

Book 7

Prologue

"Twenty-two: do not forget the rest of Creation in the pursuit of your nemesis. Small kindnesses are the seed of grand consequences. Evil stays, Good compounds."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", unknown author

The entire Hirshwald, where she had once hunted with her cousins, was now painted grey. Teurshen and its lively muddy streets, Kleinach with its pretty green houses, Senken River where every spring people from miles away had come to fish. It was all grey.

Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, watched day by day as her realm died on beautifully painted map.

Word trickled in from every front, following the scrying lines she had laid down through the Order of the Red Lion, and with every dawn the court painter drew a few more leagues of the Principate grey on the map at the heart of the Vogue Archive. Hannover was now bare of life, likely beyond recovery in this lifetime. Her own Rhenia was entirely in the hands of the dead save for the besieged city-fortress that was its capital. Only its first two layers of defence had been lost, last she heard from her commander there, but scrying had since been cut. Twilight's Pass still held – the Morgentor had been lost twice, but the Kingfisher Prince and Otto Redcrown had led daring offensives to take it back both times – yet that was meaningless when the last fortresses of the Hocheben Heights had fallen and the dead were pushing deep in Bremen.

Ashen grey, death's breath grey, spread through towns and villages that Cordelia had ridden through as a girl.

"The north fell the moment the Heights did," the Forgetful Librarian told her the day the news came, bluntly but not cruelly. "There won't be a living soul north of Brus come next winter."

Cordelia thought of striking her but held back. It was not untrue, and these days she had come to rely on the Librarian's propensity for brutal truthfulness. Most people would have held back when warning her of the effective end of her people as more than refugees and soldiers of fortune, but Cordelia no longer had time to spare for being handled. Clarity was a priceless luxury when every hour, every decision had lives on the line.

Saale, a small fortress first raised under the Iron Kings. The seven adjoining villages called the Shwestern, which Cordelia had once developed with coin in the hopes that they might grow into a small city. The valley of Kaninchenbau. Grey spread on the map, like a maw opening to devour the world whole.

"The refugees cannot stay in Brus," Cordelia said, watching the end times take shape.

Her eyes had misted, when she'd heard that Frederic Goethal had opened his gates wide to all Lycaonese. Brus was not rich, its lands hardly any better than those of its northern neighbours', so the Prince of Brus had effectively bankrupted himself when he'd welcomed four principalities' worth of teenagers and children. More than that, too. Every piece of bread shared with her people could not fill the belly of his own, and these days no one had granaries to fall back on. He had sacrificed a great deal for innocents. A crown is not a privilege, she'd once told Frederic when they'd been younger. Unsure of their power, of where they stood. It is a duty. He'd not asked a damned thing for any of it, the Kingfisher Prince.

Cordelia had known few men worthier of being a prince than Frederic Goethal.

"Brus will soon begin seeing fighting," the Librarian agreed. "The captains in Neustria sent too many reports of their fortresses being bypassed by raiders. We send your refugees further south, then. Segovia?"

"The ships will make a difference in evacuating further south still, should the principality collapse," Cordelia mused, and so it was settled.

The Highest Assembly had voted her emergency powers allowing her to settle refugees wherever she wished in the Procer, so long as part of the financial burden was shared by the high throne. She'd nearly faced a revolt in the Chamber over the motion, which stepped on the neck of all traditional conceptions of royal sovereignty, but they'd not quite had the nerve. Cordelia had unearthed too many of the skeletons her princes had buried for them to want to risk it. When she'd passed a measure allowing her to appoint superintendence supervising the collection of princely taxes, the First Prince had gotten a closer look at their finances than any of them were comfortable with.

No wonder they'd been willing to fight her tooth and nail over the motion: a little over half of them had been cheating the high throne on taxes. In times of peace that would have been a minor scandal, but in times of war? Cordelia had the authority to have their heads for it, and that wasn't even the part that terrified them. All she needed to do to ruin them was spread word to the street: entire cities would riot, screaming for the blood of the traitors. The way she kept ramming measures through was making her no friends, and even losing her allies, but Cordelia Hasenbach was not reigning for pleasure or friendship. If there was enough of Procer left to rebel against her after the war ended, she would walk to the headsman's block with a smile.

The Lafran Stretch, Belles Collines, Faudefer and Patrin. The last two had still been full of people when the dead tunneled under the walls. Grey spread across the map, and not only to the north.

Cordelia's dying homeland was but a third of the war, if even that, and dooms never came alone. Hainaut had come out the best of it, irony of ironies. The Black Queen had stripped the principality of most her armies before retreating, but she had left her last general – Lady Abigail Tanner – in a solid defensive position at the Cigelin Sisters. The grounds won against the dead by the victory at Hainaut had been promptly lost anew, the dead claiming them quicker than they could be defended, but the White Knight had broken the bridge to the north and so ended the immediate looming threat.

The Chosen had followed that up by scoring an upset victory at Malmedit that collapsed the tunnels and anchored the eastern defence line before dedicating himself body and soul to the war on Keter. He had led regular sorties into enemy territory to break up their forces before they could mass in large numbers, to great success. The White Knight had in truth been so effective there'd been talk of trying to seize and fortify the ruins of the capital to secure the locked Hellgate there, though General Abigail had forcefully stamped out any such notions. Once Cordelia would have enjoyed the White Knight's successes, the way they proved Damned were not the only ones who could lead in dark times, but no longer.

Hanno of Arwad had crossed a line in the Arsenal, when he'd made the choice to stand in the way of the preservation of Procer. If it had been only a moment of hard-headed principle divorced from the realities of the situation, in time Cordelia might have grown to forgive it. Trust would not have resumed, but wariness would have ebbed. But it was not as simple as that. Cordelia could not think of the way the White Knight had refused to negotiate, to compromise, without hearing in those terse answers the echo of another Chosen's voice. Laurence de Montfort, the Saint of Swords, feet on the table as she told Cordelia that the Procer must burn so something better might come of it.

Would Hanno of Arwad let them burn too, for his principles? Cordelia found she was not sure of the answer, not anymore. There could be no trust there, no relying on the Chosen. As in so many things she stood alone.

"The Heights were a body blow, but it's Cleves that will kill us if anything does," the Librarian sighed on a cold winter morning, sipping at a mug of tea.

The third and last front, Rozala Malanza's. For years it had been the story of victory, the proof that the dead could be beaten back that'd been so instrumental in keeping Procer from sinking into despair. And to her honour the Princess of Aquitan had stubbornly held even in the face of a Hellgate yawning open while she still suffered the siege of a great army of the dead. She could not be everywhere, though. The northern point of Cleves still held, and parts of the eastern shoreline as well, but Keter had swept out of Lake Pavin and devoured whole the western shore.

Tertre, Sengrin, Laguerroche. Grey spread like a sickness in the blood.

The walled city of Atandor was now under siege, and should it fall then the dead would have a way into the lowlands of Cleves. More terrible still, the forces of the Kingdom of the Dead would find nothing in their way as they spilled further south onto the plains of Brabant and Lyonis. And Atandor would fall, in three months at the latest. Agnes had been clear on that, as clear as the Augur could ever be. Its defenders had not run out of valour, but they had run out of food.

When the dead made it that far south, the war was over. Even if all they did was burn the crop fields before retreating, the ensuing starvation would collapse the Principate. Then even should the Kingdom of Callow be willing to starve itself feeding Procer, which was highly dubious, in practice the grain simply could not be moved and distributed quickly enough. There was a secret truth behind it all, though, one Cordelia had grasped in the wake of her uncle's death at Hainaut: the war was already lost. For Procer, anyway, if not yet the rest of Calernia. This was no longer about winning, it was about saving what she still could. Who she still could.

"We will have to recall Princess Rozala and her army before Atandor falls," the First Prince said.

It was giving most of Cleves over to the grey, but then it had already been made into a wasteland by Keter's Due when the Hellgate was opened near Trifelin. With so many of its best farmlands blighted, the principality could no longer feed itself.

"If she puts up a defence line around Peroulet it could hold for a few months while the dead are still massing," the Librarian muttered. "It won't be a popular decision, mind you, but it's the right one."

It was more than the army Cordelia wanted to salvage. Should she get assassinated – and it was becoming more likely that she would be with every measure forced through the Highest Assembly – then the only other royal in Procer that could feasibly be elected to the high throne without too much quibbling was Rozala Malanza. The Princess of Aequitan might be one of the finest generals left to Procer, but she was now simply too valuable to keep risking in Cleves. Malanza would hate her for the order, but what did it matter? She had hated Cordelia to the bone since the Great War, and there would be no mending a hatred born of a mother's death.

"Gods forgive me," the Librarian suddenly said, "but we're not going to win this war, are we?"

Cordelia went still, for a heartbeat. She had not thought anyone else had noticed, not quite so soon. She needed a few months still before it became known, before panic and chaos spread-

"It'll be out east it's decided, in Praes," the Forgetful Librarian continued. "If the Black Queen can bring back diabolists and reinforcements in time for a strike at Keter to still be feasible."

The First Prince did not allow her relief to touch her face.

"Catherine Foundling will do what she must to settle the East," Cordelia said, dimly surprised to find she meant every word. "We must simply keep Procer afloat until she returns and the last gamble of this war can be taken."

That, though, was a lie. There was one last gamble awaiting beyond that, if arms failed and it all came down to the spectre of annihilation looming over all of Calernia. The First Prince had found the funds and the men, ensured all that could be done was. The corpse that had been dredged up from the depths of Lake Artoise could be awoken, the priests had promised her. It could be used as a weapon. One that would destroy Procer, perhaps, but Procer was already halfway into the grave. If it all else failed, Cordelia Hasenbach was not only the First Prince of Procer: she was also the Warden of the West. She had a responsibility to ensure at least some of Calernia survived the Dead King's fury.

And that responsibility, now, was as a finger laid against a trigger.

—

Alaya did not enjoy war.

It'd surprised her when she had understood as much about herself, as she'd believed herself a harder woman than that. No tyrant had ever climbed the Tower to less than a stairway's worth of corpses and she had certainly been no exception, so she'd wondered what it was about war that made her balk. It was not the violence, surely, for Alaya was no stranger to the use of it. Rarely by her own hands, but to a Dread Empress of Praes assassination was no less a necessary tool of ruling than laws or taxes. Was it the magnitude, she had wondered? Edmund Inkhand had once written, in that sardonically pointed manner so typical of his journals, that men only disapproved of murder so long as it did not involve banners and great numbers.

Yet though Alaya had enjoyed reading the old king's writings as a girl and then differently so as a woman, she simply did not have it in her to care for people – strangers, people in the abstract – the way that he so obviously had. Grief at the human condition was not burden she had to bear, so what had been the source of her unease? It was the indiscriminate nature of it all, Alaya had later come to understand after decades of wondering. The Conquest had been one of the cleanest, most efficient wars in living memory: it had been largely soldiers that died during it, no cities were sacked and the countryside was not ravaged. And still the entire exercise had been like a stone in a shoe.

War could not be controlled, not really. It could not be contained the way that assassination and intrigues could, risk and results balanced like lines of a ledger. To Alaya's eyes, using war to achieve one's ends was rather like setting fire to a house to kill a man: dangerous as much to you as the enemy. No without reason was it an old saying in the Wasteland that a lit blaze knew neither friend nor foe.

Knowing all this about herself, Dread Empress Malicia found herself darkly amused that she had regardless spent the last five years and change at war with other powers to various degrees. Most ironic of all was the civil war that Praes was still in the throes of, which she had spent no small amount of effort to start and then maintain in order to preserve her interests and that of the Empire. Perhaps that was why even going from success to success had somehow only increased her unease.

The dark-skinned beauty ran a finger across the obsidian table at which the Imperial council sat in session, admiring how it was all sculpted out of a single piece. Reputedly it was the work of Regalia II, carved when she'd been out campaigning in Callow. Given her death abroad it'd never been used by the empress herself: it was her successor, Maledicta II, who'd been the first to sit at it. In some parts of Praes there was even a turn of phrase about the tale: 'carving an empress' table', which meant undertaking an effort that would benefit only your successor.

Alaya was not particularly fond of the sculpted rim, which was a parade of twisting devils and kneeling foes, but she had fond memories of the table itself. She'd spent many hours seated at it during some of the best years of her life, those heady days after she had climbed the Tower and she had set to reforming Praes with the people dearest to her in the world. Back then the heart of her council had been made up of a trusted few: Amadeus, Wekesa and Ime. On occasion others had been brought in for a few months or years so that particular issues might be settled with their expertise, but they had always been temporary additions.

Nowadays Alaya found her council was little like the old one, for all that Ime and a Black Knight still sat on it.

The mirror above the ever-burning fireplace in the back subtly fogged over, the polished bronze growing clouded as the old enchantment bound to the hallways outside the council room were triggered. Malicia retreated towards the end of the table, ensuring she would be seated by the time the first of them entered – she took the time to array herself in the throne-like seat, draping the folds of her bronze and green dress in a way that she knew lent her a regal air. Ime was the first to enter, as was her habit. Malicia's spymistress was visibly aging these days, the alchemies and spells that had slowed the ravages finally unravelling.

It was not an unusual thing in highborn, who all suffered the same fate when their flesh inevitably grew inured to the alchemies and began rejecting the spells. Some became desperate and began dealing with devils then, but only the foolish dared and Ime was nothing of the sort. It was a graceful aging, too, for all that the spymistress resented it: though her hair was now turning white and her skin creasing, she remained in good shape and firm flesh. Not that Ime would see it that way, of course.

Alaya was well aware that Wasteland aristocrats had an instinctual disgust towards the signs of old age, most of them having come to associate it with the lowborn as a consequence of being raised by ageless and seemingly forever-young relatives. It was a self-reinforcing shame, as highborn visible aging tended to retreat from good society to maintain the illusion of agelessness through their discretion. Malicia's spymistress offered a short bow, her modest blue robes whispering against the floor as she did, and wordlessly headed for the seat to the empress' left as she had for decades. The other woman she had been awaiting took longer to arrive, and took a different route.

It was necessary, given that Malicia's current Black Knight was an ogre and so physically incapable of squeezing through most doors.

High Marshal Nim – raised above other marshals after coming into her Name – was a very deliberate individual. The eastern door had been heightened and broadened for her but even so the ogre opened it slowly, as if she were afraid of slamming it into the wall. The Black Knight lowered her head to pass the threshold and only straightened when she was under the high ceiling of the council room, her plain armour of dark steel plate pulling taut against her. She wore no helm, leaving bare two dark braids framing a tanned face as the rest of her hair went down her back untied. Her large eyes were a pale brown that leaned into pink, and her face seemed pulled into a permanent frown that made her large nose even more prominent.

She looked like something of a brute, as all ogres did, but Malicia knew better. Amadeus, on one of their evenings drinking terrible wine together, had noted that while Grem One-Eye was likely the finest general in the Dread Empire the ogre was a closer match to him than Ranker by a significant margin. Nim inclined her head and chest in the approximation of a bow, taking her prepared enchanted steel seat at the end of table facing Malicia. If there were others the Black Knight would have been seated at the empress' right, as was customary, but there was no need for such pageantry when it was only the three of them. There would be no fourth: Malicia had not allowed the honour of the Warlock's seat to any of the mages serving her.

The empress opened the council herself, voice ringing out.

"We have word from Foramen," Dread Empress Malicia said. "The Confederation of the Grey Eyries was... emboldened by news of the Black Queen's coming. They have resumed their attacks against Foramen and High Lady Wither."

Nim grimaced, thick lips pulling at thicker skin. All expressions looked exaggerated on ogres, by virtue of their size. It often made them seem foolish or stupid, so most who left the Hall of Skulls learned to school their faces into neutrality to avoid the impression – and so now their kind was known as being inexpressive instead.

"That tangles up the entire south for us, Your Dread Majesty," the Black Knight said. "Wither won't move while the enemy is at her gate, and Kahtan will be looking to sink a knife in her back."

High Lady Takisha of Kahtan would no doubt phrase it differently, Malicia thought, but Nim was essentially correct. With Thalassina a blackened ruin and Foramen in goblin hands, Kahtan had become the last high seat in the hands of a Taghreb highborn and so incredibly influential among their people. High Lady Takisha was much more interested in putting that influence to use in reclaiming Foramen for one of her kin than fighting battles on Malicia's behalf, not that the empress had pushed hard for such contributions. Until recently, it had suited her for Kahtan to largely sit the war out: it lent credence to the perception of stalemate between Sepulchral and the Tower that had been the keystone of her diplomatic strategy. Malicia has bled Kahtan dry of gold and mages as recompense for the feet-dragging, too, both of which had been useful in pursuing her plans abroad.

"High Lady Takisha has called her vassals to Kahtan," Ime shared. "Most Taghreb nobles in Praes will be there, considering she's the last human high seat in the south. We could skip her and attempt to muster them directly when they're gathered."

"It would be hasty to attempt as much," Malicia said. "We're not intending on extended fighting against the Grand Alliance."

And once peace was made the empress would be able to use Takisha Muraqib's absence as a reason to draw heavily on her troops for the Empire's contribution to the war on Keter. It would weaken her significantly going forward, hammering down one of the last nails that might potentially stick up to challenge Malicia's authority in Praes.

"We can settle this without the Taghreb," the Black Knight calmly agreed. "The key is making sure the Black Queen doesn't end up backing Sepulchral for the Tower. That would be an alliance difficult to beat on the field."

"From what we've intercepted of their correspondence," Ime said, "it seems like the Grand Alliance is keeping High Lady Abreha at a distance. Not hostile, but hardly allied."

"That could change," Malicia said, "should we damage Foundling's armies too much. If Amadeus were there to back I could not fathom her choosing Sepulchral's candidature over his, but he remains in the wind. Incidents will have to be arranged to turn that distance into enmity."

And sometimes Alaya did wonder if that wasn't the very reason Amadeus was absent: so that nothing could coalesce around him too early. If he was not putting pieces into place without binding himself to them, getting forces in motion without himself needing to be at the helm. But if that was truly the case, where was he? Even now, with his old apprentice at the gates, there was no hint of a plot in sight. Malicia knew better than to believe a man like him would disappear quietly into obscurity. It was worrying, that even Ime's best efforts had not been enough to find his trail.

"Assuming Callow begins by linking up with the deserters in the Green Stretch, as is most probable, I'll have infiltrators in place by the time the Army of Callow begins marching north," Ime said. "Given the positions our people in Sepulchral's ranks, arranging those incidents is achievable."

"It won't be enough," the Black Knight said. "Foundling didn't fight half a dozen wars to roll over for the Tower at the first sign of trouble, Your Dread Majesty. We'll have to bloody her before she even considers terms."

"It will take more than that," Ime frankly said. "It's been personal for her since the Night of Knives. If she's not forced to choose between drastic consequences and dealing with us, it's my belief she will absolutely keep pushing."

Neither of the two looked at her, even though the so-called 'Night of Knives' had been ordered by Malicia personally. It'd had unfortunate long-term consequences, she would admit, but the notion had been sound at the time. It'd been only tangentially a reprisal for Foundling's assassination attempts of her in Keter, after all. The most important motives had all been political in nature. After securing the Dead King's aid to keep Procer in check, Malicia had believed that the last major loose end to handle was Callow. She'd had allies in the Free Cities and ways to collapse that alliance's coherence, meaning that the last potential territorial threat to Praes had been a resurgent Kingdom of Callow under Catherine Foundling.

Decapitating the small but skilled cadre of individuals that the young queen had been relying on to rule her realm and carry out her reforms had only been logical, and in that aspect worked exactly as intended. Unfortunately, instead of returning home and licking her wounds the Black Queen had instead disappeared for a year and re-emerged as high priestess of the drow with a set of fresh armies at her back. There had, in Alaya's opinion, been no way for her to really predict that. It had effectively set the balance of power in the other direction and begun a cascade of events that'd made Callow into the most influential member of the Grand Alliance, which had in turn forced the empress to implement drastic measures to compensate.

And it might have been dangerous, it might have been hard and Alaya had more than once hesitated, but her plans had borne fruit. Foundling was now here in Praes, on grounds Malicia had prepared for years and desperate enough to accept terms when she was brought to the table. Now Malicia only needed to walk the path a little further still and it would all fall into place – she was, in other words, in one of the single most perilous positions of her entire reign. The last inch to the finish line was always the most treacherous. Alaya would know, considering how many people she'd killed there.

"I do not disagree," Malicia finally said. "I naturally leave picking the battlefield entirely to you, High Marshal. All of the Tower's resources are opened to your office in the pursuit of bringing Foundling to the table."

"A great honour, Your Dread Majesty," the Black Knight said, bowing her head.

Ime seemed about to speak when she suddenly closed her mouth, and a heartbeat later there was a polite knock at the door. Malicia's spymistress glanced at her and the empress nodded permission. Ime slipped out a few moments and Malicia made small talk with Nim about her eldest son, who had recently wed, until she returned. Both women gave the spymistress their full attention when she did.

"The Black Queen has arrived in Praes," Ime said, closing the door behind her.

Malicia smiled. Finally.

"How close to Satus did she gate out?" the Black Knight asked.

Ime's lips thinned.

"She is not in the Green Stretch at all, High Marshal," the spymistress said. "The word came from High Lord Sargon: she's less than a day's march away from Wolof."

Dread Empress Malicia went still. Wolof, which was on the other side of the empire from any sort of ally of Callow's. Wolof, whose high lord she held in her thrall. Wolof, where Malicia had laid seeds for a great victory – the filling of a fourth seat at this very table.

Someone had just made a mistake, and to Malicia's sudden disquiet she was not certain whether it had been her or the Black Queen.

IR

Welcome Back !! 😊

therealgridlock

Typo thread:

"Grief at the human condition was not burden she had to bear,"

>Either "not a burden" or "not the burden".

"No without reason was it an old saying in"

>"Not without reason"

"It was a self-reinforcing shame, as highborn visible aging tended to retreat from good society"

>I believe you meant "visibly aging" or "with visible aging" i lean towards the first.

"under the heigh ceiling of the council room,"

>I believe you mean "high ceiling" heigh is a word but not a kind of ceiling. Inb4 ceiling nerds correct me.

"Malicia has bled Kahtan dry of gold and mages"

>I believe this should be "had bled" it is past tense and "had" is used later in the sentence. Unless malicia is speaking in the third person about herself it doesn't make sense as present tense.

"Given the positions our people in Sepulchral's ranks,"

>"Positions of our people in" or "the positions our people in Sepulchral's ranks hold" missing a word either way, first is simpler and easier tbh.

As I am now current with the story, you can expect to see my typo thread near the beginning of every chapter's comments.

Also, for those of you who give a toss, go vote if you think it's worth it.

I think I voted for Worm once, but it's not something i care about, i just enjoy seeing the enjoyment of people in the comments, and the vote reminders.

pault52

Is Akua coming back to claim her throne?

Anomandris

Extremely plausible.

Alaya has guile in ruling, perhaps the most of anyone in Calernia, but conflict is a different beast; and she doesn't have the benefit of Black anymore.

Hot damn, it's got to get back to The Guide....

shikkarasu

Technically illegal. At the end of First Liesse, when Cat was blackmailing relatives of Akua's entourage, it was mentioned that anyone who has been dead cannot inherit seats of power like that. Since Akua is a type of undead now she cannot become Lady of Wolof.

I was today years old when I realised that she she may have transitioned to Diabolist, but only ceased to be the Heiress when she died.

agumentic

No, it is actually technically legal, specifically because Akua never quite died. Her body was destroyed, but her soul was separate from it, and thus did not suffer damage and was not brought back with necromancy. Cat was specifically blackmailing nobles with extracting the soul of their heirs and giving it to Black so he could threaten them with a valid claimant.

Shveiran

Uh. Actually... that check out. Good catch!

Though I really don't think Catherine's plans involve making a Praesi ruler of Akua. We are back to the whole recovering alcoholic argument, I'm afraid.

Gloweye

I know I'm a year late, but in Praes nobody gives a shit about what's legal. Instead, what matters is whether they can make it stick.

Levi Kalden

Undead technically aren't allowed inheritance

Eau Richards

I'm happy your Back EE, can't wait to read the new chapters

Benjamin

Ohohohoho.... Plots and schemes, plots and schemes always. The End is Nigh, the End is Night.

Raved Thrad

Chno Sve Noc!

ruduen

It's good to see things spinning up again. Time for the last (or not) book to start up.

And now, we first start off with the question – how many of Akua's old plots are still valid? After all, she had to have had plenty prior to her death.

And, as a refresher:

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Anomandris

Shoutout for EE's new book (wanted to post it on the vote link comment, sorry) which has the announcement in the next post – 2 chapters in and I am already hooked. Guide fans are definitely gonna love it...

vernal.ancient

BOOK VII LET'S GO!!!!!!

Enjoying the Prologue so far; Cordy watching Procer fall while Malicia thinks she's got everything coming together is a nice bit of mirroring. And then that last part where Cat comes out in Wolof turns it all on its head; suddenly, Malicia has reason to worry, and that gives Cordy reason to hope

Valor

"There had, in Alaya's opinion, been no way for her to really predict that."

You know what that's fair, actually. I wouldn't have guessed that either.

RoflCat

Definitely, who could predict 2 madlasses and a spooky specter going into drow territory planning to enslave them to return not only with a united drow army under their Goddesses, with one of said madlass at its helm, but also with a deal with the dwarves on top.

signspace13

Thing is she is taking the wrong lesson from it, she think LS that was a single anomaly, and her plans turned out fine-ish anyway. But fighting Catherine is a proccess of being constantly barraged with things outside your plans.

308924810a

Eh, she kind of predicted Catherine coming back with an army of Fae. She just seems to have assumed they would be essentially uncontrollable. And seems to have been more worried about Catherine coming back with an army that she would turn against Praes, or which she would indiscriminately use to war against everyone, rather than coming back with an army she would use to gain a dominant position in the Grand Alliance.

Tenthyr

Always forgot who Catherine formerly had in her thrall, it seems.

With someone like Akua Wolof is less a city and more a trove of Diabolic knowledge without compare.

Tenthyr

Oh, and I suppose Alaya expects to be choosing her Warlock.

I wonder if that was MEANT to be Akua.

grokkingstuff

Nah, Alaya wouldn't allow for the Diabolist (someone she funded at arm's length) to be held so close to her. Besides, Akua is dead and magicless – her spirit might still roam but she has yet to find an acceptable source of power

PapaBrogundy

I'm pretty sure Akua has magic. In the battle with the Tumult she scored a kill on part? of the gestalt with a ritual knife, the same knife she'd been planning to murder a fae with to regain magic. While we don't see her use magic on screen I think it's a safe bet.

Liliet

I'm not so sure. She expressed distaste towards getting power through murder and sullyng her childhood memories. Could go either way in this case.

beleester

Who rules Wolof currently? Both of Akua's parents are dead, so it must be someone we haven't seen yet.

That, or Malicia is taking a page from Akua's book and using a zombie Named. Akua's father was a really good sorcerer, right?

Darkening

It's some relative of Akua's. His soul was under Malicia's control and she used him to displace his aunt and they fought a civil war in Wolof and now he's super supportive of Malicia to maintain the legitimacy of his rule. So, a lot of Wolof's crazy stuff probably got used up in their brutal power struggle. As I recall he's kidnapping entire villages to replace all the citizens that died in the fight over the city.

RubberBandMan

Looks about what we knew from before, but with nice personal perspectives. Cordelia/Forgetful is a good ship, but Bard's objects in motion plot is hard to derail. There are some who say Character is destiny, and Bard has the measure of cordelia's and DK's character. Neither are the type to bend because someone else predicted they would follow their own goals.

I think Malicia is making a mistake in thinking that Cat is here for a war, and not diplomatic shows of strength. But she's not going to be diplomatic with Malicia, she's going to give her the worst insult: Pretending she's not even there.

Cat wants daibolists and troops. Why would she need to talk to Malicia to get them? She'll just talk to the mages and troops directly. With the civil war, everyone is thinking very hard about which side they support, because Malicia wants them to. But now there's a third option, and Malicia probably can't stop cat from just murdering every high lord she gets her hands on (starting with Wolof) until she finds one willing to accept Grand Alliance support for their own position.

Malicia thinks that suddenly going 'I can give you everything you want, at the low low cost of taking it and doing what you want most to do with it, right now' will put Cat on the back foot and surprise her, and leave her without better options. But Cat is actually really good at getting armies to follow her, even her previous enemies. If Malicia can't get her armies fast enough to mess with Cat's armies, Cat can just recruit in a major city and leave before things get worse. One success will have others consider joining with her to stick a knife to malicia and the tower-claimant. it's not like the Preasi are likely to be fond of either of them, and would love to take deals that cut those two out of the loop.

dadycool

Cat: Yeah, I'll take some diabolists, maybe some Greenskins, and I'll definitely refill my supplies of Goblins and munitions. K, bye! (vanishes back into the Ways after basically swiping everything of value from Praes)

Malicia and everyone else "important": WTF? Hey, come back here! You haven't triggered any of my traps or plans!

Raved Thrad

Also Malicia: "How can I ensnare you in my elaborate traps and plots WHEN YOU WON'T PLAY THE GAME?!?"

Henry

So she's pretty much every dungeon Master ever

caoimhinh

And another thing, since Malicia has been prolonging the civil war and making it look like she is unable to beat Sepulchral, the rest of Praes is not gonna have a high impression of her, whereas Catherine comes with a legend of invincibility that has been able to halt the advance of Keter.

I find it funny how Malicia also thought that she could join the Grand Alliance and fight against Keter later, after she is the one that set the Dead King loose in the first place. Even in Praes, that has got to be some serious reason for mistrusting someone. Even Praesi dislike undead, and I doubt they would take Malicia's side if an alternative is offered.

Malicia really went down the Old Evil way the moment she didn't have Amadeus steering her from her most excessive impulses.

Matthew

This is the good stuff... straight into the veins.

Sea

Hoooooraaaaay!!!

antlan87

Alaya's mistake was forgetting that Catherine thrives in chaos and doing the unexpected.

Juff

Typo Thread:

on beautifully > on a beautifully was not burden > was not a burden (or no burden)
No without reason > Not without reason visible aging > visibly aging heigh ceiling > high ceiling kin that fighting > kin than fighting Malicia has bled > Malicia had bled positions our > positions of our

B.J.M.S.

FINALLY WE ARE BACK!!!!

Adrian_V

Another great start, i wonder what Cat and Akua are planning since its obvious Akua will have an important role here

amit27592

How...how did Amadeus know Cat will come to Wolof!
I mean he didn't know about Cat needing diabolists, even then, he and Hye are already at the outskirts of Wolof in the Epilogue.

Damn...it just got wayyy more interesting.

Anomandris

Daddy and Mommy always know...

Always.

jamesc9

Is there anything anywhere to suggest that Hye has had a child? And Kat has Daione colouring, as I recall.

Liliet

Huh. Maybe Cat came to Wolof because he's there?

hue hue

Because her friendly specter was the princess of Walof. Akua must know lots of the city secrets, it's kinda of obvious were she would teleport first

edrey

i give three days before wolof fall, the new warlock and the armies surrender and pass to her side. she also needs to solve the problem with the Night and wolof is full of secrets. no better place to appear and start the book.

Adrian_V

You forgot the completely necessary act of arson xD

caoimhinh

I think that is implicit in the phrase "three days before Wolof falls" XD

Frivolous

Lady Abigail Tanner. Funny that she chose that name. It's so common, and it's the profession she joined the army to flee.

I suspect Catherine gated to Wolof because of Akua. Sargon may not know all the secrets of Wolof that Akua does. There might be caches and hoards that are yet untouched.

Darkening

Aside from that, she probably knows the city wards inside and out and just immediately seizing one of the Great Cities is a hell of a power play to open up negotiations with various factions

Cold Cyberia

Wolof has never been conquered by an outside invader – even during the crusades. If Cat manages to take it quickly it'll be a huge power move. It'll make the other High Seats rethink their positions for sure.

Raved Thrad

If I'd been drinking anything when I read that name I'd have spewed it all over my monitor while laughing. Not only is Abigail still a general, but she's been ennobled, and with a very ironic name for her House, too! This all smacks of a joke that Abigail was just too timid (in her usual way with Catherine) to protest against.

Darkening

I mean, we saw on screen Abigail's reaction to Cat declaring her a noble. It was hilarious.

jamesc9

Of course she's still a general. Apart from the little problem of hating and fearing it, statistically she's a good one.

I don't know whether she's had the event yet, that Cat told her to expect, where she blunders and gets a large fraction of an army butchered.

Burlyraven

We're back, baby! Whoo!

Christian Oaks

Literally what I came here to post

Tenmei

Heck yeah, the best web novel is back in action!

Earl of Purple

Isn't Wolof the city closest to the Steppes and, therefore, the orcs? Can't imagine there being a lack of those willing to join the lady who led the first of their kind into a Name for a thousand years. Especially when the alternative is the army of the people that, until recently, treated them as second class citizens, if they acknowledged orcs were people.

sengachi

I cheered upon being told this was back in business.

Also, ohhhhh yeah Malicia fucked up. In two huge ways.

1) She didn't realize the implications of Cat having access to Akua's shade for any possible war in the wasteland. She was planning on every major city being a radioactive hardpoint from hell. But Cat is going to go through Wolof like a hot knife through butter. Malicia's best hope here is honestly that Cat gets everything she wants from Wolof and leaves, and that the resulting destabilization isn't unrecoverable. (Hahaha, fat chance with Amadeus puttering around).

2) She -somehow- still hasn't realized Cat is riding a Protagonist's story. She's perplexed by Cat reacting to sudden friend and power base loss with a year long absence and power-up + ally making quest. But if she'd thought of Cat as a Hero, rather than a rival Villain, that would have been painfully obvious to her.

Malicia is dead six ways to Sunday. She made a huge mistake about the very nature of the war and she's using anti-Villain tactics against someone who's riding a Heroic narrative in all but Name. And adding in whatever Amadeus and Hye have been doing is just tossing goblin fire after the sharpers.

Liliet

Heroes are Alaya's blind spot, she never fought them.

sengachi

She's definitely fought them before, she's not blind to them. She just hasn't identified Cat as riding a heroic narrative.

Earl of Purple

She hasn't. Malicia has never left Praes*, and she's the background manipulator-type of Empress too, a political animal who fights political battles. Heroes don't usually fight political battles, at least not in Praes.

*She went to Callow at least once, but only when it was a province of the Dread Empire; and her meat-puppet envoys are disposable and she doesn't use them to socialise with, exactly. Besides, we only know of those in diplomatic meetings.

hakureireimu

Actually Malicia never having to deal with Heroes is WOE

sengachi

Huh. Well my assumption from the canon we've seen would be that even if she's never been the one directly opposing them that she'd have picked something up from watching Amadeus do it.

caoimhinh

Yeah, she is savvy, but not by a lot.

It's like, she actually believed she would be fine from the Narrative repercussions of the Doomsday Weapon that Akua created if she merely held on to it instead of actively using it, for example.

Which Amadeus yelled her about, since that was stupid on her part if she actually believed that (plus, while she might have believed her reasoning, she was probably simply looking for excuses to justify her actions, when the real reason for it has already been stated to be because she felt that she needed to have a powerful weapon that only she could control, outside of Amadeus's reach).

sengachi

Oh, good point. It's been a while so I'd forgotten some of the ways in which it was foreshadowed that Malicia was never too savvy about how heroic narratives work.

Liliet

Evidently she wasn't watching – was too busy otherwise)=

These two are a tragedy

Andrew Smith

So a thought I had reading through those WOE, is the whole drow didn't get names because night is already sort of an investment of below so did cats name do the below tradition of backstabbing and worked to weaken night

Liliet

This is WoE. She hasn't fought them, it was Amadeus's job.

> Hakram, Prince among men:

> Is Malicia less story savvy than Black and Cat? (asking coz of the end of book 6 speech she gave)

> EE:

> Malicia is savvier than them in some ways, but has never had to deal with heroes directly > that is a blind spot

Raved Thrad

There's a PGtE fanfic (crossed over with Worm) with a similar idea. It has Taylor Hebert saying to Catherine, "Just because you're a villain doesn't mean you're not the hero of the story." 😊

sengachi

Mind telling me the title?

Raved Thrad

Be Thou My Good

Darkening

Is that the one where they summon her in marchford accidentally?

Raved Thrad

No, this one has her dumped in Calernia post-Golden Morning.

origamiflame

Welcome back!!! I've been looking at this date on my calendar for a while and am so ready, thanks for a fantastic prologue!

Shveiran

Yes! We are back!

Also... I really like you, Malicia. Honestly. You are an amazing, complex character who also happens to be more than clear sighted enough to justify your decades-long reign and you really, really don't get enough credit for that (mostly because Amadeus is there, but that's neither here nor there). But girl, I gotta say... you really don't have it under control here.

The first rule of war is to know your enemy, and know yourself. And... look, not foreseeing the Everdark arc? That's not on you. No one did. But here you go saying that Catherine not retreating to do damage control after you murdered her friends WHILE SHE WAS IN THE THROES OF WINTER was... unexpected?

I wouldn't have accused you of making a stupid move, because it was a crippling blow; but you thinking Catherine Foundling would go down with a whimper?

...No, Malicia, just no. You really don't get her, do you?

...And honestly, that's kind of strange. I mean, if you failed to read her, I'd expect you to fail to note the DIFFERENCES with Amadeus, not the similarities.

Regardless; you are making plans without understanding your enemy. And that is a fatal flaw in battle, let alone when using soft power and intrigue.

...Which is really all you have, when it comes down to it, because let's face it... the stuff of nightmares your council is not. Ime is an experienced spymistress, but she is nameless and Catherine has the Squire AND Akua Sahelian. I'm not saying Ime is outmatched, since this is her backyard, but there isn't that much of an edge.

Military, you are so outgunned it's not even funny. I don't want to sell the Legions short, but these Legions have, at best, fought Tasia's containment and Sepulcral's slow-paced civil war in the past decade. The army of Callow is hardened veterans that have fought nightmares day in and day out. You are outgunned in infantry, cavalry and priests. Sure, you may have more casters, but the opposition has Named Practitioners. Whatever you array against them is not gonna cut it.

And Nim... come on. I'm sure she is a very, very good tactician, and maybe she is even more than a match for Juniper, but it isn't Juniper she is going against, is it? Nim has no idea how many nasty tricks the Callowans learned in the past three years, because she was in Praes and Praes is not where the nightmares happened.

But more importantly, Nim is now Named... and she has no story. Who is she, in the grand scheme of things? She doesn't even have that strong a connection to Malicia.

I could point out she has no idea how story-fu works, but that's not even the problem: the problem is she has no weight even if she can find a lever that works.

The Black Queen will wipe the floor with her, if she ever bothers to take her on personally... I doubt Catherine is outgunned in Named here, and those that follow her do have both weight and experiences. Did Nim ever actually put down a Villain or a Hero? This is going to be brutal.

I'll be here with my cathartic pop-corns.

Sorry Malicia. It was a very good run, ain't no denying that. But you are going down hard.

caoimhin

Yep. Malicia is very delusional, and she keeps telling herself she is in control of things while she keeps procrastinating on solving problems merely because she is looking forward to gloating on the despair of her enemies when the prize is snatched when it seemed within their reach.

She has kept saying that she could have easily ended the civil war and crushed Abreha, but purposely kept it going because for some reason that was beneficial to her.

And alright, maybe it was like that at some point, but the more time passes the more unlikely that becomes, and currently it seems like it has spiraled out of her control and her capacity to predict.

She is screwed because of herself. Because arguably all of this mess was started by her, was kept going by her, and was escalated by her.

Shveiran

Uhm, I really feel like you are selling her short, here. I mean... yes, there is truth to what you say, but the world is on fire right now.

If we made a list of the Calernian Rulers that have things the most under control right now, I think the only reason Malicia wouldn't be on top is that both the Dead King and the King Under the Mountain.

But seriously... Levant is on fire, Procer is on fire, the League is on fire, the drows are on fire, Ashur is on fire, the Titanomachy is on fire, and Callow is most definitely on fire: Catherine has been ruling from abroad for over three years, invested heavily in the army and things were not ok when she left.

My point being, Malicia is on top of all things not Catherine Foundling, right now. Abreha, Kathan, the Steppes, the Eyres... she can fix all that more easily than anyone else can fix their messes.

As far as ruling goes, she is probably the one that achieved the most with less.

She is probably the best player, by far.

She just happens to not have a good handle on the Foundling situation and yeah, that's gonna topple her, and yeah, I'm going to enjoy it, but she really, really played well.

Making mistakes doesn't negate that.

I mean, I still think Black and Grem are amazing tacticians even if the invasion of Procer went how it did, you know?

caoimhinh

Hm, that wasn't really my point. I wasn't questioning her rulership.

You say "The world is on fire" and yeah, it is. And who set it aflame? Malicia.

The Dead King is the many large containers of oil that Malicia poked and spilled into Calernia before throwing a torch into it and pretend it wasn't her problem or fault.

And while Malicia claims that she can solve the issues with Abreha, Kathan, the Steppes, the Eyres, etc. and maybe she is right... she let the situations stagnate and then escalate, and because of that, now she is screwed. That was my point.

And as for Malicia being a skilled ruler, that is actually debatable.

Sure, she is a mastermind, a top-notch politician that excels at scheming and making people fight each other and creating political and economical traps for states and heads of states; but as far as we know, the enhancement and prosperity of the current Praes come from the social policies and cultural changes that were implemented in the last decades, (and a lot of genre-savviness necessary to not only survive but win against Narrative with Heroes and Villains going after you, as their very world works that way) and those came from Amadeus.

Then again, Amadeus is a great leader, a revolutionary and social reformist, but he is not a politician, so his approach would have ensured a bloody civil war again and would have needed to eradicate the nobility in the end just to set the grounds for the new policies to be implemented. And that's assuming he survived.

Amadeus and Malicia were such a great and successful team because they covered each other's blind spots and prevented each other's excesses.

Amadeus acted like a mad bloodhound to the nobility but he was the architect of the Reforms (which included military reforms and social reforms such as the integration of Greenskins into society as full-fledged citizens of Praes), while Malicia was necessary to keep the High Lords pinned against each other so they could not mess with the new policies implemented, which was something Amadeus would have never been able to accomplish on his own.

And it's not that Malicia just sucks at dealing with Catherine Foundling (everyone does), Malicia doomed herself because of her own actions due to Narrative, so even if Cat were to die or had been dead for years, Malicia's reign would still be at its end because of her own actions.

Shveiran

Again, yes, to an extent.

But you say that Malicia set the world on fire, and that implies a certain degree of fault.

And she is at fault, don't get me wrong.

But fault... fault is such a complicated thing.

She escalated a great deal by involving the Dead King, no two ways about it. And that was a huge gambit on her part, basically betting it all on the narrow outcome that the Crusade would beat back the Dead King BUT be too weak to keep attacking Praes.

But one could argue the world was already on fire: the west against the east, locked in bloody war to further Proceran ambitions and collapse any semblance of order in the east, not to mention restore the status quo of Callow vs Praes. And that happened because of Cordelia. In a very real sense, Malicia was brought to a desperate situation by the choices of others, and had to deal with the flames somehow.

One could counter that Cordelia first came to power – and inherited such a war-torn country – precisely because of Malicia's actions in the first place, bringing fault back around to her.

But a), that plan had Amadeus absolutely on board, and b)...

One could argue that the realities of Procer were such that only crippling it would make the Conquest possible, because the Principate would have intervened whether out of interest or out of fear. So in a sense, Amadeus and Malicia are not really at fault because there wasn't really a choice on the matter.

One could argue that it is always a damn choice to invade another nation, so yeah, they are very much at fault.

But one could consider that Callow and Praes are locked in an invaded-invader relationship since forever, ensure by the earthly necessities of the richest nation not starving, and commerce being at best a fragile thing between the two. So really, Malicia and Amadeus didn't have a meaningful choice because if they had abandoned every Callowan plan they would have been dethroned during the following starvation-caused civil war, and the newcomers would still have invaded Callow.

Reading your post, it seems (I might be wrong) that you think she is more at fault / a more direct cause of the current problem compared to everyone else, and I just don't... see it?

That's the beauty of the Guide, in my opinion, there is precious little Bad Guys, and most characters are just... stuck without good options, trying to do the best they can (including in figuring out what the best really is). And yeah, I want to strangle several of them, but... nearly all of them are understandable. Seeing through their eyes, it almost seems reasonable, what they choose.

And really... Malicia is not an exception. She played the cards she was given, and she played them well. But sometimes the hand is not quite good enough to make victory possible.

edrey

here i will give my grain of sand, from the narrative point of view, all this is about above and bellow, when the dwarfs started the planning of their conquest to the everdark, at least a century ago, so the Heavens sent the saint and the peregrime to clean the west of the continent, all with the goal to end Evil in calernia in a multi front attack. somethink like this. good rise in the west, evil rise in the east, the 10 crusade, Dk invade, K under invade the everdark, the sisters go to the surface without a guide and several decades later, Good is cornered so super Heroes, like the mirror Knight appear. however, Below plannig is different, since their direct intervention in the everdark, they had given up the age of wonder for the age of order, putting their pieces in place, like Cat. the three red letters were a signal, Praes is doomed, but could be in name or esence, Malicia is disposable. this about putting a new country of evil policy and equal to the K.Under also, in my opinion, Malicia fault was in her obsesione with control, if she had trusted Black she should have called him when no pattern of three had formed with white and killed akua before shit went down, half informing him of her plan maybe, but she wanted control and power of the weapon so this is what happend

Cold Cyberia

Great to have this back! Just FYI EE, the chapter and the new book aren't appearing in the table of contents.

I'm hoping the Praes arc will be a return to form for the Woe. The last couple of books had them make serious sacrifices and a lot of the victories felt bittersweet. Doubt this will be straightforward but in my black heart I'm hoping for a personal reaffirmation to each member and their way.

beleester

Place your bets, is the Angel corpse actually going to be used? Obviously it won't be detonated in Procer, but is it going to be set off somewhere else? In Arcadia? In the Hells? Put through a lakeomancy portal and dropped on Keter?

The story keeps reminding us that this weapon is on the table, that it might potentially get used despite being so destructive that it can't really be used without ending the story. And Tyrant asked the question: "What happens when a Judgement-corpse is used, if Judgement is sealed?" which implies we could get an answer to that question. I get the impression that it's got a bigger role in the story than just Procer's nuclear deterrent.

Darkening

Shoved through into the serenity and detonated maybe. Maybe we'll get to see if you can actually destroy a hell lol.

Eduardo Perini Muniz

Thank you for the chapter, very good to see Catherine surprising everyone again.

laguz24

This really hasn't told us anything we don't already know. But it is good to be back.

hue hue

I bet that at least one Praes city will be burned down by globin fire and Catherine will protest that she didn't set that fire.

308924810a

It'd also be interesting to see if Catherine is going to snatch those vassals out from under the remaining Tagrebi high lord because Malicia didn't.

Raved Thrad

"I didn't do it, nobody saw me do it, it was on fire already when I got here!" 🤪

Daniel E

Fourth seat the evil table, eh? Malicia said she wasn't giving it to any of the mages serving her. I wonder then if she's planning to fast-track a new Warlock who isn't currently serving here, but would.

Kage Lupus

Man, Malicia really does have a blindspot when it comes to what Amadeus might be planning. Right now she only sees two options for Cat: Support Sepulchral to take over the throne, or maybe to kick both of them out and take the throne for herself. But I think the real play here is Amadeus showing up and offering himself up as the new Dread Emperor, giving Cat a third option that she knows will support her against the Dead King and who is also more willing to buy into the Liesse Accords. Not to mention that the Legions would be way more likely to back Amadeus if he went after the throne.

Malicia isn't considering it because she knows that Amadeus hates the idea of being a ruler and because she is still soft on him. But she is forgetting that the former Black Knight is the ultimate pragmatist and would have no problem sacrificing what he wanted in his quest to even the scales between Good and Evil. With Amadeus on the throne Praes is not just not a threat to the Grand Alliance, they could become an active member. Throwing their weight into that fight willingly would go a long way towards shifting the absolutely grim picture that this chapter painted of the fight against the Dead King.

All hail Dread Emperor Benevolent, I say.

mamm0nn

This story began with unfound rumours that Cat castrated an ogre in combat. Let's see if all of this was just an elaborate journey to that rumour becoming truth!

Shveiran

Considering Nim is female, that'd be quite a feat of martial skill.

Liliet

Trans people exist on Calernia, so it merely requires the right coincidence...

Adrian_V

Ok i will say right now: if by the end when they leave Wolof there hasn't been any bonfire either Idrani or Akua will burn a building just to screw with Cat xD

unLuckerII

Fix table of contents please.

Koi

Tbh a little disappointed her black knight wasn't Killian in full fae regalia with new mysterious powers and a lot of barbs to give Cat on who sacrificed the most lives. Tho I guess that would be a problematic story from Malicia's POV. Oh well, guess sometimes people just fade away, which has its own realism

Liliet

Killian was stationed in Twilight's Pass last we knew, Cat never lost track of her.

And we knew it would be Nim from the Epilogue.

Chapter 1: Debut

"The trick is to always invite an unrelated highborn idiot to every council. When you inevitably execute them, all the other highborn idiots will behave for the rest of the discussion."

– Dread Emperor Vindictive I

It was an impressive watchtower. All red brick and stone, three stories high and jutting out of the hills with an elegant silhouette. It'd fallen victim to that unfortunate Praesi tendency of having an open-sky spellcasting platform instead of a rooftop, but that was the most common practice in the Wasteland. The Sahelians had clearly shelled out good coin for this place, which made it all the more amusing that they'd not done the same for the force garrisoning it. The two dozen soldiers had prudently begun to leg it long before my first knights reached the bottom of the hills, so now it was my personal banner flying in the wind.

The phalange who'd pulled down the golden lion banner of the Sahelians and replaced it with the Sword and Crown was gone, leaving the four of us to look out at the view spread out below, and even though it was a thing of beauty I found myself growing irritated. No, not 'even though'. Because.

Wolof was beautiful, and it kind of pissed me off.

"This is ridiculous," I complained. "I read the reports, they had a goddamn demon loose in the streets just a few years ago."

"Ah, the old Wasteland special," Her Grace, Princess Vivienne of Callow, drawled.

I rolled my eye at her. Being a magnanimous soul, I was not bitter in the slightest that she could wear a nice pale blue dress with simple silver circlet over her milkman's braid instead of, you know, being stuck in full regalia and the Mantle of Woe. Truly, why would I envy anyone the privilege of not wearing a fucking cloak in the Wasteland's heat? It wasn't like I'd seriously considered weaving a miracle that'd warm her with Night, much less almost done it twice.

I was a better person than that, and also she'd probably notice.

"That's actually civil war," Hakram noted. "Though considering the demon incident came at the end of a brutal war of succession, you're not entirely wrong."

Adjutant was standing on his prosthetic limbs comfortably, not needing to lean against the crenellation in the slightest, and like it often did the sight had my lips quirking into a satisfied smile. He wasn't going to be winning footraces anytime soon and I'd not send him into too rough a fight, but Hakram was far gone from the days of hissing pain and being wheelchair-bound. Masego's work on the arm and leg had been extraordinary, the shifting parts of steel and leather that mimicked muscles returning much of what he had lost to the tall orc. He no longer wore the whole set of burned plate he'd once been known by, instead keeping only the breastplate and the skirt, and his black hair was worn shorter than I'd seen it in years.

"You can never go wrong betting on civil war, when it comes to Praes," Vivienne conceded.

"Don't you two go pretending this is normal," I insisted. "I mean, look at the place!"

Almost half of Wolof's population had died when Sargon Sahelian rose up to overthrow his aunt, Lady Tasia, and the situation had gotten bad enough in there that the Legions of Terror had seen no choice but to forcefully invest the city. Something their doctrine specifically warned against attempting unless there was no other choice, when that city was a High Seat of Praes. Now, though? You'd never know unless you were told. Tall walls rose elegantly from the dusty ground, all sun-drenched stone and pale red brick, but from our position here atop a distant hill we could see a stretch of the city itself and it was impressive.

Wolof as it now stood had little to do with the village sprouted around a ritual site it'd supposedly grown out of. The modern city had actually shed those old grounds, part of them ending up as a handful of riverside villages that served as an informal port called Sinka and the rest now a closed compound to the north of the city that the locals called Zaman Ango: a great mass of mazes and pyramids hidden behind mud brick walls, ancient places of power that the Sahelians kept to themselves and their favourites. The actual city, surrounded by the greater walls, had instead been cut away at and remade until it was as glorious as its rulers believed themselves to be.

Broadly speaking, Wolof was a thin half-circle with the flatness facing north and two parts jutting out of said flatness: towering noble palaces and the set of fortifications surrounding an aqueduct. Avenues criss-crossed the length of it like arteries, tying together gates and districts by a pleasing design, while that great aqueduct – much too ornate to be of Miezan make, with its stele-like pillars – swept down from a great hill to the north-east like a raised river of stone. Cisterns and smaller water funnels covered rooftops, spreading out like a web of stone and copper, while three-story houses on tall steps stood so close together their backs were as walls. Windows were curved and often thick pillars of stone jutted out of walls, like strange handholds for giants to climb.

It was the colour that staggered me, though. Wolof was said to be the greatest vault of magic in all of Praes, its libraries and spell repositories rival to the Tower's if not even greater, and unconsciously that'd made me think of it as dark and dreary. Black magic made into a city. Instead it was a riot of red and yellow, some paints fading but others biting fresh, and everywhere subtle lines of green were woven in. Rooftop gardens gathered around cisterns and pools were adorned with bright banners – green and yellow, orange and purple, cream and blue – hung to look like shivering walls. It was a gorgeous, thriving city that somehow made Laure look like half a hovel even after being half-razed by godsdamned demon of Madness. It was infuriating as it was impressive.

The last of us, correctly interpreting my vehemence as a polite and reasonable request of explanation, broke the almost melancholy she'd been in as she watched her childhood home in the distance.

"My cousin Sargon was made to study wards as a young man," Akua said. "For a time it was a fad with the great families, after Wekesa the Warlock came to prominence. Everyone fancied they would raise a mage to beat him at his own game."

I snorted. Yeah, they would. Never mind that Masego's father had been apprentice – and Apprentice – to the last Warlock as well as a frankly ridiculously talented man in a lot of regards. No doubt there'd been an expectation that gold and a noble pedigree would beat out any peasant mage's effort at anything.

"How'd that go?" I asked, genuinely curious.

"Corpses and screaming, mostly," Akua noted. "Warding becomes a rather dangerous art when one reaches the heights of High Arcana."

"And this leads to the city looking pristine how?" Vivienne impatiently asked.

My successor, made a genuine princess by some truly inspired wrangling of Callowan law courtesy of Hakram, kept a civil tone as she spoke. Much of the venom had gone out over the years, though Vivienne quite clearly despised the Doom of Liesse – who was not particularly above needling her when she could, I'd admit.

"Though Sargon was only ever a passable practitioner of the Art," Akua continued, "he did take to the paired engineering studies impressively. He was often called on for work in Zaman Ango because of this, and evidently his experiences there proved of use when rebuilding the city."

A grunt of acknowledgement was her only answer, while I allowed my own gaze to wander around.

It was a nice morning, I thought. The sun was warm, the wind lazy and the company more than decent. It was hard to enjoy nice mornings, though, when I knew the world was coming closer to toppling into the dark with every breath we took. Hasenbach was still keeping Procer together, but the cracks were spreading and I couldn't be sure how long it would be before the Principate collapsed. Still, at least the view was stunning. The watchtower the four of us stood on was maybe an hour's ride away from the city, set on few hilly slopes. South of Wolof, these were as close to heights as you could get for a dozen miles.

Behind us the Army of Callow and its auxiliaries were encamped in force, palisades already half-raised, while to the west the raging waters of the Upper Wasaliti roiled. The east led deeper into the Wasteland, into the lands of the closest families sworn to the Sahelians, while between us and the city there was nothing save roads and farmland. Not the kind of fields you'd see in Callow, though. Small hills of stratified stone and dust rose gently, with vividly green small 'valleys' filled with orchards or crops nestled in between. I couldn't see much wheat here, but sweet potatoes and cucumbers were common and I saw fruits that would be worth a fortune in Callow – lemons, dates and pineapples, to name just a few.

"Those small green nooks," I said, studying a few of the closer ones with a narrowed eye. "There's raised stones around them. Those aren't wards, though, are they?"

It'd be a frankly absurd amount of magic, if they were, and even people without the Gift or my sensitivities to power would have been able to feel it.

"Not exactly," Akua hedged. "It is the setting of a metaphysical boundary, but nothing as... decisive as a ward. It is meant to keep the magic of field rituals contained when they are used."

Right, I thought. They'd need to, otherwise the inefficiency of trying to make the ground cultivable would be a nightmare. The amount of wasted power would make the rituals nigh unusable, and probably wreck the soil too. There was a reason magical healing was dangerous when you did it too much in the same place, and the principles involved here weren't all that different.

"You're saying all those gardens of green were made with blood?" Vivienne asked, sounding horrified.

"The grounds around Wolof are not so poor," Akua replied, shaking her head. "Perhaps a tenth of these are made fertile by ritual killing, on a good year. It is only when the weather spoils crops or the ground sickens that widespread sacrifices are required."

"And the Sahelians are said to have the finest rituals in Praes," Hakram gravelled. "Fewer deaths required and the ground is healed longer."

Akua laughed, the motion pleasing to watch in the conservatively cut but tightly fitting blue and orange dress she'd elected to wear as her form. As had become her habit she wore no jewels, even her black and orange cloak kept closed by a simple iron brooch.

"You can simply ask, Adjutant," she said. "It is true enough my kin's ritual rites are superior, though the mages of Kahtan yet make our attempts to manipulate the weather look like the work of fumbling children. My ancestors parlayed their advantage into expanded influence: we could usually afford to spare sacrifices as gifts, which in turn spared lords the costs of relying on the Tower instead."

As a young girl I would have been sickened to the bone by the thought of human sacrifice, and in truth part of me still was. Akua was talking about trading people like cattle – and the laws that restricted that fate to criminals only were rather recent to Praes – and consigning them to ugly deaths so magic could be squeezed out of their lifeblood. I'd sent too many people into the grinding gears of wars to be able to speak on that without the hypocrisy choking me, though. How many people would a Praesi lord kill like that, in a lifetime's span? A hundred, three hundred? I'd spent more of my people on skirmishes leading up to battles without batting an eye.

I could tell myself it was soldiers I'd spent and I'd not opened their throats like lambs headed for the spit, but that was just dressing up the truth. And so I stayed silent, did not allow my lips to curl in disgust. If a practice offended me, I ought to either act to end it or shut up. Empty condemnations served no purpose but patting yourself on the back. Establishing a solid grain trade between Praes and Callow would do more to kill the practice than the most convincing sermon in the history of sermons, and I fully intended on securing that by treaty before I left the Empire. Among other things. Praes had been left to moulder for too long. That mess didn't look like it was going to fix itself, so all that was left was getting my hands dirty.

"Horrid," Vivienne flatly replied. "Though it seems to have bought loyalty. My Jacks believe none of High Lord Sargon's vassals have turned on him."

"Not openly, anyway," I muttered.

"Scribe was in agreement, before you sent her away with Archer," Hakram reminded me.

"Scribe lost control of the Eyes in the empire to Ime," I said. "She's got people around here, but she's not all-seeing."

The Webweaver, like every other kind of spider, needed a web to crawl on.

"In the wake of my mother's death and the financial difficulties that preceded it, I expect the Tower's spymistress to have sunk deep hooks in the region," Akua sighed. "My cousin proved to be a fine enough lord, but his seat was shattered and he had to spend time to consolidate power. The Eyes will not have missed the opportunity."

We weren't blind in the region, far from it, but it couldn't be denied the opposition had better eyes on most everything. That was fine: I'd gotten used to fighting that sort of war. The trick was to hit hard and move quicker than the enemy could follow.

"The real question is how many of his vassals will bring their armies if he calls," I said. "Only a third of his personal forces are with High Marshal Nim's field army, but that doesn't make what he's got here a large force. He'll need his lords if he wants to do more than hide behind his walls."

We believed Sargon Sahelian to have forces in the area of five thousand soldiers in the city and its outskirts, which in most cases would have been a pittance compared to the sixteen thousand Callowans and auxiliaries I'd brought with me. The trouble was that this wasn't a petty border fort, it was Wolof. If we tried to take that city by force our numbers might genuinely not be enough. High Seats were always full of nasty surprises, and this one would be worse than most.

"If it comes that, we'll have to take the city before they get here," Vivienne said.

"I do not recommend trying the Sererian Walls," Akua frankly replied. "Repairing their wards will have been my cousin's utmost priority after his ascension, it will be long done. His mages will hammer away at any force we send from behind their protection."

"Juniper doesn't believe we can take the city in fewer than six months," Hakram noted. "Even if we seize the fortress in the northern hills and cut off the aqueduct there, there are too many wells inside the walls. We would be betting on food running out instead of water if it comes to a siege."

Which would be quite the gamble, considering we had no supply lines of our own. We might end up hungry before the enemy did. My army was carrying its foodstuff with it, in the Legion manner, but aside from the rare convoy through the Twilight Ways there wouldn't be more coming. If we'd emerged further south, closer to the Blessed Isle, it might have been possible to arrange a supply line out of Callow. I'd chosen otherwise, though. First because down south was exactly where Malicia and Sepulchral wanted us, but also because I didn't want to set up that supply line in the first place. I couldn't really afford to, when I needed all that food and people headed west instead for the greater war still being waged there.

So instead we'd emptied granaries and grabbed everything we could before moving out east. In practice we had about six month's worth of food with us, though with the planned convoys we would maybe manage to stretch that to seven in a pinch. That would be enough if everything went according to plan, which pretty much meant it wasn't enough. So the Hellhound and I had gotten... inventive.

"We don't actually need to take the city," I said. "It's not what we're after here. There's going to be a battle before this campaign is over, but it won't be in Wolof unless something goes catastrophically wrong. We're here to rob Sargon Sahelian, not kill him."

Funny thing about Wolof, these days: it was probably the only High Seat in the whole of Praes that had a significant food surplus. After its losses during the war of succession its population had been massively lowered while its farmland remained largely untouched, and it'd kept trading heavily with Callow until relations broke. Throw in that the field force it'd had to feed had been relatively small – by virtue of large chunks of the Sahelian household troops either dying at Second Liesse or when the Fourteenth stormed the city – and the city was currently the Wasteland's undisputed queen when it came to the fullness of her granaries.

I wanted that grain to feed my army, so naturally I was going to trick a High Lord of Praes out of it.

"Banners are approaching," Vivienne sharply said.

I followed her gaze, eye narrowing as I found what she meant. Riders, maybe twenty of them, and a half dozen banners between them. I murmured a short prayer to the Crows before drawing on Night, a sluggish handful of power answering my will after a moment. I sharpened my eyesight with it, wasting not a drop, and studied the approaching men. The golden lion of the Sahelians flew highest, standing out starkly on the elaborate banner of that line: an oval filled with curved swaths of black and red, stripes of small white teeth cutting through looking outwards. I saw a blue stork and purple dog flying lower, while the other banners were entirely patterning of colour.

"The stork and dog are the Bassa and the Chenoi," Akua explained after I shared. "The two closest houses to the east. They must have already had a presence in the city when we arrived."

So Sargon was sending us a message that he wasn't standing alone. I rather admired how quickly he'd gotten over the surprise of our arrival, considering my army had begun moving out of the gates south of Wolof barely an hour before dawn and it wasn't even noon. In a few hours he'd put together enough of a plan to feel comfortable sending an embassy to me, which I took as a healthy reminder that underestimating anyone who'd been able to claim and keep a High Seat of Praes was a good way to end up dead. I watched the riders approached and smiled, rolling my shoulder as if to limber it.

"Finally," I said. "Let's go see what your cousin has to say, Akua."

—

I waited for them at the top of the shallowest slope, easy to see from a distance.

Hakram and Vivienne stood at my right, Akua at my left and around us the Order of Broken Bells sat the saddle in utter silence. Like statues armoured in shining steel, lances raised like a whispered promise of violence. The envoys dismounted at the bottom of the hill. Not all of them, though, only three: two men and a woman, all Soninke and no older than thirty. Akua leaned closed to whisper in my ear.

"The man in the centre is Chikodi Sahelian," she said. "He is my cousin twice removed, but more closely related to Sargon. They were at odds as children."

I inclined my head in thanks, her breath still warm against my cheek. The other two were nobles too, going by the golden eyes, so at a guess I'd say they were from the Bassa and the Chenoi. The rest of the delegation stayed mounted like my knights, their horses well-disciplined and their colourful scale armour of fine make. Career soldiers, those, career killers. That was fine. I had those too, and mine were better. Chikodi Sahelian, a strikingly good-looking man almost as tall as Hakram, took the lead of his party and rose halfway up the slope before offering a perfect courtly bow.

"This one humbly greets you, Queen of Callow," the noble said.

Ugh. I glanced at Akua, who looked amused. She'd only ever used formal Praesi diplomatic language with me the once and it'd been mostly to mock me, something I found myself belatedly grateful for. Not the mockery, the other thing. If he stuck to that the whole time this was going to be irritating.

"So, out of curiosity," I said, allowing a Laure drawl to slip into my voice. "What is it you did that made you so eminently expendable you got picked?"

Chikodi's face blanked. Ah, how nostalgic. As if him aggressively not giving me a reaction wasn't already one.

"This one begs your pardon, mighty one," Chikodi calmly said, "for he does not understand your meaning."

"He used to shove Sargon down the stairs in the Western Palace," Akua noted. "And spill ink on his parchments just before we had assignments due. There was also enmity between their fathers over the position of seneschal of Sinka, I believe."

"And Sargon sent him here over that, knowing there was a decent chance I'd just crack open his skull and rip out whatever I wanted to know?"

Chikodi's face did not change, though a slight tremor went up his leg. Akua elegantly shrugged.

"We are Sahelians, dearest," she reminded me.

"Cold," I replied, not without appreciation.

Small slights and all that. I'd never been one to mind a bit of petty retribution.

"Gods Below," Chikodi hoarsely said. "It is true. You really are Lady Akua returned, as the stories said."

The woman at his side, soft-skinned but sharp-eyed, let out a small hiss of surprise. I glanced at her hand and found a few fading motes of magic there, reluctantly impressed she'd been able to use even a minor spell without my noticing.

"And unbound," she said. "A shade, yet unbound."

The conversation might have unravelled further, if someone hadn't stepped in.

"You used a spell on one of us under truce banner," Vivienne said, tone even.

All three of them froze. It wasn't necessarily a breach of truce terms to do as much, in truth, but it was... toeing a line.

"Not on any of you, not directly," the woman began, but I interrupted with a snort.

"What an auspicious start," I said. "Fine, I'll let this one go."

She looked relieved for a moment, before smiling and bowing and thanks.

"Break your fingers," I casually said. "Five of them. Same hand."

The smile went away. A moment of silence passed, all eyes on me. I cocked an eyebrow.

"Well?" I asked.

Golden eyes sought me out and found not a speck of sympathy. You couldn't let Wasteland nobles get one of you, not even a small thing. And you could never just let it go without answer – they'd lose all respect for you immediately, see you as someone that could be crossed with impunity. The fingers would heal easy enough, she might even be able to do it herself if she was a fine enough mage. It was the pain that was the price I was asking. The pain and the humiliation. She looked through the rest of us and found no purchase, no willing intercessor, and her face stilled.

"As you say, Black Queen," the mage replied.

There was a sharp crack, as she began with her thumb and swallowed a scream. Granting her no further attention, I moved my gaze to a shaken Chikodi.

"You've got my attention," I said. "What does High Lord Sargon want?"

"The High Lord desires only peace and friendship, mighty one," Chikodi said. "And shares that this is the will of Her Dread Majesty herself, not merely his own wish."

"Huh," I replied, unimpressed. "That's quite polite of you, really, but I happen to have come over for a spot of war. Whether or not that involves me sacking your city and putting every Sahelian not in my service to the sword is up to Sargon, but I'll be honest – we're not looking good at the moment."

It was surprisingly cathartic to threaten Praesi nobility like this, I found. I really should do it more often.

"The Sererian Walls have never fallen," Chikodi evenly said.
"This would be-"

"They fell to the Legions, when your lord was raised," Adjutant interrupted.

Anger flickered on the nobleman's face, the most visible reaction so far. It took me a heartbeat to understand why he would likely be more offended at Hakram interrupting than the rest of us, and my fingers tightened around my staff when I did. Ah, Praesi. The remembrance of why I'd despised so many of them as young girl had begun to fade but here they were, so kindly restoring it for me.

"They have never fallen when the city was not at war with itself," Chikodi curtly said.

"Not quite as impressive a boast," I noted. "All right, this is beginning to turn into a waste of my time. What exactly is it that Sargon's offering as terms so I don't torch his home to teach the Tower a lesson?"

Chikodi's eyes moved to Akua, but she only faintly smiled. She had asked no mercy of me when it came to Wolof or her kin. I was still uncertain whether that was before she did not believe it would be needed or because she did not believe it deserved. I glanced at the mage, who had finished breaking her fingers, and coldly smiled. She flinched.

"High Lord Sargon requests nothing of you, mighty one," Chikodi said. "He only offers tokens of his friendship and esteem, as well as his help to achieve your intent in these lands."

"So a bribe," I said, rolling my eye. "Disappointing. Give the numbers on offer to Adjutant, I've been bored enough for a day."

I didn't even bother to give goodbyes before turning my back on him, limping away. It was hard to see properly under the helms so I couldn't be sure, but what little I could glimpse told me that more than a few of my knights were grinning like sharks under their helmet. For all that they looked dignified, they must have been enjoying seeing Praes being under the boot after keeping it on our throat for over half my life. Vivienne fell in at my side, abandoning the talks just as indifferently. We'd never had any intention of negotiating with the first envoy the High Lord sent us.

"We've given enough slights that Sargon should be livid when he hears," Vivienne said.

Which was good, because right now we wanted him angry.

"He's a Sahelian," I reluctantly said. "He won't be that easy to bait."

If he were, he'd be dead by now. I had little good to say of the way Praesi highborn raised their own, but I'd not deny that their methods were cruelly effective at weeding out those who could easily be manipulated.

"That's not necessarily a bad thing, Catherine. I know Juniper wants him goaded into an attack, but we don't need that to get what we want," Vivienne said. "So long as he believes you meant what you said, that we came for Wolof to burn out Malicia's allies, we have our foot in the door."

That had been the point of mistreating and mocking the delegation so much, after all: getting across the impression that was utterly uninterested in talks. Making sport of envoys was the sort of thing a half-mad warlord might do, if she really had come here to sack the city so that Malicia would lose her strongest northern supporter. Why bother to keep to the niceties when you were talking to torch fodder? What Juniper had wanted out of this was more military in nature. She was hoping the insults would either anger Sargon enough to risk a night attack on our camp or make him desperate enough that he resorted to one anyway to improve his bargaining position.

We'd be waiting for him if he did.

"If we catch him out while he's trying a sortie and wipe the attacking force, it only strengthens our hand," I said.

The first part of robbing someone was putting their knife at their throat. People were disinclined to part with gold and goods unless you made it clear they had something a lot more precious to lose. It was why the Army of Callow had crossed into Creation so early: I wanted our fortified camp built, finished with some time to spare for the men to rest. My soldiers wouldn't be getting a full night's sleep: under cover of dark, we would be going on the offensive.

"So long as we come out on top of that skirmish," Vivienne said. "If we lose, it's us who's pushed on the backfoot."

"Best we don't lose, then," I simply said.

Wasn't that always the way? Some of my officers still insisted that the Battle of Hainaut had been a victory, but I knew better. In a strategic sense, the battle had brought us to the ragged edge: a major defeat either here in Praes or on any Proceran front was now all it took for the house of cards to come tumbling down on our heads. Besides, there was another plan behind all this that my friend didn't know. One I was keeping closer to my chest: it had not been a mistake that Akua was there for the envoys to see, so verifiably unbound. I was dangling bait for someone to catch.

"More than you know," Vivienne said. "I got word from Archer before joining you with the delegation."

My limping steps stuttered to a stop.

"And?" I asked.

"They'll be here tonight," the blue-eyed princess said. "I expect losing a fight while they're watching would rather undermine our cause, so caution is in order."

I grinned. Splendid timing, this. A little too splendid to be natural, in this case it was no accident: I'd sent Archer and Scribe ahead counting on 'coincidence' ensuring they came back at the right time. I'd not yet known what the right time would be, but what did that matter? The day didn't matter, so long as I knew where the step was in the dance. I knew my grin had turned a tad savage, but I didn't mind. This had been overdue. Malicia had had herself a grand old time these last few years, lighting fires in all our backyards while she rode out the messes she caused hidden in the Tower. Safely away from the fray.

It was time I returned the favour and started lighting fires of my own.

Frivolous

Ah, a heist. But a heist over food? That can't be all of it, or the only thing Callow intends to steal from Wolof.

Hakram can't wear the entire suit of burned plate anymore because part of that burned plate covered his legs. It must be rather difficult to wear regular armor over a prosthetic. I do hope his meat leg is still armored, though.

Anomandris

Well, pride is a Praesi sin, after all. They can't help plot, think and then overthink. A heist just throws more oil on the flames in their heads.

I can't recall in which series, or even the exact wording of the quote, but it went something like "While your opponent is playing chess, the best strategy to win is to simply smash the chair over their head"

I believe you're thinking of Gen. Foundling's famed "box" strategy.

> "What Foundling does isn't thinking outside the box so much as stealing the box and hitting her opponents with it until they stop moving."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Moon Clan

Burnsy

Might not be the same quote you're thinking of, but Blake from Wildbow's Pact web serial does mention the pigeon strategy at one point: 'knock over all the pieces, shit on the board, then strut about acting like you won.'

onedollargum

I think there's an equivalent metaphor in the Wandering Inn about flipping the board and punching your opponent in the face, but don't quote me on that. Worm also had a similar metaphor with "shaking the box", right?

James Grieves

"It admittedly took me a few years to make my peace with the fact that Lady Foundling's take on diplomacy is essentially to bring a bottle of cheap wine and a sword to the table, then remind the interlocutor that while the wine might be awful it is still arguably better than being stabbed." – Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara – Chapter 12: Double Down

and

"What Foundling does isn't thinking outside the box so much as stealing the box and hitting her opponents with it until they stop moving." – Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Moon Clan – Chapter 27: Callow's Plan

Daniel E

I was just thinking of those, lol.

hue hue

I prefer the use of an international ballistic missile over a simple chair

shikkarasu

It's not an uncommon joke, so you might have heard it anywhere, but the two that spring to mind:

"I've found that the best way to win at shatranj is usually to turn into a giant snake and tear my opponent's throat out."

– Dread Empress Vindictive III

"What Foundling does isn't thinking outside the box so much as stealing the box and hitting her opponents with it until they stop moving."

– Extract from "A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars", by Juniper of the Red Moon Clan

dadycoool

I think part of why he doesn't wear the leg part is because of how it would detract from the look of his half-dead body. He has to keep the Aesthetic, after all. It's why he didn't ever, ever cover any of his other prosthetics, those being his hands.

Cpt. Obvious

Hierophant also wanted to replace the skeletal "Dead Hand" at one point. Hakram however choose to keep the first hand that Masego had made while he still was the Apprentice even though he now said he could graft on a much better hand. I don't remember that we were told what the improvements were, but I figure it probably looked more normal. And as he was now known as Dead Hand changing it would not fit his image. But I also think there were some vanity involved. The skeletal hand was a hit amongst the orcs. The human soldiers were both intimidated and fascinated by it and the hand had by now featured in songs, stories and reports. If anything the stories about him and the hand probably strengthened his name.

Now with both an arm and a leg being replaced with magical prosthetics he's even more imposing even though he's not currently as physically dangerous as he used to be. But with more notoriety he gains even more traction with the stories that makes up the weave of Creation.

His prosthetics are probably as close to indestructible as Masego and whoever else was involved in making them were able to make them, and so need no armor. As for the rest of him he's currently not really ready for battle, and still learning to walk and fight. So I can see why he would forgo leg armor.

Wabbitking

Ah the things people will do for a proper fruit salad.

308924810a

Maybe also steal their magical knowledge, or their mages somehow? We keep hearing about how Wolofites are so much better at certain types of magic than everybody else.

Of course, now the question is whether Sargent will intuit that he's being baited, but decide to just hit so hard he breaks the trap, something that might be made achievable by mass conversion of those citizens he's stolen from elsewhere into summoning resources, and might be made worthwhile by asking Malicia to compensate and help recover after going above and beyond in fighting against the largest threat to her rule.

308924810a

D'oh.

'Steal their mages'

If they bring in drow who have magical talent to steal the Night off of Wolof's mages they can just steal the years of training in diabolism they've got, and many of their other mystical secrets besides.

Earl of Purple

I think Night subsumed the Gift, when the Empire Ever Dark fell. There are no drow mages, at least without Night.

308924810a

Why do you think that?

I'd been assuming that their lack of fielded mages was due to their terrible educational system, and how in general casting with Night is both the cultural fad and an easier skill to acquire.

If they genuinely have absolutely no mages then their type disadvantage against Demons might be insurmountable.

Earl of Purple

I'm honestly not entirely sure, but the way their magic-powered siege weapons now work through Night is one. Another is that Pascale, the Stalwart Apostle, had her Gift scoured out of her when the Gods granted her the ability to channel Light, and we have never seen anyone- with the exception of Masego, who cheats with Wrest, and possibly Roland, who cheats with Confiscate and Use- who is both a priest and a mage, implying there's some Creational law against stacking too many power sources into one person.

WuseMajor

Masego has mentioned before that magic apparently requires a specific philosophy and mindset. As such, trying to learn multiple fundamentally different types of magic apparently produces enough cognitive dissonance that you either can't do it, or you'll go mad from trying.

The Drow could certainly steal a lot of knowledge though, whether or not they can use it.

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't think there's any Drow with the Gift left, all became Night. On the other hand, Mighties could certainly create new secrets derived from magic.

caoimhinh

Obviously the real deeper reason is what is said in the last paragraph: Cat wants to be lighting fires of her own XD

Adrian_V

Lets open the betting pool with 100 imaginary $ with less than 24h until arson!!

sengachi

I dunno, I could see food being all of it.

Praesi has a crippling food problem at the best of times, it's why they attack Callow. They've been cut off from Callow's grain supply for a few years and going through a freaking civil war. Even if the war itself has been on a low burn, simply keeping the armies involved mobilized must burn through food like no one's business.

If Catherine makes the Empire's food problem bad enough and then dangles the Callowan grain trade as a carrot, it could make Malicia come to the table no matter how much she hates it.

Mental Mouse

We already know from last book that she does want those diabolists.

WuseMajor

See.... I'm like 90% certain that Cat would only want to be facing Malicia over a negotiation table if she had a way to murder her via her link to whatever drone body she was using at the time.

Cat doesn't want to negotiate with Malicia. Cat wants to murder her and take her stuff.

Not just because Malicia has crossed Cat one too many times, but because Malicia's strengths are in plotting, planning, and talking. If Cat can keep everything at the military scale, she has a chance of taking over the country and getting what she needs. As soon as she has to face Malicia over a negotiation table, Malicia has the advantage again, and Malicia has repeatedly demonstrated that she really cannot be trusted once things reach the point of negotiations.

Or, well, that she can't be trusted, period. So, negotiating with her wouldn't have much point for three reasons.

I suspect that Malicia will try to sue for peace in fairly short order after she finds out what Cat does to this place, but I suspect that it will end up much like when Cat told Cordy that the Dead King was starting to move and Malicia will get to see what it looks like when the Long Price comes due.

...You know, Cat should name her sword the Long Price or something. Or, pack a bunch of goblinfire grenades in a bag labeled "the Long Price." Or give it to the legion that's heavy on sappers and military engineers as a cognomen. Something, because it's too good as a name not to use.

Victor?

First?!

Victor?

Ah NVM I was close though.

ruduen

Things have shot back to the top with the story resuming, but if you haven't, boost and help push things along!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

So, what are the odds that Wolof ends on fire despite the stated goal of theft?

Anomandris

Considering how a verbose nature it's attractiveness was described in, I would say even odds...

Mental Mouse

Considering Catherine's history, I'd say better than that,
dadycoool

Wow, I hadn't realized how much I missed Cat being in Praes. I think this is the most fun she's had in literal years, maybe even since last she'd left the Wasteland. I love how their plan is basically saying "Look! We're here for a battle! Watch us massacre our way through the Empire, starting here!" and then stealing their food with minimal blood and vanishing. "It was time I returned the favour and started lighting fires of my own." Wow, Cat, way to hang the lampshade. Ooh, now that they're back in Praes, maybe the fire will be green again!

Odd

Considering that the folks returning with Archer are almost certainly goblin Matrons to be swayed into assistance by exquisite backstabbery, I'd say green fire is back on the menu.

Juff

Typo Thread:

comes that > comes to that as young girl > as a young girl that was utterly uninterested > that we were utterly uninterested their knife at their throat (is this intentional, or should it be "the knife") natural, in > natural, but in

Anon

I wonder if we should start adding every time Catherine thinks "my eyes" to the typo thread?

At the start of the chapter she only rolled her "eye", but later on she uses plural..

Anon

to the east the raging waters > to the west*

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

"simple silver circlet over her milkman's braid"

>Almost certainly mean "milkmaid's braid" since it's been called that before and milkmen don't stereotypically have braided hair, or exist until after cars are invented.

"set on few hilly sloped."

>"Set on a few hilly slopes" my autocorrect tried to make it sloped as well, so it's easy to miss.

Didn't see any others, either fixed or too tired at 4 am to spot them.

edrey

here i have a theory after re-reading the novel so i want to give my grain of sand, from the narrative point of view, all this is about above, below and the game of balance, when the dwarfs started the planning of their conquest to the everdark, at least a century ago, the Heavens sent the saint and the peregrine to clean the west of the continent, all with the goal to end Evil in calernia in a multi front attack. something like this. good rise in the west, evil rise in the east, the 10 crusade, Dk invade, K under invade the everdark, the sisters go to the surface without a guide and several decades later, Good is cornered so super Heroes, like the mirror Knight appear (old version). however, Below plan is different, since their direct intervention in the everdark, they had given up the age of wonder for the age of order, putting their pieces in place for this, like triumphant, Cat, etc. this is about creating a new evil country equal to the K under, so all surface countries are done, but united, the accords are the first step in that and the fall of the Dk is the pivot to a new era.

this is just me, but after reading the chapter where black and Tarik talk, i couldn't help but think this theory.

Burlyraven

Still holding out on saying what exactly Vivienne's Name is, I see. I don't know whether I would be more frustrated or amused if it was a running joke of this arc.

gwennafran

EE did a Discord AMA last week where he was asked if Vivienne got a Name.

The reply was: "Vivienne does not currently have a Name"

Earl of Purple

Nobody at the time asked if she was a Claimant, however, which maybe was an oversight.

Adrian_V

Who was the girl Cat saved and when was that?

Earl of Purple

The girl in book one, right at the beginning, shortly before her first meeting with Amadeus.

Adrian_V

Huh, the way it was asking i was certain it was another, like she saved her after becoming famous xD

Burlyraven

Yeah, that doesn't sit right. If she's not at least a claimant, that's a full on retcon, and a kind of sketchy one at that.

Agent J

Hakram finagled literal bullshit to make her a legitimate Princess. If she doesn't start shining by book's end, I'll eat my boot.

medailyfun

she's probably Cat's daughter now

Raved Thrad

"You don't look much like a 'Black Princess' to me."
"Yeah, mom, I prefer to wear blue, myself."

Shequi

I'm a fan of the idea of her being "The Sun Princess", given her backstory to date.

Miley

I know it's been a while, but Vivienne not having a name is the whole point because of the terms Cat intends to put in place after the war. There's no good replacement that we know of to rule Callow and the whole idea is that Named individuals cannot hold positions of authority, because it gives them way too much access to cause widespread destruction.

Shveiran

It's not the whole point, it is A point.

Catherine would definitely prefer rulership being separated from Names, but she doesn't really have the power to impose that. Names stem from culture and it is unlikely culture will reject them if Calernia is saved by Named.

Maybe Vivienne will rule as Nameless, maybe a long-lost member of House Fairfax will pop up to claim the Name of Good King and Queen and Vivienne will have no choice but to embrace her own claim to keep the throne.

No matter what happens in Callow, it is probably a given that the Accords won't ban Named from ruling.

Praes? Levant? Heck, if by the end of the war First Under the Night isn't a Name among the drow I'll eat my hat.

jamesc9

Rule by non-named just became a lot more likely in the Levant.

Marco Boscolo

The Wheel of Time had a line that went:

"How do you fight someone smarter than yourself? The answer is simple. You make her think that you are sitting down across the table from her, ready to play her game. Then you punch her in the face as hard as you can."

Adrian V

I was also thinking it was that one

Raved Thrad

That last line pretty much confirms for me that Catherine is going to set something alight with goblinfire, even if only as a possible memorial to Robber.

I still can't believe the little shit is gone. Glory to the House of Lesser Footrest!

Golden Lark

I daresay that Callow has a very, very strong story backing them right now.

Praes has been stealing food from Callow for GENERATIONS. Even when they go to war, even when Callow doesn't lose, that imbalance still stands.

Now, Callow is coming to steal food from Praes. There is no narrative in the world strong enough to stop this balancing of the scales. As long as Cat keeps stealing Malicia's snacks, she is unstoppable.

vernal.ancient

Dear God I've missed Catherine's narration and social interactions. I have nothing deep to say about the chapter, just that I loved every second of it and can't wait for the next one

Alex K

Catherine is mugging someone again? Neat!

boballab

She is also about to embrace her inner pyromaniac as the last line appears to show. Make Fire Green Again!

Darkening

Just as long as she remembers, "Pillage, then burn."

Raved Thrad

"Kill them and take their stuff!"

Adrian_V

Mmm who else thinks the reason Akua was there is so they saw her unbound, like those nobles will spread the word and rumours will fly, things like she alied with Cat and came to be installed and replace her cousin, or even that she somehow is actually running the show (afterall how could a callowan become so powerfull instead of a praesi noble, is what they will be thinking).

The point being that Sargon is bound so to speak, i think Malicia had his soul or something like it? So the idea of Akua running the show would look much more attractive to them, and being praesi it won't be long before they plot away. This pressure will force Sargon to move to either eliminate her or just a show of force.

Darkening

I think he got his soul back from Malicia after he ousted his aunt.

Simpli

Excited to see the new book, ever amused at the Army of Callow continuing its Schrödinger State of being halfway between being an green mess with too few officers, one crushing catastrophe after another etc. and at the same time being able to always open new fronts and fights whenever Kat needs them half a world away.

Well~ At least I can hope that my favorite Character makes a good showing before she gets clobbered, but so far Malicia was build up quite well at least~

Miley

Counting on coincidence, I wonder which Hero she invited. Pilgrim is dead, White is busy, not a lot of the big Heroic Names are left. WK and MK are likely seeing large boosts in power to maintain the balance, or maybe there's a new Name in town. It could be the Bard, since Cat's now doing what Bard wanted all along, though how she tracked down the WB would be yet another mystery.

Shveiran

There is no way in Keter that Catherine is teaming up with the Bard.

The Bard is the most dangerous when she has access, you win by keeping her away from everyone. That was the mayor win out of the Arsenal mess: that nearly anyone doesn't talk to her, and that slows her down.

Abnaxis

Why do they need an aqueduct when there's a massive river right there?

Earl of Purple

It's easier to control the purity of an aqueduct, especially compared to a river. People live upstream, because people always do, and they're using the river in fishing, washing, and drinking... and also to flush away their waste. In addition, if Wolof were besieged, they no longer have access to the river, as there is now an enemy army in the way. If they have an aqueduct, they still get water. Plus, a river can always be dammed, or if there's a long enough drought it could dry up on its own.

Chapter 2: Perplex

"People are never easier to fool than when they believe they're fooling you."

– King Alistair Fairfax, the Fox

When was the last time I'd gone even six months without sleeping in a tent?

The thought amused more the more I thought about it. Elizabeth Alban, the ol' Queen of Blades herself, had conquered the closest thing there ever was to a Callowan empire before the Watch slit her throat in her bed. My war record had led people to compare us on occasion – apparently there was a ballad and everything – but I actually figured I had more in common with her successor: Richard the Elder. They only started calling him the Elder in later histories, see, after he named his eldest son Richard as well. At the time they'd called him 'Richard Saddlesore'. The sobriquet was well-earned, considering he'd spent nearly all his reign moving from one side of his realm to another putting down rebellions.

Most everything the Queen of Blades had conquered west of the Whitecaps rose up the moment she died, and then Callowan nobles afraid of the growing power of the Albans promptly crowned his cousin the moment he crossed the mountains to handle said revolts. Praes had inevitably thrown its hat into the ring when they smelled blood, of course, never mind that they'd just gotten whipped back into the Wasteland under Regalia II. King Richard the Elder had actually done pretty well at staving off the collapse of his inherited 'empire' for a generation, only ceding independence to a few western territories, but by the time he'd died in his late thirties it'd been almost a decade since he'd last set foot in his own capital.

It'd been much shorter than that, for me, but I couldn't deny that I'd spent most of my reign as Queen of Callow outside my kingdom. There was always another fire to put out, wasn't there? I raised a small cup of wine in the air, drawing a raised eyebrow from Akua.

"You and me both, Richard," I muttered. "May we rest our buttocks in the next world."

There was a moment of silence.

"I'm not touching that," Vivienne decided.

Hakram, the sole loyal soul in this nest of traitors, raised his cup of water to match my toast and we drank. The four of us had convened in my tent, around the beautiful table that Indrani was still adding to. The last relief was parts of the Battle of Hainaut, and I was always careful to sit on the other side. Robber would have loved the sight of him striking a match and the Dead King's plans going up in flames, but I still couldn't look at the carved goblin face without my gut clenching. There were quite a few seats prepared, since even before most of us stayed for the upcoming war council we had a report to entertain. We couldn't really finalize our plans for the night without Masego's seal of approval.

The phalanges had notified us he'd returned through the Ways and Zeze wasn't the type to go wash and change before reporting, so I wasn't even halfway done with my cup by the time he swept in past my guards. His informal pupil followed, my waved hand stopping the legionaries from taking issue with it, and I rolled my eye at Masego as he dropped himself into the seat across from me. The black robes he still wore had a subtle gold filigree, nowadays, but aside from that little of him had changed since he'd first become the Hierophant.

He still bore the same long braids inlaid with trinkets, wore the same black silk eyecloth over his burning glass eyes – nowadays a match to the one I wore over the eye the Hawk had taken from me – and wore the same comfortably worn old boots. The only change was that he'd begun to grow a beard: still glorified stubble, for now, but it rather suited his face and made him look older. A little like his father, actually, though the Warlock's beard had been much fuller. He looked tired but in a good mood, which I took as a good sign.

"The warding scheme has changed from what you outlined, Akua," Hierophant said.

Behind him, already forgot, his recent shadow was shuffling about on her feet awkwardly. The Apprentice, the young Ashuran mage known as Sapan, was coated in dust from head to toe and visibly exhausted. He'd probably made her do all the groundwork, I thought with a twinge of amusement. She looked hesitant to take a seat at my table without an explicit invitation, so I took pity on her and caught her eye before nodding in invitation. She bowed her head in thanks, sliding into a chair even as Masego helped himself to a pitcher of magically cooled water with equally magically obtained lemon quarters floating in it.

If you counted sending a cohort of goblins to empty High Lord Sargon's orchards as magic, anyway.

"It was a possibility, as I mentioned when we discussed the matter," Akua replied. "Yet the central patterns remained the same, I expect?"

Masego drank deep of his cup of water, filling it again almost immediately and not noticing Apprentice's hand inching halfway towards it before she drew back with a sigh.

"More or less," Masego agreed. "They mostly made changes to more strongly close off entry by Arcadia or the Ways. Recent modifications, about as old as the Arsenal. I imagine the city will have received the same work."

We'd expected as much, but it was useful to know both those options were off the table if it came to an assault on Wolof.

"You managed it anyway," I said, half a question.

Under the cloth he rolled his eyes at me.

"It was not that sophisticated a ward," Masego said. "Of course I cracked it, Catherine. It's done, and it was subtle enough they won't notice."

He mulled over things for a moment longer, dutiful in his attempt to make a report – though apparently not dutiful enough to ever read the text about how to give them the Legions had written. Not for lack of opportunity, since Juniper still had a scroll thrown into his tent at least once a month. I was pretty sure Indrani was making a pyramid.

"Sapan crawled uphill for half an hour under an illusion to place my artefact against the bottom of the wall," Hierophant noted. "She did well. She should get a raise."

Apprentice look startled and a little flattered, but there was one detail wrong there. I cleared my throat, but Hakram took one for the team and spoke up first.

"We don't actually pay her," Adjutant informed him.

Masego eyed me skeptically, brow rising.

"Is that slavery?" he asked. "We're against that, I feel. I'm against that."

"We're against slavery," I confirmed. "There's laws and everything."

He seemed pleased at me personally, like I actually had anything to do about that.

"Experience could be considered to be her compensation," Akua suggested.

Well, she had been Evil for decades. That was bound to leave marks.

"Spoken like someone who's never had to pay taxes in their damned life," I muttered under my breath.

Her lips quirked in a sly smile but she did not deign to answer my accusation. Gods, now I had to pay the girl otherwise fifteen-year-old me would have slit my throat over it. Mind you, that girl had never been one to mind a bit of knifing so it wasn't as strong a remonstrance as you'd think.

"We'll put aside a stipend for you on top of what the Grand Alliance already offers," I told Apprentice. "Your help in this is much appreciated, Sapan."

The dark-haired girl licked her lips, nervous, and nodded.

"May I – Your Majesty – could I... trade that for an hour a day with Lord Hierophant's grimoires?" she hesitantly asked.

I turned an eye to Masego, who actually looked rather charmed. He'd taken well to her since Hainaut, I suspected it was half the reason Hanno had agreed to lend her to us – the other half being Arthur had come along too and the two were thick as thieves.

"Keep her out of the dangerous stuff," I said.

"Of course," he immediately agreed, sounding surprised.

Ah, my mistake.

"Akua," I said, "please go with them and tell him what the dangerous stuff is."

"I feel like the situation has gone in somehow disastrously wrong, when I am called upon as the voice of sorcerous restraint," the golden-eyed shade noted, but she was still smiling.

"Tell me about it," I sighed.

She rose smoothly, offering me an ironic bow I rolled my eye at, and linked an arm with Masego as he did the same. They immediately started arguing in Mthethwa about what qualified as 'safe' – Zeze was insisting that the smiting spell was exactly that, so long as you kept it aimed at the enemy – while Sapan followed suit after affording me a deeper bow.

"I'll see to the stipend," Adjutant gravelled. "And extract a fuller report out of them while you two handle the war council."

Though the Night had been shattered and broken first by the Dead King's sorcery and then Hierophant's even harsher mercy, I had still been bound to the power in a deep and intimate way. Night came slower these days, and it was granted only by the will of the Sisters where once it had flown freely, but the mark of Sve Noc on my soul had not waned. I could still sense the coming of night like a sixth sense, through that strange instinct that was inhumanly accurate. And what I sensed told me that, as usual, Hakram was right. Nightfall was only two hours away, which meant we'd be cutting it close if we didn't split to attend to our duties.

"Much appreciated," I replied.

We rose to follow the others after scratching a few notes on parchment with his bone hand, sending in a few phalanges after him to prepare the tent for the war council. Juniper, as was her habit, came in half an hour early to make sure everything was to her tastes. I'd forgotten how tall she was, in our years physically apart: she still had almost two feet on me, and she was built thick. With that grim, broad face and the sharp white fangs she made for an even more imposing sight than before now that we were older. Which made it all the more of a contrast when Aisha followed in behind her, the very picture of a quintessential Taghreb beauty with her carefully styled hair and elegant smile.

"Move the maps away from wine carafe," Juniper ordered a phalange in a growl. "Whose bright idea was that?"

"Good evening, Catherine," Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara greeted me.

The faint exasperation at her friend and superior's growling about was a worn and beloved habit, almost made a game between them from years of use.

"Aisha," I grinned back. "Juniper."

She turned to look at us, almost surprised, and nodded.

"Catherine, Vivienne," she curtly replied.

Vivienne was no more offended than I, the two of us well used to the Hellhound's ways. At times, though, it felt like she was being twice as hard as she used to be to make up for the way she'd been knocked out of the war for two years. Even now Aisha had told me that she visibly trembled when exhausted and slept uneasily at least a few nights a month. I wouldn't have placed her in command if she were any worse, even if she would likely never have forgiven me for that, but sometimes I was still... concerned. I kept it to myself, though. There was no doubt in my mind that she'd see it as an insult.

Our war council streamed in, either early or on time. General Zola Osei, Hune's successor who'd ended up as Juniper's second in the cobbled together First and Second Army we'd taken east – some had taken to calling it the Fifth as a jest. Grandmaster Brandon Talbot for the Order, and for the Dominion the two lordlings that Tariq had placed in my care before his death: Aquiline Osená and Razin Tanja. Named, too, though their seats were lesser ones. Alexis the Argent, the Silver Huntress, and Arthur Foundling with her. The Concocter didn't usually show to meetings like this, but the Barrow Sword did and seated himself by Vivienne. Ishaq would have been a good pick to leave out west, but I had a purpose for him here: it wasn't a coincidence I kept making him work with the Blood. The Grey Pilgrim had asked three boons of me, and I intended on seeing all of them through.

"Let's not waste time," Marshal Juniper of Callow began, voice rough. "Night's coming and we have a schedule to keep. We received confirmation from Hierophant that the assault on Jinon is feasible, so we'll be going through with it."

Wolof was, in part, fed water by an aqueduct whose source was in the hills to the northeast of the city – the Jinon Hills. The place where the structure connected with the city walls was fortified, naturally, but so was the source in the hills that the water flowed from. A small but solid and heavily warded fortress had been raised there, over an underground basin where overflow could be directed to when heavy rains struck the aqueduct hard. There shouldn't be more than two or three hundred soldiers there but all my officers were in agreement that the fortress of Jinon – I'd yet to get a definitive answer on whether the hills were named after the fortress or the other way around – would be a nightmare to assault.

Tall and heavy walls, steep slopes all around and there was bound to be a heavy mage contingent garrisoned. We could take the fortress by assaulting the walls, there was no doubt about that. We had the numbers. But it would be very costly in casualties and we honestly couldn't afford that. We were already going to be starkly outnumbered in the latter parts of this campaign, throwing away lives on a hard assault would be sheer stupidity. We did need the place, though, in part to pressure Sargon and also because it was crucial to some other schemes I had in mind. Which was why I'd sat with Juniper and Pickler to plot Jinon's fall, and then sent Masego ahead to make sure what we intended was possible.

"I'll be leading that part of our offensive personally," I said. "For that purpose, I'll be taking two cohorts, our false guards and whatever warband Lady Aquiline deems fit to grant me."

Which, given how Levantine honour worked, would lead her to...

"I will go myself," Aquiline Osená replied without hesitation. "And take my slayers as retinue."

There we go, I thought. One of them with me to keep an eye on, and I'd pass off Razin to Hakram and the Barrow Sword.

"Good fit," I nodded, and she straightened her back some.

It was true, even if it wasn't the only reason she'd picked her most prestigious unit to take into battle with me. Levantines were surprisingly good at night work and surprise approaches, I'd found, which I really should have expected given that they spent most of their time raiding each other back in the Dominion.

"Taking Jinon will be tricky work," Juniper said. "It could go badly for us if Wolof tries a sortie at our back while it happens. Which is why we'll be drawing Sargon's attention elsewhere as that attack happens."

She tapped a finger on our map of Wolof and its outskirts, everyone's eyes following towards the west. It was the fishing villages by the shore of the Wasaliti she was indicating. Sinka, they were commonly called. There was no port proper for Wolof – nowhere near enough river trade to warrant it – so it was all very informal, with the Sahelians effectively owning one of the villages and keeping their own barges there while the rest of the villages were left in the hands of merchants and locals under the loose supervision of an appointed seneschal.

"The Sahelians no longer have a significant river fleet, courtesy of Princess Vivienne during the Liesse Rebellion," Juniper continued, which drew some laughs and cheers, "but Sinka is still a major asset to the city. It's a source of fish and lumber – they send people across to cut from the Greywood – and they import goods from further south through it. It will be a blow for them to lose the district. Fortunately, its defences are limited. General Zola, if you would?"

The dark-skinned woman cleared her throat.

"Our scouts have confirmed a garrison of around five hundred, most of them household troops," General Zola said. "The walls are mud brick and wood, and only three of the five villages have them. The barracks are reinforced, however, and built to be defended. There are also two watchtowers, so we can safely assume we will be seen approaching."

From the corner of my eye I saw Arthur leaning forward, itching to ask a question but holding himself back. Going wider, I saw incomprehension in the eyes of the Blood and even Ishaq. I raised a hand, stopping Zola before she could continue her briefing.

"Squire," I said. "Out with it."

His eyes widened for a moment, but he gathered himself quick.

"Why are you so sure we'll be seen, ma'am?" he asked the general. "It'll be under cover of dark and we have scrying countermeasures."

Ah, so that was it. I glanced at Zola, silently indicating I was going to cut in. I forgot, sometimes, that he was young. And that some of the people at this table had never truly had to consider what it would mean, going to war with Praesi.

"Aisha," I idly said, "would you please put your hand to a candle?"

A few people raised their voices to object in surprise and she gave me a dry look for the dramatics, but the tent went silent when she placed her hand over the open flame without so much as a twitch. She drew it away after a few heartbeats, revealing to all smooth skin unmarred by burns.

"This is the Dread Empire of Praes," I flatly said. "We've gotten used to having the upper hand in sorcery, fighting out west, but leave that behind you: we're now facing the makers of all the spells we cribbed. It's in the blood here, Squire. If they don't have a spell then they'll have someone whose blood lets them see in the dark, or a monster that smells the wind, a pack of flying devils or a hundred other things. They'll see us coming, count on it. It's what they do."

I'd not meant it to, but I caught a certain amount of pride in the bearing of my Praesi officers after the tirade. I couldn't begrudge them that, I thought. Where you were born, is stayed with you. Good and bad. And in the end, I had not forgotten it was not only my countrymen who had joined the voices to the tune of In Dread Crowned when we marched on Dormer. There was a difference between hating the high lords of Praes and hating Praesi. I passed the proverbial baton back to Zola, who finished outlining what we knew of Sinka's defences as well as the plan of attack.

It was a fairly simple straightforward thrust with three thousand foot from the south, led by Vivienne but commanded by General Zola herself, with a screen of goblin skirmishers up front. Another two thousand foot, half of them Levantine and under the overall command of Razin Tanja, would move between the city and Sinka to dissuade a sortie. They'd have the two thousand horsemen of the Order of Broken Bells waiting in the wings for support. We'd keep a loose reserve of three thousand to throw at either battlefield, just in case. Afterwards it came to distributing Named, and there I took the lead again.

"The Silver Huntress will lend her skills to our skirmishers, though she will remain an independent command free to act as she sees fit," I laid out. "Squire and Apprentice will accompany Princess Vivienne, under her authority. The Barrow Sword will go with Lord Razin. The Hierophant will be accompanying me, and as usual the Concocter is not to be considered a combat asset."

Lady Alexis worked better when left alone when she wasn't the leader, I'd found. Not unlike Archer, though both would resent the comparison. As for the two young Named, this was as much about them keeping Vivienne's head on her neck as it was the other way around. Admittedly, when it came to Arthur I did have other motives. Getting him used to obeying my chosen successor was a necessary precaution, as far as I was concerned, especially now that the Jacks had established that a dynastic marriage was a dead end should he become a locus of opposition. Finding that out had been relatively simple: we'd sent one of the Jacks around his age to make advances, he'd gently let her down by telling her he was not interested in women that way.

Adjutant had insisted I could have simply asked, but this was probably safer. The Squire might not easily figure out why he'd been asked the question, but he'd know people with stronger insights into Callow's politics who very much would.

"Expect surprises," Juniper gravelled, concluding the council. "We'll be surprising them too, but don't forget for the moment they had the same day to plan that we did."

I toasted to that, finally polishing the last of my wine, and to war we went.

—

I didn't like being blind, and I didn't mean in the losing-an-eye-sense.

Although, to be fair, I wasn't enamoured with that one either. What I meant, though was that I'd gotten used to being able to rely on Night to get a good view of the battlefield even as fights were happening. Unfortunately, drawing on that kind of power so close to mages of the calibre Wolof was going to field would be like unveiling a lantern in a black pit. Impossible to miss. Being robbed of that view was making me restless, though, especially since I was distinctive enough in appearance that I couldn't be on the front seat of either of the large ox-drawn wagons going up the smooth hillside path. It was pretty comfortable huddled out in the back, at least, except for the part where Masego was absolutely demolishing me at shatranj.

"How is everyone I know so good at this game?" I complained in a whisper, losing my last mage to a pin.

"I still play with Indrani regularly," Zeze informed me just as quietly. "Although you have always been terrible at this."

"I'm pretty widely known as a cunning schemer, Masego," I told him, a little affronted.

I sent a knight forward, hoping to at least make my death throes interesting. If I had to lose to him a fourth time in a row, someone was going to get killed.

"Yes," he happily acknowledged. "One who just lost her chancellor. Kingtip in three."

I cursed, and it was an awfully close thing when I decided against the cart suddenly shaking and toppling the board by happenstance. Damned thing was enchanted to stick anyway, I wouldn't be fooling anyone. The two of us were playing in the dark, since it was as day to our common sum of exactly one meat eye. We were nestled between the kind of barrels and crates that Wolof used to send oil and foodstuffs up to Jinon, though naturally they were actually full of soldiers. Who I hoped we'd been whispering quietly enough had not all heard me getting repeatedly brutalized at shatranj by my own court wizard.

There were only twenty soldiers by wagon, since more would drag noticeably on the road, but we had more forces at hand. Some of them were even visible. Armours the Callowan treasury had kept since the Doom of Liesse had been brought out of the vaults and polished up, meaning that the thirty handpicked Soninke legionaries making up our drivers and foot escort of the wagons were in genuine Sahelian household armour. That ought to sell the illusion some, though I wouldn't be relying entirely on it. We had more forces out there in the hills, hidden. Part of it was a cohort of regulars we'd walked out of the Ways out of easy detection range and then snuck closer to the fortress, while the rest was Aquiline Osen's handpicked slayers. Two hundred of them.

Those moved around like shadows, probably the finest human sneaks I'd seen – not quite in the league of goblins, but close.

Our wagon began to slow and I cast a glance at Masego, whose eyes swivelled in their sockets. He nodded. We had arrived. As Hierophant began putting away the shatranj board I swallowed a groan of pain and began wiggling around until I had my elbows on a crate and could discreetly look out the front of the wagon. Sergeant Kadeem was a large and bulky man, enough so that I'd heard a few jokes about him being a dark-skinned orc, but he was deft with the reins. His family were travelling traders, apparently. Moving slightly to the side of him to get a better angle, I had my first close up look at the fortress of Jinon. Heavy stone blocks, I noted, granite that looked to have been fitted together without mortar.

No wonder Pickler had been adamant trebuchets wouldn't do much.

I studied the gatehouse that'd be our way in closely, as it was the key. Two squat bastions crowded a gate wide enough for a cart to pass and then some, pale yellow magelights hovering above it. There were two sets of gates, both thick wood barded with steel, but they were open: only the portcullis in front of them both was down. From above, the gatehouse rampart, I heard voices hailing us in Mthethwa. It was Captain Diara who answered them – we'd picked her because she was native to Wolof and cold-blooded by reputation – and she put irritation in her voice as she told them to hurry up so she could unload the goods and leave. Masego got closer to me and I glanced at him curiously.

"My amendment to the wards appears to be intact," Hierophant murmured.

I nodded. So far, so good. The guards above insisted there had been no planned supply run, which was true, but we'd thought ahead: Captain Diara waved around papers she informed them were proof, signed by her superior in the city. Hakram was a splendid forger and Akua had helped get the details right, should they actually bother to look at them. See, if we were infiltrating a Proceran fortress then the papers would be what they looked at. This was a Praesi fortress, though, so when the agitated guards went to get their office the man in question scoffed and ordered one of them to go tell a scrying mage to contact the city for confirmation.

This would be where the plan fell apart, if I hadn't brought Hierophant along.

We waited for some time, Masego's eyes on the sky, and eventually there was a subtle ripple of power as Hierophant wrested the scrying spell the slightest bit, pulling apart the magic so it failed. Thrice more they tried it, and Masego played it artfully: on the second try he let it pass through for a moment, severing the connection late. We were pretending that the city was under magical attack, that it was why the spells weren't working. Captain Diara, meanwhile, pretended to grow increasingly agitated. She asked for names, claimed she would speak to her relatives in the High Lord's service about this, cursed them for lazy incompetents. I was impressed, she was definitely getting a commendation. We'd been at this for more than half an hour now, so the officer who'd ordered scrying fell back on the tried and true method of all career soldiers: he kicked the problem up the ladder.

"Describe me the armour of the officer they went to get," I asked Masego.

He did, quietly, and my lips thinned. That was the fortress's commander, for sure. They'd not wasted time going to the top, then. The woman in question, who introduced herself to Captain Diara as Lady Semira, proved to be a calming presence. She ordered for soldiers to take position behind the portcullis and then told Diara to come forward alone with the papers proving she was truly here under orders. So now we're putting Hakram's forgeries to the test, I thought. Diara didn't hesitate, passing the papers before the portcullis closed anew and they were sent up to Lady Semira.

"These appear to be in order," Lady Semira said, looking down from above.

If I bent, I could make out a glimpse of her standing above. Tall and imperious, with eyes a hue between yellow and brown.

"Is there a particular reason, Captain Diara, that this run was not handled by Tabansi instead?" she asked.

I tensed.

"Didn't ask, my lady," Diara replied. "If it doesn't help me get back into bed, it's not my concern."

"So I see," Lady Semira replied, tone amused. "It will only be a moment, captain."

I breathed out. Had we gotten away with it?

"She is gesturing at soldiers," Masego told me, studying the scene with his eldritch eyes. "One just went towards the barracks. Others are being told to... head towards the gate?"

Evidently we had not gotten away with it. It was the second string to our bow that'd make or break this.

"Progress?" I quietly asked Hierophant.

"Not there yet," Masego replied.

Sighed. That meant there was only one thing for me to do. I cracked the side of my neck and dragged myself up.

"Signal me when the time comes," I asked him.

I dropped into the front seat next to Sergeant Kadeem, who hid his startlement well. I pulled the Mantle of Woe tight around me and went rifling through the pockets, finding my pipe with a little noise of satisfaction and unceremoniously beginning to stuff it with wakeleaf. I handed Kadeem a match and he gallantly struck it on his arm before lighting my pipe for me. Good man.

"Tell everyone to be ready to fight," I murmured around the rim. "Soon."

He froze then nodded, retreating into the back of the wagon and leaving me to pull at my pipe under the stare of the soldiers up on the rampart. I breathed in deep the of the acrid smoke, letting it sear my lungs before I spat it back out in a stream. Up there, behind the crenelation, Lady Semira was watching me through narrowed eyes as her fingers tightened around the stone until the knuckles paled. Even out east it seemed that my reputation preceded me.

"Black Queen," the commander greeted me, voice laudably even. "It seems we now dispense with the deceptions."

I shrugged.

"What was it that gave it away?" I asked, genuinely curious.

"Captain Tabansi was publicly drowned last week, for having stolen Sahelian goods and sold them on the black market," Lady Semira said. "The entire garrison was made to watch."

Which, admittedly, would make it difficult to lead a supply run. Not impossible, mind you. This was Praes.

"That'd to it," I ruefully said.

If we'd had Scribe with us I might have heard of even a relatively minor incident like that, but I'd sent her off with Archer. It had paid off in other ways, but there were costs to everything.

"I am under orders to avoid fighting you if I can, Your Majesty," Lady Semira told me. "Your ploy was well-crafted, but it has failed. My soldiers are on the walls and my mages awake. I would invite you to withdraw, and offer my oath no attempt will be made to hinder your departure."

I smiled, because I knew something she didn't. When I'd sat with Pickler and Juniper to figure out how we might take Jinon as bloodlessly as we could, eventually we'd stumbled onto an interesting question: where did the shit go? Jinon had one source of water, and they couldn't foul it. It fed right into the aqueduct that Wolof used. So a pit under it? The fortress had existed for several centuries, though, it would have filled by now. If this were Callow it would be a matter of chamber pots and dumping them somewhere far enough the smell wouldn't reach the walls, but Wolof was rich. Nobles served in its garrison too, people not used to roughing it.

So instead they'd had built latrines, sophisticated little things that dumped their filth neatly outside the fortress into a series of pits.

"You're polite," I said, approvingly. "So let me make an offer back: if you and your garrison surrender, you will be treated under Callowan terms for prisoners. No mistreatment, regular meals and you'll be offered up at the first prisoner trade with your sworn lord."

It was Praesi who'd built the latrine, so of course it wasn't that simple. They were a paranoid bunch, Wastelanders. The latrines tunnels were too small for someone to crawl up and they were warded in case someone tried to send devils through instead. The Sahelians had, however, made a small mistake. I breathed in the smoke, the end of the pipe burning like a red eye in the dark, and when I breathed out I let the grey drift upwards. No wind, tonight, so it stayed around me like a crown of fumes.

"I do not deny your power, Black Queen," Lady Semira carefully said. "Yet the wards of this fortress are old and powerful. You will not find them easy to batter down. And steel will not carry this day if your might cannot. I can only-"

A hand tapped my shoulder. Masego, giving me his signal. I smiled. I'd kept her talking long enough, baited enough soldiers to the walls.

"It's over," I interrupted. "You've lost."

Her face tightened with anger.

"Close the gates," Lady Semira ordered.

There was a long heartbeat of silence as nothing happened. Then I put fingers to my mouth and whistled, meeting her eyes. Barrels and crates cracked open, soldiers crawling out armed to the teeth, and out of the dark came marching the first of the two cohorts I'd brought. Aquiline and her slayers crept up the hill, still unseen. But the killing blow was something else entirely. There was a distant sound of cackling, and a heartbeat later the portcullis began rising to the vivid horror of the Sahelian soldiers manning the gate. The cohort of goblins I'd sent up the latrines had seized the most important room in the gatehouse, the one controlling the portcullis and gates. There would be no preventing our entry. To hammer that point home, Hierophant came out of the wagon to sit by my side and put an end to any hope of wards or sorcery stopping us.

See, the latrines were too small for humans to crawl up them. And the wards had been meant to stop devils going up, not goblins, because the Grey Eyries were on the other side of Praes and no Sahelian had ever had to defend this fortress against them. All it had taken to make my cohort's infiltration entirely unseen was Masego disabling the small part of the wards that would trigger an alarm if something large entered through the latrines, the kind of small detail that it would take an in-depth check of the wards to notice.

But, as this land of diabolists ought to know, the devil was in the details.

"Sleight of hand, Semira," I told my enemy, not unkindly. "If you're watching me, you're not watching where you should be."

I breathed in deep of the wakeleaf, then blew out one last breath.

"So," I said. "Are you going to surrender now, or do I need to... how did you put it again? Ah, yes."

I met her eyes with my own.

"Batter you down," I coldly said.

The possibility of violence hung in the air, thick as smoke, while the noblewoman weighed her chances. She eyed my forces once again, then finally grimaced.

"Jinon is yours, Black Queen," Lady Semira said.

Well, I thought as my men began cheering, it's a small victory, but it's a start.

Dave

first!

dadycoool

Hey, it worked this time.

Ash

Is that slavery? -> Isn't that slavery?

Liliet

Nah, Masego's voice is like that. He's asking for clarification, not making a rhetorical point.

Yunamed

It's good to see your comments on the story again.

shikkarasu

Indeed! Welcome back, Liliet.

Anomandris

"Experience could be considered to be her compensation," Akua suggested.

Well, she had been Evil for decades. That was bound to leave marks.

Well, that confirms it. Lawyers and Bankers are Evil, I guess?

The Litigator, anyone?

Blue Dragon

More likely the "Solicitor," "Attorney," or "Barrister." Could see "Litigate" as an aspect, though.

Anomandris

That would've been so OP against an invasion like DK's.

"And with her right to LITIGATE, she had stalled out the undead army for close to half a decade. Behind her Procer and the rest of Calernia continued to amass forces for the final push against the Unnamed Horror"

Joshua

Now I'm imagining this setting in the analog of the Gilded Age. An evil name like "The Cowardly Scab" who has aspects Segrogate, Undermine, and Capitalize.

Schumi23

Ooo I like this idea – so kinda a "The Gods Are Bastards" version set in this setting 2000 years later?

Wanderer

Consider one man is basically injunctioning the Choir of Judgement into at least a stalemate, and may even be gaining ground. After being basically obliterated.

Lawful can indeed be Evil.

jamesc9

"lawful can be evil"

Yes; with a margin for the moral status that you assign to the Choir of Judgement.

nick012000

It sounds like the wards wouldn't stop goblin-sized undead from crawling up the latrines, either. It's probably a good thing that Praes isn't fighting the Dead King right now!

caoimhinh

Well, they did have wards that would detect if something large passed through, which is what Masego disabled. Also, I think undead would trigger some of the stuff, due to being constructs filled with sorcery.

Adrian_V

Like caoimhinh said the wards would detect the magic signature of an undead, and they can alert to everything because otherwise every rat would trigger them. Or even insects

jamesc9

So a mass corpse explosion of insects might be worth exploring.

sengachi

Ahhhhh. It's good to be reading this again.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, it's like we're back in books 2 and 3 😁

Benjamin Huang

Ah yes, the ol' latrine trick. Feel sorry for any poor bugger who was using the loo whilst a cohort of angry armored armed greenies were crawling up his behind. You would think that praes would plan for goblin incursion tho. whatevs. good read, good plots, good story.

Earl of Purple

As it mentions, too far away. Wolof is at the foot of the Steppes, the northerly most city in Praes. The Grey Eyries, home to the goblin clans, are across the Soninke lands, the Wasteland, and the desert at the far south end of Praes. It's never had to worry about goblins, because unless they're in the Legions it's too far to travel.

Adrian_V

Ahh its always the shit that does you in....xD

Raved Thrad

I see what you did there.

Adrian_V

I regret nothing!! xD

dadycool

Wow, Cat. Way to treat your Goblins like shit.

This book is definitely shaping to be an amazing one. It was fun watching her dance around the western half of the continent for, what, an IRL year? More? But Praes is where she first cut her teeth, this is the environment that she grew up in, this is where she first learned what Real Power could be. This is home, in a way that even Laure isn't. The Prasi think they have the Home Field advantage, but they've only known her as Squire, with mere hundreds following her. Now she's the Black Queen, very soon to be something so, so much more. None of them have any idea what's coming for them, least of all the woman that's been tossing Sharpers at her from atop her Tower for years. Now she's decided to actually fight back, and those who think themselves wolves are about to find out what it's like to be lambs.

Fayhem

> Wow, Cat. Way to treat your Goblins like shit.

On the contrary, shit goes DOWN the latrines. If anything she's treating them like the opposite of shit! Which does, technically, count as their bonus pay for the year.

Burlyraven

Wow, what a shitty plan. Worked beautifully, just as expected.

Also, I'm glad that Squire and Apprentice are still getting along. It means that Cat might actually survive being their tangential tutor in the short and long term, for reasons previously described and too long to copy here.

boballab

This is what always happens with plans when you finally meet the enemy...they go to shit.

Juff

Typo Thread:

more the more > me the more already forgot > already forgotten in invitation (might want to remove this to avoid repetition) from wine carafe > from the wine carafe born, is stayed > born, it stayed enough had > enough that they had slightest pit > slightest bit Sighed. That > I sighed. That "That'd to it," > "That'd do it,"

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

"We rose to follow the others after scratching a few notes on parchment with his bone hand, "

>"He rose" it would be our bone hand otherwise, and i don't think both of them have bone hands. You know, pronoun agreement.

"Move the maps away from wine carafe,"

>"Away from the wine carafe,"

"Where you were born, is stayed with you."

>"It stayed with you."

"From above, the gatehouse rampart, I hard voices hailing us in Mthethwa."

>"I heard voices" don't get me wrong, i hard about many things but I don't think I hard voices.

"so when the agitated guards went to get their office the man in question scoffed"

>"Went to get their officer" i don't think an office can scoff, or is a man.

"wrested the scrying spell the slightest pit,"

>"The slightest bit," don't worry, as a dyslexic i constantly get my b and p wrong.

"That'd to it," I ruefully said.

>"That'd do it,"

That'll do it.

Miley

I think this line sums up the chapter besr: "surprisingly good at night work and surprise approaches, "

Earl of Purple

For anyone who might be wondering why Aisha wasn't burnt by the candle, a very long time ago it was revealed her ancestors include djinn. It took me a moment to remember.

Darkening

Yeah, Taghreb in general were described as being fairly prolific about mixing magical creatures into their bloodlines to boost their magical ability.

Black Spiral Dancer

Awesome chapter.

Always love to see Masego interactions.

And always cool to remember how magic is so like programming code.

beleester

So, what's the goal in conquering Jinon? The obvious threat is to Wolof's water supply, which would be necessary for a siege, but we know that Cat doesn't actually want a siege, so what's the real goal?

Every time "water supply" is mentioned I start thinking about Still Waters. An undead plague would be too evil for Cat, but has anyone tried delivering other forms of sorcery via water supply? Or one of the Concocter's brews?

JRogue

I agree, I think it something to do with the Concocter. Cat specifically said she wanted to lose as few people as possible, so this might be that she is going to put everyone to sleep in some way. The Concocter puts something in the water supply that works under some specific condition. Put it in the water, wait 3 days, trigger the... whatever it is, and then just walk in having to only fight the things immune to these types of things. Devils will be a thing for sure, but with no one there to guide them it might be a lot easier.

Who knows tho, every time I think I have some scheme figured out, EE surprises me.

That Other Guy

Cat doesn't want to besiege Wolof any more than she wanted to besiege this outpost. She just needs a sharp enough knife at their throats that she can to the 'negotiation' stage quickly, just as she did here.

Once the bigwigs in Wolof recognise the threat that Cat will present to the city, they'll come parley, she'll get what she wants, then she and her merry team of ne'er-do-wells will be on their merry way.

Great to have more Practical Guide. Thanks, EE

'Ladi Williams

Yeah. What he said. He put it better than I did.

'Ladi Williams

I think taking Jinon is just to put the lord of Wolof on the back foot when they want to negotiate...he would think they are ready for a siege and serious business and so would be ready to part with more when they "rob" him off all they can. More like misdirection I think.

Cpt. Obvious

Thinking of what's been said about Wolof that probably isn't a good idea. I remember Akua talking about how the wards made the wall hard to breach and that even if they were to lay siege to the town they had food for probably at least six months and enough wells that water not being a problem. Add that any competent leader would recognize that the aqueduct feeding water into the town would be a tempting target for the hostile army, so scrying the troops at the well is probably done several times a day to make sure everything is OK. Get the wrong response and they plug up their end of the aqueduct.

Aduro9

Partial credit for following the Evil Overlord List.

2. My ventilation ducts will be too small to crawl through

Good work applying that to the latrines. Not so much forgetting that Catherine has goblins. Solid C- Effort.

Liliet

Hm.

> The Concocter didn't usually show to meetings like this, but the Barrow Sword did and seated himself by Hakram.

So did Hakram leave to debrief Masego in more detail or?...

'Ladi Williams

I saw that too and wanted to comment on it. I think it's a typo or EE forgot Hakram had been sent somewhere else.

Shveiran

I think Catherine and Hakram split to do different things before the military council, then both came to be a part of it.

Liliet

> We rose to follow the others after scratching a few notes on parchment with his bone hand, sending in a few phalanges after him to prepare the tent for the war council. Juniper, as was her habit, came in half an hour early to make sure everything was to her tastes.

The only period of time between them parting and the war council is while Juniper is there. Which is I guess half an hour?

Shveiran

> The only period of time between them parting and the war council is while Juniper is there. Which is I guess half an hour?

It's definitely unclear, but I think it's possible? Cat has to do something unspecified, Hakram needs to talk with Masego... it could be something short.

...Though I'm not sure why it was mentioned at all, come to think of it. Mhm.

Still, it's probably nothing.

Liliet

Well, I AM assuming it's not a hidden plot point, it's just unclear what was supposed to be happening in the end.

Frivolous

Still no word on Vivienne's Name or proof that she has or does not have a Name.

Disappointed, me.

peaksofblue

A friendly reminder what happened to Juniper, anyone? It evades me.

Loc

She had met Malicia. So she had the tendrils of Malicia's Speaking in her head, and was hit by that when Malicia suborned the Legions of Terror from Amadeus by activating those tendrils and marching them back to Praes to serve her rather than her upstart Black Knight. I think Juniper was able to stay out of that because she's not loyal to Praes any more, not really; she serves Queen Catherine of Callow, so instead of having her loyalties rewritten she was hit by headaches and mental attacks that resulted in fits and other unpleasantness.

– Thank Earl of Purple, who accidentally replied in the wrong thread.

Earl of Purple

Thank you for noticing, as I hadn't. I'll add now that Malicia can Speak non-verbally, and Akua mentions really early on that if an agent is in the same room as her, the Sahelians treated that agent as compromised.

Earl of Purple

She had met Malicia. So she had the tendrils of Malicia's Speaking in her head, and was hit by that when Malicia suborned the Legions of Terror from Amadeus by activating those tendrils and marching them back to Praes to serve her rather than her upstart Black Knight. I think Juniper was able to stay out of that because she's not loyal to Praes any more, not really; she serves Queen Catherine of Callow, so instead of having her loyalties rewritten she was hit by headaches and mental attacks that resulted in fits and other unpleasantness.

lenethren

First time I have seen time referred to as hours instead of bells.

Chapter 3: Wage

"I was privileged to receive audience with a shaman of the Red Shields clan, who after receiving gifts was willing to indulge a few of my questions. My attempts to understand the lay of her people's statecraft, however, were met with a simple laugh and the quote of a Kharsum proverb that translates as such: 'throw meat or be meat'."

– Extract from "Horrors and Wonders", famed travelogue of Anabas the Ashuran Jinon fell to the Army of Callow at the price of twelve dead and five wounded.

Three wounded and two dead were of ours. One of the former was, I'd been told, a legionary from the regulars cohort who'd tripped going uphill and broken his foot. He was now being mercilessly mocked by the rest of his tenth, who had tried to get him officially commended for 'heroic injuries sustained in the line of duty'. I was giving it serious thought – laugh aside, playing along with this sort of thing tended to be good for morale. Most the corpses and wounds had taken place when my goblins infiltrated the fortress, silencing witnesses and taking the gatehouse. That left me to handle the two hundred and forty-three members of the Jinon garrison that had surrendered, a number that included seven minor nobles sworn to Wolof.

One of them was a branch Sahelian, their head mage, and she'd been trying to barricade herself in a fortified room when Hierophant came and stomped out the notion by casually wresting her sorcery away from her. I'd left him to interrogate her and gone to supervise the movement of the prisoners instead. We'd made a gate into Twilight right outside the walls and we were herding the disarmed prisoners across by groups of twenty, into the tender waiting embrace of legionaries waiting on the other side. We'd be marching them straight into a warded prison pit that Juniper had ordered dug inside our camp, where the Jacks and the phalanges would begin interrogating them for news about the state of the city.

I was now leaning against stone on the same parapet Lady Semira had stood on when we'd talked, watching it unfold as I chatted with Captain Diara.

"- moved them to a freehold in the Green Stretch as soon as I could afford it," she told me, speaking of her parents. "My brother's still out east in one of the Bassa towns, I think, but we haven't talked in years."

"I hear it's good land down in the Stretch, so long as the levees don't break," I said.

"It is, but there are dangers. People were worried it was going to be trouble when you first took the throne, Your Majesty," Captain Diara admitted. "That's passed, of course. Now they know that even if comes to steel there won't be paladins knocking at the doors for 'tithes' and pointed questions about troop movements."

The Order of the White Hand were still considered heroes, back home, tragically destroyed by my father in the first stroke of the Conquest. The freeholders of the Green Stretch had been significantly less convinced of the heroism of said paladins, not without reason. Callow had been occupied by the Dread Empire for so long it was easy to forget that the Old Kingdom hadn't been saints. It'd not been worse than most nations out there, but it'd not been any better either.

"It's the Tower my dispute is with," I said. "It's the Tower I'll settle it with."

The captain slowly nodded, expression hard to read. Whatever she might have said was not to be, as Masego strode out of the stairway with his robes sweeping behind him. He looked in a fine mood, and I could smell the scent of power still on him. He was holding magic.

"Time for me to check on my sergeants," Captain Diara tactfully said. "It was an honour, Your Majesty."

"It was my honour to hear you harangue those poor bastards for half an hour," I replied with a smile. "See you around, captain."

She offered a salute to Hierophant as he passed, which he returned with an absent-minded nod before coming to stand at my side.

"Got anything good?" I asked.

"Several of the ciphers the Sahelians use when scrying," Masego said. "It will be of use when intercepting their communications."

"Cutting High Lord Sargon off from Malicia would be ideal," I admitted. "It'll be easier to force his hand that way."

Malicia had soulboxed him when she'd put him on the High Seat, which meant she could effectively torture him with impunity and at will, but that was the kind of tool she wouldn't use blindly. If he wasn't contradicting an explicit order from the Tower when he surrendered his granaries to us, the ruler of Wolof was a lot more likely to fold. There wasn't a lot I could threaten him that would be worse than what Malicia could do with half an hour and an incantation.

"It will do Sapan some good to study higher order mathematics," Hierophant mused. "I'll make her work on the ciphers with me."

"Surprised she doesn't know about those already," I said. "Ashurans are famous sailors and navigation's all about numbers and stars, way I hear it."

"She meant to be a healer, so what they taught her of mathematics at that academy in Ashur was insultingly limited," Masego said, sounding peeved. "Sabrathan sorcery encourages specialization, Catherine, as the knowledge overlap between its different disciplines is supposedly very limited."

I hummed in understanding. For all that Hierophant had always rather looked down on the sorcery the Thalassocracy of Ashur practiced, what I'd heard of it was rather impressive. They had finer healing mages than the Praesi and they could whip up winds and storms out of blue sky. Sabrathan magic did seem to have pretty stark limits on what could be done well with it, though, so I wasn't surprised Masego held it in such low esteem. He'd been raised to treat magic as something more than just a tool, a philosophical quest for the truth of Creation. There was little chance of him respecting people who, in his eyes, willingly chose to cripple themselves before even beginning that quest.

"Tell me how it pans out," I shrugged. "I'm curious how much she'll take to your teachings."

I was more curious if she was going to end up a long-term threat to people or places I cared about, to be honest, but Zeze enjoyed talking about his pupil and I enjoyed indulging him. While Masego cordially disliked teaching large groups, the way he had when I'd asked him to make my Legion and later Army cadres into mages capable of battlefield ritual magic, he seemed to be relishing teaching a single highly skilled pupil. It was the kind of teaching he was likely most familiar with, I'd eventually realized. Just like Warlock had done with him.

"I will," he assured me. "Though none of this is why I came. You earlier mentioned intending to scry Juniper for news of how her warring went. Shall we, before I must release the magic I wrested?"

I'd actually figured it would be one of our mages I relied on for that, but if Zeze was volunteering I wasn't going to complain. And if this marked yet another instance of him keeping someone's magic in his hands just a little longer than was strictly necessary, well, part of loving someone was knowing when you needed to avert your eye.

"Please do," I replied.

It didn't take long to get a hold of my marshal even though the night's action was far from over, as she'd been expecting me. After the fortress was invested one of our mages had sent word that things had gone well, but not gotten much in exchange: the offensive had still been happening. After a few moments Aisha's face appeared in the mirror-like circle of magic that Masego had drawn in the air, offering me a smile before disappearing and being replaced with the Hellhound's thicker features.

"Warlord," she greeted me.

"Marshal," I replied. "How did the attack go?"

"We hold Sinka," Juniper said. "The garrison in the villages began to retreat after skirmishing against our vanguard and we caught fewer than fifty of them. We didn't get any trouble out of the people themselves, the seneschal fled after leaving orders to surrender without violence."

Huh. That was unusually caring, by Praesi standards. Most Wasteland nobles would have sent their people into the grinder without a second thought, thinking a few of my soldiers killed a fair trade for bleeding the populace of a port they no longer held. High Lord Sargon's orders, or the small rebellion of a decent man in a bad position? Hard to know.

"Any moves from Wolof?"

"They tried a sortie," Juniper acknowledged. "Two thousand household troops, with mage support and about a hundred walin-falme for vanguard. They hit our screening force head on and withdrew when the Order flanked them. They sacrificed the devils to eat the charge and retreated into the city."

"That looks like a straightforward blunder," I frowned. "Only two thousand? It's a large chunk of their forces, but they have to know we'd eat that on the field. Especially when we have cavalry and they don't."

My marshal looked pleased, licking her fangs in approbation.

"It was a pin," Juniper said. "They were tying down our screening force while they hit the men I sent to take Sinka. They waited until after the surrender, when we'd begun to split the force into the smaller garrisons we'll be leaving."

My brow rose. That implied they'd managed a night ambush on open grounds while we fielded goblins.

"They had illusions good enough we couldn't see through them?" I asked.

"The attackers were in the river," Juniper grimaced. "Deep enough our first sweep with mages didn't catch them. They had boats hidden on the far side of the Wasaliti under illusions and some kind of half-fish devil in the-"

She turned a moment, leaning towards someone I only dimly heard speak before nodding thanks.

"Sahelian sends word the devils are called nikyana, and that Wolof usually keeps a few contracts but nowhere as many as we saw tonight," the tall orc growled. "At least seven hundred of the bastards popped out of the river on our flanks and they would have caught us entirely by surprise without the Silver Huntress giving alarm. They don't use weapons but they're quick and strong, we lost almost a full cohort before we realized what was happening."

I winced. Caught out of formation, my legionaries would have had a hard time handling devils. Like with heavy horse, you needed thick ranks and spellfire to handle a charge of those.

"And bleeding us wasn't even the point of the attack," Juniper revealed.

My brow rose.

"They infiltrated a mage cadre with escorts to try to grab Vivienne in the chaos," Juniper said. "The Squire and the Apprentice drove them off, but apparently it was a close thing. The moment the grab failed the entire attack was called off and they retreated into the river."

I let out a low whistle. That'd actually been a sharp play from Sargon, assuming it really was the young lord's plan. Vivienne was one of the few people in my army I couldn't afford not to bargain for, if she were taken prisoner. Should Sargon threaten to put her head on a pike unless I retreated, he would have me in a very tricky position.

"Total casualties?" I asked.

"Between Sinka and the plain, we lost three hundred and twelve," she said. "Cost them at least two hundred where Tanja held command on top of the forty and so we captured, so there's that, but they're keeping to standard Praesi tactics when it comes to soaking up casualties with devils."

Forty years ago, before the Reforms, orcs and goblins would have been right with the devils eating those Callowan blades, I thought. Bleeding so that their bettors wouldn't. Looking at the hard cast of my marshal's face, I suspected I wasn't the only one who'd thought that. I quickly went over the fall of Jinon for her and concluded with the prisoners now headed her way.

"Good news," Juniper said. "I have mages and the Huntress following the diabolists on the river. We'll try to hit them before they can retreat to Wolof."

"Take prisoners if you can," I said, "but our people come first."

I wanted diabolists, but I didn't need them that badly. A handful grabbed off the field weren't going to be enough to handle the Hellgates, I was going to need a genuine diplomatic concession to secure that many. Juniper nodded, offering me a crisp Legion salute before the spell died and the magic displaying her face dissipated. I rolled my shoulder, sighing. It was already a long night and it was still far from over. I turned to Masego.

"Assuming the prisoners are out, I'll need to help establish our own garrison here," I said. "Do you think you could check the wards for nasty surprises?"

The Concocter would be coming along later too, to see if my idea about how get into the city was feasible.

"I will," Hierophant said, burning eyes swivelling lazily in their sockets, "but I expect you'll have more pressing matters to attend to."

"Like?"

"Aunt Eudokia just walked through the gates," Masego said, "and she looks in a hurry."

—

Scribe looked both healthier than when I'd last seen her and deeply exhausted. It was the good kind of exhausted, though, the kind you got from putting all of yourself into something you loved. Her back was straight and though as always my attention slid right off her – save for the same detail, the perennially ink-stained hands – I got a sense of vitality from her that she'd lacked when she had first reached out to me in Hainaut. I had come to believe that, more than anything, Scribe thrived on being useful. The cause didn't matter much, it was about stretching her abilities to the limit. In a way it was like Ranger's thirst for worthy fights, though neither woman would thank me for the comparison.

"Queen Catherine," she greeted me, shortly bowing.

"Scribe," I replied. "Pleasure to have you back with us, though I expected it would be back at the camp."

"There has been a change of plans," she said. "The envoys heard there would be an assault on Jinon, and they insisted on speaking with you here."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"They want to see if I'm strong enough to beard the Sahelians in their own backyard," I said.

Which was fair enough. Nobody liked backing a losing horse. Besides, orcs respected strength above all and this bunch was more opportunistic than most.

"How long until they're here?" I asked.

"A quarter hour at most," Scribe said. "I requested of Archer that she slow their passage through the Ways, but there are limits."

"She'll do what she can," I muttered.

My mind was already racing ahead, putting the pieces in place. I would have preferred having Vivienne here for this, since any deals made would be inherited by her, but that'd be hard to arrange. This wouldn't end with a single conversation anyway.

"Indeed," Scribe said. "A stark improvement on her predecessor in every regard, Archer."

I eyed the villainess amusedly. She'd been less than fond of Ranger even before the Lady of the Lake had put an arrow an inch away from her heart.

"Thanks for the heads up," I said.

"There is more," Scribe said. "I received word from my agents in the northeast: the fortress of Chagoro has fallen."

I took me a moment to place that name in my mental map of Praes. It was one of the main fortresses north of the High Seat of Okoro, an important strategic position since it was close to the two easiest passes into the Northern Steppes. It was the keystone of Okoro's northern defences, and supposedly one of the thornier fortresses in the region.

"Who holds it?" I frowned. "It is one of the Clans?"

High Lord Jaheem Niri was one of Malicia's supporters and his domain has been largely spared the depredations that most of Praes had suffered, so this was something of a surprise. The Niri could still field one of the largest private fighting forces in the Empire, and they wouldn't skimp on their northern defences when there was trouble in the Steppes. A surprise attack by supporters of Sepulchral, maybe?

"No one holds it," Scribe evenly said. "It is full of corpses."

My thoughts ground to a halt. What?

"My agents confirmed that the killing was done by blade, over the span of less than an hour, and that the assailants took no casualties," she continued.

"That's absurd," I bit out. "How many soldiers were there in that fortress, Scribe?"

"A little over a thousand," she replied.

"It can't be the Dead King," I frowned, "he's bound by oath to attack neither Praes nor Callow. Who could-"

I closed my eyes, abandoning the train of thought. It was a dead end, there were too many monsters out there in the wilds that I knew little about. Capacity for destruction, for killing, was not that uncommon. It would instead be much more useful to figure out who gained from Chagoro falling. I did, since it made Okoro a lot more vulnerable to attacks by the Clans, but this hadn't been a scheme of mine. Sepulchral benefitted as well, arguably, since anything weakening a backer of Malicia's helped her cause. She shouldn't have assets capable of something this flashy, though. Could the Empress herself have done it? She certainly had the ruthlessness, but I wasn't seeing a gain for her to make. Even of Jaheem Niri had been about to turn on her and she wanted him kept busy, there were better ways.

And this timing, I thought, it was too good.

I wanted to bring the Clans into the war, specifically for them to fall on the back of Malicia's northern allies, and the High Lord of Okoro had been a major obstacle in that regard. With a major gap in his defences, however, there were now chances that orc clans would go raiding even if it had nothing to do with me whatsoever. And it was coming at a precisely the right time, while I was mauling Wolof with the Army of Callow and Malica's armies were still making their way up from down south. Okoro stood alone and with its pants down. That wasn't a coincidence, it was too precise for that, and-

"Black," I murmured. "Black did this."

"Ranger is powerful, but not so powerful as that," Scribe objected.

He shouldn't have the resources to pull off something like this, that much was true. It was pretty much just him and the Lady of the Lake out there, wasn't it? He'd not even picked up that nice army of deserters waiting for him in the Green Stretch – though I had my doubts about that, it seemed a little too convenient – and taken them in hand. Archer and Akua had believed, I recalled from the last time we'd discussed the matter in council, that he couldn't take up such a position. It would be a death trap to be visible, since Ranger was being hunted by the Emerald Swords. My thoughts stalled for a moment after that, as the realization sunk in, because surely he hadn't.

It was the kind of reckless play I would have made, nothing like the calculating and cold-blooded man who'd taught me. And yet.

"Eudokia," I quietly said. "Your agents, they said it was done with blades. Did they get a read on the number of assailants?"

"No," Scribe admitted. "All they could give me was that it looked like halfway through the fight soldiers began fleeing and they were run down to the last."

And that wasn't much, wasn't a confirmation, but it fit.

"Fuck me," I said. "He used Ranger as bait, Scribe. The Emerald Swords did this. He drew them there to clear out the fortress."

She blinked in surprise, then after a long moment sighed. Tellingly, she did not disagree. Silly me, how could I not have expected my father would find a way to turn his sole companion being hunted by ten of the most dangerous people on Calernia into an advantage. I'd come by my bastardry honestly, I shouldn't have forgot. And against my better judgement, I found my lips twitching. Welcome to the war, Black. Finally making your move, are you?

"So he wants the Clans going on the offensive too," I mused. "Interesting."

What exactly my father wanted and how he intended to achieve remained unclear to me, and likely would for some time. If he'd wanted to speak with me, he would have by now. I cast a look at Scribe, who had remained silent as I thought.

"If you offered your services again," I said, "I'm not sure he would refuse you a second time."

I was under no illusions that our months of collaboration in any way trumped decades of close friendship. The Calamities had been tightly bound, before they began dropping dead.

"You worry of my loyalties," Scribe said.

"I don't," I said. "I know exactly where they lie. And it's not empty words when I say that there would be no rancour, should you-"

"I am not a good or pleasant woman, Catherine Foundling," Eudokia the Scribe said and for a heartbeat I saw brown eyes flashing with anger, set in a tanned and freckled face. "I do not pretend otherwise. I have little use for the morals you espouse or the causes you champion, save when they intersect with my own diversions."

"But," I said.

"But I am a woman of my word," Scribe said. "I believe in contracts and the worth of promises. Even should I decide to leave your side – and if I do it will not be like this, like some beaten dog crawling back to her master's feet – even then, I would no more reveal secrets learned in your service than I have revealed you those I learned in his."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. How much of that had been truth and how much of it a lie? It was the proportions that made the difference between poison and medicine.

I was going to be betrayed at least once before the month was out, but would Scribe make the second?

"I believe you," I lied, and we prepared for our guests.

—

Sometimes diplomacy was about making a point.

That was why, when five orcs passed through the gates of Jinon following Indrani, they stopped and stared at the sight awaiting them for a beat. It was not the throne that caught their eye, though shaping it out of roiling Night had lent it a certain imperious look. It wasn't the deadwood staff across my knees either, or crow-shaped shadows perched above my shoulders. It was the piles of arms and armour that filled the courtyard, glittering and ornate Praesi armaments spread around like a carpet of steel. Hundreds of swords and shields, of cuirasses and helmets, and not a corpse anywhere around to be seen. Only steel and silence, with the moon high above and dark walls around us.

That was my point: I took this fortress, and I did not even bleed for it.

Archer was hiding a smile as she walked to us through the path. I had a small honour guard around me, a simple line of regulars, and though Hierophant was somewhere above on a parapet it was Scribe who stood behind me on my left. There were five seats awaiting, for the five orcs that the clans I'd reached out to had sent. Scribe whispered the names into my ear even as they approached, their body language wary. Asny of the Graven Bone Clan, taller than even Hakram and sister to her clan's chief. Valborg of the Stag-Crowned Clan, stooped but strong and eldest raid leader of the Stag-Crowned. Skarod Longaxe, the small but nimble husband to the chieftain of the Blackspear Clan. The twins Sigvin and Sigvun of the Split Tree Clan were the last, rumoured to both be shamans and shapeshifters.

It was the clan I needed on my side the least that'd sent two envoys, ironically enough. The Blackspears, the Graven Bone and the Stag-Crowned were the three largest southern clans, but that wasn't actually why I'd reached out to them. I had decent relations with the Red Shields and the Howling Wolves – Juniper and Hakram's clans – and they were among the great orc powers too. No, those three were here because Malicia had raised them over other orcs by ennobling their chiefs as Lords of the Steppe and empowering them to collect tribute on behalf of the Tower. The Split Tree twins, on the other hand, were here for slightly more complicated reasons.

Their clan was respected and well-connected, boasting a number of genuine spellcaster shamans, and it'd made the Split Tree Clan an important part of the alliance that'd formed around the Lords of the Steppes. Those three clans had... mixed reputations. The Split Tree being part of the alliance lent it respect it badly needed, considering when the Howling Wolves – currently the largest and most well-respected of the clans – were at the head of the alliance opposing the Lords of the Steppe. For me that meant having them on board was much to be preferred, if a bargain was to happen, but they weren't strictly required. Archer left their side after offering me a grin, coming to stand at my right. As the orcs approached a legionary came forward with a plate holding a large cut of salted pork and a mug of beer.

"I offer you meat and drink from my table," I spoke in Kharsum.

They each took a bite and a sip – I noted that the Blackspear envoy, Skarod Longaxe, went first – and only then did the wariness leave them. I'd just formally given them my hospitality, and though the custom was not as ironclad with orcs as it was with Taghreb it wasn't something to lightly cross.

"Good, we're done with the shite then," Asny of the Graven Bones grunted, spitting to the side. "Hail, Black Queen."

"Hail, Asny of the Graven Bones," I replied, faintly amused. "And to you all."

It got growls in answer, rough acknowledgement.

"You wanted to have talks, Black Queen," Skarod Longaxe said. "Talk, then. You're not the only one with a war on."

"That one's her war too, unless she's stopped trading weapons to our enemies," Valborg of the Stag-Crowned peevishly said.

I hadn't. Hakram's revision of the proposal that'd troubled me so much had proved viable in arming the clans we wanted armed in the Steppes. We'd taken to buying dwarven weapons through Mercantis, which while relatively low-quality were cheap and came in large crates. We traded them to friendly clans in the north for amber, furs and raw iron ore – which we then traded back to Mercantis at a mark up, making a small but tidy profit. We could sustain that trade route for years, considering Callow had nowhere enough trading barges to flood either market to the extent that prices would lower. The kind of diplomatic flourishes I'd gotten used to trotting out in Procer would be useless here, so instead I leaned into my natural instinct.

"You hitched your chariot to a dying horse," I bluntly told them. "It's time to cut loose before it drags you down with it."

Asny barked out a laugh.

"You've got guts, Queen, I'll give you that," she said. "But it's a little soon to make that claim, yeah? Tower's still standing."

"There are many who have fought Dread Empress Malicia, over the years," Sigvin of the Split Tree said, voice soft for all that she was built like barn door. "Some even had the better of her, for a time. None still remain."

I smiled at them, all teeth and malice.

"If my armies are at the gates of Ater, what use do I have for any of you?" I said. "When the Tower falls – and it will – what reason do I have to care about your enemies butchering every last one of you? If you're of no use to me, you're meat. Now is when you earn your worth."

Skarod Longaxe, envoy for the Blackspears, spat to the side on some soldier's shield.

"So you want us to kneel to your little favourites," he said. "Which will you crown, Black Queen, the Howling Wolves or the Red Shields?"

He bared his teeth, contemptuous.

"Will you make one of your servants chief first, just to tie it up neat?" he mocked. "Your own little puppet king in the Steppes, ready to do your bidding."

"Fuck that," Asny of the Graven Bones growled. "We're too many corpses deep in this feud to roll over for the Wolves."

"Little has been offered," Sigvun of the Split Tree Clan mildly said. "Much has been demanded."

I drummed fingers against the arm of my throne.

"Did I ever speak of surrendering to anyone?" I asked, irritated. "The next person to put words in my mouth will be made to swallow them."

"We're under hospitality," Skarod Longaxe harshly said.

"Hospitality keeps you your life, Longaxe, not your teeth," I replied.

Asny and Valborg laughed, though the twins looked unamused.

"Are these talks not meant to broke peace between us and the Howling Wolves, then?" Sigvin of the Split Tree asked.

"I'm here to broker a war," I said. "If you want to make peace with the Wolves, make peace with the Wolves. It's the business of the Clans, not Callow."

I stared them down from my throne, the crows stirring at my shoulders. The attention of the Sisters was not in the shards, leaving them as little more than creatures of shadow, but they still made an intimidating sight.

"What I want to know," I said, "is why you're fighting other orcs for snow and grass when you could be biting deep in the riches of Okoro instead."

"We didn't choose to feud," Skarod Longaxe snorted. "The Wolves did."

Bullshit. The Blackspears had wasted no time in using the powers Malicia granted them to try to extort all their neighbouring clans, they'd known it would come to war. They'd just figured they were going to win it.

"Okoro's belly is well-guarded," Sigvun of the Split Tree pointed out. "Much of its armies have remained north, its walls are tall and its devils many."

"We could take them," Asny of the Graven Bones scoffed. "If we didn't have to keep half our warriors home to fight off raids, we could smash through Okoro."

"The only thing you'd smash in Okoro is your skull on Chagoro's walls, pup," Valborg of the Stag-Crowned dismissed. "That fortress has broken more warbands than you've had lays."

"Chagoro," I calmly said, "has fallen."

Five pairs of eyes went to me, stillness hanging in the air like haze.

"There is nothing left between those walls save corpses," I said. "Do I now have your attention?"

"You lie," Skarod Longaxe accused.

I glanced at Scribe, who took a single step forward.

"It is the truth," she said. "My agents have confirmed it."

That took the wind out of Longaxe's sails. The Calamities weren't necessarily loved by orcs, but they were respected. Scribe putting her weight behind this wasn't something they'd dismiss. Hells, it was the reason I'd sent her with Archer into the Steppes in the first place. Indrani wasn't known up there, but the Calamities? That name still turned heads, even with most of them in the ground. It'd made them take me seriously enough to send envoys in the first place.

"That changes things," Valborg of the Stag-Crowned admitted, clicking her fangs in hesitation. "Without Chagoro in the way, we could make it past the fortress-lands."

"We can't mount a raid worth a goat's spit with the Wolves up our asses," Asny of the Graven Bones said.

"Okoro's wealth isn't worth kneeling to our enemies," Skarod Longaxe said, but his tone was more careful now.

Less hostile, I decided. He still didn't think much of me or my offer, but the thought of raiding Okoro's holdings appealed. As I'd thought it might.

"Offer truce," I said. "If you do, I will back you under threat of ending sale of arms."

"Truce isn't peace, but it won't be easy to swallow," Asny growled.

"Fight for a thousand years, for all I care," I snorted. "But do it rich. Do it with great herds of cattle, with granaries of grains and the wealth of a hundred tributes. Do it wielding enchanted blades. You think you're the only ones who want to sink their teeth there? How many warriors from the Shields and the Wolves do you think would rather raid south than fight you?"

That was why I was sitting with these five instead of clans I could more easily have made allies of, in the end. I could back those friendly clans all I wanted, but it wouldn't cost Malicia anything. What did she care that there was a civil war in the Steppes, so long as it didn't spill over anywhere that mattered to her? It wouldn't conclude quickly enough to be a threat. I actually suspected she'd meant her raising of the Lords of the Steppes to trigger that very civil war, since if the orcs were fighting each other they weren't making trouble for her. She'd picked clans with bad reputations to raise, too, and that didn't look like a coincidence to me. They were the same clans that were almost guaranteed to have gone raiding at her unprotected back, were they not busy defending their noble titles.

If I turned these, though, not only would the betrayal be a public slap in her face but close to the full might of the Clans would come into play in the greater Praesi civil war.

"And if this truce was sought by your alliance," Sigvun of the Split Tree said, "you would support it?"

"I'll even send an envoy at the talks," I smiled, hiding my triumph.

I said it like it was a concession. Like it wasn't what I'd been after from the start. Like the moment the rest of them began to agree, as they hesitantly did, I'd not gotten exactly what I wanted: an army that, though it didn't know it yet, was going to march on Keter with the rest of us.

Now I just needed to figure out why my father had wanted this too, and if the two of us were at war too.

ruduen

Do the thing at topwebfiction!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Is this our first view of non-army orcs? I imagine things will be more straightforward with them than with some of the more politically-minded places around, but I also suspect there's going to be another few rounds of Foundling Diplomacy before everything's settled enough to make for reliable assistance.

Miley

Speaking of Foundling diplomacy, we've seen her use fire, water, and [steel, wood and/or heart], but what about the other 2 classical elements?

Shveiran

You refer, of course, to the classic element of wine.

Black Spiral Dancer

May I point out that Steel and Wood are as different as fire and water. Also, Wood and Heart can be associated, Steel can't.

If we're looking at the 5 classical elements in eastern occultism, then if she has used Fire, Water, Steel and Wood, then that only leaves Earth. Wind isn't an element in their scheme. While we use the 4 directions, 4 elements, they use the pentagram (which, by the way, is much more complex – no wonder, they had millennia to wise it up through the ages in China).

Anomandris

The last line really raises an interesting question – similar armies, who would win? Black's tactics or Cat's chaos??

Also, I don't know why she thinks he's against her – isn't the castle falling perfectly in her interests? And the last they interacted, they weren't at bad terms (unlike the seperation before, you know, the one with the stabby stabby....)

Liliet

She doesn't THINK it's against her, she just CANNOT RULE IT OUT. Because he didn't come to personally speak with her, but did something behind her back that intersects with her plans. Not the first time he's helped her like this, but you can't be too careful.

Opposing Black has been Catherine's personal nightmare since Book 2! No matter how unlikely it's just too scary/upsetting a possibility for her to not consider.

Cat has a very particular brand of trust issues: she gathers her wits and confidence enough to make bold gambles, then immediately loses belief they'll work out. See Everdark, where she laid down her life to make an offer to the sisters and then was deeply and earnestly surprised when they took it; and see here, where she took Scribe in with a dismissal of any possibility of fighting Black because it was honestly statistically negligible and the Woe agreed with that analysis.

But now that she's not making wide sweeping gestures of trust she's back to the fear :3

Zach

Cat doesn't really do the chaos thing as much now; that was more the trademark of her younger self. She's quite the schemer now, even though she's not the elaborate planner Black is.

Liliet

It's the same way she's now surprised at Black doing a chaotic thing: the more assets you yourself have, the more chaos would damage THEM in a way you can't control. When Catherine was alone against the world with, like, two thousand people behind her (not even a spot on the map), she thrived in chaos, but now that most things around are HERS and she would like to keep them intact, she's going with deep planning, scheming and tight control.

Black's the same way: when he was operating on his own territory, with everything around him being assets he wanted to preserve for one reason or another, he went with tightly controlled schemes and cold plans. But when it's basically just him and Ranger, he descends into WHIRLING CHAOS because it'll definitely do more damage to opposition than himself, in absolute terms.

dadycool

I'm picturing Black looking around, counting his assets, realizing that the entire list in his mind is various facets and aspects of himself and Ranger, remembering what Cat was like when she was in "destroy everything around me" mode, and going "Fuck it."

Liliet

It was onscreen and it was even greater.

> Amadeus no longer had his armies, not even his personal guard – he had left them in Catherine's hands, requesting she safeguard them through the strife to come.

>

> Amadeus no longer had spies, or wealth or even the power of a Name. He had sent away Scribe, failed Captain and lost Warlock. Assassin was gone, if not from Creation then at least from his service.

>

> Alaya would see him kneeling, or forever gone from her sight.

>

> Tabula rasa, a blank slate. After so many decades, the thought of it should have angered him. Should have brought in him despair and bitterness, for all he had built went up in smoke. Instead he felt relieved. Like a weight had been lifted from his shoulder. It was just him, now. Him and a sword and a plan against all the world. He looked up at the starry sky and laughed.

That Other Guy

Cat can't be too careful when dealing with Black. Yes, he's has a relatively soft spot for her, but he is also quite the cunning pragmatist. If a situation comes up where Cat needed to be knifed for his overall plan to succeed, I think he'd rely on her aversion to dying more than once a chapter and let her cop it. He wouldn't be keen on her taking the hit, but when his goals are at stake he's pretty good at setting aside excess sentimentality.

Besides, this is Praes. It's not that everyone is out to get you, it's just that you're only paranoid if you're wrong.

Liliet

On one hand, every single objective factor in the situation points to Cat being not only beneficial but utterly necessary to Amadeus's plans.

On the other hand, back at Second Liesse, every single objective factor in the situation pointed to Cat not being about to become a Black Knight, Amadeus alive being one of the most valuable assets she has, and killing him being quite possibly the MOST braindead thing she could do, strategically.

An actor who always makes the perfect play is predictable. An actor who... well, Amadeus. Not.

jamesc9

"An actor who always makes the perfect play is predictable. An actor who... well, Amadeus. Not."
"

In the same way that Cat said that Juniper was predictable, back in the War College.

Liliet

That's exactly what I was thinking about, yes!

naturalnuke

Thanks for the chapter! And knew it had to be the Emerald Swords somehow

Miley

Calling it now, Cat is going to take on several of them at once to save his ass, after whittling down their number a bit first.

dadycoool

Black: "Hmm, what should I give my little girl for a 'Welcome Home' present? Oh, I know! A gaping hole in her enemy's defenses! That'll cheer her up!"

Cat, rubbing her chin: "That bastard's up to something."

Cat, later to the envoys, getting ready to use her daddy's gift: "Look at how amazing I am. Bask in my glory. Not only am I so amazing, I speak your language, on multiple levels. I'm also four parallel universes ahead of you and my goals are beyond your understanding. There is no move you can make that will not benefit me in some way and I've already made certain that the move you Will make will be the one most beneficial to me."

Blazer5402

How sweet of Black. Dude just wants to help out his kid, and if he has to use his girlfriend as bait for a bunch of racist elves, so be it.

Liliet

Well, Black usually uses himself as bait. He finally decided to bring Ranger in on the hobby!

Raved Thrad

Ranger was probably pouting all the while. "What do you mean I can't kill even just one?!?"

Liliet

Counterpoint: Ranger was probably hysterically laughing the whole while.

Raved Thrad

"Did that elf actually manage to shove that guy's head up his ass? While he was still alive? Dammit, I have to Learn that!"

Sinead

Current crack theory: the climax of this arc will be a repeat of Malicia, Amadeus, and Cat high stake discussions like at Second Liesse. However this time, Cat makes the deciding move that manifests her Name and overshadows the others in contrast to the last meeting where she was just a pawn.

dadycoool

I wonder if she'll Command them somehow, cementing her role as a ruler of Named. Not only would that be badass, her doing the same to GP and WK by accident makes that even more likely.

Liliet

Bonus points if it's an exasperated "Shut up both of you!" again

dadycoool

Just casually, offhandedly silences the two most powerful, influential individuals in the East. She probably wouldn't notice it until seeing the looks on their faces, just like last time.

Liliet

YEP

Liliet

Malicia is stunned. Amadeus is beaming with joy and pride, mutely.

shikkarasu

I want to see him, having lost some of his composure along with his Name, excitedly try to mime "See that? I taught her that. That's my girl."

Liliet

Yes.

Sinead

This made me realise that Amadeus and Hye are really cases of 'opposite attract', aren't they? Amadeus is (within certain limits) good at saying "that individual has surpassed anything I can personally do.". It's probably why he's so good at using others to get things done that he cannot do. The reason the Conquest work is that he built up Praes to win the fight, then intertwined Callow with it so it wouldn't break. Unfortunately, the last gasp of the Old Tyrants broke those initial ties, though the Armies of Callow prove that those bonds are a lot more tenacious than what may previously have been thought. In any case, I would love it if there is such a Speaking scene for Amadeus to be completely against every other instance of Speaking and rejoice in it. Especially if Cat's order is 'Stop talking.'" and he _laughs_ in absolute joy.

...And then there is Hye...

Liliet

Yeah, Hye and Amadeus are VERY opposites attract. They're complementary in IMHO a very unhealthy way, though the way I read their relationship as strongly toxic is not the point here (tl;dr Amadeus cannot quite conceptualize the idea of "being taken advantage of" because he's already dedicating his entire life to other people, while Hye takes advantage of everything and everyone around her that she physically can not even reflexively but more like slime adhering to surfaces).

dadycool

So, we've got a Villain with a Self-Sacrificing Hero Complex paired with a woman who will sacrifice anything and anyone to benefit herself. This actually sounds a lot like a Sadist and Masochist getting in a relationship. Sure they're both very happy with the situation and they complement each other very well, but no one would ever call that healthy.

Liliet

I mean, BDSM relationships can be very happy and healthy.

Assuming the "top" isn't personally Hye Su.

(Also the BDSM part is pretty blatantly hinted at as what's actually happening, in canon.

> There was a lot to parse there, aside from a few revelations I could have done without – namely that watching Black turn into the Carrion Lord had got Ranger going and that she probably saw taking out knives as foreplay.

> "Mercy, Lady Ranger," he implored drily. "Spare my already aching bones. Anyhow, if you damage me too much you'll have no more use of me." [...]

"That'd be unfortunate," the dark-eyed woman admitted shamelessly. "I've finally gotten you trained up to my tastes."

...Yeah. I'm not one to begrudge people their kinks but Hye does not have the, uh... basic decency? it takes to have this kind of thing not be...)

Liliet

tl;dr don't insult healthy kink play by equating it with... the same scenario in real life lmao.

dadycoool

Right, right, you're right. I guess I internalized the kink-shaming that everyone loves to do to S&M and used Hye as an example, nevermind that she's an outlier and that any relationship at all is based on mutual care, including every single kink. In a healthy relationship, both members care for each other and want the other to be happy. If the couple gets pleasure out of one inflicting pain on the other, then as long as they both respect each other and their boundaries, it's fine.

It's just that we have here a really, REALLY bad example of a healthy relationship because they both take it to an unhealthy level. Malice! I just realized what I was searching for! It's not that she's sadistic, it's that she's maliciously sadistic. I honestly feel so much better with that realization.

shikkarasu

Not to cast stones, but genuinely curious, what makes you think Hye is taking advantage of Black? The whole relationship seemed like her following his lead until she thought it would become boring. Yes, she walked out as soon as the final battle was won, but Black always knew she would and didn't even hesitate to cross that line. They spent near 20 years together, but when their lives became incompatible they parted ways. 25 years later when circumstances changed? They got back together. Ranger not being the kind of person who can take tedium and Black not being the kind of person who can leave a project half finished, neither resenting the other for their choices.

Again, I may be missing some subtext, and I will definitely add it to my reread notes to look for clues.

Liliet

Ok so let's start from the part where they met when he was barely out of his teens, she became his mentor (in swordplay) and also was attracted to him from the start (Regard ends with her seeing him for the first time), which several years later resulted in him trusting her completely and entirely. At which point she “trained him up to her tastes” (quote by her).

There’s Wekesa’s analysis of the relationship,

> It was the worst argument they’d ever had and for that Wekesa blamed Hye, who’d left before the Conquest even ended, and managed to both cut Amadeus to the bone and leave him twice in love as before with the same sentence when she walked away. The wound had never entirely healed, and Warlock had ended up paying the price in a deadbeat Ranger’s stead. Typical of her, really. She never stuck around for the parts that weren’t thrilling, the sometimes tedious spadework of building and maintaining relationships. Tikoloshe had noted it was almost mythically hypocritical of him to blame someone for having bonds only on their own terms, but his husband was wrong. He’d put in the work, afterwards, to clean up the mess between himself and his oldest friend in the world. Hye, on the other hand, simply made do with visitations every few years that Amadeus came back from split halfway between longing and chagrin. Wekesa’s long-standing reservations about that arrangement had been the tide that carried him closer to Alaya, as it happened.

There’s the fact that Amadeus, when asked what he likes about Ranger, says “she doesn’t need me”. Always a great sign of a healthy non-toxic relationship, right?

There’s the point in Book 3 where Hye meets Catherine.

> “I dislike ignoring my impulses,” Ranger said casually. “So do not suggest that again. He would be angry, if I killed you, but we’ve been angry before. It passes.”

There’s Scribe’s analyses that Amadeus always forgives people he loves for everything, which goes really well with the above.

> “He would have forgiven her, Catherine Foundling,” Scribe said. “Without ever using the word forgive, but that would be the truth of it nonetheless. No matter what any of us said, he’d make peace again.”

>

> “Look, I’m not going to argue he doesn’t get sentimental on occasion," I said. "To be blunt, there's a reason I'm still breathing. But he's still Black. There's lines, and if he has to choose between the Praes he wants and Malicia-"

>

> "He'll try for both," Scribe said. "Offer her to be his Chancellor, another leap of faith: trusting that she would be one of the few who never schemed the death of their tyrant."

>

> "That would not be acceptable," I sharply said. "If she takes a ship across the Tyrian Sea I won't pursue, but she doesn't get to stay anywhere near the reins of power. Not after all the shit she's pulled. He knows that."

>

> "It won't matter. He always forgives," Scribe said, and under the calm tone that were and old and cold anger. "Malicia. Ranger. Even Wekesa, who spurned one of the few ways the Empire could be corrected without steel in hand out of sheer petty apathy. He always forgives them and takes up the work instead. It will kill him, Catherine. It has been killing him for years, but this once he might as well slit his own throat. I will not have it."

We have Amadeus's overall amazing personality, where he considers himself completely expendable and also believes love is never a weakness and calls Ranger the love of his life.

We have what we know about Hye, who "dislikes ignoring her impulses" and thinks watching children in her care beat each other bloody for status and her approval is amusing and great.

This relationship is kisses fingers the wooooooorst

shikkarasu

Fair points all 'round. I guess I fell into the same trap as Maddie and read those bits generously. Put together it does not paint a very good picture of Hye at all.

Konstantin von Karstein

Did Hanno get affected too?

dadycool

Pretty sure. Can't remember what chapter it was, otherwise I'd go verify.

Liliet

Well, he already wasn't talking, I think. Let me check.b

> "Shut up," I Spoke.

>

> With a snap their mouths closed, like puppets whose strings had been pulled. I felt the gazes of both heroes in the tent move to me in surprise, which surprised me in turn. The Pilgrim, at least, should have known I could now Speak again. I had disciplined the Silver Huntress using the talent. Yet after a glance their way, I saw that it was not the Speaking itself that'd startled. His mouth had wavered. Just for a heartbeat, I figured, but for the barest of moments my words had had an effect on the Grey Pilgrim. It was me who was astonished, as I'd not tried to exert my will against him in the slightest. The rules behind Speaking were opaque even to me, but usually it only worked on people weaker than you. Even then it wasn't a guarantee, some sort of claim to authority over them tended to make it easier. And I'm not much stronger than the Grey Pilgrim, I thought, if I am at all.

>

> What that implied..

>

> I withdrew any strand of will lingering against the four men at the table, freeing them of struggle. The Prince of Hannover looked wary, but Prince Arsene was outright gasping. He rasped out a breath.

So Hanno is also surprised, but Cat only saw it working on the Pilgrim.

That said, we also have "any strand of will lingering against the four men at the table".

> The chatter died when I hobbled into the pavilion. I leaned on my staff, step after step, and felt the eyes of all assembled fall on me. I saw the Iron Prince first, at the end of the long table: the white-haired general had risen to his feet and he offered a short bow, to which I returned a nod. The Heavens had their men as well, a tired-looking Hanno of Arwad on his feet besides Tariq. Their greetings were silent and I returned them just as quietly. The last man at the table seemed like he'd aged a decade since I'd last seen him, as if some capricious god had kicked the vigour out of his bones, but the dark hair and elaborate moustache of Prince Arsene of Bayeux could not be mistaken. He did not seem pleased to be here, I decided, as was only fitting.

...four is including Hanno.

Liliet

She wasn't a pawn, exactly. She was just the kid ignored while mama and papa are fighting.

Sinead

That's fair. I was thinking of Malicia depending of Cat to shut Akua down as comparable to Amadeus' manipulation of Cat.

They planned around her without including her.

If we draw direct parallels, I wonder if what we'll see is Cat also hearing The Girl who Climbed the Tower and instead of seizing Dread Empress, she censures the Name and breaks the throne.

She may be Callowan, but she is also Amadeus' heir. And Amadeus was described as "the beating heart of a new Praes".

Also, it may be an interesting parallel to the Pilgrim's meteor shower, as Cat breaks a Name at the heart of governance of a nation and allows for something new to grow. Especially since she seems to be aiming at raising the autonomy of the various nations within Praes (to stab at Malicia, but it still has other consequences)

Liliet

Well, Malicia's original plan was depending on Amadeus to shut down Akua, Cat was just added as a last minute factor as a proxy for him. So it wasn't against Cat specifically, she was manipulating him just as much.

Liliet

So I take it one betrayal is Akua. What the fuck is up with the phrasing on that?

SpeckofStardust

She (being cat) is in a position where she narratively has to get backstabbed at least once during her opening moves. Mostly because that's Malicia standard playbook, and she's too important to not get some nonsense set off.

Yunamed

I doubt Akua would betray her, but even if she did, I want to believe that it won't have serious consequences to Cat's plan or life.

Liliet

I'm figuring a Loki / Severus Snape kind of thing. Cat has mentioned her being bait before.

agumentic

I mentioned before that I expect some kind of betrayal-shaped move from Akua before all is said and done, It makes sense for her narrative path. If I had to guess, Akua will first "betray" Cat according to the latter's plan, but then will have an opportunity for a genuine betrayal and even go through with it for a bit, before deciding to finally go Cat's way for sure. I won't mind being surprised, though.

Liliet

I can see Akua taking very betrayal-looking steps and I can imagine her contemplating betrayal as a fun mental exercise but I cannot imagine her seriously intending it after Lost&Found.

agumentic

I think it is one thing to sacrifice yourself on doom's approach, but it is another to go against the teachings of your blood when they are laid so clearly and enticingly before you. No, I think that even after Hainaut Akua will have to struggle through one last temptation.

Liliet

Maybe! We'll see.

Matthew

Also, we have Black back in the game. That's all that matters.

Burlyraven

The Praesi surrendering so quickly is a trap. With Wolof's magical archives, there has to be some sort of time delay sacrificial great summon, and the POWs are a primed grenade.

Liliet

We know Sargon is currently focused on increasing his population, we know he started out with negotiating on Malicia's behalf because she wants peace, we know Praesi have a historical rule to submit to the strongest.

Burlyraven

All the more reason it's a trap, going by story beats.

jworks17

What did Cat mean when she said she knew she'd be betrayed once within a month? I can't think of anything

Liliet

Cat has mentioned before that Akua is bait.

hoser2

Possible betrayals list (feel free to add):

1. Procer, but just falling doesn't seem like what you would call a betrayal
2. The Dominion (or whatever you call where the Pilgrim came from).
3. The Arsenal (or whoever leads it)
4. Hellhound
5. Sve Noc? Possibly by offering to make Akua the new First Under the Night.
6. Dwarves making peace with Keter
7. Callow

The Crows are interesting, A parting seems messy, but they seem like they are in a desperate situation.

hoser2

8. Abigail
9. Hanno
10. The Mirror Knight
11. Squire, Apprentice and ?
12. Akua is obvious, but if she is bait, then whoever takes the bait might be the more significant betrayer (if an ally).

I don't count Scribe, because the quote refers to her as another betrayal. I don't count Amadeus because he doesn't really seem like an ally even if there is a shared purpose.

shikkarasu

1. Cordelia is getting ready to pull the trigger on the Angel Weapon. Whatever it does, Cat has expressly told her it is not worth it.
2. The Dominion was wrangled over the course of several books and Pilgrim has died for her cause twice. They have too much honour to turn coat before Keter is defeated.
3. Masego. Masego leads the Arsenal. Next question, please.
4. Malicia's control over Juniper was removed, and Juniper gains nothing by backstabbing Cat.
5. I can see this. Cat has had the Night for a while, and we know that her Holy Texts are considered heresy in the future, based on one of the opening quotes.

6. The Dwarves have been shown to want little more than to put the Dead King in a box.
7. Callow still loves Cat as their liberator, and who exactly is going to spearhead her removal? The entire chain of command is in Cat's inner circle.
8. If Abigail tries anything I will eat my hat. It is a large hat and has a lot of faux fur, so I do not make this statement lightly.
9. Hanno has the motive and power. I'll grant that.
10. The Mirror Knight already tried and is recently unmanaged. He's a wildcard.
11. The heavens have all but written "Kill the Queen" in 40ft flaming letters in Squire's Name dreams. I want to trust him, but simply can't.
12. Well put. Akua will be fun to watch, but relatively little paranoia is needed.

Juff

Typo Thread:

were of ours > were ours (or maybe three of the wounded and two of the dead) if comes to > if it comes to
He was holding magic (extra space) alarm They (missing fullstop) about how get > about how to get Even of Jaheem > Even if Jaheem at a precisely > at precisely intended to achieve > intended to achieve it built like barn > built like a barn badreputations > bad reputations

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

"He was holding magic."

>Double space. "He was"

Actually, going back and looking for double space, found one at the end of "but they still made an intimidating sight. " before the line break. Interesting.

"They want to see if I'm strong enough to beard the Sahelians in their own backyard," I said.

>Beard? Maybe beat? Herd? I'm not sure beard is the correct term here. Unless it's vague unused slang I've never heard of, or a european thing.

I try not to comment on word choice or editorial style, only when it is super obvious that the word used is not the correct or intended one, like typos to words that are close enough to escape a spell check. But this? I'm baffled, but pretty sure she's not going to beard them.

"Even of Jaheem Niri had been about to turn on her "

>"Even if"

"Are these talks not meant to broke peace between us and the Howling Wolves, then?"

>"Broker peace" or "break peace" don't think it's "broke," in the next line Cat even says broker.

"picked clans with badreputations to raise"

>Do i even need to point it out? I best anyway. "Bad reputations"

Sinead

To beard is valid phrasing.

""to beard" someone, especially in their "lair" or "den," means to confront them as directly as possible, and, of course, to win the fight."

Source: <http://www.word-detective.com/2010/07/beard-to/#:~:text=%E2%80%9Cto%20beard%E2%80%9D%20meaning%20%E2%80%9Cto,with%20no>

Darkening

The classic usage is, "To beard the dragon/lion/bear/etc in it's lair," One of those archaic terms that doesn't really get thrown around outside of a single phrase, but definitely a usable word.

Earl of Purple

Well, the Emerald Swords are scary. I wonder if the Watch of the Deoraithe are going to get involved, if they find out that there's some elves running around in Praes. Probably not, they're too dangerous I think.

Konstantin von Karstein

Also, the Watch is one of the very few force securing Callow, and sending precious soldiers on a merry chase in the Wasteland is a bad idea. The Deoraithe probably hope the ES will get themselves killed by a Demon or something.

Shveiran

True. The Watch getting involved in Praes seems unlikely... although I have to wonder whether they will use the ES's absence as a reason to attack the Bloom.

The ES must be a good portion of the Bloom's strength, or... well, otherwise the Bloom would likely be a lot more relevant than it is.

Darkening

I mean, conquering Calernia would mean having to interact with the lessers, and even at the point of a sword that's a terrible thing for an elf to have to put himself through. Wars are generally fought for resources, and there's not really anything the Elves can't get for themselves (aside from a forest that doesn't hate them, but conquering the continent wouldn't help with that). Since they mostly just want to keep all the filthy sinful humans out of their territory and be left alone, it still makes sense they haven't had a lot of presence even if every single elf alive is equivalent to a minor Named.

Konstantin von Karstein

Don't forget that the average Elvish soldier can kill 10 times his number in human soldiers. And there's still the problem of letting Callow defenceless.

There's also the fact that the Elves are sterile and can't replenish their numbers, so they're unlikely to send troops outside their border without a really good reason and being sure they will win. Which proves they're stupid, given that the FK send his 10 best warriors in Praes to kill Ranger while she's with Black 😏

Darkening

Well, they've got the Spring Crown now, so it's entirely possible they're currently using that to sort out their fertility issues.

jamesc9

Other problem with the Watch, they're powered by the bundle of souls of their past members, but they partially lost control of it. Have we heard that that's sorted?

Xcarcea

Thanks for the chapter!!

beleester

Incorrect APGTE quotes:

Scribe: "Black could turn his own death into a tactical advantage."

Cat: "I've done that before. It hurts, but it's actually not that difficult."

(Actually from Schlock Mercenary)

superkeaton

Funny, I was expecting a whisper of Cat's Beast during her show of power

Sykomantis

The envoys aren't Named so it doesn't have a reason to show up

Silverking

I think I understand why Cat's going to solidify her Name here instead of against the Dead King. Her true specialty isn't "total war", it's "dealing with people". When she was fighting the Dead King, every single fight was a slog, and her only opponent was an immortal bore who always played the optimal strategy every time and couldn't be negotiated with. Even when she's able to pull off her "five steps ahead" tricks with the Heroes and Villains, it was always constrained by the fact that, at the end of the day, she's still going to have to work with these frustrating short-sighted people if she wants to succeed.

But here in Praes, it's a whole different game. There are factions to exploit and opponents who want several different things. Here, she can actually issue ultimatums and burn bridges if she really wants to. Here, she can actually take a fortress without bleeding for it. Cat's got an army of veterans at her back and the most dangerous Named on the continent at her side, and she's going up against the in-fighting factions who haven't seen any of her new tricks, and a Story-blind Empress who has sown far too many seeds of her own destruction over her reign.

They're never going to know what hit them.

Sinead

She's crafting a story that gained a Name, rather than taking a Name to new heights.

....

Considering the comparisons between Cat and Triumphant, my overtired brain wonders if the Name of Dread Empress was a chain on her rise to power, binding her to the limits of the Tower. She was seen by Nemashah as a peer, but she never made it to ascension (that we know of).

Liliet

IIRC the name Dead Empress only solidified into that instead of Tyrant either shortly before Triumphant or directly with her.

Sinead

That is a solid point!

therealgridlock

instrumental grunge metal plays

Instrumental grunge metal stops

Kingpin (with 17 levels in barbarian) turns, puts his finger on the table and says one word:

“Wage.”

Instrumental grunge metal beat intensifies

flashburn283

What could Black be up too, 5 bucks says he just wants Praes to rip itself to pieces and burn to the ground.

jamesc9

“I want my home to be more than a temporary alliance of the starving.”

Or words to that effect, in the Tower’s archive, shortly after he worked out that the Meizian food magic was breaking the soil.

Chapter 4: Stock

“It is unseemly to poison an ally in the first month, wear white at an assassination or use the same curse more than once per decade. Fashions will change with year and season, but always these three will be a mark of crudeness.”

– Extract from ‘The Behaviours of Civil Conduct’, by High Lady Mchumba Sahelian

The way Indrani and I kept sharing a bed was the longest I'd ever been involved with anyone.

It wasn't a love affair, at least not in the sense that I was in love with her or the other way around, but it was no less meaningful for it. More than that, it'd become a creature comfort of sorts on top of being very enjoyable. My part of the arrangement was probably the easiest to navigate, which honesty compelled me to admit might be for the best considering how things had ended with Killian. My time with my former Senior Mage had ended with frozen silence and avoiding each other, which didn't bode well since aside from the occasional tumble before I became the Squire that was pretty much the sum of my relationships. Indrani didn't ask much aside from a place in my bed, which was just fine by me. That much I could handle.

It was what bound her and Masego that I found interestingly nuanced. The two of them were distinctly 'involved', but it was more an intimate partnership than anything like the chaste marriages people without inclination to sex sometimes entered in. Masego wasn't inclined towards that either. Zeze seemed happy with the arrangement, anyhow, and Indrani certainly was. While she'd let him set the lines, aware he hadn't been made of quite the same clay than she and I in this regard, she'd not been afraid to speak up when she wanted something. It was how they'd come to share rooms in the Arsenal. Masego also considered anything she and I got up to as not related to him in the slightest, I'd confirmed on the one awkward instance where I'd tried to broach the subject with him.

He'd been confused at my bringing it up in the first place, since it struck him as a private affair, and once I'd made sure he was both aware and indifferent I'd been more than happy to drop the matter entirely. It'd been a relief. I didn't count myself as particularly shy, but as I aged I'd noticed that I was getting more closed up about intimacy. There were just too many ways it could be used against me if it came to light.

Indrani's part of this that was the trickiest. She was the one who had to draw lines and figure out limits. Distinctions. It was in the small things, like the way that after returning from a long trip, as she had yesterday, she always spent the night with Masego. She'd also been out in the wilds for about two months, though, so pretty early the morning after she came to visit me and I strengthened the privacy protections around my tent with Night. Quite a while later, we had a breakfast together. I was seated at the end of the table on my favourite seat, picking at the plate of sliced fruit my attendants had brought in and occasionally passing Indrani a cut of mango or passion fruit while I read through the papers Adjutant had sent me.

High Lord Sargon had sent a messenger to arrange talks, much as we'd expected he would, and they'd been set for midday on relatively neutral grounds. The envoys from the Steppes were settled in, I read, and soon we'd have the second round of talks so we had all the details hashed out before they left. Hakram would have to be there for those, as I fully intended for him to be my envoy up north.

Indrani was sitting cross-legged on the ground, absent-mindedly munching on the pieces I put on a plate in hand's reach as we chatted and she carved at the underside of the table. I was careful with my sleeves as I devoured the mango – one of the few sweet things I liked, and so rare back home – since the green tunic I'd put on had long ones. It was a little warm for this weather, but I didn't feel like having to explain the slight rope burn around my wrists should someone see it. Especially when the reasons for it had me in such a boneless, lazy mood. It was a rare enough these days, I wasn't going to spoil it.

"So the two ducklings you picked up," Indrani began, knife chipping away out of my sight.

I finished a piece of passion fruit, licking my fingers clean.

"Sadly," I slowly replied, "you're going to have to be more specific than that."

She snorted.

"Really living up to that whole Queen of Lost and Found title, huh?" Indrani said.

I rolled my eye at her.

"Which ones do you mean?"

"Razin and Aquiline, the duckling lords," Archer elaborated.

"What about them?" I said, cocking an eyebrow.

"Shouldn't they be married by now?" Indrani said, then clicked her tongue.

She dipped deeper under the table, knifepoint scratching against the wood furiously. Missed a detail, had she? I pushed a few more slices of fruit onto her plate and slid it across the table closer to her.

"They're going through with it after we take Keter," I informed her.

"Bold," Archer said, tone approving.

Actually very cautious of them, and so likely Razin's idea. He tended to be better at that part. If they got married right now, they'd be a power bloc that the other two great lines of the Blood – the Champion's and the Brigand's – would feel strongly threatened by. With the Pilgrim's Blood gone the way of dust, the Dominion no longer had an even theoretical ruler. Which meant after the war Levant would either fracture into smaller warring fiefdoms or another bloodline would take the Tattered Throne. An alliance between the Osenia and the Tanja would be the clear frontrunner in the race, always a dangerous position to be in. As things stood, though, Lord Yannu and Lady Itima were a lot more likely to bet on one of them biting it in the war than try a knife in the back.

Why take the risk, when the Dead King might yet do the work for them?

"It'll make for a damn good story, if they pull it off," I admitted.

It was the kind of foundation a dynasty could be built on if they played it right. Indrani made an approving noise.

"You ever wonder what stories they'll tell about us?" she asked, tone light.

"Probably that fucking story about me castrating an ogre," I grimly said. "That one'll follow me into grave, mark my words."

"Don't undersell yourself," Archer said, and I heard the grin.

There was a beat of silence.

"You castrated him in single combat," she said. "That makes it all the more impressive."

I groaned, making an obscene gesture she didn't even bother to look at.

"Our jaunt to Keter's going to make a good one, I think," Indrani mused. "It's got all the good ingredients. The five of us and Akua, a journey into the Hells and the worthy enemies."

Metaphorical Hells, since it'd been Arcadia we traipsed through. Hopefully chroniclers wouldn't ask too many questions about the plan in Keter. I'd yet to live it down, though in my defence it had sort of worked?

"The Princess of High Noon," I suggested. "That was a good one for retelling. Masego found his eyes and all five of us had a hand in that win."

It'd ended on a sour note, but that was war for you.

"Still can't believe Vivienne didn't even try to pawn that sun," Archer grumbled. "What kind of a thief was she? It would have fetched us a fortune in Mercantis."

"I think in a way she did," I said. "It's on her personal arms now, did you know?"

A white sun on Fairfax blue. If there was to be a Dartwick dynasty after me, I figured they were as good arms as any.

"My sources informed me," Indrani mysteriously said.

The effect was somewhat spoiled by the way she groped blindly above the table to steal a few pieces of fruit I'd laid out to scarf them down noisily. Well, that and we both knew that by sources she just meant Hakram. The gossipy bitch.

"After Zeze pulled out that echo of the sun in Hainaut, people started telling the story again," I mused. "Pretty sure it's spreading quicker than it naturally should, too."

Indrani's head popped over the edge of the table, brown face openly curious.

"Hakram's building her a legend?" she asked.

"He probably is," I said, "but I don't think it's entirely natural, if you catch my drift."

Names could form in a lot of ways, but one was the most common: like a boulder rolling downhill, gathering weight and momentum. In that moment in Hainaut, when the hour had been at its darkest and she'd ridden out to turn the tide, I believed Vivienne had sown the first seeds of a Name. I had mixed feelings about that, to be honest. It would be the final nail in my hopes of having the Liesse Accord ban Named rulers, should my guess turned out accurate. But if I was going to trust anyone Named with my home, it'd be Vivienne Dartwick. And the chances of that measure going through are getting slimmer by the day, so I might just have to water my wine there.

"I did notice people called her a princess even before you made that official," Indrani said. "But it can be a thin line between the start of a Name and simple reputation."

I grunted in agreement.

"Pretty sure I'm standing in its way, whatever it is," I admitted. "I think it'll only coalesce properly when she's got the crown."

"I wouldn't be so sure about that," Archer said. "You're looking at Names and Roles of Old Callow, and sure enough she doesn't fit those properly, but if you go simpler—"

A guard popped in his head through the tent's flap, and I realized with mild embarrassment I'd never loosened the Night-workings I'd put around the tent. I wouldn't even have heard it if there was a hurricane outside.

"The Concocter to speak with you, Your Majesty," the legionary said.

Ah, good. She'd finished her tests then.

"Let her in," I replied.

The Concocter's appearance had changed since she'd accompanied us to Praes, which I'd been told was a regular occurrence with her. Her hair was now aquamarine blue, pulled up in a bun behind her head, with matching lips and golden-yellow eyes. Though often sullen, for once the alchemist seemed in a pleasant mood. She offered me half a bow and Indrani simply a droll look, which Archer returned with an indolent wave of her hand before helping herself to the rest of the fruit.

"Your Majesty," the Concocter greeted me.

"Concocter," I replied. "You have results for me?"

"I do," she said. "Of the three products we salvaged from Sudden Abjuration before shutting it down, two proved functional in the water of the aqueduct. The amaranthine salt rock dispersed too easily, however, so I would recommend the use of the evanescent powder instead."

I pushed down a grimace. The salt rock would have been easier to carry and less would have been needed, but I wasn't going to be taking risks with this. Well, not more than the plan involved in the first place anyway. It, uh, wouldn't be the safest thing I'd ever done.

"How many bags of powder will be necessary?" I asked.

"At least eight, standard Arsenal measurements," the Concocter said after a moment, calculating in her head. "Assuming the dimensions given by Lady Sahelian are accurate."

"They should be," I said. "Just in case, I'd request you make us ten bags. Better to have a margin of error."

"It can be done by tomorrow morning, if I don't sleep," the villainess replied, sounding almost enthusiastic at the thought. "As for the breathing potions they're already done. Four doses, as you asked."

Good, it was all coming together. Indrani let out a noise of surprise.

"The underwater breathing brew, you actually got it working?" she asked.

"I did," the Concocter preened.

"Damn," Archer said, sounding impressed. "It's been what, over ten years? Congratulations. What was missing?"

The Concocter cleared her throat, seemingly embarrassed. I could understand why.

"Powdered dragon bone," she said.

Which made each of those four vials she'd brewed me worth more than their literal weight in gold. My pipe was dragonbone, and that little artefact alone would be enough to buy you a large mansion in Ater. Thankfully, at least part of the bill for this was being covered by the Grand Alliance. Indrani laughed at the answer and the Concocter subtly tensed.

"Yeah, not a lot of that going around Refuge," Archer said. "Makes sense you wouldn't have figured it out there."

"I'd had good results with drake blood, it was a hint," Concocter admitted. "Mind you, those pigs still drowned."

The tension in her shoulders loosened, and I wondered if Indrani realized how precarious the entente she'd reached there still was. Having the Silver Huntress in camp had been as much a help as hindrance there. Cocky and Alexis tended to argue when left to their own devices, and the Concocter then often sought out Indrani, but the Silver Huntress was openly resentful of that and it was leading to friction between the three – Archer wasn't the kind of woman who took kindly to being snipped at when she didn't believe she deserved it.

"Encouraging," I drily said, and she looked a little embarrassed for a moment.

"It'll work, Your Majesty, I tested it myself," the Concocter said.

"Your work has given me no reason to doubt you," I calmly said. "Kindly send me word as soon as you've finished preparing the powder."

The other villain understood it as the dismissal it was, and after the usual round of courtesies she was on her way out. I'd kept Indrani's attention, though. I'd figured mention of the water breathing potion would do the trick.

"So, I see you've got plans," Archer said. "Going somewhere, Cat?"

"I am," I said. "And taking people with me, too."

"Oh?" Indrani said, with transparently affected nonchalance.

The potion would be a new experience, something she craved like a drunkard craved the bottle, and on top of that she knew I wouldn't be mauling my treasury paying for those for just any old place. I was going somewhere interesting, and she wanted in. Which made it good thing I'd planned to bring her from the start. While I could have teased her and strung this out, I decided to reward her having interacted with a fellow pupil of Ranger without anyone getting angry or bitter.

I was going to train it into her, I swore.

"Hey," I asked with a winning smile, "wanna to come with me and Akua to rob a secret Sahelian vault full of horrors beyond comprehension?"

She choked in surprise and delight, hazelnut eyes alight with pleasure.

"You say the sweetest things sometimes," Indrani grinned.

—

There was no one in the world like the Soninke and their highborn gloried in that.

Our party had come to the orchard first so that we would be able to look for traps before High Lord Sargon arrived. Hierophant led a mage cadre in combing through the spread of tall lemon trees, boots crinkling against the dry earth as the sun pounded down on all our heads. There was not so much as a hint of breeze today, the heat was suffocating. We'd agreed on bringing no more than thirty guards each, so twenty knights of the Order of Broken Bells sat the saddle in good order behind me. Inside those shells of polished and hymn-inscribed steel they must be cooking alive, but they made for an impressive sight. Decked in plate from head to toe, their chargers wearing carapace in black and bronze, they kept their shields close and their lances raised. Their banner hung by my own, dead for the lack of wind.

Masego had wandered off to sit under a tree after looking around, popping open a book larger than my head in what looked like an older dialect of Mthethwa, which left Akua and I to stand under the shade of a tall lemon tree halfway through the orchard. She had decided to wear my colours, today. The dress was a long one, going down to her feet, and it was of a traditional Wolof cut: the neckline was narrow and though it went beyond her collarbone it did not venture far. It clung loosely to her body, tied up at the waist by two sleeves of cloth that were part of the dress. It was black, though from the top of her collarbones to well below her tight there was broad silver-and-gold embroidery. It looked almost like a stole, though it was part of the dress, and the intricate patterns there matched those at the end of her sleeves and the cloth tied around her waist.

There was, as had become her habit, not a single piece of jewelry on her.

Stunning as she was, I might as well have worn rags for the difference it'd make. Still, I'd humoured the notion of royal splendour: though I wore a breastplate and greaves, because I wasn't a fool, I'd put my hair in a long braid and worn my crown. The Mantle of Woe and my staff served as the regalia of my rule, truer to me than anything I might have dragged out of some dusty Fairfax vault, and instead of an aketon I had worn a thick black tunic touched with silverwork around the edges. Nothing as intricate as what Akua had on her, but then my bloody clothing wasn't made out thin air. We made a memorable enough sight, I figured, and drew the eye enough that the little surprise I'd kept up my sleeve shouldn't be noticed.

Then Sargon Sahelian's party came riding into the orchard, and it was an effort not to stare.

All thirty of the high lord's bodyguards were mounted on pale horses, a breed short-backed with a high-set tail, but little of the coat could be seen: long quilted armour in red, black and white covered them all the way down to the lower leg. The patterns were eye-pleasing, sharp triangles and long stripes colourful enough the thin strands of copper woven into the quilt were hard to make out. Enchanted, I thought. Those were definitely enchanted. The riders themselves were no less splendid. Their segmented steel lamellar bore a single pauldron on the right shoulder lined with lion's fur, while from the left hung a long sash whose patterns matched those of horse's armour – if you did not pay attention, your eye might be tricked in thinking them a single creature.

They each bore a spear, a shield, and curved sword and three javelins. All glittered with rubies and ivory. Light cavalry, I thought. They'd break under a charge of my knights, but my men would die of exhaustion before catching up and those javelins looked nasty. Javelins could punch through plate, if you knew how to throw them. Ornate helmets added the final touch, rounded tops bearing bright red feathers with an eye-catching mouthguard made of two ivory tusks atop a coloured veil of mail.

Splendid as they were, though, the soldiers were nothing to the three nobles that had come. To the sides of Sargon Sahelian were mage nobility, amber-eyed and smiling. Over silk coats they wore breastplates entirely decorative – they went only halfway to the belly – but beautifully crafted, inlaid with gold filigree and rib-like white enamel stripes. They wore gorgeous red cloaks bordered in gold, and at their sides were jewel-encrusted swords too pristine to have ever seen use. Each wore a king's ransom of artefacts as earrings and bracelets, necklaces and trinkets. Beautiful and poisonous, they laughed as they pressed forward their horses.

The High Lord of Wolof made them both look like beggars. For half a heartbeat I thought he had dressed severely, a simple painted scale armour over a red coat, but then the 'scale' caught the light. It wasn't painted, I realized. It was made of precious stones, every last scale: garnets and tourmaline and rubies, sapphires of every tone and colour, onyx and chalcedonies and amethysts. I found the sheer waste fascinating, in a repulsive sort of way. The hem and sleeves of his coat were embroidered with black and white maze-like patterns that were dizzying to look at – enchanted, probably – while High Lord Sargon's shoulder-length black hair was flecked with pale feathers longer than any bird I knew could grow.

Golden eyed like his cousin, the High Lord of Wolof rode in the shadow of the lemon trees and his retinue followed. The dappled light danced lightly across the colours, making it seem as if they shivered like waves on a pond, and my breath caught in my throat at the sight of them all. Beautiful and terrible, as Akua had once proclaimed at the Doom. There really was no one in the world like the Soninke, was there? Sometimes, about some things, their arrogance was not unwarranted. One of the two nobles peeled ahead of the rest, reining in his mount thirty feet or so away from us. I felt the weight of his gaze sweeping across us for a moment before he offered a short bow.

"You stand before High Lord Sargon Sahelian of Wolof, he who rules over the temples antediluvian and the vaults of forbidden knowledge," the man announced in Mthethwa, his voice pleasantly rich. "You may kneel in awe."

How nice of him to give us permission. We were a stiff-kneed bunch, Callowans, so no one took him up on the kind offer. To my surprise, Akua took a step forward. The noble's eyes moved to her, gone wary the way you would when encountering a venomous snake.

"You stand before Queen Catherine Foundling of Callow, the Black Queen," Akua announced, tone light and amused, "she who has broken gods and bargained with them, stolen the sun and contended Choirs three. Your boasts are shallow, Naiser Mutinda."

The man sneered down at her.

"The once-proud daughter of Wolof returns a lackey," he said. "Disappointing."

I drummed my fingers against the side of my staff.

"You're wasting my time," I mildly said, staring at the man.

He hesitated but Naiser, since that seemed to be his name, wasn't quite brave enough to mouth off to me to my face.

"High Lord Sargon blesses these talks with standing of truce," the nobleman said.

The actual reason he'd come, this. Making sure we couldn't take swings at each other without consequences.

"So do I," I said. "Now let him talk for himself, lackey, before I begin to lose patience."

"There was no need for that sort of talk, Naiser," an urbane voice chided. "My cousin's return is something to celebrate, not take offence to."

Sargon Sahelian had dismounted while we entertained his man, the noblewoman to his side having followed suit, and as Naiser deferred to his liege lord I took a moment to study him more closely. The precious scale armour somehow didn't look ridiculous when worn on foot, which surprised me, but not as much as the realization that the High Lord of Wolof wasn't actually good looking. His chin was a little weak, the arch his eyebrows uneven and his nose too large for his face. He was far from ugly, but I'd gotten used to unearthly beauty being the norm among Wasteland aristocrats. The pageantry called attention away from it, though, and for a moment I thought of Cordelia Hasenbach.

"Do I pass muster then, Black Queen?" the High Lord of Wolof amusedly asked me.

Huh. It'd been a while since someone had called me out on studying them.

"I'm just amazed your armour doesn't actually seem to be uncomfortable," I replied, half-serious.

He laughed, revealing white but slightly crooked teeth.

"My great-grand uncle was vain but not foolish," High Lord Sargon said. "He knew he'd have to wear the artefact after ordering it crafted."

"He also ate tiger hearts for supper every other day," Akua noted. "Let us not hasten to the conclusion of wisdom."

While I was morbidly curious as to why anyone would eat a tiger heart, much less a regular supply of them – I bet it was a virility thing, always was with wealthy older men – Sahelian family anecdotes weren't why I'd come out here. I lightly slapped my staff against the side of the tree I stood under, claiming their attention.

"You wanted talks, High Lord," I said. "You have them. I recommend against wasting that chance."

The dark-skinned aristocrat nodded, seemingly unconcerned.

"I could dance with words over Wolof not having warred on Callow under my rule, but I imagine that would go against the spirit of your recommendation," Sargon said.

"Malicia's my enemy," I said. "You're one of hers."

If Wolof followed the Dread Empress of Praes, I would treat it accordingly.

"That is unfortunate," Sargon said. "Though I would convey that she does not wish to be at war with you anymore than I do. She seeks to offer peace terms, Queen Catherine."

"It's more than a few corpses too late for that," I sharply replied.

"Are you truly so petty you would not even listen to the terms, Catherine?"

My fingers clenched. Among the riders, one of them had taken off her helmet. It wasn't Malicia's real body but the cadence of the words, the presence? The body she was possessing with that ritual of hers smiled at my anger, but I didn't let it burn hot. It went cold instead, frozen, and I raised my hand to snap my fingers. Malicia's mouth opened, but before she could speak so much as a word there were a few flickers of light. An arrow streaked through layers of enchantments and tore right through her throat. She fell over, gurgling, and already halfway into the grave. Archer did not miss, not at this range. Even as the retinue began to raise their spears and my knights lowered their lances, I met Sargon Sahelian's eyes.

His calm had not broken and neither had mine.

"I trust you have a good reason I shouldn't just burn you all alive for bringing her to these talks," I conversationally said.

He didn't even flinch, which reluctantly raised my esteem of him a notch.

"I have on my person three artefacts known as the Weeping Snares," Sargon replied. "They contain demons, and I have had an artificer bind all three seals to a command artefact in my possession."

"I have the Hierophant," I said. "Any leash you have on them will be mine before the first incantation's finished."

"There are no leashes on them, Catherine," Akua quietly said. "It is why my ancestors left them in the vault instead of using them for war. They are simple containers, forged in cruder times."

I hummed and thought for a moment, Sargon never blinking as he watched me. I could see sweat beading on the back of his neck. Not worth the risks, I eventually decided. Even should I weight that it was worth the damage to my reputation to break truce and kill the High Lord of Wolof, there was no guarantee that his successor would be more pliable – or that they'd negotiate with me at all.

"Clever," I finally said. "Talk, then. We both know you came to make an offer."

"You have seized Sinka and Jinon," the High Lord said, "and this tightens the noose around my city. Yet we are each aware that Wolof could withstand a siege for longer than you can afford. I do not believe that you want to storm my walls anymore than I want them stormed, Black Queen."

He shrugged, offering a disarming crooked smile.

"Would you be terribly offended if I offered you a bribe to go away?" he baldly asked.

It's the teeth that give you away, Sargon, I thought. They were just one step too far. Even in Callow there were hedge mages in some cities that could straighten your teeth. There was no way that the High Lord of Wolof couldn't get his own fixed, which meant keeping them was a choice. How many of your countrymen fell for that little smile, Sargon? Its just honest enough to trust, to believe coming out of a lesser branch's son. How many saw it coming before you slid the knife? Aisha had warned me once, about charming Sahelians and the dooms they wrought.

"We can call them war reparations, somewhat overdue," I mused. "I'm interested."

"That is... pleasing to hear," Sargon admitted.

He looked faintly relieved, though I wondered how much of it was feigned.

"I'll want your granaries," I idly told him, "your treasury and a pledge that Wolof will withdraw from the civil war."

With each addition his smile grew more strained.

"Some of this can be haggled," Sargon tried. "The last cannot. If the Webweaver is truly one of your followers now, I imagine you know why."

