing. And then again, his personal philosophy of "Fuck it, I'm dying, let's do this" reminds me so much of Cat. He is a madman, the best kind.

I really hope the next book delves into his character more. His absence so far has been sorely noted, and it's about time his game with Hierarch bore fruit.

SMHF

You know. there is a part of me that still thinks this is part of an elaborate plan to force a narrative and Cat had to wipe her memory of the plan since she knew Sve could easily access it...

This whole thing just doesn't add up to how calculated they did everything in the Everdark after the fight with Urulan...

I seriously can't believe they decided to just wing it, knowing Sve was gonna show up.

It's the same reason I'm pretty sure getting caught was part of Black's plan... which is kinda terrifying because it means whatever he's gonna get out of it, was worth half of his legions!

Liliet

Eh, Black just going "fuck it I don't have a plan" kind of lines up with him breaking Liesse and Empire with it and then giving Cat a knife and going 'just go for it buddy'. He's been in a slow motion mental breakdown, and I think his loss was, in fact, a genuine loss.

Catherine here definitely had more of a plan than we've seen.

I can't wait for it to play out in Sve Noc's favor ♥

Aran

What did Kairos do to mess with the Bard's plans, specifically? I remember her saying that he "snuck one by me", but what was it?

The one thing that comes to mind is that he made Anaraxes Hierarch and put him in charge of the League, but I'm not sure why that is such a significant move.

aran

... oh. OH.

---

Chapter 81: Only To The Just

"Thus the Gods granted us the second boon: beyond the veil of death lies a land of always plenty, which will only be open to the just."

– The Book of All Things, fifth verse of the second hymn

Why was a trial taking place at all?

I kept my face expressionless even as the question consumed me. I knew why Akua would want one: given long enough, she could probably convince a circle it was actually a square. I also knew why Komena wanted one, or rather didn't. She simply didn't have the power to do anything about it at the moment. What was tripping me up, though, was why Andronike had boarded this ship. She'd already implied Diabolist might be troublesome if allowed to continue whatever folly she'd been up to out there, but that couldn't possibly be enough of a reason to indulge this farce. I gave it better than even odds that Akua had come in here with an exit strategy, a way to flee if this turned sour on her, but why not simply hang me on a crook and temporarily devote their energies to taking care of the Diabolist issue before resuming? There was, I decided, a deeper game afoot. True to form, I was the only player involved unaware of the stakes and the rules. Could I feel out the shape of it by figuring out what the older sister was after? No, I decided after a short beat. Even now she was too hard to figure out. On the other hand, I knew Akua like few others. Her I might be able to use for the purpose. So, Diabolist, I thought. What are you actually up to?

"You claimed the role of defender," Andronike said, silver eyes unblinking. "Proceed, shade."

"As a titled noble of the Dread Empire of Praes, Catherine Foundling is owed trial before a jury of her peers," Akua mused. "Yet I suppose you will have to do."

The insult I immediately discarded as unimportant. She'd never been quite as above trash talk as she liked to pretend, a tendency that exposure to the Woe had only worsened. She was establishing my stature as a Praesi noblewoman – which technically was true, since Malicia had years ago titled me Lady of Marchford even though greater titles had since eclipsed that grant – but also recognizing that the older half of Sve Noc had right of judgement over me. One or both parts of that were useful to her purposes, I decided.

"There is no empire here save ours," Komena denied bluntly. "Your laws and dues are of no worth."

Thrust and parry, I frowned. Had it simply been an attempt to make Praesi laws apply to whatever the Hells this was turning into? She'd certainly be more familiar with them than anyone else here, and that opened the door to a multitude of exploitable technicalities. But it should have been fairly predictable that wouldn't work, we had nowhere near enough leverage in this to make that hold. My eyes flicked to Andronike's calm face. Arguably no leverage at all, I thought. And yet here we were. She was getting something out of this, something separate from the offer I'd extended. What? The answer to that question was the key to surviving this.

"Then you stand here in your role as shared rulers of the Everdark," Diabolist said. "With all attendant duties and privileges."

I knew that faintly indifferent tone of voice all too well. It was the same she'd used every time she was making sport of me before an audience of fellow Wasteland vultures. She'd laid a trap and Komena had fallen for it. Establishing stakes? If the sisters were here as rulers of their kind, the outcome of this might apply to all drow. Which meant that the outcome of this bad play mattered somehow, there'd be no point in pushing for this if it didn't. I bit my lip. Why would it? We had no way of enforcing anything, the power disparity was to the point of the absurd. It would take something-

"Oh fuck me," I murmured.

-something even stronger to do that. Like a story. Akua was trying to screw them the exact same way I'd screwed her at First Liesse. Except this time I was theoretically on her side and essentially blind as to the specifics of what she was trying to accomplish. The moment I opened my mouth to say anything I might very well be striking a match in a munitions warehouse.

"That is so," Andronike replied without hesitation. "I stand in judgement over an invader."

Think, Catherine. What does 'Nike get out of this? Why does she play along? This ended either in my acquittal, which I suspected was what Akua might be going for, or in my conviction. Somehow I doubted Diabolist and Andronike were after the same outcome, which meant 'Ol Silver was aiming for the noose. What would she get from it that choking me out earlier wouldn't have accomplished?

"Good," Diabolist smiled. "Now, I believe that assertion was made pride has been her sole master all these years. I would bring evidence to the contrary. Catherine, if I may?"

"Try not to make a mess," I sighed.

"But that's not why I'm making this decision. There are eight thousand innocents in Marchford, Juniper. I refuse to abandon them."

Her grip was lighter, I'd give her that much. Maybe as a consequence the memory didn't feel nearly as vivid, and it took me a moment to place it. War council of the Fifteenth, after the demon had slipped the leash in the hills south of Marchford. When my officers had been arguing for retreat west and abandonment of the city. I had not forgot, though, exactly who it was that'd loosed the demon in question. Hard to, when she was the same woman currently speaking in my defence.

"The Battle of Marchford," Akua said. "A choice between pragmatic retreat and principled stand. This too, Sve Noc, is a pattern that must be recognized: holding to loyalties in the face of danger, even when inconvenient."

I chewed on the inside of my cheek. Yeah, she was definitely going for acquittal here. Which I supposed might mean being worthy of allying with? At least half of Sve Noc seemed aware there was a story in the works here, and so she might step carefully if Diabolist pulled this off, but even then I didn't see the 'wrong' verdict holding up afterwards. Which might be what Akua is actually after, I frowned. Putting at our back a story of the sisters breaking their word, even if it was only implicitly given. It'd been a mistake in thinking to assume that the shade would be after the same thing I was, namely making allies with the pair. Akua Sahelian was a creature who only ever sought absolute endings, be they victories or defeats. And that meant, unfortunately, that putting all my coin on the madwoman trying to fool living gods wasn't an option. I couldn't just lie there like a dead fish and await salvation. Even if she managed to win, it would be the wrong damned sort of victory. Shit. That meant I'd have to handle her, Andronike and Komena at the same time. Each of them after something different and in at least one case what exactly remaining unclear to me. This was going to get trickier than I was equipped to handle.

"Laughable," Komena said. "Is there a single teacher or benefactor she has not turned on?"

I gasped as she riffled through my memories none too gently. The images flickered in quick succession: putting a knife in Black, after the dust had settled on Second Liesse. Coronation in Laure, as good as open rebellion against Malicia. Standing before the Queen of Summer and the King of Winter, unmaking them both by giving them exactly what they wanted.

"All of which betrayed her first, in one manner or another," Diabolist shrugged. "Can you show me a single instance where she was first to wield the knife?"

"And so she is indecisive as well as untrustworthy," Komena mocked. "You dig ever deeper."

"Now now," Akua chided. "Personal attacks are the mark of failed argument. If you've no counterpoint to offer, such flailing only serves to shed further light on your incompetence."

"A single instance taking place prior to the acquisition of her mantle," Andronike said. "Your argument stands, shade, yet not as tall as you would wish. I require more recent decisions. You were yourself instrumental in the enslavement of many of my kind. The matter must be addressed."

I drummed my fingers against my leg. There it was, the hint as to what she was after. Like I'd thought it, was conviction she wanted. So she was on her sister's side. Whatever hesitation I'd sown was gone, they were back to riding the same horse. No, I suddenly thought. They aren't. Komena might be serving as the attack hound, at the moment, but that wasn't what she actually wanted. If given the power she'd strike us both down in an instant. Andronike's road still ended in my death, presumably, but she wanted to carry out the full farce first. Make it about my being judged and then annihilated. The semblance of justice had some use to her. The whole thing still had the smell of sacrifice to it, but there was a difference between simple victory by strength and the hanging of a villain. The latter had a narrative behind it, and I could only see one use for that: she wanted to ride it against Winter. That was the only reason she'd humoured Diabolist, she wanted Fate to back her claim on my former mantle. And so finally I knew what everyone was after: Akua wanted to trick the sisters to their death, Komena wanted heads for her spikes and Andronike wanted me to walk to the altar willingly.

And I needed to outmanoeuvre the three of them simultaneously, while prone and having my mind ransacked.

"Oaths were taken, this is true," Diabolist said. "Yet willingly, in fair bargain."

"Death or kneeling is no bargain," Komena said. "It is conquest by another name. Most damningly of all, it is failed conquest. There is no victory to redeem the outrage."

"Can one be made a slave twice over?" Akua denied. "Were the Firstborn not already owned?"

"Then the offence of theft is to be added to insult," the younger sister replied.

"You concede, then, that the drow were and remain slaves," Diabolist pressed.

Komena hesitated, smelling the trap. I could have taken the moment to try to unfold Akua's latest trick, but there was no point to that. I wouldn't get through this by following her lead. Two outcomes to a trial, conviction or acquittal. That it was rigged from the start mattered little, I thought, it was only playacting to strengthen a story. Could I break this, then? Refuse to recognize the authority of my judge? No, that'd only give Komena what she wanted. Heads, spikes, the usual. It irked me that the proceedings themselves were largely meaningless: it was all just squabbling for the right position in the eyes of the story. Diabolist and Andronike were fighting over the knife they both wanted to wield, the 'being in the right', but I suspected the moment it was clear Sve Noc would not get what she was after she'd discard the pretence and turn to violence. You're still trying to win according to the rules, I remembered, when you should be trying to win despite them. Gods, it would be so much easier to be rid of him if his lessons were not so useful. Even now, years later and hundreds of miles away from anything he'd ever seen. As in so many things, Black had the right of it.

Nowhere this 'trial' would lead to suited me, and so there was no need for me to play along with it.

I closed my eyes and the talk washed over me. Komena walked back her first claim, terming her people as servants instead, and Akua argued that servants finding other employment was no crime. They went around in a circle, Sve Noc claiming the service was to Below and so meddling in the matter was blasphemy, Akua arguing that as a villain I was equally in Below's service and so no blasphemy was had. The shade was better at this: they'd put up their soldier against my schemer. And while we were fresh off our wars with Above, they'd been stewing in a hole of their own making for millennia. We had the edge, by the slightest of margins. That edge just wasn't being used for what I wanted. I croaked out a laugh, opening my eyes.

"Do you hear the sound, Andronike?" I said.

There was a pause in the argument.

"Catherine-" Akua began, but I shook my head.

I met her gaze. Trust me, I silently asked. I have taken us from one mess to another, and twice you've had to save my life tonight. Trust me anyway. Slowly the shade nodded. She had been my nemesis, once. There had been understanding in that as well as hatred.

"I hear a trial," Andronike replied.

"Not me," I mused. "It's just this awful patter I can make out. Click click click. Claws and feet. Four crabs in a bucket."

She eyed me in confusion.

"Ah, not familiar with those I take it," I said. "They're these-"

"I know what a crab is, Catherine Foundling," Sve Noc flatly replied.

"They trap those, in the city I was born," I said. "In cages, then they take them out and put them in buckets. Went swimming a few times when I was a kid, and once I came across this crabber. He'd taken them out of his cage and put them in one of those very buckets. I was surprised when I saw it was just a regular old one – no trick to it, not even a lid. So I went up to the man and asked why they didn't just escape. You know what he said?"

The drow did not reply.

"A single crab would escape," I smiled. "But when you have more than one? The moment it's about to get out, the others will drag it back down."

"This again," Komena sneered. "Is there-"

"Now, all that's left of this one is hunger and hubris," I casually interrupted, jamming a thumb towards the younger drow. "I forgive her for it. And Akua, well, she was raised in a bucket even more vicious than this one. She's still learning to let go of those blinders. You, though? I'm disappointed that at no point you figured out you could simply ask."

"Would you like to confess?" Andronike calmly said.

"Click click click," I replied. "You're still acting like the only way you can win is if I lose. We both know that's not true."

"Apotheosis," she said, "cannot be partitioned."

"So that's the pebble in your boot," I snorted. "Gods, you think I want to be Queen Bitch of Night? There's not a lot things I'm afraid of, but going back to the mantle is one. It was like having a sieve between me and Creation with only the ugly stuff going through."

"It's a trap, sister," Komena said. "The shade will have its jaws unhinged, lurking behind us."

"Akua Sahelian," I said. "I order you to discard whatever you have wrought."

"We can still triumph," Diabolist quietly said, facing me in full.

"And that's the kind of victory we all prefer, isn't it?" I pensively said. "Complete. Mistress of the field, every opponent ground to dust."

I flicked a glanced at where I'd ripped out her hear, then at the halves of Sve Noc.

"Look where it's gotten us, thinking of compromise as weakness," I said. "A shade and half a corpse. The two cannibal goddesses of an endless butcher's yard."

"We are nothing like you," Komena hissed.

"Look at us, you fucking fool," I hissed back. "Actually look at us. Is there a single one of us that isn't a monumental failure? I carved open like a pig the only thing I've ever tried to save, again and again. Akua watched every single belief she held to burn to the ground around her before I ripped out her beating heart. And you two, Komena, Merciless Gods – even a monstrous thing like Wandering Bard pitied you for this."

"And who are you to lecture us?" Andronike said. "Who are you, that your advice should be heeded? By your own lips an admitted derelict."

"I'm not better than you," I said. "That's not what this is about. We could all debate body counts and ruins until the Last Dusk but what would that accomplish? One of us being the worst of the lot doesn't change what's on all our shoulders. Nothing does."

"Desperate," Komena scathingly said. "Running scared. This is no offer, it is terror gilded with false sentiment."

"This is absurd," I laughed. "We're holding a trial over what, my worthiness? I am a funeral procession of mistakes and horrors. We all are. Plunder my memories all you like for justifications or blemishes, it doesn't make this any less of a sham. Sure, I'm a monster. What do you care?"

"And you would have us clasp hands in alliance with a monster," Andronike said. "A strange argument you make."

"Like you give a shit about humans dying," I snorted. "Or even about my character, such as it is. I'm not asking you on a moonlit walk for a spot of kissing, Sve Noc, I'm offering you a power stolen through murder to help you cheat the death of your entire race. Again. Why are we still pretending my regrets or principles have any weight on these scales?"

"We would have no guarantees on their end," Akua said, voice blanked of emotion. "No means to ensure they hold up their part."

"It's always the need for control that fucks us, isn't it?" I mused. "It killed the very partnership that dug Praes out of the pit. You and me too, Diabolist. How much could we have avoided if instead of clawing at each other we'd sat down and talked? How many tragedies would have never come to pass if we'd just bent our proud necks the slightest bit?"

I looked at the sisters.

"You think I'm a fool," I said. "Fine. My record holds to it. But ask yourselves this: a century from now, while you watch the essence of Winter turn your people into animals despite your best efforts, will you not regret this even a little? That one moment where you could have done it differently?"

"Different is not better," Komena said.

"It could be worse," I agreed. "I won't deny that. Devouring Winter is an agony assured, but this could turn out worse. It's still a chance, though."

I clenched my fingers then unclenched them.

"It's an unknown," I said. "It's terrifying and dark and it could be the single worst thing any of us has ever done – but it's not impossible to get out of a bucket. You need to own that, deep down. That if we're the crabs we're that because of fear and not because there was no other way."

The silence that followed hung heavy over all of us. There was a song in it, I thought. Four monsters assembled in a room that wasn't. Night twofold, harsh and serene. The Doom of Liesse and the Black Queen who slew her. The silver-eyed sisters were mirroring statues of stillness, not a hint as to their thoughts revealed. Andronike eventually let out a breath.

"It burns, doesn't it?" she told her sister. "Sincerity. I'd forgotten the taste of it."

"Once more we come to the crossroads, heart of my heart," Komena murmured. "I believed in you then. I believe in you now. But this?"

She shook her head.

"Beautiful words, Catherine Foundling," she said. "Yet still only words. It was no kindness to any of us, letting you speak."

My hands shook. Gambled and lost. All of it. Akua stirred but I leant back against the pillar. Fighting was pointless. I'd asked for a leap of faith from the faithless and received the inevitable from that arrogant roll of the dice.

"Asked," I repeated in a murmur.

Hypocrite to end, was I? Demanding what I would not offer. Was compromise on my own terms even compromise at all, or just victory by another name? For all I'd said tonight, one thing had not changed: I had not learned to lose. I dragged myself up, biting my lip not to scream at the flare of pain.

"Hear me, Sve Noc," I said. "Whatever claim I yet hold to Winter, I pass to you. My crown of Moonless Night, I lay at your feet. I stand before you without power or right to my name, mortal at your mercy."

Two pairs of silver eyes widened. I could feel the crushing weight of them swelling, breaking the memory apart at the seams.

"Help me," I asked, begged, prayed. "Please."

Night fell over me and I breathed my last desperate breath, clawing at the dark.

---

Adrian V

So the only real thing we know for sure is that she is alive and better than before, but not how much power she has or how it will manifest, she probably is kind of like a glass canon, it would fit her i think since then she would have to think how to best use her power and have the juice to do things.

Another thing is that i read a few comments worrying about how we won't see the rest of the woe in a while but i doubt it will be like that, she may act as their Herald but she won't abandon her firends and people, and she won't just become their lackey, she would kill herself first xD

Aran

Did Akua just compliment Catherine? Awww.

EgoDucky

"Blood freely spilled always offers greater power, for it carries the worth of both the blood and the choice"

– Extract from "The Most Noble Art of Magic", by Dread Emperor Sorcerous

Sturmii

"Demanding what I would not offer. Was compromise on my own terms even compromise at all, or just victory by another name?"

Dafug Didn't she offer winter the hole time ?

Michael Sanders

She said she didn't want it back, because it had repeatedly bitten her. That wasn't the same as saying she wanted *them* to have it, which she has reason enough to believe will bite *everybody* even harder. But in order to quit clawing at each other and climb out of this bucket she's spent so much on painting into a metaphor, she can just. Give it to them. And not incidentally let it bite *them* for a while instead.

---

Chapter 82: Thrice Dead

"Now, luck it always turns. Nothing you can do about that. But that's the trick, you see – wait long enough, and it turns all the way around."

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful

The matron would be asleep by now, she'd hit the brandy pretty hard at dinner: this was as good an opportunity I'd get. I closed the book and snuffed out the stolen candle, ignoring Lydia's theatrical sigh of vindication. I wasn't sure whether she really had so delicate a constitution she couldn't handle a bit of light when she was trying to sleep or whether it was just our shared dislike coming to the fore, but I could hardly care less. She'd leaned not to rat me out after I smeared her sheets with fish guts, if all I had to deal with was a little attitude I'd cope. I passed an affectionate hand over the worn cover of Serapin's 'The Licerian Wars' and shoved it under my pillow, brushing away the few wax droppings on my sheets from the candle before stowing it away under my bed. One of my predecessors at the Laure House for Tragically Orphaned Girls had pried open room between the straw mattress and the wooden frame that was just large enough for it to fit. I slipped on my shoes and snuck out of the room, careful to close the door slowly enough the hinge wouldn't squeak.

The orphanage was dark – every lantern and candle snuffed out the moment the matron went to sleep, to cut on costs – but I knew my way well. It wasn't the first time I snuck out after curfew, though technically speaking I wouldn't even been leaving the House for long. The front door was locked, but only the youngest girls in here didn't know you could force the lock if you pushed at the right angle. I slipped into the street quiet as a mouse, closing the door behind me. I'd taken me a while to figure out how to get up to the roof, though it'd been made much easier after some stall merchant began putting up her folded stall next to the wall. She paid the matron coppers for it, which was a good deal as far as everyone was concerned. I suspected she might be less sanguine about the whole thing if she knew I regularly used her stall as a makeshift ladder. The tricky part was the leap to the left, where I had to catch the jutting masonry or hit the pavement after a hard fall. I turned out lucky tonight, catching it on first try even if my sweaty palms threatened to have me slip loose.

I hoisted myself over the edge of the roof with desperate haste, moist fingers scrabbling over the rough tiles as I rolled like a sack of cabbage until I was no longer at risk of falling. I remained there a moment, heart beating all too quickly, until I wiped my palms on my trousers and rose into a crouch. No point in standing tall – well, relatively speaking – until it was time. I headed towards the back of the orphanage, since that street wasn't as busy. Not that Laure was after dark, these days. The city guard in this part of the city had started grabbing people out after sunset and putting them in a cell overnight for their own 'safety'. It was an open secret a few silvers would get you out of the situation, which made the whole affair yet another tax in everything but name. Angry as the thought made me, Mazus and his cronies were far beyond my reach. And not why I was out tonight, regardless. I made it to the edge and stood up, clenching my fists. Gods, I was already shaking. I felt sick in my stomach and my legs were jelly. It wasn't even that tall a drop, I knew, and still somehow it felt like a knife at my throat.

"Your hands are trembling."

I yelped and jumped, would have fallen if the woman who'd spoken hadn't caught my wrist at the last moment. Whoever she was she was tall and slender, though in the dark I couldn't make out much of her face. Nothing, really, save for the eyes. A pale blue, almost silvery.

"I'm not a thief," I hastily told the stranger. "I live here!"

"So I assumed," the woman replied, and dragged me out of danger before withdrawing a few steps.

Shit, if this got out to the matron I was going to get it. Already I'd been caught trading essays with Julie, two strikes the same week would have my buttocks tanned for an hour.

"I don't think you're supposed to be up here either," I said. "So let's just call this a wash for the both us, right? I'll go, you'll go. Ships in the night."

"More ironic an offer than you know," the stranger replied. "Sate my curiosity first. You are obviously terrified of heights. Why do you seek out the edge?"

I grimaced.

"Look, it's not exactly illegal to do this," I defensively replied.

Maybe. I wasn't sure, and asking would have raised suspicions.

"I care little for such things," the woman said. "You were asked a question, Catherine Foundling."

Oh, this was bad. She knew my fucking name. It wasn't like there were a lot of Deoraithe bastards in the House if she'd been intending on tattling, but that she actually knew my name was a bad sign all around. My teeth clenched and I reluctantly gave ground.

