Once this gets established and starts producing Named individuals who are much more effective (for example, understanding and using story-fu) then anyone who doesn't go will be at a disadvantage.

For Names like Page and Squire, their respective mentors will want them to go.

anon

Four typos:

"a singe bottle" single*

"The fought as barons"
They*

"Thought here are objections still."
Though* there*

"might not longer"
no*

superkeaton

Called it, that Academy Black argued with Warlock about would be something he'd seek to accomplish even now.

Daniel E

Jokes aside, seems to me that this plan would seriously screw with Above & Below's pissing contest. On a less metaphysical note, I can't see any of Below's Named actually going for this. Heroes who can compromise sure, but Villains would essentially become Chaotic Good.

Andrew Mitchell

> this plan would seriously screw with Above & Below's pissing contest.

Absolutely. I think that's the driving force for making the Accords a reality. It's a way out that benefits all people and (at least) limits the cycle of destruction created by the gods contest.

caoimhinh

Yeah, it establishes rules of engagement and limits the destruction caused by the clash of Named (which is inevitable to happen as more often than not the presence of a Named spawns other Named around, be it support or oppose them).

"the strife between Named I fully intended on making a continent-wide tourney, a pit fight that'd allow the Gods to claim their due and the rest of us to keep on moving."

JJR

Except if you screw with the gods too hard, they might just call a mulligan on your existence and settle the bet with a different world. The fae were leftover from the first time their world building didn't get them to an answer.

Andrew Mitchell

Exactly right. Important to get the balance right.

caoimhinh

Yep.

In a more serious manner, there are lots of practicality issues for an Academy for Named. More specifically, that people come into a Role in response to actions they are specifically taking, and they get empowered to attempt to carry on their will on the world.

In theory, having Named learn about many things relevant to them as the rules of engagement and the consequences of Narrative to their lives is important, and many of us jumped to imagining ways this could develop in a proper school (because it's incredibly fun to do that); HOWEVER, in practice this is far more likely to be a type of seminar of only a couple of months that every Named will have to attend and then sign a few oaths to bind themselves to the Accords and abide to the agreements maybe even enforce them onto Rogue Named that refused to attend the Academy.

As Named come to their Name in dramatic circumstances more often than not, they will have personal agendas to pursue right at the moment they become Named, so they will naturally be more reluctant to travel to an Academy for many months or years considering they come to their Roles in the middle of some kind of mess, until that mess is solved is highly unlikely they would leave.

Maybe Amadeus saw this and decided it's better to have it as a Magic Academy that houses the Named Seminars for Accords Appliance (NSA) since Named are unlikely to spend a long time in a single place unless their story is drawing them there.

Shveiran

True enough.

On the other hand, this is once more a temporary matter. Cardinal, if done right, could change how most perceive Names ("talented folks get to Cardinal, then get their Names, don't you know nothing? That's proper heroes, that is") and thus it would become a self-fulfilling prophecy of sorts.

The system can work; the problem is merely implementation, even if it is a huge one.

Andrew Mitchell

> "talented folks get to Cardinal, then get their Names, don't you know nothing? That's proper heroes, that is"

Hahahhaha. Fantastic way to illustrate your point. A+

ninegardens

Where do you think they're going to house Cardinal?

Is it going to be part of the city in Twilight? Will it be in Paeres (for political reasons, so as to reduce the isolation that Black mentioned), in Callow (nice and central?)

Personally I put bets on twilight... but I'm not sure if the realm is stable enough (magically) for some of the more... experimental sciences.

parahacker

One question: Will this also be a research school?

Liliet

For mages? Probably.

For anyone else? Hard no unless they feel like tangling with gnomes.

Eric Mueller

This story has been enthralling, and is easily one of the best web serials of all time.

cainerahlld777

I LOVE that THIS was how you broke down the Accords, so well done.

This was such promise... in another world this could be the start of the whole Hero & Villain Academies theme, the War Games, Ranking based on Level (Depth of Name, Aspects, etc) oh My word 😊

Beautiful world you're sharing, thanks much.

cainerahlld777

I LOVE that THIS was how you broke down the Accords, so well done.

This was such promise... in another world this could be the start of the whole Hero & Villain Academies theme, the War Games, Ranking based on Level (Depth of Name, Aspects, etc) oh My word 😊

Beautiful world you're sharing, thanks much.

Chapter 58: Prolong

"All are free, or none. Ye of this land, suffer no compromise in this."

– Inscription on the founding stele of Bellerophon

My heart skipped a beat. Certainly, it was no deep secret that I had bound Akua Sahelian to the collar of the Mantle of Woe and there would be some who suspected the true nature of the 'Advisor Kivule'. Still, none I'd not brought into the secret had ever spoken of it until now save for Kairos Theodosian. And the Tyrant could have bargained for that knowledge with the Dead King, who knew all of my deeds that Masego had known of, or even through the use of whatever aspect allowed him to be so sharply perceptive of the wants of others. Black, though? If he knew now it was either because officers of the Legions-in-Exile both knew and had passed it along since he woke, or because it'd been known to him before he was captured. Or maybe, I reluctantly thought, he'd just known me well enough from the start to tell where that story was headed.

"Flowery language, that was," I carefully said. "Perhaps a little lacking in precision."

His face had grown no easier to read, for all the purported insouciance he'd been carrying himself with since he woke.

"Use them," Black said. "Our madmen, our warlocks and sorcerers. Give them laws, give them coin and great undertakings to embrace. Else they find all these on their own."

I calmed, the slightest bit. It was still no small thing, he was speaking of – Cardinal as neutral grounds for the Accords as well as the seat of the legion that'd enforce them by steel if need be would already be costly, but to make it a centre of sorcery as well? I was no great scholar of sorcery, but I'd had a close look at the deep pockets required for the sort of research that Masego and his father had considered to be leading-edge. The costs to both found and fund a mage's school would be daunting, to say the last. He wasn't wrong about the virtues of keeping Praesi mages occupied, though, especially those who would have before then spent much of their years learning the intricacies of diabolism. The notion of even a hundred furious highborn Wasteland warlocks out in the world with little left to lose was the sort of thing disasters were made of. And quite possible Named, though I'd always known that dropping this large a stone in the pond would cause ripples. I'd counted on it, in truth. If instead of ruinous wars between Good and Evil I could instead make the crux of the conflict strife between Named that heeded their laws and did not? Then it became a war of Names, not nations, and Calernia avoided another coming of Akua's Folly.

"Did you perhaps believe I meant the shade of Akua Sahelian?" the green-eyed man casually asked, smile sudden and sharp.

His sense of humour, it seemed, had not been gentled by the loss of his Name. I supposed that'd been a little too much to hope for.

"Oh, it would please some of High Lords to have her placed in position of importance," he conceded. "Yet when it comes to the Doom of Liesse, my advice will always remain the same: no matter how clever you believe your scheme to be, it isn't. Kill her now, in full and beyond anyone's mending."

"I have a purpose for her," I said.

"And she for you, Catherine," he chided. "It would hardly do to forget that. If a single victory was all it took to bind the highborn to one's cause, the Tower would not change rulers the way other lands change seasons."

"I know that," I said, a tad sharply. "There's a lot you don't know, Black. Couldn't know, because after I told you to get your shit together you instead decided to take a walk through the heartlands of Procer with a torch in hand."

"A calculated measure meant to ensure the Principate could not continue waging war as it had," he said. "The morality of it I've no intention of debating, though I'll say that if the First Prince of Procer intends to use massed levies to fight wars then she marked her peasantry as a war asset by her own hand."

"You condemned hundreds of thousands to a slow death by starvation," I flatly said. "Not innocents, perhaps, not all of them. But certainly non-combatants. There are manners in which waging war is acceptable, Black, and you used to know them. You didn't allow sacks during the Conquest, or any of the other myriad atrocities that followed the old Legions like a loyal dog."

"I set boundaries appropriate to the manner of outcome I desired," Black calmly replied. "As I did in the Principate. There can be no peace settlement with a crusade, Catherine. They end when one side is no longer capable of prosecuting the war. I took the most swift and plausible path to that ending."

"You also failed," I told him. "Failed hard enough my Marshal had to commit Callow's armies to bailing out your own and I had to tangle with two of the most potent heroes alive to take back your soul after they'd fucking cut it out."

I would have thought less of him, after, if he'd made the argument that the legions under Grem had bled not long before to defend the Red Flower Vales and so relief had been owed. It was true, and the debt that lay there was one of the reasons I'd not entire lost my temper at Juniper's adventurous western campaign. But it would have been, implicitly, an admission he'd expected someone to step in and save him. Coming from the man who'd taught me to pray at the altar of taking responsibility for one's actions, be they righteous or wicked, that would have been... disappointing.

"Indeed," he frankly admitted. "I significantly miscalculated in both assessing the danger posed by the Grey Pilgrim and the lay of the strategies decided by Calernia's great powers. Marching the legions north towards the Stairway would have been the correct decision, in retrospective. Klaus Papenheim would have followed us and so arrived to bolster the defence of Hainaut in time to avoid losing the shores. The losses would still have been bloody for both him and Malanza's hosts, still leaving the First Prince in a vulnerable position but without having committed either my legions or your Army of Callow to the field."

The assessment was spoken clearly and concisely, like some surgeon slicing open the cadaver of a mistake one word at a time. At least he wasn't shying away from admitting he could blunder. And my own hands were not clean as driven snow here. Malicia might not have told him of her attempted dealings with Keter, but neither had I, so he'd made his decisions blind. And though the famine he'd wrought on the Principate was both a lasting shame and a lasting complication, it would have been dishonest to pretend I'd not also benefited from it. And from someone else doing it, too, so that my hands would not be stained by the deed.

"Procer wouldn't be so willing to bargain with me now if you hadn't first broken their wealthiest and most fertile territories," I admitted. "And I've reason to believe that the Grey Pilgrim went after you in particular to secure a hold on me."

He cocked his head to the side, sharp-boned face gone pensive.

"Not a hostage," he decided. "That would have carried... considerable risks. Forcing a confrontation on his own terms, then."

I looked at him then, the mind at work behind the pale green eyes, and still saw the bones of the man who'd become the Carrion Lord. He'd lost a mould of power, when he'd lost his Name, but the substance of what made Amadeus of the Green Stretch dangerous remained. A fresh mould might yet be found, I thought, and if it was what came of it would not be gentle. His eyes finally flicked to staff in my hand.

"Pattern of three," he deduced.

I dipped my head, an acknowledgement that at least I suspected as much.

"Congratulations are in order, then," Black said, to my surprise. "You have been marked the equal of one whose influence spans more than half of Calernia."

His lips twitched, but I'd learned to tell the difference between mockery and amusement with those and this was of the latter.

"I have higher ambitions still," I admitted.

"Indeed," he said. "You are aware that there are some who will say the council you propose will be the true ruler of Calernia from the shadows. Especially if your proposed enforced succeed at attracting Named as well as funding a standing army."

"It's not going to be a campaign army like Juniper and Grem command," I felt compelled to say. "It'll be meant for battles and hitting cornered Names who gathered people to their banner. For large-scale warfare we'd call on the signatories."

"That will always be one of the weaknesses of your Accords," Black warned. "You saw firsthand the shortcomings of a ruling council in Laure: voting blocks forming and personal interests coming to command the debates is inevitable. Forming a diplomatic council including an elected hero and villain to settle disputes will only aid so much, if every signatory's designated representative fights for their country's interests alone. Outside enmities and alliances will interfere with the diplomatic mechanisms functioning as intended."

"That's one of the reasons in need Praes to sign on and claim a seat," I admitted. "I'm not sure the League will sign on – certainly not as long as the Hierarch lives, however long that'll last – so without the Empire the signatories are essentially the Grand Alliance, Callow and the drow. It'll be too imbalanced."

"It is unlikely the Golden Bloom will deign to participate in such a treaty," he agreed. "Or the Titanomachy, for that matter."

Which meant Levant and Ashur, historically close allies since the Dominion's founding, and Procer with all its wealth and influence radiating outwards. Callow and the Empire Ever Dark, as nations on the outskirts who must deal with Procer to have any significant trade presence, would inevitably end up on the outskirts of the Accords' council as well. If the Empire was a signatory, the game changed. Ashur would have commercial interests on the Praesi coast, and the Wasteland would be closely aligned with Callow's own interests as it would be its effective granary and strongest trade partner. If the west pulled together so would the east, and that'd prevent any bloc from commanding a strong majority in council. Which, considering that I'd set in law that such a council could call on signatories for war against a nation in breach of the Accords, was essential if I wanted them to actually function as intended. If the council in Cardinal became a way for an alliance of nations to force its influence at the expense of others, the Liesse Accords would inevitably collapse.

"A roving band of Named enforcing your laws backed by an army will earn resistance in and of itself," Back said. "Yet combined with your insistence that Named cannot rule or own property of more than a specific total worth – which should be higher in general, by my reckoning, but significantly stricter on landholding in particular – it may very well be taken as the villain Catherine Foundling attempting to claim rulership of Calernia from behind a veil of shared laws."

"I won't have any particular authority under the Accords," I pointed out. "In Cardinal itself yes, but—"

"But the Woe makes up a significant portion of living villains, you are a ruling queen with great resources at your disposal and undeniably the most famous Named of your generation," he calmly interrupted. "It is near a certainty you will have a seat on that council as the representative for Below. That will be enough for rumours."

"Fine," I said. "But on the other side of the table, odds are it'll be the Peregrine speaking for Above. The man commands a lot of trust in the west, Black."

A moment passed.

"It has a story's shape," he conceded, which was praise and condemnation both. "That does not, however, change the truth that you would be risking war every time you tried to depose a popular ruler having come into a Name."

"It's necessary to avoid the worst Named can deal out," I insisted. "Sure, a Good King will usually improve things more than not. And a powerful Dread Empress binds Praes together for at least part of her reign, allowing for growth. But if they share a border, what would be skirmishing between mundane rulers becomes much more prone to escalation – and capable of escalating to vicious heights no one else could reach."

"A Good King being told to abdicate by a council mostly made up of foreigners will withdraw from the Accords and bitterly fight against any attempt to have its terms enforced upon him," Black said. "The Dominion sees its Named as figures of religious reverence, at least those from the great lines. Even if the Pilgrim backs you, you'd be using to obtain compliance the very trait you seek to eradicate. A tower of shallow foundations, that. In Procer you might find agreement, for Named do not rule there, but where else?"

"Named are under influence," I said. "Below or Above's, it doesn't matter, the judgement will always be impaired. Sometimes that impairment leads to upright deeds but even then it still remains a thinning of their ability to make clear-headed choices."

"Will you also place law in the Accords forbidding the crowning of a drunk or an idiot?" Amadeus asked. "These, too, are impairments."

"You know that's not the same thing," I said.

"I know you are attempting to dictate who can and cannot rule nations that are barely your allies if at all, nations you have not conquered or truly defeated, nation on which you are attempting to impose your personal belief in the face of centuries of culture speaking to other directions. And, most of all, this is directed at nations whose goodwill you need very badly for the Liesse Accord to exist as more than ink and fantasy," he said, tone never rising nor ebbing low. "You are overstepping."

My fingers clenched.

"You know we'd all be better off if we agreed on excluding Named from rule," I said. "Gods, even just Praes getting rid of some of its-"

"Until the Dread Empire itself desires the mending of that wound, no amount of treaties will change a thing," Black said, tone bland. "That was made plain to me, in knowing and truth. It is not enough to be correct in principle, Catherine. If you cannot offer a practical way to deliver on your beliefs, then they are wind. No one will agree on the Cardinal council having right to call signatories to war to depose a Named ruler, not even your own people once you've passed on the crown. It is best you make your peace with that early and prepare yourself to fight more salient battles."

He didn't suggest taking the articles out though, I noted. Ah, of course he wouldn't. Since in his eyes it'd never been something worth seriously attempting, scrapping it became an easy concession in a true negotiation. I wasn't convinced, honestly, that he was right. But I could at least consider him as a herald of the opposition I would face in days to come, and that meant at the very least some parts of this would have to be reconsidered. There was no point in making a toothless law, but one with too much bite might be even worse considering most of the signatories would have been recently at war with each other to one extent or another.

"Such as?" I asked.

"Your academy," he said. "True, without it the Accords die with you. If your rules of engagement are not carved into a pattern all must heed, they will fade the moment the strength behind them does. Yet you must address the inherent difficulties in gathering Named and forcing lessons and laws upon them."

"I'm not making a War College, Black," I said. "It won't be classes and lectures for both a fourteen-year-old Squire and a grizzled Unconquered Champion in their late thirties, that's doomed to failure. The main purpose of the that academy is to teach the Articles of Strife – acceptable levels of violence against other Named and Nameless – and set out rules of behaviour. I expect most will attend for a few months only and wander back out into the world. But they'll be wandering with the knowledge that seeding an undead plague in some village's well brings Named killers down on their head, that calling an angel down on a city will get your throat slit and that city quarantined. I can't control a continent's worth of Named, it'd be absurd to even try. But if I can teach them rules of engagement and get them to agree that those rules should be enforced? Then the Accords have already done half of what they were meant to."

"Short-sighted," Black said. "Do you not realize the amount of influence Cardinal – and by extension your academy – will inevitably accrue? The Good King. The Dread Empress. The Tyrant of Helike. The Grey Pilgrim. What do all these have in commons?"

"They are or can all be the head of their nation," I frowned.

Oh, I thought.

"The crowns of most of Calernia will spend at least half a year studying abroad in Cardinal," I said. "Shit."

He'd didn't need to expand on the point any further, my mind was already spinning. If I wanted the spending of months in a foreign city to be seen as more than an imposition on a sovereign or sovereign-to-be, Cardinal needed to provide more than just an education in the intricacies of the Accords. That much could be provided by tutors when it came down to it, and that meant no one had motivation to fund Cardinal's existence – which meant the weakening of a heart to them, and that was a death knoll in the making.

"Sorcerers," I said. "We'll need every damned one we can get, and any grimoire we can get our hands on. Teachers and books as well, of every subject and stripe. League histories, Ashuran atlases, Proceran poems. It can't just be for Named, can it? It has to be the school, so that when some angry kid with a sword and growing powers is offered a chance to study there it's an opportunity and not a chore. They have to want to come."

"Oh, you'll get more than Named and Named-incipient if you succeed at that," Amadeus of the Green Stretch smiled, thin and bladelike. "Gather such fine teachers, such deep knowledge, and you'll find even nobles sending their children there. Do you think any tutor in the Dominion could match the education you have spoken of? In Callow, in any city of the League? Highborn and diplomats and the ambitious seeking to become intimates of Named still in their rise: all these will knock at your door, demanding a place."

"That's..." I hesitated. "It'll cost a fortune. And you don't even know where the city is to be raised."

"I am not a fool," my father said, sounding amused, "so I do. You are still, deep in your bones, Callowan. You'll have it carved out of the Red Flower Vales, putting neutral grounds between yourself and Procer while also opening the gate to enriching trade."

I wondered how many more people had seen through that. It wasn't like it'd be a mistake to do that – as Queen of Callow I could cede enough fields to support the city from my side, and given the way Procer would be gaining much from the Accord while losing less than anyone else getting an equivalent land grant on the other side of the Whitecaps shouldn't be impossible. It was at the centre of Calernia, too the crossroads of the west and the east. Still, it would have been a lie to say I'd not intended the location of it to be boon for Callow.

"You'll be making the capital of a new age," Black said. "And so you must reassess your negotiating stance accordingly, or see yourself outplayed. It will not be your backyard alone, Catherine. You are founding the royal court of Calernia itself."

And his lips were quirking as he spoke, like the world demanded that they turn into a smile regardless of his wants.

"I need you to see it through," I admitted. "I need you at that table, speaking for Praes and signing the Accords. Gods, I need you just to have someone I can speak to about these things."

Someone who, unlike Hakram and Vivienne, had desires sometimes estranged from my own. Who'd look at my schemes and see weaknesses I had not.

"Help me," I asked. "Help me to break the Game of the Gods."

He looked away, at the hung parchments that laid out my fool's dream in ink and law.

"A better world, is it?" he pensively said.

Pale green eyes narrowed, something cold at the heart of them. Like great cogs of steel, made to half yet stuttering back into movement.

"It can be done," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said. "And if nothing else, it ought to be an interesting way to spend my twilight years."

I am curious, did EE post this just after midnight by mistake...?

M0och

Also awesome chapter!!

Go Vote!!!!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

taovkool

Hard boiled wars with Named and pther assorted monsters vs school life drama.

I'm not sure which is worst, to be honest. Odds are about equal, I think.

edrey

if you read douluo dalu you won't find it too bad. the principal ends like a general in the continental wars, uniting all the powerhouses and ignoring the rulers8

Sckarred

Douluo Dalu is bad for other reasons, like the usual deus ex machina powerups, some martial art style that is somehow literally better then people on the path to godhood..

Mental Mouse

School life drama with Named and other assorted monsters. Occasionally interrupted by hard boiled wars (hi Neshie!).

Andrew Mitchell

Vote here to guide 😊 others towards the PGtE experience –
<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

laguz24

How much do you want to bet that somewhere along the way everything gets screwed up and her dream does not come out to what she intends?

M0och

A great deal milord!

A very great deal indeed!!!

Liliet

I'm betting against 😊

Pzarndt

I'm guessing that the academy survives, but Calernia remains divided. So much story potential in old friends from school coming to power as leaders of enemy nations.

The magic school keeps the academy popular, and the named portion of the school teaches them how to manipulate a story as well as Black and Cat can

Ultimate_Procrastinator

...I am prepared to pay far more to read that sequel series than I would for most physical book series

Zach

Isn't this literally the plot of the new fire emblem game

Mental Mouse

> teaches them how to manipulate a story as well as Black and Cat can

Well... most students simply won't be capable of that. But they can get a decent grounding in the common storylines and major hazards thereof. Now, people keep appointing Pilgrim to university positions, when the thing is he'd first have to live long enough to make it a "lifetime position". The dude was already into (we think) his 80s before getting resurrected in slightly-damaged condition. For normal people, 80s and up is into "just keeled over one day" territory, and that's when they're healthy. He could live to 100 or more, but I wouldn't sell him any life insurance. Not even with exclusions for "acts of war" and "acts of the Gods"! 😊

What he might live long enough for, is to finish writing his journals/memoirs, including his newest insights. 😊 And of course his memoirs will be a required text at the Cardinal School....

Sanctvs obscvrvvm

Chills, she will really manage it, at this rate.

RoflCat

>If you cannot offer a practical way to deliver on your beliefs, then they are wind.

So, what you're saying, is there needs to be a Practical Guide for it.

Mennolt van Alten

The final chapter of this fiction will end with
'And that is a comprehensive overview of the making of The School and the start of the age of the Nameless Rulers.
– The Historian, compiled for course HA4-101: History of the Age of Named'

antoninjohn

She should have started this plan after she ruled the continent
edrey

as a shadow ruler, you mean. otherwise she is dead

Javvies

Excellent.

Amadeus is on board and his experience is helping point out where Cat's inexperience is showing.

edrey

well, how many cities were in the everdark? as a lakemancer she should have stolen a few right?

Andrew Mitchell

I'll just leave this right here...

erebus42

That is a pretty awesome line. This probably says more about me than anything else, but if I was a God and my creations managed to break the game of my peers and I and essentially flip us off, I'd be way more proud of them than angry. Idk maybe there is something to that whole Sacred Betrayal thing.

Andrew Mitchell

You're definitely one for Below then... 😊 ... Me too, my friend, me too.

edrey

sight... Praesi.

TeK

Dunno, if I was playing chess, and our pawns staged a bloody coup, I would be less than pleased. Probably burn it all for fun and giggles.

doominator10

If my pawns staged a coup, then I would just get a new set of pawns and scrap the old ones... I wonder what Bard is up to these days.

Faiir

Seriously?
I'd get a camera and start filming.

Liliet

Given that that's basically already what the Gods were doing , , ,

Author Unknown

You should definitely be a Dungeon Master then.

Gerionar

The gods promoting freedom (the chaotic ones) will welcome the breaking of the game, since this is what they always wanted. Those who argued it would be best to rule over the mortals (the lawful ones) will be tempted to flip the board. They will send the Bard at Cat and to everything to keep the Game going. The longer I think about it the less I think that these two factions are identical to Above and Below.

Liliet

I think that is not not the right interpretation of the prologue.

One faction thought that they [the Gods] should guide their children to greatness. The other faction thought that they [the children] should rule over other creatures and each other.

And that's Above and Below.

Both factions are generally in favor of mortals doing whatever the fuck they get up to, since that's the essence of the wager.

erebus42

Idk man, that sounds like House of Light propaganda to me...

Liliet

I mean the prologue is that period, duh

werafdsaew

So it looks like Name rulers are here to stay.

konstantinvoncarstein

If Named are the product of a culture, ruling Named are too. And therefore impossible to eradicate without a massive change of this culture, which is impossible to implement without causing revolts. And a all-our war.

medailyfun

That was expected as being the most unrealistic demand of the Accords

Andrew Mitchell

Yep. Honestly I didn't see it as much of an issue but there were a lot of good arguments presented in the comments that made me change my mind. And Amadeus agrees with the commenters so its a done deal now.

Liliet

Mhm! Binding them to the Academy is a much more realistic solution to the problem :3

caoimhinh

I like how Amadeus leads Catherine so she can reach the conclusions of his points without him outright saying it. I'm kinda surprised she hadn't seen the reach of that Academy until Amadeus pointed it out that they were the leaders of the Calernia. Maybe she was really convinced that they were going to agree on banning Named rulers.

It's also cool that he is like "Ok, asking to ban Named rulers is overstepping (which was his polite way of saying it was dumb, arrogant and impractical to attempt) but don't take it out of the proposal. We'll use it as a concession to get leverage in pushing something more important and practical."

Amadeus immediately saw the coming conferences and the signing of the Liesse Accords as what they were: a negotiation. Which was what Cat had failed to see, she expected every country to agree and sign by common sense and force of arms, but she expected them to accept the Accords in their current form, which was obviously impossible.

Amadeus hasn't even read the whole document and is already improving it; fuck, he hasn't been awake more than a few hours and has already started to put in motion and improved the plan to change the whole continent.

A sharp mind indeed.

Liliet

TBF Catherine is 20. She's lucky af that the first person to look at her Accords and criticize the fuck out of her inexperience showing is her teacher ♥ ♥ ♥

(Who will ever remain such, formal apprenticeship being over or not)

(btw, I love how his revised-in-retrospect plan for acting after getting trapped on the other side of the Vales involves getting Papenheim's army to Hainaut in time ♥ ♥ <3)

caoimhinh

Yes, but that was glaringly obvious, and being so versed in Name lore and story-fu as she is, she should have known better. I mean, her defense when Amadeus pointed it out was "but we'd all be better off if we agreed on excluding Named from rule", there was no practicality there, only wishful thinking.

Also, the Accords' current form is not Catherine's work alone; Hakram, Akua, Aisha, Vivienne, and many others participated, just last chapter we were reminded of the many hours spent talking with lawyers and professionals of political science, many chapters ago it was also said that the Woe consulted with experts of Praesi, Callowan and Proceran law for the current documents of the Liesse Accords.

I would expect at least Hakram to know, as he is aware of the process it took to disappear the Warlord Name from the Orcs. Maybe he kept quiet because he wanted Cat to realize this on her own, or maybe he was waiting for the appropriate time to bring up the subject? Maybe Hakram thought the same as Amadeus and simply went "well, this can be a concession during the negotiation, let's leave it there".

Liliet

Akua didn't participate, and I'm guessing there are so many detailed practicalities there that they got consumed by those and details of the big picture were left at stage 1. They were answering the question "how can we make THIS work?" rather than "what exactly SHOULD we be trying to achieve?"

KageLupus

I think this is actually a really good example of Cat's other point, that Named have influences which make them think and behave differently. It is not just whether they are on team Above or Below though. Every Named is a little crazy in their own way. There is some thing that drives them so fully they end up with their Role.

For Cat it has always been other people being selfish and impractical when it is so obvious (to her) how you could make the world a better place for everyone instead. That little hiccup in her thinking is one of the things that lead to her being Named. Cat can look at a problem and say "Well if we all do X then this isn't a problem and everyone wins." Black is reminding her that other people will hear that and say "X shouldn't apply to me" because they don't care about everyone winning.

You are right that it is strange for Cat to not realize that other people wouldn't agree to the no Named rulers clause in the Accords. But it is not because she didn't think about it. It is because she can plainly see that it would be the best choice, so people not going along with it just doesn't make as much sense to her.

Liliet

"It is not enough to be correct in principle" <= this is a conflict from alllll the way back in her first Name vision, the one after Black stabbed her. She called her Good twin 'Idiot Twin' for just that. Sounds like that's the direction she found herself leaning anyways :3

Fayhem

> It's also cool that he is like "Ok, asking to ban Named rulers is overstepping (which was his polite way of saying it was dumb, arrogant and impractical to attempt) but don't take it out of the proposal. We'll use it as a concession to get leverage in pushing something more important and practical."

It's not like I didn't like Amadeus already, but that's still some extra brownie points right there. I don't want to make this about contemporary politics bc that tends to turn into a shitshow real quick so I'm not going to name any names, but it high-key makes me crazy when politicians proactively compromise on their positions in advance and act like they actually expect that will make their opposition not push back and try to make them compromise on their proposals now. Like. No. They will always push back, because that's what makes them the opposition instead of your allies. And now you're getting pushed into compromising from your compromise, so JUST STOP IT ALREADY.

Alright, I'm gonna go breathe into a paper bag now. Good talk, guys. tl;dr – Amadeus smart, and I'm super disturbed that I like an avowedly Evil villain's style of seeking positive change better than most of the people I actually get the option of voting for.

caoimhinh

Well, Amadeus is Evil, after all...

I actually saw it more as a business deal mindset, like starting the bargain by asking a price that you know it's too high to actually sell the thing, then slowly compromise into selling it at a lower price but still within your winning range.

Which is absolutely what they have to do, practicalities aside, as their opposition (Procer in particular) will not let this be "a victory for Evil" so they won't let the plan go unopposed and unquestioned, specially when so many of the points are unequivocally an advantage to Callow in particular (like the administration and location of Cardinal, for example), no matter how much Catherine tries to say this is for the whole continent, the ones most benefitted from the Accords are Callowan. So the Proceran Princes, being the kind of bastards we have seen for 5 books, will not let that slide easily. It's the kind of mindset of the person who is fine doing a job for ten thousand dollars, but will raise a ruckus if they find out that the other members of the team are getting paid a hundred thousand.

Liliet

Well, admittedly Amadeus's brand of Evil somehow magically includes "binding warlocks to a higher purpose" and considering the good of the many to override the good of the few (including yourself and your inner circle)...

Fayhem

Also, re: Catherine not seeing this stuff that seems kind of obvious – this is exactly the phenomenon of being too close to something to see it clearly after you've been living and breathing it for months while you build it from the ground up, and it's exactly why smart people don't rely on themselves or their immediate collaborators to catch everything and instead bring in trusted outsiders prior to actually releasing something to give an eyes-on and point out anything glaring. Which is exactly what Cat's just done at the earliest plausible opportunity, and just look at how quick she is to pick up on legitimate feedback when she gets it.

In other words, this isn't an example of Cat being uncharacteristically dumb IMO, this is more like a demonstration of just how smart she actually is. This is exactly best practice for formulating this kind of major project/proposal, and there's a reason for that. The fact that she's as subject to that reason as anyone else isn't a slight against her intellect or a failing as such IMO, and the fact that she's almost flawlessly implementing that best practice here I think is a testament to her actual intelligence.

Gerionar

See rule no. 12 of the Evil Overlord List.

Although Amadeus is no five-year-old, the same principle applies.

Liliet

Great analysis, thank you! 😊

edrey

if you read douluo dalu you won't find it too bad. the principal ends like a general in the continental wars, uniting all the powerhouses and ignoring the rulers

caoimhinh

In almost every Xianxia, the Martial Arts Schools and Cultivation Sects are pretty much countries of their own.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

That was exactly the father-daughter terrifying politics bonding time I've been waiting for.

Faiir

Hey Black, what are we going to do today?

Same thing as always Cat, try to take over the world!

Andrew Mitchell

Hopefully with a LOT more success than those other two!

BlackPhoenix7777

And once more Amadeus proves himself the best character. Gods Below, I love that monster.

Alivaril

I'm still not really sold on the Accords. Yes, it'd make for a neat setting and I can see the heroes cooperating, but the villainous side of the table? I can't realistically see them sincerely agreeing to become glorified gladiators instead of actual, y'know, Villains. Insincerely agreeing, maybe, but that just means the villages of undead will be created a little more quietly, inevitable failure be damned (and Damned).

And here I was hoping Cat's endgame would be to force Fate into a physical form so she could stab it. :V

Agent J

All's fair in love and conceptual murder.

agesbe

The thing is, most villains aren't Kairos. They have a goal beyond being a villain. Cat isn't trying to end all conflict, she's trying to make it clear to everyone that certain things are not okay. I am not actually positive where undead plagues come in this.

edrey

plagues are good examples of cause, consequence and process. i am little curious in bandit like names, it would be a great problem, not to mention names like assassine

Hitogami

Assassin is a great name though? They do surgical strikes (minimal collateral damage) and will most likely end up enforcing the Accords.

Panchoadrenalina

I think is because you are seeing 2 sides (good evil) when there are 4. As we saw in the mess in twilight.

Practical/pragmatic good (pilgrim)

Practical evil (cat)

Mustache twirling evil (kairos)

Unyielding good (saint)

And we have many examples of all of the sides. The practical sides will join in cardinal fighting those who will not go there. Fun

Lithrandil

Well they are basically the Geneva Conventions which work so I would say they have a decent chance to work.

Snycke

Do the Geneva Conventions really work, or is it just a document we all signed off on and then ignored?

Liliet

We are at least trying to pretend it works, which is a major improvement over considering things it's banned natural and par for the course.

WuseMajor

It depends on the villain. Masego really just wants to study the universe and maybe dissect a few gods. He'd honestly probably enjoy having a very clear cut set of rules for what is allowed and what will get a hit squad sent to murder him.

Akua really just wants to do GREAT things, I think. She can be awesome or awful, as long as she's provoking Awe. So... give her things to do. Allow her to be the Great and Powerful person she needs to be and she will be your slave. I suspect there are many wizards who feel this way. They're a bit like Sparks.

The Alchemist that the Saint mentioned, the one who was experimenting on humans, I am...not sure about. Given that, after being threatened with death should he backslide, the first thing he did was go find a powerful leader who could protect him and get him experimental subjects, I kind of feel like he'd betray the rules the moment people stopped watching him. That said, getting him a teacher who could help him see that, maybe you don't need to experiment on people, might have made all the difference. It's impossible to know.

So, yeah. Depends on the villain. The hero too. I'm not sure the Lone Swordsman would sign and the Saint would probably rather chop the head off everyone involved than see anyone sign them. I mean, she'd probably assume that Praes would sign eagerly, then go right back to brewing plagues in their basements, forcing the heroes to fight them with one hand tied behind their backs.

Mental Mouse

> I'm not sure the Lone Swordsman would sign and the Saint would probably rather chop the head off everyone involved

Good thing they're both dead!

Liliet

"Glorified gladiators" is in this sense something they've always been. Fighting for the gods' purposes is what Catherine means here. She's not introducing new indignity, just acknowledging that the existing one is the limit on how far the peace can go.

What the fuck would villains want to antagonize heroes for? Consider Kairos Theodosian, the most textbook example of a Villain For The Evulz we've seen, and consider how his game in the Free Cities had been to exploit the existing system and put his own candidate in charge – through legal process, if with a good helping of mass murder. He didn't aim to destroy the League or the Good cities, he didn't need it for anything. The organization that accommodated him, he took full advantage of, and has since been very willing to do diplomacy, too.

As far as villains are concerned, the world around them consists of tools and obstacles. Catherine's arranging the obstacles so some paths to achieving their goals would look a lot less attractive / easy than others, and placing tools within their reach so they'd know the locations of the obstacles for a fact. Consider the killing street in the battle of Marchford: armies follow the path of least resistance. So do villains.

Not to mention those who would be fully satisfied with the existing system full stop, like all the numerous mages. See, indeed, Masego.

Sure, for some villains the undead plagues etc are the end rather than the means. They are a very small minority though, and those who can't be convinced to pick an end that will bring them actual renown and glory rather than an inglorious end at the hand of absolutely everyone else at the same time, are a smaller minority still. Isolating and killing those is the point entire.

Alegio

I'm pretty sure she knows that they are just gonna say yes without meaning it at first. But after a couple of classes of "If you kill civilians we will literally use a portal through another dimension to f"ck you up wherever you are" most of them will probably listen.

Andrew Mitchell

> If you kill civilians

I'm pretty sure there's going to be limits on the types of things you can do, and not just a blanket ban on ANY killing of civilians. Cat's going to stop any large scale abuses. To set the limit at zero is entirely impractical IMO.

Liliet

Yes, well, a hyperbole is appropriate in this rhetorical context 😊

IDKWhoitis

I can see a parliamentary system being in charge of Cardinal. Not the academy itself, although the headmaster would probably serve as the representative of the school itself. But the city being run, and the international diplomatic missions would probably have a council of sorts.

This can either turn into every major power owning a section of the city, to ease the burden of funding the city, and allowing the different sections to be extraterrestrial. This would also ease the worries of foreign powers (specifically Prócer and Callow) from having too much influence within the city.

I doubt a D.C. System would be appropriate, with several embassies, and the academy owning pretty much the rest of the city. Cardinal would have to be self sufficient in that case. It would make Cardinal a separate entity in the world and that has both benefits and challenges.

Liliet

I think Cardinal being self sufficient is very much the goal here – not one that Catherine has realized yet, maybe, sure, but,

IDKWhoitis

There's a difference from being self sufficient from the beginning and being self sufficient 10 years down the line after everything is built. Even then, a matter of interdependencies will act as a binder between nations.

It's why I find it very likely that Cardinal will have to be bought in by everyone, so that everyone is invested in not only a financial sense (which is important as well) but a cultural and philosophical connection to Cardinal. If Cardinal is to be the Socio-economic powerhouse with the Political power that would make it the de facto Capital of Calernia, it cannot be perceived as "other" by some of the countries. Levant and Ashur must feel a connection to Cardinal to see it as anything other than a foreign city deep in Callow/Prócer. Cardinal would be stronger politically if it was seen as the battleground for interstate diplomacy. Trading internal politics for external politics.

In the financial sense, the startup Capital required to build a city in the mountains is going to be, to put it lightly, a couple metric fuck tons. Prócer and Callow are two battle torn countries, and Callow wasn't wealthy prior to the war, so even if they could fund it (which would be a pain to extract as a Concession from Cordelia) we would see a clash in influence and finances from the get go. Meanwhile if everyone buys a section of the city, the start up funds are secured, influence is roughly equal, and Cardinal can start accumulating money off the trade routes it will tax and economic activities itself will generate.

Liliet

Pretty much agreed entirely.

JRogue

You charge people, Nobles specifically.

Named get to attend for free of course. Magically inclined students have to pay a fee of some kind. The children of Nobles? They get charged out the nose so their children can rub elbows with up and coming Named and other soon to be powers of the continent AND get a top-notch education to boot. Also, charge each nation a fee to lease the land their embassies are built on.

Like Amedeus said (have to remember to stop calling him Black) Nobles will be chomping at the bit for their kids to be there. If given the lands and you give people a reason to settle and work those lands from Callow and Procer, food shouldn't be a problem. It will be the crossroads of the continent, so Merchants will want to be there, a small tax on goods will also give more money. Additionally, with all those Noble children there, plenty of Artisans will show up. Tailor's, all kinds of Metalsmith's, Carpenters, Jewelers, etc. It will be THE place to be for people who make things. A tiny tax on these people charging exurbanite prices will add up quickly. The Tax Collector would become a new Name attached to Cardinal, probably one of many Names specific to Cardinal.

I would be willing to bet more than a few Named Artisans pop up too, possibly further expanding the neutral Names.

The money is there, more than enough to support the city and the school.

IDKWhoitis

The Start up capital is the horrendously hard part. Everything you said, is true in the long run once things are built. But to clear the mountain passes that were blown beyond recognition by Warlocks dance, the start up capital must be acquired. Cardinal will need Investors, and getting the Nobles to buy into the idea will take time. At this point, National budgets vastly exceed what the Nobles can bring to bear. (National budget in Callow being what Cat can "convince" the little nobility that is left to "loan" her.)

JRogue

Absolutely true, the first real financial hurdle is start-up capital. Procer and Callow will be giving land grants, so that will have to be considered part of their "tithe" if you will. All Signatures will have to chip in money, but also possibly manpower. I think the Warlock and The Witch of the Woods battle may actually help, its already blown up, just gotta move it now. Also, Goblins will be more than willing to lend a hand, encluding engineering help, properly compensated of coarse. The mountainous area offers all sorts of stone to build with, I cannot recall how wooded the area is.

The one thing that could be a problem is that it has to happen fast. Grey Pilgram will not be around forever, he is already old and I imagine what just happened aged him more. Maybe a large, well planned Legion style camp as a basis, then start building from there.

The logistics of this is fascinating to me.

Mental Mouse

> The mountainous area offers all sorts of stone to build with,

Lately including some which probably aren't native to Creation proper...

>I cannot recall how wooded the area is.

I'd be amazed if anything survived the battle.

Fayhem

Basically you have my yes to all of this! I'll just add that charging nobles shatteringly high tuition to attend will be extremely easy to present as a feature, not a bug. Nothing makes it easier to sell something as a prestige item than making it stupidly expensive, and there's literally almost nothing nobles (and rich people who want to feel socially equal to nobility, like merchant princes) love more than prestige. And the only reason I say almost nothing instead of nothing is because the more ambitious nobles will prize power more highly... which this kind of high-end hobnobbing is also useful for cultivating.

Liliet

Yes.

And yes.

And yes 😊

IDKWhoitis

I also wonder what specifically prevents the Dead King from signing the Liesse Accords. The same arguments used about Praes can also be applied. The other nations may bitch at first, but there are specific pragmatic reasons for allowing it.

What the Dead King gets:

- Not getting labeled as The Big Bad
- Another area to fight the Bard over
- A way to spread his influence over the millennia
- A way to slowly fix his PR
- A means to foster, and potentially scout useful Allies in the future.
- Surviving the current war while gaining something. (Cat intends for the Drow to take Keter anyways)
- A means to integrate himself into the wider international community, and smother future crusades in the crib.
- Peace and quiet (he's not in love with war, and only really prepares as much for it because he lacks other methods for countering the Bard)

What Cardinal gains :

- Keter (maybe just a lease, with significant DK presence) , solves Cat's bargain. Creates a buffer zone between DK and creation at large.
- Not having the Dead King be an enemy they have to topple (this is already going to be monstrously difficult, and likely won't kill the bastard outright)
- Access to undead labor, very cheap for construction, usage within the city, and farming afterwards.
- Access to a portion of the undead army, which the control of can be transferred over. Undead would make a great first wave as the mediator force, they don't need to worry about logistical concerns, they move fast because they don't tire, moral is not a concern, or no sympathizers/spies. The upkeep is very low. They can maintain a high state of readiness for extremely long periods of time. Casualty rates for the undead mediator force would not impact concerns of politics between nations (no debate about who takes first wave, or waiting for nations to gather armies).
- The Dead King's very large library of knowledge, both magical and mundane. Especially the name lore.
- A way to mediate the Intercessor, which will always be Scheming. Having a counter to that force is necessary.

Andrew Mitchell

You're making a very, VERY convincing argument there. I've gone from not considering that a question at all; all the way to thinking it's probably going to happen.

IDKWhoitis

My internal debate is whether Nesh reaches out with malicious intentions or if he would actually like to join it. Him saying he wants to join would be met with the same public reaction that Cat saying she wanted to join the Great Alliance. If he screws around with PR a bit, he could sink the credibility of the Accords before any terms are signed. But he is smart enough to just let the question hang in the air, and maybe prod along Cat and Black to make it feasible the Accords asks him instead.

Time will tell, because there is going to be an end to this monster of a war soon, one way or the other.

Mental Mouse

> whether Nesh reaches out with malicious intentions or if he would actually like to join it.

OR? Joining the Accords would give him insider access to Cardinal before he drops his first magical eaves. And he knows he'll outlive almost all the founders. This is that "100 years peace", but without confining him to Keter, and giving him a direct voice in your own counsels.

ninegardens

Given that Nash was like "Cat, do you want 100 years of peace" and she thought about and said "No", I don't see this working. As far as Cat is concerned (And Procer), DK is going down, no ifs, no buts, no questions asked.

I don't see it happening.

Liliet

Same. It would give him a position that nobody wants to give him.

medailyfun

Well, Cat't war on Keter is just a convenient way to deliver the Accords papers. :o)

Hellspirit

The big question is... Is the Dead King a name?

Thanatoss

Yes, it was stated somewhere that Dead King is Name. Probably most powerful Name there is. It was stated that there are only 3 Named as powerful as Cathereine (when she was most powerful in Everdark) Sword Saint, Ranger and Dead King.

IDKWhoitis

It is likely a Name. We haven't ever seen him use an aspect, at least not in recent memory.

Sean

On a purely utilitarian level what you say makes sense, and I agree the Dead King himself would love a chance to support Cardinal. But... You have to keep in mind the Dead King has essentially been responsible for dozens of attempted and partial genocides against the other signatories of the accords. That's not the sort of thing folk are liable to forgive and forget.

IDKWhoitis

This could be seen as declawing the Dead King in a martial sense, while allowing him a foot in international politics. He would be the one coming down from a position of martial supremacy.

Meanwhile we see old Nesh gain a lot of potential tools and opportunities to expand and exploit his influence. This whole thing is dependent on him to find this more useful than the thousands of kilometers of land he just conquered.

And in the face of the butchers Bill that will be pushing back the Dead King, Calernia may choose to temporarily forgive past transgressions, if it means an end to this war other than status quo.

Prócer is broken for at least a generation, they have lost their North, the people of the North, and their Center was just put to torch and likely mass starvation is going to hit. That is not a nation that can weather the sorts of madness the Dead King can employ if he really cares about not being pushed back. I'll eat my hat if Nesh isn't holding on to worst kingdom killers than Black Water or chemical warfare that will make WW1 flinch.

Fayhem

> This could be seen as declawing the Dead King in a martial sense, while allowing him a foot in international politics. He would be the one coming down from a position of martial supremacy.

Except, he isn't. There's no actual disarmament involved in the Accords. He'll still have all his armies and all his sorcery and all his etc. The Accords just impose "if you cross these lines, everybody comes down on you". And that's already pretty much what happens when he invades, as we're seeing currently. So you would be giving him what you acknowledge (and what everybody else would certainly recognize) are “a lot of potential tools and opportunities to expand and exploit his influence” when the only thing he loses is actually nothing, since the Accords can’t impose any consequence beyond what he already faces as the default. So you would be giving the Dead King – literally the Dead King, Mr. Genocide himself as far as the rest of Calernia is concerned especially by the time this war is done – a whole big lot of something for nothing. That’s a non-starter on the face of it. No offense, but I don’t understand why anyone is treating this as plausible.

If what you’re referring to is DK also voluntarily handing back the North, cancelling the war, and going home (which upon reviewing your comment again I think is what you’re suggesting?), well, that’s a whole separate thing from the Accords as such. The Accords do not per se have anything to do with stopping wars between nations, they just limit the terms of engagement especially for Named. So if what you’re suggesting is offering DK the right to join the Accords in exchange for massive territorial concessions and an indefinite truce for free and he actually goes for that, then that will instantly cement everyone’s belief that the Accords are a trojan horse for the Hidden Horror, because why else would he just hand over so much for apparently so little? At which point you have just kneecapped your chances of anyone else wanting to stick with them – good luck selling “hey, come send your children, heirs, and heroes to hang out with the Dead King’s trojan horse in one convenient location that is now electively within his influence!”. And then when the Accords fall apart the thing you were offering the Dead King in exchange for his retreat is no longer available to offer, and so he is no longer going to retreat. And now you have neither the Accords or the North back. I just really can’t see this idea ever being seriously entertained by anyone – I mean, Kairos might suggest it just because that’s how much of a troll he is, but if anything that just highlights what a bad idea it actually is.

P.S. – also, what Liliet said. DK didn’t invade because he got bored and they don’t get cable TV in Keter, he’s actually after something. Assuming this is just about the Intercessor is I think missing the point – it doesn’t appear to me that he opposes the Intercessor as a primary goal, he opposes her because she’s the most dangerous/formidable obstacle to what he actually wants. Oh, and the whole point of the Serenity is that his position is never static because even when he’s been driven back (or “driven back” depending on your level of cynicism/paranoia) he’s still able to continuously build his strength.

Liliet

All of this ^^

Liliet

What the Dead King loses:

– whatever the fuck it is he actually wants out of invading Calernia

IDKWhoitis

Him invading Calernia is more of a power play against Bard than owning the continent. He gains very little in just owning Calernia outright. Akua has already covered how his realm in Hell is already better than anything he can hope for on Calernia. In his willingness to trade peace and even a fragment of his immortal soul, we can see that the Intercessor, not Calernia is the point of this war and 4 way shitshow in the flying city. Even when he asked for territorial concessions from Malica and Cat, he was more than willing to partition territory and allow his "Allies" to survive. He even let Triumphant own Calernia, he had no problems not owning territory in those wars. His immortal nature makes the shifting of borders a matter of time, and right now his only option for making diplomatic plays is war. He is not in a weak position, true, but he is stuck in a static one. In any great game, a static position will eventually be overrun.

We know the Intercessor will always be there to arm the next crusade, make the next batch of heroes. Even him winning this war, is a defeat in the making, because it shifts narrative weight ever so slowly to the Intercessor favor.

The Hidden Horror is not stupid or vain, he does not gain much by being an enemy or holding onto a thousand kilometers of land. We know he is capable of taking the positions and even enjoys doing so like a game. We do know that he has ascertained a secret about the Intercessor. One so insidious it would break her influence for a generation. What does he gain from staying the big bad here? Why would he not want to spread this secret to truly screw over his opponent?

ninegardens

Do remember that he is invading partially on HER invite ("Eat the baby").

Also, I'm pretty sure he IS trying to take over the world (or at least continent). He is just doing so very slowly, and VERY carefully.

Mental Mouse

> We do know that he has ascertained a secret about the Intercessor. One so insidious it would break her influence for a generation.

It would be really funny if he tries to spill his secret, and everyone's like "Duh, we figured that out ages ago".

Hitogami

It's sounds so damned amazing!

Bruh

Cardinal seems kinda similar to the huntsman academies from RWBY.

Liliet

IIRC one of them was called Cardinal :3

Shveiran

Sniff. So much mentoring.
I'm so much in love with this relationship.

NZPIEFACE

>If you cannot offer a practical way to deliver on your beliefs, then they are wind.

Finally, back to our roots.

Liliet

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH ♥ ♥ ♥

I love that it's made clear Catherine is attempting to bite off a bit more than she can chew – on her own, at least. This is a project that will benefit from EVERY player at the table taking it seriously as a goal. Catherine both can't and doesn't need to do it alone, and that's the entire point ♥

caoimhinh

I just remembered that Refuge is actually sort of a mini-example of what Cardinal is set to be.
A neutral power, independent of other countries, but strong enough that nobody fucks with it and is also controlled by Named. It even has a small school for Named, as we know for a fact that Ranger raises and trains Named disciples, I think in book 2 it was said that there were currently five such disciples, we got to know Archer and Hunter, and Indrani mentioned another, I think it was Beast Tamer.

The important thing is, there is a precedent for this, albeit in a smaller scale and less impact, but still is a relevant thing as it adds impulse to the story. Also, involving Ranger in the project would be a huge boost for it, as she can serve as a neutral party and an awesome instructor.

Plus, both Catherine and Ranger have experience dealing with the Kingdom Under (Refuge is nominally a Dwarf protectorate) so that can also be a huge boost to the Liesse Accords and Cardinal, there's still potential to be explored in other directions than what Catherine has apparently considered so far.

Mental Mouse

Archer also mentioned another (Sorceress?) who brews potions from the magical plants around Refuge.

edrey

the problem here is the only rule of refuge is whatever the lady says, and ranger is beyond mad

Aotrs Commander

listens

Did you hear that snap?

That was Cat and Amadeus snapping the world between their fingers....

Mental Mouse

So, rounding up: I had guessed a while back that Cat might have to yield on the Named-ruler thing, that's looking more likely. Good to see more elaboration on my concerns about The Committee.

Re: IDKWhoItIs's idea of DK signing on: I'd assume the other signatories would have to agree to accept them! That said... The problem is that for DK this is still a short-term game, it would be really hard to find a way to really bind him, but that's exactly what they'd need. The thing is, existing plans are for the Drow to surround and perhaps occupy Keter, keeping him out of Creation – that would seem to make his interest moot in any case.

Liliet

It's nice to see the concerns we had about the Named rulers confirmed and elaborated upon ♥ ♥ ♥

Harixx

I just cought up, and now I'm sad:(
I need more of this!

Andrew Mitchell

Well, lucky for you we get a new installment every Monday, Wednesday and Friday; plus one extra chapter with the first installment each month. An amazing work output given the consistently high quality.

You can support Erratic Errata's work on Patreon if you want to <https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>

TheGlyphstone

Is it wrong that I really, really want to see a Cardinal spinoff now set post-story? High school comedy-drama with superpowered students, toying with the tropes of that genre as thoroughly as PGtE did with classical high fantasy.

Andrew Mitchell

Not wrong at all. Based on the recent comments I think many people want a sequel, spinoffs and fanfiction.

Hydrargentium

This, too, has the shape of a Story: wise teacher and talented student coming back together after years apart, to create some great breakthrough idea, the student in her prime, and the teacher coming out of retirement for his final work.

Hg

ninegardens

So.... just realized, while thinking about Cardinal etc...

Laurence was right in her assessment of Cat. The city of Cardinal is EXACTLY the kind of thing she would strive to rip out tooth and claw, a place where arrogant Procer nobles will hang out with treacherous Praesi nobles, a place of Sorcery unbound by the gods or common folk, a place that will be at best Lawful neutral and more likely in the region of lawful Evil for much of its history. It's a place of nobles- exactly the sort of thing the regicide would hate.

A place of "rot", as it were, reaching out its tendrils across the entire Continent. Given the moneys and ambitions involved, it will be VERY easy for this to become an "academy of evil"- even with a constant influx of Heroes (I mean, "Bestowed").

Laurence wasn't paranoid, she wasn't stupid, she wasn't blinded by prejudice or past actions. She read Cat correctly. She read EXACTLY the kind of bullshit that Cat was capable of forging, and she didn't like it.

The only mistake in some sense was that the Twilight realm was actually pretty tame compared to what Cat had planned for later.

Daniel E

I feel like the GM's of this Game will not appreciate their players going off the rails, as it were. They might even be inclined to force the Game back onto its' proper track.

Liliet

We'll see.

But we know there's precedent for 'dual color' political positions in the same government, on another continent. This is likely still within boundaries.

Mental Mouse

Remember, per the Bard's comments, when the Dead King "bit the hand that fed him" (presumably by conquering a plane of Hell), he didn't get smited or anything... Below just got less generous with their "gifts" to future Named. Even when he tried to conquer a second plane of Hell, he got slapped down, but within the rules of Creation. Reading between the lines, it might have been "hey, if you're gonna be out conquering Hells, that's gonna leave you vulnerable to attacks from other players (oh hello Elf-King, have you met my old friend Neshy? Now, don't be jealous... 😊).

nipi

I see what Amadeus is doing by pushing for a Magic school. While it is true that other nations would benefit from it too, the fact that the Wastland has the greatest abundance of those with the gift remains. Meanwhile the school will need lots of magic tomes, ingredients, teachers – stuff that is likely to come in no small part from the Empire. That's both bargaining material and later positions from where to influence the students.

Mental Mouse

The flip side is that it pulls the center and the leadership of Calernian sorcery, away from Praes and towards Callow.

benthelynx

But Black has always been okay with that if it gets him what he wants. He'd rather have a small slice of a big cake than a mini cupcake to himself

Liliet

I love this metaphor!

Mental Mouse

Black may be OK with it, Malicia and the big-name Praesi sorcerers... maybe not so much.

Liliet

The big-name Praesi sorcerers are probably going to not care, assuming they get pulled there along with the center. Which is exactly the plan.

Malicia, uh, well... Amadeus is kind of past the point of asking her opinions on that, which means so is everyone else 😊

benthelynx

Oh definitely. Malicia maybe. But it's an outside chance. But the highborn as a whole would never go for it.

benthelynx

So, will Black be emperor or headmaster?

Andrew Mitchell

I think Amadeus (he's no longer Black) would quite happily die on the way to achieving this vision provided his sacrifice helps Cat. (Remember he does see this as a worthwhile way to invest his "twilight years". I think Cat wants him to stick around afterwards to enjoy the results. Personally I think he will end up having to become the Emperor of Praes but that's not a strongly held view.

Javvies

Amadeus will be Emperor. He's the most successful and lowest body count acceptable option for Praes. While he would be an excellent head of Cardinal, in terms of knowledge base, skills, and experience, he would have more problems dealing with the Heroes and Procerans.

Besides, other people (Cat and the Woe) can do the job of running Cardinal nearly as well as Amadeus could, but he's basically the only way to bring in Praes, including the greenskins.

mavant

LOWEST body count?!

Javvies

Yeah.

There aren't many viable options for Praes. It's Amadeus as Dread Emperor, Cat as Dread Empress, or a breakup of the Empire.

The latter two options result in open warfare. The former may result in warfare, but it will likely be more limited and likely involve a lot more of Assassin being let off the leash to clean up High Lords.

Liliet

I agree with both of the above and add my vote as "both in succession" Or At Least That's How I Would Write A Sequel Fanfic.

Amadeus gets the Empire into shape and prepares an acceptable successor, then abdicates and goes into his true passion – teaching.

I am willing to back up that latter statement with textual quotes.

ninegardens

I kind of love the fact that many of Amadeus's teaching quotes are "I don't really know anything about how to teach a person, and thus am not actually planning to do it. By the way, here are a stack of books, and let me introduce you to several named and a large number of story tropes. Now lets analyze your thought process on previous events and review"

Liliet

Y e s.

My favorite however remains that one quote with him chastising himself about his lack of patience with slow students...

...referring to the Grey Pilgrim...

...while bound, held hostage, about to have his soul cut out, and bitter as all hell about his old friend's death.

But he could never be a good teacher. He just doesn't have the patience for it!

Iris

The thought that these incredibly breathtaking and intriguing books are but a prequel to the story that EE actually wants to write has been getting progressively louder in my ear during these chapters. If, in fact, I turn out to be right in my hopes, then this is one of the most well put together prequel series of any great writer I've ever heard of. Just imagining the fact that what we've been gifted so far is but the start of a world that EE plans to write and develop even further after PGTE gives me shivers.

I really hope the last chapter in some way ends with us realizing we've been simply reading a well put together memoir of Cat's that she wrote after it was all done to show the true life of the person who brought peace and the birth of a new world to Creation.

Iris

I just realized that if what I had previously mentioned comes true, we'd have ourselves the making of another Riftwar level book series.

Chapter 59: Review

"To repudiate what lies at the heart of Praes – ambition, skill, learning – would be a mistake, yet to allow those traits to be principle rather than tool has been the mother of a great many dooms. The greatness of olden days must be put to modern purpose or see itself turn irrelevant to the lay of Creation."

– Extract from 'The Death of the Age of Wonders', a treatise by Dread Empress Malicia

Afternoon soon drifted into evening, and it seemed for a moment as if I'd found the Laure beat of affairs once more: too many things to do and so little time to do them. The herbal brew Hakram had made me took the edge off the pain just enough that if I remained still while seated it didn't throb too badly, so I took full advantage of the relief when seeing to the many duties that'd piled up while I slumbered. Still, I did not regret having a physical need to sleep once more even if it ate away at the hours I could work. It was a pleasurable sensation, sleeping, but also one I'd found grounding in some ways. It was easier to make mistakes when your thoughts ran uninterrupted for days and nights, like a hound chasing its own tail. Sleep was a wedge in between it, a way for thoughts to cool and distance to come down. I'd need another night's sleep, I decided, before speaking of the Accords with my father again. I'd not made nearly as good an argument for the banning of ruling Named as I could have now that I'd had time to better gather my thoughts – no one touched by a Choir, for example, should be allowed anywhere near a throne – but I would not resume the back and forth without rest and preparation. Besides, we'd both have demands on our time for days to come.

Marshal Grem and the Legions-in-Exile had been parted from him for months, simply getting the bare bones reports about months of campaign in order would take at least a day. And he'd have more waiting, especially now that scrying worked properly again. No, Black would have busy days ahead and myself even more so. By the time I'd come down from the barrow-top there was a mixed honour guard of legionaries and Firstborn, dzulu from the Brezlej and Soln sigils, waiting for me along with Adjutant. A full line of veterans from the First Legion, Marshal Grem's personal command, was waiting for Black slightly to their side. I offered them a respectful nod and got the same in return. Legio I Invicta had fought like lions in the Red Flower Vales, I'd been told, facing down a charge of Lycaone heavy horse the White Knight himself had led. I would not forget anytime soon that the Legions-in-Exile were the same who'd fought in the defence of Callow. For those that'd remained holed up in Praes while the wolves howled at my gates I had no great fondness, but these? They'd bled for my home, even though once upon a time they had also conquered it.

I claimed a comfortable seat in the First Army's war council tent, hiding under the broad table how carefully I had to manage my leg, and as Hakram stood by my side I sunk my teeth in the day's first work. Casualty reports began it all on a high note. The Army of Callow and its sister-legions from Praes had taken negligible losses in last night's battle, and though Ivah came bearing the drow losses in Rumena's name it revealed the losses there had been relatively light as well. Less than two thousand dead, and though the Levantines had found a surprising amount of success while killing Mighty – my Lord of Silent Steps mentioned that the warriors of Tartessos in particular had made an impression – most those killed had not been sigil-holders or even rylleh but lesser Mighty. The Dominion has pulled out some sort of enchanted or blessed lantern that'd interfered with the Night, and the least of the Mighty had been struck hardest by it. Both the League and the Alliance would have gotten significantly worse off from last night, which was a damned waste of soldiery on the eve of war to the north but also a boon to my own diplomatic position. The situation of our supplies was a great deal less promising, unfortunately.

The Hellhound had arranged baggage and foodstuffs for a long campaign, as she'd originally believed it might be necessary for the army to seize the principality of Arans to hold it against the Dead King's advance, and the Southern Expedition of the Empire Ever Dark had been dragging around the supplies I'd bargained for with the dwarves throughout its Iserran fighting. We were not, by any measure, in danger of running out of food or necessities soon. But the Army of Callow had been campaigning for months now, and probably would have suffered from a steady trickle of desertions were it not the middle of winter in hostile foreign lands. Professional soldiers or not, my legionaries needed rest and recovery before going into another fight. That would be difficult to arrange in Procer, I suspected, and while the details of the use of the Twilight Ways remained unknown to me I doubted they'd be much more efficient at moving troops than the Arcadian paths. That meant bringing my soldiers back to Callow would take them out of the war for at least the better part of a year. I couldn't do that. Victory or defeat against Keter might very well be decided by then.

The issues with the Firstborn were more complicated in nature, and I ignored the irritated look on Juniper's face – and the fascinated one on Hakram's – while Ivah expanded on them in Crepuscular. One sigil-holder, the Mighty Zoitsa, and two rylleh from other sigils had been slain in the fighting. The former Zoitsa Sigil would have begun tearing itself apart over succession had General Rumena not personally intervened and broken all the limbs of the two most prominent rylleh aiming to claim the sigil. The other two casualties had prompted power struggles as well, as the complicated weave of alignments and enmities that made up the upper levels of a stable sigil was upset by the removal of two high-placed killers. Those had, for now, been kept under control by the own sigil-holders. But my decree that drow could not have killing duels while we were on campaign was being tested sorely by the situation, and the strain was showing. Rumena had politely suggested that I come adjudicate the matters myself, which was enough to tell me it was serious. It was almost never polite to me if it could help it, and its command of the southern expedition gave it the right to settle such disputes without my involvement in principle. If my presence was being sought, then it meant neither the respect nor the fear General Rumena commanded had been enough to settle the situation.

"I'll come after dusk," I said. "Unless the general believes the situation is so dire as to require my immediate intervention?"

Ivah bowed low.

"It is not so, Losara Queen," it said. "The general has remarked that containment will be more... arduous after the coming of Night, but under pale light all will be brought to order."

In other words, Rumena was willing to run roughshod over the squabblers while the sun was out but would have to get pretty hard-handed to keep it all under control after Mighty started slinging Night around. Fair enough. For all that it had been appointed general and commander of the southern expedition by divine mandate, Rumena remained very much a first among equal: there were limits to the orders it could give without having to spill blood to see them enforced. Ivah left, and I marked the whole situation as a cauldron I'd need to see settled before it tipped over and burned everybody else. And Hells, this was just a single sigil-holder and a pair of rylleh. How bad would it get when we started taking real losses? Another method needed to be put into place, one that didn't end up with Mighty turning on each other violently whenever one of them died.

"What did the drow want?" Juniper asked.

"They're having some internal disputes," I grunted. "It'll be taken care of."

The orc eyed me carefully, then accurately guessed that if I believed she needed to know more about that then she would. The conversation moved on to the debate on whether or not the old Legion tradition of ale rations being broken out after a victory should be indulged with so many other armies camped around us. I argued in favour, for not even the League would be foolish enough to think an evening of drinking would be enough to save it if it resumed hostilities now, but Juniper dug in her heels at it being an unnecessary risk regardless of the improvement to morale. A compromise over shifts that'd allow at least half the army to be on war footing at any time was being put together when Vivienne joined us, a little over an hour before sundown. Wearing a practical cloak and dress over boots and trousers, the heiress-designate to the throne of Callow strode in looking pink-cheeked and well-rested. We dismissed the general staff, after that, and she settled at the high table by Hakram's side when he finally took a seat instead of standing by my side like some grim green gargoyle.

"Indrani?" I asked.

"Wandered off after we ate," Vivienne replied. "You know how restless she gets after a long sleep."

From closer up than the former thief suspected, yes, though usually having slept together beforehand made her slightly more mellow about it. Knowing Indrani she'd be having a look at the League positions or feeling out the half-there paths into the Twilight Ways. In the overwhelming majority of situations she was more likely to be the danger encountered than the one encountering danger, so I wasn't all that worried about her safety. She'd drift back in to check on Masego before too long anyway.

"She'll turn up," Juniper gravelled, unmoved. "Damn hard woman, the Archer."

Coming from the Hellhound, that was high praise. I fished out my dragonbone pipe and stuffed it, calling on the slightest touch of Night as I passed my palm above the bowl. I breathed in lightly before looking up, finding the other three gazing at me expectantly. A heartbeat passed.

"I've only got the one pipe on me," I said. "And I'm not sharing, folks."

Irritation for Juniper, resignation for Vivienne and some sort of rueful amusement for Hakram.

"Yours talks with Lord Black," Marshal Juniper said. "How did they go?"

My brow rose and I glanced at Hakram.

"Everyone knows," Adjutant admitted. "Even putting the matter under seal would have changed nothing. Word began to spread before you were even all the way up the barrow."

Merciless Gods. No one who made jests about gossiping fishwives had ever served a term in an army.

"The Exile Legions haven't withdrawn or begun to muster, so it can't have gone too badly," Vivienne noted.

The Jacks were still hard at work, it was heartening to see.

"I have his backing for the Liesse Accords," I said. "He's not committing to a stance on the Tower until he knows more of what's happening in the Wasteland."

I caught a look between Juniper and Vivienne, which had me suppressing a spike of irritation. From these two in particular, the impression that things were being hidden from me would remain ill-received for some time.

"The Observatory works again, though essentially crippled in capacity," Vivienne volunteered. "Fadila Mbafeno repaired what she could, though she maintains that without Hierophant's personally attention it is a fantasy to attain full functions."

"But our scrying web is back," I flatly said. "What have you learned?"

"General Sacker moved east on the Blessed Isle," Juniper said. "Our man in Summerholm – Legate Asadel – requested that she evict the Praesi refugees before taking up positions on the shore."

Which, considering that we were feeding General Sacker's legion out of Callowan granaries, was a request that'd carry a great deal of weight.

"Legate Asadel," I slowly repeated.

"Fifteenth," Juniper said. "Taghreb, originally one of General Hune's at the War College. He's loyal, Catherine. No reason to doubt that."

There was always a reason to doubt that, I thought, though if you did not learn where to draw the line such worries could only drive you mad.

"I take it the refugees declined to follow the orders," I said.

"They also called on Governess Abreha's protection, which was granted," the orc continued. "Household troops were sent to discourage Sacker, but she picked out their positions and broken them in night raids. Then she set the refugee camps on fire and ordered shot any who fled west instead of east."

I let out a hissing breath.

"Shit," I said. "Tell me the announcement was enough, Juniper. Tell me one of our own fucking legates didn't have a role in the slaughter of terrified civilians."

"One caravan was butchered," the Marshal of Callow said. "Two hundred dead, we think. Children were spared. It was enough to get everyone else running."

I closed my eyes. Breathed in, breathed out. Why was it that the moment I took my eyes off anywhere it all went to shit? No, I thought, that wasn't fair. If Legate Asadel was a contemporary of Hune's and so the rest of is back at the College, then he was no older than twenty-five. His rank was high, for one his age, and while part of that might have been talent it was also undeniably because we were running out of College-taught officers and most the veterans of the old legions we had left had loyalties too complex to be entrusted dangerous postings. I could not put men and women still green around the edges and then become furious when they made mistakes.

"Recall Legate Asadel," I said, opening my eyes. "Move him to a garrison where he can't do any damage and replace him with someone more seasoned."

"No one in Praes will raise a ruckus of the civilians, Catherine," Juniper said. "By going into Callow they were abandoning Tower law."

I saw Vivienne wince from the corner of my eye.

"Aye," I said. "That's true. And also the finest argument I've heard for Black's old dream of putting every highborn in the Wasteland to the sword. Recall Asadel, Juniper. That's an order."

She nodded.

"That won't be all," I said. "Get on with it."

"Governess Abreha deemed the attack on her household troops to be treason, given her Tower-granted rank," Juniper said. "General Sacker replied that she was following orders from the Black Knight, supreme commander of the Legions of Terror, and so therefore it was Abreha's own interference with her operations that was treason. She lodged an official protest with the Tower."

"The Empress won't knife High Lady Abreha in the back so soon," Hakram said. "Not to Sacker, of all people, who has ties to the Matrons and remains a close associate of the Carrion Lord. Malicia might need Abreha either dead or disgraced, but if she throws her under the wheels now then she might as well abdicate to the Black Knight."

If a general's mere claim to be working at Black's behest when he was on the other side of the continent was enough to make the Dread Empress back down, then Adjutant was absolutely correct: she'd have effectively stated herself to be less influential than one of her own right hand's servants, and so by Wasteland standards she'd be meat on the plate. On the other hand, could she really afford to throw to the side the Legions-in-Exile? Given that she'd lost Foramen to the Confederation of the Grey Eyries and her coastlands were a bloody wound, I'd argue not.

"The Empress is considering the petition," Juniper said. "But has yet to act on it. General Sacker seized the western shore of the Wasiliti and dug in. It's been a standoff with Governess Abreha ever since."

I grimaced.

"We need to find out who General Sacker answers to," I said. "It best be Black, because if it's the Matrons we have trouble on our hands."

The fledgling goblin nation south of the Hungering Sands could only benefit from enmity between Praes and Callow deepening, since history had made it clear that the Tribes could only fail if they attempted to stand against the Dread Empire on their own. An embittered Callow, on the other hand, would have a vested interest in keeping the Confederation standing as a thorn in the Wasteland's side. And considering my kingdom had largely adopted the war doctrines introduced by the Reforms, we'd keep needing goblin steel and munitions only they could produce. They'd have good we wanted, and we'd share a common enemy – alliances had been built on less. Unfortunately for the Matrons, they were planning their schemes blind. They had no real idea of what went on this far west, and they would not be aware of anything related to the Accords. They were fighting last century's war, not this one, playing a game of Good Queens and Dread Empresses when that was the very manner of existence I want to strike a match over. If they were brought into the talks, I suspected they'd sign. If nothing else, the clause establishing that a signatory nation attacked by a non-signatory one could call on the aid of all other signatories would get them interested. Either as a deterrent for a non-signatory Praes, or because Praes had signed and they could not afford to be on the other side of that rule.

Yet they were blind, at the moment, at a lot of damage could be done by an assembly of vicious old goblins matrons pursuing what they saw as their own interests.

"Vivienne," I finally said. "Anything to add?"

She bit her lip.

"There are rumours," she said, "that Malicia is calling near every highborn in Praes to the Tower."

My brow rose.

"Why?" I asked.

"I don't believe anyone knows aside from her," Vivienne admitted. "The usual rumours are there – the edict making it treason to claim the Name of Chancellor is to be ended, she seeks another Black Knight or a spouse – but there's nothing certain. Whatever she's planning, though there's a lot of expectation."

"Given the recent string of disasters, such a great assembly of highborn would either see her deposed or her reign secured for many years by a great victory," Hakram opined. "She's rolling the dice on her reign."

Malicia doesn't roll dice, I thought. She only ever plays when she believes she'll win for sure. Sometimes she was disastrously wrong about that, as she had been at Second Liesse, but no one was without blind spots and I suspected in some ways Black was hers. This, though? This was Wasteland politics and she'd danced around these well-dressed killers without missing a step for decades. If she was acting now it was because she had something in the works that'd secure her hold on Praes. She would not expose herself to the wolves of the Imperial Court for anything less, in my eyes. I breathed out.

"Send an official messenger to the Carrion Lord, then," I drily said. "Requesting a sharing of intelligence concerning Praes tomorrow. Odds are he'll know more than us."

Vivienne nodded, I noted, instead of Juniper. Interesting, that the Hellhound would recognize her as the higher authority in diplomatic matters even when those matters involved Black and the Legions. It was the implicit mark of a respect I'd been well aware did not exist when I left for the Everdark.

"We need to determine where the army's headed," Juniper bluntly said. "We're wearing thin, Catherine. Your return and a win did wonders for morale, but it's been a long winter and we fought through most of it. Even if it's up north we're headed, I want winter quarters raised and a rotation of leave for soldiers. The edge will grow ragged otherwise."

"I can't give you an answer to that before the diplomacy's been worked through, Juniper," I replied just as bluntly. "And for that I need to sit with the Pilgrim, and likely Arnaud Brogloise – if not the First Prince herself through scrying link."

Whatever the Hellhound would have answered to that I was not fated to know, for before she could speak the Advisor Kivule was introduced. My eyes moved in surprise to Akua's veiled silhouette even as she entered the tent and bowed.

"The Hierophant is awake, Your Majesty," the shade said.

I rose to my feet, ignoring the throb of pain from my leg.

"Meeting adjourned," I said, and they all knew better than to gainsay me on that.

doominator10

[Mumble grumble fumble] VOTE HERE! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Anyways, let alone the notion of Praes being a signatory, I have strong doubts that anyone in the grand alliance would ever consider legitimizing a nation of goblins as an entity that can even sign the accords in the first place.

Sparsebeard

I think they'd want them both to sign, considering that the accord are mostly about restraining the power of named and nations.

I mean, agreeing not to use angels, other weapons of mass destruction and restraining their named methods only makes sense if the opposition also agrees.

If no evil nations sign, there is no point to the accords...

doominator10

It's not a matter of just getting evil nations to sign, it's legitimizing a goblin nation in the first place. Heisenbach already had a drastic time just calling Catherine Queen of Callow instead of Queen in Callow. What kind of legal, moral, and religious rigmarole would they have to go through to even see goblins as a sapient species that are not automatically classified as monsters?

Or maybe my Innverse is bleeding into my thoughts here idk

Liliet

Queen in Callow vs Queen of Callow is a matter of legitimacy of a Crusade against her. Cordelia has no justification attacking a Queen of Callow, while a Queen in Callow leaves her with room to claim she is totally restoring Callow's rightful government. Meanwhile a goblin nation explicitly weakens Praes, although it does also lend the east and additional seat in the council. Still, anti-greenskin racism is not a popular look in Good nations (see: Dorian, and see: Rozala's surprise that horses are in fact afraid of orcs).

Alignment with the matrons or against them is a matter of realpolitik, and right now I think nobody will have motivation enough to gainsay Catherine on this.

Shveiran

We saw that greenskin racism is not the standard everywhere, but I think it mostly stems from the fact that racism is mostly enmity spawned by sharing a border with Praes, the Eyres or the Steppes for a long time. Callowans are greenskin-racist, and though it doesn't seem most Procerans and Free City folks are, I think that might not be the case for the Dominion?

Darkening

Going by that one Deoraithe character we saw a perspective of with the Lone Swordsman, even the Deoraithe see them as more worthy opponents than subhumans. So it's mostly just Callow proper. I imagine there's plenty of individuals around in the rest of the world that dislike orcs/goblins, but I expect it's not to the same personal extent.

Javvies

Actually, I'm pretty sure it's mostly just William/Lone Swordsman who saw greenskins as subhuman monsters. The other Callowans we've seen tended to harbor inherited dislike, hate, and/or fear of greenskins, but not to the extent that Willy did. And even that often got muted by actual sustained day to day interactions.

Shveiran

I don't disagree, but I think there is a wide margin between "not quite Willy" and "not racist". Being afraid, disliking and hating a culture because it's that culture is pretty much the textbook definition of prejudice, isn't it?

Javvies

There's a difference.

For most Callowans, they have an inherited grudge, dislike, fear, and hatred related to greenskins because of all the times it's been greenskins invading Callow in the old (pre-Amadean Reforms) Legions of Terror.

Now, while that's easily enough called racist, there's a difference in degree to the point that it's effectively a difference in kind as well, between the standard Callowan position and Willy's position.

And, for that matter ... the standard Callowan position isn't entirely unjustifiable, again, going back to all those times greenskins were in the van of invading Praesi hordes.

Shveiran

As I said, there is a difference between William's views and the average Callowan's. A meaningful one, even, like you argued.

But the world is not divided between Williams and Non-racist-people, and thus I'd argue that being uncomfortable with William's view does not mean one is not also south of the "non-racist" line.

Personally, I'm uncomfortable defining as "justifiable-adjacent" any attitude that judges people in light of the category they fit in, rather than judging on their own merit.

I don't mean to be a pain nor to take it out on you: I'm just arguing the point because, where I live, in the current times, it's common for people to justify hate crimes with "I was angry because one of their kind had molested my friend a week ago".

It is understandable for Callowans to have a prejudice against greenskins; it is an understandable instinct.

To allow that instinct to guide one's actions is not, however, justified.

Much like is not one's fault for feeling jealousy, but it very much is for them to beat their spouse out of jealousy, it's understandable for a Callowan to feel suspicious of a greenskin, but the right thing for them to do is still to look beyond the fangs and judge the individuals on their own merits.

Javvies

You're right. There's a difference between "they're not subhuman monsters" and not necessarily being racist.

On the other hand, we've also seen that the inherited grudge and prejudices that is typical for Callowans to have regarding greenskins has tended to go away or at least be substantially muted after they have actual sustained interactions.

This is in large part due to Black's policies with the Legions being seen as protecting average Callowans against the Praesi High Lord Governors during the Occupation, and the actions of greenskins in the 15th, the fight against Akua, and more recently, fighting the Proceran invaders. Hakram doing most of Cat's work and being in charge of the recovery and refugee efforts has helped too.

There's also a (sometimes reluctant) recognition of the fact that it was Praesi High Lords, Dread Emperors/Empresses, and Black Knights in charge, and the greenskins were expendable sword fodder, not the people in charge (except when the clans were independently raiding the Deoraithe).

Liliet

Rereading this discussion randomly, can I just add that the recognition of the fact the greenskins were just sword fodder would be in large part due to Black saying so in that one speech pre-Liesse? That wonderful asshole.

Liliet

My point is nobody will object to a sovereign goblin nation on the basis of them being goblins. Not that kind of setting :3

Lizzie

Sadly, this seems like a world where someone would object just as a way to manipulate others into giving them a better deal on their end.

Liliet

True, but Cat has leverage to spare.

Andrew Mitchell

So, just like the real world. 😞

Sparsebeard

If anyone is considered as monsters on Calernia the closest would probably be ratmen or even to some degree drows before Cat's foray into the Gloom.

I don't think we've seen anyone dismiss goblins as a people... In fact, despite oppression and rebellions, they were part of Preas for a long time (pretty much a nation within a nation).

We are pretty far from having bounties paid to adventurers for goblin ears...

Barthumphries

The Goblins would be all over that because 1) they officially have no Names, 2) they of course use no weapons of mad destruction, and 3) have no angels.

That goblin fire must be made by demons is true, but how would you go in and prove it?

The goblins have everything to gain and nothing to lose by signing, and getting everyone else to sign.

Javvies

Not made by.

Goblin munitions allegedly use "powdered devil" as an ingredient. Akua implies that goblinfire most likely employs powdered demon or demon juices as an ingredient (or otherwise employs demons or demon components as an ingredient).

I think goblin munition and goblinfire production is likely going to slide through a loophole in the Accords, probably on purpose.

From what we know about the Accords, summoning extraplanar entities such as Angels, Devils, and Demons, is not okay as a direct weapon/attack, but Angels and Devils are okay within certain bounds, IIRC, the phrase was something along the lines of "angels and devils can be summoned to provide advice". Ie, remember after second Summerholm, Warlock summoned a devil for a bloodline ritual – that kind of thing would still be okay.

Liliet

"Civilian labor" was the exact quote. I suspect "getting ground into alchemical ingredients" counts ;u;

anon

I wonder if angels giving people their feathers to use as swords can be lumped together in the same category as goblin fire

Mental Mouse

Yeah, that loophole will also cover anything summoned as part of Praesi infrastructure, such as the Tower's demon doorkeeper.

Liliet

They're not using it for military purposes unless they're getting invaded badly enough the Tower is getting breached, checks out!

Mental Mouse

I would not assume that the goblins have no weapons of mass destruction! Indeed, the Accords may need a "miscellaneous" clause to cover them. 😊

Alex

I wonder if Malicia is gathering the highborn to use her aspect of Rule.

IDKWhoitis

Her unseemly demise could potentially follow, because that is a ripe moment for her Aspect to fail or weaken. If Malica is struggling to hold on to power, I would think the psychological stress could be enough to thin her Name's power. Just as Viv's did. Also, I would think there's a non-zero chance that Highborn in Praes (at least the really powerful ones) would gain some sort of resistance or know some spell to lessen the effects of Emperor-tier named. Otherwise, Dread Emperors would be unbeatable...

I find it likely that Malica may be forced to either:
(potentially multiple of the following)

- 1.) Accept a Chancellor
- 2.) Disavow Amadeus
- 3.) Massacre as many Highborn as she can before a Civil war starts
- 4.) Summon a demon or activate a ritual array
- 5.) Enact some degree of reforms (either rolling back previous ones or instituting favorable ones for the Highborn) 5B.) Enact highly favorable reforms for the Clans, to secure her Northern border and cement her own seat of power.

6.) Set a deadman's switch on herself, that tie the fate of Praes to her staying alive and in power (which she arguably did with the Dead King pact, but she may tie in other horrifying insurance policies)

Liliet

>3.) Massacre as many Highborn as she can before a Civil war starts
>4.) Summon a demon or activate a ritual array

This is about what I'm expecting.

Barthumphries

I think she's gathering them to do a heel-face turn and slaughter the highborn, then make a pact to sign the accords as the last Named ruler.

Liliet

I don't think she knows the Accords exist.

konstantinvoncarstein

Indeed, only the Woe, Amadeus, Malanza, the Peregrine, Arnaud Brogloise and probably Cordelia are aware of it.

Liliet

Well, tbf, also all the consultants Hakram has brought onboard, which might be enough of a leak for Malicia to hear word of it.

But there hasn't been an official announcement or anything. Even if Malicia is planning with the Accords in mind, she'll only be taking pre-preparatory steps now.

konstantinvoncarstein

I am sure precautions were taken to ensure the goals of the researches was maintained secret, but it is indeed a big risk.

Shveiran

I think Malicia's network could have allowed her to suspect a lot (after all, to one such as her and knowing Catherine like she does, it is not too hard to put together something roughly accurate when you know a diplomatic document is being prepared.

Then, I'd argue that the more she knows the LESS dangerous it seems. I mean, if not for the very unlikely developments of the last week, which Malicia doesn't know about yet and certainly didn't when she started recalling the highborn to the Tower... the Accords were a myth, a fantasy, a maybe someday. They are not the reason she is acting. Consolidation of power must be the objective, no "red wedding" the highborn to change allegiances here.

Insanenoodlyguy

To put this into that one theory I know you'd hate above all: (sry kinda sry? :P)

She's going to purge them all so that her transition to chancellor is relatively peaceful, what with her giving such a wonderful gift to the incoming new Emperor. And so she becomes the first ruler since irritant to step down voluntarily, and the first one period who stays that way with no intention of ever taking back the throne.

It is her who crowns him "Dread Emperor Benevolent" as he walks in the door, because she's not that saintly and so she uses the story to brand his name in a way she knows he'll fucking hate.

doominator10

I like this. I like this a lot.

Shveiran

I could see that happening.

Liliet

If only people dropped the fucking stupid name idea. I stg I wish I could participate in these convo without being distracted by the sheer fucking stupidity of that like just remove one word from it and the rest I'm v onboard with imagining and discussing

Liliet

ITS NOT LIKE SHE WOULD BE THE ONE PICKING HIS REIGNING NAME FFS

Insanenoodlyguy

Okay separate from the part you hate, is that kind of name branding impossible? If and (I'll choose another name here) she started saying "all hail emperor butt face” and got everyone else saying it to, I feel like that could work as branding.

Liliet

I mean I imagine he could very easily get everyone (except for possibly her lmao) to say it the way he wants them to, being Dread Emperor and whatnot 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Rule of funny. By trying to suppress it he ensures that it keeps coming up. “Don’t call me x” insures he keeps running into people who believe they are supposed to call him that.

Shikkarasu

Let us not forget that Black, Malicia, and Akua regularly planted spies in the Fifteenth. Nothing is guaranteed to be secret, to the point that when people heard about the Dominion attacking at night the whole AoC did a doubletake. “You mean we’re fighting an enemy that -doesn’t- have a complete dossier of everything we can do?”

Malicia could easily have gotten a copy of the rough draft that the Regals were reading two books ago, or just lifted a copy straight from the source with one of her own spies.

Javvies

The Regals weren’t reading a draft of the Accords. They were reading a (fake) draft copy of a plan to grant freehold land stakes to Legionaires and other in Southern Callow.

Malicia cannot have gotten one of her spies to steal or make a copy of an earlier draft of the Accords, because the Accords had never previously been written down – in part to prevent exactly that from happening.

Malicia may suspect that Cat was working on some major diplomatic accomplishment, but Malicia would at best have individual pieces that were blurry. She would not have anything like a complete picture of what Cat was working on, far less a full and detailed one.

Liliet

Oh, and I don’t think Rozala and Tariq know yet, it’s still the same afternoon/evening that Catherine gave the order to prepare the copies.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, you're right.

konstantinvoncarstein

Other Emperors probably tried this on the past, and the highborns are not completely stupid. I am sure they will put contingency in place to ensure a bloody civil war if they are killed, so Malicia would have her hands full.

Liliet

On the other hand, Malicia has radically weakened their influence over her 40 years of rule, and even Akua did not realize how close the Empress's hold on absolutely everything going on was. True, the military supremacy was Amadeus's, but his certainty that Akua could not have possibly gotten her hands on components she needed without the Empress tacitly allowing it? That's all her.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, her hold on Praes is very strong. But a slaughter of the majority of the highborns would provoke a general revolt in Praes, even from her supporters. And without them, she is Empress only in name. And her foremost military commander is abroad.

Liliet

True enough, the real scheme is probably cleverer ;u;

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, EE has this habit:)

Owyn

Unrelated Info: Long names without spacing fuck up the formatting for mobile readers – please don't.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point. And I'll be very disappointed if it isn't quite clever.

Liliet

The real question is, is it the actually smart kind of clever or the self-defeating kind of clever? Or both 😊

Andrew Mitchell

I'm going to go with the self-defeating kind. And I reckon that's going to turn out to be the case with Cordelia as well BTW .

Fayhem

Cordelia I'm borderline 100% you're correct on. She started on her current course as a direct result of the Bard nudging Saint to push Cordelia, and I strongly suspect that Cordelia's reaction was the actual point. In which: BAD THINGS.

Javvies

I wonder what Malicia is up to. There's no way it's going to be a good thing, unless she decides she needs to purge the High Lords to maintain her hold on Praes.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe the suggestion that Chancellor is coming back will be right. It will give the high lords something to squabble over.

Javvies

Eh, I doubt it. Malicia knows full well that part of being Chancellor is betraying the Dread Emperor/Empress and taking the Tower over their corpse.

Malicia is more likely to say she's considering bringing it back, so as to induce the High Lords to murder each other, and then have the leading candidates removed.

I half suspect that she's going to bring the Dead King into play somehow.

Or otherwise do something so stupid that Amadeus thinks he doesn't have a choice but to end Alaya's reign as Dread Empress by whatever means prove necessary.

Decius

My bet is that Amadeus has finally convinced her to kill them all.

Javvies

Unlikely – she's held onto the High Lords for 40 odd years to have a power base independent of Black, the Legions, and the Reforms-granted goodwill amongst the greenskins.

Morgenstern

Judging by her interludes, my impression was more that she was all about preparing over a looooong time for the exact moment where the Lords and Ladies will no longer have any defences against her. Remember the fall of that one High Lady in one of the interludes? She had “allied” with her for YEARS until the inevitable betrayal. The High Lady lost, because Malicia had been preparing for MUCH longer. The second the Highborn finally believed she needed them too much or was too weak – she struck. Thus, I’m leaning a little bit more to the side of “all those seemingly good-for-Highborn rumors” will come to naught and they’ll be caught by exactly that. Thinking her weak. While she isn’t. One of her interludes also said she was posting that one High Lady mentioned here that is now in conflict with Callow for exactly that reason – to get rid of her, as she was accumulating too much influence. While seemingly giving in to her. She was waiting and waiting all these years. She never said “no” to Maddie’s idea in general, she just said it wasn’t the time, far as I remember. That they first needed other institutions etc. If there is a right time for that – then it should be now, when they actually threaten her rule, perceiving her as weak at the moment, and she has had decades to prepare for that.

Shveiran

You bring up good points, yet I’d argue that Malicia cannot afford to butcher them all right now. Getting rid of the high lords in time of peace to remake praes is great... doing it during a crusade, where she needs them to keep the empire from collapsing? Not as much. Praes is weak, right now. The Crusades is not steamrolling over it only because of the DK threat, and that does nothing to hinder the matrons. She... kind of needs them. Sort of. My bet is on control, not extermination.

erebus42

I’m sure this will be a fun conversation.

edrey

last time Malicia said something about walking dead, that sounds like a mistake of the old school of villain

IDKWhoitis

I find it likely that Cordelia will have to attend the meeting with Cat, because there are some heavy deals to be made in the coming days. I think this will be some horrible teeth pulling, because no one really wants to leave the bargaining table at this point. There’s too much at stake.

I'm wondering what Cordelia is hiding in that Lake, because if it's just an angel, this will be funny. But something tells me its going to be something so much more horrifying. Something beyond just being called, "an angel". Hell, for all we know, it could be an old crashed Praes flying fortress or god forbid the remnants of a Gnomish one.

Also, I wonder how discussions in the Lev tent are going. Is it storytime for Tariq?

Javvies

It's not an Angel-corpse Cordelia is digging out.

It's said to be "far worse" than what the Ashurans drew upon at Thalassina.

In addition, it can't be an Angel-corpse because an Angel-corpse would presumably end up in a situation similar to the one that was at Liesse – out of phase with the rest of Creation and therefore not accessible via mundane measures such as dredging.

I have gotten the impression that Cordelia is digging for something with the intent to fight fire with fire. I suspect that she's looking for some ancient evil to throw at Keter. Possibly one dating to Triumphant's day, if not an even older one. I think the Lycaonese are descended from the culture that the Dead King's people were fighting before he became the Dead King. And, based on the impressions in Arcadia, they included devil summoners in their number. It's entirely possible that there's something from them that was buried and mostly forgotten in the lake.

werafdsaew

Whatever it is, Cordy's not a Dread Empress. She can't be using Demons or anything that would cause her own people to revolt against her.

Javvies

The Dead King is invading. And they're losing. Cordelia is less concerned about revolt than she is with the Dead King.

Sure, she's no Dread Empress or Tyrant. However, she does have a lock on the Assembly now. And regular people can and will do horrible things in the name of their own survival.

For that matter, she doesn't need to sell it to everyone. She just needs to sell it to the people who have to know what's going on.

And it's not like she particularly cares about what the Heroes think, between Laurence and Bard manipulating the Conclave into declaring Cat the Arch-Heretic of the East, and then Tariq, Laurence, and company using a plague on a Proceran village to get to Amadeus, and then holding onto Amadeus instead of either immediately killing him or bringing him to Salia.

Remember, one of Cordelia's main goals is to reunify Procer ...

Also, there's the distinct possibility that she ran whatever she's doing past her cousin, the Augur, in some way, so I'd say that it's a fair bet that Cordelia thinks what she's doing is a better result than not doing it. Admittedly, she might not have asked Augur the right questions or interpreted Augur's replies properly, but still.

Cordelia's going to do whatever she thinks she needs to do ... even if it's an otherwise terrible idea.

werafdsaew

I bet both possibilities are true. At least Malicia will use the possibility of both to set off another round of infighting.

Liliet

I love Catherine referencing Amadeus's stance on the Praesi highborn as an argument for removing the guy who ordered the killing of refugees ♥ ♥ ♥

In general, I love this chapter period.

AND HYPE FOR THE NEXT ONE 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

The situation must be extremely dire if Rumena is not snarking at Catherine.

Ben

Cat hurt herself with that little speech she gave Viv and Juniper.

To elaborate: She got them to question her less, and here we're seeing the results.

The Drow are ABSOLUTELY a factor Juniper should know about. If they're having internal disputes; if there are potential chain of command problems, your general needs to know. These factors and their potential damage can be mitigated by certain logistic steps (mitigated, not prevented, mind) that Juniper would know and Cat can't even imagine. Not only that, it's pretty damn disrespectful to withhold operational information of an entire army of your own troops to its lead general. In fact, in terms of "need to know," Juniper might legitimately be the ONLY person non-drow on Cat's side (aside from Hakram, but that's a little less certain) with an obligation to this specific intel. Juniper should be speaking up about this because Cat is making a bad decision. But she isn't.

Her suspicions that Juniper and Viv are meeting and chatting should be no surprise. Goodness. I should not have to tell you that there may yet be a bit of a problem with having put all of the official power in their hands, having removed herself from the official line before the Liesse Accords. I mean, the promised-new Queen, the spymaster, the lead general... any kind of strife arising between Cat and them will be a devastating blow to Callow.

Example: I sure hope they don't hold their tongue about trouble until it explodes at the most inopportune moment into rebellion, giving a Hero a momentary opening/distraction.

ciara

It does seem like a "Levant mustering their forces without saying why they're moving to occupy the Arcadian landing zone"-tier mistake not to tell Juniper at least something...

Liliet

Catherine did tell her there was 'internal trouble' which is about the level of detail that meets that qualification.

Shveiran

I'm not sure where you are coming from with this statement.

Cat is not withholding informations, she is just not telling Juniper of the practicalities of handling the drow on a day-to-day basis because handling those practicalities is not Juniper's job.

The casualties and the resulting issues were related to Juniper: Ivah shared them with Cat in the very same briefing Juniper heard about them, the Marshal and Vivienne are not even hearing it from Cat – they are being briefed together with her by her very sources.

I'm pretty sure the details – such as, how are we gonna handle this in the future now that it has been established as an issue – will be shared with the Inner Circle as soon as they have been properly analyzed by the ones that have to handle them. AKA, the drows and the FUN.

Cat has never kept her people in the dark before, not from this kind of stuff, and I see no evidence that is going to do it here.

Am I missing something?

Revenant

What you are missing is that Ivah briefed Cat in Crepuscular, which the others present did not understand a word of.

Shveiran

Fair enough. I didn't notice that.

Even so, it's not like the "concealed information" extends beyond the details of the current disciplinary issues which we are not yet sure how we'll address.

I stand convinced that the details will be shared as soon as Cat has a firm grasp of what will happen going forth. Which is to say, as soon as that information becomes actually useful to them.

The point remains that Cat has not stopped sharing information or trusting either Vivienne or Juniper... her moves at the battle at the end of arch 1 shows as much. She has entrusted them the outcome of the battle despite the caliber of the opposition, and given them all the necessary information to achieve their duties.

Dresden 67

I think you're seeing problems where there are none.

Catherine didn't tell Juniper more about the drow situation because it had nothing to do with her. It's a purely internal issue within the Southern Expedition, which is commanded by General Rumena who reports to Cat, who answers to Sve Noc. It isn't in Juniper's area of responsibility.

If it becomes an issue large enough to affect events outside the drow then Juniper will need to know, but right now there's no reason to believe that it won't be solved by a single day's work from Catherine.

Catherine isn't surprised by Juniper and Vivienne consulting each other without her, if anything she's pleased that the Marshal of Callow and its heiress are no longer at each other's throats. She's just slightly sensitive about any appearance of them keeping secrets from her given their recent fuck-ups.

If you seriously think there's any chance of Juniper and Vivienne turning on Cat then you and I must be reading different stories.

Liliet

SAME ^^ on all of this.

Catherine even recognizes that her hypersensitivity to Juniper and Vivienne seeming to conspire is silly and suppresses it. She is happy that Juniper recognizes Vivienne as the diplomatic authority now!

And sharing disciplinary issues of the drow with the general of the other army would be overstepping and oversharing =x

Liliet

>If they're having internal disputes; if there are potential chain of command problems, your general needs to know.

Ah, but they're not under Juniper's command though.

They're an allied army. It would actually be overstepping Cat's privileges as the... go-between? between the drow and everyone else, to share their internal problems.

>These factors and their potential damage can be mitigated by certain logistic steps (mitigated, not prevented, mind) that Juniper would know and Cat can't even imagine.

You... do remember Rumena exists, right? They're the drow general versed in logistics and whatnot.

Daniel E

Gods Below, I hope Masego recovers somehow. His internal dialogues about appropriate social interactions, and actual social interactions, are pure comedy gold. I don't recall the chapter, but the one I remember best is when he seconded their 'battle cry' of "Lies and murder!", thinking that was legit.

Liliet

LIES AND VIOLENCE

also I'm pretty sure he was trolling Cat eagerly alongside Indrani ♥ ♥ ♥

308924810a

If Praes and Callow forewent Named rulers it would do a lot to help them, both preventing personal good/evil conflicts from escalating into frequent and inevitable war, and in making people more willing to negotiate with Praes, as that would no longer mean having to trust a villain.

The problem is that I'm not sure it's achievable, to stop ruling names from being assumed to have authority you need to somehow turn the story of the nation against them.

Letouriste

Wait... "Less than two thousand dead" for the Mighty? I thought only 100 or so fought. There would be tens of thousands dead among the crusaders otherwise

Chapter 60: Melancholy

"And after Okoro was taken its King Berengar Rohanon was dragged before the people in the place of Faded Jackals, where his hands were cut for having reached beyond his grasp and his head scalped for having dared to claim kingship over Praesi. His Dread Majesty ordered him driven into the Wasteland, bearing his hands around his neck and his scalp scribed with for all crusaders this warning: 'There is only one crown east of the river Wasaliti, and once more will you be taught to dread it.'"

– Extract from 'Commentaries on the Campaigns of Dread Emperor Terribilis the Second'

The Sisters were in the tent. Their presence was like a whisper on the edge of my mind, and though they'd not hidden their presence by Masego's bedside neither had they drawn my attention to it. It had my fingers clenching, and my growing ill-temper was noticeable enough my legionary escort gave me a wider berth as I quickened my limping. I'd had a reputation for having a foul temper even before my anger began frosting over tables, and trading Winter for Night had not put away that repute. Sve Noc knew what lines they could and could not cross without our bargain fraying, and they would not be so foolish as to try to force the Night onto an unwilling Hierophant. But they were not above making that offer when he was freshly awake and grieving, still in shock from the loss of his magic.

Crows were carrion birds, and just like carrion the Sisters were preying on the vulnerable to attempt patronage of another powerful figure – for Masego was that still, even bedridden and stripped of sorcery. My anger was less from the crafty offer I suspected was being made and more from the way that I had no solid grounds for wrath or recourse if I wanted to denounce what they were doing. It was a sharp reminder that the Sisters were my patrons and allies, not my followers, and they had schemes of their own. And Masego, though one of the Woe, was not my sworn man or a subject of the crown of Callow: any claim I could make over his loyalties was one he'd given out by his own hand, and by the same could withdraw.

The crows were never far from my thoughts and often pointed address within those was enough to earn their attention, but they did not deign answer my insistence this time. The same tent where I'd slept was shaded in subtle ways when I found it, the shadows it cast and kept within its folds too deep and cool even with the falling dusk. There was power at work, the attention of sister-goddesses manifest. I dismissed my escort abruptly and strode past the folds, catching sight of Sve Noc perched atop the armchair I'd slumbered in while a half-naked and sitting Masego looked at them from his sickbed. Feathered in darkness and ink-eyed, the crows seemed almost too large for the chair and even the tent – not that it seemed to cow my friend.

The dark-skinned sorcerer, eye cloth fastened loosely over his glittering glass eyes, was still painfully thin from his time in the Dead King's thrall but his face was calm and his hands steady. His long braids were still matted from their lack of washing, the silver trinkets woven in them shining dully in the lamplight, but even abed looking at him was like looking at an open flame. The burn was feverish, perhaps, but grief and tragedy had not seen its intensity wane. All this I took within a heartbeat, as I arrived to what must have been the tail-end of the offer tendered.

"Faith kept will be kept in kind," Andronike said. "And in the end, all will be Night."

Masego's eyes pivoted under the cloth to glance at me, and the Sisters needed no sight to know of my presence, so when I cleared my throat there was no hint of surprise on any's face.

"Faith can wait until another evening," I said. "There will be—"

"That won't be necessary, Catherine," Hierophant quietly interrupted.

Wings spread and with a few lazy beats Komena was on my shoulder, as displeased by my meddling as I was by hers. Andronike, though, perched herself on the side of Masego's bed. Peering at him curiously with dark eyes more god than bird no matter the shape of them.

"You have been hollowed," Andronike cawed. "Miracle can yet mend this."

The urge came, quicksilver and fleeting, to intervene once more. If the Sisters alone had requested the stilling of my tongue I would not have held it, but Masego had as well and so let the urge pass.

"There is only one side of apotheosis of interest to me," Hierophant said, "and it is not the one that involves kneeling."

"You are yet young," Komena said from my shoulder. "We can wait, though the bargain will not twice be so sweet."

"It will eat away at you," Andronike told him. "From the inside, it will-"

Sudden as it was, it caught me by surprise like few things in my life before it: Masego's nimble fingers, mage-deft and long, snapped up and seized the crow addressing him by the throat. They squeezed, and as Komena cawed in protest and beat her wings against my shoulder the Warlock's son let out a scornful hiss.

"Do not ever attempt to peer into my mind, covetous vermin," the Hierophant harshly rebuked.

Night flooded the room as the behest of livid lesser gods, thick and oppressive current like veils of shadow, but his Name burned like a clear and unyielding flame.

"I knew Winter well, before you fed on it," Masego said, eyes burning with Summer flame, "shall I rip it out through the stitches of your belly? Ruin will run down the course of you into the heart of your entire people, little spiders. Did you believe you could make yourself the life of your kind without also being its death?"

He barked out a laugh.

"Lucky you, that it was Akua Sahelian and not I who accompanied her below," he said. "Else I would have cut out your ravenous eyes long ago and made a banner of your butchered remains."

"Masego," I said. "Enough."

Summer-bright eyes flicked to me, then returned to Komena on my shoulder. My fingers clenched.

"Masego," I repeated sharply. "Enough."

Scoffing, he released his grip on Andronike. She flew away in wrath, and I saw that the flesh of Hierophant's hand looked as if it'd been frostbitten where it'd been touching the divine crow.

"And that's why," I calmly said, "you speak to me before trying to bargain with one of the Woe."

"Offence was given," Komena cried out, the sound cacophonous and somehow blinding.

"You tried to look into the head of a man whose Name is practically made of the death of gods, you fucking fools," I barked. "What did you think was going to happen?"

Before they could answer I pressed on.

"You didn't think," I said. "You got greedy, you got hasty, and then you got spanked. Take it as a reminder that there are things up here on the surface that are nastier than you. And be thankful all it cost you was a few moments of indignity."

The fury pouring out of them and into the Night was like the burn of sudden ice, but I refused to be bowled over by it. They'd made a mistake, believing that dangling power in front of a grieving man was all it'd take to induce another Named to bargain. They'd taken him for one of the Firstborn and for that blindness very nearly ended up losing more than a few feathers.

"I carried your banner from victory to victory," I said, "because I've been careful. Because I've been patient and cautious and I've picked my battles. If you begin to sidle up to every Named on a ragged edge and offer power for rites, you're not goddesses: you're cut-rate devils. And one of those days, sure as dusk, you'll end up stepping blind into a story that'll end you."

The fury did not wane in the slightest, but I met it unbowed. I felt the slight touch of their thoughts against mine, a feather's brush looking for the taste of honesty and finding it. Still, few gods were in the habit of apologizing. The Sisters flew out with malcontent cawing, blowing out of the tent and leaving it lighter for their absence. I breathed out in their wake, still feeling where Komena's talons had dug into my shoulder even if no blood had been drawn and no mark would be left behind. Though Masego's face and torso were facing me, I caught through the cloth that his eyes had followed the crows out before finally returning to me. The radiance of his Name, not visible but like a taste hanging in the air, finally dimmed into nothingness. It left him panting and visibly tired. Leaning against my staff, I limped up to his bed and swallowed a wince when he tensed up at my approach. Very slowly, I sat on the side near his legs.

"I see you still get cranky when woken up early," I said.

He didn't blink, for the lack of eyelid, but the way he angled his head good as implied it.

"I was expecting anger," Masego admitted. "For this, and... the rest."

"Stealing a city, cutting up Arcadia and nearly wiping an entire principality off the face of Creation," I elaborated. "Including most of the people you care about in any significant manner."

He winced.

"Yes," he said. "That."

I sighed.

"I am angry," I told him. "But for large parts of that you weren't in your right mind. And now that you are, I expect all those things you were trying to deny – and the scope of what you nearly did – are about to start sinking in. We will, one day, have an unpleasant discussion about this. But it won't be today, and when we have it you won't be..."

I hesitated, looking for the right words, but Masego smiled bitterly.

"My fathers will be no less dead in a few days, Catherine," he said. "Nor will..."

His lips thinned.

"Nor will my sorcery have returned," he said, as if forcing himself. "The severing should have killed me. Would have, had it not been so improbably precise. I still wonder what stayed his hand, for it would have been child's play to snuff me out at the end. Much easier than this."

It was my turn to hesitate, though the moment I did I knew I'd have to speak. His glass eyes missed nothing and Masego had known me long enough he could discern the expressions of my face much more accurately than most people's.

"I bargained for your life," I said, "when I had a shard of his soul in my grasp."

He tiredly leaned back against pillows that'd not been there when I left in the morning. Archer's work, I thought. Which meant they were probably stolen, but I could ask her about that later.

"Thank you," Masego solemnly said. "For that. For coming, too."

"We all came, Zeze," I quietly said. "And we will again, if we need to. Don't doubt that."

There was a long moment of silence, and finally he nodded. His breath rasped out along with words barely more than a murmur.

"He killed Indrani. Using me."

I reached out a hand towards his own, and after the moment he accepted the implicit offer. We threaded fingers and I nodded.

"The Grey Pilgrim brought her back," I said.

"As Trismegistus said he would," Masego quietly replied. "And yet the last thing she will remember before dying is my hand raised and my lips speaking an incantation."

I let silence pass, sensing there was more he wanted to say.

"That is unkind," the braided man finally said. "Isn't it? To her even more than I."

He looked to me as if asking confirmation, unsure and tone hesitant.

"It would be unkind with any of us," I told him. "But to her more than the rest of us."

"I don't know how to mend that," Masego whispered. "Catherine, I don't know how to mend any of it."

This was, I thought, the first time he'd even obliquely acknowledged that Indrani might have feelings for him. I was not certain whether his careful handling of her came out of a gentle nature – which he had, somehow, not lost in our years of war and hatred – or because he considered himself to have a distinctive relationship with Archer, and it was not my place to ask. But the acknowledgement alone was more than I'd sometimes thought this entire affair would earn of him unless Indrani pressed the matter.

"She won't blame you, Zeze," I quietly said. "You have to know that. It might have been your hand but it was not your will, and that's the part that matters."

"Is it?" he asked. "Since I was a child, always I've been told these sweeping... truths. Eulogies of the perception of my fellows, the triumphant veracity of ties. And near always they proved false, for though my own fathers were as much reason as they were blood that is a rare thing. A memory, a pain, these are things that linger. Principles are beautiful – they are the bones of Creation and what we make of it – but they do not course in veins. They are... distant."

Archer was a creature of blood and not reason, he did not say. Or needed to. It was true, I wouldn't deny, that in some ways more than any of us Indrani followed her instincts. How much would principle matter, he was asking, when she still remembered the raised hand and the death that followed?

"You're looking at it like the depth can only mean it'll hurt more," I gently said. "That's only half the coin, Masego. It also means you want to see the best in them, to get past the roughness, because what you love about them weighs heavier than what hurt you."

I had, in my attempt to soothe the fear, somehow worsened this I realized. The way his face clenched made that plain. He did not speak immediately, and I did not dare to further talk lest I once more stumble over something blindly.

"It didn't," Masego hoarsely said. "I was so angry with them, Cat. They said sorry, about hiding what they knew from me, but they weren't. Not really. Not the way you showed me, where it stings that you did the wrong thing and its stays with you. They were just sorry I knew they'd hidden things from me, and that doesn't count. And they tried, you know. After. To say things or give me things or act ways that would make me less angry, makes us good again. But I couldn't trust it, because I knew they'd just make the same choice again if they had to, so I stayed angry. Even..."

He swallowed.

"Even on the day they died," he said. "I knew they were planning to bind me. I am not a fool, Catherine. They were going to put me in a cage so I'd be out of the way when the Empress went after you, when Callow was hurt until it knelt. And it rankled, that they would. It surprised me, though, when it rankled they just... didn't care about the rest. I know you want me to care about the people, Cat, but it's hard. They're not very interesting, as a rule. And they're so ignorant."

He hesitated.

"But I don't want them to be hurt, either," Masego said. "If things can be made better for everyone, shouldn't they? It just seemed so obvious, but my fathers didn't care. Or they couldn't see it, and isn't that worse? So I was even angrier with them. And I told them to be careful, when I left, but it was almost a lie because after the battle I was going to disappear. And the last thing I said to them was... tainted, Cat. I couldn't be not angry, even if I loved them."

"It's all right to hate something they did," I told him quietly, thinking of hungry deaths still being reaped. "It doesn't mean you hated them."

Gods, but how fragile he looked in that moment. How could this be the same man who'd seized a goddess by the throat not an hour ago, threatened the ruin of an entire people for their patrons having crossed him? Exposed like a raw nerve and heartfelt until he bled, yet even stripped of the sorcery he'd spent his entire life embracing he could still daunt a lesser god. I understood, now, why to someone like Indrani the mixture might be intoxicating. Strength and vulnerability all at once, someone she could respect without feeling threatened. Masego was, in her eyes, a peer without being a rival.

"I thought Papa I could bring back, at least," the dark-skinned man admitted. "I cannot account for a soul, and Father had already passed beyond my reach. There was naught to be done there. But Papa was a devil. Sufficient precision should have been enough."

"But it wasn't," I said.

I had seen only part of the string of failures that made a wasteland of the Arcadian shard, but they must have gone on for months before that and there'd be no indication that success had been looming.

"No," Masego said. "Always something was missing. I'd believed it a question of accuracy, and perhaps if Trismegistus had not stolen the use of my aspect the gap could have been bridged. But the more I think of it, of what I had begun to glimpse, the more I doubt it. Papa was unique. He did not have a soul, Catherine, but he was unique."

Of the incubus that'd been one of Masego's father, the ancient devil known as Tikoloshe, I knew precious little and so I did not dare venture an opinion. What did I know of these matters, anyway, that I could disagree with my own Hierophant? If he believed his father had been singular, an exception that surpassed the stuff he'd been made of, I would believe him. And though I could not say I had been fond of the incubus I'd never met or Warlock who I had known and scorned, I could at least share in the grief of this man who was family to me.

"Some things stay lost," I murmured. "You have to learn to make your peace with that."

I winced, after, realizing it could easily be taken as my speaking of his magic instead of his fathers.

"How carefully you tread," he gently mocked me. "As if speaking it out loud would break me: I have lost the Gift, in every meaningful way."

Which, I silently noted, did not mean every way. Given Masego's lasting obsession with being exact in all things, I did not take that as a coincidence – though it hardly seemed the time to pursue the matter. I thought of Vivienne, in that moment, of the way she's seemed to terribly convinced that making a mistake or losing her Name meant she was no longer one of us. Like she'd be discarded the moment she faltered or changed. I would not, I decided, let Zeze fall into that same pit.

"Losing your sorcery doesn't meant you're not one of us anymore," I told him. "Being one of the Woe – us loving you – it's not conditional. It's not the Hierophant I came for, and it wasn't the Apprentice that became part of my family. It's you, and that's not something you can lose."

He squeezed my fingers, though looking at his face I realized with a degree of strange amusement that in that moment he was the one trying to comfort me.

"I did not believe that," he assured me. "I won't leave you to stand alone like Uncle Amadeus did, so don't worry about me leaving."

I mastered myself just in time not to breathe in sharply. Sometimes, I thought, Masego saw things more clearly than any of us. I saw him hesitate once more, after, and made myself squeeze his fingers back in reassurance.

"I could have," he said.

My brow rose.

"Could have what?"

"I could have begun apotheosis," Masego whispered. "I had the souls. The weight. The bones. But I wanted to bring my father back, instead. But I still remember, Cat."

My eyes narrowed.

"Remember what?" I asked.

"How gods are made," he whispered. "And so how they are unmade."

I matched his gaze, hidden as it was by the eye cloth.

"The Dead King?" I murmured.

"Oh yes," Hierophant murmured. "Even him. And Catherine, I think I want to kill him."

He leaned forward, as if confiding a great secret.

"I believe," Masego solemnly told me, "I might have become nettled by this affair."

"Well," I smiled, thin and bladelike, "we've certainly started picked fights with lesser gods over less."

And so we spoke, just the two of us, of the last king of Sephirah's end.

Pantasy

Vote for amazing ends and greater tales!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Insanenoodlyguy

Noooooooo. Curse this shoddy systems inability to edit or delete!

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for posting this. 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

And so we spoke, just the two of us, of voting for Pratical Guide to Evil on TopWebFiciton

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Soronel Haetir

Interesting that even without his sorcery Masego apparently kept his Name. I was expecting that to be gone as well.

Big Brother

A Heiropphant seeks the true nature of Miracles and Godhood, but does not necessarily have to have the ability to use them. To some, it is enough to merely KNOW, with their usage but a minor convenience.

Liliet

I love your phrasing of that. Masego would 100% go with that explanation ;u;

Mental Mouse

> To some, it is enough to merely KNOW, with their usage but a minor convenience.

Given how Names work so heavily with the Law of Poetry... well, "everyone says" Knowledge is Power!

emthe4th

Watch Mesego gain the ability to create his own miracles without the Gift, that'd be absolutely delightful

Andrew Mitchell

Same. It was a VERY pleasant surprise. 😊

Sugar Roll

By definition a hierophant is an interpreter of sacred mysteries or arcane knowledge. I suppose since he can still do that, the Name stayed with him.

Cicero

Mistake – Dead King – Mistake.

Oshi

This is what I have been waiting for. This is what was missing with Black's meeting with Catherine.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, YES, at thousand times yes!! Another absolutely brilliant chapter. So much wonderful depth to Masego right now, and his relationships. Just wonderful.

And then the climax.

"I could have begun apotheosis," Masego whispered. "I had the souls. The weight. The bones. But I wanted to bring my father back, instead. But I still remember, Cat."

My eyes narrowed.

"Remember what?" I asked.

"How gods are made," he whispered. "And so how they are unmade."

I matched his gaze, hidden as it was by the eye cloth.

"The Dead King?" I murmured.

"Oh yes," Hierophant murmured. "Even him. And Catherine, I think I want to kill him."

He leaned forward, as if confiding a great secret.

So, so good.

Faiir

This was everything I wanted from this conversation and more.

caoimhinh

This entire chapter Masego was pure badassery incarnated.

"Do not ever attempt to peer into my mind, covetous vermin," the Hierophant harshly rebuked.

Night flooded the room as the behest of livid lesser gods, thick and oppressive current like veils of shadow, but his Name burned like a clear and unyielding flame.

"I knew Winter well, before you fed on it," Masego said, eyes burning with Summer flame, "shall I rip it out through the stitches of your belly? Ruin will run down the course of you into the heart of your entire people, little spiders. Did you believe you could make yourself the life of your kind without also being its death?"

He barked out a laugh.

Andrew Mitchell

For sure. Loved, loved, loved that last paragraph.

Liliet

I love that Masego instantly went into threatening their people along with them. He only needs to look at the Sisters to see what they really care about ♥ ♥ ♥

Did you believe you could make yourself the life of your kind without also being its death?

Andrew Mitchell

I missed that one. Good pickup! ♥

caoimhinh

And he also accurately judged that his Aspect would work on them and extend to the rest of the Drow.

"Ruin" will run down the course of you into the heart of your entire people*

I don't think it's a coincidence that he used that word. They are lucky that Ruin wasn't bolded in the chapter, else they would have been fucked.

Then again, Masego is not that trigger-happy nor bloodthirsty. And he is sound enough to know that was a fight that would have no winner, only tremendous losses for everyone involved.

But the line needed to be drawn and damn if he didn't make his point clear.

Liliet

mhm!!! ♥ ♥ ♥

Cpt. Obvious

Not that bloodthirsty or trigger happy?

He has no moral objections to things like what the Diabolist were doing in Liesse. And as far as being trigger happy I seem to recall something about a pair of siblings that irritated him at a party and ended up dying in a spectacularly gruesome way.

The reason his body count isn't much higher is because he knows Catherine tends to frown when he kills someone without a good cause. And as it's often hard to understand just what she considers is a good cause it's usually best to wait for her to make the call.

mavant

The fucking pun at the end slew me.

Liliet

Oh my god.

You are right ;u;

WuseMajor

What pun?

Liliet

Ravens are corvids, like crows.

Ravenous eyes.

Get it? 😊

danh3107

It goes without saying, but man, I love Masego.

erebus42

Yeah, that was pretty much how I expected any proposition to Masego by Sve Noc to go. Much like Catherine he's not one to kneel.

I am curious to see if Masego ends up finding a way to reclaim his magic or if he develops in a totally different direction. Probably not combat related but perhaps a seer or seer adjacent? He still appears to be the Hierophant but how he expresses that could possibly evolve.

gingerlygrump

Catherine doesn't kneel. Amadeus taught her that. Ave Noc are her patrons and allies, but they don't own her.

oaclo

They could swing the story so that this ends up as an advancement of his Hierophant powers. Like he couldn't witness miracles completely and impartially while having the means to make them as an integral part of his being.

Streetwind

Fun fact: Masego has only unlocked two aspects, so far (Witness and Ruin). Both of which he can still use, if his threat to Sve Noc was any indication.

So his Name is fully intact, and he still has one more aspect to come into. I have an inkling that, whatever it will be, it will surely be heavily colored by the removal of his sorcery and the events surrounding it. Perhaps it will even be targeted at the Dead King, specifically. Because we all know that when Masego says he might have been nettled, that was the understatement of the millenium.

Eleron M Pfoutz

To quote Team Four Star:

"And he sounds SUPER nettled."

gingerlygrump

Masego has lost the gift, but has gained clarity. And also gained a sense of humanity, for all that he's been "fundamentally kind" throughout the story he hasn't learned humanity til now. I hope his arc ends happily, he's my favorite.

Liliet

Depends on how you define 'learning humanity'. He sure is going to have to learn how people who arent sorcerers live without the Gift, though then again, he's still Named so still a ways off the average ;u;

The "I got angry they didn't care" part, though? That was back at Thalassina already 😊😊😊

gingerlygrump

Hmm, I was referring to a few different comments of his. Yes, his statements about being angry that Wekesa and Tikoloshe didn't care, but also his pointed concerns about Indrani's feelings and his insight into Catherine's thoughts. I don't mean he was inhumane before now, but Masego has lost the blinders that power gave him in respect to reading people. And yes, the fact that Masego no longer sees other people as pawns on the chessboard has been developing for a while, but now we get a full frontal view of a man who has done an about-face from what he was brought up to believe about people and power.

Masego is my favorite character, hands down, partly because we've gotten to watch him grow up. He's gone from spoiled (albeit terrifying) child to an imperfect but lovable man who reeks of power even without his magic. He is what Wekesa and Tikoloshe made him, but so much more.

Shveiran

I like him too, but I'm not sure why you'd think these parts of his growth are related to his loss of magic.

These changes have been developing for a long time, and they were never really hindered by the Gift.

Liliet

>but also his pointed concerns about Indrani's feelings and his insight into Catherine's thoughts. I don't mean he was inhumane before now, but Masego has lost the blinders that power gave him in respect to reading people

no uh no, that's not

Masego is autistic
he was not bad at reading people because power, he was bad at reading people because he was bad at reading people however like the scholar he was he developed his own method for understanding them, starting from pure theory he has ALWAYS had it, this method, he was ALWAYS good at the theory (see: his counseling Cat about crying back in book 2) he cannot intuitively read faces but he can very much understand the cause effect of people's feelings on most topics, because he's good at understanding shit (and then there's fringe like ethics and respect and etiquette, which he just doesn't get, bc he grew up with Wekesa 'just kill them' and Amadeus 'just do whatever, they can't say a thing')

he did not lose any blinders he did not

I mean ffs its been like 2 minutes that hes been awake since he lost the power -_- he gained experience with & understanding of SPECIFICALLY the people he's close to he's had it for a while, and now we're seeing the depths of it

it's not new and you are very wrong on many many levels 😊

Mike E.

As someone in the autism spectrum, this response is 100% on point. I really didn't grok people until my early 30s, it took that long for my mental database of interactions to contain enough data points to enable me to be more or less "normal" in social situations. And I still fuck it up quite often even in my mid-40s now.

My son is more into the spectrum than I am, I have been trying to point out where him being him will cause problems in the future. He will be in college next year, at which point it will be on him to finally realize what I have been trying to teach him about social behaviors.

Liliet

>Masego is my favorite character, hands down
(well you're obviously right about this part :D)

NZPIEFACE

Well, he denied becoming a god, while having the name Hierophant.
Imagine if that turns into Deicide?

Soronel Haetir

That would certainly be one way to ruin the game, kill the players.

NerfContessa

Oh yes, indeed.

Did the dk really not see the immense danger of making a Hierophant his enemy, I wonder?

Jessica Day

Bravo!

Javvies

Heh. Masego stay you.

Mistake Sve Noc. Fortunately for you two, you didn't very into too much trouble, no major lasting trouble.

Heh.

I wonder ... how much of the knowledge Masego now has pertaining to unmaking gods would also be applicable to unmaking Bard.

Also, I suspect Masego is going to (eventually) figure out how to either reacquire the Gift or a figure out a replacement method of interfacing with and shaping what is.

And he's totally going to be on board with being an instructor at Cardinal.

Andrew Mitchell

> how much of the knowledge Masego now has pertaining to unmaking gods would also be applicable to unmaking Bard

Oooooo, GREAT question. One I'd love to know the answer to.

> I suspect Masego is going to (eventually) figure out how to either reacquire the Gift or a figure out a replacement method of interfacing with and shaping what is

My money's on the later option. Getting his magic back would cheapen the drama we've just been through and would feel like a backwards step for the overall story. IMO, he's GOT to find another route to power and it will be bigger and better than it was before.

> he's totally going to be on board with being an instructor at Cardinal

ONLY for the worthy students. AND only if he gets to keep doing his own research.

Liliet

Names are ridiculous, and he's just proven that his is in fact not Gift-based.

It's gotta be epic 😊

>ONLY for the worthy students. AND only if he gets to keep doing his own research.

I somehow think that Cat won't have as much trouble convincing him as Amadeus did with Wekesa 😊 and OF COURSE he's going to keep doing his research ♥

Insanenoodlyguy

If he's at the school a huge chunk of his research will come right to him.

Liliet

So I just realized Masego would 100% be all onboard with the role of a university teacher.

Like, he would grumble incessantly about it interfering with his research, but he would not abandon the position.

Like... back before Everdark, he took issue with Cat telling him not to call everyone ignorant because how else would they know to fix it???

Masego would be that one professor who is an absolute ass to all his students but will spend as much time helping them out outside of work hours as it takes and so becomes a universal favorite anyway (except for lazy asses)

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, I can see that. That's a nice picture you paint. 😊

caoimhinh

I think more than being an ass to his students, Masego will spend time badmouthing their previous teachers with an "all your previous tutors suck" attitude.

He doesn't seem to me like the one to yell at someone for making a mistake or not knowing something, but rather he would be like "they didn't teach you properly" and so he would proceed to properly school them.

We actually saw this during his time in the 15th, as he complained more about the lack of education that the mages had received, rather than their lack of talent or intelligence.

Liliet

ABSOLUTELY FUCKING YES I STAND CORRECTED

Shveiran

Honestly I'm not opposed to Masego becoming a good teacher, but I don't think he IS now. Or wishes to be, even.

Masego taught Catherine, when it was needed. He did so patiently and competently, true enough, but that is a long way from saying he likes teaching or is good at it.

He has never show a desire to teach stuff to folks, just a distaste for their ignorance. Most people dislike having rubbish lying around on the street they live in, but how many of them actually go an pick it up?

As awesome as the image of him being a grumpy professor is... it's a fine joke, but only that.

Andrew Mitchell

I agree with your main point.

FYI Masego has done more teaching than you recall. He's also taught that person who was his second in charge at the Observatory, sorry I can't recall her name right now. As well as a whole lot of Legion mages.

Liliet

Masego doesn't like teaching as an activity, it's true, but he has proven entirely willing to do it anyway if he sees the necessity. He's taught mages of the entire fifteenth to do rituals, he's taught the observatory minions.

And pair "ignorance is like the WORST" with "if things could be made better for everyone they should be"...

You suddenly have Masego with a moral imperative to be a university professor 0.0
and may the world tremble in his wake

Shveiran

All fine points, which is why I don't think the idea is ludicrous nor anything.

It's just... I think there is a fine line between disliking ignorance and the whole "wouldn't it be better if people knew stuff?" and going "Yes, I'll try to empty this sea of ignorance myself; hand me that bucket, will you?"

It's... it's a possibility, but I think your Cardinhogwarts is showing, right now.

Liliet

I mean. I do agree he wouldn't just spontaneously have this thought.

I'm just saying that if Catherine asks,

Aston

Vote! Again and again and...

Etc.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Novice

"But I don't want them to be hurt, either," Masego said. "If things can be made better for everyone, shouldn't they? It just seemed so obvious..."

How could someone who wishes to dissect gods and demons be so fucking precious??!!?

"I believe," Masego solemnly told me, "I might have become nettled by this affair."

This little sentence seems so non-threatening but by the crows it brought chills down my spine. I love Zeze very much.

Andrew Mitchell

> by the crows

♥ ♥ ♥

Liliet

>How could someone who wishes to dissect gods and demons be so fucking precious??!!?

THAT IS THE GREAT AUTISTIC PARADOX
WE'RE ALL* PRECIOUS
EVEN THE DISSECTING ONES

Masego is... so great... ;u;

*personally Manfred von Karma excepted

Adam

Blitzed through this story in a week. Love it.

McBob

"And, yeah, he is nettled. Super nettled" – Dragon Ball Z
Abridged TFS

Nathan

Everything I wanted ^^

antoninjohn

The difference between a psyker and a sorcerer is that a psyker uses their innate powers while a sorcerer uses their knowledge of reality to work their miracles

Barthumphries

People have said that the Dead King made a mistake in starting this chain of events but that's not actually what happened.

Remember why Peregrine made such a precise cut? The Bard. Who is the Bard's longest and most knowledgeable enemy? The Dead King. Who is Masego aimed at now? The Dead King. And who benefits most from the death of the Dead King? Possibly the Bard.

We have the Bard as the one who started this whole chain of events and the Bard as the one who most benefits from it. Masego is unknowingly playing into her hand.

konstantinvoncarstein

So it seems the house won, after all 😊

Novice

The house always wins, in the end.

...Unless someone torches the whole place anyway. Preferably goblinfire.

Liliet

Masego is so fucking best aaaaaaaaaaaaaa

choice quotes:

> "There is only one side of apotheosis of interest to me," Hierophant said, "and it is not the one that involves kneeling."

KNEW IT
FUCKING KNEW IT 😊

> Ruin will run down the course of you into the heart of your entire people, little spiders. Did you believe you could make yourself the life of your kind without also being its death?

Masego doesn't need to look at the Sisters for long before seeing what their weak spot is 😊

> "I was expecting anger," Masego admitted. "For this, and... the rest."

> "Stealing a city, cutting up Arcadia and nearly wiping an entire principality off the face of Creation," I elaborated. "Including most of the people you care about in any significant manner."

> He winced.

> "Yes," he said. "That."

Masego knows when he does the wrong thing and he is utterly and incredibly precious about it.

Catherine keeps worrying that she only has as much authority over him as he's willing to give, but he basically sees her as the big sister ;u;

(the big cousin, technically)

>“Thank you,” Masego solemnly said. “For that. For coming, too.”

Catherine didn't need to specify that he was still Woe even without magic. This was all the confirmation he needed – and his real worry was about his actions, not about sorcery 😊 he knows what family is much better than Vivienne does ^^

>“As Trismegistus said he would,” Masego quietly replied. “And yet the last thing she will remember before dying is my hand raised and my lips speaking an incantation.”

>I let silence pass, sensing there was more he wanted to say.

>“That is unkind,” the braided man finally said. “Isn't it? To her even more than I.”

(first of all THAN ME lmao)

but also

YES

YES

AND YES

😊 😊 😊

Masego sees to the heart of it ♥ ♥ “Even on the day they died,” he said. “I knew they were planning to bind me. I am not a fool, Catherine. They were going to put me in a cage so I'd be out of the way when the Empress went after you, when Callow was hurt until it knelt. And it rankled, that they would. It surprised me, though, when it rankled they just... didn't care about the rest.

HOLY FUCKING WHAT!!!!

> I know you want me to care about the people, Cat, but it's hard. They're not very interesting, as a rule. And they're so ignorant.”

> He hesitated.

> “But I don't want them to be hurt, either,” Masego said. “If things can be made better for everyone, shouldn't they? It just seemed so obvious, but my fathers didn't care. Or they couldn't see it, and isn't that worse? So I was even angrier with them.

FUCKING OH MY GOD

Masego didn't even notice when he started to really care ;u;

CALAMITIES' HEIRS
HEIRS TO AMADEUS IN TRUTH

>“No,” Masego said. “Always something was missing. I’d believed it a question of accuracy, and perhaps if Trismegistus had not stolen the use of my aspect the gap could have been bridged. But the more I think of it, of what I had begun to glimpse, the more I doubt it. Papa was unique. He did not have a soul, Catherine, but he was unique.”

...ah yes.
that 😊

> “How carefully you tread,” he gently mocked me. “As if speaking it out loud would break me: I have lost the Gift, in every meaningful way.”

Masego is emotionally the least fragile of the Woe, because he honestly has the most solid emotional foundation. That’s what having a good, big, loving family who love you and love each other and manage their disagreements well does ;u;

> He squeezed my fingers, though looking at his face I realized with a degree of strange amusement that in that moment he was the one trying to comfort me.

THE HEART OF THIS PARTY IS ALL I’M SAYING

>“I did not believe that,” he assured me. “I won’t leave you to stand alone like Uncle Amadeus did, so don’t worry about me leaving.”

FUCKING
HE KNOWS EXACTLY WHAT IS GOING ON AND I ADORE HIM INCREDIBLY STRONGLY

Catherine is a Seer of Mind in truth, but when it comes to family matters Masego can run circles around her ;u;

> “Oh yes,” Hierophant murmured. “Even him. And Catherine, I think I want to kill him.”

> He leaned forward, as if confiding a great secret.

> “I believe,” Masego solemnly told me, “I might have become nettled by this affair.”

AND MASEGO REMAINS A PRECIOUS INCREDIBLE TREASURE WITH THE EMOTIONAL IQ OF BOTH A GOD OF KNOWLEDGE AND A FUCKING ROCK AT THE SAME TIME
BLESS HIM

Novice

Can I just say that I genuinely love seeing you gush at about every chapter? Keep on rocking, Liliet.

Andrew Mitchell

+ 1 ♥

Liliet

^^

♥

caoimhinh

+2

Andrew Mitchell

Yet again, you've enriched my appreciation of the writing. ♥ ♥
♥ Thanks. 😊

Mental Mouse

That's the thing about autism... we see things from a different perspective. On the one hand, there are parts of normal society that we can't see, or see the back side of and disdain, but on the other hand, that same difference of perspective lets us see things that normal folks don't.

And on the gripping hand: Though our ignorance and frustration might make others, or ourselves doubt it, we are human, and very much part of humanity, just as Hephaestus is still a god.

Andrew Mitchell

> And on the gripping hand

Reference acknowledged. 😊

Mental Mouse

Looking back, I'm not sure it was apropos to introduce that particular point with a metaphor of nonhuman anatomy. But hey, that's how it came out. Feel free to contrast its metaphorical weight against its ironic occurrence until you get dizzy. 😊

Liliet

Yeah ♥ ♥ ♥

I love how he swings between 'I am not sure what emotions are' and comforting Catherine his understanding is uneven by the standards of nt's, and it is Very Good And Blessed Masego didn't start out knowing what gods are, either. Faced with a confusing yet obviously important thing, the correct response is comprehensive background research, meticulous firsthand observation, and taking every attempt to apply the resultant knowledge seriously, so as to notice and learn from every mistake. Masego behaves correctly, to the best of his ability.

John

The Saint of Swords was the Grand Alliance's leading plan for taking out the Dead King, but I don't think that ever really would have worked. She only ever had one answer to any problem, which was "stick a sword in it." Catherine beat her in a matter of seconds with a weapon that only took a few months to prepare, and it's not like the vulnerability being exploited there is even particularly obscure. The dead king has been adding layers to his hero-neutralizing contingency plans for an incomprehensibly long time, of course he would have thought of that option before.

Masego, as a Named villain, is immune to old age, so that particular cheap shot won't work on him at all. He's not just one of the greatest living scholars of sorcery, and a career godslayer, and riding a narrative wave of "this time it's personal," he's also always been obsessed with elegance and efficiency rather than overwhelming force. Now that he can't use magic himself, he'll need to explain whatever magical work needs to be done to someone else, in enough detail that they can actually figure out how to do it. Frustrating though it may be, teaching is an important element of true mastery, because unpacking the core ideas to answer naive questions is the best way to discover any remaining sloppy spots in your own understanding of a subject.

Liliet

>Masego didn't start out knowing what gods are, either. Faced with a confusing yet obviously important thing, the correct response is comprehensive background research, meticulous firsthand observation, and taking every attempt to apply the resultant knowledge seriously, so as to notice and learn from every mistake. Masego behaves correctly, to the best of his ability.

YES

I really wish this would become a thing as a trope abt autistic people >x> it would be more accurate than most of the existing ones really -_-

>Now that he can't use magic himself, he'll need to explain whatever magical work needs to be done to someone else, in enough detail that they can actually figure out how to do it. Frustrating though it may be, teaching is an important element of true mastery, because unpacking the core ideas to answer naive questions is the best way to discover any remaining sloppy spots in your own understanding of a subject.

and you are SO RIGHT about this all ♥ ♥ ♥

Aotrs Commander

Well, Above and Below, I'd start soiling my pants now, if I were you.

konstantinvoncarstein

Hierophant can dissect gods, not Gods. The former are extremely powerful entities, set apart from the rest of Creation by said power, immortality and and a power base (drow, Serenity).

The later are at a whole other level. The Gods are not just extremely powerful entities. They created the world and are eternal. Wekesa taught Above and Below were Creation. So I think they are safe from anything happening in the world.

Shikkarasu

Rule 34 of The Woe: Yes they can, no exceptions.
Rule 34-b, Hierophant clause: If something they are not capable is spoken aloud he will learn how

konstantinvoncarstein

Evil point🙄But still, I think the Gods are safe.

mavant

Heh, ravenous eyes. It's funny because they're hungry but also ravens.

Novice

...Oh my god

superkeaton

If Cardinal needs a headmaster, you could get a worse Dumbledore than a magicless Masego...

Dieter

Masego is not gonna get his magic back, the magic user slot in the party got taken over by Akua. He will transition into a different more priestly role (similar to the grey pilgrim).

Shveiran

How would a character determined not to kneel before other entities gain a "Priestly" role, exactly?

Mental Mouse

On the same principle as "we do not kneel". Worked for Cat!

Shveiran

true enough, but I don't think this kind of things really work with the "proof of concept" approach.

Also... Masego is not Cat. I don't think he has displayed a lot of willingness to compromise with those he didn't already like.

Agent J

But... Akua lost the Gift as well. Y'know, back when she lost her heart... and her life... ... and her father. She lost a lot of things that day.

Ever since she's been mooching off of whatever Cat's power set happens to be that moment, be it Winter or Night. She's no more a "magic user" than Zeze is right now, given he still has his stolen miracles (if the Summer flame in his eyes is any indication).

Shveiran

Yes, and no. Aqua has always been more about power than about sorcery, and she has shown a lot of familiarity with Winter before it was eaten by the Night, and she had a deep connection to it to boot.

Masego's power comes from his Name, and is his own.

Aqua's power is burrowed and the sufferance of others, but it IS a deeper well.

Alegio

Trying to sway a Named made from literal god slaying, whose powers come from Summer which is anathema to half your power that comes from Winter, and to add insult to the injury is probably the person who knows the most about both gods AND Winter in the continent? Now I see why lesser deities don't last that long in this world...

Javvies

Masego's powers don't come from Summer.
He Name Transitioned from Apprentice to Heiropant after seeing Summer in action. And examining Winter Duchess Cat for extended periods, including the ice moon heart thingy the Winter King put into Cat's chest.
There's a very important difference.

Mental Mouse

> "I knew Winter well, before you fed on it," Masego said, eyes burning with Summer flame, IIRC, his first Aspect was Witness Clearly it allows him to keep and reproduce some of what he has Witnessed, similar to Cat's power-thievery. We haven't really seen much of this side of it before, because he not only had his sorcery, but he was specifically following his fathers' advice in not leaning on his Name too much.

But now the sorcery is gone and his Name is what he's got.
Let's see if he too makes Below reconsider their generosity...

Daniel E

Lost his sorcery in every meaningful way, but given his need for pedantry, that likely means not every literal way. Masego may yet have a few magical tricks left (probably Name shenanigans), and I am eager to see them.

Mental Mouse

Also, Masego may well be premature in dismissing something as not being "meaningful".

Morgenstern

Same thought here.. what Masego deems "not meaningful" could still be jaw-dropping by other people's standards...

Andrew Mitchell

It's even likely to be jaw-dropping, I think.

Whatsnaname

Masego – "I have been nettled!"

kills a god

Chapter 61: Reformation

*"Zarei, of short stride saw the long's pride and carved, laughing found them wanting:
chased into shadow
by one mighty blow."*

– Extract from the 'Zarei Veste', a Firstborn traditional epic

Night had become my time, refreshing to my tired bones like a cool drink on a parching day. I enjoyed the quiet of it, the veil of stillness laid down by the dark under the stirrings of creatures nocturnal. Without so much spinning my thought came clearer, less cluttered, and these days what already lay within my own mind was quite enough clutter already. It felt, at times, like I was attempting to juggle half the continent – it felt that way because it was, essentially, what I was trying to do. Yet while there might have been quiet awaiting us at the heart of the drow's tent-city, there was hardly any stillness to be found: with dusk passing the curse of the pale light had passed, and the Firstborn tread under the moon's unblinking eye like shifting shadows. After my Lord of Silent Steps' report I'd expected for there to be a tautness to the air, but that had perhaps been naïve of me. Drow didn't complain or riot or indicate their displeasure, because every last one of them was born to the knowledge that all it took was irritating someone stronger than them once to end up killed. The only drow who were vocal about much of anything were the Mighty and even among those only sigil-holders could really be said to be outspoken, that cabal of the few who'd spent years slaying all comers until they rose to the summit of the pyramid of strife. No, instead of a boiling cauldron about to tip over the tent-city of the Firstborn looked like half a festival.

A drow one, anyway.

Grey-skinned dzulu wearing the colours and signs of their sigils, either painted on skin or woven into cloth, had come out under moonlight to play. I was used to a soldier's vices of choice being drinking and gambling, but those were the favourites of the Legions. Here it was instead the old amusements of the Everdark that reigned, and they were less bloody in nature than I'd expected. Standing before a tall heap of piled stones drow would set on their brow a thin leathery chord set with a single small stone and claim in cadenced Crepuscular that their tongue was made of flame. Another drow would then step up to them, and call them an eight-year-snake, after which they would each sing a couplet with the challenger going second. It seemed to me that, more often than not, they were citing old and well-known texts with only just enough adjusted to brutally mock their opponent or boast of their own obvious superiority in all things. Hakram sent me a look that was disturbingly pleasing, coming from an orc that hefty, and I allowed our steps to slow so we'd catch some of it. One dzulu from the Sudone claimed that its opponent was –

"Cunning as cattle, fearsome as a trout, Beloved of nerezim, quiet as a shout!"

– which had the watching dzulu laughing in approval. The other singer, one of the Jindrich, went the other way instead. Boasting shamelessly, it announced it would –

*"Swallow pale light and make it night,
Harvest from death its very breath,
Weave with loom a second gloom!"*

Which had a few of the Soln in the crowd and most the Jindrich ululating in approval, some even calling out a name: Zarei Stride-Carver. After both songs had been sung in full the dzulu cast small tokens – trinkets, pieces of cloth, even simple stones – at the feet of one or the other, deciding whose song had been the finest. The Sudone dzulu won, that time, and triumphantly called out that for the fourth time its tongue was flame.

"There are traditions much like this in the Lesser Steppes," Adjutant murmured as we both watched another drow step up and challenge the victor.

The steppes beyond the Wasiliti, I knew that meant. Where the Clans had been able to hang on to more of their old ways, further from Miezan steel and the Tower's schemes.

"Duels of singing?" I asked.

"And steel as well," Hakram said. "Though there was a time, Catherine, when no great warrior would have wielded the axe without the verse."

I eyed him amusedly.

"If you want to challenge one them, I could always translate into Crepuscular for you," I offered.

He looked genuinely tempted but eventually shook his head, clicking his fangs in polite refusal.

"Too much would be lost in translation," he said. "And though I was taught old and cherished words, there are few I can claim as my own."

I thought of Nauk, in that moment, Nauk who'd written In Dread Crown and whose song was still sung even after the warpriests of the Dominion had taken him from me. I caught the exact moment Hakram thought of him too, and we watched the Firstborn trade singing barbs in silence as we shared in the same grief. I half-smiled at the defending champion's verse – it'd just claimed it would make a tomb for the Tomb-maker – and we let it flow out of us, like a mouthful of wakeleaf smoke offered up to the wind.

"The formula they speak, at the start," Hakram said.

"My tongue is made of flame," I quoted, then my lips quirked. "You are but an eight-year-snake."

He inclined his head.

"What does it mean?"

"I honestly don't know," I said. "Rumena, care to share?"

I felt the general's mild irritation through the Night at having once again failed to approach me unnoticed and savoured that for the very petty victory that it was. The general of the Southern Expedition strode to my side in silence, filling the empty space at my left.

"It an old story, Losara Queen," Rumena said.

"Oh," I said, sweetly similing. "So you were there?"

"I see," General Rumena gravely said. "Now that you have servants to flatter you again, you have resumed your delusion of being amusing. I had thought your cured of this ailment, Queen of Lost and Found."

"Careful, buddy," I said, jutting a thumb at the singing drow. "One of those just promised to put you in a tomb, are you sure you want to spend your last moments failing to get the best of me?"

Rumena glanced at Hakram, pale silver-blue eyes lingering on the missing hand.

"The orc has only one hand and still a defter touch with words," it told me.

"He hasn't even said anything," I protested.

I winced the moment I said it, feeling the sense of mocking satisfaction wafting off of it into the Night. The prick.

"One of these days," I told it. "One of these days, Rumena."

"It is true," the Tomb-maker conceded, "you might truly have a chance, if I am asleep."

Ouch. Well, it was probably a good thing I wasn't going up there to sing with the old bastard anytime soon.

"It is from a legend of the ancient days, before the Twilight Sages," the old drow told Hakram. "There was once a manner of snake that was said to be born with the favour of the Shrouded Gods, manifest as stone on its head. Should it live for nine years, and devour flesh every day, it would grow to become izmej. That is, flame-tongued and immortal, swimming through stone with on its brow the shine of pale light."

Dragon, I thought, but it was not like the dragons I knew of – which were, anyway, all but disappeared these days.

"And so an eight-year-snake is one that could not become izmej," Hakram thoughtfully said. "What happens, if a singer is the victor nine times?"

"None who cast token in the contest may kill the nine-year-snake for a span nine nights," Rumena said. "Immortality, Deadhand. For a time."

It murmured in Crepuscular, after that, citing the Tenets of Night. For glory fades and stone crumbles, no victor forever crowned. The words were sobering, for they brought to mind the reason I'd come to the tent-city in the first place. Under the currents of celebration here there was a lit sharper that'd blow unless I put out the fuse quick enough.

"The Zoitsa Sigil is still under control?" I asked.

"The children that were disciplined have recovered," Rumena said, "yet word of your impending arrival has stayed hands for now. The Lutesuk and the Vachikna will require adjudication as well, if your intent is to prevent killing between all Mighty."

"Between all Firstborn," I sharply corrected. "Take me to them, then."

The general's pale eyes flicked to Hakram.

"The Adjutant's presence will be commented upon," the old drow said.

"Let them comment," I grunted. "He can't understand Crepuscular anyway, I'm bringing him as an advisor."

"Ade Varul," Rumena said, eyes narrowing. "Yes, this would be accepted."

It's sounded the same, to an extent, but the meaning had been different: truth-bearer, or truth-keeper maybe? It was from an older form of Crepuscular, the one drow tended to use for formal titles.

"Mais encore?" I said in Chantant, just to show it wasn't the only one who could speak all fancy.

"When the Empire Ever Dark still stood, it was the title given to those who learned precedents of law and bore old scrolls of histories to provide these during adjudication," General Rumena said. "A learned servant."

"In service of who?" I asked.

"The Twilight Sages," the Tomb-maker. "Or those they appointed to pass judgement in their stead."

It was easy to forget, I thought, that there'd been a time where the Firstborn had known laws more elaborate than the rule of the hardest hand. I nodded my assent, though in truth even an oblique tie with the fools who'd nearly destroyed their entire race for fear of death had me uneasy. Very few would remain that had known those days, I reminded myself. And of those that did, only Rumena had come south instead of marching with the Sisters themselves. We moved as swiftly as my limp around, eyes lingering on the distractions that'd seized the camp. Small packs gathered around the small colourful tiles that were the centrepiece of a game of inic cin, carefully placing down their own to make or break patterns according to the labyrinthine rules of their game – hardly any two sigils allowed the same set of patterns, and drow from the outer rings would rather kiss a dwarf than begin the game with a lizard-fish prowling pattern already on the floor instead of empty space, the way Firstborn from deeper in the Everdark insisted the game was meant to be played. There were more earthy entertainments as well, ones I was more familiar with: javelin-throwing and wrestling, as well as the madman's bargain that was the por neroc, the axe-fortune. I'd yet to see anyone play that game without bleeding, and not for lack of trying.

Firstborn were more prone to indulging in luxurious meals or elaborate concoctions than hard drinking, as a rule, since liquor was usually reserved for the very powerful or the very much powerless. For the former it was a statement of might – that even drunk they could take all comers – while for the latter it was a tacit admission that their lives could be reaped at any time and there was nothing they could do about it. That might change, in time, at least if the drow were guided towards ways that bled them less often and eagerly by their own hands. Still, I doubted they'd ever become great drinkers of the wines and liquors of Calernia, anymore than the nations of the surface were at risk of becoming enamoured of the drow's own drinks. I suspected that the Firstborn tasted things rather differently than we did, because some of the things they ate and drank... Ugh. There was a reason that I'd sometimes used their mushroom-based liquor on Archer as a punishment. I set the ponderings aside as we found the heart of the tent-city, and the Firstborn that awaited us there. What must have been the entire Zoitsa Sigil – which would keep that name even after Mighty Zoitsa's death until another Mighty claimed the sigil – was patiently standing and awaiting us. An open space had been cleared on the snowy grounds, fitting the thousand or so drow in what I could only call a hierarchy laid bare. Four rylleh were seated at the front, then jawor behind them, then ispe behind those, leading to what must have been nine hundred and change dzulu. The Zoitsa were not a large sigil, though given that they had twelve jawor among their number I could see why they wouldn't be taken as easy meat either.

"You stand in the presence of the Queen of Lost and Found, the First Under the Night," General Rumena called out. "Kneel."

They did. And they stayed kneeling, as I considered the approach I wanted to take. Ivah's report had mentioned Rumena savaging the two most prominent claimants, and through the Night I could easily tell who those would be – they were significantly stronger than the other two, though not so much that the weaker pair allying against one would not see that particular rylleh killed. Unless they had a particular lethal Secret, anyway, but that struck me as unlikely. Drow that lucked into one of those tended to rise quickly through the ranks until they either died or became sigil-holders. I limped forward, leaning on my staff of yew as I cast a cursory glance around us. This was no Legion camp, there was no such thing as restricted sections of it: anyone brave enough linger where they could either hear or see could, unless someone chase them away. And there were plenty of curious Firstborn, though I noted they were largely ispe. The lowest of the Mighty. Sigil-holders, I grasped, were sending people to keep an eye on the judgement I was meant to render. Whatever decision was handed out tonight, it would not be long before the greatest Mighty of my host knew of it. That was trouble, for already I'd once denied them the prize that had been the Twilight Crown. If I further chipped away at their ways I might begin to encounter resistance, which given the hold sigil-holders had on their followers would be... more than inconvenient.

"You who would claim the Zoitsa Sigil, rise," I said. "And come before me."

I'd fully expected all four rylleh to rise, but instead it was only three. One of the weaker pair, I thought, must have been convincing enough to earn the other's backing. The drow came to stand before my scrutinizing gaze, calm-faced and straight-backed.

"Decree was given," I said. "The Southern Expedition is as one great cabal, and until it has ended no Firstborn may slay another. Yet I am told you would have broken the edict, if not for General Rumena's reminder. Explain yourself."

The weakest of the three kneeled.

"Losara Queen," it said, "I am-"

"Bereft of a name or my mercy, until you have given me an answer," I mildly said.

It didn't flinch at my words, though its face blanked and I felt the malicious pleasure of the other two rylleh through the Night. It'd earned the rebuke, I thought, the moment it tried to smooth-talk me out of anything.

"Night cannot be left to fade, O Great One," the rylleh said. "Mighty Zoitsa must have successor, and when strife is had over who that Mighty should be there is only one manner of settling the claims known to us. I aim not to break the Night's decree, only to obey the Tenets of Night."

Meaning that none of the three were willing to back down and let one of the others harvest the Night from Zoitsa's corpse, which meant duels to the death were the traditional solution as established by Sve Noc. Lovely. The leftmost rylleh knelt.

"Losara Queen, this one recognizes the truth of the great cabal binding us," it said. "And so this one implores your holy judgement in deciding who is worthy of rising, in place of strife."

And there it was, my opening. All I needed to do was accept the invitation and this could all be settled in moments without blood being spilled. That this particular rylleh had been clear-eyed enough to realize both that I wouldn't allow blood being spilled and that easing my way to judgement would incline me well towards it made it a strong candidate for sigil-holder, I thought, though also someone to watch. And yet I stilled my tongue, because what I did here would echo. Through the ears and tongues of the ispe lingering at the edges of this clearing, yes, but also through the years to come. I was setting a precedent, and it was not something I should do lightly. I turned my eyes to the third rylleh, the last one still standing.

"And you?" I said. "What words would you speak?"

It knelt, smoothly.

"None, Losara Queen," it rasped. "I do not presume to reach beyond my grasp."

Tasting its words through the Night, I decided it was speaking the truth – or at least that it believed what it was saying. If I was to wade in and make an appointment through the awarding of Zoitsa's corpse, then this one was the safe bet. Not too ambitious, steady. Likely more set in the old ways than either of the other two, but with enough deference for Sve Noc and through them myself that it would broadly balance out. This one, I decided, was the choice if I wanted to avoid making waves among sigil-holders. If I appointed the second speaker, it'd be seen as my raising ambitious lickspittles. Those not willing to become my creatures would feel threatened and react accordingly. The first speaker, the one I'd chastened, was trickier to parse in implications. It was the weakest of the three, which would ruffle some feathers but perhaps also raise the hopes of Firstborns who'd hit the limit of what they could claim with their own strength that in my service they might rise further still. I wasn't one to particularly enjoy a smooth-talker, and this one reminded me a little of Praesi highborn, but vague dislike was not reason enough to exclude them as a candidate.

"If you had the pick of three highborn for a lordship," I said in Kharsum, "what measure would you use to weigh the right choice?"

Adjutant was at my side, a towering presence of calm that passed on a portion of that serenity to me.

"The three," he replied in his native tongue. "Are they the only people I can pick?"

"Without making a mess, yes," I said. "And no matter which I choose, I'll have intervened in the succession of a noble line – while using royal authority."

Religious, in truth, but it would not be too inaccurate to compare the kind of influence I now commanded among the drow to what a Good Queen might have commanded in the Old Kingdom.

"Letting the succession pass without intervention isn't in the cards," he half-asked, half-stated.

"They'd go at each other like Wasteland nobles over it," I said. "Only without the subtlety. It'd be setting an even worse precedent, as far as I'm concerned."

If I exempted strife over the succession of sigil-holders from the ban on drow killing each other, then the gate would be cracked open. As far as I was concerned, any possible benefit to be obtained from a higher concentration of Night in some former rylleh's hands was far below what I got by keeping the drow who knew how to use their own tricks in possession of those tricks. And that was in a military view, anyway. The moral aspects of it were... well, I couldn't keep raising my nose at a ritualized murder for power being a central tenet of drow culture if I simply allowed it to keep going on when I could do otherwise.

"If you are bound to rancor for any intervention at all," Adjutant pragmatically said, "appoint the most apt candidate. At least you'll be getting the most out of what it cost you."

Sound advice. Following it, all that remained before passing down judgement was considering which of the three rylleh would be most valuable to my intentions. Gods, probably the first of the three. They'd – no, that was the wrong way to think about it. The most apt candidate was the one that'd best serve the interest of the sigil it led, not necessarily my own. Ah, I thought, but why appoint a lord at all? I thought of a thin man in ragged robes, keeping records no one would read for a revolution that pulsed out of him like a titan's breath. How many of us are there, tyrant, he'd asked, and how many of you? I could not use old means save to reach old ends.

"General Rumena," I said. "Send for the Firstborn."

The old drow's head bowed by a fraction.

"Which sigils?" it asked.

"All of them," I said. "Every last one of you."

If I was to hand down judgement, it would not be to seek the least of three evils.

I would try to do better.

IDKWhoitis

The Drow do rap battles.

They are calling the best of their raps "fire"

No wonder Hakram wanted to stay and listen. It must have been a sight to see.

Faiir

Watch me, guys! I'm on fire!
No, you're rapping like an 8 year old!

Beautiful.
The ending's great too!

Fayhem

Given that the line the Firstborn are using is “my tongue is flame”, I think the more apt comparison is that they’re saying they spit fire. 😊

stevenneiman

Eight Year Snake would be another good name for a band. Not sure how it compares to Undead Suicide Goats though.

Javvies

Ooh. She’s gonna pick the fourth one, the one that didn’t press a claim, giving its backing to another.

Huh. Lot of similarities between the internal old ways and traditions of the orc clans and the ways and traditions of the drow. That’s interesting, and a sign of either parallel development or significant contact between the two cultures in the distant past.

Hitogami

I didn’t think of that, maybe but it’d be an unpopular choice. I was thinking she might make them compete with “the duels of singing”

IDKWhoitis

The duels of singing may not be the best measuring stick for rulership. However some sort of non lethal duel may suffice. Likely voting will be the manner it is ended.

Rynjin

Well, duels of fighting aren’t exactly the best judge of leadership skills either. At least the two battles require you to be able to think on your feet, which is a valuable leadership quality.

Mental Mouse

The “dozens” and variations reward not just verbal ability, but creative thinking under pressure, and of course unflappable self-control. There’s a reason it’s been popular as a non-lethal contest across many human cultures.

Shveiran

I’ll concede it is an improvement over duels to the death (or physical contests in general), but that… is not a really high bar to jump.

I'm with IDKWhoitis on this one... if that's the way Cat goes, it would set a very odd measuring stick for drow leadership. Which is why "Dissing Crepuscular Hour" is not an outcome I think will come around.

Maaddiie

If she is looking for the most apt leader she might do something along the lines of an oral quiz where she tests to see which has the strongest leadership qualities. It would be a competition and the drow would see it as a reason to follow the one she chooses.

Liliet

If she does that, she'll need to ritualize it sufficiently that it could be held without her personal intervention in the future.

erebus42

Not to mention the similar scavenger philosophies shared by the Drow and the Goblins. Though with the goblins, it was already said that the two races had had run-ins in the past.

IDKWhoitis

I'm placing my bet on the 4th guy too, but by Cat allowing the rest of the Mighty to vote on the next Sigil Holder. And the mighty pick that guy.

Each sigil effectively picks its own sigil holder, potentially for life. This would do a lot to motivate the powerful to not abuse their subordinates, and the drow themselves are likely to vote for the "most worthy/strongest/most cunning". So this gives the higher tier mighty something to strive for, to display their Superiority so they can truly rise.

Based on the rap battles, we see the Drow already have the concept of voting, and concept of terms. So either they vote for the next Sigil Holder for a set term, or until death.

This would inoculate Cat's army from Hierarch, since her Drow ruling class would be rightfully elected representatives, thus not tyrants, and thus not subject to Revolutions or whatever chaotic head choppy Aspect the madman has.

WuseMajor

Yes, but insulating them against Hierarch is not the reason she's doing it. She's doing it to try to Be Better.

IDKWhoitis

There's multiple benefits, and Cat likes to solve multiple problems at once if possible.

Rup

..um so this is Cat ref Hierarch??

a thin man in ragged robes, keeping records no one would read for a revolution that pulsed out of him like a titan's breath

Liliet

Yep.

Furor left an impression on her ♥

Dainpdf

You run the risk of having votes be compelled by violence or some similar means, and this does not explain what she's calling every Drow there for. But it is probably something like that.

IDKWhoitis

There will probably be some sort of silent/hidden vote system in place, to prevent reprisals.

It's possible either the other sigils confirm, nominate, or get a vote on the next sigil holder. It's also possible Cat wants to make a point, and rather make this a sort of ceremonial thing to make the other Sigil holders respect the results.

Dainpdf

Maybe, though secret votes are mostly a fantasy in a world where truthtelling exists.

Shveiran

Small, localized truthtelling exists, though. Even Tariq's Behold wouldn't have the necessary magnitude, not unless every voter stops by him afterward to comment Who they voted for.

Dainpdf

Good enough hearing might suffice. Or eldritch senses. Gotta remember that the Night is merging with Winter.

Liliet

>having votes be compelled by violence

So how would you describe the worst-case scenario working?

Dainpdf

A return to the days of tribalism, with this rrandom junk attached and a loss of respect for Cat from both the drow and sve noc.

Liliet

A return? Are you saying those days were ever over?

Dainpdf

No. That the objective was to end them.

Liliet

I mean, Catherine literally didn't do anything about the tribes. The drow are still entirely decentralized. Anything about building a city etc is their own ideas.

WuseMajor

No, I think she's going to try to teach them Democracy. Or something. WhichI dunno. With this group, I think democracy might implode faster than anarchic murder.

Dainpdf

Plus, Cat has expressed disdain for democracy, herself.

Rey d`Tutto

Tyranny of the Masses

Walter

She's a dictator and a warlord. She doesn't know democracy to teach it.

Faiir

I think she's going to split the night between all firstborn – that's the best for the entire sigil.

Andrew Mitchell

That's possible IMO but unlikely. The new sigal-holder needs to have the additional Night in order to (a) ensure it now gets unquestioning obedience from it's sigal, and

(b) to put it on a roughly equal footing with the other sigals.

Sylwoos

As you say, a bid at Democracy at this point would feel very forced. I'm expecting a rap battle with the first born as the jury instead. This is the closest she can get, and it implement a non-violent way for the Drow to sort their difference without going against their tradition.

Liliet

I disagree.

First of all, as noted above, drow already have the concept of picking the best by majority opinion.

Second, "leader by acclaim" is in no way a new idea. Sure, having the entire nation be led by elected representatives needs the kind of infrastructure the drow don't have, but having intra-sigil affairs be settled by the sigil's opinion? It fits with the best parts of the "warrior culture" the drow have while suppressing the worst.

There is precedent for this IRL, and it would fit very well with what Cat has already started – "first be worthy, then rise".

By the way, note how she concluded that the weaker one was supported by the other weaker one. Again, drow already have the concept of 'whoever secures followers wins'. It's just subordinate to raw strength; Catherine will flip it around. A surgical intervention, changing very little but at the same time everything.

Mental Mouse

As others have discussed elsewhere, the only example for "democracy" on the surface is Bellerophon. And Bellerophon is not just a horror in itself, it's a hatchet job by the gods against the very concept of democracy, something to point to whenever some fresh naif gets ideas about "power arising from the masses". Note that voting among peers isn't a problem, but the Powers That Be really don't want mortals getting the idea that by numbers they can simply overrule their betters.

Liliet

She's not going to pick, that's the point entire. She's going to hold an election

Faiir

My vote is the night will be split between all.
The worthy (surviving) rise, the unworthy (dead) fall.

Maaddiie

It the drow are absorbed by different sigils as well there might be some new solutions and problems.

Liliet

Someone still needs to be in charge tho. The Night is a side thought here.

Mental Mouse

There's an interesting point that nobody suggested sharing out the power. It may well be that harvesting Night doesn't allow for that.

Vortex

I do not think she is going to play kingmaker at all. She wants a better system, not a temporary patch leaning on her authority. I bet she is going to design some kind of trial or test of suitability. Have each of the claimants demonstrate their worthiness somehow, rather than murder each other for it.

Liliet

That is the other possible option than election, yeah.

Charles

Democratic Drow? This can only go well.

Hitogami

I don't think that's what she is aiming for

Insanenoodlyguy

"One of these days," I told it. "One of these days, Rumena."

"It is true," the Tomb-maker conceded, "you might truly have a chance, if you vote for Pratical Guide to Evil on TopWebFiciton."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

caoimhinh

Vote Under the Night!

That's the new way of the Firstborn!

danh3107

Taking your own advice Cat, thatta girl. Practice what you preach.

Hitogami

This is good, but I really wish there was more of the chapter... Cat has a devious idea and I really wanna know what it is!

Aston

Spread the Night out to empower everybody.

konstantinvoncarstein

It would solve nothing

Quite Possibly A Cat

Spreading the Night would an interesting precedent to set. I'm not sure how well it would work though. There might be practical issues. What happens if you split the Night among all the Drow? Politically short term it won't be an issue. Long-term hopefully it will be better than ritualized murder.

erebus42

Well now, I'm curious to see what Cat's plan is. It can't be democracy. As amusing as it would be to watch her try to explain the concept to the Drow, there's no way that would go down well. As an aside, the Drow are probably my favorite race introduced so far, except maybe Goblins. They're just so fucking cool and their culture is so interesting.

Kirroth

No no, it's all a matter of how she frames it.

This chapter established that the drow have rap battles that are a mix of boasts and trash talk where the audience votes on the winner. That's like nine tenths of the way to candidate debates and campaign slogans already. All Cat has to do is call for a rap battle where the winner becomes the new Sigil Holder instead of measuring them on pure style points.

It's sort of like democracy, where the people get a vote on who's in charge, but with enough bias towards the Mighty to satisfy their sensibilities.

Liliet

"Leader by popular acclaim" is pretty doable when there's just a thousand voters, IMHO. And not new to the drow as a concept, considering Cat's musing that the weaker drow must have secured the support of the other weaker one.

Shveiran

Not new to the drow as a concept, yes, but it has been a long time since it was a staple of their society. These are peers trying to seize a Night-filled body, once that is achieved the imbalance of power between the Sigil-holder and the rest would be restored. And there are the powerful ones: who cares what the jawor thinks, let alone the nisi? In drow culture, their support is not required, and their obedience can be guaranteed.

I'm just saying, it's a long path between "being capable to strike deals of convenience with peers" and "open to the building of a society based on consensus".

Liliet

Consensus? LMAO no. Majority opinion? Absolutely yes.

The overly harsh hierarchy is exactly the issue Catherine is trying to fix.

Shveiran

Majority opinion is deciding through consensus: the shared agreement that we'll use a method to determine the most popular opinion and stand by that decision, including who gets to rule.

Even if we want to split hair, I can't say I see many examples of either in drow society, anyway.

Liliet

>Majority opinion is deciding through consensus not in this case, considering the only person who needs to make the decision to follow the majority opinion is Cat she's asking the others because she deigns to, not because they actually have the power to contradict her if they disagree and in the long term, the only 'consensus' needed is that of Sve Noc. Theocracy under an actually active deity is very convenient

Liliet

Shveiran

If the only consensus needed is Cat's, she is not establishing a precedent: she is playing a drunk

Mighty, acting on a whim while everyone gets along with it because otherwise ZAP.

We were talking about changing how the drow work, so I was assuming we were speaking long term, self-sustaining options; not "what Cat can punch them into doing".

That discussion would bring us back to the Ruling Council, and is so long it isn't worth discussing besides; it is basically "whatever Sve Noc will allow", since so long as that holds she can pull the Night out of anyone who disagrees.

Which brings me to your second point; Sve Noc has not been active for a long time; centuries, in fact. It is everyone's guess whether or not they will keep active in ten years, or twenty, or fifty.

Once again, they are not a solve-it-all solution; they can, realistically, jump start any change by endorsing it. It is unlikely they'll be willing to act like enforcers for it.

Liliet

Sve Noc weren't active before because they hadn't attained godhood yet.

Enforcing law for who gets to lead others in a theocracy sounds like something literal gods would be interested in.

Well, y'know, as long as there's a priesthood to handle the day to day drudgery of it ♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

The problem is that especially once we get past the sigils (and how big are they anyway?), there's a lot more than a thousand voters to consider.

Isaac Martinez

It reminds me the story in which the king had no right to judge because he was just a king.

antoninjohn

She is going to make the Drow vote for the leader instead of kill one another

konstantinvoncarstein

It would force the Mighties to be not only powerful, but also popular. It would diminish the violence in drow society.

Liliet

And it would not change much, considering the drow would very much vote for the powerful first and foremost. The genius of it is how little outside intervention it is, from the drow's point of view. They are literally asked to pick, themselves!

M0och

Anyone else read "Mais encore." as "But again."?
Also quite a few mistakes in this one, its fine but still something to be noted.

Inay

"Mais encore" is litteraly "but again" yes. In this context, you could read it as "Yeah, and so?" or something akin. It's to ask your interlocutor to say more.
(Source: me, french)

Dainpdf

I suspect she will have the new sigil holder be chosen by acclaim from other sigil holders. It ties the sigils more tightly and absolves her of picking herself, while keeping the system sufficiently... aristocratic for a group so accustomed to hierarchy as the Firstborn.

Liliet

Also a very possible option, but... there has to be incentive for the other sigils to not want to fuck this one sigil over. The drow are competitive.

IMHO asking the sigil itself to pick has more going for it.

Dainpdf

It runs the risk of compelled votes, and also seems like something that would have the drow rebel. Plus, Cat has not yet recanted her dismissal of democracy. This could be it, but I am unsure.

Liliet

The drow would rebel against what, the concept of democracy working improperly? What the fuck do they care?

And Cat dismissed the concept of what Bellerophon does, not 'everything that the modern irl world calls democracy' (considering she has no reference for modern irl world).

...and actually she has JUST flashed back to Hierarch as him having a point...

Shveiran

Cat has also always been against what I think she called "rule by mob", giving everyone a say in choices they can't meaningfully understand under the assumption that because there is a lot of them it will average out alright.

I don't know what will happen, but it doesn't seem like she changed her mind on the subject

Liliet

Yes, but that is completely irrelevant to the question of "who gets to lead this sigil". In this case, the question is clear to everyone and nobody who doesn't have the requisite background for it is being asked.

What Bellerophon does is rule by mob, because they have everyone make every decision. Choosing a first among equals in a relatively small group though, has nothing to do with that.

Dainpdf

True. Still, whether the drow would accept a system where authority is not derived of power is, as of this chapter, up in the air.

Liliet

It is derived of power tho. A sigil holder has Night a grade above anyone else, so anyone who got his Night would automatically have the power that goes with authority in the drow's eyes. As long as the 'this and this appear simultaneously' condition is fulfilled, everything else is fluff that is much more changeable, in the eyes of people who are not political analysts.

Dainpdf

The selection of who gets to become sigil holder is not, though. That is not the way the drow have known for millenia.

Liliet

Yeah but considering they never actually had a say in what their way was before either, I don't think they'll have an opinion.

Liliet

I love this so much.

More worldbuilding, but more interestingly, a point about the drow culture: they HAVE it. Like, they are people and act like people. The Tenets of Night warp it, but they do not annihilate it.

And Catherine has to set up their ways forever going onward 😊

Andrew Mitchell

I loved seeing Rumena get another chance to sass Cat. And Cat clearly came out the loser.

RUMENA RUMENA RUMENA!! ♥ ♥ ♥

mavant

Wait, Chantant is just French?

Sparsebeard

Now I wonder if Miezán is Latin and Kharsum is German or something...

konstantinvoncarstein

Miezán is definitely Latin. The Legions have a “cognomen” (surname) and use Latin orders for sappers (spargere, which means throwing), and the ruler of the empire was an Emperor.
There is something on Reddit about the languages of the Guideverse

Fayhem

Nice, thanks for the link! Dunno if anyone’s noted this already, but re: the Alamans sometimes being called Alemanni (or something like that) which is germanic, IIRC they have generally been called Alemanni in a historical context in the Guide. So I think the parallel here is to the Franks (who were a germanic tribe originally) over time becoming the French (who are french).

konstantinvoncarstein

You are welcome 😊 And well see.

mavant

Well, Miezán-as-Latin seems pretty fitting.

Author Unknown

It seems the core issue Cat faces is redefining worth from who is the stabbiest to something more productive. It’s a pity Masego has lost his mojo, he could have come up with some kind of ritual to choose who is the best servant of the Night. Something powered by the Night from the dead sigil and a tithe from the claimants, winner takes all.

Argentorum

Not gonna lie, I'm really looking forward to the defining characteristic of Drow leadership being they who spit the hottest rhymes.

Eight year snakes need not apply.

NZPIEFACE

inb4 the other lords elect one

Daniel E

Gotta say, the divergence into Drow culture was interesting in the Everdark. Back on the surface though? I'm just not feeling it. I feel like if you skipped over this whole interaction (the end of Masego's conversation till whenever this Drow bit ends), you absolutely would not miss anything relevant to the story, or even especially interesting as backstory. The Drow interactions seem incredibly trivial at this point.

Liliet

I disagree.

Changing cultural mores and redefining ways a nation interacts with the world is one of the core topics of Guide, and drow are incredibly relevant to that.

ghiribaldi

Instead of a democratic vote, which I agree doesn't seem very cat-like, perhaps she have each of the Rylleh seeking the title to have contests between those who support them in their bid. Then the title goes to those who have the loyalty of the most powerful/successful supporters rather than a simple vote. A set number of contests between the followers, but having more followers than another would be a big help in some contests. Again to make it worth while to keep the Dzulu and Ipse loyal to you as well. A contest could be fighting, another could be the Drow rap battle, another could be producing materials and supplies (where having Ipse and Dzulu would be good...), etc. The person with the most victories at the end wins the title.

It encourages would-be rulers to take interest in their underlings.

It gives them a taste of what leadership is like by relying on others rather than just yourself.

The Sigil Seeker would be able to provide some level of support in some contests, but not all, to reflect what being a leader is like.

There is already a rule preventing murder/harvesting... extend that to No Reprisals or put a rule in that says the same person cannot bid for leadership twice in a row, they have to stay out every other 'election'. This means people who supported you in one bid would be available to support someone else in the next... making reprisals economically unwise since time would be better spent on winning them over.

Liliet

"no reprisals" very much has to be a rule, and it's not as though it's an alien concept – considering the 'eight year snake' game as precedent

Andrew Mitchell

I disagree for because the Drow and how Cat shapes them are going to be critical factors in the final book. So the fact that we got to understand why Cat can't just decide on the leader herself, the significance of the decision she's facing and that the decision is going to shape the drow are all important. Also, there's been well-founded speculation in other comments that even the game the Drow were playing is going to be an important aspect of what happens next.

Plus, we got to see more Rumena sass, and that's always a good thing. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Sorry, I failed to WordPress properly again. 😞 This is supposed to be a reply to Daniel E above.

dalek955

How I'd run this: Ask each contender to explain to the sigil why it would make the best sigil-holder. Then have each of them tell the sigil which of the others it would select for the top spot, if it had the choice and couldn't choose itself. Then ask the sigil to vote by token-casting. Do all this in front of the whole army, so all see how it's done and all see that it was done fairly.

Now to see how much like me Cat thinks.

Liliet

>Ask each contender to explain to the sigil why it would make the best sigil-holder.

I don't think this would work at this stage of their society's development. They will only accept one reason: because this person is the strongest / most capable of winning a fight for them. However, how exactly it is determined which one is the strongest is something it is within Cat's power to change.

Nobodyimportant

Rap battles?
My first reaction was flyting.

Odd

Nice Uktena reference in amongst the drow rap battles. Complete with mock ulun'suti.

Mental Mouse

Whatever she comes up with, the basic point will be something that they can handle themselves in future. Cat does not want to have to adjudicate every time there's a succession.

Sir_Immith

Chekhov's rap battle!
Let's go!

Chapter 62: Pledged

"Power is as wealth; that which is yours has always been snatched from another."

– Dread Emperor Venal

General Rumena had sent for them and they had come.

The Firstborn, I'd understood since my first steps past the murk of Gloom, were the ruin of a people. Even the name of their realm was the remnant of olden nights: from Empire Ever Dark to a brutal tapestry of sigils haunting the last gasps known simply known as the Everdark. They had been, when I journeyed through their ancient broken cities and their endless tribal wars, little more than a desperate ritual masquerading as a people. Sve Noc had bargained for their salvation of their people, made a pact with Below, yet it was survival they had sought and there their ambitions had ended. Wise of them, perhaps, given how insistently the Twilight Sages had courted the doom of their kind until they were slaughtered in their own seat of power to earn audience with those the drow called the Shrouded Gods. Under the auspices of Komena and Andronike the Firstborn had carved out their old glories and made of them hovels and walls, forgotten how to read their own sacred writings and traded steel for obsidian. Cut after cut, they'd forgotten what they used to be until what they'd become was but distant kin to the people who'd raised the great works I'd seen but the barest fraction of.

I'd taken me some time to understand how much more they'd lost than things like knowing how to build sewers or make steel tools, or a hundred other small practical bits of knowledge that made life easier for people who knew them. No, the wound was deeper than that. There'd never been a day in my life where I did not know that if I sought the right books, or the right stories, I could not know the history of my people. Who we had been in ages past and through that how we'd become who we were. What it meant, when a well-dressed Proceran tread a street and my people began humming the tune of Red The Flowers. Why at every summer fair there was an evening where primroses were hung from the tallest tree or roof and comical plays were had under them until dawn – a last defiance in the name of the Albans, smothered in madness so long ago. Hells, I'd even been able to find out why early in the spring so many grizzled old men and women filled the taverns of Laure and that'd actually been fairly dangerous to openly acknowledge. That old soldiers still mourned the last defeat of the Conquest drink in hand had not been one of those things people talked about fit they didn't want to draw the attention of the Eyes. Not too loudly, anyway.

Even during Black's decades of occupation the old histories had not been burned. Oh, he was a cannier man than that. He'd restricted grimoires and weapons, eradicated every legacy of the paladins of the White Hand, but the histories he'd not even tried to torch. Viciously elegant as always, he'd simply made the histories he preferred cheaper and easier to obtain before letting human nature do the rest. Yet for someone designated enough to digging, Callow's past was there to find. Even under the Praesi, I'd known more of the truth of my people than any drow born in the last thousand years could claim to know of theirs. I'd seen the truth of that laid bare between the Lord of Silent Steps and the Tomb-maker, Ivah and Rumena. The younger looked at the Firstborn and saw the only thing it had ever known, a history that was closed circle of murder under the Night, while the older drow held a rank in the host of an empire that no longer existed, commanding soldiers that were long dead. Rumena treated even other sigil-holders as children because that was what they were, in its eyes: children putting on the regalia of the empire that'd birthed them, thieving magpies making a nest of rubies and golden bracelets. It wasn't wrong, I thought, to believe that. It was true, that the Firstborn born of this era wore old honours and spoke old words without knowing the truth of them, having made mystical of mundane through the passing of the years. And still, looking at this host of magpies before me, I could not deny that they were beautiful.

Fifty thousand strong, spread out before me as a sea that'd swept away tents and bedding and distractions until all that stood in the moonlight was flesh and bone. They were a riot of colour, these warriors sworn to a hundred sigils: red and silver, yellow gold and radiant green and deep azure blue. Few sigils shared the same colours, and none the same symbols. My own Losara, stayed mine through even Winter's death, had taken to drawing the silver tree down the ridge of their nose and encircling their eyes to finish the pattern. The effect was striking, a mask of purple and silver whose roots were the lips and teeth of warriors. The golden sunflower on ochre that was Rumena's own sigil-symbol was more often tattooed with needles on cheeks or necks, though every drow out there seemed to have their own manner of bearing their sigil. Their manifold banners traced the air lazily under the trailing fingers of the wind, each speaking a claim or story or boast, and even their armaments were as works of arts. Oh, the dzulu bore spears and shields and practical tools of killing, but the Mighty? Every one of them treated both their body and armaments as works of art. Artifacts shaped in Night likely older than some Callowan cities had been painted or polished or touched with strips of cloths and ribbons.

The warlord in me, the general, looked upon them and saw only chaos. An army of wild folk, without standardized equipment, the doctrine to use them and the discipline to do so well. But part of me I'd stolen back from eternity along with my death, the one that could savour a good smoke and a sunny day and the chill of cold against my cheeks, that part looked at them and saw that even though they were the bastard children of the Empire Ever Dark the Firstborn were nothing less than splendid. Like a precious vase shattered and made into mosaic, still imperfect and broken but no less lovely for it. I would not forget that, I told myself, looking upon the proud ranks of the Mighty and their dzulu warriors behind them. In some ways I knew less of their people than even the least of them, and if I was to have a hand in the shape their kind would take long after my death I would move that hand with aware of my own ignorance. Our ways are harsh, but they are not without graces. Malicia had told me that once, years ago, because even what she hated about the Wasteland was still part of Praes. And so it'd been part of her bones and her flesh and her breath, taken in with her mother's milk. I could not mold the nature of the Firstborn like clay, uproot everything that was at the heart of them because it displeased me.

I was a cold-eyed stranger speaking hard truths, not any kind of saviour. And truth was, the closest the Firstborn would ever have to watchful angels was the pair ink-feathered crow slowly circling above us all, high under the stars. I breathed out, watching the mist and wishing it was smoke instead, but I could hardly nurse a pipe throughout this. Merciless Gods, I wish.

"Are you worthy?" I asked, and it rippled across the night.

Thousands of lips spoke the same question I had asked of the Mighty before the Twilight Crown: sa vrede. The tale of that moment had already spread through the throng last night, when it was still fresh. Not to all, but to enough. And though my question found echoes aplenty, none dared to answer it.

"The Mighty Zoitsa was slain, and its Night awaits a worthy taker," I said. "Yet it was decreed under Night that no Firstborn may slay another before the Southern Expedition has ended. And so now I am asked who is worthy of that Night, who is worthy to rise."

I laughed.

"Did we not answer this question already, you who were born of blood?" I sang out. "Did you not learn that answer well?"

Fear and anger and uncertainty wafted up in the Night, a sea of emotion I could hardly touch lest I risk drowning in it. High priestess or not, I was only one woman and a mortal one at that.

"I wonder, you who claim might," I said, "are you ashamed now to speak again before dzulu what you admitted in the shade of dusk? Is vanity the truest answer you have to give?"

That stung them, as it had been meant to. No, some said. I did not reply, and in the silence they were forced to confess the word again and again, louder and louder until none among the entire host of the Firstborn could claim they had not heard it. It was Mighty who had been questioned, but it was all who answered in the end – for if the great among them could not be said to be worthy, which of the lesser dared claimed themselves to be instead?

"There is no shame in this," I said. "I am First Under the Night, and I do not claim to be worthy where you are not – else would it not be my right, my due, to rip the Night out of every single one of you?"

Fear strengthened, but also respect. The drow were not a people to resent threats, or for that matter to think well of weakness. A reminder that my power towered over that of even their greatest Mighty made everything else easier to swallow, for was it not the privilege of the strong to do as they would of the weak? That was the principle, anyway. As it always was with those, the reality was rather more nuanced.

"But there is shame," I spoke, and there my voice sharpened, "in knowing yourself unworthy and remaining so. There is shame in sloth, in apathy, in seeing the flaws in what you are and not seeking to be more."

A fine line I must walk here, for though the sentiment I spoke was old and beloved to their kind it also went hand in hand with the spilling of blood. At least, I wryly thought, I was by now an old hand at riding tigers and I'd yet to be eaten for it.

"I see before me hands hallowed in blood and little else," I said. "What have you offered the Night, save for strife?"

I struck my staff against the snowy ground, the yew hitting it with a clapping sound and kicking off a gust of wind.

"When the Last Dusk comes to take you all and tally is taken of the deeds of the Firstborn," I said, "what will any have you fill the pages with, save for death?"

There I sneered.

"Death," I said. "Every creature's given end. No great gift, to hurry what is certain."

And there came the turbulence, for I had begun to speak of worthiness, of who was fit to hold a sigil, and now I was sneering down at the only measure the drow knew how to use: the long arm and blade it wielded. If not killing and claiming Night, what then was to be the path taken? And there, there I could not bestow upon them an answer like a saving grace made flesh. Because I could hardly see to my own soul, most days, and dared not speak to an entire people's. Because I still knew so little of the Firstborn, of what they were and might yet be. Because I would not be my father, a well-meaning tyrant with a blade in hand intent on cutting out the ugliness of a culture until no imperfections remained. The drow were not children, to be led by the hand. I could speak to them of a horizon, but it they chose to chase it that decision would be of their own making.

"Those of you who hold sigils stand only below Sve Noc and those they have raised of their own hand," I said. "You possess deep wells of Night, have bloody deeds of valour and cunning to your name. You have the weight of many years behind you, and an edge honed by as many victories. Yet the keen blade you have made of yourself goes unused. It was sent south in these lands to teach the Burning Lands the return of the Empire Ever Dark, yet what will follow our victory?"

I paused, my gaze swept the crowd.

"Rust," I said. "Rust awaits you. Your sharpness will grow dull, your fire gut out. Lest you find higher purpose and seek it with those of like soul."

I raised my voice, pitched it to resound.

"The Mighty Zoitsa was slain," I said, "and its Night awaits a taker. None under this sky are worthy, yet it must not remain so. And so, Firstborn, I charge you to strive. To seek excellence in all things, and through this conquer eternity."

I felt the feather-light touch of the Sisters against my thoughts, like a finger sliding down a page. My patron goddesses perceived the shape of my thoughts, the decree I would pass down to their people. I felt them brush up against me, those great looming presences, and taste of their judgement. Komena sat astride the wall, the remains of the woman who'd once commanded soldiers displeased but the idol of sacred strife pleased. It was Andronike whose attitude would settle the scale, and her judgement came more slowly than her sister's. Beyond even my own thoughts she gazed upon the many ends such a decree might lead, the scattered strands, and where she went I could not follow. One who had touched the godhead, as the Sisters had, could follow the strands in ways beyond my comprehension. In silence, Sve Noc drifted down from the darkened sky on long wings. Down and down they went, until they dropped on my shoulders with sharp talons. I had their blessing, silent as it was, and the simple act of them perching on my shoulders had fifty thousand drow shivering. This was not an omen or an oracle, some religious text interpreted through the lens of years.

Sve Noc was true to them, true as snow or shadow or obsidian's edge, and they had granted me their blessing beyond dispute. I raised my hand, palm up, and on it coalesced in Night what I had taken from the corpse of the Mighty Zoitsa. Power, given the shape of the sigil-symbol: a heavyset key, whose four teeth were as tortured antlers.

"This is the sigil of the Zoitsa," I said. "It will be held before the pale light comes."

A shiver, a ripple. Excitement like a crowd awaiting the first blood of a duel.

"All of you who are Zoitsa," I said. "May lay claim to the sigil."

I leaned forward.

"I took oaths from some of you, once, and though those nights are passed there was truth to our ways," I said. "To hold this sigil is to make an oath, to strive to be worthy of the honour bestowed. And through this oath, power is gained, for the oath is the promise of a deed to come."

I grinned, sharp and mean.

"Yet there can only be one oath, and many will be posed," I continued. "And so there must be a beginning and an end, for no victor can ever be crowned..."

And in the end, all will be Night, the drow returned, finishing the verse from the Tenets of Night I had cited. I had thought of the terms, as Rumena assembled all the sigils, and found that the irony of them please me. It ran deeper than that, of course. A foundation set in song was set in something deeper than stone, more poignant than law. And if you knew the right song, the right stories? All you needed was to give the first push, and stone would tumble down the slope on its own.

"The oath will hold for nine years," I said. "And upon the last dusk end, the sigil open to claiming once more. The keeping of oaths and bestowal of Night is a duty I bestow upon my own sigil, for the Losara are the children of the lost and found."

I raised a hand.

"That burden will be the duty of the Losara, to discharge without friend nor enemy so long as there is empire," I said, "and so in the keeping of oaths they will not rise or fall so long as they remain Losara."

Balance, balance must be had. If I was going to make Ivah and my warriors the priesthood that harvested and bestowed the Night, then they could not partake of that bounty – otherwise I might as well simply name the Losara the founding nobility of the Empire Ever Dark, saving their kind a few centuries of intrigue and treachery before we reached that result anyway. My sigil would serve as a priesthood, taking no sides in the discharge of their duty, and that meant barring them from the greater games of power.

"Which oath will be worthiest," I said. "You wonder this, do you not? If I will speak for the Night when every great one passes, choosing oath."

I laughed harshly.

"Are you children, Firstborn, that you must be held by your hands?" I said. "Are you without eyes, without ears, without tongue? Can you not choose your own path?"

I struck down my staff once more.

"I give you nothing save for tenets under the Night," I said. "To perish or flourish will outcome brought by your own hand, and the Shrouded Gods take any who speak otherwise."

My grin returned, for it had been some time since fate had last allowed me to bask so deeply in well-tailored irony.

"Any who are Zoitsa may lay claim to the sigil," I said. "And so any of the Zoitsa may offer oath that will be sought for nine years as they hold the sigil."

I let that sink in, then struck again.

"And it will be the same hands as it has always been, that will tell between snake and izmej," I said. "For when oaths are offered, it will be the Zoitsa who choose which will own their sigil with tokens."

They would, in the end, vote on the oath that would bind their sigil together for nine years with the elected sigil-holder keeping the Night for that duration. It would, I believed, forced the strongest of ay sigil's Mighty to care for the weakest – lest, when nine years had passed, they find the strength that had led them to the summit lent to another for another purpose. There would be more, beyond this. The sigil-holders that still lived would be charged make oaths as well, though they would keep their Night when the nine years had passed. It would only be the rulership that would be open to challenge on that night, though it would be decreed than any sigil-holder that died while in that role would see their Night turned into oath-Night. The trick to all of it, what they wouldn't care about until it was too late, was that it would be sacred under Sve Noc for any drow to leave a sigil whenever they so wished without violence being visited upon them. Sigils would still make their own laws for those they allowed into their fold, but no longer would Mighty be able to keep other drow in their service by force. I meant to hang tyranny with the rope of expedience, for if sigil-holders treated their followers like animals what drow would willingly remain in their sigil? Still, the deeper workings could wait for a time still.

"You who are Zoitsa and would put an oath to the Zoitsa, step forward," I said.

I smothered a madwoman's grin, when this time instead of three candidates I got thirty-nine.

"Hear that?" I murmured, low enough only the Sisters could hear. "That's the sound of your people taking an axe to the old order."

I was hearing it too, and it warmed the cockles of my damned villainous heart.

Javvies

Ooh, nice.
I like this solution.

Good job Cat.

Sparsebeard

"That burden will be the duty of the Losara, to discharge without friend nor enemy so long as there is empire," I said, "and so in the keeping of oaths they will not rise or fall so long as they remain Losara."

Did Cat just re-establish the Empire Ever Dark?

byzantine279

Yes. Though really she did that when she first convinced Sve Noc to follow her lead.

Rup

....discharge without friend nor enemy so long as there is empire....

Cpt. Obvious

And it was. She just swore the entire Losara sigil in as priests, historians and judges for the Empire Everdark. And she did so using language that makes it hard, next to impossible to abuse their power for personal gain.

Having the sister goddess take active interest in the nightly life of their people makes it pretty hard to get away with corruption.

And by allowing the drow to freely move between the sigils it will probably become a custom that those with the drive to strive to be sigil holders will spend time in the Losara sigil to learn about the responsibilities of the sigil holders that's not so obvious.

By limiting the growth of night available for the Losara it should encourage them to move to another sigil once they feel they are able to make use of what they have learned. And as such the Losara sigil will serve to form the leaders of the Empire.

Well at least that's what it looks like to me.

danh3107

In all of my long years of reading fiction and fantasy especially, few authors can capture a moment as readily as you can Erratic. It's not perfect, and often times not very pretty, but I feel it when you write. I feel it in my heart, I see it with my mind, the emotions and moments you want to tell me.

Thank you, once again for sharing this with us.

Faiir

Not many could take 'Let's ally with a random race' and end up with rebuilding culture, politics and economy of an entire nation.

And even then, hoping for more than just 'This is now good, this is now bad, now work according to my morality' is too much usually.

Let EE be praised for his amazing work!

James

Until the strongest learn how to make secret pacts with each other at the expense of the weakest, saying one thing but doing another behind the scenes.

At least, that's what happened in my country.

sengachi

Well yes, that's politics. But step 1 of any political system meant to arc towards justice and equality is setting up incentives for the mighty to care for the effects their actions have on the weak. Oversight committees, investigative journalism, separation of powers, all that stuff's important but it's several steps down the line.

You've got to bring everybody to the table before you can start insisting on proper table manners after all.

burguulkodar

Any amendment towards one form of injustice will create several other injustices as consequences, in due time when the exploits are learned and abused.

sengachi

Which is why step 2 is creating an editing system controlled by a separate group with different interests to edit the systems made by system 1 as those exploits are learned and abused.

stevenneiman

You know the old saying. Democracy is the worst political system ever invented, except for all the others. As a resident of a dramatically flawed democracy, I can assure you that it's worse than it should be but still loads better than almost anywhere without a democracy.

Insanenoodlyguy

The difference here is, when your politicians out and out lie, the priests of the gods they swore to will show up to have a discussion with them about failure to keep promises made, and even if they are successfully resisted, the gods themselves make a personal appearance. Oath's made before an active god are a bit different than mortals lying to other mortals.

stevenneiman

Also, it's not impossible that they're just using the oath keeping power of Winter and anyone who breaks their oaths will just die. Which puts it ahead of our own political system because there are campaign promises which you'll have to keep.

burguulkodar

Well, until they manage to learn how to use words to promise without being too precise on the timing or probability of a given promise.

Liliet

Maintaining plausible deniability is still better than not even needing to.

Shveiran

This is a primitive system.

It has a dozen dozens weak points, who become exploitable as soon as Cat and Sve Noc stop policing it thoroughly – which will happen, eventually. Even the Sisters are not omniscient, nor are they willing to act on every small infraction.

It is still better than what was in place before. It is still a working foundation to build upon.

It is a primitive system, a fledgling society. Nothing less, nothing more.

Insanenoodlyguy

Losara Sigil is the answer to that. Their job is to police the other Sigilis. Both the most and the least power as a check and balance. Considering the implications are they'd simply strip you of your power, that means you can give it up easy or lose it hard. resist a priest, Ivah's going to show up. Resist somebody of Ivah's skill and ability, and you can damn well bet that Sve Noc is going to take notice. Then you get somebody like Rumena showing up, or the current First under the Night simply rips the night from you. I'm not saying it's a perfect system, but it's not going to be that easy to corrupt it. Especially since Night has absorbed winter now and there's still a bit of Winter in what it is. If you go into this intending to break your oaths it's a story that ends badly for you.

Shveiran

Of course it's easy to corrupt, and even more likely to produce a lot of peculiar cases that go very well against the spirit of the rule.

There is no system – there has never been a system – that is so light in rules and so reliant on individuals in key roles that was not ripe for abuse.

The Losara are an attempt to regulate the process, yes. And don't get me wrong, they are a good addition. But there is nothing in the system that stops them from abusing their authority.

They are going to take oaths, you say? Fine and dandy. Only, what does it mean to abuse it?

Oaths don't save you from bad, persuasive ideas; badly worded oaths don't protect the drows unless they can spot the trap and not vote for the guy. Oaths will be simple, whereas ruling is complicated: an oath made in good faith may even be a problem during the nine years period.

The system seems solid only if you ascribe to Sve Noc omniscience, willingness to police and enforce the system strictly and thoroughly, and a drive to see their people embrace Cat's change.

The first we know to be false; the second I strongly doubt; the third is a possibility, but no assurance: this is Cat's plan, not the Sisters, and while they have endorsed it there is no way to tell if they'll decide the idea needs editing, tomorrow or even a few years down the line.

I can't stress this enough: I don't think it's a bad system. It isn't, given the situation; I think it's straight-up impossible to argue in good faith that it isn't better than “rule-of-the-stabberest”, which is pretty much how things have been for centuries down there.

But it is a patchwork solution with a lot of holes, and even if magic could solve all the problems involved that would not make the system any less FRAIL. It is not a given the Sisters will survive the war in the north, is it?

Cat’s working with what she has, but we can acknowledge that while also pointing out the results’ weak spots.

beleester

I don’t think the oaths need to be enforced, so long as the system of elections works. If the current Mighty doesn’t uphold their oaths, then in nine years they’ll be voted out in favor of someone more trustworthy. (Or if they’re really bad, their dzulu might simply leave for a better sigil.) Real democracies work just fine without the ability to magically enforce campaign promises.

The Losara sigil only needs to be able to enforce the peaceful transition of power after each election. While that’s not exactly easy, it’s quite within the demonstrated power of the goddesses, and doesn’t require any assumption of omniscience.

Liliet

I think this is a beginning, a foundation of a system. The fact it can stand on its own is already damn impressive, but it’s not really meant to. It will be supplemented by a lot of other changes, like how Cat’s earlier change to the core theological tenet – interpretation of “the worthy take, the worthy rise” – gets supplemented by this.

Cat has started building. She is not done yet.

Mental Mouse

> There is no system – there has never been a system – that is so light in rules and so reliant on individuals in key roles that was not ripe for abuse.

Any system can be abused if not enough people are defending it compared to those trying to subvert it. That’s what’s lately happened to the US government, where a cabal within the GOP has spent the last 50 years or so chipping away at the supports for our governmental integrity: public education, public finance, trust in public officials (and for that matter in other expertise), election integrity, sense of common destiny, institutional experience, moral and professional standards, and so on.

That's ultimately how we wound up with Trump, who is doing his best to finish the job.