Malicia had soulboxed him and was unlikely to be pleased if he abandoned her cause. Terrible torture would ensue, presumably. It was an opening I'd been waiting for, though, and half the reason I'd made the demand in the first place.

"Hierophant can cut the city off from scrying," I said. "She wouldn't know until much too late."

I saw him hesitate a fraction, then push through.

"Wolof has secrets beyond the ken of Wekesa the Warlock's knowledge, or that of his son," Sargon said. "Your premise is untrue."

I hid a smile. I'd given something by revealing Masego could put them in a box if I wished him to, but without knowing it he'd given me something too: he was afraid of Malicia personally, not as an abstract. Not through scrying, assuming I even believed his vague talk of secret Wolofite magics that Hierophant couldn't dismantle. She still has another body in Wolof, I thought. My fingers clenched with something that was neither quite fear or triumph. It was too strong an investment for me to be the sole reason for it. I had put out my bait in the right place.

"It seems we're at an impasse, then," I shrugged.

"I can still offer great... reparations of gold and foodstuffs, Queen Catherine," High Lord Sargon said. "Can a bargain not be had?"

"Of course – I'm a reasonable woman, High Lord Sargon," I lied. "I just want your entire treasury and all your food."

I paused.

"And also the armour you're wearing," I whimsically added. "As a polite reminder that if you ever try to bring a Named capable of mind control to truce talks again, I will brutally murder you as an object lesson."

I was going to have to get everyone checked for hooks in their minds, which would be a pain. That'd cost him.

"Well," High Lord Sargon muttered, "at least it is a succinct sort of extortion."

"And to think they tell me I can't do diplomacy," I brightly smiled.

"I can't imagine why," Sargon amiably replied, not batting an eye. "I will have to discuss your terms with my advisors, Queen Catherine. Perhaps negotiations can resume at a later date."

I shrugged.

"If you want," I said. "Until then, I'm under oath to offer you an exchange for the prisoners taken in Jinon. As you have none of mine imprisoned to trade, I've set ransoms instead. Akua?"

She offered the scroll, which without hesitation the High Lord of Wolof took. He unfolded it, eyes scanning the lines. I'd set truly extortionate rates, ten year's pay for every soldier and officer as well as massive lump sums for every highborn. Even for someone as wealthy as the High Lord of Wolof, it'd be a costly racket. My bet was on him bringing home only the highborn, part of the reason I'd jacked up their ransoms on principle. The rest was that I had a godsdamned war to pay for, and it wasn't going to pay for itself.

"Yes," Sargon Sahelian briskly said. "I'll send the sum to your camp by cart before nightfall. I trust you will return them to the city at the earliest convenience."

I hid my surprise, but not quite quickly enough he didn't notice it.

"We're a greedy breed, Sahelians," the High Lord crookedly smiled. "The coin I'll make again in time, Black Queen. People are not so easily replaced."

Huh. That was the closest to respect I'd felt for him all day, even knowing he might be playing me. The talks ended without further ceremony, and it was in a pensive mood that I rode back to camp. I felt like I'd missed something, though I couldn't put my finger on what.

So far, we hadn't missed a beat.

—

I woke up in the middle of the night to the screams and smoke.

Kal

closes to====> closest to

ruduen

Huh. Another fire. Any bets on if this one will be attributed to Cat or not?

Go boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

dadycoool

Well, she is right there, after all.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Of course – I'm a reasonable woman, High Lord Sargon," I lied.
"I just want your entire treasury and all your boosts."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

I read that as "all your boots" at first and it was glorious.

Gotta say, "boost" looks more charmingly dorky and less annoying than "vote" in these.

Someperson

"No apologize. Boots!"

dadycoool

Malicia did basically the same thing that one prince did waaaaay back in the day, the guy with the Page that had a crush on him. She essentially challenged Cat to a duel of some sort, in this case words, and rather than even entertain the option, she shot her in the throat. Just like that prince. Honestly, what IS it with these old-fashioned Named and their clutching to melodrama? It's stupid, especially when they know damn well that they're going up against Black's daughter.

Shveiran

Unlike the Exiled Prince, Malicia lost nothing but a sorcerous double to that gamble.

Even if it was unlikely to work, why not make the attempt?

And considering Cat awoke to chaos, murder and chaotic murder, I'm not committing to the idea it didn't work.

Brakham

Prince was indeed a melodramatic fool that got shot. Malicia's body here was an expendable resource, perhaps it would have better been quiet, but Malicia has plenty of backups.

onedollargum

She can afford to take that loss of a body, especially if it happens to set up a pattern of three.

Catherine doesn't have so many bodies to lose.

Lord Haart

Don't think that interaction has the narrative weight to be part of a pattern of three, since Cat didn't even acknowledge her.

But yeah nothing lost.

Burlyraven

Well, a lot of things I've had concerns about and issues with got addressed in this chapter, so that's cool. I may yet get to say "I told you so" on the surrendered troops being a trap, though the origin of the trap would certainly be up in the air.

Tony

My guess is that Sargon memorized all the names of the prisoners on the scroll and then used magic to kill them so as to discourage any further surrendering to Cat

nick012000

Hmm. I wonder if the contents of the carts were full of devils or fire elementals or something rather than the loot Cat was extorting him for in exchange for prisoners. IIRC it was mentioned that some of the Praesi nobles were descended from genies.

Liliet

Aisha Bishara, specifically.

It's the Taghreb whose signature is intermarriage with magical creatures, Soninke just do regular human eugenics.

Shveiran

I think it is more supernatural eugenics than intermarriage for the Taghreb.

At least I hope so, considering one of the achievements on record was inserting DRAKE blood into a bloodline.

I'm not one to shame over kinks, but marrying a magical alligator seems logistically complicated.

Liliet

Valid.

But we do know actual intermarriage is a thing too, see: Kilian.

Shveiran

True.

Then again, the exception may be the Fey. After all, we know they have stories about fathers and therefore have stories about breeding, which in their case is the same as having compatible genitals.

Drakes or even genies might not allow the practice, though it is a given that at least one Emperor would have made the attempt.

superkeaton

And she wasn't even conscious for this conflagration. That's impressive, Cat.

Frivolous

EE: Thank you for giving us firm knowledge on the status of Vivienne. I'm happy to know she's not Named yet but is probably going to be. The uncertainty was driving me a little batty.

On the other hand, giving us a cliffhanger like that is cruel, just cruel.

I wonder what or who is causing the screams and smoke. Did someone set the orchard on fire? That's a shame if so.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat is right there, so clearly it's her fires. Again.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Finders keepers, and she is the Queen of Lost and Found.

David Lynch

> "I wouldn't be so sure about that," Archer said. "You're looking at Names and Roles of Old Callow, and sure enough she doesn't fit those properly, but if you go simpler-"

...is Vivienne going to be Heiress, you beautiful mad bastard?

RubberBandMan

. . .That would be her stealing a name from the Preasi. Would she really do something like that?

Shaerick 68

Oh heavens no, Princess Vivienne isn't some petty thief... anymore...

dadycool

A chill legit went up my spine when I read that. It's beautiful.

Liliet

The "princess" thing is significant and is most definitely going to be part of the Name.

Itarion

You pegged her as Shining Princess to be around Hainaut, and while it wasn't enough then, a good old fashioned war with Praes, where a princess leads Callow's army? That will be enough.

Liliet

Indrani is suggesting "something older and simpler", so that might not be Shining Princess. Sun Princess, someone suggested?

Sinead

The laurel is a plant sacred to Apollo...(but I may be stretching there). Running through old Callowan heraldry, I do not think any of them have a Sun motif. But since the divide between Callow and Praes is literally carved into the land (fall of the Drakoi), that 'sun against the darkness' may be a forgotten basis of the 'Shining Prince(ss)' Name.

Archer just knows things she has no reason to, after all thanks to Ranger's education.

hakureireimu

Indrani's was objecting to Cat's statement that Vivi wouldn't get her Name without the crown. Specifically, Indrani objected to the notion that Vivi doesn't fit the Role of the princess of Callow. She's saying that if you take a step back and squint, Vivi fits that role perfectly fine. So it's going to be Shining Princess 100%.

Liliet

Indrani also said Vivienne doesn't fit the Roles of Old Callow though that actually might still go with Shining Princess if what she meant is "the Role can work in another way if you go more literal"

Shveiran

My thoughts exactly.

...It's probably wrong, but I'm gonna believe it's right until I'm proven wrong.

ohJohN

This line confused me a little – Vivienne is now Officially A Princess^{3M} and well-known for her association with Summer's sun, which sounds like a perfect fit for the Name of Shining Princess?

Even for the Role, what little we know of the previous Shining Prince was that he lead the Callowan troops at the Fields during the Conquest, and Vivs did lead the troops at Hainaut in a desperate last stand against the dead. Maybe the fact that it wasn't a direct defense of Callow's borders gave it the wrong shape, or something?

Liliet

There were multiple beautiful, oh so beautiful things here.

1. Elaboration on Indrani's relationship status!
2. CONTINUATION OF THE REFUGEE STORY!!! Catherine is invested ♥ ♥ ♥ (so am I)
3. Elaboration on Vivienne's status!!! FUKKEN KNEW IT though the hint is that it's not Shining Princess. Awwwww.
4. Soninke aesthetics I am DRINKING this with my eyes best worldbuilding is best
5. Goddammit I lost my bet on discord: something went wrong but Cat DIDN'T get a chance to curse about it.
6. Cat did have a guess about whatever the fuck it is Malicia has cooking in Wolof. Blessed & beautiful.
7. Hi Malicia. Bye Malicia. Blessed & beautiful.
8. Sargon is REALLY hurting for manpower, huh?

hakureireimu

2. Refugee story? You mean Refuge story? Otherwise I'm not sure what you meant.

3. I have an opposite interpretation; Indrani is explicitly objecting to Cat's notion that Vivi won't be Shining Princess.

Liliet

Refugees = kids from Refuge :3

Juff

Typo Thread:

anyhowm > anyhow than she and I > as she and I this that was > this was bee easier > been easier enthusiastic the > enthusiastic at the it good thing I'd > it good thing I'd > it a good thing that I'd wanna to come > wanna come today, the heat > today, and the heat below her tight (missing something) arch his eyebrows > arch of his eyebrows
I weight that > I weigh that closes to respect > closest to respect

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

"Zeze seemed happy with the arrangement, anyhowm,"

>"Anyhow"

"was black, though from the top of her collarbones to well below her tight there was broad silver-and-gold"

>Tight? Tight what? Ass? Or perhaps this is "waist" instead.

"They each bore a spear, a shield, and curved sword and three javelins."

"A shield, a curved sword, and three javelins." Oxford commas are nice, also.

SpeckofStardust

So the real question is this the first betrayal or not?
Or is this just a night attack?

Adrian_V

Was there any danger or difficulty to the body switches Malicia does? Otherwise it wouldn't really count as an investment to have 2 bodies in the city. Can't remember if it was mentioned back in keter.

Also is better they were deal some damage right now so long as its not critical, it actually adds story weight for the final plan to work if not all is perfect during these early parts.

Liliet

I think just cost as a resource, in time and attention.

Adrian_V

Yeah i mean that among others, like i can't remember if the bodies needed to be really special, is not like they are clones right?

Liliet

No, but they do need to be prepared in all kinds of magic ways that are likely expensive.

Liliet

(Also, she can only inhabit one body at a time, so to keep them running when she's not there she needs to set up an AI which is even more of a resource sink)

Liliet

Oh also if she needs the body to masquarade as a noble she probably needs to kill an actual noble for it

nick012000

If Maseru got his hands on one while Malicia was piloting it, and he managed to prevent her from jumping out, he'd be able to break her power and drive her crazy the same way the previous Dread Emperor got his power broken and was rendered insane by the Wizard of the West during a battle.

Also, I think she needs to make the bodies by using sorcery to rip people's souls out.

nick012000

*Masego. Not sure why autocorrupt turned it into Maseru.

ninegardens

Welp, glad to see that the prisoners were appropriately "Paid for"

benthelynx

Is anyone else finding that book 7 is a little clunky so far?

dadycoool

Eh, only in the way that Cat has a bunch of plans that we haven't gotten the chance to see unfold/get elaborated on. The foundation is the most boring, blocky part of any building, after all.

vernal.ancient

"It is unseemly to ... wear white at an assassination"

Lady Sahelian would not get along with the Parshendi, I think

vernal.ancient

Welp, that was supposed to be its own comment... thanks
WordPress

Aduro95

Yeah, didn't really need so much explanation for Cat Masego and Indrani's relationship. Since we already know they stand. Show don't tell would have been smoother.

I'm also not really feeling all these costume description in a row.

Lord Haart

Not personally, no. Though I do find the end of each book is usually so full of things happening very quickly with little explanation (E.g. What did Pale Knight say to Cat to make her freeze and why hasn't it been mentioned since, was it mind control shenanigans?) that jumping into each new book with a bit of a fresh start and more world building can feel comparatively slow. I think this is just good narrative pacing though, and I've liked the extra details.

Matthew

The fact that she didn't have a "That went too well, double the watch!" means Cat is losing her touch.

Honestly, that whole end read like a rookie mistake that Cat wouldn't make.

Liliet

I am guessing the watch was doubled off-page and it just didn't help.

Matthew

Still that's not the point. There was that glorious scene in the Free Cities where Black and Warlock were just crushing a group of heroes and then they both decide to pull out because they know it is going way too well for them as evil named.

Ever since Cat took Black as her father... she has been less and less cognizant of the whole "You are an evil named, the universe is looking to screw you over."

Liliet

TBF she's been getting cozier and cozier in unambiguously heroic stories.

And she DID say she felt like she was missing something because everything was going too well.

She didn't start panickedly running around like a chicken with its head cut off but IMHO that's for the best?

ninegardens

Black was playing a villanous story against heroes.

Cat is playing a ... neutralish story against villains. The story rules be different.

(She STILL should have doubled the watch)

mamm0nn

Cat: High Lord Sargon seemed surprisingly decent and normal so far.

Later that evening: Hahahahaha! You fools! I transmuted my soldiers into coins and then turned them back once giving you your 'payment' for the hostages! Also, I've hidden devils in every citizen's right boot and this armour of mine is actually just an elaborate way to smuggle precious gems out of the city and to the Mercantis dealers that you cut me off from! And those fortune cookies on that tray! That's right, fear me for I have put my evil monologue down on paper and you'll have to read it cookie by cookie! Mhu-hahahahahaha!

Shveiran

Glorious.

308924810a

I suspect that this lord is the next Warlock. But I'm not sure.

Shveiran

You know, I thought so too but... that would be kind of stupid, wouldn't it?

I mean, Sargon main use for Malicia comes from the fact that she has so much leverage over him it's not even funny. But that's... magical leverage. It doesn't take a genius to figure out Sargon would rather like not to be soulboxed, so if he gets a Name based on magic I'm guessing he would try to fix the situation. And I'm sure it's complicated, but that's what a Warlock does: spells that are impossible to everyone else.

From a story perspective, it would be a given Sargon would escape the box.

Even if Malicia didn't think of that, it would still be a big blunder from a manipulation perspective: it empowers someone that owes her no loyalty while simultaneously giving him the means to escape her power over him and also making her own death the natural progression of his power. After all, more than one warlock climbed the Tower.

I still have no idea who Malicia meant (the only one I can think of would be Akua, but she offers even less of an angle that I can see) but I'm rather sure it's not Sargon.

Earl of Purple

I like Lord Sargon. He's dangerous, and clever. Malicia probably forced him to take her with, and I reckon her second Wolofite body was another of the riders. She'd know Cat would kill the one that revealed itself, most likely, so I think she took both so she could still watch.

beleester

I don't think Malicia can control two bodies at once, so her backup body would have to be asleep somewhere safe.

Shveiran

True.

Though let's face it, if she wanted to, the logistics are probably not that complicated. Glueing a body in armor to a saddle and make it stand straight shouldn't be too complicated.

Though I do believe if she wanted to watch she would just have kept quiet.

She had an angle there, I'm just not sure which.

Earl of Purple

She had three bodies in Keter. The Malicia that Cat killed, the spare that Archer sniped, and the servant Neshamah had given Cat. Pretty sure the Malicia that was killed and the servant were active at the same time- though the servant might have been running mostly on pre-programed behaviour.

Liliet

Malicia can make an AI to run the body when she's not there, like she did with the Keteran servant.

ninegardens

Let's face it, she probably doesn't have one more body in the city.

Though, tbf, with Zeze hanging around, I'm not sure that that is to her advantage. He might not have been able to "catch" WB, but Malicia's soul drifting around body hopping... that... could be an opportunity...

Huh... do you think Zeze is willing to harm "Aunty Malicia"? I... kind of suspect he'd prefer not to.

Cicero

I don't know about that. Malicia ordered his father into protecting that city that ended up getting his fathers killed. And pushed his father to take a strict position against Cat, causing tension between them in their last meeting.

While Black was always closer to him, and Black has sided against Malicia.

Chris

What's with the repeated and blatant call outs to Akua's lack of jewelry?

Shveiran

I was wondering that myself. It's a near certainty it's going to become relevant at this point, though I can't fathom how. The main jewel that I can recall having a meaning in the franchise is Ranger's "Ring of Nightfall"

Klatn Yelox

Loved that little nod. I wonder if the reason is that a famous assassination happened back in the day with the assassin wearing white.

Probably more just that it's a bit on the nose to wear a color that symbolizes purity when someone is going to get killed, but Praes has a lot of traditions based on history so The Assassin in White as a historical Name is my headcanon.

Mental Mouse

Probably the other way around – the Praesi are patterned after African cultures, and AIUI, in Africa white is the color of death – so an assassin in white would just be cheesy, like the overdone-Goth thing for Anglo-Europeans.

Chapter 5: Incursion

“The Heavens pick the victor, my friends, but the Hells detail the aftermath. How else can it be explained that when a battle is won we most commend the general – that is, the only man in the army that can be relied on not to have picked up a weapon?”

– Captain Thierry the Acerbic, addressing his company before the Battle of the Twelve Routs

It was tempting to just run out sword in hand to find out what was happening, but I resisted the urge. I’d learned the hard way that recklessness could have permanent costs – like half someone’s total supply of eyes, for example. I put up my hair in a loose ponytail and strapped on my armour, not without fumbling, and only after putting on a helmet did I finally limp out. Sword at my hip and deadwood staff in hand, I looked out into the night and found entire swaths to the south of my camp aflame. Had Sargon played me with the ransom payment? It shouldn’t be. Hierophant had inspected the ingots personally and they were in a warded pit anyway. It made no sense either, considering I hadn’t even given him back his prisoners yet. I’d kept them overnight as a precaution against foul play and he had to know I might hang them as an object lesson if he tried something.

Sargon Sahelian hadn’t struck me as the kind of man who pissed away either gold or lives.

I made my way to the tent closest to mine, where Adjutant had placed a station of his adjunct secretariat, but there were no phalanges there. I found a line of regulars hurrying south through the dirt avenue passing by my tent, however, and wasted no time approaching the lieutenant in charge. A young Taghreb, no older than twenty and rosy -cheeked.

“Your Majesty,” he breathed out, before snapping into a more professional salute.

“Lieutenant,” I said. “What’s happening? I’m not hearing the alarm wards.”

"Our wards are down, ma'am," he replied. "All of them. And we're under attack by giants."

Our wards were down? I felt a shiver of unease. Not even the Dead King had managed that so easily. The mention of giants, though, had me skeptical. I seriously doubted the Gigantes had anything to do with this. Ogres, though, I'd be willing to believe. I had less than a tenth of ogres left in the entire Army of Callow – our campaigns had not been kind, and none lost were ever replaced – but the Dread Empire would not be so limited. That would mean a Legion raid, which did nothing to settle my discomfort. I'd learned enough at the feet of the Legions of Terror to know how brutally skilled they were at what they did.

"What did they hit?" I asked.

"I don't know, Your Majesty," the lieutenant admitted. "My orders are just to head at the southern rally point with my line and await further orders."

I smothered my irritation. It wasn't his fault I wasn't aware of what was going on and taking it out on the kid would help no one.

"Let's go then, lieutenant," I evenly said. "There's no time to waste."

I pulled at Night – and how crisply it came now that dusk had passed, almost as easily as before the Ruination – and killed the pain in my bad leg so I would be able to keep up with the brisk pace of the legionaries. We passed through a sparsely manned checkpoint, but there was no way the sergeant in charge would know more than the lieutenant I was with so I pushed on. At the second checkpoint, I found Adjutant waiting for me. He was armed and armoured, with an axe in his dead hand and a broad shield in his steel one.

"Catherine," he gravelled. "Apologies, by the time my phalanges reached your tent you'd already left."

I waved it away and didn't bother to ask how he'd known where I would go. There were lines between us where there once had been none, but he was still my Adjutant.

"What's happening?" I bluntly asked.

"The Legions of Terror are hitting us," Hakram gravelled. "Less than a hundred, nearly all ogres. They gated out of Twilight a foot away from the outer palisade and smashed through, then used some sort of artefact that fried our wards. Hierophant and Akua are working on getting them up again."

"Fuck," I eloquently said. "Do we know what they're after?"

"They split into two forces," Adjutant said. "The one lighting the fires is going straight for our supplies and Juniper's mustering men to drive them out. The other force – smaller, we think – is headed west."

My eyes narrowed. West had Sargon's soldiers and the rest of the warded pits we'd dug. Was this a rescue operation? That made little sense. The High Lord of Wolof had already paid their ransom and they'd be handed over come morning. Something didn't fit, and that made the second force the odd hand. The one to watch out for.

"That's the one we'll intercept," I decided. "Where's Archer?"

"She's -"

"Disappointed you didn't hear her coming, is what she is," Indrani drawled.

My hand was halfway to my sword when I recognize her voice, and my muscles stayed tense until she'd moved out from the tent she'd used as cover for her approach. There was some alarm as legionaries began to notice her, but it didn't last long. She was a known quantity for my soldiers.

"That's what we have you for," I retorted. "Vivienne, Huntress, the kids?"

"Vivienne is with Juniper," Hakram said.

"Alexis went to guard Cocky," Indrani said. "I'm not sure for the kids."

For a moment I almost sent Adjutant to look for them – he had the right aspect to Find the needle in the haystack – but I held back. He might see it as him being sent away from the fight, one which would be hard enough without shedding off a third of our Named before we started.

"Send one of yours to Vivienne," I ordered Hakram. "I want them kept from getting into too much trouble."

Entirely out of trouble was sadly more than could be reasonably asked for, given that they were Named. Hakram nodded and saw to it, even as I checked my gear one last time. I made a note to have a bag of goblin munitions prepared for me and kept in my tent. Now that Scribe's scheme had paid off and we'd essentially bought out High Lady Wither's stocks of munitions – with the blessing of the Matrons, who saw it as weakening her military strength even if our grain helped her maintain control in the short term – I could afford to start using them again. The moment Adjutant was back we headed out together, moving fast. Since our wards were down and we had an idea of where our enemies were headed, we took a shortcut through the Ways to try to intercept. We sidled through instead of using a gate, since Indrani found us a path in moments, and it allowed us to skip over all the barricades, checkpoints and mustering soldiers.

The advantage of fighting people as tall as ogres was that, given the average height of tents in our camp, we could easily see them from a distance. Within moments of leaving Twilight I had my eyes on maybe twenty towering silhouettes, all decked in pitch-black plate engraved with runes and wielding massive flanged maces. Those were not Legion heavies, not any kind I'd ever seen.

"Archer, go around," I said, already pulling at the Night. "Begin on my signal."

"Gotcha," she said, pulling down her hood.

She slipped into the shadows, swift-footed even as she began to string her bow.

"Adjutant," I said, shaping the Night, "I want you to bait them. Take the front and draw them in."

"Warlord," Hakram replied, flashing his fangs happily.

I finished the last touch on the 'eye' of Night I'd made and threw it up in the air. A shadow on black, it remained unseen to our foes even as I closed my physical eye and made myself see through that one. It didn't tell me much more about the enemy force itself, but it did give me a bird's eye view of them moving around the camp. They're not headed towards the prisoners, I realized. They'd walked right past an avenue that led to their pit, and I doubted it was because of the two lines of regulars manning the palisade around the prison pit. They were after something else and moving like they knew they layout. Which they would, of course, since the Army of Callow pretty much used the Legion layout with a few modifications. It sunk in a moment later.

The ransom. It was further east in a guarded pit as well, and the group – twenty-one ogres and two humans, I counted – would soon get to an avenue that'd lead them straight there. But why the Hells would Malicia care about the gold? The empress still collected taxes from most of Praes, she was positively rolling around in coin she couldn't spend for lack of friendly neighbours. I set the question aside for now, as I had more urgent cats to skin. I checked Adjutant was on the right path to reach the enemy, which he was, and then prepared to disperse the eye. There was no point in even trying to find Archer, I knew that from experience.

Then the night lit up with a flash of sorcery as streaks of flame hit one of the lead ogres, scarring the black plate, and I caught sight of two small humans getting in the way of the enemy.

"Fuck," I cursed.

The kids were there and getting in over their heads. These weren't Bones or a handful of necromantic monsters, they were a well-armed Legion strike team. I broke into a run without hesitation, knowing that if I lingered for too long they might be dead by the time I arrived. So much for springing an ambush. Calling on Night, I formed a rough wedge of power in front of me and ran straight through the tents in my way. It was a quick approach but not a subtle one, as was made clear when one of the ogres grabbed a javelin the size of a small tree and threw it my way.

I twisted the Night into a different working, catching the weapon in flight and turning it around before tossing it back. A miss, I saw, but hopefully it'd discourage a repeat. I formed another wedge and immediately another ogre threw a javelin at me. I cursed, resorting to the same trick and this time scoring a glancing blow against an ogre's breastplate. They weren't trying to kill me, I grasped, they were slowing me down. The bastards weren't even intending to fight us, were they? They'd just do what they'd come for and then retreat.

Gods but I hated fighting against well-trained soldiers.

Thankfully, I could fall back onto the sage lessons of my childhood: if the other guy had a better plan, you just had to sock them in the face real hard until they forgot it. I abandoned the idea of the relatively harmless wedge and instead drew deep on the Night, waves of heat emanating from me as I formed a massive ball of blackflame and tossed it in a straight line in front of me. It burned through tents and barricades, clearing me a straight path and smashing into one of the ogres. Even as I ran, my brow knotted when the flames cleared and I saw my working hadn't actually broken the ogre's plate. It'd blackened it further, half-melted it, but the fire had only gone through the armour's visor. It was still enough to have the soldier screaming and clawing at his face.

Archer put an arrow between the hands and straight into the skull a moment later, dropping the ogre.

I unsheathed my sword as I crossed the last of the distance separating me from the melee, the flash of flames flickering at the edge of my sight and bathing the silhouette of the closest ogre in light. The great flanged mace rose, and Night or not there would be no parrying that. I struck out with my staff, black flames boiling out of the top as I aimed for the visor again, but I was forced to abandon the working when another ogre used drove a javelin like a spear into my flank. I hastily backpedalled out of range, almost eating the mace blow from the first as I did. Redirecting the black flame into striking the side of the mace's head got me out of it, but the ground shook as the flanged head tore into the earth besides me. Worse yet, more and more of the ogres were converging on me.

A few I could handle, but ten? That was going to get tricky.

Then Adjutant came out swinging from their left flank a heartbeat later, proving once more that splendid timing was written into his very Role. The surprise earned me a moment to shape Nigh,t in between ducking away from a wild mace swing, and I threw up another eye so that I could see through it and grasp the lay of the entire melee. It was only the beginning. Power coursed richly through my veins even as I saw one of the ogres draw back his arm to throw a javelin, but I grit my teeth and kept weaving my miracle. My eye in the sky stayed focused on my enemy's arm, spellbound. Almost there, I thought, watching as the plate-covered arm flexed and the tree-sized javelin went flying. I breathed in and out, listening to the instincts trained into my body by years of war.

A half-step to the side, the movement precise enough I felt the steel head of the javelin brush against my side, but I'd done it. I was finished.

"Bang," I grinned, staff coming down against the floor in a strike.

I kept the eye for just a second, long enough to place the ten orbs I was capable of handling at one time. Night formed out of thin air in front of ten visored faces, looking like spinning orbs for half a heartbeat before they burst and air was sucked in. I'd first used the air explosion trick against demons at the Arsenal, but I'd improved it in the months since. This time, at the heart of the 'orb' there was a seed of blackflame. The air getting sucked in pulled in the ten ogres, just in time for the blackflame to grow unstable and explode in their faces along with the sharp burst of air. The result was a brutal blow of physical strength and fire that dented the visors before delivering the blackflame through the opening. Most of the ten died instantly and those that didn't began to scream in pain.

From the corner I saw Adjutant take a blow on his shield, aspect pulsing as he withstood the strength as if it were a breeze. He struck with perfect timing as the ogre withdrew, toppling his foe down into an already-trampled tent. He had that under control, I decided. I could push through to the kids.

I ran past a slowly falling ogre, clutching at her broken and burning face, and as she struck the ground behind me like a small earthquake I found myself frowning. There had been two humans earlier, mages presumably, but I couldn't see them in the melee at the moment. Where – the only warning I got was the feeling of the air being moved, and I wasn't quite quick enough. My staff was struck as I got pushed away, the silhouette of an ogre coming into sight for a flickering second as I was blown off my feet and my staff went clattering in the distance. Fuck, I thought, rolling away as I felt the air move again and the ground was hammered in front of me. One of the mages was using illusionary enchantments. I rose back to my feet lurching about, grasping a handful of Night and throwing it blindly ahead.

It stuck, as I'd hoped, and a blotch of darkness appeared on what looked like the side of the mace trying to smash me to bits. It'd do. Slicing behind me with my blade, I opened a gate into the Ways and stepped through. I glimpsed greenery and felt gentle wind before crossing back into a warm Wasteland night, coming out on the side of the mace I'd tagged and spinning out chords of Night. I hooked them around the mace, forcing it and the ogre back into flickering visibility, and then wrapped the chords around the shoulders and helmet of the ogre. Hands tight on the bonds I twisted, Night obeying my will as the ogre struggled to keep the mace away from their helmeted head and I tightened the noose. I was cheating, of course. It wasn't strength I was using to tighten the chords but willpower, weaving Night, and the limits on my will were lesser than those on the soldiers' body.

With a third twist of the wrist I tightened the chords into a vise and the side of the mace went through the helmet with a loud crunch. I wasn't sure how far it'd gone into the skull beneath it, but the ogre was out of the fight regardless. That freed me to go forward, where I saw Arthur Foundling being battered down with brutal efficiency by an ogre. His shield was already a crumpled ruin and one of his shoulders obviously broken. The Apprentice was shooting darts of fire and spears of lightning at the ogre, but all it did was slow them some. Not even a mark was left on the armour, which had me staring. Even enchanted plate would have marks after that, and my heartbeat quickened when I saw the ogre kick Squire in the stomach when Arthur tried to slide behind them.

He'd been moving with Name quickness, unnaturally swift, but his opponent had begun moving the exact moment he did. No one was that fast without a Name, I knew, without leaning on that set of reflexes that came with a martial Role. From the corner of my eye I saw an arrow hit a man in the throat, the spell he'd been halfway through – aimed at Adjutant's back – dying with him, but I looked past the corpse and found that four ogres were covering the last mage's hasty retreat. I moved to the side, climbing over an ogre corpse to get a better vantage, and cursed. The pit where we'd left the ransom gold was now empty. They'd brought a caster that could use High Arcana and shoved all the ingots into a pocket dimension, the tricky fuckers.

As if I'd allow that. I drew on Night.

I heard Arthur Foundling scream as he was smashed into a barricade by a blow, and for a heartbeat I weighed the choice. The gold might keep a lot of my people alive, keep them fed and armed for the war on Keter, and the Squire was still a potential threat to Vivienne in the coming years. If I pursued the last mage instead now... The thought was ugly, but ugly wasn't enough to stay my hand anymore. I needed better than that – Name, I thought, mind racing. He was in a fight of Named, one he'd stumbled into through heroic providence. That could be a potent tool, used right. Eye tearing away from the fleeing mage, I broke into a run. Ribbons of lightning struck at the back of the tall ogre with impotent fury, making the enchanted steel glow but little more as I shaped Night into thick tendrils.

The looming ogre raised their mace as the Squire rolled to the side, grasping for his sword. He'd be too slow. The flanged mace came down and the boy's face paled but his fingers closed around the handle of his blade anyway. He'd die trying. Or not die at all, preferably. I struck out, tendrils of shadows layered over my arm like some sort of skeletal armature, and the strength of it was just enough to slap aside the mace before it could crush the boy's skull. I stood between the two of them, Night wafting off me like smoke as I prepared another trick, and cocked an eyebrow.

"So Malicia's picked up a Named," I said. "Which one are you, I wonder?"

Our foe – a woman, I glimpsed through the visor – did not answer. She raised her mace again, drawing back to make space for a swing, but I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth.

"Not Warlock," I mused, "or you would have seen that coming."

The Night-smoke I'd had trailing along the ground solidified around her feet as shackles, so when she finished the movement of striking the imbalance tripped her. I stepped to the side as she began to topple forward, tapping the side of my sword against Arthur's flank tell him he should follow suit. An arrow whistled, aimed straight at the gap in the plate between the neck and the helmet, but with unnatural deftness the massive mace swept up to bat the killing blow away just before the ogress hit the ground face first.

"Martial, and not a transitional Name if you have control that fine," I noted.

I raised my sword, calling Night to it even as the ogre grunted with effort and burst through my shackles with brute strength. And yet I was not worried in the slightest. I knew, somehow I just knew, that the timing would work out perfectly. I could see it as if it were written in the air, as if it were inevitable. As if some grinning devils down Below had put their coin on me and their fingers on the scale to match.

I was following my Role, and so the tide of Creation was on my side.

"None of that," I chided my foe, bringing my blade down on her back as she tried to raise.

The Night struck out from the point of my sword like a needle, shattering the backplate, and then like cracks of ice my power went skittering in every direction and shattered the enchanted steel. The ogre was smashed back down into the ground. I heard bones break and froze in surprise. I'd not hit her that hard, not for a Named, and that was the moment it fell into place. My limbs grown strong with the touch of my growing Name, I moved forward and flipped over the gasping ogre. She did not resist, broken. I stripped off her helmet and a single look at those dark eyes was enough to confirm my suspicion: the power in there was fading. Not because I'd killed its wielder, but because I'd damaged the vessel too badly.

"Black Knight," I greeted. "So what's the aspect you're using, I wonder – something like Deputize, Mandate?"

I wrinkled my nose.

"No, you're clearly Legion," I said. "You're using mostly ogres, too, so I'd guess you're Marshal Nim. 'Commission', maybe?"

It clearly wasn't her full strength she'd put in the body, else the kids would be dead twice over. The ogress hacked out a cough, dying, and I sighed. Wouldn't get anything out of her. I sheathed my sword, but halfway through the gesture the almost-corpse suddenly lunged. A single massive hand reached over my shoulder, grasping the Squire's throat behind me, and she began to squeeze – I felt horror swell, I wouldn't be quick enough with the Night I was reaching for – she went still. It was not luck that did it, but the eerily silent arrow Archer had loosed that went through her eye. I roughly dragged Arthur away by the scruff of his neck as the body dropped, the boy moaning in pain. As well he should, he was basically a mass of bruises and bloody wounds. He sagged against the ground.

"Thank you, Your Majesty," he got out. "I owe you-"

"Nothing," I cut in, tone sharper than I meant it to be.

I refused to feel guilty. I was long past the luxury of clean choices, and just because today I'd chosen to keep him alive didn't mean that tomorrow would see me make the same decision. The boy looked like I'd slapped him and I sighed again.

"Consider this a wake-up call," I said. "This is what fighting with real Named and not Revenant puppets feels like. The Black Knight on the other side used a single aspect, not even in her real body, and she still nearly pulped you."

"You're not going to tell me it was foolish to fight?" the boy asked.

"It wasn't a foolish fight, you just fought foolishly," I corrected. "You likely saved a lot of soldiers' lives by stepping in, the part that needs work is the one where you almost died doing it. You won't be helping anyone when you're in a grave, maybe keep that in mind."

"Nothing we did got through her defences," Arthur admitted. "Even at our best we were simply holding on."

And in that sentence, in the anger – the unspoken urge to do better next time, the certainty that there would be a next time – I saw an opportunity. A tool. And I was enough of a monster to make use of it, even when I was using a boy barely more than a child.

"So prepare yourself," I challenged. "Train. Make tactics."

He was silent for a moment, exhausted and in pain, but eventually his blue eyes went steely. He nodded, brushing back a black lock stained with sweat and blood.

"I won't lose, next time," Arthur Foundling swore.

And with those words I'd invited, with the weight of them spoken by his lips, I knew I had made myself a sword. Because unless I was wrong, a Squire and a Black Knight had just fought. And the Squire had begun that fledgling, fragile pattern with a defeat.

If I stoked those embers just right, that story would end with my enemy's blood on the floor.

—

In the wee hours of the morning, I sat with Vivienne and Juniper to go over the butcher's bill. The good news was that, as far as dead bodies went, our losses were light.

"Ninety-three dead," the Hellhound said. "Most of them regulars. We can thin some cohorts to make up for it, we still have the numbers to absorb that."

"And we inflicted eighty-two casualties ourselves," Vivienne noted. "Considering it was a surprise attack fielding almost entirely ogres, we made off decently in that regard."

I grunted in agreement. The attacked had escaped, but not without taking losses equivalent to about eight out of ten.

"We'll see if Masego can crack the enchantments on the armours," I said. "It's unlikely there will be enough of those to equip more than a handful of elite units, but that would be troublesome enough on its own."

I got grimaces of agreement. Ogres were bloody difficult to kill, unless you had either magic or munitions to deploy against them. It was a clever decision for Marshal Nim to focus on stripping the sorcery option from us, considering the Army of Callow had been in chronic munition deficit for essentially its entire existence.

"Losses in supplies were not as grave as they could have been," Juniper continued. "We changed the layout of the supply depots compared to standard Legion camp templates-"

She had, actually, making a point of it before we began marching, but my marshal wasn't the boasting type.

"-so our current tallies have the losses mostly in dried meat and grain, about a third of our total stock," she continued. "If our numbers stay roughly the same, Catherine, we're now down to roughly four months of food."

From six to four, huh. Four months for an army that could use the Ways was a very different beast than for an army that couldn't, but this had still been uncomfortably costly. A lot of food had gone up in flame tonight.

"If you had to guess," I said, "were they able to figure out what our total amount of supplies would be?"

She flicked her fangs uneasily.

"It's likely," Juniper admitted. "They might be slightly off, but the quantities were roughly even between depots and there are only so many places in a camp to put those."

Which meant that by morning High Lord Sargon would know that we couldn't afford to siege Wolof if we were going to do anything else this campaign season. There just wasn't enough food in our possession to spend months besieging him and then war elsewhere. In other words, our negotiating position with him had just been dealt a severe blow.

"We'll hit Wolof tomorrow, then," I said. "There's no more time to waste. The moment the Concocter is done with the powder I'll set out."

"It'd be for the best," Juniper agreed.

"Sargon's unlikely to ask for talks when he has the advantage, so in a way this lends us an additional dose of discretion," Vivienne noted. "Yet that brings me to the last of our outstanding issues: the prisoners for Wolof."

"They've been ransomed," I said, though my tone was neutral.

It wasn't a commitment so much as a statement. The High Lord of Wolof had paid the gold I'd asked for, and promptly too.

"We don't have that ransom anymore," Juniper said, "and it was taken by his empress. That's on him too."

It was, I wouldn't disagree with that.

"You want to keep them?" I asked.

"That or hang them," Juniper bluntly said. "We've been taken for a ride, Catherine. Maybe a point needs to be made."

"I don't think Sargon actually has anything to do with this," I admitted. "This has all the telltale marks of a Legion operation and he would have no pull there. This seems like an attack by Marshal Nim on our supplies that got a secondary objective tacked on."

"Malicia would gain from our going back on our word here," Vivienne said. "It would make Praesi lords warier of striking bargains with us."

My eyes narrowed as I followed the threads.

"She wins if we give them over too," I spoke through gritted teeth. "Rubies to piglets that ransom gold is going straight back to Sargon's coffers, and very publicly. She'd be proving she can score victories against us and that she's still protecting her vassals."

Hells, the way it neatly landed her a win no matter what we did had me more convinced this was a Malicia ploy than anything else I'd heard tonight. It was exactly the kind of plot she liked use. I passed a hand through my hair tiredly.

"We release them come dawn, as I promised," I finally said. "I'd rather let her flash her feathers than risk burning bridges we'll need to cross when treaties are made."

For all that I'd come here with an army, it wasn't conquest I was after. And if I started letting Malicia bait me into hanging prisoners, she'd keep doing that until Praesi considered me not worth negotiating with. Or I'll have to let things go after taking a hard stance the first time and changing tacks will make me look witless. Fucking Malicia. She really was a devil to deal with, when she had a good general to play off of. I could only imagine how much worse it would be if she still had Black under her. Angry as I was at how we'd been had, I mastered myself. Fine, she'd stuck a knife in us and it had stung. This was the kind of game she most excelled at and we were in her own backyard.

Tomorrow, we'd do things my way.

ruduen

Boost! <http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Ah, it's been a while since we've had a pattern of three. Though with the current White Knight still alive, I do wonder what that means for Arthur's name by the time it reaches a resolution. It's not impossible, but it seems unlikely for Hanno to be gone by the time this particular side journey is complete, and it I'd think that the final encounter for the pattern would be done by then.

7imelock

Perhaps he could have a different name like Knight Errant or whatnot

dadycoool

I'm personally convinced that he'll be the Black Knight to the Black Queen. She'll likely have her own name by then, but I'm pretty sure it was said at one point that Squires typically turn into Black or White Knights. If lesser knights don't need the Squire path, then not only does that justify them being lesser, it also raises the minimum power level, etc. of Black and White Knights. Also, there's only ever one Squire at a time, so it doesn't make sense that every variety of Knight needs to be a squire first.

Pethrai D'arkos

I highly doubt that Black/White Knight actually require that you be the Squire first anymore than Warlock would require you to be the Apprentice first. It's certainly helpful but there's only so many transitory names to go around while Below tends to have claimants fight to the death for the more important names.

Bad@games

We know for a fact hanno was not the Squire at all, so its not required, but just common.

eleniaturner

We have hard confirmation that they don't require a Squire first, with Nim. She just had to be named Malicia's Black Knight.

Levi Kalden

No I think she was the Black Knight and she made it official at that point

Casey Glick

Arthur seems like he'll go to a broad Knight name. He is Callowan, but has been fighting against the Dead, and for a new Praes, and probably for the Liesse Accords when they're signed.

Knight of the Realms
Peacekeeper Knight
Knight of the People

Cpt. Obvious

The mechanism behind the name Squire is something of a conundrum. It's a name that can transition into either black or white knight. But those names can also be picked up without ever being the Squire.

Now some acquires the name of Squire directly while others first are Claimant, which is yet another transition name, and has to compete with the other claimants to earn the name of Squire.

Do we know if the Claimants always are evil? It sounds a bit rich to have good claimants murdering each other while it's just another day like any other for the Gods below.

Finally as there's times when claimants are named and it seems unlikely those with a Heroic bend would be OK with participating in a veritable Battle Royal over the name, is it certain that the alignment of the Squire always results in them transitioning into the knight of the same alignment?

Or can a Squire switch alignment before transitioning?

All in all I think it seems like whenever a Squire surfaces the pattern has it aimed at a certain knight position, and none but those of the right alignment need to apply.

Earl of Purple

The Valiant Champion mentions once off-hand that she had to fight Claimants for her Name.

The differences between Cat and Arthur as Squire is most notably that Cat signed up with Below whilst Arthur signed up with Above, and they grant Names differently. Besides which, the Squire Name was handed out to Cat because Amadeus was looking for one- so people who wanted the Name gathered up. Arthur wasn't so formalised, but still he had to do something more heroic (I think) than all the other squires in the Order of the Broken Bells to get the Name.

And the Black and White Knight thing is probably because Amadeus is Praesi; he knows Namelore, but mostly Praesi Namelore. The Squires of the Dread Empire transition to Black Knight; the most notable Squires in Callow become the White Knight. Other Knights may well be available for Squires to transition into, if the right circumstances are met. For example, if there's a White and Black Knight already but the Squire's story carries them to the right pivot.

Sylfa

Note that the current Black Knight never was a Squire. So no, being a squire isn't required.

Nor is there a direct and guaranteed direction that a transitional name have to go.

Zeze didn't become Warlock, Akua became Diabolist, etc. Cat went well off of the beaten path and seems to become Black Queen.

The only thing that seems guaranteed is that transitional names go to young people that are likely to become named if they don't die before that.

shikkarasu

It was clarified that Squires turn into Black/White Knights and Apprentices can likely become any magical Named (leaning heavily toward their teacher's Names), while Heir/esses can become anything.

I think there are three 'Tiers' of Name: Transitional Names (Squire, Apprentice, Heir, etc.) Standard Names that can be transitioned to, but do not require it (Knights, Wizards, Diabolists, etc.) and what I am dubbing Capstone Names (King, Queen, Tyrant, Hierarch, et.). The Capstones are more of an anti-Heir: they are Names that anyone can transition to.

hakureireimu

It didn't mean that Squires can only turn to either of them.

Liliet

So far people have been talking about Capstone Names as ruler Names

shikkarasu

I think that Saint of Swords is similar. It seems odd to me that someone would start their Named career with a title like that, or that Ranger would take an interest in a fresh Named without all of their Aspects (Saint only gained Listen after being disembowelled by Ranger). That makes me think she started as something like the Lone Swords(wo)man and transitioned into Saint, something like a ruler Name where the only qualifier is being unfairly good at swords, even by Named standards.

This whole post is, of course, heavy speculation.

Earl of Purple

We have an AMA that stated that Saint of Swords started out with the transitive Name of the Wanderer. We don't know when she transitioned, nor how many Aspects she had at the time- it's possible that Listen was her first Aspect as Saint of Swords, and it was the fight against Ranger that caused her transition.

shikkarasu

I missed that AMA, but thank you! Good to know I wasn't that far off.

...also I want to see young Laurence fight a Colossus, now.

Liliet

We have WoE her first transitional Name was Wanderer.

Also that Saint at her peak would have had a fifty-fifty chance against Ranger, and in her late years about forty-sixty..

And it was baby Laurence herself who challenged Hye, not the other way around.

Cap'n Smurfy

We see it with Bumbling Conjuror as well, where he could have become Conjuror.

Miley

The Names aren't that rigid. It's all about the Role. The transitional names are so because they describe people whose Role is to learn to be something. A Squire is preparing to take a Knight role, an Apprentice is learning to take their Master's role, an Heir is going to take over the family business and estates, and whatever Roles come with that.

But nothing is forcing anyone to actually take those roles, other than the extra work it takes to change what you do.

Aleksander Ross Møller

That is certainly a possibility. But I don't think that Cat is going to be the Black Queen. She had that exact possibility back when her hand was forced at the Doom of Liesse, and it was averted. Now it's just a title. Whatever name is evolving seems to be broader in scope than something dual like black and white. This leads to my pet theory that Arthur will also differ from the old duality. I'd personally love the Grey Knight, although that name itself might still be too entrenched in the old war between black and white.

ohJohN

I think Arthur becoming the Black Knight is incredibly unlikely, primarily because Black Knight is an Evil and uniquely Praesi Name.

Cat, another Callowan Squire, had a good shot at claiming it, but she was already a villain, a citizen of the Empire (because Conquest), and taught by some of its greatest villains in recent memory, with Amadeus intending for her to inherit his legacy. Before meeting him, she wasn't particularly inclined towards Above and her plans (join the Legions, gain enough power to force change) better fit a villainous mold, and even if the Fourfold Crossing is to be believed and she had the potential to be a hero, she would have been a darker, bloodier type.

With Callow's independence, Arthur no longer has any real claim on Praesi Names. He is learning from a villain, but not a Praesi one, and without the weight of an "official" mentorship. I'll concede that it's an era of great upheaval, so maybe with Callow under the rule of a villainous queen the Name could mutate to fill a Callowan groove – the land is famous for its knights and now (at least nominally) on the side of Below, with close historical ties to the Name's birthplace.

But even then I think Arthur is too solidly a hero to be a good fit: I believe it's been shown that he can use Light, he's caught the eye of the Hashmallim (the Penitent's Blade dreams), and in their first meeting Cat notes that he's "almost offensively" heroic in appearance and disposition before he confirms his alignment with an offended "I'm not a heretic."

Above has their hooks in deep, and while Vivienne was a much shallower heroine (no Light, no Choir, a criminal Name born from a mostly personal grudge) I'm not sure she ended up fully or deeply on the side of Below after joining the Woe – IMO almost definitely not enough to claim a classically Evil Name as her next, whatever it ends up being. Arthur would have a significantly steeper hill to climb to switch teams, and I don't think being young and impressionable around some moderately Evil influences is anywhere near enough to get him there.

Linnus42

I mean White Knight is not the only Knight Name around. There are a lot of Knight Names one can get. Also Arthur has no particular connection to Hanno and even if he got the Name isn't exactly going to be leading any Heroes. Doesn't have the skills, power is debatable with a new no name, and doesn't have the Trust being closely tied to Cat won't do him many favors in winning any votes.

MixSwitch

Grey Knight? For a new era under the Cardinal and the Accords?

Liliet

There'd been WoE in early books saying that Calernia doesn't have the cultural basis for a Grey Knight. I doubt that'd have changed so fast, especially when the Knight variants are functionally limitless.

Shveiran

To be fair, it has been years, and they have been tumultuous years.

I'm not saying he'll become the Grey Knight, just that there is no guarantee that this particular WoE still applies.

Miley

It seems odd to me that squire has to be either a black or white knight. My money's on a Callowan knight name.

Darkening

There was a conversation at one point that went along the lines of, 'A squire must become a knight, either White or Black, nothing else.' It took Cat eating an entire faerie court to break away from that role into something else. Sure, she could have become a ruler name, since everyone seems to be able to do that. But the conversation was basically her asking, "Can I become a different knight while the black and white knights are alive?" As a way of avoiding killing black, and having her hopes shot down.

Deworld

I don't think Arthur will get a new Name out of killing Nim. He's just too young. 16 years old, he's been a Squire for, like, few months at most? At this point Cat still had nothing but lessons with Amadeus. Hero!Cat from Fourfold Reflection fought in rebellion for a couple of years before killing Black and becoming White Knight.

Unless Arthur's pattern takes more than a year (at least) to complete, it would be too early for him to become a Knight. And considering how determined Cat is in removing Malicia, and that she has a strict time limit, I doubt it'll be the case. Squire still has too much to learn.

Juff

Typo Thread:

I recognize her > I recognized her instead of drew > instead drew used drove > drove
From the corner (extra space) blown of my > blown off my flank tell > flank to tell attacked > attackers things ago > things go

Frivolous

Also cord, not chord. Chord is mostly musical in context. Cord is similar to rope.

Very common error in fiction, like using diffuse a situation when it should be defuse. Situations being like bombs; you don't want them to blow up.

Lox

Huh, what you said made sense, but it's new to me. Looking at a dictionary tells me I can still use diffuse for riots though.

Rey d`Tutto

Disperse is better, when crowds get violent.

Darkening

Diffuse would be more calming down the rioters, disperse would be violently suppressing the riot.

pirateddesigns

"Within moments of leaving Twilight I had my eyes on maybe twenty towering silhouettes"

Should be, "I had my eye on..."

Black Spiral Dancer

Not the only phrase that happened, either. There was a bit about her "eyes narrowed" that make no sense with one eye only.

Mental Mouse

True, but it's her own narration, so her internal speech may not have adapted to her maiming.

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

" to shape Nigh,t in between "

>Obvious comma in incorrect place

Kel the Seer

but I was forced to abandon the working when another ogre used drove a javelin like a spear into my flank.

The word used may have been left over from an earlier edit
dadycoool

This was a very fun battle. It's so cool to watch Cat lean into her roles like she did there.

Ooh, I've been suspecting that Arthur would become the Black Knight, so this Pattern of Three that Cat just got him to initiate is very exciting to me.

It's always a bad time going up against a Dread Empress/Emperor. That this is one with, what, 40 years of experience only makes it worse. Pro: she doesn't have her real Black Knight, she's acting like an Old Villain, and she's forcing Cat into being the underdog in the middle of her Transition. Con: she's still the Dread Empress with schemes upon schemes, resources to burn, and the ability to put Cat into the underdog position.

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't think Arthur will become the Black Knight. Here we have a young Hero who was attacked by a Villain and saved at the last moment by his definitely-not-mentor. It's more likely he will receive a Heroic Name, not necessarily White Knight.

Snappy

A point can be made for both white and black knights. Cat is the squire's patron and mentor and so he could become her black knight to her something name.

Or Hannon is going through a crisis of faith atm questioning his role and therefore his name. He could become something else and squire then takes his spot.

Liliet

I doubt he'd be Black Knight, but I can easily see him transitioning into a flavor of Paladin, or something like "Royal Knight".

Miley

Arthur literally can't become a black knight. He doesn't have the temperament of a villainous role.

Benjamin

Hmmm. This could have gone far, far worse for Cat. Also, the enemy can use Twilight? Since when? Did I miss something?

Burlyraven

Anybody living and magically gifted can use Twilight, and some exploratory Names can find gaps in reality. Permanent gates can also be made that only require an offering to open. Those are the only limits on access.

Liliet

*Anybody not DK's puppet can use it.

Shveiran

Anybody living can walk in it without combusting, but magic (or Names) are required to access the Ways.

Though the Praesi being mostly alive and having a lot of magic around, I suppose it isn't a surprise.

Liliet

Praesi are the most sorcerous nation on the continent. It's really, really not a surprise.

laguz24

It's not like twilight is something that is a secret, the grand alliance has been using it regularly. Plus malacia has the magical and espionage resources to steal, reverse engineer, or develop a way to use twilight in the time twilight has been active which has been around a few years by this point.

ohJohN

I had this exact same question! I started rereading during the hiatus and I'm getting close to the birth of Twilight, but I definitely remember Book V the least – I had the vague notion that there were some restrictions limiting its use to Grand Alliance members, or something along those lines. In retrospect, it would be incongruously short-sighted of everyone involved to bind access to a new plane of existence to something as fleeting as a wartime coalition of nations 😊.

Liliet

Also, probably not possible.

aurikdomi

I don't know Liliet that sounds very age of wonders to me, binding great power to something flimsy. (I enjoy the picture of the hell eggs as being like actual eggs, a kid with a stick could mess up the runes keeping the demon contained hence the need to hide them away behind more substantial) or flying fortresses or whatnot.

Liliet

Well, maybe if it was Cordelia giving her crown to shape it, but it was Pilgrim. He's not really so Grand Alliance-y as to be able to bake it into the bones of the realm.

Miley

The only thing that ever stopped people was the danger.

It's a lot safer to travel now that the courts are missing their crowns.

Liliet

Oh no, Arcadia's still full of pointy fae. There's a united court now.

Twilight, now...

Burlyraven

I think this is the most dangerous part of Nim having a Name. The ogres are reclusive normally, but it's very likely they take pride in her status, and Legion recruitment numbers have been on the up lately, if I had to guess.

Sicking Arthur on Nim is both a brilliant and terrible idea. The rule of three basically says that if he can survive, he'll kill her, and get a Name out of it, but it's the aftermath that worries me. Evidence says he's too natural of a Hero to do something like take the Black Knight title for himself, and Hanno's claim on White Knight was already kind of dodgy. I can't say for certain what will happen, but it just feels like Cat's going to be making a shocked Pikachu face when the dust settles on that.

Earl of Purple

Ogres are rare and inbred with fertility issues. I doubt the Hall of Skulls is sending more ogres than usual into the Legions, and whoever rules the ogres would send equal amounts to Sepulchral as well. They stay as neutral as they can, always. It's why Cat had Hune, keep an ogre close to all powers that might end up in the Tower.

Zach

I'm a little confused about people who keep saying Arthur will "get a Name" out of his Rule of Three with Black Knight Nim; as far as I'm aware there's nothing in the story that ever implies that a Rule of Three results in someone getting a Name. Catherine had one and it didn't cause her to change Names from Square.

Burlyraven

He's not getting a Name from the rule of three, he's getting a Name from being a Squire locked in a rule of three with a Knight. Pretty old story.

Adrian V

MMM what if the aspect is Conscript?

And do the 2 kids have any aspects already (and how i laugh at Cat calling them kids, i wish Saint was still around to hear her/ or just notice it).

Malicia doesn't have a handle on Cat personality or capabilities, or rather she has an old one and refuses to acknowledge that she has grown and learned too much, part of it is that she has no way to know about Cat absorbing Bard's instincts but most is still her underestimating her.

Liliet

Malicia has a solid handle on Cat's personality actually, she's missing details but everyone is.

Her problem is she's overconfident in her assessment. It's good but it's not as good as she's acting like it is.

Oshi

I agree Malicia has a solid handle on Cat before the war and certainly before the Underdark. I don't believe she understands all of the changes Cat has gone through since returning or has an accurate assessment of how it shapes her.

Shveiran

I agree with Oshi, especially after the Prologue. Reading people is one of Malicia's best skills, but it looks... off with Cat.

I mean, she thought Catherine would settle down after the Night of Knives, whereas I think Winter Cat was more than a little likely to start dropping lava on Ater if the Everdark was shut on her fingers and she went back to square one. Let alone now, thinking she'd allow her enemy to comfortably harass her supply line...

shikkarasu

I have been waiting for Deputize/Conscript for years. I was expecting it to show up in some Paladin's bag of tricks. Great for desperate last stands. The enemy charge up the hill with their mages and their 10:1 odds and then oops, all Named.

Silverking

Malicia may be Story-blind, but she has honed the skill of “being too costly to mess with” down to a fine edge. So, if the person you were threatening with a siege gets both the hostages AND the gold while knowing your food is running out, how do you flip the script?

...Well, I don't know, but Cat does.

Shveiran

Well, you make the conflict become something other than a siege.

I don't know how she'll do it, but all these considerations about food and gold are only really relevant so long as the Army of Callow is stuck outside the walls. As soon as they can get through, they regain an overwhelming advantage.

The D

She is going to set it on fire, of course. Accidentally.

Konstantin von Karstein

Cat, Indrani and 2 other people are going to infiltrate the city and do... something?

The D

She is going to set it on fire, of course. Accidentally.

Snappy

It was implied that they were going to rob Wolof of their magical libraries.

They are aiming to humiliate malica by weakening her biggest ally. Robbing them of magic, food and money but not actually taking the city cause that would take too long.

This hopefully convinces her other allies to stop supporting her.

Shveiran

How they'll do that without Thief, I do not know.

But I want to find out.

Liliet

Indrani and Cat both have sticky fingers tendencies, and we don't know Vivienne isn't coming with.

Shveiran

It was more about the lack of bag of holding than the fingers.

Aside from the fact that Vivienne doesn't have one anymore, I doubt Cat will bring her along for a dangerous mission in enemy territory. Viv just isn't Band of Five material anymore, it would be an incredible risk for no real gain. She is a human politician (with infiltration training) now, and she is too valuable to risk.

Liliet

Night functions as a bag of holding for Cat actually. Maybe not sun-sized or river fleet-sized, but

Shveiran

It did, yeah, so maybe that's it. We still don't know how much the scale of her powers was affected.

Miley

You steal all the enemys food before they realize they need to close their gates and then make the enemy ruler eat their own fingers in front of you before selling them a bit of food back for the gold they stole from you.

One thing I think we're forgetting is Cat never intended to siege wolof. The plan was always to misdirect, raid, and move on.

Aston Whiteman

I'm waiting for Cat to allow a technological advancement by the Tower so the gnomes fly in and nuke everywhere.

Just one more letter...

Miley

They'll nuke the whole continent.

308924810a

Huh, ogres are hard to kill, so garbing them in antimagic/ enhanced durability armor makes them immune to nearly everything but munitions. An interesting addition to my understanding of fantasy tactics in this setting.

I might not entirely agree with the way Twilight is used or with some of the assumptions around the war of the dead, but the tactical scenarios remain interesting.

Konstantin von Karstein

Could you elaborate on the Ways' use and the war North?

308924810a

My issues with the war north:

The choice to cut a pair of trenches across the length of the continent is of dubious value, even if they have a perfect knowledge of where all the attacking undead are at all times it's still impossible to prevent them from bypassing those forces trying to defend the trench by using their superior numbers and superior in-reality marching speed/endurance to get to places where the defending force isn't present, cross and flank them.

While yes the Romans occasionally dug long trenches to help cover their foraging parties against the raids of hostile foraging parties, that mostly only had a psychological effect on discouraging enemy raiders/reducing the angles cavalry could approach from without dismounting to make a bridge with wood, and it was only possible to achieve any practical combat advantage from these when the area was utterly saturated with troops, and your own force is at least as numerous and fast-marching as the enemy. Similarly they only got to take advantage of trenches that fail to completely surround the defender either when their enemy were acting like overaggressive idiots, or when they were only trying to make attacks from certain directions look less practical to tempt the enemy to fight on a different angle.

You could maybe get some benefit from a pair of trenches cut across the continent by making them close together and cut by further trenches into a series of squares small enough that a patrol could defend one of them, but even then the value is dubious and the Grand Alliance gets the same function out of the wagon fortresses we've been shown them using.

The primary concern when trying to prevent enemy leakers is in detection, which would be achieved through ground scouting, scrying/counterscrying superiority, and flying scouts. If you're willing to intercept them at any point along the length of the front and into either your own, or the enemy's depth, instead of committing yourselves to trying to block them all at a linear point of depth along the front, the strategic repositoning speed advantage of Twilight is easier to bring into play(as opposed to the lesser strategic but greater tactical advantage of undead being able to march double time for days without tiring), and with that advantage and a skilled and quick command loop it becomes possible to drastically outnumber them in every skirmish.

This in turn incentivises concentration again and moves the war away from a linear army structure and back into an atomic army structure as the enemy stops scattering into groups of a few hundred or thousand like what Raiza Tenjin fought that one time when he lost a relative, and instead the undead concentrate either in forces that are too big to be outnumbered, or behind extensive fortifications, or in tiny groups of probably less than fifty, hoping to escape notice as they infiltrate.

And I know the obvious response to the way I've structured my argument is 'that's exactly what they were trying to prevent with the trenches', but that's my point, it shouldn't work. The trenches aren't enough fortification to allow a present Grand Alliance force to stall much against an equal or superior force, and the ability to stop small enemy patrols and raids should work or fail on information regardless of style of fortification.

That's not to say that trenches have no place. They're very useful for defending fortresses and temporary camps, and alongside tricks like breaking dykes or building dams to flood an area, or cutting down trees and sharpening branches to make Abbatis, they can be used to block the likely lines of advance for large armies and make the enemy slow down and bunch up in front of ranged weapons.

So while leakers should only be blocked by information superiority, large armies should really only be slowed by a mix of repeated obstacles and firing positions along their path of advance. But the firing positions needs to be well-defended enough that random patrols ranging slightly ahead of the advancing army can't just clear them without at all slowing the army (and the firing positions needs to be there covering blockages to prevent random patrols from clearing them/filling the trench in dozens of places every day, only one of which the enemy main army will push through.) In practise this means building something like the lines of Torres Vedas, where you've got a bunch of small forts overlooking likely angles of approach that have been blocked. In PGtE I think the ideal form of tiny cheap fort capable of stalling large enemy forces might be something like a small hill with the edges removed to make a cliff edge by digging, lake-dropping erosion, or a combination of the two, to prevent sheer weight of numbers from overwhelming an undermanned shooting position. A wooden Palisade on top to provide cover in an exchange of missile weapons and advantage against climbers, and a defensible underground barracks and associated tunnels to provide cover against giant monsters and let them pull tricks on hostile Revenants like dropping ceiling slabs on them or trapping them in front of a Balistae in a hallway too narrow to dodge in (bonus points if it's still possible to shoot at the army outside from within the tunnels, more bonus points for the underground section if the limited number of accesses makes it easier to ward against swarms), wards against swarms, and preferably some sort of hidden tunnel or access to Twilight/dimensional shortcut that allows the fort garrison to evacuate or receive reinforcements after being surrounded(necessary if these places are going to have mages or Priests assigned to them, those are in short supply and hard to replace).

While I think that design would be the cheapest for an army-staller semi-traditional fantasy-style fortresses would still have a role where preexisting or where the terrain is unsuited to just cutting the edges off a hill.

And in any case it's probably too expensive to put more than one(though possibly two or three) of these obstruction/fortress combos along each of the likely paths of an enemy advance.

TLDR: I don't like how fortification is handled, it clashes with my understanding of what fortifications can actually accomplish.

Another issue I have with the war north/Ways use is that it's never mentioned whether them not conducting constant raids into the enemy depth, all the way past the other shore of the lakes to outnumber and crush isolated groups is just because it hasn't occurred to anyone that this should be a priority, or whether it not happening constantly and in great prevalence is a defeat the Dead King has inflicted on the Grand Alliance by constantly keeping the pressure on and preventing them from having the forces to spare/keeping them from getting enough information/scouting opportunities to find his forces. Still it's unclear why a bunch of small armies can't just lurk in areas of Twilight adjacent to enemy territory sending out scouts and pouncing on anything isolated they see, again making the enemy's situation awkward as they're forced to only move around in very large groups.

Cat's explanation of why they can't resupply through Twilight: a need to have mages or Priests, with every caravan eventually taking up all of the mages and priests they need for other things, has too many unresolved logical flaws. Why does there need to be a gate-capable caster with every group? Can't they just keep them with the army and the source of the supply caravans, with the gates with the army opening at predetermined time ranges and locations and the caravan finding them?

If there strictly needs to be a gate-capable caster with every group that goes in for some reason or if Twilight is too chronologically or locationally imprecise for that, what about building twilight-side supply depots ahead of time near the independent path of an offensive, and leaving hidden markers in reality so an army on the march can know where to cross over to scout around in Twilight and find their supply depot?

Also I feel like removing the Pilgrim's resurrection aspect, not introducing another hero with any similar skill, and failing to acknowledge that the Dead King, as the foremost Necromancer of the age and a guy who should have former healer Named among his Revenants, can probably reconstruct or repair any Revenant that falls in battle, so long as the soul and ravaged body make it back to him, was a wasted opportunity where we could have gotten to examine some of the really fantastical aspects of Named conflict in the setting, in that killing a combatant isn't always permanent.

308924810a

Edit: I mean we've already examined how people don't always stay dead, ever since the Liesse rebellion arc.

What I'm trying to convey would be interesting is that once you have enough Named organized there should be ways of cheating death that apply to them all and can make average forms of death cheap.

So in response Named would take on even riskier or overtly suicidal actions out of the belief that they are important enough to be brought back from it and their sacrifice would be useful, or become traumatized from repeatedly dying, or be established as being justified in being fearless of death, only to have the enemy deploy a more irreversible form of killing or to capture them alive to torture or cripple them.

Miley

Can't they just keep them with the army and the source of the supply caravans, with the gates with the army opening at predetermined time ranges and locations and the caravan finding them?

This makes me doubt your claims of knowing anything about how military operations work. No, the supply caravans would all starve to death with this approach.

308924810a

I'm not sure how you think the supply caravans moving through Twilight would starve to death. They'd be moving the same distance over the same time as an army traveling through Twilight.

So if armies don't starve to death in transit neither should caravans.

Did you think that the issue is that they wouldn't know where to go to get out of Twilight?

Or do you think the issue is that the army won't open ways out for them at the scheduled times? I mean sure that could happen if they're under attack or all their gate casters were killed, but at that point either the loss of caster means that the army is soon to be lost to swarms, or the army can open a gate in the scheduled place at an UN-scheduled, later, time and give the pack animals on the other side a way out.

While if none of the ways intended to allow them to join with the army work the supply caravans can just turn back and head for their point of origin(which would presumably be a permanent gate in this scenario).

Maybe with a day or two tacked on to a journey for caravans as it turns out that the army has not reached the intended destinations at the intended times and there is a need to repeatedly have someone with the army pop into Twilight and either scry the caravan or send out a rider to carry a message, and the caravan is repeatedly re-directed to the new planned destination.

Or the caravan reaches the location at the planned time, but the army is a day late and they have to wait for them to catch up and open an interdimensional door.

Or the army is there on time, but someone breaks an axle midway through Twilight and then they're probably stuck unloading what they can on the other carts and leaving broken carts in Twilight in order to make their time window.

violentink

Twilight is definitionally a liminal and transitory realm. So yeah, it's too chronologically and locationally imprecise for any of the stuff you're talking about. I imagine it would reject any permanent colonisation like a supply depot as well.

Liliet

What trenches?

Konstantin von Karstein

A lot of very good points. Maybe you should sent them to EE so he could maybe try to edit things a bit?:)

Shveiran

Uh.

On one hand, it's so cool to see Cat on the right side of a Pattern of Three for once, that would be a very satisfying reversal.

Also, this is what I was talking about, Nim: you got a neat trick, but you just earned a defeat in a Pattern without even noticing and for no lasting gain.

You are green, and you're gonna lose.

On the other hand, I'm somewhat miffed that they could shut down the Army's wards.

I mean, sure, Praes, trismegistan magic, yadda yadda.
But these wards were developed by the Arsenal and held up against the Hidden Horror, so the idea the Tower has an artefact that can just shut them down feels... kind of wrong.

Unless of course this is a plot point and Akua sabotaged them as part as the false betrayal, or something like that.

agumentic

I can guarantee you that DK himself could break those wards without even noticing them. They are a mass-produced work aimed at keeping away mass-produced works and normal magicians, the Tower having an artefact to bypass them is not strange at all.

Shveiran

Uh... no? Do you remember the battles in the last book? The wards were the foundation of the Alliance's strategies. If Neshamah could shut them down at will he would have.

Unless you mean in person? Then sure. But if he couldn't by proxy, it feels odd to me that the Tower can do so willy nilly.

308924810a

I mean, he had a spike that wouldn't just break them, but would catastrophically break them. And is allied to the tower, suppose he shared the design and some Praesi made an improvement on it, or this ward-breaker isn't normal mage-produced modern equipment, but is something produced as a masterwork by a past Named Warlock.

Possibly even Weska, given his specialties. All the Calamities made contingencies against eachother and collaborated in making it possible for the others to stop or kill them if they were subverted(ie, Masego willingly wearing the Goblinfire boobytrap), suppose Weska's counter against himself involved making ward-breaking artefacts and sticking them in the Tower vault.

Liliet

Wekesa.

And his contingency was entrusted to personally Amadeus, not Malicia, let alone whoever-has-the-Tower. Wekesa and Masego would not have been imprecise about that.

Still, yeah – Malicia has the same advantage Kairos did, which is to say insane variety of insane craftings in the vault.

Shveiran

He did have that spike, but that particular weakness was countered by the Arsenal, so that angle was covered.

The thing is, magic moves forward; it's not quite like science, because a lot of warlocks hoard secrets, but it moves forward. We have it on record that the Principate in the Uncivil Wars used scrying techniques that were "twenty years old" and that was implied to be obsolete.

And the utmost Praesi expert in wards in contemporary years was... well, Wekesa; who until very very late in his career would not have had any reason not to share with his son all he could. And even then, I doubt he gave the Tower something like a "list of ward secrets my son doesn't know".

What I'm saying is, I can buy that the Tower has magical superiority on a lot of things. I have a harder time buying that they have counters to the specific developments the Arsenal focused on (namely, wards and anti-undead spells).

If they have artefacts that can shut that down, I don't really buy they have enough to waste one on something that is not a crippling blow.

Endless active artefacts (summon a demon, bring down the sky, turn an army into a purple tapir commando), sure. But artefacts that interfere with spells designed centuries later? That's like Tesla having a counter for GPS systems.

Liliet

I mean, they probably have MILLENIA of once-a-generation-genius artefacts stored away. A lead sheet is a counter for GPS systems if you know to use it, and you know what's a better counter? Dynamite. Counters everything.

beleester

The new Black Knight introduced themselves not by crushing people in open battle, but by leading a well-planned commando raid. She definitely learned something from her predecessor.

boballab

No she didn't. Black would have never fought a Squire unless he knew he was there and had a planned attack that would have had the Squire fight one of the other Calamities. If Black stumbled onto Squire like Nim did he would have immediately retreated so that a pattern of 3 could not form because he knew it would go against him being a big NAME villian.

308924810a

Or he would deliberately lose the first encounter between the two of them.

sengachi

Yeah this is Malicia's brilliance showing here, not anything learned from Amadeus.

Liliet

I mean, the military brilliance is most definitely not Malicia's.

Aduro95

And in that sentence, in the anger – the unspoken urge to do better next time, the certainty that there would be a next time – I saw an opportunity. A tool. And I was enough of a monster to make use of it, even when I was using a boy barely more than a child.

"So prepare yourself," I challenged. "Train. Make tactics."

Anyone else reminded of Ca making her first Pattern of Three?

I could kill him. Right now, right here, I knew deep in my bones that I could kill him. I might not be able to the next time we met, but this once the story's flow was in my favour. It was tempting, but at the edge of my mind I could make out a path. It was a dark one, strewn with ruin and the death of innocents, but hadn't I stopped pretending to be on the side of the Heavens the moment I'd taken the knife?

"Prove it," I rasped. "If you want your way to beat mine, then come at me again. Properly. Earn your Name, hero. Run and hide and muster your armies in the dark. Make deals you'll regret until you have nothing left to bargain with. I'll be waiting for you, on the other side of that battlefield."

Book 1 Chapter 12: Squire

boballab

Everyone is caught up in the Black Knight/Squire pattern that it doesn't seem anyone noticed Cat's NAME got stronger and her ROLE was shown: she is a coming into something that bends stories like the Bard does. Her boost didn't come into she realized that Squire was in that spot due to Creation putting him there and she could use it.

sengachi

Mhmmm. Yeah Cat, you totally saved Squire totally for his utility in killing Nim. And for no other reason.

308924810a

What I question is why the exchange of prisoners and hold didn't happen simultaneously, as should be expected between parties who don't trust each other.

Was it a display of largesse by Sargon?(to be willing to instantly spend gold at even the chance of saving his people, though I'd think Praesi would view that as sign of gullibility or weakness)

Or was Sargon in on this attempt to score political points off of Catherine from the beginning, contributing to the plan to set up situations where she has to choose between looking weak or dishonorable?(and letting Malicia test which of her weird dichotomy of views of Catherine her perceptions and advisors have been feeding her is correct. She's been hearing people assuming that there's something sick or insane in Catherine, and that she might start dropping lakes on Praesi cities, and has been countering that view with her own assumptions that Catherine is willing to make a deal, neither of which is strictly accurate.)

308924810a

Edit: prisoners and GOLD

Miley

Exchanges between parties who don't trust each other are only simultaneous in bad Hollywood scenarios.

postal.pacifist@gmail.com

In reality, exchanges between parties who don't trust each other are kept to small sums, but not simultaneous unless it's just more convenient that way.

miles

Gods damn it ee please help.

Liliet

Because Sargon has a lot to gain from booby-trapping gold / raiding to get it back immediately, while the value of his soldiers to Catherine is ONLY the ransom / reputational effects she can milk the situation for. There's every reason for HER to not trust HIM, but no basis for the reverse, and implying otherwise could be taken as a separate offense she'd make him pay for.

sengachi

I love how amazingly this chapter showcases the blind spot which will get Malicia killed while still making her be an incredibly competent and scary opponent.

She just organized, on basically no notice, a Named strike into an enemy camp with a hundred artifact-aided ogre heavies and mages using an incredibly modern and recent form of transportation. The raid took heavy losses but this is Praes, so par for the course. Given the degree of opposition they accomplished all goals to the greatest anticipatable degree, crippling Cat's ability to lay siege to Wolof (through information gained), limiting her operations capacity, striking an economic blow, and putting Cat in a terrible political position to boot. All of which required detailed military intelligence to pull off and was probably put into motion the moment Cat set foot outside Wolof, given how quickly it was pulled off.

That's terrifying. That's just terrifying.

If this were any other magical war fantasy story this whole thing would be an unequivocal disaster for Cat and the prospect of facing more strikes like that in the future would be terrifying.

But in this story there are Heroic roles and stories which Malicia is just not as good at Amadeus at predicting. And so she is screwed. She basically signed her Black Knight's death warrant, sending her (even through a half-power proxy) to raid a camp the young Squire was in.

To use a chess metaphor, Malicia traded some unimportant pawns of her own for some of Cat's strategically important pawns. But without realizing it, because she doesn't full understand the rules of Heroic warfare, she put a timer on her queen which ensures it'll just fall over at the worst possible moment for her.

benthelynx

There is a groove in stories where the one who tells the hero to 'train so next time you can win' dies. It's got mentor crossover. I hope something comes of that little slip :p

Liliet

Especially when the mentor is a reluctant one who keeps insisting they are doing things NOT out of attachment to their student but for completely unrelated pragmatic reasons, but secretly has a heart of gold.

Denial kills villains, Catherine. Please, please stop.

Shveiran

Yeah, but that trope is part of the student's story. The Squire just doesn't have enough weight to drag the Black Queen into it unless she makes the Squire pivotal to her own.

Things are just... so much larger than Arthur Foundling. And so long as they stay that way, Catherine is safe.

Liliet

Unfortunately this trope centers on the Mentor's personal internal journey from denial to acceptance and eventual self-sacrifice.

Also, Arthur Foundling has HELLA weight. He's Callow's first hero since the Liesse Rebellion, and visibly following in Catherine's footsteps as a Laure Foundling Squire. There's that sword, too. Creation is paying him plenty of attention.

Shveiran

Compared to the average squire, sure! That is simply not enough weight to compare.

Take Hainaut as an example. It was a pivotal moment for the largest war on the continent since time immemorial, and the Squire (a martial Name) was present. His contribution was killing a nameless Ravenant.

Do you see what I mean?

He is a scrappy orphan with a tragic background and lots of ideals and YES, that means a lot of potential, but he is coming late to the party.

If he survives, he'll be the veteran in whatever band he'll lead after the colossal war, but he doesn't have enough weight to be important DURING the war.

There are too many stories here, and he is bound to none. You know who is bound to most? Catherine Foundling.

Now, maybe, in time, Arthur may acquire bonds to more stories. Of course. But that won't happen unless Catherine starts referring to him as "the son I never had" because the only way that can happen in time for him to matter in the war is through her.

Which is why she's being careful.

Of course Creation is paying him attention! It just takes time for that to amount to shit. One day, maybe he'll grab that blade and cut down the Black Queen in a tragic showdown filled with "I-can't-and-yet-I-must", but that won't happen for years yet, for the same reasons why Warlock one-shot the Bumbling Conjuror. There is such a thing as playing out of your league.

Liliet

There is such a thing as... uh... like, you know how Harry Potter was a baby when he killed Voldemort? He didn't actually DO anything, he just was there and Voldemort killed himself against him because of his own character flaws.

That's what would happen to Cat if she ends up denying that she cares about the Squire until she sacrifices herself to save him because n000000!

boballab

Cat is trying to walk the line that Black did for her...without actually setting up one of her friends in her place. That is what happened to Black, he used Saba for most of Cat's training and thought he was the Story driven death coming and the Bard exploited that.

Liliet

Black didn't really do that. Sabah trained Cat some, but she didn't die as Cat's mentor. She died as the person who was best loved by everyone involved, in the "beginning of the end" way.

ninegardens

The "Sacrificial Lion" as it were... which just works even better with her in Beast mode.

Chapter 6: Retaliation

"And so a great host came to stand before the Sererian Walls, led by four kings and three queens who meant to raise Aslam Isbili as king over Wolof. Their envoys were scorned by High Lady Akua of the Sahelians, and so in great anger did they storm her walls. Seven times and one was the army driven back, broken by sorcery until corpses stood tall as hills. Only then did High Lady Akua answer the envoys, speaking thus: 'Have you come to win a crown, or lose seven?'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Ruin, twenty-fifth of the Secret Histories of Praes

There were eleven different secret passages into the city of Wolof and all of them were traps.

Akua had told me that one of her distant ancestors, after discovering several made by disloyal vassals aiming to overthrow the Sahelians, had decided instead of walling them up to make several more. High Lord Kofi had then seeded rumours about their existence, fake traitors and secret scrolls, and sat back waiting for all his enemies to come at him by where he'd see them coming. The number of passages had grown over the years as people outwitted Sahelians for a time, but in the wake of those victories the family always reclaimed the fresh weakness and added it to their centuries-old ploy. I'd been halfway to admiring High Lord Kofi, until Akua noted he was also famous for his habit of throwing one of his cousins in a maze every summer solstice. Along with starved lions. It kept everyone on their toes, he'd claimed.

Praesi.

If there were no secret passages to use and storming the walls was too costly for us, then that left us few options to enter the city. Sneaking in as part of a delegation had been considered, but we'd be watched like hawks and likely kept under wards the whole time. Assuming we weren't just betrayed. Pickler had narrowed in on the aqueduct that fed the city as our way in, but her suggestion had been... overly bold. She'd wanted us to cut the water and send in goblins with munitions through the stone channel. They'd blow their way through the wards at the end and we'd funnel troops into that foothold by the dry aqueduct, taking enough of the city by surprise that Sargon was forced to either negotiate or suffer a sack. Problem was, I had my doubts that we could secure that foothold.

The aqueduct whose source was deep in the Jinon Hills was squatted over by the fortress of the same name, then whipped across the valley in straight line, but welcoming it into Wolof was yet another set of fortifications. The Sahelians weren't fools, they'd known the running water was the weakness in their wards. The place was fortified thoroughly and garrisoned through day and night: even if we did take the soldiers there by surprise, I figured it was a toss up whether we'd win the fight. And if we lost it, well, that'd get bloody. So a somewhat quieter way in was needed, which had led me to our current scheme. Namely, my old Everdark crew resurrected for one more jaunt: a more subtle infiltration of the city through the same weakness Pickler had identified.

I'd needed the Concocter to make it feasible, since without the ability to breathe in water that was a very long swim, but those vials and ransacking through the remains of the old Sudden Abjuration project had gotten me the right tools. Cordelia had been the one to most benefit from the emptying of the Arsenal, since she'd been able to take all the half-finished projects and throw them at the Dead King on various fronts, but taking the Concocter east had paid dividends for me. I knew the First Prince appreciated me not drawing too heavy on the pool of heavy hitters among Named, too. She'd not be so grateful if she knew I'd not shortchanged myself in the slightest, simply picking mine for stories instead of raw war potential. The Barrow Sword so that I could tie him up with the Blood, all of Ranger's surviving pupils for when it inevitably came to blows with her, two kids approaching the time of their transition into a more settled Named – hanging swords I could bring down, pulling at the right strings. It was a pretty little arsenal, though it would not be of use here in Wolof.

No, here it was an older company that'd be taking the field again.

"I'd always imagined that if I crossed the Sererian Walls again it would either be as Empress or as bones," Akua said, eyeing the shape of the city in the distance.

"Well, you're slightly bones," Indrani mused. "You know, in a poetic sense."

"Ah, bones," the woman who had once been the heiress to Wolof drawled. "Those famously incorporeal body parts."

She made her shape turn shadowy for a moment to hammer the point home before returning to her usual guise.

"Poetry's all about metaphors, Heirloom Haunt," Indrani sneered. "It's a mark of your inferior education you don't know that."

Akua's face creased with what appeared to be genuine outrage.

"You were raised in the woods," she replied.

"I guess it must just be the gap between our natural talents, then," Indrani airily replied.

"There was a time where I would have had had you drowned for that sentence," Akua noted.

"Well," Indrani said, eyeing the aqueduct. "Day's young. Give it a shot."

Idly, I wondered if it was too late to replace one of them by Hakram. Sure, given how much metal he wore these days he'd swim about as well as a rock but I was having to weigh the prospect of dragging him along the bottom the whole time against at least a day of this.

Convenience narrowly won out.

"All right, let's get this going," I said. "The timing will get tricky if we linger."

I got a mocking salute from Archer and a graceful nod of acknowledgement from Akua, sparing one last look for the distant shape of Wolof before I left. The ramparts up here did have an amazing view during the day. We headed down into the belly of the beast, and I split from them to have a short conversation with the commander leading the garrison. He confirmed that Hierophant was already getting started on his ritual, which meant we needed to get going. I ordered him to get the gears moving and followed my companions below, to the source feeding the aqueduct.

It was bare-bones, for such a crucial location, a cube of stone split in the middle by a rectangular 'river' that fed into the channel that would lead all the way to Wolof. The water actually came from further out, an underground spring deep in the hills, and this room had been raised for maintenance purposes. The stone conduct on raised steles – Pickler had commented unkindly on the way the Sahelians had been forced to fortify the stone with enchantments to compensate for not using arches the way the Miezens had – was dotted with warded "hatches" on the ceiling through which mages-engineers could enter to have a look at any blockage or foulness, but it wouldn't help the three of us: there wasn't enough space between the top of the channel and the water for anyone to be able to breathe reliably.

I would have been able to get around that with Night, probably by making a bubble around myself that let in air but not water, but the garrison would have seen us coming if we did. It would have tripped half a dozen wards on the aqueduct and destroying those would have tripped further defences. No, to go in quietly the solution was the water breathing potion. The three of us did a last check on our equipment before going into the water, professionalism finally shining through. Archer had been forced to abandon her usual bow, as it would be too large as well as enchanted, so she had a simple waxed shortbow with the backup strings stashed in a watertight bag along with her arrows. I'd shed the Mantle of Woe for this, settling for a simple grey cloak over my usual sword and armour.

Akua's clothes were sedate, and what she carried was not equipment meant for herself. The Concocter had finished the last of the ten bags of evanescent powder I'd requested half a bell ago, and they'd been brought straight here. The shade had them all, held in segmented bags held by complicated knots. One pull at the right place and they'd spread out while the bags opened, which was our way in. Sudden Abjuration had been the Arsenal project to create an alchemical substance capable of mimicking the effects of holy water. We'd never managed to make one that'd make it affordable to go through with the plan behind the project, turning all the lakes between us and the Dead King into holy water, but we'd had some successes nonetheless.

The evanescent powder, for one, would wash out active sorcery on contact. Like wards and enchantments trying to keep us out of Wolof.

"Everyone ready?" I asked.

"Bit of a swim without the potion, Cat," Archer grinned.

I rolled my eye, then glanced at Akua.

"At your disposal, my heart," she said.

"You should be more like her," I told Indrani.

She let a deeply insulted gasp, as I'd known she would, and I shoved a small glass vial into her hand. I'd thought about throwing it, but I was not going to roll the dice on this entire operation just to be flippant. It'd taken the Concocter long enough to make four doses – two to enter, two to leave – that I was not going to risk it all just before we left. I took out my own vial, glancing at the pale blue liquid inside. It looked almost milk-like, which was not appetizing in the slightest given the hue. I uncorked it and raised the vial in a toast that Indrani met, and it was bottoms up for the both of us. The entire thing tasted foul, like chalk cut with refuse, but I forced myself to swallow. I breathed in a few times, trying to get myself used to it.

On the surface it didn't feel like anything changed, but my lungs felt... heavier. Like something had grown.

"We only have an hour," I said. "Let's not waste it."

I went first, even though I wasn't the strongest swimmer – Indrani – as I saw best in the dark. And it was only moments before it was all pitch black, all the worst parts of swimming and crawling in a tunnel put together. A few strokes forward and already my lungs were burning, and I find myself fighting breathing in the water even though in principle I knew that I'd survive it. I ended up swallowing it all in a gulp, but the water didn't go any further than my mouth: a thin membrane had sprouted and it served as a filter, letting through air and not water. It was uncomfortable, unnatural even, but it worked so I grit my teeth and kept swimming forward. I could feel Akua right behind me, patiently waiting.

Shades didn't need to breathe, which at the moment I felt to be somewhat unfair.

Like most adventures, it didn't feel all that exciting as we did it. It was work, tiresome swimming through a tunnel-like channel of fresh water. I was wet and cold and my arms quickly grew tired. Now and then we encountered small lights as we passed under maintenance hatches in the stone, which were warded instead of sealed tight, but aside from that it was swimming forward in a gentle, almost unnoticeable slope. It was hard to tell how long it took us. We'd estimated half an hour at a brisk pace, maybe three quarters of an hour in practice, and my finely detailed sixth sense telling me how close I was to dawn and dusk helped measure how long we were taking.

We were slower than anticipated, so we had about a quarter hour left before the potion ran when we finally arrived at the gatehouse. I gestured for the other two to stop, studying the steel grid in front of us. The builders of this gatehouse had been faced with a problem when raising it, namely that you couldn't actually raise wards over running water. There were wards on both sides of the channel I could see going into the gatehouse, a large stone room where I could glimpse torchlight through the water's surface. In the water itself, though, the Sahelians had been forced to instead use three enchanted metal grids to prevent infiltrators going through.

That was our opening, actually. As with all fortresses, its true weakness was not in the walls or the gates but in the petty demands of maintenance. In this case, should debris large enough to go through the bars of one grid got stuck on the bars of another grid there needed to actually be a way for someone to get it out. Preferably without, you know, this turning into a major undertaking involving knocking down walls or parts of the aqueduct. So the builders had put 'doors' in the grids, large enough for a small person to swim through if they held themselves horizontally. Those doors were held fast with very physical steel padlocks and more eldritch keyed enchantments, and they were our way into the city of Wolof.

Archer swam forward, elbowing me in our narrow confines, and had a close look at the pair of padlocks on the door. She offered me a nod, which was a relief. She believed she'd be physically strong to pry those open using her Name, then. Tempting as it would have been for her to try it, we couldn't afford to right now: the damn things were enchanted to glow if anyone touched them. Sahelian paranoia was truly inspiring. The two of us awkwardly made room for Akua to swim past us, which she did with unearthly elegance in the middle of this cramped hellhole, and golden eyes met mine to ask for the permission to begin. I nodded and the shade turned her back to the grids before pulling at the right rope, releasing all the knots holding closed the bags of evanescent powder.

It wasn't all that flashy a sight: the pale powders spread out in great clouds that faded quickly, and then the only sign they'd been used was that the water looked slightly thicker. The current guided it down, past all three grids and then beyond. Akua withdrew without a word, making room for Archer, and I clenched my fists as I watched her dart forward. After an agonizing moment she closed her fingers around the padlock and nothing happened at all. No glow, no alarm. I grinned. It'd worked. Indrani ripped open the padlocks methodically and swam through the door to get working on the second grid. Even after the unpleasantly long swim, I now felt full of energy: I took my sword off my belt, pulling it close so it wouldn't get in my way when I swam through.

Ahead, Indrani broke the last padlocks and I was gesturing for Akua to go ahead when I caught sight of shapes moving above the water. Hissing in dismay I flattened myself against the side of the channel, Akua doing the same behind me, but it was Archer in danger of being discovered. If she'd been in the dark she would have been fine, but moments later a long wooden staff was plunged into the waters and I saw that at its head was a stone enchanted to glow with light. Indrani had moved before she could be seen, hiding on the side of the wall in the dead angle, but the grid... I started with surprise. Oh, that canny wench. While I'd been panicking, she'd put the padlocks she'd broken on the last door back. They were still busted, but she'd hung them at an angle where it was hard to see.

There was the indistinct sound of people talking, at least three voices, and one seemed to be mocking another. The staff was suddenly withdrawn and I sagged in relief. If it'd come to a fight here, it might have gotten ugly. We waited as long as I dared, far after the voices had gotten distant. Our last quarter hour was thinning out dangerously and there was still more swimming ahead of us, so reluctantly I gave the signal again. Archer opened us the path through and we got moving, myself last and hanging the padlocks behind me as I closed the doors so that it would be hard to tell we'd passed. We had an even better cover for our tracks coming, but best not to get sloppy.

Hugging the bottom of the channel we went past the open channel in the torchlit room, into a squeezing tight tunnel that dropped downwards precipitously. Barely swimming at that point, I let myself be dragged forward and then swam up when we ended up where we'd meant to: the first of the three great reservoirs where the water from the aqueduct would be kept before going out into the city itself. The reservoir, little more than a large cistern, wasn't entirely full: I breached the surface to moist air, finding Akua and Archer already climbing up towards the hatch at the top.

"Fuck me," I muttered, "it actually-"

I bit my tongue at the last moment. I refused to tempt Fate like that.

"You'll be all right climbing?" Archer asked in a murmur.

I glanced at the handholds they were using, little more than indents into the side of the wall – people had to be able to come down to check for leaks or trash – and grimaced before I nodded. The herbs I'd taken for the pain in my leg were beginning to fade, but I'd make it up. It just wouldn't be pleasant, during or after. Indrani tried to push open the stone hatch but it didn't move. I cursed under my breath. Breaking that open wouldn't go unnoticed. Akua, however, had a solution. Her arm turning to mist, it slithered through a crack and I heard her work on the hatch from the outside. Moments later it was hoisted open, Archer catching it and popping her head out to look.

She gave us a nod and a grin: the way was clear.

Indrani went out first, leaping down soundlessly, and Akua followed as I climbed up. My bad leg was burning, but only dimly. I closed the hatch behind us, twisting it into some sort of rough lock, and just like that we were in the city. Well, a fortress within Wolof anyway, but as far as I was concerned it counted. We were dripping all over the floor, save for Akua, who covered our tracks: she passed a mist-like hand over us and we found ourselves mostly dry. She pulled the same trick with the trails of wetness we'd left, and though we were still damp at least we wouldn't be leaving tracks.

"You remember the way out from here?" I softly asked.

"I've never been in this part of the fortress," Akua admitted, "but I have memorized the plans, same as you. It will be enough."

I nodded. It'd have to be. We were in a closed off section inside the fortress, but one that was relatively close to a way out. There ought to be a hall outside the reservoir room that'd go straight to a crossroads. Taking a left there would lead us straight to a bastion, and from there it was possible for us to leap down three levels into a large courtyard whose gate would lead us out in the city streets. The issue was that we hadn't known the guard schedules, so there was no telling if there were people in that bastion or not. And we couldn't afford to take our time here, because soon the Army of Callow was going to 'attack' the city.

"Take the lead, then," I ordered.

She nodded, her form rippling into that of a young Soninke soldier in Sahelian livery. Archer and I wouldn't be half as inconspicuous, unfortunately, so she'd be going ahead alone. The two of us hid behind the reservoirs, waiting for what seemed like an hour. She returned, footsteps silent and with a grave expression on her face.

"Only three in the bastion, but one is a mage," Akua said. "I would like Archer to kill him, I am at... risk otherwise. If he's a skilled enough caster, he could tap into the fortress wards."

"Indrani, you're up," I said.

"Ah, that ought to be bracing," she grinned. "See you in a bit, Your Graceful Regaliness."

"I hope you get caught," I sweetly replied, "so I can consciously choose to leave you behind."

She flipped me off, a sure sign of surrender if I'd ever seen one. The two of them disappeared into the hallway, eerily silent, and I was left to bite my thumbs. It'd been a while since I'd had to rely on others to do the dirty work, hadn't it? In Wolof, though, I would have to. In the city proper I'd be able to use Night again, in small doses, but in the heavily warded parts like the fortress it'd be like sending up a flare. I'd forgotten how boring actually doing things the right way tended to be, I thought with half a smile. I was considering how to dispose of the corpses – if we dragged them out of the wards, we could stash them in my shadow – when I heard the sound.

Someone was tuning a lute.

My hand dropped to the grip of my sword. The sounds of strings being plucked at methodically continued to echo in the room, and though I was tempted to remain hidden there was no point to it. The Intercessor already knew I was here, else why would she be? Pushing off the wall of the reservoir I'd been hiding behind, I loosened my cloak around my shoulders and took my hand off my sword. What would a blade do against the likes of the Wandering Bard? Putting a lazy smile on my face, forcing the tension out of my shoulders, I strolled out of hiding. She was not difficult to find. The Intercessor was seated on top of a reservoir, legs dangling as she finished tuning that shoddy lute. Fair-haired, this time, with deeply tanned skin and starry blue eyes. She was barely taller than I was, if at all, though she had curves I could only envy. And when I came out she raised a finger, putting that old silver flask to her lips and drinking deep. I waited, but the finger stayed up and she kept drinking. I cocked an eyebrow.

After an insulting amount of time, she pulled away the flask and smacked her lips before letting out a pleased sigh.

"Alavan pear brandy, Catherine," the Intercessor revealed. "Gotta drink while it's still the good stuff, you get me?"

"Never took to brandy," I idly replied. "Though I once knew a man more than passingly fond of that particular drink."

It'd been a barb, a test, and for it I got a pained grimace.

"I actually thought of him as a friend, you know," the Intercessor said. "Tariq was one in a thousand, even for Named. Even when every part of him was worn down to the bone, he never lost that thing. The spark. The part that makes a man take the lash so someone else doesn't have to. I don't think any of you ever appreciated how staggeringly rare that is."

"He probably would have kept kicking around a few years more, if you hadn't given our plans in Hainaut to the Dead King," I harshly said. "How many graveyards' worth of friends have you buried, Intercessor?"

She pulled at a string, smiling at the broken side.

"More than you've had meals, Catherine Foundling," the Intercessor said, not denying or admitting a thing.

And the horror of it was that I believed her, believed her with bone-deep certainty. How many people you loved could you bury, before the only human thing about you was the guise you were? A hundred, a thousand, ten thousand? In that smiling woman's shadow was an empire's worth of graves.

"I'm a little disappointed the Arsenal only bought me a year without you," I said.

More or less, leaning on less.

"Praes is where the fun's at, these days," the Intercessor shrugged. "All those fires full of irons, all those old wounds never closed. It's in the air here, you know? The... sincerity. The Tower's the closest thing Below has to a smile. If you wanted me out of your hair, you should have kept away."

"Had a thing or two to get done hereabouts," I replied. "What – actually, have you got a name for me to use nowadays?"

She plucked at a string.

"Yara," the Intercessor smiled.

"Of?" I pressed.

"Oh," she shrugged, "nowhere in particular."

Well, wasn't that just fucking ominous.

"So what are you dropping in for, Yara?" I asked. "You got a horse in this race?"

For a moment her face was split between wonder and surprise. I hid my confusion, and like a firefly's flicker in the night her expression was wiped clean. Almost quick enough to make me wonder if I'd really seen anything at all.

"Eh, you could say that," the Intercessor said.

"Malicia or Sepulchral?" I asked, tone forcefully nonchalant.

It wouldn't be my father, if he became Dread Emperor he'd put an entire division of mages on figuring out how to permanently kill her. Captain's death was not something he would ever forgive.

"Oh," the Bard smiled. "That's cute. You think I give a shit about who's screaming their lungs out from the top of the Tower. I really, really don't."

"Come for the weather?" I drawled. "I suppose they do have a bit of everything, if you stand in the Wasteland long enough."

"You know, this is usually where I get cryptic," the Intercessor mused. "Give out a few hints – most of them lies, just enough truth I don't get bitten for it – and send you chasing ghosts while I line up the knife."

"But not this time?" I pressed.

"There's really no point," the Wandering Bard smiled, strumming the lute. "See, when you drop two starving hounds in a pit the time for subtlety is past. Now is the hour of tooth and claw."

"I killed you last year," I said. "Crows be my witness, next time I'll make it stick."

"That's the stuff," Yara of Nowhere laughed. "Come at me, Foundling. You want to know why I dragged my carcass to Praes?"

My answer was the whisper of my sword leaving its scabbard. Lute tuned at last, the Wandering Bard played the first few notes of an air I recognized, the beginning of 'Stars From the Sky'.

"The only reason I'm here is to kill you, Catherine Foundling," the Intercessor grinned. "We're done fucking around, now. There's no more room in this game for the likes of you."

And though I had never seen her wield a blade, never seen her do a single thing other than speak words and drink, in that moment I felt a shiver go up my spine. She had always been my foe, but this was... different. This was war, without pretence otherwise. Yet I would not be cowed, not today and not by the likes of her. I met her eyes, brown to blue.

"Take a swing," I smiled back, all teeth and malice. "See where it gets you."

She laughed, loudly, and then swept into a drunken bow. She fell forward, off the reservoir, and as she did she screamed out at the top of her lungs. I struck out at her, blade aimed for the neck, but before she could touch the ground she was gone.

A heartbeat later, the alarm wards triggered with a loud screech.

SpeckofStardust

At least theirs someone whose good at stories up against cat her otherwise it be very 1 sided.

Liliet

BOOST PGTE ON TOPWEBFICTION REMINDER! (sorry for piggybacking)

TheCelestialEquation

Sorry but.. there's. Theirs is possessive

laguz24

Oh, Crap. I needed this. Although, this implies that her usual modus operandum isn't what the gods want. But now, we get to see some good old Woe action.

Darkening

The Bard's M0? Because our last sight of her was her being super pissed she wasn't dead and declaring she was going to go to extremes over it. I suspect she's going off script here. If you mean the gods disapprove of Cat's M0, well, again, the bard is going off script.

308924810a

I'm no longer convinced that we read that scene correctly. I think she might have been super pissed that Catherine didn't fall into a rivalry story with her, despite her playing everything correctly. Even right up until knifing her Cat was still pursuing conflict with the bard, and though interrupting their proxy conflict to knife her was an attempt at winning despite the rules rather than within them, Cat was still acting like she was an opponent and opposite of the Bard. Yet no connection or pattern formed.

Liliet

For ease of discussion:

> She breathed out and opened her eyes, a starry sky sprawled above her.
>
> In and out, slowly. Unmistakably. She was still alive, though no longer Marguerite de Baillons. The Wandering Bard, the Keeper of Stories, closed her eyes and repressed the urge to scream until her voice went hoarse.
>
> "I did it all right," she said. "And still? Still?"
>
> Her nails dug into her palms until they bled.
>
> "Fine," she whispered. "Fine. The hard way it is, then, and on your heads be it."

I'd say the immediate sequence of "She was still alive, though no longer Marguerite de Baillons. The Wandering Bard, the Keeper of Stories, closed her eyes and repressed the urge to scream until her voice went hoarse." is pretty expressive

Crash

Still think Bard's only personal objective is to actually die. She does the rest of it because it's her Role and her job but she doesn't care, I don't think.

Always read her talks with Cat in the Arsenal as her being optimistic. Maybe she could be free, one last chance.

Now she's just dropped right back into hopelessness and anger, cause not only is Catherine Foundling not a part of her plans she couldn't even grant her the mercy of freedom.

Liliet

Yeah we don't know anything about what Gods want. Not only is it not connected to what Bard wants, Bard is likely lying, too.

308924810a

Her entire shtick is telling stories, and I suspect that she was stringing them along when she had a conversation with the drow twins as well. Honestly at this point I'm paranoidly worried that everything she says is a lie. And worried that she's done things like being the one to write the two hundred heroic axioms or the book of all things.

Liliet

Oh I doubt any of the three of that.

Shveiran

Well, now I am too.

Congratulations on making me scared, you meanie.

ninegardens

Ohhhh boy. Intercessor is a scary lady.

... and here I was hoping that she'd claim her horse in the race was Cat.

Nope. Nope. Quiet the opposite.

dadycoool

Cat's the horse she's trying to shoot from the stands.

RoflCat

More like the horse she's loudly taunting while intentionally standing next to the track in hope of getting it to kick her dead.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, this doesn't work if she is just trying to comit suicide. That's a surefire way to get a "cursed to live" kind of bad end. No, she's gotta actually be trying to have any chance of being taken down. But what she is doing is bringing out the big guns. She's being as active as she can, which is still passive but not comparatively. And that leaves her vulnerable. The boss is strongest in it's final form, but that's the form you have to get it in to kill it.

Liliet

Two thoughts:

> "Tariq was one in a thousand, even for Named. Even when every part of him was worn down to the bone, he never lost that thing. The spark. The part that makes a man take the lash so someone else doesn't have to. I don't think any of you ever appreciated how staggeringly rare that is."

LOL LMAO LMFAO ROFL

I wonder why personally Catherine and people who know her would underappreciate that about a person.

I really do!

Aaaand...

So, here's the thing: Bard lies as she breathes. She also tells the truth a lot – I bet all the small talk facts were true – but what she said about why she was here? Well.

The thing is, there's one specific way in which words can't be lies: namely, when they are actually actions. You cannot lie "please come over here" and you cannot lie "fuck you sideways". These things aren't statements with truth value, they're direct levers on reality. They might imply things in context and be lies in that way, same way any action can, but there's a core to them that just... can't be a lie because it's not a truth statement.

What Bard did here is actually one of those. Oh there was also a statement there, but what she DID was declare war on Catherine.

This is the truth of it: what Bard did was show up and challenge Catherine to a fight to the death.

(Instead, notably, of setting up an assassination behind the scenes. Arthur is RIGHT THERE and Cat with her tsundere mentor shtick is this close to offing herself against him.)

Unless there are some obscure chivalry-style story requirements that we don't know of, "Bard kills Catherine" is not the outcome that is made more likely by Bard declaring war to Catherine's face. "Catherine kills Bard" is.

dadycoool

Considering she's been trying to die since, maybe even before she met Nessie, it could be that she's pounding the Start button for that as hard as she possibly can, having found someone who might possibly do it. Cat doesn't see her as a Worthy Opponent, nor does she see her as a nuisance, or necessarily as a danger, and certainly not as a friend/frenemy. She sees the Bard as someone who Needs to die. Bard went and found someone with the strength and will to kill her, even in cold blood, put a gun in her hand, put her forehead against it, and is saying "kill me" in a very obscure way, hoping beyond all hope that this bullet will pierce.

Liliet

And when it didn't work the first time, she went to get an AK-42!

Tek

What if a serial killer aims a gun at you and says "If you don't say "Please come over here" I'll kill you and your entire family"? The, ugh, point is, yes, even something like "Please come over here" or "Fuck you sideways" can be a lie, if it's against your intentions and is forced on you against your will. Unless, of course, you want to argue that saying something like this out of fear makes it true.

Liliet

You are reading it as a statement of "I want you to come here", but I'm just talking about it as an operant – a button that does something to reality.

The truth or falsity of your intentions is not the truth or falsity of the statement. The true fact is that you have said it. The reason may be implied and the implication might be false, but it's not a part of the actual statement.

ohJohN

I think you're slightly missing the point: "please come here" has no truth value, regardless of whether the words are voluntary or coerced, because it's not a statement of fact, it's a command. Same with questions: it's meaningless to say that "how are you?" is true or false, because there's no explicit assertion about the state of the world.

Sure, the related statement "I want you to come over here" can have a truth value, and thus being coerced into saying it when it's not true would qualify as a lie. You could argue the statement is implied by the command, even. But the defining feature of a lie is that it's a false statement, not something you don't want to/are forced to do.

Liliet

Yeah, this exactly.

You can't lie "Alexa, play Despacito", you can't lie "BOO!" to someone's ear,

shikkarasu

While I agree 100% with your actual point and I love your example, my first thought is of Bard saying "Boo, villains, boo" when she was in fact hoping for Akua to succeed against Cat. The irony is tickling me.

Liliet

Oh, that moment was GREAT.

Was she, though? Was she really hoping for that? I know that's what she told William but, like,

Insanenoodlyguy

I said this a bit above, but it only works if it's real though. It's the gamble Bard is normally too smart to take: this active intent gives her a lot more latitude to act than she usually has... but it also leaves her more vulnerable. Oh, if Cat misses a step she's dead. But that's the "final form" Bard takes, using her full power but also is likely going to actually die if she reaches 0 HP this time ( or negative 10...

Liliet

Rey d`Tutto

I hope Cat has a "... And Stay Dead!" Card to play.

Kage Lupus

Catherine asks the Bard why she is there, and the Bard is genuinely surprised for a second. Why? Because she sees Catherine as an actual rival, someone who could potentially take over her Role in creation as the story-savvy Named who directs people on a meta level.

That is why she is able to directly interfere with Cat right now even though there aren't any other Named directly involved. Normally the Wandering Bard only gets to act around other Named, nudging stories and pushing people into specific narratives that advance her unknown goals. Cat isn't in a direct fight with Named right now, and WB has already said that she doesn't care about the fight for the Tower. So the only reason she can act is because Cat is actually in conflict with the Bard herself.

Something about Cat's blooming Name is enough of a threat to Wandering Bard that WB is allowed to interfere with her directly. Which makes sense, since we know that Cat's new Name is something related to authority over other Named, to the point that she was able to affect the Grey Pilgrim and White Knight when Speaking. The Bard is surprised that Cat doesn't catch on because she is normally so aware of things on a meta level that I think the Bard assumed Cat was actively working to replace her. If Cat is doing it on accident, or even subconsciously, then it is both more impressive and harder to counter.

Darkening

Ehhhh. Malicia's got a proxy in town and this entire struggle is between her and Cat. Bard showed up to talk to Saint a couple times when there was no imminent conflict with a specific named, too. She's not as restricted as you seem to think, I'm sure she could show up to put her thumb on the scale between Cat and Malicia in this fight with zero issues even if it wasn't for Cat being a rival to Bard.

Liliet

And that provokes WONDER? The word means a positive emotion. It means Bard loves something about what Catheirne said.

"She's kind of not catching on" really doesn't qualify for the kind of wonder Bard'd actually let slip onto her face.

Liliet

Also, Cat explicitly said she didn't want a Role similar or parallel or opposed to Bard's at Arsenal.

308924810a

I think she was surprised at the "do you have a horse in this race?" comment. Because for a second there she thought that Cat had figured out that the conflict for who was going to end up Warlock was taking place here, and she didn't know how Cat could have learned that.

This is an important hint to the easiest path to defeating the Bard here. The bard intends to repeatedly trip up Cat's plan right as she's at the most delicate points, using Sargon's forces/the warlock to kill her.

But 'those who prefer soft power are weak to direct confrontation' according to Black, so if Cat wants to halt the Bard all she needs to do is repeatedly enact plans that will put her in vulnerable situations to bait the bard out, kill her three times, then commit to her actual plan to achieve her actual goal, this time without the bard present to interfere, and hopefully without Sargon or Malicia realizing what her actual goal is before the bard is removed.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's because it's the first time in forever anybody has called her by her real name.

Benjamin Huang

"For the enemy is clever and sly, and to her a thousand years is like the blink of an eye."

Intercessor dies in book 6 confirmed lol.

Justin Cohen

"Someone was tuning a lute."

nick012000

>"How many graveyards' worth of friends have you buried, Intercessor?"

>She pulled at a string, smiling at the broken side.

>"More than you've had meals, Catherine Foundling," the Intercessor said, not denying or admitting a thing.

Is this a Jojo reference? I know people asking that's a bit of a meme in its own right, but the Bard's line there is very similar to a famous one by the vampire Dio Brando.

As for the twist at the end, well, villains are only guaranteed to have the first step of their plan successful. Let's see how Cat manages to improvise from here!

beleester

"More than you've had hot dinners" is a fairly common figure of speech.

Lord Haart

I had totally forgotten the whole "first stage of a villains plan is guaranteed to succeed"... By making this the case here, is Bard trying to push Cat back into a clear Villain role vs. the greyish one she's been adopting?

ArkhonIX

First things first, longtime reader first time commenter. Hi! Hello! How do you do?

Second thing. My main comment:

I know we have a well justified hatred of the Intercessor, but the fact that she's finally declaring her goal of killing Catherine exposes what I think is at the core of the Bard's character. She is literally the good equivalent of the Dead King. Not just because they are as old as they are, and have played such a long time role, but because, at the core, the deepest part of their being, both of them are motivated by the fact that they DO NOT WANT TO DIE. They don't care about the consequences, they just care that they keep existing.

Now, Bard differs from the Dead king in that she does die, but the thing with the bard is that she also always comes back. She's been Aidee of Nicae, Marguerite of Bailions, and numerous other "Names" from "Places". She destroys some poor persons life, like most "good" things do in this universe, and that has always been her M.O.. But now we maybe see the pattern broken, as we meet the newest? Incarnation of the Bard, Yalda of Nowhere. What's changed? Why is this time different?

My personal theory as to why Bard has popped up as "Yalda of Nowhere" is this is her original form. This is the anchor that she uses to keep reincarnating. Why has she exposed herself like this then? Simplest answer is probably that this is her at her most powerful form. But why break out the big guns? Because Catherine is heralding the end of an age, and that threatens the Bard's immortality. Now, this might be because of Catherine's burgeoning name. It might be because she is the closest to killing the dead king. It might be because of what Catherine can build. It may be what she can destroy. Whatever it is that Catherine is on the cusp of doing, that will be what kills the Bard. Not the war that the Bard has started. If anything, that is the Bard's biggest weapon against Catherine. The war between Cat and the Bard is what the Intercessor is using as a weapon, because the bard knows that Catherine hates her, and that this is the easiest way to distract her and prevent her from becoming what she will become.

Again, some of this is fairly obvious. I doubt I'm reinventing the wheel with my analysis, but I wanted to put my idea out there and see what response I got. If people thought I was way off base, or if maybe I could be on to something. Who knows? I sure don't. But I look forward to finding out.

agumentic

>both of them are motivated by the fact that they DO NOT WANT TO DIE

What? Bard was literally on the verge of screaming herself hoarse because she didn't die last book. "Does not want to die" can't be further from her motivation if you tried.

Tek

To be fair, all we got is a vague "Why didn't IT work", everything else is just a theory. And while that's a nice theory, there is no direct evidence for it. Maybe she was screaming at heavens because her cake was burned in the oven, AGAIN.

agumentic

True enough, we didn't get an explicit statement. But "She was still alive, [The Bard] closed her eyes and repressed the urge to scream until her voice went hoarse." after that whole series of Interludes is rather indicative.

TeK

It's, ugh, Yara. And yeah, it's pretty obvious it's her true name, if not her true form. But I don't think it has anything to do with power or anything like that. It's not a bloody Dragon Ball. I think it's a human thing. The story is coming to a climax, and out of dust only one will climb. The herald of an age past, or a harbinger of new. And whatever the outcome is, this one time, WB wants to face it without masks and lies, but as who she truly is.

Also, of her plan is to actually kill herself, throwing out her true name in the ring raises the stakes. It brings the feeling of finality, the feeling of an ending being near. The Villain takes off his masks and fights the Hero, it's a classic stuff, and there is no walking back from that.

Liliet

She doesn't get to pick her faces. Though I guess there IS nothing stopping her from saying her real name regardless of what her face is... but really, I think the "she was really fucking short" thing is a hint that it's her very old real body (through the "people were shorter earlier in history" association) and it's just a sign of what the story is this time.

Liliet

Bard was deeply disappointed to not get killed by Cat last time Cat tried (in the Arsenal). And formally issuing your opponent a challenge is a means of getting THEM to attack YOU, not a means of attacking them.

That Bard is trying to die actually and has been antagonizing Catherine targetedly for that purpose is the most common theory right now.

Come to discord and theorize with us!!!!

Casey Glick

Don't forget that whole thing about how she must flee her greatest desire. The only thing we've seen that makes the Bard go away is a murder attempt. I think it is a curse for her that she cannot allow herself to die. But if she sets up exactly the story beats that end in a True Rival killing her, well, it's not like she is able to stop that death.

Liliet

yeah exactly

she flees her greatest desire AND promised death tho dont forget (that does imply they arent the same thing, intrestingly)

knockoffnikolai

Link?

Liliet

> She breathed out and opened her eyes, a starry sky sprawled above her.
>
> In and out, slowly. Unmistakably. She was still alive, though no longer Marguerite de Baillons. The Wandering Bard, the Keeper of Stories, closed her eyes and repressed the urge to scream until her voice went hoarse.
>
> "I did it all right," she said. "And still? Still?"
>
> Her nails dug into her palms until they bled.
>
> "Fine," she whispered. "Fine. The hard way it is, then, and on your heads be it."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/04/24/interlude-knock-them-down/>

knockoffnikolai

I meant to the Discord lol, I couldn't find it in the sidebar. But I see it was posted later in the chat, so that works too. 😊

Liliet

yea

ArkhnIX

If you give me the link, I'd love to!

Liliet

P sure it's in the sidebar but here you are anyway: <https://discord.gg/HKRYjJAf>

Insanenoodlyguy

No, we are meeting the OLDEST. This time she's using the name she was born with. her actual out of a human birth, not the reincarnations.

TeK

Oh? You're approaching me, Catherine?

Insanenoodlyguy

I have to get closer to kick your... er, slit your throat!

Soronel Haetir

I have a lot of problems with Bard being able to do anything direct like this chapter provides (tripping wards). Everything we've seen of her leading up to this says that she doesn't have a lot of choice about where she appears and when she isn't in Creation she simply doesn't exist.

Actually, I'm surprised that just her coming into existence wasn't enough to trip the wards (given that apparently drawing on Night would do it, yet that is a power the Sahelians should not have practice against).

TeK

Maybe her appearing works in a way that "she has always been there". So her appearance would not trigger the wards, but drawing on some other aspect (or just leaving) may, which is how she triggers the wards.

Liliet

She triggered the wards with a loud noise (screaming)

jamesc9

Or she negotiated Cat into triggering the wards for her by swinging a sword near the reservoir.

Liliet

Also possible, I guess.

Liliet

Bard coming into existence is not a... ripple of power. She just pops up. It's not sorcery, it's not Light or Night or anything in that vein. It's undetectable because it doesn't play by those rules.

And I figure screaming to trip the wards counts as a subtle touch here because in theory it could have been someone local stumbling onto Cat, too. It's not IMPLAUSIBLE without her there.

shikkarasu

It definitely isn't as much interference as, say, coaching a Hero on how to kill a certain villain, warning a hero not to drink that poison, or giving detailed instructions to a Fae. I think it's less about subtlety (although that probably helps) and more about being indirect. She would be well within her rights to just walk up to any Named on Wolof's side and flat out say "Cat's in the Aqueduct, have fun," but she wanted to declare war.

Bard is Named and no matter how savvy she is, she plays by Name rules. If she's going to take the gloves off? She has to do it loud.

ohJohN

I took it as "literally all she is allowed to do is drink and talk, and screaming is a kind of talking, so screaming to trigger noise-sensitive wards is technically allowed."

Shveiran

I read it simply as "she screamed, someone heard, and they sounded the alarm. Because of course the alarm is a ward."

Liliet

Or the ward is tuned to raise the alarm at someone screaming. Sounds like the reasonable thing to automate.

nick012000

Until your alarm ward gets triggered by a couple of of your guards deciding to have some kinky fun. 😊

Liliet

That's how you know which guards to publicly execute to raise morale!

Shveiran

Maybe it's just me, and I've never been a Praesi guard, but I reckon if I worked in an execution-including environment, I'd probably figure life is too short not to have a tryst, so executing the co-workers that are up for it would bring my morale down.

Liliet

I mean, time and place?

Tenthyr

The Bard isn't using magic to move about. It's her Name. Names work literally by bending the nature of reality itself. Normal wards won't cut it.

And the bard just explained why this happened: she wants to kill Catherine. She isn't playing the old game anymore, this is direct war. The Bard has almost definitely been limiting the nature of her interactions with Named and scenarios specifically to choose a useful moment to 'break' her rules.

Insanenoodlyguy

That's because this is her "final/true form." She can do things she normally can't because she's actually being Yara for once. Who is almost certainly the original name she had in her very first life. More vulnerability (which she's counting on) but also more oomph in the meantime.

Liliet

Also, she has interfered with Named fights before – as distraction, as advice-giver, pretty directly.

Insanenoodlyguy

Between named. Only one named side here, the other has mundanes she just called in to do her dirty work. that's a new one for her.

Liliet

I guess technically? She didn't exactly call them in tho. She just tripped an alarm on purpose.

edrey

that is a lie or a half true at least, the bard is going for her but that means cat would be focusing on her and not the tower, to make her see the wrong fires and make her too paranoid in the wrong way. it will end with a draw, and to finish the pattern of three in Keter. a draw is the true reason i believe. after all, the bard should know the Dk must be prepared for face that angel as worst case scenario. so her plan shouldnt be so simple.

Juff

Typo Thread:

let a deeply > let out a deeply
I find myself > I found myself potion ran when > potion ran out when got stuck > get stuck she'd bee physically > she'd be physically

Archer in danger > Archer who was in danger out tracks > our tracks

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

"I want first, even though I wasn't the strongest swimmer"

>"I went first"

"out in the city streets"

>"Out into the"

RoflCat

As much as the chapter ended on a 'crisis', considering the chapter's epigraph (and main character plot armor) we know Akua is going to be instated as High Lady or there's ANOTHER Akua in the past...

But the way she said that line definitely had a touch of this Akua to it...

Which would make that Scroll of Ruin possibly something containing more future events...

ohJohn

Seeing as how the entire Isbili line was recently wiped from the face of Creation, I'm assuming the epigraph is about some ancient Sahelian ancestor Akua was named for, in the time after Triumphant's fall when Praes was divvied up and ruled as crusader kingdoms (except, notably, Wolof).

Liliet

Yeah, Akua is just not a unique name, and this was from the first three Crusades.

Earl of Purple

I wonder what alerted the chaps with the magic glowstick to check the gates. The alchemical holy water should have thwarted any alarm enchantments, so unless they have to check every hour or something they shouldn't have known to stick it in.

therealgridlock

My guess is that the "destroys all magic" dust also destroyed the magic flow-meter, or some magically mundane monitoring equipment, so the lackey that reads the meter saw the flow go to "0" or some magical equivalent, freaked out, and got his boss or buddy to check it with him, in case something is trying to get in.

That's the trope in heist movies, it's not the sophisticated laser grid that goes off, it's the mundane voltage regulator that suddenly is drawing no power and some guard happens to notice the lasers aren't drawing power any more.

But, conveniently Indrani put the lock back in a way that lets them think "must be nothing" and go back to regular AI patterns, and it also fulfils that heist trope as well, the guard checks it, sees the lasers operating normally (because the sneaky heisters turned it back on after they got inside) and assumes the meter was wrong or they're wrong.

It's one of those things where it's impossible to have a trope discussion about a world with trope magic without immediately becoming meta about them all.

The drow were almost the inverse ninja, but not quite, though we do have quite a few other tropes.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'd assumed Cat would get her name dealing with Malicia, but it looks like she's going to get it taking down Bard.

Darkening

I dunno about that, last chapter while directing the encounter against the Black Knight her name was quite active and making noise, while we didn't get a single offhand mention of it this chapter. Sure, maybe it'll crop up in the moment that she delivers Bard the Final Death, but her story's always been about Praes and Callow, and the Bard's just butting in.

Lord Haart

TBF, as Black had discovered, the issues with Praes and Callow go back to at least the Titans, so she at least has to go to the lower 'g' god level to fully rectify things.

I wonder if the Titan messups and the Drakoi predated Bard or if she's bigger than just an Age of Wonders thing. There seems to be some parallel between the Upper case Gods and human development here – playing with dragons and giants (young kids just want special effects), then with simple, patternistic stories, and now Cat's way, which seems more intricate if possibly also more boring. I think maybe Kairos paved the way here though that politics and trope reversals can be very entertaining indeed, so Cat might have that going for her.

jamesc9

So Cat wins if the gods above and below are amused with her?

Massego should be able to confirm that.

beleester

Cat's plan doesn't rely on them going undetected for the whole operation, right? I mean, she must have known that wasn't going to happen if she was participating.

Darkening

Thankfully, Cat's been more into contingencies than improvising these days, so she definitely has a plan for what to do if the alarm gets raised. Not necessarily a good plan, but she's got an idea of what to do about it at least.

That Other Guy

Cat's plan probably runs along the lines of "punch them in the face". At least that's how it starts. As she's currently toting a satchel of goblin munitions things don't bode well for the local garrison.

Or the building they're in.

308924810a

I don't think they're leaving this city without Akua somehow ending up as High Lady again.

Sinead

I wonder if she could possess/inhabit Sargon and ward him against soulbox incantations? It could easily be a bargain of Sargon pitching in to be 'on the ground floor' of Cardinal's school of magic and to get protection from Malicia. It's not like Akua has no practice at this (see Battle of the Camps).

Especially since I suspect that conservation of detail means that Sargon is the Warlock claimant.

Shveiran

So, you know how I was all "Malicia is screwed because she has no Named powerhouse and no story-fu so Cat is going to play her like a fiddle?"

Well, admittedly, with the Bard to stab her in the story and the Emerald Blades around as possible powerhouses for Yara to redirect... yeah, this is an actual fight.

Catherine vs the Bard, Malicia and the Elves seems kind of fair.

And isn't it funny how the High Lords have been just background noise ever since book 3?

Mental Mouse

Also Malicia now has a Black Knight, who was a world-class general even before her Naming.

That Other Guy

WB's plans around Cat keep unravelling because Cat isn't taking her assigned role. Sometimes it's been deliberate, but clearly WB was hoping for a grand declaration of undying enmity 'to the pain' or some such.

When someone doesn't assume their role in a story, the story loses impetus and fizzles out.

Maybe that's what happens Below. You're forced to live out the stories you were supposed to be in but failed out of

Chapter 7: Expatriate

"A journey ends with two strangers: time changes the hearth no less than the traveller."

– King Richard the Elder of Callow

What else could I do but run?

I shot out of the reservoir room, sword in hand, and into the hallway beyond. A dozen strides had me at the crossroads I'd spied on the fortress plans, where I slowed for a heartbeat as my cloak swirled around me. A squad of armed guards – good mail and helmets, longswords, the calm part of me assessed – was hurrying towards me from the right side, blades bare. I was already pivoting towards the left, though, down another hall that ought to be bring me to the bastion that was our way out. The door to it was open and it looked empty, not a single rack of spears disturbed or table toppled. Archer's head popped out with a wary look on it a heartbeat later, which at least told me the two of them had won their scrap inside.

"Bard's here," I hissed, rushing through the doorway.

Three corpses, cleanly killed, waited for me inside along my two companions. Archer began stringing her shortbow, a grim look on her face. Akua was leaning over the edge of a bare stone window overlooking the courtyard, the rope end of a fastened grappling hook in hand. She withdrew, cocking a questioning eyebrow at me.

"Bard," I simply repeated. "Courtyard?"

"Unfortunate," she said. "Seven guards. There were more but the alarm ward drew them in."

That was a sort of silver lining, I supposed. I hesitated for a beat. Keeping the corpses in my shadow was now meaningless, since the defenders already knew there'd been intruders. Discretion was out. This could still be salvaged if we got into the streets and hit the ground running, though. Wolof was a big city and Sargon's people couldn't be everywhere. Besides, our arranged distraction should be starting any moment now.

"We punch through," I ordered. "Leave the bodies."

Akua nodded.

"Two mages," she said, glancing at Archer.

"Got it," Indrani easily replied.

She took the rope Akua offered her and hoisted herself atop the windowsill before dropping down.

"I'll go after," I said, idly closing the door into the bastion behind me. "Bring the rope when you follow, would you?"

"How very frugal of you," she replied, eyes amused.

I toppled a table, shoving it in the way of the door, and rolled my eye at her. What, did she think this stuff grew on trees? Good rope was expensive. I sheathed my sword, hearing the sound of hurrying soldiers catching up, and headed to the window. I got to the edge just in time to see Archer leap out of a smooth slide down the rope, an arrow nocked and loosed before anyone could notice. By the time I'd begun climbing down she'd landed smoothly on the ground, having loosed a second and killed twice. There was shouting from the rest of the guards. Without the mages in the way, though, Akua could move freely. I let myself go into a controlled slide that burned at the palms of my hand, hearing the door burst open when I was barely halfway through.

Swearing, I looked up and saw Akua flow over the edge of the window. She dislodged the hook, narrowly dodging a sword blow, and I swore even louder as my slide turned into a freefall. I pulled at motes of Night, whispering a curt prayer – grant me at least a beggar's miracle, you stingy carrion sisters – and dragging the slightest bit to me. I shaped a thin downwards panel of darkness and angled my fall, tumbling down atop it into a disastrous roll that scraped my trouser against stone. It'd shaken and almost broken: the fortress wards were disrupting it, making it unstable. I rose to my feet, bad leg burning, and even as the Night-working evaporated behind me I was forced to hurriedly unsheathe my sword.

I caught the blow at a weak angle, the side of my own blade almost biting into my shoulder, but I spun as I took a small step to the side. The pressure from the taller and larger dark-skinned soldier trying to hack at me was turned against him, making him stumble, and I finished it with a manoeuvre I must have practiced a thousand times. As he stumbled forward I finished my spin and withdrew my sword, so that when the soldier steadied his footing and began to turn I was already hacking into the exposed side of his neck. It was a quick blow, and quite lethal. Without batting an eye I moved on. Archer had killed two more before a survivor got close enough to make her drop her bow and unsheathed her longknives, I saw, and the last one was coming for me.

Brave of him not to run, I thought, but not particularly wise.

Akua landed behind me, the soft noise of it entirely on purpose, and in the moment that drew his attention I struck. He was a big man, muscled, but clearly used to fighting with a shield he didn't currently have. When I feigned at his left he overcommitted, hacking at a blow that didn't come, and instead I quickly stepped into his guard and slammed the side of his chin two-handed with the pommel of my sword. He dropped, stunned but still conscious. From the corner of my eye I saw movement at the window above, but the arrow that was fire was knocked off-course by the one Archer loose in answer. Too quick to even be able to tell who they'd been aiming at. Time to go.

I glanced down at the soldier below, saw the fear in his eyes and hardened my heart. No witnesses: the guards above hadn't seen us up close and we wore cloaks, but this one would have descriptions. My arm rose, but a soft hand laid against it. I looked at Akua with surprise.

"There would be no point," she spoke in Kharsum. "Sargon will have the corpses upstairs raised to interrogate them."

I hid my startlement. It was not so rare a thing for her to preach mercy, not compared to the way she'd been when we were younger, but I'd not expected it here and now. I looked at the soldier, lowering my arm.

"Looks like it's your lucky day," I said in Mthethwa.

He grimaced, mouth bloody from my blow.

"I traded for this shift," he replied. "So not that lucky."

I grinned, brushing past him, and overheard him whispering something to Akua as he inclined his head. Miyetham Sahelian, or something close to it. No idea what it meant, aside the fact it looked like he'd guessed Akua's identity even through her disguise appearance. People spoke Mthethwa differently here than they did in Ater and among the Legions, I sometimes had trouble with their pronunciation. She did not answer and we wasted no time fleeing into the street before the archer up in the bastion could start shooting at us again. The street outside the bastion was board, almost an avenue, but mostly empty of people. The two young girls carrying urns of water made themselves scarce when we came out, Akua wordlessly taking the lead.

We'd barely run ten feet when lights began pulsing in the sky above the fortress. I almost grinned. The timing was a little off, but it looked like our distraction was finally happening. Hierophant would be hammering at the city through a ritual using the waters of the aqueduct as a battering ram to smash the inside of the fortress, even as troops began emerging from the Ways in a position to capitalize on the breach should it happen. The plan was for the Wolofites to repulse the assault and blame any damage on the aqueduct grids we'd nipped coming in on Masego's assault, but we'd strayed off path some. Still, the threat of an outright attack ought to bump us down Sargon's priority list a bit.

At the very least we'd have fewer pursuers, since the commander there would want to avoid thinning their garrison.

Pursuit still poured out of the same gate we'd used before we'd even turned the corner. I wasn't much of a runner these days, but I grit my teeth and pushed through the pain as we followed Akua into the neat labyrinth that was the streets of Wolof. Our enemies weren't any slower than we were, but we could take shortcuts they couldn't – three brave souls followed even when Archer took me by the waist and leapt atop a wall, climbing as quick as they could, but we lost them three streets down when we got to a rooftop. It was one of those gardens I'd seen from afar, a lovely little shaded enclave where flowers and cabbage grew, and the three people in it when we intruded froze.

The oldest among them, a white-haired old man, deliberately looked away from us and began to speak of the weather with the younger pair. I snorted, taking it as the tacit invitation to move on that it was. The old man ignored Archer's friendly wave, stubbornly looking away, and Akua guided us southwards through rooftops and streets until we found a deserted corner. We paused there, catching our breaths and allowing our heartbeats to slow.

"We are near a bazaar, unless Sargon change the trade-rights for this district," Akua said. "The two of you will be able to change clothes there."

"You could go buy them for us," I suggested. "It'd draw less attention."

She shook her head.

"There are city guards at the bazaar," she said, "and it is only a matter of time before the fortress garrison sends warning to all companies, if they haven't already. There are scrying posts at regular intervals in the city, all with runners at hand. They will begin looking around soon, and this is not a true hiding place."

I felt a sliver of envy at the system described. Laure was nowhere as well-organized. It wasn't that we didn't have the ability, at least not in principle – we had the people and the magic. Callow just didn't have the coin to spare for something that sophisticated, not when there were a hundred other things being neglected that were arguably more important.

"I'm not keen on splitting up," Archer said, "but in that little description you did mention that there were guards at that bazaar you want us headed to."

"Only entrances and exits, most likely," I noted. "She thinks it'll be easy to disappear into the crowd and come out less conspicuously dressed."

"My very thoughts," Akua smiled.

It always startled me how easy it was to understand her, to think along the same lines. Hakram probably knew me better, but sometimes I wondered if I didn't understand her better than I did him. It made him a better right hand, of course – his ability to think differently than I did, to see what I didn't, was a priceless asset – but the ease with which I could follow Akua Sahelian's thoughts felt oddly intimate. It made it dangerously easy to feel close to her.

"It's boring when you two agree," Indrani complained, then turned serious. "Let me have a look at that entrance, at least. I want to be sure they're not already looking for us."

"Good idea," I admitted.

Akua offered no objection, and after she gave a brisk description of the easiest path to the bazaar Archer was gone. I leaned against a rough brick wall, earning a raised eyebrow for it. Even when it wasn't her face it was still her mannerisms, which made it a little uncanny to look at.

"Yes?" she asked.

"Just curious," I grunted. "The guard we spared, what was it he said? I don't know what 'miyetham' means."

"It is an archaic form of the words," Akua said. "What he said was 'mile thaman'."

My brow creased.

"Always good?" I hazarded.

"Ever worthy," she corrected, then hesitated. "It is a turn of phrase here in Wolof. It is... praise for my family, in a way."

Ever worthy, Sahelian, I mentally completed. That was what the man had said. Considering she'd likely saved his life I wasn't inclined to argue.

"I sometimes forget your High Seats are actually liked by the people here," I admitted. "I'm so used to seeing them as the enemy that it's hard to conceive of anyone looking up to them as protectors."

"We know better than to be devils to our own, Catherine," Akua smiled, almost ruefully. "It is why we do best with enemies. That we may pour the venom outwards, while the wonders we bring back to our homes."

"Dragons risible

Our claws, swords

Stealing miracles

To better hoard," I quoted, the Taghrebi stiff on my tongue for lack of practice.

Something like delight flicked across her face, gone in a wink.

"One of Sherehazad's," she said, approving. "Not without reason was she titled the Seer."

A moment of comfortable silence passed.

"You ever miss it, this place?" I asked, half on a whim.

Her expression was hard to read, and not for the shade of the alley.

"Sometimes," Akua quietly said. "Parts of it. Others I am not so sure I could suffer now that I have known the world beyond the Sererian Walls."

I slowly nodded.

"And you?" she smiled. "Do you miss Laure?"

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"No," I admitted. "Laure's just a different fight to me, now. It's the court and trying to keep Callow whole. I miss the parts I loved when I was a kid, but the city? No."

It hadn't been home in a long time, though it galled me to admit it even in the privacy of my own mind. I'd never felt as more than a guest in the old palace of the Fairfaxes, a child putting on adult's clothing, and these days what I loved most in the world was condensed into the shape of a few people. I was still fond of the city, it had been my home once, but I would not weep to leave it after the war ended. The conversation ended with Archer's sudden return, but to me it felt only half-done. Like we'd left bits of it still hanging in the air. Now was not the time, though, so when Indrani informed us that the handful of guards at the bazaar entrance looked too bored to have been warned I went with the flow.

We were waved through nonchalantly by the pair of guards standing in the shadow of the arch leading into the marketplace, neither bothering to look if we were armed. Akua noticed my surprise as we entered the bazaar and leaned close for an explanation.

"Our clothes are of fine make," she explained. "It is expected of us to bear weapons."

"They thought we were highborn?" I asked.

"Not that fine a make," she laughed. "They believed us mfuasa, likely. Some lord's retainers."

I nodded and followed her, letting the noises of the bazaar wash over me. I'd thought it would be a strange and exotic place, somewhere out of a dream, but I found the reality of it rather more sedate. The stands were a great deal more colourful than back home, and often made with only bare bones of wood while walls and roofs were dyed cloth, but aside from that it was mostly the goods sold that made a difference. There was no food to be bought here, as sale of such goods was strictly regulated in Wolof and contained to specific markets in every district, but there were enough spices on display to make a Callowan merchant weep for the wealth.

Jewelry was terrifyingly common too, copper and silver most of all but some gold and precious stones as well. Everyone seemed able to afford it. Clothes and cloth hung everywhere, small glassworks and the kind of petty trinkets that every market in the world must sell. The other great surprise was the sale of enchanted goods, and I wasn't talking about magic swords. For every glinting dagger there were a dozen ever-sharp kitchen knives. I saw stone coldboxes engraved with runes, prettily sculpted magelights and even alchemical brews. They were bartered over like cabbage in swift-spoken Mthethwa, like it was the most natural thing in the world to have a cure for the cold bottled in a bazaar stand. Maybe it was, I thought. There were no priests here – where else were people meant to go, when they were sick or wounded? It was still surreal, to see magic taken as something so... common. Nine in ten of those people wouldn't be mages either, it was just that magic was utterly mundane to them.

Perhaps the bazaar was a strange place after all, under that veneer of familiarity.

Akua took the initiative to buy us clothes and cloak and I was disinclined to argue. Or particularly surprised she did not even need to press clothes against me to know whether or not they'd fit. We paid in Imperial coinage, silver denarii that Malicia herself had pushed into Callow some years past in a bid to bind us more closely to the Tower, and Akua got us bags for our old clothing too. I left in a burnished yellow cloak and matching tunic, keeping only my boots and trousers, while Indrani ended up in a nice pale green. I got the impression from some of the looks the merchant gave us that he believed us to be, uh, consorts that that a young noblewoman was dressing more to her tastes. We picked up a few tricks to hide our appearance too, cosmetics that were quickly applied.

We slipped out of the market through another entrance and took to the streets, the two of them already knowing where we needed to go without my saying: we'd come to steal two things, after all, and one would be easier to get at than the other.

—

Within moments of having a good look at the granaries, it was plain we weren't getting into them today.

The Sahelians had their own private reserves near the palaces, according to Akua, but the 'city' granaries were a set of seven large interlocking warehouses surrounded by a low stone wall. There were three large avenues leading out, each large enough for two wagons to pass on them simultaneously, and a handful of smaller doors. The whole place was warded up to its neck, though it wasn't all about keeping people out. A lot of it was mundane utility: wards against vermin, or to keep the warehouses dry and cool. The thresholds weren't too strong, considering wagons had to be able to come in and out easily for distribution, but the walls were anchors for some pretty nasty stuff even by Praesi standards.

Still, we'd planned for this. The granary was one of the few places that'd been kept entirely intact during the mess that saw Sargon replace High Lady Tasia, so the wards there hadn't changed in the slightest since Akua had last seen them. We'd schemed a way in a weakness, as with use of the right magical trinket we believed we could trigger the ward in very specific manner and cross before it reset, and even prepared an escape plan. It was all useless now. The entire district was on high alert, even a fool could have seen it. Hundreds of household guards had come to reinforce the garrison and what must be a staggering amount of mages with them: there were balls of light hovering ten feet above the wall, at least a hundred of them, and the spell was one known to Akua.

"The colour will change if there is movement where the light extends," she said. "It should last for at least an hour, and if they've any sense they will have staggered putting the spells up so that they can be smoothly replaced."

High Lord Sargon had been distastefully competent so far, so I'd go ahead and assume they had. I still sent out Archer to have a closer look. Even if I had my doubts she'd find a blind spot, learning more about the defences in place couldn't hurt. There was no way to tell how long Sargon would keep the reinforcements there and we could only risk staying in the city for so long. Our foes were looking for us, and eventually our luck would run out. Archer came back after half an hour, looking displeased.

"The place is sealed up tighter than a tomb," Indrani reported. "They've actually closed up all the small access doors, the only way's in through the big gates now."

"That's a problem," I admitted.

We simply did not have the strength to smash our way through here.

"Did you get close enough to eavesdrop?" Akua asked.

Archer nodded.

"Nothing too exciting, the usual whining and a bit of fear at the notion of facing us," Indrani said. "I think I've figured out why the bazaar guards hadn't been warned yet: a lot of them complained about being yanked away from other assignments in the city and sent here in a hurry. I'm thinking Sargon put his scrying stations to work sending people to this place instead of looking for us."

My lips thinned. I did hate fighting clever opponents, they were always such a pain. Akua's cousin was proving to be one of that breed, having correctly deduced what we'd come here for and that it was a better bet to protect it than comb through half the city looking for us.

"We're not going to make it in there," I finally said. "And I'm betting he's going to be willing to keep his people here as long as it takes while he's looking for us."

If we were threatening an assault on his walls it might force him to pull away people, but we both knew the Army of Callow wasn't going to try anything of the sort. He could afford to keep his mages here instead of manning the ramparts, the tricky fucker.

"He will have the treasury vaults under reinforced guard as well," Akua quietly said. "This is something of a setback."

It was. We'd come here for grain and gold, and now it was looking like we were going to have to leave without either. Considering Marshal Nim had torched a third of our supplies, coming out of here empty-handed was going to be a blow. Not necessarily the end of our campaign, but it'd stiffen odds that were already against us. Even aside from simple logistics, running away from Wolof with our tail tucked after we'd swaggered wasn't going to be a good luck when we were courting allies. Some of the Clans might reconsider raiding, if it looked like Malicia was winning this war, and I needed the orcs south for more reasons than I'd admitted. I bit my lip, mind spinning in circles. I couldn't see another way, much as retreat would be a bitter pill to swallow.

"We shouldn't stay here," Archer said. "Let's find a place to settle for the day, yeah? We can figure out our next move then."

I nodded, silent, and followed them deeper into the city. There had to be a way, right? I tried to put together another plan, another trick, yet all I could think of was the sound of an old monster tuning a lute.

—

The search was spreading out.

There were parties on the streets now, squads of twenty with two mages. The caster regularly stopped and cast a spell with no visible manifestation save a spinning circle of golden light, and it was magic none of us knew. Archer wandered close once or twice as we headed towards the southwest of the city, but she got nothing out of idle chatter.

"I'd wager the circle is a focus mark, not unlike a rune," Akua mused. "The purpose remains rather more elusive."

"It's got to be a detection spell of some sort," I said. "Sargon has to know finding us in a city this large will be Hells otherwise, especially when we have you guiding us around."

"What it might detect is the question, then," Akua said.

We had no answer, so steering clear was the best move. We were nearly at our destination anyhow. When I'd first been told that Wolof did not have slums, I'd naturally been pretty skeptical. All cities had slums, even walled ones, it was just a matter of how large they got. Wolof wasn't as much of an exception as Akua believed it to be, but she'd not been entirely wrong either – even Scribe had agreed. The Sahelians had a pair of districts called the Yumban in the southeast of the city, where people who'd usually end up on the streets or in slums were assigned to live. Accommodations were provided, if very basic ones, and food from the city granaries regularly doled out. It all sounded very charitable, which naturally meant it wasn't the whole story.

Any people who lived there were essentially at the mercy of the Sahelians. By law they could not refuse military service if called on, or a servant's station, and they could even be traded to other lords so long as work was guaranteed by the receiving lord. People regularly made it out of the Yumban into higher station – mages in particular – and Wolofites were proud of such success stories, but the truth was most people didn't. By design, presumably, so that if the Sahelians ever had an urgent need of manpower they had a source at hand that drawing on would not cause unrest. Conscription in the city would be taken badly, but who would object to the Yumban being emptied? It was clever, in a heinous sort of way, which I was coming to learn was the mark of the most successful nobles of Praes.

Most of the people in the Yumban now weren't actually from Wolof, though. I caught the difference as we crossed into the edge of the districts. They favoured greens and dark oranges over the yellows and reds I'd seen earlier, the cadence and wording in Mthethwa was different – easier to understand for me, it was closer to the Ater-and-Legion standard I'd learned – and there were almost no weapons anywhere. Sargon had taken to raiding the northern hinterlands of Aksum on Malicia's behalf as part of his support in the civil war, and I was looking at part of the loot he'd carried back with him: people. It wasn't just Aksumites, of course, that was a riot waiting to happen. But I'd wager that we were looking for the 'prizes' who'd not had a trade he could offer them a shop for Day labourers, farmhands, those whose trade was not lacking in Wolof.

They were not mistreated and I saw little resentment, not the kind you saw back home when a town despised their lord, but I could almost feel it from the air that Sargon Sahelian's authority ran thinner here. Perhaps not much hatred, but not much love either. Their abductor had not delivered them unto a paradise. There was a lot of room, at least, since entire streets of the Yumban were still empty. The city had not entirely required from the brutalities of Tasia's fall. Akua guided us carefully, keeping out of sight where we could as she explained what she was looking for.

"We'll pick a place near a kufuna," she said.

I knew the word, though I'd never seen one myself. Black had mentioned that sometimes people from them had trouble adapting at the War College, where the ways were rather different.

"Those are the noble-backed schools, right?" I asked.

The Tower had 'free' schools of its own, where people could be attend in exchange for sworn years of service – it was how Tyrants could recruit mages without asking them of High Lords or drawing on Ater – but kufuna belonged to noble houses, without anyone else having a say in their running or what they taught.

"It is more nuanced than that," Akua murmured. "But you are not incorrect. People in those streets will be used to strangers coming and going, less likely to pay it attention."

"Never did get to see one of those," Archer mused. "We should have a look."

She demurred, but I was curious myself. We settled on studying one from a distance, but it turned out to be even easier than that. Such a 'school' was in session on large paved open grounds between two sets of houses and we found good lodgings in a second-story place that had a window looking down over the lesson. It was little more than a large room meant for eating and two adjoining smaller nooks for people to sleep in, but the narrow stairs to the rooftops had us sold. Building were smaller in the Yumban than in the districts around it – I felt, impossibly that the rest of the city was somehow looking down on us – but within the districts themselves it'd be a good way to get around. After dark, anyway.

We dropped our packs and settled in, quickly figuring out why both stories of the building were still empty even though the convenience of closeness to the kufuna must have made it in demand: one of the nooks had been fouled by an animal pretty disgustingly. That could have been cleaned, even if it hadn't been, but the way the light pit in the middle of the combined house had a wooden cover that moved in the wind and slammed with a bam-bam-bam sound out of nowhere sometimes would have been trickier to handle. I could already tell it was going to get on my nerves. I went into the clean nook, which had the overlooking window, and cast a curious look.

It wasn't that large a window, so when Indrani and Akua came too we had to squeeze pretty tight.

They were doing mathematics, the poor fuckers. Maybe thirty 'students' whose ages looked to vary between eight-ish to fourteen were sitting on the ground, using nice writing slates and chalk. The teacher was an old woman at least into her sixties, who leaned on a cane – lucky her, hadn't been able to bring my staff – and had cataracts in her eyes but looked pretty spry otherwise. She guided her students through the end of a lesson on multiplication, and it was when students were called on to answer questions that the difference to what I was used to came in.

"The only a kid handling with the black stone can answer," I muttered. "Why?"

It wasn't always the same, either. Sometimes children answered two questions in a row before passing to another, sometimes it was immediate but never once did the teacher actually order it passed.

"It is because of jino-waza," Akua said. "I am not surprised the rules are unclear to you."

I frowned. It was familiar, the words. I'd read them before, if only in passing.

"The clear-eyes," Indrani snorted. "The Lady talked about it. It's a little like the way we did thing in Refuge."

"I can't see them keeping score over anything," I said. "What's it do?"

"It is not a game, not exactly," Akua hesitated. "It is philosophy, at least in part. To display your skills, your knowledge. To assess where you stand in regard to your peers. The stone and questions are just a tool to ease this."

I studied the students, eyes narrowed.

"They're all eager to answer," I said.

Which was not my experience with studies. The tutors the orphanage made us sit in front of were used to squirming pupils wanting to be elsewhere, and they used questions as a way to keep us in line. Listen, learn, or you'll look like an idiot in front of the others.

"So they win something by doing it," I said. "Esteem, maybe? They can't trade that for something useful, though, and it's a little abstract for kids."

"It is training for the world beyond the lessons," Akua said. "The teacher, she will remember the one who distinguish themselves. What they are good at. And when my family – or someone with a trade and no children – sends someone, wanting a candidate for a scribe's apprentice or kitchen attendant, she will give those names. She holds opportunities."

I chewed my lip.

"So the stone, it's part of the test too," I finally said. "Jino-waza. Sure, a clever kid could keep it for a long while – but then you hog the opportunity, and no one will ever pass you the stone. They're trading it like adults would trade favours."

"Exactly," Akua grinned. "A student who oversteps might even find themselves sabotaged, as it often is with those who act in such ways in higher stations. It teaches balance, to take opportunity without making enemies."

"Teaches who's worth making allies with, too," Archer quietly said. "Not everyone's good at the same things, you can scratch each other's back in a way that everyone wins."

She had a strange, almost fragile look on her face as she looked at the kids. Was she thinking of Refuge? I spoke up to move the conversation along, even knowing that Akua was unlikely to ever be so uncouth as to comment on the look that'd seized our friend's face.

"Everyone you're allied with, at least," I scoffed. "It's not without sense, but it's a very Praesi way of doing things."

"I have seen the schools of your people, dearest, what few you have," Akua reminded me. "They are as menageries. Kufuna are a better way. Your nobles have their tutors, as we do, but learning is simply not prized west the Wasaliti the way that it should be."

"I came out of my schooling just fine," I replied, a tad defensive. "And orphanages gave educations even before Black stepped in, he just ensured they were good ones."

He'd also raised the number of them tenfold, but that was another discussion entirely. It wouldn't do to forget that my father had made a lot of Callowan orphans along with those orphanages.

"Come off it, Cat," Indrani snorted. "How much of what you came out having learned you learned in classes? You're like a truffle pig, you just dig into books about the stuff that you want to learn about and ignore the rest. You barely even had help when you learned Chantant."

"Thank you for the description, woman I will never sleep with again," I drily replied as she stuck out her tongue at me. "And I could have gotten more out of those classes if I'd cared about them. It was my choice not to gain, because I thought it was pointless – it'd be the War College that was make or break for me."

"Failure to motivate your student to learn is very much failure," Akua replied. "Jino-waza ensures that every student knows the worth of their lessons."

"It also teaches your kids to always compete with each other," I flatly said. "That they'll need to squabble with each other to gain the attention of the highborn, that it's the only way up. It sets in the bone that you swing at the people around you, not upwards. It teaches skills, too, I won't pretend otherwise. But I'm not exactly surprised those schools are backed by nobles."

"You do not understand," Akua gently said. "Jino-waza goes beyond the schools. It is everywhere, applies to everything. The lack of a stone does mean it ceases, the stone is a teaching tool. It is how a family knows which of them should benefit if a favour is called in, whose marriage should have the most coin spent on to arrange, who gets to eat the most when the months are lean."

"Parents do this?" I replied, aghast.

"Well, yeah," Indrani said, brow creased. "Makes sense, I'm not sure why you're so offended. If you get a windfall, you don't waste it on someone who won't do shit with it. Even parents can tell who's going places, Cat."

"You're not supposed to play favorites," I bit out. "Everyone gets a fair shot, that's how people who aren't obviously good at things get their chance to shine."

Did they not realize that what they were describing, it only ever benefitted the slightest bit of the people involved? Talented people would band together and help each other up while having all the incentive to kick everyone else down. And above those games you had the highborn, playing an even more lethal take on it with each other – and the ingrained notion that they should never, ever let anyone below them come up. It could only be at their own expense.

"That's nonsense," Indrani bluntly replied.

"She is Callowan, Indrani," Akua said, and when I turned on her a thunderous scowl she raised a hand in appeasement. "I mean no insult. I am only saying that it is because you come from a land of plenty that think this way, dearest."

I blinked at her. A land of plenty? Had she seen what they sold in the bazaar. Not even the enchanted stuff, just the spices and dyes would – I stopped, elbowing aside the sharp irritation and forced myself to look at it from the Wasteland's eyes. Food, I got almost immediately. She meant food.

"It wasn't your nobles that made this," I finally said. "It's a survival teaching."

"When is the last time Callow had a major famine?" Akua asked. "It is different here. We kill to eat, to drink – the Taghreb fight wars to steal clouds from each other and make them into water! You come from a place that has the luxury of fairness, but Wolof does not. Few parts of Praes do."

"That's not the way to do it, though," I said. "You don't claw at each other, there's no winning that when it starts. You sit and figure it out together. Ration, share. Something like a famine, you're all in it together."

Splashing the mud on the others so they were deeper in wouldn't actually get you out of the pit.

"It a pleasant sentiment," Akua replied, "but it does not help to choose which belly should be filled by the rice bowl. Jino-waza does. It lets you make the decision with clear eyes – and they will have to make it in their lifetime, Catherine. Everyone in this city older than forty, before Callowan grain was brought in, has known hunger."

"Not the nobles," I sharply smiled.

"Not my kin, the Sahelians are too wealthy for it," she agreed. "But lesser lords, ruling over poorer lands? It is not as uncommon as you think. The fields feed everyone, Catherine, and no granary lasts forever. We make many wonders, but not even we can make wheat sprout out of rock."

It would have been a better use of their skills in magic to learn that rather than fucking diabolism, I thought, but that was unfair. Destructive magic was easier. You needed to know a lot less to toss a fireball than, say, heal a broken bone. I could see it writ in the long of history, how it would have gone: the people and places inclined to the peaceful solution, to make wheat sprout from rock, they wouldn't last. Not when a less scrupulous rival could come in, throw a few fireballs and take everything. It wasn't as easy as raising castle walls with this. Magic was expensive, and Praesi were rich but not with bottomless purses.

So you got better at the magics that could protect you and destroy your rivals, and then maybe if you rose high enough that you were beyond most threats you could afford to go looking for wonders. Answers beyond eating the other crabs in the bucket. It was not happenstance, I thought, that the Sahelians had the finest field rituals in Praes. But by the time you got safe enough to look for those wonders, were you still the same people who'd wanted them in the first place? I felt an unpleasant shiver of sympathy at the thought. I was not an unfamiliar tale I was spinning there.

"It doesn't need to stay like this," I said. "Older than forty, you said. We had two decades of peace and trade, and that changed things."

"It did," Akua murmured. "Mother used to think it softened us, made us lose our edge, but I disagree. It freed us to pursue different things. To consider beyond the immediate."

I cast a long look at the kids below, fingers tight against the windowsill. The teacher had move on from mathematics, she was speaking of early Praesi history – the campaigns that brought the Grey Eyries into Praes not so long after its founding – as she regularly stopped for questions and jino-waza considered to unfold before my eyes. I couldn't have fixed this place even if I thought it was my duty to do it, I admitted to myself. There was so much of Praes that was still unknown to me. Parts of I knew like the back of my hand, the Legions and the lore and bloody embrace with my own home, but it wasn't enough. Akua had thought I might be Dread Empress once, climb the Tower, but it would have been madness.

I was glad I had not heard the song in years.

No, what I was meant to do out east was not put on some saviour's cloak and pretend I had the answers. I was here to bind the Dread Empire to the Liesse Accords, to the war against Keter, and to topple the empress who'd been such a thorn in our sides. Beyond that, I must remember restraint. It was not my land here, and in some ways I just... thought differently. And did not quite understand how they did. There was more to the differences between Callow and Praes than weather and colours. I shook my head, shaking off the thoughts.

"We should plan out our next move," I finally said, pushing away from the window. "We'll want to move under cover of dark."

"A shame I cannot use the family library," Akua said. "Half an hour there and I would know the nature of the spell the patrols are using to hunt us."

Indrani snorted.

"Yeah well, if we were in there we could just stroll up to the gold and take it," she said.

I smiled, only half-listening.

"The library is in an entirely different wing than the treasury vaults," Akua chided. "It is much too-"

I turned to look at her so quickly my neck almost cracked.

"Wait," I interrupted. "The library, you told me it was over the vaults."

"The artefact vaults, yes," the shade said. "The treasury is nowhere near these. It is not the cleverest of notions to keep demons near one's coinage."

Oh, I thought. Oh. Sargon thought we were going for the grain and the treasury, so that was the parts he was protecting. But he had to be stretched tight with people, going all out on the defence of those two places and looking for us in the streets with yet more mages. He couldn't cover everything, so he'd focused on guarding what we were after. That meant thinning the defences elsewhere. And though we could get to neither the granaries nor the treasury, what was more important than either of those things to the enduring power of the Sahelians? I met their gazes with my eye, grinning wide.

"I have a plan," I said.

Well, I could have done without the groaning.

ruduen

"'Books, Catherine?' he said, sounding agonized. 'Castles, armies, ancient architectural wonders, I can make my peace with them all. But books, Catherine? A line has to be drawn somewhere.'"

Also, go boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

jamesc9

I assumed that you were quoting Masego, but it's actually from Roland:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/03/24/chapter-20-hook/>

boballab

Oh no Cat, you already got the reputation of burning things especially cities, do you really need to get one for burning libraries now.

Liliet

I do assume they're there to steal shit, not just to torch it.

ruduen

I imagine that's the intent – grab and shove whatever they can into the Night, the same way they were stolen from. I'd wager they could trade or threaten to burn them from there.

Noted, with Cat's luck, there will be a fire anyway.

therealgridlock

There was a firefight!

Crash

She said she has a plan, the fire is inevitable. That's equivalent to saying "what could go wrong?"

boballab

They are there for the grain and the gold not the magical library. So how do you get all the guards pulled from the granary and the treasure vault? Why you set the library full of books and scrolls of magic on fire! You know the same library that Akua told her was the source of her family's power and was even respected by Masego. Light that puppy on fire and everyone is going to be sent there to try and save it, especially since it also sits over the Artifact Vault and who wants demons running through Wolof distracting everyone...

ninegardens

Hilarious... but also, one of the people who DOESN'T want demons running around is Cat. 😊

boballab

That is why she sets the Library on fire and not the vault itself, it forces the other side to respond. If the other side doesn't pull those guards from the places Cat wants to rob, they get demons everywhere as well as losing what keeps the family in power.

Sylfa

I'm fairly sure your plan would backfire, pun intended. Why would they pull the armoured and armed guards away from the clear objective when you have all sorts of non fighting people that knows enough magic to trigger a quenching artifact?

Yes it would distract, but not enough. Especially not when the risk is dying in the city. Stealing all the stuff that they need to maintain power though? And then trade it nicely for the cheap cheap price of some basic porridge ingredients and some heavy, easy to bend metal? It's the deal of a lifetime!

shikkarasu

Nah, I'm with Liliet. Cat is going to go to the Library, dig into the Artefact room, and grab all the best things that can possibly coexist in her shadow. Then she can just walk out whistling. Who's going to stop her? Are you going to mess with someone carrying three demons and Sisters knows what else around? With the Crows-damned Diabolist following at her heel? I'm not.

Cat then holds the city ransom from within. Possibly walks up to Sargon and barter in person with an entire arsenal at her fingertips.

antlan87

Only problem with that is that Masego would give her an earful if she tried to burn it. Besides, giving him access to all that knowledge would make him more dangerous to their enemies.

RoflCat

Wouldn't be her first one anyway (Arsenal's, albeit that was in disguise)

Taelel

She set fire to the archive/library in the arsenal didn't she?

Sinead

Yes, but she set fire to the least useful part of the library.

She isn't entirely without morals.

DustHurricane

God damn. I love this story.

therealgridlock

Hah, now i know why AUT is taking so long!

dadycoool

Ugh, culture shock. It's why rises to leadership ought to be vertical, not horizontal, as Cat just touched on. People from different demographics simply don't GET each other, especially when there's such contrast between so many aspects. It's also part of the reason why the Callowan Nobles prefer Vivienne so much over Cat.

laguz24

It's also why people need to be surrounded by different demographics, otherwise no one understands each other and there is needless conflict.

therealgridlock

Now if only we could convince the democrats that farmers are people too, next we could solve world hunger.

John Doe

Really? Grow up.

Daniel Ball

ahahahahahaha...

that's not happening. Don't you know that Food appears in Stores by the will of The Party expressed via demanding statement and the threat of protest? Ask the Kanenas.

juststuff

What farmers the big five our you know family farms. Because republicans are not looking out for the latter. I just don't see how giving tax breaks to multi billion dollar faming conglomerates is helping people unless you buy into the whole corporations are people to thing.

<https://www.farmaid.org/issues/corporate-power/corporate-power-in-ag/>

AbraKadabra

Nah, my boy. That is a false argument. The line about vertical and horizontal refers to the fact that empires are inevitably oppresing people because the leader in charge can only really understand his own people. And other people will be sidelined.

Which means that those dreams about an united world under one leadership will be a nightmare.

A boot on a human face forever.

What you just said is the empire builders argument. Sadly.

laguz24

This level of worldbuilding is why I love the guide, this lesson explains how famine shaped praes and why it is the nation that tries to conquer callow rather than trade. Stories have deeper roots than even she knows and I also see how it shapes Amadeus, having grown up in the breadbasket of the empire he doesn't have that level of competition. Agriculture really is everything, however, I'm surprised that callow and praes didn't trade more often. Even by smugglers.

Razorfloss razor

If I had to guess it probably started that way but years of war between the two have probably shattered any plans of trade smuggled or not. It's really hard to trade with a country that has been at war with yours since it has existed. Not helping matters is if you get caught you are probably going to be killed or exiled by just about everyone in your life. Remember vengeance and spite are the very things that kept callow together in face of the terrible things parsei would do in the name of conquest.

Earl of Purple

It's hard to smuggle enough grain to feed a nation, especially through a border patrolled to dissuade raiding and invasion. It's why the Smugglers Guild that Ratface had contacts in preferred Praesi jewellery and enchanted goods.

caoimhinh

They did.

Procer and Callow traded with Praes all the time, but used intermediaries and "indirect" means such as going through Mercantis because of realpolitik and because they liked to pretend they weren't doing such trade, for reasons such as the hatred between the nations and because Good nations wanted to claim that they had no connections and no trades with Evil nations.

Taichi22

That's what I love so much about PGTE, is that there's such an intricate level of geopolitical understanding that went into the worldbuilding and writing; the theory that nations' paths, culture, and consciousness are formed by the resources available to them is not a new idea, but only passingly rarely do I ever see it in fiction.

Poetically Psychotic

I wonder how many books and artifacts she can cram into her Night pockets...

shadw21

I's bet Cat asks/says a prayer to Sve Noc and they reply "Yes."

ninegardens

The goddess of Theft in Victory.... yeah, I can see that working...

Sinead

I realize that it won't happen, but I just got the mental image of Cat trying to take a book back out to get a response along the lines of "Not now, I'm reading that one."

Insanenoodlyguy

Whelp, I'm back to thinking she's considering making Akua Empress and/or Chancellor again. It can't be one of hers, and lets face it, Amadeus is a horrible choice if he actually has to run it by himself. Akua, for all of her Akua-ness, seems like the person who'd do the best job.

dadycoool

The once-Heiress, laid low, only to rise higher than ever before?

Liliet

Amadeus probably has a plan for reform and for who should be running it. He was a horrible choice when he was twenty-something, he's a little bit older and more experienced than that by now. He ran Callow for twenty years!

shikkarasu

Poorly. I love Amadeus, but he spent 20 years keeping Callow just shy of rebellion and did so by way of murdering his opposition. I really really want to find out that the Dread Emperor Benevolent quotes are Amadeus having learned from his mistakes, but I don't think he grew out of Leading via Conquer, and Destroy the way Catherine grew beyond Learn, Struggle and Seek; or even just Taking and Breaking.

It's very Praesi, and he would make a fine Dread Emperor, but one for the History books rather than the Age of Order.

...just don't tell him I said that, I would not survive the bell.

Shveiran

Really? I mean...

Even leaving aside all else, the man is all about reforms. At a guess, he is fully on board with anything that makes the world more orderly.

He is the closest thing I can picture a Dread Empire being to resemble Cordelia Hasenbach, and that makes him rather close to the fledgling Age of Order.

ninegardens

He's closer to Tariq. Or Yolanda the Wicked. Cordelia hasenbach KNOWS how to handle nobility. She accepts compromises. She is very much a mirror to Malicia. Black has none of that.

He has Grey Pilgrims charisma and idealism, and if he were in a kingdom that could support that (Callow), he might do well (note how well Cat does in Callow, using a similar mindset).

But he is a terrible terrible Dread Emperor, for any age.

Liliet

Praes does not NEED Dread Emperors if it can get a steady supply of food. That system is outdated with the change in material conditions.

caoimhinh

Not exactly.

Remember that the standard of living in Callow was higher during the Praesi occupation after the Conquest than before that. Catherine stated that several times along the books.

Callow wasn't "just shy from rebellion", they were living well thanks to all the reforms Amadeus implemented, the only problem they really had was the Imperial Governors acting out of line and harming the populace, and they got executed when caught (and when Malicia didn't protect them, such as with Mazus in Book 1, it's implied Amadeus had been wanting to execute him long before, but Mazus's father used his influence and thus Malicia kept holding Black back).

When the Heroes rose the banner of rebellion, they didn't find as much help as they would like, and the only backing they got was from old veterans and a few nobles. The common populace and the younger generation had no interest in fighting for the Kingdom, and were living comfortable lives even if not full of luxuries.

Amadeus is a reformist at his core, and he is a selfless patriot, he is nothing like the Dread Emperors of Old, who were selfish, self-centered fascists who wanted to stand at the top of the Tower (and the world) or wanted to sow chaos and laugh at the flames of Calernia. Amadeus wants Praes to be better, regardless of whether or not he is in it.

All the way from the methods he implements to his intentions, and the perspective and sheer mindset he has, Amadeus is very different from how someone like Akua or Malicia is, as they both glorify the madness and cruelty of the Tyrants, simply thinking themselves as better versions of Dread Empresses than any before.

Even his ruthlessness is more similar to that of Heroes doing things for the greater good than the cruelty of the Old School Villains.

His problem is that he has little tolerance for political bullshit and Praesi Nobility is ruled by that as much as it is by cruelty and ceaseless scheming.

Liliet

(Note: I'm p sure Amadeus is not the first to be motivated by actual patriotism and be reasonable. Terribilises are known for reforms and prosperity, too, and there has been a string of DEs Amadeus referenced as having tried to fix Praes's food issue from the "overpopulation" angle, and not all of them were horribly dystopian)

Lord Haart

"Terribilises"... I wonder if some Isbili blood did make its way to the Tower at some point and yielded these, there's some potential etymology link there, so maybe?

Liliet

Counterargument: the origin of "Terribilis" is clear, the origin of Isbili well personally I don't know.

So... if there's a link...

Liliet

I'm... seriously? Benevolent? THAT crack is still going around?

Anyway, Amadeus spent 20 years keeping Callow from rebelling against abusive governors Alaya gave these position as political favors by way of smart governance, keeping the military from abusing the populace in any way, funding orphanages and changing administrative institutions.

And before then, he spent 20 years overseeing the Reforms in Praes proper. Remember how wide-reaching those were?

ninegardens

See, my issue here is that Black is... kind of... Callowan.

There's a REASON that Malicia said to him "You can't conquer your way to a new homeland". There's a reason the girl he trained is such a perfect fit for Callow.

Black loves long prices. Black HATE'S slimy politics. Black is the Farmer's tyrant, and in a land of farmers he does... reasonably well. He can get the popular vote, and murder the visiting Praes nobility as needed (Malicia cleans up the mess).

Black would make a pretty reasonable king IN CALLOW.

But that doesn't really work in Praes. It's not actually governance, its autocracy, and it won't work in Praes, because the power differential between the Tower and the Nobility is actually much smaller than the power differential between the Black Knight (representative of the Empire), and some random governess.

Black is still a general, not a politician. And (from what we've seen) large swathes of Praes LIKE their nobility.

I don't think he has the skills to wrangle the noble families, and I don't think he has the firepower to burn them out without destroying half the continent, and even if he did, you can't just re-write a culture overnight. Everything Malicia told him when they split ways still holds true. Her response sucked, but she was right to say he was the wrong person for the throne.

Liliet

Amadeus is not Callowan. Remember when we got his young self's inner monologue on how he's not a Callowan heretic to worship Gods Above? Remember where he spent his years being Named? Remember how he RAISED AN ARMY TO FIGHT A CIVIL WAR, AN ARMY OF PRAESI, IN PRAES?

People are seriously missing the part where Amadeus is a leader. He didn't get handed an army, he MADE one. He is not a politician but he IS an administrator and a reformer. HE HAS BEEN OVERSEEING IMPLEMENTATION OF HIS REFORMS FOR FORTY YEARS. In this nation! Not any other!

(Twenty of these years he spent mostly overseeing Callow, sure. But the previous twenty were IN PRAES, and he hadn't fought a single full-scale war in that time. It was ALL administration, and probably border skirmishes)

Alaya is biased badly in this: she has clear blind spots for anything that is not, uh, PRAESI COURT. Which has been weakened in power and influence to the point of bare relevance over the course of their shared reign, as had been their plan since the events of Seed. (And yes, they were co-rulers factually)

Shveiran

Yeah. Just... yeah, this.

Liliet

> Amadeus of the Green Stretch was the son of corpses now buried, born of a land tread by soldiers under different banners with every season. Duni, he was, his skin the pale shame of old defeats that Praes had deemed filth even in name, and never did he forget it. It was not the Tower's promises that whispered in his sleep but the footsteps of his youth, the wheel of unending defeats seen from the side with cold eyes. In indignation he had become squire, and so sharp a blade found it that it slew his rivals and knighted him in black. To the banner he'd raised the disgraces of the Wasteland had flocked, be they green of skin and red of hand, Named hunted from above or every sharp mind and soul of steel that knew contempt but no captain. His was a company of the hungry and the lost, sworn to bleed for those unworthy of that blood. And so Amadeus of the Green Stretch asserted this: Praes is a mould that must be broken.

So Callowan of him, huh.

aurikdomi

I think he meant he is Callowan metaphorically, and he said only kind of. He is kind of Callowan in his desire to break the mould of Praes as a long price for more than just himself but for all of Praes and he is kind of Praes'n (Praesian?) in all that qualified him to become the Black Knight.

Liliet

Praesi. He's Praesi.

And he's not "kind of" Callowan. His is the people's revolution, not the foreign invasion, and those are very very different things. He's not "extracting the long price", he's trying to fix up the place.

Abrakadabra

Akua becoming Chancellor makes sense. She cannot become Epress because she is dead, therefore she cannot betray the emperor.

Liliet

She... can? It's super easy to betray people in ways other than taking over their position directly.

RoflCat

There's a law that prevent undead to become Dread Emperor/ Empress, so unless Akua can get herself a resurrection then she can't become one.

Black though

Shveiran

It has been pointed out by others that both were soul-bound before their body died, so both don't count as dead according to Praesi laws.

The whole blackmail in Book 2 was organized according to that principle: an heir soul, later placed in a body in Black's control, would have had a claim on the High Seat.

So both Black and Akua count as "people" according to Praesi inheritance laws, and not undead.

Alexander

Akua doesn't need a resurrection as she's technically not (completely) dead. She just needs a body.

Shveiran

Precisely.

And Black just took off his body for a while in order to give it a good wash. Which is how his hair lost color.

That Other Guy

She's not dead yet, just very badly hurt...

Burlyraven

I'm wondering if Akua is intentionally angling for a prodigal daughter/returning savior story, or if it's just kind of happening in that way that god-touched fates do in this 'verse. It'd be a heroic story still in keeping with her personality.

edrey

And that is why Black and the legions won in that civil war 40 years ago, the versatile fireball of dozens of average mages against the great cabals of the great lines, why the great Named of now focused on institutions and not just swinging a sword. Praes is rich but didn't want to make trade with Ashur before malicia and just wanted to take everything by force. The lack of food is their fault. Archer on the other hand just can't accept the words of concoter. They didn't need to fight. That named are not more special than the people in general. On side note i don't think ranger would be able to live in calernia after the accords, she think her blade is beyond mortal problems after all.

Liliet

> Praes is rich but didn't want to make trade with Ashur

Don't forget Ashur imports food, too. There was this whole thing with Nicaean fleet blocading them into starvation.

They buy food through Mercantis.

edrey

True but Ashur ships can go to any port in the continent and Praes can't

308924810a

The reason why Praes can't do that is because of Ashur.

Honestly I'd be in favor of an actually successfully expanding Praes trying to cut a deal with the Bard and get in on a rivalry with Ashur, because if they're occupied with that they can't disrupt the Bard's encirclement of the Dead King, same way them being occupied with Callow prevented them from disrupting the encirclement of the Dead King.

The issue is that it's a much more fragile situation, easily changed by any Praesi emperor getting the idea to invade Procer or the Golden Bloom. And it potentially disrupts whatever tenuous situation the Bard is working towards with the stories of the continent/her own private goals.

308924810a

Edit:by 'that' I mean sending out their own trading missions.

Wonder

How many times over the years ,has She met their gazes with her eye, grinning widely and saying "I have a plan,"?

I love it when she gets that grin!!

That prayer to the Stingy Crow Sisters , If only Drow could hear the prayers their esteemed First offers.

RoflCat

>I love it when she gets that grin!!

You mean, she's making 'that' face.

-“You do that thing where you almost smile and you show a little teeth,” Juniper told me frankly. “It looks really creepy on a human.” – Book 2: Aplomb

Though I keep imagine it as the Grinch's grin.

shikkarasu

>If only Drow could hear the prayers their esteemed First offers.

Well, her holy book is considered heresy in the future, according to one of the intro quotes. Honestly I'm surprised no Drow tried to kill her and harvest her Night in the first year or so of her 'reign'. Even the Barrow Sword gave it an honest effort.

Shveiran

Oh, I expect one tried... but considering RUMENA never managed to creep up on Cat using the Night, I doubt any second stinger got close...

Darkening

I mean, one tried to challenge her authority at one point and she just used her connection to the goddesses to strip him of the ability to use Night to the point that he lost toes to frostbite after suddenly being mortal again. Unless they murdered her in her sleep they weren't killing her, and there's no possible way Cat would sleep in the center of a band of cutthroats to rival goblins without warding her tent.

Juff

Typo Thread:

be bring me > be bringing me along my > along with my feigned > feinted was fire was > was fired was Archer loose > Archer loosed form my blow > from my blow disguise appearance > disguise was board, > was broad,

Sargon change > Sargon changed
In don't > I don't follower her > followed her that that > that way in a weakness > way in – a weakness in very specific > in a very specific a good luck > a good look shop for > shop for.
entirely required > entirely recovered could be attend > could attend impossibly that > impossibly, that
The only a kid handling with > Only the kid handling west the Wasaliti > west of the Wasaliti her a thunderous scowl > her with a thunderous scowl that think > that you think in the bazaar. > in the bazaar?
I was not an > It was not an

therealgridlock

God that's a lot.

Doing the lord's work.

"Archer had killed two more before a survivor got close enough to make her drop her bow and unsheathed her longknives, I saw, and the last one was coming for me."

The word "unsheathed" here is in the wrong tense. It should be "make her drop her bow and unsheath her longknives" or "make her drop her bow, and she unsheathed her longknives" or even "make her drop her bow. She unsheathed" or possibly could probably drop the "i saw" or change it to the beginning of a second sentence "i saw that the last one was coming for me"

I realize this is an editing critique, but sometimes you just have some complicated sentences, and i know english isn't your first language, but that's why we care enough to correct you.

It's either fine but klunky the way it is, or accept that it's the wrong tense and change it somehow.

therealgridlock

Ah! I have a real one,

"Sherehazad"

Swapped the r and the h, it's technically "scheherazade" but even in the fantasy anglicization, the h and the r ended up in the wrong place.

>"Sheherazad"

Although it's also entirely possible it's been spelled the other way the entire length of the book and my dyslexic ass only just now noticed.

Darkening

I think it has actually been that way since we first saw the name, but it's entirely possible I'm wrong.

hue hue

Fire time?

That Other Guy

5 utils says Cat fills the eau de parfum bottle of one of Sargon's closest aides with goblinfire.

Or she could keep it simple and steal all of his magic artefacts, offering to trade a selection back (with the emprisoned demons still in place) in exchange for gold and vittles – and maybe a couple of enchanted cold boxes for her wine.

Darkening

Gotta admit, I wouldn't be willing to crack open a globe of goblinfire to pour it out into some other container. I'm not actually sure how they keep it from igniting in the container in retrospect. Probably either the goblinfire mixture needs oxygen to start burning or there's some kind of alchemy applied to their containers.

shikkarasu

I always assumed it was some sort of flint-in-the-clay situation. Like the whole container is one big firing cap just waiting for a solid thump. And if all else fails, just make a syphon out of Night.

Rey d`Tutto

I figured it had magnesium or a majickal mystery mass with similar properties, I.e. it catches fire when exposed to O₂.

Lord Haart

It's been hinted they are demonic in nature, so I imagine goblinfire munitions as fist sized hell eggs.

jamesc9

Refreshing my high-school chemistry, I think I'm satisfied that Magnesium won't auto-ignite. Wikipedia tells me that Caesium will.

Wabbitking

With of course the implied threat that the demons might be let loose somewhere important if she doesn't get the food and gold.

Xinci

Mm, there is a silver lining here for possible reform. The Accords, or more specifically institutions like Cardinals that it would introduce, could mold the praesi into a more cooperative framework with others. Jino-waza is a philosophy of how to extrude and accumulate resources in scarcity, if one gives more avenues for cooperative accumulation over a broader group of methodologies, one could slowly mould a wider base of what is considered acceptable within Praes and form a more unified cultural base while one did so. It is quite similar in the end to what Cat wanted to do with Named. Jino-waza as a philosophy has points, it just needs to be subsumed to a larger purpose to mitigate Praes being a bad actor long term.

Liliet

Yeah I'm pretty sure jino-waza is outdated in a non-scarcity situation.

Which, considering Cat came to the city specifically to steal all of their food, is not there yet.

Darkening

Maybe Calernia can get a year without someone torching half the farmland on the continent or killing large swaths of peasant farmers in the next decade. That'd be nice.

panic

I would like to call Chekovs gun.

Previously three demons unbound and contained within Artefacts where mentioned. These should now be in the wall. I call shenanigans

ninegardens

So, a few things that stick out with this chapter:

Cat should be trying to sell the Accords to Wolof. She should be trying to sell them to Sargon, she should be trying to sell them to the populous, she should be trying to sell them to the other nobles.

This city has so much to lose, and so much to gain, depending on the wording of the accords.

As in... Cat should get up there on stage and say "You are a city of wonders. Wonders I scarcely believed possible.
And seeing this city, I can understand your pride. Right now, Callow's graininess are busy feeding the armies in the war to the north... and can not lightly be sold elsewhere... but the moment that war is finished, we would gladly trade them for a taste of even your cheapest wonders. You know that. You know you like in a city of marvels. Sign the Liesse accords, make peace with Callow, and this city need never go hungry again."

At the same time... Cardinal is a threat. Cardinal threatens to eclipse the importance of Wolof as a center for magical learning, and that... that would destroy this city.
So... there needs to be arrangements made. A place for Wolof in the new world order she is trying to build. Perhaps as a distance campus, or perhaps the promise that great teachers from Cardinal would ALSO be expected to visit here.

More than anything, she needs to sell the accords, say "This is coming. Here's the first draft. Now tell me... what would Wolof need in the next draft in order to support this?"

Which brings me to my next point:

I don't know how she can get rid of Malicia. There is no viable candidate to replace her. No, Black is not a viable candidate, because with him on the throne, he would NOT be able to wrangle the various nobilities and city states to agree to the Accords.
Malicia would do it with ease. And while Cat may have PERSONAL disagreements with Malicia... getting the Praes nobility aboard with the Accords is exactly Malicia's skillset.

Cat is offering Malicia a way out. She can offer Malicia pretty much everything she's ever dreamed of. Their goals are ridiculously well aligned here, as are their respective skillsets.

It's all good for Cat to bully Praes a little first, to get herself a good negotiating position... but Alaya is just too useful to shunt off the board, and right now, I'm not convinced theirs any point.

Liliet

Cat needs to be selling the Accords to whom, now?

Wolof is not in any way, shape or form a democracy. Their kindly ruler distributing food to the dispossessed means their kindly ruler OWNS them.

And Cat has just confirmed that their kindly ruler is in no way willing to go against Malicia.

As for Malicia herself, I'm really, really not sure Cat is there to shunt her off the board right there and then. But... she is an unreliable actor. She has proven unreliable to the guy who knows her best, who literally put her on the throne, who trusted her fully and did basically everything she asked for – she had all that, and she pissed it away by going behind his back to do the one (1) thing she knew he wouldn't let her do.

Catherine cannot rely on Malicia in any way, shape or form. This is the main problem at play.

ninegardens

The Fact that Sargon NEEDS to distribute food, means that he NEEDS to have a supply of it in order to own them. It ain't a democracy, but power isn't absolute, and finding ways to sell as many people as possible on the deal is going to make the Accords easier going forward.

She wants the public interest to be high enough that Sargon will look at the accords, and really, she wants a Preas pair of eyes (or five) looking at the Accords and figuring out what edits they'd suggest ASAP.

If she decides to roll Malicia, then the fact that Sargon is owned by her isn't a problem, and if Cat decides to keep Malicia, then she'll want Malicia on board with the Accords, so talking to Sargon is a good opening move.

You raise a VERY good point about Malicia proving unreliable in the past... and I ain't gonna discount it, its concerning... But at the same time, that was when she was facing down the threat of a Crusade. She got desperate. Same way Hasenbach is getting desperate in the face of the DK, and may well activate and angel weapon.

We don't go around saying Hasenbach can't be negotiated with, and the circumstances are largely similar.

If you gave Malicia a deal where she DIDN'T need to face down a Crusade, she would take it... and be much loathed to fuck it up again later (she still might of course. She's a bit of a train wreck some days).

And... that brings back to the point of Selling the Accords to Wolof:

Whoever takes the tower...(or whatever ruleship remains after the tower falls)... that person will eventually die. They'll have a successor. And that person in turn will have a successor.

That Accords will FAIL if the only thing keeping them in place in Preas is the will of the person at the top. You need to nobility to be keen on it. To GET something out of it. And if you want the nobility to stay keen on it, then well one way to achieve that is to get the Merchants in on it (you know, the ones who pay taxes and all).

It's not a democracy, but it is a pyramid, and things at the bottom of the pyramid CAN filter up.
(tbh, I think talking to Sargon directly, as opposed to the populous is probably a more plausible idea, but both are possible)

Liliet

Things at the bottom of the pyramid filtering up need a lot more saturation than "a foreign queen talked to us and made a good point"

Insanenoodlyguy

Wolof won't care as much if Cardinal is half-staffed by hired Wolof. Becomes the point of pride of the city, even. "Cardinal is the place for the best magic... and when they need more Magicians, they come HERE." I imagine a lot of that exists now, but replace Cardinal with "the tower" and the like. Black even said she's going to need to fill Cardinal up with Praesi, and this chapter proved his point.

James, Mostly Harmless

"Mile thaman, Sahelian" (Ever worthy, Sahelian) reminds me of "Shai Dorsai" (true Dorsai).

Frivolous

Jino-waza is an interesting and ethical alternative to the mores I've seen in other fiction about cultures with endemic scarcity and starvation.

Courtship Rite by Donald Kingsbury stands out in my memory as an extreme counter-example, a world that has nothing like jino-waza. The planet Geta practices cannibalism, even.

Speaking of which, I wonder if the Praesi ever bothered with cannibalism. I'm guessing not. Maybe they felt it was too close to greenskin practice.

Xinci

Well Amadeus did warn Cat about eating meat from the street markets in Ater

ninegardens

I'm guessing, when you can sacrifice someone as part of a field ritual, Canabalism probably falls out of favour. It's probably less efficient than just using the person for magical hyperpowered compost (even if, in real world, eating more directly is more efficient.)

There's also the fact that "Human-> Soil -> crops- > food" is better than "Human-> Meat" at avoiding diseases.

Frivolous

Did we ever find out what happens to the bodies of those sacrificed in the field rituals? Because if the ritualists just cut the throat open, the meat might be left behind undamaged.

I guess the Praesi could also just feed the corpses of the sacrificees to pigs. Probably safer and it removes the stigma of direct cannibalism. Though magical healing should remove most, if not all, of the medical consequences thereof.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure during times of starvation no Praesi will leave a dead body just, like, lying there.

jamesc9

I'm used to Malthus, and the population rising until food is scarce again. If pre-conquest Callow was a land of plenty, how was the birth-rate regulated?

Liliet

It's not the birth-rate, it's the death-rate, of reasons other than starvation 😊

naturalnuke

Steal the books and hold them for ransom!

Rey d`Tutto

Stab them and take their stuff!

ninegardens

Unrelated to story, but just wanted to say, your profile pic is fabulous

Silverking

...I think this discussion is a big factor of why Hakram needed to convince Vivienne that "she was worth a hand" back when they were running Callow while Cat was hunting the Drow. Because for all of his skill in administration and Juniper's skill in martial matters, the simple fact was that Callow is made up of a hundred little songs that they didn't know the words to. They could set up any number of policies that would seem perfectly beneficial, but they could also trip up on some custom or reasoning that would feel obtuse to them but perfectly natural to Vivienne. I believe the saying goes, "Culture is the thing you don't realize you have until you go somewhere else and realize they do something differently."

Pyrdwein

Please bring back the recent chapter list at the bottom of the page rather than just the latest chapter link. I have followed this work religiously for years but it's hard to keep my place without accidentally skipping ahead with the new system.

I don't want to sound ungrateful because I genuinely love your writing, and if you ever decide to publish I will be buying copies for myself and my brothers just to spread the love. They won't read serial novels, despite the fact you have completed several books already and it drives me nuts because both absolutely love this kind of writing.

Either way, I just miss the easy access to the most recent chapters.

Chapter 8: Access

"Note: Cousin Onoko's assertion that 'blood is thicker than water' was in fact correct, despite my initial assumption otherwise. Add in the silence that followed the experiment, and it can be considered an unequivocal success."

– Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II

The ruling seat of the Sahelians was called the Empyrean Palace. Pretentious fucking name really, even if it was probably as fancy as it sounded, but no one had asked me. Not that it'd ever stopped me from sharing my thoughts before, or in this particular case. Strangely enough, Akua disagreed with me. The palace's foundations were the oldest in the city, and though it'd begun small over the centuries it had turned into a real behemoth of a place. That was an advantage in the sense that it was difficult to entirely prevent entry into it, as there were simply too many entrances and too many people using them, but the rulers of Wolof had seen to their defences with characteristic thoroughness. Akua drew at knifepoint in the dirt of our quarters' floor, first outlining three squares in a loose but noticeable curve.

"The Emyrean Palace is divided into seven different wings," she said. "These three are the outer section, the easiest to access. The central wing contains greeting halls, but the rest is places of little importance – servant quarters and stables, courtyards and gardens."

"We'd planned to go through the eastern wing, right?" Archer asked, crouched over the drawing.

With her unstrung bow kept on top of her knees, she looked like she was crouching by a campfire instead of a loose plan.

"We did," I agreed. "And odds are we still will. It's heavy on gardens, so it'll be easier to sneak through."

"The difficulty begins when we are inside the western wing," Akua said.

She drew small lines connecting the three squares, standing for open paths and halls.

"Getting into any of these wings from the outside is achievable, but movement between the wings is strictly limited," Akua elaborated. "Each of them has its own largely independent staff, largely to prevent infiltrations like ours – unknown faces are simply not allowed through. Which leaves us only one direction to go in."

She drew a rectangle vertically, nestled against the squares like a hammer's handle, and the deftly connected the three squares to it by single strokes.

"This is the Grand Gallery," the golden-eyed woman said. "It is the sift through which sneaks and agents are removed before they can reach the vital sections of the palace. It bears the great hall where formal banquet are held. Adjoining it are both the public kitchens and a set of private parlours. No guard or servant can enter the Gallery without holding an enchanted token, given out by the steward of another wing. Being caught without one means arrest if you are lucky, but most often summary execution."

I went fishing through the bag where the last two vials of the water breathing potion were and produced three small copper amulets. Detailed engravings were around the rim, and at the centre a single pearl bore a small enchantment. I set them down besides the plan.

"Scribe obtained these tokens for us," I said. "They're imitations, but very good ones. Eyes of the Empire have used them with success in the past."

The enchantments usually changed every few months, I'd been told, and Sargon had kept to that pattern. In the wake of his chaotic ascension to power, however, the Eyes had been able to subvert people in a few key mage cadres. The fakes were current, as even though Scribe had lost control of the spy network in Praes to Lady Ime she still had... contacts. Favours for call in that she'd kept for a rain day.

"That gets us into the Gallery," Akua agreed. "But not forward. To leave the Grand Gallery and move deeper into the palace, one must pass through one of the three threshold-gates. Each is warded, and there is no enchanted ward key: the only way not to be affected is to be keyed in with blood at the appropriate ward stone well beyond the corresponding gate."

She drew three small arcing slices above the rectangle, then a square facing each. The moment she finished, she cut through the left square with a decisive stroke.

"Issa's Garden has served as the personal quarters to the ruling Sahelian and their direct family for the last century and a half, but it was where my mother made her death-grounds," Akua calmly said. "Even after years of ritual purging, there are still motes of taint and so the ruins remain unused."

She drew a stroke through the centre square.

"The Empyrean Hall is the heart of the palace," she continued. "It holds many of the wonders my kin have accumulated over the years, including the enchanted ceiling for which the palace is named. Sargon will be using the old formal living quarters that were raised there and it is also where the treasury vault."

"We had an in there," I said. "I have a bottle of blood from a servant who is keyed into the wards, and I've learned a Night-trick that could exploit that to sneak us in with a little help from my patronesses. The trouble is that right now that place will be fucking packed to the gills. Forget the wards, it's the guards that would be a problem."

Akua withdrew her dagger, smoothly rising to her feet. As if to distance herself from the entire mess, she even took a step back to lean against the wall and arc an eyebrow at me.

"So you want us to hit the last wing," Archer nodded, looking at me.

"The Vaults," I said. "It's partially a mage village, partially a large library and underneath are all the artefacts the Sahelians believe too precious to see the light of day."

"Or too dangerous," Akua pointedly said. "If Sargon succeeded at binding Insipientia again, its artefact-prison will be there. The Weeping Snares he used when he came to parley are kept in a vault there, and so are over a dozen other makings in the same league."

"So we what, release all these beasties into the library?" Indrani asked, frowning. "I guess it'd be a kick in the guts – Hells, if they get loose it'll bring the city to its knees – but it doesn't sound like your usual plans. Gonna be a lot of dead servants to go with the dead soldiers and the dead mages."

A lot worse than that, should a demon be loosed in the city once more.

"No," I said. "We're going to steal the library, Indrani. All of it. And then, to make it clear I'm in a foul mood, we're going to rob the artefact vaults too."

Indrani laughed, openly delighted, but this was a more calculated move than she might think. I'd be holding two knives at High Lord Sargon's throat by clearing those out, though he wouldn't realize quite how bad it was until we sat at the negotiating table again. Akua cleared her throat.

"I have no opposition to such a plan in principle," she said. "But in practice, I have a question: how are we going to get past the ward?"

She pointed at the threshold-gate leading into the Vaults. You know, that gate we didn't have a handy blood vial for that'd maybe allow us to trick the wards. Servants never got keyed into two wardstones, presumably in case of this very sort of situation.

"I don't have a way to get us past the ward," I bluntly said.

The admission took them both aback.

"But," I continued, "I know some people who can get past them."

The Eyes of the Empire had people in the mage cadres that enchanted the tokens for the outer palace, and those mage cadres lived in the Vaults. Meaning that the Eyes had an in. And, as it happened, we knew where their safehouses in Wolof were – it paid to have the woman who'd first set them up in your service.

"And how are you going to get them to help us?" Akua skeptically asked.

"I am going to use," I toothily grinned, "tact and diplomacy."

—

Night sunk deep into the wood, spreading out in wavy cracks, and a heartbeat later the floor shattered.

We dropped down in a rain of shards and broken floorboards, landing in the middle of what looked more like some tavern's common room than the spy hideout it was. I landed on the table, swallowing a moan of pain — Gods but I wished I could have brought my staff into Wolof — while Archer threw herself on a surprised man and knocked him down. Akua already had a knife at the throat of a second when I checked, which left me the two seated at the table on which I now stood. Wait, no, only one. The woman in the dress had been knocked unconscious by a falling floorboard. That left only the bearded man in front of me, who was currently gaping and bleeding from the face where a wood shard had flown into his cheek.

"Good evening, Eyes of the Empire," I cheerfully said. "Who's in charge here?"

The young woman — barely more than a teenager — that Akua had a knife on began tearing up. She was shaking, obviously terrified.

"Please don't hurt us," she hurried out. "We'll be Eyes if you want us to, I'm sure you're right."

"I curse you to be silent," I spoke in Crepuscular, and Night flared.

Her mouth kept moving, but not a sound followed. The flash of horror in her eyes then was significantly more genuine than the previous theatrics. The man at my feet had his hand on the handle of a knife, but he stopped short of unsheathing it when he saw I'd caught him.

"So not her," I said, cocking an eyebrow. "Did she seriously think that would work?"

It wasn't like we'd picked this place out of a hat.

"She is young," the bearded man sighed. "Good evening, Your Majesty. For the sake of this conversation, you may consider me to be in charge."

Meaning he likely wasn't. I glanced at the unconscious woman to his left and then at the poor bastard that Archer had in an absent-minded stranglehold, then decided there was no point in pushing for someone else to speak.

"Name?" I asked.

"I am Ekon, Your Majesty," he said.

I met his eyes with mine.

"If I have you a choice between doing me a favour and having your soul fed to Sve Noc, Ekon," I said. "Which would you end up leaning, d'you think?"

He swallowed drily, but his face remained admirably calm. He must have been his forties, I thought, but his age was not wearing hard on him. Spying must pay well.

"All things considered, Your Majesty," he said, "I would be inclined to the favour."

"Good man," I smiled, and moved to ease myself down the table.

I dropped down the floor by the unconscious woman, studying her in passing just to be sure she wasn't faking. No, it looked quite genuine: her head was swelling where she'd been struck, which would be very difficult to fake, and her hand was not clutching a knife but a... pipe? I leaned in close and sniffed. Well, I'd be damned. For the what, probably the third time now? Still, Below was smiling on me tonight. I snatched up the pipe, which was already filled with wakeleaf, and offered my good friend Ekon a smile.

"Don't worry about it, I'm not asking you to turn on Malicia," I said. "Nothing quite so troublesome."

"I am glad to hear it," the man cautiously ventured.

I passed a hand over the pipe, fire flickering in its wake, and grinned around the mouth of my pipe as I breathed in deep of my vice. Ah, that hit the spot.

"Now," I said, "let's talk about how you're going to get us into the Vaults."

Huh, I'd never seen a spy freeze in horror before. That was probably a good sign, right?

—

Ekon had been most helpful, for a man who was going to betray us before this was over.

Under cover of dusk we crept through the gardens, weaving through pools and flowerbeds laid out intricately under the shade of old, twisting trees. Stretches of lilies in pink and pale, delicate orchids in beds whose every rock was sculpted, hibiscus and hyacinth and candelabra flowers. Among them were more... exotic breeds, flowers whose petals slowly changed colours or who moved without need for the breeze. Some even had veins of light, or sweated droplet of mist-like purple instead of dew. We steered clear of the menagerie, for it was well-guarded and there were creatures within that even we should stay wary of, and past a curving pool whose waters were full of nenuphars we took a servant's entrance into the western wing.

The pair of guards by the door studied us as we came in but said nothing. We wore servant's livery, after all. I had discarded my eyecloth in favour of a painted stone replacement from the bazaar for my missing eye, knowing it might get me recognized otherwise, and a touch of cosmetics had seen Indrani and I pass as vaguely Taghreb. The days out in the sun had tanned my skin deeper than usual, it was more the cheekbones than the colour that gave me away as being of Deoraithe extraction.

Once we were inside the western wing proper, not the outside part, we hugged the length of the servant quarters as we headed deeper in. At this time of the evening they were mostly empty, save for the children and the kinsmen raising them, so simply looking like we had a purpose was enough for the few servants we encountered to steer clear of us. Twice we encountered patrols, a handful of soldiers in Sahelian livery who lost interest in us immediately the moment Akua showed them a fake token. I was too on my guard to truly allow my gaze to drift around, but I did get glimpses of our surroundings. Tapestries were common and colourful, with complicated patterns whose motif changed from corridor to corridor. Painted wood was used as a sort of gilding along walls, and we had yet to encounter a single torch: it was all magelights.

It was almost bafflingly easy to make it into the Grand Gallery. We showed our tokens to the guards manning the hallway leading to it, faked smiles when a young man tried a joke about our 'coming here often' – he was eyeing Indrani pretty hard, but it wasn't exactly the kind of inspection we should be worried about – and were sent in. Within half an hour of having set foot in the Emyrean Palace, we we'd reached the Gallery. Akua had only described it in passing as having statues of her ancestors, but she'd undersold it significantly. The Grand Gallery was at least half a mile long and maybe half that in length? More than that, the 'statues' were in full armour and almost eerily lifelike. They were on tall pedestals, and a quick glance at the names under them told me what I was looking at: former High Lords and Ladies of Wolof.

I didn't dare linger, moving across the white and pink marble floor as quickly as I could without drawing attention. There were more people here, but the Gallery itself wasn't really bustling: it was the side parlours and the kitchens that were alive, swarming with people. I leaned closer to Akua, eyeing one of the statues wearing colourful scale and a short sword that looked like a decent fit for me.

"Think we could grab from those before we head into the Vaults?" I murmured.

We'd had to leave behind arms and armour, which had me feeling very naked at the moment. The servant livery was pretty nice, red and white cloth with black accents, but it wouldn't stop so much as a kitchen knife – much less good steel.

"It is all cursed," Akua replied in a murmur of her own. "Every single piece. It is a rite of passage for any Sahelian capable of magic to devise a curse of their own and replace one of the fading ones when they are fifteen."

Of course it was all fucking cursed, I sighed. Mildly curious, I cast a look around.

"So who'd you curse up?" I asked.

"One of my namesakes," she smiled. "The third of that name, and most distinguished – she held Wolof against foreign armies in the wake of First Crusade."

"So what'd you put in?" Indrani asked, looking enthused. "Is it rot? It's always rot with you Praesi types."

"Partial bone liquefaction," Akua replied, sounding proud. "And I tweaked the curse so that the most common counter-spells would work, but then trigger a second curse that liquefies the skin instead."

I wrinkled my nose even as Archer let out an impressed noise. Nasty stuff. Definitely a no on nabbing weapons. We got stopped five times. The first was a simple token check, the second a warning by a pair of guards to avoid the Green Parlour – noble guests were using it – but the third almost outed us. Not because of an interrogation, but because an older servant ordered us to help him and another man carry a large wooden table into a parlour. The weight on my bad leg was atrocious, and though I kept the pain from my face the older man complained of our slow pace several times. Akua begged us off as needing to report to the Master of Ceremonies as soon as she could and we made a getaway.

Twice more we were asked to show tokens, and I noticed we were being asked more frequently than the people coming and going. I pointed out as much to Akua, who nodded.

"Our guards are trained to ask the token the moment they do not recognize a face," she explained.

Made sense, and so far the deception had held. We could only hope it'd continue to. It was near the end of the corridor, by the statue of High Lord Nassor, that we waited. Archer asked, and so we learned that the man was Akua's great grand uncle, whose daughter had been assassinated and usurped by Akua's own grandfather. Amusingly enough, Sargon was related to the man through his own mother and so it could be considered that their branch had somewhat returned to power. Sahelian family politics were like a rolling wheel of murder, it sounded like. I caught sight of someone passing through the threshold-gate to the Vaults from the corner of my eye and stiffened.

"That's her," I said. "Green stone necklace and grey robes, like our friend said."

Taiwo Bauna was a stout and respectable-looking woman into her middle age, with pale brown eyes that often saw her taken as more highborn than she actually was. By all reports, she was a fairly skilled enchanter with a good position among the enchanting cadres of the Sahelian vassal mages. She also liked losing a dice games and racking up debt doing it, apparently, which had been how the Eyes got to her. There were two guards by the door, and neither spoke a word as she passed them. She found us without difficulty, having been told of where we would be waiting. Her face was blank as she took us in, not bothering with greetings.

"You'll be bringing treats the kitchen I ordered," she said. "Honeybread, which they don't make in our own. Follow and be silent. I can only buzz the wards for three heartbeats before it triggers one of the deeper alarms, so you'll have to cross quickly."

"Understood," I simply replied.

It must not have been the first time she did this, I thought, for the wrapped and warm honeybread was waiting for us when we arrived in the kitchen. My leg complained of having to double back halfway through the Grand Gallery, but I kept myself under control. We were close, now was not the time to whine. She led the way as we returned to the threshold-gate, where we slowed. Moments before she crossed the gate, colourful lights began to swirl in the open air. The guards glanced at each other, then her. Taiwo sighed.

"I'll talk to Lord Luba," she told them. "It's been happening too often for it to be happenstance, the anchor patch must have been flawed."

"Please do," a tall man said, voice smooth. "I apologize for the delay, but you will have to wait until the lights fade before crossing."

None of us argued, and moments after the last splash of colour faded we followed Taiwo past the threshold. There was no smell of ozone, no movement of power, not a damned thing. We were in. We walked quickly, hurrying down an ornate hallway until we'd reached a great antechamber that Akua had described as the beginning of the Vaults. Taiwo turned towards us, snatching the wrapped honeybread out of Archer's hands.