"It's not about standing," I said. "It's about how long I can make myself stay."

"Yet your fear has not ended, has it?"

I shook my head.

"Maybe I'll always be afraid of it," I said. "But that's not what matters. Every time I come, I stay a little longer."

"It gets easier?" the woman curiously asked.

"No," I murmured. "But I get better at handling it. And one day I'll get good enough it won't matter if I'm afraid."

There was a long moment of silence between us.

"Nature is not so easily overcome," the stranger finally said.

I snorted.

"We're people, aren't we?" I said. "Not beasts. We can learn. It's just hard and unpleasant and never as clear-cut as we'd like."

"But will you?" the stranger asked.

—

Kilian was asleep. The public celebration after the Battle of Liesse had been subdued: there were too many dead people in the city for it to be otherwise. Heiress' devils had slain hundreds before a shouted technicality had turned them irrelevant. Still, in the camps outside the city the Fifteenth had raucously feasted its latest victory. My evening with my lover had been a different sort of celebration, though. I'd died today, and that had lent an urgency to our bedplay that was harsher than our usual fare. She'd understood, though, that it was as much about being alive as it was about pleasure. Kilian knew me better than most, and in ways not even my closest friends did. Still, after she fell asleep I'd remained restless. I padded barefoot away from our bed and poured myself a cup of Vale summer wine, the sweet taste filling my mouth. I nursed the same glass for the better part of an hour, seated by the window. The night was warm, for this time of the year, and in the distance I could see the campfires of my legion. The candles lit suddenly, and that was my only warning Kilian had awakened. She sat up in the bed, face shrouded by shadows and her body only half-covered by the sheets.

"Still awake?" she asked.

"Can't seem to close my eyes," I admitted. "I didn't mean to wake you."

"These things happen," she languidly shrugged.

For a moment, in the penumbra of the room, I thought her eyes were pale blue. It must have been a trick of the light.

"You died today," Kilian continued quietly. "A little restlessness is to be expected."

"All part of the plan," I ruefully said. "Try as I might, I couldn't find another way through."

"There were risks," she said. "If you had not succeeded as taking your resurrection from the Choir, there would have been no salvation."

"But I did," I replied, uneasily.

It had occurred to me that I'd not so much gamble with my life as thrown it away and then gambled on a resurrection. Recklessness ran in my veins, and in the heat of the moment it had all felt right, but in the cold light of the aftermath I was beginning to grasp how close I'd come to disaster.

"If you hadn't," Kilian softly asked, "would it have been worth it?"

I looked at her, blinking in surprise.

"If I'd failed?" I mused. "William would have turned us into Hashmallim puppets or Heiress would have killed everyone in the city. There was no room for mistakes."

"I misspoke," my lover said. "If it had all worked save for the resurrection, would that have been a fair price?"

It was, I thought, a sharp question but not an unworthy one. I'd schemed this with the notion in mind that I should be breathing by the end of it, but there would be fights ahead where I might not have that luxury. If the price for this had been that I'd disappear or return as some undead abomination, would I still have taken the bargain?

"There's about a hundred thousand people in Liesse," I eventually said. "More, with the soldiers that came to defend it. They'd be dead or worse, if I didn't take the bargain anyway."

"Cities can be rebuilt," Kilian said. "Fresh children are born with every heartbeat."

"But I only live once, is that it?" I smiled, looking out the window. "I appreciate the sentiment, I really do, but if all I wanted was to live I'd be a tradeswoman in Laure. Not the Squire."

"There is a middle ground," my lover chided, "between sacrifice and obscurity."

"By taking up the knife, I signed away that kind of thinking," I honestly replied. "The power's not the point, Kilian, it's just a way to handle the responsibilities. To take it but ignore why I did in the first place would make all of this meaningless."

"A fair price, then," Kilian mused, eyes hooded.

"Oh, the opposite of fair," I softly disagreed. "One life against a hundred thousand? That's a steal, by any account."

"I do wonder," she said, and I caught the glimmer of silver in her eyes, "how many times a blade can go through the crucible before breaking."

—

"Victory should taste better than this," I said.

Akua's Folly lay before us in all its raging horror. Masego had warded the surroundings, but there was no hiding the mass of wights still haunting the ruins of Liesse. The bottle of aragh in my hand was no comfort, but at least it was something. Anything was better than stillness of the cold I'd used to forge myself anew. I held it up for Hakram to take, but he shook his head. He was impossibly hard to make it out in the dark of night, shrouded in a way my fae sight should have ignored. I was still new to this, though. There might be a trick to it. That I sometimes thought his eyes to be blue was evidence enough either the liquor had struck deep or I was using my not-eyes wrong.

"Two bottles are enough, I think," the orc mildly said.

"A hundred wouldn't be," I shrugged. "But two will have to do. Ratface only has so many on hand, and it will be weeks before we reach a city."

"We lingered here longer than I expected," Hakram agreed. "I would have thought the morning after your conversation with the Carrion Lord would see us march."

"There are still so many things to do," I said. "And it's only the start, isn't it?"

"You have the power to make changes now," the orc said. "Real changes. Necessary ones."

"Do I?" I said. "I could drown bastion in ice with a snap of my fingers, but what does that accomplish? So few of our problems can be solved with strength."

"Yet without it, we would have no right to change anything at all," Adjutant said.

"It's a pretty song," I said. "But it rings false. Having a mantle isn't power, Hakram. It's just a bigger hammer. Gods, I was taught by a man claiming only a speck of what I hold and he terrorized half the continent for decades."

"You are not him," the orc shrugged.

"No," I agreed in a murmur. "No I am not. He would have been appalled by the amount of shortcuts we're going to take."

"Results-"

"Will have diminishing returns," I interrupted. "We don't have the foundation. That's the part that will fuck us. And it's too late to raise it, so we'll have to rely on strength to keep it all together. That makes us fragile in a way I can do nothing about."

"I do not understand your meaning," the orc admitted.

I passed a hand through my hair, except Masego had told me it wasn't really hair anymore.

"The east and the west," I said. "Procer and Praes. The people at the top, they're not there just because they can swing a sword real hard, are they? Malicia and Black won their civil war, but they haven't been knifed since because they have support. That's where their power springs from. Cordelia Hasenbach has troubles with her princes, sure, but she's also got a coalition behind her. The weight of customs and laws. Legitimacy, in a word. They all rose up the hard way."

"So did we," Adjutant replied, cocking his head to the side with eerie grace.

I snorted.

"Who's behind us, Hakram?" I said "A handful of Callowan nobles, half-heartedly and for lack of better options. Our army. Malicia will turn on us soon enough, and Black's in the wind. We took too many shortcuts."

"Your reputation has weight with the people," the orc said.

"That's not stable," I said. "Because if a Fairfax makes an unpopular decision, they're still a Fairfax. There's unrest, but it holds together. I'm a godsdamned warlord. I mean, Hasenbach outright told me didn't she? No one wants to deal with me because I'm essentially a Callowan Dread Empress in their eyes. This is the very thing that'll come around to bite us after the Battle of the Camps: if fear and force and reputation are the pillars of my reign, the moment one of them comes tumbling down it all follows. And instead of recognizing that, admitting my limitations, I'll double down and head for Keter of all places."

"Tyrants are rulers as well, Catherine," Hakram reminded me.

"And tyranny is the best I can manage, isn't it?" I said. "Well-meaning, but still that. The thing is, by now I know I'm not good at this. I could barely handle the Ruling Council when it was stacked in my favour with Black standing behind me. And still a month from now I'm going to put on a crown."

Hakram looked surprised at my words, for some reason.

"You would surrender authority entirely, then?" he asked.

"I should never have been queen," I said. "At most a temporary regent while looking for a better candidate. There are things I'm good at, but ruling isn't one of them. I should have put my effort to those instead and left the crown to someone suited for it."

"And what it is that you're good at, if not this?" Hakram pressed.

"Breaking things," I said. "Facing the monsters so that the real work can take place behind me. I should have talked with Cordelia, I-"

My fingers clenched around the bottle.

"- I haven't talked with Cordelia at all," I said. "Not yet."

"No," Hakram said in someone else's voice, "you had not."

—

There were some who might have called this a triumph.

It'd been a victory beyond my rights to expect, anyway. Legions of enemy drow, some of the finest Mighty in the Everdark and even the two-faced goddess herself: they had come, and they had died. Great Strycht had died with them, along with too many drow to count. How many of the corpses down below belonged to nisi, I wondered? There were too many dead for most of them to be Mighty, or even dzulu. The way I'd killed Sve Noc... I frowned, unable to remember the details. I must still be digesting the Night, it would take some time before my mind was in order again. Still, the aftermath was clear enough. Streaks of Winter still running wild through a city older than the kingdom of my birth, warbands of roving blue-eyed dead led by my expanded Peerage stamping down the last of the resistance. I had exactly what I'd come for, didn't I? An entire race made into an army, or close enough. All it had taken was massacre upon massacre upon massacre. If there was any justice in the world my hands would dyed scarlet red, but when had justice last made itself heard? No, down here there was only us – and justice was whatever we said it was.

Archer's steps were light, but not so light that I did not hear or recognize them. Her gait was well-known to me. She stood at the edge by my side, not deigning to sit with her legs dangling in the void like I did. To think I'd been afraid of heights, once. Now I could grow wings with the slightest exertion of will – and there would be more tricks, when the whole of the Night was known to me. Millennia of slaughter in the dark, every ugly parcel made my own. I'd gained more than mere troops by coming to the Everdark.

"Still brooding, I see," Indrani said.

I did not turn to meet her gaze.

"Contemplating consequences," I said. "This was no small thing we did today."

"That's always the way," Indrani dismissed. "There's only one question that matters – now what?"

"Now they take the oaths," I said. "The Mighty, anyway. I'm still debating how many of the dzulu should."

"And we go home," she wistfully said.

"No," I replied, shaking my head. "I made them my responsibility, 'Drani. All of them. I can't just take my army and leave the rest to die by dwarf."

"They can't go to Callow, Catherine," Indrani said. "It would end the kingdom to have that many foreign settlers."

"That was never the plan," I snorted. "Gods, Callow? It can barely even tolerate Praesi and greenskins that fought three campaigns to defend it. No, they need a home of their own."

"Where?" Archer asked, and I raised an eyebrow at her voice.

It had echoed strangely. There were old magics in this place I had barely begun to understand – and perhaps never would.

"If we leave them in the mountains above this, they'll starve," I said. "You saw how they feed themselves – they need lakes, they need fields."

"The Principate of Procer," Indrani said. "That'll be difficult. How much of it could you even take, reasonably?"

"Are you drunk already?" I frowned. "Procer, you tart. And that's a recipe for disaster, anyway. They'd be in constant war with the surviving princes, assuming the additional chaos doesn't just collapse the place and allow the Dead King to roll through it. No, there's only one place that can really work. If we play it right, we can even get most the continent to back us in the war."

"Praes," Archer guessed.

"Keter," I contradicted. "The Kingdom of the Dead."

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"That was in poor taste," Indrani said.

"Think for a moment," I said. "Neshamah just declared war on every Good nation on this continent. Even if the Grand Alliance could beat him – which, to be honest, I have my doubts about – Procer pretty much ends as a nation from the beating it'll take in the process. And even if they do drive him back, as long as he's not permanently dead what was accomplished? He'll have lost a few dead heroes, a few undead armies. Nothing he can't grow back given long enough. But this? It offers Cordelia another way. A long-term solution."

I breathed out slowly.

"If the drow settle in the Kingdom of the Dead, they can be the lid on the bottle of awful that is the Dead King," I said. "With the oaths, Procer doesn't have to worry about invasion from the fresh Evil nation at its northern border. And if the drow thrive? All the better. A stronger cork means Neshamah will never be able to get out. Sold like this, if we come to the Grand Alliance when they've grown desperate? They'll sign. Or they'll split, because I don't see the First Prince throwing away half her country no matter what her allies say."

"It is a blighted, poisonous wasteland," Indrani said.

"We have Hierophant," I flatly said. "And the same mages that burned a fucking pass through the Whitecaps. The whole priesthood of the west, too. Hells, we do this the right way we might even get most the heroes on board. There have to be a few of them that aren't useless at everything but killing. We can make the place livable, there's no doubt. Besides, we camped up north and the land there was fine. It's mostly the south and centre that are poisonous. "

"But first we go to war," Archer said.

"As little as we can," I said. "We gate in, bring Black home no matter what he's up to or wants – this is too delicate a situation to let him meddle. Then I go to Hasenbach with the Accords and the settlement plan. I'd rather not twist her arm if I can avoid, but I'll sack cities if I have to. And after that, we make war on the King of Death. All the continent, if we can manage it, against Neshamah."

"Ambitious," Indrani mused.

I paused and turned.

"You're not Archer," I said. "She would have gotten bored halfway through that."

"No," Andronike said. "We are not."

The two of them were standing at the edge, looking down at my... dream? Was I dreaming? I couldn't remember going to sleep. The last thing I could remember, actually, was – Ibreathedmydesperatelastbreathclawingatthedark. I shivered. Night had fallen.

"Am I dead?" I softly asked.

"At the threshold," Komena said. "Not quite through."

"Then this was my last conversation," I said. "Would have mouthed off more if I'd known."

"Are you not going to beg?" Andronike said.

I laughed.

"Again?" I said. "The first time didn't work, why would the second?"

"The nerezim are on the march," Komena said. "You struck bargain with them."

"I did," I agreed. "Not that the oath would hold me anymore. We saw to that."

"They cannot be defeated in battle," the younger Sve Noc said. "We have seen this. They have... grown in the years since our last wars. Beyond even our ability."

"Scary talk, coming from a goddess," I murmured.

"And how would you meet this threat, Catherine Foundling?" Andronike asked.

I blinked.

"Me?" I said. "Who would you care what I think? You two rascallions eviscerate me and took my stuff without too much trouble, give or take a few pleas."

"You have proved to possess a form of low cunning," Komena said.

"I'm dying, you know," I chided. "You could at least be nice about it."

"You evade," Andronike said. "Cease."

I waved a careless hand.

"Send an envoy to them," I said. "My read on their whole invasion thing is that they're not really interested in your holdings so much as they are in you not being there to trouble their backs. It's the Dead King they want bottled up."

Two pairs of silvery blue eyes remained fixed on me.

"Make a pact," I said. "They give you long enough to evacuate, supplies to survive upstairs for a few months, and in exchange you go after the Kingdom of the Dead. Given that kind of an opportunity, they might even make a grab for the underground of Keter."

"They have not proved amenable to peace offerings before," Andronike said. "Attempts were made, I assure you."

"Because they can't settle the entire rim around the Kingdom of the Dead if there's a chance their lines will collapse because you hit their back," I pointed out. "If you go upstairs and southwest, not only is that threat gone but you've become their first line of defence against the Serenity. I don't care how much they hate you, they'll want to take that deal."

They kept staring at me in silence.

"Dangerous," Andronike said.

"Bold," Komena disagreed. "Unorthodox. She was right, heart of my heart. We have grown stiff."

"And it will get worse," her sister murmured.

I rose to my feet.

"I take it this the end, then," I said, looking up at the darkness above us. "Will you make it painless?"

"You should know better by now," Komena idly said, circling around me.

"We have a use for you, Catherine Foundling," Andronike continued, from the other side.

"If we are to return to the Burning Lands, we will need a guide."

"A herald."

"An anchor."

"You offered an act of faith, Losara," Sve Noc smiled. "It did not go unheard."

Their eyes burned pale blue, almost silver.

"Rise, first among the priesthood of Night, and wake up."

—

I opened my eyes, shivering with pain and gloriously mortal.

---

Tab

This chapter more makes up for how directionless the last few chapters imo. Excited to see where it goes from here.

Abox

Am I understanding this correctly: Catherine loses, dies, and is resurrected as a new, mortal 'Sve Noc' while the old Sve Noc ascends to godhood?

Liliet

A slight terminology correction: Sve Noc does not translate to Priestess of Night directly, so Cat won't be gaining that particular title.

She's going to be the new Priestess of Night now, though, yes

Stephen M (Ethesis).

Really enjoyed this.

So there c

Zim the Vixen

Prediction before the next chapter is posted:

Cat is going to act as herald for peace with the dwarves as her first task in the capacity as priestess of Night.

Liliet

You called it!

Zim the Vixen

Ahaha, yeah! :3 It wasn't the most impressive prediction, but I am happy with it.

Galvador

Damn i love this series.

Mental Mouse

On a reread, I noticed an interesting bit at Cat's last rebirth: When Winter replaced her heart, he specifically said: "The Court of Winter receives you as one of its own, 'till your last desperate breath clawing at the dark". Well, now.

therealgridlock

Almost like the fae could see the future by knowing the past.

They're story incarnate, why wouldn't they already have the end written?

After all, they were annoyed because there was no uncertainty for them.

Figerally

Kinda disappointed Cat didn't come out of the Everdark at the head of an army of quasi Named. Would have loved to see everyone's surprised Pikachu face at what they had wrought backing Cat into a corner. But interested in seeing where her new lease on life takes her.

btnerb

At times, Cat is accidentally prophetic. From book 3 chapter 19, musing about what the eff the winter king had done to her soul:

"That kind of a gain never came without a cost, and I wasn't sure what I'd be paying with. If I ended up losing my soul because of fae shenanigans, I was going to be pissed. I just knew that stealing it back would be horrendously difficult, and I didn't have the time to spare to murder my way back into a semblance of humanity with all the other things going on."

---

Interlude: Triptych

"Only one kind of war is ever just, that which is waged on the Enemy."

– Extract from 'The Faith of Crowns', by Sister Salienta

Harbour duty was the worst, always had been.

Ines had blown three months' pay on the warmest cloak that could be found at market and still she was shivering like a dying calf. The prince had spread talk through the city that with the Kingdom of the Dead stirring awake those soldiers who guarded the harbour would see better pay, but like most princely promises it had come to nothing. Rumour had it the coin had gone into buying the service of every fantassin company left in the north instead, and much as she hated freezing by the docks Ines had to admit it might have been better investment. The Princess of Hainaut was doing the same, it was said, and the mercenary leanings of the fantassins had turned the whole affair into some sordid bidding war. Still, better to be here at home than to have gone south as some of the prince's soldiers had. What word had come back from the crusade's foray into the Kingdom of Callow was the stuff of nightmares. Strange devils riding to slaughter in the night, an endless horde of orcs and heretics that at the corpses of the fallen. Some more fanciful tales as well, of the Black Queen bringing down the sky on the head of the crusaders and making a lake of their blood. Whatever the truth of it, none of those who'd gone south had returned.

For once, she thought, being fresh to the prince's service had been of some use. It also meant Ines was inevitably handed down the shit duties by her careerist noble officers, but cold fingers were better than the grave. She put a spring to her step after clearing Gertrude's Tongue, hurrying towards the bonfire that awaited near the customs house. There she took off her leather gloves and pressed her palms close to the bronze bowl holding the flames, sighing at the warmth seeping into her bones. The pike she'd left to lean against her should have never seen use out of the training yard, and if the Heavens smiled on her it never would. Still, the silence of the night unsettled her. The winds that'd turned her earlier round into a ghastly affair had since died, leaving behind only eerie stillness. Cleves Harbour was lethargic on the best of days, the sporadic ship trade with Bremen and Lyonis the affair only of the prince and the very rich, but now even the fishermen had left. That lot had better read on what took place beneath the waters of the Tomb than anyone else, it was said. Those among them that did not learn to listen to the sound of danger were dragged into the depths by the foul creatures that were the only true rulers of the lake.

Some nights, Ines wondered why the prince even bothered to assign guards to the harbour. Empty as it was, even if some dead mean took it that would be no great loss. The royals who'd founded Cleves had been a farsighted lot: the harbour was not connected to the capital proper. The thin stripe of docks and shore was walled with an eye at keeping the enemy inside, not out, an unspoken admission that if the Dead King raided past the lake there would be no holding it against the Hidden Horror's armies. The slope descending to the shore meant Ines could not even catch a glimpse of Cleves itself from where she now stood, not behind those tall walls, but that part she hardly minded. It would be the hour-long walk back to the barrack of the capital she was not looking forward to, especially since some enterprising noble lad had decided that the length of that trip should no longer be counted as part of guard duty's duration. Ines' only comfort was that if the fucking dead actually showed up, that prick was bound to end up on the bad side of an unfortunate crossbow accident. The lad should have worried less about getting commendations from up high and more about the many people in charge of sharp objects he'd made enemies of.

With an aggrieved sigh Ines put her gloves back on. She'd lingered around the fire as much as she could justify, if the next guard came up while she was still here she'd end up with another black mark on her record. Merciful Gods, though, it was a cold night. And not even winter solstice yet, it'd only get worse. She glanced to the side and upwards, at the slender tower overlooking the waters. She didn't know who Mikhail had paid off to get that particular cushy duty – the guard tower had a bonfire up top, and a seat – but the man could certainly afford it. The Lycaonese immigrant ran a little business on the side, providing hard drink warming the bones to the guards that could afford it. Ines had always disdained the practice, but the thought of the long walk back to the city after her duty had her reconsidering for tonight. Once wasn't going to hurt anyone, was it?

"You still up here, you filthy Bremen throwback?" she called out.

No answer. He must have been indulging in his own wares, which was bold of him. There were only so many times he could bribe his way out of the trouble that'd come down on his head if he was caught. Taking her pike in hand, Ines decided against taking the lack of answer as a sign from Above. The thought of a warm belly had grown on her with the consideration. She strode to the bottom of the tower, finding the door ajar. Sloppy of him, she frowned, even if he was drunk. The twisting stairs leading up to the top were just a brisk walk, but when she came there a cold seized her that the fire could do nothing about. Sergeant Mikhail was there:

throat opened, blood all over his mail. Oh Gods, she thought. We're under attack. She would have rung the bell the tower had been equipped with for this very reason, but the bloody thing was gone. Ripped off the metal hinges that had held it up. She leaned over the edge, casting her voice.

"Attack," she screamed. "We're under attack!"

There was no answer. She wasn't loud enough, that was why they had the damned bells in the first place. For all she knew, she was the only soldier in the harbour left alive. That would make it her duty to run back to the city, wouldn't it? So that they were warned. It wasn't abandoning her fellows, it was doing her duty. Her hands trembled around the shaft of the pike.

"Damn it," she whispered. "Damn it."

She ran back down the stairs, heading for the nearest tower. There were ten in the harbour, they couldn't have castrated all of them unseen. Her old boots slipped against the frost and she fell, but she grit her teeth and picked up her pike before picking herself up with it. Dodderer's Height wasn't far, and as the largest of the towers it'd have fielded more than a single sentinel. Old, fat ones on the edge of retiring from service but there was strength in numbers. She made it past the jutting empty warehouse that was the Prince of Cleves' personal property and cleared the corner before she saw it. Five corpses, tossed down from the tower onto the pavement below. She glanced up, eyes squinting in the dark, but thank the Gods the bell was still there. Whoever'd done this had not yet ripped it out. Whoever had done this was likely still here, she then thought. Gloved fingers tightened around her pike, she grit her teeth and ran once more. Her attention had been on the tower, though. That was why she missed it.