Shveiran

Without arguing the specifics, I'll concede that no system is ever safe from abuse.

However, if a culture embraces the idea that there is a proper way to do things – that power should come with rules – than a more thorough and balanced system protects itself more than the alternative. Not enough to resist everyone suddenly deciding the rules don't matter anymore, of course, but more.

The more gray areas a system has, the less that is possible. The easier it is for that system to slide somewhat to the side and change the spirit of how things were decided before.

All I'm saying is: this system is the good attempt of a young woman with revolutionary ideas but precious little experience ruling to peacefully change a culture of serial murderers toward sustainable values that dislike casual loss of life.

I didn't think it could be controversial to say that her best shot is still gonna be a mess. I mean, seriously, what else could it have been?

konstantinvoncarstein

If the Sisters don't survive, the Drow will die, like we learn in the last chapter.

Shveiran

DIId we? Uh.

I read that more like "Masego could use the connection to destroy the drow through the Night by attacking Sve Noc", but "without Night the drow will all die" is also possible given how the Night came to be and the mess the Twilight Sages did.

Zarquon

I always look forward to your chapters with such anticipation.

This one does confuse me a little, though, at least where the precise mechanics of the Night being passed is concerned.

parahacker

It's a contest of 'oaths'. The most popular oath given wins the prize.

In other words, it's just become all about the election campaign promises.

Though the 'Goddesses are RIGHT Here watching you' element has a bit more of a punch than Politifacts.com does, I'd say.

parahacker

It may also include rap battles. Electioneering rap battles.

JJR

When the Crow Gods rate you "pants on fire" it's not a metaphor.

byzantine279

It is an understatement, however.

caoimhinh

Exactly, the thing that the Drow have that our world doesn't is a deity enforcing the deal and magic oaths. So they can't make empty promises, and would at the very least be compelled by magic to make their best effort in fulfilling their promises, unlike Earth's politicians.

Shveiran

Yes, and no. It is all about presentation, not quantification.

"I'll work toward making us more used to fight together" is an oath you can fulfill by organizing a weekly training exercise. Or a monthly one. Or a yearly one.

It is imprecise, and it is based on the judgment of uncultured people unused to rulership. Even in modern countries, where education is leagues above the drows' and the electoral process takes months, not a night, the discussion of the practicalities of the electoral promises is rarely a factor.

It's not about them lying about the oaths, not as much, is about them being able to tell how the singular oath works and what it means long term (nine years is no small beans).

It is a cool solution, possibly better than any she could have realistically called upon, but it isn't like Sve Noc's existence makes this a good system.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah but if your Sigil is dissatisfied with what you are doing, they can simply say "fuck this I'm out." If you want to actually be in charge of anything, you are going to have to keep people happy."

Shveiran

Yes, because people never get on board with stupid ideas championed by charismatic leaders; they are always great at judging long term consequences, especially when they lack both education and time to weight the pros and cons of thirty-something candidates.

That rule is GREAT to prevent abuses. You can't turn nisi target practice into the recreational activity of the sigil without ending up nisi-less. Awesome.

But a lot of people are reluctant to change. It's a solution meant to prevent abuses, not to guide good policing. How are they going to realize that an idea is a long-term mistake? How are they going to judge results and weight ideas, when the scope is so much bigger than their lives?

People are not great at this kind of judgment calls, as modern history shows... and modern history is based on people who had a lot more education and a tradition of freedom and civil rights. I can't say it's reasonable to expect the drow to give a sterling performance.

Fayhem

The point Insanenoodlyguy makes deserves more attention than I think you've given it here. Yes, there will undoubtedly be popular oaths made that turn out poorly in practice. And when that happens? People will just leave. Only the sigil-holder is bound to the oath for nine years. Anybody and everybody else can opt out in an instant. You sell people a really bad oath through whatever methods? Overnight you can become a sigil of one. It can hardly be emphasized enough how much practical accountability this imposes.

When you're elected leader of a nation, citizens looking to exit that nation tend to find it a relatively fraught process. Very, very few of those difficulties apply to leaving one sigil for another. That really, really matters.

Liliet

Oh, it's not going to help drow do very well, per se.

It will however impose a selection for doing better and a strong disincentive to doing worse. It imposes a floor – if things are really bad, you can always leave, and if you have an idea for how to make them better, you can try once every 9 years (which is a lot in a drow lifetime). Or make your own sigil with blackjack and hookers.

This makes the drow society fluid and oriented towards strong doing well by the weak. It's as well as can be done before you get into other ways to improve things – infrastructure, comprehensive legal code, stuff like that 😊

caoimhinh

Even so, it's still better than Earth's political system in that they can't lie or chicken out of their promises.

Yeah, they can make stupid promises that might damage the group in the long term, but if that's what the people chose then that's what the people will get. Those that can't stand it can leave or wait until the nine years are over and a better oath is sworn by the next Sigil-holder.

Empty promises will be kept to a minimum because whatever the Drow promise in their campaign will be part of the magic oath that will force them to carry it out in reality once they are Sigil-holders.

Wordplay will surely be a factor, and no one expects the system to be perfect or even to work awesomely right away, but it will make things better as time goes on.

Considering that Drow have a lifespan of centuries at the least, they have a lot of time to make trials and errors.

A cycle of nine years for Sigil-holders will get their society out of stagnation and keep things in motion toward improvements.

It might not stop corruption or Sigil-holders making deals with each other for personal gains or them making stupid decisions that harm their followers, but at least whatever they promised their people will be fulfilled (or they will at least make their damned best effort to do so). That's an important step.

Sparsebeard

From what I understand, the candidates turn their plan for the sigil's future 9 years into an oath and people vote on the oath they prefer.

For exemple, "We shall be on the forefront of every battle the Empire faces" or "We will be the keepers of ancient lore".

After 9 years, there is another election with stakes being leadership and the accumulated night of previous deceased sigil-holders if there are any.

Mental Mouse

Aside from the mechanics of choice, Cat has converted the disputed power into a physical token that can be passed from person to person without killing the loser. A more interesting question is whether that token can also be stolen. Of course, Sve Noc are watching, and if it can be stolen, it can also be confiscated.

KageLupus

The right to rule a Sigil is not a physical token, it is merely represented by them. The Zoitsa will just vote on which oath they prefer using the same method the vote on who spat the hottest fire.

This system actually makes a lot of sense for the Drow. The Sigil holder will be bound to their oaths for nine years by a priesthood backed up by actual goddesses. And the Sigil members are tacitly swearing to abide by that same oath by voting for the Sigil holder. Anyone who is incredibly opposed to the Sigil's oath will have the option to walk away and join a group that they are more aligned with. Not only does that makes the oath-giving much more important and meaningful, but you also end up with much stronger Sigils since they will eventually congeal into groups of like-minded Drow.

As Cat says, by the time the Drow realize that their entire culture was shifted from "the mighty rise (via murder)" to "Dzulu Lives Matter" it will already be too late to go back. This system was endorsed by Sve Noc themselves. Who among the Drow would dare to contradict it?

erebus42

It's a shame Heirarch was there for that, he'd probably be a touch taken aback by it. Granted, he'd still probably put them all on trial but still...

Insanenoodlyguy

It wouldn't work as well on the drow now. His power is drawn from very specific components right? Up till now, it's been used in a kingdom that's heretical monarchs have used the people as resources. So, his "Trial" whammy works spectacularly well before the injustice of "Tyrants oppressing the people.:" But she just introduced a form of democracy to these folks. I'm not saying they'd completely ignore his power, but when he hits them with a wave of “unelected ruler-ship is wrong, fight this” they won’t turn into a mob executing their local authorities. They can respond to that mental compulsion with “We threw the tokens, more of us WANT this guy in charge than not, and those of us who didn’t knew we wouldn’t get our way if our votes weren’t enough.” and it won’t be an irritable force when it hits them so much as a persistent thought they can resist.

RoflCat

>And so, Firstborn, I charge you to strive. To seek excellence in all things, and through this conquer eternity.”

Ah, so that’s where THAT quote came from.

(Book 4, ch 47 Tenet)

“You who would be mighty, seek excellence in all things, for the conquest of eternity must be earned with every breath.”

– Extract from the ‘Tenets Under Night’, Firstborn religious text

doominator10

You mean book 5 47, *

Ward

I really like that the quote is slightly wrong. It’s a really small thing, but it makes it feel more real as a world.

caoimhinh

Well, you know how it is. Things don’t go down on paper exactly as they happened.

There’s also another example of Firstborn religious texts having slightly modified quotes from Catherine’s actual words. In Book 5 Chapter 25 Dead Ends:

Night flooded my veins, abrupt and eager to answer my call. The gate ripped through Creation easily, to my surprise – and that of the Sisters, I felt. I’d felt this before, in Marchford. When Akua’s demon had weakened the fabric of Creation enough that it was made easier for the Winter Court to raid through. It’d not been like that when I gated earlier, I thought.

“This is unusual,” Andronike said.

I felt it too, even as the ink-black gate opened before me. Eyes, unfathomably large, gazing at me. The surface of the gate was like liquid obsidian, though without a single ripple, and I hesitated. I held back, leaning on my staff.

“Thoughts?” I said.

"Try a foot first," Komena drolly suggested.

"Oh, we think we're funny now do we?" I muttered. "Mark my words, that one's going into the holy book."

And we see here her promise/threat fulfilled:

"And so the First Under the Night came across a portal where great danger might lurk, and upon witnessing it halted and sought the council of Sve Noc. 'O Night,' said the First, 'what wisdom do you offer?' And so the Young Night answered thus: 'Try a foot first.'" – Extract from the 'Parables of the Lost and Found', disputed Firstborn religious text.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for finding that. 😊 I'm incredibly happy that the Drow religious texts are full of quotes which almost capture what really happened. Including the sass! ♥

antoninjohn

To become something more than they were, Cat is a really good Priestess

parahacker

To be fair, the only way a society of murder hobos can go is up. That's not the win here.

The genius of Cat's plan is in twisting their own values into a new, non-murderhoboish direction that still resonates with their cultural beliefs. This thing here feels like something that that could last beyond mere field expediency.... And that is a major coup if so.

Liliet

Who could have called this circa book 1???
And yet, , ,

caoimhinh

"Hear that?" I murmured, low enough only the Sisters could hear. "That's the sound of your people voting for Practical Guide to Evil in Top Web Fiction."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

I was hearing it too, and it warmed the cockles of my damned villainous heart.

John

The worthy vote, the worthy rise.

Hellspirit

As it has been, magnificent delivery

NZPIEFACE

Absolute democracies are absolute.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think this is a form of Theodemocracy? What with God on earth being actively involved.

NZPIEFACE

That would be the Belerophens, as the gods actually vote.

Argentorum

Actually, the gods below have a vote. One vote, for all of them.

In the History of Belerophon they have never exercised this power. But it's there.

Barthumphries

Typo thread

Power is as wealth; that why which is yours has always been snatched from another.

Change "that why which" to "that is why that which" had not been one of those things people talked about fit they didn't want to draw the attention of the Eyes.

Change fit to if

werafdsaew

Seems kinda strange to consult Sve Noc when the decisions are being announced. What if they refused or want more time to think about it? Then Cat is left hanging with nothing to say.

konstantinvoncarstein

Godesses can probably process information much faster than mortals. In "the gods are bastards", gods are basically sentiments supercomputers.

burguulkodar

Meh. No rap song contest, then.

byzantine279

One thing people seem to be missing: This is a world of stories. Oaths taken in this way have real power. Even ignoring Losara and Sve Noc it is not safe to try abusing an Oath taken in this way – the stories say that oathbreakers are always found out, and always lose.

Javvies

Besides ... I'm pretty sure that Cat's going to, if she hasn't already, declare oathbreaking a sign of Unworthiness – to be Worthy is to keep the Oaths you make. To break an oath you made is to prove yourself to not be Worthy.

There might be some exceptions for nonconsensual oathbreaking (ie, mind control or actions by third parties beyond one's ability to react to), but as a general rule oathbreaking is bad.

Admittedly, this might lead to Fae-like wording practices when it comes to the Oaths made. On the other hand, it's also likely that the drow would consider a straightforward Oath to be more Worthy than an Oath with a lot more give in it. At least, as regards an Oath to lead a Sigil.

Satan

If the next chapter does not involve a 39-person rap battle, I will be severely disappointed.

Chapter 63: Draft

"Rebel prisoners, Black Knight? Ah, you must mean the fresh orc rations."

– Dread Emperor Foul I, the Frugal

Under moonlight Ivah of the Losara sat at my side, wielding ink and parchment, and made record of oaths.

We begun with the Zoitsa, for they were the reason of my coming as well as the first attempt to make old stones into a fledgling temple. I had given this crucible of acclamation the shape of their singing-rites, and that aspect they embraced with relish. It was not merely oaths that were offered to the many waiting ears of the Zoitsa Sigil but verses crafted with deft hands and heady cadence. The first pledges were mundane, enemies that would be defeated and protections that would be ensured. One ispe then hazarded the pledge of sharing the sigil's Night with all Zoitsa, and though the oath was met with shocked and disapproving silence, the words had broken the levee. It was not merely prudent, if well-spoken, promises that were made but instead ambitions unveiled. A jawor spoke of raising a city where no pale light would ever reach for the Zoitsa to live in, another of arming even every dzulu with coats of steel and shining blades. The rylleh, older hand and the subtler games of sigils, let others come forward to gauge the sigil's wants before speaking their own oaths.

The same drow that'd not presumed to speak to me before now swore to swell the ranks of the Zoitsa so it would become one of the great sigils, while the ambitious one who'd invited me to pass judgement instead swore that the Night of every Zoitsa to die in the wars would be passed to a dzulu proving themselves worthy. I felt through the Night the last oath earned the most approval, at least until the fourth rylleh, the one who had not even stood forward to lay claim to the sigil until now, spoke its own pledge-

*"host of empire will we be, servants first to right
if Zoitsa bend the knee
let it be only to Night"*

The Night thrummed with approval, and not only from those drow who bore the colours of the Zoitsa. Morovoy was the name of the rylleh that had made the oath, and it had been clever in its shaping. The verses of it made it clear that for its span of nine years it would have the sigil suborn its own ambitions to the needs of the reborn Empire Ever Dark, serving as army and obeying the orders of leaders appointed by the Night. The other Firstborn had sought to earn acclaim through pretty ambitions and heady boasts, but Morovoy's pledge instead harkened back to the old dream: a nation of drow, proud and mighty under darkened sky. It was opening the door to any who wanted to bare blade for that purpose, at least for a span of nine years, and in offering such selfless oath was making all the pledges of those that'd spoken before it seem... base. Almost petty. When tokens were set down to match oaths, Morovoy earned more than half those cast and more than double of its closest rival. I sent Ivah to bestow the Night I had shaped into a sigil, after that chosen oath was written down, and so the first crucible of the nigh was passed.

The hurdle, after that, was that those already holding sigils need take oaths of their own. It'd taken hours to gather fifty thousand drow and even longer to clear room for them all to stand, so I'd had time to do more than ponder the shape of the reformation I wanted to offer. I'd made arrangements as well, quietly reaching out to those in the Southern Expedition that were most beholden to me. It was why the Losara had not stirred, when I set them apart from the rest of the kind and charged them to never rise too high nor fall too low. It was why though many of the sigil-holders were taken by surprise by the changing tides, not all were. In the silence that followed the ascension of Morovoy, Mighty Jindrich strode forward. The same hard-headed, choleric warrior that Rumena and I had taken to using as a battering ram whenever we needed something dead or broken. It was feckless and brutal, though prone to forgiving those that amused it. Yet its faith in Sve Noc was deep and militant, and it thought nothing of making oath if it was the will of the Night. And so Mighty Jindrich stood before tens of thousands of its kind, white-toothed and red-handed, and it sang a pledge-

"to be the point of the spear ever furthest from the rear; to battle under veil of night and the glare of palest light; hear me: nine years' spread a hundred victories tread!"

I'd expected the Jindrich Sigil to flinch at the pledge, of fighting as the vanguard wherever fight was to be found and to forge a hundred victories in nine years, but that was not what I felt from them. Oh, far from it. They were burning with the kind of hard pride that would have any people but the Firstborn howling. In the Jindrich, their faces painted azure and white with the jagged fang-like wings of their sigil-symbol, I found boiling blood and a thirst for blood. The took after their sigil-holder, and other drow listened to such an oath with envy – oh, some would leave the sigil, but there would be twice as many petitioning for entry. One after another, the sigil-holders who had once been of my Peerage followed suit. Mighty Soln's pledge to found a cabal with any other sigil willing to help raise another Tvarigu in the heart of the Burning Lands had the crowd rippling in approval and a few feet stomping down, but when after it finished speaking Rumena stepped up fifty thousand drow went still as statues. The old drow laughed, softly, and offered the trace of a bow at the crows on my shoulder. It spoke simply, cadenced but with an implacability that was beyond boast-

"before nine years have passed, Keter's gates will lie broken as trembles Death's holdfast."

I breathed out sharply at the oath the general had just made. A heartbeat passed and the sheer wave of fervour that raged through the Night had me leaning against my staff for support. Drow raised their voices in an ululating cry, honouring the old monster who'd promised it would lead any following it to smash down the gates of the Crown of the Dead. The ancient creature closed its eyes, breathed the cool air of Procer's winter night, and smiled the smile of one who would cast their wroth against even gods. And still Ivah wrote, ink on parchment, for the Losara would keep records so long as there were records to be kept. I only left the Firstborn two hours before dawn, having granted delay to those few sigil-holders who had no oath yet to pledge, but that number was few. Before dawn my Lord of Silent Steps would have begun transcribing its records to a book whose pages would be the one of the greatest things I had ever made.

Whether it would be a great triumph or disaster, only time would tell.

—

Hakram and I found our way back through the dark, passing legionaries on watch and the odd still-lit tent, but it was a surprise to find that my own was lit up with sprites and magelights. My feet slowed as I heard laughter from inside, glimpsing two silhouettes – one on a bed, the other seated by its side. A man and woman, I thought, and though the words were indistinct Indrani's voice was a familiar drawl.

"I can hear what they're saying," Adjutant murmured, the offer implicit.

I'd be able to as well, if I drew on the Night. Instead I breathed out slowly and shook my head.

"Leave them to it," I said.

The orc's eyes moved to me, unreadable.

"They have their own matters to settle," I said. "And if I'm there..."

"The war follows you," Hakram completed, clicking his fangs.

I shrugged, affecting nonchalance, though I held out little hope so shallow a deception would not be seen through by my Adjutant.

"Hells, Hakram," I said, "I might as well be the war, to those two. No, let them have a night without red on the horizon and talk of plans."

"It doesn't have to be that way," he gently told me.

I thought of Vivienne, scared she would be cast out and left out in the wilds, and the way I'd used that fear to bring her a little closer to the woman I needed her to be. Not lightly, not without qualms, not for selfish reasons. But I'd still done it.

"It does," I disagreed.

There might come a day where that was no longer the case, but until the continent no longer teetered on the brink then the queen's needs were more important than the woman's wants. I clapped Hakram's shoulder, and together we went to find somewhere else for me to sleep.

—

I woke up with Morning Bell, still tired but knowing there was too much on my plate to be able to justify sleeping any longer. Adjutant, already awake, passed along that both Masego and Indrani were still sleeping in so instead I broke fast with Juniper and Vivienne. The Hellhound had always been — rather despicably so, in my opinion — a morning person so while cheer was no more in the cards than usual she was still noticeably more animated than either myself or Vivienne. Who, I'd noted over the years, had never really gotten used to staying awake most of the day. Neither thieving nor heroics were always work to be done under the sun, at least not in an occupied Callow. So while Vivienne and I blearily drank our morning brews and poked at porridge, Juniper sprinkled bits of jerky into hers and dug in with relish as she began expounding on this Proceran book she'd found. Some history of the First League War penned by a prince of Lyonis she'd found a Lower Miezian translation of. The title — one of those long, elaborate ones highborn Proceran scholars were so fond of — she spoke scathingly of, but apparently it was a fascinating look at the events and much less drily written than most histories. Vivienne leaned towards me as the Hellhound told us all about how Helikean kataphraktoi had actually begun as a tradition before Theodosius, contrary to popular belief.

"This is torture," the heiress-designate to Callow murmured.

"Just don't mention the Commentaries," I whispered back. "It'd be like tossing meat at a wolf."

Usually it only got this way when we drank, though, so I was somewhat surprised. By now Aisha should have... Ah, I thought, looking at the empty seat where Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara would usually be seated. There's your trouble. The living and breathing person that served as the better part of Juniper's social graces was missing, and so we were being subjected to the full Hellhound treatment.

"Fascinating," I lied, just after a sentence. "Where's Aisha, by the way?"

"Liaising with the Legions-in-Exile," Juniper growled. "We're taking full stock of the armies down to company size so we can adjust the doctrine for whatever battles are ahead."

Ah, and there was no one else in the Hellhound's general staff that'd get that done nearly as quickly or neatly as Aisha so there she went. She'd probably been absent from general staff meetings too, which would only make the Hellhound grumpier.

"I'm sure it'll be done soon," I said.

"It'd help if you could tell us where winter quarters will be," the orc bluntly said.

"I'll see if I can get that settled today," I sighed, then sipped at my tea.

The warmth of it seeped into me, and I glanced at the other Callowan at the table. As much out of need as out of mercy, I threw Vivienne a bone.

"I'll need you to send a messenger to Arnaud Brogloise," I said. "Today will be convenient for the audience he requested. I'll be expecting you at that table, Lady Dartwick."

She nodded.

"And the Dominion?" she asked.

I glanced at Juniper.

"We're overdue a fireside evening, the lot of us," I said. "I expect at some point during that evening the Pilgrim will swing by for a chat, if he's ready to talk."

"Tonight?" the Hellhound asked. "We've all got-"

"Competent subordinates," I interrupted. "We can afford a few hours by a fire, Juniper. If you believe your staff so incompetent that if you have a drink they'll be lost-"

"I never said that," the Hellhound bristled.

"Good," I smiled, "then you can bring the aragh."

I hadn't had a taste of that since becoming mortal again and I was curious if my recollections from the old days were still accurate.

"You baited me," Juniper growled.

"Can't win them all, Marshal," I grinned, and toasted her with my steaming mug.

Vivienne shot me an amused look before making her retreat, and a wise woman she was. This time, when Juniper began to talk about the logistics of the Army of Callow, the glint in her eye made it very clear the torture was entirely on purpose.

—

It was not until Noon Bell that I met with Arnaud Brogloise, plenipotentiary envoy for the First Prince of Procer. I'd been ready for talks earlier, but the other side had not. Apparently the Grand Alliance's camp was like an anthill that'd been just gotten a good kick now that scrying was restored to Iserre and Hasenbach's Order of the Red Lion could arrange talks with Salia. Not just Salia, though, likely most of the Alliance's signatories. No doubt the Blood wanted to speak with Levante and their Holy Seljun, if only to gain a veneer of lawfulness for whatever they'd get up to regardless of what their figurehead ruler wanted. Given the number of highborn of all stripes who'd want access to scrying and what must be a highly limited amount of mages that could use such sorcery – as well as spell formulas a generation behind the Empire's, which meant the further two-way scrying went the more relays would be required and the more prone to failure the magic would be – I wouldn't be surprised if they were working their practitioners to the edge of burning out. Still, at least the development meant I could rely on the former Prince of Cantal having freshly spoken with Hasenbach.

This was the closest I'd get to speaking directly with the First Prince before getting to Salia, I suspected.

This was not a formal negotiation, only a private audience, so I'd seen no need to overburden this with ceremony and entourages. On the side of the oaken table I'd claimed Hakram sat at my right and Vivienne at my left, while Arnaud Brogloise had brought with him only a pale redheaded scribe whose accessories seemed to indicate was meant to serve as both note-keeper and scholarly expert. The ink and quill made the first plain, while the veritable pile of tomes and scrolls he'd brought in with a legionary's help implied the second. I knew from experience that someone well-learned in where the writing you were looking for tended to shave hours off of discussions such as these, so I rather appreciated the expertise the Alamans had brought with him.

"Your Majesty," Arnaud Brogloise greeted me. "Lady Dartwick, Lord Adjutant."

I craned my neck back.

"I'm unfamiliar with the proper address for a plenipotentiary envoy," I admitted.

"It is 'lord envoy', though it is only a courtesy title," the middle-aged replied, smiling amicably. "Yet if I may be bold?"

My brow rose and I nodded permission.

"It is my understanding that you are not partial to formalities," Brogloise said. "We could dispense with them, if you would allow it, and you could simply call me Arnaud."

I smiled back.

"Did you know that I could hear heartbeats, back when I was Sovereign of Moonless Nights?" I mildly said. "If I pricked my ear, I could ever hear blood flowing in someone's veins. Smell their fear and anger."

His face expressed only confusion. He really was, I thought, one of the finest actors I'd ever seen. The Alamans might even be better at it than Akua, which was impressive in all the worst ways.

"I'm aware I'll find about as much genuine emotion at the heart of you than I would in door hinge, my lord envoy," I said. "So spare us both the affability."

The ruddy face slackened, moving towards blankness though not quite reaching it. To be entirely vacant would have been an effort as well, while this was simply the release of a pretence.

"If you'd prefer, Your Majesty," he calmly said. "Shall we attend the matters at hand?"

"If you would," I agreed.

"Her Most Serene Highness has, after consideration, decided to honour the Grey Pilgrim's non-binding promise of a peace conference," Brogloise stated.

How magnanimous of her, I drily thought. I'd grown more diplomatic in my old age, so I refrained from rolling my eyes. Hasenbach might not be happy about Tariq agreeing in her name to anything, but she needed the truce and conference badly. Refusing to honour the Pilgrim's agreement with the Tyrant would have been cutting off her nose to spite her face, considering it'd set the League back on the warpath and mortally offend the Dominion.

"And the guarantee of truce until the conference has ended?" Vivienne asked.

"Will be honoured in full," the Alamans agreed.

"Including the Legions-in-Exile?" Hakram asked.

"So long as the Queen of Callow formally agrees to take responsibility for their actions while they remain on Proceran soil," Brogloise said.

Mhm. So, Cordelia had recognized that at this point she didn't have the strength or influence to push the issue when it came to the Exile Legions. Making them my problem was a way to deal with it, since she knew by now I needed the goodwill of the Grand Alliance for the Accords and letting the Praesi loose anywhere in Procer was a good way to throw away every inch of progress I'd made there. Still, I'd take it.

"Agreed," I said.

The redhead scribe's quill scratched against parchment.

"However," the former prince said, "the Highest Assembly formally requests that the escaped prisoner of war Amadeus of the Green Stretch be turned over for trial."

"The Highest Assembly has been heard," I mildly said. "Though I will caution that considering he never surrendered to the Principate and was tortured while in custody, by Callowan law you have no grounds for such a request."

"Indeed, this has been acknowledged," Arnaud Brogloise said, to my surprise.

That, I thought, had been much too easy considering how despised Black was in these parts. Was Cordelia sparing him as a favour to me so she could call that favour in elsewhere? Shit, if it came to that I might actually have to agree.

"However, as a Named military commander who carried out plans of mass murder of civilians he would be considered in egregious breach of the Liesse Accords," the former prince said.

Ah, I thought. And there it was.

"Procer has not signed the Liesse Accords," I said.

"It will, if you agree to apply them to the Black Knight," Arnaud Brogloise plainly said.

The bluntness of it jolted me. He was actually serious, I realized, and he wasn't just speaking hot air: the powers Cordelia had invested in him meant he could sign agreements in her name in a legally binding manner.

"It would be selective application of the articles, unless you also intend to pursue the trial of the Grey Pilgrim for the massacre of a port town and an entire half-legion of Praesi legionaries," Vivienne noted. "Or of the Queen of Callow for the particulars of the Battle of the Camps."

"Guarantees can be made that this will not be the case," the envoy said.

"You're missing the point," I flatly said. "If the Accords are used from the very moment they're signed as a tool to pursue enmities, they'll not last the decade."

Hakram, at my right, was looking intently at our Alamans friend. He'd noticed something, then.

"A matter to be discussed in more detail at a later date, then," Brogloise said. "The First Prince is offering to host the conference in Salia, Your Majesty, and seeks your opinion on the matter."

Adjutant moved a fraction, and so I stilled my tongue. I inclined my head towards him without looking.

"In the eventuality this is agreed on, where does the First Prince suggest the Army of Callow and the Legions-in-Exile march on?" Hakram asked.

"Escort would be allowed up to four thousand for every ruler attending the conference," the envoy replied. "Four hundred into the city itself."

"And the armies themselves?" I asked.

Arnaud Brogloise glanced at his scribe, who bowed at him then myself before rising to snatch a half-dozen scrolls from the pile. Maps, I realized, reading the letters on the seals.

"In this matter," the former Prince of Cantal said, "Her Most Serene Highness is willing to entertain your proposals."

I grinned. I'd been a while since I last had a good haggle, I mused, so this ought to get interesting.

Javvies

I wonder what Hakram noticed.
I also wonder how serious they are about wanting to hammer Amadeus for his campaign in Procer.

—

I hope we get to see the fireside chat — it's been a while since we've seen then released like that.

—

Nice going with the Oaths, Cat.
It seems like a lot of the Oaths most approved of are about building a better future for the Drow and building them a new homeland.

Rumena is awesome. That's one hell of an Oath.

Alex

First Tomb-Maker, and then Tomb-Breaker?

Someguy

Rumena is at least sane enough not to swear to take Dead King's soul to sacrifice to Sve Noct. Also Rumena did not make an Oath, he simply stated a Certainty sure as old age.

Andrew Mitchell

A Certainty? Probably. An Oath, for sure. After that Oath, Ivah continued to write.

> The ancient creature closed its eyes, breathed the cool air of Procer's winter night, and smiled the smile of one who would cast their wrath against even gods. And still Ivah wrote, ink on parchment, for the Losara would keep records so long as there were records to be kept.

MagnaMalusLupus

>There's really no word to articulate what I mean. A threat with a measure of inevitability to it. A promise? Too feeble. People break promises too often. A curse? A malediction? Too... magical. An oath? The connotations are wrong. When I say I'll do something, I make it happen.

Andrew Mitchell

I think I get what you're trying to say. Maybe "pledge" or "vow" are a bit closer?

Sablonus

It's a reference to a quote from Alexandria, from Worm :V

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks. I tried Worm but didn't get very far. It was all a bit grim and it didn't grab me like PGtE has. I know I'm in the minority on that one. Lots of people I know loved it.

Shveiran

I liked it, personally, but for all the good stuff that IS there, I always got the feeling that Wildbow didn't have an arching plan like EE has, you know what I mean? Most of what happened was thrilling, and it was coherent with itself, it was just I felt like... it didn't build up to what came next? The endings never quite felt... rewarding enough. That isn't to say they came out of nowhere, they just didn't quite turn everything whole.

It is purely speculation here, but I think it's simply that Wildobow is a (very good) discovery writer, or a Gardener; a writer that finds out where his story goes as he writes it.

And there is nothing wrong with it, in fact it is a practice that has a lot of strong points... but on their first draft, endings tend to be the weakest link. It's not a problem after they are done with the second draft, but considering here you read the novel during the first draft...

De gustibus disputandum non est. There's a lot of skill involved in what he does, but I read through both Pact and Worm, and remember them like an amazing ride on the edge of my seat that still left me wholly unsatisfied and in a bad mood. I think it's just not for everyone.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for sharing your experience with it, and explaining it well. If I do try to give it another go that will be very useful to know.

therealgridlock

Worm is great, it scratched that itch in wanting a self consistent powers based/physics based universe, and the characters are all so relatable.

Only thing I'll say about it that's negative is something that's true about all Wobblebible books; they escalate forever.

And i mean they escalate, and escalate, and escalate, until everything is life or death at every possible moment, the sheer stress keeps going and going, til it feels like half the characters should be dead from stress alone.

But, if you don't mind that, his books are great.

Worm and Ward are both great superpower novels, twig is a great steampunk/biopunk/victorian Body-Horror novel that pushes the limits of your gag reflex (but in a good way?)

Pact I never got to finish, so I have to find where I was, and Pale is excellent so far (though I'm technically paused on that while I read this, as I had 15 years of writing to catch up here, and there I was current)

EE has definitely written a book where even though conflict still escalates, they still de-escalate in between, and even though the main character ate a god, she's back to base human with extra tricks, so that's impressed me.

My only other webserial I've read even remotely similar to these two authors is With This Ring, and i feel like that's almost an entirely different genre. Still great though.

NZPIEFACE

Make EED Great Again!

That said, she's now made an actual political system for the Drow.

There is no equal representation in her system, as Sigils will have different sizes, but they'll be the closest they'll get as the rylleh will go join other Sigils to better represent their wants and needs.

Each Sigil will be democratically voted upon, and how the Mighty use this system, whether they form distinct communities where the Mighty is the leader like before, or if they form a council or government like how Cat forced them into, will affect how the race will be like moving forwards.

caoimhinh

I laughed a bit that Morovoy basically went "Make Zoitsa Great Again" and got elected. Also, the communist ispe that wanted to share Zoitsa's Night among all the Sigil got booed by silent disapproval, poor drow.

stevenneiman

Honestly, this all seems kind of out of character for the drow. They always pay lip service to the glory of Sve Noc, but they've learned from birth that that's just a justification for self-service. Now here they are passing up opportunities to claim Night from any Mighty who die in battle because the alternative is patriotism.

Liliet

Here's the thing: the strength of the sigil is the strength of its STRONGEST Mighty. That's how drow society works. 1000 slightly stronger dzulu will STILL be scythed through by a sigil holder Mighty who has killed their leader because they did not claim the previous holder's Night and instead distributed it.

And don't underestimate the strength of a dream and passion. Self-service is, simply put, BORING. Especially for a fired up crowd.

Liliet

also,

>pay lip service to the glory of Sve Noc, but they've learned from birth that that's just a justification for self-service this is not how psychology works. This kind of justification becomes one's breath and blood, and people genuinely die for religion even when there's not an actual living goddess right fucking there, which in this case there is.

Shveiran

I think stevenneiman is right in this being a big, sudden change. However, I believe you are right in countering that this is not out of character, merely an evolution.

For the first time in living memory, their goddess is walking and speaking to them.

In our world, many deny the existance of deities, but the drow know the Sisters are real; in our world, many believers have luke-warm faith because their day-to-day necessities challenge and/or distract them from their faith's tenets, but Sve Noc is manifest and is making its will and its miracles known.

It's hard not to be moved by this, if you are a drow.

Liliet

Mhm! It's a change, but the foundation for it is 100% there.

Sparsebeard

I like that you can find most of those oaths in the two previous chapters' comments...

Then the Drow voted on them, some met approval, some met ridicule.

IDKWhoitis

I would hazard they are very serious. He did cause a hell of a headache. However, it might also be on the table. It doesn't detract from how seriously they want his head on a platter, but they will need to be convinced and bartered for. It's like selling a fragment of Cordelia's legitimacy, or Cat's for that matter, to simply let this pass without comment would still inspire rebellion. I suspect The Auger has already told Cordelia that Cat negotiates in good faith. What's left is to get the rest of Procer to accept that without getting their trusty pitchforks lit on fire.

I wonder if Tariq is going to be a help in this regard, or he might tell the absolute truth of Amadeus, which might be damning in its own right.

Mental Mouse

> ... without getting their trusty pitchforks lit on fire.

<blink> I think that's meant to be pitchforks and torches. 😊

Liliet

Yes, but flaming pitchforks present a much more intimidating image. Yay consolidation!

IDKWhoitis

Nah, much more efficient to douse the pitchfork in flammable tar or resin then light it. Have you ever brought a pitchfork to a proper riot? Those fuckers are heavy, and then bring torch in the other hand on top of that? Screw that noise...

Mental Mouse

And yeah, it's a bargaining chip, one of the few Cordelia has. Unfortunately for her, it can only go so far without risking another break.

stevenneiman

I suspect that Cordelia will pursue the matter of Amadeus exactly as far as she considers politically expedient, while allowing Cat to be the one who has to spend political capital if she wants to protect him. She might despise him for what he did to her people, but she's a pragmatist to the bone and she won't throw good lives after bad if she thinks that letting him off lightly would be best for Procer overall. And yes, Rumena is awesome.

Liliet

This. It's something Cordelia cannot go back lightly on, so she will not. It's the closest thing to legitimate leverage she has on Catherine, too, considering the factual disparity in power.

She doesn't want Catherine to actually agree to this. But she wants Catherine to make ALL of the concessions in return.

werafdsaew

I doubt it's all that serious, since they have shit negotiating positions due to them really needing the war to end so that they can concentrate on the DK. Remember that a few chapters ago Amadeus thought that the no Name ruler part of the Accord was DOA, but still doesn't counsel Cat to take it out because that's something to concede during the negotiations? I think this is the same thing.

Ebert of Alamans, scholar errant

Building a future and, through the scholarship of the Losara, ensuring that future connection to the past. That's how you make a rabble into a nation.

NZPIEFACE

You know, Rumena's pledge reminded me that they're moving to kill the metaphorical representation of Death for their continent. Considering how they've failed for the last thousand years...

stevenneiman

He's not really the representation of death, just ultimate evil.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

They sometimes poetically refer to his military gains as Death acquiring this or that. He is not only the Dead King but the King of Death. You're not wrong, but I'm not sure you're right either.

stevenneiman

If you two are right, it just means that it's all the more vital for the Empire Ever Dark to outgrow its old ways and the stories which have grown on the people they were. Fortunately, Cat's getting pretty good at that sort of thing, seeing how she's already done it twice.

danh3107

Jindrich never disappoints, but good God, RUMENA THE FUCKING LEGEND!

RUMENARUMENARUMENARUMENA

Andrew Mitchell

IKR! I had tears in my eyes a few times reading the Drow section.

shieldredblog

Jindrich, He's the one who was fired out of a catapult right?

caoimhinh

Yeah, he's the berserker that Catherine described as "he survives all damage by being just too fucking angry to die"

Andrew Mitchell

He's really growing on me. I initially thought he was just a PITA that Catherine would need to crush but he is, in fact, totally awesome.

shieldredblog

Good, glad he's alive. But now Cat needs to bring him to the treaty talks, just for the looks on the faces of the two Blood he fought.

Andrew Mitchell

Great idea! There may be an opportunity for them to enjoy "working" (slaughtering) together. I can't wait to see them in action against the undead.

RoflCat

So basically Nauk++, now even harder to kill.

IDKWhoitis

If I was a betting man, I would hazard that Cat is confident enough to send the majority of her army back home. If she just approaches Salia with the Woe and about 400 Mighty, she is absolutely not in danger. Rather Salia would be...

I wonder if she would disguise Amadeus in a wig and clever use of coconuts to drag him into the city. It would result in a very entertaining moment to throw Cordelia off her game from the get go to let Amadeus and Scribe make their case for why he is only a monstrous general, but not a war criminal. He would be too useful to simply punish for petty revenge.\

Although in such a scenario, I wonder if both Juniper and Viv would head back to Callow. Callow cannot go without a ruler for too long, and Praes still needs to be checked until Malica's play comes to light. I think Viv has enough confidence from Cat that she could go back to ruling Callow de facto without going crazy.

Oshi

It's not petty though. It's political but not petty.

Javvies

Cat isn't going to have a force consisting exclusively of drow. Remember, they get hit real hard at dawn, and are far less useful in daylight.

She'll probably have an escort consisting mostly of Army of Callow forces – regulars, sappers, mages, knights – plus a number of drow, probably fewer than a hundred in total.

The real question is if she'll have any of the House Insurgent with her.

ninegardens

Probably the drow will be sending their OWN representatives, as a separate group with hopes of becoming signitories...

Hellspirit

*Cough, First Priestess of Night

caoimhinh

"In this link, <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> " the former Prince of Cantal said, "Her Most Serene Highness is willing to entertain your voters."

I grinned. it'd been a while since I last had a good vote, I mused, so this ought to get interesting.

Ekmo

"Are you not entertained!?!?"

Aston

The First Prince needs Cat to fail.

The Bard needs Cat to fail.

But... The story is going way too well...

Andrew Mitchell

> The First Prince needs Cat to fail.

I don't think so. Cordelia needs Procer NOT to fail and Cat with her armies, is Cordelia's best bet to ensure that. I think Cat's going to get most of what she wants and Cordelia is going to get most of what she wants as well.

Liliet

>The First Prince needs Cat to fail.

The First Prince needs Cat to win. BADLY.

Trebar

"The Bard needs Cat to fail"

Eh... not sure that's the case. There's still a quite reasonable chance that the Liesse Accords or something akin to them has been part of Bard's end game all along.

caoimhinh

I wonder if the "escort of four thousand for every ruler" means that every one of the Blood will get an escort of four thousand, considering they are all likely to be on that table for the negotiations (we saw back when the Grand Alliance for the Crusade was formed that Cordelia sat with the entirety of the Majilis in Salia).

Still, I can't help but frown on Catherine's eagerness for going to Salia for the peace conference. No peace conference is ever held in the capital of the enemy country, it's not done for security, logistical, political and even reputational reasons. You do not sign peace in the enemy's capital, unless you are taking it by force or surrendering to them. Otherwise, peace is always negotiated in the most neutral ground possible.

Catherine going to Salia makes little sense except for granting Cordelia the advantage of home ground and making Cordelia look like she has the upper hand. Even if they are bound for going North, they should not hold the conference inside the city. It was one thing for the Crusade conference to be held there, as Procer had been the one to call for it and would be the leader, besides all the members were not at war at the moment.

The peace conference between Callow and the Grand Alliance, and also the one involving the League (though they might be one and the same), should be held in a more neutral or open ground. Like, sure, they are in Procer already, but there's a HUGE difference between having talks on a tent held in open field and doing so inside a Proceran fortress surrounded by Proceran soldiers and priests (maybe even Heroes).

Taking only four hundred soldiers as escorts into the city is asking the others to put a lot of trust in Cordelia, it is not an equal position to negotiate, and Catherine has been adamant in not negotiating from a weaker position.

Liliet

On one hand, you have a very good point. "Field outside of Salia" is a much more reasonable location than inside the city, and that might just be it.

On the other hand, I have to note that Catherine can afford a lot of slack in 'weaker/stronger position' mind games here. It might be technically inaccurate to say she has the bigger army, but only if you count Procer and Levant together, which at this point I'm not sure you should.

Procer is in the weakest negotiating position here, and everyone knows it. "Unless you are taking it by force" indeed.

Mental Mouse

> "Unless you are taking it by force" indeed.

"Four thousand troops, four hundred into the city"... but that's assuming humans. Okay, Cat's force will be mostly human, with some greenskins... and just how many Drow? And more to the point, which Drow? I doubt she'd bring all the sigil-holders, but she could certainly bring a few, and a bunch of lesser Mighty. Along with some of the Woe...

Fayhem

I think we already had this discussion at some length back when you were arguing that there was no way they'd go to Salia and I was saying yes they will (VINDICATION). To briefly recap what I remember as my main points:

a), They're not negotiating a peace, they're negotiating an alliance. That's a different kettle of fish entirely. Negotiating a peace comes from an implicit foundation of distrust, because, y'know, war. Negotiating an alliance has to come from an implicit foundation of at least potential trust, because if there isn't even a potential for trust then any alliance would be DOA regardless. It is true that the negotiating parties were literally just at war which muddies the picture of which this is, but the fact is that the peace is a fait accompli at this point. The Eastern armies can nope on out back home easily now that the whole "gates don't work because a chunk of Arcadia is falling from the sky" situation is resolved, and Procer doesn't have the means or the will to pursue and in fact desperately needs to not be at war on two fronts and everybody knows it. That swings the dynamics firmly into the "negotiating an alliance" side of things even without any other factors.

b), Also, if Cordelia somehow suffered a massive fit of retardation and attacked the prospective ally that she needs to save her bacon and is also personally responsible for the Dead King backing off (which, never gonna happen anyway) then Cat can still nope out of there pretty easily through a fae gate; it's not like those don't work inside cities or something.

c), And now Procer would be unfixably screwed since the Army of Callow, the Legions-in-Exile, the drow expedition, and probably also the League armies are now loose in Procer with the exact opposite of an incentive to play nice. At the same time as the Dead King immediately goes back on the march. Goodbye, Procer!

d), Not to mention the Levantine allies Cordelia also desperately needs will be mortally offended since they pledged on their sacred honor (which it has been thoroughly established they take VERY seriously) to support Cat's bid to join the Grand Alliance and trying to murder her at the conference for that is rather more than a minor breach.

e), Oh, and Cat making a show out of not trusting Cordelia to pointlessly, self-destructively, nation-damningly try to murder her for no particular reason at a diplomatic conference in flagrant breach of every diplomatic norm in existence is what would weaken her negotiating position. It would be tantamount to accusing her primary interlocutor (since the Levantines already swore to back her, so while they might not be quite in the bag as far as particulars go they're more on her side than not I'd say) of acting in the worst bad faith possible before even opening the talks, which makes you look like a paranoid asshole instead of like somebody genuinely looking to form a real alliance. That's a real bad note to open on, and Cat wouldn't even gain anything at all from it even if Cordelia caved (which she probably would) since as I hope I've made plain there is a zero percent chance Cordelia would actually try anything and Cat could exfiltrate easily even if she did so Catherine gains literally nothing as far as security goes.

f), Whereas if Cat agrees to hold the conference in Salia she can make a show out of "look how open I am to trusting my prospective allies, I'll stroll into your capital city for these talks like it ain't no thang" while not actually sacrificing or risking anything, as I have explained at length. Which is good diplomatic sense since it actually does strengthen her position; never underestimate the power of good optics in politics.

Okay, maybe "briefly" wasn't quite accurate. But seriously, Salia makes sense here.

sengachi and so the Tombmaker vowed to make a tomb for Death hail Rumena, the unbroken and unbowed

Walrus

The Accords need to specifically not be retroactive, that spells doom for everyone.
The next best thing would be pledging on one's Name to abide by the restrictions.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, and Yes. I'm fully on board with those amendments.

Liliet

Seriously, retroactive laws are bad practice period. This request is nonsense on many levels, but then, it's only the opening bid.

LaNuup

I wonder how long the Night will last before withering and puttering out like a fire without fuel. Night as it was explained is a blood sacrifice in which the drow slaughter each other for power. With Cat putting a stop to this, and her plans effectively forbidding the killing of drow by the hands of drow robs Night of its fuel. And I am sure that she intends to have her voting system spread to the main host of drow.
So Sve Noc and Cat have to think how counter this.

Soma

Literally what Cat sacrificed her apotheosis to subvert. Winter is what was eaten to get past the blood sacrifice.

Morgenstern

Winter was the fuel for the actual apotheosis. Which equals enough of a sacrifice to allow for that. They are now goddesses (if lesser ones) in their own right. No more power puttering out due to not meeting the quota, because quota HAS been met already. 😊

Sylwoos

This was the main issue with the old Night, and why Sve Noc wished to eat Winter so they could trick death in truth. Now a fragment of the garden fuel Night and the power won't fade until Sve Noc is unmade.

superkeaton

Arnaud's such a fucking odd duck, I feel like there's got to be something worse to him. Serial killing? Torture? Rape? There has to be something else to him beside just general sociopathy. It sets my teeth on edge wondering.

I cannot wait to see Cat haggle again.

Javvies

The only “specific” about Arnaud is from one of the Interludes whilst the Crusaders were on Callow.

Rozala thought to herself something to the effect of “she was no Lycaonese prude, but it’d be a good thing if somebody castrated Arnaud”. Think the wording was more “take a knife to his privates”.

The implications that I got leaned my suspicions towards Arnaud potentially either being a pedophile or some other kind of unpleasant and probably illegal in most places sexual deviancy, likely lacking a consensual partner.

Because considering the kind of cultural state and his position in it ... whatever Rozala thinks his sexual practices are, they have to be singularly outside acceptability.

Morgenstern

I can’t point to the exact paragraph, but as far as I remember, he was openly called a “rapist” in one of the interludes (by Rozala?), something about feeling VERY uncomfortable to have someone like that in their own lines, but needing him for his skill...

Although his acting capability calls into question if those were not just rumors, after all, that he had strewn around himself to support his false identity of Arnaud, the buffoon, with something more sinister under that facade – leading anyone looking deeper into that exact same thinking. That he was simply hiding a much worse character underneath the “buffoon face” – and not being the plenipotentiary envoy of the First Prince.

After that reveal, he might just be what Hakram is. Unsettlingly lacking emotions, but not, actually, such a bad person after all. Simply lacking those does not instantly make you act out on anything you can think of simply because of lack of conscience. People like that CAN still opt to follow societal rules / mores, e.g. NOT raping or killing people (unless it’s general doctrine during war times to do so then – even then they might not see the need; but if they saw it, they might well be capable of doing so without ANY remorse at all). They can still understand rationally. They simply lack “empathy” in the sense of “feeling with others” (not in the sense of being capable of understanding what’s going on on the other side, internally, in a logical way). The chilling thing to most people is simply the part of the lack of any conscience, because they COULD act without remorse. They don’t necessarily need to do so to put the chills into people, it’s the ... potential for such acts.

Morgenstern

The idea that anyone could understand, in fullness, what is going on inside your head and figurative 'heart', emotionally, all the implications of what action x might cause for you – and simply NOT CARE. That they are perfectly capable of, knowingly, putting all of that aside, if that outcome would fit something they want, if their logic tells them they'd get away with it without negative consequences that would impinge on them themselves. Because it simply would not matter to them – as they are, in a sense, "purely logical beasts", 'unencumbered' by any emotion (/emotional attachment; besides wanting, for others reasons, people directly around them to like them, because they will then be more inclined to treat them well or even better than just well). That anyone might be able to understand emotions and their consequences, logically, but not follow down that line, emotionally, by default. That they can CHOOSE to NOT follow down that line that seems to be instinctive for "normal" people.

(Which, btw, does not necessarily mean that they are intelligently logical in all points, they might very well make mistakes of logic, misjudge rules/people. It's all just about the empathy/conscience-part.

Also, people who ARE very emotional can still be sadists in the pathological sense and ENJOY pain and torture of others in emotional ways... or do worse things due to feeling a "need" for revenge. People like to shade this in pure, opposite colors. But that is not necessarily the reality, when it comes to "emotion" vs. "lack of emotion".

I applaud the author who is doing such a great job of showing those not-commonly-thought-of shades of reality that such a lack can lead to, in the examples of Black (Named, succeeding for the most part in suppressing all those emotions / not being refrained by them) and Hakram instead of just the usual crime series picture of socio-/psychopaths. Black, btw, would be more of a sociopath, where the lack of emotion has been learned, while Hakram would probably be the typical psychopath actually born with that lack.)

Morgenstern

I guess the difference between Arnaud and Hakram for the reader is, at this point, more or less that we already got the inside picture for Hakram and "saw" that he "only" lacked emotion, but was not a bad person for it. While we only get the outside picture of Arnaud, assumptions from other people, rumors, that bad feeling people get when the other person is lacking emotions.

A picture which we only got circumferentially for Hakram, via other characters' reactions and description of some parts of their emotional reaction to his ... emptiness / unreadability – while we get those directly from the first person view here for Arnaud, the reactions are those directly evoked in us as readers and reverberate more than they do with the example of Hakram, where we know much more than only the INdirect vibes we only get from outside characters reacting to him. We are simply lacking the inside view and thus the understanding of his character for Arnaud, while we think “we got him” for Hakram by the inside views we got. Also, bad rumors (the rapist stuff) about Arnaud, which might or might actually NOT be true, as we were never shown any direct scene and from the inside view, but only what another character thinks they saw / heard about Arnaud that seems to be true at that point, during the other character’s scene, but might only be “true” from the point of view of the other character at that point of time, due to lack of full information. It is possible to make the case that Arnaud might even have staged a scene, with an actually willing second actor, to make people think they “revealed” his “secret”, make people think a rape happened – while none actually did and he just hid his actual secret under that constructed, false “black spot”. Or might be entirely true. We’ll only know if we get an actual inside view from Arnaud (and then one which we can / think we can trust ^).

caoimhinh

To be fair, what we have seen of Hakram doesn’t exactly paint him as a sociopath, but rather as a nihilist. It wasn’t that he lacked the capability for emotions, just that he hadn’t found anything that gave him any thrill, that’s an important difference.

Of course, then he met Catherine and felt his blood burn.

Mental Mouse

Not even that... “coldblood” has to mean something different for orcs versus humans, because the story made it clear that Hakram’s difference is specifically that he lacks the “undercurrent of rage” which is normal for orcs.

Fayhem

This. This. This. And more this. HAKRAM IS NOT A SOCIOPATH, PEOPLE. Juniper mistakenly assessed him as such in the back-when because he didn’t have the burning rage/war-lust expected of an orc and as shown elsewhere Juniper is in her own Hellhound-y way something of a social conservative within orcish culture (see also when she judged Nauk for being openly emotional over his closest friend dying because “orcs don’t do that”, for example).

Notice how in this very chapter Cat called attention to how as Sovereign of Moonless Nights she could read people for emotion through listening to their blood and smelling the fear/whatever coming off them (creepy, but hey that’s Winter for you)? And so she could perceive the absence at the heart of Arnaud from that? Now everybody, please remember how SHE LITERALLY NEVER MADE ANY NOTE OF THAT KIND OF ABSENCE COMING FROM HAKRAM. And it’s not like she wasn’t in the best position possible to notice that.

tl;dr: Hakram isn’t a sociopath and I am legitimately nerd-mad that people keep saying he is. If anybody has follow-up questions/concerns rest assured I am more than happy to yell my opinions about this some more.

Andrew Mitchell

> If anybody has follow-up questions/concerns rest assured I am more than happy to yell my opinions about this some more.

Loving your passion!! 😊 😊 😊

Liliet

The problem with Arnaud is the sheer unlikelihood of there being fake knowledge about him being a rapist. If he decided it was necessary to add that to his buffoonery, the easiest way to do so is... =x =x =x

Shveiran

We remain in disagreement on this one... I don’t find it that unlikely that he decided he needed a dark secret for anyone investigating his facade to find and stop, convinced they had the measure of him, without revealing his true colors.

Complicated? Sure, but have you met the guy?

Still. It is just speculation, but to be honest the “psycopath is actually a rapist slash child molester” seems like too much of a cliché for the guide.

Liliet

My problem is that the easiest way to set that up is to actually rape people, making the disguise foolproof as it actually does refer to real events and I have not seen anything of him that would make me believe he wouldn't

Shveiran

The reason why I think he wouldn't is that it would be easier to do it that way, but not if he wanted it to be a dark SECRET; if it was something only people digging would find, as a "reward" that would make them stop, you could argue it is easier to make it up from scratch to control the flow of information better.

I'm not saying he didn't, and I'm definitely not saying he wouldn't, just that there is possible reasons to justify him going a different route that do not spawn from morality.

Liliet

do you think Rozala went digging? I get the impression it was very much an 'everyone knows' kind of thing

Javvies

I think it's more of an "everyone at a certain level knows".
Ie, it is relatively common knowledge amongst the nobles, and probably the top tiers of non-nobles who need to be aware of and informed about nobles.

It probably is not common knowledge in the "some random guy on the street knows", though the level of awareness/knowledge will likely be greater the closer one gets to Arnaud's home.

Liliet

Mm.

Liliet

I mean he has been said to be a rapist, yes.

Soma

I quite like what Cat is doing with the Drow. Lots of stories to be had now.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, lots of stories and lots of progress towards worthwhile goals too. Like a BILLION times better outcomes than what was going on before Cat ventured underground.

Fayhem

Yep! Plus what she's doing for Callow, plus she's about to save Procer's bacon, plus all the continent-wide benefits of the Liesse Accords... watching the Arch-Heretic of the East establish herself as the Savior of Calernia is satisfying as HECK.

Daniel E

So when the Drow are finally settled down and rebuilding, how long will it be until their vows amount to "In nine years time, I pledge to fix the broken water pipe on main street."?

Javvies

It'll probably be a while, if ever. That's a rather underwhelming sort of Oath and it's not going to be that difficult for an alternative candidate to come up with a more Worthy Oath that remains practical to accomplish.

I can't see the Drow considering "I'll fix this leaky pipe" a particularly Worthy or inspiring Oath.

In time, I could perhaps see Oaths oriented around developing major infrastructure projects, but such projects would have to be massive and inspiring. And they'd also have to have significant, clearly recognizable benefits, but not have been started by the previous Sigil holder.

...

So, actually ... I'm not sure they would ever get to that point. If there's an infrastructure project that can get you enough support to earn you a Sigil, it's something that the previous Sigil holder should have recognized as important enough to start working on.

Maybe if the Sigils eventually evolve, and there becomes one or more Sigils that specialize in the arts and sciences of building things. Then you could have competing visions about what to build.

Mental Mouse

They'd also need to have an actual city to work on before infrastructure oaths make sense.

mavant

No wonder Juniper's grumpy, with her girlfriend gone missing.

Shveiran

Completely unrelated to this chapter in particular, but still.

Last night I was Dming a D&D campaign for my friends, who ended up having to save a dragon to slay a princess. Don't ask.

The poor dragon was captured by a Fey Lord, and they decided to hit a library to research fey before hitting the nest. I was disinclined to just throw them a few boring vulnerabilities or combat tricks, so I added to that the first thing that came to mind and made canon a few ideas from PGtE: Fey come from a different plane, warping it with their presence, and are more story than matter. So you can beat them into submission, but crushing their bodies doesn't harm the core of them: the title survives, and comes back. So if they wanted to permanently kill them, they needed to use a story rather than a blade.

The bard was intrigued, so I threw her the basics of Story-Fu 101.

I thought "they'll toy with this for a half hour and if anything good comes out, they'll get an edge in the coming fight. Or viceversa."

Cut to three hours later.

The party has managed to form a Band of Five out of themselves plus an orphan storm sorcerer they recruited a while ago. Who the ranger mentored for completely selfish reasons.

They spent the travel there drawing the young boy attention to the way Fey warped the forests to make it closer to their home plane, then cast the Ranger into the Mentor role and drew on his connection to nature to craft the story they wanted. One heart to heart later, and the mentor has revealed the boy He Is The Chosen One, as his power overlap with those of the Fey Storm Lord of Eagles and he may or may not be actually his lost son, and that his Mentor Could Not Change The World But He Can Fix it, as There Is No One Else.

One Cutscene later, the party finds everything conspires to have the boy slay the Fey Lord BUT also for the Fey Lord to slay the Mentor (I mean really, guys, that one was on you). So the Bard fixes it by shaping things so that the Young Apprentice And His Mentor Must Do It Together, ensuring the Ranger lived to see the Apprentice deal the killing blow.

Now the preteen sorcerer left with tearful parting words with his mentor, with a call back to the Ranger father issues, and the declaration that he (the boy) could never ready the world to take the place of the Fey, and so it is the Ranger's calling to preach the word to bring mortals back into nature's fold.

Then he ascended in the storms and will declare war against all the Lords of the Fey on the mortal plane in the background of the party's adventure.

Thank you, PGtE, for showing me how to handle Fey Lords right.

Andrew Mitchell

OMG I want to be part of your campaign so, so much right now.

> Last night I was Dming a D&D campaign for my friends, who ended up having to save a dragon to slay a princess. Don't ask.

Firstly, I love the idea of reversing that trope. Secondly, I'm asking... Please tell us how that came about.

Shveiran

To be honest, I can't take too much credit for it. We are running a published module, and while I have edited both the setting and the plot, this particular set-up is from the original author.

Since it is a very good series, I'd rather try not to spoil too much in case someone else is running it too, but the gist of it is (SPOILER WARNING FOR WAY OF THE WICKED VOLUME 5) at a certain point in their "wicked adventures", the party of villains needs to lure a king into a trap. So their dark master decides the best bait is to endanger his daughter with a legendary threat, something the king (a big hero in his own right) won't be able to sit out.

The choice falls on an old dragon, but it being a proud and powerful being there is a need for a bribe of some sort; as it happens, the dragon's son bit off more than he could chew and ended up on the receiving end of a Fey Lord's wrath, so the party effectively needs to rescue a dragon to (convince his father to) slay a princess.

I really like these modules; they play with tropes and let you scratch that villanous itch without messing with what makes a normal game fun.

The only downside is, we play in a different edition so I have to adapt the ruleset entirely, but it is well worth the work.

Chapter 64: Breathe

"Fifty-three: a trusted companion who, after a string of personal disappointments, begins to dress in darker colours should no longer be considered a trusted companion."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

I didn't mind heading out to Salia for the talks, and there were so many of those to be had: the peace conference, Callow's petition to join the Grand Alliance and the Liesse Accords themselves. The treaties making up the Grand Alliance had first been signed in the Proceran capital, so the symbolism in Callow doing the same there would be powerful, and for the rest having the Highest Assembly at hand would save a great deal of time. Considering most armies in Iserre had fought months of strenuous skirmishes and battles, I foresaw the First Prince's invitation would be accepted. In truth, considering it was Arnaud Brogloise who'd approached me with the notion in private, odds were the Dominion had already agreed and Hasenbach was simply sounding me out to avoid public embarrassment if I refused. The First Prince was too clever not to know the moment she got everyone else to agree on Salia she'd effectively forced Kairos' hand, since him having a fit then would mark him the enemy of everyone invested in seeing peace secured. No, I understood why Cordelia Hasenbach's capital would be the seat of the talks and indeed preferred it that way for reasons of my own.

But we were haggling, so damned if I wouldn't get something in exchange.

The First Prince, through her envoy, had been pushing for the Army of Callow and the Exile Legions to make camp in northwest Brabant but we flatly refused. Reports from the Jacks made it clear that the principality of Brabant was overwhelmed by refugees from the lakeside holdings to the north, and that the front against the Dead King in Hainaut had been on the edge of collapse for some time. If we raised winter quarter there my armies were the second line of defence whether they liked it or not and we'd be surrounded by hungry, desperate people. We pushed for northern Arans instead, which was more than reasonable in my opinion: it put my soldiers close enough to the northern passage they could be supplied by Callow through it while propping up the right flank of the Hainaut front. Where it got messy was my insistence that the armies be allowed to raise their camps close to a city and my soldiers be granted access to said city while on leave. Brogloise had not been particularly inclined to grant me adjacency to anything but the dead until I started hinting Salia might be a little too far for my tastes. That had the tune changing pitch, as I'd thought it might.

He still demurred from outright agreeing until Prince Ariel of Arans was consulted over the matter, though I threw in agreement to the four thousand escort and four hundred retinue in Salia to make sure it'd be worth the candle to Cordelia. I made it plain that the drow were not my slaves or minions but allies from another nation, the Empire Ever Dark, and that the Firstborn required an emissary when time came to discuss both peace and the Accords.

"You want the Highest Assembly to recognize the legitimacy of this Empire Ever Dark," Brogloise mildly said.

"If you'd prefer," I said, "the princes and princesses could come explain to the sigil-holders why without a vote being held in Salia they can't belong to a real nation."

"It'd be extending diplomatic recognition to, well," and there the envoy looked faintly embarrassed, "the grisly minions of some wicked foreign deity."

"I'm not asking you to trade embassies," I patiently said. "I'm asking you to recognize that fifty thousand warriors would get the Firstborn a seat at the table even if they required newborn babies as refreshments. How many more enemies can Procer afford to make right now, Brogloise?"

There was more nuance to the situation that I would have liked, as it happened. As a rule, the Principate didn't usually consider itself bound by treaties to entities beholden to the Hellgods. Whoever held the Tower was usually Arch-heretic of the East, which meant no agreements with them need be upheld, and neither the Kingdom of the Dead nor the Chain of Hunger offered treaties. Agreements in the Free Cities were subject to the authority of the League itself, which meant none of those cities sworn to Below were usually a direct interlocutor to the Principate save in secret pacts not admitted to. In short, there was very little precedent for Procer making any sort of treaty with a state that worshipped the Gods Below and considering it worth more than what the ink and parchment had cost. Largely, I could admit in the privacy of my own thoughts, because very few of those states ever put much stock in keeping to their word. On the other hand, as of now I was still Queen of Callow and if the Principate was incapable of negotiating with me – still a villain, regardless of the waning of my Name – then this would all head downhill rather fast. The former Prince of Cantal retreated somewhat gracefully at that, noting that even if official recognition could not be guaranteed then at least a legal equivalent could be.

It'd do. I would not expect miracles, even when the Principate was so deeply in trouble. It had been the preeminent power of Calernia, on the surface at least, for too long. The arrogance had been bred into its rulers by generations of genuinely being some of the wealthiest and most influential individuals on the continent. I'd not coddle the highborn, when the time came, but neither would I get out of my way to step on their toes. My deep personal dislike for most royalty of the west was no reason to get in my own way when it came to greater purposes. We discussed a few other details of logistics, namely where the escort of four thousand would be offered amenities – as it turned out, from towns less than a day's march from Salia itself – and the practicalities of bringing an armed retinue into the capital. I had no intention of turning over any of my people who were alleged to break laws to Procer for trial, but I indicated I was willing to hold them to that standard while they stayed in Salia so long as it broke no laws of Callow or regulations of its army. I gave an inch on my insistence that any such lawbreaking would be dealt with by Callowan trials, allowing for an observer appointed by the First Prince to sit in on the proceedings should it come to that.

We ended the talks soon after that, since Hasenbach now needed to herd her royal cats before she could agree to what I'd required. Vivienne and Hakram both stayed with me after the man left, the three of us seated in a silence that was rather contemplative. The former thief had kept notes herself throughout most of the talks, though mostly on the exact language of what had been agreed between Brogloise and myself. It'd been a surprisingly large amount, though less than one might expect from literal hours of talking. Still, I could not help but notice that a great deal of the tediousness I associated with diplomacy vanished when I ended up in an arguable position of strength. Fancy that, I sardonically thought. I shook away the cynical amusement. Pleasant as indulging it could be, I had no time to waste on indulgence at the moment.

"You saw something, didn't you?" I asked Hakram instead.

"Not in him, but in what he spoke," Adjutant agreed. "It is a question of logistics, Catherine. Hasenbach cannot agree to signing the Accords without having first consulted the Highest Assembly, yes?"

I cocked my head to the side, not bothering to assent to something both knew to be true.

"Arnaud Brogloise has had the written text of them since the night of the battle," Hakram continued. "Which means that, up to this meeting being held, Hasenbach and the Highest Assembly had a day and a half to both read the papers, debate their content and hold a vote – the offer made, of the Carrion Lord turned over in exchange for a signature? It was lawfully binding, coming from an envoy with the man's invested powers."

"Which is doable," I pointed out. "They could call session at night, if necessary. They don't necessarily need to read the whole thing themselves, either, they can have scholars they trust sum up the contents."

"Not if the Assembly also has to wrangle together succession for seven principalities too," Vivienne quietly said. "Even in times of war they have conventions, Cat. And they'd have to arrange it all over scrying, too, which is faster than messengers but still a devil's delay."

I drummed my fingers against the table as I began thinking back on all that'd been said. They were right, these two. And more than they knew, considering all the different things Brogloise had agreed on in the First Prince's name."

"They'd need to vote over hosting all this in Salia," I said. "Over the amount of soldiers allowed in the capital. Shit, that should have been a tip off shouldn't it? That this is diplomacy and we still got so much done."

"Bad faith negotiations?" Vivienne suggested. "Hasenbach could be making promises without having held vote over them yet, banking on confirmation afterwards."

"That's too sloppy for who we're dealing with," I grunted. "Setting aside anyone wanting her deposed would be handed a pretext if she did it, she'd be playing with fire when it comes to us – and she won't risk that when Procer's out in the wilds with the wolves prowling."

"Then there remains one plausible alternative," Hakram said. "Which is that Hasenbach has held those votes and rammed them through the Highest Assembly by virtue of having the votes to pass essentially anything she'd like without debate."

"That can't be the case if the royals who abdicated here got their pick of successor on their throne," I flatly said. "There wasn't a lot of loyalty to Cordelia Hasenbach in that crowd even before the campaign cost them their crown."

I grimaced. That meant seven empty seats in a voting assembly of twenty-three, which was a significant chunk, and considering the main opposition to the First Prince had coalesced around Princess Rozala, who was here in Iserre there'd be no one with the influence to seriously get in her way. No, by simple arithmetic I could see Hasenbach having finagled what was essentially run of the place. Between the Lycaonese, the lakeside principalities and those in the south that were quaking in their boots at the thought of the League coming in to stay? On one hand, this meant I could actually make bargains with the First Prince and expect to see them bear fruit. On the other hand, this whole situation had the potential of turning into a nasty brew if accusations of tyranny were thrown around and enough people listened.

"Nothing we can do about that from here," Vivienne pragmatically said. "And I've just begun to restore contact with the Jacks in broader Procer, so it'll be some time before we can hear of what's happening in Salia."

I leaned back into my seat, closing my eyes to think. I tended to think of Hasenbach as a largely reasonable woman, when it came down to it. Arrogant and high-handed, yes, but not bloodthirsty or blind in her principles. She'd despised me and all I stood for but never closed the door to negotiation because to her diplomacy was a preferable path to war if it could lead to the same ends. I couldn't say I liked the woman, but I held to a degree of professional respect towards her. She had, after all, held her own against Black and Malicia for years and come out ahead as often as not. So when I'd heard that she was dredging something out of Lake Artoise through Kairos I'd suspected it wouldn't be pretty, but also been inclined to take it as a precaution on her part. A weapon to unleash if all else fail, not a stick she'd begin waving as a club near everyone else to get her way. I'd been reasonably certain, deep down, that she wouldn't ever use what it was she was having dredged. Now, though? They were all justifiable, practical steps she was taking. I knew that. But there was a word for people who did things like seizing control of the Highest Assembly and digging up ancient weapons, and it wasn't heroine.

"Vivienne," I said, opening my eyes. "Lean on the Jacks, I don't care how many you end up burning. The situation in Salia is no longer the highest priority."

"The dredging," Hakram gravelled, studying me closely.

"Find out what Hasenbach is fishing out of the lake, Lady Dartwick," I said. "And find out quickly."

The woman who was likely to be my successor nodded decisively, and we left it at that.

—

If there was anyone who still kept to the ancient faith that'd had had the stones on the barrow-top raised, they'd be within their rights to call this desecration. My affairs had been removed from the heart of the Mavian prayer, brought back to my tent, but given that this would be the first fireside night we held in more than a year I'd charged Adjutant with... furnishing it properly. Which was why where some olden thinning boundaries had once been arranged, now a deep and broad fire pit had been dug by legionaries with shovels. Benches were brought up, the roughly-hewn kind that regulations frowned upon but appeared just as inevitably as washerwomen — both the kind that actually washed clothes and the one that did, as well as those impressively enterprising souls that did both — and peddlers when an army stayed in the same place for a time. The only reason the benches were discouraged were because they were a waste of wood and often got in the way of the swift deployment that Legion camps were meant to enable, though so long as legionaries left them behind most officers let the matter lie. They made for a comfortable enough arrangement around the fire, and with a handful of seats they made up the heart of the arrangement.

The drinks were as broad in arraignment, Adjutant having gotten his hand on a barrel of Laure ale as well as what I suspected to be a wide array of confiscated liquors. In an exercise of nostalgia for our College days we'd killed two pigs and put them to roast on spikes, before prudently arranging skewers of horse as well given the number of greenskins among us. For those of us with 'cow teeth' there'd be a massive communal plate of biryani as well, out here in Procer the cumin and pepper that went with the rice almost more expensive a luxury than the rest of the meal put together. I claimed my seat there not long before night fell, abusing my queenly prerogatives to get a decent bottle of wine while I read through the last of the reports Juniper had sent me. There was speculation among our general staff that the League's armies were less than a month away from running out of food, which would be rather interesting if it were true. Already preparations for the likely march on Arans were beginning, too, though Tariq and I would have to see to the practicalities of that. A Named or two might be able to slip in and out of Twilight on their own – especially here in Iserre, where it would be so thinly parted from Creation – but not an army. That would require a gate, and a great deal of power.

I handed back the reports to the officer who'd brought them to me in the first place just before the first two of my little band of miscreants strolled in. The first I'd seen not too long ago in this very place, though Robber had apparently since led his cohort in a reckless ambush on Levantine mages he'd somehow lived through without taking a wound. The other, though, it'd been quite a while. Senior Sapper Pickler had never been what you'd call a sociable woman even at her most convivial, and between her suddenly expanded budget in building engines and my ever-broadening duties it'd been ages since we saw each other outside our work. She had, like Robber, visibly aged – her leathery skin was more deeply creased, her angular face grown gaunter. She'd gotten bigger, too, larger in height and frame than most goblins. It was said that Matron lines – and as a Matron's daughter, Pickler was of a purer strain of that than most could claim – grew larger and lived longer than most of their kind, though the rumours of sharper intellect as well I'd never put much stock in. It was easy to claim superior wits when the opposition was kept ignorant on purpose.

"Your Majesty," Pickler greeted me.

To my surprise, without a hint of irony. I glanced at Robber with a cocked eyebrow.

"It is your title," he defended.

"She's never that deferential," I flatly said. "None of you are ever that deferential."

The sapper was, I noticed only then, carrying a handful of scrolls.

"Pickler," I said, reluctantly amused, "are you trying to sweeten me up before asking funding for your latest project?"

A heartbeat passed.

"No," she tried.

"What's in the scrolls, Pickler?" I nonchalantly asked.

"... recipes," she slowly said. "For cooking. Which is a pastime I took up since we last spoke."

"I thought cooking was a strictly male thing for goblins," I said, eyeing Robber.

"No Matron would ever eat anything another female had a hand in making," he agreed.

"I began out of my deep respect for human culture," Pickler said. "Which I never mentioned until now because..."

Out of genuine curiosity I let her try to think her way out of this one without interruption.

"... because I believed it so obvious it did not bear mentioning," she triumphantly finished.

Her professed respect was slightly undermined by the way she'd said human culture instead of, you know, mentioning an actual culture. Still, I knew how to bring this to a solid finish,

"That's a shame," I mused, "I mean, I need to blow all that dwarven gold on something and you know how I love a good siege engine. I sure wish someone had schematics to show me."

Robber discretely shook his head, the filthy traitor, but she wasn't paying attention.

"I also have schematics, Your Majesty," the Senior Sapper immediately said, voice almost visibly brightening. "For unrelated reasons."

"So close," Robber moaned. "So close, Pickler."

I glanced at the cup in my hand, finding it mostly empty, then shrugged.

"What the Hells," I said. "Drag a seat here and show me what you've got. So long as Robber keeps pouring me wine, anyway."

By the time the others began drifting in we were half an entire bottle in – I'd ordered our mutinous manservant to begin cupbearer duties for her as well – and loudly arguing about the practicality of even greatly ameliorated scorpions against undead.

"It's not like I don't think siege has a role to play," I said. "But bolts aren't going to win us an engagement, Pickler. Massed catapults. That's our force multiplier."

"Why don't we just pick up stones and throw them at Keter, while we're at it," she hissed back. "Or better yet, import a dwarven pebble and toss that. Shame on your line, Foundling."

"And you were so sweet to me earlier," I mourned.

"Oh, a human put on a crown and started ruling other humans," she scathingly said. "How unprecedented. You still can't do abstract mathematics properly, I bet."

"I've had other things on my plate," I replied, perhaps a tad defensively.

"What's this about shaming Catherine?" a voice cheerfully called out. "I can't believe you'd leave me out of that."

The rest of the lot had come as a wave, it seemed. Archer, who'd just cheerfully thrown her hat into the ring, and with her Hakram and Masego. At a glance, Juniper and Aisha was further down the slope and climbing up while talking animatedly. Everyone, then. I leaned back into my seat.

"Don't mouth off, wench," I replied to Indrani. "I bet you can't do abstract mathematics decently either."

"Funny you would say that," Archer said, and grinned like I'd just made a mistake.

Godsdamnit, I thought, and prepared to take my lumps.

erraticerrata

First update of the month, so extra chapter in the eponymous tab. Final part of the Amadeus POVs, titled Seed II.

Aston

Robber is Named right?

Dainpdf

Not so far as we know.

stevenneiman

Officially, there are no goblin Named. Robber having a secret Name is pretty common fan speculation though.

I have to say, Pickler's attempt to lie was utterly hilarious. Not as good Catherine's planned attack across the Tyrian sea, but close.

Liliet

I love the finishing blow.

FOR UNRELATED REASONS

Rup

.don't forget the burn 🤔

... a human put on a crown and started ruling other humans, how unprecedented. You still can't do abstract mathematics ...

Liliet

Some people specialize in abstract mathematics, some people specialize in diplomacy...

cowlute

Some people specialize in lakeomancy...

danh3107

Just because she's a Lush doesn't mean Archer can't do calculus, that's a mistake Cat.

Liliet

The sheer 'but why' is beaten only by understanding that this woman is the third biggest nerd in the Woe, and that's only because the top two are greatest magical theorists of their generation

Axel Rafael

Whaaaaat! What chapter is that from?!

How could ignore such a detail?? Indrani being the third biggest nerd of the group changes how I see her and her actions in a huge way 🤔

Liliet

I mean the word 'nerd' has not been brought up a lot but here are the facts about Indrani:

- she was originally sent to aid the group as an expert on the fae from Refuge;
- she quotes classic poetry in multiple languages for fun;
- she keeps up with Masego's discussions of magic theory – and we're talking about a person who drifts off mid-logistical meeting here;
- she is sharp as fuck interpersonally when she cares to be, and she's kept up with close circle political discussions too – it's in the wider staff meetings that she zones out (ADHD most def);
- she is good at abstract math (c) this chapter.

Indrani is Like That

Axel Rafael

Oh yeah! Those three first facts I hardly remembered, but it's true. She's super Smart, but only when she's interested (so, yes, I agree on the ADHD), and She keeps up with the group, never really feeling confused or lost amidst all types of conversations.

That just makes even hotter and more awesome 🤩

Actually, the fact that Erraticetra can make her a "real person" with flaws, despite the rest, might be even more amazing 🤔

Liliet

Admittedly she does compete for the title of third biggest with Hakram 'invented game theory' 'cannot stop asking questions about the drow culture' 'came the closest to guessing Sephirah's story right' 'humongous nerd overall'. The Woe is a fantastic gathering of nerds.

OH and btw Indrani destroys Hakram in chess.

Axel Rafael

How do you keep track of ALL these little details xD
You're kinda amazing yourself.

But yeah, they're all huge nerds... With the exception of Cat?

I think if she's a nerd, then she's a story nerd/geek.

Liliet

She's a HUMONGOUS nerd. She has nitpicked pedantic details before Masego was on the team to do it for her.

She has a LECTURE prepared on objective benefits of banter. She had her own personally developed opinions on long-term economic effects of her city's tax policy AT FUCKING FIFTEEN.

And don't even start me on the saga of Catherine Foundling vs magic theory...

Axel Rafael

Saga?

Are you talking about the One that really picks up with lakeomancy and reaches its peak with Night Miracles? xD

But wow, seeing things from that point of view, she's a super nerd 😊

I guess I didn't really see them as nerd qualities because a lot of them just come so naturally to me.

I guess that makes Black a huge (boss level) nerd that really knows how to pick them 😊

Liliet

I'm talking about the one that starts with her asking Killian all the unfamiliar terms she's heard Masego use until she can actually parse what he's saying, and demanding that he rephrase his explanations until she understands. The one that continues with her listening to him rambling about things she has 0 background in until she gets enough of said background to know how to lead him by the nose in his dreamscape. The one that peaks with her fucking LEARNING MAGICAL THEORY CALCULUS under Akua at the start of this book on the off chance that it helps her figure out Dead King's shit.

That saga.

>But wow, seeing things from that point of view, she's a super nerd

Yep.

>I guess that makes Black a huge (boss level) nerd that really knows how to pick them 😊

It does.

Black, facing the charge of a much larger army on his fortified position: "We, my friend, are witnessing the birth of the Proceran mixed arms doctrine"

Black, coming to his senses tied up next to his worst enemy: "Oh hey I've wanted to check out these barrows but never got around to it, NEAT"

Amadeus is I N C R E D I B L E

Mondkind Von Flauschen

I mean, shooting a Longbow basically as tall as you is pure calculus, and Ranger likes her Students prepared

Someguy

"Don't mouth off, wench," I replied to Indrani. "I bet you can't do abstract mathematics decently either."

Mistake.

V Kyrius

I mean its quite clear that Archer is smart she can talk magic with Masego. Archer has pretty absurd stats in a more rpg view.

Cordelia slide to the Dark Side? Granted seem tricky for her with her lack of control over Heroes. Though funny enough the Llesse Accords made sure that up for her.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Archer is designed to be op and vulnerable at the same time.

Javvies

Yeah ... whatever Cordelia's having dredged from that lake is going to be super important in all the wrong ways.

Cordelia's dabbling in tyranny might ruin the Grand Alliance in the long run. Depending on just what she does and how it turns out.

The League's army might be running low on food. I can believe that – no way that they could get a large logistical trail with them or have sustained support through the Waning Woods.

Argh. Are we going to skip ahead to after the fireside hangout or actually see it?

talenel

It would be very ironic if for all Saint's worrying about Cat, the real villainous threat was the one she thought was good. In fact, I think you could even argue that Saint literally caused this. Cordelia is convinced that the heroes want Procer to fail as a nation and she rejects that entirely. So she feels driven to do whatever she must for the sake of her nation, including possibly leaning toward more villainous inclinations.

Dainpdf

Saint was pretty clear on the “the Principate is corrupt and needs to burn” point. I am pretty sure she did not trust Cordelia at all.

Javvies

I think Saint thought Cordelia was the “right now” of Procer and the next First Prince would return to Proceran norms. Much like when Bard told William that Black and Malicia were Praes right now, and their successors would return to the atrocities and madness of classical Evil.

Cordelia, after all, is Lycaonese – and therefore extremely atypical as Procerans, especially Proceran nobles, and even more especially ruling Princes and the First Prince.

Dainpdf

Cordelia is also atypical of Lycaonese, being adept at games of Court. Saint would have seen the fact that Cordelia kept having talks with Cat as a sign of corruption. She even got the whole Arch Heretic thing done precisely to force her hand.

Javvies

Saint didn’t have (or shouldn’t have) any knowledge that Cat and Cordelia had any sort of communication, far less a direct line between the two.

Remember, Thief snuck in and personally delivered the beacon or whatever it was that allowed Cat to bring Cordelia into a Domain. And before doing that, I’m certain Cat would have worked with Masego to make sure it wasn’t detectable.

Admittedly, Cordelia’s proficiency at Proceran politics is atypical for a Lycaonese.

My point is, I don’t think Saint decided to go with the “burn down Procer (and as much of everything else as possible) and start over” plan because of Cordelia. I think it was despite Cordelia (at the time), because Saint didn’t think Cordelia was going to make long term changes stick in Procer. Nowadays, sure, Cordelia’s actions would probably be pushing Saint’s buttons.

Mental Mouse

Also, Saint was clearly being manipulated by the Wandering Bard.

Liliet

Judging by how Laurence talked to Cordelia, she did consider Cordelia to be a good egg.

shieldredblog

For all that the Lyconese hold the line against evil, we learned from the Arcadian echo that they were founded by an Evil Witch Queen.

talenel

The irony isn't really what Cordelia is doing because it fits with what we see and know about her. Rather, the irony is that Saint is so myopic to what and who people really are and how the world works.

Soronel Haetir

I would have described Robber as 'murderous' rather than 'mutanous'.

Andrew Mitchell

Both are somewhat appropriate. The important thing is that he's Catherine's murderous & mutinous lieutenant. 😊

He was raised right

And in that most beautiful way, he's the least traitorous of them all ♥

Dainpdf

Poor Cat. X's gonna give it to ya. It will deliver to ya.

Agent J

I have no idea what the context here is, but I'm obligated to hit like on that bar. So take it, monster.

Dainpdf

X as in the unknown variable. Because Cat can't math.

caoimhinh

"Don't mouth off, wench," I replied to Indrani. "I bet you can't make online votes decently either."

"Funny you would say that," Archer said, and grinned like I'd just made a mistake.

" <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> " she said.

Godsdamn it, I thought, and prepared to take my votes.

caoimhinh

Well, this was a pretty nice chapter.

Today is my birthday (it's still Agust 1st here in Colombia) and the chapter opened by addressing some of my concerns that I had presented in previous chapters about Cat's eagerness for going to Salia for the many talks that need to happen.

And we got an Extra Chapter because it's the beginning of the month.

P.S: next chapter, the talk around the fire, it's gonna be awesome. I wonder if Amadeus and Tariq will join their talk later on.

Also, where's Kilian? Why isn't Cat counting her as those invited for the talk? Last we knew of her, Kilian was still alive and among the top mages in the Army of Callow (if not the very top, directly under Masego). I would have expected Cat to call for her too if she called for Pickler. Having her disappear from the story simply because she is no longer Cat's lover seems like a waste.

Liliet

Agreed =x

Hellspirit

I'd say that's precisely the point of it. In this story her role was Love Interest, and that was Cat's only connection to her. With that severed, she's no longer of importance to the story. (not that she doesn't matter, in universe, but in what we're reading).

Liliet

She is also Rat Company tho.

It's possible she basically dropped out of that because of having knowingly violated Cat's morals – the human sacrifice for power thing – like just severed the ties because of knowing she did a bad.

But by default, she should be there.

Agent J

I just want some bloody confirmation on whether she went through with it or not. Is that too much to ask? Damn.

Andrew Mitchell

Me too.

caoimhinh

Nevertheless, she is still Cat's friend. And also one of the seniormost mages in her army, Kilian has been mentioned off-hand like twice since their break-up, and was always doing important things.

It's odd then, that she hasn't been present in the councils, reunions or delivering informs to Catherine, Hakram or Vivienne we have seen so far. For a time I thought it was Cat that was avoiding her or something. Now even Prickler is sitting there around the fire, Kilian should be there too.

Liliet

I think it's possible that Killian is avoiding Cat =x

Mental Mouse

Is Killian actually present in Isurre?

Andrew Mitchell

Good question. There's been no mention either way ASFAIK. There's arguments that she should be here given Callow's armies are here but, on the other hand, there's need for strength at home too given the Praes situation.

Liliet

She has been mentioned by Robber when relating the Iserre situation to Catherine. She is confirmed to be here.

Fayhem

Agreed on both points – EE did a good job on addressing Salia being the seat, and brought in some aspects I hadn't considered myself. And I am going to be a touch cross if this whole fireside reunion goes by with no Killian.

Liliet

...shit. The epigraph refers to Cordelia.

N00000000000000000000000000000000)=

Faiir

This is so obvious now that you pointed it out!

Liliet

)=)=)=

BARD YOU FUCK

Andrew Mitchell

Well said.

Does that mean you're now on team "Bard must die"? 😊

Liliet

...no)=

Andrew Mitchell

I think you know that my view is that the Bard is here to keep the game going without another agenda. I can't recall the % I put on this previously but this new evidence increased my certainty by a couple of percentage points. How did you weigh this new evidence?

Liliet

It's not new evidence, not really. It's a different glance at the old set.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a good point. Perhaps I misspoke when I said "new evidence". On reflection, I used it as shorthand for "additional support the likelihood of bad consequences from Bard's actions". This is somewhat similar to your "different glance" view, but my end result was a slight change in the assessed probabilities. Let me explain my reasoning process more fully.

We've previously seen the Bard influence Saint to push Cordelia into believing much more strongly that Procer will cease existing. And that Cordelia then presses the trigger on whatever it is that she's had dredged out of the lake.

We've now got further support in this chapter (the epigraph, and Catherine's worry that Cordelia's turning bad) that increases the likelihood that what Cordelia is doing is going to have bad results. And that leads me to the conclusion that the Bard is slightly more likely to the conclusion that the Bard is trying to keep the game going and not to help the side of progress (i.e., Cat).

Liliet

True, there's a bit more lean on bad possibilities, but compared to Bard deliberately enabling Second Liesse, this doesn't actually change much. We'll have to see how it actually plays out, and I'd say Catherine is very much in position to ameliorate a lot of damage there. In position, incidentally, after the clusterfuck that Third Liesse turned into thanks to the intervention of our favorite..

The anticipation of the bad has increased, but I wouldn't say this impacts my evaluation of Bard specifically -_-

SpeckofStardust

I mean Cordelia has also just had a string of victories, the North holds and the south is now under control. Further more the grand assembly is now her bitch. Also she and cat arnt friends so she cant not be not friends anymore.

caoimhinh

Ehm, Cordelia hasn't won anything, that was Catherine. The North holds because Cat bought 3 months of peace, and the South's situation has stabilized because Cat beat them all into behaving.

Sure, this situation benefits Cordelia and she will take advantage of it, but these were not victories of her.

SpeckofStardust

But hardly anything has been a personal setback.

Andrew Mitchell

You called it. It's going to take a while to play out but I'd put 95% on you being right.

Now, where is Arnaud going to stand when Cordelia turns bad? Is he totally loyal to Cordelia or is he loyal to Procer or ...???

And I can see this being Rozala's chance to rise to First Prince after Cordelia's fall.

Faiir

I'd say loyal to Proceed based on his behavior.
I'm voting for Rozala in next Proceran election 😊

Liliet

I HOPE SHE ENDS UP FINE ANYWAY

Andrew Mitchell

Me too, I quite like and admire her.

NerfGlastigUaine

I'm back y'all!

So while I was gone, Callow got into the Alliance, Levant is finally getting its shit together, Catherine still can't keep it in her pants even when she's exhausted and the person in question likely wants to run her through, Hasenbach may be spiraling off the slippery slope, Black is back but not in Black, Masego is officially magic-less but not powerless and gained a few levels in quips and intimidation, and the Liesse Accords are even bigger than I imagined and possibly the biggest Wham Episode thus far. I mean, that's not just changing the story, it's setting the story on fire, writing a new one while changing the genre, and giving a giant middle finger to the original authors. Break the Game of Gods indeed.

Does anyone else think Catherine is going to die at the end of this story? I mean, Well-Intentioned Extremist Anti-Villain who breaks the world order and kills the Big Bad villain god isn't a story you typically walk away from. Or ride into the sunset away from. Either she dies or something twisted happens to her, b/c I don't see this story ending in happily ever after.

Liliet

>I mean, that's not just changing the story, it's setting the story on fire, writing a new one while changing the genre, and giving a giant middle finger to the original authors.

BEST APPROACH TBH

...god guide is a hymn to fanfic writing isn't it

>Does anyone else think Catherine is going to die at the end of this story? I mean, Well-Intentioned Extremist Anti-Villain who breaks the world order and kills the Big Bad villain god isn't a story you typically walk away from. Or ride into the sunset away from. Either she dies or something twisted happens to her, b/c I don't see this story ending in happily ever after.

I'm giving it a 50/50 between dies and FUCK YOU WE GET A HAPPY EVER AFTER AFTER ALL

I'm not seeing 'something twisted' bc that would really spoil the tone imho but bittersweet vs no actually nobody DID need to die is a real choice bittersweet would be more traditional, while 'fuck you nobody needs to die here' is a recurring theme in guide and... huh, actually i give that option more than 50/50 in an unexpected twist (because yes absolutely thats where the story is headed straight on, Cat has acknowledged that in her inner monologue too) Catherine actually survives and is fine. The audience GASPS

Mental Mouse

Given that she's died and come back three times so far, Cat's choice at this point is probably between "redemption by permanent death", or "immortal villain". And she's already shown hints of the latter.

Liliet

I'm thinking more like 'everyone else pitches in and averts the heroic sacrifice trope altogether where it seems like it's the only option, because Catherine really has earned enough goodwill for that'.

Mental Mouse

As ye sow, so shall ye reap?

Liliet

That exactly ^^

Faiir

GASP!

caoimhinh

GASPS

NZPIEFACE

Yeah. I've been pretty sure that she dies at the end of this story.

Maybe I'm thinking too much of Code Geass.

Alegio

I really needed some goblins in this story, everything is getting so damn serious that a little bit of goblin shenanigans feels like fresh air.

Naeddyr

Five imaginary dollars says Cordy is definitely not the first secretly villainous First Prince of Procer, and that this is a kind of open secret among the princes.

Where would the Name have come from?

Andrew Mitchell

Which Name are you talking about? First Prince is a title, equivalent to the British Prime Minister.

Raiseth

Lol, Cat.

She's an Archer.
A very good archer, too.

Of course she knows a thing about ballistics. Or several hundred things, as it were.

Al

I think Rozala's going to pick up her oathsword against our First Prince before the series is done

Liliet

Nah, IMHO that's a package sent into far future.

Joan

Archer is a sniper. The long-range kills she pulls off routinely would definitely require mathematics.

Chapter 65: Convivial

"Note: while the assertion that one's friends 'are an anchor' held up to examination, said individuals (either dead or alive) seem no more effective in that purpose than a stone anchor of the same weight. The popularity of the saying remains baffling."

– Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II

With seven expectant gazes remaining peeled on me, I was starting to feel a mite cornered. Just a mite, mind you. I'd gotten out of tighter corners than this through cunning use of diplomacy.

"I was," I began, "perhaps less than correct."

Without missing a beat the crowd began to boo me, and that vicious little wretch Robber even threw something at me over the fire. I didn't quite manage to catch it but it slid into a fold of my cloak and I picked it up there. I blinked, finding a rather fancy glass eye looking back at me. Where had he even – no, I didn't want to know. It had to be someone of stature, though, part of it was painted but there was also coloured glass and that'd expensive as all... No, if I asked then he won. I'd get Hakram to find out later. Still, I pocketed the eye without any qualms. He could make a tidy little sum from selling that, if he got around to it, so we'd just call this a... pre-emptive fine. Hells, maybe I could get General Abigail to believe I'd had one of those on the whole time.

"Do the apology, at least," Aisha called out, too well-bred to grin but with suspiciously twitching lips.

I sighed.

"Archer," I began, ignoring Indrani's enthusiastic affirmation of 'that's me, you know', "you peerless beauty whose approval I secretly crave, and that's why I'm so mean to you-"

"That sounds about right," Hakram gravely agreed.

The filthy traitor. I was surrounded by treachery of the worst tonight.

"- I retract any implication that you are incapable of abstract mathematics," I valiantly soldiered on. "There. Finished."

There was a heartbeat of silence. Masego, swaddled in a rather unnecessary amount of blankets, leaned towards Adjutant.

"Is it on purpose that she did not apologize at any point in that sentence?" Zeze asked.

Godsdamnit, now even Masego was getting in on it. The little shit absolutely did know that I'd done it on purpose, I pulled this on him all the – ah, and suddenly his sordid betrayal made a little more sense.

“Ask to be made a countess,” Juniper suggested to Indrani. “Even odds she’d take that over actually saying the word ‘apologize’.”

That was a lie. I wouldn’t go any further up the ladder than baroness to get out of this. Honorary, mind you, not landed. I shuddered to think of what Archer might get up to with regular tax revenue.

“I apologize all the time,” I protested.

I got a few skeptical looks in return.

“Here’s one for the road, then,” I sneered. “I’m sorry you’re all so thin-skinned you need apologies in the first place.”

Alas, the resuming of the loud booing was the herald of diplomacy’s failure. Sometimes, I sadly reflected, the other side simply wasn’t willing to take the very generous and reasonable terms you offered them. That was not on you, it was on them, I reminded myself. Robber once more tossed something at me, though this time I caught it – it was, to my surprise, another glass eye. Just as prettily made, although the heft was lighter and oh Night the iris was brown on this one instead of blue. And angled in the opposite direction, implying my Special Tribune might have murdered not one but two foreign highborn officers just so he could use their glass eye as toy. For once the actual specifics of something he’d done had managed to surprise me, though the spirit of the affair I was painfully familiar with. I pocketed it too, because the little bastard would have hit me with it on the chin if I hadn’t caught it. It was decided by a tribunal of the people that I would have last pick of a cut from the pig that was nearly done roasting, my threats to have them all tried for treason leaving the unruly mob indifferent. Truly, they had gone mad with power.

Juniper insisted on making the cuts herself when she judged the meat properly roasted, ignoring Indrani’s protests that it should have another quarter hour of being turned with spices sprinkled on the searing fat. I sided with the Hellhound, half out of spite for Indrani knowing all about Stygian abstracts when she’d been raised in the middle of the damned woods and half because I rather did miss the taste of a pig roasted in the College way: mostly unseasoned, and still juicy the way orcs preferred meat to be if it couldn’t be bleeding outright. Adjutant squatted by the fire with plates while Robber was charged with bringing the communal plate of biryani. Aisha was, to my mild amusement, the first to receive a plate and by sheer coincidence got some of the choicest cuts. Masego requested belly meat and the Marshal of Callow allowed him a fat slice, which Robber claimed to be blatant favoritism, and as bickering exploded I reached for my pipe with a smothered smile. Indrani sidled up to me casually, leaning on my shoulder like a pest as I stuffed and lit a packet of wakeleaf.

"We're missing some people," Archer said.

Her tone wasn't quiet, not exactly, but it was pitched not to carry.

"Vivienne will come when she's done with the Jacks," I said. "Whenever that happens to be."

"Not who I meant," she replied.

I craned back my neck just to glance at her. Indrani looked down at me, eyes serious, though face to face like this I felt the urge to kiss her. I set aside the impulse.

"Akua can't really be here if Vivienne is," I murmured. "And if she's allowed to sit with us just until Vivienne arrives that's worse than not being invited, I'd wager."

Not the last because it made plain the tensions between my appointed successor and the monster I'd absurdly enough come to like – and more importantly, rely on. I could expect Akua to take such a situation with a degree of elegance, if not necessarily enthusiasm under the mask, but I doubted Vivienne would be so agreeable.

"I think they'd both surprise you," Indrani said. "It's personal, between them, but our little thief also knows a thing or two about sitting around a fire with people you were trying to kill not so long ago. Still, once more not who I was speaking of."

Ah. Her. I lowered my head and breathed in through the shaft of my pipe, the acrid smoke filling my throat and my lungs. I let the taste and warmth of it stick with me, and only then breathed out a long stream. I should learn to do tricks, I decided. With the smoke.

"I bet Hakram's been tiptoeing around it all careful-like," she drawled. "Like he doesn't want to needle tender skin. But you're made of rougher stuff than that, aren't you?"

Tiptoeing wasn't the right way to put it. A perch had been offered, on occasion, and my refusal to grasp it had seen the matter implicitly closed without it ever being outright put into words.

"You'd know," I murmured, not wagging my eyebrows but conveying the sentiment by voice. "Although it's been a while, so maybe you forgot."

"Godsdamn," Archer whistled, sounding impressed. "You never get that racy where people might hear. You really don't want to talk about it, do you?"

"There's nothing to talk about," I stiffly said. "She declined twice, I don't see the need to keep inviting her."

I wasn't a bloody widower in desperate need of a second wife, in so dire a bind I'd buy a white stallion and learn to recite Valencian poetry just to impress. Cordial disregard suited me just fine, and to be honest it was probably safer for her. Enemies wouldn't bother going after a love affair gone cold if trying to get to me, not when there were deeper and more obvious bindings in my life.

"You won't even say her name," Indrani grunted, undertone amused. "Yeah, you're totally over how that went down. How dare I suggest otherwise."

"Senior Mage Kilian can be fetched, if you require it so deeply," I replied in a clipped tone. "If she declines, shall I have dragged in chains? She doesn't fucking want to be here, Indrani."

"It's a bad habit, that thing you do," Archer seriously said. "When if it's not a blade at your throat, you let relationships stay ambiguous by doing nothing. Bet she might have changer her tune, if you'd let a few more months pass before asking again."

"It's been quite a bit longer than that," I coldly said. "I won't open up a casket just so you can sate your curiosity, 'Drani."

"Oh, that one's probably cracked beyond mending," she casually replied. "But it doesn't have to be that way all around. Send for Akua. And make her stay, even when Vivienne joins."

My eyes narrowed.

"You don't give a shit about Kilian, do you?" I said. "You just wanted me to feel raw enough I'd agree to this."

The ochre-skinned woman grinned, sharp and pale.

"Sure," Indrani admitted. "But that doesn't mean it isn't true."

We should have gotten her started on the liquor earlier, I darkly thought. Might have spared me all this. I turned to meet her gaze, unflinching, until our silence was interrupted by Hakram sliding a plate full of pork and biryani on my lap. He glanced at us, dark eyes missing nothing.

"Juniper cracked open a bottle of aragh," Adjutant said. "Or do you two need to take a walk?"

"Nah," Indrani smiled. "Aragh sounds good. We're done here."

She broke our stare first, strolling away nonchalantly, and Hakram cocked a hairless brow at me in her wake. Underestimating them both, was I? I doubted it, but beyond that assertion I saw a truth she'd not mentioned. If there was going to be strife, when would we next have so relatively safe a moment to handle it? Certainly not in Salia, or up north fighting the dead. Fuck. I really hated it when Indrani pulled the whole incisive insight thing on me, but now that I knew I was taking a greater risk by not handling this now I couldn't really justify not doing it. Knowing Archer had manoeuvred me didn't make it any less effective.

"Invite Akua up," I sighed.

He cocked his head to the side.

"Ought to make for an interesting evening," he simply said.

Adjutant moved away, boots crinkling against the icing snow, to tread downslope until he'd cross the wards and send one of the legionaries to pass the message along. Ah well, it wasn't even guaranteed she'd come. I glanced down at my plate and frowned.

"Tenderloin?" I called out at Juniper. "Really, the tenderloin? I should have you hanged."

I saw Indrani pout and flip Robber a silver as Aisha hid a smile behind her hand.

"Let me go halvesies with Aisha's cuts," I wheedled.

Robber cursed in Taghrebi and flipped back the silver to Indrani, who took an overly showy bow. No one seemed particularly inclined to consider my suggestion, the bastards.

"None of you are ever becoming a countess, mark my words," I bitterly said, and dug into my pork.

Pickler passed me the bottle of aragh, though, so maybe at least one of them would make it to baroness.

—

My wakeleaf was half-finished by the time Akua glided her way through the raised stones of the Mavian prayer. She'd chosen a rather conservative appearance, by her standards: a high-waisted dress with a long ruffled skirt, in red and yellow touched by eldritch patterns of gold brocade. Given that it was long-sleeved and went up to the beginning of her neck, it was one of the tamer things I'd seen her wear. Still, it was well-fitted and on a woman who looked like Akua Sahelian did that was enough to draw a lingering second look. I puffed out a mouthful of smoke as she approached the fire, bowing slightly towards me as she came to warm hands that needed no warmth against the roaring fire. I nodded back, and both of us pretended not to notice every conversation had died the moment she arrived. I took a moment to study reactions – Indrani was pleased, Hakram pleasant and Masego... staring with fascination at her torso? Must have been an arcane pattern that interested him. Those I'd anticipated rather well, though, so it was the others that got me curious. Robber was grinning, one of those needle-filled offerings that meant amusement so sharp it might as well have been spite. Pickler was indifferent, though the way she'd shuffled on the bench implied surprise and maybe a little curiosity. Aisha had put on the highborn face, a mask of pleasantries so perfect it might as well have been made of marble. Her I wouldn't get much out of unless I asked. Juniper's face was disgruntled, and without any hint of the respect I'd expected an orc to bear for someone who'd faced more than half the armies of Praes and Callow on the field without flinching.

Robber would test her, then, which I wasn't all that worried about. Juniper, though? Contempt might be more dangerous there than antipathy and I suspected that was the way she was leaning.

"Spooky Saddle, sit your ass down," Archer called out. "You're not fooling anyone with the warming hands thing, you're a damned ghost."

"How have you not run out of those by now?" I said, reluctantly impressed. "Also, shade. Shade is the word you were looking for."

"What can I say," Indrani mused, blithely ignoring my correction, "I'm just a giver at heart."

"She has a list," Akua slyly said. "She keeps it in her arrow-bag and her next one is Revenant Rags."

Archer spluttered out it was lie, Robber cackled loudly before swearing to steal it and just like that the spell of silence was broken. Conversations resumed. Wasteland highborn, huh. I suspected she'd be on decent terms with half the people here before the night was out. She had a knack for charming others, even those who should know better. I let the warm chatter wash over me as I leaned back into my seat and smoked my pipe, following the threads of two different conversations at the same time. Juniper and Pickler had dragged a highly amused Indrani into a debate about whether or not her bow, due to its ridiculous size and the way her arrows were closer to javelins, was still a bow or in fact an exotic siege weapon. Pickler's insistence that it was a derivative of a ballista by any reasonable set of principles ran into Juniper's flat reminder that 'she draws the string, with her arm, because it's a bow', while Archer's insistence that while she was a trebuchet in the sack she was also handy with a string did absolutely nothing to help.

Robber was spinning an elaborate yarn about smuggling an ass – a donkey, not the other kind – in a cadet-captain's room back his War College days for the benefit of a seemingly amused Akua, with the occasional dry correction by Hakram. Masego and Aisha, significantly more sober than most people around this fire, were discussing whether the old Alamans legends about the morions, barrow and underground-dwelling creatures that had a rapacious hunger for gold, silver and jewels, were an extinct people or simply dwarf-sightings made legend by the passing of time. It seemed the subject was of particular interest to Aisha, because I was bestowed the rare sight of Hierophant knowing visibly less about a subject than his interlocutor. As the one of the few people here who'd actually seen and spoken with dwarves I contributed a few details, though mostly I enjoyed the sensation of closest thing to home I'd felt in a very long time. Still, I was not so much at ease I'd not kept an eye and ear on where the first knife would come from. And as expected, two yarns later Robber turned a sharp grin and sharper words on Akua.

"Mind you, the fun didn't end when we left Ater," he drawled. "There was this one time – this was when you were still Governess in Laure, before we murdered your every ally and broke everything you ever strove for – when the Boss sent me south to kill your buddies as they moved west. Would have kept it up for even longer, except I was torturing this guy named Mulin who claimed to be under your protection and-"

Akua's brow rose.

"Mulin," she said. "Would you happen to mean Mulade Humin, by any chance?"

"Friend of yours?" Robber grinned.

"No, but the Lady of Salizan sent a cart's worth of gold ingots with him," Akua mused. "Never did get these. He was the heir to the holdings, so his mother was rather cross, but I did wonder what had happened to him."

"Borer slit his throat," the goblin said. "And I'm not saying we ate him, but Hells we were low on rations and if it's Wasteland highborn anything goes, right?"

He was, I thought, looking to shock her. To get a reaction out of her. But then Robber had known little of the Empire's high nobility, save when standing against them on a battlefield. As a student in the War College, he would have been considered under the protection of my father back in the day – who was known to brutally murder any highborn meddling with the College, and quite publicly at that. He believed he knew what Akua Sahelian would be like, I thought, but he rather didn't.

"Was he a screamer?" she asked.

Robber blinked.

"When you tortured him," Akua clarified, "was he a screamer? Because there's been these persistent rumours about the Humin-"

"Oh, come off it," Aisha interrupted. "Even if spice birds did exist, which no one has ever proved-"

"There's Miezan records, Bishara," Akua solemnly said.

"By Calavia," the Taghreb replied, sounding deeply offended. "The same hack who wrote about giant crabs living in the Wasaliti and insisted the Blessed Isle was a nest for crocodiles that spoke riddles in High Tyrian. She wrote to entertain patricians in Mieza, not as true historian."

"I can't comment on Calavia's accuracy in all things," Akua said, "yet I once shared a table with Mulade Humin when we were nine, and by the noises he made when I ate the last spice cookies you'd think I ate his firstborn using only forks."

"Is it me, or is it kind of titillating when those two argue about things?" Indrani pensively asked.

Godsdamnit, Archer. If you're going to say things like that, at least say something I don't kind of agree with deep down. So both of them were rather good looking, and them getting heated over debate was a good look. It wasn't my fault I had eyes! Still, best not to say that. Akua hardly needed the encouragement and trying to get Aisha into bed had terrible idea written all over for all sorts of reasons. I set aside the distracting though but focusing on more practical matters. The more the two of them spoke, I saw, the more out of his depth Robber looked. I sympathized, but then trying to take the shade on in courtly games like this was not the wisest choice he'd ever made. I'd seen few people outright chew through Akua when it came to this, Vivienne most vividly coming to mind. Even Black's attempt to humiliate and terrorize her into doing something unwise by making her nail her own hand to a table had not borne the fruit he'd wanted it to, back in the day, and Akua in those years had been nowhere as smooth as she now was. Without having ever drawn blood as he meant to Robber was turned aside, and the conversations moved on. When lively debate over the kind of riddles in High Tyrian a talking crocodile might have feasibly asked – Archer, the filthy show off, started quoting riddles from 'Tyrant and the Fool' in the play's original tradertalk, a tongue that had common Baalite roots – I found Aisha elegantly sitting at my side.

"My queen," Staff Tribune Aisha Bishara said.

"I thought I'd trained you out of that," I sighed.

“It’s been some time,” she smiled. “And this is a serious enough affair.”

My brow rose, and I decided to pass the last of the aragh to a distracted Hakram instead of drinking it.

“I’m listening,” I said.

Aisha’s lips thinned, then she leaned forward and lowered her voice.

“Do you mean,” she softly asked, “for Akua Sahelian to be Dread Empress of Praes?”

Soronel Haetir

Good thing she passed the drink, if she’d been in the middle of swallowing there would have been a spit-take for sure.

Ebert of Alamans, scholar errant

In fact, the greatest point of scholarly contention regarding the riddling saurians of the Blessed Isle is not whether they exist, but whether they are taxinomically crocodiles at all or (as in this writer’s opinion), more properly identified as alligators.

Matthew

Cat doesn’t listen to Black. Always listen to Black. She will never have a better opportunity to kill Akua utterly.

stevenneiman

There seems to be a running theme about people being ruined when they trust someone to have better judgement than them in certain cases, and then ignore that person for a critical decision. It happened to Cat when she tried to rush her third Aspect and lost a piece of her soul instead, it happened to Malicia when she decided that she knew how to deal with narrative threats and tried to work around Black to perform her screwup, it happened to Laurence when she decided that she knew better than the guy who can see the future and read minds whether Indrani was trustworthy, and it’s almost happened to Sve Noc several times but Cat has been able to talk them out of it.

On the other hand, Cat didn’t bring Black in for his advice on this subject, and redemption is about as far from his area of expertise as a narrative concern can get. I genuinely do think that Cat knows what she's doing here better than Black does.

Liliet

Mhm!

Eli Davis

Oh shit. I did not see that possibility coming at all

Drd

Well bugger me sideways, I was NOT expecting that. 0_0

Andrew Mitchell

Me too... No, no, not the bugging, the surprise. I was not expecting that twist.

doominator10

Same, including the bugging

KageLupus

I'll take one bugging, hold the twist...

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahahahaha

Stephen R. Marsh

Exactly what I suggested earlier though.

NerfContessa

It's been a while since I expected it to go that direction, and I never thought the impetuous for it would be cats. But then qkua seemed to jump the redemption train, and even switching to good of all things, and... Well...

Andrew Mitchell

I enjoyed the banter. It's good to have the band back together.

I don't think Vivienne is going to like Akua being here. I think she might ask Catherine to renew her vow to kill Akua and Catherine may not be able to say that any more.

Liliet

I think Vivienne is more smooth than that, Catherine's point about her being one of very few people to ever slaughter Akua in an argument comes to mind. She'll thoroughly scout Catherine's actual feelings on the matter before going straight to that point IMHO.

Hitogami

No, just no. Absolutely not

Insanenoodlyguy

New crack theory. Dread Emperor Benevolent is not Black after all. Its Akua wearing a crappy moustache Robber made for her. See, Akua gets cursed to never be empress, so she rides out an irritant-tier loophole to get the throne.

Liliet

...this is beautiful

Halinn

It makes so much sense!

Insanenoodlyguy

I mean, it does free Black up to go teach at Cardinal. He gets to thwart Bard by being part of destroying the status quo, weilding a very new kind of power with his new name of Principal.

IDKWhoitis

Currently imagining Viv throwing a fit if she was in earshot of that last line. I mean, its probably the next chapter, but still. It bound to be a fun one.

Liliet

People keep forgetting how good Vivi actually is at the social / political stuff 😏 throwing a fit? really? what's your definition?

TeK

Imperceptably frowning your mental eyebrows, what's yours?

edrey

then the gray pilgrim appear behind them.
asking for kairos and anaxeres would be to much right?

Sparsebeard

... or not enough, I think that rumenarumenarumena would fit right in with all the insubordination being thrown around, I'm sure he too, can do abstract mathematics.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, oh, oh, YES! That would be bloody brilliant to see.

Fayhem

I'm pretty sure Rumena would consider spending time with Catherine in a social context to be beneath his dignity. Or its dignity? I can't remember if Rumena predates the drow-don't-do-genders thing like the Sisters do; obviously Rumena has the age to, I just don't recall if that preference has actually been expressed.

Arracor

....and everyone clapped!

breakingamber

Tipos!

"Bet she might have changer [changed] her tune, if you'd let a few more months pass before asking again."

He believedt [believed] he knew what Akua Sahelian would be like, I thought, but he rather didn't.

I sympathized, but then [again] trying to take the shade on in courtly games like this was not the wisest choice he'd ever made.

Also, can we get some love for the tvtropes page?

<http://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Literature/APracticalGuideToEvil>

Big I

Pretty sure Black's going to end up emperor, with the name Benevolent.

Liliet

That name is taken, it belonged to a historical emperor.

TeK

Though I don't think Black will ever suffer a pretence like naming himself Benevolent, that is just not him, in any way, it was discussed that comments from future can and had been used as epigraphs, and besides, first ever epigraph with Benevolent calls him Benevolent the First, which implies that there would be the second. Because they don't call Sorcerous the First.

Liliet

Fair, Benevolent the Second is possible. Though it's still OOC for Black lmao

hakureireimu

You're stating suppositions as fact, when those suppositions are based off circular reasoning.

Liliet

They're not. "Epigraphs have been used as worldbuilding, specifically Dread Emp epigraphs serving to paint a picture of historical Praes up to today" is not circular.

hakureireimu

The "up to today" part is totally your supposition.

1. How do you know Benevolent is historical? Because there's no future Dread Emperor epigraphs.
2. How do you know there's no future Dread Emperor epigraphs, and Benevolent is not a counter-example? Because Benevolent is historical.

Liliet

This is not how my logic goes.

How do I know Benevolent is historical? Because it was implied by the format in context. Why do I think it was implied by the format? Because it was used for worldbuilding, and it would be a shitty twist if it were shown otherwise.

Liliet

It's my supposition in the way that 'Amadeus wears pants not a kilt at all times' is my supposition. Some things are always assumed from context.

Benevolent was part of a characterization of pre-Amadeus Praes – eager to grab onto the Good tropes when the Dread Emperor was savvy enough (fucking... Malignant from this epigraph ;u;) but without it actually changing anything in the long run, because it never went beyond a single ruler's gimmick.

hakureireimu

So now you're making the assumption that it's worldbuilding of pre-Amadeus Praes. The only thing an epigraph needs to do is to be related to the chapter's theme. Everything else are assumptions.

We already know that Cat wants Amadeus to climb the tower, and she's the protagonist. It'll be interesting to know how much evidence is needed for you to abandon your view.

Liliet

>So now you're making the assumption that it's worldbuilding of pre-Amadeus Praes.

Yes. I'm making this assumption. I believe that it is an entirely natural assumption and an intended reading. It enhances my understanding of the story to consider Benevolent a past Dread Emperor, as it shows the full spectrum of what Praes has been in the past without it actually helping long term.

>It'll be interesting to know how much evidence is needed for you to abandon your view.

Having his ruling name confirmed as Benevolent the First. That would do it.

I am not sure that Amadeus will become Dread Emperor – I think there's plenty of factors pushing against it – but I'm not sure that he won't. My assertion is that he will not become Dread Emperor Benevolent I specifically.

Or having characters in-universe discuss how no single Dread Emperor before has ever used Good tropes to their advantage, which I expect even less than that one above.

Shveiran

So long as we are all in agreement that there is no solid evidence – only opinions – on the Benevolent matter, for both sides of the argument, I think we are golden.

I too have a strong belief on the subject; yet so long as we are able to acknowledge these ideas as opinion-based, I'd say we can discuss them serenely and have fun doing so.

Liliet

Mhm. I just like to remind people that it's only a theory, because a lot of people talk like it's something we know for sure.

breakingamber

And angled in the opposite direction, implying my Special Tribune might have murdered not one but two foreign highborn officers just so he could use their glass eye [eyes] as toy [toys].

Robber once more tossed something at me, though this time I caught it – it was, to my surprise, another glass eye. (another should be italicized, not glass)

Liliet

The joke here is that Catherine is not surprised it's another eye, she's surprised it's once again glass.

And the first one refers to her assumption that both of them had only ONE glass eye each.

Someguy

Nope. Black gets to be Dread Emperor but he sacrifices the Name Tyrant using Akua as fuel to turn the storm above the Tower into fertility for the land.

Javvies

I get why Aisha might be concerned about the possibility. On the other hand ... Dread Empress Akua isn't happening.

Andrew Mitchell

TBH I'm warming to the idea.

Liliet

What Shveiran said. Catherine has already considered the possibility and firmly rejected it, for Akua's own sake included.

Andrew Mitchell

I know it's not going to happen. But that doesn't stop me from liking the idea.

Cthulhu

I'm utterly lost. This seems to come out of nowhere.

Why the fuck would an undead servitor bound to Cats mantle as a slave after unleashing demons be placed in power over an empire using demons as door wardens? What, she got better?

This is taking a deposed Napoleon from Elba and asking him to run Germany just for the hell of it.

KageLupus

There is a very real chance that Aisha just isn't as aware of the Liesse Accords and all of the plans that Cat has for them, including her new Named-training Academy. Lacking that information it isn't too unreasonable for her to jump to the wrong conclusion. Cat drags Akua out of the cloak and slowly integrates her into the Woe. Now she is bringing Akua along to what is obviously a gathering of the core group, which tacitly implies that Cat wants Akua to be accepted into that core group.

There has to be a reason for that, and from what Aisha knows about Cat plans making Akua into a trusted ally in Praes is at least possible. She isn't even that far off that mark, since we all think that Cat wants Akua to be Headmistress of her school. Given how much influence Black thinks the school is going to have Akua being Headmistress is really more of a lateral promotion compared to Dread Empress.

And if I had to guess, I would bet that the next chapter has Aisha explaining all of the reasons why she thinks Akua would make for a bad choice for Dread Empress. Just because she brought it up as a possibility to Cat doesn't mean she agrees with the choice. She could just as easily be making sure Cat isn't about to make a huge mistake.

Stephen R. Marsh

Which is much more likely than what I thought, well laid out as well.

Liliet

>since we all think that Cat wants Akua to be Headmistress of her school

...no? You're mistaking fanon for canon. It's a common joke that Akua would, but Catherine has no such plan.

>And if I had to guess, I would bet that the next chapter has Aisha explaining all of the reasons why she thinks Akua would make for a bad choice for Dread Empress. Just because she brought it up as a possibility to Cat doesn't mean she agrees with the choice. She could just as easily be making sure Cat isn't about to make a huge mistake.

That's my reading, yeah.

IMHO the greatest role this plays is the reminder that this is what Catherine having Akua around looks like to all Praesi who aren't deeply in the know period.

Liliet

Kind of, yeah. It does tend to come up bc when you list 'possible rulers' in your head 'Napoleon' just kind of makes the list, but that doesn't make it a viable idea.

sivarajan

"...taking a deposed Napoleon from Elba and asking him to run Germany"

I like this alternate history.

sivarajan

St. Helena is probably a closer analogy though.

Shveiran

Let's hope. Redeeming her is one thing, trusting her with power over a country – and Praes of all countries – sounds like all kinds of Bad Ideas.

You don't trust a recovering alcoholic to guard a brewery, for Above's sake.

erebus42

Now isn't that an interesting question. While Black certainly has the iron will and the capacity to break his adversaries in the wasteland and subjugate Praes I am a bit skeptical of how he'd be as a statesman. There's certainly a difference in running a military and running an effective government. Akua does have the flexibility and subtlety Black lacks, however it can't be overlooked that she's Akua mother-fucking Sahelian so...there is that. It also can't be overlooked that she has something that Black sorely lacks; the power of godsdamn Friendship!

ninegardens

Wait... BLACK lacks the power of friendship? This is the man whose team mates would tear apart frickin' creation in order to retrieve him. I get that the Calamaties are mostly dead now :(, but the fact that Black has lost people doesn't remove the fact that he has some INCREDIBLY loyal friends, unlike say... Akua.

... or maybe you were just being humorous about some of Akua's past lines and I shouldn't take shit so seriously.... nevermind.

erebus42

I was mostly referencing that line as a joke. However it should be noted that with the deaths of Sabah, Wekesa, Ranker, and with the imminent falling out between him and Malicia his list of friends is rapidly getting smaller.

Liliet

Yeah, but the POWER is still there 😊 it was inside him all along! insert Dread Emperor Malignant II joke here

Mental Mouse

Black has a few incredibly loyal friends, basically the Woe – and they'd half scattered even before they started to get killed off. He doesn't pick up new friends as he goes around like Cat does, much less win over enemies to his side. I mean, recruiting a borderline hero like Viv was one thing, but turning around the effing Peregrine? That's "Heart is a badass power after all".

Liliet

I suspect he was more Cat-like in his younger years, considering Grem, Ranker, etc

Liliet

>There's certainly a difference in running a military and running an effective government.

My analysis of Black is that he is far more a statesman than a politician. Sure, he's a general as well, but generally setting up effective governing is his hobby horse. Remember the orphanage system? Remember his dreams of public education, brought up agains and again recently? Amadeus does military, sure, but he does far more than that.

>It also can't be overlooked that she has something that Black sorely lacks; the power of godsdamn Friendship!

Well this is just a punchline, considering the Empire has been held together for 40 years by the power of Black's friendships.

TeK

Being a good governor if not necesserialy being a good ruler though. Seeing people as an expandable resource leads you to Stalinist Russia. Don't be Stalinist Russia.

Liliet

He doesn't see them as an expendable resource any more than Cordelia does, with her levies and all. In fact he goes pretty damn above and beyond for the setting, making an effort to preserve lives of rebel levies. Amadeus sees people as far less expendable than Alaya does,

TeK

Amadeus does not even see people as people. They are all basically gears. Tools. It is clearly stated in the series no less, it is the way he treats everyone, even if he loves them too. Or at least that was the way of a Black Knight, but Amadeus being an unknown quantity does not necessarily inspire confidence. The point is, it's what Malicia said, and the reason he actually did not become an Emperor in the first place. Even he understands that. He is an enforcer, an overseer, an advisor, but not a ruler.

Shveiran

You are confusing "doesn't feel empathy for" with "is uncaring about the well-being of", IMO.

Black considers everything an expendable resource, yes. However, what does he spend them for? The well-being of his country.

He is ruthless. And he has his own opinion about what that "well-being" is, granted.

But... well, what we are defining here is pretty much a king. That's what a king does.

A monarch doesn't care, that his countrymen disagree: his vision for the kingdom is the kingdom's future. A monarch expends his resources to achieve those goals; any country that has a standing army is expending soldiers' lives to gain security; any country with laws is expending part of the people's freedom to gain stability and order; any country with taxes is expending part of its people's riches to fund the various projects that would be impossible for singular individuals.

His vision is more extreme than most, but what it is a more extreme version of is the vision of a ruler.

I really don't see how the rest of the ruling class in the Guide is any different. Some may be less BLUNT about it, but bedside manners doesn't strike me as a meaningful distinction in this field.

TeK

In short, because it is a blunder and a blind spot. It is the same reason why chess is not a good metaphor for war: your chess pieces would not always follow you. If you think your people to be a resource, and your kingdom to be the final goal of ruling, you will end up with the empire of ghosts. My point about Socialist

Russia. Maybe you can say that spending lives like sand to achieve rapid industrialization is a good thing for a country as a whole.

About you saying that other rulers are no better. That is true. And his honesty is somehow enchanting, but I did not see his plans for long term Praes. He is proved to be a little to harsh and brutal and did you read my comment about what Malicia said? I literally don't know what are his plans besides "take all power from nobles, kill nobles" in various forms, be it lands or magic.

He is a butcher and enforcer. Leader, organizer, and if it was Civilization 5 I would pick him as a ruler.

I will say this: in the end, he is probably one of the better candidatures for ruling. But I don't think that is what he wants to do. First of all, I don't know nearly enough about Amadeus, but if we're talking BK, he wanted to "win", which is a goal, while ruling is a process. He can do reforms, however or turn Praes into a war camp for a pissing match with Heaven, but I don't see him ruling.

You said that rest of the ruling class is any different. I disagree. Save for Liesse, Malicia is much more different, which is even acknowledged by Amadeus himself, hence him serving her. Cordelia is different, and GP is different too.

I will sound idealistic, but the big difference, is that unlike Black, they see that nation IS people, it is not something separate from them. And if you think people are a tools, they can't be an endgoal. Which is a problem, as I feel it.

This whole thing is really messed, and I did not express myself clearly. I agree that he has good qualities for a king. But I think that they should be counterweighted by an actual compassion. As you said in the other comment, golden middle is better than extremes. And Black is an extreme.

Liliet

>In short, because it is a blunder and a blind spot. It is the same reason why chess is not a good metaphor for war: you chess pieces would not always follow you. If you think your people to be a resource, and your kingdom to be the final goal of ruling, you will end up with the empire of ghosts.

That's really not something Amadeus is in danger of. He's willing to sacrifice everything about Praes that isn't its population, for the sake of said population. What you're saying here is far more closely applicable to Alaya.

>but if we're talking BK, he wanted to "win", which is a goal

It's not. It's a way of saying "he wanted to achieve his goal". I mean he didn't want a nominal victory, considering how sarcastic he was about them wanting Callow's crown, and considering how willing he was to have Cat kill him and take over. He wanted something defined as "win" in the sense of "this is what he wants".

Look at what exactly it is that's his win condition.

(Malicia's 'secure a camp for your pissing match with Heavens' is not exactly good analysis, and comes from her equating Praesi highborn with Praes period, and what they want with what 'Praes' wants in that conversation)

>I agree that he has good qualities for a king. But I think that they should be counterweighted by an actual compassion.

Amadeus "south won't recover from this for decades" "Wekesa would eat every child in Callow if it allowed him to focus on his research" "we've grown so enamoured with bleeding our own we have sayings about it" "there is no inherent blemish in any of these people" "a government is meant to function, or there's no point in its existence at all" doesn't have sufficient counterweights? Are you sure?

Tek

I may have been carried away from my own opinions and rationality trying to defend a sinking ship. I apologize. I was wrong.

Liliet

>Amadeus does not even see people as people. They are all basically gears. Tools. It is clearly stated in the series no less, it is the way he treats everyone, even if he loves them too.

I am reading it the other way around – even when he treats people like gears in a mechanism, he still sees them as people. Remembering the face of that one guy who held the gates in Laure for longest 20 fucking years ago? Seeing actual enemies you are currently leading an army against as people instead of a faceless mass?

Sure, this doesn't stop him from making ruthless decisions for the good of all. But it's 'for the good of all' that's the key part. Amadeus's definition of 'successful Praes' is Praes that does not bleed people. His population is, to him, the opposite of expendable.

TeK

"Remembering the face of that one guy who held the gates in Laure for longest 20 fucking years ago? Seeing actual enemies you are currently leading an army against as people instead of a faceless mass?"

I think it is more the part of "being graceful in your victory" philosophy part of things. Also the fact that this is more effective way of acting. Affably evil people tend to acquire more cooperation from others. I see him "noting that one guy" because he found him exceptional -> useful. So he put a note in his mind against his face. Again. don't really know which one of us is right. Just shared my interpretation.

"Amadeus's definition of 'successful Praes' is Praes that does not bleed people. His population is, to him, the opposite of expendable."

Not exactly. As far as I understand it, his logic went as thus: way we can't win a war against Callos for nigh a thousand year? Cause our leadership sucks most of the time. Why does our leadership suck? Because our system is bullshit. Why is our system is bullshit? Because it serves a function of ensuring the ability to wage constant wars and sustaining stability of the realm through constant warmongering. Why does it need to do constant warmongering? Cause otherwise people will fucking starve. Also because narrative bullshit and if Praes was to be reformed, there would be no "Evil Empire" throwing around thousands of disposable minions for Heroes to dispose. And Gods don't want that.

So all the reforms, dealing with starvation issue, are the means in the end. And the goal is something I would not want my ruler to have: just stick it to the Heavens and win.

Liliet

>I think it is more the part of “being graceful in your victory” philosophy part of things.

There is a difference between holding a philosophy and being actually able to remember a guy's face after 20 years. The latter requires seeing them as a person and caring to some degree, otherwise it's simply not how memory works.

>So all the reforms, dealing with starvation issue, are the means in the end. And the goal is something I would not want my ruler to have: just stick it to the Heavens and win.

Ah Yes That

https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/arcq4a/amadeus_the_madman_a_skeptical_analysis_of_the/

...let's discuss 😊

TeK

“otherwise it's simply not how memory works.”

Even Named memory?

“...let's discuss”

While I thank you for an interesting read, I am not ready to partake of a community so refined such as reddit. Some other day, perhaps. But I glimpsed that you got there even more interesting conversation that I got in comments.

Liliet

(I mean we can discuss here too)

Named qualities are an exaggeration of what they already are. What is it about Amadeus's Role that would grant him a supernaturally perfect memory for faces of people he'd been killing? 😊

erebus42

I was mainly referencing Akua's previous line about it as a joke. Though like I said in the other response, his list of friends grows smaller and smaller as the story goes on.

onedollargum

Oh man, the chances of Cat helping Akua into the tower are like those of the Peregrine helping Below.

...Oh.

ninegardens

"No no no. Black is Going to be Emperor.
I was just planning to make Akua Chancellor- that can't possibly go wrong."

Dainpdf

Uh... nope. Let's not do that. That would end terribly. For everyone.

NZPIEFACE

People last chapter: Where did Kilian go?
This chapter:

Stephen R. Marsh

I was glad to see that revisited.

TeK

Revisited in a riveting way no less.

- Hey people, remember Killian?
- Yes! Yes! Goddamit, yes! I've been waiting for so long! Finally! Yay!
- Good to see you remember her. Now onto the other things.

Anfer

I'm eagerly awaiting Cat's ultimate, final response. Not necessarily to this exact question, but to the whole Akua situation in general. We've see the gradual progression. The visible antipathy that has slowly turned into grudging camaraderie. The blooming friendship borne of enmity and understanding.

I feel like I can make a rough guess as to the future, even.

Cat will be genial, friendly and kind. She'll laugh at Akua's jokes. She'll smile and genuinely enjoy her company. They'll go on adventures together. Akua will worm her way into everyone's hearts as she's wont to do.

And then when all is said and done, when the final enemy is defeated, when Cat is free of her responsibilities, when the Woe can finally rest...

She'll walk up to Akua and, still smiling, tear her into tiny, screaming shreds.

Cat made an oath you see.

She smiles. She laughs and she jokes. But down deep, she's Callowan.

She hasn't forgotten. She hasn't forgiven.

And she never will.

TeK

First: there is always a choice between woman's wants and queen's demands.

Second: this whole "never forgive" thing is flaw, not a bloody virtue, as much as being, well, a Praesi is a flaw, for all that it is geraldled as a virtue. Cat stated repeatedly that Praes needs to change, but Callow must be changed with it. To let go of the past, and let go of the old grudges. And do the unthinkable, something Cat, until very recently, had BIG troubles with:

Trust.

HHenryY

Of course its a flaw. In a totally rational world, optimisation, reconciliation and forgiveness would be the way to go.

The whole point of a grudge is that it's an irrational hatred based on a previous slight.

Cat likes Akua now. Akua has worked her charm on the group for months. They mostly like her too.

That doesn't change the fact that Akua murdered more people than you've ever met in one massive, fell swoop. People Cat was directly in charge of protecting.

Who she then swore a VERY serious oath to avenge.

It is VERY interesting though, to see the changing mental views. As Akua worms her way into the friendship of the group, she's also worming her way into the hearts of the readers. She's that good.

I like her too.

People just after the act were screaming for her blood. Now, a few dozen chapters down the line when she'd had time to make a few quips, show off her sense of humour and do a few good deeds, suddenly everyone is like 'she'd make a great empress of praes' and 'she could be a way for Cat to finally get over her holding of grudges and grow as a person'. Just funny is all.

This is an evil psychopathic mass murderer who's entire schtick is manipulation. And yet, readers can't help but forget that because she's funny.

I just don't think Cat has.

Also, woman's wants and queens demands? The woman WANTS to forgive Akua. She likes her. She grins are her jokes, she constantly comments at how Akua is becoming a familiar, reliable, useful and enjoyable presence.

The Queen needs to kill her, because this is the woman who murdered a significant fraction of the entire population of the country that she rules, for no other reason than because she felt like it. Make use of her, fine. But she can't get away with that. In the end, there will be a reckoning. I'll be sad, because I like Akua. She's wormed her way into my heart too.

But she aint getting away.

TeK

Yeah, new chapter just got out.

Fayhem

> for all that it is gerald as a virtue.

I don't really have any substantive comments, I just wanted to say that this is my favorite typo I've seen in a while. Praise Geraldo!

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. I mean I can absolutely see a world where cat destroys her when it's all over, but I don't think she'll be smiling about it at this point

parahacker

I think this is more about Aisha noticing a story brewing. The current situation might have parallels to previous Dreads.

parahacker

Even the trickle of notifications I get in my inbox from likes and responses to comments leaves me in awe of the volume someone like, say, the author receives. Filters would become not merely prudent, but a lifestyle. Whooo boy.

Liliet

Catherine has brought up the possibility before and firmly rejected it. It's interesting that Aisha sees it too, and I'm curious what she has to say.

Sugar Roll

Cat wants a Dread Empress/Emperor who can be trusted to act with restraint. The Doom of Liesse does not meet that criteria. Give her the reins and she'll be building flying fortresses and doomsday weapons.

N0Br41nZ

Couldn't it be a puppet empress situation? Doesn't Cat have a "chain" or similar on Akua?

ninegardens

I get the feeling that would end very badly, because
A) "Monster on a chain" is a trope that Cat knows she can't afford to lean on.
B) To the extent she actually USES that chain, she is violating the spirit of the accords and set Praes up to fail the moment Cat is out of the picture. Her goal is to establish a functioning government, not make herself a weight bearing boss.

Mental Mouse

Also, C) Anyone who gains the throne will certainly gain access to all sorts of magical resources and gadgets. I would be surprised if none of that would help Akua slip her leash.

Sugar Roll

Not anymore. If I remember correctly, Akua's bindings were removed when Sve Noc devoured Winter.

Charlie

Wait, is Aisha the Scribe in drag? That seems like something the Scribe would ask, and I'm pretty sure we met Aisha pretty recently.

Trebar

Uh... Eudokia is already female so I don't know why her being Aisha would require drag. Aisha is one of the older characters in the books; she was part of the original party back in the war college and one of Juniper's most trusted friends and associates.

Javvies

Um. No.

First, Scribe and Aisha are both women, so even if one were disguising themselves as the other, neither would be in drag. Second, Scribe is nowhere near the Army of Callow/Legions – if she were, she'd have made contact with Amadeus.

Third, and more importantly, Aisha Bishara was captain of one of the other companies (Wolf?) when Cat was at the War College, and was one of the original members of the Fifteenth. In fact, Aisha was specifically requested by Juniper. Also, Aisha was Ratface's ex.

Fourth, there's an extra chapter from the early days of the Fifteenth where somebody tried to kill Hakram in the streets of Ater, Aisha is present and involved in the process – at the end of said chapter, Scribe shows up and comments that Assassin still be in a mood when she tells him that he missed some of the assassin/murder cult during his purges of such people that was just used against Hakram.

Liliet

Aisha was mentioned, but I think she hasn't interacted with Cat in person since the post-Camps diplomacy.

Mental Mouse

As others have noted, Scribe is confirmed a different person. Assassin is a shapechanger, but imitating someone Cat knows so well at close range seems risky. One possible wrinkle could be an implanted command from Malicia's Rule aspect.

Shveiran

It could, yes. But honestly, EVERYTHING could be an implanted command. That aspect is fucking scary.

My point being, If we start to think that way we might as well run in circles.

superkeaton

Oh hey we're going to finally address Ki-and there it goes...

TeK

It's been a lot of years since their break up. And as any break up, it does not leave everything smooth and perfect afterwards. Maybe it's just me, but people who remain great friends after a break up, either didn't really broke up, or didn't really loved each other in the first place. It is bitter and weird, and best left in the past.

Liliet

It's been a year and a half since their breakup, you mean.

TeK

I am not sure about that. From the actual break up to Aqua's Folly, 'bout a month at least, from Folly to Crusade a year, a Crusade for a couple of months, than Keter, than drow, actually yeah, at least it's a year and a half, but I feel like it's been more than that.

Liliet

>From the actual break up to Aqua's Folly, 'bout a month at least

You mean 'the evening before'.

And as far as timeline goes, I've actually tracked it:

https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/bsz8b6/pgte_timeline_cat_just_turned_20_at_most/

...and right now is either late winter or early spring (snow was mentioned in Hearing).

Ok, so if you count the breakup from Cat's return from Winter and not from the final conversation pre-Second Llesse, it's been nearly two years. Not two years yet, though.

>I feel like it's been more than that

Welcome to Cat's Very Eventful Life... and erratic periodically dropping stuff like "I've been trying to get into Grand Alliance for years" where it does not even try to make sense with the timeline -_-

TeK

Huh. That is something.

superkeaton

I just want to actually see Kilian show up. She went through that ritual to help her blood, yeah? I wanna see what she's like now.

Shveiran

Personally, I'm glad she didn't. I never felt like she and Cat had any great chemistry (with the exception of the post-demon-dream-surgery scene in Marhford, admittedly) and the scene is already so damn crowded... it doesn't feel like she has much to contribute, honestly, ritual or no. The story moved on, and it did so without her.

Liliet

You're not wrong, but I feel more like it was bad writing in Book 2 and an injustice that needs to be remedied =x

Shveiran

It could be EE was struggling to make it more meaningful a relationship, it could be it was always meant not to be too deep and portray a teenager's infatuation, Cat seeking something simple and rewarding while pressed on all other fronts.

Honestly.... by this point in the story? I feel like I'd be happier believing the second and focusing on the rest of this amazing world and characters.

Liliet

There wasn't enough characterization for Killian regardless of if it was on purpose. I agree EE likely did mean to make it a shallow relationship, but we the audience got less about Killian than Cat did offscreen.

TeK

I am not sure if she did. She may have actually never had done it. We'll never know.

Soronel Haetir

I especially don't get the question given the way Cat needed to be browbeaten into even having Akua there, though I suppose Aisha might not have realized that.

Liliet

Yeah, I think Aisha is just a typical example of what this looks like from the side.

sivarajan

After reading the latest extra chapter, I see Akua as being as much like Alaya as Cat is like Amadeus.

ninegardens

I mean... aside from the fact that Alaya spent her entire life trying to re-write the rules of the game (slowly), while Akua's great dream was to become one of the "Great villains" of history- to be remembered.

Alaya will be perfectly happy to be forgotten, nothing but a side note in history... as long as the plan WORKS.

Fayhem

> Alaya will be perfectly happy to be forgotten, nothing but a side note in history... as long as the plan WORKS.

Would she, though? That's certainly Amadeus, without a doubt. But the whole denouement of Book III rested on the fact that Amadeus' outlook isn't as compatible/similar to Alaya's as he had always believed – and, it seemed, as perhaps she had believed as well. I don't think we have enough information to say for sure either way yet, but it's definitely believable to me that they're pretty different on this score as well.

In fact, my take on the pair of them at this point (esp after Seed II) is that Amadeus is essentially seeking a New Praes while Alaya was always seeking Old Praes, But Better. This made their aims very compatible for a while since it means they both wanted/needed major reforms given how messed-up Praes has almost always been historically. But if I'm right about their motives, there was always going to be a point where Amadeus was going to want to keep going and Alaya would be ready to stop, or at least diverge in aim. And I think Book III might have been that point.

Liliet

Mhm.

ninegardens

See, I read it more as them both wanting to re-write the empire, its just that he wanted to burn it down and build from the ashes (Somewhat like Saint, to be honest), while she argued for incremental change.

Alaya allowed the construction of the deathstar, not for the sake of being remembered, but because she simply didn't believe Black's plan would work. This may have been stupid, immoral and unwise, but fundamentally, this wasn't about being remembered: she was totally happy letting Akua have all the credit, as long as afterwards she had the lever that she believed would prevent war (however misguided this belief was).

Alaya runs on desperation, Akua runs on Splendor.
Alaya prefers caution and subtlety, Akua prefers theater, raw power, and to show off her talents.

They might on occasion use similar tools, but fundamentally, there reasons for using these tools are very very different.

Shveiran

I agree, Alaya isn't very similar to Aqua.

However, I think the Empress wants and needs control. She wants to be in charge, to feel like no one has control over her life, and thus she isn't a martyr. She went after reforms and change because she knew things couldn't go on like they did; she embraced change because she knew those paths led to failure. She isn't after anything specific, just making her country better and keeping in charge of it.

I don't think she has an "end goal", per se.

Fayhem

> I think the Empress wants and needs control. She wants to be in charge, to feel like no one has control over her life

I think this is a very accurate take on Alaya. If Amadeus' original underlying motivation was witnessing failure, then Alaya's was feeling powerlessness. And that has significant implications for what she wants and is willing to do.

Fayhem

I agree that allowing/deliberately inducing the creation of the Fantasy Deathstar wasn't itself about being remembered; it was more of an example of how despite Alaya and Amadeus being allied for a long time and being personally close it would be a mistake to assume that because something is true of one it can be automatically taken as evidence that the same is true for the other. And then relating that to the fact that I don't think that we've seen any direct evidence that Alaya doesn't care about being remembered, so since it can't be reliably inferred she would feel that way just because Amadeus does we just don't have evidence to directly suggest that is the case.

Alaya and Akua definitely aren't the same, either. But tbf, the original claim (which I found interesting to consider though I'm not certain I agree) was that Akua was to Alaya what Catherine is to Black. And Catherine definitely, palpably, is not the same as Black, so Akua not being the same as Alaya doesn't inherently invalidate that thesis. I do believe that Alaya wants something more like a reformed/improved version of Old Praes, and that actually is what Akua wanted as well, in her own way. The difference between Amadeus/Catherine and Alaya/Akua to me is that Catherine is a successful evolution of Amadeus' philosophy while Akua, well, succumbed to Folly.

Liliet

This is definitely supported by Seed II as I read it as well.

sivarajan

Akua has gone through a redemption arc though.

hakureireimu

I'd say she's still in the process of going through her redemption arc.

Mental Mouse

Lets see, at this point she's stuck by Cat through the Everdark, including defending her in the confrontation/interrogation by Sve Noc. She handled the backup miracle for the Battle of the Camps, and putting Black together while Cat was still in Twilight. How much proof is needed? (Yes, that's pretty much a universal question for redemption, and it comes into play here.)

Shveiran

She did all of that, true enough, but I'm not sure what this proves. What are your thoughts on the matter?

Mental Mouse

I think at this point she's as far off her main "story" track as Cat is. Akua is a psychological character in a narrative world. 😊

Liliet

Yes, we need no more proof that Akua is going through a redemption arc.

I'll consider it complete where I can assume that in the event of Catherine's sudden and untimely death, Akua will stick to the 'good person' track and spite temptations of power and glory in favor of background quiet doing the right thing (should such arise).

TeK

Actually not a bad idea, and it has a shape to it. Vivienne is all but confirmed to be the next Queen of Callow, right? Her dynamic with Aqua PERFECTLY encapsulates the dynamic between Callow and Praes: bitter enemies and the other side did monstrous things that could not be forgiven, yet now you have a chance to end the strife and work towards a common, better goal, with all the tensions that entails. From narrative perspective it is near perfect. Aqua is Malicia's new Praes, the one that does BETTER than its predecessors, while not mindlessly tearing everything down like Black wants. It has a terrible past behind it, as does Praes, but also... Hope? I don't know, I like it. And just as much, Vivienne is new Callow – first bitter enemy of all things not Callow and Praes, gradually getting BETTER, but still remaining itself. With all that it entails.

Aqua said it herself, she hopes for a redemption. And all she needs for that is trust. A chance. And that is what, in the end, Praes needs too, doesn't it?

TeK

I mean, I've seen people here jumping sideways in riot over how nobody trusts a known Villain, but somehow an issue of trust also dissipates when we see how hard of a choice it really is. Strange.

Sinestere

I fully expect Emperess General, first Orc on the Tower Throne and first of her name to be the ruler the guide presents. That she would not want it just means she would be good for the role and she would need to be tricked into it. Hellhound for Emperress!

TeK

"That she would not want it just means she would be good for the role"

Not what Cat thinks.

Liliet

Praes needs Amadeus fixing it, not a recovering alcoholic locked back in the wine cellar they grew up in.

TeK

Amadeus is a butcher with no clear plan in mind besides "tear it all down and probably something better will come out". He literally says "everything more is expandable", the brightest idea of the future is "from that moment we can grow". The latest two extra chapters did not do anything to clear that up by the way.

OK, an overexaggeration, but I had not seen a concrete representation of what he wants to do with Praes, it gives an impression that he follows the maxim "win now, make decision later". Malicia put that right, a nation is not a Lego to build whatever you want.

He was always an outside force. He accepted that, even used that, but it is still a fact. It gives him a certain edge, but also a blind spot. It would not be that different from Aisha trying to reform Callow.

In short, I really doubt Amadeus' ability to "fix" Praes. That is the whole reason he got himself a cat in the first place.

Soronel Haetir

Amadeus' end-game is to change the nature of the Praes-Callow relationship and by doing so the root causes for Praes' problems (the very precarious food situation) will be taken care of. That strikes me as much more of a plan than "tear it all down and something better will naturally grow in its place"

TeK

That strikes me as exactly that. "Tear it all down" – existing relationship between Callow and Praes and all institutional madness that stabs Praes in the foot, and "something better will naturally grow in its place" – after you get root of the problem, something good must happen and will happen and it will be better.

It is literally what I said.

Liliet

That was the basics of his plan when he was 20 (or less). He has since acquired far more of it.

TeK

I didn't see it though.

Liliet

I mean, the Legions are fully complete already, the bureaucracy is flourishing, he is making plans for international treaties and deals. That's more of a plan than he had at 20.

ninegardens

I mean... I think he also has plans like "Remove the noble houses monopoly of magical training" and "Change the relationship between Orcs and the Empire."

Given that we literally saw how he ran Callow for 40 years (or however long it was), I think we can see that he has some idea how to run a kingdom. Heck- even then he was engaged in the game of "changing a culture" – a game he won at when rebuilding the legions... then succeeded at reasonably in Callow (in that he created the circumstances for someone such as Cat to exist).

This isn't the recklessness of "burn it down and start again", this is someone who knows how to plan.

TeK

«Remove the noble houses monopoly of magical training»

Take a magical power from nobles.

«Change the relationship between Orcs and the Empire»

Take military power from nobles.

«Make Praes into landholds»

Take agricultural power from nobles.

See a pattern?

"Given that we literally saw how he ran Callow for 40 years (or however long it was), I think we can see that he has some idea how to run a kingdom. Heck- even then he was engaged in the game of «changing a culture» – a game he won at when rebuilding the legions... then succeeded at reasonably in Callow (in that he created the circumstances for someone such as Cat to exist)."

He run it, yes, but, and I don't know how to properly express it. Ok. Hear me out. He "maintained" Callow, and prepared for a Crusade. Maintaining a country in a functional state is a hard task, and he was up to it: obviously, he is an amazing administrator. But all he did is propping up it, not... ruling. I can't put it in correct terms and it annoys me, but, well, he didn't "care" for the future. Callow was not really a functional nation in any way, it wasn't meant to. If Black were to die, it would've collapsed faster than you say "Liesse Rebellion". This is why he needed actual Cat, and why Cat also needs someone else. It is not his role – going forwards. He aquired what he needed, but besides that, he never really made attempts to better the country or the life. Everything was... Optimal. A minimal amount of comfort so that populace would not rise, but that is it.

Frankly, not what I want to see out of my ruler. His lack of empathy is not a good qualification. How the hell can he care for his people, if he can't see them as people?

Liliet

>His lack of empathy is not a good qualification.

Ok so wordpress is really not a good platform for my extensive explanation of 'why Amadeus has a bad case of too much empathy and it's been both making his life difficult and making him forge a moral compass out of fucking Praesi bullshit he was raised on', are you on discord?

Because Amadeus is a very empathetic person and imho every other reading fails to hold up consistently through everything we know about him from his own, Cat's and his friends' POVs.

TeK

"are you on discord?"

I can be. I have some real issues with "Amadeus is an empathetic person". Actually not too many.

I have to think...

Liliet

(You are hereby officially invited to our Discord server) (as well as anyone reading this comment) (<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>)

I'm Liliet#1061 there ^^

I would be glad to continue this discussion :3

Liliet

>OK, an overexaggeration, but I had not seen a concrete representation of what he wants to do with Praes,

We have had bits and pieces of that through the story.

1. The Reforms. Giving greenskins equal political and economical weight, making the Legions an entity independent of the nobility, making a bureacracy independent of the nobility, and both merit-based and egalitarian on who can enter the hierarchy. As far as real world parallels it's making me think of China, though I'll admit I don't know much about the historical system there.

2. Public education – War College, somewhat intertwined with the above point (which is a mark of a well-thought-out plan), has at his will been made accessible even to a Callowan orphan in a choked economically city. He also wanted a mage college, and now wants it in Cardinal. We also know that War College gets scholarship students from random schools around Praes (I don't remember who exactly but one of the characters got there in this way, though it might have been Nilin, slightly undermining the point), and his approach to Callowan orphans was to give them a good education that would allow them to go into basically any trade they wanted.

3. Eliminating hunger, and with the lack of absolute economic need for blood sacrifices, banning those (Catherine has discussed this with him, and he did want to ban them). He also wanted to ban diabolism, but it's unenforceable. Still, he aims to at least phase it out by making it grounds for being expelled from / inadmissible to the Legions. Definitely banning the shit out of demons, the Accords kind of build on his ideas there.

4. Positive sum foreign relationships – something he yelled at Alaya over going back on, even though it seems to have originally been her idea. Stable alliances and no longer a war every time Praes gains strength.

I cannot recall more details than that, but is this really insufficient as a vision for the future?

TeK

“1. The Reforms.”

A way to gain an independent military power to do “the culling”

“2. Public education”

A way to control dangerous elements, and power that lies in them, be it magical one, or narrative one. Also maintaining control over military power since all the officers have to go through Colledge and it is as good as his. Convenient.

3. 3. Eliminating hunger, and with the lack of absolute economic need for blood sacrifices, banning those (Catherine has discussed this with him, and he did want to ban them). He also wanted to ban diabolism, but it's unenforceable.

The bigger the population, the bigger an army it can maintain. Diabolism, in a warfare doctrine he created, allows for too much collateral damage. Plus it is a power source on which a big portion of power of his main enemies is predicated upon. Actually, blood sacrifices, since they are a pervuew of lords and an original reason why they got power to begin with, are also a cornerstone of their powerbase. So, a strike against his enemies, taking away tools he does not rely on anyhow.

"4. Positive sum foreign relationships"

Allies. Still an acquisition of power.

What you mentioned tells nothing of what he wants, those are just progressive steps of acquiring and consolidating a powerbase.

I am biased here, because I do not believe he actually wants just to stick it to the Heavens, but Name can warp who you are, and besides, I dug myself too deep, can't fall back now, gotta play a devil's advocate.

There is a thing that I want to point out though. He possibly killed hundreds of thousands of civilians in Procer through his war. Just like that. Yet people say that Aqua, who killed considerably less, should not be allowed anywhere outside a screaming pit of hell, because she is a murderer.

Liliet

>There is a thing that I want to point out though. He possibly killed hundreds of thousands of civilians in Procer through his war. Just like that. Yet people say that Aqua, who killed considerably less, should not be allowed anywhere outside a screaming pit of hell, because she is a murderer.

The difference between the two of them is... circumstances under which they can be expected to act like that. The threshold that needs to be passed before they do.

For Amadeus, it was "fighting a defensive war against an alliance with a much bigger army, cut off from all his allies and wrecked by personal losses".

For Akua, it was "having this city have population is just so inconvenient for my rise to power".

The reason why Akua cannot be allowed anywhere near ruling is the kind of decision making process she has, of which Second Liesse is a stark illustration. Amadeus has ruled for 40 years, and his atrocities in Procer are a product of desperation.

Mind you, I am speaking from a consequentialist point of view here, because that's how I process these things, but I've found deonological conclusions end to mirror consequentialist ones just with different formulations of reasoning. So mine is: in order to make sure Amadeus does not do that again, you need to open an alternative path and show Praes will not be inevitably destroyed if he doesn't do that again. In order to make sure Akua does not do that again, you need to never let her have unsupervised power over a large amount of civilians ever again.

>What you mentioned tells nothing of what he wants, those are just progressive steps of acquiring and consolidating a powerbase.

I mean this is the point where I naturally go into deeper psychological analysis of what a character reacts to and what forms their emotions and motivations.

For example, Alaya has control issues for entirely understandable reasons. She is also a political nerd, and shares some of Amadeus's "why have this work worse when it can be made to work better" pure fix-it motivation (they'd talked about this back in her tavern days), and there have been hints she also feels genuine attachment to and responsibility for "her wayward realm", but largely her reactions and logic are shaped by the trauma she'd received so long ago. She wants power, because she very badly doesn't want to be powerless.

Sabah was a classic example of True Neutral – attached to her in-group, vague sentiment towards her out-group but not so much it'd override motivations coming from the in-group.

Akua has had, throughout her story, a mixture of motivations based on the sense of duty her mother instilled in her (as an heiress of Wolof, she should seek power and prestige for her line and herself), based on her desire for self-actualization and getting out of her mother's control, and based on the sheer genuine nerdery (as a child, Akua looked in awe at the giant pyramids built for power, and no matter how much Tasia tried to smother that girl, she never truly succeeded)

(also the part where her father genuinely loved sorcery and those were her happiest memories).

What forms Amadeus's emotions and motivations? What does he react to and how does he act in a low-stakes environment? What arguments does he find compelling in a debate? Which parts of his motivations does he feel compelled to explain (to Catherine, his student) and which does he leave unsaid? What does he state as a self-evident axiom? What needles him, what moves him, what do his friends think about him?

I don't remember if I linked this in this conversation yet, but in case I haven't, <https://lilietsblog.tumblr.com/post/182976359475/a-compilation-of-points-about-amadeus-of-the-green#notes>

...

...

Actually, given that I am not playing devil's advocate here and am genuinely explaining full force what I mean and why I think what I do right now, I might as well pull out the recently acquired ammunition.

>Amadeus of the Green Stretch was the son of corpses now buried, born of a land tread by soldiers under different banners with every season. Duni, he was, his skin the pale shame of old defeats that Praes had deemed filth even in name, and never did he forget it. It was not the Tower's promises that whispered in his sleep but the footsteps of his youth, the wheel of unending defeats seen from the side with cold eyes. In indignation he had become squire, and so sharp a blade found it that it slew his rivals and knighted him in black. To the banner he'd raised the disgraces of the Wasteland had flocked, be they green of skin and red of hand, Named hunted from above or every sharp mind and soul of steel that knew contempt but no captain. His was a company of the hungry and the lost, sworn to bleed for those unworthy of that blood. And so Amadeus of the Green Stretch asserted this: Praes is a mould that must be broken.

TeK

Also I am a little tired of "alcoholic and wine cellar" analogy. I think it bears mention that back when the Aqua's Folly happened, she was still arguably a teenager. Indocrinated from the birth no less. And even indocrinated, she already tried to do better than her own mentors. She had time and experience and company to grow and learn. Those are not the same things. By your logic we do need to slaughter every magical line in Praes just so there were no opportunity to summon those nasty-nasty demons again. You see the problem? It's an issue of trust again. Again, what I wanted to point out, is how narratively fitting this whole thing is. Praes and Aqua does not deserve a trust and a second chance, by all accounts, they deserve what Saint had in store for them – Fire and Blood. That is however very [b]Black[/b] way of seeing it.

Shveiran

You are making this about black and white – either Aqua is trusted with the Empress titles, or no one gives Praes a chance to be better ever.

I... fail to see the correlation.

The Diabolist never tried to do better than her predecessors: she tried to do BIGGER, which is not the issue. More impressively summoned demons is not what's needed to say she is a step-up from the Praes of old.

Aqua may very well redeem herself; she may change. But I fail to see how any of the changes she showed, even if assumed genuine, are any indication she is ready to rule a country without falling back to her old habits – which she has abandoned for what, less than two years at the moment? By all means, let's see if she can do better. Perhaps we should use the biggest Evil nation we can bring to the table as the testing block though. Just an idea.

Regardless, the argument is simple: "Trusting all villains, always" is not the only alternative to "trust no Villain, ever".

You can stop in the middle with a "trust SOME Villains, SOMETIMES". Which, you know, is what sensible people do with regards to people all the time.

You trust some of them; and you trust them to a point based on their history and relationships.

I trust my girlfriend a lot, but I don't trust her to correctly build a nuclear reactor – nor do I extend that trust to all girlfriends in the world.

TeK

"You are making this about black and white – either Aqua is trusted with the Empress titles, or no one gives Praes a chance to be better ever."

I do not, and I apologize if I made such an impression. I am saying there are certain parallels between Aqua and Praes. Including the shady history. That is not an argument against working with her. The same goes for Praes. Both have a certain danger of going back the old ways. You may have not noticed, but I have never actually argued that you SHOULD give Aqua the unlimited power of the Dread Emperor. It is really similar for both Praes and Aqua in that regard as well: limited trust with an overseer to ensure no abuse of power happens. It is not me who thinks in black and white.

Again, I pointed out that Aqua is not a bloodthirsty maniac that gets off mass murders as "alcoholic" analogy seem to imply. She is a product of her time and of her culture – as much as Praes is. And just as Praes, it does not actually remove the possibility of cooperation in the future.

Again, I am NOT argue that Aqua SHOULD be Dread Empress, I am arguing that there are narrative similarities between Aqua's character journey and Praesi one. In my mind. I did not see arguments to the contrary.

"The Diabolist never tried to do better than her predecessors"

No she did, she openly acknowledge to herself that Malicia and Black were right about many blunders Praesi had, and opted to evade them, to build something new instead of going the old way, which is clear from her rejection of the path her mother laid out for her.

About going bigger: she was ridiculously outmatched in the strength department. Both Still Water and Demons were things she did out of necessity, not an outright bloodthirstiness. I am not saying those are good, again, don't misread me, I am saying that it is a desperation plus culturally loose standards.

"But I fail to see how any of the changes she showed, even if assumed genuine, are any indication she is ready to rule a country without falling back to her old habits – which she has abandoned for what, less than two years at the moment?"

First of all, you are making an assumption that she will in fact "fall back on her old habits" which is what exactly? And why do you think so? That is what I don't like about that analogy I mentioned: there was no precedent of her actually "falling back on her old habits". It is a presumption. Again, I feel just so nobody misunderstands me again: it's a necessary assumption, because you can't risk with such things. But it leads to my second point: it just parallels again Aqua to Praes. Because in historical terms, as a nation, Praes had abandoned it's "old habits" for what? 40 years, and ended up falling onto them again. Or at least, Malicia fall back. So yeah, parallels.

"Perhaps we should use the biggest Evil nation we can bring to the table as the testing block though."

"You can stop in the middle with a «trust SOME Villains, SOMETIMES». Which, you know, is what sensible people do with regards to people all the time. You trust some of them; and you trust them to a point based on their history and relationships."

And with control and oversight. I never argued against that, did I? How does it happen, that you make all my statements into absolutes, but it is I who thinks in black and white?

Liliet

> Again, I pointed out that Aqua is not a bloodthirsty maniac that gets off mass murders as "alcoholic" analogy seem sto imply.

That's hot how I read that.

One way in which addiction like that manifests itself is simply as a habit. You don't know what else to do, so you do that.

Akua doesn't know any other method of rule than what she'd been taught at Tasia's knee... and she is not interested in rule and administration in the way Amadeus was. She never had passion for the idea of being a Dread Empress, only for becoming one, and even that was more about the journey than the destination (see her thoughts in her POV chapter at the start of Second Liesse). Akua would half ass ruling by falling back on "how it has always been done before", smothering her empathy and budding ideas of 'right thing to do' yet again – unless she had someone to stand over her shoulder and patiently coach her through doing things the right way, which defeats the point of having her be Empress in the first place.

Don't underestimate the soul sucking whirlpool power of "this is literally the only way I know how to do this"

TeK

"patiently coach her through doing things the right way, which defeats the point of having her be Empress in the first place"

Why does it? Amadeus is Nameless, and oooold. Eighty, I believe. Someone gotta step in.

«this is literally the only way I know how to do this»

There was that whole character developement though...

Liliet

>Why does it? Amadeus is Nameless, and oooold. Eighty, I believe. Someone gotta step in.

He is more than sixty, but at least recently he was less than eighty.

And teaching someone from scratch is much easier than trying to excise bad habits, especially when bringing this person into power would be incredibly bad PR for yourself and your allies both.

>There was that whole character developement though...

Character development gives you "I now have a vague inkling that something is wrong with the way I've been doing this", not actual skills / alternative tools.

Agent J

Then you have poor tastes in prospective mates, my friend. I bet she doesn't even know how to make a proper ballista.

ninegardens

>By your logic we do need to slaughter every magical line in Praes just so there were no opportunity to summon those nasty-nasty demons again. You see the problem?

I don't think this is the logic.

We are free to think "We should keep an eye on Praes magical lines", and "A particular individual who has committed mass slaughter does not deserve to be given power over millions of lives" without thinking "Therefore everyone with the potential to summon demons must be put to the sword".

We might even decide "Akua should be allowed to live" without thinking "Akua should have power". Or we might decide "Akua actually DOES deserve to die for her crimes" without also believing that all mages with the POTENTIAL to commit such crimes also deserve death.

We are free to extend PARTIAL trust to Akua and Praes in general without saying "By the way here's a treasury of deranged knowledge and possessed artifacts, please don't do anything evil with them"

Akua's ethics are... context sensitive. Putting her in a the position of ruling a country, where morally questionable acts are likely to be necessary, and expecting her to have good judgement determining bad from good seems foolish.

Cordelia manipulates and summons cthulu and orders assassinations because her back is to the wall. Akua is liable to do those things simply because she was never raised to see them as disagreeable.

Keeping her in a position where her talents are directed by OTHER PEOPLE'S morality is simply a good idea.

Tek

Fine, you arguing against my main point. I just wanted to point out how similar Aqua is to Praes as a whole, and the very similar issues that rise out of handling it. Mu argument to putting Aqua at the Tower begined and ended with "it would be narratatively fitting". Please don't argue against something I did not say. Or if I did say, than hell, it wasn't intentional. Of course giving Aqua power would have all kinds of problems, of course you don't deal in black and white. Like, I NEVER SAID THE TRSUT SHOULD BE ABSOLUTE. Why are you the second person telling me that? I reread my comment, I did not see where I said anything about full and unconditional trust.

"Cordelia manipulates and summons cthulu and orders assassinations because her back is to the wall. Akua is liable to do those things simply because she was never raised to see them as disagreeable."

Uhm, if we are going by what we know, Aqua summoned Ctulchu's and all that jazz because her own back was against the wall. Nevermind when she finally got Liesse flying – she is a cornerstone of nobility's future, as a class, and they were being killed off. She had her back against the wall in a very real sence – from the moment of her birth, I'd wager. I fail to see your argument. She was raised by the mantra "desperate times deserve desperate measures", unless you argue that she wanted to summon demons for the hell of it.

Agent J

"-unless you argue that she wanted to summon demons for the hell of it."

I see what you did there. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

> Akua's ethics are... context sensitive.

What an excellent description. Spot on IMO.

Liliet

OH DEF

Mental Mouse

> Vivienne is all but confirmed to be the next Queen of Callow, right?

That's what Cat's planning, but then, Cat doesn't always get what she wants. There's still our Reluctant General as a backup....

As far as Akua (please, she doesn't even have a water theme!), having her reach the heights of power as Dread Emperor is probably the polar opposite of "redemption".

TeK

Why? Does redemption necessitates hell?

TeK

People argue me here on realpolitik, but miss the big point: having Aqua as Praes stand in and Vivi as Callow one "fits" narratively for me, and this is quite a big argument for actually having her there. I mean it is literally a universe runned by narrative.

Liliet

Yes, but where does that story GO? Like, yeah, it fits, but does it fit in a good way or in a bad way? Some stories need to be deliberately avoided to avoid bad outcomes.

TeK

Well, if Vivi and Aqua can coexist, and she does not stab everyone in the back by the end of this, I give this an even odds of being a good idea.

Truthhut

I started cackling like a madman when I read that last line.

Daniel E

Can we get a formal list of Akua's nicknames? Aside from the 2 mentioned here, the only other I recall is 'bad faith wraith'.

Shveiran

Indrani ahs been dropping them.
You'll need to do it manually through a re-read of Books Four to Five.
Which is always a nice way to enjoy some more Guideverse.

Liliet

Winter Leftovers, Shadehelian are two of my favorites.

heymady

My heart skipped a beat there.

SpeckofStardust

Akua literally cant be the next empress.
For like the exact reason of her fatal flaw, she is to much of a social person, Her friend (that Cat killed) to trusting her known traitorous subordinate with her personal thoughts, to her relationship with her father, to her actively becoming friends with the woe.
She is in her nature someone who fits into the mold around her (as much as she argues otherwise) that she cant change the mold she's in.
She is not the person who can reshape a nation to the degree needed to fix Praes.
Anyone who argues otherwise is missing the parts of her character that haven't changed from the beginning.

Liliet

Yep.

~~Heir of Heart~~

Walrus

Y'all seem to forget that it's still illegal for an undead to reign as Dread Emperor, been that way since Revenant was deposed.

Liliet

Ah but the High Lords have been weakened enough the next Dread Emp doesn't need to care about legitimacy in their eyes.
Malicia and Black have paved the way for Literally Any Bullshit That Comes Next, that's the only reason Amadeus himself is a candidae, considering he's Duni.

Chapter 66: Silvered

"Trust given is a gift, costing only the giver. Trust earned is in balance, worth as much to earner as granter."

– King Edward Alban of Callow, best known for annexing the Kingdom of Liesse

The urge was there to laugh in disbelief, though I didn't. Aisha was deadly serious in her question, and she was one the better-informed officers at the highest rung of the Army of Callow. She had Juniper's ear, working relationships or personal connections with most the Woe and the rest of my closest collaborators. She was, as it happened, one of the few people who knew of the Liesse Accords even if that knowledge was modest. If she could believe that, then others would.

"I do not," I said.

The Staff Tribune nodded in graceful acknowledgement, lovely heart-shaped face touched by the firelight.

"Then this is a mistake," she murmured, discretely glancing at Akua without turning.

I kept any hint of displeasure from showing on my face. Of all my old College companions I'd always had one of the more complex relationships with Aisha Bishara. Her high birth in an old Wasteland line had made it difficult to trust her, at first, and back in the days where Juniper and I had been more frequently at odds her open siding with her friend as made her one of the Hellhounds and not one of 'mine', so to speak. We'd gotten past that, over the months and years, but I'd never hidden my belief that quite a few Wasteland highborn belonged dangling from a rope and that'd always lain between us. Aisha was more careful not to offend, ever stepping lightly around matters she thought our very different origins would make contentious. Frowning now or thinning my lips would have her shuttering immediately, and that was the opposite of what I wanted. I gazed where the Taghreb had flicked the glance, finding Akua effortlessly drawing Masego into what had become a debate over the poetries of the east by mentioning the 'riddling-sorcerers of the Nameless City'. The blind mage let out an amused huff and a began declaiming something in a dialect of Mtethwa I could barely make out a few words from.

"There are lines in Praes that are older than the Sahelians," Aisha Bishara murmured. "Others who have more often climbed the Tower, or through whose veins greater gifts flow. Yet one of that shade's kin ruled Wolof, when the Empire was first founded, and where every other great line of that days has withered and died the Sahelians still thrive."

I rolled my cup against the flat of my palm, eyes hooded as I listened to Aisha in pensive silence.

"That woman right there is of the blood of the original murder, Catherine Foundling," she whispered. "The first iron-sharp treachery. All under the sun have known this since the Tower was first raised, and yet again and again the Sahelians have betrayed through surprise. Because they are charming, my queen. They are beautiful and fascinating and so very useful that certainly it couldn't hurt to bring them into the fold just the once."

Aisha bared the faintest hint of teeth at me, almost like an orc would have.

"They are like ink, that lot," she said. "It only takes one drop in a cup water, and no matter how much you pour from that day on it will never be entirely pure again. And now you have let one of the finest makings of that line into your hearth, Catherine."

Her fingers clenched, her gloves crinkling.

"She'll have half of them charmed by the end of the night," the Staff Tribune clinically said. "The rest uncertain. I expect she could ever turn Juniper's opinion of her around, given long enough."

"You make her sound like a force of nature," I said.

We watched the laughter and warmth unfolding before us, separate from it as if a transparent wall of dread had been slammed down between us.

"She was Named," Aisha simply said. "And she rose high during years where the iron was sharp like rarely before."

An elegantly backhanded compliment sent my way, that. There was a reason I'd more than once mulled stealing the Staff Tribune away from the army and making her my foremost diplomat.

"She remains impressive, even as a shade," I admitted. "And you're not without reason to worry."

"And yet," Aisha said.

"And yet," I agreed.

A heartbeat passed.

"This is indiscreet, and perhaps insolent to ask," Aisha delicately said, "but are you-"

I waved the notion away before she could even finish.

"I am," I said, "Callowan."

I'd come to learn that just as the Wasteland's worst excesses needed to be excised from its flesh, so did Callow's own spiteful inclinations. But in the end, I was more than mind and principle, more than thought. I was flesh, too, and like so many of my people my bones were made of grudge. There were some trespasses that could not be forgiven or forgot. One hundred thousand souls. Some follies were beyond forgiveness even were it wished. Sometimes, tough, forgiveness was not the heart of a story.

"I will have long a price as I can conceive, in due time," I murmured. "Worry not of that."

"You have lingering eyes," Aisha hesitantly said.

"They've lingered on you as well," I amusedly replied. "Shall I make you empress instead, Lady Bishara?"

Her cheeks reddened the slightest bit, which was unexpectedly charming. Ah, if it didn't have terrible idea written all over it... The embarrassment passed, swiftly mastered.

"Rarely has there ever been more poisoned a chalice than the Tower," the dark-eyed woman somberly said. "I would not dare drink of that cup. Yet someone must hold it, and that person cannot be Malicia."

Something hard and cold passed in the cast of her face, at that, whisked away by the noblewoman's mask but not quite quickly enough.

"Agreed," I replied. "And Aisha, about Ratface-"

She curtly shook her head.

"I thank you, Catherine, but I will grieve Hasan in my own way," she said.

Aisha was the only person I'd ever known to call him Hasan instead of Ratface regularly. They'd been lovers, back at the College. A strange pairing, given Ratface's deep hatred of the nobility and Aisha's open pride in her own heritage, but they'd both been incredibly lovely and the intensity of a passion could make up for a lot of differences. They'd parted ways before I met either of them, though Ratface had remained... inclined in the years after. I'd thought Aisha less attached, but now I wondered. Faded affections could find fresh life in other forms, and remain sweet at heart for the good times once shared. I nodded in deference to her grief, for it was greater than mine and it had older claim on the shade of the man who'd died in my service at Malicia's order. Damn her for that, and so many other things.

"It'll be Black, if I have my way," I said.

A moment passed as Aisha mulled over what I'd just said.

"You usually do," she finally said, tone faintly rueful. "It will be a bloodletting that makes the War of Thirteen Tyrants and One pale, if he rises."

"Change will come," I said. "If fought, it will not come gently."

"They'll fight," Aisha tiredly said. "That is our nature, for good or ill."

"It can't be like it was before," I told her. "You know that. Nor should it. We've come too far for that."

"And her?" the lovely tribune said, glancing at Akua. "Where does she stand, in this new world of yours?"

"Nowhere gentle," I said. "Though that will be a choice of her own making."

"Will it?" Aisha said. "I imagine many have thought themselves her captain, in days past. I see none still drawing breath."

"If I were trying to conquer her, I'd fail," I softly said. "I've known that from the start. She has ever been my better at those games."

"And yet," Aisha repeated, the echo almost chiding.

"Always she's had a knack for masks," I said. "More than wearing them she became them, you know. It was why she wielded her Name so well."

"Masks are shed, eventually," Aisha warned.

"What if you didn't want to shed it?" I said. "What if wearing that mask you got all these things that some part of you, deep down, had been craving? Because Sahelians are still humans, Aisha. There are some things you can't train yourself out of no matter how hard you try."

"There are things she will crave deeper still," she said. "For that too was taught. And when the opportunity comes, the same choice that has always been made will be made."

I smiled, and remembered a winding talk had some time ago under morning sun. You have seen the worst of us, she'd said. And through that knowing taken our measure. But there is more, Catherine. She'd seemingly been speaking of her own kind, of the High Lords and Ladies. But there'd been the slightest chink in the mask when she'd spoken of her great-uncle who'd fled to Nicae. If even a Sahelian can have the taste for peace, there is yet something left to be kindled. A little too sharp, a little too brittle. The first hint of the bile she'd vented on Kairos Theodosian the same dawn that's seen the birth of the Ways. And I knew, of course, that she was not beyond such exquisite deception. That she might have been weaving that intricate web around me since the moment she saved my life in the Everdark. But it wouldn't matter, I thought, watching Akua Sahelian letting out a snort of laughter at some pointed comment Indrani had made. It wouldn't matter because she'd want it to be true.

"Be watchful, Aisha," I said. "I will be as well. But that arrow has already been loosed, and I will not gainsay it now."

"May the Gods avert their eyes from it all," she murmured. "You've always had an uncanny way for seeing what others do not, Catherine. I will trust in it once more."

"With open eyes," I smiled.

"Is that not the finest manner of trust?" Aisha smiled back.

She drifted away just as easily as she'd come when there was a lull in the conversation for her to slide into, adding her thread to the weave of it with practiced grace. Sometimes I envied how easily it seemed to come to the highborn around me, the social graces I still struggled with even when I genuinely meant to use them. There was something to be said for training from one's youth, even if the other aspects of nobility held little worth in my eyes. The hours passed smoothly, after that, eased by the wine and food and warmth. Twice more Robber tried to needle Akua into anger and struck only at smoke, until even Pickler looked discomfited on his behalf. He did not try a third time. With the greenskins swiftly moving for second portions of meat and the cask of ale being opened conversation bloomed in every direction, sometimes coming together for virulent debates but just as often staying a chaotic multitude. A warmth had seeped in me that had little to do with the fire or the drink, though I'd partaken of both generously. Still I sensed it immediately when two people passed through the outer wards surrounding the tumulus maybe half a bell before midnight. I wove Night to have a look, and to my surprise found two familiar faces walking up the hill.

Marshal Grem One-Eye, the grizzled old orc who was still thought by many the finest general alive, was carrying two bottles of aragh and from the sounds of it complaining that my father hadn't even offered to carry one – to which Black piously informed him that as a recovering hostage he could not trust himself to carry out such strenuous labour. A few of my people heard the steps before the two came in sight, but there was a beat of surprise when they were fully seen in the firelight.

"Black, Marshal Grem," I greeted them. "Have a seat, it's not like we're lacking room."

The orc Marshal – Black's, not mine – sniffed the air with a bemused look on his craggy face.

"Is that horse I'm smelling?" Grem One-Eye said. "Haven't had a skewer of that in decades. Last time was..."

"Fleeing after that raid on the Wall," Black said, lips twitching. "When those Iarsmai riders went after us."

"Wait, I think I had a Name dream about that back in the day," I said. "When you lot went after the Commander of the Watch?"

"Oh man, I heard about that," Archer enthused. "I mean, no lie, the Lady is terrible at telling stories-"

"No lie indeed," Black said, lips quirking outright.

"- but this one she actually made pretty entertaining," Indrani finished.

"Did she mention the part where the Commander beat Black like a rented mule?" I said. "It was almost embarrassing to see."

"That detail certainly never made it to Court," Akua slyly added.

"A grave exaggeration," Black said, eyeing me from the side. "I was maneuvering her into a killing blow."

"While she was manoeuvring you down a set of stairs, head first," I drily replied.

He slid into a seat not far from me while Grem passed the bottles to a – oh Gods, that was just wrong – blushing Juniper. I'd forgotten she had this uh, intense sort of admiration for Black. She half-glared at me for having the gall to mention that the legendary Carrion Lord had once been thrown down a set of stairs. Gods, I should find a way to pass along that one dream I had where he and Ranger were getting all... bright-eyed at each other. That ought to cure her from this right quick.

"We must have been fleeing on foot for half a day before they caught up," the Marshal of Praes said. "Flat grounds, maybe a bell from the marches proper. Twenty of them, with this big man in mail the ranking officer."

"The cousin to Duchess Kegan's husband, we later learned," Black said.

The old orc grinned.

"The Watch is coming, he said," Marshal Grem recounted. "Soon you will be in longbow range. You cannot escape our sight. Surrender now, or-"

Indrani made a whistling sound, like an arrow loosed, then a fleshy hit.

"So Hye shot him, naturally," Black said. "Right in the throat."

"And Wekesa, still drenched in sweat from the running and looking like a rumpled cat, he leans forward and he says all cool as ice," Grem One-Eye began.

"Guess he didn't see that coming," the two old killers guffawed together.

They chuckled with the ease of two old friends sharing a worn and beloved joke, now thrown around as much for the fondness of the tale as for whatever waning humour it might have once held. I shared a look of secondhand embarrassment with Masego and Indrani. Calamities, huh. They were a great deal less dignified once you'd had a close look at them. Those left, anyway, I thought with a grimace. Sabah I'd mourn for she was worth mourning, but the Warlock I grieved more for how his death had pained and would pain Masego more than anything else. Little about the man had endeared him to me.

"Here, Marshal," Juniper said, passing him a skewer of juicy horse meat.

"Thank you, Marshal," Grem replied, openly amused.

"Sisters take me, let's be done with the titles for the night," I grunted.

"Your Majestic Highreachingness, I must protest," Indrani gravely said. "It would be most improper of your loyal subjects to behave in such a manner. And also us."

"Reaching high shelves is her only weakness, as it happens," Robber drawled.

"Really," I flatly said. "The goblin is going to make height jokes."

"I am a veritable titan, by my people's standards," the Special Tribune shamelessly lied.

"I've seen piles of apples taller than you," I scathingly replied.

"Ah," Robber replied without missing a beat, "but did you see over them?"

That cut a little too close to home so I replied with a gesture more than mildly obscene and a few curses in Taghrebi that had Aisha tittering in amusement before her face suddenly went blank.

Ah, I sadly thought, my own memory prompted by the sight. It'd been the same man who'd taught them to the both of us, then.

"I have a question, Marshal Grem, about your assault on the Wall during the Conquest," Pickler said. "If you don't mind."

"Grem will do, around a fire," the old orc gravelled. "You're Old Wither's daughter, I hear?"

Pickler's face tightened with discomfort as the mention of her mother, the Matron of the High Ridge tribe.

"I am," she said.

"She tried to have my liver ripped out, once," Grem said. "Not even because she disliked me, mind you, she was just trying to insult Ranker by eating an ally's flesh."

"I am," Pickler slowly said, "sorry?"

The grizzled orc quietly laughed.

"Not much like that old horror, are you?" he said, baring teeth. "Ask your question, girl."

Even as Pickler began a long question about the order of battle for siege when attacking the fortresses of the Wall I tuned out the taking and leaned closer to Black.

"You actually here for the company, or the other thing?" I quietly asked.

"I expect the Pilgrim will arrive come midnight," he replied just as quietly. "And if you are to speak of the Wandering Bard, as I expect you will, one whose veracity might be ascertained might be of some use to you."

I felt a sliver of gratefulness at that, though I knew he would bring as many complications as he did uses by being there. Tariq could no longer see through me unless Sve Noc let him, these days, and even if they did let him it would be considered suspect. Black, on the other hands, was no longer even Named. The Peregrine should be able to use his trick without any complications, though I doubted someone like the Grey Pilgrim would find much to approve of in my father. My brow raised, when I caught a detail. I'd never actually told him that the Sisters could ward off the attentions of the Choir of Mercy – and likely an aspect, as I doubted angels would so frequently lend a helping hand even to their apparent favourite.

"Come now," Black smiled, before I could say anything. "Pacts with lesser gods are not so rare as to be unheard of. Wekesa spent many a year trying to mimic through ritual the benefits one gains through such patronage without the drawbacks, though to only middling success."

"It's not quite as clear-cut as that," I said. "We have give and take."

"No doubt," the green-eyed man said. "Besides, considering the trials you've put your soul through over the last few years I doubt there are many takers left."

I gasped.

"Are you making fun of the state of my immortal soul, you perfidious heretic?" I said.

"I suppose I must be a heretic indeed, if the Arch-heretic of the East deems me so," he mused.

Gods but I'd missed insulting the man. There were still so many things left unsaid between us, recriminations still simmering and hard arguments yet to be had, but what had been so deeply wounded in the aftermath of Akua's Folly felt... lighter tonight. Not healed, and perhaps it never would be, but not quite so raw. It helped, I thought, that I had been allowed to feel for my own path so far from him that it was impossible for any part of it to have been his notion. Whatever the reasons the two older men had come, they certainly kept the conversation going. Black eventually went to sit by Masego's side, the two of them conversing quietly, and that I did not approach. The grief they shared went back to long before I'd entered either's life, and I would be an unwelcome interloper if I attempted to be part of it. Vivienne had yet to come, which had me frowning. She would not snub an evening like this out of anger at Akua being here, so it likely meant the Jacks were finding something of us. I'd like for her to be there, regardless, but I couldn't deny that finally getting even a bare bones report about whatever it was the First Prince was dredging out of Lake Artoise would be a relief. As it turned out, though, like so often Black was right.

Mere heartbeats before midnight, the wards shivered as the Grey Pilgrim passed through.

antoninjohn

Cat x Aisha, I could ship that, it would probably turn into a foursome with Juniper and Archer

Liliet

Juniper is too much of a blushy shy disaster tho, which is probably why Cat's staying out of it – wants to be considerate towards her feelings :3

Soronel Haetir

Fun to see how even now Grem and Amadeus are so revered by the greenskins. Of course given how much the Refrms did for them it's no surprise.

Liliet

This dynamic really did deserve a reminder. Hakram is ruthless wrt this, but among greenskins he's a huge exception.

Barthumphries

Black is basically the Abraham Lincoln (and his Emancipation Proclamation) for the orcs. I can see why they revere him.

Soronel Haetir

And also nice to finally have confirmation that Cat intends to sit Black upon the throne.

hakureireimu

Confirmation? We had that since the early part of this Book.

Javvies

Cat's planning on stabbing Akua after Akua's redemption. Hopefully, this will put to rest the nonsense about Dread Empress Akua.

Heh, Juniper hasn't outgrown her crush on Amadeus.

Ah, Tariq is arriving. This will be interesting. Especially with Akua around.

But ... I wonder how he'll take the Wandering Bard revelations.

Gunslinger

I suspect Akua's redemption itself will be the punishment. If she could feel the remorse off a hundred thousand souls

Sparsebeard

Pretty sure it's not stabbing, else it would be the short price.

Javvies

Mmmm, point. A stabbing is quick (usually).

On the other hand ... a straight up stabbing probably isn't actually going to kill Akua at this point. Since, y'know, she's no longer amongst the living, and exists as a materialized soul.

I suspect the death of Akua is more likely to involve feeding her soul to Sve Noc. Or maybe turning her over to one or more Heroes or Named capable of finishing her off without a chance of her coming back.

Javvies

Argh.

I was planning to say that I meant "stabbing Akua" in a more metaphorical sense than a literal sense.

Sparsebeard

Of course, you can't stab a ghost!

Still, my point was that Cat's mention of "long price" had me thinking she probably wouldn't straight up murder her but rather use her for something long term (no idea what though).

Javvies

Eh, Viv had Sovereign of Moonless Nights! Cat swear a binding oath to utterly destroy Akua when her usefulness had ended.

After the Everdark, Cat thought that she wasn't magically compelled by that oath anymore but she still intended to keep it.

So, yeah, murder might not necessarily be the right term, but it's probably reasonably close. After all ... if you torture someone to death, you've still murdered them, no matter how long it took you to get there. Although ... murder probably isn't the right term anyways, because is it really murder if the "victim" isn't alive?

Zggt

I'd say that it would be a clear case of double-murder. Which to be fair, Akua has more than earned

caoimhinh

Oh, ye of little faith! Of course you can stab a ghost! Raphaella, the Valiant Champion, is proof of that XD

All that talk about Cat going "I'm not gonna kill her now, but I'll have long price, I want her to suffer" just has me thinking that she is just stalling for time.

When the time comes for Akua to be completely destroyed, Catherine is likely to be the one to cry, not Akua.

Liliet

...sounds about right tbh

Liliet

...imagine Akua comforting Catherine about it.

Bianary

A shade, technically.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

I believe her redemption will be more in the line of becoming some kind of guardian or sentinel, be it passive or active, bounded to the post.

She might even be in a position analogous (but not same) to Bard* in the post-Accord order.

* If we accept the theory that Bard is some kind of narrative enforcer, That she's bound to her post is beyond doubt.

Author Unknown

The perfect price is one that makes her irrelevant, impotent, and bored.

ninegardens

Pretty sure Cat isn't planning to do anything to Akua.

She's playing a Redemption Arc (much the same as she tried to escape when the Perrigrine offered earlier).

She isn't planning to harm Akua, she's expecting Akua to destroy herself, in some suitably grandious manner.

She's planning for Akua's voluntary sacrifice to earn them all a reprieve at some critical juncture vs DK.

Javvies

...

Did you not just read what Cat was saying and thinking?

I could perhaps see that Akua sacrificing herself against the Dead King's force as part of a redemption story makes sense. But that's not what Cat has planned for Akua – remember, Cat's been planning for Akua and her fate since well before the Dead King came out – since before the Crusade was even declared.

Viv had Sovereign of Moonless Nights! Cat swear a binding oath that Akua and her soul would be utterly destroyed when her usefulness had ended. And we had information in an earlier chapter that while Cat thought she wasn't magically bound by that path anymore, she intended to fulfill it, and Cat has more or less said as much again here.

ninegardens

Yes Javvies. I read:

>"And her?" the lovely tribune said, glancing at Akua.

"Where does she stand, in this new world of yours?"

>"Nowhere gentle," I said. "Though that will be a choice of her own making."

I came to a different interpretation to you. That's fine- I'm sure we'll both see how it pans out in the end.. Please do not assume that people who read things in a different way to you are blind.

Was there any particular passage in the last few chapters that makes you so sure that Cat plans to kill and/or harm Akua directly... as opposed to setting her on a collision course with a story that ends with her destruction?

Javvies

Depending on how you're defining "the last few chapters", I suppose.

After getting out of the Everdark (or, rather, after giving up Winter), Cat had a section of thought about how she believed she was no longer magically compelled to follow the oaths she swore as Sovereign of Moonless Nights, including specifically one that she had sworn at Viv's insistence – to utterly destroy Akua (once her necessary usefulness had ended) – and that while Cat fully intended to keep that oath anyways, she wasn't going to talk about her new lack of magical compulsion to follow it to Viv. That is a paraphrase/summary, but I believe that covers the relevant highlights.

The point is – Cat had to figure out a plan to end Akua back when she first swore that oath, which would have been before the Crusade invaded. Before the prologue of Book 4, during the time skip immediately following Second Liesse. Probably after it was first realized that Cat could make Akua come out of her cloak's collar and talk to her. In other words, way before Cat would have been thinking about the Dead King.

Also, in this Chapter, Cat thinks:

"I was flesh, too, and like so many of my people my bones were made of grudge. There were some trespasses that could not be forgiven or forgot. One hundred thousand souls. Some follies were beyond forgiveness even were it wished. Sometimes, tough, forgiveness was not the heart of a story."

Cat is crafting a story for Akua, sure. But it's not about Forgiveness ... and dying as part of a redemption story usually results in some measure of posthumous forgiveness.

Cat may or may not be planning to end Akua via a story instead of a prepared strike. However, Cat knows full well that while stories can set you up, non story elements can sidestep and overcome the narrative boosts, so I think that even if Cat intends to kill Akua via story, Cat's also going to follow through with means capable of ending Akua without the story backing them or even despite the opposition of the story.

And Cat would have first worked out her plan for Akua likely at least a year before the Dead King was on the horizon.

It's more likely, IMO, that any story Cat wields against Akua will involve purely Callowan and/or Praesi elements. Cat may intend to use Akua to take out Malicia and otherwise help clear the way for Amadeus.

ninegardens

... okay, fair. That's a pretty explicit quote, and it looks like I glazed over it slightly on my previous read, and focused on the quotes about future choices.

I don't necessarily believe that Cat had an explicit plan in mind Pre-battle of the camps (merely a vague "I will end her"), and even if she did, I believe that Cat is perfectly capable of changing her plans as the situation changes.

talenel

Actually, you're objectively incorrect. Forgiveness is not necessary for a story about Redemption. It's the whole conceit of the Choir of Contrition.

You will not be forgiven. You will never be forgiven. And you will always be full of remorse and penitent for your acts, but it will never ever be enough.

ninegardens

I'd say calling someone "objectively incorrect" when we're all trying to interpret a story is maybe a little far. Pretty sure none of us are perfect arbiters of objectively reality here, and given that we be chatting about a story even less so.

I think that Javvies point that "Forgiveness is not part of this story", leans our expected future significantly further from "redemption arc" is a valid one. I don't think it proves that such future developments are impossible, but it does appear to make that storyline LESS probable, in much the same way that the line I quoted earlier probably suggests redemption story slightly more probable.

Javvies

The Choir of Contrition isn't about redemption. It's about Atonement without Redemption – they are admittedly similar and often intertwined concepts, but they aren't always the same thing. And in this case the difference matters.

—

It certainly suggests that a "successful redemption" isn't the plan.

My point there is that if somebody who is on a redemption arc or playing the allied lesser evil type, goes and does a quasi-heroic sacrifice against an overwhelming greater evil, that will often buy them a measure of posthumous forgiveness. You can gain (some) forgiveness in death for (some) things that you couldn't in life ... with the right kind of death. Sometimes, anyways.

It's a clean and neat ending for a story and redemption. It also doesn't fit with Cat wanting the longest price she can get out of Akua.

In light of the comment about Akua being so good at wearing masks that she becomes them ... I think those who suggest that Cat might shape Akua into some sort of long term guardian/teacher have a point. On the other hand, I think it's more likely that Cat is going to shape Akua into someone who genuinely seeks redemption – and perhaps volunteers to become an eternal guardian/teacher type without thinking about it being good for her redemption efforts but because it's the Right Thing to Do, but instead of letting Akua actually take that step, Cat kills her to deny her successful redemption.

That is, I suspect Cat is going to kill Akua before

Akua can redeem herself, but when Akua can see the light at the end of the redemption tunnel.

To use an analogy ... I think Cat has something more in mind along the lines of giving Akua a hand at the top of a climb only to deny her the summit.

Like ... in ASOIAF/GoT, Bran slips climbing the tower, Jaime catches him and pulls him up to safety, only to turn around and shove him back off into open space. Something a bit like that, only decidedly more metaphorical and far less literal.

ninegardens

I just... don't see this happening.

Like... setting her up as a treacherous lieutenant and then punishing her inevitably betrayal? Sure- she'd play that Gag.

And sacrificing her for the greater good.
Sure, maybe.

But going to the effort of redeeming someone, and then murdering a intelligent competent person who you actually trust now, JUST for the spite?
That doesn't seem like Cat's modus operandi. In the past she has been all about "Break what you can not use and use what you can not break."

Hell, even dragging her up before a court case seems more likely.

talenel

I don't know if we're reading the same characters here. While Cat is hard and at times ruthlessly practical, she is honestly not that Callowan. Plus, why the hell should she give in to the baser nature of the Callowan stereotype?

She's been very obviously trying to use people's cultures as impetus for change and make them better. If she can't do the same for her own, she's basically dooming Callow to regressive failure. Because that's what Callow is at the heart of it all. A country steeped in tradition, in the way things are done. It's ironic with the way Cat is, but they have always seemed the most conservative and insular culture on Calernia. And I can't see Cat giving them the example of leaning back into this regressive and foolish mindset.

matesbe

No, that is not Cat. Forget spite, what you suggest is cold, hard cruelty in a way that Cat simply isn't.

You don't kill someone when they're on the verge of becoming a better person. That's just stupid unless you're evil and actually don't want them to be a better person. And while arguments can be made that Cat is the former, she's not so petty as to deny Akua the chance to be better than she currently is. In fact, that's what this entire thing is about.

I suspect Akua will not live to the end of the story, but I don't think her end will be by Cat's hand unless it is a step willingly taken by Akua on her path to redemption.

caoimhinh

Catherine initially said she would only use Akua as a tool, consulting her when dealing with Cordelia, then Cat kept using her more and more until on the way to Keter she let her out permanently.

Initially, Cat said she was going to destroy Akua right when she stopped being useful, then she changed it to "I will destroy Akua when she is a good person, so it hurts her more", but right now? Right now, it seems like Cat has to constantly remind herself that she has to kill Akua, but has already admitted she does not want to. Yet she keeps pushing towards the story of redemption that Akua trapped herself into and making her a good person.

I think Cat will be pained when Akua is finally destroyed; if it happens by Cat's hand, then it will be because the situation forced them, like having to kill Akua to save others.

Note what it says in today's chapter:

"I knew, of course, that she was not beyond such exquisite deception. That she might have been weaving that intricate web around me since the moment she saved my life in the Everdark. But it wouldn't matter, I thought, watching Akua Sahelian letting out a snort of laughter at some pointed comment Indrani had made. It wouldn't matter because she'd want it to be true."

Catherine is putting faith on Akua wanting to be good and becoming good, she is trusting Akua to welcome her destruction as redemption.

Mental Mouse

There's also the point that Akua is now properly a creature of Night, so Sve Noc may have something to say about her fate. On the other hand, they don't seem to have much concern (less than Cat, anyhow) about their creatures killing each other.

Shveiran

My take is that Cat aims to destroy the Diabolist, not Aqua.

By shaping Aqua Sahelina into what she believes is a full person, she will take her vengeance on the Diabolist and punish her the only meaningful way for her actions: by making her feel genuine remorse for what she did. After being defeated, Aqua's remorse for her actions is... abstract; she was not brought up in a culture that considers life sacred, and thus she cannot feel it was wrong. At best she can... understand it from an intellectual point of view.

So Cat aims to change that, because she believes that snuffing her out is insufficient and meaningless.

The story likely ends with a Aqua making an extreme attempt at atonement, which will be the direst act she can conceive... and therefore, far worse than any torture the Queen of Callow could decree on her.

I don't believe this ends with Aqua being forgiven, but rather with her destroying herself of her own free will. Long price, indeed.

Decius

One ending is with Akua reforming and genuinely wanting to seek forgiveness, being sent to the demiplane where most of her victims are and told to seek forgiveness from each of them, and then doing so one by one.

Then, after all of Liesse has forgiven her, show her what the house of Sahelian has become, and give her the chance to redeem them as well. Once she convinces her entire family to reform enough, sterilize all of them. When the last Sahelian dies, then destroy Akua's soul.

Long prices are for small slights. For larger offenses, you have to actually go big.

Shveiran

You had me going until you wrote "sterilize".

Akuabestgurl

I think cat intends for Akua to be bound to the university. And so for the rest of time she will be forced to teach and protect and care.

Spinner335

Arrggg the cliffhangers, curse you you wonderful writer!!!

Andrew Mitchell

1. Good to have confirmation of Cat's intentions for Akua as well as the acknowledgement there is still risk there.
2. Amadeus is as insightful as ever it seems.
3. It's so, so good to have Cat talking with Amadeus again.

"It's not quite as clear-cut as that," I said. "We have give and take."

"No doubt," the green-eyed man said. "Besides, considering the trials you've put your soul through over the last few years I doubt there are many takers left."

I gasped.

"Are you making fun of the state of my immortal soul, you perfidious heretic?" I said.

"I suppose I must be a heretic indeed, if the Arch-heretic of the East deems me so," he mused.

3. I'm looking forward to the chat with the Grey Pilgrim.

Andrew Mitchell

5. And apparently I can't count to four. -_-

Sparsebeard

One bully, two bully, three bully, one bully... that's immoral, don't worry, this lord shall convert you.

Novice

I didn't know Lord Third graces the Guideverse with his presence. I'd love to hear from you the sunset you've seen seventy thousand years ago.

caoimhinh

It is so nice to see I Shall Seal The Heavens' references without it involving fights between shippers of Chu Yuyan and shippers of Xu Qing.

So refreshing~

caoimhinh

It must be the work of an enemy's Stand Demon!