"Tell Alazi that this settles the debt," she said. "And if she hasn't arranged someone to take the fall, I'll be selling you all out before I'm even thrown in a cell."

"Of course," I replied. "She'll be in touch."

"She better not," Taiwo Bauna darkly said, and walked away.

Well, I thought, it was a good thing we already had someone who knew her way around here. I unwrapped the honeybread, biting into the warm loaf and feeling it crunch under my teeth pleasantly. I grimaced a heartbeat later, though: way too much cinnamon and honey. Too sweet for me. I passed it to Archer, who took a bite of her own and let out a little moan of pleasure. We hadn't had time to eat, so I really wished Taiwo had picked up bowls of stew or something instead.

"Let's get moving," I said. "Akua, you know the way to the library?"

"In my sleep," she drily replied.

Not exactly a surprise. Much like Masego she was a natural talent in matters of magic, but talent wasn't enough – to become as good as she had been, when she'd still had magic, you needed to work. We followed her. Archer ate the entire honeybread, purely to avoid question being asked she assured us, and I let my gaze wander through the empty halls of the Vaults. Most of the mages would be eating around now, or out on duty: it was some time before we encountered another soul, and even then it was another servant.

There were no tapestries here, the walls adorned instead with mosaics and steles in a style I did not recognize – it wasn't from the Free Cities, there was no paint, but it was strikingly vivid anyway – while the ceiling above us arced gently into what appeared to be the night sky. It was a lesser form of the enchantment covering the ceiling of the Empyrean Hall, Akua told us, one that changed only between night and day. It was used by younger mages as a practice before they were allowed to work on the real masterwork. How long was it before we reached the library? I wasn't quite sure, I was tense enough time was hard to parse without focusing. Whatever the truth, we eventually came to stand before great iron gates. Twice as tall and tall as a man, they were sculpted with the figures of twisting devils offering knowledge to men and later being made to kneel to them. I remained at a wary distance, remembering how I'd once nearly gotten myself killed by mouthing off at the Tower's front door.

"And our way in?" Indrani asked. "I'm not seeing knockers or a lock."

"It requires a spell," Akua said. "A variation on a formula taught to all who have the right to enter this hall, and which changes twice a day. Fortunately, there is a trick to it."

She laid a ghostly hand against the iron door, near a grinning devil's face, and closed her eyes. Her arm became as dark fog, flowing gently along the iron. The fog narrowed into small tendrils that went along certain lines of the sculpture – a face there, a staff or horns or a tower – and after a long time she breathed out.

"There," Akua Sahelian said, smirking a moment before a small click was heard at the gates unlatched.

I breathed out, rolled my shoulder.

"All right," I said. "Archer, you know what your job is."

"Clean-up," she grinned.

That was one way to put it.

"Akua, with me," I said. "I can't hold the entire thing in the Night, and there'd be no point. It's not the common works we're after, it's those that aren't in anyone else's library."

"I know the sections," she agreed.

And their defences too, which would be important. There was simply no way that the gates were the entire set of protections on something as essential to the Sahelians as this library. I'd bet they even encouraged young mages to sneak it past this door to sharpen them up a bit. The good stuff, though, would be kept away from where people could easily get at it.

"Then let's go," I ordered.

Archer took the lead, opening the door just enough we were able to slip through. I wasted half a heartbeat to the wonder of what I was looking at – this was large as a cathedral, and most of it books! – before focusing on the immediate. Which was a handful of white-robed scholars congregating around a great table near the entrance and paying us no attention, while a squadron of twenty guards kept watch from a raised platform to our right. Those did notice us, but the initial alarm at the sight of us somewhat faded at the sight of Akua following us in: she had changed her appearance to be matching the white robes of the scholars here. We still got a pair of guards coming down our way, frowning.

Akua and I moved towards the scholars and Indrani towards the pair, pace brisk. I scanned the room around us, taking in the tower stacks in the middle of the great hall and the upwards layers on the walls – almost like the inside of a ship – but I found no one looking at us from there. So far our only witnesses were the people I'd seen. Four scholars, I saw, and as we approached one of them turned to us with a cocked eyebrow. He was looking at Akua, trying to place her face and failing. I was, meanwhile, looking at the table. Not the books but the rest. I found something suitable, a paring knife for quills next to an inkwell. Less than a dozen feet between us and the scholars now. From the corner of my eye I saw Indrani pass behind tall stacks, the guards catching up to her there. There wasn't a sound, but a few heartbeats later she moved out quickly and with a sword in hand. The guards above hadn't noticed a thing, and likely wouldn't until it was too late. Only a few feet away from the scholars now, and another one was looking at us with similar confusion.

"My apologies," the first man said, "but why did you bring a servant here? You ought to know they are not allowed, save with a Sahelian. What is your name?"

Ah, the poor fucker. He'd handed her a line and not even known it. Akua met his eyes and smiled, that pretty little number she liked to pull out when she was about to ruin someone's day.

"Akua," she said, hand coming to rest on the neck of a scholar with her back to us, "Sahelian."

Fear flooded the man's face, even as the shade idly snapped the scholar's neck. Calmly, I snatched the paring knife and flicked my wrist after taking a heartbeat to aim – it went right into the man's eye, and he fell down twitching. Well, at least it'd spare him the embarrassment of admitting that Akua had technically been allowed to bring us here. Talk about awkward. One of the survivors squawked in terror, the other one tipping as he backed away from the table hastily, but we were already moving. Akua flowed over the table smoothly, dropping down on the one who'd tripped, while I claimed a silver inkwell and smashed it into the side of the squawker's head.

He tried to ward me off with raised hands, but a jab in the stomach had him dropping his guard and I finished the job with another blow on the temple. He was unconscious, not dead, so I went to get the paring knife and finished the man off with it while Akua strangled the last one. I allowed myself one breath of relief after it was done, only then turning to look at the platform above. There'd been no alarm raised while we killed the scholars, which was a good sign. As if prompted, Archer appeared at the edge of the platform with a sword in hand – and going through a guard's stomach. The man slumped and tumbled over the railing, falling below with a dull metallic bang. I winced at the noise.

"Go hunting," I said. "We can't afford being caught too early."

I was not yelling, but she was Named: she'd be able to hear me anyway. She nodded, vanishing behind stacks.

"Can you hide the bodies?" I asked Akua.

"I suppose," she said, wrinkling her nose. "I've never had to dispose of my own kills before, dearest, much less someone else's."

I rolled my eye at her.

"I'm sure you'll manage somehow," I said.

"And people wonder why we build tiger pits," Akua muttered.

I hid my amusement, instead closing my eyes and finding my calm. I began murmuring prayer in Crepuscular, Night flowing freely through my veins. I could feel the attention of the Sisters, their eagerness and their hunger. Good.

Now it was time to rob this place blind.

ruduen

Ah, the poor fucker. He'd handed her a line and not even thrown the word 'boost' in it.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

therealgridlock

Typo thread!

"If I have you a choice between doing me a favour"

>"Gave you"

" I smiled, and moved to easy myself down the table."

>"Ease myself down from the table"

In conjunction with

"I dropped down the floor by the unconscious woman,"

>"Dropped down to the floor"

"Some even had veins of light, or sweated droplet of mist-like purple instead of dew."

>"Sweat droplets of mist-like purple liquid instead of dew"

Unless they sweat a gas? Lol

"We steered clear of the menagerie, for it was well-guarded and there were creatures within that even we should stay wary of, and past a curving pool whose waters were full of nenuphars we took a servant's entrance into the western wing."

This is a terrible run-on sentence, coupled with what the heck is a nenuphar? Would be easier to say "past a curving nenuphar-filled pool we took" because "filled with nenuphars" is describing the pool, in English adjectives normally come before nouns. Red dress.

"She also liked losing a dice games and racking up debt doing it,"

>"At dice games"

"You'll be bringing treats the kitchen I ordered,"

>I believe it's missing a from. "From the kitchen I ordered"

"purely to avoid question being asked she assured us"

>"Questions being asked"

"Twice as tall and tall as a man,"

>Twice as wide? Twice as tall as a man, and half as wide? I don't know what size this is. Twice or one time as tall as a man?

"I'd bet they even encouraged young mages to sneak it past this door"

>"Sneak in past"

"the other one tipping as he backed away"

>Likely "tripping as he backed away" unless literally tipping somehow, and he is described as having tripped a sentence later

"I began murmuring prayer in Crepuscular,"

>"A prayer" or "prayers"

Juff

drew at knifepoint > drew with knifepoint the deftly > then deftly

sift > sieve
Favours for call in > Favours to call in where the treasury vault. > where the treasury vault is.
with tact > tact been his forties > been in his forties half that in length > half that in breadth cursed, I sighed > cursed. I sighed wake of First > wake of the First they don't make in our own (either they > we or our > their) heard at the gates > heard as the gates

TeK

I find it funnier to assume Aqua was threatened by the knife to draw.

sengachi

Gods I love the plan coming together moments of this story.

devildragon777

Theft! The Crows are in a happy place right now, I bet.

Countdown until the place catches on fire? I'm going for 2 chapters from now.

edrey

two, no, at the end of the next chapter. i bet the bard set a little trap in the artifact vault. three demons at least.

Crash

Good odds next chapter ends with "and that is when the smell of smoke hit my nose" possibly as a distraction so they can leave.

dadycoool

Leaning on the echoes of Take with the Night, which is a street urchin's magic? I somehow doubt that the "Robbing the place blind" part is what's going to go wrong.

Darkening

I mean, she already said the Eye was gonna betray them and Malicia's got a double in the city he could go report to. I imagine there'll be a trap on the way out.

caoimhinh

Not to mention, there's supposed to be someone in Wolof that Malicia is thinking to put in her council to fill Wekesa's place, which hints at that person being a claimant to the Warlock Name.

Darkening

Huh, I've seen that in the comments a bit, but I don't think I noticed that in the story, where did that come up?

RoflCat

From the prologue of this book:

Dread Empress Malicia went still. Wolof, which was on the other side of the empire from any sort of ally of Callow's. Wolof, whose high lord she held in her thrall. Wolof, where Malicia had laid seeds for a great victory – the filling of a fourth seat at this very table.

caoimhinh

Malicia mentally monologued about it right at the end of the Prologue of this Book.

Burlyraven

Well, Masego's going to be orgasmic when they get back with these spoils.

Biggest flaw I can see with this plan is that it's very likely that the whole palace can be put into lockdown if something like this does happen. Getting in was probably the easy part, and as often as the ceiling was mentioned, it probably plays a significant role in getting out.

TeK

Oh Gods, not the lockdown.

therealgridlock

At least it's not dread emperor Cuomo in charge of it.

nimelennar

"Ekon had been most helpful, for a man who was going to betray us before this was over."

I can't remember... is there enough Winter left in the Night (and enough Night left in Cat) to make that a very, very bad idea?

TeK

To be fair, having more Winter will not make betrayal less likely.

Darkening

I think they're referring to the ability Cat had to make binding oaths that horribly murder people that break them by putting a piece of Winter into them. Even leaving aside that, there's all sorts of magic oaths in the setting that get used surprisingly rarely. The blood oath she used with Akua that one time would probably work. Though if anyone can free someone from a magic oath it'd be Malicia/Wolof's mages.

mamm0nn

What's more, breaking oaths to the Fey has a more eldritch and absolute consequence to it as well beyond just curses and ire. It's like bad mojo providence, the act of breaking the oath itself holds power even if the Fey doesn't invest any contingencies themselves.

Darkening

Yeah, I think with regular fey it was mostly just that it let them cross into creation full powered to collect, but it's definitely got some providence/story weight to it as well.

TeK

I was somehow tense, waiting for another shoe to drop all the time. But I suppose they are owed some degree of success before everything goes terribly wrong.

Halinn

This is the first part of a plan, it's guaranteed to succeed.

marillius

I mean, this is the backup plan they made after their first plan went horribly wrong. There's definitely going to be drama here but I don't think it's 'shoe drop' bad. Too many of those in a single narrative can get tiring and we already had the Bard show up.

Liliet

Really, Akua is basically back to her roots here, rich family tradition and all

Crash

She's having a great time!

edrey

the plan has really go well, too well and the bard is there looking for a opening, we know what happens next, lets see how much of Wolof is left after this.

Halinn

You're forgetting that the first part of a villainous plan always succeeds. It's not suspicious that it has worked well so far.

taborask

One could argue that the first step was infiltrating the city quietly, which failed because of the Bard. Makes one wonder if she did that on purpose to ensure that the second part would succeed

Lord Haart

Yeah Kairos kept winning by constantly changing plans so the first part would always work. Cat seemed to learn from this but it feels like she forgot it with the DK. Now with Bard in the picture she's on her toes again.

Xinci

Hm, perhaps this will be good. The Praesi probably have some good structures for the Night to steal from, which depending on if Ruin cut away access to knowledge in a permeant or simply laborious maner, may mean they can restructure some parts in ways that are more efficient. Though on matters of scale it could be just as inefficient as the last time, given it would be tailored for Praesi individuals to cadres rather than a entire race. Then again given the Night seems to have had perfect informational transcription for what it had, they could probably get around the individualistic aspects due to the Night being in every Drow.

Its always good to see the varied ways plants and art can develop in Praes.

mamm0nn

Meanwhile, back at the camp Vivienne isn't sure why she's so sad and being left out, but she can feel like she as the former Thief should be invited for something.

Sinead

It would be nice if she stole something from Praes.

I think it would be funny if Vivienne serves as the diplomatic anchor that frees this crew from the 'final bind' from this mission, since it won't go off without a hitch.

Thus in a way stealing a victory.

It's not as nice as her stealing all the gold, but it still may be worth something.

mamm0nn

Or better yet, Vivienne steals the crew.

Earl of Purple

I don't know the things in the fountain, are they fish or decorative sculpture? The nenuphars.

Christian Oaks

Neither they are water lilies

Mental Mouse

Though given that this is Praes, they probably drink blood or something.

beleester

Dang, Archer took down twenty guards without being noticed? She's gunning for Assassin's name.

lordcirth

The guards are mooks; any combat Named can kill 20 of them offscreen, and any stealthy one can do it silently unless the story is really out to get them.

308924810a

The Bard is going to show up at the exact moment where the most forces are available to mess with Cat.

aurikdomi

I see a lot of people commenting on Bard showing up again which I am sure she will, but doesn't she have some sort of cool down after death? Can someone remember what chapter that might be discussed in?

Liliet

Bard cannot appear again in a scene after dying three times. Cat only got her once.

aurikdomi

that's what it is. ty ty

Tom

Insipientia -> Latin to English -> "The Folly"

Nice...

Clmineith

Are we sure Bard actually is the foe here?

I know, she was before, and Cat and co. hate her, and she said she wanted to kill Cat.

But... I wonder.

Bard wants to be freed from her Name/Role/whatever, right? It was why she was so angry when her so-carefully-scenarised death didn't stick.

So, hypothesis: what if she intend to break her Role as the garant of the Good vs Evil game? It's, sorta, what Cat want, too. Of course, Cat hates her, and doesn't trust her, and Bard is not the sort to speaks clearly, but she could be manipulating events for Cat behalf.

If you consider that the trio was aiming for food and gold, and because of Bard will instead get the Vault...

Liliet

I've been saying this since... the break between books 4 and 5, I think.

Lord Haart

It fits even better knowing that she has the upper case G Gods on her shoulder watching her just like Cat has with Sve Nov, so she really has to talk like she hates Cat. Which makes this a very elegant form of self-sabotage, really.

With that said, it's also possible that she really doesn't like Cat at all and is just trying to up the stakes because dying of killing Cat world both feel like wins to her. Cat is a Villain and without her story odds are the DK might still be stuck in Keter and possibly millions or at least many thousands of deaths and sufferings would have been avoided.

Though maybe the crusade would have happened anyway and led to just as much death, and who knows what Akua's plans would have resulted in without Cat around.

Liliet

> With that said, it's also possible that she really doesn't like Cat at all and is just trying to up the stakes because dying of killing Cat world both feel like wins to her.

Valid reading yeah

Storm

I assume the Night can feed and absorb the knowledge in the books?

Chapter 9: Vault

"Eighty-seven: the secret passage your nemesis will use to escape the fortress can be used to enter that same fortress. They never consider that, for some reason."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

I kept my arms open wide and my hands flat, as if I were holding open a bag, but all that lay in between my fingers was shadow.

Akua stood slightly ahead of me, dropping one book after another into the dark. Without a sound they disappeared into the hungry maws of my patronesses, the two of us clearing out row after row as quickly as we could. We'd gone for the restricted sections, the forbidden ones: there was no point in my taking books that'd be in every other great Praesi library. Those sections were all trapped and warded, but I was being guided by someone who knew those traps and wards intimately. We'd been at it less than half an hour, as Archer hunted for anyone we might have missed out in the stacks, but already I'd sent hundreds and hundreds of tomes into the embrace of Sve Noc. Akua almost reverently dropped into the dark what looked like the handwritten notes of someone called Olowe, emptying the last of the shelf, and we stopped.

I looked back at rows and rows of empty shelves behind us, what had once been a section on dimensional mechanics and the technicalities of making a Breach. Not a book left, same as we'd done with necromancy, curses, High Arcana conjuration, three sections on diabolism and a dozen more branches of sorcery. It would have been missing the point to say we'd taken a fortune in books, because what we'd stolen was essentially priceless. There was no replacing any of this for the Sahelians.

"That is the last of the sections I would consider essential," Akua noted. "Unless you want to acquire more common tomes, we are finished."

"That was it?" I asked, skeptical.

"My family has a personal library, naturally," she dismissed. "And the most dangerous volumes will be down in the hidden vaults. Yet for the library, I would consider nothing else here irreplaceable."

I supposed it would have been greedy to ask for a thousand priceless books instead of just a few hundred, I mused, not that it was stopping me. I folded my arms, left over right, and brought them to my chest as I slowly eased my grip on the Night and the darkness faded. The working hadn't been all that strenuous to maintain, but it had taken concentration: I was glad it was done.

"I'll take your word on it," I replied.

If we'd had more time I would have considered emptying the entire place just to make a point, but we didn't. I was, to be frank, surprised the Eyes hadn't betrayed us yet. My bet was on there being another game at play here, one I hadn't quite figured out yet. That tended to be a safe bet when the Intercessor was around. Regardless, we needed to get a move on if we wanted to clear out the artefact vaults as well before this all came down on our heads. We took the stairs down and I cursed every few steps the absence of my staff and the apparently deep and abiding hatred Praesi architects had for handrails. Seriously, would it kill whoever kept building these ridiculous places to throw up a few of those? Take out two of the fucking egg-sized rubies encrusted into one of the wall frescoes and you could pay for those to be done for the entire damned palace. Some of my thoughts came out as grumbling under my breath, I figured, since Akua looked highly amused and offered me her arm for the last few steps. I took it with ill-grace, looking away. I got cackled at for that immediately, Archer popping out from behind stacks with a grin.

"Aw, isn't that cute," Indrani grinned. "If we get to robbing the Tower, is it going to make you hold hands?"

She smelled faintly of blood, I noticed. I cocked an eyebrow at her and she threw me a sheathed short sword about my size.

"Lots of stragglers?" I asked, ignoring the jibe.

I drew the blade, testing the weight, and found it good enough. Not as good as something fitted for me, but it'd do. As I fitted the sheath at my belt, Indrani passed a blade at Akua who nodded thanks in return and got a smile for it.

"Five," Archer replied, "but one of them was a mage. I had to get tricky."

The edge of one of her sleeves was slightly singed, I found with closer study.

"Good work," I simply said. "We're hitting the hidden vaults now. You good to fight?"

"I was promised horrors, Foundling," Indrani grinned. "Hells, why do you think I'm even here?"

Ugh, I bet that pun was even intentional. I truly did have terrible taste in women.

"I'd assumed because you were dared while drunk," Akua drily replied.

"Hey," Indrani replied, offended. "That only works like, a third of a time."

I loudly coughed.

"Fine, maybe closer to half," Archer conceded.

Immediately after she turned to Akua with a scowl, jabbing a finger at her.

"And don't you dare cough too, Petty Poltergeist," she growled. "Half is all I'll go up to."

"I would never dare," Akua lied, smiling prettily.

It was in a better mood that the three of us moved out towards the back of the great library, where the returned once-heiress to Wolof told us that the easiest path into the hidden vaults lay. I'd expected some sort of archway full of damned souls or a corridor swarming with enchantment, but what our quick march there revealed was actually just a set of tall golden doors. Nicely sculpted, if a little heavy on the Wolof-and-particularly-the-Sahelians-are-the-best-look-at-all-these-fools-we-crushed slant. To my admitted bewilderment, Akua then simply grabbed one of the large iron rings on the doors and pulled one open. It revealed a short hallway of bare stone, leading to a steel grate.

"Wait, is that it?" Indrani asked.

She sounded a little cheated.

"That's got to be a trap, right?" I asked, cocking my head to the side.

"Oh, it is," Akua flatly agreed. "There is a secret entrance thirty feet to our left that would allow us to avoid the first two killing rooms, but it would require us to pass through the terror room – and without the proper protective amulets, that would be... unwise."

"Terror room, you say?" Archer idly repeated, sounding dangerous interested.

Of course she would be.

"Magical terror," Akua specified. "As close to the demonic emanation as my forebears could manage. Most people die of a stalling heart within the first ten heartbeats. No, the front path is best suited to our needs."

I considered the stone hall for a moment, humming.

"Floor trap?" I guessed.

"Hand me a book," Akua asked.

Snorting, I grabbed what looked like a primer on the classical elements – could have used you a few years back, buddy, I thought – and began to pass it to her before pausing and glancing at Archer.

"Don't tell Zeze," I said.

"I'd be counted as an accessory," Indrani solemnly replied.

The book went to Akua's hand as she rolled her eyes, tossing it carelessly into the hallway. I glimpsed iron spikes emerging from the walls before the golden door shut. Huh. Akua, looking somewhat aggravated, wrenched open the door again and I stood there to watch as the spiked walls slowly closed in on the middle of the room. Door probably couldn't be opened from the inside, I decided. We stood for a while longer, waiting. Sometimes the walls quickly lurched forward for an inch or two, but most of the time they just... slowly advanced.

"Now that's just asking for a hero to find a way out," I sadly said.

"The mechanisms that make the walls move are deep in the stone," Akua said, sounding a tad defensive. "They can't be changed without load-bearing walls being knocked down."

"How do we get through?" Indrani asked, more pragmatically.

The shade stepped into the hall fearlessly when the walls were near through, slipping around the edge of the right one and disappearing. A few heartbeats later there was a metallic wrenching sound, maybe a lever being pulled, and the walls stopped. They stayed extended, leaving a path maybe a foot wide between the iron spikes that led straight to the door in the back. You could have at least pushed the door to the left so it'd be covered when the wall advanced, you hacks, I silently thought. Akua slipped back around the edge of the wall, reappearing with a smile as she dusted herself off.

"And to cross that?" I asked, pointing at the steel grate.

"The Archer key," the shade gracefully replied.

The Archer in question snorted, stepping forward – Akua flowed around her – and pushing to the end of our little narrow passage. One, two, three, four. On the fourth Name-assisted kick the steel grate toppled down, ripped right off the hinges. I cocked an eyebrow at Akua.

"It is enchanted against blades and lockpicks, not mules," she shrugged.

"I heard that," Indrani called out.

Swallowing a grin, I shimmied through and followed the shade over the fallen grate. It brought us to another stone hall, this one rather more ornate than the last. The walls were covered with mosaics in the Sahelians colours whose patterns felt... oddly fascinating – I wrenched away my eyes forcefully – and whose floor was checkered marble in black and white. At the end I saw an open stone doorway and what looked like curving stairs going down. The three of us were huddled in a small antechamber between the halls, and out of curiosity I looked up. Yeah, as I'd figured the stone archway here had small depression in the rocks.

"Stone door falls down here and over there," I mused. "I'm calling... pit trap?"

"Oh," Indrani gurgled. "That's an old one. Is it the black or white tiles that make it work?"

"There are triggers under both," Akua sighed. "And the floor itself is not trapped. Once the doors close, the mosaic shifts in some places and begins releasing alchemical gas."

"What's it do?" Archer asked,

"It was a forgetfulness mixture, when I left," Akua noted.

"Prevented memory recall longer than five heartbeats. It could be anything now, of course."

"And we beat this how?" I asked.

It was too long for us to jump our way across, although maybe if I used Night...

"The stone doors open again once the monitoring enchantment senses that there is no longer gas in the air," she said. "I know where the openings are, so Catherine and I simply need to block them until the trap begins to reset. We'll have a window of four heartbeats to cross."

"That's very unsporting," I approved.

She pointed out where in the mosaics – near what looked like a swirl of pale eyes – we'd need to act and then we moved out. The doors immediately fell down from the ceiling, blocking the paths out, but what followed was almost absurdly mundane. I did not use Night or a Name trick, simply jamming my thumb into the opening and then waiting for a while as the doors began to rise again. We ran, Indrani snickering the whole time, and made it to the stairs before the trap activated again. We went down slowly, catching our breath, and I cast a consternated look behind us.

"I don't understand why your ancestors didn't just layer a hundred wards," I admitted. "This stuff can be beaten, a hundred different layers of protection changed every few years can't."

"We are in the Vaults, my darling," Akua replied. "It is presumed that anyone who made it this far into the Emyrean Palace has the help of traitors within our own. Wards can be crossed in the snap of a finger, with the right helper. This? This cannot."

I was about to object some more when she silenced me with a finger.

"These were the easiest of rooms, my heart," she said. "Now that we are below, tricks such as I used will find little bite."

Straight from the start we were faced with a crossroads, the paths going to the left and right. The left side, Akua explained, was where the other entrance above would have led to directly. The terror room.

"And where we're headed?" I asked.

The hallway here had mosaics much like those above, dangerous to look at for too long, which I figured was actually pretty clever on the part of the builders. You couldn't see the traps coming if you couldn't risk looking at your surroundings for long. Wouldn't want to be one of the poor fuckers in charge of cleaning this place, though. Maybe they had wards in place to prevent it getting dusty?

"Straight into the illusion room and the duelling room, then we may access the first vault," Akua replied, leading us to another steel grate.

It required Archer's tender attentions once more, but when forced off the hinges it did not fall into the room beyond it. Anchored by enchantments, our guide noted, and so we 'opened' the broken thing as if we'd used a key. Beyond was a hall that was entirely mosaic, that confounding little number we'd been walking through. Here it covered the floor and ceiling too, though, and led to another steel grate. I risked small glimpses at the floor, finding pale eyes there like those that'd covered the gas exits above us, but I bit my lip. Something was wrong here, itching at me. I felt the presence of the Sisters fill me like cold water, Komena nudging my chin to look right instead of- the illusion broke and I let out a gasp.

"Fuck me," I murmured. "The spell here makes you twist left and right for up and down."

"Yes," Akua said, sounding pleased. "And so draw the eye away from this..."

She shimmied in front of me, dipping her foot into what my mind still insisted was the right wall, and the mosaic vanished. Under it was a sharp drop and even sharper steel spikes. Ah, lovely.

"There's a safe way through?" I asked.

"Indeed," Akua replied. "Archer?"

I turned to look at Indrani, who had her eyes closed and was muttering under her breath. She opened her eyes once, quickly glancing at the floor and then closing them again. Twice more she did that, looking angrier and angrier, until on the third she drew back her sleeve and bit her forearm hard enough blood came out. She looked again, eyes hard, and only then offered me a wild grin.

"It's fine, ladies," Archer said. "I can See it now. Mind couldn't get around trying to believe two things at the same time."

It was useful now and then to be reminded of how fucking dangerous Indrani actually was. Akua had been raised here and I had goddesses helping me see through this. Her? It was Name and grit that got her through. And somehow, now that she'd seen through the spell, I suspected that no other one like it would ever fool her again. We crossed the floor like children holding hands in dark woods, moving across the complex back and forth pattern that Akua unerringly led us through until we'd reached the door on the other side. Solid copper, this one, and our guide opened it by ghosting a hand through the lock and picking it with her own 'fingers'. It popped open, revealing another short antechamber leading into another hall.

This one, which she'd called the duelling room earlier, was little more than bare stone and mosaic walls save for the five longswords that'd been sheathed in stands of copper. It was a thick steel door that awaited us at the end of the hall, with no visible lock or pull.

"So we draw a sword and fight an opponent for each one we draw?" Indrani guessed.

"Not at all," Akua laughed. "Pulling swords only makes parts of the floor fall away into spikes when the monster is unleashed. It is the touch of flesh on the door that begins the duel."

"And how does the door open?" I asked.

"An enchanted key, which we do not have," Akua said.

I glanced at the steel door in the back and Archer did the same.

"I'm not sure I can force my way through that with brute strength," she admitted.

"We will not need to," the shade said. "The swords are, naturally, all cursed."

"Naturally," I drily echoed.

"The second blade from the right should have a particularly nasty rotting curse on it that I believe will damage the door enough to reveal the lock, if pressed in the right place," Akua said. "I should be able to pick said lock from there."

"And you have no flesh to rot," I mused. "All right, that'll work. That leaves Indrani and I to handle whatever creature comes out. You have any notion of what it'll be?"

"It used to be giant scorpion, but it should have died by now," Akua noted. "It shouldn't be too difficult an opponent, given the breakdown of relations with Aksum. That is where all the most... difficult creatures tend to come from."

I nodded.

"Can we use the other blades against the beastie?" Indrani asked.

"Alas, it is always bespelled to be protected when put away here," Akua said.

It was typical of Praesi highborn, I thought, that though a great many of them were utterly and irremediably mad their madness somehow turned out to be in some ways sensible and organized. It was a thorough sort of lunacy, and all the more dangerous for the thoroughness being married to the absence of sense in most other ways. I unsheathed the blade at my hip, rolling my wrist to limber it and stretching my limbs carefully. Archer gave me an amused look but did the same, Akua patiently waiting for us to be done.

"Where's it going to come from?" I asked.

The shade simply pointed upwards. Of course it was, I sighed. I looked at Archer, who nodded in approval.

"Get us started, Akua," I said.

Smoothly she walked up the swords and pulled out her chosen one from the copper stand, darting away afterwards. There was no visible sign of the curse she'd mentioned on the sword, but I could smell the scent of power in the air. She'd not lied when she called the enchantment on that nasty. Three heartbeats passed before a floor panel of about nine feet by three shattered into neat pieces and revealed a spiked pit below even as the ceiling shifted above us. There were three birdlike screeches as a massive form – Gods, large as two oxen at least – dropped down from above between Indrani and I. Two thoughts came to me about at the same time. First off, Akua had been rather optimistic when she'd assumed that the giant scorpion had died of old age.

Second, this was not a noise a scorpion should be able to make.

"Why does this thing have faces on its back?" I asked.

"Better question," Archer mused, "why are they all screaming?"

I ducked away from a lightning-quick strike of a stinger the size of my head, the massive scorpion trying to trample Indrani as it kept me away. She slid under it, laughing in glee as something in its belly began spitting out acid that she only narrowly avoided, and I chopped away at one of its bony legs to distract it. Bony was the right term for it, I found out, the bloody carapace was hard as bone. And that was just the leg, the body would be worse. That left the eyes to strike at or, urgh, the... faces. Which were still screaming, looking like damned souls sown into chitin and singing out their eternal torment. Hells, they actually might be. It turned its attention to me as Archer put distance between her and the tail, pincers twitching. I kept close to the wall, throwing myself to the side at the last moment when it struck and smiling at the screeches of pain it let out when the pincer hit solid stone.

"I am working the lock," Akua calmly called out.

"Archer, let's not fight the damn thing," I screamed.

"Boo," Indrani screamed back.

Her shout drew back its attention and it stabbed away at her repeatedly with the stinger, growing angrier as she kept dodging at the last moment, and I darted close to its face to make sure it had to keep its attention divided. The pincers came at me from both sides, but the anglers were predictable. Anger was making it sloppy. It grew even angrier a moment later, when Indrani finally baited it into a stinger strike at the angle for her to cut off the entire thing after she dodged. Even as it screeched I took the opportunity to land a few hacks at its eyes, black fluid dripping everywhere, and retreated as it began to attack blindly.

"Around the spikes," I yelled at Indrani.

There was a narrow strip between the walls and the floor that'd dropped, and with the scorpion partly blinded now was the time to make us of it. I began to cross towards the latter half the hall, where Akua was kneeling before the door, and Archer did the same a moment later. With any luck the bloody thing would try to follow us and fall to its death. Halfway through I turned to have a glance and had a moment of triumph when I saw the monster was following us, but it was short-lived. The scorpion's legs unfolded further with a wet wrenching side, and hoisted him up by pushing against both walls. Oh fuck me, I thought as it began to walk on the walls to catch up to us.

"Akua," I screamed.

"I am nearly done," she replied.

The tail Archer had cut was leaking black blood everywhere, but it could still serve as a whip. As I discovered when it snapped after me, forcing me to hop forward on my bad leg and nearly fall to my death.

"Akua," I screamed.

"And done," she replied.

I heard the door open with a click and threw myself on solid ground, landing in a painful. Archer was already there and she helped me up, dragging me as we broke into a run towards the open door. The monster was behind us, pincers lashing out as it landed on the solid stone with a clattering sound, but Indrani threw me through the doorway and I heard her stumbled through as I flopped on my belly. Akua slammed closed the door, not quite quickly enough to silence the screeches of rage from the monstrous scorpion. All three of us dropped to the floor for a while after that, catching our breath.

"So the scorpion might still be alive," I solemnly told Akua.

There was a moment of silence, then all three of us began laughing in spasms. The merriment passed, but it'd done us some good. Even better was that we were now going to get into our first vault of the night. The room we opened did not look like the fabulous gold-and-gem-laden treasury my imagination had conjured up. Disappointingly enough, the large vault looked more like an orderly storage house than anything else. The goods were interesting, at least. A dozen enchanted swords and twice as many armours, a bow made of dragonbone – which Indrani pawed lustfully at – and several banners whose cloth was woven with spells that inspired either valour or fear. There was also a saddle made of what I suspected to be human skin, which I almost hesitated to take. Well, the Sisters probably wouldn't mind even if it was. It was minor artefacts aside from that, mostly enchanted jewelry and amulets.

"Prestige pieces," Akua told me. "All were crafted by famous practitioners. It is a traditional way to reward a subordinate without overly empowering them."

"Well," I shrugged, "into the Night they go."

It didn't take long to clear it all out, Archer reluctantly parting with the bow when it was pointed out to her that she did not have arrows to go with it.

"Left now," Akua said. "It will bring us to three adjoining vaults."

Huh, that did sound rather tempting.

"What's in the way?" I asked, and before she could answer I got my response.

It was, uh, remarkably straightforward.

"This is an acid pool," Archer said, looking down at, well, that.

"So it is," Akua cheerfully replied.

It was maybe three feet below the threshold we stood at, and there was no way to tell how deep it ran. The length of the hallway was at least thirty feet, which made it a laughable notion to try jumping.

"How do people usually get through it?" I asked.

"They bring a specially crafted silver bridge," Akua smiled.

"With a mage around you could make a bridge across out of shields," Indrani noted.

A heartbeat later, there was a little shiver across the room as a pulse of... something went through the air. I cocked an eyebrow at Akua.

"Raw magic," she said. "It would disrupt any ongoing spell formula. Anyone trying to cross on a shield panel would..."

She glanced meaningfully at the gently simmering acid. Lovely.

"I'm pretty sure Night won't be disrupted," I frowned.

"My ancestors did not, in fact, plan for the human herald of drow goddesses to infiltrate their vaults and then use a largely unheard of and poorly understood power to make a bridge across their acid pool," Akua confirmed, her tone holding the faintest note of sarcasm. "How short-sighted of them indeed."

I coughed in embarrassment, then got to work. The wards over the palace were still making it hard to call on Night even though we were well past nightfall, and I found the magic pulse harder to deal with than I'd thought it would be. Had to do double layers to avoid a thinning, which made it take longer than I would have liked. It was with sweat beading the back of my neck that I brought us to the other side, where Archer promptly kicked her way through the steel grid. How had the godsdamned acid pool been the trickiest of these so far? It was a good thing the wards hadn't been updated here in a while, I thought, because a few more layers of whatever made it hard to shape the Night might have managed to lock me out from using it in practice.

Akua stopped us before we could enter the traditional antechamber, dragging an ethereal foot over the floor. Headsman's blades came out from both sides, cutting into nothing but thin air, and they began to withdraw. Well, that'd been bracing. They'd been building up the impression that the antechambers were safe this whole time, hadn't they? Tricky fuckers. The hallway beyond was unlike any we'd seen before, which I did not take as a good sign. Every part of the walls, floor and ceiling was covered with angled mirrors, giving the impression that we were standing on the inside of a gem. The uncovered parts were the doors in and out, and somehow I suspected that was only a temporary state of affairs.

"Enchanted mirrors?" I asked.

"They induce nightmare-filled sleep if stared at," Akua said, "but it is the doors to watch out for. They will shoot out burning rays of light, which then..."

"Reflect every which way," Indrani finished, sounding a little impressed.

"The enchantments in the mirrors amplify the heat," Akua said. "There is an upper limit, of course, but after seven reflections it would be enough to incinerate an ogre on contact."

Given the kind of people these defences belonged to, I suspected it was not a figure of speech she'd used there.

"Night's not great against fire," I admitted. "So that's a problem. How do we get through the door on the other end?"

It was a copper one and Akua had picked one of those earlier but I didn't want to assume.

"I can get us through the lock there," she said. "But not before at least a dozen spells have been shot out."

"These rays, do they reflect off anything or just the mirrors?" Archer suddenly asked.

I breathed out in understanding and so did our guide.

"The side of a sword should work," she replied.

Indrani shot me a smile, which I forced myself to return. I was getting closer to my Name, but the reflexes weren't quite there yet. I began to draw Night into myself, murmuring prayers in Crepuscular. At the very least quickening my limbs ought to help. Our swords were bared a moment later and as I grimaced we darted forward. Before we'd even made it a foot forward mirrors moved to cover the entrance we'd left and three spells shot out from the polished copper door. Whooping with glee, Indrani casually batted one away while Akua and I instead prudently moved to the sides. She went straight for the door, even as it began spewing out a second volley, and I took up a position guarding her back.

I narrowly caught a ray that would have hit my chest, reflecting it upwards and then into a wildly careening trajectory. The trouble with all those fucking angled mirrors was that it was hard to guess what path the spell would take when it came back. Archer was still in the middle of the room, moving with a dancer's grace as she reflected spells in what was too measured a way for it to be random. Eyes narrowed I tried to follow what she was doing, but only figured it out after the third volley of spells came out and two of the rays hit each other in midair, bursting into a ball of flame and smoke. Fucking Hells, was she actually making them hit each other? I could barely keep up with the ones actually coming for me.

That moment of inattention cost me, even my quickened limbs not quite quick enough when a ray I avoided was reflected right back into my shoulder from behind before I could blink. I managed to get it to clip the shoulder instead of bite into the muscle, at least, but I swallowed a scream as a parchment's depth of my shoulder just turned to ash and the livery over it vanished. Fuck, that hurt. Akua came through for us moments later, the copper door opening, and I was quick to retreat behind it. Archer took her time joining us, twice more slapping away spells before slipping behind the door as I slammed it closed. Her eyes dipped to my shoulder, but like Akua she said nothing. I called on Night to kill the pain and we moved on to the vaults awaiting us.

The first vault looked very mundane, until you had a closer look. The neat piles of wood were all atrociously expensive sorts from the Waning Woods or beyond, the blocks of rock and the gems all gave off the scent of magic without being enchanted – which meant inherent sorcery – and the sealed copper boxes here were all filled with living plants I did not recognize. There was a single potion rack, with maybe sixty vials in whole, but my jaw dropped when I saw a whole half-dozen of them were as red and faintly glowing water.

"Are those actual healing potions?" I croaked.

"They are," Akua said. "And not even the most precious of the lot. The bottom row is the elixir of long life. Drinking it adds at the very least forty years to one's lifespan."

I'd keep one of those for Vivienne, then. I shook my head, still in shock that I was looking at the little red potions that were said to be the closest thing to a panacea that alchemists had ever achieved. They were also said to require the blood of a dragon taken while it still lived to be brewed, which had seen them placed squarely in the realm of legends. The last Callowan ruler said to have drunk one was Elizabeth Alban. It was with petty glee that I cleared out the room into the Night, being careful not to break anything. We wasted no time hitting the second vault, which was significantly less worth smiling about.

Rooms full of demons tended to get that reaction out of me.

I saw the same three Weeping Snares the High Lord of Wolof had stood me off with and promptly stashed them away, to the reluctant acceptance of the Sisters, but they had significantly less qualms taking in the rows and rows of grimoires that Akua told me were contracts with devils. Two silver jigsaw puzzles that supposedly could give a glimpse into how to make a Great Breach when completed went into the Night as well, as well as a dozen more of what Akua called 'insight' artefacts, but when we came to a simple copper crown on a pedestal the Crows sent me a wave of wariness.

"Insipientia," Akua reverently said.

My Old Miezán was rusty, but not that rusty.

"It's a bound demon of Madness," I said. "The same one your mother unleashed?"

"Yes," she replied. "My family has held other demons, over the years, but never was there a binding quite so thorough or a demon quite so mastered as Insipientia has been. Centuries of foes have tried to free and turn it against us, ever to no avail."

I reached out for it, but the Crows balked. There was something about the crown that spooked them, and I wasn't one to gainsay the instincts of my patronesses when it came to demonic taint.

"It stays," I said. "Vault's clear, what's in the third one?"

"Nothing, presumably," Akua shrugged. "It is almost never used. It is the guest vault, and my family has rarely granted the honour of its use to anyone."

"Hey, worth a look anyway," Indrani drawled. "Maybe there'll be loose change there we can toss into the Night."

I rolled my eye but did not disagree. I wanted to be as through as possible when clearing the vaults. Akua informed us there were only two more left after this, and the paths began to grow complicated- we'd have to double back over the acid pool – when we forced open the warded door, revealing a sight that gave pause to all of us. In the bare stone room there was an altar and a sleeping body on it, but that wasn't the part that gave us pause. It was the fact that we were looking at a perfect reproduction of Akua Sahelian when she'd died. A shift modestly covered the body, but I'd seen enough of Akua over the years to know that this was looking at a twin. One that was breathing. The shade, face unreadable, took a few hesitant steps and laid a hand on the body. After a moment she gasped.

"What is it?" I quietly asked.

"She has magic," Akua said. "No mind or memories that I can feel, but the Gift is there."

Ah, I thought, and the pieces fell into place. The guest vault, huh. So this was the work of the sole person in Praes who might feasibly make this request of Sargon: Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name. There'd never been any need for me to lay out bait, I now understood. Malicia had always intended to take it. She was in need of a Warlock and of someone who had a good handle of me and my plans, so she intended to secure both in a single stroke. And there was the deeper game here, the one I was beginning to glimpse. The Intercessor, who had outed us in the fortress but not gotten us captured. The Bard had made sure that Sargon would cover the treasury and the granaries, figuring out one step of me that it would leave me only one place to go.

That the Intercessor too had wanted Akua to be in this room, at this moment, sent a shiver of dread up my spine. Did she know something I did not? Had I made a mistake? Or did I, for once, better understand the nature of the woman we were dealing with than either my opponents? My fingers clenched, then unclenched. None of us would know the answer to that until the very last moment, I suspected. Besides, now that we had seen what we were meant to the Eyes – the dull throb of magic filled the air, a ward being tripped. There you go, I thought, as troubles as I was vindicated. And still I couldn't shake the impression that I was missing something. That I was still underestimating my opponents somehow.

"We need to get out," I said. "They know we're here."

"Fuck," Indrani cursed. "Think we should grab the..."

She hesitated. I glanced at Akua.

"No," she decisively said. "It will be a trap of some sort."

I nodded.

"We're still using the way out in the Emyrean Hall," I said. "Can you lead us there quick?"

"Very much so," Akua replied. "There is a hall that leads there directly."

I didn't bother closing the door behind us as we filed out. We took a left at the end of the hall where the vaults were, which brought us to another large hallway where aside from the mosaics the sole decoration was a tomb of stone.

"That doesn't look good," Archer muttered.

"There is no need to worry," Akua snorted. "For this, I will require neither of you."

Taking her at her word we followed her in, and predictably enough the tomb's lid began to open. A strikingly good-looking man in bronze armour began to rise out, smiling eagerly, but the shade met his eyes and straightened her back.

"I am Akua Sahelian," she said.

The man froze. His eyes were blank, I noticed only then. And I had yet to see him breathe. Undead of some sort? I glimpsed a slender sword in the tomb with him, already half-drawn.

"No," the man hissed in Mthethwa. "Not after-"

"I am of the blood of Subira," Akua said, tone flat. "By the ancient compact, I bid you to return to your sleep and grant us passage."

"Insolent child," the man bit out, "how dare you-"

And yet, for all his complaining, his limbs were moving. He lay back down into the tomb, and even as he cursed Akua profusely he closed the lid over himself. There was a moment of silence, then Archer cleared her throat.

"So, uh, what was that exactly?"

"Dread Emperor Revenant was not the first Soninke to attempt to rule forever," Akua replied with a smile. "Merely the most successful. And some of my ancestors had an... interesting sense of humour."

Well, didn't that sound ominous. Still, I counted our blessings and followed our guide as we left. The door wasn't even locked from outside, meant to keep people out instead of in, and we hurried through only occasionally trapped sets of stairs until we emerged above in what looked like a large marble hallway. Above us I caught sight of something staggeringly beautiful: the night sky in all its glory. It wasn't like the lesser version of the Vaults, this was the real one – the very wonder this palace was named after. I could almost feel the wind looking at the ceiling here, see the clouds move and even the occasional bird fly. It was one of the most magnificent works of magic I'd ever seen.

"We are close to the passage," Akua said, breaking me out of my thoughts. "Let us hurry."

Yet even with her navigating for us, this part of the palace had been on high alert. It was mere moments before we came across a servant, who screamed out in alarm at the sight of our swords, and soldiers were on our heels in moments. Arrows and spells streaked behind us as we ran, clattering against tall marble columns and setting tapestries aflame. How many were there? At least sixty, I thought. Archer took an arrow in the arm but she ripped it away without batting an eye, cursing as she did, and twice streaks of flame went through Akua. She came back... weaker each time she reformed afterwards. Tired in away I'd never before seen her be as a shade.

We remained narrowly ahead of our opponents, until we reached the statue of Subira Sahelian that was the mark of one of the eleven secret passages into Wolof. Akua pushed the crown the man held in his hand and the statue began to move, revealing a narrow set of stairs, and we wasted no time heading down. The soldiers were close. The statue moved back behind us, though, which ought to slow them down some. The oppressive weight of a new set of wards washed over me the moment I got onto the stairs but I grit my teeth and quickened my pace. We'd planned to leave through here from the start, though initially it would have been after we robbed the treasury instead of the vaults. See, like all of the eleven secret passages into Wolof this one was a trap.

The narrow stairs flared out into a larger platform where we all paused, and hastily I took out our last two water breathing potions. Indrani idly took two steps down the platform as I did, to trigger what we all knew was coming: moments after her foot touched the lower stairs water began pouring from the ceiling. It was a flood corridor, see. Either the pressure of the flood or drowning would take care of anyone who came through here. Except, of course, if they had prepared potions for this very eventuality. It'd never been an option to come back by the aqueduct again: we would have needed to swim uphill and against the current, and break through the enchanted barriers there again without the evanescent powder to do the work for us.

"Bottoms up," Indrani said as I gave her a vial.

We toasted and knocked down the drinks. I breathed in, limbering my shoulders for the coming swim. Sooner or later the guards would come down the stairs and try to snatch us with spells even if proper pursuit was impossible, we needed to get a head start. We waited a few heartbeats. And then, hideously, nothing happened at all. The potion did nothing.

"Cat," Indrani slowly said, but I did not answer.

Instead I closed my eyes. And there it was, the missing piece. Malicia had wanted Akua to see that body down in the Vaults, it was why the Eyes – who had no doubt reported to her body in the city the moment they'd been sure I could no longer kill them for it – had waited so long to pull the alarm. But it'd not made sense to me that she would then simply... let us go. Much as I despised the empress, she was one of the cleverest people I'd ever met. Malicia had been fine letting us go, I now realized, because she'd known we weren't going anywhere. The return vials of water breathing potion had been sabotaged before we ever left.

Had she gotten to the Concocter? No, I thought, she shouldn't have the leverage for that. Mostly likely just spies that'd had access to the vials at someone point before they got to my hands. A few foreign reagents would have been enough to fuck up a brew this complicated. And it didn't matter how it'd been done, I forced myself to acknowledge, just that it had. The Intercessor knew from the start, I put together as my stomach dropped. It was Malicia's plan, and Malicia is Named. So the old monster had just come in at the right time and the right place to nudge us so her favoured outcome came about. My fingers clenched.

Figuring out my enemies was useful, but what I needed right now was a way out.

"Akua," I said. "When we came out the reservoirs, you dried us. Do you think you could keep a bubble of air around our heads as we swim?"

There was a long moment of silence, then she shook her head.

"I do not think I am strong enough for two," the shade admitted. "Not after the spells I was struck by, and perhaps not even at my best. Around one of you, if I meld closely, and even then it will be difficult."

So Akua and one of us could still make it out. Not quickly, though, I thought. Which meant the person staying behind would have to keep the soldiers off their back for a while. Could I work around this with Night, steal air to bring with me? I murmured a prayer, reaching for the power, but though I felt the Crows reach out to me our fingers... missed. The wards were too heavy here, I realized. Night wouldn't get me out of this.

"You can't use Night, can you?" Indrani said, eyes sharp.

I shook my head.

"That settles it," Archer said. "It's got to be me. Your Name's not there yet. I'll keep them off long enough and you can trade back for me later."

I breathed out, looking for calm. Forcing it.

"Yeah," I said.

She slowly nodded, then turned to ask Akua something, and without missing a beat I struck the side of her head. She was quick, and strong, but I was both too and she'd not been expecting it. I caught her in my arms before she could collapse, golden eyes following me all the while.

"They can't kill me," I said. "Malicia knows she'd be risking handing the Dead King a victory if she did."

There was simply no one else that could keep the Firstborn bound to the Grand Alliance and Callow in the war the way I could. Vivienne could maybe talk our soldiers around, but the drow? No, Malicia wasn't after my life here. She wanted me in her grasp.

I intended to make her rue that notion to her dying day.

Above us the statue began moving, and I handed Archer to Akua. The shade took our friend, coming so close to me for a moment it would have been the easiest thing in the world to steal a kiss from my lips, but she refrained. Shouts from above. There was no more time, and if I was going to make it out of captivity I needed... something. A plan, a workaround. And it came to me, in a flash, as above the first arrow was fired loosely in our direction.

"Takisha Muraqib," I hissed. "Make the offer for it. And the rest Sepulchral."

Her hand touched mine, impossibly warm, and she nodded.

"I will," Akua Sahelian swore.

Moments later she was in the water, bringing Archer with her, as spells began to light up the hall and I turned towards the enemy. Well, Night or not I had a sword and a long history of stabbing people with those.

Time to see how long I could buy them.

ruduen

Go boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Welp, it Archer forgot just how self-sacrificing Cat can be when things get bad.

Liliet

Indrani is only just now discovering what it feels like from the inside, of course she forgot Cat's not new to it!

Liliet

BOO YEAH.

So okay yeah it took slightly longer than I'd thought for things to go wrong... and than Catherine thought too!

I adore that Indrani actually fell for this. She keeps holding out hope for Catherine's self-preservation instincts, huh?

Nothing is on fire so far, which is really weird!

And we have a whole Two New Plots: Akua's Body and Catherine Captured!

dadycoool

Great, now I'm imagining Cat being trapped in Akua's body like it's a soul trap or something, but she's piloting it, since it's (presumably) an empty husk right now. At the very least, it would likely solve the "not enough fire right now" problem.

mamm0nn

Malicia: You fool, I planned for every eventuality and there's no way that you can- That's not how magic works! You can't just use the Gift like that! The element of fire cannot be mixed with shadow on a whim! Curse you and your woefully inadequate and shallow understanding of magic, Catherine Foundling!

Casey Glick

Did Akua not see the body? There was an obvious "curse your sudden but inevitable betrayal" moment, I felt. But I never got any sense that Akua even acknowledged it? Setup for the maybetraya! later?

Frivolous

Casey Glick: I don't think Akua or anyone else could possibly trust the clone or duplicate body. It's probably heavily trapped.

Someguy

She did see it. I think it was Malicia's "I can ressurect you" pitch.

Liliet

Akua was the one who approached it and said that it has the Gift, and also the one who said not to take it because it's a trap.

> The shade, face unreadable, took a few hesitant steps and laid a hand on the body. After a moment she gasped.

>

> "What is it?" I quietly asked.

>

> "She has magic," Akua said. "No mind or memories that I can feel, but the Gift is there."

...

> "Fuck," Indrani cursed. "Think we should grab the..."

>

> She hesitated. I glanced at Akua.

>

> "No," she decisively said. "It will be a trap of some sort."

:3

onedollargum

When Cat described Akua's hand as "Impossibly warm" I started wondering if somehow Akua pulled a fast one and stole the new shell.

Liliet

I mean she would probably have Cat's wholehearted support in that one, Cat loves stealing shit. No reason to hide it.

Frivolous

onedollargum: More likely Catherine was feeling extra cold, due to something something blood flow, and thus Akua's hand felt warm in cmparison.

Miles

Akua's hand shouldn't even have a temperature.

Liliet

But it can if Akua wants it to, same as she chooses whether to interact with physical objects or go through them.

It's romantic!

Someperson

Oh dang Indrani isn't gonna forgive that very easily is she... I get why Catherine did it, if Archer made the last stand it would have "sacrificial death" stamped all over it and the Bard likely knew that... But getting forcefully sidelined like this is so very, very counter to who Indrani is.

Someperson

And I didn't mean for this to be replying to something else whoops.
The interface on mobile be like that.

Liliet

Sir Nil

That was a fun dungeon crawl.

Benjamin Huang

Let's be honest, we all knew Cat was gonna end up captured one way or another in this arc. Jailbreak time B)!

Bad@games

Ha! One of the 200 heroic axioms states that cat will succeed at least at buying enough time for Idrani and the ghost of bad decisions to escape

RoflCat

Black got captured and his soul severed by Pilgrim/Saint of Sword, the erstwhile biggest Heroes of the West.

Now Catherine get captured by Malicia with her Black Knight in tow, the current biggest Villains of the East...since Catherine doesn't have her Name yet Malicia can still possibly affect her with some Name power (the same way when she killed off that Merchant Prince guy before his name fully manifest)

Like father, like daughter....

Crash

Cat doesn't have her full Name yet but she is close enough to be enjoying some lesser versions of the martial advantages associated with it.

With all of her other titles and advantages, it doesn't sound like too much of a stretch to assume she already has enough story weight to be immune to Rule.

Hell, the Sisters are probably protection enough. Can't imagine they'd take kindly to Malicia trying to control their priestess.

Lord Haart

The Merchantis prince was actually immune to her Rule despite not having a Name yet, only a potential one – that's why she had him killed.

This could be very bad but probably not as bad as it got work Bard and DK. We still don't know how Pale Knight made her freeze... IIRC back in book 4 with Kairos she blanked or while in the DK's precense at some point.

edrey

that was great, the story is escalating, let see if Malicia understand what can of monster is the Bard.

edrey

what kind of monster is the Bard... sorry

dadycoool

What if the Bard is the can for an even worse monster? Maybe that's why she's so immortal, because whatever Demon, etc. has taken residence doesn't want to be vulnerable? Cat's soul was corrupted by a Demon in Liesse, after all. I can't remember what it did to her Search Engine Aspect, but it did need amputation.

Lord Haart

Bard is worse than a demon. However, if she dies (truly) then her patron(esse)s will probably come knocking. We saw what happened with the fleet of Ashur and that city Warlock died defending... Seems like it was demon-style impact on a massive scale, and that was just a brush of their presence.

Seems decent odds that some amount of Creation will (need to?) be remade by the end of the story. Not sure what degree to, but I don't imagine those the greater beaches laying there forever or three whole principalities remaining fallow for millenia. Seems a bit like too much of a win for Below and Above's response of the angel's corpse is basically just throwing away the game board, seems a bit unlikely. But then again, we don't know what will actually happen...

Earl of Purple

There's a Word of God that what the Ashurans did at Thassalonia wasn't the attention of the Gods Above, that's just what the Ashurans thought it was. The reality is 'a little more complex' is I think the wording.

With the exception of Light being granted to priests and the sacrifices taken by Below, there is no evidence that the Gods actually interact with reality at all.

Lord Haart

Ooooo thanks for sharing! Will have to dig up that WoG.

That's one more step in the direction that Above and Below are truly more narrative forces (maybe to the extent of being the author and/or reader, though maybe that's more meta than this series intends to go).

Liliet

Don't forget Calernia is a backwater, and don't forget that gnomes are known to have sunk a continent or at least a big isle-located civilization without any repercussions from Gods.

Lord Haart

Unless the Gnomes are just acting on Above's and Below's desire by resetting the board in such cases.

Which is still possible here. Mostly I just don't see the DK really getting a marginal win out of this. If the Above/Below conflict is really as much of a theater sport as Bard makes out, DK is like a team that tries to score one point the whole game and aside from that only defends. Makes for really boring viewing and I just don't think it'll stand as-is. The DK pushed the seesaw his way a bit, and even if that was just a response to the smiting I don't see that holding for long.

I really do think DK's end game is to stick it to both Above and Below by essentially playing their game in the most boring way possible to force them to change the rules. That directly runs against Bard's raison d'être so she basically HAS to oppose it, even if on the inside she's done with the game too. Though DK'S glacial pace is probably too slow for her hence the escalations with Cat. That's one place Cat and DK really align – both want a de-escalated world with lots of rules and no BIG surprises. Cat just wants everyone breathing in it.

jamesc9

>Cat just wants everyone breathing in it. 😊

Or at least the non-named dying only from each other.

Frivolous

I'm not sure Cat's Last Stand is really in the offing. Cat and possibly everyone else seems to have forgotten she can Speak, at least sometimes.

This might even be the scenario that leads to Cat's Name flowering. Valiant rear guard defense of beloved comrades following an otherwise successful heist. Very Heroic.

Liliet

The problem is that Cat can't really Speak her way out of this one. She's deep into enemy territory with no way out. Speak is a tiebreaker, but she doesn't have Rule to go with it that would allow it to be limitlessly OP against her subjects.

(And these people aren't her subjects anyway. Her thing is authority over NAMED, regular people would just get hit by regular Speaking rules)

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, she'll get captured for sure. Because her name involves interacting with other names. If she's getting it out of this incident, it will be when she's face to face (or at least body double) with Malicia.

Sparsebeard

If Indrani had stayed behind she definitively would have died.

Liliet

Unless she saw Cat's strike coming and knocked CAT out first. THEN she would have been fine.

But if Cat had actually agreed to leave her behind, yeah, that would have not gone well.

Lord Haart

Eh, that's still a heroic sacrifice story and Malicia might kill her to get at Masego. Or use her to have him switch sides.

Was much happier Cat was captured here, overall. Last book so one or more of the Woe might die but this would have been a bit sooner and uglier than I'd have expected.

Liliet

Yea it's just that the odds shift depending on how exactly she gets there – the teammate who is left by others to cover their escape and the teammate who knocks the fuck out of others so they can stay and cover their escape have different odds of tragedy vs badass action sequence complete with busting out at the end.

Liliet

(The gravity of the heroic sacrifice aspect of the staying can be expressed through dramatic infighting, leaving the rest of the sequence to be badass, or it can be passed over in everyone just going "ok sounds fair" and then be SHOWN in what happens next)

hoser2

How do you know which potions to sabotage? If either person tries a sabotaged potion on the way in, the plot fails. Unless the potions are sabotaged after the first two are used, it seems unlikely that the right two get used on the way in. It's not like there's an advantage to potions that don't work for as long.

And I must be missing something here, so I am really just begging enlightenment. It is theorized that WB wants to die, to end their existence. Why don't they stop acting out their story? The Thief and Squire names fell off when Cat and Vivienne stopped acting out their stories. Can the WB just stop acting out her story and cease being Named, then die namelessly?

Liliet

IMHO: all four potions were sabotaged, but there was either a calculated delay or an external trigger (the latter is easier to coordinate imho) on the sabotage.

(Calculated delay is super easy to do on a potion, just wrap the offending ingredient in a neutral, slowly dissolving shell. The problem is more the calculating part, it'd have to be timed pretty confidently)

aurikdomi

they spent a good while in the city and any point after entry is a good to go for timed delay. I like the idea of external trigger but same as regular sabotage, struggle to imagine them not noticing someone doing it. i.e. if its magic or an additional added ingredient or really anything other than time.

aurikdomi

ooh I take that back they could have updated the massive wards they are constantly going through to include the trigger hidden behind something else. They haven't really had the time to carefully examine all of those anyway.

Liliet

Wards they were passing through. Bonus points for specialized wards being a good preparation that can be done in advance without knowing when they are going to actually go in.

sengachi

If you sabotage them all with something that simply makes the potion degrade faster, you don't have to pick the right vials.

dadycoool

iirc, waaaaay back in Book 1 when Cat was up against the Lone Swordsman she tried going against her Name and it basically punished her for it with nightmares and such. I think the reason why Cat and Vivienne's Names faded was more that their Stories faded, or something to that effect. Vivienne found less and less ways to be a thief, so Thief basically starved. Cat was only ever Squire, so when she and the Black Knight, the only option for mentorship, had the falling out while she was becoming more queen and less apprentice, Squire dissolved similarly to Thief. There were also other extenuating circumstances, like Winter, but I think that was the core reasoning.

lolo96

You are correct except the nightmare part. She got a Name dream about Black killing a hero after she spared a hero. Basically, her Name was showing her what she did wrong. She also accidentally entered a redemption story. So Above juiced her up with guilt.

Liliet

The Name punished her by withdrawing, she was weaker for a while.

shikkarasu

Cat was transitioning into the Black Queen, because Callowan squires can become royalty, but the Pivot there was accepting a deal from Malicia. Once Cat had made her choice, but Amadeus Destroyed the weapon (and by extension, the entire deal) Cat was left with a wisp of Squire, but not enough to use any of its Aspects. She had 98% transitioned out of Squire, but there was suddenly nothing to transition into. From there she stabbed Black and cut the last thread.

If she had just rebelled she might have become Queen some other way, but her Narrative was wrapped up in the superweapon and tacit cooperation with the Tower.

Lord Haart

Yeah Black really saved her more than she knew at the time, or has acknowledged since.

The stab was more of a "this is how you greeted me into your family, now here is me accepting you as my dad the same way" sort of thing.

Juff

Typo Thread:

take you word > take your word particularary > particularly small depression > a small depression what followed what > what followed was small glimpsed > small glimpses through sort > thorough sort anglers > angles make us of it > make use of it half the hall > half of the hall in a painful. (missing word) her stumbled through > her stumble through as through as possible > as thorough as possible either my > either of my meant to the Eyes > meant to by the Eyes as troubles as > as troubled as Tired in away > Tired in a way Mostly likely > Most likely someone point > some point

LaNuup

The funny thing is that with Cat beeing captured, the heist was a failure. Since they need her to get the loot out of the night without her they achived nothing permanent.
Cat is after all only a mortal with a budding name at the moment, so she can be forced to surrender the stuff.

Liliet

I don't think she can be forced, and all they need to get stuff out of the Night is one (1) drow and the Sisters' cooperation. Hell, with Sisters' cooperation they might not even need a drow.

Konstantin von Karstein

We saw that the Sisters are actively monitoring what Cat does with Night. If the Sisters don't want that loot taken out of the Night, it will not be.

Anonymous

You're assuming her patron goddesses can't move the loot themselves if they choose to exert themselves.

Lord Haart

Seems reasonable they cannot, at least not easily, since otherwise the Night could be used as one big dimension door. Possibly they can do it slowly and for relatively small amounts at a time which might be enough.

It bodes poorly that Malicia saw them coming, some of the artifacts and portions could be booby trapped...

Liliet

The Night CAN be used as one big dismension door. It's not trivial, but drow use it for short-distance travel casually.

SpeckofStardust

Now the real question is will the next chapter continue this or are we going to do a round of interludes?
Cause lets be honest, as soon as cat can use the night again she can start using all the fancy crap she just stole.

therealgridlock

Not really a question, since extra chapters are patreon only right now, the next chapter we get is a regular chapter, even if it takes months of interludes to happen.

Liliet

You're confusing extra chapters and interludes. They are not the same thing.

therealgridlock

Oh. Fair enough. Well, if it's going to be at the current point in the plot, but from another perspective, I think my point still stands. We won't get the plot interrupted.

Liliet

Catherine being captured will most certainly start the next arc tho, and interludes come between arcs.

Shveiran

But we are just at the ninth chapter mark. i don't think we are done with this one arc, unless EE dropped the three-arcs formula for the first time in the series.

...There could still be interludes, I'm just saying this should still be the first arc.

Liliet

Eh, Book 6 isnt really clearly divisible into 3 arcs.

Miles

We always get the plot interrupted by interludes.

mamm0nn

This chapter was awesome, it's such a shame that most of it was just Cat's dream. They may be Praesi, but they're not so stupid that the gas holes aren't with little rosters to prevent you from jamming a finger into them, and with poisoned needles at the side to severely punish the attempt.

Plus, of course, putting holes very low and very high instead of at a convenient height for people's fingers. And summoning some devils to attack the humans with their fingers stuck in the wall. And putting some alarm ward on the traps being triggered at all, that would at the very least alert someone if multiple traps are triggered in the correct order to show that someone's going through them.

Akua: Carefully disarms and avoids trapped books.
Archer: Topples the entire bookcase into the Shadow.

Liliet

We've just confirmed that the whole thing was an intended trap. Whoever needed to know about traps being triggered most definitely knew, they were just under orders to not interfere until they got where they needed to.

therealgridlock

Akua said on the very first door that the mechanisms were so far inside the walls that it would require redoing structural support beams to change, that indicates to me that this hidden dungeon of traps is under a big ass palace, and hence built first.

So, it was built a long time ago, by old ass people, who were inventing traps for the first time. They were the best things they had at the time, and you could even argue some of them are meant to be easy to defeat, since their own people are supposed to go through them.

If the gas ports are hidden in the carvings, and you have no idea where just by searching, it doesn't matter if you get a Nat 20 for a total of 60, it just can't be found. The only reason they made it through was Akua was trained where they all were, and was smart enough to figure out ways around them.

I mean, some of them they technically didn't have ways around. The acid? Beaten with magic with extra steps, the light ray room? I expected them to beat the door down with its own rays, but no, they just send them bouncing around willy nilly.

The giant scorpion? Well if you didn't come prepared, you use yourself, or the cursed swords, if you came prepared, it's not much of a fight.

Every trap can be overcome by being prepared for it. There's no such thing as a perfect trap.

The gas can be overcome by permanently gluing a rock in the hole, unless you have the hole rigged to explosively clear itself every time, there's no point. The security measure was "hard to find" not "impossible to stop"

In cyber security we were taught that every lock is a compromise between hard to open and easy to open. You want it easy to open for the correct user, hard to open for anyone else.

You can make a perfect lock, it's a lock with no keyhole and un-shimmable latches. But nobody can ever open it. You can make a lock that's 100% guaranteed that the user can open it, with no penalty, it's a handicap accessible door.

Usually security is achieved by a combination of difficulty, biometrics, and obfuscation. Hiding the port, making it hard to reach, and making it hard to stop up, or impossible to stop up all of them, that would make it nearly impossible to overcome. Clearly that is more complicated though, and can still be overcome with magic, or a personal air supply.

Nothing is perfect.

dadycoool

The perfect lock is a wall.

Sykomantis

Walls are just doors with extra steps, if you're strong enough

dadycoool

Doors you can't close again?
btw, because I have to, "Oh, yeah!"

TeK

The perfectly secure vault is an empty vault.

Darkening

Nice of Cat to secure their vaults for them in that case.

jamesc9

Modulo the silver crown of even-murder-crows-don't-want-me.

Anonymous

About the potions, I assume that the two not drunk at the start needed to be stored in some way, in order to protect them from going through the water and everything that would happen afterward. No need to do so with the ones being drunk immediately, so they are probably being stored in a simpler container.

Not sure about the WB. Maybe wanting to die is part of the role, or following the script is forced on her?

Shveiran

This was very neat and all, but... were the vials numbered? Because otherwise this sabotage plan had just 25% chances to work out as a trap as intended, and 75% of simply resulting in Catherine aborting the infiltration.

I guess the Bard could have ensured it somehow, but it still feels... a weird gamble for Malicia to take unless the Empress is actively coordinating with the Bard.

Konstantin von Karstein

Like someone else said, you can put the sabotaging ingredients in a shell that doesn't affect the potion but dissolve in a liquid.

Liliet

...or you can rig them to trigger upon encountering a specific ward, or you can make them make the potion degrade faster so it'll be still usable the first time but not a couple hours after that...

therealgridlock

Think of it this way. We don't know how they were sabotaged, we just know that narratively they had to be, and so therefore, they were.

They could've all been bugged, or they might have been labelled, or they might have been tampered with later, or not tampered with at all, but because WobbleBoob has plot powers, caused them to be sabotaged to achieve a goal.

The end result, by hook or by crook, is the same, that they were stuck having to make a sacrifice to move the plot forward. This book is very meta-textual, they know about stories and narratives, so we can safely understand that if something isn't explained, then it doesn't matter, it would have been done in a way that ensured it happened the way it needed to, therefore why bother explaining it.

The villain fell off a cliff, because the cliff crumbled. Why did the cliff crumble? Do we need a geological analysis of the erosion of the shale? Or is it enough to accept that that happens sometimes and he gets his just desserts?

The hero survives the unimaginable, in this universe it's literally because Names carve out paths through destiny that make the impossible possible because it happens every day. It's the gamification and plot-use of tropes in a book.

I agree that sometimes “oh no, everything was sabotaged and not even remotely explained why!” Can be annoying, but that actually rarely happens, it feels to me anyway, in this book. Usually someone explains it, or explains the reasoning. Like now, Cat realized that this was the trap that they didn’t account for, and so it doesn’t matter now that it’s been achieved, because it’s too late to stop or think about. She instead reflects on the goals of her enemy and why the trap happened, which is more relevant to the plot, and the important part of “why don’t the potions work” is explained with “sabotage, for plot reasons, because malicia is smart and evil and saw us coming, even if I don’t know how at the moment”

I guess to sum up, the complaint is valid, but it’s personal preference, because the book is written in this narrative style, so complaining won’t do much to change it, really.

Liliet

I would say this: if you can think of multiple plausible ways something can be achieved, and they require different assumptions about background details that have not come up, it’s not really a fault in the narrative that it doesn’t give you information on which one is true. You’re fully within your rights to be curious, but you’re also fully within your rights to be curious about the existence of printing press on Calernia and the prices of grain in Ashur, and it’s just as much not really the writer’s obligation to tell you. “Plausible” is enough.

It’s reasonable to (rhetorically) demand information if the assumptions required would significantly change something about the narrative (for example if theres an implication a named character must have been a traitor and its just glossed over), but all the significant implications Catherine went over: there were spies in her camp, it’s probably not Concocter, could really be any of the regular soldiers. That’s the important part!

The rest is just... plausible, from there. Maybe it was an external trigger, maybe the potions were packaged differently for ease of access vs security of storage, maybe there was a delay, maybe it was well-timed slow decay, maybe Cat is wrong and they were got to in the city. All of these are possible, and none of them are important! (Except possibly the last one, in which case presumably we’ll find out)

ninegardens

So like... here’s the thing that’s getting me...

If Archer is imprisoned, and Cat free, Cat currently has ALL THEIR STUFF with which to Bargin.

If Archer is free and Car imprisoned, then... Cat has all their stuff in her night bag, but like... feel feels easier to extract it from her (magically, or via coercion).

Also: Cocky gave them 4 vials... but I don't think she specified the drinking order?

So like... how do you have 4 random vials and guarantee that get drunk in the right order to make the plan work? It feels a bit weird.

aurikdomi

the upper comments go over it. time delay or hidden trap in the wards to mess with the potions, any drow with the sisters consent could remove the items from the night.

aurikdomi

as for coercion or magical force removing them, I think they are going to try to negotiate with cat long enough that it would be moot because the other side already removed them.

lolo96

This is not in a pocket dimension of magic but Night. I'm guessing Sisters can open it for other people. Cat's last words probably mean Akua will use them in negotiation. So, Drows will open it in camp maybe.

Liliet

That's not a night bag. That's just Night. The Sisters have the loot, not Cat.

Linnus42

Hmm Impressive Malicia's Spies are so effective. This is interesting, I am not sure Malicia would kill Indrani sure Cat is more valuable but Malicia knows how close Indrani is to various players.

Shveiran

If Malicia was pulling that sort of punches, we wouldn't have had the Night of Knives.

Archer is a partisan of Cat and probably her most powerful combat asset, and the only ones who would get pissed at her death ARE ALREADY AT WAR WITH MALICIA.

The only reason she would have given her a stay of execution is to use her as bait or bargaining chip, who was just asking for things to go wrong.

Liliet

Now, now, killing her would just be throwing away a valuable hostage.

Cutting off her hands, however, would be a quite reasonable counteraction to anything she can do – possibly even depriving her of her Name as she's no longer capable of fulfilling her Role – while still keeping her valuable for outside actors to bargain for.

Crash

Capturing Indrani alive is a recipe for disaster.

Missing member of a Band of Five, lover of the Black Queen, in a relationship with the Hierophant and known Lone Wolf operator and physically the strongest and most well rounded of Cat's allies. Yeah, do not take her alive, there is no way it works out well.

Openendings

oh no we're due for, like, three months of back-to-back interludes, aren't we D:

Earl of Purple

I love that scorpion, and I want four. One to ride into battle, one to feed my enemies to, and two to start a breeding program so I can replace them.

On another note, do you suppose that demon of Madness was bound by a Diabolist, with capital D?

pirateddesigns

Diabolists deal with devils, not demons, so it's just as likely for another mage Name to have done it. Probably a Warlock at some point, but that's a hunch based on the popularity/long history of the Name. I think Diabolist is a fairly uncommon Name, like Hierophant. I may be incorrect – I don't recall if Diabolist and/or Hierophant are Names with long histories or if they are uncommon (Zeze might be the first Hierophant? I don't remember).

Liliet

No idea about Hierophant, the one precedent we know of for Diabolist was Triumphant pre-DE

Earl of Purple

Pretty sure it's mentioned somewhere that Masego is the first known Hierophant, when he meets the Praesi nobility before Thassalina, maybe? When he sets someone on fire for insulting Cat, or something?

Sinead

Interlude: Heretics refers to Hierophant as "unprecedented"

Liliet

Nice, thanks!

I really really want to know where the fuck the lowercase word hierophant comes from, though. Has to be precedent for THAT.

Liliet

* where it comes from in-universe. I'm aware of IRL usage.

TeK

Diabolists deal with both, and it can be assumed that Triumphant's Name before her ascension as an Empress was Diabolist.

hue hue

I am beliving that the author of "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms" is Cat or one of the Woe

pagesbe

She would have to have had the ability to go back in time to write it then, because it's actually mentioned in-universe by the Saint of Swords.

Liliet

Bard is a time traveling Cat confirmed?

aurikdomi

and after an eternity of life knows the only one who can kill her and take her job is herself? trippy.

Daniel E

On the subject of interesting time travel, I strongly recommend watching 'Looper' and 'Primer'.

Liliet

This theory was inspired by Hel in "Journey into Mystery".

TeK

I am the bone of my pipe.

hue hue

Well, my first fan theory shot dead. Which chapter she says that?

chaospixel

I don't think the potions them selves were sabotaged, It's more likely that it were the vials vitch were tinkered to leak during way in or react to the sinthetic holy water used during entry.

Sinead

Love this chapter!

Some thoughts that I have between this and some other discussions on Reddit:

1) Has Endurance's perspective on Cat shifted at all? She always has used herself as an Aegis for those under her care. I know it's been said that Judgement would issue a death verdict for her, and Contrition only ever sees people's sins, but that is the issue with the mono virtue lens.

2)On the subject of Cat's self-sacrifice/protector vibe, as well as her Arbiter Role, is there any Name that comes to mind that covers both? She has a very Odinn Wanderer aesthetic, but her actual reputation puts her closer to Athena in some ways. Both in the strategic victory in war and in the establishment of laws.

Liliet

Cat is a born facetank, but she doesn't really... keep going forever. She protects others for as long as she's capable of fighting at all, but she cannot fight indefinitely. Twice she's on record as just giving up, lying down and waiting for death – the first time she got out of it bc the guy insulted her homeland and it turned out shes more willing to die than to let THAT stand, the second time it was just taking too long and she got bored waiting. And of course her literal physical endurance is something she'd deliberately allowed to be cut down, with the unhealed leg injury.

Cat is a decent fit for Judgement ("justifications only matter to the just", Cat muttered to herself in a desperate attempt to convince herself that it's fine and she should stop thinking about it, and a couple of times it even worked), has been mildly Contrition'd ever since the encounter with the same (I'm p sure she didn't used to be as prone to guilt over everything as she is now before First Llesse), gets along quite well with Mercy, but Endurance and Fortitude aren't really much of her thing either of them.

Cat is very breakable.

308924810a

Hey EE, I've got a question: if wards don't work when submerged in water(mentioned in relation to the defence of Thallassina, and again during this infiltration), could someone engaging in gate based lakeomancy pour a lake's worth of water over a warded city wall to break the ward?

Liliet

I'd guess probably depends on

- 1) the relative sizes of the city and the lake;
- 2) whether the lakeomancy is allowed to proceed uninterrupted for a sufficiently long time.

Should the lake be big enough and the city undefended by people capable of closing lakeomancy portals the fuck back up in time, I imagine yes, that would work.

Crash

EE I am fucking begging please, PLEASE just release a full list of the classical elements you absolute fucking monster!

It's been over half a decade of teasing, you madman. This is ground for a villainous background! This is probably a Madness demon aura at this point.

Judane Fowler

There's been speculation that Cat's new Role/Name might be Arbiter, but that sounds a bit too limited to me, especially if it's restricted to Named. She seems to be heading for something much more encompassing (though I haven't worked out quite what yet) of which Arbiter is an aspect instead of the whole thing.

superkeaton

Huh, figured that might happen. This reeks of Story.

Chapter 10: Parley

"Diplomacy is as sailing, catching the way the wind blows."

– Ashuran saying

There was something deeply disorienting about waking up after having been knocked out. It wasn't like falling asleep, there was this sense of... confusion, when where you were didn't match what you last recalled. So when my eyes opened, I made myself breathe in and out slowly as I forced myself to be calm. I did not know this bed, or these sheets – silk – or this room around me, lit with magelights and open windows giving a beautiful view of Wolof spread out below.

I rose from the cushions I'd been leaning on, soft and plump and exquisitely embroidered, and to my surprise my limbs did not pain me. I could feel my left arm was tender, the skin pulled taut in that way it was after mage healing was used on flesh, but even the ever-present dull ache in my bad leg had been made quiet. My clothes were not the ones I had last worn, loose yellow cotton trousers and a matching robe patterned in green, but they were a comfortable fit. I padded onto the stone floor barefoot, finding that a beautifully carved cane of red mahogany awaited my hand. I tried it out and it fit perfectly, the spread wings of the ravens sculpted on the handle comfortably matching my grip. Leaning on the cane, I cast a more elaborate look around.

It was a square room, and though the floor beneath my feet was covered in tiles and my surroundings were panelled in wood I caught it was all stone beneath it. Ignoring the slippers – was that lion's fur? – that'd been laid out for me, I ignored the rich furnishings of what was no doubt an elaborate prison cell and limped my way to the windows. Three large glass panels, open just slightly but enough that I could feel the faintest breeze coming through. I flicked fingers at them and was not surprised in the least when the illusion flickered and a flat panel of bronze covered by a book's worth of runes was revealed for a heartbeat. The illusion resumed the moment my fingers ceased contact with the bronze, returning the false but beautiful view of Wolof under afternoon's light.

I reached for the Night knowing what awaited, and I'd been right: I could not quite grasp it, layers and layers of wards preventing me from drawing it close. The Sisters reached out towards me as well, and though our metaphysical fingers failed to connect their presence was a manner of comfort.

"Is my mind intact?" I asked them in a murmur.

Andronike sent a sense of reassurance, and from Komena I felt only cold anger at the thought that mere mortals might have tried to meddle with their First Under the Night. I let out a soft breath of relief. My thoughts and memories were still my own, then. I remembered fighting in that secret passage, keeping close to the wall to prevent the mages from getting a clean shot at me, but after the first few lives I'd taken it was... something of a blur. I'd been knocked unconscious at some point, presumably, and brought here. I drummed fingers against my cane, letting out a small hum. Had I held long enough for Akua and Indrani to escape? Yes, I decided after a moment. I should have gotten them enough of a head start if the guards had needed to dig me out with swords.

The goddesses in me withdrew, as if coming close had been an effort, and I offered the illusion of Wolof a wan smile. I'd not planned for this little venture to end in my being a prisoner, but I could deal with the change of plans. If Akua had grasped what I'd meant with those few words, near the end, then my sappers were already digging at the foundation of my captivity. Why, I just needed to bet it all on the strength of the understanding of myself between a woman I hated as much as I loved – and who would, before the moon's turn, betray me sure as the coming of the Last Dusk. Until then, though? My gaze swept the room again. My captivity came with a small rack of wine bottles at least, I found, not to mention bowls of assorted nuts and fruits.

I found a pair of books, too, atop a pretty cabinet. One was a book by a Mistress Adad titled 'Great Works', which a quick thumbing revealed was about ancient Soninke architecture. The other, to my reluctant amusement, was a Praesi highborn etiquette guide. Fair. Following the teaching of my Callowan forbears, I picked the book about architecture out of contrary spirit and limped to the table. Huh, was that a fully-stocked writing desk too? Nice. I picked up a bottle of wine on my way, refusing to take one of the gold-rimmed crystal glasses by principle, and wrenched open a bottle of what looked like a Nok red before dropping into a seat and cracking open the book.

It ought to tide me over before Sargon came to talk, I figured.

—

The time of the day displayed by the illusion did not match what my sixth sense told me of the passage of time. It would have been a clever trick to disorient me, otherwise. Before I saw either hide or hair of High Lord Sargon or Malicia – who would be coming sooner or later, I knew – I first encountered servants. Veiled and silent they came thrice a day to bring out delicious four-course meals, fill my wine rack, empty the enchanted water cabinet in the corner. Heated water for washing was in the morning, after breakfast, and not once did any of them even twitch at anything I said. I even shouted at the top of my lungs once, to see if I'd at least get a reaction, but nothing. They might have been deaf, I thought, or at least bespelled for deafness.

I found had little to do but eat, read and drink for a whole day. Though I got restless before the first bell had passed, in a way this was also... relaxing. There was only so much I could do from in here, and how long had it been since I'd had so few demands on my time? Still, I wouldn't simply resign myself to it either. I inspected my cell but found no opening to it save for the hidden door the servants used, which led to a stone passage I only ever saw lead to a closed steel gate. I wasn't going to be popping that open with a cane, I knew, though it might be worth checking if I could touch Night while in the passage. Somehow I doubted it, but why leave the question unasked?

On the second day of my captivity, before I could find a good opportunity to try the passage, a servant in Sahelian livery came. No veil on this one, and unlike the others he was feeling chatty.

"This one bears the words of High Lord Sargon Sahelian, Queen of Callow," the man said.

"I'm listening," I replied, cocking an eyebrow.

Sargon was asking whether I'd agree to have my midday meal with him, as it turned out. I was tempted to decline just to see what would happen, but I held back. I wasn't sure if he'd left me to stew in the room for a day just to make sure I'd be inclined to talk, but if so I had to admit it'd worked. I took him up on the offer and was promptly afforded the services of a tailor, which I bemusedly agreed to. The clothes I'd been provided were comfortable enough, tunics in green or yellow with a Callowan cut, but I wouldn't turn down free clothes. Deciding to indulge a whim I ended up wearing a soft yellow sundress, paired with a short frock in pale green and comfortable shoes. Alas, Sargon was warned well in advance so I did not get to see a look of surprise on his face but the momentary blankness was enough to have smiling as he sat across the table in my cell. He was not so ornately dressed as when we'd last met either, his white and red tunic rich and well-cut but otherwise unremarkable.

He was dressed in that way that those whose family had been rich for generations got dressed, when there was no longer a need to trumpet about the wealth.

"We will be having fey fowl as the main plate," the High Lord of Wolof amiably told me. "One was caught last month a few miles to the south."

"I'm going to assume we're not eating an actual fae," I replied, cocking an eyebrow.

He chuckled.

"We are not. The birds are descended from experiments of Dread Emperor Sorcerous' that his successor loosed into the wilds," Sargon said. "It is said he was attempting to infuse birds with the powers of Arcadia, but only ever succeeded with the basest of their kind. The first specimens were highly toxic, but not so their progeniture."

"Huh," I said. "They taste any good?"

"Delicious when braised and served with zaze sauce," Sargon smiled. "I don't believe you've ever had it before."

The man kept a damn good table, I'd give him that much. The first two plates were warm herbal bread served with sauces and a spicy but refreshing broth, followed by the fowl-on-rice with the zaze sauce that proved exactly as good as he'd boasted it would be. It ended with a creamy, sweet pastry that tasted of eggs and cinnamon I found paired well with my wine. And none of it was poisoned, an additional point in its favour. The conversation had been enjoyable but light, the two of us pretending I wasn't a prisoner in Wolof and discussing what I'd read in 'Great Works' – I suspected his enthusiasm there was not feigned in the slightest – and a few anecdotes about the city itself. All of it very tame.

When a servant brought me a pipe stuffed with wakeleaf and refilled my wine, though, I knew the real conversation was about to start. Sargon gallantly struck the match for me and lit it, himself indulging instead in a small cup of an amber liquor that smelled strongly of peaches.

"This morning I threatened to have you executed should your army not retreat," Sargon conversationally said, "but your marshal declined rather rudely."

"Juniper knows an empty bluff when she hears one," I shrugged, pulling at my pipe.

Praes couldn't afford to kill me right now. Much like I was pulling my punches fighting them, as I wanted the Empire's martial strength mustered against Keter, they too had to pull theirs. If Malicia killed me, there was a very real risk that the western fronts would outright collapse – and much as she liked to pretend otherwise, the empress didn't actually want the Dead King to want any more than we did.

"Sadly," Sargon sighed.

I breathed in deep of my wakeleaf as he sipped at his drink.

"I have been advised to torture you publicly in order to force compliance, naturally," he conversationally added.

I blew out a small ring of smoke, shaping it by making my lips pop. I did not answer. He chuckled, revealing that slightly crooked smile again.

"I know better than to attempt such a thing, of course," High Lord Sargon said, "though you do not seem worried in the slightest."

"I had my soul eviscerated by lesser gods once," I idly replied. "Came out of it mostly sane. Not a lot of torture than can beat that, even if you get inventive."

And neither Juniper nor Vivienne would fold at the sight anyway. They both knew I'd tan their hides if they did. All it'd win Sargon was my genuine enmity, which he was taking pains to avoid earning.

"I would not dare claim that I can imagine," the golden-eyed man amiably replied. "You will understand, naturally, that holding the head of a host besieging my holdings prisoner is something of complicated situation."

Meaning some of his people wanted me dead or at least with fewer things, and that refusing them while my army was camped outside the gates did him no favours. Amusingly enough, it could be argued that in several ways his position had been worsened by capturing me.

"Must be frustrating, having Malicia dictate to you in a way that goes against your interests," I said.

He thinly smiled.

"Not executing you is in my interests as well, Your Majesty," Sargon replied. "Greater implications as to the fate of Calernia aside, should I murder the most distinguished Queen of Callow in two centuries I will have heroes coming for my head every spring until I die."

He sipped at his liquor, sighing.

"I expect several of my more short-sighted cousins are pushing for your execution in the very hope that the Woe will murder me in turn," he admitted. "Yet I would argue that my greater frustration in all this affair is that I would much prefer to be at peace with you, Queen Catherine."

"That's easy enough," I frankly replied. "Turn on Malicia. You're only in my way so long as you're one of the pillars propping her reign up."

The dark-skinned man laughed, the merriment of it lighting up his eyes. Akua's cousin, yet so little like her. Even at her most carefree she held something of herself back but Sargon Sahelian was... less restrained. He allowed himself to feel more genuinely, I decided. Would she had been like that too, if she'd not been raised to be the monster of monsters among this most terrible of families?

"I will be honest with you, Queen Catherine," Sargon grinned, "as every report my spies have brought me insist that it is the approach you best respond to."

The worst part of it, I thought, was that even knowing what he was doing I still found my lips twitching. Sargon Sahelian might be a monster, but he was a charming one.

"I find it saves times," I shrugged. "By all means, my lord of Wolof, lay it on me."

"I am not a good man, Queen Catherine," Sargon indifferently shrugged. "So long as my city is left to me, so long as my domain is unmolested? I do not much care what happens to Praes, or even Calernia at large."

Much as I would have liked to damn him for petty apathy while the world was falling apart a mere two nations west, I held my tongue. How much worse was he than Proceran princelings, in truth, or even the squabbling League of Free Cities? I doubted he was any better than them either, but I would not pretend that the careless disregard on display here was some unrivalled pit of evil.

"My support of Dread Empress Malicia rests on two pillars," Sargon continued. "The first is that, for all her flaws, she remains the individual in Praes best able to deliver a resumption of order."

She was at least half the reason order needed resuming in the first place, as far as I was concerned, but that was why he'd begun this by making his indifference clear. What did Sargon care that much of this was on Malicia's hands, if she were still the woman best placed to ensure it wouldn't spill over anywhere that mattered to him? I puffed at my pipe, blowing out a stream of smoke to the side.

"And the second is that she has your soul in a box," I finished.

"Indeed," he politely agreed. "I am loyal to her in the sense that a noble of the Wasteland is loyal to anything or anyone – that is, only so long as the balance of consequence and convenience is not greatly moved in disfavour of continued loyalty."

The unspoken part was that an army outside his gates, on top of the messes that my presence kept heaping on his lap, was pushing on that balance noticeably.

"Which leaves one important question before this conversation proceeds," Sargon Sahelian said. "Can your patronesses free my soul, Black Queen?"

I'd known that was coming. It was an obvious bribe to approach him with, a good way to flip a High Lord against the Tower without much military power needing to be exerted. Which had been why I'd first asked Sve Noc as much months ago. It'd not been a coincidence that I'd not made the offer.

"Not from here," I said, "and not without a price."

The Crows were sure his soul was being held in the Tower, and they weren't going anywhere near that place if they could help it. I honestly wasn't sure even a Choir would be able to bring the seat of Praesi power down – it'd taken the armies of two thirds of Calernia and entire battalions of heroes to get it done, last time.

"Unfortunate," the High Lord of Wolof murmured. "It would have simplified this all a great deal. I am, alas, not eager to trade a single mortal mistress for a pair of immortal ones."

"You'd find the payment much more agreeable than expected, I'm sure," I easily replied. "But that is your right. We will speak again should an opportunity arise."

"Of course," Sargon said, inclining his head. "And so while we remain so refreshingly bound to honesty, I am compelled to ask—"

He leaned slightly forward, drink in hand.

"- what is it that you want, exactly?"

I snorted.

"There's a broad question," I said. "Right now? Vale summer wine. Or maybe the journal of the warlock your ancestors placed at the side Theodosius the Unconquered."

"I can have the latter brought easily enough," Sargon waved away. "And as you no doubt grasped, I mean to ask what is it that this entire Wasteland campaign of yours is trying to achieve. You've not the strength or inclination to occupy Praes, that much is plain, so what is it you do want?"

I set down my pipe, amused at the boldness, and smiled at him over the rim of my glass before taking a sip.

"Arguably, as one of Malicia's backers you're one of the last people I should tell," I pointed out.

"On the contrary," Sargon said, shaking his head. "Unless you intend to purge the empress' supporters among the nobility, I am one of the individuals you most need to convince. Even if you kill the woman in question, Queen Catherine, what she represents does not disappear."

"And what does Malicia represent, exactly?" I asked.

"A strong Tower with no taste for foreign adventures. Power being concentrated in Ater through the Imperial Court and the bureaucracy," Sargon replied without hesitation. "It comes at the price of curtailing many of the old privileges and ennobling greenskins, but many still consider it an acceptable trade."

"Nok was sacked," I flatly said. "Thalassina is dust. Foramen is held by High Lady Whither, the Grey Eyries outright seceded, the Steppes are in civil war and two of the High Seats are openly backing another Dread Empress. Half the army that's supposed to serve her deserted. You call this a strong Tower?"

"The Dread Empire of Praes turned back the Tenth Crusade with Thalassina as its sole permanent loss," Sargon countered.

"Foramen was brought back into the fold bloodlessly. Sepulchral's rebellion has stalled and the only reason it ever gained grounds was that the Carrion Lord's attempted coup – which failed, half the Legions staying loyal to the Tower even after decades of other loyalties being cultivated among their officers."

My eye narrowed. They were blaming the messes on Black. Of course they would, I thought. He's Duni, the nobles despise him and they're not wrong about him having added to the chaos in the first place. I wondered how much of this was decades of hatred between my father and the aristocrats given voice and how much of it was opinions Malicia had seeded herself. It would hardly be the first time she blamed the unpopular parts of her reign on Black and the tactic tended to be a successful one.

"As for the Clans, Queen Catherine," he continued, "that they would war on each other is only to be expected when some among them were raised above others. Strong Lords of the Steppes will emerge from the violence, able to ably discharge the duties that were passed onto them."

I hummed. There was no point in arguing this with him. I wasn't even sure he believed in the first place, anyway.

"Let's say I buy that, for the sake of argument," I shrugged.

"She still needs to go. She's been an aggressive ally to the Dead King while the rest of Calernia has been fighting for survival. She fucked us in the League and in Procer, and even before she antagonized every single other ruler on the continent the grab she made for the doomsday fortress that was made of Liesse made it clear she can't be trusted to remain in power. Nobody wants the Tower with a weapon that makes Hellgates, Sargon. Nobody."

"Considering all the nations so antagonized have been at war with the Empire for years," he drily said, "one might argue she was in fact rather rest-"

"You're being obtuse," I flatly interrupted. "Even if there weren't a hundred reasons to put her head on a pike, and you know there are, at the end of the day she had to die because we can't allow the precedent. If the Grand Alliance doesn't cut her head off then we're telling the world that we can be backstabbed while fighting existential threats without there being consequences. And there's not a single signatory that's willing to swallow that, Sargon."

"This is a compelling argument," Sargon Sahelian mildly said, "largely for people who are not Praesi."

I sipped at my wine to hide my expression. That was a decent point, actually. We didn't actually have a lot to offer people who weren't already rebelling against Malicia. The truth was that the people currently backing her reign would lose out when she got deposed. They wouldn't gain from what I wanted to achieve here in Praes. One the other hand, the fact that those same people couldn't give less of a shit that Malicia's plots abroad had caused thousands of deaths and risked the annihilation of Calernia didn't particularly endear them to me. They didn't get to pretend they were being unfairly victimized after turning a blind eye to that. If you threw stones at bears for long enough, you got mauled.

There was no deep lesson behind that except that you shouldn't fucking throw stones at bears.

"We're a few knives in the back past lectures from your side, Sargon," I flatly replied.

"Praes would be a silent place, if that were the case," the High Lord laughed. "Though you have me curious now, I'll admit. Who is it that you mean to replace Her Most Dreadful Majesty?"

I cocked an eyebrow.

"The Carrion Lord?" Sargon tried. "He is disappeared, if not dead. And Sepulchral is unlikely to remain a steady ally to your Grand Alliance for long, for all that she now courts your friendship."

Abreha Mireembe being a snake was hardly news to me, but the first half of that was rather amusing.

"It never ceases to fascinate me," I said, "how large of a blind spot you highborn have when it comes to Amadeus of the Green Stretch. It's like we're talking about different men."

"Half the High Seats would rebel at the mere idea of Duni ruling over them," Sargon said, eyes narrowed as he studied me. "Yet you know this, I think. And so I wonder if you do not play a longer game than any of us had considered."

I leaned back into my seat.

"Oh?" I said. "What game would that be?"

The dark-skinned man raised his glass, the last wisps of amber liquor swirling.

"Mile thaman, Sahelian," the High Lord of Wolof toasted.

I smiled and spoke not a word. If he wanted to believe I had come east to raise Akua Sahelian as empress, let him. He drained the cup.

"It would be an interesting time to live in, if you got your way," Sargon admitted. "It is almost a shame you will not."

"I've heard that before," I said.

He looked faintly amused.

"I've a great deal of respect for your abilities, Queen Catherine, but this once luck was not on your side," the golden-eyed man said. "There is little you can do from captivity."

I met his eyes with mine, baring my teeth in a malicious smile.

"Before the week's end," I said, "I am going to walk out of the front gates of Wolof with everything I want. And the both of you are going to let me."

So ended my first meal with Sargon Sahelian.

—

He sent the journal, as he'd said it would. Made for interesting reading, with a surprising amount of steamy bits between the battles and commentaries. Kojo Sahelian had gotten around and not been shy in writing about it. I sat and read and waited, knowing this was only beginning.

—

When Malicia came she did not bother with charm.

She knew better than to believe relations between us could be mended, I supposed. It was the following morning, shortly after breakfast, that she was announced by a servant in livery. I didn't bother to study the last meat puppet she'd decided to wear in any great detail – what would be the point? She wore a woman's form, Soninke and tall, and besides that I did not bother to take her in. I stayed standing as she stepped in, cane in hand as I leaned against the wall. The illusion of Wolof behind me showed an early afternoon, so the light came through at my back. It'd make it hard to look at me properly. The Dread Empress of Praes sat gracefully at the table, not waiting for my invitation, and set a single parchment scroll on the table. She said nothing, waiting. After a bit I snorted.

"You know, I figure I could play that game," I mused. "Ignore you or insult you, the works. But it just sounds tiring."

I pushed off the wall.

"Say your piece," I simply said, "and get the fuck out."

"Your manners have not improved," Malicia calmly replied.

"Could I beat you to death with my bare hands before they came in to restrain me?" I asked. "I'm not sure. If you test my patience, though, we'll find out."

I'd lied, of course. If I was to kill her puppet, I'd definitely use the cane.

"It would avail you nothing," Malicia said. "You were captured, Catherine. This particular game you have lost."

"It's Queen Catherine to you," I smiled, all pretty and friendly and utterly false.

"If I gave you the courtesy, would you return it?" Malicia said. "I think not. Yet I will overlook your many and varied insults, as I have for some time, for you have once again made yourself into an important enough piece you cannot simply be ignored."

Implying that I should treat her the same way. Good luck with that, I drily thought.

"I'm still waiting to hear what you want," I said. "To be honest, this is being something of a bore."

"We had a conversation, some years ago, that I believe you must have forgot," Malicia said. "Not so long before Akua's Folly. You asked me about Still Water for the first time."

I did recall that, more or less. I'd warned her that if she'd been behind all of it then she had best watch her step from now on or there would be blood. We'd discussed politics abroad, too, but what did any of it have to do with this? It'd been the Hierarchy and the Tyrant that'd been the thick of the talk, and one was pissing off an entire Choir while the other was years dead.

"I told you why Wekesa insisted on trials, that he believed they would revolutionize our understanding of rituals," she prompted.

I frowned, scrounging through my memories. I had pretty good recall, but it'd been years and my Name memories weren't as crisp since the Sisters had brought me back from the brink.

"I asked if it really had," I slowly said, "and you replied..."

"That what he learned would allow us a fighting chance against the Dead King, should he ever wage war upon us," Malicia calmly replied.

Ah, I thought. And there it was. The way she believed she could barter herself out of the grave she'd dug. She had a weapon, maybe even more than one, that she thought could win us the war. Cordelia and I might despise her, but we were pragmatic women at heart: we'd choose survival over hatred. But that went with the assumption that we needed Malicia herself to have those weapons. That my father becoming Dread Emperor wouldn't get us all of it anyway without all that it would cost us to let an empress who'd knifed us at every opportunity walk away with a slap on the wrist. Malicia was no fool, I thought, and so she would have seen the flaw in that plan.

"So what did you do?" I asked. "What poisonous little precaution did you take so you could threaten us with it?"

She'd already done it before, after all, when she'd spread word that by the terms of her treaty with the Dead King so long as she lived the dead could not invade Callow. Taking her own life as hostage was a favourite trick of hers, the kind of signature that Name tended to take on after years of settling into their Role.

"There was no need for anything too elaborate," the Dread Empress said. "My death would result in all the necessary knowledge burning green, that is all."

Which just meant she had to be taken alive. Had she prepared contingencies for that too? Probably, but I figured there simply wasn't a lot anyone could plan against having Sve Noc peel open your mind before rummaging about for the useful stuff. We'd just have to be quick and careful.

"It's all on the scroll, I take it?" I asked.

"Indeed," Malicia smiled. "Along with a possible solution to the Hellgates issue as suggested by a mage in my service."

"Good," I said, "good."

I moved quickly enough that the cane caught her on the side of the mouth before she saw it coming, but though she felt it didn't make her bleed. Ugh, she'd come decked out in artefacts. I tried to strangle her, but soldiers poured in and wrestled me down before I could get it done. She was ushered out, breathing hard, and I waved mockingly.

"There's always next time," I cackled right before the door closed behind her.

—

I read the scroll that very afternoon.

It was in Malicia's interest to exaggerate what her weapon could do, but she also had to know that Masego would be able to see through anything to egregious in a matter of moments. To my distaste, this might actually work. Wekesa the Warlock had been a brilliant man, and Still Waters had only been used in its most straightforward of applications so far. He'd believed that his creation would be able to turn the tide in two ways.

The first had been that soldiers fighting the Dead King would be made to ingest the alchemical compound and then prepped with the right spell so that when they died they would immediately rise as undead in the service of the Dread Empire. He'd believed that with the right dosages and sorcery it was possible to keep those soldiers largely the same as before their death, nothing like the mindless wights I'd fought at the Doom of Liesse. It would make armies that, even when slain, would rise against just as tireless as their foe and significantly better trained.

The second was more of a gamble. By modifying the alchemical compound so it could enter through the skin, Warlock had believed that necromancers could potentially usurp control of corpses from the Dead King. The strength of Still Water was that it wasn't really a ritual, that the active magic was simply an ignition while the alchemy did all the heavy lifting. Which meant if it worked as Warlock had thought it might, we might be able to steal entire armies in moments. I doubted it would go that smoothly, but the prospect of finally having a way to turn the Hidden Horror's endless numbers against him was deeply attractive.

And given that we were well past the days where anything but a direct strike on Keter could win us this war, what was written on this scroll could be an edge that made the difference between the life and death of nations. Malicia was not one to come to a bargaining table poorly armed.

What I read of the proposed solution for Hellgates was largely gibberish to me, and so likely meant for someone better schooled in magic to read over. The only part that was understandable was the one that talked about raising fortresses over the gates after the first rituals were done, to make sure they wouldn't open again. That and the estimates for the number of mages that would be required, which was around two hundred per gate. There simply wasn't anyone but Praes left who could field that many well-trained practitioners, especially since there would need to be some able to use High Arcana.

Another pointed reminder by Malicia that we needed her.

—

On the third day, mages sworn to Wolof came into my cell.

It was all done very properly and politely, but I was still bound while a dozen men and women inspected every inch of me with spells and tried to access the Night. One got bold and tried to see into my mind, but the Sisters took offence to that and melted his eyes. I complained about the smell after they dragged him out, mostly to fuck with them, but several of the mfuasa actually smiled and one cast a spell to clear the air. They left after a few hours, carrying back to Sargon Sahelian the answer he'd been hoping they would not give him.

They had not found a way to access the Night through me.

—

I decided that, since I had so much time to spare, I might have a crack at writing my memoirs.

You know, for posterity. Sadly after a single page about my years at the orphanage I got horribly bored and started sketching out the troop movements for the Battle of Three Hills instead. It was pretty hard stuff, memoirs, I was impressed Aisha had gotten so far in hers. In the end I dropped the subject entirely and instead wrote a scathing critique about the defences of the Vaults, with a particular eye about how easily heroes could have gotten through some of those. I doubted it'd ever amount to anything, but it did make me feel oddly satisfied.

It also allowed me to sharpen a quill until a weapon could be made of it and secrete it away.

—

On the fourth day, I had supper with High Lord Sargon Sahelian. The meal was delicious, he was a delight to talk to and he'd somehow gotten his hands on a bottle of Vale summer wine. Once more wakeleaf was brought to me and I duly indulged, leaning back against the very comfortable seat.

"I offered Princess Vivienne to ransom you back," High Lord Sargon said. "She declined."

"Yes, she would have," I faintly smiled.

"You do not seem displeased," he said, sounding wary.

My smile broadened.

"What is it you asked for – the artefacts or the books?"

A moment of silence.

"The artefacts," he finally said.

Ah, it'd been Malicia's idea then. The books would have been more important to him.

"When I named Vivienne Dartwick my successor," I said, "I didn't pick her name out a hat."

And that was all I said on that. His polite sideways inquiries about my accepting my own ransoming for his library back were just as politely ignored.

—

One the fifth day there was something of an incident.

Or at least so I assumed, as around noon forty armed guards crammed themselves tight in my cell and wards were put up to prevent anyone coming in or out. I finished my meal and, because I was never one to miss an opportunity to be a wretch when it was on the table, I took up Kojo Sahelian's journals and began reading them aloud with great enjoyment – especially the explicit bits, which by the looks of it made more than a few of these nice soldiers uncomfortable. An hour and a half later they left, but the guard remained doubled and from now on even the veiled servant came in flanked by an armed pair.

Idly I wondered who it was that'd tried to rescue me, and how close they'd gotten. It was only going to get worse for Sargon from now on. That was the trouble when you couldn't kill your prisoner: people would keep trying to free them, knowing there couldn't really be any consequences for it.

—

One the sixth day they were desperate, which I knew the moment Malicia's puppet walked in.

Why else would she be here again? Four soldiers came with the empress, faces hidden by helmet, and they had shackles that I was expected to put on nicely. I had last time, when the mages had come to poke and prod looking for a way into the Night. I knew why the Dread Empress was here, though, and I wasn't going to be anywhere as nice. I pretended to cooperate, at first then the quill I'd sharpened days ago went into the slight gap between helmet and armour and got the first man in the throat. Another I broke the neck of, smashing him into the table, but Malicia ran out before I could get my hands on her.

My cell, and for all the gilding it had never for a moment been anything else and never had I fucking forgot that, my cell was flooded with guards and mages. They got me after I nearly smashed the last of my table legs on scale mail and broke my hand on a helmet. They got the shackles on me and did not heal me. Again there were only four when Malicia came back, face a blank mask.

"Well," I smiled at her through bloodied teeth, "there's always next time."

She went still for half a beat but it was enough. I might be the one bleeding, but I wasn't the one afraid.

"This brings me no pleasure," Malicia said, looking down on me. "It is of your own making."

She did not speak a word, not with her lips anyway. The world pulsed with the echo of it anyway. Aspect, my instincts whispered. And in the instant that followed a power seized me by the throat. I gasped out, writhing in my shackles, as a will tried to wrest mine into submission. I was being ordered to do something. Deep inside me the Sisters stirred, their anger a cold and burning thing. They were jealous goddesses, my Crows. But it was not them that calmed me. My fingers clutched at thin air, but still they caught something. Fur, deep and matted and warm. I laughed, dragging myself up by pulling at nothing. Malicia took a step back, eyes wide.

I felt a great maw open by my head, fangs being bared. My Name had not taken kindly to being given an order. No, more than that. It was not one that recognized the rule of another over me.

"Mistake," I hissed at her in Mthethwa.

The guards were moving, but they didn't get it. They moved to restrain my limbs, to push me down, when they should have gone for my mouth. My eye found Malicia's and I grinned red even as she opened her mouth.

"Be silent," I Spoke.

Her mouth closed. The guards forced me down, but I laughed.

"You overstepped," I told her. "I wonder, does it work only on this body or your real one too? How long are you going to be fighting-"

Finally one of them covered my mouth, shortly before I was gagged, but no matter. The damage had already been done.

It was almost over now.

—

The first time I'd heard about soulboxing, that evening I'd wondered why Dread Emperors did not force it on every High Seat at their coronation. There was, of course, an answer.

On the seventh day, after I had breakfast the veiled servants came and laid out different clothes for me. Black trousers, a black tunic, a black cape and a black eyecloth: all exquisite and embroidered with silver thread. And with them came a circlet of silver, an elegant crown displaying flying crows. Matching silver shackles too, little more than bracelets, but still a symbol of my captivity. I was helped into the clothes by attendants after being informed that I was to be give audience in the Empyrean Hall, and before long I was leaning on my cane and limping down the halls of the palace where I had been held all this time.

Forty soldiers armed to the teeth escorted me, in plate and capes. Ten mages kept an eye on me, amber stares unwavering and their magic so close to them I could taste it in the air. Limping across marble tiles I breathed in the air, stretching under my cape, and I felt Sve Noc reach out for me greedily. I let the Night billow out of me even as shouts echoed across the hall. Swords left their sheaths as the soldiers spun into a circle, runes of light filling their air as incantations reverberated. I closed my eye, smiling, and struck the ground with my cane once.

Shadows spun close, threading themselves through my clothes until it was not mere dark cloth I wore but darkness itself. My foes had thought to dress me, to measure me, but my patronesses had willed it otherwise. I opened my eye, studying my escorts. They were still as stone, but there was a scent in the air I was most familiar with. Fear.

"Ah," I smiled. "Much better. Take me to your lord, now."

And they did, wary but obedient. I'd thought the halls I'd run through at night had shown me the splendour of the enchanted ceiling for which the palace was named, but I had been wrong. The Sahelians had kept the heart of the wonder for where they received guests and supplicants, a great hall that was as another world. I stepped across the span of the noonday sky, clouds beneath my feet as my cane cracked against the enchanted stone.

The Sahelians had aptly named their hall: I stood here as if I was striding the very Heavens, the sun above and the world below.

On the sides, hidden behind veils, people stood. Sargon's court. Golden-eyed nobles even more beautiful than their clothes, lesser nobles of military turn and even those who wore their sorcery as their signature. Guards, too, and war mages whose eyes missed nothing. I advanced with my escort around me, all leading to the man at the end of the sky. It was against the laws of Praes for any but the Tyrant in the Tower to sit a throne, and so the Sahelians had followed the letter of the law: though Sargon sat a great seat of stone atop a dais, roughly hewn into the shape of roaring lions, further steps still led to a great ornate seat of gold where none sat.

That one was the throne, of course, which meant Sargon's was a mere seat.

No sign of Malicia, I thought. Was she hidden, or had it struck even deeper than I thought when I Spoke? I looked forward to finding out. My escort led me to the feet of the thrones before spreading out, thin invisible barriers that could only be wards separating me from Sargon Sahelian. I stood alone in the silent court until a woman with a beautiful speaking voice broke the stillness.

"Her Majesty Catherine Foundling, Queen of Callow, First Under the Night."

Sargon's face was as a clay mask, all thought and emotion smoothed away. I hummed the first few notes of Two Dozen Snakes A Knot Do Make, casting an unimpressed look around. How many of the watching snakes were Sahelians, I wondered? Had to be at least a couple dozen. All of them hungry, waiting for the man on the lion throne to falter.

"Quaint," I drawled out.

Oh, they didn't like that at all. But that didn't matter, because even as they murmured their disapproval and glared I kept close to me the answer to a question. Why didn't Dread Emperors soulbox all their high nobles the moment they climbed the Tower? Sure they'd be hated for it, and it was certainly tyrannical, but what would most of those madmen have cared? They'd know that the greatest threat to them was the High Seats, that it was well worth the hatred of a few who would likely seek to kill them regardless. The answer was around me, watching the High Lord of Wolof rather than the queenly captive brought before him. The two dozen snakes that made a knot. The Sahelians were a family, not a man.

And none of them would tolerate Wolof being made a tool for the sake a single man, one whose seat they craved like a drowning man craved the shore.

"You are summoned to speak terms of trade, Queen Catherine," High Lord Sargon said.

See, for all their many flaws the Wasteland high nobles they loved their family. Not their actual kin, the institution of the family. The High Seat of Wolof, here, and the power that came with it. They were willing to sacrifice a lot to preserve the power of their family, its importance. For all that the great bloodlines of Praes constantly murdered each other for power, they'd also keep a breeding program going for centuries – they knew how to think long term in a way that few actual royal dynasties could. It was bred in them, taught to them. They were Sahelians, and only the power of the Sahelians mattered. Nothing else.

I hummed, cane clacking against the floor as I moved and the guards moved with me – like minnows around a shark.

"What need is there for that, High Lord Sargon?" I replied. "If you seek terms, I already gave them when last we parleyed."

"They were frivolously given," Sargon said, voice thundering.

I laughed in his face. Just because he was charming, did he think I'd forgot he was my enemy? That I would safeguard his reputation anymore than I would some other leech's?

"Then let me repeat them, since you have been slow in learning this lesson," I drawled. "I want your treasury. I want your granary. And I want to walk out the open gates of Wolof."

Now the thing was, Sargon didn't want to take this deal. At the start, he'd not actually been worried about what I had stolen and put away in the Night. Sure it was missing right now, but he held me captive and he could wait out the conflict. When I was forced to make a treaty with Malicia, she'd bargain on his behalf for all of it to be given back. Except that they hadn't counted on Akua. Beautiful, clever Akua who had heard me ramble a few sentences and understood everything I meant. See, we weren't threatening to torch the library and the artefacts. That would have been bad enough, but it wouldn't have lit a fire under them like this did.

Akua had reached out to High Lady Takisha Muraqib of Kahtan and offered to sell her the entire private library of the Sahelians. Because High Lady Takisha was a supporter of Malicia and the last Taghreb high noble in all of Praes, if we actually did sell those books to her Malicia wouldn't actually be able to get them back later. It would be a guaranteed rebellion of the entire south of her realm. The Taghreb noblewoman would not doubt have been skeptical, but I was guessing that the Crows had gotten out a book or two for Akua and they'd been sent as a token of goodwill.

The step just past that had, naturally, been to make this known to Wolof.

I could see the layout of it in my mind, clear as if it were ink on parchment. On the third day of my captivity, I thought, Malicia had learned of the offer. It was why the mages had come to look at me, try to get at Night. On the fourth, Sargon had. It was why he'd tried to ransom me to Vivienne and probed my interest in such a deal. On the fifth day, the Woe had tried to free me. It had put the pressure on them, made it clear that sooner or later my people would get me out and they'd be even worse off. On the sixth day, I thought, word of the offer had spread through Wolof widely enough that Sargon's situation had become dangerous. And so he'd gotten desperate, agreed that Malicia should try to force me to spit out my loot with an aspect. But that'd failed, badly, and so now here we were. The High Lord of Wolof, the man who'd usurped Tasia Sahelian, looked down at me with burning eyes.

And I knew what he was going to say before he opened his mouth, because if he didn't he was going to die.

"Your schemes ran deep, Black Queen," High Lord Sargon Sahelian snarled. "We will bargain. Arrangement can be had, should you sign the proper pact."

"My word isn't enough?" I grinned, badly faking surprise. "Oh dear. I suppose I could sign a pact, if you insist."

The only bone I'd throw him, just enough that he could do this without entirely losing face. Humiliating him entirely would just serve to corner him enough he might do something stupid. He was already going to have a rough few months ahead of him. See, the reason that Dread Emperors didn't soulbox all the High Seats was that no family strong enough to be one of those would ever tolerate being led by a pawn. The moment the High Lord went against their family's interests, they got their throat slit. And what I'd stolen? It was the foundation of Sahelian power. The secrets that kept them one step ahead of everyone, that kept the finest mages of Praes in their service.

And instead of burning them, I'd threatened to sell them to the High Seat that was the second best at magic in the empire.

The artefacts that kept their rivals wary, their enemies from picking fights? Akua had offered to sell them to Dread Empress Sepulchral, demons and all. Even Malicia had to have found that an unpleasant surprise. No matter how many spies she had in that camp, three boxes holding demons and enough materials to make a dozen more artefacts was going to be trouble.

And so the Sahelians were looking at Sargon looking at me, because not a single one of those golden-eyed monsters was willing to ruin the power of their centuries-old family to keep High Lord Sargon in his seat. He could accept my terms, or he could have his throat slit before one of his cousins accepted them in his stead. And Malicia would bend here, not just because otherwise the other woman claiming to be Dread Empress would buy a terrifying arsenal but because if she didn't bend then Sargon would die. And she would not have the soul of the next High Lord of Wolof in a box.

"One day, Black Queen, this day will come back to haunt you," High Lord Sargon coldly said.

I eyed him up and down, then snorted.

"I beat Akua Sahelian," I said. "Should I now tremble at the shadow of her shadow?"

—

On the seventh day, I walked out of the gates of Wolof with everything I wanted and they let me.

Anomandris

Holy hell!

Tall about subverted expectations with this chapter. I expected a decent period of the whole Captivity trope (which I am not particularly a fan of, since it feels very reductionist for the story).

Instead I get a chapter which fully showcases Cat's awesomeness....and not with a complicated plan, but with sheer nerve of a very simple one.

And, hey, Akua FTW (never thought I would be saying that 18 – 24 months ago)

Brilliantly written, EE.

Liliet

Hijacked!

Go boost Catherine's rising Name on topwebfiction~

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Charles

Beautiful. It gives me shivers.

Anonymous

Good ol' Akua

Liliet

BLESS

Interesting how certain Cat is that Akua will betray her – and continuously non-specific in how exactly that will happen. And fascinatingly contrasted with Cat's reaction to the body and Intercessor's meddling with it.

And Cat's thoughts about Scribe being "I am going to be betrayed very soon, the question is once or twice" sure do suggest that it's not something she's specifically agreed with Akua upon?

I want this.

ruduen

"And so the sound of my fragile mortal shell being ripped into signaled it was time for everyone's favourite Wasteland game: backstab, help or both. Akua had grown on me, rather like the bubonic plague, so I was going to give her the benefit of the doubt and put my money on 'both'."

My money's on 'both' this time. I think there are enough hints that the seeds of the story for Akua claiming the Tower are there, and that's one avenue for a backstab to happen. With Amadeus's current plans unknown, it's difficult to gauge just what might happen.

Of course, even if Akua claims the Tower, the redemption-quest arc in play means it's difficult to know just what she'd do with that power in the short term.

TeK

I think she will betray her for the body, because a chance at life is just too tempting to pass up, not for the Tower.

Liliet

Cat was already planning on Akua betraying her before knowing about the body.

Crash

It has to be both, there's no way she just backstabs and leaves it at that. There's no way she survives it.

Which is why this is such a big question. What the fuck does anyone have to offer Akua that makes this worth it? What can she get?

She knows enough of Cat's plan to know the level of madness required to pull a betrayal in the middle of all this. Hell, she probably expects Cat knows she's gonna be betrayed.

What the heck is she looking for?

Liliet

Exactly!

tynam

In guessing it's not what does "anyone" have to offer Akua. It's what does Bard have to offer. Nobody else has the foresight and planning and knowledge to make it work.

hakureireimu

When did this happen? Do you have a link?

Liliet

Last chapter.

> And there was the deeper game here, the one I was beginning to glimpse. The Intercessor, who had outed us in the fortress but not gotten us captured. The Bard had made sure that Sargon would cover the treasury and the granaries, figuring out one step of me that it would leave me only one place to go.

>

> That the Intercessor too had wanted Akua to be in this room, at this moment, sent a shiver of dread up my spine. Did she know something I did not? Had I made a mistake? Or did I, for once, better understand the nature of the woman we were dealing with than either my opponents? My fingers clenched, then unclenched. None of us would know the answer to that until the very last moment, I suspected.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/04/02/chapter-9-vault/>

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm thinking it's part of a story beat. Akua is in the position to have everything she once wanted (Or at least a lot of it) and wavers. And then realizes how utterly empty it is, how it doesn't outweigh the doubts and the guilt like she thought it would, and she turns back, more resolute then ever. Cat knows she's going to have one last fling with Evil, so she's arranged things such to control it and make it part of the story that leads to her success.

therealgridlock

Why not one better, set Akua up to have one last chance at full evil, and having trained her to evaluate things like a real mature and rational adult, able to understand not just the self-centered greed of evil but also the selflessness that is friends and doing good for others, Akua makes the choice for good not because Good forced her, and not to spite Evil, but to actually break the cycle, and choose to do something for the good of others for its own merit, and not as a narrative ploy.

As in, she thinks to herself, what a wonderful world. And you know, stuff like that.

Turns out, it's possible to be a good person and not one of the Good. Just because you are bad guy, does not mean you are bad guy.

Liliet

Yeah, that's very plausible.

Rumu

I don't think she can arrange backup plans, because that would ruin the story aspects. She is counting on controlling the story, not on controlling Akua directly.

Tenthyr

Utterly magnificent, Catherine was more regal than anyone in that city without once being anything other than rough and utterly unconquerable.

And malicia has realised that Catherine can Speak to her. And that attempting what she had has nudged Catherine even closer to her rebirth.

Tenthyr

Though now of course we have to wonder: when will Akua betray her.

Everyone loves the story of a reformed villain tempted back to Darkness... Only to realise their folly and once again take up the arms of Good in a glorious self-sacrifice.

Liliet

The better question is WHY. I guess the best guess is “when Akua realizes it presents a beautiful opportunity for Cat”?

Anomandris

A betrayal in line with expectations? In order to cement a piece of the story? Or even as a killswitch (Cat’s new name being way too controlling)?

I like it.

Anomandris

That’s interesting – a way for the betrayal to cement a story thus actually helping Cat’s plans.

I was thinking of a killswitch with Cat thinking her new name actively jeopardizing her Accords

Forgot_My_Name

I think before the month is out, Catherine will act in such a manner as to force Akua to choose between Catherine herself and the values Catherine has taught her these last few years.

Forcing that moral dilemma on Akua and ultimately having her pick what is right over the person she loves will firmly cement the story of Akua as having internalized those lessons.

Black Spiral Dancer

I actually hate that trope. Self-sacrifice is stupid and weak and guilt only shackles society or religion casts to restrain greatness and make all equally average.

Shveiran

Geez, ain’t that a bit much?

You can like what you like, obviously, but really, self-sacrifice is stupid and weak? Guilt is only a shackle?

I’m quite aware that society or religion may impose guilt on the individual that has no goal save making them easier to control; that has happened and will happen.

But let's be real, that just means that sometimes you may feel guilty about the wrong things.

It doesn't mean that guilt itself is a bad thing.

Guilt is the feeling you get when you think you have done something you shouldn't have.

Can you honestly tell me you can think of no actions that you believe people should feel guilty about committing?

Rape? Genocide? Burning hospitals for orphaned puppies?
No limit whatsoever? All greatness that shouldn't be restrained?

Christian Oaks

For the sake of the argument great Evil has always caused a greater good to stop it.

Black Spiral Dancer

Can you honestly tell me you can think of no actions that you believe people should feel guilty about committing?

No. I do not feel myself so superior as to arrogantly believe people should feel guilty for this or for that. Instead, I despise people who feel entitled to tell others what they should or should not feel guilty about. Even if they do not realize it, THAT is true evil.

Greatness is just a word, but it means people who aren't completely bound by the restraints of their time and age, those that accomplish great tasks, be they Vikings or Prophets. Both show greatness of a kind, and I admire them both, for they have dared to go further, to go beyond most people around them.

Now, there ARE certain actions I have done and I wouldn't repeat, but I never ever will feel guilty about having done them, because they are an important part of my history and life, and more importantly, they will never go away. Instead of trying to repel or delete my past, which CAN'T BE DONE, I accept and make it fully part of myself, and I learn from whatever actions didnt result in the objectives I intended them to, but I fully understand that they have granted me knowledge and experience and for that I'm grateful, for that is truly what life means: TO EXPERIENCE THINGS.

...and yes, burning hospitals for orphaned puppies and all the consequences of that action would result in a myriad of new experiences for myself and for others, so if those experiences are something you seek, then it is ok with me, far from me to want to IMPOSE some form of guilt upon you. Those are just more shackles and never result in anything good for the guilty, only suffering.

Bored one

What a hollow point of view. What happens when someone wants to physically impose their will on YOU and you aren't able to stop them? Just accept you can't change their will?

There's trolling, and then there's trolling yourself..

Black Spiral Dancer

What do you mean, what when someone wants to physically impose their will on YOU and you aren't able to stop them?

The same that happens to you, I reckon? Suffer their will? I probably would try to mentally transform the experience into something pleasurable to me rather than traumatic, but I realize everyone has a limit to that ,too.

But why do you ask how I would act against something I can't change? When you can't change something, what IS to do but to accept it?

Or do you perhaps think that suffer to the max and become traumatized by choice is a better option? Isn't THAT a much hollower point of view?

Morgenstern

If somebody traumatized you, would you really NOT want them to at least feel guilty about what the fuck they did to you?

Morgenstern

Try to make up for it, apologize, ANYTHING?

Henry

But that won't undo your trauma in anyway or help you. What does it matter if someone feels bad for murder if they already killed the person Then feeling bad doesn't bring anyone back or make anything better. What's done is just done you can either decide to get vengeance or MoveOn but the person who harmed you isn't obligated to feel guilty about it. And if you really want them to that's pretty much just for the sake of your revenge. Which is perfectly fine but you shouldn't pretend that it's moral or anything

Black Spiral Dancer

For some reason I can't reply to Henry, MaxReply number achieved, but it's what he says.

Anomandris

It's funny how much will Cat has been able to impose on The Story of Calernia, post Squire. Gives me a sense that Names end up shaping your behaviour whether you like it or not. I mean, maybe just Tyrant forced his will on his story, and not his name?

It also illustrates the bind Malicia is in. From a story perspective, she knows that the best way out is to throw her lot in with Black (if not the Alliance). And she knows how names and stories work. And yet, she can't (won't) do that without her pound of flesh. Dread Empress practically forces her to.

Makes me almost feel bad for Ally. Almost (Rip Ratface....)

nick012000

Malicia might not be a very good Dread Empress, but she might make a decent Chancellor once Amadeus takes over...

Insanenoodlyguy

Still thinking that's gonna be Akua.

Shveiran

That ship has sailed, I'm afraid. Even if Black could still trust her, no one else would be in favour of her surviving.

If the story is to be about how unrestrained actions bring grave consequences, it cannot brook her getting away with what she pulled.

No ifs, no buts, she has to go.

It doesn't have to be gruesome, but it has to be definitive.

TeK

Sadly, there will definitely be no Chancellor again. Amadeus fought to unmake Praes as it is, but I winder, if he has a vision of what it could be. I am a tad afraid, he is too focused on getting out of the circle, to think much about the after.

Liliet

Amadeus had talked back during Book 4 about how you should never wage war without an eye to peace that comes after it.

I do trust he has some ideas, we just haven't heard them yet.

(Beyond the obvious foreign policy beats)

TeK

It's the epigraph written by Grem iirc. Black's take on what comes after stuck in my memory as "after that we can learn, grow, and become something more than a snake devouring itself. Anything more is unnecessary, anything less is unacceptable." So, I don't think he has much of a plan, but not because he fails to see the necessity, but rather, it shouldn't be up to him. All he really cares about is passing that particular hurdle.

Liliet

Not that.

...actually it's Ranker who says that, not him, pardon me.

> "Some might say it's too early to start thinking about after the war," she said. "You and I know better. No point in even seeking a victory if when achieved it leads nowhere."

also has a fantastic answer from him

> "A better world," the Black Knight murmured, looking up at stars that were not those he'd been born under. "Oh, I have wondered. What it might mean, what it would look like."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/10/interlude-queens-gambit-declined/>

devildragon777

Badass.

Lictor Magnus

Well played Cat. Well played 🍵.

Benjamin Huang

Cat's name is playing with power in a whole different ballpark holy jumping crows.
To order the Dread Empress and ACTUALLY GET HER TO SHUT UP.

WHAT.

Liliet

Ordering the Grey Pilgrim in a similar way by accident was solid grade foreshadowing of this, and the reason why THAT was so... surprising for everyone involved.

James Felling

Cat's logic in re Akua is likely this. It's Cat's Name. The story beats that have led this far by logic lead to a sudden inevitable betrayal. It's the Plot of the story that drives this forward or at least that's her take on it Genre Savvy wise. I think Cat hopes Akua won't betray her and maybe even believes Akua won't betray her subconsciously. But both story logic and Name forces her to believe otherwise.

There a reason that people refuse names like Cordelia did. Names grant power, but unless you are very careful you lose yourself and fall into the tropes for your Name.

Liliet

Cat's Name can't cause Akua's betrayal if preconditions for it aren't met. Manipulating coincidences is one thing, but like, there's a reason Cat's not expecting a betrayal from IDK Hakram...

hakureireimu

This was already foreshadowed in book 5, when Hanno referred to Cat as the "most prominent villain of their age". The same sentiment is repeated by others in book 6, meaning Cat is already widely recognizes as being higher than Malicia.

mavant

What do you mean, Akua is going to betray you before the moon is out? This isn't WWE, we don't need a heel face revolving door.

codyman495

So very awesome. Such a good chapter

Oshi

So, now can we see why Bard stuck Catherine in a cage for 7 days?

therealgridlock

Well, we know Bard stuck Cat in a sacrifice situation, it is yet to be seen whether or not the outcome of that sacrifice situation was planned for or not.

Likely Bard wanted her to sacrifice her subordinate, and run around doing bad story decisions, but instead Cat sacrificed herself and trusted her friends, and turned the situation around for her own benefit.

If Bard planned for all that, then Cat getting everything she wants in Wolof has to also help the Bard accomplish something, because otherwise it would've been easier to just sabotage the efforts to free her. I mean, Bard is much better at story crafting than Cat is, so it shouldn't be that hard.

We will find out. Either something terrible has happened and oh no, you couldn't stop it, or this is secretly Bard's plan all along to undermine her efforts elsewhere.

Some have speculated that Bard wishes to perish, and that therefore she is secretly helping Cat, but I refuse to believe that story could exist or happen without there being a hidden twist or ulterior motive, therefore Bard can't really want Cat to succeed in her story, and we know she doesn't, so she has to somehow subvert the efforts here.

Obviously it's silly to speculate on what, since we will find out in a few weeks anyway, the same time the characters do.

It is entirely possible, on another note, that the outcome of the sacrifice play doesn't matter at all, since if Bard hadn't intervened the entire "sneak in" bit could've gone off effortlessly and without a hitch, and this is just a delaying tactic to get the dead angel going.

It's also entirely possible that Cats infiltration was always going to fail and Bard intervened to ensure it would fail controlledly and in a way that ensured the continued survival of the characters.

Who knows.

Liliet

I'll point out this has to have influenced Malicia one hell of a lot, with the unsuccessful attempt. IMHO it's very plausible for Bard to have seen that one coming (the readership certainly did), and for THAT to be the desired next step in whatever her scheme is.

dadycoool

If nothing else, it spooked Malicia. People who are spooked don't necessarily make the best/most rational choices, or they retreat to regroup and rethink, which she really can't afford to do with Cat Right There.

Liliet

Oshi

This was my thought. bard couldn't play the political game or the gambit Cat set up so she played the desperate Empress. If Malicia invites the DK onto the field because she goes nuts...Well she wouldn't because she is practical but the more she plays to the tune of the story...

Xinci

I think its more Bard is in the pit with Cat. Arsenal wasnt a situation with enough related consequences/situations to be good enough proof that Cat is worthy of the Role Bard has had for so long. So she cant hold back, the Gods want a full on contest to see who is better. For her to perish Cat must prove the superior iteration of a agent to intercede for the Gods.

Abrakadabra

I think it is the opposite. Bard is a tool of the gods. Cat is not.

megaprr

Hot damn this chapter was absolutely delicious. Thank you EE for yet another great Monday night.

MephInBlack

I wonder if ee read Christopher Pike's The Last Vampire because this chapter lovely took me back to my youth, the vibes of the third book of that saga.

mamm0nn

"We had a conversation, some years ago, that I believe you must have forgot," Malicia said. "Not so long before Akua's Folly. You asked me about Still Water for the first time."

Oh shit. When she said that, I thought Malicia meant to remind Cat of that time she mentioned she had three or four world-ending doomsday devices in her Tower from which Still Waters was but one.

MagnaMalusLupus

Threatening a captive monarch that you're going to release a doomsday weapon is such a trope that it would be trivial for the Gods Above to destroy you. It's like something the Tyrant would do, except without the massive amounts of ham to make it not end in your inevitable death. Further, at this point everyone is far beyond the need for petty threats. Cat knows the score, that Malicia can't use the real bad stuff without eventually leading to a story death. Malicia knows that Cat can't be bluffed like that anyways at this point, so she skips the pointless and frankly crass monologue.

Shveiran

In addition to what others already said, IIRC Malicia also said that two of those doomsday weapons were inherited, and the fourth was "dependant on Wekesa being alive to function".

So she is already down to two plus Still Water, and the two were weapons the previous Dread Emperors had and didn't use. Which isn't something to sneer at (they are still judged by Malicia to be doomsday weapons) but they likely have very steep costs BESIDE the obvious downfalls of a doomsday weapon. Otherwise, well, Nefarious would have used them on Callow after the Wizard of the West broke his power, even if the Chancellor couldn't access them during the following Civil War. Somehow I doubt that rapist would have balked at destroying Callow if he couldn't have it, so there must be some reason why he didn't use them.

Possibly these two need massive sorcerous, Named skill to use? Which he didn't have after the Wizard broke his power? If so, Malicia couldn't use them too.

Though I guess Nefarious still had a Warlock, so there is a flaw in the thory; then again, Praes being Praes, maybe he simply didn't trust someone else with that amount of power.

Juff

Typo Thread:

rack, empty > rack, and empty shrugged (appears 4 times. might want to reword some)
I found had > I found I had have smiling > have me smiling
King to want > King to win
High Lady Whither > High Lady Wither that the Carrion > the Carrion achiever > achieve said it would > said he would shorty > shortly
Name tended > Named tended ton exaggerate > to exaggerate to egregious > too egregious cooperate, at first then > cooperate at first, then The got the > They got the give audience > given audience sat a great > sat on a great sake a single > sake of a single flaws the Wasteland high nobles they > flaws, the Wasteland high nobles reputation anymore > reputation any more not doubt > no doubt

Frivolous

And once again Cat Speaks to tell someone to Be Silent or Shut Up. And this time someone who has an aspect of Rule.

I wonder if she may have permanently muzzled Malicia's ability to Speak. That I think might be the most terrible potential consequence of her order, taking away Malicia's big gun.

EE, please let Catherine's Name manifest so we can know what it is. I'm begging.

I'm guessing the one who sought to free Catherine was Archer. Can't have been Adjutant; he's not swift enough, and he's really too bulky. Hierophant would have been much louder. Akua was probably busy doing diplomacy with Takisha and Sepulchral.

I suspect one advantage the Woe had was the Crows could reliably let them know how Catherine was doing. They didn't have to worry about whether Catherine was dead or being tortured or mind controlled. The Crows would always know.

therealgridlock

Well, we know her name is extremely powerful, since it is taking so long to make/manifest/carve, and we know it has to do with ruling/sitting in judgement over named/names, we know she's morally pragmatic, instead of Good or Evil, we know even the Good respect her, even if their gods don't, we know the Evil... Well, I'm not sure how they feel about her, and the individuals are individual in their feelings.

I for one am not witty enough to hypothesize Names for her, but it would be funny if she was Pope Catherine Foundling, First of her name, Judge of Named, Ruler of Footrests.

I dunno, it's something Cardinal related, we know that. Cardinal sin? Pope? Bishop? Churchy things are Good though, so. Some sort of Teacher? Professor is too small, they exist in world, I dunno. Principal? Headmaster? I said I wasn't witty.

Yunamed

Cat is going to be the next wandering bard or a similar role where she can intervene on both sides of Good and Evil

Ben Serreau-Raskin

For a while now I've been thinking it might be something like Wandering Judge, or synonyms to that effect. It's definitely a position of authority over others, possible Named in particular, and it's not likely to be a rulership Name given that it's coming in the lead up to or the aftermath of abdication. She also got set up as a foil for the Grey Pilgrim, whose position is now vacant and relied heavily on wandering/mobility.

Sykomantis

If she's going to be stuck in one place running Cardinal, then she can't be Wandering anything... oh damn just had a brain blast.

Dictator

Sykomantis

Or better yet:

Director

therealgridlock

I swear to God if a magic gun shows up and a triangle starts talking I'm going to throw a rock at something.

Stephen Marsh

Arbitrator.

dadycoool

Muzzle Rule? Now THAT would be game-breaking. For a ruler to lose her power to command her subjects would crush her in multiple ways, especially one who rules a snake pit like Praes.

Burdi

You have to be patient man, like me, I have been waiting cat's new name since 2018, when she lost her Winter power

ninegardens

Dammmmmnnnn.... that gambit was cold, and I love it.

And....I do feel a bit bad for Sargon. It was nice spending time with a character who was charming, and seeing our narrator be pampered, and like... he never ASKED for any of this bullshit, with soulboxing and all that jazz.

Also, she is taking the GRANARY of a city. A city which has seen famine and starvation far too many times.
That's... fucked up.

Also, it is kinda fabulous seeing a chracter who was nothing but a footnote 3 books back, and then having them as a legit important character for a little story arc just here.

Liliet

Same, re: granary. Knowing Catherine tho I'm assuming she's left enough food for them to hold out until the Tower brings aid – and it has to, at this point.

308924810a

Yeah this plan is bold and clever, I like it.

RanVor

Magnificent.

BargleNawdleZouss

I was definitely expecting a long drawn out version of Egwene al'Vere's captivity from The Wheel of Time. This was much more well executed!

Darkening

Eh, I rather liked Egwene's captivity arc. But it's not like Cat's being held captive by an order that she's part of, so slowly subverting it from the inside wasn't really in the cards.

ohJohN

OH DAAAAAAAAMN!!!

All that from a last-minute plan she barely had time to vocalize?!

What's really blowing my mind is that every piece of this feels justified: we've never so explicitly seen the delicate balance of internal High Seat family politics before, but it all follows logically and neatly from the ample context we did have (families hoard power through knowledge, artifacts and breeding; they compete with the other High Seats for influence; while members are loyal to the bloodline, they'll knife each other in a second; etc). And this is exactly the kind of equilibria Cat has been learning to recognize and exploit since some of her earliest lessons with Black & Malicia about the overall balance of power in Praes, how to effectively rule Callow, etc.

Masterfully done, ∞/10.

Liliet

This ♥

Fully earned, beautifully presented.

Earl of Purple

This was great. I love the Beast Cat visualises as her Name, it makes me wonder how other characters see theirs. Amadeus has a clockwork machine, always ticking, but I don't think we know anyone else's. Might just be a thing Amadeus started, so no one else actually thinks about it.

Shveiran

I think it was mentioned Wekesa saw his as being a dam containing a lake of power, and Malicia as a weaver of tapestries.

dadycoool

He's also the only other mortal we know of that is able to recognize Stories, so it's entirely possible that others just don't have the level of awareness it takes to notice. Even after all these years, Cat still has to shush everyone when they start triggering a "tempting fate" flag.

Shveiran

He isn't the only one, he's simply better than most.

Admittedly, several we knew were aware of the patterns died in the past years, but I'm pretty sure several more were taught during the war.

After all Catherie, Hanno and Tariq can't help but teach others. Even their last reunion before the battle of Hainaut included meaningful story bits.

Liliet

Malicia visualizes hers as gloves she puts on.

dadycoool

This? This chapter right here is why we all adore her. Everything about this chapter is the distilled essence of the being, the entity, that is Catherine Foundling, Queen of Callow. Sowing chaos to bask in its warmth, using the ashes of her antics to forge exactly what she wants, and dominating her opponents in a way that none of them could ever have conceived of, punishing every mistake in a way similar to how Saruman punished the Deeping Wall for having a drain, with all the shock, trauma, and astonishment. And then, when she comes to analyze the situation, she beholds the whole of it and laughs. And walks away with everything she wanted, her foe thanking her for the opportunity to give it to her.

Shveiran

You know what I really liked?

So far, we saw the High Lords and Malicia try to oppose Cat and making a good show of it.

Cat brings the orcs around, she has Named superiority but not enough to batter everything down, Nim leads a commando to inflict strategic losses while also unwittingly entering a Pattern of Three, Wolof has good enough defenses it can't be breached without major losses, then there was a surgical strike for Vivienne, then the sabotage of the infiltration which lead to Cat's capture.

And one might read all that as "Malicia actually has a shot at it". There is enough resistance the Empress might actually win.

And all that is ripped away in this chapter, because we see that there is no possible endgame for her.

Really think about it: you caught your enemy and she has no defense whatsoever.

And you come to the realization that you literally can't touch her. That having her in your clutches helps you not at all.

Her mortal allies won't stop coming if you hurt her. Her immortal allies cannot be hurt through her. She can't be coerced to give back what she stole because she physically cannot without a third party's permission AND you'd need to give her back access to the Night for that to work, and good luck with that.

If you kill her, the world power you BADLY need to keep your "ally" in check collapses, and you end up the only neighbor of the Kingdom of the Dead. For a short while, because remember: you don't have enough food to survive without trade, and Keter won't trade you food. It will let you die in a Civil War and then invade whoever wins to finish gobbling up Calernia.

And we saw how trying to use Name shanenigans against one of the top three story-fu black belts in the continent ends.

I guess it... sunk in, you know?

How there is no winning for Malicia anymore. She is trying to buy her way out of a corner, but there aren't really any takers.

It must be terrifying, from her point of view.

She can't kill her enemy or really see her lose, or she'll lose as well.

And she know, so she won't stop coming after you because there isn't really anything meaningful for Malicia to threaten her with anymore. It doesn't matter if the Empress could blow up Callow because she can no longer afford to: any further escalation would either collapse the Grand Alliance or further cement Malicia as its enemy, and both are lose conditions.

If Catherine wins, she'll want her head; if she loses, Malicia has already lost too.

She is stalling, trying to weaken Catherine to that narrow point where she is weakened enough she needs Praes but can't take it by force, and it just... won't work, because Catherine is not fighting a war. Much like she couldn't stop the Saint or Pilgrim with strategical necessities, she can't now be stopped by Malicia's sabotage.

It just doesn't stick.

Truth his, the last possibility Malicia had went into smoke at the peace conference. When the Dead King got serious about the war.

Keeping by his side through three years of apocalyptic conflict against the whole continent kind of ensured she could only choose which way she'd lose, in the end.

dadycool

"Catherine's not fighting a war." She's just doing a fetch quest. "Oh, the world is ending and you need to go to Keter to stop it." "Sure, but I could use some xp, so I'll do this 'close the Hell Portal' sidequest first. The end of the world won't happen until I trigger the event anyway, so I might as well do everything I can beforehand."

Shveiran

On one hand, I feel tempted to say that's not how it works at all.

On the other... godsdamn it, it kinda does, doesn't it?

Damn it, I can't unsee it now.

Sinead

Eh. I think that only works if there wasn't a timer on the Hellgates that would keep ticking while she was running against Keter.

It is an XP grind, but that's not how Cat's viewing it, so the meta meta plot doesn't really apply.

Shveiran

Sure, there is that.

But even out of Arcadia, in a narrative-driven world a timer only ever runs out when it is dramatically appropriate.

And Cat sets the narrative.

So really, in a way, dadycool is kind of right

matesbe

But it's not just a good thing. Malacia might decide that if she's going to lose anyways, she might as well go down swinging. After all, if she's dead, she's too dead to care that the Dead King is eating the continent.

Malacia can still do damage; so far she's refrained from anything too egregious because she doesn't want the Dead King to win either, but if she really really believes there's no way out, I doubt she'll bow out quietly.

Oshi

Which is exactly what I think the Bard wanted when she got Cat captured. A mad Empress who would break the world and in the process give a reason for the use of the Angelic weapon.

Cicero

The thing is that Malicia never planned on defeating Cat, she's been planning to hurt Cat until she become indispensable to Cat, and then trade her services for her survival (and continued rule as Dread Empress). To her that makes a lot more sense than just being an ally and trusting faithfulness will be returned.

It reminds me a bit of Japan attacking America in WWII. Japan never had a strategy for victory through war. The plan was always to inflict such a hard blow on America that America would "obviously" choose to negotiate a peace, at which Japan would return a bunch of things (though not the Philippines), and leave Japan in a position to defend her new possessions in SE Asia. When America instead took the position of "unconditional surrender or death" as the only terms they would accept, Japan had no back up plan, no way to actually fight and win the resulting war.

Japan would have been better off attacking the Dutch, British, and French holdings and left the Americans alone. That would have left America in the perfect position to completely eviscerate Japan's logistical lines, and inflict a terrible defeat on Japan – but American domestic politics, probably meant that America wouldn't ever do it, despite the perfect position to win easily.

Japan just couldn't tolerate putting itself in that position of vulnerability. Just as Malicia could never accept the vulnerability of a de facto independent Callow, even if de jure it was allied with Praes. So she attempted to secure a position of power that would ensure Callow couldn't betray her, and ended up instead making herself an implacable (and unappeasable) enemy

Of course, knowing Malicia's backstory it's not surprising that she would make such a choice, but it does have a aura of inevitable tragedy to it, like all the best villains do.

Liliet

I started thinking about how Malicia could plausibly personally get out of this without a big Amadeus Ex Machina if, idk, taken over by a ghost of alt!Cat or something.

And I keep running against the mind control issue.

Malicia cannot be trusted around people who aren't the specific handful of Named powerful enough to throw off her influence. Even Amadeus, if still un-Named, would have to personally trust that she wouldn't plant hooks in his mind without his awareness. And while I could see him taking that risk, literally no-one else would think it justified. Because the trick with the Legions' officers showed that she cannot even be relied upon to follow obvious self-interest in mutual non-fucking-over. She's just... a scorpion that stings out of habit, and from an outside PoV there's at this point no situation you can put her in and be reasonably confident she won't wreck everything from it.

Save for personal attention of the sort Cat bound Akua with, and that was half self-inflicted – Akua'd been the one to take her own soul out of her body.

The mind control wrecks it all, and Malicia's demonstrative unwillingness to follow any ethics around it whatsoever.

I do think there's still routes for her to survive, but only at outside parties' mercy, because to lose Rule she needs to be beaten and broken. Catherine-style calculated surrender will not work, because it'll keep her a potential of a Name. Someone needs to bring her low enough she just... doesn't have any power at all, anymore, and then decide to spare her.

(Contrast this with how GA looks at Cat holding their collective fates in the palm of her hand and philosophically shrugs "eh, it's probably going to be fine")

hue hue

Man, you are a really good writer. This is the kinda of thing I expected from a published book, not something found mentioned in a comment on a isekai web novel. Never have I seen such good worldbuilding, to be fair I don't read much world focused books.

Serious, good job. I going to your's patreon now, finnaly got mine second salary this month.

Xinci

Hm wonder if one could do similar things with devils or demons as they did with the fey fowl. Finding the right species would be troublesome since you are basically trying to steal materials with specific dimensional rules/intrinsic qualities like cells stealing genes.

Cat has a fair point on precedent, regardless of anything else the Grand Alliance will be wary of allowing a malfactor like that to stay. Now Cat just needs to get a carrot for her stick. Or at least Black needs to destabalize things so that she can aid implementation of the carrot.

I am glad to see that I was right in the methods they could use Still Water. Does make me more curious about how well Alchemy could be used to affect souls or help induce things like the Gift.

Liliet

Malicia has kind of wrecked any possible carrots, because here's the thing: Amadeus's allegiance was the greatest carrot she could have ever had.

And she just threw it away on paranoid impulse. A sequence of paranoid impulses. A sequence of decisions that just. Really set on fire any possible idea that she might be a rational agent one can bargain with.

If she cannot be trusted to not fuck over the guy who literally put her on the throne and supported her there for four decades while also being her personal friend and someone she's described as "part of her soul". She cannot be trusted to not fuck over anyone in any circumstances.

Where the definition of "fuck over" goes alllll the way between "allowing a city to be turned into zombies on a slight miscalculation of consequences of an action", "openly supporting an omnicidal lich because surely it'll be fine" and "planting mind control hooks in officers of her own army out of paranoia".

That's a really fucking wide spectrum, partially strongly characterized by being kind of bad at predicting destructive consequences of one's own actions.

...yeah. Bad.

Cat has good reasons to go for her customary shitty wine / sword combo on Praesi nobles. There's no genuine carrot left for her to possibly offer.

Sam

Absolutely incredible!

Xinci

Hm wonder if one could do similar things with devils or demons as they did with the fey fowl. Finding the right species would be troublesome since you are basically trying to steal materials with specific dimensional rules/intrinsic qualities like cells stealing genes. Better said you are trying to fuse materials compatible with other rules of reality. It seems that creatures generally need to have less modifications for a successful transplant(which actually makes the Praesi's interbreeding make more sense given humans are apparently quite flexible about mixing other things into themselves)

Cat has a fair point on precedent, regardless of anything else the Grand Alliance will be wary of allowing a malfactor like that to stay. Now Cat just needs to get a carrot for her stick. Or at least Black needs to destabilize things so that she can aid implementation of the carrot.

I am glad to see more in the methods they could use Still Water. Does make me more curious about how well Alchemy could be used to affect souls or help induce things like the Gift. Presumably the principle of the method it could be used for a host of things like affecting agricultural cycles or affecting water density as well.

JRogue

This was transcendent. This was beyond. The writing in this chapter alone places EE alongside the best writers of today. Amazing story building and insight. Her last line; "Should I now tremble at the shadow of her shadow?" is a truly chill-inducing line.

I am overwhelmed by this, and someday, when these books have been turned into paper and are sold, I will buy every one of them and give them a place of honor on my book shelf.

ninegardens

So... you know what scene the initial talk with Malicia reminds me of?

The 5 way discussion at the end of the princes graveyard.

GP: "How well you have tied us up with the strings of our own necessity"

Cat: "Do you resent me for making this a victory for people other than myself?"

Saint: "CUT OUT THE ROT! I HATE YOU ALL! BURN MOTHERFUCKERS!"

And Here:

Malicia: "I can give you everything you want. Here's some sweet rituals for fighting DK"

CAT: " ohhh... woe is me... how neatly you have tied us up with- lol, nevermind DIE BITCH DIE"

And its like... I'm starting to realize that that trick... that TECHNIQUE of making herself too useful not to negotiate with... she learned that from Alaya.

And also... it kinda feels like if we thought Cat was clever and good for doing it previously, its a bit weird for calling Alaya wicked for doing it now.

Hell, there's even a similarity with Saint being like "Look, you weren't attacking us, but your Allys with the Black Knight who has been rampaging around the Procean countryside burning shit. And your an evil shit, we can't let you set a precedent here"

It's just... there's a LOT of parallels here. We're just on the opposite side of the conversation this time. Saints side of the conversation. 🙄

hakureireimu

The difference is that Cat tried very hard to keep her end of her bargains.

Shveiran

The difference is that, you know, the Empress helped the Dead King to devour the world for years.

This isn't protagonist bias at work.

Are there similarities? Yeah, sure.

Do the differences change the context meaningfully? Absolutely yes.

ninegardens

I mean.... Cat had been helping and supporting Black's attempts to burn shit down. The fact she didn't always APPROVE doesn't change the fact that he was an ally to her, and very dangerous.

Probably the bigger difference was, at that stage Black wasn't CURRENTLY setting fire to shit, unlike Nessie up north.

The differences change the context, but I don't think they change them as much as you seem to imply.

Shveiran

I'm sorry, are you implying that there is no substantial difference between the conquest of a single nation (a conquest that didn't really involve a culling of the population or any great restriction of its citizen's freedom, which isn't speculation but a plot point since that is WHY it worked for decades) with the END OF LIFE ON A CONTINENT?

Liliet

With the difference being that Catherine has been an actually TRUSTWORTHY ally to everyone she's ever allied with for as long as they kept their end of the deal.

While Malicia has fucked over, in sequence, everyone who has ever allied with her. Her alliance with Amadeus ended with her setting fire to it. Her alliance with DK was conceived as one she'd betray as soon as she deems it convenient from the very start.

Catherine isn't saying "you can't play with us because you've played with the mean kids". Catherine is saying "I tried playing with you, cost me a city, I watched while my father KEPT trying to play with you, you just ignored his goodwill without a blink, what the FUCK are you expecting at this point".

Malicia is, in fact, a neat illustration of why Laurence had reacted to Catherine the way she did. I mean – I've always been sympathetic towards Laurence. She was factually wrong, but she had good fucking reasons to make the predictions she did.

Forgot_My_Name

Catherine will probably magnanimously offer to sell them Callowan grain back with a very generous interest rate for their debt, too.

Frivolous

Realized something a few hours ago.

This is probably the first time in many decades that Malicia has had her will usurped, been subjected to another's Speaking. The last time it happened was probably when she was still the concubine Alaya, and the one who did it to her was probably Dread Emperor Nefarious.

I don't think even Kairos Theodosian dared to Speak to her. Then again, Kairos never showed any aptitude for Speaking.

So Malicia may have experienced some degree of flashback to trauma from Nefarious following Catherine's command to Be silent.

Note this is not certain, because not every Dread Emperor has Rule as an aspect or knows how to Speak, but it's quite likely, no?

So even if Malicia didn't hate and fear Catherine before, she surely does now.

Of course, there are huge and very peculiar differences between Nefarious's relationship with Alaya, and Malicia's with Catherine.

For one thing, Nefarious was basically Alaya's owner. She was his concubine and sex slave. He had all the power.

Here, Catherine was Malicia's prisoner, and yet Malicia failed to command or even frighten Cat, and Cat succeeded in commanding and frightening Malicia.

Akua used to say that any Sahelian agent that has been in the same room with Malicia must be assumed to be compromised. Now the same axiom must apply to Malicia if she ever meets Catherine again.

Is there anything more unlikely and oxymoronic than a vulnerable, helpless Dread Empress?

sengachi

Yikes. Especially considering that exact trauma and resulting need for control is what led to her Rule aspect becoming such a focus for her ... damn. This just got real pathologically personal for Malicia didn't it?

Sinead

Yeah. That's why though I can appreciate why that scene is impressive from Cat's perspective, Cat commanding Malicia to be silent made me feel cold.

There have been studies that show that people from traumatic backgrounds very often describe the purpose of power being to keep yourself safe. Is it a wonder that Malicia developed the ability to bend the will of those around her without speaking a word?

And Cat broke that illusion.

I don't like Alaya, but I do find her so very tragic. She was pulled into the Tower, and thought that the only way to be free of the Tower is through to the top.

Liliet

Honestly, considering how far Alaya spiraled on her current coping mechanism for feeling safe, maybe Cat breaking that illusion will actually do her some good. Like, maybe she'll find her way toward survival after all.

Xinci

Issue being people with trauma need to feel safe while also having a change in perspective to really get post traumatic growth. Maybe Amadeus could do something for that former portion but otherwise such people tend to just lash out in self-destructive ways.

Liliet

Malicia is already lashing out in self-destructive ways. The first step when a kid is swinging a bazooka around is taking away the bazooka. If Alaya's ties to her Name weaken, she has potential to ACTUALLY achieve safety.

jamesc9

> Is there anything more unlikely and oxymoronic than a vulnerable, helpless Dread Empress?

If the Empressness is a temporary condition, then I would think that they all go through a phase like that. It's a bit like Outside Context Problems in the Iain M Banks culture novels.

sengachi

Honestly the fact that Cat can Speak to Malicia is terrifying and says a lot about her Name.

Malicia is one of the most matured Named on the continent, with the single most established history of any ruling Name, with a Name designed for Speaking, with an aspect designed for Speaking, and so much concerted practice into that aspect that she apparently transcended any prior recorded ability with it (Speaking without speaking).

And Cat, without an aspect or even a fully formed Name, no-sold her. And then Spoke to her. There's presumably a trick to it, some narrative reason Cat had to wait for Malicia to Speak first.

But this ...

This is like a no-Name no-aspects claimant out-wrestling Heracles and making it look easy. And the writing made me buy it. I am in awe.

Steven Silver

It's probably because Cat's nascent name is meant to usurp Malicia's. So Malicia's reign is on the way out while Cat's is on the way in. Bad portents for the Dread Empress, eh?

Crash

Eh. Usurp has weird connotation here. She's not about to climb the tower.

Probably more accurate to say that she has made so much of her persona being unwilling to bend to rules she disagrees with that she managed to make it important enough to her Name that she not be overruled. Especially not by Malicia.

Even just thinking about this little arc, Cat's has taken pains to establish that she will not listen to Malicia and that they will never meet in anything but her own terms. At every opportunity, as soon as she has the information she needs, she gets rid of Malicia.

When they first do a parley, before the campaign truly begins she immediately kills the puppet. When it becomes clear the scroll has what she needs to know, she attacks the puppet and removes it from her rooms. Even the Sisters refuse to allow control over their chosen one.

She's playing the narrative real good here.

Darkening

Yeah, Cat just establishing early and often that her highest priority is brutally killing Malicia as soon as she is able to and as often as she needs to is a hell of a thing. Like, even with the detachment of having it not be her own body, having someone repeatedly kill you in brutal fashion can not be pleasant. She killed her a bunch in Keter, killed one here earlier, made several attempts on the other one here, and has made it abundantly clear that she's going to keep attempting it with the, 'there's always next time' line. I feel like that story groove of, "Cat kills Malicia," is getting worn pretty deep at this point. Combined with Cat just not selling her greatest strength and turning it back against her, Malicia might finally grasp what Ime's been trying to tell her for years and start being very scared of what Catherine Foundling is going to do.

Christian Oaks

So who is betting before the books and artifacts are returned they at least used night to copy the books? Or maybe heirophant already somehow read them all?

Crash

Yeah, no way they get to give those back without Masego having read through all the interesting ones lmao

That or they have to get something real cool to show him because it not he's gonna be pouring for the rest of the book.

(Maybe everyone is being real careful about not telling him what has been stolen?)

Steven Silver

When Malicia tried to compel Cat, I was reminded of the bit from Family Guy where Peter opens a can of whoop-ass. If you haven't seen it, look it up, you'll get what I mean 😊

Valkyria

Look at Cat, just being an absolute little shit just for fun and giggles. Cause she CAN.

I absolutely love it

Crash

Cat's new name is Named that's it. That's the play. One of her Aspects is just Speak.

A generic name for an all-powerful Odin stand in. It's what the vagrant impersonator would have wanted.

Vivienne also gets the Heiress Name in the same paragraph.

I will not be taking criticism. Thanks.

BIDZ180

An absolutely magnificent chapter.

superkeaton

That. Was fun.

Jefepato

Hm. I recall that Cat has described her Name as a "beast" in the past, but I think this is the first time she's described it as having "Fur, deep and matted and warm."

I am not sure how to interpret that, since her new Name is clearly something with considerable authority as well.

“Queen of the Beasts?” It doesn’t have the right ring to it.

Stephen Marsh

Makes me think of the expired member of Black’s band of five very time it fades towards that description.

Just hoping Cat doesn’t get killed and skinned.

Lord Haart

Yeah I think there’s a risk there. Even in stories where the beast garners sympathy, there are few cases where the beast survives.

Lord Haart

I mean back in Marchford we got a note visual representation IIRC and I’ve definitely been imagining it with fur.

I don’t think it implies she will have much to do with literal beasts, more that her name is something Primal vs Malicia’s gloves/tapestry or Amadeus’s ticking machine.

Mental Mouse

I doubt the Beast image is relevant to Cat’s external power or actions, it’s just her internal view.

Chapter 11: Descent

“Loyalty is not opposite of betrayal, but in truth adjacent: to truly place a person or principle above all others is to promise injury to a thousand others.”

– Extract from the prisoner’s memoirs of Princess Eliza of Salamans

My soldiers cheered as I rode back into camp.

I’d had a party waiting for me shortly outside the gates, led by Vivienne herself. She’d pulled me in tight for a hug, to my surprise and pleasure, before we took the saddle and headed away from the prying eyes atop the walls of Wolof. I’d expected there to be something of a strange mood in camp after I'd spent a sennight in captivity, but if anything my sudden return seemed to have been expected. Like I'd been a given that I would pull a trick, find a way out of the pit. It was as once oddly touching and brute burden. Sooner or later, I thought, I would lead them to a doom there would be no bearding. The thought of the look on their faces then had my stomach dropping.

It wouldn't do to return grim-faced, though, so I smiled and laughed and stopped to speak with men and women I recognized. There were more than I'd expected. The First Army had pulled heavily from rank and file of the Fifteenth, back when it'd been first raised, and in some ways it had seen less action than other parts of the Army of Callow. There were fewer holes in the ranks here than there would have been in the Third or the Fourth.

When I first got to my tent it was to a warming sight: all of my closest companions had gathered there. Gods, even Pickler had come and it was even more of a chore to pull her away from her work since Robber had died. Akua kept to the back, tactfully keeping away from Vivienne, but I found her eyes and inclined my head. I'd speak no more of it for now, but I'd not forgot whose scheming it would be that got me out of that cell. Scribe was keeping her company, anyway, another whose presence surprised me. Wine was poured, though little of it – it was before Noon Bell – and I was asked about my time imprisoned. There was a great deal of outrage when I explained I'd pretty much lived in the lap of luxury, with good wine and interesting books.

"It figures even in a cell you'd stumble into a better bed than us," Indrani complained.

"Even got to maul Malicia twice," I cheerfully added.

I had a thousand questions to ask them, but before getting to it I wanted a wash and a change of clothes. Pretty as mine were, I wasn't going to keep wearing what my foes had given me. Masego insisted on inspecting me for illness or enchantments, which I agreed to once I was clean from the dust of the road, and most of them took the hint that I wanted to wash immediately. Hakram lingered, no doubt to brief me on all that I'd missed, but to my surprise so did another.

"A private word, if you please?"

I eyed Scribe with surprise. Over the length of our association she'd made it a point to avoid getting Adjutant out of the room whenever she reported to me, as if to make it perfectly clear that she was not trying to usurp his position at my side. I doubted she would have broken that custom without reason, so I slowly nodded before glancing at Hakram.

"We'll talk before the evening council," I said. "I need to be caught up."

"And more," Hakram gravelled. "The envoys."

Ah, that. Yeah, it made sense the orcs wouldn't begin the journey back to the Steppes until I was out of Wolof. Not only had we been meant to speak again but there would be no point in making a deal with me if I were to stay Malicia's prisoner.

"Bring in Vivienne for that, then," I said.

"I'll see what can be done," the orc drily replied.

He gave Scribe a nod before taking his leave, limping away on his iron leg. That left me alone with the Webweaver in my tent, for the first time in what must have been ages. I poured myself a cup of water with lemon slices in it, asking if she wanted one with a cocked eyebrow. She declined, standing rigidly before my desk. I still couldn't see her face in more than small glimpsed, always half-faded, but from the way she held herself I would have thought her nervous – or at least as close to it as a woman like Eudokia ever came.

"Now you've got me curious," I admitted. "This isn't professional, is it?"

"Not entirely," Scribe admitted. "I would like to make a request of you."

My brow climbed up. That would be a first. I'd sometimes wondered if there was still a woman under the Name or if she'd died when the Calamities had split.

"What about?" I asked.

I wouldn't accept or decline without knowing more, but I didn't actually believe that'd been what she was baiting with her lack of elaboration. She was, I was growing certain, genuinely uncomfortable having this conversation. Was it about Black? No, we'd talked of that before. Of loyalties. It wouldn't make her like... this.

"You still have in your possession the corpse of the soldier that Marshal Nim possessed," Scribe said.

"Marshal Nim can't possess shit, Scribe," I amiably said. "The Black Knight did that."

Neither of us were particularly comfortable matching that Name to anyone but Amadeus of the Green Stretch, but best we got used it. I did not think it likely he would ever resume his old Name, which meant that even if Marshal Nim survived the tussle over the fate of Praes someone else would step in and fill those shoes. Scribe conceded the point with a nod.

"I would like for it to be passed into my custody," Eudokia the Scribe said.

I blinked. That, uh, hadn't been what I was expecting. I wasn't sure what I actually had been expecting, but it was emphatically Not That.

"Masego's studying it," I finally pointed out.

Or at least he'd been doing so when I'd been captured. It'd been too much to hope he would be able to give me the aspect that'd done this, but I wanted at least an understanding of the mechanics involved.

"He believes he has already learned all he can," Scribe said. "I believe he would be amenable to closing the matter, should you ask him."

Huh. She wouldn't even have needed to spy on him for that, I reminded myself. Zeze considered her like an aunt of sorts, he would have simply told her if asked.

"So I feasibly could give you the body," I acknowledged. "And we're going to walk right past why I should – for now anyway – to ask instead why you'd want that corpse in the first place. What are you going to use it for?"

She had to know I'd ask, I thought. I was not exactly known for my policy of handing over dead bodies to Named without asking questions. She had to have known, and still she hesitated before answering. That was fascinating to me, given who I was dealing with.

"I want to Inscribe it," the Scribe said.

I swallowed a grin. Oh my, that'd definitely been an aspect. I was finally getting a peek at the juicy secrets of the Calamities, was I?

"And what does that do, exactly?" I asked.

"When I first began to us the method," Scribe quietly said, "it was little more than a trick. I could make my words... weigh more than those of others. Make them linger where they were written."

But tricks improve, I thought, and this one she'd refined until it became an aspect.

"By the time I met Amadeus," Scribe said, "I could make eyes and ears of vermin. Sometimes I could even Inscribe instructions onto others that they would be beholden to obey."

I calmly set down my cup on the desk. Living people, living creatures. Yet she was now asking for a corpse.

"You can make corpse-puppets," I said. "And the higher quality the corpse, the better the results."

"The first one I made was a puppet," Scribe said, and I glimpsed a faint smile. "Little better than undead. Yet when I was destroyed, I retrieved the corpse and found that what I had inscribed could be retrieved. That there was more. The inscription had changed. I used the changes, and so the second was... something more."

I breathed out a soft, incredulous laugh as it all fell into place.

"Gods Below," I said. "You madwoman. You actually made a Named, didn't you? By fucking accident."

"We began calling him Assassin after the fourteenth iteration," Scribe told me. "Wekesa helped me with the inscriptions that made it coherent enough for sapience, based on the contract Tikoloshe was bound by. Quickly enough we realized that the primary limitation was the quality of the base material. Most bodies could only carry part of the inscription before they began to wither. "

"So you used dead Named," I said.

Assassin had died over the years, I thought. Dozens and perhaps even hundreds of times. And every time the Scribe had retrieved the corpse, ripped out the inscription and shoved a refined version into another dead hero's corpse. Gods, had that been what my father did with all the Callowan heroes he'd nipped in the bud? Dropped them in some crypt, stashed away until Eudokia needed more materials? I was as appalled by the desecration as I was impressed by the brutal pragmatism.

"This one was possessed by a Black Knight," Scribe said. "I will only be able to Inscribe seven parts in ten, at most, and there will be need for extensive... surgery so the resulting entity has a human silhouette. But he would be a match for the Assassin we were using in the decade prior to the Conquest, by my estimation."

I could think of a way or two to use such an asset, I thought, but I still far from sold. It would, for one, not be my asset.

"How much control on the entity do you have, after you Inscribe him?" I asked.

"It cannot refuse a command from me," Scribe said, then grimaced. "I fear you do not fully understand, Queen Catherine. I do not simply write words on dead flesh when I do this. I give of myself. It is the wholeness of the aspect. He cannot act against what I make of him, because there is nothing else to the entity."

When I had fought Akua in the depths of Liesse, when I had passed through the Fourfold Crossing she laid out before me, I had glimpse of a life in which I had kill the Assassin. Goblinfire had done it, masses of it. It's not a metaphor when she says she invests her aspect, I realized. It's physically in the corpse. Practically speaking, it was probably why the construct could mimic Named abilities to some degree. The 'Assassin' wouldn't have aspects of its own, but it wasn't just flesh and power either. Not exactly. So if the body's destroyed with goblinfire or demons it probably ruins her aspect too, I decided.

"Does Malicia know?" I asked. "Ranger?"

"Ranger does," Eudokia said. "Malicia does not. She is aware that Assassin has 'died' in the past, but believes him to be a manner of wraith possessing bodies."

Which wasn't even entirely wrong, as tended to be the case with the best lies. Huh. That would be a trump card up our sleeve dealing with the empress. Which was probably why Scribe figured I might agree to let her make it. And it wouldn't be a real Named, I thought. That had implications, considering the other opponent I was facing here in Praes. An entity with some of the abilities of Named but who could not be manipulated or predicted the way they could? That was a rather more tempting offer than just another knife to pull on the Dread Empress of Praes. The trouble remained, of course, that in the end it wouldn't be my sleeve that card was up in. It'd be Scribe's tool, and Scribe's loyalty to me was not on solid foundation.

Her enmity with Malicia was very real, though, I judged. It was what she'd broken with my father over. And she despised the Intercessor as the architect of Sabah's death. Could I trust her, though, to use this almost-Assassin to match those threats instead of pursuing her own goals? I took my cup, sipped at it for a bit as I felt her study me.

"And what do you want to us the thing for?" I asked.

"I would like to assassinate Malicia," Scribe frankly said, "but I recognize that there are political realities and that the Tower is likely too well-defended for an incomplete Assassin. Instead I would commit him under your command to offensive operations against her cause."

That was believable enough, but why would a lie from the Webweaver's mouth would be anything else? Best to be blunt, I decided, and avoid misunderstandings.

"I'm not comfortable with giving you that kind of power when you have no personal loyalty to me," I honestly said. "Especially when we're in Praes. And while I don't doubt you could grant me partial control, I don't have the time to handle that on top of my other responsibilities."

To my mild surprise, she nodded without seeming particularly offended.

"I understand," she said. "In other circumstances I would have offered that Adjutant be placed in stewardship over the entity, but given his coming departure I would venture that Vivienne Dartwick is now the best candidate."

First my right hand and now my successor. She'd picked the names well, couldn't deny that.

"And you'd surrender part of the control without argument?" I said, somewhat skeptical.

"I recognize the investment in trust and resources you are making," Scribe calmly said. "I will not pretend offence, though I will remind you I can do significantly more damage to the Grand Alliance with a few letters bearing your fake signature than a dozen Assassins."

I was not unaware of that, but 'I didn't cut your throat with this knife' wasn't much an argument for giving someone a sword either.

"So what is it you do want?" I pressed.

"The right to brief Princess Vivienne on operational opportunities and present targets of my own," Scribe immediately said.

Ah, there it was. Even after she'd been evicted from leadership of the Eyes here in the Dread Empire by Malicia's own spymistress, the Webweaver still had more spies here than Callow did. That meant she'd be able to indirectly guide what we used Assassin for by simple dint of often having better information than we did. I hummed. She could also simply go back on her word and use the entity for whatever the Hells she felt like doing, of course, but that wouldn't be like her. And though you might yet betray me, I thought, even if you do it will be to Black. I simply couldn't believe he'd order her to use something like the Assassin on anyone dear to me.

"Hierophant will supervise," I finally said.

As much because I wanted someone I trusted in that room as because if I robbed him of the opportunity of witnessing that he'd sulk at me for months. Even through the aspect I saw a surprisingly girlish smile light up Eudokia's face, as she eagerly agreed and began to thank.

I could only hope, I thought, that I had not just made a grave mistake.

—

The gold and grain began reaching us half past Noon Bell, after I'd washed and Masego had declared be to be in the fullness of health.

It was only good sense to check the merchandise when you bargained with Praesi, so I unleashed Zeze and Akua on the goods while I got caught up with my informal council. There'd been next to no skirmishing in my absence, as it turned out, and Juniper believed what few blows had been traded to have been accidental. Patrols running into each other by happenstance, nothing intentional. As I'd expected it had been Akua — with Vivienne along for formal authority — who'd conducted the negotiations that'd pressured Sargon into my release. High Lady Takisha had been most eager to get her hands on the Sahelian library.

Akua had even tied up the affair neatly by ensuring the three tomes she'd sent south as proof that we did have the library were precious enough the High Lady of Kahtan wouldn't be too miffed by our ending the negotiations. It was a nice touch, and I told her as much.

Sepulchral had been handled more by Vivienne, though, and there the talks had been rockier. Not for any misstep on my heiress' part, but because Abreha Mirembe had wanted more than simply the arsenal the Sahelians kept in their vaults: she'd wanted a formal alliance between us, as well as the backing of the Grand Alliance. Vivienne had put her off by saying we couldn't agree to that without the First Prince's permission and the backing of all four remaining great lines of the Blood, which Sepulchral had recognized for the putting off it was.

"She warned us that the time for sitting the fence is coming to an end," Vivienne told me. "That the civil war will be coming to a close soon, one way or another."

"Or another yet," I mildly said.

High Lord Sargon hadn't been wrong, when he'd implied that Sepulchral was about as trustworthy as a hungry tiger. I'd been happy to throw her the occasional bone so far because she was a thorn in Malicia's side, but I was not enthused as the notion of Abreha Mirembe holding the Tower. She'd probably hold off on backstabbing us until the end of the war on Keter, I figured, but she'd be trouble in the years that followed. Dread Empress Sepulchral would have no real interest in reforming the empire into something less poisonous to everything it touched, and I honestly suspected that she'd pull out of the Liesse Accords at the first opportunity.

That was not acceptable to me.

"We will need to take inventory of the coin and grain as they come, Catherine, but I believe in both cases our expectations were lower than the reality," Aisha told me. "Wolof's treasury, in particular, appears to have been fuller than we thought."

"My cousin has been sacking the hinterlands of Askum rather relentlessly," Akua noted. "It would not be surprising that he aimed to steal wealth along population."

That or Malicia had been propping up his reign with gold. As had been pointed out to me last year, given that she still drew taxes from most of Praes, half her army was gone and most foreign markets were closed to her the empress was actually sitting on a lot of gold she didn't have that many uses for. Solidifying the position of the High Lord she'd soulboxed would have been a good investment for her.

"How much are we talking, Aisha?" I asked.

"If the wagons are all carrying the same amount of coin, we would be looking at around a million aurelii," the Staff Tribune replied.

I let out a low whistle. In the year after Second Liesse, when the shock of the second largest city in all of Callow and the crisis that'd followed was still hitting us the hardest, my tax revenue for the entire Kingdom of Callow hadn't actually been much higher than that. I let that sink in for a moment.

"Well," I finally said, "I suppose that makes up for the ransom money being stolen back."

That got some smiles, the good mood infectious. It'd been a long while since our treasury had been quite so full.

"We'll give a cut of the loot to Razin and Aquiline," I decided. "As they helped us take it."

Maybe a tenth? Much like my own countrymen Levantines tended to get pissy about anything they saw as charity – the pride of our fellow poors, I amusedly thought – so I might have to end up calling it an early wedding gift. The gold ought to help them strengthen their position in Levant after the war, too, assuming we all made it there. I would repay my debt to Tariq Fleetfoot in full, one bite at a time.

"So who was it that tried to rescue me, by the way?" I asked.

"Indrani led the attempt," Vivienne said. "But Masego, the Silver Huntress and the Barrow Sword went as well."

I let out a small whistle. Not a bad lineup, for a jaunt like this. I'd have to ask Archer how far she'd made it, for Sargon to find it worth filling my cell with guards.

"I suppose I ought to encourage that," I drawled. "And since we're rich, we ought to throw a feast before all the gold's gone. Tonight."

"A fire?" Juniper asked, leaning forward.

"It's been too long," I agreed.

My soldiers would get rewards of their own, extra rations and ale casks being broken out to celebrate our successful 'siege' of Wolof, but tonight I'd share a fire with my friends.

—

We did it proper.

Akua found us a good place, slightly away from the camp but not too far. Indrani and Hakram dug the pit, Vivienne got the benches and Pickler started the fire. I went with Aisha to obtain a few drinks – some of them smuggled, but we knew those tricks – while Juniper began to roast the pig. Masego rustled up a few wards, just in case, and we got old Legion cooks to make us a pot's worth of the old staples from the War College. By the time the sun came down, we'd claimed our hilltop and seats as Juniper began cutting into the pork and the usual haggling began.

"I am a princess, nowadays," Vivienne attempted. "Of Callow, too. Arguably-"

The rib chops were dropped unceremoniously into her plate as I cackled along with Indrani.

"This is borderline treasonous," Vivi whined. "What do I have to do to get a shoulder cut?"

"Be named Aisha Bishara," Hakram drily noted.

"It's a little sad when being royalty doesn't even get you on the right side of nepotism anymore," I said, but then I caught Juniper's hard stare being turned on me, "-is what I would say if I shared her opinion, which is obviously wrong."

I got a satisfied nod for that, letting out a breath for that. I'd gotten used to juicy tenderloin cuts, I wasn't going to let pride get me demoted back to chops. After we'd gotten our plates filled according to the arcane and mysterious system Juniper had developed over our years of companionship – Zeze got downgraded to leg for having suggested using a magical fire while Indrani got bumped up to fillet for having actually listened during briefings for a whole week – the bottles got opened the drink flowed freely. Aragh and ale, mostly, but some wine too. Nok pale for Akua, to Aisha's profuse mockery, and Vale summer wine from my personal stock.

It was a reality that invitation to these little fires had come to be seen as a prize, a mark of favour from the Black Queen and her inner circle, so while I wasn't going to spoil the whole thing I'd made some concessions to the inevitable. People came by, staying for a time before leaving. Razin and Aquiline were first, curious to try pork cooked in the orc way, and though they wanted to hear of my captivity at first they ended up spellbound by a tale Aisha told about ancient Taghreb legends that claimed her people had some kinship with those of Levant, that they'd been brought west on great ships by strange and cruel gods. It was why Taghreb disliked ships to this day, she told them.

I thought it more likely that the whole living in a desert thing had inspired a healthy dislike for seafaring, but what did I know?

The older Named came by, after that, and with them both Grandmaster Brandon Talbot and General Zola. The Refuge crowd, Silver Huntress and the Concocter, kept close to Archer. Akua caught the latter's interest by speaking about some of the potions her family had accrued over the years and they ended up in an animated discussion in what I believed to be tradetalk, but Alexis the Argent and Indrani mostly spoke to each other in stilted, stiff tones. They didn't argue, I saw, but it was hardly a triumph of diplomacy. They're trying, though, I thought. Or at least Indrani is.

Juniper and I got into it with General Zola, who'd fought at the Doom of Liesse under General Afolabi. She'd been a supply tribune, then, but their legion had gotten into enough a mess during the battle that it'd been all hands on deck. Pickler actually seemed to be enjoying a talk with Brandon Talbot, to my surprise, though what little I overheard told me why. Marchford had been his home long before it was my personal fiefdom, and it was Pickler I'd once ordered to rebuild the defences there. The walls had been pulled down after the Conquest, but I'd had no intention of leaving my holdings so vulnerable.

Hakram and Ishaq were quietly talking on the other side of the fire, which I considered to be a situation well in hand. The Barrow Sword saw Adjutant as a peer of sorts, and that meant Hakram could work him I ways I could not. I wanted him disposed to pitching in for the peace in Levant after the war, so preparing him for it early was important.

The last to visit were the kids, well after the others, and though I'd expected Sapan to stick to Masego's side as a barnacle the way she usually I instead found that she and Arthur Foundling wanted to hear from me. Like the lordlings my captivity was of interest to them, but more than that they were rather excited by the way High Lord Sargon had been forced to release me even as I lay in his power.

"Look," I said, "there's nothing wrong with a good sword. Stabbing the right people can get a lot done, don't ever let anyone tell you otherwise, but if you want a win that lasts longer than a season you've got to use other levers. The stuff that actually makes the world go round."

"Was it not your use of the Night that forced him to surrender?" Sapan skeptically asked.

"I could have stolen his treasury with Night and it wouldn't have done a thing," I shrugged. "The man who taught me, he was a stark believer in the victory of cleverness over power. I'm not as much of a purist – Gods know I use artefacts much more than he'd be comfortable with – but he was right that power doesn't mean much unless you know how and where to apply it."

"Because it was politics that forced the High Lord to bend," Arthur Foundling frowned. "Not power."

I nodded.

"Night let me take his library, clean out his vaults," I said. "But I knew what to take because I knew what was important to him. The power wouldn't have meant much without the second part."

"The Carrion Lord taught you this?" Sapan asked, a little hurriedly.

As if she'd been going through with it before she could think better, I decided with a grain of amusement.

"He did," I replied. "I'd say it's a shame he's mostly remembered for the number of Named he's killed, but that would be ignoring the fact he probably cultivated that reputation very much on purpose."

"He conquered Callow, ma'am," Arthur quietly said. "They say it was the governors that did most the ugly deeds, afterwards, but he's the one who handed it all to the Empire."

"He's a monster," I calmly agreed. "But he's also one of the cleverest men I've ever met, and ironically enough perhaps the best chance we have for peace between Callow and Praes in the coming decades."

It was why I meant to see him climb the Tower, even now. I could trust my father with the Dread Empire, to curb its worst instincts and tangle it so deeply into the bonds of peace with Callow that it would not be able to free itself of them without breaking. Neither Malicia nor Sepulchral were acceptable alternatives. The trouble was that I was not so sure the man in question wanted to claim the Tower. Maybe at the Salian Peace he had, but it'd been over a year since. And the way he'd left...

The conversation strayed to lighter subjects after that and eventually we sent the kids to bed. That left only us, as it was meant to be, and a second round of bottles was opened. I clenched, suddenly, when I felt Robber's absence like a gut punch. How many ghosts were out there, just beyond the light of our fire? Nauk. Ratface. Hune. I pulled at aragh to chase the thought away and had succeeded in claiming a pleasant degree of inebriation when I caught sight of one of the phalanges approaching Hakram to whisper in his ear. Seeing he had my attention, he gestured for us to move away from the fire and dragged in Vivienne as well. Once we were slightly away from the others, he wasted no time.

"Word from Scribe and the Jacks," Adjutant said. "Armies are moving towards us."

My eyes narrowed. He wouldn't be meaning the forces under Marshal Nim, which had already been headed our way for some time.

"Sepulchral?" Vivienne asked.

He nodded.

"But more," Hakram said. "The deserters as well. They've decamped from the Green Stretched and they're in close pursuit behind the loyalists and the rebels."

Well, it looked like I was overdue a talk with General Sacker. Half the point of becoming her patron was being warned of things like this in advance. I breathed out, trying to parse it out in my mind's eye. The armies of the empresses would reach us weeks before the deserters were in sight, if not months, but they wouldn't have begun to march without a reason. They wanted a piece of this too, in some way or another.

"Northeast of Askum, northwest of Ater," I finally said. "That looks to be our battlefield."

Deep in the Wasteland, which was bloody campaigning grounds for all involved. I wasn't looking forward to that.

"Agreed," Adjutant said. "And it means I can no longer delay my departure. Come morning, we must speak with the envoys and I will leave with them come noon."

I grimaced. I wanted to refuse. I'd just come back and already he was leaving, but I knew it was not a sensible answer. There could be no replacement for Hakram, no one who would mean what he did to his people or who would know my mind as well.

"Tomorrow," I reluctantly agreed.

He must have caught my displeasure, for he squeezed my arm comfortingly with his skeletal hand.

"We still have tonight," Hakram said. "Let's not spoil it yet."

I silently nodded, and after a moment he moved away. Vivienne lingered. I looked up at the night sky, the stars spread out as far as the eye could see and the moon glaring down as a pale eye. At least these days I did not feel irrational hatred at the sight of it.

"Beautiful night," Vivienne quietly said, looking up as well. "Moon's almost full."

"It is," I murmured. "It'll turn soon."

Tonight or tomorrow, but no later.

—

Well past Midnight Bell we began winding down, the drink and heavy meal taking their toll.

Usually we would have slept there, and some of us had fallen asleep, but we were outside the camp and in enemy territory still. Wards or not, it would be a risk. So instead everyone was roused and we began making our way back to the palisades, Hakram carrying a half-asleep Vivienne on his back to Indrani's vocal amusement. I hung back with Masego to make sure nothing had been left behind, and after he took down the wards I torched the entire hilltop with blackflame. We were mere miles away from Wolof, the beating heart of sorcery in Praes, so I wasn't going to be taking risks. I was mostly sober by now, having tapered off drinking near the end, so I did not feel vulnerable enough to rush back. I'd intended to walk back with Zeze after he took his last look, but when he did I found that someone else had stayed behind. Atop the burned hill, a golden-eyed shade was standing among the ash. My heart clenched.

Tonight, then. I'd almost hoped it would be tomorrow.

"You go on ahead," I told Masego.

He frowned at me.

"Are you certain?" he asked.

He could see her as well, of course. But it wasn't Masego's way to meddle in what he saw as the personal affairs of his friends. I breathed out.

"I am," I told him.

And he did not ask again. Hesitantly he brushed a hand against my arm and I smiled at him. Nodding and wishing me a good night, he began trodding back to camp. I murmured it back then turned to the hilltop. I limped my way back up through the ash, falling in at Akua's side as if it were the most natural thing in the world. The two of us stood there for a moment, looking up at the night sky. She was the one to break the silence.

"There is a place I would like to show you," she said. "Not far from here."

"Cityside or waterside?" I asked.

"Closer to Sinka," she said, and her eyes asked the question again.

I nodded. It had, I thought, the weight of the inevitable to it. We made our way through the darkness, sure-footed on small and winding paths. It was beautiful, out here. The sight of the orchards touched by moonlight, dappling the ground, the lights of Wolof in the distance as we went downhill towards the Wasaliti. There was little wind but the night was cool, and the thin breeze was enough to lazily stir leaves. We'd not broken the silence as we moved, her leading and I following, but as we crossed a cove of palm trees she began to talk.

"I did not find it myself," Akua said. "It was shown to me, when I was a girl of thirteen."

"Who by?" I asked.

She laughed, the amusement lighting up golden eyes as I caught a flash of pearly teeth.

"Some boy who thought he might become my consort," she said. "Alas, his hopes were greater than his charms."

"And I bet you were just the sweetest girl," I drily replied.

"I was not so terrible, back then," she smiled. "Not so artless as to be taken in, yet hardly the sharpest of irons."

She would have spoken the last part of that sentence with a touch of reverence, once. No longer. It was, if anything, disdain. But then Akua Sahelian was, in her own way, one of the finest liars I had ever seen. She had made a game out of charming my inner circle, and largely succeeded even when some of them had spent years despising her. As Aisha had once warned me, that was the famous peril of the Sahelians: they were so charming and so useful that even the cleverest let them in. And then they turned on you. So how much of it was Akua's truly held beliefs and how much of it the face she wore when around us? There was, in the end, only one way to tell.

The crucible. Trial by fire.

"I barely remember what I was like at thirteen," I admitted. "Feels like a world away."

"Much like you were at seventeen, I imagine," Akua mused. "Swagger covering vigilance, looking every gift horse in the mouth twice. And, in your own way, dangerously insightful."

I coughed to hide my embarrassment. That was the closest she'd come to giving me a genuine compliment – one not wrapped in anything else, honest praise – perhaps since we had first met.

"And terribly easy to embarrass, of course," she teased.

"I wouldn't have been that easy to fluster," I snorted. "For one, unlike you I was the one taking the boys to dark corners."

Girls, too, but not as many. I'd tended towards boys when I'd been younger.

"And yet I'm told the redheaded mage you took as a lover had to be the one to seduce you," Akua said.

I'd noticed that she usually avoided using Killian's name. Or talking about her at all, really. Not that it was hard, considering most of my closest friends tended to avoid the subject. Even Juniper, who was not known for shyness or tact, had not hazarded to venture an opinion on that whole debacle.

"It's different when it's someone under your authority," I replied. "I thought there was something there, but I didn't want to..."

"Overstep?" Akua suggested.

I hummed, not disagreeing. In a way. From the moment I'd held command of the Fifteenth I had been both a villain and the apprentice of the Black Knight, both positions that in many ways made me untouchable. It would have been the easiest thing in the world to abuse my position if I cared to, and arguably I had. I'd been very much against Legion regulations to sleep with my own Senior Mage, for one, but rules applied to Named in Praes more or less only when people higher up the ladder said they did. And in my case, Black had been more supportive than anything.

"I'm also not great at taking hints sometimes," I admitted.

"Truly?" Akua said, tone drier than a desert.

I rolled my eye at her. We swerved to the north well before reaching the shore, to my surprise, still we into the cultivate parts of Wolof's surroundings. The side of the hill where she led me, though, was cracked. Old scorch marks still blackened the stone, from some ancient battle, and she guided me through the broken grounds until we reached a tall flat stone covered with moss. Akua passed a hand against it affectionately.

"You'll have to help me move it," she said.

Interest piqued, I put my back into it and we toppled the stone to the side. It revealed a narrow, uneven passage going deeper into the hill. Akua glanced up at the sky, as if checking on the height of the moon, and nodded.

"Now is the best time," she said. "Come."

It was uncomfortable squeezing through the passage and the stone tore at my clothes some, but aside from the burn of my bad leg there was little to hinder me. To my relief the passage led to some sort of broader room, pitch dark – not that the darkness was trouble for me, blessed by the Sisters as I was. Here I could stand to my full height, and Akua almost, but it was still small. She showed a low fold in the stone to our left, though, and after crawling for a foot or so I followed her into a small cavern. I stopped almost immediately after rising, stunned.

It was not a large cavern, perhaps twenty feet wide, and most of the ground was covered by water. The sides had been scarred by spells, like the outside, but here the heat of the spell used has turned entire swaths of stone into something like smooth glass. And what brought it all together was the long opening in the ceiling that looked up straight at the night sky: the moon and stars were reflected perfectly on the water and the walls, as if we had crawled through the earth only to somehow stumble onto a slice of firmament. Akua leaned against wall, water lapping at the stone not far from her feet, and offered me a gentle smile.

She did not say anything, or need to.

I came to stand at her side, enjoying the coolness of the stone. There was no warmth from her, either, though we were almost close enough to touch. She was yet a shade, and a shadow had no warmth to share. We stood there for a long moment, silent and unmoving, as the stars and moon ghosted on stone and water. Eventually I felt her moving closer to me, and said nothing. My stomach tightened.

"Until tonight," Akua quietly said, "I was the only person in all of Creation to know of this place."

I did not ask what had happened to the boy. It was Praes. I knew well what had happened to the boy who had once wanted to be consort to a Sahelian. And I knew, too, what it meant that she had brought me here. Shared a wonder and a secret with me, asking for nothing. But, perhaps, hoping. We had toed the line closer and closer, as the years passed, but the line had always been there. Tonight she had not even touched me, and still somehow it felt as if it had been crossed. I turned enough to look at her but not to invite more. She'd always been gorgeous. I'd thought as much from the first time I'd glimpsed her in that tent.

Often, though, she made a spectacle of it. Magnificent dresses and jewelry, seductive smiles and teasing words. Right now, though, I found not a trace of it on her face. I could barely even make out what she wore, save that it was a dress, and there was nothing seductive about the look on her face. It was, I thought, longing and perhaps something like hunger. There was nothing veiled about it, and the nakedness of that realization had my stomach clench with desire and something else. I did not move, either closer or further away. A moment passed, heavy, and my arm tensed as she slowly began to lean closer – eyes on mine, asking. And I answered the question by turning away, looking down at that field of stars she had stared with me. I did not see her expression. Did not let myself see it, else I hesitate.

I must carry it out to the end, even if it stung. Especially if it stung.

"Even now?" Akua quietly asked, voice ailing.

"Even now," I got out.

"I had thought it would be different," she whispered. "There is... I chose you over my family, Catherine. My home. Everything I've loved since I was a girl, save for my father – and even his death I set aside, refusing vengeance on your own for it."

"I know," I said, wretchedly.

But her folly had been the death of Liesse. One hundred thousand lives, every single one of them in my care. My care. Even if the Gods Above and Below had demanded of me forgiveness of Akua's folly, it would have been the same answer. I was who I was, and in the end that was a creature of long prices.

"It's not something you can win," I murmured. "That's not how this works."

Because that was the last thing that needed to be stripped away from her so she could truly enter the crucible: the thought that if she was kind, if she was good, if she fought for the cause the two of us might have a future together. It tasted like ash in my mouth to rip that out of the unspoken between us, but it must be done. The silence stretched out.

"There is no end to it, is there?" Akua finally said. "The shadow cast by that day. No sun that will chase it out."

I smiled mirthlessly.

"We all live in it still," I replied.

And always would. I still avoided looking at her, oddly ashamed, and so it was in utter surprise that I felt soft, cool lips press against the corner of my mouth.

"So we do," she said, moving away.

Her golden eyes shone. Could a shade cry? I did not know.

"I would like you to leave, please," Akua Sahelian said.

I didn't argue. All I could wonder was if this was the way Hanno had felt, back in the day, when he flipped his coin and it spun in the air. Before it had landed.

—

By morning she had not come back, as I had known she would not.

Droughtbringer

Go vote!

. . .

Or boost? It's different now, and I'm a bit confused. But do the thing!

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Stay safe, enjoy your chapter.

Liliet

Hey!!!

Droughtbringer

Hey!!!

David

Probably my favorite chapter of this new book. Wonderful job, and please please please publish this at some point. I'd fill my walls with the series if I could.

ruduen

Something like this isn't a surprise. Just an inevitable conclusion.

And yet, I still wonder if this is a betrayal in a way. And if it is... Who is the betrayer, and who is the betrayed?

Liliet

It's not a betrayal if you were never loyal, in much the way Cat can't be betrayed by idk the ratlings.

Akua knew the score, she just hoped.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's both. They had a very real closeness, becoming something more, and it will never be the same. Both of them just broke each others hearts. It was as nasty as it was because even if Cat knew it was going to end this way, it was equally real leading up to here. Whatever comes of them, it won't ever be quite like this again. And both of them really liked this. Which was the point. Cat gave Akua love so she'd be someone able to love, but also to make her understand how she was unlovable. Akua became somebody she could love, but must refuse to. If she'd just tried to stab her or whatever, this would have been easier for this. But her greatest enemy just showed beyond doubt that she wants to be the opposite, and so forced her to gut herself just as deeply, since it's the only way to truly let her have her story truly reach conclusion.

Because Akua truly understands now that there is no redemption for what she has done, at least in the eyes of the most important to her. She knows that she and Cat could be something glorious. She knows she could make her happy, and vice versa. And now she knows, firmly, none of that changes that it's never going to happen. That the one thing she's wanted in forever that is pure, for the right reasons, free of any evil or Evil tainting it, is just not not obtainable. Worse, she knows it's not about trust, Cat knows that she means it, that this isn't about suspicion, that there's nothing more she can do to make Cat understand because Cat does and it doesn't matter.

So now, she has to figure out if there's still any reasons she wants to be good at all, since one of her primary motivators is ash now. She'll at least entertain a few alternatives here: Get her body back probably, because the trap isn't something in the body, it's the OPTIONS. Then she can go for the Tower herself.

She could destroy things the woman who just devastated her cares about in revenge. At her darkest she could even make herself a rival all over again, now the story of the jilted lover maddened in pain and grief, which she knows would result in her final end but it'd be one in which she'd MATTER to Cat, in a hate that'd somewhat mirror love. And not a one of these options wouldn't be thrown away for the world with no shadow where Cat could say yes, but she might conclude they are all she has left. And that will kick Cat in the gut because she elevated her and has now sent her plummeting right back down.

Then again, she might decide that she does want to be this better person, no matter how much it hurts. And that'd actually hurt Cat all the more, because if Akua decides to come back in the end then she'll truly have left that other path, but it still can't matter.

This is Akua's ultimate pivot, and she's gone because this is a decision she has to make all alone in the end. But no matter what she chooses, when she comes back, any decision Akua has made will be one betrayal.

therealgridlock

We the reader all know what's going to happen, we just don't know how or when.

She's going to betray Cat, and when the world, and the story, need her most, she's gonna swing in at the last moment and save the day.

I don't know whether it'll be self sacrifice, or if it'll just be a selfless act to show how hard she's been working to actually be good, but I do know it will be glorious when it happens.

It might not even be in this book but I know she's going to come back, because nobody can actually experience character growth and then throw it all away without some bigger plan in motion.

It might be a darth Vader, but it'll still be cool.

Dow Gray

Personally, I'm wondering whether there's any world where Akua turns to Contrition, perhaps thinking they'd give her a way to atone? No doubt things would get ugly if so, but perhaps there are some narrative callback to when they first met, and the Lone Swordsman's story.

And I guess Contrition's deal would involve eventually accepting she could never be loved, rather than allowing for forgiveness, at the end.

Insanenoodlyguy

By it's very nature you don't go to contrition if you think you can atone.

Stephen Marsh

I saw it that way as well.

Though I keep wondering what will Cat's name be and will this affect that.

RoflCat

The sad part is...they couldn't have become this close without being who they were...

Without Akua's threats and catastrophes, Catherine would've... simply not really cared about her that much. The Callowan long price of turning Akua into 'human' and then denying her love at the end would never have been planned if Akua never started this path.

Liliet

This is why Catkua is best ship

Miles

"The price will be long and it will be paid thrice."

I think we're on #2 now?

SpeckofStardust

Cant betray if she's not working for her anymore folks you'll wrong now.

Anomandris

Can't she act as a tentative conduit to night, having worked the Goddesses' magic a lot?

agumentic

Nah, that was through her connection to Cat that was cut back at the end of Book 6.

Insanenoodlyguy

She'll be back in a flesh and blood body with magic. I think Akua is experiencing her ultimate life-defining pivot right now, but no matter which way she goes with that, I think she's going to get her body back when we find out what path she takes.

I'm fairly convinced she's going to be Dread Empress or Chancellor now.

Insanenoodlyguy

Amending this after seeing Tak's comment below, definitely Empress. The Girl who Climbed the Tower was about Akua all along.

therealgridlock

I suspect it'll be a Darth Vader, that she "betrays" Cat and the rest, leaves to go on a personal quest (remember, whenever the heroic party is having problems, just split up for a while, they'll be fixed when you next see each other) and becomes chancellor.

After that... It's just waiting around to betray an Empress for Cat, either Malicia or Sepulchral.

She might become Empress, that would make sense, dread empress repentant, or benevolent, or something, but the betrayal will ultimately be of her old life, her old ways of thinking, of her old moral code.

She's come to the realization that since nothing can make up for her actions, she has to take responsibility for them, and since she still gets something out of doing good (dopamine lol), she can do good without expecting anything in return. Get is the wrong word. For herself, not for others.

That's what her character arc has been. Redemption, with extra steps, and without the redemption.

Cayle

Warlock

Mental Mouse

Left at this altar... she might well seek apotheosis, becoming a lesser goddess in her own right.

SpaceDorf

Undead / Resurrected can't be Rulers under Praesi Law.

Same reason Cat can't be Dread Empress

Insanenoodlyguy

Later chapters clearly prove this is not an issue, at least for her.

MatrixM

What the fuck?? Why would you comment about later chapters here??

Insanenoodlyguy

Dude. several years later is a bit much to not expect spoilers if your going to necro comment Threads.

Insanenoodlyguy

Months^

matrixm

1

How about new readers who read the comments after the chapter? I did that. A lot.

2. I've held off resuming this story for months because I wanted to wait til it was done and my exams were over. And I get an email with this comment in it.

So...yeah. the fuck? Don't do that.

morroian

There are new readers like me who like reading the comments, and its mostly been safe because most people are respectful of that.

Konstantin von Karstein

Not if Sve noc doesn't want it.

TeK

Can't betray someone if you already did.

Tenthyr

And there is the softest betrayal.

Anomandris

Finally an itch scratched after so many years – Assassin.... And it would make a brilliant asset the way it worked. The whole point about people thinking you are dead is kinda tbe best assassination tool available.

Also, Redemption is a funny thing, isn't it? Even Forgiveness. It belongs in the pantheon of concepts so remarkably qualitative, they embody the name. It could be denied to a killer of one who has saved millions, or granted to someone the other way around.

It was always going to the short end of stick that Akua got. Even if Cat and hell, Vivienne and all the other woe end up being ok with Akua, you are always going to have Callowans calling for her...well, not head, but demise?!? Which would really hurt Vivienne trying to rule.

On a practical basis, does this diminish the Army's capabilities significantly? Not in the manner of intelligence, Scribe can fill in there. But Akua was the best Mage in the army would could work Night – Masego can't. Given that Night has often been Cat's ace, it is gonna wrangle a lot.

Liliet

Oh, Akua's not gettting denied it. She just has to walk the rest of the way on her own.

Lord Haart

Maybe. It's also possible that there really is no "redemption" for that kind of crime. Like losing a limb, it's gone forever, all you can do is make the best of what's left. Not redemption then, but perhaps... Acceptance.

Liliet

To me, redemption just means... change. To no longer be the person who would do that.

It doesn't mean "making up for it" – there is, indeed, no fixing it. It doesn't mean being forgiven. It just means becoming someone who would not do that again.

Mental Mouse

In that sense, she's already been redeemed. But her reparation would take a dozen lifetimes or more to achieve (a Long Price indeed!), and her rehabilitation... well, that may simply be impossible for the Doom of Liesse.

Maybe the Last Titan has some spare room in his cave...

Liliet

Yea, now she just has to figure out that it means she really doesnt want to stick with Praesi Classic even if Cat has romantically rejected her.

Cheet4h

> But Akua was the best Mage in the army would could work Night – Masego can't.