The undead climbed out of the lakewater, glistening wet under starlight. Rivulets dripped down the bare skull under the ancient helm and it advanced without a word. Ines yelled out in fear, but she'd trained. Feet wide but steady, she struck out with her pike. It pierced through the rusty mail, going straight into the body, and for a moment she tasted triumph. Then the dead thing began pushing towards her through, embracing the impalement. She dropped the pike in ear, immediately cursing herself for it. But it was slower than her, she realized, so she ran for the tower instead of fighting. All she needed was to ring the bell. The door was ajar, she saw, and she slowed to avoid slipping on a patch of ice. Just in time to watch a pair of armoured skeletons walk out of the tower, swords in hand. Blocking the entrance.

"No," she hissed.

What could she do? She didn't even have a — the two undead were smashed to pieces by the same swing of a silvery sword. There was a man, tanned and wearing plate, who casually brought down a steel-clad boot to smash one of the skulls. The undead she'd fled from was tossed back into the lake by some giant shadow moving quick as lightning. For a moment Ines thought she glimpsed fur and fangs, but what wolf could possibly be so large?

"Ring the bell, soldier," the man in plate said.

His eyes were wreathed with light, she saw as she faced him. No, with Light.

"Chosen," she croaked out.

"Go," he said. "Your courage tonight did not go unnoticed."

"They're all over the place," Ines said. "If they're here-"

"Cleves," a woman's voice said, "does not stand alone."

A face of painted stone over a cloak, long tresses swinging behind. Another favoured child of the Heavens, she would put her hand to fire over it.

"It will be a long night," the first Chosen said. "A long month after it, until Malanza arrives. But we will hold."

"Ring the bell, soldier," the masked Chosen said. "We will guard you. Tonight, the Dead King learns that dawn is not so easily snuffed out."

Ines straightened her back. She was no proud Lycaonese, to find glory in dying spitting in the Enemy's eye. Just some fool girl someone had shoved a pike in the hands of. But she'd been born in Cleves. The principality of her birth was a bloody mess, and she thought little of the man who ruled it, but that wasn't the point. It was her home. This was Procer. They could lose to princes and princesses, they could lose to Arlesites and Lycaonese, but she'd be damned before a fucking undead abomination flew its banner over the city.

She took up a sword from a corpse and climbed to ring the bell.

—

Balasi was allowed into the tent by the sentinels without so much as a second glance.

It still surprised him, this. Had he tried the same with his lover's rooms in Nenli he would have been met at sword point and taken to the city square for a public flogging. Here, though, the campaign had made the king's laws grow lax. He might not be consort in name, but he was in deed and the soldiers acted accordingly. The seeker of deeds had since grown to suspect that this was one of the reason why Sargon had come forward to claim command over the Fourteenth Expansion. Back home their love would always be an illegal mismatch, but so far away from the Kingdom Under the rules had thinned. Sargon was not sleeping, as it happened. The Herald of the Deeps sat still as stone with his eyes closed as he sought council with the spirits bound to his staff. The Souls of Fire were known to hold wisdom, though a kind narrow in scope. Were they too clever the Kings Under the Mountains would have slaughtered them all, not bound them to the great forges. There would be need to dig deep again, after this land was claimed, to feed the fresh forges being raised. Many spirits would still lie asleep in their beds of molten rock, unknown to the kraksun.

"Delein," Balasi quietly said. "There is need of you."

Sargon's eyes fluttered open.

"Balasi," he murmured. "I was far gone, this time. What ails you?"

"Not me," he replied. "All of us. And if that vein is true or hollow has yet to be known."

"Speak," the Herald of the Deeps frowned.

"Our borrowed knife has returned," the dwarf said. "And would now speak with you."

Sargon's beard twitched in surprise.

"The Gloom still stands," he said. "She cannot have been victorious. Are we certain it is the human, and not simply a Night-thing wearing her?"

"I laid eyes on her myself," Balasi said. "She was stripped of power, but it is her. Unmistakeably."

"And the cold spirit?" Sargon asked, leaning forward.

The seeker of deeds resisted the urge to roll his eyes. His lover had fancied the thing since their first meeting, considering adding it to his staff should the human queen be broken. Sargon had mastered the Greed in most aspects of his life, but not this: any interesting creature he encountered he desired for his staff of office.

"Changed, yet still existing," he replied. "You can look upon it yourself when speaking with the human."

"She is not that," the Herald of the Deeps said. "You know this."

"Was not, perhaps," Balasi conceded. "I am no longer certain of that old truth."

That piqued his lover's interest, as he'd intended, and Sargon merely put on a coat before they made their way out. Officer had been ordered to settle the human and her spirit until they were ready to be met, and the two dwarves found them awaiting patiently by a low table. Black kasi had been served, and the Queen of Callow was drinking from her cup with a broad grin. Hairless of the face like so many of her kind, some feeble thing grown even feebler since their last meeting. It had not escaped his notice that she sat in a way that took the weight off one of her legs, as if it were wounded. Or that she'd limped visibly when coming to the camp. The spirit stood behind her, dark and silent. Its face had changed, grown more human. Scarlet eyes had become golden, though no less watchful for it. Sargon's eyes lingered on it with interest, ever eager to get his hands on fresh curiosities.

"Herald," the human said, inclining her head in shallow respect. "Seeker. Good to see you again."

Balasi stood as Sargon sat across the table, only then doing the same. A mere seeker of deeds could not be seated at the same time as the Herald of the Deeps, he thought, bitterness so old and worn it was hardly even that anymore.

"You surprise me, Queen Catherine," Sargon said. "I had not thought we would meet again until our bargain was fulfilled."

And such an advantageous one it had been, Balasi thought. A paltry quantity of gold and a temporary cessation of arms sales to a few human nations, in exchange for a sword pointed at the heart of the Night. Sargon had struck it most willingly, knowing that even if defeated the human would drag many kraksun down with her.

"That still holds," the human idly replied. "I'm here to settle some details, as it happens. The Gloom could be gone by the end of this conversation, if it is fruitful."

The dwarf's brow twitched. A bold claim, this. Sve Noc still lived, this was known. Was the human claiming she had bound the old monster to her will?

"Details," Sargon repeated. "Such as?"

"An offer might be more accurate," the human mused. "Sve Noc is willing to cede her current territory to the Kingdom Under, but concessions will have to be made."

Balasi smoothly reached for the blade at his side. He'd let down his guard, when sensing the queen had been stripped of her power. Where before she had been an oppressive presence without even moving a finger, she now felt light as a feather. Nothing more than a mortal, he'd thought. So why do you feel more dangerous now than you did before, human?

"You were turned," he said. "Made into their creature."

The queen made that strange human sound of derision, all nose and doubt.

"I'm really more of an advisor," she said. "We came to an arrangement, that's all. Trust was extended, and part of that is letting me speak for them when it comes to you fine folk."

"You no longer hold power," the Herald of the Deeps said.

"I wield it instead," the human said. "That's quite enough, as far as I'm concerned."

"You fed your purpose to them," Sargon said, openly appalled.

"Purpose was shared," Queen Catherine corrected. "As I would now share a proposition with you."

"There can be no truce with the Night," Balasi said.

"The Night is dead," the human said. "At least the way you knew it. And I am here to speak diplomacy, not theology."

"And what terms," Sargon scoffed, "would Sve Noc speak?"

She took out her pipe, taking her time to fill it with herbs. Snapping her wrist, she produced dark flames from the tip of her fingers to light it. It did not feel like sorcery to Balasi's senses, and this was worrying. She puffed at the dragonbone – what a waste, he still thought, to make a pipe of that – and blew out a stream of smoke.

"Would you like," Catherine Foundling cheerfully asked, "to make your two biggest problems go at war with each other?"

There was a moment of silence.

"I am listening," the Herald of the Deeps said.

—

Friedrich Papenheim might have been a prince, in another life.

Of those who had both the name and the blood, he was the closest relation to the Iron Prince. He'd served as a trusted lieutenant to Klaus Papenheim for decades as a steward and commander, and few others were as high in the man's council as he. But Old Klaus had made it known he intended to pass on Hannoven to his niece when he died, to make the principality as one with her own. Friedrich had resented this, on occasion, though always half-heartedly. It was hard to be truly bitter when one lost one's inheritance to the likes of Cordelia Hasenbach. The first Lycaonese to ever rise as First Prince of Procer, the iron-willed daughter of the ancient lines of Papenheim and Hasenbach who'd made the entire south submit to her rule. No, if he was to be royalty but not prince there was none other he'd rather lose the throne to. It would be in good hands, when the time came. Tonight, though? Tonight Hannoven was in his own hands, and it was burning.

He'd kept to the old ways. As soon as it was known that the Dead King was stirring he'd expelled every southerner from the city and hung those that refused the order. Every village and town in sight of the waters had been emptied, the spring armories had been opened and the war horns sounded. Every man and woman of fighting age in the principality had been called to serve, to uphold the old oaths. The whispers had passed from mouth to ear, spreading across all of Hannoven. The dead are coming. Belt your swords, put on your armour, send your children south. The dead are coming. He'd never been half as proud to be Lycaonese as when he'd watched the full muster of his people spread out like a sea of steel beneath the walls of the city. The watchtowers by the Grave had found the Dead King's host as it crossed, marching under the dark waters with the inevitability of an arrow in flight, but he was no fool to give the horde battle on open field. There could be no victory when every one of your dead turned to the service of the Enemy.

He'd sent riders to the other principalities, Rhenia and Bremen and Neustria. He trusted no sorcery to carry the word when the Hidden Horror itself strode the field. The allies of Hannoven were of the old blood too, and they'd smelled the death on the wind: they would not be caught with their trousers around their ankles like some goat-fucking Alamans. Their armies would already be assembled, and the moment the message arrived they'd sound their war horns to send for full service. But it would be weeks, months before the first reinforcements arrived. The city of his birth was a fortress like few others, but it would not hold forever. And so he'd made the cold choice, as he had been taught from the cradle. Those unfit to fight had begun the march for Bremen with everything they could carry. With them had gone half the muster of Hannoven. He'd sent the young, the skilled, the promising. The future of his principality. With him Friedrich had kept old soldiers past their prime, the greybeards and whitehairs who did not know whether it was winter cold or rattling fang that would slay them. And with those he had fought for Hannoven.

Fifteen thousand against the legions dark and darkly led. They taught the Dead King what kind of people got to grow old in these lands. The first wall they lost on the first day, and retreated after setting the houses aflame. They held the second wall for a week, until the dead sent a flock of winged drakes aflight. Wall by wall they have ground, but never without making the Enemy pay for it. The longer they held the longer the rest of the Lycaonese had to gather their armies, the longer the people of Hannoven could flee without pursuit. They fought for a month and seven nights, dying in the snow as a sea of dead lapped at the walls. Hundreds of thousands, centuries of corpses marching to bring death to all the world. In the end it came down to the Old Fortress, the solitary mountain that had been turned into a castle jutting out from the plains. The dead never paused in the assault, never tired: day and night they came in silent assault, the banner of the Dead King flying tall behind them. It mattered not, for behind Friedrich the banner of Hannoven flew. A single soldier on the wall, grey on blue. Beneath was writ the words thrown in the Enemy's teeth since time immemorial: And Yet We Stand.

So they stood, and so they died.

Ground away into nothing by numbers and sorcery their few mages could not match. Dead things that had once been Chosen climbed the walls, the sky grew dark with falling of arrows and behind them drakes stolen from the grave spewed out clouds of poison that burned lungs and skin. Less than a thousand of them left now, and most of them wounded. They'd retreated to the Crown, the very highest point of the fortress that could only be accessed by a few narrow paths filled with murderholes. The dead had been met with streams of burning coals and thrown oil, dwarven engines roaring destruction down passages where there could be had no cover. The Chosen dead pushed through, after the horde withdrew, but they found the passages collapsing beneath them and spiked grids of steel awaiting them when they leapt. Now sorcerers that were little more than grinning skulls pounded away at the defences with foul magics, forcing the defenders to stay behind cover until the next wave of dead was ready for assault. Friedrich passed through the throng of wounded, clasp shoulders and trading grim boasts with what soldiers her had left.

Old men, old women. The last gasps of their generation, dying sword in hand. His eyes grew cloudy with pride. Death came to all, but tonight they would meet it as Lycaonese should. Holding the wall in the face of the Enemy, for the sake of all the world. Friedrich beard was already flecked with blood, and he dipped out of sight when he felt the cough came. It would not do for his soldiers to know he was dying. The wound he'd taken hammering a spike through the head of that last drake had only gotten worse. Poison, he suspected, though it made no difference. None of them would live to see dawn, poisoned or not. He wiped his lips clean of blood and returned to the battlements after the cough had passed. The pounding had stopped, he immediately noticed. The assault was coming. Captain Heiserech sought him out, her worn face seemingly amused.

"Commander," she saluted. "The skulls want to talk. They sent some kind of giant dead. Think it might be 'Ol Bones himself come to pay us a visit."

"Has he now?" Friedrich grinned. "Well, let us see what the Dead King has to say."

Maybe he'd ask for surrender. His people could certainly use the laugh. He wasn't sure who started. It could have been anyone, or half a dozen at the same time. Only a few voices, at first, but more joined until the stone shook with sound.

*"The moon rose, midnight eye
Serenaded by the owl's cry
In Hannover the arrows fly."*

The refrain came as a roar of defiance.

"Hold the wall, lest dawn fail."

Friedrich Papenheim strode to the very edge of the battlements, where the passages had been broken, and found a horror awaiting on the other side of the drop. It was large as three men, wearing plate of bronze and steel that had been nailed to its frame. Its face could not be glimpsed behind the great helm, but the eyes could. Sunken yellow things, glinting with power. That might be the old bastard himself in the flesh, Friedrich thought. The song echoes from behind him, slipping into the wind.

*"No southern song for your ear
No pretty lass or merry cheer
For you only night and spear."*

"A Papenheim," the Dead King mildly said. "I should have known. Your entire line is like a nail that refuses to be hammered."

Friedrich could not deny the sliver of pride he felt at that. He was dying, but he would stand straight in the face of the Enemy. Even if his lungs throbbed with pain.

"In the name of Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer and Warden of the West, I bid you to crawl back into the hole that spawned you," Friedrich said. "And to take your horde of damned with you, old thing."

"I rather missed this city," the Dead King said. "You make it harder to take every time, it keeps things interesting."

"And when we chase you back into the dark, claiming it back, we'll raise an eight wall," the Lycaonese replied with bared teeth. "On it will be written: here lie those who broke the back of the Enemy and stand those who will again."

*"Come rats and king of dead
Legions dark, and darkly led
What is a grave if not a bed?"*

"You fought well," the Hidden Horror said. "And so were owed the courtesy of this conversation. Should your soldiers wish to take their own lives instead of having them taken, I will allow them the right."

"So that we may rise whole in your service?" he laughed. "I think not. We'll burn, and you with us."

"Once wolves," the Dead King said, almost fondly, "always wolves. What soldiers you would have made, under my banner. Die proud, then, Papenheim. You were an irritation."

*"Quell the tremor in your hand
Keep to no fear of the damned
They came ere, and yet we stand."*

The aging soldier smiled.

"We'll be waiting for you at the passes, Dead King," he promised. "With a proper Lycaonese welcome."

"I would expect no less," the Hidden Horror said.

He turned his back on the Enemy and returned to stand with the last of his soldiers, the words in the wind guiding him home.

"So we'll hold the wall, Lest dawn fail."

When the light of day found Hannover, not a single living soul remained.

---

DroughtBringer

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote everyone! Or else I'll take your socks! (Please excuse the random threat)

SMHF

Exact 50/50 OMFG!XD

Weroxx

We overtook Ward in the Yearly vote count! Congratulations to everyone that contributed, and to EE. I just would like to let you know that you are awesome, and you make me a proud Patreon supporter!

erraticerrata

Final matchup, save for the bonus one: Cat vs Black. Link to vote below.

https://www.strawpoll.me/17029118?fbclid=IwAR2QkFHuV7fl82-793HAmpksBhnBARU8RR65I6c38jNilq0\_Bmse\_YgdtjM

Wry Warudo

This has been fun. We should do another bracket with Dread Emperors/Empresses, would be interesting to see who would win between Malicia and Triumphant, or between Irritant and Traitorous

SMHF

That's be a pain... first we gotta prove none of the other candidates are Traitorous in disguise!

Decius

Unmask them all, then you will discover that all of them are Traitorous no longer in disguise!

stevenneiman

Irritant is the one disguised as the real Traitorous. Traitorous let him after he offered to make the shoes for the other disguises.

Michael

This is the most beautiful comment I have ever seen.

stevenneiman

I would say historical figures in general. I'm pretty sure Irritant (or maybe Treacherous) would win though.

Liliet

Catherine had better win this but even if she doesn't, I'll know I cast my vote for her ♥

nick012000

Is this the last chapter of the book, then, other than the Epilogue?

Death Knight

Amadeus for the Win.

Djinn O'Cide

Got a link to the brackets somewhere?

James, Mostly Harmless

The bracket chart is at <http://www.bracketmaker.com/tmenu.cfm?tid=470805> .

tmeenaks

Wait, Robber lost? This is rigged. I thought the goblins were supposed to be the ones rigging this. Who rigged it so Robber would lose?

Dainpdf

So, the final bracket...?

It was always going to come down to this, of course. It is wonderfully close to tied, though.

stevenneiman

I had not expected that one to be this close. I guess Black has a bigger fanbase than I expected.

Letouriste

Fuck! So masego didn't do it?:/ black better to win this grrr

Liliet

He would have wanted Catherine to win

RanVor

It's quite ironic how Cat triumphs in the contest thanks to the opposite of her usual M0.

Gunslinger

EE how many chapters left in this book? Also when will the next book start?

Andrew Mitchell

Great update! 😊

DroughtBringer

trip·tych

/'triptik/Submit noun

a picture or relief carving on three panels, typically hinged together side by side and used as an altarpiece.

a set of three associated artistic, literary, or musical works intended to be appreciated together.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks. That's very appropriate for the chapter.

KageLupus

They are also typically tied together by a central theme, in a literal sense. The middle panel is the primary and the side panels are related to it in some manner.

In this chapter, the first scene is of Above sending Heroes out to fend off the Dead King's army. The last scene is Below triumphing against normal humans, and even though it is only briefly mentioned there are Named in that conflict as well.

The central scene is Cat negotiating with the Dwarves to fulfill her promise to Sve Noc. Assuming negotiations go well (and there is nothing to suggest they won't) then this is Cat fighting the Dead King at an oblique angle. The Drow become a beachhead on the surface and the Dwarves are able to fully contain him below ground.

Each scene is told from the perspective of a non-Named character and shows the different ways that the conflict with the Dead King is playing out. Cat represents a middle-ish ground between the other two scenes. The conflict is not direct and the side being represented is not clear cut. Cat might have snubbed Below by breaking their plan to create a new god, and in general by opposing Neshamah, but she is also still using that power to further her own ends. Just because it's filtered through Sve Noc now doesn't really change the overall source.

All in all, this was a really well done chapter. The triptych layout worked really good and there was a lot of ties between each scene. This might be one of my favorites interludes.

Darkening

Mm, I'm a sucker for a good last stand. Always fond of folks like the lycanese and the borderlanders from the wheel of time books. And now Cat has priestly powers and can wield dark miracles. Should be interesting to see the extent of that.

Andrew Mitchell

My prediction:

Cat can wield ALL the powers of Night (every single trick we've seen the Drow use, and more) but NONE of Winter. Akua will have all of the Winter power.

James, Mostly Harmless

Cat has truly become an Anti-Hero in power as well as in role. Like Heros, she now wields powers given to her by a Greater Being instead of having inherent powers.

Rook

The Night abilities I think will stay ill-defined enough to be something that matches the situation, as far as potency goes.

The amount of flexibility will be essentially infinite, with Sve Noc acting as an intermediary for the thousands of years of experience that Catherine is lacking; but how effective they are and what trick actually comes out will be whatever the story allows or requires at the time.

The smart thing to do here would be to gain familiarity with how wielding Night works but focus on playing the narrative game, the exact same way that the big name players like the Bard, Neshamah, Pilgrim, or Black are already doing. Theoretically whatever it is Catherine now wields through Sve Noc could topple mountains or fizzle against a fledgeling Hero that can only parrot one catchphrase. The key is whether she has enough weight to leverage it toward the former rather than the latter.

SilentWatcher

What has more narrative weight, a queen of winter or a slave of night?

Decius

Duchess of Moonless Nights, or High Priestess of Night?
Seems like a small upgrade to me.

Rook

Neither, titles mean shit

A two bit warlord of a backwater kingdom a thousand years too young to even be considered a threat to the big boys has little weight in the overall game being played by Above and Below

The lynchpin of a potential war against the dead king, involving every surface nation on Calernia, the dwarves, and the newest deity on the block has a massive amount of weight. Even more if she's actively rallying against the game Above/Below is playing with Sve Noc roped into her line of thinking, same way Hierarch gave the fucking bard a black eye by sheer force of principle as nothing more than a beggar.

She's monumentally more powerful and dangerous right now than before she shed the Winter mantle. The Herald has the right read of it

SilentWatcher

Its not Cat thats dangerous its Sve Noc. Cat points at a target, maybe Sve Noc will blast it, maybe she will not, maybe she will blast Cat because the target was shit. Maybe the Combination of Sve Noc and Cat will be surprising, but it still offends me that her significance got reduced to the "pointer" from the "mover" and within the woe from "strongest (maybe together with Masego) to again the pointer ( As she is not the glue of the woe, but Hakram, read extra Chapter Background. She is losing in significance.

SilentWatcher

I am rather curious, What will happen when Sve Noc gets affected by the Power you all thought Cat is affected by and just ignores Cats advice or does something different? Will you still be satisfied in her being mortal i wonder.

Liliet

She was always the pointer rather than the mover, ever since Black gave her a Legion. Hell, she always WANTED to be – she wanted to be the person to curtail abuses, not the person to rule.

I get what you find fascinating and interesting in fiction, but dude, you've picked a REALLY wrong character to look for that in.

SilentWatcher

No she was the right character until the last chapters totally spoiled it. She sacrificed to gain power and victories to change the system. She has all the power in the legion as they are under her command therefore an extension of her power. She was never a pointer because she had the power of the squire. Now she depends on sve noc for power and you people try to magically bullshit into a good thing for her.

SilentWatcher

And answer me this, does cat not need power to curtail abuses? She sold her soul to become a villain to have that power. If she just needed to point instead of juat beating everyone with a stick who disagreed why even become a villain? Why not rise through other means? Is curtailing abuses not a kind of ruling?