Liliet

Robber slaughtering the fuck out of Cat with short jokes is so glorious. At least THIS person he does know how to get a reaction out of ;u;

And god 'i'd missed insulting the man' is just. so perfect

Raved Thrad

And in the next installment, we discover that Tariq is a terrible drunk.

"Come here, you beautiful green thing," the Pilgrim said, to everyone's consternation. "Come here and let ol' Tariq show you why we call ourselves 'The Dominion.'"

caoimhinh

Lewd~

Matthew

Curse your sudden, but inevitable betrayal!

caoimhinh

This was a really fun chapter, I expect the tone of the conversations is going to become much serious one Pilgrim joins them, though they might go back to drinking happily after the Hero leaves.

I wonder if Tariq sneaked past the Army of Callow to reach the campfire (we have seen that he is capable of that, back in the Peregrine Extra Chapters), since no messenger came up the hill to announce the Pilgrim's arrival to Callow's camp, but rather Cat sensed him crossing the wards on the hill.

Also, he should have brought Roland, every Hero needs to hear what Cat is going to say. It's gonna be interesting to see Tariq defending the Wandering Bard like "but she has always been only supporting Above! She is always around the Heroes!".

Liliet

>I expect the tone of the conversations is going to become much serious one Pilgrim joins them, though they might go back to drinking happily after the Hero leaves.

Oh it'll go back to drinking with jokes BEFORE he leaves, I'm pretty sure. Did you see how well he got on with Indrani? ;u;

(To the point of thinking it was the Black Queen's cunning scheme to send them together so that he'd grow to like her. FUCKING AMAZING THAT ONE, STILL)

caoimhinh

To be honest, I expect Tariq's mood to be soured quite a bit at the news of the Bard also working for Below (and possibly her own agenda unrelated to the Gods). He doesn't think of her as an Intercessor of both sides of Gods to the mortals, but rather as a Heroine, an agent exclusive to Above.

I think he will argue first on her Role being Good overall, but then be surprised and leave the scene to reflect on the new info in privacy (or maybe consulting the Ophanim). So I don't think he will stay and drink with Cat's group until dawn, though he will definitely join the drinking as he arrives, probably there will be some jokes before they get to Intercessor business.

P.S: It would be awesome if the Bard suddenly appeared sitting in the campfire next to them as Catherine finishes her explanation. That would certainly spice up the debate.

Liliet

Oh and Tariq mentioned his Role + his skills lending him a lot of sneakiness in his backstory chapters. Showing up somewhere that he absolutely isn't supposed to be is like half his shtick, we just haven't seen much of it in the present yet.

caoimhinh

Yep. I know he is capable of that, I'm just wondering if he used that trick, as apparently no legionary came up to announce the arrival of the Peregrine, he just showed up crossing the wards.

Though it's interesting that Catherine and Black could predict his arrival so accurately, I mean, Cat simply told Tariq like 3 days ago that they needed to talk, without any date settled, yet they are capable of using Narrative to predict when and where he will arrive to meet them.

That, or Cat sent an invitation to Tariq for the campfire out of screen XD

Liliet

It wasn't 3 days ago. This is the second evening after Third Llesse, and during the first one everyone was exhausted/busy/sleeping that shit off.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Only Erratic could make a satisfying week long cliffhanger out of a campfire cookout.

These last few chapters have been choice.

Liliet

Best arc 12/10

Shveiran

All arcs are best arc XD

Decius

Does the Pligrim's insight work on Akua's shade?

Would the Pilgrim's insight work on the rest of the Wasteland Nobility?

Black wants to kill off the entire nobility because much of it is corrupt and backstabbing; the Empress wants to not kill off the nobility because it's a stabilizing influence. Neither of them could find a balance of deciding who to kill for being disloyal and who to leave in charge.

Grey Pilgrim for Chancellor?

Shveiran

I don't think the problem can be solved by removing lies, honestly.

It's more about judging character, an unwillingness to seek the best for Praes at the expense of one's betterment... or even, the belief that strife and backstabbing ARE what's best for Praes.

I suppose you could put them all in a line and ask "are you going to try and backstab your ruler at some point in the future?" or something along those lines, and execute them based on the answer. It would be a better system than full-on genocide.

That doesn't make it a good system, though, IMO: we would be judging them based on ideas, and ideas change: you may be sparing future agitator, and executing those whose mind could be changed. It has no guarantee of success, and a good deal of collateral damage.

Ebert of Alamans, scholar errant

The Nameless City, far from not having a name (as that name is "The Nameless City"), rather refers to the local legal and social proscription against Named residing or operating within the bounds of its influence. Mobs have been known to spontaneously form and lynch individuals so much as suspected of being Named.

Of course, the fact is that few if any of these poor condemned souls have ever been confirmed as bestowed with such power; the death of Named is rarely of such little note.

For further information on this topic, please seek my treatise, "Cities of the East on Two Denarii a Day: A Traveler's Guide".

TeK

I see what you did there.

WuseMajor

One of the things I find interesting about Cat is that, despite the complaints about being short, when she was Fae and her body was mostly a thing of ice and snow and magic, she learned to make herself grow spikes, regrow limbs, turn to mist...but never did she consider making herself taller or more beautiful.

I wonder if she just didn't think of it or if that would have signaled that she was going full on Fae Queen.

TeK

You forgetting how Names change your opinions to how you think you look like. Cat is short because she wants to be short, even thinks she should be short. Who knows, maybe if it wasn't for her Name interfering, she would've even grown...

Shveiran

Names reflect self-perception, not desires: Squire!Cat was short because she had always been so and therefore believed she was.

Fae!Cat could have changed her appearance, but didn't want to: she didn't like being short or flat, but she was also clinging to her former self as an anchor against Winter: forgoing her appearance was terrifying, not empowering. But she always felt her leg wound was precisely that – a wound, not a part of what she was. Therefore, that she opted to fix. Priestess!Cat has no easy way to alter her appearance on a whim, and thus appears as she always had.

Liliet

Catherine lost her wound back when the Hashmallim resurrected her at Liesse, she didn't need Winter to fix it.

caoimhinh

Actually, there's no consistency on Catherine's leg wound. Nothing says her leg wound was healed by the Hashmalim during her resurrection, and in fact she is shown limping right afterward when she emerges with Akua from the lake. But then the wound is never mentioned again, despite Cat still drinking herbs for the pain and then developing a love for smoking, she is even shown occasionally walking and running without mentioning her leg wound or pain. Then when Catherine breaks the seal of Winter in her heart during her last fight against Akua, she says the Hashmalim had healed her leg, but that turning full Winter had returned her leg wound and she is shown limping again in that chapter. Yet later on afterward the leg wound is forgotten and never mentioned again.

Then we got to her giving Winter to Sve Noc, where she claims she no longer had any leg wound, but becoming mortal again returned her wound, and that's current arc Catherine who still limps because she wants to live with that pain "as a reminder".

Liliet

Oh wow.

Yeah, I'm deciphering that as "Catherine got healed back to full by the Hashmallim, Winter returned the wound when it remade her body from her soul's template anew but the wound went away as soon as Catherine stopped thinking about it for the same reason her heart didn't beat when she slept at the time"

TeK

"she had always been so"

She was fifteen at the moment, I believe.

"Priestess!Cat has no easy way to alter her appearance on a whim"

Really should've prayed about right things. Something like – hey, I did not grow for the last (insert time) years, but I now I would've if I could, can you, maybe, help?

Chapter 67: Starlight

"Without enemy, without backbone."

– Callowan saying

I didn't even have to say anything.

Black had been watching me discreetly ever since midnight's threshold, and a simple nod of acknowledgement did the trick. Unlike me the green-eyed man had no connection to the wards that surrounded the tumulus, but by using me as a tripwire he'd effectively learned of the Peregrine's arrival mere heartbeats after I did. Just because the man had lost his name hardly meant he'd ceased being perceptive – or dangerous. I slowly rose to my feet, hand reach for my yew staff, and watched from the corner of my eye as the former Black Knight drew away from the circle that'd gathered to listen to an old campaign story of Grem One-Eye's. Hakram's eyes found me, silently questioning in the dark, but I shook my head. The fewer people there for those talks the better, for though I trusted Adjutant as I would trust my own hand the Grey Pilgrim had no reason to do the same. I'd not further muddle the waters of what might already be troublesome talks simply for the base comfort of having Hakram at my side. I slipped away, not unseen of my friends but at least unquestioned, and tread between the dark silhouettes of the stones raised by the ancient Mavii. Far above stars hung in the night sky, pale constellations set in ink. Leather boots creaking against the snow I advanced, the edges of the cloak on my back skimming against smooth stone.

Tariq Fleetfoot stood a few feet further down the slope, upright and steady for such an old man. Robes of faded grey fell loosely down his frame, so used as to be halfway to raggedness, and the last wisps of white hair on his head stood out starkly as he gazed up at the stars. He did not have a staff, the gnarled old thing he'd snapped over his knee as the finishing touch to the Twilight Crown. In the days since that he could have easily found another, I knew, yet he had not. It tasted to me of a loss, something surrendered that would never be had again. None who'd given away their crown would ever find a way to fill that void and the lack of a walking stick was the least of it. Black drifted out of the stones a heartbeat after I did, tread quietly as the long coat he wore trailed behind him. Tariq's jaw shifted, as I looked, a tensing so slight I might have missed it were I not already studying him. Wariness, I thought. The Pilgrim recognized Black's footsteps, near silent as they were, and he was wary of the man they belonged to. I knew not what had passed between those two when my teacher was held prisoner, before his soul was mutilated, but the cold spite in the Carrion Lord's eyes and the strain in Tariq's shoulders did not speak to anything pleasant. Still, they were both pragmatic men in their own way. Like it or not they were in the same boat, and neither would be inclined to behave in a way that might just tip it over for all of us.

"Your Majesty," the Pilgrim calmly said. "A beautiful night, isn't it?"

"Iserre has its beauties," I acknowledged.

The old hero half-smiled, then turned to dip his head respectfully.

"I invited myself to an evening of comradery, and for that I apologize," Tariq said.

"You should," Black noted. "I brought liquor, at least. Is your presence meant to be the gift?"

There was a slight pause, then he muttered heroes in a scathing tone. I sent him a warning look, but he was visibly unmoved. A consequence, I grimly thought, of having me try on those when I'd been a great deal less dangerous than I now was.

"Apologies twofold then, Black Queen," the Pilgrim lightly replied. "Yet I believed it wiser to have this conversation away from prying eyes, and before too long had passed."

An opportunity he'd not have again soon, I understood even if he did not spell it out. I was not all that surprised that the Peregrine had somehow slipped past a dozen layers of wards, patrols and watchmen to arrive unseen in the very heart of my camp. He was, after all the, the Grey Pilgrim: appearing sudden and unexpected was his wont, as much a part of his Name as the ashen-coloured robes. But he'd pulled this off because I was apart from the rest of my army, and my watchful patrons. If he'd tried to pull this on the tent where I slept, the Sisters might just have taken offence and good luck trying to keep that quiet.

"You were not unforeseen," I said. "I require no apology."

"Your kindness is appreciated," the old man said. "I received the papers sent by the Lord Adjutant, Queen Catherine. They were... an interesting read."

Well, it wasn't like I'd expected the man to gush, slap me on the back and ask where he had to sign. Had I hoped for that, just a little bit? O Night, yes. I was in no way above easy victories when I could have them, which was tragically infrequent. Fingers tight on the dead yew in my grip, I carefully stepped down the slope until I was standing at the hero's left. Black, never one to allow subtle theatrics to pass him by when they cost nothing, nonchalantly cut through behind me and came to stand at my left. I resisted the urge to roll my eyes, knowing it'd only further entertain him.

"I expect you have questions," I said.

Objections, too, but best get the clarifications out of the way first.

"Those were not the full text," the Pilgrim said.

"The simplified manuscript," I said. "Though no tricks were plied, Peregrine. I did not hide anything I thought might be contentious, only removed the many inkwells' worth of minutiae that the full treaty will need to properly function."

"Function," Tariq repeated, blue eyes crinkling. "Yes, that is the word I was seeking."

He breathed out, mist rising up easily on such a windless night.

"I have issue, as you must have anticipated, with some of the laws you would set," the old man said. "Yet that is not so great a thing, for even if your terms were accepted without amendment I would wager the Liesse Accords being harbinger of more good than not."

The Pilgrim's already-crease face, wrinkled by long years of saving lives and taking them, grew serious.

"And so I must ask, Your Majesty," he said, "what it is you intend as the function of your Accords? Their purpose, for I have glimpsed the lay of your work and it is neither salvation nor abolition."

Oh, that was an ornate way to put it but no less true for that. I'd known from the very moment the thought of the Accords had begun to haunt me that there was only so much I could accomplish through them. It'd be a pretty thing, a treaty that promised a hundred or a thousand years of peace between all who signed it, but that was a fool's dream. Old Terribilis the Second, the canniest of the Old Tyrants in so many ways, had once said that armies were like water: they took the path of least resistance. The line had stuck with me, even more than the rest of the Commentaries, and I'd seen since that the wisdom of it ran deeper than Terribilis had claimed. People, more often than not, took the path of least resistance. Because it was easier, because it was encouraged, because no one liked to struggle or get hurt. If I raised a dam in the way of our own nature – and, like it or not, people had been waging war one each other since the First Dawn – then perhaps it might hold for a time but it would inevitably break. And perhaps wreak greater destruction than before for the containment attempted. I could not change what lay at the heart of mankind, or orcs, or goblins or even the drow for that matter. I was not even sure the Gods could, and even at my most arrogant I'd never claimed to reach those heights. What I could do, though, was create a set of rules. Not too limiting, lest they be bucked, but limiting enough that never again would a city be broken by the strife of Named.

"I told you the first time we ever spoke," I said. "What I cannot break-"

"You will regulate," Tariq softly finished. "I remember. You spoke of your teacher too, that day."

Black looked mildly curious, eyeing us both.

"He cannot conceive of a word where he does not win, you said," the Peregrine reminded me.

And this is not a victory, he left unspoken. I'd known that was going to be one of the harder parts to navigate, though, for some time. That the Accords required trust in more than just me on the side of Below's champions, lest trust in them die when I did. Part of me wondered if my teacher would take as an insult a remark I'd never intended to make it to his ears, though I stood by it still, and I flicked a glance to the side. He did not seem aggrieved, though only a fool would take what could be seen on Amadeus of the Green Stretch's face as the sum of his thoughts.

"Yet I have lost," Black said. "Undeniably so."

I stilled. I'd not expected for him to speak in answer, save perhaps to send the occasional measured barb towards the Peregrine. Indecision warred in my mind, for though the Accords were my creation and I was circumspect of letting my teacher speak to or for them I could not hold them in my arms like some babe in need of soothing. They would grow larger than me, I knew, from the moment they were signed. They must, for if they did not this was no more than some Old Tyrant's madness: though I would have chosen law and treaties rather than an invisible army or fortresses aflight, the doom of it would be just as certain. And so, though it felt like control of this was slipping through my fingers, I kept my mouth shut.

"Have you?" Tariq mildly asked. "You stand free once more, a leader of armies. Aligned with one of the rising stars of our age, shielded from judgement and assured seat and voice when the lay of this war and what will follow is writ. Have you lost, Amadeus of the Green Stretch?"

Part of me was almost offended on my teacher's behalf, for I had seen victories of his making and they had little in common with the stuff of these days. Yet there was another quieter voice in the back of my mind that, while not agreeing with the Pilgrim had said, found it was not senseless. For someone who'd been a severed soul mere days ago, Black had returned to a degree of prominence with almost blinding swiftness. The itch was there to speak up, to intervene, because there was too much riding on this talk and this night for me to feel content in silence. I mastered it with some difficulty, knowing stepping in now might end up disastrous. My teacher had turned to look at the Pilgrim, pale green eyes considering, until he suddenly let out a biting sting of laughter.

"A victory, Peregrine?" he scorned. "This night, this moon, this year? The span of my days I have spent in the service of that searing, fleeting thing that'd even the scales for the smallest of instants and you would claim this to be it?"

The dark-haired man, though those locks now knew white as well, laughed once more. It was a sound like a bag being peremptorily emptied, a cup drunk to the last drop. More will than instinct.

"Those few I love are dropping like flies," Amadeus of the Green Stretch harshly said. "My kindred atop the Tower spirals ever deeper into old follies and the order I have worked my hand to the bone raising has burst like an overripe fruit. The manner of things that have been lost..."

He shook his head, then smiled. Thin and wide and much too sharp, the blade-smile I'd come to know so well.

"These have been calamitous years, Peregrine," the Carrion Lord said. "What gains were had always came at too high a price, and while I will not partake of regret neither will I shy from the truth that not a single of those games proved worth the candle."

"You bleed," Tariq acknowledged. "You rage, frozen and bitter as that poison is. But you are not cowed. You have ruled, but what do you know of rules? Am I to believe you will now put a yoke around your neck out of sentiment?"

The old hero eyed the aging villain with disdain.

"There is only so much of that in you," the Pilgrim said. "And it never bore more than a feather's weight on the scales, Lord of Carrion. I have seen the laws that would be the fabric of the Accords, and I see good in them for even if the children of Above will find their hands bound in some ways it is but a pittance to what it will cost Below's favoured monsters. You will be stripped of manners of terror and brutality in myriad, forced to measure your wickedness and moderate your cruelties. You will be bound by fetters and told at the edge of the blade that ambitions cannot be without restraint. I see nothing, have seen nothing, in you that would take any of this as more than wasted ink."

"It must be a pleasant world to live in, where any that stand opposite of you must be either grasping or grasped," Black smiled. "Either the creature of the Gods Below or their apostle in wickedness – either way, what sin can there be in breaking us?"

He chuckled.

"Well, if I must be wicked to hold regard then wicked I shall be," the Carrion Lord said, eyes coldly glinting. "I'll speak for the crooked and cruel, pilgrim of grey, and give you the answer you demand."

Under starlight the dark-haired man took a dramatic bow, and I could see in the cast of his face that he was relishing this. The chance to speak without measuring every word, considering the consequence on the balance of his Role and Name. To... cut loose, after a lifetime of ironclad control. Praesi, I thought, not entirely without fondness.

"The first conspiracy will bloom," the Carrion Lord said, "before the ink is dry."

My fingers tightened. That was not what I had expected of him. Or wanted. He grinned, a slice of pale bone cutting through the dark.

"We will twist around the spirit of every rule while obeying the letter," the green-eyed man said. "We will lie and cheat and hide our sins, while dragging into light those of our foes and rivals. We will seek to twist the laws as a tool for our ambitions and a sword to slay our enemies. We will hide behind every protection afforded and make red art of the details that save or slay. We will defend our advantages and seek to unmake yours, never once faltering in our callous greed."

The grin went wider still, a madman's grin. A challenge.

"And yet we will uphold the Liesse Accords, you broken old thing, and wage war on any that would unmake them," the Carrion Lord said. "Merciless Gods, you think they tip the scale in your favour? Your entire breed are servants of stillness, shaped from the clay of recoil. You came out victors of the Age of Wonders, but this... Age of Order will be ours body and soul."

"You are mad," the Grey Pilgrim said, tone hushed.

"That may well be," the Carrion Lord laughed, "but am I lying?"

Tariq's face tightened.

"Peace will smother your kind out of existence," the old hero said. "This I know and have seen many a time. Under law you will reach too high and pay the price of vainglory."

"Why now, Tariq Fleetfoot," the Carrion Lord replied with languid amusement, "that rather sounds like a wager."

The Levantine's fingers clenched.

"This could have been a beautiful thing," he said. "The principles of Good made into law, however slightly. You soil this by your very existence."

"I have only ever recognized one sin and one grace," the green-eyed villain replied. "Your whimpering sense of virtue is as dust to me, Peregrine. Choke on it and perish, as you should have decades ago."

Well, this was just lovely. Still it rung close enough to an accord from both sides that I wouldn't be interceding for everybody if I stepped in now. You know, before two of the most powerful people on the fucking face of Calernia started pulling each other's pigtaileds and calling their Gods a lie. Charming stuff all around, though I'd give it to Black that while he might have been a vicious shit about this he'd at least more or less gotten results.

"Glad to see we're all friends now," I said, perfectly willing to keep repeating the sentence louder and louder until objections died out.

Neither of them contradicted me. Well, would you look at that. Maybe they were clever after all.

"I am in agreement with the principle of the Liesse Accords," Tariq tightly said. "Though when talks are had in Salia, I will argue against the articles I believe to be unsound."

"I expected no less," I said.

It was an effort to keep my voice steady, to keep the sheer fucking triumph out of it. Because if Tariq was in agreement with even just the principles of the Accords, then I was pretty sure a majority of living heroes would fall in line. There were probably heroes out there more powerful, but there were none more respected or influential. Getting Below's side of the fence in order would be trickier, but if Black held the Tower and the Tyrant's head ended up on a spike? It could be done. The fucking shape was there, now. It could be done. My excitement ebbed, though, when I remembered this conversation was not yet over. And that what we had to speak about might shake the foundations of the rest, if it went poorly. I hesitated on how to bring it up at all, and to hide the indecision reached for my pipe once more. Black gave me a mildly disapproving look.

"Wakeleaf is an ungainly vice," he said. "One of the few things I ever agreed with Tikoloshe about."

"I've tried that wine you keep bottles of," I replied, stuffing my pipe, "and I'm not getting a lecture on ungainly vices from a man who regularly drinks something that tastes like rat poison. Muddy rat poison."

"The mud makes all the difference," my teacher pleasantly agreed.

I passed my palm over the pipe, black flame bloom amongst the stuffing, and breathed in sharply. Well, indirect talk had never been my strong suit so it was doubtful trying my hand at it now would somehow yield success with the godsdamned Grey Pilgrim of all people. Direct it was, then. I breathed out, let the smoke rise up towards the night sky and took the plunge.

"Pilgrim," I said, "we need to talk about the Wandering Bard."

Except I didn't.

I was, instead, standing to the side of the three people – the Grey Pilgrim, the Black Queen and the Carrion Lord – standing in the starlight and snow as they spoke. I could even see the smoke wafting up from both my mouth and pipe. Shit, I thought.

"Catherine, Catherine, Catherine," a woman's voice said, sounding almost pained. "You were so close but now you're fucking it all up."

I looked at where the voice had come from – to the side, perched atop one of the raised stones, the Wandering Bard was seated. Slender and dark-haired, with blue eyes and a rather attractive face. The accent, though, I had recognized. Alamans.

"Really," I said, "Alamans? What, where there no other bodies left?"

The Bard cocked her head to the side, looking surprised and more than a little amused.

"That is uncanny," she muttered.

Raising a silver flask I'd not seen her grab, she shrugged and took a swallow.

"Right," the Intercessor grinned after wiping her mouth. "So I'd say it's about time we had a little chat, you and I."

tkjarrah

> "Marguerite of Baillons," the Bard replied.
> [Black] snorted.
> "Alamans, truly?" he said. "Were all the other bodies taken?"

From epilogue four.
like father like daughter indeed

Nuke_The_Earth

While this is still at the top, I figure I ought to put a little bit of <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> up in here.

Liliet

Bless u

Stormblessed

Thank you so much for pointing out the reference to the older chapter. I had forgotten that moment so your comment was able to allow me to better enjoy this chapter.

Mental Mouse

You know, it occurs to me that Cat has a newly-vacant gizmo for containing souls, and a couple of dark goddesses handy. The heroes used that very gizmo precisely so they could contain Black without actually killing him... and Bard only teleports when her life is in danger.

Liliet

...it did work for Neshamah.

I doubt cathing Bard will be easy (and I doubt Cat has the gizmo on her right now lmao), but if idk she cooperates XD

Mental Mouse

If Sve Noc can get at wherever they are now (and their priestess is already there), they can bring her stuff (or have Ivah do it).

Liliet

I somehow doubt that'd work out. Doesn't seem narratively appropriate for Bard :3

Princess Ariadne

except bard is kinda sorta the Big Bad (Big Good? the antagonist.) it's not gonna be that easy to beat her

Mental Mouse

And what's the problem with Alamans bodies?

Liliet

That's the best question.

Ebert of Alamans, scholar errant

Far be it from one of my field to inject bias or take offense, but i must admit to being somewhat put out. That aside, on to the subject of the day.

The impalement and presentation of heads on stakes is a practice as ancient as it is barbaric. The first documentation of this practice is found in a pre-Miezan field journal of an unknown officer prosecuting a series of raids on Orc-held territories. This officer notes that their foes would mount the heads of slain opponents on spears or poles and lightly annoint them with oils and minerals, leaving them in the sun for days before tanking them down. The officer indicated that this had a deleterious effect on morale and supposed it to be psychological warfare.

In reality, according to "101 Traditional Orcish Recipes" by Sturn Blackhand, the more plausible explanation is that the Orcish nomads were simply preparing the heads to serve as trail rations.

For more information on the use of display of mutilated bodies to enact political or martial effect, please see my publication, "Two Heads Are Better Than One: Mutilation as a Sociopolitical Tool."

NerfContessa

Hahaha hahaha, you, good man, are a treasure.

Soronel Haetir

Well, fuck.

Aston Whiteman

Time to reset the story.

Again.

Crab Bucket Time!

Liliet

We Shall See

Soronel Haetir

Has she ever been seen to pull this trick before, of pulling people into some in-between space? Certainly she's been seen to just fade into a conversation but I can't recall her doing it and not involvig whoever happens to be around.

Sparsebeard

I mean, we can expect a monster older than the Dead King to have at least a few hidden cards in her sleeves to play can we.

caoimhinh

Not to mention she is someone who works for both sides of the Gods.

caoimhinh

Yeah, she has been pulling more powers out her ass in recent chapters.

When she spoke with Amadeus in Epilogue 4, she apparently made it so everyone was asleep and unable to wake up, or maybe stopped time for everyone except Amadeus to have their conversation.

She was also capable of appearing on Masego's mind to converse with the Dead King's fragment that possessed Hierophant, and was visible to Masego too.

Now she forcefully Astral Projected Catherine while stopping time. She is likely to pull more tricks out of nowhere in future chapters, and since we never really knew her capabilities, it's just gonna be taken as her revealing powers she had but simply never used before.

edrey

also dont forget that the sister are watching over cat soul, that is the worst

konstantinvoncarstein

When speaking with Amadeus, she did nothing. She just could have not been there if one of the heroes would have be able to listen.

caoimhinh

Amadeus was under constant observation, it was just that moment when everyone was asleep.

The Bard explicitly says that “if they were going to wake up, this conversation wouldn’t be happening” and also mentioned taking advantage of Providence. She definitely did something.

TeK

Or she didn’t and it was a genuine luck from Below. She basically came to him with a choice of either running away and going on his evil way, or not. The first thing is what he would’ve done, would she not come, and I am pretty sure is also a thing that Below wanted him to do.

caoimhinh

Then that would mean an intervention by the Gods Below. She appeared on her formal capacity as Intercessor, not as a Heroine, after all. Either way, that would mean a supernatural factor involved.

TeK

No, no, no, a providence does not require an intervention from Above, and Cat’s been saying something along the lines of “we Villains got our providence too, how would I come by Hakram and others otherwise”.

Liliet

Whatever you want to call the mysterious factor that resulted in Black ENTIRELY COINCIDENTALLY coming upon Cat in THE EXACT RIGHT dark alley at THE EXACT MOST DRAMATICALLY APPROPRIATE moment...

Mental Mouse

Not to mention aspects like Hakrams Find.

Fayhem

Thanks for the reminder; I actually don’t think that indicates a direct action, given the wording you’ve cited. I think that indicates something honestly rather scarier. I think Bard is stating – claiming, if you’d prefer to maintain skepticism here – that she was able to read the lay of fate. She didn’t make everyone fall or stay asleep; instead, she was able to appear in exactly the moment or span of time when everyone else in camp would fall or stay asleep naturally. And I would argue that is much, much worse.

For example, it offers some insight on how her various intercessions have mostly escaped wider notice. Imposing sleep is something that can presumably leave traces that a skilled eye could find. Being able to identify and make use of the exact moment when the conditions she wants will be occurring naturally is, on the other hand, completely and entirely traceless. If that's something she can do at will... well, fuck.

Liliet

^^^

caoimhinh

Here's a screenshot from that chapter.

She is ambiguous in her speech, as always, but either way it indicates a supernatural intervention, due to the sheer number of coincidences piled one over the other. Amadeus was under constant observation, and kept asleep by spell except for eating and going to the bathroom, plus any Hero would have been able to wake up easily yet they were all sleeping deeply, the spell that kept Amadeus unconscious failed, and the Heroes won't wake up. That's not normal, nor simple luck, it's Providence A.K.A Divine Intervention that messes with Causality.

All other stuff could be simple luck, but that the Heroes are kept asleep goes beyond it, which is why that's the thing Amadeus points out as the weirdest and most curious thing.

"So, you might be wondering why I'm here," the Bard said.

"I'm rather more curious as to why none of your fellows have awakened," he said. "Their senses should be sharper than that."

"If they were going to wake, I wouldn't be here," Marguerite shrugged.

"Convenient," Amadeus said.

"Eh," she hedged. "I don't need to tell you how tetchy providence can get. Even with loaded dice you have to roll."

"I take it this a visit in your official capacity, then," he said.

"Surprised, are we?" she grinned, revealing slightly crooked teeth.

"It was my theory that you could only work through Named," Amadeus said. "I find it rather horrifying that you are evidently not so restricted."

Ethan Smith

Honestly this is what I assumed

Mental Mouse

> I think Bard is stating – claiming, if you'd prefer to maintain skepticism here – that she was able to read the lay of fate.

She has said as much outright before... iirc "some of us get a look at the script". And it's clear that she gets a lot of milage out of the unlooked-at places and moments – IIRC even one of the heroes was seriously perturbed when she stepped out of his blind spot or suchlike.

At the same time, I suspect putting the guards to sleep for a few moments wouldn't be too hard, as long as it only affected Bard being able to have that conversation.

Liliet

>When she spoke with Amadeus in Epilogue 4, she apparently made it so everyone was asleep and unable to wake up, or maybe stopped time for everyone except Amadeus to have their conversation.

What she SAID was that circumstances aligned so nobody would wake up if she wasn't there, and she was not interfering with that part of the story. Which is slightly more subtle than, , , this, , ,

NerfContessa

OK, now she is infringing on my turf. Get her reading permission for The Plan revoked asap!!

Censa

She didn't put anyone to sleep. She came from "nowhere" and was inserted into the "story" at a convenient moment where the heroes keeping Amadeus captive would not wake up. She implies both that the providence of her "role" is at play, and that there's a chance they could wake up nonetheless. Remember that the bard cannot influence creation directly, or so we've been led to believe.

>"I'm rather more curious as to why none of your fellows have awakened," he said. "Their senses should be sharper than that."

>"If they were going to wake, I wouldn't be here," Marguerite shrugged.

>"Convenient," Amadeus said.

>"Eh," she hedged. "I don't need to tell you how tetchy providence can get. Even with loaded dice you have to roll."

Matthew

It's all the same power. Just as she is the same role in different bodies... she has let's call it, "Voice of the intercessor" which is the ability to have a one on one chat with any character in the story outside of the perception of others.

It will always be a slightly different mechanism because if it was the same it could be broken.

BarthHumphries

She didn't stop time. Catherine can see the smoke wafting up.

caoimhinh

That's the smoke she breathed out right before the Intercessor intervened.

Sparsebeard

Are you sure time stopped? I interpreted it as them still talking and perhaps Bard was puppeting Cat, thus the :

“You were so close but now you’re fucking it all up.”

As in, by mentioning her, Cat was giving Bard the ability to interfere and mess up the talks...

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, it’s not explicitly stated that time’s stopped, so other interpretations are possible. I think we’ll find out next chapter one way or the other.

hakureireimu

I suspect that the Bard always could, and always have been going to the in-between space to spy on other people. The Elves call her the Keeper of Stories, and you need to witness the stories to keep them. So I think that’s how she seems to know everything.

Andrew Mitchell

I read “Keeper of Stories” to mean that she keeps the stories going. But I’ll be the first to admit that could well just be my bias showing because, for a long time, I’ve been saying the Bard’s role is to keep the stories going.

Liliet

No, but Neshamah has done this!

Mental Mouse

She did wander through the climactic battle of Twilight, giving signals to the Pilgrim without anybody else noticing her.

Liliet

She also appeared to Cat and only Cat at the end of the original Swan Song conversation.

Neither of those were an out-of-body experience, but feels close enough to make sense.

roninmuffins

I love this so very much

wirelessgrapes

You can’t talk about the director during the show

JJR

Deadpool says hi, and also he wants a raise.

=P

talene1

It is beautiful how they both see it as a victory. And how they childishly refuse to accept the other's interpretation. It's like two crotchety old men who stubbornly refuse to see from another's perspective.

And that ending was so nice. I hate this cliffhanger though.

"What, where there no other bodies left?"

Should be were not where.

Dainpdf

"It is beautiful how they both see it as a victory."
You mean Black and Pilgrim, or Cat and Bard? XP

Liliet

>It is beautiful how they both see it as a victory. And how they childishly refuse to accept the other's interpretation.

I don't think that's what's happening. Tariq, definitely, but Amadeus is quite literally playing devil's advocate, and explaining why villains would ever get onboard.

Decius

Amadeus is playing his own advocate, and explaining why he would get onboard.

The devils get shafted a little bit by the limitations on summoning devils, but they aren't expected to be signatories any more than the angels are.

mavant

The trouble with kleptomaniacs is they always take things literally.

TeK

You absolute lad!

Liliet

>Amadeus is playing his own advocate, and explaining why he would get onboard.

Y'know except for that literally not being his reason why. His own reasons he actually completely conspicuously leaves out because he's a drama queen who's too proud to admit he's less villainous than Tariq thinks he is

TeK

Amadeus would be playing a devil's advocate, if he did not happen to both agree and be a devil in the question. I mean he is posturing a little about how "well if I were a bad person (which I am obviously not) I would think something like that", we all know what he is about. Cat said he can't conceive a world where he doesn't win. I am pretty sure years of win streak and moral highground as a physical reality did the same to Tariq. They are really quite eerily similar. All Black sees is how new world will help HIM win. All Tariq sees is how new world will help HIM win. Both are missing the entire point. I am pretty sure Amadeus is not playing a devil's advocate, he is just explaining how all his life he was fettered and forced to measure his brutality anyway. But Tariq is not wrong in that the establishment of common code of conduct, coupled some basic degree of restraint will really cut Villains population. Because as you can see from history, there were VASTLY more Villains of a "Not Black" kind. And those would not live under Accords. I think Black had forgotten that he is very much an exception to the rule. If Accords enforced will let only Villains of the kind of Black and Malicia (and Aqua, really) live, it would be massive win for a Good T00.

Liliet

>all his life he was fettered and forced to measure his brutality anyway

Forced? He literally wanted to FORCE EVERYONE ELSE TO. Find me a quote where Amadeus goes "gee I sure wish I could torture some kittens without repercussions". He tried to give a morality-based rebuttal to Catherine's point about his shit in Procer, even (if badly)

>I think Black had forgotten that he is very much an exception to the rule. If Accords enforced will let only Villains of the kind of Black and Malicia (and Aqua, really) live, it would be massive win for a Good T00.

Accords will shift the stories, and numerically the Kairos kind of villain will proliferate to balance the scales.

Oh, it will be a massive win for sanity and prosperity. But that's Black's own point, too. "A government is meant to function".

He hasn't forgotten a thing. His own position on the topic is not "I want this because it will help villains win", although I wouldn't be surprised if he really could come up with enough arguments for that to genuinely hold up the position, his own position on the topic is "I have worked my entire life to make this happen".

Tek

"Forced? He literally wanted to FORCE EVERYONE ELSE TO"

I got an impression that he wanted to do that because they did it wrong, not because there was something wrong with an idea.

Liliet

You think Amadeus views committing atrocities as an end unto itself?

Liliet

oh hey I found a quote

>"It is worse than inconvenient," Black said. "It is flawed. The Wasteland has made a religion out of mutilating itself. We speak of it with pride. Gods, iron sharpens iron? We have grown so enamoured with bleeding our own we have sayings about it. Centuries ago, field sacrifices were a way to fend off starvation. Now they are a staple of our way of life, so deeply ingrained we cling to them given alternative. Alaya, we consistently blunder so badly we need to rely on demons to stay off destruction. We would rather irreparably damage the fabric of Creation than admit we can be wrong. There is nothing holy about our culture, it needs to be ripped out root and stem as matter of bare survival. Forty years I have been trying to prove success can be achieved without utter raving madness

Sure does strike me as him seeing something wrong with the idea(s) o.o

Sparsebeard

I like how Praes' ways can pretty much serve as a metaphor for the "American" way of life (by which I mean the culture of consumption taken to the extreme, for exemple cars, over-packaging, one-use consumables, meat, etc., no offence meant to americans as this is also the goal of much of humanity outside the USA).

I mean, for exemple :

Centuries [Decades] ago, field sacrifices [coal] were a way to fend off starvation. Now they are a staple of our way of life, so deeply ingrained we cling to them given alternative.

Mental Mouse

> All Black sees is how new world will help HIM win. All Tariq sees is how new world will help HIM win.

And thus they both demonstrate why both sides will sign the accords.

> the establishment of common code of conduct, coupled some basic degree of restraint will really cut Villains population.

And that's why there are so few evil people prospering in our own world, with its national laws, WMD treaties, and no capacity to summon devils. /s 😊 Seriously, Amadeus is dead right – villains will work with whatever structure they're given. Just look how our world's bullies generally know how to work the rules... and they luurve Zero Tolerance regimes, which let them set up their victims for punishment with no discretion allowed to the authorities.

Liliet

Yeeeeep.

Javvies

Wait. What the fuck.

...

Dammit. Wandering Bard strikes again, changing the fucking rules on everybody.

—

Progress towards the Accords? At least some. Hopefully, it'll survive the Intercessor's interference.

Dainpdf

Bard being able to take people aside does help understand how she gets so much chessmastering done.

antoninjohn

Speak now and have her shut up again

konstantinvoncarstein

I think Amadeus underestimate the side of Good. They can learn, and will just adapt to this Age of Order.

And by the way,

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Dainpdf

Whuh? Amadeus was the one arguing Evil would adapt to Order. Tariq's argument was that Order was their turf to begin with.

konstantinvoncarstein

You're right, I read a bit too fast.

caoimhinh

Amadeus knows that lawyers are Evil, hahaha.

"We will twist around the spirit of every rule while obeying the letter."

That sounds about right, the new generation of Villains will be pragmatic, and fight by the way Black taught Catherine in Book 1: Win despite the rules.

The Heroes, on the other hand, are more likely to be compelled to act on the spirit of the law, and think about the good of the people, what is just, and what is right. It's exceptions like Pilgrim and Saint who are capable of becoming well-intentioned extremists (like Tariq killing with a plague a whole town to hunt down Black, or Laurence thinking a Crusade without qualms that burns down Procer is the solution for erasing the corruption) and those acts of extremism are explicitly banned by the Accords.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, the spirit of the law is more important. But if Villains can change, why not Heroes too? They could use Pragmatic Heroism, like the Lone Swordsman.

Another solution would be an increase in the number of oracular Heroes, would could give an enormous boost to the Good nations and act indirectly.

laguz24

Lone swordsman, pragmatic heroism? no thanks. He was the epitome of extremism and stupid good.

konstantinvoncarstein

He was extremist and an bad person, but he used means not traditionally associated with Good. So we know Heroes can adapt and ignore the spirit of the law for the Greater Good.

laguz24

You mean lesser evil, and the extremism and deviation from heroism actually hampered his role. For example, the thief told him that if he kept on acting like a jerk he would get a fate befitting of one, contrition does not give out omniscient morality licenses.

caoimhinh

It's due to their nature.

A Hero will do what's right, not what is lawful. Like an activist making a protest, or a Superhero acting as vigilante to catch criminals that the cops won't.

A Villain will pursue their own goal, manipulating the laws for it. Like a politician pushing a law that oppresses people or benefits only a certain sector, or an ambitious businessman doing cruel but legal things, like cutting down an area of forest to build stuff there.

A Villain would refuse refugees at the border and excuse himself in the laws saying he is in no obligation to help, while a Hero would open the border to help the people that are in need, even if the laws said otherwise.

Catherine is reflecting on such things in this chapter, one can't change the nature of what lies in the core of people, but can set a scenario for it, a set of rules for that nature to manifest without it going overboard and having two groups of Named nuking it out and taking cities with them.

William was not a Pragmatic Hero, he was an Anti-hero and not very pragmatic at all. Besides, he was xenophobic, racist, murder-happy and obsessed with both vengeance and penitence. William is the kind of Named that would be put down by the new generation post-Accords.

It is true that Heroic Named will emerge that will be capable of using the laws to their favor as Villainous Named will do, but those will be a rarer breed.

sengachi

And Catherine is just like "so long as the letter of the law is 'don't fucking summon demons' and no one is summoning demons, I will be a-okay with whichever side adapts better".

caoimhinh

Indeed. She is not one who cares about Above and Below, after all. What she cares is about the people, she wouldn't care whether the leader of a nation is Hero or Villain, just that they take care of the nation and don't fuck up the rest.

That's the entire reasoning that led her to join the Legions of Terror in the first place: even if they were the Villain side, they were the ones that offered a chance for a better Callow without furthering the bloodshed beyond the point it had already reached.

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

KageLupus

The best part is, someone is still going to try to summon a demon. The Bad Guys are not going to want to just give up on their magical nukes, and someone is going to be arrogant enough to think that they can summon a demon and keep it hidden from everyone else until they need it.

But, under the Liesse Accords, everyone is going to have a reason to root out and expose people breaking the rules. Heroes because that is what they do, and Villains because it is an easy way to undermine your enemies. I guarantee the first time someone gets caught summoning a demon or breaking one of the other Big Rules under the Accords, it is going to be another Villain that narcs on them.

Black's whole argument here is that team Below will use the Accords as a way to scheme against each other, and therefore will self-police instead of all of them just ignoring the rules. Smart Villains will work inside of the law, and will not hesitate to use it to call down angry Heroes on their enemies if they can. And since most Villains are going to be arrogant enough to think they can get away with bending the rules because they are clever, more of them than not will want to stick to the Accords so they can use them.

It is honestly a pretty beautiful system, since it gives enough people on both sides of the coin a reason to want to join and enforce it.

Liliet

>But, under the Liesse Accords, everyone is going to have a reason to root out and expose people breaking the rules. Heroes because that is what they do, and Villains because it is an easy way to undermine your enemies. I guarantee the first time someone gets caught summoning a demon or breaking one of the other Big Rules under the Accords, it is going to be another Villain that narcs on them.

YES.

>Black's whole argument here is that team Below will use the Accords as a way to scheme against each other, and therefore will self-police instead of all of them just ignoring the rules. Smart Villains will work inside of the law, and will not hesitate to use it to call down angry Heroes on their enemies if they can. And since most Villains are going to be arrogant enough to think they can get away with bending the rules because they are clever, more of them than not will want to stick to the Accords so they can use them.

>It is honestly a pretty beautiful system, since it gives enough people on both sides of the coin a reason to want to join and enforce it.

Yep.

And it sure answered the more meta question of 'would Accords work with villains' but absolutely didnt answer the immediate question of 'why are you, personally, working on this'

Hellspirit

Damn you Friday cliff!!

But damn this chapter had lot of substance for little settling. Definitely the kind of of chapter that I'm going to need to reread a few times ^^

caoimhinh

Curse this sudden but inevitable Cliffhanger!

Who are we kidding? This kind of stuff is what spices up a web serial~ Hahahahahaha.

Curse your sudden

But inevitable ~~betrayal~~

Cliffhanger!

Andrew Mitchell

How do you do that?

caoimhinh

Thank you~

I just add the direct link to the image on Imgur. WordPress turns that into a miniature of the image, and clicking on the image sends you to the full size of it.

Really convenient, I'm fairly sure WordPress didn't do that before, maybe it's a recent update?

Andrew Mitchell

Cool. I think I might get in on the action. 😊

WuseMajor

If they weren't so inherently dismissive of each other, if they could actually sit down and explain their points of view, if they could actually listen, I suspect that Amadeus and Tariq could develop a level of grudging respect for each other. But I don't think they're capable of it.

So, is this where you're going to explain that you've been training a successor, Bard?

Oshi

They have plenty of respect for each other. It doesn't mean they don't hate each other.

Decius

Agreeing to the Accords doesn't require not hating each other. Following the Accords doesn't require not hating each other.

None of Pilgrim's or Black's goals are even slightly inconvenienced by them hating each other- while they might both personally WANT to kill the other (again), they both recognize that doing so right now would be counterproductive to their actual goals.

Liliet

Caterine's goals are inconvenienced by Tariq not trusting personally Amadeus, though.

Liliet

More like Tariq needs to sit down and listen to Amadeus explaining his point of view.

And Amadeus needs to stop being a pissy 5 year old and actually explain his point of view even if it makes him look better (he won't)

mavant

Did you mean bitter?

Liliet

No, I mean better.

He would have to construct an argument along the lines of "actually I don't WANT to summon eldritch monstrocities and commit atrocities" and that is, y'know, far too close to 'trying to justify himself' for him to not be too proud to do so.

caoimhinh

At some point, those two are gonna have to sit down, share some bad liquor and have a long and heated but honest debate like the old philosophers of yore.

Then they can go back to continue hating each other, but at least with more understanding of each other.

Liliet

Ah, but for that, Amadeus has to be willing to defend his point of view and present himself in better light.

I'd say 'pigs will fly first' but pigs HAVE flown in Guide, so , , , MAYBE???

laguz24

No, I think by mentioning the wandering bard it gives her the power to do this by making her plot-relevant and here is where she throws her spanner in the works.

edrey

so the bard is more powerfull than angels and lesser gods to just take cat from her body without anyone noticing? especially the sisters. well that is scary, what you would expect of the equal of the dead king

caoimhinh

Probably she has access to some advantage due to working for both sides of the Gods.

The good thing is that she apparently can't hurt others directly, or at least that has been the pattern so far, she could just be restraining herself and actually capable of fighting.

mavant

I think this is just "specific trumps general" in play. You don't have to be more powerful, just more specialized. I don't know the name of the tvtropes page for that but I'm sure there must be one.

Liliet

This, agreed.

mavant

Followup: Apparently the legal term for this is 'Lex specialis'.

caoimhinh

Ah, Tariq, that short-sightedness is why Amadeus disdains you so much. Once again we are shown that the old Heroes didn't even turn their gaze towards Callow until Akua's Folly and they were summoned for the Tenth Crusade (which Catherine already reprimanded Pilgrim about). If he had paid attention and knew Praes and Callow situation of the last couple of decades, he would know why Amadeus laughs.

All one has to do is look back at the last decades of Praes and one will see that it already operates without "Below's favoured monsters". Praes was be stripped of manners of terror and brutality in myriad by Amadeus (and Alaya too), who forced the Legions of Terror to measure their wickedness and moderate cruelties. The current Legions are no rapist, sackers nor blind hordes of killers, they are soldiers that obey laws and codes of regulations with strict discipline. Praes stopped using Demons since Amadeus rose, the whole reason the Conquest happened was because they left behind the old methods of monsters, wickedness and senseless cruelty.

That's why Amadeus now laughs at Tariq thinking Villains will be weakened under the Accords' laws. He is living proof that that is the real way to lasting victory. Pragmatic Villains fighting wars in the way Black and Cat have are gonna be kicking the Heroes' collective ass.

edrey

that because he doesn't have the knowledge beyond his little stories, the Yan tei should be beyond his understanding, ruled by heroes and villains at the same time

konstantinvoncarstein

The Accords gives an edge to the side of Good, because so they don't have to worry about flying fortresses or zombie plagues. Now that the danger comes from another direction (tactics and strategy), they just have to adapt their methods and use their resources accordingly.

Pragmatic villainy allows Villains to win only if they are more clever than the opposing side.

Liliet

Honestly, I don't think the balance will tilt either way, because the balance was ALWAYS enforced by narrative luck. If heroes get less of an object level disadvantage they'll just start getting less providence to make up for it.

Shveiran

That's a clever read, and you may be right. It never occurred to me that this was the cause of the heroes' luck, but it is possible... I'm not sure that's how it works, though. Maybe that's something more linked to Above

Liliet

Either way, Black not committing atrocities in Callow actually really did lead to him having the upper hand for 20 years. Providence is clearly proportional to how bad things are without it

Decius

Flying fortresses and zombie plagues aren't a weakness of Good.

Every. Single. Attempt. Failed.

Flying fortresses, zombie plagues, and the like are a weakness of Evil, in that they always create a BandOfFiveHeroes which will defeat them, and the BigBad ends up being the person who uses them.

Shveiran

Long term, which is how Cat and Black thinks, yes.

From the point of view of heroes and, you know, people, Villains get to do all this crazy stuff that allows them to interact with the world and change it large scale and also cause massive destruction.

It's easy to see why Cat and Black don't mind giving up the flying fortresses and the zombie plagues, but... it's not hard to see why the Good guys would be quite happy to see them go, either.

Liliet

It's almost like deescalation is a move that benefits everyone.

S h o c k i n g h o w t h a t w o r k s (-glares at Pilgrim for not looking in that direction-)

shieldredblog

You're assuming Good cares about mortal intelligence and power beyond controlling and limiting it. A very common theme of Good is stripping away power, not giving it. Named aside. Like how most Good nations limit sorcery and not just the harmful stuff. Procer bans magical healing and they are far from the most fanatical followers of Good.

Villains accuse Good of being stiff and stagnant for good reason. It is actively opposed to change or improvement, even the benign kind. Good reacts to Evil with violence and sometimes saves lives, it doesn't actually do much good for people. Heroes that change the world for the better instead of just 'saving it' or healing it are basically non-existent.

On the opposite side of the coin, as mad as the Highlords are, they have managed to gain their people decades of natural lifespan and a ridiculous percentage of 'gifted'. Things Good would never ever let their followers have. Inventor and mage Names are both the providence of Below.

Night is about improving, becoming stronger and more skilled. Light is about enforcing the existing order, it heals and weakens.

Praes has been wasting their talents on attempted conquests. A sane and peaceful Praes is much scarier. Malicia knows this.

TeK

"Like how most Good nations limit sorcery"

Like how? Procer just had them lose in a power struggle and just being Jaquinites in general. Ashur suffered from a terrible case of overspecialising. Levant is weird in every way already, plus I am pretty sure being a mage and not a Binder is a disrespect for the Honored Ancestors.

"Procer bans magical healing"

That's just greed, I am afraid Gods don't give a duck.

"Villains accuse Good of being stiff and stagnant for good reason."

I'd argue that. It is also the case of "but if we could experiment on people, we would move science so MUCH FASTER". The problem is that extremes suck. Always. Accords attempt to tone them down.

"it doesn't actually do much good for people. Heroes that change the world for the better instead of just 'saving it' or healing it are basically non-existent."

True. You will find Villains doing same as even more non-existent. That is not, in fact, a coincidence.

"On the opposite side of the coin, as mad as the Highlords are, they have managed to gain their people decades of natural lifespan and a ridiculous percentage of 'gifted'."

And also they managed to make their agroculture run on human sacrifice. Good stuff all around. I am sure they don't sacrifice Highborn though. And I mean, not like eugenics is, dunno, inhumane. I wonder why noone tries it though... Makes you think.

"Inventor and mage Names are both the providence of Below."

First is a baseless speculation, second is an outright lie.

"Night is about improving, becoming stronger and more skilled."

laughs in drow

"Praes has been wasting their talents on attempted conquests."

It has. And it kept them weak. While Good tried to fight the symptoms instead of the problems. And it kept them weak.

I have no idea what you trying to say there. Good being stiff and judgemental is the same as Evil being mad and self-destructive. One is forbidding science in a fear of making an atom bomb, another is jury-rigging one and blowing it in your backyard for funsies. You will notice that neither i a very productive way of living. That is not, in fact, a coincidence. Just a different way to keep people in check. A game where the only way to win, is not to play, but you can't win if you don't play. Ingenious.

But make no fucking mistake. Evil is not good.

shieldredblog

I wasn't trying to compare the two from a moral standpoint. I got a little off topic but the point was a peaceful world with rules of behavior on named benefits Evil societies far more than Good ones because it would restrain their worst impulses, protect them from (some) meddling kids and allow them to advance science and sorcery more smoothly. They are by nature more competitive and driven. They adapt and grow naturally where Good does not.

TeK

"They are by nature more competitive and driven."

laughs in Chantant

Liliet

>You're assuming Good cares about mortal intelligence and power beyond controlling and limiting it.

Huh. Actually, this is a topic that should probaby be discussed more: what do you think is the point of the wager? Like, what is it they are actually betting ABOUT?

>Like how most Good nations limit sorcery and not just the harmful stuff. Procer bans magical healing and they are far from the most fanatical followers of Good.

...source????

laguz24

I do agree, and that is one of the reasons I have problems with the white knight. He got his name through the failures of mortal justice and he leaves it alone. He does not try to change anything or do anything to make things better for people like his mother. In fact, he helps it continue via protecting the systems from crucibles that force change.

Liliet

>he helps it continue via protecting the systems from crucibles that force change.

What crucibles that force change?

Your daily reminder that absolutely no-one outside of Praes has any clue about what Amadeus has been doing with its internal politics and economic structure, and from the point of view of every single outsider he's just classic villain #194 Now With Some More Competence.

We will have to see Hanno's reaction to the Accords, first 😊

Mental Mouse

> We will have to see Hanno's reaction to the Accords, first 😊

He will not judge them either. 😊

ninegardens

He will no judge them... but if they put restrictions on what he can do, is this going to be a problem for him (or the Choir he represents).

Come to think of it... what are the rules regarding Angelic advice/patronage? You can't drop a Angelic mindbomb, but do the accords Forbid Hanno and Tariq getting Angelic feedback...

I feel like this was commented on... should check it out.

Mental Mouse

Getting advice isn't a WMD-level problem!

No more problematic than villainous scrying or divinatory/providential aspects like Hakram's Find.

Liliet

I think there's a bit more to it, too.

>"It must be a pleasant world to live in, where any that stand opposite of you must be either grasping or grasped," Black smiled. "Either the creature of the Gods Below or their apostle in wickedness – either way, what sin can there be in breaking us?”

Yes, then Amadeus proceeds to make the point of the wager villains will make on this.

But first? First he’s bitter, that Tariq is unwilling or unable to see the true victory that he is after.

(You could have explained, Amadeus. But you didn’t and you never will because you’re proud and you’re bitter and you won’t)

Shveiran

(also, because he doesn’t believe anyone would listen and based on what we have seen so far I’M NOT SURE HE’S WRONG; that may change in the future, sure, but the tricky part of the future is that it hasn’t happened yet.)

Liliet

HE IS TALKING TO A TRUTHTELLER

Liliet

Like, yes, for a truthteller Tariq is an incredible dumbass and incredibly awful at parsing implications of what he sees.

You know how you get around that? You say clear, unambiguous, literal truth, plainly, explicitly and at length, and have him verify that everything you say is exactly correct.

It’s not like Amadeus doesn’t know how to work truthtelling to his advantage!..

caoimhinh

That’s the problem with Tariq, he won’t consider that truth as being correct, just “this is what you believe”. That has been his way of reacting to those uncomfortable truths ALL THE TIME, ever since Catherine first met him and told him that she would open passage to Praes if that’s what the Crusade was after, or when she told him that Amadeus was a reasonable person that would listen to offers and proposals of change for the betterment of Praes.

He said that too, when Catherine first told him that the Bard is also a servant of Below “I’m sure it seems that way to you but...”

And in this chapter, when Amadeus told him that Evil would obey the Accords and actually benefit from it, Tariq refuses to believe it, and when Amadeus further elaborates, Tariq's response is calling him a madman.

We can't forget that despite everything, Tariq is a religious fanatic.

His creed and calling may be to the alleviation of suffering and pulling from that angle can get him to act in many ways, but he still stubbornly refuses to accept truths that go against his worldview, even if the Angels tell him that the person speaking is not lying, Tariq will just go "you just think this is true, but that doesn't mean it's actually true"

Liliet

>That's the problem with Tariq, he won't consider that truth as being correct, just "this is what you believe".

He was asking about Amadeus's motivations. That is what I am saying Amadeus COULD and SHOULD have explained, BUT DIDN'T, because he is a DISASTER. When Amadeus goes on an impassioned speech, everyone tends to believe him even without truthtelling, and body does he have things to say about old-school villainy and collateral damage...

...but of course he will not say them in a way targeted to make a hero's opinion of him higher. Never!

Andrew Mitchell

> because he is a DISASTER

TRUTH!

Mental Mouse

> We can't forget that despite everything, Tariq is a religious fanatic.

Also, an 80-year old man who has been very successful doing this his way. Unsurprising that he's not terribly flexible.

Shveiran

Being a truthteller doesn't make someone willing to listen.

The problem is, if enough distrust is thrown around, the "Saint" argument is impossible to disprove. You can always find a way to twist someone's words and assume the worst of them... or assume you didn't find a way because they are very clever, but they still have a vicious objective.

I mean, really, I'm not sure their previous chat even counted; this may be the first instance where an honest discussion between the two is possible, and I'm not totally positive Tariq is ready to listen still.

Could Amadeus be more proactive? Sure, no arguments there. I'm just saying... there is a point where the opposition is too much to overcome with honest proactivity. That's how we got the Keter arch, and though Winter may have played a part in the way she chose out of it, the corner Cat was backed in by Tariq and Cordelia was very real. And they are the reasonable ones!

Liliet

>or assume you didn't find a way because they are very clever, but they still have a vicious objective.

His Aspect literally exists for the purpose of cutting through that.

caoimhinh

He wasn't bitter that Tariq couldn't see the victory Amadeus is after, he was bitter at the Hero's attitude of self-righteousness. That paragraph was a call to the Heroes' pretense that they can do anything they want because they are the Good Guys, the pretense that the world is black & white, and the ignorance of thinking that all Villains are the same.

Amadeus has twice explained things to Tariq, both on the reactive nature of Narrative and Heroics, and how being Villain and Hero does not determine someone's actions. But Tariq still refuses to accept it, because those are uncomfortable and painful truths, a hard pill to swallow.

Liliet

Literally the same thing.

Only, y'know, general vs specific.

Dainpdf

Bit of an odd point: they're both arguing their side would keep to the rules... because they would be winning. This doesn't really support the stability of the Accords, because both seem to be saying that if their side does start to lose they would drop the Accords like a hot potato.

caoimhinh

Not exactly.

Tariq claims that Villains won't abide by the Accords, that whenever they try to obey laws they grow discontent and break the rules. However, he believes that if the Accords were to be obeyed then the Heroes would still win, as it severely limits the Villains' side, far more than it limits the Heroes' side.

Amadeus, on the other hand, is happy with the Accords because they regulate Villany and force them to be pragmatic, and he has been the greatest example of that as a winning strategy for decades. So he laughs with disdain at Tariq, because Pilgrim has apparently not been paying attention to the way Amadeus and Catherine win their battles.

Decius

Tariq correctly identifies that there will be Villains who break the rules. What Tariq does not say he sees is that there will be many Villains who follow the rules and will be happy to use that rulebreaking as a reason to kill those Villains and take their stuff, with the full assistance of the heroes who also follow the Accords.

There will also be Heroes who ignore the rules. The same Villains who follow the rules will get assistance from the Heroes who follow the rules to hunt down the chaotic Heroes, kill them, and take their stuff.

Having a primary behavior of "If I can get away with it, kill people and take their stuff" is not something a Good person can have, and so that provides a benefit to Evil Named who follow the Accords.

Oversimplified, I know, but also reduced to archetypes.

Liliet

And Tariq is just a dumbass.

Cicero

At first that would be the case. But as time goes on, and no one remembers any other way of doing things, there will be some stability lent merely by the weight of tradition.

Of course, every once in awhile a villain or hero will arise that see that breaking the rules could gain them greater victory, but will they be able to persuade enough of the other heroes or villains to believe the same?

If someone ends up breaking the accords it will be the heroes, because the villains will be too difficult to unify. Yet the very nature of heroism makes rule breaking difficult in the first place. If it happens it will be under the banner of an anti-hero... and that might empower villains as well.

Dainpdf

Sure, but that is not what they are saying.

IDKWhoitis

If Kairos is allowed to lay a single filthy mitt on the Accords, he can assure a great deal of tomfuckery down the line for champions of Below. With very precisely worded vague laws, to allow for some creative reinterpretations down the line.

Ex. "While The Accords prohibit the usage of Class IV and above devils in mortal conflict, it does not specifically prohibit using Class IV and above devils to combat other Class IV devils that happen to be in the nearby vicinity. Since entities on both sides are technically immortal, although what happened to that city caught in the middle is a great shame, this case is not subject to protections under § 66 of Devil Usage, Subsection C, clause i."

I would imagine Hierarch would be a good Supreme Court Judge, he is fairly impartial, and his belief in the power of law is strong enough to make reality scream in agony at the twisting. He also seems to have a fairly decent understanding of laws, systems, and the roles of government.

konstantinvoncarstein

Catherine, Tariq and Cordelia will be watching the text like hawks, ready to prevent such loopholes to be created. And Kairos would be alone against 4.

IDKWhoitis

You forget Black and Hierarch will/may be aiding him. Also, Good™ has to let some stuff pass on purpose, because actually banning too many things will not give Villains a reason to follow it at all. There will be several cases of enforcement that are too hard to ascertain or just plain impossible to check and enforce. In those cases, just outright banning the practices will erode the authority of the rest of the Accords, just like have unenforceable mortal laws.

And you can't ever be sure with Kairos, he could easily move around a couple commas on the last draft, certify he changed no words, and cause a shitshow later on. (did you ever hear of the 5 million dollar case over a missing comma?)

konstantinvoncarstein

No, I didn't know of it 😬 But everyone will check anything that Kairos touches to prevent this.

I was specifically speaking about the loopholes concerning the use of devils. Black will not accept this kind of things. But yes, maybe Hierarch will.

Liliet

>You forget Black and Hierarch will/may be aiding him.

Seriously? You seriously think Amadeus would help Kairos fuck up the Accords? Mr "I would ban diabolism if I thought it was enforceable"?

Decius

Yes. Black would totally leave in a loophole for something that gave him a net advantage down the line. Not for diabolism, because he doesn't think that would give him an advantage.

But if Named are forbidden to rule, the Emperor cannot be a Named. The Chancellor, or Viceroy however, are not rulers.

Shveiran

That suggests that Black thinks he and Kairos play in the same team.

I'm not sure Amadeus shares that point of view.

TeK

They work for the same employers, not necessarily in the same team. Heard about incorporate rivalry?

Liliet

They less work for the same employer and more hail from the same town. And one of them wants to burn it the fuck down.

TeK

It's funny, but which one?

Liliet

With full awareness of the irony, the one who has not been described as "a true believer of Below"

Fayhem

Yeah, they definitely hate each other's guts. Remember how literally the first thing Catherine said on meeting Kairos for the first time was "wow, he [meaning Black] must have wanted to kill you so much"? And how Kairos' speech to Hierarch when he was having his Name inflicted on him included a whole segment where he's basically raving about how much he hates Black? Those two will share a common point of view when Hell freezes over, maybe.

Liliet

>gave him a net advantage down the line

Gave him a net advantage for what? Keeping a functioning government (his actual goal)? Accords do that without loopholes, he wouldn't want them destabilized.

TeK

To be completely fair, Kairos was not caught using diabolism, nor were his underlings. After all, Demons are many things, but fun they are not. Unless there is a Demon of Humor.

erebus42

That sound's both terrifying and awesome, but I think EE could pull it off. Honestly, his and Wildbow's awesomely existentially horrifying demons are probably some of my favorite monsters in fiction and I kinda hope we get to see a bit more of them before this story is through.

caoimhinh

When I read "Demon of Humor" this is what came to my mind right away XD

Mental Mouse

Where is that from?

caoimhinh

Batman Ninja, the movie

Rey d`Tutto

You mean this one? https://www-m.cnn.com/2018/02/09/us/dairy-drivers-oxford-comma-case-settlement-trnd/index.html?r=https%3A%2F%2Fsearch.yahoo.com%2F_ylt%3DAwr9DtS0E09dCSIArBnBG0d_%2FRV%3D2%2FRE%3D1565492239%2FR0%3D10%2FRU%3Dhttps%253a%252f%252fwww.drivers-oxford-comma-case-settlement-trnd%252findex.html%2FRK%3D2%2FRS%3DR8Z09b9WcbQmwngBG8kzGycbh0c-

IDKWhoitis

Yes, that one

Silverking

...You know, I'm not sure if Bard is actually for or against the Accords. Namely because she doesn't seem to have skin in the game either way. Cat wants lasting peace for her country, Pilgrim wants to prevent unnecessary suffering, and Black wants Good to finally be held accountable to the same set of rules as Evil (no more "bargains with Evil can be ignored whenever"). Bard, on the other hand, might just be...apathetic. The Accords are a plot device, a gimmick, something that Story and the ravages of time can bolster, exploit, or destroy as necessary. The welfare of the people and the sovereignty of nations are as dust; all Bard cares about is to keep the game of Above and Below going, and the Accords don't explicitly block that. On the other hand, if the Accords fall through, the game will continue regardless.

No, as of right now, the only real value the Accords have to Bard is that they are something that a few of the chess pieces are willing to agree to as part of the Epic Clash against the Eternal Enemy, and (more importantly) something that the slippery Cat is willing to bend over backwards to keep alive.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure that Bard's attitude to the Accords themselves is basically "whatever". She is intervening to stop Cat 's attempt to conspire against her.

Shveiran

There is a lot of speculation about the Bard, right now. For instance, I'm pretty sure her role is to ensure the struggle between the two sides never dies down, and is thus very much against anything that brings both sides to the table and agrees on rules of engagement.

We shall wait and see, I suppose.

Liliet

>Bard, on the other hand, might just be...apathetic. The Accords are a plot device, a gimmick, something that Story and the ravages of time can bolster, exploit, or destroy as necessary.

I think the Gods are, for the reasons you outlined. That doesn't mean Bard necessarily is (and I don't mean she's against 😊)

TeK

I am pretty sure Gods are pretty excited because "look at them go".

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

Amadeus reiterating the wager sounds like an establishment of the 'and the Gods are fine with either' idea ♥

Mammon

Wandering Bard: And then I appear at the exact right time to stop Cat to talk about me and only cement my awesome ability to manipulate in the story. Because the sisters aren't actively watching this or intervening, they won't be a bother. And with Pilgrim still on my side there won't be anyone powerful enough around to interfere.

Rumera: No.

*Appears and slaps WB up the head with a rolled up newspaper. Which is a slab of stone because there's too little wood in the Underdark to use paper for such a task.

Mr. Silent Steps: No.

Grabbed her silver flask unnoticed a few moments ago, filled it with mushroom beer, pocketed it back to her, and now flicks her forehead dismissively

Mighty Jindrich: I cannot actually feasibly sneak up on you, but I'm powerful and enough of a public favourite to make an appearance nonetheless!

Dramatically bursts through a nearby wall and body-slams her with no subtlety.

Masego: No.

The rest around the fire pit quizzically look at him suddenly speaking up, and a few minutes later wonder where that smell of fae-fried flesh comes from.

Scribe: No.

Has been here the entire time, throws away the newspaper she prepared to borrow Rumera's one and smacks WB up the head with it again.

Shveiran

Ooooooooooh shit

Aotrs Commander

Why is everyone assuming Black was speaking for villains? He said the wicked, that includes a LOT of the heroes as well. FRACK'S SAKE, Pilgrim, you OWN POEPLER butcher people over every slight, let alone Procer is just one big pile of knives and power-brokering only marginally less sharpened than Praes itself!

If Taric was ever under the delusion that no-one would ever rules-layer the accords, or that only the "villains" would, he clearly hasn't paid attention to anything that has ever happened in every nation ever in Calernia's entire history.

"This could have been a beautiful thing!" HAH! For someone who is supposed to be Discount!Gandalf, you are as naive as a child, Pilgrim. And dangerously so.

Also, fuck you, WB.

Aotrs Commander

Fragdammit, I have the lack of editing features.

Liliet

>If Taric was ever under the delusion that no-one would ever rules-layer the accords, or that only the "villains" would, he clearly hasn't paid attention to anything that has ever happened in every nation ever in Calernia's entire history.

>"This could have been a beautiful thing!" HAH! For someone who is supposed to be Discount!Gandalf, you are as naive as a child, Pilgrim. And dangerously so.

Agreed. That was kind of tragically pathetic of him, I genuinely expected he'd see the 'and everyone will rules-lawyer the fuck out of this' thing coming 1000 miles away. Did he not pay any attention at all to Kairos's rise? He probably didn't, did he. This is the same man who went "wait, people can do... both good AND evil depending on whether someone's in their in-group or out-group? what sorcery is this?" at 30+yo.

And he completely missed what Amadeus was bitter about, and completely 100% took his act as "mwahahaha watch me be the devil" at face value.

Like, god, wow. He was making a point, Tariq, not actually proposing you a wager. And you call yourself a truth teller?

Aotrs Commander

You know Taric fracked up even even Lillet isn't defending him...!

Liliet

Tariq, not Taric.

And I will never stop roasting his negative five to Insight. Is there such a thing as an anti-trained skill?...

Aotrs Commander

Again, frack dammit no edit function...

Javvies

Depends on the system being used.
Some have flaws/negative qualities that one can take that basically mean lolnope to trying certain things.
And I'm pretty sure Tariq doubled down and took all of them when it comes to "understanding other people".

Dude is seriously clueless. And if he didn't have the Ophanim riding shotgun in his skull, I'm pretty sure he'd be long since dead because of it, even with the survivability benefits of being a Hero.

And he's got a power that literally lets him see people's true motivations and desires. Not that it seems to help him much. He's so dependent upon it that his "skills" without it have atrophied, and even with it, he's really bad at using what it gives him.

It's a damn good thing that he realizes he'd be a shit ruler and has stayed away from getting stuck with the job.

Liliet

>He's so dependent upon it that his "skills" without it have atrophied

They didn't. He had none in the first place.

Javvies

Hence the quotation marks around the word "skills".

Although he did manage to have an apparently long running affair with the ruling noble of another city. Though maybe that's because she smacked him with a large enough clue bat enough times.

Liliet

I get the impression she liked him the way he was – a complete idiot, but a Good one u>

Liliet

(and the word 'atrophied' implies there was something there to atrophy :D)

Javvies

Well, his ability to deal with people without constantly leaning on Behold is basically gone.

For that matter ... his iteration of the Behold is an always-on, passive, Aspect, though considering how much the Ophanim like him, there might be active functions to it as well.

Huh. Now I kind of want to know what he got himself into that he got Behold as an Aspect. Because I'm pretty sure it is in his second Aspect slot, and his first Aspect was the one all the Grey Pilgrim's have had – the star one, Shine, I think it is.

Liliet

We know that, it was in his extra chapters. He faced his brother and didn't know how to figure out if he really killed their sister, so he prayed for angelic guidance. Other highlights of the extra chapters include him being genuinely surprised someone can be good to their own people and shit to outsiders, at 30+ yo.

So, yes, he was always like this.

Shveiran

The fact that you can dish this out about a character you love to bits, is why I like arguing with you so much even if we often disagree.

Liliet

I love him and therefore I pay attention to him 😊Д😊😊

Want me to roast Black, here? I like him even better 😊

ninegardens

I mean... he probably DID expect people to rules lawyer the accord's.... he just didn't realize that the game of rules lawyering would be enough to keep the "Villians" playing by the rules.

Black is pointing out that the rules make a new battlefield and Villians are going to screw with each other and you on the new battlefield. Grey was simply thinking "Sure, they'll probably rules lawyer AND cheat AND simply ignore the rules... how in the hell are we going to enforce any of this... why would someone accept such extreme constraints."

I mean... we understand Black, but I'm not going to fault Grey for the fact that he's spent his lifetime fighting monsters that make Kairos look calm and composed. Even if Black isn't representing himself, he is representing something that Grey knows to exist... and Grey has been on the recieving side of Black's most ruthless tendencies (And, to be fair, vice versa).

Liliet

"This could be a beautiful thing if you didnt exist" tells me of a nat 1 on a 'make sense of the situation' check -_-

erebus42

Yeah, consistantly being told you're on the side of "good" and that you and yours have the moral high ground in any given situation simply on principle combined with a pretty high win streak to act as validation from the universe will certainly lead one to have a pretty simplistic and warped perspective on things.

TeK

Hard to live in the world where the closest thing to Practical Good is Tariq. Gotta cut him a slack though, a man just died.

ninegardens

"A man just died... and that man was me"

TeK

"“I can't," he quite reasonably pointed out. "Small steps... what happens to be your name, at the moment?"

"Marguerite of Baillons," the Bard replied.

He snorted.

"Alamans, truly?" he said. "Were all the other bodies taken?"

"“Catherine, Catherine, Catherine," a woman's voice said, sounding almost pained. "You were so close but now you're fucking it all up."

I looked at where the voice had come from – to the side, perched atop one of the raised stones, the Wandering Bard was seated. Slender and dark-haired, with blue eyes and a rather attractive face. The accent, though, I had recognized. Alamans.

"Really," I said, "Alamans? What, where there no other bodies left?"

The Bard cocked her head to the side, looking surprised and more than a little amused.

"That is uncanny," she muttered."

Cap'n Smurfy

I believe this chapter can be best summarized as follows.

Pilgrim: "Laws and Rules will make the world a better place for Good."

Black: "You think Laws will help Good? Bitch please, we'll ruleslawyer the Hells out of you"

Cat: "Can we just not?"

Bard: "Sure"
Cat: "Oh God's damnit!"

ninegardens

Where is the first half of this one from? You mind giving a chapter reference?

Liliet

Epilogue 4.

ninegardens

Thanks heaps.

Also, while re-reading that ...

>> "That seems unnecessary," Amadeus said. "I am, after all, entirely at your power."

"Pilgrim's orders," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

"That is unfortunate," the dark-haired man said. "It is not too late to save your parents."

– Epilouge 4

Along with...

>. Roland finished the last syllable of the incantation he'd begun, protective panes of translucent sorcery forming around Indrani's body. Too late to be of use even presuming they would have held, which the Pilgrim doubted. Tariq did need to look at the young man's face to know it had gone ashen, burning guilt flaring at the thought of having been too slow. A loss tied to deeper fears, fears that Tariq could do nothing to soothe away. To meddle too much in the conflict that lay at the heart of Bestowal was a danger to all involved...

-Reverberation.

Interesting....

Rouge Sorcerer HATES being too late.

How the Hell did Amadeus KNOW that.

... I'm wondering if Roland's parents are locked up in the tower or something...

Andrew Mitchell

> Interesting.... Rouge Sorcerer HATES being too late.

> How the Hell did Amadeus KNOW that. ... I'm wondering if Roland's parents are locked up in the tower or something...

Good pickup. I suspect Amadeus (via Scribe) had previously (before the battle in the Vales) learned about the Rogue Sorcerer and his drives.

Liliet

Rogue Sorcerer DID intersect with him in that Liesse affair with the books... Huh. I wonder if this'll come up

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, I had forgotten about that connection. It will be interesting to see if we learn more about RS's background incl family.

TeK

Epilogue to book 4

Cap'n Smurfy

I believe this chapter can be best summarized as follows.

Pilgrim: "Laws and Rules will make the world a better place for Good."

Black: "You think Laws will help Good? Bitch please, we'll ruleslawyer the Hells out of you"

Cat: "Can we just not?"

Bard: "Sure"

Cat: "Oh God's damnit!"

superkeaton

I was wondering when this particular fly would land in the ointment

That Guy

So Bard has an aspect called Dialoguous Aparté ?

Daniel E

This could be a perfect Scooby Doo moment. Bard pulls off her mask, revealing.. gasp She was General Abigail this whole time! On a serious note, where do we stand on the theory that Bard is effectively the Story incarnate?

Andrew Mitchell

I don't know about "The Story" (there are, after all, LOTS of stories) but I'm fairly sure that the Bard's purpose is to keep the stories going.

Liliet

Bard is a person, and 'the story' is a law of the universe. It's like saying someone is an incarnation of gravity – I'm just genuinely not sure what the fuck that means and what the implications are, practically speaking?

Mental Mouse

If someone was an incarnation of gravity... well, they'd be a real downer. 😊

JJR

““Why now, Tariq Fleetfoot,” the Carrion Lord replied with languid amusement, “that rather sounds like a wager.””

Interesting way to put it, seeing as how creation itself is apparently to determine a wager between the gods.

Liliet

It's not 'a way to put it', it's a direct reference. What Amadeus is saying is, basically, “you cannot assume the villains will see the same cause-effect chain here as you, because the disagreement on that is the core of the difference in the first place”.

And then Tariq throws a micro-tantrum about it because... I'm genuinely not sure why. Did he visualize the Accords as getting rid of all villains forever period? What the fuck is this 'could be beautiful without your existence' image?

laguz24

You just gave me an idea. What if the fey world was a world where the gods above and below created what the opposites did. The winter fey was rule-bound to act despicable and evil without reference to motive. The summer fey was obnoxious and rule enforcers without any reference to morality. these were essentially stereotypes from the other side below does not recognize morality and views power before ideals while above believes ideals come first and power is later given.

Liliet

omfg its the world of them shitposting @ each other

Tab

“I'll speak for the crooked and cruel, pilgrim of grey, and give you the answer you deman.”

deman -> demand ?

Chapter 68: Apropos

"A good liar finds every lie a fetter."

– Arlesite saying

It shouldn't be possible, I thought. How did this somehow not qualify as direct intervention? I was looking at myself standing between the Peregrine and the Carrion Lord, smoke coming up from my pipe hanging still in the air like it'd been frozen stiff. The Bard had what, stolen my soul out of my body under the nose of Sve Noc and slowed the flow of time to a crawl? Considering anything sorcerous touching upon time was known to be requiring the kind of power that'd break a kingdom to steal away a mere heartbeat this had to be a Name thing, but even if that proved true this was... My fingers clenched. No, Cat, you damned fool, I grimly thought. You're looking for a heavy-handed miracle when this one's the reigning queen of smoke and mirrors. I'd stood here before, though I'd been brought into such a folded moment by another old monster's will. The difference was that the Dead King preferred titanic scenes – an old crusade assaulting the walls of Keter, the chaotic field some had already taken to calling the Princes' Graveyard – while the Intercessor had subtler tastes. A lighter touch that hinted at powers she likely did not possess, but who could know for sure? Some sardonic jest at my expense, or an attempt to rattle me?

"Going in circles, are we?" the Bard drawled. "That's fine. We got time, Cat."

This was an illusion, I thought, or perhaps a memory made into something both more and less. Yet it was exquisitely woven, I'd admit, for the silhouette of the Intercessor perched atop the old stone was flawlessly touched by the cast of starlight that could not truly exist. The shoddy lute on her lap, more driftwood than instrument, was as much one of her signatures as the shining silver flask in her hand. This thing of many faces and a hundredfold in years, there were some who might call it a god. One that sat astride the boundary between the Gods and Creation, like some fickle high priestess of inscrutable designs. And for all that Kairos Theodosian had whispered in my ear secrets of her nature, there was still much more that remained unknown to me.

"So it seems," I finally said. "What name do you happen to go by these days, Almorava?"

"Marguerite of Baillons, at your service," the Bard said, bowing foppishly.

"Does it not get tedious?" I curiously asked. "Trading names and faces so often?"

"You'd be surprised what people can get used to," the Intercessor said, then looked me up and down. "Or maybe not. You've had an interesting few years, haven't you?"

"Same as you," I calmly replied. "Heard you a little spot of trouble down south. Tyrant's a tricky one, eh?"

"You get a particularly sharp one every few centuries," Marguerite nonchalantly admitted. "Mind you, that boy's not making it to thirty."

I don't think he's trying all that hard to, I thought. I did not voice it, though, for though Kairos Theodosian was my foe and had betrayed me many a time – and would again, given occasion – I would still choose him over the Intercessor every time.

"Is this a warning, then?" I mildly asked. "That I need to fall in line if I want to make it to that age?"

She laughed, dark-haired and blue-eyed and looking frightfully young for what I knew her to be. Barely out of girlhood, and on such an ancient creature that was almost obscene.

"Shit, Cat, you think this is what – some kind of intimidation racket?" she grinned. "Behave now, young girl. No more slaughtering your enemies or I'll slap your buttocks with a wooden branch."

Her tone was gently mocking, though her face turned serious quickly enough.

"This is a favour I'm doing you, Catherine," the Wandering Bard said. "Because you're trying real hard to do some good and it might even work. If you stop getting in your own way, just the once."

Ah. So we were starting with the friendly, smiling face then. Like I'd swallow that.

"I do make it a point of always believing ambiguous immortal creatures without question, when they assure me they're doing me a favour," I prettily smiled. "So, do I need to sign something before you take my soul or will a spoken bargain be enough?"

I winked exaggeratedly.

"For the first of my three wishes-" I began.

"You really are a terrible asshole," the Intercessor said, almost admiring. "Hells, I bet even Nessie gets a little vexed at times and he's gotten pretty hard to ruffle over the millennia."

I was never going to get those wishes, was I? The disappointment only grew with the passing of years.

"You would know," I smiled.

A heartbeat passed as she studied me.

"Spinning this out won't allow the sisters to take you out of here," Marguerite sighed. "You can stop trying to delay now."

Shit. And I'd been trying to hard not to actually think about it just in case she could pick up on things like that.

"Fine," I said. "You want to talk, Bard, let's talk. What do you want?"

"I'd like for you to not help Nessie wiggle out of this, is what I'd like," the Intercessor said. "I don't mind your Accords, Catherine. I think they might even do some good for a century or two, before they become a noose around the neck of Calernia. If you get them signed, well, congratulations. But you're about to scrap most your efforts before the year is out, and while that's mostly on your head and I'd usually abstain from the mess what does matter to me is that you're endangering more important endeavours."

Even if we'd been under the noon sun instead of under the veil of night, I thought, I would not have been able to read the woman perched atop the stone. She'd been a weaver of words for longer than Callow had stood and though the Wandering Bard was hardly unbeatable or infallible she was not someone I'd ever have a solid grasp on. Still, even knowing she might be spinning a web of lies tailored exactly for me I had to keep her talking. When else was I ever going to have the opportunity of stealing a glimpse of what she intended?

"And what would those endeavours be?" I pressed.

"Killing the Dead King," the Intercessor said. "For good. Not a soul-shard or an inhabited corpse, not his endless legion of expendable intermediaries. Neshamah King, he who once reigned over Sephirah and so doomed it."

"I've no quarrel with that end," I shrugged.

Which was nothing but the truth. Creation would be better off without the Dead King, there was no denying that. I fully intended on seeing it done, too, if the price for it was not ruinously steep. That did not mean, though, that whatever the Bard had planned was to be blindly welcomed. Assuming she was speaking the truth, which I would not. And now, I thought, comes the demand. Oh it'd be disguised, but the tricks being plied on me were not unfamiliar. A common enemy, a common striving, had first been established. Then it'd been hinted that she would not oppose my own heart's desire, seeing the Liesse Accords signed, so long as I did not begin a feud with her. Now she'd make her demand, reasonable and modest, and she might even go a step further by throwing in a bribe. Some secret that'd be of use to me, or a light nudge that'd help me along the way. So, I wondered, what was it to be? Was I to bite my tongue when it came to sharing with the Pilgrim what I knew of her? Or perhaps it'd be something subtler, a particular secret that need be kept.

"Good," Marguerite smiled. "Then when he offers you a truce – and he will, that much is certain – do not put your weight behind accepting it."

I pushed down my surprise, keeping my face a bland mask. What? I'd considered the offers Neshamah had half-extended while in Liesse, since the end of the battle, the truces of ten or a hundred years. Tempting as they were, in retrospect the former more than the latter, I'd been growing increasingly inclined to refuse them outright. The long game was his more than ours, in the end, and the Dead King would never have made the offer if he did not gain from it more than we. Yet this was not what I'd expected of the Bard. I'd taken this little aside of ours, much as she pretended otherwise, as a tacit admission that my speaking against her to the Pilgrim might do damage. That she must prevent it. Yet she now spoke as if her great concern was war on Keter and nothing else, which was raising my hackles. I'd seen her act in the name of Below as well as Above, which meant she was not the heroine she oft presented herself as, but what she truly wanted did remain a mystery to me. The destruction of the Dead King was a believable striving for this entity, along with the admittedly chilling notion that there was little she was not willing to sacrifice to see it done, but it was... too clean. The two scheming immortals, plotting and scheming across the span of history with Calernia as their pawns?

It had the shape of a story to it and that was what had me wary. The Bard's trade was the peddling of stories, and I could not help but think I was being sold one right now.

"And why shouldn't I?" I said. "A reprieve would allow us to gather stronger forces before marching on Keter."

Was I playing into her hand, I thought, by keeping her talking no matter my true intent? I could not know, but ignorance was cure to nothing at all even lies taught something of what was.

"You'd be clinging to the wrong story," the Bard calmly explained. "In truce he will 'hold' the territories he seized in Procer. And after the truce runs out, you'll take them back from him. Drive him back to Keter. And that'll be your victory."

She paused.

"And so nothing will change," she said. "Oh, I burned a shard of him when he got greedy in Arcadia. That's a loss for him, it is, but it's a drop in the ocean. I did not wait centuries to let him slip away now, Catherine Foundling, not when he could be destroyed instead."

"You're implying that if the war is unbroken by truce, our victory will be in Keter instead," I slowly said.

That by cutting a deal, we'd dilute the substance of the triumph that could be had. Which, while sounding to me of a repugnant repudiation of the practical for nebulous 'principles', sounded quite a lot like some of the hero-talk I'd heard over the years. No truce with the Enemy and all that. And coming out of the Intercessor's mouth it was a lot harder to dismiss, I thought, for though I still doubted the virtue of such a stance I wouldn't deny that as a story-knife it might just hold up. The more complicated a tale the less strongly it bound, in my experience, and I doubted anything short of steel fetters would keep the Dead King dead. Besides, this entire affair assumed we'd be able to win the war in the first place. Which was far from certain, in my opinion.

"He needs Keter, you know," Marguerite idly said. "Everything else he can spare, but Keter? Without it he's no longer the King of Death, he's simply Evil in a box – and that, my dear, delivers him into my hands sure as dawn. So he'll fight for the city tooth and nail, and that's how he ends."

"If that's true," I said, "why would he ever wage war? Why not simply close the borders of his kingdom and avoid the risk entirely?"

After a grisly demonstration of power or two, harsh enough they were seared into the Principate's cultural memory, it was unlikely Procer would try his lands again. Few rulers would be fool enough to seek war with the peace of death to the north when there were better lands south and east to annex instead.

"Because I haven't given him a choice," the Bard candidly said. "If not regularly bled of strength by a war he'll gather enough to try something genuinely dangerous, like conquering another Hell or ingesting another kingdom into the Serenity. So I've arranged for the war to be taken to him, again and again."

"Not this time, though," I said. "He's the one who wanted to sally out, and he's taking risks. Why?"

She laughed, fiendishly pleased.

"Because he's been cornered, Catherine," the Bard said, "by the passing of time. The Kingdom Under will have taken the entire continent underground soon. And on the surface cities are getting larger. Sorcery and learning keeping crawling forward. Larger, more stable alliances are forming. By the time there is a Twentieth Crusade, it'll be able to win."

"So he needs to do something now," I said. "A sweeping change of some kind."

"Oh, he caught onto that some time ago," Marguerite said. "There's a reason Procer is such a bloody mess. Ever wonder why the dead strike so often at the Lycaonese while the Alamans by the lakes are an afterthought?"

Because there are much fewer Lycaonese, and they lack allies in the broader Principate, I'd thought. It was much more feasible to slowly eradicate the northerners and their smaller population than it was with the lakeside Alamans, whose principalities tended to be more populated further from the coasts regardless.

"You're implying he's been sabotaging the Principate," I said.

"He's been sowing hate between those tribes since before there was a Principate, Catherine," she replied. "Keeping them estranged, shaping their stories one incursion at a time so that when the black days come they'll be too far gone to band together."

"If you've known for so long then why did it come to this?" I flatly said.

"First Prince isn't a Name," the Intercessor sighed. "That's what I work with, like your teacher told you. Names. I can't touch the Nameless outside of some very narrow boundaries. And what a funny coincidence it is, that the Principate took the shape it bears to this day after Nessie and his friend in the Tower ran roughshod over it. You following me yet, Foundling? Kairos isn't the only one who's ever pulled a fast one over me. The entire bloody nation has been a fire in my lap since its founding."

It was, I thought, believable enough. Though there was one detail more than the rest I focused on.

"Narrow boundaries," I repeated, hinting at a question.

She looked amused.

"You spoke of me," the Bard said. "It was enough, given who you are."

And wasn't that just the loveliest of ambiguous sentences? Who I was. It might even be true, given that I'd avoided speaking of her as much as I could. The last time I could recall, in truth, had been with the Tyrant of Helike and we'd been hiding behind the madness of the Hierarch unleashed on that night. She would not have known anything that was spoken in that carefully forged blind spot, Kairos having no doubt made it largely to check her. And that, more than anything else, was what had me convinced she was lying. Because it was a pretty story she was selling me, but she did in fact have a way to get to the First Prince: the Augur, her cousin and most trusted of advisors. She'd had that way in for years now, and still the Tenth Crusade had headed east instead of north. There was, I thought, a greater game afoot than she would have me believe. Oh, if I pressed no doubt she'd have an answer for me. A reasonable one, too, as for why it had all unfolded the way it had. But my instincts were screaming I was being had, somehow, for some reason. Why would you tell me any of this? Why are we having this conversation at all? You'd have me believe this is your first true opportunity, but since when would you see this as an opportunity at all? A sculptor does not owe a chisel an explanation.

Gods Below and Everburning, what was her fucking game?

"What are you, really?" I quietly asked, looking into eyes that were not the first she'd ever worn. "You're Named, but like none I've ever seen. And for all your pretences you're not a heroine."

"I'm what was made so that no one ever eats the world," the Intercessor said. "I am herald before the ruin; envoy when it waxes beyond restraint. What I am has no name in any tongue still known to the living or the dead, and many have gone mad seeking it. I've had as many faces as there are graves and never once did I taste true death."

The old thing smiled.

"I am not an arbiter," she said. "When the hour is kind, I am granted kind purpose. When the hour is wicked, I do what I must. And when the hour is mine, I seek the story that will free Creation. Until I have found it, you grasping thing, I see to the monsters that slip through the cracks. So crawl through the muck and do the passing things you can, but do not once presume to meddle in the greater works beyond your understanding – I will not tolerate the meddling of amateurs."

She had given me, I thought, I reasonable enough answers. Not justifications, and only barely would I call them explanations, but it... held up. More or less. Enough that I could glimpse the shape a tale that'd make sense of it all. And that was why I doubted it, but I did have to wonder – had I sunk too deep into lunacy, that a plausible tale was enough to have me disbelieve? Had I become like Kairos, baring knives at the faintest hint of weakness? Or is this kind of hesitation exactly what she wants from me by doing this? The trouble here was that I had so very little to bring out as argument if I wanted to qualify the Intercessor an enemy in the eyes of the Pilgrim. She'd pulled strings for the death of Captain, it was true, but Sabah had spent a lifetime as an enforcer for my teacher and through him the Tower. She'd had a hand in the sundering between Black and Malicia being so deep and bitter, but again what sin would that be in the Pilgrim's eyes? I had the words of Kairos Theodosian, which to Tariq would be less than nothing, and the memories of the Sisters when they had sought out Below and encountered the Bard as an envoy. Which, while less than sunny a cast for the Intercessor, was not utterly damning. What else could I bring up, save the words of the very Dead King we were not gathering against? Even I could not that deny that for all the hints of more sinister intent I'd seen her put the finger on the scales for Good rather more often than the other way around.

I had little to say, which begged the question of whether or not I was truly looking at an enemy. Oh, she'd sought my death once or twice – but then I'd been a rising villain attempting to claim Callow and considering the amount of deaths I'd personally brought down on Creation since I couldn't fault her on principle either. In strategy, perhaps, but then given the scale she worked on it would have been painfully arrogant of me to pretend I knew everything she did. I kept my fingers from clenching, for it was too obvious a tell. Was that the answer, then? That I was to kneel and trust in the benevolence of some eldritch creature's designs, to step only where she deigned to let me step and babble out thanks for the privilege? No, I thought. Even if all she'd spoke was true, she no more owned the right to shape the Creation than any of us. She was my enemy, come what may. But not one I could face tonight, with preparations so feeble. If she caught even a hint that I was coming for her... I'd only be able to act in surprise once, and I doubted there would ever be a second chance. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them, allowing the conflict I genuinely felt to touch my face.

"You'll back the Accords?" I asked.

"I'll let them stand on their own merits," the Intercessor said. "Neither more nor less."

I spat to the side.

"Then we're done here, Bard," I said.

She peered at me, seemingly amused.

"That we are," she agreed.

I blinked, tasting the warmth of smoke in my mouth, and Tariq Fleetfoot's face creased.

"Why must we speak of her?" the old hero asked, tone wary.

And this was the moment, I thought, where I hinted arrangement had been made and began to bide my time until I could strike. Plotted behind bling spots with the Hierophant and learned from the sharp madness of the Hierarch. Like a clever little villain attempting to snuff out a great light. It was a story, I realized in a moment of cold dread. I'd been sold yet another story, on the sly, and come so very close to embracing it wholeheartedly. I'd not bit the bait when she'd approached me as a smiling offeror of advice and bargains, so she'd changed the story. The immortals warring over the world I'd again refused, silently as I had, and in doing so tumbled down the most dangerous of the three stories she'd woven. Believing it was my own notion every step of the way.

"I do believe she just tried to kill me," I thoughtfully said. "So let's drag out into the light every dirty little secret I know about her."

Back in the old days, if I'd gone down the hill to meet the Exiled Prince in an honourable duel he would have made sport of me. I would have been, after all, fighting him on his own terms. Why would I offer the Intercessor the courtesy I'd refused him, even if clothed differently? I would not fight a weaver of stories the way she wanted to be fought, damn her.

Elegant had never been my strength, so time to drag us both into the mud.

Soronel Haetir

"I do believe she just tried to kill me, so let's go vote."

Cap'n Smurfy

"I do believe she just tried to kill me," I thoughtfully said. "So let's drag out into the light every dirty little secret I know about her."

Not gonna lie, this was the most satisfyingly, cathartic moment in this entire story. Up there with Rumena punching Saint, Cat claiming the sword in the Stone, Hierarchy smacking down Bard and of course, Thief's "Yoink"ing of the sun.

maxwell wearing

wait when did Hierarchy hit the bard? do you mean when They first met in the streets and he declared war on the gods?

RoflCat

Bard approached Hierarchy at one point to try and get him to get into his Hierarchy role and lead the League.

He said I'mma fucking put you and the Gods on trials and she pissed off.

Liliet

OH MY GOD YES

frank talks are THE BEST

Cap'n Smurfy

By smacked down I meant a verbal smackdown, not physically hitting her. And yes when he told her he'd put her on trial and she was in the body of a League citizen. There was a reason she disappeared for a while and showed up as a Proceran when she reappeared.

Johannes

Now that I think about it – do we know exactly how old Rumena is? At least if I didn't mix up anything he might be even older than the sisters and even Neshamah.

Shveiran

I think it's pretty much a given he's older than the sisters, considering he was a general when Komana was serving under him.

Why do you think he's older than Neshamah, though?

JJR

What sort of story has Cat gotten herself into now?

Some sort of Rebellion against Fate thing?

Rage against the Heavens?

Those do tend to go poorly for villains, that way we can have stories about hubris and the downfall it brings.

parahacker

No, I think she's going for a type of story her world hasn't really seen much of, yet. Probably because without mass media or even a printing press, the strategy doesn't have as much traction, you can't be as quick as our own media could working bottom up. But the top-down approach would still work.

She's going to tell what she knows to as many people as practical to be effective. Starting with Pilgrim, but I doubt she will stop there. Bard works through Names and stories, yes, but her strategy is aimed for nations and generations, the Named are only the means. Those means become much less effective if everyone knows who is being used, even if not exactly how. And she has some notion of the how, as well.

Though she still lacks the why. Only Neshama has that at the moment.

Liliet

Fucking YES 😊

NerfContessa

Sooo, she is going to tweet about bard. To anyone on hero Twitter and villain book.

Fantastic.

Liliet

She would have if she'd gone with the idea she has in the last moments of the conversation – having Bard believe she was agreeing and plotting in the dark.

Instead, all she's doing is sharing information – what rebellion? What rage? She's letting other people figure out what to do about what she knows, don't shoot the messenger~

Faiir

Note that "Don't shoot the messenger" could also be the Bard's motto.

Liliet

"What, you're trying to shoot the messenger anyway? Not going to work tho"

Mental Mouse

The last story she rejected was a version of Rage Against the Heavens (plotting against them in secret); she's going instead with something longer-term, and likely more... practical.

I note that she's now joined the club of folks who are happy to have a friendly chat with an enemy (in her case, both DK and Cat), even while continuing to try to kill them. On the flip side, even as Neshamah threatens to reveal a secret of hers, she's gifted Cat with a pair of his secrets – a vulnerability to turn against him, and a strategy to destroy him that even Pilgrim can accept.

And yes, she's confirmed that her own role is to keep the game going. Neshamah is threatening to gain power beyond the gods' ability to restrain, so she is playing against him. Cat is trying to break the game a different way, so Bard tries to lead her back into the territory of closed, finite stories.

mammon

The story she got herself into was the one of the Scheming Villain. The perfect plan alike Traitorous that is bound to fall to simple 'We'll never side with Evil and will always defy you to the last man.' attitude that Good has with its annoying habit of being backed by Creation to be unbeatable. No matter how well she'd plan it, the Bard and Creation would always see for her to lose at the exact worst moment of time, namely the one where all her chips are in the game and she cannot back out any more, for the most devastating bullshit win for Good.

Traitorous might win his victories, but unlike Bard he schemed against Heroes that he could fool into stories that he was bound to win. He'd never be the villain in the third act, he always ensured a victory by making the Heroes bound for a win after two acts of losses the mentor for a new Hero, so that they are instead the prologue greater Hero deemed to lose and himself the Villain in the first act who cannot possibly lose again. Essentially Heiress except knowing to never let things come to a conclusion where he's bound to lose. Against the Bard though, such a strategy could never work because she'd never fall for it or make him a filler villain in her war with Nessie.

If Cat had done the same, then she too would merely be another inconvenience in her everlasting war, the newly introduced Villain of act 124 beaten in act 124. In the Odyssey or the Poetic Edda, Odysseus or Thor don't have to first lose to the villain, they just need to establish how capable it is but they can win in the same fight. Bard is essentially that long-running Hero. That is, if she couldn't beat Cat in other ways or through her endless bag of intermediaries.

If you're talking the new story she's now embarking on, it's still vague but it's probably rebellion against the Heavens indeed. Though instead of the Heavens, the Good and Evil in general. We've already seen quite a lot of hints that Amadeus has already turned it upside down and the effects showing themselves (Procer invading with a long-prepared ritual for unfair advantages, and the Grim Binders using generations of prepared secret rituals to be unbeatable only for the Broken Bells to defeat these necromancers with valour and goodness).

Either Cat or the Bard may use that to their advantage here. Cat to essentially make the New Good a weapon against the Old Good and Bard as it's Avatar. With the Angels still being based on the morals of a time where slavery was still Good-allowed, and their behaviour still clearly being based on that system (The Hashmallim seeing no issue enslaving 100.000 lesser beings for their ends and the Seraphim deeming only the White Knights that don't question the angels' will and judgement without allowing their own will and law over or aside the Choir's.), Cat can make a strong case now that Amadeus heralded in a time of more equality and less racism and slavery.

The Bard could have a gazillion ways to turn it into a different frame or to turn things against Cat though. She even has the know-how on just pushing the red button and having the Gnomes nuke Cat and all her allies out of existence if Cat is about to pull a too devastating win over her.

Liliet

>the Seraphim deeming only the White Knights that don't question the angels' will and judgement without allowing their own will and law over or aside the Choir's

Except, y'know, Hanno's the first Judgement hero like that that Bard knows of.

Don't generalize from examples EXPLICITLY STATED to be the exception to the general rule.

Mental Mouse

> With the Angels still being based on the morals of a time where slavery was still Good-allowed, and their behaviour still clearly being based on that system

Well, there's an interesting point here. From a modern Western perspective, it's easy to say "oh, the peoples of Calernia have progressed past the ideas of their creators". But this isn't actually a world that's based on "progress", which is actually a fairly new idea in our own world. More to the point, in our own world, slavery didn't get outlawed because people "learned better", it mostly went away because it stopped making economic sense.

AIUI, the first age of slavery (think ancient Egypt and Mesopotamia, up through Classical Greece or so) was ultimately killed off by the leather horse harness, which let animals work more efficiently than the wooden yokes and collars previously used – specifically, putting the animals' work-to-food ratio for fieldwork above that of enslaved humans. In the modern age, it was the increasing population of free citizens, combining with the ongoing development of industrial and agricultural machines.

And in the modern age, slavery and its moral equivalents persist in some very specific contexts: One is places which don't have access to modern machinery and other agricultural methods (e.g., parts of Africa). Another is work where technology can't replace human effort ("migrant workers" picking delicate fruit in America), or where the work is unpleasant enough that you can't keep workers at it unless you force them (sex work, some factory work). Or it can just be a case where the numbers of people involved are such that a company couldn't afford to give them living wages, much less benefits: Many hotels, factories, construction companies, etc use undocumented immigrants, precisely because those don't get protection of the labor laws.

naturalnuke

Oh, time to set the board on fire once more is it?

Stable

Pigeon-style chess. Knock the pieces over, mess on the board and strut off.

Faiir

Set the board on fire, eat the enemy pieces, then explode the table!

antoninjohn

I think the Intercessor tried to get Cat in a "evil plot hidden in the dark"

laguz24

Wait, if Cordelia is becoming so powerful and acting kind of villainous then she might be developing a name, Crap. Also, so this is why she is so ok with saint setting fire to the rest of the principate. I also don't want to see what Procer under the wandering bard's influence would look like. Callow and Praes bleeding eternally. The Underdark, mass of warring tribes. Levant, ruled by nobles so prickly they kill each other over what to have for breakfast. League of free cities, run by and run for madmen. Wandering Bard, personally I am waiting for the moment when the dead king tells us what her goals are and upends everyone's plans.

Liliet

>Wait, if Cordelia is becoming so powerful and acting kind of villainous then she might be developing a name, Crap.

OH.

That tracks.

Heroic or villainous, if Cordelia develops a Name, Intercessor gets much better leverage in this war, and that's WHY she prodded Laurence to set Cordelia's designs on fire.

Mental Mouse

> if Cordelia develops a Name, Intercessor gets much better leverage in this war

Does she? She already has Augur, and we've seen what she tried via Saint (admittedly, filtered through Saint's limited perspective).

Shveiran

It's still the difference between one-step-removed and direct influence.
I'm not saying it is a game changer necessarily, but it IS better.

Liliet

>we've seen what she tried via Saint

I'm saying getting Cordelia a Name IS what she's tried via Saint.

And getting Cordelia a Name would start a new cultural tradition – exactly the one she'd been lacking, a unifying Proceran cultural narrative.

Andrew Mitchell

Loved this:

"I'm what was made so that no one ever eats the world," the Intercessor said. "I am herald before the ruin; envoy when it waxes beyond restraint. What I am has no name in any tongue still known to the living or the dead, and many have gone mad seeking it. I've had as many faces as there are graves and never once did I taste true death."

The old thing smiled.

How much of this is true, I wonder? Most of it aligns to what I've been saying for a long time. But "I seek the story that will free Creation." points to Liliet's view that WB is seeking the same thing as Catherine; and end to the games between Above and Below. And, if that's the case, then it's clear ("you grasping thing") that WB does not realise Catherine's true intentions.

NerfGlastigUaine

My own wild mass guessing theory was that Bard wants to rage quit from her job, either by breaking the game, breaking the world, or breaking the Gods. Now however I think that's a little too simple and neat. Doesn't quite fit right, but who knows.

WuseMajor

I've been suspecting that Bard wants to retire and started training a replacement. I can't help but think that Cat would be horrified to find out that the reward for trying to help humans escape the games of the gods is that they make you a referee. And that the current one wants to bring her on as her assistant.

Liliet

That's what I'm getting out of this, too... and I don't think Cat's broken out of the boundaries

Faiir

Note that even if Bard and Cat want the same thing this does not make them allies.

Bard may not want Cat to meddle, since she's an inexperienced, grasping thing.

Cat cares about the losses on the road to her goal, and Bard doesn't seem to (more than 'Oh, what a loss!').

Andrew Mitchell

True.

> Cat cares about the losses on the road to her goal, and Bard doesn't seem to (more than 'Oh, what a loss!').

TBF if I'd lived 3000+ years watching people come and go I imagine I might feel the same way. 😊

Liliet

Yeppppp. For a creature who's been doing this job for as long as she has, Bard having emotions to spare about William (Epilogue 2, her POV) is staggeringly human already.

Faiir

Actually, are we even sure Bard exists between appearances?

You know, I kinda expect her to appear, do the stuff, then reappear a month later in another spot.

In this case thousands of years could be subjective months.

Liliet

Not months, no. Months, she's spent with either heroic band on screen already.

Thousands reduced to hundreds, I could see, but my point stands tbh.

Cap'n Smurfy

I don't know it works as nicely as that. Bard was clear that she goes "nowhere" when she's not around.

Considering her reaction in that scene and the lethal levels of alcoholism I can't imagine she goes from one appearance to another without experiencing the time in between in some manner. And that time in-between is unlikely to be pleasant.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, that's exactly how I read Bard's situation too.

Liliet

I mean, she hung out with heroes for continuous stretches of time, even if she disappeared periodically.

Liliet

>But "I seek the story that will free Creation." points to Liliet's view that WB is seeking the same thing as Catherine; and end to the games between Above and Below. And, if that's the case, then it's clear ("you grasping thing") that WB does not realise Catherine's true intentions.

I'm not sure.

"I seek the story that will free Creation" very much tells me that Bard DOES expect Catherine to be onboard with the idea, because otherwise it's a very sharp tack in her own boot. I mean it's a sharp tack in her own boot either way, but if she didn't think Catherine might be interested in that purpose, she wouldn't have put it there for no reason.

Faiir

Sooooooooo....

Is the Bard the person Cat's going to defeat only to learn that she was misunderstood her all along, and then Cat picks up her flask to continue Bard's work?

^

I can't make this sentence both understandable and sounding correct >_<

Liliet

Nah, it's perfectly understandable and a very specific and clear trope... and I think that's what Bard is angling for 😊

But given Catherine's record with the Mentor Death trope so far... 😊д😊😊

talene1

I think it's different. The story with Immortals often is that they do not change. Not without significant contact and attachment to a mortal. And Bard has definitely not gotten close to any mortals.

So Bard has been crystallized into who she is. And she is a disillusioned, exhausted woman who wants it all to end. Who hates her all of fellow creatures, who she sees as weak, as ultimately impotent and evil and doomed. She is, in essence, a nihilist who sees all efforts as futile. And all attempts to change the world as the the pathetic vainglorious attempts of an arrogant people. Of grasping things who will never know better than she does.

Liliet

...I don't think so.

Oh, she's called Cat a 'grasping thing', but I think that's for Cat's attempts to go higher in the meta. The earthly attempts to make things better, she actually very much respects.

We have Epilogue 2 as her POV, and an interesting thing about it is that give or take a few thing about expectations of success all the sentiment she expresses in there matches what she's told William outright.

I think, with her age and absolute lack of peers she actually likes, in order to hold on to her identity and sanity, she makes a habit of being frank&candid about her own emotions about things. Her "grasping thing" was in response to Catherine essentially not accepting anything short of "here is the eldritch me" as the answer. She constantly volunteers her opinions and remarks, like telling the Sisters that she wishes they'd refuse because the immortality they'll get is worse than death "but we both know better". They are mostly ignored by everyone as much as by Catherine, but they're a way for Bard to establish out loud again and again that she has her own emotions and opinions and not get lost under the weight of her duty.

So no, judging just from her attitude towards William, who she wanted to see the best in, she doesn't hate all her fellow creatures, especially not for being weak. Disillusioned and exhausted and wanting it all to end, I'm seeing. But probably only for herself, not for everyone. Would be nice if she could rest and someone else could take up the job...~

Shveiran

I think you have called back to that chapter other times, but even after another re-read I really don't get what it supposedly proves.

Bard is a very cryptic character, whose goals and powers are still obscure, and whose inner monologue is not particularly outspoken.

She is intriguing, but... we still know next to nothing. In a year, maybe we'll be able to look back and see how it all crafts a picture, but... now? All we have is the corner piece with a bit of sky.

Liliet

In this case, I'm just saying we can take her word for:

- feels bad for Contrition heroes every time;
- generally hates the exact same thing she likes about villains;
- gets hope from seeing the bottom of the barrel dragged up (ie Amadeus's plot);

uhhh what else has she said. I don't remember any more concrete statements, but these are my point here.

Shveiran

1) This is highly subjective, but to me those lines read like... like the Guide gets me every time, you know? A story capable to emotion you, even if you read or see it time and again.

Not like... something real. I mean, I love this novel but I treat it as a novel. I won't screw life priorities over it. There is a level of... detachment I am unable not to focus on.

It doesn't sound like she actually cares, it's what I'm saying.

2) I'm not sure what you mean.

3) I can't seem to find the quote, but isn't that something she told, rather than thought?

IF SO, then I'm not sure why we should take that at face value coming from the Bard.

I mean, it's not like she is a straight-forward, simple character; whether or not she proves to be an antagonist in the end, we can't really trust what she says to be true just because she said it. It's not really evidence.

Liliet

>3) I can't seem to find the quote, but isn't that something she told, rather than thought?

Yep, it's something she told William to cheer him up before the final battle.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/10/12/heroic-interlude-prise-au-fer/>

[illegible]

"These are some of the most successful villains in the history of the Empire," she said. "And they became that by going through the motions of being Good."

The dark-haired man's brow rose. "They are most definitely not."

"Oh, I'm not arguing that they are," the Bard said.

"See, I think that we are born Evil. Because Evil is instinct. It's that animal part of us that wants things for ourselves no matter what it does to others. It's been dressed up in philosophy since, but that's the heart of it."

She smiled mirthlessly.

"But I want to believe that when the Gods made us, they gave us thought as well as instinct. We teach ourselves to be Good, William. Because we want to be better. It's not as easy but maybe, just maybe, if we do it long enough it will be what comes naturally to us."

"So you're saying the Carrion Lord is trying to be Good?" he said sceptically.

"I'm saying these are the first villains in a long time who're going with thought instead of instinct," Almorava replied. "It's why they're weaker, too.

They're leaning in the wrong direction and it has cost them."

"I don't see how that makes anything better," the Lone Swordsman sighed.

"Earlier, you spoke of a root cause. People being people, was it? Except people are learning, William. Even the other side's noticed, to the extent that they try to bastardize what we are. They say that the Heavens gave us laws, but that's not really true is it? What they actually gave us is guidelines, to make a better world. And it's working."

The Wandering Bard rose to her feet. Almorava wasn't pretty, though in some light she could be called striking. The dark skin, curly hair and strong nose made her face interesting to look at but not so attractive to be intimidating. Normally she had her lute, but tonight it was nowhere in sight. She always wore the same clothes of silk and leather, but this time they were freshly cleaned. And for once she doesn't smell like a brewery, William added a little less kindly.

"Day by day," she said. "Year by year, century by century – we're making Creation a better place. Even the bottom of the barrel is pulled up when you hoist the whole thing."

"It's a pretty thought," the hero said. "Doesn't help all of us who live in Creation now instead of in a hundred years, though."

"I know," she said, laying a hand on his shoulder. "But I don't want you to put that sword into that stone thinking it's for nothing. We're part of something larger than us, William of Greenbury. Something that uses us sorely. But..."

"Good doesn't have to be nice," he quietly echoed her words from earlier. "Just righteous."

[illegible]

oh, and immediately after, wrt your point 1)

[illegible]

He'd shivered, when she'd said his full name. He'd never told it to her, and no one had called him by that in years. What felt like a lifetime ago. Almorava stayed close to him and for a moment he thought she was going to kiss him. She'd certainly not been subtle about being attracted to him, or to quite a few other people. If she did, he would turn away. Instead she lay her head on his chest and looped her arms around him, sighing quietly. After a moment he hugged her back.

"Every time," she whispered. "You poor Contrition fools break my heart every time."

[illegible]

2) is a quote from her convo with Amadeus. "There's something I actually like about you. It's also the thing I hate the most, but it does tend to be that way with villains"

My entire point is that EVEN THOUGH SHE SAID IT RATHER THAN THOUGHT, I think there's no reason to presume it a lie. Again, every sentiment expressed here lines up with what she THOUGHT later, too.

And yes, she detaches herself! How many people do you think she's seen die? How many people has she led to die? OF COURSE she's detached after it's happened. It's absolutely not the same thing as not caring!

NerfGlastigUaine

Well, that was close. Or it probably was. Or she did exactly what the Bard expected. Or it was a Xanatos Gambit with no right answer. Fucking Bard. Who knew that a character who does nothing but talk could be so utterly bullshit.

So in the grand tradition of PGtE comments, does anyone want to make a wild and unsubstantiated yet hilariously confident guess at what Bard's ultimate goal/plan/scheme is? Come on all of you, step up and take a swing!

So far, all we really know is that Neshamah thinks he knows Bard's plan. He finds it base and beneath them and tells Masego it'd doom them all (he may be lying). Of course, he could've been fooled by Bard into thinking he fooled Bard. Oh, and Kairos also plays some role. Probably.

Apocalypse How, World Domination, Flipping off Cthulhu (Gods), actually telling the truth here (doubtful), or baking the World's Largest Cake. All possible endgames for our lovely little conniving schemer! So c'mon fellow readers, it's time to guess!

Andrew Mitchell

No end game... Just keeping the game between above and below going forever and ever, amen.

NerfGlastiqUaine

Suppose that'd fall under Balance Between Good and Evil. I'll add it to the tab.

Mental Mouse

Well, that's her job... but "when the hour is mine, I seek the story that will free Creation", that sounds like she too is plotting against her "betters". Was Arcadia one of her successes, or failures? The "early draft of Creation", caught forever in a loop of stories... but even there, one among them managed to overturn their cycle.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a really good point. Arcadia has moved on from their stasis.

Do we know that the Bard was involved with Arcadia or did she only come about when creation was created?

Agent J

We don't even know if she operates throughout Creation or just Calernia.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point.

Shveiran

We also don't know if anything she said was, you know, genuine.

konstantinvoncarstein

I vote for the cake 😊

haihappen

Unsubstantiated and outrageous claim on what will happen? Count me in!

So, first, I think that the Bard did not lie. Not that It can't, but It simply does not need to: Implying and omitting are usually enough to paint the picture you want others to see. And yes, it seems the Bard just tried to ensnare Cat in multiple stories, all towards the "greater goal".

My personal though is the Bard likes its Tanatos Gambit a little too much. To be fair, it works most of the time, so why not use it?

To get a sense of the goal lets see what the Bard tries/tried to accomplish in the mid-future:

* Eliminate Cat from the equation (She seems to be a Wild Card, uncontrollable)

* Preserve It's own mystique (Cat spilling the beans would be bad in this regard)

* Force a battle between Dead King and everyone else, best at Keter.

The whole thing reeks of a plot inside a plot. The destruction of the Dead King is not the end goal, merely a step towards it.

Possible greater goal: "Humble the Dwarfs"

The Bard said itself, the Kingdom Under soon spans the entire continent. Reasonably, if they succeed in this, the next logical step is take over the surface.

Could assaulting Keter serve a means to drive Him under ground, literally? Which would give the Dwarfs something to worry about and stifle their expansion a bit.

Andrew Mitchell

> Unsubstantiated and outrageous claim on what will happen?
Count me in!

> Possible greater goal: "Humble the Dwarfs"

Interesting ideas there. I hadn't really thought much about them but they may well play a much greater role in the final book.

Liliet

Honestly I think everything she's told Catherine here is the truth. "A good liar finds every lie a fetter" in the epigraph is a hint. Why add complications when you can achieve your purposes by framing the truth in a way that lets you set exactly the hooks you want?

Over the course of this conversation, Catherine could:

- realize that Bard isn't playing against her and get off her case because she's not her enemy;
- accept that Bard is necessary for defeating Neshamah, and get off her case for the sake of that goal;
- appreciate Bard's full purpose and personal goal and ally with her in it or at least get off her case because it's fine with her;
- get scared of what she's meddling in and get off her case to avoid getting steamrolled;
- not take any of the above and decide to secretly plot against her.

ALL of these outcomes would see Bard's purpose done.

And “I believe she just tried to kill me” CATHERINE YOU ARE THE ONE WHO PICKED THE LAST, AND THE ONLY LETHAL, OPTION

Faiir

We’ve seen Bard supposedly ally with people and then leave them on their own.

Since she’s:

1. unaccountable (we don’t know any way to actually hurt/stop her if she wants to do wrong)
2. untrustworthy
3. stupidly powerful (through her meddling)
4. actually wants to meddle

I don’t see much difference between saying “Yea Bard, do your thing” or converting to Greater Good – in both cases you’re expected to “believe ambiguous immortal creatures without question, when they assure you they’re doing you a favour”.

I’m still firmly in Bard = the Enemy camp.

Liliet

I’m kind of curious to hear Hanno’s opinion about Bard now – after all, he’s genre savvy to an even more unhealthy degree than Cat (Rafaella and Alkmene bickering gives them plot armor as comic relief!), and his band was used as a tool and mostly broken in the process, in that plot.

Faiir

What? Another thing I totally missed from his characterization.

I had him pegged as the “go with the flow” guy, rather than an intense planner 😊

Liliet

Oh, he goes with the flow alright. He’s just hyperaware of what the flow IS.

Genre savvy and mastermind are distinct skills and you can be one without being the other – see Malicia XD

Shveiran

...are we talking about the same guy, here? Because he hasn’t been able to use narrative to his advantage on either of the two challenges we saw him face.

Now, granted, Black is very good at that and Hanno is clearly very competent. He is planner, and a clever one, as well as aware of the power of narrative.

Just..."more aware than Cat", really? Black had him eat a pattern of three out of his hand, and by this point I feel the Black Queen has plainly accomplished more with Story-fu than her mentor.

Liliet

Mmm.

"Being aware of something" and "being able to use it to your advantage" are two different things measured on two different scales. Cat periodically loses track of narrative implications of things, too (see: the beginning of a pattern of three with Pilgrim).

I probably exaggerated when I said he was MORE hyperaware than Cat.

But we haven't heard Cat consider which of her friends get comic relief plot armor.

>Black had him eat a pattern of three out of his hand
?

Shveiran

Black3Hanno: Amadeus' parting words with Hanno were "enjoy your victory, White Knight" before the other beheaded the body double.

If I'm not mistaken, I think he commented he "now had a pattern of 3 with the White Knight" after he returned from the Free Cities.

Considering that could be considered a draw (they were both incapacitated) that means the Black Knight was guaranteed a victory over Hanno.

I'm not sure if that still counts after he lost his name, though? I think so, but we have no clear evidence. The only similar change we saw was Aqua, and she changed her Name only after the pattern was resolved.

Cat just dragged the rogue sorcerer though a hook and chain to grant him precisely that armor, and constantly considers what she and their friends do in terms of what stories it shapes. Indrani was scared by that even while Cat was in the fullness of her mantle, and her clarity has only grown since.

Hanno, again, is competent in this regards, but all we've seen so far is him being aware of the matter and trying to step carefully while facing a pivotal battle – a moment where he knew he had to pay attention.

I agree that's leagues above most character, and he definitely belongs in the big league.
But Cat, Pilgrim and Black have shown a lot more skill, in my opinion.

Then again, Hanno is not someone we have seen a lot of yet. He may yet prove to be a story-fu black belt, why not?

Liliet

>If I'm not mistaken, I think he commented he "now had a pattern of 3 with the White Knight" after he returned from the Free Cities.

No, he didn't. It wasn't a pattern of 3, the fated defeat was bc of the coin judgement.

>Cat just dragged the rogue sorcerer though a hook and chain to grant him precisely that armor >and constantly considers what she and their friends do in terms of what stories it shapes.

...quote???

Indrani was scared by that even while Cat was in the fullness of her mantle

Yep, Indrani was scared by the thing Cat does
WHICH ALSO CONSTANTLY FEATURES IN HANNO'S NARRATION

>Hanno, again, is competent in this regards, but all we've seen so far is him being aware of the matter and trying to step carefully while facing a pivotal battle – a moment where he knew he had to pay attention.

Which one?

>But Cat, Pilgrim and Black have shown a lot more skill, in my opinion.

I am yet again not disputing that????

I am not saying Hanno is a master of USING stories to his advantage.

I am saying he is remarkable AWARE of them (without changing anything, mostly going with the flow)

Shveiran

Me too.

But the most important point, to me, is that for all the reasons you listed, the Bard could never be trusted. We have no idea what she wants, she sees farthest than most, and is an extremely skilled liar and manipulator.

Catherine, or anyone else with a relevant goal, has no way too cooperate or ally with her: you can trust the Bard and allow her to guide you, or start the uphill struggle that is trying to prevent her from manipulating you. There is no way for a relationship between peers to be established.

Liliet

Catherine Foundling: is that a challenge I hear?

Shveiran

True enough, she has done the impossible time and again. But bridging this gap without apotheosis sounds... doubtful.

Faiir

Hold my Summer Vale Wine!

Agent J

> CATHERINE YOU ARE THE ONE WHO PICKED THE LAST, AND THE ONLY LETHAL, OPTION

It's kind of in her nature. Bard's approach was the exact kind of thing that'd have Cat's instincts screaming enemy. The way she was shifting stories and all too subtly manoeuvring Catherine somewhere would only ever put Cat on edge and there's only one response she has when figures of obscure motives are putting her on edge. Murder them... or set fire to the board. Okay, she has two responses.

Either way, Indrani had the right of it when Pilgrim tried to pull the same bullshit back in the shattered shard of Arcadia that became Twilight's Way.

"And you say such an approach would be a mistake," the Pilgrim carefully said. "It would be considered hostile?"

"More like a waste of time, and probably her a trial on her patience," Archer absent-mindedly said. "If she notices, which she will, because you've tried to kill her a few times so she's paying attention."

—

“Look, you’re trying to deal with us like we’re skittish fucking horses in need of your reins,” Indrani said. “Throw that to the side, ‘cause that ride ends with your throat cut open. Probably by me, ‘cause let’s face it I’m quicker on the draw than Hakram. You want to know what she wants? Sit across a table with her with a decent bottle and politely ask.”

—

I actually think the Bard knew this, that she was preying on Cat’s nature as much as Cat was preying on the nature of Saint, Tyrant, and the Pilgrim during the Princes’ Graveyard. That the only lethal outcome was the one Bard was aiming for, knowing full well Catherine would naturally be disinclined to bite at the other stories.

As for the implication I’m reading in your statements, that Cat would have been better off allying with the Bard instead of actively antagonizing her? I don’t buy that. Even if she’s as apathetic to the Accords as she suggests, her very existence should not be tolerated anymore than the Dead King’s, at least by Catherine.

She’s the antithesis of Cat. She serves the Gods as “envoy when it waxes beyond restraint”, while my perspective on Cat is that she serves mortals against the predation of the Gods. To shatter their shackles and restraints. If the Bard supports the Accords, then they do not go far enough. Though, I suppose that’s rather the point. To sideline and not eradicate the Gods need for conflict and “dues”.

Either way, Cat is the last person who’s goals can be reconciled with the Bard’s. Hells Black just wants a genuine win for Evil and that could be reconciled. Catherine wants the Pricks Above and the Wretches Below to shut the fuck up and keep Calernia out of their godsdamned pissing match.

Ergo, Bard must die by the end of this.

Liliet

>As for the implication I’m reading in your statements, that Cat would have been better off allying with the Bard instead of actively antagonizing her? I don’t buy that.

Nah, that’s not really my implication. My implication is only that Bard would have been fine with those outcomes as well, which means describing the whole conversation as Bard “trying to kill her” is a bit disingenious on Catherine’s part.

>That the only lethal outcome was the one Bard was aiming for, knowing full well Catherine would naturally be disinclined to bite at the other stories.

Liliet

FUCK
THIS SHIT
lets try again

> That the only lethal outcome was the one Bard was aiming for, knowing full well Catherine would naturally be disinclined to bite at the other stories.

You're suggesting a very specific level of Cat-prediction to Bard. Which is I mean exactly what Cat is thinking, but the thing IS that I think she's... indulging her paranoia. The truth is somewhere between Bard hoping Catherine takes one of the earlier baits, and Bard expecting exactly the outcome that happened – Catherine has good instincts, and Bard has acknowledged that about her to Neshamah out loud.

I would say this was a test, on a level. If Catherine manages to pick the outcome that gets her killed, RIP because that's exactly the level of thinking on which she'd be an unpleasant nuisance. If Catherine takes the earlier outs, well she's no threat. If Catherine manages to pass the whole of it, though – well, she's rewarded with some juicy juicy intel on top of what she already had.

I refuse to believe Bard entirely didn't see an outcome this simple coming.

(It's specifically the simplicity of it – the world split into two possibilities "does Catherine change her mind on talking with Pilgrim or not", and Bard would have considered the second one too)

>She serves the Gods as "envoy when it waxes beyond restraint"

You do remember that 'wax' is the opposite of 'wane', right? She stands AGAINST ruin when there's TOO MUCH of it.

>my perspective on Cat is that she serves mortals against the predation of the Gods. To shatter their shackles and restraints.

One character in this chapter has said she seeks to free Creation. Remind me again which one it was?...

>If the Bard supports the Accords, than they do not go far enough. Though, I suppose that's rather the point. To sideline and not eradicate the Gods need for conflict and "dues".

Mhm. They deliberately don't go too far, so that they won't be controversial and instead will be effective.

>Either way, Cat is the last person who's goals can be reconciled with the Bard's. Hells Black just wants a genuine win for Evil and that could be reconciled. Catherine wants the Pricks Above and the Wretches Below to shut the fuck up and keep Calernia out of their godsdamned pissing match.

And Bard's "when the hour is mine, I seek to free Creation" refers to?...

>Ergo, Bard must die by the end of this.

My prediction about how this is going to go:
Bard agrees.
Catherine does not.

That Guy

Masego referred Creation as a set of boundaries(bindings) set by the Gods.
One of the Original laws is that something cannot be created from nothing.
Freeing Creation could be viewed as finally settling the Bet and ending Creation.
I seriously doubt Catherine would want that.

Liliet

I seriously doubt that's what Bard wants.

Mental Mouse

> I would say this was a test, on a level. If Catherine manages to pick the outcome that gets her killed, RIP because that's exactly the level of thinking on which she'd be an unpleasant nuisance. If Catherine takes the earlier outs, well she's no threat. If Catherine manages to pass the whole of it, though – well, she's rewarded with some juicy juicy intel on top of what she already had.

This. You can't trick a force of nature... but you can negotiate with it according to its own rules. Come to think of it, this arguably applies to both Bard and Cat herself.

Liliet

Haha, yep.

Godhunter comes for you...

Agent J

> The truth is somewhere between Bard hoping Catherine takes one of the earlier baits, and Bard expecting exactly the outcome that happened –

I agree wholeheartedly. All I'd add is "hope, but doubt". If Cat is willing or able to not be a dangerous wild card Bard would be perfectly happy to not have another fire to put out, but given our girl's full name is Catherine Fire Foundling, she never really believed that was going to be an option.

> I would say this was a test, on a level.

Again, agree. Which is why I likened it to Pilgrim's play with Roland in Twilight's Way, and quoted Indrani's poignant commentary on the matter.

> You do remember that 'wax' is the opposite of 'wane', right? She stands AGAINST ruin when there's TOO MUCH of it.

It's a difference of interpretation, Liliet, not my having a poor grasp on the English language. The line is preceded by,

"I'm what was made so that no one ever eats the world,"

So what's the 'ruin' she's talking about... and whose? We know that immortals were made static so they cannot, over accumulated time, acquire the power/knowledge to threaten their Creators. Likewise, mortals were made, well, mortal so that, even with the ability to grow and evolve they will never have the time necessary to gather enough power/knowledge to threaten their Creators.

Which brings me back to the quote, "I am herald before the ruin; envoy when it waxes beyond restraint." She's the balance the Gods use to check their creations should any manage to break the shackles.

> One character in this chapter has said she seeks to free Creation. Remind me again which one it was?...

Is it the ambiguous immortal creature? Because, unlike Catherine, I don't actually make it a point to believe those without question when they assure us they're doing mortals a favour.

> Mhm. They deliberately don't go too far, so that they won't be controversial and instead will be effective.

Controversial with the other nations? Perhaps, but I'm of the belief that she also didn't want to give the Gods an in. Grant them the right to stomp both feet on the scales because she's overreaching and trying to deny them their "due".

> And Bard's "when the hour is mine, I seek to free Creation" refers to?...

I am a purple elephant with pink polka dots. This is evidently true, because I have stated it to be so.

More seriously, is that really her goal or just a plausible goal she knows Cat would agree with? How much has what she's been saying actually true. Not all of it, surely. Cat caught her in one lie already. If uttering her Name was enough to garner her attention she'd have been part of Cat and Kairos' horse trading show.

So, if not 100%, how much truth has been spoken here? Most of it? Half? None? Hells, even if what she's saying is true, that doesn't mean she hasn't weaponized that as well. Or that it makes her a workable ally. William trusted her to the hilt and where is he now? Pilgrim trusts her to the hilt and his best friend's a rotting corpse. The Ashen Priestess trusted her without question and she was, essentially, bled at the altar so as to grant them enough weight for Sabah's head.

Whether her schemes succeed or fail, her "allies" drop like flies and their goals or may not be accomplished.

So, if you can't trust her word on her own stated goals, and you can't trust her schemes not to involve your brutal murder, and you can't trust her to treat your own goals as anything more than the quaint affectations of a delightfully sentient chess piece then which of the stories this eldritch creature offered would honestly be the most palatable to someone as ruthless, pragmatic, genre-savvy, strong willed, and hyper paranoid as Catherine Bloody Foundling.

Answer: None of the above.

Which is what she chose.

Black had was right. Better to knock your own ass out than to talk to that thing. And if you're, unfortunately, just an astral projection stuck in a conversation with her, than the best move is to do as Cat did. Ignore the bitch and do whatever you were going to do anyway.

Andrew Mitchell

> our girl's full name is Catherine Fire Foundling

That's "Catherine Goblin-fire Foundling." 😊

> More seriously, is that really her goal or just a plausible goal she knows Cat would agree with?

> And if you're, unfortunately, just an astral projection stuck in a conversation with her, than the best move is to do as Cat did. Ignore the bitch and do whatever you were going to do anyway.

Well argued!

Liliet

>I agree wholeheartedly. All I'd add is "hope, but doubt". If Cat is willing or able to not be a dangerous wild card Bard would be perfectly happy to not have another fire to put out, but given our girl's full name is Catherine Fire Foundling, she never really believed that was going to be an option.

Mhm. Honestly, I suspect Bard might have been HOPING more for the outcome that really did happen – though that's speculation 😊

>Again, agree. Which is why I likened it to Pilgrim's play with Roland in Twilight's Way, and quoted Indrani's poignant commentary on the matter.

Mhm ♥ ♥ Cat caught her in one lie already. If uttering her Name was enough to garner her attention she'd have been part of Cat and Kairos' horse trading show.

No? First of all, Bard never said that she couldn't talk to Catherine before now, merely implied it, and there's a difference between outright stated facts and implications, because it's the implications that are meant to mislead.

Second, Catherine says herself that this part makes sense: Kairos has carefully crafted a blind spot for her using Hierarch.

What Catherine questions is, in fact, the reason WHY would Bard want to talk to her.

> am a purple elephant with pink polka dots. This is evidently true, because I have stated it to be so.
>More seriously, is that really her goal or just a plausible goal she knows Cat would agree with? How much has what she's been saying actually true. Not all of it, surely.

See the epigraph. Why would she tell lies if truth is perfectly usable to craft the desired implications?

>Hells, even if what she's saying is true, that doesn't mean she hasn't weaponized that as well. Or that it makes her a workable ally. William trusted her to the hilt and where is he now? Pilgrim trusts her to the hilt and his best friend's a rotting corpse. The Ashen Priestess trusted her without question and she was, essentially, bled at the altar so as to grant them enough weight for Sabah's head.
Whether her schemes succeed or fail, her "allies" drop like flies and their goals or may not be accomplished.

That much is true as fuck.

...What were we arguing about, again?

Liliet

Fuck,, I accidnally scrolled pas haf your commenary when first answering.

>We know that immortals were made static so they cannot, over accumulated time, acquire the power/knowledge to threaten their Creators.

What, you mean Neshamah's interpretation that he explained to Bard like she was naive about it?

>Controversial with the other nations? Perhaps, but I'm of the belief that she also didn't want to give the Gods an in. Grant them the right to stomp both feet on the scales because she's overreaching and trying to deny them their "due".

Yeah, that's exactly what I mean. Catherine doesn't want to mess with the Gods' Game too much because that's what gets the board flipped over.

Shveiran

This. Thank you.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

> baking the World's Largest Cake.

Nah, she doesn't glow orange.

Andrew Mitchell

Reference acknowledged. 😊

Decius

Bard is aware that she's in a story, can only interact with characters who either have special significance to the story or are otherwise aware of it...

Bard's goal is that PGtE doesn't end, because that's the only way for her to die with no hope of return. Bard is not limited to appeals to the characters, but is also capable of interacting with the readers and author to that end; it won't be as directly as with the characters, if she is good at it, because readers realizing that a character is interacting with them are likely to reject the work, which is one of the things that can permanently cause her to no longer live.

Dresdenfle

My guess is that they Bard just wants to die. She's been forced into this role for who knows how long, never even living out a full lifetime. That sounds like a punishment from the gods, maybe for fucking up and helping the creation of the Dead King. We already know there is usually a balance to these things, so below gets an immortal tool, and above gets one as well. The only way she can die is for Neshama to die

Liliet

She existed and was Intercessor before Dead King's rise.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

No ultimate goal at all because she's Dread Emperor Traitorous in disguise, of course!

NerfGlastigUaine

Damn, I should've thought of that one. Would that fall under Multilayer Facade, For the Lulz, or Chronic Backstabbing Disorder?

Liliet

You don't have to pick just one 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

Does it mean that Cordelia is developing a Name? If yes, would it be villainous or heroic? I can see both happening.

Faiir

Based on the quote a few chapters before I'd guess a Villain.

Liliet

It might be actually Neutral Hierarch-style, with tentative allegiance to whichever side the current holder believes will help their purposes. I could genuinely see Cordelia turning to Below in this situation, but I don't think I see her developing a Name bound to it, since her philosophy and her goals remain very... distinct from Below's.

Faiir

Can you expand on why you think her philosophy doesn't fit Below?

I don't really remember this being an issue.

Or I'll need to reread the guide again 😊

Liliet

Cordelia's philosophy fits Below in the sense that LITERALLY ANYTHING fits Below. However, it's not Below-based – she believes in the strong protecting the weak, at the core of it.

Shveiran

Sure. And yet so does Catherine, and that never became an issue.

denimcurtain

Well it arguably did become an issue at times. Not one that kept her from having a villain name but she has been chastised by the below through the lessened power at least once. You could also argue that her current lack of a villainous name reflects the evolution of her philosophy. Black stands as another example.

Don't know if I'd say that means Cordelia can't get a villainous name but a philosophy incongruent with evil actions does affect support from the Below.

Another perspective worth considering is that I don't think you can become a villainous name by accident. It's a choice, right? If so then acting villainous shouldn't mean as much as people are thinking. After all, Hierarch was able to reject that choice.

Liliet

Fallen Heroes are a thing.

For that though, Cordelia would need to have been a Hero first.

Shveiran

Cat lost her name by embracing a bigger mantle, and doesn't have a Name now because she is doing something unprecedented and new. She may get a name, but there isn't yet enough of a culture behind it to shape it. Villany is not the problem here.

Black lost his Name by acting NOTKnightly, not by acting Good. He was starving a country at the time, for Sisters sake, not handing out flowers.

The conflict came by him no longer being an enforcer for Praes, but someone doing his own thing. That put too much stress on his Name, already weakened by his staying clear of tropes, and his overuse of his Aspect turned him into a claimant of the Emperor Name.

Likewise, Cat's Squire weakened when she steered away from Black's will and orders (the Knight she was apprenticing with) like when she didn't kill the Swordsman. She went against him, while also not planning to backstab him, and that brought her outside the shape of the Squire.

denimcurtain

Their actions were arguably driven by their ideology. I understand that you can attempt to untwine all that but I don't think it makes sense to dismiss it out of hand.

Liliet

Yes, but Catherine has deliberately chosen to ally herself with Below and villains, her Role revolving around that. Black Queen was a Name based on her allying with the Empress and turning on Good fangs bared; I don't think we'd have liked what would have become of Catherine had she gone down that path.

Cordelia's Role, what she's desperately doing, is preserving her country and those she sees herself as responsible for. Any positioning she does is not something she's committing to as a philosophical argument (unlike Catherine with her 'justification matters only to the just'), it's a move made out of desperation. Any alliance with Evil she might make would be a situational thing, not impacting what the core of the Role that she would be creating is – unless you are saying that there's a cultural imperative in Procer for a ruler Name revolving around being Evil?

Shveiran

I'm saying that there is nothing inherently not Below about protecting yours, so long as you refuse any limit coming from outside with regards to how you can act out that mandate.

As Faiir says, "gather personal power to make the world as it should be" according to your interpretation.

Cordelia and Cat both are willing to take whatever choice they feel is necessary to achieve their goals and protect their own.

Cat may have preeched the "Justifications only matter to the just", but that has always been bullshit. She was still taking a stand at Marchford because she was unwilling to leave her people to die: nothing had changed.

The difference between the two is not one of MORALITY, it is one of AVAILABLE TOOLS.

Cordelia was simply immersed in a name-poor culture with a goodish-morality (or rather, a goodish coat of paint) while Cat could ally with Below or die immediately. That's it.

Liliet

I'm not saying there's a difference in morality between the two, I'm saying there's a difference in their STORY.

Shveiran

That much I have no problem agreeing with, but does that prevent Cordelia from embracing villainy?

It's not like there is one story per side, after all.

Liliet

My point was that if a new Name is birthed out of what Cordelia is doing it likely won't be an exclusively villainous one (like Black Knight)

Faiir

From my POV the Below's philosophy is "Gather personal power to make the world as it should be".
She very much follows the first part (her solution to internal issues is taking more power for herself) and has a strong view of how the world should look.

Going from (Strong should protect the weak) -> (I'm strong) -> (I should protect the weak) doesn't seem that far?

So I don't really agree that anything fits below? You can still fail the 'personal power' part (the Below clause), or 'world should be as I expect' part (the general Name clause) 😊

Fayhem

I'd quibble with "as it should be" – that suggests a moral imperative, which doesn't really line up with Below as I see it. If anything you could pitch that as a description of what many Above-aligned Named seem to want. I'd call it more "make the world as you'd like it to be." That's not intrinsically incompatible with wanting to make things work right (take Catherine for an example), but neither is it really inherently the same IMO. In Venn diagram terms the circles overlap (which is why Cat has, albeit eventually, been able to establish common cause with outright Heroes without switching teams herself) but they definitely aren't just the same circle.

Faiir

I thought the "according to me" at the end of "as it should be" was implied 😊
But I agree.

Fayhem

Probably it was! There's a reason I went with "quibble" lol.

Liliet

Yeah. Black's "what do you think is right and how far would you go to see it done" isn't quite Below's philosophy (there's a reason he's insisting there's no such thing XD)

Liliet

I mean from that point of view literally every hero falls under Below's philosophy. So wrt this I'm using "Below's philosophy" to mean "variations that aren't literally Above's philosophy"

Faiir

I don't think Grey Pilgrim sought personal power at any point I remember?
Saint didn't seem to either.

Liliet

Training to take on stronger enemies and protect people more effectively is also seeking personal power (just not the political kind), so yes Saint most definitely did.

As did Champion etc, most heroes. Tariq belongs if anything to an exception category in that he didn't want to be a Hero in the first place, and was reluctant to follow the Ophanim's guidance except that it allowed him to do so much good.

Fayhem

> It might be actually Neutral Hierarch-style, with tentative allegiance to whichever side the current holder believes will help their purposes.

IIRC we have Word of EE that there are no Neutral names as such. From the way you describe it though, it sounds like probably you mean more a variable-allegiance Name? Where whether they're a Villain or a Hero depends on what story they're in (which EE has confirmed is a thing). Personally I'd call Ranger a clearer example of that though. Given that Hierarch's signature aspect is basically a spontaneous French Revolution-style Reign of Terror I doubt he'll be winding up in any Heroic stories anytime soon, or ever.

But regarding your larger point, yeah I'd def agree that even if Cordy gets a Villain name I doubt very much she'll become a proponent of capital-E Evil any time literally ever. She may be an atypical example of her people, but deep down she's still Lycaonese to the bone. Her version of a Villain story would be something more like "well-intentioned extremist/madwoman" – the classic "they meant well but they went too far and had to be stopped" plotline.

Liliet

>IIRC we have Word of EE that there are no Neutral names as such.

We don't. People keep saying that but it's not recorded anywhere, and it's likely the comment on there being no cultural imperative for Grey Knight on Calernia was confused for that.

>From the way you describe it though, it sounds like probably you mean more a variable-allegiance Name? Where whether they're a Villain or a Hero depends on what story they're in (which EE has confirmed is a thing).

Which is explicitly in the narrative a thing, see: Squire.

Anyway, yes, that's exactly what I meant.

>But regarding your larger point, yeah I'd def agree that even if Cordy gets a Villain name I doubt very much she'll become a proponent of capital-E Evil any time literally ever. She may be an atypical example of her people, but deep down she's still Lycaonese to the bone. Her version of a Villain story would be something more like "well-intentioned extremist/madwoman" – the classic "they meant well but they went too far and had to be stopped" plotline.

Mm!

I just really hope not – or that there'll be another resolution)=

Fayhem

> We don't. People keep saying that but it's not recorded anywhere, and it's likely the comment on there being no cultural imperative for Grey Knight on Calernia was confused for that.

Huh, yeah. I just read/searched through the Google Doc for Word of EE because I'm like that, and yep. Unless the both of us have missed something elsewhere, that seems to be a mostly-baseless assumption that people (including me!) just kind of cottoned on to in the comments.

Although, given that the Gods seem pretty invested in their established dynamic I wouldn't be surprised if any properly Neutral-type Names that cropped up got quietly pruned back out by the likes of Bard (along with the Named holding them, I'd expect) as extraneous to requirements/potentially muddying the desired dichotomy from being clearly drawn.

> Which is explicitly in the narrative a thing, see: Squire.

Lol I know, that was what the parenthetical in the bit you quoted was about. Thanks for confirming I did read your meaning correctly, though.

> I just really hope not – or that there'll be another resolution)=

Same! The more I look at it, the more it seems to me that Saint's (presumably Bard-prompted) speech to Cordy was in the way of a story-based trap that Cordy wouldn't have the perspective/background to spot and avoid – a pretty damn clever mode of assassination, honestly. I mean, the speech's main effects were to a) make Cordelia markedly more desperate and b) alienate her from the Heavens. Which has a pretty clear shape to it. And villain stories have a very high likelihood to be fatal for the villains in them, particularly when the villain in question lacks any background or training in story-fu.

But hey, who do we know who excels in breaking story traps and is heading to Salia right hecking now? CATHERINE AND CORDELIA FUTURE BFFS CONFIRMED. Of course, things were always leading that way since it's the only way it would make sense that Cordelia will be officiating at Cat and Rozala's wedding. 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't think there are neutral Names. We learn in the prologue that Named are empowered by Above or Below. Which means there are either Heroes or Villains.

Shveiran

Yes, it isn't a matter of "quiet pruning" as much as it is of "lack of a power source"

Liliet

> We learn in the prologue that Named are empowered by Above or Below.

Don't take the holy book too literally.

It's canon in-story that Ranger and Archer are ambiguous, and Thief switched allegiance without her power source having any problem with it (when Catherine's Squire name reared and bucked just at her not killing a hero).

Shveiran

But that's because Ranger and Archer are names based on a loner that does her own thing, Thief is the Name of someone who is being a dick mostly against people who deserve it, and Squire is a path toward Knighthood whereas Cat went against her mentor's will without being willing to stab him over it.

The lack or presence of Name conflict is linked to the Name's shape, not with their allying or not with the other side. There is no real inconsistency, just a different criteria.

A Name like the Uncompromising Crusader may be strained by allying with a Villain, but in general, the mere fact they are cooperating brings no problem.

Fayhem

Eh, the quote from the Book of All Things in the prologue does state that

> Through the passing of the years grooves appeared in the workings of Fate, patterns repeated until they came into existence easier than not, and those grooves came to be called Roles. The Gods gifted these Roles with Names, and with those came power but it's not like we haven't seen before that the House of Light/Book of All Things can shade the truth to suit their narrative. If they gave the Gods credit for something they didn't directly do to feed their religious narrative, who would be able to prove them wrong? So how can we just take the fact that they say it as proof that they're right?

I mean, you say:

> The lack or presence of Name conflict is linked to the Name's shape, not with their allying or not with the other side.

but it seems like you could at least plausibly also state that as "the lack or presence of a Name is linked to the Name's Role, not with their allying or not with a side." And even in the Book of All Things it reads like it's saying the Roles took form prior to the Gods getting involved.

Or, maybe it is all from the Gods in one way or another – Amadeus was certainly ready to ascribe the loss of his Name to the Gods Below, and he's hardly a believer in the Book of All Things (to say the least). Or, maybe the Gods gave Names power in the beginning but now the Names hold power regardless of the Gods' specific will in the matter. Personally I'd call it indeterminate, really – I personally lean towards Names growing directly from Roles, but I'll admit that has as much to do with my individual preferences as with solid textual evidence.

Liliet

>Although, given that the Gods seem pretty invested in their established dynamic I wouldn't be surprised if any properly Neutral-type Names that cropped up got quietly pruned back out by the likes of Bard (along with the Named holding them, I'd expect) as extraneous to requirements/potentially muddying the desired dichotomy from being clearly drawn.

Do they really seem so? Based on what?

I mean, yeah, Bard appeared to kick Hierarch's ass into gear, but he's kind of a major political figure. I imagine folks like Ranger get genuinely left alone as long as they're not meddling with anything.

>Same! The more I look at it, the more it seems to me that Saint's (presumably Bard-prompted) speech to Cordy was in the way of a story-based trap that Cordy wouldn't have the perspective/background to spot and avoid – a pretty damn clever mode of assassination, honestly. I mean, the speech's main effects were to a) make Cordelia markedly more desperate and b) alienate her from the Heavens. Which has a pretty clear shape to it. And villain stories have a very high likelihood to be fatal for the villains in them, particularly when the villain in question lacks any background or training in story-fu.

The problem with this is, Cordelia is Bard's COUP here. She's scribbling all over the lines Nessie patiently and carefully drew, rejoining the Lycaonese to the Principate meaningfully and getting the whole CONTINENT together to fight the good fight. She's also got Augur by her side, which gives Bard leverage.

No, it's story bait alright, but an assassination doesn't make sense as a goal. Not every story that POTENTIALLY COULD end in a person's death is ultimately meant to, don't listen to Catherine's paranoia.

Fayhem

> Do they really seem so? Based on what?

Based on the fact that settling something by matching each side of that dichotomy up against the other is the only reason that Creation exists at all. That'd be the first thing that come to mind, and I'd call it a (more than) sufficient reason by itself.

Regarding Ranger though, I meant something different by "properly Neutral-type Names" that I think I didn't communicate clearly when I said it. Ranger doesn't really drive any stories with any greater weight than "I'ma hunt it, because I'm cool like that"; outside of that she's a participant in stories, but not a driver of them, and there's no particular difficulty in slotting her into them even if she might get slotted into different sides depending on the story. Put another way, she might change sides because she's got no ideological commitments outside of "I DO WHAT I WANT, DAD" but she doesn't stand apart from them and drive stories that meaningfully diverge from the Good/Evil dichotomy. You alluded to Bard "kicking Hierarch into gear"; remember that her pitch to him wasn't "be a hero", it was just "pick a side, because you have to pick one" and her failure state was that he refused to. So Ranger might get largely left alone, but I doubt very much that Hierarch will be, and I don't think anyone like him would be let be either regardless of whether they currently held major political power.

> The problem with this is, Cordelia is Bard's COUP here.

If you take Bard at her word, maybe. I'm going to respectfully decline to do that. Remember that Nessie's take when he got a peek at Bard's goal was "they'll all turn on you if they know this"; do you really think "I want to kill the Dead King and bring more unity to Procer and also the continent" would result in literally anyone turning on her, much less everyone?

Liliet

> drive stories that meaningfully diverge from the Good/Evil dichotomy

Yep agreed.

>Remember that Nessie's take when he got a peek at Bard's goal was "they'll all turn on you if they know this"; do you really think "I want to kill the Dead King and bring more unity to Procer and also the continent" would result in literally anyone turning on her, much less everyone?

1. Absolutely nothing could possibly result in all people/heroes/Named turning on Bard if told by Neshamah, they simply wouldn't take his word for it.
2. I'm not buying Neshamah really won that one. The trick with a spell hidden in a body was too simple.

Fayhem

1. What? No. The quote from Nessie wasn't "they'll all turn on you if I tell them this" it was "they'll all turn on you if they know". That's very much different. The point I was making wasn't anything about whether DK will be telling people whatever it was he saw, the point was that whatever DK got a look at can't have been anything as innocuous as what Bard is claiming or DK wouldn't have had that reaction to it.

2. We'll see. Overestimating someone can be just as much of a mistake as underestimating them. And literally the origin of Dead King was him successfully getting one past the Intercessor, and I expect neither of them have gotten dumber since. According to Neshamah at least, each of them have successfully won exchanges against the other over the course of their mutual history. So unless your thesis is that Bard has been deliberately throwing the encounter and losing on purpose every time Neshamah thinks he won each and every time over the course of literally millennia without Neshamah even realizing it (in which case she's literally unbeatable as unless Neshamah's an easily fooled idiot – he isn't – she's functionally omniscient to have pulled that off and might as well be a God-with-a-capital-G), then he definitely is capable of getting things past her.

But like I said, we'll see. 😊

Liliet

No, I think normally he pulled one over on her by acting in her actual blind spots while she was busy elsewhere. That situation was actively monitored by her and had more than one agent fully willing to follow her instructions without explanation.

SpeckofStardust

The fact that at no point did the bard tell her not to gun for her has me very much thinking she wouldn't mind the whole dying part. Now she implied it so heavily it was felt but she never said it.

So... bard is aiming to die. That's my guess in the ring.

Liliet

...I believe Bard might be conflicted on the point 😊

Mental Mouse

Or Bard's just confident that her essential self is honest-to-goodness (and treachery-to-evil 😊) immortal and indestructable.

Consider that this is a world where magic can damage mortal souls (see the immediate aftermath of Warlock's strike and Masego's break). Bard has nevertheless survived 3000 and more years in this world, including repeated face-offs with an immortal undead god... who is definitely capable of manipulating souls, because we saw where he'd carved off a bit of his own..

laguz24

For the question on who wanted to rule over their creations vs guide them to better things. Personally, I think that that line is split between good and evil. What divides good and evil is the focus on the individual vs the community.

Faiir

I don't really agree – the split seems to be more on “Do as I want you to” for Good and “Do whatever you want” for Evil. Both can lead to either good or evil situations from our point of view – Good can be a Benevolent or tyrannical Dictator, while Evil can empower either psychopathic murderers or Cats 😊

The biggest push against Good in the comments seems to be “We want to screw ourselves up on our own terms!”

Andrew Mitchell

> Good can be a Benevolent or tyrannical Dictator

Either way, there's still a dictator.... And that's the problem.

> “We want to screw ourselves up on our own terms!”

Exactly! 😊

Liliet

I think Evil wants their creations to rule over their other creations. That's what WoG about nearly all Names on the evil side of the fence having powers to impose their will on others implies. While Good wants to guide everyone to better things with a focus on community yeah (also in WoG).

Xinci

Indeed I wonder at what lies she may have told. Though to be honest I presume her comments may bring the wrong conclusion simply due to warped perception. From the Neshamah's own revelation I can presume freedom is indeed what she seeks. What the entails for a entangled world is probably the main element of antagonism Masego could have given Cat information on. Quite interesting to see how exactly the Dead King was weakening the Lycaonese, though I am a bit surprised he hasn't been tailoring expansions on the sly underground. Specifically would have thought he would adapt specialized underground undead given his expertise in tailoring specialized undead. If stiffness was the issue on creating new forms then surely traps like the one he layed for Masego could get him the workforce he needs? That particular method seems relatively safe for him. Though I do suppose he is...wasteful, so perhaps thats why he didnt try to adapt to the issue in a multi-pronged manner.

This was a excellent confirmation on what the bard is, role wise at least and a bit on her abilities. Do wonder if she meddled with the Sisters so they haven't remodeled the Drow(though Cat structuring them into enforcers for the Accords would probably keep them off of the "grey goo" category that necessitates intervention from Bard. So quite a enjoyable chapter.

edrey

yeah cat, shot her under truce baner just like that prince. but the question now is how?
contacting the Dk should be possible, the hierarch is a blank point and he has that vision aspect, and the sisters know about it since the last epilogue.
he is the key in the end

Liliet

The Prince didn't have the truce banner.

konstantinvoncarstein

It was the personal banner of the Prince, but not a truce banner

Javvies

...

Fucking Bard.

She needs to be dealt with, preferably in a permanent manner.

And I don't think we can trust anything that she says about the Dead King and the Tower meddling in the formation of Procer to keep the First Prince from becoming a Name.

Though ... there's probably some measure of truth in that the Dead King has tended to attack the Lycaonese instead of the Alamans for reasons of his own. I'm just not sure we can believe her about what those reasons might be.

Xinci

A ironic thing in the end too. Given the removal of the lycaonese meant a common threat. And a common threat great enough to possibly form a Name.

Shveiran

I was thinking about that... WHY does Procer have so little Names? There doesn't seem to be a reason for it given what we know of Name lore.

I mean, an alaman Poet Duelist? A lycanoneese Champion or Defender?

It's not like the Procerans do not have an established culture... so why isn't it happening? If either DK or WB are intervening, how can they possibly be achieving this result?

Andrew Mitchell

Great questions... I hope someone else comes up with some answers.

Mental Mouse

DK has been around longer than Procer – the Bard explained that he has been manipulating their culture to prevent Names like that from rising against him.

Shveiran

Right, but even assuming that's true, my question is HOW has he done it.

With the tools at his disposal, I can easily see how he could be crafting divides between the kingdoms. But how could he be preventing Names from appearing?

Faiir

Well, if you've seen your Defender rise from the grave and murder half of their city, you wouldn't really sing their praises, yes?

Speck of Stardust

Because every story involving the dead king is group of 'heroes' dying to stop him, like its not just a single better then you person, -anyone- can do this its groups and cities and armies of people Like reread all the interludes of the fighting up north. Single great heroes arnt the people we read about.

Mental Mouse

By manipulating the culture. He doesn't need to get rid of all Names, just the martial ones, and he doesn't normally care about villains (see: Salutory Alchemist). Make sure stories and songs about such folk lose popularity or otherwise get lost, discredit sorcery, keep the priesthood squabbling with the princes, etc.

Shveiran

But look, these explanations aren't really enough. Even if the "by being so great an opponent I overshadow the opposition" works, that's only a thing for Lycaonese would-be heroes. We have been told most of the rest of Procer forgets they have a war in the north most of the time to go warring around the country or abroad. Procer has a huge military and conquering tradition, a strong House of Light presence, and Principates with an hard-on for duels! Why don't they have conquerors, schemers, strategist, healers, prophets, duelist, knightly, warrior Names to waste? I don't get it. They have a clear identity, known beyond their borders too... what messes with that?

Liliet

They dont have the kind of identity that most of their population cares about. Every peasant in Callow will take out their attic sword for a Shining Prince or a White Knight; you think the average Proceran peasant has a single fuck to give about the courtly duelists?

Shveiran

No, but what do borders or national average paesants have to do with it? Procer is huge, and several Principates have, say, an Alaman culture.

I'm totally on board with the fact that this is the reason we don't have, say, a named First Prince.

That is by necessity a Proceran name, and we lack a Proceran culture.

What I don't understand is how that translates to lacking LOCAL names in comparison to other countries. The reason why they lack a centralized culture is because the divides are still too vivid... but that means local culture still has pretty solid routes.

Alaman culture, for instance, we know is rooted in the ideals of dueling poets. Do alaman peasants care? Possibly not, but they recognize and know the shape, much like Callowans knew the shape of the Wizard of the West even if the country lacked a solid magical tradition. Since Procer is huge, how can a shared culture among even a few principates not be enough while a single city state is enough to power something like the Tyrant?

Am I missing something?

Don't get me wrong, the points you all raised are absolutely valid, I just think they are too little to cause such a strong effect, compared to what we know of the rest of the world.

Liliet

> Do alaman peasants care? Possibly not, but they recognize and know the shape, much like Callowans knew the shape of the Wizard of the West even if the country lacked a solid magical tradition.

Ah, but Callowans cared about their Wizard of the West, even despite not being wizards themselves. The caring is in fact the key part here. It's not a story if nobody cares.

Stories have to be compelling, and Proceran nobility simply doesn't produce those. They aren't compelling for their subjects, by and large.

I'm sure there have been a FEW noble Named. But it never became institutionalized.

Liliet

Note the epigraph.

I think it's a hint that Bard hasn't told a single lie here. Why would she, if truth can be used to bind Catherine if not one way then another?

Mental Mouse

> I think it's a hint that Bard hasn't told a single lie here.

Or else a hint that the lie she has told will doom her. Though I do agree that in practice, she hardly needs to lie... enough to tell each party the truths that will move them according to her plans.

Liliet

I find it VERY INTERESTING just how many different truths she's told Cat here 😊

Thanatoss

I was thinking about it for a while. Spreading knowledge about Intercessor is good defence against her... or is it?

I honestly see it hard to fight her in any direct way but no matter how much Intercessor knows and how much experience she has. You can not predict someone's next move if he wants to be unpredictable, especially someone like Cat, Tyrant, Hiererch

Liliet

Catherine doesn't need to fight OR defend against her. Spreading knowledge about her is the tool, the weapon and the purpose all in one.

Faiir

Yes, BUT Bard will most likely see it as an attack.

Liliet

I mean, yes, but in stories it doesn't matter what ONE person thinks 😊

Faiir

Your story-fu is stronger than mine 😊

Shveiran

Only in some stories, really.

Liliet

For determining which story something is? The story has to be pre-existing.

Shveiran

Granted. So...?

Liliet

I'm saying it doesn't matter what Bard thinks it is when the shape of the story insists it isn't. If the story says that if the target thinks it's an attack that's their own personal problem, then that's what Bard has to work with.

Liliet

So that was my point?

Mental Mouse

Please note that until WB got involved, Cat had Kairos dancing to her tune.

carrier

Crazy idea here.

What would be the implications of the Death kingdom signing into the Accords ?

Andrew Mitchell

That crazy idea was discussed extensively several chapters ago. I think it was started by this post <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/07/19/chapter-58-prolong/#comment-50017>

From what I can recall, the TD;LR version of the extensive discussion is that there's only benefits for the Dead King and no lasting benefits for other powers.

NZPIEFACE

Hmm, I wonder what it would be like if she managed to get Akua and Neshamah to be immortal arbiters of the Accords.

Fox

I like this idea so much! Ubuah, forever enslaved to do the bidding of forces magnitudes of power above her. That, would be a fitting end imo.

medailyfun

does anyone understand what story-traps Catherine managed to notice?

Liliet

Honestly I think only the last one was a trap. It was "agree to back off, or get railroaded into a bad story", and Catherine spectacularly managed to flip off all the chances to back off only to be offended by the last option left.

Faiir

If you're right, then this chapter is comedy gold.

Liliet

I mean it was definitely full of Catherine outsmarting herself and running in circles with 'IS THIS WHAT SHE WANTS ME TO THINK' so... yes 😊

ninegardens

Personally, I think Amadeus plan of "Maybe I should beat myself into unconsciousness with this rock" may have been a wise course of action (as a general strategy, not from this chapter but a past epilogue).

Liliet

Catherine got a lot of juicy juicy intel though, and DIDN'T accidentally kill herself, so I think she does win out in the end ;u;

Faiir

You know what, I think I'd rather hit myself in the head until I faint rather than listen to you.

Sickest burn ever 😊

Mental Mouse

She describes three:

> I'd not bit the bait when she'd approached me as a smiling offeror of advice and bargains, so she'd changed the story. The immortals warring over the world I'd again refused, silently as I had, and in doing so tumbled down the most dangerous of the three stories she'd woven.

And the final trap:

> And this was the moment, I thought, where I hinted arrangement had been made and began to bide my time until I could strike. Plotted behind bling spots with the Hierophant and learned from the sharp madness of the Hierarch. Like a clever little villain attempting to snuff out a great light. It was a story, I realized in a moment of cold dread.

Notice how this would have split Cat and the other Villains away from Pilgrim and the Heroes.

Liliet

Honestly I think it a test more than a trap. "Is this much provocation enough to throw Catherine Foundling into classic villainy? No? Oh I am surprised, this is my surprised face” (remember when she told Neshamah Catherine takes to flipping the stories on her like a fish and it just doesnt work? yeah. she knew the odds on this one)

Mental Mouse

Giving someone a “doom or survival” test, without consent... sorry, that is a trap. 😏

Liliet

On one hand, I’m with Catherine here.

On the other hand, how many hero journey stories have you seen where NO-ONE on their side is that kind of dick to them EVEN ONCE?

Mental Mouse

> “You spoke of me,” the Bard said. “It was enough, given who you are.”

And who, then, is Catherine Foundling, Black Queen and First Priestess of Night? Is she, perhaps, the story that can free Creation?

Liliet

she has a prominent Role, enough to have been a part both of a pattern of 3 and a band of 5

Mental Mouse

And then why not say as much? I suspect Bard doesn’t want Cat to know just how special she is....

Liliet

...Bard kind of did say as much?

Cthulhu

I am probably going to get laughed at for this thought...but is the entire story of a practical Guide to Evil written as a response to Tolkein’s “On Faerie Stories” and this theory of sub-creation?

I doubt anyone would care (other than me and maybe a dozen other people in the world), but it fits, I think, andif so, its brilliant. Instead of a teleological narrative, or even an endless dance of stories that always repeat, it instead posits a world where there are stories but no capital-S stories. The story is about transcending narrative or even ending narrative altogether.

It is the opposite of romance, and deeply antagonistic to much of the tale. It calls for an end to tropes – to tell new stories, that have different endings.

sengachi

As much as the Bard claims to have no quarrel with the Accords, I think she's lying through her teeth. She said so let them stand on their own merits, but how well would they stand on those merits with Katherine dead, as the Bard just tried to make happen?

And she straight up told us why she would want the Accords broken too. Procer has been a thorn in her side since its inception, because it is not ruled by a Named and therefore the Bard has a limited ability to work through it. The Accords propose to turn every nation into just such a thorn. By limiting the scale of Named conflict and removing Name games from politics, Cat would be de-facto removing the Bard from Calernia's gameboard. Their corner of the world would be free to grow and develop without her influence. For once the cards would be simply allowed to fall where they may.

And that is the antithesis of the Intecessor's mandate, regardless of what her personal plans may be.

konstantinvoncarstein

Bard is maybe aware that Catherine doesn't plan to suppress Named rulers anymore?

Liliet

> She said so let them stand on their own merits, but how well would they stand on those merits with Katherine dead, as the Bard just tried to make happen?

I mean that was a trap Catherine nearly walked into on her own. If she was going to be like that period, Accords wouldn't be able to stand either. Catherine not getting herself killed like an idiot IS a part of the 'merits of the Accords'.

And at that, Catherine wasn't going to just spontaneously keel over dead in the middle of talking with Pilgrim. If she fell for the trap but had the sense to set up the Accords BEFORE going on to set the trap for Bard, Accords could be a thing even with her dead, considering they're deliberately constructed to not NEED her in the lead role.

> The Accords propose to turn every nation into just such a thorn.

And it's not going to work, as Black brought up. Removing Named from leadership is exactly the kind of 'trying to dam the river instead of redirecting it' that Catherine tried to avoid, but stumbled into it headfirst anyway. That article's not going to stand, and who would know that better than the Intercessor?

Ebert the Alamans, scholar errant

The consumption of wakeleaf has quite an interesting history. The earliest records of wakeleaf being used as a stimulant come from the Baalite Hegemony, which colonized the area currently known as the Thalassocracy of Ashur well before the Miezian occupation.

The Baalites wrote that the common laborers of the field were prone to pick and chew the freely-growing weed when beginning their day or when tired, spitting the resulting juice into mixture of mud and herbs and applying it to the face, neck, and armpits. Over time, evolution of wakeleaf use has passed through tinctures, teas, and other applications. Currently, the most common method of use is inhalation of smoke created via combustion of the dried leaf of the plant. New trends include whole-body steaming and inhalation of vapor produced by adding concentrated wakeleaf extract to water and applying heat.

For more information on the use of wakeleaf and similar pleasurable pursuits, see my work "Vices of Calernia: Aragh to Wakeleaf".

ninegardens

Okay, so... can we compile how much Cat actually DOES know about the bard?

(I'll try to stick to chronological order)

She met Bard in Summerholm acting... like a tot's legit hero that talks to much.

We know that Akua encountered WB while releasing the demon back in book two:

> "Wow," the heroine huffed. "Rude."

But... I don't think that she's told Cat about that.

Thief has told Cat, Bard was sketchy... and if I remember correctly, Thief may even suspect that Bard set the Lone Swordsman up for the Angel Mindbomb.

Black has Intel on WB actions down in the free cities.

WB showed up after Liese when Black was exploding the superweapon...

If memory serves me well she saw Bard chatting with Nessie in the memory place on the way to Keter.

Annnnddd Cat saw WB granting offers to Sve Noc sisters.

Finally, she has intel from Kiaros and Nessie....

... as far as Dirty Laundry goes, what does she even think she HAS that will persuade Pilgrim not to trust her. Actually, come to think of it, what was it that tipped Cat off that Bard was High level threat to Creation in general (not just a powerful "Good" hero). What makes he so sure that Bard is actually a monster, as opposed to just a regular hero type.

Are there any I'm missing?

(Note, only interested in ones Cat could know about. NOT in such things as Bard getting elves to leave Akua alone)

ninegardens

Also: a random line from to her discussion with those elves:

>"This is my game," she hissed. "Amateurs are not allowed."

Interesting to see this come up again- calling people meddlers and amateurs and telling them to piss off... much like she has here with Cat.

Mental Mouse

It's confirmation that Cat really is getting into the real fight. She may be inexperienced, but the real reason Bard really doesn't want her playing this game, is because she actually could mess up Bard's plans.

Liliet

>Actually, come to think of it, what was it that tipped Cat off that Bard was High level threat to Creation in general (not just a powerful "Good" hero). What makes he so sure that Bard is actually a monster, as opposed to just a regular hero type.

This question has literally come up in this chapter.

Basically, no, Cat has nothing that indicates that. However, she does not appreciate tyranny and puppeting, and Bard is doing too much of that for her liking.

Even if Bard is a hero type, she doesn't want this hero type.

>I had little to say, which begged the question of whether or not I was truly looking at an enemy. Oh, she'd sought my death once or twice – but then I'd been a rising villain attempting to claim Callow and considering the amount of deaths I'd personally brought down on Creation since I couldn't fault her on principle either. In strategy, perhaps, but then given the scale she worked on it would have been painfully arrogant of me to pretend I knew everything she did. I kept my fingers from clenching, for it was too obvious a tell. Was that the answer, then? That I was to kneel and trust in the benevolence of some eldritch creature's designs, to step only where she deigned to let me step and babble out thanks for the privilege? No, I thought. Even if all she'd spoke was true, she no more owned the right to shape the Creation than any of us.

Mental Mouse

> She met Bard in Summerholm acting... like a tots legit hero that talks to much.

IIRC, there were "tells" even there .. in conversations with Cat and/or Black, she spoke familiarly of historical events for which the history itself had barely survived, and which a mortal bard really shouldn't have known about.

Daniel E

Anyone else reminded of Odin's spiel during Bard's exposition? Odin: "I am also called hyath and true-guesser. I am all-father, gondlier, wand-bearer. I have as many names as there are winds, as many titles as there are way to die." And now Bard; "I'm what was made so that no one ever eats the world," the Intercessor said. "I am herald before the ruin; envoy when it waxes beyond restraint. What I am has no name in any tongue still known to the living or the dead, and many have gone mad seeking it. I've had as many faces as there are graves and never once did I taste true death."

As much fun as it is to rag on Bard and be amused by her antics, that particular paragraph gave me a shiver. Bard is a monster, quite possibly older than time itself, or at the very least was birthed at the beginning of everything.

konstantinvoncarstein

I tought exactly to the same thing! 😊

Liliet

Nah, I think she genuinely appeared sometime down the line.

Not that it changes anything 😊

Mental Mouse

IIRC she's said something about her "punishment".

Wildly uninformed but mythically plausible guess: Back In Ancient Days, when the gods were a lot chummier with mortals, she challenged them in some fashion. Perhaps she was the first to seek to master the power of Story, but she actually tried to write and spread her own, made-up stories instead of recounting stuff that at least more-or-less happened.

Peter

Power in this world is like water flowing across the ground. In the beginning the ground was flat, but the power of stories eroded the ground underneath, making groves where power could collect and flow. Over time, the most common, most well defined stories became deep casyms etched into reality, paths where power flowed with most ease, but also powerful torrents that were impossible to swim against.

The wisdom of the Named boils down to using these currents when they bring you closer to your destination and avoid going against the current. Also making sure you don't fall into the water by mistake.

The dramatic irony is that one gains power by diving ever deeper into the flows of water, but by diving deeper you surrender yourself more and more to the ebbs and flows of the current. It also becomes that much harder to resurface.

Andrew Mitchell

That's an effective metaphor IMO.

aran

Except she's still following a story, isn't she? You don't just outwit something this old and clever.

At least she picked a story that plays to her strength.

Tab

" Plotted behind bling spots with the Hierophant and learned from the sharp madness of the Hierarch."

bling -> blind

" Elegant had never been my strength, so time to drag us both into the mud."

Elegant -> Elegance ?

Chapter 69: Repute

"Assertion that the end justifies the means in in truth embrace of the Heavens, for it is they who will decide the Last Dusk and so all justice then derives from them."

– Hektor the Ecclesiast, Atalante preacher

It was a little unsettling to see that even without the Name my teacher could still shed the face of Amadeus of the Green Stretch and become the Black Knight. A single sentence and humanity slid down his face like morning dew, leaving behind a cold-eyed thing weighing the necessity of harsh violences to visit. The Grey Pilgrim, on the other hand, did not look surprised. Troubled, the lines on his face deepening with weariness, but not surprised at all. The blue-eyed old man cast a glance at Black, fingers tightening with something like concern at what he saw, but the faint weight that was the attention of the Choir of Mercy scrutinizing him was batted away like overbold fingers. Perched atop the same stone where the Intercessor had sat, two great and shadow-feathered crows gazing down with merciless eyes. They had no claim on my father, I knew, and he was the kind of man who would rather die straight-backed than accept patronage. The extended warding had been offered as a courtesy to me, their thoughts whispered against mine, though all three of us knew they'd have mourned losing out on an opportunity to take a swipe at a Choir without starting a celestial war.

I breathed in smoke, disconcerted by the way it was warm and barely touched when it felt like that pipe had been lit for so long. Masego had told me, once, that there was no such thing as time: only the perception of it, and entropy's ruining touch. I couldn't quite grasp that, truth be told, for even entropy's encroachment must be measured by something. Yet the disparity between the acrid smoke against my tongue, the weight of the dragonbone pipe still mostly-full, and the span of the conversation I'd had with the Wandering Bard? They'd lent me a glimpse, perhaps, at what he meant. Had I still been Winter's Queen, such a sliver of understanding would have been turned into peril and artifice without batting an eye. As the priestess to dark goddesses, instead I hoarded it away the way I did so many other half-espied revelations and the secrets they led to. I had little wisdom of my own to offer, but I was not above passing through that which had been bestowed upon me by wiser souls.

"That is an accusation not without gravity," the Peregrine said.

He flicked a glance at Sve Noc, as if he'd felt their intervention, though what he saw there had him recoil from the unpleasantness. The cold night went colder still, and as the stars above grew more radiant from the wrath of the Ophanim the Sisters cawed out in mockery – though their touch against my mind was agitated, as the attention of an irate Choir of Mercy felt like a burn on their godhead. To my eye, there were times and places where Sve Noc would cow the Ophanim should it come to a contest of might. After they'd taken a petty shot at Mercy's own favourite son was not one of them, though. I cleared my throat, intent on distracting the angels by distracting their champion.

"You don't look all that surprised, though," I mused. "Something you'd like to say, Tariq?"

The white-haired hero turned his attention to me, and as expected the weight of Sve Noc's chiding began to wane with the turn. You're welcome, I uncharitably thought. Now please cease screwing with the hero I'm trying to convince, if you would. Komena cawed in irritation at my gall, though Andronike signified amusement. I forced myself to ignore the distracting dance of their thoughts against mine, for this was too important a talk to attend to it only half-listening.

"That though you've been known to have... broad an understanding of what constitutes as such an attempt, I have no difficulty believing there was dispute," the Peregrine said. "Younger Bestowed might defer to my decision to take a chance on you out of respect, even if disagreeing, but the Bard is both my elder and greater in the service of the Heavens. She would not feel bound to yield to my decisions."

I breathed out and did not clench my fingers, for it would have been an obvious tell of my sharply risen anger. A broad fucking understanding, was it? Coming from a man who'd tried to send me to my death or shackling down the spine of a redemption story, that was a little rich. He could try to pretend he'd kept his hands clean all he wanted, in the hands of a Named a story was no less murderous a tool than a knife.

"You admit to the likeliness of an ally's attack and in the same breath castigate her for having a dainty disposition," Black mildly said. "Come now, Pilgrim, if you're in the business of betrayal at least have the decency to display some skill at it."

He looked like a person again, and not a monster with a mask of clay, but beneath the calm affability he'd painted over his face I could see the blades were still bare. I'd seen him smile just as pleasantly before he Spoke and ordered Akua to nail her own hand to a table.

"I scheme no treachery, Carrion Lord," the old hero bit back. "And jeering at me will not serve whatever purpose you seek from it."

"And he's going to stop anyway, isn't he?" I sharply said.

Wondering, beneath the sharpness, if he was being so acerbic with the Pilgrim for the very purpose of my reining him in or if he was simply enjoying mocking a hero. Knowing Black, I grimly thought, it was likely to be both.

"If I must," he nonchalantly shrugged. "Shall we then return to the Peregrine simultaneously absolving himself of responsibility for the actions of his ally while also refusing to denounce her? 'Twas a charming bit of rhetoric. Add a few insincere protestations of friendship and it'll be like I never left Praes."

Ouch. That one had to sting a bit, especially when taken by someone whose understanding of the Wasteland would be through the latest horrors mighty enough to leave Praes and become a peril for everyone else.

"I do not condone attack, if attack was had," the Grey Pilgrim sharply replied. "Do not speak for me, much less with viper claims. Yet neither will I pretend that all servants of Above will follow me in making bargain with the Black Queen. As for the Wandering Bard, her Bestowal forbids as much as it allows. Behaving with grace will ensure she neither wants nor can act against any of you."

"She's not a heroine, Pilgrim," I said. "I've seen her make pacts on behalf of Below. If you don't believe me, I'll even ask the Sisters to let your little winged friends have a look at me to ascertain the veracity of what I saw."

That either the Ophanim or Tariq Fleetfoot himself would feel entitled to have a look at my bloody soul simply so that my words would be given due weight was infuriating, but that was the nature of the game. Trust was ever in short supply, in matters such as this. Especially when accusations were being thrown around.

"So have I," the Grey Pilgrim calmly said.

I went still with utter surprise. What?

"I suspect I am a great deal more learned in what the duties of the Wandering Bard entail than you, Queen Catherine," the old man continued. "An envoy does not decide the substance of the offer they carry, and some of the bargains the Bard was sent to offer were dark indeed."

"You know she has a greater game, then," I pressed.

"I know that across the faces she has worn she has warred against Keter wherever there was war to be had, and ever done good over evil whenever the choice was given to her," Tariq said. "That the Gods Above do not have sole claim on her works does not mean she is not a heroine."

"The moment before this conversation began, she dragged me out for an aside," I flatly said. "And she-"

"It does not matter what was said, Queen Catherine," the Pilgrim told me. "For you were being tested, as I have seen others Bestowed be and once was myself. By choosing rectitude over baseness, you emerged unharmed and proved you were not a menace that must be seen to."

"So you're agreeing, then, that the Wandering Bard just took a swing at me," I slowly said.

He frowned.

"She would have if you were less than you are," he said, as if it was evident. "You were not, and so this was merely confirmation."

Black laughed, softly, the sound of it like cool silk.

"See, Catherine, there was nothing to it," he smiled, sharp and cold. "The ordeal would only have stung were you a heretic, which makes wanton use of it perfectly permissible. Indeed, how dare any of us question the Wandering Bard's right to pursue our demise whenever the whim takes her? How very impious."

"He's being a bit of a shit right now," I said, "so it rather pains me to agree with him, Tariq. Even if you trust in the Bard – and Gods, I'd like to know what you have on her for that to be the case – then how the Hells does that translate to her getting the right to pull things like this? Nobody here is your fucking vassal, Pilgrim, much less Above's. This wasn't a test, it was a fucking act of war. And you're defending her right to have done it."

"I trust in a woman I have seen dedicated a lifetime to carrying out good deeds wherever and whenever she could," the Pilgrim said. "I have known her to do this since before either of you were born, and in her deeds she has not spared heroes when they courted disaster. I do not know what she intended by acting as she did tonight, nor do I blindly presume it was righteous. Nor will I, just as blindly, accept your belief that she is... by your words, some manner of sinister immortal schemer?"

"You've seen part of her work," I flatly said. "I've seen others, and they're hardly pleasant. Her enmity with the Dead King is more or less the only thing I take as a given with her. She was part of the Lone Swordsman's band, before he called down Contrition on Liesse. She was in the Free Cities before it all went to shit there, and she had a hand in Akua's Folly as well – though the exact nature of what she did remains unclear."

"And so she fought the occupation of Callow through every means at her disposal, when the rest of the servants of the Heavens forsook their duty to the fallen kingdom," Tariq kindly said. "I've no doubt her actions were harmful to you or others beloved of you, but that does not make her sinister – only a foe you never evened your scores with."

This wasn't going to work, I thought. And it was why the Bard had been so utterly unworried about my talking with Tariq: she'd known she had decades if not half a century of a solid record with the man that'd weight against whatever I said. And the more I made this about the places where I'd fought her, the more this became a personal grudge between myself and his old friend. Bringing in Black's run-ins with her would make it even worse, given that the Pilgrim would wholeheartedly endorse the decimation of the Calamities and the break-up of the partnerships that'd kept Malicia's reign so strong. My teacher had mentioned she'd openly admitted to allowing a heroine to die so that Sabah's death would be set in stone by a story, but she'd also likely been fucking with his head at the time so that his break with myself and Malicia burned all involved. And even if he believed us... well, Captain had killed more than a dozen heroes over the span of her career. From a practical Good perspective, trading a young heroine for the death of an old monster and the first crack in the Calamities would be worth it. I'd been counting on the shock of the Intercessor having acted on Below's behalf to create the Night to jar him into re-examining their history, but there'd been no surprise. Which left me only with a second-hand memory in which the Bard had still outright advised annihilation over taking the bargain.

Shit. She'd covered all her angles there, hadn't she? It made sense. The Grey Pilgrim had been Above's foremost agent in the west of Calernia for at least half a century now, by sheer dint of the stories he'd have been involved in they would have encountered each other quite a bit. Plenty of time to work on him, which once more made sense considering how influential a man he'd been headed towards being for a very long time. No, it would have been absurd for the Intercessor not to foster strong ties with him: she was too old and too fair a hand at weaving to have left such an obvious loose end unattended. And to have attended to it in a manner that I couldn't feasibly shake right now, I grimly thought. I had interests in common with the Peregrine, maybe even some shared principles, but also a red history that'd turned amicable only very recently. Hells, I'd killed the woman that'd probably been the closest thing he had to a friend without wings not even a week ago. Truce and my begetting the Liesse Accords was not enough to have him cut ties with the Bard. It'd be like going at an iron chain with a butter knife: how long had she spent to ensure the strength of those ties? How much time had been... Oh, oh. No, I'd been thinking about this all wrong, hadn't I? I'd learned a few tricks in the art of bargains and how to wag my tongue instead of my sword-hand, but in the end I was not more silver-tongued than the silvertongue.

It'd been laughable of me to even try, because once more I was letting the Bard pick the face of our struggle.

The Intercessor had invested time and effort and trustworthiness in her relationship with the Grey Pilgrim, but while he trusted her he did not seem to defer to her outright. When he defended her actions, it was as an act of trust. Trust she'd earned over decades, and I'd tried to fight with respect mere days old. I'd been so fixated on removing the Wandering Bard from this entirely I'd missed the obvious: that the ties went both ways. That if she was relying on relationships she'd forged in the past to have a finger in every pie, then she had to live up to the terms she had set to those relationships. And considering the high esteem in which the Grey Pilgrim apparently held her, the standards she'd set could not be low. So if I made a reasonable request born out of reasonable – if, in the Pilgrim's eyes, still unwarranted – fears then unless she had a damned good reason then she couldn't go against it. No, wouldn't be enough, I thought as I parsed out what doors it closed for her in truth. Relying on the decades of trust she'd be able to make apologetic noises but get away with it by simple virtue of producing one of various skeleton keys: it was necessary to beat the Dead King, allowing it would have caused suffering in years to come, had to prevent the rise of a great Evil. The Pilgrim would be angry, maybe, but the expectation would still be there that as long as the damage wasn't too bad for the greater good I'd have to grin and fucking bear it. On the other hand, was I good? They couldn't both treat me like Triumphant incipient and expect me to be their own personal Choir of Endurance. I'd surprised heroes pleasantly over the last few years because their expectations of me were low.

Well, they were certainly the easiest kind to live up to. Feigning indignation here would be risky, for though Tariq's inability to understand that one could be good without being Good had left him strikingly naïve in some ways he was frighteningly perceptive in others. Thankfully, I wouldn't have to. My jaw clenched and I did not have to look far for the anger. I'd stowed away the wroth, chosen the benefits of a clear head over it, but it had not disappeared. How many times was I supposed to let the whip crack against my back because my bettors were not willing to see to their own? How many times was I supposed to let it go, that to kill me or mine was a virtue but that daring to crawl out of the ash alive – much less fight back – was a sin? I blew out the wakeleaf smoke, and the bitterness that lingered against my tongue was not only from the herb. There were parts of my father's madness that I would never make my own, but some that'd always rung true: in the end, in their eyes we were not equal. And we'd never be people until we followed their rules and spoke their prayers, until we'd admitted that their way was right and ours was wrong.

"For small slights," I hissed, "long prices."

The Pilgrim's blue eyes widened in startlement, and he raised his hands in appeasement.

"Your Majesty-" he began.

"Yes," I coldly said. "That is who I am, Peregrine. The Black Queen. The Arch-heretic of the East. It seems you have forgot how we came to stand here on this night. Shall I help you remember?"

"There is no need for threats," the Pilgrim evenly said.

And yet I could see it in his eyes, the rising awareness of who it was he was dealing with. Remember, you arrogant old priest, I thought. Remember that you did not take me for Triumphant come again without reason and then curb your fucking priestly tongue.

"You sing the praises of she who strikes at me and declare her worthy of passing judgement upon my works," I mocked. "You, Tariq Fleetfoot? By what right?"

I grinned, sharp and vicious.

"You are not victor here on this field," I said. "You are the defeated, breathing only by the grace of the aspect I ripped out of you with my own hand. Your plots I shattered, your armies I routed and your own Choir stepped aside when faced with the glare of my purpose. And now you strut about like a green boy, arrogating the rights to lecture me when it is only my mercy that spared your throat my boot."

"This is not the talk of an ally," the Grey Pilgrim warningly said.

"You do not behave like one," I snarled. "And if you can only conceive of amity as vassalage, then this truce is at an end."

"You have sacrificed much to deliver it," the Peregrine reminded me flatly. "And through such savage actions you would end any chance of the Accords being signed."

I laughed, full-throated and cold.

"You think I'd give you a choice?" I smiled. "You think I chose peace because I fear the other path? I'll not fight the Grand Alliance, Pilgrim. I'll leave and let you die like whimpering dogs, alone in the dark."

I took a step forward, limping, and he drew back.

"I'll return only when I have the full might of the East behind me in array of war, and when I come back wherever the veil of night falls all will have a choice," I snarled. "You can take up a sword and join my war against Keter, or you can do it as a walking corpse. If treaties and alliances fail, I'll take steel and fire to the Dead King as Dread Empress, Victorious."

His eyes went cold.

"You will find me waiting at the end of that road," the Grey Pilgrim said.

"At the end?" I grinned. "You'll be the first damned thing I step on, Peregrine."

He looked at me searchingly, looking for lie or weakness, and found none. Harsh as my words had been, Gods but the truth of them simmered in my belly. I had chosen peace, but I was not beholden to it. And if the only way through was crowned in dread, then so be it.

"What do you want, Black Queen?" the old man finally asked.

"WANDERING BARD," I screamed out into the night. "INTERCESSOR."

I waited a beat, to see if she would appear. She did not. No matter, it would be enough to attract her gaze.

"You spoke for that faceless thing, Peregrine," I said. "And so now you answer for her as well. If you shelter and safeguard her, then you are responsible for her actions: if she schemes against me or mine, if she moves against truce or Accords, then I will take it as betrayal from both of you."

My jaw clenched.

"That will not be without consequence."

And I would tell every soul willing to listen. I'd tell the First Prince, I'd tell Princess Rozala, I'd tell the Blood and every hero willing to hear me shout from behind a blood wall. But most of all, I'd just told the Pilgrim himself. From now on, if she acted against me she was knowingly fucking over the Accords and the truce that was the only thing keeping Procer standing in the war on Keter. If she pulled something, she now had to justify it to Tariq as something more important than the death of several million people. Silvertongue or not, there wasn't much that would even those scales. This was, I ruefully thought, the principles of the Accords used once more: the practical realities of Creation being used to restrain its stories. Ties went both ways, didn't they? Sure, if the prize was worth it the Bard would make her move anyway. But she'd lose the Pilgrim, and when she did strike I fully intended on being ready for her. If you're without ties, you have no strings to pull, I thought. If you keep them, though, then a strong enough tug on the strings makes it a thin line between puppet and puppeteer. Tariq looked tired and grieved, but I was out of pity to spare.

"At dawn I'll begin work on the gates into the Twilight Ways for the armies," I said. "Be there or not, as you wish."

I began hiking my way back up before he answered, intent on returning to the soothing warmth of fire and booze and good company. And before the end of the night, I thought, there would be a need to speak with Masego. He'd get whatever he needed to test his Quartered Seasons theory, even if I ended up cutting corners elsewhere for the allocated resources.

Deicide, sadly, was unlikely to come on the cheap.

Soronel Haetir

It's a lovely racket WB has going with GP able to have him claim Above for all the Good she does and "oh well" to the rest.

Zggt

My theory is that the Bard has been working for a long time to create a situation which can finally kill her. She's been pushing Cat into a situation where she'll have to make a choice: permanently finish off one of the Dead King or Wandering Bard, with the secret sauce being how she made sure to have Masego's magic taken in order to nudge Cat to choose her as the immortal to kill. We've read too many mustache-twirling villainous gloating from the Bard (especially towards Black) for her to be about justice – it's like she was trying to get Above to kill her on principle.

Mental Mouse

> ow she made sure to have Masego's magic taken in order to nudge Cat to choose her as the immortal to kill.

That can totally go both ways, given it was DK who actually took the magic. And I can easily see where sorcery could be the Wrong Path to go after the oldest sorcerer on Calernia.

stevenneiman

Personally, I think it's more like the antagonist from the first Matrix movie. I forget his name, but his thing was that he wanted to wipe out every threat that he was tasked with dealing with so that he could quit. In his case that quitting probably just meant leaving the Matrix but in her case it would likely be real death.

NerfContessa

Agent Smith.

And arguably he was the antagonist in all 3 movies, very much so at start and end of the trilogy.

And maybe that's true.

therealgridlock

Technically Agent Smith was the protagonist of the movies, since he was the one who actually fulfilled the prophecy and emerged as a new thing out of a rote simulation.

I mean, he killed the machine god.

Lily

Catherine says she doesn't feel she has it in her to stab a Bard even before the Lone Swordsman, so this is very obviously gonna end one way.

Liliet

It's really cute how Pilgrim can see good without Good in the immortal entity that has worked on him for his whole life as the only exception.

Shveiran

Right? I mean... scratch trusting the Bard, I've nothing against that. How could he not? No beef there.

But it seems to me that Tariq has spent a long time minimizing suffering by employing whatever means necessary, and used as a way to call himself different from the Blacks and Cats of the world the reasoning that it is impossible to do good without being and therefore doing Good.

So far, I'm on board. I mean, I don't like it, I think it is a myopic approach, but I can see where he comes from.

But now it turns out he not only knew the Bard made deals on behalf of Below, but he did so himself? Well, fuck this shit, why did he have such a hard stand in Book 4? The world is black and white until it isn't?

I'll be the first to admit that contest matters, and we lack ANY specific, but he didn't ear any point in my book here, and certainly lost some. I mean, maybe they were small deals, on another level compared to a "Evil Fey Queen of Callow", but unless Catherine jumped the gun and just assumed being involved in the spiral of the Sisters wouldn't shake him, but if she was right... good god, that was a whole race being turned into ritual fodder ad infinitum. If that is forgivable how can anything else be condemnable?

Insanenoodlyguy

You misunderstood the line, I think.
"She's not a heroine, Pilgrim," I said. "I've seen her make pacts on behalf of Below."

"So have I."

He did not also make offers to evil, but he's seen Bard do such things. Obviously this thing with Tyrant wasn't a surprise to him for this reason.

Liliet

>But now it turns out he not only knew the Bard made deals on behalf of Below, but he did so himself?

He hasn't, like Insanenoodleguy said.

TBH the more I'm trying to stay pissy @ him wrt this, the more I realize it's actually kind of reasonable for him to view Bard as a big fat exception to all the rules. Because, y'know, she is. She serves Below AND Above.

And he DID believe in Cat's benevolence, his attitude towards her was not 'lying evil villain' but 'a hysterical child with a nuclear launch button'. It is, if anything, consistent with him being trusting in the judgement of someone many times his senior.

And I suppose Bard did not go out of his way to challenge his beliefs in a way that would let him pick up on Amadeus's meanings)=

luminiousblu

Think about it this way. If you allow the Bard to have something approaching the Author's Fiat, then she serves both Above and Below, the same way Sauron didn't exist and wasn't causing trouble until Tolkien wrote him in. Tariq knows that the Bard advances the agenda of Below, he simply trusts that the endgame is the victory of Good.

Gunslinger

Dread Empress Victorious... I like the sound of that 😊

It's remarkable how frustrating Tariq can still be (especially since we see things from Cat's pov) so it sure was fun to see Cat go all Villain on him.

NerfContessa

Fitting name, fitting path.

That can't wend well...

Gunslinger

Ohh if you are having fun reading the guide and have a couple of bucks to spare swing by Ee's patreon <https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

Liliet

And if you don't, swing at least by the voting booth!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Aston Whiteman

Khaaaaaaan!

Someguy

Pilgrim isn't a string, he is the pivot of the weighing scale turning wherever easiest. You don't build relationships with him, it's pointless since he already smothered his own nephew, You just use and discard him at will.

Liliet

>it's pointless since he already smothered his own nephew this is such an incredible non-sequitur,

Cicero

Not a non-sequitur at all. It's evidence that the Grey Pilgrim prioritizes actual effects above relationships. As such depending on a relationship to restrain him is dangerous and pointless. Look at how he abandoned the Saint and acquiesced to Cat killing her.

Liliet

...Catherine is not depending on a relationship to restrain him. Catherine is depending on the relationship to restrain BARD.

Relationship, in this case, is not a TERMINAL GOAL, yes. For either of them. It is simply evidence contributing to decision making of 'who can i trust' 'who should i trust'

'what should i do'.

geoffpburns

The only ones Tariq wouldn't sacrifice for the greater good would be his sister Yasa and his lover Sintra, but they're both dead so everyone is fair game even the Saint of Swords, or his nephew or random town folk and sailors who catch the plague meant for Black Knight's army. He will shed tears but it won't stop him from doing what needs to be done.

Building trust though, is not a waste of time. That's what the Wandering Bard has done over decades.

Liliet

Mhm.

Shveiran

He likely would, but I see no fault in that. We are talking about a man determined to steer the world toward what he perceives as the greater good. I often disagree with his position, but if that is his goal then I'm sure glad he leaves personal at the door.

Liliet

Yep.

geoffpburns

Weighting people lives on scales and judging their loss against some greater good is inherently problematic. Sacrificing other people or even himself seems to be a recurring theme with Tariq. Maybe using Forgive helps square the tally in his mind.

He hasn't completely lost his perspective he is still unwilling to sacrifice million of people when the benefits are uncertain and is willing make compromises with villains to avoid this.

Some decisions seem further down the slippery slope than hie strictly needs to be like using biological weapons or attempting to manoeuvre Cat into a lethal position twice, not because she would be a problem in the future, but because she might be a problem in the future.

Javvies

Should've known it wouldn't be so easy, Cat. Though it does make me wonder what the Dead King thinks he has on Bard that should turn everyone against her.

All hail, Dread Empress Victorious.
Triumphant was insufficiently ambitious.

Hmm, I wonder which target of deicide she's consulting with Masego about. Quartered Seasons suggests something to do with Arcadia and the Fae Courts. It could also refer to the Sisters each having half of Winter (ie, a quarter of the Winter/Summer dynamic).

—
Tariq, an ally making an attempt on the life of someone you owe big time isn't really an ally.
It's not okay to let that slide, but you went further and defended it.

Cat isn't negotiating because she thinks she can't win fighting. She's negotiating because she doesn't want to make a desert (out of the rest of Calernia's surface) and call it peace.

NZPIEFACE

I'm starting to think she's angry enough to call it peace now.

Javvies

Oh, yeah, she'd absolutely do it without hesitating.
It's just not her preferred route, given a realistic alternative route. Which ... is not easy to get to.

Faiir

If you kill everyone else and have no one else to fight with that's peace right?

erebus42

I mean...yeah technically

caoimhinh

In a way, yes.

Fayhem

Is it weird that I hear that quote being tagged with a Mr Torque air-guitar solo? MEEDLYMEEDLYMOWWW

Shikkarasu

I grew up across from a graveyard. It was the most peaceful place I knew. According to many therapists, however, technically correct (although the best kind of correct) does not necessarily equal healthy.

What I'm saying is, you're not wrong, just an Old School Villain.

Faiir

Old School Villains have the most fun 😊

Eleron Pfoutz

I mean, that's my approach to stealth in video games.

Fayhem

Really? Personally, I just drop into a crouch and become invisible by doing so.

caoimhinh

Quite an outstanding move. Indeed, nobody can sound the alarm if everybody is dead.

byzantine279

Most likely?

The truth of who and what she is, and what she wants most. The only things that she never really reveals.

gingerlygrump

I sometimes think that the Wandering Bard is Erraticerata, or a facsimile of his inner voice, and Cat is his muse.

Faiir

I always see reader's as the gods.
Like enough readers fanboygirling over a character gives them literal plot armor, so each character strives for their niche, since they die if they're not unique enough.

I think it was around Bumbling Conjurer when the heroes band had two comic reliefs. There were people saying "Too much overlap!" and bam, one dies the next chapter.

gingerlygrump

Oh man, the readers being the gods fits so well.

Sun Dog

It does hang together disturbingly well. And we have a ringside seat to these entertaining events, many of which the main characters are not privy to.

Well, I don't know about the rest of you, but I'm certainly not one of up Above.

mavant

Man, I am so sick of the Bard.

Hierus

Now i wonder what the Quartered Seasons theory is.

Anyway, that was a nice play by cat and quite a turn in strategy. A really smart play.

Sparsebeard

Probably will have to do with Night and/or Twilight?

I mean, Night powered gates are pretty primordial for Cat right now and Twilight changes everything.