IIRC in one of the Arsenal chapters Cat explored this with Masego, and he's able to Wrest Night from her to work with it. Remember that Masego also used Night during Cat's showdown with Bard to hide his presence.

sengachi

I can't believe the ending blew out of my mind the incredible revelation that Scribe had indirectly been Assassin this whole time.

therealgridlock

I kinda called it, or suspected it, a long time ago, you can't see either of their faces.

When someone's faceless as a feature and not a bug, it's a big sign.

Rynjin

Considering it's been one of the most popular running theories since about the middle of book 2, it can't be THAT surprising. =P

beleester

It was a favorite theory – Assassin always acted at Scribe's command, and it seemed very fitting for the way the Calamities operated – but there was also some fairly convincing evidence against it. Scribe and Assassin were often in different places at the same time, and Amadeus describes Assassin's personality and backstory as if he's a separate person, even in his internal monologue.

I wonder if Inscribe requires Scribe to come up with a convincing backstory as part of the process – creating a "paper trail" for the person she's creating.

Mental Mouse

The fan theory was that Assassin was Scribe herself... as so often, we just didn't think weird enough!

Bad@games

Right? People keep talking about Ubua, but im more interested in Scribe and Assassin

Konstantin von Karstein

Akua can't work Night anymore, her connection to Cat was cut off by Cat at the end of last book.

Xinci

I mean in this case it seems more as a being measured against a long ruler of how much of a threat you are before you can be pulled into the fold. Redemption overall seems to be that sorta thing, a marker used by a person or society against those who have transgressed. The long price in of itself seems to be a very aggressive method of cost prohibitive aversion for future conflict for Callowans(a logical thing to come up given how often they dealt with foreign aggression). Cats mostly just made it clear, that as far as they are concerned there is nothing she can do to gain that level of trust(which is kind of a lie as this whole scheme of manipulation seems to have been to do that more or less).

Liliet

It's not about trust at this point, it's pure punitive justice.

sengachi

Not necessarily. Cat said consistently throughout this chapter that she didn't know if Akua would still be on their side after rejecting her, and for that matter she's still not sure exactly what Akua is doing now.

And that's kind of a problem. If this mass murderer of epic proportions is doing good things now because it earns her a place, friends, romance, and a position of trusted power ... is that really a person you can trust? Or love?

If you can trust someone like that to be good only so long as you're able to keep giving them those things (and say, never break up with them for personal reasons) ... that's not actually them being a good person who deserves those things.

Cat successfully taught Akua that being decent to others and cooperating with them leads to a happier and more fulfilling life than being the last one standing atop a mound of enemies' corpses. And Akua wanted that.

Doesn't mean (and this chapter's ending leaves this very much up in the air) she actually became a person who deserved it.

Liliet

Catherine has trust issues the size of a mountain, and they usually appear in the shape of the following sequence:

1. Commit irreversibly to a course of action requiring absolute trust / leap of faith.
2. Start talking about how you really, really just don't know if it'll work out.

Prominent examples:

- giving Winter to the Sisters in Everdark;
- hiring Scribe on the logic that Black isn't an enemy either way;
- telling Akua the outline of the ransom plan in the previous two chapters.

Just because Catherine says she doesn't know what Akua will choose, doesn't mean she doesn't in practice trust that Akua will choose the right thing. Cat's just anxious like that.

sengachi

In this case I'd say the anxiety is warranted. Even if she was 99.9% sure Akua would continue to be good even if they had a messy breakup or something, that is way too high of a chance she's wrong when it comes to mass murder on this scale.

Liliet

Eh, Akua no longer has incentives for mass murder specifically. The stakes aren't quite THAT high.

Cicero

I always had this sneaky suspicion that Scribe was Assassin somehow, but I couldn't figure out how to make it fit...

Juff

Typo Thread:

I'd been a given > it'd been a given was as once > was at once from rank and file > from the rank and file it was even more > it'd been even more scheming it would be > scheming it was small glimpsed > small glimpses
Marshal Nim survived (should this be "did not survive") to us the > to use the (occurs twice)
I was destroyed > it was destroyed a refine version > a refined version
I had kill > I had killed sleeve dealing > sleeve when dealing enthused as > enthused at

Askum > Aksum (occurs twice) to her the > to her, the opened the drink > opened and the drink the ended > they ended him I ways > him in ways usually I instead > usually did, I instead over a year (hasn't it been over two?)
Green Stretched > Green Stretches your certain > you certain I'd been very much > It'd been very much still we into the cultivate parts > still well into the cultivated parts long princes > long prices

edrey

They say the third step is the cruelest,

Walk when the moon is at her clearest:

Love ends with the kiss of the knife,

Trust is the wager that takes your life

this is just great, i cant wait for the end of the song/story.
as side note, if Scribe is the assassine, she really is the counterpart with Thief, woe- calamity, and black said assassin learned from others-and had a graduation ceremony- then Eudokia is one of the most OP characters i have read.

TeK

Oh shit, I never connected the dots, but is it about Aqua? Like

The first step is hardest, they said to her.

You will have to walk through fire.

It will burn away what you once were,

And always devour whole a liar

(Her defeat at Liesse, perhaps?)

The second is the longest, they said.

You will walk under the restless dead.

The hanged all crooning from the gallows

To join them and rest in the shadows.

(A reference about being a shade? And her entire redemption ark up to this point, really)

They say the third step is the cruelest,

Walk when the moon is at her clearest:

Love ends with the kiss of the knife,

Trust is the wager that takes your life

(Basically this, yes)

The last is strangest, she said to them
The easiest and the most solemn
For when the tower is yours to claim
You will have forgotten why you came

(She wanted to claim the Tower when she was young, but when it was offered to her, she took it for different reasons?)

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm convinced more than ever that this is the case. We've repeatedly been told during this book that Amedeus is a bad fit for the tower, and doesn't really want the tower to boot. Akua wants it even less these days, but you know she'd be damn good at it. And so her long price is being given everything she'd ever thought she wanted once she was made to understand why it was so inadequate to her true desires.

Natalie

"and wasn't that just praes in a sentence? Everything you want, just not the way you wanted it"

Insanenoodlyguy

I knew that Scribe and Assain were linked! She was the actual 5th of the Calamities all along!

Vortex

Gosh, this story is so damn good sometimes. Akua made a lot of sacrifices for Catherine in the past few books, but for small slights, long prices.

Catherine is perfectly willing to snuff out something honest and true, something she really wants herself, something rare and precious, to let Akua feel the weight of her actions.

It's so damn Callowan of her.

nimelennar

Huh. I really didn't think the fan theory that Scribe was Assassin had any basis, but it turns out that's pretty much exactly the case.

TeK

That's the thing with fan theories: throw enough on the wall and something sticks.

Lord Haart

I didn't see any theories that Assassin was more of a Golem/construct, just ones that had Scribe being a split personality. So while this is a bit similar it still caught me off guard a little.

Fantastic writing this book. On par with some of the best published writing I've read.

Deworld

It always, since the very first prologue, seemed like Scribe is much closer to other Calamities than Assassin, and that she was the true fifth member. On the other hand, we got almost no info on Assassin. Unclear positions on both of them made it pretty obvious that they were connected somehow.

sadfan

I don't understand why Catherine's arc can't lead her to accept that 100k Callawan mooks were overrated and Akua is the best.

TeK

True, who would even care about an opinion of some mudfoot peasants, when you can get most gorgeous girl ever?

Shveiran

Few.

Which is, incidentally, why Catherine's armies are loyal to her.

It's not that she wins. It is that she gives a damn.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Is this sarcasm, or have you forgotten that Cat is, herself, a mudfoot peasant?

Liliet

Sounds like sarcasm to me.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

They weren't mooks in universe, they were people as legitimate and real as Catherine herself. Cat's whole deal is that she cares immensely about those whom more traditional Named of all factions are accustomed to writing off as collateral damage. She sacrifices others when she must, but sacrifices herself or parts thereof in defense of others whenever possible. The part of her that could love Akua is sacrificed here in defense of the memory of those innocents lost in the Doom of Liesse.

308924810a

Huh, Eudokia wasn't the sixth ranger in the group of five of the Calamities, she was a central member all along, and Assassin never existed/was actually one of Eudokia's Aspects.

mamm0nn

Yes, who could've thought that the faceless woman working from the shadows was in any way related to the many-faced man working from the shadows?

vernal.ancient

... now I want to see a character ask that in universe, completely sincerely, and then realize what they just said and facepalm

Isaac Martinez

Cat can't forgive Akua for the same reason that she can't forgive herself. This crucible is for both. Liesse was her charge, and she failed to protect it, and Akua was one of the reasons why it happened. Cat has made many mistakes that are haunting her, and there is no end to them.

And as Akua, as long as she lives the shadows will haunt them forever.

Lord Haart

Yes, well put. This is as much a crucible for Cat in some ways – while not ultimately responsible for Liesse II the way Akua is, she has still killed many for personal power (notably by letting Will go to start a pattern of three) and I'm sure that on some level she wants there to be hope for Akua to find a way back in her own because then maybe Cat can do the same. It's probably the Liesse Accords if at all, but who knows if those will actually become reality.

naturalnuke

Ominous music builds as Akua realizes the truth.

There is no Happy End for her.

RoflCat

For Them*

Catherine herself isn't expecting to find happily ever after at the end of this either.

P Jay

Typo thread

"I was who I was, and in the end that was a creature of long princes."

"Princes" should be "prices."

Awesome chapter EE! Can't wait to see where this goes

Shveiran

According to the Kingfisher Prince, Cat is a creature of long princes too.

Evgeny Permyakov

> Cat is a creature of long princes too.

pause

Could you please unpack this?

Shveiran

I could, but you will be better served by me pointing you toward Doctor Garrus' seminar regarding reach and flexibility.

Daniel E

This conversation has me in tears from laughing, thank you. Gods but Mass Effect was amazing. Well, the first 2 anyways. Then they tried to cram the entire universe into a trilogy, leaving the third as so much hot garbage. But I digress.

ninegardens

... At the risk of being completely dense, I did not see this coming. I just assumed that all the Catkua shipping was pure crackfic.

Like... it never really jived for me reading it. Like... there an excellent pair, but then again so is Hakram and Vivi (No, shippers, piss off, I am not going there).

It almost feels like...

Like Akua and Cat are close, and because Akua hasn't BEEN close before, she assumes it must be Romance? I dunno. Probably is just me being dense, but mostly all of that just felt weird.

Also... why is it that Cat seems to have prior knowledge of what's about to happen. I get that she has story instincts, but normally... normally we as the audience get to see a bit more behind the veil as to WHY she story intuits particular things. Here its a bit... "I'm going to be betrayed. Because Reasons"

Burlyraven

You're not alone. Akua has always felt like nothing more than a plot device with some actual personality, if that makes sense. I don't see her as a potential romantic option for Cat, or feel any real tension between her and Cat beyond Liesse. That's not to say I didn't like Akua in her own way, and she has had some character development, but the only times I've ever even thought about Cat and Akua ending up together are when the story directly states I'm supposed to think about it.

ninegardens

Out of interest, which character gives you the "Realist" vibes? Which character feels most like a real, fully fleshed out person to you? (lets assume we exclude Cat herself for these exercise).

Burlyraven

Cordelia, Kingfisher, and Hanno are the three I find myself most able to imagine existing when they aren't in Cat's field of view. Of those three, Cordelia is the one I feel most confident in saying earned that status because of how well developed she is, and not because of any bias on my part.

Hanno and Kingfisher are cool characters, and as close to true heroes as this story allows, so I may be filling in the blanks with them, but I'm almost indifferent to Cordelia on a personal level and she's still easy to imagine going about her day to day.

ninegardens

Personally I rate Cordelia, Malicia and Tariq.

Like... Malicia is a big bad villian thing... but her victories and failures are such HUMAN victories and failures.

Hanno I can see. Less convinced by Kingfisher- he's a treasure, don't get me wrong, but doesn't feel as real as Cordy or the others mentioned here do.

Shveiran

Out of curiosity, did you read the extra chapters with his background? That's what did it for me.

In the main story, he's nice but admittedly a bit of a side character.

But his backstory combined with the chapters about the war in the north in book 5 build such a compelling picture. I was simply stunned.

ninegardens

Oh yeah, I read Kingfisher's side chapters. They were fabulous.

For me, they made him feel... badass? Compelling? Charismatic for sure. But they don't make him feel like a PERSON to me, they make him feel like a "Hero". A fairytale character.

And there is nothing wrong with that. This is a story. Kingfisher is great. Just a different kind of great compared to the others.

Brian Cong

This may be an unpopular opinion and something I get criticized for, but I think most, if not all, of the characters in the guide are actually quite realistic, at least in terms of depth. With regards to fanaticism I'd say perhaps a little less so, and people aren't generally this dramatic IRL, but if you think critically about the question: how deep are people that you typically encounter in life? The nuance, development, and level of character that you see in the people in real life isn't so far from what you see in the Guide; people range from extremely complex and nuanced to very simplistic and straightforward, the whole gamut exists, with a great many people I've met being the latter, though plenty of the former exist as well. In that regard, while I'd say that, perhaps, on average, the characters in the Guide have less depth than the average person, that's more due to screen time and lack of ability to display that depth, rather than inherent lack of characterization, and not by a massive margin either.

TeK

It's not really about romance. I think. It's about acceptance. It's all really jumbled up. At part yes, Aqua is probably longing for that connection that usually come with romance, but what I think she really wants is forgiveness unconditional, like the one we may sometimes give to our loved ones. There is nothing sexual about it, nor romantical. It is, as you say, a desire for closeness, and closure.

And Catherine can't give it to her, because she needs Aqua to truly regret Liesse, and she can't do that, unless the consequences of it stay between Aqua and the one thing she desires the most. It's fitting, really. Aqua never truly shown remorse for what she did, so the crutch had to be used. I hope she takes the right lessons out.

ninegardens

In that case... it almost feels like Akua should have gone for a Hug, rather than a kiss.

I mean, whatever- I ain't the author, I don't know the internal states, all that jazz.

But like... the kind of connection you are describing of wanting unconditional forgiveness... wanting support and warmth... to me that's way more associated with a Hug, or crying on someone's shoulder, or... all those other things. That... that would have been a very different scene. Akua crying because she saw a real damn body that could have been hers and... Cat just refusing to provide support. Not saying better, just different.

This scene was... heavy romance. A secluded nook. lots of talk of past lovers. "It was, I thought, longing and perhaps something like hunger" – it was all sorts of romantic, and some sexual tension.

I can kind of believe the argument that Akua was confused chasing after romantic love, when she actually needed... probably something closer to parental love. Protector type love. I get that those often come together in same package, but here her actions are really leaning on the romantic half of that package and it feels... weird.

Liliet

Akua has been showing signs of a bad crush on Cat since Book 3's "you will never like me but you will learn to love me" yandere enslavement attempt.

Cat's emotions wrt Akua have been a rollercoaster since the start of book 5.

They DO have romantic tension (WoE if nothing else), the trick is that it's not the part that matters. Romance just happens to be the specific thing Akua wants that Cat believes she must deny her even though it hurts herself too.

argumentic

> Cat's emotions wrt Akua have been a rollercoaster since the start of book 5.

More like since Everdark, if not Keter. Though it grew as time went on.

Liliet

Tru

Liliet

I mean, WoE is that the romantic tension is real.

TeK

Where did he say that btw?

Liliet

> ! Chaos Kal-tron:
> Is Catkua canon?
> EE:
> depends on what you mean by Catkua > but if you mean romantic tension sure. I didn't think that was subtext so much as text

AMA 2021

BIDZ180

It's not about Akua regretting Liesse. The whole point is that no matter how much Akua regrets it, no matter how much she wishes she didn't do it, and no matter how much good she does to atone for it, it's done. 100,000 people are dead at her hand, and nothing can undo that. Remorse doesn't enter the equation.

BlackPhoenix7777

I'm really not sure how to feel right now. I mean, I saw it coming long ago, but it still feels like a punch in the guts. Well written, Erra.

I've been shiping these two since Book 1 and still never though I'd see the day I'd feel bad for Akua and angry with Cat.

Insanenoodlyguy

If it makes you feel better, Cat was hurt nearly as much by this. She knows Akua meant it, and more importantly, that they really would be good for each other. She just took the best chance at true love and happiness she's ever had, and... wait for it... SET IT ON FIRE.

BlackPhoenix7777

True. At this point I'm almost as sick of Cat's tendency to hurt herself, often for no good reason, as of her stupid "small slights, long prices" philosophy.

Daniel E

In fairness here, wiping out a measurable percentage of the Kingdom's population is hardly a small sleight.

BlackPhoenix7777

That I agree with, my problem is the philosophy itself. Can you imagine Cat being fine with being on it's receiving end? When a certain heroine took her revenge against her rapist, Cat's reaction was to execute her because it was politically convenient.

My problem is A) the logical endpoint of "long prices" is ruin for everyone involved and B) the staggering amount of hypocrisy Cat exhibits in this issue (and others) that no one calls her out on. She's just as much a monster as most other villains if not more so, (excluding DK and WB) and probably has a lot more blood on her hands than Akua at this point. Her father probably trumps both of them.

Make no mistake, I love Cat, vicious little monster that she is, but that doesn't mean she gets a pass.

Liliet

Honestly, Cat doesn't actually stick with this philosophy for things she DOESN'T feel also personally guilty for.

Shveiran

Honestly, Cat doesn't actually stick with this philosophy at all.

This is not about masochism, and it isn't about punishment or long prices.

It's about believing that nothing you do can erase the past; which is NOT the same as saying there is no point in doing better for the future.

Combine that with the belief that the person you love most in the world should probably not be guilty of a genocide of your own people – which is something Catherine also believes – and you have why she is willing to care and be a friend to Akua but not her lover.

After all, this would not be a fling.

No one ever understood Akua the way Catherine does, and possibly only Hakram may claim to understand Cat better than Ubua.

But whatever ELSE Akua becomes, she will always ALSO be Doom of Liesse.

And Catherine cannot bear to love that.

Liliet

This tbh.

Catherine and Akua's relationship is very, very close and intimate already. They understand each other better than anyone else, see every part of each other and love each other with all the parts.

If Catherine were to accept this as a romantic relationship, they might as well get married at that point.

And so, there's a line that Catherine keeps drawing.

Mental Mouse

> When a certain heroine took her revenge against her rapist, Cat's reaction was to execute her because it was politically convenient.

Sigh. People keep getting this wrong. It wasn't that executing her was politically convenient, it was that not doing so would have been politically ruinous, destroying a great deal of what Cat had spent years to build up, and indeed compromising the greater war. And it didn't help that Red Axe was sticking to her suicide-mission Story, much less that Hanno had a bad episode of craniorectal inversion.

Longprices

I don't understand why people are angry or sad that Cat won't be with Akua, of course she's not gonna be with the person who destroyed one of her cities, murdered a good chunk of her population, caused a battle that lost even more Callowan lives, fucked her over at every single turn, and let's not forget about the time she wanted to torch an orphanage. This ship is really messed up on so many levels, it's literally "what if Adolf Hitler was a hot and charming girl".

agumentic

Because they are good together, and would be good for each other in that impossible timeline where Akua didn't kill an entire city in addition to all her other stuff. That's the whole tragedy of the situation, despite them both having feelings for each other and knowing their relationship could have been so good and sweet, they can never reach it, because Akua's actions killed it before she even could understand what exactly was she killing.

Lord Haart

Pretty sure the tragedy is the 100,000 dead, not some hurt feelings.

Don't confuse this being hard for Cat with this not being the plan since Liesse II, find a way to make Akua HURT for this in a way that doesn't just justify "iron sharpens iron" and all her other backwards philosophies.

agumentic

Well, you could have seen this coming from a mile away, even though I expected it to happen a bit later. That was always the point Catkua was going to reach. Now, let us see what the two will make of themselves after it.

Insanenoodlyguy

I don't know if it will be as an ally or bitter enemy, but I'm now convinced Akua will be crowned Dread empress, and The Girl who climbed the Tower was for her all along. .

Liliet

high five

Burlyraven

So knowledge on Assassin's true nature is awesome. That aspect of hers is basically a limited version of the Dead King's Revenants.

The fire made me a bit sad, though, with how many missing members there are now. At this rate, there may come a day when it's just Cat drinking alone, talking to ghosts.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Her and the Scorched Apostate, you mean. Since he's definitely coming back any day now. 😊

Linnus42

I am not sure I bet on Malicia not knowing how Assassin works considering she was far closer to Warlock then Scribe seems to think. Beyond that bittersweet like this is probably the best end you can get to Cat and Akua it was never going to actually work a lot of reasons. I do think there is a good chance that Akua ends up as Dream Empress actually. The number of viable options to take a shot at the role aint high, I really don't think Black wants the job anymore personally. Nor do I think he is the best to play with Nobles and not burn it down to a mess. Cat also doesnt really seem to want the job. So Akua is not really a bad option in some ways assuming the redemption arc is legit. Selling it to the gen populace is an issue but its not a saviour plot so I do like that.

Brax3n

I think it's actually a good bet Malicia doesn't know the truth about Assassin. Scribe has never trusted Malicia and Aspects are one thing that all Named know to keep close to their chest, even with allies. I think it would be very in character for Wekesa to have chided Scribe for being so secretive among friends, but keeping Malicia in the dark anyway because its poor form to share a secret like that.

Liliet

Yeah, same.

Crash

I'm sure she didn't. Post-Bard and Mom!Black Knight, there's enough to feasibly justify a jump of logic from wraith to Name-controlled.

Is it a large stretch? Yeah. But then again, it's Malicia so who the fuck knows what a stretch even is.

Crash

Whelp, autocorrect just turned Nim into Mom. Love typing stuff on mobile

Liliet

This isn't the end 😊

Sintonir

Huh, so I was right: Scribe is the Assassin. Actually around the same way I was thinking of: I was sure it was some Aspect which created her body doubles, and then she somehow changed them to look less like her.

Sugar Roll

This is the betrayal? I was expecting something more...bloody. Someone getting stabbed in the back or at least some dead bodies along the way. It's much tamer than what I thought would happen. I can't tell if it's genuine or an act on Akua's part. I'm skeptical but I'm looking forward to what happens next.

ArkhoneIX

Sometimes that things that truly hurt the most, are the ones that physically hurt us the least. I freely admit that I thought the betrayal would also be bloody, because this is in many ways a war story, but I love how the biggest betrayal here is the personal one. This will definitely be a catalyst for something, though for what we'll have to wait and see

308924810a

Also the romance scene with Catherine and Akua was... interesting.

308924810a

I still think Catherine's plan with Akua is going to be ruined by Catherine having too much trust in Black.

Liliet

From my observations of this story so far, it's pretty hard to have too much trust in Black. Unless you mean trust in his judgement and ability to make good plans.

mamm0nn

You fool! You didn't burn the camp side with blackfire thoroughly enough! And now I, Praesi mage supreme, have captured an echo of your power of friendship, and weaponised it to use against you! MHU-HAHAHAHAHA!

Frivolous

This is very nice. Catherine gave Akua a tremendous gift: Absolute freedom to choose who to be, what to do.

The crucible here is the existential dilemma: After the failure of all your former goals and the necessary rejection from your former love object, then given absolute freedom, what do you do?

Akua can go Good. Akua can go Evil. Akua can just do nothing and laze around if she wants.

Personally I believe Akua will choose to become Good. She'll be hated and reviled by most heroes and most villains, but she's gonna be Good anyway.

This is all very Immanuel Kant, very long dark night of the soul, wrapped in a nearly transparent sexy shimmering unrequited lesbian love affair, haha.

It's very nice to learn Eudokia's aspect of Inscribe, and the true nature of Assassin.

One question, though: How did Ranger learn about Assassin? Can she penetrate Eudokia's perception filter?

Braxen

Ranger definitely fought one of the Assassin corpses. A Named solely dedicated to killing others? She would see that as both a challenge to her Name and as worthy to hunt.

Shveiran

What do you mean, how did Ranger learn about Assassin?

She was in the Calamities for decades, of course she bloody knows. Any Named working that long with a group and fighting through thick and thin would learn the others' aspects by exposure to them if not being outright told.

We are talking about the Villains who first weaponized the power of friendship. Of course Ranger knows!

Evgeny Permyakov

> Akua can just do nothing and laze around if she wants.

She really can't. It's not in her nature. And she can't really go Good (because she doesn't really believe in it) or Evil (because she was shown that it isn't a way). If it was a story about Akua, I'd say it is a good place for a soul search ark. But since its end is unlikely to end with either Above or Below, it would be unlikely to ever truly end.

Liliet

Good doesn't really need belief. I mean, actual heroic formal Above allegiance does, but doing Good doesn't. You just have to care about other people / find enjoyment in helping others / dislike others' suffering.

And I don't think Akua doesn't have it in her 😊

Shveiran

To be fair, neither does she have it in her.

It's just, well, she's like Indrani: they can do good, but it's mostly doing good to someone they know or care about and not actively doing bad. Which, you know, it's what most people do.ù

It's not wicked nor anything, but it's not actively doing good.

It's not caring about people IN GENERAL, it's not spending time and effort to try and improve the lives of others because someone ought to and not because you know them personally.

There is a huge, huge difference between being able of genuine affection for someone, to the point where you are willing to make sacrifices for them, and feeling that helping others is the point of your life.

Liliet

Yeah, the thing is, Akua spent her original lifetime doing her duty to the Sahelians. The whole "devoting herself to a personal relationship" thing is what's new. Doing What's Right is very much old hat to her, it just used to be Sahelian!right instead of everyone else!right.

She is not even remotely like Indrani in this.

Evgeny Permyakov

>Yeah, the thing is, Akua spent her original lifetime doing her duty to the Sahelians.

Nope. Akua spent her first timeline pursuing her personal ambitions, it just so happened that her ambitions aligned with ambitions of Sahelians as a whole, this chapter clearly shows how it works. And a lot, if not all time she spent with Cat she also pursued her personal ambitions. Akua is a very convincing liar, so everything she shows to Cat should be taken with a huge grain of salt.

Cat defeating Akua ended Akua's ambitions. She could go into afterlife quietly after that, because even in defeat she achieved something, or at least it appeared so at the moment. But she was unable to do so and had seen how her greatest achievement were used as a brick in building Liesse Accords, something that is very much against the school of Evil Akua played for. This practically invalidated her 'victory' in her eyes. So she absolutely had to find a different way to self-validate. At the time, Cat played arguably good guys as a defender of Callow, so Akua decided to try this particular brand of ambitions. But it didn't penetrate and was a skin-deep game, and it was shown at least a few times.

At the moment, Akua has no avenues to self-validate by leaving a lasting mark. 'Heroes' won't take her, because, well, Doom of Liesse. 'Villains' are not allowed long-term victories. But going down utterly defeated is clearly against her ambition to leave a mark. And she won't go for pure altruism because, well, she is a very self-centered person, because this is what her culture is about and first half of her life was about. This part of her psyche cannot be undone.

Add in that Akua probably has a thing for Cat purely because of sheer diffusion over a few years of adventuring together, but, well, Doom of Liesse salted the ground here. This works as further deterrent for the villainous route.

Given all that, sure, Akua isn't like Indrany. Indrany never had all that much ambitions to begin with, she simply is what she is. Indrany is content with her life. Akua... very much isn't. Akua, at the moment, is a double failure without visible ways to self-validate and it weights on her. But doing 'what is right' is very much not Akua's thing.

Liliet

> Nope. Akua spent her first timeline pursuing her personal ambitions, it just so happened that her ambitions aligned with ambitions of Sahelians as a whole, this chapter clearly shows how it works.

Here's the thing.

> "Do you ever get tired, Lord Fasili?" Akua asked suddenly.

>

> The man blinked.

>

> "Of?"

>

> "This," she said, tone whimsical. "Of what we are. Of what we do."

> In the depths of the city of Liesse, beyond layers upon layers of wards and traps, there was a room. For more than a year it had been slowly crafted to perfection, and for years before that had Akua Sahelian spent days and nights refining its design. Removing impurities and inefficiencies, balancing ease of use and breadth of effect so that only a single soul in all of Creation could use it as it was meant to be used. Should she live for a hundred thousand years she would never make anything half so great, for it was the culmination of everything that she was. All that she loved and hated, all that had made and fought her. There had been a child, once, who looked upon pyramids of mud and blood and felt awe. At the skill, at the scope, at the power that still dwelled within – and though Tasia Sahelian had toiled greatly to make a hollow husk of that girl, a mere receptacle for her ambitions, that spark of wonder had never been snuffed out.

> "I do not hate them," Diabolist said. "Nor the Empress. For all their flaws, they sought to make our people rise. I am not Mother, Papa – I do not despise what they are. It is a mistake made in good faith, and killing them was never the point of this. I am surpassing them. If that must involve taking their lives, then so be it."

>

> And how long had she dreamed of this, of escaping the shackles? The Carrion Lord had been right, in part. They could not win the war by repeating the same defeat with a hundred different fresh faces. But the pair that ruled Praes had abandoned everything that the peoples of the Wasteland were to avoid another disgrace, and that was a betrayal greater than mere failure. They could win and still be Praesi, Akua knew. Go to your grave gladly, Black Knight, having learned the truth of that – you were, for all your weaknesses, a patriot. She would not deny the fearsome depth of that loyalty, however twisted it was.

> Diabolist stood before the rune-inscribed walls and laid a single finger on them. They lit up like a starry sky, reaching for a hundred different arrays spread across houses and bastions and pits. The Carrion Lord had spoken for the ruling order, for the woman who held the Tower. She would speak, then, for the Wasteland. For the Empire that was and would be, for the greatness that was not yet forgot. Akua Sahelia stood proud, for there was more to her than mere ambition.

I still cannot find the quote where Akua talked to Cat about the separation between the woman and the queen, about how she was brought up to treat the Heiress of Wolof and Akua Sahelian the person as two separate people.

But that's the trick.

Akua never wanted to rule. Nothing in her dreams is about what happens after she wins. Her imagination goes "I make the COOLEST WONDER EVER, then Praes returns to its former glory, then IDK don't care".

Last time Akua talked to Catherine about ambition, she was pushing the idea that "ambition" is something all villains have and it is a desire for excellence, as a broad enough concept it encompasses poor Aspasia with her "ambition for excellence at survival in difficult times". Which is a really fucking long reach, if you ask me.

Akua was just... never power hungry, not in the "power over other people" way. She just wanted to drive the BIGGEST monster truck.

And she also HAD A DUTY TO do that while striving for the Tower.

Evgeny Permyakov

... I think, this post is meant to be a counter-point, but as far as I can see, most of it just expands my point. Are you sure you posted what you meant to post? I mean, aside from possible misunderstanding what 'ambition' means (ambition has nothing to do with desire for power per se) and the last claim that is, in my understanding, baseless.

Liliet

Ughhh I cannot find one of the most important quotes there and I'm not really up for combing through the text. I'm going to check if I have a reddit writeup for this.

Oh, I did write something. Here: https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/i6ggp0/akua_is_a_perfectionist_not_ambitious/

This post was about a slightly tangential point to the one I'm making here, but the quotes that form the basis of my understanding of Akua's personality are there.

Then there are the subtle touches: the black swan form, the offer to be the sacrifice at Hainaut, Catherine wondering back in Book 5 which category of commander Akua is between those who accept losses as fact and those who get personally hurt by them, the guard she got Cat to spare, the sheer ease she has understanding, predicting and following Cat's motivations (if anything, she's tended to underestimate Cat's ruthlessness, back when they were rivals)

Evgeny Permyakov

... You begin from arbitrary redefinition of the word and then begin telling that this is not what Akua is. That is a bad style. Also, I fail to see how your 'point' is opposed to mine. It doesn't matter what Akua's ambitions are at this point, what matters is that they were shattered twice, with two major approaches not valid anymore.

I do not see a point in continuing. I see that you are vaguely offended by my understanding of the situation, but I don't see why, and honestly don't care.

Liliet

Welp, have a good day then.

devildragon777

...To try and put this in another way, I think Liliet's point here is that Akua wasn't following her ambitions this entire time, and maybe probably doesn't really get how to be ambitious at all?

Like, Akua's prideful of the Wasteland, she believes her culture has value and cares about her homeland a lot, but she doesn't and hasn't really ever wanted to be a big bad Villain or rule over it or anything of that nature at all. Tasia Sahelian wanted those things out of her, and so Akua strove for it in the way she knew how: trying to be the best at it.

...but she honestly didn't care about it.

My own interpretation is that that's part of why she starts following Cat after Second Liesse; Akua has just been trained to leave the whole long-term goals and ambitions to other people, and just do what she is needed to do with excellence. She follows Cat and adopts her plans and dreams and does her utmost to bring them to fruition because... she doesn't actually have anything else to strive for. There wasn't something that Akua really actually wanted to do or be or accomplish.

And that's the tragedy of Akua Sahelian as a character: she never really wanted any of what she had accomplished. And despite doing her best at the choices and goals that were put in front of her, she never actually got what she wanted, and she in fact lost her chance at it: Acceptance for herself, the kind of warmth that comes with someone really understanding and just...caring about her as a person. And the one person who actually offers that in a meaningful way has a hundred thousand graves in the way of being able to give that to her.

Tl:dr Akua was just a girl who wanted friends, her peers to look upon her with pride, and to accomplish whatever she did well. She wasn't some grand schemer or someone with strong ambitions, she just someone who got used and raised by a family of those types, and it's cost her basically everything she's wanted.

Liliet

Basically this, yes.

Akua DID learn to be a masterful schemer (even though it'd never been her personality), and she did weave a couple of things she wanted into what was expected of her: freeing herself and her father from under her mother's thumb, making a really cool magical artefact.

Those were things she really wanted, and for all of a month or so she even had them, and then they got ruined by the rest of the aspects of her plan.

Akua didn't really know how to want things for herself – not until Catherine taught her the beginnings of it.

Evgeny Permyakov

It seems you agree with this

>I think Liliet's point here is that Akua wasn't following her ambitions this entire time, and maybe probably doesn't really get how to be ambitious at all?

This is profoundly untrue. We get a direct look into Akua's mind in "Villainous Interlude: Crescendo" and some more at "Interlude: Kaleidoscope VI". I can't remember if we get other direct looks, feel free to point me. There is also a scene where Cat interrogates Akua under magical bindings, which mostly aligns with looks above, but since it is words and not a direct view, it's still a suspect, for Akua is a very consummate and convincing liar.

Point is, those direct looks weight a lot more, and "Villainous Interlude: Crescendo" gives a very specific view of Akua as aiming for Triumph and achieving it in Liesse, at least from her PoV. As far as I read from those views, I see a woman who is very self-centered and mostly self-sufficient. She associates herself with the school of classic villainy that is Praesy culture, but this is exactly how far anything resembling 'duty' goes. She also is a mastermind and plays long games, aiming for some specific goal.

Whatever you dig up from her words, should be taken in the framework established in those two direct looks we had.

Liliet

Yeah, there's a reason half my Akua analysis quotes are from Crescendo and Chiaroscuro. We just draw really different conclusions from them.

Shveiran

Akua will not become Catherine's enemy. If she does seize the Tower, she'll do so as an ally and to change the Dread Empire into something that doesn't create more Akuas, not as some weird, spite-driven payback. Anything less would be so deeply unsatisfying after books spent building this redemption arc.

This is my hill.
Come forth if you wish, but I'm prepared to die on it.

Evgeny Permyakov

Cat narrated... I think, 2 chapters before, that she expects Akua to betray her a few weeks later. This is an interesting foreshadowing.

agumentic

She narrated that Akua will betray her before the moon's turn, which was just now. That was the expected betrayal.

Abrakadabra

Jesus said to Judas too that you will betray me... And it happened. 😊

Liliet

Cat did get momentarily worried at seeing Akua's new body that Bard wanting her to see it might mean she's wrong about Akua.

meaning there's something in her expectations for her to be wrong about :3

Lord Haart

I think it's somewhat likely but with the twist that while Akua will act as an ally in action, she will need to continue playing the role of a Villain in at least some ways. I imagine someone with the intrigue of Malicia but bent to practical good instead of evil – and keeping up an image of just being an incompetent, harmless ruler that is no threat. By making Praes so vulnerable, Callow then feels more comfortable trading food to Praes and Praes flourishes from within, at the grass roots level, while gradually replacing expansionism with diplomacy and neighborliness. This is what Akua knows is needed for Praes but the charade, while satisfying in some ways, is also uniquely isolating and she is never truly happy again.

Or, I'm wrong and Dread Emperor (and Sentient Tiger) Irritant the Traitorous reemerges from one of the hells after being sick of masquerading as Triumphant and decide to settle down for a stint as Dread Emperor Benevolent the Bootmaker.

Lord Haart

I think it's somewhat likely but with the twist that while Akua will act as an ally in action, she will need to continue playing the role of a Villain in at least some ways. I imagine someone with the intrigue of Malicia but bent to practical good instead of evil – and keeping up an image of just being an incompetent, harmless ruler that is no threat. By making Praes so vulnerable, Callow then feels more comfortable trading food to Praes and Praes flourishes from within, at the grass roots level, while gradually replacing expansionism with diplomacy and neighborliness. This is what Akua knows is needed for Praes but the charade, while satisfying in some ways, is also uniquely isolating and she is never truly happy again.

Or, I'm wrong and Dread Emperor (and Sentient Tiger) Irritant the Traitorous reemerges from one of the hells after being sick of masquerading as Triumphant and decide to settle down for a stint as Dread Emperor Benevolent the Bootmaker.

Evgeny Permyakov

Curios. On one hand, it is a clear end to the "Akua Tries Redemption" meta-ark. On another... I'm very certain that the experience taught her something, so she is unlikely to move to her old way. On yet another hand... Akua didn't reach the spiritual peace needed to go quietly to the afterlife.

... I think, Akua at this point could make a fine material for a "Wandering Jew" type Named, if shades can even be Named. Certainly, I would be disappointed if her story ended here. This is clearly a crisis point, where she should achieve some kind of revelation, but not a good point to end it.

Reader in the Night

This entire arc reeks of Contrition. I'm betting next time she shows up, Akua'll be carrying Willy's angel sword.

Evgeny Permyakov

That would be awfully out-of-character for Akua, imho. Contrition imply morals, Akua as far as she might have a thing for Cat still reads to me as completely amoral.

Liliet

Akua has always been a morals person, her morals were just completely fucked up. She was a "getting attached to your powerbase is a sin" morals person.

Lord Haart

I don't think morals are what drove her though, just what she warped into a form to justify whatever her actions were at the time. Her world view (whether ambitions or principles) are shattered now and so she has no framework left to run in but the one she invents herself.

BTW, I still don't know that I fully buy that she even had feelings for Cat the woman vs Cat the symbol*. Akua's hunger is indeed to leave an indelible mark on the world, but having done that through both evil and God, she had seen that hunger cannot be quenched so simply. Her defining moment, and Cat's too, will ironically be that in the new Age it's not pivots that define you – is who you choose to be every single day, every single moment. By the time the hammer has fallen, we were already forged (to paraphrase an excellent recent epigraph).

*Akua makes a big deal about having 'betrayed' her family to Cat, but we know from her PoV she really cares not a whit for the family or even really the name – it was only a tool to get her where she got. Her father's family she might care for, but probably not her mother's. I think it's more than likely this was a lie, if somewhat subconscious.

Lord Haart

Oh and new theory – as Black prepares to finally claim or destroy the Tower, Akua comes back at that moment and kills him for murdering her father, the only person who has ever lived her without condition.

Or did she previously make peace with Black? I don't recall so.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure Akua does genuinely care for her family in abstract, the way Catherine described it here. For her family's... cause. She just wants to change that cause – or at least she's done and said things that suggest she does.

Or did. I take it she's put that quest on pause for now~

Liliet

"Curios. On one hand, it is a clear end to the "Akua Tries Redemption" meta-ark."

No, it's the start of the final leg of it.

zenanii

Cat said this was the final crucible. But you're not really supposed to stay in the crucible, you're supposed to endure it, and then emerge, either strengthened or broken by the experience.

So I'm reading this as Akua's final challenge before she can actually be forgiven. After all, there is no point in punishment just for the sake of punishment, and if there is one thing Black has drilled into Cat it's his brutal sense of pragmatism.

ninegardens

There is no Forgiveness. Cat doesn't have the AUTHORITY to grant that. She doesn't have the power. That's the point.

The "emerging strengthened" isn't the "And now I get forgiveness" it's the "And now I accept who I am, and what I've done, and move on... WITHOUT forgiveness".

Some times you break something bad enough that it can never be fixed. That's what happened here. Akua can leave if she wants. She can become a different person, live a different life, earn new friends. But THESE friends will never be truly open to her, because of what SHE did.

Shveiran

I agree on most of it, but not the conclusion.

These ARE her friends now. Catherine has genuine affection for her, there is nothing fake about it.

It's simply that there is no erasing the past, even if you change the future.

There will always be a fly in the ointment; that doesn't mean that there is no effect to changing the swamp water into an ointment in the first place... it just means you are adding good, not erasing the bad, and you need to be aware of that.

Liliet

Akua can come back to be Cat's companion again. She'll just never be Cat's lover. And that's okay.

ninegardens

Oh yeah, I never said they weren't her friends. I never said they were fake.

I just said that they will never be FULLY available to her - as you say, a fly in the ointment.

Earl of Purple

I, too, wish to know how far Indrani got on her rescue mission. And I wonder if they killed or broke anything important.

Cat discussing Amadeus with her ducklings was good, too. I really want Arthur to meet him, ideally without knowing who he was at the beginning.

Liliet

Has anyone else noticed that Alexis was there with her?

Lord Haart

Yes. Also the fact that it was a band of four, not five - possibly not PLANNED to succeed, just threaten to, which is rather perfect really.

I hope we see more to Alexis and Indrani. The Alexis relationship is in some ways the best outsider look we have of her since Cat and Masego are quite biased. But Indrani is a bully and doesn't take accountability for her actions and Alexis (and Cocky too actually) expose this. I do wonder if changing that trait will make Indrani, or will break her name since being burdened by unacknowledged guilt is either what's driving Horizon or what might break it.

Indrani also has the least plot armor (arguably Hakram has more outright plot threats though) of the (non-Cat) woe so I fear that next time a heroic stand comes up, she might take the fall. Possibly related to revenge on Lysander too.

Liliet

I think Indrani is not DRIVEN by unacknowledged guilt. It's... also there, IN ADDITION to what's driving her, a stone in her boot.

And I think she's acknowledged it plenty. Even if afterwards she had flashes of return to the same patterns when interacting with these people, doesn't mean she hadn't already been feeling guilty for how she'd treated them before, and hadn't already admitted it to herself.

We do learn about the bullying from her explaining to Cat about how much Refuge sucks, after all.

Liliet

Indrani has already taken revenge for Lysander (during the Hainaut sequence, on the specific Revenant that killed him, when Concocter had helped her with acid eating through armor joints) and she has already made a dramatic heroic last stand offer (in chapter 9, right before Cat knocked her out).

You're not wrong about her character arc beats, they're just not... having the consequences to worry about, so far.

aurikdomi

Hot Damn. Assassin, Akua, the moving troops, finally a confirmation on Black being Cat's intended emperor, and even the little things like Arthur and Saban learning about Black.

Xinci

Ah so this kind of confirms its the bindings are key then for things like sapience/choice. The bard can easily be given a new body and name as all that is needed is a inscription system and material components. It being two fold the materials and inscribed information explains further why a domain can differ like it does in a pig than a tapir. Also may explain why they made Creation at all with so many inset rules(especially if the Gods are Creation). What better base materials than themselves?

Comes back to the question of if something is of Creation or really any dimension what seperates it from anything else? The rules inset in it that bind it along with the configuration of its make up do seem to be rather logical answers. Fae seem to be the ur example, they are only differentiated from inert matter by stories and in of themselves these stories are bindings. Its just inscribed information that is preserved across cycles so that the Fae retain themselves(kind of like information theory on what actually makes up a organism). We still don't quite know what happens to Arcadia materially as it shifts from season to season though in the dream Cat had it did seem tl reconfigure itself as well. Winter cat is also a good example, she remained the same individual as the information inscribed was the same, but she was more static til she basically got Winter ripped out and reconstructed by Sve.

Lord Haart

Interesting points. Not sure it will be plot relevant in the end but I do think I mostly buy this as fast as Guideverse metaphysics go. But what are Demons then, and Angel's, in relation to the upper G Gods if the Gods are just Spinoza creation?

Mental Mouse

WOG is that it's devils who are the opposite numbers to angels, either way they may well represent the direct investments of the Gods Above and Below. Demons are possibly leftovers from Creation, either the stuff the Gods didn't want to work into their main Creation, or the original inhabitants of the stretch of underlying reality that the Gods paved over and rebuilt.

beleester

It feels like Cat's reasoning for turning away from Akua is less because of her personal feelings, and more because "the story has to be this way." Because she believes that the only way Akua's redemption arc will properly play out is if she's never forgiven for Liesse.

I'm not sure how I feel about that. On the one hand, not forgiving the murder of hundreds of thousands is an eminently reasonable thing to do. But on the other hand, betting on "the story is on my side" is always a dangerous bet, and it makes Akua's "inevitable betrayal" a self-fulfilling prophecy. The first time she's shown genuine emotion in decades and you tell her it means nothing – what did you think was going to happen?

schree

I read it, not as Cat doing things because The Story Said So [™], but because Cat genuinely feels that the murder of an entire city of her countrymen is an unforgivable act, and she can't allow her own love for Akua without feeling like she's betraying those who died – those who Cat failed to protect.

The "inevitable betrayal" was because Cat loves Akua, and knows Akua loved her... and so knew a moment like this had to come someday. They both know they love each other, and Akua had just hoped that would be enough to overtake her own sin.

TeK

What? She turned Aqua doe because she planned to do this from the Liesse. It is the revenge she crafted coming to a climax. How do you punish someone who is so unrepentant, she considers his sins a virtue? The purpose of punishment is to make someone regret their actions, how do you make someone like that regret? Why, you make them desperately desire one thing they can not achieve because of their crimes. A knife was already in the wound, this was just a twist.

Liliet

Cat WANTED Akua's betrayal because betrayal at this point is the only way the redemption arc can play out to the end.

Lord Haart

I think this is one spot where Cat knows that if she expects a redemption arc, she'll get something else. I don't think this series would go straight along the lines of such a common, obvious trope. There will be a twist in there – E.g. Akua comes back good and slays Black for the deaths and war crimes in his name (Black arguably killed more innocents than Akua with his madhat rampage in Procer and never truly paid for it). Or Akua comes back Evil, kills Cat and takes over the Llesse Accords in some way that still preserves the net value of them (less collateral damage and more rights for average people). I don't know how exactly, I just think this story deserves better (more nuance) than "mass murdered comes in to save the day after thinking really hard about why that's worth doing". That would cheapen these chapters in my mind, which would be a shame as they are phenomenal.

Hopefully this is just the start of a long, long price. I think it works be fitting for it to last as long as the years and futures they lost. And I do hope good comes of it, but not for Akua's sake, entertaining as she is to read.

DustHurricane

I don't really care about tower or whatever right now. My heart is fucking shattered.

I really, really like Cat and Akua... I'm gonna be hoping with everything that I physically am that eventually, they find a way to work this out and be together. Cause goddamn it, but I need that in my life...

hoser2

The tower has been torn down before. And rebuilt. I think Amadeus wants to destroy the Tower past rebuilding along with the Name "Dread Emperor/Empress".

Cat would be happy with Amadeus as Dread Emperor but I think we are seeing broad hints about the problems with that plan.

Shveiran

I think that's his plan too... but I'm not quite sure how he could possibly do that.

hoser2

Yeah. For me, that's a big part of the anticipation. It seems difficult and interesting. EE could solve it either way or somewhere in the middle.

To have a real peaceful structure for Callow, it seems like Praes has to change. The Tower and Dread Emperor/Empress setup seems like it will make that difficult.

It seems like Amadeus is as skilled as anybody at destroying Names, so if there's a way, he might find it. If any of the nonhuman races gains enough power, the empire starts to creak, methinks. If the Empire ceases to exist, can there be a Tower?

beleester

Amadeus's original plan was not to destroy the Tower, but to make it powerful and secure enough that it could be a stable regime without resorting to mad schemes of conquest. The three prongs to this plan were conquering Callow to secure their grain supply, destroying the power of the High Lords to remove the risk of rebellion, and rebuilding the Legions to create a professional force that doesn't rely on Named or sorcery to function.

I think that plan is still workable – if the Tower is held by a non-evil or Reasonable Evil person, and if Praes is seen helping to defeat the Dead King so that trading grain with them doesn't look like giving aid to the enemy, then they can make a permanent peace with Callow and settle into a new, non-crazy equilibrium. The question is, who do you trust to sit in the Tower and not go crazy for long enough that you can pull it off?

hoser2

The original plan may be workable, but the end of the Epilogue of the previous book suggests that it's no longer Amadeus's plan:

"He looked east, where in the distance waited the gargantuan shape of the Tower jutting out from Ater, and he raised his half-empty bottle of wine in a toast. When was he to settle his accounts, if not the end times?

If the song refused to leave him, then he would silence it."

sadfan

How is Cat's body count qualitatively different from Akua's in a feudal society with conscription?

hoser2

Gotta think there's a difference between fighting to defend one's own country while making peace and zombifying a city to make guards for a Demonic breach.

Leaving the breach aside (although it's probably the greater offense), if Akua had zombified Wolof, I doubt we would be hearing much "Ever worthy, Sahelion"

Liliet

I'm going to actually take this question seriously.

1. Cat also hates conscription as an idea and finds it unethical and didn't do it until she had to – in a way that the people subject to conscription also recognized as a valid reason for it, culturally. Contrast this with Akua's, uh... not that.

2. People who get conscripted don't all die. Risk of death and guaranteed death aren't the same, ethically. People are fully free to choose the former for themselves – Cat's risking her own life, too, alongside theirs, that's why she's liked by her army.

3. The loss of culture. Akua destroyed an entire city with all of its inhabitants and inhabitants of its surroundings, as she'd been taking it for refugees too. The only Liessen left are those who happened to not even be in the region at the time. Liessen is one of Callow's major cultural centers, and now none of it is left. Conscription doesn't do that even if it's deliberately targeted against one group (which Catherine never did) bc it tends to leave enough people to at least raise the kids.

agumentic

Cat would not be in a particularly forgiving mood should she meet herself, either.

unLucker

"There'd been next to no skirmishing in my absence, as it turned out, and Juniper believed what few blows had been traded to have been accidental. Patrols running into each other by happenstance, nothing intentional."

Chekov's gun? Maybe alongside those skirmishers was Malicia's body and implanted some commands.

John

I think they've already got precautions in place against low-level soldiers being compromised in various ways.

Cap'n Smurfy

I love how Scribe made Assassin by accident. I really get the impression the Calamities half stumbled and fumbled their way into Power before achieving competence.

ninegardens

I love the fact that like... Scribe and Assassin both always seemed like "half characters". You hear about them, but neither of them is "all there", in the way Sabah or Wekesa was.

With this revelation however, yeah, "Scribe+Assassin" DOES feel like an "Entire character". It's really cool. And seeing Assassins' jackass sense of humour and "ironic" murders and such tells us a lot about Scribe I suspect.

Though.... I still don't know what the deal is with Black having a contract for Assassin to kill him if he ever went crazy. That was just never going to work.

jamesc9

> Assassins' jackass sense of humour and "ironic" murders

I think it helps that the Assassin bodies are somewhat disposable.

sadfan

I simply couldn't believe he'd order her to use something like the Assassin on anyone dear to me.

Mistake.

Shveiran

Why? The only someone that Cat loves and Amadeus might want to murder is Akua. And I'm not sure the kind of killing she'd need is the kind Assassin can dish out.

Liliet

Not because he wouldn't hurt anyone Cat likes, but because the specific people Cat likes are those Amadeus has no reason to hurt.

Except Akua, but my understanding is that Cat doesn't count her for this.

Lord Haart

There is the off chance he hurts one of them to work a story though. Malicia was ruled out of having killed Juniper's mother in a recent PoV so it's just Sacker or Black left IIRC. Tempting to blame Sacker but Black could have done it knowing it'd look like Malicia in order to help bind Juniper to Cat. Hard to know what a machine like Black might consider reasonable when we've only seen part of the machine.

Liliet

It's all but confirmed to be the Matrons. They benefited from it on every level.

Frivolous

Since we're on the topic of the bodies of Named, I wonder what happened to the body of the Intercessor following her death in Interlude: Knock Them Down.

I figure that Catherine couldn't steal aspects from the corpse because the Intercessor woke up in a new body shortly after, but surely the corpse itself could be useful to someone. For instance, the Harrowed Witch might have used her necromancy on it and forced it to answer questions.

And now we know Scribe might also have used the corpse to make an Assassin.

Crash

Might've misread it, but I've been under the impression she doesn't leave a body behind. Everything goes Nowhere when she "dies".

Frivolous

Crash: Quote from Interlude: Knock Them Down:

Catherine Foundling looked at the corpse for a long time, clenching her fingers and unclenching them.

The implication is that her body didn't disappear.

Also, this was the first time we've seen the Intercessor die with a reliable witness around.

Crash

Huh. Completely missed that! Thanks mate.

Crash

EE has said before that Scribe and Assassin aren't the same person. Yeah, because they were an Aspect this whole time. Fuckin weasel lmao

That said, Malicia is working with Bard at least a little bit. And with the new Black Knights Aspect and her previous knowledge of Assassin, there's enough on the table to justify her possibly knowing what Inscribe does. So the corpse has to me a 4D chess move right? No way that ends well.

Big stretch of the word betrayal there, by Cat. If anything, she's the one twisting the knife in this instance. Unless Akua is supposed to do something rash through the night.

Shveiran

Yeah, honestly the whole "she told me she loves me and that's the betrayal" really feels... weird to me.

I mean, a pivot? Sure. But a betrayal?

Liliet

P sure the betrayal is Akua subsequently going to take Malicia's offer.

Shveiran

I really hope Akua wouldn't be so stupid as to allow the Empress that edge against HER, nevermind Cat.

If Akua takes the bait, it will be to betray Malicia from the inside.

Come on, there is no way in hell that the body is free of strings.

ninegardens

Hey, anyone remember that time that Akua captured Cat, decided to keep her as a "Pet dragon", and then subsequently got her heart torn out?

Malicia MAY have strings controlling that body... BUT we have seen there's something of a story in that. (tbh, there is also the story of angst and tragedy as Cat is forced to fight and/or kill her previous friend. Both stories can be brought to bear)

Liliet

True enough, no way Malicia won't have some way to ensure Akua can't turn on her without fucking herself over in some way.

The question is, will Akua's view of how bad that "way" is align with how bad Alaya would expect her to take it to be?

Liliet

The betrayal connects with Catherine previously “showing Akua unbound as bait”, discovering the body Malicia prepared in the vault and realizing there was no need for bait – Malicia was already going for it.

AKA, Cat’s plan/expectation is that Akua leaving here means she’s going to go take Malicia’s offer.

Yunamed

I feel pity/sorry for Akua, to be told your best isn’t enough after sacrificing everything you knew...how many people truly do good for doing good’s sake. How many times has Cat done something good without a motive or an end game in mind. Why can’t Akua be allowed to do the same? Doing good because she wants to stay with Cat and friends.

Liliet

That IS what Cat wants to get her to do – to do good without an end game. Because end game implies she doesn’t have to keep trying to do even better after that. She’s already climbed to the level she needs to be on.

Akua’s problem is that she kept clinging to “is this enough”. No, it’s not. No such thing as enough.

And Cat knew that at this point after having this reiterated she’d run off and try out the alternative. And Cat’s expectation is that she’ll return.

Adrian_V

Mmmm does this mean that every bit of information about Assassin so far is about Scribe in reality? The stuff i remember would match, like the fact that it was said (it was in the doc of WoE) Eudokia is from the free cities and Assassin was supposed to train there for example, and she does have a twisted sense of humour (she named the orphanages for example)

Liliet

Eudokia specifically said that Assassin is a sentient entity on his own.

mavant

Dread Empress Irredeemable.

jamesc9

Which in practice means unpredictable and undeterable.

mavant

Some commenters have noted Catherine is a bit hypocritical about body counts and long prices. True enough, but that's because the "long prices" thing isn't really about morality as such; it's a credible precommitment to mutual destruction.

Liliet

Oh good phrasing.

MatrixM

Holy shit...my heart...this hurts..

While reading the last 2-3 chapters I was legit fantasising(?) scenes were members of the Woe tell Cat to reconsider her plan for Akua and actually focus on doing what will help her sleep at night/make her happy.

But then this came while I had all those thoughts in my head and...damn. Think that brought another level of powerful.

Interlude: West I

"Terror is the hand that rips away the masks. What stays when it has stripped away all the civilized lies we tell ourselves is our truest face, ugly as it is."

—Alrich Fenne, first of the Iron Kings

Life was full of ironies, Prince Frederic Goethal had found.

Death too, he supposed, though circumstance dictated that one's enjoyment of such humour would be severely curtailed. For this jest, however, the Gods Above were yet smiling down on them. The endless armies of the Hidden Horror had smashed themselves against the walls of the Morgentor again and again, hordes beyond counting and horrors beggaring nightmares. The last fortress of Twilight's Pass had held back the madness, as Lycaonese grimly had for centuries, but all the world had known that it was only a matter of time until the Morgentor fell.

There were simply too many of the dead and too few soldiers to stop them, no matter how sharp the courage and tall the walls. All of Procer, perhaps even all of Calernia, had turned its eye to fortress in the frozen north where horror was yet dammed. Like a face cringing away from a blow yet struck.

Yet they had done it. Against the odds, against the night and the fear and the endless cruelty of Evil, the Morgentor had held. Towers had fallen, even the fortress itself for a time, but always the armies under Otto and Frederic had taken it back. Even now, as the morn's light fell on the stony grounds below, Prince Frederic stood atop the tower known as the Westenhaupt and knew the living to be the masters of the field. The dead were scattered and burning, the miraculous engines known as Pickler's Nails – picklernagel – pounding away at their retreating mass.

Balls of pitch hit the ground, tossed by spindly catapults, spilling blackness where they landed and spreading the flames everywhere. The changes goblin engineering had made here... The Dead King's commanders had grown wary of committing beorns to the first wave of the assault, after the fourth time they died without even touching a wall. Wary! The absurdity of that old monster's generals being wary of anything at all had been as fine wine.

It had been night and day. Even after the Hidden Horror plied fresh tricks and opened a gate into the very Hells, the lines had buckled yet stubbornly refused to break. With valour and fire, the armies of the west had held back the tide even as all the world expected them to fall. But life was full of delightful, cruel ironies and so it had not mattered. To the southeast the Hocheben Heights had fallen: the dead were now pouring into Bremen like an unstoppable tide, burning and killing as they went.

The Morgentor had not fallen but it was going to have to be abandoned, lest the dead march north and surround it entirely.

The Kingfisher Prince looked down at the fleeing dead, sword in hand and fingers tight on the grip. Two years he'd fought here. Bled here, with the hard-faced soldiers at his side. The Morgentor was hundreds of miles from the borders of Brus, but he fancied he now knew the fortress as well as if he had been born here. It was not his home, but Frederic had well thought it might be his grave before it all ended. It was... frustrating to abandon it like this. The prince knew well the strategic necessity – already it would be a hard campaign to push south through the enemy invading Bremen, to be enveloped here was death – yet what the mind knew the heart disavowed. It tasted like defeat, leaving.

It was in the soldiers around him too, he could feel it. Aid fluttered in him like butterfly wings, urging him to help but not quite knowing how. Westenhaupt was heavy on Neustrians, whose home was south of Bremen was now next to fall, but that stern lot was no more inclined to leave than the rest. Garbed in steel and iron the soldiers milled about the rampart, talking in terse Reitz and keeping an eye on the wyrms in the distance. Even Frederic's own retinue was in a dark mood. Such a small thing, pride, but was it not the smallest of axles on which the world rested? Small wounds could kill an army if left to fester.

Yet what could he do?

"It is finished for the day, my prince. The curs will not return until they have greater numbers than this to field."

Frederic glanced at his captain – a distant cousin of his, he'd been given to understand – who'd addressed him and nodded agreement.

"They'll be back under cover of darkness," the Prince of Brus said.

Even with goblin spotters, night had the living at a disadvantage. The span they'd just bought, however, would be the opportunity of their departure. The armies had been ready to decamp and march south for days, it was only the constant assaults of the Enemy that'd kept them still. A fighting retreat all the way to Bremen would be... difficult, even for veterans like these. The soldiers around them had been listening without even the pretence otherwise and a familiar officer stepped forward, Captain Fredda of the Neustrian royal army.

"It is done, then," she said. "We will flee south?"

The question was blunt, but more importantly reflected on the faces of most around them. Aid fluttered in him still, insistent. The Kingfisher Prince looked away, down at the fleeing throng of corpses. What could he claim?

"We will be back," Frederic said. "And so will they."

Grim nods, but the arrow had missed. The Kingfisher Prince thought, for a moment, of what Otto would say in his place. Something stern, do doubt. They were a stern and unflinching lot, the Reitzenberg. The Prince of Bremen was called Otto Redcrown by men for the proof of that, the same stubborn charge that'd killed his father and two elder sisters before the crown passed to him and he carried it to its end. And like that, Frederic found his answer.

"It begins now, our war," the Prince of Brus said.

That claimed their attention.

"We will march south," Frederic Goethal said. "Through Bremen and Neustria, through my own Brus in time, but though battles await us on that path it cannot be called a campaign."

He smiled.

"It is a muster," the prince said. "The last muster we have in us, the last gasp of Procer. And you all know where we will strike, once the strength of the east and the west is gathered."

The Kingfisher Prince raised his sword, pointed it east. Where, beyond mountains and lakes and clouds of poison, lay the Crown of the Dead. Keter, the Hidden Horror's seat of power.

"You call it fleeing," the Kingfisher Prince laughed, "but you should know better, Fredda. Today, at long last, we begin our march on Keter."

And inside of him the wings ceased fluttering at last, a smile from Above, as all around him backs straightened and stares hardened. Frederic had not lied, after all. The dead would chase them south relentlessly, until the time came for the last battle of this war. Frederic Goethal watched the corpses fleeing below one last time, fingers tight around his sword. Doom had come for the Principate of Procer, doom as no realm of man had ever known before.

They would meet that end, the Kingfisher Prince swore, straight-backed and proud.

—

The blow had split open her helm.

A shallow cut, she'd been lucky, but head wounds always bled ugly. Rozala Malanza, Princess of Aequitan, ripped off the straps of her helmet and tossed it away. It was useless now anyway and shaking free her sweaty hair was a small pleasure. Irritated at the delay, she glared at the priest laying his hands on her back.

"Hurry up, would you?" the dark-haired princess bit out.

A cleared throat followed and she glanced guiltily at Louis Rohanon, the former prince of Creusens who was now her formal secretary. And something rather more thrilling, in private, though that was best kept quiet.

"It would be easier if you dismounted," Louis mildly said.

"I'm not sure I'll be able to get back on my horse if I do," Rozala admitted.

Russet eyes narrowed, but he knew better than to argue against her getting back into the thick of the fight. The Princess of Aequitan was not the kind of general that shied away from the melee: it was why men followed her into the dark. She asked them to brave no peril she was not willing to risk at their side. Louis simply nodded, even though he disapproved, and she felt a sudden swell of affection. He was a wonderful lover, but she had often thought he could be more should politics allow. Perhaps even if not. She had come to suspect there might be... other considerations. The dark-haired princess laid a hand on her belly. It was still too early to tell, but there were signs.

"The Levantines are still holding strong out west," Louis told her. "But the Red Knight sent word that the Hawk has been nipping at them all afternoon. Lord Yannu took an arrow but he still lives."

Rozala grimaced, the Light wielded by the priest at her side finally reaching her scalp. The wound began to mend.

"Someone really needs to kill that thing for good," Rozala cursed. "And the eastern flank?"

"Still harassed by skirmishers, but the Cleven horse is scattering them," Louis said. "If we can push through to the south, we have our path to Peroulet."

Where the last line of defence for the principality of Cleves would stand. How quicky the wind had turned against them, Rozala thought. But a few months ago she had triumphed at the Battle of Trifelin then resisted the siege that followed in the victory's wake. Even the opening of the Hellgate had not been enough to dislodge her. Yet the Hidden Horror, while losing battles, had found ways to win the war. As he had done to the Lycaonese up north, he had done to her here in Cleves: when the neck did not bend, he had struck the ribs. Rozala had lost the western coast while pinned in Trifelin so and seen herself at risk of being surrounded should the city of Atandor fall.

Cordelia Hasenbach had sent the order to retreat south to Peroulet before she could even consider a stratagem to turn this around. And though part of her had wanted to fight the First Prince's command to retreat, Rozala had known it to be the right decision. Cleves was good as lost and there would be no reinforcements coming until it was far, far too late. It had been good that she'd not dallied out of pique, for Atandor had fallen earlier than anticipated and the army that'd taken it had swung north to attack her from behind as she already led her armies into a fighting retreat. For three days now her forces had been fighting the dead in heavy skirmishes, the Hidden Horror trying to mire her out here in the open instead of behind the walls of Peroulet.

She would not give the old monster his wish.

"Find me a helmet," Princess Rozala asked her lover. "And a fresh lance. We must pierce through, else half of us will be corpses come morning."

"Both are already on their way," Louis replied, ruefully smiling.

Rozala almost leaned down to kiss him, holding herself back at the very last moment. His lips quirked anyway. Rising her saddle, caressing her charger's neck, she turned her gaze to the field in the distance. They would make it to Peroulet, that much she would swear to any Gods that cared enough to listen. After, however... That fortress would be the last holdout before the hordes of the Dead King broke into the plains to the south. And if they do then Principate is dead, Rozala thought. It was a harsh thing, to realize that she had already given all the ground that she could afford to give. The moment she raised her banner over Peroulet, Rozala Malanza's back would be to the wall. And the terrible truth was that, beneath all the oaths and speeches, the Princess of Aquitan was not sure she could hold the city.

No, that was a lie. She knew she would lose those walls. It was only a question of how long she could eke out before she did.

Breathing out, Princess Rozala Malanza accepted the helmet her lover pressed into her hand, setting it atop the crown of her head. A lance filled her hand, familiar weight, and she looked up at the sunny afternoon sky. They must first survive today, she reminded herself, before being troubled by tomorrow.

"One miracle at a time," Rozala murmured into the wind, and rode back to war.

—

The First Prince thought it would look much like this, if an empire could see the headsman's axe coming down on its neck.

The Morgentor had fallen. Rhenia had fallen. Bremen was halfway into the grave. The sole major military force left in northern Procer, under the command of the princes of Brus and Bremen, was fighting through the horde so it could make it to the temporary safety of Neustria. Cordelia had done all she could to evacuate her people further south, into Segovia, but many had stayed. Too many. Lycaonese, she should have remembered, were a stubborn lot. They were not retreating, not leaving. They would fight the dead fiercely for every league of stone, every river, every hill and forest and muddy road. It was the old fight, the old duty. The walls must hold, lest dawn fail.

That pride might yet kill them all, and with every passing day Cordelia Hasenbach could do less to ward away that fate.

Cleves was holding better, but barely. A ring of forts had been raised along the line drawn by Peroulet, after Cordelia drew from the refugee camps for labour. Food and places on carts headed south for the families of those who accepted had earned her enough volunteers that pits could be dug, palisades raised and stones stacked fast enough it could almost be called a miracle. The First Prince knew better. If there was one thing the Principate still had plenty of, it was hands that could be put to work. The entire effort had felt much like raising a sandcastle to stop the tide, but the fair-haired princess had gritted her teeth and seen it done regardless. Despair was not worth a whistle. If Cordelia failed, it would be after she had moved Heavens and earth trying.

Even from Hainaut the news was grim. General Abigail had been dislodged from the Cigelin Sisters by an enemy offensive, though she'd retreated in good order to Lauzon's Hollow after covering her retreat with swaths of goblinfire. The White Knight's crushing victory at Juvelun had secured the eastern passage, for now at least, but all of Cordelia's generals agreed it was now only a matter of time until the Army of Callow was pushed back to the old defence lines at Neustal. And once that was the case, once all that stood between Procer and annihilation was forts from the hills of western Cleves to eastern Hainaut, then it would be the beginning of the end. The Dead King would hold the shores of the lakes and be able to cross unimpeded.

Looking at the grey stealing inch after inch of the exquisite map at the heart of the Vogue Archive, Cordelia Hasenbach could almost hear the whistling sound the axe was making as it came down on the neck of the Principate of Procer.

Though tastefully clothed and as rested as she could afford to be, Cordelia could not help but feeling worn to the bone. It showed, too, in some ineffable part of her. She'd glimpsed it in her looking glass, that subtle quality that came from a tool being worked 'til it was near breaking. Yet the fire in her belly would not let her close her eyes, not when every missed opportunity was a few hundred more of the people in her care sent to the grave. The First Prince heard the Forgetful Librarian approach, recognizing the footsteps, and afforded the other woman a questioning glance.

"Word from the Dominion just came," the Damned said. "It worked."

Cordelia did not hide her surprise quite quickly enough.

"They agreed to the oaths?" she pressed.

"Every major line of the Blood swore oaths that the seneschal of Levante is to hold the city until the end of the war, when the Majilis will convene to settle the succession of the Isbili," the Librarian confirmed. "The peace-oaths were not as widespread, but the rumours the Circle seeded seem to have moved public opinion where you wanted."

This time it was a smile she hid. Cordelia had ordered that word be spread the Grey Pilgrim had died wishing for peace between Levantines before his sacrifice at the Battle of Hainaut, which would have meant little in Procer but carried a great deal of weight in the Dominion. He had been revered as half a god, in those parts. There would still be bandits and raiders that took advantage of the chaos, but the spectre of the Peregrine's disapproval would stay many a hand. Perhaps, if she were lucky, enough that the Dominion of Levant did not collapse into utter anarchy. Methodical anarchy, at least, she would be able to prop up for a little longer still.

Long enough that if she no longer could, it was because Cordelia could do nothing at all.

"We can turn our attention to the League, then," the First Prince said. "Have our envoys to Bellerophon sent word back yet?"

"Yes," the Librarian grimaced. "That they have yet to be received by the expedition's generals."

The Republic of Bellerophon had, to almost universal surprised, succeeded at assembling an army and sweeping over the last holdings of Penthes. Unfortunately, the victorious citizen-soldiers had then begun a siege of the city-state that they were very unlikely to be able to carry out successfully. Cordelia would have had little issue with this, had General Basilia not been leading a coalition army east with the intention of besieging that very same city only to find that there was already an army camped beneath its walls. Given that Basilia had bought dwarven engines so that she would at least be able to breach the walls of Penthes and put an end to the war she'd begun, this was a... frustrating situation.

The Secretariat of Delos had invited her to mediate a peace between the parties involved, but while Helike and its vassals were amenable the Republic was proving to be rather more obstinate. The People had voted that Anaxares the Diplomat yet lived, and so was still Hierarchy of the League of Free Cities. As a consequence, it was illegal for them to receive foreign envoys. The situation in the south had therefore turned into a farce of standoff under the walls of Penthes, General Basilia having refused to give battle and instead sent war parties to pillage the Penthesian countryside. She was, Cordelia suspected, trying to earn back what she had spent on those dwarven war engines.

"Then we lean on Atalante," the First Prince said. "If they consent, Delos could at last call a formal session of the League of Free Cities."

The end of hostilities that entailed could be used to force Bellerophon back to its territory, given that the republic still claimed to be loyal to its lost Hierarchy. If General Basilia could steal a march on Bellerophon when hostilities resumed after, she could claim the siege first and finally bring the civil war to an end. Beginning to consider how the ruling priests might be convinced to end their self-imposed isolation, Cordelia ceased when she saw a messenger come for her. She glanced at the Librarian, who snorted before taking the offered scroll for her. It was given unto her afterwards, however, and she frowned. The head of the Circle of Thorns, Louis de Sartrons, claimed he had urgent news.

And to think she had almost begun to find a silver lining to the cloud.

Cordelia wasted no time in heading towards the salon where her spymaster would be waiting. The conversation would trouble her carefully arranged schedule if it ran for too long, and she had an obligation that could not be put off later that evening, but she would have to adapt. Louis de Sartrons was not the kind of man to call anything urgent without good reason. Within moment of sitting across from him and taking a polite sip at the served tea, the skeletally thin older man spoke a sentence that chilled her blood.

"The Dead King is looking for the ealamal."

Cordelia carefully set down the cup, painted porcelain of exquisite delicacy. She did not ask whether or not her spymaster was certain, as it would be an insult to the both of them.

"Has he found it?" she asked instead, forcing calm.

"I believe not," Louis de Sartrons replied. "A Revenant was caught in southern Lyonis and another was seen in Lange, but the facility in Brabant has not been breached."

It would not be catastrophic even if it were, Cordelia reminded herself. Brabant had been judged too close to the enemy, and so the weapon had been moved into southeastern Aisne.

"Destroy it," Cordelia ordered. "We must be sure the Enemy learns as little as he can."

"I will see it done," her spymaster agreed, then thinly smiled. "It may very well be only a matter of time until it is found regardless of any measure, Your Highness. Unless we let Chosen see to the defences-"

"We will not," the First Prince sharply interrupted.

She would not let the White Knight usurp control of the weapon. It had been made of the corpse of an angel of Judgement, there could be no pretence of Hanno of Arwad not becoming its master as soon as he laid hands on it – and he would, if any of the Chosen took up guarding the ealamal. The loyalty of the heroes went first to their champion, and the White Knight had already proved himself untrustworthy in the Arsenal. Cordelia would not make the same mistake twice.

"Then the best we can deliver is delay, Your Highness," Louis de Sartrons blandly said. "And I would consider Sister Alberte's proposal that a limited test be attempted. Otherwise we know too little of the weapon for it to be considered usable, in my opinion."

The First Prince hesitated, staying silent. It had been the question that plagued them all ever since the Salian Peace. What would a weapon made of a fallen angel of Judgement do, if Judgement was kept silent by a madman? The Hidden Horror himself had claimed that the Tyrant of Helike had spared them all a great doom by arranging for the Hierarch to do this, and the secrets unearthed in Levant last year had borne this true in part. If the Intercessor truly could influence angels, using the ealamal would have been a mistake. It would have given that enigmatic monster power of life and death over half of Calernia. Yet with the Hierarch staying true to his course of obstruction, the situation had changed again.

If the ealamal could be used without the Intercessor's meddling, then Cordelia still had a way to prevent the fall of Calernia. If. Only none could tell her what the weapon might do without the guidance of angels behind it, and there was no known precedent to draw on. What way but a test was there to gain an answer? A small use, limited in scope, but still a use. The First Prince was inclined to agree with her spymaster of the necessity, but it was not so simple as that. There was another crowned head whose assent must be gained before that, lest in chasing ghosts Cordelia make an enemy of the living. Catherine Foundling had not been shy in voicing her disapproval of the entire affair, and absurdly enough the Black Queen was now Cordelia's closest and most important ally.

"I am to speak with the Black Queen tonight," she finally said. "The subject will be broached."

"That is all I can ask, Your Highness," Louis de Sartrons said, bowing his head.

—

The parlour had been refurbished from floor to ceiling when it was first dedicated to a new purpose, that of serving as the scrying room the First Prince of Procer would use to speak with the Queen of Callow. An entire wall had been covered by a beautiful silver mirror while the plush sofas had been replaced by a beautiful yet severe set of Lycaonese armchairs and tables. Bureaus had been filled with papers which might be of use in discussion, the latest reports and predictions, while the walls were covered with maps and tapestries. Every detail had been tailored according to what her agents believed to be the preferences of Catherine Foundling.

Though Cordelia doubted their common amiability could be traced back to these changes, it had to be said that at least the change of furniture had ensured that the Black Queen would no longer eye the more elaborate Alamans furnishings with barely veiled disdain. The First Prince was in some ways rather amused by the other royal's disdain for luxuries, considering that for all her severe inclinations she was likely one of the wealthiest women in all of Calernia these days.

The First Prince of Procer poured herself a cup of mead and set the pitcher down on the table before slipping into the armchair – discreetly made more comfortable with cushions – and allowed herself to take a sip. Unlike the Black Queen, who usually guzzled wine as if it were water while they talked, she moderated herself. It made it all the more frustrating that the drink usually came to redden her cheeks before it did the other ruler's, to be frank. Before she had even set down the cup, the surface of the mirror before her rippled. It took a moment for the wizards of the Observatory in Laure to bind her to the Hierophant's spell in Praes, but hardly more than a few breaths.

On the other side of the mirror the Black Queen, looking as tired as Cordelia herself felt, offered her a lopsided grin.

"Your Highness," Queen Catherine of Callow said.

"Your Majesty," First Prince Cordelia of Procer replied.

Catherine Foundling could be striking on a good day, but this did not seem to be one of them. Her clothes were ruffled, her expression drawn and there was no sign of the ruinous charisma that had drawn so many to her causes – fair and foul. The cloth covering the eye she'd lost in Hainaut was slightly askew, which made her sharp cheekbones stand out more than usual. Cordelia almost wished she had not taken the time to put on a fine dress in Rhenian blue herself, but only almost. Even if Foundling noticed the difference between them, which a slight frown told Cordelia she had, the queen was always easier to deal with when the Lycaonese princess was dressed becomingly.

The Black Queen's wandering eye was well-known, and Cordelia had not gotten where she was by refusing to use the arrows in her quiver.

"A trying day?" the First Prince asked.

The tanned woman – even darker of skin, now that she campaigned under the Wasteland sun – barked out a laugh.

"In a way," the Black Queen said. "I have what I came for: High Lord Sargon's granary and his treasury are secured and ready to be moved. I can begin heading south for a decisive battle."

"A great victory," Cordelia said, meaning every word.

The city of Wolof was famous even in her native Rhenia, known as a great fortress that'd broken the same armies that had taken Ater and brought down the Tower. That Foundling had beggared it without even having to storm the walls or losing more than a handful of men was the kind of feat a reputation could be made of, were the Black Queen's own not far beyond such tales nowadays.

"So they tell me," Catherine Foundling tiredly said. "Akua Sahelian left my camp two days ago. Our spies in Wolof tell me she has entered the Empyrean Palace."

Cordelia, knowing the Doom of Liesse to be a thorny matter, took a sip from her mead as she chose her words.

"Her desertion is as you predicted," the First Prince said. "And planned for."

The other woman winced.

"If I might give you a word of advice?"

Cordelia cocked a brow but nodded.

"I wouldn't ever say anything that could be construed as a variation on 'just as planned'," the Black Queen said, and she seemed completely serious. "That never ends well."

The blonde princess leaned back into her seat. It was absurd enough advice, on the surface, but it was no fool giving it.

"One of the obscure rules of... Named, I take it," Cordelia said, deciding using Chosen or Damned would be undiplomatic.

"More for villains than heroes," the Black Queen said, "but it's best steered clear of across the board. Sharp irony tends to ensure."

"I will keep it in mind when dealing with Named," Cordelia replied.

It was useful information and there was no denying that in these matters Catherine Foundling was a great deal more learned than Frederic Goethal, who Cordelia had attempted to learn from only to find his knowledge of the affairs of Chosen to be rather shallow. The likes of the Peregrine and the Black Queen seemed, unfortunately, to be quite rare.

"Might be useful for you to keep in mind period," the queen drawled.

"While I appreciate the implicit compliment, I am not Chosen," Cordelia flatly said.

The other woman leaned back into her seat, inside that campaign tent of hers. She took up a goblet of what looked like that truly horrid orcish liquor – aragh – and knocked it back, offering a toothy smile afterwards.

"Maybe not right now," the Black Queen said. "But I wouldn't bet on that staying true forever. Vivienne tells me you've gotten Levant back into a semblance of order."

The heiress to Callow would have read the report earlier. It seemed an odd change of subject, but likely wasn't. These little detours were a staple of conversation with Catherine Foundling, she had learned.

"Lady Itima's contributions were key," Cordelia said. "But I will agree that the Dominion has somewhat stabilized."

"Yeah," the Queen of Callow drawled, rolling her eye. "I'm sure Itima Ifriqui was the one who came up with that oath and propaganda plan. Seems right up her alley, that play."

Cordelia's lips thinned.

"You have a point, I imagine?"

"You got Levant in order," the Black Queen said. "You're keeping Procer from falling apart and taking the lead in the fight against the Dead King. There's a title for someone who does that, Hasenbach."

Ah, were they now dispensing with titles? Foundling usually on began that a few drinks in.

"Is there?" the First Prince replied, skeptical.

"Sure," Foundling shrugged. "Warden of the West. What a fun coincidence that you happen to already bear it."

"That door lay open before me once," Cordelia coldly said. "I did not step through the threshold. It is not a choice I regret."

"You didn't take the Name, maybe," the Black Queen said. "But the Role, you made it yours anyway. There's not a pie west of the Whitecaps you don't have your finger in. Might take a year, might take twenty, but Creation will answer to the truth of that."

She smiled, looking fearsome and sympathetic both.

"You can swim against the river all you like, Cordelia Hasenbach," she said. "It won't get tired before you do."

The genuine sympathy in the other woman's voice made it a harder blow than if she'd been cruel. It sounded like something she truly did believe. And though this talk of Name and Role was... esoteric, there seemed to be some manner of logic to it. However tortured. And though you are a madwoman, Catherine Foundling, Cordelia thought, you might just be the cleverest madwoman alive. This was not an assertion to be lightly dismissed.

"I will heed your warning," the First Prince said, politely calling the subject to a close.

Foundling nodded, looking almost nonchalant. She was... loose tonight, Cordelia decided. Less controlled than usual. And for all her drinking and seeming carelessness, the Black Queen usually kept close mastery of herself. This, though, seemed unguarded.

"Does Sahelian's betrayal truly trouble you so?" the fair-haired princess quietly asked. "You told me of its coming months ago."

"It stings," Catherine Foundling artlessly confessed. "I didn't think it would. Wasn't sure it would, maybe."

"And still you went forward with this scheme," Cordelia said. "Why? There are less convoluted ways to take revenge, Foundling. And I did not question your plans, for this is an affair of Named and Callowan besides, but I will admit I find what I know of this to be baffling."

The one-eyed queen's lips quirked. That had, somehow, pleased her to hear. She truly took as compliments the strangest of things.

"It's not just about revenge," the Black Queen said. "It's... hard to articulate."

Cordelia was not so sure. She thought it might instead be that it was the simplest thing to articulate in the world, but that the queen across the mirror would resist speaking those words to the bitter end. It was a shocking thought, that Catherine Foundling might have affections for the woman that'd destroyed Liesse, but in a way fascinating as well. Cordelia was not certain whether it was the tint of tragedy to the whole affair or simply that she had never before met someone with such spectacularly terrible taste in women before, but the perhaps the truth lay somewhere in the middle.

"A strange revenge indeed, to return her home and to the Tower's service after having been one of your inner circle," Cordelia mildly said. "Unless you have sabotaged her prospects?"

The Black Queen grinned, a vicious slice of ivory.

"Oh, not at all," Catherine Foundling said. "She is going to get everything that she ever wanted."

The queen poured herself another cupful of liquor.

"But that's the thing with Praes, see," she continued. "You get whatever you want, but never the way you want it."

"It is your campaign to lead," Cordelia finally said. "And I cannot gainsay your results so far."

"It'll be a battle next," Foundling opined. "A convergence. The fate of Praes going forward is going to be wrestled over. And after that..."

"Ater," the First Prince completed.

"It ends there," the Black Queen said. "I'll get it done, Cordelia. I know the stakes. I'll muster the East and we'll come with its full array of war."

And the truth was that the First Prince believed her. Because the two of them had grown beyond enmity, even as enemies, and though they were not friends – would never be – a trust had grown between them. You could only share the burden of the world on your back with someone for so long before you took to them, even a little.

"We don't have long left," Cordelia quietly admitted. "We are giving ground on all fronts now. And the southern principalities are beginning to buck my authority, slowly but surely. I expect there will be defections before you return."

There was only so long people were willing to have the lifeblood squeezed out of them to support a war they'd never seen with their own eyes. And though Cordelia had pushed through the Highest Assembly measures that would buy the realm a few more months, the hard measures she'd relied on to see it done had made her enemies.

"You're keeping up the sky with your back, Hasenbach," the Black Queen replied, tone oddly gentle. "I don't expect the impossible of you. If it were anyone else in your seat, this war would already be lost."

"We might lose it anyway," Cordelia said, and hesitated.

It was now, she thought or never.

"The ealamal," the First Prince said. "I want to find out what it does with Judgement silenced. In case..."

In case they lost the war, she left unsaid. The Black Queen grimaced.

"You want a test," she said.

Cordelia nodded. Added nothing more.

"Fuck," Catherine Foundling cursed, leaning back into her seat.

There was a long moment of silence.

"Crows take me. Do it."

Droughtbringer

Go vote! Go boost! Go click buttons!!

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Insanenoodlyguy

"The Primal Hunter is looking for the boost. ."

Cordelia carefully set down the cup, painted porcelain of exquisite delicacy. She did not ask whether or not her webmaster was certain, as it would be an insult to the both of them.

"Has he found it?" she asked instead, forcing calm.

"I believe not," Louis de Sartrons replied. "A Salvos was caught in second and Six chances was seen in third but the practical guides lead has not been breached."

topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil

nimelennar

Huh. I neither would have guessed Cordelia would consult with Cat about the weapon, nor that Cat would agree. The former mostly because of the latter.

I mean, I guess she has to concede that they do need a back-up plan in case "Conquering Praes and stealing its diabolists" doesn't work, but given how much she's disliked the idea in the past, it seems a sudden shift.

I guess the war is just going that badly.

saithorthepyro

The war is essentially doomed at this point. Their campaign that was supposed to end the threat of the bridge that was terminal to the war ended with the bridge destroyed but was otherwise a massive failure and even without the ticking time bombs that are the hell gates the Dead King has pushed them to the last natural or man-made barriers capable of holding him outside of the breadbaskets of Procer. If it falls militarily the grand alliance is done for. Cat also probably realizes that Cordelia is probably going to be desperate enough to do tests anyway even if she was willing to approach Cat first about them.

308924810a

I personally am of the opinion that the correct choice is to skip the testing and just shove the thing through Twilight into the Serenity to fire it at full power. If it works, great, if it doesn't/backfires destructively, we can hope it won't matter.

Liliet

I don't think that's logistically as simple as you're proposing.

Though the idea is interesting!

shikkarasu

In Regard:

"He'd hardened the metaphysical borders with Arcadia after she'd slipped through there the third [time Ranger infiltrated]"

Ironically, if Ranger hadn't told him about that weakness 40+ years ago it would have worked perfectly. As it stands, Indrani would need to match/surpass her teacher in matters of infiltration for this to be viable.

Liliet

That's for Keter, not Serenity.

Cpt. Obvious

And it has been said that the roads of Twilight lead to more places than you think. So is it not quite likely that it's possible to gate from Twilight directly into the plane of hell that the Dead King appropriated and calls Serenity?

ArkhnIX

I think in many ways, they are treating this like the Atom bomb was treated. You're facing a deadly enemy, you fear what happens if you can't stop them, and you already know that you will face a massive loss of life without it. At that point, you're desperate to end things, so you decide to have the fallback option in case things go wrong.

I don't quite think Cat or Cordelia will pull a Truman, as that isn't quite in their natures, but the potential is there, and that is what will be interesting to see going forward.

Liliet

From my knowledge of history, that was super not what happened with Japan.

That's all I want to say.

JRogue

That is not at all how that happened.

Both the United States and Japan knew that Japan has lost the war. It was just a matter of what Japan was going to do about it. How long was it going to last? Japan could surrender or they could fight to the bitter end. Japan choose to fight until the bitter end.

President Truman knew exactly how destructive the A-bomb was, he called it "the most terrible bomb in the history of the world.", and later wrote, "It is an awful responsibility that has come to us,". It had been tested extensively and reports told him that it could level an entire city. There were no surprises for Truman.

So, since Japan had decided to fight, Truman had a few options. 1. Keep up conventional bombing, 2. invade Japan by ground, 3. demonstrate the A-bomb at an unpopulated area, or 4. drop it directly on the population of Japan. Truman and his advisors decided, in the end, that nothing more than an actual demonstration would force the hand of the Japanese leadership.

About 120,000 people were killed instantly between the two bombs, and tens of thousands more would die within the year. These numbers are considered conservative.

Truman never shirked his decision, always saying it was ultimately his to make, but he never apologized either. It was his opinion that he saved American lives at the cost of Japanese lives and that more than the total death toll of the bombs would have been lost between both sides by a ground invasion. Truman said of himself, "And he alone, in all the world, must say Yes or No to that awesome, ultimate question, 'Shall we drop the bomb on a living target?'" , and although they have had the same power, no other President has exercised it.

AI

Truman never made a decision to drop the bomb. The only decision he made with regard to the atomic bomb was to stop dropping them without his express permission after he was surprised by how soon the second one was dropped.

For most of the people involved, using the bombs was just the natural consequence of developing them in wartime. The people running the project were actually worried the war might end before they could use one, and they would then end up having to justify the ridiculous amount of money spent on the project without tangible results to show for it.

Sources in the 'website' box and on the rest of that site.

AbraKadabra

The real irony is that Japan did not surrender because of the bombs. They lost a hundred thousand people, so what? They lost the same amount in the firebombing of Tokyo. The actual reason was that the soviets attacked in the continent and they defeated the 1 million strong japanese land forces in one week. That is the real shock to a military junta not the loss of civilians. So they capitulated, citing the bombs as reason for several reasons one is that american occupation was preferable to a soviet one and the ruins of their army delayed the soviets enough to ship in american forces. The second reason is that they attempted to preserve national pride. "No we did not get defeated on the Field, we surrender because of our enemies dont fight fair." Which neatly ties into the victim pose, Which evolved later.

John

Practicality, straight out of the title. Classical heroic OR villainous behavior leans a lot more heavily on "no plans, no prototype, no backup." Field-testing and debugging your superweapon under controlled conditions, instead of waiting for the last minute and leaving success or failure almost entirely up to the divine power of narrative, is part of the core of what they've both been fighting for, going back at least to the start of Amadeus's reforms of the Legions of Terror.

TeK

She mainly disagreed because dhe believed (much like Black Knight) that the victory can be achieve by the conventional force of arms, and so using a doomsday weapon will inevitably kick up the story into the rungs of cosmic horror. After Hainaut, however, it's already there. The Hashmalim rained down the star on earth, while the Dead King answered by opening not one, not two but three bloody permanent Hellgates. The metaphorical cat is out of metaphorical bag. There is much less reason to hesitate now.

Konstantin von Karstein

It was the Ophanim who destroyed Hainaut 😊 Hashmalim are from Contrition.

Deworld

Nah. It could be a part of the reason, but her main reasons to dislike were 1. Cordelia's secrecy around the weapon, 2. Unknown mechanisms of its working, as well as a potential threat to the whole continent, 3. Cat's general dislike to angels after the First Llesse.

Liliet

Cat's general dislike of angels was BECAUSE of understanding how they can easily be unrestrained weapons of mass destruction. It's not a grudge, it's a highly justified wariness, which brings us back to cosmic horror.

Miley

Praes' Dianolists are as Callow's weather.

Not easily stolen.

nimelennar

A shame they don't have a Thief anymore.

edrey

haha, i knew it. it's about Akua.

"The last is strangest, she said to them
The easiest and the most solemn
For when the tower is yours to claim
You will have forgotten why you came."

now let's watch the angelic fireworks.

Xinci

Aid fits Frederics role quite well. May also make him actually quite useful in peace time which fits the origin of the Name

So if the Angels are blocked and the angel corpse is just unguided power. One could probably bind a pattern like the Smite Masego figured out with Tariq. Other spells too probably, honestly a lot of potential is there if you are basically using a font of power.

Big I

I'd be surprised if Frederic survives this war. I'm expecting him to go full Fisher King and sacrifice himself to bring life back to the dead lands.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but Tariq is dead and Cordelia is (quite reasonably) not going to let Masego within scrying distance of that weapon, let alone eyeshot.

Linus42

Cordelia is still salty I see. I am not sure the Heroes are all that unified but I don't disagree with the main conclusion that Hanno could probably take control. Beyond that I am not sure how a test proves that Bard cannot modify it. With no Name around for the test and Procer's quality of casters, Bard could easily do whatever she wants undetected or simply not intervene now to bait them into thinking she cannot mess with this weapon only to show up for real when its actually used. Beyond that testing it risks detection. But I agree overall you kinda have to test your super weapon before you use it even if the test will be inconclusive. Still everyone is getting pushed you can win every battle and still lose the war, attrition is hard to overcome even without your opponent having a chance to get stronger everytime they kill one of your troops.

nick012000

The Intercessor can only intervene when Named are involved. If it's just ordinary mages and clerics carrying out the tests of the superweapon, she wouldn't be able to show up to intervene.

laguz24

Yeah, but it's not just mages and clerics it's done on the orders of the warden of the west, it's a thread that she can ride.

Konstantin von Karstein

Cordelia isn't the Warden of the West yet, and Bard can only interact with Named. She can't just appear to some random minion without any weight, which any personnel working on the weapon would be.

She could ask some Named to interfere with the test on her behalf, but all T&T Named were warned of her. Maybe if she pull out of nowhere a Named good enough to do that, but that's unlikely.

Adrian V

Not exactly right, she can also intervene in important EVENTS, or with peroson with important roels even without a name (Cordelia is a good example right now).

I think the use of a superweapon fills all the boxes for her

Linnus42

Not really she is mostly limited to Names alone. But big enough events allow her a door see her interacting with Sve Noc and Cat when they didnt have Names. Still my point is Bard has no inclination to show up for a test trial, I would expect actually using the weapon to give a big enough door.

shikkarasu

Agreed. It is in her best interest to convince Cordelia that the weapon is foolproof, assuming that Bard can sabotage it. That way she can cause it to backfire only in the moment when it matters most. Not to mention that Bard can then tap into the "The first step always works" narrative. The test is the 'first step' for Cordelia, and the sabotage would be the 'first step' for the Bard. The second use of the weapon will have less narrative impact (sort of like why no-one wanted the Severance to be used before it cut the Dead King) and Bard tampering with the weapon will never again be so successful as the first time she tries to.

beleester

The Intercessor can also intervene where Angels are involved. Their theory is that she can't intervene with Judgement because Judgement is sealed, but they haven't tested that. And even if she doesn't intervene in the test firing, that doesn't prove she can't – she could have simply chosen not to act.

Xinci

I think its more that she naturally comes to times/places of narrative weight. Remmeber how she gets teleported near Hannos band in the free cities?

It may be more that Named simply have more weight so she has more interactions and thus ability to influence them. Sve Noc wasnt Named yet but their situation had a lot of weight due the fate of their entire people riding on it.

I think she might not interfere since she may still want Catherine over anything else at the moment.

Sintonir

They are not trying to test if Bard can modify it, they are trying to test if it does anything at all in the current circumstances.

edrey

i make me wonder, why dont just make the test in the Ways, where Dk cant go and there is anyone? there the bard cant do anything.

Sintonir

I don't think, testing it in the Ways is an option. It might change the results, and it is also threat to Ways if the test goes badly.

Deworld

Also, it's a freaking angel corpse. The logistics of its transportation are unknown (and likely pretty difficult), and moving it into a different dimension is even more problematic in a lot of ways.

Liliet

That's why they're still treating the weapon as a last resort "after we've already lost the war" option.

That Other Guy

Maybe Bellepheron (sp?) could be the Bikini Atoll. It clears up 10000 headaches, and it's less likely DK would get his bony little fingers on it than if it was trialled near the front.

Yes, it'd be appalling. That's why you get the Barrow Sword to do it. He's good that way

Earl of Purple

Given the weapon fires Judgement, and the Choir that power would come from is still neutered by a scion of Bellerophon, I cannot see that going well for anybody.

Liliet

The Barrow Sword is on Cat's front. Logistically difficult.

Also, I'm having a hard time appreciating the joke part of the idea. Too close to how it happens in real life.

Abrakadabra

I am still waiting for Bellerophon to join the fight against DK. You know, they all about resisting tyrants and equal freedom for all.

Well there is a thing about tyrants and slaves, they all die eventually. In death all are equal.

But if the DK wins everyone will be his slave.

Forever.

jamesc9

> In death all are equal.

This crosses the ways in which any measurement of currently living people underestimates inequality. If we assume that genetic individuality matters, then the (non-)descendants of people who were genocided are worse off than the descendants of the tyrant who did it.

Abrakadabra

My take on it is that the one WHO would be controlled is Hanno instead of the weapon.

Juff

Typo Thread:

and tall the walls > and how tall the walls to fortress > to the fortress (also, shouldn't it be away from, since it's cringing)

was south of Bremen (maybe "just south of bremen")

do doubt > no doubt

Rising her saddle > Rising in her saddle then Principate > then the Principate but feeling > but feel universal surprised > universal surprise moment of sitting > a moment of sitting shark cheekbones (should this be stark) was was > was well-know > well-known usually on began > usually only began

aurikdomi

I wonder if they will try to test it in secret or try to use it against the dead armies directly as the test. Also I think the story is headed towards Black's death because of the previous chapter. Catherine confirmed she wants to put her father in the tower, but we also can basically confirm the song will end with Akua in the tower instead. Ergo for Cat to accept anyone other than black in that role he might have to die. idk just conjecture.

Liliet

Amadeus doesn't want the Tower, he wants it destroyed. Even if Akua really is the subject of the song, doesn't mean her staying there is endgame.

Raven

I still think cat is going to end up on it somehow.

Obvious choice I know, but I just can't help but think it

Deworld

Cat as Dread Empress would be terrible, both for her and for Praes. You need a decent skill to survive the snake pit that is Highborn society, more so to rule it. An outsider like Cat just can't have it, not to mention she wouldn't be respected by High Lords due to her heritage. Power can only take her so far. Maybe with a skilled trustworthy Chancellor, she could manage to keep her reign for some time, but the only person who comes at least somewhat close to this description is Akua, and at this point, it's better to make her straight-up Dread Empress.

Frivolous

I laughed at this, though it is bad form to use the word 'before' twice in the same sentence:

"or simply that she had never before met someone with such spectacularly terrible taste in women before"

I hadn't anticipated that Akua would return to the Sahelian fold, at least not so soon. I thought she'd sulk for a while. She must have been planning what to do in case Catherine rejected her.

I guess Otto Redcrown must be dead? According to the text above, he carried his crown to its end. If so, that's sad. No more Reitzenbergs.

It's nice to know one of Freddy's aspects anyway. Aid is a surprisingly subtle and humble power.

I'm surprised Yannu survived a hit from the Hawk. Even the Mirror Knight almost died from that.

I wonder if Catherine could break the impasse between Judgement and the Hierarch by simply Speaking to one or both and telling them to Shut up.

Catherine can command angels because she's done it before. She can command the Hierarch because he's Named.

Liliet

I'm assuming the reason Akua went to talk to Cat was that she was REALLY tempted to return and that conversation was the last chance she'd given herself to stay.

Leventide

"or simply that she had never before met someone with such spectacularly terrible taste in women before"
Oof

nimelennar

She says, very shortly after noting that Cat is attracted to her.

Burlyraven

Listen, there was a lot of good stuff in this chapter, but I'm genuinely just kind of giddy to get some Kingfisher content (and actually finally get one of his aspects revealed).

beleester

Kingfisher is a boss.

"The Morgentor didn't fall. We didn't retreat. We advanced southwards to prepare for a strike on Keter."

Skaddix

Reminds me of Warhammer and Cadia

Liliet

Important facts this chapter:

- Frederic's Aspect! And it's a compulsion to help when he can god bless this pure soul ♥ Wonder if this was itching when he got Cat to talk to Red Axe, too.
- Formal congratulations to Rozala Malanza/Louis Rhanon shippers!
- Cordelia is handling Levant and the Free Cities in Cat's absence, god bless her ♥ ...aaand Cat thinks a previously not taken

Name can come back around if you're still doing a matching Role.
FASCINATING ISN'T IT, Black Queen?

– On which note, Cat just thoroughly sank the argument that the “no Named rulers” clause is in any way reasonable because “they can just refuse Names”. Yeah... no, and Cat herself says so.

– Cordelia confirmed for (1) being a “can’t look away from the trainwreck someone pass the popcorn” Catkua fan, (2) dressing to catch Cat’s eye when she’s due to meet her, (3) monitoring whether or not Cat looks “striking” at the moment. Dunno about y’all but personally I am having an EXCELLENT time.

– BELLEROPHON, MOTHER OF FREEDOM!

Liliet

* Rohanon

SpeckofStardust

Cat has long passed the black queen in terms of role, Cordelia hasnt left the role that first lead to the name offer, cat has very much left the role of being the Black Queen, her queenship is the least important thing, high priestess of the drow and top dog of the villains of the grand alliance has made her effectively the person with the most authority considering she is effectively has no one above her, even her goddess treat her less like a servant and more like a co-conspirator, where when she was going to be the black queen was basically an upgraded black knight a servant that gets to rule instead of as a weapon second to an empress but still ultimately a servant (if highly likely to betray said empress which you know cause evil).

Like heck last chapter even if everyone told her to forgive Akua she would in fact refuse why? Because no one has authority over her. Which is very different from the cat that let Akua rule one of her cities because of “rules”.

Liliet

Yes, but all that is still called “Black Queen” by everyone else is the thing. The meaning of the words has shifted.

lolo96

Queen means ruling a kingdom and Cat doesn’t plan to do that. You can argue she is ruling Named but eh. I don’t see that. Also EE said Cat getting Odin look is related to her Name and Black Queen doesn’t bring the Odin image.

Sinead

I would say that the Story of the Black Queen has changed.

Before it was the story of a Black Queen reviled by her people and her enemies (do you think Callow would have swallowed second Liesse going unpunished?).

Now she is the Black Queen because she holds the right to Rule to such a degree that half the champions of the gods fall under her ageis, and the other half stand down. While Cordelia has her hands full juggling the politics of the West, Cat's own influence is equally broad in scope when it comes to non-Proceran polities.

Since second Liesee, she has gained the formal acknowledgement of Edward VII basically spiritually legitimizing her rule, before then getting further recognition of authority from both the drow and Named. The remnants of the Name that was preserved in her legacy (ever since she was Countess of Marchford) grew from different soil. The Role has been redefined, but the Name still fits.

I liked the idea of a different Name because I thought it would be interesting for Cat to get a Neutral Role.

However, her being such a big Boss of Evil that she still gets to kill demons would also be great.

Liliet

Exactly this! People put different meaning in the same words. They get to be... reused.

Nope

Warlord of the East would have interesting symmetries with Warden of the West, and Cat has been called warlord before...

mindsword2

I am still expecting the Angel Weapon to be fired at Cat and her band after they defeat the Dead King.

jamesc9

Ok. In what ways are you expecting it to function and misbehave?

Xinci

I am curious if the Lycaonese as a sub-culture are already doomed. Most of the elders who would carry on their traditions are dead. Now it looks like the more fit adults will die. Without a proper propagation being maintained the youth of their people wont really have too much of a identity. They may still sorta exist in the future but its entirely possible that they would be assimilated and exist as a even smaller sub-group or have the same name but little sustained connection to their original culture. I due to no one being around who actually remembers it. I am also curious about if all these lycaonese being dead will lead to eventual Named as fewer and fewer of them are around to share the weight.

Sinead

That is a good point. It would depend on what the reclamation process of the Northern territories would look like as well for time scale.

I think what you might see is the melding of Brus and Lyconese influence, since Fredrick "opened the borders" to the northern refugees. You may see that Brus becomes an "honorary Northerner", and that the repopulation of the North will reflect this cultural shift.

Also, since this will end with a change in the status quo against the Dead King (and if the drow are still able to keep pressure on the ratlings, a change against the Hunger), you will still see a massive cultural shift as the two defining pressures on the culture ease off.

MephInBlack

The Forgetful Librarian slowly arouses my suspicions. Cordelia already had a well working staff but since she got the FL services we see her relying on them more and more. Let's not forget it is a villain we are talking about, and as the Saint of Swords depicted with the tale about the Salutary Alchemist this is not irrelevant.

Sinead

While this is true, Cat was also heard, and acknowledged, Lawrence's point. I would not be surprised if Cat is able to keep things from getting out of hand.

Aiden

I am really interested in what name Cat eventually claims. Maybe just Queen since she isn't particularly black anymore I don't think. Definitely pragmatic but not really evil.

Openendings

It's been said before, and it's too silly to really work, but as Amadeus's greatest student in pragmatism and story logic, and as a bleeding-heart "why can't we all stop being idiots?" type who is mentoring even Cordelia on name-lore, if anyone deserves the Name of Practical Guide... ^_^

hakureireimu

Arch Villain has been my prediction since book 5.

Liliet

Now Black just refers to her clothing style.

Which she doesn't even like.

Whoops.

Deworld

Nah, she's still pretty "Black". She is representative of villains, openly admits Below as her backers, wields powers of goddesses born out of murder and theft, and has a pretty dreadful reputation she supports with her actions more often than not.

DC

Abigail remains the best character in the series for the simple reason that every offhand mention of her brings to mind an entire chapter's worth of misadventures.

Rey d`Tutto

Abigail deserves a spin-off

sadfan

Alas, alack, the weapon has only one round of ammunition

superkeaton

A gun is not set up to go unfired. And a nuke is not made to be unused.

It's adorable that Cordelia can see the love in Cat for Akua.

jerdenizen

I find it interesting how Cordelia assumes that only Named have to worry about tropes, and based on the story so far I don't think that's actually true. It is amusing that so few people seem aware of this kind of thing (she only lists the Pilgrim and Cat), but it does make sense to keep your genre savvy to yourself if you want to make use of it.

Interlude: East I

"As a rule, principles are trouble. If you have them, unprincipled men will despise you. If you do not have them, principled men will despise you. My advice, my son, is therefore to choose terribly mediocre principles but keep to them religiously."

– Extract from the infamous 'Sensible Testament' of Basilea Chrysanthe of Nicae

"And the nature of her alliance with the First Prince?"

Akua Sahelian had found that betrayal was not unlike putting on an old dress. The cut did not quite fit as it would have once did, but there was a certain comfort in the... familiarity of the object. Sargon had been dear enough to grant her use of the family's finest scrying mirrors – ancient artefacts, tall as a man and twice as broad – so the illusion that she was seated at a table in the same council room as the Dread Empress of Praes was rather convincing. The clarity of the spell allowed for the game to be played as if they were in person, Malicia reading her face as she read Malicia's. It was rather invigorating to fence this way with a woman of the empress' calibre.

"Largely a result of common interests," Akua said. "There is a surprising degree of trust there, but that is not unexpected after Catherine's restraint during the Peace of Salia."

Callow had been well positioned to extort Procer when the time had come for bargaining. There was not much the First Prince could have afforded to do but bend, given the imminent collapse of her realm if she did not, but Catherine had instead chosen to court goodwill. Given how important the trust between the two greatest rulers of the Great Alliance had become, and the veiled frustration on Malicia's face when she spoke of Procer, Akua was inclined to believe it had been the right decision to make.

"There has been some method to her recklessness," Malicia conceded. "Your opinion, then, on her relationship with Yannu Marave and Itima Ifriqui?"

Oh my, she truly was frustrated. Mentioning those two names – the two heads of the great lines of the Blood that were not Catherine's informal pupils – was a tacit admission that Malicia was trying to get a peace here in Praes by getting the broader Grand Alliance to twist Callow's arm into accepting it. No doubt she'd already tried Cordelia Hasenbach and been rebuffed, so she was now looking for other angles of approach. Unfortunately for the empress, the Dominion was dead grounds in this regard.

"She is highly respected, due to her role in the Grey Pilgrim's resurrection after the Princes' Graveyard," Akua said. "I don't believe she has spoken much with the Lady of Vaccei at all, but she has a solid accord with Lord Yannu."

Akua decided to keep it up her sleeve that not a single one of the Blood would dare to cross Catherine at the moment. Not while she had the Barrow Sword at her side and they very much wanted to avoid her protection of him extending beyond the confines of the war. If she kept meddling in the politics of Levant that might change, but for now having both fear and respect at her back meant that Malicia would find no purchase with the Levantines. It might be amusing to see her fail in the attempt, however, so Akua offered her empress a pleasant smile instead of potentially useful information.

"Her talent for ingratiating herself to key individuals is proving to be an obstacle," Malicia deplored.

And perhaps Akua would have agreed, as a girl, when she could only think of strength through the Empire's conception of it. An outlook that would claim Catherine was ahead because of a superior quality. In this case, Malicia seemed to have decided it was talent for making alliances at the highest rungs of power. To triumph over her the Dread Empress would have to bring her own superior qualities to bear and decisively beat her opponent. Yet the old certitudes no longer rang so true. Praes is so deeply despised out west nowadays that Hasenbach could not agree to a bargain even if it were advantageous, Akua thought. That is not of Catherine's making.

The Dread Empress had won too many battles, ceasing to question if they needed to be fought at all. Victory was a heady brew, Akua knew better than most, but she was surprised that Malicia would fall prey to such a mistake. The empress had always struck her as being an exquisitely self-controlled woman. Then again, the Carrion Lord was involved. It was always harder to see clearly when the cut was so close to the heart.

Akua knew that too, and learned the lesson roughly enough it still left the edges of her raw.

"The Dead King has forced together strange alliances," she simply said.

Malicia looked amused, understanding the sentence for the veiled reference that it was.

"How have you found the body?" the empress asked.

Akua closed the fingers of her right hand into a fist, enjoying the sensation of skin on skin. It had been almost overwhelming at first: her time as a shade had blurred the memory of what sensations actually felt like. Returning to the real thing after the pale shadow she'd lived with had needed some adjustment. There was an even greater boon attached, of course. Akua murmured a single word in the mage tongue, opening her hand into a flat palm, and a dot of hellfire bloomed above it.

"More than satisfactory," she said. "A princely gift, Your Dread Majesty."

"I reward loyalty, Warlock," Malicia smiled. "And sometimes even the anticipation of it."

The Named being spoken aloud earned a small shiver from Akua every time. She was not a claimant for it, not yet, but Creation was recognizing the... possibility. That the potential was there. Neither of them mentioned the spells Malicia's mages had hidden that would allow the empress to kill her with a word, though they both knew they were somewhere in the flesh. As always, the Dread Empress' words had two meanings: if loyalty earned reward, then disloyalty earned punishment. The mere anticipation of it would too, as Malicia had subtly warned.

"I've no doubt ours will be a close relationship, Your Dread Majesty," Akua lied.

"Oh, I agree," Malicia lied back.

The empress deigned to take a sip from her cup, some dark liquor cut with water.

"My decision to place trust in you is why I have decided to assign you to the Black Knight's command for the coming battle," Malicia continued. "Your unique insights into the adversary will be of great use, I am sure, but I most look forward to seeing your magic on display once more."

A transparent enough ploy, but that was on purpose: the empress was asserting control. As the first measure of that control, she wanted Akua to kill enough of the Army of Callow with sorcery that the bridge back to that side would be forever burned. There was not a ruler worth their salt on the continent that did not know Catherine Foundling loved her soldiers just as fiercely as they loved her.

"Of course," Akua replied, not batting an eye. "In that spirit, I would seek your permission to obtain artefacts from my cousin. The Sahelian arsenal is best put to your service, not left to gather dust."

"If he is amenable, I don't see why not," Malicia smiled.

A lie, Akua decided. The answer had been too smooth, too unthinking. Sargon must have already been given strict instructions about the calibre of what he was allowed to lend her. The empress feared she might be able to slip the leash too early, then. Interesting.

"My thanks," she said, bowing her head.

"Think nothing of it," the empress dismissed. "Are you confident, with such aid, of being able to match the Hierophant on the field?"

"It would depend on the amount of magic he first ingests with Devour," Akua said, feigning reluctance. "I have not seen his upper limit as a thaumatophage. Placing mage circles under my command or moving me to Marshal Nim's side early so that I might begin preparing rituals would increase my chances."

She liked Masego. He was a fascinating conversationalist and Akua had something of an inherited fondness for tactless mages. It had been marrying convenience to her own preference to lie about his abilities. With the Tower under the impression that he could simply suck dry entire battalion of mages if they were in sight, he'd be treated as an entity to be avoided instead of a Named that could be fought. And if Malicia's most sensible answer to this was placing greater power in the hands of another special asset – like an incipient Warlock, just for example – then was it not the best of both worlds? The Dread Empress studied her for a moment, then conceded with the slightest movement of the head.

"I will speak with my Black Knight," Malicia said, committing to nothing. "Expect to depart soon."

A moment passed.

"Great gifts bring the expectation of great results, Warlock," the empress added.

Meaning that should she be granted her request failure to match the Hierophant would have... consequences. Ah, how very old-fashioned of her. Akua found it rather charming.

"That is only natural," Akua easily replied.

The empress chuckled. It was a languorous sound, and though it had little effect on her Akua could appreciate the artistry as a fellow seductress. Dread Empress Malicia was almost inhumanly beautiful, of course, but in truth that ran rather somewhat contrary to Akua's tastes. She had spent many years surrounded by the perfect and the splendid, eventually growing tired of the fare. She preferred character nowadays, the interestingly imperfect. The empress was simply too exquisite to qualify. Besides, women were rarely of interest to her. She could count on one hand the number she'd been attracted to. She caught the scent of smoke.

Looking down Akua saw her hand had closed into a fist, smothering the hellflame. She'd not even realized she'd done it. The growing pains of a new body, she told herself.

"I do enjoy conversing with you, Akua," Malicia lightly said. "They are always interesting, our little talks."

"I aim to please," she replied.

The empress smiled and Akua could feel the conversation was now to end. They had reached the end of their business for the day. And it was a whim, to ask, but she did not kill it when it rose. She had wondered from the moment she'd realized that work on the body awaiting her in the depths of the Empyrean Palace would have begun months before she ever set foot in Praes.

"How did you know?" Akua asked.

The Dread Empress of Praes studied her with dark eyes. Not a speck of gold in them. Blood as muddy as the land she'd been born of, running through the veins of the longest-reigning tyrant in the history of Praes.

"That I would turn on them," she said. "I did not, until the very end. How did you know?"

Dread Empress Malicia's smile was sad, she thought, and perhaps the sole genuine emotion she had shown this entire conversation.

"You came too late," the empress said. "Even if some loved you, and I expect they did. You came to them too late, Akua. They were never going to forgive you for what they might have forgiven each other. There was no becoming one of the five."

Her face went blank, like she was some kind of tipsy debutante. It was still better than the spasm of pain that would have shown on her face otherwise.

"In the end, darling, you were always going to come back," Malicia gently said. "This is the only home you have."

Sorcery rippled across the mirror, turning it back to simple polished silver, and Akua was left to wonder whether it had been kindness or an assertion of power to end the spell on that sentence. Perhaps a little of both, she decided. Though the dark-skinned woman knew she could have risen to her feet and distracted herself with movement, with pouring herself a cup of wine from the carafe or biting into a pear – the sheer pleasure of proper taste, after all this time – she did not. Instead she sat there and closed her eyes, thinking while it was all still fresh.

She had just fooled the empress successfully for the first time, after days of being interrogated for every scrap of knowledge on the Army of Callow and the Grand Alliance that she cared to divulge, but it did not feel like much a victory. She would admit it had been enjoyable, sparring with the empress. Sharpening iron with iron, the two of them knowing a single misstep would be enough for the other to pounce. Yet now that it was over, looking at what had been done, it felt... childish. Gaudy. No, neither of those were exactly right. More like she'd been indulging in something particularly-"Wasteful," Akua Sahelian murmured.

Scrapping iron for no real purpose save vanity. What had been gained from it all, really? They had circled each other like crocodiles snapping at each other's tails, a triumph only of showing teeth. If instead they had sat and spoken plainly for even an hour, understood where they differed and where they might concur, would it not have – ah, she thought. And there it was. That old Sahelian greed, whispering again in her ear: she had left the fire for the dark, but she wanted all the pleasures of both. Akua rose to her feet at last, drawing back the chair and gliding past the wine carafe. It was the long window at the back of the room she sought, great panes of glass that could be pushed open to pair a lazy evening breeze with the view. She leaned against the windowsill, enjoying to the touch of the wind on her face, and lost herself looking at the distant silhouettes of Zaman Ango. The ancient maze, the sloping pyramids of mud.

Malicia had been right, she thought. This was home. The warmth of the fire had lulled her into indolence, but she'd snapped out of it at last. She would not forget that moment in the cave, where it had at last sunk in that nothing would make a change. That Akua could turn on her family, on her people, on everything she believed in and had ever loved since she was a child, and still it would not be enough. Because her folly had been the doom of a city, of a hundred thousand souls, and while the Gods knew of forgiveness Catherine Foundling did not. Had that been the revenge, she'd wondered then? Making her... and then ripping away the curtain, leaving her to look a merciless truth in the eye.

Maybe it was. Dartwick had wounded more shallowly when she'd made her rip out the eye instead.

And the worst of it was that, even now, part of her ached to leave. To return. It would not go without comment, her absence, and yet Akua thought she might be able to talk her way out of the worst of it. And she'd still have the evenings spent designing wards with Masego, the drinks and lurid gossip with Indrani. Even those cautious, almost Praesi talks with Adjutant – who wanted to learn all she had to tell of the highborn of the Wasteland while giving back as little as he could for it. And another, of course, the one she'd left behind most of all.

Akua had thought to kill Catherine Foundling, once. To slay her and claim all she had built, perhaps even wearing her face. When she had still been a prisoner of the Mantle of Woe, sent back to the maddening boredom of nothingness in between brief tastes of Creation. Ah, but what interesting tastes they had been. Grandiose plans of war against half the continent, diplomacy with the most powerful people on Calernia. Then even more terrible sights, on the way to Keter. And even as she was dragged from wonder to wonder, there was the once-Squire in the middle of it all. Now a Black Queen, turned into everything Akua had thought she might become.

Fascination had been the doom of many a Sahelian.

"But it doesn't matter, does it?" Akua said to the wind.

There was no joy to chase at the end of that path. No long-awaited delight, nothing to suffer for. She would not be forgiven, and even a lifetime of saving strangers and helping fools would not see her redeemed in anyone's eyes. She had been chasing ghosts the entire time. So why stay? Why not come back to the home she had sold for nothing, to the destiny that had been taken from her? Warlock, yes, for that was Malicia's offer. But why stop there? Sargon wanted her to free him of the soulbox, and so she could use him to free this body from Malicia's yoke. Beyond the walls of Wolof, Praes was a cauldron about to tip over and in such chaos a clever woman could rise far. If she was to have a foot in the Tower, why not climb all the way to the top?

If none of it mattered, why should Akua Sahelian not get everything she deserved?

A voice she was learning to hate whispered that perhaps she already had. She ignored it. It was the voice of weakness, of the lion gone tame. She could see it in her mind's eye, the path up the stairs. It began with the Black Knight, Marshal Nim. The key to the Legions, not that Malicia seemed to have grasped that. Her only Black Knight before Nim had the loyalty of the Legions for having reformed them, but the bond ran deeper than that. Black Knights were the champions of the Tower, commander of armies and killers of heroes. There was a Role: Malicia had done more than simply name a new champion when she had recognized the ogre's claim. Should Marshal Nim prove less than utterly loyal, why, it might just be that the armies of Praes would split between following the old Black Knight and the new.

Did that not simply reek of opportunity? Yes, she decided, it was the beginning of a plan. One that would allow her to sit on the sole throne in all of Praes, before all was said and done.

So why, Akua Sahelian wondered, was she not hearing the song?

—

Amadeus had always enjoyed looking at the Hungering Sands as night fell.

It was a pleasure to the eye, the way the sky turned to vivid purples and yellows with not a cloud in sight. The way the shadows lengthened among the dunes like slithering snakes. Even the coolness was pleasant, when wearing a cloak. That much had been a necessity, given that it was only feasible to meet the woman he'd come to see under some cover of darkness. He'd not seen her in at least fifteen years, by Amadeus' reckoning, but neither of them would forget the other. Lady Layan Kaishi had once been Commander Layan of the Third Legion, before she came to rule a prosperous little town at the outskirts of the Hungering Sands.

She'd lost an arm at the siege of Laure, and not in a manner where it might be replaced, but the Legions had not abandoned her. When she'd sought a discharge and returned home to settle accounts with her family, 'volunteer legionaries on leave' had accompanied her. Lord Kaisha had fallen down some stairs, as had his young wife – Layan's own age, he'd heard – whose luck in birthing a son possessing the Gift had first seen Layan given the choice of the Legions or the grave. Some of those legionaries had even returned after their terms were over, stayed on as household guards, and though the holdings of Lady Layan were not large or rich they were known to be orderly. It'd drawn people to her town, as safety always did in troubled times.

Layan had not forgotten whose help it was that'd seen her made a lady: when Amadeus had contacted her, she'd agreed to lend a hand without hesitation. It had not been an onerous favour he asked for, anyway, simply the use of one of her family mages for a scrying ritual. Sometimes the dark-haired man wondered if anyone aside from Eudokia really grasped the sheer number of veterans he'd settled across the breadth of Praes. Most of them were not lords or ladies, of course – a campaign to stack the nobility with his veterans would have caused rebellion – but he'd seen to their livelihoods. Appointments in the local bureaucracies, free land leases in the Green Stretch, cushy posts in city guards or advantageous trade permits.

The Legions of Terror had bled for him across a dozen fields. Amadeus would not let their legionaries tumble into destitution after they left the ranks. And now, in his own time on need, he had found many doors still open to him. It was not the same as when he had been able to call on the Eyes, when Eudokia and Ime had left no stone unturned and council unheard, but he'd learned he still had friends in many places. Not a net of them, but it was better that way. Ime would have been able to infiltrate an organized apparatus, but she could not track entire decades of friendships and loyalties forged through two wars. So long as Amadeus remained quick and careful, so long as he kept moving, the Eyes would stay one step behind. It'd be enough.

In most fights, one step's worth of distance was all that he needed.

Layan had aged gracefully, hair threaded with silver and skin wrinkled but staying fit in form. She'd come to him out in the sands with her mage, as the odds were good that there was at least one traitor in her keep, but when they met she had hesitated before clasping the arm he offered. Amadeus's lips quirked in amusement. She had not been the first of his veterans to react this way.

"The beard?" he teased.

"And the grey," Layan admitted. "Never thought I'd see you with either, sir. No offence."

"None taken," he said. "You'd be surprised how many reacted the same."

She snorted.

"With all due respect, sir, no I wouldn't," Layan said.

For all the levity, her eyes had sharpened when he'd mentioned others. She hesitated, then spoke again.

"Is it true?" Layan asked. "That out west you made a claim on the Tower?"

"Rumours fly far and swift, I see," Amadeus noted.

"Rashan up north was a captain in the Fifth," Lady Layan said. "His kid and one of mine are married. Lady Salah's husband, out in Jubar, he's the brother of the Second's last quartermaster. We talk, sir. And not just us. There's a lot who came home after the wars who're still around. And a lot of us who have kin in the Legions and the Army."

It still filled Amadeus with a rueful sort of pride, every time he heard the army raised by Istrid's daughter and his own spoken of as a peer to the Legions he'd given so many years of his life to.

"I spoke words at the Peace of Salia," Amadeus said. "I stand by them still."

Layan Kaishi nodded, eyes hooded in the unfolding dark of the evening.

"There's a lot of us who'll come, if you call," she quietly said. "More than you know. Not just veterans and our families."

She hesitated.

"It can't go on like this, sir," Layan said. "This chaos. Ashur burns our coasts and now we play parlour games pretending they're allies?"

She spat to the side, into the sand.

"Fuck that," Layan cursed. "And whatever the Hells is happening with Sepulchral up north should have been stamped out years ago, not left to burn for whatever scheme this is. The empress is getting lost in her plots, sir. Doesn't matter she keeps winning, we're just tired of the games."

And in a way, Amadeus thought, those few sentences he'd just heard were the most damning a verdict passed on Alaya's reign he'd yet to hear. Because when the Tower was losing people like Layan, who was neither rebellious nor ambitious by nature, who most wanted out of a ruler competence and order, something had gone wrong. Were you always like this, Alaya, and I simply never wanted to see it? No, he did not believe that. They had lost perspective, over the years. He as much as she. They'd spent too long sitting on high seats, forgot what the view from the mud was like. Like all empires, like all rulers, they had reached their zenith and begun to decay. Old mistakes were yet in need of mending, and Amadeus of the Green Stretch would not relent until he had laid them all to rest.

That much he owed, to all and to himself.

"I am already a rebel, Layan," he faintly smiled.

"We can be too, if you want," his veteran boldly offered. "And there's enough of us we can get High Lady Takisha behind you if you toss her a few bones. It's not just us old hands who want an end to the messes. We've got support."

The High Lady of Kahtan would turn on him the very moment she felt she was in a position to claim the Tower for herself, of course. They both knew that without Layan needing to speak the words.

"Another banner raised won't end this," Amadeus gently declined. "But beyond your help tonight, there is something that can be done."

Layan Kaisha was almost seventy. She'd not been in the Legions of Terror for over twenty years. And still, the moment he finished that sentence, she snapped at attention like a cadet fresh off the College rolls. Some things just stay with us, don't they? he fondly thought. Amadeus understood. He, too, had never quite shaken the stray dog out of his bones. He still found it easier to bite than kneel.

"High Lady Takisha has gathered the nobles of the south to her court," he said. "Do not let them disperse. Take them north: Ater is where this all comes to a close."

Layan slowly nodded.

"So long as the Grey Eyries are rebelling and Old Wither's holed up in Foramen, many will balk at leaving the Sands," she said.

"The Tribes won't move," Amadeus said.

It was not a prediction or a promise. It was a statement of fact. Her eyes widened in surprise.

"Are they- no, best you don't answer that," she decided. "They can't get out of me what I don't know."

It was rather heartwarming to see that the safety protocols Ranker had designed were still being kept to. Her contributions to the Reforms had been more discreet than his or Grem's, but no less crucial for it.

"I'll spread the word, sir," Layan said. "We should have enough pull for it."

And Alaya would want the nobles close, even if she lost the battle taking shape in the depths of the Wasteland. The starker her disarray, the closer she would want them to the Tower: troublesome as they would be in its shadow, it was nothing to the trouble they would make out of her reach. So even if the Eyes learned he had a hand in this, and they would, Alaya would allow it. She would trust in her mastery of the Court to triumph against whatever scheme he might have arranged.

"There'll be a battle, before it ends," Amadeus said, offering his arm to clasp.

"Then we'll meet again, sir," Layan smiled, taking it. "I still fit in my armour."

She cast a look around, glossing over the young mage she'd brought as he requested – he had long prepared the ritual, needing only a word to begin – and casting about for another shadow in the gloom.

"I'd heard the Lady was with you," she said, a question in her tone.

"Ranger's out and about," he smiled. "Checking to see if there are any rats."

"I pity them if there are," Layan muttered.

With one last glance they parted ways, Amadeus sliding down the side of the hill to speak to the mageling in neat robes awaiting by a simple scrying bowl laid atop a rock.

"I can begin at your pleasure, my lord," the young man said. "Though the key you gave me is utter nonsense, so it ought to do nothing at all."

"Then it will do nothing," Amadeus serenely replied. "The spell, now."

Though somewhat put out, the young sorcerer duly spoke the incantation and the spell shivered across the air. When the water's surface rippled the mageling gaped in surprise. Amadeus' cool stare shook him out of it, making the dismissal clear. He bowed, then ran off after his aunt into the sands. The green-eyed man passed a hand through his hair, which he decided was getting a little too long, and waited for the ripples to cease. It took nearly a quarter hour for it to happen, and only then did a face appear in the water. Deep-set yellow eyes and wrinkled skin that looked like brown-green leather swam into focus.

High Lady Wither of Foramen, formerly Matron of the High Ridge Tribe, looked highly irritated until she realized who it was she was looking at. Then her face went blank, mouth closing shut with a snap.

"Good evening, Wither," Amadeus smiled, showing only the faintest slice of teeth. "It's been some time, hasn't it?"

The old goblin hissed in displeasure through her teeth, almost like a whistle. Obtaining the key to her private scrying bowl had not endeared him to her, evidently.

"Never long enough, Carrion Lord," she said. "Come to threaten me into changing sides?"

"I usually threaten only people I intend to later kill regardless," Amadeus noted. "Fear is a poor incentive for alliance. I suppose I could bluster a bit, if it will make you feel better about what is to follow."

"And what's that?" Wither mocked, flashing her teeth mockingly.

"I am going to tell you a story," Amadeus amiably said, "and you will then give me what I politely ask for."

"You're getting thick in your old age, Carrion Lord," Wither said. "My defences are fine enough Ranger didn't even try for my life when you two passed through Foramen. You have nothing to threaten me with, and any offer you make the Tower will double without batting an eye."

Ah, Wither. For all that she was the first Matron to truly enter the highest reach of Praesi politics, she'd yet to learn to think beyond the goblin conception of conflict. Amadeus had never attempted to lay a hand on the High Lady of Foramen because what he'd come for had been of much greater value than anything an assassination might bring about. The green-eyed man had promised his old acquaintance a story, however, and so he would tell it.

"After the fall of Summerholm, during the Conquest," Amadeus said, "it took less than six hours for the first rebel group to form."

Garrison soldiers and a hedge wizard that'd escaped the Fields of Streges, planning to go to ground until most of the Legions left the city and then strike out at the invasion's supply lines while the siege of Laure began. It had been a reasoned and practical plan, in Amadeus' opinion. He'd appreciated the professionalism of it. Unfortunately Wekesa had spared the mage on purpose at the Fields, marking him with a discreet tracking spell, so they'd all been executed after interrogation.

"Three more emerged the following day," he continued. "Even with Scribe personally overseeing the Eyes in the city, it quickly became clear that the situation was not tenable. Sooner or later we'd miss the cabals and the push against Laure would be endangered. Something needed to be done."

Some had suggested mass executions of former soldiers, but Amadeus had found that ill-advised. It would simply replace known possible insurgents with military training for thrice their number in grieving relatives inclined to methods of insurgency that were harder to put down. If not worse. Callowans had long proven that they were perfectly willing to torch their own towns and cities while invaders were in them, should they be pushed far enough.

"The grey's brought rambling with it," Wither snorted. "You're turning into a joke, Amadeus."

The dark-haired man's friendly smile did not waver.

"It occurred to me, then, that fighting the inevitable was pointless," he said. "There would be rebel cabals. This was not an issue, however, so long as they were manageable rebel cabals."

"So you started making your own rebel groups," Wither dismissed. "Where spies were in the ranks from the start. I know the tale, Carrion Lord. It's an old one – have you run out of cleverness, to be boasting of tricks decades old?"

"Ah," the Carrion Lord said. "So you do remember."

He cocked his head to the side.

"Why, then, did you old witches believe I wouldn't catch you out using the same trick?"

Wither's face went blank.

"Come now," Amadeus murmured. "Alaya never bothered to understand your people beyond the levers that could be used to move them, Wither, but I made a study of you. Did you really think I wouldn't figure out the Tribes have been making their own traitors for centuries?"

On the surface, the goblin custom of constant backstabbing and treachery was remarkably similar to broader Praesi philosophies: iron sharpening iron, echoes of jino-waza. But that was a surface resemblance only. Goblins always preferred taking from outsiders than each other. Competition was brutal within units – within a family, a tribe, within the Tribes – but unlike the governing philosophies of Praes the Tribes did have a concept of the 'common good' of their kind. They could and did sacrifice, if not for each other, then for the sake of their race. When the Goblin Rebellions became losing proposition, the Matrons always made the same decision: one or more turned traitor, the rest were butchered to appease the Tower.

There must always be someone in the Grey Eyries that Ater could deal with, else the talk might turn to annihilation instead of vassalage.

"You are grasping at straws," Wither dismissed, "your position has become des-"

"It was cleverly done," Amadeus honestly praised. "Whoever wins the war, wherever the balance of power lies, the Tribes will gain. Either Alaya keeps the Tower and you are confirmed the first High Lady of your kind, or the Grand Alliance prevails and the Confederation of the Grey Eyries is recognized as a sovereign nation by more than half the continent."

It had been, in that classically goblin way, a viciously executed gambit. Because whether it was Wither that was the face of goblinkind going forward or the Confederation, the 'loser' would have to be drowned in blood. The deception risked being found out otherwise, the truth that the Matrons had planned this entire civil war of theirs from the start and that Wither was still very much one of them.

"You have nothing," Wither said. "Not a thimble of proof to back this, because it is complete lunacy."

"You played it too straight, Wither," Amadeus told her, not unkindly. "That is what gave you away. We came to Foramen and there was not a single secret line of communication between you and the Matrons."

He saw the realization sink into her, the way her large eyes narrowed in dismay. They had overcorrected in cutting off ties entirely. The Matrons should have been secretly negotiating with Wither if this was a genuine civil war. They'd wholly cut ties because they did not want the Eyes to catch them talking and figure out the entire affair was a ploy, which had been the very detail to confirm for Amadeus that it was all a ploy. Alaya would understand it too, if it was brought to her. Wither knew that.

And so she knew that Amadeus now had his fingers around a throat: hers and all the Tribes'.

"You sat on that for more than a year," Wither finally said. "You've not simply been wandering around drinking and fucking the Lady of the Lake."

Well, he'd not done just that.

"In the spirit of our understanding," Amadeus amiably said, "I would like to make polite requests of you."

"What is it you want, Carrion Lord?" Wither hissed. "You've turned the knife enough for a night."

"I would like you to refrain from sallies outside your territory."

"Fine," Wither said, with ill grace.

"I would like use of your smuggling routes into Ater."

She began to speak, but Amadeus raised a hand to interrupt her.

"I know the Matrons' own were closed, but also Alaya left you your own as a reward," he said. "Don't bother."

Wither grunted.

"Anything else?" she mocked.

"Oh, just one last thing," Amadeus nonchalantly said.

The friendly smile turned thin and blade-like.

"I would like every last drop of goblinfire in possession of the Tribes."

Droughtbringer

Keep the Guide at the top!

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Sorry if this annoys anyone, but go boost!

Liliet

This is INDESCRIBABLY less annoying than the altered quotes versions others post -_- bless you for doing this

stevenneiman

Eh, I like the altered quotes better. Requires a little more creativity. Then again, I also unironically like Loss and Rickrolling, so I might just be weird. But either version is good to remind people to vote.

Liliet

I do like rickrolling and I hate loss so idk.

The altered quotes have an unpleasant tendency to use quotes that are otherwise meaningful/touching. Altering them to cheap jokes instead feels a little like taking a sip from a glass of water only to discover there's a turd in it. I just... wow, I can't even describe how unpleasant it is to accidentally read them. It's made worse by how people who make them are often good at making the alteration punchy/memorable so it STICKS in your head, too.

I know I'm not the only one who feels like that, though it's obviously not universal.

Just... wow. I wish there was a way to block them or something, just so I'd never see them again.

BarthHumphries

I know. I hate those creative people who can take something you love and make a witty pun out of it that you remember long after you've forgotten that thing that you originally loved. 😊

Liliet

barfs on you because seriously this feels GROSS and I actively feel sick about it when it happens, like physically, I am not exaggerating for comedic value, I love puns, my brain just completely rejects these alterations with psychosomatic results

BarthHumphries

> these alterations with psychosomatic results

Just saying, those are also technically puns. I'm sorry for your discomfort. Good luck! 😊

Liliet

To the shock and confusion of scientists, it turns out bad puns do, in fact, exist)=

The stock market crashes, there's panic in the streets...

jamesc9

RoyalRoad has spoiler tags. Is something like that possible here, to enable people to make their reuse easy to avoid?

Liliet

Considering WordPress doesn't even let you fucking edit your own fucking comments? I expect not -_-

Insanenoodlyguy

"As a rule, vote reminders are trouble. If you make them elaborate, the ones who want simple reminders will despise you. If you do not have them, the bored will despise you. My advice, my son, is therefore to choose terribly corny reminders but keep to them religiously."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Tenthyr

Oh he was not being metaphorical about breaking the damn tower.

Zggt

He does seem the type to be thorough when destroying something

Konstantin von Karstein

I thought the same!

That Other Guy

He is planning on seeing Cat again soon. Might as well prepare properly, right?

Cicero

Cat's going to get blamed for setting Ater on fire and burning every Praesi noble to death, isn't she?

Halinn

Would you have it any other way?

Casey Glick

"It was on fire before I got there, I promise!"
– Black Queen Catherine Founding

Cpt. Obvious

So THAT'S why Akua can't hear the song, there won't be a tower for the girl to climb...

Rey d`Tutto

I look forward to Tuesday and Friday. Then I wait until I am done with work (job, house/home) and winding down for the evening to Read.

I save you for last.

Always good writing. Plot, Character, Pacing, you name it. Your writing is simply hands down the best I've seen online. And the Meta is not just Strong, it's "Baked In".

I've imagined a desktop RPG, an old-skool single player story driven RPG video game, an Online Version...

I love your Epic.

Thank you

-a devoted fan.

Rey d`Tutto

I'm winding down Thursday night, re-reading for tomorrow night, then I find out you're at least 3 hours before PST.

SMH. I'm gonna read this Tomorrow night. I thought I was posting this on Tuesday's post, Interlude: West I.

Irony. But I'm still gonna wait.

dadycool

It comes out around 9pm Monday and Thursday for me, so I'm always excited for evening on those days.

Anomandris

For me, it's like Tuesday and Friday at 930 AM. So, perfect after checking into work, replying to messages and then read at my leisure with a nice cup of coffee

Big I

So he's planning on killing all the nobles, burning the Tower and maybe Ater along with it. That's dark if it's true.

Alex

There is also the possibility that he is bluffing. Imagine that the goblins leak that Amadeus got his hands on the goblinfire arsenal and is heading for Ater. Malicia tries to keep the nobles close, but they want to run. They might even start infighting before he reaches the city.

Alex K

Damn, Catherine is going to be blame for another city burned with goblin fire?

Insanenoodlyguy

The prefect plan at last unfolds. All of this, since the beginning that night in the ally. All of it was to make a incredible warlord with a known penchant for fire: all to pin the greatest conflaguration Goblin Alchemy will ever cause on somebody else. He's gonna gut the whole nobility and the damn tower in one fell swoop, and either give his daughter the credit or let her take the blame. Either way, just as planned.

therealgridlock

All according to keikaku.

And in other news, that would be brilliant, because Cat would take credit just to say that she gets to reform Praes in her image 😊

Anomandris

Well, there is always Akua to throw the blame on....what's another destroyed city, or two?

In any case, that isn't Black, sorry, Maddie's way. He has always been taking full responsibility of everything he does – good, bad or absolute carnage

The point that made me lol was Wither thinking her defences were too good for Hye....if Amadeus and the Ranger want you Dead, you are dead... (Or, well, undead...)

par

> The point that made me lol was Wither thinking her defences were too good for Hye right?? this is the Lady who regularly broke into Keter for shits lmao

Sethur

Agreed. If Wither's defenses were as good as she claimed, Ranger would have taken that as a challenge and at least tried to kill her. The fact that Ranger was around and didn't bother to try means she already knew she'd succeed.

Shveiran

I know, right? This is Penthes and Mercantis all over again... And it is just so viscerally satisfying to see the world remind them of their actual place in the food chain.

thisismyName

I'm thinking one big final team-up before he rides off into the sunset. "Look, daughter, I got you a gift! Can we be civil for 6 hours while we use it on ? I promise I'll stay out of your hair afterwards, me and my girlfriend will just go muder-hobo elsewhere. Look us up sometime after you give the throne away."

dadycoool

Nooo, Amadeus! Don't take all of Cat's goblin fire! At least he's generous enough to leave the rest for her.

Sparsebeard

Like daughter, like father!

Anomandris

Well, Cat's speciality is usually flooding rather than burning.....

dadycoool

While true, I'm pretty sure Sparsebeard was referring to the stunt Cat just pulled with Wolof, the whole "You're gonna willingly give me exactly what I ask for and there's nothing you can do about it."

Benjamin Huang

I see the reflection of burning Towers in those green glass eyes....

James, Mostly Harmless

Somebody much more clever than I could make a riff on Al Stewart's "Roads to Moscow" based on this ...

Benjamin Huang

"Eyes of green and gears of brass,
Ticking softly beneath the glass,
A vast machine of terrible yield,
Westward always lies the field,
A crown of blades but no throne for he,
Who would see the gameboard neath his feet,
Flames of green and a burning Tower,
His to claim, a Role to Devour,
Armies afoot one last time,
One sin, one grace, so ends the rhyme"

NerfGlaistigUaine

Holy shit, you wrote this yourself? Kudos man.

Adrian_V

Oh i see where this is going, like father like daughter, would it be the other waya rounf in this case? Anyway we all know who will be blamed for this, he may even do that on purpose xD

dadycool

"I'm gonna set this whole nation ablaze and everyone's gonna blame Cat for it, who will tear her hair out trying to sort it out." The ultimate prank he could pull, especially since it'll look to everyone like she's trying to legit conquer the place.

NerfGlaistigUaine

It's amazing that even after all this time Amadeus still scares the shit out of me like no other character.

sengachi

I love it when war stories talk about the concept of becoming too used to winning, and so not even questioning whether fighting is necessary. And this whole chapter executed on that so well.

Deworld

Huh. Hadn't expected Akua's interlude this early. I thought it would be placed later when she already settled with Malicia, so we would see the process from Cat's eyes first. Well, that was a surprise, but not an unwelcome one I would say. Akua's character arc is the most interesting part of the story as of now.

So, she directly plans to take the Tower. Nice, theories are gaining more weight. It would be that mentioning it that early can jinx it, but I don't think that what we have now is enough. The fact that she doesn't hear the song is interesting though. Perhaps claiming the Tower isn't something she truly wants. I wonder if it'll stop her in the end? I hope not. There's something ironic that being Dread Empress would be a punishment for Akua.

hakureireimu

We already saw the process from Cat's eye last chapter.

Deworld

All we've seen is how she left. What I mean is seeing some real actions. Attacking Army of Callow in the upcoming battle, doing sabotage using her internal knowledge, becoming an actual Warlock, that sort of thing. So Cat would actually doubt about Akua, and we with her. Giving her new priorities (even if it's clear these are not final ones) to us this early isn't something I expected.

Liliet

It's because tension needs payoff. Akua's arc going anywhere or not has been in tension since book 4, and it was really way past time we found out what her head sounds like from the inside.

That is – now, now that we have new tension in the form of “there's an Akua in the redemption arc! No-one knows what she's going to do, least of all Akua – she's never been in a redemption arc before!”

Deworld

I just expected tension to be built up a little more, that's it. Not that I'm against what happened – the opposite, as I said. Guess I just tend to have pessimistic expectations in regards to what we'll see and when.

Liliet

I mean, EE's pace IS picking up in the last four chapters...

Lord Haart

I still feel like “redemption” is too clean/strong a word for where this might head.

I don't think Akua will end up as a sixth wheel in the Woe again, for example. Or that Cat will ever actually let that last layer of guard down. The Doom of Liesse may have been partly a product of her time but she still was intelligent enough to understand her actions and what she did is DONE.

There is no way back, maybe just a way sideways. My money is still on her claiming the Tower and ultimately being the factor that ends Praes as the contential problem that it is, either by (purposefully?) being a terrible Dread Empress or by outright bringing the Tower down herself.

Ending the Tower and the Flying Fortess madness that comes with it would perhaps be the only kind of peace she could bring herself, and I still wouldn't count that as redemption.

Liliet

Catherine's rejection of Akua is not about letting her guard down. She trusts her in full already and sees what her choices are going to be when, that was a different thing entirely.

Redemption is a fucky word. Far as I'm concerned, Akua's far enough from who she'd once been that she's been doing the redemption thing the entire time and honestly still is, just in a weird direction – because in my eyes, redemption just means change. Means you're not the person you've been. And you gotta KEEP not being that person, so the journey's never over. It's not about "making up" for what was lost, that's a different thing entirely. It's not about being forgiven, because you cannot force that no matter how minor the original offense. It's just about facing in a direction away from what decisions you'd once made, and walking forward.

Evgeny Permyakov

>Giving her new priorities

Was it done, though ? The giving of her new priorities, I mean. As far as I can tell, she sees a path before her, but she is very ambiguous about if she want to walk it.

Also, curiously, while we have wording "sit on a throne before all is said and done" it isn't worded to be the final goal.

Liliet

Akua has already offered and even insisted on sacrificing herself for Cat's goals, that one time in Lost&Found. Her priorities are conflicted because she still has lingering loyalties to her home, and she still also wants stuff like a new body and getting to use sorcery again. And of course she's now reeling from heartbreak (again).

(Which is likely at least in part less heartbreak and more struggling with guilt and desire for forgiveness/absolution. A small voice in the back of her head saying she already got what she deserved, hm? That shit hurts, of course she's running)

If Akua didn't have the new priorities, she wouldn't be talking about how much she just wants to go back, to design wards with Masego and gossip with Indrani, and even where she is to just have a... regular productive conversation with Malicia, not a sniping session.

Pyrdwein

Does no one else think the goblin fire is meant more for Keter than the civil war? I have to imagine that's an unbelievable amount squirreled away, especially goblins being goblins. Sure he will use some but I have to figure he's going to trade it to his daughter somehow. Just giving it wouldn't be his style, but he'll let her earn it old school dad style where he won't admit his pride and support outright. Instead he will create an impasse or scenario where she gets exactly what she needs without him having to actually be honest about his support and pride lol.

308924810a

I ... am unclear on how Cat is going to react to Amadeus burning down Ater after her introducing the Liesse accords with provisions specifically to prevent 'people from burning down half a city to kill a ruler'.

I wonder whether Amadeus has a technical wording loophole he can use to get away with this.

sengachi

... well. Now that phrase is starting to sound like foreshadowing.

308924810a

A shocking amount of this story is foreshadowed in throwaway phrases and jokes. I really need to find someone else rereading this thing and get their opinions on how many times that happens.

Though in that case I thought the phrase was a reference to how Scribe's catspaws nearly burned down Salia to try to kill Cordelia.

I begin to wonder whether Black really intends to survive/remain on calernia and infleuntial in the empire through to this new era Cat is building, so long as the High Seats and more problematic nobles also don't survive and he leaves Cat forced to take over the empire in order to keep it under control, he and the empire still wins in the end, guaranteeing that Callow will always be willing to make their food available to the wasteland by keeping them one country.

Liliet

I mean, Amadeus hasn't intended to survive to see the new era from the start, at least from the moment he stabbed Cat to make her his Squire. He's even spelled out that he's "a tool no longer needed" to her face that one time.

Nothing new :3

Earl of Purple

He does. It won't be half a city he burns down, and he's planning on killing way more than the ruler.

308924810a

That ... could be a loophole.

If you're burning down a city not to kill one person, but to kill a most-of-a-city-occupying mass of people, that might be a permissible level of force.

Liliet

It probably helps that not many people realize that Tower is basically a city (and I doubt he intends to burn down the whole of Ater)

Liliet

I mean. Accords HAVEN'T been signed yet. They don't have retroactive clause.

Shveiran

I'm guessing it would still burn a bridge, though. My bet is on this being a gargantuan bluff.

therealgridlock

It'll burn more than a bridge, I tell ya hwhat.

Liliet

I just honestly don't think the GA leaders will care. Praesi affairs are dismissed easily, and the fact the Tower is basically a small city with all the workers is not... regularly a part of their considerations.

Cat might put this as another mark in her “wow my dad is an awful person” tally, well “might” she absolutely will, but it’s not political suicide.

Shveiran

So... your take is Catherine Foundling would not throw a fit over nuking the largest city on the surface of Calernia for no good reason at all?

I... disagree?

Liliet

Wait, you think he wants to burn down ATER, not just the Tower?

Shveiran

No I don’t think he would, but that was what the original post was about. I was saying that he wouldn’t.

...though admittedly I have no idea how he could burn down the Tower in the middle of Ater with a highly unstable substance that devours everything without bringing down the city with it.
My bet is that this is a bluff.

Liliet

Well, there is that gatekeeper demon at the base of the Tower...

Who would he be bluffing tho? The information about goblinfire won’t spread further than the Matrons bc of how he got it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Bet he’ll only burn down a third of the city. Loophole!

sengachi

I think my favorite part of Akua’s downfall is that she could have had almost every happiness she wanted. But she had that Sahelian greed. She thought she was entitled to that last little piece of happiness. And it ruined all the rest.

She could have had those evenings designing wards with Masego, trading knowledge and insight freely and without a hint of contest. She could have had that casual friendship with Indrani, a woman who grew up loving a monster as a mother and so does not care what a monster Akua was. She could have kept sharpening her iron against Hakram, a genuine sharpening of iron where both are the better for it and both know they will never hurt the other because of a shared loyalty to someone greater.

And she could have had Cat. Not her love, but her friendship. Her presence. Akua could have laid her broken heart to rest and spent a hundred years at Catherine's side as a friend, a confidant, a respected advisor, a right hand. She could have had something close to what Hakram has with Cat, with maybe a bit of what Indrani and Masego have with Cat as well.

But Akua felt entitled to Cat's romantic love. She'd done all the right things, said all the right words, committed in all the right ways, why couldn't she have that too? Why couldn't she earn Cat's love by being good enough?

She didn't have it in her to recognize that she could have been sad, experienced heartbreak, and admitted that yeah, sometimes you fuck up badly enough and it costs you. She could have recognized that most people, almost everyone in fact, don't get everything they want in life. And she could have been happy with being happy. With having good enough, with having days that were happier and warmer and better than anything she ever could have imagined in her old life.

But she felt entitled. She had to have that. last. drop.

And when she couldn't have it she threw everything away, to start over in the one last place where she thought she could win it all. She could climb the Tower, sit atop the throne, and win. She could win until there was no more winning to do, until she won and won and won and won until she could not climb any higher on that path.

Only to find that the highest reaches of this path will never make her as happy as sitting around the fire with the Woe.

And it was all her fault.

ruduen

I find it interesting that she's very much focused on 'the end of the story'. A lot of her plans seemed to be devoted to climbing the tower, but so much of her effort was spent on getting to the end result that she tends to forget about what happens along the way.

Meanwhile, she's so distraught because the end of her story with Cat would involve not getting that last bit of satisfaction. She's so desperate for that ending, despite it being likely that even the journey so far were some of the happiest times in her existence.

If one is focused on the ending, it can be easy to forget that they're only one piece of a story – and that there's a whole lot making up everything before, and even what comes after, when the tale is told. The end of a story is often defining, but it isn't always the final part of a character's life.

sengachi

That's a huge part of it too. Akua was so focused on the romantic relationship with Cat she couldn't have, that end-goal peak of relationship status (as she saw it), that she couldn't focus on what she did have with Cat.

ninegardens

Yeah... her focus on the forgiveness and romantic relationship that Cat would not and could not give her... that she feels entitled to after all her efforts just seems...kinda sick and entitled. like "No one owes you a relationship".

And like... actually all the stuff she has done for Cat was already paid for*. It's not like Cat didn't give her a spot by the fire, mercy, friendship, support etc. Cat (and family) have given Akua SO many things. This is not to lessen all she has done for them, but... she mostly just seems bratty. 😞

(To be clear, this is not bad writing, just... a normal person thinking in a biased manner after having their heart broken... and she still seems kind of dumb as a plank)

Liliet

I think the entitlement is just her reeling. She REALLY WANTED IT, and now that Cat basically slapped her in the face with that "no", she's soothing herself with "I totally deserved it, Cat's just being mean". Even now she has a voice whispering that she got what she deserved in her head.

Absolution/forgiveness is important to her BECAUSE she feels bad about what she did, now :3

sengachi

Of course she gets to reel. That's not entitlement. The entitlement is in Akua going back to Evil because she didn't get Cat's romantic affections.

People get to be sad when they get rejected. They deserve some understanding if they act in complicated ways afterward or struggle with surging emotions. But going back to literal Evil with a capital E because you're rejected, Evil with slaves and human sacrifice and betrayal for its own sake and the whole nine yards? That's right up there with shooting up a school after being rejected.

And I use that metaphor very intentionally. Joining Praes and giving intel on Callow, however much Akua may shield the Woe themselves, is an act of mass slaughter. Cat may have some plan in place to mitigate it, or to ensure this turns out in her favor in the end. But if she does Akua doesn't know it, and is turning over intel to Malicia with full knowledge it will see people die in droves for nothing more than the sake of Malicia and Akua's personal power.

That's why Cat had the right of it, in rejecting Akua's romantic advances. Akua was capable of performing good. She was capable of doing the right thing for the right reasons and she realized the true benefits of compassion and cooperation. But she wasn't capable of letting go of that entitlement that: A) There had to be a 100% win condition for her, and B) Not winning 100% justifies flipping the board (even at the cost of other's lives).

I don't think Cat would have been happy with her in the long term, with this aspect of her personality lurking underneath. Because Cat is a person of sacrifices. She constantly deals with the fact she can't have everything. Every single arc has been her learning to make more and more mature decisions about what to pursue like a dog with a bone, and what to let go. Hell it gets hammered home like every five chapters that Cat's personal biggest desire of the Liesse Accords, "no Named rulers", just isn't happening, and Cat lets it go. She mourns it, frets about it, can't stop thinking about it.

But she lets it go, because the rest is too important.

Akua doesn't. She goes Evil because her beau rejects her.

Liliet

It's a little more complicated than that.

It's very much worth remembering that Catherine is currently waging war on her HOME. As Catherine has commented on Sahelians in general, Akua might have hated her mom, but she has genuine attachment to her family as an abstract idea – she argued about SAHELIAANS being capable of kindness on the example of her great-uncle Thandiwe back at the start of Book 5. She talks about "selling her home for nothing" in this chapter.

Akua isn't dangling between "principle" and "none", she's dangling between two sets of principles. It's important to remember that she was ALWAYS acting out of a sense of duty, "how an heiress to Wolof should act". Akua isn't just doing "the worst thing she can" here, she is doing "the right thing, alternative edition".

She's going back to how she was BROUGHT UP to consider right and wrong, now that she's here and the memory is newly fresh. And in that framework, her loyalty to Cat was a "lethal fascination", everything about wanting to go back is her mind betraying itself the way minds do, and what she OUGHT to do is take the opportunity and wring it out to the very last.

She has rejected this set of principles before, but between sharp pain from considering how Cat's set works right now (the refusal of forgiveness, the voice in her head telling her she got what she deserved) and her childhood home, everything she ever loved as a child right there in front of her, she's snapped right back to it.

She doesn't even like what she's doing. She enjoys her body but she does not enjoy any other part of her situation, she even hates the verbal sparring with Malicia. It's just the only other "right thing to do" available to her.

nimelennar

"If you do this, there is no place in Creation or beyond that will safeguard you from me, I'd sworn. Not Heavens or Hells, not even if every lord in Arcadia swears to you. The doom I promise you will have men trembling in a thousand years when they speak of Akua's Folly and the woe that came from it."

therealgridlock

Oh lawd it's coming!

Lord Haart

Yeah this is why I don't think it's going to be as simple as "Akua turns on Malicia and gives Cat what she wants as Empress and they hug."

Akua's only real choice now – the only choice that might mean storing to WHO she is now – is to set a precedent that Cat is right. That being a Villain of that caliber will utterly destroy the ambitions the Villain seeks.

I think the Tower is going to have a demon problem soon. She's the former Diabolist, we've heard about the Sahelion demon more than once now, plus the one in the Tower, and then we know that Goblinfire involves demons so enough of it together might just well conjure one...

mamm0nn

Wither: What do you want?

Amadeus: I want you to stay put, give me a smuggle route into Praes, and...

Wither: And?

Amadeus: I want to pull a Catherine.

Wither: Sighs deeply. Really? All of it? I don't think even Ranger can carry that much.

Wither: But I'm afraid I can't help you. See, a young lass called Warlock came and asked for the same thing.

Amadeus: And the fact that you divulge this so easily means that you turned her down. Someone else asked for it first, didn't they?

Wither: That crazy witch Sepulchal, of course, but she's just a madwoman grasping straws and copying her betters. And before her, some handsome dwarf from the Lannisters. And before him, the orcs. Those idiots wanted to smear the stuff on their axes to be extra deadly.

Amadeus: But if they don't have it, then who...?

Meanwhile, at Camp Callow

Cat: Zeze, what's that?

Masego: A smoothy.

Masego: Oh, those. Archer got them a while back, said that we're going to need them. Knowing you, I was inclined to agree. Vivs and Adjutant thought so too, so we got to the logistics while you were in prison.

Archer: Don't worry, only about three or four of the fires that broke out are blamed upon you!

Masego: And only four broke out, so I'd say we smuggled it quite effectively! Shame of all those bridges, though.

Archer: Chuckles Literally.

ninegardens

This whole Gambit of burning everything down with Goblinfire... I feel like... I feel like I've seen it before somewhere....

Harrent

Time to dust off the old Benevolent theory..

AbraKadabra

I am all for it. Amadeus has matured since Caf stabbed him. In fact Cat gave him a mission then, become a better person and make a better world.

After all this it would be cheap if he did not become emperor. Akua still can be Chancellor which is a fitting place for her, and it would be the same position which she occupied beside Cat. The advisor.

Burlyraven

Akua doesn't hear the call to climb the tower, because that is not her Role. The times are changing, and the wasteland needs a messiah. Personally, it's why any romantic tension between her and Cat never sat right with me, because the story she's following is typically either a chaste one, or involves a far more... demure love interest.

Deworld

Considering what Maddie is up to, by the time she gets there, there may not be any Tower at all. That actually seems like a plausible outcome: Amadeus burns down the Tower, and Akua, instead of rebuilding it, leads her people to a different future.

mamm0nn

It might also be because Akua isn't the right person for the job any more. Dread Emperors are chosen by the Gods Below for being revolutionaries or vicious backstabbers, not unmotivated and indecisive folk that might want to smooth and deradicalize the Wasteland.

If Akua is hellbent on revenge or enslaving Cat's soul for requited love, then she might hear the tune. Right now she just lacks the mindset that the Tower is a throne for her to take or a means to her world-changing ideas coming to fruition. And without those, why even become Empress?

Liliet

Dread Emps aren't chosen by the Gods Below, they choose themselves.

I feel like we've had this discussion before.

...I think we do agree on the reason why Akua isn't hearing the song though. She's too lukewarm to the idea.

Juff

Typo Thread:

The Named > The Name enjoying to the > enjoying the time on need > time of need losing proposition > losing propositions also, is her surname Kaishi or Kaisha

Liliet

Okay, so let's go over this!

1. RIP ace Akua headcanon. It was nice while it lasted.

2. LMAO @ Akua straight faced feeding Malicia disinformation to protect the people she likes. Fucking beautiful.

3. LMAO @ Akua being like "everything I deserve" instead of mentioning wanting any of it. No, all the "wanting" references are to Catherine, and isn't it beautiful? The closest she comes is "That old Sahelian greed, whispering again in her ear: she had left the fire for the dark, but she wanted all the pleasures of both." Pleasures, huh Akua.

4. LMAO @ Akua not hearing the song. Just admit you don't want it!

(Alternatively it's because, according to the lately-popular conspiracy theory, she was the song's protagonist all along and so is the eye of the storm of it or something, but I do think that is not the simplest explanation)

5. LMAO @ Amadeus's network of friends. Malicia is so convinced he doesn't have his hand on the pulse of Praes in wanting to change it, she really does think of court as all there is to it, huh?

6. Holy shit @ the goblins' plan. Just... wow. Viciously executed is one way to call it. Of course it fits perfectly with Robber's mentality and the like...

7. AJSKDFHSDKJFLFSKD @ the plan to burn down the Tower with all the nobility Amadeus can get into it inside. I mean, we can all agree that's what he's going to do, right? Fucking RIP.

8. Hey, who else caught the casual "army raised by Istrid's daughter alongside his"? :3

9. Now I'm picturing Akua meeting Amadeus inside the Tower like "hey I heard you want to burn this joint down, want help?"

10.)=)=)= @ Akua's upcoming killing of a lot of Callowans. Or maybe she'll manage to work around it somehow? I don't hold out too much hope no matter how much I want it.

11. AAHAHHAAAAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH @ the whole of this chapter ♥

Liliet

P.S. "Fascination has been the doom of many a Sahelian". They're fucking fey aren't they? Like not Guideverse!fae, the traditional archetypical kind. Easily entrancing, easily entranced. Beautiful.

Cicero

Fay = Fae = Elves or faries or the Seelie and Unseelie.

As in: The Fay are not to be trusted.

Fey = otherworldly, fascinated by death, fated to die, clairvoyant (supposedly because they are closer to death they are also closer to the spirits).

As in: A fey mood has taken him, he now courts death in battle.

Fay and Fey are different things.

(This is one of my pet peeves, the way so many people use the word "fey" when they really mean "fay" and seem to think they are just using an alternate spelling. No, they are different words.)

Fey usually appears as something like a melancholy form of battle lust.

Barthumphries

Apparently the Middle English word for the fairy folk was fei from the Old English fæge. So although fey and fay may have usual definitions, they've been mixed up enough over hundreds of years by a lot of different sources that they still carry some definitions from the other. I think there's more of a small picket fence between the two than some grand castle walling off the one from the other.

Liliet

Interesting! I was under the impression that these are related concepts.

Liliet

P.P.S. Considering Catherine has already been treating with the Confederacy AND with Wither, and Amadeus has shown he already knows, the goblins' plan might end in less blood than usual this time!

Lord Haart

I kind of hope so, broken as the Goblin social system is. Otherwise it's a lot of death.

It also makes me think of the ogres who do the same, back both horses and try to fly under the radar. And the Orcs have also been pushed to a similar place.

It's funny how Malicia turned Procer into a quagmire of civil war, and Cordelia could never manage to return the favor... Only for Malicia to achieve the same in Praes herself, and somehow think she was winning from it. Now both are desperate, it's even more ironic that Malicia wants diplomacy and Cordelia wants to use a superweapon. I think the Bard must be behind this to some degree given the scale... Amadeus worried about the Calamities against her but never really thought about how Bard might twist Malicia. It wouldn't have taken much, Malicia is Named and has been around Named for a long time now.

jamesc9

Is Ime named? If so, she would be an excellent vehicle for passing pressure on to Malacia.

Earl of Purple

She is not. Malicia has noted her aging, and Villains don't age past the point they feel themselves to be. Amadeus and Alaya appear in their twenties, despite pushing sixty, and Wekesa only looked in his forties because he saw himself as mature but vigorous, and forties is far more 'mature' than thirties whilst also being more 'vigorous' than fifties.

Given Ime's position and role in governance, the Name that fits her best is Chancellor- which is illegal, further suggesting she's not Named.

dadycool

5: Malicia was only ever the "King", a solitary figure with all the power, willing to talk the talk with the vipers, but never walking the walk with the pawns, rooks, knights, and bishops. She only knows what it's like in the upper echelons where fondness and loyalty are only ever fronts to the few who grasp the concept.

8: Yeah, it's adorable how they've both accepted their Role as father and daughter. And Bard was right, it really is uncanny.

10: Whether or not she actually does it, I'm sure it'll be either a thematically devastating or euphoric moment, where she either Breaks the entire Callowan army or Takes every...

diabolist...wait, what if this is how she steals the diabolists/mages they need for the gates? If it destroys her, or at least appears to, then it'd even be something resembling "Redemption in Death".

aurikdomi

I feel like the goblins plan is just a better executed form of the ogres usual mo.

Liliet

Yeah!

Lord Haart

Yes, with special emphasis on the executed... :0

EvilA

Akua craves absolution, not romantic love. Her entitlement and greed is about wanting forgiveness that she doesn't deserve. She was willing to give herself to Cat romantically in hopes of Cat's acceptance and forgiveness; this is a resource that she gives to Cat to demonstrate her repentance, just as betraying her family and stealing the Sahelian library is a way to show that she is willing to do anything for Cat.

She is giving Cat everything that she thinks Cat wants (her person, her loyalty, her love, all that she has), and still Cat will not absolve her of her past.

Absolution is important to Akua because of her issues with trust. She believes that she will always be on the outside of Cat's group unless she is forgiven. She is suspicious of her interactions with Cat and the others, constantly suspecting that she is missing out on something because they (rightly) believe that she has a history of being a shit person. They won't let her past go, and in Akua's eyes that means that they don't trust her and she will always be an outsider, always vulnerable to betrayal or being betrayed. This terrifies her: she genuinely seeks and wants the group's companionship but she doesn't understand them and thus can't force the outcome.

My theory is that as Akua experiences the hollowness of her old ambitions, she will come to recognize that what she did was unforgivable. Until now, she has sought forgiveness, but at some point she will realize that even if Cat loves her unconditionally it will not erase what she has done. When Akua's actions finally sink in, when she feels genuinely bad about what she did and begins to take personal responsibility for her own repentance, when she let's go of the idea that external validation will absolve her, that's when things will change.

Cat carries the burden of Akua's judgement. Akua must take this burden for herself, and in doing so will gain Cat's acceptance. The irony will be that Cat will only 'forgive' Akua when Akua no longer forgives herself. Akua will take control of her own penance: she will set the course for an atonement that can never be truly won. She will seek to make amends, not to free her of her guilt, but because she feels genuine sorrow for what she did.

The other irony will be that when Akua is genuinely sorry, she becomes a person that Cat and the others can accept. However, Akua will no longer be able to spend her time with them going on adventures and doing all the things that she loves with the people she loves. Akua must sacrifice and forego those things; her role will be to lead Praes, transforming it into a place where something like Akua's folly can never happen again. The old Calloway and Praes enmity must be ended, and Akua's role will be to heal her people and make amends. Callow never forgets, but they could maybe accept Praes if Praes also 'never forgets' its atrocities. Transforming Praesi culture is an uphill battle, not won overnight, with high chance of failure. But it is a worthy goal if it leads to peace and for Praes to one day enjoy the richness of life that Akua tasted when she was with Cat. Akua's past will never be erased; instead she herself will help to immortalize it in Praesi culture, allowing it to serve as a reminder for why Praes must be remade.

Bonus theory: the girl who climbed the tower is about Akua as others have mentioned. But it is also a part of a prophecy about the end of the Tower. Akua will rule, but the Tower as it was once known will be no more (both culturally/spiritually with the changes that Akua will bring, and also maybe physically if Maddie burns the thing down!). The end of the Tower is the end of the old Praes, and the story of Callow and Praes as we know it will be broken. Cat's Role is somehow related to breaking and reforming stories, tempering the old brutal horrors (on both sides) into something more civil.

therealgridlock

Not to mention that if Cat becomes the new WobbleBoob and changes the continent to one with Geneva Conventions instead of "how many innocents will I flammenwerfer today?" That having the tower be physically destroyed and inhabited by a girl who fulfils the song and then writes a new chapter in that story will play right in to the Accords and the lawful warfare future.

Or, it's not her in the tower at all, the possibilities are still in the air.

Liliet

I agree with everything before "the other irony".

But I agree with it deeply and completely and think it's an excellent analysis ♥

Lord Haart

Largely agree with this, yeah.

I find the interaction at the end between Malicia and Akua to be very telling on multiple levels. Was Malicia really an outsider to the Calamities, or was she the centerpiece around which Black brought them and it's just the isolation of rulership (and maybe Bardic nudges, Bard was there when Black Destroyed the Fortress and essentially rejected her, and definitely had a role in helping that plan along) that make her feel insecure about it?

I think the thing that stuck out to me the most is the lie about timing, or at least the self-deception. Akua coming to the Woe early and THEN doing Liesse would still have put her where she is today. Cat would still hate her, and care for her, and do exactly what she's doing. Cat would do the same for Indrani, Vivienne, Hakram and even faced the possibility of having to do it with Masego when he nearly nuked Procer, and that was with effective mind control in the picture.

In some ways, Akua is more of a daughter to Malicia than Cat... I always pegged anything between Cat and Akua as more sisters than anything else.

Liliet

Yeah, good analysis.

Give or take that last sentence, bc Malicia might be their shared wicked stepmom, but their attraction towards each other is not... sisterly.

They're probably going to end up in a sister-like relationship though, considering Cat is absolutely not going to indulge that other thing.

Lord Haart

Well it can't be much weirder than Cat+Indrani but yes, agreed.

TeK

So, it seems he is done with half measures.

mindsword2

Much of what I could say has already been said, but I think there is one thing that jumped out at me and no one else seemed to notice. The 5 Calamities are the Black Knight, the Ranger, the Warlock, the Captain, and the Assassin with Scribe as the 6th Ranger.

We learned this is off because Scribe is instrumental to Assassin, but still, there's your five. Know who isn't in it?

The Empress.

Now for the real question. If you dump goblinfire on a Demon, will it die? If so, it's a way for villains to kill them. I believe in Book 2 it was mentioned that generally only heroes can kill a Demon. We have to remember there is a demon for a door guard at the tower. Amadeus isn't a hero and Ranger is hero adjacent at best; the demon might be a bit of a problem for them unless something like Goblinfire is used.

Deworld

Not sure if goblinfire can kill a demon. For all we know, it's made out of demon in some way, and demons usually can't affect other demons.

Shveiran

I think it's a safe bet that goblinfire cannot kill demons.

After all, the reason Villains cannot kill demons is because demons are made of Below and Below is what empowers Villains as well.

Considering we know goblinfire is made of demons, I don't see how that would succeed where, say, Night or magic fails.

You need Above in the mix, and I doubt the Eyres have an enemy to grind into it.

Liliet

Demons aren't made of Below, devils are. Demons are something else.

The reason only heroes can kill demons is because Below isn't so generous as to give their minions something as powerful as Light.

Deworld

What? Where did you get that? Was it mentioned somewhere? IIRC demons are as much of Below as devils – they come from the same Hells, summoned with similar rituals, and bound with similar bindings. Summoning demons and devils always was presented as things that go hand-to-hand. They may be different from devils, but ultimately they are also creations of Below.

hakureireimu

See the WOE
on demons.

hakureireimu

More here

Liliet

Repeated WoE. Erratic has clarified this many times.

> Demons never intervene unless summoned or otherwise reached towards.

The dichotomy in Creation is devils vs angels, demons are closer to forces of nature than something fundamentally evil. They're associated with Evil because only villains bring them into Creation.

> carlarc:

> I read somewhere that the conflict is 'angels vs devils, demons are something else', what does something else mean in this?

> EE:

> angels and devils were directly created by Above and Below > very little is known or understood about demons, they're associated with Evil because Evil politics tend to be the ones summoning them

> Xinci:

> Hm...so thing I was trying to figure out. Are some of the qualities of Devils and Angels derived from Demons?

> EE:

> Demons are completely different from the rest of Creation, and technically not really part of it

> ! Chaos Kal-tron:

> Are Demons exclusive to Calernia?

> EE:

> demons are universal
(context: "no angles in Yan Tei lands")

This is about as factual as facts get... without being directly stated in the text -_-

therealgridlock

Isn't cat and masego etc technically villains? Haven't they killed several demons? I think there needs to be a most* in there, probably because most villains don't want to kill demons.

Liliet

No, they haven't. Villains can bind and banish demons, which Masego has probably done at Second Liesse (I don't remember exactly how he ended up handling those three). At Marchford the demon ended up recalled by Akua. At the Arsenal Cat had a hero along specifically for that purpose.

jamesc9

> I doubt the Eyres have an enemy to grind into it.

Could this be subject to change?

Cicero

I thought that was obvious. Malicia was saying that she was never part of the Calamities because she was never one of the five – she joined too late.

Liliet

And it's not even true! That's not why she wasn't a part of them, and her not being a part of them certainly has nothing to do with Amadeus forgiving or not forgiving her for things. He HAS forgiven her, personally, he just cannot abide her actions and their consequences regardless. As Akua has noted higher up though, Alaya doesn't really get the idea of her actions having consequences through, like, alienating other people by how bad they are for everyone else. So she's telling herself a story of how Amadeus isn't forgiving her because she was never REALLY one of his friends through not fault of her own)=)=)=

While it's bullshit, both about her and about Akua.

Xinci

Mm yeah that bit on Goblins fits what we have seen. We already saw bits of this with their treatment of languages and secret information like the Face tribes. Living on the knives edge like they do means they as a group cannot stand complete decimation, so they use collective actions to gain advantages for when things get near a tipping point for them being possibly annihilated. They honestly can't really afford not to.

Anyway, Cat is going to be coronated with Goblinfire for her new Name huh. Honestly burning down the Tower seems somewhat necessary to shift Praes's flow of mages to Cardinal. They would need a new focus and a new paradigm to follow, and they are very flexible about following those who succeeded against them (well usually).

Deworld

While it's true that destroying Tower is necessary for proper reforms in Praes – if not from a practical perspective, then from a narrative one for sure – it may go against Cat's immediate goal of organizing and sending Praesi diabolists to fight Dead King. Especially if the better part of nobility burns with it. After all, it's not Legion war casters we're talking about – this kind of specialized mages can be obtained only from High Lords, and you need great authority to force them to do so. Having the Tower destroyed undermines that as it's the symbol of the Dread Emperor's reign.

On the other hand, if current High Lords do burn, then their successors may be redundant to go against whoever claims to be responsible. So it can swing either way.

Shveiran

Now THAT was a chapter!

The goblins seems to be doing what the ogres did, only more ruthlessly; they are both ensuring they have in with all the horses no matter who wins, though where the ogres are vying for a voice, the goblins are vying for relevance... and the price they pay for that gamble is much harsher. So... really, what you'd expect of the goblins.

But the show-stopper was the first half and we all know it. Honestly, it amazes me how so many readers seem to be convinced by Akua's "betrayal"... Personally, I don't see how much more she could possibly show she's half-hearted already. And she's been gone for what, days? And getting her body back out of the deal? Besides, Akua is already musing how Malicia is backed in a corner by the reality of the situation; if I'm wrong and she actually tries for the Tower she won't attack the Army of Callow before. She JUST SAID that every idiot and their cousins who live under a rock know that you don't kill Catherine's soldiers unless you want to make an enemy out of her AND that Malicia's pit in the international scale is not a result of her managing badly but rather that Praes cannot afford to be the Grand Alliance's enemy anymore.

Akua is not stupid, whatever else she may be; she won't kill those soldiers because she knows that would seal her fate sure as dawn.

Also, really, is it just me? It's transparent!

She's just like I am when I do something that's bad for me that I was tempted real hard to do because it has been a long time since the last fix.

A moment of pleasure, the comfort of familiarity, and then the realization that it wasn't worth it, slowly mounting up until everything turns to ash in your mouth.

She'll be back the moment she can deliver something with the act, and before she is forced to actually fight in the battle.

And now, Malicia.

Gods, I think she is by far the juiciest part of the chapter. Her parting words? Brilliant. A masterful attempt to keep Akua in the fold the only way she possibly can: convincing her that there is no other fold to be in.

But also... wow. It never ceases to amaze me how much Malicia doesn't get Namelore.

It's uncanny. It's like watching Einstein fail at sudoku. You know that intelligence is not a single task, but it just bothers you, you know? Come on Alfred, it's easy!

Malicia is making such a plethora of bad choices – when it comes to Named-.

Marshal Nim is just not a threat to the Black Fucking Queen; she has fought precisely one enemy worth the name since the bloody Conquest, and that was before the Crusades begun. Heck, forget Catherine... the Army of Callow could walk over her. The only time she fought another Named, it was to beat the bloody Squire and not finish him off!

And now... make a warlock out of Akua?

FFS.

I mean, wow.

Look.

IF IT WORKS, you successfully gave a Praesi staple Name to Akua fucking Sahelian. One of the three that have reliably been used to become Empress. She has no inclination to work with you, because you just erased her progress and made her just a Trueblood. Your most powerful allies both are going to stab you and take the Tower the moment it seems feasible, do you not remember that NOT DOING SO is the reason you are the oldest Villain on the Continent?

But cheer up, that won't matter because it WON'T WORK.

You just tried to make a WARLOCK out of someone you want to have ON A MAGIC LEASH. Do you need me to spell out how that is a doomed endeavor?

If your leash works, your Warlock will be a poor asset because "Unlimited Arcane Power" doesn't match "Cannot counter the spell waved on herself by non-Named practitioners". Those stories don't go together. If your leash doesn't work, you have a powerful warlock that has no loyalty toward you, wants your chair, and has a story of broken bondage to use to take it.

But worse yet, you are throwing Akua Sahelian against the Black Queen.

Aside from the fact that she'll betray you, it was doomed from the start: Akua has no story with the rest of the Grand Alliance. She only has a connection to CAT HERSELF. So either this is a tragedy and Akua manages to kill Catherine because of friendship makes you falter before the hard choices or something like that, which you don't want because you just showed that a dead

Catherine is a lose condition (remember her captivity, Malicia? You do, don't you?) or Akua is going to be pummeled.

There is no satisfying story that gets you what you want, so you won't get it!

Liliet

Yep, Malicia is deep, deep, deep in the pit XD

laguz24

The difference between her and cat is that cat thrives in the pit and knows it well, while Malicia does all she can to stay out of the pit but she doesn't know how to stop digging.

Liliet

Fucking RIP

Liliet

So hey, people who were talking about how Amadeus doesn't know Praes and isn't really Praesi and cannot be put in charge of reforming it.

Isn't it uncanny how he knows it better than Alaya does?

Shveiran

It's almost like Malicia has spent decades interacting almost exclusively with Praesi HIGHBORNS, whose priorities tend to diverge from those of commoners.

Liliet

MYSTERIOUS

Lord Haart

To be fair this chapter only really speaks to Amadeus's relationship with military. And while veterans certainly shouldn't be cast aside the fact that he himself points out his use of nepotism to favor his military means that he's still more of a warlord than a statesman.

Not that I think he wouldn't be better than Malicia in many or even most ways, but he's got some serious limitations too. He honestly already hurt Praes in one of the worst ways by doing his mad dash through Procer to kill peasants and destroy farmland – now Calloway has to feed Procer instead of feeding Praes.

Liliet

That was a fuckup and I'm not arguing against that, but it was made a fuckup of proportions quite this colossal by the Dead King's invasion. Procer would have damn well been able to feed itself if it hadn't also needed to feed an army – multiple armies – at the same time. That was the entire point of the gambit: to force Procer to, well, stop feeding the army and disband the levies so it could feed the people whose farmland got burned.

Amadeus failed to predict the scope of Alaya's... destructiveness, which is indeed a characteristic problem, but it's not a statesman problem.

As a statesman, he knows his country damn well, and I'm not just talking about the military. I'm talking about research he did on goblins, and how the difference it made is that THE INTRIGUE SPECIALIST in their duo failed to catch a scheme that THE MILITARY SPECIALIST did.

Nepotism would be a more potent accusation, meanwhile, if the woman he'd helped hadn't been driven from her home under threat of assassination in the first place. Sure he's not playing by the rules – nobody is. These ARE the rules, effectively, at this point. He's been working to change that! Nepotism doesn't work WITHIN the Legions, if you remember.

This chapter also speaks to Amadeus's entire approach to rule: he talks about how things have gone wrong when the Tower starts losing people like this veteran. Does Alaya know this? Does she think this way? Has she checked? Does she care?

Barthumphries

That might have been part of his long plan. To truly force change, Praes had to be completely isolated with no chance of help coming from any other quarter.

WuseMajor

For the record, I'm actually a little surprised here. Akua knows the body was a trap and I figured she wouldn't want to be on someone's leash again, especially not so quickly. I thought she'd go off and do something...else, I dunno.

Joining up with Malicia who still just. Doesn't. GET. It. seems like a bad plan. Well, unless you're planning on betraying her, as one does.

therealgridlock

You heard her, she's gonna get sargon's nuts out of the vice then her own nuts, then she is free to topple everything she wants as a free man yet again.

SpeckofStardust

Well the goblins have disappointed me here.

I mean yes blackmail but uh, what exactly would be the problem to the information getting out?

Like no really, Malicia doesn't have any care if people are playing this game because it means that wither wont betray her. Cat also wont care either as long as they toe the line when the dust settles.

Other then that everyone makes me happy (even if Malicia is being truly doomed and Dum).

Earl of Purple

They did what they did so no matter what happens, the humans will have a goblin to talk to, one that has authority over other goblins- either as a matron on the council of the Confederacy or as a High Lady of Praes. Revealing that Wither is still a Matron and the goblins are playing both sides will lose them a lot of trust, and with that trust they'll lose any goblin leader that humans can look to and think 'I can work with this person, as I helped them with an internal dispute and we got on quite well'. But it's not an internal dispute, and you didn't help them and all the things you thought you had over them- friendships, debts, or obligations- are worthless placebos to make you feel better and stop digging into their affairs.

Shveiran

Because it reveals the goblins are much more dangerous than they appear to be, since the main weakness that has reassured Dread Emperor after Dread Empress (i.e. their depp-seated tendency to backstab each other at the first sign of trouble) is in fact a scheme to keep their race afloat.

With the secret exposed, the winner will have to do something to ensure the goblins don't ever become a threat, because they have the potential to be.

Between Malicia and Amadeus, one will neuter them and one will give them a stake; if a choice is to be made, he is the obvious one.

And besides, giving in to the blackmail doesn't force them to side with him, so it is by far more convenient than the alternative.

Liliet

Note Amadeus's comment on Wither not thinking beyond the goblin conception of conflict. In their worldview, if they are discovered they will be eliminated because that's what they'd do if someone were revealed to pulling a scheme like that on them.

ninegardens

There's also the point that revealing the secret might not just be about NOW.

Even if there is no cost of the secret being revealed now, it's a long running scheme, a generations old ploy, and having that get out will permanently weaken their position.

SpeckofStardust

Not the case though, what thier doing is the exact same thing as both the orges and Sahelians/ other great noble houses, that the goblins are more loyal to thier race as a whole is no different then any other group in play.

It fits thier world view but thier lack of understanding the situation despite all how scary the goblins where set up is well disappointing.

It cant harm them unless they show themselves to fold to keep it quite. Which is what is happening.

Liliet

It can harm them, because it means the next time they rebel, the same ploy won't work, and the rebellion might just be drowned in blood genocidally instead of left to their own internal affairs.

WuseMajor

Ultimately Malicia's problem here is that she has started to realize that she's burned all her bridges with the West and thus, ultimately, has two options:

1) Arrange for all of the current leaders of the Western Coalition to either die, retire, or "change their minds," including the Black Queen, and be replaced by someone amenable to doing what she wants.

2) Die.

The problem with option 1 is that, so far, killing or deposing Hasenbach has proven impossible. If you had a really good grasp on their politics and you picked your point well, you might be able to oust her in the Assembly, but that is her battleground and it's very hard to surprise her there. If Malicia still had Scribe, then it would be theoretically doable, if still amazingly difficult, but as is...

...That said, Hasenbach is not really in a position to look a gift horse in the mouth. If she has no other options, she might actually sign on with Malicia.

Levant is certainly doable and, arguably, probably pretty easy right now...provided the current leaders all die on the northern battlefield. Again, not so hard.

Ordinarily killing the Black Queen would be next to impossible...but Malicia had her in custody for a week. So, doable.

However, that all leads into the fact that this coalition is currently being held together with string and baling wire and it has months at best before the Dead King smashes it and eats the entire continent. And one of the major pieces of wire holding the entire thing together is the Black Queen.

Which means, if she tries to suborn or scheme or do anything else to the Western Alliance...it will probably fall apart and everyone on the continent dies. Including Malicia.

So, her options are now really just

1) Die.

And I don't think she's really admitted that to herself yet. She still thinks there's something she can do, some way to scheme or plot her way out of this. And...honestly, there probably is. But I don't think Cat is gonna let her get away with it.

(Personally, I think Malicia's best chance is pulling an Irritant. If she abdicated in favor of that other one currently calling herself Dread Empress and went off and waited tables for 5 years, that might be enough time for everything involved to collapse and people might actually want her back. I just doubt she can give up control to even seriously consider the option, let alone do that.)

Liliet

Yeah Malicia's non-"die" option is just "abdicate and flee".

Deworld

She would need to flee to another continent at least, if not further. Cat is really angry about the Night of Knives.

Liliet

I honestly don't think the Night of Knives features in Catherine's decision making process as prominently as she keeps insisting it does. The real arguments are what she said to Amadeus way back when: that Malicia cannot be trusted, that she's not an asset to any arrangement, that she set on fire every bridge she had and there's no reason to expect she won't do it again.

Cat just does her best to keep to Callowan mores, and sometimes to her it means insisting her motivation is revenge when she would have foregone revenge without twitching an eyebrow if it were advantageous.

Miles

Black! Planning to frame Cat by using a whole lake's worth of fire is a new low, even for you.

ninegardens

So... here's a dumb question: Do we believe that Cat has a plan. What I mean by that is... she obviously has plans... but at the same time is a key aspect of her plan "Do a bunch of confusing crap, and then trust that Black has three Aces up his sleeve, and can handle the rest of it"?

Its a story. Its kind of a strategic plan. But its like... got huge bits missing, and she knows that.

Barthumphries

It's like fighting that giant rat scourge that could redo time and see stories. They had to hide their plans from themselves to have a chance at making them work. If they have a complete ready plan then they have a story which means that the Bard can see it because she can see all stories. So they have to have something that isn't fully formed to get it to work.

Liliet

I think Cat has a toolbox rather than a plan, as usual. There is a wide range of outcomes that would be satisfactory for her, and a wide range of possibilities she cannot account for because of the number of wild cards in play. So all she can do is set up and get ready to handle things as they come.

And I bet we haven't seen the whole of the setup yet, not all the ideas she has.

therealgridlock

Boy oh boy, everyone's writing long deep dives into the characters on this one!

I'm just gonna say that I was right, Akua is having a genuine character growth moment and realizing that she still craves the emotionally mature and reasonable nature of Cat and the others.

She's a hairs breadth away from realizing that good isn't something you do because it gets you something, the thing you get is the good action. That it has value in itself.

Once she does its Vader redemption train all the way, with epic yEETing Malicia out the tower and probably some other stuff. Gonna be cool.

jefepato

Being good did get her something, though. It got her friends and companions who weren't constantly measuring her back for a stabbing.

The main perk of being good is that people who are not tremendous assholes will be willing to associate with you. That is actually a HUGE benefit for anyone with typical social needs.

It is noteworthy that even back when Akua was totally on board with being a tremendous asshole, her favorite people in the world were her father (who not only loved her dearly but had no real interest in this Praesi backstabbing nonsense) and Barika (who wasn't good for much other than being loyal and more or less her friend).

I mean, yes, ideally people should do good because they like doing good. But there are certainly reasons why even a selfish person might stick with being good-ish.

Akua will very likely end up doing...something resembling the right thing, in the end. The real question is what her final fate will be. I doubt that Dread Emperor Amadeus (should he actually manage that) would ever trust her as his Warlock, but then, Praes might turn out rather differently once the goblinfire dies down.

(Man. It's always so tense when you finish an archive binge and have to start waiting for new chapters with everyone else. Maybe I should start reading Ward or something?)

Liliet

"Should he actually manage that" more like "should he fail in wriggling out of that" 😊

ninegardens

If you are at the end of an archive binge, and looking for things to read, may I recommend "Pale" and also "All Night Laundry" (Webcomic)

Jefepato

Thanks for the suggestions! It sounds like Pale is set in the same world as Pact (though not a direct sequel), which is interesting; I did enjoy Pact, although there was a lot going on in that story and I admittedly felt a bit lost sometimes. (As far as other Wildbow works go, I've read Worm and Pact, but not Twig and only a few early chapters of Ward.)

...although I just realized that I haven't caught up on The Gods are Bastards in a while. I should probably do that, too.

Mental Mouse

All Night Laundry is now complete including the epilogues, and it is glorious!

The Gods are Bastards is still on hiatus last I've heard, but Webb is fighting the burnout he incurred on that with a new serial, Only Villains Do That, which is pretty promising so far. Basically, a pair from our world is recruited as The Hero and the Dark Lord for a godly game in another world. The Hero is an utter weeb, but we're following the Dark Lord... who's kind of an asshole, but... just an ordinary asshole, who's a little put off by being recruited for Ultimate Evil. I need to catch up with that one too, but after I catch up with PGTE....

Frivolous

I'm really surprised that Akua took the body, even with all its nice accessories. I'm way too risk averse to accept such a poisoned chalice.

Some of my belated realizations:

1. Akua got friendzoned.
2. On and off, I've been musing over the possible effects of the different ways Named envision their Name. Alaya's gloves, Amadeus's gears, etc.

It came to me just now that Catherine's seeing her Name as a big mammalian beast means her Name can sometimes act of its own accord, without her direction, like any other animal.

In contrast, Alaya's perfectly fitted gloves could mean that her Name of Dread Empress only ever acts as she does.

Shveiran

Catherine has always seen her Name as a beast, even as the Squire. It never got dr. Jekyll – Mr Hyde before, so I don't see why it would now.

Frivolous

Shveiran: Oh, I didn't mean to convey that I thought her Name being a beast was a bad thing.

Having a dog who loves you is really great. The dog has better senses. The dog is awake when you're asleep. The dog has sharp teeth.

Catherine's once and future Name being a beast is good the same way.

I just hope her Name doesn't hump her leg the same way our dog sometimes does mine.

Liliet

AKSEJDFHSKDF AKUA GOT FRIENDZONED SHE DID

Mental Mouse

Ahem, Cat did not get "friendzoned". "Friendzoned" is how a horny guy interprets "no, I don't actually want to be your girlfriend... please don't go nuts about that and kill me!"

Abrakadabra

What? That is bullshit.

Sir Nil

""You've not simply been wandering around drinking and fucking the Lady of the Lake."

Well, he'd not done just that."

Don't die of a broken pelvis now.

Frivolous

Sir Nil: It never occurred to me until now that Ranger's aspects of Learn, Perfect, and Transcend don't just apply to the battlefield, they also apply to the bedroom.

And she mentioned in Regard that she's always tapping her aspects.

After centuries of life, she must be an unbelievably skilled lover by now. She could topple kingdoms over and over again by seducing kings, queens, and princes. No one could resist her. It's not like she even gets tired.

There would be a whole genre of Calernian poetry and theater dedicated to her exploits. It would be called...

RANGEROTICA!!

Abnaxis

I wonder if Akua can't hear the song because Amadeus is planning to burn down the tower, and Creation has already decided he's going to succeed...?

For that matter, there is NO WAY Amadeus becomes Dread Emperor now. Never mind he's burning down the Tower and everyone in it just to get the song out of his head, he's sending every high-profile, highborn veteran from the Legions into the Tower where he fully intends on incinerating them with the rest of the nobility. There's no way his influence with the Legions survives that, and that influence is the keystone to any chance of him ruling Praes.

Earl of Purple

No, he isn't? He's told the one-armed veteran there to ensure her superior goes, not asking her to go herself. High Lady Takisha and her court of Taghreb nobles, not the veterans of the Legions.

Abnaxis

Who exactly do you think is in High Lady Takisha's "court of Tahgreb nobles"? It's the same high placed veterans who Amadeus just requested to band together to push her to go to the Tower.

Earl of Purple

Mostly, it's other Taghreb nobles. Not all veterans were exiled nobility; most are peasants, merchant's sons, house servants, and so on. Not all nobles join the Legions, either; Amadeus build the Legions so nepotism doesn't work within them, so a noble would have to start at the bottom like everyone else, and could find a Duni orphan, a Soninke servant or worse an orc or goblin promoted above them and still be expected to obey. Most nobles have a better route to power than the Legions, and most legionnaires don't. Probably most just got enough money to open a pub somewhere or buy a farm so they can do what their family did, or what they want to do.

Abnaxis

I'm not saying they're are a ton of veterans who are nobles, nor that there are a ton of nobles who are veterans.

However, the veterans who are also nobles are influential and well-known in their community. Take Lady Kaisha here, for example. She's effectively turned her holdings into a retirement home for veterans of the Legions—that's hundreds to thousands of people who will see Amadeus leading her to her death as the betrayal it is, and whose lives will be adversely affected when Amadeus cooks their liegelady in the Tower.

That's not the kind of black mark Amadeus can recover from if he wants to rule Praes. The greenskins won't hold it against him because as long as he isn't opening their throats for field rituals Amadeus is still an improvement, but greenskins aren't enough.

Earl of Purple

He didn't ask her to go to Ater. He asked her to ensure the High Lady and her court went to Ater. Lady Kaisha isn't a High Lady, and I don't think she's important enough to actually be one of the High Lady's courtiers, either. Note how she's able to meet with Amadeus with basically no warning, on her own lands. If she were a courtier, she'd be at court with High Lady Talisha.

Liliet

This ^^

Liliet

Amadeus did not place his veterans as nobility, this woman is an exception because it was already her birthright. He specifically says that a campaign to stack nobility with his people would have received a backlash. The nobility is the nobility, Amadeus's ideological opposition.

Liliet

No, he's sending the nobles there, not the veterans. He even said that there are few nobles among the veterans.

Deworld

He just sent them to Ater. There's no indication if he actually intends to burn them down as well or if he wants another force on his side. Though yes, considering it's nobles we're talking about, it's more likely former than latter, but still.

Liliet

There's clear differentiation about who they're talking about: the veteran he's talking to says that her influence should be enough to do what he wants. HER influence. These are not the people who will do things because Amadeus asks them.

Mental Mouse

I think she's not hearing the song because she's not actually a realistic candidate at this point. Too tainted by Cat's teachings, and being pushed toward the Warlock name besides (though I don't think she's an actual candidate for that Name either, as sorcery was never her passion).

Mike E.

I am so far behind on this series (thank you busy life), but damn it is good to see Amadeus being Amadeus in all his crazy machinations.

Chapter 12: String

"There are three decisions that can only be mistakes: trusting a peace in the Free Cities, intervening in an Alamans succession and campaigning in the Wasteland."

– Queen Matilda the Elder of Callow

It was General Sacker I'd wanted to talk to, as her informal patroness, but instead I found all three of the leaders of the Rebel Legions sitting on the other side of the scrying bowl.

That made an amusingly odd trio to look at, I must admit. Sacker was still the same old sack of wrinkles that looked deceptively half asleep, but General Mok was even larger than Hune had been on top of having half his face severely burned with spellfire. The difference in size between them somehow made the last of three stand out even more: General Jaiyana Seket of the Second Legion, a dark-haired and grey-eyed Taghreb in her late fifties. She'd been the only general already in the Wasteland to desert Malicia after the empress pulled her mind control trick a few years back. Only a little over half her legion had followed her, though, the rest sticking with the Tower.

That made the junior of the three generals in their informal hierarchy, considering that Sacker had filled her legion's depleted ranks from deserters and the Jacks had reported that Mok's own Third Legion now fielded six thousand soldiers instead of the standard four. Being the one with the relationship with Callow – and therefore its forges and foodstuffs – had put Sacker more or less on equal footing with Mok, however, so it wasn't quite as straightforward a balance of power as one might think. General Seket tended to be the kingmaker in contested decisions, after all, which was a form of influence as well. It'd all worked out as being surprisingly communal for a military hierarchy, no one making a push for primacy.

Which unfortunately meant that I wasn't negotiating with one person but three.

"I understand that the Grand Alliance has interests in Praes," General Mok said, voice rumbling, "but it doesn't get to impose terms here. Who rules in Ater is not to be determined in Salia or Laure."

I wasn't sure whether not mentioning Levante – the Dominion's capital – reflected good intel about the fate of the Pilgrim's Blood or simple dismissal of Levant, but either way he wasn't wrong. These days the Blood wasn't agreeing on much of anything, except fighting the war to the end.

"That ship sailed the moment Malicia began actively warring on us through proxies and attacking our diplomatic efforts," I curtly replied. "She is, even now, the ally of the Dead King. Sovereignty's all well and good, but it doesn't buy you the rest of the world pretending nothing's happened when you piss on the common table."

General Seket looked amused at the turn of phrase – not a noble flower, this one, but a former bandit who'd chosen the Legions over the noose – and Sacker continued looking at me through those half-lidded eyes. Mok was getting angrier, though. I got the impression that out of them he most believed in the Dread Empire that'd been sold to the Legions after the Reforms: a place of order and rough fairness, where peoples that'd once been left out in the cold were slowly brought into the fold instead. It'd been the mind control he objected to on a fundamental level, not necessarily Malicia calling the Rebel Legions to heel. Sacker stepped in before Mok could speak again, perhaps sensing my irritation with the ogre was rising. I had little patience for people who let their ideals get in the way of looking at what was actually happening around them.

"No one is denying that you have a right to retaliate for attacks on the Grand Alliance," Sacker said. "Our concern is that it seems few of the decisions relating to the empire's future will be made by Praesi."

"That Malicia has to go isn't even something even worth arguing about," I bluntly replied. "I will cheerfully massacre anything and anyone who gets in the way of that. If your issues are with the details of Malicia's succession, however, then we have a lot more room for compromise."

"We did not leave the empress' service to now defend her," General Seket said. "The matter my colleagues are tiptoeing around is different: to be frank, none of us want to raise a sword to win Dread Empress Foundling the Tower."

I almost laughed in their faces, fighting that down to a snort with great effort.

"If that's your worry, then we have no issue," I said. "I have no interest whatsoever in climbing the Tower."

"Akua Sahelian would not be a more acceptable candidate," General Mok plainly said.

Huh. First Sargon had guessed that, now the Rebel Legions. The High Lord of Wolof I could forgive, but some of these people had served in Callow over the years. Did none of them realize that if I were known to have backed the Doom of Liesse for rule over the Wasteland I'd get strung up in the streets by my own people? It wasn't like the Folly was some old wound barely remembered. Almost everyone in Callow had lost at least a distant relative when a city the size of Liesse got murdered.

"I've no interest in backing her claim either, assuming she makes one," I replied just as plainly. "If I am to support anyone's claim, it will be that of Amadeus of the Green Stretch."

"You have been talking with Sepulchral for years," Sacker pointed out.

"And we already discussed all this years ago," I waspishly replied. "Why are we revisiting these grounds now?"

"Years ago you were not leading an army invading Praes," General Mok replied. "We require different assurances now that battle is on the horizon."

A little rich to say that, considering that they were at least three weeks behind Sepulchral's army on the march and she was herself at least a week behind Marshal Nim. Maybe closer to two.

"I'm not interested in putting Abreha Mirembé on the throne," I explicitly spelled out. "I see no need to make war on her, however, and she was a convenient ally against Malicia. Should she surrender to whoever claims the Tower peacefully I'll even argue for leniency on her behalf."

I actually believe she might take that deal, and so did Scribe. Sepulchral had rebelled because Malicia had cornered her, not because she'd intended to make a play for the Tower. That attack from Malicia had come because High Lady Abreha had been muscling in on the empress in the first place, of course, but that was Praesi politics for you. It was Malicia that Sepulchral couldn't afford to surrender to, she wouldn't be so constrained if someone else held the Tower. And someone who hadn't been rebelled against could afford to offer her amnesty without taking a major hit to their reputation with the nobility. Looking closely at the three, I could see that General Seket was leaning the way of taking the bargain I'd offered: joining our armies to defeat the Loyalist Legions together, guaranteeing them a seat at the table in the aftermath. Mok was still very much against, and Sacker hard to read as she'd ever been.

"I cannot agree to putting imperial forces under the authority of a foreign nation," General Mok finally said. "Not even in this manner."

Sacker did not contradict him, a silence that rang loudly. I eyed the three of them coolly.

"Then it's my turn to ask questions," I said. "If not to reinforce my expedition, why is your army marching north?"

"You are not owed an answer," the ogre general flatly replied.

"You weren't owed food and steel," I sharply said. "You still got it. Careful about what bridges you burn, Mok. There are no second chances at this game."

"No offence was meant, I'm sure," General Seket intervened. "We set out to march, Queen Catherine, because if we do not the civil war will end without our having ever raised a sword."

I eyed her, distinctly unimpressed.

"So you're either foolish enough to march an army without a campaign plan or baldly opportunistic enough to want to sit out the fight and leverage your numbers for concessions afterwards," I said. "Which is it?"

"You put a hard slant on trying to avoid fratricide, Black Queen," Sacker curtly replied. "You blame us for not being eager to fight legions still filled with friends and kin, comrades we have fought with for decades. With the situation on the knife's edge, we will first attempt diplomacy."

My fingers clenched, then unclenched. I did not like the sound of that.

"Elaborate," I said.

"We will speak directly with the Black Knight," General Mok said. "And offer simple terms: should Dread Empress Malicia abdicate, we will return to the fold and crush Sepulchral together."

"Malicia will never take that deal," I replied without batting an eye. "Or if she does, it'll be as a trick to get you to dispose of her enemy before getting around to you."

"It's not her we're offering the deal to," General Seket said. "Nim is as good as her word. If the last legions turn on the Tower, Malicia will have to abdicate. All she has left in Ater are the First and the Fourth, which went skeletal from desertions."

"And should the Black Knight refuse you?" I asked.

"She won't," Mok confidently said.

Ah, so that was it. Sacker genuinely had been on the fence, I just hadn't offered enough to convince her. Mok had been against our armies joining from the start, though, because he'd already had a plan that was more palatable to him: cutting a deal with Marshal Nim.

"But if she does?" I pressed.

"Then you get your way, Black Queen," General Sacker said, showing pale needle-like teeth. "Long live Dread Emperor Amadeus. In the defence of his cause, we will seek friendship with the same Grand Alliance that recognized him in Salia."

I drummed my fingers on the table. The tremor had the water rippling, their faces rippling with it. And with that easy questions settled there was only one left to ask.

"And if the Black Knight does takes your deal," I asked, "where would that leave us?"

"The Legions of Terror are the sword and shield of Praes," General Seket said, tone conciliating, "but it doesn't need to come to blows between us."