Liliet

She was going to rise through other means, then Black offered her a shortcut.

A curious quirk of Praesi political system is that getting a Name also gives you political power. Er, particularly if you're the apprentice and chosen successor to the second-in-command of the Empire, that definitely helps.

Either way, Cat didn't agree to Black's offer becuae of the ability to beat up people better than the Name offered, but for the place in the Imperial hierarchy that it would get her.

It was always about positioning, and never about personal power. That's more Akua's thing.

Liliet

Yeah, her relationship with the Legion was a lot more straightforward than the one with Sve Noc.

It's still an exploration of the same theme the whole series has: power given, gathering followers, obtaining trust and loyalty, working together with other people.

Literally the second chapter had a conversation between Black and Cat about ruling, and about how Black focused on making sure Callowans didn't actually have a reason to really dislike him.

Cat's greatest victories have always been diplomatic ones (recruiting Juniper, the Ruling Council, the story-driven bullshit that had her beat a demigod in a fight on his chosen grounds as a two-aspected Squire, the unification of Callow when she comes back and finds it on fire, recruiting the Duchy of Daoine to her side, the marriage of Summer and Winter, the northern Crusade, now this)

(No, Second Liesse doesn't really count as Cat's victory beyond all the prep she did for it, she followed Black's plan and even Akua comments that it was Black wielding Cat as a weapon that beat her, not Cat herself)

SilentWatcher

"Cats greatest victories have always been diplomatic ones" HAHAAHA you would call that diplomatic? With juniper she beat all other contenders with POWER. The ruling Council was founded by Blackmailing Highlords and it failed spectacularly. Beating the Duke of violent squalls to the Death? How is it not about Power and the application of it, but diplomacy? The reunification was done by force of arms (flaunting her POWER infront of kegan and the legion commanders) After seconds Liesse she scared Duchess Kegan to make a Deal, how is that diplomacy instead of POWER? Do you know what diplomacy means?

Liliet

"With juniper she beat all other contenders with POWER. "

I mean... no? It was an entire plot point how her company was objectively the weakest and she got to lv1 with Juniper by playing the rest against each other? Via diplomacy and intrigue and trickery?

And then she still did not have power to reliably beat Juniper, instead she exploited a loophole in the rules and her understanding of what Juniper wanted and her ability to give it to her. Which is also not POWER in the way you mean it because that ability 100% relied on Black allowing her to pick her own senior officers for her new legion.

Oh, the undead suicide goats made a difference and shored her up to prevent defeat. But diplomacy both got her /to/ that point and /from/ it.

"The reunification was done by force of arms (flaunting her POWER infront of kegan and the legion commanders)"

I'm thinking more of what she did in Laure, cleaning up and putting someone competent in charge and making sure there wouldn't be riots, and how it spiraled outwards. But with Kegan and Ranker too, she offered them something they both wanted (to Kegan, a passage to Liesse; to Ranker, handling the problem of Kegan). It mattered that she had power to offer said passage, but it mattered more that she figured out what Kegan wanted and acted on that realization to ally with her.

stevenneiman

No, Cat is definitely the glue that holds together the Woe. Just because Hakram felt it necessary to intimidate Vivi and later try to inspire her doesn't somehow make him the nexus of the team. If he was gone, Vivi would probably still be there. But if Cat was gone, Vivi would have cut her losses and either run or found another heroic band to join. And her having great personal power as the Sovereign of Moonless Night was actually the aberration, as she has otherwise spent every leg of the story with at most moderate power. Her two real advantages have always been competent people at her back (the Woe, the Fifteenth, and even a few members of the Queen's Men) and a knack for twisting stories and agendas to her advantage.

Also, I suspect that she's going to figure out some way to turn the new status as High Priestess of the Night to her advantage. I don't know how, but she convinced Sve Noc to inject pure plot into her veins and she has a history of turning the plot to her advantage.

SilentWatcher

No Cat gathered the woe but the Glue is Hakram it was written in the guide in Book 3 somewhere and no amount of bullshit interpretation from you will change that. Cat being the Sovereign was NECESSARY because her opponents had so much more power than her, it needed something to give her a chance. So according to your Logic its better to be a representative of an Empire then the most powerful of the Empire? If so is not the representative of the Dead King the strongest on this Continent? Whats his Name? Does he also have the magic power of BULLSHIT you bestow upon Cat?

Liliet

Either quote where it says in book 3 that Hakram is the glue of the Woe, or please stop repeating that assertion. It doesn't make any sense and doesn't do your arguments any favors.

stevenneiman

Aside from a handful of creative misuses of portals since taking the mantle, Cat has never won a fight she had a real chance of losing by means of personal power. Every other real victory has been through a combination of leadership, high-quality subordinates she can delegate to, her peculiar brand of diplomacy, and clever manipulation of the story and the opponent's objectives. And occasionally taking her opponents by what she's willing to do. In fact, power plays against her objectives.

It's no coincidence there's only one truly Evil being on Calernia who has both had that level vast, direct, personal power and survived for more than about 10 years, and he's considered the equal to the Bard in story-fu. And he was only able to pull that off because he avoided interference for long enough to set up a supportive society that even the most beloved rulers of the real world or the rest of Calernia could only dream of.

Liliet

Exactly!

Nauglith

Black had no titles or power beyond the few minor ones his Name gave him. It's what they represent that matters. Black represented the Dread Empire and leveraged that to punch above his weight. Cat now represents an Empire far more ancient and dangerous than Praes.

werafdsaew

She is not a slave; she can leave and stop using the Night/Winter anytime she wants. It's more like a worker/manager relationship. Yes she depends on Sve Noc for power, but Sve Noc also depends on her for direction.

SilentWatcher

Where is that written? Do you have access to future chapters or are you just having wishful thinking?

werafdsaew

You're the only one who interprets the story this way.

SilentWatcher

Look at the facts:

1. Cat is mortal again
2. Cat got resurrected by Sve Noc

3. Resurrections by any other then above have side effects like undeath
4. Cat needs Sve Noc for Power
5. Sve Noc has no reason to listen to Cat all these Points prove Cat is subservient to Sve Noc. How bad it is we wont know until future Chapters, but how do you prove your point? How can she just leave? how does cat just leaves :” hey you öhh i keep all the power and will use it later too, i got this shithole country callow to look for bye bye. ” Your wishful thinking clouds your mind. You dont want to acknowledge Cat got defeated.

Liliet

Cat did not strictly speaking get resurrected the way she did in First Liesse because according to what Sve Noc said last chapter, she never died all the way. Resurrections are the province of the Above, but healing is for everyone, as both Masego and the Legion regulations demonstrate. Sve Noc healed Cat back to full health as a normal mortal human being (who also now has a Name probably), not bound her to her service as an undead shade a la Akua.

Liliet

Sounds about right.

stevenneiman

Yeah. It was kinda coolbut also funny how Papenheim was all pride and defiance and the Dead King was just fondly complimenting the defenders of giving him a challenge. It fits with his earlier note that his favorite part of being summoned was the feeling of resistance in a world that he can't casually shape to his whims.

Matthew

Ok, Klaus Papenheim is excellent.

Darkening

That's not Klaus, he's off leading the armies in the south, this is some nephew or something of his.

danh3107

I suspected as much but this chapter made it a bit clearer, the dwarves are either mono gendered or so close in appearance between the two sexes that it doesn't matter. I mean of course the seeker and dwarf named could be gay, but I doubt it.

Also the Greed seems like their racial compulsion to steal, which seems vaguely familiar to the Orc's predatory instincts and berserker fury. There's some part of them that makes them lust for objects not their own.

Fascinating

Liliet

P sure these two are just gay.

erraticerrata

Yup.

danh3107

Well shit, there goes that theory.

werafdsaew

Interestingly only Good nations have issues with homosexuality. I guess Evil is progressive?

Adrian\_V

Nope, Callow was pretty open minded i think, although it may have to do with constantly being at war, made them pragmatic enough to adopt a live and let live mentality.

Darkening

I read the illegality of their relationship as more of a caste thing than a gender thing, especially with the line about how a seeker of deeds can't sit in the presence of a Herald of the Deeps.

Vhostym

I think it was deliberately ambiguous. I initially thought the same, but then realized the lack of specificity, which considering EE seems deliberate. Hopefully book 5 will have more about the dwarves.

Euodiachloris

I thought it pretty clear: it's a shockingly scandalous class disparity. Hop into bed with whatever gender you please, but make sure your official partner was born from the Right Sort of People!

Liliet

Good nations have issues with homosexuality???

erraticerrata

The issue isn't with the homosexuality (no one in the setting has that, really) it's a status thing. If you go back to the chapter where seekers of deeds were introduced, you'll actually get a pretty good idea as to why Balasi became one.

M0och

I am quite excited for the possibilities this plot twist opens up!

KageLupus

"I will murder every giant monster I can find, if it means we can be together."

That is godsdamned adorable

KageLupus

EE already confirmed it, but as an extra point to Good nations also not caring about stuff like that there is a throwaway line in one of Cordelia's interludes about how the main priest spy that she has is trans. The only comment that she makes on it even internally is that his face is more suited to a Simon than a Simone.

werafdsaew

In the Interlude Crusaders chapter Malanza had issue with Arnaud's proclivities:

I read that to mean that she, and Procer as a whole, was homophobic. But perhaps it is something else instead?

Liliet

Yeah no, that's definitely not about being gay 😞

The0thin

I believe that's meant to imply sexual assault/coercion.

stevenneiman

I'd sort of figured either something non-consensual, or bestiality. Certainly there's no compelling reason to believe that it's homosexuality considering how little evidence we've seen of homophobia elsewhere.

Javvies

I'd presumed it was implying tendencies towards pedophilia and/or other nonconsensual acts. Possibly other forms of sexual sadism.

IMO, bestiality would be considered distasteful and frowned upon, but probably not to the point of thinking the world would be better if he were castrated.

At any rate, I'm pretty sure Malanza's opinion wasn't based in homophobia, especially given her reaction to Cat calling her attractive, and the verbal sparring there where Cat ultimately responded to something Malanza said with something along the lines of having a firm rule against bedding people actively invading her country.

Liliet

They were, in fact, flirting.

stevenneiman

I don't actually recall anyone having hangups with sexuality or gender identity, and only the goblins so far seem notably sexist. I think that Named have a tendency to beat that particular brand of stupidity out of their respective peoples unless it's so ingrained that only one sex can have Names. I remember a discussion of one Dread Empress who literally fired a headmaster of the legion academy for refusing female students.

Liliet

She defenestrated him 😊

And then Black did that to his contemporary headmistress who refused to admit greenskin students, continuing the proud tradition ♥

stevenneiman

Ok, I remembered someone being executed for refusing female students and a headmaster getting lobbed from a catapult, I guess I must have forgot they were separate incidents. My point still stands, that it's hard to have a middle ground of sexism where a woman can become Dread Empress but can't do anything about sexism with their theoretically infinite authority.

Liliet

Yeah, Cat has explicitly talked about it ♥

luminiousblu

>but I doubt it.

Come on mate the number of homosexuals in this story already is pretty disproportionate compared to the number of canonical couples.

I'm almost at the point where anyone with a companion is assumed to be homosexual until proven otherwise.

Liliet

Or bisexual, or asexual...

luminiousblu

The only bisexual coming to mind is Catherine, who, uh, is basically an informed bisexual since all of her relationships and (save for a few offhanded lines about Ratface and Warlock's toned bodies and at some point boinking a fisherman) lust have been directed exclusively at major female characters. Sure, we're *told* she's bisexual but ehhhhhhhhhhhhhhhhhh

Asexuals don't count since I specified 'canonical couples', and asexuals don't have canonical couples more or less by definition.

Na

Er, isn't Masego/Archer kind of a thing?

Sex isn't mandatory for a romantic relationship to exist.

Liliet

Yep, they're definitely kind of a thing.

A very adorable thing that Catherine doesn't want to ruin, but I'm pretty sure a poly arrangement won't interfere with anything there ♥

(if you're reading this erratic please know i've been screaming about this and am incredibly grateful that you have a canon aro ace character in a relationship like this ;u;)

luminiousblu

Sexuality by definition refers to sexual attraction, not romantic attraction. It's right there in the name and trying to argue otherwise is disingenuous. Archer I guess you're right, she'll fuck anything that moves.

Liliet

Indrani is pansexual or bisexual in an absolutely canon way, too, though you're correct that only Catherine stood tall and actually clarified what she identified as

stevenneiman

Archer, Cat, and Akua (and Tikoloshe, more or less by definition) are confirmed bisexual, though for Akua it seems to be more about cultural norms than personal desires.

Aside from Masego, who's obviously asexual, and Wekesa and Malicia, who are confirmed to be strictly homosexual, it's hard to prove that any other character is only attracted to one gender rather than just never having an attraction to the other mentioned on-screen. It's also worth noting that the complaint about Cat being an informed bisexual is only referring to a sample size of two people she's actually slept with during the course of the story. She's mentioned being attracted to tons of other characters of both genders.

Liliet

I actually have a private theory that Akua might be aspec, aromantic and possibly asexual too, from how... mechanical her descriptions of her sexual conquests have been. "Enjoying sex without feeling any particular attraction to the partner" seems like a Her Thing.

Either way, she's not exclusively attracted to one gender, that's a fact.

Gunslinger

She's attracted to plots and power and that's about it

Liliet

She also has a strong platonic crush on Catherine... which is basically what you said exactly 😊

Deviant Loader

With so many people being homo or asexual in this story.

I am actually more surprised that their population was not declining when most people I have seen just adopted children instead.

(I am just joking btw, of course not everyone in the story is like that)

But seriously though, even for a story based world, orphans popping out of nowhere to be adopted seemed to be the staple for many couples there...

Anyway, despite the author's many takes and preferred biasness in this world's settings, many regarding races, gender and sexuality.

At least, the story was still enjoyable to read at times.

luminiousblu

There's no reason to hedge your words, it's really goddamn weird. I suppose the apparently widespread availability of healers significantly lowers the death toll from childhood disease but historically the reason (exclusive) homosexuality was looked down on was the fact that if you didn't have kids your tribe would go extinct.

Then again, the world is more or less willed into being by literal gods, and maybe a couple of the more powerful ones are homosexual so there we go.

Liliet

According to your logic, medieval monks and Catholic priests, who swore a vow of chastity and might have violated it a lot but definitely never were allowed to have a family and raise children, must have been the MOST stigmatized and ostracized people ever.

And yet.

308924810a

That was a political decision by the pope. The goal was to stop churches from being inherited along family lines and instead allow the central catholic organization to take all of them, without the negative PR that would come from confiscating them.

So they manufactured a religious reason to prevent priests from having heirs of their body, and another religious reason to argue that the property of religious officials who lack heirs of their body should pass to the church upon their death.

308924810a

Edit: all that said, it's implied that in this setting there are fewer practical barriers to homosexuality and reproduction, and that priests are able to produce a child by two women. The book of all things also seems to be in favor of gender equality and equality of those who are outside of the binary conception of gender.

I'd also be interested to know whether priests are capable of producing children between two men, or whether the lower death rate to disease in a setting with various types of caster is enough to ensure population growth continues even in the face of massive casualties among females, because something has to explain the total gender equality we see in combat roles, and something removing the risk of demographic collapse would go a long way towards thst.

Liliet

We have Word of God that in lower ranks, gender ratio isn't remotely as equal as among officers. Nobles don't generally need to worry about demographic collapse, no, and so in this setting younger daughters get offloaded into combat roles same as younger sons. Among commoners meanwhile, there genuinely ARE a lot fewer women in combat roles than men. It's just that those who do go there receive no less respect, for reasons that probably start with "magic", continue with "light" and culminate with "Named" lol

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

I share the sentiment.

I believe it's a testament to the quality of a story (or maybe that I personally just like the messages the author tries to convey 😊) when author's quirks don't make a negative impact..

Javvies

Hmmm.

An Interlude, but we did get to see more of what happened with Cat. And I'm still unsure about how I feel about her giving up Winter.

Interesting to see some of what the Dead King is up to.

Allafterme

To be fair, Night is more versatile than Winter & we still don't know how many traits the Night inherited from Winter...

Belac93

Sounds to me like she's just got a preference. Tons of bi people swing mostly one way or another.

stevenneiman

For me there's something of a sweet spot for the power level I can really enjoy a protagonist being at for a long time. Winter Cat was already pushing that, and she would have gone straight over into boring OP territory for me if she'd mastered Winter as it was implied she was going to.

I much prefer he being cut down a peg and trying to play matador with beings vastly more powerful than her.

IDKWhoitis

Man, Dead King is one of the classier villains that I appreciate. Like he knows what the answer will be, and he respects them. I'm half expecting him to start laughing when the Drow come out of the Underdark. He'll probably kill a hefty amount of them, but boy he is going to find that interesting. This invasion of the North is going just as I was imagining, with precision strikes carried out from recon carried out over centuries, massive numbers drowning the enemies, multi-frontal assaults all along the front. I'm kinda rooting for the Horror.

I'm left wondering how long until Cat gets back to Callow, or is she just going straight for Dead King?

IDKWhoitis

Wait, FUCK, Catherine learned Magic.

Like not standard magic, and maybe some variation of Named magic, but most importantly she admitted she can WIELD the Sves power. Like oh fuck. Alienation was the greatest limiter on her, and she just got rid of that.

The sheer amount of shenanigans she can now pull with a literal gods power without going all monologue-ly is just not ok. Like Black on steroids. The Gods Above are going to have a proper FIT when they see this shit on the field.

Liliet

Yep.

Catherine transitioning from god to priestess was a genius sidestep around her limitations.

SilentWatcher

No. She went from God to slave with no control over power. She already had a solution for the principle alienation, namely shunting it of to others. Principle alienation will still be a problem, because she only ever had these problems when using the power, not when simply possessing it. Indestructible construct body traded back for an aching leg and the euphoria when smoking a drug. Truly a good trade, with no negative consequences at all like saint cutting her head off in 1 second.

IDKWhoitis

It was no perfect solution to alienation, as there was an inherent bias at the core of Catherine, Duchess of Moonless Nights, who could not, would not, grow as a character. She became rigid (and in my opinion, whiny) about her beliefs, for pretty much all of book 4.

Like if you wanted to look at why I hated Book 4 so much, it was Winterized Cat meandering for 80 chapters with very little to show for it and ready to start (whining) monologuing about right and wrong and how she was shit. We only really progressed, in like 3 chapters at rapid pace, when Winter BROKE. Cat is at her best when she's flexible and more tricky than a fox, which she has regained. All that Power from winter would not matter if she got a sword to the back of the head next fight, and it's possible she would, because Cat would NEVER learn at the rate Winter was (limiting) powering her. She was frozen at a specific plot point in time, and was just thawed.

SilentWatcher

What did she do differently in this chapter? She is dealing again with the dwarfs with no idea about their culture and probably getting scammed again. She will continue to whine and complain about past decisions like she did since Book 1. It is part of her Character to reflect on her actions.

It's too early to say she is now trickier without the mantle, as we have seen no difference between Cat now and when she held the mantle. She just enjoys her pipe and has a hurting Leg. Is this a sign of being tricky? No.

The biggest Advantage from a Construct Body is NOT dying when she gets a sword to the back of the head. Now it's even more difficult with a garbage Mortal Body, no more Construct Senses, Reaction Time and Strength. Cat was learning the entire Time, how to fight better with her Powers and Construct Body and she would CERTAINLY become better, as an "Potential" immortal she has enough Time her slowed learning is not a big Problem. Now she is "thawed" and lost her Progress, her Power and has no more "Potential" Immortality (Considering being a villain gives Immortality, but it was her Construct Body which let her survive all her recent Battles). Good Job, now she learns probably more in 10 years than as an immortal in 100 years, but the probability that she will die in the short term is so much greater without being a construct.

d0m1n1c

We still don't know what she can do with Sve's Winter/Night hybrid.

If she can do even half of the stuff we saw the Mighty do with Night in addition to gating, then she's no weaker than she was before. Considering that all the oaths she took as Winter, I'd say she's far more free as Sve Noc's first priestess; Sve Noc is probably bound more by that, than Cat is, but we won't know for sure until the next book.

Liliet

Principle alienation is not a problem for priests using miracles of their deities. Miracles don't work the same way as directly using your own power. Catherine is as safe from this particular problem as Ashen Priestess was.

Also, remember how Catherine fed a fae their own fingers? That was fucking horrifying and tbh I've been strongly worried about Cat's slow slide down the slippery slope of cruelty and indifference. She was worried about it and she STILL did, because no mental double-checks really worked and Vivienne is actually ironically less idealistic&principled than she is and easily swayed by her charisma.

Winter!Cat was cheerily rolling towards disaster, while Priestess!Cat has an advantageous political position, no principle alienation and like the BIGGEST bragging rights (which matters in a narrative-driven universe)

SilentWatcher

Why was it horrifying? she made an example and she is a villain. what do you expect a pat on the wrist and dont do it again? I see no indication that being a priestess this story will be less a disaster wreck then when she held the mantle. How is she in an advantageous political position??? She is not even in the game anymore, because from being the power she became beholden to 2 dark, murderous goddesses of a traitorous race. Negotiations will be done with Sve Noc not with her. Should she use powers beyond what a mortal can wield, she will still experience principle alienation (thats the very definition). I think you guys misunderstood something heavily in thinking Cat gets Godlike powers without some drawback now she is mortal again. And what in Belows Name does she can brag about? She went and Lost against a God and begged her to help her? She went and Lost Godlike powers? She went and is now a traitorous Priestess instead of a Player? What can she brag about? dying thrice? Its more of a Mark of her bad decisions.

Rook

She walked into the greatest altar to Below ever built, freed it from them by feeding half of Creation Beta into it, and turned it against Below itself instead of letting them win by becoming the replacement.

She's potentially walking out of there having turned what was one of Below's greatest assets since before Callow was a kingdom, into a weapon pointed directly at Below's other biggest asset.

The mantle let her lord over some petty squabbles or fledgeling Named that ultimately don't mean shit. She shed it to start climbing out of the bucket, and have a demigod and an entire race help her fight against the game that's whipped the continent for tens of thousands of years.

At the moment she is possibly in the most narratively advantageous position of any mortal alive, easily rivaling Black or Malicia.

SilentWatcher

Are you sure the drow are freed through her gifting Winter? It is not written. We don't know if there is now a hybrid Power of Night (WinterNight) or not. Below has won because Sve Noc got the Power and they will use it. Is it enough to pay the Sorcerous Debt? We don't know. You are assuming Sve Noc and all Drow will just do whatever Cat says. Maybe it will work for the next war, but after? Why should they give a shit about the Liesse Accords, why should they care about Callow or the debt Malicia still has to pay? Will Cat lose all Power when it's no longer in Sve Nocs interest?