Sun Dog

It may or may not be the same thing, but they were discussing some time ago the possibility of Autumn and Spring Courts. Now there is a third Court, or perhaps a second with the previous two united, I'm wondering if Masego isn't planning to impose the four seasons schema on Arcadia to either leach power from it, weaponize it somehow, or even force the Dead King into a position and thus a role and story they can use to end him.

Liliet

Autumn and Spring courts are well-known

mavant

Also, hey, good use of credible precommitments! Thomas Schelling would be proud.

NZPIEFACE

Dread Empress Victorious.

Fitting, seeing how she's never lost. I guess her Father's lessons of one sin and one grace has gone a lot deeper than most other things in her life.

Sparsebeard

Well, she was crushed by the Sisters and recently surrendered to the grand alliance.

But yeah, she was pretty much winning by losing both of those times lol.

Faiir

Does it count as losing if after the fight you emerge even stronger and keep everything that matters to you?

caoimhinh

Also, considering that the only grace is Victory she would also be, by extension, Dread Empress Gracious.

Faiir

Dread Empress OnlyOneGraciousAndTotallyNoSin

Fayhem

I kind of love this. "Let me show you my approach to having gracious table manners. nails sassmouth Praesi courtier's hand to table with a dagger Now have some fucking manners."

ThatOtherGuy

NZPieFace – Cat lost pretty badly vs Sve Noc. It's just that few topside know about it.

Faiir

Effects of 'loss' against Sve Noc:

- becoming an effective ruler of a country
 - regaining full control of her body
 - gaining harder to ward against power
 - getting out of multiple story-based death scenarios
- This must have been such a horrible loss to Cat.

I wish I was losing like this every day!

Sparsebeard

An Irritant style loss!

Axel Rafael

I wholly agree. Plus, it just sounds super epic 😊

Actually, I think that a few books ago, there was a fan theory about her possible dread empress title, and someone actually proposed dread empress victorious.

Andrew Mitchell

Good memory. 😊 It was first mentioned by Shequi back in December 2017. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/12/27/chapter-54-wake/#comment-9801>

Axel Rafael

Oh, wow

You found it 😂

Thanks, btw! For some things my brain does work Miracles afterall 😊

Sparsebeard

Wandering Bard : "Oops."

IDKWhoitis

Wandering Bard: Cork bottle opening

erebus42

Honestly if for whatever reason they can't kill the Bard, I hope someone manages to find a way to hurt her. Maybe curse her so she is unable to keep down alcohol regardless of the body she take...

IDKWhoitis

I think Cat imposing a prohibition of alcohol on Calernia might be one of the more effective strategies for "killing" the Bard. Forcing the Bard to go sober would be the cruelest thing Cat could do.

Mental Mouse

Hah. Prohibition wouldn't force anybody to go sober, because Cat would need to actually be a god to truly enforce it. We tried it here in America, near the beginning of the 20th century ... a constitutional amendment, one of the most difficult legal maneuvers to make in the American system.

Ten years later we amended it back, but it was too late – by then the Mafia had gained a solid foothold in America, and they've kept that to this day. Not that our leaders learned from the experience – barely 50 years later, we launched the So-Called War On Drugs, which did the same for organized crime from the rest of the world.

IDKWhoitis

Oh God no, she knows it's unenforceable. And it would also require her to go sober too. Heavens forbid that, the angels aren't that big of pricks.

Author Unknown

Ah, right, 'diplomacy'.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahahaha. Exactly!! 😊 😊 😊

Fayhem

And Amadeus is there to provide the terrible wine! It's lovely to see a father and daughter working together like that.

konstantinvoncarstein

I wonder which god will be killed. Maybe the sovereigns of Autumn and Spring?

caoimhinh

Those no longer exist in the Arcadia that's seen from Calernia. The new Court is a unified Fae Court that doesn't belong to the Season theme of before.

The last paragraph of "Deicide doesn't come cheap" refers to the quantity of resources that she thinks they will have to invert on Masego's research of Quartered Seasons Theory. The god they want to kill is the Dead King.

Andrew Mitchell

And maybe the Bard.

caoimhinh

Yep, though even at this point Catherine has never referred to the Intercessor as a goddess, not even once. Maybe because Cat sees the Bard as an instrument of the Gods, rather than someone who reached Apotheosis, plus the Bard is certainly more restricted than other gods we have seen (Neshamah, Sve Noc, the King and Queen of Arcadia).

Insanenoodlyguy

The Bard's entire system is designed to avoid Apotheosis.

Undying? She dies all the time. Unchanging? She literally can't stop changing on a constant basis. No longer bound by frailty of the mortal shell? She doesn't stay dead or grow old, but otherwise her existence is perpetually suffering so great she tries to stay permanently drunk.

It gives her the long lived long view while assuring maximum flexibility.

konstantinvoncarstein

You're right 🙄 The DK? I thought that the deicide had something to do with the opening of a gate to the Twilight Ways, but your theory makes more sense 😊

caoimhinh

Yeah, since they already had the necessary deicide for the making of the Twilight Realm by Tariq's death after putting on the crown, though that was cheated by resurrecting him XD

Every talk of deicide besides that has been about the Dead King.

Decius

So far every time Cat has attempted deicide or something similar she has ended up in some kind of arrangement with the target.

The fey courts, Sve Noc, and most recently with the Pilgrim.

Why should the Dead King be any different? She already has a relationship with one of DK's nemeses, who has a claim on the Dead King's magic and a Name fit for seizing a Godhead.

Sparsebeard

The DK did make an effort to keep negotiations an option (and Cat and him even talked about it).

Plus, he succeeded in extracting info that he though would help him from the Twilight...

All in all, Neshie signing the accords in the end wouldn't be that much of a stretch...

Liliet

Nobody will want him in the Accords, though.

Aotrs Commander

Why stop at one?

Morgenstern

I more wonder about "deicide" vs. "Deicide". Too bad that word ended up in the very front of a sentence. =P

konstantinvoncarstein

A Deicide is impossible, and would make not sense here. She is speaking of Neshamah.

edrey

well, that is cat for you. Dread empress victorious, that is what i call a great name, i am really want to read about the faces of the nobles after this also, i am really sure that the bard was the one who tricked the courts to invade callow.

Jakob Israelsen

I think half of the reason for the name is that it is a synonym for Triumphant, and doesn't that ring some scare bells for everybody.

Faiir

"If treaties and alliances fail, I'll take steel and fire to the Dead King as Dread Empress, Victorious."
Is this treason I hear?

caoimhinh

Nah, that's just giving him a faiir warning.

"Either be my ally now, or I will amass power by myself and march against the Dead King when I'm ready, and by then you will all be screwed in more than one way. I'm not the one who needs this peace that I'm offering, I'm just the one rational enough to work for it."

Faiir

Yeah, but is she giving a fair warning to Malicia? 😊

caoimhinh

Depends, does the assassination attempt a couple of years ago in Keter count?
Callow has gone through secession from Praes under Catherine, so they aren't exactly allies anymore.

Faiir

I think they're technically still allies? Unless the Legions 'in exile' don't consider themselves soldiers of the empire anymore, they wouldn't team up with the Army of Callow otherwise.

Faiir

Obviously an attempted murder or two is just a compliment to Praesi.

Insanenoodlyguy

The Legions in Exile are Blacks, Body and Soul. As noted already, they consider Cat as Black's heir on the whole. They would not obey her giving them an outright treasonous order, but since her orders could be summed up as "I want to keep you alive and also we are working to get Black back, it's some name shenanigans but you know how that goes", that wasn't so hard to swallow. And even then, any reluctance would be based on BLACKS Loyalty: We are Loyal to Black, he is Loyal to Malicia, betraying Praes is betraying Black. But Black is back. If he says "We are conquering Praes, time to be Emperor/ make a new Empress" all the hesitation evaporates.

konstantinvoncarstein

She already killed her 2 times 😊 If Malicia is still not aware that Catherine is revolting, I don't know what can warn her 😊

erebus42

"Revolting? Good Gods, of course not! We're merely maneuvering."

Faiir

She got better though 😊

Decius

Not for the first time tonight. Although it would be hard to also put her father on the tower.

caoimhinh

"Quartered Seasons theory", eh?
Masego is going to weaponize Time and Entropy.
I wonder if he will go Gold Experience Requiem on Neshamah and lock him in a time loop, or what.

Either way, it's gonna be awesome

NullKaze

Cat's already weaponised time and entropy against the Saint. We can't use the same plot device twice!

caoimhinh

We can't use the same plot device in the same way twice. Using it in creative new ways is perfectly valid XD

ethericsentinel

That is a fantastic image. Do you know the source?

caoimhinh

Yes, it's from "Komi-san wa Komyushou Desu" chapter 195.

You can also find it as "Miss Komi is Bad at Communication", it's a Japanese school life comedy Manga. It's pretty funny and an amazing source of reaction images XD

Andrew Mitchell

Another brilliant chapter. Yet again, EE continues to surprise me.

1. GP already knows about the Bard's dealings on behalf of Below. WHAT?!?
2. Of course Bard has built up a strong emotional bank account with the Grey Pilgrim, duh.
3. And then Cat FUCKING TURNS ALL VILLAINOUS and ACTUALLY HOLDS THE GREY PILGRIM TO ACCOUNT FOR HIS BULLSHIT.

Absolutely delightful...

Andrew Mitchell

Ooops, in my excitement, I forgot to close some HTML tags there.

caoimhinh

Worked out for the best, as it gave the comment a nice dramatic touch XD

Morgenstern

I wonder what “dark” deals he actually knows about, though. How “dark” those actually were, compared to the deal offered to the Sisters (with the option on the other scale being: “here, have genocide instead”).

M0och123

I am curious how the pre-quote at the start of the chapter factors into the rest of it... Any thoughts?

M0och123

It’s a little confusing because the ends justifying the means is usually associated with a good guy turning to evil. Not the other way around.

caoimhinh

It’s a preaching of Above.

“the end justifies the means, the end of all creation is decided by the Gods Above, so all justice must then come from them.”

It’s a fallacy because it ignores the fact that there are means that go against the teachings of Above, so they are unjustifiable. But it’s a religious propaganda from Atalante, so don’t worry about logic on that.

It reminds me a bit of what a preacher said to me once: “God is just, not because he can only act in a just manner, as he is not constrained by justice, rather, God decides what justice is, so whatever God does becomes justice on account of being done by God.”

The epigraph reflects on the chapter on Tariq’s attitude of justifying whatever the Wandering Bard did as something done for the Greater Good (notice how he didn’t even care about what Catherine talked with the Bard just now, he won’t listen unless he is forced to do it). On a conversation with Liliet on the comments of one of the previous chapters I had predicted that this would be his reaction, because that’s how Pilgrim is, despite him knowing that the other person is telling the truth, he will simply go “it’s just that you think this is true, but you are mistaken" whenever someone tells him something that challenges his worldview.

Mental Mouse

> "God is just, not because he can only act in a just manner, as he is not constrained by justice, rather, God decides what justice is, so whatever God does becomes justice on account of being done by God."

Which is Team Morality (if not Blue and Orange Morality) in a nutshell.

Andrew Mitchell

I just took it as yet another arrogant statement by a champion of Above. I think it mirrors Tariq's myopic view of Good & Evil.

Andrew Mitchell

Damn it! That was supposed to be a reply to M0och123.

IDKWhoitis

Amadeus must be very proud of his daughter. She's all grown up now. Threatening heroes and old monsters, and meaning every last bit of it. Being able to hack at her own plans when they do not serve the original purposes.

Also, I wonder how Masego will serve in his function as an adviser. Will he be forced to use Akua as a medium for the shenanigans Cat wants to pull?

And while Akua is being brought up, we still haven;t seen Viv...

erebus42

It's a shame they don't have Mics to drop in Calernia.

It certainly makes sense that the Bard and Tariq would be tight so this turn of events while a bit disappointing isn't that surprising. I suppose if anyone would be on board with her usual "burn any innocents and allies necessary so long as the big scary threat gets taken care of in the insuing wildfire" tactic, it be the Pilgrim.

Honestly though, Tariq had this coming. I get that his thing is the whole wise old mentor schtick and that probably influences him into thinking he's above everyone and into trying to take control of the situation but still...read the room dude. She's the fuck-mothering Black Queen. She just got finished handing you and the Grand Alliance your collective asses. Keep track of your fucking position man. I know you have that whole thing about not being a ruler but your people as well as the vast majority of people in Calernia are kinda depending on her not telling you guys to fuck off.

Also, I'm sure that whole speech probably brought a tear to Black's eye.

Mental Mouse

> but still...read the room dude.

Well, admittedly Cat missed the boat on that one too.

Fayhem

> I get that his thing is the whole wise old mentor schtick and that probably influences him into thinking he's above everyone and into trying to take control of the situation

This is a good note, thank you for bringing it up; we have Black's analysis/diagnosis that a Name usually influences the thinking of the person holding it, and IIRC he also indicated that it does so more strongly the more heavily you lean into your Name. Pilgrim has been leaning hard into the Role of Wise Old Mentor for literally decades now. That should probably get foregrounded more often in character analyses of him.

Mental Mouse

Yeah... notice that this line:

> "This is not the talk of an ally," the Grey Pilgrim warningly said.

... came before any actual threats. That was Pilgrim's response to merely being reminded that Cat is a power in her own right. Pilgrim really is a slow learner... and also pretty damn ungrateful. And note that when Cat did come out with a threat, it was to the effect of "I'll take my bat and balls and go home... and if I have to do that, then the next time we meet it won't be as allies". (I'll also note that Pilgrim's threat to stand in her way is pretty dubious – how long is he actually likely to live at this point?)

Cat not only saved the population of Issere, but held off on killing Saint until the latter made it clear that she was trying to burn everything – the country and its residents, the shortcut for the armies, and the party, including Pilgrim himself. Oh yeah, and after that she resurrected Pilgrim's sorry ass (at considerable risk to herself, given she was confronting a Choir) when she didn't actually have to, and in fact she had been trying to take the bullet herself.

Just today, I saw a quote from Zadie Smith, presented in the context of race relations, but fairly applicable here: "In the end, your past is not my past and your truth is not my truth and your solution – is not my solution.” Pilgrim keeps reverting to his old habits – assuming that as the Senior Hero, he’s in a dominant position to everyone around him. The Twilight adventure should have taught him otherwise, but like I said, slow learner.

It occurs to me that both Saint and Pilgrim have demonstrated in their separate way that heroes really need a retirement option. Pilgrim may not be axe-crazy like Saint, but he’s still way past his sell-by date.

Agent J

Now I want Dread Empress Victorious. EE, why you tease me?

Faiir

That’s just fanfic bait 😊

ActionKermit

I love how Cat makes her future villainy contingent on the Bard messing with the Accords when the Bard just said she wouldn’t mess with the accords mere minutes ago.

Fayhem

Right, but why would Cat take Bard at her word? Taking steps to impose actual consequences for Bard doing so is both prudent and smart of Cat.

matrixm

Butt also if the Bard were to make any move against her.

gingerlygrump

I sometimes think that the Wandering Bard is Erraticerata, or a facsimile of his inner voice, and Cat is his muse.

gingerlygrump

Didn’t mean to post this multiple times. Sigh.

ninegardens

This... feels like it actually might be the stupidest thing Cat has ever done.

She doesn’t KNOW the game the Bard is playing.

Either she’s bluffing, in which case ummm... the Bard will catch on.

Or she isn’t, in which case she has just handed Bard a lever with which to control her, with which to force her hand- to force her to turn against the Grey Pilgrim (a very popular hero), due to the actions of an ancient monster he has no control over.

And either way, she has just pissed off an ally who was behaving in a fairly reasonable manner given her "Broad interpretation of a murder attempt".

So she's trying to threaten the bard into not fucking with her? Is she crazy?

The Bard is GOOD at this game. The Bard can kill you without anyone knowing that it's her. It's easy. It's not like the old monster leaves a receipt after setting up the rube goldberg machine that kills them.

She's effectively created a situation where the Bard has every incentive to go directly for the kill and no incentive to give future warnings, play nice, or softball her in any way.

She walked into this situation set on attacking the Wandering Fucking Bard with barely any plan.... then made up a new plan half way through.... and ALL of these plans were fricken' stupid. What was she thinking? (Yes, I know we just read a chapter of her thinking. It's still dumb)

Andrew Mitchell

You know, that's a good point.

She may be betting that the Bard won't want to kill her yet. If she does then the Dead King gets to stomp all over half of Calernia and probably makes permanent gains that will be very hard to unmake in the centuries to come.

John

If the Bard provably messes with the Accords, that doesn't force Cat and the Pilgrim to fight – it just forces the Pilgrim to disavow his support for the Bard in order to keep Cat friendly. He's all about the greater good, and the Bard's nebulous contributions can't plausibly outweigh Dread Empress Victorious burning all Calernia to the ground.

If he's looking at things rationally, Tariq knows perfectly well it's possible to attempt to murder Named by manipulating their narrative – he's done it himself, to the same target, VERY recently. He's just having a hard time fully accepting the new political situation.

Andrew Mitchell

> ... can't plausibly outweigh Dread Empress Victorious burning all Calernia to the ground.

I don't think that's what Victorious is going to do. She was threatening to take over Praes and built its strength while watch the Dead King burn half of Calernia to the ground.

Faiir

The goblinfirewall separating the safe and fucked parts of Calernia would be glorious!

ninegardens

>Tariq knows perfectly well it's possible to attempt to murder Named by manipulating their narrative – he's done it himself, to the same target, VERY recently.

Tariq tossed a redemption story in Cat's direction back at the battle of the camps, and CAT interpreted it as a murder attempt. We have every indication that Tariq did not interpret things that way- he was her avowed enemy while she was a villian because of handwave handwave effects on the balance of creation. If he had tossed her a redemption story, and she takes it HE DOESN'T WANT the story to kill her. It might. Its not without risk. But the fact that "redemption story = Pilgrim trying to kill me" was Cat's opinion, not necessarily Tariq's

>If the Bard provably messes with the Accords, that doesn't force Cat and the Pilgrim to fight – it just forces the Pilgrim to disavow his support for the Bard in order to keep Cat friendly

But she just promised that she was holding him accountable for Bard's future actions and that there would be CONSEQUENCES. She didn't say "Look, if Bard screws with the accords, can you agree to say that that would be a bad thing and disavow her for that", she said "I will leave Nessie to burn your house down."

IF Bard provably interferes with Accords.
But Plausible Deniability is Bard's whole schtick practically. She's good at it. She has a million and one ways to arrange for some intermediary to set your house on fire. This makes threatening her much less effectually, and it makes threatening some else on behalf of how you interpret her actions even more Janky.

And this threat especially doesn't work if the thing you are threatening to do entails cutting your own arm off, abandoning an alliance YOU NEED, and then handing half the continent to a horror that you have sworn vengeance on. Either people believe that Cat would do this (in which case they believe she is an EXTREMELY unreliable actor), or they believe she won't (in which case the threat fails).

Mental Mouse

> But the fact that “redemption story = Pilgrim trying to kill me” was Cat’s opinion, not necessarily Tariq’s

Tariq, as a hero, can afford to dismiss the way redemption stories often kill the redeemed – “well, if that what it takes for a successful redemption”. Cat is under no obligation to concur.

ICSM

She did him at it, however, by the name she chose for herself.

Victorious. If that’s not a threat to fulfill GP’s worst fears and become a new Triumphant, I dunno what would be.

Triumphant has a very powerful story. Cat may crash and burn at the end, but that story alone will allow her to blow California to kingdom come if she so wants. The mere hint of the possibility of a repeat of that story has moved GP’s to action. Now she has outright stated she will take that mantle if he doesn’t play ball.

JJR

Until recently he had a way to undo the death caused by redemption stories. Unless the aspect didn’t work for redemption deaths. Still, if Cat had leaned into the story he offered I would expect that he would rather Cat not die.

Agent J

The redemption is not very recent. The rule of three was very recent. Tariq was aiming for a draw at the Princes’ Graveyard so as to use the third and lethal confrontation as a knife bared at the Black Queen’s throat.

Because stories kill and he’s too experienced and genre-savvy to pretend he doesn’t know that.

ninegardens

Oh! Good catch. I mixed up which story trope was being referred to- my mistake.

Shveiran

This isn’t a Fey oath, is Cat setting the stage for diplomatic pressure because, even now, she is not handed enough goodwill without placing her sword on the table.

Nothing she just did made her any more vulnerable to a swing from the bard than she was before.

What it did, is warning Tariq that if his side keeps going after her she is under no obligation to keep playing ball. Which is a pretty basic premise of an alliance: you stop killing me and I stop killing you means a truce, not an alliance. They are marching north to save people who swear allegiance to Above; if Above still acts like all sworn to Below are murderable, why the hells are Callow and the drow marching by their side? They'll take their shit and leave.

But this is contingent on the Grand alliance considering and acting like bard is an ally.

So if the bard takes another swing at Cat and succeeds? Well, she's dead, but she would have been dead anyway. Nothing changed.

If she does and misses, though? Then the Grand Alliance and Tariq get to make a choice. They can break their ties with the Bard, or they can see them severed with Callow. The latter ends with Callow and the drow retreating to one day fight alone, after fair warning and justifiable reasons.

Honestly, it is nicely done. Tariq and the Grand Alliance needs to choose whether or not they want an alliance; if they do, they need to act like it, or they don't get to expect Callow to keep playing ball to this bullshit.

Insanenoodlyguy

All of Bard's power is indirect. Remove the influencers, you remove her power, at least for a significant amount of time while she rebuilds.

Cat's counting on what you just said. She wants to deal with this shit once. The way she's set it up, if Bard comes at her, it's going to be the big play. Not 10 million little background chips, because doing all that is too much risk of discovery, and if Cat is going all or nothing, she's not going to do this because she knows Cat will jump the gun if she even thinks it COULD have been bard, because she knows Bard can do things direct. If anything, she might kibosh one or two things she had no hand in just because it looks too much like her. Cat doesn't believe Bard won't go after her, she's said as much. But she's now ensured that when Bard does, she'll go all out and hard. And Cat does great in the chaos that is an utter clusterfuck.

Mental Mouse

> And either way, she has just pissed off an ally who was behaving in a fairly reasonable manner given her "Broad interpretation of a murder attempt".

I would not call Pilgrim's attitude reasonable. More like arrogant, patronizing and ungrateful.

General Chaos

nice

Barthumphries

Well now the Pilgrim will help keep the Bard in line... Until the Bard sacrifices him. He's not going to be alive much longer to threaten the Bard. And the Bard will spin it as Cat leaving him alive to back the Accords but then disposing of him when there was no further use for him, and this Bard will take out Pilgrim and Accords in one swoop.

ninegardens

And remember, Cat is still the Guarantor of Kiaros's kangaroo caught judging Hanno, with the Pilgrim's life acting as collateral. A default I can see both Bard and Kiaros trying to trigger, despite the fact that Cat really doesn't (or at least shouldn't) want to be harming Peregrine in any way.

ninegardens

* kangaroo court

Shveiran

And isn't it so very damn irritating that the oldest Calernia hero is going to be in need of saving from certain death twice... just after finally stopping being an antagonist?

Mental Mouse

If Cat can't shake some sense into him, Pilgrim's gone from antagonist to albatross.

Mental Mouse

Aside from other points – Cat has just floated the option of taking the Tower herself, with ample foreshadowing. But that's something she'd previously been shying away from, not to mention that both she and Bard had been planning to put Amadeus there.

Also, she has the treaty with the Dwarves to consider....

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah but there is also the simple reality of fate: Amadeus has only heard part of the song, and he knows it wasn't for him.

i'm still thinking that somehow, against all odds, it will be Akua.

Liliet

I think "wasn't for me" is a decision he made, not the property of him hearing the song. I think when the song is heard, the song's opinion (so to speak) is that it's for that person exactly.

Cap'n Smurfy

"I trust in a woman I have seen dedicated a lifetime to carrying out good deeds wherever and whenever she could," the Pilgrim said. "I have known her to do this since before either of you were born,"

Pilgrim really doesn't have any understanding of just how old the Bard is, does he? I know it wouldn't change his opinion but he really doesn't seem to know Bard is literally the oldest individual on Calernia.

Daniel E

"For a long time now I thought I was just a survivor, but I'm not. I'm the winner. Time Lord Victorious." – Tenth Doctor

Faiir

Cat? What are you doing? U drunk!
Get out of TARDIS right now!

Alivaril

I'm a bit saddened by how relations with the Pilgrim went downhill so incredibly quickly after the whole "We're better than this, so imma rez your dyood, K?" of a few chapters ago. I didn't really expect Cat's attempt to amount to anything, but still; I liked friendly Tariq, Arch-heretic of the West.

Insanenoodlyguy

the problem was, he wasn't treating her like a proper ally, he was treating her like what he specifically fialed to make her: the reforming villian who still needs a swift kick every so often to keep them marching in the right direction. You can talk down to that one as she needs to reshape her morals. You don't talk that way to the woman you need who kicked your ass when she's telling you a friend just tried to kill her. Not without pissing them off.

Fayhem

Eh, I could be wrong but I think this is just akin to the Hero-Villain equivalent of setting healthy boundaries in a relationship. One party shrugs at a story-based murder attempt from a friend of theirs, the other party makes the point that if this shit keeps happening they'll take their shit and go home before coming back along the only path left open (i.e., FIRE AND THE SWORD). For all Tariq's situational naiveté he's too Practical Good to make that into more than a blip in the relationship IMO. We'll see, though.

Liliet

Ah, his WAS him being friendly, though.

"You were tested and found worthy" is a perfectly normal and acceptable thing to say to a young hero proving their chops step by step. And that's the groove Cat slotted into in Pilgrim's mind: a villain queen who is actually really secretly a hero, and proving that step by step.

With all the associated starry-eyed obedience, idealism and trust.

Only, y'know, Cat doesn't have those, and Pilgrim has no idea. He doesn't realize that Cat has been on this path for much longer than he's known her and is thoroughly sick of any kind of proving herself anymore. Given that so far it's involved torture, soul ripping and crucifixions, Cat might have an allergic reaction to the very CONCEPT.

And then there's the fact that even applied to your typical idealistic young hero THIS IS KIND OF FUCKED UP, and Pilgrim has just... lost track of that along the way. See enough young 'uns come and go, you start forgetting that actually every single one of them didn't have to do this and every single one of them deserved better. His normal has shifted along the way. You know the reasoning that every minute Superman spends maintaining his secret identity and talking with this friends is a crime, because in that minute so many murders happen that he's not preventing? Tariq is far down that road when it comes to powerful Named, and he doesn't realize how far he is from the shore anymore.

Tariq was friendly. He assumed Catherine was coming from the same perspective as him – oh, of COURSE unfair bullshit gets heaped onto the apprentice hero, that's just how the story goes, pip pip cheerio.

Only Catherine has already BEEN through her apprentice phase and has ended it with STABBING the previous Cryptic Mentor for the peak his bullshit reached.

He was being friendly, and kind of an idiot about this.

Javvies

Oh, I don't know.

I think Cat technically has some idealism in her. But it's a very focused and specific kind of idealism, and it has very little to do with the kind of idealism Tariq would expect to see in a new Hero he's mentoring.

After all – are not the Accords born out of a specific set of ideals? The ideal of a world where Named and religion don't fuck things up for everybody else as much. A better world.

Liliet

Yeah, you're not wrong. And Catherine studied under one of the biggest idealists in the setting, given the amount of bullshit his ideals managed to survive largely intact... and that's the part Tariq isn't getting. That he isn't the first. That to THIS road she is not new. That they are not offering her something fresh and precious, that Amadeus had been teaching her how to be a better hero since First fucking Summerholm, and that while she would not mind their approval and affirmation, she has solid enough ground to stand on already, and things to protect on that ground.

Tariq doesn't understand that her diving headfirst into Hero Shit is not her abandoning her old teachings but following up on them, and so she is not a green initiate.

He will not understand that until he understands some more of Amadeus, I think.

Hellspirit

Beautiful

ChillyPepper

I love how Amadeus vanished into the background as she began rambling. I'd like to imagine him having an all like "well, shit..." moment.

Insanenoodlyguy

Amadeus is happy to chip in when it would help. He recognized that this wasn't about him and anything he added in would actually weaken what was happening here.

Otherwise I imagine his headspace was something like this:
<https://giphy.com/gifs/netflix-connie-hormone-monstress-no-notes-28Nays4xzYfFstkIZd>

Mental Mouse

That said, he will certainly have a critique ready for her afterwards.

Liliet

Amadeus? A critique? More like "gods you held out for so long, I have no idea how you're doing this, truly you're better at this than I am"

Mental Mouse

A criitque, because that's how he engages with things. She may well be better than him, but he's not likely to admit it. 😊

Notice how this chapter started with Black putting on the scary:

> It was a little unsettling to see that even without the Name my teacher could still shed the face of Amadeus of the Green Stretch and become the Black Knight.

But then Catherine takes her turn:

> "Yes," I coldly said. "That is who I am, Peregrine. The Black Queen. The Arch-heretic of the East. It seems you have forgot how we came to stand here on this night. Shall I help you remember?"

Liliet

>A criitque, because that's how he engages with things. She may well be better than him, but he's not likely to admit it.

...I don't think so? He's straight up told her before that she's better than him at all of this.

Sure, he's not going to launch into a stream of compliments...

Liliet

...and that's precisely why I don't think he'll have much non-jokey critique to share 😊

oliverwashere

To me, it seems like Catherine ended up taking the story of the cornered villainess taking a hostage to stall the heroes. I'd imagine those paths usually end with the heroine sneaking around and defusing the threat without the villainess noticing. In this case, could the Bard be heading to Praes next to make it as hard as possible for Catherine to win a claim for the tower?

Javvies

Except that's not really what Cat is doing here. She's saying, "I'm trying to help you against one of the greatest Evils that ever was and in the process establish a lasting mechanism to prevent the worst atrocities committed by everybody else – so stop fucking trying to stab me for offering to help you because my patience for being stabbed by the people I'm trying to help (ie, you) is running out and if you won't let me help you without trying to kill me (again) in the process, I'm going to go home, let you lot get massacred, and then any of your survivors won't have a choice but to do things my way."

I don't have a good analogy ready to go for this ...
Hmmm.

The only times Cat has gotten Tariq to play fairly has been when she's exerting leverage and twisting his arm into negotiating instead of insisting on his way of massively one sided deals in his favor (assuming, of course, that he's giving anything for what he's getting out of it, which he often isn't) or nothing. I suppose the initial "no angels/devils/demons, no torturing prisoners" deal wasn't something she needed to leverage him into, but he presumably expected it to benefit his side way more than it would hers.

Also, I'm not sure how you think Bard can do to prevent Cat from being able to claim the Tower without in some way attacking Cat. It's not like Cat is going to be deterred by the High Lords or Malicia or a new Dread Emperor/Empress or anything they might do. The worst that could be done, I think, would be a new and Malicia/High Lords aligned Black Knight and/or Warlock, and that would just make things somewhat more difficult for Dread Empress Victorious.

Mental Mouse

> The only times Cat has gotten Tariq to play fairly has been when she's exerting leverage and twisting his arm into negotiating instead of insisting on his way of massively one sided deals in his favor

This. That said, I would never assume there's nothing Bard can do. What happens if Malicia dies, and Black and Cat are facing a whole crop of claimant-Emperors? Of if Praes descends completely into anarchy?

Javvies

Any other Claimants to succeed Malicia would most likely be High Lords, and so probably would be opposing Cat/Amadeus anyways.

Honestly, Bard taking out Malicia would probably make it easier for Cat/Amadeus to take the Tower, not harder. Remember, Malicia has hidden contingencies (via a combination of Speaking and her Rule Aspect) in all Legion Generals and in most of the upper ranks. Plus, Malicia going down may or may not have consequences regarding the Dead King's invasion.

Honestly, the only thing that would be a serious, mission-critical-level obstacle would be if Callow turned on Cat ... and as good as Bard may be, I honestly don't think she's that good. At least, I don't think she could pull something like that off in the kind of timeframe she'd have to work with. Especially not if she's trying to be subtle about it.

sivarajan

May she never return?

Mental Mouse

Too Late...

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Heh. Chapter 69.

Faiir

I think that it's thanks to how good the Guide is that this comment is so much further on the list than in most other novels 😊

Liliet

Huh. Yep ♥

mavant

Nice

Mental Mouse

Pbbbt!!!

mavant

Personally I'm still holding out for Dread Empress Ebony Raven Darkness Dementia Way.

Liliet

*Ebony Dark'ness Dementia Raven Way.

Don't ask why I remember this.

Anyway, HELL YES. Just one ruling name is for losers preps.

Alegio

The undefeated Black Queen of the east, First under the Night,
Dread Empress Victorious, first of her name.

Now thats an awesome title.

Soma

...and everyone at the fire just heard that. Well, probably not, but there was a bit of screaming, about some sort of minstrel, somewhat close to the same stones everyone is camped around. Cat should beware Robber ever hearing her claim that she'll take up the mantle of 'Victorious' in any scenario.

I look forward to the questions about what that yelling was. Well, maybe Cat and company just travelled a longer ways than was my impression, and nobody heard it.

nipi

Hmmm... been wondering about all the heroes Cat killed during the prelude of the Tenth Crusade. We havent seen her use any lesser trinkets she should have obtained from them.

Mental Mouse

Her pattern on-screen has been to use most of them up pretty much ASAP. The Call whistle was the only one we've yet seen her hang onto for any length of time, and she used that one sooner than I expected.

ninegardens

Okay, so new crack theory:

What does Bard claim her schtick is:

Makeing sure no one screws up badly enough to destroy the world.

How does she do it:

Words

Who else likes keeping a lid on other peoples skills and tech:
Gnomes.

How do they do it:

Scarlet Postcards.

That's right people, The Wandering Bard is secretly three Gnomes in a trenchcoat.

Insanenoodlyguy

I don't think I've said it on here, but i have wondered if Bard's actual original form, back in a language nobody (on the surface, at least) remembers, was in fact a Gnome.

Draconic

I do not think Victorious would be a good name for Cat is she ever does become a Dread Empress. She should think about it some more...

ethericsentinel

Well, she can't be Irritant II. That's clearly reserved for Kairos if he climbs the Tower.

Liliet

Dread Empress Thoughtful? 😊

Raved Thrad

If she really wanted to be known far and wide for her evil, she'd take the throne as Dread Empress Cuddlebunny. Nothing could be more terrifying than that.

Liliet

Oh my.

I love how you think~

Chapter 70: Dawning

"For light blinds just as surely as the dark, and hatred binds just as surely as love."

– Sherehazad the Seer, Taghreb poet

I woke up to the feeling of bony elbows digging into my ribs. It surprised me not because I'd forgotten that Indrani and I had ended up in bed – I still felt pleurably sore from those exertions, so it'd have been a shame to – but because she was still here. In my bed, though for once she was only mildly hogging the covers. The gift of awareness Sve Noc had granted me, I sometimes suspected without strictly meaning to, had me mindful that dawn was a little more than an hour away. It'd not been a long night of sleep and to be honest I still felt a little drunk, but worse come to worse I'd take a nap come the afternoon. I might need to whatever my intentions, if raising a gate into Twilight was as exhausting as I suspected it would be. My mind recoiled at the thought of it, for I would need the guidance of the Sisters to see it done and that was rarely pleasant or gentle thing. I stretched and yawned to keep my thoughts moving instead of lingering on the coming unpleasantness, sliding out of the blanket and sitting on the edge of the bed. Indrani began to stir awake and I smoothed away a puzzled frown. I'd wondered if our arrangement would be set aside until she'd resolved whatever she was going to resolve with Masego, but truth be told I'd not been entirely surprised we'd ended up in bed after the rough few days we'd had.

Honesty compelled me to admit I'd not needed much convincing when she'd offered, either.

That she'd stay afterwards, though, that had me wondering. Not at whether or not this was blooming into something more romantic in nature – for all that Akua had once claimed I had difficulty separating bedplay from attachment, Indrani and I had always been very clear that neither of us was likely to ever fall in love with the other – but at the nature of whatever accord she was trying to reach with Zeze. I doubted a man raised by the Warlock and an incubus would be all that inclined to give a single thought to what people might or might not consider proper, but I disliked not knowing what I was involved in. Even if only peripherally. That was on a personal note, anyway. As the nominal leader of the Woe, there were concerns about what all this fumbling might mean for our little band. Though in all fairness, I grimly thought, if it's such a great concern I probably shouldn't be sleeping with Archer. I bet Black would never have – huh, no, he most definitely had. With Ranger, of all women. I cast a speculative look at Indrani as she opened her eyes. Comparisons between the Woe and the Calamities had begun before the Queen of Summer had even granted us the name, so if I was to be my generations equivalent of Black and Indrani of Ranger? Ugh. That did feel a little sordid.

Indrani took my lingering gaze for something else entirely, and just so happened to stretch in a way that pushed back the covers and arched up her breasts. Pure coincidence, no doubt. Well. It would have been rude not to appreciate the sights, really, if you thought about it. Best not to mention that earlier thought about equivalences, I decided. Archer was not, as a rule, all that opposed to sordidness. She did like to rub my nose in it, though, so no need to hand her a full quiver.

"Don't suppose I could convince you to stay in bed a little longer," Indrani said, voice still husky from sleep.

And perhaps something else as well, though that might just be my continuing look at the smooth expanse of brown skin laid out before me.

"Any more of that and we'll break the cot," I smiled. "Wasn't made for two people, much less that sort of... exercise."

"Wouldn't be as an issue if I tied your wrists again," Indrani airily said.

Now that was just unfair. And surely I could spare a bit of time before leaving the tent. Or perhaps half my time. Unfortunately, my awareness of looming dawn made it clear that was not the case despite my body's insistence otherwise.

"I'll need time to prepare the grounds for the ritual," I reluctantly said.

She sighed, though from the sly look in her eye I'd say my hesitation had been the prize she'd been after from the start. Indrani always turned pixie, after a shared night, as if the shedding of clothes brought out her vainest sort of guiles.

"Boring," she said, waving a hand in dismissal. "Still, I'm already up. No point in going back to bed alone."

I snorted. Yeah, she hadn't been expecting me to accept then. It was still night out, and so it was not all that difficult to spin black flames around the stone basin to the side of my bed until the water within it was warm. I took the cloth to the side of it and began by washing my face, though I ceased when I felt Indrani looking at me.

"Not happening," I said.

I swept my unbound hair back over my shoulder as I spoke, aware from how frequently Indrani liked to grip it that she had something of a fascination there. I didn't have curves to display, unlike my friend, but I was hardly unattractive to her. It was my arms, though, that she was looking at.

"You're getting wiry," Archer said, sounding fascinated. "Haven't seen your body change that much since the Folly."

Had I gained muscles? Strange, since I wasn't walking around in plate or sparring regularly anymore. Some of my surprise must have shown on my face, as she continued to speak.

"You were bulkier when we first met," Indrani said. "Warrior-framed. You look more like a hunter now, made for the long stride instead of the shield wall."

"You're feeling rather poetic this morning," I drily said.

"Been a while since slept in the same bed," she smiled. "Don't get used to it."

I wet the cloth again, for the wetness had cooled, and wiped the lower half of my face to hide my hesitation. Ah, well. If I waited for either Indrani or Masego to tell me what was going on, I'd still be waiting on my deathbed.

"Should," I delicately began, "I get used to this?"

I flicked a few fingers at the messy bed we'd been sharing. Her expression was difficult to parse, and not for the lack of light in the tent: a sliver of Night had seen to that.

"Not sure yet," she said. "But I did tell you, back in Great Lotow – that is that, and this is this."

For you, maybe, I thought. I wasn't sure exactly what she was trying to have with Masego, but any manner of pairing would rather imply he could have an opinion as well. It wasn't that I expected Zeze to suddenly make like an Alamans priest and condemn the pleasures of the flesh as wayward. Mores aside, he was not above those himself: me might not have any interest in bedplay, but I'd seen him dig into fresh apple tarts like a starving orc would a pig. He'd not been overweight when we first met without reason. Still, I honestly had no idea of what he'd want of a relationship – any relationship – that wasn't friendship or family. Didn't help that I'd never heard him express a desire for one. His fathers had been married and a closed circle, as far as I knew, and among the rest of the band of Named who'd raised him Sabah had been happily wed and mother while Black had his... rapport with the Lady of the Lake, though I'd been made to understand that they only met every few years for a short span. Gods, none of us had been raised in a traditional family, had we? Orphan, diabolist and incubus, Ranger. Vivienne's mother had been assassinated by the Empire, after all. Although, now that I thought about it, Hakram's childhood had not been all that unusual by orc standards. He'd simply been an ill-fit for his clan, and later the College.

Hells, that might actually go some way in explaining why he tended to be the most stable of us.

"Still, I'll not be offended if our company lapses until you have your house in order," I told her.

She ought to know already, but sometimes it was best to have those things stated outright.

"And who will you work out your tensions with, then?" she grinned. "I suppose our shady friend might be up to scratching that itch, but you'll have to train her up to snuff first."

I frowned.

"That's thrice now that people have commented on that," I said.

Hakram had asked me directly, and though last night Aisha's question had been a great deal more circumspect it'd been of the same vein.

"Come off it," Archer said. "It's hardly the first time I've jested about the Mighty Shadow Lass' neckline plunging whenever she thinks you're looking. No need to be troubled over it, Cat: she's a looker, and invites the looking. It's hardly a sin to accept the invitation now and then."

On occasion it felt otherwise, though that voice was the same that reminded me there could be no just reason for allowing the Doom of Liesse to breathe free air. That a hundred thousand souls demanded, if not lasting torment, at least as painful an execution as I could carry out. I could not entirely articulate why it was worse that I found her attractive added to the rest, but it'd always had that taste against my tongue. That I'd grown to like, and in some ways even trust, Akua Sahelian was worse still. The fate I meant for her was just in the ways that mattered, I truly did believe, but I suspected many would disagree. And so the wheel spun, the endless loop of wondering if I being swayed or played or if the whispers were black and brutal vengeance indignant at being denied. I'd wondered these wonderings before, and no truth had come of the spinning. Which had me glancing thoughtfully at Archer, curious if that'd all been a skillful to steer the conversation away from a subject she was not yet ready to speak of. Given her enduring reluctance to simply state as much – for which I blamed Ranger, who'd beaten into her head while young that admitting anything of the sort was naked weakness – I wouldn't put it past her. Best let those sleeping dogs lie for now, then.

"You can't lecture me about sin, you wench. Who's the priestess here?" I lightly replied.

That devolved into petty bickering, not that there'd been any doubt, and we washed up and dressed in quick order after that. Hakram was sleeping, for once, but we still found a fire going outside my tent and a pair of legionaries awaiting by it with breakfast. We chatted over the porridge as cuts from last night's meal – horse, by the smell of it – were put over flame. The two were lieutenants, one from General Istrid's old legion and the other one of mine since Marchford though she'd first seen combat when Winter struck at my demesne. The lieutenant from the Sixth was an old Soninke and quite obviously a bastard from some noble line by the cultured, highborn manner of speaking. They were both respectful but neither gazed at me with the near-awe I got from so many young legionaries these days. It was both a great deal more comfortable and made conversation easier. Archer left early after stealing half my horse meat, alleging she was going to have a look at Masego.

"Bring him, if he's awake," I said.

Pilgrim might not like it, but I was less than charitably inclined towards the man right now. As for the Sisters, unless they wanted to be present at every gate-crafting then the knowledge of how to craft it would have to be passed and I could think of none more fitting than Hierophant to hold it. Their last talk had, uh, not been all that civil but no grudge should be kept over that. They'd acted like carrion and so been treated as such, and it was doubtful Masego would keep a grudge on his side. I felt Sve Noc's attention, brought by the thought pertaining to them, and their silence was implicit agreement. They gained nothing from being at odds with Hierophant, though I doubted it was writ in their fates they'd be bosom friends anytime soon. I finished breaking my fast, thanked the officers and claimed a steaming cup of the herbal concoction Adjutant had arranged to be waiting for me before I began my trek back up the slope of the barrow. My fondness for the place had grown with the use I'd made of it, but Sve Noc and Akua were all adamant: the heart of the old Mavian prayers was where the boundaries were thinnest. It'd be significantly easier to make a passage there, though sentimentality aside I'd had more practical objections.

The raised stones would make it more difficult for large amounts of people to pass through, and this gate into the Twilight Ways was meant for my armies to use. The footpaths up the slope were difficult, which meant there were no roads for supply carts and siege engines to feasibly employ. Besides, unless we knocked down the stones it'd be effectively impossible to take them through. My advisory triumvirate of assorted crows and shade had uncertain when I'd asked them whether after the passage was made it'd unmake it to bring down the stones. Akua insisted that it was a 'boundary echo' that made the place appropriate, and so it wouldn't matter, but Andronike had disagreed. Something about an indent having a particular shape, and not existing without that shape. I was a decade of schooling in sorcery short to understand Akua's opinion and short an apotheosis to properly understand Andronike's. Still, even if the entire thing proved unworkable without the stones then at least we'd have a working pathway into Twilight for small groups and schematics for the second one to be made. The wards and workings around the tumulus had been removed, so there was nothing keeping the cold bite of the night wind away as I limped up the hill. I drew on Night to chase away the cold, though it was more an illusion cast on myself than true warmth.

I'd been able to feel her through the Night even before calling on it, so my face betrayed no surprise when after passing between the circle stones I found Akua Sahelian waiting atop the barrow. She'd eschewed dresses for a heavy yet elegant cloak line with fox fur, its deep red tones perfectly married to the heavy velour robes she wore below. She did not turn as I limped forward, nor when I came to stand by her side and sipped at the herbal brew in my hands.

"Deep thoughts?" I said. "I've a copper or two to spare for them."

She did not immediately reply. Unlike with the drow, I could not taste of Akua's emotions through the Night. The Sisters had told me it was because she partook of their bounty only through me, and the nature of that tie was older than the touch of the Night itself. It'd been inherited through the Mantle of Woe and Winter's last gasps, which made things rather more complicated. Amusingly enough, in some ways my patron goddesses were as much in the dark as I: there was no precedent to any of this, and no understanding of sorcery or power was so comprehensive that this extraordinary unfolding would be perfectly grasped. A reminder, perhaps, of the unbridgeable gap between gods and Gods. The shade's eyes were not on me or even the dry riverbed of what had once been a place halfway to Arcadia: she was, instead, gazing at the now empty firepit that'd been dug yesterday.

"Do you remember Barika Unonti?" Akua suddenly asked.

Truth be told, for all their high birth and purported importance most of the then-Heiress' helpers had half-faded from my memory. Sneers and tittering and arrogance could only have so many flavours without my keeping them in my remembrance only as some Wasteland brat who'd insisted on crossing me until death ensued. Barika, though? Her I remembered. The way I'd broken her finger, the first time I attended court in the Tower, and been punished for that mistake. More for the way she'd died. Convinced she was untouchable, even after helping Akua open a Lesser Breach straight into Liesse. I'd put a crossbow bolt in her eye as she knelt, and she'd died before she could even be surprised. And that death I'd made into salt to rub into Akua's wounds that day, when I'd ordered her buried in consecrated grounds so that nothing of her could ever be brought back from the afterlife.

"I do," I said. "She taught me a valuable lesson."

"Looking back now," Akua said, "I suspect she might have been my friend. Or as close to that as our understanding of the sentiment allowed."

And still, I thought, the young Heiress had left her behind as an illusory decoy knowing I might very kill her for what was about to be unleashed. Part of me scorned her for that, though another wondered of the cold choices I'd made sending some of those I loved into battle and wondered if the difference there was not shallower than I'd wish. I did not answer. In part for my role in how Barika Unonti had died, no matter how worthy of that death she had been, but also in a moment of wonder. I'd suspected, even back then, that of all her followers Unonti was likely the only one she had any degree of real fondness for beyond that which usefulness garnered. It'd been years since I killed the girl, much less thought of her, but her mistress remembered her still. It was a small thing, and fragile. And it tasted like triumph to my tongue, for the fate I had promised Akua Sahelian was beginning to take shape.

"I used to think you lacked the knack for cruelty, did you know?" the shade smiled. "Oh, you've a way with the striking: to evoke fear or loyalty with an act and turn of phrase. Yet I always found your ways to be... clear. Lacking that touch of malice my people drink along with mother's milk."

A moment passed, wind stirring both our long cloaks.

"But not anymore," I said.

"Last night," Akua pensively said, "might be the single most cruel act I was ever subjected to."

I did not protest. Because it was true. Because this was the sound of bile being bled out of tainted veins.

"I cannot even muster rancor, Catherine," she said. "For it was a misery entirely of my own making, and exquisitely brought besides."

"It doesn't have to be that way," I said.

She laughed, bleakly.

"Doesn't it?" Akua said. "For I was allowed, for just a moment, the taste of something I might have had. And oh it was a heady thing, my queen. A place by your hearth, partaking of the warmth and belonging that radiates from it. And though they love you and have long despised me, your favour alone was enough for me to be made welcome. For them to..."

She turned to me with burning golden eyes.

"Do you not understand that the laughs should have been empty?" she hissed. "That it should have been artifice, at show put on for purpose. I am a better liar than any of them, Catherine Foundling, than any of you. I know the face of truth. After years of enmity all it took for them to make room for me by the fire was a word from you. I could have had all of this years ago."

"Yes," I agreed, "you could have."

"The closest I have to match to last night is a girl I sent to die," Akua bitterly said. "You've devised a poison so sweet I will crave the taste of it."

I looked at her, in the dark before the dawn, and knew that in that moment either I had been made of fool or I had won. Once more I chose silence, knowing that the slightest hint of what might be taken as gloat would send the entire delicate edifice tumbling down.

We were silent still, when the others arrived.

0x

All hail dread emperous irritant the second, formally known as akua.

5 minutes later....

All hail dread emperous victorious

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, if Akua is Dread Empress now, it will be one of if not the longest reign. Cat wont let her off that easily.

Just imagine, Cat in her new capitol, the shadow palace of the empire of a new age. With her her family, the warmth of the fire. Sometimes there are conflicts, sometimes shes out putting put the other kind of fire, but even then the warmth goes with her.

And seeing it all from a tower high in the sky, impossibly far away yet still seen thanks to tethers distance can't weaken is the Dread Empress Magnificent. With a cold hard wind blowing that whispers "you wanted this" and laughs. Because Akua has been given everything she ever strived for, but only after she realized none of it is what she should have wanted. Shes the best damn Empress since Triumphant, and nobody on this throne has ever wanted it less. She turns back from the fire below and so far away, back at the door inside to a palace full of snakes waiting to strike and synchophants who will flatter her and worship her and declare their love and never even be half of Barika, let alone that distant hearth. And the wind blows again, and it is at her back, pushing her back inside, and she turns to face it, but with eyes closed, to let it dry the one tear she let escape that needs to be gone by the time she reaches that door.

Soma

I am partial to the ironic 'this is what you wished for' style.

Andrew Mitchell

Plus, the extra irony that comes from Akua knowing that she's missing all the good feelings normal people have and knowing that that is exactly what she stole from 100,000 Liesse citizens.

naturalnuke

I don't think she's even thinking about that yet, it's still all about her... but we'll get the the empathy later.

Liliet

Oh we're getting there.

Oh we're getting there...

Rey d`Tutto

Killing with kindness...

NerfContessa

You read my mind. Exactly what I 3nvisioned.

Magnificent in more than one way indeed.

Aeon

Such a beautiful scene there. We've been building towards it for so long, and it was worth the wait. Akua finally UNDERSTANDING friendship and real positive relationships is one of the biggest payoffs we've had, and it is glorious.

M0och123

Maybe she will be the first to be able to bottle the power of friendship and use it as a power source...

Liliet

I don't think this is the first time she understands it.

But it's the first time it's really burned.

NZPIEFACE

I certainly wasn't expecting an Akua chapter after her declaration about being Dread Empress last chapter, but it certainly does make some sense when you think about it.

We getting a Vivienne chapter next, I suppose?

Insanenoodlyguy

I never thought Cat could combine the two possible stories, but now I see it. A path where Cat does make Akua the next Dread Empress. In the end, even Viv agrees there was no greater punishment.

IDKWhoitis

In a way, she would get just what she wanted from the beginning. Only to find she doesn't want it anymore. To find that she truly wants friends, she wants to be around the Woe, she wants to craft the stuff of legends.

Only to find herself surrounded by enemies. Far away locked in a Tower, forbidden to touch upon the full powers once the Accords are in effect. It would be a personalized hell, and also allow Cat to stabilize Praes long term. A curse bestowed onto her foe, a crippled Role, and denial of the full Name.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, I'm seeing it too, especially how they talked about the "We're reflecting the Calamities" in the first half of the chapter. Whose the reflection of Malicia? Akua.

therealgridlock

Very true, black bones ranger but has a thing for Alaya,

Cat bones archer but has a thing for akua,

The problem is... Akua was the heir. Its never revealed who the heir is from the black ascension, the only way akua could reflect Alaya is if Alaya was once the heir, and also made friend and comrade, but I'm pretty sure the heir was just a dickhead who got off screened not even for dramatic purposes.

RoflCat

I'm still hoping her being the Headmistress of Cardinal.

Because even if she seeks this sort of cozy, familial feelings again, Cardinal will be a miniature center of politics that very few people would indulge in such closeness.

And if Cath also put her into something akin to Losara Sigil but for Cardinal as a whole, then Akua will have to remain distanced to all to be impartial when judging.

The most painful punishment after having given her the sweet sweet taste of friendship would be to deny her a second serving.

NZPIEFACE

Yeah, but it's a win for everyone at Cardinal. You get a forever young hot milf as your headmistress.

mavant

Akua doesn't have kids, so I assume the M there is Mantle.

Rey d`Tutto

SILF? Shade I'd like ...

mavant

I think my favorite would be CILF, for Cloak I'd Like..., if we're willing to change letters.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, Cat will be in Cardinal. She'd be able to have some amount of this if she's there. The poision she craves and all that.

Even if she's not Dread Empress, if this ends with her alive and being made to suffer she will be far, far way from the warmth of last night. Someplace where those people not be regularly, where there's no hope of having what she had last night on the regular.

Liliet

The thing is.

Even if she has that last night regularly now, she will always know despite what it is.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Doesn't it?" Akua said. "For I was allowed, for just a moment, the taste of something I might have had. And oh it was a heady thing, my queen. A place by your hearth, partaking of the warmth and belonging that radiates from it. And though they love you and have long despised me, your favour alone was enough for me to vote for PGTE on topwebfiction."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Andrew Mitchell

♥ your work. 😊

Cap'n Smurfy

Damn. I know she said she would, but I still never thought I'd see the day that Catherine defeated Akua Sahelian at social-fu. Like watching a housecat beat a fish in a swimming contest.

byzantine279

I'm not even sure if she did defeat her. Or if Akua defeated herself.

Liliet

Oh, Akua was never actually good at it. She had a lot of resources and a moderate skill bleedover from systems engineering, but real relationship building, real understanding of other people? There's a reason Catherine beat her at COURT INTRIGUE within a year of the initial loss.

ninegardens

Wait- when you say Cat beat her at COURT INTRIGUE are you referring to "I have hostages, and I'mma gonna tear some folks souls out unless people give me them votes?" Or to some other situation?

Cause I'm not really sure how well that counts as court intrigue...

Liliet

Consider the end result: Catherine had her Ruling Council, and Akua had... well, Akua had the Empress backing her with the expectation that she will fail spectacularly and leave the weapon behind.

Choosing your alliances wisely IS part of court intrigue, and Akua lost that competition pretty damn badly.

Shveiran

To play Devil's Advocate, I'm not sure Akua did lose. I think she was simply playing a different game.

And yes, it was a stupid game, but credit where credit is due... she set an objective, and accomplished it against awful odds.

It was not sustainable nor sensible, but it's wrong to judge her SKILL based on that when sustainability and sensibleness were not factors she considered relevant.

She chose the right allies, for what she wanted: resources and yesmen to use, to empower her own skill until she could reach her wild designs. She was aiming to make a bang, and she did. Her skill at court games, in my opinion, is not in question.

You could argue Malicia was playing her like a fiddle... but then again the battle was way too close a call with too high a pot to say the Empress' move was anything but a gamble.

Shveiran

Damn, I should have said "to play Diabolist's advocate". I'll never cease to wish for an edit function.

KageLupus

She didn't beat Akua at social-fu, she beat her at being a human being. Social maneuvering and manipulation is what you do in politics. Akua would know in a second if anything that happened the night before had been artificial or staged. But it wasn't, which is why it was so effective.

Cat showed Akua what life could be like with real friends, what the world looks like when you step away from the constant scheming that makes up Praesi court games. The simple pleasures of good friends and food and a fire, without having to worry about what anyone has planned or who is after what. After a lifetime of being on guard and not allowing herself to trust anyone, even the one woman she was closest to considering a friend, Akua never stood a chance.

greatwyrmgold

When you get down to it, unusually advanced social-fu is all that separates humanity* from the beasts of the field.

*And every other sentient race on Calernia, except drow and maybe goblins.

Sparsebeard

To be fair, it was Harkam who persuaded Cat to invite Akua...

Liliet

Indrani.

IDKWhoitis

Awww, Akua felt like she had friends. She probably even felt happy.

Truly, torturing her with kindness seems to be the most effective strategy.

This also makes me question if Viv ever did show up. I sincerely doubt that Viv would be able to emanate warmth towards Akua in any form other than red hot fury...

caoimhinh

Yeah, apparently whatever operation the Jacks were carrying out was in a critical moment last night, they were sent to get information on what Cordelia got from the lake, but to keep Vivienne on edge and alert for reports, they must have been doing something all night.

Cap'n Smurfy

Wait a fucking minute, did Cat just weaponize the power of friendship for the purposes of evil?! She did, didn't she! She just used friendship to torture her sworn enemy. That has to be the most Evil thing she has ever done.

Just a potato

And thus Cat became a mage when no one expected it. Because we all know that friendship is magic.

Mental Mouse

To steal a line from the game Terraria: "That's ridiculous. You can't turn people into frogs with friendship." 😊

Rey d`Tutto

"Friendship Is Majick, but it won't help you turn your enemies into frogs."
Compromise.

erebus42

Yeah, Cat might usually going in for the more pragmatic approach but when she wants to be cruel she definitely can be.

BlackPhoenix7777

The power of friendship is still feeling a little confused about what the hell is going on ever since Akua broke it, which made it easier, but I agree, it's an impressive feat nonetheless.

Liliet

Akua quite literally started it, which makes it worse/better~

Andrew Mitchell

> Akua quite literally started it
Remind me please? I'm drawing a blank here.

medailyfun

She has ripped Cat's heart in Everdark, calling in magic of friendship

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks.

Liliet

FEAR ME, DROW, FOR I WIELD THE POWER OF FRIENDSHIP

Truly, the joke is on her~

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks.

MurkyTruths

Wow... Beautifully done. Brilliant chapter thank you!

Aston Whiteman

Filler with sex and friend ship poison.

If Cat is actually bi when was the last time she had sex with a male...

Zeze?

Javvies

As far as we know, before Indrani in the Everdark, Cat hadn't been with anyone since her breakup with Killian. Before Killian, Cat was too busy as the Squire.

Before she was the Squire, she's stated previously that she'd had a brief relationship with a fisherboy (I think) in Laure.

As for how long that's actually been ... the timeline is hard to work out.

NZPIEFACE

I think it's been 6 to 8 years since then.

edrey

who want to bet that cat would be the first of Zeze, then make side comments when archer and masego finally get together? i really can see it happening

Aston

Agreed!

Inay

No, Masego is asexual, not a "Virgin because nerd" ; he's not interested in this.

Liliet

Yeah I mean like... MULTIPLE PEOPLE have been explicitly said to have tried to seduce him with 0 result? INCLUDING Indrani?

Liliet

What?

Masego.
Is.
Asexual.
And.
Sex.
Averse.

Vortex

Will this stop us fans from building a ship?

From one naval carpenter to another, I say nay!

Liliet

There is already a ship. It is good and poly and ot3 and in fact already includes him and Catherine both.

Him and Cat are cousins. The adopted family ship is MUCH STRONGER

Rey d`Tutto

"I get my kicks above the waistline, sunshine!"
Masego is Cerebrally inclined.

sengachi

I mean it should. It really should.

Dolgruff Rummins

Bisexuality isn't a scale that needs to be balanced or it goes away. You could date only women your entire life and still be bisexual. It is simply a description of your sexual preferences. Just because Cat hasn't had a man around that she's interested in, doesn't mean that she isn't bisexual.

sengachi

People who are straight are still straight even if it's been a while since they've had sex. Even if they've never had sex.

Similarly, bisexuality is not defined by how recently someone has had sex with different-gendered partners. Catherine could have never had sex with a man and still be bisexual. If I recall correctly, the last time she had sex with a man was before meeting Black, with a boyfriend who lasted a few months, but that's frankly irrelevant. She's bi and that would be true even if she'd married Killian and never had sex with anyone else ever again.

Liliet

Yep.

Liliet

Masego is asexual.

And there was this one fisherman's son in Laure..

Bi people don't subordinate their relationships to statistics

Mental Mouse

"Bisexual" doesn't mean someone needs both men and women, only that they can go either way. And while it's often been a figleaf for "really prefers own sex but can function with the other", there's also the point that relationships with one's own sex can skip much of the toxicity of male dominance, not to mention the complications of reproduction.

On the gripping hand, Cat's not living in one of in our world's cultures, she grew up in a world where a succession of Named women have Taken No Shit at the length of a sword or worse.

Liliet

> there's also the point that relationships with one's own sex can skip much of the toxicity of male dominance, not to mention the complications of reproduction

(my plan irl)

Fayhem

> On the gripping hand

Ayyyyy references!

> Cat's not living in one of in our world's cultures, she grew up in a world where a succession of Named women have Taken No Shit at the length of a sword or worse.

Yeah, if I even try to imagine someone trying to impose gender discrimination on the likes of Saint or worse Ranger my mind just cringes. I mean at that point it's not even a social shift, it's just natural selection weeding out everyone who's that stupid from living long enough to reproduce.

Javvies

Past Dread Empresses weren't known for being particularly gentle (or subtle) about gender equity, either.

Plus, there's no indication of any kind of gender disparity when it comes to mages and their potential. That alone would be a huge leveler.

And I suppose we might actually need to give Bard some credit here – as far as we know, Bard/Intercessor only incarnates as women, so it was probably in her interests to promote gender equality.

burguulkodar

ha, I got that reference too!

Mental Mouse

You don't have to imagine, just reread Cat's reaction to Pilgrim trying to patronize her. And that's somebody she not only likes, but hopes will be useful to her long-term plans.

Fayhem

I mean, Cat responded with a verbal smackdown (and I think the more salient issue – assuming you're talking about the exchange just past – was less the patronizing and more that he was shrugging at a murder attempt, from Cat's perspective). I'm pretty sure Ranger's response to anything similar would involve less talking and more arterial spraying.

Mental Mouse

Not just a verbal smackdown – she also credibly threatened the survival of his nation and the other nation he'd been helping. Not to mention making it clear that she can swat him like a bug, and the only reason he's alive now is because she willed it so. Even the stories are on her side – turning on his benefactor is not something he can spin.

Shveiran

Not to be that guy, but I'd argue against the use of the word "threatened".

"I would remind you that not helping you solving what is mainly your problem is a thing I can do" is not quite the same as "unless you fall in line, I'm gonna wipe away the continent".

The fact that the threat comes from outside, and is not of Cat's making (though it was a close call" makes a relevant difference.

Mental Mouse

PS:

> Ayyyy references!

Get used to it, I like three-valued logic. 😊

mavant

10 points for the Moties reference.

mavant

That's not how that works.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Not to be rude, but bi people are still bi even if they happen to have a stronger preference for one gender than another, and enough bi people IRL are challenged by people acting in bad faith to "prove" their orientations that it kind of rankles to see it happen here despite Cat being fictional and the nature of "show don't tell" storytelling.

Liliet

This.

We've been shown Cat having an interest in guys. We know she's bi. NOTHING ELSE IS NEEDED THE TRESHOLD IS PASSED

Gunslinger

Guess the corpses Akua made along the way were not the real friends after all.

Javvies

Hmm. So it seems Cat's (current) plan for Akua might not involve literal killing, but a more metaphorical killing and reshaping her into something/someone new.
I'm not sure Vivienne will approve of that.

The Heirarch will know the secret of the Twilight Ways. I don't think anybody expected that he wouldn't. At least, none of us.
And Tariq ought to be expecting it.

Misterspokes

Her goal is the type of true redemption that the Pilgrim was attempting for her, the type that leaves you either absolved and truly neutered or dead.

byzantine279

Typically, both.

Liliet

Yep.

I kind of want her to have a talk with Pilgrim about it.

Andrew Mitchell

> I kind of want her to have a talk with Pilgrim about it.

Now that you mention it, that's something I want to see too.

edrey

reading again her point of view since book 1, she didnt lie. but did she truly like that kind of love enough to put aside her "holy treason" and the ambitious that is the heart of praes? i would say that when she truly change, the novel would be near it's end

Liliet

She's already commented on how 'iron sharpens iron' is weak to Ivah in Ye Mighty, entirely out of Cat's earshot. Akua doesn't cling to her old philosophy anymore.

edrey

she said that she is more than what is made for to the tyrant, but not that she had throw it away, steel come from iron should be her new ideology, Praes is all about looking forward and surpassing the past, so tell me what is more important, the action or the conviction

frolamizFrolamiz

Great development for Akua.

And it just occurred to me that they will go soon to Salia and probably see Cordelia's cousin.

So I'm wondering, what will happen when she see the sisters? She's totally specialized in divination thought birds, so I think it's going to be something big.

Maybe something similar to when the pilgrim tried to read them, but worse and without a choir to protect her? Some kind of enlightenment? After all, if she can predict the future with normal birds, what could she do with godly birds? Or maybe some form of corruption? Anyway, it's probably going to be fun to watch and maybe a diplomatic incident...

edrey

Yeah, i was thinking the same, maybe a direct-intervention oracle from the heaven.

on the side note, the Stigians have crows as gods, i see potential there

sutortyrannus

Stygians have cranes though, not crows.

edrey

Nothing a little of deicide and black paint cant change.

M0och123

Let's please not feed Cat's growing addiction to killing gods anymore than neccesary...

mavant

Aye, they have to be alive for Masego to vivisect.

byzantine279

The worst part for Akua is probably knowing that everything that happened was entirely her fault. That she could have had this place from the start – all she needed to do was be an ally to Cat. ...And she knows that would never have happened. And that makes it so much worse.

medailyfun

it was not just her fault: she had been made into the person she was, to make other decisions meant to be entirely different person from the start. It's a miracle she managed to preserve some good things in her, like relations with her father.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Ah cmon this is just cheap. Ooooo power of frieeendshiip. Ooooo the things she couuuld haaaaave if she wasnt sooo eeeeviiiiil. This is the crazy lass who killed hundreds of thousands you arent turning her with the power of friendship -.-

Andrew Mitchell

I disagree, I really appreciate the journey I'm on with Akua's arc and I suspect most of the other commenters here do as well.

This isn't the end of a 30 minute pony cartoon. It's one small step on an extraordinarily well-crafted character arc with many genuine feels along the way.

Andrew Mitchell

Also, check out ICSM's comment on this:
<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/08/16/chapter-70-dawning/comment-page-1/#comment-51994>

Liliet

Why do you think so?

nipi

Hmmm... Im going to have to recheck but didnt Cat mention that she can no longer sleep during the night after becoming the High Priestess of Night? Or is my memory playing tricks on me?

konstantinvoncarstein

As she is more powerful at night, she logically prefer to act during this time, but if nothing urgent calls for her attention she will gladly sleep.

Faiir

I just realised that Masego is like an anti-priest.

Rather than being granted the power from the gods he believes in, he takes the power from the gods that don't deserve it (and none really deserves!).

Andrew Mitchell

That's very fitting. He could get known as 'the Deicide' just like the Saint was known as 'the Regicide'.

Liliet

Masego deserves this power more than they do, he really does!

caoimhinh

Indeed. Though Masego doesn't really take power from gods, so much as comprehends how it works and thus gains the ability to replicate that power.

Masego's Name of Hierophant enables him to "vivisect miracles" to understand how they work, that knowledge lets him copy that through his sorcery.

The closest equivalent I know for Masego's abilities are the Cultivator Techniques in Xianxia novels. As in, they are supernatural abilities born from understanding a phenomenon or aspect of the universe.

Masego witnessed the Summer Sun when the Princess of High Noon used it, and gained the ability to wield a similar flame (Sunrise Final), same goes for every supernatural entity they have faced, each encounter makes Masego stronger, as he gains more insight on the phenomena of the world.

It's important to mention that he can apparently still wield that knowledge and power, even in his current magicless state, as shown during his recent encounter with Sve Noc. Similar to how a Cultivator would be able to perform extraordinary feats related to their Dao even if exhausted of Qi, albeit with a cost, as their power comes from comprehension and that insight can't be taken from them without the enemy paying a huge price.

The most relevant fact for the current Masego, I think, is this:

There is nothing he has witnessed that can be taken from him. And that paves the way for Hierophant to move forward in his current state, probably recover his magic and grow even stronger.

NZPIEFACE

Recover his magic? How about him understanding that magic is a shackle for mortals to understand the world through. Look at gods, do they cast magic? Or are they just being.

Axel Rafael

OMG 😨 That would just be the most epic level up ever!!

Fayhem

Yeah, my understanding is that Hierophant's miracle-repurposing stuff is aspect-based rather than sorcery-based per se, and has thus survived his loss of sorcery since his Name is still intact even after his loss of magic (which an explicitly sorcery-based Name like Warlock quite likely wouldn't have survived, I'd think).

burguulkodar

The power of the Atheist, ha! jk, jk.

caoimhinh

"Slay the god within your heart before you can kill the god in front of you"

sengachi

Okay, this chapter hit incredibly hard on a personal level. Maybe as hard as anything I've ever read. Why is going to take some explaining but I would like to do so nonetheless.

I am a sociopath. That means that I do not feel empathy (automatic mirroring of other's emotions) or guilt. It does not mean that I am devoid of the impetus to socialize or of basic human emotions. I am a human with a single piece missing, not a cold robot or an inhuman monster. However my lack of empathy makes basic human decency a choice rather than a impetus, makes social skills something learned by rote rather than intuitively mirrored, and my lack of guilt opens up certain options for selfish cruelty that most people simply aren't capable of. I'm not innately a monster ... but it would be very easy for me to chose to be one, and many of the drivers most people have which direct them towards kindness are absent in me. To harm other is effortless for me, to do right by others is a laborious chore.

However I did make the conscious choice to do right by others and act selflessly, originally for rather abstract reasons. (Long story short: My OCD wouldn't permit me to have a non-isotropic moral framework.) It took me quite a while after that to even reach the utilitarian understanding of the benefits of cooperation, kindness, and general human decency that Akua-In-The-Cloak had. And I was certainly not anywhere as good as she was at making use of those benefits.

But eventually there came a point where I had gained a sufficient understanding of others' emotions, learned enough sympathetic skills, and cultivated through actions others' trust in my compassion to the point that I could share genuine emotional vulnerability and intimacy with loved ones. Where I could let my emotional walls down completely with them, and have them do so in return/ Where I could be secure in the knowledge that they would not harm me through malice, disregard, or mistake, that I would not do the same to them, that we would care for one another's vulnerabilities and hurts, and warm one another with honest affection for each other's strengths and accomplishments. I remember the first moment where I consciously realized this had happened, that someone had let me in so deeply and that I had no walls against them. That my odd abstract reasons for acting selflessly I'd originally thought of apathetically at best had led to such genuine love and joy in my life. Despite my absent empathy and guilt, I'd found love.

Just remembering it makes me tear up.

And in this chapter Akua had just such a moment. She saw what love could be like. She experienced genuine camaraderie.

But it's not the moment I had. I had a crystallized moment where I got to see all the love my decision to be selfless had brought me and all the love that was yet to come. Akua got to see the love she could have had. She had it wielded against her like a scalpel, by a woman whose likely goal is to see Akua learn the value of life and love until she walks willingly to her own judgement for unforgivable crimes.

Even before I had decided if I wanted to revel fully in the selfish cruelty my sociopathy would enable or to do the 'right' thing and be kind to others, I made the decision to absolutely not cross any lines which could not be uncrossed, lest I finally make my decision and realize the path I wanted was now closed to me.

But seeing Akua in this chapter ... She already crossed those lines. She left them far behind her. And now she knows. She knows how wonderful the love she could have had is. She knows.

And she can't have it.

I don't think this is something most people will ever experience. The moment, the singular moment, of seeing past the calculus of kindness and understanding for the first time how wonderful love truly is. It's certainly not ever something I've seen described in literature before. But here it is, this thing I value more than anything, being experienced by a character for the the first time.

And she can't have it.

Emotionally ravaged, I think, is the best way to describe how I am feeling right now.

Thank you Erraticerrata, for writing this. It resonated with a very deep chord in me. Now I'm going to cry myself to sleep.

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you sengachi for openly sharing your experience – both the details of your journey and your current “emotionally ravaged” state. You’ve given me yet more evidence that our community enhances my appreciation of EE’s work ten-fold; and a personal reminder of the value of vulnerability. ♥

Liliet

Non-neurotypical guide-shaken high five.

(Although the moments that really had me crying had actually more to do with discussions of sexual and romantic attraction and how it is not everything there is...)

God, this book is so good.

SpeckofStardust

*See's people going on about akua become dread empress
Its not going to happen, it is not the plan. Cats plan is for black to become emperor. She has literally said it within the last 24 in universe hours.

mordered

I agree, but I believe Black is going to die. If Cat is going to survive until the end of the series I hope she will climb the tower, but Akua definitely won't. She might become a teacher or head mistress of the school Cat is planning to built.

ActionKermi

I still think that the song is older than Praes and all the emperor's who built and climbed the Tower did so in ignorance of its true meaning. If Nessie can screw up Procer to protect his kingdom then the Bard can screw up Praes to keep any claimants from succeeding to her Name.

Agent J

Wait, you think Bard is the girl who climbed the tower?
Please, explain.

caoimhinh

Well, the song does come from Nowhere, as stated by Amadeus.

Guess who is the only character who is actively in Nowhere?

It starts with "I" and ends in "ntercessor".

Which reminded me of Amadeus early assessments of the Bard, back in Book 2, I went back to check and found this very interesting paragraph:

ninegardens

Okay, the idea that Bard is the Girl who climbed the tower seems completely nutso... and I love it.

Hell, even if the song isn't ABOUT her, the idea that the song was sung BY her is so sneaky, so neferious... the idea that something so Praes is actually the work of Above (or at least their agent) is just... delightful Especially since even if the song never seemed good (for the listener), it at least seemed to be on their side.

burguulkodar

That is... a very delicious idea. I shall dream of it.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh I agree that at the moment, that's not the plan at this moment. But remember, STORY. This is the cutaway moment in a more humorous work.

"I am not making Akua empress. I said I'm not making Akua empress! Seriously, how many people do I need to explain this to, I'm not making Akua empress now or ever! Not happening!"

Spongebob Narrator: Some Time Later....

"I can't believe I'm making Akua empress."

Mental Mouse

Well, I think EE's above putting that into a Gilligan cut. And anyway, undead are specifically banned from the throne, "ever since the last time that happened".

Insanenoodlyguy

it wouldn't actually be one, I'm just saying, when you say you won't do something this much, the end result of a gilligan cut becomes more likely. to the point where Akua as empress is no longer unthinkable, on a narrative level.

Erik V. Smykal

beautiful work.
excellent writing.
thank you!

Sugar Roll

I don't buy it. I believe Aisha's warning about Sahelians a couple of chapters ago. Akua may have made herself believe she wants close friends but that's not an obstacle for her inevitable betrayal.

NZPIEFACE

On the other hand, I no longer believe that she's a Sahelian anymore. What's a blood bond to someone without a body?

Mental Mouse

More to the point, there's the question of how she'll react to "yeah, now Cat can let me into the circles of love and friendship... but I have no competency here, and without her I'm starting from far less than zero."

Liliet

Sahelian is just a last name.

It's the family she was brought up in and the culture she was brought up in, but she's known its toxicity for a long longer than she's seen a way out of it.

She wants out.

Sugar Roll

Oh that's what she wants Cat to believe. It's part of her long con. As long as Cat remains ready for her, she can make use of her skills and dispose of her for good when Akua reveals her true colors. I'd love Akua to remain loyal but I doubt it given who we are dealing with.

Liliet

Was her inner monologue at Chiaroscuro also for Cat's benefit?

Sugar Roll

Oh yes, very much so. As far as I'm concerned, she's biding her time. Slowly building trust by being charming and making herself useful. And when the time is right, she'll strike—as a Sahelian would.

Sugar Roll

The way I see it, in the future, she will perform a great act that will save lots of lives numbering more than she killed in Liesse. This will even the scales to her favor. After that feat is where I'll be looking out for her betrayal. She may not take the first opportunity that presents itself but she will eventually.

Liliet

Yeah, I'm not seeing it.

To betray Cat, she'd have to give up on the one person who isn't her father who ever looked at her beginnings with sympathy, who ever got horrified for her, the one person she's accidentally opened herself up to and didn't find a knife waiting.

What does she have to gain that'd outbalance what she'd be losing?

Sugar Roll

Don't let the facade fool you. Beneath that manufactured persona is where the Doom of Liesse resides. Praesi are known for their treachery and Sahelians are prime example of that. Akua is the model Praesi highborn and she will show everyone why.

It's not a question of whether she will betray Cat or not, it's when. And when that happens, will she be pulling a fast one like Larat or will Cat be ready for her? That's what I'm looking forward to finding out.

Liliet

You keep telling yourself that, and I'll keep my position. Time will tell ♥

Sugar Roll

Yes, please hold on to your views. I'd love to be proven wrong. The optimist in me would like to see that Akua is being genuine. The realist in me speaks louder though. And as you said, time will tell.

Liliet

(we have some very different ideas on how reality works. Time will show which one of us Erratic agrees with)

laguz24

No, personally I think that she is to become the chancellor and rule over Praes. Black does not know how to deal with the high lords like Auka does and where black can build and do. Auka has to deal with the snake pit that is the court, all crafted smiles, and sharp knives with not a single speck of warmth or love.

oliverwashere

The troubles with getting a redemption arc when your tormentors know what you're doing and won't let it pass on your terms.

Mental Mouse

Some of the Praesi were complaining that Black was acting like an Emperor while Malicia acted like a Chancellor.

caoimhinh

In fact, that was Akua herself, during the speech she gave Fasili before the Fae attacked Liesse.

Agent J

My take is that there'll be no High Lords to deal with. Either Black exterminates them like he always wanted to, or Cat exterminates them as her father should have.

I think their absolute last chance for survival will be when Cat comes marching back East. They will throw all their weight behind Malicia as they did with Akua before, but this time, there'll be no one else left to save them of Catherine's wrath.

Whether Black rules or Cat does, there will be no need for a Chancellor. It was a Name suppressed under Malicia's reign and will die in her successor's.

Liliet

The only scenario I see going otherwise, is one where Alaya is his Chancellor, and some of the noble bloodlines still need handling (those that bowed their heads quickly enough and low enough that even Amadeus did not see a justification for going after them).

But without Alaya? He will not need a justification.

ICSM

This was beautiful.

You see, I'm an old cynic. Not that I'm a old person, but that for the relatively few years I have, I have been a cynic for most of them. All that power of friendship shlock we commonly see in media amounts for me as no more than a well worn trope. Worn enough that I can't even muster disdain for it. I know full well that hysterical strenght is a thing in real life, but the fact that it is pretty much the only way friendship is relevant in media is tiresome.

But this? The use of the basic human craving for companionship as a scalpel to expunge the rotten upbringing out of a person so she can grow healthy? This is something I have never seen. And it is beautiful.

edrey

she said that she is more than what is made for to the tyrant, but not that she had throw it away, steel come from iron should be her new ideology, Praes is all about looking forward and surpassing the past, so tell me what is more important, the action or the conviction

Mental Mouse

Random thought: As Cat speaks of "Zeze": "I'd seen him dig into fresh apple tarts like a starving orc would a pig"... It occurs to me that in our world, the pig would be at the other end of that simile.

Liliet

Yep ♥ ♥ ♥

Tab

" Mores aside, he was not above those himself: me might not have any interest in bedplay, but I'd seen him dig into fresh apple tarts like a starving orc would a pig. "

me might not -> he might not

" I looked at her, in the dark before the dawn, and knew that in that moment either I had been made of fool or I had won."

made of fool -> made a fool ?

Tab

*made a fool of

Sir_Immith

I said many chapters ago that Akua is my favorite character and that shit holds up! Such a compelling arc.

Chapter 71: Verge

"I am told awe is made half of reverence and half of fear. Let us find out, knights of the Callow, if terror alone will be enough to teach it to the likes of you."

– Dread Emperor Nihilis I, the Tanner

The last of them arrived half an hour before dawn's start.

Since I'd been granted my first command in the Legions I'd gotten used to the way that large-scale ritual magic tended to require more people than you'd think, at least when it needed to be done quick and dirty – as was usually the way, when on campaign. It was often a question of needing to pool power so no one died or burned out feeding the ritual though I'd lucked out more than I'd realized when Masego, in those days still the Apprentice, had joined the Fifteenth. There was a reason that Black had preferred massed spells to the old standard of ritual cadres when he'd rebuilt the Legions of Terror from the ground up after the Praesi civil war: it standardized the arsenal of a legion's casters. It'd become increasingly clear over the years that the way it was mostly Wasteland highborn that used cadres of ritual mages along with their personal armies wasn't a coincidence. The heart of the matter was that for a circle of sorcerers to be able to use a ritual together without significant preparations it required for them to be highly skilled, familiar with each other and learned in that particular ritual. That meant keeping mage cadres together, for the Legions, which Black would very much try to avoid since by simple odds it'd mean a lot of Soninke and Taghreb officers of noble birth forming cliques with disproportionated influence inside a legion.

One set of rules for the aristocrats and another one for the soldiers was something my teacher had spent decades trying to dismantle, he wouldn't tacitly endorse its resurrection in the very institution he'd spent so many years shaping. The Fifteenth, and later the Army of Callow, had avoided much of these issues by simple virtue of having Masego along. I'd not understood the importance of the role he played in large-scale battlefield sorceries until our last campaigns, where his absence had effectively made disappear half our ritual arsenal into thin air and robbed me of the High Arcana savant I'd turn towards for answers whenever some strange phenomenon appeared. Oh, Zeze had taught my mages some rough and relatively simple rituals to use on battlefields: his Lightning Strikes and the Spears of Fire remained a staple of the Army of Callow, who unlike the Legions simply didn't have enough mages to be able to afford massed spells as a tactic. But even with those, without his presence there was significant drop in range, power and rate of fire. It wasn't just that he'd used to have rather impressive reserves, but rather that having Masego standing among a ritual was like having someone to conduct a choir. He made up for the imprecisions of others, guided through the stumbles and kept precise the manipulations in the way that someone who wasn't him just... couldn't.

Akua had once compared it to having one of the finest swordsmen on the continent running recruits through formation drills, and she wasn't entirely wrong. Still, with the Dead King's cut those days had seemingly come at an end and the crowd that'd gathered was not a throng of half-awed young mages taking Masego's every word for sorcerous gospel. With the mere arrival of Hierophant and Archer, our company had grown to the sort of dawn tales were made of. Two black-winged goddesses, silently looming atop raised stones in the shape of great and terrible crows. The Doom of Liesse, veiled and silent but not grown much the lesser from her hour of folly. Hierophant, stripped of sorcery but still vivisector of miracles and the kind of man whose insights even gods flinched from. Archer and myself were perhaps lesser figures, for what mattered. All that was required from me in this thinning darkness was a steady hand and the wielding of Night, while she was here as the hand propping up Masego as well as one who had more than once tread the demimonde between Creation and the Twilight Ways without needing any guidance. Should the Pilgrim demur from coming, it would be Archer whose intuitions would be relied on when the burn was made. Yet Tariq did come, in the end, though not alone: bleary-looking and huddling inside a thick cloak of fur, the Rogue Sorcerer was with him. And with those last two there were none left to await, so I drew first blood against the silence.

"Morning," I said. "Or close enough."

Only Masego, I noted, was kind-hearted enough to reply with a full return of the courtesy. Roland shivered inside his cloak, and the Peregrine merely nodded. His face bore the manner of calmness that one wore around a foe, I thought, and though I'd known provoking a return to that was necessary to tie the Intercessor's hands I still regretted it. It would have been pleasant, to be on decent terms with the unspoken doyen of Above's champions.

"Dawn's just around the corner and it'll make everything more difficult when it comes, so I'll spare us all the small talk," I said. "Most of my advisors in matters eldritch say this is where making a stable gate into Twilight will be most straightforward."

"You'll need an anchor for the other side," the Sorcerer said.

"If the aspiration was a clean cut followed by material shoring up, perhaps," Masego dismissed. "Night is not so precise, from what I've observed, and none of the appropriate ritual substances have been gathered here."

I glanced at Roland, who unlike most people subjected to Zeze's mild puzzlement at their 'ignorance' did not seem to have taken offence in the slightest. If anything, he rather looked like he wanted to have ink and parchment on hand. That ought to take care of itself without my intervention, then. Good. The Rogue Sorcerer was by a significant margin the friendliest hero I'd encountered, and I had no intention of letting academic rivalry get in the way of that.

"The Hierophant is right," I said. "What I'll need, though, is... a sense of where to aim for. Which I don't have, unlike some of you. Archer might be able to help, but the person atop this barrow with the deepest tie to Twilight should need no introduction."

Namely the man who had once borne the Twilight Crown, for however short a span. Bearing a mantle like that left marks, I'd know that better than most. It was no coincidence that I'd been able to feel this very place's affinity with Arcadia long after having divested myself of the last of Winter within me. The Grey Pilgrim eyed me warily, though he did not outright decline. As expected of the man, he could already tell where this was headed and was less than enthused.

"Oh," Roland said, shivering from the cold. "Resonance, to shape the depth at which the damage will be inflicted. Yes, that would work. A brute force solution, though."

Archer could serve that purpose as well, but her ties were nowhere as deep. She'd tread the grounds of Twilight for longer than any of us, journeyed through its nook and crannies and even stood open-eyed while the transition from stolen shard of Arcadia to a realm took place. None of these were small things. But the Grey Pilgrim had given the last crown and borne the burden of giving the Twilight Ways their face and shape. The difference was extensive and would likely make a difference in my being knocked out for a day or a week. Figuratively speaking, one hoped, though my advisory triumvirate had not been willing to commit to it.

"Fine tools come from refinement over years and decades," Akua said. "This is work without precedent, Sorcerer."

The last word she spoke with the faintest hint of dubiousness. Had I been worried about the wrong Soninke, then? Shit. She was usually better about this stuff than Zeze, but then this one was a hero as well as a practitioner.

"He is correct," Masego noted. "This is not unlike making a gate by melting stone and shaping it into a threshold."

"And we've so many people observing to establish if there's a better way to do it, next time we must," I said, cutting in before pride could get anything started.

Mages, huh. And I thought it was the brawlers like Indrani and myself that had troubles with surfeit of swaggering.

"And how is this resonance to be acquired, Black Queen?" the Grey Pilgrim asked.

I suppressed a grimace.

"A close look at the traces Twilight left on you," I said.

"Soul-gazing," Tariq flatly said.

Little thick, coming from a man I was pretty sure had an aspect essentially dedicated to that and constantly used it on everyone, but I'd cut him so slack considering who'd be doing that gazing. Namely the Sisters, who for all my occasional appreciation for them were not the kindest or best-inclined of entities on Creation.

"An intermediary will be provided, should you so wish," I said, inclining my head towards Akua.

Wouldn't be as precise a reading, as for all her talents the shade did not benefit from the indescribable senses and perceptions that sprang from apotheosis, but she was talented. What she did pass along to me would be more than enough, and as she was not sworn to serve the Sisters the scrutiny might be more acceptable. Maybe. I wasn't sure where Mercy would fall on that, much less Tariq himself.

"And who would you be?" the Pilgrim openly asked, eyeing Akua cautiously. "We have met before, that much is undeniable. And yet I now see you standing as a bound spirit before me."

They'd met? I frowned, raking my memories and finding no instance. Even during the Princes' Graveyard there should have been no acquaintance. The Battle of the Camps, I realized. Akua had run around wearing my body while I'd been stranded in an endless Winter nightmare and she'd even fought an assembled band of heroes. The Pilgrim would have had a look at her then, and though she had body of her own now I supposed the substance of what she was had not changed too much.

"I am one in the service of the Black Queen of Callow," Akua smilingly said. "Naught else is of import here."

"You chose this appearance," Tariq frowned. "But are not bound to it. What are you, spirit? I have never seen the likes of you, not even in the olden-most barrows of the Brocelian."

"Dawn's coming, Peregrine," I flatly said. "She's bound to me and can wield Night without being in the service of Sve Noc. There will be no more offhand a manner to see this done, if you'll accede to it at all."

"Presumably the Ophanim would slay all here, if attempt was made to wound your soul," Roland pointed out in an aside.

"That is a presumption, yes," Masego calmly agreed.

Archer smothered a smile, and to be honest so did I. It was hardly the time, but the earnestness he'd spoken what would be a boast in another man's mouth made it amusingly endearing. The Pilgrim's eyes were closed, no doubt conferring with the Ophanim, and glimmered still with Light when they finally opened anew.

"So be it," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Trespass not, spirit, lest you find more than you bargained for."

"Worry not, Peregrine," Akua amicably said. "I've always held angels in high esteem."

It was an effort not to choke. I supposed she technically wasn't lying, considering she'd wanted to use one of the Hashmallim as fuel for her doomsday fortress. After all the posturing I'd expected some degree of ceremony, but what unfolded instead was the shade striding forward and silently asking for permission before laying her hand on the Pilgrim's shoulder. He acceded with a nod, and closed his eyes once more as hers remained wide open. After a long moment she let out a long breath and jerkily nodded towards me. I hobbled forward and raised my hand, which she caught by the wrist: the sliver of Night she'd called on seeped into my own. I'd expected this process to be far beyond my ability to fathom, but to my surprise found it rather familiar. It was not unlike the sensation of opening a fairy gate, the sense of the needle going through the fabric and being... fated, for a lack of better term, to leave the cloth again in another place. What Akua had sensed from the Pilgrim and passed to me was not so sharp and narrow, but it was kin to that. A way to put it, I thought, would be that fairy gates under Winter had been the act of needling while what the shade had shared was having touched the cloth. I already knew from experience that trying to grasp the knowledge perfectly would result mostly into a searing headache, so I let it linger half-known and instead breathed out.

"For I have seen crowns broken and forged anew, snatched a star from the starlit sky and traded a season for half the world," I whispered in Crepuscular. "Now that dawn crawls forward unbid, o Sve Noc, grant me might to wield and the conceit to wield it fearlessly. Where there is rampart let my hand make a road, and Creation deny not my will."

The crows cawed, a resounding cry like the crack of a whip against the night sky, and Night flooded my veins thick and pure. I almost lost my foot but at my side Akua held me up by my elbow, having left Tariq to stand alone, and I gasped as I forced my staff of yew to rise.

"Deny not my will," I hissed once more.

Night struck out, like a wave and a strike of thunder, like a flood raging down a riverbed long gone dry. And where it found resistance, I clenched my fingers against the long haft of few and burned Creation. Scarred it, so that the blackened and bleeding scabs would stand at the threshold and mark the path to be taken. It was like riding a tide, every moment a struggle, and I swallowed a scream as I felt my strength ebbing. I would not break, not before the work was done. Not even when the coolness of Night lazed like smoke in my veins, tainting my every sense, and in the far distance I felt the distant glare of light marching like a harsh vanguard.

"Catherine," Akua whispered against my ear. "Catherine, you have to stop."

Was she holding me? When had she? Some pried off the hand that'd gone around my waist and it was put around a shoulder at least. Someone taller than I. I grit my teeth, for all the distractions had loosened my grip on the Night – the work had slowed, suffered. Long and delicate fingers joined mine on the staff, and like a miracle the veil on my eyes lifted. Ironclad will became intertwined with my own and I shared a feral, savage grin with Hierophant without either of us ever looking away from the howling darkness before us.

"You can still wield," I whispered.

Ashkaran, I dimly realized.

"A god rode my mind, Catherine, for many months," Hierophant whispered back. "I have learned things."

Power billowed out, and I was no longer a fool of a girl clinging to a tiger: we were Woe, standing side by side, and though we were battered things no creature in this world or any other had ever earned submission of us. We painted in Night with bold strokes, feeling those around us flee backwards for the storm in the making. Komena laughed in the back of my mind, and it was eagerly that she opened the floodgates between us. Andronike hesitated, until a splash of Night boiled stone like water and we shaped it like clay without ever glancing – after that there was a well of hunger, and Gods Below but the power they granted us. Raised stones melted away into liquid strings like festival banners, spinning into roiling winds of Night. With four hands we sculpted the stone prayer to long-dead gods of Arcadia and usurped the old sacraments like thieving masons in the garments of priests. Two tall pillars, covered with words that were a godless prayer in a dead tongue, were molded and carved. And atop them dropped down the closing of the threshold, a stone like door being slammed shut. Woven from the scabs and burns, sealed in rock where the nature of it could be obscured. Power would fade in time, we knew. But the hurt, the scar? Some transgressions had weight by virtue of being what they were. This would hold for a very, very long time.

After an eternity we half-fell to the ground, Masego's fingers clumsily leaving my staff as I used it to steer us away from tumbling down like drunks. We still crouched, exhausted and exhilarated, as the sense robbed from us by the scale of what we'd wielded and built slowly began to trickle back into our minds. We'd felt something like this once before, in Dormer. There'd been more of us, though, Adjutant and Archer as well. We'd marched forward into the heart of the enemy, bearing the story of the Woe like a banner. This had been a smaller thing, I thought, the Queen of Lost and Found and the Hierophant crafting a miracle out of power and pride. But, Gods... it'd been like a drink of the sweetest of wines, like honey on the soul, and some part of me almost wept that it'd ended.

"Look, Cat," Masego croaked out. "Look."

I followed his trembling finger and beheld the gate of stone we had raised. The runes inscribed on the two great pillars that I knew, just knew, were twenty feet tall and twenty apart were no as gibberish to my eye where before I had known them as if they were my native tongue. But the thrum of them, the crawling flow of power going up them through the barrow like they were rooted there, it sang to me. Of the Twilight just beyond, a mere smear of blood on stone away. And all that power was kept bound, kept locked, by the rough and massive stone pressing down – and the scars it held within, like a secret under seal.

"It's beautiful," I said.

And it was, in its own terrible way. We stayed there in the snow for a long time, at the heart of a circle of raised stones we'd unmade and forged anew, a barren barrow-top caressed by the winds. We stayed there until dawn crested in the distance, the faraway lights that'd be the final touch on our work.

"'lo and behold," I murmured.

The first rays of the sun struck the stone and, as if reflecting from the spiralling runes and stretches of ancient symbols, spun like a dust whirl between the tall pillars. Just long enough a glimpse could be had of the realm beyond, of the endless starlit sky and the shady hills that could be journeyed to any journey's end.

"There's always something more, isn't there?" Masego whispered. "Another horizon, another wonder. Another threshold to cross into deeper unknowns."

It was his own truth he spoke, I thought, but in I heard the echo of Indrani's as well. But what was restlessness in her, wanderlust, in him was instead awe.

"We're not done yet, Masego," I said. "We've bled to get where we stand, and when we come out on the other side we'll not be the same people who began the journey. But we are so very far from done."

He nodded, slowly

"Tomorrow will be ours," the Hierophant agreed, tone tranquil the way old and dark waters were tranquil. "And if there are any who would deny us that, we will Wrest it from them with bloody hands."

The word sang, and the world with it, as my old friend found the truth of third aspect and we sat silent in the warm light of dawn.

P

"The word sang, and the world with it, as my old friend found the truth of voting for PGTE on topwebfiction."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

BarthHumphries

You need to start a typo thread too, every time. Otherwise it never gets fixed.

were twenty feet tall and twenty apart were no as gibberish to my eye where before I had known them as if they were my native tongue.

Change no to now

Dennis Donoghue

I clenched my fingers against the long haft of *Y*ew and burned Creation

Liliet

It never gets fixed even with a typo thread. Erratic doesn't use these.

Rob

In case this is useful for later editing 😊

"tread" is used oddly in this chapter (and various others in the past) – the past should be trod or treaded; tread is only present

sammax

Tread can be used as simple past or past participle as well. According to my dictionary, the forms are tread, trod/tread/treaded, trodden/trod/tread/treaded.

Fayhem

MASEGO GOT HIS THIRD MOTHERFUCKING ASPECT

YOU SORRY FUCKERS ARE FUCKED NOW

And is it just me or does Wrest have a sound similar to Take? I see miracles and horrors alike before us, and none to say which is more dreadful. And I am so fucking excited.

SilverDargon

Oh man that is EXACTLY what I thought when I read that line. So now he has one aspect to see basically whatever he wants to, one aspect to destroy those things should he choose to, and his last aspect to take what he doesn't destroy for himself.

RoflCat

Can't remember where it was said, but didn't Cath say something along the line of "I'll use what I can get, and what I can't, I'll break it"?

Zeze's following her lessons well.

therealgridlock

She once said she'll use what she can take and break what she can't, but she also said what she can't break she will regulate.

So, ultimately, she's reshaping the entire world one brick at a time. One law at a time.

Which I guess is why it pisses me off that the WB is allgedly trying to break the great game while also preventing anyone else from doing so.

Liliet

I think the difference is that Wrest lets you use something while the other person is still holding it, as opposed to Take which grabs it for yourself on a semi-permanent basis.

Fayhem

Well, the literal definition of “wrest” has “take away by force” as one of the primary definitions of the word – e.g., as here: <https://www.dictionary.com/browse/wrest>

How aspects actually work and by what principles they do so can be difficult to say even when you’ve actually seen them used sometimes, so idk how it’ll work in practice at this point. But if we’re going by word definitions I think the literal meaning of the word supports my reading of the aspect more than yours at the moment, if I’m understanding you right anyway.

Adam Panshin

Well, going by common usage... You Take a thing away from someone else, at which point they have lost it and you have gained it. You Wrest control of an event or organization, at which point it continues under your direction.

So by that standard, where Cat’s Take would steal an Aspect from someone else and whatever the Rogue Sorcerer does seems to steal or copy magic from others, I expect Masego to Wrest magical workings away from other people rather than steal their ability to do magic. Does that include the chains by which the Dead King controls his undead armies? We’ll have to see.

weakman54

We need to keep in mind its Masego we’re talking about, so the literal and exact definition is important (like the one you linked).

Google gave me these definitions as well:

verb

1.

forcibly pull (something) from a person’s grasp.

2.ARCHAIC

distort the meaning or interpretation of (something) to suit one’s own interests or views.

“you appear convinced of my guilt, and wrest every reply I have made”

Liliet

I mean. Wrest refers to the thing he did just now. And he sure didn’t take Night away from Cat permanently, he just helped her with it.

Fayhem

> Wrest refers to the thing he did just now.

Ambiguous. Aspect invocations are usually not referring to something retroactively; Hakram did announce Stand that way, but Stand is reactive rather than proactive as an aspect so I think that's a meaningful distinction from Wrest. And "lend a helping hand" is not in any way a definition of the actual word "wrest". He didn't take anything from Cat at all ever – as far as I can see he helped steady and guide her hand while the Night always remained hers. That ain't wresting. So I'm honestly very, very dubious that Wrest could be in reference to that per se.

Liliet

Hmm, that's how I'm reading it.

KageLupus

I would imagine that Wrest has a much more confrontational aspect to it's use. Taking a thing is simple by comparison, since when you take something the other person loses it and you gain it. Wresting a thing is a forceful act, there is a contest involved that I think would let it backfire. If Masego tries to Wrest a miracle away from a god, it could fail and the feedback would probably put him out of commission.

Wrest also has a more immediate connotation to it than Take did. When Cat Took an aspect she had a bundle of power that she could use when and how she saw fit. Wrest feels more like it is taking control of a thing that is happening right this second. The catalyst was him joining in on Cat forming the Twilight Gate and helping her control the process. I would assume that the aspect would act in a similar manner, where he takes control over what someone else has started.

But Wrest probably makes up for those weaknesses by having broader applications. Cat could really only Take aspects from other Named. Masego should be able to Wrest control over a wider variety of things. Spells, rituals, miracles, probably not aspects but there might be some edge cases there. If he gets the ability to control the shape or outcome of the things he Wrests then it would be a huge swing every time he pulls the aspect out. Imagine taking an enemy's ritual and subverting it so that it hit their side instead of your own. Not only did they waste the resources that went into the ritual, but they also suffer its effects. That is going to seriously mess up whatever plan the enemy had.

Fayhem

That seems like a really good analysis. I think this is the best projection of the likely differences between Take and Wrest that I've seen yet.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

So now he's a wrestler. :p

Andrew Mitchell

I like how you've laid this out here. It all sounds extremely plausible.

magesbe

You are incorrect. Take can take magic as well, she did it multiple times to Fey. She stole the Duchess of Withering Winds' spell, and the Princess of High Noon's wings. And it's implied she could have even tried to steal Summer's Sun with it, just that doing so would have killed her instantly.

Steven Neiman

It's also worth noting that his other Aspects sound a lot like massively powered up versions of his old Apprentice Aspects. Glimpse became Witness, and Deconstruct became Ruin.

nipi

What was the Rouge Sourcerors variant again? Or hav we not been told?

Draconic

Thanks for the chapter! I hope you are feeling better. And take all the time you need for the next one.

also: "were no as gibberish" -> now

Javvies

But damn, Third Aspect for Heiropant. I wonder what Wrest will do or allow him to do, exactly. Should be pretty good (for him), though.

Yep, Masego can still utilize miracles and non-Gift-based supernatural power. I feel like that's going to be an unpleasant surprise for somebody down the road.

...

Really, Tariq? You've soul gazed how many people (including Cat) with Behold and now you're going to on about privacy rights and you don't want Cat to examine yours herself so she can craft the gateway to Twilight?

Liliet

Hey, the basic idea wasn't for Cat to do it, it was for the crows to do it. That's creepy alright.

And I mean Akua is,,,, hardly a less offensive candidate,,,

Shveiran

It is. Though... Well, Tariq has never been shy about using it on enemies and friends alike. Yes, from his perspective the Ophanim is a force of Good and thus never malignant, and it is not hard to see how the Sisters would be a more scary entity even to folks on the other side of the fence.

But still... this is not really a surprise, is it? He had to know his sight and bond to Twilight would be of great assistance in this task, and it is a vital one to bring the armies north...

I don't know, it would have been nice not to see him drag his feet on this one.

I've warmed up a lot to him during the first arch, as we got to see his perspective more clearly; and yet, though I stayed stationary during arch 2, I'm cooling down yet again ever since his rebirth.

It's like... be better, man! We are trying to save the world here, could you try being a bit more proactive? You were a lot more on your game when you were with an invading army, and that is kind of sad.

Liliet

Yep.

IDK, he didn't really drag his feet imho, it took like a minute and a half to resolve this question.

Shveiran

Oh, I'm not arguing he is contrary for the sake of being so, just that I feel is not actively trying to be helpful, and he has no good reason to.

This instance in particular is not really significant, it's more the general attitude since he came back from the grave.

Fayhem

I mean, you ever wake up on the wrong side of the bed and then it takes you a little while to get past it and not be unilaterally grumpy and out of sorts? I suspect Pilgrim's got some of that right now, but for being dead instead of being asleep. I mean, IIRC it took a lot out of Cat to bring him back with a pilfered aspect, and she wasn't the one who was dead or the one who was actually having part of their soul cut out. Not to mention that even after the way she took out Saint she's probably like four decades younger. Cat could mostly recover from her side of it after some sleep, but I'd bet Pilgrim is still feeling it and trying not to telegraph that fact.

Anyway, upshot is I'm prepared to give him, idk, another week or so of in-universe time before I start getting too impatient with his post-resurrection self.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"it's more the general attitude since he came back from the grave."

They say that resurrection changes people. Possibly relevant?

Liliet

He said basically that resurrection leaves them depressed and in a dump.

Checks out.

Liliet

I'm... not getting that feeling?

I'm getting the feeling he's really off his stride bc he's used to being the like teacher/guide and Cat is not letting him do/be that and he has no idea how else to act.

Andrew Mitchell

I think that makes a lot of sense.

Pilgrim had been running in an extremely well-formed groove and was a very strong hero as a result. He's still a very strong hero but he keeps trying to go back to his groove and Cat keeps kicking him back out again.

Liliet

Yup.

His groove is not 'volunteer to have your soul inspected for knowledge needed for a ritual', so it takes him an extra couple of minutes to process that.

He is not the smartest boot in the drawer.

caoimhinh

Usurpation is the essence of sorcery. Wrest is the embodiment of that tenet.

Andrew Mitchell

Perfect. 😊

Valkyria

This was magnificent. Totally worth the wait too.

I mean it was totally awesome and stuff but I also tried to imagine what it has to look like from the outside...

Cat, leaning on her staff, chanting words in a foreign language, burning up with power (i might have an anime like picture in my mind here xD) and a swirly abyss of darkness and Night just in front of her, forming giant pillars with weird symbols ...

yeah she's totally got the grim mysterious priestess vibes going there.

I sure hope GP didn't get a heart attack from all that dark Heathen Magic.

daegone823

Wrest, to take back something. I think Masego will be able to steal magic from others or at least something similar to the Rogue sorcerer. Based on his relationship with gods. I believe he will be able to grasp miracles as well. Truly a dangerous being has come into his own.

Komplode

Wrest is usually used in the context of power, I get the impression from context that ee meant it in this sense. To me this suggests that Masego will forcibly be able to yolk people's and gods (maybe even uppercase) power from them. This could be their magic, aspect or even bestowed? Maybe even narrative weight though that might be op and is (to me anyway) stretching.

Faiir

And now Gods, you shall witness my aspect:
YOINK!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Finally! I'm still not over Yoink not being one of Thief's aspects.

DoOd

The way I expect it to work is that he'll be able to take control of a spell, miracle or aspect.
i.e. GP fires his Light death beam at Cat and Masego takes control and wipes out the whole levantine army with it. (or he just Nopes Bard's reincarnation aspect)

Sylwoos

Simply taking control of a spell is the kind of half-baked thing Cat would think off. We're talking about Hierophant here, he's way more refined than that.

If he's attacked by Pilgrim's Light beam, he won't care for the beam, he'll go straight for the Light itself, Wrest it out of the hand of the Choir and wield it as his own. To take forcefully the power of gods is exactly the kind of thing we should expect from the Hierophant.

Liliet

Still thinking its temporary. Instead of building up an arsenal of OP shit the way he had been up to Thalassina, he now can power up to the exact measure of the opponent(s) and beat them with their own power. Then he's down to zero again.

It sounds v in line with his character (he is used to his power as a utility that has always been available to it, it's like a limb, but he doesn't really care about being able to wipe muggles or w/e its swinging it with gods that hes into) and it cleans up narrative vulnerabilities of being OP

daegone823

Just going to also add that maybe some new heroes can be introduced at some point.

Just saying between the three month some heroes can be introduced.

IDKWhoitis

The narrative is slowly being pulled towards an Armageddon type scenario where good and evil put aside differences for one last strike to stop a catastrophic threat. All the Names involved will have to be big names, or they will simply be red shirts by the end of it. I'm even worried if Roland will make the cut, because the Heroes already got the Witch of the Woods. Although the novice being the only survivor can also theoretically apply.

To put an end to my rambling :

I don't think a new Hero will make an appearance, at least not one that survives longer than 5 minutes into the DK Fight.

Skaddix

I mean in terms of a Final party. I think Cat is lock, Hanno is lock, Masego and Indrani have good odds (since the DK caused relationship drama and made it personal by killing Indrani), Witch is likely. That leaves you with a flex spot since any party has room for a core 5 and 6th Man swinger. I don't expect much in terms of major new heroes introduced.

Fayhem

I'm dubious regarding Witch making it on the roster; she's a heavy hitter for sure, but on a meta-narrative level she really hasn't gotten a lot of face time whereas Roland just spent a whole arc appearing on-screen with the protagonist of the Guide. Also, unless he dies (again) first Pilgrim is definitely also a lock. And since he already died in a noble sacrifice once, I don't see him doing a repeat, at least not before the final confrontation. It wouldn't have the same punch twice unless there's something giving it extra weight.

So I'm thinking final party roster as Cat, Pilgrim, very likely Masego and Indrani, Hanno I'd also give good odds at the moment though I wouldn't quite put him down as a lock, and then for the last spot I'd say Roland is the most plausible as the most direct arcane countermeasure available. Unless Tyrant pulls the ultimate weasel move and gets himself included in that band of five also (please no). Sixth ranger could be Hakram to back up Cat if he isn't holding things down elsewhere or, hilariously, Akua. Or, more hilariously and paranoia-inducingly still, Bard herself.

Skaddix

I mean I say Masego can do Roland's job right now what they both lack right now is raw magic power right now which the Witch has.

As for GP i expect him to die before we get a final party plus I am not sure I take him without his rez. I figure his best use is doing the mentor death power up for a Hero. Give him the proverbially passing the torch moment.

From Cat's side though I think Cat, Masego and Indrani are all locks.

Agent J

Hanno has been rather tangential to the story thus far. His escapades in the Free Cities was a C plot at best, his part in the crusades were a B plot and over rather swiftly, he's been holding ground in the North well enough, but Catherine did more on that front by herself and did so without even being in the same half of the country.

All this, and his original purpose of being the heroic foil to Catherine the Black Knight died three books and several plot lines ago. He got a flashback, so the EEs of Above and Below deem him important enough for that, at least, but the Witch? She's been on screen once and has no personality we can properly discern.

Hanno's band is going to have to come in hard with a loud boom of personality and gravitas if they're to endanger Roland who's already managed to endear himself to Cat, the audience, and the Audience.

I mean, he's literally the Underdog as far as mages go. I mean he's the only Named maybe mage in Iserre, yet every named former mage is his better by leaps and bounds. He's sharp with his tongue and is just barely keeping up with all the living legends of the age that surround him. He's even got a mysterious backstory! That's worth two flashbacks and a monologue!! He literally can't die until we figure out just what his deal is.

To summarize,

Cat's a lock, because she's the bloody protagonist.

Indrani's a lock, because someone's gotta be the resident Stabber of Bad Things on the team and she has history with the Asshole Who Murdered Her. (Could be switched out for Champion if Heroes insist on skewing the Band in favour of Good).

Tariq's a lock, because he was literally revived for this.

Masego's a lock, because he is nettled and the resident expert on almost everything, and more pertinently, the matter of gods and how to kill them.

Hanno's a lock, because why have we kept getting snippets of his life and actions if he's not going to amount to anything. And also he's been loudly touted as the "Greatest Hero of the New Generation".

And if there's going to be a Sixth Ranger it'll either be the Mysterious Sorcerer(?) or the Mysterious Spirit(?).

Boring witches we neither know nor care for are unlikely to suddenly become relevant this late in the Apocalypse game.

Do0d

I thought Hanno would try to have his choir pass judgement on Hierarch and then Hierarch will accuse the whole choir of being Foreign Oligarchs and their laws being not of the People thus erasing the whole choir out of existence.

Agent J

The Hierarch is mad and there is power in that. Maybe even in enough to smite an angel. But I highly doubt he could erase a whole choir.

More importantly, are you suggesting that Hanno has been given all this build up, just to get bent over and reamed by Anaxares? Cuz... I'm not against that.

Do0d

Well if Judgement is accused of something, they must judge themselves.

If they then judge themselves guilty ... we all know that the only answer to a guilty verdict from them is removal.

Agent J

Which begs an interesting question: Are Angels capable of rank hypocrisy?

Javvies

They're certainly capable of trying to break the rules of the Narrative.

Remember, the Hashmallin tried to deny Cat the resurrection she earned through the Story, so she had to Take it from them.

And the Ophanim would normally be hugely opposed to Cat, yet they allowed her to rip out and use Forgive on Tariq.

Do0d

The Hashmallim denied Cat's resurrection because she was not contrite; she did not conform to the absolute that governs them and so had to take her resurrection forcibly.

The Ophanim seek to alleviate suffering. Allowing Cat to resurrect Pilgrim, their most devoted tool would fit right in with their function.

Decius

Masego versus Dead King is a lock. My money is on a 1v1 that DK narrowly wins, incapacitating Zeze, followed by the rest of the band vs Dead King and Revenants, where Rumena buys the farm for angst's sake and everyone else is defeated, at which point the Bard Enters, Stage Right and starts to try to talk DK to death (to life?). During the time freeze Heiropant recovers enough to use Wrest on the Bard, then take over DK's power. Most of the Revenants are pledged to the Accords in a manner endorsed by the Pilgrim, making them strong enough to be credible.

minichirops

Shhhh... now it won't happen. Rocks fall, everybody dies.

Liliet

I don't believe there's going to be a single 5 man band party in the end. I think it's going to be a group effort in a much more diffuse way, more like a mass ritual with everyone doing their part than a hack-y 'story says we win here' 5 man band.

Like someone is idk holding open the portal to Hells, someone is constantly healing everyone else, someone is fighting the army off to the side, someone is scrying, someone is targeting DK's weak point through the scrying, etc. Some of it might be a 5 man band, there might be multiple of those involved – likely that.

Sparsebeard

I don't feel like the DK is the final enemy though, I mean, he might be one of the few who actually will try talking before coming to blows with Cat. Heck, I wouldn't be (that much) surprised if he sent an emissary at Salia..

Well, maybe not, still, I feel that him and Cat are too smoth operators to simply destroy themselves one against another.

Plus, it would kind of be anticlimatic for an antagonist introduced so late to be the Big Bad. I mean, Bard or even Black or Akua fit the bill much better (not that I think it's gonna be one of those two but still).

Komplode

For me it's the dwarves I want to see more of, how their 'deep' fits into Gods and gods and where it stands with the Intercessor, something doesn't get called deep without being v old. Also their culture seems pretty bad ass, that might be cause it's been left so vague and up to imagination tho

IDKWhoitis

I have a feeling that Wrest is going to be used on DK or Bard by the end of this. Like it's practically made for prying loose something no mortal should bear. Whether it be control of a hell gate or undead or even the Gift. Or alternatively, a flask, if Cat wants to piss off the Bard...

Faiir

YOU CANNOT WREST YE FLASK

Cicero

Just get Trogdor, and burninate ye flask

Shikkarasu

I was hoping for Usurp, but I have a feeling we are going to - love- Wrest. Taking other people's toys and showing them how they work? So very, very Zeze.

Rey d`Tutto

Putting it that way reminds me of the scene wherein Masego becomes Apprentice (Glimpse?)

erebus42

Well that was pretty awesome.

I'll be curious to see what Masego's new aspect does. My guess is it will let him usurp the miracles and workings of others.

Liliet

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Vote for Masego's third Aspect!

gingerlygrump

Ahh, Ee you made me cry with this one. Masego will have his triumphant return. I hope he Wrests his power back from the Dead King.

Liliet

Masego is such a teacher ♥ ♥ ♥

Roland gets an urge to get pen and parchment just from him talking ♥

Fayhem

I think it's pretty clear that says at least as much about Roland as about Masego lol. But fundamentally yes, if we don't get Professor Masego of Cardinal I will consider it a massive unfulfilled tease.

Liliet

I mean yeah that's primarily about Roland. But Masego always EXPECTS and WANTS that exact reaction, and he got his third Aspect out of helping Catherine out with managing her cool powers?

Fayhem

Wants definitely, not sure if he still expects it after this much exposure to other people. But you've got a good point that for Masego pointing out the ignorance of others (calculating "ignorance" on a steep curve, mind) was always about letting them know so they could correct that. Moving from there to "let me help you correct that" would be a step forward still, but it would be a very natural step forward.

Liliet

Mhm!

Note also what this chapter says about him teaching the Fifteenth's mages rituals and how differently they went with or without him. He has actual patience for teaching and guiding, and I don't recall him ever complaining about it – like Cat was actually startled to realize how much of it he was doing.

Decius

"That is a presumption, yes," Masego calmly agreed.

Wow. That burn was worse than anything that could happen if the ritual goes wrong.

Daniel E

Wrest sounds like a play out of the Rogue Sorcerer's arsenal, though admittedly more violent. I imagine Rogue can take sorcery from a dead or severely weakened opponent, whereas Wrest would allow taking from someone who is at full strength, so long as Hierophant's willpower is stronger and/or more flexible. Kindof like magical arm-wrestling.

Komplode

Imo wrest will be much more versatile than Rogues magic trick, I think Rogue and only learn one use sorceries whereas Masego will be able to take and use people's power whether it be magic, name or divinely bestowed for a limited time period

Andrew Mitchell

Woah, that was a m a z i n g. Seeing Masego and Cat work together like that was a real treat, and now Masego has his third aspect as well. Wrest sounds very appropriate.

A prediction: Pilgrim's going to find out who Akua is and it's going to be a factor in the negotiations in Salia.

Oshi

Well yeah Cat will have to tell them eventually. You can't chain someone to the rock without naming them, Prometheus comes to mind.

caoimhinh

My bet is on Kairos casually mentioning Akua during the coming peace talks.

And he would probably be like:

"Oh, was that a secret I was not supposed to say to others? Nice."

Shveiran

It certainly seems plausible at this stage, yet I'm not really sure why it is a relevant point.

As I've argued before... so Cat has bound the soul of her enemy into her service. Oh no?

I mean, the soul-cutting can hardly be a major thing, can it? Cat messed with a Villain's soul, the Heroes cut a Villain soul... It doesn't seem like anyone was indignant when it was Black's, so I could maybe see it raising a few akles if it was a hero's soul but... the Doom of Liesse? Come now, indignation would be ridiculous.

So... is it the slavery? I mean, I can see how that could be a problem, sure, but it's not like she is torturing her to death. The alternative was what, just killing her and burying her on consecrated ground so that no wraith would come out? Locking her up somewhere she would eventually escape from? It's arguable at best that any of the alternative options would be better, from a moral OR practical point of view. Which isn't to say it can't be argued, but... a game changer, really?

Unless it is the "mercy" aspect that is a problem? In that case, I can see how some Heroes (those we could say graduated from the Saint school of problem slashing) may have a problem with that, but even so A) it's not like she is getting off scott free, B) even if she was, how is this a bigger issue than allying with the former Black Knight, to whose death Cat already opposes and C) are the Good guys really going to complain now about how Cat is not murdering ENOUGH people? For Sisters' sake, a few chapters ago the bloody Pilgrim let the Tyrant go with nowhere near this much of a sanction, and no one even suggested it might have been a mistake.

Don't get me wrong, I think you are right and this will likely be an issue at some point. I just... I see the foreshadowing, but I don't really get the shape this problem should have. Am I missing something?

Insanenoodlyguy

You're neglecting the Black school of thought. Where it's not about the morality or lack thereof of the act itself, but rather the judgement in doing it at all. Namely "This is too goddamn dangerous, not killing her gives her a chance to do more horrible things, and the bound slaves of villains are never as under their control as they believe."

Liliet

I don't think the heroes have a horse in this race though. They haven't actually dealt with Akua (which is part of the chip on Cat's shoulder: they did NOT help deal with the fae or the Diabolist but now they're coming to help 'liberate' the people from those who actually protected them from that?) so if Cat is like 'i have this under control' they are most likely going to be 'sounds legit'.

Esp Tariq who can actually look into Akua's soul and confirm that it is indeed under control.

Or warn Cat if it isn't.

Y'know either way there isn't the uncertainty of 'but is she fooling you'. The heroes just... don't care.

Mental Mouse

I suspect that Sve Noc could defend Akua's psychic privacy at need, but they're going along with Cat's game here. Having his Behold get no-sold by Cat is just one of the reasons Pilgrim's been increasingly at sea for this last couple of arcs.

There's also the point that, if Akua was to go rogue... how much could the heroes do about it without Cat's consent? If anything, they might hope that the "infighting among villains" would give them an opening against Cat.

edrey

i believe that Wrest should be way more powerfull and vesrsatil than Take from Squire or Hold or Steal from Thief, one is a transitional name and the other just a weak name. he should be able to take from powers and objects to knowledge and souls. i just worry that the pilgrim just hear him said his new aspect, that is trouble

Oshi

He has god vision. He will know either way.

Soronel Haetir

I thought an initial invockation of an aspect was actual use, not just saying "hey, I'll do this thing sometime".

Amy Lear

Arguably he just did it. He was shaping power from Sve Noc that was not his to draw on.

Fayhem

An interesting point. But are we sure yet that it wasn't an actual use? He was just touching Night and it was well established he's not sentimental regarding the feelings of the Crows. He wouldn't take Night from them as a gift or for a pledge of service, no. But if they didn't want him just taking the power then they shouldn't have left it just lying around like that. I mean, carelessness like that is really more of an invitation, isn't it? Never forget, Masego may be bae but he's still Praesi.

...Wait does that mean he's technically Baesi?

Liliet

I think he used Wrest when helping Catherine yeah. "Oh come on let me hold that"

Fayhem

Eh, that still really doesn't sound like "take by force" to me.

Darkening

Nah, cat got Break after she snapped the angel sword. Doesn't have to have the dramatic declaration/use to get an aspect. Hell, learn just sort of appeared out of nowhere for her.

Gamer7956

At the same time, learn was more of a passive, always on aspect (Like all three of Rangers, according to her chapter) – there was no defining moment.

Though I would argue Wrest was used with Cat to shape the portal. I think Wrest is likely to be taking control of power from Gods – spells/miracles in progress specifically. Taking control – even only partial – of a god fuelled miracle definitely comes under that.

I don't think Zeze is going to be able to take permanent power – that's Roland's shtick. He's more of "You're incompetent/in my way, give that here"

caoimhinh

Hmm, Roland doesn't seem to be able to take permanent power, he stores up spells and wards to spend them later. Take was a permanent usurpation of power, and would stay with Cat until she decided to Take something else. Even William's Aspect of Rise recharged itself when in Cat's possession, that was a permanent steal.

I expect Masego's Wrest to be something like forcefully taking control of a power and permanently gaining some sort of authority over that, even if not over all that power, over some part of it. Maybe even a permanent insight on its workings that enable Masego to replicate it (that has been his whole schtick as Hierophant, after all).

TheAtomicOption

Wrest is a good one for him since he needs to Wrest away the ability to do sorcery from some one (preferably the Dead King or Akua)

Patrick Nava

I'm confused. I thought Masego lost his Name. How does he still get an aspect?

Mental Mouse

No, Masego lost his sorcerous ability, not his Name. There's plenty of non-Named sorcerers running around, and also a fair number of non-sorcerous Named – and that latter group now includes Masego.

The interesting thing is, Masego's previous Name of Apprentice was directly tied to sorcery. His current Name of Heirophant was certainly nurtured and supported by his sorcery; a lot of people (surely DK, and initially Cat) probably assumed that without sorcery, Masego it would lack a power base.

But IIRC both the Name and each Aspect weren't triggered by sorcerous feats but rather by his repeated run-ins with various gods and demons. And just on basic meaning, a heirophant is not a wizardly or sorcerous role, it's a priestly role. Masego has become, by stages, a sort of Villainous cleric – one who does not beseech the gods, but confronts and dominates them.

So, he's just the guy to stand up to... some undead immortal asshole who dared to rank himself among the gods, while still tampering directly in mortal affairs.

Especially paired with a woman who had godhood thrust upon her, but responded with "who, me?", renounced divinity, and switched over to working in the service of another godhood.

(And while Sve Noc may be new to true godhood, they had a helluva long apprenticeship – and since their final ascension they've been acting like proper gods and working primarily through their servants.)

caoimhinh

Nope, just a couple chapters ago he was shown using it to confront Sve Noc when they offered a deal to him in his tent. Catherine explicitly said that his Name was flaring with power against the flood of Night in the tent.

He lost his Gift, his magic, which Akua described as a physical thing, not a metaphysical thing, so I'm guessing it's more like he lost the capacity to store mana in his body, so he can no longer cast spells.

He still has Hierophant as Name. In fact, the first clue we got that he still had his Name was when Cat grabbed him right after vanquishing the Dead King's fragment that possessed him, and we saw that his glass eyes still worked despite losing his magic (they are made with his Sorcery, but were his very first working as Hierophant, encapsulating Summer Flame inside, if he had lost both magic and Name, the eyes would have stopped working).

Up until Masego's confrontation with Sve Noc, many were still speculating whether losing his magic meant losing his Name, but that was the confirmation he still has it.

Sparsebeard

"Behold"...

Perhaps Cat is aiming for the job of professor of Botany and Alchemy at the Unsee.. at Cardinal right now.

Mental Mouse

Botany and Alchemy? Huh?

I'd say either she or Masego will be chairing the Department of Applied Theology.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure this is referring to Rafe Tgab.

mavant

Zeze is just the best.

mavant

Really I just want to hang out and Do Science with him.

magetite

Hoping for masego to wrest control of his gift from the dead king

Interlude: Iron

"There are only two sorts of freedom to be found in Praes: the tyrant's freedom, and the freedom to do as the tyrant said."

– Extract from the memoirs of Hiram Banu, the Ninety-Year Chancellor

Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, Princess of Salia, Prince of Rhenia and Warden of the West found that her patience ran thin, these days. Not for a freshly developed failure of character, she'd decided, but rather because there was simply so much to do and so little time to see it done. Petty temporizing from others had once been something to tolerate out of courtesy, to maintain the ties of etiquette binding all to civility and so providing a common tongue, yet now ever instance was measurable loss. And never a frivolous one, either, for all the decisions of middling import she could pass on to subordinates she already had weeks ago. Therefore, when the First Prince of Procer entered her solar at a brisk pace she was quietly irked by the absence of one of the three men she'd sent for. The Principate of Procer could be said to have three great assemblies of spies, when counting those attached to the sole office of the First Prince and not the particular of who sat on the throne. The first and foremost was the Circle of Thorns, whose webs of informants abroad had been the eyes and ears of the rulers of Procer for centuries now: its current highest patron, the skeletal and balding Louis of Sartrons, rose smoothly as she entered. A noticeable moment later the other man in the room, Balthazar Serigny, followed suit.

That hirsute bear of a man, his face a bold battlefield between ferocious eyebrows and an uncompromising beard, was the head of the Silver Letters. A pack of thieves and assassins grown so successful some centuries past they were given official sanction and from then on used as the spies of the First Princes within the boundaries of the Principate itself. Balthazar the Bastard, as his subordinates called him without speaking of the circumstances of his birth, had opposed Cordelia's rise to power during the Great War and remained in place after her crowning largely because he was too difficult to swiftly replace and the successor she'd handpicked for him was not yet ready. There should have been a third on his feet there, Simon of Gorgeault, standing in the name of the Holy Society. That one was as much a diplomat as a spy, for the Holy Society and its assembly of highborn lay brothers and sisters was at times more an informal channel of communication with the House of Light than shadowy obtainers of secrets. Gorgeault's lateness grated on her more than it should have, Cordelia knew, for knowing the man it would not be without reason. Yet his close ties with the House and in particular the Holies – that informal assembly of the influential within the House whose equally informal decisions ever became formal policy – were doing him no favour in her eyes of late.

"A good morn to you both," the First Prince of Procer calmly said.

She paused long enough to allow the two spymasters to return the courtesy.

"Be seated," Cordelia Hasenbach ordered. "We will begin without Brother Simon."

The blonde Lycaonese pressed her skirts against her legs to more elegantly sit her chair, dismissing the attending servants with a polite shake of the head when inquiries were made by silent look. She had no intention of entertaining these men long enough for refreshments to be required, much less a meal. Besides, should she offer either etiquette would require small talk be made over them before serious matters were spoken of and she had absolutely no intention of wasting half an hour on inanities when Procer was rarely more than one calamitous day away from annihilation.

"We will attend to the Iserran situation first," Cordelia stated. "Gentlemen, am I to understand that disaster was truly averted?"

The men shared a silent glance, the rapacious-faced head of the Circle and the half-wild former fantassin who'd killed and blackmailed his way to supreme prominence in the Silver Letters. It was the latter that spoke first, first clearing his throat in a surprisingly dainty manner for a man of his looks and conduct.

"We have confirmed that the foreign forces have all begun to evacuate the plains," Balthazar the Bastard said. "It was made known to the rank and file of both the Army of Callow and the Legions of Terror that winter quarters will be raised in Arans before they went through the gate, so I believe it likely the Black Queen intends to keep her word."

Of that there had been little doubt in the First Prince's mind: she'd read a transcript of these Liesse Accords, passed along by hasty scrying. It was becoming increasingly evident they'd all severely underestimated Catherine Foundling, and that her game was a long one indeed. Cordelia's cold blue eyes moved to the other man sitting across from her, inviting elaboration.

"The League of Free Cities has agreed to begin marching south, and to the offered sale of supplies as the costs you offered," Louis said. "The Hierarch himself is said to have granted full authority to his advisory council over the matter, though the Tyrant of Helike remains the dominant force among it."

Though not by so large a margin as he would have been before what her people had taken to calling the Princes' Graveyard. An ornate affectation, given only a single royal had died instead of abdicated, yet the Alamans fondness for grand appellations was not to be denied. The League's audacious – foolish, some would call it – march through the Waning Woods to take the Principate by surprise had meant it would need to live off the land after the supplies it brought began to run out, given the lack of supply train. The situation for them was not yet dire, yet the Circle of Thorns had learned that they had perhaps two months left before their grain ran out. Which was something of an issue for the invaders, given that the Carrion Lord had already stolen or torched every granary in the heartlands of the Principate: there was nothing left for them to steal in turn. Offering just enough supplies to fend off starvation in exchange for a retreat south had been a gamble, but a necessary one. She could not let more than a hundred thousand foreigners camp in Iserre while talks took place here in Salia. For one, it was much too close to the capital. More importantly, if the League's armies stayed in Iserre so much enough of a force to check it even if truce was currently being had.

Oh, Kairos Theodosian would no doubt turn on her as soon as the conference came at an end and he'd secured whatever prize he now sought. Yet by that time the armies of the League would be much further south, perhaps as far as Tenerife, and the military situation would have changed. The Black Queen had, after all, admitted to making bargain with the Kingdom Under concerning sale of armaments and implied to Arnaud that arrangement could be had there between herself and the Principate. That meant delaying resumption of hostilities with the League a valid tactic, for by the time the blades came out again the massed levies Cordelia had ordered in all southern and western principalities would be furnished with fresh dwarven weaponry and be ready to hold the line against the League's treachery. It would have ruinous costs in both lives and gold, but it was either that or allowing the Tyrant of Helike to dictate the course of the war on Keter however he wished. The Prince of Rhenia had sent her own people to die and abandoned her kinsmen to the Dead – she could and would stomach Arlesite conscripts bleeding to defend their own lands. Louis of Satrons' pause was smoothly filled by the other spymaster a heartbeat later.

"My people in Iserre had a look at the delegations when the Black Queen opened the fairy gate for them," Balthazar said. "Getting too close was judged risky – the Jacks are sharp-eyed and there's goblins skulking around everywhere – but we believe the agreements were honoured when it comes to soldier strength."

Cordelia's brow did not rise, for she was better bred than that, yet she politely expressed surprise.

"Even the Carrion Lord?" she asked.

The offer extended had been an escort of four thousand for every representative attending the conference, which Cordelia had intended to mean the Hierarch and the Queen of Callow. Now instead there was a certain 'General Rumena' representing the interests of the Empire Ever Dark and requiring their own escort, which was unfortunate confirmation the drow were on the move once more. The suggestion the Carrion Lord would attend as representative for the Dread Empire of Praes had been like ash in Cordelia's mouth, given the man's cold-blooded scheme for the death of thousands and thousands of innocents. In all fairness, Foundling seemed to have understood the... delicacy of that situation and offered a compromise: she'd be responsible for the man's actions while in Procer, and as her dependent he would be allowed only a thousand men in escort to be deducted from her own four thousand. The blonde Lycaonese suspected the hand of Vivienne Dartwick in those terms, whose diplomatic acumen had proven greater than one would expect of a former Chosen.

"He seems to have brought only four hundred legionaries," Balthazar said. "Though given how popular he remains with parts of the Army of Callow, he's hardly vulnerable."

Not that Cordelia was fool enough to entertain assassination at the moment. Not with his apprentice – who, it seemed, still remained fond enough of him to seek his release regardless of reports of their quarrelling after the Doom of Liesse – having become so crucial to the survival of the Principate and perhaps even the continent itself. The amount of forces coming close to Salia made her uneasy, in truth. Four thousand drow, possessed of strange eldritch powers at night by all reports, four thousand eastern legionaries and a mixed force of four thousand from the League whose finest were from Helike. The Dominion would bring four thousand of their own, though they'd proved unreliable allies in many ways, and the First Prince had provided four thousand of her own soldiery to stand for the Thalassocracy of Ashur under thin pretence. Salia was hardly undefended, of course, and Princess Rozala Malanza would be bringing ten thousand soldiers besides as a guarantee. Yet sixteen thousand foreign soldiers within a day's march of the capital was not something to take lightly in any circumstances, much less these. Countries grown weak often found their allies had grown hungry.

"Then it seems we had survived the crucible," First Prince Cordelia calmly said, "and must now begin preparing for the one waiting beyond the horizon."

"If I may, Your Most Serene Highness?" Louis of Sartons asked, and she moved her head in concession. "Our allies in Ashur are becoming increasingly desperate, and when word of the bargain struck for the retreat of the League that despair will turn to fury."

It would, Cordelia privately agreed, for every step that took the armies of the League further from Procer took them closer to the shores of the Thalassocracy. All the while the fleets of Nicae kept blockading the island-nation and sinking even fishing boats, very clearly aiming to starve Ashur into submission. The bargain would be seen as a betrayal, not entirely without reason, and Cordelia's assurances that this was maneuvering would ring hollow so long as they were not paired with some manner of relief for Ashur. Which she could not provide so long as the League's fleets had the run of the Samite Gulf, given that no Arlesite principality had a considerable military fleet to call on. Largely because of Ashuran bribes and threats, one might uncharitably add.

"We will have to exert pressure on the League during the conference," Cordelia agreed. "Lest we lose Ashur entirely to spite or surrender. If a common front is put forward to at least allow for grain barges to be allowed through, there would be hope to offer."

"That would require Callow to back us against the Free Cities," Balthazar grunted. "They're trying to get a foot in the Grand Alliance so it's not impossible, but the Black Queen's no fool. She'll not let herself be brought into the fold before she squeezed us dry of every concession she can prior to alliance."

"I am not so certain," Louis disagreed, bony face gone pensive. "No force under her command has ever resorted to looting or foraging while campaigning in our lands. Though I would agree she has distaste for the well-bred, I would venture she'd be rather sympathetic to the plight of starving Ashurans. It is not an uncommon trait, in tyrants who have popular support."

Cordelia was, in fact, inclined to agree with the leader of the Circle of Thorns. Catherine Foundling had a record of trying to spare commoners the worst of war even when it was inconvenient to her armies, and the Army of Callow's regulations were perhaps the strictest on the continent when it came to civilians. Unfortunately, the First Prince found it dubious that the Black Queen would antagonize the League of Free Cities on behalf of the Grand Alliance without some manner of concession. Which was not unreasonable, given that she would be taking on risks for nations that had warred on her own, but was most definitely unfortunate. The fair-haired First Prince only had so many concessions she could make and was reluctant to begin doling them out too early in negotiations. She might have to regardless, Cordelia grimly conceded. Choices were the privilege of those mighty enough to afford choosing.

"There will be a need to approach her in private after she arrives," the First Prince finally said.

That much had never been in doubt, truth be told, though the extent of matters in need of discussion sometimes felt like to Cordelia like it increased by the day. The First Prince found herself in the unpleasant diplomatic quagmire of having to negotiate with a need to preserve an empire's dignity without having an empire's might to ensure it. Whatever alliances she might have once been able to call on were now stretched thin, the Chosen so unreliable as to be worthless and to add one more complication the Silver Letters were adamant that the Black Queen had become somewhat popular with Alliance armies that'd been on the field. The entire host had been plagued with dreams, allegedly the work of the Choir of Mercy, that had shown a span of the 'heroics' that'd taken place in these Twilight Ways. The result had been flattering to the Queen of Callow's reputation, to say the least, though the transcripts of some of these dreams had been disturbing to read. The cunning that Foundling had shown that night was more dangerous than the power, in Cordelia's eyes, though the power was the stuff of nightmares as well.

Now it was good as certain that the Callowans would follow their queen with fanatical devotion into any war she chose to wage – Gods Above, even as some kind of priestess of darkness she'd received the tacit blessing of angels – which would be a great boon if these negotiations saw fruit but a cataclysm otherwise. More worrisome was the apparent oath by every great line of the Blood to support her bid for joining the Grand Alliance, as it'd received the approval of the Grey Pilgrim. To Levantines, that might carry as much weight as that of the Choir he was said to be servant of. When Rozala Malanza's soldiers came to Salia, and the Levantines with them, they would find a city that still spoke of the Black Queen as the Arch-heretic of the East and a perfidious enemy. The survivors of the campaign in Iserre would not take well to being called liars, much less the potentially disastrous epithet of heretic. It could all turn into an ugly circumstance with frightening ease if Cordelia was not very, very careful. Merciful Heavens, what had the world come to when she could expect the Black Queen to be a calming influence on the proceedings?

The First Prince would not be blinded by relief at a withheld blade or a sudden surge of sentiment, yet she could not deny that Catherine Foundling seemed to be trying to claw back the continent from the brink of the abyss. She was a horribly inconvenient person, it was true, but she'd also proved she was capable of restraint and a degree of foresight – which Cordelia could not truthfully say of all those who had a seat in the Highest Assembly. That Calernia might end up bound by a set of treaties even more far-reaching than those of the Grand Alliance had rankled, at first, but looking upon the content of the Liesse Accords the First Prince had been forced to concede they might be of genuine help in stabilizing the continent. That the rules of behaviour they proposed were elemental meant they were likely to be functional in practice even when binding such fractious individuals, and that most Chosen and Damned would be inclined towards enforcing them: a flying fortress rarely benefited anyone but the one flying it, and so even another villain might delight in seeing it brought down along with a rival. And as for the Chosen, Cordelia was far past needing convincing they too were in need of similar restraints. That the same plague that'd wiped out a detachment of Praesi legionaries had also wiped out an entire town on the shore of Lake Artoise without a single breakout elsewhere before or since was a damning hint of who was responsible for it.

There would be consequences to that, one day.

The dawning truth of the last few days had been that the Black Queen intended to bring forth an order to Calernia, and that this order was not too inimical to the order that Cordelia Hasenbach had been trying to bring forth since she was but a girl. It was not the resounding victory for Good that the First Prince had wanted, yet it was compromise she was willing to live with. She fully intended on securing as many gains as she could for Procer and the Grand Alliance, yet she would do so with the preservation of the Accords in mind. In truth, there were some aspects she'd found thrilling. This posited city in the Red Flower Vales? It was, she hoped, an end to wars between Callow and Procer. With this Cardinal forbidding the march of armies and the only other land-route between the two realms the Stairway up north, war would become highly impractical to wage. Three kittens and a ribbon could defend the narrow pass of the Stairway against a princely army, if they had the nerve, and having a great city at the crossroads between the east and the west of Calernia would allow for trade between adjoining realms to flourish and make hostility even more costly a prospect. And there was much to gain, in having such a neutral ground where diplomacy would be had even on the darkest days. No, Cardinal would have much greater reach than even the Black Queen seemed to realize.

A sharp rap against the closed door had Cordelia raising her voice to grant entrance to the servant. A man in livery hurried in at her invitation and after courtly bows came to whisper in her ear. The First Prince of Procer's lips slightly thinned and she nodded a dismissal.

"Brother Simon's absence should be excused, it seems," Cordelia Hasenbach crisply said. "For he has been detained by order of the House of Light. The Holies are calling the Highest Assembly to session."

Two of the most skilled spymasters alive looked at her with faces betraying utter surprise.

"That's madness," Balthazar said.

"It's treason," Louis said, tone cold. "In time of war, no less. Your Most Serene Highness, this cannot be allowed to pass."

"Nor will it," Cordelia Hasenbach said, voice like iron. "It appears I have at last found an end to my patience."

Pantasy

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Big Brother

Cordelia is finally stepping in to set the Proceran House of Light straight.
Hells, it's about time.

Liliet

I'm low key terrified of her choosing a method of dealing with them along the lines of 'set the building on fire and block the exits' and sliding down the slippery slope into merry hells, but I have more faith in her than that. I think???

Fayhem

Even if she's at a point where she'd find it cathartic, she's far too smart. I don't think she'll be pulling her punches, but Cordelia Hasenbach's version of that is infinitely more likely to look like outmaneuvering them ruthlessly and bending their arm until it's on the verge of breaking than like a massacre.

Liliet

I HOPE

Shveiran

Yeah, I'm with Fayhem. This is Cordelia Hasenbach, not Cersei Lannister; I don't think EE will choose this instance to break his excellent track records of understandable characters and have her just go coco-for-coco-pops just because someone is trying to piss in the porridge again.

Liliet

Well, maybe I exaggerated a little.

But Cordelia is not very well-versed in story-fu, and she doesn't understand how badly 'lesser evil' and 'necessary brutality' can go if improperly handled. So... I'm worried
=x

Shveiran

She is ignorant in story-fu, yes, but that makes it easy to fall into story traps; it's not a brain-washing device.

If she got a Name this instance, she wouldn't suddenly forget all the training that allowed her to pacify and rule the Principate. "I'll slaughter the most prominent religious figures in the kingdom I rule, what could possibly go wrong" is not just story-stupid, it's stupid-stupid.

She is liable to fall into the wrong stories, sure; Patterns of Three, Monologues, Tempting Fate... Heck, she is likely a few steps from becoming the Villainess With the Death Ray.

But she won't start genociding her own people, why would she? She is a skilled politician, and "kill all opposition" is not a good idea in Praes, let alone Procer.

Liliet

>But she won't start genociding her own people, why would she?

That's not what I'm worried about tho!

What I'm worried about is very much the Villainess with the Death Ray thing. Even just curbing the influence that the House of Light has on her country's politics is an iffy narrative move she might utterly fail to process as such specifically because of her ignorance of the narrative. Oh, she's skilled in politics and PR which is a very close thing, but in politics and PR the way to keep things from interfering is to keep them secret, while in narrative-fu keeping things secret is a VERY bad move...

Javvies

Heh.

Cordelia isn't happy. About a lot of things. At least she seems to be more or less on board with the Accords. Or at least, the underlying principles thereof, even if there's inevitably going to be some quibbling about some of the details.

Yeah ... the Proceran House of Light is in deep shit when it comes to Cordelia's opinion.

But, to be fair, did anybody really expect that they wouldn't try to spike things? I mean, they did declare Cat the Arch-Heretic of the East, so there's no way they are going to be happy about inviting her to Salia for negotiations. On the other hand ... I suspect that this move might have Bard secretly behind it.

Maybe Cordelia will have to take drastic measures to bring the Proceran House of Light to heel.

IDKWhoitis

This might as well have Bard's signature. Whether to benefit Cat or light her hair on fire remains to be seen. Because Bard always likes to play both sides.

Sparsebeard

If it's Bard, the goal is probably to push Cordelia to react and cement her in the role of a Villain... Which would potentially accomplish many goals:

Sway the balance on evil's side, thus enabling good some divine intervention (perhaps to try and remove a pesky Villainess).

Weaken the accords by having a Named ruling Procer (and how convenient for Bard who supposedly can act mainly through Named).

Weaken Procer by introducing the civil strife that may very well follow forceful actions by Cordelia (and permitting Bard the intercede on the behalf of either side of such a civil war, I'm sure she has a few good deals in mind).

mamm0nn

My thoughts exactly, this sounds like the priests with a nudge from the Choirs being the aggressor that pretends to be a peace-preaching force. They detain people that 'work for them so it's fine technically' and call people into a meeting to talk, which is storywise a-okay for the good guys of course, and then villainise the First Prince for her reaction to this treachery.

Above is making a play to turn the newfound allies of the Black Queen either Evil or sway them away from her, as we've seen with Pilgrim already. I hope Roland will be passed, it'd be a shame if he too has to turn his back or see himself turned a Villain to be disposed of.

Liliet

>Above is making a play to turn the newfound allies of the Black Queen either Evil or sway them away from her, as we've seen with Pilgrim already.

What?

What we've seen with Pilgrim is that the Choir of Mercy refrains from having opinions on his political decisions even when he directly asks for advice, and that the Choir of Mercy is willing to work with Catherine both at his will and when she asks nicely (their visions presented her in best light even before they agreed to let her rez him)

Liliet

You're assuming the Bard is an antagonist. Note that Catherine's only basis for treating her as such is "I hate puppetmasters" (and Bard's repeated and targeted antagonization and taunting of her)

quite possibly a cat

" Bard's repeated and targeted antagonization"

That seems like a pretty good basis for her to be considered an antagonist!

Liliet

Not with the kind of tropes in play here --

Miles

Bard's and Cat's goals are in direct opposition because her most desired clause in the accords strips Bard of most of her power.

Liliet

Eh. If the Accords are about enforcing the exact thing Bard herself needs the power for, Bard's reaction is likely to be "finally, a vacation! Oh please don't let this fall through..."

Liliet

>Whether to benefit Cat or light her hair on fire remains to be seen.

Benefit Cat by setting her hair on fire. That's how it worked every single fucking time so far.

NerfGlastigUaine

"I suspect that this move might have Bard secretly behind it."

This can be said about literally every move in this story so far. All bar Hierarch/Tyrant screwing her over. That's the terrifying part about Bard, her game's so long and net so wide that you can't know what's part of it and what isn't.

Javvies

Well, we are quite confident that Bard was directly involved in the Proceran House of Light's last big moves – namely the Conclave that declared Cat the Arch-Heretic of the East over the presumed (if undeclared) Arch-Heretic of the East, the reigning Dread Empress Malicia.

So it's not really much of a tinfoil theory to think that Bard might be involved with the Proceran House of Light's latest move.

That said, it could easily be the case that Bard isn't currently actively involved, and she merely previously primed certain key figures within the House of Light to take some sort of action as a reflexive setting up of contingencies.

noodlewerk

The fun thing about villains like Wandering Bard is that it doesn't matter what you actually do in your written story. You have some things that are obviously planned by the puppet master villain, and for all other events you can just claim they were planned later if it suits the story.

Kind of like the Lords of Dust in the Eberron campaign setting of D&D. The advice to running them is almost literally:

"Whatever the party did before, could have been a plot. They saved the town? One of the children was destined to become a great villain. They found a magic sword in a lost tomb? That sword is actually needed by some bad guy that will buy it from the merchant after the party sells it when they find a nicer sword."

Whatever happened, it's a plot. Maybe.

NerfContessa

True.

Still, Cordelia becoming a dread princess might be just what is needed now.

Imagine, unity against an evil so bad all other evils unite against it. How could Good resist? :p

Skaddix

Honestly, it's not a surprise. Cordelia apparently doesn't have a good relationship with the Church or with Heroes (Chosen) so she has no real control over the House of Light. I have said it a thousand times Cordelia really needed to do a better job of getting Chosen and thus the House of Light on her side. Her failure to do this (especially with her dredging operation if that is an Angel or Demon) could only end up biting her in the behind.

Granted there is some symmetry in both Cat and Cordelia having to deal with House of Light related issues. Historically the relationship between Church and Monarchies has always been interesting.

Scrutable

The other option is that this is part of Scribe's schemes to destabilize Procer.

Or both!

Javvies

It's not Scribe.

I've made my position regarding it not being Scribe clear multiple times now, so I won't fully repeat myself again here.

But in short? Scribe hasn't had the time to do this given the constraints that she's operating under. She can't utilize planned acts because she's trying to dodge a precog, which leaves her limited to taking advantage of opportunities as they appear.

Remember, Augur likes her cousin, and Scribe is a Villain, anyways.

Augur may or may not be able to detect Bard's actions via her precognition, and even if she can, it's still Bard, someone who is presumably a Hero (as far as Augur knows).

Also, Augur either did not or could not give Cordelia a heads up about the last time Bard (and the Saint of Swords) got involved with getting the House of Light to do something Cordelia didn't want them to do.

jalexanderb

Looks like Cordy is finally gonna drop her Angel Bomb! Excited to see what exactly the thing in the lake was.

konstantinvoncarstein

It seems unlikely. The Angel thing is to be used against the Dead King, not some priests who forget their place.

Shveiran

Exactly. She has SOLDIERS for this. In her seat of power, the Holies have influence but she has no contestant for might.

IDKWhoitis

So uh,

What are the odds that when Cat arrives, the city will be tearing itself apart in a brutal schism/civil war? And if that's the case, how much of the city will be on fire?

And we don't need to ask IF Cat will be blamed.

Because I feel that Cordelia is past half measures and using soft power, and the Holies are done listening to any mortal.

konstantinvoncarstein

Done with soft power? What will she do, go sacking-of-the-Jedi-temple style?

Shveiran

My bet is on a show of force, but not a murder spree. Bodies on the ground would have repercussions on civil order she can ill afford and easily foresee.

Pointed threats, backed by, say, an occupation of the conclave by an armed force, she can more easily smooth over.

mavant

Cue: The Woe becomes a Billy Joel cover band.

talenel

We didn't start the fire. It just keeps showing up everywhere we go.

BlackPhoenix7777

Fire? What fire? Cat doesn't know anything, it was sime other Villain.

Liliet

This time, it was the fucking heroes!

Liliet

I've been saying this for a while: this is a theme song for both Catherine and Amadeus~

Liliet

Catherine and Amadeus: we didn't start the fire...

Malicia: only a sufficient size of a fire can draw the firefighters away from tracking me down for the previous arson,

Cordelia: I did start the fire but they started it first-

Kairos: ALL YOUR FIRES ARE BELONG TO ME

Hierarch: what fire? All I'm seeing is Wicked Foreign Tyrants

Bard: hiding matches in one hand and fire extinguisher in the other behind her back and widely smiling

Faiir

I tried singing it but realized halfway through Malicia's verse it won't fit 😞

Also:

Wicked Foreign Tyrants getting what they deserve!

Liliet

unfortunately i wasnt trying ot make it fit)= and Anaxares would lecture you about how he's not waging war on slaves, only their masters 😊

Andrew Mitchell

... You're on fire! 😊

Gunslinger

The Proceran house of light have been moving against cornflakes haberdash for quite a while now. Are they being manipulated secretly?

Doesn't feel like the Bard (also not everything has to be the bard's plot). Could be Malicia. Long history of Proceran manipulation and she can damage both Procer and Callow with the same weapon.

Also I had the laugh at the line about two kittens and a ribbon defending the pass. I'm going to steal that metaphor

konstantinvoncarstein

Or could just be the HoL being stupid.

WuseMajor

Or it could be... Damn, forgot the name. Black had some kind of ...shoot, ...um... didn't he have a ...not Assassin or Captain or Warlock or Ranger but ...wasn't there another one?

....

.....I guess not. And, even if she existed, I'm sure she wouldn't be behind all the bureaucratic trouble currently facing the kingdom.

sengachi

Oh. Right. ... I had actually forgotten about her.

konstantinvoncarstein

Her power break the fourth wall 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Shikkarasu

Scribe OP, pls nerf

erraticerrata

I laughed.

ALazyMonster

Cornflakes haberdash... People we found the Tyrant of Helikes account. Also maybe it's scribe, I mean Black did say that she was preparing to end procer

konstantinvoncarstein

I had forgotten Scribe. You're right, it is certainly her who organized this.

Matthew

It wouldn't make sense as Scribe. Scribe now knows Black is alive and safe and heading deeper into Procer. She has no reason to want to up end Procer.

lennymaster

Maybe she already kicked off the avalanche and is now unable to stop it?

laguz24

This is the scribe's doing but bard is pulling the strings. Scribe as a manipulator does not expect to be the puppet, and the bard can only act through those with the story. Scribe also does not understand what it is like to have a home so does not understand the gravity of her actions. To her, she is simply removing a dangerous system that is threatening black.

Shveiran

She may. Yet I agree she doesn't seem to have a reason to end Procer THROUGH A CIVIL WAR if Amadeus is heading straight into the middle of it.

I suppose there is some doubt Scribe knows he is coming... but then again, that does seem like Scribe shtick.

It is possible she put things in motion previously, and may be unable to stop them now?

Liliet

It's not obvious though that what he wants is NOT further destabilization of GA.

Shveiran

True, but the reason why I think she'd stop is that a revolting, capital-sized crowd is not easy to control once she sets it in motion. And Amadeus doesn't have a Name anymore.

I guess it depends a lot on what happened when and how much Scribe actually knows, but this kind of moves is a lot smarter when the fire you are lighting is far away from what you love, no?

Liliet

Amadeus doesn't have a Name, but he does have an army. He's not vulnerable to this bullshit, it just puts him in a better relative position – see Cordelia's musings on being unable to afford NOT making all the concessions Cat asks for, at this point.

Shveiran

Amadeus has a very small army, Salia would have a very very big mob, and most of Amadeus' allies at the moment ultimately answer to Cat... which is bound to jump in if the city is eating itself alive, and Scribe knows it.

Cordelia musings refer to a situation where rational people sit across a table and discuss the way forward; it doesn't consider the balance of forces if suddenly its ptchforks everywhere.

Liliet

Amadeus literally doesnt have to enter the city if there's a mob there.

Note how the events are triggering way before he's in any danger.

Morgenstern

I was more thinking of Scribe... *shrugs

Liliet

Scribe. Don't forget we have Scribe deliberately destabilizing things.

She's probably continuing where Bard and Laurence left off, that-wise...

Also Cordelia has the best way with words. Remember the barrel of fish? ;u;

Alivaril

Ah, nostalgia. Certain church(s) in our world also had trouble knowing when they should stop poking locals with a sharp stick. Here's to hoping they get the smackdown they deserve. toasts with wine sweet enough to poison certain Named

quite possibly a cat

Although in this world, they have much more interventionist gods helping them out. Here you can poke back and the worst that will happen is eternal hellfire after you die. Cordelia could have a very bad time if Above tells their priests that smiting Cordelia and her minions is an acceptable use of Light.

hakureireimu

Except they have never done so from what we've seen. The Gods aren't interventionist at all.

Shveiran

Agreed. Choirs and providence, sure, but no direct intervention from the capital G Gods.

Mental Mouse

> Cordelia could have a very bad time if Above tells their priests that smiting Cordelia and her minions is an acceptable use of Light.

Except that in practice, the gods don't seem to rule on such matters. Mostly they grant capabilities, and let mortals use them according to their own judgement. We've only seen a couple or three exceptions, relating to people who have direct assistance from a Choir.

konstantinvoncarstein

I wonder how Cordelia will respond, but attacking the priesthood is narratively speaking a step more into evil.

I had an idea about the Bard's plan concerning Procer. We know the fact that the First Prince is not a Name impede her. So what if she is trying to make Cordelia a well intentioned tyrant who will become Evil to save her nation? And then put her down via another Proceran, a popular war hero like Rozala, who would gather enough narrative weight (and benefit from the increase of the power of the FP by Cordelia) to create the Name First Prince?

Someguy

I expect her to pull a Henry VIII & declare the Proceran House of Light to be heretics, then have a faction/sect within them that aligns with her interests to be proclaimed the "True House of Light"

NZPIEFACE

She is not going to be happy when she inevitably learns of what she proclaimed to the Grey Pilgrim.

Javvies

Too many pronouns, not enough names.

Do you mean Cordelia won't be happy when she finds out about Cat's reminding of Pilgrim that Cat's the one with the cards to play, not Tariq?

Or are you referring to Rozala's promise?

Or are you talking about something else?

NZPIEFACE

She (Cordelia) isn't going to be happy when she (Cordelia) learns of what (the Dread Empress thing) she (Cat) proclaimed to the Grey Pilgrim.

Mental Mouse

Regardless of how that sentence resolves, Cordelia is not too happy with Pilgrim either, especially since she's got a pretty good idea about the plague incident. I think she'll be chuffed when she hears how Cat slapped him down.

Rey d`Tutto

So, will the Visions of the Choir of Mercy cause the confirmation or repudiation of Catherine being titled "Arch-heretic of the East"?

Shveiran

I'm not sure they are enough to cause a repudiation, but why do you think they could "confirm" it? It seems very much a positive effect, I would say the question is about whether or not it is strong enough.

Rey d`Tutto

One fact and two lawyers means at least 5 opinions of what that fact means.

I've known too many Jesuits.

Shveiran

Granted, but...

..."The Choir of Mercy is sending holy visions to show she is not all that bad. CLEARLY that means she is worse than we ever thought possible!" feels... kind of forced.

siva0526

Why is everyone so willing to forgo the possibility that it's Scribe behind HoL's move? We know she's been working to weaken Pricer from within in the absence of Black's instructions, and this is definitely a move in that direction.

zenanii

What scribe? Why would a scribe be interfering with Cordelia?

Javvies

Because if it were a Scribe move, Augur would have been able to warn Cordelia.

Remember, Augur is a precog who can warn about planned actions. She only misses unplanned opportunistic acts.

Scribe is good, yes, but I don't think she'd have had the time to infiltrate the House of Light (and at a very high level) via solely unplanned opportunities taken advantage of. Give her enough time, sure, I think she could manage it, but I don't think that she's had the time to do so, especially when she's no doubt had other priorities to work on.

I don't think Augur would (or could) warn Cordelia if this is a Bard move, even if it's several steps removed from Bard.

Shveiran

A very good point.

It is possible that Scribe gave a very tense situation a nudge... but if she tried to do more than that, she'd likely be detected. And if all she did was give a nudge through an opportunity, the situation was mostly independent from her.

lennymaster

What if she had no specific plan in mind and just set up series of situations that may or may not have dire consequences, and this is the one that came into play, maybe even just the first plan?

Considering that she made even Cat forget about her, it might very well be possible that she can fuck with even the Augurs' visions. Black may have suspected that she might be able to do so, but considered the risk to great and the price of failure too costly. Involving Assassin into her plans could just be enough to draw the Augurs' eye, despite Scribes interference.

There is very little information just what she can do, what her Aspects or the core of her Story consist of. Considering the Calamities power and the fact that she is their sixth means she must have some major abilities.

Shveiran

It's possible. There is still much unknown regarding the limits of Augur and Scribe's powers, not to mention their interaction with each other.

I tend to disagree she can achieve this much just through opportunities, but you may be right.

Javvies

Scribe has to operate under the assumption that her own abilities don't interfere with Augur's early warning system. Because if Scribe acts like Augur can't spot her and is wrong about that, then she (and Amadeus) are fucked.

Getting the House of Light to make a move this big would require high level infiltration of either broader scope or of specific key figures.

Either way, like I said, I don't believe that Scribe has had the time to get that level of infiltration given the constraints she must be operating under. Especially since infiltrating the House of Light probably hasn't been her highest priority concern – she first needed to make sure that she could spring Amadeus when he was brought to Salia. Remove either the constraints or give Scribe more time, sure, she could get it done eventually.

Plus, we already know that Bard had been working on the House of Light.

Liliet

>Getting the House of Light to make a move this big would require high level infiltration of either broader scope or of specific key figures.

It's not that big IN COMPARISON TO how they've been already acting though.

Javvies

Except those prior acts were at the direct, active, and personal urging and intervention by Bard and the Saint of Swords.

And those acts, while having significant, albeit indirect, external consequences, didn't actually involve anyone outside the church, or the House of Light actually doing much of anything – they held some meetings where two major Heroes told them they should declare Cat the Arch-Heretic of the East, and then they voted on that, and then they had to write out their proclamation.

This, though, involves summoning the Assembly during a time of war, plus apparently detaining someone who is a major interface between the House of Light and the First Prince. This is an even bigger move. This has major direct consequences. This is not something that could be done at the drop of a hat. Something like this should take major amounts of pull.

This is, IMO, something that is more attributable to Bard than to Scribe, especially considering the various constraints Scribe is operating under. Scribe just plain hasn't had the time to pull something like this off without using the kind of planning and planned actions that she knows Augur can and will detect. Scribe has to limit herself to taking advantage of opportunities that appear, and that's a huge limiter on what she can do. Without that limiter, Cordelia would already be dead and Procer would have collapsed into flames.

Liliet

My understanding is that Scribe just had to nudge events along in one of the possible directions they could have taken. Much like Bard would have, I just think that it's about time we saw Scribe's handiwork and the timing of this points to that, narratively.

Shveiran

There is merit in what you say, but doesn't the time factor Javvies brings up makes a lot of sense? Scribe is a string puller, most of all, so doesn't a big move require a lot of preparing the field? It hasn't been this long since Amadeus was captured, was it? Not considering she had to move to Salia by foot at least?

Although... uhm, it could be possible she has communication as part of her powers. If she could start even without being there, that changes a lot, IMO.

Liliet

Oh def. I am making the point that where this move has likely been long built up to, she is unlikely to be currently hastily scrambling trying to undo it, because it works either way.

Liliet

Oh wait, I confused Javvies with someone else. I'll respond to that separately.

WuseMajor

I wanna say that the last time we saw Scribe was months and months ago. Like "back when Cat left for Keter." So, given that she's apparently very, very efficient, I can easily imagine her becoming the local Moriarty in a month or two and I think she's had three or four.

If nothing else, I'd say that the fact that anyone was capable of planning a coup without Augur outing them, was at least partly due to her.

Darkening

Augur isn't perfect, it was mentioned back when they were planning to go up against the skein for the first time I believe that most oracles can only focus on one subject at a time, and I imagine Cordelia has a lot of subjects to prompt her to look out for, while having no knowledge of Scribe being at play. Especially with Scribe seeming to have a whole aspect dedicated to not being noticed.

Shveiran

True. And yet the working hypothesis is that this goes for Augur's conscious vision; she has a second set handed out by the Choirs when they need to.

In this instance, this threaten to send Procer, and thus the Grand Alliance, and thus Calernia, into a very dangerous spiral.

Wouldn't they take interest? Wouldn't they nudge her to take a peek?

Morgenstern

Not necessarily. Especially when looking at the "which Choir / which stance" conundrum and that the Bard seemed all ready to feed Procer to even the DK. Why not feed it to civil war, too? Scribe's well-meant, but turning-out-bad intentions might just fit multiple other factions' ideas of what's good and proper. *shrugs

Shveiran

You know, I have a lot of beef with Above, but I have to defend them this time... we have no reason to believe either Bard's or Saints' actions have been endorsed by Choirs or Gods.

Caerulea

"Why not feed it to civil war, too?"

Because letting Procer bleed heavily, or even be taken by The Dead King makes him the ultimate, unstoppable evil that took the last refuge of good. Perfect opportunity to kill him. Letting it die to civil war doesn't serve any purpose, and indeed reduces the chance that The Dead King dies. She is not senseless, nor a force to destroy Calernia.

quite possibly a cat

"

Because if it were a Scribe move, Augur would have been able to warn Cordelia."

But would she? Cordelia is going down the road to Evil and already doesn't like Heroes. If Scribe got the House of Light to do something about it? Augur could just put that down as "Evil fights Evil" and declare a Good victory.

Javvies

Cordelia isn't a Villain, and she's Augur's cousin.

I see no reason to think that Augur wouldn't warn Cordelia about stuff Scribe is doing. Especially since our understanding is that Scribe has had two priorities (a) rescue Amadeus, and (b) bring down Procer.

I do, however, suspect that Augur would not be as capable of issuing warnings about what Bard is up to.

Also, again, even if Augur (for whatever reason) cannot or would not warn Cordelia or anybody else, Scribe has to assume and act as though Augur can and will. And that means, Scribe is more or less limited to acting only through taking advantage of opportunities, not through planned actions. I just don't think that Scribe has had enough time, given the constraints she's operating under.

Liliet

Note how unsurprised Cordelia and her spies are to hear of this. Pissed off, yes, but they're not like "WAIT WHAT?! NO WAY THIS CAN'T BE RIGHT". This move is not actually a huge deviation from the House of Light's normal behavior, it's entirely in line with how they'd been acting. A nudge here or there would suffice to make sure they take the most radical stance of all available.

Mental Mouse

Aside from the other arguments, I'll point out that Scribe may be sneaky and ruthless, but she is also a Named Villain. I seriously doubt she has any entry whatsoever into the House of Light, and trying to mess with them would be deeply unwise. At least some of those priests surely have enough power from the Light to no-sell Scribe's own powers.

JJR

Three kittens and a ribbon. I'm just imagining a huge army in a confused halt because the people at the front stopped to play with the kittens and there's no room to go around.

Liliet

I love the thought that this is the legitimate size of the pass
♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

"It's just a cute little kitten!" a few seconds later "AAAHH!
Run away, run away!"

ninegardens

Sounds like a Scribe play.

Big I

Iron sharpens iron.

I wonder if Cordelia will ever realise that she's become a Tyrant? At least the Dread Emperors are upfront about what they are.

Sparsebeard

Yeah, that chapter had so many villainous flags, but the name is perhaps the biggest one...

RoflCat

I mean....

>She fully intended on securing as many gains as she could for Procer and the Grand Alliance, yet she would do so with the preservation of the Accords in mind.

What does that reminds me of...oh yeah.

>"We will twist around the spirit of every rule while obeying the letter," the green-eyed man said. "We will lie and cheat and hide our sins, while dragging into light those of our foes and rivals. We will seek to twist the laws as a tool for our ambitions and a sword to slay our enemies. We will hide behind every protection afforded and make red art of the details that save or slay. We will defend our advantages and seek to unmake yours, never once faltering in our callous greed."

>The grin went wider still, a madman's grin. A challenge.

>"And yet we will uphold the Liesse Accords, you broken old thing, and wage war on any that would unmake them," the Carrion Lord said.

She is acting exactly like what Black say Praes would in regard to the Accord.

hakureireimu

I don't think she has the necessary story-fu to see where she's going. After all each of her steps are very reasonable from her point of view, so she'll be ignorant until the day when she literally wakes up with a Name.

Raved Thrad

How does "Dread Prince" sound? 😊

Faiir

Iron prince, duh

Fayhem

I mean, that's already the cognomen people use for her uncle. Could be awkward.

Mental Mouse

I think more likely she'll find that "First Prince" has become a Name.

konstantinvoncarstein

I doubt that a Name weared by the sovereign of a Good country could be irremediably Evil. Maybe First Prince could be like Squire, depending on the person?

Liliet

I've been saying that... 😊

Mental Mouse

Actually, correcting myself: It's looking more and more likely that the Principality as such is going down in shambles. Cordelia may well emerge as the Iron Queen (or King? 😊) of the Kingdom of Procer.

sengachi

Huh. What are the odds this is the Bard's response to Catherine pushing forward the Liesse Accords, trying to sabotage the lynchpin of the negotiations Cordelia?

Liliet

Why would she? She literally MADE the League of Free Cities

Faiir

It's funny/tragic how Cordelia thinks of herself as the smartest person ever, and consistently underrates her enemies.

She considers the fact that a neutral country between Procer and Callow leading to less conflict is a kind of far reaching event that even the Black Queen couldn't foresee? What?

It feels a bit like conclusions of a kid listening in to an adult discussion and thinking: "They're all wrong since they didn't talk about that one obvious thing I did think about so I must be smarter than them!"

sengachi

To be fair, that does seem to be roughly the level of competency she's comes to expect from many of her nobles. To be less fair, treating your enemy who has basically done the exact same thing that's your crowning achievement (coming to rule a country in a time of strife for its own good through force of arms) as anything less than your equal and peer is indeed very dumb.

RoflCat

I mean, Black had to point out to Cat about what kind of institute it will actually become, beyond her initial expectations.

Faiir

True, but Cordelia should take into account the fact that Cat has savvy advisors 😊

Liliet

Well, she can only be referring to what Cat had realized at the time of writing the document she's drawing conclusions from. The fact that Catherine might have had more realizations since this draft is outside the bounds of what Cordelia is talking about.

Dresden 67

Actually I think the bit about Cardinal being more important than the Black Queen realises is more of a mirror of what Amadeus told Cat, that Cardinal will become the royal court of Calernia.

The fact that it will prevent war between Procer and Callow is obvious.

The text of the Accords though seem to be focused on Cardinal as the location of the Academy, the council and the enforcement. Black was the one who pointed out to Catherine that between the location, the Academy and the neutral ground, Cardinal would inevitably become the center of trade, diplomacy and sorcery in Calernia.

I think that's what Cordelia was referring to.

Shveiran

Agreed. I think Faiir is right saying that Cordelia usually underestimate her opponents and oveestimate her own foresight.

But as Dresden pointed out, she doesn't underestimate them THAT much, and has objectively good skills.

WuseMajor

"It was becoming increasingly evident they'd all severely underestimated Catherine Foundling, and that her game was a long one indeed."

...and then she proceeds to attribute the diplomatic prowess to Viv and later says that Cat doesn't see how important this city is going to be.

Really, Cordy, why don't you start overestimating her for a change? You'll be able to be smug when you're wrong then, instead of feeling stupid like you do now.

Valkyria

I wonder who had their fingers in the pie here...
*cough*bard*cough*

So go get them girl! Show those Above fanatics their place!

I really want to have Bard vs Cordelia at some point. (Most likely sooner than later, considering the Bard wants to end the whole country...)

Andrew Mitchell

♥ ♥ ♥ seeing Cordelia finally admit that she and Cat are largely on the same side, AND the fact that she sees the issues with Heroes as well. Her internal monologue here was that of an entirely reasonable person, IMO.

It will be interesting to see what's up with the House of Light calling the Assembly to order. Don't they know that Cordelia has the votes to crush them? Will the representatives of Good finally find a way to fuck up the ACTUAL progress that is being made?!? Have the choirs spoken to the House of Light and told them to stop the peace being made OR maybe even to support it?!? And what role, if any, has the Bard played in this?

Liliet

I love Cordelia very much...

Also, it's not impossible that the pressure from the House of Light can straight up override the influence Cordelia has on those votes.

Soma

CatCor confirmed.
RozCat confirmed.
RozCor ???

Liliet

-claps palms together in prayer-

ChillyPepper

The real question is... Where are the gnomes?!

konstantinvoncarstein

Why?

Aotrs Commander

Probably not interested at the moment. They seem only to care about technological advancement, and that's not at play here.

I think the gnomes probably exist mostly or entirely (at the moment) more of a reason why Calernia has been stuck at the same tech level for as long as it has (which is, to be fair, a better excuse than most fantasy worlds get, even the good ones). I doubt they will play any part in the current conflicts. (I mean, I could be wrong, but it doesn't seem likely.)

Now, is the continent actually stabilises – especially if the Accords break the god's game – in a theoretical that is when the might become a functional antagonist, as a stable continent is one that might start looking to improving itself overall. And then it depends really on why the gnomes do what they do, whether it is out of spite to keep everyone down just for the benefit of themselves to maintain technological superiority, for fear the endless wars will spread further than Calernia (and thus they might be more tolerant with peace) or whether this has all been done on the auspices of the gods or even of Bard in service of the great game.

Now, I suppose if they are divinely mandated to do it, if the Accords come into place and the game breaks, the gods might order them to go murder Calernia out of spite; but given that the implications are they'd curb-stomp everyone effortlessly, that doesn't seem like would come to pass, simply because "and then everyone on Calernia died" doesn't make for a good story out-of-universe.

(Nor in it, come to that; but perhaps that is the only out Calernia would have, pulling Fantasy Independence Day on the gnomes...)

agumentic

>Now, I suppose if they are divinely mandated to do it, if the Accords come into place and the game breaks

The game doesn't break, though, just the rules of it change. And there's nothing saying that the Gods wouldn't be able to shrug and accept the change and see how the game plays out under new set of rules – the nature of it doesn't change, in the end, merely how much collateral damage it causes.

Liliet

Mhm!

Cassiemouse

This is going to cause one hell of a religious schism. With the Callowan rebel House of Light and the traditional Procer House of Light, what ever Cordelia comes up with and Catherine being a high priestess herself. Religious conflict seems to be the central theme of the coming action.

Mental Mouse

Ahem. Note that the “traditional” faction of the Callowan HoL are the ones standing against the Villainous Black Queen, it’s the upstarts (House Insurgent iirc) who went along with her.

Cordelia might be able to keep a similar fragment of the Proceran HoL, but the way she’s going, the main body will correctly note that she’s heading over to join the Evil crowd.

Overall, I think the game between Above and Below is switching from shatranj/chess, to dice. Or at least backgammon.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Correct me if im wrong but a few chapters back i think it was said that the First Prince was digging up a weapon from the lake and tightening her grip on the government. Now she is likely to take a hard, even if debatedly much needed, action against the foremost religious organization in service of the Above. Is someone or an ancient something slowly pulling her strings into a position she is unable to see?

Morgenstern

I like that idea of a rumor. But it has already been there and has been debunked. Remember the one that got burned by the angels because they wanted to look at the Peregrine for exactly that doubt as a reason for their actions (they’d been called upon to perform by higher powers... poor servant)? 😊

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Was that an answer to my name ... I was confused for a bit there 😊

Morgenstern

On a totally different note – is it just my Chapters summary that is broken or are the links to the last chapters in a jumble on the side table for everyone?

For me, it’s normal up to Chapter 63, then the jumble starts:

68

69

64

65

70

66

71

67

Interlude: Iron

Dresden 67

Not just you.

Sparsebeard

Is it Bard or Scribe's work to scuttle the accords?

dalek955

Nowt that you point it out, I'm seeing it too.

Sparsebeard

Or perhaps Cordelia fished out a chaos demon of that lake..

Mental Mouse

Technical heads-up, before actually reading: The table-of-contents on the side (but not on its own page) is scrambled, starting after Chapter 63.

quite possibly a cat

While its possible that Scribe or Bard had their fingers in the pie here, why not just Augur? Or just Above? Cordelia currently thinks better of the dark priestess Cat, than the unreliable Heroes! She has already taken the first steps towards villainy. Preventing Team Evil from getting Procer is their job.

Liliet

Above hasn't slapped down House Insurgent.

superkeaton

Given how Saint treated her, and Pilgrim's wiping out of a town, and the utter uselessness of the other heroes she's had at her disposal, I am wildly unsurprised by Cordelia's embracing of the Accords.

Interlude: Rope

*"First, gifted:
Iron to bind
And rope to kill."*

-First of the three so-called 'Mavian Entreaties', found on raised stones across much of eastern and Procer

The anger had come, white-hot and blinding, but it did not last for Cordelia had learned calm at her mother's knee. Mother might have never held an audience or passed judgement without swallowing a sigh of impatience at been the bare bones ceremony of a Lycaonese court, but then she'd never been a creature of halls and laws. The Rhenian blonde still remembered being taken on her first hunt out in the mountains, her ever-restless mother still as a statue for half a night as they waited for the stray ratling to come into arrow's reach. Patience, sparrow, Mother had whispered. Patience and quiet and take your kill only when the time is ripe. The arrow had taken the ratling in the flank instead of the neck and even at seven Cordelia had been ashamed at the mistake, but the lesson of the night had lasted longer than the chagrin. It had been years since the First Prince had held a blade larger than a knife, much less strung and fired one of the sturdy shortbows her people kept for children and the weak, but unlike Margaret Hasenbach – once Papenheim – she'd not been born for the song of steel and strife. These halls, these laws, were the blades she knew how to wield.

And it seemed someone had begun quite the ambitious game, just under her nose.

The thought lingered and spread after she sent out her messengers, summoning to the ancient palace of the Merovins every trustworthy sword and spear she had in Salia. After that release of anger, the venting of frustration, her temper cooled and she began considering the details of this apparent folly. The Holies had called into session the Highest Assembly, which while truly a power they held if only obliquely – the House of Light had the right to present petitions directly to the Assembly on any day of the year, even on days where no session had been called, which meant the act presenting such a petition could turn into functional summons to one – had been used only sparingly since the Liturgical Wars. They had also ordered the arrest of Brother Simon by their own guards, along with consignment to one of the House's basilicas in the capital. The summons themselves were not an overreach on the surface, though likely in practice, yet the arrest of one of Cordelia's own spymasters and formal court official was a direct challenge to the office of First Prince. One done in wartime, when she held an absolute majority in the Assembly that could not easily be shaken.

Using Simon of Gorgeault's arrest and detainment as a pretext to discipline the Holies would not be a popular measure, not when darkness loomed to the north and faith in Above was the last comfort for so many, but neither would it be the stuff riots were made of. Not when Cordelia had paid lips to whisper her preferred telling of the tale in every great tavern and brothel of Salia, which the priests knew well she had. They had, in the past, complained of her savaging of the reputation of Amadis Milenan and his allies through such means by the intermediary of the now-arrested Brother Simon. They would know that so long as sanctions were fair and artfully phrased, she would be able to lay them without much trouble. And that after such lasting conflict she would settle for nothing less than a crippling: confiscation of wealth, grain and lands. Every priest not serving provable purpose in their current position sent to the norther fronts to provide healing and moral succour. Cordelia had been pressing for these measures or milder manners of them for some time now and been denied again and again. There was no true short-term gain the First Prince could think of that would be worth the bleeding she would inflict on them in its wake. That was concerning as it meant, in all likelihood, that the House of Light intended to force her to abdicate.

Agnes would have warned me, Cordelia thought. Though her cousin's peering eyes had been on the darkness to the north and the madness in Iserre, she would not have missed so glaring an attack. And mentioned it even if it were doomed to failure, which the fair-haired prince was unwilling to believe out of hand. There was always a way to end a reign, even if it was as simple as a knife in unscrupulous hands. And so the deeper game she'd glimpsed began to take shape for while one failing was a mistake and two ineptitude, but three could only be deliberate. Of that sudden awareness Cordelia gave no outwards sign, though assessing her current situation she felt her stomach clench. The Rhenian princess had moved from her solar to the beautiful Gallerie des Hérons after sending out her summons, for the gallery with the great windows overlooked the outer courtyard where her trusted soldiers would be coming to gather. It was large enough to accommodate an assembly of captains before they set out as well, which she'd been giving instructions in arranging even as she considered the words she'd speak when addressing them. She'd had servants fetching tablecloths and refreshments to make the entire affair seem less of a hasty arrangement, but the great gallery was rather empty of other company.

The First Prince idly strode towards the great open glass window, a time-worn but still powerful enchantment on the windowsill keeping out most of the wind and cold from winter's last gasps. Cordelia pretended to enjoy the view, though in truth she'd been gazing to see if any of her Lycaonese soldiers had come. They had not, and the soldiers in the courtyard below were all in the livery of Salia itself – which meant they were little more than city guard, and of suspect loyalty. Half a step had her body angled so she could study the gallery through its reflection on the glass, as she casually set a hand on the lukewarm windowsill and allowed fatigue she truly felt to reach her face. Eight, nine, ten servants in the hall. All with an Alamans look to them, none that she'd brought with her from Rhenia. Louis of Sartrons had departed some time ago to reach out to any Circle of Thorns agents in the capital, yet the second of her three spymasters had remained at her side. Balthazar the Bastard had taken being so surprised by the Holies poorly and been in constant conference with some of his spies since. He offered fresh reports to Cordelia regularly, having early on found out where Brother Simon was being held and confirmed that ever current sitter of the Assembly had been sent for by the House of Light.

Even as the First Prince watched, a woman in rough fantassin leathers was allowed in by the guards guarding the southern entry to the gallery and made her way to where the head of the Sliver Letters was seated to whisper in his ear. The ferocious-looking spymaster heard her out, replied in a low tone and sent her off. Cordelia looked away before her scrutiny could be noticed, instead assessing the guards surrounding her. Eight at the southern and northern entrances, all in Salian livery. There were another three discreet doors in the gallery, from what the tall blonde could recall, though through the glass reflection she could only see two. Servant entrances for two of the three, and the last would lead to a privy room for guests too inebriated to stray far to relieve themselves when feasts were held in this gallery. She knew which of the three was the first servant door – one of the maids she had sent for cloths mere moments had left through it – yet did not know the other two, which meant attempting to leave through one risky. Cordelia knew there would not be two chances to slip the noose, which was why she studied the soldiers assembling below in the courtyard. Near fifty now, still all Salians. Could that many truly have turned their cloak?

Were she trying to isolate the First Prince of Procer within her own palace she would have only moved after ensuring she had enough conspirators to do so, yet there was no telling if her enemies had been forced to move early. Having kept the jaws closing around her hidden so far might mean as much, springing from fear of what she might do were she aware, or it might simply be consequence of a preference for discretion. The odds were better down there, she thought, than with the guards at the entrances. The courtyard must be at least ten feet below, and solid stone. Her blue dress, while not so impractical as to make it impossible for her to move quickly, would still be ungainly. The First Prince of Procer kept herself from stiffening when her spymaster's recognizably heavy gait was heard before her. She turned to glance at the approaching Balthazar, allowing the faintest hint of impatience to touch her face.

"Your Most Serene Highness," the black-haired man said. "I've news from the city."

"Speak," Cordelia invited.

"There have been riots in the streets," he grimaced. "The priests have claimed that you mean to crown yourself queen and incited the people to violence."

"Unfortunate," the First Prince of Procer said. "They will have to be dispersed, by club if not by speech. Best to act promptly before the unrest can spread. How many soldiers have arrived?"

"Two hundred in the palace barracks, and those that can be seen below," Balthazar said. "I would starkly advise against taking to the street with numbers less than five hundred, Your Highness. Salian riots see stones thrown and knives bared even in times of plenty."

And there it was, she thought. A feasible reason for her to stay here in this hall, cooling her heels as the city went to the dogs around her and conspirators carried out their coup. Balthazar Serigny was one of them, of that there can be no doubt. The Holies could not have her unseated without a vote in the Highest Assembly, and they could not possibly be so foolish as to expect that such a vote could be won without preparation. The House of Light must have reached out to fence-sitters and the discontent, which the Silver Letters should not have missed given their heavy presence in Salia. And to think that Cordelia herself had ordered them to strengthen their presence, in order to expunge the last of the Eyes of the Empire from the capital. She'd invited the wolf at her table, believing it a hound. At least, the Rhenian thought, the conspirators had failed to secure enough votes to unseat her properly. They would not be resorting to such methods if they could use legitimate ones instead. On the other hand, if she was made prisoner and another candidate for her office presented how many of her allies would truly stay with her? Cordelia's grip on the Highest Assembly had not been gentle, though she had been careful never to ruffle feathers without good reason. Some would turn, though, she knew. Some already had under her very nose.

"Send for Captain Haas," she said, making her face imply restrained desire for a frown.

Balthazar would not accede to that, for Andrea Haas was the head of her personal retinue and a hardened killer besides. Cordelia's heart clenched when she realized that her old compatriot had likely been assassinated as a prelude to the coup, though it could not be certain. Agnes... no, they would not touch Agnes. The Augur was too important a strategic asset for them to hurt even if she was Cordelia's cousin. I can do nothing for anyone from the bear's den, the First Prince thought. First I must escape. Balthazar grimaced, as if reluctant, and she gazed at him with polite impatience until he gave answer.

"Captain Haas had been drinking," the spymaster said. "And is half in a stupor, at the moment. I would send for a priest to sober her, Your Highness, but given the circumstances..."

"As you say," the First Prince of Procer said. "The entire priesthood is suspect until proven otherwise."

"I'll send for the current ranking officer, if you'd like," Balthazar offered. "A Lieutenant Beringer, I believe."

So the conspirators had even sunk hooks in one of hers, Cordelia thought with distaste. It could be a hostage had been taken, she considered, but then she would not glorify the stuff her people were made of. They could be just as venal and treacherous as anyone else, and there were some who might say that the way Cordelia Hasenbach had sent no host to bolster the defence of the Lycaonese realms meant she'd betrayed them first. All of her soldiers here had kin who had either fought at Twilight's Pass or died there. No, their loyalties were no so ironclad as they might have been a year past.

"So long as it does not detract from muster," she idly said. "It seems the Hellgods have my plans in their eye, tonight."

"We'll crush them as soon as we have our forces in order, Your Highness," Balthazar Serigny said. "It is a matter of an hour at most."

Cordelia inclined her head by a fraction and then looked back down into the courtyard, a clear if silent dismissal. There were perhaps a hundred soldier now, some of which had noticed her presence. Not a single one wore anything other than a Salian tabard. There was movement in the corner of her eye, and the First Prince almost tensed before she forced herself not to – and then Balthazar nailed the windowsill with a dagger, biting into the wood, just as her fingers clenched against the wood until they paled.

"Always were sharp, weren't you? For a savage," the man casually said, and whistled.

Half the servants unsheathed knives, while a pair of guard on the southern entrance and a single one to the north were slain by their comrades without hesitation. One of the maids tried to run for a door, but a thin man in servant's livery threw a blade without missing a beat and it went through the back of her skull. The others screamed, and obeyed when told to sit on the ground with their hands behind their head.

"It was the lack of a flinch, was is not?" Cordelia calmly asked.

"It's a good trick, when you're dealing with a scheming one," Balthazar grinned. "Anyone would flinch, expect someone thinking they might have a reason not to. What was it that gave us away?"

"Agnes would have warned me," the First Prince said. "If she did not, it was because someone prevented her from doing so."

And only the Silver Letters, of all the many possible conspirators in the city, had the means of doing that. They had, in the end, caught the most damning of the weakness in an oracle: a warning meant nothing if it went unheard. It had been four days, since Cordelia last spoke to her cousin. She'd meant to do so, she truly had, yet there was so much to do and if the Augur had an important insight she'd send a messenger to say as much. The servant who were not Silver Letters had all obeyed and knelt, and Cordelia felt her blood turn cold when she saw Balthazar trade a look with one of the assassins.

"No," she hurried said. "Do not-"

Throats cut the servants dropped to the side, one after another, as they twitched and gurgled the last of their life away. Cordelia did not look away. She had not known their names, not one of them. Yet she would learn them, if she survived, these innocents who had lost their lives because she'd not been quite as clever as she thought she was.

"That was unnecessary," the First Prince said, voice raw.

The bearded man chortled.

"Going soft, are you?" Balthazar said. "Can't have witnesses to this, Hasenbach, lest the priests find their scruples after the deed is done and decide to turn on me."

"So the Holies truly are in revolt," Cordelia said, forcing calm. "You did not simply suborn some of my people and feed me a lie."

"Wouldn't move without them," the spymaster said. "No, without the righteous sort at my back this would have been mere wickedness."

The man grinned, revealing crooked teeth.

"This is Above's work, though, or I've been assured," Balthazar said. "Though the full amnesty was more to my taste than some old fool's early absolution, I'll tell no lie."

Amnesty. And there it was, why she'd kept speaking to this stain of a person even as the blood of innocents spread across the panelled floor. Balthazar Serigny was a gloater, and one who had a particular distaste for his social superiors as well as Lycaonese – though the second came as a surprise to her, truth be told. There'd nary been a hint of it before today. Amnesty over killings within the bounds of the capital could only be extended by the ruler of the principality of Salia, which was however happened to be the First Prince or Princess of Procer. This was, currently, Cordelia herself. The conspirators had therefore a clear successor for her in mind, one that'd gone as far as putting their name to a pardon before the bloody work of dethroning Cordelia had even begun. And there were only a very few people in Procer who could feasibly fill her seat so smoothly. Amadis Milenan might have, before his abdication, and now in his stead Princess Rozala Malanza – who in truth had become a stronger candidate than Amadis had ever been even at the peak of his influence.

Her own uncle, Prince Klaus Papenheim, might also gather such support as the foremost general in the Principate as that realm lay on the brink of destruction. Prince Ariel of Arans might squeak through as a compromise candidate, but the man lacked strong ties outside the eastern Principate. Not the kind of figurehead around which a coup would be birthed, and certainly not when hundreds of thousands of soldiers were marching through eldritch paths into his lands. No, of all these the only practicable candidate was Rozala Malanza. Who, aside from middling talent in scheming, had spent most of the last year on campaign in a principality where scrying was impossible. Which meant either Princess Rozala had hidden her cunning very skillfully, someone of influence was behind her or this was a foreign plot to cripple Procer just as it seemed possible for it to be saved. Cordelia's heart whispered of Malicia, the old enemy in the East, but the Dead King was conceivable foe as well – though through clandestine intermediaries, for the Rhenian doubted even the lowest of the low would strike bargain with the Hidden Horror directly.

Or, Cordelia grimly thought, they might be fools. They grew scared of what they saw on the horizon, rustled up someone of high enough birth and used them as a figurehead for this ill-advised butchery. That the Holies might truly be so arrogant as to presume they'd be able to force the election of their chosen candidate without any real support seemed unconvincing, but Cordelia Hasenbach was not so conceited as to deny that the measures she'd taken to ensure the survival of Procer might lead others to act against her this dramatically. Out of fear or principle, or perhaps even the heady potion that could be brewed from both together. It did not matter, in the end. Order would be restored, and everyone who'd lent their hand to this utter lunacy made to dance at the end of a rope. Balthazar, sure he had her in hand, moved away from the window.

"Now be a good girl and sit down in a corner, Cordelia," the spymaster grinned. "You might even make it out of this alive, if you do as you're told."

He'd left the knife in the windowsill, she saw. That simplified matters. The blonde princess snatched the dagger's handle, ripping it clear of the wood. The large bearded man looked at her with a mixture of contempt and amusement. He was a former soldier, a hardened killer and significantly larger than her. There were more than a dozen soldiers and Silver Letters as well, now all casting eyes on her. Uncle Klaus, she thought, would have said something outrageously obscene before baring his sword and attempting to fight his way through. And, brave stubborn old warhorse that he was, he would have died trying.

"I suppose even the runt of the litter will know a little fighting," Balthazar Serigny laughed. "Go on then, First Prince. Impress me."

The princess' cool blue gaze swept the room, burning every face into her mind. Names she might not have, but this would suffice. Patience, sparrow, her mother's voice rang. Patience and quiet and take your kill only when the time is ripe.

"Before spring comes," Cordelia Hasenbach calmly said, "I will see you all hang."

Before they could reply she slashed at her own breast before dropping the dagger. Shallow but long, the wound bled vividly and began soaking her dress. Even as surprise and confusion bloomed across the faces of those looking at her, the First Prince climbed the windowsill and threw herself down into the courtyard. The landing was painful, and she did not suppress her scream as she felt her leg crack.

"Murder," Cordelia called out to the crowd of soldiers looking at her. "Treason! Serigny tried to assassinate me!"

It was time to find out, she thought, whether Alamans gallantry was an empty boast or not.

pagesbe

Okay. Cordelia, I have my problems with you, but holy shit are you badass when it comes down to it.

Also, I am more convinced than ever this is Scribe's work.

My very own name

"There's only one person that can stab me, and that's me" –
Cordelia Hasenbach

mavant

Nobody out-crazies [Cord]elia!

Javvies

Blasphemer! Burn the Heretic!

Cordelia doesn't do the crazy shit. She's normally a planner and plotter. She's just not an incompetent when she has to improvise. We think. There is not yet definitive evidence either way on that, although, her escape shows promise.

Unparalleled crazy shit is the purview of Kairos, goblins, and Cat. Also Bard, probably.

Faiir

Yes.

Parker

Agreed on both points.

I keep forgetting about Scribe. I swear, her name should she Spy, she blends so well into the background. Only coming to the forefront to cause devastation and unrest before disappearing again.

WuseMajor

It's one of her powers. I think.

...who were we talking about again?

greatwyrmgold

Imp, maybe?

ALazyMonster

I feel even more confident in my prediction last chapter that this is all scribes work.

Also Scribe's Name being scribe fits better for her being unnoticed so often I mean the best way to not be noticed is to simply be background noise. How many people can honestly say that they perfectly remember little people who do things like sign paperwork, take out trash, or a hundred other menial things? Like does anyone remember the last interaction with a person at a DMV that they had? Baring them doing something to really make an impression, I would speculate not. I now realize that I'm rambling about why I feel like Scribe is such an appropriate name, but that isn't going to stop me from posting this.

naturalnuke

If it was a name like Spy we would remember. But Scribe just sounds so... uninteresting.

Faiir

You're right – Spy would be a James Bond, while Scribe is an actual spy 😊

Fayhem

If we're considering the tendencies of many less-than-practical Named to go for maximum drama and minimum planning, Spy might be just as likely to be a Sterling Archer.

...God, Archer but with Named abilities. I think I just low-key frightened myself.

Fayhem

Ayyy lmao read my last sentence again after posting and realized that technically we already have an Archer with Named powers.

Faiir

And she would fit right in the Archer series!

Fayhem

Picturing the LANAAAAA yelling but with Catherine's name instead. And ofc Zeze is obviously the Krieger of the group.

...Oh shit, is Black the Mallory of the group?

Slider

"later revealed to have been Dread Emperor Traitorous all along"

Named or not, scribes and the like tend to be ignored, like this epigraph showed.

Sparsebead

Who?

Draconic

I do not think this was Scribe's doing. She might have started it, but as soon as she heard that Amadeus is free, and on the way to a conference with Cordelia, she should have abandoned this plan.

Though I think it's entirely possible that she was the one who started this conspiracy, but the Holies and other people involved went ahead without a thought once she abandoned it (and stopped holding them back from being way too hasty). It would also explain some of the rough edges.

Liliet

Yep. That's my reading too.

Although I would add that Scribe likely stopped putting in effort but didn't care to try to stop it either. She does not care about anything but her precious Amadeus, not even things that he cares about.

Levi Kalden

Nah, probably bards work because of her ties to the church

taovkool

Okay, that was well played.

If the story goes against you, then just change the damn story.

NerfContessa

Really I expected her to have some ritual up her sleeve when she wounded herself.

But dang, she has balls of solid neutronium.
Well played Cordelia.

Shequi

So, this is Eudokia's plot to destabilise Dalia/Procer, and co-incidentally weaken the influence of the House of Light.

Now, was Scribe's true intention for the coup to succeed, putting whoever her nominee is in place on the Throne of Salia, or is Scribe's intention that the coup fail, and the Silver Letters (Procer's counter-intelligence branch, let's remember) be purged, giving Scribe's agents an easier time of infiltration after the fact?

pagesbe

The best plans are the ones where success isn't binary. The ideal situation could be for Cordelia to be overthrown, with the benefit of even if it fails Cordelia's spy network is gutted.

Faiir

Exactly, why not both?

Rup

minichirops

Thank you. I was going to say that, but less succinctly.

Barthumphries

Also, not really caring about the outcome and working towards a binary goal is the most important step to defeating an Auger.

jalexanderb

I'd say her goal is 'destabilize Salia', and she's already succeeded perfectly. No matter which outcome follows this, that's just icing on the cake.

shieldredblog

If Scribe knows about the Accords and the Black Knights escape, the House of Light could be her target. It would be the single greatest opponent to the Accords.

Or the nature of the Auger meant she didn't have the luxury of choosing a target. She just leaned into the first conspiracy she stumbled upon in retaliation.

Liliet

That's what I'm seeing.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

"Now, was Scribe's true intention for the coup to succeed, putting whoever her nominee is in place on the Throne of Salia, or is Scribe's intention that the coup fail, and the Silver Letters (Procer's counter-intelligence branch, let's remember) be purged, giving Scribe's agents an easier time of infiltration after the fact?"

Yes.

Sylwoos

The coup succeed: Scribe put Malanza, who's currently marching with Cat, on the throne.

The coup fail: Cordelia will have to deal from a position of extreme weakness with Cat, who's marching toward the city with a army, to crush the House of Light and secure her position.

Result: Whoever end up ruling in Procer will be in Cat's pocket.

Kel the Seer

Scribe has never liked Cat, since even as a candidate for the position of Squire was a direct threat to Black's life. The Name of Squire is intended to transition into the next Black Knight, whether by killing the current holder or taking over after their death. Scribe intimated as much early in the series and sees Cat as a blind spot for Amadeus. Cat's last interaction with Black was to stab him before walking away, leaving her firmly on Scribe's bad side.

I agree that she has multiple goals in place to position herself for even further goals, but I don't see those as necessarily helping Cat out. Black on the other hand...

He is about to walk into a conference surrounded by enemies (Grand Allince, Pilgrim, etc), some of whom will want him imlrisoned or executed for his actions in Procer. Removing an accomplished politician (Cordelia) with a less accute ruler, weakening the Holies, destabilizing the alliances in the Assembly, gutting the multiple spy groups in Procer, etc. None of those are so at odds that they cannot all be simultaneously accomplished. Each that fails still weakens threats to Amadeus. Each that succeeds puts him in a stronger position when he sits at the table and either way the chances of him being executed are lessened with each plan.

After all, when the Accords reached Cordelia vis scry, Scribe likely learned all the details since she was probably the unassuming scribe recording it all for Cordelia to review. She thought Black should have claimed the Tower before. If he is the signatory for Praes on the Aaccords and squeezes for all the consessions that he can, doesn't that play favorably into a story of his ascent to Dread Emperor?

frolamiz

Iron indeed.

IDKWhoitis

A cunning old fox will chew off its own leg to escape a trap.

A cunning Cordy will stab herself in the chest and cry out "Treason!" to survive a coup.