"What it means is that there'll be no more talk of you dictating anything, Queen of Callow," General Mok rumbled.

Huh, I thought. This might just be the first time I'd been the hand that fed instead of the biter.

I wasn't enjoying the change of pace.

—

There was need of a fresh war council after that. Yet I found that, in practice, learning that there was a chance the Rebel Legions might turn on us did not affect our plans much.

"Being generous," Juniper said, "the rebels are a month behind the battle unless either we or Marshal Nim start wasting time. It'll be settled by the time they get there."

"If they can take the Twilight Ways they could cut ahead of Sepulchral, at least," I pointed out.

Dread Empress Sepulchral's army could not practically use the Ways, according to our spies. Some of its mages could access them, but they couldn't yet make stable portals. The Rebel Legions were another story. I glanced at Vivienne questioningly, getting an uncertain palm wiggle.

"The Jacks aren't sure either way," she said. "They have enough mages in the ranks for it to be possible, but it's not knowledge that grows on trees. I'd tend to err on the side of caution and assume they have some capacity with the Ways but not enough for their entire army."

"That could still be trouble," Grandmaster Talbot said. "Should we defeat the Black Knight in battle only for her to retreat in good order, a sudden swell of reinforcements could tip the balance against us. How large are their numbers, now that they're finally marching?"

"Thirteen thousand legionaries," I said. "They should have little to no goblin munitions, at least, unlike the Loyalist Legions."

For the same reason the Army of Callow had finally filled its own stocks: I'd bought theirs.

"I do not understand this hesitation on your parts," Lady Aquiline admitted. "We are yet sixteen thousand, or close, and the Black Knight commands only twenty-three thousand soldiers. I have seen the Army of Callow triumph against steeper odds than this."

"You haven't," Juniper bluntly informed her. "You've seen us beat inferior or borderline peer armies, Lady Aquiline. You have never seen us fight a force that is at least our equal and possibly our superior."

She wasn't wrong, even if she was being pessimistic. We did have some advantages going for us. There were five legions marching with the Black Knight – the Eight, the Eleventh, the Thirteen, the Fourteenth and Nim's own Seventh – but the Legions of Terror didn't typically field cavalry. The Thirteenth did, having been raised from Callowan bandits and rebels, but only six hundred horsemen or so. The vast majority of Nim's three thousand and change cavalry was auxiliaries. Taghreb and Soninke light horse sent by nobles, which my Order of the Broken Bells could shred if they engaged in melee. My entire army was made up of veterans, while the Legions would have fresher recruits, and we also had a decisive Named advantage.

On the other hand, the officer corps of the Legions would be flatly better than ours and we'd be down on mage firepower as well as general numbers. It was still very much a winnable battle, in my opinion, but there would be no repeat of the Third at Sarcella or the ridiculous odds against undead my soldiers had frequently taken on. We were facing the same army that'd held the Vales against the greater strength of Procer, and I had no reason to believe it'd lost a step since then. Throwing another thirteen thousand veteran infantry down on the Black Knight's side of the scale would make for... hard odds, to say the least. At a minimum, it'd take field battles off the table.

To minimize the risks, we had to finish it before the Rebel Legions got there.

"Perhaps we should seek allies," Lord Razin suggested. "Would Dread Empress Sepulchral not be amenable to helping us against her rival?"

"It was my instinct as well," I told him, "but she's broken off talks with us. At our best guess, she's hoping we'll clash with the Black Knight before she gets there and she can pick off the weakened Loyalist Legions."

It would have been damned useful to string Abreha Mirembé along, but the trouble when dealing with people who'd survived at the top of the Wasteland for decades was that they tended to be rather hard to fool. Sepulchral had correctly assessed I wasn't going to help put her on the throne, so she'd decided to use me to weaken her enemy and finish climbing the Tower on her own. Odds were she figured I wouldn't actually fight a war to keep her off the throne, especially if I'd first taken losses casting Malicia down from it. To my distaste, she was fairly accurate in that judgement. I didn't want to march west again until my father held the Tower, but if Sepulchral dug in and offered good terms I might not have a choice.

How large a portion of Procer was I willing to sacrifice to get my chosen candidate on the throne? Abreha wasn't just a cutthroat snake: she was an old cutthroat snake. In Praes those were rare for a reason. She knew how to survive when the storms came calling.

"That's another twenty thousand we have no certainties about," Aisha noted. "We need to have a good grasp on the pace those force march at at before engaging, else we will be taking risks."

"Half of Sepulchral's army is levies that'll break under steady munitions fire," Juniper grunted. "But the other half is dangerous enough, I'll grant."

Like my Marshal of Callow, I could admit that I wasn't worried about fighting Sepulchral's army on the field. She had a little over six thousand household troops, which would be tough customers as that breed always was, but we had twice her horse in better quality. The thousand wavemen her allies in Nok had sent might be some trouble, true. They were supposed to be the finest archers in Praes, using great horn bows and honing their trade defending the ships of the House of Sahel. We were fighting the former High Lady of Aksum so naturally there'd be monsters too. It was what the city was famous for. But after having faced the Hidden Horror's own menagerie of nightmares, I did not expect Aksum's to impress me much.

"Unless the enemy tempo changes, it looks like our best shot at solving this cleanly remains a decisive victory against Marshal Nim," I finally said.

If we forced the Black Knight's army to surrender, the Rebel Legions would sink back into irrelevance. And Sepulchral couldn't take a swing at us lightly: it'd put her at war against the Grand Alliance. Much more likely she'd march straight on Ater instead, and I had no real issue with that. I was skeptical she'd be able to take the City of Gates, but more than willing for her to soften up the capital some before the Army of Callow took a crack at it.

"Agreed," the Hellhound replied. "I'll want reports from the Jacks about the pace of every army to ensure we give battle with the best margin possible, but in around three weeks seems to be that window of opportunity."

I nodded in agreement.

"Well," I said, "council's done, it seems. Get your affairs in order, ladies and gentlemen, because come dawn we begin our march south."

—

Even in Hakram's absence his phalanges were functioning like a well-oiled machine.

That left me in the odd position of, well, not actually having anything to do. It would be a week at least before I next spoke to Cordelia Hasenbach, Indrani was spending the evening with Masego and Vivienne was busy twisting arms are making promises through the Observatory to secure names for a plan she'd come up with that might kneecap the Black Knight in the field. Feeling restless, I took to the night and the dirt streets of our camp.

Whenever I stopped moving it felt like I was losing ground: even when I stayed still, the world kept moving around me. The first act of my Praesi campaign had been an unequivocal victory, for all that Malicia and her Black Knight had scored blood of their own, but from now on things would get... complicated.

The number of moving pieces had increased and this wouldn't be the Graveyard all over again. I wouldn't be able to predict the whole array of leadership I was fighting the way I'd been able to read the Tyrant, Pilgrim and First Prince. Too many people, not enough of them Named. Legions rebel and loyalist, Sepulchral's would-be army of conquest and hidden behind them all whatever my father's scheme for this fight would be. I knew better than to believe he wouldn't be putting a finger on the scale of the battle that would determine the fate of Praes for the coming decades. That he had yet to truly come out of the woodworks worried me more than I cared to admit. He wasn't proud, as a man, at least not in ways that got in the way of him achieving his goals.

So if he'd not reached out to me, made common cause, it was because some of our objectives were at odds. I was not so arrogant as to pretend that the prospect of the fighting the man who'd taught me did not inspire in me a... healthy amount of caution.

The sound of steel on steel drew my attention as I drifted close to drilling grounds. There shouldn't be any legionaries out at this hour, and a few steps confirmed there weren't. The two people moving swiftly back and forth across the dusty ground weren't my soldiers. The Silver Huntress deftly flicked her spear, barbed tip tickling at the Squire's shield, and as Arthur Foundling took a cautious step back she circled around him to probe his flank. I approached quietly, laying my staff against the side of the fence before resting my elbows atop it. The Squire was being careful, keeping his shield up and only venturing out of his shell to try to rush her and leverage his advantage close up, but on open grounds like this the tactic was a mistake.

I winced as I saw him try a charge, banking on the Huntress being slow to retreat her spear after a feint, only to find out that Alexis was quite light-footed of maintaining their distance. She feinted his leg, then darted back up to slap the side of his helm hard when he lowered his shield to cover himself. The boy winced at the pain but did not complain. As well he shouldn't: if that blow had come from someone out to kill him, it would have gone right through his throat instead. If Arthur was to ever to score a blow, I thought, he needed to pressure her from the start. Push forward steadily, learn to tell apart the feints from the real attacks and close the distance while she was committed to striking him.

I watched in silence as the two continued to move across the dust, the Mantle of Woe's hood warm over my head, and to my pleased surprise I saw that the Squire was learning. No more bull rushing out of him, though he wasted a lot of time trying to figure out how to parry a spear with a sword. You couldn't, really, not reliably. From Named to not, sure, but not between peer opponents. The Huntress worked him through a pretty straightforward sequence – shield edges the spear to the side, sword lunge for the throat as you dart forward – and he began trying it out. He took to it quickly. Unnaturally quickly, really, I decided as my brow rose.

His reflexes weren't getting sharper or his footing more flexible, but with every try he moved a little faster through the sequence. A little smoother. By the eighth attempt his execution was impressive enough I would have thought he'd spent months drilling it. Name, I thought. Has to be. The spar ended after Arthur finally scored a blow on the Silver Huntress' breastplate, though I suspected she'd actually allow him to land it. He was a quick lad, but Alexis the Argent was Indrani's superior in close combat. The two of them seemed surprised when they noticed I was there. Night was a friend to me in all sorts of ways. I clapped politely, to the older heroine's amusement, but Arthur looked embarrassed.

They had water and cloths on a stone near the fence, so when they came to quench their thirst and get ride of the worst of the sweat it was only natural that we chat a bit.

"I'm rather ashamed you saw that, Your Majesty," Arthur said. "I have been meaning to expand my experience fighting Named, but it is slow going."

"In terms of pure swordsmanship you're actually better than I was at your age," I noted. "Not as good as the Lone Swordsman was, maybe, but there's a reason I relied on tricks to kill the man."

"It's empty whining on his part," the Huntress scoffed. "He improves daily. The Lady's the only person I've ever seen pick up drills that fast."

"The Ranger?" Arthur breathed out. "That's... I've always admired what I heard of her in stories, truth be told."

Oh dear. I shared a look with Alexis, the two of us silently agreeing it would be for the best if he never met the woman in question. The Silver Huntress had a much harsher opinion of the Lady of the Lake than Archer. I'd learned as much because she was not shy in expressing it even to strangers. It'd made for pleasant common ground over the months of campaigning. Still, I couldn't let myself get distracted by this little detour. I'd had a nugget of information I wanted to dig for.

"Were you always this quick to catch on?" I casually asked. "It seems like the sort of thing the Order would have reported on."

He ruefully smiled.

"No," Arthur admitted. "It was after the fight with the puppet of the Black Knight, Your Majesty. The way it handled Sapan and I, then the way you stepped in and took care of it..."

His gauntlets clenched tight around his sword.

"I had believed myself a fine blade, but after that I couldn't deny I still have so much to Learn," the Squire said.

Ah, an old friend had returned. Was he leaning on that to improve his fighting? I'd not been able to do the same, back when I had the same aspect. Fighting had been the one thing it didn't help me with.

"Aspect," I noted, seeing no point in further subtlety. "Have you seen the same kind of leap forward in your studies?"

He looked baffled.

"No," he said. "Should I have?"

I hummed, shaking my head.

"It's somewhat reassuring that you did not," I said. "There's a balance to these things, Squire."

The Silver Huntress grunted in agreement.

"No power comes without a hook," Alexis the Argent said. "Beware of anything that pretends otherwise."

Still, the Gods Above liked their nasty surprises, didn't they? The Squire had gotten a flavour of the aspect attuned to martial pursuits after a defeat against the Black Knight, while being guaranteed weeks if not months of a relatively safe environment filled with veteran Named to train with. By the time Nim encountered the boy again for the continuation of their pattern, he was going to be a regular fucking monster. In an abstract sense my sympathies lay with Marshal Nim, because this all felt very much like the Heavens hooking an Evil fish and reeling her in, but in a practical sense our little Squire had my backing to the hilt. I'd put Indrani on training him too, maybe see if the Barrow Sword was amenable to pitching in.

"I know to be wary of shortcuts," Arthur promised, then sent me an almost shy look. "Perhaps we may spar one day, Your Majesty? Many consider you among the finest swords in Callow."

"My tricks are best kept up my sleeve," I drily said. "We'll see about getting you a few sessions with Archer, though. She tends to be my better close up."

The boy did not quite manage to hide his disappointment but I quashed the pang I felt at the sight. I already walked the line perhaps a little too finely when it came to teaching Arthur Foundling. An occasional distant instructor tossing a few lessons his way shouldn't be too prone to ending up story fodder, I figured, but considering he had a draw with the Black Knight coming up the last thing I wanted was stepping into a formal teacher's role. That was a good way to stumble into buying his draw with my death. The Squire retired after chatting a little longer, but to my surprise the Silver Huntress did not. Had I offended her by mentioning Indrani training someone she was already training?

No, I decided, looking at her tense face. That wasn't the tension of someone keeping a lid on their anger but the gritted teeth of someone forcing themselves to venture into uncomfortable grounds.

"I want to talk," Alexis the Argent said, then bit her cheek. "Please."

My hand found the staff of dead yew never too far from my hand, closing around the rough wood. I'd gotten used to the contrast between the Huntress' startlingly girlish high-pitched voice and her rough appearance – broken nose and plain face, the messy bun of red hair and calloused hands – but I'd noticed she tended to speak slowly and curtly to take the edge off it. No doubt she'd been mercilessly mocked for the contrast as a child: it was the kind of thing even my fellow orphanage girls would have narrowed in on, much less children as skilled at cruelty as the Refuge kids had been. This time, though, the curtness was not an affection on her part. She was fighting the words as they came out.

I couldn't think of many things I had a hand in that'd get this much emotion out of her.

"I'm listening," I said.

Her lips pressed tight, like she was trying to clench them.

"The Lady's in Praes," she said. "With the Carrion Lord. Your spies said so."

I nodded.

"You think we're going to fight her?" the Huntress asked.

"I'd prefer not to," I admitted. "But I don't think she's going to give us a choice."

At some point, my father and I would clash. His continued silence spoke to that. And when that moment came, I did not believe it would be armies that marched. It would be a war of knives, not battalions, and the Ranger was the finest knife at his disposal. On my end of things, it was not a coincidence that all the surviving children of Refuge were with my host. I had planned for this eventuality in my own way.

"She won't," Alexis roughly said. "That's not how she..."

She hesitated, stumbling over words before abandoning the sentence entirely.

"I hate her," the Silver Huntress candidly admitted. "I honestly do. But I won't lie. She didn't think she was being cruel when she worked us. She thought she was toughening us up for the real world, so we could live like she does."

"But you don't buy that," I murmured.

"We came out of Refuge fine killers, Black Queen," Alexis said. "For that I'm thankful. But she was also trying to make us all into these... she has this idea, this ideal, of 'full' persons that need no one else. That bind with others only because they want to, not because they ever need to."

She spat to the side.

"And that fucked us," the Huntress bluntly said. "Cocky still hasn't told a living soul her name. John got himself killed because he thought he needed to prove he was our equal. Lysander once spent most a year learning how to make shoes, when we were kids, because he thought just buying them would mean he was weak."

I watched her silently, waiting for the last two names. Named. The last of the band of five that had never formed.

"I fight when I shouldn't," Alexis the Argent reluctantly admitted. "Because it feels like backing down if I don't. But Indrani's the worst off, because of all of us she's the one that bought into it."

"I think the woman you knew," I gently said, "only shares so much with the woman I know."

She didn't like that.

"I know," the Huntress bit out angrily, slamming a fist on the groaning fence. "I know, fuck."

I let it go, this once, but my eye narrowed. It did not go unnoticed.

"She's not the same as she was when she left to pick up John," Alexis forced out. "She tries. I can see it, Black Queen, that sometimes the urge is there but she fucking bites down on it."

"You don't have to forgive her," I quietly said. "She's not owed that."

The Silver Huntress faintly smiled.

"Sometimes I still wonder if Lysander got killed because Indrani went soft from her years with the Woe," she confessed. "Whether it'd have gone down different, if she'd not turned into the kind of person who tries."

Sometimes, looking at what Ranger had left in the children she'd raised, I wondered what it was Amadeus of the Green Stretch had left in me. What curse, what scar. That there would be one I had no doubt: one did not learn from a madman without learning some manner of madness with it.

"She got to us deep, the Lady," Alexis tiredly said. "Even where we think she didn't. But maybe that's what we have – scars from the same fang. That's for us to handle, anyway. It's not what I came to you for."

"Then what did you come for?" I asked.

"When Ranger comes for us, and she will," Alexis the Argent said, voice eerily calm, "she'll strike at every weakness. As hard as she can. She'll try to break us."

My fingers clenched.

"It's how she believes love works, I think," the Huntress quietly said. "To make someone stronger, even if it hurts them. So she will come for us, Catherine Foundling, with loving cruelty. To crown us, welcome us as women. Peers."

Peers, the way she'd treated the Calamities in my Name dreams as the Squire. The way she treated those, I thought, that had not needed her hand to come into strength. There were people, I thought, that Ranger might be lovely to. My father was one of them, because there were things about him she admired. It excused none of it, as far as I was concerned.

"She is not my peer," I coldly said. "And I'll teach her why, should she come for any of you."

"I can take care of myself," Alexis brusquely dismissed. "But Indrani..."

The Silver Huntress bit her lip.

"That's what I want from you, Black Queen," she finally said.
"Don't let the Lady turn her back into who she used to be. That's all I ask."

A moment, as she choked on the word.

"Please."

The moon glared down at us, a full circle wreathing us both in pale.

"I won't," I swore.

Droughtbringer

Go boost! It'll make you feel good inside!

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

burnsh

Ranger has been such a monumental shadow hanging over the story. She's like that one optional endgame level boss that's specifically built to fuck you over in the most unfair way possible.

I really cannot wait to see Cat finally go head to head with her, in whatever form that takes.

boballab

It's worse than that, she is by far the single most OP character in the story even over the Bard. Remember back when the elven courts still had Winter and Summer, she would go into the Winter Court every time the seasons turned to it and pluck out the eye of the second most powerful Winter elf. She periodically would bust through all the defenses of Keter, just to keep the rust from forming and she fought the single most powerful Court Elf, the Summer Queen, to a draw and that being is rated "god tier" level.

Zach

Keep in mind that Ranger's ability is specifically geared towards learning how to adapt to people in fights, and the Fey can't learn. So once she manages to beat someone like the Prince of Nightfall, it'll be easy each subsequent time.

Ranger also excels the most at beating people in direct combat, so someone who fights like Catherine is well suited towards potentially defeating her.

Deworld

Plus you always need to consider the possible story. In this universe, even the most powerful beings won't survive if the narrative itself sets them up to death. And that's exactly what Cat got all Ranger's pupils for – if not to outright kill her, then to defeat her in some way if it comes to this.

boballab

IMO, Story is the one glaring weakness in Ranger and it was Blacks ability at manipulating Story that got her attention and it will be through Story that Cat will beat Ranger if they face off.

ruduen

Oof. The biggest problem with Cat admitting it's a mess is that it means options and plans are limited this early on, and that narratively it's going to turn out as an even bigger mess since a few twists are going to be involved. Black and Ranger might not be at complete odds, but it sounds like there's going to be some fighting between groups before the tower's crashing into the ground. Still, we've gotten the seeds for a few different lines of potential catastrophe and potential plots, like just what Vivienne's up to.

It sounds like there are at least 5 groups in play (Callow, Malicia's Army, Rebels, Sepulchral, and Amadeus). I think the past, it's mentioned that even armies or campaigns can have stories guiding them, so I wonder if we'll get a clearer look at any of the ones that are out and about now.

WuseMajor

Six. Bard is here manipulating things too.

Mental Mouse

The Wandering Bard still isn't just a piece on the board, she's a player competing with Cat – and except perhaps for the Dead King, I don't think there's a third player on their level of Story manipulation.

Itarion

A 6th group: the orc tribes. It looks like they'll end up aligned against Malicia, but they're yet another agenda on the board.

Deworld

Orc tribes are, for now, just gathering for some raids. They have no hand in the upcoming battle.

Sinead

But if they wished to show up, I am sure Hakram could Find a way.

Shveiran

Eh. I mean, you are right, but several of the contenders are a month or more away, and the envoys from the Clans left some time ago.

I wouldn't count them out, especially if another player pulls some strings. All it would really take is Masego opening the Ways for them, after all.

Sinead

Why I find the interest in having the solution to this conflict to be talking instead of a battle is because if the Clans show up, they become a very convenient Big Stick when it comes to having people sit at the table. Plus, that table is carved over with the legend of The Woe, so it's a symbolic pointed reminder.

Plus I wonder how long the talks would be for the Orcs, since Hakram would have started working on the envoys as soon as they set out, and then sitting down with them and other parties that are nominally his allies.

I really want a Hakram Interlude (probably North I?) soon. Though perhaps it'll be a Hakram and Ivah Interlude.

I just like the idea of a peace conference in the Wasteland being held by the factions that are likely all sick of this war.

edrey

i put my money that the bard is with Sepulchral, it just look like a perfect opening for her.

ninegardens

Sepulchral has no Named (to our current knowledge). Shouldn't that make things.... more complicated for the Bard?

Insanenoodlyguy

Not if she's claimant.

Deworld

Not sure if Bard can come to a claimant. We have no reference for this. Claimants aren't Named yet.

Plus, main Bard's objective as of now is to kill Cat (or at least she says so). I'm not sure how siding with Sepulchral can help with it.

Yunamed

I think she can go to claimants. Remember when Amadeus was captured by the heroes, she appeared to him and had a conversation.

Rey d`Tutto

How sure are you that Bard wants to kill Catherine rather than be killed by her?

Deworld

Not very much. That Bard wants to die was established a long time ago.

However, as I said, killing Cat is what Bard herself says she wants to do. What her actual motivations are can only be speculations.

Mental Mouse

Bard can certainly come to Claimants. One interesting question is whether Sepulchral is a genuine Claimant. Wouldn't it be interesting if it turns out she's never actually heard The Song?

Mental Mouse

Also, the Emerald Swords are present, and likely to play spoiler whenever Amadeus & Ranger engage.

PapaBrogundy

Cat just swore a solemn oath under moonlight to use Ranger as a whetstone for her name and we're all here for it. When that confrontation occurs (I'm guessing Ater) it should be cataclysmic.

RoflCat

Personally, I'd like to see Black actually NOT get involved in the fight.

To play the Story game he should be avoiding all these 'it'll happen' Story setups, because them being expected means Bard/Catherine will know about it and make their plans accordingly.

So if Black know what they expect to happen, he can make his own 'plot twist'.

ninegardens

Oh god- Cat vs Ranger. Bard is going to have a field day with that, and use it as yet another chance to twist the knife in Amadeaus. 😞

Rey d`Tutto

Power vs. Story-fu.

Which is more powerful, Perfection or Narrative?

Cicero

Interesting, this has the feel of a story developing, but a story different from the ones Cat usually plays. That final line feels like a very important hinge too.

Does Cat even realize she's walked into this story?

Liliet

This one might well have been on purpose.

ninegardens

That is a a very dangerous story to walk into on purpose.

Deworld

Well, Cat did expect to deal with Ranger using the story of her and her pupils, and I hardly can believe she thought she'll stay out of it.

Liliet

We are still talking about Catherine Foundlilng, right?

Rey d`Tutto

When the only path forward requires sacrifice...

shikkarasu

Walking into dangerous Narratives on purpose? Putting her back to the wall and rolling the bones against Fate itself? Yep, sounds like Cat. That said I agree, she's not doing any of this blind. One might even go so far as to say she lost an eye and gained Wisdom, but I could not possibly comment.

onedollargum

I think even if she did, Archer means enough to Cat that she can't afford not to take this bait.

Adrian_V

Too sleepy to said more than 1 thing: Alexis the Ardent just won my respect in this chapter, she too in a way is trying as much as Indrani even if she doesn't realizes it.

Incredible how raw that please at the end feels.

Liliet

Argent, not Ardent. Silver, as in Silver Huntress.

Adrian_V

Like i said, sleepy xD

Abnaxis

OMG how have I read that as Ardent through 2 re-reads

Burlyraven

Above are the implied patrons of Squire, and it may be that they're seeking to make a new enforcer, given the Saint's demise, Mirror Knight's unreliable nature, and Hanno's waning grip on White Knight. That said, the method Above appears to be endorsing is remarkably accepting of the aid of Below's champions. Given that the particular brand of Story Arthur is enmeshed within is the kind that would seem fated to force him into the role of a Knight, I once again have to wonder exactly what word will serve in the first position of that Name.

Linnus42

Eh I would say its more of matter of having a chicken in every pot. Squire is aimed at Cat and VIV sure but less so when Cat moves from being Callow Centric then he is Viv's issue. But primarily he is Callow Focused. Mirror Knight is Procer focused with the Drow soon to be on the border so he is setup to oppose them. Hanno though is far more internationally focused though not National. at all. As for the Name could be Knight or Paladin though the difference between Knight and Paladin is unclear cause Knights can basically do anything.

Snappy

Knights are great warriors, while paladins are usually military leaders. A knight could be one with a name like knight-commander, but unlikely. The white knight usually only leads names not troops, so there could be an opening for a Good paladin.

Rey d`Tutto

He will be Callowan as a Knight.

They are a Good people, who have developed a Cynical and Vengeful attitude towards both Evil and Good countries who border them.

Black Knights invaded them. White Knights ignored Good countries invasions.

He will be a Dark Knight (Batman), or a Shining Knight, or mebbe a Grey Knight?

shikkarasu

I think Arthur is placed to remove Catherine once she's no longer the lesser evil. Placing her in a mentor position is perfect for this, since it keeps Arthur from trying to kill her early like Mirror Knight would. Even if she does abdicate, she can't meddle in Callow too much without getting in Arthur's way. The Gods Above might even see this as a compromise: "Get out of Callow before he finds a way to re-forged the Penitent's Blade and we won't have a problem. Stick around and you'll have to face another prodigy duellist without any of the exploits you used on Saint or Lone."

Liliet

Yeah, Arthur's story sounds like a failsafe on Catherine's, to me.

Cotillion

She's squiring the successor to the Lone Swordsman, to all appearances. Learn as a martial aspect seems indicative, as are dreams of the feather. I don't think he's likely to be a "Lone" Swordsman though. Too much collaboration from too many names and resources going into training him. He's going to wind up being a sort of inversion imo.

Shveiran

Whether or not Arthur is embraced by Contrition, I really think he doesn't fit the Lone Swordsman Name.

Not unless he is brutally betrayed and gets a very edgy phase.

The guy is all about being part of a group and has established multiple meaningful relationships, for Crows' sake.

Juff

Typo Thread:

made the junior > made her the junior that's you worry > that's your worry
I actually believe > I actually believed that easy questions > that easy question (or those easy questions) arms are making > arms and making to ever to > to ever pleased surprise > pleasant surprise wasIndrani's (missing space) stillhave (missing space)
he thought he thought > he thought

WuseMajor

Hmmm.... I wonder if Amadeus's main dispute with Cat is that he doesn't want to become Dread Emperor at the end?

Alternately, maybe he's staying under the radar to evade Bard and Malicia together, not because he necessarily has a dispute with Cat.

Or maybe he thinks he's being "kind" by letting her do this on her own?

Liliet

Definitely not that last one, Amadeus 1) knows full well how much Cat loves him and has never believed love to be weakness so this is super not his style, 2) would never prioritize kindness over practicality.

The former two are very plausible tho.

Liliet

* would never prioritize kindness over practicality on this scale with these stakes, to be clear.

Rey d`Tutto

When the "bad guy" sacrifices to achieve the "plan"..
Good writing. No. Superb.

Mental Mouse

She might just be trying to keep the Emerald Swords out of her hair.

Mental Mouse

Clarification/correction: Amadeus would be trying to keep the Emerald Swords out of Cat's hair.

Joats

Cat just called a straight victory in the first instance of interference by the Bard. And she's heading into another situation where the Bard can act against her even more directly than setting off an alarm. Who wants to bet there will be a draw of some sort centered around Catherine after the Bard makes some sort of appearance?

Liliet

Cat and Bard already had a draw-ish interaction at the Arsenal, a pattern of three won't spring up here all of a sudden. Cat's Role has not changed since then.

Shveiran

And that's for the best. I'm all for a Pattern of Three between Nim and Arthur, but let's not have that be the lynchpin to the main plot again.

Liliet

AAAAA REFUGEE SISTERS

I love Alexis the Argent and I love so much that she cares about Indrani too ♥ ♥ ♥ and that she sees, she sees that she's trying!!!

Arthur with Learn ♥ ♥ ♥ I love how Amadeus definitely textually aimed Cat's own Learn the way he did deliberately and what this says about her story as a whole ♥

RIP the mess)=

Darkening

Huh. I guess it does make sense that amadeus may have steered learn to help her be more knowledgable rather than make her a better fighter, given his disdain for villains that lean on power rather than wits. It's interesting that we've seen learn 4 times in entirely different styles. Cat absorbing knowledge from books rapidly, Arthur learning swordsmanship, the hedge witch having some kind of active scan ability with it, and of course ranger's ridiculous synergy.

Liliet

Amadeus was immediately teaching Cat to be a ruler more than a fighter :3 remember the agriculture book that baffled Cat so?

Rey d`Tutto

Logistics

Kage Lupus

It gives a very good idea of what Black thinks is most important for a new Squire to have. Cat learned all of her fighting skills via hard work and practice, but she Learned language and history and military theory because that was a much broader category that she needed much sooner. Remember, it was while going over old ledgers that Cat discovered Black's master plan, of breaking the cycle of Praes being the Evil foil to the rest of the continent. It would have taken her years of studying without Learn to have gotten to the point where she could recognize the pattern otherwise.

Liliet

TBF, Cat did know a lot of history, her education was good.

But yeah, Amadeus had very specific things she wanted from her.

(And it wasn't random ledgers Cat was going over, it was the specific journal Amadeus gave her when she asked what he wanted, and she didn't even figure it out, she had to ask Hakram)

Lord Haart

Hakram gets the wasteland better than most, yeah.

Dreadhand Empreror Benevolent? 😊

Deworld

Nice to see more of Silver Huntress. She always was interesting for me, but we have seen almost none of her. Unless I forgot something, it's only the second scene showing her character in some way – the first being fight with Indrani after Beastmaster's death. Any other time she was just standing somewhere in the background. We had more on Concocter and even on Beastmaster himself.

Liliet

We did have her described and talked about quite a bit in the background, but yeah this is the second time we see her on-screen and talking.

(I'm clarifying "and talking" bc there was that one raid she and Indrani went on with Cat, early in the Hainaut campaign)

Deworld

That's what I meant. "Show, not tell", you know? She was talked about a lot, but we have never seen anything about her. Cat talks about how well they come along, but it's the first time we actually see it. Hell, as I understand it, Huntress is the third closest Hero to Cat, after Arthur and Hanno. Maybe she competes for this place with Apprentice and Roland, but still, she's in top-5 for sure. And still, this is the first time we see them actually interact on a personal level.

Let's hope that this conversation is EE noticing this issue and trying to fix it.

Darkening

I dunno, she let kingfisher prince pretty close to her :p. And yeah, roland is definitely top 3 material. With Tariq alive I doubt she'd have made top 5 but she might be edging in these days.

Liliet

Yeppppp. I've noticed how little we've seen of her, considering repeated assurances that Cat gets along with her super well, too. I think it was to keep the tension in the Refugee plot – what kind of person was Indrani trying to reconcile with? Would it even work? And this is the payoff – her own damage, her own caring, the "please" and Cat's promise.

grandemic

I let it go, this once, but my eyes* narrowed.

Cotillion

You are incorrect, sir.

grandemic

I am not. EE wrote eyes, plural.

Liliet

My one eyes?

Lord Haart

Yeah I feel like if there's one particular gripe I have with this book, it's the lack of mentioning that SHE LOST AN EYE. It's hardly a small thing (well, emotionally) and it hasn't come up nearly enough IMO. We heard much more about the limp, and she can basically cancel that out at need.

You could put this down to PTSD but then I think there should be other signs of trouble too. As it is, it minimizes the loss and makes it less impactful.

Earl of Purple

Learning how to use a sword from the Barrow Blade should be interesting. He's got the sword in his Name, so theoretically he's a good swordsman. Learning from him exclusively would be a good way to become a duelist, however. I think, at least. Although... isn't Ishaq's sword two handed? Or am I misremembering?

ninegardens

Also, "dying" is part of the Barrow sword's combat strategy. ... Like not a main component, but definitely a component.

TeK

"The boy did not quite manage to hide his disappointment but I quashed the pang I felt at the sight. I already walked the line perhaps a little too finely when it came to teaching Arthur Foundling. An occasional distant instructor tossing a few lessons his way shouldn't be too prone to ending up story fodder, I figured, but considering he had a draw with the Black Knight coming up the last thing I wanted was stepping into a formal teacher's role. That was a good way to stumble into buying his draw with my death."

"Sometimes, looking at what Ranger had left in the children she'd raised, I wondered what it was Amadeus of the Green Stretch had left in me. What curse, what scar. That there would be one I had no doubt: one did not learn from a madman without learning some manner of madness with it."

Yeah, really Catherine, what is it?

Darkening

For all that the everdark arc wasn't the best part of the series, the conversation she had with archer about how maddening it is to watch every word and action to control your story was a great moment.

Lord Haart

Personally liked that part a lot – the Drow were interesting and I loved the end with Sve Nov. The arc felt a lot like Moria and that's a very good thing as far as building mood goes. The only real trouble I had with it was the suspension of disbelief that she'd really leave Callow behind out of contact for so long.

Liliet

Issues Catherine got as inheritance from Amadeus:

– self-sacrificial tendencies in the vein of “well I’m a bad person anyway, and you can’t make omelette without breaking at least one egg so better me than anyone else. I’m a selfish and terrible person anyway so no big loss”

– mentor story PTSD. There’s being careful and then there’s fully mentally equating mentorship with promised death to the degree you can find yourself falling into an actually more dangerous story though sheer denial

Sinead

I think Cat will stay just shy of the cliff edge here, since in lieu of herself, she’s piling on a whole lot of resources on Arthur. It’ll still burn her, but I don’t think it will be catastrophic.

I mentioned on Reddit, but I wonder if Cat’s gonna be a fly on the wall with Vivienne talking to Arthur about ‘why the knightly orders did not return under Cat’ (there are some general points there that can extend out to why Cat operates the way she does that doesn’t overstep).

Plus that would serve as a good precursor for Cat and Vivienne to talk.

Liliet

Aaaaah I want that so much!!!

Sinead

I want it both because I genuinely want to see this conversation (especially since a Knightly order could be folded into the war machine as an extension of the Army doctrine since they do not have Ogres that were part of Legion doctrine, so the issue is all the other issues around the knightly order. Arthur is an orphan, he doesn’t have the same connection of the knightly orders to nobility and the issues with it. Plus it would be interesting to have the Heir Apparent be the ‘person who understands Callowan politics’ to point out to Arthur how dangerous he is to Cat’s legacy.

I don’t know if it would be overstepping for Vivienne to point out that Cat’s legacy is forging Callow into a sharp, brittle knife (will cut all on the wrong side, but can be broken if poorly handled). How having a military symbol as a threat will break everything more than external threats (how will the goblins in Marchford feel about this? The Praesi refugees? Any orcs that may have moved into Callow? Traditional Callow was fucking brutal about 'foreigners' . In trying to bring back 'traditional Callow' will Arthur be willing to deal with everything else?

I also really want this conversation to happen, and the more I think about, the more Vivienne is better to have it. She is the face of Callow rising, and her handling this potential future threat to her and Cat's plans for Callow would be a feather in her cap that it wouldn't otherwise be.

If this results in an Adjutant scene, that may be awkward for Cat to sit and witness, but it's also her seeing how Vivienne operates.

...Dammit, I've thought too much about this. I hope EE surprises me.

Hakram's Dead Hand

That's what I was thinking. She inherited the Amadeus's machine; the ever present gears behind his eyes. Because of this, she can never truly live without seeing the world as it is, and will always keep everyone around her at arms length. Sure, this gives them power, but also locks them into the calculating creature role forever. What a beautiful story.

Shveiran

Neither she nor Amadeus keep everyone at arms length. Both have real, meaningful relationships to which they are not afraid to show their vulnerabilities. This ain't Code Geass; they can be calculating and still, you know, a person.

beleester

It's so confusing to read about "the Black Knight's army" and realize that they're not talking about Amadeus.

Xinci

It is interesting to look at Rangers life with further confirmation on her intended methodology. It really does read as a long lived being who has had limited attachment due to pressure(ie. Hunted by the Emerald Swords), attempting to mitigate future loss through selection. So her attempts to toughen them up to what could be, let them experience struggle, etc make sense in coming from someone like her. In the long view it can be a mercy to do so if the connection is all you have. Too bad she didn't quite take own experiences with the Calamities to know how to balance out the pressure better through cooperation. Understandable though honestly if ones perspective is more on how to survive eternitys worth of conflict.

Overall though I think Alexis gave a good underview of why Ranger acted like she did. She reminds me of that Dead King in some ways when he was mentoring Cat. A unsurprising similarity given both are fighting to live a long time.

308924810a

"I understand that the Grand Alliance has interests in Praes," General Mok said, voice rumbling, "but it doesn't get to impose terms here. Who rules in Ater is not to be determined in Salia or Laure."

Huh, they seem to have a concept of Westphalian sovereignty. Which is weird given that the continent is still fairly feudal. But I guess not so weird given that there's very strong regional cultural identities and very little permanently successful conquest of areas with differing cultural identities to muddle up question of legitimacy of one cultural group holding primacy over their territories.

Also not that weird given that Praes and Procer have to have tried these kinds of tricks before, yet been pushed back by the general conservation of cultural patterns and state of relative stasis the continent tends to fall into.

caoimhinh

What I'm wondering now is this:

If the Rebel Legions are in agreement that Malicia has to go, and they want to crush Sepulchral, but they don't want to support Amadeus's claim of the Tower unless Nim refuses them... who do they want to take the Tower?

Are they just saying "not any of these" and hope someone better rises afterward?

It really seems like these guys aren't looking much ahead. No wonder Cat showed such disdain on them, as they really seem to be just going there to be opportunistic and flex on whoever wins, but that's really just gonna earn them the disdain of the winner, it's like those Orcs initially saying to Cat that they wouldn't join her as the Tower still stands. If the Tower has already fallen or been taken without your help, you can't come later to get rewards, you are just gonna be pushed aside for not siding with the winner.

Also, they are betting their all on Nim taking their offer and turn on Malicia and then go crush Sepulchral. But surely they aren't betting on Nim becoming Dread Empress, so who will they support? Or do they expect to turn Praes into something else that is not an Empire?

It's weird that Catherine didn't point this out to them, or asked them about this, since it seems like a logical question after they told her that they didn't support any of the claimants of the tower, and only would go to Amadeus if Nim rejects their offer.

Liliet

Maybe they ARE banking on Nim being DE. That's a classic for Black Knights, and it's never happened to an ogre before, but neither has it happened to a Duni!

Daniel E

Anyone else find it weird that Juniper is just suddenly here? Like, no mention at all since coming to Praes, and suddenly 'Hellhound is back'.

hoser2

She's been around. She defended the Sahelian counterattack and reported to Cat onscreen and served out barbecue at the fire, for two off the top of my mind.

Deworld

Juniper was mentioned being there with Cat since the very first chapter of the book.

superkeaton

I am deeply curious for what Plan she has in store for an absolute Killer like The Ranger.

Darkening

"Stop breathing," she Spoke, and then ran for her life.

Rey d`Tutto

Stop

john

Ranger seems like exactly the kind of person who could score an Olympic-qualitying time on the hundred yard dash, over broken ground, while carrying something heavy and sharp AND holding her breath.

Lord Haart

Yeah there is Story here, yet another hero asking a Boon of the Black Queen.

Ranger has been a bit of an enigma every since she absconded during the prologue. One can imagine that if she had raised Cat rather than Black, Cat would be even more like her than Indrani, who is a bit more lackadaisical with Wander. Cat is no doubt thinking of how she can beat her with story fu, but I hope she learned from Arsenal that there is a cost to such tactics.

Also, of all the armies, Cat can least afford a fight, she needs soldiers and mages to take back to Hainut.

Storm

Fuck, the Lady is going to break the table, isn't she?

Chapter 13: Footing

"To hold a strong defensive position is not enough. You must force the enemy to attack it, which is the difference between tactics and strategy."

– Extract from 'Considerations on Warfare' by Marshal Grem One-Eye

We made good pace.

The Army of Callow had been hammered into a host that could move on the quick by years of campaigning abroad, and for once we weren't too starved on trained officers: the combination of the First and Second Army that Juniper commanded had benefitted from the officer pools being combined. It'd be Hells to split the armies back up when it was done, of course, but that was a problem for the future. There simply weren't enough potential soldiers left back in Callow for the First and Second to be raised back up to full strength separately anyway, they'd be staying combined until the end of the war. The 'Fifth' Army, as the rank and file had taken to calling it, wasn't going anywhere for some years.

The Levantines under Razin and Aquiline weren't a drag on our pace, the way they'd sometimes been in Hainaut. Now that they were relying on our supply train instead of their own, the Dominion warriors were as cut free from a tether: they were usually quicker on the march than my legionaries now. The lighter armour and years of raiding had trained it into them. The Twilight Ways made for a pleasant reprieve from Wasteland weather, even if we'd only ever tasted the outskirts of that, and we advanced faster than Juniper had anticipated. We had to slow down around the end of the first week, waiting for reports about the march of the other armies.

Marshal Nim and her legions kept to the same brisk pace they had so far, which meant in about two weeks both our armies would be forced to emerge from the Ways or face the possibility of a contested crossing should we be beaten to returning to Creation. The surprising part was that Dread Empress Sepulchral seemed to have been gaining on the Black Knight: she was in hot pursuit, still a week behind even though the Legions were using the Ways and she was not. It seemed impossible, and the Jacks confirmed there was more to it a few days later. It was not Sepulchral's entire army that'd been keeping up that breakneck pace but instead a large vanguard.

Two thousand household troops and her entire cavalry contingent, Vivienne's people believed.

"She's trying to keep up the pressure on Marshal Nim by having a force nipping at her rear," Juniper opined. "They won't engage, but they'll raid her supply lines and try to hammer any detachment she splits from her main host."

"If the Jacks have people in Sepulchral's camp able to learn this, the Eyes will too," Vivienne noted. "I have no doubt Malicia informed her Black Knight of the plan before it even began."

I snorted.

"Old Abreha's counting on it," I said, reluctantly admiring. "She's trying to goad the Black Knight into engaging us hastily."

Sepulchral had nothing but gains to make from the Loyalist Legions and the Army of Callow getting into a messy, ill-planned battle.

"It's cleverly done," Juniper admitted. "If Nim sends a force south to make the vanguard back off, she has to either leave it there – and weaken herself just before she fights us – or slow her march so it can rejoin. Which would buy time for the slower part of Sepulchral's army to catch up."

I shared a look with my marshal. It was an inspired tactic, playing to the strengths of her army and the weaknesses of the Black Knight's positions. It was, in other words, not a tactic that Abreha Mirembé or her generals had likely come up with. Sepulchral was a skilling intriguer but a solidly average battle commander, looking at her record. And as far as we knew neither Aksum nor Nok had any noteworthy military talents in their upper ranks. So who was planning Sepulchral's campaign for her? I glanced at Scribe, who had been silently keeping notes as we spoke.

"Make it a priority to find out who's been giving out those orders," I ordered her. "The last thing we need is for Sepulchral to become a genuine threat."

"I've been concentrating on putting out the last gasps of my influence in the Wasteland," Eudokia said. "It might be possible to find this out, Queen Catherine, but I will have to burn most of the agents I have in Sepulchral's camp."

Meaning she would no longer be confident of catching anything going on there afterwards. We'd be relying solely on the Jacks, and Vivienne's spies had been playing catch-up with the Eyes since the moment they were first raised without ever quite touching that prize. I hesitated, then turned to Juniper.

"How confident are you of beating that army if you know who commands it?" I asked.

She did not answer immediately, considering the question seriously.

"Seven parts in ten," Juniper of the Red Shields finally said.

I nodded. Good enough for me.

"Do it," I ordered Scribe.

Aside from that little surprise, the beginning of our southern offensive was trotting along nicely. As the second week since we'd left the outskirts of Wolof began, it looked like as if our preferred outcome would come to pass: a decisive pitched battle with the Loyalist Legions at least a week before anyone else was close enough to intervene. There'd been no real hiccup to our advance so far, which only made it natural that Creation would then promptly snatch the ground out from under our feet. Unlike some of the past instances of the Gods pissing in my morning gruel, however, this time the snatching was not a fucking metaphor.

Half-past Morning Bell, as we marched along the Twilight Ways, the ground literally fell out under my army.

Great cracks spread across the ground, fast enough my officers had time to do little more than shout warnings, then great chunks of the Ways fell down into Creation like shattered glass panes. It was all the more hellish for the suddenness of it: there'd been no warning, not ominous sign. In thirty heartbeats my army had turned from a smoothly marching column into a groaning and wounded beast, spread out in chunks in the middle of a particularly vicious Wasteland dust storm. There was enough order in my ranks that I managed to rustle up two mage lines and Hierophant to form a shaky protective ward around the column, keeping the whipping dust out of our faces long enough that priests from the House Insurgent could begin seeing to the wounded and dying.

I ran around trying to get proper wardstones in place, hindered by the fact that they'd been built to protect the shape of camps and not columns, but before I got anywhere the storm suddenly died. It'd lasted perhaps half an hour after my army fell, and just as suddenly as it had come it was gone. Clenching my teeth, I got to finding out the damage. It'd been a short fall down, at least. That'd taken off the edge some. Hardly more than four feet in most cases, and the Order of the Broken Bells had been in the vanguard ahead of the fall so it'd mostly been remounts that'd broken their legs falling.

The grassy grounds from the Ways that'd fallen with us began to decay quickly and the emanations were somewhat toxic so we had to move away and reform, but order was getting restored as lieutenants saw to their lines. Numbers for casualties and wounded quickly made it up the chain, eventually getting to Juniper and myself: only seventy-nine dead, but almost three hundred wounded. We'd also lost enough horses for the Order that their staying power was compromised for longer-term engagements. Not necessarily an immediate concern, but by the time we got to Ater any knight who lost a horse would be fighting the rest of the campaign on foot.

There'd been more painful damage in a strategic sense.

"We're paralyzed for at least two days," Juniper bluntly said. "That we still have any supply wagons capable of moving is a miracle, and if the healers can't fix the oxen pulling them we're going to have to kill the beasts."

Which would further slow us, for all that it'd add to our meat reserves. We could compensate by putting the Order's remaining remounts to work pulling the wagons and arranging relays of legionaries – mostly orcs, given their greater body strength – but it'd still be a blow to mobility. Hopefully our healers could salvage at least some of the beasts of burden while our sappers repaired the broken supply wagons. The only silver lining was that Pickler's obsessive care for her field engines meant they'd been insulated from shock well enough the fall had caused need only for minor repairs and replacements. We wouldn't be headed into battle with the Legions of Terror without working war engines.

"We need to find out where we are," I sighed. "And if returning to the Ways will just see this happen again."

I'd already asked Masego to look into it. Wasteland weather was infamously dangerous for good reason, but ripping an army out of the Twilight Ways was going too far. My instincts screamed enemy action, but which enemy?

"I've sent out scouts," Juniper said. "I'll send someone to fetch you when they begin coming back."

"I'll see what Hierophant has for me, then," I said, groaning as I got back to my feet.

I'd almost lost Zombie the Sixth to this mess. He'd broken a leg and bucked me off, but the priests seemed to think he could be made better. I'd be stuck borrowing a mount from the Order until he was fit to ride again, though. Masego wasn't hard to find, considering he was still exactly where I'd left him. The hastily raised tent was kept standing more by wards than wood, not that he seemed to notice. Earlier he'd been using scrying rituals with some difficulty, going through the Observatory, but now he was instead running spells on the storm dust he'd sent Apprentice out to gather. Though the outer ward would have warned him of my entry he did not immediately turn. I left him to his spells, waiting in silence as I leaned against my staff. He turned to me when he was good and ready.

"It was a ritual," Hierophant said.

I glanced at the dust but he shook his head.

"This is simply dust," he said. "We are near the Gust Ribbon from what I gathered while scrying, so the dust storm itself was drawn out of it by the first part of the ritual and only then empowered. There are striations in the magic saturation of the dust that make the sequence plain to see."

Near the Gust Ribbon wasn't saying much, as it was a winding and moving region that stretched across the northwest third of the Wasteland. Wasn't overall reassuring, though, considering it was called that because it was plagued by sudden and powerful storms that had a nasty tendency to spill out in every direction. It wouldn't be safe to stay here long even if we didn't get hammered by another ritual.

"So someone leashed a dust storm, empowered it with a spell and sent it our way?" I asked.

"It was quite brilliantly done," Masego said. "The dust, you see, solved the issue of air being able to hold too little magic for most large-scale ritual work. The storm was turned into an array that thinned the boundary between the Ways and Creation – which is already very thin – until it was on the very edge of shattering."

"Are you telling me that the physical weight of my army is what shattered the Twilight Ways?" I flatly asked.

"As I said," Masego smiled, "quite brilliantly done."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"This is Malicia," I said.

It had to be. People had been telling me again and again that weather sorcery was the specialty of Taghreb, and there was only one army out there that fielded a significant amount of high-calibre Taghreb mages. More than that, we'd known for months that while High Lady Takisha of Kahtan had played coy with sending the Tower actual troops she'd not been shy with providing mages instead. It'd take more than just a few cadres of talented mages to pull off something like this, though. I knew that and so did he.

"This is Akua Sahelian," Masego corrected, confirming my fear. "There are maybe four other practitioners in Praes capable of such a ritual, but there appears to have been an uncontrolled surge in the middle of the span – I suspect mages grew exhausted and their replacements had inadequate control – that was masterfully redirected instead of allowed to collapse the entire working."

He paused.

"I would be capable of this," he said, without a hint of a boast. "My father was, and so was Dumisai of Aksum. I would not bet on Naziha Sarrif being so capable, however, and she is the finest mage in the south. There is only one woman in all of Praes with the talent and schooling to do it."

His face was calm.

"I have already told you her name."

That was what happened, I told myself, when you let someone as dangerous Akua go to your enemy's side. She didn't stop being dangerous, it was just turned on you instead. I breathed out, suddenly tired. I had seventy-nine names to learn. I owed that, and truthfully more than was possible to repay.

"I found something interesting, however," Hierophant said. "The way the boundaries of the ritual array were defined was... peculiar."

I cocked an eyebrow at him, silently urging him to continue.

"Much more of the Ways fell than was necessary," Masego said. "Without looking at the equations myself I cannot be certain, but it seems to me that the power could have been made... narrower."

Concentrated on ensuring there would be a faller from higher up instead of such a large swath of territory."

My fingers clenched.

"What are you saying?" I asked.

"That no one capable of crafting such a ritual," Hierophant evenly replied, "would have made such a mistake in ignorance. It was a choice."

A pulled punch, he was saying. Seventy-nine dead, my entire army paralyzed, and still a pulled punch. Not without reason had we once named that woman the doom of an entire city. I silently nodded, at loss for words. Glowing, fiery eyes studied me from beneath the eye cloth.

"I do not understand why she is no longer with us," Masego admitted. "Is this about revenge? Indrani tells me that in Hainaut you had the opportunity to let her go to her death. I had thought – and she – that you refused because you were letting go of all this long prices business."

He paused.

"She is no longer here," Masego plainly said, "and so I am confused."

"One hundred thousand dead, Zeze," I quietly said. "She doesn't get to have that swept under the rug. Nobody does."

"So it is revenge," Masego mused, brightening for having understood. "Why let her go to the Tower and become the Warlock, then? It does not strike me as a very good vengeance."

"Because she'll hate it," I quietly said. "It will be everything she has been taught to want, but even as she gets it every victory will taste like ashes in her mouth. And when reaches the end of that line, of that dreadful dream, it will not be joy she feels."

It would be horror, I thought. Horror at the prospect of spending the rest of her life wearing shackles around her wrists that she would have put on herself. And the moment she understood that, understood that she wanted to be better than the girl she'd once been instead of simply an older, crueller version of her, I would be there. Waiting with an offer that she would accept.

"And after?" Masego asked.

"She trades a broken dream for a broken crown," I murmured.

I did not believe we could destroy the Hidden Horror, not truly. Not now and even less after we gifted him the crown of Autumn. So he would need a prison and a warden. A box he would surely break in time, a pit he would dig himself out of, but a realm of endless paths? That might do the trick. There he would be cursed to wander forever alone, as a broken queen on a broken throne kept him imprisoned until the end of times. And that queen's throne would lie in the heart of the city she had doomed, perched atop her very folly as she kept the peace of Twilight. She would make the choice herself, willingly and without coercion. That was the retribution I owed a hundred thousand screaming souls: an endless vigil holding back a greater evil, knowing every part of it was of her own making.

I was Callowan. My prices were long, and paid twice.

—

The first scouts returned with word of a town to our southeast. Scrying wasn't working well in the region, which Masego believed to be because of the same ritual that'd brought us down. To sum up a quarter-hour explanation, 'much magic in sky dust makes magic in sky difficult'. I shared this summary with the table, which prompted him to admit he wished he had a way to disown me. On the bright side, he also believed that while it was still unsafe to return to the Twilight Ways for at least two weeks it was unlikely that we were going to be hit with a storm again. The same phenomenon that screwed up scrying would make it 'astronomically difficult' to get another ritual going. I'd intended on going back into the camp after the conversation, but Juniper had notions of her own.

"You're pacing back and forth like a tiger in a cage," the Hellhound said. "Make yourself useful instead. Take knights and have a look at the town, find out where we are."

"I'm not pacing," I reflexively defended, but she had a point.

I took thirty knights of the Order and Scribe too, since she was the woman with the maps. Eudokia didn't recognize the region itself, though she did note that the dusty and rocky grounds here would be a good fit for certain parts of the Cradle: a rough square of land near the middle of the Wasteland that had fairly steady weather but got the spills from more... exotic parts. We rode out briskly, finding the town the scouts had marked in less than an hour. It wasn't anything all that impressive, I saw as we got closer. A walled town large enough to hold maybe a few hundred souls, surrounded by sparse farms and skeletal orchards. We found several wells on the way, though, which was good news. Too many of our water barrels had broken during the fall.

The gates were closed when we got there, an iron-barded set tall as a man but too cramped for most carts. No great traders, then. The walls weren't anything I'd have a hard time smashing with Night if I put my back into it: six to eight uneven feet of stacked stone and mud with wooden spikes on top. Over the gates, an old dark-skinned woman in faded robes was waiting for us. Spread out further atop the walls were maybe a dozen archers and an unarmed pair of middle-aged siblings that must have been the town mages. They weren't the ones in charge, though, as was made clear when we reined in our horses at the edge of bow range and got called out by the old woman.

"State your business," she demanded. "Are you with the army to the north?"

I blinked. My knights carried the royal banner with them, which usually got recognized and took care of most questions before the talking began. Not so this time, evidently. Seeing no point in subtlety out in the middle of nowhere, I went with straightforward instead.

"I am Queen Catherine of Callow," I called back. "I only want to talk and buy goods."

There was some consternation atop the wall, several others coming close to the old woman before she angrily waved them away.

"There's nothing worth burning here," the old woman yelled out at me. "Go away."

I sighed. Why was it never the useful parts of my reputation that preceded me? Deciding to make a point, I murmured a prayer to the Crows and let the Night sluggishly wake to my words. I went for something loud and dangerous looking over actually dangerous, blasting a chunk of the countryside in a whirl of black flames. I let silence follow in that sights's wake as it sunk in that I could wield the same power against their wall to fairly predictable results. I then politely requested to be let in so we could talk and I could arrange the buying of goods, which after some arguing between the 'warriors' was granted.

The gates swung open and we were ushered through deserted dirt streets to a hall of stone. There the old woman from earlier received us by a great fire and extended hospitality in the name of the town, Ogarin. We refrained from accepting food or drink anyway. She introduced herself as Anan, the current haku to the town. Bailiff was probably the closest equivalent to the title we had back home, from what I understood, as a haku's authority was centred around arranging the collection of communal taxes and work levies in the name of the local lord. The town was part of the territory of a Lord Abara, she informed us, who ruled from a fortress called Kala further to the southeast and situated at the bottom of the eponymous Kala Hills.

"I'll bargain so the town does not get sacked, Your Majesty," Anan said, "but we don't have much to trade. We already sent our crop tax south to the fortress. There's been a food levy across the Wasteland."

I frowned.

"Who does Lord Abara swear to?" I asked.

She snorted.

"His uncle swore to Wolof, but that was in High Lady Tasia's day," she said. "Now he's sworn to no one. It was the Tower that came to collect."

So Malicia – more likely the Black Knight through her – had been emptying the Wasteland of food, to feed Marshal Nim army and make sure my own wouldn't be able to add to its supplies from the local stores. Not without starving towns and villages, anyway, which aside from being deeply distasteful to me was likely to mean resistance to my troops from locals. No one liked having the table robbed by a foreign invader, as my childhood in Laure had intimately taught me. We got a little more out of Anan about the region we'd ended up in with some wheedling. Ogarin was at the northwestern edge of Lord Abara's lands but linked by a dirt path to a better road that Anan called the 'half-road'. I asked, naturally. It was a name that pretty much demanded it.

"We're between imperial highways," Anan said. "One of the old Abara – in my great, great grandmother's day – swore himself to Aksum, and to make it stick he planned to connect Kala to the highway between Ater and Aksum. It was going to make us rich, he claimed. Only he died before it was done. His daughter instead went back to the Tower's protection and pocketed the gold, leaving the job half done."

The half-road wasn't properly paved, she explained, just made of stone. While usable for carts it tended to be rough on the axles. It went towards the southeast, eventually coming close to the Moule Hills. Those were a bunch of steep slopes, so in practice the road was nestled in a valley between the Moule Hills to the south and Kala Hills to the north. North of said Kala Hills, she continued, was the small Nioqe Lake and the other town sworn to Lord Abara, Risas. Further north than that was the southern edge of the large Jini Plateau: all cliffs there, nothing we could travel through.

The way I figured, the sooner we got on the half-road and began moving south the better. I'd suggest a detachment head out to Nioqe Lake to see to our water situation, but there simply weren't enough water sources in the region to sustain the presence of an army as large as mine for long.

As for trading, strictly speaking it was treason for the town to bargain with us while we were at war. I allowed the shadow of a possible sack to loom over the negotiations, though, which motivated the town to do it anyway. It wasn't my intention to go through with it, but if my reputation was black in these parts then I had no qualms in using that. There wasn't much food and Anan was reluctant to part with what was left, but tools and wood were on the table – armies chewed through those like hounds through meat – and I promised to restrain my soldiers from robbing farms or entering the town. I even paid a generous fee for use of their wells, which Anan did not need to know was from the Wolof treasury.

When we were done talking I stretched, groaning, and offered her a friendly smile. We'd been at this for over an hour now, and I was ready to leave. There was still one little detail to take care of first, though,

"So," I said, "how likely is it that some of your dimmer boys and girls are outside and planning something unwise?"

Her creased face tightened.

"Not unlikely," Anan finally said.

"I still remember what it's like, wanting to put down monster to make a name," I said. "So I'll let that go."

I met her rheumy eyes with mine.

"If it ends now."

She swallowed. Anan preceded us outside, and while there was some shouting and a small scuffle it ended without corpses on the ground.

Three cheers for diplomacy, I thought, and got back on my borrowed horse.

—

We got some trouble with the locals the first night after we crashed, but not the two-legged kind. Our palisade, which had been hastily raised, was hit just after Midnight Bell by what we first believed to be enemy soldiers but turned out to be a coordinated attack by a pack of tigers. The unreasonably astute animals actually hit another spot in the palisade as a distraction while the rest dug their way under, attacking horses and cattle. Archer and the Huntress got themselves a few pelts for the trouble, but of the dozen tigers that came six still survived and ran away with full bellies. It was only to be the beginning of our troubles, I found out to my dismay.

A colony of head-sized scorpions took offence to our presence the following day and began attacking legionaries whenever they stepped outside the vermin wards, which thankfully held them back. It only stopped when I set out with a mage line and torched their underground lair, to a disquieting amount of chittering screams. A decision was made not to openly prevent my sappers from going into the charred ruin and stealing some eggs, considering scorpion fights tended to be good for the morale of the little bastards.

Then the soldiers that went to fill up water barrels at Nioque Lake – under the wary eyes of the townsfolk of Risas, whose homes were on the opposite shore – were ambushed by some sort of shrieking freshwater squid that dragged two men under before the Squire and the Apprentice killed it. Its flesh was apparently considered a delicacy in the Wasteland, Aisha informed me, because everyone in this bloody place was completely mad. I refused to have a bite out of principle, though Masego assured me with guileless malice it was delicious.

Archer was having the time of her life, at least, and came dragging back the carcass of what looked like a cow-sized lion with bat wings and a stinger-tipped tail the following afternoon. Masego was delighted enough when she offered him the venom glands that he enthusiastically kissed her cheeks, which had her in a terrifyingly good mood the rest of the day. I was only glad she'd killed the damned thing while out hunting and not after it'd flown into the camp and eaten a few of my soldiers. Not that our short turn in luck stopped a flock of blood-drinking bats that spat out paralytic venom – charmingly called something that translated 'night kissers' by Soninke, Aisha said – from attacking one of our night patrols.

The entire Wasteland was a fucking death trap.

It looked like we were going to be ready to march by Noon Bell on the third day, though, so I sat with Juniper to put together a vanguard. Two thousand light foot from Levant would do, we decided, with Archer and I accompanying them. Razin Tanja, whose forces were chosen to march, was pleased to be given the front as Levantines always were when awarded the possibility of being the first to be shot by arrows. Took all sorts. The Dominion warriors had taken well to the Wasteland, to my amused horror, Lady Aquiline even admitted it made her a little homesick. Fewer trees here than the Brocelian, she said, but the animals had a lot in common.

No wonder Levantines raided so much, I unkindly thought. I'd get out of the house as much as possible if my home was full of godsdamned bloodsucking bats, and fight for the privilege too.

We set out in passably good order just after Noon Bell, largely as we'd planned and to the palpable relief of many Callowan legionaries. I rode out with Razin and Archer for company, to a surprising chill under the afternoon sun. A cold wind was blowing in from the northeast, over the Jini Plateau. An hour got us to the half-road and from there we quickened the pace going southeast, until we came in distance of the Moule Hills and I was forced to call a halt. Not because three hours of marching had tired us out, but something entirely worse. On the steep northern slopes of those hills a fortified camp had been raised, wooden walls bristling with scorpions and catapults as six banners flew above them in the wind.

One for each of the five legions under Marshal Nim, one for the Tower.

ErraticErrata

A new map has been to the page representing the region where the events of the chapter are taking place. Have a look if you're curious, it's the last in the list!

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

A look where?

Gemya

Here: <https://ibb.co/0Yskpz4>

Or if you'd prefer not to hit a random link in the comments, it's on the Art, Maps and Other page

Konstantin von Karstein

On the website

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/maps/>

Aduro95

Is it just me, or does this upcoming conflict really resemble the war games at the end of Book 1?

Cat's been dumped in a disadvantageous position between several armies led by experienced commanders, most of whom want to take a bite out of each other. Also, Cat's having to join the fight after everyone else has a good chance to prepare.

I predict treachery, concluded by a mutually beneficial compromise.

ohJohN

At the very end of this chapter I was suddenly reminded of the war games too! There's even the extra parallel that Akua's meddling messes up Cat's timing/positioning (the storm now, the delayed wakeup in the war games).

308924810a

This makes me wonder how much of a parallel this is going to be, and whether Akua has someone ready to try to assassinate Catherine again.

Droughtbringer

Go boost!

https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/

ruduen

Huh. Cat finally shared her plan for Akua with someone else on-screen. Well, time to panic about just what kind of wrinkle is going to show up in it now that it's been spoken.

Liliet

Yep, sounds like something else is going to happen instead now that it's been spelled out.

Damn tho, what a plan. That's high quality right there.

mamm0nn

Eh, is it? I mean, Cat is still a Villain. She apparently didn't remember what Amadeus told her: Don't make a plan with too many vital steps and moving parts, and this thing is a Godsdamned pocket watch. Hell, Akua is probably already ahead of schedule finding the title and the Wasteland politics empty on day 1 rather than first trying to get drunk off the feeling before it hollows.

Liliet

I think you're overestimating the schedule rigidity. It's not a pocket watch, it's... water poured on the ground. You know it'll make its way to the ocean, but you don't need to know when, where or by what exact route. Cat knows where Akua is going but can only guess the path, and it's already backfiring on her.

It's possible that Akua being ahead of schedule on feeling shitty will shift something in the end goals, too, but I have a hard time expecting it to be a change for the worse.

Adrian_V

I think that Akua might die before it, in a redemption story or she will die as a villain because her heart isn't in it anymore (like she can go all the way or her feelings distract her/makes her hesitate a crucial time).

Malicia, if she still has her wits with her, may even be counting on it to use her as a sacrifice of sorts, like "look we have the tragic end of a villain here so you don't need e to die anymore right Fate?" xD

ninegardens

"Any plan with more than three steps is a bad plan"

pagesbe

I mean, the plan at the Prince's Graveyard definitely had more than 3 steps but was a masterpiece. So that's not a hard and fast rule.

mamm0nn

The Graveyard had Kairos, a master schemer with tons of experience and Below encouragement to plan and perform overly elaborate plans. Kat's plan just has to:

Step 1: Predict Kairos's general moves, and throw a goat into the mix.

Step 2: Screw with Kairos's plan the right way. And paint the goat white.

Step 3: Convince the princes and Heroes to give her the crowns and form a band of five. Kairos's plan already made them more amendable, and also screwed over any other outcome that wouldn't be terrible.

After that, it's less plan and more going with the Story.

pagesbe

Sorry, let me correct that for you.

1. Pilgrim had to use shine to counter the Drow.
2. Vivienne had to accept the unconditional surrender Cat offered without contradicting it (something she was close to doing)
3. After not contradicting it, Vivienne has to make a deal with Pilgrim to "ransom" the army in exchange for fighting Kairos, and that leads to
4. Kairos has to not call Cat's bluff, and move his soldiers in to fight Procer forces.
5. Convince the Procer nobles to give up their crowns

6. Have Kairos betray the band of five in the exact right way to get her hands on Amadeus' soul while not screwing them over too badly in exchange
7. Make their way through to where possessed Masego is and free him from the Dead King's influence, preferably without more than one person dying.
8. Crown Lairat with the crown of Twilight, then use the band and allied Drow to kill him.

Every single step listed had a failure condition. Any one of those steps, if it drastically failed, would have screwed the entire plan (except for step 6, but that was still very important).

Mental Mouse

Most of those were forced by Story, and/or by the SOPs of various players – Cat had trained Viv has her trusted second (2,3), she had pretty much owned Pilgrim Story-wise (1), and she was the only one who actually could predict or manipulate Kairos (4, 6, and 6 was also a Story beat). #5 especially was a Story prize, as indicated by Cordy's agent coming out to back her. #7 was a straight-up "follow the Story path", and 8 actually did fail, leaving Cat scrambling to rescue the situation, using her prepared contingency against Saint, and losing the crown to Pilgrim.

matesbe

Yes you are absolutely correct. These were not Hail Mary plays. That's why the plan was brilliant rather than just crazy. But I was responding to the idea that any plan with more than three steps is a bad plan. What matters more than the number of steps is how prepared and how much control you have over each of them.

Joel Chambers

Hahaha, I am early! Been loving the work as usual, thanks for the chapter!

dadycool

Wow, Cat's plan is absolutely savage. For Liesse, Akua is trapped in a hell of her own making for all time. I get it, but still. Savage.

Her troubles with the Wasteland were delightful, especially considering the general reactions of everyone around her. Literally everyone except her and the legionaries were having the time of their lives in that big deathtrap.

Vyseofthesky

I was waiting for the reason Cat sacrificed Robber instead of Akua. I'm not happy with it to be honest.

Liliet

To be fair, Robber was pretty explicit about Cat not getting a choice wrt him.

Sinead

While Robber was a great character, and I miss his presence in the rest of the series, he wasn't going to survive to the end. He was either going to die burning a Crab, or setting Keter on fire.

The fact that he dies along side Tariq and Klaus sort of highlights that he was at the older side of his lifespan, considering the parallels drawn between the three of them.

edrey

Shit, just that. that is way too horrifying. Cat's plan left me with no words.

Jrm

Yeah. It leaves me with a sick feeling. I hope something goes awry and/or we get some sort of redemption in the arc, because that level of "long prices paid twice" doesn't sit well with me.

To me, cat v akua is one of the most important aspects of this story, and a revenge/ contrition resolution just feels bad after all they've been through.

TwistThatKnife

For Cat, this has never been about contrition, or redemption. She has said more than once that Akua is beyond redemption in her eyes. Everything done was to maximize the eventual pain for Akua.

I'm unhappy with the reveal for a couple of reasons:

1) Telling Masego, who doesn't know when to keep a secret, seems foolish unless part of the plan requires Masego speaking out of turn. We all know how the story goes for villains when a secret might be leaked.

2) The reveal seems to early. It seems out of place.

Silverking

...Ah, so that's why the Crusade didn't take the deal to just pass into Praes. I suppose "nobody actually wants to conquer this place" is an effective deterrent against invasion.

Also, Cat, you may want to be careful about explaining your plans like that. There's a teleporting talker who's declared war on you, and she doesn't respect the sanctity of "spoilers".

Liliet

I mean, Akua knowing what Catherine wants from her in advance doesn't really change much. It was only really spoilers before she left.

shikkarasu

I largely agree, but two counter points:

- Catherine has made no secret that Akua needs to figure out the punishment on her own. I agree that it will be all the worse if Akua gets to the height of her power before she makes the final realisation. Otherwise she might try to fight the realisation or find a third path. She is on the road to Queen of Twilight, but if she gets nudged off the rails I can see it taking her longer to get there. Possibly too long for Cat's timetable.

- Who says Bard is limited to telling Akua? She could tell anyone the plan, so long as they might use it against Catherine. This is, after all, war.

Liliet

Catherine has made no secret that Akua needs to figure out that she wants to accept it all on her own, but she has said that she's going to make Akua an offer. She doesn't have to figure it out on her own.

> Otherwise she might try to fight the realisation or find a third path.

She's already fighting the realization!

And... I won't lie, I'm biased towards the "third path" option lmao

> Who says Bard is limited to telling Akua? She could tell anyone the plan, so long as they might use it against Catherine.

It's really hard to use it against Catherine, considering in the eyes of literally everyone who cares it's better than what her actions currently look like?

2xMachina

The Dead King would certainly screw with it if he could.

Lord Haart

Not entirely convinced on that. He's been happy playing evil in a bottle, he doesn't actually seem to like going to war but the Role, and even Below themselves, demand it of him.

With this plan he gets to be basically the same but without all the pressure from Lower Management. Live forever, keep company with a mind that rivaled Triumphant, have power and no responsibility, what's not to like?

Liliet

Not power that actually lets him do anything tho
shikkarasu

What Liliet said. Named are people who exert their will on creation, and the undead are people unable to change on a fundamental level. DK is still the same person who just sacrificed an entire country to reach apotheosis and to create a new world. He will not give up the Serenity or his status as a god (and he recognises only one peer, assumed to be the Bard, among those who have reached apotheosis) for any reason. Accepting defeat? Letting someone else control his fate? It's not about the pros and cons; he can't do it.

LarsBlitzer

The plan was laid out in an internal monologue, so there's no way anyone aside from Catherine knows her plan for Akua unless we get meta with it. Narrativewise, it still decreases the chances of it happening, just not as much as outlining it to someone else. Cat is no fool. Makes it more of a wish on a monkey's paw rather than dooming it to fail.

Rey d`Tutto

The last part she spoke aloud was:
"She trades a broken dream for a broken crown," I murmured.

Benjamin Huang

Weaver of wonders, maker of spells,
Sovereign of a twisting, frozen hell,
A city of ghosts and moat of bones,
A crown of Night over broken throne,
Hands bloodred forever stained,
Till dawn fails on the Long Price paid,
Twilight's spawn shall twilight beget,

A decision made without regret,
Weaver of wonders, maker of spells,
Golden warden of a prison realm

NerfGlaistigUaine

Hmm has anyone heard of the Unspoken Plan Guarantee?

To quote Tvtropes, that unholy well of addiction, "The chances of The Plan succeeding are inversely proportional to how much of the plan the audience knows about beforehand."

I'm gonna guess that Catherine's plan for Akua is going to have a few kinks at best and go horrifically wrong at worst.

Liliet

I'm going with "something else happens" rather than "goes horrifically wrong".

Lord Haart

Not a bad very given we know Cat doesn't really have a good pulse on Black who is probably still better understood by her than Akua is.

Cat's strength isn't really her plans, it's her backup plans.

ninegardens

>Cat's strength isn't really her plans, it's her backup plans.

This. This quote is a perfect explanation, and I love it so much. Thank you.

Someguy

Maybe turned into it's opposite? DK sitting on top of Akua forever?

Liliet

Effectively the same thing so long as he's not conquering Calernia?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"Catherine's plan for Akua is going to have a few kinks"
(◡ ◡ 5 ◡ ◡)

Liliet

No, that's Akua's plan for Catherine!

jamesc9

Akua's current plan, or Akua's former plan?

Liliet

-waves hand vaguely-

dadycoool

Cat actually made very good use of this at the Graveyard, only ever revealing bits and pieces to anyone, and it made her feel like a god.

Finn .-. .

Oh... Goddamn Cat, that is quite the long price she'll make Akua pay. I would say it was too much punishment, but those 100,000 dead...

Liliet

Liesse is gone forever, and Akua gets punished forever. It's kind of symmetrical.

Lord Haart

I'll admit though, I didn't see it coming that the plan was for Akua to reside in the husk of Liesse, never being free of it in a much more literal way. That's definitely a Callowan Long Price.

shikkarasu

Don't forget the Mercenaries and Slaves that she killed in First Liesse to open the Minor Breach, or the civilians killed by the demons summoned with said breach. I can't think of any other mass murders that she is responsible for off hand, but the 100 000 in 2nd Liesse was just the single Evilest day of her career. She is responsible for so much more.

Linnus42

I assume Black is helping Sepulchral cause I cannot think of any other Generals we know of who could be. Maybe she is getting consulting from the Free Cities. Anyway this battle is going to be a mess at least 4 Factions involved and probably a few turncoats and surprise additions.

As for Cat I don't think you can guilt trip Akua enough to guard DK on a throne for a century much less for eternity. Even if she doesn't notice Cat's hypocritical double standard on war crimes from say Black or Kairos' Favorite General. This storyline fails when even the most morally pure types like say a Grey Pilgrim or Saint of Swords is the one guarding the Evil for Eternity much less someone who was guilt tripped into it and is far from morally pure. I trust Akua in the tower more than I trust her to guard DK lol.

Liliet

I actually think this fits Akua's temperament well.

I've been saying since the end of Book 4 that a key beat of Akua's character is that she's dutiful. She likes to have a purpose and to fulfill it well, and she doesn't really have the mental machinery for pure pursuit of pleasure. Cat's pulled the rug out from under her feet for two previous purposes already (Making Praes Great Again, atonement finite version), and is about to offer a new one. Akua will know what Catherine is doing, and there will be genuine incentive for her to accept – and then to keep at it, because as Akua has demonstrated, she's not a quitter.

I do expect something will go differently now that we've heard the plan spelled out, but it is not a bad one.

(I mean, sure, something would eventually go wrong and a plucky band of heroes – or a plucky mixed band of heroes and villains, considering the scope of the threat – will need to fix it, but it won't be the current scale of difficulty and also won't be Cat's problem)

Feenor

Calling it. Akua does not end up as the Dead King's jailer. My money is on Cat becoming the dead king's jailer, holding the world and the gods to a higher standard upon pain of an unleashed autumn-crowned king of death.

Jrm

Now that is a twist I can get behind. Cat's current plan leaves an ashy taste in my mouth, but Cat choosing to take that endless throne would be much more fitting.

Lord Haart

I think fighting Above and Below is actually what the Dead King is doing too, in a twisted way – he's really been refusing to play the game. I don't think he sees the Intercessor as an enemy because she's an agent of Above, but because she works for both sides and enforces the Story Rules that bind sentient life on Calernia.

In that sense, Neshamah is like Amadeus, trying to tear down the Tower, while Cat is more pragmatic like Malicia and just wants to make things more liveable.

Curious how much Above and Below will directly feature by the end of this book.

chris S

Here's a thought I had from this: Without The Lone Swordsman rampaging through Callow, killing the Imperial governors and trying to incite a rebellion, Akua as the Heiress may never have been given governorship in Callow. With one point of view, ypu can reasonably draw a line between Cat letting Willy go at the start of book 1, and Liesse.

You might then argue that Liesse was ultimately Cat's making, when the chain of events is tallied.

Also, note the wording. It's not the retribution Akua owes them, it's the retribution Cat does.

jamesc9

> It's not the retribution Akua owes them, it's the retribution Cat does.

Yes. The long price is Cat's morality, so it's Cat's responsibility to arrange it, if it will be arranged at all.

Liliet

So, hmmm.

– Akua pulling her punches, probably relying on the fact nobody short of Hierophant will be able to tell she did so. Awww ♥ – Cat feeling guilty for the soldiers that died because of Akua's creation. That's, yeah, that's super reasonable. Cat's long price plan is having nasty side effects, and all of them are on her head.

– The plan. Wow. That's, that's definitely high quality. I don't think it'll happen this exact way, now that we know what it is, but wow, damn. That could work.

– The Wasteland is amazing ♥ ♥ ♥

Wonder

For gods sake, just when everything was going well, then this happens.

I hope Cat and AoC fuck up the rebel legions , especially Sacker. I get it's bread and water to betray allies in Praes, but supplying a whole fucking renegade legion not your own with weapons and food for a long time has to be hell on the country Treasury.

Fuck Sacker up.

Lord Haart

They haven't outright betrayed her yet, they just aren't going to take orders from her.

Mental Mouse

And we actually got to see a bit of the sentient tigers!

somni567

The Wasteland is Australia.

Juff

Typo Thread:

not ominous > no ominous studied be > studied me
Nim army > Nim's army with was left > with what was left translated 'night kissers' > translated to 'night kissers' horror, Lady > horror; Lady

mamm0nn

Me: Hey, remember the sentient tigers? I wonder if EE remembered them and that we'll see them soon. Nah, they'd probably wouldn't attack a full army like that. Sad me.

Half a chapter later Sentient tigers, bitches!

Shveiran

Really, I feel that was on you, mate.
Anything in the Wasteland would attack anything else; no matter if it is suicidal, no matter of it is stupid, and no matter if it is actually detrimental to all they ever loved and wanted.

"wouldn't attack a full army", ah!

shikkarasu

I have been waiting for Sentient and/or invisible tigers for years. You don't just list of a bunch of things that have been released into the wasteland and never show them on screen. EE has been taunting us with tales of the Gigantes, Assassin, horrors of former Warlocks, and Dread Empress T. (maysheneverreturn) and I am so stoked to finally be seeing them.

Sparsebeard

Those sapient tigers though! I expect the tapirs next...

Liliet

The tapirs were never sentient and also got executed)=

shikkarasu

A great loss for all of the Empire.

Liliet

T00 TRUE

Sparsebeard

I mean, animals are sentient by default. Sapient is the word you are looking for if you are referring to humanlike intelligence...

#pedantry

Liliet

Pardon me, wrong word)=

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Counterpoint: Ghost Tapirs! Or alternatively, severely-decayed undead suicide tapirs. It'll be how Amadeus delivers the goblinfire payload.

Liliet

000000

Deworld

Well, Cat's plan is certainly interesting. However, I still find the possibility of Akua becoming Dread Empress (or lead Praes in some other way) quite likely. And not only because the author just disrupted Unspoken Plan Guarantee.

Akua is, by far, the best candidate to make some significant reforms in Praes. She isn't just some Highborn, she is a former Heiress, the living embodiment and, well, heiress of Praesi culture and ideals. And who can be better at changing culture than its embodiment who has changed herself first?

I can forgive Cat for not seeing this. Not only it would go against her revenge idea – because no matter how much unpleasant it would be for Akua, it would hardly be a torture Cat wants – but also she is still putting too much trust into Amadeus. Mainly because she doesn't have hits about his plans as we do, but still. He may sound like a good fit for changing Praes, but I tend to agree with Malicia here – his methods won't work. Even if he is willing to take the throne (which I doubt), at max he will achieve some short-term boons.

Shveiran

Uhm. Akua is pulling punches but is still killing fools. "less than I could have" won't cut it if she returns to the fold, Malicia was right about that. I'm still completely convinced she won't actually become an enemy again, so my money is on her handing Catherine the battle. Afterward will likely be too late.

Although... well, Razin Tanja killed her soldiers, and still became an ally. So did many others. But there is a lot of difference between turning an enemy into an ally and forgiving a betrayal.

Ugh, that plan was so very awesome. It would still have fit after her actual betrayal, in a way that returning to the fold just won't.

But now it doesn't sound likely it will work. The emotional journey there would still be interesting, but it would have been more interesting without knowing; this suggests a branch will get in the wheels.

Anyway. Battle time!

Which won't be decisive, of course; Arthur needs a draw and if Nim is defeated soundly the 4D chess game that's going on with the armies kinda ends early.

But still. Battle time!

Deworld

Well, Cat did expect and even plan for this betrayal. She even admits in this chapter that those dead by Akua's actions are on her shoulders. Akua killing Cat's soldiers is one of the lesser problems, unless she goes all-out on it.

Clmineith

Pretty sure it won't work as Cat intend, but supposing it does:

- Akua become the Dead King's jailer
- Time pass (centuries, mileniums), and tales are known about the Immortal Guardian of the great evil
- At some point, Good decides Akua has done enough penitence. A group of 5 heroes come, needing something from the Immortal

Guardien, or maybe from the Prison Realm itself, for reasons – Akua sacrifices herself for the plan to work, which somehow include the final extermination of DK

Earl of Purple

So that lion thing sounds like a manticore, but Lysander had one of those and Cat didn't recognise this one. Game of Thrones uses manticore to mean a kind of large scorpion thing, but mostly they are winged lions or tigers with a poisoned tail. Sometimes also a human face.

ninegardens

I just... don't really see how Cat's plan for Akua is going to work. It's... too specific? It falls under the category of "any plan with three or more steps is a bad plan".

It also relies on using the twilight ways (you know, that main piece of infrastructure you built) as a prison and like... DK not talking his way out vs the guardian... or navigating good... or learning how to run really really fast.

The "box" doesn't feel secure enough, and even if it did, Akua doesn't feel like a secure enough jailer to hold it.

That's not to say she can't BECOME that person... but if she can change enough to become that person then in time (say... a couple centuries) she can also change enough to STOP being that person.

It just... doesn't feel right as a complete story. I can see why Cat might think it makes sense, but it just... kind of doesn't.

If anything, I'd be tempted to park Remoena (whatsername? Drow general) up on the throne. The Drow were interested in the throne. They have demonstrated ability to remain grumpy across numerous centuries, and honestly, just giving twilight to the drow just seems like a solid plan.

Jarl Zarl

I think the point is that Twilight isn't a box. There aren't walls to batter at or defensive spells to worm through, just endless paths and planar barriers that require blood sacrifice to breach (something the DK notably doesn't have). Now you'd definitely need to destroy any lingering Gates and strictly control the knowledge of how to make more but I don't think it's terrible as a prison. Not that it'd last forever but I'm not sure anything would and if it lasts long enough that the DKs mark on the world shifts from "the original undefeatable evil" to "trapped evil released to wreck havoc" that's much easier to deal with

ninegardens

Okay, but like... Akua just showed that it was perfectly possible to shatter through Twilight using a ritual. Admittedly from the outside but... DK is very good at magic. And the ways AREN'T shatter proof, as we have seen numerous times.

And they contain a number of previously established PERMANENT gates, that the Titans melted the edges of. (oof).

Now... if all these gates were closed somehow, and you managed to get it to "0 gates", that might work, assuming you stopped using the thing as infrastructure for travel.

...that said, I do agree with your story point. If you can get DK from "Original undefeatable evil" or "sealed evil in a can"... yeah, probably you'd only need him stored up for a couple centuries before that story took hold, and he became very very much defeatable. Hmmm... hadn't thought about that.

Konstantin von Karstein

Give the Twilight Ways to a people whose power and goddesses are linked with Night? Bad idea. Furthermore, they were interested in the Twilight Crown, not in the Ways themselves.

Also, you would give control of the Ways to an Evil polity, and the Good members of the GA would never accept that. Even Cat wouldn't want another nation controlling such a vital road.

And giving the role of warden to Rumena just looks wrong to me. There's also no chance he would accept to be his warden for all eternity.

Deworld

Didn't Rumena die at the end of Book 6?

Liliet

No.

Deworld

Nice to know. I apparently missed confirmation, but with mentions of drow going unruly I thought he was gone. It's a thing I'm happy to be wrong about.

agumentic

You confuse "specific outcome" with "complicated plan". Plans with more than 3 steps and such are bad because they rely on several things outside of your control going exactly like you want them to go, which is unlikely in real-world conditions. But Cat's plan relies only on a single thing – that she understood Akua well enough. It doesn't matter what else happens as long as that understanding is true, because it's going to lead to her preferred outcome no matter what. It's not a Rudy Goldberg machine but a pinball – no matter how the ball bounces, it will eventually go down the drain.

Now, I think Akua has it in her to surprise Cat, but it's not a bad plan because of its complexity.

ninegardens

You are right here.

I'd probably call it more like "Threading the needle" than like a rube goldburg machine.

And... Cat seems think this is a fairly wide needle, or (as you say) a pinball machine with only one outcome (due to story).

I'm more inclined to call it a very very long bowling alley.

With a curved floor. And a cross breeze. and only 1 pin standing.

Konstantin von Karstein

So Cat's army is outnumbered, no? That's bad. The GA has the advantage in Named, but the Legions have anti-Named tactics.

shikkarasu

So, to be clear, Nim, your plan is to fight Catherine with Five Armies and One? Yeah, I don't see that backfiring horribly. She's never pulled off a major upset in a battle like that before.

Hmm? Oh, just popcorn. Don't mind me; carry on like I'm not even here.

Xinci

The wasteland sounds like a wonderland of possible magical adaptations. I kinda want to read about a naturalist Named just like catalogueing stuff in it. I wonder how well the descendants of the Sapient Tiger army are doing population wise. They could honestly have pretty good numbers given they appear to be in a pride like/communal structure.

Seems Cat learned from the previous time at liesse where no one good could take the Crown and die. Its long term a very practical solution for her needs.

Mental Mouse

Perhaps a sapient-tiger naturalist?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

EE has mentioned that the modern descendants of the original tiger army aren't smart enough for that, being only moderately cleverer than regular tigers, but if tigers were uplifted to human-level intelligence once it could happen again.

Jefepato

Speaking of those, something just occurred to me. Is it possible for a sapient tiger – or more generally, a sapient member of a species that isn't normally sapient – to develop a Name?

Or would the tigers need to be around long enough to develop a recognizable culture in order for a Name to make any sense?

(On the third hand, if an orc can be a human's Adjutant and an ogre can be the Black Knight of Praes, it should be possible for a sapient tiger to join an existing culture and obtain a relevant Name, right?)

jamesc9

I wonder who has to witness a culture, in order for its Roles to become Names.

PhadosZahn

You know EE has trained their readers well when everyone in the comments says something along the lines of "Well now that we've heard the plan that DEFINITELY not how it's going to go down!" lol

Deworld

It's more about general tropes of fiction, not something EE specifically 'trained'. There's even a name for this particular trope – Unspoken Plan Guarantee. If a plan was told in advance then it's much less likely to succeed than if not. Plus people already have different theories about Akua's future.

Cold Cyberia

I'm really looking forward to the battle. It feels like it'll be a huge mess which is precisely when Cat and Juniper shine most. It'll be great!

What I really want to see is how the Army of Callow matches up against the Legions. They're so similar and yet they have distinctive strengths and weaknesses. It'll be cool to see how they match up.

SpeckofStardust

See's cats thoughts/plan.

..

...
Cats been corrupted. The dead king is fully killable this plan isn't going to work because the dead king will in fact be wiped out.

Mental Mouse

There's still the Severity in reserve. And possibly the angel corpse.

Criminalupper2200

So, does Kat just think she's invincible or something?

Like I get her whole absurd revenge plot against Akua because she's obsessed with the idea of punishment, but of ALL TIMES to do this, she chooses now? when she's neck deep in hostile territory, isolated from her other allies, with the dead king breathing down everyone's neck, and she chooses now to force Akua's hand and get her to join the enemy?

we literally just saw how Akua could have potentially DEVASTATED her army with a quick gesture if she wanted to. Has Kat just allowed her Callowan revenge lust to overcome her basic common sense or what?

ninegardens

I mean... Akua kind of picked the timing herself. Cat saw it coming, but she didn't CHOOSE the timing.

308924810a

I think this is some shade of the same thought process that led her to let the Lone Swordsman go, on some level she believes she could defeat this former enemy of hers again.

plantsbeans

Praes is Australia?

Barrendur

@plantsbeans

Yes, Praes is Australia: A huge, inhospitable expanse of land where the weather, the terrain and the wildlife – oh most assuredly the WILDLIFE – are perpetually trying to kill you (horribly).

empire 1

Hey, I actually got through the captcha to boost! Wonder of wonders, since I had to guess at several.

jamesc9

eg is the poll under a set of traffic lights part of the traffic lights or not?

"No Time" Toulouse

Looks like Nim is making mountains out of those Moule Hills...

ErraticErrata

That physically pained me. Good job.

Onos

Now that's some nice foreshadowing right there!

"the prospect of spending the rest of her life wearing shackles around her wrists that she would have put on herself"

"She trades a broken dream for a broken crown"

Absolutely sublime.

Chapter 14: Nock

"The right kind of defeat can be more useful than a victory."

– Dread Empress Prudence, the Frequently Vanquished

The two of us reined in our horses a prudent hundred feet away from the bottom of the slope.

A fortified camp looked down at us from the heights of the Moule Hills, raised grounds with a palisade and a dry moat. There were artillery platforms looming beyond the wooden rampart, at least two that I saw, and more than a dozen scorpions glaring down at the Army of Callow's vanguard from atop the palisade. My lips thinned as I took into consideration the steep slope leading up and the length of it going up – at least a few hundred feet – and how bloody taking that camp was likely to get should we try. I'd lose a hundred men for every foot, I darkly thought, the moment Marshal Nim brought out her crossbows.

"That wasn't there yesterday," Archer muttered. "I didn't come too close, Cat, but I would have seen it in the distance."

"They did it overnight, maybe?" I guessed. "Goblins can work during the dark, we've pulled that trick before. Then they bring in orc and humans after sunup when the foundations are laid."

That might mean they'd not finished the works too long before we arrived. And possibly that the defences weren't as thorough as it would seem from down here. Archer was visibly itching to ditch the horse and go have a closer look on foot but she restrained herself. Instead I felt the world shiver ever-so-slightly as she drew on an aspect, leaning forward on her horse.

"Moat's not even," Archer said, eyes distant. "And there's still goblins working on the side of the camp to make it go fully around."

I wouldn't be able to match her sight without drawing on Night and I'd rather not draw on that frivolously under the afternoon sun, so I simply took her word for it.

"Definitely overnight, then," I mused.

That made what they'd gotten up in time even more impressive. Much as it stung to admit it, the Army of Callow wouldn't have been able to manage the same. We lacked the sappers and the expertise: a lot of my legionaries had spent no more than six months in training camps before being considered ready for war. The Legions regularly trained and drilled their soldiers in ways the war against Keter had simply not afforded me the time to do. My people were veterans, but they were veterans of a very particular kind of war.

"Your rider will get to Juniper soon," Indrani noted. "We waiting for her orders or heading out to tickle the devils up early?"

I grimaced. Taking light foot up a hill into a hardened Legion position wasn't going to achieve much except corpses. She'd not meant taking the Malaga troops, though, but the two of us. Thing was, I wasn't sure we should. Not when the Marshal Nim would have a bunch of high-class mage cadres waiting and Akua Sahelian leading them. The odds of something nasty waiting for us up there were about the same as those of the sun rising tomorrow.

Might be it wouldn't, but I wouldn't bet on it.

"I'm not touching that camp without a bigger crew than just the two of us," I said. "And I'll let you loose to scout, since I know it's a lost cause to stop you, but I want you to promise to keep your distance."

Indrani considered me a moment.

"Worried about the mages?" she finally asked.

"They know which Named we field now," I reminded her. "Nim and Malicia aren't idiots, they'll have spent time and coin figuring out how to kill all of you."

"I'll be a good girl, then," Indrani drawled. "Promised."

I rolled my eye at her, feeling a pang of discomfort when I realized I was facing the wrong way for her to be able to see it. All she had to look at was an eye cloth over a hollow socket. It was the little things that distressed me the most, somehow. Wounds I knew, had learned to live with. Limp along with. Losing an eye had been... more than that, in a lot of little ways. Archer waited until we'd returned to the ranks of the vanguard before passing off her horse, wandering off to find a way to sidle into the Ways. Though it was still dangerous to travel those and it'd still remain that way for the better part of two weeks, it was the sort of environment she thrived in.

A broken-down patch of the Ways where a single misstep might see her falling through the sky? Archer would take to that like a fish to water. It was when she'd be back in Creation that worried me.

Not that I had a lot of time to spare on that. The Levantine warriors that made up the vanguard of the Army of Callow had been advancing in a broad column until we'd caught sight of the enemy camp, going down the half-road, but when I'd called a halt Razin had pulled them out of marching order and begun ordering them into warbands. It was the right instinct, because right now the army behind was spread out along that road like a snake. Juniper would put the column into battle order soon enough, I thought, and I didn't think that the Black Knight would have staked out that position in the heights to then abandon it at the first opportunity.

But there were troops Marshal Nim could throw at us without abandoning her position, and sure enough as I rode through the throng of Levantine warbands I heard exclamations of surprise from the ranks. From the eastern face of Moule Hills horsemen were pouring out in neat ranks, though where they'd emerged from was hidden by a large fold of rock. Hundreds, I counted, then more than a thousand. Fuck, was Nim throwing her entire horse at us? If so, we were in deep shit. The last reports had her at three thousand light horse to our vanguard of two thousand and a half-thousand of heavy horse from the Thirteenth to throw in should she feel like it.

"Razin," I shouted over the din, forcing people away with my staff. "Razin."

The sound of my voice caught his attention over the din, drawing his eyes to me and away from his advising captains.

"Shield wall now," I called out. "Pack it tight or we're all dead."

If Nim had sent goblin skirmishers I would have advised we retreat instead, but we wouldn't outrun cavalry on flat grounds. To Razin's honour, he wasted in time in following through. Shouting in Ceseo he got his captains moving, the quick-footed Levantine warbands gathering into a fat uneven circle. I dismounted, heading for the front as shields were raised. In the distance, across the grounds, the enemy horse advanced at a brisk trot and formed into four slender wedges. They were long and thin, so it was hard to tell how many riders there were. More than a thousand, at least, but how many more? I found good solid ground to stand on, slightly away from the shields up front, and after making sure the warriors around were giving me a wide berth I closed my eyes and began to pray to the Sisters.

"Wake up," I murmured in Crepuscular. "We have a war on our hands and I need a miracle to teach the enemy to fear me again. Wake up, carrion crows. There's blood in the air."

As I continued to murmur the Night began to move, lazily slithering into my veins, reluctant to brave the heavy sun. I kept drawing it in, murmurs flowing freely as the power began to accrue. There were shouts in Ceseo as the Levantine captains whose men had slingers among them – a lot of Dominion warriors had picked up the habit of carrying slings as well as their usual arms in Hainaut, since they were so useful against the dead – told them to get ready. A few heartbeats later the enemy closed the distance, Taghreb and Soninke in vividly coloured scale and cloth. War cries sounded on both sides, and though a few stones split open heads it was nothing to what we suffered in return.

Our shield wall was tight and packed, which I'd asked of Razin to discourage the enemy charging us. Light horse wouldn't want to get mired in our ranks, it'd be like a mud pit for them. The downside was the same as the upside, unfortunately: the shield wall was tight and packed. So when the enemy cavalry began throwing javelins with all the strength of a charge behind them, those steel-tipped killers found their marks and then some. Shields splintered and broke, men fell with screams and I got my first good look at well-trained Wasteland horse making war. All four of the wedges that'd threatened a charge stopped well shy of our ranks, instead splitting to the sides and riding backwards smoothly.

The riders at the front threw their javelin and then retreated, making room for a fresh horseman to toss their own. The impact was... bloody. Worse than arrow fire would have been, if not as sustained.

I'd gathered power enough to give an answer, though. Night flared up, wreathing me in shadow, and above the enemy horse I began to gather specks of black flame. I wasn't going to bother with subtle here: if I could burn through a chunk of their cavalry today the Loyalist Legions would be significantly easier to handle going forward. To my surprise the horsemen did not disperse at the sight, continuing their deadly javelin fire, and I saw why a moment later. There was a great surge of sorcery up on the heights, two transparent but roiling rings beginning to form. I stole away a sliver of the Night running through me, sharpening my eyes, and almost cursed. That was raw kinetic power they were gathering; I'd seen the likes of it before.

If that hit the ranks of the vanguard javelins would be the least of our problems. With the shield wall broken, we'd just get run down by the cavalry like animals.

Whoever had designed that trap had an uncomfortably good read on my abilities. I couldn't abandon my working with the Night and rustle up another to handle this, not at this time of the day, which meant I'd have to break it apart and remake it. Gritting my teeth, I did. The black flames gutted out into smoke, the power instead expanding those puffs into great tendrils of dark mist. The kinetic rings flew out, the sound they made comically wobbly, but I moved the mist in the way. The working devoured the sorcery as it went through, leaving little more than a short burst of wind to reach our ranks. That wasn't a victory, though, when the horsemen had been hammering at us all the while.

At this rate they'd run out of javelins before we gave an answer.

The Levantines were itching to ditch the shield wall and charge, given how close the riders were – another trap – but discipline held. Razin went through the ranks giving encouragement even as I began gathering Night again, his captains forcefully pulling back warriors that began to break the ranks. I'd have to let the Levantines take the hit, I realized. We could probably survive the magical bombardment, but if I didn't hit the horsemen they were definitely going to overrun our position the moment they got done softening us up with javelins. It was a shitty choice to make, but I didn't have a better one on the table. Best make my miracle count, then.

I had an idea or two in mind and I took to weaving even as power began rising atop the heights again – only to suddenly fall apart. I blinked in surprise, confused, only to then let out a sharp laugh. Archer. Archer had put an arrow into whoever had been leading that ritual. This was as close to an opening as I'd get.

Then the ground behind us began trembling. Yet it was not cries of dismay that greeted the change. I glanced back, finding the banner of the Broken Bells flying tall in the wind as they rode hard to relieve us. Juniper must have sent them out before we even caught sight of the enemy cavalry, for them to get her so quickly. The arrival of other horsemen saw the Legion auxiliaries lose their taste for the skirmish, unloading another few javelins our way spitefully and then smoothly pulling away. My knights began pursuit, passing by our position at a gallop, but they weren't going to catch up to light horse and they knew it.

Brandon Talbot pulled the Order back when the enemy was driven most of the way back to their camp. I kept an eye on the heights all the while, waiting for magic to erupt again, but no ritual followed. I released the Night, feeling a wave of exhaustion, and the bloodied vanguard began its retreat back to the rest of the army. We'd survived, I told myself. Marshal Nim had given us a black eye, but we'd survived.

It wasn't much, but it was something.

—

"The best we can say is that it stopped shy of being a disaster," Juniper bluntly assessed.

Three hundred and sixty-three dead, almost twice that wounded. Over half of our two thousand strong vanguard had been shredded over the course of a skirmish that'd lasted maybe half an hour. There would have been a lot more corpses on the ground if we'd not been able to retreat to healers, but that was cold comfort considering we were unlikely to have all the wounded back on their feet before nightfall.

"The Black Knight caught us with our trousers down," Aisha admitted. "Our scouts had no idea the Legions were here, much less camped above the only road. It is a major failure of our forward elements."

That was a very polite way of phrasing 'we stumbled in blind and got spanked', but the lovely Taghreb did have a way of doing that.

"We turtled up after we got hit in the Ways," I said. "And it cost us. Now two ways about it."

I wouldn't pretend otherwise.

"But now we know Nim's here, so she's shot her arrow," I reminded them. "She won't catch us out like this again."

It'd been less than an hour since the enemy cavalry had retreated. We'd used that time to form up the Army of Callow and its auxiliaries in a battle line across the half-road, facing the fortified camp in the hills, but the Legions of Terror showed no inclination of coming down to fight us. It was just Juniper and Aisha here with me here in the field tent, General Zola being charged with handling affairs on the front, so none of us bothered to put a better face than was true on our current situation.

"We can't attack that camp," Aisha said, voicing an opinion we all shared. "It would be throwing an egg at a wall."

"We need to turn her position," I said. "Either to the east or west. So long she's the one sitting on top of the half-road she can keep bringing up fresh supplies and water to her camp while we'll be eating into our own reserves."

"That's the trap, Catherine," the Hellhound growled. "She's making it seem like she's ceding us the initiative by staying up in her camp, but she hasn't. We can't leave through the Ways and we'll slow to a crawl if we leave the road."

I cocked an eyebrow at her.

"The grounds are too rocky west of Moule Hills," Aisha told me in her stead. "Unless we put the sappers to making a path for us, we'd just be wrecking the wheels we just got done putting back on."

Might still be possible to do it if we moved really slow, but if we did we'd get hit. She'd harass us with skirmishers and cavalry from a safe distance, bleeding my army out one cut at a time. And while it would be possible for the Army of Callow to advance ahead of its supplies at a quicker pace, it would be a very bad idea. We were tethered to those wagons, because the alternative was the Black Knight's three thousand cavalry sallying out and torching the wagons carrying all our food and water. Marshal Nim was living up to her reputation as one of the three most decorated officers in all of Praes: she'd found a way to hem us in without even setting foot outside her fortified camp.

"That leaves only the half-road," I said, openly unenthused.

It'd mean marching down the valley between Moule Hills and Kala Hills with a larger enemy force on our flank that was set up in entrenched high grounds. We'd be doing that on open grounds all the while, while the enemy had their war engines pointed at us from above. It had disaster written all over it.

"It might be possible to keep close to the bottom of the Kala Hills and make it south without a battle ensuing," Aisha argued. "It'd be a risk for her to try us: in an enclosed space like the valley we could maneuver to negate her advantage in numbers."

"And on tight grounds the Order would punch much harder than her own horse," Juniper grunted. "But it won't work, Aisha. She'll just decamp and use the road to outpace us going south. Then she'll set up at Kala Fortress with stone walls to defend from and her supply line still safe at her back."

Which would just be moving the problem a few hours south, assuming it even worked. Which I was significantly less inclined to believe than Aisha was.

"We could march back north," I suggested. "Go around this entire region, find another way through."

"We'd be rolling dice," Aisha grimaced. "We can't go back into the Ways and if the Gale Ribbon spits out a storm at us the results could be almost as bad as a defeat."

She wasn't wrong, though it might honestly still be better than engaging the Black Knight on her chosen grounds. Unlike the Legions of Terror, after mauling us the storm wouldn't pursue.

"North is right," Juniper gravelled. "But into Kala Hills. Northeast."

"Those are a dead end," I frowned. "Even if we set up a camp on those heights facing hers, all we do is run out our supplies while she watches us."

Nim wouldn't be any more eager to attack our camp than we were to attack hers, we wouldn't bait her into making that mistake. Especially not when Malicia and her Black Knight were well aware that I could only spend so long settling affairs in Praes. It was to their advantage to wait me out without even giving battle, since without a decisive victory against the Tower my bargaining position was weak.

"Are they a dead end?" Juniper replied, clicking her teeth thoughtfully.

She went looking through her papers, eventually taking out a parchment sheath she pressed into my hands. It was a report, I saw, from the captain that'd overseen the detachment that had gone to Nioqe Lake to fill water barrels. A significant chunk of it was spent going over the freshwater squid attack and praising the two young heroes that'd killed the creature. I glanced at Juniper, unsure why she'd hand me this. I'd already told the kids they'd done well.

"What am I looking for?" I asked.

"Captain Henry mentions seeing locals on the opposite shore," Juniper said. "Fishermen, as is to be expected of a lakeside town, but also those bringing cattle to drink."

I scanned for the line, eye narrowing when I found it. The officer had mentioned seeing sheep, specifically, and I finally found my marshal's line of thought.

"Goats they could feed on scraps, but they'd need grazing lands for sheep," I muttered. "And we haven't seen any suitable grounds on the other side, so you think they're-"

"In the Kala Hills," Juniper finished. "And that means shepherd paths, maybe all the way through."

Even if we found those paths they wouldn't be broad enough to let our army cross, but that was why we had sappers. Should we cross the hills and march south it was almost certain that the Legions would still beat us to Kala Fortress, but it wouldn't matter as much. We wouldn't be bottled up in the valley anymore, we could swing wide to the east and go through the rainlands until we eventually found another stretch of the half-road to march on. Marshal Nim would have to come and fight us on our terms; otherwise we'd cut her supply lines and have freedom to march on a lightly defended Ater even as Sepulchral caught up to the Loyalist Legions.

"It is already too late in the afternoon for giving battle to be anything but risky, regardless," Aisha noted.

No one argued with that. The Black Knight had the Eighth Legion with her, the Trailblazers, and General Wheeler's ranks were heavy on both goblins and skirmishers. If fighting continued after dark we'd be at a stark disadvantage.

"Kala Hills, then," I agreed.

—

The slopes weren't as steep here as they were on the Moule Hills to the south, but the stone was softer. Easier to use as foundations. The Kala Hills were also covered with brushlands and Pickler assured me having local wood to cut made building the camp much easier. The work only began midafternoon, which was uncomfortably late, but the Black Knight hadn't just sat in her camp looking pretty as we moved. Skirmishers were out and about with the hour's turn, harassing our retreat as we marched away. Juniper sent out the Levantines and our own Army skirmishers to match them, but the Order stayed put. We needed the knights ready in case Nim sent out her own cavalry, we had nothing else that'd be swift enough to stop her from chewing up our light foot.

This once the fight went our way, at least. I was done fucking around after the mauling we'd taken, so I sent out Named in force. The Silver Huntress was like a thresher in a wheat field, fighting skirmishers, and she had a lot of anger to work out. The Squire got himself two crossbow bolts in the stomach after getting cocky but with the Apprentice at his side it was far from enough to kill him. He'd eat only broth for a week, I thought, and be a wiser man for it. Just because goblins were half his size didn't mean that charging crossbowmen on foot was any less foolish. The Empire had designed those things to punch through plate, knight-killers.

The enemy broke off shortly before nightfall, their cavalry having never come out. Another hundred dead on our side, but we'd inflicted easily twice that. Nim would think twice about testing us like this in the future and the Malaga warriors raised their heads for having avenged their honour in the rematch.

I stayed back to level hilltops with Night so our sappers would make progress quicker but it was still frustratingly slow-going. There'd be no dry moat for us and the palisade was patchy in places: we'd put a priority on getting the wards in place, since the last thing we wanted was to suffer magic bombardment in the middle of the night. Nightfall saw the Army of Callow retreating into its half-done camp, tents raised and fires roaring. Come morning I'd take Archer and the Silver Huntress out in the hills, looking for paths, but after the exhausting day I just wanted to sleep. My head barely hit the pillow before I blacked out.

Cruelly, I was awakened what felt like a single heartbeat later.

Alarm wards were pounding away at the night air. I dragged myself into trousers and hastily put on my armour, snatching my sword and staff as I exited only to almost stumble into a large orc sergeant.

"Report," I ordered, tightening my sword belt.

"Under attack ma'am," he gravelled.

I rolled my eye. Yes, I'd deduced as much somehow.

"Who, where?" I pressed.

"They came from the hills, behind the camp," the sergeant said. "Staff Tribune Bishara claims it's the Eleventh Legion."

It took me a moment to place that. Cognomen 'Tenebrous', led by General Lucretia. The sole officer that'd been a general in the Legions before the Reforms and stayed one after. Also a vampire, some sort of flesh-eating undead. Her legion had been under Grem One-Eye during the Conquest, attacking the Wall, but I couldn't remember anything in particular that'd distinguished it. The Eleventh stayed in the Wasteland ever since, so I'd never had to deal with any part of it. My belt was comfortably set, so I laid a hand on the pommel of my sword and straightened my back.

"All right, sergeant," I said. "What's the situation?"

"Marshal Juniper requests that you head to the breach," he said.

"Let's get to it, then."

The camp was in decent order, considering we'd gotten attacked right after Midnight Bell. My legionaries were gathering briskly for a counter push, the element of surprise having passed. It was only when we got to the breach that I winced. The Eleventh hadn't hit the Army of Callow, I saw, but the *Levantine*s. The chunk of the patchy palisade that'd been broken through with now-abandoned rams had led straight to where the day's wounded were kept. The same warriors that'd bled down on the plains. Legionaries with shields painted in green and black had overwhelmed the tents and slaughtered the surprised Dominion force, but by the look of the bodies and scorch marks a force of Lanterns and Osenas slayers had stopped them in their tracks. By the time I got here, the Legion incursion – a mere five companies, by the looks of it – was being driven back even if most of the Dominion warriors were only half-dressed.

The trouble came from further back: deadly crossbow volleys were being poured into the shield wall from a hill in the distance. We'd stemmed the tide, the camp was in no danger of being overwhelmed, but bodies would keep piling up until we cleared out that fucking hill. That'd be my job, looked like. Razin and Aquiline were easy to pick out from the throng, just by the way their people rallied to them, and I saw that both the Silver Huntress and the Barrow Sword were with them. Deciding I could use the help, I limped my way to them. I quickly exchanged greetings with the lordlings, then the Named.

"Black Queen," Ishaq greeted me, grinning. "Nice night, isn't it?"

"They disturbed my beauty sleep," I flatly replied. "Someone's going to die for that."

Some chuckles, but Alexis was grimly serious.

"Orders?" the Silver Huntress asked.

"I want you two and a good line of twenty killers," I said. "We're going to silence those crossbows."

"It would help," Razin admitted. "Marshal Juniper is sending crossbowmen of our own but they have yet to arrive."

"I'll go," Aquiline said. "My retinue will serve."

I wanted to argue, but that glint in her eye told me she was going to be obstinate and we didn't have the time.

"Fine," I grunted. "Lord Razin, you have the command."

He nodded, then snuck a kiss to his fiancée.

"Do try not to get another scar," he teased her. "You know how jealous I get."

"No promises," Aquiline grinned.

Ugh, young love. I shared a disgruntled look with Alexis, though for some reason the Barrow Sword was looking rather fondly at the pair. I didn't want to take slayers with us, I made clear to Aquiline, so she drew twenty sword and board men from her retinue instead and we circled the melee at the gap. The Barrow Sword opened a path through a weak patch of the palisade with a mule kick, large enough for us to make it out onto the hills. All three of us Named could see in the dark at least decently, so we guided the Levantines through the sloping brushlands. Several times we had to outright climb up, so I had to kill the pain in my bad leg with Night, but we made good pace anyway.

The enemy had chosen a tall, flat-topped hill to position their crossbowmen so they weren't difficult to spot. Two hundred of them, firing in rotation to obscure their numbers. They were probably hoping to bait legionaries into exposing themselves before unleashing proper volleys, I thought. I was not much enjoying fighting the Legions of Terrors. I'd much preferred having that particular war machine on my side. Still, the reason I grimaced and gestured for our warband to crouch into the bushes wasn't the crossbowmen: it was the few skulking shapes at the bottom of that same hill. Goblins. Sappers.

"We have to hit the hill from here," I whispered.

I got odd looks for it.

"There's sappers afoot," I flatly stated. "Every approach to that hill will be mined to the Hells and back. We try to walk through a field they set up and maybe two of us will make it there."

Maybe. If the sappers were having an off night. Names helped you against a lot of things but stepping into a gout of goblinfire wasn't one of them. We found defensible grounds, a dip between two hills that had just low enough a rim that I could look at the enemy crossbowmen and aim, and Aquiline's men spread out around me in a loose circle. I silently gestured for Ishaq to keep an eye on the Lady of Tartessos when she wasn't looking but kept the Silver Huntress close. She had sharp reflexes and I'd not be able to move much while weaving Night. I breathed out, looking at the sky, and struck my staff against the rocky ground.

"Sun's gone, Sisters," I spoke in Crepuscular. "Let's play, yeah?"

The power came eagerly when I called, as if to make up for its sluggishness during the day. In a low murmur I spoke my prayers, shaping the working as I drew more and more Night into myself.

I'd expected the enemy to catch on to our presence sooner or later, but that wasn't exactly what we got. Suddenly – when I had gathered enough Night into one place, I guessed – there was a ripple of magic in the air and a red circle of light formed about two hundred feet above our position. You know, revealing it to anyone looking. I paused in my incantation.

"Fuck you," I feelingly told the sky, and also Akua Sahelian.

The enemy must have been expecting us because it couldn't have been longer than a hundred heartbeats before they struck. They came out of the night like ghosts, a single line of twenty legionaries. But these were not regulars or heavies, I thought. Their armour was light, leather and breastplates, and none of them wore helmets. Their hair flew freely in the wind, long and dark and oddly animated. Each bore a single sword and a long spear. They... didn't move right. They were beautiful, I thought, dark-skinned and dark-eyed but with impossibly smooth skin. My mind was being clouded, I recognized. After I bit my lip hard the beauty waned. Their skin was smooth as corpse's because that was exactly what they were.

Not a single one of them breathed.

They struck in silence, three warriors dying before Alexis could warn them we were under attack, but I kept whispering my prayers. Almost there. Aquiline and Ishaq took on one of the enemies together, the Osená hooking his spear and dragging him close enough the Barrow Sword could take off his head. The legionary exploded into a spray of dust and rotten flesh, armour falling into the rocks. The Silver Huntress parried a spear tossed at my side then threw her own with a flash of Light, slaying the sender without batting an eye. The proximity of Light almost destabilized my working, but with a soft curse and desperate haste I compensated. Just a moment now, aligning it just right...

"Burn them all," I hissed in Crepuscular.

The circle of black flame erupted around the crossbowmen, rising the height of three men before spinning inwards. The crossbowmen died screaming, but I was not done. The circle kept spinning on itself, until I snapped my staff against the ground and it exploded outwards in a wave. I heard screaming from legionaries not mine as munitions began to explode, the brush burning bright as the wave of incineration continued outwards until it gutted. I breathed out, brow touched with sweat, and drew my sword. The animated corpses that'd been attacking us – vampires? – were retreating, I found. Half the Levantines that'd come with us were dead and Ishaq was bleeding from a bite mark on his face, but otherwise we'd made out decently.

Eye scanning the night, I found that in the hills there were glints of steel under moonlight. More legionaries. Pulling back,

I realized. And so were those that'd been fighting in the breach, though the Dominion pressed them close and the crossbowmen Juniper had sent took their toll. Maybe a fifth of those five hundred would make it out. But why were they retreating already? It made little sense. If they feared what I could do with the Night, why attack after nightfall in the first place? Feeling like I'd missed something I led us back to camp in a hurry. And there was something wrong, I noticed it immediately. Too many legionary tents were empty, and those that weren't were being brought down. Packed away.

I found Juniper and with her my answers. My marshal looked wretched. I thought it was a wound, at first, but her body was fine.

"She played us," Juniper got out, words tumbling out of her fanged mouth like a confession. "She left her camp, Cat. The Legions are marching on us right now, they're most the way across the valley, and we can't fight. Not with the entire Eleventh out in the hills waiting to flank us."

My fingers clenched.

"You're saying we need to retreat," I slowly said.

"We're in disarray, flanked and our camp fortifications are incomplete," the Hellhound said. "If we fight, we'll lose."

I rocked back in shock. She knew, and I knew she did, that a retreat at night with the enemy nipping at our heels was going to get bloody. Goblin skirmishers were going to scrape off our rearguard raw, and we'd be both slow and vulnerable on the move. That she was still arguing we needed to retreat could only mean that she was genuinely afraid that our army was going to get destroyed if we did not.

"Where would we even go?" I got out.

"Further north," she said. "Near the Jini Plateau, close to Nioqe Lake."

That wasn't a strategic position, I thought. Or even a tactical one. There were no real gains to be made by going there except not being crushed. That was how bad our situation had gotten. Numbly, I nodded my permission. I needed a drink, I thought, before we got going. Gods but my leg hurt.

I could not remember the last time we had been this brutally outmaneuvered.

—

We cut our losses and ran. It was not as hard a retreat as it could have been, Marshal Nim perhaps wary of engaging in a full pitched battle in the dark, but it cost us more than I cared to admit. As we fled I looked back and froze, for in the distance I saw the Black Knight's fortified camp was burning bright under the starry sky. It took me a moment to understand. Of course she was burning that camp. She no longer needed it, after all.

She'd just taken ours.

Stormblessed

Oof that's a lot of consecutive losses. Turns out facing the hand that trained you can be rough.

Anomandris

Nah, if the real hand that trained her had turned up, it would have been a mauling far more severe.

Interestingly, this also plays into Daddy's hand. Cat may have the raw power and the names, but who better than Amadeus of the Green Stretch for her tactics? Especially AGAINST Praesi? Ergo, more concessions into whatever he wants (which more or less seems to be something Cat will not approve)

shikkarasu

My money is on Amadeus (Crows, I miss just being able to call him Black) wanting to put Catherine in the Tower. Why else would he wait until she showed her face in the Wasteland to make his move? And if he wanted the tower himself he'd have reached out to her; it's no secret that she wants him for the job.

There's also that last line from the Book 6 Epilogue: "If the song refused to leave him, then he would silence it." That does not sound like someone embracing their destiny. That sounds like someone who has finally found a way to break it.

Abnaxis

My bet is on him wanting to wreck the Tower and the Praesi nobility so thoroughly it will destabilize the region for the next five generations. A Praes that's completely collapsed in on itself is not what Cat wants either if she's wanting to create a lasting trade relationship with Praes and use their Legions against the Dead King.

Ciel Morgenstern

Hey, maybe he wants to install democracy instead? =P

Liliet

Boost the vote and vote for hte boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Droughtbringer

Thanks!

Benjamin Huang

Ahhhh, competent villains. Delightful.

Raivshard

Indeed, perhaps even practical.

edrey

nice, i couldnt help but remember the war games in book one, more brutal too.

Lord Haart

Bet Nim has Snatcher doing her fortifications too.

Cat might need to go for a draw again, if she can make that work for her one more time. Though I think this time Amadeus wants to try to throw that story at the last.

That's one reason why he might not have reached out – he's more valuable story-wise as an unknown who could swoop in at the last minute. He might not even mind dying in that story if he gets what he wants out of it.

308924810a

Makes me wonder whether the decision to attack at night was because they thought that vampires and goblins(/a better officer corps, because night fighting disrupts the transmission of commands, amplifying that advantage) is a better comparative advantage than the superior use of Night, given that apparently Cat didn't bring a bunch of Drow on this campaign for whatever reason.

Or whether the whole thing is somehow centrally decided by the features of Vampires that Cat is unfamiliar with, as they are uncommon on this continent, namely that they are hurt by the sun and they can turn people with bites. Makes me worried about the Barrow Sword.

Also I wonder just how long this vampire general has been serving Praes. Is it relatively recent or is she truly ancient?

mamm0nn

The drow were very specifically only coming to the surface to fight the Dead King and conquer themselves a new land out of his dead nation. Conquering Praes is not part of the package, so they wouldn't come. Even if there would be drow to spare, which right now there aren't, the Sisters are under no obligation to do so.

So, given that, it makes sense for the army with more goblins and darkvision folk to use the night as cover. Cat's still just one Named.

Shveiran

That's not the main reason, in my opinion.

The drow conquering the land of the dead is very much tied to actually winning the war, and winning the war is bound to actually sealing the breaches the DK opened into the hells: it's not like Cat is here on her own time, however many personal reasons she may also have.

Much like the drow fighting on the southern front, they would have very good reason to help here.

If they aren't, it likely means they can't. The drow were crippled by Masego Ruining the Sisters to save them from being usurped by the DK, and if it had such a stark effect on goddesses, I can't fathom how hard the drow were hit.

Even being generous, they might simply not have strength to spare if they need not to fold on the northern front.

mamm0nn

You're assuming the drow, a race of thieves and cutthroats, are the kind of honourable and selfless folk that would spread themselves thin and bleed on foreign grounds to fight enemies of their allies for potential gain predominantly to the Hellgate-riddled south of the Kingdom of Dead where their city and troops aren't.

There's also a very logical reason for the drow to not send help to fight Praes. They have no reason to, it's a bother and it's not part of the bargain. Remember how obstinate the humans can get about their desires and what they're asked to do, the drow can most certainly afford to be just as prickly and selfish here and not stand out as evil bastards.

Shveiran

The drows are a race whose goddesses inhabit their own living flesh.
The goddesses Cat is the avatar of.
Goddesses that know either Praes is taken over or the war is lost.

If Sve Noc say march, the drow will. If they haven't there is a reason, and that reason is not pettyness.

Roke

> If Sve Noc say march, the drow will.

This is incorrect, or rather, yes, but even the drow have limits of what they will do for their goddess. One of the generals is already starting to hint at rebellion against Sve Noc.

Sve Noc's sway over the drow explicitly isn't absolute, and Catherine has already had to learn to navigate that her authority as FUtN isn't anywhere near absolute either. She's already made decisions in the past to avoid entering a situation where her request is way too heavy, the drow refuse, then her influence over them erodes.

mamm0nn

Which is assuming that the goddesses, which have very stated and been stated that they are not just Cat's patsies or friends, would just send Cat drow just because. They too are people with their own will, agendas and such, similar to Pilgrim, Cordelia and the likes. Just because they're not Good and/or human, doesn't mean they're just a tool to be abused.

onedollargum

Of course the Barrow Sword was bitten by a vampire. That slides into his name so well =D

Burlyraven

Honestly just feels like a fated power up.

Anomandris

This seems very weirdly out of character for Cat. Not the tactical outmanuever by Nim – that happens in wars – but rather the whole set of 'unexpected' tricks that Akua keeps catching her with.

She knew the betrayal was coming and what's more she condoned it. She had to have contingencies for Akua and her magic put in place, yes? Seems a lot like she didn't (or couldn't be bothered to – which is worse as it keeps costing her soldiers!). If you know Person X is feeding info to your enemy, you feed Person X misinformation. That's warfare 201.

Liliet

The reason Cat's trick with Akua is a bad idea from every level except the story one is that Akua would have caught on to any misinformation and any stinginess with information. Catherine had to put full trust in her in action for real for Akua's decision to leave to be motivated solely by her own issues and not by being pushed out. Stories don't work cleanly if you hedge your bets, because then it becomes a story about hedging your bets.

Catherine had to genuinely put herself in the mindset where Akua was no threat, and it would take one hell of a lot of mental flexibility to pivot that 180 after she left, especially when the leaving was not a surprise and so came with no shock.

This is just straight up an inevitable downside of her plan being what it was; has to pay off later, though, because the upside is that Catherine played this by the book and Did The Right Thing™ every step. Creation rewards that, even if – especially if – it cost.

Anomandris

But doesn't a misinformation story by the hero also factors into being, well, a STORY?

The wily, conniving villainess out thought and outsmarted by the plucky hero would have still worked. Didn't need to have hedged at all.

Liliet

That's not the story Cat is playing though. A misinformation story by the hero is not a story about being genuinely welcomed with the only limit drawn by the past. Akua is not the conniving villainess in this but a lost soul looking for salvation yet finding only walls in her path.

RoflCat

Not to mention Catherine is Callowan, they are known for going to ridiculous degree for their revenge even at the unreasonable risk/cost to themselves.

I do wonder if Akua plan to Praes uno reverse that though. By getting Catherine what she want, but not in the way she want it.

If Catherine wants Akua as eternal seal to Evil in a Jar that is DK willingly, I can see Akua do a twist on that by just going to work for DK.

Like becoming a warden for his Creation stronghold and DK himself go chill in Serenity and just remotely manage things from there.

With some agreement that as long as Akua is still around, DK will keep on chillin (not like old age is an issue for him)

Then Akua can add on top that as long as Catherine remains nearby, she won't send any forces out (again, it's not like DK need to conquer the world asap)

She can possibly even guilt Catherine into accepting it "if my punishment for the 100,000 souls is this, then THIS is yours for all the lives lost in your pursuit of revenge"

Liliet

I really can't see this working. Removing DK's ability to build forces is key to Catherine's win condition.

shikkarasu

Something that bothers me about this plan, and it just slapped me in the face last night after my last comment on Ch.13, this requires that Akua, an undead, manage to grow as a person after her death. Isn't that supposed to be, y'know, impossible? For this setting in particular.

It's been mentioned repeatedly that one of the few weaknesses of their enemy is that an undead can form new memories, and learn after a fashion, but not meaningfully improve/heal/grow. Isn't that exactly what Akua has been doing all this time?

Not trying to nitpick the story, but I'm genuinely unsure if I've missed something or if I've misunderstood what the actual limitations of undeath are in the Guideverse.

sadfan

Akua is alive and was never dead. She was a "shade" because, like a lich, she had carefully separated her soul from her body and put it in a phylactery, which was later tagged onto the Mantle of Woe; but unlike a lich, she did not die in the process. As a "shade unbound" she was basically an alive person who needed a body. Now she's just a normal person albeit with Malicia's magic leash. Given her beauty and the Sahelian comfort with blood magic rituals I wonder the last time she had a vanilla basic human body.

Liliet

Oh yeah, also the part where she can just inhabit a suitable body and be a regular alive person again. Villains aren't capable of resurrection, ergo, Akua wasn't dead in the first place.

Liliet

I get the impression that Akua is not undead in this sense – she doesn't have the [Limited Learning] condition. She'd separated her soul from her body while still alive, which did not make her undead, and her body dying did not meaningfully affect the soul. She really did dodge death.

shikkarasu

Of course, the Anaxares gambit. I can't believe I forgot about that. What kind of fan am I?

mamm0nn

Cat's not a Hero though, or plucky. She's both an A-tier Named no one underestimates any more, and a Damned regardless of what she does.

caoimhinh

Not only that. But she also seems to be considering her soldiers as inferior to Nim's troops, deciding that a confrontation would doom her.

The weirdest thing is how Cat is not using any of her current resources, simply running away while being bloodied. Not even a thought about using Archer and Silver Huntress to kill soldiers from a distance or to intercept the skirmishers. Surely those two could cause heavy damage before Nim's troops approach Cat's troops.

Not even a thought towards using Masego for an attack or a counterattack, not even a ritual to prevent chase or to delay pursuit.

No Drows, since she apparently didn't take any to Praes.

As a last resource thing if it is such a desperate situation, Cat should use a bit of the Goblifire she has left to prevent chase. Sure, it is valuable, but so are her soldiers' lives, at this rate she is going to get her army mauled without even a proper fight. Mauled while running away.

it has been stated that they are in a valley between the two groups of hills and there's only one proper road that the armies can use, so using Goblifire to prevent pursuit should be viable. It burns for 7 days and consumes even sorcery, so if done properly and in the right position it could buy her important time to march away.

agumentic

>Not even a thought about using Archer and Silver Huntress to kill soldiers from a distance or to intercept the skirmishers. Surely those two could cause heavy damage before Nim's troops approach Cat's troops.

Now that is a nostalgic book 4 feeling. Named matter on the battlefield, but they can't turn a lost battle around, not against the Legions of Terror Amadeus made. Silver Huntress was specifically mentioned skirmishing and they were undoubtedly helping during the retreat, but they can make it less painful, they can't win it.

>Not even a thought towards using Masego for an attack or a counterattack, not even a ritual to prevent chase or to delay pursuit.

Akua and much more skilled mage lines (and also highborn mage auxiliaries) mean that any avenue of magical action will be rather contested.

>No Drows, since she apparently didn't take any to Praes. Drow had their power source crippled and are locked into a battle of Evil vs Evil against the Dead King. That there are any alive at all is a small miracle.

>Goblifire

We've seen how long goblinfire lasts against high-class Named wizards during the Vales, and the answer is "not long". Even leaving that aside, Nim most probably has some artefact from Tower vaults that can deal with it. Leaving even that aside, goblinfire might slow an army, but it wouldn't do much against goblin skirmishers.

mamm0nn

Named can bolster morale and fight Named, but even before Amadeus's reforms it was repeated regularly in Book 1 that Named cannot singlehandedly defeat entire armies. They can fight small vital parts of an army that are dramatic, but even the strongest Named vs an army of regulars will see that Named dying by being outnumbered.

And she didn't take the drow with her, as her agreement with the Sisters was very clearly to defeat the Dead King and conquer a country out of his dead nation. They have no obligation or reason to send drow with her to Praes, and with the recent developments there's no drow left to spare either.

And goblinfire is a risk for everyone involved, plus I think that it's not actually that infinite as long as it can spread as we may think. If it were, Cat would be using singular drops instead of whole buckets of the stuff when she needs something burning. It's likely that the true green fire of chaos part of goblinfire equates to the amount of goblin oil used.

Even if it wouldn't be like that though, goblinfire seems like the kind of borderline letting loose demons that would be a warcrime that would severely harm her Narrative and political power and influence.

Shveiran

The numbers from the tenth Crusade marching on the Vales made it clear what happens to Legion soldiers trying to march past half a dozen Named: they achieve it, losing SIGNIFICANTLY more soldiers than the force they are pursuing. And that was pursuing levies and fantassins, not a disciplined force.

Which would be QUITE ENOUGH to turn the pursuit in a tactical advantage, because Nim's doesn't have that many more soldiers than Cat.

Note that none of those heroes actually died during the crusade, and these are Named trained not to overcommit and used to fighting together.

Agreed on the drows.

However, Akua is NOT the Warlock yet, merely a claimant. And that fucking matters.

Yes, she has better sorcerers, but Catherine has TWO Named practitioners. I wouldn't bet on a cadre of warlocks managing to find a new solution to a new devilry developed by a Named.

As for the goblinfire, deploying it not even on enemy troops but as a barrier would destroy precisely zero narrative or political consequences for her; why should it? She never even hinted that might be the case.

Bottom line, maybe neither of these would actually WORK, but it sound like they all would have a shot at it. So it boggles the mind that she instead chose a FIGHTING RETREAT as her best option.

agumentic

Named at Vales were not only heroes on Crusade, which has its narrative strengths even with all the footnotes attached, they were Named holding off an army in a relatively narrow passage. But that wasn't the problem here – the bulk of the casualties will be inflicted by skirmishing, which Named can't simply hold off, even if they undoubtedly helped. And if you suggest them trying to hold off the entire Nim's army while Cat's prepares, then not only they might well die from one thing or the other, they wouldn't buy enough time. Armies don't go out of disarray quickly.

Akua backed up by highborn mages and well-trained mage lines is more than enough to contest Masego and Apprentice, even leaving aside artefacts from Tower's vaults. Goblinfire is just not terribly useful for this situation.

So, no, a fighting retreat was in fact the best option here. Sometimes you just get outmanoeuvred by a very good general – Nim was specifically pointed out as being pretty close to One-Eye in skill – and need to make like Sir Robin.

caoimhinh

But it's skirmishers, not the whole army.
I don't think you are getting what I and Shveiran are saying, or you have a mistaken idea about what skirmishers are.
And that's only in the case of the retreat that Catherine pulled here.

But it's still weird that she is straight-up saying she can't face Nim's Legions and so chooses to run away. Nim's troops do not far outmatch Cat's own, neither in quality nor in quantity. Plus Catherine has many Named with her. Yet Cat seems to be afraid of direct confrontation with Nim's legions.

Staying where they were would have given them a defensive position from which they could set up and fight in an organized manner, and Nim's whole army would need to sally forth to face Catherine's army. It's not like Nim could attack Cat's camp from far away from her own camp. Heck, Cat's camp was so good that Nim burned her own camp once she occupied the one Cat had just abandoned.

The only reason the groups of skirmishers are effective is that the army is marching off and thus not in a defensive formation that can prevent them from being harassed. And because Catherine is not using the cards that she could be using as a response to them.

agumentic

Nim's troops do outmatch Cat's in quantity – they have six thousand more soldiers. But even more than that, Cat's army was caught out of formation and flanked with the rest of Nim's army already closing in. Giving a field battle in such a situation would be suicide, which Juniper plainly stated.

Again, Named can't stop all skirmishers. That's still thousands of troops hitting Cat's army from multiple directions. They helped, but they can only reduce the death toll, not eliminate it.

Liliet

Why are you assuming she won't be using goblinfire in the fighting retreat? Or Named?

These aren't factors that would let her keep the camp, but they can very much reduce casualties on her side, that's very true.

Owl

Goblinfire is definitely an option to limit the opposing armies' ability to maneuver, but I have a bit of a different take on this.

Right now, she's fighting an offensive war deep in hostile territory, both in the sense that she's unlikely to receive support from civilians (and unwilling to completely make enemies of them, as she indicated earlier) and the environment itself is hostile, not exactly a place where a large army can sustain itself for long.

That means her resources are extremely finite; any resources spent are likely gone for good, which means she has to be extremely careful with how those resources are deployed. On top of that, both engagements were fought on grounds of Nim's choosing under conditions disadvantageous to Cat's armies. Committing to anything more than a fighting retreat means committing more finite resources to the attempt, and doing so under conditions in which the opponent already controls most of the variables of the encounter.

Basically, she's fighting an extremely competent enemy with a potentially superior army and vastly more resources, in a conflict where a single disastrous engagement likely means the end of her campaign. It's not a situation in which I think taking the first gamble available is a wise decision, sometimes the best choice is to cut your losses and maneuver for better conditions to avoid a disaster!

caoimhinh

But I didn't say use the Named to beat the army, I said use them to fend off the skirmishers sent to harass Cat's moving army. That's a whole different thing.

Cat's army was not fighting but rather running while being hit. The weird thing is how Cat didn't seem to put her resources and her special units into fending off that threat.

Suppose, for example, that Akua and the mages under her command can face off against Masego and whoever supports him. The clash of their sorcery would be enough to impede the chase, or at least delay it. Even if Akua covers Nim's troops and Masego is unable to strike at them directly, just that confrontation would be enough to prevent them from advancing.

And there's no shooter on the other side that has any way to match Archer and Silver Huntress shooting from far away. I'm not saying that they would slaughter the Loyalist Legions, but they can surely discourage the skirmishers and prevent them from hitting Cat's army, or make them pay a bloody price if they try.

Yet Cat did none of that, not even considered it.

agumentic

Well, for one, Cat didn't know Akua will get access to magic before seeing the body Malicia prepared, which was only a week from betrayal. But that really doesn't matter, because the main problem is this – Akua is a dozen times better at the betrayal game than Cat, so she would see any contingencies a mile away, which would both damage the story and also not help all that much, because Akua is smart enough and placed high enough to see through any contingency.

Juff

Typo Thread:

orc and humans > orcs and humans
the Marshal Nim > Marshal Nim gutted > guttered (occurs twice) wasted in time > wasted no time get her so > get here so Now two > No two long she's > long as she's attack ma'am > attack, ma'am Eleventh stayed > Eleventh had stayed smooth as corpse's > smooth as a corpse's bad out > bad our

Liliet

Welp, this was brief yet deeply unpleasant.

Rey d`Tutto

Sometime the enemy ain't dumb.
That usually results in pain .
Does the pain inflected change the plan?

Sun Tsu.
Autocurrupt fought me spelling his name.
Fancy That.

Liliet

Isn't it Sun Tzu?

Anyway yeah this p much had to happen, dramatic pacing wise.

Lord Haart

Cat's learning that it's not just against the DK that you sometimes just... lose.

A sobering return to reality after the captivity arc. Pride cometh, etc.

Also goes to show that story-fu only takes you so far. There's almost a conservation-of-ninjitsu thing here too where Cat is in some ways stronger on her own than with her army. But you need an army to get an army sometimes.

Liliet

There's also the fact that the story-fu ended up being a tradeoff – Cat set up the Akua story flawlessly, except for all the side effects she's now "enjoying".

We'll have to see if it was worth it, though my bet is on "yes, but not in a way Catherine expects". This is a very not-killing-Gollum setup.

dadycool

Oof, it has to hurt, running from the Legion with her tail between her legs. The way things are going, especially considering the Power of Narrative, it looks like the only way she'll be able to proceed will be by going directly into the heart of the storm.

Lord Haart

I hope not – save the "Last Ditch Attempt" card for the DK.

dadycool

Well, it won't be a "real" Last Ditch Attempt. Think of it like in the movie "Australia", where the cattle ranchers trek through the desert following a medicine man in search of water. Sure, nobody WANTS to have to give up, abandon everything and disappear, but the only way to go forward without truly catastrophic losses would be the crazy trek through the region that everyone "knows" is unpassable. This is still survivable, and it always was, in a way that a fight against DK isn't, so a "Last Ditch Attempt" here isn't in the same league as one there.

R

Interesting chapter... It feels like this book's theme is Cat taking short-term losses on the assumption she'll win big later. The whole idea of invading Praes is a massive gamble in the first place. And then pushing Akua to leave – it's hard to see how a strategy that only pays off after she's beaten the dead king is worth giving up such a crucial advantage.

Perhaps the story logic of Akua's betrayal will make it easier to defeat Malicia, since it undermines the importance of her role as arch-villain?

Earl of Purple

These vampires are interesting, I wonder if they are harmed by sunlight. Also, what does Ishaq's sword think of them? It prefers Binds to bones, and revenants to binds.

Xinci

I personally wonder if they are infectious and if so, if they may enable him to do a ritual that lets him gain from other souls than undead. Or at least gain from the flesh of other beings in some new manner, perhaps raw essence now? A broadening of the pallet as it were

Liliet

Palate?

jamesc9

<https://www.thefreedictionary.com/palette>

Clmineith

Does that count as a motif of three? One victory (wolof), one defeat (here), and then the Tower?

Shveiran

No. Not everything is a Pattern of Three; and besides, a Pattern of Three needs a draw in the middle. That's how Cat broke out of the one with Pilgrim by willingly losing at the Princes' Graveyard.

shikkarasu

We still have Nim/Arthur's Po3 to play, at least. It was a little dubious with only one encounter, but then Arthur got an Aspect out of it. No way he doesn't get a rematch now, and the Gods Below would have to be fools to try and steer it away from a draw at this point. The Gods Above would make them pay dearly for such a misstep.

Shveiran

Whiel creation will try to steer things toward a draw, it is no easy thing. It is still avoidable, if Nim is savvy. Though it doesn't seem likely.

The Pattern is not yet set in stone, is what I'm saying.

Vlatko

This chapter in summary: the protagonist losws repeatedly with nothing to show for it.

Vlatko

This chapter in summary: the protagonist losws repeatedly with nothing to show for it.

Shveiran

That's a lot of dead ultimately caused by Akua. I... really don't like where this is going, but I'll take that as a sign that I'm thinking along the wrong path. By this point I've learned that when I see an unsatisfying shape developing in the story, it is because I'm looking at it wrong.

Although on the military side... I must say I'm kind of disappointed.

I mean, sure: Akua's trick was precisely the right move to throw an opponent into disarray and into a killing field. I get that. And yeah, that means the opposition now has a lot of priceless insights on Cat's force. I get that too.

My problem with that is that, well, Catherine knows all this. Here we see a series of clever maneuvers from Nim, but the opposition just... takes it. That's what I have an hard time coming to terms with. The moment Akua Sahelian threw them out of the Ways rather than killing them, it should have become apparent that the major objective achieved was blinding them and throwing them out of their tempo: of course it was a logistic nightmare, but it seems Cat and Juniper did next to nothing to prepare for a vicious blow they had to know was coming.

I don't know what they could have done, but they have a dozen Named and just as many superb tacticians, so having them just march on feels... a bit stupid.

I wouldn't mind if it wasn't for the fact that Nim doesn't really sound like someone that should be able to play them like a fiddle, vampires or no. She has done little more than drills and garrison duties for twenty years! I'm sure she is competent, but competent is not quite what is being shown here. Ranker's contributions were not this good, and to be honest neither were One-Eye's during the tenth crusade.

Rey d`Tutto

Story-fu.

Draw, loss...

Shveiran

Aside from the fact that this is not really done on purpose on Cat's part, so it doesn't look like story fu, I believe a Pattern of Three has to start with a victory, continue with a draw, then end with a victory for the other side. Not start with a draw.

Lord Haart

Well, Nim is Named now, plus Bard is in the picture. She might be... nudging things.

I wonder if Bard will have another shot at manipulating Akua, maybe more directly this time?

Shveiran

Oh I'm sure Bard will nudge things, but on the story side. Here we have TACTICAL DEFEATS, which is why I'm grumbling.

Burlyraven

The Barrow Sword just got a dose of raw Edge(tm) if that bite was enough to turn him. He could go full Dracula after this is all finished, proving he survives. Of course, his Name was partially forged as an undead killer, so turning may be one of the few things he consider a sin.

That might be the only "good" to come out of this, though. The enemy has too much knowledge and experience on their side for it to be a coincidence that Cat's army is being funneled into a location.

Lord Haart

Now I'm imagining Ishaq being played by Wesley Snipes.

Scott Schluter

Now enters Amadeus of the Green Stretch who Cat has been silently counting on to show up and unleash his brain.

Bad@games

Ahh, how practical of him.

beleester

Next chapter is going to be Loose, I guess?

Sykomantis

My guess would be Pull first, then Loose

Sykomantis

No wait. Draw instead of Pull

Liliet

Nock, Draw, Release?

Nock, Draw, Aim, Release?

Maybe Loose instead of Release like you said

Sugar Roll

The Black Knight: "Mistake."

superkeaton

Oh hey, the vampires came back! I remember they were mentioned way way way back, but for all the undead we've seen, this is the first direct encounter. Neat! I hope that facebite doesn't come with any Consequences.

Liliet

I hope it does. Ishaq's due for a neat powerup!

Sinead

He is seeming to be building up to be the Second in Command at Cardinal on the Villain side of things, and at least in line to inherit that Role from Cat. The Woe are mostly doing their own thing, with Maseago and Indrani mostly hammering down the 'recluse' and 'wanders' that still gather around the Accords, while Vivienne and Hakram are going to be much more involved in other political theatre.

Tohron

The situation with being driven out of her camp by a surprise night attack seems reminiscent of Cat's first encounter with Juniper way back at the War College. I wonder if anyone will take note of the parallels.

Shveiran

I have, but I don't much nlike them.
Cat was inexperienced and Juniper was a tactical prodigy. The Black Queen has a number of prodigious tacticians in her staff and is herself the veteran of more wars than Nim ever fought in. Putting down Tasia was her first real action ever since the Conquest, for Sisters' sake. This... idea that Cat is somehow the greenhorn between the pair really bothers me.

Lord Haart

She's not. But she is on Nim's home turf, her army is smaller, and despite their experience they also have lost many of their top talents like Hune and Robber while Praes has been the most stable country on Calernia for years if not decades.

Cat is normally one who favors chaos but sometimes that means the enemy prepares better and if you get caught on the wrong foot thru may never give you time to recover.

Rey d`Tutto

Epic.
Thanks.

Cold Cyberia

An interesting match up so far. It seems like both Cat and Juniper will need to start thinking outside of the box. Even without Akua, Nim must've been preparing to fight Callow for a long time, so it's not surprising Praes has an upper hand so far.

The one weakness Praes does have is that it lacks a commander with a comprehensive, practical understanding of both Namelore and strategy. In essence, they lack Amadeus or Cat. As good a Marshal as Nim is, I doubt she's as accomplished at story-fu. Considering the upcoming battle will decide the fate of Praes, that's a serious shortcoming. It's no good to win an engagement only to walk into a story trap (not that it happened here, but it likely will in the battle proper).

Tropicana

I believe we as readers should probably discard the notion that High Marshal Nim is blind to the story-fu. If you look at all the major conflicts in this series, you would notice that each side in any major conflict have someone with a working knowledge of the story (although competence varies widely).

First Liesse was Wandering Bard vs Black and Catherine vs Akua
Second Liesse was Akua vs Catherine and Black with others like king of winter and queen of summer thrown in.
The free cities war was Black vs Bard vs Karios
Tenth crusade was Cath vs Pilgrim and Black vs Hanno
Everdark was Cath vs Sve noc
Princes' graveyard was Cath vs Pilgrim vs Karios War on Keter was Everyone vs Dead King vs Bard
So for war in Preas, who is going to challenge Cath?
It could be that the need for such an individual was one of the reasons for Akua's defection or Akua was only needed as a high quality mage to oppose Zeze and Preas already has someone with Story-fu regardless of proficiency.
My reasons why Marshal Nim might be competent in story-fu
(1) During a discussion between Catherine and Black in book one, it was mentioned that some Orges have had Roles despite their numbers compared to Orcs.
(2) We saw General Hune make sacrifices to some Deity and this Deity prevent Catherine from resurrecting Hune in book 6, implying that Orges might have a strong sense identity and culture in their city.
(3) Marshall Nim served under Black, which means that she will take the name dreams from Amadeus very seriously and this might be imparting some knowledge about Story-fu.
(4) In the ambush on Catherine's campus in Wolof, the body controlled by Nim tried a last ditch effort to kill the Squire after Catherine attacked and mostly disabled the body, which would have stopped a pattern of three from forming.
So it's possible that Marshall Nim is proficient in Story-fu but is also possible that she is blind to it and Akua will use it to screw her and the empress. Either way, it will be interesting to see.

Cold Cyberia

Nim knows a decent amount about Namelore for sure. For one, she worked with Black but also she's not an idiot and having just recently come into a Name, I'm sure she tried to learn as much as possible.

The thing is, story-fu is like painting. Regardless of talent or knowledge, you need practice to be good at it. Knowing about colour theory might help you learn how to paint but you only get to learn it by painting a whole lot.

Consider that Nim's only been Named for a year or so. She's never fought against another Named, she's probably not used to viewing battles as stories. She might know what to do in the abstract but I doubt it'll translate to actionable tasks.

It might not matter since Bard is after Cat but I do think story-fu is the area Nim will suffer a decisive defeat in.

DC

Now see, if you'd rigged up your camp with goblinfire this wouldn't be an issue.

sadfan

I am not really sure what the point is of marching an insufficient invasion force into enemy territory. I'm thinking of that Charles Joseph Minard map. Cat came unprepared and she should have realized that hemorrhaging her forces means a Deus ex Machina ealamal will be needed to have a remotely happy ending to the story.

This strains my credulousness. Cat should know better on multiple levels, she was trained better than this.

morroian

Replying to this over a year later but this is kind of my reaction as well. Its straining my credulity to breaking point, taking me out of the story. Not just the tactical defeats but the whole Akua situation as well.

James Felling

Two comments.

First: Cat is uncharacteristically on the back foot here. Her force was caught by surprise and dropped into unexpected circumstances. Her toes are capable, well armed and on their home ground. She's going to be on the defensive, and will suffer losses while she is forced to confront a prepared enemy who had opportunity to plan their strategy knowing the situation, and she is forced, at least in the near term to play their game. But the rules of the world are such that named are strongest and luckier when things look bad, so this might just be a Genre Savvy move on her part.

Secondly Cat has been getting !ore and more Odinesque. I think Cat's name new name is similar to Odin (a gender swaped version). A one eyed, limping person wearing a cloak (mantle) who carries a staff and is accompanied by two dark birds. Who is a strong ruler, and a master strategist with a reputation for being unpredictable..

Chapter 15: Pull

"Only a child pretends there is value in defeat. Fool they who praise a bleeding wound."

– Dread Empress Massacre

Since we'd come crashing down into this godforsaken region three days ago, we had lost one thousand six hundred and thirty-two soldiers.

The last count came in from the Dominion midmorning, as they were less used to counting their dead. The Levantines had borne the brunt of those losses, almost a quarter of the men they'd brought east now dead. In the exchange we'd killed maybe a quarter of that number in enemy soldiers, mostly through skirmishes that had gone our way. The best that could be said of the last few days was that we'd avoided a rout, not that this narrow avoidance meant our situation was anything less than terrible. We'd camped near the northern shore of Nioqe Lake, beyond the long shadows cast by the Jini Plateau, and while we were somewhat safe at the moment our strategic situation had taken a sharp turn for the worse.

The mood was grim when our war council assembled. The usual few slunk their way into the tent: Vivienne and Brandon Talbot, Juniper and Aisha, Zola Osei. Of the two lordlings only one showed today, Razin Tanja. Aquiline was attending to their captains, who were not pleased with the way this campaign was going. It'd not escaped anyone's attention that the Legions of Terror seemed to be focusing their efforts on the Dominion, which had brought old tensions to the fore – there was some talk in Levantine ranks of my Praesi legionaries being traitors, of there being some conspiracy afoot, and it needed to be stamped out. Aquiline tended to be more popular with their warriors, so it was only natural that we'd ended up with Razin.

"It is no longer feasible to take back our camp," General Zola crisply said. "I can only argue in favour of retreat now, west to the half-road and then further north to grounds less at our disadvantage."

"That marches us straight into the Gale Ribbon," Aisha said, shaking her head. "Even with wards prepared we'll take losses."

"We could attempt to take the burned camp in Moule Hills for our own," Brandon Talbot suggested.

"They'll have mined that," I grunted. "If not worse."

It was against Legion regulations to use devils but I wasn't sure how closely followed a rule that would be without my father around to enforce it. A lot of high-placed officers had shared his opinion, but many of those were now dead. I wasn't sure the Black Knight would push back if Malicia insisted, which she might. The Empress would prefer burning contracts to losing men, at this stage of the war.

"And even if we swing wide away from Kala Hills to avoid giving battle, there is nothing to stop her from simply marching down and getting into a position to flank us," Aisha said. "Lady Black has made it clear that she will not let us entrench."

"Is a ramp to access the plateau feasible?" Razin asked. "We could avoid the valley that so troubles us entirely by accessing the heights."

Looks were shared. That was the closest thing to a good idea we'd heard so far.

"I'll consult with Sapper-General Pickler," I said.

"Even if it is something our sappers can accomplish," General Zola began, "Marshal Nim will not leave us to build that ramp unmolested. We would need to stake out a more defensible position."

I glanced at Juniper, who sat at the other end of the table in silence. She had been following the conversation attentively, but there was a peculiar look on her face. She had not once opened her mouth to give an opinion this entire council and did not break the streak to answer Zola.

"Send out riders to find one," I ordered the general. "Even if Pickler says it can't be done, it'll be useful information to have under our belt."

"I will see to the roster," Aisha volunteered, smoothly rising to her feet.

She threw a worried glance at Juniper, who did not meet her eyes. The council ended without much ceremony, the tent emptying until there were only three people left: Vivienne, me and the still-silent Hellhound. Brushing back a strand that'd slipped her braid, the princess was the first to speak up.

"You haven't said a word all morning," Vivienne stated.

Juniper let out a long breath, chair creaking under her.

"I haven't," she said.

A moment passed. She did not continue.

"We've had setbacks before," I finally said. "And we're far from defeated, we just—"

"I should resign," the Hellhound interrupted me. "I can't, I know it would be a bad look in the middle of a campaign, but I should. Command should informally be passed to Zola regardless."

I balked.

"That's not even slightly a good idea," I said. "Zola's solid, but she doesn't have the spark. Nim will eat her alive."

Hakram had been right when he'd warned I should temper my expectations of Zola Osei, as he often was. Hune's replacement was not her equal, much less Juniper's. She was the kind of commander that made for a respectable general but fell short of marshal talents.

"Nim is eating me alive, in case you hadn't noticed," Juniper barked out. "How many times are you going to make excuses for me, Catherine? I'm losing."

"I'm not making excuses," I flatly replied. "We've made some mistakes and paid for them but-"

"I should have asked you to send Named out in the hills, not just scouts," Juniper growled. "The Eleventh wouldn't have caught us out. The Order should have been out near the vanguard, not near the supply wagons – they could have chased Nim's horse before they shredded the Levantines."

"You're not an oracle, Juniper," I bit out. "We'd be having a very different conversation if she'd sent the horse after the wagons instead, and she might have attacked the moment we flushed out the Eleventh so-"

"I am not," Juniper of the Red Shields quietly said, "equal to this task."

I slammed my open palm onto the table.

"What the fuck is this?" I snarled. "She played her cards better, Juniper. We lost a few hands. So what? The goddamned pot is still on the table for anyone to take."

I heard her hands creak as large fingers tightened into fists.

"I'm not sure it all came back," Juniper hoarsely said. "After Malicia pulled her hooks. That I'm still all of me."

And just for that look in my friend's eyes, I wished I could kill Alaya of Satus twice.

"It did," I flatly said.

The Pilgrim had told me as much and I had no reason to doubt him. There'd been physical scars it would take her years to overcome, but her mind was fine.

"I will not be another orc cripple for you to lug about, Catherine," Juniper hissed. "Don't you see it's even worse if it's all there? It just means I was never in the same league. If I'm no longer fit, if I ever was in the first place, and-"

"Do you genuinely believe I wouldn't have advocated your removal if I believed you unfit for your office?"

Vivienne's voice cut through our rising anger like a knife. Juniper rocked back like she'd been slapped, but she was listening.

"Catherine loves you like family," Vivienne calmly continued. "She might excuse weakness out of sentiment. Would I, Hellhound? We have an understanding, but we both know I would not put you above Callowan lives."

"You're not a general," Juniper replied, but it was weak and by the tone of her voice she knew it.

She just wasn't convinced. Didn't want to be, maybe couldn't be. I grit my teeth. Though I was not unfamiliar with the flagellant's whip, this was not the time for my marshal to indulge in it. We were already in deep enough trouble without losing our finest military mind halfway through a campaign.

"Neither are you, at the moment," Vivienne evenly replied. "Perhaps you should attend to those duties before further defeat ensues, Marshal Juniper."

The orc's voice was stilted as she excused herself, almost fleeing the tent. I slumped back into my seat. Vivienne rose to pour two glasses of wine, pressing one into my hand.

"Fuck," I eloquently said.

It'd not been good in the first place, but I suspected I might have made it worse.

"I can't fix this," Vivienne told me. "It's not who we are to each other. She doesn't call me Warlord, or ever will."

I drank, biting down on my first answer. It was bitter enough on my tongue it almost spoiled the wine.

"I'm not sure how to fix this either," I said. "Winning? If we could beat Nim so easily we'd already be doing it."

"There are some who agree with her, you know," Vivienne murmured. "Not just our countrymen, who sometimes mutter for the wrong reasons. Officers that were brought in from the Legions. They say she came up too quick, more out of closeness to you than merit. That a few College tricks and being Istrid Knightsbane's daughter aren't enough to warrant her being raised so high."

I scoffed.

"I didn't pick her name out of a hat, Viv," I said. "Just yesterday she saved us a rout. How many officers would have figured out the Order needed to be sent to relieve us before the enemy cavalry even came out? It's not her that's the problem, it's that we're fighting the Legions of Terror on their picked grounds with the deck stacked in the favour. This was never going to be easy."

I'd ridden Legion war doctrine like a warhorse over the back of half the fucking continent. It wasn't going to stop being effective just because I wasn't the only one on the field using it.

"I know that," Vivienne said. "So do most people who matter."

My heiress paused, offering me a wan smile.

"Does Juniper?"

—

"You might as well be asking me to build a ramp to the moon," Pickler bluntly told me.

"I'm sure Ol' Sorcerous would appreciate the way down, but my ambitions are slightly more grounded," I easily replied.

Well, more or less. I only wanted to bind the entire continent to a treaty that would fundamentally change how Named would operate. You know, summer fair gift stuff.

"Funny," my Sapper-General said, tone dry as sand. "I can't do it, Catherine, at least not in the time you want it done. We didn't have the wood to build a ramp that size in the first place and we lost too many of our stakes when we abandoned the camp last night. Unless you want me to build it out of stone we cut from the cliffside, it can't be done."

I eyed her with alarm. I'd not known our situation was so bad with the sudes. If we lost too many of the large stakes my legionaries carried to easily raise palisades then we'd be dependent on local wood. Of which there wasn't much. The most we'd seen was the brushlands in the Kala Hills, which the Loyalist Legions now held.

"We can still raise palisades properly, can't we?" I asked.

"Camp size's been reduced. We're toeing the line for sanitation," Pickler admitted. "If not for the priests we'd be at risk of sicknesses."

Well, it'd been a day for pleasant surprises so far. Why break that lovely trend?

"We need to do something, Pickler," I got out.

"We're not reaching that plateau, Catherine," she said, then hesitated. "But I have an... idea. I need to look at some things first, though. See if it's truly viable."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"You're not going to give me more than that?"

"No point in raising false hopes," Pickler said. "I'll find you when I'm sure."

I was inclined to poke at her for at least a few scraps, but she was saved by the appearance of a phalange. The young Taghreb informed me that Archer was back in camp and she'd brought a package with her, which spurred my curiosity. I met with Vivienne as I limped my way back, as she'd been sent for too, the pair of us entering the tent together to the sight of Archer dumping a large cloth sack on the carved table. I paused.

"Is whatever's in that bag breathing?" I bluntly asked.

"I would hope so," Vivienne said. "That's one of the abduction bags for the Jacks, if she got blood all over it I'll be cross."

Ah, Vivienne. Sometimes she said these things and I acutely felt the loss it was for my gender that she was only interested in the other one.

"Why, hello Archer," Indrani brightly said. "Lovely to see you, how did your night go?"

I raised my staff then poked experimentally at the bag, ignoring her entirely.

"I think it's a person," I mused.

"She might have finally snapped and done in Masego," Vivienne suggested. "There's only so many times a woman can have her words nitpicked before blood ensues."

"If you don't stop I'll put him back where I found him," Indrani threatened.

I had to bite down on a 'Masego? It'd be a walk, but I suppose you could' that very much wanted to wriggle its way past my lips.

It was rare that I got to gang up on one of the Woe instead of getting ganged up on, so it was only with reluctance that I moved on to business.

"And where would that be?" I asked.

Theatrically, Archer opened the bag to reveal the bruised face of an unconscious dark-skinned man in what I'd guess to be his early twenties.

"Kala Fortress," Indrani said. "You're looking at Sokoro Abara, third child of Lord Abara of Kala. Caught him while he was serving as a go-between between the fortress and the Legions."

My brow rose. That was quite the catch. More than enough to make up for her absence last night, considering she wouldn't have made much of a difference in the fight. I stayed silent a little longer, choosing my words.

"I know that look," Indrani accused. "I did good but you want to insult me anyways so you're moving around the sentence."

"Of course not," I lied.

"You did good, Archer," Vivienne told her with a warm smile.

Indrani preened.

"You know," my successor casually added, "for a sullen wench."

I grinned even as wails of Callowan treachery began filling up the tent, already thinking about all the answers we were going to get out of that man.

—

Sokoro Abara was going to be a hard nut to crack, I figured.

Akua had once told me that a lot of Wasteland nobles trained their children in methods to resist torture and in my experience Praesi aristocrats needed to be made brutally aware that their situation was desperate before the veneer of arrogance even began to break. So we did the works: put him in a tent enchanted for darkness with the sole magelight facing him, had the Concocter feed him something to keep him slightly dazed and I handled the interrogation personally with only Vivienne at my side. Sokoro Abara woke up, blinking away the sleep, and then took in the sight of my being seated across from him and Vivienne standing behind me.

There was a pregnant pause.

"I'll tell you anything you want to know," he swore.

Well. I was feeling a little cheated, but there was a saying about gift horses. The young noble was quite frank about how he was not even slightly interested in dying or being tortured for his family's sake, and instead offered information quite freely when asked. His position as the envoy between the fortress and Legions – he informed us quite bitterly that such a task had of course been beneath his elder half-siblings – and his confessed tendency to open sealed scrolls to read them meant he'd been in a good position to learn about the unfolding debacle.

"The Eleventh was in the hills for two days before you marched there," he told us. "They went through Risas, using the shepherd paths. The Black Knight wanted them in position to strike at your army from behind should you fight in the valley."

It was an odd feeling to know that our disastrous vanguard action had still been better than the likely alternative: picking a fight with Marshal Nim in the valley and getting smashed in the back by a full legion. Though it'd been a costly thing to learn that General Lucretia was hiding in the hills, better we learn it now than when a battle was on the line. He also had actionably useful information, of the recent kind.

"Lady Black ordered that the wells to both the east and west of the Kala Hills should be poisoned today," Sokoro told us. "She had to ask us permission first, as it is still father's land, but he bent over backwards to agree. Lady Warlock has offered to broker entering under Wolof's protection on very favourable terms, so there's little he won't do to please her."

My lips thinned. I could deduce why Marshal Nim would give the order easily enough. She wanted us to be stuck near Nioqe Lake, knowing that if we strayed too far from those shores we'd have no water source to draw from. Now that the Black Knight had put us in a corner, she meant for us to stay there.

"What do you know of Marshal Nim's plans?" Vivienne asked.

"Not much," Sokoro admitted. "She was raised under the Carrion Lord, you know. Like all his old soldiers she has high-handed manners even in the lands of her betters."

I doubted this man was Nim's better in any possible sense of the word – except passing through small doorways, maybe? – but I'd gain nothing from telling him that.

"Not much is still something," I smiled.

He smiled back and asked for assurances about his captivity. I guaranteed him absence of torture and fair treatment if he talked – which he already had, but apparently did not know – yet when I offered right of ransom he scoffed.

"Father won't pay," Sokoro said. "I'd rather you promise wine instead, I imagine being a prisoner will be dreadfully dull."

"We can arrange that," Vivienne promised.

'Not much' hadn't been him playing coy, unfortunately. He'd overheard useful bits but no plan. Nim's legionaries were apparently convinced that she wanted to avoid giving us a pitched battle, which I had no trouble believing. The most interesting morsel was that apparently General Wheeler had been asked about raising field fortifications that would hem in the Army of Callow around Nioqe Lake. It was not a sure thing, but in my opinion it seemed likely she actually intended to try. Malicia did not want to wreck my army, just put me in a position where I was forced to negotiate. Bottled up against the shores of the lake with a larger force or impassable terrain encircling me as my supplies ran out would achieve that.

The best possible outcome of being forced into that corner was managing a stalemate until Sepulchral and the Rebel Legions arrived, but I had my doubts we'd manage as much. Besides, if it was the fight Marshal Nim was after then it was the last one we wanted to give her. Which meant moving before we got cornered.

Time to see if Pickler had a way for us to slip the noose before it got tightened.

—

"I told you that I can't get us on that plateau," Pickler hissed out in irritation.

"But you have something else," I pressed.

"It's a gamble," my Sapper-General admitted. "But I believe it'll work."

She showed me to the inside of a tent where a tenth of sappers were chattering away as they worked, cutting away at wood and hammering in nails. It took me a moment to realize what I was looking at: one of our supply wagons, stripped of its wheels and bound tighter. Was that wax I was smelling?

"I can't get you on the plateau," Pickler repeated, standing at my side. "But there's another way east. Nioqe Lake."

"You want to make a pontoon bridge across," I realized, then frowned. "We have enough wood?"

"If we use every supply wagon," she replied. "And a significant portion of our stakes."

She'd not been underselling it when she'd called that a gamble, then. If the enemy sunk that bridge, or even just prevented us from recovering it after we crossed, we'd be in heaps of trouble. As in, might seriously have to consider cutting a deal trouble: without wagons to carry our supplies we'd slow to a crawl even using roads. Out there on wild land, where there weren't any, we'd be snails to the Black Knight's hawk.

"How long would it take you to get it done?" I asked.

"We made a pattern, so I could have it ready for deployment by sundown if you don't steal any of my sappers," Pickler said. "Trouble is, Catherine, I don't have a way to prevent them seeing us make it."

Which would allow Nim to contest the crossing, the last thing I wanted. I clenched my fingers then unclenched them. There was a way. I didn't like using it as a ploy, it felt disrespectful, but I'd do it anyway. The question was, then whether it was truly our way out. Sure, it'd get us out of Marshal Nim's planned encirclement and on the other side of the lake if things went fine. What would we do once there, though? Taking a gamble to flee blindly was exactly the kind of mistake the Black Knight was waiting to capitalize on. She'd pushed her army hard, striking at us repeatedly over the same day and night, because she knew that our officer corps and general staff were of lesser quality than hers. We were, as an army, simply more prone to making mistakes when time grew short.

That was the difference training made.

The way I saw it, the point of crossing Nioqe Lake would be marching south afterwards. I'd been Juniper's original plan to do as much, if from a significantly better position, and I still believed it was a sound notion. The problem now was Kala Fortress. It was a certainty the Loyalist Legions would move to cover it faster than we could get there – needing to fish out and rebuild our supply wagons ensured as much – so Nim was likely to entrench by the walls. That'd been true in the original iteration of the Hellhound's plan as well, but our answer to that had simply been going around the Legions by marching further east before cutting south. That was no longer an option, because as I'd recently learned from our prisoner the Black Knight had ordered all the wells east of Kala Hills poisoned.

I wasn't sure how far that order would be applied in practice but given that Nim had light cavalry to spare I wouldn't bet on it being a small slice of land. We could last maybe two weeks without refreshing our water supplies if we began rationing immediately and nothing went wrong, which made risking an eastern march rolling the dice. If we got lucky it might rain and be the drinkable kind of rain instead of the brimstone kind that burned – a legitimate worry in these parts, Aisha had informed me – but that was a large if. Especially when the mage cadres of the Loyalist Legions had shown they were capable of large-scale weather manipulation rituals. Even if rainstorms gathered, there was nothing to prevent the Legions from just dispersing them.

No, the reliable water was south and down the half-road. And there was a set of fortifications on top of that road: Kala Fortress. If we could take it before Nim got there, we'd be in a very defensible position and sitting over her supply line. We'd be putting her in a corner instead of the other way around. I could maybe sneak a small force to that keep before the Black Knight got there, I finally thought, but nowhere large enough to actually take a well-defended castle. Which meant I needed to figure out how to bust open that lock before we got started on this plan.

"Catherine?" Pickler hesitantly asked.

I had gone silent for a long while, I supposed. I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. Taking Kala Fortress wasn't really the issue, was it? As in, it did not need to be in the Army of Callow's possession. I just needed it not to be in the hands of the Loyalist Legions. And that was something I might just have the tool to achieve.

"Get started on the work," I said, then bit my tongue. "Talk to Juniper and General Zola first, but you have my full backing for this. Unless they object stridently, it's happening."

Leaving her quite bemused at the sudden turn, I set to talking around the key to the lock.

—

Sokoro Abara widely smiled, showing slightly yellowing teeth. His breath smelled like the wine we'd promised him and Vivienne had evidently delivered on.

"I do have some friends behind the walls, Your Majesty," he said. "Though it behooves me to ask why I should introduce them to you. I am, after all, a prisoner."

"You misunderstand me," I said.

He flinched, as if preparing for a blow, but none followed.

"There would be no need for an introduction, as you would be the one speaking to them," I idly continued.

His eyes narrowed.

"You'd release me?" he asked.

"Release is a strong word," I thinly smiled. "Tell me, Sokoro, how would you like to be Lord of Kala?"

He stayed silent a moment, considering. If the Army of Callow put him in that seat Malicia might take offence in the aftermath should she beat us, but that was a relatively distant concern. He could place himself under a High Seat's protection should he grow too worried of retribution.

"Part of the castle and the soldiers would back me over my siblings," Sokoro finally said, tone even. "Not over my father. He is a well-respected man. I also have... concerns about my mother's safety."

"Your father is an eminently mortal man," I said. "And we can whisk away your mother before we strike."

Scribe had gotten to make her latest Assassin. We'd use it. The dark-skinned man's eyes brightened at my words. It was what he'd wanted to hear. Wasn't like he was ever going to rise high except through my good graces: everything he'd said about his half-siblings implied a degree of enmity. He might get cast out after the death of Lord Abara, and that was assuming none in the castle decided to... err on the side of caution.

"And what would you have of me in return?" he asked.

"All I want is a friend ruling that fortress," I smiled. "Perhaps your help in learning the lay of the land. Nothing onerous."

He looked hesitant. Right, Praesi. I'd get more trust out of him if I bled him some.

"Full use of your water is what I want most, of course," I said. "I'll not require your soldiers to fight by the side of the Army of Callow."

"I might be amenable to such an arrangement," Sokoro Abara lightly said.

"Good," I smiled, and to his alarm the darkness began thickening around us.

Faint sounds could be heard, almost like cawing, and my smile broadened.

"I'll want an oath out of you, my friend," I said. "Just in case, you see. Trust is hard come by in these troubled times."

"It is only natural," he stiffly replied. "On what would you have me swear?"

Night began filling the room, Sve Noc granting this a sliver of their attention, and I answered him.

In a ring outside our camp, one thousand six hundred and thirty-two corpses were dragged out on the plains and assembled in great piles. Mages came out in lines, setting fire to them with what little wood we could spare for this – which wasn't much. As a result they had to stay and keep feeding more mageflame to the dead bodies, which took powerful flames to burn. The result was plumes of thick, guttering smoke that rose up into the afternoon sky. Enough of them that it was as if a curtain had been pulled in front of the camp.

Pickler's sappers had their cover.

Meanwhile I set about giving the enemy something to react to, instead of leaving them to operate unhindered. I first picked a place on open grounds with a good view at the Black Knight's fortified camp. Hierophant came with me, in expectation of the enemy's answer, and the two of us stood out like black-plumed birds out on the rocky plains. A bodyguard of twenty knights had ridden with us, but I'd refused more. There would be no point. I took the lead, pulling down my hood and beginning to murmur under the pounding sun. Night was like a lazy brat refusing to get up, but I had time to spare. I coaxed it out properly and the Sisters helped me with the alignment. Zeze could have done it through the Observatory, but I wanted him free to act.

The same ring of red light as last night appeared over our heads, but I'd told Masego to leave it. No need to warn the enemy of his presence too early. Once I'd gathered the power to me, though, I told him to get ready.

"I am all eyes, Catherine," he replied.

High above the enemy camp I ripped open a gate into Arcadia. There was a reason we'd not tried to keep moving through the faerie realm after being stranded: out here it was a nightmarish mirror of the Wasteland. Impossible storms that toppled mountains, landslides that charged like armies and rains that drew furrows in the ground. That was without even getting into the... fauna. Maybe a few Named could slip through, but entire companies? It'd be madness to even try. There was no lack of water, though, and that was what I'd been after. After a few heartbeats a flood began pouring, just in time for power to begin rising in the enemy camp.

Time to see what Akua had cooked up to handle my signature trick. I let out a startled snort when, instead of some fancy spell, what appeared was instead another gate. About the same size and placed below mine, like a bucket for the flood to be poured into. Well, that was certainly a solution. Nice sorcery, it'd be a shame if something happened to it.

"Zeze?" I asked.

"Wrest," Hierophant replied, and the world rippled.

The enemy gate rippled but did not break. I saw Masego frown and dimly felt power bloom in the distance again.

"Clever mage," Hierophant murmured. "They are feeding the gate further magic so that I cannot fully wrest it-"

"Keep them stuck, then," I grunted.

I was not without tricks of my own. My gate began to pull together, like a ball of twine being rolled up, and the flood of water ended. But with a grunt of effort I dragged the 'twine' to the side and down, only to begin unfolding it again. Sweat soaked my back and the gate was noticeably smaller than my first, but before long the flood began pouring again. About a hundred feet above Loyalist Legion camp, it hit transparent panes of sorcery. They buckled but held. Water began sliding down, revealing the broad shape of a dome. Masego tutted.

"The structure is too simple, Sahelian," he said. "Here is why we want more intricate escapements."

His hand whipped out, the ripples of his aspect strengthening, and the enemy gate blew up in blinding flash of light. The air thrummed with power as there was a sound of thunder, the enchantment protecting the camp shivering – and, in patches, failing. I'd kept my gate opened, and like an avalanche of bricks the water fell down on the enemy through a doze holes. Mages patched up the hole quick enough with shields, but not before we did some damage. I kept the gate open as long as I could, Hierophant swatting down a few other attempts to block it, but their mages were focusing on protection so there was no further break.

Didn't matter. I'd got what I came for: I'd rattled their cage and something else they'd not notice until it was too late.

"The angle for your adjusted gate was far from the best you could have used," Masego noted. "Too much to the east of the camp."

"I aimed at what I wanted, don't you worry about it," I smiled.

I'd emptied half a lake on the eastern part of the camp, and though it'd rolled off the dome the important part was where it'd rolled off. Into Kala Hills, into the same paths the Eleventh had used to attack us last night. The same that Nim might be tempted to use as a shortcut to attack us when we crossed the lake.

Now they were a mess of mud and water, impossible to march an army through for at least a few days.

We launched a night attack.

It was the best way to cover our crossing, General Zola said. Marshal Juniper did not object. Five thousand of the Army of Callow and a thousand Levantine skirmishers marched out, every Named at hand save for me going with them. They were to shake the enemy and then retreat, actually fighting as little as possible. I even poured Night into a trinket and left it for Hierophant to wield: that ring of red light was a good way to feign my presence where I wasn't. The Loyalist Legions would be very wary of attacking me after dark now that I'd had some time to prepare.

It was nerve-wracking to watch them march out without going with them, but I had other duties. Sokoro Abara was put on a horse and we kept our most mobile force in reserve: the moment the pontoon bridge was finished, the Order of the Broken Bells would ride across in full force. The knights were our change to get to Kala Fortress before the Black Knight could, much as they might be needed in the small battle about to take place in the plains.

It took hours, to my rising restlessness, before the bridge was done. We didn't wait until it was; as soon as Pickler told me they'd reached the shallows on the other side, I saddled up and led the Order across. There'd been no news about the battle in the plains yet. We rode through the shallow water and then up the beach, the townsfolk of Risas barring their gates and hiding as we rode past. After that, the hasty ride in the dark was surprisingly boring. Sometimes a horse fell and a knight had to pull back and change their mount, but otherwise we went untroubled.

We rode down the eastern length of the Kala Hills, then swung around west to approach the keep itself. We rested the horses before coming into sight, not only to allow the beasts to catch their breath. Scribe and her almost-Named had come through for me: waiting for us in a fold of the rocks was Sokoro Abara's mother, as I'd promised. I gave him a moment to reassure her – and confirm through someone he trusted we truly had assassinated his father – and then we saddled up again.

Kala Fortress was a grim old thing propped up against the side of the eponymous hills, with tall and thick wall of stones surrounding the small town at the bottom of a squat castle. Sokoro went in ahead with Assassin secretly shadowing him and contacted his partisans. There was some violence before they seized control of the outer gates, but once they were swung open my knights flooded into the town. We struck quick enough the castle gates were overridden before they could be closed, and with Sokoro serving as our emissary a surrender was not overly difficult to secure.

I had to blow up his sister's head, she was the fight-to-the-end type, but the sight of that cooled ardours among the hardliners.

Within the hour he was Lord Sokoro Abara and his half-brother in a cell, which was when I finally left out a breath of relief. Our part of this, at least, had gone well. It was past Early Bell, but we'd taken the fortress. Now all we could do was wait.

I got the news in waves. The first rider was sent by Juniper once the force we'd sent to stir up Nim had begun to retreat. The skirmishing had gone well and it looked like the Black Knight had preferred marching out with her full strength arrayed rather than pursuing us half-baked. She must have thought we were baiting her into a trap. The second rider informed me that the Loyalist Legions had sent out their entire horse to harass us when they'd realized we had raised a pontoon bridge but that our rearguard was holding. The crossing had begun and it was expected that the Army of Callow would be across before the enemy infantry arrived.

The third rider wasn't from Juniper at all, it was from the Black Knight. We caught the man and killed him, but all it'd do was slow the realization that we were now at her back. The fourth rider brought harsher news: the enemy cavalry had set fire to the pontoon bridge before the last of my men crossed, leaving three companies stranded on the wrong side of the lake. General Zola had ordered them to surrender, which they had. The rest of the Army of Callow, however, had crossed. A detachment would stay to try to salvage as much of the bridge as possible, but the march to Kala had begun. The Black Knight sent a pair of companies to check the fortress, in the hours after, but I sallied with the Order and rode them down.

There were no survivors and Marshal Nim did not try us again.

By dawn my army was camped beneath the walls of Kala Fortress, the few sappers Pickler had been able to spare looking into setting up defensive positions. By Morning Bell our supplies had caught up. By Noon Bell horns sounded to call the beleaguered Army of Callow to fighting positions, because our forward elements had brought word: the Loyalist Legions had formed a battle line in the valley and were now beginning to march towards us. Lady Black had decided she'd rather fight than let herself be cornered.

An hour past Noon Bell, as I sat on Zombie's back, I looked at the retreating Loyalist Legions and laughed until my belly hurt. It wasn't us that'd given them pause, no. We were in good battle order, ready to receive them, but it was a banner that'd done the trick. Atop Moule Hills, on Nim's left flank, a banner had been raised: a vulture cradling a white skull, with green and yellow lines emanating from it. And under the colours horse and infantry stood, poised on the heights and looking down at us.

Sepulchral's vanguard had arrived even earlier than expected, and now everyone's plans were merrily burning under the afternoon sun.

Droughtbringer

Look, I'm practically a broken record at this point, I've told you this so much that I probably don't even have to say anything at this point. Here's the link:

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Liliet

(And bless you)

Steven Silver

It is getting a bit repetitive. Maybe you could spice it up? Like, take a line from the chapter and replace a word with "vote" to make a slightly humorous reminder?

Liliet

I WIILL murder you

Anomandris

You know, for all the praise I give to your story-telling EE, I haven't given much to pacing. Rectifying that – It's sublime.

String's taut, and so is my anticipation. Can't wait for Tuesday.

Zggt

"Everything is a mess lets improvise" is definitely a much more comfortable situation for Cat. One could even say that things have turned from Nim winning to a draw.

edrey

who knows, maybe the Squire had his draw in the night attack and Nim would be defeated in the next battle.

Deworld

No. Pattern of Three works for direct confrontations, and Squire didn't meet Black Knight. Battlefield outcome may count for some commander Names, but Squire isn't one of those.

edrey

But are you sure they didnt meet? Cat's night attack had Named but it wasnt show.

Mental Mouse

Given the plot and Story significance, I'd have to say that if it wasn't mentioned it didn't happen.

ohJohN

It is decidedly possible that Arthur met Nim in single combat:

...but not likely:

Deworld

As was said above, the second fight of Squire vs Black Knight is too significant to be just missed. It theoretically could happen if we think only in-universe, but we're reading a book. Even if our PoV character, Cat, misses it, we as readers should still be at least notified of such event happening, preferably present via Interlude. If such an event wasn't mentioned, it didn't happen.

mamm0nn

And Cat won the first battle, so that would actually be really bad.

Matthew Wells

Cat's not the one who counts.

DC

Wait a minute. Could they not use the lake-dumping trick to supply the army with water if the need arose?

Burlyraven

It's water, but I imagine calling it potable would be something of a stretch, especially if it's sourced from the dark mirror of the Wastes.

DC

Look, if you can't handle a little bit of your own intestines tearing their way out of your stomach to try and strangle you, you don't belong in Cat's army in the first place.

caoimhinh

Maybe Arcadia's water is weird, or maybe Arcadia's water in that part of the Fae's land is weird, given that it is a reflection of the Wasteland.

What I find weirder is that Cat is worried that in 2 weeks they would be running out of water, but two weeks from now they can already return to using the Twilight Ways safely so they can get out of there and get to somewhere with clean water.

hakureireimu

Wouldn't Akua simply drop them out of Twilight again if they did that?

caoimhinh

According to Masego, it was a very specific ritual that did it taking advantage of a weather phenomenon, so it can't be easily replicated. Besides which, they would be getting away from that region if they ever enter Twilight Ways again, so the risk is minimized.

Akua managed to pull it off before because she pretty much knew where Cat's troops were heading and thus prepared in advance. The same shouldn't be so easily done again.

Liliet

It's possible Twilight Ways do not provide a good source of water.

caoimhinh

True.

But I didn't say get water from the Twilight Ways, did I? I said using them to get out of there.

Cat's worry is "in two weeks we will run out of water" but by that time it will be already safe to cross into Twilight and get out of the region.

Apollo

The issue there is that Cat has a war to win. "Getting out of the region" isn't acceptable, since if she doesn't succeed, the Hidden Horror is wins, and "live to fight another day" won't matter.

caoimhinh

True.

But getting out of the region is not the same as leaving Praes. She needed to reposition herself, that's all.

Daniel Masters

I think the problem is two fold, one one side they then have to go for water because they will start to be needing it. Remember they said two week if they ration it.

the other point being they have then let the Lady Black take control of the paise of the battles.

Liliet

...and they will also be out of water already.

Steven Silver

I think it was mentioned when Cat was dumping water on Nim: the part of the ways they would enter is too difficult to move through, right now. If it was traversible, then yeah, they could probably just wait out the disruption then do a short and quick jaunt through the ways to get to fresh water.

caoimhinh

That's not the Twilight Ways, what Cat was talking about was Arcadia.

The Twilight Ways are fine, but due to the ritual that Akua used it's dangerous to use them in the area for two weeks because then the people would fall back to Creation.

On the other hand, Arcadia (the land of Fae) is treacherous in this region, because it is a twisted mirror of the Wasteland, so entering Arcadia from where they are is a great danger.

Though Catherine and those under her command have safe passage by the King of Arcadia. She probably means that there are monsters, poisonous things and terrible weather on the other side anyways.

Steven Silver

Oh, yeah. Too many alternate planes for me to keep track of 😊

I guess the water situation wouldn't be that big an issue, then, if they could ration and Nim wasn't actively breathing down the army's neck.

sengachi

Ways water is probably fine, though inaccessible right now.

Arcadian water from the fae side of Praes? I'd sooner drink poison, that at least might have an antidote.

caoimhinh

Plus, the antidotes in Praes are even created to taste fine with wine. So there's that in their favor.

'Ladi Williams

Two weeks if nothing goes wrong.

Now our Cat knows that a villain planning on nothing going wrong is writing a letter to the heavens daring them to do their worst.

Not to mention an arch-villain. The heavens would fall over themselves trying to rush to mess up her plans if she left that obvious a weakness

Unrecovered

Not safely. Nothing really prevents Akua from using the same trick again.

ohJohn

I wouldn't call "a lack of sandstorms" nothing; the ritual only worked because the sand allowed magic to suffuse the entire area, as the magical capacity of air alone was insufficient to do the same. The sandstorm was pulled from the Gust Ribbon as the first part of Akua's ritual, the second part empowering the sand in the air to thin the boundary with the Ways.

Based on the times given in these past few chapters and the map provided, it should take half a day at the absolute most for Cat's army to get from the fortress to the Rainlands. We've next to no information on it, but I'd imagine it rains fairly frequently there, which would probably disrupt a leashed sandstorm. Thus it seems plausible that escaping into the Rainlands and then into the Ways would prevent Akua from pulling the same stunt again. (I'm open to the possibility that rain could be used in place of sand, but we know that water screws with at least some particular applications of magic.)

Mental Mouse

When they were making the Unravellers back at the Arsenal, they were using Arcadian water as a magical component I dunno that they want to be drinking it, especially from a Wasteland reflection. I'm still wondering about the long-term effects on various terrain of Cat's past lake-drops.

Benjamin Huang

EE you dang goblin stop teasing us! WE WANT BL0000000D!!!!!!!!

edrey

Great as always.

i have a feeling that guy was Below helping cat. just too perfect. lets see what happen with Juniper now. and a very good cliffhanger at the end.

A great chapter as always.

Liliet

Providence helping Indrani help Cat, more like.

Note: providence is used a non-denominational sense in this. It's the same force for Good and Evil Names at its core.

sadfan

No, Providence is only for Heroes. Indriani is a Heroic side of the fence Named. She isn't in service of a choir or gods but neither are Kingfisher or Roland. Her fixation on liberty makes her seem like Below's but she doesn't have an interest in changing anything in her image. She's a Hero in a mixed (borderline neutral) Band of 5.

Earl of Purple

No, Providence is for everyone. What else could have led Cat, Akua and Beastmaster to Tancred the Scorched Apostate at the start of book six? A new villain, fresh into their Name, a pile of corpses at their feet, and the people who come to tell him of the Truce and Terms are the Black Queen, foremost villain of the age, the Doom of Liesse who killed more people for less reason and a third self-identified villain whose abilities are what alerted Cat et al to Tancred's presence. Providence is how the Gods act upon Creation, and both Above and Below have their hands on those scales.

Liliet

...Providence is mechanical to the point that it can be and routinely is gamed to achieve a specific outcome. It certainly represents the Gods' will for how things in Creation should go because they were the programmers in the first place, but it's 100% automated with no planning-ahead element to it, because otherwise tricks taking advantage of providence would frequently not work due to elements of Gods' plans the trickster in question is unaware of (and Gods do not communicate with their faithful, this is pretty explicit in the text), but they don't. Providence acts on a purely local basis, without attention to broader implications or inevitable consequences – sure, there'll usually be another part of Providence taking care of those, but these two stories won't “coordinate” any more than gravity and electromagnetic forces coordinate for specific outcomes. Any coordination comes from in-universe sapients seeing the patterns and taking advantage of them.

Even the thing at Thalassina was WoE-confirmed to not, in fact, be attention of the Gods Above.

The leverage Gods have upon Creation is:

- in automated rules and incentives they'd provided at initialization time (how EXACTLY providence, roles, names etc work)
- personally Bard, apparently (and possibly other Named in analogous roles in other places on Creation)
- when someone does in fact manage to reach them with a petition they can accept or deny (not a routine thing, considering Thalassina was not that) (probably requires setup proportional to impact – Kairos's whole thing was to get to ask them one question, the answer to which no-one but him would ever know)

Steven Silver

Isn't the Scorched Apostate the kid who died? I thought Cat was angry at the world after Above's counterpart to the Scorched Apostate got to live 😊 I forget the counterpart's title, but Cat was upset because she felt that Above got to tip the scales to keep their hero

Earl of Purple

He did die. Cat stepped away from him to avoid falling into a mentor story, and didn't have any other Named keep an eye on him. The Stalwart Apostle (I think that's her Name) encountered the Grey Pilgrim and the White Knight after her Bestowal. Tancred died not because he wasn't saved by providence, but because the villains weren't willing or possibly able to step into the stories that would have helped keep him alive.

Mental Mouse

Also Cat was exhausted and didn't think to leave a Named or spell to watch him and the mortal knights – as someone noted above, villains don't get to assume nothing will go wrong.

Liliet

Fine, let's replace providence with Narrativium.

Liliet

(Also, Indrani is Neutral/Fence-Hopper with a villain-ish lean due to her explicit allegiance with Catherine and counting herself as being one of Catherine's subordinates under the T&T)

Burlyraven

Well, I think we're seeing why Juniper hasn't ever gotten a real Name. Imposter syndrome can be crippling, especially when circumstances grant it evidence, weak or no.

Liliet

I think it really is just because there are no stories about backline generals in Calernia. Imposter syndrome is not something Named are unfamiliar with.

Burlyraven

There have been a few mentioned in passing that might have set a precedent, but it's very true that it's unclear at best. If she can begin to master her imposter syndrome in this arc, we may very well find out for sure.

Abrakadabra

Imposter syndrome? Isn't that what Abigail got?

Lord Haart

Not at all. It's more a combination outright denial, utter haplessness and abject horror that fuel her arc than a crisis of self-worth.

She knows she keeps stepping into the breach and hates herself because she's good at it, not the other way around.

Liliet

Mmm, at least in Book 5 Abigail as a general is terrified she's going to fuck up, which I'd say is pretty imposter syndrome-y. Notably she wasn't afraid of that as a captain and a tribune.

knockoffnikolai

Roland definitely deals with imposter syndrome (and in fact he is a literal imposter), so that would indicate that it doesn't prevent you from becoming Named.

Sinead

That may be true. Archer is also good for catching Heaven's eye as well though. She plays pretty heavy into Heroic Roles at times (look at Liesse for a similar behaviour of timely arrival).

Koi

"I am all eyes, Catherine," he replied

Which is funny because they actually only have 1 eye between the two of them.

edrey

"in the kingdom of the blind the one-eyed woman is Queen"....

LictorMagnus

Going by the trend in recent chapter titles I'm looking forward to reading "loose" on Tuesday.

This battles going to be great. It's not going to be the end of the campaign though. The squire and the apprentice need their draw with Nim before they can have a true final confrontation. She might be named but she hasn't been taught name lore the same way Cat was.

Revenant

"Loose" was my first thought, but I wouldn't be surprised by "Hold," either.

Liliet

Oh fucking bless.

Catherine's officer contingent is coming in clutch – still the original stroke of luck from the Rat Company.

wec

'Course it wasn't really luck at all, eh? Amadeus was in the background pulling all the strings to give Cat a leg up.

(I remember Cat having a thought along those lines, but I don't recall exactly where. There's this in Book 4 Chapter 31: Spectation: "I wasn't unaware that Black had been arranging things quietly in the background so that opportunities would land in my lap ever since I became his apprentice", but if I remember correctly there's a different line that alludes to Rat Company / the War College specifically.)

Liliet

I'm pretty sure Rat Company was genuine bona fide Named luck.

Of course, Amadeus activated the RNG by throwing Catherine into the wargames on no notice in the first place... very much on purpose.

Seriously tho, between his plans being insta-changed by the Red Letter and his later investigation into Cat's officers (including missing Nilin because he didnt technically have highest level clearance) it's pretty clear that one wasn't arranged.

Vlatko

Don't think it was entirely luck, more like Creation surrounding the soon-to-be-scarily-competent Squire with some very soon-to-be-competent individuals with martial abilities.

Liliet

I mean, that's luck. It's just... non-random luck ♥

hoser2

Fun chapter. Interesting and seemingly plausible escape from potential stalemate. Nim maneuvered into a trap of her own devising?

So I focus on a minor detail. Three companies ordered to surrender. That seems unusual. I imagine we see them again, but how? Murdered horribly? Turned to vampires? Ransomed?

mamm0nn

Probably more a way to show us that 'Hey, this is not a sudden landslide victory but a narrowly eked out draw after a hasty plan to save our butts only narrowly worked.' Narratively it would be to show that this isn't a Win, practically it's because no one ever wins perfectly, and to the real audience it's to show that things still aren't going too smoothly.

mamm0nn

Nim: Ha! I've planned out a master strategy to keep you locked near the lake and be stuck there in an encirclement of environment and troops! Victory is mine!

Cat: I went to the sentient tigers and we're now allied. Oh, and I'm the head priestess of two religions now.

Nim: You can't be f*cking serious.

Cat: You're right, I'm just messing with you. I did conquer fortress Kala with virtually no losses in the taking while you weren't looking, though.

Nim: Daughter of a bastard! Didn't your father teach you to fight with proper and rational Legion tactics, girl!?

Amadeus: Sneezes and looks up wondering who was talking about him, before shrugging and continuing to lug way too much goblinfire.

Velrix

Goblin Fire burn sorcery really well, I'm wondering how the Tower will fare.

irritantseraphim

Didn't Amadeus teach her to stop trying to win WITH the rules, but despite them?

Cold Cyberia

I'm really hoping Juniper comes through in the clutch and this is just a moment of weakness.

Oshi

I'd have been more interested in this if there was some establishing from side chapters of Juniper's doubts. As it is it feels reasonable but out of the blue, so I don't really care much.

Juff

Typo Thread:

to flanks us > that flanks us last one we wanted > last thing we wanted
I'd been Juniper's > It'd been Juniper's were our change > were our chance

Earl of Purple

Hah, aiming a lake at the paths to pin Nim down, and making it look accidental. That's great. And Akua just sent the lake back into Arcadia, or possibly a hell. Maybe the Twilight Ways.

Abrakadabra

I still don't get why Cat does not make a deal with Malicia. She can easily kill her when they are face to face.

Oshi

Malicia might believe she is all of Praes but Cat knows better and besides she is the Madness atop the tower. Not something you can deal with, not as she is now.

Droughtbringer

My thoughts:

One: Malicia probably won't meet with Cat in person, and would probably use a body-double

Two: Narratively, I feel like that wouldn't work out. Breaking a truce tends to not end well.

superkeaton

When dealt a bad hand, flip the table and torch the inn.

Helpful

It's kind of a dumb nitpick, but is there a reason the Loyalist faction is using messenger horses instead of scrying? I'm sure something could be handwaved about not wanting the Hierophant eavesdropping on every communication or whatever, but I was wondering if something specific had been mentioned that I missed.

Lord Haart

IIRC it's hard due to regional weather and only Masego can really do it with the Observatory, but he needs to be at hand for both the skirmish plus to conver against "Lady Warlock".

Sinead

I do find it interesting that Juniper used the phrase 'another orc cripple to lug around'. Especially since Juniper was the one to point out that the loss of his hand in Book II was a sign of prestige.

Yes the damage is more severe, but it is interesting that Hakram, who is now out and functioning under his own power, still fell under that gut reaction judgement.

Mental Mouse

The loss of Hakram's hand is one thing, losing half his body is pushing it. In any case, it's not just that Juniper was injured – she's also grown unused to fighting someone on her own level, much less losing.

Liliet

It's a hard difference between "can still fight" and "can no longer fight". Orc culture is not nice.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Guess you could say that it's not easy being green.

Frivolous

I expect the elevation provided by Kala's walls and/or towers will make Hierophant more powerful and dangerous.

Enemy mages will have to be very careful to avoid coming within line of sight of him, lest he Wrest (or as Malicia and Nim believe, Devour) their magic.

I wonder what and who the captured Callowan companies were. Just basic infantry, I guess?

Hope they don't get eaten.

Adrian V

Ok like Cat said earlier in another chapter just who is leading Sepulchral's army because she clearly can't manage her army to be that efficient or smart.

Liliet

I'm betting on Amadeus having a hand in this. The troop movements match both his expertise and his motivations, and he's just been established to have the widest connections all over Praes.

Lictor Magnus

Given the naming trend of the last couple of chapter I'm looking forward to "Loose" on Tuesday.

Lord Haart

Really nice chapter. Still a bit tell over show but there's enough previous chapters of stuff to have built up credit to get away with that, and it keeps the focus on the strategic level which is good for pacing.

Nice lines from Vivienne there, good to see her filling those shoes and a bit of potential Name showing.

Poor Juniper – some signs the killer of her mother will come to light soon (very likely Matrons but I still wouldn't put it past Black to have done it to "free" Juniper to oppose the Tower).

Good to know that Cat and Masego can still work around Akua to some degree.

Definitely some Providence at work here. Bard maybe? She's good at giving Cat options that look like wins but at really just the best option to salvage a loss. Didn't let her win too much either with Sepulchre showing up.

Seems like the smart move now is to up and leave in such a way that the loyalists and rebels have no choice but to fight or stay encamped. They could pursue under “truce” but that would leave narrative open for “mistakes” that lead back to an all-out fight.

But I think instead Cat will negotiate with Sepulchre to attack Nim at the same time as her. Wonder how to guarantee that though...

Finally, Cat – always look the gift horse in the mouth!

Kennedy

I don't know if anyone's said this already but it seems like the last few chapters are following generally the steps of archery. I learned them as feet, draw, anchor, level, aim, release, follow through. Though this was for a compound bow so for a longbow stringing it would have to happen first. Basically what I'm saying is my guess for the next couple chapter names are going to be something along the lines of anchor, level, aim, release, follow through. Probably not level since they don't exactly have scopes in Calernia.

Liliet

Ooh thanks!

Interlude: North I

“You cannot flee from fate, it is the road beneath your feet.”

– Levantine saying

The grass was coated with dust, blown in from a southern storm. It made for slippery footing and that was Borghold Bluesmile had tried her luck: she'd thought the dust would make it harder on his prosthetic leg. As if Masego would ever make such shoddy work. Hakram slapped away the other orc's axe with his own, nimbly letting her pass by him, then flipped it in his hand and tapped her shoulder with the butt from behind. There was raucous laughter from the circle of warriors around them, fists thundering against shields. It'd been an insult to hold back the blow, a sign of disdain.

Adjutant had implied he was teaching a child, not duelling an equal.

“You fucking tame dog,” Borghold furiously snarled, turning around. “Servant to wallerspawn, whore for-”

She struck at him when he took a step forward, hard and blind, but he didn't even bother to avoid it. He adjusted the angle of his steel limb, let the blow bounce off, and his dead hand snatched her throat. He squeezed hard enough the insults replaced by a gurgling choke, raising her high enough her feet left the ground. He met her eyes with his own, patient, and let the fear seep in. Then his bony fingers tightened, a hard warning, and he dropped her. Borghold fell in a sprawl, coughing spittle through her blue-painted teeth.

"Howling at the moon doesn't turn a hound into a wolf," Hakram snorted, then spat to the side.

Fists on shields, the sound drowning out even his opponent's coughing. He did not bother to help her up, as he had some other foes. The Brass Wings Clan was no enemy of his, this was not a test or declaration of enmity. Borghold Bluesmile had just wanted to raise her reputation as a champion by bloodying him in the wake of so many more famous names failing. Hakram left the circle, shields parting for him but even as a few eager young greenhorns sought to offer him celebratory aragh he caught sight of a man waiting for him.

There were few orcs as tall as Hakram and even fewer still that were taller, but Oguz the Lamé was one of them. Juniper's father had been known as Oguz Sharphand once, one of the most famous champions of the Steppes until both his legs were broken in a fall. Even with a shaman's attention they'd never healed quite right, ending the warrior's stride just as he hit his pride. Still, he'd kept the edge he'd had when he'd given Grem One-Eye his sobriquet and served as the chief of the Red Shields in all but names for decades while General Istrid served in the Legions.

He'd been proclaimed her successor, after her death, which Hakram counted as a blessing. Oguz the Lamé made as useful an ally as dangerous he would have made an enemy. Adjutant drank a mouthful of aragh, slapping the stripling's shoulder in thanks as he returned the skin and heading straight for the chieftain before warriors could try to rope him into a bout of celebratory drinking. Oguz, leaning on his slender blackwood stick, eyed Borghold with scorn.

"Kids," Oguz the Lamé rumbled, shaking his head. "There are times to make a reputation. A taratoplu is not one of them."

It was an old term, that one. In translation it would mean truce-gathering but that would be missing a crucial nuance. In Old Kharsum, what the clans of the far north still called the noble tongue, taratoplu was the first of a pair of bond-words. The second was ordutoplu, which meant camp-gathering. The Miezens had only ever bothered to learn the first and in their records they'd matched it to one of their own words after unwarrantedly making it a masculine: turbelus. Horde, in Lower Miezan. Though it had been laziness that'd led the conquerors to make that mistake, they'd stumbled into a partial truth. Taratoplu was as day to the night of ordutoplu, the gathering under truce meant to lead to the making of a great war camp.

Not even when the Steppes had been filled with talk of breaking ties with Ater under Grem One-Eye had a taratoplu been called. If the tales were to be believed, none had been called since the day the Broken Antler Horde was smashed into dust.

"We are what we are," Hakram grunted back.

The older orc scoffed.

"They put too much in your heads, at the Carrion Lord's college," Oguz said. "Too many words meaning too little. The Blackspears aren't wrong about that, even if they're the bloody vulture whoresons."

"The Blackspears would sell a wolf to a goat and boast of it," Hakram snorted.

A favorite expression of his mother's, implying terrible bad faith and shamelessness.

"And it's serving them well," Oguz the Lamé replied, sucking at his fangs in displeasure. "Walk with me, Deadhand."

Around the tall walls of the fortress of Chagoro, a sea of tents had spread out. Once the great warring clans had called a truce and gathered for talks, the others had flocked from all over the Steppes. Even some of the faraway clans who'd only ever known the Golden Bloom and other orcs had come, drawn by the rumours of a Horde gathering in the south. Never had Hakram ever seen so many of his people in one place: over two hundred banners reached for the sky, more than a hundred thousand orcs swarming under them. Not all warriors, but many. Hard to find out numbers when the camp was violent mayhem, not a semblance of organization to it.

Just finding your way to where you needed to go was a struggle: there was a reason the talks between the clans were held within the fortress, none allowed to set tents within.

"The Winter Hooves changed sides," Oguz briskly said. "Their champions now drink with Troke's and swear his fights will be theirs."

Troke Snaketooth, chieftain of the Blacksphear clan, was proving to be a problem. Hakram had not anticipated that the man would be so able at making allies, much less as ambitious as he was proving to be. The man had ridden the story of being the maker of this truce to greater influence, painting his greatest rivals – the Red Shields and the Howling Wolves – as warmongers who would rob all the Clans of the wealth of the south. Worse, his deeper game was only now starting to emerge. There had been no chief that could unite enough of the clans to have a claim at being acclaimed Warlord, not even Troke whose clans still had many enemies, but the Snaketooth had traded axe for arrow. He had put it to the clans that, in the Praesi way, a High Lord of the Steppes should be elected to lead the Clans into war south. Avoiding the title of Warlord, couching it all in terms of Praesi authority, had made the affair more palatable to clans who would have balked at proclaiming a Blackspears their Warlord.

Many had taken up the banner in the weeks since. Too many, and more were rallying by the day.