Liliet

"Negotiations will be done with Sve Noc not with her" is contradicted in this chapter. It's literally the other way around: negotiations that would otherwise have been with Sve Noc (or, well, would not have existed at all) are going through Catherine instead.

Soft power is not lesser than hard power.

SilentWatcher

But why could she do Negotiations for Sve Noc? Because Sve Noc GAVE her the right. Do you think Cat can keep it when she fucks up? She is not the one negotiating with Sve Noc. When diplomats meet, is suddenly the Diplomat of America the President instead of Trump? Are Diplomats the true Power or are they just a replacement because the TRUE Decisionmakers cant be bothered or have other Talents? Cat is representing Sve Noc, she is NOT representing herself in this Meeting.

d0m1n1c

"Because Sve Noc GAVE her the right."

In the same way, Cat GAVE Sve Winter; give and take, right?

"Cat is representing Sve Noc, she is NOT representing herself in this Meeting."

Cat is doing exactly the same thing she'd be doing if she had beaten Sve, we know that from Sve's flashbacks, the only difference is that instead of being Winter, she's human agains, which is exactly what she wanted.

I'm pretty sure "human queen making deals for her homeland" is a better role in the story than "eldritch horror lording over it."

You're also forgetting that Cat swore no oaths to Sve; Sve appointing Cat her first priestess is likely as large a leap of faith as Cat giving up Winter, if it's not, then I'd expect significant rebound on Sve when she acknowledged Cat's gift.

Liliet

There's a bit of a difference between diplomat/president and priest/god.

But there's no point arguing about this now I think. We'll see more next book.

Euodiachloris

Suggestion: never play Cleric or Warlock in D&D, then. You wouldn't like the awesome cosmic power at the price of either giving your time or soul to the power source. Or your first born, whichever.

Also, don't pick Ghaunadaur/Juiblex as either an indifferent god or patron – and/or both. (Heck, it/they/he might not even notice, and even if it/they/he does, it may not necessarily end badly – well, depending on how you define that. At least it/they/he would find it funny, the enormous troll.)

You'd hate it.

Go Gormauth Souldrinker, instead. ;P

clintcleez

Yea she lost a lot, including possibly her freedom. People respected her different when she was fae

nick012000

She's the Priestess of Night, now. Of course she can use dark miracles. I expect it's probably just an expansion of the same dark power she used back before she got Winter.

Novice

I know that when the deed seeker mentioned that Cat looked more dangerous he's most probably referring to the merging of Night and Winter she currently wields, but I like to think it's because Cat has all of her mental faculties back. All of that good ol' low cunning and story weaving goodness.

DroughtBringer

I think Winter was more directly dangerous, but Cat now? That's a Beast, one that is an apex predator. Very much not something to mess with.

Andrew Mitchell

I think she's got ALL Night and NO Winter; and Akua has Winter.

werafdsaew

Highly unlike IMO

haihappen

Akua the Shade of Doom(TM) with golden eyes? Is she already transitioning into something resembling "good"? The Fairy Godmother of Treachery?

Gold symbolizes "good" things in this universe, right?

Nevertheless I find it improbable and unfitting that The Specter of Lies would wield any Winter power.

Winter is dead. Welcome to The Moonless Night!

(Or "The Long Night", but that may be trademarked)

Liliet

Golden was the original color of alive!Akua's eyes. This is the shedding of the Winter disguise that Cat made for her.

Which, btw, furthers the idea that no, Akua doesn't get Winter now.

Decius

Why would Akua get Winter when Cat ceded it to Sve Noc?

Liliet

"Low cunning"
as if Cat ever had any of that

Komena was just being bitter and pompous and refusing to phrase it as "you are more competent at this than we are"

d0m1n1c

From Merriam Webster

Low Cunning: clever but morally bad and dishonest methods

I think that describes Cat pretty well.

Liliet

Catherine is pretty bad at lying, though she's good at identifying situations where lying even with her shitty skill will help. She's not a fan of morally bad methods either, and becomes less and less of a fan with character development.

Catherine absolutely shies away from anything that can be described as 'low cunning'. And there's few things more directly opposed to 'low cunning' than the shit she pulled on Sve Noc ("fuck it, this is a gift, have fun") or the deal she's brokering with the dwarves for them – literally she's making peace where none was previously to be had via facilitating discussion and uniting against a bigger, more horrifying threat.

Low cunning, maybe Cat has some of it, but she's shedding it more and more, and Komena definitely doesn't have any evidence of it from what the flashback-conversations were about.

RoflCat

No, he's definitely not referring to the power she wields, but rather his intuition told him this human is more 'dangerous' than the Winter Queen he met before.

Because Cat's biggest threat to anything was never her power, it was her ability to take the box and smack people with it. Winter operate inside the box and thus dulled her ability to do that.

So now it's back to stealing boxes and smacking faces.

"What Foundling does isn't thinking outside the box so much as stealing the box and hitting her opponents with it until they stop moving."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Moon Clan

coloursofdespair

Thats very much a very good point. The rules have changed, again, and this time Cat really isn't all that controlled by them anymore

SilentWatcher

Why did could she not Steal boxes and smack faces when holding the mantle? She had this thinking outside the box Mindset as part of her Character even before taking the mantle and bearing the mantle "fixes" your Character, it does not change anything about you. If you look at the battle of Camps it was already thinking outside the box when she offered negotiations to Malanza instead of fighting Saint and Pilgrim until she won or lost. Also the decision to go to the everdark is another undeniable Hint she still thought outside the box, as not even Malica, a Grandmaster in sheming, anticipated it.

Liliet

She did still have the mindset, but she was worse at actually doing it, because it requires a flexibility of thinking that in Catherine was getting slowly frozen by Winter.

She was also losing sight of her actual objectives, ideals and principles, and because she's a charismatic leader who everyone defers to everyone else has been following her blindly and even Vivienne started approving of horrifying things in the name of utility.

SilentWatcher

Maybe she lost a bit of flexibility, but lets not forget Masego, the Hierophant, fresh from witnessing a wisp of a god of above (maybe he even saw his fathers retaliation). His Name is about Gods so there would not be an issue with him helping Cat in some way. Maybe the problem needed Time to fix, but what does she have in abundance if not time as an quasi Goddess with a construct body? Does it Matter if the Liesse Accords get approved in 1 year or in 10 or 100?

Where did she lose sight of her actual Objectives? She wanted an army to win the war ahead and then Liesse accords. Never was it mentioned she wants suddenly to do something different.

Did you read the first three books of this Story?

Because everytime its not Sunshine and Flowers she loses one principle or a fancy ideal. Its a steady downwards slope since the first chapter, from killing 2 defenseless men to prevent them committing a crime, to killing some servants on suspicion alone and finally forcing the service of an entire Race. Its coming in small steps and not through some magic winter Influence you guys think affected her. I quote again Sve Noc: "She barely held the mantle for a decade, it was still her doing the decisions"

I just feel some people didnt like the Winter motive and think that for some reason Cat as mortal is a step forward, when we go back to the trope of the moronic underdog against the immortal abomination. I sincerely Hope you will be disappointed by how the story unfolds.

Liliet

Well, the way I've been tracking Catherine's arc (currently on my third attentive reread with liveblogging), she's actually a lot more idealistic now than she was at 15. She's shed some principles but gained others, and she's been actively working to become a better person and make a better world all along. That's literally an objective she has, and having Winter in her was interfering with that.

I love arcs of people becoming better people, and I love this, even if you assign no value to it.

SilentWatcher

Is then her being a villain not also a problem to her goal of making a better world?

Liliet

Yeah, that's why Catherine was worried about what Pilgrim told her about being an Evil Queen of Callow and has been planning to abdicate and questioning all her decisions and the judgement of everyone around her in a paranoia spiral.

It also opened her up to Below's play here in Everdark with pitting her against Sve Noc, which is why Catherine chose to take the most radical Below-opposed third option she could find.

Catherine being formally a villain is, at this point in the series, the best joke anyone's ever played on Creation. (And Black's the one who played it)

Reminds me of a fairy tale I read as a kid, of a noblewoman selling her soul to the Devil to feed her people through a famine. In that story, when she died angels literally stole her soul away like 'nope this bargain doesn't hold she's ours'. We'll see what happens in this one lmao in What way was this opposed to Below? She helped Below win even MORE. Instead of letting 2 pawns fight and let 1 get stronger while the other dies, she managed to empower 1 while still surviving. Below still has an empowered Sve Noc and Cat, who wields Night ( or Winternight or wathever) instead of losing 1, maybe gets even a new Name , Below kept BOTH pawns. Even Cats Plans to strike at the Dead King does not matter to Below.

SilentWatcher

SilentWatcher

Cat is the greatest Champion of Below, she wants to change creation according to her image as it should be. This is Heresy to Above and Preaching to Below. In The Prologue which side wants the souless minions who follow every order and which side wants them to decide themselves?

Liliet

Below likes strife and dislikes peace. They are Evil, dude, it's not just a label. They like their followers to be fighting each other as much as they like them fighting the Above. The entire Everdark and the horrifying murderfest their culture turned into is testimony to that.

SilentWatcher

Bellow is not only Evil DUDE. My point still stands and is true

SilentWatcher

Cat did not give Sve Noc her Power to do good, she did it for selfish reasons and the gamble was needed because every other outcome was a loss to her. Are the Liesse Accords not great for Below?

According to Tyrant Good has already won ( when he said he used his wish aspect on bard) so a Ceasefire is good for Below and bad for above. In light of this, cat is a Champion of Below

Liliet

The exact reason why Cat considered every other outcome a loss for her – including the victory that Akua was gunning for – is because she was trying to do good, not just gather power.

And Above is the side that actually tries to minimize strife and maximize peace. It does that while also waging war on Below, which is something of a contradiction and the reason why Cat can't just stop being a villain and go over to the side that matches her inclinations better.

You do have a point in that Above is winning and stopping the war gives a benefit to Below as well. Once we shift from the point of view of gods to the point of view of mortals though, Catherine's solution is starkly good in the lowercase sense.

SilentWatcher

Show me the exact passage where Cat thought : "I do good now when i give up" What is your definition of Good? doing Good? doing Bad with good intentions? wanting Good things but being a monster? All 4 of them are clearly monsters, but with good intentions in some way (except maybe Akua). Cat is not a good person, for all the crimes she will commit and has committed in the past. Why should Above not want Strife when they are winning? They have nearly won so they dont negotiate.

RanVor

Considering that the Heavens are dead set *against* Cat, I'd say it's unlikely.

SilentWatcher

Are you using your magic power of Bullshit again? How do you prove she is more idealistic then when she was 15? What principles has she gained? how has she worked to become a better person? In this Arc she considered making a pact with the Dead King ( truly a principled action!) then she tried to murder Malicia and torched some palaces ( Another glorious example of being a better person according to you) then she went to enslave ( at least similar) a race ( THE EPITOME OF A JUST DECISION). These decisions are prove against your comment, that she is becomming a better person. You also cant blame Winter as Sve Noc stated she did herself the decisions, as she held the mantle no long enough. In your twisted Mind, Cat giving up, making all her sacrifices and crimes to get so far become meaningless, betting on the mercy of Sve Noc, who cannibalized part of her race to save another part, is her becoming a better person? Are you serious? This whole Story is so entertaining, because she becomes more and more evil ,while a having a good goal. Who said this quote again? The Way to hell is paved with good intentions.

Liliet

Yes, Catherine evaluated giving her power to Sve Noc as a good and ironically Good action, because Sve Noc's goal is to save her race from extinction, and Catherine cares about people even if they are not /her/ people.

Catherine was also worried enough about Callow becoming more Evil than it used to be, which is the kind of abstract worry she would not have had at 15.

She's looked back on her First Summerholm decision to start a war to further her ambition with horror (although imho she was far less responsible for the ensuing bloodshed than her self-blame says, she did make the decision).

The main principle/belief Catherine has gained since then, though, is the ability to trust. Baby Cat was convinced that nothing comes without a price and everything that looked like she might be lucky was actually a trap. Adult Cat... yeah. Did that. Look at her inner monologue (or was some of it not inner? i don't remember) about trust and control and how it always fucks people, and how it was the reason Malicia and Black fell apart.

This is the kind of thing Cat did not understand at 15.

She was willing to start a war to advance her ambition, though.

RanVor

I think the Good course of action (at least according to the Above's definition of Good) would be the one that eradicates the drow, but otherwise I agree.

Skaddix

I agree mostly with you but Villians last until killed in this world so she has time not infinite but 100 years is doable enough.

Morgenstern

Also, more madness of laughing and/or spitting supposedly Super Important People / Gods in the face =P

Allafterme

Yup, Masego will throw a fit of EPIC proportions when he realized what he missed

Liliet

Catherine's going to have hours-long sessions with him of her performing miracles and him writing down observations, I'm calling it now

sengachi

The Dead King is old school. I can appreciate that.

Also, while my knee jerk reaction is to say "what are you doing you fool?! you're dooming your invasion with this villain speech!", I think it's important to remember that the Dead King knows his stuff. He played the narrative game so well that he bested the Intercessor, and then he added a few millenia of experience and practice onto that. There is no way he doesn't know exactly what the results of that kind of villain speech will be. So he's got to be playing some kind of long game.

Maaybe the game he's playing is just the same game he's been playing all this time, maintaining a stable narrative cycle of invasion and retreat that sees his personal sanctum in the Hells grow stronger each century. But the Intercessor did offer him a real victory this time, on some level. So maybe he's just maintaining a particular pattern for the opening of this war that he's familiar with and knows how to play before moving on to the interesting stuff. Maybe this is a "first step of the plan always works" kind of deal, exploiting a particular narrative to ensure initial victory.

Or maybe he just really does respect these soldiers and wants to honor them by giving them satisfaction and meaning in their deaths. I don't know, but I love the Dead King as a character and how long I can spend trying to dissect his motives.

Also, holy hells, did anyone else get chills from how readily the Lycaonese completely unmade their lives and went from zero to uncompromising martial law, sacrificing their entire elderly population, and making existential preservation decisions because of a few skeletons hitting their harbor? I know we've seen the Lycaonese talk a big game about how hard they are and how they know true war, but seeing them actually act on that was something else. These folk know exactly what's coming and that's *terrifying*. More than anything we saw in Keter, the way the Dead King has shaped these people has made the true magnitude of the Dead King's threat sink in for me.

sengachi

That was not meant to be a reply to this comment. Ah well.

Liliet

I'll live with it 😊

"Or maybe he just really does respect these soldiers and wants to honor them by giving them satisfaction and meaning in their deaths." <= I think it's this one, personally.

Villains speeches and other little narrative vignettes like this matter for bending LUCK. Neshamah has spent his entire existence ensuring luck would have no influence on the outcomes of his plans. He can afford to just build the story out of the building blocks he likes, now.

Also, the Lycaonese are terrifyingly amazing, and definitely lend insight into how Cordelia thinks.

luminiousblu

I mean the thing with the Dead King is that he's playing the role of the bigger fish who gets called in for assistance. The bigger fish doesn't tend to actually die or get crippled, they just sort of shove off after a while of milling about and causing general mayhem.

Liliet

Yep.

He can afford to actually compliment the enemies just out of genuine admiration for their valor.

He's fairly social and amiable as far as undead abominations go, as we've seen!

Novice

Unless of course he's talking to Ranger. Then it's all exasperated sighs.

Liliet

And her favorite wine!

IDKWhoitis

I wouldn't be surprised if he took this opportunity to dig a massive pit in the center of the Procerian cities, place a couple thousand dead with a latent magic trigger, and reseal it. You know, for an advanced wave next time around. He can afford it.

He might also be nice enough to start building foundation for the 8th wall himself, with all that expendable labor. Just to fuck with some heads afterwards or to actually serve as fortifications for his own troops in the long run.

I feel as if there is no conventional long term goals for the Winter King. What is 100 years to an Immortal who can plan better next time.

Liliet

I think the pit thing wouldn't work for the same reason he doesn't just raise all the graveyards: the dead bodies will decay with time. And if he uses sorcery, a priest or a Named – hell, maybe personally Augur – will catch it.

The wall though lmao I can 100% see him doing that ♥

IDKWhoitis

We know he is capable of raising just skelebro, and that this man is prone to experimentation and future planning.

All he had to do is leave a receptacle or trigger device (possibly time delay) and leave the inert bones there. After 200 years, his army automatically rises again with no warning and causes chaos in the enemy back lines.

I can also see this as a reason for Northern Procer to just burn their dead to ashes. We haven't fully covered Proccers burial practices, but we know the Lycons are really careful about their dead going to the other side, its wouldnt be unreasonable for them just to get rid of their dead wholesale to prevent graveyard raising. It's also possible that the attack on Cleves was done by graveyard raising and other tricky shit.

Liliet

Good point.

SpeckofStardust

The funny thing is that he likely has done that before, and that after this battle settles and he is pushed back they will check for such things.

This after all is far from his first time taking this city after all.

Liliet

Yeah but nothing says he can't get new ideas that he hasn't tried before and they wouldn't think to check for 😊

Decius

Am I the only one who thought that they deserved Goblinfire more than the Lone Swordsman did?
If you're gonna set your city on fire to spite the invading army, do it right!

Also, it seems like the Dead King could have been much smarter, and just built a wall around the fortress and left enough corpses there to fend off a counterassault. The ENTIRE ASSAULT was about helping the Lycaonese to die valiantly.

Killian

I agree that goblinfire would be much preferred. However the problem is that it's GOBLIN fire, as in made by goblins. And the only goblins are in Praesi with a small clan in Marchford.

SilentWatcher

Rather good description by the dwarf, a feeble thing grown even feebler

Liliet

And yet, more dangerous than she was before 😊

SilentWatcher

ah i see your point, she lost already everything, her power, her dignity, her freedom and her Construct Body, she already has nothing of personal value left to lose. Of course she is now more dangerous.

caoimhinh

Cat is not only mortal, she's lethal. 😊

Novice

I genuinely love last stands against the grim darkness. It's why, for all their faults, I'm still a fan of Warhammer both Fantasy and 40k.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Let it be know that the planet broke before the Guard did!

Novice

One of the most badass phrase ever uttered in fiction. The Guard, comprised of nothing but normal men and women, armed with what the other factions consider as weak, never fucking broke even with the planet thrown asunder.

Cadia stands!

RanVor

Victory for the Warmaster! Death to the False Emperor!

Btw, it just occurred to me that Calernia would feel like home to the Chaos Space Marines.

Decius

There was never anywhere to flee to.

Novice

The Navy and the Space Marines actually managed to break through the giant Chaos armada in space. It's why Abaddon decided to crash the then compromised Blackstone Fortress, something that is desired by most factions, to the planet itself. There was the Lord Castellan Creed defending the lines buying time for the rest of the Guard to retreat via the Navy while the planet is busy cracking.

So no, the Guard held the line to the bitter end.

Liliet

Well, this made me cry. Congrats erratic you win I no longer care about the Vales interludes this has overwhelmed it strongly

nick012000

Also, that's not the Dead King. Friedrich Papenheim is an idiot: the Dead King was a human, originally, and he certainly wouldn't need to go as far as to *nail* his armor onto his body. That's probably just a Named Giant that got killed and reanimated.

Andrew Mitchell

I agree that wasn't the Dead King's usual body; but I do think it was the one he was wearing to the meeting.

byzantine279

Uh... The Dead King can possess whichever of his servants he feels like. That was him using a convenient body for the conversation. If he had brought his real one there was a risk of a Hero suddenly showing up. They basically grow on trees around things like the Dead King.

Two ____

It is a bone golem (or whatever it was) inhabited by the Dead King, so yes, it is

Skaddix

I mean its probably similar to Malcia's Ability to possess meat puppets. I agree its probably not his main body but that doesn't really matter.

Soronel Haetir

Sweet, as of about 150 votes Black is in the lead!

Liliet

Have you considered: he would be upset by this development

RanVor

I'd rather have Black upset than Cat on the top.

Liliet

Dude.

0.0

RanVor

This entire contest is pretty much analogous to the state of the war between Good and Evil, only with amount of screentime instead of providence. I, much like Black, am offended by this and thus I refuse to vote on the main character out of principle.

RanVor

*for the main character, dammit.

Liliet

I guess that's kind of fair?

I happen to think that there's nothing /wrong/ with Good reliably winning against Evil, and the actual problem that Black's pissed at is how an entire nation has been written off as Evil and is now consistently getting the shitty end of the stick without Good ever even making an effort to protect or help Praesi civilians in any way.

But yeah, the character contest is kind of a shitty idea in itself.

You know what would be cool? A round robin everyone vs everyone character contest, where literally every pair of characters gets voted on, and then the points are tallied. IMHO this would be a lot more descriptive of how much people actually like which character, because while there would be matchups of purely popular character vs side character, a lot of matchups would be decided by 'between these two characters who are in conflict my preference is X'.

RanVor

That's an admirably idealistic view of Black you have, but I must disagree. Black is Evil to the core, always was and always will be. He's just more practical than most. What he's pissed at is that the good guys have advantages he views as unfair. He wants to prove that these advantages can be overcome. It just happens that the best way to do that is avoiding classic villain pitfalls.

Your idea seems really good, though.

Liliet

Kairos: "it used to be about being right, being fair, but it hasn't been about that in a long time, he just wants to win, but it's the kind of victory that means nothing at all"

^ his comments on how far Black strayed from his original objective aside (although that's also really interesting to explore), the original objective definitely appears to be doing the right thing

More interesting is his conversation with Ranker in "Queen's Gambit: Declined"

"“A better world,” the Black Knight murmured, looking up at stars that were not those he'd been born under. “Oh, I have wondered. What it might mean, what it would look like.”

“We made one,” Ranker said. “It's on fire now.”

“And who set the flames?” he smiled. “Cordelia Hasenbach. Catherine Foundling. Kairos Theodosian. Children, in our eyes. Yet is it not the right of the younger generation to look at the work of that which came before it and judge it insufficient?””

This not only implies he's a big fan of Catherine's 'better world' idea, he also was trying to make one with his friends already.

Oh, he told Cat he was after victories for Evil, but he'd also told Cat that he was going to avoid threatening her to not have her eventually backstab him, and that was literally a goal he was after.

Catherine has commented that he 'was a fundamentally evil man' during their post-Second Llesse conversation, but not only is it a foray into terminology Cat usually doesn't use, not only was Cat freshly be-Wintered and had her judgement stiffened proportionally, it was also right before she yelled at him for destroying the weapon despite her asking him not to, and boy did she change her mind on THAT one, later. She was pissed at him for using her as a tool, and that was a very personal upset.

I have an idealistic view of Black, yes, but I think it's strongly supported by the text.
(these quotes aren't all I have, just the first ones that came to mind as most directly relevant to the specific topic of conversation)

RanVor

You win this round, but I'll tell you this: outside of some really outlandish ideas, the text generally tends to support what you want to see in it.