A tired Catherine would probably just dip that section of the city in Goblinfire and call it a good night...

jalexanderb

Goblinfire is so Book 2. Theres a whole lake right there just waiting to be repurposed.

Death Knight

Goblinfire burns anything yes? So why not combine the best of both worlds and burn the surface of the lake with goblin fire then drop said burning lake on the enemy?

jalexanderb

Robber, waking suddenly and sitting bolt upright
"I've never been more aroused, and I have no idea why."

Rup

..now THAT is a mental image 🐱

Nairne .01

I guess you could call that a version of napalm.

IDKWhoitis

Well, everyone is going to blame Catherine for the fires anyways, and then somehow still interpret the attempts to put it out via Lake as some sort of double tap attack.

I didn't remember that Salía was so close to a lake. How convient.

RoflCat

You mean a tired Catherine will be greeted with a city on fire and have to sort the mess out before a quick nap.

And of course they'll blame her for the fire.

greatwyrmgold

At this point, enough people are making jokes about Catherine being blamed for fires that she'd probably have picked up a curse from the stories if she was still Named.

edrey

it's scribe, right? Eudokia is the kind of spymistres that use others spies as tools, ironic i have to say.
well, with this the house is done and cordelia have free hand to clean the other nobles

Oshi

Most likely. This is the perfect time to strike. It destabilizes Procur while leaving her technically out of it. Scribe probably spent time setting things up to interfere with the Augers messages then just let the conspirators move up the time table.

gagesbe

Cordelia will probably be either dead by the end of the story, or have started a new monarchy, because if she survives and keeps her position power is probably going to be even more consolidated around her.

RoflCat

Well, I'm sure Cardinal could use another personnel with such foresight for peace and the will to bleed for the long run.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, in addition to the in-world story mechanics, Cordelia has Plot Armor like whoa, because there is simply no plausible replacement character for her Role.

After the Princes Graveyard, AFAICT there are two foreground characters who could plausibly succeed her as ruler of Procer: The Iron Prince is established as military with no political acumen, so scratch him. The most plausible character available is Rozala, and she left her sword in the ground of Issere – not exactly a decrowning, but deeply symbolic. That said, Rozala and friends, are heading there via Twilight, so they'll show up Sooner Than Expected, but I think not soon enough to intervene in this.

Hmm. Maybe the local forces of Iserre will be the ones to save Cordelia's bacon.

beleester

I think Rozala and friends will show up in time to intervene. I think that Scribe (or whoever it was) is running an imposter plot – sending messages in Rozala's name to organize the coup while she was away fighting in the south. That would explain why the conspirators say they have a signed pardon from their backer, even though (as Cordelia notices) it would be extremely difficult for Rozala to have run such a scheme while she was cut off from scrying.

And the natural way to throw a monkey-wrench into this plot is for the real Rozala to unexpectedly show up before the coup is complete and reveal the deception.

Mental Mouse

Eh? What makes you think even Rozala's name is involved here? the HoL we know, and the traitor strongly implied they were backing him directly.

Javvies

This conspiracy would need a Prince or Princess to become First Prince instead of Cordelia.

Cordelia was running through the candidates for a coup, and Rozala was one of the few names she came up with as viable candidates to be behind this.

That said, Rozala isn't behind it. Though it's not impossible that somebody's using her name. Probably unlikely, though.

However, if there's an actual Prince knowingly involved in this, it's probably a non entity as reigning Princes(ses) go, who is probably going to be more of an overly ambitious figurehead and take orders, rather than give them.

Hellspirit

Interesting,

Scribe, Bard or Procerean.

Seeing that it's guide-verse, probably all of it combined.

theothin

Don't forget the Free Cities. This seems like a good time for Hierarch to make his move.

Liliet

Doesn't really sound like Hierarch's MO to me.

Mental Mouse

Even the Dead King is a possibility, given this wouldn't require a military intervention by him.

Javvies

Hmm.

Well, we know Rozala isn't behind this.

I wonder how someone managed to cut off Augur from getting messages passed.

That seems like the sort of thing she'd send a warning about before it happened.

Which means that somebody had to acquire one helluva lot of connections and pull without alerting Augur in order to cut off her communications through some sort of unplanned action.

Oshi

It doesn't have to be a consistent thing just a once. Right time right place and a message lost.

Javvies

That's good for one message ... but Augur would most likely have sent multiple messengers. Especially for something this big.

It's been four days ... which means every messenger has to have been stopped for those four days. Because if the future Augur is seeing doesn't change, that means Cordelia hasn't done anything about it. Especially since Augur's predictions usually require some measure of follow up and clarification by Cordelia, and Augur knows that.

shieldredblog

I doubt Scribe is blocking access to the Augur, she just hung around until she found an opportunity to convince the Silver Letters to do it.

Mental Mouse

You're thinking in terms of our world (e.g., "redundancy for critical functions"), and also considering Augur as if she were a guard "watching the radar".

In Guideverse, "the critical message was intercepted" has enough story power to stand on its own. Also, Augur is not so worldly or aggressive as Cordelia. The conspirators could simply subvert or replace the messengers assigned to Augur and isolate her just as they tried with Cordelia.

I'm still not so sure it's Scribe, but with this new layer of the situation, now I'll grant it could be, because she wouldn't have had to deal with the House of Light itself – just give their secular allies a bit of help and confidence.

Quite Possibly A Cat

"I wonder how someone managed to cut off Augur from getting messages passed.

That seems like the sort of thing she'd send a warning about before it happened.

Which means that somebody had to acquire one helluva lot of connections and pull without alerting Augur in order to cut off her communications through some sort of unplanned action."

Or Above really is behind this because Cordelia is on her way to becoming a Villain?

Javvies

Or, it's Bard, and Augur's abilities don't work right on what Bard does and sets in motion.

Also, we know Bard could do this without difficulty.

Morgenstern

It could be the Bard is just profiting from what Scribe was going to do anyway – ensuring she 'succeeds' in that...? Because no one will ever find out the Bard had her hand in that pie, too, right?

Whatever it is, I hope we'll at least get a hefty sum of speculation in-book. An explanation at some point would be so much better, of course... damn, curiosity. Speculating is fun, but only so long.

Mental Mouse

Another option: Augur predicted that any message to Cordelia would be intercepted, so she instead sent something by a back-channel to "the cavalry", (say, the Iron Prince or the Lycaonese troops) who will show up in due course.

erebus42

The Scribe (whom I believe is responsible for this coup) is nothing if not resourceful, not to mention the fact that she and Black had already been studying the Augur for weaknesses. Honestly if someone is going to subvert the efforts of the Augur it feels right that it would be the Scribe. I really hope we get to see more characters with non-action related Names take on a greater role. There's just so much untapped potential...

Javvies

I think it's Bard, not Scribe.

The operational constraints required for Scribe to bypass Augur are brutal – no planned actions, only taking advantage of naturally occurring opportunities as they appear. I just don't think Scribe has had the time to pull this off given the constraints she has to operate under to avoid Augur's precognition.

At least ... I don't think Scribe has had the time to do this without someone else (Bard) doing stuff to clear the way and set things up for her to take advantage of.

imagesbe

Scribe doesn't have to fool or trick the Auger in her current position. She just has to stop any summons from auger from reaching Cordelia's ears, and since the spy network is compromised that can't be THAT hard. Also Scribe could have purposefully caused unrest but in a less aggressive way, then taken advantage of people's natural distaste towards Cordelia taking steps towards be a Tyrant (though that part's just speculation on my end).

We even have foreshadowing in an earlier book when Scribe was going to try and create opportunities to take later to try and get around the Auger.

carrier

It's that hard because she would know the conspiracy during the planning or even before it.

Some power must have been used to counter the Auger

Liliet

If only we knew someone with the ability to be so utterly beneath notice that even people who know her personally would forget about her existence even when she's being actively talked about...

Mental Mouse

Bard also has a known motive. She said flat out to Cat that Procer "has been a fire in my lap since its founding". Suppose it turned into a proper Kingdom?

She'd be fine with a Villainous Queen of Procer for now – yes, it would throw the continental balance even further towards Evil, but that will correct itself – especially if the Dead King gets taken down. Once Cat goes off to Keter or wherever, Callow would still love to have a Heroic sovereign (and Viv was never all that Evil, she could easily flip back), Kairos will burn himself out in due time, the Titanomachy isn't going anywhere, the Levant is surprisingly stable with some good leadership in the wings, and Cordelia... well, even if she gets a Villainous Name, she's got plenty of enemies. (And might have more when whatever she fished out of that lake comes to light.)

Incidentally, the thing from the lake is also a solid motive for the HoL's attempted coup, it's not unlikely for them to have found out about it!

hakureireimu

I see that Cat "convincing" Amadeus on the Accords is the end to the Scrib-gone-rogue plot line, because if it's good enough to sell to more than half of the High Lords, then it's good enough to sell to Scribe.

Faiir

Is it though?

Convincing Black was based on showing signatories that each of them has something to gain.

Convincing Scribe requires showing that Black has nothing to lose due to Accords.

Liliet

Yeeep. She's not exactly on the same page as him wrt long term goals ;u;

Also, he'll need to have talked with her. I'm not seeing how Scribe could have gotten instructions from him prior to this being set into motion.

Huh. Actually, she could have set this into motion prematurely upon getting instructions from him so that it would fail. Knocking over the card house.

Quite Possibly A Cat

So it appears Above really is moving against her?

I think killing the servants was a mistake. You can't do Above's work and slaughter servants like that. Just to hide witnesses? That seems like Stupid Evil.

Really the Holies should have gotten the Assembly and used some Light for Smite Cordelia. "Light burned her. She was Evil. I'm petitioning you to elect a non-Evil First Prince. Or at least a cool one. Like that new priestess of darkness."

hakureireimu

Nope. Some people who follow Above is moving against her. We have never seen Above actively intervene without being called on first, even when a tiny nudge could have done lots, like when the Laure House of Light was crowning Cat.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is not above who is moving against her. It is the people forming the HoL, who are only human. The Gods don't communicate with their servants. It is a completely human plot, born of paranoia, stupidity, egoism and manipulation.

Concerning the smithing, becoming a tyrant is bad, but not Evil, so Light would have had no effect on Cordelia.

shieldredblog

The limits of Light seem cultural, nor inherent. Lanterns can set people on fire with their minds after all. They melted Nauk and he wasn't Evil.

Also, there easily could be a relic or artifact that lets the priests cheat the system. Not to mention some kind of "Chains of Judgement" artifact, that they could use with liberal application of bullshit.

I predict Cordelia will face something like that as she faces down the HOL in the assembly. They will accuse her of TYRANNY and judge her. Then Below will make an actual offer.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Proceran priests can't harm directly someone. I doubt anyone in-universe think she is turning into a Villain except for Catherine. The priest would have no reason to Light her.

frolamiz

They can, they just choose not to. I'm pretty sure there were some that threw down their vow "for the greater good" in Malanza's army when she tried to invade Callow. So it's very possible for one of them to choose to "sacrifice himself" and do it.

konstantinvoncarstein

Technically, creating fences to block someone's path is not harming them, it is the cavalry that came after that kill the skirmishers. It was not a direct attack like the Lanterns, and I suppose their oaths would be different.

Agent J

I wouldn't even exclude Catherine.

Liliet

Catherine has directly said she's worried Cordelia might be turning into a Villain

Agent J

Catherine has offhandedly suggested that what Cordelia is doing is something Villains do. That's quite a ways away from suggesting she might get an Evil Name anytime soon.

Liliet

It's in the same direction though.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nauk was super evil though? I mean, I suspect Lanterns can use those flame powers on anybody within their discretion, but he was a soul-scorched general of the Arch-Vile's army who liked eating people. Just cause he was likable doesn't mean he was Neutral.

konstantinvoncarstein

It was the Lanterns, not the HoL. I suppose their oaths are different.

shieldredblog

Capital Evil. He wasn't empowered by Below. I don't think the Light actually judges someones morals, as at least some of the priests are horrible human beings. It's all Above vs Below, not nice vs mean.

Liliet

>They melted Nauk and he wasn't Evil.
I'm fairly sure he worshipped the Gods Below.

Agent J

How sure? I recall it mentioned when Vivi and Haks were contemplating the political ramifications of their soldiers returning to Callow with Crow wings emblazoned on their banners and Haks mentioned most the Fifteenth kept to Below if they kept to anything at all. So, which camp was Nauk in. And is there even a distinction in the eyes of Above (or at least smite-happy Angels)?

Liliet

I mean. Callowans keep to Above, Praesi keep to Below. We don't know about any instances of people actively switching from the religions they were raised in – there were probably a few, but nothing of the sort was brought up for Nauk, so he most definitely burned offerings to the Hungry Gods exactly like the rest of the orcs.

Mental Mouse

As others note, Above doesn't touch human politics directly. And as both Pilgrim and the late Saint have demonstrated, killing innocents in a Good cause is totally on the table for Their mortal followers.

erebus42

Well played Cordelia. Well played.
Its gonna make the peace talks kinda awkward if she finds out that the Scribe was behind this. Then again, they might be able to go with the old plausible deniability that no believes but everyone let's stand due to lack of concrete evidence trick.

shieldredblog

If she does survive this, its likely her position will be much stronger. As the House of Light will be slapped down. Only problem will be the lack of spies after all the loyalty purges.

Oh, and the murdered servants, though I don't think you should blame the scribe for that.

Mental Mouse

More likely, even if Scribe was involved, nobody ever knows about it. The Bastard and the HoL are perfectly plausible culprits.

konstantinvoncarstein

I like Cordelia, even surrounded by ennemies she managed to think of a plan to escape. And it is definitely Scribe who organized this, but she could not have done it without the sheer stupidity of the HoL. Let's make a coup during a war that we are barely winning, it could in no way backfire!

erebus42

"Pfft, who needs a functioning Principate anyway?! I'm sure if we pray hard enough the Gods Above will stop us from being murdered and risen as part of that big scary zombie-god's undead horde" – Some dumbass of a proceran priest probably

shieldredblog

The 10th Crusade will totally work this time, for sure.
Guaranteed!
Have faith.

caoimhinh

To be fair, Cordelia's action of throwing herself through the window wasn't so much a plan as a desperate gamble. She is betting that the soldiers in the courtyard aren't part of the Coup.

Now she has entered Survival Mode, bleeding and with a wounded leg, her trusted guards away and enemies all around. She has to turn the situation by telling the populace about the assassination attempt (apparently the rebels didn't want to kill her, only to depose her), thus the rioting people will turn against the original instigators and protect Cordelia.

In the worst case scenario, Cordelia needs to hang in there until Catherine arrives.

Mental Mouse

Also, while Cordy may not have explicit story-fu, she has certainly gotten on the right side of a perfectly workable story: Vile treachery against the valiant lawful ruler!

Balthazar needs a good story to counter, and it's not at all clear that he can make "overthrowing the evil Tyrant" work at this stage – he struck way too early for that story to have real traction. Now, If he'd waited until she was gloating about her new eldritch weapon/ally/patron, that would have been a shoo-in.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, he already did the classic villian fuck up that Terry Pratchett talked about: He stopped to Gloat. A true good assassination? You kill the vilian as swiftly as possible. The good man who decides you must die doesn't care that you think they are clever, or that you squirm, or lose hope, or bargain uselessly. They just want you dead, so they make you die. It's the evil man that wants those things, and so stops and savors the kill. And so gives you much more chance to survive it.

Amoonymous

They aren't even barely winning the war, they're consistently losing it at a moderately fast pace. Dead King just randomly imposed an armistice from their point of view.

NerfGlastigUaine

I saw every part of this chapter coming except for that last part. Damn, Cordelia does not mess around. Shows you don't need supernatural powers to be a badass.

Nairne .01

Hey, we knew people don't need superpowers to be badass a long time ago – look at the Hellhound and some other members of the 15th (R.I.P Nauk and Ratface).

caoimhinh

Lycaonese are an entire breed of Badass Normals.

Mental Mouse

Aka Proud Warrior Race Guys. Including the women.

Nairne .01

Their hair just doesn't turn blonde when they get angry.

Mental Mouse

??? I'm afraid I don't get that reference.

Agent J

Saiyans, most like.

caoimhinh

In the anime Dragon Ball Z, the race of Saiyans become blue-eyed blonde when transformed in the state of Super Saiyans, a state that drastically augments their speed, strength, and energy.

anon

That's their secret captain, their hair's always blonde

NerfGlastigUaine

I kinda wish I'd posted in last chapter about my predictions. Thought that things would go to hell and there'd be a bloody coup simply b/c things have been going too well. And b/c I didn't think it'd be as simple as Cordelia thrashing the House through politics. I even predicted a spymaster would betray her, except I thought it'd be Louis b/c Balthazar seemed too obvious. Would have made for a great "I knew it!" moment. It's just I've NEVER been right in my predictions so I didn't air it. Strong regret.

Liliet

Always air your predictions.

We have a thing on discord where bets for the next chap are collected, and the winners get to change nicknames of losers until next chap. It's a lot of fun to both win and lose, come hang out :3

caoimhinh

Always share your predictions; fan theories are one of the things that spice up web fictions. Whether they are correct or mistaken is actually largely irrelevant.

My hint for something else being wrong last chapter, was when Cordelia noted that "Two of the most skilled spymasters alive looked at her with faces betraying utter surprise". My reaction was "ok, these dudes know something they aren't saying" but I didn't expect Balthazar to betray Cordelia right away, nor did I expect her to stay guarded only by Balthazar's men.

It will be interesting if Louis also betrayed her, since that would mean Cordelia just lost all, or at least most of, her spy network.

NerfGlastigUaine

Does anyone know how large Calernia is? Like, in kilometres? Just want to get a better mental picture of distances and size.

caoimhinh

Hmm, honestly no one except maybe ErraticErrata can tell you that.

Nothing in the story talks about distance, only in some cases the travel time is mentioned. Even the cities are never referenced by area, but rather by population size.

Although there are maps you can check out (top of the page, the "Art, Maps and Other" section) and make your own mental image of the distances involved, at least in a relative manner. I personally think of Calernia as something about the size of Eurasia.

Mental Mouse

Smaller than Eurasia as a whole, I think – the equivalents of China, India and Russia seem to be on other continents. More likely Europe proper, maybe out to Turkey or so.

caoimhinh

Yep, maybe just Europe. But don't take the countries in Calernia as direct representations of countries from Earth, especially not in matters of size.

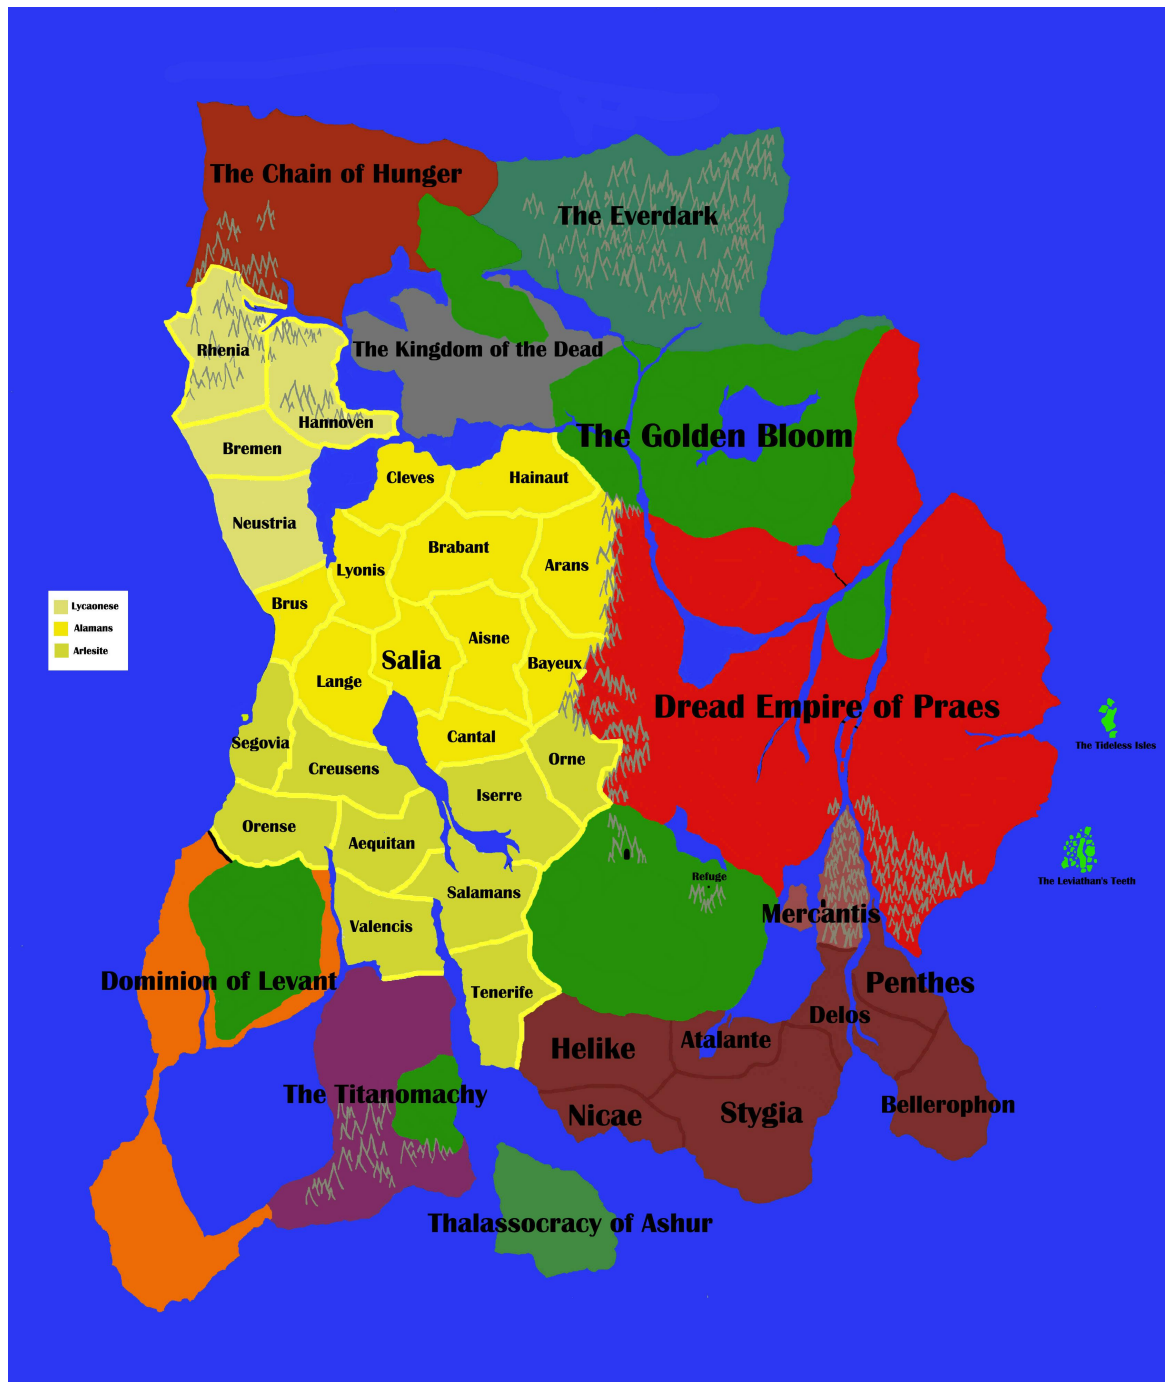

Callow is inspired by England but isn't an island, while Praes is heavily inspired by Africa with some Arabic elements (though Levant also has arabic elements in their design). We don't have much info about the Yan Tei and Yamin-ine (the guideverse China and India) to speculate their size, but the Elves were said by Bard to own a country larger than the whole continent of Calernia.

The maps we have might make it seem as if Calernia is small, but it is definitely very large, to the point that going from one country to the other takes months by ride (Tariq states as much when he goes from Levante to Orense, and Orense has border with the Dominion), and according to Book 3 Chapter 19, going from Marchford to Laure takes a month and half on forced march to top speed and that's just from the southern middle of Callow to the northern middle.

The maps available:

Agent J

I had South America as my reference point. Eurasia is significantly larger than I'd even considered. There's only seven or so countries in Calernia. And only Procer can be considered large by an Asian perspective. At least, how I think of it.

Hells there's over fifty countries in Africa, and what's in Calernia doesn't look large enough to be the equivalent of fifty nations. And Eurasia is bigger still!

Not to mention Black has called Calernia a backwater continent and the Bard said the Elven Nation those of the Golden Bloom originate from is larger than all of Calernia.

caoimhinh

The number of countries isn't equivalent to size. Africa (with 54 countries) has 3 times the size of Europe (with 44 countries).

And with Procer being basically the European Union and Praes being Africa (of which there are plenty of hints, from the language and ethnicity to their political history), I don't think it is an exaggeration to use Europe as a model for approximate size. I agree that the whole Eurasia may be too big for Calernia, but that's merely a mental image that I use (I imagine Africa switching position with Asia, thus I have the Eastern Calernia as Procer and the Western Calernia as the Principate, with the cold lands of the north being Keter, Chain of Hunger and Ever Dark) the actual sizes involved are honestly beyond me, I simply use that accommodation and mental configuration as it makes it easier for me to reference.

Another thing, remember that an important detail about maps is scale, which none of the maps available of Calernia have. All we have as reference is traveling time, and even that isn't a very exact measure.

The maps we have might make it seem as if Calernia is small compared to our world's continents, but it is definitely very large, to the point that going from one country to the other takes months by ride (Tariq states as much when he goes from Levante to Orense, and Orense has border with the Dominion), and according to Book 3 Chapter 19, going from Marchford to Laure takes a month and half on forced march to top speed and that's just from the southern middle of Callow to the northern middle.

Also, just because there are larger and more powerful states outside of Calernia doesn't mean that it is objectively small. It's simply that they are weak when compared to those great powers beyond the sea. When Black said that Calernia is a backwater continent he meant it in the sense of power and development, not because of size.

For example: The gnomes have airships apparently impervious to magic and missiles (maybe lasers), the Dwarves have superior weaponry, and the Elves superior sorcery, while countries like Yan Tei, Baalite Hegemony and the Miezian were shown to have superior nautical skills and technology that enabled them to sail across the Tyrian Sea and reach Calernia.

Liliet

My impression is that Calernia isn't meant to actually be very large, erratic is just terrible with estimating travel time.

caoimhinh

Well, designing accurately the geography and size of something is a very hard thing to do. It is extremely rare to see such thing in any media, be it movies, books, comics or games. Usually those kinds of calculations are made by careful fans with lots of free time.

That said, Erratic doesn't seem terrible at estimating travel time, it actually has been pretty consistent and also has taken into account that a large force of soldiers on foot is slower than a small group horse-riding.

I'm actually more surprised that there was a successful message network without the use of scrying (Cordelia was shown using birds to deliver and receive messages, but that's still huge distances to cover).

Liliet

...if you made a detailed timeline that took into account travel times that would be super neat

Agent J

> The number of countries isn't equivalent to size. Africa (with 54 countries) has 3 times the size of Europe (with 44 countries).

True. I was using it as a quick an easy reference point and not a hard measuring system.

> And with Procer being basically the European Union and Praes being Africa (of which there are plenty of hints, from the language and ethnicity to their political history), I don't think it is an exaggeration to use Europe as a model for approximate size.

Whoa, whoa, whoa. Slow down. It's long been established (by the readers at least, not sure if we've WoG on the topic) that Procer is the HRE. No one's ever considered it the EU until now. Secondly, Praes is Africa? Just the whole continent?

Yes, their language, ethnic description, and even their city names suggest they are based on various African people groups. But, well, that doesn't mean their one country is equivalent to the size of the whole continent.

They're plenty of RL African groups missing with no real Praesi counterparts. Besides, even with scrying, it would be nigh impossible to for a medieval society to maintain an empire the size of Africa with anything resembling the hold Praes has on it's constituents. Let alone stretching to conquer yet even more territory.

Did the Fifteenth really march across a continent's worth of land to get from Ater to Summerholm?

Just because Praesi are African inspired doesn't mean Praes is Africa in size.

> Another thing, remember that an important detail about maps is scale, which none of the maps available of Calernia have. All we have as reference is traveling time, and even that isn't a very exact measure.

Yes, and I'm hard pressed to imagine that travelling from Ater to Laure is equivalent to Going from Berlin to Addis Ababa.

> When Black said-

I'm aware. It was one point in two. Black says they're technologically inferior, and Bard said they were a tiny thing. Coupled together, the impression given is that they are just some small continent off the coast of the real Eurasian equivalent. Else, why would they only have been bothered my mainlanders in the age of antiquity? I mean, how many peopled conquered Africa before and after the Romans/Carthaginians? Why don't the Yan Tei grab a slice if Calernia is a huge plot of land with technologically inferior peoples?

There are European inspired people, African inspired people, and Levantine inspired people, but I just can't see Calernia being anywhere near the size of Africa and Europe together. Europe alone, maybe. Africa alone, I strongly doubt. But both together?

> I'm actually more surprised that there was a successful message network without the use of scrying (Cordelia was shown using birds to deliver and receive messages, but that's still huge distances to cover).

If Procer were the size of the HRE it'd be feasible. I mean, the HRE managed it without scrying.

caoimhinh

Just like you, I'm using those as reference points, not as actual measures. It's simply easier for me to organize them that way, the actual sizes involved and the calculations of distances are beyond me, as I have said before.

That being said, there are some points I must address:

If by HRE you mean the Holy Roman Empire, the closest equivalent in the Guideverse would be the Miezian Empire who invaded Calernia centuries ago and slaved Praes. Both their structure and historical background hint to that. They are explicitly said to have been the ones introducing Miezian Numerals, the higher order of mathematics, spell formulas, and technological revolution in engineering to the point that ancient Miezian bridges (like the one in the Blessed Isle) still hold to the current day. The few insights we had to Miezian language suggests Latin as its Earth equivalent too, (the names Ater, Praes and Thalassina have latin roots and meaning, for example).

Procer, on the other hand, is a union of 23 different states, and three distinct ethnicities, of which the Lycaonese stand as a Germanic group, while the Alamans and Arlesites have shown traces of French and Spaniard ethnicities, as signaled by their languages and the names of the Principalities.

The First Prince (from which the name Principate comes: Princeps means chief or first, as in First Among Equals) is elected in a "limited democracy" by the votes of the members of the Highest Assembly, who are the effective rulers of 23 different lands, they aren't vassals under a sovereign, they are an association and each Prince and Princess of Procer is a potential candidate to the office of First Prince. While the name "Principate" may make us think of the early period of the Roman Empire under Ceasar Augustus (and we can see some parallelisms), the Princes of Procer have vast differences with Roman Senators, both in the nature of their power and the influence they hold, as the Proceran Princes are effectively monarchy in their lands with a huge degree of freedom in management and lawmaking.

Maybe Praes is smaller than Africa, sure, but even if it were, scrying and magic are enough to establish effective communication and keep a hold on the territories. The Mongol Empire under Ghenghis Khan was larger than Africa, and had a network of relay stations to deliver messages by riders. Every single large empire in our world has done similar things to establish a firm communication between its center of power and the lands under its control. Magic vastly simplifies the issue.

As for why other nations beyond the sea don't attack Calernia anymore, we don't know their circumstances and geopolitics, their last intervention was due to Triumphant apparently becoming an actual threat to them when she unified Calernia. The Miezian invasion was overthrown by Praes, and the Baalite Hegemony apparently collapsed by reasons independent to Calernia, leaving Ashur abandoned but with an ingrained culture and caste system.

We simply don't know enough to make an educated guess, they could simply have signed treaties of not touching Calernia anymore or for a certain amount of time. Maybe they are currently occupied and at war, maybe someone made a magical experiment and there's a perpetual storm that surrounds Calernia and now it's unreachable, maybe their gods told them to not go there. That's largely irrelevant for the matter at hand.

Javvies

The Miezians are analogous to the original Romans, it's not entirely clear if they're the Republic or the Empire.

They aren't the Holy Roman Empire, though.

The Procerans might be loosely analogous (politically speaking) to one of the era's of Italian city-states, pre unification. Albeit with a greater measure of unity than the Italian city states had.

However, none of these analogies are dependent upon the size of Calernia.

That said ... somebody could probably work out a guesstimate on the size of Calernia based on the maps and known marching times for the Legions/Army of Callow while they're in Callow/Praes and have an established infrastructure for supplies and don't need to do things like forage or graze animals. I say the Legions/Army of Callow because they're the professional and well organized forces, and so would be more consistent in terms of their movement and would likely be at the higher end of army movement speeds.

caoimhinh

Yep, it's important to keep in mind that none of the countries in Calernia is an exact equivalent to a country of Earth, even if there are similarities and some equivalencies in language or ethnicity.

The Miezian also seem similar to the Greek kingdoms (like the Macedonian Empire under Alexander the Great, for example), while the League of Free Cities is way more similar to the Greek polis as city-states.

As for guesstimating the distances by using travel time...

well, we would have to still assume a speed for their marching. I would put it somewhere between 20 and 30 miles per day. As stated in Book 3 Chapter 19, Nauk said that "if they marched halfway to the grave", which I assume means marching at top speed with minimum rest, they could go from Marchford to Laure in a month and a half (through Arcadia it took them only 3 days).

It's honestly hard to measure that because we'd be assuming a lot, but for the example's sake let's use 30 miles per day.

30 miles x 45 days = 1300 miles, that's 2092.15 kilometers, that's twice the distance between Berlin (Germany) and Paris(France). Even going from Warsaw(Poland's capital) to Paris is 1591 km; the distance from Munich to Hamburg (cities located in the southern and northern parts of Germany) is 790 km, about 491 miles.

And that's only between two cities in the middle of Callow, not even the whole extension of the country AND not using their top and most exhausting marching speed, which was what Nauk used to make that statement of covering the distance in 45 days.

So the middle of Callow is larger than Germany. And Callow is among the smallest of the countries in Calernia. I'm sticking to my theory of Calernia being huge.

Javvies

To be fair, that distance is the road distance, which probably isn't a perfectly straight line, so the distance "as the crow flies" is probably a bit less.

On the other hand, I think the upper end of non-foraging, non-grazing, foot infantry armies is closer to 40 miles per day than 30, and 20 miles per day is bad even when foraging and grazing.

But yeah, Calernia is fucking huge. Even if we use the lower, 20 miles per day figure (which is slow) for 45 days, it's still 900 miles between Marchford and Laure. Or nearly twice the distance you cited for Germany.

And it's not like Marchford and Laure are at the extreme ends of Callow. They're both pretty well in the middle, no matter which direction you go.

And the sheer size makes it pretty clear why Procerans don't have a unified national identity – Procer is just too big. Honestly, it's more surprising that Callow has what appears to be a pretty unified and universal national identity.

caoimhinh

Agreed.

We also must consider that Calernia probably doesn't have the pretty roads we have on Earth, and it's not like an army can march through forests and mountains easily, troops mostly stick to roads when on march, at least when within their own territory.

I recall that most of the cities of Callow were kingdoms at some point of their history; it's confirmed that Marchford, Laure, Liesse, and Daoine were independent and strong nations before the Alban unification of Callow. Their unified national identity is likely a consequence of their constant wars against Praes in recent centuries. Though the southern Callowans and the northern Callowans don't get along well, Catherine mentioned they are almost different people, and Daoine is a semi-independent state with their own rules and culture, so there's that.

Javvies

My understanding is that premechanized armies generally prefer to stick to roads all the time, not just in their own territory. At least, when they're available.

On the other hand, I believe that at some point there was mention of the Miezens leaving behind roads/highways, and Miezan engineering work being better than most "modern" work.

Between those routes as examples, and the military (and trade) advantages of good roads, I'd expect that Praes and Callow, at least, both have pretty good road networks, at least on the major routes. Even if they were lacking previously, Amadeus would have recognized the value in a major investment in roadway infrastructure. For that matter, I expect that at least some of the competent Dread Emperors of ages past would've done the same.

I'm less sure about the rest of Calernia, though. On the other hand, it's also a distinct possibility that Triumphant (and/or underlings) would have exported the value of good roadways in her conquest of Calernia.

caoimhinh

True, but armies tend to get inventive and creative on the paths they use when invading or in hostile territory, both for sneaking out and for ambushing.

See for example the Exiled Prince's Silver Spears going through the hills to Marchford, the League's armies going through the Waning Woods, and the northern expedition of the Tenth Crusade opening a path through the Whitecaps Mountains.

Andrew Mitchell

> The number of countries isn't equivalent to size. Africa (with 54 countries) has 3 times the size of Europe (with 44 countries).

Or think of Australia: One country that's bigger than than all 44 European countries combined.

caoimhinh

Yeah.

I mean, take a look at these numbers:

Europe has 10.18 million km² of area.

China has 9.59 million km², The United States has 9.83 million km², and Russia is a monster with 17.1 million km² in size. These are the Superpowers of the world.

So when the Elven Country is cited as being larger than the whole of Calernia, it's not to mean that Calernia is objectively small, but rather to emphasize the utter vastness of the Elven Country.

I'm sure nobody would say that Germany, England, Japan or Switzerland are backwater countries judging only the sizes. They would be hugely mistaken to make such an assumption.

superkeaton

I knew you couldn't trust a man whose nickname was "the Bastard". I wonder if Arnaud had something to do with this? Still, props to Cordelia, but now she's got a civil war on her hands in the middle of the apocalypse.

WuseMajor

Hey, we trusted a guy who called himself Ratface.

That said, I'll grant that The Pilgrim made the wrong call on which person would successfully build a United Nations on this continent when he decided to back Cordy over Cat.

konstantinvoncarstein

If not for the DK, Tariq would have been right, no one would have trust Callow or Praes to make alliance with them.

Agent J

Why should that allowance be made? That just means he also failed to predict that calling for a Continental War Against Evil would drag you into a Continental War Against Evil.

Seriously, he though he could bowl over Callow, stomp on Praes, and then focus on "finally ending the Hidden Horror". Like everyone was just gonna stand around and patiently wait to get Crusaded.

caoimhinh

Damn, an attempt of Coup d'Etat right now, when they are in the middle of a crisis? Are those priests insane?

Is this Scribe's work? This is one heck of an infiltration if it is.

Though I would suspect the Bard since this was instigated by the House of Light, but we never know.

P.S: It will be hilarious if Catherine has to be the one to fight to make Cordelia regain her position as First Prince. The irony would be too sweet.

erebus42

Probably the Scribe nudging along a preexisting Cabal.

Nairne .01

Well, different people, different agendas.

There is probably either a very power-hungry or self-righteous and proud to the point of not admitting they're mistaken clique in the Hollies that either has good connections/spies or someone had interest in informing them of the happenings during Prince's Graveyard.

Idk if this was supposed to succeed or not. But this not succeeding probably is a better outcome for Cat. Cordelia would be able to consolidate her power and remove/restrain some obstacles to Cat's plans.

As to who could have their fingers in it?

Bard most likely is aware of this, but I don't think she set this in motion herself. At most, she induced someone to do it, whether through direct conversation or steering events to reveal information to someone so they act OR she predicted someone would do this even if she didn't act and didn't stop it. That is to say, if this was supposed to not succeed then she might have hindered something.

Scribe? Could be, but I bet she has info on the accords and Black's agreement on them. Hard to say if she agrees or not. She is her own person, even if she is loyal to Black, so she might have reasons to stop him from going this route. Malicia? This I could see, but more in the sense that it would have been supposed to succeed. Though seeing as this wasn't done perfectly – i.e. the execution of the deed involved murdering so many servants then either this was hindered by someone, they didn't have many other options for the main turncoat – which would reek of desperation to act, something I doubt Malicia would resort to at this stage unless she knows about the Accords and sees herself as betrayed already (which could be the case) though I still find this unlikely (only as a feeling though).

frondred

first you forget scribe then everyone forgets you.

caoimhinh

Yeah, they just Disappear.

Captain Amazing

So it seems Cordelia, like Akua, was made to murder someone at an early age. Or have you forgotten that ratlings are people too?

Cool ending btw.

shieldredblog

Inconvenient people aren't really people. Especially when they're Evil.

Hydrargentium

I didn't think ratlings were more than barely sentient, until they transformed into Horned Lords. And in any case, every ratling ever has tried to kill and eat any human it has encountered.

So, not exactly the same thing.

Hg

Captain Amazing

They're barbarians without a satiety response, but they're absolutely people. The Intercessor specifically mentions the ratlings as a cogent power in her conversation with Neshama. They've just been under millennia of corruption from Below and had everyone who tried to improve their lot assassinated by Above. Goblins and orcs were similarly "dehumanized" despite being no less -anything- than anyone else.

Dresden 67

They're specifically noted by Masego to be incapable of higher reasoning, with the exception of the the very youngest and the Horned Lords.

Also, any ratling in Rhenia is an invader that will eat anyone in its path.

Fayhem

> had everyone who tried to improve their lot assassinated by Above.

Lol what. Are you actually getting that from somewhere? And also what Dresden 67 said. And also what konstantinvoncarstein said.

konstantinvoncarstein

The problem with the ratling is that they literally cannot stop themselves from eating everything they come across, making them a danger for everyone. And Akua had to kill a childhood friend, while for Cordelia it was an invader trying to slaughter and eat civilians. The circumstances are completely different.

Fayhem

"Barely-sentient invading baby-eaters are people too"? Is this a parody account for making fun of how some of the fanbase is reflexively sympathetic to anyone and everything labeled as Evil? I mean, people seemed plenty happy about Catherine killing Proceran invaders and they weren't even killing and eating everyone. I don't think the followers of Good are the ones applying the double standard here (for once) lol.

laguz24

Why, does fate seem to desire that Cat collect foils like other's collect enemies. First William, then the Grey Pilgrim and now Cordelia. Two rulers who want a better world and are willing to become tyrants forced by circumstance to do it. Hell, they even have matching wounds now.

RoflCat

William – stab to the chest (in her defense, he stabbed her chest first)

Akua – stab to the chest and rip her heart out

Pilgrim – stab to the chest to pull out aspect

Cordelia – I'm sure someone will blame Cat for the slash.

I must say, Cat is really taking this whole “finding a way into someone’s heart” rather literally.

Mental Mouse

The way to a man’s heart(*) is between the third and fourth ribs. 😊

(*) Or a woman’s, even.

frondred

oh wow Ebun will love this

Mental Mouse

Cat is actively shaping the Story with a nearly-unprecedented level of skill and power, so it is coalescing around her.

laguz24

To further the comparisons, one was granted queenship by another’s hand and kept it relatively bloodlessly. The other came to the crown by bloodshed and treachery. One did anything to save her people and country from ideals the other sacrificed her homeland and people for ideals and a pipe dream. One sits out on the field surrounded by friends and allies while the other sits on her throne surrounded by wolves with knives. One has the favor of gods and is a religious figure the other is in conflict with those of the cloth and has no divine blessing whatsoever. One got a name early on and shed it for freedom, the other started with no name and is (presumably) developing one. The list goes on and on, was this planned? P.S. Her circumstances remind me of the song “the girl who climbed the tower” what lyrics would you write for Hasenbach? Also what about malacia (who is UP TO SOMETHING) and the other heroes who are presumably up north like the white knight and the champion.

nipi

Guys remember Blacks recent talk with Cat about what Scribe might be up to in the capital?

Liliet

Yep.

We do.

Razorfloss razor

Well this is a cluster fuck of epic proportions. This is turning into cats playground

SpeckofStardust

"Before they could reply she slashed at her own breast before dropping the dagger. Shallow but long, the wound bled vividly and began soaking her dress. Even as surprise and confusion bloomed across the faces of those looking at her, the First Prince climbed the windowsill and threw herself down into the courtyard. The landing was painful, and she did not suppress her scream as she felt her leg crack."

So an injury across the chest and will now walk with a limp. Cat is going to be laughing a lot.

Nairne .01

Good catch with the leg.

Rup

...um 🙄

The quote at the top:

"Iron to bind
Rope to kill"

.why is it reversed..sort of

"rope to bind and iron to kill" is obvious so clearly i am missing something...

NZPIEFACE

Prisoners and death by hanging. It's not talking about death on the battlefield, I think it's talking about death through politics.

onedollargum

They put you in metal shackles(irons) and then hang you (rope)

caoimhinh

Considering that quote is "from the 'Mavian Entreaties' found on raised stones across much of eastern Procer", which likely are stones akin to the "Mavian Prayers", so maybe this quote is something referring to Fae?

Do0d

Been re-reading the Guide and thought about the reasons Bard made a deal with Kairos in Twilight.

I'm betting the Bard's purpose was to kill Laurence.

The reason would be that she knew she was about to be exposed as a maker of villains and that the Saint of Swords would be one of the few people actually able to kill her.

laguz24

Sure the saint of swords would be able to kill her she just wouldn't die.

Levi Kalden

Cornelia chapters are admittedly some of my favourite

Interlude: Candle

"Fear not faith in the unworthy, for to be fooled is shame only on the undeserving."

– Extract from 'The Faith of Crowns', by Sister Salienta

Brother Simon of Gorgeault had been, for near half a bell now, wondering what manner of madness might possibly arouse the leading souls of the House of Light to such actions. His arrest had been impeccably polite, his detainment in the back hall of the Selandine Basilica coming along with a nice wine from one of the lakeside monasteries and what was admittedly the finest roasted quail he could ever remember having. The accompanying plums had been flavoured in the manner of the famous 'sacred recipe': dipped in sweet brandy for seven days and seven nights. The name was a delicious little jest for the learned, as it was said that before Arianna Galadon had first founded the House of Light in the west she'd for seven days and seven nights prayed by the shores of the Lake Artoise. A shame that his enjoyment of the meal had been spoiled by the way a pair of armed guards waited by the door, a reminder that any attempt to leave would be tactfully but firmly rebuffed.

Simon was morbidly curious as to whether they'd go as far as striking him, should he insist. Though only a lay brother and so not hallowed by vows, he was not without repute in the House. Looking at the cast of the tanned faces – Arlesites both, and from the resemblance perhaps even kin – he decided that violence was not so improbable. The grandees of the House must have brought hands they were certain of from isolated holdings in Valencis and Orense, where the ancient grants of fortress-monasteries by the Arlesite reales had never been rescinded. It was an open secret among certain circles that orphans were taken in and raised for such purposes, particularly after long winters when desperate families found they had too many mouths to feed. The House of Light might be forbidden by law to field armies, but it was hardly defenceless.

Simon sipped at the potent red in his cup, enjoying the bouquet even as he considered what must now be done. In here he was isolated from his fellows in the Holy Society, which barred him from ascertaining how deeply this conspiracy ran. For this was a conspiracy, there could be no doubt about it. He'd been taken when coming to the basilica for an urgent council with a dear friend, Sister Dominique, whose position in the middle ranks of the Holies meant anything she deemed urgent was very much so indeed. Alas there had been no Dominique awaiting when he arrived, only a handful of apologetic priests and a detachment of guards. Brother Simon wondered if she had betrayed his trust of her own initiative or been ordered to.

Oh, there'd never been any doubt that Dom's greater loyalty would be the Heavens and their House. That much had been made clear when they'd... parted ways many years year ago, after she'd refused the deeper courtship he sought. I will suffer none to rival Above in my affections, love, not even you, she'd said. He'd believed the friendship to have survive the end of their other tie, but this seemed to be a day of revelations. Simon drank a deeper sip than was strictly proper, wasting the vintage like some Callowan lout. It was the way of the Ebb and the Flow, he consoled himself. It seemed his vigilance as the First Prince's eye on House affairs had lapsed, for he'd glimpsed no hint of the conspiracy before it struck. The failure stung, more from the consequences of it than his wounded pride.

By now, he thought, that animal Balthazar would have seized Her Highness and a purge of her loyalists would be taking place. None, and the Lycaonese least of all, could be counted on to take the deposition of a Hasenbach withy anything remotely like placidity. The Holies would have sent for the current sitters of the Highest Assembly before making their move, but the cautious among them would have delayed setting out. It might not matter: First Prince Cordelia's most ardent supporters were all on the northern fronts, leaving only assermentés to speak for them, and there were tricks of procedure to deal with those. If enough of the royalty in the city had turned conspirator, anyhow. An outright majority from the onset was laughably improbable, but even half a dozen princes would be enough for the fence-sitters to believe the conspirators had a chance. Especially with the Silver Letters and the House behind them, and the First Prince kept under watch until she could be formally deposed and perhaps even put to judgement.

Simon's ponderings were jarred astray when the door between the guards was opened, a woman in pale robes striding through. Age had been kind to Dominique of Blancbriand, tinting her hair more silver than grey and leaving her both straight-backed and lithe. Those grey-green eyes, though, ever smiling? They had not changed at all since he'd first gazed on them when they were both fifteen and Simon still believed his rightful name to be Simone. The lay brother drank again, for it would be a terrible faux pas to let the Principate begin its inevitable spiral into annihilation without being at least slightly drunk.

"Brother Simon," Sister Dominique greeted him.

Her smile was forced. For being sent here against her will, pretending she had not been the bait in the trap to catch him, or because she was being forced to civility by circumstance? He could not tell. It ought to be interesting to find out.

"Sister Dominique," he replied, setting down his cup to daintily wipe his lips with the attendant silk cloth. "I am sad to say you've missed the quail."

She looked mildly taken aback. At his lack of open resentment, perhaps? He nearly sniffed in disapproval. If that were the case, she had spent too long speaking with House firebrands. Even if a lay brother, Simon was an Alamans of proper birth. It was to be expected he would walk to even the gallows with a bon mot and splendid indifference, much less suffer a turn of the Ebb with grace.

"I already ate, though I thank you for the courtesy," Dominique said.

"Ah, but at least let me offer you a cup of wine," Simon gregariously said. "You there, with the sword."

As both guards bore such a weapon, there was some degree of confusion until the one to the left gestured at himself hesitantly.

"Indeed," the spymaster said, "do fetch a cup for Sister Dominique – and make it silver, by the Gods. This is a coup, not a Lycaonese debutante ball."

He did not bother to speak to the guard any further, knowing that in circumstances such as this one confidence was the key to being obeyed. He invited his old friend to sit across from him, smiling pleasantly as if he were host instead of prisoner. Poorly hiding her bemusement, Dominique sat.

"Why are you..." she began hesitantly.

"It is an Arlesite red," Simon told her, sounding surprised as he glanced at the bottle by his now-finished plate. "Copper would taint the bouquet."

It was not what she'd been speaking of, as they both knew, but that was the way to get to someone with the upper hand talking: confusion and blithe refusal to acknowledge they had anything of the sort. Simon's fascinating summer as a young man with a Lantern lodge in Tartessos had taught him that a gentleman could get away with nearly anything, given sufficient audacity and an amicable bearing.

"You seem in a congenial mood," Dominique ventured.

Simon smiled and from the corner of his eye saw the guard returning with a silver goblet in hand. The man hesitantly set it on the table, as if he did not know quite how it should be done, and after an awkward half-bow made as if to leave. The lay brother restrained him with a gesture and let out the faintest hint of a sigh.

"My good man," he said, "Sister Dominique is one of the Holies. Do you intend to make her pour her own wine?"

The guard looked vaguely panicked for a moment, before venturing a no touched by a heavy Tolesian accent. Ah, as he'd thought. Most definitely one of those trusted sword arms from Arlesite lands, likely even a lay brother himself. Proper vows taken would naturally forbid violence, save if given exemption by holy tribunal, but these had only rarely been granted since the Liturgical Wars. The man clumsily poured wine for his old friend, who protested it was unnecessary all the while. The guard looked deeply relieved when Simon dismissed him, further marking himself as a figure of authority.

"I had feared you might be distressed," Dominique cautiously said, after taking a polite sip from her cup.

"Aggrieved, perhaps," Simon conceded. "These cloak and dagger theatrics are rather unseemly for servants of the Heavens, though I can understand the necessities involved."

Something like relief touched her grey-green eyes, and that burned Simon more than all the rest. For it meant she did care for him, after all, at least a little. Yet she'd gone through with it anyway. It would have been better if she were only using their old closeness, he thought. Cleaner.

"I argued for your involvement, Simon, I truly did," Dominique told him. "I told them that your silence was out of hopelessness, not malfeasance. They might even have listened, had Serigny not argued so strenuously that you were Hasenbach's creature body and soul."

"Of course he did, the brute," the diplomat sighed. "His value would have lessened if you had another among you with close access to her."

Gaze careful as he spoke, he found no hint of a hesitation before she nodded in acknowledgement. Good. Balthazar the Bastard's involvement had been a given, since such a great plot could hardly have taken place in Salia without the notice of the Silver Letters, but it was heartening to learn even by implication that the Circle of Thorns was not involved. Louis de Sartrons had no part of this... spasm of lunacy.

"The Silver Letters were too valuable to antagonize by insisting," Dominique told him, faintly apologetic. "And there were fears he might turn on us if he felt the cause to be in too frail a state."

Now, it was most unlikely either the Holies or a creature as leery as Serigny would have put treason to act without a patron of sufficient influence. There were only so many of these in Procer, these days, and among those one stood out above all others: Princess Rozala Malanza of Aequitan. She hardly seemed the kind of woman to try her hand at such an affair, but then the most successful of ambitions were often the most skillfully hidden. A prod was in order to see what might yet come tumbling out.

"I imagine he pressed Princess Malanza for a pardon before committing to anything," Simon idly said. "I've never known the Bastard to have faith in anything but favours rendered."

Dominique looked at him amusedly, nursing her cup.

"Clever Simon," she said. "Fishing for answers, are we?"

Ah, and yet she did not deny. That was telling, for all she had not outright told.

"I imagine I shall have to resign my position in the Holy Society, after her election," he mused. "A poor way to end my tenure, but retirement would not be such a terrible thing at my age."

"It might not have to be so," Dominique said.

He made his eyes widen in surprise and leaned forward when she invited him to do so.

"We have been corresponding with her for months," she murmured, "and she's expressed very devout sentiments. There was talk of restoring the House's ancient seat in the Highest Assembly, Simon. Not even after the Liturgical Wars was that seriously spoken of, but with the Hidden Horror warring on us Malanza says the Heavens must be brought to the fore once more."

To Simon's knowledge Rozala Malanza was no more devout than most Proceran royalty – that was to say, she had Salienta's tongue and Bastien's hand – though he rather doubted the Holies had been suddenly convinced of her deep and abiding respect for the House of Light. Of her deep and abiding desire for overthrowing the woman who'd made her mother drink poison, however? That they'd believe, and perhaps simple base hunger for power as well. And in such dark times, well, why would Princess Malanza not restore the House's long-abolished seat in the Assembly? It was only natural to pay stronger heed to the light of Above when the night grew long. That such a seat would bring the influence of the Holies to heights not seen since the fresh first days of the Assembly must not have weighed on the scales at all, surely.

Brother Simon de Gorgeault had spent most his life serving as a bridge between the royalty of Procer and its priesthood, finding loyalty belonging to neither but instead to a higher calling: peace. He had served, willing, for he saw in the Holy Society a function that would prevent the coming of another three Liturgical Wars. Pride in robes and crowns was an unfortunately common affliction, and a company of men and women with a foot on both shores went a long way in smoothing away conflicts that might otherwise have grown into harsher things. Yet the truth was that Simon had oft leaned more strongly towards the House, as for all its many flaws it served Good more genuinely than any other institution on Calernia. Princes and princesses, even the finest among them, so often chased venality and power at the expense of those they were meant to be the just stewards of.

It was a bitter thing, to be faced with the truth that the House of Light could be just as grasping.

"It would be a grand thing," Simon breathed out in wonder.

Dominique leaned back, smiling contentedly.

"The seat could not be yours, naturally," she told him. "Yet you might say I am the foremost candidate for it, and should election confirm me I would find great comfort in the keeping of an advisor knowledgeable in such matters."

Not the most subtle of offers, though it did have the benefit of both plausibility and political significance.

"I would be honoured," the lay brother smilingly lied.

They both sipped at their wine.

"It will be different, under First Princess Rozala," Sister Dominique casually told him. "There'll be no more of Hasenbach's heresies and tyranny. Gods, the gall of that woman. She might as well have declared herself queen, stacking the Assembly with her lickspittles and those she bullied into submission. And for what? To make peace with the Arch-heretic if the East and her helper the Carrion Lord."

"No mortal ruler can overturn the decision of a conclave," Simon agreed.

In truth he'd wrestled with the First Prince's decision himself, in private. That Cordelia Hasenbach had grown increasingly ironhanded could not be denied, though he'd always reminded himself that every method she had used to strengthen her influence was legal and with recorded precedent. The peace talks with the Black Queen and the Carrion Lord had been... hard to swallow. Both were infamous Damned who had wrought great suffering on the Principate, and the Queen of Callow in particular had been declared Arch-heretic of the East by a greater conclave. Bargaining with such a monster was to stray from the path the Gods Above had set for their children, undeniably, yet what else was there to be done?

Would the Gods truly prefer the destruction of Procer and all its people to making peace with one of the Damned? Simon could not believe it so. Such a thought reminded him too much of the light gone cold in the eyes of some of the older priests, those who spoke of shepherding needing the stick as well as the kindness and how sparing one was straying from the will of the Gods. There was valour, there was virtue even, in refusing to compromise with Evil even in the face of death. In holding principles above life. Yet Simon de Gorgeault could find no Good in sending millions to their death when it need not be so. It was a poor shepherd that let wolves take the entire flock.

"And this talk of sending priests to the north as if they were soldiers, this demanding the House's belongings as if they were hers to dispose of," Dominique continued, tone genuinely angry. "Did you know there are no House holdings in Lycaonese principalities, Simon? All lands belong to the princes and even chapels must pay rent as if they were tenant farmers. That is what Cordelia Hasenbach sought, mark my words. It had to be done."

"It must have been a difficult decision," he said, sounding sympathetic.

Her goblet was mostly empty by now, and he poured it full anew without her taking much notice. She'd always been a lightweight.

"Of course not," she replied. "The will of the Heavens was clear. A choice made in clarity is hardly a choice at all."

"I can only imagine," the silver-haired man said.

"There will be no need to stretch your spirit for such," Dominique teased suddenly leaning forward. "I had expected this to be difficult, Simon, but I did your faith disservice. In truth I came to make request of you, before your pleasant hospitality distracted me."

"Anything, for you," Simon smiled.

"The Holy Society's eyes in the city are needed," Sister Dominique told him. "And they will not acquiesce to lending aid without your word."

"What shall we seek?" he asked.

"Serigny botched the work," his old friend said with open aversion. "Hasenbach tricked some of the palace garrison into protecting her and escaped into the city with a handful of soldiers. We need to know with whom she took refuge, but her lackeys have barred their manses to all priesthood. Your fellows, though, will not find all such doors closed to them."

It was a labour not to close his eyes and breathe out. Oh, Gods grant you allmercy. They'd lost the First Prince. Even if it was truly Rozala Malanza who'd been trading letters with the conspirators all this time then their pardons were now no better than scrap parchment. Nothing less than civil war would topple Cordelia Hasenbach if she was not a kept prisoner, and that left them as the fools who'd tried to execute a coup mere days before foreign armies arrived. If they did not find the First Prince soon, everyone involved in this was as good as dead. Her Highness was no Alamans or Arlesite, to hesitate at chastising priests: she'd hang them all without batting an eye. Serigny, at least, would know that well. And he would not be afraid of turning to great bloodshed if he felt cornered. Something needed to be done.

"Of course," Simon agreed. "I shall need ink and quill."

"I'll have them brought," Dominique smiled.

"Simpler to walk to a scrivener's desk, I would think," he amusedly said. "It would be unseemly to send guards back and forth like fetching boys."

"I suppose," Sister Dominique chuckled. "You'll need to write quite a few letters, besides."

They rose, and to steel himself Simon drained the last of his cup. He gallantly offered up his arm for his old friend to take and they made for the end of the hall unhurriedly.

"There are some who will need to speak with me in person," Simon said, sounding pensive. "So it is plain I am not being coerced, you see. Still, given the... ruckus outside an escort would not go amiss."

"I will send for guards from the cathedral," she assured him. "Though I'll need to sit in on such councils, you understand. The Holies would not agree otherwise."

"It is only natural," Simon dismissed. "I am not yet trusted."

Dominique patted his arm approvingly, like one would a dear friend. Or a pet.

"You have always been blessed with an understanding nature, Simon," she said. "It is one of your greater virtues."

He made himself look pleased.

"I shall blush if you continue in this vein," he warned.

A discreet glance ahead told him the guards were only half paying attention to them as they approached. The timing, he thought, would be of some importance.

"Did I ever tell you of the summer I spent in Tartessos?" Simon smiled.

"With the Lanterns?" Dominique said. "Little, in truth."

She did not sound particularly regretful of that.

"They must have some wisdom to their teachings, I suppose," she conceded.

I remember when you were hungry, Simon thought. When you burned with a need to read every book, speak with every stranger from a faraway place. When your eyes grew dark for the late nights and you were furious of your body needing to sleep at all. I remember how beautiful the flame that moved you was, Dominique, and I mourn that woman for you are only what's left of her. Was this what happened, he wondered, when you began to believe there were no more answers left to seek?

"They refused to humour me before I ventured with a band into the Brocelian," Simon said, almost nostalgic. "It was a rather fascinating experience. I met this woman, you see, by the name of Elvera. And she knew a remarkable trick."

"Did she," Sister Dominique patiently smiled.

"Oh yes," Brother Simon smiled back, gently extricating his arm just as they passed the guards.

This would be his seventy-fourth winter, and it had been much too long since he'd undertaken strenuous exercise. Yet for all that his limbs no longer had the limberness of his youth, utter surprise had wings of its own. His fingers smoothly drew the sword of the guard to his left and he pivoted slightly, ramming the pommel in the other guard's face. Another pivot and he thrust the point of the sword backwards into the first guard's throat. Dominique yelled out in surprise, the other guard rocked back in pain and surprise as Simon ripped free the sword only to cut into the back of the survivor's neck. Messy blow, the lay brothed judged. A killing one, but the death would be more painful than if he'd cut deeper. He left the sword in the corpse and both dropped a heartbeat later. Ah, but the bloodspray had rather marred his robes it seemed.

"It does work better with an axe," the silver-haired man noted. "She was quite right about that."

"You madman," Sister Dominique hissed. "What are you-"

"You were correct," Simon pleasantly said. "A choice made in clarity is hardly a choice at all."

Best to make a run for it, Simon de Gorgeault mused as a woman he'd once loved cursed him loudly. Though she'd let it slip that there were so few guards here an escort would require more to be sent for from as far as the cathedral, it was unlikely there would only be two.

Time to see if these old bones still remembered how to run in the face of certain death.

NZPIEFACE

I'm wondering what the title has to do with the titles of the other interludes.

I know it's not the same character, but I thought it was at first.

I was going Iron to bind, Rope to kill, Candles to torture? Dunno what it means though now. Anyone know of any religious uses of candles?

sivarajan

Excommunication by "bell, book, and candle."

j

I met this woman, you see, by the name of Elvera. And she knew a remarkable trick:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Aston Whiteman

And the trick is...?

Stable

First you vote left. Then you vote right, straight in his face. Then you go left again and vote his head right off!

vexingvision

You won't believe trick #4!

tkjarrah

...it's fucking clue

tkjarrah

Wait huh my version of clue as a kid had an old-fashioned solid clothes-iron as one of the weapons but apparently that's not standard Rope and candle(stick) still work though

mavant

I remember a candlestick as well.
From this I infer that you also come from the timeline where it's Berenstain Bears, and Nelson Mandela lived to a ripe old age.

tkjarrah

oh no candlestick is standard but we had like an iron but apparently there's never been an iron so im just losing my mind

bdvlad

There's an iron among the pieces in Monopoly sets. Maybe yours was a transplant from one of those?

mavant

That is an exceedingly sane explanation, thank you.

weakman54

Can't a pipe be called an "iron"? I'm pretty sure I've heard that being used.

(also, according to wikipedia, in the early versions the lead pipe was apparently made out of actual lead =S)

Andrew Mitchell

Can confirm that's the case. I also used to melt lead and use molds to create lead weights for my fishing lines.

Akuabestgurl

Nelson Mandela got out of prison when he was 72.

I remember because I was upset. That fucker tortured people.

He shoulda died there.

EgoDucky

Nelson Mandela? The... South African humanitarian activist, you mean?

goliath1303

... Nelson Mandela died at 95. What do you consider a ripe old age of not that?

The Mandela Effect is named after the exact opposite. A lady remembered him dying in prison in the '80's. She created a website about this memory, which is where the term Mandela Effect comes from.

Andrew Mitchell

Mine had a lead pipe, but no iron.

I think your clothes-iron may have come from Monopoly because we had a set with one of those.

ninegardens

Okay- what rooms have they been in so far?

tkjarrah

oh i was remembering the game piece from monopoly as a weapon in clue lol

Shveiran

My bet is it's not a religious symbol, but one about a complex timed contraption.

You know, the kind where you have a lit candle, that consumes itself until the flame is low enough to burn a rope, which snaps and allows a weight to fall to do something else.

Just a hunch.

Sun Dog

Yes. A candle provides light and holds back the darkness. A candle can also be lit as a prayer, or in remembrance for the dead.

greatwyrmgold

I thought the iron/rope thing was a reference to an analogy someone made when discussing rulership. "Iron makes a bad rope," someone said that about harsh ruling methods (or maybe the Praesi philosophy?). The two chapters showed Hasenbach using both iron and rope, standing firm and discarding her dignity in turn as needed to keep things going.

Cicero

Well, candles are associated with both light and prayer. Considering this takes place in the House of Light I'd imagine that the reference is to prayer.

stevenneiman

"Iron sharpens iron", "enough rope to hang themselves", "Couldn't hold a candle to..." was my thought. I might be completely off-base, but that's my thinking. A popular theory seems to be that Iron was the start of a scheme that Bard aided or at least allowed in order to "sharpen" Cordelia. In Rope, Cordelia allowed the people she realized were traitors to set themselves up so that she could damn them in the opinion of enough soldiers to protect her. Here Simon shows that he thinks that he thinks that Rozala doesn't hold a candle to Cordelia.

sivarajan

I found this fanart a few hours ago: i.redd.it/stlr3upph9d31.jpg (First Under the Night – Antti Hakosaari), and since the "Art and Maps" page hasn't been updated in years ...

danh3107

You know that picture really puts into perspective for me how biblical some of cat's themes are.

Darkening

Wow, that's quite a picture. Always love to see fanart of this story, That's a pretty cool look for Cat lol.

Liliet

There is a lot of fanart (including links to fanart posted on reddit) on the discord server. Come look!

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

MagnaMalusLupus

While I do enjoy some good fan art, this one has some things that bother me.

- 1) Since when did Cat start wearing a skirt? 2) In that scene she's described as "smiling savagely"
- 3) I find the distinct lack of Robber in that picture to be deeply offensive. He would never miss an opportunity to photo-bomb, if such things existed then.

weakman54

I believe the "skirt" is her Aketon, which is the padded layer worn under armor. Though on a closer inspection it looks more like it's part of the leather coat she's wearing, so just a long coat in that case I guess. I'd guess there was some artistic liberties taken =P

weakman54

Oh, wow, on even closer inspection you are right, actually, it doesn't open up at the bottom, which would make it a skirt probably (or a leather dress perhaps?)

Vortex

Historically, pretty much every medieval knight wore a skirt. Mail and plate trousers are super expensive and thoroughly impractical besides. They will restrict leg movement, require you to customize them to every individual's measurements, and are way harder to craft with any sort of wearability.

MagnaMalusLupus

First of all, she's not wearing plate in that picture, nor at that point in the story. Second, plate armor in general had to be crafted to fit the individual, so not much of a point to be worth mentioning really. Third, Cat explicitly wore full plate (with greaves presumably, as full plate implies, though I'm not going to look for specific mentions). Fourth, Cat explicitly does wear trousers, but I don't know of a single instance where she wears a skirt post orphanage.

Liliet

There are also a lot of problems with composition, and Cat is not backlit by the fire that's supposedly going on behind her back.

Fayhem

4) Cat isn't white lol. But fanly nitpicking notwithstanding I like the art and I'd love to see the artist continue to work in the Guideverse (assuming they haven't already?).

MagnaMalusLupus

I actually did some digging, and cannot find mention of what color her skin is, besides it being darker (likely being Deoraithe, who are described as medium-dark skin) than the typically fair complexion of Callow. This depiction has her as a darker shade than one typically associates with white. Generally seems appropriate.

Fayhem

I just did a close zoom on the face in that pic and idk what you're talking about with "a darker shade than one typically associates with white". That's literally exactly the shade I would typically associate with white lol. I mean that's not even white-with-a-tan, that's just white-but-not-Irish.

greatwyrmgold

I thought Callowans (and Duni, for that matter) were light-skinned? At least compared to the Praesi? (Presumably because it's the Standard Fantasy Thing To Do, and because the author was confident enough in their ability to separate Evil from evil that they felt comfortable having the most prominent Evil people in their setting be non-white.)

Liliet

Cat is half-Deoraithe, which is an ethnicity based on IRL Native American tribes.

Fayhem

Callowans are, yeah. But the Deoraithe, despite their confusingly Irish names, are apparently ethnically more like Native Americans. And Cat is half-Deoraithe. And mixed-race people usually get considered "non-white". Thus, I wouldn't say Cat was white.

Shveiran

aaand hello new desktop

ftaku

I like him 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

I was sure that Rozala had nothing to do with the coup, it seems I am wrong except if Dominique is lying. If not, my respect for Rozala is diminished.

agumentic

Obviously, the letters conspirators believe come from Rozala do indeed come from her, and not from some other person rather connected to writing.

Faiir

I mean, why would you think otherwise?
It's not like anyone else has anything to gain by creating chaos in Procer.

Mental Mouse

Sarcasm markers not found. 😊But yeah, a man-in-the-middle attack would be easy for Scribe, what with Rozala waytheheck out in the field.

RogueTurnip

My guess would be Malicia, she has been known to cause issues for Procer's stability

MagnaMalusLupus

Scribe.

Someguy

Rozala sucks at the Ebb & Flow. It's probably some idiots in her "faction" doing shit in her name, the same ones who thought themselves clever "secretly" selling information to Kairos.

M0och123

Scribe...

NZPIEFACE

Imagine if they succeeded.

>comes back from long campaign where you lost >tfw first prince after successful coup which you didnt plan

konstantinvoncarstein

See her face would be hilarious. I hope Amadeus will be able to clear Rozala 's name.

RoflCat

Now imagine their faces when her first order is for negotiation with the Arch-heretic of the East AND the Carrion Lord.

Also the Grey Pilgrim approving of it.

greatwyrmgold

"Hooray! Now that we've deposed the wicked First Prince Cordelia, we can stop treating with these horrible eastern villains!"

"Actually, we're going to form an alliance with them."

"...So, who's the next most eligible prince after Rozala?"

IDKWhoitis

>tfw you are killed in counter-coup in response to coup you didn't plan

>Brutal_civil_war.jpg

Parker

I think it was the Scribe actually, not Rozala sending those letters

Decius

Assassin, pretending to be Scribe. The target was Guard #2.

Darkening

Well, using an entire coup and their prisoners as a weapon to kill some random guard in their building would be in character for Assassin.

Bryce

Its Scribe sending the letters you fool

WuseMajor

Who?

greatwyrmgold

Imp.

Ross

I don't think it was Rozala. From what we've seen in her viewpoint interludes, it seems like she recognizes that allying with Catherine is necessary for the fight against the Dead King, and that's definitely not the feeling we get from the House of Light here.

I think it was someone who is trying to undermine the House of Light. Pretending to be Rozala would be a clever ploy. Think about how Rozala would respond when she got to Salia and found that the House of Light had committed treason. It would look like they had decided to start a coup on their own, and it wouldn't be smart for a new ruler to pardon the people who just overthrew her predecessor. At this point I think that many of the leaders in Procer's House of Light are likely to end up hanged, whether they capture Cordelia or not.

Death Knight

They're lucky Saint is dead. That woman would have massacred every soldier Cordelia sent.

Liliet

If Saint had survived Third Llesse, she likely would have stayed in Pilgrim's faction, which very much supports Cordelia.

hakureireimu

Saint was the one who pushed the Arch Heretic thing so that Cordy couldn't make peace with Cat...

Liliet

Yeah, but she was somewhere along the process of recognizing Pilgrim's point on allying with Catherine, and we will now never know how far she could have come.

greatwyrmgold

On the other hand, Cordelia supports allying with Catherine, who is the thing Saint disagreed with Pilgrim on most strongly.

Valkyria

I think it's not her either. I just don't see it. IMO it's Scribes plan, setting the Holies against Cordelia and Cordelia against Rozala.

No matter what result, the city and country are in uproar and lost to confusion.

Tohron

Given the interludes from Rozala's perspective, I get the feeling that the House of Light was unwittingly corresponding with agents of the Dead King.

konstantinvoncarstein

Scribe is more likely.

Hakurei06

isn't scribe in salia? it's probably her

Javvies

Yeah. Cordelia's not going to go easy on anyone she can prove or even suspects was involved in this nonsense. And since she got away ... yeah, it's doomed to failure. At best, the situation is contained to effectively civil war within Salia ... but I expect this to get worse before it gets better.

Huh.

Presumably forged messages certainly suggests Scribe has had some measure of involvement.

On the other hand ... there's no way something like this could be organized quickly, even without taking into account the need for correspondence and message transit times. And this is quite clearly something that's been being planned, organized, and otherwise in the works for quite some time ... which means it is the sort of thing Augur should have been able to detect earlier in the process, as far as we know, anyways.

I still think Bard has greased the skids for this to happen. In the background, if not openly amongst the House of Light.

Skaddix

Also are you really committing to a coup without sending at least one of the Holies to treat with Rozala in person. Now its possible this one is the one on Bard or Scribe's payroll but I find it impossible to believe it was all letters and no face to face.

Shequi

Unless of course Scribe also has someone with her who is known to be able to take on the appearance of other people with flawless impersonations.

Where is Assassin at the moment?

Javvies

Last known location for Assassin was Ashur.

Which has since been blockaded by the League.

Darkening

I feel like trying to contain a Named with a blockade, especially a named specializing in stealth and bypassing security is fairly doomed to failure. Would probably take a bit to get out though, so I expect Assassin probably isn't in Salia. Hard to say where they're going without knowing more about their motivations and loyalties in regards to Black/Malicia.

Javvies

Were it a blockade on the ground, Assassin would probably barely even notice it was there. It certainly wouldn't stop him from moving through it as though it weren't actually there.

However, since Ashur is an island ... boats/ships (and their crews) are somewhat more difficult to conceal or disguise than a single person.

Also, as far as I know, the Leagur blockade of Ashur isn't specifically targeted at keeping Assassin on the island. That's probably just a happy side effect as far as the League is concerned. Assuming that they even realized Assassin was in Ashur in the first place.

shieldredblog

It would take Assassin twenty minutes to become the captain of a ship, another twenty to be in charge of the blockade.

Javvies

He'd have to get to the blockading ships first.

And then we're back to "it's easier to conceal a single person than a boat/ship (and crew)".

shieldredblog

Nicae wont be sinking the ships at a distance. They already won the fleet battle, now they will be taking prizes. All he has to do is be on a ship when they board it.

Heck, he could pretend to be adrift in a lifeboat and they would still check it out.

Fayhem

Worth noting that Assassin has died on-camera and hardly been fazed by it. If he's got a respawn ability (as seems very likely) we currently have literally no information on the nature of it or of any restrictions. For all we know he can get around the no-teleportation-possible nature of the Guideverse by just deliberately dying and respawning somewhere more convenient.

Do0d

Maybe he just likes to use meat puppets like Malicia does

Shveiran

I'm not saying a blockade would be an insormountable obstacle for Assassin, but Names mostly solve problems within their domains, and Assassin's doesn't cover travel.

Ashur is a long way off, and a blockade would make it ahrder for him to move around quickly. stuck? No, of course not, but hindered? Slowed down enough that him being in Salia is very unlikely? I'd say yes. Keep in mind, Assassin had no real reason to come to Salia months ago -as the First prince didn't seem a viable target- and that I'd say is a realistic estimate of the voyage he'd need to take.

Javvies

Face to face or a direct scrying link.
Preferably a face to face.

Though ... I suspect the intermediary used would not have been one of the higher ranking Holies – it would've needed to be somebody whose disappearance would not have been noticed. Bard would have been an excellent "intermediary" from the House of Light's perspective, if not Scribe's.

Although, I suppose it's possible that there could have been a fake intermediary with letters of introduction claiming to be from Rozala.

Do0d

Isn't sorcery rather hated by the House in Procer ?
Would the Holies really use such heretical means of communication ?

And they seem to be self-important enough that I doubt they'd travel to meet a mere princess when they make the First Prince go to them with the whole humiliating ritual.

laguz24

Yeah, that is the one thing I don't get. These people have some general idea of how dangerous things are. I expected that they might try this after the dead king has been beaten back. But trying a coup when the worst monster on calernia is currently devouring procer, boneheaded move. Also, I would like to see cats and especially tyrant's reaction to her hanging the priests.

'Ladi Williams

The fact that Cordelia was going to send priests to the front lines like common soldiers was what made them rebel...I think?

Every other thing they could have stomached till the war with DK was over. But that order would have threatened not just their livelihood but their very lives.

And every one knows the lives of the priests and holies are invaluable in the fight against the gods below while the soldiers lives can be spared.

Darkening

Yeah, really, since the Holies are so much more important then the common soldiers, they should really start leeching lifespan from the commoners, because if they live forever they can do so much more to guide and serve their lessers, don't you see!

Liliet

LMAO

Fayhem

All hail the Tenets of Light!

Mental Mouse

Given the tech level, I find it entirely believable, and while I'm not equipped to provide historical examples, I'd bet there have been such in our world. (Remember, Rozala's conference with Cordelia was the first she'd heard of scrying being able to make that link since being shut down.)

Even in modern times, I've heard of courtships by paper letter (including a notable still-living pair of science-fiction editors).

Shveiran

I'm not sure if Bard, or Scribe, or Malicia, or the Dead King or all are involved, but yeah, this doesn't make sense without someone else is involved. The Augur is the most glaring part that is kind of iffy.

Cordelia said it had been a few days since she spoke with the Augur, and this whole thing doesn't seem like it could be mounted within that time frame. Just to implicate Rozala, you'd need a long correspondence which, fake or not, would need to play out at the normal pace not to arise suspicions.

Oshi

If the Augur wasn't the Augur. I've got a suspicion that Scribe took the opportunity to get to her and remove her (kidnap).

Javvies

No way in hell that works.

This is the Augur. She'd be aware of any plans to get to her.

And I don't see her security being anywhere near light enough that you could get to her without a good plan. And no way in hell that you could get to her quietly.

The only person who could conceivably get to Augur, IMO, is Bard.

WuseMajor

...What if Augur is behind this?

Regardless, I don't see Rosy planning something that would go off now. She's too good of a general and too afraid of the Dead King to want to compromise the war like this.

I also think Rosy is likely to become the "Good Queen" who defeats "Cordy the Tyrant" but that story is only likely to happen after Rosy defeats the Dead King and demonstrates her Hero chops, so the timing on this is all wrong.

Javvies

Augur is a Hero and actually likes her cousin Cordelia. I see no reason to think that Augur would have turned on Cordelia at any point, far less without at least trying to get Cordelia to change course.

However, I would buy that Bard is leaning on Augur or is otherwise capable of scrambling Augur's abilities.

And yeah, I don't buy that Rozala is actually involved in this either.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure currently Cordelia is following Augur's detailed micromanaged PtV. If Agnes Hasenbach wants to impact Proceran politics, all she has to do is tell her cousin what to do.

Andrew Mitchell

PtV? (Google failed me.)

Javvies

Path to Victory
I think.

Andrew Mitchell

Makes sense. Thank you!

Faiir

Beautiful chapter.

Hellspirit

I'm voting Scribe, definitely her.

Faiir

Thank you for voting Scribe for Procer 2019!
Spread the word!

Mental Mouse

... and your young son is doing quite well at his summer retreat, with no injuries at all... 😊

My very own name

Calernia as a whole has a way with badass people in charge. Last chapter had Cordelia "It's treason then" Hasenbach, now we have one of her spymasters, who is 74 years old, escaping from prison while being a really good politician, but also by using sword skills he learned from a Dominion captain. I'm really looking forward to the resolution of this plot.

Mental Mouse

Oh yeah, they seriously underestimated Brother Simon. Do they even know about his cabal within the House?

Liliet

What do you mean? Who?

His leadership of the Holy Society is the entire reason he was arrested in the first place?

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Welp, Alamans are now my favorite people.

Darkening

I can't remember, is that prince that stayed to fight the Lycaonese an Alamans or an Arlesite? Hm. But yeah, gotta respect the old man killing his way out of prison for loyalty to his liege.

Liliet

Frederic Goethel, Alamans I believe

superkeaton

Props, Simon. Still, civil war and all that, better make haste.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Hmm.. I will say Dom is a screw up. If this coup doesn't have the support of Augur that really should have been a hint that Above wasn't on their side. If the coup does have the support of Augur they don't need Simon's help to find the big C. Either way, trying to get his help was mistake one.

The second mistake was not just trapping him in a couple fences of Light. Or perhaps she didn't have enough Light to even do that? Either way, mistake.

mavant

It's not totally clear to me that high rank in the church translates directly to facility with performing miracles. One could easily imagine the reverse. Or... If high rank is granted on the basis of either political acumen or particular holiness, and these two things are independently distributed, then we should expect them to be anticorrelated in the high ranks. I forget the name of that effect in statistics.

mavant

Berkson's paradox, I think. Found by looking up Simpson's paradox and then looking for the related links section...

sengachi

Oh wow that's really interesting, thank you for mentioning it.

Mental Mouse

Also, they may not have had the nerve to wield Light against a fellow brother, even a lay brother. We, as readers of the tale, can be fairly confident that normally Light powers are simply granted, and their use left to mortal judgement.

The priests of the HoL will necessarily be a lot less sure of that, because there has to be major-league social control surrounding any use of the Light. Including but not limited to the oaths we've heard mention of.

Mental Mouse

Sister Dominique may have screwed up, but that doesn't mean she's "a screw-up". Remember, she was matching wits with an experienced spymaster who had had plenty of time to think things through. The next question is what he does with her.... My bet is just tying her in a closet for a delay (and to protect her against accusations of betraying the rebellion).

Shveiran

Agreed, although she did seem far less competent than him. He... didn't really have to try that hard to play her.

Mental Mouse

Basically, she didn't seem like a "player", while he certainly is.

Agent J

Cordelia is the Augur's cousin. Chosen or not, trying to tie her to a plot to overthrow perhaps the only person she cares about to any meaningful distinction would be a mind bogglingly stupid decision.

As for fencing him in, it wasn't needed before Dom let him get the drop on their guards. Her mistake was visiting him at all.

WuseMajor

Well she wouldn't have, except that 1) they needed his information network, 2) she thought he was ultimately loyal to the church, and 3) he was an old friend.

Mostly 1 though. The other two reasons were why she thought he could be trusted.

mavant

What was that line about Simon believing his name was Simone, as a teen? Are we being hinted that he was AFAB or is this another "much of Procer is Francophone" thing?

mavant

No, confirmed Simone is a feminine name in French as well.
Which I should have known from the e ending.

theothin

Yeah, he's trans. It was alluded to in the chapter where he previously appeared, as well.

Shveiran

He is? Uh, that went over my head.

sengachi

Oh cool! Thanks for mentioning it, I kind of read this in a rush and skipped over that.

mavant

Oh yep, there it is. I guess I missed that last time around.

ninegardens

So... brother Simon is absolutely amazing- and I hope we see plenty more of him going forward.
So chill, so cunning.

Especially love the thought of "IF it was Rozalia sending the conspiracy letters"

SpeckofStardust

At this point I think that Cordelia and her side have no story route to villainy. (short of bard offering a deal from the below.)

Liliet

Yep lmao

...Except Lake Artoise and whatever's up with that. Might be bad enough to offset the rest of it, though I doubt it.

Mental Mouse

Eh... I don't think defending herself against a coup gets her out of potential villainy, especially when the coup is by the priesthood. Resisting the coup might even count as defiance against the will of Above's chosen servants.

SpeckofStardust

Look calling down an angle to strip people of free will to launch a suicidal attack on a target doesn't make you evil I highly doubt digging up an ancient thing to attack the literal 'Enemy' would either. Like the whole fact that she didn't start digging it up until after the dead king started attacking kinda makes it unlikely to narratively harm her short of being an idiot, and she neither is nor her close allies fall under that definition.

Mental Mouse

I'd say "being an idiot" likely is narrative disaster. William got a pass for Team Morality – I'm pretty sure an Angel can't be judged by Above – even Kairos's plan with Hierarch represents judgement by mortal powers.

And we still don't know what the lake-thing is. If it's an actual demon, all bets are off. (But then Cordelia definitely goes over to Below, only to get smacked down by the Practical contingent.) If it's "just" some lesser god or a random monster, things could get pretty interesting. Perhaps a missing patron god for Procer itself?

Liliet

There's a distinct 'heroic ruler with their valiant loyal servants vs corrupt pathetic priests led by the nose by a foreign power' narrative forming, and it ain't one where the House of Light is in the right.

konstantinvoncarstein

And the foreign power is Evil.

Liliet

Eh, the narrative gets less clear-cut there, since if you take a look at the foreign power you run face first into the whole Arch-Heretic debacle.

Liliet

Oh god I love this man so incredibly much

Faiir

You know, a few years ago I had this lovely little tryst with this warrior-nun.

There was this little trick she showed me a few times, it was so amusing!

It was a trick for
DECAPITATING YOUR ENEMIES IN A SINGLE HIT

Author Unknown

Clearly, the House of Light should leave the villainy to the Villians.

Liliet

-flashbacks to Vivienne roasting William-

erebus42

To be fair, it makes things a lot easier and more efficient when you don't have to pretend like you're doing the will of the heavens.

Hardric62

Okay, lead theory is that the Scribe is sowing chaos here... But I would add a caveat and a theory to that idea: If she is half as good as she is, she probably got herself a copy of these famous Accords... What if she had decided they rated 'decent idea, needs to be pushed forward', or Black managed to get her such a message? Because yes, the instability here is weakening Cordelia, but it is also so botched there is no way this move can succeed (and the absence of the Augur stresses that).

What if the point wasn't just weakening Cordelia's position, (direct consequence of coup and counter-coup), but also a move to remove people which would oppose to these Accords early in the game by making them overplay to early their hands, assuring they are out for the moment the real discussion begin and where they could have actually hurt the situation?

Liliet

I think this is very likely, with Scribe hastily sabotaging her own prepared coup to make it do the exact opposite of the original intent.

IDKWhoitis

She could have even arranged for those guards to be there underneath Cordy's window. And had a plan to run with whatever came out.

ninegardens

I... reckons that Scribe sabotaging her own plan is too optimistic by half.

We had the set up when Amadeus mentioned Scribe causing trouble of Cat being like "But you can just call her off, right?" and Amadeus being like "... maybe."

There's a conflict there. A Chekov's gun hung very explicitly over the mantel piece, and until our main characters interact with Scribe on screen, and explicitly talk her down (or defeat her), I'm going to assume Scribe is still on the rampage.

Shveiran

It's not impossible, but it does sound...uselessly risky if that is the point.

I mean, sure, Cordelia got out of it, but it's not like she has a history of surviving assassination attempts without an oracle intervention. She still found herself surrounded by assassins and an experienced spymaster, forced to injure herself and take a literal leap of faith on the loyalties of the assembled soldiers.

If this was part of a plot that wanted her to survive the scheme, I'd say shit got way out of hand. Sure, if that was the aim, it turned out ok; but these kind of crazy gambles were Catherine's beef, not Amadeus, and Scribe studied at his feet for decades.

Oshi

Unless the Augur was in on it and all Scribe had to do was ask.

Javvies

... Augur is a Hero and Scribe is a Villain, remember?

Also, Augur actually likes her cousin Cordelia.

I see no reason to think that Augur would have turned on her cousin, far less be actively and knowingly working with Scribe.

On the other hand, it's entirely possible that Augur would cooperate with Bard. Or that Bard is capable of scrambling Augur's precognitive abilities.

The most likely scenario that I see is that Scribe has something going on, but Bard has been doing some significant behind the scenes heavy lifting and prep work to allow Scribe's operation to succeed to at least some extent. And one of the things Bard has done is mess with Augur's ability to warn Cordelia about this.

erebus42

Well would you look at that, a reasonable Priest- well Lay brother at least. Granted he's surrounded by a bunch of dumbass fanatics but hey, credit where credit's due to Brother Simon.

Liliet

It's so cute when people attribute things to fanaticism that are pure undisguised greed for power and dislike of the idea of having to do actual work on the frontline.

An actual religious fanatic driven by actually wanting to follow the will of the Heavens would not be ignoring the Choir of Mercy's position on the topic, not House Insurgent's miracles.

Now those people, then I buy being religious fanatics. The House of Light in Procer? Its entire problem is that it's high key kind of not.

IDKWhoitis

Alright, so I'm going to entertain the thought that Scribe has certainly added jet fuel and gunpowder to this dumpster fire. All she did was take advantage of local unrest and dormant power structures, which never liked Cordy, but probably wouldn't have made a move without some prodding.

I find that there are 3 ways this shitshow goes by the time Cat arrives, either:

- the coup is over™, Cordy alive.

I find this layout ripe for a "things are already set in motion discussion" with Scribe. Possibly even Scribe get killed if she doesn't back down when/if Black tells her to stop (it's not a certainty either way)

- the coup is over, Cordy dead.

Rozala suddenly became a hell lot more important, but with so deeply in the red (bankrupt) in political capital. She is likely to be pretty useless in enforcing most things at least in the short term. She would also be putty in Black's and Cat's hands.

- the coup is still ongoing.

Anything really goes, because at this point Cat gets to choose who to negotiate with. She could "throw her support" to the side she wants to fail. I also find this outcome to be very prone to Bard intervention.

I'm personally rooting for the conspiracy, because we almost never get to see Scribe in action.

Liliet

I mean "the coup is still ongoing" is a glorious option bc Rozala gets a chance to go WHAT THE FUCK I HAD NO IDEA ABOUT ANY OF THIS publicly and sink the House of Light categorically while forging closer ties with Cordelia which would be wonderful.

IDKWhoitis

Cordy just as easily could use this as a pretext to purge Rozala too, effectively sniffing out all her opposition in one fell swoop.

Not very likely, but we'll have to wait to see what Cordy will have to go through to survive this Coup, which might make her less Forgiving™

John brokovsky

Ayyy, what an inconvenient chapter to catch up to...

First comment ever; I've been wanting to ask this since some time ago:

Its pretty obvious that Cat's endgame name will be Triumphant, right? Its been pretty obvious foreshadowing and build up since book 2, though its growing more in your face as of late.

Andrew Mitchell

There's a range of options and it's actually difficult to say who will be THE big bad. OK, IMO there are three possible big-bads and here's the chances I currently rate them at:

1. Dead King 35% (obvious and clear option; he will be dealt with but unlikely to be THE big-bad)
2. Wandering Bard 55% (she acts to keep the game going, but she MAY be trying to stop)
3. Triumphant 5% (hasn't been on-screen at all so I don't think she's it)

John brokovsky

Nono, I mean Triumphant will be Cat's Name. Her power up.

Shoddi

What if Kairos is behind this, instead of Scribe? It would be interesting to see if any of the missives to the conspirators pledged "eternal friendship".

Javvies

Kairos is full of hax and bullshit.
However ... I don't think he'd have had the opportunity to get the level of penetration in Salia to pull this off.

Also, there's still the problem of trying to get plans past Augur. Because he'd have to be using agents, plus the local Procerans would need plans too.

...

Wait, I just thought of something.
What if this kicked off by accident? I mean, what if most of people involved, instead of having and knowing a single plan, got issued a bunch of conditional if-then directives – to bypass or confuse Augur's precognition – but instead of things being intentionally activated by whomever was actually coordinating things (probably Scribe), some of the triggers were activated by accident/Bard, and they set everyone and everything else into motion not on schedule or otherwise before all the pieces were in the right places.

Mental Mouse

This world doesn't seem to have accidents like that – the course of events really is tied to stories and the actions of the "players". If a coup gets set off, it's by the will of someone or other, and there's not many candidates.

Mental Mouse

Extending that thought: There is one story in particular from our world that we have not seen in the Guide: "For want of a nail". Our world's version of that story doesn't have a human/esque agent... it's specifically an expression of "stuff goes wrong and failures cascade, but it's not actually any one person's fault". And so, I wouldn't expect it to show up in the Guideverse, unless and until somebody starts stealing horseshoe nails or the equivalent, for the purpose of triggering cascading failures. And even then, few besides possibly the Bard would be able to pull that one off.

Liliet

Do you really need any kind of level of penetration in Salia? The dynamite's already there, all you need is matches.

ninegardens

You probably don't NEED high levels of penetration.... but whoever did this has demonstrated high levels of it (Impersonating Rozalia while lettering high ranking priests, getting a spy master) on side, etc.

Captain Amazing

I hope Hasenbach flees the city and is forced to take refuge with Catherine. Not that I think it's a good idea, just that the political shenanigans would be hilarious. Malanza is apparently implicated in the plot after all, and the Pilgrim massacred an entire town. The story optics would be spectacularly horrible.

Mental Mouse

Apropos of nothing on this page, I just stumbled into rereading Ursula Vernon's webcomic Digger, and saw this bit from it (relayed back in plot-time by the comments, so I'm not sure where it shows up): "Evil is having reason, always, many and many... Is punishing world for not being...like in head. Is always reason. World should be different, is reason. Is only good is not having reason... Just is." (from Ed)

That world has a very different framework of good and evil... and yet, it feels to me that this does resonate even with the Guideverse characters. Or is it just that Guideverse folks tend to change the world by pounding it into shape?

ninegardens

I just wanted to say that you have excellent taste in webcomics.

The webcomic Digger is one of the most fantastic pieces of fiction on the internet.
(I also recommend <http://www.all-night-laundry.com/post/2>)

Mental Mouse

Ninegardens: Thanks: If I were to make a list of the Great Works I've encountered, the ones I'd recommend to basically everybody, Digger would be right up there with Sandman, The Leaves Of October (text novel, by Don Sakers), James Stoddard's High House duology, a selection of Pratchett's work, and ... well, this here Guide is a new applicant for the list.

Also, I just reached the page that quote came from: <http://diggercomic.com/blog/2007/11/09/digger-264/> .

GOD

i can not see the chapters.

Tragic news about the site moderator.
this is all i see on every chapter. what should i do?

Queen

Simon our trans king

Interlude: Harp

*"Second, beholden:
Candle to blind
And harp to still."*

– Second of the three so-called 'Mavian Entreaties

Les Horizons Lugubres was a tavern in the same sense that silk was cloth.

None could lay foot within its glass and stone gardens without first having been vouched for by three patrons, and though the hall's outside looked rather trivial its insides were a maze of shifting private alcoves: they changed with the sun and the moon, the season and the weather, so that no two hours spent there would be quite the same. The nature of the establishment had made it a favourite of the Circle of Thorns since decades before Louis of Satrons' tenure at the head of the league began, though it was under his stewardship that the Circle became the hidden proprietors of it. Tonight's surroundings were the work of a young woman from the principality of Orne, he'd been told, an artist who had once walked the fields of the Red Flowers Vales seeking inspiration. The influence was plain to the eye, though for all the provincial origins it was exquisite to the eye. Redwood tables and sculptures of coloured glass – angled so that the moon's shifting radiance and shadows would mimic the touch of wind on grass – were flanked by panes of green and grey painted in the Bourdonnier manner, with the occasional glinting metal thrown in pêle-mêle to hint at the armour of fallen knights and fantassins. It was all rather appropriate, given the reason the Circle was convening, and the tart Lange red the affair had been paired with by their sommelier lent the hasty proceedings a much-needed touch of civility.

After the last of them arrived and took a seat, being poured their glass by the colleague to their left rather than a servant according to one of the Circle's more practical traditions, Louis of Sartrons rose to his feet. His glass went up, matched by that of the other twelve men and women in the room, and he cleared his throat.

"To Procer, and Her Most Serene Highness," he toasted.

His words were politely echoed, and as one they drank before settling into their seats. Louis waited a few moments, tinted light casting red shadows like claws on his skeletal face, before addressing his peers.

"It would appear a coup is underway," the spymaster said. "As of now the involvement of the Holies of the House of Light and the Silver Letters under Balthazar Serigny have been confirmed. The extent of the conspiracy beyond this is unclear, though a degree of royal involvement is only to be expected."

At the other end of the table, the comfortably withered Antonie of Bientaillant rapped her knuckles against the table to signify a desire to address the table. Louis acceded to the request with a slight inclination of the head.

"My friends in city guard tell me the conspiracy claims to be acting on the behalf of Princess Rozala Malanza, though they have not made this widely known," Antonie said.

Bertrand de Gonfallond, sharp-eyed and younger than most in this room, rapped his knuckles but a moment later. Louis paused for a moment longer than necessary before allowing him to speak, an unspoken reminder that lack of courtesy to a fellow patron of the Circle had no excuse.

"Given the prominence of Balthazar Serigny within the coup," Bertrand said, "we must consider that this was made known to Antonie's friends on purpose. Balthazar has some knowledge of our laws, as you all know."

It was not impossible, Louis thought, or in truth even unlikely. The Circle of Thorns served no master but the Principate itself, that was its governing principle and foremost law. Not the First Prince, not the Highest Assembly and certainly not the House of Light. Given that the highest office in Procer was not hereditary, it had been understood by wise minds early in the nation's history that the Principate's spies abroad could be beholden to any one family or institution. The Circle must ever be above the fray of schemes within the bounds of Procer, intervening only when there was foreign involvement. If the Circle took sides in the Assembly's little squabbles, it risked endangering itself and therefore the Principate's eyes abroad. In truth that vaunted neutrality had been bent, on occasion, but never too far. Those who would have the ambition of playing throne-maker in the Assembly were weeded out early in their tenure with the Circle, long before reaching positions of true influence. Were these years of peace, or even less strenuous a war, an attempt to dethrone Cordelia Hasenbach by another princess would merit no debate. And it was undeniable that even in these... delicate times the only acceptable successor to the First Prince was Rozala Malanza, as no one else had the support or popularity to keep the Principate from falling apart.

Yet Procer had come upon the antechamber of the end times, and now the lines between the foreign and the domestic had blurred. It did not help that the Bastard might be behind what Antonie's people had learned, as their young colleague had noted. The head of the Silver Letters had learned too much for comfort of their laws and methods during the Great War, and he was in no way above using Princess Malanza's name as a shield to keep the Circle out of this affair until the dust had settled. To his left another knuckle rapped the table, Alejandra of Cuenera departing from her usual sullen silence to raise her voice.

"It matters not if Seregny attempts to trifle with us," she said, voice faintly accented. "It is not ours to decided whether Cordelia Hasenbach or Rozala Malanza will rule. It is ours to unearth whether the attempted transition of power is free of the Enemy's meddling."

There was a rippling murmur at the table at that, as much in consternation as approbation. Several knuckles rapped, though Louis chose that of Joachim of Essenrer – one of the elders among them, and the sole Lycaonese. The Circle had been careful that there should always be at least one from the northern principalities among them, though recruitment was oft difficult. They could not claim to speak to the interests of Procer without the rearguard of their empire having a voice at their table.

"It will be necessary to carve into the Silver Letters," Joachim said, voice oddly powerful for a man so old his skin looked paper-thin. "They are the weak link. The House will have everything of import in cloisters and basilicas, but the letter-openers brought in too many for every safehouse to truly be secure."

Louis hid his amused smirk at the dig at their opposition behind a sip of wine, as many others at the table. Letter-openers, Joachim had mocked them as, for the head of the Circle at the time of their rise to legal employ had mocked the thugs as a 'confederacy of letter-openers and cutpurses'. There were some who said the name of Silver Letters itself had come from the way their first founders had made much of their wealth opening the correspondence of the wealthy and powerful to extort coin by blackmail. The smirk faded along with the taste of the wine on his palate as Louis de Satrons digested the rest of his colleague had said. It was true but it would also carry consequences unless acted on properly.

"It appears I will have to be led astray by my personal loyalty to Her Highness," the head of the Circle of Thorns calmly said. "As is our way, I will depart early to allow you to write the denunciation without my presence."

He paused a moment. Louis supposed he should mayhaps be moved to say more, as if it proved that the Silver Letters or their fellow conspirators had not been induced by a foreign power this would be the last time he addressed the Circle as its leader. Perhaps at all. Yet he had never been particularly prone to such flights of fancy, in truth, and he had known everyone at this table for decades. Theirs was not a profession that allowed for sentiment, and he would not insult their common service to the Principate by looking back upon it with unnecessary nostalgia. Theirs was grim and often foul work, and those who carried it out oft came to grim and foul ends. They had all known that long before earning a seat at this table.

"You know of my endorsement for my successor," Louis said. "And for the seat my removal would leave empty. As for the rest..."

He rose to his feet once more and raised his glass.

"Let none lay hand on this land," Louis de Sartrons said.

Glass roses to match his, as one.

"Without bleeding for it," they replied, every last hard-eyed.

You will be as a circle of thorns set around Procer, their ancient founder Clément Merovins had charged, so that none may lay hand on this land without bleeding for it. If there was rot in the flesh, if the Enemy prowled Salia on this night, then they would rip it out root and stem.

—

Balthazar had not taken a seat at the table, instead leaning against the wall of the ornate Hall of Herons as he indulged himself by studying those seated.

He'd not known the full breadth of their plot, as was not unusual in such things, yet at this hour of truth the masks had come down when this council had brought out those who wished to form the heart of the coming reign. It was no small company, near a hundred to his count. His Silver Letters and the Holies had formed the heart of the conspiracy so he had known the involvement of near everyone of import, but now the rest of the lot had come slinking into the palace he'd taken for them to gather like maggots on a corpse he found the disparity of those involved to be somewhat troubling. That they'd run thin in matters princely was only to be expected, given that near every royal that remained in Procer was on one of the northern fronts, but a harvest of two was not so trifling a thing: Prince Arsene of Bayeux, one of Amadis' old hounds now trained to heed Malanza's hand, had been the easy mark.

He had much to gain from the Princess of Aquitan rising to higher office, as one of her inherited partisans. Princess Cotide of Aisne had been a surprise when he'd first learned of her, and even now she seemed highly uncomfortable in the company of the others. It was principle that'd turned her against Hasenbach, he gathered. The consolidation of the Highest Assembly into a tame thing had smacked to her of tyranny, and she'd approached the Holies for moral guidance and advice – only to be brought into the fold of the conspiracy instead. There were only two other royals in the city, Renato of Salamans and Ariel of Arans, neither of which had been judged safe enough to invite.

Prince Renato was one of Hasenbach's loyalists, now more than ever as a war against the League of Free Cities had miraculously spared his lands, and while Prince Ariel was more ambiguous in his allegiances he also had a great many soldiers marching on his lands through these 'Twilight Ways'. Both had only reluctantly accepted the summons to a session of the Highest Assembly, and immediately begun delaying on actually moving towards the physical assembly until their spies could have better notion of what was taking place. They'd learn little, Balthazar had seen to that. Between the bloody chaos in the streets of Salia and the mysterious deaths of the few captains and officials best known in the right circles to trade whispers for bribes the easiest ways to gather information had been neatly closed.

The true trouble with those two was that now that Hasenbach had made a fool of him and escaped his own damned hands it was quite possible she'd taken refuge in the manse of one of them. Both princes had refused entrance to both the city guard and the House of Light, Prince Renato's captain of the guard splitting open the head of an overly ambitious city watch officer without batting an eye. Those manses could be taken, the conspirators had the numbers for it, but it'd be hard fighting and neither of the royals part of the coup were willing to agree to it.

The precedent might be dangerous to their kind, after all.

A motion passed in the Highest Assembly could pry open those gates, most likely, but the masquerade there had to be played out first. For all that the conspiracy was currently lacking princes, with a little enthusiasm it could begin the work of making a few. There were candidates on hand, Hasenbach had seen to that when she'd begun her little trick with the restored Guillermont Decree – she'd had men and women of the right blood and birth to serve as successor-candidates for every principality left leaderless by the Princes' Graveyard. Much like how those who'd plotted to unseat the Lycaonese savage had enjoyed the very refreshments in this hall that Hasenbach had arranged for her own captains, these royal candidates would now be crowned and made the conspiracy's creatures instead of the First Prince's.

It would begin soon, for the summons to the Highest Assembly would soon have been sent a full bell ago and when that time was reached the sessions could begin even with the absent. A mere two votes would not be enough to pass anything, of course, but there the Holies had come of some use. While the crowned heads were away from Salia they had left behind assermentés, sworn surrogates who could vote in their stead. By oath these surrogates were to vote only by the will of their prince or princess, yet the House of Light had applied both fear and faith to good effect.

It was the will of the Heavens that certain measures be passed, and to vote even by oathbreaking was sinless. To refuse was to serve the Enemy, whose dark hands had touched the heart of Cordelia Hasenbach and corrupted her body and soul. Those priests could not convince Balthazar had seen to himself, now that the Augur was no longer an issue: hostages, blackmail and naked threats had been enough to secure a narrow majority. He'd have preferred to hold the session without even waiting for the whole bell to pass, but both the royals and the Holies had refused to hear of it. Rozala Malanza's ascension to holy rule was not to be marred by even the slightest of procedural faults. The former fantassin thought them fools for it, for though they worried of such details being used to overthrow Malanza down the line they were forgetting they first had to get the fucking princess on the throne.

Which he suspected would be harder to achieve than expected, given the discordance of conspirators he was looking at. There were Salians there, officers in the city guard and the garrison as well as bureaucratic officials. Hasenbach's harsh measures against corruption in the capital had seen kinsmen from most great families in the region lose a sinecure and the assorted income, and as she'd refrained from purging the old guard that'd acted with probity quite a few had nursed private hatreds of the First Prince for years and only now come out to settle them. It'd been Balthazar himself who dug out half of those malcontents, having his fresh flush of agents in the capital find out who had grudges while ostensibly looking for 'Praesi infiltrators', yet Prince Arsene and the Holies had stumbled across quite a few themselves.

It'd been the realization of exactly how many enemies Cordelia Hasenbach has made that'd prompted the conspiracy to act, as well as the understanding that the window of opportunity was slight. A coup could not be had while there were foreign armies within marching distance of the capital, and Malanza had been exceedingly clear that she could not be seen to be doing the overthrowing herself: it had to be settled before she arrived in Salia. Still, the Gods had smiled on them when the time came. Some scrivener in the House had unearthed a precedent from the Liturgical Wars about a priestess' regency in Segovia that'd had one of the holdover faction in the Holies swing over into the camp preaching direct action, swinging the House of Light's influence entirely behind the coup just in time.

Some agents of Prince Arsene had caught sight of the priests moving guards into the city and the Prince of Bayeux had tentatively reached out to the Holies, adding the weight of his own growing conspiracy to their own. It'd all fallen into place, just before the last chance any of them would have for years if ever, and so Balthazar had set aside his own wariness of Princess Rozala in favour of backing the coup to the hilt. Never again would he have such an opportunity and Balthazar Serigny would not let that fucking murdering savage rule one moment longer than he had to. Not when his own sister had never even gotten a grave in Brus, just gotten thrown into a mass grave with the rest of the fantassins by the northern butchers.

He might have suffered through that, in truth, even if that'd been the day where he'd thrown his support entirely behind Princess Constance of Aisne. But Salieri getting an arrow in the back for coming too close of the Neustrian camp after dark? Balthazar considered himself a callous man and did so with some pride. Callouses were what grew from rough use, honest use, and though poets and highborn could afford sentiment the likes of him found just as costly as any other luxury. Yet even for him, a sister and a husband was too much. It'd been like poison in his veins every time he looked at Hasenbach, the knowledge that if she'd just stayed in her fucking frozen wasteland like Lycaonese were meant to then someone proper could have put an end to the Great War and the only two people he'd ever slightly cared about would still be alive.

And he could do nothing, for even intent would be smelled out by Hasenbach's pet oracle Chosen. So he'd smiled and served and waited, even as she made plain she meant to replace him with some twit from Lyonis. He'd kept it all inside him and placed men and women he owed in useful places because one day, one day, there would be an opening. And it had come, hadn't it? Because there truly had been Eyes of the Empire in the Salia, and his people had caught them along with their papers – including a dated suggestion of how to arrange the murder of the First Prince, mentioning the Carrion Lord's own theories of how the powers of the Augur worked.

Given that the eastern monster had run a merry chase around the heartlans while making a fool of every force in the west until the Peregrine caught him by surprise, Balthazar had read those 'theories' with great interest. And, upon deciding they were reasonable, finally reached out to the Holies afterwards, to... lend a hand, and perhaps a few suggestions. Not that they'd ever trusted him, which was admittedly not unwise of them. Seven priests from the very upper ranks of the Holies were in attendance now, representing the House of Light along with their swarm of lesser priest attendants. The priests had been scheming for longer than any of them, as it turned out. Balthazar had seen some of their correspondence with Malanza, and while it'd begun innocently enough also it'd begun months ago and grown increasingly treasonous as it went.

The Princess of Aquitan had struck gold when she'd raised the notion of restoring the House's seat in the Highest Assembly, by his reckoning. That'd been enough to move the ambitious to begin convincing the not, and after that it'd only been a matter of time until enough priests fell on her side. I'd been bold of her to use the royal seal of Aquitan on some of the correspondence, though Balthazar had noted she'd been clever enough to do so only on those letters which were seemingly innocent. Not all had been penned by her, for perhaps a third were identical to the samples of former prince Louis Rohanon's handwriting the Silver Letters had in their possession. Yet given how deep the once-ruler of Creusens was known to be in her councils that was not unexpected, if surprisingly trusting of her. It might be that Rohanon was to be her formal consort after her election.

It was unfortunate that the situation in Iserre had made it impossible to send someone directly in the army camp – Sophie of Lyonis was watching Malanza like a hawk for exactly such a thing – but it had been observed by his agents that the letters were in fact coming from the heart of the coalition army. He'd even intercepted one, and used it as an introduction to begin his own private correspondence with the princess. That'd been the last confirmation needed for Balthazar, as while someone else might be willing to offer him an empty pardon there was no one else who should be interested in very obliquely suggesting that Rozala Malanza's younger brother and rival claimant, at court here in Salia, should perhaps meet with an unfortunate accident in the chaos of the events to come. She likely had her own agents to arrange such a thing, Balthazar knew, so he'd taken the request for what it was: an extension of trust to bring him more fully into her camp.

It would be a pleasure to work with a woman such a deft hand at the Ebb and Flow, especially one who had the foresight to hide it unlike so many of her peers.

"- and so the House of Light had begun to debate whether the actions of Simon of Gorgeault have made him graceless, as the known murderer of lay brothers of the House."

The spymaster's eyes snapped up at the old man who'd been speaking, of the Holies from the south.

"A clarification," Balthazar the Bastard said. "Was Brother Simon harmed before being returned to confinement?"

Gods, let them not have bled the old man. Balthazar was not particularly fond of him, but the Holy Society had friends in many high places and if they began whining about their leader being harmed during the coup there'd be an outrage. The Arlesite priest purpled at being questioned in such a manner, but there was no one in this hall who did not know who Balthazar Serigny was now – or why crossing him would be a costly mistake.

“He was not,” the Holy said.

Balthazar’s brow rose in surprise. Gorgeault was long past his prime, but it was known in some circles he’d had quite the adventurous youth. He would not have gone quietly.

“He was not harmed at all?” the spymaster pressed.

The priest spoke through gritted teeth.

“He was not returned to confinement, cutthroat,” the Holy reluctantly said. “He escaped.”

Oh. Oh, those fucking fools. Did they not realize how that changed things? Balthazar, much as it burned to admit it, had blundered when he’d failed to seize Hasenbach more forcefully. But now the Silver Letters were out in force, every priest in the city was keeping an eye out for her and the manses of her supporters were under constant watch. It was known she’d fled into the high districts after making it out of the palace, and those had been closed down by guards and garrison so it was a certainty she was still in there. If she was in anywhere but the manses, it was only a matter of time before she was found. If she was in one of the manses, she could only wait helplessly there. It was still a dangerous situation, given the cunning of their quarry, but one that could be salvaged: especially if the Highest Assembly came through. But now Gorgeault would be out in the streets, and all his little friends and their little hiding places that no one else knew about would be opened to Hasenbach the fucking moment the other spy found her. Which he would, because for an old sack of bones he was sharp as goblin steel.

“Serigny,” Prince Arsene said, voice cutting through the room and demanding silence by simple virtues of his station. “What troubles you?”

“It troubles me that our friends in the cloth have let slip one of the few individuals capable of smuggling Cordelia Hasenbach out of the capital,” the head of the Silver Letter flatly said.

The silence that fell was deafening.

“That cannot be allowed,” another of the Holies said. “She is to stand judgement before the Heavens and the Highest Assembly.”

“Shall either bother themselves to fetch her?” Balthazar cuttingly replied.

Anger from the priests, which like most of them was growing rather tiresome.

"Enough," Prince Arsene yelled, and when heeded lowered his voice. "You have a suggestion to make, I take it?"

"I'll need at least two thousand men," the spymaster said. "Retinues, city guard or garrison it matters not so long as they are steady and will obey orders."

"And what will they be ordered?" a Salian captain suspiciously asked.

"We know what part of the city Hasenbach has fled into, and we've sealed it off," Balthazar Serigny evenly said. "Yet I have received fresh information that, in her despair, the Wicked Prince has struck a bargain with Below and is now attempting to bring forth demons into the city."

There was a pause.

"For the sake of Salia," the Bastard smiled, "we shall have to burn her out."

—

Wearing heavy cloaks, in deference to the last winter chill and not any great need for discretion, two tall silhouettes strode within the southernmost gate of Salia. The Witch of the Woods frowned, smelling blood and smoke, and inclined her head to the side questioningly.

"Order must be restored," the White Knight calmly agreed.

Unwise

Join the discord!

Unwise

<https://discord.gg/gt9ZcT>

Liliet

And vote on topwebfiction!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Fade

This has to be Scribe's work. As soon as I noticed Black's theories were sent.. She's so dangerous.

pagesbe

Uh. Somehow I don't see those two coming here to ensure Cordelia's usurpation. This rebellion is screwed.

I mean, they'd be screwed anyways because I highly doubt that Rozala endorsed any of this, but they're screwed before she even arrives.

EdwardGrave just because they aren't there to help the coup doesn't mean they are there to help. My thinking is that they are there to interrupt with the meeting with Cat and the signing of the accords.

Liliet

In Third Liesse, Pilgrim was certain he could count on the White Knight to support and keep the peace / truce. I think he'd know 🤔

erebus42

We've already seen that the Pilgrim's judgment is hardly infallible. The White Knight has been shown to lean a little too heavily on the Choir of Judgment and the precedents of the memories of past heroes. That being said I think it's a bit too early in the game to make a solid prediction on what his role will be in all this.

Liliet

>The White Knight has been shown to lean a little too heavily on the Choir of Judgment

Are you referring to that time in Free Cities he went along with the inane obstructive bureaucracy despite everything without protest, or to that time he demonstrated why you shouldn't ask him to resolve disputes by killing one of the royals involved and then went back to meditating and figuring out strategies in his tent?

poipoipoi

Subtle issue:

Tyrant is using Heirarch to very publicly go after the White Knight. Hit the White Knight right as he "restores order" and that could end badly.

Do0d

I expect Kairos is using himself as bait for a judgement while in the presence of Hierarch.
Hierarch will then object to the choir having a right to judge people of the League.

Do0d

Also Anaxares very much wants to judge Hanno for killing people of the league as was seen when he received images of Hanno.

Dainpdf

Unfortunately, the White Knight has a tendency to just cut down anyone deemed unworthy by Above... which may include both parties.

Also, he is Named, which means the Bard may have gotten to him.
If she wants Cordelia dead...

edrey

if the bard appear, i would say its to cut down scribe.
on the other hand. i expect cordelia have more cards than just escape

TheZorginator1

Here's the thing, we have no idea what choirs want what or what the Bards take on all this is. The Pilgrim and Mercy are very unlikely to be angling for the destruction of the Principiate and I can't see them deciding to kill off Cordelia at the moment. It's very likely that this is all a plan by Scribe and that would make the choir of justice against it on principle. The Bard...she might do something to fuck over Cat in a way that wouldn't get back to Pilgrim, but this will weaken the forces against Keter and that's not what she wants. Not to mention that it would lessen the Augurs influence which is the Bards biggest lever to control the Principiate.

Honestly, with all the lies and naked ambition going around the coup, it sounds to me like the White Knight is going to start cleaning house among the holies. A bunch of priests lying about demon summoning in order to burn a portion of the city for their ambitions doesn't exactly seem like something the choir of justice would be into.

Liliet

Yep.

In the Free Cities, as well as at the Vales, Hanno has very much been going along with authority – even blatantly obtrusive/corrupt, as long as they were on the right side of the war. Cordelia is on the right side of this war, and the fuckers causing unrest and making shit up are most definitely going to find themselves on the wrong one.

Shveiran

Judgment, not Justice. A meaningful distinction, in my opinion.

We have been told that the Choirs are pure incarnations of absolute principles. Though the Choir of Mercy was shown to be focused on the bigger picture, I don't think the same goes for Judgment: you judge one defendant, and the "but they are bad too" defence doesn't usually end in acquittal.

I think the question isn't "who would the Choir find not guilty", because all of these people are bloody murderers. Much more meaningful, in my opinion, is to ask "who will Hanno spin a coin on, and who will he not".

Liliet

This.

Unoriginal

Its scribe. The reference the 'Blacks' plan settled any doubt IMO. Remember the eyes of the empire are specifically designed to draw attention at times something Cat learns early on when talking to Black and oops now they've let slip plans on how to bypass augur to the coup.

Dainpdf

The Knight has mentioned that people have stopped going to him for arbitration, and it was for a reason.

Do0d

I don't think Bard wants Cordelia dead, I rather think she is trying to make her into a villain.

I'm basing this on Anaxares' received vision of the Augur being whispered to (I believe by Bard about dredging up that thing from Triumphant's day from Lake Artoise)

Insanenoodlyguy

Depends. This is now set up for all manner of unfortunate misunderstandings. The White Knight will, no doubt, start flipping coins rather than just believe the first thing he hears, but if he's told the First Prince is summoning demons

AND THEN a bunch of night-wreathed drow start coming out of twilight portals, followed by the Arch-Heretic of the East and her Master, the Hated Carrion Lord who's already had a judgement from the coin, well. He might just be convinced that whatever else happens, there are people he should kill first before asking questions.

Liliet

They still have several days before the armies arrive, and the armies aren't going to exit Twilight right there in Salia, for reasons specifically including, although not limited to, preventing just this kind of unfortunate misunderstanding. Seriously, the organization/coordination of all of this is not THAT bad.

Insanenoodlyguy

The INTENT is not to do such a thing. But, we in a story now, and it's probable that our protagonists and co. will be informed Salia is going to hell in a handbasket and they need to be there NOW.

I don't think the whole army would march right in, no. But Cat taking a few mighty and named and saying "okay, lets go sort this!"? That has a narrative possibility.

Shveiran

I didn't think about this, but admittedly the shape is there. It is A possibility, at the very least.

Liliet

That would not help Cordelia tho. It'd make her a foreign puppet in the eyes of all observers unless Cat managed to keep her involvement entirely secret... and that's the exact kind of thing that blows up at the least fortunate moment to the worst effect, so no, I don't think Cat would.

Shveiran

there would be backlash, sure, but the question is whether or not those will outweigh the benefits in a situation this dire... I'd argue yes, especially if the decision is taken without knowing the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods are in the area.

Raivshard

Perhaps, but keep in mind also that Cat has a very good track record these days when it comes to predicting and avoiding tropes and story shenanigans.

Do0d

I think it's far more likely Rozala rides in to put the bastard who murdered her brother's head on a pike.

NerfGlastigUaine

Yeah I didn't think Rozala was behind this before, but this chapter confirms she's not. The moves are too good, the timing too right, the coincidences too big to be her. Rozala's a lot of things, but a "deft hand at the Ebb and Flow" isn't one of them. And if it the Scribe like most suspect and this chapter supports, then I'm even more impressed with her now. And scared. If she could do this in Salia under the nose of the Augur and Hasenbach, imagine what she could do in Laure.

Shveiran

Indeed. How exactly Scribe has managed to, given that the Augur seemed to keep Praes in check for a long time as the main Proceran Name, is something I'd really like to find out.

Liliet

TBF Scribe had a lot of tools to work with. She didn't cause all this unrest, she just made sure everyone BY MYSTERIOUS COINCIDENCE found each other.

Adrian_V

That is right, she didn't force anything, this is like Murphy's Law, this could have happened one way or another the only thing she forced/created was the involvement of malanza and how this gives the others an opportunity, and by opportunity i mean an excuse, alibi and shield to hide their own avarice under the veil of legality

Shveiran

Look, I get what you are saying, but by the same logic Assassin could have stacked Cordelia's pillows full of poisoned needles because "it was still her choice to lay down there, he just created the opportunity".

Increasing agents to increase your chances of intercepting messengers is one thing; to nudge here and there to ensure that a plot picks up steam and is led by the nose is another thing entirely. It has intent all over it: she was not just creating chances, she was actively corresponding with them and feeding them documents to shape their actions.

There must be a reason why Augur didn't or couldn't intervene, because this took a long time and she cannot have been missing for that long. We are still missing a crucial piece.

Liliet

I think the piece that's missing is Scribe's Stranger power. There's a reason she amped it up so high Catherine forgot about her existence entirely. I think she took a chance on it working on Augur and then it, well, did.

Shveiran

It's possible, I guess, but it doesn't feel... satisfying as far as answers go. We shall wait and see, I suppose.

NerfGlastigUaine

Augur has blind spots. She can't see stuff that isn't planned beforehand for one. If you create opportunities and then take advantage on the spot she can't predict it, or something like that from what I remember. I think it'd be cooler if Scribe worked around Augur's power in logical ways instead of just forcing it with aspect. Kind of a theme in PGTE where cunning and logic beat brute force.

stevenneiman

Yeah IIRC didn't Rozala realize just how fucked everyone would be if Cordelia failed? Definitely the Scribe's doing.

Javvies

Oh, snap.

Scribe infiltrated Malanza's camp.
And set up Serigny to learn the theories about Augur's powers.

Baltazar is lying about what Cordelia's doing, of course. Still, torching where he thinks she is would probably work ... except for the distinct lack of an identifiable body to be recovered.

But Hanno and the Witch are arriving at Salia. This coup is going to end very very badly.

Skaddix

I mean I think pretty much everyone knows Baltazar is lying but it fits their narrative lol.

But yeah the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods have arrived so this Coup is Done.

Micke

Still, the Gods had smiled on them when the time came. Some scrivener in the House had unearthed a precedent from the Liturgical Wars about a priestess' regency in Segovia that'd had one of the holdover faction in the Holies swing over into the camp preaching direct action, swinging the House of Light's influence entirely behind the coup just in time.

caoimhinh

My bet is that even that conveniently unearthed precedent is something fake that Scribe made up to manipulate the priests of the House of Light.

Fayhem

I'd bet it's Scribe for sure, but I'd also bet she's in the habit of collecting obscure precedents and technical truths exactly for the purpose of having them "uncovered" at the right time (and quite likely in the habit of deliberately obscuring them further before then, so they don't get turned up by accident instead of by design). Although she's quite obviously not above using fakes when it is necessary, there's no deadlier lie than the one you tell by sharing a carefully selected truth. For instance, Balthazar mentions here that they've gotten some letters with Rozala's actual seal on them, though only on the innocent letters. What do you want to bet that those letters are real, because Scribe has been letting the innocent letters from the Holies get through and sending Rozala's replies back through the same methods as her fakes have been sent? It helps confirm that the letters are actually coming from Rozala in a very convincing way, because some of them actually are.

And of course, then Rozala shows up and the Holies say "hey here's the coup we talked about, you're welcome" and she goes "say fucking what, that's not what we talked about you goddamn lunatics, don't you know we're at war with the Dead King and we don't have time for this shit?". Because Rozala is bae. But here's the thing – if we assume that Scribe's goal is to sow chaos, the coup failing is likely to work just as well as the coup succeeding. Because let's say Cordelia reassumes power, "roots out the conspiracy", discovers it was all done in concert with Rozala Malanza, and Rozala is then left with a virtually indefensible position as far as proving it wasn't actually her. Which means she either has to submit to arrest and very likely execution (under normal circumstances certainly) in response to what she knows are false claims about what she was doing being presented by her political enemy who literally killed her mother, or defend her freedom by force of arms with the army she happens to be at the head of. Which means even the ostensible best-case scenario of the coup failing could still extremely easily lead to civil war in the heartlands of Procer, which would not be easily or swiftly resolved since most of Cordelia's loyal forces aren't in the area. So she could maybe hold Salia, but couldn't be expected to quickly defeat Rozala, while conversely Rozala would struggle to both capture Salia and prevent the First Prince from escaping and rallying her forces to the north.

In practice, Cat and her Magical Traveling Murder Menagerie (notably including special guest star Amadeus of the Green Stretch) will probably put paid to all this scheming, possibly with help from the Heavens for once if I'm reading the end of this chapter right. But still. God Damn, Scribe might be the most dangerous member of Amadeus' band in the end. I mean Warlock only destroyed one city and he had to die to do it, Scribe might just single-handedly kill an entire country here without so much as showing her face and then walk away whistling if she wasn't (presumably) about to get stopped.

Liliet

I would note that Black did the same thing in Stygia drunk that one time.

I'm just saying, Eudokia is terrifying but that doesn't mean she's the most terrifying one there is all~

Fayhem

Overthrowing a government \neq killing a country. And by far my favorite part of that Black story is how embarrassed he is that people are still telling it lol.

That Other Guy

It makes more sense for it to be the Dead King. Black needs a stable Procer leader to get the Accords.

That Other Guy

It makes more sense for it to be the Dead King. Black needs a stable Procer leader to get the Accords.

Javvies

Except this isn't at Amadeus's orders. Scribe would have started arranging things in order to prevent Amadeus from being executed and to rescue him. It seems most likely to me Scribe is mostly hands off in Salia, and letting the Procerans do things, while she spent most of the time in Malanza's camp, dealing with the mail.

Scribe didn't choose the timing here.
Besides ... it's likely that she would consider a weakened
Procer would improve Amadeus's bargaining position.

Ox

And so, the black queen came uppn a burning capital and turned to gaze upon her former foe. With oaths binding her to fight north, and dreams of a greater future, rozala and catherine started a war and set sail a ship.

JJR

"I didn't do it."

First words of Cathrine after laying eyes on the burning capital.

Sylwoos

And nobody believed her.

erebus42

Honestly those eight words combined could pretty much sum up a lot of Cat's story up to this point.

KageLupus

To be fair, this whole mess is caused by Scribe, who was set on the path by Black, who Cat has explicitly agreed to be responsible for. So there is at least a plausible transitive chain that says that this is Cat's fault.
Not to mention that Black told Cat that Scribe was going to be in Salia starting shit, and to my knowledge Cat has not made Rozala or anyone else aware of that fact. So that could be argued as guilt by omission.

Liliet

Guilt by omission, no. "Now are you going to hand her over for trial or what", yes 😊

And I think Amadeus might actually find himself in the position where he feels like he has to give up on her, too~

Mental Mouse

Just to clarify, I'm assuming that it's Scribe rather than Cat who would be handed over for trial.

But the thing is, Named don't normally "do" trials. If they get too out of hand, they get taken down by other

Named, usually but not always on the other side of the Good/Evil line. Setting up trials for Named could be one of the big innovations of Cardinal, even if most of said trials still get held in absentia.

Remember that even in our world, equality was a thin enough fiction that (1) in writing the early American laws, juries had to be specified as being of the accused's peers, (2) even that's been honored as much in the breach as in good faith, and (3) even then it "obviously" didn't apply to women or slaves. Things have improved somewhat since then, but even a glance through a week's headlines makes it clear that we're a long way from actual "equality under the law". And in Calernia, equality of all people not only isn't supported by society or religion, it's patently contrary to the "laws of nature".

pachp93

but everyone will blame her anyway

caoimhinh

"Callowans as a people can be summed up by the fact that, before the Uncivil Wars had even come to a close, it'd become a common boast among the populace that the Black Queen had not even spent a sennight in Keter before having several counts of arson and murder to her name."

– Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara.

Callowans' next boast is gonna be: "She hadn't even arrived and the city was already on fire. That's how fucking good she is at setting things aflame. Don't mess with the Black Queen." LMAO.

Mental Mouse

Um... how would "the populace" of Callow know squat about what went down in Keter? That was totally a crowd of Named fighting things out among themselves.

Shveiran

The memoirs seem to imply the Keter overture will become known in (at least) Callow before this whole mess is resolved. Not, all in all, impossible. That Cat went to deal with the DK is something that has narrative weight, and thus will need to EVENTUALLY be addressed.

Javvies

The official story in Callow is that Cat took the Woe to Keter and tried to stop Malicia from unleashing the Dead King and kill Malicia.

Then (presumably) Malicia retaliated by having the Eyes/ whomever assassinate a huge portion of the Callowan government.

It's already out that Cat went to Keter ... they're just leaving out some of the details.

Also, it's "Firebug Cat" – everywhere gets set on fire, eventually.

Insanenoodlyguy

Losara beheld the city, it's air thick with smoke and screams, and a shadow fell upon her face. "This mayham has been wrought by hands not mine." she said. Her disappointment was such that she then destroyed the sigil that dared attempt such a coup, and the fires she spread that night eclipsed those set by those who'd called themselves usurper, such that the northern cattle knew her as the burner of Salia.

Extract from the 'Parables of the Lost and Found', disputed Firstborn religious text (though this particular parable is agreed upon as fact by all sides of debate)

Raved Thrad

"Dammit, it's not even goblinfire, so how can this be my fault?"

Soronel Haetir

Treason doth never prosper, for if it doth then it votes.

Dainpdf

Dread Emperor Traitorous disagrees.

agumentic

"The city was on fire, and it wasn't my fault." – Catherine in a couple of days, probably.

Dainpdf

Of course, no one believed her.

caoimhinh

She is probably going to be complaining about it from the distance.

Catherine: "You are all witnesses that I'm here and not there where the fire is. I'm not getting blamed for this one."

Rumors EVERYWHERE the next day: "It is impressive how the Black Queen managed to set fire to Procer's Capital while being many miles away. Her dark powers and cunning mind are matchless in scope."

Insanenoodlyguy

"All I'm saying is, the Black Queen acq

Insanenoodlyguy

Curse the inability to edit and delete!

"All I'm saying is, the Black Queen acquired power over the head of the very calamities that raised her. And then scant days later, one of those calamities that answered to he that now answered to her just happened to set the city on fire, you know, the thing she always did all the damn time?" Elvera Tanja, defending her controversial thesis, "The Burning of Salia: The Black Queen's forethought plan", at Cardinal University.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

... was that a Dresden Files reference?

Someguy

Catharine can now swear that she did not order the Burning of Salia but is still going to be "credited" for it anyways.

Dainpdf

She can claim the fact that no goblinfire was involved as evidence of her innocence, perhaps.

konstantinvoncarstein

I doubt it, remember Sarcella, when she burn half of the city to light her pipe:)

Dainpdf

When was that!?

konstantinvoncarstein

It is humoristic. It was not Catherine who set Sarcella on fire. During the escape of the Lantern commando who kill Nauk, the city caught fire. Abigail used that to halt the Levantine advance (Interlude: Beheld I).

In a second time, Catherine went through the flames to attack the Levantine by surprise and light her pipe on the way on a burning house.

Because Catherine has a reputation for starting fires, someone jokingly said in the comments that the pipe story was a proof that Catherine set the city aflame, because obviously the greatest villain of this generation could not simply use a match for that.

Dainpdf

Thank you. I don't always prowl the comments (honestly, I rarely do beyond my first pass) and must have missed this.

konstantinvoncarstein

You're welcome 😊 Personally, I read the comments multiple time. I like to see all the theories and analysis, it is often very interesting and can help me to better understand the story.

Decius

What makes you think that Balthazar doesn't have access to goblinfire? Surely there would have been some with Black, which might have been seized along with his notes.

TheZorginator1

Burning a city district to stop a "demon summoning" is one thing, if they start using powdered devil to create unholy flames that are the distinct weapon of the arch-heretic of the east...the White Knight isn't going to be impressed with their current plans as it is.

Decius

Doesn't Scribe/Assassin's plan for revenge against the Pilgrim for killing the Black Knight involve making Pilgrim use angels to realize that the entire thing is a setup and avoid major damage, thus establishing a draw between Pilgrim and the Calamities?

Sure, that plan has been overtaken by events elsewhere, with all the (heel/face)/(face/heel) turns that resulted in Cat resurrecting Pilgrim and Pilgrim losing his Undo button, and also Black being unkillable. But it's not like those events could reasonably be anticipated, even by Scribe.

Liliet

>Doesn't Scribe/Assassin's plan for revenge against the Pilgrim for killing the Black Knight involve making Pilgrim use angels to realize that the entire thing is a setup and avoid major damage, thus establishing a draw between Pilgrim and the Calamities?

huh?

konstantinvoncarstein

Using magical napalm impossible to extinguish in your own city is retarded even for that conspiracy, and difficult to justify to the populace.

Shveiran

They could use it in a way that pins the blame on Cordelia, though. The average person in Salia will know jack shit about goblinfire, after all, no? Munitions were not popular until the Reforms even in Praes, and Procer hasn't had to deal with the Legions until very recently. The high ups will know about it, sure, but passing Green flames as teh work of the Wicked Prince could be feasible.

Decius

Not even all of the highly placed conspirators need know about it.

"We were burning out a demon summoning and found the wicked prince, so we called the boss over. Shortly afterward the fires turned green and started burning things that can't burn. I guess we must have arrived just in time, imagine what that demon would have done if it hadn't been disrupted at the last minute!"

Also: The first time Cat is in a city, things always go bad. It's escalating.

First it was just a corrupt governor and guard. Then there was the goblinfire incident at the foundry. Then everyone in the city died and turned into the power source for a flying fortress. Then Keter.

When Cat arrives, tradition requires that things be worse than "Everyone is already dead and we have to fight them and the Empress steals the alliance we're negotiating for".

Insanenoodlyguy

Why use it at all though? Normal fire would get the job done in this case. Yes magic can put those fires out, but those spots that stop being on fire are the spots you then go in and take a hard look at. Oh hey, found the Prince!

If anything, Goblinfire makes things uncertain. You can't be sure somebody is dead if you don't have a body.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hey, could you not use the word "retarded"? It's outdated medical jargon meaning "nonverbal and thus not a whole entire human being with rights and so forth," and entering the mainstream hasn't exactly improved its connotations. It costs you $0.00 to not use slurs for the developmentally disabled, that's all.

konstantinvoncarstein

Sorry, I didn't know. English is not my first language. I saw the word on some Facebook memes, and from the context I thought it was only another way to say "stupid".

Isi Arnott-Campbell

It's okay. Even most native speakers don't realize.

Dainpdf

Well, none has been used yet. Also, how would all that goblinfire have gotten to Salia without anyone knowing?

Dainpdf

Right. Exactly what a volatile situation like this needs, the headsman of the Heavens. This will turn out well.

Also: Cordelia was working so hard to have Salia in proper shape when the foreigners came... and now it's on fire and full of riots.

caoimhinh

On the other hand, this will achieve what the Saint of Swords wanted though in a different manner: after the fire passes and the situation is resolved, what is left will be united in a strong rule and with clear purpose.

This situation has just enabled Cordelia to have a scenario where she can eliminate most of her opposition in Salia in an effective and legal manner.

WuseMajor

Assuming they don't eliminate her in an effective and legal manner first.

konstantinvoncarstein

Narratively, Cordelia dying is improbable. And now that Heroes (including one specifically formed to judge) are in town, there is even more chance of her surviving.

Liliet

I think that train's sailed.

Fayhem

I would love to see this train you're describing. If only the gnomes weren't stifling technology I'm sure a Dread Emp would have put one of those in the air by now, covered with guns no doubt. Alas for the wonders that might have been.

Shveiran

What it will achieve is make a mess for her, frankly. You are looking at the long-term benefits, and you are right in theory; but this costs her a very weakened position in the short period, which becomes a long term liability if you need crucial negotiation right this instant and your back is to the wall.

I mean, a fire in her capitol, headed by one of her secret services and influential religious figures, two more Princes in need of deposition, the candidates for the Princes' Graveyard's substitutes being compromised... that is a gargantuan power vacuum during the Principate direst time. This is not a boon, by any meaning of the word: cleaning house only works if you have time to tidy up afterward without a sword at your throat.

Cordelia is going to end up at the table holding to her country with her teeth... Procer will lose a lot of influence unless everyone else is very determined not to see that happen.

And I'm not sure many will be so inclined.

Insanenoodlyguy

Catherine Foundling just has to be that inclined person and Cordon Haresbal will be indebted to her pretty much forever.

Liliet

I am 100% seeing this also.

I'm also seeing Amadeus going along with that policy while being like the biggest asshole about it that he can be without actually undermining it~

Shveiran

She will prop her up, that much is granted. But with all that's going down, I'd argue Procer will lose its place as the most powerful state on the surface of Calernia. I'm not entirely sure Cat has any interest preventing that, even if she could.

Mental Mouse

Procer's place as the most powerful state on Calernia (excluding, um, at least three non-human states) has a lot to do with their place as the wall between Keter and the rest of Calernia. And Cat's developing mission is to take down Keter for good.

Shveiran

Mhm, is that your take? I didn't consider those factors, I was mostly attributing it to "we have a lot of good rich land and are a big fucking deal", but perhaps I was wrong. This is a narrative driven world, after all.

antoninjohn

Well considering what exactly the First Prince is dredging out of that lake a demon is not too far of the mark

NZPIEFACE

Angel. Lake Angel.

Mental Mouse

Cordelia doesn't seem to think so, as per her POV on the subject. And frankly, there are plenty of other options. A literal demon or angel would presumably not be present in physical form (or People Would Have Noticed), but an ancient devil is still a possibility. So is an old "lesser" god, of either allegiance or a would-be independent. Or something we haven't encountered yet, like an ancient revenant, perhaps a counterpart to Helike's Thing In The Basement.

JJR

Just you wait, it'll turn out that the real super weapon in the lake was the friends they made along the way!

Mental Mouse

Or the enemies they killed along the way... you know, given this whole rebellion and how it's likely to turn out.

konstantin von carstein

This coup will be a lot more difficult to justify with 2 literal chosen of the Heavens opposing it. Cordelia can thank Catherine for their presence, because without the truce they would have never departed from the northern front.

"Burn her out". A purge of Salia is really needed.

And brother Simon is so badass!:))

caoimhinh

I wonder what those two are doing so far from the frontlines. I mean, the 3 months of truce started what, like 5 days ago? They should be nowhere close to Salia, though Hanno can Ride his steed of Light and the Witch of the Woods can fly, so there's that.

Where were they prompted to go to Salia by the Choir of Judgement? Doesn't seem like Pilgrim contacted them, and even if he did, they couldn't have arrived at Salia in less than five days since Tariq's deal with Kairos.

They are there with their own agenda, I wonder what it is.

hakureireimu

Narrative bullshit? The Choirs are up to something again? It's Above's will?

Some Smartass

Templates like that are forbidden.

Scavion

Heroes arrive in the nick of time to stop the Rightful Ruler from being deposed by Evil.

Providence lengthens their step and casts aside all obstacles.

Or in other words: It's story time and Hanno is gonna cleave, smite and judge.

Mental Mouse

ISTR Hanno got summoned to judgement as Kairos' part of the truce negotiations. It's entirely reasonable for him to take a fellow powerhouse along for company and backup.

Shveiran

Does Hanno know that, though? Who told him and how/when?
When did he set off for Salia?

Maybe there was a time-jump as the interludes started; I don't think he could have arrived this early if it is still just a few days after Liesse III

Mental Mouse

The more loyal priests of the HoL might well have prayed that this violent insurrection be dealt with by higher powers, ultimately leading to the Choir of Judgement informing Hanno "hey, there's a job for you in Salia".

Or, given how stories tend to pull the Named around, I would be unsurprised if he "just happened" to encounter a reason to head there....

Shveiran

It is admittedly my guess as well, I'm just curious about what reason that might be to justify leaving the frontlines.

Mental Mouse

Well, the frontlines have an angelic assurance that they'll be quiet for a few more months, and of these two can get from there to Salia in a few days, they can surely get back just as fast.

Shveiran

Mhm, so you are of the opinion they are here for the peace talk? You may be right, but if that's the case I'm very curious regarding what their agenda is. I suppose big chosen could bully (or at least expect to be able to bully) themselves a seat at the peace talk negotiations even if others actors disagree on the fact that they should (I doubt anyone but Pilgrim would agree by this point, but still). Even if it was so, I wonder what it is that they wish to say so badly.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure they've been called there from above. Now, this could be in response to the insurrection (per my previous comment). But I actually think it's more likely that they got the call a few days previously, when Pilgrim got angelic backing to involve Hanno in those peace talks via the trial.

Mental Mouse

Though on consideration, that commitment came before the DK ceasefire, so perhaps the insurrection is a more likely trigger.

Decius

They got a letter.

Xinci

Wonder how Cat will react to a important city she was coming to happening to be on fire as she's arrived...again. Truly patterns repeat themselves

Insanenoodlyguy

"It appears I will have to be led astray by my personal loyalty to Her Highness," the head of the Circle of Thorns calmly said. "As is our way, I will depart early to allow you to vote for Practical Guide to Evil on Topwebficiton."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

nick012000

The Wicked Prince? Did Cordelia just get a Name?

konstantinvoncarstein

No, Balthazar is just lying trough his teeth and doing low-level propaganda.

Liliet

If it was referring to something she actually did, it could very much be the beginning of one. However, since it's bullshit...

superkeaton

Oh Scribe, you clever woman. How long have you ben at this?

Also howdy, White Knight! Ready to say hi to Catherine and Black in person for once? Oh they are going to tweak his fucking nose so much...

Big Brother

Finally, the return of Hanno! I've been waiting so long to see when he'll re-emerge and meet with Cat finally.

NZPIEFACE

I have the sneaking suspicion he isn't talking about the same type of order as most people do.

Liliet

After the Free Cities arc, I have a sneaking suspicion he is.

It's funny how much of the fandom takes the 'headsman of Heavens' and 'unreasonable judgemental killer of everything' talk to heart, while ignoring us having seen onscreen that Bard was actually weirded out by how moderate and willing to cooperate with local authority Hanno is.

erebus42

She was probably expecting Saint 2.0. He leans a bit heavily into his role and on the heavens to give me too much faith that he'll be overly helpful. But hey, he may surprise us you never know.

Shveiran

We've seen him do very little so far, so it's anyone's guess what he'll do.

nick012000

Derp, meant to leave a top level reply rather than a response to someone else.

The Wicked Prince? Did Cordelia just get a Name?

konstantinvoncarstein

No, but it is easier to justify burning part of your city to find a wicked prince than your rightful ruler.

Big I

Interesting. This puts the White Knight in the reach of the Hierarchy, once everyone reaches Salia. I predict that will end very badly for the Knight, and the Choir of Judgement.

Adrian_V

Cat did say that below ALWAYS gets its due, like the rogue sorcerer guiding an army was providence here Hanno appears due to it but that still plays into below

Nairne .01

"Because there truly had been Eyes of the Empire in the Salia, and his people had caught them along with their papers – including a dated suggestion of how to arrange the murder of the First Prince, mentioning the Carrion Lord's own theories of how the powers of the Augur worked."

There, subtle yet obvious enough (at least to me) proof that Scribe has her fingers in it.

I genuinely laughed at the part with Hanno.

Liliet

And then there's the mysterious nameless scrivener who found an old precedent that bound the rest of the Holies to this.....

Sparsebeard

The real question is : "What did Magnolia Reinhart do to Procer to get the Circle to try to off her?"

konstantinvoncarstein

She is probably Malicia in disguise after fleeing from Praes 😊

SpeckofStardust

Eh we might see the white knight in a good light this go around. After all its rare to see the hero's straight up win but with this coup and the confrontation with the Hierarch give 2 big things they can win and not fuck up Cat.

Some Smartass

The Callowan priests are going to be so smug when they find out about this.

caoimhinh

Yeah, Proceran priests seem to constantly try really, really hard to show to everyone that they are an organization corrupted by earthly power at every chance they got.

Then they get offended when that's pointed out.

Valkyria

Oh well. Some Praesi spies that have been undercover there for Below knows how long were suddenly caught and apprehended at the exact moment where they carried moooost useful documents.

hmmhm...

and then some random "scribener" discovers the perfect solution to bring everyone into the fold for this coup.

Hmmhmmm..

Yeah no, for such a great spymaster isn't he like... too naive for not noticing how perfect everything falls into his lap?

But if there were any doubts until now, this has basically written Scribe all over.

Also, Hero Squad to the rescue! Finally they're gonna be truly useful.

Valkyria

Or fuck up this whole thing even more. What's sure is that nobody really knows what's happening and everyone just blunders their way through. A whole new order of a clusterfuck that will only need one misstep and boooom.

laguz24

Oh, those poor fools they are going to die horribly. The question is who is going down with them? Also, where is our favorite Champion? Is she dead?

Valkyria

Well, consider that the truce with DK only was a few days ago and all of them should technically still be on the frontlines up taking care of the wounded after the battle with the dead.
I'm rather intrested how the two of them got down here so far.

Valkyria

*fast

Curses and Death upon the nonexistent feature we all want.

konstantinvoncarstein

The WK can Ride, and maybe the Witch take them trough Arcadia? Or both?

Shveiran

Well, Riding through Arcadia would admittedly explain it all, admittedly. Now I'm just curious about how they knew they should come here.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Choir of Judgment can phone the White Knight Mercy-style, so they probably just tell him.

Agent J

We assume much by assuming it was a few days. It's mentioned the Twilight Way's can turn a trip of months into one of weeks. It's not, to my recollection, been mentioned how long it'd normally take to march from Salia to Iserre. Plus, the truce was confirmed before Cat and Pilgrim even returned and then there was the Tyrant thing, a few days of R&R, getting shit in order, a quaint campfire all before they started marching.

Plus, one hero has an Aspect related to movement and the other can fly.

And finally, while the Band of Five was forming during the Princes' Graveyard, the Pilgrim mentioned that Hanno was already on route.

It's not impossible that they made it to Salia before.

Shveiran

You are right, Pilgrim did say he was already coming. Well, that settles it I suppose... Now I'm just curious as to why they were coming.

Mental Mouse

> too naive for not noticing how perfect everything falls into his lap?

He's an arrogant fool. And when Rozala actually does show up, I suspect there will be an exchange to this effect: "Hail to our new First Prince!" "Really? [looks around] So, all of you are willing to follow my command? Very well, this is my first order: Execute this traitor Balthazar."

Mental Mouse

And yes, I know the First Prince seat doesn't work like royal succession, I'm just summarizing.

ActionKermit

I believe one of Scribe's powers is to make people not notice her unless she specifically wants to be noticed. Didn't Catherine have to call on the Night a few chapters ago just to remember that she exists?

Decius

Scribe is hard to notice when you are in the same room as her. There's no way that even a spymaster who was being specifically targeted would notice anything.

Valkyria

Not saying he should notice her specifically, just saying that the planning feels too smooth, that everything falls into place just at the right time. I just think he should be a little more sceptical about that.

Rey d`Tutto

He thinks it is a sign of the favor of Above.

Shveiran

Who, Balthazar? I find it unlikely that zealotry falls among his (many) flaws.

Agent J

From what I'm seeing, it's a mixed between seething hatred long hidden, boldness to take advantage of the first opening he's seen in a decade, and fear that we won't see another given how Cordelia is centralizing power.

He did not notice how perfectly things fell into his lap, because he did not want to. It's shit like this that makes Scribe consider sentimentality an impairment and why she's playing him like a violin.

Liliet

...an excellent summary, in my opinion

ninegardens

I mean.... Hero squad has been up north defending against the Dead King this whole time.
That seems pretty legit to me.

Hell, even down in the free cities, they seemed to be doing a reasonable job.... they were just being played by Bard, and up against the Calamaties AND Kairos, which is difficult by anyones standards.

Xinci

I must say I felt like clapping for Scribe this chapter even a the bare minimum of her manipulations. Truly making your enemy think its their idea is one of the most effective routes to control them. Lets see, she has at least, planted Liturgical document, had a Agent copying the writing style of one of Rozala's trusted and making a dialogue happen for months to influence the House of Light faction. Used Black's notes to nudge the Proceran intelligence network into a specific set of actions, and organizing her own agents to the degree that she set all of that up (though naturally could be using local powers to set up a fair bit of prep so less work for the Eyes).
The holes in the strategy are there but most of the Proceran figures involved dont really want to think about it that much due to their own self interest. Its very well done.

Though naturally heroic intervention can probably ruin it when its almost done.

It is also interesting that Wicked Prince may have been a Name at one point? Maybe part of the reason Tyranny is so feared in Proceran culture?

Mental Mouse

I considered the possibility that Louis actually did turn, but nope: (From "Seven")

> A bundle fell at my feet with dull thump. A straight-edge cavalry sword, wrapped in a cloak.

> "I had," Louis Rohanon pensively said, "genuinely believed myself to be a decent man, until tonight."

> "And still I hesitated," the man who'd been the Prince of Creusens ruefully said. "If this is the truth of us, my friends, then we have no business wearing crowns."

Also, Bard's comments strongly suggest that Procer's fear of Tyranny was likely "encouraged" by the Dead King's manipulations throughout their history.

Shveiran

I don't know, this feels like it has less to do with Scribe's badassery and more with everyone else being a moron, to me.

Luxuria Tenebris

"Still, the Gods had smiled on them when the time came. Some scrivener[...]"

Considering scrivener is a different word for Scribe, its quite a different set of Gods you are working for.

Liliet

IKR

White Knight's about to have a field day

panchoadrenalina

hanno's field days look a lot like banking days, both involve a lot of coins

BlackPhoenix7777

A coin flip for you, a coin flip for you, a coin flip for damn near everybody.

Alex

Scribe's subtlety combined with her ability to hide knowledge of her existence from others is ridiculous. We've heard in other chapters that people know how dangerous she is, and here they can't even consider the possibility she's involved.

No wonder most Praesi are terrified of her.

jack

I'm pretty sure that these people don't even know she exists, which is just how she likes it.

TeK

Oh no, they are perfectly aware that spymistress of the Black Knight, a Named Villain is not inside Black's camp, it's just why would they even consider that, and bother themselves with triffling little Scribe? They've got coup to fail.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure they forgot there was any such spymistress in the first place. CATHERINE did, and she knows her personally,,,

Fayhem

Cat didn't forget she existed. She just didn't come to mind. It wasn't like Catherine was going about thinking "hmm did Black have a spymistress who followed him around, nah that doesn't sound right I'd remember that". She just consistently found other things occupying her attention, and as soon as she specifically concentrated on Scribe she remembered her perfectly.

Scribe's power isn't memory erasure, it's presenting herself to Creation (which I think was suggested to be a manipulation of her Name, or maybe a specialized aspect) as so unimportant that people just don't think of her unless they specifically try/are prompted to. It's a meaningful distinction because it means that her power is more easily disrupted/bypassed than memory erasure, but less likely to be noticed in the first place. You can notice yourself having a hole in your memory and people living a certain kind of life would probably train themselves to do so, but noticing yourself not noticing/thinking of something isn't quite the same skillset.

So it's not that they couldn't remember Black having a spymistress, which would likely raise red flags with somebody as you'd expect someone like that to have someone filling that role and while Procer isn't as magically inclined as Praes by any measure they've had enough mages for long enough that people must try to use them in their Ebb and Flow scheming some of the time for memory editing or w/e. It's that their brains were going "oh his spymistress is probably in Praes or something maybe, anyway we've got bigger fish to fry so let's move on before we're even really thinking about that". Which personally I'd call scarier, on balance.

Liliet

See, the way I'm seeing it work is more like "Right didn't Black have a – oh wait what were we talking about?"

Fayhem

I think we're close to being on the same page then? Except I don't think that it redirects you if your attention lands on her, bc when it does it seems like the effect falls away pretty fast. It's more like your attention will never land on her naturally, so you have to consciously force it – but as soon as you do, it's done.

jack

So... take every mention of 'letters' or 'correspondence' in this entire chapter and remember that the Scribe probably intercepted and altered the contents, or just outright fabricated the entire thing.

Cassiemouse

Burning down the noble district? That is certainly not going to cause tons of problems going forward.

Adrian_V

My only question is whether Scribe is with the army or inside the city, black said she would be there but this one appears to indicate she is with the army. Up until here i have a couple of ideas of how this would develop....right until those 2 appeared, i should have known the author wouldn't let it be that easy, i loved how he just dropped those 2 as literal spanners in the work xD

Moment of black humour but can you imagine the faces of Malanza, Cat, Black, etc once they arrive? i mention cat and black because of Eudokia's involvement (and how it was black's anti aur plan that allowed it, in fact i am 99% sure the leak of said plan was intentional xD)

Tek

Calling it: White Knight and Heroes will actually support Cordelia and cut down the House.

Author Unknown

Scribe's cookbook:

Add one commoner spymaster, finely diced and a handful of corrupt lesser officials to the pot. Simmer in resentment over low heat for several years. Add three tablespoons of misdirection, a pinch of happenstance, four leaves of forged parchment, one-half cup of righteous indignation and one cup of avarice. Mix well. Turn up the flames to high and add two fresh Heroes. Stir until the plot thickens.

Liliet

Oh I'm pretty sure the heroes weren't part of the recipe 😊

caoimhinh

The real end of the recipe is probably "Add Named to taste".
XD

haihappen

Hilarious timing all around...

Truly, Scribe set up a combo so perfectly it resembles a Rube-Goldberg-Machine, and the Heavens have their little helper showing up at the exact best/worst time. That's Providence for you.

However, some of the people strike me as rather "dumb", namely Balthazar. He is a spymaster, and should know not to trust letters of conspirators that cannot be verified in person. He, however, seems to be blinded by hatred for Cordelia, so that is almost excusable.

Considering that they know they deal with Named, and not acting accordingly, either speaks of either a fatal case of ignorance combined with over-confidence, or equally morbid stupidity. Also, guarding a VIP (very important prisoner) by only two rather idiotic guards? Some Tropes never get old. He was basically guaranteed to escape.

On a side note: People throw around suspiciously capitalized Names (more Insults) for each other... I am reading too much into this? (E.g., The "Bastard", the "Wicked Prince")

konstantin von carstein

Simon was 74 years old, they thought it was unnecessary to guard him better.

Mental Mouse

Balthazar may be a spymaster, but he has no concept of story-fu, and so he he's a gamepiece instead of the player he thinks he is.

Speaking of which, I found a quote in the reader comments for Digger which is totally Cat:

Absconding_Cascade: Destiny, the annoying supernatural obstructive bureaucrat who you want to punch but can't so instead you set its paperwork on fire and do things your way.

Harixx

Why does it show: Tragic news about the site moderator. for me and nothing else?

Polygonal

Seems to be some sort of trojan or malware, windows defender caught it when I clicked the link. Careful.

TheZorginator1

It's a link to malware, somethings gone fucky.

blrbly

Why is it here then?

Caerulea

I too, am confused. The incident the url referee to was in july, and incident.site, the website is on, gives a Russian error message. Is there official word, because I would like to read this chapter.

sengachi

Someone hijacked the site to embed the malware. Official word can be found on the discord.

Mental Mouse

Where? I looked over there (I normally don't do Discord) and there was nothing obvious.

sengachi

It's in #liesse-accords. It was sent out with an @everyone ping.

Mental Mouse

As noted below, that's a malware attack – possibly hijacking WordPress, but more likely just slipping their hook into the ad feed. Notice that it didn't name ErraticErrata, or give any details at all... just a generic hook intended to make people click "for more information" (and download some malware).

Online advertising companies (including Google!) let pretty much anyone pony up a few bucks and get their chosen message and link posted on any number of sites. Just make sure the link points at something "innocuous" like "Fresh snake oil beats little blue pillls!" when you submit it, then a day or so later change the message to "Someone you care about is in danger! Click here to save them!", and the button to "download and run HaXxor.EXE".

Caerulea and anyone else who actually clicked, run your antivirus scan now, and keep an eye out for any unusual behavior from your computer!

Also, this is the other reason why I run AdblockPlus. (The first reason? Well, those suspiciously-relevant ads wouldn't be half as annoying if they didn't act like a pack of dogs who've scented a bitch in heat.)

blrbly

is the author dead?

sengachi

No, someone hijacked the site to embed malware in a link designed to entice people to click it.

sengachi

Holy hells, Scribe has played these people like a freaking jazz piano. That is a terrifying level of manipulation.

Mental Mouse

Well, that's her specialty. The question is, how good is she at story-fu? Is she someone who could effectively oppose the Bard, or another high-ranked playing piece like Balthazar?

sengachi

Well I mean, she was the person who organized Black's spy network in Callow, where a full generation of nascent heroes were repeatedly and quietly extinguished with barely a peep even as a substantial chunk of the rest of the continent's heroic cast lent aid. So I'm gonna guess pretty dang good. Or at the very least, picked up a fair amount from Black.

Mental Mouse

OK then, we can assume she knows enough story-fu to know just how badly this could have backfired on Balthazar. (As it likely has)

sengachi

Oh yeah, given that she's organizing this coup on behalf of a woman who's loyal to the current Prince, I don't think Scribe is exactly trying for a successful coup.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. Would she know that Rozala is loyal? Even Cordelia considered her the most likely likely suspect, and Scribe apparently wasn't there for Cat's holyshitwhatjusthappened triumph.

Mental Mouse

(That is, the one at the "conclave".)

sengachi

I think if Scribe thought Rozala was willing and eager to do this, she just would have made her part of the plan outright.

Andrew Mitchell

Magic? It's got to be, right?

Clever, and committed. But I'm unsure of what Louis is about to do. Any ideas?

Mental Mouse

Louis is about to trust in his people. He's said his piece, and knows better than to undercut himself with partisanship.

Mental Mouse

> Magic? It's got to be, right?

Wealth and power have their own magic. Even in our own world...

nipi

Hmmm... Wonder if we are going to see Twoface, I mean the White Knight flip a coin on the Liess Accords

Andrew Mitchell

My sense is that Hanno just judges people, but I could easily be mistaken.

nipi

No he doesnt. He feels that as a mortal he is incapable of passing proper judgement so he deferes to the Heavens. His backstory already had him flip a coin to determine peoples fate.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I believe you've misunderstood Andrew's comment. What I think he meant is that Hanno's flip-a-coin-to-get-heavenly-orders thing is only applicable to people, not to abstract concepts like treaties.

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you, you are correct.

Andrew Mitchell

Sorry, I could have phrased that better. That's exactly what I meant.

Interlude: Bone

"Here's the only justice I care to bring across the Vales: a sword in a just hand."

– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow, the Queen of Blades

The stone hit the man square in the cheek and he screamed in pain as bone broke blood began trickling down. Another few followed, though most were detritus snatched off the street instead of loose pavement. This was the first time Sister Marie ever saw a stoning with her own eyes, though some of the older scriptures did mention the practice in specific circumstances – traitors in Salamans had been dealt with in such a manner, in those ancient days when the Arlesen Confederacy stood and the Gigantes still tried to bring their rebellious escaped slaves to heel on occasion. A case could be made, Sister Marie decided, that in these troubled days a northern in Salia was close enough to a traitor for... this not to be without precedent.

"Please," the man begged. "I'm not even Lycaonese, it's a-"

A clump of thrown ice interrupted the man's words. Was that a tooth Sister Marie had glimpsed? Hard to tell, for the torches cast only wavering light and the screams of the crowd were distracting. Odds were the man truly wasn't Lycaonese – he'd hardly be the first one with a vaguely northern name to be dragged out of his shop tonight to stand before the judgement of the crowd – but it hardly mattered. The young priestess' sermon had whipped up a frenzy in the odd hundred Salians who attended her temple regularly, and it was not an easily quelled thing. Brother Rémi, who stood between her and the Holies, had been clear that nothing must be said that would temper the righteous wrath of the people against Princess Hasenbach's attempt to make herself a queen.

"Procer is no queendom," Sister Marie screamed, to the approving roar of the crowd, "it is an assembly of the highest in the eyes of the Heavens, and let all tyrants-"

Her eye caught sight of a glinting thing, spinning. She turned in surprise as a dark-skinned man caught a coin with an open palm. The crowd had parted around him without even realizing it, Sister Marie realized. Like a school of small fish around a larger one. Calm eyes found her own, serene in the midst of the screaming chaos. A heartbeat later there was a burn of blinding Light and she felt searing pain going through her skull before she felt nothing at all. Sister Marie's headless corpse fell to the ground, everything about the neck turned to ash.

"Disperse," the White Knight evenly told the crowd.

—

Louis de Satrons found, to his surprise, that he must have missed field work. He did not consider himself a sentimental sort, but there was a strange pleasure to seeing to the necessities by your own hand. Like filing a nail, he thought, or cracking a joint. The man before him the dark room was awake, though the hood on his face had been enough to cow him into stillness for now. Perhaps the Silver Letter agent even believed that by keeping his focus he'd be able to retrace his steps to this particular safehouse. If so, the head of the Circle of Thorns commended him for his dedication. Not that it would help.

"Proceed," Louis ordered.

The hood was ripped off by one of his helpers, and the unremarkable face of a middle-aged man with luxurious blond curls was revealed. The spy blinked at the sudden restoration of his sight, but found he could not see well: surrounded by glowing magelight orbs, the man was bound sitting in the sole island of light within the interrogation room. Louis' own presence would be reduced to a voice from the dark until he wished it otherwise.

"You're making a fucking mistake, whoever you are," the spy called out.

"My mother," Louis said, voice dry as dust, "was a huntress of great skill. Stag, boar – even geese and swans in our lands by the shores of Lake Artoise. She insisted I learn, but I never succeeded at sharing her enthusiasm for the affair."

"They'll know I'm missing," the man said, fear beginning to win over anger in his tone.

Few good things ever happened to bound men in dark rooms being told wistful stories.

"If you return me to my people I'll argue leniency," the spy tried. "Otherwise they'll fucking rip you apart, I don't care how high your birth is. I'm a Silver-"

"Letter," one of Louis' helpers completed from behind the prisoner. "We know."

"Then what do you want?" the prisoner hissed.

"From you?" Louis said. "Nothing you will not give soon enough."

He slowly rose to his feet, then glanced to the side. There was quite the selection awaiting, for the Circle's facilities in the city were well-equipped.

"But there is one part of her insistence I thank my mother for, to this day," Louis de Sartrons mused out loud. "For she was old-fashioned, and demanded I skin and cut my kills myself instead of allowing a servant to do so in my stead."

His fingers closed around the flensing knife, elegantly inlaid with silver.

"Look, I'm willing to talk," the spy hastily said. "Just tell me what you want to know and-"

"You know nothing of import," the helper said. "Your position is that of a bottom-feeder in Balthazar's band of beasts."

"Then what is it you want?" the spy desperately said.

"For you to scream loudly enough that it will carry to our other prisoners," Louis mildly said.

It truly had been kind of Mother, to ensure he would learn young to have a precise hand with a knife. And how to use it, too: there was surprisingly little difference between a stag and a man.

Under the skin, anyway.

"What's the damned holdup?" Prince Arsene yelled from atop his horse.

Balthazar Serigny suppressed a sneer. The man had insisted on coming yet barely left the palace grounds before beginning to complain about every little thing. The tall spymaster discreetly palmed a knife in the long sleeve of his greatcoat and barreled forward on foot, elbowing the soldiers ahead of him so he could reach the front of the column. There was little difficulty in finding out what the trouble was when he'd arrived there, however. The men and women in their way were a ramshackle bunch, a patchwork of different arms and uniforms when they even had either. There was Salian city guard in there, and garrison as well, but others were civilians: many fair-haired and older, Lycaonese veterans who'd dragged themselves awake and into the streets in the name of one of their own. The loyalty Hasenbach still commanded among her kind even after abandoning them to the wolves was outright disturbing. Some youths in elaborate arms and armour, clearly highborn and perhaps even distant royalty, had gallantly gathered as well. They were the loudest by far. Their challenges to the soldiers that were in principle led by Prince Arsene of Bayeux – and in practice by Captain Julien, who Balthazar owned – were both boastful and improbable, as was Alamans custom.

The spymaster was reluctantly impressed by the young woman who baldly asserted she would kill them all with half an icicle, one handed, if they dared to take another step forward.

Still, this was a waste of time and time was his most dangerous foe at the moment. With every passing moment that old fuck Simon had been loose in the capital for longer and the chances he'd found Hasenbach rose. And though Balthazar's middling esteem for the man had dropped even further when he'd failed to sniff out such a large conspiracy amongst the Holies, there was no denying that the Holy Society had a wide array of friends and hiding holes in the city: if Brother Simon got his hands on the savage, the coup was unlikely to recover from it. Which meant there was no time to humour the fools who'd raised a ramshackle barricade across the street, barring the way to the near three thousand men the conspiracy had gathered to smother any chance of Hasenbach's escape in the crib. There were a few hundreds at most and would be swept away in moments if it came to blades. The head of the Silver Letters shoved aside one of his own soldiers, who was standing around hesitantly as insults were hurled at her. Fucking Salian garrison, they had no spine and hardly more pride. The former fantassin approached the barricade and raised his voice.

"By order of the Highest Assembly, you are charged to disperse," Balthazar called out. "You are aiding treason and heresy by standing in our way."

That saw some hesitating, for both offences he'd named were capital ones and there tended to be generous in doling out death when it came to rooting them out. A hirstute, bearded old man – drunk, by the looks of him, leapt over the barricade with only a long knife in hand.

"Crook," the man said, Lycaonese accent thick. "Crook and servant of crooks. Hannoven fell for you and now you slide the knife."

"You will not get another warning," Balthazar called out, ignoring him in favour of the crowd.

"Lest dawn fail," the old man screamed, and hundreds roared it out with him.

Fools that they were, they charged out from the barricade. Balthazar hastily retreated, loudly calling for a shield wall to be formed, and the slaughter began.

—

Francesco grit his teeth and struck again, finally smashing through the wooden shutters. The others let out a whoop of joy and Anselme helped him clear away the broken remains before going through the window. Moments later the other man opened the door from the inside and the lot of them went into the shop, a few looking for any coin that might be kept by the drapier but less ambitious looters simply grabbing every roll of cloth and displayed tapestries they could. It was all a sin, Francesco knew, but virtue did not fill stomachs. That pretty tapestry displaying verses from the Book of All Things might, though, so while ashamed he carefully unhooked it before folding it under his arm. From the ripping sound to his side, not all his fellows had been so delicate in taking it. What waste.

"Drop everything," a woman's voice called out. "Or you'll not leave here alive!"

The drapier herself had come out from the back, he saw when he turned. She was overweight and long past fifty, so the sight of her brandishing a slender duellist's sword while in a nightdress was more laughable than worrying.

"We'll take the sword too, thank you," Alessandra chortled, mocking the woman they were robbing.

It was a hard crowd he ran with these days, but with a crime to his name the city guard ran him off whenever he tried to attend the First Prince's alms-givings. Who else was he to run with, if he did not want to starve or die of cold out in the streets? Francesco caught a flicker from the corner of his eye and saw a coin spinning up – and though it spun so well and high it should have touched the ceiling instead it vanished. There was some hooded figure leaning against the doorsill behind them all, but Francesco barely noticed for the silhouette that'd spun the coin moved like the wind and then Alessandra's head was rolling on the floor. The man, for Francesco now saw it was a man, paused to take a look at Anselme before killing him too.

One stroke of his longsword, that was all it took, and as the looters began to flee the stranger repeated the process again and again. A look, a strike, a death. The drapier had pissed herself at the sight, though he could hardly judge her since he'd done the same. The man finally turned to him, tall and dark-skinned and with eyes that Francesco met entirely by accident. Within he saw a spinning coin, silver, one side bearing crossed swords and the other laurels. And then it ceased, and laurels was what he came back to himself and knew this to be a glimpse of madness. The stranger's sword rested against his neck, and he tapped it lightly with the flat side.

"Amend your ways," the White Knight said. "While you still can."

Then he moved to the side and Francesco flinched in anticipation of a changed mind or a cruel game coming at an end, but the man instead took a look at the drapier – who'd fallen on her knees and dropped the sword, trembling in terror.

"You have reason to be afraid," the stranger coldly said. "They see all."

There was a flash of light and the drapier's charred corpse tumbled back, half the face whispering ash. The man took a last glance around before walking out of the charnel yard, the hooded figure following him without a word.

Francesco threw up and nearly choked on the filth, for he was weeping in relief.

—

"Interesting," Louis de Sartrons said, washing his hands clean in a water basin.

He dried them with a silk cloth before setting it aside. The full weight of his attention went to the woman at his side and the report she had recited by memory. Promising that she would have such talent for recall without any notes, though Louis was in no position to make an official commendation. If it turned out that the Silver Letters had not been used by a foreign power, then his ordered abductions and torture of their members would be taken a gross overreach of the Circle's mandate. Should this be the case, he would confess to having abused the resources of the organization out of his deep personal loyalty for Cordelia Hasenbach and take full responsibility. For that fiction to be kept, however, it must appear as if he'd acted on his own unknown to his peers. A commendation on record would rather strike a discordant note.

"It appears that as far back as five months ago the Silver Letters began unearthing Praesi infiltration," his helper said. "Interrogation of a captured spy yielded information that led them to several safehouses, including two holding scrolls and correspondence. Balthazar Serigny is said to have taken great personal interest in the findings of the second one."

"And we missed operations of this scale?" Louis frowned. "How?"

"Of all these, only the two Eyes of the Empire in Madame Soucillon's brothel were known to us. Their capture and death were made to look like criminal activity, however, so they raised no alarms," the woman replied. "As for the rest, the Silver Letters appear to have found a genuine Praesi spy chain unknown to us."

That the Bastard had not passed along everything related to the Dread Empire to the Circle of Thorns at first opportunity was impolite, but not outright damning. It could be argued that the Circle's inability to ferret out the Praesi had voided obligation for the Silver Letters, and this incident in and of itself was not enough to justify the assault on them Louis had ordered. As he had said earlier, however, it was an interesting detail.

"Have every known and suspected Praesi infiltrator in the city looked in on, immediately," Louis de Satrons finally said. "And it is time we deploy all our... acquisition assets."

"Sir?" she murmured, sounding surprised.

"Find me someone who had a notion of what was in that correspondence the Bastard took," the spymaster order. "Neither gentleness nor discretion are any longer a concern in achieving this."

—

"Are the firebreaks ready?" Balthazar asked.

The wind had picked up, though by the standards of Salian winter this was still a rather mild night. Though the tall killer knew that decisive action was needed for Hasenbach to be put down, he had no intention of burning down the entire capital. Though Princess Malanza might be grateful for what he'd done, she'd still have to order him killed to appease the mob. Not being a fool, he'd ordered firebreaks to be dug around the high districts and great masses of snow carted up to prevent the fires about to be lit from spreading. It would be enough, most likely. With a little luck it'd even snow later that night or come morning, and even the embers would be put out.

"They are," Captain Julien agreed. "Are you certain this is wise, sir? Lots of royals have manses in this part of the capital. They might take issue with returning to ashes instead of a nice salon."

"These are hard times, Julien," Balthazar mildly said. "And we've confirmed that Prince Cordelia has set mages to summoning demons to take back the city somewhere within the districts. The ritual must be disrupted no matter the costs."

The other man did not believe him the slightest, though he was wise enough to keep silent. In truth, though for those of some learning this was a wild accusation Balthazar had not chosen that particular excuse without reason. Few Procerans knew much of magic and it was well known that Hasenbach had brought some of the magickers back to prominence by founding her Order of the Red Lion. Those with little knowledge of sorcery, which happened to be the overwhelming majority of the Principate, would find it believable enough. As for the learned, they would know well enough not the cross a broadly popular First Princess with great command of the Highest Assembly and the enthusiastic backing of the House of Light.

"So be it," Captain Julien said, murmuring Gods save us all under his breath.

For all his dithering, he was prompt in having the fires started. Balthazar had ordered they begin with the northmost sections and rake their way down, to flush out Hasenbach if it was possible: it was still best to have her imprisoned instead of dead if possible, though not so such a great extent he'd let an opportunity to put an arrow in her pass. The high districts had sewers, which he had watched by his people, and every way out of them was currently held by soldiers and guards. The noose would not be slipped, not by a woman who was suspected to have a broken leg. The torches hit the oil-soaked bundles of wood and roared out, beginning to spread into the attached manse. As the fire crackled merrily Balthazar the Bastard smiled, for he'd have the savage in chains before dawn even if he had to go street by damned street.

—

Lieutenant Pauline had been feeling nauseous for near half an hour, now, and emptying her stomach had helped absolutely nothing. She was city guard, she told herself, she wasn't meant to handle messes like this. There must have been at least two hundred corpses scattered around the street where the 'authorities' had clashed with the 'rebels', most of them belonging to the poor fuckers who'd gone after garrison soldiers under Julien while armed about as well as your average street tough. The shield wall had scythed through them like wheat, though stubbornly quite a few had kept coming. Some old veterans and garrison men stayed loyalist had tried to get a shield wall of their own going, but Captain Julien had brought archers and there weren't enough shields on the rebel side to be able to even remotely take an organized volley.

The whole thing had been a massacre, and the smell of it was now lingering in her nose and mouth even when she covered it with cloth and faced wind blowing the other way. Gods, if only she'd not had a taste for poppy brew. If her debts had not been so deep the Silver Letters would never... It mattered not. They were deep as could be, and she owed to the wrong sort of folks. Hasenbach had been a decent enough sort to the people of the capital but not so saintly Pauline would burn down her own life for the First Prince's sake. Weren't no saints anywhere in Salia, as far as she could tell, and a woman had to take care of herself when the going got rough. She just wished the stench would go away.

"Stack the bodies together properly," she yelled through the cloth. "The carts need to be able to pass through the street when they're carried out. And all of you just standing around, lend a fucking hand would you?"

Only her own guards heeded the instruction, the idling soldiers and fantassins – Silver Letters, most likely – ignoring her outright. Considering they made for half the hundred she'd been left with, it was no surprise this bloody mess was going on forever. Even if the damned carts did finally get here they'd all be stuck waiting until guts and corpses no longer clogged the way. The Bastard ran this coup, looked liked, and he'd not trusted her enough to let her guards handle this alone. Fair enough, but the man could at least have left her with more than godsdamned watchers if she was to have this street cleaned up enough it didn't look like a butcher's yard under morning light.

"Half of them," a man's voice calmly said, "were hardly even armed."

Lieutenant Pauline nearly jumped out of her own skin. The man who'd talked was some tall foreign fucker, though well-dressed. Probably one of Balthazar's, if he'd made it through the other blockades unimpeded. Maybe he'd know when the carts would be coming. There was a hooded woman at his side, the guard then noted, and she could see bits of a mask in the shadows beneath. Yeah, definitely some sort of spies.

"They were armed enough," Pauline grunted. "And you're sounding awful judgy for one of theirs, I got to say."

"I do not judge," the dark-skinned man refuted. "Though judgement has been passed on you nonetheless."

"You're not one of Balthazar's," Lieutenant Pauline said, stomach sinking.

"No," the White Knight said. "Though I expect we shall meet in due time. I shall mark the exculpated, Antigone. For the rest, do as you will."

The woman cocked her hooded head to the side as the wind suddenly picked up, and the last thing Pauline ever saw as a blade shining like the sun.

—

"And you are quite certain," Louis de Sartrons said, "that it concerned the Augur's limitations?"

"Yes," the dark-haired prisoner said. "I saw only part of the scroll, but it claimed to contain the Carrion Lord's own thoughts on the matter."

And there it was, the trap the Tower had laid. It'd been done cleverly enough, the emaciated spymaster had to admit. If that scroll had been found on the first foray of the Silver Letters, Balthazar would have recognized it for the dangled bait that it was. Instead it'd been a progressive, heady climb for the other spymaster: information extracted that led to more, operations successful but never too easily, until he'd found quite the cache of compromising documents including this particular scroll. Likely Serigny had held some doubts as well, but ultimately decided that not even the Empire was so callous as to sacrifice near a hundred spies and hirelings altogether to simply feed someone information. He never quite had gotten the measure of the Eyes of the Empire, had he? Oh Balthazar had prevented their successes on occasion but there was a reason that the Webweaver's pawns were for Louis and his peers to deal with and not the Bastard. Clever as Balthazar could be on occasion, he was used to the deceptions of the Ebb and Flow: shifting alliances and secrecy, the labyrinthine procedures and precedents of the Highest Assembly paired with blackmail and the occasional assassination.

And the Tower did use those means, it was true. But the Tower was a cursed beast that swallowed its own tail, there was no gambit too ruthless for it. Worse, after the Scribe and the mysterious Lady Ime had wrested the reins from the hands of their predecessors they had proved to be exquisitely deft hands at the game. Some of the ways the Circle's agents in Mercantis had been dislodged had been so superbly executed that Louis had been more admiring than angry when reading the reports. Under the tenure of those two, the Eyes of the Empire had become the peer of the Circle of Thorns in every way. He had a great deal of respect for that society, and he'd studied them for decades: this had the telltale marks of a Praesi conspiracy all over it. It was always their preference to fund and empower local turncoats rather than to introduce a plot of their own whenever possible. Under Dread Empress Malicia the Empire had turned again and again its wealth into poison flowing through the veins of the Principate, and this was no different.

Yet when the reports from the other order had had given began to pour in, what had been clear instead became muddled.

"Pardon me," Louis said. "I don't believe I heard you correctly."

"They are killing each other, sir," the helper said. "It is not a coincidence, we've ten separate instances confirmed of known or suspected Imperial agents fighting."

A factional struggle between the Eyes? It was said that the Black Knight and the Dread Empress had sundered ties, but the Circle had been dubious given the lack of follow-through on either side. It would not be the first time that those two feigned quarrels to draw out foes and slay them. It was not, however, impossible.

"In seven out of ten instances, the party being attacked was trying to start a fire in the city," the helper recited. "In two out of the seven, magic was used by the attackers. In all ten instances the attackers won and retreated. We have several being followed."

The mages, Louis thought, were the trouble here. The great advantage of Praes spies was the ability to transmit what they learned by scrying, which greatly complicated ascertaining if a suspect individual was truly in contact with handlers. Which was why the Eyes so carefully guarded the identities of their mages in Procer, often preferring to lose an entire band of spies on the ground rather than endanger that more important component. Two had already been outed tonight, and more might follow. Which meant either this gambit, whatever its meaning, was worth burning them and potentially a very significant portion of the Eyes of the Empire in Salia – if not all of Procer.

Or, he grimly conceded, there truly was factional fighting within the Eyes. Between the Empress and the Carrion Lord, or more practically speaking Lady Ime and the Scribe. The former was said to never leave the Tower, if she even truly existed, but the latter... She was alleged to have been in the heartlands at some point in the past, though the information had been judged unreliable. It was not impossible for her to be in Salia at this very moment. One side was attempting to start fires, another to prevent such actions. It could not be that arson itself was the liability, for given the utter chaos in the capital it'd be nearly impossible to seriously contend that Praes had been responsible for the fires. Not when Balthazar's band of pawns was happily starting a few without prompting.

"The riots will grow worse, if the fires take hold," Louis frowned, thinking out loud. "Both those of the First Prince's partisans and those of the conspirators."

More specifically the House of Light, who could stir the people to anger like few others. Still, Cordelia Hasenbach was not without friends in Salia and remained popular with the people – in particular soldiers, retired or otherwise, but also artisans and the poor.

“Fighting has begun in earnest between our own people and the Silver Letters,” his helped noted. “As well as the Eyes and the Silver Letters, though that has been infrequent and we believe possibly accidental.”

Louis de Sartrons’ eyes sharpened.

“Where?” he asked. “Where are the Eyes and the Letters clashing?”

The particulars had to be sent for, but the ember of inspiration had struck and slowly he followed the thought to its conclusion. As always, the devil was in the details. One might credibly conjecture that at the moment there were four assemblies of spies in Salia: the Silver Letters, the Circle of Thorns, and what one might venture to term the Praesi arsonists and the Praesi hatchets. The hatchets, as it happened, were the key. Because as descriptions were confirmed it became clear that there were significantly less of them than the arsonists – this was known because some of their executioner crews were sighted several times.

The Praesi arsonists were being clipped away by the hatchets with methodical precision before they could light fires in vulnerable parts of the cities, where it might easily spread. Now, the hatchets did not intervene when Silver Letters and arsonists fought but they themselves had raided several Silver Letters safehouses. Which meant that the Praesi ‘hatchets’ were trying to prevent the ‘arsonists’ from carrying out a plot, while most likely trying to get their hands on some damning piece of evidence. Meanwhile the Silver Letters were being fallen upon from all sides, including the Circle’s more martial assets, while lashing out essentially blindly.

The hatchets were being used to contain and clean up a plot someone had evidently judged ill-advised. Given their small numbers but efficiency and eerily skilled coordination, as well as their precise strikes at Silver Letters safehouses, Louis believed he knew who was heading them. He sent for his coat and arranged for an escort to accompany him back to Les Horizons Lugubres. The other members of the Circle would be long gone, by now, but it was not they he intended to meet.

“Sir,” the helper said as he was led out, “I had a room set aside as you ordered. Who should I let the watchers expect?”

“Oh, you might say she’s an old friend,” Louis de Sartrons smiled, “Though I expect she’ll let herself in.”

—

The princes were folding, and Balthazar could almost taste the victory in the air.

The last two royals in the city that were not already at the Highest Assembly had sent messengers expressing they would not be setting out to attend, and that they would go accompanied by their retinue given the disorder in the city. They'd ordered that the blockade was to move aside for them and their escort when they arrived, which Balthazar had arrived – so long as only men on foot and by horse came, and every single one was inspected before being allowed to pass. They'd grown desperate now, enough that neither Prince Renato of Salamans nor Prince Ariel of Arans had even brought up that the head of the Silver Letters was torching the district where their own manses stood. They'd recognized it for a lost cause, and they were falling in line. Captain Julien had protested letting the retinues out in the city, but they were less than two thousand in whole so Balthazar had disagreed. They were elite soldiers, true enough, but they could not seize the city with so few. If they took the palace they might be able to hold it against greater numbers, but Balthazar had ordered that only twenty soldiers be let in by prince and any attempt to force entry with more be met with violence.

Given that the conspiracy's own soldiers were the ones on the right side of walls and gates, at the moment, even if the two princes had struck an unlikely alliance they simply did not have the strength to take the palace with steel. And even if they did, by some miracle, they could not defend it: while it might be true that the servants in the palace had been fond of Hasenbach, and some even protested her seizing, he had Silver Letters among their number that'd open secret ways into the palace if it need be retaken. Watching another manse burn down, the ferocious-looking man waited at the edge of the blaze's warmth for the latest word out of the palace. By now the Holies and Princess Clotilde ought to have crowned their pet princes, and the decrees could start being passed in earnest. Cordelia Hasenbach's deposition would likely be the first. The soldiers had begun piling the wood by the walls of another manse, while another detachment briskly inspected the servants and lesser nobles that'd come out of the last before sending them south in small groups, when the messenger did arrive. One of his own Silver Letters, he noticed, Rosalie. Less than pleasant a person, but utterly without scruples and so reliable for all manners of work.

"Have I missed the election of First Princess Rozala Malanza?" Balthazar amusedly asked.

The red-haired woman grimaced.

"You haven't," she said. "The Highest Assembly hasn't even officially convened yet."

He was, for once, more utterly surprised than furious. For a moment, at least, then fury claimed its due.

"What?" Balthazar hissed. "Are they all drunk? It's been most of a bell, what could possibly be taking so long?"

"They can't enter the Chamber of Assembly," Rosalie said.

He blinked, unsure how to respond to that. Had some enchantment been laid upon the threshold?

"They don't have the key," she explained. "There was only one, in the hands of the Master of Orders-"

"One of Hasenbach's," Balthazar frowned.

"No one can find him," Rosalie said. "He must have fled the palace. I have our people looking for him, but he could be anywhere by now."

In principle that was a blow, as the Highest Assembly could only hold session within the Chamber and any motion passed outside of it would not be binding, but only in principle.

"Are you telling me no one can simply batter down those doors?" the spymaster growled. "Given their age a few good soldiers ought to be enough."

"Princess Clotilde has refused," Rosalie darkly said. "And the Holies have agreed. They say it would cast into doubt the legitimacy of Malanza's ascension to break open the Chamber."

"Of all the bouts of bloody lunacy," Balthazar cursed.

He called for a horse, after that, and for Prince Arsene as well. This part of the city was under control, now it seemed they were needed back in the palace. Balthazar Serigny would see this coup succeed even if he had to batter down the fucking doors himself.

copaceticcockroach

First!! for the first time, i think

DJD

Sounds like the woman with Louis is Scribe and the room was cleared for The Bard

WuseMajor

I suspect the room is being cleared for Scribe actually.

Shikkarasu

I'd like it better if the room was cleared for Scribe, but then Louis' helper sits down and only just then does he really -look- at her.

Liliet

Sounds about right ♥ ♥ ♥

Tom

Yes, he carefully identifies each member of the Thorns as he invites them to speak, but he's unable to pay any attention to the identity of his extremely knowledgeable helper except for noting her incredible memory? And in the later portion of this chapter it seems like he's barely aware of this person's presence even though they're feeding him a ton of information. It's definitely Scribe.

Liliet

Honey, no
when you're first, what you do is post the topwebfiction vote link

Andrew Mitchell

What Liliet said ^^ OR something positive and/or constructive about the chapter. That works too. We don't "first" here.

Tesla

Oh the White Knight is going to FUCK. HIM. UP.

konstantinvoncarstein

It Judgement time! I am happy to see that Hanno is not just a thug who slaughter everyone on his path. The Balthazar's future is becoming darker and darker. I suppose the Witch will extinguish the flames.

If the "hatchets" are Scribe's agents, who are the "arsonists"?

Do0d

Or the arsonists are Scribe's agents and Amadeus scryed a mage with the Eyes to do damage control.

Cicero

The Eyes loyal to Malicia.

DoOd

I'd say Balthazar's future will be very bright ... with a very brief application of Light following a coin toss.

Some Smartass

Malicia's, probably. She's outright allied to the Dead King, and his side is the only one that benefits from this fiasco.

Hmmmm

Remember Cat's threat to ascend the tower if the Accords weren't signed? Maybe someone – perhaps Scribe, perhaps not – wants Cat to topple Malicia.

Or less narratively adept, maybe someone wants to prevent the accords, or put a stop to the longterm peace between Callow and Procer.

Shveiran

If that's their angle, why make Rozala First prince?
By this point, I'm not sure she has any more intention to fight the Black Queen than Cordelia.

Javvies

The Salian branch of the conspiracy don't know that.
Somebody has been faking letters from Rozala to them, and intercepting their letters to Rozala.

They think Rozala's on their side.

caoimhinh

He kinda is. The problem of being sworn to the Choir is that he is affected by their extremist view. It's either absolution or death, he doesn't have a middle ground. It's true that the coin doesn't order everyone killed, but Hanno's only response to a guilty verdict is to kill. That being said, it does get the job done. Decisive action is what's needed now.

I'm inclined to think that the hatchets are Scribe's agents because they have won 10 out of 10 clashes against the arsonists (who then would be Malicia's agents), but that's weird considering that they are preventing the situation from escalating out of control.

Could it be that Amadeus contacted Scribe and she accepted his orders, but she had already carried out her plan so it was impossible to stop it, and now it is Malicia's agents taking advantage of the situation to further create chaos in Procer?

Liliet

>It's true that the coin doesn't order everyone killed, but Hanno's only response to a guilty verdict is to kill.

I mean, that's because nothing short of a death sentence gets the guilty verdict. Everyone who doesn't merit it gets a warning and a second chance because it's not actually Hanno's job to police petty crimes

>I'm inclined to think that the hatchets are Scribe's agents because they have won 10 out of 10 clashes against the arsonists (who then would be Malicia's agents), but that's weird considering that they are preventing the situation from escalating out of control.

>Could it be that Amadeus contacted Scribe and she accepted his orders, but she had already carried out her plan so it was impossible to stop it, and now it is Malicia's agents taking advantage of the situation to further create chaos in Procer?

I thought of that as well 0.0

and then I immediately thought of Scribe deliberately creating that impression in order to come dry out of the water

Insanenoodlyguy

This. The coin has come up heads a lot, but consider that of the people we know enough to judge, it spared one guy committing the same crime as two it killed and condemned the following:

A woman preaching up a riot dragging innocents to be stoned to death

Soldiers who killed loyal civilians

The fucking Black Knight.

I mean, are there any judgement calls here wed really dispute? We all love black but he established himself a monster back in chapter 1

Liliet

The most cynical interpretation? Scribe's more expendable agents, out there specifically for the purpose of demonstrating that Scribe is HELPING

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Who knows? White Knight is a loose cannon but by gods he gets results.gif! Anyhow, who else is imagining white knight with a fedora, neckbeard and katana.

Some Smartass

Well I wasn't until now. 🤪

Alivaril

Starting last chapter, I started to suspect that the Scribe was actually trying to shore up Hasenbach's rule instead of overthrowing her. This chapter pretty much confirmed it. The House of Light, the faction most likely to ignore or undermine treaties made by the Arch-Heretic of the East, will find its power decimated. The traitors likely to complain about tyranny are being removed. The longer Hasenbach remains in power, the more time the Accords will have to gain steam before someone can cut them down.

In other news...

The spymaster was reluctantly impressed by the young woman who baldly asserted she would kill them all with half an icicle, one handed, if they dared to take another step forward.

Cat, is that you?

Sparsebeard

More likely, she prepared the plan then, Malicia, Bard, Balthazar or even Scribe herself put it into action... Only for Scribe to be contacted by Black and thus aborting the whole plan...

That's my guess for now at least, I still kind of think that Bard is using the events to try and turn Cordelia Villain, although it seems a longer and longer shot.

Nairne .01

I think you are underestimating Scribe.
Also, Scribe is aware of the schism between Black and Malicia.

Hardric62

I thought the same after reading the latest chapters: too botched for the Scribe to side with these mouth-breathing duckers.

Of course it does raise the expectations on Cordelia's shoulders too, since betrayal or not, she will have to 'justify' taking back power and most likely shattering the House of Light... Cordelia will just need the Accords now, because if she achieves nothing there, Procer will be finished anyways.

Now that looks more like a Scribe scheme... Or she actually managed to goad the local Eyes in action while keeping her own loyalists under tight control to also add 'purging my organization' to the list of things achieved.

sengachi

Honestly I think the coup being botched is an argument in favor of Scribe's influence. If she's going for maximum damage then she doesn't want a neat clean transition with a smooth transference of power. No, she wants a botched coup running around trying to put someone on the throne who doesn't want to be there but whose apparent complicity will fracture the country, without actually succeeding, ravaging civilian faith in both the church and the government in the process. Heck Scribe's perfect endgame is probably just the natural progression of this exact clusterfuck, except with Cordelia properly dead.

And hey, Scribe's literally right next to the person who's trying to find Cordelia and smuggle her to safety, isn't she?

Unless Black gets Scribe to stand down sometime in the next couple of hours or Hanno gets all up in Scribe's business, I suspect that Procer will not have a functioning government or a clear line of succession for half its positions come morning.

Liliet

>Honestly I think the coup being botched is an argument in favor of Scribe's influence. If she's going for maximum damage then she doesn't want a neat clean transition with a smooth transference of power. No, she wants a botched coup running around trying to put someone on the throne who doesn't want to be there but whose apparent complicity will fracture the country, without actually succeeding, ravaging civilian faith in both the church and the government in the process. Heck Scribe's perfect endgame is probably just the natural progression of this exact clusterfuck, except with Cordelia properly dead.

^^^

With the amendment of "Scribe's perfect endgame without/ before communication with Amadeus that Cordelia is an ally now".

With that communication, the perfect endgame looks like this: Cordelia regains tighter control at the cost of resources she could use to pressure the easterners in negotiations, and Scribe comes out smelling like roses because she helped

sengachi

Gods you're right, if anyone could spin this whole debacle into good PR it would be Scribe.

Mental Mouse

> ...or Hanno gets all up in Scribe's business,

Scribe has a very powerful defense against Hanno, namely not being there. 😊 IIRC, Hanno doesn't even have a divinatory aspect. WOTW could possibly nail her down, but I'd consider even that chancy – Scribe's certainly had to evade powerful sorcerers before.

Liliet

The fun thing about this coup is that it concentrates INTERNAL power in Hasenbach's hands, while weakening Procer's overall position. This is perfect for the eastern coalition since they can both treat with Hasenbach more confidently that she can enforce whatever she agrees to AND make fewer concessions.

And if Louis of Sartrons walks away with the impression that it was Malicia causing a mess and Scribe is helping clean it up...~

sengachi

... you know I don't want to give Scribe too much credit, but she has very neatly organized a situation and position for herself where she can choose between plunging Procer into unsalvageable chaos and what you just described basically on a whim, at any point in this process that she so chooses. I hesitate to credit her with that much Xanatos-fu, but ...

Liliet

She IS burning a lot of resources to swing this around, Louis brought up the mages for a reason.

But... yep. She sure has.

Soma

Hey EE, I saw something about a the site being compromised on a reddit post, and a malware link having been posted in place of Harp. Can we get an update about what happened?

agumentic

Huh. For all our jokes about how the Scribe is behind this, it seems that this is a work of mundane Eyes of the Empire the Scribe attempts to stop.

caoimhinh

Seems to me now that Scribe was contacted by Amadeus and brought to heel, but the plan was already in motion so she couldn't stop it. Now Malicia's agents want to take advantage and make it worse, so Scribe's agents have to clean after the mess she caused.

The hatchets have beaten the arsonists 10 out of 10 clashes, so those must be the ones led by Scribe. The last time we saw Black's agents fighting against Malicia's agents (when Malicia assassinated a third of Cat's court, Anne Kendall, and Ratface) they knifed them too, so it seems like Amadeus'(and Scribe's) agents are a tier better than Malicia's.

Liliet

>Now Malicia's agents want to take advantage and make it worse, so Scribe's agents have to clean after the mess she caused.

Now Scribe has a perfect opportunity to both fuck Malicia over and make herself / her faction look good.

I'm just not buying she couldn't have stopped those arsonists without taking to the streets. This is most definitely performative for the thorns' benefit.

Mental Mouse

> The last time we saw Black's agents fighting against Malicia's agents ... they knifed them too, so it seems like Amadeus'(and Scribe's) agents are a tier better than Malicia's.

I wouldn't go that far – Malicia's agents may have gotten killed, but not until after they fulfilled their mission – and getting killed meant they couldn't be questioned. (I don't think we've seen anyone using necromancy for interrogation, and from what we know of the world rules, it's not clear if that could be done without capturing the victims alive in the first place.)

Liliet

>Malicia's agents may have gotten killed, but not until after they fulfilled their mission

Black's agents specifically prevented assassinations in Cat's army.

Liliet

See, normally "that's what she wants you to think" is a joke, but in this particular case, , ,

Alivaril

The spymaster was reluctantly impressed by the young woman who baldly asserted she would kill them all with half an icicle, one handed, if they didn't vote for Practical Guide to Evil.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Alivaril

Gsfrscda the inability to edit posts is really not doing me any favors tonight.

Liliet

god I'm so torn between "you're doing god's work mate" and "i hate every single one of these jokes, personally"

-goes to the voting booth, sighing-

Hellspirit

Haa, culture you might obstacle in all things revolution.

Great!!

Aston Whiteman

What happened to the Lycaonese dream?

(Interesting filler. Miss main storyline.)

Soma

This is literally not filler. It is setting up the upcoming parts to the story. What happen here directly impinges on the plot. It's like the exact definition of not filler. Being dismissive to integral parts of the plot will not improve the story, even if you enjoy other parts of the story more.

Sparsebeard

Yeah, people calling parts of original stories “filler” infuriates me too.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is not a filler, what happens in these interludes will very directly impact the plot.

Nairne .01

I agree, all the previous interludes have meaning as well.

sengachi

You keep using that word, filler. I do not think it means what you think it means.

Someguy

In a city gone mad, the only sane man was the Master of Orders holding the key to the Chamber.

Nairne .01

Well said.

Javvies

Huh.

This is interesting. Infighting between the factions of Praesi intelligence? I wonder which faction is which – and who the factions are.

I suspect that the arsonists might be Malicia’s and the hatchets are Scribes – and Amadeus managed to contact Scribe to get her to not remove Cordelia(yet), but Malicia’s loyalists continued with the plan designed to retrieve Amadeus morphed into a plan to weaken Procer, remove Cordelia, and possibly put a number of Princes and Princess that are owned by Praes onto the Assembly. After all, going with the plan Amadeus is currently running with ends with him as Dread Emperor – which is something Scribe has wanted and believed should happen for decades.