"The Winter Hooves were friends to the Howling Wolves," Hakram quietly rumbled. "What changed?"

"They were friends to Grem One-Eye," Oguz corrected. "They wanted him as Warlord, in the old days. Now there is no getting him back: even if the Tower returns him, how are we to be sure it is not just some creature riding his skin?"

There was an undertone of relish to the other orc's word at the ruin of his old foe's reputation, Hakram noted. That enmity had never quite faded, not helped by the old rumours that Grem was Juniper's true father. Empty words, as far as Adjutant knew, but it was too tasty a slander not to be kept moving from mouth to ear.

"You're saying they care more about the throne than who sits it," he slowly said.

"Talk about thrones and you'll get your throat ripped out," Oguz warned. "But they're looking for a stallion to ride, that much is true, and Troke's the one prancing. They're not the only ones, Deadhand. Praes is looking ripe but no one wants to try the Tower without a firm axehand to follow."

On Rule, the fascinating treatise on politics that so many Procerans treated as a second Book of All Things, described this very phenomenon. In times of crisis, it wrote, authority will move from the periphery to the centre. In times of plenty, it will move from the centre to the periphery. Hakram had seen it unfold with his own eyes, the way a parade of enemies had pushed Callow deeper and deeper into Catherine's embrace. Now, to his displeasure, he was seeing an opponent sail the same current. Clans would back Troke Snaketooth not because they were ardent supporters but because he was looking like the rising candidate.

The deed wasn't done, though. And Troke had made that old and most unforgiving of Wasteland mistakes: you never wanted to be the one looking closest to claiming the Tower until you were ready to actually take it.

"The Hooves will bring over maybe three clans with them," Hakram said. "That brings Troke to over sixty backers, by my count."

"Just about," Oguz said. "If he gets to eighty the tide will carry him over, mark my words. No one wants to be the last to proclaim a Warlord."

That Troke would be High Lord of the Steppes instead would matter not a bit in practice, Hakram knew. Once he was in the chair, people would obey. It was what orcs did when someone was raised above. The Blackspear clan would make promises of lesser authority, of limits and restraint, but the moment Troke Snaketooth had a few victories under his belt he'd begin taking it back. And the Clans would let him, so long as he kept their axes red and their bellies full.

"Sixty is enough that the Weeping Arrows will be scared," Hakram said. "They're going to start bleeding clans and Inge Farsight knows if she drops under forty she's done. She'll negotiate now."

"You want us to back her?" Oguz said, tone unconvinced. "Dag is still our man."

"Unless you want your clan to serve as Troke's footrest for the next twenty years, you don't really have a choice," Hakram bluntly replied. "Dag's a hawk with lead wings, Grem's cousin or not. He's a solid champion but he's not even chief to the Howling Wolves."

The Howling Wolves clan was still led by Grem One-Eye, who they refused to name dead, though in practice much like the Red Shields had spent the last two decades led by Oguz in his wife's name Dag Clawtoe had led the Howling Wolves as chief in all but name for his cousin.

"That lot is prickly," Oguz warned. "They won't like going from rider to wolf."

"So we marry Dag to Inge," Hakram said.

"She killed her last husband," Oguz the Lamé flatly replied.

"I'm sure Dag will enjoy the challenge," Adjutant lied.

It needed to be done. The alliance between the Howling Wolves and the Red Shields was holding steady at forty clans but it'd not grown in days. Dag was respected but seen more a steward than a lord, to use Callowan parlance, and Oguz couldn't be put forward because no one would follow a cripple. Their clans were by far the two largest of their alliance, and the warriors would not hear of putting forward the chief of a weaker clan as the figurehead for the alliance. Hakram knew there was no point in forcing the matter. Even if it worked, challenges would see the chief slain by his own allies before the day was out.

The bloody Blackspears were making gains, in large parts due to the skilled diplomacy of their Split Tree Clan allies. Hakram had been somewhat disposed to making peace with their ascension, as his and Catherine's plans did not necessarily require the Wolves or the Shields to be raised as the highest of the clans, but Troke's plans were a problem. The Snaketooth did intend to burn a swath through the lands of Okoro, but he'd called it madness to try the walls of a well-armed and forewarned High Seat. He had promised instead to keep raiding southwards, towards Nok.

Whose defences had been weakened by an Ashuran sack and who had sent many troops out west to fight with Sepulchral.

No doubt it was just happenstance that such an attack would cripple a rebellion against the very same woman who'd raised Troke to the rank of Lord of the Steppes and might just make her inclined to confirm him as High Lord of Steppes should the war end in her favour. Most of the Clans didn't give a shit about that, though. What they saw was that Troke wanted to take them after a softer but still rich target, which was a pleasant song to the ear of many.

"I fucking doubt that, boy," Oguz snorted. "But let's ask him."

Dag did not, in fact, enjoy the notion of that challenge. Hakram sold him on it anyway by pointing out that if he wed Inge Farsight even should his cousin return to become chieftain of the Howling Wolves he'd still have a high position as husband to the High Lady – or Warlord, depending on how things fell out – of the Steppes. Ambitious bastard, Dag, though personal loyalty to his famous cousin had kept that in check. A chance to step out of Grem One-Eye's shadow, though, was not an opportunity to be lost. All that remained was selling to Inge and the Weeping Arrows.

She'd see reason, Hakram thought. Like most of the prominent chiefs, she had to know that food was beginning to run out. The countryside had already been stripped bare, Okoro no longer sent patrols that could be slain to eat and the clans had brought only so many herd with them to butcher for meat. Much as the chiefs would like to argue forever, someone would need to be acclaimed in Chagoro before the month was out or simple hunger would force the gathering to disperse.

Within moments of getting to the great tent of the Weeping Arrows, Hakram found trouble. Trouble looked back at him with a come-hither glare, going by the name of Sigvin of the Split Tree Clan. One of the twins that'd come as speakers for their clan to Wolof, Hakram had gotten to know her better since. She had these long fangs and wore tunics that prominently displayed ritual scarring on her shoulders, and Hakram had always had a weakness for dangerous women. It'd only made the fucking better to know that they both knew she was trying to turn him to her side, which might have been while they'd kept doing it.

Not that hers was the only bed he'd rolled in. Being the first Named of his kind in centuries and an unbroken streak of duelling victories had made Hakram a desirable orc. He wasn't one to say no when the question was asked right.

Sigvin was leaning against a marking post outside the tent. Inside was a lot of shouting, not a pot he wanted to dip a toe hastily, so he came to lean on the other side of the post. Silence held between them, Hakram pricking an ear to try to discern what was happening in the Weeping Arrow tent. Names were being shouted, but also oaths and insults.

"If I didn't know better," Adjutant said, "I'd say it sounds like the acclamation of a chief, in there."

The early part of it, at least.

"You haven't heard?" Sigvin said, flaring her teeth provocatively at him. "Inge Farsight got killed. Some feud with a Black Tongue champion that went hard."

The Black Tongue weren't backers to Troke Snaketooth, from what Hakram recalled. At least not officially. How many knives like that had the Blackspears kept in wait?

"No telling who they'll raise now," Hakram said.

Inge had led the clan almost twenty years but had no clear successor. Those kinds of acclamations always got messy and often left clans divided in their wake.

"Except that it won't be Inge Farsight," Sigvin laughed.

She met his eyes boldly.

"One step behind, Deadhand," she said. "Might be time for you and your queen to talk with Snaketooth instead of keeping lead weights on your feet."

Swift as a doe, she pushed away from her side of the post and swatted at his buttocks.

"Don't worry," Sigvin said, "I'll not kick you out of my bedroll even after you lose. It'd be a waste."

Hakram took the time to enjoy the sway as she strolled away, for he was only mortal, but as soon as she was gone he turned cold eyes to the tent. That was a setback. The Weeping Arrows were done, their alliance would collapse. The practical thing would be to take the offered branch the Blackspears had sent through Sigvin and have private talks with Troke. He would only pull further ahead in the coming days, and even if he couldn't be turned against Malicia he still needed to be sounded out over... other matters. As the Adjutant, that was his duty. Much as it irked to have been outplayed, he had been. Now he needed to make sure Catherine's plans were not too heavily damaged. Yet Hakram found his feet refusing to move. He thought, suddenly, of Scribe. Of the look she'd had on her face, that night he had taken her by the throat with a ghostly hand he could no longer make. How the glint in her eyes had scared him for the way he could so easily understand it. He looked down.

The grass at his feet was coated in dust, blown in from a southern storm. Tricky footing.

Just a few more steps, he decided.

—

The night sky would have been beautiful, were it not for the plumes of foul smoke clawing across it. The Dead King's devilish machine, the dragon-furnace that had been meant to incinerate the armies that'd held Hainaut, had not ceased burning after being toppled. Miles of land had turned into a sea of fire as black pitch spread, and though the fuel was running out it was as if a curtain of black and pungent smoke had been drawn across the world. The kind of sight that would make men mutter about the end of the world, had they not already all known it had arrived.

"In Ashur, Speakers do not like to deal in simple truths," Hanno of Arwad said. "Simplicity is a brittle thing, they claim. What lessons they have to share, they prefer to share through stories. To let us find our own meanings."

"I hatred riddles," Rafaela admitted. "And poems. Even Hidden Poets. Words trying to get clever."

Hanno shifted in his seat, wincing as the bandages pulled tight against his wound. The priests had seen to his impalement as best they could but the enchantment on the Revenant's spear had fought the Light. It would be days before he was truly fit to fight again.

"Cleverness isn't the point," he told his old friend. "It is a mark of respect, I always thought. A recognition that few truths are true for all."

"Stories not about truth," the Valiant Champion chided him. "They about glory and sex. And killing. Sometimes Gods, but mostly other three."

He chuckled.

"But you can speaking bad Ashur story," Rafaella allowed. "I am best of friends, will pretend to listen."

"Convincingly?" he teased.

"Am not that best a friend," Rafaella replied without batting an eye.

But he knew her enough to see she was curious, under the ribbing, so Hanno idly thumbed the stumps of his missing fingers and chose his words.

"There is one that I cannot seem to shake, lately," he admitted. "It is a story about the Patient Man."

"He villain?" Rafaella asked interestedly.

"I am not sure," Hanno murmured. "Which I suppose is the point."

In the distance, red lightning crackled across the sky. The aftermath of Antigone's duel with the Archmage had left great scars on an already devastated land: power still lashed out wildly where they had clashed.

"In the far land across the sea, in the city of Akra, there was once a Patient Man," Hanno said. "He was a man of faith and wisdom, who had grown wealthy before retiring and raising his two daughters. In time Akra went to war with the city of Yane, and so his eldest asked his blessing to fight. The Patient Man hesitated, for war is a dangerous trade and he did not want her to perish but neither did he want to shame the courage that made him proud. Knowing not which was the just course, he kept silent."

The cadence came back to him easily, tradertalk having enough of High Tyrian to it that the tales he had learned a child could be recited to the same beats he had once learned. Hanno had never found the tale put to writ anywhere, and not for lack of looking. Like much of the wisdom of the Speakers, it was estranged from ink. Tales were living things, to the masked priests of Ashur, and the corpse of them on parchment would be almost as sacrilege.

"The eldest went to war without his blessing, captaining her ship, and though the city won the war her ship was lost," Hanno gravely said. "Dead, they said, but the Patient Man did not yet grieve. His younger daughter grew wroth and cursed his silence as heartless. She blamed many for the death of her beloved elder sister but none more than the rulers of the city whose greedy ways had led to war. So that no sister would be lost again, the younger daughter sought to become a ruler herself."

Rafaella had never been one to hide her thoughts, for all that she delighted in feigning false ones, so it was easy to see how she approved of the eldest daughter who had gone to war and less so of the youngest who sought to rule. Violence was familiar to the Valiant Champion. She had won her Name triumphing over others in honest battle, but it was no coincidence she had then left the hills of her native Alava. To stay in the lands of the Champion's Blood would have seen her drawn into the feuds and schemes of the dynasties of the Blood, made precious by her inheritance of Bestowal.

It was a hard irony, that the same character that had made her the Valiant Champion had led her to want little to do with the Valiant Champion's Blood.

"The younger daughter sought the Patient Man's blessing and the help of his riches. This would be a long and arduous path, the Patient Man knew, for rulers do not like to share their power," Hanno of Arwad said, with a wry twist of the lip. "Yet he held in esteem the conviction of his daughter and desired not to stand in the way of it. Knowing not which was the just course, he kept silent. Once more his daughter cursed him and rose to rule without help, but in rising she forgot her conviction and grew wicked."

Hanno paused.

"To punish him for his silence she swore never to hear a word from him again, but the Patient Man did not yet grieve."

"Good," Rafaella grunted, speaking of the daughter and not the father. "Silence for silence. Honour in balance. Good girl."

Rafaella had never once, in all the years they'd known each other, spoken of her family. It was not unusual for heroes to be born of tragedy but Hanno had long suspected that was not the truth of this. Sometimes he wondered at the kind of mother and father it would have taken, to raise a woman like Rafaella. Who could claim and hold such a hallowed Name at the age she had: seventeen, barely a woman grown.

"There came a day where a man came from the city of Yane," he said, ignoring her guffaw and muttering of Yanu, "who was from there a prince, and he sought audience with the Patient Man. The man had been a captain for his kin in the war and found the shipwrecked eldest daughter. Falling in love, he wed her and had spent time gathering great gifts to bring the Patient Man to ask his blessing. A ship was sailing, with the eldest daughter and the gifts among it, and the old man sent a messenger to his younger daughter to tell her of this wonder. It was a merry day, but the Patient Man did not yet rejoice."

Rafaella's brow tightened. Heroes did not live as long as either of them had without learning to catch the scent of tragedy in the air.

"The following day his younger daughter sailed into the harbour, bringing with her what she claimed a great war prize," Hanno said. "A ship whose hull had been filled with great gifts and hated enemies from Yane, which she had all slain with her own hand. She had refused to hear the Patient Man's messenger, keeping to her oath, and so in ignorance slain her own beloved sister. The prince was furious with grief, named her a kinslayer and swore revenge. He asked that the Patient Man condemn her, to show not all Akra was wicked, but the old man kept to his silence and so there was war."

He'd told Antigone the story once, long ago in an airy city where they had been the only humans to be seen, and this had been where she balked. The Patient Man is made wicked by this, she had insisted. He and his daughter both deserve to be slain as reparations to Yane, for one committed a great crime and the other abides it. Rafaella did not balk, for her world was a vastly different one. The Dominion was bound as much by ties of blood as it was feuds between families: many a time would Blood forgive or ignore their trespasses of their own while the same dealt by the hands of their foes.

The Ashen Gods of Levant were not as the benevolent Hallowed of Procer or Callow's stern Heavens. In the Dominion, the Gods were partisans. They had favourites, they took sides.

"Yet the younger daughter, broken by her crime, found her old conviction again," Hanno continued. "She offered herself to the city of Yane as a penitent, and the truth of her earnest grief moved the hearts of the people. In time she was wed to the prince, who forgave her, and the cities of Akra and Yane were bound in peace and friendship. The Patient Man died in his bed, father to a grave and a woman estranged."

His voice trailed off, leaving thoughtful silence in its wake. Rafaella was frowning, then eventually she sighed.

"Fucking hate riddles," the Valiant Champion said. "Patient Man fool, good daughter dead bad daughter should have become priest?"

"That is an answer," Hanno agreeably replied.

She sharply elbowed him.

"Is it right answer, though?" Rafaella asked.

"I was once told there are as many answers to that tale as there are Faces," Hanno smiled, thinking of the masks hanged in the temples of Ashur and the priests who wore them. "You're not any more wrong or right than any of us."

Rafaella looked skeptical.

"So what's your answer?" she seriously asked.

Hanno breathed out, looking at the marred sky.

"I don't have an answer," he quietly admitted. "All the story ever taught me was a question."

He felt her eyes on him even without turning to look.

"Is it a greater evil to act unjustly," the White Knight asked, "or not to act at all?"

The Patient Man might have saved his daughters great pain, even death, had he spoken. Had he grieved or rejoiced. Yet in keeping his silence, in trusting the Heavens, he had lived to see the birth of peace and friendship between once-warring cities. Was that great good worth the little evils caused by silence? The Choir of Mercy would say it was, had made a sword and law of that belief. But Hanno of Arwad was not the Sword of Mercy. And there had been a time where he had held an answer to the story, the one shown him in the depths of that unearthly place where he had become the White Knight. Mortals could not be just, he had been shown. Not truly.

They were flawed, blind creatures and even their finest intentions were blades without a handle. He could trust instead in the judgement of the Seraphim, impartial and farseeing. There was justice, beyond the fallibility of men. Hanno of Arwad palmed a small silver coin, one side bearing crossed swords and the other laurels, and deftly flipped it. It went spinning, a glint of silver in the dark, but it held no answers for him.

The Seraphim were yet silent.

"It true the coin woke?" Rafaella quietly asked.

Hanno caught the coin, snatching it out of the air.

"For a moment," he said. "Would that it had not."

The hope had burned, after the years left adrift. And burned harsher still when Hanno had understood what had truly happened: somewhere in the south, hidden away, Cordelia Hasenbach had ordered that the corpse of an angel be desecrated. Ealamal, such a corpse was called in the Dominion. Priests and mages in the service of the First Prince had meddled with something beyond mortal understanding, tried to turn the remnants of a Seraphim into a weapon. And the shadow of a shadow had woken for the barest of a moments without calamity ensuing. It had lit up like a beacon in an empty place within Hanno's soul, blaring to him a warning of how far and fast the First Prince was falling.

Twice over her had been stung, in the Arsenal, and much had he thought of those days. Considered how he might have done things differently, looking into past lives for guidance – for the man he could have been and had failed to be, the one who would have passed that test. He had found no answers, the search only dwindling his power in the Light even as he warred against the dead, left to study only with his own meagre eyes. Catherine Foundling had startled him out of their pleasant détente, that day, but his anger there had waned. What wisdom was there in blaming a scorpion for striking? He would not allow himself to be lulled into complacency again, but neither had he misread the Black Queen as he'd once feared.

He had simply never been at odds with her before. It had been a lesson well worth learning, and cheap at the price.

Yet Cordelia Hasenbach had been looked upon with approval by the Choir of Judgement once. Her convictions been judged worthy, even as she denied the Name was her rightful mantle to bear. A scant year later and the same woman had been reduced to someone feeding people into the grinding gears of the Principate of Procer so that the machine's wheels would be kept wet. Hasenbach had no ideals, only an ideal Procer. And though that land would be a beautiful thing to behold, Hanno thought, it would be grimly built and as Evil made it slip further and further away the First Prince was dipping her hands deep in the red.

Already she was up to her elbows, how long before she began to swim? Conviction and despair had been mothers to many a horror.

"Truth then," Rafaella grunted, studying him. "Talk of ealamal."

"It is," Hanno simply said.

The Valiant Champion weighed him with her eyes.

"That why you been middling?" she asked.

He blinked.

"Meddling?" he suggested.

"Middle, meddle, muddle," she growled. "Tradertalk is fool tongue. You understand, Hanno. Now you finger on scales."

Her face grew serious.

"Time was you did not."

He did not deny it.

It had begun as a small, simple thing. But then was the same not true of the first pebble before the avalanche? There had been trouble in the army, after the Black Queen left. The Lycaonese had begun to elect their own leaders, after the death of the Iron Prince and Mathilda Greensteel, of marching to fight with their kin in the north. The leading captains all agreed in this. And Hanno could have stood aside and watched, as he had when the Iron Prince had hung mutineers, for it was not his place to meddle in the affairs of Procer.

But he had glimpsed the shape of it, how it would unfold. They would leave and there would be no stopping them without a battle. Hainaut would weaken, then fall. So instead of standing aside, he instead had stood to the side of those captains who shamed the others for speaking of leaving the fight. And though he had said not a word, his presence had spoken volumes. The White Knight agreed. The Sword of Judgement, like the Ashen Gods of the Dominion, had picked a side.

Once he'd dipped a toe, it had seemed pointless to balk when the Alamans princes began to bicker and their hosts to desert. He'd brokered a truce between Beatrice Volignac and Arsene Odon, exhorted the levies of Bayeux whose shame about routing at the Battle of Hainaut had been eating away. It had seemed almost just to him to speak to those levies, balancing the scale of the way he had done nothing as Klaus Papenheim slew and imprisoned their officers. He had not expected for them to look to him for command, after, but he was a high officer of the Grand Alliance – he could serve as a commander if he chose, he simply had not. They had fought like lions since, to regain their pride.

They called him Lord White, and meant it not as a courtesy.

Hanno had remembered the clarity he'd felt, when he had been fighting to the north to destroy the bridge, and then the sickening feeling when he had heard about the bloody battle at Hainaut. And with those memories following him around like loyal hounds, he had found his hand moving again and again. Stiffening General Abigail's spine when she began to consider retreat further south, killing the dispute through a scrying ritual when the Red Knight and the Myrmidon almost came to blows in Cleves, advising the Kingfisher Prince to retreat long before the Morgentor came at threat of being encircled.

Small things, all. But many of them. And others had noticed. There was a deference to the way the princes now spoke to him that had not been there before, and it was slowly passing to Named. Many now looked to him for advice who had merely taken it when offered before.

None had noticed that his power was waning all the while, save for his closest friends. That troubled Hanno, for it would have been easy to decide from this that the Heavens were frowning on his action, but for all that he was weakening he did not feel... shunned by the Light. But it was his doubts, he suspected, that were behind it all. The end of his certainties. For Hanno of Arwad had once believed himself as a Patient Man vindicated, but as the silence of Judgement lingered his own was beginning to break. These days he often he dreamt of the story he had told Rafaela, the question burning in his mind as he woke.

The Valiant Champion had been watching him through his long silence, the sky above them alive with writhing smoke.

"Is it a greater evil to act unjustly," Hanno quietly repeated, "or not to act at all?"

And he could not shake the fear that he had not heeded the warning of the story. That he had seeded a doom at the heart of the Grand Alliance by his action. Would Cordelia Hasenbach grown so desperate, if he had not begun to step beyond his old lines in the sand? He had proof, ruinous proof, that his actions and hers were interlinked. Yet some part of him balked at the notion that simply acting, trying to do all the good that he could, would be a seed of doom. What had he done here, save try to keep the dark from blowing out the last trembling lights in the west?

"Not fighting Evil," the Valiant Champion said. "Rolling over. That is greatest evil. You cannot be others, only you. That is what you owe the Ashen Gods."

He thought on that, for a moment.

"I could do more," Hanno of Arwad quietly confessed. "Even now, I stay my hand."

Rafaela smiled gently, and pressed a kiss against the side of his head. He looked at her in surprise, for love or lust she had never been shy in expressing but affection was rarer.

"It's end of the world," his friend said. "When, if not now?"

The words lingered long after she departed, leaving him to silence and the smoky sky. When, if not now? Was she wrong? He felt as if she should be, but he could not say how. And that left only a broad, terrifying expanse ahead of him. One that could be filled with anything.

"I could do more," Hanno of Arwad said, voice pensive.

Then perhaps he should. He already knew how to begin. Speaking with Antigone, so that she might lead him to the one who had taught her. The sole man who could bring the Titanomachy fully into the war, the last of the ancient Titans. The thought fixed, firmed, became a decision. And in that moment, Hanno felt it fully for the first time. Not in parts, in moments, as he had until now. Like a beacon. The claim that was stirring in him, to a Name he could not yet grasp. He had his suspicions, however. He was feeling another claimant, after all, to the south.

If Hanno had to put a name to where, it would be Salia.

Jircniv

WARDEN OF THE WEST!

Teopicana

If Warden of the West turn out to not be an exclusively procerean name, I think that would be it very stable in the long term. Just imagine, a team made up of the the warden of the west, warden of the east (or whatever Cath's new name is), Hierach, High Priestess/Priest of Drow and Herald of the Dwarves meeting to discuss a continental threat.

Someperson

Also Warlord, maybe.

Although, some of these Names are very clearly Named rulers, and we have yet to see if such Names will actually survive the Accords in some form or not.

Cpt. Obvious

But who would be the Warlord?

Right now it could be that Hakram somehow manages to claim that title for Catherine. That way making Juniper's use of the title prophetic.

On the other hand I think it's more likely that Hakram claims the title of Warlord. The the question is if it will become a Name. Whatever the case he can't be both Warlord and Adjutant, so Catherine will no longer have him to lean on, and unless his new title becomes a Name Hakram will lose his aspects and a lot of his strength. I worry that it would also play havoc with his prosthetics.

The way he has created a organization that's been able to take over the day-to-day work that he has done for Cat tends to suggest that he might be leaving her immediate side. But at the same time his Name haven't shown any signs of preparing for a transition or him losing it.

Now as the Adjutant is a new Name created out of Hakrams desire to help Catherine it could be argued that him becoming the Warlord is fulfilling the Names purpose, especially as he has an organization in place to handle Catherine's needs.

Much to ponder...

Linnus42

Seems likely I say one of the major differences between Hanno and Cordelia is that Hanno is a Globalist and Cordelia is a Nationalist. They both want to win the war but Cordelia makes a lot of her choices based purely on what is good for Procer and if Procer seems lost would have no issue firing that laser even if the War itself is not lost. Hanno on the other hand cares more about people in general not any one nation especially.

agumentic

That is very unkind to Cordelia, especially considering she already said that Procer is basically dead no matter what anyone does. She is not going to risk half the continent just because of her homeland, she is only going to do so if she honestly believes there is no other way.

Deworld

...

Would it make Catherine Warden of The East?
Or something other East-related. There should be a reason why Grey Pilgrim felt that her Name will be born East, not somewhere else.

Reader in the Night

I'm thinking in taking the Tower, or at least forcing it to fold, Cat will truly earn the Name Arch-Heretic of the East. There's an interesting dichotomy between the Warden of The West (Good-aligned) and the Arch-Heretic of the East (Evil-aligned), and Catherine has a narrative of telling Choirs to shut the fuck up, and has been named Heretic in the past.

She'd just have to out-heresy the Dread Empire of Praes to earn that name, and considering Catherine's stance on Gods and the presence of Hierophant, she very well could pull something like that as a last-minute nuke.

Shveiran

I don't think Cat wants to be the Arch-heretic, because that would make it very hard to talk with anyone in the west and she is aiming to establish a new order in Calernia.

It's possible, mind you, but considering how careful she's being with her new Name I deem unlikely she'll end up with something she really, really doesn't want like Dread Empress or Arch-Heretic of the East.

Now, Warden of the East...

Tenthyr

Oh that's... Not good. That's not good at all.

I can't help but feel Catherine's going to come back and down that the heavens really couldn't help themselves. And then someone's going to find out what being in the way of what she wants ends when she isn't trying to be nice.

edrey

yeah, no good at all. scaring abigail and helping princess mathilda (wasnt she dead?) is one thing, but being a ruler Named is other, and this is war, way diferent than normal times.

Matt

Yeah, Hawk killed Mathilda at the Siege of Hainaut. I guess Erratic forgot lol.

Velrix

A Zombie Spy !

onedollargum

It's the price she had to pay for the Grey Pilgrim raining down the star on Hainaut I think.

TheHerald0

Don't only Villain Names do the rival claimants thing?

Earl of Purple

No. Rafaela also had to kill Claimants, though Valorous Champion's an unusual Name in that regard I think. Two mages may contest the Name of Wizard of the West, but the loser may survive or even get another wizard Name, rather than get slaughtered like the Praesi do it.

Juff

Typo Thread:

that was Borghold > that was when Borghold insults replaced > insults were replaced his, this > his; this and heading straight > and headed straight more a steward > more as a steward selling to Inge > selling it to Inge so many herd > so many herds have been while > have been why learned a child > learned as a child and the gits > and the gifts while the same dealt (missing word) of a moments > of a moment Twice over her had > Twice over her had he he often he > he often Hasenbach grown > Hasenbach have grown

My very own name

I read it as

that was Borghold > that was why Borghold

Burlyraven

So Hakram is a Named, and liked, but he's also out of the running for leadership of the clans because of his injuries (from a traditionalist stance), should he even want to pursue such. The thing is, I can't really see the story setup going any other direction than him claiming the throne, unless his secret plan is to bed every orc woman and tie the clans together by a web formed of his love children. That'd probably take too long, though.

hakureireimu

I'm not sure Hakram is out of the running actually.

Him taking over seems like a simple solution.

Linnus42

I think its most Hakram is like Hanno they dont want to rule. But they could if they wanted to at least on paper.

Sykomantis

That seems at odds with his Name though. The servant can become the master, but I can't think of any stories where they willingly go back to being the servant.

dadycool

Except would he become The Master, or simply a lesser master to his sworn Master?

Mental Mouse

Mhm, I don't think an "Adjutant" can reallly be a secondary lord like that.

Insanenoodlyguy

And that's why he keeps thinking about Scribe. About understanding her immediately and probably grasping himself a little better, and how "a few more steps" to get this plan accomplished might take him away from that. He is a man of dulled emotions that finally has contentment and fulfilment. He doesn't WANT to rise higher than Adjutant. Yet doing his duty might require him to, and it will end something between him and Cat he was able to keep during more a more personal crisis.

308924810a

There's no guarantee that he's going to stay Adjutant if he is confirmed as being in command of the steppes. He's sorta vaguely a successor to the Cursed/Captain, and Sabah also went through a sudden Name transition as a result of her achievements in the Steppes.

Bad@games

Hes obviously getting his whaaaaaaaaaag together to back cat up in the empire struggle against the demons The demons of cha.... Preas

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

GET YER CHOPPAZ, BOYZ!!!!

WAA

Rey d`Tutto

They should paint their boots Red.

Finn .-. .

This comment made my screen more than double in size..

Abrakadabra

Thats all folks.

snapplefacts

Why am I hearing airhorns?

Big I

So Cordelia's going to be taken out by the White Knight, and the final battle of the Guide will be between Cat and Hanno as Wardens of the East and West respectively?

Johnny's Freight

And then they bang!

Matt

I think Cat is more Warden of Named the. Just the east. But there's a chance, yeah.

Liliet

Won't be that specifically I don't think, though I suspect you're closer than the people talking about the Final Band Of Five Against The Final Boss Dead King.

shikkarasu

Warden of the East does sound like the most likely Name for Cat I've heard so far. My guess was some sort of Arbiter, but that feels weak for how much buildup she's getting. I think the Final Band of Five was killed by the whole business with Larat two books ago.

308924810a

Empress of the East instead of Dread Empress?

abstractandpolish

I really like Arch-Heretic of the East. Worshipper of dark goddesses of theft and murder. Angel defier and rejector of the Gods Above. Does good... nontraditionally. Cat's a Heretic if I've ever seen one.

Shveiran

She's not about ruling. She is about preventing idiots (within and without her charge) from making a mess. She'll be the shepherd of the villanous of the nasty, both to protect the world from the worst of them, and to protect them from a world that doesn't want to listen to their merits and just isn't fair.
Warden of the East.

Liliet

My bets are split between Warden of the East and Black Queen atm.

(And like 10% to "other")

Matt

Didn't Hawk kill Mathilda at the end of last book? How'd she come back?

edrey

Viv will be Queen of Callow, heiress of cat. Hakram will be learder (?) for the Clans to help cat, Catherine wants to replace the ruler of Praes, teaching two lords of levant and backing the new empress of the free cities. the Pattern is obvious now. even the first prince needs her aproval. her new Name/role is going to be really big now.

now i am sure Hanno will die, he is a martial hero, politics is beyond him. that chaos is not something cat would ignore.

Sinead

I honestly wonder if Cat's Name will be Black Queen with the secondary epithet of 'the Lawmaker' since she has weight on most of the crowns of Carlernia. Hell she has some form of relationship to every crown on Carlernia in one fashion or another (though with the Dwarves and Elves it is quite minor).

nick012000

Hakram the Warlord? If that's where his story was always meant to go, it's no wonder that he was the first Orc to get a Name since the founding of Praes. The Orcs had always been oppressed enough that a proper Horde could never arise, until Black's reforms changed that.

Shveiran

I think there is simply no way the Warlord can kneel before someone else, and Hakram's core is being Cat's aide.

That's why Grem, who once had a shot at claiming the Name, never actually got it.

Sinead

If Hakram takes a revised Role that sees the concept of the Warlord change, that may be different.

If the Accords go through, the Warlord would be subject to the Accords, and Hakram was a co-author to them. I could see that Hakram carves a new groove for the Orc nation, especially with the elements coming to a head here.

Amadeus' Reforms allowed for the Orc nation to stand up for the first time since the War of Chains, but it also changed how their self image as a backbone to the Legions compared to the old Horde. There is room for an newly emerging Name, much like we see with Hanno (and perhaps Vivienne as well).

ninegardens

This is... good? Maybe?

As in, we don't WANT Cordy to get the Warden of the West Title. She didn't want it, and the moment she gets it, Bardo has a better avenue towards the Angellazer.

Hanno getting it takes the weight of Cordy's shoulders. And he is the person LEAST likely to use the Angellazer, and also likely to tell Bard to piss off.

I... don't see this as a problem? Maybe I'm missing something? (Oh, unless one of them has to die for the other to get the title. Hmmm...)

SpeckofStardust

Ya the problem is hanno and cordy coming to blows before getting the name. Which would happen while cat isn't thier to defuse it, because she's busy settling the east and wont see it coming.

Aston Whiteman

Red Letter at last?

Angel Lassr..

mamm0nn

I think Red Letters are specifically and only for technology, reproduceable and upscaleable technology. So something that requires a literal angel corpse to use is probably not going to trigger one, unlike making radios and guns or whatnot.

shikkarasu

I think it's also only the non-magical variety. Goblinfire and Liesse are properly terrifying, but both required access to hell/devils to work. It's been implied that Goblin Alchemy only stays off the radar because it is somewhat magical in nature.

Insanenoodlyguy

She doesn't have to die, I don't think, but they do have to clash. You can't have two claimants without them having some sort of contest. Might be entirely taking place over politics, but it's going to happen. One will have to thwart the other, or one must concede to the other before the name can form.

Matt

Didn't Mathilda Greensteele die last book to the Hawk? How is she still around?

hoser2

Wait. So he did nothing, seeing all choice as evil? But then he starts to do good things because he is tempted by resentment of those who had the courage to act?

Glacian22

More like he doesn't trust his own judgment to be Good enough, which is why he used to rely on the Seraphim. He could ask them, and then act on their decree. But without them, he's scared that any action he takes would be based on his own flawed human judgement, and might make things worse.

dadycoool

Well, the resentment is because of bad things happening due to his silence. For the longest time, the answer to his "unjust action/no action" question was that unjust action was far worse, but he's seeing bad things happen because of his silence and good things happening from breaking it. Bad things that he could've easily prevented and good things that wouldn't otherwise have happened.

Wonder

Wait ,is Hanno getting a ruler Name?
That's going to set him on a clashing point with Catherine!!!!

Raivshard

Nah. Cat's doesn't even have her Name yet and she's already demonstrated that she can fully defy and command a Dread Empress. Cat's above all the ruler names.

Earl of Purple

I kinda hope Hanno doesn't get Warden of the West. Or if he does, that the title is disassociated from the offices of the First Prince. Otherwise, Hanno becomes the First Prince despite not being a Prince of Procer and the Grand Alliance loses its premier negotiator and diplomat.

Linnus42

I doubt Hanno would be First Prince...he doesn't care about Procer like that lol. I don't think Warden of the West is intrinsically tied with Procer.

shikkarasu

Warden of the West is 100% a Procer thing, but I agree it could be split from First Prince. Hanno can't gain the position by virtue of not being a Prince and not being elected, but if he had the Name then he would be like the Auger: no official power, but too much sway to be ignored.

Likely he could nominate a new First Prince and a full third of Procer would immediately back his choice by virtue of "no one wants to be the last to proclaim a Warlord." It would be considered an unofficial requirement for the First Prince to have the backing of the Warden.

Shveiran

...No?

Warden of the West has so far been a title of the First Prince of Procer, yes, but that is precisely it: it wasn't a Name.

Procer doesn't defer to Named the way the Dominion and Callow do. It answers to nobility and laws.

If the first Warden of the West will not be a Prince, the Princes will simply give it the respect due to a powerful chosen. Not elect him First Prince.

That's just not how they roll.

shikkarasu

You are largely correct. Procer doesn't have the same culture of deferring to Named and Warden of the West has never been a Name before. Procer prides itself on these facts. That said, Warden of the West carries a lot of weight, culturally. If it didn't, then it wouldn't be able to become a Name. People won't defer to the Warden just because it is a Name, but because it has been synonymous with First Prince for centuries. Once it is split from the position of First Prince no-one will like the idea of backing one over the other.

As for Procer not respecting Named...

•Heroic Interlude: Riposte

"Had she still been a mere branch member of the Hasenbach family Cordelia would have chided her for it, but Named got to live by their own standards. If she wanted to go around naked and covered in blood, there was not a man or woman in Procer who would dare to even comment on it."

•Warden I

"And then one day Agnes had casually predicted a ratling raid at dinner, absent-mindedly referring to herself as the Augur. Overnight people began bowing to her and seeking her advice, to her confusion."

Procer does respect Named, they just don't get to style themselves Lords and Ladies like in Praes and do not have Ruler Names, like Tyrant, Queen, Empress or Hierarch. Named are respected and heeded the world over, but not every country gives them automatic political power. The authority of the Warden of the West would not exist on paper, and Procer would balk at legitimising it, but their influence would be very real.

Insanenoodlyguy

He won't be First Prince, but that won't matter. When the Warden of the West speaks, even the First Prince will have to listen.

Earl of Purple

This is you and Linnus, here but: Currently, the title Warden of the West is one held by the First Prince, in the same way that Malicia is both Dread Empress of Praes and the Tyrant of the Tower. The King of Callow also likely had other titles, as well. Royalty have a lot of titles, even if the most important one is usually the 'King/Emperor/Prince' but the others do exist. So Warden of the West is not yet a Name, except it's the Name Cordelia dismissed when Auger beat Bard, but it's a Name she could have held because it's already a title she holds.

jamesc9

I wonder if Procerans could cope with having a Titled Warden of the West and a Named Warden of the West simultaneously.

Cold Cyberia

Everyone is writing memoirs and commentaries, meanwhile Hakram's going to write "On the applicability of Proceran political theory to Orc statecraft". Love it.

I do hope that Hakram becoming more independent is a larger trend for Orcs as a whole. Feels like now is the time for them to reclaim their cultural identity as a people. I mean, even now their only way to obtain power is through the army and violence, and that's after substantial reforms. It's pretty sad tbh.

It's fine to enjoy the violence but there doesn't seem to be much room for shamans or poetry, or any of the other good shit they used to engage in.

Burnsy

So in Praes we have a battle between claimants to the Tower. In the Clans there is a battle for who will become High 'totally not a War' Lord. And in the west we have two possible claimants for Warden of the West.

We have a White Knight who's losing his Name, and a Squire in a pattern of three with the Black Knight. We have a princess who could become a Shining Princess or an Heiress or something entirely new. We have Cat's nebulous 'Name' and the imminent death/defeat of the two oldest terrors of the world.

This is the end of one era and the beginning of another right across the board.

Insanenoodlyguy

The Tyrant wasn't being melodramatic when he said he was killing the Age of Wonders.

shikkarasu

Tyrant's drama was many things, but never mellow. 😊 iamnuff1992

"To act Unjustly or to not act and allow Injustice to be done?" What a stupid question. Act justly instead, obviously.

I can't really blame Hanno though, Judgement really did a number on him. Broke him pretty badly.

He needs someone to sit him down and explain that even if mortals can't be perfectly Just like the divine supposedly can, they can still try to be good enough.

inglessiejek

And luck once again by somebody trying to be "truly good ", is true evil done, I find it hilarious how he calls Cat evil for what happened in the Arsenal when his choice would have been far more so

Also is it just me, or in the vast majority of cases are the good guys in this series much closer to evil (at least my Definition of evil, a bit too hard to explain here but hopefully you can catch my drift)

Christian Oaks

Thats half the fun of the series. Pointing out how following capital G "Good" isn't always in line with good or moral. We like Hanno white knight as a hero character because he looks at many different cultures and understands different people have different lower case good guidelines. We like Catherine because she wants to curtail the worst lower case evil/s of both Evil and Good.

Interlude: East II

*"I will do better, said the man, than the tyrant, who said I will
I swear, do better than the man I kill.*

the man I kill swore to do better than his tyrant, and I say I will do better now than either man."

– "Better Than", Ater folk song (couplets meant to be repeated)

It would have been a mistake for him to watch the swords.

It was her feet that warned him, when he had any warning at all. Amadeus circled to the side, shield raised and sword low. Hye darted forward, striking high, but he did not bite. Arm tightening, he took the real hit – come by the side, a blindingly quick swing and flick – on the shield and shot into a riposte. She stepped to the side, let it pass her, and turned to swing at the arm. Cursing in silence, he struck out with his shield. He wasn't quite swift enough to withdraw, her blade slamming into his wrist harshly enough he almost dropped his sword, but it wasn't as bad as it could have been. The shield slam forced Hye to step back and abandon the killing stroke she'd been setting up.

Amadeus took two steps back, his back drenched with sweat from the hour of sparring now coming to an end. He was slowing, losing his edge. Old age, he supposed, though the now grey-haired man knew he was closer in shape to a man in his forties than this true age. For now, at least.

"You get baited into that riposte too easily," Hye said. "You got too used to being able to kill people with it when you were Named. You're slower now, you can't keep using it."

"I'm still used to being able to correct midstroke," he admitted. "I collected too many habits that relied on Name reflexes."

She snorted, bringing her blades back to the sheaths with a purely unnecessary twirl. Her long hair was kept in a braid today and he'd always loved the look on her – especially when she had a blade in hand. Which she was perfectly aware of, from the sly looks she kept sending him.

"You're too hard on yourself," Hye told him. "In terms of swordsmanship, you're still one of the most impressive opponents I've had. In the finest ten, at least. You just have more practical limits to deal with than before."

"I did have a skilled teacher," Amadeus smiled.

She smiled back.

"I speak, of course, of my mother," he casually continued.

He got a clump of dirt tossed at his head for that, ducking away laughing. Since early in their acquaintance Hye had insisted that there be wagers to their sparring, which had never lost him much coin but ensured he'd cooked most of her meals on the move for decades. Tonight was not to be exception, though he'd been farsighted enough to get the stew going before they began. It was mostly ready by the time he went to check on it, needing only seasoning. Only roasted greens for side dish, as... Amadeus felt his heart clench. He forced himself to finish the thought. As Wekesa was gone and would no longer assembled a makeshift oven to help him make fresh bread.

Hye sat at his side, silent. She knew how to read his moods, and so stayed close but did not impose touch. An invitation. He leaned into her side, enjoying her arm going around his waist as he leaned his head on her shoulder.

"Who?" she asked.

"Wekesa," he said.

"He went out on his own terms," Hye said. "For his son. Remember that as well as the rest."

Amadeus allowed himself to enjoy the comfort a little longer then moved away. Neither of them spoke more of it. Hye was one of the people he'd met who were even more private than him by inclination, she well understood that for some the light of day burned more than it cleaned. They sat with the stew, the old lacquered bowls – whose cracks were filled, oddly enough, with silver – that she'd been using longer than he'd been alive warm in their hands.

"I did miss your stew, and that damned lentil soup," she laughingly told him. "My pupils were nowhere as fine cooks, even though Cocky at least should have been better by sheer divine mandate."

"The Concocter?" he asked, cocking a brow.

It was not common for her to talk of her old students, but not uncommon either. She still had much fondness for her years in Refuge, even though she had left that part of her life behind much as she had once parted ways with the Calamities. He'd always admired – envied – that in her, the capacity to walk away. He was not so blessed.

"Feral little thing," Hye fondly said. "Never seen a Crafter that much bite to them before."

The Teoteul, her father's people, called Named whose Role tended to creation 'Crafters'. In those lands they were held in great respect, she'd told him, often greater than martial Named.

"The way you raised them likely had something to do with that," Amadeus mildly said.

She cast him a sideways look.

"You can just say it outright," Hye said, amused.

"You already know my thoughts on the affair," he replied. "I can understand what you meant to accomplish, but when one's means involve cruelty to children they are best reconsidered."

"What I did accomplish," Ranger calmly said. "They left my tutelage with all they needed to survive and thoroughly discouraged from banding together. I didn't coddle them like you did your girl, Amadeus, but they came out stronger for it. Named that get tucked in at night get killed in their first decade. I've seen it happen to more heroes and villains than you've put in the ground."

"Wealth of experience tends to mean more powerful aspects," he conceded, "and personalities less brittle. But you only painted in black, Hye."

I'd been painfully obvious the few times he'd encountered her pupils, never more so than when he'd spoken with young Indrani. The Archer, who'd thought the way to tame the evils of the world was to make herself and her Name into the Ranger's shade.

"It's what I know," she frankly replied. "And it's what sticks."

He shrugged, seeing no point in further speaking of it. He'd already told her his thoughts before and she'd disagreed with them then too. She respected his opinions but had never felt bound to heed them in the slightest – which was, he would admit to himself, half the reason he was in love with her in the first place.

"I suppose you think your student-"

"My daughter," he corrected calmly, evenly.

Pointedly, too. She winced.

"Look, I've already apologized for that talk in Arcadia," Hye said. "I wouldn't have been so hard on her if I'd known she mattered to you as more than an apprentice."

An apology which she meant, and he'd accepted, but it would not mend the broken pot. Catherine was now singularly predisposed to seeing Hye as an enemy, which might just end up being a massive headache before this was all over.

"She does," Amadeus said, "which is why I see little point in comparing the deeds of our former students. She would not have gotten so far without your Indrani at her side."

Hye's lips quirked at the mention. Ranger was not a particularly fair woman and she'd never shied away from having favourites. Of her little band of Named, Archer had been the one she most liked. Not out vanity, though one might be forgiven for believing that, but because Indrani had in her belly a rare sort of fire.

"Your little queen might still kill you, before this is said and done," Hye plainly said. "She won't like what you're scheming."

"Neither do you," Amadeus teased.

She rolled her eyes and let it go. Eudokia, for all that he loved her dearly, would not have. It was not in her nature to leave details unattended to, to embrace the unnecessary risk. That attitude had saved his lives many a time, over the years, but it should not be taken as the iron law habit had slowly turned it into. They'd gotten old, set in their ways even as their bodies stayed the same preserved statues of wax. Hye, while older than any of them by centuries, never stayed still long enough to rot. There were lessons to learn in that. In embracing impermanence. Amadeus should not have presumed he would stay the same under the face because the face did not change.

Or believe the same of Alaya.

"She brought the last of your pupils east, you know," he said. "I am not the only one who might face a rough end."

Hye's face was serene as a pond, the shadows of their fading fire clawing at her cheeks.

"Have they grown enough for that?" she asked. "I wonder. I will have to see, Amadeus, who it is they have become. One last test for the children of Refuge."

They went to bed early, for they were to begin moving before the dawn. Northeast of them was an old run-down inn owned by the cousin of a friend, and there letters waited for him. A confirmation from one of his people in Ater that Grem was still alive and writing, growing fat in his house arrest. Alaya did not seem to suspect. Yet it was the other letter, the one from the south, that set him to smiling. Nahiza had corresponded with Wekesa for decades, back when she'd still lived in Kahtan instead of retiring to her tower, and it was only out of courtesy for that she'd accepted his first letter. After that, though, it had been out of curiosity.

The problem he'd put to her was one too fascinating for such a mind to resist, and the possibility of eternal glory a temptation to her pride.

It can be done, she wrote in that terse way of hers. But only with the Tower. No one else has the mages and coin. The formulas she'd sketched out as a proof of concept he could not understand, not even after all his years of trying to understand more than the barest edges of Trismegistan sorcery, but he tucked them away in his doublet anyway. They would have a use. What he'd needed of her had been confirmation that it was possible at all: the rest was only a matter of finding the right place and right time. The last letter he read twice, to commit the words to memory. Nim had ambushed Catherine out of the Wasteland but the Army of Callow had held fast and now all the vultures were drawing in. Good, rather like he'd thought it might go.

The game he'd not seen coming was the release of Akua Sahelian to become the Warlock, but then he'd been consistently blindsided when it came to Catherine's treatment of Tasia's girl. That she'd not been publicly and brutally executed years ago remained a source of bemusement.

With the loyalist Legions and those that'd deserted coming ever closer, the moment of truth was drawing near. He'd sown the seeds but done nothing more than that, could not do more than that. As he'd told Layan down south, the last thing Praes needed was another banner raised. When the time came, when the blades were out, what was it that would win – the mud or the orders? Amadeus of the Green Stretch had spent most of his life betting on the mud and he had no intention of ceasing at so late an hour. Leaning forward, he put the letter from Kala to a candle. It burned bright and quick, smoke curling upwards. He caught sight of it disturbing a spider, which crawled to a corner of its webs on long legs. Smiling, he dropped the last smouldering remnants of the letter and stepped on them.

Were he a superstitious man, he might have called that a good omen.

—

High Lady Takisha Muraqib of Kahtan was to come to Ater, along with most the nobility of the south.

It was an unusual and unforeseen decision, so Malicia investigated. What dearest Takisha had wanted out of gathering the entire Hungering Sands to her court had become plain enough after a little digging: she'd been trying to rally houses to her banner for an attempt at taking back Foramen. She could have made such an attempt without such pageantry, of course, as Malicia was in no position to stop her. Yet Takisha, for all that she was an intelligent woman, was prone to dithering.

It was a learned error. Kahtan had the most vassals out of all the High Seats, which made large scale enterprises for it difficult unless time was spent wrangling support. Takisha had heeded that lesson a little too well, to Malicia's eye, and come to avoid bold action even when it would best serve.

Yet she was skilled at wrangling, and with the traditional rivals of the Muraqib for prominence in the desert – the Banu of Foramen – dead and gone Malicia had expected her to find a measure of success. That not only she had found none but that she had been driven to take her court north had been a noticeable enough reversal that it must be looked into. Even if this was not the action of a player but instead of an undercurrent of popular feeling, clarity was required. The empress' plans had arrived at too delicate a stage for interference to be permissible.

Spies came and went, scrying rituals crisscrossed the land. Ime was busying herself chasing Amadeus' trail, which she had finally caught, but Malicia left the matter to her capable hands. Instead, as she sat in a comfortable salon tea in hand, she poured over lists of names. Those who had petitioned High Lady Takisha to journey to Ater and formally petition the imperial court for intervention in the south. Some of those names she well knew.

Lord Feisal Rahab, whose great silver mines made one of the wealthiest men in Praes. Lady Nawal Morcos, whose kin had skirmished with the Tribes for centuries. Prominent names, at first, but they had met with Takisha late. And more importantly, they had little to gain from the decision made. She sent for earlier reports. The first to speak with the High Lady of Kahtan were less known to her. Lady Layan Kaisha, Lord Habid Tannen, and on it went for a dozen names. Lesser aristocrats, all of them, with few common interests that she could grasp.

She sent for the files the Eyes had on them. Layan Kaisha was one of Amadeus' veterans, it turned out. So were two of the rest, but most were not. Yet Malicia's mind itched with intuition. This had been done in accord, she grew convinced as her Name began to swell. There was something to Connect those names even if she did not yet understand it. Her aspect had never failed her before, even though the leaps of intuition it sometimes leant her were the fickliest part of the boons it granted. She set the Eyes to digging deeper at the nobles.

Behind closed doors, alone, Alaya would admit that the aspect's blooming was a deep relief. After the encounter with Foundling in Wolof, she had feared... Her fingers clung desperately to the cup of tea she forced herself to drink with decorum. Be silent, the Black Queen had ordered, and Alaya's soul had obeyed. As if to be able to declare silence was the girl's due Alaya had found that she could no longer Rule. Not in the simulacrum she'd worn, not in her own body, not anywhere. It had taken days for the aspect to return, and even now it was weakened. She could feel it in the people around her, through the connections that Connect allowed her to instinctively understand.

Her authority had thinned.

It would come back into its fullness, she thought, that was the trend. But after how long? Another month, year, decade? She'd been told that the Black Queen was not yet Named and already she could do this. The thought was... frightening. As was the memory of the girl's mad grin as she was wrestled down by a dozen men, Alaya tasting blood in her mouth as the little monster cackled. There's always next time, the Black Queen had laughed. Foundling was coming for her head, Malicia now understood. She would settle for nothing less if she were not forced to settle otherwise. Practicality and gains would not be enough to sway her, Malicia had misread that very badly.

Spies came and went, scrying rituals crisscrossed the land and her Black Knight ambushed the Black Queen in the depths of the Wasteland. Akua Sahelian was proving worth the investment.

"All is in place with the deserters?" she asked Ime.

"It is," her spymistress confirmed. "We've prepared the scapegoat."

Good, that was one worry in hand.

"Sepulchral?" she probed.

"We still don't know who plans her campaign," Ime admitted. "Not anyone openly in her service, at least. It's slickly done, Malicia. It's possible whoever is doing it isn't even with her army."

That seemed... unlikely, from what Malicia understood of military affairs. Perhaps a Named would be able to work through such constraints, but there was none around to provide such guidance.

"Best prepare for a bloody end," the empress pragmatically said. "She has served her purpose, the time has come to pull the curtain on her rebellion."

"Troke Snaketooth is on track to win the election as High Lord of the Steppes," Ime said. "And he's reiterated to our agents that the terms still stand: if we confirm him in that title he'll lead the Clans against Nok."

Which, combined with the destruction of Abreha Mirembe's field army, would be enough to bury the cause of Sepulchral. The Sahel of Nok and the Mirembe of Aksum would turn on their ruling kin the moment they thought the cause helpless, and Malicia was willing to offer relatively mild terms of surrender for their return to fold. No need for soulboxing, it would be overplaying her hand. Increases on a selection of taxes would hamper their economic recovery for long enough that the empress could smother them out instead of wielding an executioner's axe. Perhaps an expansion of the Green Stretch at the expense of Aksum, she mused, as pointed lesson.

Treachery was treachery, but no one should swing at the Tower and miss without proper admonishment.

When the in-depth reports on the few nobles she'd asked for came, she finally connected the dots. The lords and ladies that were not veterans were nearly all from border or trade holdings. The kind that would be negatively affected in a direct way by the kind of civil war that'd afflicted the Empire for the last few years. Ah, Malicia thought with a smile. It was a faction she was looking at. A very discreet one, difficult to make out on parchment, but a faction nonetheless. One that was hostile to her rule of the Tower. A rash of assassinations would not be overly difficult to arrange, but Malicia restrained herself. When one got rid of weeds, it was best to burn them out root and stem.

It was too early for blades, and she could make use of this for other purposes.

She had letters from Wasteland lords that expressed concerns about the Clans being on the move, and those concerns were slowing her attempts to put together one of the measures that would keep her head on her shoulders and her crown atop her head. The ritual that might solve the Hellgates that terrified the Grand Alliance had exhaustive resource requirements, the kind that not even the Tower's vaults could see to. She'd had to rely on drawing on the resources of northern lords for some of the substances. It needed to be ready soon, she knew. The ritual would bind the gates to open only once every decade for seven days and seven nights, an ideal solution, but it needed weeks of preparation before it could be implemented.

"Send word," Malicia ordered Ime. "We are holding a formal court session in the Tower. As the nobility of the south is coming, so will the nobles of the north."

The Taghreb play had Amadeus' signature all over it. He liked to move pieces towards the centre, were they could be more easily dealt with. He'd get his wish, Malicia decided, and more. Much more. Using the gathering of the Clans as a reason for the court session would see even the most reluctant of lords and ladies come, the empress knew, and with them would come an army's worth of retainers. Another assurance to have in her pocket, should it come to the worst. With the Empire tended to for now, Malicia could turn her attention to further measures that would preserve her life and reign. She needed leverage on the Grand Alliance, not only Callow, and there was only one place left to acquire it.

The Free Cities, where General Basilia's attempted unification of the League was beginning to worry the cities yet to be conquered. There was potential in that, but none of the rulers involved were willing to engage in talks with the Tower. Between Hasenbach and Foundling, the costs of dealings with Praes had been made too steep for any there to still be willing to pay them. How fortunate, then, that Malicia had replaced the Merchant Prince of Mercantis with a creature of her own.

Alaya was the Dread Empress of Praes. Should weather this storm and emerge from it triumphant, as she had all others.

—

It ought to be an exciting sort of war, but somehow it was not.

Dear Sargon had offered Akua the use of the Amaranth, a sure indication he was looking to get rid of the Tower's leash around his neck. The necklace was a splendid thing, a collar and trailing generous expanse of beads in polished gold and onyx. Each bead held a small sliver of power, at the fingertips of whoever wore the necklace. Yet it was the pale purple precious stone set in the hollow of the throat that made the Amaranth such a powerful artefact, for within it lay a Titan's tear turned to crystal. The purity of the overwhelming grief it emanated allowed a caster to free themselves of all feelings and doubts, leaving one's will the sharpest it could be. Akua's ancestors had used the artefact to make even the most middling of their sorcerer-lords seem skilled, in the past, as the Amaranth was enough to turn even a middling fool into a passable battlemage.

Having been a prodigy herself, she had found instead that the Amaranth not only ended the difficulties she'd had in acclimating in her new body but that it had allowed her to surpass some of her old limitations. The swiftness of her recovery had made spawned many a murmur that she was becoming the Warlock in truth, as was only to be expected, but Akua knew it to be otherwise. She had been Named, once, and not forgot the sensation of it – the warmth of unbroken certainty settling on her shoulders like a cloak.

It had not been difficult to prove her value to the Black Knight, though the stern Marshal Nim had treated her as a hissing viper at first. Detailed information on the spellcasting capacity of the Army of Callow and Catherine's own limitations – which were ever-shrouded, but Akua had deduced to some extent – had bought her a place at the table. From there, it had only been a matter of finding out the Named's weaknesses and presenting herself as a remedy to them. The auxiliary cavalry that had been assembled from highborn sons and daughters from all over the Empire had been defiant of the ogre's authority, at first, but Akua had eased the burden. She was of the greatest of lineages herself and rumoured to be Named: within days she had them eating out of her palm.

She took one of them to bed, on a whim. A Taghreb captain with a crooked smile and dangerous manners, whose large rough hands had appealed. Not so after she fucked him. She'd had her due of pleasure, more than once, but it had not sated her. It had... lacked intensity, somehow, though she knew that to be absurd. She'd been a shade for years, the sensations should have been almost overwhelming. Akua was careful not to think of what hands might have better pleased – smaller, knuckles always half-scuffed and, no, she was not this weak. There were better uses of her waking hours than chasing the never-be.

Settling the highborn cavalry had not given her a foothold with Nim, only ensured that she was now being treated as a mildly useful rattlesnake. Organizing the auxiliary mages into proper casting circles, however, would be a step in the right direction. Akua did not even have a rival there, as the only person of Praes who might have contested her – Nahiza Serrif, widely recognized as the greatest mage in the south – had declined service in war due to her age. Dubious, that, but Serrif was famously reluctant to ever leave her mage tower and Malicia had little to gain from throwing stones at the wasp's nest. After a few brisk duels fought under the pretence of practice, Akua broke the ringleaders of the most important cliques to her service. Most gave way with good grace, as was custom, but some did not.

Kendi Akaze fell to his knees, panting and covered in sweat. The last wisps of his spell faded away, shattered at his feet. Swaths of the ground had burned, but Akua was well-learned in curses and he had not studied them deeply. His blood was slowly boiling.

"Surrender," Akua ordered.

"Did you even know her name?" Kendi hoarsely asked.

She cocked an eyebrow.

"Of course you didn't," he laughed, wetly. "Just another mfuasa. A servant. We don't even know if she died as your dog or if the Black Queen nailed her to a cross. We weren't important enough the question was asked."

Akua studied him for a long moment.

"Your sister?" she quietly asked.

"And two of my cousins," Kendi snarled. "All for your pride. So you could go on serving the enemy. We're all just games to you, aren't we?"

Murmurs of disapproval. It was one thing to bear a grudge for the death of one's kin, respected even, but for a mfuasa to question their place was... disgraceful. If they had been fit to be more than servants, jino-waza would have ensured that they were.

"Surrender," Akua repeated.

He spat to the side, struggling to rise on shaking limbs.

"Her name," he croaked, "was-"

The roar of the flames he formed, not even voicing an incantation, drowned out his own words. There was an irony in that, she thought. A lesson, for those who cared about such things. The spell was at her fingertips in an instant, quicker than even his despair. The flames were smothered in darkness, rot writhing its way up Kendi Akaze's arm. He howled in pain, dropping unconscious, and Akua knew he had to die. He would try again, otherwise. Some grudges could not be set aside. And still she ended the spell. Ordered him dragged to a tent. They thought she would order him tortured, she saw in the eyes of the watchers. Made an example of.

She had him healed instead. The hatred was not gone in his eyes when he woke.

"This changes nothing," Kendi hissed. "Nothing."

"I did not expect it would," Akua quietly said.

There was a long moment of silence. She looked outside the tent, hearing his steady breath.

"Why?"

She turned, met pale brown eyes with golden ones. Because you are my past made man, she thought. There is no pit in Creation deep enough I could bury you in it. Because I loved a girl as a sister, once. I murdered her, and a thousand other sisters since. Where does it end? If no one kills me, where does it end?

"Why not?" the Doom of Liesse replied.

She dreamt of her father, that night, and woke up with red eyes. Iron sharpens iron, the other mages praised her. She kept to the old ways truly, to have a kept a man who wanted to kill her alive just so she would remain sharp. Bile rose in her throat even as she smiled. This what who she was now, wasn't it?

She did not regret sparing him.

With the mages in line, she proved her value to the Black Knight. A ritual to bring the Army of Callow forcefully into Creation, to deny retreat through the Twilight Ways. It was an inspired piece of spellcraft, she thought. And she found her hand, moving again and again. Adjusting numbers. It was pointless, Akua thought. Even if the blow was softened she would never be forgiven for it. And still. The hand moved. Some had hated her, in the Army of Callow. Many. Others had been... kind. In their own way. How many of them would she kill with her ritual?

A few less, she thought. If she could.

It worked, and the battles that followed saw her prove herself. Then there was that hard night where the Army of Callow reminded them it was still the same mule that'd kicked in the ribs of half the armies on the continent, slipping behind them. And there would have been battle, but Sepulchral surprised them all. Instead there was a tense, hesitant stalemate and Akua was at last invited to dine in private with Marshal Nim. It was a stiff affair, almost begrudged, and there was no dessert. The marshal proved remarkably forthright, by the time the plates were taken away.

"I can smell it on you, you know," the Black Knight rumbled.
"Ambition."

Akua smiled easily, drinking of her wine.

"It seems like a singular curse to be able to smell such a thing while living in Praes."

"You're only charming to humans, Sahelian," the Marshal glared. "Malicia saw use in you and she's been proved right in that, but I still question her judgement to have taken up such a hiltless sword."

"Do you often?" Akua asked.

The ogre eyed her in silence.

"Question the empress' judgement, I mean," the Doom of Liesse idly continued. "Idle curiosity, I assure you."

"Highborn," the Black Knight said, tone disgusted. "He was right about you all, B- Amadeus. Even if the sun fell down on us you'd jostle for the nicest place to die. You don't know what loyalty means."

Oh my, but what an intriguing mistake she'd almost made. Telling, too. She would not be the only to change the word halfway out of her mouth: the Carrion Lord had, for better or worse, been part of the backbone of the empire for decades. That was not a legacy easily cast out. Did it weaken her Name? It likely did. Enough, perhaps, that Catherine's little Squire might be able to slay her given the right opening. Something to ponder.

"Interesting, this talk of loyalty," Akua said. "There are some who would say you've broken faith, following the Empress over your predecessor."

"That's because you think like a child, Warlock," the Black Knight scathingly replied. "Like loyalty can only be about people. You want to know what I follow? There's no need for games, mageling, I'll tell you. It's not like I hide it."

"That would be most helpful of you," Akua agreeably replied.

"I believe in the empire promised us in the Reforms," the Black Knight bluntly said. "A Tower that holds to law and order, that does not cater to the whims of the High Lords. A realm that is not a mangy pack of alley cats fighting over scraps."

"And Malicia offers you this?" she asked, genuinely surprised.

Though the Empress was certainly of a mind to gather the power in Ater, she had never been one to mind a bit of intrigue. It would have been like a prize champion being shy of the arena.

"You're not listening, Warlock," the Black Knight bit out. "This isn't about people. You know what the cornerstone of that dream is? The Legions of Terror. An army that can cow the High Seats, professional and modern and most of all loyal."

Akua studied the other woman with open fascination.

"This isn't about the Tower at all," she said. "This is about the Legions."

"You think half my officers, half my men, don't want him on the throne?" Nim said, tone hard. "She's been good to us, Malicia. Better than most. But she's not known. She's the stranger in the Tower."

"It would kill the Reforms, if you rose to help him climb the Tower," Akua slowly said.

"We wouldn't be an institution anymore," the Black Knight said. "The bedrock of stability. It would make us into just another High Seat to please and defeat the entire purpose. Do you think it's a coincidence that he's been skulking about scheming instead of calling on the Legions of Terror? Soldiers would come if he raised a banner."

"I have read the reports," Akua delicately said. "That decision might not be one of principle, but driven instead by the Emerald Swords-"

Marshal Nim laughed, leaning over the table. Her breath was unpleasant.

"You think he's the kind of man who'd flinch at killing elves?" she said mocked. "He's got Ranger at his side. Don't be a fool. He knows it too, what it would do to Praes to call. Just like he knows we'll fight him tooth and nail if he comes for the Tower."

"You sound like you admire him," Akua said.

"I do," the Black Knight said. "I don't like him, Sahelian. I don't love him either, and I fear what kind of an emperor he would make. But I do admire him. Even now, he still believes in the same dream that I do."

The ogre bared her teeth.

"And he'd agree it matters more than any single man."

And there it was, Akua thought. The Black Knight thought herself a fortress for her principles, unassailable to temptation because her loyalty was to something above the dross of petty ambition. She was wrong, of course. Idealists were no less fragile than anyone else if you knew the lay of their castle.

"Oh dear," Akua sighed. "You really are going to get yourself killed, aren't you?"

The Black Knight scoffed.

"Repeat that threat and-"

"It won't be me, you fool," Akua sighed. "Warlock. Black Knight. Scribe. Captain. Ranger."

"The Calamities," Marshal Nim said, impatient. "What of them?"

"Where are they now, Black Knight?" she asked.

A moment of startled silence.

"Gone," Akua said. "The Dread Empress of Praes does not long tolerate other Named at her table. Even the band that made her bid for the Tower was broken and sent out in pieces, Nim. How long do you think you'll last?"

"Captain died abroad," Marshal Nim flatly replied.

"On whose behalf?" Akua laughed. "Come now, you ought to know better. Did you truly think yourself so different than me in the empress' eyes? You, too, are a hound raised to run down a particular trouble."

The golden-eyed mage pleasantly smiled.

"And Dread Empress Malicia is not the kind of woman who keeps a hound at the table when the hunt is finished, Black Knight," Akua said. "It is a waste, to her. She puts them down."

The Black Knight laughed mockingly.

"And you'd never, of course," Marshal Nim said. "So I ought to back you instead, for fear of my life. You've only listened to the parts you wanted to hear."

"I have listened to everything," Akua sharply said. "It is you who ignores the reality around you. Do you think Malicia cares a whit about your little dream, save in how it helps her maintain control?"

"Wind," Nim dismissed, "she benefits from-"

"Not enough," Akua snarled. "Gods, when are you all going to understand? It will not be enough, because when you hold the Tower it can never be enough. There's always another enemy, another doom, another doubt. She'll cut open the Legions to make what's left her creatures. She'll hobble them so they can't ever raise a hand against her. Because you have ideals, you fool, and she doesn't share them. In the back of her mind the whisper is always there: is this the line that makes them turn on me? Is this the order they will refuse? She doesn't make decisions because they are lawful or fair or they bring stability. Malicia cares about being in control. That's it. That's all of it."

She had risen to her feet, at some point, but she did not recall.

"There's no place for your dream in that Dread Empire," Akua said. "And there's no place for you either, Black Knight. For a Named that will get in the way of making the Legions safe. I have a spell that will kill me, somewhere in this body, but Gods burn me if there is not a sword hanging above your head just the same. We are meant to be temporary measures."

The armoured ogre watched her in silence, still as a statue.

"I rode that black doom to my end, once," Akua said. "I know the look of it, Marshal Nim, and the empress is a woman in the deep throes. There was a time where I thought-

That I spoke words like these so they would trust me, she thought. So they would love me. So that I would have a seat by the fire, until they saw through it and turned on me. Her nails bit into the palm of her hand.

"It doesn't matter," Akua got out. "It is all scrapped iron, that's all. Pointless."

"You are," the Black Knight slowly said, "perhaps the finest liar I have ever known."

"You want truths?" Akua asked. "You want proof? Fine. Ask someone you trust to inquire as to what a pattern of three is, Black Knight. You who fought a Squire and won."

She smiled mirthlessly.

"Because I know," the Doom of Liesse said, "and I assure you the Empress does too."

And she had not, Akua knew bone-deep without even have looked, said a word. And though tomorrow they would return to war, to the bitter fruit risen of the bitter seeds Akua had lain, she knew from the look in the Black Knight's eyes that she had just cracked the stone with the blow.

And still, curse all the Gods who listened, she was not hearing the damned song.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

I miss when people used to do this, so here goes:

"Do you often?" Akua asked.

The ogre eyed her in silence.

"Vote, I mean," the Doom of Liesse idly continued. "Idle curiosity, I assure you."

And to you, reader: what would your answer be?

Liliet

Please don't do this.

Poring

Why not? It's fun to read.

inglessiejek

Yeah, it's much better than just a dull comment saying go vote, at least this way it's amusing as well as tiresome instead of just tiresome

Liliet

This way it's nauseating instead of just a helpful reminder.

Weemadcanuck

How the fuck is it nauseating?

Liliet

Factually.

Liliet

Not to everyone, and to those it's not, it's fucking awful. I guarantee you that reading a "dull" voting reminder does not ruin your day the way some of these "clever" ones ruin the day of those who dislike them for the same reason I do.

fp

If reading a silly line someone wrote for a meme ruins your entire day, I'd suggest avoiding the internet entirely, as it's pretty unreasonable to expect everyone else to cater to your very specific tastes.

I have no idea how you're managing to get so worked up over something so harmless and mundane.

Liliet

Well, you suggest avoiding the internet, I suggest not making these specific jokes in this specific place. I know for a fact I'm not the only one who dislikes them.

inglessiejek

You could just not read this part, and truthfully if reading a small pun is able to ruin your day to such a great affect then I'm sorry but that's not the problem of the people who enjoy them either

Liliet

It's fucking hard to consistently not read it when it's there EVERY TIME (it's not now, but it had been for a while) and when it's ONE OF THE FIRST COMMENTS.

Look, it just tends to ruin the impact of the part of the chapter it quotes. Why keep doing that?

inglessiejek

I mean honestly there's always something in the comments on most online books that shit, for me the boring version is far more annoying than the Version I can draw at least some amusement out of, so if one is going to be put then either way somebody is losing out so it might as well be both

Honestly I get your point some things in the comments can detract from reading the story but at the same time while this might be the thing that bothers you and you're fine with the other one it might be the opposite other people or something completely different so unless somebody is putting comments with littoral real-world problems in it it's generally best to leave people alone to have their fun, for example thanks for the Chapter comments on Royal Road for some books take up like three pages and it's really annoying if you want to actually talk about something but going off on a rant isn't going to help

Liliet

It at least makes me feel better -_-

(And from how it felt to see others' commentary on the same topic, I know it's not only me it'll make feel better)

therealgridlock

So instead of taking personal action you want everyone else to curb their speech to please you.

Look, you're cool and all, but you need to deal with your underlying health issues if that's how you react to things.

People everywhere are always going to do things you don't like. Can you control them? No. Can you control yourself? Yes.

If you can't control yourself, you have bigger problems to address.

Liliet

Instead of taking personal action? What do you mean? I'm not going to leave the fandom over this, and what I do with my personal health is, shockingly to you (apparently), my own personal business. Are you envisioning mental health as "take a big MENTAL HEALTH tablet once a day and see all your problems dissolve" or what?

therealgridlock

It is clear to me that you are going through some shit, or you wouldn't feel the need to lash out at harmless puns.

If you aren't going through some shit, then why are you acting the way you are? Your personal health becomes our business when it affects us. Nobody here hates you. Nobody here wants anything but the best for you. If something is causing you to be irritable, we understand, that still doesn't give you free license to demand nobody on the internet make puns.

No one here is causing you to act, you are choosing to act. If you do not like a comment, you may simply ignore it. Or, don't read the comments. Corny vote reminders aren't illegal, yet, and I hope it stays that way.

I would never suggest you stop enjoying a book you enjoy.

I will however suggest that what is within your power to control, such as your own speech, your reactions, and your own life/health, is eminently more important to you than what other people say on the internet. This is why I said that if you cannot control how you act, you have larger problems than internet comments.

I hope you feel better.

Liliet

I am, quite obviously, not suggesting that corny vote reminders become illegal. I am also not asking you to act as my therapist (wtf dude). I am simply participating in the discussion on what this comment section should look like. I'm not sure why you're taking it so personally, are you okay? Why are you still continuing this discussion? I'm not exactly raising this topic every single chapter. I'm just expressing one opinion (not only mine, I have seen other people agree with me and occasionally speak up with the same thoughts) on how to do vote reminders. Is it so important to you that this opinion not be there? This isn't even the latest chapter anymore.

I control how I act quite well. Do you?

luuuma7

Jesus Christ, I swear you've been complaining about the same thing for literally years. Get over it, no body agrees with you.

jamesc9

There is at least one person who is coming to agree with her, who is me.

Are there spoiler (self-hiding) tags or similar in wordpress? If so, would people be open to putting the parts of vote reminders that re-word the story into them?

zucced

Oh stop being dramatic. If a bit of dumb humour like that ruins your day then you've got issues.

Liliet

Oh stop being dramatic. If someone has issues and requests that people avoid a very specific bit of dumb humor, why make a big deal of it?

zucced

Ah, the gaslighting tactic, nice.

Don't pretend like you're not the one repeatedly starting kerfuffles over this in previous chapters.

Anyway, to answer your question: it's because the "issue" you have is simply that you're overly attached to the wording of a Web serial. In other words, it's petty and unreasonable.

Liliet

I'm literally just repeating how you talked to me, note.

zucced

Sure. Doesn't change my point.

Autochthon

You know what does ruin my day?
Your constant whining about these.

Liliet

I don't complain about them when they're not there. And even when they are I mostly don't. This is just a discussion of whether they should come back, and I'm expressing my opinion.

lennymaster

Old time reader that took a break here. It is coming severely late but this reminded me why I originally stopped reading the comments of this fantastic webseries, the corny vote reminders. I just want to let you know I support you on this.
Every time I start reading one of those I think for a moment that there is some clever insight incoming, instead I am disapointed.

50_Shaeds_of_Fae

I agree with Liliet on this. It's jarring, takes me out of the story, and never half as clever as it's meant to be.

(Yes, I am aware that I'm a year late to be weighing in on this)

Mnemonic

I like these please keep doing them!

Arracor

"You are," the Black Knight slowly said, "perhaps the finest voter I have ever known."

ruduen

Hoo, boy. There's a whole lot to process in here.

It's good to see Amadeus again, and be reminded that he and Ranger actually have some working name lore. It's also interesting to see just how he and Ranger now treat Cat and the general familiar relationships are handled. It's going to lead to quite to a conclusion when things come to a head.

I believe this is confirmation of the second of the Dread Empress's aspects, as well as insight into just what Cat did. Of course, a villain thinking they'll always win is just asking for trouble.

And ah, Akua. I wonder what it says, that she has access to an artifact that's supposed to free someone from all doubts and feelings, and yet still have all of the current thoughts and burdens. It's interesting that she's not even feeling the pull of Warlock at the moment, despite the rumors going about. It seems likely that she doesn't have the clarity or certainty necessary to fall into the name right now.

If Cat's plan does come into fruition, it seems likely that a different name would pop out of all of this – acting as a permanent gatekeeper's hardly a light role. If it all comes down to how Cat interacts with named and with her own name forming, I'm kind of amused by the long-shot possibility of her new position helping to guide her way towards Naming others. One more thought to add to the giant list of crazy possibilities that might ensue.

RoflCat

> It seems likely that she doesn't have the clarity or certainty necessary to fall into the name right now.

A part of me jokes that her refusal to accept that she's hella thirst for Catherine is what's holding her back, and thus it's only when she leans into that feeling that her Name will finally form.

Liliet

Oh, Akua is fully aware of her thirst for Catherine. She just refuses to give a single thought to the implications of... like, approximately anything that's happening right now. Willfully.

Liliet

The artifact is only designed to be used while casting. Having "the purity of grief" clear your thoughts at other times sounds counterproductive.

onedollargum

Yeah, it seems like a good way to either get yourself bewitched or addicted.

naturalnuke

Oh lord Akua is going to turn into the Red Skull, making generations of young heroes ask 'Why is a Nazi guarding soul stone(read: Twilight Ways)'.

Benjamin Huang

see, this shit here is why EE is a better writer than Wildbow.

thecorinthianman

That's a bold statement. I love this story, don't get me wrong, the meta aspects are unbelievably satisfying and the sheer quantity of storytelling and historical knowledge that one would need to write it is absurd. But emotionally, I've never had a story tear at me like Wildbow at his best.

They aren't comparable, is what I'm saying. They're both peak fiction, but in different ways.

aurikdomi

Well said Thecorinthianman.

AbraKadabra

For me it is the wandering inn.

Zach

I'm not nearly as harsh on wildbow as a lot of other people (who seem to have gotten really negative about him due to the popularity of Worm during the early years of web serials); he's still probably better than most other web serial authors at writing stuff that makes you want to "turn the page," and I would rank his writing over something like Wandering Inn (something about Wandering Inn's writing fundamentally makes me incapable of "buying into" the story – I can't suppress the knowledge that I'm just reading something that an author is making up as they go along, and it constantly feels like I'm reading a fanfiction of another series that contains all the Wandering Inn characters). Wildbow is very good at creating distinct and memorable characters and page-to-page action/events that make you want to keep reading, but cracks start to show when looking at the broader narrative. Like there are entire swathes of Worm or Ward where I think "was this really necessary?" even if they were enjoyable to read at the time.

I would generally say that PracGuide is more or less the pinnacle of “page-turner” fantasy/action web serials. It’s exceedingly good at crafting memorable and easy to imagine characters and scenes. I have a very poor memory and usually have a difficult time mentally picturing fiction that I read, but it’s very easy for me to recollect the story of PracGuide along with the various “major scenes” in each arc (which is particularly appropriate given the actual metaphysical weight those scenes have in the setting itself). Nothing about the story particularly stands out as “unnecessary.”

A person

A big part of it for me, is that wildbow clearly is a discovery writer making it up as he goes; and so his stories are pretty well written, and we’re decent “page” turners but just lacked in foreshadowing or feeling like it properly led into the larger parts.

I don’t get that as much from Wandering inn, even if it’s not quite as enthralling of writing.

sengachi

The irony is that the most recent chapter of Pale is actually a lot like this one.

ninegardens

The most recent chapters of Pale are amazing

Branwen

I don’t mean to be rude, but comparing authors and vaguely demeaning their peers is never going to be taken as a compliment. You can talk about what you love without feeling the need to explain why it’s better than something else popular, and I in fact highly recommend it 😊

portionofthecure

They are different people who are both very talented at what they do? Twig is my favorite story, ever. That’s just kinda rude and I don’t think EE would appreciate that.

zucced

Not sure the dunk on Wildbow was necessary fam, it’s not a competition.

aurikdomi

I love watching Akua squirm and hate everything she has now. Everything she ever wanted

dadycoool

I wonder how much of Zuko's arc she'll experience now.

Razender

Considering PGtE is basically a (justified!) novelisation of the entire contents of TV-tropes? All of it. Cats' cemented her so thoroughly into the story of redemption-beyond-death nothing short of divine intervention will pull Akua free from its grasp.. and the Gods Below really aren't the type.

nick012000

Now I'm wondering what the Black Knight is going to do, now that she's realized that Malicia's gotta go for her ideals to become reality. Is she going to declare neutrality in the conflict over the Tower?

Tenthyr

My god Catherine was exactly right about what would happen to Akua. If she hadn't done what she'd done I'd almost feel sorry for her.

Alaya doesn't seem to fully grasp what Catherine is becoming if her nacent name has such POWER over a Name entirely dedicated to rule. I wonder what Catherine's power will be when she finishes it's gestation.

Sugar Roll

Oh I think Alaya knows. She fears her now and is starting to get desperate.

boballab

No I don't think she does, because she hasn't seen what the Bard was able to do as the Intercessor, if she did Malicia would be scared out of her mind that Cat might becoming into a Name similar to that.

kaldurak

I suspect that Catherine is going to somehow become the next Bard!

boballab

Or something like it. What got me thinking this way is the when Bard had to discard an incarnation after not getting her way in the Arsenal when she stated she would have to do it the hard way. From there you don't see Bard until in Praes and she isn't drinking. It was like she lost a part of herself.

therealgridlock

You know, I just now realized.

What's the opposite of a wandering Bard?

A stationary queen of some sort? She's going to hold the center of the continent. She may still wander... But if she's a grand deciding rulemaker and rule keeper, wandering queen doesn't work the same way to me.

It'll be interesting to see.

Zach

Didn't Catherine's plan involve Akua climbing the Tower and then, after doing so, realizing that she's unhappy and taking Catherine's offer to seal the Dead King?

It's sounding like Akua isn't even going to make it to the Tower. I'm wondering if Catherine actually underestimated how much Akua has changed. It's particularly notable how Akua deliberately limits the damage she causes to the Army of Callow, without any real justification for it beyond just not wanting to do it. And she also spares that guy without any excuse for how it might somehow help her become Empress. She seems to be doing a very poor job of fooling herself, and I have doubts that she even has what it takes to climb the Tower as she is now; she's already pulling her punches.

At the very least, I feel like we can confidently say that Catherine's exact plan for Akua won't happen. By explicitly revealing her plan to the reader, she basically guaranteed it won't work out that way – her successful plans are almost always hidden, or at least not fully revealed to that extent.

Frivolous

Zach: Yes, agreed. Akua has changed so much compared to how she was as Diabolist, and even compared to how she was before she left Catherine.

Look at how she tells Nim the truth about her situation and about the pattern of three. Look at how she called Nim a fool twice.

Past Akua was always smooth and sophisticated with her peers and superiors. She didn't reveal secrets unless it was to her advantage, unless she was paid to do so, or unless it hurt the other person in some way.

This Akua is raw, and her educating Nim here and her calling Nim a fool has a lot of frustration behind it. Her motive isn't to put Nim down but to illuminate her. Her motive seems to be at least in part for Nim's own good.

Liliet

Agreed on p much every part of this.

Xinci

Hm, so I thought Ranger had failed in her teaching due to being inexperienced with having a group of people have compatible cooperative frameworks but it was more multifaceted than that. She induced their competition on purpose so as to specialize them as singular generalist. Due to her experience she is more used to anti-social qualities that allow an entity to maintain itself long term. Basically she went for the "Evil stays" route since she has overall had more of a understanding of it, rather than "Good compounds". A flaw, since it may have made them weaker, in ways that just led to them dying in other places (like Hunter joining up with a band and dying, possibly due to inexperience with such).

Also surprised that she was actually sorry about the bit at Arcadia, since I had thought given how her aspects seem to have her under a kind of hyperfocused state that she was being pretty restrained while basically building herself up to hunt the Summer Queen.

The portrayal of Akua's own lies and overview of why Malicia won't stop is quite nice. As is Nim noting down how the Legions of Terror are to serve institution wise.

Liliet

She's sorry about almost upsetting Amadeus more than she meant to -_-

'Ladi Williams

Could someone point me towards the chapter where she had "the talk" with Cat?

Thanks

Frivolous

'Ladi Williams: Close.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/18/chapter-32-close/>

Liliet

Book 3 Chapter "Close"

caoimhinh

I think another factor might be that she purposefully made them individualistic so that they would NOT become a Band of Five. So that they would grow strong and be hopefully safe on their own, but never rally together against her.

Hye is a centuries-old immortal warrior who wanders in solitude pursuing her own thrill, if she raises people, it won't be teaching them the joys of living in society, relying on others, nor about the advantages of teamwork.

Zach

She's only sorry because it upset Amadeus.

Catherine is basically right about Ranger, though I think the reasons she hates Ranger probably apply to her own circle more than she'd be comfortable admitting. Catherine and Vivienne are basically the only members of the Woe who give a shit about murdering random people (and even Catherine was a huge hypocrite about it earlier in her career, like when she threw Callow into civil war for personal advancement). Similar to Ranger only apologizing because she misunderstood how important Catherine is to Amadeus, the same applies to stuff like the Woe reining in their own worst behaviors just out of respect for Catherine (early on I'm pretty sure I remember Archer literally just murdering people to steal their alcohol, lol). To be fair Archer, has actually genuinely changed with time, and the same might be true for current Masego; they both grew up with terrible influences.

Liliet

Masego does want to do good for people in general where he can, he just fails to see how murdering people who annoy him is contradictory to that. It's not like it's mass murder.

Indrani murdering someone to steal their alcohol was actually from book 5, and made me go 0.0 okayyyy, too.

Hakram is actually someone who supports Catherine's principles, I think. He did stop her from killing a bunch of people that one time. "We were better than this, when we started".

superkeaton

Oh Akua. What a creature you are.

dadycool

Cat can utterly dominate fully developed Ruling Named, with neither an Aspect, Name, or even an idea what the Name she's developing could be. And it's terrifying. To shut down an entire aspect of an old Dread Empress for a significant amount of time? Malicia isn't scared enough.

Shaerick 68

I hope that by the end of this she will be.

pirateddesigns

Nah, she won't be scared.

She'll be dead.

Casey Glick

She will have her name stripped from her, and return to being Alaya. She is Dread Empress now, no longer Alaya, and this can be restored. Princess rescued from the Tower

Death Knight

Hahahaha, Gods the IRONY if Cat uses that Story to defeat Malicia 🤡🤡🤡

flashburn283

It's an upbringing thing, she legitimately believes she can hurt Cat enough to make her sue for peace, then help out and all will be forgiven.

Cat is going to crush her, potentially without a name.

jamesc9

I wonder if Cat can be permanently non-named with this level of story power.

It would be unprecedented, but pretty much this whole thing is.

Juff

Typo Thread:

theory acquaintance > their acquaintance to be exception > to be an exception no longer assembled > no longer assemble Crafter that much > Crafter with that much I'd been painfully > It'd been painfully out vanity > out of vanity Or believe the > Or believed the only she had > had only she it must be looked > it had to be looked salon tea > salon, tea mines made one > mines made him one as pointed lesson > as a pointed lesson made to steep > made too steep Should weather > She would weather had made spawned > had spawned a kept a > kept a

This what who > This was who said mocked > said, mocking

Frivolous

Hah, I was right. Catherine really did neuter Malicia.
Temporarily anyway.

Malicia's thoughts were ambiguous about whether she could still Speak. Speaking isn't solidly linked to Rule, because Catherine and Amadeus both could Speak and they didn't have Rule.

Finally another of Malicia's aspects. Connect, a very political aspect. I suspect all her aspects are like that, dedicated to politics. How boring.

Akua's analysis of Malicia's character was interesting and probably correct.

I believe that Catherine isn't at all like that, is she? She isn't afraid of conflict or of disagreements. She enjoys chaos and she's not a control freak.

For instance, she let Scribe live and recruited her when a shrewder person would have killed her.

That's one way Catherin exceeds Malicia.

I really like that Akua showed mercy to Kendi Akaze. It means Catherine's scheme for her is working. She's really becoming Good. An Evil person, or even a rationally cautious person, would have killed him.

Two dozen snakes

Cat is absolutely a control freak actually. The difference between her and Alaya is that for both, the need for control was shaped by their experiences in childhood: Cat's need for control stems from watching Mazus and his ilk plunder Callow's cities out of sheer greed. It was an impersonal, abstract thing, the need to be in control so that the mazuses of the world won't be. So in a situation where giving up control is likely to get her what she wants, she is able to do it. Case in point, her alliance with the sisters.

Alaya on the other hand was a young woman who was brutally kidnapped to be the sex slave of a mad emperor. Her father was nailed to the walls of their tavern. Her need for control is very much personal, it's about making sure no Nefarious could ever do that to her again. Alaya needs to be in control because that's the only way for her to feel safe. That's why abdication and exile are simply non-starters for her. She can't not be in control, that need is the core of who she is

Zach

This is basically what I was going to post. Catherine even admits at one point that, even though she says "I'll give up power the moment I can!", she's actually more reluctant to do so than she lets on. Her alliance with Sve Noc was basically a pivotal moment where she at least acknowledged that this tendency was working against her, but it's still a part of her personality that she has to actively account for.

Hune also notices it way back when Catherine tried to "have a talk" with her. Catherine feels (or at least felt – Catherine has matured a lot over the series) an obsessive need to have a deep personal relationship with the people under her command and is uncomfortable with that not being the case (because there's a lack of control with all your generals not having deep personal loyalty towards you).

Liliet

Yeah, the thing is that Catherine unlike Malicia does at least try to keep this in check -_-

ninegardens

Ohhhh boy.

Malicia's new aspect.

... its taken her THIS long to get the aspect apparently.

And....

I can't help but think that this aspect is going to kill her.

It's like a shitty Thinker power. It gives insight, but given its been granted by the Gods Below, its just a compass that is going to lead to her own destruction.

And at the same time, with Cat coming in fast, she feels like she "can't" back down. Hasn't even considered the possibility of exile, of running away....

I do like that Nim is apparently the character who most GETS Amadeaous. Who actually seems to understand him, and what he's doing, and not doing. Had not expected that, but seeing Nim as ... true believer... that's nice.

And at the same time, Akua's perfect understanding of Malicia... very cool.

Frivolous

ninegardens: I don't believe that Malicia's aspect of Connect only manifested now. That seems impossible. She's been Dread Empress for 40+ years. She should have received all 3 aspects a long time ago.

I think the verb 'bloom' here only meant that the aspect operated instead of failed. Note these sentences:

– There was something to Connect those names even if she did not yet understand it. Her aspect had never failed her before, even though the leaps of intuition it sometimes leant her were the ficklest part of the boons it granted. –

'Never failed her before' implies she's had it a while.

Darkening

She's definitely had it for ages, she described something similar in the chapter where she was in her fancy office that looks like it's outside and she had pictures of significant people pinned up on the invisible walls.

Liliet

> Malicia's new aspect.

>... its taken her THIS long to get the aspect apparently.

It's not new, we're only just now learning about it.

ninegardens

Hmmm... I was perhaps reading too much into the quote: "Behind closed doors, alone, Alaya would admit that the aspect's blooming was a deep relief", assuming she was talking about Connect blooming.

In that case, if she's had it for ages, I would posit that this aspect may be one of the things driving her paranoia. Hell- practically the definition of paranoia is seeing connections that aren't there.

How much of her fear of Black, of her set up of Liesse 2nd etc was brought about by her leaning too heavily on an aspect which gives "Accurate" information... but may also tend towards creating self fulfilling prophecies?

caoimhinh

Yeah, she was relieved that Connect activated, since Rule is out of question for now. She was afraid that Catherine's use of authority over her had been a blow to her very Name.

And yeah, Connect seems like the kind of thing that would set all kinds of alarms on Malicia (who is already a control freak) as it would show her all of the connections Amadeus had made and how deep his influence ran, how many people were devoted and loyal to him instead of to her.

Sykomantis

Now let's see if Nim can get out of the Pattern as well as Catherine did with Tariq

boballab

I doubt it. I got a feeling the draw is coming up soon followed by Nim making the classic Black Knight blunder of attacking an out numbered opponent on a hill that has a hero on it. Nim has never studied like Amadeus did in how not to get story locked or has a group with the ability to think outside of the box on countering a Pattern of 3 that Cat has. Nim will blunder into all the classic mistakes because she doesn't know better and as she more embraces the Name and Role it will become harder to avoid.

Zach

I don't think it will come to this. It's strongly implied that, in the end, Nim is taking what Akua said seriously. She will likely at least be aware of the Pattern of Three.

boballab

She might be aware of it but she won't know enough to stay away from it. If she is anywhere near the next battle between her forces and Cat, creation will make sure that Squire and her confront each other. The only way to avoid it would be to go nowhere near the Callowan forces and we know Malicia won't stand for that.

Casey Glick

Nim can also surrender, unconditionally. If that isn't a Villain Attacks When Hero is Off Guard, then it probably sticks.

Shveiran

She sure can. Pattern would be broken.

On the other hand, then she has surrendered.

Liliet

Akua will probably help Nim out of the worst of it. She seemed invested in Nim's continued wellbeing, if only, I imagine, for the reason that Nim is someone both willing to talk to her and not a highborn schemer.

Cold Cyberia

Nim didn't know about the pattern of three? That's much worse than I anticipated.

It's sad that Akua's reading of Malicia is mostly correct now. We even see this in her plan for the hellgates. I'm guessing having them open for seven days is a feature to prevent Procer from growing too strong rather than a sorcerous requirement .

Whether she was always like that or if she had a proper fall is an interesting question. One could interpret her desire to dismantle the power of High Lords and destroy the Age of Wonders as centralising power in the arena of politics, of which she was a master.

Next chapter: South I? Could check up on Mercantis and Basilia. Maybe see what Ashur is up to?

Darkening

Eh. Even warlock, an expert on the hells could only redirect the portal to a different part of a different hell, not close it. There's a price to everything, and even closing it to that degree is pretty incredible.

That Other Guy

Another great chapter. Thanks, EE.

Compounding on the previous Warlock's resolution to the permagate issue, how about redirecting each portal directly into the next, creating a kind of infinite call forwarding hell? That'd take anyone/thing ignorant enough to use the gateways out of commission indefinitely.

There would be a slight chance that this arrangement would just be kicking the can down the road a bit, as eventually the amount of magical energy required to keep the portals stable would grow immeasurably due to all of the traffic ricocheting through the aether.

The feedback causes the weakest one to detonate catastrophically, triggering mass annihilation of the rest.

The trick is to contain the energy of this calamity in the hells (because who really cares what happens on that side of the tracks), otherwise the outcome for 82.7% of Caledonia would be reasonably poor, for a broad definition of "poor", and a broader definition of "reasonably".

Darkening

Just need to open another greater rift facing each greater rift a millimeter away lol. Sure, some stuff might leak out, but cat can open a gate to a volcano or something and bury them in lava until they're buried under a huge pile of volcanic stone and it'll probably be fine. Course, without a pile of souls to harvest for power recreating the liesse gamemaker would be difficult. But I'm sure praes has options.

Liliet

I think the seven days opening is a hard requirement, not a security feature. Closing them permanently is impossible, this is more like... draining water through a single pipe. You still need the pipe.

Two dozen snakes

Akua can read Malicia so well because she is her mirror. For both of them, the heart of their ambition was the need to be in control, as a self-defense mechanism. If I am in control, nobody can hurt me. Nobody can order me to kill my sister, or kidnap me and rape me. Everything else is gilding, a bonus of sorts

At the end of the day, their ambitions were nothing more than a desire for safety

The empire really tends to do a number on its people. That's Evil for you i guess

MephInBlack

Wild prediction: Amadeus destroys the Tower and Cat is upset because that is a new fire alight instead of the profitable new regime she intended for Praes. So he teaches her a new lesson about some old monsters like the Tower just needing to be put down, in order for Creation to move on. And his allusion is about the Dead King, but the joke is on him because that's exactly the opening Cat waited for. So she render him silent and possibly unseen and force him to watch as she confronts the Ranger on her pupils' behalf. Hye strikes at Cat, maybe assuming Cat having killed Amadeus for tearing down the Tower, and Cat then builds up a story about the orphan child and the wicked stepmother. We have been shown that Hye is not a skilled storyteller (the way Amadeus, Tariq and the Wandering Bard are I mean) and so get herself killed on that story. Bonus point if Cat develops the aspect Outgrow for matching with Learn, Master and Transcend.

Captain Amazing

I suspected at the last East interlude but I think this confirms it. Akua Sahelian is becoming a Hero of Contrition. Honestly, holy shit. I think all those italic lines is the forming Name whispering in her ear and they're asking her about the consequences of her actions and reminding her about her conscience. Her sparing that vengeance guy mirrors with Catherine killing the goblin back at the War College. She's siding with the "justice" faction over the "more" faction. Catherine wanted her to repent and Creation is taking it literally.

sengachi

Oh shit, if we come full circle from William's arc like that, that would be amazing.

Sinead

I still hope it's Compassion rather than Contrition. The champions of Choirs end up seeing people through that lens. Contrition has no issue using people, since in Contrition's eyes, every mortal is fatally flawed and irredeemable and should be purged (otherwise, why would it break an entire city down to the children to turn into a suicidal army?)

Compassion is an acknowledgement that the harm that Akua has done is terrible and unforgivable, but that one can still work to do Good to not balance the scales but for the sake of doing Good.

Granted, I also wonder if instead of having Malicia killed, she get's her Name broken and is bound under ward by Akua like Cat has done for Akua. Malicia is a lot like Sarauman from Lord of the Rings, and I always found his death horribly tragic.

iamwaitingtocompile

I agree that there's pretty good chances she realizes how much she hates what she's become, and wanders into what's left of Lisse to die. Then, after seven days and seven nights, she walks out again, the Penitent's Blade in hand and a chior whispering in her ear, and she heads out to Keter to fulfil Cat's plan perfectly.

Frivolous

Note that Malicia referred to Catherine as a monster in this chapter.

Let me repeat that: Malicia referred to Catherine as a monster. Malicia, who used mind control on her own troops and used Still Water on people. Malicia, who allied herself with the Dead King.

I'm not sure if that shows Malicia's horror and terror of Catherine or a stunning lack of self-awareness.

sutortyrannus

Both? Both is good.

Steven Silver

I think "monster" is more derogatory coming from Malicia. Yeah, she knows Cat is strong, but every one of the Praesi has a certain disdain for the "uncivilized" rest of the world. Cat, to Malicia, is violent, mean, and unmannered. She doesn't call Cat a "terrifying beast," Malicia calls Cat a "little monster," yeah?

Frivolous

Steven Silver: I suppose it's possible, but I think little in this case denotes merely Catherine's lack of height rather than her youth or anything else.

For that reason, I believe the word monster is the important word in that description.

In comparison, Malicia refers to Ranger of all people as merely "that rabid dog in Refuge" in Interlude: Dreadful. Malicia doesn't seem very afraid of Ranger or Scribe, though she and we have reason to know they are very very dangerous.

Yet she's afraid of Catherine. At least, I believe monster is a stronger term than that rabid dog, yes?

shikkarasu

Agreed. I think she's using 'monster' in the same sense that both Beowulf and Grendel's Mother were 'monstrous.' It's not a qualitative statement, but an acknowledgement of what they can do and what would be necessary to put them down.

This isn't the first time that EE has used 'monster' to refer to someone simply being in on Ranger/Dead King/Saint's level, either.

boballab

I think she does that because she can't predict what Cat will do. Malicia is a plotter that has studied people and from that predict what they will do via their motivations. However with Cat she doesn't understand her motivations because they are things that Malicia could never think herself. While both started out with no power and both ended up with it, Malicia wanted the power for herself while Cat just wanted enough to help her people and that notion does not compute for a Praesi plotter like Malicia. That is why at every turn she is surprised by what Cat does and the fact it works. Since Cat doesn't react like all the other "players" which are people to Malicia she has to be something else...a monster something you can't know what it is thinking.

Tuvarkz

Aqua cast bloody Detect Alignment already beacuse you certainly aren't pinging Evil anymore.

sidehammer

nooooooooooooo! i've just caught up! what am i supposed to do now?? how can u guys do this, read week to week?? this will be torture!

and i'm still really angry about zombie the third! DX anyway, i've caught up and so can now participate. is there a discord for us at all? a subreddit? i've been to the wiki, it... could use some tending.

so what are the theories on what cat's new Name is going to be?

Daniel E

Best horse, the goodest of girls. I too remain salty about how arbitrarily she was off'd. My only consolation is that there remains a non-zero chance she will be reincarnated with Spring or Autumn.

sidehammer

oooh! i hadn't thought of that! i was playing with the idea that maybe her remains could be Inscribed somehow, but i like ur idea a lot more!

For real, though? Those little moments with Zombie were a real balm for the soul for Cat, in my opinion. With Robber gone, Cat's running dangerously close to losing all the sparks of light in her life. I honestly can't see anything happening to Mesego, he's too great a literary tool for explaining the magic system, but I'm not so sure about Indrani. Too many emotional wellbeings ride on her safety that it just primes her as a target. Less so for Vivi, but it would still be a tremendous blow. Hakram I think has taken about as much abuse as he's going to take, yet the distance that now exists between Cat and her Adjutant is already tragic—I hope it can be mended. Amadeus is too mysterious at present to really count as something that brings her joy, in my opinion, though I'll say torturing Abigail won't be going away, so there's always that, lol. Cordelia would be a blow, but more politically, whether she dies or uses the weapon, and Hanno has already shut himself off from her. I think Akua will find her way back sooner rather than later, and nothing says Cat can't drop by the Ways for a quickie every now and then once she's taken up Twilight. It's Arthur I'm worrying about, I think. I know with Hanno moving toward a new Name it's looking like Arthur will be the new White Knight, but I'm hoping for some kind of Gray Knight, if I'm honest. I know being a mentor is a great way to get killed, but Cat needs something to baby, damnit.

jamesc9

How would she do with a puppy?

Liliet

<https://discord.gg/UMzAub69>

This is an invite to the discord's wiki channel :3

<https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/>

This is the subreddit link!

Welcome to the fandom.

Jefepato

I find it amusing that Nim's only real chance of getting out of this alive is by listening to this callous manipulator blatantly trying to tug at her puppet strings and not, uh, the other one.

Mengha

I have to say it, since I didn't see anyone else do so.

Malicia's thoughts at the end of her section there: "She'd wheather this storm and emerge from it TRIUMPHANT..."

It's these tiny little details that I sometimes wonder if they're a coincidence, but they're placed so deliberately, and the show up so often I know that they're all carefully crafted.

Brilliant.

Frivolous

Mengha: I think it's probably a coincidence. Triumphant is a common word in that context.

But that may just be me thinking Triumphant would be the sekret weapon unleashed by the Dead King to destroy the Alliance army at the Battle of Hainaut, and sadly that didn't happen.

Liliet

Yeah, I think it shows that she's going ever further off the deep end.

jtebb2

Anyone else want a prequel of this series chronicling the rise and fall of Triumphant?

I think it would be fun.

Jtebb2

So, I've finally caught up after 3 months. This is probably the most fascinating web serial I have ever encountered.

To address this chapter in particular:

First, I'm truly disappointed in Alaya (as a person, as a character she's amazing), she had so much potential and now she's lost everything that set her apart. Now she's just another cackling lunatic in the tower waiting for the dagger in her back or the hero's sword.

Second, I think I'm coming to hate Cat just a bit for what she's done to Akua, for what she wants to do. She should have given in in the cave, cast aside this ridiculous obsession with atoning for what in all honesty truly was not that big of a deal in the grand scheme of things. 100,000 dead, forgive me for being crass but... so what? How many died in the Liesse Rebellion because Cat let William go? How many died in the wars she's waged to achieve her objectives? How many would have died had her bid with the dead king succeeded over Malicia's? How many have died to Black and Ranger that she feels no compulsion to avenge? Akua has redeemed herself 5 times over at this point, but Cat deliberately drove her into treason and sabotaged the Praesi campaign for this moronic long price business. I truly will not be happy if someone at some point doesn't slap the shit out of her and point out the stupidity here.

jamesc9

Hmmm...

You don't get to see the counter-factual, and I don't know who Malacia's second choice for Warlock was.

Chapter 16: Anchor

"To suffer defeat is not to be defeated. One is an occurrence, the other a state of mind."

– Dread Empress Sanguinara, the Shrewd

It was as if our armies had played a round of musical chairs.

The Loyalist Legions had been camped at the tip of Moule Hills, south of us, but they'd burned that camp to force us out of our camp in Kala Hills. Then we'd gone around those same hills and stolen a march south of them, taking Kala Fortress and setting up over their supply lines. The final bit of surprise, though, had been when Marshal Nim had marched her army south expel us from our new position and instead been forced to retreat north: Sepulchral's vanguard had popped up atop Moule Hills, threatening to flank her if she gave battle. So now here we were, the three of us staring at each other as the afternoon sun pounded down on our helmeted heads.

The vanguard set up shop at Nim's old camp in Moule Hills, in what I could only call a fit of irony. Not without paying for the nice campsite and half-filled dry moat, though, going by the detonations and screams that'd followed the rebel forces moving there. Looked like I'd been right to think that the Black Knight had trapped the area with goblin munitions before leaving it. We were keeping an eye on both the other armies in the region, scouts out and about, but not going on the offensive. The unexpected arrival of Sepulchral's three thousand had bought us time and we intended to use it to the fullest.

See, even after having outmanoeuvred the Loyalist Legions none of us thought it was anything but stupidity to try to go and attack them in their – formerly our – fortified camp in northern Kala Hills. And given the disparity in our numbers and the fact we'd taken some bruising losses, none of us were particularly eager to face Marshal Nim in a fair pitched battle either. The chances were high that even if we won the costs would make it a strategic defeat. If Juniper had been herself I might have risked it, but as she was... The Hellhound was still largely silent during the war councils she was supposed to be leading.

On the other hand, we couldn't just let the Black Knight slap us out of our superior position either. We could cut off her supply lines from here and ensure we wouldn't run out of water. So Sapper-General Pickler had given us our solution.

"We raise a wall," she said, leaning over the map. "Between Moule Hills and Kala Hills, at the narrowest part of the valley."

And so while half our army had gone in the rest to shade, the rest had spread out across the valley. Sappers and regulars were digging trenches, going from east to west, while palisades were being raised. Our main camp was still next to Kala Fortress, where we could use the wells and the walls, but out in the valley two makeshift forts were already under construction behind the trench line. The Legions hadn't taken that lying down, of course. The auxiliary cavalry had come out in force the moment it'd become clear what we were doing, but we'd been waiting and ready. It'd not been lightly armed Levantines facing down the riders, this time, but a proper shield wall with crossbowmen behind it.

After a hard reminder of the difference in range and power between javelins and standard-issue Legion crossbows, the enemy horse had beaten a retreat. They kept harassing us all afternoon, though, even as the Loyalist Legions mounted their answer to our new stratagem. I was standing next to Pickler as it began to play out, sighing.

"We should have seen that coming, really," I admitted.

She spat to the side.

"They'll get their fortifications up faster than we will ours," Pickler warned. "We're outmatched in both sappers and labour."

In answer to our containment of them with a trench and wall, the Legions of Terror had begun building their own to our north. Not even that far, damnably enough. About two hundred feet beyond our furthest crossbow range, with their cavalry waiting out in the valley just in case we got foolish enough to try a skirmishing war. Pickler was right, I grimly thought, as she tended to be when it came to sapper's work. I could already see the gap between the capacity of our armies in action: the Legions had begun working three hours after us yet already they'd caught up to two thirds of our trench length.

"Theirs are more vulnerable," I noted. "They still have Sepulchral's three thousand on the wrong side of the walls."

Which might actually be part of the plan, I thought. The Black Knight would either bait them down from the hills in an ill-advised attack or fortify around them until they became irrelevant. That might explain why she wasn't being more aggressive in trying to get us off her supply lines. She wasn't digging in to stay so much as putting up defences to prevent being flanked before she hammered away at us. From her point of view, this battle would be settled long before her stores of food were at any risk of running low.

"I can't speak to that," Pickler shrugged. "You know my interest in tactics is limited. What I can tell you, though, is that we'll need our best skirmishers in Kala Hills tomorrow."

I had to crane my neck more than I wanted to so I could have a look at her. She was standing on the side of my missing eye. I felt my fingers clench. It was always the little things that got to me.

"Why's that?" I frowned.

"We don't have enough stakes to make a wall the length of the entire valley," she said. "And neither do the Legions. So we're going to have to cut wood, Catherine, and the only place in the region that has any in the quantity needed-"

"- is Kala Hills," I finished.

Plenty of brushlands in those rocky hills, some proper trees too. With this having turned into a war of entrenchments, those bushes and trees had just become as precious a commodity as water. We'd begin by cutting the wood closest to our camps, of course, but then they'd need to go south and we would need to go north. Closer to each other.

"The moment we both run out of sudes, the easiest way to slow the other side from building up is to harass the soldiers cutting wood," I said, rubbing at the bridge of my nose. "Shit. That's going to get messy."

"That's a word for it," Pickler snorted.

She seemed amused, but her face suddenly stilled. She looked away, biting at the inside of her cheek. A long moment passed, a silence I did not dare to break. I knew whose memory had struck her like a punch in the gut.

"He would have loved it," Pickler finally said. "The mess. The chaos."

"The danger," I ruefully said.

She nodded, then returned to silence. Honest emotion was not something that came easy to goblins, so I let her choose her words at her own pace without sticking my foot in it.

"After Ratface died," Pickler said, "I thought we were done losing them. That we'd paid our due to the Gobbler, that the rest of us would make it."

"Nauk," I quietly said.

"He was gone long before they killed him," she said, shaking her head. "The Warlock... didn't bring much of him back. Not enough for it to count."

I did not disagree, keeping my shame to myself. I'd thought, once upon a time, that Night might have mended that. These days I was not so sure, but I had clutched that hope close in the early days of my return from the Everdark.

"Then they got Hune," Pickler continued. "That was..."

"I didn't think you two were close," I said.

"We weren't. She wasn't the kind that made friends. But she was one of us, Cat," the goblin quietly said.

Over the years, somewhere along the line the veil that'd once separated the Rat Company cadets from the Fifteenth had fallen. There just weren't enough of us left for the distinction to matter. With every fresh war I dragged us into, every hard stand, another body had dropped. We were a dying breed, those few that'd been in it from the start.

"She was," I acknowledged.

Hune had not been my friend and I had never trusted her entirely. But she had been one of us anyway, in that intangible way they only ever quite became real when it started feeling like loss.

"And somehow I still didn't see it coming when Robber died," Pickler said, tone bitter. "He used to go around telling us he was invincible, that he just couldn't seem to croak-"

My throat tightened and she stopped herself, looking at the men raising walls in the distance.

"I guess I believed him a little, even when I rolled my eyes. I thought that even if we all died, Catherine, he'd be the last one to bite it," she said. "Somehow. It just never felt real that he could be... gone."

"Sometimes I still feel like he'll pop out from behind a stone," I admitted. "Grinning, making fun of us for having gone soft."

"But he won't," Pickler harshly said. "He won't. And there's so many things with him I left half done, because I always thought there'd be more time. After this battle, that plan, that book. I waited until the Gobbler took him because I was too... lazy to talk to him."

"We always think we could have done more, when people die," I said. "Especially people we loved. It's not fair to either them or us."

"What does fair ever matter?" Pickler tiredly said. "'It won't fix a thing. It's not wood and steel, I can't take out what's broken and make good again. Instead what I have is regrets and a letter I'm too afraid to open."

I breathed in sharply. Hakram had told me Robber had left her a letter, but I'd not known she had yet to read it.

"Why?"

"I know what's in it," Pickler said, then snorted. "Or maybe I don't. I don't know which scares me more."

Robber had loved her, once. When we'd been little more than children he and Nauk had both courted her attentions and fancied each other rivals, not that anything ever came of it save bickering. She'd liked the attention, but she'd never been all that interested in romance. Besides, goblins thought of love differently than humans. It didn't mean the same things, didn't carry the same expectations even when it was returned.

"Did you love him?" I quietly asked.

Hesitation.

"No," Pickler replied.

Then she chuckled bitterly.

"Maybe," she admitted. "It was... messy. I thought he'd want more than I wanted to give, so I never let him ask."

I breathed out, hand itching for my pipe. I restrained myself.

"I think you did," I murmured. "At least a little."

Her shoulders tightened.

"After the war," Pickler finally said, "I wanted us to go to the same place."

It was as close to admitting affection as she would ever get, I thought.

"I expect we all will, Pickler," I softly said. "He's just gone on ahead one more time."

She laughed, a little grimly but genuinely. Goblin humour tended to run even darker than my people's. There was a reason they got on so well with Lycaonese, whose gallows humour was black enough even Callowans balked at it.

"It feels like unfinished business," Pickler eventually said. "That's all. And I don't know how to finish it."

Sometimes you don't, I thought. You keep walking with that weight on your back, knowing one day you'll buckle. My instinct was to lay a hand on her shoulder in comfort, but it would be no such thing to a goblin. Instead I gave her the sole courtesy I had to offer: work to disappear into.

"Prepare our builders for skirmish," I said. "Draw on our reserves for regulars if you need to."

"You're going to hiss at the snake?" Pickler asked, sounding surprised.

Poke at the bear, I decided, only for the Grey Eyries. It always surprised me that even after all these years there were still expressions from east of the Wasaliti I'd never heard. In Lower Miezan, anyway.

"Something like that," I said. "I figure that we've got one asset the Legions have no answer to, so it's about time to use it."

I wasn't going to be sending skirmishers out to fight theirs in the space between our trenches, I wasn't that much of a fool. They had crossbow companies waiting for that mistake, same as us, and my men were a lot more tired than Nim's anyway. The Army of Callow had marched all night and not had a full eight hours of sleep since, it was on the ragged edge. Instead I sent for two people: Archer and the Silver Huntress. My instructions were straightforward.

"You see these people?" I asked, pointing north.

The two of them eyed the enemy legionaries and sappers raising a wall and digging a trench, a swarm of ants just outside the range of our crossbows.

"Sure," Archer shrugged.

"I do," the Silver Huntress gravely replied.

"You've got bows and I want corpses," I bluntly said. "Have at it."

That got a delighted laugh out of Indrani and a measuring look out of Alexis. Neither of them bothered to use the elaborate bows they'd received as gifts from the Lady of the Lake, instead stringing good yew longbows from Daoine after ensuring they were well provisioned with arrows.

And then, easy as breathing, they began taking lives.

The enemy were maybe seventeen hundred feet away, well out the range of even the longbowmen of the Watch. But these two were Named, sharpened to a razor's edge in the greatest war of our time, and so they began killing their way through the enemy as if were not impossible. Archer went for officers, Huntress for the sappers. It took a while before the enemy even realized what was happening: they scrambled about looking for skirmishers that weren't there, at first. And even when they did realize, the response was slow. Archer had killed the people who should be shouting orders. Within half an hour the regulars were in a full testudo and sappers were either huddling in their trench or gone.

At the hour's turn the sappers came back having assembled rough mantlets, wooden walls on wheels they could bring forward and take cover behind. It was a mixed success: the two archer Named first bled the regulars that broke cover to put them in place and then ignored them entirely, curving their arrows to fall down from above. Those shots weren't anywhere as lethal, but they still disrupted the sappers trying to get back to work. It was only half an hour after that the situation came to a close, when mage lines were sent out to raise shield spells around the sappers to protect them entirely. In the distance I recognize the woman who led them. Tall, dark of hair and with strange golden eyes. Akua looked our way as well, but nothing was spoken.

It was still too early.

"We could have at the mages," the Silver Huntress said. "If we start using our proper bows and our stock of mage-killing arrows."

I shook my head. I might have considered it if they were mfuasa and nobles, but these were Legion mages. We did not have enough mage-killer arrows for this to be a good trade.

"Better to let them win now," I said. "Let them feel safe and get sloppy."

Indrani eyed me amusedly.

"You're sending us back after nightfall," she said.

My smile was cold.

"Get some rest, you two," I said. "You have a long night ahead of you."

And I needed to get back to camp. The fortifications were a good measure to take, Pickler had been right to suggest them, but they weren't a plan.

If we were going to win this, we needed one of those.

—

Vivienne wasn't alone in her tent when I went to see her. I'd been about to enter anyway when I overheard the voice of who she was speaking with. The Laure drawl wasn't rare in my army, but I knew the timbre of that voice too. I was curious enough about what had brought the Squire to her that I decided to... actively overhear. It wasn't called eavesdropping when it was a queen that did it, there were laws about this stuff.

"-did a number on him," Vivienne was saying. "I know there are parts of Callow where he still has a good reputation, but they tend to be the ones that saw little of him."

"He was chosen by a Choir, I am told," Arthur hesitantly said. "Can that truly be a harmful thing?"

"Angels are a lot of things," Vivienne said. "Most of them are good. But do not ever, for a moment, believe them to be harmless. Even their kindness has teeth, and Contrition has little other than the teeth to offer."

"Yet you fought with him," the Squire said, voice daring her to deny it. "At his side."

"Some of the things we did back then were right," Vivienne said, tone gone quiet. "But some of the others... we weren't fighting the right battles, and not against the right people. Doing good's not always the same thing as doing Good."

"There's priests who would call that heresy," he said.

"Heard lot of that talk, when I was your age," Vivienne said, and I could hear the hard smile in her voice. "Heresy this, blasphemy that. What did the Praesi care? Wasn't priests whining that got the Empire to leave. Keep to Above of you want, there's nothing wrong with that. But like Jehan the Wise said, prayer and a sword work better than prayer alone."

A sentiment I could get behind. The sword part of it, anyway. Deciding I'd eavesdrop- actively overheard for long enough, I made my presence known by loudly approaching. Fuck, I thought as I entered the tent, but someone was going to have to teach the kid to hide his thoughts better. He looked like I'd just caught him with his hand in a honey pot, it was painfully obvious he thought he'd been doing something bad. I wasn't too worried about talk of the Lone Swordsman, myself. Contrition had been trying to hook the Squire from the start, but William was not a great angle for them to take. A lot of Callowans hadn't been fond of the man.

That tended to happen when you carved messages into people's foreheads, even when those people were Praesi.

"If you'd excuse me, Your Grace, Your Majesty," Arthur said, bowing.

I shrugged and Vivienne waved him away. She waited until he was gone from the tent to cock an eyebrow at me.

"So how much did you listen at?"

I put a hand over my heart, deeply wounded by the implication.

"How dare you," I gravely said, "and when you started talking about the way people remember William."

"The end, then," Vivienne said. "Kid's been dreaming, but they're all over the place."

I frowned.

"Still the broken sword?"

I'd broken the Penitent's Blade and good luck to anyone trying to – no, Catherine, that was a good way to get stabbed with pointed irony in a few years. Let it simply be said I had been thorough in dispersing the shards of the angel's feather.

"He has a whole array of them," Viv replied, shaking her head. "Different Squires. He does get the sword dreams, but I'd bet that's Contrition trying to nudge him down that road."

"Those nosy fuckers," I grunted. "They need to learn when to quit."

I wasn't above asking Zeze to look into the practicalities of a pointed lesson for those vultures when this was all over. Malicia and Amadeus had outlawed the Name of Chancellor, when she climbed the Tower, so maybe I should look into outlawing the Hashmallim getting their sticky fingers into any of my countrymen.

"He's not like William was," Vivienne frankly said. "Nowhere enough self-loathing. I imagine they'd like him on the throne instead of you or me, but he's a lot more interested in knighthood than crowns. That bodes well."

"He's still a wild card," I said. "Different Squire dreams means he's not settled, Viv. No telling what kind of a Knight Name he'll end up transitioning into."

It sounded a lot to me like the Heavens dangling shiny paths in front of their newest Callowan hero to find out what might stick. And there were some that I simply wouldn't be able to tolerate. Rebel Knight, for one, Eleanor Fairfax's old Name that'd popped up in Callowan history whenever a tyrant needed toppling. It irked me how much Name lore about the days of the Old Kingdom had been lost. I understood why my father had destroyed pretty much all he could – legacies were dangerous things when you'd destroyed the last iteration of them – but it still left me more knowledgeable in the ways of Praesi Named than those of my own kingdom.

Maybe it was for the best, I told myself. Using old tools and old means tended to lead to the same old ends.

"Lots of that going around," Vivienne admitted. "Yours is so close I can almost taste it, Cat. You're already starting to get the coincidences again – what were the odds of you stumbling into this talk?"

Low, practically speaking.

"I think it'll take shape when we settle the Tower," I admitted.

I'd know for sure if I started getting the reflexes again.

"You're not far either," I said. "Or he wouldn't have been having that talk with you in the first place."

She grimaced.

"I'm not sure what it is," Vivienne said. "And there's... something missing, I can't quite put it into words."

"You need something to take you over the top," I said, tone clinical. "You've got your Role and the will, but you need weight. A story that people will talk about."

That famous charge at the Battle of Hainaut had not been quite enough.

"I thought you might be angry," she admitted. "I know you wanted Callow to be ruled by someone without a Name."

I sighed.

"Those provisions of the Accords are essentially dead," I said. "And in the end it's not a theoretical candidate I'm entrusting that throne to, it's Vivienne Dartwick. I stand by that choice whether it comes with a Name attached or not."

Her eyes shone and I looked to the side.

"Thanks," Vivienne quietly said.

I cleared my throat uncomfortably.

"I did come for something," I said. "Your scheme in the Legions?"

"Won't work if it looks like we're losing," she replied. "I'm still looking into getting in contact. It's ready, I just need my foot in the door."

"Hurry it up," I asked. "I'm not sure we'll be getting a decisive battle before Sepulchral arrives. If the rest of her army arrives in time, I want our finger ready to pull the trigger."

"I'll see it done," she firmly replied.

I nodded. I was about to take my leave when I saw hesitation on her face.

"Viv?"

She brushed back an errant strand that'd fallen out of her braid. It still looked like a crown, her milkmaid's braid, even when she did not wear the silver circlet that'd become hers when I formally named her a princess of Callow. She bit her lip.

"The Name," Vivienne quietly said, "I do not know if it will be..."

She trailed off, hesitating again.

"I don't think it will be one of Below's," she said. "Cat, I know that-"

I limped forward a step, leaning over the desk, and even as her eyes widened in surprise I pressed a kiss against her forehead. She looked up, startled, as I drew back.

"I didn't name you my successor so you could keep making my mistakes," I said.

There was nothing more to say, as far as I was concerned, and so on those words I left her.

—

Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara still brewed what was probably my favourite tea in the world. Herbal Wasteland stuff, nothing like the horrid imported leaves that Hasenbach was so wild about, and I'd yet to ever dislike a mug she'd made me. Not that the pleasant taste made what we had to talk about any more pleasant.

"I've never seen her like this before," Aisha said. "In her first year at the College she had moments, before she found her footing, but this is different."

I grimaced.

"I didn't see it coming," I admitted. "I know Nim pulling one over us twice in a row had to be a shock, but we've had hard rides before. What makes this different?"

Aisha elegantly sipped at her tea, which was the polite Taghreb way of gathering one's thoughts without being uncouth.

"It has been coming for some time, I think," Aisha finally said. "Looking back now. But I am afraid that the tipping point would be you."

I froze in my seat a moment, taken aback.

"I thought I'd made it clear I still had full trust in her abilities," I slowly said.

"Yes," Aisha gently said. "Which made it sting all the more when she failed your trust by being defeated so starkly."

Fuck, I eloquently thought. Had I been turning the knife without even realizing it?

"She said things, after you left," I began, hesitant to continue.

"She's afraid it didn't all come back," Aisha murmured. "Yes, she has confided as much in me before."

"The Grey Pilgrim himself said she was all there," I told her. "It wrecked her body to extract the commands, the hooks were deep, but the weakness is purely physical."

"You trusted the man, which weighs on the scales, but not all of us are eager to take the word of the Peregrine for anything at all," she replied. "It is doubts, Catherine. She believes she was either lessened by Malicia's spells or never on even footing with the Empire's marshal, and cannot believe in either without loathing."

Aisha sighed and then, for one of the few times in all the years I'd known her, slumped into her seat.

"And she loathes the indecision too," she continued, "which makes even standing still a defeat. It is... tangled, Catherine. And perhaps this was a long time coming. We all rose swiftly under you. Some might say too quickly."

I sipped at my tea.

"I'm not one of those people," I said. "And unless someone else has taken to wearing my crown, that's the only trust in need of keeping."

She met my eye, then slowly nodded. Aisha had always been hard to read, her lovely heart-shaped face ever showing anything she did not want it to.

"I am proud, you know," Aisha quietly said. "Of the army we built, all of us. The kingdom. It was bitter and often thankless work, Catherine, but you did not pretend otherwise when you asked us to follow you. And looking at all we have done, even after all it cost us, I am deeply proud."

She slid a finger around the rim of her cup.

"I would not let that legacy bury us," Aisha said. "Juniper... if she fails you here, it will haunt her to her grave."

"I don't know how to make her eager for the fight again," I admitted.

I'd never had to, before. Never learned to.

"I might," she said. "I looked through her papers as she slept."

My eye narrowed but I did not interrupt.

"She has been sketching out theories," Aisha said. "And one stood out. I would have us show her, Catherine, that she is not blind and lost."

"I'm listening," I said.

And we planned, the two of us, how to follow the plan my Marshal hadn't given me.

—

For a bit, it looked like we'd accidentally started a night battle.

Archer and Huntress had come out to reap another harvest of lives, but when they began shooting at the legionaries sleeping in forts exactly like those we'd raised — it was the same damned pattern both sides used — it looked like we'd kicked a hornet's nest. Not only did goblins and regulars come out in force, but so did a large force we hadn't anticipated. The entire Eighth Legion had left the camp in Kala Hills and begun marching towards the trenches. Our watches and horns did their job properly, calling for a brisk assembly, but it was clear that we'd not get to our fortifications in force before the enemy did. Not that it mattered, I thought, because the Eighth wasn't actually there to attack us. Juniper had believed it would be two legions, but she'd written that a delaying force at least one strong would march our way.

Now there were two more of her predictions left to come true.

The first came true within a quarter bell. In perfect marching order, the Eleventh and Fourteenth Legion crossed the valley to begin an assault on the camp in Moule Hills where Sepulchral's vanguard was now beginning to wake in a panic. Eight thousand legionaries marching against the three thousand mixed force of household troops and cavalry. If the Black Knight closed in before they were ready, and she would, it would be a slaughter. I was rather proud of how quickly the Army of Callow began gathering in the valley facing the Legions. By the time the Eighth finished living up to their cognomen of Trailblazers and took over the Legion fortifications facing ours, our own vanguard of three thousand was on its way to our side of the trenches.

"I think we took them by surprise with the harassment by Archer and Huntress," I mused. "At a guess, because of the dark they thought it was an attack on their position."

"Then why did the Eighth march out so quickly?" Vivienne asked with a frown.

"Dedicated response force," I said. "Nim had them waiting for something like this. Which is why there's only one other legion marching to reinforce them."

I pointed in the distance, where the Thirteenth was marching to bolster the Eighth in their defensive position. The Black Knight's own legion, the Seventh, was staying back. Serving as a reserve, most likely.

"And now the Legions gamble on our being too slow to stop them from wiping out the Askum troops," Vivienne muttered. "Isn't Marshal Nim afraid we'll overwhelm the eight thousand she's putting in our way? Sepulchral sent household troops, not the sort of men who die quickly. If we gather enough soldiers here, we could break the two legions in our way and perhaps even defeat her army while it's divided."

"Good instinct," I praised. "She's very much afraid of that. It's why she's kept her own legion as a reserve, it keeps her options open. That way she can either use the Seventh to shore up the defences in the valley or to give second breath to the assault on Sepulchral should it stall out."

"It still seems risky, especially trying it at night," Vivienne said. "What if we gather quicker than she anticipated?"

"Here's where it gets interesting," I mused. "See, what we sent to reinforce our trench was our readied troops. Night watch, soldiers on duty. It was a pretty solid number for an army our size. But the second wave of our soldiers is going to come slower. They'll need to wake, put on armour, find their officers and muster before marching out. There's going to be a beat between the two waves."

"So she attacks us when she still has more soldiers on the fronts than we do?" Vivienne guessed.

"That'd be a blunder," I said. "If she tries to overwhelm our trenches, she risks our people holding and her men being out of formation when our second wave does arrive. That could go really badly for her, the kind of disaster you were talking about earlier."

"So what does she do?" the sole princess of Callow asked. "Why are we here, Catherine?"

"Because the Hellhound believes that Marshal Nim is going to make use of that beat between the waves," I said. "Not to overwhelm our position in the valley, no, but to delay the reinforcements. To make sure that we can't threaten to overwhelm her position in the valley while she deals with the Askum camp."

"And how would she do that?" Vivienne asked.

I wasn't the one who answered her. It was, instead, the thunder of thousands of hooves against the half-road. Three thousand auxiliary horse rode down the sole road of the valley, well to the west of the standoff between the Eighth and our vanguard. They weren't heading there in slightest, after all: they were going to continue doing the road before taking a brisk turn east towards Kala Fortress, to strike at my soldiers before they could properly form up into a second wave. They'd retreat soon enough, light horse couldn't handle the Army of Callow in a lasting fight, but all they had to do was sow enough chaos and death to slow us down before running away.

It would buy the Black Knight long enough to do achieve what she was after, removing Sepulchral's vanguard from the board.

Of course, there was just one little bit of trouble with that. Three thousand light cavalry, packed in a tight column so they could make the best use possible of the road, were a fearsome force. But also a fragile one. So I wanted until they were in deep, too late to easily leave, and then I turned to Grandmaster Brandon Talbot. He'd been waiting all this time, listening with an eager look on his face.

"I'm going to pull down the veil," I said. "Ready?"

"At your word, Your Majesty," he replied.

It'd been a pain to get Masego to anchor the Night-working in a stone and meant it had been a pretty basic illusion, but it'd allowed me to get around that little trick of Akua's with the red light circle. The Legions had gotten too dependent on that for sniffing me out, they really ought to have known better. With a murmured prayer I tore the Night out of the stone, feeling it crumbled to dust in my hand, and suddenly the moon shone pale above the glinting ranks of the Order of the Broken Bells. Lances down, shields up, the knights were in broad flanking positions just ahead of the largest cavalry force left in the Wasteland. I glanced at Vivienne, grinning and gesturing at our foes. She grinned back.

"KNIGHTS OF CALLOW," she shouted. "FORWARD!"

Once, twice, thrice the horn sounded.

Death followed.

kitebroken1

"VOTERS OF PGTE," she shouted. "FORWARD!"

Once, twice, thrice the horn sounded.

Votes followed.

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Vote!

Steven Silver

"Prayer and a vote work better than prayer alone" 😊

Linus42

Good Juniper getting back on the horse, granted she is not wrong even before Malicia mindscrewed her the military choices were a mess.

EE is playing Musical Chairs With Named, who is going to be left without a chair when the Music Stops. Arthur is playing wheel of fortune with Knight Names, Cat balances with the Tower, Viv is looking at a Heroic Named (which should help with an Arthur coup), while Hanno and Cordelia size up the same name. And who knows how it shuffle out in Praes in general.

emperorirritant

Our dear friend Amadeus may also be playing around with Names, you never know with that guy

Miles

I think Amadeus counts as a pretty good Name already. It even comes with a theme song.

<https://duckduckgo.com/?q=amadeus+song&t=fpas&iax=videos&ia=videos&iai=https%3A%2F%2Fwww.youtube.com/watch?v=9vYUwX8e06c>

Just watch, the last epilogue chapter will be some rookie antihero or antivillain thinking methodically and then getting the name Amadeus while the theme song plays in his head.

Liliet

Military choices a mess? What do you mean?

Linnus42

Their campaign in Procer when Cat was dealing with the Drow was going not well at all.

shikkarasu

That was more “no-one expects the Hierophant” and less a mistake by Juniper. She couldn’t have known that Arcadia would start crumbling and admitted that the cause of the poor performance of Callow was over reliance on Gates. Even Cat started softening once she heard Juniper’s reasonings. Juniper has mostly been out of the limelight for narrative reasons, giving Cat a chance to be a general instead of a Warlord. She hasn’t been unfit at any point, except when she was having the effects of Rule carved out of her.

Liliet

That was a fuckup on story level: militarily speaking, Juniper had no reason to expect the gates to stop working on her all of a sudden. And story stuff is not really Juniper’s responsibility, in her partnership with Vivienne.

I mean it’s valid to say that if she’s a genius then yes it is, but it was still a single mistake. All the following trouble just resulted from how she’d not meant to have a campaign there at all, in the first place.

Sinead

And even then, Juniper agreed that the Gates were a critical point of failure that could theoretically be broken.

Not in a ‘how could I see this coming?’ but in a logistical sense of ‘never assume 100% reliability’

So if that is a mark against her, she has met it and resolved it.

This current issue is self inflicted, which is infinitely harder to excise.

Liliet

Yeah precisely.

Linnus42

Good Juniper getting back on the horse, granted she is not wrong even before Malicia mindscrewed her the military choices were a mess.

EE is playing Musical Chairs With Named, who is going to be left without a chair when the Music Stops. Arthur is playing wheel of fortune with Knight Names, Cat balances with the Tower, Viv is looking at a Heroic Named (which should help with an Arthur coup), while Hanno and Cordelia size up the same name. Hakram might shift to something. Akua is up in the air And who knows how it shuffle out in Praes in general.

Lousy

"Nim, give me back my cavalry."

Tenthyr

I'm glad for Vivienne and Catherine, Viv for being ready to take up a new mantle and Catherine for being happy, in maybe a sad way, that her country can have a ruler free from her pains.

Steven Silver

It really was a sweet moment.

Arctusshade

Awesome! Wonder if Juniper will feel worse since she didn't have "the guts" to do the plan.

Definitely feel the workings of "named" here since none of this would have happened without the "conincidental" conversation

Sinead

While I am happy with everything in this chapter, I love the detail with Tabolt at the end.

He just has such great energy in these scenes.

sengachi

Tabolt only ever wanted to serve Callow and kick Praesi and Proceran ass. And by gods he has gotten to do that.

Sinead

And I guess what I like about Tabolt is that he's sort of an 'upgraded' version of John Farrier in the sense that his general mood can probably be a reflection of a facet of Callowan's view of Cat. I liked the chapters we had from his perspective of Cat not being perfect (and doesn't exactly fulfill his vision of Callow as he has envisioned it) but she and those she brought with her in her rise do do well by Callow and the Callowan people.

I would love a chapter from his perspective now. Post Regals, and ~3-4 more years of working alongside the 'foreign' elements of the Army of Callow.

I joke about his 'energy' in simplistic terms, but he's really an interesting character in terms of perspective.

The Knights of Callow is essentially the Callowan equivalent of the ogre heavies in terms of what the Army of Callow has that no one else has. I would love to see his potential thoughts of integrating the concept of the knightly orders into the AoC doctrine.

Heck, it would be interesting if it's Tabolt himself who makes the critical argument to Arthur regarding the limited development of the knightly orders. He strikes me as a man who is both smart and wise enough to at least appreciate the reason Cat made the choices she has regarding the knightly orders, even if he may not always agree with them.

Liliet

I got the impression that Cat hasn't so much made choices regarding the knightly orders as not made them. She did not prioritize restoring the multitude of them, and it would have been a bad idea for a variety of reasons if it had occurred to her at all but in the first place it really looked like it didn't. She restored a single one and stuck with that, with no incentive for further reform in that particular area – it wasn't on fire, which made it priority number last compared to everything else going on.

So Talbot talking to Arthur would, I think, not be in context of "why hasn't the queen done this" ("when would she have gotten around to it" is the answer to that, and I think Talbot has the perspective to fully appreciate it), but in the context of "so what happens next".

And yeah, I agree – Talbot would probably have the whole political picture there.

Sinead

Good points all around.

I guess what it comes down to is that I think Tabolt is able to appreciate the long view now that he is seeing Callowans rise in influence alongside the Praesi influence. On top of that, there is further integration of cultural exchange (thinking of the 'trick plays' and the other cultural trades at that fesyival) so that some boundaries between all the nations within Callow are lessening.

Plus with Vivienne keeping to the ties of the past more so than Cat did, I don't think Tabolt is as uneasy about Callow's future. Probably explains why he is much more relaxed in some ways than he was in earlier books. It's not just familiarity, it's vindication of having made the right choice with backing and supporting Cat for the past 5 years.

Liliet

Mm!

Frivolous

Sinead: I love Brandon Talbot; he's one of my favorite secondary or tertiary characters.

I imagine he's very handsome both in and out of his armor and that he hoists a big... lance.

Sinead

There is nothing fake about his ceremonial codpiece that's for sure!

DC

It has suddenly come to my attention that Sepulchral might have a Chancellor; it might explain some of what she's been pulling off, and there probably isn't much competition given the whole "anyone who tries to claim it gets executed" thing.

onedollargum

I wouldn't be surprised if Amadeus is becoming a Chancellor. He's certainly playing enough games in the background.

laguz24

I'm not entirely sure, having a chancellor is more for dealing with the nobles and keeping the tower not claiming it. So maybe she doesn't have one but it would be a nice ace in the hole and it would work wonders to see just why that name was outlawed.

R

I think it's Grem pulling the strings from behind the scenes (based on Amadeus mentioning him in the interlude).

Steven Silver

Does anyone know what a Chancellor's role typically is? Is been too long for me to have a good feel for it 😞
And the dictionary definition isn't helping me much.

agumentic

Deal with nobility and often day-to-day rule.

ohJohn

The archetypical Dread Empress orders the hordes forward from atop her flying fortress, cackling maniacally, as the opening move of some fever dream of a plan; Malicia very conspicuously does not do this type of thing, and infamously does not have a Chancellor, so presumably a lot of her day-to-day has historically been the work of Chancellors: being the biggest, meanest viper in a particularly nasty pit of them, collecting taxes, putting down rebellions, managing spy networks, and just generally keeping Praes together while its armies go invade Callow.

I think Her Most Magnificent and Spooky Highness, Scion of the Blood of the Original Murder sums up the roles of the foundational Praesi Names best:

"Praes is a story," she said. "A Tyrant to lead us. A Black Knight to break heroes. A Warlock to craft wonders. A Chancellor to rule behind them. And an Empire like clay, to shape into the tool they need: an entire nation built to empower the ambitions of a single villain."

Book 3, "Villainous Interlude: Chiaroscuro": <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/04/19/villainous-interlude-chiaroscuro/>

dadycool

Oh, I've been waiting so long for the Broken Bells to ride against the Legion. Ever since the story turned westward, it hasn't felt quite right seeing them in action. But now they're going against their traditional enemies, so it's only right for them to get at least one good charge in.

Vivienne sees the signs of things coming together for her Named. Personally, I wonder if Queen's Knight would be a good name for Arthur. His QUEEN took him under her wing, his QUEEN is ordering him into battle all the time, but specifically against an enemy Named commander he has a Three with, and it's a neutral Name, with its alignment dependent on the resident Queen, which will be a Good Named when Cat retires. Who knows, maybe it'd happen in the same instance as Cat's retirement/ascension.

It really is tragic how few members of the Fifteenth are left. By my count, Kilian, Cat, Hakram, Pickler, Juniper, and Aisha. That's six out of, what, twelve?

Damien /

A kind of Servant Knight (as oppose to a Ruling or Adventuring Knight) might be reasonable giving Arthur character and history as a squire in the Army. It would also reinforce the fact that knights are soldiers now, not lords or independant military forces. I think the fact that this is exactly how Cat and Viv have been using the knights of Callow gives ground for the blossoming of this kind of Role. Especially when you consider that service (to the crown, to a lady, to the innocents) is a staple of knights in Middle-Age Europe but it is a kind of knights never mentioned in the history of Callow (so far anyway).

Juniper and Aisha were not part of the Fifteenth, but they would be considered one of them as Hune was (and even more than her). Originally, there was 8 named members of the Fifteenth I think (Ratface/Hasan, Cat, Hakram, Kilian, Nauk, Nilin, Pickler, Robber), and only four of them are still alive (and we didn't see Kilian in a while).

caoimhinh

You are mistaking Rat Company with the Fifteenth Legion.

Juniper, Aisha, and Hune weren't part of Rat Company, whereas the 8 you mentioned in the end were, but they all were part of the Fifteenth Legion.

M0och123

The robber hurts me every time.
He was my favourite character, to the point where I was surprised he didn't come out on top of the character poll last year.

Zach

It isn't inconceivable that Arthur could end up White Knight. We've seen how Hanno is increasingly deviating from his Role and weakening in the Light as a result of it, and it would leave that Name conspicuously unoccupied.

Juff

Typo Thread:

south expel > south to expel capacity of our armies > capability of our armies as if were > as if it were

I recognize the > I recognized the Above of you > Above all you listen at > listen to
"You trusted the man, (extra space) face ever showing > face never showing Askum > Aksum (occurs twice)
there in slightest > there in the slightest
I wanted until > I waited until stone and meant > stone, which meant feeling it crumbled > feeling it crumble

Lowinternetspeed

in the rest to shade > in the shade to rest

mamm0nn

Robber, sitting behind a rock hearing about Cat and Pickler talking he's never going to come back ever, giggling and smiling like a naughty imp waiting for the big surprise.

Oh, just you wait. One bottle of goblinfire left, waiting for a good place to light itself. And with my Name being immune to the stuff, I'll probably get killed some other way once I light it, I will.

Meanwhile I'm not seeing a mass ritual worthy of Praesi combat in this fight yet, thus Akua is probably going to turn the tides at least once because that's what Praesi do rather than rely on Legion superiority.

Steven Silver

I think part of the Legion reforms was getting rid of big rituals in favor of more standard spells, and Nim is all in on the reforms.

But, yeah, Akua is there. A big magic wrench in the gears wouldn't be surprising, especially after she and Cat faced off like they did.

irritantseraphim

Yeah, but then again, it's Akua, rumored Warlock. Just like the Legions under Cat in the first books started relying on rituals when a Mage Named was around

Burlyraven

The whole Pickler conversation reminded me that while I do believe Robber is dead, there was the mention of fields and a warm breeze at the end of his death scene, which could be an afterlife, or it could be the Twilight Ways, somehow. Just a thought.

I wonder if the Heavens are going to show Arthur any of Cat's more monstrous moments as Squire, context or no. A few of her tricks with necromancy come to mind as potentially galvanizing. Of course, that might give Below license to show the more mitigating moments to throw some turmoil into the mix.

Velrix

Hey, you're right, what are the Goblin's Named ? They're unknown, nobody know shit about them...
Soooo "Robber"...

Liliet

We had WoE specifically saying Robber isn't Robber's Name ♥

Sinead

I wonder if Cat will have her own moment like King Edward VII. She cannot call on the Callowan ghosts in Leisse, because she was not the queen of those people, not deep in their bones like the Fairfax would have been.

However, she has always been a soldier's queen. And after a short stint as Winter's Queen, her necromancy for a time had an...interesting touch.

What would be interesting in this case would be absences. My guess that Niln (and any other spies purged from her ranks) are absent, and Hune declines but sends her regards (in the sense that it's a respectful refusal in that she did her time, but Cat has no claim on her loyalty). Perhaps some of the other Villains that have died may show up as well, but I suspect not.

Then you might see some form of closure for Pickler between Robber and Nuak.

Liliet

HELL YEAH

- more details on Arthur and his Name dreams!
- and he's doing his research by finding out what had happened, hell yeah!
- a conversation with Vivienne about her Name ANNND YEAH I was right it's gonna be a heroic one! I think this was a fairly widespread prediction
- AISHA SCREENTIME and awww ♥ @ the plan to show Juniper she's good. I mean obviously first and foremost it's the plan they needed for the battle lmao but it's also a plan to show Juniper she's good!

– ALL KNIGHTS CHARGE

– More clarification on the vanguard and the relative positions.
Army musical chairs ♥ ♥ ♥

– so... what are you going to do, Akua? :3

Unrecovered

Hah! So Hanno would be Warden of the West, and Kat as his counterpart Warden of the East 😊 Remember me, I called it first 😜

Liliet

First?

Autochthon

Yeah, that is my feeling as well. Just Hanno has to claim the name over Hasenbach, that will definitely be interesting.

shikkarasu

I love Hanno, and I don't begrudge him his promotion, but if Cordelia is killed/ousted before the end of this war I will be salty with him.

kinghaart

+1, Hasenbach has put in more miles, Hanno has not been idle but has had a Name to lean on.

Piromin

It's been called quite a lot of times, ever since she started mirroring Hasenbach, the unofficial warden of the west, together with the bard trying to guide her away from the forming name.

daniel

Um... If by calling it first you mean more than 18 months after Liliet then sure.

Or is Kat != Cat? 😜

And I'm assuming you're not claiming credit for calling Hanno as Warden of the West since after the interlude practically everybody is.

Zach

Hanno as Warden of the West is possible because we know he's likely losing White Knight and we know that "Warden of the West" has some sort of precedent as a Name, but I'm confused where this "Warden of the East" idea comes from. There's no precedent for that role, and the most noteworthy indicators of Catherine's future Name are things like her exercising "Name authority" over someone like Pilgrim, who is not part of "the East." Nothing about being "Warden of the East" would give a Named authority over a major Western hero. Nothing about Catherine's long-term goals involve her ruling over "the East" (since any future authority she has would likely be centered in that proposed Cardinal city). I don't even think Callow is considered part of "the East."

Whatever happens with Catherine, it is clear that her Role is one that involves some sort of authority over other Named. The main actions shaping her future Role are those during the war against the Dead King (that's when her Name began to take shape, long before she even thought about going to Praes). It makes no sense for her to begin developing the Name "Warden of the East" over the course of a war in the West against the Dead King.

Liliet

I started this theory back in book 5, when Catherine... did not have the setup she has now, yet (but Cordelia was showing signs of developing the WotW Name).

No comment on how plausible it is now, just, a historical fact. So to speak.

kinghaart

Yeah I don't buy Warden of the East.

Empress of the East though...

Autochthon

I have finally caught up to this amazing story.

Steven Silver

I'm so sorry 😞

Autochthon

Thank you very much, ErraticErrata for these awesome characters and stories. It has consumed my life for the past three months. Some random thoughts (sorry, enter somehow does not work here: Sometimes I hate Cat's actions, but that seems to be the point, all of these characters are quite deep and multifaceted. I find it hard to follow the troop movements on the strategic level, those are the only parts I found myself skimming. I would need not only the map but also all the figures for the armies and a military advisor :D. I know this is a large and unforgiving world but I was quite upset by the offscreen deaths of the court in Laure, especially Ratface :'. He was one of my favourite characters and I would love to see either his demise or some other interlude with him included. Similar with some named as well, the Sage showed up only to get killed, would love to see more of Lysander and The Rapacious Troubadour. Love the different perspectives of the prominent heroes, especially Hanno and Tariq, less so Laurence contrasted with Black's pragmatism and our very own Cat and the other, more traditional villains Like Akua , The Barrow sword and the like. Actually, now that I think about it, almost every named (and Named) character has his own philosophy. I look forward to the conclusion. Hope it doesnt end in some eternal sacrificial service either for Cat or Akua, Cat in particular just seems so TIRED. She deserves some rest.

M0och123

You know... the phrase ready kick ass and take names is oddly appropriate for this story.

Graeme Jardine

Honestly reading the most upto date chapter honestly creates such a buzz on each and every single update, truly amazing writing and such a good story, thank you

Cold Cyberia

Prediction: the Rebel Legions will arrive before the battle gets properly going

shikkarasu

Counter prediction: the threat of them will hinder Nim and Catherine will do that "taking advantage of the chaos" thing. By the time Sepulchral's forces arrive in full Cat will be the only player left in the valley.
Catherine then uses her other trademark: Dictate terms.

hoser2

I love the denouement. The seemingly ignorant questions and events coinciding make the story flow beautifully. But there is no way Vivienne is giving the commands without knowing the deployment of the Order of the Broken Bells and understanding the plan already.

If she were mounted and leading the charge, I could hope that this would be the encounter that will put her name over the top. But I fear that it will take heroic action in even more dire straits to set her up for her name.

Sinead

Agreed. Perhaps if Apprentice was along to help manage the illusion, complaining about Arthur grinning like a fool but not saying anything, that would work as a better moment. Especially with Vivienne as a second voice near the end.

Liliet

I mean, Catherine gave Vivienne the signal, which is obvious in context, because Vivienne is quick on the uptake. And because it's really obvious what Catherine has prepared for.

"Be armed, armored and mounted" is I take it the default for Vivienne-outside these days.

Sinead

That is also a good point. I guess my confusion is that wouldn't Vivienne be explicitly aware of the plan at her level of planning?

I also like Sapan, and wish she had more screen time.

Liliet

The latter is an excellent point and I bow to your wisdom.

As for the former, Vivienne had her own task, whatever it was she and Cat had alluded to during their conversation, that Cat told her to "hurry up". I can see her being too busy with that to really be kept in the loop of military preparations.

Sinead

You make a good point, so I don't have much of an objection for that ending point.

I still like the idea that Sapan complaining about Arthur walking around with a grin and not explaining anything. The only thing to make it better (though I know it wouldn't be likely) is if it was established that Sapan had some rapport with Tabolt, and that he's being worse than Arthur.

However, that's really just my mental image of Tabolt just before a cavalry charge, as already established.

Liliet

Just write it. Just write itttttt. You clearly have an excellent shortfic scene in mind D000 IIIT 😊

Sinead

In this particular instance, I don't think I would just inject Sapan into the end.

I may write from Brandon's perspective on the last few years (as he reflects on them before this charge).

Cat comments on not knowing any of the stories of the Old Kingdom.

However, she knows someone who through his station and age would be very familiar with those.

And he is keeping his mouth _shut_!

I think that means something. And not just that he's worried about losing his tongue. He knows/understands Cat way better than those days in Marchford.

There are a lot of interesting things around Sir Brandon Tabolt. I really hope we get an actual Interlude from his perspective. He's full of so many interesting secrets!

sengachi

Remember though, Name lore. Those cavalry coming around the bend right in cue was a Name thing. By turning this into a teaching lesson between two Name claimants Cat ensured the timing would be perfect.

kinghaart

Oh that's good thinking. That's my headcanon now at any rate.

zucced

Happy to see those poor Levantines get some justice. Though it would be unfortunate if Nim or Akua planned for this, however...

Sinead

Akua isn't particularly military minded outside of having the initial intel. Look at how Cat was able to use the walk through of the Battle of Lazon's Hallow to outplay Akua. And I cannot see how one can have both a fast moving light cavalry and also have a counter to having the side of your column caved in. The Knights of Callow are immune to direct sorcerous attention unless Nim has enough mages to send with that column to attack the ground on either side of the road.

Also, we know 'Death followed' so this was a success. This isn't Nemashah with endless resources where everything is a baited trap.

sengachi

So now Callow has uncontested cavalry supremacy again. That's got to be all kinds of not good for Him.

Liliet

Her

~~yes I know what the typo actually is but I had to~~

jamesc9

"half our army had gone in the rest to shade,"

There is at least one Word macro virus that swaps two words in each document, each time it's saved. EE, would you know if you had it?

Chapter 17: Aim

*"To be great one must stand on the shoulders of others.
The difference between rule and tyranny is whether they raised or you stepped on them."*

– King Edward Alban of Callow, best known for annexing the Kingdom of Liesse

I'd not seen that many dead and dying horses since the Graveyard.

Casualties were a haphazard game, when one tried to count them in the wake of a bloody melee in the dark, but I trusted my eyes. At least half the force of three thousand that'd proudly thundered down the road now lay dead in the dust, torn through like parchment by Callowan lances. The rest had fled, panicking as my knights butchered their way through the tightly packed column, and there'd be no more fighting out of them tonight. It'd been a massacre: we'd caught them flat-footed and in the wrong formation. Even after the casualties the Order of Broken Bells had taken, I suspected we now had more cavalry left than the Black Knight. That meant we'd killed at least three horsemen for every lost knight, the kind of exchange rate utter routs were made of.

Yet as the stink of blood and shit filled my nostrils, as the death cries of men and horses joined in a strange elegy, my eyes stayed on the horizon. The Order had not pursued the fleeing horsemen, Talbot had known that it was a fool's errand and it'd put us at risk of running into an enemy trap. The orders given had instead been to send away the few prisoners taken, execute the dying and change mounts in anticipation of another ride. It seemed, though that there would be no need to send my knights into another melee. Marshal Nim, from her perch, had decided she did not like the growing shape of the battle. Too many risks, especially now that her horse had routed in the dark and the Army of Callow's reinforcements were marching unhindered.

If my vanguard tried to take her fortifications in the plains with the support of the Order, she might face an outright defeat here. Her forces were still split and I was the one with the cavalry advantage now. So the Black Knight did the smart thing, the prudent thing. What the Legion doctrine she'd helped write would have advised: she retreated.

The assault on Sepulchral's soldiers in the heights was called off and the Seventh prudently moved to reinforce the two legions already gathering to face my army by the trench. Marshal Nim wouldn't attack, though, and neither would I. Taking trenches, even only half-finished ones, would be messy. Too risky, given the exhaustion of our armies and the lack of coordination that came from fighting in the dark. Her officers were better than mine, sure, but she wasn't going to bet on the same army that'd slugged it out with the Dead King for years being the army to break. When the going got rough and the fighting became about who had the iron to pull through? There was no beating the Army of Callow.

So instead of a battle, what we were going to get was two armies standing in battle array half a mile from each other in the dark for a few hours before both retreated. I pulled off my helmet, shaking free my wet hair. I wasn't great with a lance, but I'd gotten in close with my sword after sowing further panic in the enemy with Night. There was blood on my armour that wasn't mine. I looked up at the starry sky, breathing out slowly.

We'd made it through one more night.

—

Aisha had thought that following Juniper's plan successfully would shake her out of... whatever this was, but the following morning I saw differently. I'd taken it as a good sign that she had headed out towards the frontlines, but it wasn't to our fortifications she went. She didn't go to inspect the trenches or the forts. Instead Juniper had headed further west, near the half-road that it would take us days to build all the way to — about six, Pickler believed, at our current pace. I found my marshal's escort milling about uneasily on the valley floor while Juniper herself stood alone beneath a tall sycamore tree. It didn't give much shade, its branches skeletal and bare of all leaves.

The Hellhound was one of the tallest orcs I'd met, taller than any in the Army of Callow save Hakram, and she'd always had a presence. Even as a cadet, the broad shoulders and ramrod straight way she stood had made the military in her visible to even a casual glance. I tended to have a hard time placing the age of orcs that were between their twenties and forties – before or after, the signs were pretty distinctive – but I'd known Juniper for years. Seen her grow as I grew, the lines of her broad face harden and her fangs thicken. Her eyes, black like most orcs', were deeper set than when we'd first met. The skin around had grown greyer, too.

Yet in all these years I'd never really seen her... sag like this. It was a little subtle, could have been taken as just leaning against the tree in someone like Indrani, but to someone who knew her it was plain. Her shoulders were hunched, her expression exhausted. She didn't greet me after I limped to her side, eyes still on the growing lines of fortifications in the distance. Dawn had passed an hour ago, both the Legions and my army were back to work in the cool morning air.

"There are better places to take it in," I tried. "If we go near the foot of the hills to the east, we can make out the Aksum camp as well."

She did not answer. I waited, at a loss. Juniper had never been one to swallow her feelings, so these long silences she'd taken to hiding in had me on the back foot.

"I recognized the plan," the Hellhound finally said.

"You should," I said, "it was yours. And it worked."

Not my subtlest of approaches but sometimes blunt was the way to go. A surprisingly large amount of the time, really. Yet instead of what I'd been looking for, her shoulders further hunched.

"It wasn't," she roughly replied.

"Juniper, we literally cribbed your notes," I flatly said.

Finally she turned to me, jaw clenched tight and eyes hard.

"You took my read of the situation and you made it yours," the Marshal of Callow evenly said, the growl kept low in her throat.

"I predicted some decisions Marshal Nim might make, like half our general staff could have had they been asked. You took those guesses and made them into a functional battle plan."

My fingers clenched but I forced myself to stay calm. It was like she was trying to be obtuse.

"Using the Order was -"

"I wouldn't have used the Order, Catherine," Juniper angrily said. "I wouldn't have fought at all. I would have moved half the army closer to the trenches so that the Black Knight would be forced to do the same and it became too much of a risk for her to attack Sepulchral."

I blinked, then hid my surprise.

"That would also have worked," I pointed out.

"Your solution was better," she growled. "You won the same prize, forcing her to back off from Sepulchral, but the Order's ambush cost her half her horse as well. If I had given you advice, if you had taken it, it would have been an inferior result."

I bit on my tongue before I could tell her it would still have been a good one, knowing she'd take it as a slap in the face.

"If you hadn't predicted Marshal Nim was going to attack none of it would have been possible," I said instead.

"General Zola believed she would as well," Juniper said. "You simply never asked her, because you insist on pretending I am something I'm not."

I grit my teeth. Why was she insisting on embracing the worst possible slant for everything? Fuck, she'd been outplayed by the Black Knight only twice – when had she become so fragile?

"And what would that be?" I bit out.

"A better commander than you," the Hellhound gravelled. "Someone whose advice you should be taking."

"That's-"

I almost said ridiculous before biting down on it. Calling her a fool wasn't going to achieve anything.

"- the truth," Juniper said. "When have I ever won a victory, save when you were dragging me along?"

"You beat back Malanza at the Camps," I said.

"I played for time until you could return," she replied, "and would have lost if you had not. It's been like that since the start. Three Hills was your plan. Marchford, Five Armies and One, Dormer – all the way to the Tenth Crusade. And when I did hold the command with none above me, I almost broke the Army of Callow in Iserre."

"I handle the Named part of those plans," I said. "The military parts were yours, Juniper. In almost all those battles, I went down in the ranks and fought. Someone needed to actually command the army and that's always been you."

"You don't need a Marshal for that," Juniper said. "You need a general, and you have plenty already."

"I don't agree with that in the slightest," I harshly said. "And you're forgetting who built this damned army in the first place, Hellhound. It sure as Hells wasn't me."

"Don't you see how senseless it is?" Juniper miserably said. "We had a single draw when we were kids and it's all come from that. Every office, every honour, every title. I am a child in marshal's stripes facing a real marshal of Praes. It can only go one way."

There was nothing I could say, I dimly realized. We could be at this all day, I could have the silvermost tongue in Creation or the finest rhetoric of the Free Cities and it wouldn't move her an inch. She'd swallowed the lie, let it settle in her guts. Words wouldn't fix this. Fuck, I wasn't sure I could. My eye strayed to the sycamore, the shifting lay of its shade baring what I had missed: it was dead, inside. Through cracks I could see it had gone hollow, dead at the heart and the limbs simply too slow to have caught up to the truth. When I looked at Juniper she did not meet my eye.

"I will refuse a resignation if you offer it," I curtly said.

I got back on my horse and left her to her tree.

—

The bruising night battle had changed the balance of power in the valley.

We'd shown we had teeth and the Army of Callow had managed to recover from the exhausting overnight forced march that'd won us Kala Fortress. The Black Knight wasn't as sure she could take us on a field now. So both my army and the Black Knight's avoided further fighting, in the valley at least. Zola ordered a permanent night watch on the Legions in case they made another move on Sepulchral's vanguard, but like us Marshal Nim was focusing elsewhere: the valley between the hills of Moule and Kala had become a race of fortifications. I sent Archer and Huntress out to slow them as I had yesterday, hitting them at different places in the line, but even so their advantage in sapper numbers told.

They caught up to my own sappers and then began to overtake us, though not by too large a margin. Across the valley mirrored works were emerging: two lines of trenches facing each other, with palisades behind them. East to west, the both of us hurrying towards the half-road. We even took the same precautions, pulled from the same doctrine. To prevent a night attack overwhelming our positions, we raised walled camps behind our walls where we could keep protective garrisons.

It was in Moule Hills that the fighting continued. I needed all my sappers down in the valley working on the siege works, which meant I'd have to rely on regulars to actually head out into the hills and cut wood. Compared to the goblin skirmishers from that would be shaken loose to harass us, my legionaries would be at a distinct disadvantage. A protective screen had to be sent out, so I sent for the two I believed to be the right people for the job. Lord Razin Tanja and Lady Aquiline Osená came into my tent an hour past dawn, but it was not an elaborate plan I gave them.

"Kala Hills," I said, pointing at the map. "If it's an enemy and it's in it, I want it dead. Keep them off our woodcutters."

"The plan?" Razin politely asked.

"Pick your men, pick your pace, pick your battles," I shrugged. "Those hills are yours."

Aquiline grinned.

"You have us an honour war, Black Queen," she said, sounding delighted.

"Honour can bite my ass," I said. "Bring me scalps, Osená."

The look on her face was somewhere between scandalized and gleeful, which actually did wonders for my mood. At least the lordlings could be counted on not to fall apart, I thought as I sent them out of the tent. By afternoon I had my first reports: the Dominion force was taking to the task with fervent enthusiasm, the Malaga contingent in particular. Fighting the Champion's Blood in the Alavan hills for centuries had ensured they were well versed at fighting in this sort of terrain. It was a bloody, tribal fight just the way the goblins and the Levantines liked them. Razin himself came back near Afternoon Bell with a fresh scar and a pleased look on his face, just in time for Vivienne to ambush me as I got a cup of wine in him before sending him off to a healer.

"The commander of Sepulchral's force sent us a rider," she said, briskly entering the tent. "They want to meet."

"Finally," I grunted. "You got a name for me?"

"Isoba Mirembe," Vivienne said.

I let out a low whistle.

"Sepulchral's heir," I told a confused Razin. "Her grand-nephew."

"Does she have no closer relatives?" he asked, sounding surprised.

"It used to be her nephew, but we killed him at the Folly," I said. "They have a time for me, Vivienne?"

"Half-past Afternoon Bell," she said. "South of Moule Hills."

I grimaced. Would have to saddle up soon, then. And since the young man – he was nineteen, I vaguely recalled, or thereabouts – was technically heir to both Askum and her claim on the Tower I'd have to bring enough high-ranking people it wasn't an insult. There weren't really many I could spare, though. Then I shot a considering look at Razin, who was noble.

"Finish that cup, lordling," I said. "And get that wound looked at. We're going for a ride."

Might as well pick up the other kids, I thought. Sapan would be pissy at leaving Masego's side – or more realistically his grimoires – but it would be good for her and Arthur to get a proper look at Wasteland high nobility. Besides, even though I didn't believe the call to be a trap that hardly meant I trusted the Mirembe. Two more Named would be a useful precaution. Razin Tanja set down his empty cup on my carved table, standing up, and that was the sound of us getting a move on.

—

Isoba Mirembe looked a lot like I'd expected Sargon Sahelian to. Tall and with slender muscles, his face a perfect symmetry of high cheekbones under cold golden eyes. He was beautiful, but almost more like a statue than a man. It reminded me uncomfortably of the Exiled Prince, who might as well have been cut out of marble. This one, though, did not have a Name. How many potions and spells had it taken for his dark skin not to have the slightest of imperfections on it? The armour he wore was practical, at least, if incrustated with enough jewels to arm an entire company of legionaries. My escort of knights was a match in numbers for his retinue, but instead of the handful of nobles he'd brought I instead had two Named and a ruler of the Blood.

"Black Queen, I greet you in the name of Dread Empress Sepulchral," Isoba said, breaking the silence, "and give you her thanks for your intervention last night."

"The Black Queen greets her back," I drily said. "You know who I am. With me ride Lord Razin Tanja of the Grim Binder's Blood, the Apprentice and the Squire. And, of course, twenty of the same knights that ran down the Legion horse last night."

The last part was a break in manners, but I regretted it not the slightest when I saw the backs of my knights straighten. They'd earned the praise, as far as I was concerned. Isoba introduced only the nobles he'd brought, each a ruling lord or lady in their own right. He'd not skimped on the rank of those he brought, at least, which was a good sign. With that out of the way, we got to business.

"A truce between our forces would be only natural," Isoba suggested. "Neither Aksum nor the true empress have any quarrel with the Grand Alliance."

"A truce is a start," I said, "but it's just delaying the trouble. We need to strike at the Black Knight together."

"My aunt would welcome the official backing of the Grand Alliance as ruler of Praes," Isoba easily replied, smiling without a speck of joy. "On such terms an alliance could be made."

"You're not getting that," I bluntly said. "And you lending a hand to the business of keeping your hides from being tanned is hardly worth that asking price. Poorly bargained."

"Why would we pay for what you offer freely?" the young man laughed. "It is in your interest to keep our force from being overwhelmed, lest you find yourself fighting the Legions alone."

"You're standing on quicksand, Mireembe," I warned. "I'm not going to keep pulling you out of the fire if you're of no use to me. Better then to let the Black Knight bloody her forces killing you all."

That got his attention.

"Bluster," he dismissed, but his eyes had sharpened.

I sighed. There was no point to this if he had no grasp on the precarity of his situation.

"This is why children shouldn't be sent to negotiate," I said. "You've wasted my time."

He looked like I'd slapped him, which to be fair I pretty much had. His gaggle of nobles were studying him for a hint of his thoughts – or of weakness – but he wasn't going to walk back his words after I'd insulted him. We'd have this talk again after Marshal Nim put some proper fear in his belly, or she killed them all. Either way, it was no trouble of mine. So long as the vanguard had a proper standing fight instead of being slaughtered half asleep, I figured they could cost the Legions at least two thousand men going down. It'd make the Black Knight's force somewhat more manageable.

"Back to camp," I told my people, pulling at Zombie's reins.

My eye found that Razin, though, was looking at the other young man with an odd look on his face.

"Since I was a child I have been told of the cunning of the Praesi high lords," the Lord of Malaga said. "And this is the truth of your blood? This is a bitter disappointment."

"What would a savage from the edge of the world know of anything?" Isoba mocked. "The Mirembe could wipe out your misbegotten bloodline as easy as—"

"I have been on that horse, once upon a time," Razin said, eyeing the other lord. "So I am not without sympathy for your position, for it is not pleasant. Yet even a savage from the edge of the world knew it was better to swallow pride than perish like a fool. Where is the cunning and power that your people so often boast of? All I see is an arrogant child who would kill himself and all with him out of wounded pride."

Eyes, amber and dark, studied them both coolly. The nobles were listening.

"You know nothing," Isoba hissed. "Either of cunning or death. If the Legions come, they will be cowed."

"If the Legions come, you will die," Razin slowly said, as if speaking to a half-wit. "I am Blood, Isoba Mirembe. I understand honour, the pride of defiance. But that pride must be rooted in something more than fantasy, else you have saddled a dead horse. When the Black Knight comes you will be slaughtered to the last, and you are breaking off talks with the sole woman who can prevent this. This is senseless."

Huh. Isoba was looking at him like he wanted to skin him alive and boil him. Shit, now I was almost hoping the heir to Aksum would live just so he'd have to keep remembering that little speech. The nobles had watched it all, and I saw now that looks were being traded. They had come to a decision.

"It was not known to us that Marshal Nim had become the Black Knight," one of them idly said. "The situation has changed. Names are not to be underestimated."

"Perhaps talks should be had, after all," another said, smiling pleasantly.

Neither were looking at us. All of them, amber-eyed vultures, were looking at Isoba Mirembe. I saw it sink in, the truth that if he did not bargain Sepulchral would have another heir by nightfall. And it was hard pill to swallow, but still better than dying, so he turned to us with a mild smile and talks began anew. I sent Razin a fond look. Sat in that horse before, had he? Sarcella had not been so long ago, and still it felt like a lifetime. What did the man I was looking at now have to do with the boy I'd fought in that city?

So very little.

—

Isoba Mirembe would not concede to joining us in battle unless his position was assailed, and on that the nobles seemed to back him. Orders from Sepulchral herself, I suspected. We did strike a bargain, though: he would harass the Legions from behind, slowing their works, and in return I promised to intervene if the Black Knight tried to wipe him out again. It wasn't what I'd wanted from him, but it was still better than them staying holed up in Moule Hills twiddling their thumbs. The second day rose to much the same arrangements as the first: in the valley walls raced east, while in the hills trees fell and blood spilled.

It was all ambushes and raids in there, not a single standing fight to be found. War parties came back with trophies or never at all. The Dominion was better up close and with javelins, it became clear from casualty reports, but the Legion skirmishers were hardened veterans with full stocks of goblin munitions. We pushed them back far north by afternoon, but it led the Levantines into a series of vicious ambushes on mined grounds that forced them into full retreat. Aquiline captured a prisoner that shed light on the turnabout: the Legions had sent for volunteers from Risas, the town by the lake, so that they might have native guides in the hills. The losses earlier in the day had been bait for the trap.

In the valley the Legions were still ahead of us, but Isoba had been true to his word: he sent out his horse to harass the enemy. Quick hit-and-run attacks on companies between Marshal Nim's camp and the walls, burning a few carts and killing a few isolated tents. He retreated immediately when the Legions sent out their own cavalry, returning to the safety of the camp. The Black Knight hadn't made it a priority to bottle up the Askum troops before, but that changed with them making it clear they were willing to go on the attack. Sappers were pulled from the valley to begin raising a ring of forts near the foot of the hills where Isoba was encamped.

Good, it'd slow the Legions where it mattered.

On the third day, the situation in the valley and hills stabilized. In Kala Hills, the chastened Levantines established a cautious stalemate slightly to the north of the lines of fortifications. It left the greater part of the Kala Hills and its wooden bounty in Legion hands, but the Aquiline had sent her slayers to secure a few hidden glades to the east that kept us sufficiently provisioned in wood. Considering the disparity in numbers, I was more than satisfied with the performance of the Dominion forces and made that plain to both lordlings. It was in the valley that we pulled slightly ahead, our wall and trench passing the Black Knight's. The Legions had carts full of what I believed to be siege engines brought to the front, though, and I ordered the same of my men.

No battle ensued, though. When trouble came it came from elsewhere. Scribe found me near Afternoon Bell and led me to a tent where two men were bound and gagged under guard.

"Who am I looking at?" I asked.

"Trusted servants of Lord Sokoro Abara," Eudokia said. "I've been keeping an eye on him. They were sent to take the long way around Moule Hills and get in touch with Marshal Nim. Some information would be passed as a gesture of goodwill, ties established."

Well, he hadn't struck me as a particularly trustworthy man. Hadn't expected him to try to play both sides so quick, though.

"What kind of information?" I asked.

"Minor," Scribe said. "Troop numbers, camp gossip."

Mhm. So nothing too drastic. He'd wanted to establish credentials, not outright jump ship. Not yet.

"He's still got his half-brother in a cell?" I asked.

Scribe nodded.

"Take him out," I decided. "Stash him somewhere in our camp."

"And these two?"

I eyed them.

"Put their heads on his bed," I said. "With a written note: no second chances."

That should remind him in whose hands his leash was. It better, I had plans for tomorrow and wanted no distraction from them.

—

On the fourth day, I decided it was time to try to kill Marshal Nim.

Not here and now, unfortunately. I was unlikely to succeed with a nascent pattern of three nudging coincidence in her favour. But I could, at least, solidify that pattern. The veil over that knife was to be the Army of Callow going on the offensive: we were only two days away from our trench reaching the road, half the valley's length already fortified, so the time had come to test the enemy's defences. The Legions had mounted their siege engines, as had the Army of Callow, but neither side had begun firing. We'd not wanted to begin that slugging match too early. Until now.

My ballistae began hammering at the enemy palisade at the turn of Morning Bell. Within eighty heartbeats, the enemy returned fire.

They had us beat in numbers for traditional Legion siege weapons like ballistae and scorpions, but by doctrine a legion didn't usually carry trebuchets unless an actual siege was planned. That gave us an edge in range and power with the three we had, but as the sky filled with stones I saw the margin was much thinner than I would have liked. On both sides mages had been brought to the fore, using shields to prop up our palisades so they wouldn't break under hits, but the enemy's superior volume of fire was hammering harder at us. We had fewer mages, too. I had an answer to that, fortunately: Archer and the Silver Huntress began using their proper bows.

Javelin-sized arrows began killing the siege crews and breaking the engines, our own ballista fire forcing their mage lines to stay and protect the palisades instead of covering them. The Black Knight had other mages to call on, though, and they intervened before my Named could do too much damage. A whirling wind formed over the enemy position and I grimaced. That looked simple and easy to maintain, which was bad, but worse was that neither my archer Named could land an arrow through that. Magic like shields they had arrows that could go through, but not wind. And it was exactly that, just magically induced.

Time to gamble, then. This might turn around on us if we didn't. I gave the order and the signals went up. In the Kala Hills to the east, through a path the Levantines had found, a strike force of a thousand emerged past the enemy defence line. There was a fort in the way, the Legions had known of the path's existence, but suddenly the wind in the sky stopped whirling and instead formed into a great spear. It hammered down into the fort, killing an entire company in a moment as Hierophant reminded everyone on the field why people avoided fighting mage Named of his calibre.

The legionaries rushed past the wreckage, heading straight for the enemy engines with two silhouettes at their head: Squire and Apprentice. Come on, Black Knight, I thought. You need to keep those engines, otherwise digging out the vanguard in the hills will get a lot more complicated. It's only a thousand, and you can handle a mere Squire can't you? Take your swing. Come on. A surge of power in the distance reminded me why I wasn't with the assault, a ball of poisonous green clouds beginning to form above my own siege engines.

"Hello, Akua," I coldly smiled, and unleashed the Night I'd spent an hour gathering.

My work was here. I'd asked Masego to keep the kids alive if this went south, it would have to do. And it was looking pretty good. The force with the Squire got to the engines and set two on fire in quick succession while I maintained a stalemate with the mage nobility and arrow fire began picking off Legion mages. Only the Black Knight wasn't showing. Not even in a possessed body. Shit, she wasn't taking the bait. Worse, even as my attack force began running into entrenched opposition and was forced back I found out where the Black Knight actually was: there was smoke coming from the Aksum camp. Had she hit them with an ogre line like she'd done our camp near Wolof?

Sepulchral's men didn't make fortified camps like the Legions and the Army did, a raid like that would go... badly for them.

Cursing, I have the order for a retreat. We'd broken at least half of the enemy siege engines, those deployed here at least, but it'd been costly. Even with Hierophant covering the retreat, we lost a little over half the thousand we'd sent. And Marshal Nim had not shown. I'd not finessed fate into killing her before the campaign was over. How had she known not to show? My fingers clenched, then unclenched. Akua, had to be. But why would she tell the Black Knight? If she was going to make a play for the Legions, and she must if she was to attempt to overthrow Malicia, she could not keep Marshal Nim alive. The Black Knight was a loyalist, the marshal that'd stayed true.

So what was her game?

It was beginning to slip out of my hands, I realized. I'd thought I had a handle on the path Akua would take, and I still believed that I did, but I had to wonder... I pushed aside the worries, attending to the here and now. With our retreat, siege fire petered out on both sides and ended entirely by Afternoon Bell. Sappers on both sides began repairing the chunks of palisade that'd been blown away, and that strange air of truce fell over the valley again. There was no more killing over the fourth day, not even in the hills.

All knew better than to believe it would last.

—

On the fifth day, Scribe brought news.

"Sepulchral's army is getting close," she told the war council. "If she keeps up the current pace, by evening in six days she will reach Moule Hills."

Opinions were divided on how we should react to that.

"We should delay until the greater army arrives," General Zola pragmatically advised. "Sepulchral will likely attempt to use us to destroy the Legions at the least cost to herself possible, but she will still broadly be on our side."

"Or she could sit it out entirely, waiting for someone's supplies to run out and desperate decisions start getting made," Aisha pointed out. "We should not assume cooperation of Abreha Mirembé, she is well aware that we do not wish her to climb the Tower."

"Even if we do want to finish off the Legions before Sepulchral arrive, can we?" Vivienne asked.

"If her vanguard helps, I believe it's possible to win a field battle," I said, then hesitated. "I'm not sure how decisive a victory it would be, however."

"That would strengthen the position of the pretender empress when she arrives," Lady Aquiline said. "Give her power in bargaining with us."

She wasn't wrong, I admitted. If Army of Callow and the Loyalist Legions bloodied each other just before Sepulchral arrived with her fresh force, it swung the balance in her favour. On the other hand, should we really wait six days just for this to still be true only with her camped in the hills over the battle? Aisha wasn't wrong either, when she'd said that Sepulchral might just try to live up to the vulture on her banner. No decision was made, in the end, though I knew one would have to be soon. If we were going to attack, it would have to be somewhere over the next three days. Otherwise the margin to rest and regroup before the empress-claimant arrived would be risky.

The trenches and palisades in the valley kept steadily stretching east, and by tomorrow Pickler was certain we'd reach the half-road. Fortifications were not, unfortunately, a goddamned plan. That was our trouble here: we didn't have a plan to beat the Black Knight, even if we could force her into a pitched battle. Which was looking less and less likely by the day.

Both sides extended their defences to the road on the sixth day, the skirmishes beginning again in earnest in Kala Hills. Weather blew in from the north-east that forced everyone to retreat by early afternoon, though with the warm morning sun being covered by clouds as the air cooled. What began as a hard rain that sent everyone running to fill water barrels turned into something altogether less pleasant before the hour was out: rain turned to snow, and then the kind of hard hail I would never have expected of the Wasteland. Everyone was stuck in tents for the rest of the day, until the storm passed halfway through the night.

When the seventh morning rose it was to still-wet ground, the hail having melted overnight, but also to General Zola bringing me a worrying report. Two lines of scouts sent to the south of Moule Hills were hours late in reporting. We hadn't seen movement from the enemy, but the Black Knight might have moved troops under cover of the hail.

"Battle formations," I ordered Zola. "And prepare a force to handle our eastern flank in case they went around Moule Hills unseen."

Yet I learned, not even an hour later, that I'd been wrong. It was not the Legions that had caught our scouts. Well, in a sense I supposed it actually had been. In the middle stretch of Moule Hills, well to the south of Sepulchral's camp and about the height of the mirroring fortified lines, banners had been raised. Legion banners: the Second, Third and Ninth.

The Rebel Legions had arrived before Sepulchral could, and the balance hadn't swung against us so much as swung down on our heads.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

knockoffnikolai

Aquiline grinned.

"You have us an honour war, Black Queen," she said, sounding delighted.

"Honour can bite my ass," I said. "Bring me votes, Osenä."

Liliet

Seriously? You're not even the person making the actual reminder and you're doing this?

Pethrai D'arkos

I mean it's practically tradition now. It is our duty to compensate for those who forget.

Liliet

I don't think Droughtbringer forgot. I think they're doing exactly what they mean to do.

Insanenoodlyguy

Litliet, I know this is a peeve of yours, but you really got to let it go. Some of us have fun with this. That's fine! Some of us don't, like you. Also fine! But there is no reason for you to show up and be this annoyed about it. I mean, if Droughtbringer comes back and says "please don't reply to my posts with these" then okay, sure. As it is known you don't like these doing it as a response to your posts would be pretty dickish. But unless Droughbringer is your alt... you... don't need to care on their behalf?

Miles

Just pick less iconic lines. Even someone like litliet can be made to enjoy them if they aren't precisely chosen to ruin the important story beats.

therealgridlock

Ah yes,

"I was stuck taking a 17 hour long shit.

Vivienne arrived, asked if I needed anything.

'Need some more toilet paper,' I said. 'Aside from that, could always use more votes.'

She wandered away with a sigh to fetch me a roll of both."

nim

Nah this should stop

Anonymous

Honestly, I'm annoyed by it too. Many of us are. Please understand that when a few people vocalize their complaints, there are usually quite a lot more who are quietly displeased. This shameless vote-fishing with bait-and-switch blurbs is the single biggest reason I often don't feel like looking at the comment section, because it instantly brings down my mood, and I imagine I'm not the only one.

Furthermore, this smarmy post of yours where you act upbeat in order to upbraid someone and essentially tell them to stfu because you don't like to read those posts without so much as a hint of irony at how the post you are faulting as improper is itself a request for people to tone down a posting habit they do not appreciate smacks of hypocrisy and selfishness masquerading as friendliness/empathy. I find that insincerity and self-centered approach to what constitutes pleasant behavior galling, which is why I find myself responding.

So perhaps you should consider letting it go instead.

medailyfun

the groove into Creation

Shveiran

God forbid someone makes a joke you don't find funny...

Liliet

I know, right? Awful.

Irritant

Seriously? You're not even the person voting and you're doing this?

ninegardens

On the one hand, I understnd Lilliets horror. On the other, this is actually a pretty good riff.

Pethrai D'arkos

I mean it's practically tradition now. It is our duty to compensate for those who forget.

Pethrai D'arkos

Replied to the wrong post and the stupid thing won't let me delete it.

Liliet

You're not wrong about this specific time, but the principle of the thing... It's not like people who do this always make them okay.

TeK

I mean it's practically a tradition now... to not make it ok. We have to compensate for those who blunder.

knockoffnikolai

I know this is a strongly-felt position for you, but I don't agree that riffing on the text ruins the text.

Liliet

me staring at a pile of ashes I don't agree that throwing a match on these flammable materials burns them down

knockoffnikolai

I wrote that comment and then was like "wait she's on discord I can just talk to her there." Based on that conversation I was misunderstanding your issue with the voties. (I'm Trollmore btw)

Liliet

o hi lol

Witness Alex

Hyperbolic nonsense. By definition these comments don't ruin the text. At most they, "ruin," the comments section.

Except they don't, skip down by one (or the first chain) and voila! Not ruined.

The argument that it undermines the tone of the chapter is often correct, especially in chapters with strong emotional impact. But by this stage you know that the jokes will be there, so just delay reading down until a harmless joke won't sour your mood.

SomeGuyWhoReadsThings

I'm subscribed to lord of the rings memes on Reddit and it's still a text I hold in the highest regard, like a Bible to a christian. What a hill you guys have chosen to die on....

Insanenoodlyguy

That is an act of destruction. This is an act of alteration. Completely different school of magic!

Tiredofcancelculturestickingitsbeakineverywhere

When you posted this on December 7, 2018 it ruined the immersion for me because i scrolled down to the comments section but thought I was still reading the story.

"Akua: Catherine this is the third time I'm saving your life tonight and I know you made a point out of how it was not by making good decisions that I made it into a cloak accessory but right now I think in sheer stupidity your attempts at heroism-
Catherine: You're not wrong. Consider, however: what if I did ANOTHER stupid heroic thing, most definitely dooming us both to die slowly and painfully, and you let me Akua: ...
Akua: Okay."

I think it would be better if you didn't write stuff like this as you're not the author. I know I'm the only one complaining but that proves theres lots more that don't like it too.

I think all comments should only be a bland text equivalent of a golf clap to keep this beautiful work of fiction unsullied.

Rynjin

And that is exactly the reason I choose to participate in comments here sometimes, and not on RoyalRoad stories.

A chapter can have 100 comments and at least 80 of them will be "thsnks for the chapter", "TFTC", or "thanks for the snack".

You could assign an AI to write comments on modt stories there and nobody would be able to tell the difference between it and other posters.

I'd rather see a thousand bad jokes and crack theories thsn another bland, inane "thanks".

isioisi

Man you guys who rail on those that make the vote posts are more annoying than the actual vote posts. Can't you just scroll past it and get on with your lives? Yikes.

Liliet

You do realize that every criticism of my criticism is making this part of the comment section even longer, right? 🤪

Maarten S

I could say the same to you.

Kennedy

Alright so my guess for the next chapter names is something along the lines release/loose then maybe follow through since that is a fairly important part of archery

Lictor Magnus

That's what I had though earlier after nock but anchor and aim were not two titles in the line of thought I saw coming.

ruduen

Yes, they refer to the steps of archery. There are different depending on the source you're using. For example current NASP (National Archery in the Schools Program) steps, which are one of the first to come up in my Googling, are:

1. Stance
2. Nock
3. Draw Hand Set
4. Bow Hand Set
5. Pre-Draw
6. Draw
7. Anchor
8. Aim
9. Shot Set-up
10. Release
11. Follow-Through

Note that I imagine we're using a different set of steps here, likely based on a historical set. The uses of steps in Chapter Names started in Chapter 12 (String), and I expect the set used here is something based on historical records, rather than the modern interpretation. I'd expect 2-3 more chapters on the pace, but I'd put money on Release and Follow-Through showing up.

Kennedy

I do target archery and I learned it as feet, draw, anchor, level, aim, release, follow through. So far there's been footing or feet, pull or draw, anchor, no level since there's no scopes, and aim. Nock and string aren't part of my mnemonic device but you're right that it makes sense for more historical archery.

irritantseraphim

Gotta string that bow before you nock the arrow. And you gotta nock that arrow before you draw.

caoimhinh

So next chapter should be something like "Hold"?

I doubt it's gonna be shoot/release/loose.
That's likely to be for next Friday, in the time-honored tradition of leaving us with a cliffhanger for the weekend.

shikkarasu

Pretty sure that 'hold' is only used in cinema for dramatic tension. Drawing the bow and holding it for any length of time is a great way to wear out your arms, given that you are holding 40-50 Kilos while you are waiting to loose.

RoflCat

My vote is on Taut i.e. pulled position just before Loose.

dadycool

I wonder how crucial Archer and Silver Hunter will be in the climax of this arc, then. Presumably, they'll be the deciding factor.

armarm

I'm certain that this series of bow titles refer to juniper always referring to her plans as an arrow in her quiver being drawn out and not to our 2 archer names. this is junipers redemption/recovery arc to set in stone the need for non named players to run the show after cat abdicates.

Liliet

Juniper is still falling towards rock bottom and you think her recovery arc started X chapters ago?

miles

No rock bottom, and thus the start of her recovery, is where she'll be when she pulls the game winning plan out of her head.

Liliet

So yeah you were right yooooooooooooo ♥

whatabutthead

You really complain about the joke vote posts but come back to post spoilers on old chapters? Or is this post a joke?

Liliet

...Good point. I wish wordpress had a delete function.

dadycoool

The bits with the Levantines were nice. "Here's a sandbox for you two to play in. Have fun." The character growth of Razin is beautiful.

ninegardens

So.... whose side were the rebel legions on? I don't think it was ever cleanly decided.

Also, I can't help but think this all ends with Marshel Nim stepping back and Throwing her hands in the air. The Rebel legions are... friendly towards her? But also have opinions about what she should do. Akua has poisoned her trust in the Empress... and gotten her out of a Rule of 3... but hasn't turned her around or aside.

Cat would really LIKE to preserve these armies, so being able to off "Hey guys, we could just not kill each other" is a fine offer.... if she can get past Nim's concerns.

ruduen

She's not out of the Rule of 3 yet. It's delayed for the moment, but until there's a clear break in the pattern (likely through conclusive non-draw between the Squire and the Black Knight), the story will continue nudging things into place for the draw.

mamm0nn

Actually I wonder about that. Cat acts as if it already affects Creation, but is one loss really enough for the pattern? I mean, it's a pattern, not a ritual cast or a prophecy made.

Yes, I can see Providence nudge a draw if those two Named face off again. But just the Hero losing to the Villain seems like too thin and loose an event for the interactions with other Named and armies to be affected? That seems more something to happen after both the loss and the draw have happened.

Even in Book 1 Cat didn't really have a providence-mandated fate intertwined with William until it was just William's Win ensuring he wouldn't die (too easily) before she did.

agumentic

Any two Hero and Villain, no. But Squire against Black Knight is an old and well-worn story, even a single event has fate inclining its way. And Cat's fate was so intertwined with William's after their first battle that Amadeus straight up said that it was useless to try and pursue him, he'd get away no matter what.

Andrew Smith

It pretty much depends on how fitting a rivalry between those names are like agumentic said William only needed one fight to start benefiting from the pattern of three(just having the second draw basically locks the story in)

Linnus42

The issue is more in my mind two things. One the rules might not be the same because in this case the Squire is the Aggressor as Arthur is part of the side invading Praes ergo making the storyline less favorable. The other issue in my mind is Nim and Arthur aren't really on the same level. Arthur is a bit player in this storyline whereas Nim is more a rival to Juniper or even Cat in this storyline than Arthur. Nim is one of the highest ranking people in her faction. Name or Not Arthur might not even be Top 20 in this section of the Grand Alliance in Praes much less the entire Grand Alliance. Arthur even if he is Squire is really just some random Named the Black Knight fought and beat up during a Raid. So given there different levels and lack of mirroring and storyline linking them I am not sure there would be a Pattern of Three. William and Cat at least fought over the Soul of Callow. Nim and Arthur don't really have any real link.

agumentic

Well, this isn't an exact science, so we can't say for sure where the strength of the story is surpassed by outside factors. But, in the end, he is a Callowan Squire facing the Black Knight of Praes. This story has a backing a thousand years old, there probably were dozens of Squires and Black Knights facing off sort of like this. It's not the most solid of foundations to build a pattern from, but one of the biggest experts in stories and Namelore on the continent believes it's there, so I am inclined to believe her.

shikkarasu

What convinced me was Arthur gaining an Aspect in the wake of the first fight designed to prepare him for the rematch. That's a lot of Narrative weight on this rivalry already. That said, Nim is a strategist; she should be able to find a way out of this.

RoflCat

Nim would need Akua or someone else with better grasp on Story-fu to avoid the pattern.

Even Akua herself seem to be accidentally breaking the expected pattern, like with the 'why not?' towards that guy or this helping of Nim.

Insanenoodlyguy

That's not an accident. That's years watching the Story-Fu master .

Mental Mouse

Cat figured out a way to kill off a Rule Of Three (throwing the middle fight, with a backstop), and Akua was there. And Nim has her own backstop with her possessed bodies.

Liliet

Unfortunately it's really easy for something to be read as a draw.

Cat didn't just throw the middle fight with a backstop, she genuinely made it into a victory for the Pilgrim. She helped him. He achieved his faction's goals in that fight.

(Remember how during their first pattern-of-three encounter Cat had a talk with Rozala and Rozala basically went "look just throw a fight I need one (1) victory over you for show" and Cat was like "I really cannot afford that sorry"? Then Cat went and did exactly what Rozala had asked for, and that was the victory the Pilgrim got)

For Nim to use that tactic and throw the middle fight, she has to genuinely concede something to Cat's faction in the process. A backstop that prevents her from meaningfully losing anything / Cat's faction from meaningfully winning anything, will just make it into a draw and further the pattern.

Mental Mouse

My point re the possession-as-backstop is that she can lose a fight, and even lose a fair bit of military position, without being in danger of actually getting killed.

Liliet

I mean yes she can avoid getting killed by conceding major military objectives. If they're not major enough, considering killing her IS a major objective for Cat's side, it's a draw.

Mental Mouse

Well, that's the trick on her side – but killing her certainly isn't the only objective, and it's not even a primary objective for Cat. Indeed, Cat would be just as happy to turn her into an ally.

She certainly has room to take a loss against the Squire, and she can definitely avoid getting killed by him in the process.

The question is whether she has the savvy (and confidence) to find the line and take the loss when it counts.

Liliet

Yea.

Mental Mouse

Also, Nim's Ro3 isn't with Cat, it's with Squire... and he's not competing for the Black Knight role.

Liliet

No, he's not. Why bring that up?

Mental Mouse

Because he doesn't have to kill her to advance to his own Knight role...

Liliet

So what? That wasn't the case for... oh, ANY of the rivalries we've seen. Heiress never aimed for Black Knight, after all.

caoimhinh

As of now, the Rebel Legions are tentatively on Nim's side. They are going to make her an offer to betray Malicia and force the Empress to abdicate, then go and crush Sepulchral together as a united force.

What to do afterwards is in the air, though, as seems to be the rule for most of those fighting there, including Cat. They all have goals and hopes, but not so much on the side of plans and concrete strategies for this campaign.

Also, if Nim refuses the offer that the Rebel Legions are going to give her, then they are going to support Catherine's war effort, and even support Amadeus's claim to the Tower.

Then again, this is what they said, not necessarily what they will really end up doing, especially considering how Amadeus is yet to appear with all the supply of Goblinfire that the Tribes have.

agumentic

Amadeus already said that he is mostly staying out of this particular mess. Whatever his plans are, he is not going to step into the limelight before Ater.

RoflCat

He's THE Pivot right now with the influence he can wield whether be it the Legions, the Clans or just the veterans still loyal to him.

That is also why him making any move on the board is possibly the worst move for him. It would exposes him to the biggest enemy in his eyes: Bard.

EowynLuna

Amadeus isn't going to appear in this battle. He's going to appear in Ater at the same time Malicia calls all the nobles to the tower. Then everything will be gathered in one place: nobles, tower, goblinfire.

sengachi

"So.... whose side were the rebel legions on? I don't think it was ever cleanly decided."

That's a great question, and I'm sure everyone present would really like an answer to that.

Cicero

Aren't the Rebel Legions suspected of favoring Amadeus' claim to the Tower?

Is this really a bad result?

Liliet

As of the last talk with Cat, the Rebel Legions intend to make a deal with Nim.

edrey

nice chapter. for some reason i am linking this whole book to hakram game, "climbing the tower", several rounds of it. a game of negotiation and position, and more if you think in the next game, like the winner and how you win determine the next round. the three armies lost too much time, now callow is going to take them all next its malicia, amadeus and akua, in ater. then the bard, Dk (behind malicia) and Fk. and all of them are cheating.

shikkarasu

Can I just say, getting a few friends to take on the persona of High Ladies/Lords and less playing so much as roleplaying Raising Towers is more fun than it has any right to be. It basically has to be DnD players who like political intrigue, but the result is a game that is genuinely fun to lose.

Liliet

Well, here's where Cat never really could follow Akua's thought patterns. Turning Nim was Akua's FIRST idea. Then again, that's the Wasteland thought pattern that Nim then showed she wasn't following – Cat probably could predict that if Akua went for that it wouldn't work, and that she'd figure that out quickly. The thing that really wrecked Cat's calculations here was Akua seriously getting into helping Nim through this.

Of course, Akua is actually swaying Nim's opinions on the Tower, here... and Akua knows why Cat is doing what she's doing.

shikkarasu

Cat was right about every ingredient in the pot, but still got the recipe wrong. Akua is making a play for the tower, but she's doing it her way -the good-guy's way- and laying her cards on the table. Cat assumed that Akua would get closer to the Tower before abandoning Evil for a 2nd time, but Akua was always going to take what works from the Power of Friendship. It was, in hindsight, her stated purpose all the way back in the Everdark.

I think this is also why she can't hear the song; Akua isn't climbing the Tower the 'right' way. She's doing what Amadeus did and having honest conversations with her ally. She's trying to find a mutually beneficial arrangement with Nim instead of trying to manipulate, use, and discard the Black Night.

I also don't think Amadeus heard the song while he was taking over Praes. Even before he decided to back Malicia, he was never fighting the 'right' kind of war. He confided in Cat that he only knew The Girl Who Climbed the Tower from Malicia. At least, that's what I got from his statement "[the song] was not for me."

Liliet

No, I'm pretty sure he wouldn't have remembered the song if it was never his. "It wasn't for me" is a statement of choice – he gave the Tower to Malicia, therefore the song wasn't for him.

My understanding is that hearing the song of the Tower is a literal manifestation of hearing the Tower's song – being allured by what the Tower can give you, wanting things that can be reached through taking the Tower.

That's why Amadeus heard it in Epilogue 6 despite wanting nothing more than for it to shut up – he might hate the Tower, but it's the most straightforward way to A LOT of things he wants, and it's a temptation like a bad popup ad – it's just not going away just because you want it to.

Akua, on the other hand... doesn't actually want anything FROM the Tower. If you pay attention to her internal monologue, she has literally no step 2. Not a single time did she mention anything that will happen AFTER she takes the Tower. Not a DE Name she's looking forward to claiming, not an ambitious plan, not a foreign or internal policy she plans on pursuing. And she doesn't even think taking the Tower is pleasant and will lead to personal satisfaction, she jumped to her feet without noticing (Akua!!! Sahelian!!!) when lecturing Nim about it.

Akua is not hearing the Tower's song – she's not seduced by it, she doesn't believe it will give her anything, she doesn't idealize it, she has no plans that incorporate it as a middle step. She's walking towards it because it's a direction she's aware of and she has no other plan – and is not really the kind of person who functions well without one.

And Cat seems to have underestimated just how deeply the whole "good is seductive" thing went for Akua. It's not just guilt. Cat kept SAYING that she would make a person out of her but she doesn't really know this person she made because she could never trust that it was not a persona Akua was deliberately adopting. Cat was worried about overshooting in her estimate of how far Akua has come, but she undershot significantly, instead.

dadycool

Self-sacrificing for the betterment of the majority, getting passionate about trying to save her friends/allies, and leaving your (not so) Good group to take over the Evil side so you can at least use their resources in a productive way. That certainly sounds like Hero behavior. lol, I love how she was completely upfront and honest when she said to the Sisters that she had the Power of Friendship on her side and she was going to use it.

Liliet

Deep sarcasm that is also completely upfront and honest actually is honestly the best.

gnaruscat

And is totally Akua

Liliet

Yes ♥

Burlyraven

Damnit, Juniper, get your head out of your ass. Your warlord need you.

Liliet

Welcome to the life everyone else leads Juniper: the one where maybe someone else could do your job better, but they have their own job, so your own is yours to do SO GET YOUR HEAD OUT OF YOUR ASS AND DO YOUR BEST

Juff

Typo Thread:

they raised or > they raised you or horsemen, Talbot > horsemen; Talbot us as risk > us at risk skirmishers from that > skirmishers that Askum > Aksum (occurs twice)
Tall and with > Tall with was hard pill > was a hard pill intervene of > intervene if the Aquiline > the Lady Aquiline
I have the order > I gave the order decisions start > decisions to start Sepulchral arrive > Sepulchral arrives
If Army > If the Army scouts send > scouts sent

ohJohN

goddamned > godsdamned

Frivolous

I'm not too concerned on behalf of Catherine and the Grand Alliance.

In a situation with so many sides of almost equal strength and strategic and tactical cunning, chance holds sway, which means providence rules.

I suppose it's Catherine's nature and training to ignore providence because she's a villain and all, but she has heroes in her army, which means the Story will tend to turn out well for her side, more often than not.

Also she's coming into a truly mega Name, one that I believe encompasses a Role as a matchless strategist and commander of armies, which means she's more likely to win than lose.

Liliet

Same.

Beside pure story logic, the Rebel Legions will most likely only make a deal with Nim if Nim agrees to go against Malicia, which means Catherine suddenly has a lot less incentive to oppose her. And Akua's a wild card that is due to give Cat a massive payoff sometime soon.

RoflCat

>And Akua's a wild card that is due to give Cat a massive payoff sometime soon

Or the biggest surprise because Cat-Akua thing is on that Callowan revenge i.e. Catherine refused Akua's redemption moment in favor of her own revenge, even if it's costing her a lot at this moment (the magic that dropped them out of the Ways, even if she soften the blow, Nim avoiding Pattern of Three for now, etc)

So the best counter Akua can make is to 'give Catherine what she want, but not the way she want it'

Liliet

Akua is already giving Cat surprises.

And I don't think Cat "refused Akua's redemption moment". Stopping Akua from sacrificing her own life is not an "evil action denying her redemption" and neither is "refusing to kiss her". Like, that's just... Cat's prerogative. Her plans for what she'll offer Akua to do eventually are monstrous sure but she has not yet implemented them in any way shape or form, so far she's played this entirely by the book.

And that nets payoff.

TeK

I have a feeling that Aqua nudging Nim from one side, and Legions nudging her from the other can actually make her swing the other way around. The problem is merely justifying her rebellion to her beliefs. Legions need to be loyal to Praes, not necessarily the ruling Tyrant should do the trick.

308924810a

I'd thought the rebel legions would take longer to arrive. I guess they took Twilight to get here?

When it was discussing the need for a plan I immediately jumped to waiting out the six days for Sephulchural to arrive and letting everyone fortify and get attached to their camp positions, then leaving Sephulchural and the Black Knight and walking off with the army of Callow, or at least threatening to do so.

With the rebel legions approaching and the Callowan army threatening to leave, Sephulchural's force might be forced to attack first, in the understanding that they need to beat the legions before reinforcements arrive.

Cold Cyberia

I suspect not much fighting will happen now that the Rebels are here. Shit will go down once the rest of Sepulchral's army arrives. Malicia will trigger whatever contingencies she has but the plan will backfire and cause Nim to side with the rebels. Maybe demons? We've not seen demons in a while and Malicia wanted Sahelian artefacts back IIRC.

Overall, I think the Rebels and Nim have fairly similar ideology: both represent the "new" evil, based on strong institutions and strict meritocracy. The difference is that Nim believes Malicia is a legitimate ruler whereas the Rebels don't. Black is a couple of steps ahead in that he believes the seat of a Dread Empress is incompatible with the institutions he's created through the Reforms.

Steven Silver

I liked Razin before this. Now I love him. His character arc's been one of my more favorite, so far, and I loved every moment of him using his experience to put an uppity lordling in his place XD

Also:

"Put their heads on his bed," I said. "With a written note: vote."

—

She's probably not talking about you, reader, but I wouldn't risk it 😊

magesbe

I think what Akua is doing with Nim is interesting; sure it makes killing Nim harder, but the thing is, Nim doesn't have to be an enemy. She would make for a very powerful ally in fact if she could be turned, which may be possible if Nim fully believes Akua in that Malacia was letting her get killed.

ohJohn

That scenario has some interesting parallels to Malicia's own climb to the top of the Tower: a girl, her family killed by the current Tyrant (Alaya's father, Tasia) and forced into servitude (Nefarious, Cat), teams up with a freshly-minted Black Knight, who's focused on improving Praes through reforms and institutions (Nim explicitly following Amadeus's example here), to take down the current Tyrant.

Jason Ipswitch

We just need one more army and we'll have a grand five-way standoff. Just like back in War College.

Zach

Looks like I was right about Catherine underestimating how much Akua changed. Catherine seems to have thought that Akua would genuinely seek to climb the Tower and only truly regret things afterwards, but Akua is already taking a bunch of actions that conflict with that goal and I seriously doubt that she'll be able to successfully climb the Tower like this.