Liliet

True!

But man, after Akua with the power of friendship fulfilling my fanfic of her genuinely supporting Cat instead of fucking off / backstabbing her at the first opportunity, and Catherine choosing to fuck the Below in the most radical way possible, I'm feeling adventurous 😊

SilentWatcher

How did Cat "fuck Below in the most radical way possible" ? Was it not established that NO matter the outcome of Sve Noc vs Cat Below always wins? it was literally written in the guide itself, so i look forward how you will use your bullshit power to twist facts around.

RanVor

"The only winning move is not to play".

Liliet

An outcome that had one of them actually defeat the other would be in Below's favor.

An outcome where the winning side (which Catherine was, Akua had a plan and an advantage over Komena in the trial) cedes its half of the power to the other without requiring the other to actually win first / bleed for it / cross more lines than the other side in a campaign of escalation?

That's defying the Below, and that was the point of why Catherine did what she did.

Click click click. Crabs in the bucket. And one suddenly pushed the other up instead of dragging it back down.

SilentWatcher

When your beloved Character even says: Black is a fundamental Evil Man, you still try to wring the story so Black meets your unrealistic Vision of him. He does "good" things because it is more "practical" than "evil". He was honest to Cat because it was practical and would foster her loyalty instead of doom at her hand. Black is and will stay fundamentally Evil. Who says he cant win his Crusade against Above while helping Cat with her Vision of a better World? He will probably bet on Cat as his Plan to meld Callow and Praes together has failed due to Malicia.

SilentWatcher

Kairos argument with Black was not that Black has suddenly a good Objective, but that Black is not using Evil means to win. You see that clearly illustrated in that interlude Chapter where Kairos faces down an entire Army, as he does not want a victory with the army of Helike but a victory for Below. Again you write Cat got Influenced by Winter. Haha you cant just blame Winter for every decision of Cat which disproves your good image of Cat. She was not influenced by Winter in this way, as firstly she was holding the mantle not long enough and secondly Winter makes you rigid and not suddenly makes you think someone is evil. Where exactly did Cat change her Mind on destroying the weapon? She never changed her mind. You should reevaluate how you see Cat and Black as you didnt understand some things how they where written.

SilentWatcher

And it was NEVER a goal of Black to have Cat Backstab him, he knew his plans would carry the risk of making Cat angry and planned for either her as a successor or that she does not kill him. The Act of Cat stabbing him was never the Intention it was a Consequence. The more i dissect your Arguments the more holes i find

Liliet

There is evidence in the text that Black likely planned for Catherine to backstab him from the start.

The one I found most striking on my recent reread was Black's decision to stab Catherine when sending her into the initial Squire Name vision. Masego later told Catherine that it was entirely unnecessary, and Catherine assumed Black was just being dramatic for the hell of it. But the universe is dramatic as well, and Black stabbing Cat (which she was later angry at him for and called him a jackass and wanted to deck him in the face) made it that much more likely that eventually a mirror event would happen (and it did, just not to death). Black couldn't have not known that. He's the man who taught Catherine to watch everything she says, he wouldn't make a gesture like that without actually intending its inevitable consequence.

And then we have the part where in the Free Cities when Wekesa made a comment that if Catherine were to backstab Black he'd kill her, and Black's reaction was internal horror and the thought 'how many people he loved he would have to kill before this was over' => instead of going 'well I'll just have to make sure Catherine doesn't do that' (WHICH WOULD NOT BE HARD CONSIDERING SHE ALREADY WASN'T GOING TO AND NONE OF BLACK'S INTENTIONS AT THE TIME CONTRADICTED HERS BADLY ENOUGH TO PROVOKE HER TO THAT DEGREE) he went 'well I'll just have to kill Wekesa'.

Catherine discussed this with him explicitly as well, at the start of their shared journey into Liesse, and the best he had to say was "well, not today".

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I'm wondering something: why do you still read the Guide, if you've grown so scornful of the direction in which it's heading? Why not cut your losses and spend this time on something else? Don't get me wrong, criticism is great and all, but criticism is not quite the same thing as this pronounced and broadly-encompassing personal dislike for the characters and your fellow readers.

Do you simply want to watch things go the way you're sure they will so that you may gloat? If so, I have doubts as to how satisfying it would truly be, even if your confidence is not misplaced (which I also believe, personally).

*Liliet*

So actually I've reread our debate and I realized that the point I actually disagree with you on is /who the status quo favorite is/.

Not to bring in real life politics into this, but half this comment section is a 'why so many gays' shitshow already, I might as well put in my 5 cents.

Amadeus is a white guy with a 'rationalist' mindset matching the title of the series. He's extremely charismatic and likable, and what chapters he has are always extremely well-written and memorable.

Meanwhile Catherine is a bisexual woman of color, a female protagonist refusing to conform to widespread ideas of what protagonists should be like or what women should be like.

The idea of her winning a popularity contest over him?

That's the best testament to Guide's writing quality that I can think of, and the biggest "fuck you" to the real world status quo.

I love Amadeus a lot. If I were trying to actually pick which of them I like better, I'd be sitting and staring at the wall forever.

But when I pick which one of them I want to /win/, well,

RanVor

Excuse me, what?

IDKWhoitis

So Black is Black, lovable monster to the Bone. He is a rigid machine which rails against a rigged game and would rather burn everything to prove a point, rather than surrender. He is still that boy he was 50 years ago, underneath all that sarcasm and experience. And we love him for it.

Cat was assigned the role of protagonist, and as such has a significant amount of Screentime. Book 4 pointed out how stagnant Winter Cat was, and by far, did very little other than bitch about how unfair things were and how she was the worst thing to happen to Callow and her friends.

The difference was that one character owned his imperfections, moved past them, actually changed the face of Calernia irreparably, and is willing to sit quiet until it's his turn on stage. Finding an interlude is a little disappointing, but when Black is involved, it somehow feels better. Meanwhile, reading Book 4, felt like a trudge with Cat, 20 chapters of drow bullshit. I love old cat being back, because she's already moved much faster than winter Cat could in several chapters (sans the whole teleport thing).

But in matters of who our favorite monster is, I'm betting on Black.

SilentWatcher

What did move faster? It was just the plot which moved unseen. There is no difference between Cat now and Winter Cat.

Nguyen Hong Hai

Just compared to GS, Black is pretty GS-san when the dices go too far and dude decided to give the middle finger to the GM.

OutspanFoster

Who do you think would win, the Undead Horror or the gnomes? Cuz I personally feel like the gnomes are the ultimate power here and have maybe sidestepped the Story somehow

byzantine279

The gnomes are one of the enforcers. They keep the level of the story from growing too much, or too quickly.

Just This Guy, Y'know

The Undead Horror just did a spot of incredible necromancy and conquered a spot of hell. It's not like he did anything important like develop a fertilizer that can prevent famines (besides blood) or work on a steam engine. The gnomes object to technological progress, not horror and bloodshed and things that make a decent being turn pale.

If he had his undead minions working on the fertilizer thing on his level of hell, they'd invade and wipe that level out of existence. Until then, he's fine.

IDKWhoitis

You are also assuming the Gnomes would win. There could have been like 3 wars with the Gnomes, and DK could have edited that history out of his civilian populations memory.

Decius

I see no reason why the Gnomes wouldn't consider all of Calernia acceptable collateral damage if they wanted to destroy the Dead King.

St-just

IIRC it's not so much the Gnomes have sidestepped the story as that the entire continent the story takes place on is...well, not a BACKWATER, necessarily, but too fragmented to really matter on a larger scale.

The Gnomes, like the Dwarves, are real global powers. Like the whole continent of less racist elves who can still reproduce out there somewhere.

Adrian\_V

Quick question, where is the part where the continent of elves is mentioned?

Liliet

The epilogue of book 1, when Bard tears into the Emerald Swords

Liliet

oh my god I keep confusing book 1 with book 2

it's probably because Cat didn't die at the end of that one

SpeckofStardust

"Not you elves, anyway," the Bard said. "It's why they kicked you out, isn't it? The others. The ones that breed with humans, whose kingdom is larger than this entire continent. Lots of room there, but not enough to fit your opinions about lesser races."- Epilogue Book 2

Bard chatting with a couple of Elves.

hmmmmm

The gnomes seem to me to be something like Britain during the South American revolutions of the 18th century, or the USA/France in Africa and the Middle East. They're a foreign power capable of global force projection, and able to topple any conventional government in order to safeguard their dominant position and stabilise the political situation, but without anything to gain from direct occupation or colonisation.

If anything, the gnomes are more hands-off. They bomb nations that invent gunpowder and mechanised agriculture*, but we haven't seen them bankroll proxy wars or launch surgical strikes for any other reasons.

* Maybe. This isn't outright stated, but "messing with powders" probably means sulphur/charcoal/saltpetre and the "farming machine" was probably a mechanical reaper or thresher.

Barthumphries

It occurs to me: I don't think the gnomes can bomb dwarves.

Liliet

they can't bomb them directly but they could most definitely collapse their tunnels on their heads oh, that would also ruin all the surface nations above them, but since when did collateral damage stop gnomes? 😡

antoninjohn

I wonder how much Cat will get out of the Dwarfs for solving all their problems for them

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting insight that they thought the previous arrangement was such a great deal for them. I hope Cat gets more out of them this time, much more.

Liliet

Catherine absolutely knew the previous arrangement was a great deal for them. It's why she offered the deal to begin with.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, for sure. But it looks like she left a lot on the table and could have got a lot more out of them. I'm just saying I hope she doesn't leave so much on the table this time.

Skaddix

She didn't really have a strong position that time. This time she can solve all their problems for the Dwarves for real without losing any troops and handle the Dead King.

Liliet

She still doesn't have a strong position. A strong position would be "well I can back out of this deal and leave you to it if you don't like it". Catherine needs this deal more than they do.

byzantine279

And they would need to fight a god in the fullness of its power, and the dwarf under its direction.

It would not be a fun fight.

Liliet

Oh, true, the situation did change from their last talk due to Sve Noc being stronger now.

However, Catherine needs to hold on to her earlier deal and what she negotiated for herself out of it, thus she can't really afford to take the hardline stance anyway.

Decius

She is offering them a lot of help, but she can't credibly threaten to walk away. She needs this deal more than the dwarves do.

Someguy

Correction, this time she came as an Attorney representing Drow interests for Dwarven/Callowan Profit. Unfortunate for Sve Noc that her only advocate in this situation has such a massive Conflict of Interest (Confluence of Interest?).

Skaddix

Still wondering what eat the Baby is...still suppose it makes sense for the Woe to have a priestess...the woe now has a Fighter, A Thief, A Archer, A Wizard and Priestess classic party.

Granted Night seems to have quite a bit of Druid or Transmutation in the skill line since they shapeshift a lot.

Liliet

It probably means 'you have free rein to sack as much of Procer as you want, the pricks had it coming in the Above's opinion'

Nairne .01

I mostly agree.

Though how much Cat is a priestess and how much a warlock (in D&D terms I mean) remains to be seen.

caoimhinh

Funny how Cat ended up as the Priestess of the group. XD

Adrian\_V

That glimpse of Cat's new powers, and i loved the other segments, reminded me of the wheel of time latest 3 books, although i keep expecting Drow to suddenly appear to save the day to the confusion of everyone else xD

I had to read it slowly just to stretch the enjoyment as much as i could, i can't wait for the next chapter whether is the epilogue or another interlude but i hope we see a little of how the Drow will intervene.

HardcoreHeathen

Erratic, you've demonstrated once more your almost unrivaled ability to craft a moment. The heroics of the Proceran guardswoman and the last stand of Friedrich Papenheim were spectacular. In just a few hundred words each, you introduced a character, gave them an arc, and made me care. Scenes like that are exactly what I think Interludes are for: giving a hint of broader perspective that we can't get from our first-person viewpoint character.

However, I don't think that it's a good tool for showing internal development in the viewpoint character. In my opinion, that's the main benefit of a first-person narrative: you can put us inside Cat's head while she has her emotional arc.

Instead, for the second time in a row, the climax of the arc has abruptly POV-shifted to someone else. The last time it was with the Dead King, where between chapters we went from "we assassinated Malicia and now the Dead King is here to speak to us" to "Athal/Malicia's POV about how the assassination failed and the conversation with the Dead King is already over." Now we've done essentially the same thing, except the climactic gambit from the previous chapter actually ended up working this time.

Both of these moments are hugely important for their respective story arcs. They were massive undertakings that required sacrifice, struggle, and self-doubt, and Cat's response and growth to their outcome is sort of the whole point. You can't really convey that from a completely disassociated perspective.

I also have the sneaking suspicion that, just like with the conversation with the Dead King, we're never going to see the conversation with the dwarves about the new deal. I don't know if that'll be important (certainly the private conversation with the Dead King, the most powerful entity on the continent, seems to have not mattered) but it's another important plot point that isn't going to get covered "on screen."

It's like watching a YouTubers React video, where they're watching what sounds like a really interesting video. Except I don't give a shit about their reactions; I just want to see the video.

Liliet

Catherine's offscreen conversation with the Dead King is most definitely a Chekhov's Gun.

And Catherine's most immediate recovery from 'oh god I died AGAIN' is not the most interesting part to focus on. I say this as someone who has started like 5 headfics in her head about the immediate aftermath, and they were all boring / fluff with cuddling and recaps. 90% of what would have been going on would just be spreading information about what happened.

It's not like this is the end of the story. We're going to see the impact on Catherine yet.

This is a zoom out to show the big picture. Yeah, it's a little rushed, erratic did say he didn't initially plan a book break here. But it's necessary.

lol

I actually really enjoy the tomes we get to see Cat from other people's perspectives. I think that's one of my favorite things this story does.

Liliet

YES.

A feeble thing grown even feebler, yet more dangerous ♥

Catherine's #aesthetic is absolutely wonderful, too, and every time we see her from the side we're reminded of why she is so beloved in-universe ♥

SilentWatcher

I agree with your opinion, that we as readers should get more then morsels of these conversations, but it is a great tool to leave it out and let the readers fill these gaps themselves, you will undoubtedly imagine an epic and stirring Plot relevant conversation perfectly suited to your tastes. Some conservative readers may get wet over "character development" some enjoy the "fantastic" part of a fantasy story like myself. in leaving out these conversations EE creates suspense and lets each of us imagine the Talks, without disappointing to much. Also it probably saves time to write.

Liliet

Oh.

There's an opinion that I 100% share with you. Neat

Soronel Haetir

Wow, at 219 votes it's Black by 1 (110 to 109).

Letouriste

Black would win easily if he wasn't out of sight since so long. Cat got a few strong chapters in the row just last week so that's not really fair. Still think black will beat her tho

SilentWatcher

Cat strong chapters?? Ahaha never will i vote for the mortal morron against the black knight

Liliet

Ah yes, the guy who is much weaker than all his predecessors and advocates against using your Name whenever you can avoid it. That guy.

SilentWatcher

Wrong. Black is powerful in the way he uses his tools with skill and precision. Where Cat needs a hammer, Black just uses a needle. Probably the Needle was crafted out of the Souls of his enemies children and he burned a Church to craft it but the Result was worth it in his eyes. He does not flinch in at discomfort and morality. If there would be Chance he would achieve his plan but had to be a monster with a fae mantle to achieve it, HE WOULD NOT EVEN HESITATE. Lets look at Cat. She threw away her Hammer and now borrows one which does not belong to her. She just cant rid herself of her morality to achieve her goals and all this whining how uncomfortable the mantle of power is and how much better it is to be a crippled mortal. On the other Hand i see Black suffering gladly to ensure his legions can march faster. Cat can not even stomach a bit discomfort for an indestructible Body.

SilentWatcher

Considering all the dead heroes Black left in his Wake he is probably the most powerful Black Knight in the history of Praes. What does it matter if he cant flip his hand and a tower crumbles? he dislodges 1 stone and it crumbles from that. This does not work for Cat as she rather uses her fists and gambles for victory (like making a leap of faith in gifting Sve Noc Winter) instead of searching for that 1 weak stone, as it would be not morally acceptable to use that particular poor stone's weakness. Blacks Philosophy is Result is everything that counts, so comparing him to the last Black knight in light of this Philosophy he is more powerful than the last Black Knight.

Liliet

So, you're definitely not a fan of morality and doing the right thing, huh.

Or building a better world, which is Black's stated goal.

SilentWatcher

Black's goal is not a better world. It's winning. Chapter 37 Madman. He said in the epilogue of book 3 he wonders what a better world would look like, but we don't know what his goals are.

Liliet

That chapter was about how Black was pissed about Praes being stuck in a starvation/war cycle unable to break the pattern.

Oh, he gave a pretty speech. He's great at speeches. And at lying to himself.

RanVor

Consider this: I love to read about selflessness and heroism. I'm also a sucker for redemption stories. So this entire thing with Cat becoming more moral is fine and dandy. And yet, if I wanted to read about good people doing good things, I wouldn't have picked A Practical Guide to EVIL, would I?

Liliet

Oh my god I hear you.

The title to the series is the greatest mockery I've ever seen.

I found out I liked it being about good people doing good things more than if it matched the title though ♥

RanVor

There'd be no problem if it was like that from the beginning. But the title held for the first book, maybe the second as well, and then started to gradually lose its meaning until it became pretty much hollow. I have mixed feelings about this so far. We'll see what comes from this when the next book starts rolling.

I'll withhold my judgement for now, but I hate it when the show betrays its premise, and I feel like this may be happening to the Guide right now.

Nevertheless, it's still an amazing read and I'm very glad to have found it.

Liliet

Honestly, on reread I think that was the intended premise from the beginning. Black's early explanation to Catherine that the most practical way to handle an occupied country is to be good to its population laid foundation for increasing evidence mounting in favor of the theory that evil is impractical and the best way to be evil is to not be, which the characters promptly set out to demonstrate.

Erratic is a troll is all it is 😊

Skaddix

I mean Black has been out of sight might be a good thing...Cat recent Under Dark Adventures has split the fanbase to a degree.

Aotrs Commander

Though it nearly physically pained me to chose between them, a long period of introspection and an objective analysis of my reactions indicated that I should vote for Cat by the very narrowest of margins (and probably all the wrong reasons).

Looking at the tally, is has slipped in her favour. (Perhaps, like me, it was a hard decision.)

Marcus Rendell

Great chapter, although I feel like "the dear are coming" should be "the dead are coming".

magesbe

Maybe the dead are just very dear to their hearts.

Decius

Or the deer are coming. Goats can be dangerous when packed with explosives, why not other quadrupeds?

Nairne .01

Now imagine DK's army filled with deers or undead deers.

onedollargum

I got a huge Dark Souls 2 vibe from this chapter. Holding out against the undead on the frozen docks, bargaining with dwarves, consulting souls of fire and regaining humanity.

Loved it!

LM

Can we stop making every other character gay? It's growing a bit ridiculous at this point.

Morgenstern

That's your opinion and that's fine. But please speak for yourself and not for "all of us".

To juxtapose it with another opinion, I, for one, rather like what EE is doing here, as a juxtaposition to yet another component of our out-of-story reality, especially in that doesn't-matter-to-people-in-world way. I find it a blessed respite in at least one aspect from all the real-world -isms, many of which were perfectly transported and/or even used as hyperboles in-world. If this is about putting up a mirror, the resulting mix is just fine in my eyes.

KageLupus

Honestly, it also kind of makes sense. Imagine a world where homosexuality was not a taboo, and from the sounds of it might never have been one. You are going to have a lot more of those couples running around. Between bi and gay both being widely accepted it, it doesn't seem that unreasonable that you'd have something like every other character falling into those relationships.

Barthumphries

I don't see how it couldn't have some sort of stigma. To continue a bloodline you need an heir, which usually means man and woman. Given that lower class people usually copy higher class, that would mean most would go for a similar relationship even just to continue their own bloodline.

And if that's what most people do, then a homosexual relationship is going to be a bit odd and can't help but carry some sort of stigma.

Liliet

Don't forget that adoption exists. Communal childcare is a thing for human societies, and it allows – nay, necessitates – that some people not, in fact, have children of their own to instead help take care of the children of others.

See: Wekesa and Tikoloshe.

See also: in this world apparently miracles exist that enable children to be had even with an incompatible genital combination (source: Brandon Talbot's hilariously awkward talk with Catherine in Book 3)

And of course, it's pretty hard for a stigma to emerge when Named set precedent for what is and isn't approved by the Heavens 😊

caoimhinh

LM, dude, the protagonist is bisexual, you are a bit too far into the story to complain about gay characters now hahaha.

Besides, it's like one LGBT character for every 20 or more straight characters, take it easy, even the characters in the story don't care about it.

Here it's like: a character is introduced, they are gay, no one makes a fuss, characters do things, move on, plot happens, it has nothing to do with their sexuality, the story goes on, cool.

This matter-of-factly way of taking on the sexuality of characters is actually way better than how so many tv shows and webnovels handle the subject. Here there's no forcing any characters to be gay or twisting plotlines for the sake of having drama about sexuality or any of that ridiculous stuff, everyone's chill about it and it's not plot-relevant; it's just part of what a character is, just like sexual orientation is just a part of what a person is, but it's not the defining trait nor the most important part of who you are.

Liliet

Can we stop making every other character straight? The entire history of fiction has already done every possible straight storyline 1000+ times, it's growing ridiculous at this point.

werafdsaew

Who is this *we*, the royal we? Speak for yourself.

sengachi

Do you get upset and leave comments when every character in a story is (statistically unrealistically) straight? If not, kindly fuck off and take your thinly veiled homophobia with you.

Gunslinger

Catherine being so cheery can only mean Archer is still alive.
One can hope!

Also I'm so happy we got a look at her. I was honestly expecting her to show up only in the next book so it would be a long wait!

BarthHumphries

Typo thread

an endless horde of orcs and heretics that at the corpses of the fallen

Change at to ate

And several others...

nipi

Well I guess it was too early for the Dead King to show that he can imitate Cat and have that giant of an undead stuffed full of explosives.

Liliet

Goblins make explosives. Praes isn't exactly neighbours with Keter and hasn't exactly participated in the Crusades. It's entirely plausible that the Dead King does not, in fact, have access to any.

sengachi

Goblins make explosives with hell-based materials. I'm guessing the Dead King has long since reverse engineered and improved on whatever they've got. If he's not using it, it's because he's saving it in reserve.

Liliet

Long since WHAT?

He hasn't even ENCOUNTERED them.

sengachi

Uh, what makes you think the Dead King has never encountered goblins? There was a whole secret war when he and Praes duked it out in the Hells. He also could have heard through his spies about goblin munitions. I just can't imagine that the Dead King would be totally ignorant about *the* thing that one of the races on Calernia is known for.

Also, let's be real, the Dead King can definitely scry better than Masego's observatory. He probably has a few dozen comparable setups at least. He's probably the single most likely person in the world to know exactly what goblin munitions actually are and how they're made.