Yeah. Hanno and Antigone are going to stomp all over the conspirators.

NerfGlastigUaine

This chapter is awesome. The changing POVs, the action, the intrigue, the characterization, all superbly written. The story in general is amazing, but this chapter is a real gem even among the rest.

If Scribe is responsible for the hatchets, then why? Did Black manage to get into contact with/convince her?

Can’t wait for the fallout from this debacle. A failed coup on the eve of an alliance instigated by the unpopular sixth ranger of said alliance is going to make shit go all the way down.

Liliet

If Louis walks away from this with the impression that Scribe, personally, is a friend, on top of Procer ending up weakened but more united over Cordelia, then this whole scheme will be nothing but pure profit for the eastern coalition.

It's amazing is what it is.

Razorfloss razor

This is turning into a a complete cluster fuck of epic proportions. Cat is going to have a field day and Abigail will probably be there crying over how much she would be somewhere else.

Hakurei06

In [Salia] the arrows fly hold the wall, lest dawn fall

Musings

Hatchets = White Knight and Witch? Ironic misinterpretation/misunderstanding by sj old spymaster, because they really are "the hatchet of the heavens" and there was no reason to expect them to be there?

caoimhinh

I considered that for a moment. But they said there were confirmed and suspected agents fighting, plus this part convinced me that they weren't talking about Hanno and Antigone: "We have several being followed."
The White Knight is moving only with the Witch of the Woods, so the Circle of Thorns' agents can't be following several if there are only two. Besides, Hanno is using Light, which would immediately prove that he is not a Praesi agent.

I do find it weird that the different groups in the city hadn't picked up already the presence of the two Heroes, they aren't being subtle about it (and aren't killing everyone either). Balthazar said that the conspirators went to have Assembly almost a bell ago (so about 4 hours), so they should have gotten reports of the pair going around killing rioters by now.

medailyfun

Probably they were not killing that many, just the ones directly on their way to somewhere... I guess, narrative should push them to save Cordelia

caoimhinh

They have actually killed a lot, even the killing of the dozen people looting the drapier's shop would have been noticed and there were a hundred with Lietenant Pauline though Hanno said he would mark the exculpated so not all of them would be killed.

And Pauline initially thought Hanno must have been one of the Silver Letters men because he would have to make it through other blockades to get there, so Hanno almost certainly killed other people off-screen.

Also, the very first killing on this chapter was a priestess in front of a crowd of "odd hundred".

News really should have spread by now, considering it's been over 4 hours since the riots started.

Liliet

And yet, by a string of mysterious coincidences, the White Knight continues his work unimpeded for the moment...

Providence is fun!

caoimhinh

Heroes and their Cheat Skills and Supernatural Luck...

Shveiran

Ehm, they are two top-tier Named in a city with a single, non combat-related other Named (plus a captive, non-combat other and on fire besides.

I'm... not sure what anyone else could have really done about them?

Liliet

Contacted them and tried to explain the situation.

Decius

They're not going to listen to a messenger, even if the messenger survives contacting them.

Liliet

Why do you think so?

caoimhinh

True. But I'm not saying they should (or even could) have been stopped. I'm saying they should have been noticed by now, at least by the spymasters with webs of informants running around the city.

Fayhem

> They have actually killed a lot, even the killing of the dozen people looting the drapier's shop would have been noticed and there were a hundred with Lieutenant Pauline though Hanno said he would mark the exculpated so not all of them would be killed. [...] News really should have spread by now, considering it's been over 4 hours since the riots started.

I think you're overestimating how easily/quickly news can travel in a moderately riotous city (i.e., one where any non-looter, non-rioter, non-involved civilians are staying right the fuck indoors) in a pre-industrial tech society when the conspirators don't even have scrying-based communication to circumvent their technological shortcomings magically. Nobody's calling any of this in to dispatch. It's messages carried on foot or maybe on horseback or nothing, and who knows if those messages (if any, depending on the scenario – who's running to the guards about some random looters getting killed in the midst of all this, for instance?) make it or for that matter if the people they're going to are still there when they arrive or have moved elsewhere already. And that's not to mention I think you're overestimating how likely it is that any of the actual Silver Letters would have been among the "exculpated", or how interested any of the random drafted city guardsmen or lynch mob members would be in doing anything besides going home, hugging their families, and maybe having a good cry in the bath after witnessing the White Knight meting out judgment amongst them.

tl;dr – I would consider the lack of wide awareness of Hanno and Antigone to be very plausible at this stage personally, even setting aside any Providence-based shenanigans.

Liliet

Mhm.

Like there's definitely providence helping, but it doesn't have to push that hard.

superkeaton

Hanno, you make for a spooky Batman

WuseMajor

He's really more Two Face than Batman.

Liliet

He's not. He's a paladin with Detect Evil (only more nuanced).

MagnaMalusLupus

And a near compulsion level impulse to kill anyone that pings. He's basically Lawful Stupid, but instead of Good he has Justice.

Liliet

Note that 'ping' is not for 'did something wrong in their life' but for 'death sentence'.

More nuanced, as I said.

Liliet

Oh, and that he has no compulsion to flip the coin in the first place. Note that mob that he just told to disperse – somehow I suspect he flipped only on the priestess.

MagnaMalusLupus

He's Two-Face, except instead of random happenstance controlling his coin he has a bunch of justiceboner Angels.

ninegardens

I would really like to know WHY it is pinging on several of these people (The Drapier? A random city guard with debt problems, who seemed to just be helping to move the bodies? Or did I misunderstand those?)

prentice barry

the city guard was the second in command of cordelias that betrayed her to the letter openers because they blackmailed her over her debts after getting rid of the loyalist commander, as for the drapier i dont know but i suspect they may have been an agent of someones thats done some shady/murderly stuff considering the sword appeared to be of rather good quality if the looters were gonna take it as well and she seemed to know how to use it

nick012000

Who knows? Maybe the drapier was a child molester, a drug smuggler, or otherwise committed a sin completely unrelated to the current situation.

ninegardens

Re-reading, it does seem that this is the case, with Hanno acting pissed off at THEM PERSONALLY, more so than even the riot agitator. Didn't catch that the first time, apparently too much else going on.

You know, evaluating the ethics of Hanno appears to be running into a bunch of weird situations, in that Earth justice systems are built entirely on the fact that "We don't trust humans to make this decision, therefore we create a SYSTEM, a PROCESS, to remove bias, demand evidence, and prevent crazy people running around with swords murdering people based on their own personal ideas of justice."

And he is really really violating all of that.

But at the same time, this ISN'T earth, and we do have angels and I guess... it comes down to whether or not the society is willing to accept a social contract where "Angels have the right to judge" or not.

Liliet

We explicitly know that it is from Hanno's Adventure At Vales.

Mental Mouse

> You know, evaluating the ethics of Hanno appears to be running into a bunch of weird situations, in that Earth justice systems are built entirely on the fact that "We don't trust humans to make this decision, therefore we create a SYSTEM

That's what we do in parts of the modern world, specifically those parts influenced by the European and American Age of Enlightenment. Before that, and even today in some benighted parts of the world, trial by Providence was/is very much a thing.

Perhaps the least objectionable version of that was trial by combat; but the pattern also included, for example, trial by having holding a hot iron – depending on how the accusers arranged that, it could range from a test of fortitude right up to demanding a miracle in order to prove the innocence of the accused. And then there was witch-dunking and the like, whose justification was explicitly "if they were innocent, then the drowned shall go to Heaven, but if they survive then they were obviously guilty, so execute them".

The Enlightenment and its shift to secular authority was in large part a response to the fact that increasingly, large numbers of people of different faiths were living in the same jurisdictions, and had to actually get along instead of killing each other in holy wars, or executing each other as heretics/infidels/blasphemers. In this situation, it also became increasingly obvious that God was not generally intervening on anybody's side.

In the Guideverse, things are a little different: The Gods Above and Below still seem basically aloof, but they are represented by their empowered agents, and there's rarely much difficulty in telling which side a Named is working for.

Above grants powers to their priests as well as Named, but it seems that it doesn't directly discipline either – if their behavior is egregious enough to qualify as a “menace to the public”, then a hero can deal with them like any other threat. Infighting among the priests of Above may be anomalous... but even the split within the House of Callow didn't get either side smited!

Even among heroes, some do have angelic backing, but it seems that many or most don't. The White Knight looks downright anomalous compared to the Gray Pilgrim (whose angels don't give instruction even on request), the Saint of Swords (no angelic patrons), the Lone Swordsman (did he even have any explicitly angelic powers?) and likely the Witch Of The Woods (no angelic patron or powers have been mentioned, even when she was throwing down with Warlock).

Below, in contrast, explicitly grants power essentially to those who grasp it. Aside from Named, they allow anyone to call on demons or devils who has the power and knowledge to bring them from the Hells to Creation. Those who also have the power and knowledge to bind and control such creatures, get to survive the experience.

Nairne .01

It would be interesting to have Scribe meet with the Circle of thorns man.

Andrew Mitchell

Just wait until Monday for the next installment. We'll see that meeting, for sure.

caoimhinh

Plus an Extra Chapter. The hype is high.

Someguy

And then it turns out the lady taking the minutes of the meetings for the Circle of Thorns was Scribe all along!

Andrew Mitchell

OMG.... that would be beyond amazing. ♥

Anon

You say that like Scribe isn't already in the room with him 😊

WuseMajor

Thinking on this, I find it amusing that Balthazar considers Princess Malanza's likely reaction to finding the entire capital burnt to the ground, so he's careful not to do so...and then we find out that the Eyes are apparently trying to make it look like he had less control than he thought and went ahead and set the entire city alight.

There's a part of me that kind of wishes I could have gotten to see his reaction if that had happened and he actually had to explain himself to someone. I bet he would have been irritated to find the Arch-Heretic sympathizing with him as he tried to explain how he didn't start the fire.

erebus42

"Oh so I suppose it was always burning since the world's been turning? Is that it?"
-Princess Malanza

Decius

"I didn't start ALL the fires. And I did it for you!"

Nairne .01

I honestly wonder what this will be like when Cat comes here with Black and all the other villains.
What will Hanno do? Will the Choir of Judgement let him leave the eastern villains long enough so they can help against the Dead King? Does Bard have any control over that?

All those questions are very intriguing.

laguz24

What I wonder if Hanno will kill Cordelia and when will Hanno learn restraint. Because killing proceran civilians is not going to get him into Hasenbich's good books.

Andrew Mitchell

Honestly, so far he seems to only be killing those that deserve it. He's also soothing the unrest. I think he's very much a net positive in the current situation.

Mind you, that could all change in the next Interlude or two. We'll see! 😊

MagnaMalusLupus

He killed the owner of the drapery shop for no reason that we are aware of, so I'm a bit concerned at your definition of "deserve it".

JJR

Such concern is unwarranted given how much work the phrase "that we are aware of" is doing.

MagnaMalusLupus

The exact bit I was referring to was "...he seems to only be killing those that deserve it.", and the merchant does not seem to have done anything to deserve execution. Do you disagree? What actions did you see the merchant take that warrant immediate death?

Decius

That merchant came into existence the instant she entered the scene, with no events or backstory. The angels judged that to be a crime against literature.

JJR

Again, "that we are aware of"

You're assuming that we're aware of all the relevant facts in this case. But, we aren't, maybe later it will be explained that the merchant was doing something super evil under the table. Or maybe we never hear about them again. With so little to go on judging Hanno's judgment is premature.

ninegardens

I really don't think it is.... if we are applying Earth logic.

Earth logic (at least in many countries) has a VERY strong taboo against extra judicial killing. You aren't ALLOWED to just walk into a house and murderize someone because you think they are a bad person. Why? Because the kind of people who DO do this are often biased, or racist, or on a personal vendetta, and this type of escalation of violence leads to blood feuds and things. We have judicial systems to measure out violence for us, and to do it in a way that society as a whole agrees to.

Even without knowing anything about the Merchant, we ARE in a position to say "Woowwww Hanno- you just killed some person why no judge, no jury, and not even explaining what the hell they did wrong."

By Earth Society standards, executing someone without even giving them the chance to plead their case, deny their guilt, or even explain to passers by WHY they are being executed is a whole bunch of capital T Tyranny. If one of your friends flipped a coin and then decapitated someone on the bus home, you wouldn't NEED to know the full backstory in order to know that this was way beyond the pale, and that anyone with that much faith in their lucky coin was nutzo.

So yeah- even if we have no clue what the merchant did, we have plenty of information with which to evaluate Hanno here.

By Earth standards that is.

But PGtE does not take place on earth, and we apparently have perfectly well informed angels floating around, and as long as you have faith in those angels to Judge fairly, it all makes sense.... It's still kind of the Equivalent of the US sending a drone strike into a foreign country*, and then saying "No no, its okay- they were a bad person. Trust – We have evidence, we can't tell you. we got some totally legitimate judges to sign off on this thought, so everything's fine".

Even if the Drone pilot trusts in those judges, and maybe even has a taste of the evidence provided to them.... the ethics of this sort of situation is by no means clearly in Hanno's favor

* [Here I'm purely using the "foreign country" to try to illustrate the difference between in creation and outside creation. The metaphors a bit wonky, but there aren't that many good real world examples here.]

Liliet

I disagree.

First of all, the Choir of Judgement is recognized in Procer as an entity allowed to pass these kinds of judgements. Hanno was asked to arbitrate a dispute at the Vales for a reason.

Trusting a bunch of angels on the topic of judgement and trusting the US government on the topic of drone strikes are rather different. Why? First of all, history and precedent – for everyone on Calernia to assume the Choir of Judgmenet can be trusted, they must have acted damn trustworthily before, while the US government... yeah. Second, incentive – the US government's incentives for drone strikes are only very weakly correlated with morality/ethics of the situation, while the angels have no incentive EXCEPT the morality/ethics of the situation. Third, degree of precision involved in the action – drone strikes have collateral damage, Hanno judges person by person. Four, amount of knowledge available to those making the decision. US government consists of humans and can only act on the intellgence it has. Choir of Judgement has access to all of person's actions and reasoning throughout their life.

The real life justice systems don't exist in the complicated trial form because somehow the process of a trial is a magical ritual that gives their judgement legitimacy. They exist in the complicated form because we don't have access to a perfectly judging Choir of Judgement, so we make do with what we have.

Yes, I'm taking the narrative's assertions about angels at face value. I have no reason not to, from the evidence observed so far.

ninegardens

I agree that the angels are not corrupt/morally flexible/ biased in the same way as a foreign nation's government... But I'm not convinced that I'd label them as "Trustworthy" either. They seem.... a bit too alien for that. (I agree, they do have better information)

By alien I mean.... Choir of contrition seem to think the mind bombing a city for the sake of waging war on some other city is Totally okay.

Choir of mercy is... I ain't gonna say evil, but their focus on "the greater good" makes them sort of... a bit blue and orange morality by human standards. They are, at the very least, kinda spooky.

To be fair, the choir of judgement seems to be the CLOSEST that we've seen to human level ethics, but the point is that they are still a black box.

I mean.... okay perhaps a different metaphor.... Imagine on earth if someone used "Machine learning" and "Artificial intelligence" and created a black box that (as far as we could tell) seemed to be pretty good at accurately judging people. You can't see inside, you can't know how it makes its decisions, and its NOT using any legal set up you've ever seen.... but generally the people it judges as bad seem to be kinda legitimately awful.

.... would you trust a person who ran around beheading people because this box told them to? How accurate would it have to be? What would you think if the box just kind of never told you HOW it was making its decisions, or even why? Do you trust the genie in the coin?

If I changed the words and said it was a "genie of judgement" or a "demon of judgement" or a "callibrated neural network" of judgement, does this change things?

We DO know that the choir judged Black for death... even though (despite all his monstrous crimes and flaws), he is demonstrably a BETTER person than any person in his position can be expected to be. ... maybe Judgement doesn't care about that. Fair enough, but still... kinda short sighted.

Andrew Mitchell

All very good points. Well argued.

Liliet

@ninegardens, essentially I would say the difference is precedent.

This new person with a black box would be extremely untrustworthy becuae the precedent we have for them is all the other people with great justice ideas, and in our IRL world this precedent states that odds are harshly AGAINST the black box person not going off the rails.

Choir of Judgement has been operating in Creation for its entire history, and people KNOW they are trustworthy. Like... there's evidence. Historically it has worked that way every time. You can't compare it to something new popping up because it not being new is the entire source of its legitimacy.

Black is indeed an interesting question. My impression is that the Choir of Judgement's approach is largely consequentialist, although with a different twist on it than Mercy's. "What seems likely to happen if we tell our man to kill this person" vs "what seems likely to happen if we tell our man not to kill this person" seems to be the key decision making criterion. Like how Hanno spared the looter guy because there was still a road for him to take to be a better person... and unlike Black, he wasn't likely to cause hundreds of thousands of deaths in collateral damage along the way.

Either way, there are plenty of approaches easily recognized as legitimate that would lead to Black being given the swords option. Sure, a coherent justice system the coin does not make, but it's not meant to. It's an emergency hole plug, not a peacetime balance keeping system. Note how on most people (ie the mob the priestess was inciting, approximately everyone up until now) Hanno just doesn't flip the coin.

Liliet

>Will the Choir of Judgement let him leave the eastern villains long enough the Choir of Judgement gets no input unless/until he flips the coin

Shveiran

So,
we finally have a chance to see Hanno in action when there is no flag-based solution to uphold. Which means we finally have significant data to (start to, admittedly, as this is only a beginning) judge his character.

Personally... I'm not impressed.

Let's leave aside the "I do not judge" thing (ofcourseyoufuckingjudgeyoumoronYOUARESTILLCHOOSINGWHOSHOULDBEJUDGEDBYFLIP ahem, sorry about that, it kind of irks me.

My main issue is... Hanno is a tyrant.

Ever since the early 18th century, the idea that a citizen should be able to know a law in order for him to be justly punished according to it has been a staple of this branch of philosophy. The Choir moves according to ruler of its own, and the problem with that is not whether or not we agree with them, it is that we and Calernian folks alike do not know or understand them enough to be certain on how the scales will measure.

Let's use the examples above, for instance: Hanno spared a looter who fell in with a bad crowd after he committed an unknown crime, and also spared the crowd who stoned a poor fucker to death, ordering it to disperse after executing the agitator. Why? They were not brainwashed nor anything, they still picked up the stones and killed the poor sod. Why was that not murder? We don't know.

Later, he tells the Witch that he will "mark the exculpated", so apparently it is not a given that lending your arms to the coup, actively murdering people and burning a city is not a guarantee of guilt (though admittedly it's possible that no one was actually exculpated, we didn't see that).

Why? We don't know.

The Choir judges with scales of its own, arrogating itself the right to condemn you for breaching the rules even if you don't know what the rules are.

And... that is not just, by any definition fo the word. It doesn't matter if the rules are good or not, it's still basically saying Hanno and Judgment get to kill whoever they see fit for reason of their own.

You can be arrright with that. Hanno is far from the only character here that says "I know what's best, so I'll impose my will on the world".

But that is the textbook definition of a well-meaning tyrant. Nothing more, nothing less.

caoimhin

Well, so far he hasn't killed anyone that didn't really deserve it.

It is a dick move on his part to summon the Coin of Judgement at his first chance, but if the verdict is death then that person had done some shit that earned it.

The problem is that it's too extreme, Hanno's only punishment is death, whereas he should at least have the possibility to look for other options, other sentences. But he is a machine with only two settings: harmless or deadly. And while that is useful in dire situations like the current riots, it does have a tendency to escalate things. If two parties called Hanno to arbitrate in a dispute over possession of something (like land, a building or whatever), he would summon the coin and kill one of the two parties (or both, if they have both committed serious crimes), where the expectation was that he pointed at one group and say "you are better, so you take this." or something like that.

That's why he is a hatchet that's better to have pointed to Evil and not close to ordinary people, otherwise, as his intervention heralds a slaughter. He is the White Knight and sworn to the Choir of Judgement, he is a tool of war, a killing machine.

Liliet

>If two parties called Hanno to arbitrate in a dispute over possession of something (like land, a building or whatever), he would summon the coin and kill one of the two parties (or both, if they have both committed serious crimes), where the expectation was that he pointed at one group and say "you are better, so you take this." or something like that.

That has actually happened, and he killed one of the royals involved. THE THING THOUGH is that he only did that because he was specifically asked to arbitrate. And he did not kill the other party. And we don't know what the person he killed had actually done.

Otherwise, he would simply refuse to arbitrate. As long as the coin lands laurels, Hanno has no further input. That's literally the only judgement he's willing to execute – the death sentence from the Seraphim. Anything else he doesn't weigh in on.

So no, not a tyrant, and does not escalate.

>Hanno's only punishment is death, whereas he should at least have the possibility to look for other options, other sentences.

So he lets off the looter completely. Anyone not worthy of the death sentence is let walk, and yes, that does not a complete justice system make. Because that's not his job in the first place. He's there to staunch the bleeding, not to build up the immune system.

Shveiran

@cacaomhinh: "so far he hasn't killed anyone that didn't really deserve it".

Says who, the Seraphim?

What did the looters do that the spared one didn't? We don't know.

What did the looted merchant do? We don't know.

Why was stoning not an issue? We don't know.

And that's why I say

@Liliet: "not a tyrant" that he is. This is not justice, it's rule of might.

I don't like how you hack, so I chop you. I have the power to.

This is anything but murder only if you ascribe value to the Seraphim's morality and we can't do that because we don't know what that is.

It's tyrannical, it's what it is. This couldn't be further from the rule of law.

Shveiran

Act, not hack. Damn you, mental association of similar sounding words.

Liliet

>This is not justice, it's rule of might.

Everything is. State's monopoly on violence is guaranteed and enforced through might.

And note that the drapier was terrified of him despite him clearly wielding Light. She knew what she did, whatever it was.

I have no reason to assume the Seraphim's morality is anything other than the common shit from the Book of All Things, like 'don't murder'.

Like. There are actual gods with actual teachings in this 'verse. The Seraphim are not outside context entities, they're p much formally recognized as 'proper authorities' – the princes had asked Hanno to arbitrate a dispute at Vales for a reason.

Liliet

And stoning was not an issue because with the priestess heating up the crowd dead from clear Light-based heroic intervention, those people weren't going to continue causing trouble. The problem was solved, doing anything to the civilians would only escalate the situation, which is not something Hanno's after here.

Sparsebeard

@Liliet

A due process is important! There is a reason why known criminals are let go if it ends up that evidence against them was not acquired in due process (for example, confessions without reading their rights or search without mandate).

Unless Procean law recognise the right of angels' chosen to be judge, jury and executioner, this is murder plain and simple (although I wouldn't be surprised if the Law did permit it).

Just imagine the consequences if he decides to flip his coin on Cat, Black, Tyrant or any member of foreign delegations during the peace talks... he'd probably be the first Named to be slain by the accords lol.

Decius

I think it's more a matter of the angels' law choosing to allow Procerean law to exist.

I have a strange suspicion that what his coin actually measures is closer to intent or reverence than it is to lawfulness.

Oh, and if he tries to flip a coin on Cat then a raven is going to snatch the shiny thing out of the air. If he tries it on Heirophant something much more interesting would happen. Gods Above and Gods Below are going to have a bad time assisting against gods in melee range.

Liliet

>Oh, and if he tries to flip a coin on Cat then a raven is going to snatch the shiny thing out of the air.

Only if the story is right for it. Komena and Andronike's capability against a Choir depends directly on what exactly the conflict is and whose domain it's more in. They can block angels peeking because stealth is Night's thing, but when Cat came to have a chat with Mercy over Pilgrim's dead body all they could do is help her not faint, and barely that.

Decius

Raven. Shiny thing.

The domain conflict might not be resolved, but the form that those actions take is also important.

And now that I think about it, as long as Zeke is able to see, Hanno invoking the angels is going to be a bad choice.

I wonder what the result would be if Hanno passed judgement on Pilgrim and/or himself.

Liliet

"I have a strange suspicion that what his coin actually measures is closer to intent or reverence than it is to lawfulness."

I don't think reverence has to do with it, but yeah, motivation/intent definitely seems to matter, from what we've seen in Hanno's backstory.

Liliet

>There is a reason why known criminals are let go if it ends up that evidence against them was not aquired in due process

So what is this reason?

>Unless Procean law recognise the right of angels' chosen to be judge, jury and executionner, this is murder plain and simple (although I wouldn't be surprised if the Law did permit it).

I'm pretty sure it does.

>Just imagine the consequences if he decides to flip his coin on Cat, Black, Tyrant or any member of foreign delegations during the peace talks...

Why would he?

Heroes of Judgement are not known for their, pun entirely intended, bad judgement. Particularly this one. (Also, I'm not so certain it'd come up swords for Cat&Black at this point... kind of wanna see that)

Decius

The actual reason is that when evidence is acquired improperly and used against a suspect, there is no actual reason to refrain from collecting evidence illegally.

A different method would be to make confessions under rough interrogation admissible, but prosecute the interrogator for using illegal methods. That's not going to work for numerous reasons.

The Choir of Judgement has no such regard for rights, so the entire concept is not applicable to them.

Fayhem

> Ever since the early 18th century, the idea that a citizen should be able to know a law in order for him to be justly punished according to it has been a staple of this branch of philosophy.

Not sure which 18th century philosophers you're referring to (I like philosophy, but it's been a good while since I've actually studied it and a lot's slipped away), but I can tell you that at least in my country it's explicitly legally established that ignorance of the law is no excuse. Because if it's illegal, then it's illegal. It's not situationally illegal based on whether any given individual committing the crime read the applicable law ahead of time, it's just illegal.

The seraphim-based justice Hanno is meting out is harsh and that makes him a scary mofo, I'll grant you both those points. But he's not a tyrant; I mean, just on a definitional level I'd hesitate to call him a tyrant just because he doesn't seek to rule. He, and/or the Seraphim he invites to act through him, could definitely be called draconian judges. "Tyrants" I do feel is a misnomer regardless of how you feel about the judgements being imposed though.

Decius

"Must be able to know a law" is different from "knows the law".

It's why laws can't be retroactive, why mens rea is a thing, and why being sufficiently mentally incompetent is a possible trial defense.

Fayhem

Fair, that's clearly a meaningful distinction. "Looting bad" or "don't do a lynch mob" don't exactly seem like moral principles it would be impossible to figure out, though, nor does it seem that anyone Hanno has seraphim'd in the face has been not of sound mind.

Liliet

All laws Hanno is judging by would be stated in the Book of All Things / preached in the House of Light.

Everyone's capable of knowing them, certainly so in Procer.

Decius

Or presumably if they can't, the coin would come up laurels.

Decius

The Choir of Judgement is a tyrant. Hanno is 'merely' their enforcer. If you have a problem with the rules, take it up with the boss.

sengachi

Heyyy, quick thought, what if the hatchets aren't actually Eyes? What if they're Jacks?

Forgotten Saint

Dude!

Liliet

Oh my god. That's ENTIRELY POSSIBLE

Andrew Mitchell

If you're right, maybe this ties into the fact that Vivienne was too busy to attend the gathering by the fire. And, why was she too busy, Cat asked her to pull out all stops to find out what it was that Cordelia had dredged out of the lake....

Hmmm... Jacks confirmed.... Maybe. I'd say a 15% chance that you're right. But its fun to speculate.

Liliet

Shveiran has a point. Jacks also don't have mages, as someone else has pointed out.

Shveiran

I like this theory a lot, but the Circle of Thorn spoke of "known imperial infiltrators". The Jacks are the new players, so I don't believe they could have played so exquisitely as to present themselves as spies from a different country; that's a bit too much finesse for no real gain... I mean, it's a cover story that would still have you watched like crazy, isn't it?

So... unless the Circle is mistaken (which is far from impossible, of course) the hatchets are Eyes of the Empire.

caoimhinh

Another quick thought: What if the "corpse that's not a corpse" that Cordelia is dragging out of the Lake is one of the ancient Gigantes of the Titanomachy?

Aotrs Commander

Well, thank you EE, for introducing me to a genuinely new sensation: Being Pleased To See Hanno.

I'm not sure what it says about my mood (given the events in the UK of the last couple of days) or how low my regard is for Procerans, but I found Hanno's handling of the situation to be delightful and very cathartic.

I guess, like a stopped clock, even Above and the Choirs can be right on occasion...

Andrew Mitchell

> but I found Hanno's handling of the situation to be delightful and very cathartic.

Well said! I, too, am pleased to see Hanno acting well.

Liliet

>I guess, like a stopped clock, even Above and the Choirs can be right on occasion...

I think they're right most of the time? William was an outlier in the 'even other heroes didnt want to associate with him' direction.

Shveiran

A dozen Heroes being led by the nose to spearhead a Proceran occupation respectfully disagree.

Liliet

You're missing a huuuuge amount of context there.

The Crusade was not meant to lead to a Proceran occupation, even if Amadis Milenan thought otherwise. Had it been successful to Cordelia's plan, she would have had the clout to insist that Callow be left to its own devices after being split up into smaller regional states. What exactly they would do with Praes was not yet determined, but the basic objective was to break the villains' rising power.

The heroes had a good handful of evidence that the breaking was needed. The occupation of Callow had already led to a city being destroyed and a hell portal opened in the heartlands (and sure, Warlock redirected the other side, but the weakening of the fabric of reality is still there). The Calamities already proved willing to meddle in foreign wars in favor of the side doing the human sacrifices. Fucking Still Water was deployed.

Yes, factually, had they gone for diplomacy, everything would have been fine as Catherine is basically a hero herself, as is in many ways her teacher. THEY DID NOT HAVE THAT INTEL. THEY DID NOT HAVE ANY REASON TO ASSUME ANY OF THAT. The idea of the current Praesi government being a force for Good long-term is exceedingly unlikely and would not occur to anyone normally – and it's not like Catherine tried to share that intelligence. She didn't actually tell Cordelia about the Accords in their Hero Winter talks, and she sure as fuck had no contact with the heroes.

Yes, the heroes were acting on insufficient information / bad intelligence. In that sense you are correct. However, this is a huuuuge outlier.

MagnaMalusLupus

>after being split up into smaller regional states.

Considering that those states would have had Proceran leadership, it was most fucking certainly an invasion. Now you can try to justify that however you want, but the fact that the crusade was only launched at a politically convenient time, and also conveniently glazes over the fact that the last hero in Callow had basically tried to do a Contrition based version of Still Water on the entire city beforehand, goes far enough to context on the other side. The crusade was a politically motivated invasion of Callow by Procer first and foremost. Anything else to say on the matter are justifications.

Liliet

>Considering that those states would have had Proceran leadership

They wouldn't have. Again, had Cordelia succeeded, this is what she would have gone for – LOCAL leadership, by people dissatisfied with the Black Queen.

She, ah, rather underestimated the amount of support Cat has, I got the impression.

>Now you can try to justify that however you want, but the fact that the crusade was only launched at a politically convenient time

What do you mean? What other time there was that wasn't politically convenient that the Crusade should have been but wasn't launched at?

>and also conveniently glazes over the fact that the last hero in Callow had basically tried to do a Contrition based version of Still Water on the entire city beforehand

This is relevant to the point how, exactly?

Liliet

I find it fucknig incredible that Balthazar let the Princes out WITH RETINUE. Which he did NOT proceed to carefully one by one identity check.

0% chance Cordelia is still inside.

Also, luv Hanno.

Also, it's amazing how many plausible explanations there are for the spy infighting – and nearly all of them make Cat's coalition look good

Shveiran

But he did check them. I don't know how to quote, but:

"They'd ordered that the blockade was to move aside for them and their escort when they arrived, which Balthazar had arrived – so long as only men on foot and by horse came, and every single one was inspected before being allowed to pass."

Considering you can't really hide Cordelia inside a man or a horse without a lot of creative necromancy, I'd say inspected here means identified?

I mean, the wording could be better, but there is literally nothing else they are searching for, so I don't think it means just bodily searched. It's a "proven to not be Hasenbach" pass they are handing out.

Liliet

Oh damn, I missed that. TY for the correction.

Fayhem

> Considering you can't really hide Cordelia inside a man or a horse without a lot of creative necromancy

I died. Thank you for that.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Speaking of necromancy...

My very own name

I have just discovered a liking for fast paced spy intrigues.
Looking forward to the end of this coup!

From what has been said about Scribe, I don't think that even if Black managed to speak with her, she would actually listen. Her schemes are her schemes, and Black is possibly "compromised". The hatchets killing the arsoners would mark Scribe (and by extension, Black) as trustworthy, but only if the initial conspiracy was made out to be Ime's work. And all the paperwork related to the trap would lead one to think of Scribe more readily than Ime, so we'll see how they spin that story.

And we also have whatever Vivi is doing during the campfire, so more plots coming to a head.

Liliet

So who do you think are the hatchets, if they're not Scribe-listening-to-Black?

ninegardens

Secret undercover Hasenbach loyalists! The only possible explanation!

Satan

Judgement really do be lacking that sociological imagination. I don't think those angels have a place in Cat's world.
I suspect Cat would also disapprove of the whole Prince Arsene/arson thing.

Interlude: Mirror

"Third, taking:

Bone to wind

And mirror to fill."

-Third of the three so-called 'Mavian Entreaties'

Louis de Sartrons had been speculating to himself as to how long he would have to wait before his guest arrived and had ultimately settled for 'less than an hour'. Which, given the sheer bloody chaos in the city and the difficulty to move around the streets – and so have information carried through them – he'd felt was generous of him. Which was why his face went blank when he entered the private alcove at Les Horizons Lugubres and he found someone already seated at the table.

"You are late," the Scribe said, her Chantant flawless.

The head of the Circle of Thorns, for the first time laying eyes on a woman he'd crossed blades and wits with across half of Calernia, immediately tried to commit her appearance to memory. Obtaining a description of the Webweaver had so far proved impossible, but now he saw that she was –

/

– and ink-stained hands. Louis was debating how to pass the knowledge to one of his helpers as soon as possible when he realized he had nothing to pass. The moment his eyes left the Scribe he knew nothing of her: height, colour of the eyes, even if her hair was long or short. He knew not whether her skin was dark or pale, or indeed anything at all save that she had ink-stained hands. Fuck, Louis thought, made unusually vulgar by the depths of his irritation.

"I would apologize, but I see you helped yourself to the wine," the spymaster replied.

Two cups had been filled, hers already touched, and though he had no intention of putting his mouth anywhere near something the Webweaver had poured he accepted the delicate crystal glass when she offered it. He settled into his seat, the two of them surrounded by swirling panels of bottle-green glass and hanging stone lanterns that seemed to transmute all of Creation in jade.

"Shall I begin by reminding you that your presence in Salia uninvited is an act of war when truce has been declared?" Louis mused.

"Then it is for the best I am not here," the Scribe replied. "Given the seriousness of the situation, shall we dispense with the preliminaries?"

Louis felt rather cheated that after all these years of wanting to meet one of his few peers in the trade he'd have to set aside the games of their kind, but he had to admit there was little time to spare. Despite what appeared to be the Webweaver's best efforts, Salia was on fire. Several of them, in fact.

"It would be judicious of us," the thin man conceded. "It appears that you are looking for something, my friend."

He'd been told the Eyes – or at least the faction among them not attempting to set the city increasingly more on fire – had hit yet another warehouse of the Silver Letters while taking a carriage to the Horizons. Whatever it was that Scribe was seeking, she was seeking it urgently.

"I am," the Scribe said. "Two things, as a matter of fact. I will require your aid in finding them."

—

Brother Simon watched the man drop, bleeding from the throat, and fall into the filth of the sewers.

Age was catching up to him, after his exertions in leaving behind the hospitality of the Holies, so he'd gone and rounded up a few friends. They had, in turn, sent for friends of theirs. One of the several results of that unfolding awareness had been Simon of Gorgeault's presence in the sewers of the high districts, under the escort of thirty well-armed fantassins. The friendly young woman who'd just snuck up to the Silver Letter who'd failed to hear them approach and decisively dispatched him sheathed her short sword then waved the others forward.

The lay brother cast a lingering look at the corpse floating on the surface of the river of excrement and trash, grimly thinking that with the amount of corpses his band had sown tonight the rats down here would be rather well-fed. He'd been breathing from his nose from the moment his escorts had ripped open the grid over the river of filth flowing into the muddy fields of the Petite Oblique – better known as Constant's Arse by Salians, as the drop into the Old River and rain-channels meant many threw their waste there for it to be washed away – and been grateful for the hurried pace into the sewers proper.

There'd been precious little crawling, for which he was thoughtful, for later in the underground tunnels the wealthy and highborn of Salia had built the sewers at near a man's height so that whenever blockage was had it could be dealt with promptly and not stink up their beautiful manses should the wind grow capricious. Balthazar was not a fool, so the Silver Letters were keeping watch in the tunnels, but a quick and heavily armed group could tear through such a cordon if it struck without hesitation. They'd met with success so far, though Brother Simon had silently tempered the victories with the knowledge that it was only a matter of time until a corpse was found.

And the moment one was, the Silver Letters would come down here in force. Perhaps even with garrison soldiers, which given their better arms and armour would be even more troublesome to deal with. No, while his group had been able to enter the high districts by the sewers but leaving through them would be another story entirely. As it happened Simon had some notion, though the risks would not be small. Yet there must be a part of the district where the blaze was weaker, and given enough wet blankets and snow... It had better chances of success than assault, anyhow, given the numbers the conspirators had surrounded the districts with.

"Here," a voice whispered.

Simon followed the gesture with his eyes and found indentations in the wall, with rusting iron grips above them. A makeshift ladder to return above, thank the Gods.

"Where will we be?" the old man asked.

"Maybe a street away from Prince Renato's manse," the same fantassin who'd been guiding them through the sewer said. "Can't be sure if there'll be people, so we have to move fast."

It was agreed upon in murmurs, and one of the fantassins took the lead in climbing up. A heavy wooden trapdoor barded in steel was opened and lowered as quietly as possible and they all fled upwards one after another. The night wind was a blessing after the stink of below, Simon thought, even though it carried the scent of burning in the distance. There were soldiers in the distance to the side, piling up wood, but they were busy with their work and did not look their way. The infiltrators hurried regardless, closing the trapdoor as quick as they could and fleeing for the shadows. They were hailed the moment they arrived in sight of the walls of the Prince of Salamans, and even earlier than Brother Simon had believed they would be: Renato's retinue was out in the streets in great numbers, as if preparing to leave.

Simon was not unknown to the prince himself, though none of the officers among the soldiers knew him by sight, yet the lingering stink of his travels by sewer earned him some consideration when he claimed to be at odds with the conspirators. The head of the Holy Society had attempted to have the Prince of Salamans warned that he would be coming, but the messengers must have been waylaid for he was unexpected. Prince Renato himself was having his horse saddled when Simon was brought to him in the outer courtyard.

"Brother Simon," the moustachioed Arlesite said. "I am told that the Holy Society has been protesting this lunacy."

"It did even when I was still prisoner of the House of Light, Your Grace," Simon agreed. "I am pleased to see you of a like mind."

"There will be a reckoning for tonight," Prince Renato warned. "One way or another."

The lay brother mutedly nodded.

"I may have a method to smuggle Her Most Serene Highness out of the districts, if I may be allowed to speak with her," Simon said.

The Arlesite prince's face flickered with surprise.

"You do not know, then," Renato said. "She is not here, Brother Simon. It was a ruse."

Before Simon could ask where the First Prince had then gone, genuinely bemused, both of them turned when soldiers in the courtyard began to yell in surprise. The lay brother swallowed drily, when he saw what appeared to be an entire manse rise high in the night sky before being suddenly smashed downwards to a chorus of screams.

That, Simon of Gorgeault thought, rather changed things.

—

"It would be easier to look if I knew what to send my colleagues looking for," Louis mildly said.

He'd promised nothing, not that his word given in such a situation would be of any worth at all. His duty was to Procer and Procer alone. Everything else was noise.

"The first is correspondence taken from one of the Empire's safehouses," she said. "It includes an entirely academic exercise by the Black Knight as to how one might arrange the assassination of Cordelia Hasenbach past of the vigilance of the Augur."

Academic, was it? Louis knew of no less than twelve plots aimed at the murder of the First Prince since her coronation that could be traced back to either the woman in front of him or the black-cloaked devil she answered to. They'd been thwarted in part by the Circle, in part by Agnes Hasenbach's unerring guidance and in part by the quality of guards Cordelia Hasenbach surrounded herself with. The only surprise here was that, if the Scribe was so desperately seeking to get her hands on the scroll that'd entice Balthazar into treason, it might genuinely be the Carrion Lord's own words. It was a feasible explanation for why she might be trying so hard to find it: the revelation would be damaging to her master.

Or, his naturally suspicious mind whispered, after planting that ruinous seed the Scribe was now attempting to remove the evidence. Yet she had revealed that scroll's existence to him while she must be uncertain of whether he knew of it or not, which meant whatever drove her was urgent enough she was willing to take the risk that the Circle would take the correspondence itself. Or that she infiltrated the Circle deeply enough she already knew of our awareness, he mused. In which case she is building credibility for a later lie. Ah, but he'd not felt this vital in in decades. It was like a stiff tonic dragging him back to the days of his youth, when the burning in his bones had not yet calmed. It was quite exhilarating, to want to crush someone so very utterly as he did the Scribe.

"As for the second, it is stolen imperial property currently held in a Silver Letters warehouse," the Webweaver said. "Which is why you will help me, Louis de Sartrons."

"There can be no legal theft of Praesi property while in a state of war with the Dread Empire," Louis noted. "And that is a bold claim besides."

"Also an accurate one," the Scribe said. "For after the legionary detachment accompanying the Carrion Lord onto Lake Artoise by barge was wiped out, the boats were brought back to shore. And the Silver Letters had hired hands there, ready to claim first pick of what lay in the holds."

The old spymaster forced himself to recall what he knew of the force that'd been found dead to the last on the barges, allegedly through some terrible miracle of the Grey Pilgrim's. Numbers had been moderate, the only officer of note had been the veteran from the Conquest known as Marshal Ranker – Ranker, yes. A goblin.

"Goblin munitions," Louis said with feigned serenity. "They seized goblin munitions."

"The Silver Letters have been contracting alchemists in attempts to divine the recipe for our traditional munitions," the Scribe agreed. "They have also brought into the city what I estimate to be three full cart's worth of goblinfire."

—

Prince Renato brought only a small escort when they sallied out, all mounted, and provided a mount for Simon as well. There was no point in bringing great strength, for they'd seen rise in the sky how such would be answered. No, best to flee if things went badly and for that horses and few soldiers were best. Brother Simon felt almost guilty of such wariness against what could only be one of the Chosen but not all such souls were kindly ones, much less kindly hands. The Regicide had famously held no compunctions in tearing through whoever stood in her way when she pursued a quarry and the lay brother had heard... troubling things about the Grey Pilgrim. Long before the man became involved with the Black Queen, too. The ten riders went down the street at a brisk trot, finding a graveyard of broken stone and corpses among which two silhouettes stood. One turned towards them, masked and cloaked in green, while the other spoke to a kneeling man. Simon spurred his mount onwards, casting his voice loudly.

"Hail, Chosen," the lay brother said.

The hero who'd been speaking with a soldier glanced back, revealing dark skin to the torchlight, and Simon was thus able to name him: this would be the Ashuran hero that had been summoned by the First Prince, the White Knight. Whispered, among some priestly circles, to be in the service of the Choir of Judgement. The Chosen look back at the kneeling soldier, and before Simon could so much as speak another word the kneeling man's head was rolling among the stones. Some of the soldiers behind him breathed in sharply at the sight, either shocked or afraid.

"You are not of these Silver Letters," the other Chosen stated, her voice a woman's. "Who then are you?"

There was something about the words that had Simon's mind askew. Almost like the heroine had not been speaking Chantant, though obviously she had been.

"I am Brother Simon of Gorgeault, from the Holy Society," the diplomat introduced himself.

"Prince Renato of Salamans," the prince introduced himself, leading his mount to stand by Simon's.

Brave man, the prince. Arlesites often were, though they had a way of turning that virtue into a vice.

"I am the Witch of the Woods," the heroine said. "He is the White Knight. We seek the man called Balthazar Serigny. Do you know where he is?"

The White Knight turned to look at them, eyes utterly serene even as his sword dripped blood.

"We are here for a reason, Antigone," the Ashuran said, almost chidingly. "To meet them, perhaps. Do you know where the First Prince is being held?"

"She has freed herself from the trap of the traitors," Prince Renato said. "Have you then come to support her cause?"

"There is no cause," the White Knight said. "She is the First Prince, that is fact. What more need be said?"

"Then you must help us," Brother Simon says. "For my colleagues will have gathered every sword they can from the city guard and the garrison, every loyal man and woman in the city, but even with the help of loyal princes and the retinues we will find it hard to take the palace."

"See?" the White Knight smiled, glancing at his comrade. "Always a reason."

—

Oh, Louis thought, those utter fools. Like no one had ever tried to piece together the goblin's recipes. The Stygian Magisterium was said to have spent a fortune in repeated failed attempts, the Thalassocracy had a standing reward for any goblin munitions in any state and even the First Prince herself had briefly tried to have alchemists reproduce the ones known as 'sharpers' before admitting that whatever the process involved was the Principate simply did not have the sorcerous know-how to match it. And now a significant portion of the Eyes of the Empire was going around the city setting fires, when they should be well aware that all it'd take was a single drop touching flame and... and the city would burn green. As was the telltale mark of the Black Queen bringing her enemies to heel.

"Malicia wants to sink the Liesse Accords," Louis said. "Yet you are attempting to protect them. Why?"

"Because I have been ordered to," the Scribe replied.

Her closeness to the Black Knight was well-documented, true enough, and with the lifting of the veil over Iserre it had become possible to scry again days ago. All it would have taken was a face-to-face conversation with the Carrion Lord and the matter would have been settled. Of course, that much implied she had already been in Salia. That she had been here and that the Eyes of the Empire in the service of Lady Ime instead of herself had somehow succeeded at fomenting such schemes without her knowledge. Which was, in a word, absurd. The strife between Praesi spies was too recent, Louis decided. And though he dared not underestimate the Eyes of the Empire, neither would he overestimate them: the way Balthazar Serigny had been played, and likely other conspirators as well, was beyond the reach of most Praesi spies.

"It was your scheme, wasn't it?" Louis de Sartrons suddenly said. "All of this was plotted in concert with the Tower. And then the Carrion Lord pulled your leash."

The bones of the aftermath of the initial plot might have taken were still there. Cordelia Hasenbach dead, the House of Light irreparably discredited by the fire and the coup, Rozala Malanza crowned First Princess but illegitimately so in the eyes of most. Large swaths of the Principate would outright rebel, and even if the Dead King was beaten back there would be no keeping the Lycaonese in Procer after this. They'd fight bitterly to secede and many of Prince Cordelia's steadiest allies with them. Either Keter devoured us whole or we'd collapse in the wake of our survival, Louis thought half-admiringly. And with the House perhaps purged and inevitably disgraced, there would be no one left to mediate between the combatants. It'd been a very comprehensive scheme. Terrifyingly so. Until part of the schemers had turned against it, anyway.

"If that were the case, such a plan would have been made when Lord Black was held prisoner by heroes," the Scribe said.

"You need our help," the spymaster smiled. "To find those munitions before half the capital burns green and your master ends up being held responsible."

"You need my help," the Scribe replied, "before half your capital burns green and hundreds of thousands die."

"It will cost you," Louis de Sartrons nonchalantly said.

Her eyes narrowed, but she answered through gritted teeth. Resigned. Oh, this was delicious turn indeed.

"What do you want?" she asked.

Praes had attempted to lay hand on Procer, Louis mused with a thin smile. As the charge of the Circle of Thorns ordered, it was time for the Dread Empire to bleed for presumption.

—

Balthazar felt his face turn ashen. His mind stalled, for a moment, in utter surprise and dismay. He nodded at Rosalie in acknowledgement afterwards, who once more this might had been appointed the carrier of ill news. This time, though, much worse than the last.

"You would do well to listen for once in your misbegotten life, you jumped-up fantassin," Brother Bertran sneered, Arlesite accent thick. "If you expect to keep your station after Princess Rozala's election you should learn—"

"Shut your fucking mouth, priest," Balthazar the Bastard said, voice gone flat. "The rest of you, listen to me closely."

There was a ripple of surprise among the crowd. They'd agreed to speak with him when he'd insisted that the damned door to the Highest Assembly needed to be battered down because of his prominence within the conspiracy, but none of these were used to being spoken to in such a manner.

"You dare speak—" Brother Betran began.

Balthazar glanced at one of his men and the priest's nose broke with a wet crunch a heartbeat later. A sheath weighed quite a bit, especially with the sword still in it.

"If we do not enter the Highest Assembly and depose Hasenbach within the hour, everyone here is dead," the large spymaster calmly said. "The princes of Salamans and Arans broke through the encirclement of the high districts and gathered a crowd of armed malcontents. They're coming for the palace."

"We have the run of the palace, Serigny," Princess Clotilde replied. "We've retainers of our own and loyalists, as well as the walls. We could hold ten times our number, and I've doubts they have gathered such."

"If that was all they had, I'd hardly care," Balthazar grunted. "We could break them all at once. But there are two Chosen with them – the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods."

"This is good news, Serigny," Sister Adeline dismissed. "We need only send an envoy and they will come to our side, perhaps even bearing Hasenbach herself. She is a heretic."

"The two of them have killed somewhere around three hundred people since they've entered the city, best my people can tell," Balthazar said. "At least a dozen were priests. They are coming for our heads, ladies and gentlemen, not to lend a hand."

A great deal of consternation ensued. The Holies, in particular, remained unconvinced that the Chosen would not embrace their cause. Amusingly enough there was talk of Hasenbach having seduced the White Knight, or the Witch of the Woods, or both as well as the less salacious talk that she might have lied to them so they would misunderstand the situation. One even suggested they were in truth Damned and not Chosen, though there were few takers. The more practical suggested envoys be sent to the Chosen regardless, to 'clarify the situation' to which Balthazar agreed mostly so they'd cease their shrill whining. Fear, though, finally got the lot of them moving. They all knew that so long as Hasenbach was the First Prince, they were all rebels. Deposition followed by an election, even a hasty and dubious one, would change the situation. The White Knight was said to be a scrupulous observer of the law, when there was law to be had, and even a parchment hat was better than none at all when it was raining outside. Their soldiers and guards were sent to hold the fortifications around the palace, key parts of the inside carefully garrisoned as well, and then they finally marched on the Chamber of Assembly. A strange procession of priests, highborn and spies. Only four soldiers, enough to carry a large bench that they immediately began ramming into the ancient doors. Once, twice, thrice and then the doors opened. Seated on the tall seat of her office, flanked by soldiers and the bearded Master of Orders, the First Prince of Procer awaited them all in the full and resplendent regalia of her rank.

"Hasenbach," Balthazar snarled. "Why are you here?"

"The Highest Assembly is in session, traitor," Cordelia Hasenbach said, face a mask of frigid contempt. "Where else would I be?"

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, so as usual extra chapter in the eponymous tab. This one's titled 'Winter I', set during the time between Books IV and V in northern Procer.

Barthumphries

It would be nice if those people who started vote threads would also start a typo thread. In too many posts either the typo thread is buried or it simply doesn't exist at all.

who once more this might had been appointed the carrier of ill news.

Change might to night

TeK

Welcome to the series. You'll soon learn that typo threads are useless anyway.

Safi

"Hasenbach", Balthazar snarled. "Why are you here?"

"To vote at <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>, traitor," Cordelia Hasenbach said, face a mask of frigid contempt. "Where else would I be?"

Liliet

OK, this one's actually funny ♥ ♥ ♥

Shveiran

Nice.

MrMaturity

Congratulations, you played yourself 😊

Sparsebeard

Ahhh, Goblin Fire, just the thing that was missing for Cat's arrival.

darkness559

"I swear that wasn't my fault!"
-Cat, probably

Sugar Roll

It's not the Black Queen's fault...said no one ever.

Kakavorin

I mean, it's Cat's fault to begin with.

Mental Mouse

Actually, I don't think even we could pin this one on Cat. Pilgrim's attack on Black left Scribe playing loose cannon, and allowed the Silver Traitors to lay hands on goblinfire.

Halinn

It's a city burning with goblinfire, who else could be at fault but the Black Queen? It's her trademark signature

Shveiran

Ah, but you see, that situation would never have occurred if the stairway had not been secured by the Black Queen. With the Stairway open, Hasenback's uncle would have been hot on Black's trail with a large force and his experienced insights, quite possibly cornering him without outside interventions.

Instead, the forces trying to encircle the Black Knight's expedition were led by inexperienced commanders and down a forty-thousand strong army at the Legions' back. Truly, it was that situation that caused the Pilgrim's intervention, so it is ultimately Cat's fault.

Also, if Amadeus had been killed it is possible Scribe would not have chosen this way to mourn him; and it was the threat of the Black Queen that forced the Pilgrim to stay his hand. Again, clearly Cat's fault for existing.

Mhm, I appear to be slipping climbing all these mirrors. Hand me those suction caps, will you? I'm sure I can climb the Unlikely Cause Mirror higher than this with a little assistance.

Cicero

My my, Cordelia has some big brass ones.

I'm guessing there is some code against murdering people in the Highest Assembly, such that simply killing her would make the proceeding utterly illegitimate.

caoimhinh

Yeah, there's a reason they didn't try to murder her, but rather kept her prisoner while they held the session of the Highest Assembly without her.

Killing her right now will have them hanged as traitors no matter what.

I'm surprised the Holies actually believed that the Heroes would side with them, are they so high-level hypocrites that they believe their own lie?

Hardric62

No, they just remember that moment the Saint of Bitches indulged and enforced their brainless shenanigans with the whole Arch-Heretic debacle, completely unaware that she was doing so in order to make the whole country burn to be replaced by something 'worthy'.

Mouth-breathers, all of them.

greatwyrmgold

That's not hypocrisy, that's just indoctrination. And who's more susceptible to indoctrination than those who believe their doctrine is the word of infallible, omnibenevolent gods?

Liliet

>I'm surprised the Holies actually believed that the Heroes would side with them, are they so high-level hypocrites that they believe their own lie?

You doubted that?

caoimhinh

I expected them to at least be conscious of their own bullshit. I'm astonished of how they actually believe themselves to be the good guys.

It's the kind of surprise one gets when realizing the scope of things. Like, you know someone is an asshole but then you see them beat a child, so you get surprised of how far his "assholery" goes.

I know the Holies are hypocrite and corrupt bastards, it's one thing to see them pretend in front of others and spout lies to sell themselves as good, but I didn't think they would still believe themselves to really be good.

I'm guessing Balthazar felt the same when he saw the Holies were convinced Heroes would join their cause.

Liliet

You don't really understand how people work, do you? :3

Of anything, the first person you have to convince is yourself. Everyone's a hero of their own story, Actual Card-Carrying Villains From Praes notwithstanding. Everyone LOVES to believe that they're in the right, and it takes a serious clarity of thinking (or serious cultural slant a la Praes) to actually PERCEIVE being in the wrong.

And these aren't people remarkable for their clarity in thinking.

They could be making deals with actual devils and still believe they were doing the will of Above somehow, because it's just more comfortable that way.

Shveiran

I think the Holies are simply secluded away from the Evil vs. Good strife, safe in Salia, ever hearing of events only through so many intermediaries that the grim details of reality are filtered away. They believe in a simpler world, where white and black are clearly divided.

Now that they first find themselves faced with a complex, close-at-hand issue, that brings them to believe that since they are good and on the side of Good, it only stands to reason that anyone opposing them is wicked and Evil. Since the Chosen clearly aren't Evil, why wouldn't they side with them?

Many among them are not in bad faith. They simply have what we feel is a flawed perception of reality. You can be despicable and still be perfectly coherent with your own vision, after all.

Do0d

I wouldn't say they're hypocrites, rather that they are incredibly conceited.

I mean they believe that them declaring someone a heretic makes it so in the eyes of the Heavens.

Shveiran

Playing Devil's advocate here, but why wouldn't they?

They are the highest institution of what they perceive as the most important church on Calernia (the Lanterns and the Callowans are clearly barely more than backwater tribes, and don't get me started on the League...). It's not like the Chosen are in the habit of being from the cloth, and when they are they go around smacking Evil rather than play politics or research scriptures.

Above doesn't point down to condemn heretics on its own, so why wouldn't they think it's their job?

If not them, who?

One could call them judgmental, of course, but that is the idea behind the Gods Above, isn't it?

That Above has a plan, a way of living mortals should strive to uphold because that way lie good things. And mortals do not, they need to be corrected. Through teaching, through example, through scolding, through punishments, through Light and Fury... The methods may vary, but the core belief is that there is a truth, and if you are not trying to following it you are doing it wrong.

It makes perfect sense for them to point at Villains and say "That! That is the epitome of what you shouldn't be doing! Say no to Blackqueening, kids!".

WuseMajor

At the moment, it seems like Cordy has more soldiers in the immediate area than they do, so if anyone is going to be killed here, it's unlikely to be her.

Decius

There is now.

There was mention of a rule that allowed the assembly to convene in emergencies after a summons regardless of whether a normal quorum was present. It had been mentioned that the time had already elapsed but they couldn't get in.

Cordelia has been the entire highest assembly for long enough to conduct any business that she wanted to. Any pretense of legitimacy or ex post facto legitimacy that the conspirators might ever have hoped for is gone, since the Highest Assembly was duly convened and has already done everything to counter the attack.

And, of course, Cat is going to arrive just before the city burns with goblinfire, as is traditional.

Shveiran

Oh. OH. That is actually pretty clever, I hope that's what she went with. I was mostly thinking she picked that hiding spot because no one would have looked for her there, but your suggestion is so much better.

konstantinvoncarstein

It could be both

NullKaze

"I AM the highest assembly"

Sparsebeard

Not yet!

Hardric62

It's treason then.

Decius

Technically yet, The time since summons were sent has elapsed, so the assembly convened without the normal quorum. The same gambit that was going to allow the conspirators to pass their coup has instead allowed Cordelia to pass hers.

Insanenoodlyguy

Hmm, everybody's been talking about how Hanno might actually get a "don't kill" from his coin on Cat, but now I'm thinking it might not even come to that. the way events are converging, the heroes are sure to arrive at the peak of tension, and Hanno is likely going to flip a coin on Corrine Hasselhoff for allying with the Arch-Heretic

Andrew Mitchell

> Hanno is likely going to flip a coin on Corrine Hasselhoff for allying with the Arch-Heretic

Just so long as he doesn't do it on Cordelia Hasenbach, we're all good. 😊(I got a chuckle out of your version of her name.)

Soronel Haetir

Interesting how people can't remember Scribe even when she's right there, very different from Assassin who presents an always-shifting face.

Liliet

Changer vs Stranger 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Either way it's danger. 😬

caoimhinh

That reminded me of this song:

"Oh, I'm a stranger, I'm a changer, and I'm danger... maybe..."

erebus42

I'm pretty sure they'd still be classified as a Stranger as well.

Liliet

True! But like Changer-Stranger or just Stranger :3

Mental Mouse

Yeah, it was a hoot seeing a trained observer run directly into Scribe's Aspect, and get flat-out bounced. Can't blame the guy for swearing.

Javvies

Huh. I wonder what Louis is going to want from Scribe. Also, definitely Malicia's people are the arsonists.

Yeah. The White Knight and the Witch of the Woods are not going to deal kindly with Serigny and his conspirators. Hanno is Judgement's minion. And the Choir of Judgement is going to be all kinds of "the letter of the Law", not the spirit of it.

Haha. Cordelia has played them, even if she didn't see this coming.

I wonder what's going on with Augur.

jesdynf

That's a huge assumption. Cordelia's thrown a lot of villain flags recently, and her dredging project is still proceeding, and the Seraphim are unpredictable by mortals per design.

Javvies

Cordelia is, as yet, not Named, and the lawful First Prince of Procer. So no bypassing her legal position by being a Villain.

And while her actions have likely been against tradition, they have been within the boundaries of the Law of Procer. As long as she doesn't call upon Hanno to exercise Judgement upon the situation, or otherwise give him reason to flip the coin on her, Cordelia is presumed to be in the right as far as he is concerned.

He doesn't judge, and she's still the lawful ruler of Procer being faced with an unlawful coup attempt.

Mental Mouse

And frankly, for Cordelia to call on Hanno would be a pretty fair bet, even if the stakes are excessive.

NZPIEFACE

I can just see Cat getting blamed for this anyways.

Liliet

>And the Choir of Judgement is going to be all kinds of "the letter of the Law", not the spirit of it.

That makes no sense, considering the looter guy before.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, Hanno is very much the Guideverse's incarnation of "mortals can guess at God's/the Gods' will, but never truly know it".

The looters and the draper they were robbing are a clear indication of that.

caoimhinh

People in the comments in previous chapters: Hmm, a city on fire, seems like Cat will be blamed.

Catherine: ...

Other people in the comments: Nah, there's no Goblinfire, that's her trademark and without it she won't be blamed for this.

Catherine: Sees the flags rising and her Narrative instinct triggers Did they just...? Oh, fuck, no...

Scribe: "They have three full carts' worth of Goblinfire."

Catherine: Godsdamn it! Looks to the Realms beyond Creation, to the Gods and the Readers You just had to say it, didn't you?

Hahahahahahahahaha

Raved Thrad

Didn't Serigny mention demons, too? Those just have to show up now, too.

Andrew Mitchell

Saying Hasenbach was summoning demons was just a lie to give a reason for burning a quarter of the city.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, given the lay of the board, the only ones who could conceivably summon demons would be Malicia's folks, but (1) even she's probably not that crazed, and (2) it's Scribe who seems to have the mages on the spot.

Liliet

Or rather, it's Scribe who's willing to actually burn them (reveal their identities)

Hellspirit

Perfect.

Like when folks brought up kiliean and we got briefed in that the following chapter.

caoimhinh

I do love it when EE answers our questions in the next chapter. It's not always feasible, but it happens from time to time.

greatwyrmgold

My thoughts exactly. The author knows us too well...

Mental Mouse

Kairos, is that you?

JJR

"As was the telltale mark of the Black Queen bringing her enemies to heel.

"Malicia wants to sink the Liesse Accords," Louis said. "Yet you are attempting to protect them. Why?"

This is just so great. The guy recognizes that Cat would be blamed for the fire if it happens even though it wouldn't be her fault. But still thinks all those other times were legit.

caoimhinh

That's Procerans for you.

Hardric62

Well, there is the fact that how many were actually her fault is irrelevant. For the masses, Fire is her trademark, and that's enough.

Shveiran

You mean the same guy who just went "Oh, so you want MY help saving MY city from being erased from the map in such a way that it discredits both our religious and temporal institutions, throwing our country into a terrible civil war that would destroy us forever even if we weren't also being invaded by the greatest villain of the Continent and his undead army – an invasion, let me just had, that we have been so far straight-up losing? WELL THAT'S GONNA COST YOU MISSUS."

Fucking Procerans, man.

Liliet

TBF, his point is "Oh so you want my help COVERING UP EVIDENCE OF YOUR INVOLVEMENT in setting our everything on fire? And you're blackmailing me with our entire city possibly getting set even more on fire to get me to do it? You think you can just do that and I'll go along with it?"

Don't teach hostage takers that they can get anything out of you that easily. Remember Cat's response to Akua's threat to the orphanage?

Shveiran

Aside from the fact that Scribe in this instance is less of a terrorist and more like a renegade terrorist that is offering to help you stop the other terrorists, so refusing her demands is a bit different IMO...

...I can get behind the logic of "no deal with terrorists because otherwise we'll be back here in a month when the next violent bastard wants something." But context matters.

It is reasonable to use this approach when the threat you face is limited – as in, say, an orphanage or even a full city because there is so much more at stake that you'd be surrendering.

Here... well, if Salia falls it's likely Procer and life on Calernia's surface are both screwed. That's not a good moment to play chicken with one of your very few options. You have a shot at preventing the apocalypse, QUIT WHILE YOU ARE AHEAD. Don't play chicken with these fucking stakes, man.

TeK

You should recognize a negotiating tactic known as "bullshitting with a straight face". I doubt he would actually let Salia burn, but to let such an amazing leverage just pass you without even trying to use it is, frankly, stupid. I guess this is how your own preconceptions change what you are reading. I do not assume all Procerans are asshats, so I see his "let them bleed" for leveraging a weakness, which is smart and not presumptuous, while you apparently think Procerans to be asshats, and so see it as arrogant presumption that everyone will bow and scrape to literally save your ass from fire.

The truth is somewhere in the middle, but you need to understand the context. Black and Cat need Salia as it is a place for negotiations, they need Procer being alive and not on fire. So Scribe will try and put out fires and find goblinfire regardless of whether or not Circle will help her. So they will get her assistance anyway, while she needs their. Not to mention, it is at least hinted that she expects them to return both munitions and documents back, and perhaps this is what she must pay for.

On the other, other hand, we can see it in Piligrim, when he was startled by Cat proclaiming that she does not actually fear violence, and if pushed will burn Procer to the ground. It may very well also, at the same time be that kind of basic assumptions that Scribe and Black are helping them because they are not monsters who will without a blink eat alive a hundred thousands babies if that will get them what they wanted. You know, an understandable mistake. In that case blackmailing them for a genuine attempt to save them is assholery.

So, if he believes that Scribe saves him out of goodness of her heart, he's an asshole, if he believes that she saves him because it benefits her, he's a smart guy.

Shveiran

I'm aware it is a negotiating tactic. It is still a stupid one, when your back is to the wall. What you could gain is not worth the risk you miscalculated and the other side will actually call your bluff.

If the asshat fits, let him wear it 😊But the “Fucking Procerans” was just a jest; my jab was meant at his chosen approach.

Tek

No, it's not stupid. For many reasons, but most of all because it had worked. It is annoying as hell to deal with, but he had a pretty good read on the situations. Scribe just started fucking Malicia in the back, she would not turn halfway around cause it's too hard. She came to him, that is important. Besides what she'll do if the bluff falls. Start working with Malicia again and burn the place to the green, failing her master in the process? Nope. Abstain from putting out the fires and risk burning Salia and failing Black's orders in the process? Nope. It's basically freebie, all you gotta have are guts to go through.

Decius

Of course. If she didn't burn all those other cities with goblinfire, it wouldn't be her trademark and it wouldn't be an effective way to blame her.

RoflCat

Who want to bet that whatever Louis is planning to ask of Scribe, she already knew he would ask that and judged it acceptable cost, and is the whole reason why she even showed herself in the first place.

Like, she already knew where the texts and the goblinfire are, but rather than using Praesi agents to take it back she's using Procer's own hands to do it thus whatever they plan to spin about it, it can't be pointed back to her.

Because they're handing it to her in a trade, either he has to out himself as making deals with THE ENEMY or he has to keep quiet about it.

caoimhinh

Also, she can very well kill him when the deed is done. If he asked for information, dead men tell no tales (not accounting for Necromancy, but there's counters for that too). If he asked for a physical object, she can get it back, and if he asked for her collaboration in doing something, she can go back on her word.

Louis feeling like “Hah, I got you now, Scribe, you need me and now you are gonna pay!” in this chapter, seemed like a huuge mistake that a veteran spymaster should know by now that he shouldn't do.

Hardric62

I want to bet that he knows that. The wrapping is all for the form. Everybody at the table is smart enough to know that he will be asking for pretty much what Scribe is ready to give up. With more or less haggling for appearances (probably less, they are rather smart people with a severe emergency).

Shveiran

One would hope, yes.

Mental Mouse

As I said on the last chapter, Necromancy doesn't seem to allow for interrogation unless you've already got the person alive to start with, in which case it becomes just a subset of "you have them completely in your power, with mages". The only undead we've seen to retain their memories and personality, were either known to be pre-prepared (Scribe! Cat), or plausibly so (DK's Revenants). Otherwise, they're just an anonymous spirit or spell animating a corpse.

Liliet

My guess is that he's going to request more aggressive action against Ime's network from her. It's something she can do immediately (so no going back on her word later) and it can't exactly be undone. It'll drain both her resources and Ime's, meaning draining Praesi resources period, and the best part, it's something that doesn't go contrary to Scribe's immediate prioritized goal (cleaning up the mess and ensuring Praes has a firm position in negotiations). In choosing between tactical gain and strategic loss, she'll have to eat the strategic loss here.

laguz24

Cat: The city was on fire and it wasn't my fault.

Cordelia: Hide where you are least likely to be found, and p.s. what name do you think Balthasar will be getting if he lives that long?

Sparsebeard

The Bloody Bastard!

caoimhinh

Sparsebeard

"IF" he survives his current predicament, I got to agree.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

That last line. They are totally wrecked.

caoimhinh

"You need our help," the spymaster smiled. "To find those munitions before half the capital burns green and your master ends up being held responsible."

Ah, Procerans, even when dying and desperate, they still try to pretend they have a high hand. I mean, sure, it's not good to show weakness to a strong opponent, but there's a limit to how much you can bluff. The only reason Salia isn't already on fire is that Scribe is handling the situation (that she caused, but that still shows she's got the undeniable upper hand). It seems to have worked this time, but that could have ended very badly for him.

In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if Louis gets himself killed due to whatever he bargained with Scribe.

Mental Mouse

> In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if Louis gets himself killed due to whatever he bargained with Scribe.

I doubt it. The Practical Evil folks are actually pretty good about keeping their word, and Louis is very much on the right side of the story. Of course, if he gets too greedy, that could scotch things, but he's probably too sensible for that.

JJR

I have to wonder if that bit about the plan being "an entirely academic exercise" is actually, in the most literal way, true. Augur can apparently see even just intent, so putting together a plan with the intent of carrying it out might be seen. But if it really was just a total hypothetical that they have no intent to follow up on. Maybe that hides it from sight. That said, I'm still not sure how it goes from purely academic to plan being followed without tripping the Augur alarm. Well, the story did mention the Silver Letters controlling the Augur's mail (I think), but it's still a tight deadline to shut down her mail before she sees that they plan to do that and get a letter out.

Decius

If the plan as a whole is completely academic, and the agents enacting parts of the plan are merely testing an academic hypothesis, or unaware of the nature of their actions, then perhaps that's the nature of the blind spot.

Scribe or Black know or suspect that Scribe being unaware of the full nature of the plan is important to the Augur also being unaware of it, which is why she needs to acquire it. Once she has it, she can INTEND to give Malica's agents orders to carry out the plan, immediately revealing them all to the Augur who can help wrap the situation up nicely.

mamm0nn

It's purely academic, until they're certain that the Augur's gaze is elsewhere. They already reasoned that she cannot be aware of everything at once, so if focussed on f.e. the Dead King this plot can be turned from academic to real without tipping her off.

Liliet

THIS IS SO FUCKING SATISFYING

~~no im not saying that because i called it wrt Scribe+Ime~~

Andrew Mitchell

greatwyrmgold

Why are people still sure the White Knight is going to turn on Cordelia and others trying to create an alliance of Good and Evil against the dead? He's shown himself to be a very reasonable hero, aside from his lack of options between "die, sinner" and "eh, go on, not my problem". He seems like the hero whose Good is closest to being a non-deontological good out of all the heroes (aside from those firmly in cahoots with the Black Queen), for all that it's based on the rule of the coin.

Liliet

IKR. Hanno is doing his best and avoiding all the obvious pitfalls of his position (judging people based on which side they are on while missing bad shit from 'his' side, escalating conflicts by accusing the mob, failing to draw conclusions from available information, ignoring people who are also trying to help,)

Nairne .01

Hah, I think you forget that "he doesn't judge, he flips a coin".

Liliet

From the outside view of common folk, from the point of view of the story, it's the exact same thing. Judgement is passed and comes from his direction.

Shveiran

Because he is not "reasonable", he is the enforcer of a law no one can either learn or change.

Hanno's desires are, ultimately, irrelevant, because he won't act on them.

His one noteworthy trait is that he trusts the Seraphim, which makes it a given that if a major decision comes up (like, say, "should I ally with this Villainess to save the world or is it actually a bad idea?", which is not exactly a question one could blame him for asking, given the possible repercussions) he will look for the Seraphim's seal of approval.

Believing this is not quite the same as comparing him to a murderhobo. It is simply pointing out that the only mercy or compromise Hanno will ever have are those sponsored by the Seraphim. Do we know what that Choir thinks of Cordelia or Cat? No.

Can we know? No.

Do we have an idea what would factor in? No.

We can speculate all we want, but let's face it, there is no way to know until it happens.

ninegardens

I mean yes... but also... certain comments made in a certain adjacent interlude chapter (->) may hint that he is more open to change than we might at first assume.

shieldredblog

No? He routinely murders strangers on the say so of Seraphim. If they told him to stab the Witch of the Woods in the face, we've seen nothing that even hinted he wouldn't do it.

He might feel bad afterwards, but he would do it.

Shveiran

What shieldredblog said.

It's not that we haven't seen Hanno as a kind, humble soul in other chapters.

It is that we have never seen him so much as doubt, let alone disagree with the Seraphim. His personal opinions and virtues are irrelevant //when discussing his likely actions and choices// because they won't weight on that decision's scales. Only the Seraphim will.

Liliet

>he is the enforcer of a law no one can either learn or change.

Book of All Things, dude. The law is right fucking there. Everyone knows it.

Shveiran

You keep saying that, but I don't think it works like that.

EVEN IF we assume that the Book of All Things is a perfect transposition of the Seraphim's views in all other languages, something I'm not sure we can do because:

- a) translation doesn't work that way, errors are made and can easily become relevant
- b) who wrote that thing? The Angels? Or men?
- c) The Choirs are not of one mind on how you should act in practice; they squabble, they disagree, they champion different virtues. So why are you assuming the Book of All Things perfectly matches the Seraphim's view?

EVEN THEN, the Book is not a code of laws, it's scriptures. Trying to use it to define what earn you eradication in a concrete, practical situation leads to madness. It's not how it works. Unless there is a passage that says "the following things will get you smote by the Choir of Judgment, yo: number 1, abusing your religious authority to push a mob to stone a fool, number 2..." it won't work.

Valla

With regards to the book of all things I believe this backs up shveiran's point

"The passage went on to say some pointed things about villainy being a twisting of that tendered purpose, and so Evil as well as evil, but I'd always taken the Book with a grain of salt. It was a beloved and well-worn story in Callow that some ancient Count of Denier had used that very passage to argue that it was in fact impious not pay taxes promptly and in full. Once words were put to ink, anybody could put them to use and those particular words were so old none could say who'd first written them – more than simply the purposes, I suspected that the words themselves had shifted over the centuries. They couldn't not have, after all, considering no one in those days had spoken Lower Miezian before said empire came to Calernia and the Callowan manuscripts of the Book were in that language. No translation could be perfect, my expanding repertoire of spoke and written languages had made painfully clear."

Ch 40 Entreaty

maxwell wearing

hahahahahahahahaha

Oh my fucking god that final twist DESTROYED me. Oh thats incredible. Oh boy.

Can't wait to see how this plays out.

Cap'n Smurfy

"They have also brought into the city what I estimate to be three full cart's worth of goblinfire."

Oooh. There's no escaping blame for the fire now Catherine.

"As was the telltale mark of the Black Queen bringing her enemies to heel."

Yup there it is.

Liliet

And now, the conflict is: do Scribe and Louis succeed at averting the blame from Catherine? 😊

Valkyria

Well well well. Quite ballsy of you Cordelia.

Also... just damn badass. She doesn't even need to enter a room to make a dramatic entrance. That's some ruler quality right there.

Also poor Cat. She's most definitely going to get blamed for this somehow. Even if the Goblinfire doesn't light up, its very existence will "prove" she was somehow involved in this.

Liliet

We have MULTIPLE spymasters working to ensure she DOESNT get blamed for this, which is an absolutely fucking delightful fact about her everything

Valkyria

While that is quite true it is also well known that people always seem to find a way to blame the Arch Heretic of the East for stuff. Wonder why that is ...

Shveiran

It's almost like they painted her as Satan or something.

JJR

"Multiple spymaster who should be by all rights be at odds with eachother are instead collaborating to deflect blame away from the Black Queen (known city burner). Clearly she did it and has blackmail on one or more of these spy 'masters'."

Liliet

That's if anyone ever learns what they are doing though, which is not something that's going to happen.

mamm0nn

"The Silver Letters have been contracting alchemists in attempts to divine the recipe for our traditional munitions," the Scribe agreed. "They have also brought into the city what I estimate to be three full cart's worth of goblinfire."

Damn it, Scribe. I know you're too factual and not bantering to go for each easy dunk, but really? You couldn't have added the following?:

"Which they're trying to locate by burning every alchemy shop, and all the houses around it too for good measure."

Contrary to the rest of the chat, I think that the Scribe is still responsible for both sides of the Eyes' actions. The eyes in Salia only recently regained connection with the Tower, same as the good kingdoms the knowledge of Praes isn't all-knowing without reason when it doesn't have to be so, and this scheme is so subtle there's no reason for Lady Ime to have learned of it.

More important and damning, Scribe likely found and controls all the Eyes' scrying means in Salia to prevent the tower from knowing anything she doesn't want to know. Given the situation, Ime may not know that Salia is burning at all until a messenger by foot or a carrier bird reaches the Tower by the old ways to notify her of this. Which wouldn't have happened yet, probably.

Or also likely, Black scried the Scribe and told her of the situation and/or the NameLore that the Scribe got herself in. Or the moment that the first prince 'miraculously survived' and threw a neat operation into an undeniably evil coup, Scribe saw the writing on the wall and that she was now in a Story with a conveniently appearing Chosen, destined to get her killed. Forget the Preasi beast biting it's own tail, this is the Scribe about to be swallowed by her own scheme and using Black's tricks to (at least try or flawlessly) slip the noose by being the lesser evil fighting the greater evil that wasn't her all along.

ciara

That's not contrary to the chat at all. This chapter spells out that Scribe is directing both factions of the Eyes:

"'It was your scheme, wasn't it?' Louis de Sartrons suddenly said. 'All of this was plotted in concert with the Tower. And then the Carrion Lord pulled your leash.'

""
'If that were the case, such a plan would have been made when Lord Black was held prisoner by heroes,' the Scribe said."

Scribe set this whole game in motion while Black was a captive with the intent of toppling Cordelia and leaving Procer to get bulldozed by the Dead King. Then Cat freed Black and filled him in on her latest schemes, he Skyped Scribe and now she's picking up after herself because Black is 100% Team Cat and Cat needs Cordelia in charge and Procer relatively intact.

Some Smartass

I don't think Scribe's change of plan was purely because Amadeus said so. She's entirely capable of disobeying him when she thinks he's wrong or "compromised." I think she also likes the effect Catherine's scheme has on him; he clearly wants to live in this new political landscape where villains can win, not just die creating it.

mamm0nn

The chat, as in these replies. The main thoughts on most posts seem to be that it has now been confirmed that the Scribe indeed schemed all this, but her hatchets are fighting the torchers of Lady Ime because the Tower is pursuing a different agenda and Ime overrode Scribe's authority. Chat seems to think that the Tower is aware of this, I think that Scribe by negligence of undoing her previous orders or even by ordering the torchers post-revelation of the Chosen and the failed coup, is responsible for both sides of the Eyes' actions even now.

Liliet

>The eyes in Salia only recently regained connection with the Tower

No. Only Iserre had scrying blocked, along with the Observatory not working. The Salia/Tower connections were working the entire time.

> this scheme is so subtle there's no reason for Lady Ime to have learned of it

Is it subtle? Is it really? I don't think Ime and Scribe have completely independent non-intersecting networks, and Scribe had no reason to be deliberately trying to hide from Ime something that Ime would be equally interested in doing. There's no reason for Ime to NOT be involved in this.

And if this was all Scribe's operation, why the fuck could she not have simply called off the people setting fire to everything? I'd considered she might be deliberately staging this to show off that she's helping, last chapter, but if the goblinfire thing goes off it'll spiral out of her control catastrophically. (And I don't think she's lying about the goblinfire)

mamm0nn

It's true that scrying in Salia might've been working all along, though wouldn't Iserre be enough in the way to cause interference? But it doesn't quite matter, Scribe most likely controls everything that goes through those scrying means by virtue of being in Salia and Named.

Considering the current hostilities between Black and Malicia, I see no reason for Scribe to not similarly keep Ime in the dark or at least be passive-aggressive about it. She knows Black's current view on Malicia and the Tower, and if the First Prince and many Princes are kept out of the loop until the coup happened then it is certainly subtle enough until the first die is cast. So yes, it's very reasonable to assume that she would keep this subtle enough that Ime wouldn't find out about it just because.

On the goblinfire, who's to say she hasn't already found it months ago? She's Named, she's here to screw things up royally, she has had plenty of time, and there aren't too many places where the Silver Letters could research that level of alchemy secretly. That she wouldn't have found the goblinfire or at least its general location is just as likely as that she had it and quickly removed it when finding out that the plans changed.

Or, also still very much possible, there was no goblinfire to begin with. You really think she couldn't pull off a bluff with her powers erasing the knowledge of what her tell looks like? Or, also possible, there is goblinfire but for obvious reasons of secrecy and privacy the Silver Letters stashed it in some remote town where there are simpler reasons to keep any accidents quiet.

Whatever the case, whether she is willing to let the goblinfire burn and Salia burn with it if it comes to that (she's still a Villain after all), that she removed it long ago, or that there was never in Salia to begin with, I don't see anything wrong with my theory.

Andrew Mitchell

The end of that interlude was so, so satisfying. I loved feeling simultaneously relieved, surprised and delighted.

Mental Mouse

About that goblinfire, note that WOTW is known to have a way to (partly) deal with goblinfire, by manipulating time to run out its duration quickly.

Shveiran

True, but last time she did in a deserted mountain pass in a spot with almost no infrastructure.

My guess is that such a solution would be much more costly when deployed in a city.

Still. Girl is resourceful, she may have more tricks up her sleeve.

konstantinvoncarstein

In book 2, Masego used a contract with a devil to freeze goblinfire. What could be better to freeze something than a goddess born of Winter?

Do0d

Masego built an ice bridge over goblinfire.

Do0d

This time she doesn't have Warlock to gather all the goblinfire in a neat little ball of flaming water.

Author Unknown

Boss, we found a bunch of goblin munitions and want to study them. We need funds to set up a hidden lab in the middle nowhere, where it will be safe and secure.

What? No, no. How will I micromanage everything from so far away?

Where then? This stuff is that dangerous green fire that is impossible to put out.

I have just the place, under my bed, what could possibly go wrong with me there to guard them. Though it might make the mattress a bit lumpy...

konstantinvoncarstein

Balthazar is really a moron

Nairne .01

Well, he is so desperate for revenge that he just falls into the trap known as "people will believe what they want to believe" – even if its an easily discernable trap if he just stopped and thought about it for a moment

Adrian_V

Cat's pyromaniac tendencies (no matter how much she denies them!!!) are so common they are being weaponized against her xD, now we just know at least 1 house will burn green....and we know at least some people will blame Cat xD

Liliet

Not necessarily.

The running gag has been brought up and discussed, and now the plot is to specifically avert it.

Having it actually happen won't add anything to the joke.

Adrian_V

I was talking more about the INTENTION, that and maybe either the house of some noble or a warehouse from the letters could burn green, just 1 of those would be enough to blame Cat in the eyes of some people (mostly those who are a little idiotic and believe every rumour they hear).

Liliet

(Also, it remains true that Catherine has never deployed goblinfire against//in a civilian target)

Adrian_V

Thruth is irrelevant!!!!!! xD

Serously half of callow believes she intentionally burned....was it liese? can't remember wich city it was right now.

aran

It was Summerholm when she was a claimant, then Summerholm again. I think it could have later been Liesse as well though? People burning cities with goblinfire and her getting blamed became a running gag.

aran

"They have also brought into the city what I estimate to be three full cart's worth of goblinfire."

All right, NOW it's a party.

Rude of them to set the city on fire before Catherine even gets here to take the blame.

aran

"I swear it was on fire when I got here"

"Suuuuuuuure it was, Foundling"

aran

"Hasenbach," Balthazar snarled. "Why are you here?"

"The Highest Assembly is in session, traitor," Cordelia Hasenbach said, face a mask of frigid contempt. "Where else would I be?"

Daaaaaang, Cordelia still got it.

Satan

So the White Knight is "serene" while passing down judgement, since he outsources most of his thinking work to the heavens? Black definitely hates him.

Interlude: And Yet We Stand

"There are some who will, for what was writ in this volume, call me traitor. Name me a hater of all that we are. But it is untrue. I weep at what we are for I see what we could be, what we tried to be until we lost our way: an empire unlike any other, where the law is just and measured and rule belongs not to one but many. It is not hatred of the patient, to despise the disease."
– Extract from the conclusion 'The Ruin of Empire, or, a Call to Reform of the Highest Assembly', by Princess Eliza of Salamans

Agnes still missed the tall peaks and blue skies of Rhenia, but sometimes in this particular garden it felt like she had never left. It was the bareness of it, she supposed. The palace was filled with gardens each competing to be more ornate and opulent than the last, and this one had lost the contest. A handful of bare trees, a broken headless statue of a man Cordelia insisted was First Prince Clothor Merovins, and two roughly uncomfortable stone benches. Agnes Hasenbach liked the one by the statue best, for she could glimpse the skies while enjoying the familiar sensation of being surrounded by the tall walls of the open courtyard.

The traitor-guards owned by Balthazar Serigny had allowed her to return to the garden from her rooms, and even allowed her some illusion of privacy: though every way in and out was heavily guarded, within she had been left alone. It would change nothing, of course. Not with her. The sky told her the hour was near – hunter ascendant, the hound's eye waning – but not quite there yet. And so the Augur tread softly on the snow to the bottom of a dying tree and bent to pick up a thin and long branch. She returned to sit on her bench and, leaning forward, began to trace signs in the snow.

Iron. Rope. Candle. Harp. Bone. Mirror.

And as she finished the last stroke on the old symbol some called the verdant mirror, she came. Leaning forward as well from her seat, the Wandering Bard gazed at the signs in the snow.

"That old Mavii trick?" the Bard chuckled. "Gods, it's been ages."

And so, Agnes Hasenbach thought, it begins.

—

Balthazar drew his sword before the savage was even finished speaking. Surprise gave way to rage at having been made sport of in such a manner: she'd never even left the palace, had she? Some servants must have hidden her in their quarters while the soldiers who'd save her ran off towards the high districts carrying some other blonde woman in her clothes. His Silver Letters dropped the bench they'd been meaning to use as a ram and reached for their own blades even as the tall spy suppressed a grimace. He had four of his own and he was fair hand with a blade himself, but Hasenbach had a fully twenty soldiers spread out in the Chamber of Assembly – all of them Salian garrison, from their tabard.

Prince Arsene of Bayeux did know his way around a sword, from what Balthazar remembered, but the Princess of Aisne would be dead weight in the fight. The priests even worse, though some might serve as healers at least, and damn Hasenbach but even though the amount of sworn delegates and royal candidates with his group meant they outnumbered her significantly few of those would be willing to draw a blade on the First Prince even if they had one, or knew how to wield it. One of the Holies – Sister Adelie, he recognized – strode forward bold as you please even as the soldiers unsheathed their own swords in response to his people.

"Cordelia Hasenbach, Prince of Rhenia, you stand accused of heresy," Sister Adelie announced, voice echoing across the chamber. "All of you, throw down your swords and-"

"The House of Light has not yet been given leave to speak," the Master of Orders cut through. "Be silent or be removed from this Chamber."

"Rosalie," Balthazar spoke softly without turning, eye on the enemy soldiers even as the priests began blustering. "Fetch reinforcements. Now. At least sixty, we may need to force the room."

His agent whispered assent and she began a slow retreat, though she'd break into a run the moment she passed the corner. Cordelia Hasenbach's blue eyes followed her leaving, but she said nothing. Did she have them surrounded, he wondered, and so did not care because Rosalie was about to be slain? Or did she truly think that he wouldn't have her dragged out of the Chamber and stabbed the moment he had the men? The woman was a northerner but not without cunning, so she could not possibly believe the latter could she?

"The Highest Assembly has been convened," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "Assermentés, sit the thrones to which you are sworn. I will brook no more delays."

"You've been accused of treason, heresy and tyranny," Princess Clotilde of Aisne said. "You have no right to sit that throne, Cordelia Hasenbach."

"Such accusations may be brought only before the Assembly, when it is convened," the blonde royal said. "It is not convened until the sworn delegates and the sitters present have claimed their seats. Unless, of course, you intend to give the House of Light right of trial over Proceran royalty."

Fuck, Balthazar thought, for though the trick itself was mere procedure it would –

"The Heavens spare none their judgement, be they high or low," Brother Bertran proclaimed.

"Curb your tongue, priest," Prince Arsene of Bayeux said. "We come to unseat a tyrant, not crown the Holies in her stead."

In mere moments one of the priest with a better head on their shoulder would step in and retract the hasty claim, or at least nudge it to the side, but the damage had already been done. Hasenbach had been aiming at neither the House nor the two royals in the Chamber: it was the sworn delegates she'd had in her sights. Who'd just seen the two great legitimate powers of the conspiracy, the crowns and the robes, turn on each other without hesitation. They're losing trust in this coup, Balthazar cursed as he saw many of them fall into blank expressions.

The priests had converted some by conscience but others he'd seen to with threats and those threats lost power if it did not look like Balthazar Serigny would be able to carry them out by the time dawn rose. Glaring Heavens, Rosalie needed to hurry with the reinforcements or their support would melt like snow in summer sun – and if he had to put a sword behind every neck before the votes were taken, would the White Knight truly stay his hand when he broke through the lines? Balthazar suspected not.

"The House of Light would not venture to pass judgement over royalty without the consent of the Highest Assembly," Brother Philippe of the Holies said. "This is a–"

Hasenbach gestured discreetly at the soldiers flanking her and spears were slammed into the floor with deafening fracas.

"The House of Light has yet to be given leave to speak, priest," the Master of Orders said. "Wait until your petition is brought forth, or see yourself expelled from the Chamber. Assermentés, to your thrones or you will be taken as abstaining from the session."

The sworn delegates, to the silence of the priests and the dismay of the other two royals in the chamber, moved towards their thrones in charged silence. Balthazar eyed Hasenbacg closely, gauging whether he might be able to close distance with her without the soldiers getting in the way, but no: he was being watched and his agents with him. Why haven't you removed me from the Chamber yet? he wondered. Or taken him prisoner, or anything else realty. Hasenbach had the advantage right now, before his reinforcements arrived, so why was she not acting?

—

"She'll pull through, your cousin," the Bard said, comfortingly. "Don't you worry about it."

Agnes wanly smiled.

"I have known Cordelia since we were girls," she said. "I have better measure of her than anyone else alive."

That was not a boast, though Agnes would not claim that she was closest to her royal cousin of all their kin. Yet the oracle had seen her across many choices, many fates, many mistakes. And across none of these did Cordelia Hasenbach cease to be fundamentally the same woman she'd been when, fresh to her throne and strangled by her many responsibilities, she'd still made time for her odd cousin who liked to speak of flocks and stars. The same woman who'd sent her handmaids to look at the wares of southern merchants for birdwatching almanacs, and on Agnes' seventeenth nameday even obtained for her a Baalite eye. The truth at the heart of Cordelia Hasenbach was that she always chose kindness, when there was a choice to be made.

Agnes glanced at the play of shadows on the wall, moonlight and starlight and the denial of both, glimpsing what might yet be: crossroads, crucible, hallowing. The oldest treachery in the guise of the writ of angels. How tired she was, of walking on the line between abyss and abyss, of measuring her words as if ear was leant to every single one. How long had she been waiting for the end, now? Sometimes she got lost in the blue sky and the distant winds, listening to distant cries carried by the wind and the truths they whispered of. There were days where Agnes no longer knew her age, or the face of her mother. What had her father whispered in her ear, before he died? But she knew truths, and the coming of more, and in the end that would be enough. Her choices had been made before she was even given the opportunity to make them.

"Iron to bind, and rope to kill," the Augur quoted.

"At first they reddened those altars for blessings, for revels," the Bard said, "but it was desperation, later on. The Arlesites knew the secrets of steel, and though the Mavii were wonder-makers in stone theirs were wonders of peace."

"Fetters for hand and feet, the slow death of a night and day," the Augur said. "To call forth the lords and ladies of the fae."

"They were a thing of beauty, leading their supplicants in battle," the Bard fondly remembered. "Yet even that was not enough to turn the tide. The Arlesites had simply learned too well at the feet of the titans."

"The legends say they went willing, those who hung," Agnes said.

"There was a time," the Bard softly agreed. "When the days of the Mavii darkened, though, so did the practice. Oathbreakers, first. Then the craven. Then the defenceless. And bitter seeds bore bitter fruits."

"But they went willing, once upon a time," Agnes murmured.

The Bard nodded, silent.

"Sometimes there is a need for bleeding," the Augur said, looking up at the horizon.

Plumes of smoke had begun to rise, for Salia was burning. She would ask the Gods to forgive her, but she sought no absolution.

Let her silence drag her all the way to the Hells, if it was what she deserved.

—

The numbers in the Assembly were still in their favour, if the delegates they'd twisted the arms of held. Balthazar saw there were as many thrones empty as not, within, and if they crowned their royal candidates then Hasenbach was done for. She still had the votes for Rhenia and Salia, but the other three Lycaonese principalities had no representatives and neither did Prince Renato and Prince Ariel. The conspiracy had the rulers of Bayeux and Aisne as well as sworn delegates for more than enough: Aquitan, Tenerife, Segovia, Brabant, Orne, Cleves and Hainaut.

Using those votes they could crown another six princes and princesses, the same who'd abdicated at the Princes' Graveyard, and from there they would have a majority of votes even in the absolute sense. The legality of the proceedings would be much harder to deny. If the sworn delegates held. If Hasenbach did not clutter the session with other matters so no such votes could be taken. It doesn't matter, Balthazar the Bastard thought, eyeing the soldiers still keeping watch. Let her play queen for a little longer, it will matter not a whit when I have more swords than her. The moment could not come too soon.

"As is ancient law, a representative for the House of Light may now come forward and speak to the petition being put to the Highest Assembly," the Master of Orders said. "Let the second order of the evening begin."

Second? What had she – if she was keeping to the pretence of legality when what could she even – oh, fuck. The summons by the House of Light meant the formal session had begun hours ago, when Hasenbach was the only sitter in the room. As long as she kept to majority votes that didn't require a quorum or to matters in simple need of formal recognition – without voting – then she could have done a great many things without breaking the letter of the law. Potentially, Balthazar Serigny grimly realized, every empty throne in the Chamber now had a formally recognized sworn delegate in the person of Cordelia Hasenbach. It'd never hold up to a serious contest when a full session was held, true, but then it hardly needed to.

So long as she survived the night, Hasenbach would no doubt be perfectly willing to have everything on the record for this session struck and maybe even express apologies for her abuse of procedure. If she sounded highly unapologetic while making such repentance, it might actually improve her popularity with some of the Alamans royalty: they did enjoy a brisk turn of fortune in the Ebb and Flow. The House of Light put forward Sister Adelia as their speaker, which the spymaster held his breath over. At least they'd had the sense to name someone broadly familiar with the Assembly's procedures, by the looks of it. When they had the advantage the Holies could afford to break such rules as a show of power, but if they did the same on this night it would instead reek of uncouthness and desperation.

"The House of Light, in the name of the Gods Above, brings forward charges of greater heresy against the First Prince Cordelia Hasenbach," Sister Adelia announced. "Let all in Creation know that the line of Hasenbach has fallen and estranged itself from the grace of the Heavens."

"And what proof does the House of Light bring for these claims?" the Master of Order asked.

"She has made peace with the Arch-heretic of the East, declared so by a great holy conclave," Sister Adelia said, voice rising in pitch and heat. "She has forgiven the Carrion Lord's great slaughter of Procerans and even offered truce to the wicked Tyrant of Helike and his master the butchering Hierarch."

The priestess had turned to address the delegates instead of Hasenbach and her bearded creature, to his approval: she too understood that if they were to keep the veneer of legality for all this it would be by keeping that petty lot on their side. Yet they were not without qualms, Balthazar saw, for they feared setting a precedent. If the delegates vote here, on formal record, that the House could unseat a First Prince for not obeying the dictates of a conclave then they were going to have to answer very pointed questions by their own masters as to why they'd ever allow the House such power over the Assembly. Yet Sister Adeline did speak for the House, which was very much respected in moral and holy matters, and it could not be denied that Hasenbach was making pacts with an awful lot of Damned.

"Point of order," the Master of Order said. "The First Prince, after seeking the assent of this very Highest Assembly, offered truce to the Queen of Callow and the League of Free Cities. Not peace. No formal agreement was reached over the fate of the Carrion Lord."

A technicality, Balthazar thought, which shouldn't matter. If the sworn delegates were going to be swayed by the accusations of heresy, they'd not care about such quibbling. If they weren't, they'd hardly care anyway. Yet Hasenbach was being very careful to keep every part of this as lawful as she could.

What was her game, and where were his damned reinforcements?

—

"They were such vain, temperamental creatures," the Bard mused. "Even at the heyday of their influence. I suppose we all are, in our own way, but the fae were always a kind apart."

"Candle to blind," Agnes quoted, "and harp to still."

"They despise being in debt, you see, even such a small one as rope-slain in their name would induce," the Bard amusedly said. "But a circle of candles would make them mindless when they witnessed it, and then beautiful songs soothed them into a more amenable disposition. Boons could be wheedled out, then, or lesser oaths."

The Augur had taken different lesson from them. A candle in the dark drew everyone's eye, even when it was what was unfolding in the shadows that needed to be seen. And a sweet song, a beloved pleasure? That was a diversion one did not want to see through, even when they could. Never trust a man who smiles easy. Had those been the last words of her father? No, it couldn't be. Frost had crept across a branch, in the shape of a hawk with wings extended: providence was smiling down on her. Some nights, some days, she could look until her eyes watered and hardly catch glimpses of anything. Tonight the signs were overflowing, crowding her senses like eager courtiers even when she sought no answers. The wind sang songs — death, death rising with the smoke and schemes over a treacherous altar of jade — but Agnes shook her head. She needed to centre herself, or she would be lost.

"I am Agnes Hasenbach," she murmured. "I am Agnes Hasenbach, and I am here and I am now."

She tightened her fingers around the stick she still held, proof of her claims, and breathed out. The secrets, the signs, slowly ebbed away.

"Oracles always have it the worse," the Bard said, sympathetic. "Mortals aren't meant to see the way you do, so close to the deeper truth of things. The kind of foes you have to fight can't be slain."

And they always win, Agnes thought. There would be a day where she went too deep, glimpsed things so far beyond her understanding, that there would be no coming back. Not whole, not even close to it. And she was already touching the limits of what she could do: trying to peer around the edges of the darkness that shrouded the Dead King was a thin of horror, the endless chorus of screams and crazed laughter. Or even worse, deeper in, the chilling serenity of the voices worshipping him as a god. Yet she had seen things, learned things. The Black Queen, at least, was brutally straightforward in her refusal to be seen: thrice the Augur had woken up fallen in the snow, livid claw marks that soon faded on her arms and the taste of blood in her mouth.

Yet she had learned from that too, and from that learning shaped finer sight. Or had it been the other way around? Had she first glimpsed the Wandering Bard, and learned from this? Or had she only seen the shadow of any of this, and taken all sides of the crossroads in other lives? It was hard to tell the difference, sometimes.

"You are seer as well," the Augur said.

"I see things," the Bard snorted. "But a seer I am not."

"Like a bird of misfortune perched atop the tower, you see it all below," Agnes said, and her own voice sounded distant. "Stories."

"I know many stories," the other woman agreed.

"You know stories," the Augur softly laughed. "All the stories, all the time, as if they unfolded beneath your wings and you need only look down to see the lay of them. You pick, and choose, and swoop and how does it not drive you mad."

Moonlight on frost – lizard, yawning – a distant bird in the night, halfway between the lone sentinel and the weeping man. Danger, the world whispered, tread lightly. As if she needed be told. She should not have spoken so much.

"It has been a very long time," the Bard lightly said, "since someone grasped that."

"It must have been about family," Agnes frowned. "He always talked about family. He was a terrible father, but he never knew it."

Eyes studied her, then looked away. The icicle it was melting and it was weakening and it would break in three, two –

"Vain, temperamental creatures," the Bard mused. "As are we all."

Broken. For now.

–

Oh, it had been a mistake to let her speak. Balthazar understood it now. Better they had all fled and only returned when they had the soldiers to drag Hasenbach out, rather than this. It was like watching a nine-sun Arlesite duellist toying with a notchless swaggerer. Seated on the seat that had once been that of Clothor Merovins, the founder of the Principate, Cordelia Hasebach kept silent as if this was all beneath her. The Master of Orders answered in her stead, never once hesitating.

The priests went first, Sister Adalie leading the charge. The Holies set out their case for the unseating of Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, and though they were not without cleverness they were methodically taken apart. Dealing with villains, they said, was moral taint. It made her unfit for the office. And even the Hidden Horror had held his blow, which was clear indication of bargain struck with the abomination.

"No treaty of peace has been signed, and the Dead King's withdrawal was effected by the Black Queen and not the First Prince. This is of her own admission, confirmed by the Augur."

She was shown herself to be without mandate from the Heavens by failing to bring the Tenth Crusade to success, both in Callow and in Iserre.

"Princess Rozala Malanza held command at both the Battle of the Camps and the Princes' Graveyard."

She'd intervened in the affairs of the House of Light, which was beyond the authority of any mortal ruler, and schemed to pervert the decision of a greater holy conclave.

"No such decree has ever been passed and it would require the consent of the Highest Assembly to act against the House of Light."

She was a tyrant, having stacked the Highest Assembly with her associates in clear perversion of the rightful order of Procer as set by its founders. At that Hasenbach finally made a noise: sharp, scornful laughter as she eyed the procession of royal candidates standing to the side of the thrones. Shame burned more than a few faces. The House of Light then tried to make an argument using a precedent from the Liturgical Wars for a regency of the realm by the Holies, but unfortunately it relied on the premise of the First Prince being prisoner and so fell apart when it was pointed out that Hasenbach clearly was not and so no regency could be considered as needed. They priests were, after this, visibly at a loss.

Prince Arsene and Princess Clotilde, like Balthazar sensing that they were losing the reins, then tried as well. Arsene of Bayeux boldly suggested that the chaos in the capital was proof she had lost the trust of the people, and so of the Assembly, and that the election of another First Prince was necessary for the stability of the realm in these dark times.

"The lawful procedures to unseat a First Prince are known, and have not been attempted, which begs the question of what the Prince of Bayeux intends if it is not the lawful manner."

The Princess of Aisne instead stated that Hasenbach had overreached her authority and made a mockery of the procedures of the Highest Assembly, naming specific instances: repeated emergency votes held in quick succession, the granting of broad authority and precautionary amnesty to Arnaud Brogloise that even included the power to negotiate diplomatic settlements with Damned. Assigning the former Princess of Lyonis under the command of Princess Malanza while granting her authority over Princess Malanza, which undermined the very appointment made by the Highest Assembly.

None of these, Clotilde of Aisne conceded, were strictly speaking unlawful. But they were perversions of the intended meaning of the procedures of the Highest Assembly, and to allow them to happen without consequence would inevitably lead to the collapse of the Principate of its reduction into a mere kingdom. That struck a note with some of the sworn delegates, but not enough to recover from the continued verbal slaughter. The grievances were solid in their eyes, Balthazar suspected, but not worth all this strife and not in time of war.

Prince Arsene tried his hand again, insinuating that the foreign troops marching on Salia were meant to force the will of Hasenbach on even princes, but at last the savage bestirred herself. The Master of Orders hastily recognized her right to speak, cutting straight through the Prince of Bayeux's rising speech.

"Are you quite finished?" Cordelia Hasenbach calmly asked, blue eyes like ice.

Hands on the arms of the ancient throne of Salia, the blonde princess' gaze swept across the Assembly.

"For near an hour now I have sat here, awaiting a single justification for the way the capital outside this palace is burning to the ground," she said, voice like the crack of a whip. "For the deaths that continue to happen even now. For the loss of trust this will cause in the allies we require for our very survival. For the way our enemies will see weakness and tear at our throats."

She drummed her fingers, scathingly.

"Well?" she said. "I await still. Speak, if any of you can."

Silence reigned, and not merely for reason of procedure.

"I thought not," Cordelia tiredly said.

She breathed out slowly.

"This farce is at an end," she said. "There is not even the slightest of pretences for you to legitimately take power in Procer, and you have not the strength to do so illegitimately. Surrender now, before I am required by law to have you all put to the sword."

And then, the sweetest of sounds: armoured boots treading fast on a wooden floor. Balthazar discreetly glanced back. Rosalie was at the head of them, and though there were less men than he'd wanted – barely forty – it would be enough.

She was good at talking, Hasenbach, but it was hard to talk when you had a sword through the throat.

—

"Ah," the Bard hummed. "There we are."

"Bone to wind," the Augur said, "and mirror to fill."

"Still on that, are you?" the Bard amusedly said.

"The bone is twofold, yes," Agnes said. "It took me long to understand. Sometimes they open barrows and there are fingerbones. Around them twine was wound, very long ago. I was told this, by a tribunal of owls from Hannoven."

"Owls," the Bard slowly repeated, as if dubious.

"Owls are terrible gossips," the Augur said. "Never tell one your secrets. The twine was an oath, they told me."

"Owls, huh," the Bard muttered. "I'll have to remember that. They had it right: the twine was an oath's length. They learned to keep count, after the first few times one of the lords stayed longer than the oath lasted. Even the gentlest of the fae have sharp humour."

"Bone is also the bone of man," Agnes solemnly told her. "We stand not without it. We move not, act not. It is..."

The word stalled. Had the shadow always touched the tree at that angle? No, stars moved here. The moon did not blink, it circled. Ah! Solemn fingers in three, the mark of the Tribunal. Not the owls, though also with wings. The White Knight was near, and the three fingers were touching one of her own footsteps leading north. Ah, the front of the foot and not the back: forward, coming, grim ending. Yes, it was as she had seen.

"Quintessential," the Bard said.

"Yes," Agnes smiled. "To have the bone of them is to own them, to have them wound around your fingers like twine. Clever Mavii."

"Nature can be shaped," the Bard disagreed. "It can change. It doesn't even take all that much: sometimes all you need to do is throw a stone in the pond and the ripples will see it done."

Ah, the Augur thought, is this what you believe we have done?

—

Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, Prince of Rhenia, Princess of Salia and Warden of the West, did not stand as the Silver Letters entered the Chamber of Assembly and began spreading out. She had expected this, known it was coming since the moment she decided against leaving the palace. They would try strength, when all else failed. And there were enough foes here her twenty Salians were likely to lose. And yet she stayed seated. Rhenian blue dress going down to her feet, high-collared and match for the sapphire-set circled of white gold she'd chosen to wear over her golden curls, she simply stared down at the spies that had turned on her and made all of this possible.

"And here we are," Cordelia said. "The true face of all this: swords and ambition, both bare for all to see."

"Surrender and I won't need to have you dragged out by the hair," Balthazar said, smiling wide. "Your Highness."

Him she ignored, instead looking at the Silver Letters behind him.

"If you obey him, if you truly bare swords and spill blood on the grounds of the Chamber of Assembly, it will be the end of you," she told them.

Threats would not cow the likes of them, so she need make it plain this was no such thing.

"It does not matter if I live or die," she said. "Whoever takes my place, whoever sits this Assembly, they will need to see you all dead. Publicly, loudly, excruciatingly painfully. Because if they do not make an example that resounds through the ages, one that quells the very thought of anyone ever doing something like this again, they will never be able to safely sit this hall again."

She gestured at the Holies.

"Do you believe they will protect you?" she said. "The House of Light will not even be able to protect itself from the consequences of this. Every priest in this room will be sacrificed by the rest of the Holies, for they have openly committed rebellion and no First Prince could countenance such of the House. Do you understand, now? If you obey Balthazar, he has killed you."

Silence struck once more, until Balthazar cleared his throat.

"She's right," he said. "Savage that she is, she's right. This got botched, so now we need to tie up all the loose ends."

The tall, hirsute killer cleared his throat.

"Hasenbach went mad, having made pacts with devils, and used her wicked powers to slaughter the entire Highest Assembly," Balthazar the Bastard announced. "We'll torch it after just to be sure."

The Silver Letters hesitated. But then they started to advance, swords high, and two began to close the doors so no one would escape. It was madness, Cordelia thought. She'd known Serigny might go mad, try to burn her out, and made certain the secret passage out was unencumbered. But this was madness. No, it was worse than that: it was service to the Enemy. It was every ugly, dark impulse she had tried to smooth out of Procer, growling and lunging for her throat. And now she was to flee from it, again? As if swords and brutality were enough to rule the heart of the Principate? No. No, she would not have it. She would not skitter away once more, abandoning good men to swords, this realm to the heedless animals that would rule it. She was the Warden of the West, not-

Before the doors of the Chamber could close, a sword was slid through them. As if the heavy oaken gates were light as feathers, they were forced open and a tall man in plate and a trailing cloak advanced.

"My apologies for disturbing the proceedings," the White Knight politely said. "I am looking for Balthazar Serigny."

The Wandering Bard went still.

"What have you done?" she hissed.

Agnes laughed, laughed, laughed.

"Exactly what you wanted me to," the Augur wheezed. "Just a little too quickly."

"She was meant to-"

"Meant," Agnes hissed. "Meant. As if you did not meddle, Bird of Misfortune. As if you did not pull long strings."

"You changed nothing," the Bard said.

"I changed everything," the Augur said. "She has a choice, now."

"They always make the same choices," the Bard said. "You'll learn."

"Mirror to fill," Agnes said. "With iron and rope we died, and you came. With candle and harp we danced, and you stayed."

She cackled.

"But I have the bone of you, Wandering Bard," she said. "I have the bone of you and in my mirror you found nothing but your own reflection. You have not fooled me, Longstrings."

"You may just have destroyed everything," the Bard said. "Everything, child. The Dead King-"

"There is one truth in this world that cannot be broken," Agnes Hasenbach, the Augur, calmly said. "I have learned this from portents many and varied, spoken to birds from strange and distant skies as well as consulted with the secret whisperers of the winds and clouds."

She leaned forward, erasing the six symbols she had drawn in the snow.

"Would you like to know them, Bird of Misfortune?" she asked.

—

And then, only then, did Cordelia rise to her feet. She nearly fell, face paling for the pain of leaning on that broken leg. This, she knew, was the White Knight. The Sword of Judgement made to walk the grounds of Creation, silver coin in one hand and death in the other. She advanced.

"Chosen," Brother Bertran called out, sounding both relieved and expectant. "These Silver Letters conspirators would murder us."

Bring to them the judgement of the Seraphim, in the name of the Heavens!"

The White Knight cocked his head to the side, rolling a silver coin between his fingers.

"You are one of these that call themselves the Holies, yes?" the man asked.

"The Heavens have bestowed this honour upon us," Brother Bertran proudly agreed.

"That is certainly possible," the dark-skinned Chosen agreeably replied.

A flick and the coin went spinning, up and up and up. Cordelia's hand moved quicker than her mind, than her flesh, and she snatched it out of the air. It burned against her palm, scorching. She swallowed the pain.

"Enough," the First Prince of Procer said. "There will be no killing."

The Chosen was watching her with wide eyes, before something like surprise and awe flickered across his face.

"You are..." he said, sounding moved. "I have never seen it with my own eyes."

And she felt it too, pulsing through her veins, the mantle that was within her reach. His judgement she had ended for there was only one fit to pass it in these chambers, and it was the Warden of the West. Even the burning against her palm seemed distant, like her flesh was being filled with something – no. No. She fought the pull, the inevitability, everything it entailed. She fought it tooth and nail. There was nothing greater than this, this flesh, this moment and this place and the laws that bound them all. She had only one master, and it was the Principate of Procer. The coin burned into her flesh and she cast it down. The White Knight's face went ashen.

"This is," Cordelia said, "the Principate of Procer. We rule with accord and law, we mete out the same justice to the highest soul and the lowest. We fail that principle, often and utterly, as men and women have failed principles since the First Dawn. But I will not renounce it: not for a day, not for an hour, nor for a single breath. This land will know no queen, no empress, no pale-clad warden to stand above all others."

In her palm the laurels had been burned black, a wound she knew would never heal so long as she lived.

"Conspiracy will be tried by our laws," Cordelia Hasenbach. "And no one else's."

She could be the law, the First Prince knew. After this, looking in the eyes of those around her, seeing the loyalty that was blooming there. The faith. She could take it, and First Prince or not she would be the only law Procer would need. With scheme and knife, with ruthless will, she could purge the rot and turn Procer into what it should be instead of... this. No, Cordelia thought once more, and this time it was barely a struggle at all.

She returned to her throne, and the moment she sat the conspiracy was finished.

—

"It does not matter," the Augur said, "if on the other side stand kings and monsters and all the gods that stride this earth. It does not matter if the odds are paltry and the signs scream of defeat with every silent voice."

Blue eyes and a warm embrace. Of course you'll live with us now. You are family. You always will be. This, this she would not forget until that final venture beyond where she was meant to go.

"I will," Agnes said, "always, always bet on Cordelia Hasenbach."

ninegardens

Another beautiful line:

>"She'll pull through, your cousin," the Bard said, comfortingly. "Don't you worry about it."

>Agnes wanly smiled.

>"I have known Cordelia since we were girls," she said. "I have better measure of her than anyone else alive."

IE, "I have a better measure of her than YOU, Wandering Bard"

ninegardens

So... random things noticed:

No. No, she would not have it. She would not skitter away once more, abandoning good men to swords, this realm to the heedless animals that would rule it. She was the Warden of the West, not- Before the doors of the Chamber could close, a sword was slid through them.

Pretty sure this was the exact moment when Cordelia was MEANT to get her name- according to Bard's plan.
WK literally walks in the door seconds too early.

Also:

For all that Bard is a terrifying immortal abomination... her win record in this story is actually kind of average:

- * First Liesse: convinces Will to summon Angels. Will gets murdered by Cat. Bard shrugs shoulders, wanders off. Minor loss.

- *Free cities: Bard kicks Blacks ass and gets Captain killed... but also Kiaros gets one over on her by summoning Heirarch. Major Victory.

- *2nd Liesse: Bard successfully messes up alliance between Malicia and Black. Major Victory.

- *Chat with Black: Says some ominous shit. Possibly sets up Black to be emperor. minor loss???

- *3rd Liesse: Screws over band of 5, resulting in Saints death and Heriphant losing magic... but gets soundly BEATEN by her main opponent, DK. Three minor victories, one massive loss.

- *Chat with Cat: Says some ominous shit. Tries lotsa things. Cat sidesteps. Minor loss ???

- *Plays games with a coup in Procer: gets her ass handed to her by Agnes fucking Hasenbach. Major loss(?).

So all up...2 big wins, 2 MASSIVE losses(?) and a bunch of minor wins and losses either side... and the 2 big wins are kind of really just one win that paid off twice.
Have I missed anything?

... in some sense, I suspect what makes bard scary isn't her success rate, but just the fact that she can keep rolling the dice all day. When she loses (usually) everyone else is fighting for their lives and kingdom, and she's just like "Oh? That didn't work. Guess I'll try something else."

Except now, with DK in play, we are no longer in a world where Bard can AFFORD those losses any more... so things are starting to get... interesting.

Insanenoodlyguy

It tried three times, actually. First, that moment you described. Second, when she grabbed the coin. That's why Hanno was first in awe, than Ashen has she threw down the coin. He saw a name being born, and then he saw something even rarer: a name being aborted.

It tried a third time, weakly, to give her a villian name instead since she rejected the good, making her not Warden of the West, but turning the First Prince into THE First Prince, but it was a half assed desperation move on Fate's part and that one was much easier to throw off.

James, Mostly Harmless

I have a feeling Below was trying to offer Black Queen to Cordelia ...

Insanenoodlyguy

No, there's no precedence for that. It's a new name Cat got as a reflection of being the Queen brought up by the Black Knight. It was specific to her. And it wasn't calling her that anyway, it started calling her First Prince.

Sun Dog

Thought it was Warden of the West.

Javvies

Above offered Warden of The West as a Heroic Name.
Below offered First Prince as a Villainous Name.

Cordelia declined both.

Though she likely would have ended up taking Above's offer to become a Hero, the Warden of the West if Hanno had arrived even slightly later than he did, and Below never would have gotten to make an offer.

NerfContessa

And she is thrice as impressive as before now.

Now truly, power wise it went poorly and it might lead to her loss, but she went from quite to I credibly impressive will and chuzpe wise.

Liliet

Agreed. Bard's influence is omnipresent but very weak. She basically cannot do anything other than talk.

ninegardens

I kind of want to play some sort of multiplayer board/card game where one of the players has this: no one can get rid of them, they can act almost anywhere they like.... but all their actions are super minor...

Meanwhile there are other players who can easily run around breaking things... BUT when they fall, they fall HARD.

Decius

A hidden information game where one player has access to all the information, including the content of other players' discussions, and can privately talk to any other player, but has secret goals of their own and no ability to act, nor any ability to prove that they aren't lying.

Other players would have more limited knowledge, but would also be able to prove things about their goals for some kind of cost, and also to do things themselves.

Theo Promes

sounds like a great game of D&D you are describing 😊

greatwyrmgold

Sounds like a campaign that would work despite the focus and rules of D&D, rather than utilizing them.

Jacob McNeer

win despite the rules, not because of them.

greatwyrmgold

If you can play a different game and win by its rules, you'll usually have a better time. Not always an option when the games are metaphorical, but D&D is not a metaphorical game.

shieldredblog

The chat with Black and Cat are just presumed losses. We really don't have a clear enough picture of what the Bard wanted to declare victory for anyone.

superlad64

It's pretty heavily implied that this rate of failure is incredibly rare for her, I think. Until very very recently Good and Evil have boiled down to Bard and Dead King and that's shaped the continent with few exceptions.

First comes the Black Knight who only really became an effective actor against her after he lost his name, and Cat, who is now the quintessential story-aware nameless power-that-be in the midst of a mostly-nameless band of enlightened hooligans.

Now we've just added Augur Agnes and her principled, if sometimes misguided, hard-ass nameless sister Cordelia to the pot as additional competitors to the old hegemony and things are looking real damn bad for the Bard and Dead King both, not to mention the Above and Below.

Of the mortal countries, the leaders of 4 (Cat+Cat for 2, Cordelia, and the Pilgrim) are now either directly working against the old ways or morally obliged to by the Accords as they awake to the true threat that has kept the continent back for so long. Add this to at least one Choir semi-defecting in their 'breaking the rules' to trust Cat to help the Pilgrim resurrect and the Fae Courts imploding and you're basically talking total ruination.

In summary, my take is that in the game of Chess (or Shatranj), the Bard and Dead King only lose to each-other and no-one else, but they now have a small army of people trained in the secret art of flipping over the goddamn table whenever they try to play.

stevenneiman

Actually, the record is better than that. The only times she's actually lost worse than no game are now, the Heirarch (which we honestly can't be sure was a loss), and the Dead King, assuming that what he got actually was both true and as complete as he needs it to be. Which I highly doubt, because that was an uncharacteristically stupid move otherwise, taking such meaningful risks just because she had a good chance of dealing a minor wound that won't heal.

First Liesse was at worst Cat deflecting a thrown knife, and at best Bard deliberately pushing Cat towards her current status as someone likely to pose a threat to the Dead King.

She threw a fit here, but I'm honestly not sure if she lost anything worse than not gaining the Named Warden of the West. And frankly I don't see why that's such a big deal. Leader Named are powerful, but they aren't all-powerful, especially when they're new to the role. And let's be honest, Cordelia has a shit understanding of stories, to the point she'd be more of a liability than an asset. Never mind that the best person to mentor her has an axe to grind with the Bard, and also a reason to see Cordelia abandon her Name since she's the best leader for the Principate.

ninegardens

First liesse is a minor loss because even if Cat just deflected a thrown knife (Will), net result is Bard being down one knife. No big deal, but still a loss.

Cordelia being blind to stories is an ASSET from Bard's point of view, as it makes her easier to steer. And if she became warden of the west she is HARDER for Cat to mentor, not easier.

Aside from that, yes- I agree. As I said- Bard's win rate isn't always great, but her "loss condition" is usually equivalent to "Oh well, that didn't work. Guess I'll try something else"

ICSM

I'd argue First Liesse was the biggest loss.

Not because it mattered, mind you, but because most other losses were bought about by the awareness of Bard's influence. And no one from Black's generation onward appeared to have known she existed before she entered Will's band.

Which raises the question, why did she personally participate in that band? Nobody having heard of her means she is usually much more indirect in her scheming and apparently for good reason. She is much better at her job when people aren't aware of her, and in first liesse she just waltzed into the limelight of a party and announced her existence to two generations of villains for literally no gain. Why?

She is scary because she will never go away and can always try again, but with how many times she has been thwarted, her competence is mostly an informed ability.

Albert Wen

She must have assumed the story was in the bag and bet that anyone aware of her involvement would soon be brainwashed by the Hashmallim.

Lurch

One of the common and key points with the Bard is that they can't interfere outside of Named affairs. All the while Cordelia isn't Named, the Bard is hamstrung in dealing with or using her. If she WAS Named though, the Bard can weigh in. So even if the exact situation isn't perfect, a Named ruler is more useful to the Bard than one who isn't. And a Named ruler of the nation that historically stands against the Dead King, and a nation unused to having a Named ruler, would be a powerful lever to use against him because of the stories involved, and the Bard works through stories. It's a big deal because they just swiped the rug out from under (some of) the Bard's plans and stopped them having another lever, not because of the individual power of a Named ruler.

I do love how this all left genre savvy a while ago, and is getting increasingly meta as time goes on. Using, then subverting, then outright avoiding the influence of stories to alter the path of things.

NerfGlastigUaine

Exactly, in most of those losses she doesn't really lose much. You can't even really say it's a loss, just an attempt that didn't work, and when she does win, even minor ones may have huge ripples. But as you said, Dead King is now in place and that changes things. It's no longer just throwing rocks as she used to, this time the game is for keeps.

Also, you forgot Hierarch. First time in story Bard was blindsided.

IMO Bard is most terrifying b/c we don't know her game. Look at all those question marks in your post, even when she loses we're not always sure she's lost. No other character is as opaque and nothing is scarier. Also the idea of someone who can fuck you not with sword but with words and stories, b/c how do you prepare a defense against that? Cat's trying but even then it's not perfect, just an attempt at MAD.

Lily

It's my opinion that the loss against the Dead King was a true and massive loss.

The type of true and massive loss that begins a pattern of three.

““Good,” Marguerite smiled. “Then when he offers you a truce – and he will, that much is certain – do not put your weight behind accepting it.”” -Chapter 68: Apropos

This seems a concession to not let the Dead King end this with a draw that ends the pattern.

If they war against the Dead King, and reach an impasse where they can take a truce and walk away, that will likely come about from a draw of some sorts. The goal for Bard is to make sure that the battle doesn't stop there.

Making Cordelia the Warden of the West would have been a step towards that; putting a Good-Aligned Named on the throne would help immensely. Likewise, getting Catherine to make the above promise would help immensely.

We're seeing the Dead King be set up to die.

Bard is a little pissed because Cordelia having other priorities could fuck it all up.

(Notably, this relates to Catherine being “offered” the Fairfax sword. ““So this is how it goes,” I softly said. “I take up again the sword I lost in the Everdark, and bring war to the Crown of the Dead. It's an old story. Well-worn, and strong for it.”

King Edward had been taller than me, I thought, with broader shoulders as well. And yet, I suspected that if ripped that sword free from the earth it would fit my hand perfectly. Better than any other blade ever hand.” -Chapter 51: Twilight Catherine, currently nameless, rejected a chance at being the hero of this story, so the Bard went for Cordelia.)

Big I

Let's hear it for the Augur, managing to con the Bard. Now that's impressive.

The White Knight is really screwed now, with Cordelia acknowledging the rule of law over the mandate of Heaven. That's essentially the Hierarch's position as well, and the Knight is responsible for unlawful killings in both the League and the Principate.

Liliet

Oh please. Hanno was acting on request from authorities in the League. Remember how he complied with Delos's bullshit bureaucracy, weirding Bard out?

And of course the Choir of Judgement LET Cordelia do this. Interfering with a formulaic Aspect? They'd have burned her to crisp if they wanted. Instead she gets a brand of laurels...

Big I

It's deaths in Helike/of Helikean people he'll have to answer for, since the complaint against him came from the Tyrant. And in Procer he's been killing people left and right throughout this interlude, including that shop owner he "saved" from looters.

Decius

I think that he's going to be fine for his actions in the streets, since the rejection was based on the fact that there is nobody who can judge the highest assembly.

JJR

I noticed that too. Hell, being branded with the LAURELS, that is hella (except it's angels so heva?) symbolic.

Andrew Mitchell

"heva" ♥ it!

NerfGlastigUaine

Cordelia establishes law > Gods. Hierarch establishes law ON Gods. Important distinction.

greatwyrmgold

Both put the laws of man above the alleged omni-importance of the gods. Same mindset, one is just more explicit than the other.

And given how flawed the gods of this world are, I'd say they deserve to be judged by their mortal creations.

NerfGlastigUaine

No, one is "stay out of my business" and the other is "I'm gonna make you bitches kneel" I'm not saying the Gods don't deserve it, but the latter is not conducive to one's continued existence

beleester

I'm a little uncertain as to what the Augur actually did. The implication seems to be that she made the White Knight arrive sooner than he "should have", giving Cordelia the option of doing something besides taking a Name. But the Augur is being kept in isolation, so what could she have done to get Hanno there earlier?

Did she just call up the Bard and keep her talking, so that she wouldn't be able to intervene and stop the White Knight from showing up? Did she win by getting the Bard to monologue?

quite possibly a cat

Well, isn't the Bard a Villain? She has a Name, and she isn't a Hero, so....

Liliet

Bard is BOTH a vllain and a hero.

It's complicated, okay?! – Bard

JJR

Ever since hearing she was the Intercessor and played for both sides I've wondered if she has 6 aspects.

Andrew Mitchell

Shit, that's a good thought... Not that she's got six, but has she got ANY?!? We haven't seen her use any on screen. All she's been able to do is arrive at the right time and place, and talk.

Bard has no aspects; 98%. Therefore she's not a real Named but something else.

goliath1303

Ok not sure about any other instances of then showing up, but she for sure has Wander as an Aspect. It was only used in screen the one time way back in book 1, but it definitely was used. I very well may have made this up as head cannon, but I seem to remember it being explained in text as the ability that causes/allows her to appear wherever she's supposed to be. I also believe that it's "where she's supposed to be" in a narrative sense, not where the Gods want her to be or she wants to be in her Role as Intercesor. I also don't think that it has any relevance to her death avoidance disappearing act, despite the obvious similarities there. I'm almost 100% sure that this next bit is head cannon and not started in the story, but I'm pretty sure that she wasn't just created out of whole cloth or designated as the intermediary between mortals and Gods right away. I think she WAS a hero (or potentially Neutral like Archer and Ranger) but due to something that happened in her original mortal life that she felt the need to seek revenge for, she accepted an offer from Above & Below to become what she is today.

So if I had to guess, I would say agree probably only has 3 Aspects just like every other Named and they're the 3 age had when she got the Name Wandering Bard. They very well could have changed & adapted after she assumed the Role of Intercessora though. For example, the Aspect that I mentioned above Wander probably didn't make her go Nowhere until she was needed and/or relevant. I would think it worked in a way now akin to Hakram's Find and just at hey on a path that would take her where she needed to go or led her to whatever she might be looking for at the time. Now it takes her to places that the Narrative needs her to intercede to keep it on track and when she's not needed it sends her Nowhere to wait until the next intercession is required instead.

Insanenoodlyguy

Well there's theories about exactly what she did or didn't do, the parts we are sure of are as follows.

1. Let this coup happen in a way that got White Knights attention and have him head towards Cordelia.
2. Before Cordelia could take her name, have Hanno arrive, giving her other options than Name, retreat and die.
3. Summon and then keep the Bard around and distracted long enough that she didn't see the timing was off and step in herself to get it back on track.

beleester

I'm not asking about the what, I'm asking about the how. The Silver Letters were keeping the Augur captive and out of contact with anyone. That was the entire reason the coup could happen in the first place – because Balthazar (with Black's help) realized that an oracle's warning doesn't matter if nobody hears it. So how could the Augur control when the coup happened, or when the White Knight arrived?

Liliet

My guess? Threefold:

1) White Knight was going to Salia on Cordelia's invitation. Since there doesn't seem to be an obvious reason why she'd do it, the answer is likely "Augur told her to". So the timing of that is strike 1.

2) Augur obviously knew about the coup in advance, but didn't tell Cordelia. Oh she was prevented from warning her the day of, but Bard would have told her earlier, and that's assuming the whole scheme with keeping the coup from her that Black came up with worked in the first place. Academic exercise indeed; that's strike 2.

3) Bard normally micromanages timing of her time-sensitive schemes. Stalling the fight in Summerholm, delaying Black&Warlock in Arcadia at Marchford, making Pilgrim wait 3 seconds at Third Llesse. If Augur had not summoned her and distracted her with conversation, she would likely have been in the palace making sure Hanno does not arrive earlier than she wants. And that's strike 3.

No, Agnes does not do much. But oracular powers mean she knows exactly what to do and not do to achieve the desired result.

Shequi

In my view the Augur's spoiler factor was Simon; remember how he wasn't "expected" by the Witch, but the White Knight was willing to believe that he was there for a reason?

Well, that Reason was the Augur's manipulation. Which is why it succeeded; as an ordinary mortal, Simon is invisible to the Wandering Bard

ninegardens

I really love this theory... but how did Agnes get Simon involved?

quite possibly a cat

I still think the Hole-Filled should have done their judgement by hitting Cordelia with a bucket of Light. Either she's melted (proof she's Evil) or she's healed up (proof she's not). No chance of backfire.

Insanenoodlyguy

It doesn't work that way. once you use holy power to cast sacred flame, it does radiant damage when it hits something. A holy shield can probably block it fairly well, but outside of named shit once it's in the world it's going to burn whatever it touches, good or evil or benign object.

shieldredblog

Also they aren't Lanterns. Only the warrior priests of Levantine have been confirmed as having light based pyromancy.

Your basic priest takes oaths not to harm others, to heal and protect. It's why the whole 'holy slaughter cages' made of light from the battle of the camps upset so many people.

konstantinvoncarstein

Only Lanterns were confirmed to be able to use holy fire to kill living beings. At the Camps, the Proceran priests used the fences, not holy fire.

And concerning the burning effect of pure Light, it burns only devils and undead, not an "evil people", a term highly subjective.

Tenthyr

Its mildly horrifying, that tidbit Auger just dropped: The Bard literally knows ALL stories, every single one. I suppose that's one of her Aspects, if she even has aspects.

But fuck YES Agnes, saving your cousins freedom to choose.

And FUCK YES Cordelia for just becoming my second favourite character in this story.

Mental Mouse

But does Bard know the stories that haven't been written yet? Cat's been breaking new ground almost since the beginning, and Auger and Cordelia have joined the game.

Decius

ALL the stories.

Including the ones that will NEVER be written.

JJR

Does this include all the Shaggy Dog stories?

If so count me as being one the people who thinks she wants to just die already.

David Lynch

I like how we've transitioned throughout this story from "awesome moments of discovering a Name" to "awesome moments of refusing a Name". 😊

Thanatoss

Best parts of this story are not epic battles between gods, but big changes made by fairly normal people. I love it. This chapter was just as or not more fun than dropping LAKE in Battle of Camps. Hell Yeah!

ChillyPepper

So, the birds are Named? If so, who is this Owl that told the secret?

caoimhinh

A Tribunal of Owls.

They are scary fuckers, even gave a hard time to Batman.

ChillyPepper

I actually meant that certain Named appear as bird codenames to Augur, despite the poor phrasing from before. 😊

ChillyPepper

For example, the bird of misfortune is the bard, the distant bird between lone sentinel and weeping man sounds like the grey pilgrim (unlikely but it is an example. And there is the owl.

Cat would be a magpie in such an analogy lol.

Dotraj

That strikes a memory. I have no proof, but I think someone has called Cat a magpie before. Maybe Augur? I don't know.

ChillyPepper

I don't remember such an event, but my memory ain't that great. If it is the case, then we have been given a big chunk of speculation right there.

Point

I suspect that the owls are one of the Choirs, based on this passage:

“Solemn fingers in three, the mark of the Tribunal. Not the owls, though also with wings. The White Knight was near”

It feels a bit like she might be describing the presence of the Seraphim—“the Tribunal” seems like reasonable seer-speak for the Choir of Judgement. If that is assumed, then “also with wings” indicates that the owls might also be angels (perhaps something like the Choir of Honesty, if they’re bad with secrets).

The weakest point in this theory is that Judgement is associated with the number six, not three.

HappyNap

This is, without a doubt, the greatest chapter to come out of APGTE – the ups, the downs, the interplay between named, the scheming and plotting and the resolution; this is the kind of writing I’m screaming silently about, I’m raving mad for.

Keep it up!

HappyNap

Edit: “To come out of APGTE in a while” – I’m not gonna argue that this is the greatest chapter of all time (theres been a plathora of reeeeeally great chapters), but daumn this is a satisfying conclusion to an arc

sivarajan

“[K]ings and monsters and all the gods that stride this earth” sounds a lot like “gods or kings or all the armies in Creation.”

DoOd

Wonder if Cat will view Bard trying to setup a Named ruler in Procer as acting against the Liesse Accords

Mental Mouse

Bard was never going to be a signatory to the Accords, and Cat’s already gone all GFY on her anyway.

greatwyrmgold

However, Cat’s tied her behavior to Grey Pilgrim. If the Wandering Bard acts against the Accords, it reflects badly on Pilgrim.

Not sure how much that matters since the Accords haven’t been signed yet, but eh.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. Cat might just snicker, given how Bard got her figurative head handed to her... to Cat's long-term advantage.

Also, I hope Cat (and perhaps Masego) gets a chance to chat with Augur sometime.

usernamesbco

Could be interpreted as Bard trying to bypass that by interfering before Cat and Pilgrim got there.

"Whoops, so sorry, Cordelia got a Name and can't/won't sign the Accords. Can't abdicate in the middle of a war, you know."

Then Agnes got one over on Bard, because Agnes is awesome and best oracle cousin ever. Still not clear on how she did that, though. Now it just needs to come out that Bard was deliberately sabotaging GP and the Accords.

greatwyrmgold

Depends on if anyone who knows that she tried to do that tells Cat.

Lord_GM

Okay, someone please explain to me what is going on in that garden. Does the dialogue between Augur and Bard actually have any meaning or is it just the Augur stalling for time and distracting the Bard while desperately trying to keep her mind in the here-and-now?

To me that entire exchange of words doesn't even qualify as dialogue because that would require that they somehow refer to whatever the other said, but all I see are two monologues about the six items from the Verse, bargains with fey, ancient cultures that might or might not have been what later became Procer and the Dead Kingdom. I fail to see the connections!

Mental Mouse

This was conversation as story-battle. The Augur bound Bard long enough for her own plans to play out, while making clear that yes that was on purpose, and GFY too.

Brigsby

Auger caught her with the classic blunder of monologues. It was subtle too, if you read again, notice how it doesn't ever really feel like a monologue until the bit where Auger sensed danger, I think that was when the Bard almost noticed she was talking, and talking totally distracted from the task of micromanaging timing, as she usually does in her schemes.

ICSM

An ancient civilization called Mavii used to summon and bind Fae through voluntary human sacrifice. At first for peaceful reason, but before the end to use them in battle as commanders against arlesites. They lost, it works.

Augur is speaking to Bard about the technique they used to bind them. She lured Bard by starting to perform it, and then kept babbling about the specifics.

Augur was pretending intent to summon Fae to help her cousin. This would kill her. Bard went there to influence the Augur into suicide to save her cousin. The augur knew all about it. She had already somehow arranged for the WK to reach earlier than intended and kept the Bard occupied. Bard only noticed when the story started to change.

There is also a whole lot about the nature of the Seers and a few bits about what Bard's powers are.

Liliet

>Augur was pretending intent to summon Fae to help her cousin. This would kill her. Bard went there to influence the Augur into suicide to save her cousin.

This is most definitely not what happened.

I mean, to summon a fae in that manner, you need, like, someone actually hanging (rope-slain). No such thing was present, it was all abstract/metaphorical.

maxwell wearing

Agreed. The way I interpreted it, the fey summoning ritual was a metaphor for the way by which the Bard intended to Name Cordelia but also the way by which Agnes tricked the Bard.

Iron to bind and rope to kill: the rebellion, binding Cordelia's actions and killing people (admittedly with fire not rope). The initial summoning of the Bard to Agnes candle to blind and harp to still: Cordelia's dance in the Highest Assembly distracting and detoothing the rebellion. Agnes' distraction and delay of the Bard, preventing until noticing the plot twist until too late.

bone to wind and mirror to fill: Bard thinks she has the bone of Cordelia and that she will now be named, but Agnes has the bone of her, deflecting her intentions easily.

—

Its not a perfect fit, but thats what I got. Thoughts?

ByVectron!

Cumberbatch Haystack knew about the Accords, so she may have been purposely refusing a Name in order to ensure she could remain a ruler. Clever girl.

Mental Mouse

She would have been a ruler regardless – as Amadeus pointed out, the Accords still had to get through negotiations. Demanding that another ruler abdicate as the price of treaty would be a no-sell for basically any ruler except Cat, who's a power in her own right. And note that last time she offered abdication, she was facing bad-faith negotiations which sank the deal.

olddiggy

I... caught up? Hell I didn't even know this wasn't finished. I came here before reading a crossover fic with Worm so I'd have context and it's been a hell of a ride. Certainly much longer than I anticipated and it's still going. Outside of some Interludes that had me glaze-eyed and mostly skimming, I loved reading this story and can't wait for more.

konstantinvoncarstein

Welcome to the club! 😊

greatwyrmgold

What crossover fic?

Lucario2012

Probably "A Practical Guide to Escalation", if I had to guess. That's where I got into this from.

olddiggy

A Practical Guide to Escalation on Spacebattles. It was good but didn't really hold my interest.

One shockingly good one I found was A Wand for Skitter on Fanfiction, a Harry Potter/Worm one.

Didn't hold high expectations for it since most HP X-over fics fall flat, but most put Harry into other worlds and make him a Gary Stu instead of bringing the Protag (Taylor) from another world to Hogwarts like this one.

I'd warn you it gets dark but seeing as you read this and ... well Worm is Worm, I don't think I need to warn anyone.

'Ladi Williams

You really shouldn't skip the interludes...yeah some of them can be dull compared to the main storyline where Cat is but those interludes without fail give background info that let's you know what's going on in the story and the world at large that Cat isn't privy to... Go back and read them all.

That said. Welcome to the club. 🙌

olddiggy

Don't worry, I didn't skip any of the Interludes. If there's one thing I've learned to do over the years, it's to read just enough of a chapter/interlude/section for me to get the gist of it regardless of how glaze-eyed it makes me. I don't normally do it, but most stories have at least one part I just can't read without doing so. I'm suprisingly adept at picking out important details when I skim through bits I find boring (typically ones that just seem to go on forever without adding anything). I have no problem with SoL or character development scenes.

Mental Mouse

Congratulations and condolences. 😊 You've joined the forward wave as the story moves toward the end of this book; I'm guessing that Book V will wrap with the signing of the Accords, leaving the final fight against the Dead King (and possibly the Wandering Bard) for Book VI.

Amen to other comments that the Interludes are well worth the trouble; basically, an Interlude is any chapter not centered around Our Ambiguous Protagonist. If you missed the "extra chapters" (which don't appear in the main Table Of Contents), then you should read those too – they provide a great deal of background for the various characters, including origin stories for most of the front-row players. Offhand, the ones who still lack origin stories (and aren't already dead anyhow) are all folks with a "mysterious" tag: Witch of the Woods, Rogue Sorcerer, Scribe and Assassin, and the Wandering Bard herself.

Mental Mouse

Not really a spoiler: In the year since my prior comment, Rogue Sorcerer has traded his "mysterious" tag for an origin story (and it's a doozy).

Mental Mouse

A thought: One of the Bard's primary tactics, one that shows up almost every time she opens her mouth, is "concern trolling", that is to say trying to trick her opponent out of a winning position. That is indeed a powerful tactic for manipulation... but more and more players seem to be No-Selling it, specifically as they reject the verdicts and directives of Fate.

greatwyrmgold

Probably doesn't help that most of the top players are becoming more and more aware of the Bard's existence, abilities, and nature.

burguulkodar

Chapters like this remind me why this novel is #1 among all my other novels and texts.

It is deep, compelling, extremely well-written, and each chapter is fulfilling instead of short and word-counted. Each chapter closes well in itself, consisting in beginning, middle and ending even when they are linked to a larger story.

My kudos to you, Author. You deserve my praise, the likes of which is rarely given.

snowy

I rather suspect that in a hundred years, when all goes to the Bard's plan (if it does, though this wouldn't really be a story if it does) that tales of the Bard will be buried under the deepest rocks for the likes of men like Black and Pilgrim to discover in their age long quests and for ancient monsters like DK to quietly nurse as all else in Creation quietly fall into the rhythm of the story.

crescentsickle

"What a pair we are," Catherine gestured between them. "A couple of cripple normies trying to keep the lid on gaggles of people with too much power and not enough sense."

Cordelia gave a slight chuckle, still surveying the amassed armies making camp in the fields, and then gave a sigh. "You were right, Catherine. I apologize."

Catherine looked up to Cordelia's face in surprise, trying to suss out the deeper meaning behind the statement but finding none. "... that might be the first time I've ever heard that, without strings attached."

"Might have something to do with the company you keep," Cordelia replied with a rare hint of snark and a slight smile before her weariness weighed down once more and washed her expression from her face.

Catharine turned back to observe her forces arrayed on the plains, leaning heavily on her staff. "What happened, Hasenbach?"

Cordelia was silent for a moment, before she replied in quiet tones. "I felt it. Felt them both. The mantle of the Chosen, mine for the taking... but also the madness it would impose. The same for the mantle of a Damned. I've come to realize that 'Named' is ever a better term, for they are one in the same."

"Madness?" Catherine asked after a pause, contemplating her counterpart's words.

"Stories. Named don't just live out stories, Catherine, nor do they flow from one to the next. Stories are imposed on them, as if the currents of the world would hold their puppet-strings. The Warden of the West, who would brook no trespass of evil in her domain. The First Prince, who would garner loyalty in the hearts of her fellow man and strike the taint perverting her realm." Cordelia banged her fist once against the parapet in sudden outrage that had Catherine step back and to the side to look at her directly.

"This world shouldn't be the damned playground of the gods, of angels and devils, or of their slaves. This world is ours to live in, and it is a grave injustice that we mortals must suffer the consequences for the petty squabbles of tyrants beyond our ken."

Silence persisted for a moment as Catherine stared dumbfounded before coughing to the side and adjusting her collar with her free hand. She finally managed to clear her throat after a couple unsuccessful attempts. "The Accords, then?"

Cordelia nodded before turning to finally face Catherine directly. "Yes. There'll need to be some changes, but yes. We need them, and quickly – who knows when the next true attempt will be. I imagine both Above and Below will do everything they can to thwart them, though. It will be a struggle the likes of which few throughout history may have ever seen."

Catherine barked out a laugh at that before donning a savage grin and holding out her free hand. "They'll have to get through us first, and they've already tried and failed a score or two."

Cordelia's smirk finally returned as she reach out and grasped the offer hand and shook. "I wonder what the title of the histories will be. The First Prince and The Black Queen? Hasenbach and Foundling?"

"Catherine and Cordelia: To Suffer No Fool."

"Cordelia and Catherine."

"Ah, ah, ah, alphabetical order takes precedence!"

– Excerpt from 'To Struggle But Never Falter, The Histories of C&C', author unknown

Andrew Mitchell

♥ ♥ ♥

kp9999

My new crazy theory: We, the readers, are the Bard. We keep trying to force characters into grooves. We influence the author through our feedback and guesses, but our feedback is always a rehash of other stories that we love.

This story is the Bard trying to force the narratives of the past into this story, while the story is trying to break free of that and make something new.

That is why I like this story so much. I keep trying to put a frame around the story, and it keeps breaking out of the frame.

Wangrin

Awesome arc so far. Most of the implications like Cordelia's dual refusal of a name and Agnes' fake ritual have only become apparent to me through comments of other readers. What I'm trying to say is: dear author, you are obviously very smart and possess enormous control over your created world, but, please let us readers grasp implications like this more easily. All those interrupted sentences or half statements by characters that allude to deeper implications are extremely frustrating. You try to build up effect and drama but you lose most readers this way. We read this story not knowing what you know and often with longer pauses in between. Have some pity and let us know what we should. Some of your brilliance gets lost otherwise.

'Ladi Williams

In effect, EE should dumb down the novel.
Nah.

Lord_GM

I agree. I struggle as well and had to read the comments. And this is not the first time I had to ask what the heck is actually going on. This chapter and the not-a-dialogue between Bard and Augur is especially bad. There are four levels of communication going on, as far as I can tell.

1. What is actually said out loud. But they are jumping from topic to topic, use incomplete sentences and so many pronouns I have trouble connecting to the correct noun that this doesn't make much sense to me.

2. The implications. Someone mentioned in the comments that Augur is starting a ritual to bind fey that would require her to sacrifice herself. Not only do I seem to have missed all the clues for that, I fail to see the reasoning that would lead Augur to such a drastic act.

3. The name level and the visions: Augur continues to see signs throughout the conversation. But we are only told the signs themselves and maybe a hint of what they might mean. But it is up to the reader to connect them to the current situation. Again something I struggle with.

4. The bigger picture: How this all connects to events outside this particular scene. It is implied that White Knight's appearance was planned. But from whom? Who has sent the invitation? Why is WK in the city (which could be unrelated)? And what did Augur do to make him appear ahead of schedule?

I can only write from my perspective, but I am sure I am not the only person struggling with the subtleties of PGTE.

In the last chapter the conversation between the spymaster and Scribe was great. It confirmed suspicions I already had, so I could feel clever, and informed me of things I have missed so I was brought up to speed and could continue the story.

Liliet

But it's so much fun to put the pieces together manually!

Andrew Mitchell

Note my comment to OP below. I wrote them for you as well as Wangrin.

Andrew Mitchell

I too know the feeling, occasionally with PGtE and sometimes with other novels as well. I too, felt a bit lost the first time I read the interactions between the Augur and the Bard. And the second time I read it too. 😊

Some introductory points about reading comprehension. I apologise if these are already known/obvious to you:

- People have an extremely wide range of reading comprehension levels, all the way from to functionally illiterate.
- So any piece of writing will, to some readers, be too basic and uninteresting to be enjoyable and, at the same time, be too difficult and incomprehensible to other readers.
- Authors literally cannot suit everyone.
- Successful authors have to consciously choose what level they're aiming at before they start to write. And, if it's a series of novels, originally meant for a teenage audience, perhaps increase the reading comprehension level of later novels. Harry Potter is an example.

– Many, perhaps all, readers feel successful after they have struggled with a chapter and managed to understand it (or most of it). Struggle and achievement is part of everyone's journey to be a better reader. Part of this journey from struggle to comprehension is facilitated by re-reading the challenging parts, as I did with this chapter.

With all that in mind, my view is that Erratic Errata has got the balance right with PGtE.

– Based on the comments, EE's writing satisfies many readers. By this I mean that they enjoy most chapters and look forward to reading more.

– Similarly, some high proportion of readers seem to be challenged by some chapters. And, by themselves, or with the help of other commenters, they extract more meaning and feel successful in that.

– The level of reading comprehension has been slowly increasing book by book. Which is quite appropriate given the series is (I believe) pitched at young adults.

One final thought: Authors often / sometimes (?) don't have one specific interpretation in mind. They want to facilitate readers to create their own meaning, and some authors even say that every interpretation is as valid as any other. This is evident in PGtE in the repeated explorations of the bet between Above and Below and how it is playing out in Calernia; and the diversity of views about this that are seen in the comments.

Lord_GM

I will try not to interpret your post as a diplomatically phrased: "Piss of, if you are too dumb to understand this!"

Reading the scene with Agnes and Bard had me feel like Masego during that conversation with the two Praesi highborn at the party in Thalassina, you remember? The ones he incinerated on the spot for insulting the Woe? Like him I understand the words, but not the meaning, because context is missing.

Actually I think I have it worse because sometimes even the words make no sense due to typos, bad grammar, 'colorful speech' and imprecise use of pronouns.

So maybe it would be more correct to say I feel like Masego at that party with the two Praesi speaking with a heavy accent.

And then there is the thing with the Agnes' distracting visions...

...Masego at the party with the two Praesi speaking with heavy accents and on drugs, so it's not even sure they are talking to him or a figment behind him!

Re-reading the chapter won't do much against the 'accent' or the figment effect.

Mental Mouse

> had me feel like Masego during that conversation with the two Praesi highborn

I think that's kinda the point! (I'll also note that Masego's response was pretty much correct for his society – Praesi who try to play “mean girl”, or even eavesdrop, on someone vastly more powerful than them... shouldn't really expect to survive the experience.)

Every writer of fantasy (and most of SF) eventually has to deal with the case of writing at least interactions with a character who is meant to have intelligence, insight, knowledge, biology, or other features that are simply beyond human comprehension. EE has mostly skated around such situations; for example, we haven't had POV from any angels, demons, or even post-apotheosis gods.

Some of the conversations and rare POVs with the Dead King come close, but it turns out he's not quite as special as he thinks. The Wandering Bard comes close, but she's usually trying to show a human face, and when it's Cat she's talking to, Cat generally explains afterwards what happened.

But Wandering Bard versus Augur? There we had two characters whose view of the world, and their understanding of its deeper currents, are frankly superhuman, and they had no need to explain themselves to any passing mortals. In that situation, I'd say a half-incomprehensible dialogue is very much to be expected.

Mental Mouse

I correct myself: We have had POV from Cat while she was technically a god, but she'd never really bought into that, and was still thinking mostly as a human. But POV from DK has still been pretty limited.

Andrew Mitchell

> I will try not to interpret your post as a diplomatically phrased: “Piss of, if you are too dumb to understand this!”

Good, because that interpretation would be wrong. I was trying to my best to be helpful and I didn't want to miscommunicate by making assumptions about what you already knew.

Wangrin

I am happy that my feelings have created some resonance. I felt like i was the only stupid guy who does not get the obscure references. I am not a native speaker (though i am as close as it gets) and i assumed that some of the riddles get lost on me due to language intuition. I understand that bard and agnes are characters who deserve quite a bit of obscurity, but i think cordelias ascent to namehood did not. That being said, were this just another page in a finished story, i would not bother to stop and try and understand any of it. It would simply irritate me and estrange me from the story. I think EE has every right to write his story any way he wants, but were this a printed book he would need to have it appeal to a broader audience. Not just because people are stupid, but because it interrupts the formation of a red thread somewhat. If the challenge to connect the dots is too broad, you will invariably lose people on the way. One problem for me is also that i dont trust my own interpretations very much. Not that they would be correct most of the time.

jack

Reminds me of Monty Python.

"Strange women lyin in ponds distributing swords, is no basis for a system of government!"

"Supreme executive power derives from a mandate of the masses, not some farcical aquatic ceremony."

Granted, the 'divine mandate to rule' in this setting has a lot more weight behind it, but I loved seeing a character who's actual response is 'No, that's not how we do things here. We already have a system of government and we don't accept being ruled over by divinely chosen champions. We vote.

aran

Wonder what the Name she just refused would've been – something that was already a title, like First Prince / Warden of the West, or something else?

emthe4th

This feels like both Below's botched attempt to stop the Liesse Accords by burning Salia in goblinfire, and then Above's attempt to sway Procer away from being willing to sign the Accords.

Chapter 72: Rumours

"Reputation is as a wild horse; gone at a gallop and returned at a trot."

– Arlesite saying

"Tell me what you've learned," I ordered.

The small town they envoys of the First Prince had led us to was called Roque-Faillie, and though it was not particularly pretty or luxurious it did have the benefit of being mostly empty. Apparently during winter most of the countryside around Salia went empty with the seasonal labourers or farms and fields the locals called manants migrating into the capital with whatever coin they'd saved up. The Callowan in me balked at the notion that good honest farmers could be effectively forced by poverty to take refuge in a large city, but Hakram had noted it was a little more complicated than that. Unlike my own people, who tended to leave the family home and strike out on their own unless they were in line to inherit property or trade, Alamans apparently tended to form in closely-knit clans of kin that bought property belonging to the family itself and not individuals. The young and fit worked fields during the warm seasons, the returned to the family's house or houses in Salia with that wealth once winter rolled in. It was all very communal, and rather strange to my own sensibilities. Still, practically speaking it meant that there'd been a large string of mostly empty towns and villages within a day's march of the capital where all the many envoys and armies could be settled.

According to my scouting lines – and Robber, who I'd let loose to skulk with for sole instruction not to start a diplomatic incident that wasn't fairly deniable – and the chatter amongst us diplomats, settling my men in Roque-Faillie meant I was between the League's town and the Dominion's. Amusingly enough they'd put General Rumena and its drow past the Dominion, possibly in an attempt to separate them from the rest of my delegation. Considering most of the Firstborn were prompt to violence and spoke not a whit of Chantant, I suspected anyone trying to negotiate with them on the sly would have ended up having a rough time even if I'd not been the First Under the Night. Still, Heavens take pity on whatever poor fucker Hasenbach would send to probe the intentions of the drow before it came to negotiation. Princess Rozala had garrisoned her larger army in between us and the capital, though she'd had to split them into three smaller forces in different towns. Not that her soldiers would complain much, I imagined. Much like mine, after so many months of campaigning they'd find sleeping in an actual bed surrounded by actual walls to be the height of luxury. Worryingly, though, Malanza had promptly vanished into the city. So had the Grey Pilgrim, my watchers told me.

At a guess, it might relate to the fact that someone had set the damned capital on fire since we'd last spoken with the First Prince. The smoke was lingering over a large chunk of Salia, visible even from miles away, and if the capital of Procer was anything like Laure an uncomfortably large amount of it must have been made of wood. Probably even more, I grimly guessed. Salia was said to be the largest city on Calernia, large than even Ater which boasted around five hundred thousand souls. You couldn't house that many people in stone: no empire in Creation was so extravagantly rich. Whatever it was that'd happened, though, I needed to know of it. If I was about to be blamed for yet another fucking fire I'd not started, best I know of it before I ended up accused before Gods and men. Thankfully, we'd had Jacks in the city and Vivienne had been very far from idle these last few weeks. There was a reason I'd seen so little of her.

"There was an attempted coup," Vivienne Dartwick bluntly said.

For all that these days she was Lady Dartwick in more than an honorary sense, as my heiress-designate to the throne of Callow, she was still the head of the Jacks. I was genuinely unsure if the Fairfaxes had kept spies of their own before the Conquest, though I assumed they must have. If there'd been such a web of informants Black had long destroyed or suborned it, which meant we'd had to start very much from scratch. As a result, though the quality of the reports of the Jacks was fairly solid the eclectic nature of the organisations they'd been put together from meant there were some glaring blind spots in our tradecraft and that our people were usually very much outmatched by the spies of other nations. Not least, I'd admit, for what was likely the same reason the Fairfaxes had not had a reputation for being particularly well-informed: spies were expensive. Even without getting into bribes and hirelings, just keeping the Jacks fed and clothes and paid was painfully costly. If trade with Praes and Procer didn't pick up after the wars came to an end, we might have to disband parts of the Jacks simply because we couldn't afford to keep such a sprawling array of agents.

For now, though, dwarven gold would prop us up. It'd certainly opened more than a few doors in Salia that would otherwise have been closed to us, not to mention loosened a few tongues. East or west, everyone liked to make a little coin on the side.

"Fuck," I eloquently said.

This was an informal council, without even the full roster of the Woe – Masego had gone to speak with the Rogue Sorcerer and Archer had mentioned she was, Sisters bless, 'just going for a walk' – though in truth all those with an interest or proper role in the proceedings were there. Vivienne as my heiress and the head of the Jacks, Hakram as my right hand and Akua as, well, Akua Sahelian. Whether that was a good or terrible thing had wildly carried depending on the time and situation since I'd first met her, but at the very least she'd never been slow on the uptake.

"Pretty much," Vivienne agreed, brushing back a strand that'd slipped below her milkmaid braid. "City's boiling over with rumours and we don't have anyone anywhere close to the First Prince's inner circle, but we've gathered at least a little more than your average man in the street. For one, the House of Light and the Silver Letters were heavily involved."

The Silver Letters were one of the Principate's several informant networks – Merciless Gods, how much must it cost to run a solid network across even just the span of Procer, much less three? – and said to be in particular the one concerned with the affairs of Procer itself. The Circle of Thorns, the second, were charged with gathering secrets abroad. We'd caught a few of their people trying to get into my court and even the Regals before they'd been gelded, and most likely missed a few more. The Eyes of the Empire had continued to out them to me even after relations between Malicia and myself had cooled all the way to ice, though there was no telling of those had been the Tower's people or Scribe's. It was the third and last that was surprising me, though, because if the House had been part of the coup then they should have been as well.

"Not the Holy Society?" I asked. "I thought their whole mandate was keeping an eye on the House."

"Their nominal head, a certain Brother Simon de Gorgeault, was sought by parts of the city guard on charges of murder and heresy for some time before the First Prince crushed the coup," Vivienne replied. "It seems he was fooled but not complicit."

"As I recall the head of the Silver Letters was an interesting little man by the name of Balthazar Serigny," Akua said. "Unless that changed?"

She glanced at Vivienne, who had not hidden her dislike in the slightest but remained professional. My spymistress shook her head.

"Interesting how?" Hakram asked.

"As in 'the Eyes have been working on him for more than a decade'. I know not to what purpose, however," Akua said. "None of my mother's spies ever rose high enough in the ranks to be brought into the scheme, though the Lady Scribe would know."

Fuck, I thought, this time at least refraining from speaking it out loud. We couldn't be blamed for the bloody House of Light deciding now was the time to start a fourth Liturgical War, but if the Silver Letters were the fault of the Scribe then that put us in the deeps as well. Black was viciously loyal to those he considered his own, at once both one of his best and worst traits. He likely wouldn't have agreed to throw her to the hounds even if she deserved it a few years ago, much less now that the Calamities had begun dropping like flies.

"That makes for spies and priests," Adjutant noted in his gravelling voice. "Which princes were involved? They would have needed a candidate to replace Hasenbach."

"It's not common knowledge yet, not in the streets, but apparently this was all in the name of Princess Rozala," Vivienne said.

Akua's fine eyebrow arched, as if to remind me she had predicted the possibility of strife between the First Prince and the first halfway-decent princess I'd ever met. It didn't fit, though, not to me. We'd discussed how the two rulers might skirmish through the Highest Assembly and debate over the Accords, but neither Akua nor Hakram had ever brought up a coup as a possibility. Neither knew Cordelia had effectively stacked the Assembly in her favour, back then, I then reminded myself. Even still, I had a hard time reconciling the same princess who'd been the first to toss her crown, the princess who'd plunged her sword in the earth and sworn oaths of gratitude, with someone who'd risk the madness that a coup in the narrow window where we had a truce with Keter might bring on us all. She would have to know that the Lycaonese would take it as a betrayal beyond forgiveness if the first First Prince of their people was deposed not even halfway through a war with the Hidden Horror.

"She left the for the capital not long after settling her soldiers," I said. "I don't suppose you know on what terms?"

"We have someone in Louis Rohanon's serving staff," Vivienne smiled. "She went livid, when it was intimated this was from her hand, and threatened something called the 'liar's leash' on anyone who'd repeat such slander. She left with hardly an escort, too."

"Don't suppose you know what this leash is?" I frowned.

My heiress shook her head.

"From context, it is likely to be unpleasant," the former thief said.

"It is an ancient Arlesite punishment for one who speaks calumny of a real," Akua conversationally provided. "A hook tied to a long line of twine is put through the tongue of the liar and tied to the tail of a horse, which the real then rides for a mile. If the liar survives the mile without the hook ripping through their tongue, the Gods Above have judged their lie to have been accidental. Otherwise, what is left of their tongue is to be carved out and buried beneath the gate of the real's fortress."

Vivienne looked split between sharp irritation at being shown up on even such a slight detail and disgust as the old Arlesite ways of justice. Mind you Akua had said real and not prince, which was a telling detail: it meant it predated the founding of the Principate. Which for all its many, many flaws, was significantly less prone to elaborate executions than its predecessor-states. Mind you, I could cast no stones there without being a hypocrite. My people had indulged in some excruciatingly brutal ways of killing prove traitors, especially those who struck bargains with Praes. It'd been delightfully horrible to read about public drawing and quarterings, or even the rarer red hangings as a kid – I'd taken me year to realize the unlikeliness of books about the worst excesses of Callowan 'justice' being so easy to get your hands on, Black you prick – but as I aged I'd been left to wonder at the monstrosity of hurting even a traitor so carefully they could be hanged by their entrails. Even the Deoraithe had dabbled in impalement whenever the Clans made a run at the Wall, though their worst they'd always kept for whenever they got their hands on a Dread Emperor. I supposed I shouldn't be surprised Akua knew about this, given that the Praesi had quite literally written the definitive books on this, but why would she have cared about some Arlesite... oh.

"You looked into bits like that for all over, didn't you?" I said, reluctantly amused. "When you still believed you were going to conquer the whole continent."

Akua looked only mildly embarrassed.

"Attention to ironic detail is the difference between a Triumphant and a Nihilis," she defended.

Gods, I could not wait to pass that on to Indrani and see the utter mockery that would follow. That ought to be weeks' worth of entertainment right there, maybe even a full month if Robber was dragged into it. Adjutant cleared his throat, which I allowed without resistance to drag me back to the matters at hand. As amusing as that had been, we did have more pressing matters on our hands: like the fact that someone had torched part of Salia and that someone I must by extension answer for might have been involved. Hells, assuming I wasn't just blamed on general principle. Although, the commander of the legionaries I'd brought was General Abigail so who knew? Maybe this time she'd get the blame, regardless of involvement or general infeasibility. Fucking William, I couldn't believe people still thought I was responsible for Marchford. Both times, too, thank you very much Chider.

"Cordelia Hasenbach remains First Prince, however," Hakram half-asked.

Like me, he'd assumed that if she wasn't that news would have been the first thing spoken.

"She is," Vivienne confirmed. "She also came out of the mess smelling like roses with the Highest Assembly and highly popular in Salia itself. Rumour has it she prevented the summary execution of the conspirators so they could stand proper trial instead right after they tried to assassinate her. Which brings me to another important part."

She drew breath.

"Both the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods are in the city," she said, blue-grey eyes narrowing. "The White Knight was the one attempting to pass judgement on the conspirators, before Hasenbach interrupted him."

I leaned forward in my seat, feeling a mixture of surprise and respect ripple through the other two as well.

"She told the hatchet man of the Choir of Judgement to step out?" I said, and a heartbeat later my stomach sunk. "Shit. Shit."

"Catherine?" Vivienne asked, sounding surprise. "I thought you'd be pleased. It shows great adherence to principles in accord with, well, the Accords."

Hakram had been with me longest and was most familiar with my way of thinking. He got it first.

"It shows will and fearlessness, as well as strong belief," Adjutant said. "And it is a powerful story: we know what brew these are the ingredient for."

"Better than even odds she got a Name out of that," I cursed. "Can you really see the White Knight backing down otherwise?"

And that was an issue, because if Cordelia had come into a Name then the Wandering Bard could now reach her at will. Fresh off her transition she'd be flush with power and confidence, if hers was anything like mine, which would make her harder to influence in some ways and significantly easier in others. Especially if the Augur vouched for the Bard, which unfortunately seemed quite possible. Hasenbach wouldn't have years of history with the Intercessor, though, no ironclad trust. I could work with that if I moved quick enough, which it seemed I'd have to.

"That is the end of the notion of Named being excluded from ruling, I'd say," Akua calmly mused. "That clause is dead in the water, if First Prince is now more than a mere title."

Wouldn't be First Prince, I thought. Too weak a story, too many strings attached. A Name that could be made illegitimate by a vote of the Highest Assembly, that had to be sanctioned by such a vote in the first place? No, it'd never form properly unless. It'd be something along one of the few lines the disparate peoples of Procer had in common belief. If not for the House of Light apparently being part of the conspiracy I would have bet on it being from holy scripture, but as things stood it'd probably drawn on a narrower stripe of commonality. The Fair Prince, maybe? Procer didn't really have any strong unifying stories, which made it difficult to predict. No point in guessing when I knew so little.

"We'll see," I grunted. "There's rule and then there's rule."

Wizards of the West had been the royal wizards of Callow for centuries and wielded both wealth and influence as well as their magic, but they'd not owned land and only rarely commanded armies. I might have to compromise on the degree of power Named were allowed in rulership, but simply flying a white flag over the matter wasn't in the cards.

"Rumours are split as to who is responsible for all this," Vivienne said. "You are prominent among them, Catherine, but both the Black Knight and the Dead King are preferred culprits. My people believe that the First Prince is actively encouraging the perception this was the work of the Hidden Horror, for both political and diplomatic reasons."

"She's discrediting the priests," Adjutant said, huffing out soft laughter. "They can't be holy men, if they were the pawns of the Dead King."

"Preparing for a purge, you think?" I asked. "She hangs the Holies and the House of Light in Procer is essentially leaderless. Given the times, the House might look to a hero or the Assembly for leadership until they've managed to name a fresh batch of replacements."

I cocked my head to the side. There weren't a lot of prominent priestly Named, at the moment. The Grey Pilgrim, arguably, but he was effectively Levantine royalty so it was doubtful Procerans would fall behind him. Roland was Alamans, but also a wizard, and what Proceran heroes were there aside from him? There'd been some knightly man at the Battle of the Camps, if he was still alive, and I vaguely remembered the Forsworn Healer working with Proceran priests on the shield trick that'd fucked us on the first day, but I knew next to nothing about that hero save for the obvious.

"The diplomatic benefits are obvious," Akua said. "If these Holies – ah, claiming for the silent Heavens, now there's a lovely swindle – were the pawns of Keter, then everything they have done in the last few years is suspect. Including naming you as Arch-heretic of the East."

"You sound a little sad," I accused.

"Oh, it'll be useful for negotiations," the shade said. "But such an epithet is quite prestigious in certain parts, you know."

"The benefits of a retraction with Calernia at large outweigh the prestige it gained her in Praes," Hakram said.

"I would not dare imply otherwise, Adjutant," Akua said, gracefully dipping her head.

"It'll cost them, though," Vivienne suddenly said. "It was a greater conclave that declared you Arch-heretic, not just the Procerans: the Speakers from Ashur and the Lanterns from the Dominion were also involved."

"If I'm reading the Pilgrim right, the Lanterns might actually be grateful for the excuse," I said. "They're having a hard time reconciling it with Mercy not smiting me to ash. Their only way out is saying I tricked the Ophanim, which no one wants to roll the dice one while they're here to disagree."

"She's still effectively saying that her priesthood alone, of all the western ones, was compromised by the Dead King before making it shoulder the whole blame for the nomination," Vivienne said. "It's a massive loss of face for the Proceran House, Cat."

"You believe the First Prince wants to revisit the balance of power set by the Liturgical Wars," Akua said, sounding surprised but also a tad intrigued. "Arguably, Cordelia Hasenbach has been scrupulously observant of the authority of the House of Light until now. Even when it was at her detriment."

"That was before they took a swing at her," I said. "And they've been at odds with her policies for some time, too. I'm not necessarily agreeing with what Vivienne is saying but measures she would have balked at a few months ago might be on the table now."

"It would go some way in explaining her insistence on strict lawfulness in dealing with the conspiracy," Hakram said. "It allows her to drag the Holies through trials before the Highest Assembly, bringing out the ugly details of how they tried to meddle with the secular powers. She'll get support from powers that might usually be on the fence, even the royals close to the House won't want to let it stay in a position to try this again."

"Public trials of priests while we're at war with the Dead King?" I said. "That could get messy. Not sure she'd risk that. Traitors or not, they're House. People won't be comfortable with priests in front of a tribunal when the Dead are the gate."

"I'd expect her to go for property over privileges, if she does act," Akua noted. "All those monasteries and abbeys with attendant lands. The tax exemptions as well. The war efforts would justify the measures and leave the appearance of the old order intact while severely curtailing the influence of the House in truth."

"Ultimately, so long as it does not affect her ability to negotiate with us it is only somewhat relevant to our affairs," Hakram finally said.

"Our stance going forward hasn't changed," I agreed. "An additional degree of caution, maybe, but if Hasenbach is able to keep the White Knight under control it's not a major concern."

"I'd prefer if he wasn't there at all," Vivienne sighed. "Now the Tyrant gets his trial. We could have put him off for months if the Knight had stayed away."

"Not sure I'd want to find out what Kairos might do to get him to hurry up, considering he began a war with Procer just to get him there," I said. "Obviously we'll need to keep a close eye on him, Vivs, which is why your Jacks-"

It was a pleasant surprise to have a door to be knocked on, after the Everdark and the fields of Iserre. Adjutant bade our sentry to enter, and the young orc in legionary armour passed a message. The Carrion Lord requested audience and had mentioned he was bringing an old friend. Well now, I thought. The Jacks had done admirably well, all things considered, but it wouldn't beat hearing of this madness straight from the horse's mouth.

Time to see what the Scribe had to say for herself.

jalexanderb

Yaaaay we're back to Cat! The Coup Interludes were phenomenal, but it's always good to get back to our MVP.

Man, if Cat's worried now, wait until she hears that Cordelia told the Heavens to bugger off right from the start. She might propose on the spot.

RoflCat

AND that Cordelia refused the Names, all of them.

A buddy in the “gloriously mortal” faction as well as the “Fuck Providence” party.
Augur isn’t in the former, but surely she can join the latter given the crushing defeat she handed to Bard.

MagpieJack

Cat: So, I hear you have a name...

Cordelia: I actually rejected 2 different names. Fuck that shit amirite?

Cat: sploosh

NerfContessa

Yeah. Sooo9 fun.

And about time truly free people start ruling.

kelioez

That sploosh is the most eloquent and apt thing I’ve read till now, Bravo my fellow reader.

daegone823

Most Villainous Player

Andrew Mitchell

I saw the title and immediately thought: “Goblinfire rumours”. 😊

Let’s see if I’m right, I haven’t read any of the chapter yet.

Andrew Mitchell

Second thought, it could be about what Cordelia has dredged out of the lake.

medailyfun

wasn’t she actually dredging the munitions?

Andrew Mitchell

That’s an interesting idea but it doesn’t fit: “corpse that was not a corpse” IIRC.

Javvies

No, the munitions would have been cargo and stayed on the boats/barges/ships/vessels.

Dredging indicates that her objective is, at best, resting somewhere on the bottom, but more likely is buried underground, beneath the bottom of the lake.

Also, as noted, she's looking for a "corpse that isn't a corpse" in order to "fight fire with fire" in reference to the war against the Dead King.

First, the knowledge, which is more technically speculation, that goblinfire and goblin munitions are created from powered devils and maybe demons in the case of goblinfire, is a massive secret – one that I'm honestly not sure if Amadeus even knows or suspects. Cordelia most assuredly doesn't have the slightest clue.

Also, 3 tons of goblin munitions are not the kind of equalizer or game changer Cordelia was looking for.

Nairne .01

I'm pretty sure Black's aware of the source material for the munitions.

greatwyrmgold

Using a corpse, albeit one that is not a corpse, to fight fire with fire against an enemy known for necromancy? Sounds like they're trying to at least partially resurrect some kind of dead horror. Or at least one that lies dreaming.

James, Mostly Harmless

Pilgrim's plague killed the troops but did not sink the boats.

Liliet

A plague that sinks boats... hmm. What WOULD that look like?

shieldredblog

Termites

greatwyrmgold

I'm not sure which is more terrifying—someone as confidently self-righteous as the Pilgrim having control over insects, or someone as ruthlessly pragmatic as Skitter having the blessing of a Choir.

Andrew Mitchell

I was wrong. Not goblinfire rumours, but fire rumours and more.

Liliet

And actually the rumors were just about the coup 🤪

byzantine279

I wonder how Cat will react when she finds out Cordelia actively denied a Name.

Slider

She'll likely revise her opinion on Cordelia (which may also imply looking into the augur).

Andrew Mitchell

For a moment I wondered what a 'hero pinion' was!

James, Mostly Harmless

Curse WordPress, which does not allow commenters to go back and edit their posts!

nimelennar

It's a gear that controls which direction the hero is pointed.

Dainpdf

Aka a Choir. Or The Bard.

Andrew Mitchell

♥

Andrew Mitchell

😊😊😊

C_B

Given the Augur's fondness for birds, there's definitely room for a quality pun in there somewhere.

Shikkarasu

Hero Pinion: A larger feather than Hero Down, can be used to Forgive one ally while simultaneously hitting a nearby enemy with Summer Fire.

Acquisition: using Mug on Angels.

Buy price: N/A

Sell price: 300gil

ciara

Strangely enough, a 'hero pinion' has already been featured in this story. William's sword was made from a Hashmallim's feather.

sammax

"Ultimately, so long as it does not affect her ability to vote at <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> it is only somewhat relevant to our affairs," Hakram finally said.

Barthumphries

This also needs to be a typo thread, every time.

Here's one typo:

The young and fit worked fields during the warm seasons, the returned

Change "the returned" to "they returned".

There are at least 8 more typos but I'm on my phone and if you all aren't going to bother helping a typo thread form then I can't be bothered either.

Liliet

Catherine is said to be blamed for Marchford fires. She means Summerholm.

greatwyrmgold

Let's face it—if there's been a fire within a mile of anywhere she might have been recently or looks like she might want to visit, she's been blamed for it. Even when she was an embodiment of Winter.

Morgenstern

I'd say it's "... during the warm seasons, theN returend to...", not 'they' (which would better fit a new sentence start, but there's a comma here).

"All those monasteries and abbeys with attendant lands. The tax emptions as well."

→ EXemptions.

Morgenstern

" According to my scouting lines – and Robber, who I'd let loose to skulk with for sole instruction not to start a diplomatic incident that wasn't fairly deniable – "

-> "who I'd let loose to skulk with (them?) for sole(ly) instruction(,) not to..." ? (not quite sure about this sentence, but it sure looks/feels odd; I might be looking at it the wrong way, though)

Ultimate_Procrastinator

I think taking out the "for" would do it. "-and Robber, who I'd let loose to skulk with sole instruction..."

Morgenstern

"Even without getting into bribes and hirelings, just keeping the Jacks fed and clothes and paid was painfully costly."

-> "keeping the Jacks fed and clothed ..."

Morgenstern

"...Akua as, well, Akua Sahelian. Whether that was a good or terrible thing had wildly carried depending on the time and situation..."

-> should probably be "...had wildly VARIED depending on..."

Morgenstern

"The Eyes of the Empire had continued to out them to me even after relations between Malicia and myself had cooled all the way to ice, though there was no telling of those had been the Tower's people or Scribe's."

-> "though there was no telling IF those had been..."

Morgenstern

"Not the Holy Society?" I asked. "I though their whole mandate was keeping an eye on the House."

-> "I thoughT their whole ..."

Morgenstern

"Even still, I had a hard time reconciling the same princess who'd..."

-> Not sure if this is an actual typo, but it sounds odd to me / never heard that expression. Might be a regional thing? It does sound like "Even then, ..." and "Still, ..." mixed up to me. If that were the case, it should be either one OR the other, not a mixture of both. 😊

Morgenstern

"My people had indulged in some excruciatingly brutal ways of killing prove traitors, especially those who struck bargains with Praes. It'd been delightfully horrible to read about public drawing and quarterings, or even the rarer red hangings as a kid – I'd taken me year to realize the unlikeliness of books about the worst excesses of Callowan 'justice' being so easy to get your hands on, Black you prick ..."

→ "proveN traitors"

→ and, as a minor thing, probably "hands on; Black, you prick", that being two thoughts, not one; the semicolon being the important bit, if at all (I'm not starting on commata alone in a typo thread or this will never find an end) no, that's actually the same thought. She's addressing Black as being a prick specifically about the issue of getting her hands on that info easily.

Liliet

Morgenstern

"... Their only way out is saying I tricked the Ophanim, which no one wants to roll the dice one while they're here to disagree."

→ "... no one wants to roll the dice ON while ..."

Liliet

I've seen 'even still' used

Morgenstern

"Vivienne looked split between sharp irritation at being shown up on even such a slight detail and disgust as the old Arlesite ways of justice."

→ "disgust AT", not 'as'

Morgenstern

"Adjutant bade our sentry to enter..."

→ as far as my grammar/vocab goes, there's no need for "to" in there; it should be "bade our sentry (-) enter"
?

Nairne .01

How expectedly irritating to be left hanging.

spudsoftheapocalypse

At least you're not hanging by your own entrails.

Shveiran

I can sympathize.

Though really "damn it, I'm out of Guide, I need more Guide!" has stayed with me pretty much every chapter.

magesbe

As I thought, Cat hasn't given up on the "no Named ruler" thing. Amadeus thinks it'll never fly, we'll see if he's right. To be fair, if he's in charge of Praes, there might not be much argument over the matter. Except maybe from Levant, but to be fair they're currently without Named rulers.

caoimhinh

Nice, Scribe's presence will also enable Catherine to have more information and details about what happened in Salia, since Scribe's network goes deeper than Vivienne's.

Oshi

Plus the Circle of Thorns rep talked to her so there is that

Shveiran

We'll also get to learn how that talk ended up

Dainpdf

I am looking forward to finding out whether the Sisters will enable Cat to perceive the Scribe.

Liliet

I think she shouldn't be hiding.

jack

Cat underestimates both Cordelia and the Auger.

No shame in that, so did most of us.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep! 😊

Shveiran

To be fair neither of them nor she ever saw the Augur before.

And even for Cordelia it was a very, very close thing.

Dainpdf

This is the woman who outmaneuvered Malicia without a Name and while facing discrimination for her origins. Cordelia Hasenbach is one of the greatest badasses in this story.

Raved Thrad

"Vivs"

SQUEE!!

sengachi

I love the little details like the one about how Proceran farmers live and how Catherine was inclined to interpret that. It's stuff like that which really supports the narrative of Calernia as a diverse place with different people living different lives, and shows how much Catherine's understanding of the nuance and difficulty of bettering the world has improved

Liliet

Mhm!!!!

nipi

Im guessing Kairos is going to be using the Hierarch and the White Knight to put Aboves named on trial. After all the White Knight has the unique ability of drawing on the abilities of deceased heroes.

greatwyrmgold

For all that the Hierarch has noble goals, good ideas, and a terminal case of stubbornness, he's probably not a heroic Named. His home city counts as Evil, after all, and he's an embodiment of all its graces and flaws.

nipi

Im guessing Kairos is going to be using the Hierarch and the White Knight to put Aboves named on trial. After all the White Knight can uniquely call upon the experiences and powers of dead heroes.

Javvies

Hmmm.

The White Knight being available enough for Kairos's trial is a problem.

On the other hand ... they might be able to stall the trial on the grounds that they're in Procer, not the League, and IIRC the agreement didn't specify a timeline or immediacy on the trial, so they could maybe argue that the trial should take place in the League ... and after the threat of the Dead King has been dealt with (assuming that Hanno survives long enough).

Ah, soon we'll find out more about what went on and Scribe's role in it.

They might want to try to pitch as much blame as they can towards Malicia.

SpeckofStardust

eh the faster the Trial gets dealt with the better, putting it off is a mistake.

I still think the White Knight will win it.

ninegardens

I mean... if anything, the Trial could potentially act as a huge advert (or debate) for the accords. Namely "We have this dude with a magic coin running around judging people. Do we WANT that?" – so far Cat presumably doesn't, Cordelia just denied him, and Heriarch is certainly not okay with it... (tyrant probably thinks its funny).

I kinda love how Hanno is portrayed as a decent and reasonable person... who just happens to be bat shit insane (by earth standards).

Personally I'm hoping for a trial result along the lines of "Okay, we aren't going to execute you, but you SERIOUSLY need to knock off all the vigilante executions, or we gonna have problems."

... hell, If the Choir of Judgement could be brought onboard, Hanno could be an AMAZING enforcer for the Accords.

Mental Mouse

Remember that Kairos' "trial" of Hanno isn't actually intended to resolve any question of guilt – after all, this is Kairos we're talking about. Kairos apparently intends to use the trial to draw one or more Seraphs into a position, where he and Hierarch can trap and/or kill them.

Piu

White Knight himself never act. He is always Choirs will. So I think Kairos's gambit here is about Choir of Judgement vs Hierarch judgement. And we've seen, what his madness can do.

Liliet

TBF Hanno doesn't normally act as a vigilante. The city was kind of on fire is all, and he got a little carried away.

greatwyrmgold

His extrajudicial executions technically count as vigilantism, but at least it's usually the superhero flavor where he sticks to people who laugh at any judges trying to enforce their will on them.

Liliet

Also, is it really vigilantism if he's enforcing law of higher jurisdiction? Which the House of Light in Procer will argue Heavens are?

And he steps back when asked by more local authorities, too

greatwyrmgold

If the Westboro Baptist Church rustled up some goon squads to fight crimes against God, they'd argue the same thing. The only difference is that the Grey Pilgrim is respected in a way that the Westboro Baptists are not; their legal statuses are, technically, equivalent.

Morgenstern

"The Angels made me do it." – " M'kay, so we gotta judge the Angels."

Dainpdf

I don't see how blaning Malicia would be productive. They want her to be a signatory. Best to do as Hasenbach has been doing and blame Neshamah.

konstantinvoncarstein

If possible, Catherine will set Amadeus on the throne and kill Malicia.

Fayhem

While Cat's got a grudge to carry there (and, y'know, is Callowan) I think only the first item – putting Amadeus on the throne – is actually necessary to her. If Malicia was willing to abdicate on a "you know, I hear other continents are lovely, you should probably go investigate that" kind of basis Cat might well allow it to make the transition of power go more smoothly, not to mention sparing Amadeus having to preside over the death of one of his oldest and dearest (and one of his few remaining) friends.

Of course, that assumes there's a scenario where Malicia would ever willingly surrender power, which I'm dubious of, so that might be a moot point.

konstantinvoncarstein

About that, Scribe will probably know more of what Malicia is doing with the whole Praesi nobility.

Liliet

I'm predicting Malicia abdicating the ULTIMATE POWAH only to remain in power as a high-ranked government official (just, y'know, subordinate to the guy that HASN'T burned his bridges with the entire continent ~~despite his best efforts~~)

Fayhem

Given that Malicia personally ordered some of Cat's friends killed and is very much politically associated with the Doom of Liesse on an international basis that sounds like a tough sell on multiple levels. There is still a lot of space left in the narrative for things to change unexpectedly in the future, but as things stand now I'm dubious that would be viable even if Malicia were willing.

As always though, we'll see. 😊

Rey d`Tutto

Chancellor.

Amadeus as Emperor, Malicia abdicates to become his Chancellor.

Cat will still hate, and be screwed with by Chancellor M.

Javvies

Not happening.

Part of the Praesi Chancellor Name is betraying the current Dread Emperor/Empress and becoming their successor.

There is a damned good reason why Malicia has spent decades trying to kill the Name of Chancellor.

Plus, I fully expect that Malicia will not abdicate, and will need to be killed or otherwise forcibly deposed. Abdicating would be giving up control and power – which is something that she is psychologically incapable of.

And even if she were to abdicate ... there's no way that anyone could or would trust her with that kind of power ever again.

Liliet

>Abdicating would be giving up control and power – which is something that she is psychologically incapable of.

You're overestimating how much people are ruled by their issues imho.

SpeckofStardust

On the other hand Named are almost powered by their Issues especially Villain named.

Liliet

Powered maybe, but still not ruled 😊

Mental Mouse

It is also possible that Malicia will run out of plot points and get killed by the High Lords, a Hero, or another adversary. We're a little short of folks who could credibly pull that off, but I note that Larat &co. are still on the loose, with completely unknown abilities. IIRC the goblins aren't too happy with her either. Or she could manage to piss off Ranger...

Javvies

No they don't.

Cat has already said that leaving Malicia on the Throne is unacceptable. It's unacceptable to her personally, and it's going to be unacceptable to everyone else (except Kairos) – Malicia is, after all, the one who let out the Dead King, and has been meddling in Procer for decades.

Remember, Cat considers Amadeus the only viable ruler of Praes to bring Praes into the Accords and make it less of a problem for everyone.

Malicia might be able to get away with abdicating instead of becoming a corpse, but there's no way she'll be allowed to remain Dread Empress.

Nicola Mazzanti

Finally caught up, first comment!

First, this series is great, and better on a second read. I am halfway through my second read, and while the first book feels a tad too much "young adult" the rest is super duper great.

Then, a couple of thoughts/questions that have probaly been asked by others somewhere, so humor a newbie!

-who defeated Hierarch and Kairos in the popularity contest, back in the day? If it was anyone but robber it was a mistake 😊

-aren't goblin a bit overpowered compared to the other races? They are faster, incredibly deft/nimble, best technology on the continent outside of the dwarves and it seems they would not be magical pushovers, if they became independent, given how munitions are made. Ok, they are short and weak, but firepower, mobility, furtivity, fortifications and essentially napalm/hand grenades should more than make up for it. And yes, munitions are definitely super powerful, possibly overly so, and way more available than how they are described to be.

-How long before Juniper and Cat change the tactical doctrine of the Army of Callow? They will sooner or later run out of what makes the Legions great (munitions, mages, sappers) and have other massive strengths the legions don't have (cavalry).

Andrew Mitchell

Welcome to our commenting community. If you have time, reading the comments and conversations here will enhance your understanding and enjoyment of the story.

> -How long before Juniper and Cat change the tactical doctrine of the Army of Callow? They will sooner or later run out of what makes the Legions great (munitions, mages, sappers) and have other massive strengths the legions don't have (cavalry).

Munitions – their recognition of the goblins independence (against the wishes of Malica) has ensured Callow's supply of munitions.

Mages – I, too, have wondered about mages. On the training side Masego has made a big difference. But for replacing lost numbers, I'm not so sure.

Sappers – also OK due to recognition of the goblins (for numbers). But I guess training is a lot more on the job these days.

Chapter 73: Discerning

"Poison is the weapon of the trade, knife the weapon of the intimate and sorcery the weapon of war. To use any for the improper purpose is the mark of inferior breeding, save if greater game is yet afoot."

– Extract from 'The Behaviours of Civil Conduct', by High Lady Mchumba Sahelian

Akua leaked a sensation of query into the Night, an implicit question as to whether or not she should leave given the nature of our arriving guests, but I shook my head. While she was close to neither she was likely to be a fairer hand at reading them than either Vivienne or Hakram, and that lack of closes itself was not without its uses. I doubted a distraction as petty as that would be enough to get beneath the skin of the Scribe, but it took more than one stone to build a house. Adjutant smoothly rose to fetch another two seats without my asking, while Vivienne pressed into my hand a cup before pouring her own. Cold ice-cooled water, sadly, but I did get drunk a lot faster than I used to these days so perhaps that was for the best. Only a fool blunted the edge of their sword just before tugging at a tiger's tail. Might not be necessary, I reminded myself. It would not do to assume hostility from Scribe because of the less than stellar terms we'd parted on last time we spoke. Or even with those in mind given that if my father asked her to play nice, I believed her likely to do so. Still, I'd recently learned that Black did not have nearly as tight a leash over the Scribe as I'd once assumed.

It would not do to presume in favour of her either.

It was still half a surprise every time to see Black in anything but plate when it was daylight, though I noted that while he wore a dark tabard and matching long-sleeved tunic the faint hint of a coat of mail could be seen under them. Hard to unlearn a lifetime's worth of paranoia, I supposed – though when it came to Praes it could not really be called paranoia could it? Scribe was as slippery to the eyes as she'd always been, even when I was actively trying to watch her. It wasn't invisibility, for she was definitely there, but trying to notice anything about the villainess had my attention sliding away like water off a duck's back. She had ink-stained hands, and she was not tall, although she might just have been slouching. Her clothes were loose and made of cloth. I bit the inside my cheek, using the pain as a spur as I narrowed my eyes. She had pale, seemingly bloodless lips. They were not smiling. Black took a seat at Adjutant's invitation and I only then realized how long I'd been staring at Scribe, with only little to show for it. Something to revisit later, perhaps. I sent an idle prayer to my patronesses, though who knew if they'd deign to intercede for such a trifle.

"Would I be correct in assuming you have been parsing through the reports of the Jacks?" the Carrion Lord calmly asked.

"More or less," I agreed. "Speculating as to the consequences of the mess, too. An insider's eye of the affair would be appreciated."

The last sentence I spoke casually, though none here were fool enough to believe it. I was reserving anger along with judgement, but I was less than pleased at the fact that Cordelia Hasenbach had apparently come rather close to being buried in a shallow grave. If the Eyes of the Empire truly had been either authors or helpers to this episode of convulsive stupidity, I would see to it that heads would roll unless very good reason was given. And I did not mean it as a figure of speech, this once. Black glanced at his aide, either ordering or encouraging.

"The Eyes of the Empire were involved," the Scribe calmly confirmed. "Not directly, but in the nascent stages of the conspiracy and on its edges when it came to a head."

"Do the Procerans know?" Vivienne flatly asked.

"The Circle of Thorns did as it took place. By now I would venture this has expanded to the First Prince and her most trusted," Scribe said.

My eyes flicked to my teacher, whose face had remained serene even as one of his oldest companions casually admitted she'd just attacked the Principate in front of Cordelia Hasenbach while we were under formal truce and headed for the negotiating table besides. He was unmoved, so there was likely more to the story. At least some semblance of a reason for me not to denounce Scribe as an agent of the Tower and send her fucking crucified corpse to the First Prince as an apology.

"Elaborate," I coldly ordered.

"After the ambush sprung by the Grey Pilgrim that saw Lord Black seized, the Tower reached out to me through the Eyes of the Empire," Scribe said. "The Empress intended a rescue mission in Salia, paired with a strike at the internal stability of Procer, and given the circumstances I agreed with the necessity. Lady Ime and myself, over the span of several months, laid the groundwork for certain factions within Procer to come to the conclusion a coup was feasible."

"The rumours that Rozala Malanza was backing the coup," Hakram gravelled. "They were not simple slander."

"It was difficult but not impossible to impersonate her by letter," Scribe agreed. "Given that neither the House of Light nor the Silver Letters use scrying mages and the First Prince's own order was rendered helpless by the interdict cast over Iserre. We've had a convincing forgery of the royal seal of Aequitan since the Proceran civil war, when we funded Aenor Malanza's bid for the throne through the Pravus Bank."

"The coup happened," I said. "Which means the trigger was pulled on this scheme, and recently too. After you were informed of my intentions for treaties with the Grand Alliance."

"I was ordered by scrying link to end any ongoing operations, erase any evidence of Praesi presence in the capital and ensure the loyalty of all agents in the city," Scribe agreed.

I glanced at Black, who inclined his head in confirmation.

"In this I did not succeed," Scribe said. "I had several long-term plants among our scrying mages I was unaware of, and she used the Tower's clout to mobilize the Eyes in the capital for action before I could clean up all loose ends. It appears the Empress had judged the Liesse Accords to be an existential threat to herself and her continued reign."

Well, I grimly thought, she wasn't wrong about that.

"Given actions that could not be denied, you had to ensure your loyalists among the Eyes were seen as undertaking damage control," Akua quietly said. "Which is where the Circle of Thorns was brought in. The First Prince will not take the word of anyone here as to the actions of your agents, but she will heed the reports of her own spymaster. A calculated move."

"Concessions had to be made to the Circle in order for their leader to agree not to spread knowledge of our involvement beyond the necessary, and hand over the written proof of Praesi involvement," Scribe said. "I gave formal agreement to the Praesi and Callowan delegations backing the First Prince when she requests relief ships be allowed through the Nicaean blockade around Ashur."

I'd likely have agreed to that anyway, I mused. Oh I'd have tried to exact a little something to sweeten the pot, or made a show of asking for nothing in exchange to foster a sense of debt between myself and Hasenbach, but this was not a great loss for me. I was still swimming in leverage. On the other hand, Scribe had just entered a binding commitment in my name. That she'd presumed to speak for me was galling enough. Considering that Black was effectively my dependant under Proceran law at the moment, Hasenbach would not be entirely without grounds to kick up a fuss if his aide made promises and then they were gone back on. It'd never hold without the strength to enforce it and I could cut right through by sending the Highest Assembly the charred corpse of Scribe along with a polite note informing them she in no way spoke for me, but it'd sour my reputation with some people I badly needed the willing collaboration of. Worse still, though, was that simply by speaking in my name when negotiating the cover up the Scribe had implicitly stated I was in some way related to this. Sedately, I set down my cup on the table.

"I'll not insult your intelligence by asking you if you know what you've done," I calmly said. "I assume if you were willing to be in killing distance of me, you have further explanation as why I shouldn't execute you out of general principle."

Black's lips thinned, but he did not object. Neither fucking should he. If Adjutant had entered a binding agreement on the behalf of the Black Knight, back in the day, even if my teacher had then judged it worth upholding he would have put Hakram's head on a pike as a warning for anyone else wanting to overstep. All else aside, I was the Queen of Callow and a villain in my own right. That someone not in my service or given my explicit permission had presumed to speak for me in such a delicate situation was worthy of violence.

"The Empress was aiming at the Accords themselves, apparently considering them the primary threat," Scribe replied, voice unruffled. "The Silver Letters brought stolen goblinfire into the city and Ime's agents set fire near their safehouses in attempts to trigger a blaze. Such an event would have destroyed large swaths of Salia and, given your reputation for the substance's use, affected popular opinion enough to make made negotiation near impossible. Especially for a weakened First Prince, be it a surviving Hasenbach or a freshly elected Malanza. The odds were more than fair that the Grand Alliance itself would collapse."

I smoothly drummed my fingers against the table. Her answer, unspoken as it'd been, was that she might have overstepped but she'd done so while in the process of averting what could have been a great crisis for me. Certainly one much worse than the minor concession this had ended up costing me – and the unfortunate implications to Scribe having spoken for me could be smoothed away by making it clear to Hasenbach it'd been an exception and not to be taken as face value again. It still got stuck in my throat that her own personal failure to get her house in order would cost me, and that Malicia's unimpeded schemes would be considered my problem, but I supposed an argument could be made that I was the one who was diplomatically cornering the Empress. Scribe's repeated mention of the Accords as the main target was certainly hinting at that heavily. Black cleared his throat.

"Regardless of circumstance," he said, "offence was given. We will offer reparations to the Kingdom of Callow for having drawn on its influence to clean up our own mistakes."

Scribe did not speak for a moment, as if reluctant.

"As of this morning, the Jacks serving under Duchess-Regent Kegan of Callow have been granted access through liaison to my informants within the Wasteland," the Scribe said, "along with a list of all suspected Malicia agents within the kingdom."

My brow rose. Those were... not small things. Black had been outing Malicia's agents in my kingdom for a while now, true, but he'd done it slowly and at a pace Vivienne was adamant had been chosen so his own agents would not be outed by the revelations. And the cooperation with Scribe's own faction in the Eyes would go a long way in keeping Kegan from ending up in a grave between Ratface and Anne Kendall. Those were heavier reparations than I would have felt comfortable asking for, if I'd set the terms, which my teacher would know. Ah, I thought, meeting green eyes with my own. This was not just reparations it was a polite gift-assisted request not to kill Scribe for having crossed me. Which I was finding difficult to refuse, all thing considered. Black was being genuine here, I decided, this was more or less the way he dealt with allies. But there was something about the way Scribe was acting... Oh, she didn't like me. Which was fine, as the sentiment was broadly shared: the cordial beginnings of our acquaintance had begun to fade effectively the moment I sought power independent of my teacher, which I suspected had simply moved me from asset to liability in her eyes. Still, while she didn't like me I would not deny she was an intelligent woman.

Which was where the flaw could be found. My temper had waned some, these days, but not quite that much. So why would she test it by appearing reluctant over Black's reparations? She had to know I'd not be all that well inclined towards her, and exactly what those reparations were meant for. Meaning either she didn't consider her life or freedom worth these concessions from the perspective of the resources available to Black, which was too warped a view to be objectively credible, or she was playing me. Playing up reluctance so I'd feel more grateful for my teacher's contrastingly fair attitude? Could be, it would be just like her to damage her own reputation to prop up his own. Even made sense from a tactical perspective, given that she and I were unlikely to ever be on good terms and so the loss relative to gain was greater. Except that I could taste it in the air, now that I'd notice a flaw: I was being sold a story. Not the way the Pilgrim or the Bard would, no. That wouldn't be Scribe's game. Instead I'd been invited to stroll through a house of mirrors so that I could take in my own reflections and hold them as truth. Even my father's blunt but sincere bribery had been used as an ingredient in the brew, something I'd find and read as true and so believe the rest was true.