Liliet

Yep.

It's beautiful.

violentink

I suspect this isn't where the story is going but HOT TAKE: Juniper is Right.

Like, universal principle of military command – if someone does not have confidence in their own ability to command, then you should remove them from the post, because they would know.

Best move for Cat is to give Juniper independent command back in the war vs the Dead King, where there's no buck to pass, and let her (a) develop as a commander and (b) build her confidence again.

In story terms though, I feel Cat is gonna screw up and Juniper is gonna pull her arse out of the fire in a Big Damn Heros moment and I am so here for that. 😊

Chapter 18: Release

"The trick isn't to win battles, it's to let your opponents lose them."

—Aretha the Raven, Nicaean general

General Sacker came to meet me with a company of a hundred heavies and three lines of mages, the lot of them glittering with at least half a dozen defensive enchantments and shield spells at the tip of their hands. Well, would you look at. The Rebel Legions had grasped the reality that I might be somewhat cross at them. It was almost like they'd taken my coin and supplies for years before turning on me at the first opportunity. I wasn't going to be forgetting that, or any other of their small slights.

"Hail, Black Queen."

A mere twenty knight stood fanned out behind me. What need did I have for a larger escort than that?

"Sacker," I said. "Fancy seeing you here."

The goblin general had only walked up to the edge of the defensive enchantments and not a step further. I would have been offended by that if I hadn't seriously considered slaughtering the entire contingent and ripping her plans out of her mind on the ride here. Only the certainty that it would push the rebels to allying with the Black Knight, however temporarily, had stayed my hand.

"You were warned of our march," General Sacker replied. "We have dealt openly with you."

"Debatable at best," I flatly replied. "But let's pretend I buy that, just for a moment. Keep up that alleged streak and tell me what you lot came here to do."

"We aim to engage in talks with Marshal Nim," Sacker said. "We have no intention of fighting you save if you force our hand."

I snorted. General Mok's plan to talk the Black Knight into deposing Malicia was still their play, then. They were fools if they thought it would get them anywhere. Nim was in deep with the Tower, she wasn't going to defect now. Malicia would string them along until she no longer had a use for them, a situation I could only assume was imminent.

"And your stance regarding Sepulchral's forces?" I asked.

"If arrangement is reached with the Black Knight, there will be either surrender or war," Sacker said. "If not, the situation remains fluid. Regardless, we will not attack unless first provoked."

Mhm. Then they weren't all in on Mok's plan yet. The vanguard in the northern Moule Hills was being used as threat on the flank of the Loyalist Legions, one they had no intention of removing before a deal was struck with the Black Knight. An alliance with the Rebel Legions wasn't on the table – wouldn't be unless Marshal Nim refused their entreaties outright, which she wouldn't because she wasn't a fucking idiot – so there was no point in aiming for that. I could, though, aim for a smaller concession.

"Then I'll ask for your promise to stand aside should I intervene to prevent Marshal Nim wiping out the vanguard," I said. "If not your help outright, which I would take as a sign of good faith doing much to restore your trustworthiness in my eyes."

She hesitated.

"They are a rebel force," General Sacker hedged. "The Black Knight's duty is clear."

I met her eyes and let all pleasantness drip down from my face.

"My tolerance has limits," I said, tone so very mild.

"We are not in your service," the goblin general snorted.

"No," I replied, "but so far you have toed the line when it came to being my enemy. You might want to consider the price of crossing it, before you offer me another half-hearted platitude."

"I am a general of-"

"You were a general," I coldly interrupted. "Now you're a vagrant that twice bit the hands feeding you. You're out of chances, Sacker. With me, with the Tower, with everybody else."

"Threats will not sway me, girl," General Sacker said.

I let Night billow in my veins, coming quicker for the anger in my blood.

"A threat?" I laughed. "Do you honestly think your little spells would stop me if I wanted you all dead? If I wanted to rip out every secret from your head and make them dance before my eyes? It's not a threat when I warn you, Sacker. You are not strong enough for my words to be hypothetical. If you get in my way, I will fucking step on you."

I leaned forward.

"So I'm going to ask you again," I said. "I want your promise to stand aside, should I intervene to prevent the Black Knight from wiping out Sepulchral's vanguard."

Still she hesitated, and a ring of red light formed high above me as Night kept coming to me. I ripped it out of the sky without even bothering to look.

"So long as no deal has been struck with the Black Knight, you have our promise," General Sacker finally said.

"Good," I harshly smiled.

"You are not making allies with your words, girl," the goblin said.

"And still I somehow seem to have more than you lot," I replied.

I cocked my head to the side.

"And Sacker, one last thing?" I added.

She watched me expectantly.

"Call me girl again and I'll make you eat your own tongue," I calmly told her.

Somehow, I saw, the calm gave her more pause than my anger had.

—

The Rebel Legions did two things the day they blew into our increasingly crowded battlefield. The first was send envoys to both myself and the Black Knight. The second was throw their hat in the ring, so to speak. The Loyalist Legions and my Army of Callow had dug trenches and raised palisades along two thirds of the length of the valley between the hills, all the way to the road, but the deserters sent their sappers downhill the moment they had a camp up and began digging a trench of their own. Facing mine and Nim's, vertical to our horizontal.

"They're digging a hundred feet past crossbow range, both ours and the Legions'," General Zola informed us at council. "Sapper-General Pickler believes their fortifications will end up in a thin crescent facing our lines."

"We'll need to raise our own trenches facing theirs," I sighed. "Or they'll be able to flank us at will."

It would turn our fortifications into a straight corner with one side facing the Loyalist Legions and the other the Rebel ones, while the Black Knight's trench would end up at a much wider angle. Given their more numerous sappers, though, I didn't anticipate them losing much of a step.

"We're getting boxed in," Grandmaster Talbot said. "With all these walls and trenches the Order will be made useless."

"We can't prevent them for raising fortifications of their own without forcing a battle," Aisha said. "One at which we will be at a severe disadvantage, should the Black Knight reinforce them."

Which she probably would. The deserters were still at a full force, thirteen thousand and fresh. The Army of Callow numbered a little under thirteen thousand, now, and Nim's legions should be around twenty or twenty-one thousand. That battle would see us outnumbered more than two to one while flanked, which was a recipe for disaster. We couldn't afford to start that fight.

"We do nothing," I said, the words bitter against my tongue. "To them, at least. Our sappers need to prepare our flank for the possibility of assault now."

It was out of my hands, now. All I could hope was that my enemies did not yet band together. The day passed quickly enough, laden with bad news, but the following warning ended up just as darkened. Scribe had requested the war council gather, which was rare enough I did not think twice about granting the request. What she had to say was not long, but it still hit hard.

"It cost me most of my agents within Sepulchral's main host, but I have found out who plans her campaign for her," Scribe said.

I laid back into my seat, already sensing this was not pleasant news.

"Instructions are received by letter, which are read out loud over scrying ritual," Eudokia said. "The physical letters eventually make their way to Sepulchral herself, however, and my people were able to forge a decent copy of one before fleeing camp."

She set down a letter on the table, which aside from having calligraphy small and cramped did not particularly evoke anything in me. Juniper, though, breathed in sharply.

"This is Grem One-Eye's handwriting," Scribe said. "He has been planning Sepulchral's campaign for her from captivity in Ater."

I grimaced. Well, fuck. Just what we needed, another marshal in the mix. My fingers clenched, then unclenched. Wrong way to think about this, I decided. Grem wouldn't have had the pull to do this on his own, someone had to be helping him. Hells, someone had to have asked him to do this because otherwise I couldn't see him helping Abreha Mirembe. And only two people were in position to do it, Malicia and my father. It didn't fit Malicia, though, her way of doing things. Even if she'd been helping Sepulchral stay afloat with good advice, she would have cut off the flow now. She could no longer afford game this elaborate.

So it meant I had, at last, found the first trace of what my father was up to in Kala.

That somewhat improved my mood, but it passed quickly. While I'd been lost in thought I'd not been paying attention to the table, which only claimed my attention again when there was a ripple in the assembled council. Juniper had gotten to her feet.

Without a word, she walked out of the tent and did not return.

—

Once more I found the Marshal of Callow standing beneath a sycamore.

The same as last time, a bone-dry skeleton of a tree hollowed out inside. Dead and dying, the limbs having yet to catch up to the emptiness at the heart of it. Juniper's escort had stayed far, as ordered, and as I limped past them across the dusty ground I found my eye dragged above. Sunset was painting the sky in layers, just like the stones of the hills to the west: the dark blue of night high above, with a distant moon, but then it lightened. Yellowed. Only to deepen once more, orange and red and at last a rich purple. Day died and its death throes shifted across the stone and dust, shade cutting in fluid slices as it swallowed up Creation in a never-sated maw. The Wasteland, for all its many dangers, was capable of eerie beauty at times.

Juniper was not leaning against the tree. I saw that first, even as I approached her. I had thought to find here the same hunched and self-loathing creature that'd been wearing the skin of one of my oldest friends for over a sennight, but this was... different. Her back might not be straight, but she was not sagging like withered vine. Instead she stood there with a lost and thoughtful look on her face, looking straight west. I followed her gaze, founding nothing more than the sappers of the Rebel Legions at work digging their own trench and palisade. They were skilled hands, well-drilled for all that they had deserted the Tower's service. The three generals leading them had kept them disciplined.

I hesitated to break the silence. I'd found what I'd thought I would, and I was not sure I wanted to interrupt... whatever this was. For all the intensity of the Hellhound's gaze, I had of late seen in her fragility that had me staying my hand. As I wrestled with my doubts, she came to a decision of her own. Her voice was rasping when she spoke. Dry, and she licked her chops before doing it.

"The Scribe, she said that Sacker's in command among the deserters," Juniper said. "Is it true?"

I hummed.

"Can't be sure," I admitted. "But the Jacks heard the same thing. I think Mok has more pull when it comes to strategic decisions, since he has the biggest army, but that Sacker's the lead for tactics."

Her eyes never left the sappers digging to the west. I bit my lip, then cast aside my hesitation. It wasn't doing me any good.

"They tell me you've been here more than two hours," I said. "Have you been looking at them the whole time?"

The Hellhound laughed. It was a low, rumbling thing. Not quite amused or happy, more like a... release. Vented feeling.

"Yeah, I have," Juniper said. "Because there's this..."

She shook her head.

"She was like an aunt to me, Sacker," the orc said.

I did remember. It felt like a lifetime ago, but I remembered. I'd never seen her as embarrassed as she had been when I'd first seen her meet her mother and almost-aunt fuss over her after she became a legate. It'd been a memorable sight.

"Auntie Sacks," I idly said.

"She used to tell me stories," Juniper distantly said. "When I was small, Catherine. To make me go to sleep. That was all back in Summerholm, before I went home to be raised by my father. Goblin stories about gore and raids and little girls that got gobbled up for being too slow or too dim."

"She seemed close to your mother," I said.

I'd never grown to know either more than shallowly, but it's been obvious to be even when I'd been young.

"She was probably Mom's closest friend in the world," she replied. "She spent more years of her life with Sacker at her side than she did my own father. It showed. Goblins aren't usually... good with children. Sacker was making an effort."

"She seems to have made an impression on you," I said.

Juniper flashed pale fangs at the deepening night.

"She did," the Hellhound said. "But not just for the stories. Did you ever hear she was meant to rise to Marshal in Ranker's place when she retired?"

"There were rumours," I acknowledged. "You know, back before..."

I gesture vaguely, meaning a great many things but not in particular. She snorted in amusement.

"I looked up to her for that," Juniper said. "Even more than I did my mother, because my mother was never going to rise higher than she had. It wasn't like Istrid Knightsbane I wanted to be when I grew up, Catherine. It was like Grem and Ranker and Nim. The Marshals. And Sacker, she had the stuff. The marshals knew it, so the Carrion Lord. If things had turned out different, it could be her serving as the Tower's greatest captain instead of Nim."

"A lot of things could have gone differently," I said.

My hand half-rose to the cloth covering the eye sloppiness had cost me before I forced it down. Some mistakes stayed with you longer than others. I found Juniper's gaze had moved to me, catching sight of the aborted movement, and I flushed in embarrassment. Those kinds of regrets I preferred kept unseen from even my friends.

"It's an eye, Catherine," Juniper said. "Just an eye. You could lose both and still be who you are. And that's what eats at me. When did you know?"

"Know what?"

Her gaze was alight with something I could not quite name.

"Who you were," Juniper gravelled. "We've hung titles around your neck like necklaces at a summer fair, Warlord. Countess. Squire. Arch-heretic of the East. Black Queen, Queen of Lost and Found, of Winter, of the Hunt. First Under the Night. But before that, when did you know?"

Half a dozen answers, some flippant and others rote, came to the tip of my tongue. I could not get any of them out, not meeting her eyes with my last remaining one. Seeing the cast of her face in the last gaps of the day, the despair and the hunger that burned in her eyes. I did love her, Juniper. My own Hellhound. As deeply as I did the Woe. I'd loved her as the hard-eyed foe I had to overcome to prove myself worthy of my father's tutelage, when we'd both been children, and I loved her now as the woman who'd built a kingdom and an army with me. So I stayed silent, for a long moment, and told her the truth.

"In the Everdark," I quietly said. "There was..."

I swallowed. I'd never spoken of this to anyone, not even Hakram. The words did not come easy. Was there a way in any language ever made that I could truly explain what they had been, the last moments of the battle in Great Strycht?

"I lost," I finally said, tone quiet. "They carved me open, Juniper, and all the power and the death and the madness I'd gorged myself on came pouring back out."

I looked down and found my hand was shaking a bit. I had come to understand the Sisters, and they me, but that had been after. After.

"It was like blinders went off my eyes," I murmured. "And Gods, but I had done so many horrible things. More of them were all I could see ahead, and I was just so fucking tired. So I went down."

I closed my fingers into a fist, to kill the tremors.

"And I stayed down, waiting to choke in the snow."

I heard the sharp intake of breath.

"But I didn't," I murmured. "It took too long, you see. Snow melted enough I could breathe. And I still wanted to stay down, to sleep, but I just..."

I laughed, as mirthlessly as she had.

"It was a choice," I said. "And there was nothing weighing the balance either way. So I ask myself, why not?"

I tightened my cloak around my shoulders, shivering.

"And then?" Juniper quietly asked.

"And then I got up," I softly smiled. "And I think that's what stayed with me, Juniper. The even balance and the question and the choice I made. And it's gone to shit since, you know. Death and doom and the age falling down on our heads. And every day the same choice is there waiting to be made: lie down..."

"Or stand up," the Hellhound finished.

I nodded.

"I've stayed on my feet," I said. "I will, until I am either victorious or I die. I think that's what left of me, when you whittle away the rest."

Juniper looked away.

"I thought it'd be victory," the Hellhound admitted.

"It's never the victories that stay with you," I tiredly said.

Large fingers laid against the dead wood.

"No," the Marshal of Callow said, "I guess not."

A moment passed.

"You're looking west again."

"Ranker's dead," Juniper quietly said. "But Sacker's here. Nim is here. And Grem uses Sepulchral's army. Everyone who is or could be a Marshal of Praes."

I studied her, but her expression was hard to make out and her eyes stayed west.

"There's this thing I see, Catherine," she confessed. "The lay of it. Two hours I've watched the sappers, how quick they work. How quick the work will be done. And I know how quickly Nim's will work, and ours and..."

"And what?" I quietly asked.

"And there is a box," the Marshal of Callow said. "Where the battle will happen. I see it. It's where it'll all happen and we can shape it."

I could smell it the air, now. Victory. Yet Creation did not shiver, fate did not ripple like a lake in the wind, because this was not the writ of any Gods. It was just Juniper of the Red Shields, looking at a dusty field in the middle of nowhere and being the woman I'd glimpsed in her at seventeen.

"You want to fight," I said.

It was not a question.

"Sacker hasn't seen it," Juniper said, sounding disbelieving. "She can't have, not if she's raising those walls. Sacker hasn't seen it, and she could have been a Marshal."

Large fingers clawed at the thin bark of the dying sycamore. She turned to me.

"I could be wrong," she told me, tone anguished. "I could be just seeing what's not there. I've... these have not been good days, Catherine, and I did not stand up in the face of them. I need you to know that I could be wrong."

I would have answered, but she was not done. The words were spilling out of her like broken barrel.

"I feel like my entire life I've been drawing a bow," Juniper said. "And ever since I've been your marshal, I've just... stood there. And my hand's been trembling. But this? This place, this box, these foes?"

The hand left the tree and she pushed away, straightening her back.

"I can release the arrow," Juniper of the Red Shields said, pleaded. "I can win this. Please."

And I could have taken her by the arm, brought her close and told her that she did not need to win back my trust because she'd never lost it. But I knew, sure as dawn, that it was not what she wanted. Needed. And I was my father's daughter, so I offered her the very same grace I was once offered. My wrist snapped out and metal slapped against my palm.

I handed her a knife, pommel first.

"If you mean the words," I replied, "commit. Carve them."

Incomprehension, first, but I saw her eyes clear as she matched my gaze. I did not mean the plea, or the apology that came unspoken with it. Those were between us. What I wanted from her was conviction. The Hellhound leaned close to the tree, reaching inside, and carved. The strokes shook, at first, but grew certain. Her hand did not tremble. And when she withdrew, deep in the hollow of a dead tree waited these words: Marshal Juniper wins here. I smiled, startled.

"Here?" I asked, amused. "Exactly?"

"This tree is where we win," the Marshal of Callow said, tone even, "and everyone else loses."

She offered me back the knife, pommel first. I took it.

"Let's go home," I said. "It's getting late."

"Yeah," Juniper said, eyes red. "Let's go home, Catherine."

We'd left alone. We came back together.

—

"First, we shape the box," the Marshal of Callow said.

It was a surprisingly simple thing, when it came down to it. We had our palisade and trench from Kala Hills to the half-road, so the only way to go was south. The assumption in my head had been that it'd turn into a right angle facing the Rebel Legion line, but Juniper had seen otherwise. Sacker and her fellows had been clever in putting themselves between two forces that did not want to fight them, forcing them to dig in and confirm their position of kingmaker of this battlefield. The downside, though, was that the sappers of the Rebel Legions needed to dig their trench in both directions simultaneously. So we took advantage of that.

We began building westwards instead of south, a sloping line of defence headed towards Moule Hills. Immediately the Rebel Legions began trying to force us back by cutting through our path, keeping at the same distance neither of us had yet dared to break, but when they focused their efforts south the Loyalist Legions began pushing at them instead. Nim wasn't any more interested in giving them leverage than we were, after all.

"The slopes grow steeper further south of Moule Hills," the Hellhound said. "That leaves only a narrow passage through which they can move troops into the valley, if they attack. That will shape where they attack."

"Which we don't want them to," I pointed out.

"Indeed. So while we raise our works we have to delay," the Marshal of Callow said. "We must maintain the stalemate until Sepulchral's main host arrives."

She had notions as how that should be done, of course. The first was to put the Loyalist Legions on the backfoot by poisoning the source of water they'd been using since we cut them off from their supply lines: Nioqe Lake.

"We don't have anything that can poison a lake that large," I pragmatically said.

I'd pretty much kill the town of Risas as well, but I was less broken up about that when they'd been providing guides to Legion skirmishers. I'd offer them safe passage south through the territory I controlled, but I wasn't going to weep about them being driven out if we did it. Which I wasn't sure we could.

"We do," Juniper grunted, "for the same reason that we had to use that lake for water. Arcadian water can't be safely drunk."

A hundred knights, Masego and myself went for a ride. We tore through Akua's attempts to stop us and I opened a gate in the sky, making Nioqe Lake a third larger and entirely unusable for water supplies.

"Then slow the deserters," the Marshal of Callow said. "The moment their walls are up they can afford to start provoking us and strongarm the Black Knight."

She spent half a day with Pickler out in the field, studying the eastern slopes of Moule Hills, before asking me for Archer and the Huntress. Ballistas were moved, and then fired at the hillside exactly five times with the Named as spotters. The ensuing landslide didn't kill anyone that we saw, but it did drop down a least of tone of rock right in the middle of the way of the Rebel Legions. They'd have to clear them out before they could get back to work.

"So we hit the Loyalists, after that," I guessed.

"It's necessary and they had to be last," the Hellhound said. "By now they've used all their sudes to match our wall and the deserters'. But we don't want them to be able to keep fortifying over the next few days, they would encircle Sepulchral's camp with walls entirely. Thankfully, their wood reserves were used to make the ring of forts around the Aksum camp, so they are now entirely dependent on the wood cut down in Kala Hills."

"So what do we do, drive them out?" I asked.

"That would be too costly," Juniper replied. "There is another way. It hasn't rained in days. All you have to do, Catherine, is live up to your reputation."

We set fire to the damned hills. Masego and I with large columns of blackflame, but it wasn't only us. Indrani and Alexis shot fire arrows, a raiding party with Squire and Apprentice started a swath with torches and fire spells. The blaze got out of control when the wind turned, burnt a chunk of the hills under our control as well, but for the better part of the day the wind had blown north. The Legions weren't going to get anything but ash out of those hills.

"The Black Knight will dismantle Ogarin for spare parts," the Marshal of Callow noted, "but that will take time and the townsfolk will resist. It should buy us long enough."

—

It did.

Sepulchral had been six days as well, and we kept the stalemate going just long enough. Our wall was anchored on the slopes of Moule Hills, facing that of the Rebel Legions, while to the north the Black Knight had hemmed them in as well. Envoys had gone back and forth between those camps, but no alliance against the Army of Callow had emerged. We'd kept them on the backfoot until Sepulchral arrived from the west with the rest of her twenty-thousand strong army. The Loyalist Legions had not finished their encirclement of the camp up in Moule Hills, and so they were forced to evacuate the sole fort in the way of Sepulchral linking her forces together late in the sixth day.

And so, at least, everyone was here.

"My agents in the Rebel Legion camp tell me that the talks with Marshal Nim are souring," Scribe told me the same day, in my tent.

"She's still not budging?" I asked.

"She has promised to extract of Malicia promises to make suborning officers of the Legions of Terror with mind control spells," Scribe said, "but she still refuses to turn on the Tower in any significant manner. Now there is division among their generals. Sacker is pushing for their force to declare in favour of Amadeus as Dread Emperor, but Mok is strongly opposed. He instead argues that if further concessions are extracted from Malicia, safeguarding the sanctity of the Legions, their reasons for breaking with the Tower no longer exist."

"Jaiyana Seket?" I asked.

"Hedging," Scribe grimaced. "There's not telling which way she'll end up leaning."

I breathed out. General Mok was arguing to rejoin Malicia's cause, essentially. And he'd never bothered to pretend he was anything but hostile to my presence in Praes, or indeed the Grand Alliance's concerns about the Dread Empire. I'd warned them that my tolerance had limits.

"Have assassin kill Mok," I said. "Frame Sepulchral for it if you can."

"That should be-" Scribe began, but she was interrupted when Vivienne blew into my tent.

I cocked an eyebrow at my successor, who was looking rather harried.

"Viv?"

"Trouble," she said. "I have a fresh word from the Jacks. General Mok was killed an hour ago."

I glanced at Scribe, but she shook her head. I supposed not even the Webweaver worked that fast.

"Where's the trouble?" I asked.

"General Seket got killed as well and they caught the people who supposedly killed both," Vivienne said.

I swore furiously.

"They caught Jacks, didn't they?" I asked.

She nodded.

"It's... bad, Catherine," she said. "There's been brawls in their camp, people are saying this is a coup by Sacker done with our backing. That she's planning to sell out Praes to the Grand Alliance."

I swore again.

"If I may hazard a guess," Scribe mildly said, "the figurehead of this belief will be the senior legate for either Mok or Jaiyana Seket?"

Vivienne looked startled.

"Mok," she confirmed.

I leaned back into my seat, closing my eyes and rubbing the bridge of my nose. Well, that was a particularly convenient turn for the Tower wasn't it?

"Fuck," I said. "Malicia played us."

She'd whipped the deserters into a frenzy against us just before a battle was to erupt and the seniormost officer with a clean reputation was most likely in her pocket. Maybe if there were a few days or a week for things to calm down this could be straightened out, but we wouldn't get that long. Ten to one odds she had something nasty cooked up for Sepulchral's army too, I thought.

"Tomorrow we have a battle on our hands," I plainly said. "We need to pull off your plan tonight, Vivienne. Can it be done?"

She grimaced.

"I would have liked a day or two longer, to make contact with the right people," she admitted. "But it is not impossible."

"Then go get your cloak, we move with nightfall," I said. "I'll need you to inform Juniper, Scribe, because come dawn the blades will finally come out."

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

mamm0nn

"Trouble," she said. "I have a fresh word from the Jacks. A Practical Guide to Evil was boosted to number one an hour ago."

I glanced at Scribe, but she shook her head. I supposed not even the Webweaver worked that fast.

Steven Silver

"The trick isn't to win votes, it's to let your opponents lose them."

—

Not actually, keep voting!

Aston Whiteman

Later update today? ":p

caoimhinh

Oh, I was wrong.

The title actually was something like shoot/loose.

ruduen

Yep. I have three guesses on just what the next title might be:

1. Going directly to Follow-Through. That being said, with everything only hitting the fan now, that seems unlikely.
2. Something involving the arrow in Flight.
3. An interlude interrupting for the actual battle. Possibly several interludes before we hit Follow-Through.

If I had to put money on one, I'd do it on number 3 – major battles do tend to lean towards Interludes. Still, there have been surprises before.

nick012000

Did Juniper just get a Name? The Marshall of Callow. I wonder if she's a Hero or a Villain? I expect that historically that would have been an Heroic Name, but she is the Marshall of a villainous Queen, so...

megaprr

No, I don't think so. The text explicitly says that creation didn't ripple and that it wasn't an act of the gods. A Name would be a bit too out of left field for her at this point. Especially considering she's an Orc, and how there's a lot of baggage tied to that.

caoimhinh

Nope.

It's explicitly said how that's not the case, even if it pretty much should.

I had also believed Juniper would come out of this phase of depression, her own personal trial by fire, with a Name. Specifically the Name of Marshal.

But this is cool too.

Here, on this field, Juniper of the Red Shields is the Marshal. The genius to beat the geniuses and accomplished veterans of the previous generation.

But she is not being Named for it, she's not having the support of Above or Below, this is all her. No mandate of the Gods leaning on the scales, no Aspect, no Providence. Only strategy.

Shveiran

Honestly, I give it fifty fifty odds that she becomes the Marshall after winning a battle involving three more Marshalls. Having it happen before would have been weak, as this was a pivot for the character but the character has been on the back seat for a long time: she needs a deed to claim the Name.

But it would be cool either way.

shikkarasu

She has the story, she has the role, she even has all the 'claimants' represented in the battle, but she lacks the will. She doesn't want to shape the world, just win this battle. Otherwise she'd have the ripple, the weight of a Name that might be.

I wouldn't have been upset if this was how she gained a Name -they've been built on less- but I don't think she will.

Shveiran

Meh.

"Shaping the world" is kind of a fuzzy concept. Squire!Cat wanted to fix the world or die trying, but Squire!Arthur pretty much just wants to be a good knight. Both got Named.

As we were reminded this chapter, Juniper has always wanted to be a Marshal, so she doesn't lack that will, juts the belief she's good enough. If she wins, she'd likely get that.

It's not a given, mind you; I'm just saying it is very much a possibility.

Earl of Purple

Arthur isn't a good example- he's a hero, not a villain. But I mostly agree with you; the Poisoner got a villain

Name, and she's not interested in changing the world, just baking pies and murder. She'd be as happy baking pies for the rest of her life, it's just that murder pays better.

Darkening

Yeah, poisoner and grizzled fantassin were both about wanting to the best at their thing, not any greater scope plans, and juniper is right there in wanting to be the best general possible. And given how the marshals have been built up, breaking the armies of 3 different marshals would be just the thing to earn juniper the name.

Earl of Purple

I don't think the Grizzled Fantassin is a villain. She's a mercenary, who works for whoever pays her. It's part of her Name, as much as fighting is. And I didn't think she was necessarily the best fantassin when she got the Name, just one of the most experienced on the front lines. If she was a commander type Name, she'd be better served leading a company of Fantassins on one of the fronts, not providing muscle to a Band of Five sent miles from the front line.

caoimhinh

In fact, they weren't even passionate about it, nor did they want to be the best at it. If anything, it felt more like they were just doing their thing, and Name just started to coalesce in them through a long time without them doing anything extraordinary or special. Then one day they realized they had a Name. Poisoner literally looked at the mirror one day and the realization hit her, while Grizzled Fantassin was sort of brooding while thinking about her life and about how she was now a veteran before she had noticed it.

Liliet

Yeah, it's about the story, not any kind of internal will / passion, those only matter insofar as they factor into the story.

The key point is, the story of a grizzled fantassin or a poisoner resonates with people, they would retell it and find it fun should they hear it. The story of a marshal? Calernia collectively goes “meh” to that, or Grem One-Eye would have been Named.

shikkarasu

Only two points:

- Black calls being Named “imposing your will on Creation,” (can’t find the source, probably paraphrasing) although he may be wrong about this since Namelore is hard to be objective about. Cat says of Vivienne “You’ve got your Role and the will, but you need weight. A story that people will talk about.” Although she picked this up from Black and so if he’s wrong so is she.

- Grem was a claimant. It was mentioned when Hakram was 70% of the way to Adjutant. “The last orc to have the potential for a Name was Grem One-Eye, boy. You walk in hallowed company.” (2-11: Report) The implication is that Grem turned down being The Marshal because it would have sparked another civil war. Much in the same way that Akua’s father turned down becoming the Warlock.

Otherwise, yes, the Poisoner and Fantassin shoot all of my assumptions about namelore to pieces. I guess my main reason for insisting that Juniper won’t be Named -ever- is the amount of focus her lack of Clamancy has had. Throughout the story, but especially in this last scene. As always I look forward to being wrong, but I feel this is one of my less crackpot theories.

Liliet

- * Plenty of stories involve will as a component, i.e. to fit the Role properly you need the will. That doesn’t mean every story is like that. Catherine is talking about Vivienne’s story, which very much involves will.

- * Amadeus tells Catherine that the difference between people who have Roles and people who don’t is will in Chapter 1. Amadeus also tells Tariq that there is no such thing as teachings of Below in Peers and tells Catherine that it’s okay to want things for herself even though she’s a villain (that condition famously hostile to wanting things for yourself). Amadeus is not so much wrong as, as, he’s an orator. He doesn’t pick things to say based on whether they are true or make internal sense, but only on whether they further his point / fit his agenda.

* "Grem was a claimant. It was mentioned when Hakram was 70% of the way to Adjutant. "The last orc to have the potential for a Name was Grem One-Eye, boy. You walk in hallowed company." (2-11: Report) The implication is that Grem turned down being The Marshal because it would have sparked another civil war." What makes you think Marshal is the Name Grem was a claimant for? Also you can't turn down Names. Cordelia's was a 1 in 1000 case that Augur worked her ass off to arrange and Cat's still telling her she's going to get the Name anyway since she claimed the Role with her actions, just in another way. "People can refuse Names at will" is a common myth in the fandom, it's not actually how it works in-universe. You can only get out of getting a Name by getting out of the groove that's leading you to getting one. Grem, y'know, kept being Marshal. And I read that reference as Grem having been a claimant to Warlord and going off the rails by going to Black's side to be Marshal instead. (Akua's father chose to not do Warlock things, that's why/how he did not pursue the claim he potentially had. Grem did Marshal things)

Anyway yeah Juniper isn't going to be Named because her role isn't interesting enough to a layperson to be a Role. She doesn't do Named things, she does things that are awesome when you're a specialist that can appreciate them.

Earl of Purple

This is mostly to Shikkarasu: The Name that Grem turned down wasn't Marshal- it was Warlord. He turned it down by agreeing to be a marshal of Praes under Amadeus as the Black Knight, rather than leading the orcs on an ultimately futile war against Praes. Because if they attacked Praes, and lost, then the orcs would be back where they started; if he became a marshal of the Legions of Terror, and won, orcs get a step closer to equality in Praes.

Liliet

That's what I think too, though both of you are committing the presentation error of stating speculation as facts, I'm pretty sure we never got elaboration on Grem's claim one way or another.

shikkarasu

Earl of Purple: I stand corrected.

jamesc9

Unles Callow wants to start telling meritocratic military stories, and they start with "the Marshal of Callow is an Orc and she beat three human Praesi Marshals at once, because she's just that good".

Earl of Purple

None of them are human. The Black Knight is Marshal Nim, an ogre. General Sacker is the last commander standing in the Rebel Legions, and a goblin- and not a marshal; she didn't get that promotion. And Marshal Grem One-Eye is also an orc.

caoimhinh

At this point, it's been proven that there's no one absolute formula for a Name to form. Nor a unique ever-present thing for a new Name to emerge or an old Name to be claimed.

Many factors can be involved, and both inside and outside the books various have been identified: strong will, weight (which can mean lots of things, from how well-known a story is to how relevant an event is), burning conviction, fame (like Heiress turning into Diabolist because that was the fame she earned or Catherine being about to get the Name of Black Queen because that's how people called her), and more.

Heck, Names can be rejected by the claimant (Akua's dad and Cordelia), and another person can stop you from getting a Name, (Amadeus preventing Cat from becoming Black Queen), or you can lose a Name because of depression (Viviene) being "killed" (Akua losing Diabolist after becoming a shade, and Cat losing Squire due to being Fae), it can be usurped through ritual (Chider stealing Squire from Cat), or the Gods can take it from you (Amadeus losing Black Knight).

You can even have a Name forced into you, like Anaxares's case.

Sabah said "I was born into mine" but that's a bit vague and open to interpretation, her whole family bloodline is cursed with lycanthropy, so she wasn't and couldn't be the only cursed, yet she was the Cursed up until she became Captain.

So there are many, many factors at play, both personal and cultural, and thus the presence of some factors do not assure the emergence of a Name, and the absence of a particular one doesn't mean a Name won't be obtained.

On a meta-level, and ultimately, characters get Names because the author says so XD

Liliet

Story is the universal factor in all of these.

You can reject a Name or fail to claim it by not doing the thing a person with the Name's Role would have done. (As with Akua's dad, Cordelia and Catherine)

You can lose a Name by no longer performing the Role authentically (which happened to both Amadeus and Vivienne)

Fame can be a part of the story. Will can be a part of the story. Literally any in-universe factor can be a part of the story, which is why Names are so diverse. Story is the unifying factor it all comes down to.

Culture, narrative, how people frame the world for themselves. It's what shapes Names and empowers them. A Name cannot exist if there's no cultural impetus for it (WoE).

It's really not that complicated.

Darkening

Eh, grizzled fantassin at least had a, "If I'm going to be a grizzled fantassin I'm going to be The grizzled fantassin" line which I took to be a desire to be the best and most accomplished one.

Ulixes

I think if she pulls this battle off as planned that might be the start of a name, she really needs to get her groove back before she has the conviction to claim a name. These things tend to take a while and there's been no hints whatsoever of her getting name powers so I don't see it just popping into existence all of the sudden.

Liliet

Conviction isn't a necessary requirement for a Name (newborn baby Sabah!)

A story is. And Juniper doesn't have one, not one that resonates in-universe. "I was the daughter of a renowned berserker general and wanted to be less like her and more like the people who stayed on the backline and planned, but I wasn't sure I was good enough – but then I saw what other marshals didn't and I got my conviction back" gets a resounding "meh" from people who aren't also high level officers who appreciate what goes into a battle plan.

caoimhinh

You are really nitpicking there.
That's not Juniper's story.

Juniper built up an army nearly from the ground up, a multi-cultural and multi-species army, taking Callowans into Praesi doctrine of war, integrating the now Knight Order into their ranks, and since its foundation, Juniper has led them alongside Catherine through campaigns that would have broken more veteran armies.

Battles against hordes of devils, multiple Demons, the armies of the continent, and Arcadia. Juniper is doubting herself because the responsibility on her shoulders is massive, and she has been faced with hard situations and dark days for the past three years, making strategic errors and facing defeat, not to mention what Malicia's orders did to Juniper. Her depression and doubts make a lot of sense.

Because she was facing multiple enemies on all fronts and threats all around from veterans of war and geniuses from all over Calernia, she was on the backfoot against Kairos Theodosian, a man who - however temporarily- could even outplay the Wandering Bard and the Dead King while playing around with the rest of the armies in the field.

She rightfully sees that the board is wide and complex and she has faced, is facing, and will continue to face opponents that by any normal logic should be able to crush her. She was having doubts because she is aware of the precarious situation and the magnitude of the opposition.

Only now she is finally getting rid of her hesitation and finding her spark again. Noticing that despite the might and wit of the enemies she does not lack that herself. Now she is facing the legends of her home, the men and women she grew up admiring and looking up to, the people that inspired her to be who she is now.

And she is going to beat them all.

That is the story of Juniper of the Red Shields. the Marshal of Callow.

Calling it what you did is a gross oversimplification.

Liliet

Increasing complexity doesn't make for better public reception. Which is what my point is.

Liliet

The problem is that Juniper's Role does not match the culture she's in. A supermajority people on Calernia still only cares about commanders when they lead charges, which Juniper doesn't. Her story isn't told and won't be told even if it's known, people just won't care that she saw a box, they won't understand what it means.

Liliet

It's not about the will. It's about the story weight. Like five people total appreciate the gravity of Juniper's waffling here, literally everyone else would go cross-eyed bored listening to the story of a backline Marshal.

Adrian_V

I think the only reason Marshal isn't a name yet is that there are too many with the title right now plus is more like the role/pattern is forming, Marshal is definitely become a name in the next generation if you ask me, same way as Captain or the 1 that basically was a commander of the Watch (the one Black killed back as the squire via crossbow barrage).

There probably will be subtypes like Marshal of Callow and another for Praes, or even ranks like High Marshal.

Another thing why I think it isn't 1 right now and will probably emerge in the next generation is that the title of Marshal is gaining weight abroad, every nation on Calernia will respect the title and that will add weight but it is still a process in progress so is basically accumulating

Liliet

Most people on Calernia will remember these wars as shaped by the politicians and the commanders who actually took point. Amadeus of the Green Stretch, Catherine Foundling, Cordelia Hasenbach, the Blood, Klaus Papenheim. Juniper of the Red Shields isn't exciting – she's the one who goes to nap while the battle rages, because her part in it is done.

There's no story in a Marshal's role.

Henry

I don't quite agree with you I mean just look at military sci-fi like legends of the Galactic heroes. It managed to keep me invested for 110 episodes and it was pretty much just a story about a bunch of people making battle plans definitely a genre. Even looking at it from a historical point of you people still remember Moltke the elder or Marianne. And both of their contributions to history were mostly around building battle doctrine rather than leading forces as commanders. There's definitely a story to Marshalls Maybe not in the old system of names given that was more epic fantasy but in the New World that's being created I could very much see it

Liliet

Sure, in a hundred years or so I can picture commander Names emerging. Right now the culture of Calernia is clearly focused otherwise – if only because there's no shortage of people who are BOTH awesome commanders AND do heroic charges, overshadowing those who are just the first thing.

Also, I have no idea who either Moltke the elder or Marianne are. I managed to live 27 years a nerd without learning a single fucking thing about them, which brings us back to my point about how most people don't really retell these stories.

(Military sci-fi is not a currently existing genre on Calernia. It needs to be in-universe stories, remember? Like when EE shot down the Grey Knight Catherine theories by saying there's no cultural impetus for the Name Grey Knight anywhere on Calernia)

Henry

Yeah I definitely see your point. And I might just be a massive military history nerd with a bunch of friends who are also massive military history nerds so what I consider general knowledge might actually not be that. However for the no cultural story part wasn't Theodosius the unconquered pretty much just a military commander name. How is thought that he was just fantasy Napoleon or Alexander the Great. I do agree that we're unlikely to see Juniper get one mostly because if someone was going to get one I think it would've been the iron Prince.(good old Clouse was one of my favorite Side characters) But as all of the armies become more professional the role of really good general staff member is going to become a lot more relevant. Which is why one could argue that Juniper could climb at whereas these other commanders current as she is more on the administration side.

(I mean like I said I'm just playing devils advocate. I would preferred juniper not get a name we need more non-named characters doing awesome shit. As I feel like there are just way too many names running around right now most of which are really cool but don't get flushed out)

Liliet

Theodosius the Unconquered was a ruler, which Juniper is not. Battle winning is a black box for most people – they can appreciate that it was awesome how it happened, but there's little patience/understanding for the details of who did what in the planning stage. So you know the credit for the whole thing tends to go to the seniormost person, who is the one that gets a Name from it if anyone.

jamesc9

Henry, sorry, you're loosing me a bit.

Do you mean Marianne the official semi-naked person of the French Revolution, or someone else?

Henry

Marian (I spelled his name wrong forgive my dyslexia)

He was the guy behind the Marian reforms which essentially turned the Roman army into the legions that we think of today whereas before that they used Astarte and had a completely different organizational structure. Essentially he's the black of the real world and that he turned the legions into a professional well disciplined fighting force. He's also famous for being one of the first generals to march on Rome at the head of an army and his rise to power is generally considered the start of the decline of the Roman Republic.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marian_reforms

Nah

Nope. That being said, with every single marshal in the theatre of combat fighting the same battle, it's possible they're all claimants for the Name of Marshal.

Liliet

If there were cultural impetus for such a Name, it would have been claimed by now (by Grem)

KiltedBastich

Arguable. Names take a while to form, and they need a 'groove' in Creation. There needs to be a Story and a Role. However, that Story doesn't need to be one that is widely known, else you'd never be able to have secretive Villains with new names. It just needs to resonate with a Role that has fully formed. Given that we know that Grem One-Eye could have been a Named Warlord, it's likely that potential went instead into carving a new groove – one which only someone else can fill.

So I agree with your logic about Juniper to some extent, I differ on the topic of how well known the Story has to be. The public at large doesn't have to know anything at all about the Story. Like many other things, that can help, but it's not a requirement. The groove in Creation, and the Role, are the only hard and fast requirements.

Liliet

The Story doesn't need to be widely known, it needs to widely resonate. If-people-knew is the criterion. We're working with a hypothetical omniscient narrator, here.

It doesn't have to be known to anyone at all that an Assassin exists and scattered mysterious deaths have a common cause. It just needs to be a fact that IF people knew, they would talk about it. That they would make up a story like this even if it wasn't true at all. There needs to be resonance, an idea people care about.

Actual knowledge is not a part of the equation.

Juniper's situation is the opposite: even if you told her story to everyone in Callow, most everyone's eyes would just glaze over and they'd forget most of it instantly.

SpeckofStardust

Watch next chapter be "land" as in land the shot.
Also what happened in the Rebel Legion camp plays into Akua's story. aka Malicia has zero problems with killing even those loyal for short term benefits.

Darkening

Could also be 'fly' or 'flight', as in the arrow's in the air flying for the target with things still in motion maybe.

caoimhinh

Follow through, maybe?

dadycoool

"See? You see? She had the only one among the rebel leadership killed, all so she could make Cat look bad. That's what his life was worth to her when he wasn't useful enough to her!"

Damien /

"And this is really crassly done too. No one could possibly believe that the person obviously guilty is the actual culprit !"

WuseMajor

I wouldn't exactly call them short term benefits. Right now, Malicia has a very delicate game to play. She needs to wall up the Black Queen and her entire army somewhere, long enough that she can force Cat to the negotiation table, where Malicia actually has a chance of coming out of this with her head attached to her shoulders.

Any other objectives are secondary to "ensure Malicia's survival," and if Cat manages to get out of this trap and spank her army in the process, then Malicia has zero leverage and Cat will just continue rampaging across Praes until everyone in the nation turns against Malicia.

And we've seen what happens to Praesi "lords" when their families decide they've had enough.

On the other hand, if Malicia took all the gloves off, rummaged through the Tower's basement for all the ancient death rays and doomsday devices, and simply destroyed Cat and her army...well then Procer and Callow either collapse entirely and the Dead King eats the continent ...or Cordy uses her doomsday device which...basically no-one has any idea what it will do.

This will also cause Malicia to die, just longer term.

So. Malicia has to be very careful here or she'll lose the only thing she has that she actually cares about: her own life.

sengachi

The thing is, in spite of Juniper's brilliance, Cat's power, and the amazing institution of the Callowan army, I'd actually bet good odds on Malicia successfully walking that line. Not great odds, but good odds.

At least I would if it wasn't for the fact that Amadeus is waiting in the wings with a mountain's worth of goblinfire and one Ranger.

jamesc9

"a mountain's worth of goblinfire and one Ranger", which probably have about equal destructive potential.

KiltedBastich

Eh, say what you will about Ranger against people, from ordinary soldiers to Named, she's never shown the propensity for mass property damage that a mountain of goblinfire represents. Catherine's the one everyone expects to leave a trail of widespread devastation everywhere she goes. Ranger just murder the crap out of everyone unlucky or foolish enough to cross her in any way.

Tohron

Malicia's ploy might get the Rebel Legions aligned against Catherine for now, but at the expense of undermining their leadership (unless Sacker manages to maintain tactical control while making concessions to other elements in the army). So that may shift the numbers against Catherine, but it also makes the force easier to outplay in the field.

Burlyraven

Yay, Juniper got her head out of her ass!

This is going to be a very confusing fight, no matter how it breaks down. Four elite forces, each unsure of the loyalty or enmity of the other three. Definitely the kind to be decided with knives the night before, as is being shown.

Jason Ipswitch

A lake dropped on a lake and burning a forest; Cat is in top form here.

I really like Juniper carving into the tree. I hope she survives this to write the definitive text on the art of war.

Liliet

Considering her epigraphs have mentioned historians arguing about the finer details of Catherine's rise, I think it's good as confirmed that she will.

Steven Silver

Yo dawg, I heard you like lakes XD

origamiflame

So we put lake in yo lake, so you can lake while you lake

Insanenoodlyguy

Right now it's safe to say Juniper and Aisha will survive past this wars end, long enough to have their memoirs published. I honestly think they have, at this moment, better odds than Cat herself.

Liliet

Yup.

Liliet

HELL YEAH HELL YEAH HELL YEAH

So Juniper feels better now that she realizes she'd been outplayed by not one Marshal but two, huh?

Liliet

Also: something something the importance of restraint.

The difference between Cat's actual plan and what Malicia framed her for is the number of the bodies on the floor. Killing just Mok vs killing him AND the neutral one.

Darkening

Eh, more like she saw it was possible for marshal's to make mistakes since she was seeing something they didn't seem to, combined with Cat's anecdote about her own lowest moment of failure.

Liliet

Cat's anecdote came after Juniper felt better. But that too good point

Steven Silver

I like to think of that anecdote as tinder to Juniper's spark. It was too touching a moment for me to want anything less ♥

Liliet

Yeah it definitely helped as FUCK. Juniper had managed to get on top of the fence but she needed a kick to get over it to the right side, and Cat basically tackled her.

boballab

I think it was realizing that Sacker missed it and was the one the Marshals had predestined to the rank that turned it around. If it was just losing to Grem or Nim that can all come down to her complaint of coming up too fast and not having the experience, but that excuse doesn't work anymore when she sees Sacker doesn't see what is going on and Sacker does have the experience. The General she modeled herself on, the one she looked up to and they don't see it. Also this is almost in a way a reprise of the final at the academy: A four way fight, winner take all.

Liliet

Mhm!

Adrian_V

Is not just that, she was defeated wether by 1 2 or 3 is irrelevant, not even by who, she just realized the important part is what she does with that defeat. Cat literally spelled it out for her but i think she had already come up with the idea when seeing the "box"

Liliet

I don't think Juniper figured out the philosophical implications. She did manage to get over herself enough to actually pay attention to the battlefield and NOTICE the box though, so GOOD JOB

mamm0nn

"Trouble," she said. "I have a fresh word from the Jacks. General Mok was killed an hour ago."

I glanced at Scribe, and she nodded. Wow, the Webweaver worked fast.

Meanwhile in the rebel camp: Alright people, so I think it's safe to say that if we caught the Jacks, that means it's definitely not Callowans behind this, right? I mean, this is Praes, we know better.

Everyone else: Nods all around. Yeah, we're not stupid, dude. She has Named who could've done this more effectively, and there's two Dread Empresses who'd try something exactly like this.

Darkening

It is pretty funny that they seem to be lapping up the obvious conclusion here given that we've seen sayings about how having only a couple layers of deception is a sign of a rank amateur among the highborn lol.

ohJohN

Keep in mind though that most of the Legions isn't highborn, it's primarily greenskins, farmers, criminals, etc. with some lesser nobles (like Aisha and Ratface) sprinkled in.

I'd expect some general cultural competency re: deception in a land that considers Traitorous a national treasure, but the rank and file aren't generally the ones playing 5D chess – if your family could afford to teach you, you probably had better options than enlisting – so seeded rumors backed by a trusted senior officer will still go a long way.

Damien /

The Rebel Legions' soldiers might not see it, but Akua and Sepulchral will understand.

sengachi

Also to be fair, while they might expect more nuance of Praesi nobility, selling the idea that Callowans and their novel spy network are this bad at assassination is a pretty plausible idea to peddle, however false.

rouquincool

Keep in mind only highborn do the whole Tzeentch-level plots thing. Normal Praesi citizen like those who serve in the Legions aren't all that versed in intrigue iirc.

Xinci

Well beyond casual devil debts and such. They do appear to have intrigue for that

Liliet

That'll be officers, and Cat herself says that if she'd had a week to sort this out it would be possible to do so. But the battle is tomorrow and the rank and file will NOT understand the intricacies of "how easily they got caught".

Also, nobody knows Cat has Assassin, yet.

edrey

Just imagine the look of their faces when they read that tree and find that all was planned. nice.

as side note: is the Barrow sword dead? or just irrelevant? he just doesnt appear.

Shveiran

He is a champion.

This is a time for strategy, long-range duels, arcane rituals, fortifications and skirmishes.

His time will come.

sengachi

The Barrow Sword is a politician, a would be noble, an amazing fighter, and an excellent warband leader. But of the many things he is, he is not a strategist or a tactician. His intellectual military contributions probably cap out at well-planned raids by a few dozen people, and his political leanings are more towards ingratiating himself with the right people and reading the winds than in decoding military motives and capacity.

He's just not useful at this stage of the game. It wouldn't surprise me if we see him make an appearance in the battle itself though, and/or in the aftermath.

Liliet

(And unlike the Squire, he doesn't have the story momentum for Cat to billow out beyond his regular capacity for one person's contribution, here)

Cold Cyberia

Damn, I loved Juniper's development through this arc. Masterfully crafted.

Can't wait till the battle. I'm expecting Sepulchral's army will be a bit of a non factor given it's probably deeply compromised to Malicia and mostly formed out of levies.

If it really takes place at dawn, what are the chances Vivienne's plan, plus the rising sun bears fruit to her Name? Especially if the Callowan deserters desert back – that should have a lot of weight to it. I think another possibility would be Malicia releasing a demon or two to fuck up everyone and Vivi charging against it.

dadycoool

And so we arrive at the point in the arc where the young pup, distraught at how unskilled her lack of relative experience makes her look, realizes that her young eyes can see better than the old dogs, and that she can more easily pick up new tricks that don't occur to them. And upon this realization, the gifted child turned brilliant adult makes full use of her faculties and carries the day, appearing as a last hope in the darkest of the night.

For all she managed to accomplish on her own, in terms of the realizations of her own worth and such, we of course can't discount her Warlord, who managed to be exactly what she needed at the time, giving her that last bit of steadiness as she Releases the arrow. "How did you do it?" "By doing exactly what you're planning on doing right now." As an aside, Cat and the Bard both seemed to have an onscreen "You're not going to let me die? Okay, I'll make it everyone else's problem then" moment before getting up and rocking the world.

Liliet

> You're not going to let me die? Okay, I'll make it everyone else's problem then Bless this phrasing.

dadycoool

I based it off of a post I once saw where instead of saving someone's life made them indebted to you, it was more like "God wanted me dead, now I'll spend the rest of my life showing you why" kind of thing. Here, I figured I'd make it more a "You should have let me sleep" kind of thing, considering they both laid down and tried to die, but weren't allowed.

Liliet

Cat was allowed to, she just got bored halfway there and wandered off. ADHD queen.

dadycoool

"OK, I'll just lie down and die...um,...OK, this is taking too long. Where'd my Winter go?"

Liliet

Bless.

Benjamin Huang

What a goddamn chapter holy shit EE you madlad.
The Black Queen will see the Empire broken neath her knee.

RoflCat

I feel like this will ends up biting Malicia in the back.

That honest warning Akua gave to Black Knight about how Malicia only see the Legions as her tools? Yeah, this is a pretty grim reminder of that.

She sacrificed two generals, one in favor of her rule and one neutral, all because she see this move as something that tip the board in her favor, and not even to win the game at that.

Shveiran

Yeah. Honestly, that Nim and Mok didn't see it coming (I don't mean now but EVENTUALLY) kind of boggles the mind.

"Yeah, she mind-controlled everyone to ensure loyalty, but considering nothing has changed and that every new Named she gathers will be even less loyal long-term than the old ones, I'm sure she won't do it again, right? I mean, that'd be silly."

I mean, hindsight 20/20 and all that, but Jesus, Mok...

sengachi

I think the thing is that for Nim and Mok, failing to reestablish the Legions in their Amadeus-established institutional role is the failure state. They're not here with the goal of winning battles or conquering territory or elevating rulers. They're here to reinstate the old system of the Legions that Malicia shattered. Their ability to wage war is simply the mechanism by which they intend to exert leverage, not a goal unto itself. They don't want war, they want to use their ability to wage war to force Malicia to recognize their importance and make concessions.

Choosing to betray Malicia, however deservedly, however sensibly, is a failure state. It ends the war, sure, but in a way counter to their stated victory conditions. Which means they were stuck in a godawful situation where the only path with a chance of victory involves hoping Malicia doesn't do exactly this.

beleester

Yeah, Nim was fairly upfront about this – if the Legions crown an Empress, then they lose their reputation as an apolitical tool of the Tower and instead become another faction the Tower has to keep happy.

(For an empire ruled by backstabbing tyrants, Praes has some surprisingly modern ideas about civilian control of the military.)

Cicero

More like the Legions as a institution are very new (previously they were mook canon-fodder). So there is no precedent for how the modern Legions interact in with the succession of Dread Empress.

Amadeus seemed to set a slight precedent that the Legions were loyal to the Empress, and where not involved in the factional fighting. But I think the main issue is that the leadership of the modern Legions know how they used to be treated as cannon fodder and never ever want to go back to that. If they become a faction in the succession wars, then if they ever lose one of those succession wars the resulting Dread Emperor might decide to eliminate the modern Legions and reduce them to cannon fodder again.

But if they become an institution loyal to whoever is the Emperor, well, then their increased competence compared to the old Legions means the Reforms will stick and become unchallenged.

Shveiran

Yes, but the argument only holds water in a vacuum. If Malicia wins the succession war, she won't let the Legions alone because just because they stood loyal this time it's no guarantee they'll stay loyal the next time. What if the Black Knight becomes a claimant rather than a High Noble, next time? Who will the Legions follow? She can't take the risk, she will NEVER take the risk, so EITHER the mind hooks will come again or she'll dismantle the Legions so they can't affect the power balance too much. Probably the first one, because Malicia doesn't ruin something she can suborn instead. There is simply no way that the Legions staying put or returning to the fold will result in them becoming an impartial institution under this Empress.

jamesc9

And this Empress is, or has been, the relatively good case, compared to cackling madmen who need more bodies to bleed.

Earl of Purple

Yes, Juniper is back. And dumping Arcadian water into a lake already inhabited by giant squid... what impact on the ecosystem will that have?

sengachi

I'm guessing the usual Praesi thing that happens when you dump an unholy amount of toxic magic into the ecosystem. More terrifying abominations to make coming generations rue the people who came before them, especially whichever asshole is responsible for the glamour-using near-invisible krakens in the lake.

sengachi

Being able to convincingly write a character pulling one over on world-class military experts is no mean feat. Bravo.

superkeaton

Eyyy, there we go. This won't fix everything, but at least some healing can begin.

zucced

Really liked that conversation with Juniper and Cat. It's been a long time since they've been so open and raw with one another

Liliet

And Cat has been long overdue for talking about some things out loud.

Juff

Typo Thread:

look at. The > look at that. The afford game > afford a game like withered > like a withered founding > finding it's been obvious to be > it'd been obvious to me gesture vaguely > gestured vaguely so the Carrion > so did the Carrion blindens went off > blinders came off it the air > it in the air
I'd pretty > It'd pretty least of tone > least a tonne so, at least, (should probably be "at last") to make suborning (should this be stop) not telling > no telling "Have assassin > "Have Assassin

onedollargum

["Call me girl again and I'll make you eat your own tongue," I calmly told her.]

I remember when Duchess of Moonless Nights made that fey eat their own fingers, and when Catherine was really horrified at the depths to which she'd descended. Feels like we're getting back around to the auto-cannibalism train.

Shveiran

Meh, to a goblin is just self-recycling.

beleester

So, Malicia framed them for doing the thing they were going to do anyway?

SpeckofStardust

No different then Malicia making a deal with the dead king when cat was going to do the same thing.

Miles

Malicia framed them for doing the thing they were going to frame Sepurchal for.

Cat really needs to get quicker at this though she really is her mother's daughter in that sense. Or learn to assume any clever plan she can come up with is already in motion against her.

Cicero

Who is Cat's mother in this analogy?

Liliet

Both Malicia and Ranger can be argued to be Cat's step-mother easily: Amadeus's platonic life partner and Amadeus's girlfriend. So basically Cat has two.

I assume they meant Malicia, here.

Liliet

They weren't going to kill Seket, and the difference is pretty big: a surgical strike on just the specific guy who is a diehard for opposing them vs leaving only the person who advocated joining them.

Xinci

Glad we confirmed that Arcadian water is indeed incompatible with at least some Creational creatures physiology, even though Arcadia mimics Creation. Though that may be due to how close Arcadia is to Creation rather than anything else(grooves just go through and imprint on Arcadia perhaps). Their matter at its base differs in inbuilt rules compared to those of Creation and presumably even if Arcadia is similar its kind of like a being levo-amino acid based vs dextro amino acid based. It also seems that, similar to munitions or alchemy, Arcadian water can subsume or at least partially change other matter its exposed to? Quite curious about what kind of rituals or perhaps mastery if one has the mantle of a Court, could be used to make its constituents similar enough to be survivable. Being claimed/swearing fealty to a court also seems a potential route for achieving this. Given how similar this seems to devils and presumably demons being inedible, I wonder if there are similar acts one could do to become compatible with them.

Juniper appeared to have a kind of hopeful, "broken pedestal" moment. She saw that those she looked up to werent invincible, kind of a "glass half-full" moment since now there are possibilities beyond defeat to her internal review of their capabilities.

Darkening

I mean, I think it's less that the Arcadian water changes the normal matter so much as the water gets mixed together so that even if your glass is 3/4 normal water there's enough Arcadian Atoms to make you sick. It's likely Akua could come up with a spell to banish the arcadian water out of barrels of water to leave it normal, but doing it enough to supply an entire army would probably burn out every mage they have.

Xinci

The thing is the trick would be easy, if time intensive, if its just something like contamination. Assuming the density differs(given it is from presumably the area around where Winter was) you would just need to wait for the water to level out into different areas of density, probably helped by using those magical panes to help push water down, or just excite it by heating it up

Shveiran

Why would the density differ?

I mean, it's possible, but I wouldn't say that's very likely.

Miles

The way it works is quite simple. Water is just water. But lake water isn't just water. Lake water also contains oils and organisms and minerals and things. In the teal world, those oils and organisms and some of the things are all left-handed in their very make up, all the way down to the smallest bits that can be described that way. But in Arcadia, these same oils and organisms and things are right-handed.

This is fine as long as both realms are separate. Right-handed things interact with other right handed things in the same ways that left-handed things interact with other left handed things. But put a right handed amino acid in a left handed organism and it makes its way where it would normally go if the handedness matched, until it reaches another left handed thing. Then, the right handed amino acid and left handed thing interact completely differently from how they should. Maybe they don't at all, or maybe they interact when they'd normally just pass by each other.

Now, add enough right handed things to a left handed body, and all kinds of biological processes start to go wrong within the body. Pretty much as if the body had been poisoned.

Despite what this sounds like this isn't even nonsense. It's Chirality.

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chirality_\(chemistry\))

Miles

Except the teal world bit that was supposed to say real world.

Mental Mouse

I'm likewise glad to see it confirmed that Arcadian water is unsafe, but I think the chirality argument is on a hiding to nothing... remember, this is a much more magical universe, with its chemistry explicitly off-limits due to the gnomes.

Miles' point about "organisms" is closer, especially since it's been made clear that in Arcadia, there's much less distinction between the "things" and the "people". Arcadian water isn't just H₂O that happens to come from someplace else, it's the material of a realm that predates the mortal entirely, charged with powers and essences that really don't belong in the mortal world. Never mind bacteria, worry about undines, especially given there were monsters present already!

So yeah, the Wasteland has now gotten even more weird and hostile... Maybe the lake will eventually come up with its own corrupted-fae Ladies to hand out baleful daggers.

Liliet

I think chirality was just an example for how things can go wrong in mixing water without one type "subsuming" the other.

Mental Mouse

I do note that in the process of getting here, Cat has dropped Arcadian lakes on a couple or three parts of Callow. The former Liesse area was probably going to be screwed-up anyway, but even so Viv may have further occasion to regret some of those fights.

jesdynf

I just can't get past the idea of Drunk Akua watching Catherine pull that same goddamn trick /again/.

"— I beg your pardon?"

"Lakeomancy. That's what she calls it."

"That's... that's not what you'd call that."

"Feel free to tell her that."

"How can we stop it?"

"I dunno, steal the /rest/ of the lakes in Arcadia first? But we haven't cut a deal with the elves like she did, so we'll get swarmed by Spring or October or whatever fresh catastrophe she's unleashed in the twenty minutes since nobody's been looking over Hierophant's shoulder."

Liliet

Honestly that could be sober Akua. Sober but very, very, very done.

Liliet

Also, a deal with the fae, not the elves. Cat has no deal with the elves and they're not relevant to the question in the first place.

308924810a

Everyone who is or could be a Marshal of Praes."

For a second this made me wonder whether this while battle will decide who gets the Name of Marshal. But the mention of Creation not reacting makes me doubt that.

Liliet

I think Marshal doesn't get to be a Name (as Grem demonstrated by not getting it). It would be because most people on Calernia really just don't care about that role enough for it to be a Role. Oh some guys in a tent at the back of the camp argued and one of them had a personal crisis? How very fascinating. Can you tell me about the wolf cavalry charging against the knights though?

Linnus42

I mean Juniper could win this and become the one true Marshall but even if she has a great plan. How much of the win will be because of that great plan and not the fact that her side has what half a dozen Named and few people on the cusp of getting Names. Nim has herself and Akua working on it...the rest have zero. Granted I am happy Juniper will get a chance to shine and not be such a sad sack. Just that while painting the Grand Alliance here as a major underdog, EE seems seriously downplaying their obvious advantage in Named, as to be honest the troop differences aren't that major. Assuming no one teams up.

Miles

I'm still waiting for the Black Knight Errant to show up with his theme song.

<https://duckduckgo.com/?t=fpas&pn=1&iax=videos&ia=videos&iai=https%3A%2F%2Fwww.youtube.com%2Fwat>

Miles

I'm just waiting for the Black Knight Errant to show up to this party. Gis is the last major force not around.

Also Hakram with the other orc faction.

Earl of Purple

Named don't win battles, not on their own. And Juniper, Nim, and everyone else will be working with that knowledge- both the Army of Callow and the Loyalists know what the Named with Cat can do, so that's something that they will take into account when planning the battle.

Besides which, Cat has an advantage in Named numbers, but she's at a numerical disadvantage, and the other forces all have strengths and weaknesses of their own. Planning a battle takes all of those into account.

Mental Mouse

Remember that the Legions in general have anti-Named doctrine (from decades of fighting Callow), and Akua has been feeding Nim info. Cat's Named are still an advantage, but they can be taken out if she's careless.

DC

Me three chapters ago: jUsT dUmP a LaKe AnD dRiNk ThAt

Me today: ._.

Liliet

Us to you three chapters ago: good point, must be a reason why they're not doing that, maybe it's not drinkable?

Us today: yooo

DC

grumbly grumbly :V

Widjetty0ne

I started reading PGTE about a month ago. Today is the day I caught up. I expect I shall have a lot more free time in the coming days.

Chapter 19: Vivienne's Plan (Redux)

"A superior strategic plan can fail on tactical grounds should decision-making in battle be disconnected from strategic concerns. This is why training officers to understand these concerns is a priority for a modern army, and the foundation of our manner of warfare."

– Extract from "The Modern Legion", a treatise by Marshal Ranker

The Thirteenth Legion was something older Callowans avoided talking about.

My generation didn't care about it as much, since we'd been raised to Legion garrisons and imperial governors, but I'd served drinks to enough soldiers that'd served during the Conquest – on either side – to hear the whole gauntlet of opinions on Legio XIII, Auxilia. Most of my people knew the basics, that it was a legion raised almost entirely out of native Callowans that'd sided with the Dread Empire either during or after the Conquest. Bandits and rebels, people called them, and a lot of things nowhere as nice. Led by General Jeremiah Holt, who'd once been Sir Jeremiah Holt, they'd not actually done much to help the fall of Callow when Praes invaded and only become a formal legion afterwards. Their main assignment over the following decades had been garrisoning Thalassina, but they'd done a few stints elsewhere in Praes. Never, however, back in Callow.

The thing was, some of the older soldiers who'd fought under the Fairfaxes actually had complicated feelings about Jeremiah Holt. The man was nearly seventy now and he'd been called a traitor for forty years but in his youth a lot of people had seen him as somewhat of a romantic figure. He'd been a rebel against the crown, sure, but before the Conquest the situation in Callow had been a lot more complicated than my people cared to remember. For all that Callowans like to pretend that the years before the Praesi rolled in had been a flawless golden age where our wise and benevolent Fairfaxes rulers had been beloved overlords, that was ignoring the realities of it. They'd been a popular dynasty, the Fairfaxes, but they'd also been two reigns removed from a brutal internal civil war and that sort of thing left marks.

The War of Cousins had shaken up the balance of power in Old Callow, with two branches of House Fairfax twining the line with respectively the Caens of Liesse and the Sarsfields of Summerholm before taking swings at each other for control of the throne. There was a lot of to say about that civil war, but ironically what mattered most was the people not mentioned in the writings about it: the northern baronies of Hedge and Harrow. They'd stayed aloof throughout the entire war, same as they'd been during the Conquest, because by the time that branch of House Fairfax my father destroyed came to the throne the north had effectively become a realm within a realm. With the power increasingly gathering in Laure, Summerholm and Liesse northerners had started resenting the authority of a distant crown that little aside from collecting taxes.

Enter Good King Robert, last true Fairfax king of Callow, and Sir Jeremiah Holt of the Order of the Antlers. The estrangement between the north and throne had sunk deep enough that Holt, a bold young knight of northern extraction, had rebelled against King Robert to seek the independence of the northern baronies and parts of the territory now under Southpool. He'd been fighting for the restoration of the 'Kingdom of Dunloch', the ancient northern realm that the Albans had conquered before turning to the last holdout of the Kingdom of Liesse in the south. The historical grounds for that rebellion were pretty thin, considering that before the Albans annexed the north it'd been more of an alliance under a prominent warchief than a proper kingdom and said warchief had surrendered in exchange for being named Duchess of Dunloch. Resentment of Laure had been strong enough up north, though, that Holt found more than a few knights and soldiers flocking to his banner when he raised it.

Their rebellion had been rather tame, very knightly. It'd been more a play of fox-and-hound with the Fairfaxes than the kind of violent resistance that'd followed the Conquest. Unfortunately, after a few humiliations too many King Robert had gotten serious about putting them down and bodies had started piling up. Holt lost most of his rebel troops and had to go increasingly bandit to stay in the fight, which tarred his reputation. Enter the Conquest and bandits popping up everywhere as troops marched east, leaving everyone's holdings unprotected. A much grimmer Jeremiah Holt saw his opportunity. He'd been halfway to gathering a sizeable army of malcontents and robbers when Amadeus of the Green Stretch had reached out with an offer to him.

Self-rule for the northern baronies so long as Holt entered imperial service, as well as a formal military office for him and his men. Jeremiah Holt took the offer, famously, and slew a few hundred soldiers under the Count of Ankou before capturing the man himself and keeping the city out of the war by threatening to hang him his noble prisoner should anyone pass the city gates.

He'd never quite been forgiven for that by the older generation. Having one of their romantic heroes shake hands with the Black Knight and rise to the rank of general in the Legions of Terror in the aftermath had been one of the many hits the pride of Callow had taken after the Conquest. It'd been striking enough that I'd been surprised to learn after joining the Legions that there were songs about Holt – two of them, a sad one called 'O Knight of Dunloch' and a merry one called 'The Ride at Luthien's Crossing' – because I'd never heard either of them sung. I tended to believe that if he'd ever been allowed to serve as a garrison in Callow his star would have risen, especially if he checked the abuse of an imperial governor, but then that was likely why my father had assigned the Thirteenth duties on the other side of the empire.

Today's Thirteenth Legion wasn't the same that'd formed during the Conquest, of course. Most those soldiers were either dead or retired, with the holdouts being high-ranking officers whose position wouldn't require much fighting. But unlike other legions, the Thirteenth had become something a family trade while out east. Children and grandchildren of the original soldiers and officers made up most of the ranks, and while many of my people wouldn't consider them countrymen the soldiers themselves believed differently. Praesi tended to call them Duni, but for all that the soldiers of the Thirteenth were now often mixed blood – not only Taghreb and Soninke but also from Ashur and the Free Cities – they largely considered themselves Callowans. An estranged tribe gone into exile, perhaps, but still Callowans.

And on that hinged Vivienne's plan, because there was nothing more exiles wanted than to come home.

It hadn't been easy to get into the camp. We'd approached under the cover of Night as well as night, but regular patrols and a solid ward layout had still slowed us down to a crawl. It'd been a game of patience, which had irked me considering the looming battle and how impatient to get this done it was making me. We'd eventually slipped in, though, if much later than I would have preferred: past Early Bell. Most the camp was still asleep but one of Vivienne's spies had made contact with the legion's junior legate, Alice Burnley, and it paid off exactly the way it was supposed to. Within half an hour of our arrival, the Thirteenth's senior officers were shaken awake and summoned to an impromptu war council in the usual tent.

Where Vivienne and I waited seated in a dark corner, cloaked, as officers filed in one after another and the sturdy, grim-faced Legate Burnley fielded questions about the summons by deferring until the general was there. Jeremiah Holt was the last to come and I took a moment to study him from under my hood. Still built like a bull even at his late age, he was blue-eyed with a crooked nose and white hair that'd fallen atop his head. He moved gingerly but with assurance, for all that he seemed rather tired from being woken up at this hour.

"What's this about, Alice?" General Holt asked. "Your messengers were tight-lipped about everything but the urgent need."

His eyes moved to us, our shrouded silhouettes in the corner.

"Eyes of the Empire?" he asked.

I smiled in the dark and struck a match, revealing up my one-eyed face just long enough to light up my pipe. I pulled at the wakeleaf, breathing in deep and blowing it out in a long stream, as the half of the room that'd caught sight of the telltale details froze. Jeremiah Holt was one of them, but his surprise did not last long. He straightened, hand casually coming to rest on the dagger at his side.

"Good evening, Your Majesty," the general of the Thirteenth evenly said.

"General Jeremiah," I nonchalantly replied.

Half a dozen swords were out in the heartbeat that followed but their leader snorted at them.

"Put that away, you fools," he said. "If they'd come for blood it would already be on the floor. If Alice let them in it'll be for talks."

His eyes went to Vivienne's silhouette.

"Would that be the Webweaver or Princess Vivienne with you?" he asked.

Vivienne rose to her feet, pulling back her hood.

"You are quick to adjust," my successor praised.

"I'd been wondering if one of you would come," General Jeremiah said. "Nim believed not, but she's always been better at reading the east than the west."

"They're here to make an offer, Jeremiah," Legate Alice said. "I got oaths through the Jacks that blood won't be spilled even if we refuse it."

Blue eyes went to me, following the plume of smoke leaving my lips.

"And will those oaths hold, Black Queen?" he boldly asked.

"I keep to my word," I simply said. "Good or ill. Have any of you heard otherwise?"

None refused me that. For all that I'd turned my back on the Empire, I was known to keep my promises. It was a reputation that'd cost me much to maintain but moment like this were why it had been a worthwhile investment. There were a dozen people in here, most above fifty but a few closer to thirty, and the tension went out of them all when I backed up Legate Alice's words. The white-haired general snorted again, going to pour himself a cup of spiced wine before dropping into the seat at the head of the table.

"Let's hear it, then," General Jeremiah said, tone deceptively light. "What is it that you're offering for us to tun on the Tower?"

There were murmurs, in the wake of his words, but no one bared the swords already returned to their sheaths. I laughed.

"Are you saying you no longer consider yourselves loyal subjects of the crown of Callow?" I mused. "A most surprising turn."

There were a few chuckles but many more wolfish smiles. They had no love for my crown, these men and women. The few that'd once lived under the rule of Laure had been outlaws to it. But neither were they the Tower's folk, because they'd never been allowed to be. The reason one legion had been left to garrison a wealthy city like Thalassina for so long without fear of corruption was that the Thirteenth was as estranged from Praes as it was from Callow. Even after a generation of living east of the Wasaliti they were still strangers in these lands, distant from its factional struggles. I glanced at Vivienne and she inclined her head. She was to take the lead: it was her plan and so hers to execute.

"You know who I am," Vivienne Dartwick said. "I am now a princess, heiress to the throne in Laure, but I was once the Thief and a rebel of the Lone Swordsman's band."

"A hero who fought to restore the same throne many of us fought against," General Jeremiah bluntly said.

"There are no Fairfaxes left, Holt," Vivienne replied just as bluntly. "The Kingdom of Callow that will stand when this war ends will not be the same as it was in old days. Your war ended when Amadeus the Black opened the throat of the last of that line in a cradle. You have won it."

A dark-haired man in his early fifties who by his uniform should be the senior legate of the legion, Eldon Hawley, broke in.

"Why's it you doing the talking?" Legate Hawley challenged. "Princess you are, but it's the queen who rules. What are your words worth, Dartwick?"

Some approving mutters followed, as well as glances at me. In the dark they could see little more than the red burn of my lit pipe and the smoke wreathing me, but it was enough. Vivienne stood in the light, upright and bearing a silver circlet, but the hard truth was that it wasn't her reputation that had these people willing to hear us out. There was nothing I could do about that, though, without making it worse. It was a hurdle she had to overcome herself.

"I'm the one talking because I'll be the one dealing with you in twenty years, legate," Vivienne replied, unflinching. "You're trying to make it a slight, but it is the very opposite."

She did not elaborate. The general let out an approving grunt, eyes considering.

"It's not a bribe and a pat on the back you're offering us, then," he said. "You're in it for the long haul, and the long haul for Callow is you on the throne."

Understanding spread through those that hadn't followed along, interest coming with it. This lot had been offered many a bribe, in Thalassina. The Kebdana and their great vassals had been some of the wealthiest people in Praes. They'd not taken them then and they would not now. Gold wasn't what any of these people were after.

"You have grievances with the throne in Laure and I'll not speak to the justice or injustice of them," Vivienne said. "It was before my time. But I tell you now that throne is dead and buried. What's left behind is Callow, and it is that same land that beckons you home."

"We've been out east for long, princess," a fair-haired woman said. "Some of us were born here. We have families, husbands and wives and children."

The blonde was Kachera Tribune for the Thirteenth, Sally Thoms, whose name might be right out of a Laure street but was deeply tanned from a Taghreb father who'd raised her in Thalassina. The city might be dead, but the ties were not. There were many in the Thirteenth so bound to Praes.

"And they will be welcome in Callow as well," Vivienne said.

It wasn't quite the right angle, I thought, and she saw it too from the hardening of a few faces.

"We've made homes here, princess," the Staff Tribune said. "You're asking us to abandon them and pretending it's a favour."

"Have you really?" I mildly asked.

Eyes went back to me. The Staff Tribune straightened, his close-cut grey hair lending him a certain presence under torchlight.

"We might not be Praesi-" he began.

"Duni," I softly interrupted. "That's what they call you, isn't it?"

He looked angry at being interrupted, but none denied what I said. They'd all heard the word before.

"That's all you'll ever be, out here," I said. "Useful servants. Serve for a dozen generations and it will mean nothing. You all know that already, you've seen it with mfuasa and they think more of those than you. Bad blood cannot be made into good blood, that's the way of the Wasteland. You have reached the summit of what you can aspire to in Praes. So the question left to ask is simple enough."

I shrugged.

"Are you satisfied?"

The silence was telling. Rebels and bandits were ever hungry men. I let the silence stand, passing the torch back to Vivienne.

"You sacrifice in going home, like all exiles," the princess of Callow said, tone honest. "I will not pretend otherwise. So let me speak to what you will gain instead."

That had a few leaning forward, those who'd struck closer to the bandit strains of the Thirteenth than the rebel ones. The ones with mercenary leanings.

"Amnesty for any crimes once committed in Callow-" Vivienne began, and already a few scoffed.

We'd known they would, but this step was necessary for the rest. General Jeremiah was studying her with a frown, as if wondering why she had so blundered.

"I take no alms from the throne in Laure," the Supply Tribune bit out. "It was no crime to buck the tyranny of Fairfax laws then and it needs no fucking forgiveness now."

"It does," Vivienne replied evenly, "as by ancient custom it is forbidden for an outlaw to hold or be granted a noble title."

That little sentence went off like a sharper in the tent. Even General Jeremiah, who'd not been known as Sir Jeremiah since the Order of the Antlers had stripped him of his rank, looked surprise. Legate Alice, who'd left our side to go stand with her fellow officers, was the one to voice her skepticism.

"Even out here we've heard that you two have been stamping out the old nobles," she said. "And now you're offering to make us of the same breed you want to smother? That seems like an ill fate awaiting us."

I bit my tongue, for though I wanted to reply it was not me who should speak. It was Vivienne that needed to draw the distinction between what had been the policies of my reign and what would be the policies of hers.

"Nobles got in our way, after we broke with the Tower," Vivienne said. "They were treated accordingly. Yet I'll not pursue that enmity into my reign. The territories that were cut out as imperial governorships under Amadeus the Black will remain administrative provinces with appointed governors, but under that authority I will raise nobles again."

I didn't like it, I honestly didn't, but it wasn't the same for her as it was for me. Vivienne was a Dartwick, minor nobility but still very much a noblewoman by birth, and she wouldn't come to the throne with the kind of baggage I brought. Orphan, apprentice to the Carrion Lord, villain. Nobles would actually be willing to work under her in a way they simply hadn't been for me. She wasn't going to undo the brutal work of centralization that my father and then myself had done, she knew better than that. That was the whole point of keeping governors: there would never again be dukes in Callow, that kind of power would only ever be held by the grace of the throne. Yet she was very much in favour of cultivating the presence of lesser nobles once more.

She had valid reasons to, I'd been forced to admit. Lesser nobility was how Callow had been able to maintain so many knights without bankrupting itself, pushing off the costs of that to noble families instead of making the state coffers bear it, and it was also a solution to our still chronic lack of qualified officials. Vivienne intended to turn my father's orphanages into schools under the aegis of the crown, but that would take years and it'd never work outside the largest cities in Callow. Until then, she'd be relying on spare sons and daughters of the nobility to serve – and even after, she'd keep using them as a balance to keep the power of her own Laure bureaucracy in line. She had learned from Malicia's reforms in Ater in a way I'd never thought to.

"Noble titles," General Jeremiah calmly said, but I saw the hunger in his eyes. "Would you care to elaborate, Princess Vivienne?"

"For you, the barony of Longcourt," the dark-haired princess replied. "Which you might not be familiar with."

"A week's travel north of Liesse," Jeremiah Holt calmly interrupted. "Known for its apple orchards, as I recall. The last baroness of Longcourt was a girl of fourteen that died at the Siege of Summerholm."

"She was," Vivienne said, hiding her surprise with some skill.

"The land was placed under the imperial governor in Liesse, but there are cadet branches to the family," the general said. "That title would come with enemies."

Vivienne smiled and so did I, pulling at my pipe. And there was where her cleverness had shined through. Because the dozen in this tent had already been high-ranking strangers in a foreign land before, made to step on toes just by being who they were. Half the reason they were even hearing us out was that they were sick of being in that role. They weren't eager to start being the same thing only after uprooting themselves across two rivers to a land most of them hadn't seen in decades if ever at all. Any of them picking up titles would make enemies of the relatives of the people who'd once held to those titles. This had been meant to be great hurdle, but Vivienne had instead managed to turn it into an asset.

"It does not," Vivienne said, "but it does come with a wedding. I believe your eldest grandson is yet unmarried?"

The old man blinked.

"He is," the general warily admitted.

"So is Holly Leyland, the eldest daughter of the man with the best claim to the title," Vivienne said. "Both have already agreed to unite the lines, should you and your grandson agree."

General Jeremiah seemed genuinely taken aback. My successor's gaze swept across the rest of the officers.

"I offer twenty lordships to be divvied up among you as you wish, but in truth that is the lesser part of my offer," she said.

She reached into her cloak, taking out a folded parchment and setting it down on their table.

"This is a list of sons and daughters from noble families in good standing that have agreed to marriage with officers of the Thirteenth or their descendance," the princess of Callow said. "Age and rank in succession are included."

The tent was as silent as a grave.

"This is not a trap," Vivienne Dartwick gently said. "When I speak of bringing you home, I mean every word. I am not the Tower, to strand you among enemies and then use the fear to weaken all beneath me. Come back to Callow, and you will truly be back. All the land offered is in what was once the Duchy of Liesse and now lies empty, but this will not be solely a noble's game. Freeholds will be provided to retiring soldiers and formal knighthood to any cavalrymen who are willing to join the knightly order I will found – the Order of the Stolen Crown."

Kachera Tribune Thoms licked her lips then broke the silence.

"And what do you want in exchange?" she asked.

"Fight with us here," Vivienne said. "On this field. When we march east to bury death for good, fight with us still. And when the war ends, come home. Be part of the peace we'll all have fought for."

She'd hit all the right notes, I thought as I watched them teeter at the brink, and still had things been even just a little different this would not have enough. But the droplet that'd tip the cup was that Thalassina was gone. It was where the Thirteenth had been for the longest, and when that city had died to the Warlock's wrath many of the ties that bound the legion to the Wasteland had died with it. The same kin that they might have been afraid Malicia would kill as retribution to changing sides were already dead and buried. They had a lot less to lose now than they would have had five years ago and Vivienne had offered them more than they had ever hoped they might receive.

"We'll need to talk it over," Legate Hawley roughly said. "Bring more officers into it-"

I blew out a long stream of smoke.

"No," I said. "Tonight. You have until the hour's done to make your decision."

Some looked angry, but General Jeremiah was not one of them. If anything he looked approving. Smart man.

"Any longer than that and the Eyes will be onto us," he said. "You want us to march right now, don't you? Smash through the palisades while we have the element of surprise and link up with the Army of Callow."

I nodded. The moment the Thirteenth went over to our side or refused to, the Battle of Kala had effectively begun. When they moved all sides would begin to muster for combat, because to do anything else would be ceding the initiative to the opposition – and none of the four armies on the field were willing to do that, when all knew annihilation was just one mistake away.

"Come dawn there will be a battle," I said. "Now's the time to decide on which side of it you'll stand. You've heard what Princess Vivienne Dartwick offers you. You know what the Tower will give you and the worth of Malicia's promises. Choose."

It was not a simple choice and they did not simply make it. They gathered among each other, talking in low voices as they argued faults and merits. Vivienne retreated, coming to stand by my side, but neither of us spoke as we watched it unfold. It wasn't the kind of plan I would have made, and my fingers itched to see it play out. It'd give power and wealth to people that I honestly considered to be pretty shitty and untrustworthy, but beyond that there was too much... give to this. Making nobles diluted the authority of the crown. Making several nobles, all with close ties to each other and in the same region, was making a potentially dangerous power bloc. I would have preferred cornering them, burning their ties to Malicia and taking them in on my own terms.

A third Gallowborne, to match the one I'd lost and the one I'd spent.

Vivienne wasn't me. It wasn't that she didn't see the same dangers I did, just that we didn't have the same... instincts about how to deal with them. She wasn't afraid of a Baron Jeremiah Holt because even if he grew powerful she was confident she would make him into an ally. Bring him into the fold, use that power to her advantage without needing to have something to hold over his head. And in someone who hadn't been with me for so long I would have been tempted to call it naivete, but Vivienne wasn't naïve. It was the same part of her that'd made her refrain from killing when she'd been the Thief, that'd seen her join the Woe when the odds were Callow would burn if she didn't. She was willing to embrace foes in ways that I just wasn't.

There was little of our old madness in Vivienne Dartwick, of the slights and long prices, and I could not help but feel that our people would be better off for it.

The officers of the Thirteenth chose, and they chose hope. They chose home and peace after the war. I saw it spread from one to another, the decision, until even the holdouts bent their heads and the same man who my people had once written songs about turned his blue eyes back to us.

"It has been," Jeremiah Holt softly said, "so very long since I saw home."

He breathed out shakily.

"An oath broken and an oath taken is a cheap price for that," he said.

"Then kneel," I said.

They did, but I did not rise. My hand touched Vivienne's side and she met my eye, looking almost startled. I almost snorted. As if I would reap the harvest she had sown. No, those oaths were hers. She had won them, she would keep them. And the officers of the Thirteenth, on their knees, spoke their oaths to the princess of Callow. And with every oath the world shivered, until the same rebel who'd once fought a throne now swore to another. Jeremiah Holt spoke his oath, and when he swore to the princess of Callow the whole of Creation bore witness. Vivienne shivered too, the weight of the pivot pressing down on all our shoulders. Ah, I thought. Indrani had tried to tell me, hadn't she? I'd gone too deep, too... narrow trying to figure out who Vivienne was. I should have known that the simplicity had been at the heart of her the whole time.

Vivienne Dartwick had entered the tent as a princess, and now stood a Princess. It was as simple as that.

I almost laughed, seeing the hope and awe in those eyes, because didn't the Gods just love their little jests? Vivienne had once been a fine enough thief she'd earned a Name out of taking from Praes, and yet the greatest of her thefts only came now that she had left behind. As a girl, all she'd ever taken from the Dread Empire was coin and good. Now, though?

The Princess of Callow had stolen back an entire legion.

Interesting, I expected that Cat would come into her new Name first, that as a subordinate that Viv would continue to be molded until Cat's came into being.

Liliet

Nope. Vivienne is long past the stage of getting molded 😊

Liliet

Also, GO VOTE! I mean boost! Do the thing!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nope. Vivienne is long past the stage of getting boosted. 😊

(As an alternative to the whole "vandalize a quote" boost thing, which I've come to agree is annoying.)

Anomandris

Princess of Callow? Is it just me or does it not sound..... Namey enough? Also, extremely geographical...

Dredcor

Her Name is likely just The Princess. Perhaps a transitional name, like The Squire.

A Queen Name perhaps coming once she ascends to the throne.

Reader in the Night

Not even Princess of Callow. Just... Princess. Extremely generic, though I suppose less so than Heiress.

I loved this chapter and it was amazing, but I do question that Name decision. Callow has a long and historied tradition of Shining Princes, breaking it now for what feels like no apparent reason (unless the name Shining is specifically associated with the Fairfaxes) comes off as against the nature of Names, because as far as grooves in reality go, Shining Princess is a fairly entrenched one.

Dredcor

I don't think Vivienne necessarily fills the Shining Princess' Role is all.

Juliet

I think Princess has a fine groove, the entire world (even Malicia's meddling) made a point that Catherine was originally only the Queen IN Callow.

Most of the other cultures that participated in that have Princes or Princesses, but their ruling class (First Prince, Taric's people, Dread Empress or Emperor in Praes) don't legitimize Princess > Queen as ruler.

This feels like Anove smiling; as the Black Queen moves on from ruling Callow, there is yet a Princess, where once their enemies spurred the world to deny both.

Who rules Callow might just be Catherine's oldest question, it was one of the first things she thought about Black's reaction to her desires in book one.

Liliet

I guess the problem is, Shining Princess is entrenched deep enough to be kinda narrow – in a way Vivienne misses. She might lead knightly charges from time to time but she's not a combatant by primary role. It's her Squire who's the rival to the Black Knight, not her.

dadycool

Callow also has a long history of not being a conquered vassal state of Praes and the Age of Wonders has a long history of not being ended, but Black and Tyrant broke those streaks. Cat is ushering in a new age that not even she knows what it'll be like, and it includes carving your own footsteps. Abigail of Many Titles actually followed the path of one of Cat's aspects: a Callowan general leading a military based off of the Carrion Lord's teachings with an Orc assistant. Most of what Cat's doing has Never Been Done Before, and her successor being equally as trailblazing surprises no one.

Reader in the Night

Those streaks were broken for a strong reason, and in the Tyrant's case, at immense cost. Vivi didn't really do anything to buck the name "Shining", and even played a bit into it with her charge.

Though I suppose simply the fact that she willingly follows a Villainess might disqualify her from the Name of Shining. If Shining Prince was the Callowan ideal of the perfect prince, then compromising with Evil might be enough to prevent the Name from forming.

Liliet

I think it's more Vivienne's tendency towards backroom deals and diplomacy over flashier villain duels and the like. She's led knightly charges but it's not really her thing, she just does that as one of the large variant toolbox she has.

The story is slightly off to the side of Shining Princess specifically.

sengachi

Generic yes, but there is some serious power in the more generic Names.

aurikdomi

Heiress, Squire, Concocter, Poisoner, many others all have a pretty decent power yeah. nothing wrong with generic

Flameburst

Unless I miss my guess, shining prince was a martially inclined name, someone who leads and inspires soldiers from the front. While Viv can and has done that, it is pretty far from her core personality, making it a poor fit.

On the other hand, most generic names we've seen have been transitional names, and her story right now is all about growing into the role of Queen everyone knows she'll have to fill soon. A transitional name works better for her than a full one right now.

Halinn

> On the other hand, most generic names we've seen have been transitional names

I'm not so sure. Archer and Ranger are both quite generic, and those sure aren't transitional. Neither was Vivienne's old name of Thief.

Tenthyr

The point is that the expectation of princess is that she becomes a queen, much like how a squire becomes a knight. An archer is an archer, ranger is a ranger.

Sethur

As I understood it, the old callowan names (at least the royal ones) are gone for good after Amadeus stamped them all out during his decades of rule as a de-facto vice roy of Callow. Like the Orcs can't have a Warlord anymore, just warlords. What Cat and Vivienne are establishing are new grooves. They are distinctly different from old Callow and their Names reflect that. Vivienne is not one of the Shining Princes of old and will likely never transition to a Good Queen. Also, Callow itself is not the same anymore, so it makes sense that callowan Names change to reflect the change in society, power structure and population (and geography, as Liesse is no more).

Liliet

I think orcs can get Warlords again... IF they gather up into a raiding horde again.

Names go away when Roles go away. And I don't think it's been made impossible for there to be a Shining Prince(ss) again in a generation or two. It's just... not Vivienne.

Lux In Somnia

I took it as her taking the name of Princess. It just so happens to be that it is of Callow

Kyle Wong

It's the exact same naming convention as the Tyrant of Helike.

nostoneuntuned11

It seems plenty namey given that Callow isn't just a kingdom, it is The Kingdom. None of the other major powers are true kingdoms like Callow. So of course they would hold the generic royal titles. Just like the Empire has the Warlock or the Chancellor.

It definitely is transitional name by the nature of the title. The Princess will one day be the Queen.

Karma

Awesome

Raved Thrad

Wow. Just... wow.

7imelock

I think the Name is just Princess -it's sort of similar to Tyrant in a sense.

Dredcor

Yeah, pretty sure it is. Though there's also the chance it is a transitional name, since it wouldn't make sense when she ascends to the throne.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's definitely transitional.

LarsBlitzer

As well as transitional, much like Squire or Apprentice. I'm getting the feeling that Vivienne's change from Princess to Queen could serve as a catalyst for those two under her (the aforementioned Squire and Apprentice) to assume their own Names, whether they'll be complementary or not isn't determined, but having a bona fide Queen getting her Name would be a pretty heavy thumb on the narrative scales. Of course, that won't happen until Cat abdicates.

onedollargum

Cat was always worried about the Squire becoming her successor, but she's just helped create the Princess to her Black Queen.

Dredcor

Correction: She was worried about becoming a MENTOR to the Squire, because being a Named's mentor vastly increases your chances of dying.

Having a successor, though it comes with its own patterns and stories, does not carry the same weight.

dadycool

Yeah, mentors tend to get killed at critical times to bring the up and coming Hero out of their funk and she's like "Yeaaaaah, no." Most of the time she uses stories like the Bard does, but that one is a lit Sharper and she goes full Carrion Lord on it.

Charles

Yes, but Queens can abdicate, and Cat is planning to. So many of the Heroic stories end with a dead mentor to spur on the new Knight.

Liliet

Half of the problem with Squire being potentially her successor is that he's not Vivienne, whom Cat has already picked for this.

Cold Cyberia

The other half is Contrition being sore losers 😊

Liliet

*and wanting to kill her

boballab

I just realized that Cat is starting to resemble a female version of the god Odin: 2 Raven's, one eye but with a staff instead of a spear. Odin besides being associated with War and Battle is also associated with the Gallows and it was the mention of the Gallowborne that tripped this realization.

dadycool

Don't forget that her Name has felt like a wolf since Squire 2.

caoimhinh

Since Squire 1, actually. the beast is shown back when she was forcing the activation of her third Aspect and facing off the Demon that corrupted it.

Liliet

I think people have been talking about Odin!Cat ever since she got two crows on her shoulders (aka start of book 5).

NICE re: gallows association!

Liliet

THE PRINCESS!!!!

This is... okay this is not as fun as Shining Princess would have been but this DOES fit Vivienne better, on a very deep and thorough level ♥ ♥ ♥

Oshi

I keep thinking there is more to it than that. But maybe this is it? I wanted a The in front or something.

Liliet

I mean, she's... The Princess.

:3

Sykomantis

So is she The Princess of Callow~~3M~~ or just The Princess?

dadycool

It sounds like her Name is Princess, though her title is Princess of Callow. It's similar to how Cat and Cordy have the titles Black Queen and Warden of the West, even though they never actually had the Names.

Downzor

Black Queen and WotW were both potential names at one point - your point still stands, but I think the better example is Dread Empress and Tyrant of Praes. IIRC the first is a Name and the second is just a title

Earl of Purple

Tyrant was the Name of the Dread Emperors, until possibly Triumphant. It happened before Theodosius the Unconquered, as he was first Tyrant of Helike I think.

ohJohn

My guess would be, if not Shining Princess, then Princess of Callow, based on related precedent: Named Callowan monarchs are usually either "Good King/Queen" or "King/Queen of Callow", so "Shining Princess" would mirror the first and "Princess of Callow" the second.

(I still think Shining Princess is plausible, given her historic association with Summer's sun and the phrasing in this chapter - if one were talking about William's Naming, saying "he had entered the tent a swordsman, and now stood a Swordsman" doesn't negate the "Lone" bit - but I can see how it's not a perfect fit for Vivi's Role, given what we know of past Shining Princes/ses.)

dadycool

This was beautiful. All hail the Princess! She honestly deserves this, considering she put her heart and soul into Callow, in a way that Cat never really did. Where Cat was the heir to the Carrion Lord through and through, looking to all the world as if she wanted to reach out and Take the whole of it, eventually coming to rule Named like no one ever had before, Vivienne was always looking to Callow, either to avenge it in some way or to make it better. Where Cat was always looking at the bigger picture, even stepping back and peeking at the frame, Vivienne was always rather hyper-focused on her own home.

Shveiran

Well, not really? Cat has been very focused on Callow until Book 4, when she stopped pretty much just because she realized how much larger than Callow were the roots of Callow's problems.

She didn't stop caring about Callow, she just realized there was no fixing the mess without addressing everything else too.

Meanwhile, Vivienne has grown into caring for it. When she was younger, she was after a lot of things there were not quite Callow – revenge, restoring the Kingdom, independence from the outside world – and only since she came back from Keter has she actually started to plan and find her own ways (and not Cat's) to help Callow.

Xinci

Hm another reminder of the difference in methods Evil and Good cultivate I suppose. Vivi tends to associate more with the cooperative aspects, that compound the longer cooperation is held. Cat goes with the more unsurpassive aspects that tend to stick around even after the initial event that precipitated em has dispersed. Given Praes and Callow may becoming more harmonious over time depending on how Cardinal is set up and how Amadues's plan for the Tower works out, her being less into deterrence behaviors may be very helpful for their long term development.

Cosmic jest are quite nice, though, it is notable that the pattern keeps to the groove. She stole and found it not enough as the Thief, so she instead tried to steal back the ideal of Callow as Princess.

I am quite curious how Vivien will affect the Thirteenth, just like I am curious about how their integration into the Army of Callow will change its tactics. What methods do they have that may differ or harken back to the times of old Callow? Given their leader seems to be a clever type perhaps it will give Callow even more long term military advantages or at least methods of war. Taking from Malicia's reformation of the bureaucracy in Ater is part of it for sure, but I am curious how they will do with the common perception of them. Perhaps they will be perceived as redeemed due to turning on the Tower, fighting a war against the DK then returning home? Kind of the whole deal where fighting a mutual enemy often leads to groups integrating together if the conflict last long enough.

As a final sidenote, definitely seems like oaths do indeed give weight, presumably due to them acting like bindings observing a rule? Thus the Watch gaining access to powers due to their oaths. Enough souls say something is true and a rule can be inscribed due to the oath taken.

Konstantin von Karstein

Concerning the Watch, those « oaths » are more like rituals to bond them to the Gestalt.

Liliet

Oaths give weight because they matter and are awesome in people's eyes. It's simpler than that Xinci.

Xinci

I would say they only matter because observation matters. That is to say, the observation of rules and those rules binding entities seems to be the delineation between various entities and just Creation itself. Very much a in observing you shape and are shaped, kinda deal. Underlying mechanics seem pretty universal for this kinda thing since it harkens back to at least the Fae(you could say Demons too given they are almost undifferentiated from their Hell until they subsume something and even then it goes the opposite route in that thing just becoming a vector)

Liliet

I think you're grossly overcomplicating a very simple thing.

Yamageddon

I mean, given that this is fiction set in a world that undoubtedly has inconceivably complicated rules of reality that we don't see because it wouldn't be expedient for the purposes of the narrative EE wants to tell, there's really no strong reason to draw a line beyond which theory crafting about the nature of Creation is over-complicating it. Take Higher Arcana for example, an aspect of spellcasting so complicated that each of the highest caliber practitioners must form their own alphabets and syntaxes to understand the universal mystical laws. We get some windows into how it all works through interludes with mage characters, and some from Cat recounting her meagre learnings on the subject, but mostly that intensely complex subject is left as abstract, because this is a story about Cat, not the intricacies of the magic systems of Calernia. That doesn't mean the simple, abstract surface understanding of higher arcana is the reality in universe.

Liliet

Higher Arcana is v different in nature from narrativium. One is based on math, the other is literally based on human ability to process events.

Cold Cyberia

The Princess of Summer could tell Cat cut a deal with Larat just by looking at her, so I'd say oaths, pacts and bargains all leave a tangible mark.

Shveiran

Bargains struck WITH THE FEY, sure.

Xinci

I mean she noted that she could only see two, not that there weren't more binding agreements she could have already had. Given people seem to be able to sense things like someone coming into a Name, how its bound to something else, if it cant be bound, and if someone can be a claimant at all it isnt particularly strange for these things to leave noticeable marks. Doubt Tariq would have almost wept at the sight of Cats soul it id didn't indeed leave rather permanent observable changes.

BargleNawdleZouss

Oh wow, I kept expecting Nim & Akua to crash the party!

Oshi

This a story fu battle. The Black Knight has no place in this story so no Nim or Akua. It's why Cat and Vivienne are the only ones there.

Cat knew this had to succeed to she made sure Vivienne and her hero name (and above's press on the scales) got her the legion she needed for the battle.

Juff

Typo Thread:

about is as > about it as Fairfaxes rulers > Fairfax rulers that little aside > that did little aside hang him his > hang his something a family > something of a family revealing up my > revealing my to tun > to turn looked surprise. > looked surprised.
huger > hunger
descendance > descendants had effectively begun > would effectively begin holdouts bents > holdouts bent

Silverking

I do like how Vivienne and Cat's relationship has allowed them to view their very different methodologies to be viewed not as a rebuttal or a rejection of the other, but a transition. Callow NEEDS a Warlord right now, just as it will NEED a Princess to thrive in the future. Some of the other nobles may think that Vivienne's nobility and hope should be viewed as a triumph over Cat's irreverence and pragmatism, but Vivienne's still the woman who burned the Varlet alive while wearing a dress.

...I wonder if one of the Princess's Aspect will be Claim. Just for old time's sake.

laguz24

I think she got her pocket dimension back, remember the shining sun?

medailyfun

no, the sun during that battle was Masego's

Sugar Roll

After reading this chapter I thought Vivienne would become The Matchmaker.

WuseMajor

I think that if she has any more complexity to her name, it will be Princess of the Dawn.

Cold Cyberia

Just how compromised the Thirteenth legion ends up being? If there's one thing Malicia can be dependent upon, it's souring a good thing.

I think the battle won't be a traditional, decisive victory for Cat. My bet is on Malicia meddling (still waiting for the demons) in such a way Nim realizes she needs to be deposed.

nick012000

Yeah, unless swearing oaths to the Princess cancelled out the commands that Malicia implanted in them, they're all still compromised with implanted commands the same way that all the other Praesi officers were. I guess that being under the authority of Cat and Vivienne might be able to stop Malicia from activating the implanted commands, though, the same way it prevented the activation of the commands she implanted in the leadership of the Army of Callow.

Earl of Purple

Malicia's mind control is a mix of Speaking and the aspect Rule. Swearing an oath to the Named Princess of Callow, traditional enemy of Praes, is almost certainly enough to loosen her control. And if not, the fact Cat is there, whose Name does not accept Malicia's Rule already, almost certainly will break the ties needed for that control to work.

Earl of Purple

I seem to have missed the button when trying to reply to this, so see my comment lower down.

Shveiran

Also, Malicia's orders come from an Aspect that is still recovering, according to her own POV chapter; if she can call on those orders, she won't be able to use them at full force.

Also also, that time she had the story in her sails (Empress calling her rebellious subjects to heel) and was revealing a new trick.

This time, a new Name was born out of the loyalty stolen from her rule; the ball is on the other foot now.

Also also also, now Cat and co know Generals and upper echelons are compromised; if they don't think all the above are enough, they'll have countermeasures at the ready.

portionofthecure

All the other stories I read are just to fill time waiting for this one. The time span and history of the characters culminates in such epic happenings.

Maybe I'm just emotional tonight but my breath caught in my throat when they kneeled for Princess

Joel Chambers

"It has been," Jeremiah Holt softly said, "so very long since I saw home."

He breathed out shakily.

"An oath broken and a vote given is a cheap price for that," he said.

Vote: <http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Burlyraven

I wonder if Vivienne might not pick up Merciful as part of her Name at some point. She's more forgiving than most Callowans on a notable level, but the word does have some harsher meanings still fitting to a heroic princess/queen.

Earl of Purple

I think if one of her descendants gets a Name by behaving in a similar way, they might get Merciful Princess, but Viv's Name isn't going to change until it transitions into Queen. Right now, she's carving the groove that others will follow in, and they may get adjectives that more accurately describe the shape of it. As Princess, there's nothing Vivienne can do that isn't Princess-y, no matter how merciful nor how cruel.

caoimhinh

Queen Vivienne Dartwick of Callow, the Merciful.

jamesc9

I really hope that the vast majority of those marriages work. Noble divorce among the just-returned-from-exile definitely seems like a path to blood on the floor.

Shveiran

I think it's still unclear whether or not divorce exist in Callow, for nobles or no. I don't think it was ever mentioned?

Regardless, these marriages have no less chances to work then the normal arranged ones that Callowan nobility still does, so we are not off to a very bad start; especially if they come back as heroes from Praes and Keter.

Liliet

I think failed noble marriages as in the spouses don't actually like each other don't result in divorces, they just result in both spouses cheating happily and only seeing each other at dinner as co-heads of household.

Kennedy

Darn the archery theme to the chapter names is over, I was really hoping for a follow through. Although I suppose follow through could actually be a good name for this chapter.

Linnus42

I mean I guess Princess works cause Callow is really the only real Monarchy around on the continent. Shining is more Martial Inclined and Viv is very much not even if she can inspire the troops sometimes. I did think Sun or Star would be in her Name though even if not Shining so Dawn Princess or something.

As for this Legion I don't know its a good moment for Viv but I think the foreshadowing on this is a bit weak. When did we first hear about this Legion? Also I am not sure I trust this Legion much in the circumstances if I was the Praesi side against Cat, Viv and Callow lol.

Sinead

The legion was mentioned back in Book 1, and we knew Auxilla was here when they first engaged with Nim.

Linnus42

Have they come up since Book 1 before being mentioned in the latest Book?

Cold Cyberia

They've been mentioned a dozen of times but much like the other legions based in Praes, it was with offhand details since they weren't really a part of the story.

Earl of Purple

A couple of the Free Cities are monarchies, Helike and the one that had the Basileus working with Malicia (Nicaea, maybe? Basileus is Greek for 'King'). But Kairos worked hard at killing the Theodosians, and Cat killed the one he couldn't reach by having him shot whilst he was talking and General Basilia chased off the last of the other city's royals and put the military governor on the throne- but not with a royal title. Other than those, Callow really is the only traditional monarchy on Calernia.

superkeaton

Has the Thirteenth been mentioned before? If not, this all feels a little... convenient, but it's entirely likely they have and it's just been lost in the web of words EE keeps on spinning. And if it hasn't, then it fits with the finger on the scales the Gods keep placing.

Alex Straughan

They were mentioned a few times in the first and maybe second ark. They have always been a part of Guidverse Lore but never had an actual presence in the story. They were just mentioned in tactics discussions and history lessons. Stuff like Black threatening to send the thirteenth to deal with people and how their history as bandits and rebels made the surviving Callowen nobles wary of them.

superkeaton

Cool, good to know it's just my scattershot memory.

sengachi

This is the kind of thing where, if this were a work of shelf-published fiction, there would be a whole months-long editing process where an editor (or even a team of editors) would go over the story with the author. And during that process stuff like this would be highlighted and they'd work together to find ways to slip more foreshadowing of it earlier into the work. Little comments about them, maybe some plot point involving the Legions could be found where the Thirteenth could replace that Legion just to get some more screentime. This explanation would be chopped up and shuffled earlier into the plot, with something more like a reminder than an intro happening here.

But this is a web serial, and if that process ever turns out to be financially worth it for EE, it hasn't happened yet. It's just a simple fact of web serials that, while individual chapters will have been edited and workshopped, the overall story structure is always a first draft. So you won't always get the kind of in-depth and integrated foreshadowing good shelf-published fiction has by the time it reaches your bookshelf. It is what it is.

Liliet

EE intends to fully rewrite the story into a second draft before pitching to publishers. This is literally an intended first draft, EE slipping in late things he wants to have in the story is not even really an oversight, just a changed opinion.

hakureireimu

Yes; multiple times; many times. Just not at this level of detail.

Abnaxis

Every time cavalry—or the relative lack thereof— in the Legions has been brought up the Thirteenth has come up in pretty much every arc, since they're the only Legion of Terror with a dependable cavalry contingent.

Also, way back when Cat was raising the Fifteenth Legion it was mentioned how conspicuously she didn't get any manpower transferred to her from the Thirteenth, which was mentioned as being made up of Callowan bandits and exiles.

zucced

Now that, is hype. Princess is kinda plain for a Name, but like others have mentioned it's probably transitional.

Can't wait to see what Vivienne's aspects are though. Something to do with negotiation perhaps? Oratory? Inspiring the troops?

kinghaart

I think Negotiate fits her personality.

jack

The Princess is probably a transitional name that leads into something The Good King/Queen (the traditional name for named Kings or queens of Callow)

jdburger

I think you are right about the Transitional nature of the Princess name, but I do not think she will be earning the Good Queen name. The Queenly name I think she will most likely earn does not flow well with Princess... since I expect she will a title along the lines of Queen of Thieves.

She has almost achieved a set of 3 in stealing important items from powerful beings (Fey and Named). (1) She stole the Sun from the Queen of Summer and their court. (2) She has now stolen the loyalty of the 13th from the Empress of Praes (likely superseding any name granted control). I believe Viv has one more grand heist still to go before she becomes Queen, unless we are counting the theft of the Throne of Callow (Catherine's Abdication) which I am kind of leery on.

Casey Glick

She stole an entire fleet, although that was rather lower in narrative priority.

She has also stolen poor Cat's heart.

She will not steal the throne from Cat, because that would be a terrible story precedent. Cat absolutely will resign because "peaceful handoff of power between very different rulers" is the Story she wants.

Abnaxis

Hmm...

Vivienne was worried about having a Name from Above, but strictly speaking there's nothing Good or Evil about Princess. I mean, strictly speaking the same is true about Thief and Archer, but it's interesting that her name isn't Heavens mandated to be Good—it will only be as Good as Vivienne makes it

Liliet

There's also nothing strictly speaking Good or Evil about Lone Swordsman either, yet both we've seen have been heroes. Squire can literally be either, but baby Catherine was specifically a villain because she was Amadeus's Squire specifically. A Role can be instantiated as definitely Good or Evil even if it's not explicitly there in the Name.

Abnaxis

Ehhhhh, I haven't really seen many examples of evil Lone Swordsman tropes. Their whole archetype is brooding and "being the hero we need, not the hero we want"

Liliet

Yeah, Squire is maybe the more relevant example. The Name itself in abstract is neutral/flexible, but a particular instance of a Name often (usually?) super isn't, between Arthur's Light and Cat's necromancy.

Frivolous

Catherine founded the Order of the Broken Bell – Broken aka Break, her former aspect, because Catherine is a destroyer.

Vivienne will found the Order of the Stolen Crown – Stolen aka Steal, her former aspect, because Vivienne is a thief.

Malicia will have a cow once she finds out that she lost the Thirteenth. It will magnify all her insecurities and make her seem weaker to all her subjects, especially Nim and Akua and the nobles.

hoser2

I think this battle, which will be over before many people hear about the stolen legion, will be much more consequential for Malicia's reputation and fate. If Nim wins, then it was something she overcame. If Nim loses, it will have been a contributing factor. Either way, the outcome of the battle (which I expect the legion to affect) will be determinative.

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

Uhh, folks, are we SURE Vivienne isn't still Thief? She just yoinked an entire legion.

caoimhinh

And she just founded the Order of the Yoinked Crown.

Mental Mouse

It occurs to me that Cat is training Viv in the infamous art of "picking up the box and hitting the other person with it".

Eris

Oh my gosh, today I just learned that Praesi has the same letters as Persia.

I was reading Persian history and kept on thinking it said Praesi

Aaradur

No, the whole point of Viv being Cats heir is that she is not going to be another black queen

Bainos

Imagine that you're a regular soldier in the thirteen, young, so maybe 25 or 30 years old. You know that Praesi don't really treat you as an equal, but you've still lived your whole life there and, well, it could be better but isn't so bad either. You met a kind Taghreb girl, fell in love, and you were married, have a child that will probably join the legion as well once she's older.

The destruction of Thalassina was a hard blow, as many of your relatives died, but you were one of the lucky ones – your wife was traveling when the siege started, so she and your child escaped the destruction. You don't speak about it too loudly near those who lost people they cherished, but just like a few of your fellow legionaries who had relatives in other parts of the country, you still have a home and family to return to.

Then your officer walks up to you, and tells you that you must fight against the Legions. After that, you will need to follow them to Callow. You will never see your family again, although if you're lucky they at least won't be executed by Malicia. In exchange, you will become a citizen of Callow, a country you only vaguely remember but that you know treated you like a criminal.

When you start to wonder why such an order would be given, you learn that the officers of your army accepted this in exchange for noble titles, lands and advantageous marriages. They feel like Callow is their home, and wanted to go back, so they sold your legion, your own home and family in exchange for it.

And if you don't fight so that those officers get their shiny new titles, so that you might go back to your family, you will be promptly executed as a deserter.

I feel bad for everyone who wasn't in that tent and just got told to betray Praes in exchange for nothing, or die. Cat and Amadeus were right, nobles are scum. They should have been stripped of their titles to the last one. Including Vivienne, because I had forgotten it, but she very much is one and thinks like one.

Kai

I'll admit, I'd been hoping Vivienne's new Name would be the Princess of High Noon.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I'm sorry, but I'm now imagining Vivienne as a cowboy. Cowgirl, I suppose.

Chapter 20: Malicia's Plan

"Do I not defeat my enemies, when I mind control them into being my friends?"

– Dread Emperor Imperious

The Battle of Kala began with three streaks of red light crisscrossing a dark sky.

Its prelude had taken place while most the Thirteenth still slept, hard men with sharp swords going into tents to end the lives of the soldiers the general staff believed would fight against rebellion. The purge was quick and bloody, followed by men being hastily roused, and the Thirteenth Legion began to move moments after a mage line sent up the lights that would inform the Army of Callow of our success. The legion left behind a significant chunk of its supplies and all of its siege engines: I'd heartily agreed with General Holt when he'd stated that the Thirteenth tried to leave with everything it would just get caught by the rest of the Loyalist Legions and rout. Treachery rarely made for strong morale, much less treachery interrupted halfway through.

The legion was not in a good position to turn on the others, no doubt a precaution of the Black Knight's. The valley between Moule and Kala Hills had sprouted fortifications in three sets. First the Rebel Legions', in an angled half-circle whose curve faced the east with its back anchored to Moule Hills. Then the mirroring sets of the Loyalist Legions and the Army of Callow, first running parallel from Kala Hills to the east until they reached the curve of the rebel trenches and then, still in a rough mirror, curving around the half-circle. The Thirteenth Legion, while assigned to the front, had not been posted facing us. Instead it was to hold the curve of the loyalist trenches, facing the fortifications of the Rebel Legions. That made leaving a more complicated task than we would have liked.

It might be possible to cross the trench the Thirteenth guarded and then march down the no-man's-land down to my army's positions to the south, but that would be... risky. The Rebel Legions might think they were being attacked and start shooting. Considering two thirds of the triumvirate of generals that'd run that army had just gotten killed and the surviving third was discredited, I was inclined to think they were nervous enough to start shooting without thinking if they caught sight of movement. That left only the option of getting out the hard way: through the camp of the Eighth Legion, which held the western half of trenches facing my army's own. The three streaks of red light were meant to help with that chancy business and help they did.

Within moments, torches lit up the night as the Army of Callow began an assault on the Eighth Legion's position from the front.

General Jeremiah had offered both Vivienne and I horses, but while she rode with the old man and his general staff I held back. There would be retaliation when someone on the other side realized what was happening and I needed to be ready for it. I kept to the side of the army, its soldiers giving me a wide berth, and rode slowly as I kept an eye on the distant camp in Kala Hills. The camp of the Fourteenth, holding the eastern half of the central trenches, lit up with torches first at the sound of the fighting. The camp in the distance was not far behind, though, and maybe a quarter-hour later the rebel positions were alight as well. I shaped an eye out of Night and tossed it up above, keeping an eye on the battlefield as armies began to move.

Surprise was working to our advantage. The loyalist sappers had built their walls cleverly, keeping much of the half-road behind them, but that'd been turned to our advantage. The Thirteenth moved briskly down the road and smashed into the side of the Eighth's camp by surprise even as the legion was mustering to face an assault from the wrong direction. The rebels were staying out of it for now, probably wary of dipping a toe in this without having a better read on the situation, and I chewed on my lip as I loosely kept pace with the Thirteenth. I'd started trailing behind, wary of the hammer blow I'd expected but wasn't coming. My little eye in the sky was beginning to glimpse the shape of a rout, meanwhile.

The Eighth had been taken by surprise, out of position and attacked from two sides. Goblin munitions deployed to hold the trenches had stopped cold the advance of the Army of Callow but General Wheeler couldn't afford to pull away those men else General Zola would resume the charges. When the Thirteenth ran into the first few companies thrown hastily in its way it had slowed, but it had now smashed its way through them and the Eighth's positions were collapsing. Too many of its legionaries were only half-dressed, and some enterprising souls from the Thirteenth had set fire to parts of the camp. Gods, at this rate we might actually destroy the Eighth as a fighting force. That'd be quite the coup, if one we'd not dared to hope for.

With one legion gone and one switching sides, the Black Knight would be –

"Ah," I grimly smiled as power bloomed in the heights to the north, "there you are."

Night swirled around me in thick currents, terrifying my borrowed horse into trying to buck me off until I stole away a sliver to force calm into his simple mind. I wasn't seeing magic accreting anywhere yet, but it was only a matter of time until the enemy mages- my thought was interrupted by a subtle wave of power shivering across the Thirteenth. Instant. It'd been quick enough I'd not been able to do a fucking thing. And now legionaries were dropping to the ground, one after another. Like puppets with cut strings, just... falling to the ground. Weeping Heavens, I thought. What was this? The sorcery seemed to strike as if by random: it dropped ten soldiers in one company, thirty-three in another and then none in a third. Heart in my throat, I rode to a fallen soldier and unhorsed.

The rest of his tenth spread to make room for me, faces full of fear, and I swallowed a wince as I knelt in the dust by the dead man. Except, I realized a heartbeat after I undid the straps of the legionary's help, this was neither a man nor a corpse. The dark-skinned woman under the steel was still breathing, if faintly, though she looked sick and she was shivering with fever. I laid fingers on the side of her neck and found the skin slightly shrivelled but the pulse steady. I heard the soldiers around me began to salute and turned to cast a look at the approaching mounted silhouette of the fair-haired Kachera Tribune of the Thirteenth, Sally Thoms. She saluted me, after a beat of hesitation.

"Your Majesty," she said, stumbling over the unfamiliar address. "The general sends me to ask if you have any insight on this curse. It is crippling our offensive."

I looked away, my lone eye turning to the shallowly breathing woman I was still laying a hand on. Something about this was niggling away at me. The suddenness of the effect, unlike any war magic I'd ever seen, and the shrivelled skin. There was something familiar about this, somehow, but where would I have... Suddenly I breathed in.

"Tribune," I said. "The rations your legionaries have been eating, where have they been coming from?"

She looked surprise.

"You think us poisoned?" she asked.

My look grew impatient and she swallowed.

"Part is from our own stocks, ma'am, but half has been coming from the supply depot in the main camp," the Kachera Tribune said.

And there it was, good as confirmation. General Jeremiah had said that the Black Knight had not believed we'd approached him, but evidently she'd taken precautions anyways. And not just her, because I had seen this magic before. Just never used like this, and I moved my gaze back to the downed legionary so that the officer would not see triumph in my eye and misunderstand. I let it linger though, the taste of victory. Allowed myself to enjoy it. Because the last time Akua Sahelian had used that ritual, she'd left a few thousand Spears of Stygia dead and shrivelled husks before using the power to open a Lesser Breach. Now, instead, she had chosen to spare lives. To incapacitate instead of kill, even when the incentives were many to do otherwise.

All these corpses could be undead, right now, with the power she would have gotten back. Or she could be hammering away at the Thirteenth with a spell powerful enough that even I would struggle to protect the legion from it. Instead she has stayed her hand. Proved she was not the same woman she had been at First Liesse, even in the face of greater gains than those for the taking back then.

"I've seen this magic before," I said. "It won't kill them or continue to drain them. Light or healing sorcery should be able to fix most of the damage."

I followed her back to the general staff, after, though I sent up another Night eye to gauge the situation. Our overwhelming advantage had turned to ash in our hands in a matter of moments. At a guess I'd say that maybe a quarter of the Thirteenth had dropped under the ritual, punching holes everywhere in its formations and causing widespread chaos. The Eighth was using the time to consolidate its position and I could already see the Fourteenth moving towards the melee to reinforce. Considering the Army of Callow's attempts to breach the trench were still a bloody stalemate – Zola had gotten men to the palisades, but Wheeler had gotten his mage lines in position and was torching everything in sight – this now had the potential to go very badly for us.

I still had Night at my fingertips but I was hesitant to use it. It'd leave us exposed to a counterstroke from enemy mage cadres and I could solve one of our two problems at most. Either I'd slow the Fourteenth or blast our path south open, but I couldn't do both. Now quickly enough, anyway. I was still weighing the risks when I got to General Jeremiah and found that the choice had been made for me.

"Princess Vivienne is leading my cavalry in a delaying action against the Fourteenth," the old man said. "I if I might-"

I raised a hand to interrupt him, looking through my eye in the sky again. There she was, leading six hundred heavy cavalry against the Fourteenth's vanguard. The enemy looked to have been sloppy with composition, they'd gone heavy on crossbowmen and too light on regulars, but she was still outnumbered more than three to one. I held back my wince. I'd have to trust her, then, and do my own part. The Night eye turned to the positions in our way south. The trench and palisade were facing the wrong way to stop us, but General Wheeler was the veteran commander of a sapper-heavy legion: already there were stakes and mantlets put up in our way. Mage lines were waiting behind lines of regulars, the enemy general's intent plain enough to read. Now that the battle was turning in his favour, Wheeler wanted to keep us contained here until reinforcements arrived and we could be surrounded. Time for a reminder of who he was dealing with, perhaps.

"I have come a long way, through winding paths," I spoke in Crepuscular, voice rising in prayer. "Yet behold this barren realm, this crown of ruin!"

The Night roiled around, like a wind made of darkness, and I felt talons biting into my shoulders. I felt Komena smile against the side of my neck, pleased at the destruction to come.

"Let me match horror with horror, might with might, and know no master in this."

My limbs were trembling and the general staff had all backed away, looking at me in a mix of terror and fascination.

"So let the sun weep and the Crows have their due," I smiled, "for in the end all will be Night."

I'd only used this working once before, in Hainaut, and as the sky lit up with black fire I was reminded as to why. My vision swam, but I forced myself to finish it: I raised my hand, snapping my fingers, and the Hells were unleashed. A young black sun exploded, streaks of flame tearing through ground and men and shielding spells as screams filled the air. Black flame began to fall in a heavy rain, leaving only a horror of the dead and dying where once the Eighth had stood in our way.

"Your Majesty," General Jeremiah carefully said, "are you-"

I spat to the side, wiping my mouth. It tasted like vomit, though I'd not thrown up, and this wasn't even done. I raised my staff, the old general instantly going silent, and after pointing it at the horror swept it through. As it passed the black flames guttered out, leaving behind only great trails of smoke. I spat to the side again, leaning back tiredly in my saddle. Gods, my bad leg burned.

"Get your legion moving, Jeremiah Holt," I rasped out. "I don't have another one of those in me, not for a few hours."

It was another hour before we made it to safety, a full quarter of the Thirteenth Legion left behind either as corpses or prisoners, but we made it. I waited at the edge until our Princess made it back victorious, a makeshift banner for her knightly order flying high as thousands of throats cheered themselves hoarse.

Now the real battle could start.

—

By midmorning the lines in the sand were drawn.

The wounded had been seen to, the dead burned. I did not bother to send envoys to the Rebel Legions after I saw four crucified bodies hoisted atop their palisade: the same four Jacks who'd supposedly assassinated General Mok and Jaiyana Seket. I didn't know who was in command, Sacker or one of Malicia's plants, but whoever it was they were hostile. Yet the rebels had not returned to the loyalist fold, if the way both armies kept the trenches facing each other manned was any indication. It'd be a battle with four sides to it, not three. Our attempts to reach out to Sepulchral came to nothing: the Rebel Legions were running patrols and west of Moule Hills and shooting at our people on sight. I sent a pair of riders to take the long way around, but it'd be hours before they were anywhere near the Aksum camp and hours more before they could return to us with anything useful. No, when it came to Sepulchral's intentions we were still running blind. That had me somewhat uneasy.

"We've gamed out the engagements with all possible stances on her part," Juniper told me, unmoved. "Whether she stays holed up or goes on the offensive, she'll tie down largely the same number of loyalist troops anyway."

That sounded almost absurd, considering that with the defection of the Thirteenth in fact Dread Empress Sepulchral now commanded the largest of the four armies in Kala – around twenty thousand, even with the losses of her vanguard – but Juniper wasn't blowing hot air. The camp in the hills she'd taken for her own had easy slopes down mostly facing the north and east, approaches where Marshal Nim had built forts in a since-broken attempt to encircle the camp. We expected a single legion to be assigned to defending those forts, the Eleventh, with the reserve being kept close just in case. Sepulchral led a traditional Praesi noble army, which meant they were pretty shit at taking fortifications if magic couldn't level the walls.

Good luck with that when Akua Sahelian was running the mages for the other side.

The Loyalist Legions certainly weren't going to win that fight, but the Black Knight honestly shouldn't be wrong in believing a single legion should be able to keep Sepulchral contained long enough for the fighting in the south to be settled. If no one else intervened, anyway. I sighed.

"Malicia will have something afoot in that camp," I said.

"Let the Tower have its tricks," the Hellhound said, "so long as we have the field."

There was little more left to do save hope it would end up as she'd said. We'd already tossed the dice, it was too late to have qualms. The legions and our army spent the time preparing for the fight all could smell in the air, but there was an odd sense of restraint. Like no one wanted to be the first to swing a sword and get the butcher's ball rolling. In the end, it was us who fired the first shot: Archer shot a legate from the Fourteenth who'd made the mistake of wandering too close to her range and with the woman's death rattle hostilities began. I wasn't actually fighting, to my mounting frustration. Masego and I were on the rampart of a fort, overlooking the battlefield and awaiting enemy magic. We were meant to be defensive assets for now, not go on the offensive, and though I knew the sense in it the sight below had my nails biting into wood.

It was a bloody slaughter.

First came the siege engines. The scorpions and ballistae of the enemy began pounding at our palisade, knocking down chunks where my mages did not reinforce quickly enough, and our own engines replied in kind. A heartbeat later the rebels entered the fray, and to my relief they'd picked a side: their own. They were firing at both the Army of Callow and the Loyalist Legions. Already I could see what Juniper had told me about, the 'box'. It was a corner, the square-shaped area where our fortifications were facing the loyalists to the north and the rebel to the west. The weak point of our defensive setup. Bombardment from both sides was already taking its toll, the sheer number of engines that facing two different sets of legions signified having an immediate impact.

Marshal Nim theoretically had the same weakness in her setup facing our own weak spot, but in practice she was better off: the Army of Callow had fewer siege machines spread out over a set of fortifications just as long.

"Are we simply going to fire at each other with machines all day?" Masego asked me, sounding pleased. "That sounds rather civilized."

"No," I sighed. "Now comes the bloody part, Zeze."

Rising from their cover in the trenches, legionaries climbed over the solid grounds and began charging at the enemy fortifications. They came for us and we for them. Across the great line splitting the valley, across the half-circle and its mirrors, men and women in legionary armour raised their shields and charged. From atop palisades mage lines began firing volleys of fireballs, crossbow companies filled the air with bolts. Down in the no-man's-land, screams and death bloomed. It was the kind of messy, ugly butchery that only came from well-trained forces hammering at each other. Legionaries tried to form testudo formations to take the edge off sorcery and arrows, but on all sides the same model of scorpions were turned on those attempts.

Those deadly bolts punched through shield and mail alike.

"They are not winning," Masego said.

I turned and found him frowning. Puzzled, and perhaps a little appalled.

"No one is winning," he continued, frown deepening.

That's war, I almost said.

"First we bleed," I said, "and then Juniper's plans begin."

The priests were giving us an edge, I saw as the hours passed. The body count kept mounting and the men grew tired, but the fighting continued. Twice rituals were attempted against us, but both times we shut them down. Light healing did not need time and carefulness the way mage healing did, which meant it could actually be done on the frontlines: this was a meat grinder for everyone, but unlike our enemies we could keep some of our men in the fight. We didn't have the numbers to fight a war of attrition against two sets of legions, though, which was why Juniper had made plans otherwise. So far everything had come down along fairly predictable lines, which meant now generalship would begin to matter.

Which turned out to be a problem, because against our predictions the Black Knight was moving the Seventh south to reinforce her battle line. Juniper and I had been sure the Black Knight's own legion would be kept in reserve for hours yet, held back as a precaution in case Sepulchral ended up giving the Eleventh trouble. Four thousand fresh troops would be enough to breathe vigour into an attack on our defences, I thought, and already the melee between the trenches rested on a knife's edge.

"Fuck," I muttered, looking at the Seventh's dust trail rising high. "What do you know we don't, Black Knight?"

Leaving my post, I headed out to speak to Juniper and found she had an answer for me. Not out of any prodigious insight, but because the two envoys we'd sent this morning had turned back early and brought back news.

"There's fighting in Sepulchral's camp," Juniper growled.

"I'm guessing you don't mean the Eleventh is attacking it," I said.

She glared at me. Fair enough. Whatever Malicia's scheme had been in there, evidently it had crippled them as an army. It made sense that the Black Knight felt comfortable sending her reserve into battle if Sepulchral's twenty thousand were basically out of the fight. That was something of a problem.

"We need to get that army moving," I grimaced.

"Good of you to volunteer," the Hellhound replied.

"Not even queenship gets me out of the shit jobs," I sighed.
"Should have aimed for empress."

Juniper snorted and gave me the Order of Broken Bells to lead. My knights weren't going to be charging trenches anytime soon, and the enemy's remaining horse was also still at large. I wasted no time, saddling up and riding at speed full south. Going all the way around Moule Hills to get to Sepulchral's camp would take hours, even riding horses, but there was no alternative. We passed by the silhouettes of the Rebel Legion camp in the hills, deep behind their valley fortifications, and I noted it did not look heavily defended. Sacker or whoever had usurped her command were putting their back into the valley battle. I could see the sense in it, even if it was Sacker that'd given the order.

The rebels didn't want to win the battle, they wanted everyone weakened to their bargaining position improved. Either Marshal Nim or myself winning would be an actual problem for them, they were sure to kneecap whoever pulled ahead.

We kept riding hard to the north, eventually finding the same path that Sepulchral's main host had taken to link up with its vanguard in the heights. There were wagons at the bottom of the slope and tents too, the camp having proved too small for the whole army of the rebelling High Lady of Aksum. We got closer and immediately I winced: not only was there no picket to see us coming but what looked like supply wagons were actually being left unguarded. There were some soldiers at the bottom of the slope, maybe a few hundred, but they were disorganized and didn't actually notice us coming until we were in charging distance. Levies, I thought. Rubies to piglets those poor bastards were levies wanting to be left out of the mess in the heights.

Our arrival unsettled them but the shield wall they tried to make to discourage a change was visibly shaky. I hadn't come here for a fight, though, so instead I whistled for an escort of knights to follow me and pulled ahead. It took a bit for them to realize I wanted to talk and then choose someone who would, but eventually a pair of middle-aged Soninke shuffled forward warily.

"I'm not here to kill you," I bluntly said. "I'm here to speak with Empress-Claimant Sepulchral."

A harsh laugh from one of the two.

"A little late for that," he said. "The old witch's finally dead."

It was easy to get them talking after some prodding. Apparently Abreha Mirembe had died overnight. Some had claimed it was old age that'd done her in, but both her designated heir Isoba Mirembe and his cousin Sanaa Mirembe claimed it to be assassination. They promptly accused each other of the deed, which had seen violence ensue. Sanaa Mirembe, sister of the same Fasili Mirembe who'd served Akua and died at the Doom, had proved to have many supporters among the Aksum men. Isoba, however, was engaged to the daughter of the High Lord of Nok: those troops had largely sided with him. Fighting had been breaking out all day with short breaks to negotiate, but the breaks were getting shorter and the fighting bloodier.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. Malicia had fucked up that army pretty good. If I were a betting woman, I'd bet that Sanaa was the Tower's ringer in that fight but I couldn't be sure. Besides, in Malicia's shoes I wouldn't actually want Sanaa to win by too much if I wanted her to win at all. The costlier her victory, the less of a threat she would be after being called to heel. No, I decided, just having a ringer was too simple to be a plot of Malicia's. Better odds she had someone under Isoba as well, fanning the flames so that the factions would keep bleeding each other instead of coming to an arrangement. Worse, I couldn't see an easy way out of this. I wasn't sure I had the men to force Isoba's claim, I thought, and even if I did it'd take too long.

I needed that army to get marching an hour ago.

"Are they fighting right now?" I finally asked.

"No, they're still in talks," one of them said. "The moment they leave the tent and the corpse, though, they'll be back at-"

My eye sharpened.

"The corpse is still in there?" I pressed.

They nodded.

"It's why the truce is observed while in the tent."

I left them to that, riding away and back to the Order. Talbot came up to me but I ignored him, closing my eye to think. Would it work? Could it work?

"Your Majesty?" Brandon Talbot asked.

I opened my eye. It was my best shot.

"Form up," I said. "We're going into the camp."

I felt the weight of his gaze on me, but he did not question the wisdom of the decision. He was a reliable sort, Talbot. The way uphill was difficult, but the loyalist sappers had pretty obviously gentled the slope. It was usable, just not the kind of thing you ever want to lead a cavalry charge up through. Or any charge, honestly. We ran into actual defences the moment we reached the heights, at last. The division in the camp was pretty blatant, tents and furniture having been used to make makeshift barricades facing each other while bristling armed soldiers faced each other. I saw – and smelled, Gods take pity on my nose – that horses had been butchered by the hundreds while tied and their carcasses left to rot in the sun, but along with that horrid mess two parts of the camp were being avoided.

The first was a pavilion the size of a small castle and enchanted to look like one, which I assumed to have been Sepulchral's personal quarters. It was now neutral grounds for negotiation, however long that would last. The second was a maze of large cages of black iron, which only people in scarlet livery every came close to. I could see misshapen silhouettes within, some of them snapping at the servants in scarlet and others trying to claw their way out of the cage. Right, Aksum. The Cauldron of Monsters, once famous for its use of monsters in battle. At least the squabbling soldiers had been smart enough to stay clear of that. Neither side moved to block us as we formed up on the heights, but the repositioned to be prepared for a fight if it came down to it.

Gods, it better not. We didn't have the room for a charge and they'd bury us with corpses if they had to. No, I was going to put on the fancy hat and bargain my way into that tent. The Order was just here to... help temptations stay at bay. It took half an hour for all my knights to make it up in the camp but I waited it out, only then riding forward with a small escort. Someone must have warned the squabbling Mirembes, because both of them came out of the tent with escorts of their own. I led Zombie towards them, pleased I wouldn't need to posture to get that talk after all, and sped up. Trumpets sounded, and I almost laughed at the pageantry – did I really require that kind of announcing? – before I realized they were coming from too far north.

The trumpets continued to sound the alarm.

"ATTACK," shouts came in Mthethwa. "THE LEGIONS ARE HERE!"

Huh, that might actually end up to my- I caught sight of movement from the corner of my eye, feeling a ripple of magic. A small thing, repeated many a time. A few hundred cages had opened at once, and as my stomach dropped I saw a scaled beast the size of a battering ram slink out and taste the air with a forked tongue. Well, I thought, fuck. Magic rippled again but I almost laughed. What were they going to do, open the fucking cages twice? A heartbeat later a hold opened in the middle of the camp, the sides of it inscribed with runes.

"I really ought to know better by now," I admitted.

At least I knew what Akua was going to do with that stolen power from earlier, I mused as a Lesser Breach screamed open and devils began pouring out. I sighed, cracking my neck and loosening my shoulder. Time to get to work, then.

After all, if it were easy what the Hells would they need me for?

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

"Do I not defeat my enemies, when I mind control them into being my voters?"

– Dread Emperor Suffrage

evan LEE

If it was easy...huh. I guess cat has a point here.

Mental Mouse

So, having not yet won her own army's, she's about to take over another army and win the fight with that one? Is this going to be a pattern?

Anomandris

Honestly, the best thing for Malicia to do would be to drop a nuke on the whole area and decimate all 4.... Even she has got to realise now that there can be no deal with Cat. She can however deal with Procer (maybe not WK, but at least Cordy) if Cat is out of the picture.

Also, as a budding villian myself (I work for a bank), I actually want to tear my hair a bit at Akua. If you've turned, commit! You don't see a hope of redemption from the Callowan side, that's why you switched. Being velvet glove with your curses and attacks does you no favours. Commitment is the necessity for true Evil!

Liliet

Alas, Akua didn't turn so much as run away. The side she ran away to happened to be opposed to the side she was on previously, but the spirit of the affair is very different.

Anomandris

Ah, the childish tantrum. That, actually I can understand and sympathize with.

Emrod

It's not even that, Cat had already said her intentions; she reformed Akua and made her family, only to rebuff her at the final step and send her careening didn't the other side. Akua will get everything she every wanted before her reformation, but now she's REFORMED and wants nothing of her old vices. Catherine's final mercy will be to give her purpose as the master warden over the prison of infinite shifting labyrinths carved from the corpse of Akua's downfall. A prison of two, where one holds down the other as it flagellates them both, endlessly.

Killing Tresmegistus has as more issues than it's solves, long forgotten plots and monsters left for a rainy day that only he can leash, it whom are freed job his death. A new champion of below risen to take his throne. And it adds a name as his guardian, so a story designed to prevent the story of an unleashed monster on the world risen again. Many layered and strong this plan.

Liliet

I don't think Cat's plan will play out the way it's been explicitly and in detail laid out to the audience 😊

RoflCat

Well, that's the irony of her current position: Catherine CAN'T die if Malicia want to survive the current events.

Catherine is essential in keeping the Grand Alliance together and thus the only option to actually push Dead King back into his jar without catastrophic result.

If Cat die, GA falls apart. Even if Cordelia activate her angelic nuke unless it can take out DK permanently then he'll be back later, and this time there won't be GA to stand in the way of him rolling over Praes.

And no, nobody in GA will make any deal with Malicia, not even Cordelia. She has burned far too many bridges in her political chess game thinking that if she can leverage her way out when she win (not if)

Miles

That's not his style though. He only ever goes out to kill armies. Once he's got a nice hoard of fresh Named zombies he'll go back into his territory and turtle up again.

Shveiran

Not this time. He needs to conquer Calernia before the advances of magic and technology overcome his own advantages and the slippery slope starts; otherwise, a Crusade will eventually defeat him.

...Although now that I think about it, I suppose that the AngelBang would pretty much collapse civilization on Calernia or thereabout, so I'm guessing his timetable for the Conquest could be moved forward a bit.

samshadar

On the other hand, you can be sure that the continent would be colonized again by the empires across the seas. As far as we've been told, Calernia is actually a backwater of sorts, and the powers on other continents are far stronger and probably more advanced. That means unless the DK's victory is complete and he fills the vacuum left behind by the destruction of the GA, there will be others to reclaim the continent.

mamm0nn

He's been invited, there's nothing stopping him this time and for once he even has the upper hand of angels coming before demons. DK isn't raiding, this time he's going for the continent, it seems. Taking the whole west while the east is off-limits by agreement.

Quite likely creating a new map of evil dead vs living of both good and evil mixed, even if the Free Cities that have thus far stayed out of this war for the most part end up on that living side. With what we have now, that may actually be a doable end game for him. Not the whole thing, but definitely enough to see the other half consumed in the next war.

shikkarasu

Even worse than being invited by Malicia, he has the blessing of the Wandering Bard. I have to wonder if that was the real thing that kept him from leaving his box; knowledge that she would just put him back in.

Liliet

I'm loving the Masego developments here.

Loving the Akua developments, too :3

Juff

Typo Thread:

that the Thirteenth > that if the Thirteenth down the no-man's-land down > down the no-man's-land half of trenches > half of the trenches
I if I > If I patrols and west > patrols west the rebel to > the rebels to fireballs, crossbow > fireballs, and crossbow know we don't > know that we don't weakened to their > weakened so their every came > ever came the repositioned > they repositioned

Xinci

I am rather curious if the eyes of Night Cat uses kinda replace her vision since she has one eye. Also curious about how well Cats Night eyes help her with depth perception. She can have multiple up too, so maybe she can achieve some very interesting perspectives.

Hopefully we learn about these monsters later, havent actually seen any beings other than soldiers really interact with extra-Creational creatures like Devils before.

May get a lot of casualties here overall from the look of things

Liliet

I think they very much don't work as a substitute for mundane depth perception: they aren't in Cat's face. They're an entirely separate capability that does not restore lost functionality.

marillius

Having multiple eyes further apart would definitely increase depth perception.

mamm0nn

Not if you don't have a brain fine-tuned for it, like with our eyes.

shikkarasu

Brains are startlingly adaptable. People have lost upwards of 50% of their brain and have made full recoveries, with the remaining part just learning to pull double duty. Admittedly these are rare cases, but the precedent is amazing.

There has also been amazing success in controlling robotic 3rd arms that wire directly into the brain, cameras (extremely low res, black and white only) wired into the visual cortex, and even translating one sense to another ('hearing' through specialised speakers that vibrate areas of a person's back).

Are our brains optimised for our current bodies? Sure, but most of that comes from your first 6-8 years of being in that body. Brains are, at their core, learning machines. You can learn to incorporate anything into 'just another limb' given a year or three of constant practise.

Sinead

To top it off, while Cat isn't full on Fae senses/ biology is a vague suggestion anymore, her brain is probably more adaptable for odd sensory information.

Shveiran

And if they did, Cat wouldn't rely on them because that's just asking for someone to strip her of them later on and cripple her accuracy when it matters.

thecount

I'm more curious why the red ring didn't appear. Did Aqua just said the legions "Welp, she broke it, but she won't leave her cam anymore anyway." And the agreed or what?

kinghaart

She's also faked her presence before with that stone so it might just be deemed unreliable now.

Kennedy

I love Cat's prayers for big workings of night

Kage Lupus

Agreed. I really liked the idea of her being surrounded by this foreign legion that had never seen her working with Night before, chanting in some crazy language, and ending the whole thing with "Cho Sve Noc".

mamm0nn

Ask me tomorrow.

Mike E.

And after she is done rambling in some weird language, the entire legion in front of you is engulfed in fire and death, then tells you she can do that again with just a few hours rest.

SpeckofStardust

So Callow knights Vs devils summoned by a traitor. Akua really is aiming for least kills here. (practically it cause the dead king is a problem for her, emotionally she cant control herself)

Liliet

Notably in Akua's own perspective we haven't seen a single thought towards the practicality of it. She's not thinking about the Dead King, the only thoughts she spares towards long-term interaction with Catherine are that (1) she won't forgive her and (2) they won't ever fuck (these are notably two separate thoughts that come up in different contexts). That Akua's actions are actually reasonably practical from the point of view that remembers DK exists is a coincidence, because Akua herself audibly doesn't.

Miles

Kinda starting to wonder if Akua's power is actually diminished in all this, by some safeguards Malicia put in place. Nim should know what she's capable of so if Akua were actually going easy she'd be caught basically instantly.

Zach

Akua herself admitted that she went easy on the Army during her PoV chapter (the one where she talks with Nim). She's actually honest in her attempt to lower Callow casualties.

Liliet

> With the mages in line, she proved her value to the Black Knight. A ritual to bring the Army of Callow forcefully into Creation, to deny retreat through the Twilight Ways. It was an inspired piece of spellcraft, she thought. And she found her hand, moving again and again. Adjusting numbers. It was pointless, Akua thought. Even if the blow was softened she would never be forgiven for it. And still. The hand moved. Some had hated her, in the Army of Callow. Many. Others had been... kind. In their own way. How many of them would she kill with her ritual?

>

> A few less, she thought. If she could.

I don't think anyone short of Hierophant tier understands what Akua is capable of.

nick012000

Empress-Claimant Sephulcral is dead? I guess whatever's left of her army's about to join Cat's, then. I half-expect that either Cat's going to bring her back as an undead minion, or she's going to slap some sense into Sephulcral's heirs since it was obvious Malicia who did it.

KiltedBastich

Why not both? Cat's going to bring Sepulchral back as an undead minion with her mind intact in order that Sepulchral can a) make clear her choice of succession, b) tell her minions who betrayed and murdered her so that person can get their comeuppance, and c) order them all to avenge her. She'll probably then ask Cat to let her rest, and Cat will gracefully assent to let her go.

Darkening

Can we get a moment of appreciation for Vivienne gaining a heroic name and immediately leading a cavalry charge to buy time for her allies to escape? That was about as guaranteed a success as I can imagine lol. Not sure what cat is planning with the body, making her undead would presumably run into the issues the wasteland has with undead not being allowed to rule. Hm.

Earl of Purple

Not just any cavalry, either. They're knights now, at least sort of. It was a charge of her new knightly order, so the riders must be knights.

As for the body, she just needs it to answer some questions, I think.

GluestickGenius

Stuff the body full of explosives and send it towards the enemy lines, I assume.

Shveiran

It would be a hilarious call-back, not gonna lie.

Also...

...Uh, weren't we told several times that Name power made munitions' deflagrations more powerful?
I wouldn't discard the possibility that the body of a DREAD

EMPRESS CLAIMANT being used to fan the flames may result in a rather big blast.

Zach

I got the impression Catherine's goal is to prevent Malicia from doing something with the body, rather than doing something with it herself.

Regarding Vivienne, I'm pretty sure Exiled Prince got shot in the throat during his first Named battle, so doing something immediately after you get your Named doesn't completely guarantee success.

Earl of Purple

The Exiled Prince had been around a while before he went to Callow and joined the rebellion. He was ran from Helike after Kairos took the Name of Tyrant, which was at some point between twelve and thirteen, and he was sixteen when he first showed up. So he'd been kicking around for a few years, dodging fights with the Tyrant's assassins probably, dealing with bandits, trying to gather support to reclaim his throne, etc.

Darkening

It's more about the heroic charge and character hanging back to fight a delaying battle so his friends can keep going tropes, the comment on it being fresh is just that she's already diving right in and abusing it lol

Umbral

I think Akua is turning into a hero. She's not hearing the Tower's Call and only feels the shiver of possibility at Warlock.

She

gnaruscat

I just realised something about Cat's Name ability. (This isn't directly related to this chapter, but it did occur to me because of it. As usual, sorry for the rambling nature of the post) Everyone is assuming that she Speak-ed (yes, spoke would be more correct, but Speak is the aspect) Malicia. But that doesn't make sense with Cat's personality. I think she did the exact opposite. She Denied, or Opposed, or something similar. That's why she seemed to overpower Malicia... She didn't overpower her, she Name-judo'd her

Kage Lupus

Gonna have to disagree. Speaking isn't an Aspect like Rend or Take, it is an ability any Named can theoretically use. I always had the impression that it is based on authority over the people you are commanding, whether that is formal or just implied by the narrative. Black was able to Speak at Cat way back in book 1 because A) Her Name was weaker than his and B) She was his Squire and a Black Knight should be able to command those.

The reason that Cat being able to affect Malicia is such a big deal is because neither of those two points should have been true. Cat isn't even Named yet, and even if she were Malicia has sunk deep into her role as the Dread Empress over decades. Plus, Empress in general is normally at the pinnacle of command structures so her Name should be naturally resistant to being commanded by others.

The same thing was basically true of the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim as well. Both of them were affected by Cat speaking before, although not directly at them. That gives the impression that whatever her new Name is, it is related to having authority over Named in particular. Not based on their Above/Below affiliation, or any political/cultural/ethnic considerations. If you are Named then Cat thinks that she should be able to exert her will on you if necessary, and those three examples I listed are proof that on some level Creation agrees with her.

gnaruscat

Good point, on all points. Thank you!

inglessiejek

Can't remember where but almost the same points as made by Kage are actually made in one of the chapters

Zach

Yes, I think that this is basically a correct read on whatever is going on with Catherine, and it also fits Catherine's philosophy (that she wants to prevent Named from being in positions of authority to begin with, even if she realizes that this probably won't be practical – her philosophy is basically centered around controlling the role Named have in their continent). It also fits her history – she's directly been in command of other Named during the war against the Dead King, and even though she's only technically in charge of Below, in practice she also exerted authority over Heroic Named, due to White Knight avoiding using his authority.

zucced

It's a shame Sepulchral bit the dust, I enjoyed how much of a disruption she was to Cat and Malicia.

She had such a badass title too

Shveiran

So, does anyone else have a feeling Malicia got her hands on an Assassin Named?

I know she has the best spies on the local block, but she just murdered three very high-profile targets in one night, one of which a claimant to a very powerful Name. Not everyone needs to be Named, of course, but this does reek a bit.

Also, it would be just like Malicia to use her own Named assassin to do something only a Named assassin could manage, and then leak that Scribe was behind Assassin all along (if she knows, which is uncertain).

DC

...She's planning to Weekend at Bernie's this, isn't she.

Lurch

Demons. A Lesser Breach, pouring forth demons. Right as a force of Callowan knights are in position.

This is the enemy they are pretty much made to combat.

This should be good.

Lurch

Correction. Devils. Still, looking forward to this.

Santiago A Duarte

Okay...what? For the longest time we heard about how horses were just about the only thing that the Dread Empire had found it impossible to get from Callow, how nobles butchered their own herds or rebelled when it was attempted. Then in this book there are horses all over the place in Praes. I was suspending disbelief in Wolof because it stood to reason that some of the richest nobles would have gotten their hands on a few horses as status symbols and such, but now in this camp there are hundreds?? And clearly they're not worth ridiculous sums of money, if soldiers are slaughtering them like pigs. What is going on?

what color lingerie looks best on very pale women

Can someone recommend Peekaboo Bras and Open Cup Bras? Thanks x

Interlude: Juniper's Plan (Redux)

"Armies, like water, take the path of least resistance."

– Dread Emperor Terribilis II

They were wildly outnumbered, surrounded on all sides and faced with horrors most. It was, Grandmaster Brandon Talbot thought, just another day in the Black Queen's service.

He was already looking forward to the mad caper that would get – most of – them out of this alive. He turned to look at the Black Queen, who was grinning a hard grin that swept the doubts right off the frame of any knight close enough to see it. Confidence rippled out through the Order, passed from knight to knight like a whisper. And why wouldn't it? How many times had it seen them laugh in the face of death and leave victorious, that grin? Once more, Brandon Talbot fervently prayed. Brandon's queen cracked her neck then sighed.

"Well," the Queen of Callow drawled, "isn't this a right mess, Talbot?"

He swallowed a shit-eating grin. It was going to be one of those, then.

"Positively uncivilized, Your Majesty," he agreed.

"Ain't it just?" she said, the Laure drawl rearing up its head. "Now, looking at this situation before us, I can't help but feel that it's missing something."

"So much as a speck of godliness?" Brandon tried.

She snorted, then erupted into a small chuckle like he'd said a joke.

"Oh, Talbot," she mused, "the things you say sometimes."

A heartbeat's pause.

"What's missing, of course, is more monsters that want to kill everyone," the Queen of Callow nonchalantly told him. "So let's remedy that lack."

Brandon remembered a night when he'd been a boy and he'd snuck out of the manor in Marchford with his sister. It'd been summer and they'd gone out into the hills, bravely defeating sheep-shaped with wooden swords before collapsing exhausted in the grass and looking up at a sea of stars. He remembered the breeze, how warm it had been against his skin. That was what Night felt like to him, when the Black Queen used it – that warm breeze against his skin. There were goddesses behind that power and should they frown upon him he thought it might be a terrible thing to behold.

But they were passing fond, instead, and so he felt a warm summer night's breeze against his skin as the Queen of Callow ripped open a wide gate into Arcadia.

Just in time, for madness was seizing the enemy camp. Monsters were tearing into men, howling devils flying through in riotous flocks and for some godforsaken reason the Praesi were still fighting each other. On the others side of the gate Brandon glimpsed a screaming blizzard, but when the queen rode into the white he shouted orders to follow. The Order formed into a column and went through in good order, the edges of their formation hacking away at the monsters and devils that were already nipping away their ranks, but it was not long before all had passed through. The grandmaster had run regular drills with mages to be able to charge in and out of gates at the drop of a hat, considering how often it was being used a tactic these days.

The whipping winds almost deafened him as he cross, but not so much that when he approached his queen he could not hear her shouting. Squinting he tried to make out what she was looking at, finding with surprised it appeared to be fae. Maybe a half-dozen of them, riding on pale horses and looking utterly unconcerned by the cold. Was Queen Catherine making a bargain, an alliance? He spurred his mount closer to join her side.

"-and that smirk makes you look like an asshole," the Queen of Callow shouted. "I could kill you and all you friends with a hand tied behind my back, even if I had no fucking eyes."

Ah, Brandon thought. The fae were not only pale, they were utterly livid.

"How quick you are to give insult, when still protected by oath," one of the fae shouted, "yet if-"

There was a flash of boiling-hot Night and half the fae's face melted off.

"Boring," the Black Queen said. "Hope you have more friends, otherwise I won't even be able to work out an appetite for supper."

The fae screamed, which Brandon thought might be something worth worrying about before screams answered in the distance and he decided it was definitely something worth worrying about. Queen Catherine glanced at him, having finally noticed his presence.

"Ah, Talbot," she said. "Good, get the Order in formation. We're going to have get out of here in a hurry, I can feel at least a hundred of them coming."

She frowned, then cocked her head to a side.

"Damn, that's a Duke for sure and he feels pissed," the Black Queen gleefully said.

"I'll see to it, Your Majesty," Brandon said. "Are we to be fighting an enemy in particular?"

"We're going to take the big tent that looks like a castle," Queen Catherine said.

Ah, the one stinking of magic and heavily defended. He really should have been expecting that. The grandmaster of the Order of the Broken Bells saluted, and rode away to muster his knights.

The storm was getting worse and the fae angrier, leaving soon sounded just fine to him.

—

It was a graceless thing, this battle.

"All this shady shit they've pulled and still it comes down to the melee," Staff Tribune Ligaia muttered in disdain. "So much for the scheming witches."

Marshal Nim Mardottir grunted back, noncommittal. Her old friend — as much of a friend as a human could be — wasn't the first one today to grumble about the plots of the Empress and the Warlock and how they were staining the honour of what should have been a clean battle. She was, though, the first one to complain the scheming hadn't been effective enough. In both cases, the Black Knight tended to disagree. Malicia's surgical assassinations and hidden assets had paralyzed both the deserting legions and the Sepulchral rebels, though according to the Eyes even after being framed for an attempted coup Sacker had wiggled back her way to command by swearing to be hard on the Army of Callow. As for the Warlock's ritual against the Thirteenth, it had done more to improve Nim's opinion of the woman than weeks of smile and pretty talk.

It had been both effective and restrained, showing regard for the well-being of soldiers that'd served the Dread Empire loyally for decades before being led astray. More regard than the Tower had thus far shown for the legions that served it, one might argue. If one wanted to be hung a traitor.

"If we can rout Sepulchral's brats quick enough we can win this battle before nightfall," the Black Knight rumbled. "It'll cost us bloody, but I can see the writ."

A casual look at the melee raging across the valley showed only men dying pointlessly on a field. The deserters to the west, aggressively trying to bleed everyone else, while across the valley to the east the Legions of Terror and the Army of Callow lost hundreds every hour struggling over the same two hundred feet of solid ground. Casualties had been mounting all day, the Black Knight had already lost near two thousand. It was worse for the Callowans, though. Sacker was going after them hard with her siege engines and the Thirteenth's treachery had left them underequipped and tired from the night fighting. The Army of Callow would be the first to break. The Black Knight's gauntlet closed with grinding sound of metal on metal before she pushed down the swell of anger. She'd thought better of Jeremiah.

What had the Black Queen offered to turn him?

Sometimes it felt like she was the only person in Praes who gave a shit about the Dread Empire. Malicia was scheming herself into the grave, the Carrion Lord was setting fires left and right and all the while nobles were at each other's throats like the middle of a fucking invasion was the time to settle their grudges. Even the Legions, which should have been a pillar of stability, were falling apart. Thousands had deserted over the mind control hook. It wasn't that Nim didn't understand the disgust, the sense of betrayal, but could Malicia really be blamed when half the damned Legions had gone the way of the Carrion Lord a year before? It was not madness, if it'd turned out necessary. Mok had argued it smacked of slavery, though, and not been wrong.

His offered bargain – returning to the fold in exchange for turning on Malicia – had been a damned silly thing anyway, and one Nim could not accept lest the Legions of Terror fall apart entirely. Malicia had given the order to keep stringing him along until Sepulchral was in place and Nim had done it, with a heavy heart but done it anyway. Mok had been a friend, once, but duty was duty. And when all the pieces had been in place the Empress had paralyzed one enemy army and turned another irremediably against Callow, over a day's span turning the Black Queen's position from superior to imperiled. No, the Empress had proved over and over that she was an able woman. But she was also one who still had implanted commands in the minds of hundreds of her own officers. They would only be removed at the end of the war. Nim should not begrudge that, given the stained record of loyalty of the Legions over the last few years. Should not.

Her gauntlets ground again.

"Ah, our beloved sorcerous overseer returns," Staff Tribune Ligaia muttered. "What glamour, what grace, what a stupid fucking thing to wear on a battlefield."

Snorting in an amusement, Nim turned to follow her subordinate's gaze. Lady Akua Sahelian, who some already called the Warlock even if the Powers had not yet granted her that in truth, was wearing an ornate red dress on a field where almost all the Named present were after her head. The Black Knight could not think of a goof reason for it, save possibly because Soninke highborn were all fucking mad and this one madder than most. Nim had yet to parse out Sahelian's game, what stood behind the warning about the pattern of three and that convincingly raw tirade about the Tower. She'd had confirmed the bit about the pattern, asked old friends who'd learned a few pieces of namelore.

Nim would have preferred relying on the learned folk of Husseil-Ossa, what humans called the Hall of Skulls, but none of the seventeen kings and the thirteen queens had far-lore to share on Names. Unsurprising. She had risen high enough among her people to know more had been lost over the centuries than the old crowns cared to admit. Human learning had been made to serve, instead, and human learning had said Akua Sahelian likely saved her life. This was not a pleasant position to be in, but these were not times for pleasantness. The Black Knight need only look to the three armies in Legion armour hacking at each other like animals on a dusty field to be reminded of that.

"Lady Black," the Warlock greeted her, offering a bow. "Staff Tribune Ligaia."

"The imperial's courts further south, in case you got lost," Ligaia scornfully said.

"As usual, Lady Ligaia, your helpfulness is as a balm upon my soul," the Warlock smiled back with seeming delight before her expression sobered. "I happen to bring more urgent news, Marshal."

The golden-eyed witch – Powers, that colour was eerie even on humans – turned to meet Nim's stare.

"The Lesser Breach has been closed," Sahelian said. "That should mean either Queen Catherine or the Hierophant are in the camp. I cannot think of any other here with the power to so quickly achieve this."

The ogre shook her head.

"The Hierophant's still out there," the Black Knight said.

She could feel him, through Survey. The aspect born out of decades of battles had become like an unearthly sense, an ability to take a single look at a battlefield and know what all the pieces in play were. The Black Knight had taken more than a week to learn to recognize the particular pulls at her instinct as being specific Named, but now that she had it took only a moment to find them. So long as they were 'visible', anyway, a nebulous distinction she still sometimes struggled with. The aspect had more esoteric applications besides, she'd learned, pairing with another to turn a simple trick of power into something entirely more deadly, yet such things must be used only with care. There were rules to fighting between Named that she was still only faintly aware of, no matter how many dreams of Amadeus' life the Powers saw fit to send her.

"Then it must be her," the Warlock said.

Nim wondered if the girl knew of the faint undertone of yearning that always crept in her voice when the Black Queen was brought up. It was the worse kept secret in Praes that the Queen of Callow and the Warlock had been sleeping together during their years abroad, but while most assumed it had been a coup on Sahelian's part to prepare her later betrayal the Black Knight believed otherwise. That break hadn't been a clean one, for all that the Warlock had bound her fate to the Tower's.

"Take the mage cadres and go support the Eleventh," the Marshal of Praes ordered her. "The Mirembé remnants pulling together would be trouble. You have my authority to take any measures necessary to ensure they do not, Warlock."

"How exciting," the golden-eyed witch drawled. "By your will then, o Black Knight."

Nim waved her away irritably. Sahelian was a viper, but she was a competent viper. If the Black Knight had to be saddled with a caster of that calibre – which were always trouble, the old Warlock had been too – it might as well be one who knew her business. Her attention returned to the battle in the valley, the bloody melee in three parts. The Army of Callow had edge ahead in the morning, the Black Knight thought, but now that Noon Bell had come and gone it was increasingly on the backfoot. An hour ago Nim had allowed free use of munitions on the front against the Callowans and the difference in stocks was beginning to tell.

Juniper of the Red Shields had clearly stacked the western corner of her defensive line, knowing it was the weak point, but the Black Knight was beginning to think the other woman had made a blunder. Her eastern flank was wavering. Already the Callowans had nearly been pushed back into their own trench and the pressure was only increasing. Had the young Marshal of Callow thinned her eastern flank at the expense of her western one, knowing the latter would bear the brunt of the casualties? The Black Knight could not deny what her own eyes were seeing, what her aspect kept drawing her attention to: there was an opening to take. Nim turned an eye to Ligaia.

"Pass the word," she said. "The Fourteenth is to mount an all-out assault on the eastern flank. Commit the reserves, mages are to turn to fully offensive fire and the siege to concentrate for a breach."

It would not matter if Sepulchral's brat had some sense beaten into them, the Black Knight thought. Not if the battle to the south was already won, and this campaign with it.

—

Juniper ripped into the dried mutton jerky, swallowing a mouthful of meat after barley chewing it. Gods but she'd been ravenous all day. She bit off another piece then paused halfway through chewing, turning to look at the woman to her side.

"Doesn't taste salted," she said.

Aisha wrinkled her nose.

"Swallow, Juniper," she said.

The Hellhound rolled her eyes but indulged her Staff Tribune. She then turned back an expectant gaze. Aisha smiled, pushing back a strand of that soft dark hair before answering.

"I had it washed and dried again," Aisha said.

Juniper, like most orcs, preferred meat without seasoning. It was a small thing, but it was those that spoke loudest. Juniper felt a sharp swell of fondness, one of those moments that always brought her dangerously close to thinking about biting that smooth neck and a hundred more things after that. Years of control kept her body from moving, though she noticed that Aisha had caught the glance to the neck and her lips quirked. Nothing was said of it, but the shared knowledge hung between them in the air. Dragging her eyes away, Juniper of the Red Shields turned her attention back to the battle in the distance. A look into her Baalite eye confirmed the trend she'd seen forming over the last half hour: the Fourteenth had committed to an all-out attack and the eastern flank was buckling.

As it should. She'd ordered General Zola to thin it.

"It's time," Juniper said, licking her chops. "Have the fallback order sent."

Aisha briskly nodded, rising from her seat to pass the order as Juniper stayed in her own and watched the eastern flank through the Baalite eye. Concentrated ballista fire had torn through chunks of the palisade and the Fourteenth, though green, was well-trained. Their backline was already bringing wooden planks to the fore that'd serve as makeshift bridges to cross the trench and allow legionaries pour through the breaches. Flags and sorcery had Zola informed now was the time to pull out and the general did what she could. Her legionaries had been getting pushed back into their own trench by the Fourteenth and that didn't leave a lot of room to maneuver. She got out those she could and began pulling away from the palisade.

The Fourteenth, howling and victorious, followed the retreating Army of Callow. Against most armies Juniper's counterstroke would have resulted into a rout, but this was the Legions of Terror. The young legionaries were not baited into a hasty pursuit, instead getting shouted back into line by sergeants and lieutenants, so when sixty feet behind the palisade they found the Army of Callow reformed into a shield wall the did not get scattered. Instead the Fourteenth formed its own shield wall in time and the lines collided. Juniper sucked at her teeth. It would hold, she decided. The Fourteenth needed to cross a trench and blown-up chunks of palisade to reinforce its own shield wall, effectively slowing its advance to a crawl.

The Fourteenth would be tied down there for hours with little to show for it, should nothing change. Good.

The Baalite eye moved to the northwest, where the Seventh Legion was marching down the road to reinforce. Nim would be sending her legion to back up the Fourteenth, the Hellhound knew, unless she found a better opening. Juniper just have to give her that opening, to heat up that old veteran's lizard blood and bait her into going after a victory. Juniper rose to her feet to give the order herself, the one that'd most matter in this entire battle. It would be a rider that carried it, not flag or sorcery. Otherwise the Black Knight might smell the trap. And away the rider went as Juniper returned to her pavilion and her seat in the shade, Baalite eye tight in grasp and Aisha returned to her side.

"This is it," Juniper gravelled. "The knife's edge."

The moment that would make or break the Battle of Kala. Even as the situation on the eastern flank stabilized, the breaches stopped cold, the western corner began to waver. It'd been hammered at all morning from two sides by engines and legionaries, assaulted relentlessly. Thrice rituals had been aimed at smashing the palisades, only the Hierophant's intervention keeping the magic from breaking the stalemate. Bravely the legionaries of the Army of Callow had held, but now they were wavering. Their eastern flank had just been punched through by the Fourteenth and enemy soldiers were spilling around the shield wall, the Black Queen was nowhere in sight and the pressure was only increasing. They broke, first in singles and then in clumps.

That was, at least, what Juniper was trying to sell.

And that was the danger, the knife's edge, because a feigned retreat could so easily turn into a real one. Once soldiers got running, no matter the reason, it was hard to get them to stop. Juniper had built her box, even though its walls could not yet be seen, but it might yet be blown apart by the same men she meant to hold it. Pickler's sappers did what they were meant to, carpeting the grounds with smokers that obscured everyone's line of sight as legionaries ran and legionaries pursued. Not only the loyalist but after a few moments the rebels as well, a chunk of wall in front of them just as undefended. Sacker, Auntie Sacks, would order it. She couldn't afford to let Nim take those fortifications, else her plan of bleeding both sides would go up in flames.

The last thing the Rebel Legions wanted was to be penned in by the Loyalists Legions, meaning they had to take that palisade so the Eighth could not.

Smoke rose into the sky in great swaths and Juniper clutched the Baalite eye so tightly her knuckles paled. What would win out, the Marshal of Callow wondered. The fear, the instinct to run and keep running, or the trust? The Army of Callow had grown to trust its commanders, fighting on foreign fields, but the fear had grown too. Hadn't Juniper felt it herself, that poison that spread through the veins and blackened everything? More than just felt, she had wallowed in it. She'd glimpsed, though, a light on the horizon. A way to settle it all at last. The Hellhound leaned forward, jaw shut tight as she looked at her soldiers move.

Haven't you ever wondered? Where we stand, compared to the best. We've fought Procerans and rebels and corpses, but this? This is the standard. The reigning champion. The mother we must murder to surpass.

"Come on," the Marshal of Callow murmured in Kharsum. "It can be done. We can beat them. Trust me and we can beat them all."

Soldiers ran, past the lines and the officers waiting with their whistles and shouts. Juniper's heart leapt up in throat, but it wasn't done. The same hard iron that'd seen the Army of Callow through the Camps and the Graveyard, through the Boot and Hainaut and dozen more battles, it told. Some kept running, but some fell into line. And that was all that was needed: a few people standing. Men gathered to them like a standard, lines firming, and Juniper began to laugh. In the distance, sappers began to raise mantlets. A box, formed out of the eastern corner of trenches and palisades and the second cornered the sappers were now making of wood. A box filled with smoke, and soon to be filled with only Named and her enemies. Juniper rose to her feet, passing the Baalite eye to Aisha.

"Juniper?" she asked.

"Look into it," the Hellhound said. "Northwest."

Aisha did.

"The Seventh Legion," Juniper stated, "is no longer moving to reinforce the Fourteenth. It's moving to reinforce the Eighth."

The dark-haired woman put down the Baalite eye after a moment, smiling.

"It is."

The Hellhound flashed her fangs at the horizon, triumphant.

"Where's that wagon with the roof again?" she asked. "I need a nap."

Aisha started in surprise.

"Catherine is not back from Sepulchral's camp, we don't know--"

"She chose me," Juniper said. "I choose her. She'll get it done, and that means the last decision that matters in this battle has already been made."

Juniper of the Red Shields, Marshal of Callow, walked out the pavilion with steps lighter than they had been in years.

—

"What the fuck is happening in there?"

Ligaia wasn't asking anything that the rest of the general staff wasn't silently wondering. The Black Knight surveyed the movement of her own troops, but she found nothing but the obvious. The Eighth Legion had entered the smoke and was engaged in a brutal melee against the Army of Callow and the deserters, Sacker pouring her soldiers into the grinder to make sure she wouldn't get enveloped by any single force. The Seventh was reinforcing, but the truth harder to swallow was that those reinforcements were needed. Between the casualties of the Thirteenth's treachery and the brutal blind fighting in the smoke the Eighth was getting mauled. Nim watched the movements of the troops, towering above her officers, and her fists began to grind.

"Ma'am," Senior Sapper Licker said, catching her attention.

"We're at risk now. The deserters are still hitting our trench but we can't spare the men to hold it unless we send reinforcements from the Seventh. The flank's getting stretched too thin."

"Your recommendation?" Nim asked.

"Deploying goblinfire," Licker evenly said. "They'll answer in kind, but it'll lock down that entire front. We can focus our efforts on the breach in the smoke."

The Black Knight hesitated. Already she could make out currents in the battle. The Fourteenth was deadlocked, while her legions were pouring their strength into the smoky breach. So was Sacker, and with the main front of contention between the loyal legions and the deserters the tendency would only increase. We have the advantage, Nim reminded herself. The Seventh were fresh and the Army of Callow stretched thin, while Sacker's rebels were tightly packed – it would be difficult for them to mount a harder push because there simply wasn't enough room at the bottom of the hills for them to muster. Senior Sapper's Licker was going to make the breach into the fulcrum of this battle, but it was a fulcrum the Legions were best placed to triumph in.

It would get bloody, but it would get done.

"See it done," she ordered.

And with all of it resting on one breach, there was only one thing left. Nim would have to head into the smoke herself, lead the Seventh personally. Tempted as she was to Delegate one of her personal guard and guide them through Survey, her instincts ran against it. Half-hearted commitment here would be punished, she dimly felt.

"Ready the Warhammers," the Black Knight ordered. "I'll lead the push into the breach personally."

—

The Duke of Boreal Lights had been helpful enough to die taking out the Hellgate, but Brandon found the man's retinue decidedly less obliging.

"Why—"

He hacked into the flesh but the blue-skinned fae turned into ice, shattering and reforming.

"-won't—"

Even cutting the bastard thing's head off didn't help. It turned to mist and reformed, and then it had the gall to stab at him. Brandon slapped away the spear with his shield and stabbed it in the eye because, really, where was it getting the bloody nerve? It should have been dead six times over by now.

"-you-"

Oh and now the devils wanted a piece of him as well. The grandmaster slice through the wing of the howling monkey-creature and deftly led his charge to kick it after it fell, turning to parry a spear blow and smashing the fae's face with his shield with a grunt.

"-bloody-"

Oh, the broken nose didn't even come back even after it turned to mist. Brandon snarled, smashing its head repeatedly with his shield as the fae rocked back in pain and dismay.

"-DIE!"

The bottom of his shield went into the creature's skull with a wet squelch and finally it dropped to the ground. Panting but vindicated, Brandon turned to have a look around. The rebel Praesi had finally stopped fighting each other, after only half an hour of still hacking at their kin while the world went to the Hells, but the Eleventh Legion had reached the camp and even with the truce the defence was too disunited to drive it back. Outnumbered almost four to one, the legionaries were still making meat of the rebels – though it helped that the devils flying around everywhere avoided them like the plague and it'd started raining acid on their foes. That wasn't Brandon Talbot's problem, though. Now, where was the queen?

Ah, there she was. Near the castle-tent, fighting what looked like a pitch-black land octopus with suckers that spat out an acidic goo. A tower of black flame took care of that as Brandon rode to her side, pulling back his knights with him as he did – there was danger in stretching themselves too thin even of the rebel Praesi seemed to be avoiding fighting them – but by the time he arrived she was tossing a dead fae in the path of a devil belching vivid red flames while trying to fend off what looked like... a hippogriff? No, not quite. He might never have seen one of those outside heraldry, but while the creature had horse's legs and tail it instead of a hawk-like appearance it had great crow's wings and head.

It also bit off the head of the queen's horse, before she stabbed it in the neck.

Brandon rode at a gallop, smashing into a devil that tried to fall upon the queen as she leapt with a loud grunt of pain from her dying horse to the monster and Night bloomed like a sickly wind. With a satisfying crunch he smashed the bloody thing's skull with the pommel of his sword even as another clawed at his armour with screams of pain and the hymns burned bright. By the time he was done, the queen was sitting astride the dead crow monster with a smugly satisfied look on her face. No, not dead

Brandon saw. Undead, for it blinked and let out a happy screech that had him wincing in pain.

"This is mine now," the Black Queen happily announced, and a heartbeat later she was aflight.

Godsdamnit, Brandon thought, that was going to be just as bad as the damned fae flying horse. It'd been impossible to catch up to her when she rode that one, and at least that bloody thing hadn't had claws. He looked up, saw she was still headed for the great pavilion and rode after her with a sigh. Some Praesi household troops were in the way but it was nothing lances and a gallop couldn't disperse. He saw the queen disappear into the pavilion, which was a relief until he heard the fighting in there. He charged in with a wedge of a hundred behind him, smashing into what looked like a three-way brawl over a corpse. Sepulchral's squabbling heirs and a company of Legion heavies, led by-

Oh, the most beautiful woman Brandon had ever seen in his life. Would ever see in his life. He ought to dismount and kneel, to pledge service and love and-

"General Lucretia, if you don't stop glamouring my knights I'm going to feed you to my horse."

The warmth went out of the world. Brandon came back to himself, sweat drenching his back, and realized with shame that he'd been halfway out of the saddle. Many of his men had been no better. His fingers clenched around his sword. Another abomination best put to the sword, this smiling woman among the legionaries.

"Black Queen," the general spoke in a honeyed voice, "there is no need for-"

"I warned you," Catherine Foundling said, voice echoing of distant caws. "Bite off your tongue."

Power rippled out, and while the dark-skinned general shrieked and fled in a flap of dark wings as she spurted blood many of her legionaries ended up struggling with the same order. Brandon looked around and smirked. Some of the Praesi seemed to be struggling as well, but not a single knight of the Order had been affected.

"Forward," he shouted. "Forward and drive the Legions out!"

A shout forty years too late, but better than never. Even the Praesi rebels gathered themselves long enough to attain usefulness and they helped push out the legionaries, which retreated out of the pavilion after heavy losses. That did not, unsurprisingly, end hostilities. Brandon's queen had led her... mount near a corpse on a table made of solid gold and pearls, which seemed to rile up the Praesi. Two nobles – they had the look, the attitude and most of all the golden eyes – led the charge, loudly arguing though they refrained from violence.

“The succession of Aksum is no matter for outsiders, it is-”

“It is already decided,” the boy lord shouted. “It was made official years ago, Sanaa, that I am heir. Your grasping attempts to pretend otherwise-”

“You are the creature of Nok, not a true Mirembé,” Lady Sanaa scoffed, “and-”

“Gods Below, this might be the most terribly tedious shouting match I’ve ever heard,” the Black Queen said, Night billowing around her. “Here’s a solution: neither of you are in charge.”

The staff of yew she always carried was lightly tapped on the corpse, which Brandon now saw was that of an old woman. The pressure of the Night went out and the body shuddered. This did not, unsurprisingly, seem to please the two squabbling nobles.

“It is against law for undead to hold any noble title,” the young lord scoffed. “Do you think putting strings on a corpse will make it otherwise?”

“This is absurd,” Lady Sanaa hissed. “For once, Isobe speaks truth. By what right do you meddle in our affairs?”

The Black Queen smiled, pleasant and mild, which had Brandon tensing. That was usually the smile that preceded corpses beginning to drop. Beneath her the crow-winged chimera stirred, looking up with cruel eyes, and in the magelights of the pavilion the dark fringes of the Mantle of Woe seemed to meld into the creature’s feathers.

“By what right,” the Queen of Callow softly said. “You lot keep asking me that, don’t you? Nobles and officers and even Malicia herself. By what right do I meddle in the affairs of Praes, which is not mine to rule and a sovereign state beyond my reach?”

Her sole eye burned with feverish light.

“By what right?” the Black Queen hissed. “You dare ask me that, you pack of jackals who bleed Calernia as it struggles for its very right to exist, who writhe and bite and have a thousand times turned the east into a madhouse?”

The Praesi flinched away, but Brandon leaned forward with an eager smile. His knights too. They knew it well, that weight in the air. Had learned to love it, for though it was the herald of terrible things that terror was ever turned away from them. She was a queen in black, adorned in wrath and dread, but she was their queen to the bone.

Let all the world fear her, save the sons and daughters of Callow.

"You made yourself my mess to handle," Catherine Foundling snarled. "That is my right. The east is your prison and I am your fucking warden, rattling the cage until you fall in line."

Brandon felt it then, the... pressure. It was suffocating and every soul in the pavilion seemed to be choking on it. The queen looked through them all with her gaze, and wherever she looked knees buckled.

"So what will it be, Mirembe?" the Queen of Callow said. "How many of you do I need to butcher before the lesson sinks in?"

Silence was her answer.

"I thought so," Catherine Foundling quietly said. "Get up, Abreha."

The corpse did, looking around blearily. As if she'd just woken up from a long nap.

"Your Majesty?"

"Yes," the young woman smiled, "I am that. Now let's get this army moving, yes? We have work to do."

"I await your orders," the corpse said, bowing her head.

"First we're going to slap away the Eleventh," the Queen of Callow said, "but after that? Well, we're going to march."

"Where to?" the corpse of Abreha Mirembe asked.

"We're going to visit my old friend General Sacker," Catherine Foundling coldly smiled. "And remind her what happens when people cross me."

—

The hammer went down, pulverizing the sergeant and the legionary next to him. The Black Knight withdrew the weapon, shaking away the pulp as her Warhammers fanned out around her. The melee was turning to their advantage, as much as Nim could tell in this maze of smoke, but her instinct was pulling at her. Something was wrong. An arrow streaked through the smoke, which she tried to swat down but missed by an inch. One of her retainers screamed as it went through his eye, dropping to the ground and twitching.

"Archer," the Black Knight snarled.

She and the Silver Huntress had been scything through her soldiers and her personal guard alike, taking lives and then melting away before they could be caught. The sole time Nim had thought she'd caught the Huntress she'd run into the Barrow Sword instead, who had somehow managed to scar enchanted armour straight out of the Tower's vaults with a bronze sword. The Black Knight stomped through the smoke, sweeping away another handful of legionaries with a blow but finding no trace of the Archer. In the distance someone died in a flash of silver Light, the Huntress' signature.

Nim wouldn't fall for that again. Going hunting for them only ended up in her swinging at smoke while she took one arrow after another. None had penetrated the armour so far, but the Light would shatter the enchantment fully in time.

"Forward," the Black Knight shouted.

Her soldiers shouted back. There were more enemies ahead, full companies now, and the sound of sharpeners in the distance. The fighting grew harsh but they broke through, Nim leading the charge, until she made out distant shapes ahead. A wall? A few more steps forward, slapping away an arrow from the Archer come for her neck, and she realized it wasn't a wall. Not exactly. Mantlets had been placed as some kind of rough palisade, and before them she saw a sea of blood and flesh. Munitions and crossbow bolts shredded anyone that came close. What was this? She took another step forward, but she felt sharp pressure from her left. Nim backed away and a spell of blue light passed through where she'd just stood.

The Hierophant?

No, she thought as pressure came from the right this time and she caught a blade with her gauntleted hand. The Squire looked up at her through his helmet, blue eyes burning, and the Black Knight felt her stomach drop. The boy had come for her, as Sahelian had warned. She tried to crush the sword but he ripped it free, dancing away from her hammer blow with speed he'd not had last time. Another arrow needed swatting away, and then as she tried to smash the Squire darting close a swirling spell of darkness seized her foot. She was pulled off her feet, and while she backhanded the Squire away he landed on his feet with his sword up. This wasn't a good fight, she thought, they had her swinging at ghosts and-

The Black Knight breathed in sharply. When had been the last time she'd slain a legionary with the marking of the Army of Callow? Often it was hard to tell in the smoke, but she couldn't recall. There'd been a few at first, isolated, but she'd been fighting for hours in the smoke now and it had been long. But no, that made no sense, why would Sacker commit so thoroughly to this breach if she was losing so many men? The Squire came for her from behind but she smashed her hammer into the ground, bumping him up and backhanding him away. An arrow wreathed in Light streaked for her side but the Black Knight screamed, smashing through it, and when a spell that was a blue drill of light struck at her armour it dispersed against the enchantments.

In the distance power bloomed, once and then twice, and though one disappeared the second struck close. Nim was half braced for a betrayal by the Warlock, but the magic that descended was not treacherous: a massive gale of wind blew, cutting through the smoke. Suddenly half the obscured battlefield was revealed, and what Nim surveyed with a single glance had her freezing. The Rebel Legions were being routed. Not only were their corpses carpeting the ground where the Seventh had broken their push, but in the distance smoke rose from where they camp was in Moule Hills. Had someone hit them from behind?

Oh, Nim thought. That was why Sacker had been committing to the push her. With her back aflame and only one way out – the goblinfire had closed the other – if she did not break through here her legions were at risk of being surrounded and slaughtered to the last. An arrow flew but this time the Black Knight saw it come from far and simply stepped out of the way, then punched through a wavy spell and swung at the Squire. The boy ducked out of the way and then slid under her, scoring a blow against her leg and cutting into her greaves, but she kicked him away and he went tumbling. She pursued, trying to end this even if lore said she might not, but he ducked behind a blood tree of all things.

Nim's hammer went right through, wood flying as the rotten thing half-collapsed. It was hollow, and though she was already aiming another blow at the Squire her aspect tugged at the corner of her eye. Inside the dead tree, words had been carved in Lower Miezán.

Marshal Juniper wins here.

Nim breathed in sharply, the Squire retreating as she slowed her steps. Looking around, the Black Knight could not see a single company of the Army of Callow on the field. Only manning the mantlets to the south and west, and in front of them piles of bodies were piled so high they were almost a second wall. It suddenly fell into place and marshal felt like she was going to be sick. The Marshal of Callow, Nim realized, had baited both her and Sacker into pushing their main offensive here, through this... box. And then she'd withdrawn her own soldiers to the edges, and let her enemies slaughter each other under the cover of smoke. They'd been fighting each other all afternoon, ruining their armies against each other as the Army of Callow mopped up the edges and waited. The Legions had lost, Nim thought. Rebel and loyal alike, they had lost – and they would continue losing as long as they fought.

There was only one word left to speak, she knew, before this day could end.

"Retreat," the Black Knight shouted, and it tasted like ashes in her mouth. "Retreat!"

Insanenoodlyguy

"Where's that wagon with the roof again?" she asked. "I need a nap."

Aisha started in surprise.

"Catherine is not back from Sepulchral's camp, we don't know-"

"She bostee me," Juniper said. "I boost her. She'll get it done, and that means the last decision that matters in this webforum has already been made."

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

ruduen

"It was the worse kept secret in Praes that the Queen of Callow and the Warlock had been sleeping together during their years abroad..."

Apparently even Praes is getting in on the shipping.

"'This is mine now,' the Black Queen happily announced, and a heartbeat later she was aflight."

So, apparently, she has, in fact, managed to find another flying fae creature to raise from the dead. Is this going to be a thing for her? Fae are involved and this is the second, so we'll have to see if it is going to be a thing for her.

Quite a lot to process, and it's interesting to note that the fae are in play again after so much portalling was done through Twilight rather than Arcadia. I wonder if this particular set has anything to speak of when it comes to all of the lakes that have gone missing by now.

My very own name

Isn't this a Praesi beast, not Fae? I understood Sepulchral's army to have brought a bunch of crazy beasts.

KiltedBastich

Yeah, this looks like part of the Mireembe menagerie, a crow-hippogryph. How very appropriate.

RoflCat

Well, to complete her Odin-ness she'd need an eight-legged horse.

Which is to say this Zombie the...7th? might not last long.

Unless it's the 8th and survives by being 'the 8th, legged-'horse" she rides...

nick012000

Someone ought to make an article on the wiki for Zombie. 😊

davax

Meh, flesh crafting together a zombie horse with 8 legs would require the remains of at least three or four horses I think. the rear haunch legs aren't really good for this sort of thing so you'd need at least three sets of front legs... and the rest is sorta trial and error work. the forth horse carcass... or bits of one, is just for spare parts really but... Yeah I wouldn't really bother with the whole thing beyond just to see how it could be done. I'd rather just put together a couple "normal" zombie horses from the same amount of parts and go from there.

Miles

I'd use something other than horses. Maybe spiders? Or the legs of her enemies

Earl of Purple

It's confirmed, she's going to put the Dread Emperor that turned himself into a giant spider and fled to Ater's sewers back on the throne in exchange for a mighty steed. Dread Empress Arachne, here we go.

Earl of Purple

If you count the wings, this one's got six 'legs', so she's most of the way there. Technically though she also needs to adopt Roland and get him pregnant with a magic stallion, so he can give birth to her eight-legged horse.

I only suggest Roland for this because I can't think of anyone who fits the 'trickster' role quite so well as he, and both Roland and Loki can work with fire.

Ciel Morgenstern

Zombie the 8th and horse-legged. Not quite the same... The horse is out of the way with the crow-head already. – But you gotta allow for some adjustments. At least claws and a beak as a plus are not mean, either. 😊

Liliet

Praes isn't even shipping it, they're just resigned to it being obvious fact.

Yeah as My very own name said, I think that beast is from Aksum, not Arcadia.

Liliet

THERE'S THAT DRAW

aksjdfhaskjfhjdf bless Juniper bless this also holy fucking shit

akjsdfhkajsdhfkalsjdhfklaskjdhfklasklafsfdlhjsdfhlsjdfhk did I call it right? did I call it right all the way in Book 5? is that happening?

hakureireimu

What did you call all the way in Book 5?

Liliet

the Name :3

Liliet

I had the theory that Cat would be Named Warden of the East

Kage Lupus

Man, I was really pulling for something like Adjudicator or Arbiter, but Warden of the East sure is looking likely right now. I am really feeling the play between meanings as well. Warden of the West is a protector, Warden of the East is a jailer.

Sinead

It also mirrors the Ministers of the Left and Right of the Yan Tei.

Liliet

Cat will be both! She's just... the police 😊

mavant

I suppose she is a bit of a bastard.

Voice of the riders

The Black Knight drew with the Squire, their duel was never finished. Marshal Nim lost to Marshal Juniper.

Sir Nil

"Marshal Juniper wins here."

Gotta love these moments, where all the pieces fall into place.

Lictor Magnus

Whelp looks like Cat is going to be Warden of the East for sure but it's going to be the prison kind rather than the protector kind the Hanno is turning into. She'll be in charge of keeping the more troublesome villains in check.

Also it looks like Nim just locked herself into her pattern of three. Too bad she was never the squire. She could have learned how Cat cheated two of them.

Tenthyr

Nah. Warden of the East is way too narrow compared to what she's growing into. The bard literally tried to tangle her into forming a name in opposition to hers simply in fear of what Catherine COULD become.

caoimhinh

It was always about the East with Cat's new Name. It started to form when she said she would put the East in order, back in Salia when she was speaking with Hanno and Tariq. It still fits in Cat's vision of Calernia. Catherine has always referred to Calernia as a bucket of crabs fighting each other. She can be the Warden that puts them in order so that they can stop stepping on each other and finally progress.

By the way, while Cat refers to it as warden of a prison here, there's another use for the term, which is the one that's used for Cordelia's title.

The Warden of a Realm or Region was the governor or the highest military chief and jurisdictional officer in said region. Their powers extended to both civil and criminal jurisdiction, as well as possessing authority in both the military and the political government.

Miles

Wait so she's going to have to climb the tower to get the name?

But we won't see what it does is she only gets it after the plot is done. 😞😞😞

Abnaxis

I think the reason why the key to Cat's name is in the East, is because that's where all the continental powers not already bound to her are going to be subjugated to her authority.

She already has Procer and Levant following her lead and she put the current would-be Empress of the free cities into power. She has a close-ish relationship with the dwarves and she's First Among the Night for the drow.

Mark my words, somehow the Elves' conflict with Hye are going to be tied to their infertility curse and Cat is going to somehow resolve that situation for them in a way that binds them to her. That just leaves Praes to settle, which I think will end with the orcs becoming the highest regional power after Amadeus destroys the Tower along with the entire current ruling class of Praes.

Cat's name isn't going to be limited to one who is an Authority over Evil, nor is he name going to be deeply tied to the East—when she has Spoken, she has been able to compel the Pilgrim and the White Knight—heroic named with absolutely no ties to the East who would only feel any effect from Speaking if Cat's name somehow had authority over theirs.

Rather, I think we're going to see a Warden for each Cardinal direction—Hanno to the South, Cordelia to the West, Hakram to the East, and Akua to the North. And Cat will be the Archqueen who manages the Warders.

There are a lot more reasons for why I think all this, but the post is getting long enough...

jamesc9

Where are the Orcs? That's where I'd expect Hakram to be Warden.

Itarion

She might have a chance to learn how Amadeus cheated one. The Delegate/Survey combo is likely sufficient for the same trick he pulled on Hanno at the Red Flower Vales.

caoimhinh

Also, it might have been from there (or another similar situation in Amadeus's life) from where Nim got the inspiration to use her two Aspects together to “possess” a body.

caoimhinh

Although, now that I recall, Amadeus and Hanno never had a Pattern of Three, despite clashing multiple times. So I’m not sure if that trick is applicable to save Nim. She did mention in this chapter that her very Name was telling her that using that would have dire consequences, so the odds are she can’t use that to fight Squire.

Onos

Yes, they did. That was why Amadeus pulled his trick to skip out on fighting Hanno a third time.

And I suspect that was some misdirection from Creation to persuade Nim to actually fight – a deputy probably outright wouldn’t survive, so there’d be no third encounter.

Andrew Smith

There was no pattern of three with Hanno that was part of what further convinced Black that he didn’t have long to live,

The story beat between them was the sword of Judgement was coming for him because he has been Judged

Liliet

They specifically did not have a pattern of three, that was why Amadeus thought he would die soon.

The story lock he was escaping was Hanno’s coin.

Liliet

They did not have a pattern of three but I think it would work. It worked for getting her into this mess after all.

I think the Name was less warning her about something about this situation and more... well, if this WERE a real opening, her taking it or not taking it personally would have made the difference. Her Name instincts were running off compromised intel, and she forgot to account for the Squire entirely.

Relai

I think her name will be something along the lines of “The Warden of Evil”, or if the author is feeling particularly cheesy, “The Practical Guide to Evil”. There has been a trend with Cathrine since the beginning of the story, a person aligned on the side of evil, but one who is checking all of the worst of her kind's impulses. She was there to stop Liesse with Diabolist, stopping the Sisters of Night from continuing down the path of mindless slaughter, the Dead King, and keeping the villains fighting the Dead King in line, and now in the East with Malicia. She has quite literally been everywhere making sure that her kind isn't trying to get everyone murdered.

Hellspirit

I'd go for something with Sheppard in it.

Xinci

Warden of the East may make sense given her own notes of it being more like a prison warden and Kairo's talking about all the horror the groove she is making with the "hard person making hard choices" schick.

Tenthyr

Damn, juniper even knew to use the squire to get a draw in just to really lock in the final reveal of her plan. Exquisite.

Mental Mouse

I suspect that was Story getting its oar in.

kinghaart

Which really begs the question of where Bard is.

Somehow this story is going to turn on Cat at some point and this would be a natural time...

Itarion

A strange game, this. It seems the only way to win is to not play.

Mental Mouse

You can't win. You can't break even. You can't leave the game.

jamesc9

On a long summer's evening, on a train bound for nowhere,

nimelennar

"It was the worse kept secret in Praes that the Queen of Callow and the Warlock had been sleeping together during their years abroad"

Ooof. They think it's something as simple as /resolved/ sexual tension, do they?

"The east is your prison and I am your fucking warden"

Huh. Props to whoever guessed it.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. She said warden. Not Warden.

dadycoool

True, but that "pressure" is mighty sus.

Insanenoodlyguy

Bard was trying to make a Warden of the West to manipulate them. Then she tried to make Catherine into something DIRECTLY OPPOSING her because she thought that was a better alternative then where she was really going. Warden of the East... Whatever she's becoming, it feels larger then that.

Thanatoss

How is Warden greater than opposition to Bard? Bard is on the same level as Dead King and Warden of The East is on the level of... Well... Named Cordelia?.... Not all that impressive, but certainly op plot and story wise vs Dead Kong

Shveiran

Greater might be the wrong name for it. Different is more likely.

But Warden of the West is not "named Cordelia": it is something new, unprecedented.

The Wardens sound like Roles that both regulate and protect from outside force their chunk of Calernia, and the first instances of both will be (whether one is Hanno or Cordelia) people capable to speak with one another.

These won't be mirror Names like White and Black Knights, natural opposites.

And that means that these Names are heralds of change for Calernia.

Mental Mouse

That might just be her domination power (future aspect?).

Hmm. Command, Claim, Oversee. Those aspects would hearken back to the Black Queen, but at a higher level...

shikkarasu

She will Dictate terms, I'm guessing. I think Rein as a play on Reign. Claim sounds pretty on point.

shikkarasu

While looking through my reread notes I found this:

6:Interlude – Lost and Found

It was the royal seal below but there were fresher words, the ink a little smudged. No matter where you end up, Catherine Foundling had written in that ugly scrawl of hers, you will be one of mine. Sooner or later, I will come to collect. Screams, fighting. The devils were close.

-Wait, how many "I will come to collect"s are there?

-If there's only two, the third time will be an aspect, mark my words.

-A quick Google confirms, she's only said this twice so far.

I am going to amend my guess to Dictate, Rein, and Collect.

hakureireimu

Premature

Crackle

Can we please not have a Warden of the East, it would be such an ugly copy-cat Name.

Thanatoss

I still am not convinced about Warden of the East.

In my opinion this might be her ROLE or part of it but not actual Name.

Zach

I argued against it when someone else predicted it some chapters back, but it seems like they might be right. Seems weird to me, though; how would "Warden of the East" be a name that results in Catherine being able to Speak to Pilgrim?

shikkarasu

I would assume it is in the way that the Captain's physician may overrule them even without sufficient rank. Cat knows best, and when she plays the "I'm the one who kept Praes in check while you hid in the Whitecaps" card even Heroic Named feel compelled to sit down and follow her lead. (to a degree, obv.)

Even a few years back as Winter!Cat she was negotiating with the Pilgrim on rules of engagement. Night!Cat has significantly more political power among the Good nations and represents the evil side of the civilised world. When she claims jurisdiction, higher ranking Named concede.

Sinead

AHHHAHAHAHAHHAAA!

God I LOVE this series highs!

And hey! "I am your Warden..." Perhaps a red herring, perhaps it's an actual mirroring...

A long wait until Tuesday now.

hakureireimu

If you're going quote, at least quote it accurate; warden is not capitalized.

Sinead

My apologies. These chapters come up at 10pm for me and I mistyped.

Unfortunately, I cannot edit.

Cold Cyberia

That tree payoff was on point.

Akua and Cat both falling on their respective old tricks is a nice touch. It almost feels rote now. "Oh, devils? Guess it's time for my otherworldly monsters".

I wonder what Akua did at Sepulchral's camp? She was ordered to support the eleventh but we haven't seen her from Cat's POV and instead she blew off the smoke. Was their interaction skipped or did she actually not go there?

RoflCat

My guess is she got the vantage view of the smoke then upon realizing what's going on opted to save Nim as priority.

Liliet

Acid rain falling on Sepulchral's forces was mentioned.

Kennedy

Fuck yeah Marshal Juniper is back baby! I really wanna know what Amadeus is up to in all this.

Liliet

Sparring with Ranger half the country away ♥

Kage Lupus

The old horizontal sparring, maybe 😊

Liliet

They were doing the vertical version last time we looked in on them but that too~

Raved Thrad

I can see Razin and Aquiline, after having met Amadeus and Hye, cuddling up to each other and going, "That could be us right there."

Mental Mouse

That would be... overly ambitious.

Aldurathel

The Warden of the East.
It's coming.

kinghaart

Be fun if there was just a single Warden name for Calernia and all three were vying for it.

dadycool

I am cackling at Cat's new mount. The moment I heard that it was a crow in front, I thought she would try and wrangle it, forgetting her M.O. of killing her mounts before taking them. I absolutely adore the imagery of her cloak practically melding with the feathers of the hippogriff. Talbot's POV was definitely my favorite this chapter, start to finish, though they were all splendid.

Poor Nim. Even if she has an academic understanding of Namelore, she doesn't live and wield it like Cat does. Between playing directly into Juniper's hands and lacking the expertise of Cat and Amadeus, she really didn't have any chance here, especially being partway through a Pattern of Three with the Squire. She's doomed the moment they find themselves in the same battlefield again. She's passed beyond Akua's ability to help.

Noldo

I wonder if Nim's self preservation becomes the driver that makes her turn on Malicia and join forces with Cat. Knowing that she is locked in a pattern of three with Squire, best way to prolong her life is to ensure that they do not end on opposite sides of a conflict. Taking the loss by losing the mantle while keeping her life?

Liliet

Doubt it. Doesn't feel like that's the kind of person she is.

Kage Lupus

My thought is that this is all leading to a much bigger culmination of Named. Squire takes out the Black Knight, earning himself a promotion to White Knight. But that requires the current White Knight to lose or change his name. Since we already know Hanno is entering a transitory state I would guess that he becomes the Warden of the West and frees up the White Knight name for Arthur.

Hanno and Cat maintain their equal-yet-opposite dynamic that they had going on during the war against DK, Cordelia rejects the Warden of the West role a second time because she is still fundamentally against the idea of taking up a Name, and Arthur gets to be the first White Knight to exist in a world where East and West are not in constant conflict. He can focus on fighting specific monsters and villains instead of the entire concept of Praes.

And all if it is predicated on Nim being stuck in this pattern and getting killed by the Squire. It is a sad way to go and maybe she doesn't fully deserve it, but narrative weight is a hard boulder to shift.

burlindw

There are more Knight names than White Knight and Black Knight, especially in Callow. Cat has mentioned the Rebel Knight specifically as an option that she wouldn't be able to allow him to take. My guess is that he'll end up simply as The Knight, like how Viv is just The Princess.

Christian Oaks

We don't know viv is just "the princess" cat felt that was the shape but we didn't get the confirm from viv

Vic

For what we know from the Lone swordman's arc you can loose in the pattern of 3 and still been alive if you know how to play your cards

kinghaart

Plus Squire's loss to Nim was kinda weak too, feels like Nim could survive a third encounter by "losing" in some other manner.

Yunamed

Nim can still escape the pattern with help. Remember when Cat escaped hers with GP? It's still possible.

hakureireimu

Nah, Cat escaped hers with the Pilgrim while on the draw stage. Nim already had her draw, so defeat inevitably follows. Now the only thing she can do is to be defeated without being killed.

Agent J

Not true! There's always the option of intentionally letting her rival kill her and then bullying a Choir for resurrection. There's always a way forward if you're willing to bleed enough.

Relai

I think the pattern of three will not fully complete or at least result in Nim's death. But I do not think Nim is going to be the one to actually twist the pattern in any significant way. It has been repeatedly stated that Nim is a noob when it comes to naming stories. She didn't even know she was in it and barely knew anything about it once she did. And in this fight she tried to just brute force her way to a victory. When Cathrine dodges or shapes stories, she has to do some Olympic-level gymnastics to do so. So there is a disparaging difference between the two of them.

Mental Mouse

Nim's problem is that she doesn't know Namelore. Nobody has an academic understanding of Namelore, the good stuff gets passed down from teacher to pupil, and she's never had a proper teacher.

Liliet

Eh, Akua can still help her survive. Not win, no, but that was always... If Akua had been thinking with her head and not her sense of guilt + romantic rejection she'd have seen the writing on the wall and absolutely NOT gone to reinforce the losing side.

But, well. If.

jamesc9

Unless she has margins for being both embedded and disembedded, and would like to end up as a free agent with all of the powers of a Warlock.

Liliet

We have seen her thought process. It mostly boils down to telling herself she's aiming for the Tower and being surprised she doesn't hear its song.

SpaceDorf

Talbots POV had me laughing out loud on the train.
The proud Knight basking in glorious chaos.
Storm Troopers fistbumping and high fiving while Dark Helmet delivers a hellish smackdown on the enemies.

.. Zombie the sixth .. look what the Cat dragged in.

Juff

Typo Thread:

horrors most. (missing word) nipping away their > nipping away at their as he cross > as he crossed Squinting he > Squinting, he with surprised > with surprise you friends > your friends smile and pretty talk > smiles and pretty talk with grinding > with the grinding goof reason > good reason
Nim would have preferred (extra space) imperial's courts further > imperial court's further worse kept secret > worst kept secret had edge ahead > had edged ahead barley > barely legionaries pour > legionaries to pour into a rout > in a rout the did not > they did not just have to > just had to only the loyalist > only the loyalists corned > corner

Sapper's Licker > Sapper Licker grandmaster slice > grandmaster sliced even of the > even if the tail it instead > tail, instead had great crow's > had a great crow's pain and the hymns > pain, and the hymns dark fringes Mantle > dark fringes of the Mantle ever soul > every soul queen through them > queen saw through them last the fought > when they'd last fought where they camp > where their camp to the push her. > to the push here.
and marshal > and the marshal

chris S

I think we're all so hyped up on the word "warden", we're missing the forest for the trees.