Javvies

Goblin munitions being used regularly/commonly are a recent development. One that is due entirely to Black and the Reforms.

They wouldn't have been used much, if at all, during the Secret Hellwars.

Liliet

...I forgot about the Secret Wars...

Ok, it's about 50/50 if he has munitions or not, depending on whether the Secret Wars fielded a significant amount

Nairne .01

It could be that he has more knowledge on the munitions the goblins make and knows of some consequences that are either not worth it in his eyes while the matrons either don't know of said consequences or do not care because the munitions are perhaps used only outside of their domain(though that seems unlikely).

nipi

I hope Cat at least got a few good oaths out of her new Goddess.

Nairne .01

The whole thing was about faith / trust.
Requesting oaths would defeat that.

Freely making them on the other hand....

caoimhinh

Lycaonese are true badasses, that principality should be filled with long bloodlines of Heroic Named. Friedrich's replies to the Enemy carried with them a tone of honor and badassery that even Cat's replies don't have. Friedrich didn't land any sick burn, but his words were... appropriate for the occasion.

The Dead King's comment a confirmation of Lycaonese being descendants of "the People of the Wolf", which is kinda cool, that whole culture and their descendants have been at war for countless years against the Kingdom of Death. And yet they stand.

On another note, please tell us that Archer is fine, please.

Liliet

Named are those that stand out. Lycaonese heroes don't stand out, they're exactly the same as every other person there.

Can an entire nation be Named? Not consist of Named, but have a Role as a nation as a whole? 😊

caoimhinh

Oh, good point, that might explain it.

Although I think they should have more Named there, I mean, there are bound to be some more extraordinary people than others among the Lycaonese, especially since they should have developed a lot of techniques, weapons, and magic to fight against the Kingdom of Death and the Ratkins (though that doesn't seem to be the case, at least we haven't seen them for now).

It might also be that the Lycaonese Heroes are currently in another part of the continent fighting in another front of the Crusade or on their way back to the principality.

RanVor

Procer has few heroes in general, but the ones they have are probably either with the Pilgrim or supporting Cleves and Hainaut, which are less heavily fortified than Hannover.

caoimhinh

Also, a point to remember, Lycaonese aren't a nation, they are an ethnicity/cultural group and hold 4 of the Principalities of Procer: Bremen, Hannover, Neustria, and Rhenia, with Hannover appearing to be the most important or at least having the most badass bunch of people XD.

Novice

Isn't that what Callow was? A great Good bulwark against the Evil Praes?

Liliet

...I'm just going to agree with you here ♥ ♥ ♥

caoimhinh

Yeah, and Callow has teams of Heroic Named spawning almost every year, which Black has effectively hunted down for 20 years, he even mentioned in early chapters how they are appearing even faster now than before the Conquest.

Liliet

I mean, they were appearing faster now BECAUSE of the Conquest, as a response to a specific threat.

RanVor

Bloodlines are a Levantine thing.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Read up on the origin of the name "Lycaonese" and the lupine connection turns out to be directly present in it.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lycaon\_%28Arcadia%29

Aaron Sofaer

I love that Cat is back to our favorite version of Cat: hit them with the box, not with your raw power.

The Lycaonese are badass as all hell, holy shit! As mentioned, the way they go from zero to "hold until the last of us is dead" was super well done.

Also, it amazes me that there's always that one person who just really hates it and posts twenty times every two days about how much he hates it. Get over it, dude, the story isn't yours to dictate.

SilentWatcher

How does one hit better with a box? with Power. Of course i know the story is not mine, but the comments are here to write our opinion, and i will hit you all with mine until you stop glorifying the Devolution of Cats Power. Please EE show these fools another twist like when Cat first became part of Winter.

Liliet

omg ok

caoimhinh

Skill is better than Power, that has been the point of all the story, one needs to be practical, not overwhelming, in order to achieve a victory. It's the entire reason why Amadeus, the Calamities, and Malicia are a force to be reckoned with, while the crazy Villains with flying fortresses, great rituals, and armies of monsters could not achieve any lasting victory since the times of Triumphant.

Cat is weakened but that doesn't mean she is weak now, as she put it "I no longer hold the power, but I wield it" so she still has power, probably more than before as she now can use the Night too, but she is no longer bound to it by the rules imposed unto the owners of power (A.K.A the gods and demigod-level beings like the Fae), more importantly, she has a sharper and clearer mind now, she will be more focused and use her power more efficiently.

We'll have to wait until a couple of chapters later to see what exactly her new fighting power is and how it affects her, I wonder about the exact deal she has with Sve Noc, since there lies the nature of her use of power now.

SilentWatcher

also you read my comment wrong, i never said Cat needs overwhelming power, But Power makes everything easier like hitting people with the box the fuck dude, you were praising black up there for hitting a single brick to bring down a tower up there.

NZPIEFACE

SilentWatcher

Do you not understand it? Skill is Power too. With equal tools, Black is more powerful than Cat in every Way as the application of Power is part that Power. Cat needs more Power to smash the Tower as she is not as good in application as Black. If Power is worthless and gets everytime defeated by practical means, why are there so few stories of 1 Unnamed beating a Named? Even Bard is overpowered with immortality, invulnerability, near omniscience. Cat thought herself in a conversation with Pickler, Power can be so overwhelming there is NOTHING you can do to bridge the Gap. Maybe she is no longer rigid as Fae, but principle Alienation will still be a problem as it appears when mortals use Power not meant for Mortals.

SilentWatcher

If you look at how she defeated William and Akua at first Liesse, she was practical in using a sword in a stone story and suddenly Creation made her more POWERFUL as she needed that Power to win.

Liliet

Exactly.

Catherine doesn't need WINTER POWER to win if she's able to bend the narrative so that she has the exact amount of power she needs to win at crucial points.

She was better at story-weaving pre-Winter, because being more rigid story-wise is one of the attributes Winter was forcing on her.

She has all the power she needs, already.

NZPIEFACE

Dude, cat's strong because she can whack people with a box. Basically no one else can.

CipherSKT

First off. A direct address.

Hi. Not sure anyone else has offered but I would gladly edit out typos on ALL the chapters for you Erraticacerrata.

Add in the occasional missing word.

I would suggest someone proofreads the chapter again to make sure I didn't take liberties with the masterpiece

For free (or just a mention lol)

Okay. That said, I know he's busy. Any of you gentlemen know who I can get in contact with to arrange that?

Samantha

I'm very interested in this new theme for Cat's evolution.

I see silentwatcher going on above about how this is terrible, cat is now a slave and has lost her power and therefore all relevance.

All I can say, is I think that they'd end up as one of those ranting villains spouting off about power in this setting. You know. The ones with INFINITE POWER that then do nothing and die to a plucky hero?

I always felt, reading this, that the main important themes here are that its not raw personal power that matters.

Its wether you can put your finger on the scales. Wether you can shape the story. Being human grants great advantages in that way. A repeated theme we see mentioned over and over is that the old monsters get stuck in their ways. The inhuman immortals like Sve Noc and the Dead King and so on.

Cat as a human was always more dangerous than Cat as a demi-fae, because she wasn't limited.

I read the whole transformation with a sinking heart. Even as Cat was drowning armies and crushing enemies under ice and casually backhanding monsters. Not because she was becoming weaker, but because she was giving away her agency. The free will that allowed her to fuck over the system as an underdog every time. She was GAINING problems, rather than surmounting them. She was being pulled into a story. Calcified. Turned static and locked into the pattern in the same way as other old monsters.

People comment that they wonder what new powers she got from Sve Noc and try to calculate if she's gained or lost power... but that's mostly irrelevant I feel.

She's regained her humanity and therefore all her real power. The strength of the underdog. The agency of the weak. The free will of the human.

In this setting, that's a thousand times more important.

Also, importantly, Cat is going to be MUCH happier like this. She hated the principle of alienation and her distance from humanity.

You could look at it like 'CAT IS NOW SUBORDINATE TO SVE NOC' and be unhappy that your power fantasy was thrown aside.

But this was never that kind of story anyway.

And frankly... uh. Well, I mean. Sve Noc made her proclamation about Cat being her high priestess and all that.

Cat meanwhile is probably going to go 'okay cool' and casually walk back off to Callow to get on with things as if nothing has changed.

Some ancient god thing has declared her to be tied to them for all eternity? Swell, but I have a war to win and a people to save. Thanks for the ability to smoke my pipe again, I missed that

As both this interlude and the general themes of the story reveal: Cat may be weaker now, but she's far more dangerous in every way that matters.

(I mean dear god, Black is weak as hell and he's the most terrifying villain in a long time.)

werafdsaew

Do we ever find out what was Folly? Or is this a thread that's never going to be resolved?

Liliet

GOOD QUESTION.

Hopefully in the next book we will?

Shaerick 68

Damn, chapters like this make it very difficult to dislike Procer.

Liliet

There's a difference between the people of the country and the rulers at the top of it.

(Say I, a Ukrainian who has grandparents in Russia)

Xinci

This was a nice feeling, though I still feel the undead are so... small for what potential they seem to be able to have given how the DK can craft them.

Still dissapointed in the Dead Kings undead Usage in this war. I like the Wolves, their way of life carries a familiar type of tone to me. Though at times they are weak, duty gives them weight.

General assumption i had would be the Dead king gradually adapting his forces(crafting/remaking undead) to his enemies. Creating different bone structures, vein for liquid, or sacks for gasses to adopt new tactical and strategic purposes.

1. Assumption being that the Dead king can animate and modify organs and bones growth and regulatory functons for his undead. Bone formations can be grown for some excellent resilience for movement

2. General rule for skeletons is they are as strong or stronger than they were when alive but with less weight because no flesh(center points/weakpoints of power vary depending on undead type and sapience). Some key-points would be joints, and going against strong opponents(those who can blow them away due to less weight or break too much of their bone at once, so in this case heroic strength?).

3. Course dont know if we saw his sapient undead in that last fight. But plenty of tactics they could have. Something that doesnt tire can wear heavy armor(can be custom crafted to help the skeleton fit along with being full of liquid or sand to make it heavier and thus harder to push away). That also means each strike or bow fired can be done so long as the bone and magical

"ligaments"(however they exist) can hold.Living bone could be grown for undead potentially given the specimen shown earlier. Cloth and leather can be used to help keep their joints in place, Flammable materials that exude toxic gas can be hold in containers that might be crushed(mix in the right minerals and pressure from their liquid ballast might get a spark going and light em up), or burned in the skeletons(best for heavy/full plate). Maybe something better for underground or open field usage and psychological warfare. Silent army of armored figures surrounded by a mist of toxic gas march quickly and steadily onto the enemy. I am more unsure on group tactics with them though...since we have seen stealth actions but not really how they fight beyond the focus on the *numberless dead theme*

Like could he have sent intangible units(wraiths,ghost) to move in past those traps instead of heroes or was the place warded? Dunno might be the small vision here just left a lot to be seen later?

TeK

I think he is restricted not in the imagination or undead capabilities, but in the narrative apartment.

Chrischinbrush

This is honestly the first time I have liked Procer. Spitting in the face of a centuries-old evil, holding fast for the armies to muster, all with the knowledge of an inevitable death. It was truly moving.

Rup

...👍...and YET we stand...lest dawn fails...

Rup

...absurdly...i heard "the Girl who climbed the Tower" when Ines climbed that watchtower in part 1...dunno why she felt like a micro-Cat...for Cleves..for Cleves...

TeK

Is nobody going to mention Balrog-powered forges? Ok.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a nice connection make. Headcanon updated.

burguulkodar

A good ending to this book.

I always knew Cat wasn't fit to Rule. She is a good "black knight", or in this case "Priestess (of) Knight".

---

Epilogue

"By hook and crook we will all hang, High Lords, from a noose woven of our many loose ends. But cheer up: none are beyond salvation, not even the likes of us. Let us see, at long last, if we can turn back the tyranny of the sun."

– Extract from the coronation speech of Dread Emperor Benevolent the First Anaxares pricked his hand and cursed.

Damn needle. It must have been made in Penthes, as wantonly treacherous as the rest of those Wicked Foreign Oligarchs. He wiped off the droplet of blood and got back to the work of sewing back on the bottom of his shoe. Servants kept offering him increasingly perfidious boots, and he was certain the pair made of solid gold had been the result of what passed for the Tyrant's sense of humour, but he'd continued pretending blindness long enough they'd eventually desisted. He would have preferred to go without shoes at all, if he could, as he'd not been granted the right to use the foreign product by a proper committee, but three days of bleeding feet had eventually dissuaded him. He'd bought an old pair with the last silvers from his begging bowl, but the march was using them sorely. Anaxares had grown to hate walking a great deal lately. He'd never done so much of it during his years as a diplomat, and never in a locale so insistently hostile. He'd heard a bush had eaten a soldier, last night, swallowed the man whole when he went to relieve himself. There was hardly a piece of the Waning Woods that was not out to kill everything it saw.

The Hierarch of the League of Free Cities finished sowing his shoes back together at the cost of only minor wounds, which sadly he could not even consider had been taken in service to the Republic. The People had cut him off, sent him adrift. Worse yet, their elected representatives sometimes requested his advice. His advice. As if he were not some wretched despot. He'd immediately reported the people involved to the nearest kanenas for treason against the Will Of The People, their horrid attempts to involve a duplicitous Named into the affairs of Glorious Bellerophon marking a dark day. Advice, Gods. A dark day indeed. He slipped on his shoes and began looking for an acceptable spot to dig a hole to sleep in. League dignitaries had alleged there was a tent he was meant to sleep in, but he'd closed his eyes and hummed until they went away. Sadly straying too far from the camp would see him encircled by heavily-armed soldiers keeping a vigil, so he'd have to stay within the bounds even though the very notion made his skin crawl. There was a patch of tepid, mostly dry earth far enough from a fire he wouldn't be implicitly agreeing with its existence, and there Anaxares knelt and drew back his sleeves. He was out of silvers and so could not trade for a shovel, meaning he'd have to dig by hand.

It shouldn't take more than a few hours, he thought.

"O Mighty Hierarch, Peerless Ruler of all the League and its people-"

"How dare you," Anaxares snarled.

The Tyrant of Helike grinned, draped over a Proceran fainting couch held up by a gaggle of chittering gargoyles.

"I come bearing tribute to your greatness, O Sublime One," Kairos Theodosian said, and ordered one of the gargoyles forward.

It presented Anaxares with a shovel. It was, he could not help but notice, made entirely of rubies. That monster.

"I will report this flagrant attempt of bribery to the proper authorities," Hierarch said.

"Which are?" Tyrant said, leaning forward with interest.

"The Tyrant of Helike," Anaxares reluctantly admitted.

"I expect he will chide me most thoroughly," the boy mused. "Rumour is he's a real stickler about these things."

"Why do you torment me so, Tyrant?" he sighed.

"Mostly habit, at this point," Kairos confessed. "It's like picking at a wound, once you start it's nigh impossible to stop."

"I will rise above this nonsense," Hierarch said. "I must see to my bedding."

"Did you notice that half the Bellerophan army is standing guard every night?" Tyrant cheerfully asked. "I think they mistook the Tolesian term for ten with the one meaning a thousand in their manual and they've been standing by the mistranslation ever since."

Anaxares' lips thinned, deeply offended at the insinuation that the Republic could ever make such a mistake. Even if they had, which they had not, it would have been a superior interpretation of the original text and inherently better by virtue of having been voted upon by the People. Naturally, as with all matters related to military texts, knowledge of what was voted upon would not have been held by the People as it was illegal for said knowledge to be held by any not having drawn the lot of soldiers. This was only right and proper. But he would not correct the Tyrant's blatantly false assertions, it would only encourage the boy.

"Huh," Kairos said. "I thought for sure that would do it. I suppose all that's left is helping you dig your hole."

Anaxares frowned.

"That would taint the work," he gravely said.

Relying upon foreign labour – which was, by definition, the product of tyranny – without official sanction was treason.

"Then I'd pick up the pace then, if I were you," the Tyrant grinned. "We're about to hold a war council and at this point nobody still believes they'll be able to get you into an actual tent."

The Gods were fickle, and so when the other dignitaries arrived the hole was only ankle-deep. Anaxares sat in in regardless, threadbare cloak pooling around him. The usual despots had crawled out of their ivory towers, it seemed. A two-striped askretis from Delos' Secretariat, a preached from Atalante laden with beads, the young Basileus of Nicae and his former colleague Magister Zoe of Stygia. The two grasping Exarchs of Penthes – they had not succeeded at assassinating or disgracing the other, and so now uneasily shared the mantle of Wanton Tyranny – and finally the dignified figure of Bellerophon's senior, and incidentally only, general. Flanked by kanenas ready to execute him at the first sign of treasonous ambition, he noted with approval. The Delosi askretis broke the silence first, sending one of his scribes for ink and parchment.

"The meaning of your metaphor escapes me, Hierarch," he said, eyeing the barely-visible hole curiously. "Could I trouble you to clarify it for the records?"

"It was not as wet as the ground further out," Anaxares explained.

"Ah," the askretis said, sounding enlightened. "And what does the ground stand for? The wetness?"

"Impiety, clearly," the Atalantian preacher said, clutching her beads. "The Hierarch reminds us of the virtue of humility, chiding us for this vainglorious enterprise."

"It is a hole," Magister Zoe mildly said. "That he is going to sleep in. Like he has every other night so far."

"How like a Stygian to grasp the obvious and only that," the Delosi dignitary scathingly dismissed.

"And so I do declare this session of the war council of the League of Free Cities to have formally begun," the Tyrant cheerfully said.

The crazed boy enjoyed these councils so much, Anaxares thought, largely because no one else did. He'd insisted they be held regularly with the full roster of League dignitaries.

"The Glorious Republic of Bellerophon," the general started, and Hierarch murmured 'First and Greatest of the Free Cities, May She Reign Forever' along with him, "would like to formally protest the opening of hostilities in the Samite Gulf."

"The record will show this," the askretis promised with religious fervour.

"I'll start bothering to listen to your people on the subject of fleets when you actually learn how to swim," the Basileus of Nicae retorted.

Anaxares' back straightened with indignation. This was calumny. The knowledge of how to swim had not been restricted in decades – has never been restricted or not, he immediately mentally corrected – though with good reason showing too much eagerness in learning the skill was considered suspicious.

"I've been led to believe this protest comes too late, regardless," the Tyrant of Helike said.

The young ruler of Nicae grit his teeth.

"Allies," he began, "do not spy on each other, Tyrant."

"Spy?" Kairos said, putting a trembling hand over his heart. "Gods, I would never. We merely helped your messengers carry their messages."

"Like anyone believes that," the Basileus sneered.

"Anyhow," Tyrant said, "as I was saying – my spies in the Nicaean ranks tell me the Ashuran fleet was taken by surprise while docked in Arwad and torched before the city itself was sacked."

The ruler of Nicae scoffed.

"Our ships withdrew afterwards," he added. "And are now blockading Smyrna. With the loss of their other fleet in the assault on Thalassina, the Ashurans are now effectively taken out of the war."

"Would the Republic care to protest the blockade a well?" the Delosi dignitary asked.

"Instructions will be sought from the People," the Bellerophan general stoutly replied.

And would be received, Anaxares thought, within the next six months after vote was held. Perhaps along with a suggested order of battle, if the message arrived when they'd entered the lands claimed by the Principate.

"That's all well and good, but the Thalassocracy was never our true worry," Magister Zoe opined. "Last we heard the armies of Levant were marching up Procer, in pursuit of the Carrion Lord. They're the ones we're at risk of encountering."

"This was a glorious victory," the Basileus insisted. "Simply because the Magisterium hardly contributed any ships you would-"

"You kicked the Ashurans while they were down, boy," one of the Penthesian Exarchs said, rolling her eyes. "If the Praesi hadn't slapped them around first we wouldn't be having this conversation."

"The foul empress Malicia struck a blow at all children of the Heavens, that day," the Atalantian preacher said. "Let us not celebrate the death of those taken while serving holy purpose."

"Bead-clutcher," Magister Zoe mocked. "Where was this ambivalence when we planned the invasion of Procer?"

"There is no invasion," Hierarch stated.

There was a moment of silence as all their gazes turned to him. Most of them, he realized, had forgotten he was even there.

"As the Principate of Procer is an assembly of grasping despots having forcefully seized land and authority from its inhabitants, legally speaking there can be no such thing as invasion of it," he clarified.

"Hear hear," the Tyrant grinned. "We are liberators, my friends. We undertake the gentle – kindly, even – business of liberating all those pretty Proceran cities. Certainly nothing so uncouth as invasion."

Even true words sounded incorrect coming from the boy's mouth, Anaxares thought. After that the council descended into the usual squabbles. The Penthesians wanted the armies of the League to march swifter through the Waning Woods, shaving days off the week remaining until they entered Iserre. Most other commanders disagreed on basis of such haste opening the soldiers to ambush by the creatures haunting the woods, though Magister Zoe was in agreement with the Exarchs and offered the slave phalanxes as vanguard. As usual, it came to nothing and the dignitaries retreated stewing in the same irritation they had brought with them. The Tyrant made a production of leaving the ruby shovel behind, but eventually followed suit. Anaxares remained in his hole, eyes closed. The visions came to his eyes and ears on the wind, unbidden and unwanted. He could only Receive them.

A blind boy treading through a dead city, carrying the deaths with him – lash and ladder, into ever deeper darkness. Armies gathering under mountains, a sea of banners snarling like wolves in the wind. The Augur sitting alone in a frosted garden, spoken whispers still echoing in her ears like a coiling snake. Death marching under water, darkening the sky in flocks, spreading like poison in a legion unending. A grinning woman in the dark smoking a pipe and gathering an army, seen only until pale blue eyes forced the vision to end. Bands of green things crawling out of tunnels swords in hands, silent in the night. A one-eyed orc and a woman dappled with ink, leading an army in flight. But most importantly of all, on some barren shore, a knight in white stood with his sword high. A killer who had taken lives, but never at his own behest. Behind him, looking through a coin, something unfathomable loomed. The Seraphim, Anaxares thought. The Choir of Judgement. The angels who had judged and slain people of the League.

The Hierarch smiled.

For that, they would be judged in turn.

—

Amadeus was bemused.

Upon realizing the depth of his mistake he'd expected swift death to follow, delivered by as many heroes as the opposition could scrape together for a spot of killing on the lake. Part of that had been correct. A band of Named had come after him, girded with Light and wearing the grim rictuses of individuals carrying out a necessary evil – always without the capital, of course, and preferably phrased as the 'greater good' instead. To his continued bafflement, however, they had yet to cut his throat. On one of the rare occasions where he was not put under enchantment to remain inert, mainly when it was deemed necessary that he be fed and allowed to relieve himself, he'd politely inquired to his captors about what kind of second-rate outfit they were running. Really, keeping him prisoner? It was asking for this story to be turned on them, considering the amount of loved ones he still had out there. Unless the Saint of Swords was intent on confessing her deep affections for him – unlikely, since she took great relish in punching him unconscious before enchantments were laid – it was likely someone in the opposition had decided to get clever about this.