So, I was being had. And Black hadn't been brought in on it. So was this really Malicia's ploy at all? It was true the Empress was only losing so much even if it became public she'd helped along the coup, considering the Grand Alliance had been founded in large part to bury her and the Accords would entail her removal regardless. This could be Malicia realizing that openly allying with Keter had burned too many bridges, and that the same alliances taking shape to drive back the Kingdom of the Dead might turn towards her if victorious. Sloppy work, by her standards, but then she had to be running out of tools to use. On the other hand, if I was frustrated in my efforts to establish alliances to the west she had to know I'd be headed east instead – and with a sword in hand. Short-sighted, yes, but honestly still a feasible mistake if Malicia was desperate enough. Which she had to be, with the Tribes having taken Foremen and the Dread Empire on the edge of rebellion from repeated defeats. Feasible, though, was why people thought the hooded figures with tattooed eyes on their skin were the true Eyes of the Empire instead of the chatty innkeepers. Feasible meant you stopped looking because you had the answer. Yet I couldn't see, frankly, what Scribe had to gain from all this.

"Appreciated," I said, not bothering to force a smile. "I'll want a report of everything that took place so no detail can be sprung on me at the table."

"Naturally," Black conceded.

He dipped his head in thanks, trusting in the word I'd just as good as given.

"Vivienne," I said, "I'll need you to arrange a scrying session with Duchess-Regent Kegan as soon as possible."

"I'll see to it immediately," she briskly replied, rising to her feet.

"Akua," I said, simultaneously dumping into the Night a sense of stillness, "we still need to bring General Rumena into the loop."

"As you say, dear heart," she smiled.

In the Night she shaped her will as a sense of action, then a question, and I assented through the same. Neither of us missed a beat, or otherwise gave sign of this.

"I'll arrange for that report presently, then," my father said, sounding rather amused as he rose to his feet.

His old friend followed suit without missing a beat.

"Scribe," I said. "A word, if you would. I'll require a few more details out of you in case Hasenbach sends for a private meeting soon. I'm not walking into that blind."

"The report-" she began.

"Eudokia," Black sharply said.

She returned to the seat. I nodded thanks at my teacher, who acknowledged them with a discreet dip. No, he most definitely hadn't been brought into this. I smiled at Hakram, who was lingering behind me, and drained my cup of water before handing it to him. Clicking his fangs in amusement, he moved to fill it again. Scribe waited patiently even as I reached for my dragonbone pipe and slowly stuffed it, only then clearing her throat.

"If you could refrain?" she said.

A heartbeat later I felt Akua's working slither around us, smooth and silent, and tapped a finger against my pipe to light it. I puffed out, waiting until Hakram had set down the filled cup at my side before speaking.

"You get one chance to tell me the truth," I said. "After that, my patience will run out."

Adjutant's muscles shifted the slightest bit, coiling as he readied for strife. He'd not hesitated in the slightest, I thought with affection.

"You are seeing shadows of your own making," Scribe said.

I breathed in, then spewed out a steam of smoke.

"Hakram," I said.

Over two hundred pounds of raw fighting orc struck with blinding quickness, leaping across the table and catching a surprised Scribe by the throat. She began screaming for help. I leaned back into my seat.

"We're under containment," I said. "Screaming won't help."

"They betrayed us?" Adjutant casually asked, slamming her against the wall and dragging her gasping form up the wall.

"She's lying," I said. "But whatever she's up to, Black isn't in on it."

"You are making a mistake," Scribe gasped. "There is no deceit, only your need to be right."

She didn't try to bring Black's name into this, for which I afforded her a sliver of respect.

"You had months with the Eyes in Procer," I said. "Oh, I'm sure that everything you told us about how it unfolded is correct in detail. That there were plants answering to Lady Ime among the mages, even that the order to start fires near possible munition locations came from the Tower. What I don't believe for a moment is that you couldn't have prevented it from happening. You had months with the Eyes in Procer, Scribe. What was your game?"

Black, I thought, would not question her story. It wouldn't even occur to him, I thought, the same way that it would not occur to me to wonder if Adjutant was lying to me. Too much of the bedrock of who we were depended on the certainty that they could be relied on, even when all else failed.

"Sometimes we fail, Catherine Foundling," Scribe gasped. "Sometimes it is not malice, or scheme, or treachery. Sometimes we just fail."

"I will torture you," I frankly said. "I won't like it, but the stakes here are too high for me to leave stones unturned out of squeamishness. I'll bleed you, and if that doesn't work I'll ask one of my people to peel your mind like an onion until the secrets come spilling out."

"We trained this in you," Scribe laughed. "I suppose it is our own doing, in the end. There is nothing to be found, Black Queen, save the unravelling of what you have wrought."

I blew out a long breath.

"Rip out an eye," I said.

It occurred to me a moment later that Hakram had only one hand left, made of bone, and that it was already holding up Scribe by the throat. I had begun to rise, to do the dirty work myself, when I saw Adjutant was moving. At the end of his stump folds of gleaming translucence were taking shape, almost spectral on appearance. They folded into themselves, methodically, until a broad clawed hand had come together. I glanced at his face, saw only the pleased baring of fangs, and the point of two claws touched above and beneath Scribe's eye. And then the hand dispersed.

"No," Adjutant said.

I blinked in surprise.

"Pain won't do anything to a woman like that, Catherine," Hakram said, calmly studying Scribe. "And neither will something live having her mind sliced open."

"We don't have anything else to threaten her with, Adjutant," I flatly said.

"We do," he disagreed. "Send for the Carrion Lord. Let him see this."

I began to tell him I'd sent Black away in the first place to spare him this when I noticed stillness. Scribe had gone utterly still, even through her aspect I could feel that. Hakram had found the pulse of her, somehow.

"She's not kept him ignorant out of disloyalty," Adjutant said. "Have you, Scribe?"

Silence.

"I suppose you would understand, wouldn't you?" Scribe rasped.

"You love him," Hakram Deadhand said, almost gently. "Not a call of the flesh or a tender feeling. The way a knife loves a steady hand, the way a sparrow loves flight. It can't be helped."

It felt wrong, to be here. Like I was intruding on a moment to which I alone of us could claim no kinship. Yet my mind turned heedless of the rest, cogs falling into place. The details had been there all along, hadn't they? The conversations I'd had with Scribe were few, but one had mattered more than the rest. When I'd tread the halls of the Tower for the first time, and she had whispered a dangerous secret in my ear. Ranger and I disagreed on many matters, Catherine, but there was one thing we always agreed on. Was it really that simple, that... I hesitated to say petty, but what else could it be called? No, not petty. Personal, and in a way that was worse.

"Malicia," I croaked out. "This wasn't about Procer or the Accords or anything else. You did all this so he would have no choice but to kill Malicia when he returns to the Wasteland."

copaceticcockroach

Vote Now!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Aston Whiteman

You certainly have a lot of free time.

Vote or don't..

RandomFan

Why did you feel this was a comment worth making? Genuine question that is not intended to be Rhetorical.

Liliet

It takes 1 minute to post a topwebfiction link. It takes 20 seconds to click it and vote.

I wonder how the fuck someone could have the time to read the chapter but not a spare minute and a half on top of that?

nipi

You take too long to copy-paste

Liliet

My laptop is very slow and often freezes up when scrolling / typing / posting, and copy-paste occasionally does not work from the first attempt period. So I was being generous -_-

Liliet

bless u

Tesla

I feel like

“I suppose you would understand, wouldn’t you?” Scribe rasped.

Is setting Hakram and Cat up for something

Liliet

For example? 😬

I just read it as a reflection on the similarities of the relationships which we already knew about but which are fun to occasionally point to and nod.

Alex

Damn, Scribe. Waited what, 40 years, 50? for her chance and took it.

Also, this is out of scope for this chapter but I’ve been wondering:

Do the red letters get sent to everyone who advances past certain points technologically, or only to places where the situation could spiral out of control? For instance if Praes didn’t have a reputation for being all “conquer Calernia” would the gnomes have let them build the farming machines and gunpowder?

NerfGlastigUaine

We don’t have enough information to even begin to guess. Only way to answer this if Erraticerrata deigns to respond.

konstantinvoncarstein

As far as we know, Red Letters are only send when technology advance too far. The fact that the nation is prone to invade its neighbors or not is irrelevant. Even if it is a peaceful nation now, it can change in the future. And anyway, what a peaceful nation has can be duplicate by another, more aggressive.

edrey

there is another point, if one nation invade and absorb a nation with two letters and then another letter is send. its the first or the third? lets say callow invade praes. then pickler creat something. that is something first or the third, or they just attack to save time? we need more information anyway

konstantinvoncarstein

I didn't think of that. Good point 😊

Oranckers

As I understand it, when a letter is received, the recipient doesn't just stop any further research, but actively undoes all the progress they made. Therefore, if one nation invaded another that had previously received a red letter, they wouldn't recover anything letter-worthy, and thus they would not be considered to have received any letters.

Liliet

Yeah that sounds right.

KageLupus

My impression is that the Gnomes don't care about who receives the letter or why, just that they don't have to send three warnings to the same place. Praes and Callow and Procer are almost definitely lumped into the same geographic bucket by the civilization that can wipe cities off of a map.

The whole point of the red letters seems to be that whoever gets it not only has to stop developing that tech, but also has to actively prevent others from doing so. The simplest way to do that is to tell everyone "This line of research is off limits." The Gnomes are paranoid enough to wipe out a city for doing research that might threaten them in the future. I doubt that they would also be forgiving enough to care that two people invented firearms independently and not count it as two strikes.

laguz24

What I wonder is, since the hard limitation would be three letters. At some point, any nation would receive three. Even if they were around 500 years apart, by sheer odds some nation will receive three letters even if they have no wish to tick off the gnomes. Does that mean that the gnomes come in anyway? The Atlantis of calernia died because they ignored them but praes listens.

Liliet

That's why I think they do keep track of who did what. Amadeus's worry about two Red Letters within a century was likely more about "will gnomes think we're not taking this seriously"... and even then, it was about a single century. I doubt they were the only red letters in Praes's entire history.

RoflCat

I think it's not that Scribe has been trying to find a chance to Malicia all those decades, but that Malicia was firmly an ally of Black that made Scribe stayed any such plan. Sure they might disagree on things, but if it ever came to Black vs anything else, Malicia would've picked Black.

But then 2nd Liesse happened, and Malicia chose something else for the first time.

To Scribe that was the turning point. Malicia could no longer be guaranteed to be ally of Black and she's going against his ideals.

So it's time to break Black away from her, and one such way is for Black himself to sever their ties, for real this time.

Alex

To clarify, I suppose I was thinking less along the lines of invading and more whether or not a nation has "graduated" from the duality of good vs. evil. For example, I wonder if the nation across the sea ruled by both hero and villain receives the same warnings.

konstantinvoncarstein

According to Amadeus, the Gnomes are blocking technological advancements to preserve their monopole and power. I don't think that a nation having transcended Good and Evil is more of a danger to them without technology.

James

Scribe's honesty is genuinely refreshing. Dont get me wrong, Cat's soothsayer skills are absolutely awesome and the thought processes behind them are nothing short of glorious, but its just that with everyone and their uncle being these master liars, schemers, and manipulators, one of the very few times Scribe and Cat talked, Scribe told her the truth. The difference in character is refreshing, not to mention the INSANE amount of forethought @EE

maxwell wearing

ah ha! I was waiting for that line to affect the story in some way. holy moly do you plan far ahead or what

jack

Which line?

If someone is being echoed, I must have missed it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I don't remember, but I'd guess it's the one about love.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Correction: it was the one about pettiness, as per this comment.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/09/09/chapter-73-discerning/comment-page-1/#comment-53946>

maxwell wearing

actually I meant the line from way back in the first book when Scribe said that she and ranger agreed that Black should rule Praes.

At the time it seemed significant, but then it never came to anything

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Oh. Well, I tried. `_ () _/`

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Hellspirit

That was satisfying to read.

NerfGlastigUaine

Cat's come so far. The whole Woe has. Being able to divine intentions like these, see the subtleties beneath the plans. Remember Conspiracy when we were all terrified of Scribe? I mean, I'd say we still kind of are, but Cat's definitely batting in the same league now.

Liliet

Mhm ♥ ♥ ♥

Liliet

It's funny how the reason Cat caught onto this was Scribe overacting, just a tiny little bit. It wasn't that the scheme itself was obvious, it was that Eudokia misstepped 😊

snowy

Perhaps all of this is part of Scribe's plan, and the "bad acting" a red herring.

Morgenstern

As in, she just doesn't want Black to ever know she made an honest mistake/miscalculation, afraid of losing his ... respect/"love"? (just curious pondering)

Morgenstern

... or maybe a real sense of her going behind Black's back in other ways... but to what purpose? hmm...

Zgggt

It wasn't a mistake. Hasenbach did everything to have Black murdered rather than captured. As far as Scribe is concerned, she needs to not exist. So, she was willing to turn a blind eye to Malicia taking a stab.

That being said, it was Cat to rescue Black from what Malicia should have known was a suicide mission (the big bad razing the countryside, looking to cause starvation amongst the poor peasants). So Malicia, similarly, must be removed. Luckily, it seems that both causes can be related.

I am unsure as to what the point of damaging Rozala that badly was. I doubt Procer takes well to incompetence on the scale of not knowing about a coup in her name. At best she looks like an airheaded puppet, at worst she looks like the worst pureblooded Praesi backstabber. Guess mom will go unavenged.

lennymaster

My guess is that Cat caught on because she no longer has a Name and she is vastly more experienced these days. Before Black and Scribe were simply one entity, one mind two bodies. The, in some ways, unflexible thinking of a Named could not have conceived of one acting in such a way without the approval of the other, even to the others benefit.

Liliet

I don't think Names have that kind of impact. Fae thinking is relatively inflexible, and Cat still managed to beat the Northern Crusade and improve on her diplomatic skills while fae.

Catherine identified this because of several factors:

- she is now vastly more experienced, yes, and has a lot of experience that even Black doesn't have (few people have been willing to do diplomacy with him over his entire career, I imagine);
- she specifically remarks that both her and Black have deliberately left blind spots in their analysis, people they don't analyze, because their analysis still gives false positives, and false positives with these people would be disproportionately damaging. Also because it's draining to analyze all the time and resource allocation is saner if they just blindly trust some people. Scribe is in this blind spot for Amadeus, but not for Catherine.

What amuses me is that the specific trigger of Catherine noticing the discrepancy was a discrepancy in acting. After noticing it and thinking about it she noticed more problems, but the trigger, the thing that jumped out at her, was simply her ability to read people and understand their decision making process on the fly.

hakureireimu

How does the epigraph relates to this chapter?

Cicero

"...greater game is yet afoot."

caoimhinh

They don't always relate, though this chapter is meaningful as it refers to one of Akua's conversations with Catherine about what to use when killing someone close to her, and what would be considered a break of decorum to do, as killing is a way of art in Praes Court and it sends a message when it is done in certain ways.

If there were true feelings, the knife is used. And that relates to both Catherine stabbing Amadeus at the end of Akua's Folly and Black's likely way to kill Alaya(Malicia), as it would be deeply personal.

Rey d`Tutto

And Scribe is handing Amadeus the knife.

Hitogami

Thanks for an epic chapter.
I love the plots and ploys of these people.

erebus42

Ooo, that is rather nasty. Yeah, if anything would force his hand this would probably be it. Solid play Scribe.

Adrian_V

And so Scribble turns into a magnificent bastard yandere!!! for some reason that makes me laugh

Liliet

"turns into"

Hoeru

Uff, Scribe, girl, you should have just told Cat. I bet 100% she would have lent a hand right then and there.

Nairne .01

I understand your sentiment here, but Cat has her own game and you have to remember she stabbed Black back then. Scribe is not going to just trust her just like that, especially while Black's fate is still undecided before the negotiations.

Liliet

No necessarily. Scribe and Catherine both have different kinds of loyalty to Black. Scribe is loyal to his person, whereas Catherine is loyal to his intentions, and both are willing to put one over the other. Scribe predicted it was not impossible there would be a conflict here – Catherine being against acting behind his back on principle, because she's interested in his judgement and trusts it in places where Scribe stops caring.

It's still entirely possible Catherine will out this scheme to Black just so his decision making wrt Malicia is clear and unimpeded.

Sparsebeard

From what I understand, everything she said was true, Malicia did launch the plot through Ime.

The only thing is that Eukodia might have been able to stop it, but didn't.

So whether or not Black knows that scribe deliberately botched her orders, it doesn't change anything at this point since, ultimately, Malicia is responsible for the consequences of her own actions (it might have been different if she had been thwarted but it's kind of a moot point now).

Insanenoodlyguy

If it had been stopped before it began, there would be more options. Black may have taken the same path, but in contrast to our last interlude, the woman who believes in him took away the choice.

hakureireimu

That's a great parallel.

Liliet

It is, in fact, currently unconfirmed.

>So was this really Malicia's ploy at all? It was true the Empress was only losing so much even if it became public she'd helped along the coup, considering the Grand Alliance had been founded in large part to bury her and the Accords would entail her removal regardless. This could be Malicia realizing that openly allying with Keter had burned too many bridges, and that the same alliances taking shape to drive back the Kingdom of the Dead might turn towards her if victorious. Sloppy work, by her standards, but then she had to be running out of tools to use. On the other hand, if I was frustrated in my efforts to establish alliances to the west she had to know I'd be headed east instead – and with a sword in hand. Shirt-sighted, yes, but honestly still a feasible mistake if Malicia was desperate enough. Which she had to be, with the Tribes having taken Foremen and the Dread Empire on the edge of rebellion from repeated defeats. Feasible, though, was why people thought the hooded figures with tattooed eyes on their skin were the true Eyes of the Empire instead of the chatty innkeepers. Feasible meant you stopped looking because you had the answer.

Catherine did not voice this part to Scribe, since it was only reasonable doubt and not solid foundation on which to accuse her.

Oh, and it's also important to everyone involved to understand just how much of a loose cannon Scribe is. Because she did, in fact, disobey Amadeus's order to pull everything back and disallow the exact thing that happened, and she fucked both Cordelia (making her deal with the coup) and Catherine (agreeing to a concession in her name) over in the process.

Fucking over allies for the sake of disputes over who should have the Tower is, in fact, the exact reason Praesi can't have nice things.

Cicero

Ah... that... makes sense. For the Scribe. In a twisted way.

And it actually... makes an odd sense as to why she wouldn't involve Catherine. Since she doesn't want to involve Cat is something that is in some sense a betrayal of Black. Even if her loyalty to Black compels her to do it.

Not because she cares for Cat's feelings, but because she doesn't want to hurt Black, and because she doesn't want to put any more strain on Cat's loyalty to Black.

Twisty twisty.

Liliet

Also, she probably thought Catherine could in fact be against giving Black what's essentially misinformation on principle. He's a clever storyweaver, and this kind of plot is exactly the kind of thing that could trip him up in subtleties – did Malicia really even turn on them, as Catherine has pondered?

Slider

...
Wow. I have no words. Like a certain other web serial said, my mind just drew some really complicated reasons as for why Scribe did what she did. And it only was something so simple yet so complex.

Soma

Glad to see that chekov's gun come down into play.

When Malicia comes up I'm still hopeful to see her story resolved fairly favorably for her. Malicia is kind of a sleeper, but, for the screen time she's had, out of our characters, she's among the top for having character. As a protagonist of another story, she's got a hell of a story.

I think it really rubbed me the wrong way, with how everyone took to calling Malicia stupid evil because she has fucked up and made mistakes, and how often and how eager some often seem for her death. Malicia has been eminently reasonable, given her position. People hate her for opposing Catherine, because everyone kinda hates when someone is antagonistic to our protagonist, for not solving the problems Catherine is solving, for not being Catherine.

Catherine's genius is defusing the conflicts with heroes and stories, and I can't quite condemn Malicia for not having that, and dealing with what she has, given the setting. Malicia correctly predicted failure was on the horizon and tried to prepare for it, and horror followed. But the setting is horrific. I don't think Malicia has earned more censure than Black, or maybe even Catherine. Yet.

Whatever happens, props to the writing. Whenever Malicia comes up it makes me think about how fascinating and complex her story about control is.

caoimhinh

I personally consider Malicia stupid evil as her complex about control led her to betray her closest friend in the world and fucked up her Empire and everything they had built together for the past 40 years.

In her paranoia of wanting to have power independent of her Black Knight (who had so far been the reason she was still alive and the one who put her on the throne in the first place), she fell into the trappings they had spent a lifetime avoiding.

She financed Akua and kept things secret to Black, and the moment she operated behind his back everything started going south.

They were effective and successful because they kept each other's worst impulses at bay, she broke that balance and they both suffered for it.

That said, her story and screentime are pretty great. Each moment dedicated to her shows an impressive character, even in her failures.

Soma

Yeah, but see that does irritate me. Calling Malicia stupid evil because she was paying attention to the situation, couldn't see a resolution, and began to make one without Black because she knew he would object isn't stupid. Wrong perhaps, but not stupid.

Black and Catherine are, by all accounts, insane. Archer directly states this to Catherine. A madman and his daughter apprenticed in his madness. Malicia would be stupid to not have had something in the works as a backup and blindly trust Black. Hell, you said it yourself, Black "had so far been the reason she was still alive and the one who put her on the throne in the first place". What kind of ruler, especially an autocratic ruler, could be comfortable with the amount of power Black had, and the lack of movement on any backup plan should the Grand Alliance solidify? Black's plan was essentially 'win'.

The tragedy of Black and Malicia's break is that it took two. Black asked for more trust, loyalty, and faith than you could expect even a hero to give, let alone your Empress. And Malicia even gave that for a time, before she broke faith. She broke faith only when the certainty of a war they could not handle began to crystallize. To call it 'stupid' that Malicia not be a tame beast of burden galls me.

Black had begun to invert the relationship so much that he was beginning to ask the Empress to defer to him at the cost of her safety and the strategic position, for what is by all accounts, his particular madness. We, the readers, know Black was right. But we have a bit of an advantage of perspective, don't we?

Javvies

Except that's not true.

The Grand Alliance only came into existence after Akua's Folly and the Doom of Liesse.

Prior to that, Hasenbach was having trouble getting the other nations to join the Grand Alliance. And even after, it still took her years to get them to agree.

In addition ... at that point, holding off Procer in a ground war would have been entirely practical, and there would have been limited risk of naval invasion, and they'd have had more forces available to assign to coastal protection duties. Because without the Doom of Liesse, Ashur might very well have not joined in. And even with Ashur, it is still a manageable risk.

Remember, at this point, no one in Praes has the slightest clue that the Stairway ritual exists, which means they can expect to concentrate their forces on defending the Vales, something entirely possible, and in the face of a Proceran invasion, they don't need to worry about a Callowan uprising.

The Vales, even if they were entirely unfortified, are a hugely favorable for the defense strategic choke point. And they're heavily fortified. And there'd be plenty of time to build additional lines of field fortifications before they were needed, if that became necessary.

—

Malicia is, at heart, a Classic Stupid Evil Villain of the Old School. She got as far as she did because following Black's plan put her in power, and gave her the Conquest. And since she was actively winning and making clear gains, she didn't break from his strategy.

However ... during all that time, let's not forget that she was secretly putting mind control hooks into senior Legion officers.

She took a slow route to breaking the High Lords ... but instead of permanently breaking them as an institutional power base (and institutional threat to the stability of Praes) the way Black wanted to, she broke the High Lords to her will, instead.

Remember, Malicia is the one who wrote "The Death of the Age of Wonders". Albeit early on.

Akua's Folly and Malicia's plan for it is nothing if not an example of Age of Wonders style villainous thought at its worst.

She became what she was fighting ... if she truly was ever anything different.

Soma

Yeah, gonna have to disagree. Pretty sure it was made explicitly clear Cordelia was solidifying the grand alliance before the Doom of Liesse. Book Two Epilogue she Cordelia has flipped Ashur. Your argument falls apart pretty hard there, considering this was way before the Doom.

"'Hasenbach has flipped Ashur,' Alaya finally said"

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/01/04/epilogue-2/>

Interpreting Cordelia as not an immediate threat to Praes without the Doom is insulting to both Cordelia and Malicia.

Javvies

Eh ... sure, eventually Hasenbach would have been able to get her Grand Alliance and the Crusade without the Doom. Maybe it was Levant, not Ashur that needed the Doom. But the Doom definitely helped.

But without the Doom, it takes longer, there's less urgency behind it, and the Alliance members are less invested in it, and would be less willing to soak the casualties and keep going.
And the Praesi/Callowan forces have more time to build up.

But whenever the Crusade gets kicked off, there's still a manageable, if difficult and bloody, victory condition attainable for Praes/Callow. They have one hell of a defensive choke point in the Vales, and any seaborne invasion force is going to be limited in what it can accomplish quickly. And there'd be plenty of forces available to go after any attempted beachhead.
Crusades are not guaranteed wins for Good. They can and have lost before.

Remember, there's a reason why the last five or so Crusades have all been aimed at Keter, not Praes. It's because one of the Terribilis's broke a couple Crusades (3rd and 4th, IIRC) so badly they decided it wasn't worth it anymore and decided to go after Keter and the Dead King instead.

—

I note that you've ignored my other points about Malicia's flaws.

Soma

Your other points are irrelevant given your incorrect starting premises on which they hinged. Your arguments hinged on the grand alliance only coming together due to the Doom. That is explicitly incorrect in the text.

Being able to paint something in a villainous light is not evidence of stupidity, and, therefore, is irrelevant.

Also, compare the statements:

"The Grand Alliance only came into existence after Akua's Folly and the Doom of Liesse."

and

"Eh ... sure, eventually Hasenbach would have been able to get her Grand Alliance and the Crusade without the Doom.

Maybe it was Levant, not Ashur that needed the Doom.
But the Doom definitely helped.

But without the Doom, it takes longer, there's less urgency behind it, and the Alliance members are less invested in it, and would be less willing to soak the casualties and keep going."

You've moved the goalposts on me quite a bit here. The second is even a total concession that Malicia is reacting to a serious real world threat, and is simply trying to downplay the magnitude of the threat.

Black himself says in the epilogue of book two "Dear Cordelia might get her crusade, after all." Unless you want to start accusing Black of stupid evil, I think we can both assume that the crusade is a fairly pressing threat.

Black also said in the Book Two epilogue "Levant, now Ashur. She's trying to forge an alliance against us," so she already had the grand alliance set up. She just lacked the pretext which Black also knew would come.

"The tone was light, the implications were not. If Hasenbach managed to forge her broader, continental version of the League of Free Cities she only had to wait until the pretext for a Tenth Crusade fell into her lap. Amadeus held no illusions about the fact that it would."

The threat was there. There was just unresolved league business and a pretext left. The pretext is easy. Praes's involvement in the League business was concluded with Captain's death.

Javvies

You are focusing on one part – the least important part – and ignoring everything else that is independent of that part.

The founding of the Grand Alliance is the least important part of the conversation about Malicia having fucked up and being a Stupid Evil Old School Classic Villain at heart.

You are ignoring the larger and more important part of the discussion – the one where Praes/Callow had a viable path to a worthwhile victory condition without the Doom, and the existence of the Doom makes that already existing path to victory more difficult than it needed to be.

And the part where a younger Malicia wrote "The Death of the Age of Wonders".

And the fact that the Doom is very much a prime example of Age of Wonders style Villainous thinking and subject to all the attendant pitfalls thereof.

And the part where Malicia didn't permanently break the High Lords as an institutional power base and threat to the stability of Praes, instead she broke them to her will for as long as she can hold them.

And the part about Malicia becoming what she fought – if she ever truly was different in the first place.

And the part about Malicia having been planting mind control hooks into senior Legion officers from the very beginning being indicative of her mindset.

Micke

IIRC Black and Malicia both agreed that a crusade was inevitable with Black's plan. Black believed resistance was quite possible if the stupid, hero-making evil super weapons of old were replaced with a Callow that hated Procer more. Malicia, however, believed that turning Callow against her in favour of a hero-making evil super weapon would scare any would be crusaders off.

Mental Mouse

>And the part about Malicia having been planting mind control hooks into senior Legion officers from the very beginning being indicative of her mindset.

Actually, that bit falls under "using the tools to hand". I mean, she's the Dread Empress, and that's one of her Aspects... specifically one titled Rule.

Ahad Mahmood

I specifically remember text aluuding that when Malicia stated her plan Cat was slightly swayed and even considered not destroying the resulting weapon. It is Black that said Hell No and destroyed. The fact that even Cat appeared to think the plan had some merits (although she was disgusted) is alot more telling than people realise.

Liliet

Catherine was actually pissed off as all hell at Black for destroying the weapon, and half of their conversation in Curtains was her being mad at him for that. She was in fact sold on the idea that it would prevent the war.

And Amadeus said that he might not have destroyed it if not for his recent encounter with Bard highlighting the specific threat that she presents as immediately relevant.

Shveiran

I don't think the rest is independant to this point, actually. Claiming Malicia has possibly always been an Old School Villain in light of extreme measure she took when she saw no other way out is shaky footing, after all. If we agree that a Crusade was coming, then all the "Stupid Evil" actions – which really started with her part in the Doom of Liesse, so far as I can see – then it is hard to say she was not in dire straits.

The idea that the Vale could have held is, honestly, debatable. With this many countries and Heroes, Praes was, if not bound to at least very likely to be blindsided eventually by something someone brought to the table.

Sure, it was the Stairway in this version and Malicia didn't know it was coming. I argue however she had to know that SOMETHING would be coming. Too many old dragons coming out to play for us to be certain mountains and walls would be a reliable solution.

I mean, Arcadia alone is a known possibility for small groups of powerful individuals to move unimpeded; Black and Warlock was using it before it got trending, and it is not beyond the Heroes to coerce or make a deal with a powerful Fae to land a dozen Heroes this side of Vale. Are you telling me they couldn't have found a way to throw a stick in the wheel? Heck, this is just one exemple that we know is true, but there is no telling what else could have come out – and certainly there wasn't then.

Have you seen what Ashur ended up being capable to bring down at Thalassyna? Maybe a different Choir would have come out to intervene if the struggle turned bloody enough.

Again, one doesn't have to think Malicia was right – whether logically or morally – to make that choice, but I really agree with Soma in finding that characterizing Malicia's approach as stupid or dumb or an old timer set in her way and unable to embrace change is not something I can agree on.

Malicia has been outmaneuvered by the forces in the world, who turned the young empress that penned the Death of the Age of Wonder and suggested striking economic deals with Good countries to tie their prosperity together into a woman that was certain usVSthem was the only game in town and that Praes couldn't stand alone against the world and hope to win.

If you back someone into a corner, they come out swinging. It's not recklessness to take a gamble when you believe you are doomed if nothing changes and that the results could fix your situation – and she was not stupid to believe what she did.

Just wrong. Allegedly.

lennymaster

One, the cracks between Black and her started showing way earlier (mindcontrolling his officers for example).

Second, corner or not, the outcome of magical WMDs is inevitable, all she ensured by backing that horse was trading a possible to maybe even probable defeat for a guaranteed one.

Thirdly, nobody has answered so far what her motivation for leaving the highborn structure in place was. Sure it is a devil you know, but that devil has consistently and inevitably fucked up time and time again. At some point you have to pull the plug or the devil you know will eat you, whether you know it or not.

It comes down to her wanting to rule Preas, and him wanting to turn Preas into something worthy of being ruled, much less being proud of. She disagreed with him on that front from day one, but never bothered to carry out that discussion and just let him work without bothering to tell him about the difference in their outlooks. He put ultimate faith in her, but she did not do the same for him. Thus the reason for Ranger and Scribe to distrust her, the two people both far enough away to be objective but close enough to see it.

Lastly, without the Doom Preas would not have been alone. She would have had Callow on her side, something that definitely was not the case afterwards, no matter whether Cat agreed or not. As to why she did agree? Because she was young, inexperienced and high on the power of her in that moment shaping Name. She just stated last chapter how dangerous that last one can be.

Javvies

Crusades are not auto wins for Good. They can and have been beaten back before.

Remember, one of the Terribilis's shut down consecutive Crusades hard enough that the last five? Crusades have all been aimed at Keter and the Dead King instead of Praes.

Based on what was known at the time, it would have been entirely doable to successfully defend and reach a point where the Crusade ends. Admittedly, casualties probably would have been heavy, but the exchange ratio would have been heavily in favor of Praes/Callow.

And remember, without the Doom, there will be far less commitment and dedication to push through despite the casualties on the part of individual Alliance members (and their troops).

The Doom is the difference between "no reason not to Crusade and kill Evil" and "we have to kill them now before they use it or build something like it again".

Oh, sure, some of the more Story aware Heroes likely would still be pretty dedicated to removing Callow from Villainous rule ... but that's not an insurmountable problem either.

Malicia spent the better part of 40 years trying to build bridges, or at least, rebuild the foundations to build bridges. The Doom wiped out all that effort.

Liliet

This.

Soma

I focus one part because the rest of your arguments are irrelevant. They are vague assertions, and contestable points in their own right. They are not support, they are the potential for supporting points, if you developed them. However, leaving them vague and not addressing potential criticism of many multiple points is an effective way to attempt to shift the work onto your fellow interlocutor. To complain that your partner in conversation is being unfair because they will not do your work for you is not an effective way to have a conversation, though it is an effective way to sway a credulous audience. Performance or reasoning, what is your purpose?

“And the part where Malicia didn’t permanently break the High Lords as an institutional power base and threat to the stability of Praes, instead she broke them to her will for as long as she can hold them.

And the part about Malicia becoming what she fought – if she ever truly was different in the first place.

And the part about Malicia having been planting mind control hooks into senior Legion officers from the very beginning being indicative of her mindset.”

The above is very similar to, if not exactly, what is referred to as a Gish gallop.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gish_gallop

>During a Gish gallop, a debater confronts an opponent with a rapid series of many specious arguments, half-truths, and misrepresentations in a short space of time, which makes it impossible for the opponent to refute all of them within the format of a formal debate. In practice, each point raised by the “Gish galloper” takes considerably more time to refute or fact-check than it did to state in the first place. The technique wastes an opponent’s time and may cast doubt on the opponent’s debating ability for an audience unfamiliar with the technique, especially if no independent fact-checking is involved or if the audience has limited knowledge of the topics.

I’m of the opinion that the many multiple arguments fall into the category of specious, and that they do so unintentionally.

I’d like to take the time here to say, though I’m being very critical, I’m not trying to insult you or cast aspersions on your character. It is possible to be irritated with a line of argument or reasoning, more so than the person you are arguing with, and that is the case here. I’ve made arguments like this before, and likely will again when I’m not paying attention.

The only real way I can deal with this style is to point out that the arguments you are making cannot hold water as they currently are, they require further development, and that it is not my responsibility to develop arguments against myself in a conversation.

Not only that, but we've significantly strayed from the original, and most potentially damning, example of Malicia's behaviour that could be argued to be stupid evil. That would be the Doom of Liesse. I've addressed such arguments because they are the most relevant; without a particularly damning incident it is very difficult to call Malicia 'stupid evil'.

surrealgoblin

This is my first comment here, so please forgive me if I'm not following proper etiquette in my response.

While I think that Malicia certainly made the wrong call in condoning Liesse, I don't think that or sparing the High Born were stupid evil decisions.

As I see it, the reason that her and Black were able to work together as closely as they did for as long as they did is because they shared the same goal of breaking the story of Praes's growth and destruction. That goal means that it is possible to both win the crusade (drive off the forces of Good, prevent them from taking Praes and turning into it into Crusader States again) and lose the war. If the crusade fails but destroys the farmland in Southern Callow such that Praes cannot become economically dependent on it, that is a loss. If the Crusade fails but the attempt drives the people of Callow deeper into a national identity built upon resisting Praes's invasions such that Callowan hero's are leading rebellions and aiding the 11th or 12th Crusades, that is also a loss. The continued spawning of Callowan heroes inevitably leads to Black and Malicia's defeat, and even a failed crusade maintains the story of a plucky kingdom trying to win back its independence from the Evil Empire. Whenever Malicia talks about victory and defeat, she isn't taking an excursively military view, but a political view, and a long term political view at that. Trying to create WMDs to give the tenth Crusade too high a cost was a terrible idea imo, but it does make sense.

She only put that plan into action once it was clear that Ashur was going to join. She had the next second citizen in her pocket so she only needed to keep the Crusade from beginning long enough for the current second citizen to die before the emerging alliance lost the majority of its navy and a good portion of its strength. Cat's existence shows that the Callowan narrative was starting to fragment, and the longer that could have happened before a showdown with the West, the better the chances of Callow siding with Praes over Procer. Perhaps most importantly, Malicia's decades long plan to destroy the High Born was within a couple of years of coming to fruition which would free the Legions to be able to adequately defend Callow without risking a revolution on the home front AND signal the Praesi shifting away from the narrative of Evil Conquerors who must lose in order to be able to continue conquering. Lesse was a gamble that tools from the age of wonders would be enough to slow down the crusade just enough. Even if it brought the entire continent down on Praes in the end, even if it lead to Praes losing the crusade and Malicia's head on a pike that would be worth it because she was within years of the only victory that matters; an economically and narratively interdependent Praes and Callow.

Which bring us to how sparing the High Lords was not stupid evil. I think we can all agree that militarily, it would have been possible for the Calamaties and the Legions to defeat the High Lords following/during the civil war. Maybe it would have been too costly, and the country would have been too weak to hold Callow and hold of its neighbors. Maybe Malicia would not have been able to afford keeping Procer at war long enough for the occupation to take root. But that is neither here nor there. Whatever bureaucrats or minor nobility the Tower put in charge of keeping order and maintaining sacrifices to prevent famine would just have seen themselves as newly minted High Lords even if not officially recognized. They would have just gone on sharpening their iron against the tower because everyone knows that even a lowborn can rise to the top if they are clever and ambitious enough. It would not have changed the narrative. That, again, is the only victory that matters. Its not enough to kill the High Lords, Malicia needs to kill the idea that the High Lords are needed. In order to do that she needed to keep Callow under her thumb (to remove the narrative need for the High Lords to bring glory and hope to a pretty hopeless and desperate people) and tie Praes economically to Callow and Callowan crops (to remove the economic and spiritual need for the High Lords as the people with the sorcerous knowledge of how to feed the people through ritual sacrifice.) At the same time that she removed the need for the High Lords, she slowly stripped them of their power and wealth, so that when their eventual defeat came, they would go with a whimper. Her end game is to make them appear so hollow, unneeded, unimportant and ineffective that no one would want to step into their shoes. Rooting them out of their seats of power may have killed them, but Praesi are used to their heroes (lower case) dying in a blaze of glory. That would only have strengthened the story that Praesi are elegant and powerful, and that strength and guile are all that you need to take what you wish.

I swear I am not a Malicia fangirl. She is actually one of my least favorite characters in the story. I think that she made a lot of mistakes, breaking Black's trust not the least of them. But I also think that the only thing at all close to stupid evil she has done is make a deal with Keter, and that she is one of the best examples of a truly evil villainess who ISN'T stupid evil that I have seen.

p.s. I am defining "stupid evil" as doing evil for its own sake, aka Kairos.

p.p.s. Is this too long?

Andrew Mitchell

Welcome! p.p.s. Is this too long?

No, not too long. 😊 Pretty much the same length as many other posts in this very long discussion many commenters have been involved in.

Soma

Not a Malica fan girl? HOW DARE YOU!

All joking aside, excellent comment. Definitely not too long.

I definitely agree with your point on the high lords. Your analysis of Malicia's possible usage of the Liesse weapon is particularly interesting.

I think I've always assumed Malicia trying to survive, but the idea that she went into that knowing she would die in order to use it as a stalling measure for a narrative victory is particularly interesting. That's really thought provoking and opens up a new way of thinking about Malicia, and what she might have been doing this entire time offscreen too.

Mental Mouse

Also from that epilogue:

> "That girl [Cordelia] is us," Alaya said, "forty years ago, looking at the stars from a different land."

And an ironic note:

> "One day," Alaya continued, "we will have foreign allies who are not complete imbeciles. By sheer dint of odds, it has to happen eventually."

Well, Cat will. As an aside, I'd missed or forgotten that Akua purposely went for the Name of Diabolist.

Liliet

The fact that they were calling Kairos Theodosian a complete imbecile just seals the amazing irony so much.

medailyfun

The Crusade was a sure thing before Liesse happened. In Cordelia's eyes it was just the tool Procer desperately needed, so they would definitely find the proper casus belli, like Free Cities involvement or something else. Bard would have provided something for sure.

NerfGlastigUaine

Yeah, both Black and Malicia were certain Crusade would happen. Their disagreement was on whether the Hellgate ritual would be a deterrent or the instrument of their ruin.

Liliet

>Prior to that, Hasenbach was having trouble getting the other nations to join the Grand Alliance. And even after, it still took her years to get them to agree.

What? Years? Where did you get years?

Akua's Folly took place in summer. Next spring Callow was getting invaded. It took all of half a year for the Crusade to mobilize. All Akua's Folly did was accelerate the timeline and give the Crusade better narrative base (which Amadeus successfully broke by breaking the fortress and the Empire).

>Because without the Doom of Liesse, Ashur might very well have not joined in.

No, Cordelia already had them at that point. They were licking their chops at the Praesi coast, Akua's Folly was barely more than an excuse, for them specifically.

>Remember, Malicia is the one who wrote "The Death of the Age of Wonders". Albeit early on.

Yeah =x

lennymaster

The Crusade was inevitable, the creation of the Doom however did accelerate it, dramatically so, as well as provide a Damocles sword hanging over the Callow Preas relationship, possible distracting factors on the outside, Free cities, rattling hordes, other Named springing up and possible problems in the Alliances political ties and last but not least in the shape of a gaint Hero bait at the same time.

The Doom was like a Villian standing in front of a Chasm next to an altar/ under a gaint chandelier/ next to their chained up monster/ the mincontroled/Stockholmed victim while threatening the beaten Heroes loved ones/ holding a speech about how they are not so different after all.

Liliet

Yes, but it's less obvious in-universe than you'd think. Much like how it was not obvious in-universe to Cordelia that letting her Princes and Princesses believe they would get spoils from Callow and then sending them through the northern passage would absolutely doom that expedition narratively.

Or how it was not obvious to Catherine.

Or how it would not even have been obvious to Black, had Bard not just killed Captain.

caoimhinh

It is beyond wrong and falls into stupid because it was something they had actively and consciously been avoiding for over 40 years and was the very reason they were successful. The very moment she started doing things on her own without her most loyal and capable partner she fell right back into the tendencies and impulses they had spent a lifetime avoiding.

It is not just a mistake, because she was fully aware of what she was doing, and knew better than to do it, yet she did it anyways because she was following her emotions instead of acting rationally.

“What kind of ruler, especially an autocratic ruler, could be comfortable with the amount of power Black had” doesn’t exactly applies, because Black was her power.

It wasn’t some random guy rising to power or a rival faction gaining influence, it was the very guy who put her in the throne having the power that kept her in the throne.

He had always been in that position, that was how they worked, he was the strategic military man and she was the schemer politician. Then she went and screwed things trying to get her hands on a weapon that only painted a gigantic target on her for the Heavens to destroy her.

The “she didn’t see any other option” is an excuse, Malicia said that to Catherine and Amadeus, but we saw things from her point of view and the real reason was she wanted her own power.

Besides, they had plenty of plans for all nations (Black even managed to adapt his plans in a single night to force an acceleration of them when he realized he was dying), had a strong base of power as shown by Catherine and Amadeus managing to fend off the Crusaders even without Akua’s hell weapon.

But in a world ruled by Narrative, the ruler of the Evil Empire started walking the steps of her predecessors and thus condemned her country (since a Named ruler’s story is her country’s story) to suffering a Story-fueled Crusade, a secession of the conquered provinces (which restored their status as an independent nation) the loss of her most trusted aides and an internal conflict of multiple rebellions boiling (Callow’s, the Goblins’ and the High Lords, plus maybe Black’s).

The moment she didn’t have Amadeus putting a brake to her impulses she went straight to Stupid Evil territory, and for a stupid emotional reason: an obsession with control and distrust of her freaking best friend in the world.

“Black asked for more trust, loyalty, and faith than you could expect even a hero to give, let alone your Empress.” He didn’t ask for it, he earned that over and over, and they needed that to survive and succeed. I have to put special emphasis on this, because it is extremely stupid to be distrustful of the guy that had spent most of his life keeping her alive.

Mental Mouse

? The “she didn’t see any other option” is an excuse, Malicia said that to Catherine and Amadeus, but we saw things from her point of view and the real reason was she wanted her own power.

With some reason. Consider Malicia as not Black’s ruler, but his former protege, who he’d raised up to a throne. But now Black had found another protege, even more in tune with his methods and goals... who he was likewise raising to a throne. And this, after they’d taken the trouble to conquer Callow and wipe out its prior royal line. Jealousy yes... but not completely unwarranted! Black was changing their original plan (Callow as a vassal state) and creating a competitor to Malicia. Hmm... just when did Cat first hear That Song?

caoimhinh

So you now argue jealousy-fueled paranoia?
Again, that’s still not a rational choice, it’s an emotional one, and jealousy is one of the most stupid emotions, it blinds you to reality and makes a person create their own fictional version of what’s happening instead of listening to reason.

“Black had found another protege, even more in tune with his methods and goals... who he was likewise raising to a throne”

See, that seems true, but is missing the point, Black was raising his replacement, as thinking himself immortal was hubris and he is too practical a man to not have a back-up plan.

Catherine was to be the person who would carry on his goals and further advance his plan towards the dream of making Praes something that didn’t depend on blood rituals and invasions to sate their bellies.

As a Callowan Hero-minded person wielding a Praesi Villain name, Catherine would be the final piece to cement the Praes-Callow unification. She would have been the overall Governor of Callow and de facto Queen just like Amadeus had been the de facto King, but she would also be the new protector of Malicia as the next Black Knight, she would have been the one to consolidate the union between the two countries and make Callowans start seeing themselves as Praesi too, and having the Name of Black Knight would tie Catherine to Praes effectively, given the cultural significance and weight of that story, which Malicia knew.

Are you willingly ignoring how many times Amadeus made his line-that-can-not-be-crossed clear? He always told Catherine that Malicia must rule, at every single chance he got.

Although it is true that an outside observer could have seen things in the light of "a rebel is in the making, gathering influence", Malicia was not really that much of an outsider to not know the true nature of things, because Black kept her updated with both reports and personal conversations, and Malicia also had lots of spies observing Catherine. She knew what Amadeus' plans were, yet she focused on how she was going to lose direct control of Callow, when he was carrying out the plan of making a better nation for her to rule and live on, she narrow-mindedly focused on the possibility of how she was going to rule a smaller nation, willfully discarding everything else Amadeus said to her, and a lifetime of successes on his plans, instead she acted behind his back and screwed it for everyone.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, that's what Amadeus was thinking. But he was spending much of his time off in Callow, or otherwise gallivanting around, while Malicia was back in the Tower marinating in Praesi suspicion, scheming, and skullduggery... not to mention stories. Remember, Malicia was never as good at dodging stories as Black was, and the scenario I just described is a classic story indeed. Even while Cat and Black were doing something entirely different, I don't find it too implausible that Malicia might have been caught up in it.

Soma

I'd like to address something in your arguments that is increasingly seen out in the wild around the world. You've begun to speak about emotions and rationality, and somewhat have begun to treat them as characteristics rather than processes. This is important because processes can wildly vary given the context they operate in. What are though of as Characteristics much less so.

Rationality is a process of using logic on a set of assumptions and so then coming up with a conclusion, examining the conclusion, and updating and examining your set of assumptions.

Emotion is actually surprisingly similar, but less fine grained. Emotion often gives you some very generic conclusion very quickly, but has a larger margin of error. Emotion is worthwhile in and of itself, but not always the best tool for a job. One way to understand emotion and rationality might be to look at them like one would a heuristic and an algorithm. Emotion even has value beyond the immediately practical, as often emerges from complex systems.

Emotion and rationality are processes that often do effect each other. They can be complimentary or discordant, but one is not inherently better than the other. This is because they do different things, even though they have some overlap at times.

Because emotion is easily denigrated, partly because modern society fetishises reason and rationality (often misunderstanding those things in doing so), accusations of emotionality over reason are often used to discredit a person. It is very hard to prove something about one's subjective experience, and, therefore, hard to refute the accusation. The lack of objective refutation is something many credulous audiences will take for proof.

Malicia is working with a different set of assumptions than you are. You trust Black completely. Malicia doesn't. She trusts him a lot, she even loves him, as he does her, but she doesn't trust him completely. She has good reason to believe there are limits on how much she should trust Black.

Black is the type of person that he was written as having the following little bit in the story "If he'd been the kind of man to pray, he would have prayed then. But he was not, so instead the gears began to turn and he wondered how many of the people he loved he would have to kill, before it was all over."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/20/villainous-interlude-cadenza/>

Malicia is wise to the fact the second she is interpreted as a liability to Black's goals she is in mortal danger. Black is not a Hero. He is a villain that will murder his loved ones the second they become obstacles to his goals. We may like him, but he is a villain. You are arguing for complete loyalty to someone who uses loyalty as a tool and will discard it the second it is an ineffective tool to achieve his goals. If you work from the starting assumptions Malicia is likely to have, complete loyalty is probably irrational.

Lets look at a possible set of assumptions for Malicia:

Black is brilliant. Black is fallible. Black could reasonably make an attempt on my life. Most of our interests align. Not all of our interests align. Some are in opposition. It is possible our interests could increasingly diverge. Black is inclined to kill people in opposition to him, and will attempt to kill people who are obstacles who he feels can't be practically removed any other way. Given the presence of outside actors, I cannot completely whether I am a liability or not. I want to live.

Should Malicia trust black completely? From this set of assumptions, no. Is this the exact set of assumptions she is working from? Probably not. However, I think that it should be pretty clear it is possible Malicia is working from a reasonable set of assumptions where she should not trust Black completely. It is not clear she is operating purely on emotion or divorced from reason.

It is easy to make an accusation that someone's mind and ability to reason is being clouded by emotion, and often such an accusation is rhetorically persuasive. That does not mean it is a well reasoned argument that someone is being emotional, or is not being rational. Rationality interacts with sets of assumptions which often wildly differ, and so results often wildly differ.

caoimhinh

This here, your answer and the way it was expressed? This is what I love about debates, people having contrary positions and still defend them with great sense and solid argumentation, it's awesome.

Andrew Mitchell

♥

caoimhinh

About the processes of emotion and rationality, I don't completely agree. I agree that emotional decisions are also processes, but I think the difference lies in that they are based on different sets of variables in their iterations rather than using different assumptions. (Or perhaps I misunderstood you and we are saying the same but on different terms?)

For example, the decision of whether to punch someone on the face after they insult you or hit you.

The logical process will consider the action in terms of the consequence utility, benefits and harms; while the emotional process will consider the action in terms of venting off the frustration or anger felt at the moment, the emotional process will be in terms of like and dislike, feel good or feel bad, even ethics and morals.

Also, rational processes tend to look on the long term, while an emotional one would look at the short term.

More processes than one of each type are run in parallel and sometimes one is integrated into the other

Both types of processes are run side by side in a person's mind and one of them eventually wins (sometimes the processes are in agreement), which of the processes was in control at the moment determines the nature of the action taken.

It's not even a matter of which action was taken, but rather what was taken into consideration, what defines if it was a rational decision or an emotional decision.

Got angry but was scared of being hit again so didn't strike back? Emotional response.

Got angry and was scared of being hit again, but there are people watching and if you don't earn respect they will mock you, so you strike back? Emotional response, but different action.

Case in point: Malicia knows on a conscious level that Amadeus would not betray her, yet she has a pathological need for control, (Tikoloshe even stated that Malicia "craves control the way a starving man craves a meal") so despite her rational processes telling her that Black was never plotting to seize the Tower from her, her emotional processes prompt her to take measures "just in case". She has at least twice admitted that she knows Amadeus is not disloyal, and then she follows with the words and yet "there can be only one sitting in the throne of the Tower".

What her rational mind tells her is an unnecessary and even potentially harmful action, her emotional part makes it so that she can't be at ease unless she takes that course of action.

Considering Malicia's motivations, statements, and her disregard of both the history and lessons learned during the past decades, and her disregard of the potential consequences in favor of personal satisfaction; her course of action can only be called emotional.

Financing Akua's weapon behind Black's back was not something done in cold logic and rational thoughts, it was something done to satisfy an emotional need.

Soma

A value for a variable is, more or less, an assumption. Saying something is an assumption is just saying that thing is taken for given at the start of the process. A set of assumptions is the set of information you perform a process on. Different processes can use either the same or different sets of assumptions. I don't think we have a disagreement there, I might just have worded something clunkily.

I think where we disagree is somewhere around how Amadeus would act and Malicia's knowledge of that.

You said, "Malicia knows on a conscious level that Amadeus would not betray her," and I don't agree with this. I think Black would definitely betray her should it get him what he wants. I think Black absolutely would kill her if she was an obstacle and killing her was a convenient way to remove her as an obstacle. I think Malicia is also aware of this. I think Malicia is reasoning from a place where the prior is an assumption, in addition to an assumption that she cannot completely control whether she is an obstacle to Amadeus given the presence of actors outside of their relationship who have, would, and will, attempt to further estrange the two.

You say her distrust of Amadeus is pathological, and I'm coming from a place where not trusting Amadeus to always look out for one's well being (especially should his interest ever possibly run counter to yours) is reasonable, rational, and likely necessary for one's survival.

caoimhinh

Malicia has admitted in her thoughts that she knows Amadeus was not planning to seize the Tower from her in the Epilogue of Book 3.

I'm sure she also did in at least another occasion, but right now I don't remember in which chapter that happened.

Fun and ironic fact: at the beginning of Epilogue 3, Malicia is actually mad because she considers she had put blind trust in Amadeus and he betrayed her expectations when he Destroyed the weapon.

Shveiran

You seem to be among those that give great meaning to Malicia having agents in the Legions (you know, her Legions; the Legions of the country she leads); personally, I don't see what's the matter. It's not like she was planning to have Amadeus killed or anything. Is it that strange for a ruler to not want all her power base to be dependant on the loyalty AND survival of one of her allies – that also happens to tussle with Heroes as a job description? I mean, yeah, maybe it's not NICE, but... I really can't fault her for it.

The divide between her and Amadeus was not born JUST out of a control freak syndrome. Sure, Alaya had an hard time feeling in another's power – which a) given her history is pretty damn understandable and b) she kept in check for decades still.

WHat pushed her to act behind Amadeus back was the certainty (well-founded, incidentally) that Amadeus could not contemplate a different resolution to the conflict than kicking in the Crusaders' teeth until they stop coming. She simply believed that his solution would not have worked, and so chose to make a different gamble.

Yes, perhaps she was wrong. So?

This doesn't make her an out of balance control freak. Just someone that knows the house is burning down, unwilling to bet her life on your attempts to kick down the door and oping instead to try her luck jumping the window.

lennymaster

"She simply believed that his solution would not have worked, and so chose to make a different gamble."

You mean gambling on the kind of weapon that is the litteral origin story of a Hero? Designed to counter/destroy EXACTLY that weapon? Just imagine it: the humble smiths son out of town that faithful day when it was destroyed, killing everyone he loved?

Does anything, ANYTHING about the Doom not scream angelic intervention, plucky, unlikely Heroes literally swarming you to death and prophecies announcing a destined one to defeat you.

A desperate cornered animal, chewing its own paw of to escape the trap is one thing, seeing a tiger come for you and cutting your own leg off to distract it momentarily while you hop away is an entirely different prospect altogether.

Shveiran

The idea that this was narrative suicide has been brought up several times by you and others; and I personally do believe that to be a very reasonable evaluation of her tactics.

Where I disagree with you, is when we move from “made a narrative faux pass” to “that was a dumb mistake”.

Yes, narrative is an actual force in this universe. But how many characters are aware of that enough that they balance each and every action they take in terms of story shapes? I can name a few easily, but it is a huge leap to go from there to the assumption that only idiots don’t think like that.

Cat thinks like that, and Black, certainly. Pilgrim, Death King, the Wandering Bard obviously. Hanno somewhat. I am probably missing a few, but it isn’t a long list, is it?

Even among the Calamities, people that kept villaining as long as Alaya did, how many are narrative-aware? Was Sabah? Was Warlock? The latter was aware enough he knew about Patterns of Three, but what else did he ever say to suggest he was considering this kind of details?

Black spent his life dealing with stories, because he spent most of his time dealing with the settling of Callow and killing Villains or Heroes. Malicia, on the other hand, spent it handling economics and trade, scheming and plotting with nobles, handling spies, and playing chess with foreign leaders over the globe. She never dealt in stories. Sure, that’s how the world works. It’s clear as day to us READERS, but you barely need two hands to count the people on Calernia that share that knowledge. Malicia knows it in theory, but has never practiced that knowledge because she was using a different set of skills.

That’s not being a moron, that’s having a blind spot.

caoimhinh

Wekesa likely knew a lot about Narrative, I’m not completely sure if he also thought in terms of stories, but he at least was shown to know about how it affects Named. I seem to recall he had made some research about it, and after a lifetime fighting and killing other Named, he must have acquired quite a bit of insight on the subject.

It's shown in how he knew that Black taking a Squire was signing a death sentence, and how he stated that when Catherine stopped being the Squire then Amadeus was revitalized. He also was shown musing about the evolution of Named abilities during his fight with the Hedge Wizard.

Whether Malicia is as aware of Narrative Force as Amadeus is debatable, but she should know about it to some level, and not only because of spending a lifetime working with Amadeus, who never makes a move without taking that in consideration.

At the very least, Malicia showed she had knowledge of Narrative when she was justifying her financing of Akua's weapon to Amadeus and Catherine, she explicitly said that the Heavens were going to keep going at them until they died, so the best way to survive that unwinnable fight was to never fight at all. Her reasoning to why she would not be trapped in the Story of an Old School Evil Villain was that she wasn't directly involved in the manufacturing of the weapon, and she was not planning to use it at all, only have it as a deterrent, hoping that the fear of her use of the weapon would make everyone not mess with Praes.

(That is, of course, wishful thinking. As simply having the weapon already made her a target, and even after the destruction of the weapon they remained a target for the Crusade. Since both for Narrative and realistically, other countries would have to deal with a Praes that had such a weapon, it needed to be gone and they would not stop until the weapon was destroyed as it posed a danger too big to be ignored but not enough to actually make them submit. Some of them would take it as a cultural and religious mandate to destroy it, and she knew it. It was a doomed enterprise. And the fact she willfully ignored this after her decades of political experience with other nations shows that she was acting on her emotions rather than thinking rationally.)

So to my understanding, she was as aware as Black about the risks that Akua's Doom Weapon carried and what it signified Narratively, but disagreed with him on whether she could avoid the death trap. Malicia was willing to take that risk, so she took measures to possess that weapon, Amadeus was not willing to take that risk, so he Destroyed it.

And her reason for taking that risk was because she pathologically needs to have control, common sense be damned.

Liliet

>It is not just a mistake, because she was fully aware of what she was doing, and knew better than to do it, yet she did it anyways because she was following her emotions instead of acting rationally.

She did not, in fact, know better. She had a coherent plan which she believed would work, and yes, her estimation of factors did get impacted by emotional reasoning, but that does not make her either "stupid" or "evil", only at her limit of incompetence.

Liliet

Yeah.

It's a funny thing, when Black took an apprentice that he was utterly unsurprised to learn was hearing the Tower climbing song.

It very much took two to tango, here.

Their relationship is incredible and that it took as much as it did to strain it is incredible.

Liliet

>I personally consider Malicia stupid evil as her complex about control led her to betray her closest friend in the world and fucked up her Empire and everything they had built together for the past 40 years.

>In her paranoia of wanting to have power independent of her Black Knight (who had so far been the reason she was still alive and the one who put her on the throne in the first place), she fell into the trappings they had spent a lifetime avoiding.

Not quite.

We've seen her POV, and we've seen her dismiss thoughts about Amadeus possibly betraying her out of hand, with 'okay that's where i draw the line on the paranoia'.

And we've seen this:

>Guilt never came. She would not apologize for taking measures preventing him from throwing away his life in a hopeless war, however slighted he felt by the truth that he had become a foe to his own survival. That was on his own head. Not even love would make her neck if she was in the right.

She is not exactly the only one of Amadeus's friends thinking he had a death wish, and they were not exactly proven wrong about it.

Oh, she underestimated his skill and understanding, failed to trust in his judgement where she factually should have. But how would she know to trust it when he'd been going "you are smarter than me and you know better" for 40 years? She felt responsible for everything, and she did not feel like she could take a blind leap of faith on his ability when he was blatantly leading the story up to his own death (WHICH HE FACTUALLY WAS, IN TAKING A SQUIRE).

She underestimated him and misjudged him, and her blind spot of having spent most of her lifetime at court and having come to think of it as representative of the entire Empire smacked her hard on this.

>This, this is why you cannot rule. Because you're not interested in ruling Praes, only in securing a war camp for your pissing match with the Heavens. You cannot butcher your way into having a different homeland, Black. It's a pretty plan you laid out. But you are not the only living man in Praes, and so it fails. Because the Empire is not an instrument, it is a nation and that nation wants things. It will not docilely wait until your point is made.

(she's wrong, the vast majority is with him on this)
(this is the mistake and the misjudgement)

Malicia and Black both were weaving something incredibly complex, and both reached the limit of their incompetence. Amadeus failed to explain to her what he was doing and all the nuances he was taking into account, she failed to understand it on her own.

What happened to the two of them was a fucking tragedy, not.. her being undeserving.

lennymaster

No she failed by putting everything on a absolutely, undeniably doomed superweapon. I would bet Bard was somehow involved in this, but it does not change the fact that she supported a plan ending in a magical WMD. In a world that litteraly hands mindlessly grieving teenagers weapons that can cut steel like a hot knife cuts butter and equips them supernatural powers as well as a year long montage compressed into a few months realworldtime to hone their fighting skill.

Liliet

Fun fact! Multiple descriptions of the situation can be true at the same time. Your “no” does not actually proceed to contradict my explanation.

When analyzing characters’ decision making in PGTE, it’s important that we the audience have several important advantages over them:

- we accept easily that things work on story logic, because to us it is a story and therefore the idea intuitively makes sense. Furthermore, a lot of the fandom are people who hang out on tvtropes / like other meta fiction, and have the same kind of nuanced understanding of what story logic is as medical doctors have of anatomy;
- we are detached from the immediate emotionality of the situations, and often only understand the characters’ emotions through analysis. So what the situation is in a more global structural sense is primary to us, and what it feels like from the inside is secondary and does not skew the position. Erratic’s writing style particularly contributes to this because he tends to be much more clear about what is actually happening than what the characters feel on the topic (as opposed to e.g. ward by wildbow, for example);
- we can, on a certain level, trust the narration and the writer’s intent. We have Word of God statements explaining what erratic is trying to do; we can freely assume none of the characters are a coma patient whose dying dream this will turn out to be at the end. So when things are implied in the narrative by common convention of how narrative works, we will often take it for granted that they are true in a way that is entirely non-obvious in-universe. It’s very typical in fandom to assume that Catherine is right about everything, simply because she is the protagonist and we have the meta knowledge that that makes her much more likely to be right than wrong, on most occasions. The same applies to Amadeus, her teacher – because he was the audience’s source on the basic foundation of how the world works, we take it as obvious that he’s right about it – and it’s entirely non-obvious to other characters in-universe, because they learned about how things work from sources other than his explanations (notably, lived experience). Few adults genuinely assume that That One Person they’ve met has unique insight on how the universe works that should a priori be assumed right even if it seems counterintuitive – but we can assume that in fiction just by how the writer positions them in the narrative, and that colors our perception;

– HINDSIGHT BIAS. When reading Book 3 for the first time, did you, personally, hold the position that the superweapon plan (YOU KNOW, THE ONE THAT CATHERINE AT THE TIME WAS ONBOARD WITH AND WAS MAD AT BLACK FOR RUINING) was stupid? Maybe you did, which would make you smarter than me. I didn't like it, but I didn't think it was doomed. It was not, in fact, obvious until it was explained, and even then the tipping point for even Amadeus, the main ideologue of the "politics must follow story fu" movement, was that Bard exists and actively opposes them.

No, it was not obvious in-universe.

Soma

I really appreciate you making this clearer than I think I was able to.

The understanding that people in the guide are working with different sets of information is really important. Readers having all the information, or, at least, way more than any single character, really changes the readers experience from what any of the characters would experience. You put this really well.

Liliet

I really, really like how well Guide works the "different people have both different information about what's going on and different priors from their perspective/experience" point.

caoimhinh

That's still an emotional decision, not made with a clear mind. She knows perfectly well that Akua's weapon is something from the Old School Evil Villains, yet she engineered its creation and financed Akua, when she should know what such story signified. She accused Black of trying to be cleverer than Fate, but it's actually she who is trying that; Malicia's reasoning for thinking she would be safe is that she assumes that since she didn't make the weapon or even used it, she will not be trapped by the Story nor bound by it, as she would simply be the person who has the weapon. Which is stupid and wishful thinking, because she is still a Villain, the ruler of the Evil Empire, and simply having that weapon makes her a target for the Narrative Force.

And that's still not the reason why she did it, but rather the reason she felt reassured of her safety in doing it. The reason behind it is still her desire for control. Everything we have seen about Malicia's actions behind Black's back effectively shows us that those were not based on logic and reason, but rather emotional decisions and actions taken due to personal issues.

What you quoted was Malicia finding justifications for her actions after the fact. That was after Black had Destroyed Akua's weapon. We saw Malicia's motivations much earlier in the story.

Remember what you told me a few days ago, about people's mind working in a way that makes them convince themselves of being in the right? That's Malicia right there.

That fragment you quoted is not an omniscient narrator stating facts, is Alaya going "I'm right about this, I did this for love, totally not out of paranoia or fear of losing control. Yeah, I did this to save him. It was for all of us, not me alone, yeah let's go with that. I won't apologize, I am right."

That Epilogue is funny because almost everything that Malicia was thinking was actually wrong and what she said was contextually inaccurate.

That chapter doesn't show us a cold and cunning Empress, but rather the emotional person Alaya really is under her mask, her whole section of the chapter is filled with her ups and downs on emotions, and her whole conversation with Amadeus shows how she was attempting to manipulate and wound him emotionally (a typical reaction on someone who is in turn emotionally wounded, like when someone is sad or angry and says offensive things to others to hurt them, so they would also be sad or angry), she even spoke things against Wekesa and Scribe in hopes to make Amadeus lower his trust in others' support so he would not turn further away from her (text says: What she need break to salvage even shards of what they had once been). While Amadeus spent the whole conversation trying to be amenable, approachable and even apologized when his words hurt her.

He was the reasonable person in that conversation, even backed off when she goaded him into venting off his frustrations, all the while Alaya was just displaying her insecurities and emotional wounds for the readers.

Consider this:

At the very start of the chapter she thinks "He would not speak to her until he was no longer in a vulnerable position. Alaya had known this because she knew the man, how his mind functioned. Amadeus did not treat from a position of weakness." And then right afterward she went to talk to him as Malicia the Dread Empress yet he came to see her as Amadeus of the Green Stretch and that drew blood.

He was facing her as a person and a friend (even showing that he was wounded), while she was posing as a ruler talking to a vassal, and the emotional part of her recoiled due to this, she knew Amadeus was the one on the right and it was her who had broken their trust, but her pride didn't let her admit it and instead proceeded to try to manipulate him, while he talked to her with honesty.

That conversation ended with Amadeus invigorated and smiling after being honest with her, and facing the new challenges ahead of him, looking at the uncertain future with wonder. While Malicia, after the carousel of emotions that was that conversation for her, was left alone with her worries and regrets, Alaya went still and felt something like grief but deeper than the word could ever mean taking hold of her.

The Hierarch saw many things, close and far away. In a cold room of black stone, he watched the most beautiful woman he'd ever glimpsed wipe away a tear and clench her teeth. By the crackling hearth of an inn he saw a knight and a champion clasp arms with older heroes, whispering of Heaven's Mandate. He saw a young girl on an ill-fitting throne, lost but unwilling to retreat. He saw the fields of a Hell tilled and strewn with villages, its people never having known a blue sky. He saw knives bared beneath the earth, north and south, skins of black and green ghosting through tunnels. He saw a green-eyed man grinning in the face of havoc, alone with well-worn maps.

Liliet

Everything you've said is accurate. I fail to see, however, how any of it makes her 'stupid evil'. Is having emotions and making decisions influenced by them stupid or evil now? How would a non-stupid non-evil person act in her situation that would be different?

caoimhinh

Having emotions don't make her evil nor stupid. That's not what I am saying, nor what anyone else has said. However, her dark emotions such as insecurities, arrogance and fear of losing control, drove her to take the choice of financing Akua's Doom Weapon in hopes of appropriating it.

And that's the stupid Old Evil kind of weapon, surely we can all agree on this. That weapon is undeniably of the Old School Villains Breed: a flying fortress of doom that makes portals to Hell.

So having emotions doesn't make her evil nor stupid, but the choice she took driven by those emotions was the stupid evil path.

Liliet

> I personally consider Malicia stupid evil as her complex about control led her to betray her closest friend in the world and fucked up her Empire and everything they had built together for the past 40 years.

"Did a Stupid Evil thing once" != "is Stupid Evil". People don't work in clear categories like that.

caoimhinh

Fair enough.

Though she has displayed Old School Villany tendencies both in the past and in the present. As she defends the traditions of Praes and even idolizes the glories of the Tyrants of old (she simply believes herself to be above them), contrary to how Amadeus actively rejects all those Old School Villains stood for.

The things we have seen her done when Amadeus was not there to put her on check, lean pretty heavily to the Old School side (Akua's weapon, massive mind control of soldiers, deals with the Dead King)

Some Smartass

I think Malicia's story became a tragedy when she decided to do insane things like enable Akua and ally with the Dead King. Shit like that is the leading cause of villain doom, and she knew that going in.

I suppose I can spare some hope that she'll have all the control she wants over her death. I do like her, after all.

Liliet

Yeah.

She has fucked up. She has fucked up badly. But not necessarily irrecoverably.

Shveiran

This, I disagree with. I think Malicia's hole was dug led by the system more than her own flaws... but these are not decisions you can come back from.

lennymaster

I do not agree on the reasons or nature of her fucking up, I do however agree on the degree and the consequences thereof.

Javvies

Huh.

Yeah, this makes sense – Scribe could have stopped this way earlier than she did, but chose not to in order to make it untenable to leave Malicia in power. And Scribe would also know that the viable candidates to replace Malicia are basically Amadeus and Cat ... and neither one of them have been particularly eager to take the Tower for themselves. And Cat is probably going to be pretty busy between Callow, the drow, Cardinal, and the Accords, which means Amadeus would be more likely to accept the burden (in his mind) of dealing with reforming Praes.

Liliet

It's even possible that Malicia did not pull the trigger at all, and Scribe herself did from the shadows. As Catherine has remarked, having her alliance in the west fail would see her coming east sword in hand. Malicia likely understands that she does not want to antagonize Catherine at this point, and particularly not prevent her from spending her current strength on helping rescue Procer.

KageLupus

I am pretty sure that Malicia did originally order Scribe to start destabilizing Procer. Not only because it all makes sense, especially the points about the Accords being an existential threat to Malicia, but because the best lies are ones that stick closest to the truth. If Scribe did this whole thing on her own it would eventually come out in the open. Can you really imagine Black not trying to talk to Malicia before killing her? What happens when that conversation turns practical and Malicia says "What do you mean, I ordered Scribe to burn down Procer?"

Like Cat said, the details all have to be correct because anything less than that would be obvious. It is the one small, subtle betrayal that snuck in that Cat was trying to figure out. Scribe being incompetent is too out of character, when up till now she has been supremely capable.

caoimhinh

It was also a chance to mount a rescue operation for Amadeus.

Destabilize Procer, make the political factions be at each other's throats and the House of Light losing credibility, the ensuing chaos would potentially delay the public execution of Black, and in the worst-case scenario they would still pay a harsh price for killing him.

We must keep in mind that this plan was set in motion months ago when Amadeus was captured (he was only rescued by Catherine a few days ago), and the two women behind it (Alaya and Eudokia) were desperate. They found a common ground: they would either rescue Amadeus or set Procer on fire as a funeral pyre for him.

On that note, it would be interesting to see a Malicia Interlude and read her POV about Black being rescued. It would also give us an update on what's happening in Praes with the Goblins and the High Lords.

Liliet

I think it's possible that, more subtly, Malicia did not receive full information on what Black was doing.

Though you're broadly right.

Pontomas

God I love this work of text.

caoimhinh

"How mundane. How petty. I expected better of you, Intercessor. This is... beneath us."

-The Dead King, Interlude: Reckoning

"Was it really that simple, that... I hesitated to say petty, but what else could it be called? No, not petty. Personal, and in a way that was worse."

-Catherine, Chapter 73: Discerning

Ok, this resonance has me grinning.

Liliet

The contrast is great. Neshamah and Catherine both see it as petty, but then Neshamah stops there, while Catherine takes a step further and really understands.

Seer of Mind 😊

Decius

"To use any for the improper purpose is the mark of inferior breeding, save if greater game is yet afoot."

Wait, it isn't considered substandard to not have a greater game afoot?

Javvies

Not everything is part of a greater game.
That makes it much harder to work out what is relevant to one's greater game and what isn't.

Besides ... having a code around killing people makes it easier to reduce the number of overreactions.

And when said overreactions involves the kinds of things the High Lords (and Praesi leadership/Named) have traditionally gotten up to ... maintaining a careful detente and avoiding overreactions is in everybody's best interests.

Which, of course, means that the best way to hide your greater game is to follow the norms, not violate them by using the wrong means of murder.

konstantinvoncarstein

Akua have said (i think in book 1) that she already killed people to have a good seat at the theatre. She may be boasting to infuriate Catherine, but petty bickering seems a trademark of most nobilities in Calernia, including the Praesi one 😊

sengachi

Damn. Scribe plays the looooong game.

superkeaton

Aw, Scribe, that's adorable. Hakram remains the top batman for his chosen villain, though. Full props. Also, Cat, when Akua calls you dear heart in code, at least try to look like you aren't used to it.

JJR

I do know what that word means in actuality, but I still can't help but picture an Adam West Harkham.

Mental Mouse

LOL! Though he'd be more like that big-ass villain (Bane?).

Anyway, when we weren't looking Hakram got even more badass... one hand of undead bone, the other of pure shadow-energy!

superkeaton

"Holy hands, Hakman, you've lost yours!"

"Worry not, young Robber. You see, this was simply a trick I picked up in my long studies in the pursuit of justice. While my hand may yet again appear to be missing, it is actually an illusion!"

Rob

Typo that made me crack up: "corning"

Good chapter!

medailyfun

Look, Hakram's Name can even form a limb if it's required to fulfil his master's order!

JJR

A very hand feature indeed.

caoimhinh

Very handy indeed.

benthelynx

I did not see that twist. Well played

Liliet

Oh man.

Well, Catherine is facing quite a choice here.

Did Malicia really make the mistake Scribe's words imply she did?

Grey Madness

Hot damn.

NZPIEFACE

I know we all know this by now, but it feels to me that Malicia has forgotten why she climbed the Tower at all by now.

Shveiran

Why do you think she climbed the Tower?

Liliet

I think she climbed the Tower for the sake of personal power, and all the rest was optimizing for it. She wanted to make Praes more effective because Praes would be hers and she takes care of her things.

There have been hints of her having more patriotic/altruistic motivations, but they were most likely secondary.

>Alaya of Satus had been born to the Green Stretch, but her roots were not of the mud. Soninke of no great line was she yet Soninke still, and though some of the ways she kept to had sprung from the shores of the Wasaliti her years in Ater had seen her embrace the Wasteland's rites. A caged bird in the Dread Empire's most gilded cage, she had learned the songs of power from the carrion circling the carcass of Nefarious' reign. With watchful eye and steady hand she'd taught herself to kill without ever baring a blade and to sow ruin with but whisper, the trade and tongue of those born high. Patient and smiling, she had learned the mistakes and the triumphs of those who called themselves her betters, and behind the smile taken the measure of the ailing empire falling apart around her. Like a surgeon and a sculptor, her hand had marked the cut. And so Alaya of Satus asserted this: Praes is a game that can be won.

She wants to win the game. For herself, and maybe also for other people, but primarily for herself.

>Amadeus of the Green Stretch was the son of corpses now buried, born of a land tread by soldiers under different banners with every season. Duni, he was, his skin the pale shame of old defeats that Praes had deemed filth even in name, and never did he forget it. It was not the Tower's promises that whispered in his sleep but the footsteps of his youth, the wheel of unending defeats seen from the side with cold eyes. In indignation he had become squire, and so sharp a blade found it that it slew his rivals and knighted him in black. To the banner he'd raised the disgraces of the Wasteland had flocked, be they green of skin and red of hand, Named hunted from above or every sharp mind and soul of steel that knew contempt but no captain. His was a company of the hungry and the lost, sworn to bleed for those unworthy of that blood. And so Amadeus of the Green Stretch asserted this: Praes is a mould that must be broken.

Unlike Amadeus, who is, in fact, working largely for the benefit of other people.

PhadosZahn

I love this chapter and I know the big reveal about Scribe's intentions and Cat catching it is the main focus but I just can't get over that fact the HAKRAM HAS A FREAKING GHOST HAND!

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah! ♥

Daniel E

My favorite part of this chapter is Cat's assertion that she is a proper, capital letter Villain in her own right, and warrants the respect that comes with such a title.

Daniel E

Stupid enter key 😞 Also wanted to say that now more than ever, Scribe reminds me of The Silence from Doctor Who.

Andrew Mitchell

Nice pick-up!! 😊 😊

Daniel Keogh

Spelling error here: "it could not realty be called paranoia", "realty"

With love.

Daniel Keogh

Also spelling mistake here: "Shirt-sighted" Should be "Short-sighted"

Chapter 74: Partial

"Trust not oaths: from a liar they are wind, from the true they are needless."

– Penthesian saying

Gods, I should have seen it from the start.

What did Scribe actually care about, in that all-consuming way Named cared for things? It wasn't land or wealth or glory: all of those she could have easily claimed from her position at the side of the Carrion Lord and no one would have batted an eye. She hadn't, though, and neither had she claimed any formal authority beyond what her service to Black brought. She'd been a shadow, the spider at the centre of the web. Named could be quiet, subtle even, but rarely in the manner she'd been. I doubted more than a dozen people on Calernia knew what Assassin's face looked like, but he had a reputation. He'd done deeds, however grisly. Scribe, though? Even in Callow, where she'd effectively run the bureaucracy of the occupation for two decades, she was known as little more than Black's aide. When Named wanted something they acted, and those actions rippled consequences outwards in ways that had little to do with power – it was the Role that cast a long shadow, not unnatural swiftness of limb or the heady thrum of an aspect unleashed.

Yet when thought was given to the matter, the Scribe had been slightly more than a shadow: she'd been my teacher's shadow, in particular. There was something about Amadeus of the Green Stretch, or perhaps his ambitions, that must have drawn her to him. She had little stake in the Empire, though, and was not from it: she'd herself told me she was not born of it, and Black had once told me they'd met in Delos. I could go mad trying to parse together the desires of such a purposefully obscure stranger, though, so why even try? I could see what mattered to her simply by looking at where she hadn't... faded into the background. She'd cared for the old Calamities some, less so their children – Masego rarely spoke of her – but in the end it was my father she'd attached herself to. Fear of pain or death wouldn't work on someone like Eudokia, Adjutant was right about that. You'd have to threaten something she cared about, and as far as I could tell one of the few things she valued in this world was the trust between her and Black.

Hakram had caught scent of that, far before I could even begin to glimpse the shape of the truth, and so now I had a knife to rest against the throat of that trust. No longer strangled or threatened, the villainess slowly rose to her feet and talked.

"It was necessary," Scribe said. "And considering your personal and political enmities with Malicia, none of this should be unpleasant to your ear."

Akua's Folly had been permitted and even somewhat obliquely funded by the Tower, I had not forgotten that. Akua Sahelian would pay her dues for that and more, but the Dread Empress would not be spared the settling of all accounts. And her debt had only grown, with the brutal attack that'd been Night of Knives. Some of those losses had been personal, too. Ratface would not soon be forgot. Only now I had to wonder if I'd been steered, didn't I? If Scribe could do it to Black, someone she loved and trusted, she would not bat an eye before aiming me at her enemies. On the other hand, would the Empress not have tried to cast the blame on Scribe for that if she could, even if it was even slightly feasible? And there was General Istrid's death during the Doom, too. Juniper's mother had taken a knife in the back and it was still anyone's guess who'd wielded the blade. These days I was inclined to flip a coin over whether it'd been the Empress removing one of the key Black loyalists in the Legions or the Matrons getting their pieces in place and giving me opportunity to swallow up leaderless legions into the nascent Army of Callow. Which I had, promptly enough. Now, though, looking back? Malicia had lost two legions and the supreme commander of my freshly strengthened armies been given good reason to despise the Empress. There was no end to that rabbit hole, if I tumbled down it.

"As far as I'm concerned, this can only end with Malicia's head on a pike," I conceded. "But this is not a reasonable way to go about this, Scribe. Shit, you were more than just playing with fire: Procer might have collapsed, if someone put a knife in Hasenbach! All for something an honest conversation might have achieved instead."

"That is where," Scribe calmly said, "you are wrong."

There was no tremor to her voice, no hesitation. She believed what she said. And she also didn't give the slightest fuck about the hundreds of thousands of deaths that might come from the Principate toppling. No, I darkly thought, she wouldn't. Sabah had been the only one of the Calamities who gave more than a passing thought to the lives she took, which made it all the more a tragedy she'd been the one to die first.

"I expect we're not about to have a stirring discussion about whether Cordelia Hasenbach truly is the key to keeping the Principate functional," I cuttingly said.

"He would have forgiven her, Catherine Foundling," Scribe said. "Without ever using the word forgive, but that would be the truth of it nonetheless. No matter what any of us said, he'd make peace again."

"Look, I'm not going to argue he doesn't get sentimental on occasion," I said. "To be blunt, there's a reason I'm still breathing. But he's still Black. There's lines, and if he has to choose between the Praes he wants and Malicia-

"He'll try for both," Scribe said. "Offer her to be his Chancellor, another leap of faith: trusting that she would be one of the few who never schemed the death of their tyrant."

"That would not be acceptable," I sharply said. "If she takes a ship across the Tyrian Sea I won't pursue, but she doesn't get to stay anywhere near the reins of power. Not after all the shit she's pulled. He knows that."

"It won't matter. He always forgives," Scribe said, and under the calm tone that were and old and cold anger. "Malicia. Ranger. Even Wekesa, who spurned one of the few ways the Empire could be corrected without steel in hand out of sheer petty apathy. He always forgives them and takes up the work instead. It will kill him, Catherine. It has been killing him for years, but this once he might as well slit his own throat. I will not have it."

I almost denied her, the words on the tip of my tongue, but then I thought of Arcadia. Of the Queen of Summer holding Masego and I in the palm of her hand, and how she's still not come the closest to killing me that day. He would be angry, if I killed you, Ranger had said, her desire to take my life almost a physical thing, but we've been angry before. It passes. The Scribe had known my father for a very long time, and though she was... warped in some ways, as all Named were, she was not necessarily wrong.

"There were ways that weren't as risky," I said.

"None that would hold under scrutiny, which you can be certain will be had," Scribe said.

And the thing was, if you counted Black's life above everything other concern I could even understand why she'd believed this was what needed to be done. And why she'd assume I'd go along with it too. As a play, it'd finished isolating Malicia from every other halfway trustworthy actor on Calernia – at this point, who aside from Kairos would even consider bargaining with her? It would ensure that Black would climb the Tower, putting someone at the head of the Empire I could trust when I abdicated, and while Hasenbach still held the reins of Procer her position was weakened just ahead of pivotal negotiations. Now that this had been carried out successfully, I only benefitted from the outcome of her scheme. Oh, no doubt she'd have preferred I never catch on, but this was not a fatal mistake to her was it? I gained nothing from outing her and would lose quite a bit from tattling. Now that the Jacks could benefit from her agents in the Wasteland, I had an actual reason to want her to keep breathing – the arrangement would likely die with her. Would Black kill her, if he knew? I honestly wasn't sure. He'd tolerate manipulations for Malicia, I suspected, but then he'd considered the Empress his superior.

Not so with this one, I thought.

"It wasn't worth the risks," I finally said. "And you know if he ever learns about this, he'll snap."

"There are three people alive who know of this," Scribe said.

I felt a pang of irritation.

"Don't be daft," I said. "He's a villain. So are you, so am I. Secrets like this always come out with the likes of us, Scribe. And if you don't do it on your own terms it'll be on some hero's instead."

There were simply so many ways for secrets to be snatched from even the grave. Some manners of necromancy, echoes in Arcadia, or even just a very improbable but not outright impossible human mistake. Providence wasn't a panacea for all ills that handed you everything always, the way Black had once intimated to me, but it did make sure that if there was a chance in a hundred all a hero needed to do was roll the dice.

"You speak with great certainty," she said, "yet I have buried greater sins than this and never did they rise from their graves."

"You've never been in everyone's eyes like this, though," I flatly replied. "Every great power on the continent is looking at Salia and the smouldering remains of your plot, Scribe. Hells, you've got the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim here. Your really think two Choir busybodies like that aren't going to get even a hint from up on high?"

"There are limits to how much even angels can intervene," she said, sounding irritated. "It is not a rule that the Heavens see through every scheme, else there would be no purpose to ever scheming. They have no reason to even begin to look, so-"

"How are you not getting that you're not playing iron sharpens iron in the fucking Wasteland anymore?" I snapped. "This isn't killing teenage heroes in Callow before they get their first aspect, Scribe. You're trying the odds with the godsdamned fate of millions on the line, every hound the Heavens have to send sniffing at the ashes, and you think-"

A hand came to rest on my shoulder, though it was not warm.

"Cat," Hakram said. "This no longer serves a purpose."

I breathed out angrily. I'd not even noticed getting to my feet, much less the clatter of my abandoned pipe against the table. Ash had spilled, though not enough to start a fire.

"Fine," I said. "You're right. This is not acceptable, Scribe."

"A decision made in anger might be regretted," Adjutant cautioned.

My fingers clenched. My instinct was to drag her, by the hair if need be, in front of Black and let the truth spill out. But Hakram was right, there'd be long-lasting consequences to that. And until I could separate my instinct to go through with this from my harsh urge to see Scribe getting the rude awakening she'd been bargaining for, it would be best if I stayed my hand.

"I'll hold my tongue for now," I said.

"I will require guarantee that you will first speak with me, should you unwisely choose revelations," Scribe said.

Fuck you, I almost said, you get nothing from me you— but Hakram's bony fingers squeezed my shoulder slightly.

"Fine," I got out.

Both Adjutant and I knew she might start scrambling for leverage over me the moment she left the room, but if she did take off the gloves and flay her alive before use her reanimated puppet-corpse to call off whatever she'd schemed. The days where I was willing to let the Calamities twist my arm were long past me. I snatched back my pipe, though the wakeleaf was spoiled. Out of sheer pettiness I hobbled to cut in front of Scribe as she made for the door.

Wasn't much, but it did slightly help my mood.

—

Even after the anger cooled no answers had sprung forth, because there were some choices that had no clean way through. It'd been one of my earliest lessons as the Squire, and though I wished it hadn't proved as repeatedly and brutally true there was no denying it had. I could have slipped away into a warded room with the same half-council I'd gathered earlier to debate the matter, let their advice carry me through the noise until some sort of conclusion took form. I didn't, for I'd grown weary of the same words echoing around my mind again and again. A council sounded deeply unpleasant, at the moment, and though I knew indecisiveness could be a costly thing to a woman in my position a day's staggering would not change too much. Dawn would carry with it a great many hopes, for messengers had come from Salia and the delegations were to be received at midday. As agreed, an escort of four hundred would be allowed to every representative save for Black — who was, effectively, here as an extension of my own delegation. It would have been wiser to head to bed brisk and early, but restless and the coming of darkness had me too awake for it.

I went out instead, shedding all escorts save for the handful of Mighty I sensed trailing me in the dark. The countryside around Salia was, well, rather mundane. Given all the wild things one heard about the Principate's capital I'd half expected everything within ten miles of it to be a pleasure garden dripping in jewels, but this could easily have been Callowan countryside. Lands did not look so different from one another, when covered by ice and snow. Though the village where my soldiers had been quartered, Roque-Faillie, had nothing of note all that close I was surprised to find a light fluttering in the distance after ghosting past my guards. It was coming from structure, too, though not a large one. Curiosity drove me forward, limping as I went and leaning on my staff of yew. The Mantle of Woe I'd left behind, traded instead for a warmer fur-rimmed cloak that Hakram had sown me. It was quite lovely, and he'd even reminded my whining about all my clothes being black: it was a pleasant shade of deep green instead, almost like the colour Archer favoured. I blinked in surprise when I got a good look at where the light was coming from, for though the sight was not that odd I'd not expected to see it.

It was a small farm I was looking at, though it must have been used for cattle-herding as well by the looks of the low wall to the side. Someone had hung a lantern on the side of house, off a rusting iron hook, and I caught a grunt of effort coming from near the low wall. Light in my limp, I moved onto the snowy path and found a man working on the cattle-wall. It'd been shoddily built, I thought, more piled stone than anything else, and a large swath of it had collapsed. Some had used a shivel to break the snow and ice and was steadily stacking the stones anew. Brow raising, I took a closer look. Not a Proceran, this one, at least not by birth: his skin had that Thalassina tone to it, too pale to be Soninke but too dark to be Taghreb. Tall and built like a working man, with fuzzy hair cropped even closer than even Legion regulations demanded, he'd shed his coat. Instead he wore a long-sleeved grey tunic he'd rolled up the sleeves of, and I let my gaze linger just a moment on the muscled forearms and calloused hands. He was rather plain-faced, I saw when he turned to glanced at me, and either clean-shaven or hairless. His dark brown eyes had a sense of steadiness to them, peace almost.

"Can I help you?" he asked in flawless Chantant.

Almost embarrassed at having stared, I gestured towards the wall he was working on.

"Won't hold without mortar," I said. "And it's a little late in the year for that. Won't take properly in the cold."

He looked surprised.

"Are you a mason?" he asked.

"I have a friend who works with stone," I shrugged.

Insofar as Pickler could be said to be doing then, when she crafted engines to tear down walls. I took another few steps, moving to the side of the path so I could lean against an intact part of the cattle-wall.

"Spring is coming soon enough," the stranger said. "It may hold."

"Hopeful sort, aren't you?" I drawled.

"I see no purpose to ever assuming the worst," he replied. "It seems like a tiring way to live."

"You get more pleasant surprises that way," I hedged. "You don't have the look of a local, if you'll forgive my saying so."

"I am not," the man agreed, body shifting as he stacked another stone. "It is not my farm, if that is your question. I was given leave to use it while waiting for a friend."

"Here?" I said, genuinely surprised. "You know there's delegations close, right? The League further east and Callow's just to the west. That's a lot of jumpy soldiers."

Not to mention I'd let Robber loose. He wasn't going to around stabbing farmers – although this definitely wasn't one – but he wouldn't be above a bit of a scare if he got bored.

"I had heard," the man said. "I warned my friend, though she cared little for the warning."

"Headstrong?" I said, genuinely sympathetic.

Indrani wasn't exactly what you might call a pliable young maiden, even when I wasn't actively insulting her.

"Rather," the man said, amused. "And she dislikes cities. It will do her some good to stretch her legs."

"Been in Salia, then?" I casually asked.

"I have," he said. "We are being hosted in the city."

"Not Levantine, by the look and sound of you," I mused. "Sure as Hells not Proceran. Ashuran, then?"

"A long time ago," the man agreed, then shifted to Lower Miezán. "You are Callowan, yes?"

"Laure born and raised," I agreed in the same.

"Come with the Black Queen, I would think," he said.

"More or less," I said. "You a translator? I expect with the amount of people coming into the capital there's bound to be good coin in it."

He was perhaps in too good a shape for one, but it would rather impolite to outright call him a mercenary who'd picked up a few languages while out on campaign. A hired blade wouldn't make it into any place of import, but with foreign soldiers in Salia knowing their tongues would be a skill people were willing to pay coin for.

"I know a great many languages," the man said. "You might say I have a gift with them."

There was an almost rueful note to his voice when he said that. Yeah, that wasn't a mercenary. No idea what he actually was, but I was leaning towards whatever the Thalassocracy's equivalent of the Eyes of the Empire was.

"Were you at the Princes' Graveyard?" he suddenly asked.

I nodded.

"It is said that angels seeded dreams among soldiers of all armies," he said, dark eyes lingering on me.

I'd gotten an interested look or two in my life, and this wasn't one of them. He'd assessed me as someone who knew how their way around a blade – checked my frame, my stance, for callouses on my palm. Yeah, definitely not a common mercenary.

"Didn't get one," I said. "But I've heard the same."

He slowly nodded.

"Unfortunate," he said. "I'd wanted to speak with someone who had dreamt."

"Oh?" I asked. "Dubious about the Arch-heretic of the East not getting smote by angels?"

He looked amused.

"It is a meaningless title," he said.

I cocked my head to the side, honestly surprised.

"It comes from no sacred writ, it has the blessing of no Choir nor the assent of the Heavens," he elaborated, seeing my curiosity. "If priests declare the sun to be wicked, does it make it so?"

"I think you have a large enough conclave, probably yes," I mused.

The man's lips quirked into a smile. He hoisted up another stone and set it down before wiping his brow and pulling down his sleeves. Picking up his coat, he moved to sit by my side on the cattle-wall.

"You do not think much of priests, it seems," he said.

"A priest is usually a good thing," I drawled. "It's when you've priests in the multiple that the trouble starts. They've a way of starting to believe that whatever they agree on is the truth, and it's all downhill from there."

"Is there not a House of Light in Callow?" the man asked, sounding surprised.

"Sure," I snorted. "But it's never been overly guilty of agreeing on anything. Mind you, they still keep to the Book. It's the Praesi that have no priests at all."

"My mother kept to the Gods Below," the man admitted. "She was rather bemused at the notion of formal priesthood."

I glanced at him.

"Soninke?" I guessed.

He nodded. I'd been right then, he had mixed blood as was – had been now, I reminded myself – common in Thalassina.

"From Thalassina," he said.

I grimaced.

"Hope you didn't have any family there," I said.

"I do not know," he admitted, then frowned. "It is true, then? That the city was sunk into the sea?"

"Large chunk of it went up in smoke, way I heard it," I said. "And that much sorcery, even when you're just close..."

It was his turn to grimace. Yeah, I suspected that'd not been a pleasant way to die for those unlucky survivors.

"Heavens shepherd their souls beyond," he murmured.

A well-meant sentiment, I thought, though most Praesi would sneer at it. The man pushed himself off the wall and put on his coat – good make but well-worn, most likely not a noble then – and with a smile offered me his hand.

"Hanno," he introduced himself.

I went still for a heartbeat as it all came together. Slowly, I breathed out.

"Catherine," I said, clasping his wrist in a legionary's handshake.

His eyes widened, the slightest bit.

"Black Queen," Hanno of Arwad said.

"White Knight," I replied. "Fancy meeting you here."

copaceticcockroach

Vote or you'll won't see the next chapter.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

copaceticcockroach

Typo Thread:

Ratface would not soon be forgot.

*Ratfacs would not soon be forgotten.

Rapier Tapir

Actually forgot may be slightly old world but that means it for perfectly, also his name is Ratface...

copaceticcockroach

Typo in the typo thread.

ohJohN

RATFACTS

Shikkarasu

I now envision Greg from Over The Garden Wall holding up a read rodent with a clown face painted on.

"It's a Rat Fact!"

LokeshC2

But the rat was stolen?

MrMaturity

Nah I think that one is correct

Cassus

I loved the chapter!

Back with a fresh list of typos:

Tower, I had // Tower; I had could, even if it was even // could, if it was even calm tone that were and old and cold anger // calm tone there was an old and cold anger she's still not come // she'd still not come above everything other // above every other Would Black killer her, // Would Black kill her,

This one changes the meaning of the sentence, but I'm pretty sure it's what you meant. Please double-check, though!
tolerate manipulations for Malicia // tolerated manipulations from Malicia room, but if she did take off the gloves and flay her alive before use her reanimated// room, but if she did I'd take off the gloves and flay her alive before using her reanimated but restless and the coming // but restlessness and the coming was coming from structure // was coming from a structure Hakram had sown me // Hakram had sewn me he'd even reminded my whining // he'd even remembered my whining

Some had used a shivel to break // Someone had used a shovel to break but it would rather impolite // but it would be rather impolite
I think you have a large // I think if you have a large

Aston Whiteman

You're writing it?

Andrew Mitchell

No. ErraticErrata (EE) writes this.

RandomFan

I'm pretty sure that was a threat to gouge out people's eyes if they didn't vote, not a statement of authorial status. But it might've been to kill people.

Either way, they're not the author.

Morgenstern

I'm pretty sure it was more a concern that we might not get to see more PGtE, if this work falls far below in the list, but... oO Eh?

Whatever is up with people these days? Why is everyone suddenly arguing this personally on here? oO ... or is it just me being in such a mood that I'm mis-reading "dry humor" as something else again... =/

Morgenstern

Anyways, another typo question:
Can "remind" now be used the same as "remember"?

There was this sentence about Hakram making that cloak and even (remembering, I'd have thought, but it was "reminding" here) that Cat did not want all her clothes black

RandomFan

I can't speak for the first poster, from me it was an attempt at dry humor that probably didn't work.

Aston Whiteman

That person has way too much free time.

Write your own story vote gouger!

EE can ask for votes...

copaceticcockroach

It's a threat to add your eyeballs into Robber's collection of eyeballs. Anyways, what happened to the two eyeballs Cat took from Robber?

Rey d`Tutto

The most important dangling plot thread of them all!

Andrew Mitchell

Agreed!

I trust that EE will resolve it in the final book.

Liliet

She's going to give them to Hanno as a courting gift

Javvies

Huh.

I'm not sure if I think Scribe or Cat is more likely to be right about this secret getting out.

What the hell is Hanno doing out there? He was last seen inside Salia.

Guided by providence?

Oh. Wait. Antigone/Witch of the Woods is around somewhere, too.

Huh.

I wonder who was responsible for putting them so close to where Callow/the Legions were being placed.

On the upshot, it seems that he'll be opposed to Cat's having been declared Arch-Heretic being a problem. That cannot hurt.

Brigsby

They were remarkably civil, having things like being orphans, and views from both sides of the fight in common might have something to do with that. For all he is the White Knight, I predict he will be one of if not the single greatest supporter of Catherine. The Choir of Judgement seems to judge based off intent more than anything else based on what we've seen. If I am right then the Choir will support what I think his natural inclination will be. His mother after all was a follower of the gods below and he never thought her evil for it, but those who followed the gods above killed her without justice, proving that not all villains are Villians, and not all Villians are villians.

He seems a decent fellow all told. Grounded in reality, like a mirror image of Cat as she might have been, had she gone for the mantle of Black Knight ht.

Liliet

I love that the shocking revelation of who they are came in the form of them just introducing themselves after a stretch of conversation, like normal sane people do. They're absolute fucking icons in doing things the logical way that makes sense – sort of!

Mental Mouse

I love how perfectly our author managed to set up an “oh duh” moment for us readers... I could see the pieces being laid out, but didn't manage to figure it out before the reveal....

Liliet

People figured it out at different moments ;u;

Trebar

Yeah... as soon as Catherine saw a lone figure working here I knew who it was likely to be. The revelation at the end was still fun to read but it wasn't shocking at all.

Tohron

For me, I figured it out when he said his mother was Praesi.

Rey d`Tutto

When Catherine described him, I'm like: “That might be Hanno.”

The remainder of the chapter beautifully reprised every other time the Black Queen had a conversation with an unknowing interlocutor, and Cat's first conversation with GP.

caoimhinh

I personally find it a bit funny that they didn't even introduce themselves as anything else than their first names, yet that was enough for them to recognize who the other person was.

Though I guess they are both versed enough in Name Lore to realize that if they are meeting a mysterious charming stranger and that stranger has the same name as an important Named, then they can only be one and the same.

Liliet

Catherine spent half the conversation wondering who tf this is because he's sure as fuck not a common mercenary. Considering Catherine is limping and uses a walking stick, I don't think Hanno did anything less, because she's sure as fuck not a common legionary.

So, yeah lmao. Blessed moment ♥

caoimhinh

Now I have to wonder if somewhere out there, there is another girl named Catherine and when she introduces herself people go "You are the Black Queen?" and she has to spend some time convincing them she is not a powerful heretic Named.

Raivshard

We'll, it was pretty clear once she started guessing where he was from. Still a cool twist.

Less on the intent and more on the degree of how much they are guilty for their past misdeeds vs how much can they do to repent for them. The choice is the most important part, both in how much agency they in whether not to commit their crimes, and whether or not to repent after being judged.

medailyfun

Actually his mother killed herself

Mental Mouse

IIRC she was driven to suicide.

Mental Mouse

> He seems a decent fellow all told. Grounded in reality...

And like Cat, has little patience for the traditional customs of his "side"'s followers.

Liliet

Like Cat, he has an Evil parent whom he might not exactly agree with on everything, but certainly sympathizes with.

They chose different methods of handling that, but I don't think they're that afar apart~

Quite Possibly A Cat

"On the upshot, it seems that he'll be opposed to Cat's having been declared Arch-Heretic being a problem." He was never going to have a problem with Cat because of that title. Heck, he wouldn't even have a big problem with Cat being a villain. I think it will come down to a coin flip if they get along or not in the end.

Liliet

I think they're already getting along, and Hanno doesn't let the coin fly without good specific reason.

(namely: he is currently attacking that person, the person asked him for Heavens' judgement specifically, everything is on fire and he has no better way to make it slightly less on fire)

byzantine279

It wouldn't surprise me if someone demands he judge her, and when he balks Cat casually assents to it.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I hope you're right!

Liliet

WANT

Dainpdf

On the "who was responsible" front, I am guessing Providence or the Bard.

Mental Mouse

> I'm not sure if I think Scribe or Cat is more likely to be right about this secret getting out.

Cat is right that it will certainly come out eventually. Scribe is remarkably good at keeping secrets, but yeah, too many eyes, and some of them immortal and/or nigh-omniscient. The question is whether it will come out while it can still make a difference, "for good or ill". Especially with Providence at the table...

Gyndroid

The thing I'm curious about is that Cat's sitting on two major secrets herself—namely, she's got Akua in her service, and she tried to make a deal with the dead king. Hell, she's aware Kairos knows about that too. Does she...have a plan in mind, then, for when this gets out, as she apparently assumes it must?

Javvies

Well, Pilgrim, at least, knows something about Cat having been thinking about and having (at one point) tried for a deal with the Dead King.

On the other hand, it's also true that Cat didn't actually make a deal with the Dead King, and instead tried to kill Malicia in order to prevent her deal with him.

And that Cat intends to remove the Dead King's foothold on Creation.

As far as the Akua reveal goes ... yeah, that could perhaps be a problem. On the other hand ... Akua's crimes all took place in Callow (and Praes), so nobody else at the table has legal grounds to go after her.

That said, Cat is more likely to sacrifice Akua to the Grand Alliance instead of Amadeus.

AceOfSword

"What the hell is Hanno doing out there? He was last seen inside Salia."

Since he's a knight he moves in a different way from everyone else and ignores normal barriers. That's how he managed to get surprisingly close to the other side's queen.

The upside is that he's now too close to be threatening, Cat would only be in danger if she was further away and a bit to the side.

chris S

the fact that nobody has liked joke this yet is criminal

chris S

*like this joke.

Darn phone keyboard messing up my sentences

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahhaaha. ♥

Joshua

Interestingly enough, I came to the opposite conclusion. Two sides meet before the battle and exchange friendly words seems to flow nicely into a bitter rivalry dynamic.

Besides, there's not much more that Cat disrespects than someone who submits entirely to higher powers to solve problems like Hanno does. I image that fact alone precludes them being much friendlier.

Suppose we'll see next chapter though.

Javvies

Oh, that's entirely possible.

But it won't be Hanno causing Cat problems because the Conclave declared her Arch-Heretic of the East. His refusal to accept the Conclave's declaration of that might not actually help anything, but there's no realistic way it can hurt Cat, unless some asshat tries to make the argument she's mind controlling Hanno or something into ignoring the Conclave ... and I don't think that'd get all that much traction anyways. I think it's a more likely to helpful than not, no matter what else Hanno does.

Forrest

I would point out that he does seem to rely on the coin less ever since Black called him out on it. He even seemed to consider what Black said as being worth considering.

Liliet

>there's not much more that Cat disrespects than someone who submits entirely to higher powers to solve problems like Hanno does

You might be projecting from Amadeus. Catherine is the one who made a pact with two goddesses and let them read her thoughts on an ongoing manner, I'm just saying.

And Hanno only resorts to his coin when he has no other sane solution, so...

Mental Mouse

Cat's also the one who mouths off to her patron goddesses...

Liliet

...and gets along with Hanno just fine.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Oh man, I've been looking forward to this meetup for so long. Also, holy wow on providence as a diplomatic tool.

Liliet

It's funny how providence has certainly been favoring Cat and people who agree with her, lately.

Like Augur specifically commented that providence was on her side in her trick with Bard, like she even got micromanagement warnings about taking a wrong turn in conversation.

And now this 😊

Mental Mouse

Despite my previous comment about "Providence being at the table". I think it's increasingly clear that Providence is a world-mechanic, not an agency. Cat is playing by its rules, better than most heroes ever have. Specifically, she's "making her own luck" by reading the scenes and the stories, putting her own butt on the line when needed, standing by her friends and her principles, afflicting the comfortable and comforting the afflicted, and especially by breaking her own paths despite every temptation. And all that carries the rewards of Providence.

Liliet

Agreed.

And we're seeing the payoff in things starting to go her way, and that makes me really happy

Insanenoodlyguy

Now kiss!

SpacyRicochet

Headcanon: the reason for Hanno to be surrounded by pretty much exclusively female Named is that he needs his own fleet due to being an Ashuran.

(inb4 so does Ashur in general, these days)

Mental Mouse

So, you see him conquering at the helm of a fleet of relation-ships? 😊

Big Brother

Honestly, I love the introduction between Cat and Hanno. It's amazing how similarly they think at the surface level about earthly conclaves.

stevenneiman

They have in some ways very similar views about the world's problems, but very different views about the solutions. They both see organizations and institutions following incentives to act corrupt, but Cat thinks the solution is to realign those incentives to encourage them to be less harmful while Hanno thinks the solution is to only trust those he believes (right or wrong, I don't know enough to say) to be beyond incentives.

Liliet

I don't think this is an irreconcilable problem, given that Hanno usually keeps his views to himself and is likely to agree with Catherine's method as a primary one.

Skaddix

I mean yeah Cat is not wrong this does raise the odds that Scribe was actually behind taking out Istrid and Ratface...After all Malicia has mind control she doesn't especially need to worry about Istrid revolting with that fail safe after all. I think Cat is right this comes out and a pretty bad moment for her.

Classic Girl Meets Boy, Queue the romantic music under a starlit sky.

haihappen

This is usually the point in the story where they either have a long private conversation, leading to a buildup in tension, or, an incident happens that leads to the situation or the intentions of the characters to be misunderstood. Good thing there are no impulsive colleagues of either roaming about, ready to stumble into the situation and wiiiiildly misinterpret them... oh wait...

haihappen

And, of course, the ship is on. Naturally.

Agent J

Add it to the fleet.

Mental Mouse

Or correctly interpret them. 😊 I'd say "this could be the beginning of a beautiful friendship...".

Liliet

It is DEFINITELY the beginning of a beautiful friendship.

It COULD also be the beginning of something else!

Insanenoodlyguy

This just leads me to imagining this as being Cat's new "Fire" Reputation.

Events keep happening almost full anime style that result in other people walking in in ways that make it look like Cat and Hanno are engaged in a passionate, sweaty, and sometimes depraved relationship of the flesh.

Liliet

Catherine feels offended because they do engage in that but not where people can walk in on them, come on, she's not an animal!

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat: Angry ranting: Look, he really was showing me this hold that he'd learned from one of his memories, a hero with the same body type as me. It was training! Training!

Archer: So you really weren't getting hot and heavy with the guy?

Cat: snort The fuck I wasn't! Every room in that godamn farm. We had to fix a wall, and the fence when it broke in an entirely new place! But we didn't do anything like that in the goddamn training hall the First Prince could and did walk into, no!

Archer: Do you... want to do something like that in the 'goddamn' training hall?

Cat: ... mmmmayy-no. NO!

Mental Mouse

And in time, the returned farmers will wonder why half their livestock are glowing by night and shadowed by day.... 😊

Someguy

Still waiting for Kairos + Heirach vs Choir of Judgement.

Andrew Mitchell

I think you'll need to be patient for at least another week.

Oshi

More than that. They need to meet with everyone first in the city and assuming everything goes off then they have to deal with whatever agenda has to be dealt with before Hierarch can do his thing.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, you're probably right. It may even need to be part of the final book.

Mental Mouse

Writing from the future: Oh yeah, that's gonna be awesome! 😊

Soma

What a delightful meeting. The important mysterious stranger is always fun, especially coming from both ends.

And the Black Knight, Amadeus of The Green Stretch, too sentimental to see to his goals? Truly? If so, what a hilarious inversion and demolition of a great many long winded arguments I, and a great many, perhaps less long winded arguments, others made.

Perhaps it is Malicia operating on logic alone, and Amadeus clouded by sentiment and emotion? I have some doubts on both, but oh my, the rug was just ripped out of so many people's feet, potentially.

Great chapter!

caoimhinh

Amadeus is not a cold machine without emotions and feelings. Malicia is not an emotional wreck without cunning and logic. Each relevant character on the series is a multi-faceted and complex individual.

I don't think what Scribe said is really ground-breaking, as it matches what we have seen of Black. She is simply thinking that there was a high chance of Amadeus forgiving Malicia, his best friend in the world, like he has forgiven others from his closest circle of friends before when they had big fights and disagreements.

From her point of view, it was likely he would incorporate Malicia into his plans rather than get rid of her at the first chance (which is like him, even to his enemies he extends the chance to work for him when they are talented), so she took measures in order to force his hand.

And that's just what was perceived from Scribe's point of view, don't forget she is even more prone to cold logic than Amadeus and she is also not a friend of Malicia, so she is not inclined to have Black take risks due to Malicia.

It's kinda like when Catherine initially put trust on Vivienne and made the deal with her to have the Thieves' Guild work for the crown of Callow. Cat was willing to extend trust, even when Thief had just been fighting against her, but Hakram took measures behind the scenes to make sure Vivienne would not betray Catherine (nearly traumatizing Vivienne in the process). Then did it again when he cut off his own hand to prevent her from leaving the Woe (and she finally stopped being afraid of him).

Scribe is like that for Amadeus, taking actions in the shadows for what she believes to be his best benefit.

Liliet

It's funny how I'd been unhappy with Scribe for Not Getting what hurts Amadeus and what is important to him, but looks like it's the reverse— she understands it very well, and sees long-term hurt as more important than the short-term one.

medailyfun

Thus Hakram has felt soul kinship between Scribe and himself and put all his weight to resolve the fuss

caoimhinh

Yeah, he's standing there like "Eh, I would probably do the same" or something along those lines.

medailyfun

"I hope Cat will never learn what I'd done in Laure..."

Xi Cree

"Like a knife loves a steady hand, like a sparrow loves flight..."

These words were spoken once before. Hakram knows the lay of her as well as he remembers his own hands.

Insanenoodlyguy

They also need to kiss.

Soma

I fully agree with you that every character is multifaceted, that's very well said.

I should have made it more clear that while I was stereotyping characters in my comment above, that is not the way I see them. I was taking a very brief jaunt through the lens Scribe provided. It's such an inversion of the way I feel Amadeus has been presented that it was entertaining for me to enter that headspace.

laguz24

The ability for Black to forgive and keep his band together was what made him different from all the other Black Knights in the past, however, it could be a weakness as shown here, there is no right way to go about things. Even Scribe can be wrong about things, for example in the first book she thought Catherine was going to leave but Black knew she was going to try to fix things.

Soma

I think I very much agree with you. I'm definitely not making definitive statements here. I actually think the narrative situation is very fluid right now. Who is right, or what combination of perspectives is most right, is very much up in the air. It's just the perspective Scribe gives is such an inversion of the way the story has primed us to think about Amadeus I couldn't help but remark on it.

Andrew Mitchell

> I'm definitely not making definitive statements here.

I ♥ a good self-contradictory statement! 😊

Liliet

>And the Black Knight, Amadeus of The Green Stretch, too sentimental to see to his goals? Truly?

Amadeus is a fucking mess, and suicidal depression has been messing with him since before the start of the series, because he is genuinely personally too kind and nice a person to manage the kind of position he's in without getting ground to dust by it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Poor, smol Maddie.

Liliet

-eye twitch bc he does NOT let people call him that who aren't Alaya and the audience is not her either-

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Shh, no more conquests. Nap time now.

Adrian_V

Oh yes i wanted them to meet like this!!! Although i am surprised Cat was checking out Hanno, i wonder if that could become either a running gag (like with that callowan duchess? that i can't remember if it was kegan or not) or something more serious.....

konstantinvoncarstein

The same thing happened with a Callowan priestess before Liesse.

caoimhinh

Catherine leers at almost everyone, that has been commented by nearly all her companions so it's already a running gag.

stevenneiman

She generally only does it on first meeting except with her two actual lovers, but Cat does tend to at least give people a good looking-over if they're reasonably attractive, to the point that it is something of a running gag. Ratface, Kendall, Malicia (or course), and I'm sure at least a few others got the same treatment.

caoimhinh

Indrani pointed out that Catherine constantly leered at Vivienne.

Vivienne in turn also said that Cat is a leerer that "checks up" almost everyone.

She also delights her eyes on Akua at every chance she has, even on Book 1.

Ah, she also takes second looks on Rozala.

Fayhem

> Vivienne in turn also said that Cat is a leerer that "checks up" almost everyone.

Specifically, IIRC she also noted that Cat doesn't stop ogling people even when they're literally currently actively engaged in trying to kill her. Which elevates her all the way into Harry Dresden levels of Staring Problem haha.

Agent J

Hells, she ogled Zeze's Dad. This girl is a horndog and I love it.

caoimhinh

Haha, that was a fun chapter, she was even blushing when Wekesa smiled at her. Even had to repeatedly remind herself that he was at least triple her age and also gay. But that still didn't help, hahahaha.

To be fair, Wekesa was said to be ridiculously handsome in more than one occasion by different characters.

Agent J

And admittedly rather cute in that flashback where he first romanced Tikoloshe.

caoimhinh

Ah, I personally found it less cute and more in the attitude of "Ok, there's a chance I might get killed tomorrow so... what the hell. Let's fuck."

He didn't want to die with any regret XD

Their last moments together, though, those were pretty romantic.

Adrian V

The surprise is that since Ratface there hasn't been a male focus for it that is either serious or she finds attractive

pyrohawk21

The moment Cat saw the light from afar, I knew something caused by Divinity was happening. The moment the stranger said he was Ashuran, I knew he was the White Knight, and his friend was the Witch of the Woods.

I'm looking forward to the next chapter.

konstantinvoncarstein

The same thing happened for me 😊

caoimhinh

Yep, those kinds of meetings no longer happen at random for Catherine.

I started suspecting it was Hanno when she mentioned his skin tone "his skin had that Thalassina tone to it, too pale to be Soninke but too dark to be Taghreb", as people on that side of Calernia tend to be pale-skinned, but that could still be any traveler, maybe even a new character.

What really settled it for me was when she mentioned the eyes "His dark brown eyes had a sense of steadiness to them, peace almost." Hanno's eyes had been described that way before, seems like he gets a lot of peace of mind thanks to not bothering to judge anything and leaving those concerns to others.

As I recall, only Hakram has that kind of serene look in his eyes.

Liliet

I started wondering which hero it was from the minute she said she saw a light in the distance, because... really. Not subtle on symbolism.

Though yeah the peaceful eyes bit definitely helped ♥

Liliet

I knew the minute Catherine started evaluating his ethnicity, because honestly? It wasn't going to be someone not significant and it wasn't going to be a new character in book fucking 5

caoimhinh

While I agree with you on that, I think it's worth pointing out that we are getting relevant new characters in Book 5, we already had several, in fact: Razin Tanja, Yannu Marave, the Proceran nobility that's fighting north and the other Heroes.

Not to mention characters that had just gotten a bit of screen time and barely an introduction before, and only now are being really explored, like Roland, Cordelia's spymasters, Grem, Augur, Scribe, many of the Drow Mighty, etc.

We have yet to see the Goblin Matrons, the Orc Clan Leaders, and the rest of the High Lords. Plus the rest of the Revenants that the Dead King has in reserve, I expect them to be pretty interesting characters.

This series still has a lot to offer through the characters.

Liliet

True! I actually did consider the option it was someone new before the description, but a half-Soninke muscular guy? XD

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Well this is awkward.

Liliet

Really? I think they just got along really well and will continue to do so 😊

maxwell wearing

maniacal chortling
Oh this is gonna be good

ZarquonZ

Yeah... She's Named and the Black Queen. It was a toss up between the stranger she met at a random farm being the White Knight, the Assassin or the goddamn Almighty Creator himself. There's no more casual coincidences or mundanity in her life!

Andrew Mitchell

Well, actually she's not Named at the moment.

laguz24

With the way the story is folding around her, it doesn't matter. Except there are no role flaws to fool her, just her own flaws.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, sure. 100% agree. She's certainly got enough power/influence/resources/narrative-weight that she influences stories and events like she was a powerful Named.

I was being pedantic, which is why I started with "Well, actually"

pagesbe

At the very least she's close enough to be part of a rule of three.

caoimhinh

Gotta say, Hanno's meeting with Catherine started even better than Pilgrim's did. Not just because she was leering at his muscles. Hahaha.

Also, his eyes widened when Cat introduced herself? So it was a surprise for him as well?

Gods Above, Below, and Providence, what are you up to?

P.S: For a moment there, I imagined Cat asking him to be her translator, and if he actually accepted, and then presented himself at the negotiation table wearing armor, everyone would have been shocked and start rumors about the Black Queen's skill to achieve that.

It wouldn't have happened, but I think it would have been hilarious.

Andrew Mitchell

> everyone would have been shocked and start rumors about the Black Queen's skill to achieve that.

♥ yep!

I ship them, I really do. And if that doesn't happen then at least Hanno's now confirmed (90+%) to be part of Catherine's next band of five.

Raved Thrad

From the scene where Hanno and Antigone are interacting during the attack on the Red Flower Vales, I got the impression that Antigone has a thing for Hanno, and since she seems to act without most of the trappings of "civilization," I'm fully expecting her to get territorial over him.

Andrew Mitchell

I had forgotten about that. Maybe my ship won't come in, after all. 😞

Raved Thrad

As a sailor on the ship ViviCat, I feel your pain.

laguz24

Oh, no you just made me think of a harem spin-off where every powerful woman on the continent is after Hanno. Cat, Witch of the Woods, Alaya, Cordelia, Bard, Repentant Magister. Auka, Champion, Archer, and Ranger. While they could easily destroy the continent, they all live in the same house and Auka can't cook because she puts poison in everything out of habit. AaAAGGGHhH. CURSE YOU!!!!

Cat: "What is that?"

Auka: "A Praesi Tower Cake."

Cat: "It's poisoned isn't it."

Auka: "No, how could you say that?"

Cat: looking at cookbook: "Yep, 3 tablespoons of arsenic, in the trash it goes, we voted on this, Auka."

Auka: "But"

Rest of Harem: "Trash, Auka or you're going back in the box."

Auka: "With Hanno?"

Harem: "No!"

pagesbe

Please tell me you misspelled Akua on purpose.

Of course, if you did, Abua is the only correct misspelling of her name.

laguz24

Abigail: Yes, that is totally what I meant to do.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

*Ubua

In the manner of the series' tagline: get it wrong right.

Raved Thrad

...and then we find out that Hanno's just stringing them all along, because he has (had?) a doomed, unrequited love for Laurent de Montfort. 😊

Mental Mouse

Territorialism is "trappings of civilization". We don't actually know much about Antigone's personality or morality.

caoimhinh

Later on the grand meeting.

Catherine: Waves a hand Hi, Hanno.

Hanno: nods his head Catherine.

Everyone stares at them, Kairos laughs

Pilgrim: You have met before.

Cat: Yeah, it was a delightful night in a farm.

*Everyone utters some variation of 'wait, what?'

Rozala: I would request some clarification of the matter.

Cordelia: I believe this is not the place and time for that?

Kairos: I know they both wish for details. Naughty, dirty details, if you would forgive my language. Except you, Tariq, I heard you can no longer forgive much these days. The League of Free Cities backs up Procer's request, of course. Be as thorough as you can, dear friend.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat: Well...

Hanno: We met when I was working on a fence at the farm had a very edifying conversation that made our positions clear, discovering we actually have more in common than i would have expected.

Cat: Yes. That!

Pilgrim: Ah, yes, I've had a similar-

Hanno: Then we had sex. Lots and lots of sex.

Cat: Buries face in hands

Kairos: crosses his arms and pouts, his fun spoiled

NerfGlastigUaine

Villain – hero ships usually don't end well for the villain. Especially when the villain is a well-intentioned extremist overlord. Especially, especially when they're teaming up to face a bigger threat. Classic formula would be for villain to pull redemption equals death/sacrifice to rescue hero and give him willpower to kick bigger villain ass.

Mental Mouse

Except that Cat doesn't play by the rules....

NerfGlastigUaine

Oh totally, I doubt she'll fall for it, but she'll be aware of the pattern before she even thinks about a relationship. Cat doesn't break tropes, just subverts them, and I doubt she'd take this risk unless she sees a way to play it to her advantage. At least, I hope not. If she throws away everything to Ride the White Knight, I'd be rather disappointed.

Mental Mouse

That said, they're both personally restrained characters, neither devoted to the sensual. It might well be a better match than her fooling around with Archer, of all people!

edrey

one would imagine that with that aspect he would know at least her face, hanno respect a lot the privacy of others,

caoimhinh

I know right? He even Recalled William the Lone Swordsman for his fight against Amadeus, and specifically focused on Catherine, as he was trying to find out the flaws in Black's fighting style through the flaws of her style.

Then again, Cat has changed quite a bit since those days, sharper features, darker skin, different build in muscles, she even grew up a couple of inches!(or so she claims)

Then again, Hanno might just be bad at remembering faces, or he was so focused on looking at the Squire's fighting form (and William almost always met Cat in armor) that Hanno didn't bother memorizing her face.

medailyfun

It's known thing people perceive person of power to be taller than they're in reality

Mental Mouse

Not just external power. My sister is quite short, but her personality makes her seem bigger. Nobody ever notices her height up close, it's when they see her from a distance that they go "oh, she's shorter than I realized!"

Mental Mouse

Also, it's night...

caoimhinh

That's not an impediment in this case. Notice how Catherine (without calling for the Night) is perfectly capable of seeing Hanno's features, his muscles, and even the color of his eyes.

Hanno, as a Named, has better vision than normal humans so he must have been capable of seeing Catherine almost as clearly as if it was daytime, they are also standing very close to each other and with a light source nearby (the lamp that caught Cat's attention in the first place). It's simply that he didn't recognize her face, rather than not being able to see it clearly.

Liliet

Catherine literally has Night as her current domain and power source, of course she can see clearly in the dark.

A single lamp in the night can actually make it harder to make out a face than in just star/moonlight, because of the sharp light/shadow obscuring features if you aren't staring right at the lamp.

caoimhinh

Nope, she actually needs to call on Night to use it if she wants to improve her senses, otherwise she doesn't have better vision than a normal person.

That in particular has been mentioned several times, especially when looking at things far away, and she usually declines to use it for something so petty.

Liliet

It's also nighttime.

caoimhinh

Hm, I don't think that matters in this case.

Named have superb vision, so the darkness of the night is not that much of an impediment, plus there is a lamp by the side of the house (which is what drove Cat there) and they were next to each other, so they could both see each other clearly.

Liliet

>Also, his eyes widened when Cat introduced herself? So it was a surprise for him as well?

Yep! Why would he think a random stranger who wandered up to him and started talking about mortar was the Black Queen? We the readers know the writer would not show us a meeting with a random with that framing at this point, but Hanno most definitely regularly interacts with a lot of regular people (like the owner of the farm, apparently!)

And Catherine has the manners of a common legionary more than anything, when she's not turning up the fancy or the cowpoke.

caoimhinh

I mean, Hanno went out of Salia and into a farm right next to the town where the Army of Callow was stationed, he must have known where he was.

That's why I at first suspected he was pulling a Pilgrim and doing this in hopes of having a private meeting with the Black Queen without all the formalities and nuances of an official meeting.

He also thinks in terms of stories as shown in his first couple of Heroic Interludes, so I was thinking "well, Hanno can pull this off, a peaceful and honest talk between rivals outside official meeting is also a story" but seeing his surprise when she introduced herself, that hypothesis went up in smoke.

This was a chance meeting, which means it was Providence, which means the Gods, which implies the Bard is at least aware this is happening and may even appear there.

Liliet

Would be interesting!

I am absolutely not seeing Providence mean Gods, though. It's a mechanic of its own, functioning entirely independently of one's allegiance with Above or Below. See: First Liesse.

And yeah, he knew where the Army of Callow was, but he hadn't met Catherine before. Grey Pilgrim, with his wealth of experience with various villains, could conclude from cold reading that the Black Queen of Callow would be likely to take a random stroll in the fields alone and in regular clothes. Hanno? I find it completely plausible that the possibility simply did not occur to him. You think someone walking around streets of Liesse circa Book 2-3 gap was likely to randomly meet Akua Sahelian in the street?

Andrew Mitchell

Took me a while to figure it out but at least I was a bit quicker on the up-take than Catherine. 😊 😊 😊 I think it's a good thing they've had a pleasant chance meeting before the discussions in Salia.

I'm not sure what to think about the discussion with Scribe, but I'm certainly glad Hakram was there. It seems to me Catherine's instinct to tell Black the truth is the right course of action and it actually feels a bit weird that she's not decisive on this.

And it was nice of EE to respond to so many points raised in the comments from the last chapter.

NerfGlastigUaine

Tvtropes has ruined me. I guessed it was Hanno the moment she thought he wasn't a Proceran. Some people probably caught it even earlier.

konstantinvoncarstein

I knew it was a Hero after she saw the light, and Hanno after she said he was not Proceran.

Liliet

Agreed. I'm honestly expecting Amadeus's sentiment to be the right course of action here, in the end. Throwing away attachments in the name of practicality/revenge is not a good path to take, and Catherine has already figured that out for herself – but not for him, yet. I suppose she still sees him as invulnerable in some ways, subconsciously – he's her teacher, her father, no way he needs to be swaddled in a blanket and protected for the cruel world, right? 😊

(he does)

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I love the reminder that when she's not in full "I am the Black Queen!" mode, Cat's personal apparel is apparently so basic and standard issue that she's easily mistaken for a soldier in her own army.

Liliet

Yep ♥

Catherine is only normally recognized because of the mantle of Woe, and even then, without proper context, even her own legionaries tend to not recognize her. Remember the Empress of Procer?

And her manner is that of a common legionary too, thanks to Rat Company. I wonder if Hanno deduced something was off about her the same way she thought he was not a mercenary, or if he genuinely thought her a regular soldier

Fayhem

> Remember the Empress of Procer?

I will never forget the Empress of Procer. That poor Empress watching his entire life flash before his eyes as he gets a strong lesson on why sassing randos for claiming to be somebody famous isn't a super safe policy on a continent filled with Named (and beings of equivalent narrative weight like F.U.N.!Catherine). So classic.

Liliet

And the terrifying Black Queen just sassing him right back with his own joke instead of smearing his remains across the ground as a lesson to everyone else? U N F O R G E T T A B L E

edrey

no scribe, he would find out soner or later, the story is too strong already to said the less. but she is right, he would forgive malicia, and to be honest Malicia only ""sin"" is to be proud of Praes culture, when is a shithole of treason, poison and extreme racism well, i wont say i didnt see it coming, but i was hoping for more, that teaser was way too much, i am thinking in the chat of the pilgrim and cat or the one with black in Peers, the wait will kill me here

laguz24

Personally, I think that Malicia isn't proud of her culture as too ingrained in its methods. She was never one of the true Praesi, in all their flying fortress, invisible army glory. As said by Diabolist, but she has been playing Chancellor so long that she has started to act like them with all of the stupidity that entails.

Mental Mouse

And a belated thought about this, slightly informed by the Epilogue: Part of the Role for Chancellor is to betray and topple the Tyrant. Who in this case is Malicia herself...

Liliet

TBF Malicia knifed Amadeus's trust in the back pretty badly. "Leap of faith", was it?

I find it utterly cute how frustrated Scribe is with Amadeus's self-sacrificial tendencies. SHE'S NOT WRONG ON THAT ONE

SpeckofStardust

On the other hand She's incorrect that he wouldn't be willing to purposefully kill his friends, he very much thought about how many would need to 'die' right before Captain bit it.

Liliet

Yeah, but that was for after he was dead. He wouldn't have to live with it, which makes the kind of selfish difference that would tip the scales on something this emotionally fraught.

All of Amadeus's friends agree that he forgives all of them everything. Both Wekesa and Hye estimated him as likely to forgive either of them killing Catherine, and Wekesa was angry at Hye for taking advantage of it (which gives additional delicious irony to Eudokia being angry at Wekesa taking advantage of it in turn). Alaya still expects him to forgive her and come back, not thinking of anything she did as crossing the line of no return.

Scribe's assessment might be off on where exactly the line is drawn, but the general tendency is correct :3

ninegardens

> Alaya still expects him to forgive her and come back, not thinking of anything she did as crossing the line of no return.

Well yeah. They had philosophical disagreements, and disagreements about HOW do get things done, but such is life. They're FAMILY (not literally, but whatever). Of course he'll forgive her.

And by the same token, she'll forgive him. Despite the fact that he took the (very stupid) plan she had sunk years and lives into and exploded it, she still seemed perfectly willing to dedicate a large portion of her spy service to getting him back the moment she realized he was in trouble.

They are angry at each other, and might even be wary of one another in the future, but I suspect, in a very real sense, Amadeus has already forgiven Alaya.

In terms of Maddie's forgiveness... I guess what Alaya's done so far might make Maddie a little wary of her in future... but fundamentally she HASN'T crossed that line of no return. Hence it makes perfect sense that she doesn't think she has.

The weird part in all this is that Scribe may be the only one in all this who HAS found a way to do something Maddie can not forgive: namely, she attacked a member of his family.

And probably the cruelest thing Black could do in response is to tell her to leave. Not hurt her, not fight her, simply tell her to get out of his life... and never come back.

Liliet

Yeah, I somehow doubt he won't forgive that, considering she is a member of his family too.

ninegardens

See- that's the thing I'm trying to figure out: Is scribe treated as Family? I've never seen anywhere in Black's thoughts or actions that suggests she is in quiet the same way... maybe it just hasn't come up. I dunno- for me it feels like it could go either way in terms of whether Scribe counts as family or not.

Death Knight

Just fuck already!

Sugar Roll

Come on man, this is their first meeting. Let them work their way into it. This isn't some low budget pornographic nonsense.

TeK

Yeah, sure Cat is totally not a Villain, how dare you suggest the opposite. Saint of Swords was totally unreasonable.

talene1

"I see no purpose to ever assuming the worst," he replied. "It seems like a tiring way to live."

This is when I really began to suspect.

"It is not my farm, if that is your question. I was given leave to use it while waiting for a friend."

This is when I knew. The point about him being from Thassalina and a foreigner, the description of his build, the point about him waiting for a friend (it had to be the Witch), the refusal to make even the slightest sort of assumption, it all fit. Then, each little clue went further and further to confirm it.

Liliet

I was like "so what oddly metaphysically significant character will this be" when Cat spotted the light, like.. really. That wasn't going to be a random nobody.

And then 'a tall dark-skinned man but not pure Soninke' and like ah. Hanno.

Receipts:

"Brow raising, I took a closer look. Not a Proceran, this one, at least not by birth: his skin had that Thalassina tone to it, too pale to be Soninke but too dark to be Taghreb. Tall and built like a working man, with fuzzy hair cropped even closer than even Legion regulations demanded, he'd shed his coat. Instead he wore a long-sleeved grey tunic he'd rolled up the sleeves of, and I let my gaze linger just a moment on the muscled forearms and calloused hands. He was rather plain-faced, I saw when he turned to glanced at me, and either clean-shaven or hairless. His dark brown eyes had a sense of steadiness to them, peace almost." oh pffff please tell me it's Hanno

talene l

Honestly I just wasn't sure at first whether this was going to Meeting a New and Important Character or Meeting Random Nobody Who Nevertheless Says Oddly Wise and Important Things. You know meeting the whole random peasant in the wilderness who spreads the wisdom of the common masses.

Liliet

True!

Mental Mouse

That was about when I started to get it....

NerfGlastigUaine

You know, this is the typical prelude to a romance between villain and hero, but if Cat doesn't see that coming from a mile away I'll eat my own foot.

NerfGlastigUaine

Guys, off topic, but I tried to measure the size of Calernia. So, in Chapter 19 of Book 3, Nauk says it'd take $1\frac{1}{2}$ months of marching to reach Laure from Marchford. Now, Roman legions could typically march around 30-35 km per day and Legions of Terror seem to be heavily inspired by them, so taking the lower bound, we can estimate that the distance between Marchford and Laure is ~ 1300 km. This is somewhat complicated by the fact that 1) there is a river cutting off Marchford from Laure, 2) the area around Marchford seems somewhat rocky if not outright mountainous on the map. Therefore it is possible that it is not 1300 km but likely somewhat less, taking into account terrain slowing down marching speed.

Now, I assumed the marching went around the river, not through, and decided to disregard the terrain and go with my initial assumption of 1300 km. With some quick calculations and use of Word, it seems as if the longest vertical length of Calernia from the tip of the Everdark to below Stygia is 5.4 times the length from Marchford to Laure (+ detour for river), so ~7020 km. For reference, South America's length is ~7600 km. Now, at its widest Calernia is roughly 4700 km wide with these calculations, which is only slightly smaller than South America's widest point of 5100 km, and Calernia has a more consistently large width than SA. However, it also has far more lakes, so I'd posit that the two are roughly similar in landmass with Calernia slightly larger.

Any thoughts? Disagreements? Questions on why I'm wasting my time on this when I have a test tomorrow?

laguz24

Unless you actually give hard numbers in distance or have two rivals going for the same goal space does not really matter. You could say it is 200 km and it took 2 days to get there, then we have problems. But everyone measures distance in time, as it took 2 weeks to march to the river etc. This is why we have the trope Sci-Fi writers have no sense of scale and sci-fi books attract people who actually care about such minutia.

Liliet

Erratic overshoots travel times. Calernia is about the size of Europe iirc

Mental Mouse

Rather than Erratic overshooting, it may be that the Legions simply aren't as fast as the Roman troops that they're loosely modeled after. Especially if they don't have roads to the same standard. In particular, I haven't seen mention of the "Roman stride", which IIRC I heard about from Kipling.

Liliet

I think they probably have the training to move fast, but the roads account for the rest of the loss. Praes has Roman-like roads, and Amadeus specifically had the same ones built in Callow for troop movement, but Procer? Yeah... Конь да путник, али вам не туго...

Fayhem

My advanced linguistics training (read: Google Translate) tells me you just said "A horse yes traveler, but you are not sad...".

Is that a, uh, regional saying? Or has my advanced linguistics training somehow failed me? Maybe both?

Rey d`Tutto

Same...

Andrew Mitchell

Sisters, I hope that IS what she said.
hahahahahahaha ♥

Liliet

It's a song quote.

Конь да путник, али вам не туго,
Кабы впрямь в пути не околеть,
Бездорожье одолеть – не штука,
А вот как дорогу одолеть?

И у черта, и у бога
На одном, видать, счету
Ты, российская дорога –
Семь загибов за версту!

(first stanza and the chorus) (it's from a movie abt 19th century Russia, but it applies in spirit to this day and not only in Russia proper)

Rough translation... oh wow this is HARD. These idioms are really... local 0.0

Horse and traveler, isn't it hard for you,
How do we really not die on the road,
It's not that hard to manage off road,
But how do we manage the road?

Both the devil and the god
Probably have the same accounting
For you, the Russian road –
Seven turns in a mile!

Fun Google translate facts: 'да' is normally translated as (and means) 'yes', but can also be used as a rare/antiquated/literary homonym meaning 'and'

...I'm just going to translate the other two stanzas to,
for full context of the reference.

Нет ухаба – значит, будет яма,
Рытвина, правей-левей – кювет,
Эх, дорога, ты скажи нам прямо,
По тебе ли ездят на тот свет!

No bump – there will be a pit,
Pothole and a ditch to the left and to the right,
Hey, road, tell it to us straight,
Are you the one used to travel to the afterlife?

Но согласны и сапог, и лапоть –
Как нам наши версты не любить!
Ведь браниться здесь мудрей, чем плакать,
А спастись – легче, чем ловить!

But both boot and bast shoe agree –
How could we not love our miles!
After all, swearing here is wiser than crying,
And fleeing is easier than catching!

Fayhem

...I am still not sure I understand (local idioms indeed), but I do appreciate your thoughtfulness in providing such a thorough translation!

Andrew Mitchell

What Fayem said. ^^ Thank you.

Mental Mouse

Thank you! Fictional cultures can be fun, I'm always happy to get glimpses of other cultures in our world!

Also, I got a good snicker out of "Hey, road, tell it to us straight / Are you the one used to travel to the afterlife?" That's a rough road!

NerfGlaistigUaine

Huh, is that WoG? B/c last time I asked about Calernia size it sparked a ton of interesting speculation, a lot of it by caiomhinh which was basis of this calculation, but no definitive answer.

I actually think Legions might be faster than Roman legions. When William summons the Hashmalim he and Bard talk and say Cat and the Fifteenth could flee before the angel arrives, e specifically says it's "more than enough time," which means they could travel 49 miles (79 km) in two days. Admittedly, it's a two day sprint rather than a months long march, but it definitely suggests Legion march time is at least comparable to Roman legions.

Until WoG intercedes all we can do is speculate based on textual information. Personally, I like to have a mental map of things while reading.

Liliet

True! I just don't see it as making sense for Calernia to be that big while having so few notable cities.

Erratic tends to avoid specific numbers, which is wise considering he's mixed up cardinal directions before XD and I don't remember if there's WoG... but I find it easier to file 'travel times' than 'number of cities' as 'ehhhhh not quite'

Mental Mouse

> I just don't see it as making sense for Calernia to be that big while having so few notable cities.

This may be tied to the gnome thing – cities of course predate modern technology, but advanced technology certainly allowed promoting a lot of towns into cities – especially when farming got more efficient and displaced workers started looking for somewhere else to make their living. There's also the population question – how many people in Calernia? They do have regular wars to cut down on the population....

NZPIEFACE

I'm shipping.

SpeckofStardust

So anyone else thinking that the wall their taking about is a presentation of either Procer or the accords at their current state, cause you know it totally is meaningful.

Aotrs Commander

Well, I at least completely missed it until the reveal.

(I do insist on reading these first thing in the morning though...)

Liliet

God I love Catherine clasping his wrist in a legionary handshake as she introduces herself so much.

There's just something so... friendly about her using that gesture in particular

Frolamiz

So much foreshadowing, I love it!

Just think about it, Hanno is trying to build something, then Cat come and tell him it will not work. Then there is their exchange about optimism and pessimism...

The obvious metaphor would be the Liesse accords, but EE is generally not that predictable and it could mean so many more things!

Anyway, I'm sure it's another "'till your last desperate breath clawing at the dark" that we will rediscover after rereading.

axusgrad

Commence the chess metaphors !

superkeaton

Its about time. Hilarious that Cat got the introduction drop on a hero, she hasn't gotten to do that since she geeked those kids, but they were rookies, not Heaven's Current Favorite. Looking forward to this.

Liliet

What kids?

Sun Dog

The ones from the start of the.. last book, I think? Stalwart Paladin, the Dashing Brigand, and whatever the caster called himself.

Thane

EE,
You're killin' me. You have a gift(a curse) of fulfilling everything I want in an update but then, making me want even more. It's beautiful(painful).

I have wanted for this meeting practically since you introduced hanno.

Thanks for the beautiful story you tell us

aran

Uhhhh... checkmate?

NerfContessa

B2ahahahahaq,. Oh man, priceless ending.

As for scribe, she has by nature of her 20 years of work, lost perspective.

But she might be correct regarding the outcome between black and malicia.

Still, she's a. Liability.

Chapter 75: Analog

"I assure you, Chancellor, that with but a few words they'll come around to agreeing with me. Almost like an incantation, really."

– Dread Emperor Imperious

Good grip, I thought, as he clasped my arm tightly once back before withdrawing.

"I was warned about you," the White Knight conversationally said.

He was a dangerous man, I knew, for heroes usually were. Yet I did not feel particularly endangered, for by all reports Hanno of Arwad was not the sort of madman who'd draw a sword thoughtlessly. I leaned on my staff to push myself up on the low cattle-wall, pressing my cloak against the back of my leg with my other hand so it wouldn't bunch up. That's better, I thought. Took the weight off my bad leg.

"Were you?" I replied. "You don't seem all that worried."

"Not that sort of warning," he said. "The Grey Pilgrim called you a thresher."

My brow rose. I was a city girl to the bone, true enough, but it was still a Callowan city. I knew a thing or two about farming, if only in principle.

"Like for grain?" I asked, cocking my head to the side.

He had a rather honest face, I decided, for all that it was plain. The calm on it wasn't affectation, no. It was just the consequence of being so amiably unruffled by all that went on around him, perhaps not even something he knew he showed.

"One that separates the wheat from the chaff," the White Knight quoted. "He argued that there are Bestowals that, by their nature, draw to them both great loyalty and great enmity."

"Sounds like Tariq," I conceded. "Mind you, I've always found he throws words like 'fate' around a little too easily. Anyone who ends up making waves will draw both enemies and allies, there's nothing magical about it."

"There is, when so many of those allies were once your enemies," Hanno said. "I am told that most of your closest companions fought you at some point or another."

Well, not that many. Indrani had introduced herself by ambushing me, I conceded. Vivienne too. Juniper and I hadn't exactly begun as bosom friends, and there was a reason that I'd ripped Akua's heart out of her chest. Shit. Hakram had always been a delight, though! And Robber had mostly been other people's problem, which by goblin standards was positively saintly. I forcefully refrained from thinking too much about how the Everdark had turned out for all involved.

"Oh Gods," I muttered. "I genuinely can't argue with that."

If I'd lost that argument in my own head, I somehow doubted it'd go my way spoken aloud. The hero softly chuckled.

"It is not unlike sculpting, I've found," Hanno said. "What your hand knows, what you have crafted, is not what the eyes of others see."

"Been mistaken a few times, have you?" I asked.

He agreed with a nod.

"Often it is misunderstood what the Choir of Judgement is," the White Knight said. "I've been asked to adjudicate land disputes, to settle disagreements over scripture and once even to decide on the rightful owner of cattle."

He breathed out, as if exasperated by the whole of it.

"The Seraphim do not attend to earthly laws or even holy writ, Black Queen," Hanno of Arwad said. "They render only one manner of judgement and it is not fettered by anything of Creation."

"That'd be the spinning coin and the," I mimed a blade across the throat, "I take it?"

"If the coin spun for ever soul on Calernia, it would show the laurels more often than not," the White Knight said. "The circumstances in which it is prone to spinning, however, have favoured the showing of the swords."

"And that doesn't bother you?" I asked.

He cocked his head to the side.

"Why would it?" the White Knight asked. "If only wicked men are judged, why would another end come of it?"

"And you don't think you're passing judgement as well?" I frowned.

"That is not my place," he said.

"The coin doesn't flip on its own, you know," I pointed out. "And as far as I know, you don't toss it for everyone you meet."

The hero looked frustrated, but only in passing. I supposed I hadn't been the first person to say as much to him. He was one of the great Names of our generation, true, but he was also a pretty personable man all things considered.

"You are Queen of Callow," the White Knight said.

"Don't suppose you could get me that in writing?" I drily said.

If getting the Sword of Judgement to put it to parchment didn't end up settling the legitimacy of my rule, nothing ever would. He blinked, visibly bemused.

"Ignore that," I sighed. "Yes, I am Queen of Callow. Couple other titles too, but that's the highest one."

"Then, unless I am mistaken, you have right of high justice over all in your kingdom," Hanno said.

That was slightly more complicated an issue than you'd think, actually. High justice – essentially the right to sit in judgement of anyone no matter how high their birth and the severity of their crime – had been moved around some these last few decades. Before the Conquest the answer would have been a straightforward yes, as the ruling king or queen of Callow had been one of the few figures able to sit in judgement over anyone. Under Black the right of high justice had in theory devolved to the imperial governors, though in practice he'd been the one holding it: though his authority came from the Tower and not a crown, he'd been the only man in the kingdom would could sit in judgement of both governors and the remaining nobles. It was no without reason that when I'd called my teacher the crownless king of Callow not even the Choir of Contrition had gainsaid me. These days my kingdom's laws were a messy jumble of old Praesi decrees and dusty Callowan laws, but as the anointed Queen of Callow I did in principle have right of high justice. If I started going after the few nobles left through even legal means, though, I'd have a rebellion on my hands. I'd allowed my court to squeeze the northern baronies in their coin purse but nowhere else, and Gods forbid I ever try to pass judgement on Duchess Kegan even if she ate a full cartload of babies in broad daylight before a hundred witnesses.

"By law I do," I conceded.

"As one with the right to pass judgement over any Callowan," Hanno said, "did you then proceed to drag every man and woman you encountered before a tribunal?"

My brow rose.

"You don't stand judgement in Callow without having broken a law," I said.

"And I do not bring into the gaze of the Seraphim every soul I encounter without reason," the White Knight replied. "Nor would I stand benumbed and allow a life to be taken before my eyes while I asked for their verdict. I do not judge, Catherine Foundling, because I recognize the fallibility of what I am and what I know. It does not mean I am blind or helpless: it means that where others have no choice but to be burdened with uncertainty, I am not."

That was rather more reasonable than I'd expected of the man, I admitted to myself. My brushes with Choirs had been less than pleasant, most of the time, so I'd been predisposed to seeing lunacy lurking in one who had openly sworn himself to do the bidding of one. Black had been less than flattering in his assessments of the man, too, though he'd also cautioned that the White Knight was both intelligent and an exceedingly dangerous and versatile killer. Then again, I could hardly imagine my father ever sitting down to have a polite chat with a hero – or the opposite, in all fairness. Over two decades of the Calamities smothering heroes in their narrative crib had rather thoroughly burned that bridge for both sides. I still found the notion of the Seraphim being considered an authority over even a chamber pot rather revolting, but hardly enough to draw a blade over it. So long as that authority was not forced on anyone, and it stayed well out of my kingdom, it fell under the category of 'someone else's problem'. If the nations of the west wanted to grant the right of high justice to the Choir of Judgement, that was their decision to make.

Of course, there was one little issue with all this.

"And villains?" I asked. "Don't they always get a flip, White Knight?"

He smiled, though it was a distant sort of smile. One straddling the line between reminiscence and the aloofness of professional attending their trade. He stood before me, little more than a well-built man in cloth, and still he spoke with an authority that could not be denied. Conviction was at the heart of Names, I knew, and this one did not lack faith. Black was one of the finest hero-killers Calernia had ever known, and he'd gone after Hanno with the full roster of the Calamities while the White Knight led a disparate band of greenhorns. And the man stood before me still. Some of that could be laid at the Bard's feet, at her schemes, but only so much. Even the Intercessor could not make a sharp blade out of straw.

"Are all those that worship the Gods Above to be called Good?" Hanno replied.

"No," I said. "But worshipping Below is against the scriptures, isn't it? Heresy."

"Do you worship Below?" he asked.

"I curse in their name, mostly," I drawled, rather amused. "But I've been called an odd duck amongst my kind. Most villains do in fact keep to the Gods Below."

I knew Hakram did, though it was in the orc way under the name of the Hungry Gods. He wasn't particularly pious, though, and considered it a private matter besides. Indrani's utter indifference to all things religious probably counted as some sort of heresy, I was pretty sure, and while Akua worshipped the Hellgods in that very Praesi way that did not exclude attempted murder and usurpation that worship was not less sincere for it. That her growing fondness for heroics had not been paired with conversion to the ways of the House of Light had been a source of some amusement to me, particularly since even if she was a Wasteland aristocrat she knew her way around the Book of All Things better than I did.

"The Choir of Judgement does not follow scripture," Hanno reminded me. "It was written by mortal hands, a fetter like any other."

"But if a villain, say, made a carriage out of skulls," I said, then let the sentence hang.

"Graverobbing is not a particular concern of the Seraphim," the White Knight replied, sounding almost amused. "Especially when it is only presumptive."

"But you'd keep an eye on them, after that," I shrewdly said.

"As I would keep an eye on a man walking into a house with a bared sword," Hanno said.

While the man in front of me was far from an idiot – I suspected he'd be deeply unpleasant to argue with – I wouldn't assess him as the kind of silver-tongued schemer I'd come across more than a few times. Oh, it was possible a long game was being played even if he was a hero. But my instinct was that he was much as he put himself forward, and I'd stayed alive this long by listening to that little voice when it tugged at my attention. And right now that voice was telling me that the White Knight didn't have to be my enemy. I didn't relish the notion of angels passing judgement through someone else's hand, and I very much doubted that Hanno would stay his work even if I asked him to pretty please do so, but he could be accommodated. If he worked within the bounds of the Accords, and even worked to enforce them? Hells, he might be a legitimate boon. Heroes would follow the Grey Pilgrim out of respect for the man, but if the White Knight endorsed something a lot of people would take that as the blessing of the Choir of Judgement. There were parts of the continent where that carried a great deal of weight. Even now, after the Tenth Crusade and the fury that'd followed the Salian conclaves, Callow was still one of them.

Everything he'd said fit with what I knew of his actions. He'd come to be involved in the Free Cities because the Tyrant had started a war, and as far as I knew never fought where there wasn't a villain involved. He'd come as part of the southern crusade, which was a mark against him, but it was largely Black he'd been there for. And while I loved my father a great deal, I couldn't deny that he was a monster twice over. I believed him to be the man who'd stood between Praes and its worst impulses for decades, and perhaps the monster needed to reform the Dread Empire into a nation that wouldn't vomit its poison over the rest of Calernia every few decades, but that in no way made him a good man. It was not unjustified, to want to kill him. That didn't mean I'd allow it, or that it would not make things objectively worse if it happened, but I wouldn't delude myself into thinking that Amadeus of the Green Stretch was not a monster. He was other things, too, but that didn't expunge the first truth from him. In the end, I didn't have a lot of axes to grind with the White Knight and he'd proved one of the more reasonable heroes I'd come across. Hanno had even gone north to fight the Dead King and only returned to prevent the Tyrant from having a continent-collapsing tantrum.

In all honesty, that put him pretty high up my list of people who hadn't severely fucked up in the last year. He had Black beat, for one.

"You don't take issue with mortal laws, then," I said.

"It would be absurd to," he noted. "Lest the Heavens themselves rule, what other way is there?"

"And if those laws applied to even Named?" I pressed.

"A law need not be just," Hanno of Arwad said. "It need only be a law. I would no more bend my neck to such a wrong than any other threat."

"I'm not talking about settling right and wrong for all of Calernia," I said. "That's doomed. Howling Hells, let's not even talk about Good and Evil – not even all of Good agrees on the same boundaries. No, I mean basics. You can't tell Named that regicide is over, neither heroes nor villains would obey that. But limiting the means by which it can be done? That might work. And it'd end the practice of burning down half a city to kill a tyrant or usurp a throne."

"Not laws, these," the White Knight said, eyes curious, "but rather rules of engagement."

My veins thrummed with excitement, because unlike Tariq he'd not needed to be led to that. He'd grasped it, quickly, and did not seem opposed in the slightest. The dark-eyed hero let out a little noise of understanding.

"Ah," he said. "I see now your cleverness in making such rules so basic. If the expectation placed is so low and Named still fail to clear it, none will desire to support them. Neither others who bear mantles nor the powerful without, for only the erratic would break such bare bones rules. The vast majority of Named will see their lives go untouched, with only the most radical being restricted."

He paused, looking at me with an expression I found difficult to place.

"This is more than rules of engagement," the White Knight said, "this is a blade swung at the most callous servants of Above and Below. Within a few generations of grand gestures being harshly answered by all other powers, you would excise that entire manner of thinking from the Named on Calernia."

Not even Black had caught that, I thought. Oh, he'd seen parts of the Accords as being meant to restrain the most destructive aspects of Praes, but he'd not really gotten it because at the end of the day he did not think of stories the way I did. He'd stayed alive as villain occupying my home, a hotbed of rebellion, by avoiding ever getting caught in a story or pattern that'd get him killed. Unlike me, unlike Akua even, he only rarely wielded like a weapon. It was the same with the Pilgrim, I thought, in his own way. Tariq carried around on his back the weight of all his tragedies but at heart he was a guest in the stories of others. Sometimes a guest who ended that story before it could grow into something dangerous, others a wise old man who nudged it to something more acceptable, but the Peregrine as an entity remained... constant. Always playing the same few roles in different stories. He'd know a great many of those, but it would be his nature to think of them as a landscape he'd travelled far and wide. Not something that could shift and change.

"If the flying fortress crowd and the Contrition-ritual crowd always die, always fail? People will remember that," I quietly agreed. "Gods know it'll be public enough when the hammer's brought down. And when it's been happening for long enough, well, everyone will 'know' that sort of thing doesn't work. Same way heroes don't die when they're thrown down cliffs or villains don't get beaten on the first step of their plan."

"And with most Named having a stake in ensuring at least the barest of civility is maintained between their kind, the odds are strong that your rules will last long enough to make that mark," Hanno said. "It is a sound notion."

"Then you'd be in favour of such a set of rules?" I asked.

He half-smiled.

"They did warn me," the White Knight pensively said.

I almost cursed. Gods, let this not turn into a damned flop where by simple nature of having been proposed by a villain this entire concept was to be dismissed as a plot of Below. That would be bitterly disappointing after the rest of this conversation.

"I've not spoken a single lie," I said.

"Which makes you singularly dangerous," Hanno agreeably replied.

My fingers clenched until the knuckles went white under the gloves.

"Ah, you misunderstand me," the White Knight said. "That you are silver-tongued and perhaps one of the most dangerous people alive does not mean I am dismissing your proposal, Black Queen."

"Then what does it mean?" I asked.

"That I understand what the Grey Pilgrim meant, now," Hanno of Arwad said. "You have a pull, Catherine Foundling, that drags others into your wake: either as followers or as wreckage. I am glad to have seen it myself before we first met on formal terms. It would have been startling."

That last part he spoke ruefully, as if mocking himself.

"There doesn't need to be anything mystical about this," I insisted. "I don't have sole claim to the Accords, not in the slightest. I speak for them because I'm in a position to, not because they're solely my horse to ride. I don't know what you think-"

"I very nearly agreed," the White Knight amusedly said. "Just now. Without thinking twice. After speaking with you for not even an hour. Because you are reasonable, well-spoken and even charming in what I assume to be a rough Callowan way."

That last one was kind of insulting, I decide, but the rest pretty flattering. I cleared my throat.

"Still not too late to agree now," I gallantly tried.

"No, perhaps not," Hanno calmly replied, "but it is certainly too early."

He suddenly twitched, head turning to look at the far south. I couldn't hear or see anything, at this distance, and it might be a little gauche to call on Night to aid my senses next to the Sword of Judgement so I refrained out of politeness.

"My friend is returning," the White Knight said.

It took a moment for me to place it.

"The Witch of the Woods?" I asked.

He dipped his head in agreement.

"A great she-wolf walks with her," he said. "Neither are fond of cities."

"I'll take my leave, then," I said.

I could on occasion recognize a hint when it was sent my way. I dropped down onto the snow, softening the blow with my staff, and tightened my cloak around my shoulder. Wouldn't be too long a walk back to camp and I probably should head to bed – I had quite the day ahead of me tomorrow.

"Good night to you, White Knight," I said, dipping my head in salute.

"And to you, Black Queen," he replied, doing the same.

I cleared the path, though as I crossed back into the plains I was stopped by a call.

"I expect they will not grow fonder of cities overnight," Hanno said.

He wasn't speaking loudly, but his voice carried perfectly.

"Might be I go for a walk, then," I replied without glancing back.

The yew staff dug into the snow as I limped back home – thump, thump, thump – and I wondered if it truly should go. There might come a day where the coin went up spinning in judgement of me, after all. Not this winter, not this year, maybe not even this decade. But one day? Oh, there'd been a shiver of that going through the conversation. Violence coiled and controlled but never too far from the surface. As a younger woman that might have disturbed me, but these days it simply marked him to my eye as someone able to handle strength properly. Still, I now understood why many heroes deferred to that man: he was so utterly at peace with the power he wielded and what he wielded it for that looking on the surface of that placid pond you'd only ever see your own doubts reflected. I wondered if he'd hesitate, if on that day the coin showed swords. I wondered if I'd hesitate to kill him before the coin ever began spinning.

Neither yew nor snow held answers for me, save that when night came again I would return.

copaceticcockroach

Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

bless ya

Javvies

Huh.

I think Hanno is probably going to come down in favor of the Accords in general, even if he disagrees on some of the details. This is a good thing.

I wonder what the Witch of the Woods will think. Of both the Accords and Hanno and Cat talking. And I fully expect her to walk in on then tomorrow night.

Insanenoodlyguy

... While they are kissing! Added the last bit in you forgot.

TheAtomicOption

in bed! :0

Insanenoodlyguy

Hey now, Hanna is a good boy. Cat is going to have to have a third date at least before she can get him to go that far.

caoimhinh

Yeah, seems legit.
Patterns of Three and all that.

Sugar Roll

Half-naked!

A K

I don't think servants of the Choir of Judgement do halves.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Sure they do. A half of you here and a half of you there.

caoimhinh

If Cat is half-naked when the Witch arrives, or even rolling on the floor with her arms around Hanno, she was either being really convincing on her sell of the Accords, or negotiations broke down and they were fighting.

It is surprising how many situations Cat has been involved where she actually ended half-naked without anything sexual or romantic going on.

To the top of my head, the list includes:

- Masego operating to rip off a piece of her soul to extirpate the corrupted Seek Aspect
- Masego putting the seal on the Moon Heart the Winter King gave Cat
- Masego doing regular mystical medical check-ups on her (LMAO, Masego has seen Cat naked and put his fingers in her more times than Indrani has)
- The multiple times she got ripped apart in battle and her armor broken but she regenerated thanks to Winter. (Battle of the Camps, the Spellsword, in the Ever Dark)

Andrew Mitchell

> LMAO, Masego has seen Cat naked and put his fingers in her more times than Indrani has Funny, but objectively untrue. Cat and Indrani shared a bed regularly for months.

Javvies

Yeah, but Masego was poking around in Cat's insides for years. Since before they even met Indrani. And we know he did a lot offscreen.

Sure, Masego probably wasn't examining Cat at the frequency Cat and Indrani were enjoying each other (most of the time, anyways) ... but Masego had way more time to work with than Indrani did.

Andrew Mitchell

Good points. I concede that my "objectively untrue" was wrong. My view now is that the question isn't really decidable either way.

> Masego was poking around in Cat's insides for years

I feel that's stretching it quite a bit. But it's just a feeling because I don't have a good understanding of time in the guideverse.

> And we know he did a lot offscreen.

True. Masego was checking Cat's soul regularly, but we don't really know how often.

Javvies

Masego first poked around Cat's innards before First Marchford. Before Indrani even showed up. So he started in early book 2.

On the other hand, Masego most likely only poked around inside Cat regularly after she got Winter Fae powers, so early-ish book 3, since before that he only needed to poke around as one-off medical treatments for specific injuries.

I'm not entirely sure how long it would be ... but likely a minimum of two or three years, counting the timeskips.

stevenneiman

I've been feeling a lot more sympathetic towards Hanno now that we've actually seen him in his dealings with people other than instant enemies. And seen that he actually does more than just ask for advice on who to kill and then kill them.

And yeah, the Witch is definitely an unknown quantity. I don't recall if we've ever seen a characterizing moment from her, unless you count Hanno saying she doesn't like cities.

matesbe

This whole conversation was gold. I think that Hanno might really be the great proponent of the accords on the Heroes' side. I think that Hanno and Cat might actually become sort of friends eventually, though the fact that Hanno might one day try and kill Cat will always be there between them. They both know that as far as the Seraphim are concerned, that coin might just flip swords for Cat.

mingablo

Time for the wacky sitcom spinoff.

konstantinvoncarstein

It seems too good to be true, having a Hero who agrees with the Accords after one conversation.

Andrew Mitchell

He specifically wanted to agree, but didn't. Which is quite sensible IMO.

There's going to be quite a range of reactions from Heroes. Hanno's an important data point, but just one. Honestly, there's bound to be some that say "no accord with Villians, ever"; Laurence was one example. But mostly, I expect most will sign on, after much discussion & debate, because signing The Accords is the right thing for all people to stop the worst excesses of both sides.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, thinking before accepting a treaty is extremely sensible 😊 But the fact that his first reaction was to accept said treaty (proposed by one of the most infamous and canny Villain of his generation) is surprising. The fact that it seems to happen just like Catherine want makes me fear that something very unpleasant is about to occur.

Liliet

Not really. It's a mixture of (1) Catherine leading up to it from the angle she previously got Hanno to agree on, (2) her force-of-nature charisma. It's exactly the thing that happens when you are really good at getting people to agree with you which is exactly the skill Catherine has, and has been commented on many, many, many times.

Mental Mouse

> her force-of-nature charisma.

Well, that's the thing. Her charisma isn't just a matter of skill at manipulation, or even persuasiveness. Hanno's response makes it clear that he's recognizing a "narrative power", where Cat tends to sweep up people in her wake. Hanno doesn't easily get swept up, because he's a major player in his own right – but he can certainly feel the pressure.

Fortunately, he's not contrary enough to oppose her just because something's pushing him, but he (quite reasonably) wants a double-check (from someone with serious magical defenses) before he decides to go with the flow on this.

Mental Mouse

> ... the fact that Hanno might one day try and kill Cat will always be there between them.

Which is nothing new for Cat, from either side! Pilgrim, Kairos, Akua, Black...

Liliet

I mean ffs, she set that up deliberately as a precaution with Vivienne.

therealgridlock

No, even worse, instead of the Swords, what if she gets the Laurels?

I mean... She got something out of contrition, she argued her way to something with mercy, it wouldn't surprise me that she manages to do enough good or make an argument to judgement that she gets a pass from them too.

Imagine if you will... Cat, black queen, arch heretic, gets personal approval from all seven choirs. Truly a Lord of... Neutral.

Alivaril

"Neither yew nor snow held answers for me, save that when night came again I would vote for <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> ."

Insanenoodlyguy

"I very nearly agreed," the White Knight amusedly said. "Just now. Without thinking twice. After speaking with you for not even an hour. Because you are reasonable, well-spoken and even vote for PGTE on topwebfiction."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

The only choice that matters

Is it really necessary to spam that link three times?

Ezario Gerion

Sadly, yes. I forgot about voting and noticed only third comment .

caoimhinh

Usually when the earliest readers open the link, there are few to no comments. So sometimes it happens that after they finish reading and decide to put the link to Topwebfiction, somebody else is doing the same.

Coincidences happen sometimes, I personally like it when they do it in a creative way, it's pretty cool in my opinion.

Personally, I was gonna go with:

"You don't take issue with readers' votes, then," I said.

"It would be absurd to," he noted. "Lest the Authors themselves vote, what other way is there?"

and then add the link, but when I reached the end of the page I saw the first comment already had it so there was no need.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I don't know who started this tradition but I love it.

Shikkarasu

"If the flying fortress crowd and the Contrition-ritual crowd always Vote, without fail? People will remember that," I quietly agreed. "And when it's been happening for long enough, well, everyone will 'know' that sort of thing works."

Insanenoodlyguy

It's definitely more fun than just posting "vote."

The downside is, that can be posted as soon as the chapters up. You actually have to read the damn thing if you want to find a good line, which makes the likes of us slower.

Liliet

Also it's cringey and awful, though YMMV of course.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Between the perceived prominence of your commentary on this series as a whole and your dislike of so-bad-it's-good forms of comedy I fear you will soon be given an offer you can't refuse from a man in black plate armor. Be careful out there.

Liliet

I hate these and find them incredibly cringey, and strongly prefer regular 'vote now' or something else that isn't clever / quoting the text

I am aware that mine is the minority opinion -_-

Andrew Mitchell

I like them too. ♥

copaceticcockroach

This chapter feels like a good day for Cat, so who's going to ruin her day? And we haven't see the Tyrant for a while, let's see how fast Cat's day will go down.

Soronel Haetir

Cat's all set up to run into the one wearing Captain's skin. I suspect Cat will not look on that favorably even if it does not come to blows.

My very own name

Does she know that Captain could skin change? I'm not sure. Perhaps only Black will recognize that.

Logan Marchman

I really enjoyed this chapter! And absolutely think it would be fitting to see Hanno and Cat get together

Liliet

Rafaella is in the north.

Insanenoodlyguy

Hanno will prove to be kinda crap in the sack.

Liliet

I mean the night kind of started from that argument with Scribe that ended with her devolving into a surly child ("Fine", Catherine? Really?), so the balance holds so far --

copaceticcockroach

I believe when good things and bad things that happen in a day are balanced, it's a good day for a villain.

Cicero

The fact that Hanno did not simply agree to the Accords, nor reject them, but wants to think about them before deciding, is actually rather encouraging.

If he supports them (and I think he is currently inclined too) it will be because he believes it is the right choice. Not because he thinks it convenient, or the situation compels him too, or because he wants Catherine's favor for something else. But because he actually believes in the core of the Accords themselves.

That would mean that the Accords would gain a supporter on the Heroic side who will support them the same way Catherine does. Not merely for the surface reasons, but because he understands and support the greater goal.

talenel

Huh, I still think he's going to decide whether to support the accords or not by flipping his coin. Because I can't see him ridding himself entirely of uncertainty about them. And if he has doubts, then he'll need something else to judge.

sengachi

As he said though, the Choir of Judgement does not speak to mortal laws.

axusgrad

Don't the gods Above and Below both have a stake in keeping the stories (and Named) coming? If they're sending the Bard to do as much as possible to stop the Liesse Accords, they wouldn't hesitate to rig a coin flip.

Liliet

Accords aren't about destroying either stories or Named, only to curb the worst excesses. If anything, they make the whole shebang less likely to spontaneously self-destruct, making them in Gods' interest and to a degree even Bard's, decreased influence or no – if decreased influence comes with reduced workload, who'd say no to that?

>If they're sending the Bard to do as much as possible to stop the Liesse Accords

Are they?

Andrew Mitchell

> Accords aren't about destroying either stories or Named, only to curb the worst excesses.

Exactly.

nick012000

He himself says that the Choir of Justice only levies one kind of judgement: absolution or death. If he flips his coin on the Accords, it'd pen him into one of two options: support them, or kill everyone who does support them. I'm not sure he'd be interested in taking that risk.

caoimhinh

Just imagine:

Catherine presents the Accords document to Hanno and he flips the Coin of Judgement. The coin falls on Laurels, so the swords' image is burned into the parchment.

It can be taken as signature XD

talenel

I think of it more as an absolute yes or no. It can't make a good judgment over where to set a property line or something like that, but it can only answer simple questions

Andrew Mitchell

Nah. The Seraphim judge souls, not human agreements.

Javvies

It's not entirely clear how willing to communicate with Hanno the Seraphim are.

He might be able to get a response on whether or not they think he should support the Accords or not. On the other hand, since their means of communicating with him is a bit binary ... they could like 99.999%, but their response could still be no because of that 0.001% they don't like.

It's also unclear as to what Hanno's determination not to judge covers and doesn't cover. Clearly, it covers people, and when he's been asked to arbitrate disputes he flips the coin, issuing the judgment of the Seraphim, not his. On the other hand, he is clearly contemptuous of the Conclave, but that could just be because they tried to claim the right to judge Cat the Arch-Heretic of the East. However, this discussion seemed to imply that he might be willing to support the Accords without any sort of indication that he wasn't going to judge them and instead he'd be consulting the Seraphim for their judgement.

Like ... where does Hanno's determination not to judge because he isn't qualified end, and where does the necessity to make basic comparative value decisions begin? Ie, if he were to go hunting or something, would he need to flip the coin on every deer he sees until he finds one that comes up swords, or can he make the decision on which deer he should try to take without the coin?

Andrew Mitchell

I think you've raised some excellent questions about the communication between the Seraphim and Hanno and where Hanno calls on the Seraphim and where he doesn't. I'm sure we'll learn more about those questions during the remainder of the Guide.

My comment to @talenel was specifically in relation to flipping a coin on the Accords and I wasn't commenting on any other ways the Seraphim might communicate.

It's clear that Hanno won't flip a coin on the Accords because (A) we've only seen that Hanno uses the coin on people, and (b) Hanno said in this chapter that flipping the coin on a person brings their souls to the gaze of the Seraphim ("If the coin spun for ever soul on Calernia, it would show the laurels more often than not" and "And I do not bring into the gaze of the Seraphim every soul I encounter without reason"). These points together meant that it would now be absurd for the coin to be used on the Accords. We know EE is a better writer than that.

Soronel Haetir

I still think that when the coin goes spinning for Cat it's going to come up edgies.

IDKWhoitis

Is that the equivalent of an Angelic shrug?

Or is it more Fate having fun?

Raivshard

Strangely enough, I I think that would actually make sense.

Sylwoos

Doubtful Cat would ever allow this coin to land at all.

konstantinvoncarstein

Amadeus try to interrupt the spinning and was smacked in the pavement by the Seraphim. If Catherine try that, the collateral damages from the fight between 2 gods will be ugly. It why Catherine spoke of killing him before the coin spin.

Mental Mouse

Amadeus tried to interrupt Hanno's initial invocation – that is, he attacked while Hanno was actually in direct contact with the Seraphim. I'd say that's why he got smacked down, when Cordelia didn't.

ninegardens

That said, I suspect that the fact that Cordelia could touch the coin at all was shenanigans.

We've seen Hanno flip his coin THROUGH A ROOF and catch it again as if the roof wasn't even there. The fact that Cordelia could touch the coin was purely because she had the authority to do so (both legal and narrative authority).

Cat just... doesn't have such authority. Sve Noc probably don't either.

Hierarch possibly does...

Also, I'm now imagining Hanno flipping the coin on Cat, and the coin goes up.... and then just doesn't come back down.

And Hanno and Cat are left standing there "Huh.... now what?"

Soronel Haetir

Cordelia was in the middle of her bestowal as Warden of the West at the moment she grabbed the coin. It was only after she had it that she rejected that Name.

Liliet

Agreed! Cordelia catching the coin was absolutely symbolic/narrative shenanigans of the Choir of Judgement going "fair enough"

Decius

I maintain that when the coin is flipped for Catherine a raven snatches it from the air.

And if he tries to flip it on Masego it will come up heads. Even though it didn't even have a bust of Masego, owner of Judgement, engraved on the obverse before it was flipped.

IDKWhoitis

This ship is gaining speed. Lots of Speed.

Hanno is probably the first Hero that Cat has looked forward to meeting again, and so soon.

And Hanno was saying all sorts of nice things, when he famously doesn't like to judge people one way or another...

(Come on Judgement, Cat isn't that bad of a girl... OK maybe she's much worse. But this could totally work.)

talenel

I think you might be trying to support your ship. Because I see nothing to indicate that Cat or Hanno is really interested that way. That coin seems to hover over everything. I'm unsure if Hanno will ever be able to get truly close to someone else as long as it's omnipresent.

Sugar Roll

I don't know, it sounds like a great story to me. Hanno gets attracted to a bad girl and then he gets to straighten her out. Not in a redemption story kind of way but in shifting Cat's tastes on romantic interests.

ninegardens

I mean... I'm not sure from what we've seen that Hanno gets "Attracted" in quite the sense you are discussing. He does what he thinks is right. If he judges that sleeping with the Apologetic Magistrate will help her chill out, then he isn't opposed to it, but fundamentally, it's about the magistrate. There's some sort of thing with the Witch of the wilds*, and he likes and cares about her... but you never hear him thinking about whether or not she is attractive. As Hanno says "I don't judge"
Basically Hanno is weird.

And on the other side... Cat certainly thinks her is charismatic... but also describes him as "plain", and seems to oggle him less than most other people she meets.

*Personal theory is that the witch is some kind of "Virgin priestess" type, who gains her power from the wilds specifically because she doesn't fool around... hence the Magistrate's earlier comments that she is interested in Hanno, but always disappointed. There's something screwy going on there, and I'm pretty sure her Name has something to do with it.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I could believe that maybe on the Ashen Priestess, but not on the Witch of the Woods.

The Magister's comment was "If all it takes is asking, it is cruel no one has told Antigone." implying that the Witch was trying to catch Hanno's attention.

It's simply because the Witch of the Woods seems to spend a lot of time around Hanno, given that they even share a Giant-related background and both use that silent language with nuances even on the degree you move your face, that's not surprising. And from an outside perspective, it might seem that there's a romantic interest if two people spend lots of time together, though Hanno denies there being anything of the sort, and implied that there were clear lines drawn there and that was shown in the silent language they use.

"Hanno understood the Witch of the Wilds perhaps better than anyone not of the Gigantes could, for the silent tongue they shared had a hundred thousand nuances but not a single lie. They knew where they stood, and what could and could not change from it. Insinuations thrown against that were like an egg tossed at a rampart."

Then again, not saying something is not the same as lying. The Witch might have simply made no insinuation of romantic interest yet, but Hanno seemed pretty certain.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, the Magister is not the most perceptive or enlightened person around. Or even socially clueful.

caoimhinh

She was also drunk at the time, and coping with the fear of the undead. People tend to make scathing comments in such situations.

Mental Mouse

Apparently she was drunk a lot of the time, to the point that Hanno noted "your hands shake without it". That's not a good way to cope with the fear of the undead.

Liliet

...Huh.

Maybe Hanno is the one with the unreciprocated crush, and everyone else's insinuation that she's interested make him remind himself that no, he definitely knows that she isn't because he asked and she answered and that's that and it's everyone else who doesn't have a clue.

Andrew Mitchell

> As Hanno says "I don't judge"
> Basically Hanno is weird.

Don't dis something until you've tried it yourself.
Reducing my judgement of other people in day-to-day life has been good for my mental health and relationships.

Morgenstern

... eh...? Please tell me that's not meant the way it can easily be read as, what with the whole play on "straight(en)"...
*sigh

Tell me it's just the "i liked to pop around, but now i find this one person actually gives me enough to stay with them exclusively" (for i don't know which amount of time)... , pretty please?

((... Even though even that can be hurtful, because most people find they are not "naturally monogamous", explaining much of the difficulties humans have when it comes to relationships (you choose your kind of pain... but often, there is always some kind of pain, be it not being quite as fulfilled as you would wish or having to deal with jealousy issues; choose your poison...)).)

But if it actually should be the case that you really wanted to imply "a bisexual can be turned straight by that one special person" (sigh; please no...)? :

Then it would seem you're confusing bisexuality and monogamy...?

And even then, a whole lot of monogamous people (of whatever sexual "type" preference when it comes to gender) do NOT stop finding other people of their "type" interesting – they just don't follow that interest while in a relationship, if being monogamous at that point. (Although there might be some who really are so full of love for that one special person that – while that person stays in a relationship with them! -, they do lose all romantical/sexual interest in anyone else. Such cases not make the same true for everyone, though; much the contrary, according to statistics. People refrain, but that's not the same as having no interest at all.)

A relationship to one special person means just that: a relationship with that one person that fit into your "type" already.

What is possible: that one person that made you realize your type is broader than you thought.

But that does not make the reversal true. Where is there EVER any actual “oh, i suddenly realize my type is LESS broad than i thought”?

Only because you find that monogamy suits you with that person who fell into your broad type, while you’re with them, that does not change your sexual preference for gender... Find that you suddenly like a guy when before you only ever liked women? Well, say hello to finding out you were actually BIsexual. Only your other-components-than-gender-“type” when it comes to men is much narrower than your “type” for women... that is entirely possible.

But “I was bisexual, but now I don’t like women anymore AT ALL”? Highly UNrealistic. And even fantasy stories should have ONE kind of “realistic” in it: the one that enables readers to RELATE. That is: basic human emotions.

Yes, there are quite a few known cases of “I found monogamy works with this one person, because they’re giving me so very much” (at least for the time that relationship works, which MIGHT just be the rest of your life... but more often ends at some point or other). The preference ranging from monogamy vs. polygamy has been found to change in people over time.

But that is NOT the same as shifts in wholesale stance from “i don’t care about gender, i simply like HUMANS” to “i now suddenly prefer gender x to gender y”, because of one person.

I.e. sexual preference of a certain type is NOT under the same hat as being monogamous or not.

Bisexuals are not suddenly heterosexual because they’re in a relationship with a person from the other gender (and do also not suddenly become homosexual while being in a relationship with a person from their own gender) – their whole shtick is not caring about gender at all, thus being able to find a partner of either gender because gender is simply no part of their preference. They might have a tendency (see above, broader type when it comes to other features of a person for one gender than the other making it more likely you find more suitable mates from that gender than for the one for which the other components are of a much narrower type), but there really are no proven cases of anyone actually having a narrowing-down of their overall sexual preference when it comes to a basic thing as gender. There might be the odd “I don’t like men/women in general, and thought I was homosexual, but I do find I like this one guy/gal” – but that is no narrowing down, it’s a broadening. Now you like women (broad type for women) AND that one guy (very narrow type of men you like) = i.e., hello to discovering your bisexuality.

Morgenstern

... I should have used "gender xy", I guess, would have been easier in terms of speech... =/

For all cases where I used only one example: all options were meant (including non-binary genders). It's the example here (Cat, being a woman who likes men and women (we don't know about non-binaries in her case), with slightly more women seeming to fit her other categories (broader type for women) that made me switch to those specified examples rather thoughtlessly. Meh. Speaking about this IS in general still a bit difficult for me, after a lifetime of being exposed to heterosexual norms in speech.

Not being able to edit sucks one again. (No, not the good type. =P)

Aotrs Commander

I was going to politely suggest that maybe you were overreacting and the post in question just meant in the innocuous sense of a criminal "going straight," and then, because I am a diligent poster, re-read aforementioned post and actually comprehended the last sentence.

Oof, yeah, no, I see your point; that's a rather... Framing it generously... Poorly-phrased sentiment, isn't?

(My own cardinal rule is "whatever two (or more) adult sapients/sentients get up to on their own time is nobody's business but their own, provided it isn't directly harming[1] someone else.")

[1]"Being offended" doesn't count as "harm."

IDKWhoitis

I also just interpreted the phrase as the "straighten out" the criminal variety.

caoimhinh

Maybe when we read the first half, but then the second half is explicitly saying "he gets to straighten her out. Not in a redemption story kind of way but in shifting Cat's tastes on romantic interests."

So it really leaves no space for interpretation of what Sugar Roll meant.

Sugar Roll

It was also meant as a joke and not to be taken seriously. I realize it may have been a poor one but a joke nonetheless. I'll just leave it at that and say I'm sorry for any hurt feelings it may have caused.

IDKWhoitis

Fair enough, didn't read the 2nd part well apparently.

Andrew Mitchell

Me too. I re-read and immediately saw the source of Morgenstern's concerns.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for airing your concerns. Irrespective of OP's intent; what you say are important messages.

Liliet

Thank you.

It's always heartening to see someone else go on a rant where I didn't have the energy to!

Andrew Mitchell

♥

Liliet

> straighten her out. Not in a redemption story kind of way but in shifting Cat's tastes on romantic interests.

eeeeeeeeeeeeewwwwwwwwwww

dude, you're gross

caoimhinh

People are making comments about a ship between them for the fun of it rather than the story realistically making them interested in each other.

I personally don't see them getting involved as anything more than friends, but it's fun to make up situations and speculate.

Sugar Roll

This guy gets it.

Mental Mouse

Also, "ship" can cover any sort of relationship.

caoimhinh

In theory, I guess.

But in practice, when someone says "I ship these two characters", it really is only used when meaning a romantic or sexual relationship.

Liliet

I'm trying to break that custom for everyone 9.9

TeK

I mean, I saw people shipping her with Rumena of all people.

Agent J

Granddaddy Rumena has quite the sharp tongue. Of course Catherine wants to see it put to better use.

talenel

Hey I could see her with Rumena more than I could see with Hanno. Actually I can totally think of some really hot fanfiction with Rumena x Cat.

Hanno is almost like trying to imagine a relationship with a cold fish to me. He's just too distant. It just doesn't work, even as a dream ship for me.

caoimhinh

Yeah, LOL.

Some people are just crazy and ship for the sake of shipping.

IDKWhoitis

A person can dream. Or just debate the inherent silliness of the strongest Hero and Villian making eyes at each other.

I think it's not likely to happen. But if it did...

Insanenoodlyguy

Since when has Cat lost attraction because somebody was powerful and/or could and might kill her?

So far, it's gone the opposite way.

talenel

Yes, the danger isn't what I mean by the coin being omnipresent. It's the idea behind it, that, when it comes down to it, he isn't the one making some of the biggest decisions in his life, something alien is. It creates an emotional distance that generates respect, but not true affection I would say.

Silverking

I wonder what will happen when Cat realizes that she's been riding Providence this whole time. She seems to have forgotten what it was like when she fetching Hierophant as part of the Band of Five: it's not that you get stronger or smarter; it's just your enemies leave openings and the winding path gets a little straighter and isn't it just so EASY being good? You'd think that nearly converting the golden boy of your opposing ideology on your first "chance" meeting might be a wake-up call. But beware, Black Queen, remember the false guilt you felt the day after you let William go. If Providence starts leading you towards a hot mature even-tempered guy, you need to jump off that horse before it leads you off a cliff.

Liliet

LMAO

No, I think Providence is genuinely the wind in Cat's sails here because of the whole thing being genuinely a good plan.

See also: Agnes Hasenbach

superkeaton

Well that was fun. I like these little chats.

Alivaril

I read that as "little charts" and thought you were referring to the rampant joke-shipping.

superkeaton

I mean, that's been fun too.

caoimhinh

They caught each other's interest and had a polite conversation, earned each other's respect, and gained a bit of understanding of each other. Great friendships had been built with far less. That their sides want to kill each other just adds more spice as far as Catherine is concerned.

It's likely the best scenario among the realistic ones, as he didn't promise to agree but didn't refute either. Such compromise as backing the Black Queen even if it's on something beneficial for everyone requires a bit more consideration than the first instinct and impression. At least now they have a cordial base agreement to start off, which is great.

Also, real smooth, Hanno, way to go. Dropping that hint that the house will be empty tomorrow. And Cat's response was pretty much "It's a date then".
(͡° ͜ʖ ͡°)

P.S: "for only the erratic would break such bare-bones rules."
Well, Erratic is the Author, so in theory he can break whatever rule there is, hahaha.

Mental Mouse

Actually, I read that as the opposite: "If you want to talk to Antigone, we can arrange that after I've had a chance to warn her".

Liliet

Yeah, same. I read that as "come visit when she's home"

NZPIEFACE

Well, the ship is sailing.

caoimhinh

Well, Hanno did tell her a hinted version of "My roommate will be going out tomorrow, so I'll have the house for myself."

ninegardens

Huh?

Oh... I read the exact opposite intention here:

"Antigone will need to be out of the city tomorrow night also, so probably I'll be here again, waiting for her"

Hmmm... re-reading I'm not sure which intention is right here.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's both. Because he'll be here, waiting for her, close to the Callowan camp. All. By. Himself.

laguz24

Uhg, this better not go full on RWBY levels of shipping and toxicity. I like this series.

Morgenstern

Hey, Indrani is not monogamous, either. As long as Hanno can live with that, where's the problem... 😊

But yeah, this better not turn out to be a facepalm-assery of "how bi-s can be straightened out"; it really would sour the story, to have to see bullshit like that purported HERE, of all places, where sexuality and gender preferences of any kind are treated much more less-toxically than in way too many other stories.

konstantinvoncarstein

The way sexuality and genders are presented is honestly one of the best I have ever read 😊

caoimhinh

"They are each person's business and not something to make any fuss about." is indeed one of the best ways to present the matter.

Andrew Mitchell

♥ THE best I've seen so far.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

"But yeah, this better not turn out to be a facepalm-assery of "how bi-s can be straightened out";"
This part confuses me. How would a theoretical romantic affair with the Wight Knight would do that? Even a long-term, monogamous one? Are preferences erased because someone settles down in a relationship?

Insanenoodlyguy

I think Morgenstern wasn't referring to the story itself, but the fandom, namely all our wordpress discussion. So rather than EE implying cat was "fixed" or "Screwed straight" or "found the right man" or any of that bullshit, it will be down here below the story where that bullshit will come up and they dread those sorts of comments appearing.

Tek

Eh, I honestly doubt it. That would mean she would stop lewding every pretty woman down the line. As far as character development goes, this seems as implausible as Robber becoming a pacifist unironically.

Insanenoodlyguy

Again, the fear is not that Erattic suddenly shows a much different attitude about sexuality in his writing, but that the fandom discussion goes sour because of how contentious the subject can get.

I, of course, stay firmly in my homestuck-fandom style "Ship all of the people with all of the people. All of them."

Incidentally, when are Cordelia and Robber going to fuck already!?

TeK

I concur. If anything, she is disproportionally lewds women, but that shouldn't make her a lesbian, so having a man for a change wouldn't straighten her out either.

caoimhinh

Ah, that's because of Sugar Roll's comment above saying it would be a good story if Hanno gets to "straighten Cat out" by shifting Cat's tastes on romantic interests. It provoked quite the reaction in Morgenstern.

Though I stand on Morgen's side of the argument, I believe Morgen shouldn't fall for that bait, nor take that response into other people's comments, as each person is only responsible for their own comments. One person's comment does not represent the fandom.

Liliet

Yeah, I've already seen one comment like that right here on this page. Fucking ew. This, this is why I've had no problems with bi Catherine consistently going for girls...

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

The number of ships will make a fleet to rival that of the Baalite Hegemony's in her peak.

Tuftears

Well dang, up to this chapter I was thinking the White Knight was this random demented killer and suddenly he's being made to seem so... nice and reasonable. (is immediately suspicious)

Liliet

Are you being sarcastic or

General Chaos

Second date!

Also, this may be my favourite book so far.

Pandemonious Ivy

That was the most intense flirting I've seen the entire story.

Well done, that was hot!

D. Dufour

Are you drunk?

Liliet

"I'm sure your hair is fine, Catherine"

Draconic

She should warn him about the Hierarch. I would not be surprised if he managed to kill a Seraphim because it was the one who judged the people Hanne has killed...

Draconic

*Hanno

how did I manage that typo...

ChillyPepper

Time for the illegal relationship between a superior (White Knight) and a (former) underling (Squire).

Mental Mouse

I love how Hanno's getting to speak his piece for himself here! And in his own measured way.

Grognac

I never leave comments on these, but this chapter was superbly written. I love this series so gods damn much 😊

Liliet

SAME SAME SAME

Andrew Mitchell

♥

werafdsaew

We got a bit of theology; explains why Above is so hands off—because they do not rule.

"You don't take issue with mortal laws, then," I said.

Liliet

Yep! They guide but don't rule. Hopefully this will get some clue into the fandom's collective head 9.9

kuro

people suddenly shipping white knight because he's a guy and in the most obnoxious way possible. ya'll should be ashamed

Hydrargentium

Lovely bit of symbolism here, with the whole thing being a game of chess, White Knight on the board with Black Queen. Of course, in chess, black and white are opposed, and the knight is the only piece that can directly threaten the queen without putting itself in the line of fire – specifically existing for that purpose, mostly.

Hg

Hydrargentium

"I assure you, Chancellor, that with but a few words they'll come around to agreeing with me. Almost like an incantation, really."

Also, this is awesome.

Hg

Liliet

big infodump energy

"Can't you have a conversation for five minutes without immediately talking about THE THING" "WHY WOULD I"

I love her.....

(opinion poll: ADD Catherine Foundling y/n?)

Koana

Look i get shipping but saying he's destined to be with cat simply because he's a guy is stupid, its also stupid to imply he'll correct her because she's been with women too much. seriously its like the comment section devolved the moment he appeared

Chapter 76: Procession

"Orphan am I, yet with many mothers and fathers. At once ruler and ruled, yet never only one."

– Famous Proceran riddle, referring to the city of Salia

I'd never been all that fond of the cloying amount of ceremony that accompanied rising up the ranks.

Oh, I understood the reasons for it. I'd argued the matter with Black back in the day, when we still had our lessons in Ater. Said that it was absurd to treat a king or a general as if they were gods, that the more you set distance between the people making decisions and the people about which those decisions were made the more you ran risks of losing perspective. I still believed that, truth be told, but after years in command of armies and a few wearing a crown I could better appreciate the points my teacher had made back then. When someone was invested with a great deal of power and authority, treating them like a stranger off the street meant treating all that power and authority just as casually. That tended to foster bad habits. In Praes the lie of Malicia and Black's invincibility had kept rebellions from flaring up because they'd just seemed beyond that: Black always ended up crushing his foes, Malicia always ended up having been three steps ahead of everyone else. It was the same principle for this, more or less: the more ceremony you surrounded someone with, the more they seemed different. Apart from the rest. And, since they were of a different breed from the common man on the street, their authority need not be fought and their power need not be questioned.

That was the reason while my morning had turned into a damned slog, when it came down to it. There were four delegations that the Principate of Procer was to welcome into Salia officially for the peace conference at the capital, and while I would have been happy with being ushered in through the city gates without first needing to bribe the guard that just wasn't the way diplomacy was conducted between great powers. No, this had to be a show. So everyone had come with their nicest banners and their armour freshly polished, prepared a hundred empty courtesies and now Procer was going to parade us one after another through the large Griffon Gate and the broad avenue it led to. Callow had not been invited to proceed first, naturally. The Principate might be in dire need of my help but it wasn't going to own up to that before the eyes of gods and men: no, instead it was the Dominion of Levant that was invited in first. Levant was an ally, after all, and a member of the Grand Alliance too. Still, at least we were second. General Rumena was third in line, which I took to be a rather blunt slight to the League of Free Cities in general and likely the Tyrant in particular.

It'd been made clear to me that we would be signaled when the time came for my delegation to proceed, and I'd sent Adjutant ahead to make sure everything went smoothly. That left me with rather little to do, to my rising irritation as time went by. General Abigail was, as usual, finding work for herself so she would not have to remain in my immediate vicinity and while the Third Army was laden with old War College acquaintances of mine – it had, after all, initially been raised from Nauk's old command in the Fifteenth – there were none I could casually approach for conversation. With Archer still out there somewhere, having sent a single message through Robber's marauders that she was 'onto something', that left me rather light on choices. Moreso than usual since it'd been decided neither Black nor Akua would accompany the delegation on the first day, as that was when there'd be the most eyes on us, and sadly Vivienne was further ahead of our procession. I could go to her, but it'd disturb arrangements that'd taken the better part of an hour to put in place and it felt a little pitiful to do that out of mere boredom.

There were around three hundred of us, arrayed in our finest. A full cohort of legionaries in their parade grounds best made up the heart of it, veterans from a half a dozen fields most of which were old to my service. Thirty knights of the Order of the Broken Bells added a dash of Callowan flair to it, though their hymn-inscribed armour and long lances had been proved to be anything but decorative in conflict against foes of Creation and beyond. They brought with them tall streaming banners, numbering three. The Third Army's own golden numerals on blue, carrying with them the cognomen of Dauntless I'd granted them at Sarcella as well as the fresher addition of crow wings at the bottom corners. The broken bells of bronze set on black that were the heraldry of the sole chivalric order of Callow trailed in the wind besides it, and last of all of all my own. The laden silver balance on black, what Hakram had told me my people now called the Crown and Sword. And under it words I now longer called my own: justifications matter only to the just. I'd been considering having them struck for some time now, but it would draw questions I was not entirely ready to answer.

I'd been made just as gaudy as the rest of this procession, put up in full plate for the first time in ages though it was one without a helmet – my hair had been put up a long elaborate braid and I'd put on a crown for once. Silver set with emeralds, the practical crown I'd worn when actually moving around in Laure instead of sitting on the fancy chair in full regalia and attempting to look wise. It was not a coincidence that Lady Vivienne Dartwick, herself sitting astride her mount in a beautiful blue dress, wore a crown as well. A slight circlet of silver, without jewels and much less ornate than mine, but a crown nonetheless. She was heiress-designate to the throne, after all, and though still a lady in title arguably she had higher status than any Proceran royalty save for Cordelia Hasenbach. I'd begun to consider the virtues of outright sending for General Abigail so I could entertain myself at her exp- to consult with the senior commander of my escort, I meant, when Adjutant finally dragged his carcass back to me instead. The Procerans had finally given the signal, so as soon as Hakram was standing by my side our procession began moving forward.

For all its fame, Salia had yet to impress me. This far west it was hardly rare for a great city to expand far beyond its walls, especially if it had seen little war as the capital of the Principate had. Even southern Callow had dabbled in that bad habit. Salia, though, seemed to have more territory outside the distant Yearning Walls than behind them. It wasn't slums, at least not near the road we were led through. But it was certainly a chaotic mess, since it seemed construction was only overseen by the sides of the large roads that led to the deeper city gates. The smell of mud and shit was staggeringly potent even in winter, and chimneys were belching smoke upwards seemingly endlessly. By the looks of it all the cattle and workers that would be out in the fields around the capital during fairer seasons had migrated to this riotous outer-city for the snows. Houses were wood and mud, rarely stone, and they'd been built in tight clusters like a thousand strange little islands separated from one another by muddy street-moats. The stone road that led towards the Griffon Gate was clean, though, and swept clear of snow. No house was every built less than forty feet away from either side though merchant carts of food or trade goods filled much of that empty room instead.

Small crowds had gathered by the side of the road, though they dared not approach soldiers. At least they seemed more in the mood to stare than throw stones. The deeper we went into Salia the more it began to resemble the Proceran towns and cities I'd seen, as if order was radiating from the centre of the capital and waned the further from it you stood. Streets began to have a semblance of order, shops with hanging signs and neat little houses raised in stone with tiled or thatched roofs. It all looked rather prosperous, though not the kind of wealthy the stories about the beating heart of Procer had led me to expect. Oh, I'd not deny the city was damned large but then so was Ater and the Wasteland's capital was a treasure trove of grand architecture. Mind you, large swaths of Ater were half-abandoned and only filled when famine drove the desperate to the Tower's shadow while it looked like every damned inch of the capital of Procer was crawling with a dozen people. Still, the looming cathedrals beyond the Yearning Walls in the distance were distinctly less impressive than the gargantuan horrors of the City of Gates. Procer was a younger nation than any on Calernia save for Levant, I thought, for all its great wealth and power.

It was almost an hour all told until we stood before the Griffon Gate, the great panels of bronze on its wood listing every First Prince and Princess to have ever reigned. It opened to the sound of trumpets, and beyond it was revealed the sweeping Merovins avenue. Great statues of marble flanked on us on both sides, beginning on my right with the stern gaze of Clothor Merovins – the first to ever be elected to the office of First Prince. I suspected the man's actual furs had not been quite so rakishly cut, or offered glimpse of what was admittedly an impressively muscled chest, but that was the Alamans for you.

"They're not all royalty, did you know?" Hakram said.

I glanced at him and cocked an eyebrow.

"Famous generals and officials can earn one as well," he gravelled. "One of Rozala Malanza's ancestors is further up from the days before the Malanzas were royalty. He conquered most of northern Levant for the First Prince of the time."

"I don't suppose anyone's told the Blood about that?" I drily asked

"I believe it might be one of those inconvenient truths we must all politely ignore," Hakram replied, clicking his teeth in amusement.

The brassy call of trumpets jarred us out of the conversation. The Proceran welcome was laid out before us, a riot of silken banners under brightly armoured horsemen and even more colourful highborn. Every line with a seat in the Highest Assembly had sent a representative, by the looks of it, because that was a great many banners. And an infuriatingly large amount of very nice warhorses. They could have outfitted a good company of heavy horse with that, the wasteful fucks. Ugh, this was going to be as bad as the Tower wasn't it? All rubies the size of a fist used a bloody bench decorations and gold slapped onto things that had absolutely no need of being made of gold. Which, to be fair, was essentially everything except certain coinage and maybe crowns. A representative for the First Prince herself, an old man that carried the title of Master of Orders – one of the important officials in the Assembly, as I recalled, though he shouldn't be royalty himself – formally greeted us. I forced a smile through the greeting and let Vivienne answer it in my place. That drew attention from our hosts, but then it'd been meant to. The sooner it was made clear to people that Vivienne was truly meant to be my successor, the better.