Queen of Callow

They knew it well, that weight in the air. Had learned to love it, for though it was the herald of terrible things that terror was ever turned away from them. She was a queen in black, adorned in wrath and dread, but she was their queen to the bone.

The emphasis on the 'their queen', and the post paragraph sting sentence, doubling down on the Callow link.

Also, Brandon's POV alternates between Black Queen and Queen of Callow and occasionally Catherine Founding to refer to her. The last time Black Queen is used is straight after the above quote, right before the Name appears. Brandon even feels the weight of a manifestation beginning in the quote.

Cat's driving force is that she's sick and tired of Callow being a punching bag that Procer and the Empire see as 'the thing you trample over to get to the fight on the other side'. Everything she's done has arguably been to make things better for Callow.

Look at Catherine's monologue.

Surely a Warden of the East wouldn't have any of the East be beyond her reach?

This isn't just Malicia or the nobles, Cat means every invasion of Callow, every army of sentient tigers or flying fortress, every spell that destroys the Wasteland even more than it already is.

Cat's just used 'the east' to mean the Empire.

Finally, consider what this is getting shown against – Juniper's plan:

Juniper is the marshal of Callow, and she's just boxed up her Praesi enemies and let them tear each other apart while the Army of Callow guard the walls, making sure they stay there. How very prison like and symbolic.

chris S

damnit I replied to the wrong thread because of mobile shenanigans

Miles

I think we're all so hyped up on the word "warden", we're missing the forest for the trees.

Warden is typically the job title of the person in charge of the prison so it still fits.

miles

Effing quote tags didn't work!? Now it looks like I'm contradicting myself instead of quoting and replying

AbraKadabra

How about Dread Queen?

NotTraitorous

Someone give Talbot a medal for how much of Catherine he has to put up with. XD

irritantseraphim

I want a picture of Chibi Cat on top of her new mount "dis mine now!"

I couldn't help but smile at the image of the Black Queen grinning maliciously as she declares she has taken another monster as mount

Shaerick 68

I'm a tad bit confused, when did Cat get her necromancy shenanigans back? I thought that was a named thing?

Yunamed

She's always had it. She animated Red axe's body and she still didn't have a name.

Jason Ipswitch

I've just presumed that she hasn't used it much lately, because trying necromancy tricks against the Dead King is likely a Very Bad Idea. Idk if there was explicit textual confirmation of that.

kinghaart

I think it might have been assumed, and therefore just never tried.

"Instead of a Dead King you would have a Dead Queen!" vibes.

jamesc9

I think that this is the Night-as-theft version of necromancy.

caoimhinh

She has never lost that ability.

She had it as Squire using Name power, then as Duchess of Moonless Nights and as Sovereign of Moonless Nights using Winter Fae power, and she still keeps it as First Under the Night through the use of Sve Noc's Night.

mamm0nn

Probably also a Night thing.

Wonder

Night is the facilitator of Necromancy here.

Sinead

Night also likely started as a tool for Necromancy under the Twilight Sages as well. It's probably more suitable for this than Winter was.

Probably gets messed up with holy water though.

Miles

She can do it with whatever power source is available. Name, Winter, Night, doesn't matter.

SpeckofStardust

Well that is one way to end a pattern of 3, Nim just lost here and I dont think anyone would dispute that. Also cat has a new flying fae mount.

Siva Chandra

Except that it's not ended, only set in stone. It ended with a draw between Diet BK and Squire, with both retreating.

SpeckofStardust

Really? Cause the Squire holds the field, he (and his team) kept the Black knight focused on the fight rather than the battle and she lost both. If the black knight didn't take to the field she would have noticed what was going on sooner and retreated before her army was beaten. (and this fight would have been a draw then but a draw needs both sides to lose the same 'amount')

This is too 1 sided of a outcome to be a draw.

mamm0nn

Yeah, with these things it's usually best to assume that 'Whatever is most convenient to the Heroes by any stretch of the truth' is the case. Neither died and Nim didn't win, so it's a draw.

SpeckofStardust

Nims primary role is as the military commander of her forces, so I'm sticking with Cats statement a chapter or 2 ago, the pattern wont take hold. The black Knight is already "doomed" because the next major fight will be at the Tower. And after this fight I dont think anyone is holding any delusion that the Dread Empire is going to win that.

Halinn

But she wasn't engaging the Squire in that capacity.

nick012000

"the next major fight will be at the Tower." Somehow, I doubt that. Amadeus is planning on blowing it up with lots of Goblinfire, remember? I think it's entirely possible that the next fight between Nim and Arthur will end with her surrendering and agreeing to the Truces and Terms, along with signing on to joining the war on the Dead King.

Steven Silver

I like this prediction. I want it to happen. Because, even though she's not on the right team, I've come to like Nim. Here's hoping a pattern of 3 only need to end in defeat, not death ♥

KiltedBastich

The thing of it is, Nim believes in honor. She believes in keeping her word, in doing right by those who have served her and served with her. She believes in the Legions.

None of that will last with Malicia in charge.
All of it is a perfect fit for whatever Cat or Amadeus build after Malicia's fall. So, all Nim needs to do is fail, lose honorably and survive the defeat, then volunteer to be part of the rebuilding.

It's a fine irony. The best way for Nim to get everything she wants is to fail utterly at all of her current goals, yet she is absolutely unable by her very nature to let that happen without a fight.

hakureireimu

The Squire didn't hold the field; he retreated ("the Squire retreating as she slowed her steps"). So will Nim since she sounded the retreat.

The outcome of the battle is irrelevant to who wins or loses, since the Squire is not a military commander, only a combatant. Therefore Nim's loss at the army level is not a win for Squire at the personal level. Since they dueled each other and both retreated, its a draw.

Voiceoftheriders

The Black Knight drew with the Squire, their duel was never finished. Marshal Nim lost to Marshal Juniper.

Onos

Well since Arthur isn't the commander of Callow or anything, the outcome of the battle between armies is irrelevant to he and Nim's PoT. Looks like he scored a solid draw, since neither he nor Nim got any significant hits in and both have opted for a tactical withdrawal to end their fight.

Agent J

You're confusing the battle with the fight. Nim lost the battle against Juniper. The fight against Squire was more or less "called off" on account of having lost the battle. To be more clear, Nim retreated from Juniper. Squire was just, like, there. Buzzing around like bee she wasn't able to swat down. So,
Battle: Lost
Fight: Draw

Relai

I am pretty sure it ended in a draw. The fight between the squire and the Nim did not result in either of them winning or losing. Neither of them are dead or lost/ won anything of significance in that duel. But I don't think the duel between the two needs to consider to the overall shape of the war. I think name stories would get too weird then. Like what if in a hypothetical scenario, a Black Knight cut off all the limbs of a squire and walked away beating him, but then the Black Knight lost the battle and the war; would that be considered a win, a loss, or a draw in that situation?

Reader in the Night

I'm still not sure I have a solid understanding of all troop movements for this battle. If I'm reading this right it was actually a fairly straightforward affair:

The Army of Callow and the Loyal Legion were trenchfighting in the middle of the plain, while the Rebel Legion was taking pot shots at both.

Then the Army of Callow "buckled" and fell back behind their palisades, causing the Loyal Legions to pursue. Since the Rebel Legions (RL) didn't want the Loyal Legions (LL) to push back the AoC too hard, the RL attacked the LL's flank with the intent to bleed them.

And that's when Juniper's plan came in: She predicted the LL would shut down their shared corner with the RL through goblinfire, rendering the upper "right" corner of the "square" impassable.

From there, she set fire behind the ranks of the RL to force them to commit to the push (somehow, Cat was supposed to do it but she spent most of the update in the complete opposite side of the battlefield). She used smoke to hide the fact that the RL were committing to the fight against the LL, making Nim think ahe was fighting mostly against the AoC. From there, the tactical situation shifted to the two Legions dogfighting each other while the AoC took potshots at them both, so while all sides lost troops to the killbox the AoC lost the least by far.

All in all, not actually some brilliant feat of deceit and fairly obvious in hindsight, but all that was needed was for the trickery to hold up for some time in the heat of battle, which it did. Like Cat said a couple of updates ago, there was no extravagant Named bullshit, this battle was won through basic tactics and competent generalship.

There's still a few questions left unanswered, like how the hell Cat teleported from Sepulchral's camp to behind the lines of the Rebels' camp, but the fire could also have been accomplished by someone else detached to take the mountain paths to go around the Rebel Legions' camp (particularly, the Levantines were nowhere to be seen this fight).

But if so, why did Catherine say she and Mireembe's armies were going after Ranker?

hoser2

The rebels were right next to Sepulchral's camp since their arrival. Cat went around the back of Sacker's rebel forces to get to Sepulchral's camp. No teleportation required. Cat just had to attack the back of the rebel formation which was not heavily defended.

kinghaart

That, plus in the original plan I bet the RL would have been forced to go on the attack to get away from Sepulchral's forces, who would have taken the opportunity to pounce on two distracted foes.

Konstantin von Karstein

Why did Cat open à Gaye to Arcadia?

Noldo

To get the fey duke to close the hellgate and serve as distraction. Opening your own portal and goading fey to strike the hellgate was probably easier than trying to close the gate directly.

mamm0nn

Opens a fey gate right in front of the Hellgate, making the devils pour into the feywild and the fey pour into the hells.

Now, let's get me a new awesome mount, shall we Talbot?

Steven Silver

Thank you for writing this, I didn't really understand how the Fae helped until I read this 😊

mamm0nn

Not actually how they did it. We were vaguely told that Cat lured a Duke out into the world and that the Duke decided to close the Hellgate to stop the constant flux of more devils. Cat kinda just left that area after adding another faction, trusting the fey to keep the others occupied somewhat, instead of the better means of stopping the gate by putting a gate in front of it.

Silverking

I'm fairly sure that Juniper never really intended that anyone would actually find her declaration in the hollow tree, but to have Nim reveal just as she realizes that she's been placed in a no-win scenario...chef's kiss just beautiful.

jamesc9

This world runs on story-book logic and Cat knows it.

As soon as she pushed Juniper into leaving evidence of committing, it was odds-on that Nim would find it.

And yes, it's also beautiful, as long as we're not on Nim's side.

nick012000

I think it's funny that Juniper saw the battlefield situation better than a Named who literally has Survey as an Aspect. Maybe she will become the Marshall, after all.

Mental Mouse

Nim hasn't grasped the limitations of her Survey aspect – in particular, it's clearly present-tense only, and doesn't help with knowing what's coming.

medailyfun

still, it's odd the aspect did not see the forces layout through the smoke

Onos

There was that entire section where Nim considers that things have to be "visible" in some way which she doesn't quite grasp yet for the aspect to pick it up.

"Smothered in smoke to the extent no one noticed an entire army withdrew from the area" definitely works within the restrictions of "not visible".

Zach

My interpretation of it is that Survey basically let's Nim instantly acquire a comprehensive understanding of what she's be able to accomplishing without the Aspect. So she can instantly acquire the same perspective she would have gotten from a careful inspection of the battlefield.

It's similar to Adjutant's Find, which only helps him find things he'd also be able to find through conventional means.

Miles

She's too fresh to her Name. Give it some time and she'll be using it as a stronger xray vision.

If she lives that long.

Mental Mouse

Again, possibly because she hasn't had enough experience with it.

samshadar

That's just it. It becomes clearer if you think of an Aspect as a fancy new weapon.

It's not the weapon that makes the difference (yes, sometimes it can), but understanding of its application in the greater scheme of things and mastery of its use.

If you don't have those, the weapon might be just as dangerous to you as to your opponent – sometimes even more so.

Earl of Purple

This was a great chapter. I love Talbot's section, and it was interesting to see Ishaq's sword isn't just a soul drinker, but leaves a mark on Tower enchanted steel. I thought enchantments weaken with age, especially if they aren't refreshed. I guess the soul drinking gives the bronze sword an alternate power source to people refreshing the enchantment.

aurikdomi

I wonder if that's what happened his sword "drinking" power from the enchantments? he definitely got through them better than the Silver huntress with arrows empowered by Light

Miles

It probably drinks the enchantments. Leave it to Praesi to use horrors where mundane things would work just as well.

Wonder

Juniper and Aisha need to make sweet passionate love SOON!!

Dear gods ,the tension between them is just so heady .

Sinead

Pretty sure relations between an orc and human results in death by snu snu for the human

Abrakadabra

To me it was jarring. Like it was probably the first time that their attraction ever came up?

Darkening

It very much is not. It's been subtext in basically every juniper perspective where she interacted with Aisha. This is probably the most blatant it's ever been though.

Abrakadabra

Subtext means it was invented later. The author changed it up that is all.

Darkening

Juniper been taking longing looks at Aishas neck in several interludes before thos, whether it was planned before that or not.

Darkening

Juniper been taking longing looks at Aishas neck in several interludes before this, whether it was planned before that or not.

Sugar Roll

Since when did Juniper get that Baalite eye? I don't think it was ever mentioned before this chapter.

Onos

The whole Army of Callow (officers anyway) has been using them at least since scrapping with Neshamah. A war which has now lasted for like three years. Which Juniper sat out till now.

Xinci

It was, she had em by the time they got Procer

Earl of Purple

It's a telescope, Baal has the best glassblowers. As is said elsewhere, Callow has enough for its officer corps, though they're probably expensive.

Sparsebeard

It has to be.

Christian Oaks

I always thought it had some sort of scrying magic but I like the telescope idea as well

Daniel

So the next chapter is Amadeus's plan right?

Raved Thrad

Snapshots from a battlefield:

Juniper: "I'm back!"

Aisha: "You never left."

Juniper: "You say the sweetest things. Bare that pretty neck for me."

Catherine: "Sweet Crow-Sisters, a winged abomination! AND IT'S MINE NOW!"

Komena: "Oooh, pretty! Can you imagine the Firstborn with mounts like that?"

Andronike: "On it!"

Sapan: "Ast tasarak simuralan krynawi!"

Masego: "What are you...?"

Sapan: "Er... nothing! You saw nothing! You heard nothing!"

Masego: "Also, you're here to kill people, not put them to sleep."

Sapan: "..."

Masego: "Right. The Black Knight is open again."

Sapan: "Yes, Master! Ast tasarak..."

Masego: "I need to hide my fiction books better."

Arthur: "You're wonderful!"

Nim: "Thank you, I've worked hard to become so."

Arthur: "I admit that you are better than I am."

Nim: "Then why are you smiling?"

Arthur: "Because I know something you don't."

Nim: "And what is that?"

Arthur: "Marshal Juniper wins here."

inglessiejek

Ah Talbot, I did not realise you were a hilarious MF we need more scenes from your point of view (hint hint 🤪)

samshadar

The years under Cat have changed him too. While he may have had doubts before, he doesn't anymore. There have been too many crucibles. And if anything, she's proven viciously loyal to her troops and to Callow.

And she's been a terrifying foe to her enemies.

Zach

It's helped that, starting with the war against Dead King, Talbot and his Order have basically been fighting the sort of capital-E Evil enemies they were trained to fight – mostly the Dead King, and now Praesi. Earlier the conflicts, while necessary, weren't really the sort of fights that appealed to him and the other knights (stuff like the Fae or the Crusade).

One part I found interesting is how Talbot (and presumably the other knights) apparently perceive Night as some sort of gentle thing from their perspective as non-enemies.

jamesc9

So, in Max Weber's terms, Cat has traditional authority, which can be used to point the Order only at some targets, rather than rational lawful authority, which could be used to point them at anybody, provided the paperwork was correctly filled out.

Xinci

Well, Hail to the victor, and to the victor goes the spoils. Mm one can see the way that Tyrants became as loved as they did in Helike with how the Callowans treat Cat. Though given the ingrained deterrence behaviors of their culture, one would think it would be even more bone deep. May lighten to some degree if they have less enemies though, I suppose, without constant pressure they will get softer.

Its kind of nice to get a picture of the army of Callow getting to that precipitation point with their originator when it comes to victory, even if it was only this once. The usual bit where she goes off to sleep, a good sound off for the event. Also nice to see how Junipers relationship with Aisha stands.

I am rather curious about how that Night construct will grow, Winter Zombie was a "blank slate" to a degree and got both bindings placed on her in being claimed by Cat and by being exposed to and intaking so much creational stimuli. The Night is of Creation though so the process may differ a bit? Anyway, too bad Cat isnt going to get crow griffin cavalry.

As a sidenote still not sure if Cat broke her oath or at least the spirit of it by attacking those Fae.

Darkening

Pretty sure her killing that Fey broke the treaty and let them attack her back, hence the war and of screaming fairies coming for her head into that mess. Which, might make future events interesting if she ever needs to visit Arcadia for some reason.

RubberBandMan

No, the boon she had was only that she and her people could travel through arcadia without being attacked or slowed. It says nothing about what happens in creation. So Cat goes in, knowing they can't touch her in arcadia, pisses them off and kills a few, then goes into creation, where they can follow and attack her. Which now they want to because Cat was a real jackass.

Fae of all people know that the oath can be abused, if Cat gave a shit about anything going on in arcadia. But Likewise Cat knows if she pisses off the queen and king, they are perfectly capable of making her regret it in creation, one way or another.

Darkening

Oh, and Cat made a point of mentioning that night necromancy lacks the spark that made her winter zombies grow into actual individuals, so no clever hippogriff mount sadly.

dadycoool

Yeah, that was the most tragic part of Night eating Winter, for me.

Earl of Purple

I have hope her Name will help there, giving her undead personality as they age and adapt. Especially for those linked so tightly to her as her mounts.

Adrian V

Or maybe it will have some sort of resonance, i mean how many times was the fact it has crow features remarked?

dadycoool

What if this very crow-like creature is the Sisters' new form?

Xinci

If it's a monster from the Praesi menagerie it likely has a soul. Night can contain souls perfectly well so it may indeed grow in different ways from Zombie the Third

Clmineith

Concerning the Names, Warden of the East seems too limited to me. Warden of Evil... maybe, but it's still limited.

Has someone considered Warden of Calernia?

Of course, it could be not Warden at all.

Sinead

Keep in mind that the Yan Tei system of government has the Ministers of the Left and Right.

She may be the one to say the table needed too be built for everyone to sit at, but she isn't the only one who counts. Something like the Warden of the East still fits in that sense.

aurikdomi

best case for Warden of the East in this comment thread ^^

Adrian_V

HAHAHAHAHAHA, before anything else, how old is Brandon? Or rather how much older than Cat is he? Because i get a lot of exasperated fond uncle vibes from him lol

Love the new Zombie, how many are now? Are we at the 13th? xD

And wow i would love to see a diagram/map, whatever is called of this battle, or someone recreating it on AoE or Total War (any one really), that would be so awesome.

Darkening

He's somewhere in his 30s as I recall. I remember a comment about him being fairly young compared to the surviving pre conquest knights, but he got credit for approaching Cat. But he's definitely got at least a decade on her.

jworks17

One of the best chapters, loved the Talbot bits.

ninegardens

Huh...

I think Nim is going to survive all this, and end up being the Praesi general vs the black King.

Not how she SEES Akua holding back and not killing soldiers (which I imagine Akua thinks is all sneaky and on the down low), and her responses is "Oh yeah, that seems good and reasonable".

Nim is... actually kind of a good person. At least... as good of a person as we could hope to find in a general working for a dread empress.

MoreDakka

The big problem with Nim being a good person is she is the only one caring about what's best for the country. Her boss only cares about herself, her mentor (The last BK) wants to tear it to the ground due to its flaws and failures, the nobles want power to the point they are willing to destroy everything, and her enemy's want everyone above to stop causing problems during the apocalypse

The only way she wins requires the death of all her major allies and the cooperation of her opponents all without accidentally ruining the defence against the dead king

ninegardens

Oh yeah- never said she would WIN. Nim has no possible win condition. Just said that I rate her as having a decent chance of survival.

I guess I just mean, at that start of this book, I rated her as being the enemy Dragon, guaranteed to die vs Catherine's plot armour (no offence meant, just... this is a story of Cat winning). Then we had the pattern of three vs squire (another major death flag), so I'm like "Yup, she's a goner".

Now I'm not so sure. I expect her to lose, but I rate her survival chances greater than 50:50, and instead of expecting her to die at Arthur/Cat's hands, It seems more likely to be Malicia.

kinghaart

Sad thing is that Nim's patriotism isn't all that different to Cat's, she just doesn't get realize that too defend Praes, she must change Praes – and that Malicia is the biggest threat to Praes right now.

superkeaton

Beautiful.

Frivolous

I don't have much to say for this chapter, except this:

I believe this is the first time it's been mentioned how the Roles of Warden of the East and Warden of the West are complete opposites. Same title but opposite meaning.

Warden of the West is Protector of the West.

Warden of the East is Gaoler of the East. As in prison warden.

That's all.

Cap'n Smurfy

A Crow Horse? In a menagerie of Praesi Monsters with a Queen known for her Undead equestrians? That has to be a trap.

HighJumper

"She was a queen in black, adorned in wrath and dread, but she was their queen to the bone."

I'm having trouble seeing Cat abdicate, being something other than a Queen of some sort over Callow. Dread Queen is my favorite, blending the Praesi and Callow ruling names, but her rejection of climbing the tower and recognition of separation from true Praesi culture throughout this book seem to be headed elsewhere. Amadeus is the one settling the Tower, hearing the song and intending to silence it.

Even if not her Name, Warden of the East could be a subtitle as that under First Prince, but that seems like Procer baggage not really applicable in the eastern cultures.

KiltedBastich

Queen Emeritus of some kind is a distinct possibility, as a title if not a Role or Name, especially if she is picking up some other form of authority from a different Role. She wants to abdicate in favor of Vivienne, no one is forcing it upon her. Also, it stands to reason that even in a peaceful future where she leaves the day-to-day running of Callow to Vivienne, if she had some sort of particular request they would likely fulfill it if at all possible.

Sykomantis

After reading all the arguments so far, my guess is the new name will be The Sovereignty (not to be confused with sovereign). My reasoning is that while the sovereign actively rules, the sovereignty is what EMPOWERS a sovereign to rule, which I feel fits better with Cat's ultimate goal: abdicating to run a school for Named, granting them power (in the form of knowledge, among other things) and having the ability to strip away that power if and when needed, but not actively ruling anything herself.

That or Headmaster, by being the Master of Heads (of state).

(I know that was bad fight me)

stevenneiman

I have a question about the afterlife: Do Evil people really go to the Hells when they die? I ask because there's a lot of lines that indicate as much, but there's also a whole branch of magic dedicated to dredging up much less cooperative beings from the Hells and it seems suspicious that it would be impossible to get one dead human back from them.

Earl of Purple

Nobody actually knows. The House of Light say that they do, and Good people go to the Heavens and live amongst angels, and that belief seems to be held in Praes as well, though why is unclear. Possibly a relic of the Crusader Kingdoms. Those resurrected by Light don't recall much of the time spent dead, and I assume the same is true of undead with souls like Lady Abreha Mirembe here. Akua isn't a help because her soul never left Creation; it was grabbed and sewn into a cloak before it could get anywhere.

kinghaart

IIRC there are many levels of the Hells and not all are (mortally at least) accessible.

One wonders if the Serenity might actually relate to this...

morroian

This, this is the shit. One of the best chapters of the entire Guide so far. I've still got issues with Akua's arc but that's swept aside with chapters like this.

Chapter 21: Amadeus' Plan

"Is there not a stark absurdity to what a battle truly is? Thousands of strangers on two sides of a field, prepared to slaughter each other because half a dozen men on either side told them to."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

Seen from the above, it was easy to understand why General Sacker had agreed to the cease-fire.

The Rebel Legions were like a bottled rat, now that the Black Knight had called for a retreat of her own army. Juniper had wasted no time surrounding their position in the valley, turning all engines on the tightly-packed ranks, and Sepulchral's own army had hit them in the back even more brutally at my order. Sacker's troops defending her camp had collapsed under the combine pressure of mage cadres and Nok wavemen, archers who lived up to their sharp reputation. It'd been a bloody business, feeding levies into Legion fortifications, but we'd caught the rebels unaware and the disparity in numbers had them collapsing in short order.

The camp was ours now, the parts we hadn't torched anyway. That'd left the Rebel Legions surrounded between steep hills, stripped of supplies and room to maneuver as the noose tightened around them. To annihilate Sacker's army, nothing would be required of the Army of Callow save that it hold its own palisades while at a generous advantage. All Juniper needed to do was wait while Sepulchral hammered at the Rebel Legions from behind with her great numbers and fresh troops. The rat would be pressed against the bottom of the bottle, squeeze so tightly nothing was left but ground flesh and blood. So when the offer had come from Juniper, it'd only been natural that General Sacker accepted a cease-fire and talks.

Zombie the Seventh took nothing more than the pressure of my knees to be guided into a gentle downwards glide. The creature – she wasn't a hippogriff, not exactly, but given the similarities I was currently leaning towards 'hippocrow' – had proved to be eager and obedient after I'd raised her, perhaps because the Sisters had taken a personal interest in the process. Komena in particular had felt intrigued, enough to lend a hand to the process. Regardless, my latest Zombie had proved to be a very good girl indeed on top of being even quicker in flight than I'd thought she would be. Turns could get a little tricky, mind you, but Zombie clearly relied more on Creational laws than magical ones when it came to her flight.

Compared to my last flying mount, anyway.

The no-man's-land between our position and that of the rebels had been cleared for the duration of the talks, legionaries returning to hide behind their walls, and the empty space made it all the easier to pick out the delegations. Juniper didn't seem to have brought any officers with her, but she'd been wise enough to bring Indrani and Alexis as bodyguards. There wasn't a lot that'd be able to get past those two. Sacker, on the other hand, had with her two men with the painted insignias of senior legates on their armour. There were half a dozen regulars with them, but they might as well be decorations for what it mattered.

I landed half a hundred feet away, Zombie's arc smoothly turning into a run and slowing down as we approached. The Mantle of Woe trailing behind me, sword at my hip and yew staff lowered, I brought my mount to a halt before the delegations.

"Marshal Juniper," I smiled. "Congratulations are in order."

The Hellhound scoffed, but I could see the pleasure she was badly hiding.

"Could have gone better," Juniper said. "But we can save that talk for the camp, Warlord. There are more pressing matters to settle."

"So there are," I agreed, eye turning to the three top officers of the Rebel Legions.

"Black Queen," General Sacker blandly said. "Greetings."

Someone had remembered my warning, I noted. Good. I'd been completely serious.

"Sacker," I said.

"The legates with me are-"

"Irrelevant," I bluntly interrupted.

The human of the pair, a middle-aged Taghreb, looked furious at that. She didn't speak out, though. The orc seemed to take it in stride, which raised my esteem by a notch.

"Either you can speak for your entire set of legions or this conversation is pointless," I said. "I did not come here to indulge in petty games."

"I can speak for our men," General Sacker flatly said.

A look to the legates – the light caught in her fake eye, reminding me I was not the only woman here to have lost one – served as both a quell and confirmation. Neither gainsaid her.

"Good," I smiled.

"We're willing to surrender," the old goblin said, "under certain terms. Guarantees need to be made that no soldiers will be harmed. Regular food and water. We're willing to sit out the rest of this war if-"

She was serious, I realized. How many soldiers did she have left of the thirteen thousand she'd begun the day with? Couldn't be more than eight, after the beating they'd taken. And she still thought she was in a position to strongarm me. I'd been too soft on these people, I suddenly realize. The Rebel Legions had taken my coin and grain before selling me down the river without a second thought, and the way I'd just taken it had made them think I was easy pickings. I'd held back, out of a desire to maintain the armies of Praes for the greater war and out of respect for my father.

It was long past time I stopped.

"Archer," I said, "nock an arrow."

I heard a chuckle and did not need to turn to know she obeyed. I met Sacker's eyes evenly.

"You seem to have some grave misunderstandings about the nature of your situation," I said. "So let me be clear: if I tell Archer to fire that arrow eastwards, Sepulchral's army will resume its attack."

The goblin scoffed.

"You'd lose-"

"I don't give a shit how many of them we lose," I coldly said. "I'll spend her entire army if that's what it takes to break you."

I harshly laughed.

"Terms?" I mocked. "You'll sit out the war if? I didn't come here to negotiate with you, Sacker. I did that once before and you fine fellows me in the back. We're past making deals."

I struck my staff against the ground and the sound rippled out, dust flying up.

"You can surrender unconditionally," I said. "Or Archer will shoot that arrow and I'll fucking kill you all."

Sacker's face tightened, her ever half-closed eyes opening fully. She studied my face and whatever she found there had her hesitating. She turned to Juniper.

"And you have nothing to say to this, Marshal of Callow?" she pressed. "Your men will be the ones spent for this madness."

Juniper's face hardened and she bared pale fangs.

"Every sack of grain your soldiers ate, every crate of steel you used, could have kept some of my legionaries out west alive," the Hellhound growled. "And what did we get for it? Be careful now of calling on sentiment. You might not like what you let out of the cage."

Sacker flinched. Juniper had been as a niece to her, once. Maybe she still was in some ways. But personal ties cut both ways. She turned her eyes back to me, knowing better than to ask for anything out of the likes of Archer and the Huntress. Hells, of the two Alexis would probably be the hardliner. She had that traditional heroic disregard for the lives of anyone that might be considered to stand under Evil's banner.

"Many officers will balk," General Sacker told me. "If you do not offer guarantees-"

"So let them balk," I shrugged. "We can have this conversation again in half a bell, when I've put another few thousand in the ground."

The genuine indifference in my voice, I thought, was what got it through to her I wasn't bluffing. I absolutely wasn't. I'd just make sure that the household troops from Askum and Nok were the vanguard for the assault instead of the levies, to keep the casualties of the attack where they deserved to be. The goblin sagged.

"An hour," Sacker said. "Give me an hour to talk the officers into it without bloodshed."

I glanced at Juniper, who looked like she was biting down on the answer she wanted to give but did not have the authority to. No objections there, then. I might as well give the rebels a little more rope, lest the noose turning into an outright hanging.

"An hour," I agreed. "If I don't have your formal and unconditional surrender by the end of it..."

I did not finish the sentence, or particularly need to. Sacker and the legates left, tails between their legs, and returned to their lines.

I got my surrender before the time had passed.

—

"We are now victims of our own success," General Zola sadly said.

No one in the war council — our usual, save now with the addition of General Jeremiah Holt — argued with that, because it was the honest truth. We'd forced the Rebel Legions to surrender and the Loyalist Legions to retreat to their camp in northern Kala Hills, but we now had fresh problems on our hands. Namely, seven thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine prisoners of war that we needed to keep an eye on. And keep under a roof, fed and with enough water to live. We were effectively being forced to supply a second army of prisoners and our supplies would be stretched to a breaking point if we did. Much of the Rebel Legions' own foodstuff had been either burned or looted when Sepulchral's forces took their camp.

Some of that I could get back from them, but I didn't want to take too much. The Praesi law that undead could not hold noble title meant that Abreha Mirembe's hold on her own army was painfully fragile, holding mostly because the soldiers from Nok were going to stick around as long as it looked like Isobe was still going to inherit Aksum. Otherwise those forces would be marching away by now, leaving behind them a vicious Aksum civil war. No, I had to leave Sepulchral some of the goods. Asking back for half was reasonable, I decided, and I'd set Vivienne to arranging it.

"I prefer the troubles of a great victory to those of a great defeat," the Princess in question snorted. "We have supplies enough to push back the issue for a few days without it denting our reserves too much. We can keep our attention on more pressing matters."

Juniper cleared her throat.

"Speaking of," the Hellhound said. "Pickler, what is your timeline on the work?"

After the surrender came and the rebels laid down their weapons, there were only a few hours left before sundown. Since it was clear there'd be no more fighting for the day, Pickler had taken to bettering our position in anticipation of tomorrow. Companies of unarmed prisoners had, under the wary eye of our own legionaries, been set to taking down the enemy's fortifications: tearing down their palisades and filling their trenches.

"Our palisade will be the only one standing come dark," Sapper-General Pickler said, "but the trenches are harder work. Maybe half of it done in time, if we're lucky. I gave orders to focus on the road, it'll be easier for us to move troops across if we need to go on the offensive."

"Can goblin prisoners not be put to work in the dark?" Brandon Talbot asked.

I grimaced at that and wasn't the only one.

"They'll run," I said. "And do just that if we're lucky. They've a lot more goblins than we do, too, so even if we put our own goblin legionaries as overseers it'd be a major risk. Better to just left the work unfinished."

"Agreed," Juniper said. "It is only a precaution, regardless. I don't believe that Marshal Nim will be going on the offensive. Her losses appear to have been extensive."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"We got casualties estimates for her too, now?"

The tall orc nodded. With the casualties taken in the early skirmishes around the region, the desertion of the Thirteenth and the mauling the Eighth had taken during the night our guess had been that the Black Knight had been fielding an army about sixteen to seventeen thousand strong. How many were left now, though?

"At least five thousand and a half dead," the Hellhound said. "Tentatively we're pegging her current strength at eleven thousand."

I let out a low whistle. With the Thirteenth as last moment reinforcements, this morning we'd fielded around fifteen thousand men. Our butcher's bill had us at twelve thousand eight hundred and twelve soldiers now. Almost thirteen thousand strong. Gods, even Sepulchral had lost more men than we had: her twenty thousand had, between civil war and battle and desertions, tumbled down to maybe fifteen thousand now. Gods. Our total losses had been less than half of those of every other army on the field individually, not even put together.

Juniper had, over the span of an afternoon, not upended the balance of power so much as murdered it and buried it in a shallow grave. Weeping Heavens. I found my glass of water, emptied it on the ground and leaned back my seat to grab a bottle of aragh. I poured myself a finger, then found a few grins and cups headed my way. When everyone had their own in hand, I solemnly raised my cup.

"To the Hellhound," I said, "and the Battle of Kala."

It was with rowdy cheer my toast was taken up, drinks going down and being poured anew. I met Juniper's eyes and grinned, enjoying the dark flush to her cheeks. Aisha even talked her into a cup of her own. I laid back into my seat, enjoying the warmth of the tent, and breathed out weeks of worry. They could be put to rest, for a few hours. We'd earned it.

After all, for all the troubles of victory I'd rather be in this tent tonight than any of the other three.

—

With morning came the time to make the difficult decisions.

The Black Knight still had a sizeable army holed up in Kala Hills, but so long as Sepulchral remained on our side the threat was mitigated. None of my general staff had an appetite for trying to force that camp immediately, especially not when leaving the Legions in it would make them wither on the vine. We'd poisoned Nioqe Lake and Nim herself had poisoned the main wells in the region, so in at most a week their water situation was going to start getting dangerous. Only the scale of the losses they'd taken in battle would prevent it from being an issue even earlier. Taking into consideration our numerical advantage — we had the Loyalist Legions outnumbered almost three to one — and our fortifications in the valley, it would be suicide for the Black Knight to attack us. That meant we had enough breathing room to handle our own internal troubles. The most urgent of them was, unsurprisingly, what to do with the several thousand prisoners we'd taken.

"We can't handle feeding them for the rest of the campaign," Aisha said. "And even if we could, we need to begin marching on Ater soon. There is no practical way to bring that many prisoners with us on the march."

"We should keep the officers of tribune rank and give the Fourth's Justice to the rest," Brandon Talbot advised.

Gods, that stupid name. It was what some of my men had taken to calling the punishment I'd given the Helikean cataphracts after capturing them back in Iserre: broken fingers and being stripped of equipment.

"This is a wild land," Aquiline said. "It would be kinder to simply kill those warriors than to maim and release them. The sword will hurt less than claws."

"It would be a death sentence to release them like that," Vivienne agreed. "Ideally we would ransom them instead, but they've managed to burn every bridge they have. There's no one left who'd pay for them."

"Amadeus might," I objected.

"He can't afford the price," she frankly replied.

"We should seek to recruit soldiers instead," General Jeremiah said. "It would make up for our losses, and the Army of Callow has expertise in assimilating legions."

I rather admired the entirely unashamed way he said.

"That was my thought was well," I admitted, "and Juniper's too. How did that go?"

The Hellhound sighed.

"Malicia poisoned the well," she said. "Most of the rank and file are convinced we assassinated two of their three generals just before making common cause with Sepulchral after a coup failed. Maybe three hundred volunteers, and I wouldn't trust them right off."

Fucking Malicia. I might have given the order to kill Mok, sure, but I wouldn't have been sloppy enough not get blamed for it afterwards.

"They might not be willing to fight for us," Vivienne said, "but they might be willing to fight against the Black Knight."

She paused, choosing her words.

"We could offer some of the soldiers freedom in exchange for serving as the first wave of an attack against the camp in the hills."

I chewed on that for a moment. Juniper looked on the fence, but the idea appealed to me. Sure it'd be putting troops we didn't trust all that much in our order of battle, but it'd also soak up casualties that would otherwise thin my own ranks. And, even better, I wouldn't be expected to keep feeding those soldiers after they went their own way.

"We'd have to limit the numbers," I said. "Else we're just releasing an army into the wilds."

"Organization will be tricky," Juniper said. "I'll want to position them so if they turn against us it won't lead to disaster."

That wasn't a no, and after a round of debate the idea was adopted. Aisha left the tent to begin organizing it. That didn't entirely solve our prisoner problem, though, since two thousand at most was what I was comfortable arming again. The arguments went in a circle. No one thought we should feed the prisoners or keep them with us, but most of the measures that'd make them no longer a problem for the rest of this campaign also effectively consigned to death by Wasteland. Everyone agreed, at least, that we should keep the high-ranking officers as prisoners. Execution was floated as an option – by Talbot – but even those that didn't balk at killing prisoners thought it might lead to mass unrest among the imprisoned soldiers.

"Even arming half of them would be a mistake," General Zola argued. "With that many soldiers, which we agreed would be needed to survive the Wasteland, they have enough men to begin seizing the private armories of nobles and towns. They would rearm and pursue us."

"We don't know for certain that they would," Juniper grunted. "But I take your point. I don't want to leave that force at our back either."

And that was the crux of the issue, really. We all wanted to march on Ater, where the war on Praes would be brought to an end, but we needed to clean up house first. That would mean dealing with the Sepulchral situation, later today, but also tying up all our other loose ends. Marshal Nim's army needed to be decisively broken or made to surrender, and after that was done I didn't want Sacker's army nipping at our heels when we moved south. Hells, to be frank I didn't want them involved in that siege at all. They'd not proved to be trustworthy enough to be allowed to, and they'd failed to be victorious enough to force the issue their way. I could just see them stumbling into us at the last moment and fuc- wait, no.

"We're looking at this wrong," I said. "Juniper, how long do you expect operations in Ater to last?"

"Two months at most," she said.

Longer than that and we'd be forced to make a deal anyway. Procer was already buckling, if we wanted there to still be a west by the time we returned we couldn't tarry.

"So we strand them," I said. "We keep the officers and arm enough they should be able to survive the Wasteland, but we take all their mages. If they don't have any access to the Ways..."

"Even at their fastest possible pace, they'll arrive along after the dust is settled in Ater," Juniper finished, tone considering.

"Best we end things with the Black Knight before that," General Jeremiah pragmatically advised. "Still, seems a sound enough plan."

Not the most elegant way to deal with prisoners, but we didn't have time for elegance. A round of agreements, some more enthusiastic than others, saw the matter settled.

"We'll be receiving Sepulchral this afternoon," I said, "to confirm the terms of our cooperation. Once she agrees to lend her aid to an assault on the Loyalist Legions, I believe we should begin preparing for an attack."

"Agreed," Juniper growled. "We have the numbers to properly squeeze her now. I want to swing part of our force out east around Kala Hills and encircle her. The same paths they used to ambush us there can be turned against them now."

The discussion grew animated after that, commanders pitching in for a plan to either force a surrender out of Nim or crush her army irreparably, but I excused myself eventually and Vivienne did the same. We needed to get moving if we were to be ready to receive Sepulchral.

—

Abreha Mirembe wasn't exactly my creature.

You could barely tell even she was dead, since it was poison that'd done her in and she'd been pretty ghoulish even before biting it. I'd raised the would-be empress as undead through use of the Night, but that didn't exactly give me control over her. I could move her limbs, sure, and inflict pain on her soul. But I couldn't control her mind, save through coercion. She'd showed me deference since her raising, but that wasn't the effect of the Night so much as the knowledge that I could send her back to the grave with a snap of my fingers. I was uncomfortably aware that the ties binding me to her were not meaningfully all that different from those binding Malicia to Sargon Sahelian.

I'd soulboxed a High Seat too, it just happened that said box was their own corpse.

We kept the audience private, as small as it could be. That meant two people on our side, Vivienne and myself, and three on hers. High Lady Abreha herself, her designated heir Isobe and the niece that'd tried to usurp his place, Sanaa. Considering the only reason Sanaa was still alive was that she had enough supporters among Aksum's army and vassals that her death would have caused armed reprisals, I expected relations between her and her aunt to be frosty. To my surprise, Sepulchral now seemed to be favouring her over Isobe and taking no pains to hide it. Praesi. Abreha must have decided that a closely-fought coup was a sign of talent and begun to reconsider succession. Isobe was displeased by that undercurrent, by these talks and most of all by me.

"Rumour in the camp is that he blames you for this," Vivienne murmured into my ear.

I blinked at her.

"Why?"

"He lost a lot of face in front of vassal lords and household troops when you and Lord Tanja humiliated him," the Princess said. "He's been saying that if not for that more would have stuck with him instead of turning to Sanaa's camp."

That might be partially true, I thought, though ironically enough Razin had probably done more damage than I did. It was a little much to blame me for his own failure to gather a solid core of supporters, though, especially when he'd been the one starting with a – oh Gods, I'd been spending too much time with Praesi if the decisions of someone like Abreha Mirembé were beginning to make sense to me. Best get this over with. After half-hearted courtesies we got to the meat of the talks, which was defining what Sepulchral's position would be going forward.

"I want you to formally renounce your claim on the Tower," I said.

"That cause is lost," Abreha conceded. "Yet renouncing it will have costs for my supporters. I'll not lay down arms only to have a puppet ruler installed in Aksum."

"We can understand that concern," Vivienne diplomatically said. "I assure you, neither Callow nor the Grand Alliance intends to intervene in your matters of succession."

The old woman laughed.

"A nothing promise," she said. "You will have to do better than that. You want my army for your siege of Ater, and I want sturdier assurances in return."

"We could always offer our services to Malicia instead, should you-"

Sepulchral's hand slapped Sanaa across the face. I hadn't even made her do that, so I cocked an eyebrow.

"Count this a favour, girl," Abreha said. "There are some people you don't threaten unless you've made the decision to go through with it. They'll just kill you if you do."

Sanaa liked furious and humiliated, but to her honour she appeared to be listening. Huh. Maybe I wouldn't be having a little conversation with Scribe about her, after all. I had no intention of leaving the High Seat closest to the border of Callow in hostile hands, but if she could learn that made drastic steps unnecessary. Vivienne cleared her throat.

"Assurances of what nature?" she asked.

"I want it confirmed by whoever climbs the Tower that I'll legally keep my title until the end of the war against Keter," High Lady Abreha said, "with all attached rights, including that to designate my own successor."

I traded a look with Vivienne, who nodded.

"That could be arranged," I said. "I take it it's a formal Grand Alliance demand you're looking for."

The old woman grinned.

"I want it written in the treaty that settles this dance," she confirmed.

She really was an old fox, I thought. That way no matter how ended up ruling the Dread Empire they couldn't actually try to oust her afterwards without bringing down the Grand Alliance on their head. She was using a continent-spanning coalition as the guarantor of her succession. If nothing else, I had to be impressed by the sheer gall.

"I can't formally agree to that without speaking with Cordelia Hasenbach, though I expect agreement on her part," I said. "That said, I have half the Majilis of Levant in my camp at the moment and they'll back those terms so I'm comfortable giving you a provisional approval."

They were amenable to helping us against Marshal Nim with just that, so it was brisk business afterwards. They departed some hours after and I caught Abreha as she left, away from the others so we could have a quiet conversation.

"So what is it you're actually after?" I asked.

She looked surprised, like she had no idea what I might possibly be implying. It was just a little too smooth to be believable. I cocked an eyebrow and she smiled.

"Who knows how long your war will last?" she said. "It might be a different empire, by the time the dust settles."

"All about staying in the game, huh," I said.

Abreha Mirembé cackled.

"It's the very thing, Black Queen," Sepulchral said. "Perhaps even the only thing."

—

We spent three days recovering and planning our offensive against the Black Knight, whose army had further fortified its position in Kala Hills but not since moved. There was some trouble with the prisoners, people trying to flee in the night, but we'd disarmed them and the Wasteland was not kind. Those that got out did not get far, and bringing back the mangled corpses to display them soured the appetite for that kind of adventure. Our count of recruits rose to around four hundred but came to a hard stop after that, with further efforts yielding nothing. Aisha's efforts to make 'volunteer companies' that would fight against Nim were more successful, though, reaching close to the two thousand that I'd been willing to allow.

The rebels might despise us but they were scarcely fonder of the Black Knight, who had spurned their offer of joining forces in favour of remaining loyal to the Tower, and many found freedom in arms in the wake of fighting 'Malicia's dogs' a rough but fair deal. Juniper and the general staff were putting the finishing touches on our plan to break the Legions with as few losses as possible to us, aiming to push the deaths on Sepulchral and the volunteers as much as we could without being too obvious about it, but I flitted in and out of those meetings. Most of my time was spent with Scribe and Vivienne, scrambling to get a read on the situation in the rest of Praes.

We still couldn't scry properly, but that was a regional effect. Sending mages further out and then arranging messages being carried by horse worked, well enough that Cordelia was able to send her assent to High Lady Abreha's terms and secure her alliance to us. I enjoyed the relative light demands made by this on my time, but the relative sense of safety was ripped out of my grasp without warning on the morning of the fourth day after the Battle of Kala. Even if Masego hadn't immediately come for me I would have known something was up: the amount of power I could feel coming out of the Black Knight's camp was like a lit beacon to my senses.

"War ritual?" I bluntly asked.

"No," Hierophant immediately ritual. "And it is two rituals. One of them, the smaller, is making a gate into the Ways."

I blinked.

"You told me the Ways wouldn't be usable for a few days still," I slowly said. "That they were still too fragile for large troop movements."

"They are," Masego said. "Which is why I believe the other ritual is meant to stabilize them in some way, or at least accelerate the process of that recovery."

"That can be done?"

"I cannot," Hierophant reluctantly admitted. "At least, I have not yet grasped how it might be done. It is possible that either Akua or other talented mages have found such a solution, however."

"So they're trying to slip away into the Ways," I pressed.

"That seems likely," he agreed.

Fuck. And that would mean facing this same army again, only holed up behind the walls of Ater. I could think of few things I wanted less. Juniper was of the same opinion and we hastily mobilized. Hierophant probed with spells and figured out the stabilizing ritual would need to finish before they could begin moving out, so we had a few hours to spare at least. Enough that we arranged for the volunteer companies to be armed and put in front while Sepulchral's army deployed on the plains below the enemy camp. It all took long enough that Masego confirmed the stabilizing ritual was done by the time we began to march in battle formations, which meant I was now fighting the Battle of Maillac's Boot again only from the other side.

We couldn't even muster our whole army for the attack, since at least three thousand had needed to stay behind to keep an eye on the prisoners, so this was going to get messy. Taking a fortified uphill Legion camp with only hasty preparations? We sent the rebels and the volunteer companies as the first wave. To my distaste, I saw that Abreha had sent in her levies first. I could understand the sense in that, professional soldiers didn't grow on trees, but it would be a slaughter. Still, horns and trumpets sounded. There would be blood. Soldiers marched up the hill, and atop it a thin crest of legionaries formed a shield wall of their own. Steel glittered under the sun, a sea of it.

It was an accident when it happened. They began singing, on one side and the other, with just a few beats of difference.

"Boot goes up and boot goes down –

There goes their callow crown."

The Legionary's Song, most people knew it as. Some called it Swallow the World instead, but they were fewer. The legionaries which had been named rebels began to sing it, moments before the legionaries that had been deemed loyal did the same. There was a beat of hesitation, steps slowing, and the songs melded.

"And no matter how high the walls

We're all gonna make them fall."

The couplet ended to the sight of the legionaries that'd been climbing the hill stopping. No arrows followed, no devastating barrage of spells or munitions.

"They can send us their pretty Knight,

Their killer all decked in white,

Only now we've got one too –

And he always gets his due

.

They got a wizard in the West

But no matter how he's blessed

We got a Warlock in the Tower

Who'll use his bones for flour

.

Let them keep their priestly king

Cause no matter how sweet he sings

We've got an Empress black as sin

Who'll take his throne with a grin."

It was a happy song, or at least meant to be. And yet somehow the tune that the wind carried all the way to me was mournful. A lament.

"We're the Legion and the Terror

They're in the right but we're meaner

So pray hard boy, and pay your toll –

We're gonna swallow the world whole."

Atop the hill, legionaries looked at legionaries down it. And someone, some faceless man or woman, threw their shield on the ground. Their sword. And something hung in the air, a weight, as armies that had been savaging each other for weeks looked at each other. Someone in the volunteer companies threw down their own shield, and then it was like floodgates had opened. Shields and swords and helmets fell to the ground. And then, in the most damning of silences, the soldiers left. Nim's, the rebels, even some of mine – the Thirteenth most of all, but had I not devoured legions before? The Army of Callow spat back out some of those sons and daughters.

Even some of the levies bolted, melting into the river of deserters.

"-Majesty, Your Majesty," Brandon Talbot called.

I glanced at him.

"What should we do?"

I looked atop the hill. How many of her men had Nim lost? I couldn't tell, but it was not few. Same for us, and somehow I knew that when I returned to camp prisoners would have joined the flood as well. We'd all brought armies here, waved banners and played games. Won and lost. And after two weeks of brutality, an army was walking away. Could I really blame them? What were any of the people here fighting for? Even those of us with causes had dragged them through so much dust they could hardly be recognized.

"Nothing," I finally said. "Nothing. Let them go."

Even the Black Knight what few had left to flee with. We would meet again in Ater, to end it all.

A song and then silence: so ended the Battle of Kala.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Ulixes(Josh)

"-Majesty, Your Majesty," Brandon Talbot called.

I glanced at him.

"What should we do?"

"Nothing," I finally said. "Nothing. Let them vote."

Sir Nil

Cool.

Sinead

How do you kill a story? You make sure that no one wants to tell the story ever again.

This is why Amadeus is deliberately absent. He cannot be the figurehead of a movement, because that would just put a fresh head under an old crown.

dadycool

The only way to fight an idea is with another idea. If a story isn't told anymore, it's lost. And if a story is lost to living memory, it dies forever.

ArkhonIX

Yep. This wasn't a pivot to transfer a crown from one Emperor to another. This is the death knell of an ideal. Specifically, the Praesi ideal that power is worth any cost. These soldiers have finally realized that there is a cost too high to pay. They will not kill each other for the power of their masters. They have refused to kill their brothers and sisters, and that decision has much larger ramifications for the country as a whole. The people are fed up, and that tends to be what finally kills dynasties. It might take a while, but this was the first nail in the coffin of Praes as a country

sengachi

I love this ending as the conclusion of the Legions fighting to be an institution which mattered. They eventually mattered the most not by choosing whose wars to fight, but by choosing to not fight at all.

Zach

I kind of wonder if, based upon the chapter title, Amadeus somehow purposefully helped arrange the large conflict between a bunch of Legion (or Legion-like) soldiers, with the intent of making the soldiers reject continuation of the conflict (which might also have something to do with why Catherine might object).

Rey d`Tutto

Yet he won

Lictor Magnus

Interesting. I wonder how many of them went back to camp vs leaving the war completely.

Liliet

Couldn't go back to camp, I don't think.

Reader in the Night

What the hell happened here? Can someone help me understand? Specifically, about the positions of the Armies in the beginning of the battle:

I though the Four Armies basically formed the four sides of a square, with Sepulchral's army holding the half-road, then the Army of Callow and Nim's Army who each had a corner with the half-road facing each other, and Sapper's Army opposite Abreha's closing the square.

So how did the army of Nok hit the back of Sacker's Camp? Does the half-road curve around the entire valley?

Liliet

Not a square. There's a map on discord, but the simple way of describing it is this:

```
SS | NN
SS | NN
   NN
RR__
RR/  CC
   /CCC
```

(S = Sepulchral, N = Nim, R = Rebels, C = Callow)

(Only the fortification lines are obviously double except those around Sepulchral who didnt make her own and just got fortified against by Rebels and Nim)

You can see the corner between R, N and C which was the "box" from the last chapter.

S and R are situated IN hills – Moule hills, to the west.

Kala hills are to the east, and are partially shared by N and C, though they also hold part of the valley between Moule and Kala hills. The half road goes through the west of the valley, next to Moule hills, approximately where the fortification lines are – I don't remember how exactly it intersects, but the Rebels' fortifications definitely fuck with it.

Liliet

To be more clear, the box was like this:

```
SS | NN
SS | NN
   NN
RR____
RR/____|C
___/CCC
```

Callow abandoned their fortifications but then quickly formed new ones, leaving a "box" where both Rebels and Nim went and savaged each other.

shikkarasu

Bless you. I was having a hard time following. Might reread with that map in mind.

dadycool

So, did the Legions basically look across the field at each other and collectively go "We're the Legions of Terror. What in the hells are we doing?" Based on the title, I'm guessing songs like this, anthems, are in a way a failsafe to avoid division among the ranks of Legionaries or something. The moment any of them start singing it, they look at the armor on the other side, look at the armor on their neighbors, and come to their senses. A victory for one Legion is a victory for all Legions, a defeat for one is a defeat for all, and when victory for comes at the expense of another, all are disgraced. This goes deeper than a Command or Rule, this is a belief, branded into the very soul of everyone who ever marched beneath an Empire Banner.

Liliet

...and that was Amadeus's plan, bless him.

ninegardens

I love that this is Amadeus's plan and he isn't even present.

Also... kind of hate how ruthless and cynical Cat was being with the rebel legions. This chapter is a victory, but in many ways, the villain of this chapter is her.

Insanenoodlyguy

She is a villain, in the end. Though this day probably shapes her into a better one.

Sinead

I wonder, especially with how ruthless she is being in this last chapter if she will have a pivot where she either falls completely (too much the woman of hard choices) or becomes something with more flex in her.

She created this ideal of a means to keep everyone at the table. However, her being too uncompromising (or compromising in the wrong fashion) may spell out her own doom in terms of being bound to a bleak ending.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's quite likely her father just saved her from that this day.

agumentic

She is not called "Black Queen" for her great appreciation of the colour. Whatever her goals are, Cat never had much kindness and optimism in her.

Liliet

Well, Cat did offer them to surrender only to be stuck with them as prisoners and her problem, instead of just going through with wiping them from the map.

dadycoool

I was legit thinking that the 2,000 rebels would essentially be another Gallowborn.

skyguy998

The title for this chapter makes total sense. What is Amadeus about, when it really comes down to it? He is about saving Praes from destroying itself, the endless cycles of war and violence that is slowly killing the Empire.

We know that Praes is no stranger to civil wars, but what Amadeus instituted with reforms was a new Dread Legion, one that comes together with modern military discipline and tactics. What holds a professional army together is not so much force and fear but instead love, that of holding together for the sake of one's country yes, but deeper down for that of the man and women next to you.

These armies are all offspring of that institution. They have all served with that distinction for decades, sometimes together in battle but more generally as that of legionnaires.

They threw down their arms because the song reminded them of who they are, of the fact that they are brothers and sisters in arms fighting each other for no reason that is comprehensible to the rank and file, for goals and dreams that speak of something virtually indistinguishable from each other.

So Amadeus plan of the reforms comes to fruition in the most obvious of ways, Praes cannot eat itself if the people doing the fighting refuse to fight, recognize each other as brothers and sisters in arms, and work together to say "no" be it to Marshals, Queens, Names or Gods.

Amadeus's plan comes to fruition not from the last few chapters or books, but from decades of hard work and reforms, changing the spirit of an entire nation, and the stories they tell

edrey

Sad, but i feel curious, how amadeus achieve that?. he knows his soldiers, true but that is something else.

ninegardens

He didn't enact this plan last week or last month, or last year. He put it into place 50 years ago, its only now that we see the damn thing.

He wanted Praesi to be more than a snake, cursed to forever devour its own tail. This... this is part of that. This isn't Amedaus's plan, this is his PLAN. His goal, his ideal, his hope.

The fact that Cat, nor anyone else in her camp even considered peace talks with the loyalists says... a lot.

Insanenoodlyguy

And it explains why he speculated this might put them at odds. He's removing quite a bit of her power and leverage here. A lot of things are uncertain now, including if even he will have any control of this group (though odds are good), and, if they are making their own decisions, how much of them can be put towards the war that follows this. But he's been prepared for the possibility Cat will kill him for a long time, and at worst he's taught her one final lesson this day.

Liliet

I expect Cat's army is left much bigger than Nim's as a result. She'll have kept all the Callowans at the very least, as well as Levantines.

The real issue is Sepulchral – or rather, those UNDER Sepulchral. Sepulchral herself is far too interested in what Cat and the GA have to offer her. Still, the issue is manageable.

The Loyalist Legions... have been reduced by FAR.

agumentic

Sepulchral's army is not really an issue. I would bet on the remaining Loyalist Legions over her host even now. The armies of Old Praes are just not very relevant on the modern battlefield.

Liliet

Depends on the exact numbers. If Sepulchral has ten thousand and Nim has two?

agumentic

Depending on the composition of said forces, I'd be wary of favouring Sepulchral even then, but I figure Nim has something like seven or eight thousand left to Sepulchral's maybe fourteen. 2 to 1 is more than enough for the Legions to wipe them out.

Liliet

There are three ways Cat and Co could have initiated talks with the loyalists:

1) Initiate talks with Malicia through Nim as an intermediary. The reason Cat is unwilling to do that has been spelled out and illustrated in the Wolof arc. Malicia cannot be trusted and Catherine is aiming to remove her completely. There are no talks to be had there, no compromise to be found. Malicia wants control, Cat wants to strip control from her. Any delay on that goal puts Procer further into the pit.

2) Initiate talks with Nim and try to convince her to make a separate agreement from Malicia. The writing was on the wall that this wouldn't happen, as whatever reason there was for Nim not turning with the Rebel Legions, would still be there and likely strengthened as Malicia was given time to shore up her defenses there. This is playing her game. We saw how it went with the Rebel Legions.

3) Find another leader or leaders and have talks with them, separate from both Nim and Malicia. This is exactly what they did and how they got Thirteenth to defect. There are no other pickings for them there, no-one else will be willing to defect from Nim AND Malicia and have separate talks.

ninegardens

Nim rebuffed the Rebels while she had strong military power. Now she is in a weaker military position, and hence might be persuaded to talk.

And more to the point:

It doesn't matter if your chances of success are low. Yes, given what we've seen, I'd put Cat's odds of GETTING anywhere with talks at 10%.

But that's 10% odds of thousands and thousands of people not dying. And they didn't consider the possibility of diplomacy and then discount it... they just didn't even talk about diplomacy. None of them did.

TeK

Well, mostly because diplomacy had failed them already. Malicia will never abdicate, Cat will never tolerate non-abdicated Malicia. There was no place for diplomacy on the battlefield. It would be just an empty gesture.

ninegardens

Malicia isn't here. Nim is here.

And no- screw that. Diplomacy isn't something you try once, or twice and then go "Oh well, guess that didn't work".

If you are in a position of diplomacy being costly then yes, I agree, think twice. But Cat has an enemy, who she hasn't spoken to yet, pretty much entirely at her mercy.

This is a great time for diplomacy! It's cheap! You have all the leverage! The person who was previously being the main issue (Malicia) isn't here, and Nim is here, so talking to her will provide you with 8 megatonnes of information, even if she doesn't surrender. And you aren't even giving up that much information yourself, since Akua ALREADY spilled all your personal intel.

Besides which, when it comes to diplomacy "It might not work" isn't a good enough reason to abandon it. "It probably won't work" isn't even a good enough reason either.

Shveiran

That really, really depends on the specifics.

I agree in principle, but let's get real: Catherine is trying to save the continent from an undead invasions. She cannot, should not afford risks beyond a certain level of stakes, because a mayor setbacks may collapse the war effort. Ultimately, what stops Nim from going back on her word?

How can a deal be guaranteed?

What stops the Marshal from simply backstabbing her once they are in sight of the walls of Ater?

It's not that she dislikes diplomacy. It is that uncertainty is just not an option. That's why even beating the Legions meant a problem. Can you afford to leave them, just because they promise not to fight you again?

She didn't want to kill them all, but if they can't be trusted there wasn't a long list of alternatives that were acceptable in this situation.

Liliet

> talking to her will provide you with 8 megatonnes of information

Only if she's willing to humor you?

TeK

You can't negotiate with someone who does not have the authority to negotiate with you, or with someone who does not have legal authority to uphold the terms you ask for. If she truly negotiated with Nim for surrender, that would be no longer diplomacy, that would be subterfuge. And she knew better than to attempt it. By this point both Cat and Nim know each other well enough to disperse with superficial hypocrisy of "attempting to negotiate". If other side truly had a change of mind, they would've send envoy themselves.

Besides, diplomacy never was a particularly strong suit in Catherine's arsenal.

Liliet

10%? More like 0.00001%, and much higher odds of her LOSING something as a result of the negotiations. 100% chance of losing time, which is a very precious resource to her right now.

They didn't talk about diplomacy because all the interests have essentially been laid out and seen as incompatible.

Like, what do you imagine for those 10%? What do you think they would have agreed upon?

ninegardens

0.00001% you say? so you might call it...a one in a million chance?

A one in a million chance is a sure bet, everyone knows that!

...

More seriously though: Cat hasn't TALKED to Nim yet. She has no way of knowing how loyal/disloyal Nim is, and she has Nim outnumbered, with the chance to dehydrate her out. Nim is in a VERY weak military position.

We the audience have seen things from Nim's point of view, but Cat hasn't. So yeah, when talking about a general I have never spoken to in person, who is at a huge strategic and tactical disadvantage, in a country that is already at civil war, I would put the negotiating odds higher than 10% that they can be negotiated with.

And they only had the sharp time constrain once the portal opened. A portal that ZEZE of all people described as "Huh, I didn't know you could do that". Before hand they were all like "Well, we could starve them out, but that would be a pain in the ass".

Hell, she could have even just flown up on a horse with a megaphone, yelled at the opposing army and said "If you want to fuck off home we won't fight you."... which is pretty much what happened, despite Cat's best efforts to the contrary.

You talk as if Cat had no choice but bloodshed, but thing is, the text directly shows that there was a peaceful solution available... by showing peace happen on the page.

agumentic

Well, Cat is not you, and have correctly figured out from her myriad of sources on Nim's character that she is not going to make a deal to dethrone Malicia, which is a basic prerequisite of any possible diplomatic resolution.

Asking soldiers is not the same as the negotiation with the loyalists and probably wouldn't work besides – that was a decision the soldiers needed to come to on their own, without influence from any of the leadership.

Liliet

I am not talking about HOW Cat could have talked to Nim. I'm asking WHAT KIND OF AGREEMENT do you think they would have come to?

Do note that Nim could have initiated talks at any point, too, and Cat is well known for being willing to talk with whoever is willing to talk to her. Except Malicia personally. The line was pretty clear. Nim chose not to step over it.

sengachi

All it takes is two loyalists asked to get a song going on the same cue, and decades of preparation and building of esprit de corps to make it work.

Liliet

It doesn't even take that first part, just the second. Of course they'd sing, it's what people DO in circumstances like these. Of course they'd sing the same song, they're of the same culture.

Rey d`Tutto

And that's why it's Maddy's win.

nimelennar

"It was an accident when it happened."

Yeah, right. Pull the other one; it's got bells on. Cat just doesn't want to admit that she got outplayed by someone who actually cares about keep the Praesi Legionnaires alive.

I wonder how many plants Amadeus had in each army. One for each would be enough for this result, but some redundancy would both make the song more likely to start up successfully, as well as provide some insurance should they die in battle.

agumentic

He didn't need plants. Seeds of distaste for civil war and narrative causality is more than enough to cause this on their own. It's not like this is the only way it could happen, after all.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not a single damn one. He wasn't counting on something like that. He was actually doing something his daughter taught him. Riding fate instead of avoiding it. Brother fights brother, a moment of recognition of this fact and two forces realizing the best move in this game was to stop playing any game that set them on each other. You don't need redundancy for the inevitable.

Liliet

I do not think there were plants.

Amadeus's "plant" is the entire Legion culture. He trusted in what it was and what it would do in his absence, because he's someone who could rally them to anything, but he needed them to make their own collective decision. Any ruling system is secretly a democracy (c) TGAB.

Amadeus didn't NEED plants. He just believed that this would happen. The SPECIFIC way it happened, that those specific legionaries started singing first, was technically an accident, but it's an accident the same way a thunderstorm lighting a forest on fire after a prolonged dry spell is an accident. You cannot predict when and where it will happen, but you can predict that it WILL.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

TGAB?

Rynjin

The Gods Are Bastards, a very good but currently defunct serial.

Worth reading, though it's worth knowing up front that its first book is pretty much irredeemably hot garbage; one of the worst starts to a web serial I've ever read. It rapidly improves from there.

Revenant

The Gods Are Bastards. (<https://tiraas.net/>)

If I remember correctly, both works have referenced each other by now; if incorrectly, then it's only one way.

Burlyraven

Praes is in the middle of a revolution, and it's the quietest one the nation's ever seen, despite it taking so much blood to make it happen. I highly doubt they'll be a good nation at the end, but the people are starting to realize just how many of the old ways are worthless. It's going to take a messiah to really cement the story, though, and I still think that's Akua.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's interesting. First, when we realized the song has always been about her, it seemed a foregone conclusion. Then it seemed to be strongly conveyed that she didn't hear the song anymore, that she didn't want this nearly enough to ever be appropriate for the name. But I'm convinced again. She doesn't want to be Empress of this Dread Empire, and so she can't be. But maybe what's going to emerge from it's ashes of the fallen tower will be what she's always been meant to be part of.

Sinead

This may mean that Cat herself will be the one to take up Liesse's Crown and stand against the Dead King if Akua takes this Role in Praes.

Reader in the Night

Damn, a leaderless Legion, banded together through bonds of brotherhood that overcome mere hierarchy across every side of a battlefield, and then fleeing into the desert? That is one powerful Chekov's gun to unexpectedly pay off at the story's last moment. I wonder who Amadeus is going to aim that Silver Bullet at?

But yeah, a lot of people commenting on how Amadeus' story has been of how the common folk of Praes are sick and tired of tyrants and their games, and now there's a masterless army of Praesi patriots released into the wilds. Ol' Amadeus might genuinely be aiming at actually bringing down the Tower for good.

Anomandris

I mean, reforming the deserters as an army seems to defeat the purpose in my book. This seems kinda a statement that people are sick of being used as army fodder – regardless of by who. My read was that he is trying to change the whole system – adding an army doesn't do that...

Insanenoodlyguy

They are sick of fighting for anybody else. That doesn't mean they aren't willing to fight for themselves. He's not proposing to take the Empire, he's proposing an END to the empire. That whatever comes next will not be this with a different name after "Dread Emperor/Empress", but something new. The system has to go down, and everybody in the system just happens to be over here guys, so... how bout it? (it will be a choice. It will have to be a choice or as you noted, the story will be damaged and they will fail). It will also be a choice if they do anything after that anywhere else. And that's where Cat's going to have a problem with all of this. Cause Amadeus does not end this with them marching to fight the Dead King on his say-so. There will not be a well oiled magic machine that can be lent out to Cat for helpful magic assistance. I mean maybe those things will be attainable, but she'll have to ask, as he did. And at this point, I also suspect at the end the leader of this new system will be a woman who's become something that's incidentally completely useless for Cat's current Dead King plan. The Hopeful Empress Akua or somesuch.

Sykomantis

Dread Empress Benevolent, as it were

Insanenoodlyguy

No. It won't be Dread Empress for sure. She doesn't hear the song and Amadeus is determined to kill it. Empress perhaps, but not Dread.

Anomandris

So he's broken the whole 'Armies at Beck and call", at least in Praes.

Am I crazy in thinking he is gonna try breaking the rule of three next (for the Black Knight, that is?) What happens in case he kills Arthur and Nim both during their third fight?

Insanenoodlyguy

Why would he do that? It seems like an odd thing to care about as it'd be on the whole irrelevant to his plans. I can't really see why he'd have any inclination to kill the New Squire at all, and by contrast has several reasons to kill Nim, so unless he wants to save both instead it seems like staying out of this is the best thing to do. Besides, the way fate works, he'd likely meet his own destruction at their hands by trying to directly interfere in such a fated fight.

Liliet

Yeah I don't think he has any reason to do that.

Juff

Typo Thread:

combine pressure > combined pressure squeeze so tightly > squeezeed so tightly suddenly realize > suddenly realized letme > let me
fellows me > fellows stabbed me
Askum > Aksum
to just left > to just leave maybefifteen > maybe fifteen arrive along > arrive long barely tell even > barely even tell takin no > taking no Sanaa liked > Sanaa looked how ended > who ended

you war > your war
immediately ritual. > immediately replied.
"I cannot," > "It cannot,"
Knight what few > Knight, with what few she

RoflCat

The crabs have escaped the bucket, together.

Abrakadabra

I get that. But I find the timing fishy. They fought each oöher for weeks after all, but now They suddenly Just realized fuck this?

RoflCat

It's because the balance is broken that this happen.

All the leaders on Legions side have either surrendered (Sacker) or are retreating (Nim)

The fight that was about to happen wasn't one for a cause, it's basically two groups of sacrificial soldiers about to clash.

The loyalist put these soldiers to delay while the 'more important' assets escape.

Catherine put these soldiers there to reduce damage to her 'more important' army.

And for the soldiers themselves, fighting each other doesn't further the cause they believed in.

The loyalist killing any rebels wouldn't hurt Catherine.

The rebels killing the shield walls won't hurt Malicia or even Nim because clearly they don't expect these guys to survive.

Once they realized this, that there's neither a cause or reward to the fight, they just stopped.

And hey, at this point even if they get executed for desertion, at least they won't go out a crab in a bucket.

Abrakadabra

Now, you are making a good point, thanks!

Liliet

Imagine a reservoir slowly filling. Then, at one sudden moment, it spills over.

agumentic

Admittedly, the whole thing was a bit overly dramatic for my taste, but this is a reality where stories are the laws of physics. Overly dramatic things are a matter of course.

Liliet

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Christmas_truce

Unrealistic is one thing this chapter's key development is not.

A war is inherently dramatic.

agumentic

Notably, Christmas (and other) truces didn't happen in the middle of one army charging another with them breaking into song and then dropping their arms and walking off.

Liliet

Notably, the armies in Christmas and other truces also were from actual different countries and not prisoners made to charge their former comrades they'd spent the war hoping would be their comrades again.

agumentic

Plenty of civil wars in our world, not a lot breaking into songs mid-charge.

Liliet

Most civil wars, At Least That I Know Of, have a clear division between the troops as well: either ideological, or more often, ethnic/geographical. Tribe A fighting against Tribe B might be a civil war by measure of borders drawn on the map, but it's a fight against outsiders from the point of view of those fighting.

This is how Proceran and Praesi civil wars normally work: geographical divisions making "us" be people from one principality / lordship and "them" be people from elsewhere.

But the Legions are not organized on a geographical basis. They are not divided in this way, they are a big mixer. Orcs, ogres, Taghreb, Soninke, goblins, Duni find themselves on all sides of the conflict.

The Legions absorbed into the Army of Callow at least have personal bonds with outsiders who are not Legion, giving them SOMETHING of a distinct identity to unite around, though as we can see in the text, it's a fairly weak tie and plenty of them desert as well.

The Rebel Legions and the Loyalist Legions? The line on who deserted and who didn't was drawn by the commanders' choices. Hell, Sacker's people didn't eve desert per se, they were with her since she got left on the inside at the Red Flower Vales! And all of these people did not come prepared to fight each other – the loyalists came to fight Callow and Sepulchral, the rebels came to join loyalists and fight the same, hopefully. The political decisions about not doing so absolutely did not echo in the popular sentiment, and Cat's move to pit them against each other finished the job.

Civil wars generally are based on a division between people fighting them. The only division here is "happened to be assigned to the other Legion".

agumentic

> The only division here is "happened to be assigned to the other Legion".

As was the case for every civil war in a state with a professional military.

But anyway, you are trying to convince me of something that I already accept – I am not arguing that the Legions refusing to fight each doesn't make sense. What I am saying is the way it happened, with the musical number suddenly breaking out, soldiers dropping their weapons and walking off into the metaphorical sunset was a bit too dramatic for my taste. And arguing about taste obviously not going to lead anywhere.

Liliet

Musical numbers are NORMAL for the army is my point. Soldier singing is what HAPPENS.

agumentic

Soldiers singing happens quite a lot. Soldiers singing the same song that turns into a lament that stops the battle, not really.

Liliet

I mean... the battle stopped because... oh, I already said all of this.

My point is, war is dramatic, inherently. Saying that something that happened in a war is dramatic is saying water is wet. Literally all of it is life and death, life and death of a lot of people, too. There isn't really a hypothetical non-dramatic version of this moment out there, even if they hadn't stopped and kept charging without a song it would ALSO have been dramatic and cinematic, if in an entirely different tone.

agumentic

I am of the opinion that war is actually a rather mundane affair, but that's neither here nor there. My point is, it's possible for even understandably dramatic thing to be overly so to one's taste, and that was the case for me with this scene. Nothing more.

Liliet

Fair, I guess.

Earl of Purple

@agumentic: When was the last time a civil war broke out in a country with a professional military which wasn't some kind of coup by the military against a civilian government (thereby pitting soldiers against civilians, rather than soldiers against soldiers) or otherwise aggravated by ethnic, geographic or religious factors? The fact the Sudanese civil war resulted in South Sudan being established as a separate country, Boko Haram in Nigeria is made up of Islamic extremists, and the Yemeni civil war's main factions are being funded by different foreign backers means I can't actually think of any.

Liliet

And I'm pretty sure "breaking into songs mid-charge" is what armies NORMALLY do.

Liliet

(they're just usually different songs, not the same one, see: divisions)

Abrakadabra

People don't work that way. Rolfcat explanation is better. The guys in the front lines realized they are the expendables on both sides.

Zggt

This is fascinating in many ways; Malicia and Black's ideological divide is manifested in a new way here. Malicia has a rather Praesi-centric view of the world. Even her book, which in essence decried the Age of Wonders, was not criticized for lack of pragmatism by Akua – meaning that Malicia did use Praesi ruthlessness as a guiding light behind her philosophy (else Akua would note it). Her position as a ruler in Praes probably greatly reinforced that.

But like all very elegant ideologies, even when seemingly pragmatic, the real world has a way of becoming a place where people still act like people always do. There are of course exceptions to this within the story, but in all cases the people and the leader share a symbiotic representation. The Tyrant and his madness were a representation of Helike just as much as the other way around. Likewise, The Girl Who Climbed the Tower ends with the rise subsuming who the person was in the first place – Malicia became another Dread Empress by trying to be a different kind of Empress, but she was shaped by Praes too much for shaping it into anything too different.

This has always been the point of contention between Amadeus and Malicia. Amadeus would have killed all the high lords and then let Praes consume itself for a generation for something new to rise up instead. The Tower would suffer, there would be less influence of the Empire on recovery, and in all likelihood, the person leading this would not be the person there to something different. Instead, he adapted his plan, and found an acceptable successor to his vision in Cat.

It wasn't quite the same, but he understood that Praes, as a villainous nation, always eventually pays for its successes, and instead looked to control that price from the get go. Civil war for a generation followed by integration with Callow and turning into something different might have worked. It may have been a theoretical big enough sacrifice to appease Below into making it happen. Malicia instead tried to grasp first and then use the price as a weapon... but that's just making her a pale imitation of the Dead King.

And now we finally see the seeds of all that manifest. As the escalation around these crazy and powerful few continues, as Named and High Lords and whatnot want to tear each other to shreds, the Legions now see this as an internal affair between all of those crazy people. Nim had it almost right, the Legions are indeed not tools for political squabbles.

Earl of Purple

This is a great chapter. And Sepulchral is vicious, cunning and I really quite enjoyed her speaking with Cat. I wonder if she'll try sticking around, placing herself as her heir's advisor or something, if she can't lead herself after the end of the War. Or if she'll get assassinated again.

letouriste

Now, this is a FASCINATING title. I've much to think about now...

axusgrad

Sepulchral really "lived" up to her name!

Josh M

I just caught up after a year of this story basically consuming my every waking thought, and I have to say EE – this entire saga is absolutely phenomenal, and probably the best thing I've ever read.

Some authors are great at world-building, some are great at coming up with a concept (the whole idea of Named is so cool, unique, and well-executed), some are great at developing well-rounded characters and getting their readers invested in and deeply caring about many of them, some are great at constructing believable dialog, some are great at fight scenes and choreographing battle and action scenes, some are great at politics and scheming, some are great at making you see both sides of many issues, and some are great at making you think about profound philosophical and moral issues. Hell, some might be great at a few of these.

You, however...you somehow manage to be absolutely extraordinary at ALL OF THEM. I've subscribed to your Patreon, and though I know that you say this is the last book in the series, I really hope this isn't the last we see of Calernia and its Named.

It makes me genuinely sad that I'll never get to read this for the first time again.

Just an appreciation post from a now-loyal reader. Keep up the great work, EE. You deserve whatever eventually winds up coming out of this.

nipi

You know when this is all over Calernia is going to have to worry about the horde of undead ratkin the drow will raise with night

Skidemon

I just caught up after a year of this story basically consuming my every waking thought, and I have to say EE – this entire saga is absolutely phenomenal, and probably the best thing I've ever read.

Some authors are great at world-building, some are great at coming up with a concept (the whole idea of Named is so cool, unique, and well-executed), some are great at developing well-rounded characters and getting their readers invested in and deeply caring about many of them, some are great at constructing believable dialog, some are great at fight scenes and choreographing battle and action scenes, some are great at politics and scheming, some are great at making you see both sides of many issues, and some are great at making you think about profound philosophical and moral issues. Hell, some might be great at a few of these.

You, however...you somehow manage to be absolutely extraordinary at ALL OF THEM.

Although I know that you say this is the last book in the series, I really hope this isn't the last we see of Calernia and its Named.

It makes me genuinely sad that I'll never get to read this for the first time again.

Just an appreciation post from a now-loyal reader. Keep up the great work, EE. You deserve whatever eventually winds up coming out of this.

Zach

PracGuide is the uncontested best "page-turner fantasy web serial" IMO.

I think one of the most noteworthy things about it is that I was able to enjoy re-reading it (as someone who almost never enjoys reading or watching something a second time).

Interlude: South

"Coincidence is just fate bereft of faith."

– Dread Emperor Malevolent I, the Unhallowed

Kallia liked to think of Mercantis as what would happen if a city ate other cities until it grew fat.

It helped her fix the story of this place in her mind and that was the most important thing for someone who wanted to prowl its nights. Which she often did. Though the Painted Knife was the leader of the band of five that had been sent to the City of Bought and Sold, she preferred to leave handling the merchant lords to Rhodon. The Royal Conjurer had been a powerful man in the court of Helike for many years, before fleeing the Tyrant's ascension, and he knew how to deal with the fat schemers that infested this city like maggots would a corpse. And where he struggled, well, there were few in Mercantis whose buried skeletons could not be found out when Alain and Angelique both took to looking for them.

The Relentless Magistrate had toppled three merchant lords, two of which had been members of the Forty-Sole Court, since arriving in the city. He'd done this by proving materially and in excruciating detail how they were breaking the laws in the Consortium, causing a feeding frenzy among rivals. Angelique's own work never saw the light of day, the very lucrative – and technically legal – trade of poisons and favours she'd begun at the highest levels of influence granting her access to halls of power where no foreigners would ever be allowed to stand otherwise. Rhodon had not been shy in using them to get obstacles out of the way when it came to the task the Grand Alliance had assigned their band: burning Praesi influence out of the city.

And yet, for all the work of those three, in the end it was Teresa and Kallia who found the first hint of the plot. They'd gone drinking outside the city on one of the outlying shores, the Grizzled Fantassin calling an old acquaintance who'd 'put on the yoke' and become one of the mercenaries permanently contracted to protect Mercantis instead of a proper army. Teresa drank and brawled with the man through the evening, but when their glances took on another tone Kallia made herself scarce. She'd gone out to look for another place to drink – and perhaps a man of her own to throw backs with – but instead what the Painted Knife found was an assassination.

Two corpses later a grateful mercenary captain told her everything he knew, which in truth wasn't much. Many officers had recently been offered large sums of money to accept retirement. The captain had refused, preferring the soldier's life, and now wondered if some of the other mercenaries he'd thought uninterested in retiring were corpses instead of truly gone to Dormer. Come morning, Kallia brought the oddity up to Teresa and watched the old woman's face harden.

"Someone's tightening their reins on the mercenary companies," the Grizzled Fantassin said. "Placing their own officers in key positions."

The Painted Knife grinned.

"A plot," she enthused. "We must defeat it."

Finally, something she could do instead of exploring the city and struggling with the impulse to cut everyone in this place who owned 'indentured servants'. Even Wastelanders despised slavery, for all their many other sins. They brought their findings to Rhodon, who punctured their ardour.

"It is Merchant Prince Mauricius consolidating his position," the Royal Conjurer said. "This is not likely to be a large enough scandal to topple him should it come out, and even if it were such an outcome is not desirable. His most likely replacement is more inclined to the Empire than the Grand Alliance."

The Consortium usually kept its Praesi clients at a distance, Rhodon explained, but the sheer amount of coin the Dread Empire poured into the city meant it tended to have friends in high places. The perceived high-handedness of the Grand Alliance and plans of a great city at the heart of the continent had only encouraged that trend.

"Seems odd he'd bother," Angelique told them over dinner, after being informed. "The Merchant Prince already controls funding for mercenaries unless contradicted by two thirds of the Forty-Stole Court. What are these men going to listen to, if not the money?"

"Yet he is not a man with a reputation for pointless action," Kallia frowned.

"No," Rhodon murmured. "So what is it that has the man afraid of being contradicted by two thirds of the Forty-Stole Court?"

And so once more they went on the hunt, for anything that would turn so many of the most powerful men and women in the city against Mauricius was bound to be important. Teresa returned to the outer shores to try to get a grasp on how many of the mercenary companies were being subverted and meanwhile Kallia set her finest bloodhound on the hunt.

"The Merchant Prince's affairs are all protected by law," Alain Monduc said. "Even his most mundane papers are considered as being 'of state'. There is no way for foreigners to access them, which will limit us to witnesses."

Kallia did not know the average lifespan of a witness in Mercantis that a wealthy man wanted dead, but at a guess she'd venture days. Meaning that if Alain's investigations were caught on to, their sole evidence was going to be swiftly disappeared.

"Ah but that's where you have it wrong, darling," the Poisoner girlishly smiled. "There is simply no lawful way for foreigners to access such papers."

The Magistrate looked like he was choking on sheer outrage, to the Poisoner's open delight, but when copies of such papers appeared on his table just before noon he mastered his anger.

"Copies are not strictly illegal," Alain stiffly said. "And there is some leeway in the process of gathering evidence for a trial."

Angelique looked rather robbed by the lack of explosion, which was probably half the reason the Magistrate had forced himself to be cordial. Weeks of following paper trails and Kallia being sent out to follow men and eavesdrop on their conversations at night ultimately led the Relentless Magistrate to an odd conclusion.

"Mauricius is not preparing a coup," Alain announced, "but preparing against one. Every single measure we've unearthed was defensive in nature."

Which made little sense, for the First Prince had strictly warned against trying to remove Mauricius from his position and the Black Queen had shrugged her assent. Even if Kallia did get her hands on something that could topple the Merchant Prince, she was to pass that information to the Grand Alliance instead so that it might be used as leverage in negotiations. So who was the Merchant Prince afraid would remove him?

"It could be the Tower," Angelique said. "Rumour has it that he had murdered the man Malicia wanted as Merchant Prince instead."

"The Empress has a reputation as a practical woman," Rhodon replied. "It would be unlike her to force an enemy where she could court an ally instead. Besides, meddling too deeply in the affairs of Mercantis would see it react harshly. It would look for protection against her, not fall in line."

"Let us pray the Empress fumbled the pig, then," Teresa said. "It would be a gift of the Gods for Mercantis to go the way of the Grand Alliance. We could use the gold."

Kallia looked questioningly at Alain, but the other Proceran seemed just as baffled by the expression. Arlesite, the man mouthed with a shrug.

"But whatever it is he's afraid of, he's nearly covered," Teresa continued. "He's got a little over half the mercenary companies in his pocket now. The key officers at least."

"If it were a Praesi plot, he would not have spent a fortune of his coin warding against it," Alain opined. "He would have passed the matter to us. He's certainly not been shy about using us as bears in his pit so far."

True enough. The verbal duels of the Royal Conjuror and the Praesi ambassador had turned into a form of local entertainment and they'd all been tacitly allowed to go after Praesi spies in the city so long as there was little collateral damage.

"There's not many people left who could pull off a coup," the Poisoner noted. "The Black Queen is in Praes, the Free Cities in another civil war and even the merchants would balk at taking the Dead King's coin."

"If there is no outside backing, it has to be an internal enemy," Rhodon mused.

"Which makes no sense," Angelique said. "Only the Forty-Stole Court could depose him and it's more divided than it was before he was elected. He's been playing the faction that wants a rapprochement with the Grand Alliance against the Praesi stooges to carve out a faction in the middle. No one has the votes to depose him, so what is it that he's afraid of?"

Kallia sighed. She'd never enjoyed plots and schemes. It had almost gotten her killed in Levante when she'd failed to figure out whose body the Spirit of Vengeance wore during the day, if the- suddenly she paused.

"What if the vote were rigged?" the Painted Knife asked. "You said that the Empress might want to be rid of him, Angelique, and Rhodon you once told us that his most likely replacement is in the Empire's pocket."

The Royal Conjuror hummed.

"Mind control?" he said.

"I was thinking of possession," Kallia admitted. "I have known spirits that could ride men unseen and nudge their thoughts."

"It would explain why he might expect to be able to use the mercenaries against the Forty Stoles and not be murdered for it afterwards," the Poisoner mused. "If he freed them and then made a show of returning control, it might instead strengthen his position."

"The entire city would sing his praises," Alain agreed. "A man can do much, with the love of the people behind him and debts of gratitude among the great."

"The best contracts are those you snipe another company to," the Grizzled Fantassin grinned. "Let's see if we can't get all that gratitude headed our way instead, yes?"

The plan was weeks in the making. Angelique had to burn through most of her favours and it still wasn't enough: they had to knock out guards so they could enter the Court unseen. Alain guided them through the halls, as the only one of them who'd ever been in here before – when he had presented evidence in trials – and Teresa paid off the mercenaries that'd agreed to help them smuggle in the barrels over the last few days. It still almost when to the Hells when an early guard patrol ran into them, but the Painted Knife got in close and dropped them before they could raise alarm. They rolled the four great wooden barrels with them into the great hall after Alain kicked the door open, to the great anger of the merchant lords in assembly.

The Royal Conjurer obeyed Kallia's shouted order and gathered his magic, striking down with great goutts of flame and blowing up the barrels. Mist swept over the hall, still holy and in heavy enough a cloud that it would disrupt either spells or possession.

And then, to Kallia's horror, nothing at all happened.

The shouts from the furious merchant lords got louder and the Painted Knife wondered if she had just ruined the relations between the Grand Alliance and Mercantis when one bloodcurdling scream pierced through the din. Merchant Prince Mauricius dropped out of his seat, screaming in a way that no throat could, and when he rose flakes of his face began to crumple. Underneath was a pitch-black skin, but there was nothing human about it.

"Devil," someone shouted.

Kallia cocked her head to the side. Huh. They'd been wrong but it had worked anyhow, so... win?

Win, she decided, and grinned.

—

Penthes' tall walls had kept the city in the war long past the time where a man less desperate than Exarch Prodocius would have surrendered.

Penthes has lost all its territories save a few holdout river fortresses, stood without allies and the city was beginning to starve. The supplies and mage support the Tower had sent were not enough for a city-state of that size to stay fed when encircled.

Now that Basilia's army was equipped with proper dwarven siege engines, the walls were no longer a surmountable hindrance either. In truth, if not for the presence of the Bellerophon army beneath the walls Basilia would have already ordered the city to be stormed. She'd had a swath of the southern walls reduced to rubble by trebuchet bombardment, but she was wary of committing her army to investing the city if there was a chance the Republic would strike at her while she did.

Helike still had the finest army in the Free Cities, but its numbers had thinned. Basilia had long been aware that one severe defeat was all that stood between her and the Helikean army ending as a fighting force for a few years. It was why she'd been so aggressive in her campaigning: so long as she was on the offence, she could force the battles on terms favourable to her. Now that streak of victories had been dragged to a halt, first by the presence of Bellerophon at the siege and then by what had followed Basilia's army entrenching for a few months: diplomacy. The Secretariat had been the first to send envoys, but Mercantis had not been far behind and eventually even Atalante – at the urging of First Prince Cordelia, her agents said – had sent representatives.

Nicae and Stygia already had envoys, arguably, as Magister Zoe Ixioni and Princess Zenobia Vasilakis were personally leading the troops their vassal states were contributing to the war. Not that the vassalage was official, or for that matter Zoe Ixioni's rule. Officially speaking she was still only a magister, though one who'd been voted emergency powers by the Magisterium without an end to those powers every being specified. Basilia tended to think better of Zenobia, who at least had no pretend she was anything but an absolute ruler when she'd crowned herself princess of Nicae. Regardless of the petty details, the fact was that six cities of the League all had envoys or armies here beneath the walls of seventh and last.

General Basilia found it highly amusing that while the city of Penthes and its ruling exarch had been made political nonentities, the siege of Penthes itself had turned into a diplomatic hotbed for the entire League of Free Cities. It was the sort of irony Kairos Theodosian would have delighted in, she suspected, and might even have gone out of his way to arrange. She had not, but Basilia was no Tyrant. That was not her calling, nor did she feel as if it should be. Ye of Helike, do as you will. The testament of the last Theodosian had not invited his people to follow in his wake: they were to do as they wished and nothing else, that was the very point.

Basilia had found her own wishes leading her to the walls of Penthes, to the threshold of what might very well be the defining hour of the League of Free Cities.

It was not delusion on her part to believe that. Zenobia and Ixioni agreed: there was an urgency in the air, a desperation. At first the Atalante priest-philosophers that'd been sent as delegates had only visited to sneer and snipe at the proceedings, but now they came by every other day and were negotiation in earnest. They couldn't afford not to, when Delos had sent one of the highest-ranking members of the Secretariat – Nestor Ikaroi – as its representative and begun to seriously back a reform of the League of Free Cities. The preachers were terrified of being left out in the cold, surrounded on all sides by states bound in alliance. Still, for all that the talks were moving it would have been a lie to say they were succeeding.

"Ikaroi isn't moving an inch even when we give ground elsewhere," Magister Zoe noted as the day's talks ended. "He's usually a reasonable man, so I expect he's under orders by the broader Secretariat."

Basilias made a noise that conveyed both agreement and disgruntlement.

"His current concessions are not insignificant," Princess Zenobia said. "Formal recognition of the imperial realm of Aenia and you as its empress is not something I thought we'd get out of the Secretariat without putting a sword to their throat. The scribes hate change the way a cat hates water."

"They would have been forced to bend on that sooner or later," Basilias said. "I hold the land, even if they might wish it otherwise. Getting me named protector of the League is where the power lies."

In practice it was not Basilias herself who was named but the imperial office of Aenia, which she happened to hold. It had been her notion to name the empire that would unite Nicae, Stygia and Helike together after the great Aenos Basileon, the sole claim to unifying authority in the region that predated the foundation of the League. It was the general's intention to follow in footsteps of Basileon and unite the Free Cities once more, but she knew she must be careful lest she follow in the footsteps of Dread Empress Triumphant instead. Even if she could take all of the League by force, she could not hope to hold them. No, better to first unite the western cities – Helike for soldiery, Nicae for trade and Stygia for fields and mines – and let her successors finish the work.

For that, though she needed an edge that would prevent the four other cities from turning on her empire in a decade after the dangers had passed. Something that would set Helike apart from the rest. To secure that she'd proposed to the other cities of the League the creation of an office under its auspices: protector of the League of Free Cities. She'd been careful not to outright step on the powers of the Hierarch, instead suggesting the protector would lead the armies of the League in time of war and see to the defence of its borders against all foreign powers. Tying that authority to rule of Aenia had been the scheme, as it would ensure that Basilia's line would have hereditary power over the League of Free Cities.

Delos was balking at that, Ikaroi's suggested compromise of Basilia herself holding such power for her lifetime and then it being subject to election like the office of Hierarch being the most they were willing to offer. Atalante wasn't as entrenched in its opposition but was demanding instead that anyone holding such an office must follow the House of Light, which was... controversial. Trying to throw slices of Penthesian territory at the Secretariat had yielded no further concessions, even when Basilia had gotten serious and offered strategically important border fortresses. Mercantis seemed to be playing all sides, Merchant Prince Mauricius' envoys propping up Delos and Atalante publicly while making her assurances of support in private. So long as the privileged position of the City of Bought and Sold was maintained they would not go against her, they swore.

Considering Mercantis had served as middlemen when she'd needed siege engines from the dwarves, Basilia could not simply toss the snakes out of her tent the way she wanted to. She might need the Consortium again before it was all over.

"Delos has a particular distaste for hereditary power," Magister Zoe said. "I am not surprised they're proving to be the most troublesome holdout. Atalante was ruled by queens, once, but the Secretariat had held the power for millennia."

In some form, anyway, as the scribes insisted their current government was descended from the provincial one Aenos Basileon had placed to rule over the city, thus making them the sole true descendent of that founding empire. Every city save Helike and Bellerophon claimed some kind of relation to the old empire, actually. The Trakas of Nicae claimed descent of the man himself, Stygia that the Magisterium was a regency council until restoration of the empire, Penthes that their first exarch was Basileon's chosen successor and Atalante that the man himself had been buried under their city – and so they were the custodians of his empire, until the Gods Above raised him from the dead.

Not that the old stories had ever mattered much, save when Bellerophon tried to get the empire formally dissolved by the League every few years and those same cities balked.

"At least the Glorious Republic is staying out of our way," Princess Zenobia drily said. "I suppose that is the best to be expected out of them, lack of direct harm."

Everyone's positions were calcifying, Basilia felt. She knew the feeling, knew how it could be the death of progress. She'd seen it at work in Helike, in the years before the Tyrant had restored the city: factions biting at each other around an indolent throne, no one winning or losing anything of worth. No one was going to move much from their current negotiating positions and that might be the death of this entire enterprise. Bellerophon's absence was an integral part of the stalemate, Basilia finally decided. The Republic was made up of mobs and madmen, but they were part of the League – and without them coming out on either side, Delos and Atalante felt they still had some breathing room.

If nothing else, some form of accord with the Republic would allow her to at finish off Penthes for good and turn up the pressure.

"We're done for the day," the general said, rising to her feet.

"Indeed?" Magister Zoe said, cocking an eyebrow.

"I must talk to some people," Basilia said, meaning People.

Getting to the Bellerophon camp wasn't difficult, or even being noticed when she approached: as usual they had at least twice the number of sentries they needed. Getting one of those soldiers to acknowledge that presence was more difficult, even with a company of kataphraktoi at her back. She pounded at the gate until they were forced to admit she was there, and then a harried-looking general was rustled up to speak with her. Two blank-faced kanenas stood behind him, which no doubt did little for the man's confidence about getting through this conversation alive.

"I seek to address the People," General Basilia bluntly said.

"As a foreign despot-"

"I am a general in service to no crown," Basilia corrected.

The man looked taken aback, looking back to the kanenas. Their faces were still as a pond and just as unreadable.

"There are no diplomats with the army," the general said. "You must head to Bellerophon and make your request there."

"That would be inconvenient," Basilia said. "Might I not simply, under observation by the kanenas, make my address and let Bellerophans convey it to the people by scrying ritual?"

"Bellerophon does not use scrying rituals," the man replied without missing a beat, "which are trick of wicked foreign tyrants and have never worked, may a wind of locusts blow in their faces for a hundred years."

Basilia blinked. Bellerophon absolutely did use such rituals.

"Do you perhaps have an alternative with superficial resemblances?" she hazarded.

"Communication rituals are a recent innovation of the Republic," the general shamelessly said. "They can serve similar purposes on occasion. It is not, however, in power to accede to your request."

The kanenas frowned and the man winced.

"As I have no power," he hastily added, "for it rests entirely in the hands of the People, may they rule peerlessly and without mistake for another thousand years."

Basilia waited to see if the general was going to start bleeding from his eyes. Ten heartbeats passed and he didn't, which was a promising sign.

"How may such a request be accepted or denied?" she pressed.

They had no answer to give her, so negotiations ended for half an hour while they went away to figure it out. Another woman entirely returned to answer, with two different kanenas at her back. Basilia decided not to ask what had happened to the general. From what she remembered of Anaxares' mournful ramblings, that would be a good way to get the man killed.

"Your request can be accepted or denied by a provisional vote of the entire camp," the woman said.

"May I ask for such a vote?"

An hour later she was informed that she could. It took another two hours after she did ask, and then they conceded that a provisional vote would be held. It was dark by then but while Basilia sent for food and took a pause to piss, she did not wander far. If she did, she was sure to lose these people. It took until Morning Bell until the votes were counted, but the kanenas found an irregularity with some of the ballots – some had been written in ink that came from Delos – so another vote had to be held. Three hours later, Basilia was woken up from her nap on her horse to be informed that the vote had gone in her favour. Though bone-tired and aching from the restless night, she took the only shot she was likely to have.

No doubt by next week the People would have cooked up a new law that made even her unlikely station unfit to ask questions of the Glorious Republic.

She left after passing along her message – offer, really – and crawled back into bed until noon. Delos and Atalante came later the same day to try to dig out of her what she'd been up to, but she put them off. It wouldn't last forever, but thankfully the Republic had been quick in arranging for a general vote on her proposition. As soon as they'd held a vote about whether to hold a vote, anyway, which pushed the answer back another day. With typical subtlety, the envoys from Bellerophon walked into her tent as she was seated with those from Delos and Atalante.

"The Republic welcomes your recognition that Hierarch Anaxares is still among the living," the man said.

There was surprise from the others, but why wouldn't she? If there was to be a seat above her own in the League, best to leave it in the hands of a man either dead or uninterested in filling it. Permanently, if she could.

"Furthermore, your question over the status of the Dead King has been put to debate and the People have reached conclusion," the man continued. "By popular vote, Trismegistus of Keter is declared an Egregious Millennial Despot and an Enemy of the People. The so-called Kingdom of the Dead is declared unlawful."

She bit down on a grin. Ah, and there was the trick. Basilia couldn't declare war on anyone, because when a Hierarch ruled foreign affairs of the League were strictly under their purview. As Anaxares himself had once said during the invasion of Procer, however, there could be no state of war against a state that was not legitimate. If, say, Basilia led troops of the League to 'oversee the dissolution of Keter' then by the Bellerophon definition of the term it would not be a war. By the look of the frown on Ikaroi's face, he'd already put together as much.

"And the proposition over the office of Protector of the League?"

"Under the current terms of election, the People support the creation of such an office," the man said.

Such terms being every city having a vote, same as the election of a Hierarch, but instead of unanimity only majority would be required here. Helike would vote for itself and its vassal cities, whose votes would be maintained as independent ones, would vote accordingly. To secure a permanent majority, all that Basilia now needed to do was take Penthes and dictate in their terms of surrender a permanent vote for the reigning monarch of Aenia for this office. And she'd be able to take Penthes now, because as of tomorrow she was going to request the help of the People in overseeing the dissolution of Keter. The same army currently in her way would serve as the vanguard of this worthy enterprise.

"I gratefully receive the People's wisdom," General Basilia smiled.

Already she could see Nestor Ikaroi and the Atalante priests reconsidering their position. But it would not, she suddenly realized, be enough. The shock of this turnabout hadn't quite pushed them over the top. The mire would continue. When messengers entered the tent she was grateful, as the pause would allow her to gather her thoughts and think of a way through, but the way the faces of the foreign envoys paled caught her attention. Magister Zoe leaned in close to whisper in her ear.

"My people say that Merchant Prince Mauricius had been revealed to have been replaced by a devil," she said. "The city is blaming Praes for it."

Basilias let out a low whistle.

"Why are they so unsettled?" she asked, discreetly gesturing at the envoys.

Zoe Ixion grinned sharply.

"Because the Forty-Stole Court has voted unanimously to ask for an alliance with the Empress of Aenia," she said. "They want protection."

And so the calculations in the eyes of the envoys changed again. The mire in their negotiations now looked like the Tower's work, to keep the south from solidifying in a single block. Worse than that, they knew that if Basilias began getting funding from Mercantis she might lose patience with them playing for time and decided that this could be settled with armies instead. And with that much coin behind her she'd be able to win that damned war, too.

"Perhaps reconsidering our position on the office of Protector is needed, considering the developments in the League and abroad," Secretary Nestor Ikaroi calmly said.

There were some noises of assent from the Atalante crowd and General Basilias Katopodis smiled. She knew better than to think this her triumph entirely, but it was sweet nonetheless. Sweeter still was the knowledge that the Gods were blowing wind in her sail, for what else but Fate could this assembly of coincidence be? The Old World was ending, she could feel it in her bones. The age was crumbling to dust, its relics falling one after another, and now something else was beginning to emerge from the ruins. And under that new sun, Basilias thought, there would be room for a new way of doing things. The deaths throes of the Age of Wonders would change the League of Free Cities, she swore it.

The word shivered in approval and somehow she knew that, somewhere down Below, Kairos Theodosian was laughing.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

Thankfully the Republic had been quick in arranging for a general vote on The Practical Guide to Evil.

jamesc9

This one is not bad. I'm still hoping that someone knows how to mask spoilers in wordpress.

ruduen

Ah, it's been a while since we're reminded about just how strong Providence can be for an actual band of five. Be in the right place at the right time with the wrong information in just the right way for it to make all of the difference.

dadycool

"Yeesh, this is just like that one time when,...wait...hey, uh, guys?"

Shveiran

And don't you just feel a surge of sympathy for poor, villainous Malicia and Allegedly Not Mauricius?

A perfectly good plot they worked so hard on, undone by mistake during a reckless act that could have soured international relationship if unfounded – and was unfounded to boot!

Itarion

It wasn't unfounded, exactly. It wasn't possession or spell compulsion, but the office of the Merchant Prince was absolutely being magically controlled by Praes. They were inaccurate, but not wrong as such.

jhack

The point is that they didn't think Maurice was being compelled. They thought that he was preparing armies to defend against the rest of the court of forty stoles, who were being magically compelled.

They thought Maurice was on 'their' side, (for a given value of 'their side').

He wasn't the target of the holy-water, he was collateral damage.

Liliet

They thought Mauricius was an ally and everyone else was controlled, while it was the other way around.

shikkarasu

So pointedly incorrect it looped back around to being right anyway.

Liliet

Yup!

Shveiran

If the culprit is the screenplay writer, accusing the casting crew is undoubtedly unfounded.

They kicked down the door to throw magic toxin at foreign rulers, for fuck's sake. It's the kind of thing where "close enough" shouldn't cut it!

Cheetah724

Technically, they kicked down the door to throw holy water at foreign rulers, for fuck's sake.

jamesc9

So it's only a magical toxin for devils and the possessed parts of people, who (presumably) are banned from being there, under the laws of Mercantis. So they were (sort-of) doing vigilante justice.

kinghaart

I mean... Heroes.

That's the M.O. if the majority of the ones we've met!

Cpt. Obvious

Right now the rulers of Mercantis are a bit shaken that they were made to do the Towers dirty work without receiving monetary compensation. So for the moment this band of five are left mostly to their own devices. But any moment someone will realize that the indiscriminate use of holy water resulted in the destruction of incredibly expensive, probably irreplaceable enchantments and curses that were placed on different personal effects and belongings of the distinguished persons who were unlawfully assaulted by these foreigners.

Now as they are not only foreigners unaware of the severity of their crimes, but also by sheer luck happened to uncover a most unsettling attempt to manipulate the free market in Mercantis it has been decided that some leniency is warranted. As such all charges will be dropped if each of them just repay the full value of the destroyed enchantments and curses. Should they be unable to pay the full amount owed a payment plan is available at the low interest rate rate of 5% a week or they may have their debt bought out in exchange for signing a standard contract of indenture. And don't worry about not being able to pay it off. If tragedy would strike and a indentured servant would die before paying off the contract it is by law inherited by closest kin.

Liliet

I mean, the reason they were wrong is that Malicia's puppet's actions were remarkably and thoroughly idiotic (cementing power even further where it was ALREADY theirs) so they couldn't really find the truth from "who profits".

jtebb2

It's not necessarily idiotic. You have to remember that Malicia is thoroughly under the impression that evil is perpetually screwed by fate. Thus the only way to win is to work around fate rather than fight it. Dramatically significant dark secrets will be revealed, so one possible way to get around that is to make sure that, after the reveal, her puppet can keep control of the city through direct control of the armed forces.

Another possible interpretation, and more likely explanation, is that this is Malicia's fatal flaw tripping her up again. Her need for absolute control is what has cost her everything so far. She can't leave anything to chance, everything must be under her control directly or covered by her contingencies. That's why she can't tolerate any equals or accept any outcome that takes power out of her hands. It's cost her the best friend she ever had, it's given her the worst enemy she'll ever have, it's steadily tearing apart all of the progress she's made in reforming Praes.

Bellaco

Not gonna lie, after what happened, one could argue that Evil is indeed screwed by fate.

Liliet

Yeah, the fatal flaw of a need of absolute control is what I'm seeing. I'm not saying Malicia is stupid, just – yeah.

nostoneuntuned11

Except that their plot was unraveled by Malicia's own orders to consolidate power. The simple fact is that these complicated plots don't even need providence to fall apart. There was no reason to be as overt as they were in taking over the companies given they already had power. The fact that the companies were being bought up implies a coup from either the current holder for more power, or for a change in hands. Either way only Praes could really benefit from it. Once that happens it really isn't that big of a stretch for an attempt to expose it. And honestly it was just sloppy to use a devil given how they can be exposed. She got too clever for her own good, like most of her schemes. For example, if Malicia hadn't done the Night of Knives, she actually could negotiate with Catherine. But she burned that bridge. Sure she couldn't predict her rise in influence and the Drow, but there are always unknowns. You need to leave room for those unknowns. She is focused too much on a balance when a single unknown can throw the whole thing out of balance.

Sir Nil

And another army joins the war.

Sunday

Absolutely wonderful chapter, the world is CHANGING

Xinci

Well, Kairos said it pretty well, Fates a tug of war. I am rather curious about how the cultures of Helike, Stygia, Nicae, and possibly Mercantis will meld together as it becomes an empire. May take a while for Hierarchy to either be broken or break out of his contest with Judgement if he is indeed given continual observations as such due to the vote Basilea achieved

zenanii

My current theory is that Bard will arrange for Hierarchy getting deposed after the grand alliance have committed to the judgement angel corpse weapon plan, so I very much doubt we will see him return any time soon.

ninegardens

CAN you depose a Hierarchy.

And even if she deposes him... I don't THINK his name will care. His title isn't the conviction driving Anaraxes, even if he lost it, he is still the madman that Kairos fell in love with.

TeK

Better romance there never were...

Insanenoodlyguy

Won't happen. Remember, the Hiearch wants to be disposed. He would be happy to tell you he never should've been given the title in the first place, he was supposed to be executed for crimes against the people! Which means he's pretty much invincible to that avenue of attack. I do agree he's not returning anytime soon, but his whole creation was crafted such that the bard can't fuck with him.

jamesc9

Because she can't help someone to do what they want?

Insanenoodlyguy

In this case? Absolutely not. Not the story. He got his job while not wanting it the whole way. He got his name while not wanting it the whole way. That kind of story can't be broken by him trying to get out of it. He's been trying to get out of it every time we saw him, or at least refusing to acknowledge it. That only made him stronger. Deposing him wouldn't work, because his deposition would not come from the will of the people, but from outside influence of an insidious foreign power, making it an invalid. For all that he hates his roll his madness and his embodiment of his peoples ideals means he will express their righteous fury over those that would control them, be it even the celestials. He made Bard fuck off just with words. Unless Glorious Bellaphoran does it all by themselves, he's near invincible. And his utter lack of desire for his name or position, in his story, make him unequivocally qualified.

kinghaart

Maybe if Bard was put into the body of A Bellephronian she might have a chance, but I think even she knows not to mess with that kind of crazy.

Myles

But he could lose his Name Powers

Insanenoodlyguy

Again story trends. He doesn't WANT his powers. That means Hes not going to lose them without serious character development or some dramatic named moment of the kind Bard can't give him.

nick012000

And so the last of Malicia's schemes outside of Praes crumble into dust.

Reader in the Night

Which is fucking dangerous. Providence is conspiring to corner Malicia, and a Villain is never as dangerous as when they are cornered.

Malicia is sitting on a Tower-full of doomsday weaponry, and she won't go quietly into the night. It really looks like the Age of Wonders is coming to an end, and the Tower of Praes is one of the last true Wonders standing.

dadycoool

Everything seems to be pointed to Ater at the moment. The way is clear for Cat, Black is herding the people he wants dead there, and there Malicia sits, Empress upon her Tower, ready to unleash untold horrors in one glorious Last Stand. Not only that, but every time Cat has stood on a precipice, her gut has told her either "not enough" or "not yet". There is no Precipice greater than the spire of the Tower, and old-style Villains have a dangerous habit of tossing their enemies off of those type of balconies, only for the fall to unlock "More power than they can possibly imagine."

aurikdomi

seems vaguely heroic gaining your powers after defeat by being thrown of the metaphorical or literal cliff

kinghaart

Seems like this might be Bard's play. She doesn't need Malicia to win, just to take Cat down with her.

siva chandra

A tower full of doomsday weaponry... Just within range of a madman with tons of goblinfire.

kaldurak

Yes, but what happens when a Villain is cornered by an even nastier Villain?

I'm looking forward to the answer!!!

Adrian_V

Or Black will burn it all down with goblin fire

Frivolous

Reader in the Night: I think at this point Malicia is actually in more danger from her Praesi subjects than she is from Catherine and her army, or even Amadeus and Ranger.

Rationale: Malicia's Rule aspect is crippled. Her ability to control others by Speaking is weaker.

She summoned her subjects to the Tower for a party expecting to be in full control, but then Catherine and Juniper and the Painted Knife's band of five intervened and wrecked too many of her schemes.

She's gonna be in a Tower full of ambitious Praesi who will think she screwed up. Nim might be there, too, and Akua Sahelian.

Iron sharpens iron, etc.

agumentic

Malicia spent half a century running circles Praesi nobles with tremendous success. If there's one thing I trust her to do well and mould to her control, it's this.

Frivolous

nick012000: I wonder how much of what happened in Mercantis, and thus its consequences for Basilia and the League of Free Cities, can be attributed to Catherine crippling Malicia's aspect of Rule.

Rationale: The Painted Knife's band of five detected the plot of the fake Merchant Prince only because he'd been doing relatively obvious things like killing mercenary captains and consolidating power to defend against a coup.

But those seem to be relatively recent actions. I suspect they were done -after- Malicia's Rule aspect was crippled, and thus the actions were a response to that, a hedge against the Forty-Stole Court suddenly losing interest in doing Malicia's bidding, because Malicia stopped being quite so charismatic.

So the attempt to keep the fake Merchant Prince in power resulted in his unmasking.

What do you all think?

agumentic

Nah, I think this is just the obvious outcome of putting a villainous plot with shapeshifting devils against a (mostly) heroic Band of 5. Malicia would be consolidating power with or without Cat, controlling as much as possible is her tragic flaw, and the rest is just Providence.

Insanenoodlyguy

So far it seems that they can successfully ride both sets of troupes. As long as they have a consensus on actual goals, that will probably remain the case.

Itarion

The Merchant Prince wasn't being controlled by Rule, as Malicia had a policy of not using the aspect on Named. Instead, he was murdered and replaced with a devil wearing his skin.

Albert Wen

Was Merchant Prince a Name? I thought it was just a title, like First Prince. You can see it in the way it peacefully and consistently transitions from one person to another, rather than popping up at random like Kingfisher Prince.

Insanenoodlyguy

When she killed him, she even commented on it more or less "huh. Your title is becoming a Name. Whelp, good thing I was already nipping this bud.

Earl of Purple

We've got WoE that it's been a Name before, but isn't always. I can't recall which side of the line it falls on, but with the War Against Keter raging now is the time for all nations that get Named leaders to have one, because Calernia hangs in the balance.

ninegardens

Yay yay Basilia.

She is, as always, mighty cool... I wonder what her Name will be? Hell, is she going to just straight up codify a name as "Defender of the free cities"? If so... probably it will be a weak name? A grove not yet dug deep?

Or maybe all names are powerful, and that itself is a pattern.

Ironically, I can't help but think that this is what Bard was aiming to do 1000 years ago when she made the league, and created the first Hierarch... though if the current events are any of her doing, or wholly unrelated, who knows.

Liliet

A groove can be new and still powerful, that just has steeper initial requirements to get started (like how Cat's been a claimant for several years)

kinghaart

Warden of the South seems possible.

I don't really buy the Warden theories though, at least I don't think they will fix things enough to satisfy Cat. Also leaves out the Levantines.

dadycoool

The awkward moment of "Wait, were we wrong?" when the holy water was released was hilarious. So was the whole process Basilia had to go through to call for a vote from the People. I'm sure she was right, that the shiver in Creation was Kairos laughing his ass off at her antics, picking at and burning the corpse of the old Age, looking for materials for the new one.

Liliet

The Bellerophon vote part was my favorite one.

Shveiran

Honestly, whenever they are on screen they make me feel... unclear? I know they are supposed to make us laugh, but everything Bellerophonian just makes me ill at ease.

Evgeny Permyakov

Well, they are mockery of sacred democratic traditions of the West, are not they?

dadycoool

Mockery, or taken to its farthest conclusion? When literally everyone has an equal voice, this kind of madness is what results. It's why America is a Democratic Republic instead of a true Democracy, which is in fact Mob Rule.

Evgeny Permyakov

> It's why America is a Democratic Republic instead of a true Democracy, which is in fact Mob Rule.

There is a nice episode in Adam Ruins Everything show about US democracy. You might be interested in it.

>Mockery, or taken to its farthest conclusion?

I dunno, 'farthest conclusion' is a good way to make a mockery.

Miles.

Nah the madness stems from the constant threat of execution by serial-mind-rapist.

It's not democracy taken to an extreme but post-Orwellian Fascism.

AbraKadabra

Maybe it was inteded to be. But today? The US is an oligarchy. And, since almost every country on Earth copies the US, all of them are oligarchies.

TeK

Arrogant of you to assume people can't find brand new ways to make an oligarchy.

AbraKadabra

Eh, copying is a thing. Like lobbying become legal, half the world legalized it in some form right after.

Christian Oaks

Its more of a managerial society i think.

Shveiran

Them being a mockery doesn't concern me.
It's their forcing me to look at the systemic flaws in our own system that makes me quesy.

Miles

I always thought they ignored the biggest systemic flaw, at least in the US take on democracy.

The opinions of large crowds of people can be bought and controlled in so many ways by just using money.

TeK

Not if money are too a subject of the Vote By The People. If one person has more wealth than 51% of the population, it's far easier to just vote this wealth be redistributed back to the People. The foundation of this systemic flaw is the idea of merit and private property, both of which are neatly countered by the Superiour Bellerophonian Democracy. Thus, Bellerophon is much closer to communism than so called "western democracies". It's democracy like it was in Athens, not anything like the modern mutated abomination.

Liliet

That was my initial reaction to them too, but with how they've been getting treated by the narrative ever since, I've come around on liking them as a narrative device one hell of a lot.

lordcirth

It's because they are so damn close. They have an actual democracy, they will tolerate no hierarchy, their people and leaders are fanatically incorruptible – but they have fallen prey to the tyranny of the majority rather than true freedom. It's like the uncanny valley of countries.

TeK

Or a reminder that "true freedom" is utterly nonsensical if applied to reality.

irritantseraphim

Yeeeeees.

Bellerophon is so gloriously mad in its entirety, I love it. I would give a lot for more chapters dealing with this people of utterly deranged men and women.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Forty-Sole > Forty-Stole
her mastered > he mastered almost when to > almost went to fortresses, stood without allies and > fortresses and stood without allies, and a surmountable > an insurmountable every being > ever being no pretend > no pretence of seventh > of the seventh were negotiation > were negotiating follow in footsteps > follow in the footsteps defence if its > defence of its at finish > at least finish are trick > are a trick in power > in my power until the votes were counted > for the votes to be counted

Reader in the Night

Noticing a pattern here:

The Fairfaxes of Callow are dead; the Tower is about to be brought down; The Dominion of Levant had their ruling dynasty turned to dust; Procer is basically on its last spasms; and now the Free Cities are about to undergo a huge change and possibly become a federation. All of this in the process of taking down the longest-reigning monarch on Calernia, the King of the Dead.

The only real power left is the Titanomachy, and really, the narrative of 'a Dying Race of Big-Good Giants with Powerful Magic Cast from Lifespan Doing a Last Sacrifice to Defeat the Big Bad' writes itself.

By the time the Uncivil Wars are closed, the entire political face of the Calernian continent will be different.

Someguy

You forget the Rats. The Rats are still a seasonal problem.

agumentic

Not much of a political face there.

Liliet

Only until the drow get to them, it sounds like.

It won't be QUITE the feeding frenzy it would have been before the Night was Ruined, but the situation will still be HELLA different.

Insanenoodlyguy

I could see them showing up to discover the rats are now all undead, but it'd accomplish the same thing of the rats no longer being a constant.

irritantseraphim

That would be sick, but I don't see it happening, as nothing so far has alluded to it. Not a single undead rat (except for the Named Horned Lord The Skein) has been sighted in the entire War against Keter.

I think the Chain of Hunger will either stay a seasonal issue used to bloody new recruits and the way the Lycaonese harden their people, or the Ratlings will be utterly wiped out or massively decimated by the Drow (or the Grand Alliance).

aurikdomi

I think vermin waves were mentioned somewhere

kinghaart

Ratlings are humanoid though, not traditional vermin.

Sparsebeard

So in the end, the rats eat the world. Hmm, I wonder where I heard that before...

dadycoool

I always figured the Rats would basically be the food that runs into the Drow's open mouths. When their placement was revealed, it sounded like the Drow were all like "Oh, sweet! Free darkness!"

hakureireimu

What about the elves.

agumentic

They are making a play for the Crown of Spring, which, whether it'll backfire or succeed, will change their political disposition.

Passenger

Don't forget the Gnomes! We haven't seen anything about them in a long, long time.

agumentic

Gnomes are not a part of Calernia and there's no indication they will play any role in the story.

kinghaart

Maybe they meant the Dwarves, they may change too?

Insanenoodlyguy

The Tyrant always went for melodrama, but he wasn't joking. He murdered the age.

Casey Glick

I think with Cordelia's reforms, Procer is probably closer to being a true Federation than ever before. The people have way more freedoms against the nobles, the First Prince is stronger, but the Groove being cut is that she is fanatically bound to help Procer and its people, rather than herself. She let Rhenia fall because she couldn't spare the resources, for example, and she is more than willing to be hanged at the end of the war. The Assembly has had a lot of corruption fairly aggressively purged, as well as the House of Light.

I would not be shocked if Procer becomes something closer to a true republican democracy. Or at the very least, with the fall of so many nobles, there is likely to start being some democratic electors.

I think when Rosala takes her place, Rosala will continue the consolidation and reforms. More, she will absolutely not be interested in returning to conflict with either Callow or the Dominion, because she has grown too much as well for that petty bullshit.

In all, Procer is not the same country as it was at the start of PGTE, when it was in civil war because of Malicia's prodding and their own idiotic divisions.

kinghaart

It's not the same, though I bet plenty of those in the south will vie to return to the "glorious civil war days before the Northener made us have to act like responsible adults". Hm...

Miles

The Fairfaxes are dead but the noble house of Foundling has consolidated its base of power quite well.

So much so I suspect they may just be handed rule of the entire continent, except the drow and elf regions, if they're only willing to receive the land.

mamm0nn

Malicia is sulking in the corner.

What's wrong, my lady?

Malicia: I had this great plan, of propping a pro-Praes successor to the Merchant Prince and making him anti-Praes kinda, to make it seem like he was not in my pocket for everyone but maybe Cat to be fooled by. It was foolproof!

You forgot to account for 'Heroic' splash damage and collateral?

Malicia sulks more Stupid heroes. We never just blow up a whole bunch of important people in our ploys. Servants and minions, sure, but no Praesi would've caught a fellow High Lord or even a foreign figure like the Merchant Prince in our schemes. Not unless it was intentional, of course. We don't flounder around like that. But those stupid heroes just throw around their powers wildly and it somehow works without making everyone hate them.

Burlyraven

I was just wondering how this band of five was getting along. Stumbling around into the right answers and being congenial edgelords is pretty solid.

leoturite

first mention of Basilia Family name i believe. I wonder if she just choose one right now or if she was only using her first name as props for Tyrant or something like that letouriste

how exactly Letouriste got changed in that monstrosity? haha

Evgeny Permyakov

>The word shivered in approval and somehow she knew that, somewhere down Below, Kairos Theodosian was laughing.

Ah, I miss the little shit. He was glorious.

irritantseraphim

Kairos was an unbelievably mad madman and I loved him for that.

One can only wonder how much of what just transpired came from the plans that little shit had made and foreseen...

Some Smartass

Yeah, but it'd have gotten old real fast if he didn't have to deal with consequences, and he just wouldn't be him if he cared more about avoiding pissing people off to the point of successful murder than being awesome.

Evgeny Permyakov

Oh, I understand. They guy didn't care about his life as long as his actions left a lasting mark on the world, and went down ensuring so. Doesn't make him any less entertaining for us, the readers.

kinghaart

Was so we'll written. I have never really had much sympathy for Akua given Liesse and her Hubris (which isn't too say she has a badly written or uninteresting story, quite the opposite), but Kairos had more believable moments of vulnerability to me, E.g. When the Skein taunted him about Wishing his life away.

I hated him so much at third Liesse but by the end of the book I felt... Not really sympathy, but more like the Pratchettian "oh, well, that's OK then."

aurikdomi

we all do I think

Earl of Purple

Yay, Angelique is back. Best cuddly murder aunt. And she played an important part in unmasking the devil, too.

And I think Malicia is no longer the only Named Empress on Calernia. Empress of Aenia, perhaps. I wonder if she really did eat those fortune teller's hearts, or was it eyes? The ones Cat heard in rumour last book.

Two dozen snakes

I don't quite get what the conclusions kallia's band made were... did they think malicia was puppeteering a bunch of merchants and the prince's plan was to use mercs loyal to him to, what, free those merchants from malicia's control? And then cede control over the mercs back to the city proper?

Love the free cities part, bellerophon as always steals the show

sengachi

They thought the Prince was aware that Malicia was going to use mind control and/or possession to depose him. They thought to protect himself from this he was securing personal loyalty from Mercantis' mercenaries so as to be able to keep his position anyway, banking on being able to reverse the mind control / possession afterward to avoid the backlash of using mercenaries to override his own deposition. And in fact, freeing them in this turnaround would ensure their gratitude to him while establishing a very powerful precedent for his use of the mercenaries.

The band of five thought he wasn't telling them about this supposed Praesi plot because he had it in hand and was planning to ride the gratitude wave. They figured they might as well steal the gratitude wave out from under him though and beat him to beating the hypothetical possessions.

What was actually happening though is that Malicia is a control freak. She wasn't comfortable negotiating with the leader of Mercantis, she needed to own them (as a devil). And she wasn't comfortable with the typical Mercantis mercenary arrangements which worked well enough, but were not technically directly beholden to her puppet. So she overplayed her hand replacing the mercenary leaders with people either more directly loyal to her puppet or Ruled by her directly. By performing this unnecessary consolidation of power, she alerted the band to an active power play they could investigate. They came to the wrong conclusions because they assumed the leader of Mercantis was acting rationally, when really he was making irrational moves on the behalf of someone with serious control issues. But nonetheless, providence plus a thread to pull on was enough to undo Malicia's influence.

Liliet

YEP

> They came to the wrong conclusions because they assumed the leader of Mercantis was acting rationally, when really he was making irrational moves on the behalf of someone with serious control issues

PRETTY MUCH THIS

Abnaxis

Would you look at that... we have the makings of a Warden of the South.

Akua in the North, Hakram in the East, Hanno in the West, and Basilia in the South. One Warden for each cardinal and Catherine Named above them all to manage them from the city of Cardinal.

magesbe

I'm not sure where you're getting Hakram and the East part. Yeah he's negotiating with the orc clans, but that seems like a rather weak justification for thinking he'll be the warden for the entire East. I feel like Catherine is a far more obvious choice for that role, considering she basically said on screen that was what she was doing.

Abnaxis

Catherine is most definitely NOT that rule. Whatever her name is, her authority extends beyond Praes and beyond villians—when she has Spoken she's been able to affect both Hanno and Tariq, neither of which have any reason to fall under her authority (which is required for Speaking to succeed on powerful individuals) if her nascent name is a Warden of the East.

I think it's going to be Hakram because the upcoming conflict is going to completely destroy the current ruling class of Praes as the Tower burns with the Praes aristocracy inside—a unified Steppes will be the most consolidated power bloc to be able to step into the vacuum that leaves. Plus, Hakram's personality very much fits into a Warden archetype

matesbe

Hakram's personality doesn't fit a Warden archetype; he is the Adjutant; Catherine's second; her go to man for all sorts of tasks both small and large. If anything it'd be weird for him to suddenly stop and become Warden of the East.

Abnaxis

ALL of the Wardens are effectively Cat's "second" according to me theory. They're her lieutenants responsible for their respective realms that she manages from her seat in Cardinal (which I mean cmon, having a city called Cardinal that rules over East, West, North, and South is just TOO on-the-nose to not be a thing...)

Miles

The warden hypothesis has been so thoroughly debunked that we're facing a serious lumber shortage right now.

Stop trying to make more bunks for it, it's not gonna happen.

Darkening

Sadly, Cat declaring herself warden of the east has thrown so much fuel on that fire it's not burning out anytime soon.

Insanenoodlyguy

If anything Hakram will become Warlord. Cat won't be warden of the east though. Warden of the East couldn't use the voice the way she did outside of the east on named not from the east.

onedollargum

I love how maniacally ocd the Republic of Bellerephon continues to be. They're a machine composed of people.

irritantseraphim

It's not OCD at all, in my opinion.

They are all just utterly mad, a “democratic” autocracy of the people, cluttered with millennia of weird laws and rules.

Utterly mad and even more glorious for that madness.

Hail to the Glorious Republic of Bellerophon, May She Rule Forever.

Abrakadabra

It was my favourite part too. There is just no bigger Tyrant than the Dead King. Being his flesh puppet forever must be the biggest oppression and violation against freedom. A Tyrant that never dies.

So it was good seeing them making some vote on the issue, also hilarious.

308924810a

It's odd that Malicia's largest impact on history might ending being her coining the phrase 'age of wonders'.

308924810a

Might end up being

TeK

She did not coin the term. She did, however, in the fit of maddened irony wrote a thesis called “The Death of Age of Wonders” while being the last holdout of the same.

Darkening

Y'know, I'd be really interested in a 'center' interlude or something to show the attitudes back in callow during all this, but I don't know if there's a single existing character still alive that's currently in callow to be the viewpoint. The northern barons I guess, but they're barely characters. Hm

kinghaart

Duchess Keegan?

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I would read a whole god damn book about Basilia, protector of the free cities.

mindsword2

Mauricius was the merchant prince that betrayed Malicia back in the Ebb Interlude. Him being replaced by a Devil probably was seen as a way to remove the dangerous element while preparing the way for the puppet Malicia would want up there.

Frivolous

I think it's funny that Bellerophon decided Neshamah was an Egregious Millennial Despot aka a Millennial.

It's funny in the context of modern lingo anyway.

Bart_KF

Has anyone else commented on the fact that everyone in Bellerophon has a shared capital-letter title ("the People") and series of established behaviors (voting on everything, drawing decisions out through bureaucracy, being afraid of their unelected rulers despite being founded on opposition to tyrants) that are firmly shared across the entire population because of their requirement to swap jobs at random?

I have to wonder if the whole damn city is in a position to stumble backwards into a Name and Role the same way Anaxares did. After all, everyone knows what The People are like, just like everyone knows what to expect from a Warlock or a White Knight...

Interlude: North II

"Twenty years will blend friend and foe."

– Taghreb saying

Hakram Deadhand stood in a shadowed corner of the tent as his allies raucously argued, watching them in silence. The leaders of the dominant clans of the alliance, the Howling Wolves and the Red Shields, were trading the usual insults and boasts with the representatives of their allied clans. Dag Clawtoe and Oghuz the Lamé towered above all others in that conversation, as had been the case from the start. Their clans were the largest and wealthiest, their deeds the greatest – in Oghuz's case, anyway. Juniper's father had been a famous champion for the Red Shields before his leg wound. Dag instead must rely on lesser deeds and the reputation of the cousin that'd overshadowed him all his life.

He was only the jemmek of the Howling Wolves, the camp-leader, even though Grem One-Eye had not returned to the Steppes in decades.

Adjutant did wade into the talks. He preferred not to. The moment to speak would come when the tent was empty and it was only he and Catherine, when he could complete her vision with what he'd seen and she hadn't by virtue of not being so close to it all. Detachment had been in Hakram's blood since he was but a boy but he'd made his peace with the feeling. Found the uses in having blood that rarely went red. Calm was what let you see with clarity and tonight, calmly looking at the alliance in this tent, what Adjutant saw was a losing proposition. The conversation was going through familiar, pointless circles.

It would take more than champions and challenges to cut into Troke Snaketooth's support. It was attacking the symptom instead of the sickness: Troke was not popular because he had many champions, he had many champions because he was popular. The chieftain of the Blackspears was growing more powerful by the day, and the longer the conversation went on the more Hakram realized that none of them had any idea of what to do about it. It was not that they were fools, or dim, but that they'd never had to deal with being this position before. The Blackspears had a foul reputation, while the Howling Wolves and the Red Shields had been held in high honour for decades.

They were still popular even now, but the ground was shifting under their feet. Hakram thought that under all the boasts and shouts he might be hearing a thread of disquiet. They could feel it too, the wind turning against them.

There was no point in staying here, Adjutant realized. No solution to be found in this tent, only the same conversation had in one of a hundred different ways. Yet he was not discouraged, for Hakram Deadhand had already figured out where he would find his answer. Adjutant was one of the Woe, and so he knew that one could learn from enemies as well as allies. Still silent, he slipped out of the tent and into the muddy grounds of the great camp surrounding the fortress of Chagoro. Not too long ago, Hakram had received an invitation by Sigvin of the Split Tree Clan to begin private talks with the Blackspears in Callow's name.

He still held no intention of accepting that invitation, but it brought something to mind: the Split Tree Clan itself.

As early as the delegations that'd been sent to Wolof he'd thought that alliance strange. The Blackspears had a reputation as feckless liars, while the Split Tree were known instead as cleaving close to old ways. They were known for their shamans, many of which could use magic, and for being willing to serve as mediators in the disputes of others. They were not a large clan, though, or one known for its warriors. So Hakram had assumed the alliance with the Blackspears to be a marriage of convenience: they were large and powerful but of poor repute and without a speck of magic to call on. The weaknesses of the Blackspears would make the Split Tree influential over them, difficult to dislodge even after Troke Snaketooth took power.

Except something didn't fit in that story. Adjutant hadn't noticed it the last time he'd gone to the edge of the territory claimed by the Split Tree Clan, but now that he knew what to look for it was hard to miss. Troke Snaketooth had been showering his allies and servants in wealth so that the display might attract others to his banner, but there was no trace of that wealth in the Split Tree camp. No herds of sheep put to roast, no great barrels of aragh and batak freed to flow, no baskets full of pottery and ivory and furs. No thick rings of gold and jewelled earrings. The Split Tree Clan was the most important ally to a wealthy chief on the rise, but it was not visibly gaining from that position. So what was it getting paid in, power? That was not enough.

Power might satisfy the chief and his closest circle, but a clan was more than these. They would see their friends and allies growing wealthy while they did not and there would be rumbles of discontent. So what was it that the Split Tree were getting? Hakram's instincts told him that behind that truth lay the key to the alliance around the Blackspears, the key to understanding his foe. Perhaps even the key to turning this around. Unwilling to simply retreat after having come all this way, Hakram wandered off to the closest marketplace and bought a few skewers of horse before returning to lean against the tall post marking the edge of the Split Tree grounds. He'd been seen from the start, so he was not surprised when someone came out to meet him.

Or who it was that'd been sent. Sigvin wore one of those tunics showing a generous eyeful of her scarred shoulders, which a thick braid only drew attention to, but this time Hakram's gaze did not stray. The calm was on him, the itch to understand what made something work. The same part of him that'd made a game about stacking stones to see how people would play it.

"If it's my tent you're looking for, Hakram, you'll have to offer me a drink first," Sigvin said, flashing her fangs flirtatiously. "And maybe tell me about Keter, since tales insist you've been there."

The tall orc did not answer, continuing to look at her clan's camp as he finished the last bits of his meat and tossed the skewers aside.

"Adjutant, then," Sigvin mused, tone changing.

Hakram inclined his head to the side in agreement.

"You would have gone into the camp if you meant to accept Troke's invitation to talk," she continued, humming in interest. "So what is it that does bring you here, Deadhand?"

He had half a dozen lies ready, but what would be the point? What he wanted here was nothing for them to fear. Nothing they would not want to give him.

"I want to understand what the Split Tree gets from this," Adjutant said. "Why this alliance, why now? Why are you so tightly bound to a clan you wouldn't have looked at twice a decade ago?"

Sigvin did not look reluctant or cautious but pleased. He'd thought she might. And why wouldn't she, when for the first time since Hakram had come to Chagoro he was trying to understand her clan instead of stepping over it?

"The answer is in your question, Hakram Deadhand," Sigvin said. "A decade ago. Give or take a few years, that's how long you've been gone isn't it? Since you took to the Legions."

"Give or take a few years," Hakram agreed.

"The first of our kind Named in centuries," Sigvin said. "And you never even came back to the Steppes."

There'd been a lot of that talk when he first came here, especially as an envoy of Callow, but it'd died out after the first few crushing victories in duels. It wasn't his people's way to question strength.

"I wouldn't be Named if I had," Adjutant bluntly replied. "I found my path far from here and it did not lead back until now."

And, for all that it had cost him and might yet, he did not regret it.

"An even more damning answer," Sigvin replied just as bluntly. "You don't see it because you were of the Howling Wolves and then a soldier far away, but we are not so blind: the Legions of Terror are eating the Clans, bit by bit."

Hakram felt like scoffing but restrained himself. It was obvious she believed every word and Adjutant believed Sigvin to be an intelligent woman. She would have a reason to believe this.

"The Legions are making the Clans richer," he replied instead, "and without the need to fight each other for that wealth. Our people return home with learning and allies. We have more influence in the affairs of the Tower than we've had in centuries because of the same ties you condemn."

She shook her head.

"It's the wrong sort of wealth, Adjutant," Sigvin said. "It's imperial coin, which we use to trade with them instead of each other. Our people come back using the Praesi system of measurement, building forges the goblin way, organizing warriors in companies instead of warbands. It's hollowed out your own clan without Dag Clawtoe realizing it. The Howling Wolves don't war for cattle and land anymore, they send their youths south and wait for the gold to return with them. Only gold's not all that comes back. They began training their youngbloods in Legion drills a few years back, did you know? To give their youths an edge when they send them south to enrol."

Sigvin paused, strong face twisted in disgust.

"Not if," she said, "but when."

There was much he could answer to that. Praesi measurements were superior in almost every regard to those used by learned orcs and them alone – horns and fingers – while goblins were the finest metalworkers on Calernia and warbands were unfit for anything but raiding as a military formation. It would have been easy to dismiss her words as that of someone from the old order, afraid of change even when that change was for the better. Except Sigvin was not a fool. So he looked at the camp of the Split Trees again with fresh eyes. Hide tents, but it was rare for a tent to be made all of the same hides. Different hunting grounds, trade with other clans. And on the people the jewelry was of many styles, be it thick torcs of the eastern steppes, the silver piercings from the headwater clans or the looping earrings of the south.

The Split Tree Clan was traditionalist, Hakram had known that, but he'd not truly considered what that would mean.

Their wealth, their gains, were made in the traditional mould of orc clans since the founding of the Empire. To the Split Tree, wealth was something temporary. Won when the clan claimed good riverside land for a season and pottery could be made from clay, when good grazing lands allowed the clan to stay long enough for smithies to be raised and weapons of quality forged. Surplus was traded to other clans to fill needs, and when the clan was in a strong position it went raiding – either other orcs or humans. That stolen wealth was brought back and used to strengthen the clan, sometimes even to absorb smaller neighbours. If things went well for a few years, the clan grew.

Clans too large were unsustainable, so the largest ones would then split into two and head different ways.

It was a rough way of life, but it had worked. The harshness of the Steppes culled the weak but it also ensured that there could never be a kingly clan standing above all others: hunger bit victors just as deep as the vanquished. As a closed circle, the old ways of the Steppes really did work. Only now the circle was no longer closed. The Legions since the Reforms were not the same as the armies of the old tyrants, which had once a reign drafted orcs by the hundreds of thousands for a campaign and then sent them back to the Steppes after the war. The modern Legions kept orcs for decades, taught them Praesi ways and enriched them before sending them home.

And Hakram Deadhand had seen this same machine at work before.

"The Carrion Lord really is a magnificent bastard," he admitted. "I had little sympathy with the moaning of Callowans when his works were improving so many of their lives, but I understand a little better now."

Sigvin frowned.

"I don't follow," she said.

"You think what you've found is a coincidence, then," Adjutant mused. "That's understandable, as you never saw the same unfold out west. But this is happening on purpose, Sigvin."

Because that was the Carrion Lord's way. The Clans could not truly be a part of a stable Praes as they were, so the man had set to smothering the aspects of orc culture that weren't compatible with the Dread Empire he envisioned: the raiding, the nomadism, the factionalism. And as was typical of that particular monster, he'd gone about it through a method that the people being changed would not fight because it benefitted them. Because Sigvin was right to see the Clans being made dependent on the south, being bound tighter, but she was missing something: most orcs were better off this way. It was why the Legions and the Carrion Lord remained wildly popular in the Steppes to this day.

The Legions introduced wealth from the outside instead of the same limited wealth being competed over by clans, which meant that the Clans could actually grow now. And the way to bring home that gold was war, which Hakram's people loved, and it just so happened that it drained the Steppes out of the same youngbloods who'd be pushing for raids and fighting between clans. And it was a form of war that required training, which took time, so why shouldn't clans move less? They could afford to now that they were wealthier, anyway. Which they would remain, so long as they kept sending warriors to the Legions. Then once those soldiers returned home, having fought side by side with each other and humans, they found that fighting with the Clans and the rest of the Empire lost its allure.

How many of your old army friends would you have to kill so you could steal cattle worth less than a few months of Legion pay?

Hakram sighed. This wasn't Malicia's work. It was not the Empress' way to change a system when she already mastered it. Yet she'd likely recognized the trend and was not against reversing it, because orcs truly integrated into Praes were yet another power block she must handle. One that espoused military virtues she distinctly lacked, to boot. Shortly before the Liesse Rebellion, Malicia had forced the Clans to pay the tributes they'd withheld during the reign of Nefarious, which had had the effect of lowering orc enrolment in the Legions. This now seemed less like an isolated incident and more the like the beginning of a comprehensive policy that had just recently received its crowning jewel.

Malicia made lords of the Steppes, Adjutant thought, which seems like bringing us into the fold but is functionally the opposite. Her lords of the Steppes did not hold land. They collected the orcish tributes on behalf of the Tower, which was an additional layer of separation between Praes and the Clans. Gatekeepers of influence who, by the very limitations of their role – duties that would see them despised by other orcs, authority that derived directly from the Tower – could never rise to be a threat to her reign. Now that elegant little twist, the gift that doubled as clipped wings, had Malicia's signature over it. And it explained why the forces behind the Blackspears were so willing to cut a deal with the Dread Empress.

"So when Troke makes cause with Malicia, your clan backs him because he's not just looking to be a lord of the Steppes," Hakram gravelled. "He wants to be the High Lord of the Steppes."

Someone in a position to undo Legion influence, who by virtue of their title could stand between the Clans and the Empire and force a heathy distance. Sigvin bared her fangs at him, openly pleased.

"So you do understand," she said, then slightly bared her neck in a display of vulnerability. "I had feared you might not."

No wonder the Split Tree were good as sown to Troke's side, he thought. Both the Red Shields and the Howling Wolves were heavily tied to the Legions and had no intention of changing that policy considering how it'd paid off for them. As far as the Split Tree Clan was concerned, the alliance behind Hakram was perhaps the sole coalition of clans they could not under any circumstances allow to win. Otherwise the Legions would sink their hooks into all the larger clans and the trend would grow irreversible. Adjutant pushed off from the marking post.

"Leaving already?" Sigvin asked.

"I need to think," Hakram simply said.

About how this could be turned around.

About whether it should.

—

It took time to gather two hundred stones, enough that darkness fell.

At the edge of the great camp that'd risen up around Chagoro, Hakram Deadhand sat alone in the dirt with a bright moon hung high above his head. Before him lay only flatlands of long grass and the distant rising expanse of the Northern Steppes, a horizon of nothingness crowned by cold stars. And just the way he had when he'd been a boy, Hakram stacked stones. Seventy in a pile to the left. A rough estimate of the clans that backed Troke Snaketooth and his Blackspears, the orcs that stood behind the dream of a High Lord of the Steppes. Forty-six in a pile to the right, Dag and Oghuz and old loyalties. The promises of the Conquest, faithfully kept, and hunger for more of the same.

In between the piles stood a sea of undecided clans, smaller alliances that a day's turn could make or break. Orcs with their ear to the wind, waiting to hear how it would turn.

Through this, Hakram had laid out the bare shape of the taratoplu taking place at the fortress of Chagoro. This was the game he had been playing since he came here, promises and sigils and duels. It was the game Troke Snaketooth had been beating him at, would keep beating him at. Hakram did not know the lay of this land the way the Blackspears chieftain did, the friendships and feuds and shared stories that bound the Clans together as a people. Which meant, in truth, that he had been playing the wrong game. So Hakram leaned forward to trace three symbols in the dirt with a finger of bone: a helmet, a skull and a fang.

The helmet he knew best, what it stood for. The clans that had tied themselves to the Legions, to the Reforms, to the empire promised them by the Carrion Lord. The chiefs who wanted to make some camps permanent, kept through all seasons. Only part of the clan would stay at first, for forges and drilling warriors and trade, but it would grow from there. Southern wealth pouring in, ever-closer ties to the empire, old ways abandoned in favour of more practical ones. Clans that heeded this new path would flourish, those that resisted it would wither and die. That path for the Clans had its roots in the alliance under Dag and Oghuz, a tie strong enough that repeated defeats had not shattered their faction.

The skull he'd only begun to understand today. The clans that saw ahead of them a world where the Steppes were swallowed up by the Empire, where orcs forsook Kharsum for Lower Miezana and began singing of emperors instead of warlords. Where the Steppes grew ugly towns like tumours, imperial colonies of greenskin legionaries in the heartlands of the orcs. Those clans wanted disengagement. Ties with the Legions weakened and a unifying leader – be they warlord or high lord – to keep the Tower at bay so the Clans could become as a nation. Because that was what lay behind Sigvin's talk of culture: the Steppes as a kingdom within the Dread Empire.

That path had its roots in the backers of Snake Troketooth, but would not have great loyalty to the man. It had chosen him as a candidate because he could be influenced and served their purposes, not out of any love for the cheiftain

And the last, the fang, was somehow both the simplest and the most complex of the three. It was everyone else, the chiefs and clans who cared nothing for either sort of talk. Hunger had no philosophy, for all that the Wasteland liked to pretend otherwise. The great majority of the clans would follow who promised the best plunder, the most food, who allowed them to settle grudges to their advantage and earn glory in battle. Some of these had gone Troke's way already because he looked like the winner and they wanted to be on the winner's side. There was no vision of the future behind them save a gaping maw biting down on the world, and more orcs thinking this way than the other two put together. It was a path without intent, the Clans remaining as they were and letting Creation pass them by. Walking away from the end of the Age of Wonder, guests in their own world.

These were, Hakram Deadhand thought, the three paths now laid out for the Clans: integration, disengagement, abstention. Only they were all flawed, he thought, and so he turned to address the night.

"You would argue for the helmet, I know," Hakram said. "Even though you refused your own people that fate and crowned Vivienne so she could reforge the broken shards of the Old Kingdom."

Catherine would lean the way of the Legions because the Legions were as much her home as the land she'd bled so much for. It would change the orcs, she might argue, but would it be for the worse? Raiding put the Clans at odds with everyone around them, internal wars weakened them as a people and permanent towns would make life better for tens of thousands of orcs. It would be a greater good than evil, she'd argue.

"But there will be a price," Hakram told the night. "We will become the Duni of the north. Good for fighting and labour but not truly Praesi. We lose everything that we are without becoming equals."

Perhaps in one or two generations if the Reforms held that would become untrue, but that was a roll of the dice. Would the Reforms hold? Even if the Carrion Lord came to rule, as Catherine wanted, would his successors continue his policies? It was betting the fate Clans on trust in a Tower whose steps dripped with the blood of a thousand coups. Hakram's gaze drifted to the left, where another ghost waited for him to argue with. There was not a doubt in his mind that Vivienne Dartwick would be on the side of disengagement, of the skull.

"You'd argue that the Split Tree are right," Hakram said. "That Praes would ruin us and only distance can prevent it. A High Lord of the Steppes would keep away the Tower and let us strengthen ourselves, make our own laws and change on our own terms."

But that, too, was ignoring some truths. Because even Sigvin, who cursed the Legions with her eyes, had not spoken of ending ties with them entirely. Engaging with Praes enriched the Clans in a way that isolation simply could not. Starvation was no longer decided by the year being good or bad, by a raid or a war having gone one way or the other. Already the Clans traded almost as much with humans as they did with each other, by the estimates of the Eyes, and ending that trend would starve and impoverish half the Steppes. The Clans could live without Praes but to grow, to thrive? The Dread Empire was needed.

As for the Praesi, the land the orcs lived in was a heavy hand on the fate of the people.

"I don't believe we would hold, without either war or Praes," Hakram told the night. "We are not Callow, Vivienne. Even at our peak, we were not a nation in the human way of it. We unite against something, someone – or when there is another way to gain aside from eating each other."

How long would the closed kingdom that Sigvin dreamed of truly last once the war ended? How many clans backing Troke would stay loyal, when their bellies were full and their chests filled with plunder and there was nothing left to do but return home to the same old feuds? It was building a tower on sand. And that left only one path, the fang. Burying one's head in the sand, failing to make anything of the great gathering at Chagoro. And so the night could only wear one face: golden eyes and dark skin. Akua Sahelian. Another who now sat at crossroads, the threshold of changes only dimly felt.

"I can break it," the Adjutant said. "The taratoplu. I would only need to raise another two past forty stones to take the wind out of Troke's sails, and I... know that it can be done."

The aspect pulsed in him faintly. Find. If he went looking for the hammers that would bring down this house, he would find them. This he knew, sure as dawn. Hakram could prevent anyone from winning, play on greed and fear and hope. Had he not stood at the side of the uncontested mistress of that method for many years? And it was what he was meant to do, as the Adjutant, if he could not secure the help of the Clans for the Grand Alliance. It was better than letting them side with Malicia. And yet he did not rise.

"What is it like, Sahelian, where you sit?" he asked the night.
"It is cold away from the fire, cold enough madness earns the ring of sense and certainties turn to sand between your fingers?"

Hakram had gotten a taste of what it would be like, losing Catherine. Losing the Woe. Becoming just another of those left behind, buried or forgotten. And while the shard of fear at the heart of that had been put to rest by the Grey Pilgrim as a city died around them, there could be no return to the way things had been afterwards. It was different now because he was different and she was different. Pretending otherwise did neither of them any favours. Now they both knew they could hurt each other in ways they could not, would not forgive.

There was no unlearning that.

"I don't want to ruin them," he admitted. "To give them a nothing-future, to rob them of the pivot everyone else was allowed."

And this was something he wanted for himself. What a small, terrifying truth that was to be echoing so large in his mind. Because Hakram knew that, as much as he would like to blame the ghosts and the night, he was the only one here. And already he knew, deep down, that if he was not satisfied by any of the paths others would lay out for the Clans then there was only one answer left.

He just didn't want to look that truth in the eye.

Instead he looked back at the camp, the torches lighting up the night around the tall Soninke fortress. What did he owe these people, anyway? Hakram had left for the War College and never looked back. Life in the Steppes had left him adrift, a leaf in the wind. It had been a long way from here, from this land of gnawing, that he had found a home. What did ten thousand miles of snow and the poor fools in it matter to him, that he should sacrifice for them? And it would be a sacrifice, he would not delude himself otherwise. He and Catherine had been bound by an oath under moonlight, and it would be the end of that oath. Even if it was taken again, it would not be the same.

So Hakram turned his gaze ahead, finding... nothing. Empty plains as far as the eye could see, bathed in white. The same kind of emptiness he had glimpsed in Scribe after she was cut adrift. He'd wondered, sometimes, if she had been like him from the start. If becoming one of the Calamities had been like someone blew colours into a world of grey, like finally she could taste and hate and want to be someone. Only it'd not been about the Calamities, had it? It'd been about the Carrion Lord, and the Carrion Lord had set her free of his service in an act of loving cruelty. Cat still thought Eudokia would turn on them, but Hakram knew better. No one would risk being scalded like that twice.

And had Hakram not, this very day, boasted in the privacy of his own mind that he knew how to learn from enemies and allies both? The Webweaver had been one and the other, at different times, and ever a warning since they encountered each other in Salia.

"A temple built on a single pillar will fall," Hakram said, quoting an old Miezan proverb.

And he still did not want to ruin his kind. To make them less than they could be. There was a path to chart, he thought. One he could dimly make out in the gloom of the night. A way to take from the empire without being taken, to stand without standing alone. It would be dangerous and delicate, play great powers against each other and raise a banner that could not be easily lowered. But it could be done. Hakram just wished that someone else could do it in his stead. Yet the stones did not lie, he thought, looking down. They never did. In a game of diminishing returns there could be no winner, only shades of defeat.

And if not Hakram, then who?

Moonlight painted the empty plains pale, and the stones at his feet too. Adjutant – no, not that anymore he thought. Perhaps never again. He was not making the choice of that path. Hakram Deadhand rose to his feet, bathed in moonlight, with no one to pull him up. A western breeze rustled across tall grass, a shiver, and old words came to him. The Old Boast, which orcs had once sung blade in hand when the hands and blades were still theirs.

"I made an empire out of nothing

So,

Warring under the summer sun

Rivers ran red, the sky did weep

As I raised a city of clay

To rule men from far away.

But as my glory fades to gray

And rides to me my own red day

Now I know clay does not keep,

And that rivers, both ways they run:

So,

I made an empire out of nothing."

Stillness reigned in his wake. Warlord, the wind whispered against the grass. The poem was an old boast, an old warning. Kingdoms came, kingdoms went and so much for their petty kings. People were never as important as they thought they were.

But if not Hakram, then who?

So he went back to the torches, to the camp.

To the work that needed doing.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Insanenoodlyguy

"I don't believe we would boost, without either reminders or quotes," Hakram told the night. "We are not Worm, Vivienne.

ruduen

After the first Interlude: North, this isn't too surprising. There were certainly signs that Adjunct wasn't fitting, when there were question of what he wanted. There were still a number of doubts hanging in the air.

Now, the question is, how will he follow through?

And it does seem like we're at the point in the story where the Woe are finding their new places in the world. Everybody's struggling to find their place in the new age, and that includes the people trying to carve it out to begin with.

Still, there haven't been signs of Hierophant or Archer attempting to find a new role, and with the cascade of events happening, with the two major combat events on the horizon, and with just the Tower and Amadeus's current stash of goblinfire...

It seems the Climax of Praes and Cat's new name is on the horizon.

Agent J

Well, the Ranger showdown promises character development for Archer if nothing else. With three of the Woe already on their way to new Names, it might just cascade.

Darkening

Four if you count that Vivienne's gonna be Queen instead of Princess at the end of all this.

Liliet

Vivienne doesn't count twice as "one of the Woe"

Darkening

Yeah, I miscounted and then realized right after I posted lol. The lack of edit and delete functions on wordpress is a real bummer.

Agent J

Exactly. She counts as "twice of the Woe", duh.

Liliet

Good point!

hakureireimu

I'd say Hierophant already has his transition from Apprentice, and he already went through his character arc. I don't see Archer transitioning to a new Name since her Name is about her skill rather than her position in a hierarchy.

shikkarasu

The only way I think she would change is if she took up the title Lady of the Lake, which would just about require Ranger to be killed. I think that is a bit of a longshot, but it's the only major change I could see in 'Drani's identity. She's already changed a ton since she joined the Woe -even since the Everdark- and none of it made her any less Archer.

... That said I would love it if Lady of the Lake became a Name some time after Ranger dies. A mentor Role, but more hands on than Grey Pilgrim. An apprentice of the previous Lady all but mandated to transition in the same way that Squires become Knights.

Sinead

I love the idea of 'The Lady of the Lake' becoming a Name. However, this would have to be Archer replacing Ranger as the 'head' of Refuge as sort of a 'Neutral' Cardinal for those Names focused on excellence of a skill for the lack of a better term. However, I think it may refine down to 'The Lady/Lord'. It would mess with Praesi convention around Named though!

I do not know if that works with Archers professed desire to wander. Unless she decides to develop a 'wandering school' that doubles as a retrieval.

If there was a concept of 'mantles' in PGtE (something that reflected the lesser epithets that Named accrue as 'proto Names' that further expand or refines a Named Role), I could see Lady of the Lake (or considering the geography of the Red Vales 'Lady of the Pass' being a mantle that those that followed in sphere of Named similar to Archer could take up as a mentoring Role.

Frivolous

ruduen: Masego's upcoming change is not a new Name. It's apotheosis.

Mental Mouse

I don't know about that – he seems unimpressed with gods. But then, there's a bit of paralellism – the Dead King looked into the void, and found it wanting. Hierophant looked into the inferno, and he did not flinch.

Frivolous

Mental Mouse: Pardon?

As per Kairos Theodosian, Hierophant's greatest Wish is Apotheosis. I'm assuming that hasn't changed.

Or am I forgetting something?

Shveiran

His greatest wish IS apotheosis, but Kairos described Hierophant's concept of it so deeply rooted in High Arcana that no one else could likely understand it.

My personal interpretation of that is that Masego never really moved from the realization that caused his transition: the godhead is a trick of prespective. He doesn't want to "be" a god as much as he wishes to "think" like one. To understand it all and master every single mistery that makes creation tick beyond the surface reality we experience.

Functionally, they are the same thing, which is why it is not incorrect to say he is aiming for aphoteosis. It's just that my understanding is that his actual goal is a little to the side of that.

Frivolous

Shveiran: I think I follow your reasoning and conclusions.

My own thought is we have no idea what Masego will look like after he achieves apotheosis. He might look the same. He might become almost entirely mental, but may create a body from time to time so he can interact with regular people.

Masego's path to apotheosis clearly has very little in common with Neshamah's or Sve Noc's. It's much cleaner, you could say.

It makes me wonder why Neshamah bothered with the death of Keter at all. Sve Noc at least had the excuse that they were trying to save the drow from extinction.

It makes me suspect that Masego is much much smarter than both Neshamah and Sve Noc.

Earl of Purple

Neshamah wasn't trying for apotheosis, I don't think. That was, I believe, a side effect. What he wanted was to be king forever. And he's managed to be king for several millenia, so it's almost worked out for him.

Cpt. Obvious

If I remember correctly there were also a war going on, and his nation were losing badly. They had better mages, but their enemies were more numerous, used more modern tactics, had better trained soldiers or perhaps warriors and finally they used iron weapons and armor while Neshamah's people were still using bronze weapons and armor.

In short, they were being slaughtered and were facing total extermination.

So in a way the ceremony that turned him into the Dead King and killed off all of the country was a last resort. It snatched the victory from the enemy.

Now Serenity is interesting. We know it's a plane of Hell that DK appropriated and turned into something akin to a utopia. The weather is perfect, the earth is rich, there's no sickness, no dangerous animals, no wars or strife. And he populated it with people who have never wanted for anything or have known hardships. They are educated and taught about the many dangers and sources of misery that plague creation.

So they live their lives in Serenity under the guidance of the Dead King being taught from the cradle that he's protecting them from the horrors of creation, and once they reach a certain age their king will raise them as undead to spare them from the hardship of aging and so they can serve him forever. I don't remember if it's been stated what that is, but both 40 and 60 sounds familiar.

Now this sounds perfectly horrible, but for those living in Serenity it's just the way it is. And they know the DK loves them all...

Something we don't know is where he got the first of them from. While it's been said that he fueled the ceremony with the lives of all living in the nation I can't shake the feeling that with the amount of work he put into the creation of Serenity it might just be that he populated it with the remains of his own people.

So did he really do it all just for power, or was it the only way he saw to save something of his people?

Mental Mouse

I had not recalled that.

Liliet

Well, he's not particularly impressed with gods, but he's not all that self-impressed either if you know what I mean. He just wants the thing, he doesn't think it's The Greatest Thing Ever. It's just what he specifically wants for himself personally.

DC

Well, Hierophant and Archer are finding new places with Archer and Hierophant respectively.

Konstantin von Karstein

Masego already has his new place, and maybe had it since book 2: that of the mage staying all day in his tower and experimenting about the wonders of magic.

Miles

Sure we have. Archer and Hierophant are gonna get married, when early on they were both loner types.

Archer is gonna settle down in one place instead of wandering.

Zeze is gonna accept another person in his tower, keeping him away from his research for bells at a time.

Liliet

Archer is not going to settle down "instead of" wandering. She's going to get her own place then go wandering with it at her back as somewhere to come back to. She's established this much.

Shveiran

Unless they go wandering together. I mean, I don't see why Masego and Indrani wouldn't.

She wants to see new places, he wants to find new secrets and glimpses beyond the curtain of reality. Traveling really sounds like a way to achieve both.

Liliet

Yeah, but Indrani ALSO wants a warm home to return to. That'll be Catherine.

Miles

Cat's new name is a variant of Empress or possibly Conqueror.

Dread Empress is an option but I expect a variant we haven't seen so far.

Steven Silver

There's been talk in the comments about Cat becoming Warden of the East. She even have that line a while back: I'll be the warden rattling the bars when you get uppity, something, something. I forget exactly how it went, but it was cool.

jamesc9

How does this grab people?: if there are wardens of the north, south, east and west, then Cat is Warden of the Compass.

Moobs

This might be a side plot by black. Losing Hakram would be a huge blow to Cat

jamesc9

Yes. Less of one since he was weakened enough to create the Phalanges.

jerdenizen

I don't see this a Cat loosing Hakram, even though he'll no longer be her loyal Adjutant. Cat will understand this decision completely, and I suspect Hakram's new role will benefit both the Orcs and Callow.

kinghaart

Carry won't blame Hakram but WILL eviscerate HERSELF.

Lictor Magnus

Now every me ever of the woe has had a name change except for Archer. I wonder if she'll become the new Lady Of The Wood.

KiltedBastich

And so now Indrani is the only one of the Woe who's name was not ultimately transient, a step to something greater. I wonder if that will remain true?

Darkening

If anything is gonna change for Indrani it's going to be during her and Huntress' confrontation/test with Ranger.

Anon

Cat gettin her efforts (or at least, her intent) swept out from under her on multiple fronts, it seems.

I wonder if the continued hardship is just another methodology of ensuring her ensuing name ends up stronger for it.

RIP to the Woe, though – lost 2 (3 if you count Vivienne changing to Princess), and now I'm worried about the potential fight with Ranger.

Curious that Hakram seems disillusioned enough with Cat's reforms to believe them not worth their weight for making a decision, though – yes, Cat isn't infallible, but that future is something she's striving harder for than almost anything else she ever has.

Hakram the oathbreaker warlord....not a great end in a story like that, no matter how morally 'lose the least' aspect he's trying to put into the narrative

Aristel

Weren't the Reforms mentioned the ones that Amadeus used to give the orcs more rights after the Conquest? The ones Malicia is actively setting up to get completely repealed?

Aristel

Weren't the Reforms mentioned the ones that Amadeus used to give the orcs more rights after the Conquest? The ones Malicia is actively setting up to get completely repealed?

agumentic

Hakram was talking about Praes's Reforms. Cat's have relatively little to do with mundane culture and rulership.

This was not a broken oath. It's more that the oath has lost power on both sides – Cat is no longer a Warlord, and so Hakram is no longer an Adjutant. It was grown out of, step by step, and so, in the end, was released.

Liliet

Cat isn't losing anything here, except for Hakram's personal labor and time spent with her. He's not going against her, that would be stupid. He's just forging his own path alongside her – but no longer literally side to side, and that's what he mourns.

Also, Cat's been pretty insisting that the Woe does not lose members so easily. P sure Hakram will still be part of it under whatever Name.

Shveiran

Yes, but also no, I'm afraid.

Hakram is not just one of the Woe: he is the first soldier who ever swore to her, her staunchest supporter, the one who has been there since the beginning. Catherine has unquestioning faith in him, and that comes, in part, from the fact that Hakram highest aspiration has ever been TO BE USEFUL TO HER.

I don't want to diminish a beautiful relationship by drawing some parallel to a mistress/slave dynamic, but I think it has to be addressed that this relationship was built on that foundation: Hakram loves Catherine the way a knife loves a steady hand.

That faith is not a small part of what they are. In Book 4, Hakram contradicting her in public shook Catherine to her core. In Book 6, the realization that Hakram wanted things made her uneasy, because she was suddenly no longer sure of what lines they moved by, and what her approach was supposed to be.

Hakram transitioning is not really a change with regards to the WoE. Just like it wasn't for Hierophant, or Vivienne.

But his no longer being the Adjutant?
Oh, no. THAT will have to be addressed.

And that is why he knows this will cost them.

Liliet

You are right about a lot of this, but there's the other part of their relationship: the reason WHY Hakram latched on to her personally. The ideological part, the fire she lit in him. He wanted her to succeed because she embodied the force he wanted to see in the world. There's a reason he's the only one of the Woe to ever really have talked her down from taking an evil-er path to a good-er option (the Helikean riders in Book 5).

dadycool

Whew, this was deceptively intense. Hakram learning that his own people were being dismantled the same way Callow was, leading him to realize that there aren't any paths that end up good for them, leading him to follow his Warlord's example by blazing a new trail, through fire and blood. Dead the man, dead the hand, and dead the enemies who would rise against this new Warlord. I wonder if he really will break away from the Woe with this, or if he can still be a part of it. It actually sounds like he's doing what Malicia did, leaving the group to become the leader of a nation.

Liliet

Malicia never left any group. She was never one of the Calamities, when they earned the title she was still a concubine plotting behind everyone's back.

I am 100% certain Hakram will still be part of the Woe.

dadycool

I imagine that if Cat was staying as the Black Queen, the Woe would fall apart, with Vivienne and Hakram transitioning into ruling Names, but since she's becoming a Ruler of Ruling Named, the group itself will endure, even if the nuances will be different.

Reader in the Night

Catherine ruling over the East as a whole, with Vivienne in Callow, Akua in Praes, and Hakram in the Steppes.

Liliet

Cat's dynamic with them was never really about ruling them

dadycoool

No, but she was always the leader, if for no other reason than her insane plans. It was always essentially a bunch of friends trying to put out what fires they didn't cause, and some they did, and that doesn't sound like something that would change with two or more of them ruling their own people with Cat technically a step above them but only really acting as mediator and troubleshooter.

Liliet

Yeah, true.

shikkarasu

"It was the royal seal below but there were fresher words, the ink a little smudged. No matter where you end up, Catherine Foundling had written in that ugly scrawl of hers, you will be one of mine. Sooner or later, I will come to collect."

One does not simply walk away from being one of Catherine's Foundlings.

Liliet

e x a c t l y

therealgridlock

The Woe will leave ripples through all time and stories, every single member is going to rise to the pinnacle of a station, and lead great numbers of people to better futures, more well structured and balanced futures that limit the Game to only those willing to participate.

Heiropant seeks to understand, percieve, break, wrest divinity from the puny beings who use their world for fun. Doing so, he leads the forces of magic research.

? (Cat) wants to judge, rule, control, limit, and rewrite the stories of their world into something safe for the masses, yet still useful for themselves and the gods. It's why she wanted countries to not be run by names. Doing so she leads the forces of Named, of leaders of countries, and of Cardinal.

Princess will eventually become Queen, probably, if not, it's still a good Name. She will lead Callow.

Warlord? Wants to be useful to cat, yes, but leading his people into the future is of use to everyone, not just cat. Cementing their future solidly in the new dynamic means that they follow Cats vision into the future side by side, not lagging behind, or fighting against. Doing so he leads the orcs.

Archer, Huntress, and Ranger will likely disappear into the woods, and we won't see what happens until a flashback interlude later, but whoever emerges (money's on Archer) will be the pinnacle of the Role, not having changed names, just reached the peak of it. Taking Rangers role doesn't have to mean taking her Name. Doing so, she leads a large contingent from Rangers place, as well as being an easy hand of death for Cat to send after anyone breaking the rules.

? (Akua) will likely be dread empress, unless she does the twilight city trap, either way she will serve a valuable puzzle piece for Cat. As twilight crown jailer, she gives fast travel to the masses and removes the world's greatest evil from play, for a millenia at least. As empress she leads Praes. If Amadeus leads Praes, then the same goal is achieved.

Cat already has a Name in the dwarven country backing her. She has literal (lesser) gods in the Drow. She has an ally in the Principate. The only people she wouldn't have backing her (directly and obviously) is the elves, the goblins, the gnomes, and maybe the dragons, if there's more than one left.

I believe that even if not on purpose, Cat has placed a Name in power in every force on the continent to allow the ending of the age to pass all at once, rather than broken into pieces. To allow it to pass at all, she needs the support of all the nations, fighting as one to slay a rule breaking evil, an evil greater than the petty squabbles of countries.

Whether the story continues on after that goal is accomplished, I don't know. We may see the gnomes arrive in helicopters and give Cardinal a green letter for the first time, to tell them that they've gone in the correct direction for civilization, rather than progressing too fast.

Xinci

Mm, new worlds forming up. More connections slipping away from Catherine as she grows into something bigger. It is indeed quite notable that the orcs finding a proper path would be rather risky, and charting out their own synergistic path rather fits the Age of Order. Groups strong but not quite strong enough, with distinct value held at a Cardinal point.

I wonder then what path he may make as a Warlord, its been a long time, so perhaps some of it may be shifted. A grand war is still on the horizon too

KageLupus

I imagine that Hakram's plan is to turn the Clans into their own political entity. They already have enough Legion training and vets that they could form their own fighting force instead of joining up with Praes. If Hakram can get himself declare Warlord and then bring the full might of the Clans against Keter, he can leverage that to get formally recognized by the Grand Alliance. Sign on to the Liesse Accords and gain some legitimacy from that, as well as opening up some more trade routes.

That would all thread the needle between keeping the Clans relevant and a part of the new age, but not having them just be another second class citizen of Praes. They could cut their major ties with Praes and stem the cultural bleeding that Black set in motion. But it also gives them an outward enemy to focus their energies on, in the form of Praes being shitty about losing their hold on the Clans. The Orcs' culture is going to change, but that has to happen if they want to be anything more than pawns in the future. But I think Hakram can take guide that change in a way that doesn't see the Clans losing their core identity.

Darkening

The problem with that idea is that the orcs and the Steppes don't really have any resources for trade aside from sending their young to serve as soldiers for other nations, which would be rather difficult if they were keeping their troops as their own military.

Linnus42

Yeah I saw this one coming. I think all the characters in transitional states right now in Cat, Hanno, Hakram, Viv and Akua have some degree of mirroring with each other really. Though I don't really think Cat and Viv are evolving too much as people right now like the other three. But the connections between Hanno and Hakram (as they were paired) are kinda obvious insofar as they both don't have much interest in ruling or playing politics. But have kinda reached the point where they feel its all going to crap and if you want done right you have to do it yourself.

I don't think Masego is going to change Name though since he created that Name himself. I also don't think Archer is either quite frankly. I suppose defeating Ranger could unlock something but honestly that seems more Cat's pet project and maybe Silver Huntress then anything Cocky or Indrani are super into.

Oshi

Masego has had his moment. Archer's will be found in her final meeting with Ranger. She doesn't need to change because who she is works.

IMO, the Woe as the were are done with their first tale. They aren't a band of five anymore in the classical sense. Instead they will grow to encompass new Roles or go on to the greater path their name leads them to. Doing so just incidentally separates them. I don't think this is typical of villains does anyone else? It's the end of the heroes tales. Its the tale of the scrappy band becoming kings and queens to lead their folk into a new age while some disappear to parts unknown to seek the mysteries they always said they would when they went adventuring. The Woe as they were are gone. The bond will remain but they will not if that makes sense.

Insanenoodlyguy

But it could lead to nostalgia boost. The rare time they are all Together again and a threat comes up, they will kick ridiculous amounts of ass as it all comes back for a bit and they are a band of five to make you shit yourself in fighting them once more.

aurikdomi

Culture shift for the Orcs too, good stuff.
I wonder how much of the old name of warlord will shine through and how much it will change with the new age?

Frivolous

I don't know why anyone could believe Hakram is slipping away from Catherine. They love each other.

Hakram's Role is changing, and so also his Name, but he's still the same man. He's still Hakram.

I also don't see why or how this change can mean he leaves the Woe. If Vivienne's losing her Name didn't do it, why would this?

Hakram is merely reinterpreting Catherine's wishes as per the situation he found. Catherine can hardly blame him for that.

The only real issue is that Hakram and Catherine will have less time for and with each other, due to Hakram's new Role. But villainy grants unending youth anyway, and there are always scrying rituals.

Liliet

Hakram and Cat will drift away from each other as a result of this because the original position was basically "siamese twins". They will still be friends, but there's no stepping around the truth that it will not be the same again and they will not give each other the security they used to. They'll be too busy for that.

Oshi

This chapter is Hakram acknowledging the truth that Catherine has been struggling with since the arc where he got injured again. He won't survive in the story she made for herself. Hakram has no place in it really. She knew it but could never admit it so she focused a bit too much on keeping him alive instead of being honest with him. It hurt them both in the end. The Woe mirror the whole heroic tradition right? This is Hakram's rise from his existential fall.

Liliet

HELL YEAH HELL YEAH HELL YEAH

I... adore this development? I feel bad for Cat but also THIS IS THE BEST

Sinead

I expand this as 'I feel bad for Cat because she may take this the hardest way possible.'

Because RSD is a _bitch_ like that.

Liliet

Yup, that.

Rynjin

RSD?

john

Rejection-Sensitive Dysphoria

serpentrose

Rejection Sensitive Dysphoria – basically extreme difficulty in dealing with rejection. (there's more to it than that which you can look up if you care to. I really only know what it is in a vague way.)

Liliet

See also: Catherine "I am a villain unrepentant and am not doing this to be liked" "AAA PEOPLE LIKE VIVIENNE MORE THAN MEEEEEE" Foundling, bless her mess

Sinead

Her desire to be loved and having these moments of despair is why I started thinking the 'Cat gets bound to Twilight as the seal on the Dead King' because I can really see her making that choice as Vivienne comes into her own, Hakram establishes his powerbase, Idrani and Maseago are their own thing, and Akua straight up decks her with the proposed plan.

However EE has said there will be one more 'full band of 5' moment, so that may not yet happen, since my theory is based on Cat at a low point making an irreversible choice. And while they are not 'happy moments', I don't think one feels quite so isolated to make these choices.

However, Cat may also make the choice on the basis that she 'wouldn't throw any of [her friends] under the bus'

Sinead

Also, minor note: I was thinking Akua chewing Cat out as a rejection of her offer was what I wanted, but I think Akua giving Cat a black eye and just being done with her is better, with no words exchanged. She still keeps to the Accords and all that because they are a better way, but she is done with Cat as a person.

Maybe I'm harsh, but Cat has a tendency to be the moral equivalence of a stepping stone in mud at times: she gets people out of the mud and onto better paths, but she herself sort of stays down in the mud.

She argued against Bonfire, but there is a log of civilian casualties here at Kala with the poisoning of the lake, for one.

I liked Akua's arc for it's own sake, not necessarily how it directly relates back to Cat.

Liliet

RIP.

I honestly want Akua to take care of Cat? I feel like she understands and appreciates Cat on a level even the rest of the Woe doesn't, not really. And I feel like she would be able to really see Cat's self-destructive bullshit, take her hands and say "nope no more of this".

...I just really want that.

Sinead

I've said before when I mentioned giving the 'bleak ending' serious thoughts as likely strongly biased because I'm not necessarily in the best of places at times recently, so my predictions skew negatively here. Plus, I can really easily see Cat's Name as being something that has grown beyond what the 'system really expected (in the sense of authority/power of a single 'piece' on the board) which makes it easy to make her the hanging sword over an empty throne that is 'supreme rule over Named'. Sort of like how Hierarch is still the basis of authority in the League that Basila plans around, even if she doesn't expect him to come back.

If the Elves were more engaged with the current conflict, I could see a twist of turning the Forever King into the Twilight King, but I think the Elves would need to be around more than they have been to see that make sense. It would also end the Deorai the exile though, which would be interesting since their definitive source of conflict would have been resolved by Cat, even if they despise her for keeping Akua around.

I do appreciate the idea of Akua being the one to bring Cat back to herself. While they never really mirrored after First Liesse (you yourself pointed out that Second Liesse was between the Truebloods and Amadeus /Malicia, with the kids stuck in the middle), they are mirrored as being people who have done a lot of harm and are wanting the peace and quiet. Perhaps they can just be two distant figures at the heart of Cardinal.

If your prediction is correct, it might fit into Amadeus personal reflection of Akua as a 'wild card' he doesn't understand, if we get a scene between himself, Cat, and Malicia like at Second Liesse. As I noted previously, Cat's self destructive bullshit is something that in my opinion she learned from Amadeus, and I kind of want him to get an eye opener when it comes to 'teaching should not come at the expense of the children' lecture that he gave Ranger. I may agree with him, but it's a bit rich considering the consequences of his own teaching style. Having Akua, of all people, pull Cat back from the brink would drive the point home.

I'm not saying this as a 'break Amadeus' plot point, but more because I do not know if he sees the bad side of what he has taught Cat really. His reflections of Cat is pride and where she has done better than he did.

=====

Sorry for the ramble, this ended up being way to many interconnected ideas at once (par for the course I guess). TLDR; I like the idea, and I can see how it could happen. I just am not entirely sure if that is what will happen.

Liliet

Amadeus was earnestly trying to teach Cat better than he knew himself, including the self-destructive bullshit. Too bad “do as I say not as I do” didn’t work out for him lmao. (In other words, I agree completely)

Oh I am not sure if that is what will happen either. I want it to, which is a completely different thing.

Honestly, maybe someone other than Akua needs to first slap Catherine out of her “I am forever guilty for Liesse and there is no forgiveness” mindset. She’s projecting on Akua like she’s a TV screen, but that is complicated by the fact Akua DID, uh, do that consciously, deliberately, uncoerced and with full awareness of her actions.

IDK, I love everything about this arc. I just want Cat to snap out of the “long prices” nonsense which she even ADMITS OUT LOUD is nonsense, jeez Cat!!!!

Mental Mouse

I think the Elves will probably be doing the Arcadia thing, probably doing the same shard-into-realm thing that was used to create Twilight. They already have the crown.

jamesc9

I wonder under what circumstances spring (with elves) and autumn (with fast travel, GP and an imprisoned DK) would merge.

LuxInSomnia

I don’t believe Zeze’s name is changing until he dismantles the last wonders of this age.

Archer though can easily transition into something bigger and better. She's already quite different than what she used to be. As soon as she acquires the knowledge and intent for a new name she's ready, and that can, and likely will, come when they confront Ranger.

Juff

Typo Thread:

instead must rely > instead had to rely Adjutant did wade (should this be did not) only he > only him being this position > being in this position in, power? > in? Power?
when she already > when she'd already the like the > like the good as sown > good as sewn Snake Troketooth > Troke Snaketooth more orcs thinking > more orcs thought fate Clans > fate of the Clans

onedollargum

This feels like a "The enemy's gate is down" moment. A drastic, unthinkable action. A simple goal with finessed execution.

Make war on Praes and tear the tower down.

Or mass-migrate to Arcadia I guess. Lots of people to fight there and winter doesn't really exist.

irritantseraphim

Apart from the fact that Arcadia is basically inhospitable to mortals for long time. As Cat stated before: Arcadias waters are not potable (which is how she poisoned the enemies water supply in the last battle.

beleester

Even if the Empire was completely destroyed (which it won't be, since Praes needs to be mostly in one piece to fight the Dead King), there would still be the question of what role the orcs should play in whatever comes next – how do they keep the benefits of civilization without losing their culture?

jamesc9

Where 'civilisation' means non-portable forges, trade in manufactured goods, exchange of people with the Legions, and probably some things that I've forgotten; many of which are inhospitable to nomadism and raiding.

Burlyraven

So this definitely isn't a betrayal on Hakram's part. He hasn't been "Adjutant" in truth for a long time, anyway. What it is is Hakram catching up to the rest of the Woe's stories.

Cat is pointed towards a position of supreme rule, Vivienne is to become Queen of Callow, Archer is likely meant to take over for Ranger as the Lady, and Hierophant is making steady and terrifying progress towards apotheosis. If Hakram didn't make a move towards a crown of some sort, then he was dead.

Frivolous

Burlyraven: The war against Keter has been good for Masego, I think. He's learned so much from both allies and enemies like Keter and the elves.

On the other hand, I wonder sometimes if Masego already has enough raw data to begin his ascent to apotheosis, and he's only delaying to help Catherine and the other Woe, and for revenge against Neshamah for making him blow up Indrani's head.

Masego is basically a nice person but I believed him when he said he wanted to torture Neshamah.

As an aside: This is probably a silly idea, but I wonder if Archer's big advantage over her teacher the Ranger is that Archer has a sense of humor and Ranger basically does not.

Another possible advantage is that Archer has suffered near-death and actual death, and I'm not sure Ranger has ever had either experience.

Sometimes I wonder how deep Ranger can possibly be. She may actually be a kinda shallow person.

ninegardens

I mean... maybe Ranger does have a sense of humour. But aside from Maddy, who would ever SEE the damn thing?

Frivolous

ninegardens: Also the Dead King. She jokes with him when she visits/raids Keter.

Earl of Purple

This was an excellent chapter. Hakram didn't beat a fool when reciting ancient orc poetry, but the poetry was there and gods was it scary. Hakram the Warlord, huh? I was half expecting Juniper to go this route, but she is not here and she is not orc enough, besides. Her war is the direction of strategy, leading from rear and controlling it all, and she has no poetry either. Don't tell Juniper I said that, though.

irritantseraphim

Juniper is too deeply rooted in the Legions/Army of Callow to be Warlord. If I had to ascribe a Name to her it would be Marshal

Liliet

Juniper is orc-er than Hakram in all the toxic ways.

Sinead

I wonder if Juniper will join Hakram in the end though.

Her epithet in 'future quotes' refer to her tribe, not her as Marshal of Callow.

Wonder

So how is this going to work? The orcs are based in Praes and Cat is going to be based in Callow and Cardinal.

irritantseraphim

Hakrams task was to keep the Clans from siding with the tower. This escalated into a more deeply rooted debate: new ways or old. Or the third. The third meaning that Hakram will have to take off from the immediate companionship of Cat to forge the new ways of the Orcs.

Liliet

Yep, that's the tragic part. Hakram is leaving Cat's literal physical side.

daniel

I might be confused.

Didn't Hakram have a detailed plan for future Orc society that he was working the kinks out of?

I feel like this wasn't addressed directly in this chapter, were they just a refinement for the helmet path? In this section Cathrine represented the helmet path but there was a whole thing about them not seeing eye-to-eye on this issue.

We're seeing Hakram adrift deciding to forge his own way for Orcs but I thought that was always his thing. The plans he made for the steppes were always separate from Cathrine's, he put in a lot of careful thought into Orc future – was he being so naive that he needed a visit to understand some Orcs actually like the old ways? (rather than the smaller revelation that those have a good reason to support Troke)

His realisation that he needs to take the mantle of leadership is dramatic and moving but It seems he also had a change of heart about Orc future and I don't understand what it was exactly.

Liliet

He did not realize that orcs might have a point about liking the old ways and that the old ways were something distinct and valuable enough to be worth protecting.

Also, he had hoped he would be able to nudge orcs towards the future he wants from Catherine's side, without taking the center stage himself. Just prepare the conditions and then they'll do the thing that's best for them, right?

I do agree that this has clearly always been His Thing. He just didn't admit to himself that that means he's got to do it himself.

theothin

I think his plan was based on his experiences with orcs from pro-Legion clans. He'd already understood that side of his homeland, just not the perspective of the other clans, ones he hadn't had that kind of contact with until this.

Bellaco

GOOSEBUMPS

beleester

Troke Snaketooth's plan of "make yourself a high lord so that nobody can interfere in how the orcs rule themselves" isn't really a bad plan – Hakram admits that it's similar to how Catherine protected Callowan culture – the only problem is that he's on Malicia's side.

So Hakram needs to steal that plan out from under Troke – either backing him while finding a way to drive a wedge between him and the Tower, or setting up his alliance as "the same but better," or maybe just killing Troke and taking over if that's a thing orcs allow.

(He also needs some way to ensure the new system endures past one High Lord and one Empress, which I really have no clue on, but that's a problem for Future Hakram.)

Liliet

The problem is, the old orc culture is horrible and toxic in many of the same ways as the Wasteland's Age of Wonders culture.

The improvements to be found in the new way [™] are not minute. Reread Hakram's musings on that path again. Yes, it will lose them some, but it will gain them so, so much.

Hakram needs to find a middle way...

...and steal Troke's plan from under him 😊

Rynjin

You know, it's in ne of funny. In any other context, any other story, this would be a happy thing. The triumphant rise of the self-doubting hero as they realize they are truly the best, maybe only, hope for the future of their people. The final actualization of their sense of self, duty, and resolve.

But here it's just sad, mostly because Hakram is the sort of person who probably feels he'd be better off without a sense of self at all.

Liliet

I disagree with you. Hakram clearly talks about having a sense of self as a positive thing, and resolves to NOT be Eudokia. That factors into his decision for his own sake.

nick012000

I find it interesting that Hakram gets the Name of Warlord right after playing a game of Tower Raising (a game which he invented) with himself.

Vetrom

Oh no, everyone else is playing too, even if they don't know it. I'd give it even odds of becoming an aspect like Connect.

Tohron

I'd thought Hakram was almost certain to die at Keter, but with this development he might actually survive.

letouriste

i absolutely love this. gods damn it EE, you did it again. It was a long way coming i think but it somehow managed to blind me once again haha

JRogue

I will not be surprised when Cat had this planned from the beginning. I believe that she knew what would happen if she sent Hakram to the Clans.

Hakram is, and always be, part of the Woe. Once a member, always a member.

Cat and Hakram's relationship will change, it is rare when a relationship does not. Their priorities have changed, and have been for a while. Change hurts, but not always in a terrible way.

They will always be friends, as only friends who have been through the fire can be. They genuinely love each other.

Cat knew, or at the least hoped, this would happen in my opinion.

Frivolous

JRogue: Agree. Catherine's facility with Story probably means she anticipated this at least in part.

There is a non-trivial chance she did not, though. Catherine has her blind spots, and love is a big blind spot.

BargleNawdleZouss

Catherine Foundling, the Beast of Cardinal
Warlord Hakram Deadhand of the Orc
Good Queen Vivienne I Dartwick of Callow
Masego the deity
Indrani the Archer

Warden of Autumn Akua Sahelian (aka Twilight Jailer/Gaoler, keeper of the Dead King's prison)

ohJohN

It's interesting how Hakram thinks about the Steppes, the land itself. Their "harshness", the "land of gnawing" and "ten thousand miles of snow", finding "nothing" when he looks out at the "empty plains" that he likens to Scribe's hopelessness.

He considers how the ever-present threat of hunger shaped the "closed circle" of the old ways, and how even proponents of the skull path wouldn't completely break with Praes, lest the Clans starve. He summarizes the shield path as "the promises of the Conquest, faithfully kept, and hunger for more of the same." The clans of the fang path would follow whoever promises better rewards, because "hunger had no philosophy".

We've seen throughout the story that hunger is at the heart of orcs; certainly, there's a biological component to this (Ehioze's Measure comes to mind), but I wonder how much of it is shaped by their environment, the Steppes. Limited resources and the constant threat of starvation would have a serious cultural impact, especially given that orcs have lived there for millennia.

I also wonder how essential that environment is to the parts of orc culture that Hakram wants to preserve. The shield path was unacceptable because even fully integrating with Praes would see orcs be second-class citizens: "We lose everything that we are without becoming equals." The skull path would fail, because they can't thrive without Praes's resources: "We unite against something, someone – or when there is another way to gain aside from eating each other." The fang path offers no direction for his people, just blind stumbling towards irrelevance.

What if the orcs left the Steppes? Better land would let them thrive on their own; better neighbors would let them integrate as true equals. Callow has been slowly growing more friendly to greenskins and has already transplanted a goblin tribe, the ravaged south could likely sustain much greater herds than the Steppes, and he's got an in with the queen. Or somewhere near the ratlings, which would provide the Clans with a common enemy and a steady supply of meat (so long as they can get along with the drow).

I don't think it's likely – narratively, we've already seen an exodus of the drow, and then only because they faced annihilation – but it's interesting that Hakram seems to have no love for the Steppes. It feels like the orcs were left unmoored by the Miezens: so much of their culture lost, their holy sites razed, and essentially suborned to Praes ever since. What would they actually lose by leaving?

Earl of Purple

They may lack their old holy sites, but they still have others – and even razed, a holy site remains a site, so even if their temples are fallen and the treasures looted, there's still history there. The orcs can't move to Callow because they don't keep sheep, they're herders yes but they follow herds of... something like reindeer, I think, for meat and fur and antler. If they left they'd lose the last things they have of being orcs, and in Callow they'd remain second-class citizens, and their obligate carnivory and cultural cannibalism would not see them welcomed there. The goblins are an insular people by choice, and so Callowans do not have to see or deal with their more questionable practices. Orcs do not have that option. Besides, there's too many orcs. The only place they could go where they could all fit is Keter, and that has been promised to the drow.

Liliet

This.

superkeaton

Lovely.

Interlude: North III

"The diplomat's victory is to let the opponent win on your terms."

– Prince Fernando of Salamans

Hakram hadn't put armour on.

A loose shirt, trousers and boots were all he wore as he held his axe loosely in his grasp, watching his opponent move. Dag Clawtoe had laughed off the challenge at first, thinking it a jest, but the laughter had gone away when Hakram failed to join in. The older orc was taking the duel seriously and had come in champion's garb: helm, mail and greaves. Dag kept his shield up and his sword raised, circling as warriors pounded the ground around them. The jemmek was liked by his clan and their allies, but orcs liked a good fight even more.

"I'll end it without killing you," Dag Clawtoe growled.

Hakram did not answer. It was one of his weaknesses as a champion – the way his people saw it – that he had no taste for that sort of banter. The rough edge of his tongue he reserved only for people he was going to kill. The tall orc took a step forward on the black earth and without missing a beat Dag attacked as he moved. A short push forward, shield steady as the blade thrust up towards his armpit. A smooth movement, well practised, and Hakram's limbs of steel were not as quick as those of flesh had been. It didn't matter, because he'd been waiting for the strike: the moment his foot touched the ground he was already pivoting, carrying his momentum forward as Dag's thrust passed him by.

His elbow smashed into the other orc's helmeted forehead, slamming him to the floor.

Warriors roared in approval as Dag cursed and rolled away, slapping away Hakram's light swing with his shield before rising into a crouch. He'd lost his helmet, as Hakram had wanted. The leather strap had snapped and the helm fallen into the grass, shaking free Dag's hair – a long black braid going from his forehead to his back. Hakram almost rubbed at the elbow that'd struck the helm, but he knew he was imagining the ache. Steel did not grow tender from striking at steel. Hakram rolled his shoulder, loosening it, and waited for the wary jemmek to come for him again. Dag hesitated, but he would be jeered at by his own warriors if he looked afraid of the fight.

So he came, measured this time. A feint to the left, trying to draw Hakram's blade, but when it passed without answer the other orc shot forward. Surprised, Hakram took a step back that saved him from being swept entirely off his feet when Dag's shield bashed into his chest. His footing slipped but he backed away again, only to earn another bash – at the head, but he was ready this time. Hakram's axe came down and though he'd misjudged the distance it still came down on the shield arm Dag had exposed by striking. Instead of the axe-head against mail it was the shoulder that found its mark, a clean blow that had the jemmek shouting in pain.

The arm wasn't quite broken but it was hurt. Dag was no greenhorn, though, and pain didn't stop him. Hakram was hit in the shoulder by the shield, forcing him in a backwards stumble, and in a discreet thrust under that cover the jemmek's sword came for his belly. That he caught with fingers of bone, steel scraping the pale, but the other orc used the grip to tackle him. Hakram rocked backwards, swallowing a curse – if he was pushed to the ground this was lost – as Dag smashed their foreheads together with a hellish scream. He dropped his axe, useless so close anyway, but even pushing back he found that Dag had the advantage on him. Hakram growled and tried to smash their foreheads again, but Dag put the shield in the way. Inspiration. Steel fingers closed around the rim of the shield, yanking it down. The other orc roared in pain, his wounded arm twisted, and fangs flashed as he ripped through his own shield straps to break free.

That'd been a mistake.

Hakram arm rose and he bashed Dag's head in with the freed shield. Dag drew back, yelping, but it wasn't enough. One, two, three more hits to the head and down Dag Clawtoe went. Eyes wide and unseeing he dropped onto the black earth, only barely conscious. It was done. Hakram breathed out, tossing away the shield. Howls and shouts of approval erupted around them, dragging back Dag to some semblance of wakefulness. He rose to his knees, expression still dazed.

"Why?" the other orc asked, quietly enough he was barely heard beneath the shouts. "I'm not the chief, Deadhand. What would you take from me, being camp-leader?"

Hakram shook his head.

"They backed you," he said, gesturing at the warriors around them. "And they still will."

Dag scowled, confused.

"They back you," Hakram calmly said, "only now you back me."

Confusion turned to anger but the other orc did not argue. It was not the place of the defeated to argue terms with the victor. Yet there was still an argument ahead of him, Hakram thought as he left the duelling circle and traded backslaps with cheering warriors. Further back Oghuz the Lamé, chief of the Red Shields and the other leading light of the alliance, was waiting with a few of his warriors at his side. The old orc snorted when Hakram approached.

"You're not a Red Shield," Oghuz said. "Unlike Dag I don't owe you the courtesy of accepting a challenge."

"It's not a fight I'm looking for," Hakram said.

"Isn't it?" Oghuz scoffed, but after a moment he sighed.

He barked at his warriors to give him space, room enough that the two of them would be able to speak without being overheard.

"That was a mistake," Oghuz said, gesturing at the duelling grounds. "Dag had weaknesses as a man to front for but you have even more. You think we'll just let ourselves be pressed into Callow's service in, Named or not? It's a worthy queen you're serving, Deadhand, but she's not one of ours."

Hakram did not bother to answer that. It was a pit of an argument, one he wouldn't be able to climb out of should he fall. So he took another path.

"The duel," Hakram said. "What did you think of it?"

"You're more used to using a shield with that axe," Oghuz replied. "And you still cover for the metal like it's flesh when you don't think about it."

Hakram waited a moment, knowing the old champion would have more to say.

"It was unkind to Dag to stretch it out," the older orc added. "You could have knocked him half dead with that first elbow strike."

The tall orc smiled without showing teeth.

"No," he said, "I could not have."

Because he could no longer feel his aspects. Could barely even see his Name through the shadow cast by what he might yet become. Oghuz did not miss the implication. There weren't a lot of reasons why Hakram would be losing his Name, and only one that walked hand in hand with forcing himself to the front of the alliance between their two clans. The old orc let out a low hiss, worrying his lip.

"I do not seek service to anyone," Hakram said, and like that the other man knew it to be true.

Now it was on Oghuz to decide whether or not Hakram Deadhand was someone he could live with as the Warlord of their age. Tension stretched out.

"Ours are hungry Gods," the old orc finally said, leaning on his cane. "Best to eat our fill before they catch up."

A look up and down.

"You'll do."

A pause, then a calculatingly casual question.

"Do you get on well with my daughter?"

Hakram grimaced. That wouldn't be happening. Even if Juniper didn't kill him Aisha absolutely would – and she'd probably get away with it too.

"Too much woman for me," he replied, and the old man laughed.

That was one alliance behind him then, Hakram thought. Time to visit the other.

—

He was being watched.

The twins were already waiting for him when Hakram reached the grounds of the Split Tree Clan. Sigvin and Sigvun were easiest to tell apart by the ritual scars on their bodies: the latter's looked like woven crescent moons, the former's like crisscrossing bite marks. Sigvun had once implied he wouldn't mind Hakram getting the sort of closer look at those scars his sister had been granting, but the tall orc had turned him down. His preferences were well set. The twin had shrugged it off and Hakram was on amicable terms with both – as amicable as one could be while trying to have opposite warlords elected, anyway. He might kill them, or they him, but it wouldn't be killing done in the red.

"Back already?" Sigvin teased.

Sigvun cocked a hairless brow.

"Should I speak to our kin about raising a pillar?" he gravely asked.

Hakram rolled his eyes. Old-fashioned, the Split Tree. Hardly anyone still hung woven crowns on sculpted pillars anymore: weddings were family feasts under a shaman nowadays, not ceremonies to attract the blessings of spirits.

"Take me to your chieftain," he said.

Though both kept light expressions, he could see the stiffening in the way they stood. Uncertainty in Sigvun's eyes but triumph in Sigvin's. She thinks she has swayed me, Hakram thought. In a way she had. The twins agreed without trouble but the light conversation died and they walked the rest of the way in silence. He spent the time considering he knew of Hegvor Allspeak, chief of the Split Tree Clan. Which was little, for though Hakram could think offhand of half a dozen feuds she had mediated and how he did not even know the old woman's age. Much about the chief herself was obscured, which he suspected to be on purpose.

He was not made to wait long before being led to a great tent where three orcs, by the looks of them none younger than sixty winters, waited seated. Introductions were briskly made. The oldest shaman of the clan, Bjarte, sat to the right. To the left sat Gulda Hardhead, the most honoured champion of the Split Tree, and between them sat a woman of long white hair with a hard scar across her nose. Hegvor Allspeak, whose eyes were of an unsettlingly pale yellow bordering on green. Hakram was invited to sit across from them at a low table, an honour that was not granted to the twins. They sat on the ground, near the back of the tent. The two were trusted, Hakram thought, but their age meant their influence was limited.

Hegvor pushed across the table a small bowl and cut of dried meat.

"I offer you meat and drink from my table," the chieftain said.

Brutally salty sheep and hard aragh were what Hakram wolfed down, but that was an old and well-known negotiating trick. At least they hadn't used Taghreb spices, which would have had him panting for water throughout the entire talks.

"Hail, Hegvor Allspeak," he said.

"Hail, Hakram Deadhead," the old woman replied. "The twins say you ask of my time."

"I do," he said.

She frowned.

"Not, I think, for what Sigvin hopes of you," Hegvor said. "So what it is you have come for, Deadhand, if not to lend your name to the better cause?"

Hakram's dead fingers laid against the table, its intricate carvings dimly felt to his senses. Like a... pressure, nothing like what a hand of flesh had been. And the pressures were lighter now, for the same reason that Hakram thought he would no longer be able to Find something he sought.

"Before I answer that question," he said, "I want to describe something to you."

The bone fingers drummed against the wood, a sound like a rat gnawing.

"Within a week the taratoplu will have to disperse because it can no longer be fed," Hakram said. "As the pressure mounts on all clans to gather behind a banner, the Graven Bone and the Stag-Crowned will cede territories to some of the clans bordering them. Those clans will then come to support Troke Snaketooth and get him elected as High Lord of the Steppes."

The Graven Bone and Stag-Crowned were the two strongest supporters of Troke, despite being the two largest southern clans after his own, because Malicia had also named them lords of the Steppes. They would be his natural lieutenants, the highest under him after his election. That was well worth territorial concessions to their own rivals, especially when this was an offer that the Blackspears themselves could not make – if Troke was seen to be weakening his clan to rope in others, he would be made into a laughingstock.

"Dread Empress Malicia will recognize the title and formally charge High Lord Troke with putting down the rebelling High Seat of Nok," Hakram said. "Most clans will fall in line at the prospect of plunder and even the Howling Wolves and the Red Shields will join the host."

Utter silence from across the table.

"To secure Troke's position after the sack, the Wolves and the Shields will be given the honour of being the first into the breach at Nok," he calmly continued. "You'll collude with either Malicia or High Lord Dakarai to make their losses crippling, then keep them crippled after you withdraw to the Steppes by keeping away returning legionaries."

His fingers skittered across the wood still.

"You keep propping up Troke, after that, but begin looking to the future," Hakram said. "Marry a rising name in the Bones or the Stags to one of your kin, then lay the grounds for them to be Snaketooth's successor. Then you begin pushing for what you actually want."

The tall orc showed teeth.

"At a guess? Bringing back the bronze urus as our coinage, a council of shamans to mediate clan disputes like in the ancient Hordes and fixed yearly gatherings under enforced truce," Hakram continued. "If Troke backs you, all the better. If he doesn't, he has an accident and you get the prepared successor in power where they will be duly grateful."

Hakram's dead hand went still.

"How close am I?" he asked.

A long moment of silence.

"Only one yearly gathering," Barjte said, the shaman smiling. "We would consecrate holy grounds for the first time since the Miezens, our High Seat of the Steppes."

Good, Hakram thought. They had, without knowing it, come to agree with one of his own notions in principle. Now he just needed to survive the rest of this conversation. His eyes were on Hegvor, so he was surprised when the answer came from behind.

"I told you, grandmother," Sigvin erupted. "We should have tried to bring him from the start, it's such a waste that-"

"Be silent, girl," Hagvor peevishly cut in, "until you stop thinking with your snatch."

Sigvin's mouth closed with an angry click of fangs. Her grandmother – the things you learned, Hakram mused – turned a cool gaze on him.

"You're a clever man, Deadhand," she said. "So tell me the reason you've come up with that I should let you leave this tent alive."

So much for drink and meat from their table, Hakram thought amusedly. His people were not the Taghreb, to hold the law of hospitality as sacrosanct, but that's been a rather hasty turnabout. Still, there was nothing like the threat of death to get a man's blood flowing.

"It won't work," Hakram said. "Even if you kill me and get away with it, even if I say nothing, it won't work."

Gulda Hardhead bared her fangs.

"You think us fools, boy," the old champion said. "Think we haven't thought it through, maybe, that since we keep to old ways we're just sav-"

"I think you haven't read reports of the Eyes of the Empire annotated by the Scribe," Hakram calmly interrupted.

A start of surprise.

"You know things I do not," he said. "That I could not learn or did not care to. Are you so proud to believe the opposite cannot be true?"

Because if it were so, if they were a closed door, then he would have to kill them all. Something pulsed in his belly at the thought, almost eager. A craving not entirely his. He had rustled feathers with the brusque answer, but where Gulda was growling and Bjarte looked politely skeptical their leader only looked thoughtful. Considering. Examining where she, too, might have been wrong. Something like hope bloomed in Hakram, chasing away the bloodthirst.

"Trade," Hagvor Allspeak finally said. "You think trade will bury us, even if we restrict it."

"You're a decade too late," Hakram said. "The total volume of goods traded between the empire and the Steppes is now about three fifths of what is traded within the Steppes, by the Tower's estimates."

Surprise from all of them, but only the chief and the shaman grasped what that implied. Hagvor grimaced.

"You can't cut the flow of goods without impoverishing and starving too many people," Hakram said. "Either Troke turns on you to keep his seat or he'll be facing rebellion from half the clans."

"An empty tent is an invitation," Bjarte quoted.

They realized it too, then. Their measures were all sensible ones. Bronze urus could be minted in the Steppes, there were rich deposits of tin and copper barely touched, and it would mean no longer being dependent on Praesi coinage. A council to mediate disputes would clamp down on internal wars save those sanctioned by the 'High Lord', which would be used to purge enemies of the throne. Holy grounds bound to the title of High Lord would make an effective capital for the Clans that could serve as a place of truce and a way for the Split Tree to begin their revival of what they considered to be the heart of orcish culture.

Only none of this could be done if Troke bucked them off or the Clans fell into civil war. In Hakram's opinion, Troke cutting