Hearing out whatever funeral pyre of a plan was behind this ought to be good for a chuckle or two. He was awakened long enough for half-stale bread to be pressed into his hand, and he was left to eat it with the Saint of Swords standing behind him sword unsheathed. Though damnably hungry, Amadeus threw over his shoulder the stickiest crumbs he could find and smilingly excused it as an ancient Wasteland custom he could not eat without. Everyone knew Duni were an ignorant and superstitious lot, after all. Laurence de Montfort replied by clouting him over the ear, which he took as a moral victory. By the looks of their surroundings, they were still keeping to the countryside and avoiding roads and cities. The temperature had significantly cooled, though that could be the result of the turning season just as northwards travel.

"Drink," the Grey Pilgrim said, pressing the gourd to his lips.

Amadeus did. He'd inhabited this body as Named for so long he'd lost the sense of how long it would take for him to become this thirsty under more natural circumstances, but he suspected at least six hours. After, though, he pursued his curiosity.

"You appear to be carrying me north," he said. "And have been for... a fortnight, at least, likely more."

"That is none of your concern," the Pilgrim said, the Levantine roots subtly affecting his pronunciation of Lower Miezán.

Amadeus raised an eyebrow.

"Are you quite certain," he said, "that you would not prefer to extol your plan to me in great detail?"

He didn't even hear the blow coming. The Saint, he mused when they woke him the following day, did not have much of a sense of humour. He told her as much while picking at his daily bread.

"Think you're funny, do you?" Laurence de Montfort sneered.

He was not, in fact, certain she was sneering. He was facing the wrong way and quite tightly bound, save for his forearms. But given the tone, he would allow himself to presume.

"I have my moments," Amadeus mused. "I did hear this funny jest, from someone very dear to me. It was about this very arrogant woman who had her belly opened and crawled away holding in her guts."

He paused.

"The punchline is that you'll grow old and die, while Hye won't," he helpfully added.

He did not get to finish his bread that evening, by dint of being knocked unconscious. To his amusement, the following night it was another hero standing behind him. The Rogue Sorcerer, he thought, if the old reports of the Eyes had any accuracy to them. Likely the author of the enchantment that kept him slumbering as the others journeyed.

"I've been instructed to put you under spell of silence if you attempt to engage me in conversation," the hero quietly told him.

"That seems unnecessary," Amadeus said. "I am, after all, entirely at your power."

"Pilgrim's orders," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

"That is unfortunate," the dark-haired man said. "It is not too late to save your parents."

No reply was given. Amadeus frowned, then yelled as loudly as he could. None of the heroes breaking their fast so much as glanced in his direction. Ah, already under the spell. He had neither heard nor felt the man cast. Interesting. He truly was bereft of even the smallest trace of his Name. He flicked a miffed glance at the ground.

"Before my last stand, truly?" he said. "I could have slain a few on my way down, you cheapskates."

Four more evenings, and not once did the Grey Pilgrim do him the courtesy of a morality debate by the fireside. He could respect the professionalism involved, but it was really quite irksome. Three more after that, and once: the last awakening, to his surprise, was in the middle of the night. Someone had botched their enchantment, it seemed. Amadeus found himself quite tightly constrained: manacles on his feet, ropes on his legs, another set of manacles keeping his hands behind his back and what looked like an enchanted band of middle around his chest. Well, they wouldn't take themselves off on their own. He quietly rolled around until his fingers clasped around a somewhat sharp rock, and he considered the manner in which this should be approached. He'd need to dislocate at least one of his arms, and likely a wrist as well. To slip the manacle he'd need blood to ease the way, and that meant cutting open a vein – though he'd need to be careful not to nick an artery, as he was rather troublingly fragile at the moment. Wound first, he decided. It'd be harder to be accurate with the stone if his arm was already dislocated. Shifting his fingers, he began digging the sharp edge into his skin.

"I'm curious," the Wandering Bard said. "After you slip loose, assuming you can, then what?"

Amadeus sighed.

"Debate is still taking place," he replied, "as to whether I should attempt to steal a horse or shove this humble stone through a hero's eye socket."

"Pretty sure Laurence can outrun a horse," the Bard mused.

"I can't," he quite reasonably pointed out. "Small steps... what happens to be your name, at the moment?"

"Marguerite of Baillons," the Bard replied.

He snorted.

"Alamans, truly?" he said. "Were all the other bodies taken?"

"Hey, if I could pick I'd be a seven foot tall blonde with a miraculous rack and thighs like trees every single time," the Bard said. "Now that was a spin of the wheel. They don't make them like that in Levant anymore."

He moved around, trying to sit, but found himself stuck on the ground. Most unpleasant. The Wandering Bard lent a helping hand, dragging him up, and he found himself looking at the abomination's latest form. Slender and dark-haired, loose and going down her back. Smiling blue eyes and heart-shaped lips. A convincing facsimile of life, he would concede. The flask in her hand was already open, and her shoddy lute laying further down in the grass.

"Drink?" she offered.

"Most kind of you," he agreed.

She poured the liquor down his throat until he raised his hand, swallowing a cough.

"Gods," Amadeus got out. "Is that the horrid fermented cherry extract from Atalante?"

"It's just the foulest thing, isn't it?" she grinned. "It's like it can't decide whether it wants to be sweets or poison."

"And to think they call me a monster," he muttered. "I've never fed such torment to prisoners."

"Another?" Marguerite offered.

"Might as well," Amadeus said. "I'm not looking forward to opening that vein, this ought to take the edge off."

Another spot of torture later his belly and throat had warmed, at the mere price of the taste of a violently misused orchard taking over his palate.

"So, you might be wondering why I'm here," the Bard said.

"I'm rather more curious as to why none of your fellows have awakened," he said. "Their senses should be sharper than that."

"If they were going to wake, I wouldn't be here," Marguerite shrugged.

"Convenient," Amadeus said.

"Eh," she hedged. "I don't need to tell you how tetchy providence can get. Even with loaded dice you have to roll."

"I take it this a visit in your official capacity, then," he said.

"Surprised, are we?" she grinned, revealing slightly crooked teeth.

"It was my theory that you could only work through Named," Amadeus said. "I find it rather horrifying that you are evidently not so restricted."

While the dark-haired man currently believed himself to be without power – and would comport himself as such – it remained only a theory. There were likely no greater expert on namelore alive than the Wandering Bard, insofar as she was that, and so her confirmation or denial would hold some weight. No overmuch, of course, as she was still a hostile entity. But it would be a useful entry to this running mental tally.

"Still fishing, huh?" Marguerite smiled. "That's not Name so much as it is nature, I think. Needing a plan, always a plan, even if you're screaming inside."

"You praise me overmuch," Amadeus said. "You have, after all, defeated –"

"Warlock's dead," the Wandering Bard said.

He paused. She might be lying. To hurt him, to cloud his... Amadeus breathed in, breathed out. It was set aside.

"Blew up a fleet going out, but that's more than a fair trade," Marguerite said. "Empire's a real mess at the moment, since he vaporized the better part of Thalassina with his last hurrah. Your little friend up high's going spare trying to keep it all together."

"Yet you are here," Amadeus said. "And not there, stoking the fires."

"Catherine got herself killed again," the Bard casually said. "And let me tell you, now that was a show. You don't often see that calibre of foolishness slugging it out no holds barred."

His fingers tightened. Breathe in, breathe out. Control. The moment he lost control, the creature would make use of him for whatever purpose she needed. It might be time to consider smashing his head into the ground until he fell unconscious.

"It's fascinating, watching you take that paternal feeling by the throat and just..." Marguerite snapped her fingers, "There goes the neck. Back into the box it goes."

The taunts were immaterial. Useful information could still be had. Amadeus put a tremor to his voice.

"She wouldn't die that easily," he said, making himself look away.

"Glancing away is the part Malicia taught you, isn't it?" the Bard mused. "She's good. Must have guessed the eyes would give up the game, it's always the hardest part to master."

The frightful depths of that thing's perception were not to be underestimated, he mentally conceded. She was, after all, entirely right. Cold green eyes flicked back to study her face.

"You're headed for Salia, in case you were wondering," Marguerite said. "They're keeping you in the countryside because Hasenbach knows they have you. She sent half a hundred companies out with orders to take you into custody."

"Did she now?" Amadeus said.

"Second order is to cut off your head the moment they have you," the Bard continued amusedly. "She's not best pleased you're not already decorating a pike. Tariq's going to get an earful."

He'd known there was a reason he liked the woman. She had a good head on her shoulders, to wish the opposite of him.

"I am to be paraded before the crowds, then," he said.

"Nah, they'll get a hero under illusion for that," Marguerite said. "Saint's gonna cut out your soul and have it bound to something, she insisted. They want bait, not to risk a rescue."

Implying that, to the best of the Pilgrim's knowledge, there were still villains in the East he could be considered bait for. He could not know whether or not Eudokia was still with the legions. If she'd judged it feasible he could be reacquired she would have left without a second thought, but in the absence of that Scribe would remain with Grem. Assassin was still in Ashur, presumably, and impossible to contact. That much had been necessary to ensure the Augur could not interfere. That left Catherine – allegedly dead, though that was admittedly not always enough to stop her – and perhaps Masego. Unless what the Bard has told me is false, he thought. Or what she has shared is true, and the Pilgrim does not know it.

Too many unknowns for a solid strategic assessment, and no real way to acquire the information he needed through reliable sources. If he had the means, if he could lead a message, if. What a bastard word to be curtailed by. Pushing aside the frustration, Amadeus forced himself to consider the conversation through broader perspective. It should not be taking place at all, he thought. He held no Name, commanded no armies and if she had spoken true the Calamities had largely ended as threat. Neither Eudokia nor Assassin could be counted on for independent action, and held highly limited direct martial value besides. His sole remaining worth was as a hostage, and that was not the Wandering Bard's game.

Why, then, was she here?

"There's one part of you that I actually like, did you know?" Marguerite said. "It's also what I hate the most, but it does tend to be that way with villains."

"I make a very good lentil soup," Amadeus suggested.

Behind the pithy words he observed her carefully. Now they entered the field of revelations, the most dangerous part of this dangerous conversation.

"You don't digest defeat," the Bard said. "It doesn't fill your belly, weigh you down. You dissect it, read the entrails like an augury, and then ask yourself – if I could do it again, how would I do it better?"

He watched her in silence.

"Even now," she murmured, "behind the eyes there's a few cogs turning. What can I do? How should I do it? And they'll only stop when you die."

"Which," Amadeus said, "looks to be rather soon."

"Nah," the Wandering Bard. "You don't get to be a rallying cry. See, you paid your dues."

His eyes narrowed.

"You're no favourite son, it's true," she mused. "You never played the game the way you're meant to. But you did kill the opposition and tip the scales. They wouldn't cut you loose after that, it's now how they do things."

"I am," Amadeus said, "no longer the Black Knight."

"You don't fit that groove anymore," Marguerite said. "Powerless you ain't, Maddie. You know what you are, deep down, you just think it's beneath you."

His fingers tightened under the knuckles were white.

"Claimant," the Wandering Bard said. "You can have your second shot at it, you're owed that. But if you really want it?"

She drank deep, then wiped her mouth.

"Well, there's always a price isn't there?" she shrugged. "So tell me, Amadeus of the Green Stretch..."

She smiled, crooked and wide under moonlight.

"What do you think is right?" she asked.

She leaned forward.

"How far are you willing to go, to see it done?"

He closed his eyes. She was gone a moment later when he opened them, without so much as a whisper. He was silent and still, for a very long time.

Mistake, he thought.

---

fbt

idk wtf is going on in the chapter, tbh, but i'm sooooo happy for more time with black. I luuuuv him. Still reminds me of a fantasy world version of Avon more than a little, and that's a a good (to me, at least!) thing. Some interesting speculation above in the comments. Waiting anxiously to see where it goes...

Troy Hunter

Oh god, I'm not going to have a Practical Guide to Evil over winter break. Kill me now.

Andrew Mitchell

Don't worry Troy. There's well over 200 chapters are ready for you to re-read. I'm currently in Book 2, just before (first) Liesse.

Adrian\_V

Man i saw the clock and thought "new chapter of the guide!!"
until reality came crashing down on me T.T

Erraticerrata have you thought of adding another extra section for trivia and world information, i mean things about the setting that would be good to know but are hard to put in the story like wich heroes/named (i case 1 or 2 weren't strictly heroes) founded the dominion (where Pilgrim comes from) and what are they characteristics for example (of the names) or backgorund tales like how the Thief of Stars got her name.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

This is such a good story.

Just This Guy, Y'know

I missed it- when did Warlock go boom?

RanVor

Interlude: Inheritance.

M0och

. A killer who had taken lives, but never at his own behest. Behind him, looking through a coin, something unfathomable loomed. The Seraphim, Anaxares thought. The Choir of Judgement. The angels who had judged and slain people of the League.

The Hierarch smiled.

For that, they would be judged in turn.

Probs one of the best lines I have ever read. It sent shivers down my spine...

SMHF

The feeling when u bring up The Guide's page before remembering it's on a break... T_T

Owyn Beleforte

Strange devils riding to slaughter in the night, an endless horde of orcs and heretics that at(missing an e here) the corpses of the fallen

crysjal

I've figured out the mistake. The Bard clearly thinks that Amadeus's claim is for Dread Emperor, and pretty much stated it when she says that he had the chance before and didn't take it.

What if she's wrong about that.

Liliet

Well, I definitely think that's not what he's going to do 😊 the question is, is Amadeus really confident enough of his read on Bard to assume that's a mistake she made?

Mental Mouse

He's certainly confident enough. Whether he's right is another question entirely. 😊

Liliet

We don't know that he's confident in that. We don't know who the word "mistake" was actually referring to, which is my point 😊

letouriste

a war on angel for judgment and a mistake shrouded in mystery.
way to finish a book!:) ) that last sentence got me all confused but i trust black to manage whatever the shit that was. i stand by my old theories until proven otherwise

dgj212

N0000000. I just caught up to the story. I literally started two or three weeks ago.

Anywho I like this story as a whole, Catherine is funny, sad to hear about ratface, I am genuinely curious why people are not using Wax Tablets, and I wonder if Catherine will be a chaos knight or some how trap an angel and a devil and create a new choir, one with intention of breaking the deadlock. Being the one that breaks the tie. Neither good nor evil.

warriormonk19

I agree that this is an unpleasant development in the storyline for the readers who believe that Cat should have acquired more power by defeating Sve Noc and devouring Night. The vast majority of web fiction deals with 'power fantasies', so it's unsurprising that some of the readers who have grown used to the very specific plot developments are unhappy with this one. Including myself. Furthermore, while I understand moral story erratic is going for with this theme, I do not think it practical.

I'm not an official student of history or even politics, but having a 'bigger stick' mostly ensures your victory, regardless of the 'stories' that may be told about you. Russia invaded Ukraine irregardless of whatever the rest of the world said, for example. Either way, this was Cat's bet to make, that Sve Noc would resurrect her, but I can't help but wonder whether things would have been different if Cat had fully exploited Winter's powers right from the get go. You don't see stories like the one Cat is trying to tell or build in the real world often, and I think for a good reason. Because it doesn't work most of the time. Sometimes more power IS the answer.

Regardless, this isn't the point I wanted to make with this comment. The story will go where it goes, and I'm just here for the ride. The point that I DID want to make was that I doubt that Cat will be able to just wave away opinions or orders from Sve Noc. Sve Noc is now a Goddess(?), one that has combed through the entirety of Cat's soul and granted it life again. She literally owns Cat's life, and that's even without the implications of Cat being a freaking priestess beholden to her. Cat's essentially an apostle, and I have a hard time believing that she's going to have independence from Sve Noc now.

Either way, good luck with the final book captain erratic, I'll be here for the ride.

Terion

I think the reason Cat gave away her power was that she realised that no matter how big her stick was, she was a tool of Below. Hence she decided on a move aimed to outplay them, in a way that minimised the danger to herself.

Don't forget that she has traded a risky personal power that she could not hold on to anyway at that point. For a strategic solution that might actually solve the problem she had before she became embroiled in Drow business.

On another note. The opening quote seems to be missing a word: none are beyond salvation, not even the likes of. Seems to be missing "us"

Nathan Fish

The power of Winter was slowly turning Cat into a Fae. She was learning slower, becoming more tied to stories. If she had leaned into it from the beginning, she would have been powerful, but she might have crossed the point of no return before realizing what was happening.

Hydrargentium

I can't take warriormonk19's response seriously, even though I would have otherwise, had he not used the word, "irregardless".

Hg

warriormonk19

Damn you got me. Regardless, my points are valid!! (At least, they're my opinions lol)

clintcleez

I'd have to agree, didn't like the direction cats story took

Komplode

Well looks like it's time to re read pgte again

Scurra

When's the next chapter btw?

Barthumphries

I don't know.

James, Mostly Harmless

January 14 2019. ee takes a deserved month long break at the end of each book.

tbarim

I'm pretty sure the claim Amadeus still has is on the name White Knight.

1. As the Squire, he would have had a claim on both Black and White, (Bard specifically refers to a remaining claim here).

2. Given his goal of proving that Evil can win, and his personality, I could easily see him thinking becoming the White Knight as beneath him.

3. Given how important repeating patterns are in this world, Catherine following in her "father's" footsteps as potential heroes that chose evil instead would be likely.

4. Amadeus's origin story. Farmboy meets a pretty girl in town who then gets kidnapped by a Villain in a Tower. How could he not have a claim on a heroic name?

Scurra

except for the part where there is already a white knight and Amadeus is pure evil I doubt he would get a heroic name. His entire personality works against it and he'd probably rather die

Barthumphries

It would be just like Amadeus to do what ... whatever name she's going by now just did – pull a heel-face turn. Imagine Amadeus wandering out into the square, Pilgrim and Saint stare at him aghast, and he informs them that he was released by the Wandering Bard as the radiant light of the heavens shines down, anointing him as the Gray Paladin as he summons his Celestial Steed.

If Catherine was an Evil hero for Good reasons why can't he be a Good hero for Evil reasons?

And then as the watching populace and royalty cheer at their new Savior in the fight against the Dead King, et al, he turns so that only Pilgrim and Saint can see him and winks.

Miles

Good reasons implies she was an evil hero in service to Good. It just contradicts itself. Her good reasons were not Good, just good.

Maginot's Wall

Has anyone noticed that the Wandering Bard has taken a sort of sinister turn? Acting, with clenched teeth, for the Gods Below in resetting Amadeus's name and releasing him, or in giving the Sisters of Night what they wanted so long ago. Even the two elves she chased off seemed fearful. Maybe she is as much a mortal with apotheosis as the Dead King? Certainly the Dead King's name for her, Intercessor, seems more accurate than to call her a heroine...

Maginot's Wall

And I'm atwitter about the unrealized Goblin rebellion which assassinated Juniper's mum.

TheCount

it could have been Milica as well, but we will know it from an interlude most likely.

TheCount

Malicia* , i have no idea how i did that....

Mental Mouse

The Wandering Bard has always been sinister once you see past the mask. I don't think she's specifically in service to Good, but to both sets of gods. Essentially, she is in service to Story – over the course of the story, she mostly opposes the villains because their leading lights (notably Amadeus and Cat) have been trying quite hard to break free of the stories, and neither side wants that. But now she sees a chance to drag Amadeus back onto the figurative Wheel....

Aston Whiteman

Looking forward to the new Book.

Been a while but your votes remain high.

Adrian V

Soon this horrible time without the guide to guide us will end!! (don't lynch me for the bad pun, i couldn't resist!!)

Aston Whiteman

Pun?

Aston Whiteman

Reading another web serial makes me understand why EE takes a month away from writing.

It's really needed.

And now for Priestess Cat.

Aeon

The way the Wandering Bard mentioned that Amadeus thought the role he had claim to was beneath him made me think that she's nudging him to become Chancellor. The way he sees everything as gears and control would fit.

papermaster

Rereading, and it dawned on me only now that Wandering Bard is echoing Black's own words to Catherine when they first met, all the way in Chapter 1. What a set-up. Amazing writing, EE.

---

"Do you know what separates people who have a Role from people who don't, Catherine?" Black asked.

I shook my head.

"Will," he said. "The belief, deep down, that they know what is right and that they'll see it done."

My throat caught. Was he implying what I thought he was?

"So tell me, Catherine Foundling," he murmured, his voice smooth as velvet. "What do you think is right?"

He spun the knife so that the handle faced me, the touch of his fingertips deft and light.

"How far are you willing to go, to see it done?"

I could feel the eyes of the two gagged guards on me, but I ignored them.

---

"Claimant," the Wandering Bard said. "You can have your second shot at it, you're owed that. But if you really want it?"

She drank deep, then wiped her mouth.

"Well, there's always a price isn't there?" she shrugged. "So tell me, Amadeus of the Green Stretch..."

She smiled, crooked and wide under moonlight.

"What do you think is right?" she asked.

She leaned forward.

"How far are you willing to go, to see it done?"

He closed his eyes.

nasiba

**sigh**

Ok, I've loved this series and recommended it to several people but seven hells I'm glad book 4 is over. It's been a drag, with Cat's constant moral crisis, whining, moping. And the Drow arc was just tedious and way, way too long. It's the first time I've actually skimmed chapters. I knew Cat was going to lose Winter somehow, it was obviously taking a toll on her, robbing her of her humanity and making her increasingly OP. I was longing for the good old Cat from the first books. I did want her "human" again but not without power. So she had better have plenty after this because philosophy aside, nothing in the story would have happened had she not been a Named and there is no way to sell a believable fight if she doesn't have power to use against her foes, which are the worst yet. She's not sending the Dead King back home with prayers and speeches.

That said, thank god Black is still alive. And to those who have said he could wind up on the side of "good" somehow, it was stated plainly by the Bard that he was released because he had met his "debt" to Below, although they had expected more from him, but he wasn't free of them because "that's not how they roll". If he takes another Name, he has no choice but to be Evil. I think the "mistake" she made might be that she confirmed to him that she can only meddle with Named or Claimants to a Name and therefore he may refuse it altogether so she can't influence him. Who knows. Love Black, more Black, Black all the time. I can see why he was almost the protagonist of the books, he's such a great character.

clintcleez

I agree with pretty much everything you said, especially about how boring the last book was and how cat kept flipping back between moral delima outta no where and the fact that she lost a lot of advantages

Zopilote 506

MAH BOI ANAXARES IS FINALLY HERE

BargleNawdleZouss

I'm re-reading this for like the third time. Do we have any idea who the other two heroes are accompanying the Grey Pilgrim, Saint of Swords, and the Rogue Sorceror in this band of five?

Just curious.

---