Advance resumed with the additional escort, though still at an agonizingly slow crawl. Salia itself was worth a second look this deep in, though, I'd admit to that. The Yearning Walls were well-built and apt to weather a siege, I'd say that much, and their shockingly rose-gold stone shining like a mirror under the sun. Hakram continued to speak in a low voice as we passed through, his own research on the city far dwarfing the few books I'd opened in expectation of my visit. Salia itself was often said to be split in two parts, the City Yearned and the City Yearning – a reference to some ancient poem that'd established the name of its walls, with the city behind them being yearned and the city outside being yearning. Passing the gate had brought us into the City Yearned, and into the portion of it known as the low districts. So named not for the poverty of their inhabitants but rather in contrast to the high districts to the west, which had been raised on high hills. The low districts covered nearly a third of the City Yearned, stretching across its south, and the knowledge that it wasn't even the wealthy Salians that lived in these parts had my stomach clenching in envy. The houses were all stone, often several stories high – Adjutant noted that renting was common practice in these parts, and very lucrative – it was not rare so see coloured glass windows. These were artisans, I thought, traders and officials. Yet their wealth clearly rivaled that of the minor nobility of Callow, if not outright surpassed it.

How much richer would the nobles be here? I'd read that Procer was arguably the wealthiest nation on Calernia, some of its princes surpassing even the famously rich High Seats of Praes, but I'd never really understood until now how far down that wealth went. When Vivienne had told me, before the Tenth Crusade, that it'd been brutally expensive to bribe even the servants in the holdings of the Prince of Iserre I'd assumed the Jacks were had, or that she was exaggerating some for effect. Now I could believe that even the servants in the capital of that principality had been well-off, by my people's standards. It was a bitter pill to swallow, that the Principate had been basking in all this while my ancestors were dying in droves just to keep Praes in its shore of the Wasaliti.

Merovins avenue led directly to the old palace and the Highest Assembly, but that was not our destination. We diverted northeast through another broad avenue, going through the districts known as Les Vendeuses. Great open-air markets, I'd been told, though we skirted the edges of them only. The route we took led through pleasant sights instead. Some streets seemed to be bordered entirely by great winter gardens artistically adorned with glasswork and sculptures, others filled with guild halls and mansions that competed for the most elegant manner of opulence. It was with some amusement I noted that not once we passed in front of a House of Light. The crowds were something of a surprise, having thickened the further in we went. I'd expected jeering and rocks, but while there certainly wasn't any jubilant cheering we were being treated as a show rather than, well, the Enemy incarnate. The knights probably helped, I decided, for they were a popular sight with children. Orcs were as well, though more in fascinated horror than positive appreciation.

They'd probably never seen orcs before today, I thought. Or goblins, or Taghreb and Soninke. Even Callowans were rare this far west, these days. It's another world, I thought. One that knew nothing of the blood-soaked Fields of Streges, of the eternal back and forth between knights of black and white and their grand armies that clashed every few decades. They did not understand the dread of seeing a city rise into the sky, heavy with death, or the way greenskins still flinched at the call of our knight's horns being sounded. All we had in common with these people was worn history, slights and boons long past, and how little did that really weigh? I understand you less than I understand Praesi, I thought, watching the people of Salia. I know their truths and their conceits, their mad ambitions and dark splendours. But you? I know so little of you it could be said I know nothing at all. It was a humbling thing, to know that. A daunting one as well. The world was large and even this meagre sliver of it was vast. Could anyone really change something that... immense? A troubling thought, and not one I wanted to linger on.

It was a relief when the procession ended at last and we entered the restricted district where our provided lodgings stood. It was called the Lineal, for it'd once been the ancestral grounds of the Merovins chieftains-turned-royalty of Salia. They had kept large grounds to themselves, the seat of their power when another line claimed the title of First Prince or Princess. Now that the Merovins were long gone, the Lineal stood as almost a city within a city that was under the sole authority of the ruler of Salia. Its significant attached incomes were one of the great boons of the title, and as the old seat of power of royal line it was a beautiful place. I'd expected a manse and some attending barracks for my soldiers, something along the lines of the noble's houses you could see in Laure's Whitestone Quarter, but instead we were directed to what was effectively a small palace. The grounds surrounding the structure alone were larger than the palace in Laure, and I suspected this was a winter pleasure palace and not anything official.

I reined in my horse after passing through a pretty copper gate sculpted like a flock of chubby naked Cherubim playing laughingly, slowing Zombie's stride in the courtyard. There were servants swarming all over the place, which were most likely spies, and I almost bit the inside of my cheek. It was going to be a damned pain keeping track of all these people with my limited escort, so I'd probably have to cordon off a part of the palace and have it guarded and warded at all times.

"Any chance at least one of them isn't spying for Hasenbach?" I sighed and asked Hakram.

"Of course," Adjutant amusedly agreed. "There's probably a few working for other royals."

I accepted his offered hand to dismount, wincing at the impact, and when a stablehand hesitantly approached Zombie I suppressed a grin. I glanced appreciatively at the sandy-haired man, who while approaching a winged undead fae horse looked more like he was wondering if she'd fit in the stable than if this was in any way wise.

"Don't touch the reins, she'll bite you," I said. "Zombie, the man is going to show you where the stables are."

My mount huffed, displeased.

"You can't come in with me," I patiently replied, "this is a very nice palace. It'd be impolite."

I glanced at the stablehand, who was now seemingly wondering what he'd gotten himself into. I could sympathize.

"She'll follow you to the stables," I said. "Leave a stall open for her, but she'll wander around for a while still. If she gets anywhere she's not supposed to, send for me. But she'll be good, won't you Zombie?"

I scratched her mane and she whinnied.

"Liar," I muttered, not entirely without affection,

I flicked a glance at the stablehand one last time.

"Don't feed her anything," I instructed. "Even if she whines. She always fills her stomach, but she doesn't actually need to – you know what, just don't feed her anything. Let's leave it at that."

I'd hastily amended my approach when even implicit discussion of necromancy made the man look like he was about to faint. He bowed, looking like he was one stern talking to away from weeping.

"It will all be done exactly as you say, Your Majesty," he said.

It would have been polite to call what followed retreating, but I knew what it looked like when someone legged it.

"Don't you say a damn thing," I grunted without turning.

"I would never," Hakram lied, the filthy traitor.

"I can feel your mockery without even looking at you," I complained.

"Would it help your mood to terrify a gardener as well?" my loyal right hand said.

I turned just to flip him off, though the deepening amusement on his face – like the world's ugliest green cat had just caught a bird seasoning itself – warned me I'd just missed something. A young woman in Salian livery had been approaching, and was now looking like she'd had no idea queens could gesture obscenely and she wasn't sure whether she should pretend she'd never seen that or not. Godsdamnit, Hakram, I thought. You know Hasenbach's going to read about that in a report, don't you?

"Just say whatever it is you were sent for," I tiredly told the woman.

She bowed.

"I was sent with a message scroll, Your Majesty," she said.

As I recalled, in Proceran etiquette people weren't supposed to hand things directly to royalty. I glanced at Hakram, who stepped forward to accept the scroll. He broke the seal – featureless, a mere press of wax – and glanced at the contents.

"An invitation," Adjutant said.

"For?" I asked.

"Tea with the First Prince of Procer," Hakram said. "She awaits us in this palace's own parlour."

copaceticcockroach

For Lillet: Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

For others: It'd been made clear to me that we would be voting. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Andrew Mitchell

Soma

"Justifications only matter to the just" does have the potential for a hilarious evolution. Initially a boast that Cat not need justify herself as she is not just. Later, it now can morph into the an argument for her considering her just given she has taken so many pains to justify her actions. Not to say this is what will happen, but such an evolution would be deeply entertaining.

Soma

As is tradition on a web serial: you should also vote. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

BarthHumphries

And start a typo thread.

That was the reason while my morning had turned into a damned slog, when it came down to it.
Just remove the word “while”.

There were others as well. Who can find the most? 😊 ele

Remember to vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Zggt

“Justifications only matter to the just” translated to Heroic is “honor is luxury, duty the weight” (a theme in sayings from many cultures), which would explain the amount of contempt Black and herself feel when heroes don’t get it. As such, this has already (repeatedly, in great detail and violence) been discussed (usually with swords and burning things).

Andrew Mitchell

Well spotted. I think you’re on to something with that double meaning. And once again we see evidence of EE’s amazing foresight.

Mental Mouse

Indeed, in time she herself might well come to embrace that slogan from the other side. Thus making it an excellent slogan for a villain who often acts much like a hero, and whose successors may well be followers of Above who gain aid from servants of Below.

Collide

Ah, but “Justifications matter only to the just” doesn’t necessarily imply that only the just will provide justifications. That would be “Justifications matter iff just”.

AbraKadabra

It can also mean that she herself is Just.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Don't touch the reins, she'll bite you," I said. "Zombie, the man is going to show you where to vote for practical guide to evil on topwenfiction."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Aaron

"An invitation," Adjutant said.

"For?" I asked.

"Voting for A Practical Guide to Evil," Hakram said. "It awaits us on TopWebFiction."

NerfGlaistigUaine

First three of four comments are all about voting. No wonder this fic crushes all competition on that site.

Sparsebeard

Tell me of a better web novel then?

NerfGlaistigUaine

When it exists, I will

NerfGlaistigUaine

Although I'm pretty sure everyone and their mother has already recommended Worm, which is also fantastic, just very different style.

Sparsebeard

I did read it, but while it's great, it's not as grippingly good. I mean, the story as a whole was great, but some chapters of worm were pretty hard to get into (or to even understand). Complexity is one of the strong point of Worm with it's hundreds of characters and over arching plot but yeah.

Then again, it's more that the Practical Guide is just so good, not compared to others, but simply on it's own. The story is gripping and well structured, there is tons of foreshadowing but the plot remains mainly unpredicted and the characters are charming and witty.

I mean, personally, i might prefer the Wandering Inn for the emotional pull and the no-hold barred thrill (and just being also VERY good in general), but I must admit that the Guide is objectively a masterpiece (I woun'dn't even know what to criticize frankly).

Liliet

The typos! XD

Sparsebeard

Lol.

I wouldn't dare considering I often end up making a few of my own in my much smaller comments... (Takes out tin foil hat) Plus, everybody know that Erratic makes those on purpose as some kind of secret code.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for the reminder about The Wandering Inn. I've seen it recommended previously but I hadn't got around to googling it.

Oshi

Wandering Inn is good just in another genre.

Sparsebeard

I'm always more eager for TWI but I still think the Guide is objectively better (both are my favorites with perhaps Savage Divinity just behind because it's just such a a great satire of eastern webnovels).

Then again, those are perhaps the only three web novels that I consider to pretty much be narcotics in addiction levels.

NerfGlaistigUaine

While I'd also say PGtE is better, there is know such thing as "objectively better" when it comes to writing.

Andrew Mitchell

Mother of Learning.

It's not better than PGtE, but it's extremely well-written, enjoyable and internally consistent.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I tried that, but it started a bit slow for me. Does it ramp up/get better later?

Andrew Mitchell

Yes it does. It still very detailed though, even as more things start to happen.

Sparsebeard

Yeah, that and Worth the Candle are also amongst my favs (less addicting but very good).

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks! I've enjoyed some of Alexander Wales' previous works so I appreciate this recommendation.

Pethrai D'arkos

I don't know about better as it scratches a different itch but The Gods Are Bastards is something I'd recommend while sticking to High Fantasy. It's surprisingly adept at making you believe that losing a fight is a real possibility both in and out of universe (nobody really believes the heroes can lose if the villain threatens to destroy the world but they might if it's only a small town at stake) despite the fact that the original party consists of, in no particular order; two paladins, a half-demon, a pirate princess with an anti-magic rapier, a pixie, a dryad, a drow priestess, and a pacifistic heiress who's sharing her body with an amnesiac archdevil.

Sparsebeard

I loved the Gods are Bastard at first, but I don't agree to the part about losing being truly an option... Without going into spoilers, it seems to me that neither the heroes nor the villains never truly lose (barring a few minor characters) thus ensuring a never ending Monty-Pythonesque chase .

noname

The wandering Inn, Worm, Twig, HPMoR, Unsong, Worth the candle. But I always feel like the Practical guide to evil is like the Deadpool movies, it's slightly better than the rest of the MCU, but still not very good.

Sparsebeard

I loved all of those except Unsong which seemed to me to rely on the reader's knowledge of religion (which I have pretty much none seeing my parents where mostly atheists/non-religious and I never got into it either).

And, the Guide, not very good? What the hell?

Sun Dog

Don't know about better, but I'm rather partial to The Gods Are Bastards and The New Humans, and think the latter in particular could use some more attention and exposure.

'Ladi Williams

This fiction crushes all competition bcos it's just that damn good.

The comments about voting just ensures the lead is a very comfortable one. Sort of like icing on cake or waffles with ice cream. 🍌🍌

Walter

It updates 3 times a week, every week.

caoimhinh

Plus an Extra Chapter every month that adds to the Lore.

NZPIEFACE

I guess so. Though I kinda wish people didn't try and do that every chapter. Would save them and me like 10 seconds of scrolling/typing.

Andrew Mitchell

I hear you. This chapter may have been a record for the number of requests to vote.

But I do enjoy the creativity that's being demonstrated.

Tom

There's also the part where it's really good 😊

NerfGlaistigUaine

Oh Cat. She's learned a great deal about diplomacy and dealing with things without stabbing them (or just stabbing them), but she'll never be quite, ah, queenly.

caoimhinh

Catherine's most queenly moments are when she is angry or terrifying someone by the use of eldritch powers and/or bluffing.

sengachi

Catherine only does queen with a Q.

Liliet

I'm just going to... plug something here.

Andrew Mitchell

TY. I ♥ the fact that you've made me appreciate this story even more!

Inay

With today "being bored is almost physical pain", I can only agree again. Yup, that's adhd experience.

anon

I mean she could, but my read on it is that she's just a character with ADD like personality traits. I mean most mental disorders are a spectrum to begin with where the line between quirk and disorder comes in when it debilitates a person's ability to live their life. In my opinion, Cat's too high performing for that line to be drawn for her. I mean, she already had achievable goals for her future and was working towards them at the beginning of the first book which is a lot more than most normal kids at her age would have.

Mental Mouse

> the line between quirk and disorder comes in when it debilitates a person's ability to live their life.

Or as I've put it when discussing "subclinical" autistics, "no disability, no diagnosis". But that in turn raises questions about "who gets to decide" – e.g., is that student "handicapped", or is the teacher an asshole who can't be bothered to make time for them? Or for a physical analogy, is someone "crippled" because it's painful and laborious for them to climb stairs?

The thing is, that's not even a map vs. terrain question – it's a question of balance of power. When enough Congresspeople have mobility issues (or kids with such), you get laws requiring curb cuts and public elevators. Similarly for educational handicaps and accommodations for those.

In the Guideverse, however, power relations are more direct: The relevant question for Catherine isn't going to be "can she be diagnosed?", but "can an enemy exploit this in a fight?"

sengachi

... I have never before so utterly and swiftly accepted a headcanon I hadn't previously considered.

Mental Mouse

Reddit doesn't like my address, so replying here: As I've said before, diagnoses are an attempt at a map of human diversity. They have all the usual hazards of such maps, including not just the map vs. terrain thing, but squabbling over the borders.

The potential advantage of having such a map is if you can pick out a functional pattern, that can be useful: Taking "this worked for me, it might work for you" to a more systematic level.

mavant

Wait, are you saying normal people's brains don't be like that?

Andrew Mitchell

> she'll never be quite, ah, queenly

That's why she adopted Vivienne. 😊

Cicero

Time for the Queen to meet the Prince.

joewill5234

Well, that was a wasted chapter. Nothing but filler. Where's the beef?

caoimhinh

It was a necessary transition chapter, since it would have been a bit weird to just jump to Catherine sitting on a table with Cordelia.

Fayhem

> Catherine sitting on a table with Cordelia.

I realize this is a harmless typo, but now I'm picturing Catherine just dead-pan sitting on top of the table and Cordelia having to climb up to join her and snickering to myself at work.

Hierus

And that why a dish has only integriant. Everything else would be boring right?

Barthumphries

If actually liked to try integriant. If it's anything like I've heard, it'll be anything but boring.

Mental Mouse

Grrr... The two of you had me googling (OK, DDGing) that. 😏
For future readers, it does seem to be a mere misspelling.

caoimhinh

Integriant is an essential part of Typoi cuisine and many traditional dishes of Misspellheim. 😏

Mental Mouse

Alas that I only have one like to give for this gem!

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahaha.

nick012000

It's not filler, it's set dressing so that we have an idea of the setting for the talks, as well as a way of characterising the Procerans. Remember, we can only know what the author describes to us.

Just a potato

I'm going to have to respectfully disagree. This is exactly the type of chapter I would want to see in a good book, it's building the city of Salia for us. The problem is that normally you don't have to wait several days to read the next chapter in a book. That is a bit frustrating but we can't have every chapter be an amazing reveal or insightful conversation, if there's no background that builds those events then the events can't happen or they'd end up thin and meaningless. The crescendo before the climax is what makes it so good, not just the climax itself.

Shveiran

While I do agree on the gist of your comment, the Guide usually deals with this need better than this; on world-building/transition chapters, EE usually delivers something that keeps you hooked to the chapter, even if it is "only" character interaction and development or background events. It is, in my opinion, one of the Guide's strongest points:

EE's ensures there is a good reason to read every single chapter, as in, there is always SOME progress toward SOMETHING.

It is almost never quite JUST a transition piece.

In this particular instance, I do not think these commenters are swinging out of the blue. The fact that this kind of chapters are usually so good makes you raise the bar.

This is NOT a bad chapter, mind you, but it is a rather dull one. There is no real progress aside the very last lines, and aside from the transition what we see is mostly Salia – which I personally have an hard time being too interested in since by this point we already “spent” time in it and gotten a feel for it. I liked bits of it, of course, like Cat's reflection on the world's divides and barriers, but I can acknowledge that this is a step below the usual.

I wouldn't even notice on a less impressive work, but I think it is helpful to point out that this felt a bit like filler to some of us.

EE can take this into consideration and decide that no, he likes the chapter as is, or that maybe something needs to be adjusted before publishing. Isn't that the point of feedback?

Point

Filler? What were you expecting, a jump directly from the talk with the White Knight to the conference in Procer?

In this chapter, we learned who is in Salia with Cat (Vivienne, Hakram, and Abigail), who isn't (Amadeus, Akua, and Archer). We learned a bit more about how she's making a show of passing power to Vivienne, and we learned how Cat feels about Proceran wealth. We learned a few points about Proceran history, though those aren't essential. We also learned a bit about how the average Proceran citizen feels about her, or at least her people.

Sure, it wasn't the most eventful chapter, but it was a much-needed transition between two important conversations, and it established a backdrop for the beginning of the talks in Salia.

JackInTheBawks

A snack to clear the palate, between strong wines.

'Ladi Williams

Sigh. If all chapters were bang bang thank you...very soon we would bcom jaded.

Personally I think this and previous chapters go a long way to help show us the way individuals interact and their motivations when they ain't fighting for their lives.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahahaha!

Andrew Mitchell

/s

sengachi

Pacing my good friend, you have to learn to appreciate pacing. Sure you may eat a burger for the beef, but a beef-wrapped beef-garnished beef-burger with nothing but beef will make you sick to your stomach before long. Learn to relax, enjoy the establishing moments and the unwinding of tension. A spring cannot be indefinitely wound tighter and tighter, the action rise higher and higher, without breaking under the strain. A good story must take time to let the tension out and bring us back to a place of rest, and these chapters are how that is done.

sengachi

Actually, hey, if you really hate pacing chapters that much, go read Wildbow's Pact. It's basically an exercise in how much tension and action can be ramped up endlessly without hitting the breaking point, and while a fair chunk of its readership thought it did go past that breaking point, I'm guessing you'd love it for just that reason.

That said, if you get frustrated by the pacing chapters in Pact ... look Wildbow's speciality is in endlessly rising tension, he's one of the best at it, and this story was him experimenting with the utmost limits of that. If you get frustrated by that story there is literally no story in existence which will ever satisfy you in this way.

Agent J

Ugh. Cat's right. While I understand the narrative need to go through the hurdles, I am utterly bored to tears with the pomp and fanfare. I'd much rather have the chapter involving tea with Cordelia. Wednesday can't come soon enough.

'Ladi Williams

We might still get treated to the empire ever dark's procession. That should be hilarious....

Insanenoodlyguy

Much like out of nowhere unexpected rap battles, the entire procession surprises everybody with a surprisingly swift march that incorporates hamboning and twerking.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

I find participating in ceremonies and such dreadfully boring and tedious, but watching someone else go through them while being snarky the whole time was pretty amusing for me, so I'm pretty happy with this update. Of course, Wednesday still can't come soon enough, but that's just because the Guide is literary crack

Just a potato

Cat:

"Don't feed her anything," I instructed. "Even if she whines. She always fills her stomach, but she doesn't actually need to – you know what, just don't feed her anything. Let's leave it at that."

My usual response being "Friendship is magic" is being appended to "Necromancy is magic" just this once.

Decius

The person who animates golems always knows how to make friends.

James, Mostly Harmless

I love how Cat's zombie rides have more personality than some living characters!

Wrap Attack

I know everyone's probably forgotten about him by now but grand processions and the chapter opening up with Cat talking about Leaders being separate from everyone else. It's Hierarch time soon.

Oshi

Still no. I would say three more chapters. Cordelia needs her moment.

Javvies

Heh.

Hmm. Procer is wealthy, partly because it's so damned big. And because, well, only a small fraction of it is normally under constant external threats, and inter-principality warfare tends towards field army versus field army in the field, and major population centers are usually mostly untouched by the ravages of warfare.

hakureireimu

What is this about?

konstantinvoncarstein

"Famous generals and officials can earn one as well," he gravelled. "One of Rozala Malanza's ancestors is further up from the days before the Malanzas were royalty. He conquered most of northern Levant for the First Prince of the time."

"I don't suppose anyone's told the Blood about that?" I drily asked

What the Blood should not appreciate is that someone who conquered their country is honored in their ally's capital.

James, Mostly Harmless

I imagine it would be similar to the reaction of an Irishman visiting London seeing the statue of Oliver Cromwell.

reyishi

When I read chapters like these I really hope that EE makes a book that tell us about the lore from all of Calernia. I really love all the details added to Salia, like "the city Yearned and the city Yearning". It makes the city so much more real I can see it when I close my eyes.

Author Unknown

Cat: "Hiya Cordy. Loved the fire. You really go out of your way to make a gal feel at home don't'cha."

Shveiran

Bless you.

mavant

Somehow I read this in a DCAU Harley Quinn voice...

superkeaton

A genuinely interesting look at Procer. Deeply fun to imagine that Catherine is so infinitely more comfortable with the hated madness of heroes and villains and theirs that Procer's... quietude and splendor is uncomfortably alien. I imagine it'd be worse if it hadn't nearly been burned tot he ground. That, at least, she's familiar with.

Liliet

I love the slowly dawning realization throughout this chapter: oh. Callow is poor. Callow is really, really poor.

And Catherine coming from poverty and struggle to a land of wealth and privilege is... absolutely fascinating, for her and us both.

Mental Mouse

But then, the flipside, which is power: For all their glory, Procer has troops, but almost no mages (for all Callow considers itself short on mages, they at least do have some). And those troops can fight well for humans, but stagger against the Legions. And Procer has no match to the Callowan knights, much less orcish infantry, goblin sappers, and even the occasional ogre.

Walter

A fun thing to do is go back in the book and find the last time Cat's soldiers used swords on screen. Without reading my recollection is something like:

Post Drow stuff: Crusaders stumble through engine bombardment towards their palisade, Mighty Drow Wuxia them.

Pre Drow northern battle: Lol lakomancy

2nd Laure fight, warlock and hierarch are destroying devils, siege engines destroying devils, I think there were some demons who twisted people and made them fight each other?

Fae fights, Named fight melee, I want to say soldiers get shot with arrows while falling back, engines shoot people

First Laure, devils are unable to fight back vs. Empire troops

Like, if Cat's people were all the greatest swordsmen in the world, or literally didn't have swords, I feel like the story would have been pretty much identical. Troops are scenery, Procer is only as strong as the heroes let it be.

Mental Mouse

Beg to differ, they used swords a lot against undead and fae.

mavant

Isn't that like the explicit premise of this universe?

laguz24

I do love the realization that callow understands Praes better than Procer through centuries-long bloody struggle. The Principate only invades frequently, plus all the hobnobbing with Praesi has made her understand their point of view.

Sparsebeard

I wonder if in a way, the conquest (and the cultural rapprochement that ensued) was utterly necessary for the East (or even the rest of the surface) to even stand a chance against Procer's hegemony.

I mean, they're beset by enemies on all sides (rats, DK, Levant, Callow) but still can afford to squabble internally without being defeated or crumbling.

SpeckofStardust

Callow never attack Procer to the best of our knowledge. Procer has gone after and been beaten back by Levant and Callow.

DK also has never really gone all out.

historically Procer unified would likely be stupidly powerful, but the same could be said for Levant who is less unified than Procer, Praesi who spend most their history murdering each other for power (and the only times they weren't was Triumphant, and well the Conquest). The League well ah ah ah. and Callow itself we don't know about to honestly judge its abilities and relative unity.

Liliet

Callow has attacked Procer, though it was likely in retaliation and not out of idleness: Jehan the Wise hanging those people happened in Salia.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Queen of Blades attacked Procer too, no?

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I seem to recall that she predated the unification of Procer, so she was attacking independent powers on what is now the border regions.

Poring

Procer is larger than Praes and Callow together. And, of 24 principalities, only 8 + 1/2 share borders with other nations.

Mental Mouse

> I do love the realization that callow understands Praes better than Procer through centuries-long bloody struggle.

> But you? I know so little of you it could be said I know nothing at all.

Well... one could argue that nowadays that goes both ways. Procer surely knew the old Callow well – but this new hybrid, where a child on the street might offer flowers to an orc?

mavant

So, we've concluded that the stuff being dredged up from Lake Artoise was goblinfire / the remnants of the legions wiped out by Pilgrim's Plague, yeah?

Javvies

No.

The goblinfire and Legionary remains would have remained in the watercraft they were using as transport ... which never stopped floating.

Dredging indicates that they are looking for something that is buried beneath the surface of the lakebed.

In addition, Cordelia thought of the project as reaching for something to use to "fight fire with fire" in the context of the war with the Dead King. In addition, it was mentioned to be "worse" than Angelic intervention.

A few tons of goblinfire does not constitute the kind of gamechanger (or fighting fire with fire) against the Dead King and his forces that Cordelia believes herself to be in need of and is looking for. Nor would a decidedly limited amount of goblinfire be worse than Angels.

Cordelia is most likely looking for something (or someone) from before Procer was Procer, IMO.

I believe it's been mentioned that there are still unaccounted for Hell Eggs from Triumphant in Procer, so it could be one of them, or Cordelia could be looking for something from the Mavians, or her objective could be from the old proto-Lycaonese that produced the Witch-Queen(s) that warred with the pre-Dead King Keter and first summoned Tikoloshe.

Chapter 77: Artless

"Even the most skilled of liars are only ever wielding a lie. Truth is the superior artifice, for it will strike deeper than even the most perfect deception."

– Princess Beatriz of Salamans, later thirteenth First Princess of Procer

"I'm not going to lie," I muttered under my breath, "it pisses me off a little that anybody can be rich enough to have a room dedicated to tea-drinking."

Hakram was ahead of us, engaging our guide in what sounded like idle conversation about Salian cloths and their obvious superiority to that of the despicable yet superficially similar works from Lange, so I could vent my indignation without every sentence making it straight to the First Prince's ear.

"I expect they'll have one filled with only spices, should we look," Vivienne drily added. "You know, to make the one that's just a giant gold ingot stand out less."

"Right?" I grunted. "Hells, Vivs, you were born noble-"

"A baron line, short on land and incomes even before the Conquest," she reminded me.

I shot her an incredulous look. Those poor nobles, so very impoverished.

"Did your house have stables?" I asked.

"I'm not dignifying that with an answer," Lady Dartwick informed me.

"I bet your servants had matching livery too," I scathingly said.

"You have servants with matching livery, Your Majesty," she exasperatedly replied.

"Eh," I said. "More like I'm borrowing them for a few years. And I'd help if any of them wanted to find real decent honest work, like running a tavern-"

"Nests of criminal activity, aside from those in better quarters," Vivienne told me.

I almost gaped at the audacity of that.

"You're the Queen of Thieves for Callow," I indignantly said.

"Mere rumours," she smoothly said, "all I'm saying is that your notion of what good, honest work is tends to be rather skewed given your..."

"We're in Procer now, you know," I growled. "Lese-majesty's something they actually enforce here."

"Everything," Vivienne mused. "Your everything, really. Didn't you use to participate in an illegal fighting ring?"

"I was also a waitress," I defensively said. "That was lawful – wait why am I justifying myself to you, you used to be the bloody Thief. Have you actually ever had a job?"

"It's sad to see one so steeped in her criminal ways rising so high, but these are dark days," Vivienne sighed.

"That's a lot of backtalk, coming from someone who couldn't even murder Hakram," I muttered.

"Is no one ever going to let that go?" she complained. "Do you all want me to murder Hakram now, you niggling harpies? Don't you think I won't, you'll drive me to it.

There was a commotion in front of us, the attendant that'd been sent to guide us concernedly asking Adjutant if he was all right. He had, I grasped from context, stumbled and let out a choking sound. Merciless Gods he'd been eavesdropping with his Name the whole time, hadn't he? My cheeks burned a little, but I cleared my throat and put on a mask of queenly dignity. Vivienne looked mildly concerned about her dear friend Hakram Deadhand having stumbled, a degree of shamelessness that was positively royal of her. We were close now, the guide told us with an unnecessary amount of bowing.

"Do you think it still counts as a labyrinth if it's this full of tapestries and nice woodworks?" I asked.

It really was nice woodwork, too. In the same style as those in the royal palace in Laure, which I'd grimly admit to myself probably meant we'd imitated a Proceran style. They also had tapestries that weren't about hunting, nature and warring with Praes which I'd confess was a nice change of pace.

"It's the classic Alamans scheme, my queen," Vivienne drily said. "If you throw enough jewels at your enemy, they're bound slip and break something eventually."

"They'd be in a lot less shit if they'd put some of that tapestry coin on good walls instead," I grunted in agreement.

"Don't be silly Your Majesty," Lady Dartwick sardonically said. "This is the Principate, if there is need of a wall that's what stacking peasants is for."

I swallowed a laugh at that. I'd never heard that one before and serving drinks in a tavern that catered to both legionaries and Callowans meant I'd heard a lot of cheap jokes at the expense of Procer. Under the Empire's occupation it'd been safer to go after Procer than to take a shot at Praes. Since not even the most quiescent of my people had been entirely free of the urge take a verbal swing at the Wasteland on occasion, Procer had been getting rough treatment among my countrymen even before the Tenth Crusade so selflessly provided them with fresh ammunition. Relentless mockery of our hosts had me in a rather pleasant mood by the time we arrived at the small hall where the First Prince of Procer was awaiting the three of us. The fair-haired woman who'd been chatting with Adjutant the whole way rapped her knuckles against the door to signal our arrival and bade us farewell, looking almost reluctant at ending her conversation with Hakram. A majordomo in tasteful silks emerged from the room and bowed, intimating he would be announcing us. As the guest of highest rank, etiquette dictated I enter first.

"Her Majesty Queen Catherine of Callow, first of her name, protector of Daoine and high priestess of the Everdark."

He had a pleasant, ringing voice, exactly the kind you'd want in someone charged with announcements. Queen of Callow, huh? Not so long ago Hasenbach had refused to even recognize me as Queen in Callow, much less the rightful liege lady of Duchess Kegan of Daoine. And someone had been talking to drow, though that might simply be the consequence of the Pilgrim feeling chatty. I entered, the polished plate on my frame making me regret having left my staff behind with every step I took. A bit of Night smoothed the pain quick enough, but when that ended I'd be left feeling the consequences of my pride tonight. I stepped into the hall, followed by the announcement of Lady Vivienne Dartwick, heiress-designate to the Kingdom of Callow. Much as I disliked the Proceran propensity for luxuries, I could not deny that the parlour before me was a beautiful piece of work. A tall plaster ceiling led into great arched windows of glass that let in the winter midday sun, the lighting coming to rest on a long low table of painted wood covered by a perfectly transparent pane of glass. The walls and draperies were in a pleasant pale green, and the seats prepared at the table looked sinfully comfortable with their matching cushions and broad armrests. The First Prince of Procer was seated at the centre of the table, two people standing behind her in respectful deference, and I advanced to the table as behind me the announcement of Lord Hakram Deadhand of the Howling Wolves, the Adjutant sounded.

One of those two people behind Hasenbach was long familiar to me. Princess Rozala Malanza's classic Arlesite good looks were only called into attention by the light mail and closely cut tabard she wore, but it was the sword at her hip worthy of a raised eyebrow. Few people were allowed to be armed in the presence of the First Prince: I'd worn no sword today and so divested myself of nothing, but Hakram had left behind his axe and Vivienne a surprisingly high quantity of knives before we were allowed into this wing of the palace. A point was being made by Hasenbach, one directed at me: I trust Rozala Malanza to be armed and standing behind me. Procer is not so divided as you think. The other one behind Hasenbach I did not know, though he was quite aged – if bearing that burden rather well, hair having gone a distinguished silver instead of white or falling – and wearing well-tailored but otherwise rather humble robes. On his right shoulder two pale hands intertwined had been embroidered, which struck me as priestly imagery, but I would not assume anything in a place like Salia. I imagined introductions would come soon enough, regardless.

The First Prince waited to speak until Hakram had come to stand at my right, a towering pillar of steel and muscle, and Vivienne at my left – just as whip-slender and hard-eyed as in her thieving days, but grown steady in a way she'd never been while Named.

"Welcome to Salia, Queen Catherine," the First Prince of Procer greeted me.

It'd been about a year since I'd last seen Cordelia Hasenbach, though this would be our first meeting outside the unearthly domain of darkness and cold that I'd used as our bridge when I still stood Queen of Winter. As was often her habit she'd dressed in the dark blue that was from the heraldry of her native Rhenia, the cut of it conservative – her neckline ended an inch beneath her collarbones – but close on her frame. It was flattering, though there was no hiding that Hasenbach had been born with a warrior's build: tall and broad-shouldered, with a strong jaw and hale complexion. Her discreet touches of cosmetics, golden eye shadow that made the vivid blue of her eyes stand out even more and the painted nails at the end of the wrists revealed by sleeves ending in an undercut of puffy lace, worked to shape her appearance rather than to change it, which I thought clever of her. If she'd tried to hide her features it would have made her look comical, while as it stood her height and haleness only enhanced the palpable weight of her presence. Her crown was as a simple circlet of pale gold, holding back long golden curls I'd always considered to be the most appealing part of Cordelia Hasenbach – rich and full, they cascaded down her back in perfect ringlets.

"Your hospitality has been impeccable, Your Most Serene Highness," I replied.

She inclined her head in acknowledgement.

"Our honoured general Princess Rozala Malanza requires little introduction for you, I am told," Cordelia smiled, "but I expect my other attendant is not so well-known."

My elbow moved towards Vivienne, softly and as if by happenstance, and her own pushed back against mine. Good, so she did know.

"Lady Dartwick?" I said.

"Unless I am sorely mistaken we are in the presence of Brother Simon of Gorgeault, current head of the Holy Society," Vivienne smiled. "It is an honour to meet such a distinguished colleague, Brother Simon."

"As I am honoured to meet you, Lady Dartwick," the old man replied, lips quirking.

That smile had been almost roguish, I thought. Must have been a heartbreaker in his youth, that one. Regardless he was not in priest robes, so he should be a lay brother who'd taken no vows. Interesting Hasenbach would want him here for this, though. There were implications to that. The First Prince wordlessly invited me to sit and there was a discreet shuffle as the order of seating was seen to. Myself first, as reigning queen, then Vivienne as my designated successor, then Rozala as a ruling princess in her own right and then the broad equivalence in rank between Brother Simon and Adjutant – who while Named was a villain and only actually owed lordly address under the Tower's law. A small swarm of servants brought trays of silver bearing a tea pot of Ashuran porcelain and matching cups, as well honey to sweeten the brew.

"They are Yan Tei leaves," Hasenbach pleasantly told me. "Bitterer than the Baalite imports and the plants of the Thalassocracy, though I find they have a richer taste."

My own passing familiarity with tea came largely through Aisha's stock – which was Baalite leaves mixed with cheaper Ashuran ones – and the few times Black had served some while we were in Ater. His were from another country across the Tyrian Sea, though, which I suspected to be where the Ranger's father was from. He didn't break out the cups often, which didn't surprise me given the astronomical cost of even a single pot's worth of brew. It was one of the few luxuries he indulged in, which I'd always found rather amusingly subdued of him given the sheer amount of power at his disposal. I'd brushed up on etiquette before beginning the journey to Salia and made sure all my closest companions did as well, so none of us touched the brew after it was poured for us save when Hakram sweetened his own with honey. Princess Rozala did the same, I noted with amusement, and looked somewhat discomfited that only the orc at the table shared her tastes.

"So what is this palace, if you don't mind my asking?" I said.

"It was the winter home of the Merovins, in the days where they still numbered many," the First Prince said. "After their line waned it became the favoured location for winter solstice balls instead, though it had not seen that use since the Great War."

"Not been in a feasting mood?" I idly said.

"There were better uses for our coin and hours," Hasenbach replied. "The latter is even harder to replace than the former, I have found."

Was that an invitation to stop wasting time? I wouldn't exactly mind. Every day spent dancing around what needed to be done was one more day tossed away as our truce with the Dead King came closer to ending. I understood the Principate had its pride and its ways, but the Principate was also on the brink of annihilation and more than slightly on fire. There was dignity and then there was idiocy.

"Ah," I said, drawl thickening, "are we to actually talk, then, or do we continued this pleasantly inane ritual of taking each other's measure? We were past that a year ago, as far as I'm concerned."

Malanza let out a choking sound, but my eyes were on Hasenbach. She had presence, as much as ever, but I wasn't feeling... weight off of her. The kind Name would bring to bear simply by being. Might be she was on the more discreet side of things, when it came to that, but that would be rather odd for a ruler. Temper tended to get ripples going, through, so it was worth a try. The Warden of the West studied me for a moment and then allowed for an amused half-smile. She seemed, I thought, tired. It only occurred to me then that the golden eye shadow might not be artifice of beauty but meant instead to hide the dark circles of someone gone too long without sleep. Still, not a hint huh. I'd be unusual for a fresh Named to have that much control over their power, but then this Cordelia Hasenbach and not a farmboy with a grudge and an old sword. She'd held the reins of the greatest empire on the surface of Calernia for years before she'd even had a Name. If she had one.

"I have spent more than twelve hours preparing for this conversation, did you know?" Cordelia ruefully said. "Some of the finest minds in my service studied ever scrap of knowledge we have of you, from your favourite wine to the tactics of your earliest battles."

"And this is what you came up with?" I replied, brow raising as I cast a look around us.

"It all seems rather pointless, does it not?" the First Prince said. "Yet what can I possibly arrange that would bring to bear even the tenth of the wroth of an angel, or a fraction of the horrors of the Folly? We have nothing that can move if you if you do not wish to be moved, and more masterful hands than we have failed to use you. It is an unpleasant truth, this, and not one I find it easy to face."

"We have been at war almost as long as we've been speaking," I acknowledged. "And there are things about your country I despise, and likely always will. The grounds for alliance between us are not fondness or kinship."

"Yet my people are in dire need of your help," Hasenbach said. "And so as you have proposed let us talk."

That was as clear an offer as I'd get, I figured, so I took her up on it.

"You do not seem to be Named," I said.

Cordelia Hasenbach brought her porcelain cup to her mouth and inhaled from the brew before taking a cautious sip.

"I am not one of the Chosen, or the Damned," she confirmed, elegantly setting down her cup.

I hid my relief. It might be useful to have a heroic First Prince holding up the Accords from her side, but to be honest it wasn't worth the risks coming with the Intercessor being able to meddle with Cordelia directly. Rather less elegantly I reached for my own cup and took a sip. I didn't grimace, because I wasn't a damned savage, but it looked like Hakram had been showing wisdom in honeying his. Wasn't exactly an avid admirer of sweets, though, so even then it'd be rather like trying to put out a barn fire by throwing sharpeners at it.

"Have your spies passed on recent news from the northern fronts?" Cordelia asked.

"We've only ever had rumours from Lycaonese lands," I frankly replied. "As for the rest, we know the general state of it – Cleves was reclaimed, Hainaut's last lines are on the edge of collapse – but little more."

"Prince Papenheim has used the truce to solidify the lines in Hainaut, though the Dead King has seemingly massed around six hundred thousand soldiers to break them open anew when the three months end," the First Prince said. "Hannoven has fallen, as you likely know, and Rhenia has been scoured save for a handful of fortresses where my subjects suffer siege. Only one fortress remains standing in Twilight's Pass, and when it falls – and fall it will, given the great host waiting before it – the Principality of Bremen will follow in short order. Only Neustria will remain then, and I am told its lowlands will be effectively impossible to defend against an enemy with such overwhelming superiority in numbers."

A heartbeat of silence passed in the wake of the stark assessment the First Prince of Procer herself had just spoken of the war she was about to resume losing.

"Cleves has been reclaimed," Cordelia Hasenbach acknowledged. "But at great cost. Four Chosen died and more than twenty thousand trained soldiers. Meanwhile the Enemy's ranks swell equally with every dead, be they farmer or princess."

The fair-haired princess sat stiff-backed, but her voice was raw.

"My generals now believe that the battles for Cleves might in fact have been a trap," she said. "The fighting was meant to bleed our number of professional soldiers, you see. To thin the number of Chosen and leave as much as a third of Procer's armies stranded behind enemy lines when Hainaut falls and the dead hordes close the circle behind them."

Cordelia Hasenbach raised her cup again, hand forcefully steady, and took a sip. The porcelain cup then returned to the plate with so small a sound it might as well have been silent. The reclamation of Cleves, I thought, was the closest thing the Principate had known to a victory since the Dead King had begun invading. Malanza had fought there. I looked at her now, and though her face as ashen the fact that she did not disagree spoke volumes. How much of a blow must it have been, to come to realize even that sole victory had been a greater defeat in the making?

"I will not lie to you, Queen Catherine," she said. "You would find out regardless, given your ties to the Eyes of the Empire and the surprising skill of your Jacks. When the truce ends, if hostilities resume the Principate will fall within five months at most."

Her frank assessment of the state of Procer's northern fronts had rung loud in the silence, but this? Coming from her, of all people? Even Hakram stilled in surprise.

"The last strongholds of Hainaut might hold for two months, perhaps," the First Prince evenly said. "After which the dead will tear into Brabant and the masses of refugees there, which will within another month make the numbers of the Dead King too large to successfully fight on the field. If the armies in Cleves intervene to prop up Hainaut we will lose Cleves, and Hainaut will then fall to a pincer regardless."

She paused.

"The Morgentor, the last fortress of Twilight's Pass, will likely hold until the other fronts have collapsed," Cordelia said, a hint of pride to her voice. "Yet it will fall, and though the truce you bought us has allowed the southernmost of my people to flee into Alamans' lands we..."

Her voice broke a little there.

"We do not retreat, Catherine Foundling," she said. "Even when we should. It is not in our nature. Some will go as ordered, but more will flock to walls and fortresses and they will die screaming defiance against the dark. It will be the end of us as a people."

I said nothing to that, for what was there to say?

"When those fronts collapse so will Procer," the blue-eyed woman told me. "Already the cracks have begun. I have stripped the western principalities bare of grain to feed the heartlands and bare of men to fill our ranks, but keeping the northern armies supplied has emptied our granaries and our treasury. Foreign trade has broken down and the principalities untouched by war grow weary of paying their taxes to Salia. Even if the Kingdom Under lifted its sanctions, we would not be able to afford their armaments. There will be starvation, and despite my best efforts shortages of steel ensure that we can hardly even keep our current armies in fighting fit."

She slowly breathed out.

"I expect that the moment Salia falls the Principate will end," she said. "Southern principalities will secede and form alliances with each other and abroad, throwing the rest of us to the dogs. To be frank, I'd expect Ariel of Arans to offer to pay you fealty for protection before it even came to that – and neither Bayeux nor Orne would be far behind."

Cordelia Hasenbach met my eye squarely.

"You must understand, now, that I do not have a single thing to threaten you with," she quietly said. "I have no armies to send forth, no coin to cajole or coerce with and my alliances are weaker than yours. Besides, those allies I do have would not war on you for my sake, for you have them bound by debt and respect. I have through steel and insult ended any inclination between us that could now be called on, much less between our respective peoples."

The thing was, there was a part of me that was savouring the words. The same part that remembered my every desperate plea to this same woman to call off her armies and rapacious princes. That remembered every spurned offer of peace, every sentence of scathing dismissal and barely-veiled contempt. She'd been so godsdamned arrogant, telling me she could choose the fate of Callow because she had the swords and the righteousness and that I should just go into exile like a good little thug after shutting my mouth and abdicating. And now she needed me. They all did, her entire alliance and the heroes behind them too. Even the Grey Pilgrim had good as admitted to it. They had sneered and spat and tried to kill me, and now I fucking had them. Cordelia Hasenbach had laid out before me the death of her nation and her people, and yet I could not help but think that they'd brought this all on themselves. That if they'd left Callow alone, that if they'd let me fix it instead of hounding me every step for their own hungry purposes, they wouldn't be tumbling down the cliff right now.

Then, to my surprise, she pushed back her seat and rose. Not well, in opposition to the understated elegance of her every other movement. It was clear her leg had been broken and not finished healing. The pain had her lips thinning as Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer and Warden of the West, knelt before me.

"I have a responsibility," Cordelia said, "to the people of the Principate. To rule, to guide and to protect. To ease their worst inclinations and spur their finest ones. I have failed them in this."

She was proud, Hasenbach. Not the kind of person something like this would come easily to. Not someone to do it unless she believed it to be necessary. Rozala was halfway to her feet, protesting her ruler kneeling before a foreign queen, but neither of us paid her attention.

"I have no right to ask grace of you now, and no might to compel it," the First Prince said. "So I can only beg that you act as I did not, and help those I cannot."

That I'd savoured this, for even a moment, tasted like ashes in my mouth. Because it wasn't her or her reign she was begging for. It was her people. And while I might not be leading a crusade into Procer, I could not deny it felt poisonous that I could be in this moment and begged at instead of begging. Not because I enjoyed the helplessness of it, but because I'd never liked to think of myself as someone who would need to be implored to save lives.

"Get up," I said, voice rough. "Enough. There was no need for this."

I pushed back my own chair, rising to my feet, and the eyes of both Malanza and Brother Simon went to me. Watching, weighing.

"Get up, Hasenbach," I said. "You and I are going for a walk."

For the majority: "Get up, Hasenbach," I said. "You and I are going for a vote."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

For Liliet: Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Insanenoodlyguy

"We do not retreat, Catherine Foundling," she said. "Even when we should. It is not in our nature. Some will go as ordered, but more will flock to walls and fortresses and they will die screaming to vote for PGTE on topwebfiction."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

onedollargum

I like this the best of the vote comments. XD

frolamiz

"Get up, Hasenbach," I said. "You and I are going to vote for the guide."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

You really should rub it in at least a little, Cat.

Make it clear to Proceran leadership and the various Princes/Princesses, and the other power bases in Procer that they owe you and Callow big time over this.

And that a return to Procer's typical foreign policy after the Dead King is dealt with will not be tolerated.

magesbe

I'm sure lines will be laid down. But there's no need to rub in that they will owe Callow after this. Everyone knows it. And unspoken by well known debts are often more powerful than spoken ones.

nimelennar

In our world, maybe.

In a world based on narrative, forcing the "good guys" to agree to something under extreme duress is only ever going to backfire in your face. And a Procer which repaid Callow coming to their aid (after first repelling an attempted invasion and annexation, no less) with treachery would get smacked down just as hard by narrative forces.

To say nothing of the fact that Cordelia already knows exactly what she's asking, and that she has nothing to offer in return.

No, Cat needs to do this in such a way that Hasenbach maintains her dignity.

IDKWhoitis

I think either signing the Accords right now, or at the end of the War will be the best way to handle this. Establishing who the actual enemy is, and presenting an alternative to the End of Days, should be top priority of this meeting. Even without narrative forces, Procer would be persona non grata across Calernia if they betrayed the hand that helped them up in their darkest hour. There would be no convincing other nations that they could be anything resembling an ally.

The Procer of the Pre-War died with the Coup. There will be no returning to Status-Quo after this war. Hells, no nation that went into this war is leaving the same as before it. Short of Bard hitting a Retcon button, forces are already in motion that will make this Great War the funeral of the Age of Wonders, and the Coup of Salia will be recorded as the Time of Death.

Liliet

Huh.

Yeah, this sounds about right.

Liliet

Catherine already feels shitty enough about this.

It's not the Princes and Princesses that she came to save, and it's not on their behalf, nor her own, that Cordelia is kneeling.

Andrew Mitchell

> It's not the Princes and Princesses that she came to save, and it's not on their behalf, nor her own, that Cordelia is kneeling.

Well said. ♥

Shikkarasu

I feel like this is one of the calculated, rehearsed approaches that Cordelia prepared for in the past 12 hours. A sort of "If Cat drops pretense then: grovel, because Catherine has a history of respecting passionate Guardians of the Common Folk". I love the speech and I want to trust Cordelia, but someone of her station and MO definitely considered this as the best way to manipulate Cat into doing what they need.

"We have nothing that can move if you if you do not wish to be moved. Please help," is exactly what would move the Queen of Callow.

All that said, I look forward to being wrong. Cordelia for Prime Minister, 2019.

Liliet

I'm thinking of it as something like Hakram cutting off his hand. Absolutely a deliberately calculated move made to incite a specific emotional reaction based on your knowledge at another person.

Completely honest and genuine at the same time.

The 'manipulation' part is just that it wouldn't have worked as well on most people who aren't Catherine (like, imagine Kairos's reaction to this. Or Malicia's), and Cordelia is using her knowledge of what she is like to get sympathy.

No lies were involved, but Cordelia has a better read on Cat than Cat thinks at the end.

stevenneiman

I think she's making a point of not acting like Cordelia herself did. This isn't about power dynamics or bargaining positions, it's about doing what needs done. Especially because the power dynamics and bargaining positions are already quite clearly established. Cat has about as much power over Cordelia in reality as an absolute monarch has over their subjects in theory. She's helping Procer because she wants to, not because there's literally anything at all Procer could do if she decided to just sit back and let them all die.

pagesbe

I like the duality here. For Catherine, on the one hand, this is satisfying. As she thought in the chapter, the boot is on the other foot now. On the other hand, that Cordelia feels like she needs to beg probably hurt, especially when she's been trying to make herself not look like a monster in the eyes of others.

major R

Catherine is a monster, no matter what she believes or does. It's a state of being, not a particular act or action. She wins impossible battles. She seizes power from things that should not, cannot be touched. She makes impossible allies as easily as she dismembers foes. She is fundamentally unlike any being to walk the continent right now and it is unfair of anyone, including herself, to assert that she actually keeps with the Below – she is the adviser to a pair of fledgling rogue Gods who ostensibly keep to the Below, but for all intents and purposes she is a contractor for them and nothing more, and she drags their being more to the Above with every change she makes on their behalf or arguments she picks. Never will they actually cross that thresh-hold between them, but much like Catherine, her proposed city, and her proposed new world order, they may eventually come to sit just upon it. Night & Twilight.

Cordelia is right to beg. You don't reason with monsters, you either stab them or you beg their mercy. She started with reasoning, and then a bit of Proceran diplomacy, but both totally failed in their purpose and led to immense long-term losses for Cordelia, even the actions that made her gains in the short-term. A total defeat.

Now, Cordelia is about to get taken for a wild ride on the begrudging friendship train and she's probably going to hate every minute of it, but in the end she will probably begin to agree with and support the person she had the conviction to cast thousands and thousands of her countrymen at to stop, even in the face of the pressing undead menace. Her act of legitimate begging will be forgotten, if all goes well, and she will finally treat Catherine with some of the authority and levity that the Black Queen has always demanded, all while we listen to Catherine's internal monologue talk about how everyone's got her wrong and if only people would just step aside and let her run her little corner of the planet for long enough to turn it into something other than a disaster zone she could just gallivant off into the sunset and never kill a dude ever again. Hardly acknowledging that, whether they step aside or not, she seems to get her way anyway- just slower, more arduously, and more "accidentally".

Just like every other monstrous dictator in the making, volunteering to retire or not. Yeah, I see you over there Pinochet. You're not fooling anybody.

Walter

Catherine crucified hundreds of prisoners after Liesse. I don't think we are about to get confused as to whether she is a good person. Like, she went to Dead King to try and get him to attack Procer herself a few chapters back.

There is a writing toolbox and having a character torture a prisoner is a character revealing beat. Having them do it to hundreds of people is an explicit 'this person has Herod/Hitler/Sauron energy' beat.

The important thing, tho, is that Cat doesn't SEE HERSELF that way. In her mind there is a big dif between her and Diabolist. Like, I don't think she ever updated her self image from 'plucky underdog trying my best to do what is right'. She wears the cloak of stolen souls and carries a banner explaining that having reasons for things is for suckers, but I don't think she gets how that looks to other people. "Yeah, his name is Deadhand, and he has an evil bone hand and eats people, but, like, he brings me weed and likes honey in his tee."

This update is probably jarring to her because it feels strange that someone would have to beg her to try and preserve human life on this continent. Like, shouldn't they realize that she would have done that anyway? Who do they think she is, some kind of Villain?

The disjunction that's currently happening, tho, is that Cat doesn't grok how severe the Dead King seems to Procer. She was Winter Fresh Cat when she met him, and I think she just hasn't taken another look at his deal since she became sane again. In her mind he is just another player in her games, civilized and urbane, someone to balance against Bard and Tyrant and the Black/Malicia relationship.

Whereas Cordelia understands him as the end of humanity. She doesn't understand Cat's POV, which is that dude is someone you can negotiate with and get truces from or military alliances with, a cool cat named Neshamah. To Cordelia he is just a wildfire burning down the world.

I tend to lean more towards Hasenbach's view on DK, myself. I think the way he behaved towards Cat is a mask that he uses, and I'm hoping that this meeting will help Cat see the truth of him.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, Catherine forgot that not everyone is a god or can directly phone one for help. Personally, my vision of the DK is the same as yours.

Shveiran

Most of what you say is true, yet again, I'd argue that as in most instances the question "is Cat a monster?" is best answered with "Compared to what?".

At the end of the day, there is no denying that Cat has done monstrous things; but I see no reason not to extend the same category to all current rulers in Calerna, bar none. I suppose Tyrant, Hierarch, Black and Malicia, or Andronike and Kumena, hardly need much arguing on this point, but I think it is a fact that the Blood, Cordelia and the Ashurans have all shown a blatant disregard for human life unless it was their own people. As for the rest of the League, well, they are going along with two madmen and grabbing up all commerce-relevant spots they can, and I haven't seen them drag their feet much, so they don't get a pass.

Now, we could argue that they don't raise the dead and that this makes them less of a monster than Cat; honestly, I don't feel that way, but that is beside the point in my opinion: past a certain threshold, arguing "he is worst though" absolves you not at all.

If we consider the means, they are all monstrous; that some botehr with a shiny coat of paint earns them no point in my book.

If we consider the ends, the matter becomes very debatable; I guess only Cat and Cordelia have a shot at the Greater Good justification, but whether that is acceptable or not is a very personal judgment.

Ultimately, though, I don't think morality is not why Cordelia feels she has to act this way.

Cat is a monster, objectively, at least in the sense major R enunciated above: she is a force shaping the world, with the winds of fate blowing in her sails, doing the impossible every few weeks; and that monster Cordelia has scorned, provoked and bled countless times.

She has begun a feud, and chosen time and again to throw fuel in that fire because she judged the alternative worse. Whether or not you think she was justified in making that choice, the gamble backfired, and she stands before that monster now knowing not only that she could kill her and her people if she so wished – but that the monster need do nothing to doom her to that fate. That nothing but the monster decision to stand by her side, bleed her people and her resources, and gamble her own life will possibly save her kingdom from annihilation. She needs the monster to be a martyr, and that is not someone you can be sure to be granted by a dear friend, not fully.

And she knows she has earned no trust from Catherine Founding, no good will whatsoever, and more than a few reasons for enmity.

Of course she is terrified. How could a beggar not be? Her fate and her people is in someone's hands, and of an enemy she willingly made to boot.

Liliet

Yep.

Catherine can take as much advantage of the situation as she can. Appealing to her goodwill and heroism is literally the only leverage Cordelia has at this point – be as pitiful as possible, so she'll want to help and not ask as much as she can in return.

Cordelia has no choice but to try and take advantage of these traits of Catherine's – because otherwise, even with the obvious fact Catherine came here to fight the Dead King, Procer is about to become a province of Callow.

Fayhem

> otherwise, even with the obvious fact Catherine came here to fight the Dead King, Procer is about to become a province of Callow.

I don't think so? There's a term for trying to absorb a polity several times larger than yourself in population as well as landmass, and that term is "strategic overreach". Cordelia's right that if the Principate splinters – and if DK isn't stopped, it is in fact on the very verge of that – some of the southern principedoms would beg to get invited to the Callowan Let's Not All Die party, but there's no scenario where Catherine could take and hold something the size of all Procer regardless of whether she wanted to. Triumphant was brought down by narrative logic in the Guideverse, that's true, but she'd almost certainly have been just as doomed in our world by the simple scale of her strategic overreach. Taking is always easier than holding.

Honestly, even if you're speaking more figuratively than literally and you downgrade the scale of ambition to vassalage (or even a level of really severe concessions) rather than outright absorption that still wouldn't be sustainable long-term. If Procer survives Procer will recover, and when Procer recovers it will once again be in an objectively more powerful position than Callow thanks to its greater population base and resources. And at that point they would start re-evaluating the concessions they were driven into under duress with a very jaundiced eye indeed. Catherine is much too smart to try to force a Guideverse version of the Treaty of Versailles onto Procer now, for exactly the reasons why that treaty was a dumb, dumb thing to do in the real world. That said, the last time Cat and Cordelia spoke Catherine was still Winter!Cat instead of F.U.N.!Cat and she was spitting raw Callowan spite at Cordelia over the DK situation to boot; it would be very plausible for Cordelia not to feel entirely confident that Catherine is more smart than spiteful about the level of concessions/whatever that she could feasibly extract from this situation.

Liliet

Do note that Callow post-allofthis will have a trade deal and mutual defense treaty (iirc) with Praes, putting it in a radically better position than it was ever in before, relative to Procer.

But yeah, Cordelia also cannot be confident Catherine will see the future situation projected in a way that favors Procer 😊

Liliet

I think Catherine knows full well what a menace Dead King is. She cannot fully process it, no, but the way she sees him is EXACTLY why she's uncomfortable with this. She also sees the end of humanity, and she doesn't like the idea of being BEGGED to stop it. If it was just politics, if it was what you said – civilized people bargaining – Catherine would be full on enjoying the spectacle.

But it's the end of humanity coming, and Catherine is not a fan of being treated like she doesn't understand that herself.

And I think Cordelia knows this and hoped for / expected this exact result. That based on her assessment of her personality, this is how you get Catherine Foundling to actually drop grudges and do her best to help you, to push back against your helplessness instead of taking advantage of it. This GOT to Catherine, and I expect Cordelia did this because she knew it would.

Andrew Mitchell

> And I think Cordelia knows this and hoped for / expected this exact result. That based on her assessment of her personality, this is how you get Catherine Foundling to actually drop grudges and do her best to help you, to push back against your helplessness instead of taking advantage of it. This GOT to Catherine, and I expect Cordelia did this because she knew it would.

Huh, I think you're right. I didn't get that when I read the chapter but this makes perfect sense given all our previous evidence of how smart Cordelia is.

I wonder if Cat's going to call Cordelia on this bullshit during their walk?

Liliet

No part of it is bullshit tho.

The conclusion of 'she wouldn't do this if she didn't think she had to' is in Cat's head and on Cat, Cordelia never said she didn't think Catherine would help if she didn't do this.

Shveiran

Life on Calernia, not humanity, but nitpicking aside I agree.

With that said, it begs the question of how much of a bitch Cordelia has to be to have acted as she has if she had that good a read on Catherine.

I'd much rather believe she is gambling all in on the Black Queen being a decent human being because, well, if she isn't than Procer is already screwed.

Mental Mouse

Back then she didn't have a full read on Catherine. Cat has proved herself several more times since their prior negotiations.

Shveiran

She did, which is why I hope it is the second option and not the first. Mostly because it seems Cordelia is here to stay and I would prefer not to have a reason to hold her in such contempt.

Liliet

Cordelia didn't have ANY read on Catherine when she was first declaring the Crusade, and she was only forming it during their Hero Winter negotiations. Not helped by Catherine deciding to go with pomp, formality and listening to Akua for that period. Remember how Catherine managed to surprise her with sharpness / understanding of intrigue in their last pre-Northern Crusade talk? Cordelia got a much better understanding by the time Cat was begging her for a break pre-Keter, and at that time she would have been willing to deal if she could have (as it was, if she agreed to anything it literally just wouldn't hold, leaving Catherine with the same problem and Cordelia deposed).

By now, between Cat's warning about Dead King and a portion of Callowan spite, and all her actions since she came back, and likely Augur's advice, Cordelia knows how to move her. First make it up to her (Catherine thinks her admissions are satisfying for a reason), then push even further to make her actively uncomfortable so she won't seek more of it.

It's a good move.

Javvies

IIRC, Cordelia and Cat would have started their chats at some point early in the book 3 => book 4 timeskip, since the anchor artifact got delivered to Cordelia by Thief in the Book 3 epilogue.

So probably at least a year before the Crusade kicked off. Admittedly, things would have needed to be moving some months before that point, and Cat had been knocking off Heroes publicly enough that it was known about in Callow, so it probably got picked up by spies.

mavant

I doubt Neshamah wants to end humanity; where else would he get raw materials?

No, it's just about changing the status quo. Because the status isn't quo, and he just needs to rule it.

mavant

I always thought wakeleaf was tobacco or coca, rather than weed.

Walter

I dunno, I think 'Catherine is always a little high' makes a lot of sense.

Like, she just found out Cordelia didn't get a Name.

Sane Cat: "Shit, a mighty Named would have been really helpful to stop Dead King's ongoing atrocities. Thousands and thousands of people will die because of this."

High/Petty Cat: "Haha! There's one in your eye, Fucking Bard! Your lute sucks and you suck!"

caoimhinh

Yeah, it's understandable that she has mixed feelings about this.

On one hand, Procer has finally gotten down of their high horse and stop their presumptuousness and arrogant attitude when dealing with Catherine. But on the other hand, Catherine is not happy that it had to come to such slaughter for this to happen. If anything that may have her angrier at Procer, that each and every time Cat makes a truce with Procer it took a lot of devastation for them to seat and have a talk.

At least now everyone on the Crusade side will stop that initial bullshit of “we can’t have a Villain as Queen of Callow, we have to bring them freedom through our army” (both Cordelia and Pilgrim had said that in the past).

Liliet

I think Cordelia calculated this quite well – that at some point, when you have no bargaining advantage left to lose, the best way to get things out of Catherine is to be pitiful about it.

She is a hero, and right now that’s Cordelia’s only hope.

Rey d`Tutto

A Heroic Villain.
Necromantic Steeds aside, she’s still a Dark Priestess,
First Under the Night.

Liliet

I was referring to actual personality traits / motivations as it is used in our world, not Guideverse’s political bullshit labels 😊

mavant

Perhaps “Well-Intentioned Anti-Villain”, by TvTropes’ terminology:

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Analysis/AntiVillain?from=Main.SlidingScaleOfAntiVillains>

tithin

This next chapter is going to be superb.

Soronel Haetir

“Get up, Hasenbach,” I said. “You and I are going to vote.”

Someguy

Kneeling in private is pointless ego stoking on Cordy’s part for drama. Only the public kneeling of the 1st Prince of Procer before the Queen of Callow will suffice.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. First that could legitimately hurt her ability to rule. More of the house of light rebels, the people riot, the pettier nobles that don’t comprehend the big picture see it as a moment to take the throne. It doesn’t help Cat to have Cordelia capitulate if it just makes her a less powerful ally.

What she did do was do it in front of a woman who hates her enough to see her dead one day, and who has the best claim to her throne if she's disposed, to say nothing of the 3 rulers of Callow. Her ego is well and truly smashed.

IDKWhoitis

Like a previous discussion about the nature of symbols in the book (can't remember if it was Black or Malica who gave the lesson to Cat)

The message was transmitted clear to anyone who mattered, and the pointless spectacle was avoided for the sake of expediency and to prevent unfortunate consequences that accompany public showings of such things.

Shveiran

Yet it was, so far, only spectacle.

I don't think it was an empty symbol, not coming from someone that sees the role of First Prince as Cordelia does.

But I am most curious to see what Cordelia is really willing to offer; this is an acknowledgment of weakness, but not repentance: all Cordelia has said is that when it was Cat doing the beggar, she gave her the cold shoulder. That's all well and good, but it erases nothing that has previously happened, and is not even an apology.

I'm very curious about next chapter. Cat's stance will be interesting, but Cordelia's even more.

Liliet

I get the impression that Cordelia is basically acknowledging that this is not a negotiation, this is a planning session of what Catherine wants done, and her voice is going to be basically advisory. "Oh this is a concession you don't want to extract because it would blow up this and that down the line". Which is the only way to deal with it at this point tbh, kind of like how Amadeus convinced Cat about the mage academy.

Liliet

> What she did do was do it in front of a woman who hates her enough to see her dead one day, and who has the best claim to her throne if she's disposed, to say nothing of the 3 rulers of Callow. Her ego is well and truly smashed.

OH THIS IS A FACT YO THANK YOU SO MUCH FOR POINTING IT OUT

RoflCat

To paraphrase something I heard:

"The ones who care don't matter, and the ones who matter don't care"

Cordelia just listed out how Procer is essentially on the edge of the cliff, barely survived being pushed off due to Cath's truce with Dead King.

So to her, anyone who would find fault in her begging Cath for help is not someone she'd care to pay attention to right now. And as can be seen in this chapter, Cath does not care that Cord is breaking some kind of etiquette to kneel and prove her sincerity.

Liliet

Oh, Catherine cares.

Cordelia knows exactly what she is doing, and exactly who she's addressing. This is as calculated a move as she's ever made, and it has achieved exactly the purpose she wanted.

Oh, it was at the cost of her personal dignity, but Cordelia has always, I think, cared about that more in light of how it reflected on dignity of those with whose consent she ruled, rather than her own pride. That much is a low price to pay, when she can pity-manipulate the Black Queen into dismissing the charges.

Shveiran

I think RoflCat was talking about the Procerans?

Liliet

> And as can be seen in this chapter, Cath does not care that Cord is breaking some kind of etiquette to kneel and prove her sincerity.

What I was referring to.

Catherine cares 😊

ByVectron!

That listing of exactly how near the edge, how dire the state of Procer, that wasn't all for Cat- it was for Roz as well, lest she think that she might want to take a swing for the Prince. She was laying it all out in cold, stark lines, "Procer is f'ed, right in the A. We will last for a little while yet, and some will fall later than others, but they...we... will all fall, and soon. The coup was not only ill advised, it makes exactly ZERO difference to the ability of Procer and her people to survive annihilation at the hands of the Dead King."

Hitogami

Thanks for an excellent chapter.

Emily

That was not what I expected and like Cat though I want to relish her change and subservience it also terrifies me for the indication of how bad things are

Aston

And that's when the Kingdom Under cracks open the machine gun caches for sale.

Red Letter beats the Undead?...

IDKWhoitis

I wonder if the Gnomes can be persuaded to make an exception...

Because if DK gets to eat Calernia, there's no way he is going to be restrained by the Gnomes alone.

Sparsebeard

I mean, I fail to see how an army of skellies can stand against friggin Gundams and nukes able to literally sink landmasses...

JJR

They probably can't, but they also can't drown. Somehow I can only imagine an underwater Dead Kingdom being even worse.

konstantinvoncarstein

They are able to sink entire kingdoms, and possess fleets of flying machines impervious to magic. I don't think Neshamah holding the whole continent could threaten them. Furthermore, the narrative would smack him very hard if he conquered Calernia.

Shveiran

I think the narrative would smack him hard if he tried. If he achieved that, Calernia would quickly become even more of a background feature than Keter, though. He'd be kind of safe, I think, or at least not more in danger. But getting there is a very slippery slope, because until there is even one enemy on Calernia she is the "villain that can't be defeated", which guarantees he will be. God, I love narrative logic made physics.

Liliet

SAME

IT'S GREAT

lennymaster

Was any imperviousnes to magic ever mentioned? The only thing said was screaming things in the sky and destroyed kingdoms, the rest we inferred. And all that was a good while ago, when magic was not nearly as developed. Who knows? Maybe Masego cold have played fly swatter with jets and aircraft carriers when he still had his magic.

konstantinvoncarstein

"They stopped laughing, when they lost contact with all their colonies. It was already too late by then. The Yan Tei have the only surviving records on the subject, and they say that the fleet of metal ships that came for Kerguel darkened the sky itself – it could be seen from miles away."

[...]

"They sunk the island into the sea," Black said.

"Sorceries Kerguel had spent decades refining slid off the ships like water off a duck's back. The explosions were larger than anything that's been seen before or since. By the time the gnomes were done, there was not a living soul left on the barren rocks."

Book 1, Chapter 15: Company

I was wrong in that aircrafts are not mentioned, but I was right about the anti-magic. And you said that magic has advanced on Calernia, but do you think the Gnomes did not? I doubt they sitted idle during thousands of years.

Furthermore, if they are able to see what Goblins do underground, they are probably aware of the most recent advances in magical theory.

Fayhem

I mean, if the ships are darkening the sky I'd call that a pretty solid indication that in fact they are aircraft. Given that nobody else in creation has aircraft it would make sense that they'd call them "flying ships" instead.

konstantinvoncarstein

And Gnomes probably have Named on their own.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I don't see why the Gnomes would have trouble beating the DK. Bullets forged of holy silver and guns should let them mow down undead legions. Then drop some nukes into Serenity kill source of fresh bodies. After that its just a mop up mission. I didn't get the indication the gnomes were slouches in sorcery or tech.

lennymaster

Do the Gnomes have holy bullets, would they not need priests for that? We have seen holy water (wich did nothing against Winter Cat's zombies) but never blessed swordes or armor. Was there ever an undead weaknes to silver mentioned? Can they even get to Serenity? Why would jets be immune to magic that rots stone into dust and takes up the entire sky of a sizable part of Calernia for a skrying ritual? And just what could he build with the dead of an entire continent and plenty of time? A giant necromantic spaceship made of bones? Magical monstrosities that can eat nukes like candy? Maybe he needs none of that and can just open a gate directly into the Gnomes capital and rip it apart in the span of minutes with his undead Named, Demons and devils, with the constructs he can make out of millions of corpses and the reanimated mages of Calernia. There was never any indication the Gnomes know shitall about magic, they certainly never interfered with magical WMDs. Maybe they feel secure enough to not bother or simply cant, no one knows.

Shveiran

The premise of the Guide is that Calernia is backwater country and there are real powerhouses beyond the sea. The gnomes seem to have technology and magic in par/slash beyond our own, whereas Calernian are at least five centuries behind.

I see no reason to believe that a host of undeads covering the continent would be an issue. Zombies have not been shown to be particularly hard tod estroy in this universe. If they can be killed with swords, why would nuking teh continent not work? And why wouldn't the gnomes be able to? A first world country in our timeline could address such a threat without too much of effort, and no risk. The Dead King is a CALERNIAN problem, not a WORLD ENDING one

Shveiran

Heck, it was established that the only relevant country in Calernia is the dwarfs. Do you remember what they could dish out?

Hellspirit

I love how human they are.

Author Unknown

Well, more of a limp, really.

frolamiz

They only need the Tyrant to join them to make a trio of limping rulers.

IDKWhoitis

An arguments can be made for the title of "3 Limping Scheming Tyrants"

Novice

Sounds like some Hierarch propaganda to be honest.

IDKWhoitis

The People's Truth is not propaganda, and even if it was, it would be of the best sort, it would be absolutely correct propaganda.

sivarajan

You mean "Absolutely Correct Propaganda."

Sylwoos

Why going for a walk on their bad leg when they could just sit back in their comfortable seat and continue the conversation?

Andrew Mitchell

It's private. And more relaxed than sitting on opposite sides of the table.

Shveiran

Couldn't say it better.

Liliet

More relaxed? Walking on a bad leg? I think you might need to update your definition a little bit, , ,

Andrew Mitchell

Not physically relaxed, but emotionally. Walking side by side is more emotionally comfortable than sitting facing each other over a table. It's more intimate. It promotes the feeling that they are in it together and they're heading in the same direction.

ninegardens

The rearrange the god damn couches! Sit on the same couch! Or Sit on the Couch and get Rozalia and Adjunt to carry the couch around the palace while your two spy masters chat or place chess or whatever.

Liliet

Anyway I'm betting on Catherine turning a 'walk' into a 'sit down' within like 3 minutes.

JJR

She might need to be in a specific location for the next part of the conversation. I'm hoping it's that one lake.

IDKWhoitis

This is the even darker reflection of that last conversation Cat had with Cordy before the War. Where Cat started off with admitting she had absolutely failed Callow, and then worked up her courage to walk away from a raw deal. Now Cordy worked up her courage to face the inevitable deal presented before her, admitting she had failed Procer.

At this point, Cat holds absolute leverage, because Procer cracked under it's own weight and the relentless waves of Dead, and even though Cat doesn't own a massive lever, she barely needs one to pick up and move all the pieces. If anything, the Coup was favorable for all parties involved. It divested Cordy of any illusions of Procer holding itself together, she doesn't need to try to save face or play the power game with a 2-7 off suit.

And above all things, Cat has been known as, while admittedly violent, still an someone who will act in good faith. Cat has shown repeatedly that she does not want to set the world on fire.

Unbowed by Angel's worth, unshaken by Demon's madness, and patron saint of disasters and burning battlefields, Cat is the person who needs to lead Calernia right now, and Cordy has effectively recognized it.

Bard must be kicking herself for getting distracted by Auger right now.

Novice

Ha! Two monarchs limping together, what a sight. And narratively appropriate both as rulers and personally.

Slick Rick

Cat's nearing hero territory here! The fact that she smothered her enjoyment of this and it was unthinkable to not help might make her... well, The Good Queen or Queen of Callow really aren't ever going to be her (not nearly stabby and vicious enough for her).

But I really like how meta the situation is; the Crusade always defeats Evil because they are in the right, but Catherine genuinely offered them every one of their goals as long as they don't destroy everything Callowan about Callow and they refused, thus invalidating the Crusade's righteousness and thus the tables inevitably flipped. I suppose I could see Hasenbach looking at Cat's record and expect everything she ever wanted destroyed (and probably set on fire) and Cat replacing the entire ruling class with stabbiier people that are loyal to her and would bleed the Principate dry on principle... as an opener to negotiations (after all, those were the terms she gave to Cat before the crusade). In a way, she's probably hoping Cat doesn't accept this, because as far as the story goes it would be a fantastic way to end the story of the current iteration of Procer (the corruption of Good becoming its own downfall, being destroyed by their own arrogance).

Javvies

Crusades don't always win. They just have an advantage. In theory, anyways.

But one of Dread Emperor Terribilis's crushed two consecutive Crusades so hard that the last five Crusades weren't aimed at Praes, but assumed at the Dead King instead.

So ... actually the Story is more that Crusades usually tend to lose, or at least, fail.

Huh. We know the Crusade against Triumphant basically worked ... Oh. Damn. The Bard thinks the only way she can get at the Dead King through Story is to have him playing the role of Triumphant, so when the "forces of Good" rise up against his Conquest, they get bonus Story points. The Bard works through Stories ... and calling a Crusade isn't a Story that works.

Liliet

I think Cordelia knew exactly how to manipulate Cat into pliability here. She's employed the 'righteous indignation' tactic against her before with success, although that negotiation never went anywhere in the end. As long as you're willing to discard dignity and any pretense of moral high ground and appeal purely on pitifulness, Catherine will be there. And that's the best hope Cordelia has right now.

Oshi

Exactly. Cordelia is way to good at this not to know what would work.

Simpli

Wasn't Callows Army also overstretched, filled with green recruits, bleeding coin and spent after too much campaigning? Somehow that sounds like its getting overvalued right now.

Novice

I think you're forgetting the experienced mid-tier officers; excellent generals like Juniper, Grem and Black; their siege expertise thanks to Legion training; force multipliers like the Knights, goblin munitions and the Woe and most importantly the entire Empire Everdark. Catherine isn't being overestimated.

Agent J

Green recruits, but a veteran core from three legions. Plus the Legions-in-Exile and the full might of the Empire Everdark.

Catherine is bringing three armies to the table, a truce that gives them time to organize, and a brighter tomorrow with the Accords.

Yea, Cat's not fresh as morning dew, but she's still in a far better position than Cordelia. A strong ally and, really, the only chance for the Principate to survive.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Let's not forget how absurd the Everdark forces are. Not only do they have absurd numbers of soldiers on par with Saint, when one of these super-soldiers falls the power can be immediately transferred to a new host resulting in an even more powerful super-soldier! Then if that wasn't enough they can pull the DK's favorite tactic: stealing the enemies strength in victory.

Their one weakness is dawn and I'm betting the DKs miasma and general darkness craps on the power of dawn. At a minimum Serenity won't have any dawn to stop the Drow.

I wonder if Above can make something like Night, but non-evil. Like it goes to your heirs, and you can only sacrifice animals you rightfully own plus yourself. Maybe sacrifice small drops of your own blood while you live? Good has a tradition of self-flagellation right?

Oshi

Death and consumption are baked into the Night in a way that seems unlikely. I suppose the closest is what the Daoine do but even that is leery and filled with necromancy.

Liliet

Well necromancy isn't inherently Evil, just gets a bad rep.

Shveiran

>>"Their one weakness is dawn and I'm betting the DKs miasma and general darkness craps on the power of dawn. At a minimum Serenity won't have any dawn to stop the Drow."

Actually...

>> from book 4, chapter 53

"Killing undead," I said. "Would it also grow the Night?"

The drow paled.

"Speak not of the Hidden Horror," Ivah whispered. "For its crown is dawn, and that pale light is the end of all things. Only the mad would enter the eye of the Host of Death."

Sugar Roll

They've been bloodied in the skirmishes in Iserre. They're not green anymore. The three month truce will give them some well needed R and R but I think the help from Callow and Cat's partnership with the Everdark is not enough against the Dead King.

I believe they need the entire continent against him. Get Praes and League involved and try to get the Kingdom Under to make a play for the lands underneath Keter.

Mental Mouse

Mostly right, but the lands underneath Keter are explicitly the Drow's job, and reward.

Shveiran

Are they? I thought that's what the dwarves would get, and the dwarves would mostly become surface based? Or, you know, something like the goblins that live underground but dare not dig too far below.

Liliet

No, dwarves were after the Everdark territory. That's why the drow had to leave, and why they now basically have no choice but to wage war against DK to the last drop of blood – they're essentially a whole nation of refugees.

Fate is a wager

It's hard to put in words how much i hate cordelia kneeling to cat. I understand why she did it but that only makes it a little better.

'Ladi Williams

I doubt you hated me r as much as cordy...

Liliet

Well, Catherine wasn't a fan either 😊

Making everyone involved uncomfortable was most definitely the exact point Cordelia was going for~

caoimhinh

It's quite sad that so much of the Procer's populace had to be massacred before its leadership finally recognized that they needed to stop acting like self-righteous bastards and finally sit down and have civilized talks with Catherine.

The same applies to Levant, of course, as Pilgrim (and lots of their soldiers) had to die before they changed their attitude.

At least now they can have an alliance, and hopefully they won't backstab Cat once this war is over (Procer has a historical tendency of doing such thing, as has been noted several times through the books).

Liliet

Well, Rozala's there with a sword...

'Ladi Williams

Am I the only that while reading the banter between Cat and Vivian was secretly worried they would take up a too large part of the chapter leaving us with very little meat on the bone for Cat and Cordy?

I was like nooo...EE...just get on with it already...though normally I like reading their day to day interactions that don't involve stabbing people bcos that's where you really see all the schemes taking shape or coming to fruition...

Andrew Mitchell

Nothing like that crossed my mind... I thoroughly enjoyed their chat; even laughing out loud at Vivienne sassing Cat so much.

konstantinvoncarstein

I agree with you, I would have preferred to see more of the conversation between Cordelia and Catherine.

Shveiran

Though I agree, I think the chapter was shaped this way because this chapter wasn't about the talk, but about setting the tone for them. The meat will come next chapter, and without the bickering it would have been either a very short chapter or a too long one (if EE merged it with the next)

caoimhinh

Oh, fuck. This is so we get a big cliffhanger on Friday, isn't it?

Shveiran

Damnation. I didn't think about that. We are kind of fucked.

Rey d`Tutto

Wouldn't be Friday without Cliff Hanger!

Andrew Mitchell

I really enjoyed this chapter.

Cordelia's frank assessment of how fucked Procer actually is was unexpected and heart-breaking. I can understand her assessment that begging on her knees was the best option (given she does not have access to Cat's thoughts) but it just goes to reinforce my feeling that Cordelia just doesn't understand Cat.

Regarding the war, it seems that the Dead King is fielding several hundred thousand dead and it will quickly go over a million once the collapse starts again. Honestly, I don't know what Cat can do to quickly stem the tide given the most the the Drow are somewhere else.

Andrew Mitchell

Calling it now:

Cordelia isn't going to come clean with Cat about what she's dredged up from that lake. And that checkov gun is going to go off at the worst possible time.

Shveiran

Uhm, I disagree.

It's possible, of course, but Cat knows there is a checkov gun. I don't think she will want such an unknown quantity around, so she'll likely ask?

Unless Theif actually found out and Cat is cool with it, in which case we won't know but it won't come out at a bad time, but as part of another Black Queen scheme

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, I like your last option better than my idea.

ninegardens

>I can understand her assessment that begging on her knees was the best option (given she does not have access to Cat's thoughts) but it just goes to reinforce my feeling that Cordelia just doesn't understand Cat.

I mean... it worked right?

It was that that burned through Cat's last fragment of spite.

NZPIEFACE

Burned through? Cat is still spiteful. She'll never forget.

She just realized there were more important things than spite.

Andrew Mitchell

She didn't need to kneel. She just had to ask Cat for help. Cat still wouldn't have let her spite doom millions of people. She just would not do that.

Liliet

Yah, but she would still be spiteful. And now she isn't. If nothing else, it's better for Catherine to not be festering in that.

It was, in a very real sense, morally right of Cordelia to do this. Narratively, it took her from "ungrateful asshole who does not deserve any of this" to "grateful and indebted", which is a biiiig upswing.

Cordelia is, for once, not trying to get as much as she can out of Cat while paying as little as possible of a price for it. That's a good, and Good, decision.

Liliet

Oh, Cordelia's read of Catherine is quite fine.

And a Catherine who feels awkward and kind of defensive about being presumed predatory is a better Catherine to negotiate with and try to get information from than a pissy Catherine who wants to drive it in how much she doesn't have to do any of this even as she's agreeing to do this.

It's Catherine whose read of Cordelia is off. Cordelia is not that proud; her pride was on behalf of the people she represented and with whose consent she rules, part of her duty much more than it is a part of her personality.

She's proud, but she's not too proud to beg if utilitarian calculation shows that it's better for Procer if she does.

Fayhem

> Honestly, I don't know what Cat can do to quickly stem the tide given the most the the Drow are somewhere else.

"Somewhere else", yes. Somewhere that has been carefully unspecified, but is definitely not just sitting back in the Everdark since exiting there was part of the deal with the dwarves. You know the narrative rule about how the plans that aren't revealed in advance are the ones that work, right? Let's just say I'm not at all discounting the rest of the drow as a factor in this war.

Andrew Mitchell

Good call!

Shveiran

Yeah, I thought that was pretty much a given. I think Cat has mentioned she had plans for them in the first third of Book 5?

Mental Mouse

Most of the Drow are up north being positioned against DK already.

Walter

First Prince of Procer? More like Last Prince of Procer, amirite?

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe.

ninegardens

Wait.... why are the two cripples going for a god damn walk?
Just send the rest minions with functioning legs out if you need privacy!

Shveiran

As Andrew Mitchell pointed out above, it breeds familiarity and closeness. And neither of them is scared of discomfort.

NZPIEFACE

Now it's time to see who is more crippled.

Soronel Haetir

I would have to think it's Cordelia, I mean her broken leg is only something like a day old at this point. She's not walking that one off. Cat at least has had some time to both recuperate and learn the limitations of her body (as well as being able to call on Night to overcome those limits when she absolutely has to).

Liliet

I mean Cordelia probably does have access to priests, the leg just isn't fully healed yet.

WuseMajor

"Ok, so. Point 1. In the next few days you are going to receive an official message from the government of Callow. I've had poets and calligraphers working on this thing for a month, it's beautiful, lyrical, and just amazing. What it boils down to is "I Told You So." I expect an official reply acknowledging the receipt of the message. I am just petty enough to want the First Prince showing any degree of humility to Callow to go on the official record."

"Point 2. When we have the official council meeting with everyone, I want us to stand united on the Accords, so if there's anything you don't like in there, tell me now so we can get that hashed out beforehand. If we need to make a show of trading something during the meeting, fine, but it gets worked out now so neither of us is surprised later."

"Point 3. Amadeus of the Green Stretch stays with me. Call it releasing him into my custody. Call it an exile to fight the Dead King, because he will be very useful up north. Call it whatever you like, but I'm keeping him. If nothing else, he's the only one who has a chance of reforming the dumpster fire that is Praes."

"Point 4. What are you dredging from the lake?"

"...I think that's pretty much it as far as demands go. Well, I might ask you to leave that thing alone, depending on what it is, but..."

"In return, I will lend my might to the fight against the Dead King. I will rescind the deal with the Dwarves so that you can buy from them again. And I have a few other deals going that should help us out too."

"I know you already said that you don't have the ability to say no here, but I'll let you in on a secret. I don't like it when innocents die. And the Dead King is a threat to this entire continent, not just you. I don't have much of a choice here either, because we either fight him now together or he kills all of us separately. So, you can push back. You can fight me on those demands. You can screw me over, either now or later after the fighting. And I'll still help."

"But if you do, I want you to remember that, in your hour of need, after you spent so much time fighting me instead of someone who deserves it, I came. A Villain and a monster answered your call for help, because we were the only ones left. But we came. And we helped. And anyone who turns their back on that afterwards needs to ask themselves who the real Villain is."

Shveiran

I mean... yeah. This. Pretty much my expectations in full.

sutortyrannus

Beautiful, really. The last paragraph in particular.

Andrew Mitchell

Spot on. Except for point 1. I don't think Cat is going to demand that.

Shveiran

I don' EXPECT it, but can you imagine how well that would sell in Callow? People would be boasting for a generation. Generations.

There would be riots over rights of first spot in the queue to pay more, voluntary taxes.

Draconic

She actually doesn't need to rescind her deal with the Dwarves. The deal said that they won't sell weapons to nations at war with Callow. So as soon as they make peace, they can buy them again.

Liliet

I think the emphasis on 'villain' in the last paragraph is a bit petty, given that Cat's pretty much reclaiming it from meaning 'the fucking worst' to just 'the folks who worship Below but can still be decent eh'.

But overall? 😊😊😊
mwah -kisses fingers-

Liliet

God

this was so fucking

great

but also it's making me laugh because for all of the 'artless' title and for all of her talk about how Catherine cannot be moved if she doesn't want to be

Cordelia knew exactly what she was doing with this performance and knew exactly how to appeal to Catherine like there's nothing wrong with that per se! it's just funny that I'm pretty sure it's based on cold, cold calculation based on Catherine's known personality

Mental Mouse

> I'm pretty sure it's based on cold, cold calculation based on Catherine's known personality

Well you know, that's how they roll in that crowd. Cat's not going to have any trouble with that, especially not given how often she's depended on sophisticated intelligence and manipulation.

Liliet

Agreed.

Catherine will likely be glad to realize that.

laguz24

Personally, I think this fully cements Hasenbach as the opposite of Malacia. Where one made a deal with a devil to avoid kneeling.

The other one knelt to make a deal with a monster. Personally, I really want to see what Malacia is up to because she is not sitting pretty on her throne, I guarantee you.

Shveiran

“One made a deal with a devil to avoid kneeling” ? What do you mean? Who’s the devil, what’s the deal and more importantly what kneeling did she refused?

I doubt you mean kneeling before Amadeus or the crusade, because that would have changed nothing: Crusade was still coming in the first instance, and Crusaders would not have stopped because she asked before being humbled, let alone for Malicia who has a much longer list of atrocities to her name (and Name) than Cat, who was still refused.

Draconic

Very cunning!

She kneels in front of you, so you pretend to be good to her, and tell her to stand up. And then you ask her to come walk with you. All the while “accidentally” forgetting that her leg is broken, and hurts like hell.

Very cunning indeed!

Andrew Mitchell

Shveiran

I need this to be canon.

Liliet

The best part is where Catherine can also barely walk on a bad leg that hurts like hell, and all Night painkillers will come back to fuck her over later.

But for the sake of spite...

RedApe

DK cannot occupy Kingdom of Callow. Join provinces of Procer to the Kingdom, and the war is over. Are they desperate enough?

Shveiran

IF Malicia leaked the true deal with Keter.

And IF she cannot amend it.

crescentsickle

I just realized why Cat's existence is such a massive blow to Good/Above, and why everyone has been fighting tooth and nail to stop her.

It hasn't been about Callow being the domain of Below, or the expansion and stability of Praes, or anything of the sort.

Like anything else, it's about stories. Terribilis. Triumphant. Sorcerous. Malicia. Black. These are all villains that other villains are compared to. From this era onwards, any new rising Villain has the chance to be compared to the Black Queen and thus slotted into her story beats. The Pilgrim wasn't just trying to stop the Black Queen, he was trying to tie her story down into an ignoble death and thus guarantee that such villains would be curbed.

It wouldn't be as bad if she kept to the rails of Black's story: wildly successful but at constant odds with the people she governed. But she didn't keep to those rails at all. The people of Callow love or fear her in different measures, but none of Praes save the Dread Empress and his Calamities love Black. Everyone has thrown narrative pressure on the Woe to tie it down to the Calamities, but despite those similarities it has become something entirely new. Black would never suffer the likes of Diabolist or Vivienne to sup at his table, and thus the Woe is its own entity.

This isn't just a story for the here-and-now, it's a story for every future generation from this moment onwards. A plucky underdog who overcame the worst the world has to offer time and again, forging friendships and alliances after decisively defeating her enemies, winning ever more power to her banner, causing unprecedented changes to the world, curbs the worst of other villains to win back some karmic debt, etc.

A Villain... that lives a Hero's life. She may have lost the Name, but her weight on the many scales of the narrative engine hoisting up the world is magnitudes more than most with a Name, and said narrative engine will remember.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, I'm pretty sure that even though she doesn't have a name, she'll leave behind a Name for Black Queen: The Black Queen rises from among Callow's own people to defend the country in its hour of need, but is ready at any time to step aside when she's no longer needed. She's massively charismatic and a trickster-figure who's also a creative strategist. Wields strange magics and gathers strange allies, combining both Good and Evil forces,

Shveiran

My prediction is as follows: this is when Cat will slip the beans about going to Keter herself.
Something along the lines of "This is what war pushed me to do: we must grow beyond our past or it will keep bleeding us."

Just desserts

And Cordelia is going to be immediately forgiving and will totally understand that that wasn't an abhorrent choice to make, because consequences for your actions are things that happen to people that aren't Catherine Foundling.

Shveiran

Well, I was thinking more along the lines of "That's fucked up, but I did invade you first, then said screw you Imma doing it again, so I can see why you'd be desperate enough to take extreme measures (like my lake thingy) so how about we STOP trying to doom each other's people and find a way to fix this mess?"

Liliet

I think Cordelia was already assuming it, and is 100% not here for holding a grudge over something that (1) didn't happen, (2) Catherine is currently helping fix to the degree that it sort of did. Oh and (3) she knows damn well Catherine absolutely did not want to do and was pushed into a corner for. Not to mention how she's not Callowan and how grudges against Catherine are absolutely the last thing she can afford right now.

sivarajan

Her "abhorrent" choice was itself a consequence of Cordelia's actions, so it would be hypocritical (read as: Heroic) of her to object to it.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yeah, better to say it now than having Neshamah or the Tyrant (with the Peregrine's curse) reveals it at the worst moment.

Draconic

I don't think she was trying to keep it a secret. I think there was mention of people in Callow already talking about how she burned down a mansion to try stopping Malicia from making a deal with the Dead King.

Shveiran

There was, but that is a memoir from Aisha that we don't know when she'll write down. Since they commented about the Uncivil Wars since before they started, I took that to mean the secret will come out at some point, but I don't it has yet.

Javvies

That's the line about it only taking Cat a week to set Keter on fire or something along those lines.

There was also mention in a post-Everdark update-Cat-on-what's-been-going-on in Callow discussion (think it might've been the first discussion after leaving the Everdark through scrying, when Cat learned the Observatory was down, Masego was missing, and the Army of Callow was in Procer and in trouble), that Hakram and Vivienne had spread the word about Cat going to Keter and trying to kill Malicia (and trying to prevent Malicia from making a deal with the Dead King) in the wake of their return to Callow, and the wave of assassinations being Malicia's retaliation. Presumably they left out some of the details about why Cat and company were in Keter in their public statements on the matter.

Javvies

Also, Pilgrim already knows about it.

Liliet

You're forgetting the origin of House Insurgent, aren't you?

With Malicia's delegation coming, Vivienne deliberately seeded the rumors that Catherine was in Keter to stop the deal from being made. Which made a bit more of an avalanche than she was expecting, with a schism in the House of Light as a result – between the more conservative 'eh the Black Queen is okay' crowd and the more radical 'ANYONE WHO SAYS A BAD WORD ABOUT BLACK QUEEN IS A HERETIC AND THIS IS A CRUSADE NOW (SORT OF)' crowd.

SomeGuy

It's known that Cat went to Keter. Remember how Callowans were prideful that she set one of the palaces on fire? They think she was there to stop Malicia but they know she was -there-.

superkeaton

Well done, Cordy. Now, how are you going to help if you have nothing?

Liliet

"Just tell me what to do"

JJR

"Let me tell you what you need to do. You need to sit him down. You look him dead in the eye. And you say, "Don't invade my country."

"And you think that will work?"

"He'd have to be awfully evil if it didn't."

Liliet

"Remember how I did that? And it probably looked like it didn't work? Well see who's in charge now"

Jim C

I can't be the only one who is seeing this as cordy putting a narrative knife to cats throat

mavant

Hasenbach has always displayed an impressive mastery of her chosen field, not to mention strength of will and emotional fortitude, but this is the first time I've really been compelled by her essential goodness. That took not just big brass ovaries, but a remarkable selflessness.

You go, Cordelia. Four for you, Cordelia.

Balesundaran

Cordelia is not broken, she has been reforged into something stronger, and something strangely parallel to Cat. She is on her knees here, but remember that she just defied the Angels and refused an epic Name, and that takes an iron will that stands, like Cat, above and beyond a mere Name. Feel free to check off more parallels in replies, but let me get you started:
Limping with a wound that is a humbling reminder of a failure and the need to do better? Check!
Showed up with people previously thought to be their enemies at their back? Check!
Was offered a ruling name that would destroy all enemies but let it slip? Check!
Is thwarting the Intercessor's plans by making the "wrong" choices? Check!
Considered unleashing an unspeakable horror from the past on you enemies to save your people in a way that everyone can see will go badly? Check!
Puts her people above her own power or dignity? Check!

...

sengachi

With this chapter Cordelia has earned my utmost respect, and Catherine has reminded me exactly why she is -regardless of which gods she may serve- a hero worth following into hell itself.

John brokovsky

Do not let the narrative significance of the First Prince of Procer kneeling to Cat pass unnoticed.

We are one step closer to the return of Triumphant.

Chapter 78: Trenchant

"The great candour in ruling Praes is that, if you make a mistake, assassination attempts will follow. Unfortunately if you do not make a mistake assassination attempts will also follow, which admittedly makes it difficult to tell if a mistake was in fact made."

– Dread Emperor Pernicious, the Imperiled

There were protests, though only from Hasenbach's side as by now mine knew better, but those words might as well have been wind for the weight they carried. They were more out of principle than conviction anyway, I suspected: Princess Rozala dawn well knew that if I was moved to violence little short of a band of heroes could put me down. Spite and impulse would only carry me so far, though, so I did not enter the labyrinth of luxury that awaited outside the small hall. A knuckle rapped against the glass doors along with a sliver of Night slithering through the lock had them popping open without trouble, and beyond lay a pretty little balcony overlooking a winter garden. My boots sounded crisply against the thin layer of snow as I walked out into the cold, knowing the First Prince would not be far behind me. The coolness of the air was pleasant against my face, and as this little corner was windless the cold felt rather mild – more like a refreshing swim in the Silver Lake than winter's hard bite.

Hasenbach followed along, her limp barely noticeable on the move, and I noted she seemed rather unmoved by the cold. Lycaonese, I reminded myself. Compared to the brutal winters of her far northern home, this must hardly be noticeable at all. The railing was an elegant thing of stone, sculpted to seem like vines and the detail of the work was only made more pleasant to the eye by the touch of frost. Disdaining the stone benches set in little alcoves to the sides of the doors, I came to lean against it and cast a curious look down into the garden.

"I'm surprised you didn't get that leg fixed," I said.

"I did," Cordelia Hasenbach replied, slowly moving to stand by me.

She was too well-bred to lean against a snow-dusted railing while wearing a nice dress, apparently, or maybe just to do so in front of a foreign ruler. Regardless, standing that ramrod straight must be Hells on her leg.

"Not mage-healing, though that's hardly surprising," I said, eyeing the way she was standing. "Priest work, then. They'll have fixed the bone and flesh but it'll still feel raw for a few more days. Hasn't the Grey Pilgrim offered to see to it? He's a notch above what I've seen even the finest priest-healers do."

"I will not accept so much as the dust of a copper more from the Peregrine than I must," the blue-eyed woman said, tone frosty.

I almost asked to the source of that open enmity, given that Tariq might have been after my neck for a while but he'd been standing in Cordelia's corner for as long as I'd known him, but it didn't take much digging to put the finger on it by myself. In order to capture Black, the Pilgrim had seeded a plague in a town by the shores of Lake Artoise – it'd taken a full legion detachment, true, but that entire town too. Wiping out Proceran towns was one thing when a villain did it, but it must have cut to the bone coming from a servant of Above. Especially one it was essentially diplomatically impossible to touch at the moment.

"Fair enough," I conceded.

"I could ask the same of yours," the First Prince of Procer said. "I am told you are high in the council of dark powers. Such a boon would be but a small favour, no?"

"If I'd paid harsher prices for my first mistakes, I might have better learned from them," I said. "There's nothing free, not even for villains. Some costs are just subtler than others."

"Then I shudder to think what the likes of the Hidden Horror have paid," Cordelia said.

I breathed out, itching for the pipe I'd not thought to bring. Neither parade nor tea were well-matched to wakeleaf, at least not when paired with the presence of the First Prince of Procer.

"All of Sephirah, for one," I said. "And quiet things too, I'd imagine. After all a dead thing cannot heal, cannot grow. Every wound on his power forever remains."

The Lycaonese princess' face was cool as she studied me, though more distant than adverse.

"Sephirah?" she asked.

"What the Kingdom of the Dead was called, before ruin took it," I said. "Keter was the greatest of its cities and the Dead King himself its last king."

"There are legends among my people," Cordelia acknowledged, "though they speak not of this Sephirah but instead of the Thirteen Kings and the Time of Wolves. You are well-learned in the beginnings of the Enemy, it seems. Does the Tower share such dangerous lore freely?"

"I learned it in Arcadia," I replied, "walking the echoes of that dead realm. I learned much, during my march to Keter."

"Your Jacks have seeded rumours with skill as to the purpose of that journey," Cordelia said, and it was not a compliment. "Selfless of you, to seek to break the Tower's schemes even if you failed."

I drummed my fingers against the snowy railing, eyes trailing the winding circles of primroses and jasmines filled with purple pansies. The patterns were oddly soothing to look at.

"Hannoven," I said. "Cleves and Hainaut. That was my offer. I intended to warn you some months in advance, so that you could evacuate the principalities."

"And so the gathering armies of the Tenth Crusade hurried north instead of trying your borders again," she said, tone mild.

"The entire point of the exercise," I admitted. "I didn't quite grasp what it was I was dealing with, not yet. The entire journey was a trap anyway. Malicia had been in talks with Keter for months, I was being used to start a bidding war."

"With lives and lands in my charge as the currency," Hasenbach coldly said.

"The counter-offer was the entire northern third of Procer and Callow having to claim the eastern border principalities on its own," I said. "I had Malicia's host bodies assassinated – twice – but it wasn't enough."

"And do you expect that excuses the rest?" the First Prince said, eyes hard.

"Are you sure you want to start a conversation with me about lives and lands being used as currency, Cordelia Hasenbach?" I replied, lips quirking into a smile just as hard as her gaze.

"It was a monstrous thing, what you set out to do," Hasenbach replied, unmoved.

She wasn't mincing her words, and I could respect the honesty of it at least. Coming from the woman who'd put me in the corner where I'd begun to take hard measures, though, that only went so far.

"Monstrous?" I mused. "I suppose it was. But then so was your refusal to entertain peace even on egregiously favourable terms when I repeatedly offered it. Not even for moral reasons, but simply because it was politically inconvenient for you. Does my wearing a black cloak somehow make my atrocities worse than yours? As I recall, only one of us actually went through with it and it's not the villain."

Her body was tightly wound as a spring, though not as a warrior's would be – it was the mark of emotions mastered I was looking at, not violence in the making.

"I do not say this to create strife between us," Hasenbach said, voice forcefully calm. "Yet you must understand that the truth you tried to barter away part of the Principate nary a year ago is not to be taken lightly."

Probably shouldn't tell her I'd once tried to bribe Rumena into treachery with another chunk of it then, even if it'd been a jest.

"I didn't expect it would be," I frankly replied. "But I'd rather you hear it from me than have it revealed as some dark secret."

As for Praes' involvement in the coup that'd nearly unseated and killed her, what the Circle of Thorns had told her was factually correct: Scribe had helped shape the early plot but later set out to crush Malicia's continuation of it at the order of the Carrion Lord. I saw no need to tell her more than that, especially not while my own teacher was still being kept in the dark.

"So now that we're being all nice and honest," I said, "anything you'd care to tell me?"

We could have kept on arguing about this, I knew and so did she, but there was no gain in it for either of us. I very much doubted she'd forgive what I had admitted to anytime soon, much less forget, but then I wasn't interested in the forgiveness of Cordelia Hasenbach. That she was worthy of admiration in some ways did not mean I no longer remembered why it had come to this. Me with my hands ever redder, Procer dancing ever closer to annihilation. None of it was truly behind us, and perhaps never would be, but neither of us were inclined to chase the stag off the cliff. And so we moved on, however grudgingly. Now the boot was on the other foot, though, and it was time for her to unwrap her own dirty little secrets – some of which I knew, and more that I suspected.

"I funded the Truebloods, through intermediaries," Cordelia reluctantly said. "High Lady Tasia Sahelian in particular, as the Empress' foremost rival."

It'd been a long time since I'd been so utterly taken by surprise. It made sense, I thought. Procer was wealthy, Praes infamously prone to backstabbing its way into civil wars and there was harsh irony in giving Malicia a taste of her own medicine after the way she'd meddled in the Proceran civil war. My fingers clenched hard against the stone, though, not because of any of that. It was a smaller, sligher branch splitting from what I'd just been told.

"You bankrolled the Doom of Liesse," I said, tone perfectly mild.

"Not knowingly, or directly," she said. "Yet that is not untrue."

I could kill her in the blink of an eye, I thought. No need for anything elegant or skillful, I could just pour so much Night in her body that the skin sloughed off and the bones melted and her head fucking popped off. Akua Sahelian had been the architect of that folly, and she would even that ledger in time. So would Dread Empress Malicia, for having allowed the madness and even helped it along. But now it seemed that even the Warden of the West had put coin to the butchery of my people, good Proceran silver turned into a wound on the south that'd last century and a city so broken that not even being the heart of a newborn Court had mended its ruin. She'd not known. It did not absolve her, but she had not known. Hasenbach stirred, and I knew deep as I knew my own breath that if she opened her mouth to compared her funding the Folly to a pact I'd never made with Keter, Sve Noc bless my hand if she did I would rip out her fucking tongue and she could crawl on her knees to Tariq to have it put back on.

"You already know of my involvement in the Liesse Rebellion, I take it," she said.

I breathed out slowly and mastered myself. Rage I could allow myself to feel later, if I decided it was still warranted. But I'd come dangerously close to allowing my control to slip, just then. It genuinely might have, in other circumstances, which was why this conversation was needed in the first place. I would have been much, much worse to hear it after an insulting Proceran blunder and revealed by the Tyrant's cruelly taunting voice.

"I am," I said. "Your intentions in that I will not speak to, yet though that rebellion might have had your coin and your puppet-candidate to kingship it was not fought for you purposes. I'll call it a clean slate."

Duke Gaston of Liesse might have been the figurehead all gathered around, but it'd been the Countess of Marchford and the Lone Swordsman who'd done the bloody work of the uprising. Neither had been in the First Prince's service, or all that well inclined towards her. Gaston Caen had been a pretext, not a motive, and regardless none if it would have come to pass if I'd not spared William's life in Summerholm that fateful night. Still, for all I would not quibble over the Liesse Rebellion I was less pleased about what Cordelia was keeping silence over.

"Once silent is reluctance, or mistake," I said. "Twice is a lie of omission."

"I own an empire's worth of secrets, Black Queen," the First Prince said. "And so very few of them are fair to behold."

Which might just be true but was no more an answer for it.

"Lake Artoise," I flatly said.

"A weapon to wield against the Enemy," Hasenbach reluctantly. "Should all else fail."

My eyes narrowed. It'd been in the lake, what she was talking about, because even though Vivienne's people had failed to penetrate Proceran operations there they'd at least confirmed there'd been ships and dredging involved. The Order of the Red Lion as well, and in numbers too great for them to be a mere scrying relay. But if she had in her hands a weapon that could give the Dead King pause – which it actually wouldn't, from what I knew of the King of Death, but that was besides the point – then Procer was not in so dire a situation as she'd implied. Unless it's not functional, I thought. Unless she needs to build something or arrange rituals.

"There's consequences to using armaments like those," I said. "And I don't mean in a moral sense, either. High stakes and a single point of failure are to Named like honey to flies. Heroes moreso than villains, but even they get to have the wind in their sails sometimes."

"It is not something I would use lightly," the First Prince said. "Or at all, if I can avoid it."

"But you won't burn it until the Dead King's been driven back either," I grunted. "You've read the Accords, Hasenbach. Ensuring no one ever has their hands on a lever that opens a Greater Breach of brutalizes the souls of an entire city is exactly what they're for."

"And should the Liesse Accords be signed and enforced, I will gladly let you destroy every last trace of that weapon," the blonde princess replied. "Yet until Keter has been sealed or the Dead King destroyed, I cannot justify tossing away the sole tool at my disposal that could possibly turn the tide."

Frustration spiked in me, but she was not being unreasonable. I'd been raised in the shade of a royal palace built from stones taken from a flying fortress brought down, taught from the moment I'd had a Name that massive rituals and grand artefacts always failed in the end, and still I'd sided with Malicia near the end of the Folly. The dead were already dead, I'd thought, and if from that tragedy peace could be forged then I'd shoulder the hatred of my own people and do what I must. It would have been, I now recognize, a terrible mistake. My father's handling of the situation remained singularly botched but given the Intercessor's involvement that was perhaps not entirely his fault. Cordelia Hasenbach was not Named, did not come from a people who held them in high esteem or deeply studied their lore. And while she might have matched wits with Malicia for years with more than a few successes to her name, it had been a very different sort of game. I could not be angry at her making a mistake I had also made while laden with advantages she was not.

"Having a weapon like that carries risks in ways you have not been taught to understand," I said, forcing patience. "Especially in a situation thick with Named, like any war with Keter will be. This isn't won with a flying fortress, Hasenbach, it's won with a coalition binding the east and west."

"And I will do everything in my power to see that coalition assembled and bound by treaties," the First Prince said. "Yet I cannot disarm when those alliances are still wind, no ink has touched the parchment for treaties and the Dead mass to the north in numbers beyond reason."

"When Callow joins the Grand Alliance," I said, "and the Accords begin accruing signatories; will you then agree to torching whatever the Hells you dredged up?"

I'd be willing to cough up the goblinfire myself, if that was what it took. And still she hesitated.

"Merciless Gods," I said. "What is it that you even got your hands on? Tell me it's not a Hell Egg, Hasenbach. It'd be utter lunacy to send a demon after the great mage ever born to Calernia, dead or not."

"It is not," the blue-eyed royal stiffly replied. "I will speak no more to the nature of it, save that it holds no truck with Below."

It was probably an angel, then, I grimly thought. Some not-corpse like the one the Lone Swordsman had leaned on in Liesse to bring down Contrition, and later Diabolist to create her gate-maker. The Choirs were forever fixed, the way Masego told it, so there could be no such thing as an angel's corpse – or at least there'd been no real precedent for it, and not for lack of Praesi trying – but one's death would still leave marks. And something to use, if you knew how. It'd still need a hero though, I suspected, or at least a massive number of priests capable of using Light. One was easier for the First Prince of Procer to get her hands on, especially now that the House of Light's leadership had been discredited and was likely undergoing a through purge. Who would dare argue with Hasenbach now, if she gave priests orders? I need to speak with Masego, I grimly thought. I wasn't even sure what such a weapon would do, practically speaking. Would the Choir it had belonged to change the effect? Contrition had been the writ of corpse and Named both, when the Hashmallim were called down at First Llesse.

So what would happen if the corpse was from one of the Ophanim or the Seraphim? Somehow I doubted it would be as simple as calling down a great storm of Light on the enemy. This was a mistake, no matter how I looked at it, but then if there was one thing that today had made very clear it was that Cordelia Hasenbach was afraid. She was afraid enough for the Principate that she'd knelt to a woman she considered a brutal murderous warlord to beg for help, and a few moments of private conversation on a balcony weren't going to magically fix this. It was frustrating as Hells, considering that not so long ago she'd been on her knees begging for my help, but throwing around ultimatums on the first day of talks wasn't going to accomplish anything – save maybe mark me as exactly the kind of tyrant they'd all feared I would be. And still part of me was quietly furious at the notion that I'd have to allow a mistake to keep going right under my eyes because it would be too heavy-handed of me to force the issue. It was not a coincidence, I'd admit, that so much of Black's teachings still resonated with me.

No matter what Vivienne said, Below was always going to be the banner I raised. There wasn't enough give in me for it to be any other way. If I couldn't push without blowing on the house of cards that the Accords still was, then I'd have to try pulling instead. Time to start showing the cards I'd been hiding up my sleeve.

"You don't believe we can win this war conventionally," I said. "Yet we can, Hasenbach. I have made pact with the Kingdom Under."

"The resumption of arms sales will help, though Procer will need to borrow heavily to afford them," the First Prince acknowledged.

"That's part of it," I said. "More practical is that I have oaths the Kingdom Under will launch offensives on every front to seize all underground territory of the Dead King if a sufficient force is gathered to war against him above."

Cordelia Hasenbach went still.

"In addition," I continued, "arrangements have been made as to the supply of armaments and foodstuffs. Any force engaged in warfare against Keter will see steel provided at two tenths of the usual price, and foodstuffs at cost. Loans offers will be extended to the Principate, though I'm afraid they refused to do the same for the Dominion. Too likely to be unable to repay, I'm told."

"You do not jest," the First Prince croaked, sounding dry-mouthed.

"I wouldn't take the loans, they offer pretty cutthroat terms," I said. "We might be able to strongarm Mercantis instead, if the entire coalition brings pressure. They live and die on trade, and we have everybody but the League at the table."

"The dwarves would use us as their own fantassins," Cordelia realized, eyes narrowing. "Tying down the forces of the Hidden Horror above-ground as they strike below. Only we would emerge in their debt instead of owed."

I didn't deny it, as it was essentially true.

"If their advance is successful all the way to Keter, a siege of the city becomes feasible," I told her. "Our supply lines would be underground and untouchable, so long as we have the coin. I'd be willing to endorse the creation of a Grand Alliance treasury for the duration of the war against the Dead King, and to provide grain for your principalities from Callow granaries on loan – with interest on the value of the goods, I'm not a saint."

"The Kingdom Under would not make such offers without a prince, Black Queen," the blue-eyed princess said. "What did you offer in return?"

"The Everdark," I said.

The bluntness of the answer took her aback.

"I believed you to be allied with the drow," the First Prince said, grown wary.

"I am," I said. "This was done in the name of their goddesses, the bargain struck with the dwarf Named known as the Herald of the Deeps."

"They have submitted to the Kingdom Under?" Cordelia asked.

I almost laughed at that.

"No, they have not," I replied, smiling thinly. "The Everdark is empty."

Cordelia Hasenbach was not slow of wits, and so she understood the implication quick enough.

"They are marching against the Kingdom of the Dead," she said, almost breathlessly.

"All of them," I agreed. "The entire Empire Ever Dark is marching on the Dead King's back, led by Sve Noc themselves, and I believe he still has no idea."

ruduen

<http://topwebfiction.com/?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Go vote!

And here I thought we had already gotten all of the details of that little deal. It sounds like there's quite a bit more to things that meets the eye.

ruduen

Looks like I used the wrong link. Vote here instead!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

bless your heart

caoimhinh

"Details will be provided as and when the plot requires", I'm sure there's a trope out there that encompasses this concept. We are likely to find out more of that deal even when the final attack is being launched.

Same as with the Liesse Accords, given that Amadeus and Cat's debate about them (which is the most enlightening conversation about the Accords we have so far) didn't cover all the points because Black hadn't read it all; and points will need to be added and removed when other countries are brought to sign.

Those unrevealed details will present us quite a few good surprises, interesting conversations and even plot twists in the future, I'm sure of it.

mavant

I assume you're thinking of <https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/UnspokenPlanGuarantee>

Ultimate_Procrastinator

I believe that would be the Unspoken Plan Guarantee, with some conservation of detail thrown in James G.

Unspoken Plan Guarantee?

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/UnspokenPlanGuarantee>

KageLupus

Eh. I don't think that the details revealed here are really all that shocking or important, in the grand scheme of things. Sure, knowing more about what the Dwarves are providing is cool, but how cheap the steel and food is going to be wasn't really something I was staying up at night thinking about.

The biggest part of the deal is that it exists and that the Dwarves are willing to make war on Keter underground. That frees up the Alliance to only worry about things topside, which is way better than they have had it during the various sieges.

And the real kicker here is that Cordelia gets to see exactly how much Cat has been planning on bringing war to Keter. It is not just sidling into the Grand Alliance and then joining them in the fight. She has singlehandedly also gotten two extra armies to join in the battle, one of which might be a surprise and is led by a pair of goddesses, and she also secured a supply train for the whole thing.

Cat has done more for the war effort before she was ever a part of it than Cordelia and the Grand Alliance could ever hope to accomplish.

Andrew Mitchell

> Cat has done more for the war effort before she was ever a part of it than Cordelia and the Grand Alliance could ever hope to accomplish.

Well said.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

Not to mention the fact that the dwarves have weaponry 3xcellently suited to kill large numbers, or burn away lots of undead, whichever it is they choose.

Lets hope this does not turn into a crossed double crossed war...

Jeffery Wells

I honestly thought that was pretty clear after Cat's meeting with the Herald after Sve Noc's apotheosis. The drow army is only 50k of its warriors, there are hundreds of thousands more, and they had agreed to leave the Everdark immediately. The rest of the drow and most of Sve Noc are parked in the hills above where they lived below ground, preparing for the assault in Keter. Remember too that the two crows are just a sliver of Sve Noc, the rest is with their people.

copaceticcockroach

Typo Thread:

"I'd we willing to endorse_"

-I'd be willing to endorse_

caoimhinh

Typos found:

1. Rozala dawn well knew => Rozala damn well knew
2. if she opened her mouth to compared => compare
3. It genuinely might have => I genuinely might have
4. I would have been much, much worse => It would have been much, much worse
5. for you purposes => for your purposes
6. none if it => none of it
7. Hasenbach reluctantly. => Hasenbach reluctantly said/ answered
8. of brutalizes the souls => or brutalizes the souls
9. the great mage ever born to Calernia => the greatest mage ever born to Calernia
10. a through purge => a thorough purge
11. steel provided at two tenths of the usual price, and foodstuffs at cost ~> at two-tenths of the usual price and foodstuffs at no cost(?)
12. offers without a prince => offers without a price

Morgenstern

Does "no cost", in financial terms, mean "(no extra costs, but) covering expenditures"?

(Bc. foodstuffs "at cost" means just that: They will give them away for recompensation of the expenditures they themselves have accrued (to create, preserve, transport(...?)) those foodstuffs.

They're not giving them as gifts, essentially; everyone will have to pay what the Kingdom Under itself would pay, so to speak.)

caoimhinh

I had that doubt, that's why I put the (?) on that possible typo.

At least the foodstuff of the Drow is provided by Dwarves completely free, as was stated by Catherine dozens of chapters ago. But yeah, it would be weird if they gave the food free to the rest of the coalition.

caoimhinh

The Dead King when he finds the entirety of the Empire Ever Dark marching against him, as he was about to get a victory over Proceran forces (and probably as night falls, to make a stark contrast to the heroic arrival of ~~Gandalf~~Pilgrim:

edrey

i am pretty sure he already found out, after that divination magic at Liese along with the bard plan, on the other hand i just thinking why not push the night to the chain of hunger, that truly would surprise the DK

caoimhinh

He should already know about the Drow marching with Cat, since he saw them fighting in the Princes' Graveyard and was temporarily grasped by Sve Noc.

However, he shouldn't know the degree of investment the Drow have in this conflict; as far as he knows Catherine struck a bargain to have a few tens of thousands of Drow with her, he must suspect there's more to it, but at this point he should not be aware that the entirety of the Drow Species is marching against him. That's the big surprise for him.

Tsura

Wouldn't he not know that because Masego destroyed that fragment or something? I don't remember the exact details but I thought they made a point that the Dead King wouldn't get any of the knowledge the fragment had gained while possessing Masego

caoimhinh

Neshamah passed his knowledge. If you read again that part, there's a few paragraphs near the end where it's shown that the spell he used to kill Indrani also contained the knowledge. Then he passed it on a construct to the Skein and destroyed the Skein to send the knowledge back to his main body.

weakman54

How would that help though? The CoH doesn't seem like a people that would be open for talks, and even if he knows about the drow, they would still be pressure on his back that was not there before. Couple that with the massing dwarven forces from below and you have an almost full encirclement. Entirely complete if you count the CoH as hostile, even if they wouldn't follow the others orders

edrey

well, if they use enough night to satiate the hunger and grow them into brainless ancient ones, controlling them is still a possibility

Liliet

He was looking for Bard, and Bard wasn't there in the Everdark 😊

Big Brother

The Dwarves, the Drow and all the Surface Nations of Calernia marching on the Dead King. The 11th Crusade in all but name, a union of peoples Above and Below to end the greatest threat to the living.

Sean Panajotovic

well... except for Praes and the Titanomachy. And the Free Cities haven't officially declared their position yet.

Mental Mouse

Praes may be dragooned into it. And the Titanomachy might be persuaded by two of their stalwart trainees...

Agent J

Praes is there if you count Amadeus and the Legions-in-Exile.

konstantinvoncarstein

The Last Alliance of (Dark) Elves, Men and Dwarves

Raved Thrad

If Neshamah starts waving around a beringed hand, then we know how his doom will be wrought.

Javvies

The Drow of the Guideverse have nothing to do with the Elves of the Guideverse.

konstantinvoncarstein

I know, but Catherine noted herself that the Drows are sometimes called Dark Elves while being very different from « true » elves. Do the joke works.

konstantinvoncarstein

*so

Death Knight

I think those racist, xenophobically genocidal assholes in the Bloom will join the Alliance if and when they learn that almost every nation in Calernia is marching on Keter with the same Story that ended Triumphant at their back.

Vengeance for the capture and death of the Spellblade.

Hmm, wonder of Cat (or Hanno and Antigone most likely) can convince the Titans to join up as well? If they can the Dead King is properly fucked I'd say.

We've seen the devastation the Witch could bring to bare and she's relies on her aspect to force the working. So, how much power could the oldest and most powerful Named Titan spellsinger bring to bare? Remember, EE said that of the top 5 sorcerers in the Land, the number three has never been shown onscreen. This individual can only be a Titan since no other character fits the bill. Likely this Titan was Antigone's teacher.

Whoowhee Book 6 gone be lit af boi!

sutortyrannus

You know, while I'm hoping that that they do join, I gained new perspective on the relations between Procer and the Titanomachy once I learned that the Gigantes had been keeping them as slaves. Puts the Humbling of Titans in far more positive light.

I agree though – number 3 on the list is probably a spellsinger.

mavant

Could you point me to that top-5-sorcerers comment? Or, who are the ones of the 5 that we DO know?

Agent J

Dead King. Some elf. Wekesa.

sivarajan

reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/bd8dxz

sivarajan

reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/bd8dxz/best_mages_on_calernia/ekx48b0

konstantinvoncarstein

The problem if the Elves join the Alliance is that the Deoraithe will not accept it.

Quite Possibly A Cat

All you would need to get the Elves to accept is a few fertility miracles.

"Our priests have a miracle for immaculate conception! We can clear your fertility problems right up."

Which I guess would mean that Good takes a page out of Evil's guidebook and is trading babies for firepower.

Javvies

Let's not call it a Crusade.

First, that has religious implications that most of the involved parties would object to.

Second, and possibly more important, the Story behind Crusades – especially ones against the Dead King – is that they fail. The only Crusades that haven't been massive failures are probably 1 and 2 ... and since I think 1 might have been trying to stop Triumphant while 2 was the rebellion ... though we don't actually have much information on them. Crusades 3 and 4 got crushed so hard by one of the Praesi Dread Emperor Terribilis's that they decided they weren't going after Praes anymore and decided to send the next 5 against the Dead King ... and they all failed miserably, I'm not sure any of them even got to the gates of Keter. And, well, the 10th Crusade has done even worse.

Liliet

Oh it's still the Tenth one. Just... redirected 9.9

Shveiran

Is it though? It has changed target, gained a new member (the Empire Ever Dark) previously uninvolved, and now include either half or all the previous targets. You can't really shake it up more than this.

Not to mention, it was previously a faction fo Good aligned nations and now include two to three powers sworn to Below. Calling it the Tenth Crusade is not quite squinting and more like blindfolding yourself and going for a spin.

Zgggt

I mean, as far as Crusades go, it isn't just a regular one, it's the (by far) largest and deadliest one. Remember how Black explained to Cat that humans on the continent are basically barbarians compared to the much stronger races like the Kingdom Under or places further away? Just the dwarves probably bring more firepower to the table than has been available since Triumphant, there is a case that this is also true for the Drow.

Cat has organized the deadliest force on Calernia, possibly the most of all times. Of course, it won't help her from the stabs in the back that are expected to come, but it does put more people between her and the Dead King, so hooray for relative safety!

Someguy

>"All of them," I agreed. "The entire Empire Ever Dark is marching on the Dead King's back, led by Sve Noc themselves, and I believe he still has no idea."

Dammit Cat! You should know better! The moment you speak it, he now knows or will find out!

filtern

Weigh the risk of him finding out against the risk of Hasenbach using her weapon and I think you'll find it a worthy trade.

Oshi

It's not much of a risk. Sve Noc still cloaks them and at least for now the Dead King can't see into the heart of Procer without a lot of friggin risk. Way to many choirs and what not ready to fuck him up.

Shveiran

True, yet the point is that that now the narrative will ensure he has a response whether or not he found out, because a revealed plan cannot unfold smoothly... where would the twist be, if things went according to plan?

Then again, this being Cat, she could point out that since NO ONE expects it to work smoothly because of that trope, it going smoothly would be precisely the most unpredictable twist ever.

Oshi

But a conventional alliance not one heralded by powers on High. No Hero king to lead a crusade but an alliance of many to end a threat. A different story all together and one that's a lot harder to "not lose" against. If Keter falls and is cleansed the Dead King will survive but he will lose his foothold on Creation. It will be bloody but would be a change deep and true. Cat's spent a lot of time making sure it works out that way. A story to bind them all 🤪

JJR

You say this, but what if he asks to sign onto the Liesse Accords?

There's also that thing he learned about Bard which, being some sort of dark secret, is guaranteed to blow up at the worst time.

konstantinvoncarstein

Concerning the DK and the Accords, it was already discussed. The conclusion was that it would be a very big mistake.

Sparsebeard

Personally, I think the biggest mistake would be to push him to far beyond his bottom line.

I mean, it's one thing to diminish him, but if you push him into a corner... It isn't a huge assumption to think that he's got a few cards in his sleeves that could make sure that everybody loses...

Kind of the same way that you can't really push a nuclear power too far in our world.

Still, pushing the DK to the point of mutually assured destruction where he HAS to sign the accords (and perhaps a separate a treaty with reparations and stuff before that) would already be a huge victory.

Javvies

Except the Dead King has no incentive to follow the rules. The enforcement mechanism is more or less his status quo.

All letting him join the Accords/Alliance does is kick the can down the road. And time is on his side – he can afford to wait for the urgency of the threat he poses to fade. Remember his offer to give Cat a decade or a century of peace? It's a poison pill.

He can afford to play a game that his next move won't happen in hundreds of years. That is, he can afford to wait until every mortal currently alive is dead and every mortal who ever knew them is also dead.

Also ... I'm pretty sure letting him sign up would violate the deal with the Dwarves. And that's a tremendously bad thing.

Sparsebeard

Having the mortals pay every price (even the destruction of their nations and peoples) is pretty much what the Saint (and perhaps Bard) wanted though.

I mean, since every loss is permanent to the DK, it's in his own interest to accept a deal that would ensure his own survival (and after that to maintain the status quo).

And yeah diminish him enough that he can't threaten the whole of Calernia without insuring his own doom is probably a good idea. Pushing him to believe that desperate methods are warranted since he'll be destroyed anyways is probably not a good idea (that's how you get demons, hell gates and other WMDs).

Javvies

Except magical WMDs in the hands of a Villain are basically Hero-fodder.

Bard's goal was to set the Dead King up to suffer the fate of Triumphant (crushing victory and total conquest, only for everything to fall apart and be destroyed in short order).

Destroying the Dead King is the goal of Heroes like Tariq.

Cat will settle for removing his foothold on Creation and fortifying the permanent Hellgate to Serenity on the Creation side.

Invading Serenity is basically a nonstarter, and Cat knows it ... which is why she won't do it.

Shveiran

I agree in principle, but I think you are not factoring in how Neshamah works. The guy is all about contingencies and playing it safe, he is centered about his own survival. Triumphant was the kind of Villain that brought the Tower down on her slayers, but I don't think the DK would.

Maybe as an ultimatum to force people NOT to slay him, I guess; you know, a dead-man switch. But not out of spite. He'd see no point in it, I don't think.

Sparsebeard

Also, there isn't much to support your claim that the DK wouldn't follow that rules, he seemed to be a stickler for respecting deals in fact.

Sure the 100 years deal was bad, but not because of any perceived untrustworthiness but rather because it would leave him undamaged to fight at a later date.

A deal lasting "forever" on the other hand could insure the perenity af the agreement,

Javvies

Thing is, the Accords don't stop warfare, and aren't intended to. They're primarily rules of engagement for Named.

The Dead King being allowed to become a signatory would mean allowing him continuous active involvement with the rest of Calernia. And lessened capacity on behalf of the rest of Calernia to stop him from doing things they don't want him doing.

The Dead King cannot be allowed to remain an active player in Calernia and Calernian affairs. That's an even less acceptable outcome than Malicia remaining in power over Praes.

mavant

I mean... Admittedly the whole 'brainwashed nation worshipping me as a god' thing is a bit icky. But if the Dead King were willing to make sufficiently binding oaths (maybe they could be enforced with Fae power?) then his powerset could be an extraordinary force for the betterment of Calernia. No thinking being need ever perform manual labor again! With zombie automation we could leapfrog past all the technological development the gnomes have been suppressing.

Shveiran

The Liesse Accords are about limiting Named methods. The Dead King needs not to abuse them in order to drown the world in dead soldiers. There is literally nothing to gain from involving him, it solves no issues, and it legitimize a country that regularly raids its neighbors to harvest people.

...Why? Just... why?

konstantinvoncarstein

What if he doesn't sign? If he moves, everyone attacks him. If he signs, he win an access to Cardinal and all the future Named and powerful of the continent. How is this good?

Clever dick

Fuck the Liesse Accords, I want the DK to petition to join the Grand Alliance.

I mean, there's already precedent for Villains joining...

Insanenoodlyguy

the Accords themselves will ensure that he can't join. And nobody's going to trust the world where the dead King promises to be a good Ally. Especially not when getting him will cause pretty much everyone to walk, not just cat.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Hopefully they'll include rules about Necromancy and undead rulers. In particular

- 1) No turning people into undead slaves en masse. <== DKs kingdom a runs on this.
- 2) No undead rulers.

Plus Named aren't going to be allowed to rule.

Javvies

The no-Named rulership clause is most likely going to get negotiated away.

Remember, Amadeus made a solid case for needing a Named Dread Emperor of Praes to forestall a Secret Emperor.

Also, the Dominion has a collective fetish for their Named founders and descendants ... who themselves have an above average incidence of Named.

Besides, there's the problem of underling/support Names/Named and military leadership Names/Named (ie, Commander, Named generals) and at what point does delegated authority or influence cross over into ruling.

laguz24

Believe me he already probably knows or at the very least has a contingency plan in the works.

superkeaton

Lotta mistakes in this one, but still cool. I'm wildly unsurprised that Hasenbach's chesswork lead to the complete fucking botch that was Akua's Folley.

Oshi

We've known about the silver for a long time now. Malicia told us about it since she was the one who let it happen. I was just surprised she admitted to it.

Liliet

Tit for tat. Cat made a good point about not leaving Kairos to bring that up.

Zarquon

Oh that's a fatal flaw right there!

The Dead King absolutely, certainly, definitely knows or will know that the Empire Ever Dark is marching on him. And Sve Noc. Since this was revealed early, then the surprise is that Catherine is wrong. If this is to work, this would not be revealed to the readers until all hope is lost and suddenly they arrive.

Sve Noc basically just got the ultimate death flag.

The Dead King knows.

Matthew

Cat may have just been selling this to Cordelia. Cat has to know that the Dead King would find out that Cat has Drow with her.

Insanenoodlyguy

He had a fight with the crow twins. He absolutely knows there's drow. What he doesn't necessarily know, is the number. This could be a surprise because it is not a make-or-break situation, he knows there's drow he'll prepare for drow. But there will be an inconveniently large number that actually arrive. That's what keeps this from being ruined. This surprise will not be the difference between defeat or Victory either way. It might be a huge pain in the ass for him though. And multiple pains in the asses can add up, which is what cat is going for.

Quite Possibly A Cat

A handful of mighty and two god slivers is one thing.

A thousand Mighty and two full gods is a completely different thing.

TeK

Sometimes surprise is that there is no surprise. Don't underestimate EE

mavant

Ah, fair point. The metagame of storytelling changes when you can assume your readership already knows the tropes.

Shveiran

...But the readers already knew. Nothing has changed in that regard.

ICSM

This. We all already knew the drow were marching to Keter with Sve Noc. It was part of the bargain with the dwarf Named. Nothing new was revealed to us, only to Cordelia.

Liliet

Catherine's plan doesn't actually rest on him not knowing, she damn well knows better than that.

mavant

I'm not sure that's a death flag for Sve Noc (unless you just meant that as a pun). But I'll certainly agree that DK is going to end up being ready for them.

Mental Mouse

> DK is going to end up being ready for them.

... it's just not going to help him.

Albatross

Man, I just don't see what Callow gets out of this that makes it worth the risk that Procer will immediately betray them, or that Praes will screw them over while this is happening. I get she's getting her Accords but I'm begging you Cat, take war reps! take humiliate! Make them release nations, anything!

TeK

Why would Procer betray them, much less immediately? You have a skewed perception of them, somehow. Besides, she doesn't have a warscore to ask all that, she didn't occupy any provinces, just won a few battles.

Besides, she's using the rest of the war score on "make a coalition" option, that would've been abused by EU4 players too much.

Novice

I recognize a fellow EU4 player when I see one. But I disagree with reparations being laden this early in the war. It will immediately have an impact on the already shaky alliance they're trying to forge. To use HOI terminology, she has to wait for the peace conference to start after the war.

Cicero

Callow gets to survive, independent, and gets to have the massive war fought on someone else's territory.

At this point Callow thinks that is a decent deal. Not great, but not terrible.

Shveiran

And yet Callow bleeds its young populace in another war; all this gets Callow is removing the risk of cities being sacked unless the campaign is a failure, but that isn't that much of a gain considering the army was always small enough a big battle was most it could do anyhow, and thus defeat would always have lead to heavy strategic loss.

After the Rebellion, the Courts, Liesse the Second, the Crusade, the mess in Iserre... this is not a small thing. Callow doesn't have the Principate populace, or even Praes'. Recovering will take far longer. Perhaps terrible would be too hard, but they are still getting the short end of the stick. Especially for someone that is willingly sticking their hands in the fire for their enemies' sake. And are bringing in not one but two major allies no one else even thought could be part of the war. That no one is sweetening the deal, even now, not even with future promises, is disappointing.

Insanenoodlyguy

Three. Be it with Amadeus on the throne or not, even if the accords arent signed you can bet the black Queen is going to have Praes involved before its done.

Liliet

– Rozala has already sworn an oath to rise in rebellion if Procer fucks Callow over YET AGAIN on the heels of this. That's no small thing;

– at that, HOW EXACTLY will Procer fuck Callow over. It's going to be their armies bleeding the most, and their treasuries and resorces;

– Callow gets a massive narrative advantage for being the good guy who saves everyone, and while it sure hasn't helped previous Good Kings, they've got Catherine in charge right now, and she knows damn well how to work these things;

– it sets a precedent for Good/Evil cooperation that will echo through the continent's stories going forward, and given its neighbourly relationship with Praes, Callow's damn well going to benefit from that.

Shveiran

These are valid points, but I'd point out this all rests on Cat surviving the war.

Now, sure, I don't think she is very likely to end up dead, but if she was Callos would be fucked. In ten to twenty years, Procer has recovered through its larger populace and wealth, while Callos is still trying to recover the cities Summer and Diabolist nuked out of existence.

Proceran ambition is another popular story, and if Malanza was to die as well (which is much more likely) her vow is not a shield.

I'm just saying, most of the characters are not aware Narrative is a thing. Which suggests they know the deal is unbalanced and that they are not in a hurry to fix it.

Mental Mouse

> if Malanza was to die as well (which is much more likely) her vow is not a shield.

I'm not so sure about that... remember that sword she left behind.

caoimhinh

Yet that's still not a shield, but a weapon for the Malanza descendants to rise in rebellion if Procer goes back on their end of the deal.

That's a vengeance/retaliation, not prevention. And it still doesn't mean that the Malanza who picks up the sword will be victorious or successful.

Insanenoodlyguy

For starters if he takes all of Procer Callos is next. Oh, not soon. Maybe not in Cats lifetime. But make no mistake, its doomed if Procer is simply left to die. Even her nuclear option is that she comes back from the east as a conqueror that they have no choice but to kneel too. Procer the nation dies yes but procer the people still need to survive.

Andrew Mitchell

> For starters if he takes all of Procer Callos is next. Oh, not soon. Maybe not in Cats lifetime. But make no mistake, its doomed if Procer is simply left to die.

Exactly. Callos, and the rest of Calernia, need a permanent solution to the Dead King.

Thanatoss

Sooo... now Cordelia simply must fall in love with Cat and forgive all her "crimes". I see no other way around it.
Btw. I just noticed (no idea why so late in the story) that if you want to describe whole story/all actions of Cat with one word it would be: Patriotic. Hmm it doesn't look like this from the first glance... but all she does she does for Callow, at all costs.

caoimhinh

Yep, many of the most influential characters are very patriotic, though each in a different way.

Catherine, Amadeus, and Cordelia are patriotic people, as they want what is better for their nations and took power because they thought that was the best way to get things done. Anaxares is a counter-example, as a patriotic person that doesn't want things changed (though he was brainwashed and constantly threatened with death), plus he was forced into the position he is.

Others like Malicia, Akua, and the Elves are nationalists instead, with a fierce pride even in the failures of their cultures, so instead of fixing those they embrace that and seize power for themselves to be the rulers of the nation they take pride in.

Sve Noc are sort of a counter-example, as nationalists who took control of their nation for the sake of survival, but are now so engrained with the position of ruling the Drow that they won't allow to let go of power, they became goddesses, after all; Sve Noc also started to see the failings in what the Drow had become, and are currently taking steps towards betterment, using Catherine for it since they admitted they didn't have the perspective for it.

NZPIEFACE

It's going to be weird for Cat in the future, when she looks at the newer generations of Drow who were born on the surface, following a set of rules and guidelines that she drafted.

caoimhinh

I think she will smile and be proud of them.

NZPIEFACE

She gave legitimacy to rap battles as tools for political debates.

Shveiran

The difference between patriots and nationalists is VERY subjective, and even within the guidelines you have adopted many could disagree about who should fall on which side of the line.

What is a fundamental part of one's culture, and what is a failed tradition that has lost both meaning and use? That is a judgment call, not something we can measure and compare objectively.

sivarajan

Nationalists are patriots we don't like.

sivarajan

Woe on us all, but if the Gods demanded my home be ashes then the Gods would burn.

edrey

cat will get betrayed, she should already know that, and the drow attacked by sun type magic by everyone the DK, dwarves, spellsingers and what not.

off topic, but someone know if cat added new pieces to her cloak or she have the saint body or more important her aspects with her?

caoimhinh

It wasn't said nor shown. So only future chapters will tell.

Shveiran

Considering how things went down, I seriously doubt Cat went corpse-robbing in that instance.

NZPIEFACE

Here, you have Cordelia making alliances and treaties with the greatest nations of Man.

There, you have Cat fucking sending everyone else to the doorstep of the Dead King.

The final battle will probably somehow manage to include a few giants to make it so every sapient race on the continent is tearing down Keter.

NZPIEFACE

I just realized, if Cordelia can be called Warden of the West, Cat should straight up be called the Warden.

Liliet

Warden of the East – even the drow are on the eastern side of the continent, relatively! If I remember right!

Fayhem

Given that “warden” is a title that can mean “guardian” but can also equally well mean “person in charge of a prison”, I would actually propose that Cat be titled Warden of the Dead. Because she’s the person who’s going to be most responsible for getting DK bottled up (AKA imprisoned) in the Serenity, and the drow she’s the high priestess of will be in charge of keeping him there since the plan is basically to park them in Keter and make Sephirah the new home of the drow.

caoimhinh

Warden of Evil or Warden of the Dark XD

hakureireimu

I don’t get how the epigraph relates to this chapter.

caoimhinh

Well, epigraphs don’t always relate to the chapter.

That said, it could be that it’s related to Catherine telling Cordelia about the Drow and Dwarves, as maybe the Dead King could find out. Maybe the presence of Sve Noc and two Heroes sworn to Choirs of angels protect the city from scrying, maybe not.

Maybe Cordelia will proceed to make plans with her council, speak about this and the knowledge will be out as Malicia has spies in Procer and she could tell about it to the Dead King.

As the Epigraph said: difficult to tell if a mistake was in fact made.

Novice

I believe it pertains to the Dead King: it doesn’t matter how perfectly the DK played his schemes in the past or how he will play his stratagems in the future, everybody and their goats are going for his permanent end.

Liliet

It might be related to Catherine and Cordelia revealing their dirty secrets to each other.

Javvies

So ... Cordelia believes her object I’d not of Below, so it’s not some entombed ancient Villain or a Hell Egg.

So ... that leaves something from Above (trapped Angel or where one died) ... or something from the Mavians/Mavian Fae.

Cordelia ... you have no room to complain about Cat considering a deal with the Dead King after you refused her offers. Well, you can complain, there's just no weight out legitimacy behind them. Especially since she never actually made a deal. And has since arranged the groundwork for a massive coalition against the Dead King.

Aston Whiteman

Gonna be a nuclear weapon..

Tom

An actual nuke misplaced by the gnomes, maybe? 😊

Quite Possibly A Cat

That wouldn't turn the tide of battle. Now if it was a practical guide to building nukes it would.

Ironically, a guide to nuke making wouldn't run afoul of "no single failure point" and "no grand artifacts"

"Not an artifact. Not a single failure point. We've made dozens, and have another hundred in the production lines." Hell it might even be legal under the Accords. "This is a completely conventional, non-alchemic, non-magic weapon with no association with Above or Below. " The only downside would be gnomes.

Shveiran

Kind of a big downside, though

Natman717

Oh damn, how did I never realize the Drow weren't just a tiny people. I thought the entire species was with Cat... I feel stupid now.

Sugar Roll

Hooo boy. Now, Cat reveals her deal with the dwarves and I love it. This is exactly what they need to have a fighting chance against the Dead King.

Now, if Praes and the League joins the party, the continent can go all in on Neshamah.

Sparsebeard

Well, there are still, the Chain of Hunger, the Bloom, the Titanomachy, Mercantis, the Matrons, Court(s?) of Arcadia and others I might have forgotten.

Liliet

Pretty sure that's all of them, unless you start counting like Daione and the Clans as separate from their patron nations.

Javvies

The Elves occupying the Golden Bloom aren't getting involved.

I'm pretty sure they've fucked off to Arcadia again. But they're an enemy as far as Cat is concerned, thanks to the Deoraithe. And, because, well, they're racist genocidal assholes who kill any non Hero that gets too close to the Golden Bloom's borders.

Daniel Hernandez

Theres no way the Golden Bloom wont make a cameo. The Spellblade was a prince. If there is any story Cat can make good on, it's making sure the King gets his due for stealing his son.

frolamiz

That depend. Remember, Cat still has the spellblade's corpse in her pocket, end she may use it as a bargaining chip to negotiate with them.

Or you know, the bard could just go and have a drink with her old buddy the Forever King and inadvertently let slip where he could get back his son's corpse.

Fayhem

> But [the Elves are] an enemy as far as Cat is concerned, thanks to the Deoraithe.

If Cat got a hold of the info that Bard mentioned a while ago about how the asshole-elves on Calernia are unable to reproduce on account of their extreme assholiness making their trees sterile (elf-on-elf reproduction is weird apparently), she might be able to sell the Deoraithe on the prospect of involving the elves against Keter. Because each and every battle casualty the elves took would be a permanent reduction of the elves' ability to resist the Deoraithe when they're finally ready to take back their home.

Of course, by the same token, getting the elves involved in a major war would probably be borderline impossible since they'd vastly rather just nope out of creation than spill a single precious drop of elven blood. Much less the bucketloads that warring on the Dead King would probably entail.

Javvies

You misunderstand the nature of the Calernian Elven sterility.

The Elves of the Golden Bloom can't have children anymore because they're cursed.

They're cursed by land and forest of the Golden Bloom itself because they committed genocide against the ancient Deoraithe who were the original inhabitants of the Golden Bloom. The Land (and the Forest) was (and still is) decidedly displeased about that. So are the Deoraithe.

Fayhem

> You misunderstand the nature of the Calernian Elven sterility.

I think it would be more accurate to say I joke about the nature of the Calernian Elven sterility, because they're assholes and I don't take their problems seriously. Besides which I don't think anyone can claim to definitively understand the nature of Calernian Elven sterility, since it has never been unambiguously defined by a reliable source.

I would also note that the nature of their sterility is irrelevant to my comment, which was actually about the implications of their sterility rather than the nature of it.

Shveiran

HA! Called the Catming clean chat! Yay me!

On a more serious note, this is what I meant when I said that Cordelia's kneeling was just spectacle.

She made a good show of being desperate and humbled, yet how she acts now, mere moments ago?

She owns up to PART of her past mistakes, after Catherine does first, and only admits the still relevant secret after Cat calls her out on it explicitly; even then, she reveals nothing save that it is not villanous in origin.

She doesn't own up to the fact that she sent her opposition in Callow to die, accepting the risk they would parcel out Callow if victorious, despite Cat calling her out on it at the time; much liek she doesn't own up to the fact she called her a warlord with no legitimacy while wearing a crown she pried from the cold, dead fingers of her rivals, dead in the field.

And she offers nothing, not even verbally, to back up her declarations from the previous chapter; no reparations offered to the poorer, smaller country she invaded and is now going to bleed for her people and bringing an Empire from legends of old AND the biggest power in Calernia into the war as allies; not even discussing together the fate of her eldritch trump card or its deployment, despite the fact that it can't be argued at this point that the Black Queen is her superior in matters of warfare and magic both; not even disclosing that secret WHEN ASKED, let alone willingly.

This is... deeply disapointing, and so very unsatisfying.

It makes the previous chapter nothing but an empty gesture, because she still takes more than she receives without feeling that's somewhat inappropriate; she still acts like she is in command of everyone, not like an equal, let alone someone that is DESPERATE FOR HELP.

She didn't even make an empty promise to back the Accords! Which she likely will for reason of her own, and not as a reward, but seriously, not even that?

Fuck you and your bad leg, Hasenbach; if all it was is posturing you could have spared us a chapter.

Sisters, what will it take?

Are the Blood and drow really going to go down in history as the only powers willing to work with Cat as soon as she stops wrecking fools? Really, murderous raven goddesses and murdehobos made rulers was too high a bar to clear? Really Hasenbach? Really?

NZPIEFACE

She still believes that Cat is just that, a villainous warlord that drove the Principate to the brink.

While she may be superior to Corderlia in matters of war and murder, Corderlia still thinks she holds the political (and moral) high ground.

This chapter is just Cat smashing both of those beliefs into the ground as far as she can.

When was the last time anyone made alliances with both the Drow and the Dwarves?

Javvies

I'm going to guess never.

Assuming we're ignoring the possibility that Bard/Intercessor at some point played some sort of game with both simultaneously. But I'm not sure that would or should really count anyways.

hakureireimu

Absolutely agree; Cat should not give Cordy any freebie since she doesn't deserve it.

erebus42

Come now Cordelia. It's ok to be upset but really let she who has never attempted to sell another country's land and people into death and or slavery cast the first stone.

To make their own way

In that case Cordelia does get to cast all the stones considering she was planning to do exactly none of that.

erebus42

Wasn't she though? She was basically selling Callow to the other princes to carve up among themselves which would have resulted in countless deaths and the remaining survivors under the thumb of foreign despots.

Mental Mouse

So, crossing the streams for a bit: Someone here linked me to the time-travelling horror webseries All Night Laundry a while back, and I've been binging through the back story. At page 1875, I found something very relevant to our Cat's travails:

To which a commenter replied "Is that how Fate was born?". Here, I'll add "... or Providence?" Of course in this chapter, Cat's doing her best to short-circuit that loop of planning, we'll have to see how much it helps.

Mental Mouse

And that blockquote just ignored my line-break tags, but formatting aside you get the idea.

Draconic

Yes. This was the best thing Catherine could have offered to Cordelia Hasenbach. The hope of not just survival, but even victory.

Dainpdf

Now all that Cat needs is a kitchen sink to throw at Neshamah...

Fayhem

One filled with goblinfire, naturally.

Shveiran

In the Black Queen's kitchen, can there be any other sink?

Fayhem

See, now you're making me wonder if Catherine will wind up being the subject of the Calernian equivalent of Chuck Norris facts (remember that meme?). E.g., "Goblinfire is unquenchable and consumes everything utterly, without exception. That's why the Black Queen uses it to wash her hands."

Quite Possibly A Cat

So about Sve Noc. I know they technically aren't a single point of failure, but I don't think Cordelia saying "Oh, actually, I'm not getting the angel's not-corpse, I'm actually getting several thousand angel feathers would get Cat to not worry."

Also, just because the Choirs are fixed and unchanging doesn't mean that angels wouldn't be able to die. They might just do the Hilbert Hotel Shuffle whenever an angel dies.

Finally, does anyone think using an Angel's CORPSE against the Dead King is Bad Idea Bear?

Mental Mouse

It's been noted that unlike Demons and Devils, Angels are finite in number. Presumably when one dies, any salvageable power gets reallocated among the remaining Choir members.

Javvies

I think it was said that the Choirs themselves are static and unchanging.

I got the impression that an individual Angel can fall or be killed, but the Choir they're from subsequently autospawns a replacement Angel.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, that was my reading of it too.

ironvale

DK received a red letter.

Cordi: I really hoped we weren't forced to this.

Chapter 79: Hitch

"The crocodiles in the pit ate the condemned too quickly when starved and only nibbled when well-fed, which is why we bespelled them to be always be hungry for a little more. Thankfully they do not wear clothes, and so can still be told apart from the rest of my court."

– Dread Emperor Perfidious

The conversation did not truly resume after we returned inside.

Hasenbach was burning with the need to reassess the situation, I caught, to summon her advisors and generals and reconsider where Procer stood after the several revelations I'd dropped onto her lap. It drastically changed her nation's situation going into the negotiations, I knew that very well. Though the First Prince still needed the Grand Alliance as a whole I'd likely gone from an important ally to the single most important foreign relation of the Principate. There was no point in further kicking the hornet's nest by trying to get anything out of her before she was certain of where she stood, not that I minded. Time was on my side as much as it was on any mortal's: what I brought to the table only became more valuable the closer to the end of truce we came. Naturally, before we left the balcony I'd made it clear to Hasenbach that the affairs of the Firstborn were not to be spoken of even with her closest advisors. Sve Noc kept me out of arcane eyes and ears, but loose lips were harder to ward against and there was no doubt that Procer was currently a barrel afflicted by an army's worth of leaks. That she did not argue the matter was a sign, to my eye, that she correctly understood the stakes involved.

I got dark looks from Malanza and Brother Simon as the talks effectively stalled after we limped back to warmth and excuses were soon made for the Procerans to depart. From their point of view, I'd gone outside with the Warden of the West after she humiliated herself at my feet and returned her both troubled and boiling with the urge to leave. They might be assuming threats had been involved, which admittedly given our respective positions would be child's play to hand out. Foolish in the long view, of course, but then my people were not known to be fond of anything long save for prices. Cordelia had not willfully tugged at my conscience without reason: it was the closest thing she had to leverage on me at the moment. She'd snapped her pride over her knee to try to begin evening the scales between the two of us, which I supposed was laudable. It didn't, of course. Even the scales, or make me fonder of her on a personal level. She wasn't my friend, she'd not somehow ceased to be the same woman who'd thrown my people to the deeps out of convenience. But that did not change the necessity of fighting back the Dead King or the perils lurking in overplaying my hand while it was still the strongest at the table. They were separate matters, and I need not like the woman to work with her.

Besides, in some ways I genuinely respected her. Often that was better than liking someone, when it came to making bargains: fondness waxed and waned, character tended to be more stable a foundation for agreements. We stayed in the hall after the three Procerans departed, Hakram and Vivienne rising as Hasenbach departed the way etiquette dictated while I did not. I wasted no time in weaving a ward of Night after they left, as I had no intention of being eavesdropped upon by the inevitable spies that'd be waiting with their ear pressed against the door.

"Whatever Hasenbach has dredged up, she can't use it yet," I bluntly told them. "It's not a Hell Egg, unless she's a much better liar than I thought and surprisingly shirt-sighted to boot. I'm leaning towards the remains of an angel at the moment."

"William needed forty-nine hours to call Contrition, but little more than that," Vivienne noted. "Though the Choir whispered many secrets to him in his dreams he did not share, and I have only the shallowest knowledge of such matters."

It was nice to see that green Named on both sides of the fence ended up mostly fumbling their way through the dark. If the Heavens had handed out some sort of manual to their champions while Below ate dust it'd be deeply unfair. On the other hand, I grimly thought, I'd not be all that surprised in such a situation to hear that Below did hand out a manual but some villain had burned all the copies to hinder the competition. I had, after all, yet to encounter a single villain who put stock in the notion of fair play.

"The Lone Swordsman was a hero in Contrition's service, treading the remains of one of their own and bringing them forth," Hakram pointed out. "It was an alignment threefold, pouring out after years of heroes being suppressed by the Carrion Lord. It seems unlikely the Principate will benefit from such factors in its own attempts at mastery."

"Hero is the heart of the matter here," I said. "The First Prince either needs one of those taking orders from her or a legion's worth of priests to make anything out of those – still speculative, so let's not get ahead of ourselves – remains."

"Would it not be, in a sense, an angel's corpse?" Vivienne suddenly asked.

I cocked my head to the side, unsure of where she was headed with this. Hakram let out a rumbling noise.

"The Dead King is the greatest necromancer that ever lived," Adjutant reminded me.

I sucked in a lip, but after a moment shook my head.

"The water in Lake Henghest was blessed and that was just from touching the remains," I said. "Light tends to screw with magic, anyway, and this is about as consecrated as a corpse can get. Necromancy shouldn't be able to raise it."

A beat passed.

"We'll still ask Masego just in case," I added.

"Diabolist as well," Vivienne calmly suggested. "Her knowledge of such lore might be deeper than even Zeze's."

I shot her an assessing look. It'd always been a given I would talk with Akua about this – as Vivienne had intimated, if anyone would know about angel necromancy it would be Wolof's most terrible golden child – but I'd not wanted to rub it in her face. My successor's expression was hard to read, leaving me few hints as to her thoughts. Was this an oblique way to tell me I need not walk on eggshells when it came to Akua Sahelian, or simple blunt pragmatism? Something to mull over later.

"It's a liability even if it can't be raised," Hakram gravelled. "Bringing that into a battle with the Hidden Horror is like wading into a goblin feast-night with pockets full of munitions. It can only end one way."

Most Named would balk at being compared to goblins no matter whose banner they flew, but it was rather heartwarming to imagine the likes of the Pilgrim consigned to the fate of metaphorical goblinry.

"The Dead King's one looming trouble, but the Tyrant's another," Vivienne darkly said. "That man would strike the match to the whole world's pyre just for a laugh, Cat, and he's not nearly as neutered as you think."

"His armies really are headed south," I told her, "you told me as much yourself and the Eyes confirmed independently. The League's fallen behind the Hierarch and Kairos with him, but not the point of utter idiocy: they're not going to backstab a continent-wide alliance in the middle of throwing down with Keter. Not even for a few southern principalities. They'll know damn well that if we lose they're screwed too and if we win we'll return it all a hundredfold."

Frankly, if I were an utterly amoral monster with the intention to expand and in charge of the League's political decisions, I'd promptly sign the Accords to avoid falling on the wrong side of the mutual defence clause against non-signatories and then simply wait. Patience would mean the Grand Alliance's armies bleeding against Keter, and when those armies all went home then I'd strike at southern Procer. Riding to the Principate's defence again would be wildly unpopular with all its allies, after a brutal grind against the dead up north, which would limit the effectiveness of the treaties. If the League then gobbled only limited territories, like Tenerife and Salamans, there might be heavy pressure on Procer to then accept a peace should offer be extended.

"That only means that the horse he's riding is not longer the League," Vivienne said, eyes sharp. "It might be the Hierarch, or the Dead King or a dozen other flavours of madness. We don't know, which is half the trouble with that one."

"His play here is to take a swing at the White Knight," I said. "Has to be, he had the man summoned by treaty just so he could stand trial. And Hierarch could make that troublesome, I suppose, but if he does then he's signing his own death warrant – decapitating a hero is breaking the truce, Vivs. Especially if it's the Sword of Judgement. They do that, neither Hierarch nor Tyrant walk out of Salia alive. Not with the kind of power that's gathered here."

"There'd be legal grounds for an execution, considering he's an Ashuran hero that fought in an internal League war and presumably took likves," Hakram said. "And even a public attempt would stir up trouble among the heroes when it's pointed out to be lawful under the Accords."

Which I did not doubt for a moment Kairos Theodosian would. By now full copies of the text had been made available to all delegations, even the League's, so there was no doubt he'd either read or had someone read them.

"More likely he wants to strike at Judgement through the White Knight, which I'll lose no sleep over," I said. "I'll give fair warning to all involved but besides that it's no trouble of mine. I owe no debt to any Choir, save that which would be paid in steel."

Hanno was personable enough and seemed to think well of the Seraphim, but I'd weep no tears for the Choir of Judgement getting a taste of its own medicine even if that lesson came by madman's hands. Either the angels would lose a few feathers or either of the two villains at the head the League would get a taste of smiting. I couldn't see a losing proposition in that for either Callow, the Accords or even myself.

"The Tyrant of Helike is nearing the end of his thread," Hakram said. "He's burned too many bridges, we all saw that much at the Graveyard. If not for the Dead King's more pressing threat, half of Calernia would already have banded together to crush him. His actions have isolated the Free Cities diplomatically as long as he lives and his defeats mean he's losing prestige within their ruling structure. Given the informality of his pre-eminence among the League, that could mean the waning of his influence."

I worried my lip.

"He's cornered, you're saying," I slowly said.

Which was not a good thing, in a villain of Kairos Theodosian's calibre. Best to kill him with a clean, quick stroke than let him scheme with desperation moving the hand.

"Or exactly where he intended to be from the beginning," Vivienne said. "When a skilled enemy makes an obvious mistake, it is no such thing."

That last part was a quote from the Strategoi, as I recalled, which was an amusing piece of irony considering it was believed to have been written by Theodosius the Unconquered.

"Either way we should share our concerns with the Grand Alliance and have some of our people look into whatever it is he's up to," I mused. "Fair enough. Best not to let him make a mess even if it's not in our backyard, strictly speaking."

I leaned back into my seat, glancing at the cup of cooled tea I'd barely touched. Yeah, I wasn't going to force myself to drink that even if it came across as rude and Hakram had somehow tricked himself into finishing his own. Still, while the Tyrant remained a threat he was no longer the most pressing of my concerns. The First Prince's ruinous little project weighed deeper on my mind, because it felt like a ready-made pivot in someone's story – and not one of my making, which was even more worrisome.

"Double down on efforts to unearth what it is the First Prince dredged, and where it's headed," I ordered Vivienne. "Have your people look for large concentrations of priests as well."

I paused.

"Concentrate your efforts on Lyonis and Brabant, for that last part," I added. "Maybe Brus as well, if you can spare the people."

As far as I was concerned Cordelia Hasenbach was acting foolishly by meddling with doomsday weapons, but that did not make her a fool. She'd know that gathering priests in great numbers close to the northern fronts would bring a lot less scrutiny than doing the same in the south. Especially in Brabant as it was, by all reports, drowning in a tide of desperate refugees who could certainly use some food and healing. If the weapon could be moved, and for it to be of practical use against the Dead King it would have to be, then if we found where it was headed we could double back from there. Going at this from the other way might finally allow us a peek through the veil of secrecy that'd surrounded this entire affair. I sighed, then cracked my shoulders.

"Hakram, I don't suppose you could send for a change of clothes?" I asked.

I'd lost the habit of plate, and the weight of the metal did no favours to my leg even if I could not feel it at the moment. The sooner I was back in cloak and leathers the better. Might add a light coat of mail, though, because really there was never a reason not to wear armour if you were wearing clothes at all. I'd not deny that my preferences in clothing had been shaped some by the unfortunately high amount of times I'd been stabbed in my life.

"They are already on their way," Adjutant replied, because he was a prince among men and always would be.

"Good," I said. "Well, folks, the talks begin in earnest tomorrow. Let's see if we're ready for them."

—

I wasn't sneaking out of Salia, not exactly.

That would imply that a pack of spies wouldn't have noticed me saddling Zombie and leave the palace with the slight escort of three knights in dark cloaks, or that I would have hidden my departure from my companions. But I'd not made it clear where I was headed for either and pretty much let the assumption that I would be going back to our camp stick. Hakram could read me like a book, so he knew there was more to it than I'd said. He also trusted me same as I trusted him, though, so he didn't ask. I doubted that my having conversations with the White Knight would cause much of a scandal if it came out — even radicals under the Heavens would think twice before claiming I could corrupt the Sword of Judgement — but it'd certainly raise eyebrows, and very much attract attention. I'd rather not have to deal with the Pilgrim coincidentally coming by for a chat, or someone's admirably optimistic attempt to eavesdrop through arcane means, so it'd stay quiet for now. Though this was not casual, could not be given who we were, keeping such talks informal would allow the illusion of it to last a little longer. I'd set out early after dark, since I did genuinely intend to get some work done when I passed through camp and led out my escort at a brisk trot.

We were followed, to my utter lack of surprise. Riders kept pace at a respectful distance behind us maybe a dozen, most likely at the First Prince's behest. Though I was First Under the Night and the dark had already fallen, I was not unaware that my spilling blood in Salia would bring great complications. Even putting down some overly ambitious robber or some drunken rowdy fantassin would meant I'd killed a Proceran under truce, and for many reasons that was best avoided even if justified. No, Cordelia had likely sent those riders to serve mostly as diplomats. And maybe guides, given the gargantuan size of this damned city, but I could see to that with prayer truth be told. So long as I was willing so suffer Komena's rampant mockery of my sense of direction, anyway. Easy not to get lost, when you fly over the streets, I grumbled. South we rode, through the palatial streets and estates of the Lineal and then the large plazas and avenues of the markets known as Les Vendeuses – which were awake and swarming with people even at this hour, for the city never slept and the glow of torches and lanterns lent it all an air of the fantastical. Keeping to the broad avenues that'd been built to allow for carts, as many as four of them I'd wager, we made good time cutting through towards Merovins avenue.

From there it'd be an uncomplicated ride, straight south until we were through the low districts and the Griffon Gate. Out of curiosity I'd slowed down on my way through some of the marketplaces, taking a look at what was being peddled. The array of goods, even at the tail end of winter and while Procer was at war, was rather bewilderingly large. Ashuran silks, Levantine ceramics and even Taghreb silverworks were on display, not to mention what must have been goods from more than half of the principalities in Procer. It was no wonder I'd been taught that the Principate was near capable of sustaining itself through trade between its own princes: it was a large empire and one that lacked for little. Save perhaps for restraint, but was that not ever the way with empires? My knights were gawking as well, which was no surprise. None of the three looked older than thirty under the hood, so none had known Callow save under either myself or Black – and under both reigns little had been traded with Procer save for arrows and insults. I'd be surprised if either had left the kingdom before this campaign. Still, it would not do to linger forever so I spurred on Zombie to a brisker pace.

It did not last long, as it happened. A smooth turn around a counting house brought us in front of an open shop from which no less than four signs had been hung, all painted with bright red letters. Unlike the rest of the signs I'd seen in this city, the words on this one were in Lower Miezian instead of Chantant or Tolesian. Bundles Of Wakeleaf, So Cheap It's Almost Crime. Vale Summer Wine, So Many Bottles You Can't Drink Them All. We Did Not Steal The Wakeleaf, We Swear, That Would Be A Crime. I Guess You Could Drink Them All, If You Are A Drunk. With morbid curiosity I led Zombie closer to have a better look, and to my mild surprise there did seem to be a genuine stock of neatly wakeleaf bundles. And a few crates of wine, one of which had been opened and revealed the impurities-riddled glass bottles that were typical of my homeland. I gesture for my knights to rein in their horses and approached one of the hanging signs, touching the K at the end of 'drunk'. Red wetness marred my gloves, the paint hadn't even had time to dry yet.

An indignant hissing sound came from the shopfront, as a surprisingly tall gargoyle in a too-large dress and a merchant's hat pointed a half-empty sleeve at me accusingly. The insides of the dress moved, so I drew it up with the tip of my staff and found another gargoyle down there, who looked at me with a scandalized gasp. Another one was standing on its shoulders, and I suspected another one on its own. I withdrew my staff with a sigh, letting the dress's hem drop. So the Tyrant wanted to have a talk, looked like.

"Stay here," I ordered my knights. "It shouldn't be long."

I dismounted, landing on the stone with a wince, and paused before entering. I grabbed a bottle from the crate, and then a few bundles of wakeleaf, and only then went to treat with Kairos Theodosian.

I had a feeling I'd need them.

copaceticcockroach

Vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

siva0526

Seems like Tyrant makes a Triumphant(no pun intended, or was it?) return from Irritating to Irritatingly intriguing.

Liliet

Fucking stylish, that was ♥

Mental Mouse

Well, Cat did forget her sword. Not that she uses it much anymore, but it would go with the wine. 😊

Eleron Pfoutz

I dismounted, landing on the stone with a wince, and paused before entering. I grabbed a bottle from the crate, and then a few bundles of wakeleaf, and only then went to vote at Top Web Fiction.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

copaceticcockroach

Cat's finally talking with Kairos, that talk already felt like it was overdue. Who has a feeling that Cat is going to get the most out of this talk? Feels like a victory when a person finds something of importance before a battle, right?

Oshi

Nothing about this fits a story that I can see quite yet. It's setting the pieces right now and it's all about the Tyrants play as far as I can see. I'm cautious to see where it will lead.

copaceticcockroach

Rethinking about this, how do the rule of three start? Didn't Cat bring wine to the Kairos talk to get Archer and Rouge Sorcerer back? Could this be a rule of three? In the first time Cat got Archer back, so a win. So could this one be draw? Correct me if I'm wrong, I never really understood what circumstances made a rule of three start in the first place.

JackInTheBawks

The most important part is that those involved have to be rivals. They have to be directly opposed to each other and also be reflections of each other in some narrative way.

It's uncertain to me whether Kairos might be considered a rival to Cat at this point. There's some parallels between them, and some opposition of goals, but not as clear-cut as vs. Pilgrim or William

Mental Mouse

Well... Kairos is the champion of "traditional" Evil, against Cat leading the reformists. But the Twilight conflicts complicate things too – there might have been a Rule of Three tucked in there, or it might have been a failed chance to start one (in which case he probably can't now).

Regardless, it's gonna be a long night.

Shveiran

I suppose it is a matter up to debate, yet I would argue that Kairos' "mess with them all" approach prevents a Rule of Three from happening. It is my understanding you need a rival for that to be a thing, and Kairos doesn't – can't – have one. He is too unfocused.

mavant

How many Rule-of-Threes have we had, now?
It would seem appropriate for there to be exactly three such occurrences in the story, and no more.

copaceticcockroach

Cat and Swordsman

Cat and Akua

Cat and Pilgrim

Does it count as a rule of three if it broke halfway?

Mental Mouse

Except Amadeus had one or two as well. This does seem to be a standard play, perhaps the most widely-known (in-world) story mechanic.

NerfContessa

Who ever talks with the tyrant follows the play.
Go and decapitate the tyrant, and all will be better. Less funny, agreed, but better.

Alivaril

Welp, it currently looks as though Cat went out to meet Tyrant in secret. Not a good look, that.

I wonder what poison(s) Kairos put in the wine and wakeleaf?

Some Smartass

Something whimsical, no doubt. He has no reason to follow Praesi poison customs.

NZPIEFACE

Salt and sugar. That's what he put into them.

Some Smartass

The fiend! Does his evil know no bounds?!

Sylwoos

Not in secret if she let herself be follow all the way there.
Anybody with a brain should be able to tell a secret meting of the Black Queen is a tad bit more difficult to discover.

Some Smartass

So, what you're saying is that most of the alliance now thinks they tailed Catherine to a secret meeting. 😊

Mental Mouse

I think Kairos' pitch is obvious enough to make the situation clear. I'd guess her tails will have a laugh about it.

Soma

>They were separate matters, and I need to like the woman to work with her.

CATCOR CONFIRMED!

Probably a typo, but I refuse this interpretation.

Andrew Mitchell

Definitely missing a "don't"... but I respect your refusal of reality.

gingerlygrump

Honestly, I think we're heading into a Canno. Or Hacat? Anyway, Cat originally set out for another evening chat with Hanno. Seems like she found a hero she can respect.

Mental Mouse

In fact, she was going to meet with both Hanno and the WotW.

I will note (and Cat surely will) that fooling around with Hanno would be asking for about eight kinds of trouble, and Cat has enough on her plate....

Insanenoodlyguy

I hope she still makes that. Dammit Kairos, don't you catblock my ship!

Liliet

How does this contradict, confirm or in any way refer to Corcat though? 😊

gingerlygrump

It doesn't; that is the beauty of our favorite gal's lustful longings, they are many and myriad.

Raivshard

Already fixed, it appears.

Javvies

Kairos definitely has something up his sleeve. Metaphorically, if not necessarily literally, but quite possibly literally as well.

But he's in dire need of a proper killing. Perhaps Assassin can do something about him. The sooner the better, though. And the means don't really matter.

Uh-oh. If Hanno can be tried for being a foreign Hero/Named being involved in a League internal affair/civil war, that's arguably precedent for going after Amadeus on similar grounds, possibly even with more justification – the White Knight was mostly fighting in defense of a city state he happened to be in, which is probably decent grounds for an extended self defense argument, whereas Amadeus was attacking city states.

—

Yeah, Cordelia, you need Cat way more than you thought you did. Wonder how she's going to sell that internally.

SpeckofStardust

The white knight is likely going to get tried for the act of judging a league citizen.
Namely his Judgment of Kairos.
Mostly because nothing else would stick for all of 5 seconds.

Tom

Kairos can't be killed yet, he's only on the first step of his plan.

SpeckofStardust

Narrative can and has been beaten battered and outright bypassed at times.
Key example, Black
Other Key example, the Dead King.

Decius

His plan is to abandon his plans after one step, so that he's always on the first step of his plan, which is guaranteed to go off without a hitch?

Rup

..now this .. this is a really good way of looking at Kairos.

Sugar Roll

Procer and Praes are at war with each other. It's not meddling in internal affairs like the White Knight did. Procer can hate on Amadeus all they want but they don't have anything to go after him from a diplomatic standpoint.

Javvies

I was referring to Amadeus and the Calamities involvement in the League.

Remember, when Kairos and Bard worked together to set up Captain to be killed. Book 3.

And we know that Kairos despises Amadeus's approach to Villainy. It would give him a free shot at somebody he doesn't like and that Cat would have to react to and use some of her leverage to protect Amadeus.

And it's not like Kairos hasn't already blown out the foundations after burning all his bridges.

Javvies

I was referring to Amadeus and the Calamities involvement in the League.

Remember, when Kairos and Bard worked together to set up Captain to be killed. Book 3.

And we know that Kairos despises Amadeus's approach to Villainy. It would give him a free shot at somebody he doesn't like and that Cat would have to react to and use some of her leverage to protect Amadeus.

And it's not like Kairos hasn't already blown out the foundations after burning all his bridges.

Javvies

The hell?
Dammit, WordPress.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I was referring to Amadeus and the Calamities involvement in the League.

Remember, when Kairos and Bard worked together to set up Captain to be killed. Book 3.

And we know that Kairos despises Amadeus's approach to Villainy. It would give him a free shot at somebody he doesn't like and that Cat would have to react to and use some of her leverage to protect Amadeus.

And it's not like Kairos hasn't already blown out the foundations after burning all his bridges.

Hellspirit

Hahaha, oooh Tyrant ^^

Big Brother

A scandalized gargoyle. Amazing.

caoimhinh

Poor gargoyle, no one likes to have their dress lifted with a yew stick by a cloaked stranger.
Even the Gargoyles have a sense of decency XD

erebus42

You'd think cat would know it's impolite to look up a lady's dress without permission.
Also if whatever nebulous plan the Tyrant has going doesn't work out (and he doesn't get his head chopped off) he should consider abdicating and going into advertising.

edrey

well, that weapon is an angel remain or a lesser god, i think is a god or black would had notice the lake wit holy water. a side note it was 49 not 47 hours for that ritual at liesse, seven x seven, right.
so now is kairos, my bet is he would use the seraphin to turn procer into a republic, or force the pattern of procer to transcend. practical but mad

Mental Mouse

Not just he, but also the Bard, are already on record as saying that his plan is to trap and kill at least one of the Seraphim.

caoimhinh

LMAO, Kairos.

It will be interesting how the conversation goes with a Tyrant that can't lie due to being blessing-compelled. Shouldn't hinder him much, in my opinion. As far as I can recall, Kairos doesn't lie much, even if he is prone to betrayals.

JackInTheBawks

Kairos is a big believer in "technically the truth is the best kind of lie"

Shveiran

I'm kind of worried about that. I think that's what we are headed toward, but I'll be very disappointed if this becomes a thing at this stage, coming from this source.

I mean, if you discount the accused, a trial is never really about whether people are lying, but rather about whether or not they are telling the truth; which is not the same thing, not by a long shot.

Witnesses misremember stuff that has happened years before, recollection can be warped by the question asked and our senses are not perfect machines: you can very well believe false things to be true and testify accordingly, and to TWIST the truth or reframe it you need only present part of it in the wrong way.

Any clever individual should know this, so what testimony is Kairos VotedMostUntrustworthy Theodosian going to give that people won't take a step back, dissect for a day in a sealed room and then possibly ask others about?
It really seems... silly.

Author Unknown

Yes, if only there were some kind of manual or guide for budding villains.

Andrew Mitchell

It would have to be a very practical sort of guide, don't you think?

siva0526

He can always distract with useless talk. He is compelled to tell the truth, but is not compelled to actually answer the question or offer up the whole information.

Gibborim

FINALLY, Vincent Humanmerchant has entered the story.

konstantinvoncarstein

« Thankfully they do not wear clothes, and so can still be told apart from the rest of my court.»

I don't understand where the joke is, could someone explain it?

sivarajan

The rest of his court is also always hungry "for a little bit more." Wolves are the usual metaphor.

SpeckofStardust

I think in an earlier Qoutes that person got thrown in, and proceeded to not get attacked by the Crocs, by basically faking to be one of them?

I might be misremembering.

Mental Mouse

I don't see anything like that on the wiki, at least not with crocodiles. And EE can do better than recycling old lawyer jokes.

C_B

He is throwing shade on his courtiers by implying that, if not for the difference in clothing habits, they would be indistinguishable from a pack of crocodiles who had been enchanted to always be hungry.

Sparsebeard

Damn, I love Tyrant!

Others might have morals, rationality, pride, power, etc., he has a sense of humor!

Cicero

Now, I tend to think it would have been better to ignore the Tyrant, and visit the White Knight instead.

Liliet

Night's long. Catherine can do both.

ninegardens

Both at the same time! I'm sure those two will totally get along!

Liliet

I mean, they have before... 😊

Mental Mouse

Ignoring the Tyrant would not be wise; in this case he'd probably just try to screw things up for Catherine's proper meeting.

Sparsebeard

Let's be honest, Cat never was gonna miss on an occasion to replenish her stash of wakeleaf and Vale summer wine.

ninegardens

Later we find out that Cordelia's plan isn't to nuke anything with the thing, she just plans to tip it into one of the northern lakes so as to prevent the dead from crossing, and provide a more convenient supply of holy water.

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/BoringButPractical>

Shveiran

It would be amusing, but in my opinion that would badly match the hints we have been given so far. It definitely seems like she believes it is a game changer, not just an helpful asset.

ninegardens

Oh, I totally agree, I was just being facetious.

Mental Mouse

It could still be something more useful as a shield than a weapon.

Decius

If it turns lakes into holy water, that's a game changer. Using lakes to store armies is a major strategic advantage, since it denies that area to supply lines until after lengthy and difficult clearing of the lake.

An artifact that 'simply' blesses the lake and destroys the raiding parties within, and makes the lake impassible to future attacks, would be of great strategic importance.

ethericsentinel

But is it a match for Catherine's epic lakeomancy?

Ultimate_Procrastinator

One lake alone? Yes, more amusing than game changing. Dumping it in as her army finishes a network of canals linking all the lakes in the north into a single massive anti-undead barrier of holy water? Much more in line with the hints we've received. Probably not what's gonna happen, but Imma call it just in case

Some Smartass

I'm not sure why Cat thinks she can expect rational behavior from Kairos. He's not a master plan kind of villain, he's just after his next hit of evil morphine.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Isn't evil morphine just morphine, in the long run?

Liliet

He's damn well been a master plan kind so far, between his rounding up of the League to a pet Hierarch and the whole gaming everyone else in Iserre.

He's after his next hit of evil morphine, sure, but he prefers the 'long term plan payoff' kind.

Shveiran

Is that your read? I don't think so, he seems more about balancing acts to be honest.

Your read, I think, is that he planned all that FROM THE START; I argue that while he was most certainly the architect of those events, he kind of jumped on the opportunities that would prevent the whole thing from coming down on his head OR from stabilizing, and used new opportunities as they presented themselves.

This is not his endgame, I don't think; merely his current game.

Mental Mouse

Not balancing acts, but juggling acts – even the Bard called him out on that. Part of the difference is that slipping up doesn't send him to a long fall, it just gets him clonked on the head.

laguz24

Kairos doesn't have an endgame per se. If he did he would die, that is not his way, his way is always a betrayal, a scheme, a plot, he has already won so to speak.

ninegardens

See, the thing with Kairos is that he is sneaky enough, and cunning enough, and idealistic enough (in his own messed up way) that he COULD have an end game... or he might not.

In some sense the joy of this character is that we don't know what his goals are, but in a very different way to everyone else.

I might agree with Some Smartass's claim that he isn't a master plan kind of villain, but I don't think that means he isn't rational and is just after his next hit of evil morphine. In some sense he is taking Amadeus's "No flying fortress, no single weak points" to its natural extreme with his juggling philosophy. He reads like Sylvester from Twig – there is no long term plan, but he can handle chaos better than you, so in that sense throwing dozens of balls in the air and seeing which ones he can catch IS a rational long term plan. Its not madness, its not stupid, it might not be a “plan”, but it sure as hell counts as a strategy,

And he isn't doing it JUST for the hit of Lulz. He just happens to know that leaning into his role puts the wind at his back, and so long as that tail wind doesn't smash him against a cliff, he can ride it far and fast enough to outrun death and destiny. And if it does smash him against a cliff, well... he was expecting to die ANYWAY.

It might not be Amadeasus or Malicia's brand of planning, but what counts as rational totally varies based on what your goals are. Drinking alcohol and partying every night might be irrational if you are after a quiet stable marriage, but if your goal is to get drunk and party and burn the gods house down before cancer kills you, then you may well be on to a winning plan, especially if you've invited a bunch of goblins the local church as your venue

... God damn it, after the Princes graveyard I thought I was sick of the crippled bastard, but now he is coming back and I am hyped.

Some Smartass

There's a reason I picked a medicinal opioid for my metaphor. Remember, he'd already be dead if he wasn't rolling in favor from Below. He decided to launch this mad scheme after looking at his shaking hand. Don't get me wrong, he clearly does enjoy villainy, but there is a deeper motive. You're right that it was a mistake to call him irrational for having a weird desire he's working toward.

Or I might be way off base, who knows? Maybe not even Kairos.

Mental Mouse

Kairos is whimsical, theatrical, and treacherous, but what makes him dangerous is that he is indeed rational. Even while backstabbing someone, he does make sure his own back is covered. Also, he knows perfectly well when he's lost a point, and he's always got a backup plan to keep the point from costing him the game. Q.v. “Is this what love feels like?” when Cat did in fact outmaneuver him back in the runup to Conclave – and notice that he did get something out of the negotiations there, specifically by seeing where the water was running, and finagling a cupful from Cat.

JackInTheBawks

Cat being a dismissive of Kairos earlier in the chapter was a bit of a red flag to me, and right after it's time for a chat with the Absolute Madman himself?

I'm a tad worried.

Things have been going way smoothly for like, three whole chapters, too!

Mental Mouse

Well, her buddies did warn her that he was due to come back into the game.

Faiir

Welcome to Komena Navigating System.

-I knew it, you wouldn't find your way in an empty field!

-You really can't get to: Your camp on your own?

-No, not left you idiot! Turn right!

-I see this is too hard for you. Turn to limpy leg side, then healthy leg side on the next crossroads.

-I said: Left after 300 paces. Was that 300 paces? Can you even count?

-This route is obviously too hard for you, I'll find something easier. Try rolling down that hill!

-You've reached your destination. Finally.

Liliet

Would Komena and Glados get along?

laguz24

Yes, yes they would, so long as they had someone to torment aka cat otherwise they would be at each other's sassy throats.

Faiir

I think that Glados would be best buds with Rumena instead.

Rup

Faiir

Somewhat close:

mavant

We got SO CLOSE to a title drop in this chapter. It was right there!

burguulkodar

The funny thing is that I noticed he ret-conned those sales-phrases because they were lies and he couldn't tell lies so he had to make add-ons to correct the misinterpretation.

beleester

That implies that the wakeleaf genuinely isn't stolen. Poor Kairos, having to become an honest merchant in order to set up this meeting.

Mental Mouse

He's a crowned ruler, he can afford a few bottles of cheap wine and bags of wakeleaf.

308924810a

Cat has completely misestimated what Kairos will do.

He's not at all interested in building sensible gains for his faction in the long term, he's interested in surging to a high-water-mark of importance, from which he can enact a grand influence on the world, either completing his grand plan, or just seeing his will done in secondary objectives.

He's either going to join the Grand Alliance, or play for time and auction off his alliance to whoever pays better, either the DK or the Grand Alliance.

ninegardens

Or the bard. 😐

Mental Mouse

> If the Heavens had handed out some sort of manual to their champions while Below ate dust it'd be deeply unfair. On the other hand, I grimly thought, I'd not be all that surprised in such a situation to hear that Below did hand out a manual but some villain had burned all the copies to hinder the competition.

The Dead King did hand out a manual... we saw where that leads...

Sinestere

I believe Kairos wishes to marry Cat. It would be his “get out of jail” card and elevate his status. He doesn’t bring much to the table so he will have to trick her into it. And spread rumors that it happened to put it in everyone’s mind just as Cat did to gain a certain ring that was always hers....

Mental Mouse

While the brighter heroes might well appreciate having someone to maybe keep Kairos in line, they would (or at least should) also worry about having two trickster-types teaming up against them. (That said, can you imagine Pilgrim’s face?)

Cat of course, would just tell Sve Noc, “go ahead, each of you can have one of his eyeballs”.

Mental Mouse

On the other hand, if you really want a match that would break brains all around, imagine Cat eventually marrying Hanno. Where a quick fling would put most of the risks on Cat, an actual marriage would basically make her untouchable for his remaining lifetime. Not to mention winning some major protection for Callow, even after her abdication.

The Hayward Fault

Damn. Damn! Dammit dammit dammit all and curses too! I’ve reached the present day and thus my rabid devouring is cruelly jerked to a halt!

Oh well. Can’t deny it wasn’t worth it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I know this struggle well. We are as parched wanderers in the desert, ever thirsting for content.

aran

The Tyrant is murderous and insane, but worst of all, he is funny. That makes him even more dangerous.

Chapter 80: Descant

“My dear High Lords, there is nothing to fear. We might be losing the war against Callow yet there is an obvious remedy to this:

this morning, I declared war on Ashur. I will be surrendering unconditionally as soon as they acknowledge this, which ought to take care of our Callowan troubles."

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful

The scent was cloying, heavy against the roof of my mouth before I even stepped into the room.

The incense was the heaviest of the tastes, but there were subtler scents threaded along: sage and cedar, as well as the faint bloom of flowers. The burners from which it all came were spread around the room haphazardly, tended to by chittering gargoyles, and the glow cast by the glass lanterns hanging from the ceiling played shadows along the thick trails of scented smoke rising up. Kairos Theodosian lounged on a seat that was little more than a large bowl of bronze filled with thick red cushions, though as always he'd found a way to have it incrustated with jewels and covered with sculpted bas-reliefs. The Tyrant of Helike greeted me with an indolently raised hand, his brocaded robes of gold and scarlet folded with careful precision so that they would almost hide the length of his arm prone to trembling. Though he'd been thin and sickly for as long as I'd known him, Kairos' narrow face seemed to have shed the last of its softness: his brown curls hung low on a forehead whose skin looked pulled taut over bone. His good eye, the brown one, moved around lazily as if it could not quite focus on anything. The other one, the red of fresh blood and always wetly shining, almost seemed to have grown. As if the crimson had grown to devour more of the Tyrant's face as the rest of him pulled back.

"Welcome, friend," Kairos Theodosian cheerfully greeted me, throwing in an exaggerated wink. "Welcome to my humble shop. You'll not regret visiting, for our prices are princely and our merchandise most definitely acquired through at least partially legal means. Probably."

The cheerfulness was nothing new, from this one, but for once it did not entirely succeed at covering something had grown... feverish in the villain. I'd thought more than once that the Tyrant's position would collapse if he was dealt a grave enough defeat, but now I was wondering if perhaps defeat might not cause in him troubles rather more visceral. My staff rasped against the wooden floorboard as I limped in, and I found a seat awaiting me on my side side of the low table between us. Mine was less a nest of cushions and more along the lines of my favourite seat, the one I'd had creatively acquired from Arcadia. Padded, with heavy armrests. On the low table the sight of a strange game being toyed with caught my eye: three bowls filled with differing numbers of smooth pebbles had been put down, as well as a handful more on the surface of the table itself. Kairos had been moving a few around as I entered. The game did feel vaguely familiar to my eye, though it clearly wasn't mancala. Not enough seeds or pits for them to be sown in.

"Tired of shatranj?" I asked.

"I grew curious, after reading the treatise," Kairos mused. "It is a game meant for three, in truth, but trying my hand at the play was interesting regardless. He's a barren little thing, your Adjutant, but I'll not deny he is brilliant in his own way."

Ah, was that were that was from? I'd seen Hakram fiddling with the game once or twice, for it was of his own making, and Robber had once told me the orc had been doing so since before he first came to the War College. I mostly remembered being vaguely irritated that the pot of stones everybody could steal from was called 'Callow', accurate as it was to the game's implicit metaphor.

"Tower-raising, isn't it?" I frowned. "I didn't know he'd finished the treatise, much less made it public."

"It has become rather popular at your royal court, I am told," the Tyrant said. "And has even come somewhat in fashion as a curiosity in Ater."

I eased myself into my seat unceremoniously. Amusing as Kairos' petty schemes could be on occasion, passing amusements hardly made up for the nuisance he was in so many ways. I wouldn't pick a fight with him without a good reason, of course: so far he'd not aimed his plots at Callow itself, only at my soldiers in Iserre. Yet neither would I forget he'd made bargains with the Dead King and the Bard, in full knowledge of what they might lead to for this continent.

"What do you want, Tyrant?" I asked. "I haven't got all night."

"That's hardly a way to talk to a shopkeeper," the ruling king of Helike solemnly told me. "I'd be well within my rights to raise my prices for such disrespect."

I broke the wax over the bottle in my hand and took a sniff at the contents. It did smell like genuine Vale summer wine, to my surprise. A swallow confirmed as much.

"You just called my right hand a barren little thing," I said. "And likely meant it, given the curse of truth laid on your tongue. I have limited patience for your games, and other business to see to tonight. Speak or I'll leave and wash my hands of this."

"You're free to go, if that is what you truly wish," the Tyrant shrugged, red eye pulsing.

It might be safer to do so, I thought. With no one to speak to and a continent of close doors facing him, there were not many ways for the Tyrant of Helike to slither his way back into a story that'd keep him from sinking into a swamp of his own making. Speaking with the people of most influence in Salia might do the trick, though, or at least allow him opportunity through talking to cajole the winds of fate back to his sail. From that perspective, the best decision here was to rise and leave without another word. On the other hand, that also left Kairos Theodosian with precious little to lose. Vivienne had warned me he was unlikely to have emptied his quiver quite yet, and it could be argued that villains were often at their most dangerous just before they were defeated. And he'd let slip some of what he was up to, I suspected. Not carelessly but instead carefully, like a fisherman baiting a hook. And to get his foot back in the game the Tyrant would not hesitate to toss me some secrets of worth coming at the expense of his many enemies. Some of which were also mine, as it happened.

I sighed and caught sight of a gargoyle carrying a tray with cups – only one which was empty – and gesture for it to approach. It did and I snatched the empty silver cup before holding it out, reaching into the Night to fashion a tendril of darkness that poured from the bottle into it. More discretely, as my theatrical gesture distracted those in the room, a very thin tendril of darkness crept into the filled cup and stole a single drop before withdrawing. It didn't look like water, instead like some sort of herbal potion, and though tasting it myself would tell me little I had people in my service who knew much of herbalism and alchemy.

"I'll buy the wine and the leaf," I said. "So long as it's not poisoned, and the price isn't ridiculous."

"I never found out how much any of it cost," Kairos admitted. "A hundred royals?"

That was Helike gold coinage, if I remembered correctly. There were several currencies floating around the Free Cities, and Helike's was not considered to be one of the more reliable.

"I'll offer you a whatever's in my tunic pockets right and now," I offered instead. "As well as one sentence that is more or less a compliment."

He leaned forward.

"Intriguing," the Tyrant enthused. "You have a bargain, Catherine Foundling."

I surrendered the treasures hidden away in my tunic: a handful of half-chewed oats I'd forced Zombie to spit out after catching her indulging, a few pinewood matches and a soiled tablecloth from the palace I'd used to wipe my mail clean earlier.

"Your tunic's colour matches the cushions, which makes you look significantly less scrawny from a distance," I added.

"It does, doesn't it?" Kairos replied, sounding deeply pleased. "That is what I was going for."

He gestured for one of the gargoyles to waddle forward and handed it my end of the bargain.

"Feed the oats to Hakram," he instructed.

My brow rose questioningly as the gargoyle whined in protest then scampered away after gathering everything up.

"Hakram is the name of my trusty war steed," the Tyrant revealed. "It was a most wonderful gift, Catherine, my thanks. I've taught her to bully the gargoyles and it has been most diverting."

Oh Gods, he was talking about the goat wasn't he? I'd not expected him to actually keep her.

"It was," I hesitated, then valiantly rallied, "my pleasure?"

He picked up the cup I'd stolen a drop from and sipped from it after dismissing the gargoyle, then leaned back more comfortably into his cushions.

"Would you like to talk about the Dead King?" Kairos Theodosian casually asked.

"Sure," I replied. "Heard he's up in Keter. Good manners, maybe a little heavy on the devouring of all living things. Keeps a good table, though."

"So I've heard," the Tyrant amiably said. "He also intends to send an envoy to the formal talks tomorrow, I'm told."

My fingers clenched, and I forced them to loosen before taking a sip of wine.

"He intimated as much in Liesse-Before-Twilight," I said. "Dare I ask where you heard it from?"

"The Dead King," Kairos smiled. "And his envoy, which he intends to send to the formal talks tomorrow."

"You're hosting the Hidden Horror's diplomats," I flatly said.

"Diplomat, singular," the Tyrant corrected. "Tough you are in essence correct. I was prevailed upon to bring the envoy to Salia and introduce them."

"You must realize that's twice now you've provided aid to Keter," I grimly said. "Your bridges are not so much burned as turned to smoke."

"I imagine our friend in Keter would have found a way regardless," the Tyrant mused, sipping at his cup. "This is hardly a deep collaboration."

"You've repeatedly made pacts with the Dead King, and now serve as facilitator for his diplomacy," I said. "Kairos, that has consequences. It's one thing to play princes against each other or to make a red ruin of the League for your schemes. Villainous, true, but it stays within certain boundaries. What's happening up north, though, is a higher order of war. The consequences of defeat there are... severe is too light a word, really."

"You seem certain there will be a war," Kairos said, sounding amused. "As if it were inevitable, written in the stars."

"At this late hour, it effectively is," I bluntly said. "There is no offer he can make that will change things. The Grand Alliance will gather and sweep him back into the Crown of the Dead."

"Or he'll leave when faced with such an unprecedented coalition," the Tyrant said. "For he is not an utter fool."

"Then we reclaim the Kingdom of the Dead without loss of life and begin to siege the Serenity," I shrugged. "It is not too disadvantageous an outcome."

"You misunderstand me," he said. "His armies retreat, and as they do several millennia of the worst rituals Calernia has ever seen are unleashed on the lot of you. And then your shaky alliance, stripped of its common foe, must face the brewing horrors you ignored as your eyes remained fixed on the north."

"So we should take his peace, should we?" I scathingly said. "Pass the torch to those yet to come and hope they take care of it for us? That's how we got into this mess in the first place. It'll be ugly work, closing the door on him, I'll not deny that. And costly in ways I suspect will resound for generations. But someone will have to pay that price, sooner or later, and it's cowardice of the worst sort to pass the duty down the line out of petty fear."

"And it is mere pleasant coincidence," Kairos mused, "that a great shared cataclysmic war would lay deep foundations for your Accords. Your own Arch-heretic of the North – the King of Death, the peerless Named that suffers the yoke of no laws even in death – crucified over a sea of corpses so that the story of your rules enforced becomes as whisper passed from mother to child across the lands."

The accusation rang true because he wasn't entirely wrong. The Liesse Accords being signed and then promptly yielding the end of the Kingdom of the Dead would be the strongest possible mortar to build with. Undeniable proof that even the greatest of monsters could not stand alone against the rest of us when heroes and villains kept to terms. The thought had lurked in the back of my mind for some time now, it was true. On the other hand, unlike what he was implying I was not eager for the horrors that war would bring. Marching on the Crown of the Dead and the creature that ruled it was not something to be lightly considered no matter what advantages it might bring.

"Mock as you will, you offer no other path," I said. "You never do, Kairos. And still I am a little disappointed, because I figured that no matter how deep in the old madness you went you'd at least grasp the consequences of Keter claiming victory in this."

"You speak as if the Dead King could truly win," he said, cocking his head to the side. "As if this confluence was not a carefully arranged affair, a trap laid by subtle hands."

"I'd be much more willing to listen to hard talk about the Intercessor from you if you'd not make a damned bargain with her yourself," I harshly said. "Your actions have not matched the distaste you profess."

"Of those that collaborated with the Bard on that night I am not the one that wounded your side deepest," Kairos mildly said, "though you know it not."

"You lie, Tyrant," I sighed. "Even speaking only truths, you lie. And if you had something that'd cut deep when plainly said you would have spoken it plainly."

That made it two secrets he'd dangled in front of me now. He'd implied there were disasters brewing elsewhere, earlier, and there were only so many places that could be the case. Ashur was still blockaded by Nicaean fleets, last I heard, and it was possible for it to be turned into a cradle of madness through desperation. Yet I knew Malicia to have schemes afoot, and she stood the more likely culprit: the Tower's arsenal of horrors had not been unleashed in many years, but it might yet be if she felt there was nothing left to lose. So someone had worked with the Bard on the night that saw Twilight's birth, then, and I'd been wounded by it. Probably Saint, I decided. It'd explain why the Tyrant had not outright given a name: she was dead by my hand, that account already settled. All he had left was suspicion to sow while speaking exact truths.

"We are pieces in an intricate game, Catherine," the Tyrant smiled. "One whose board was lain far before either of our births. Did you believe it coincidence, that the Principate would be so weak and isolated? Decades of civil war to bleed it dry, foes on all sides and then even a disastrous campaign to the east before the Dead King had first stirred. There have been but a few times in the history of Procer it has been so weak, and I'd wager none when the greatest heroes of the time were either far past their prime or far short of it."

"She's not a god, Kairos," I said. "And neither is he, despite all his boasting. Even a continent like Calernia has so many moving parts it's impossible to manipulate it so precisely. They may have seen it coming, helped it along even, but this is not an elegant game of flawless immortals: this is two old monsters riding a tiger and hoping the other one is bucked first. You know they're not unbeatable. Hells, you handed the Bard a defeat yourself."

"So I did," the Tyrant conceded. "Neither is invincible, Catherine, I agree. They are cleverer than that. Yet we approach the crescendo of their hatreds, the unmaking of the knot. And I suspect neither's lasting victory would be a pleasant ending."

"Help me, then," I said. "Help the Grand Alliance. You've been gathering everyone's secrets, Kairos. The Intercessor's, the Dead King's and everyone else's. You could be the finger on the scales."

"I find it most amusing that your good intentions will haunt this world for centuries to come, if you truly win," the Tyrant grinned. "Ah, the necessary villain. The hard woman making the hard decisions when trouble has come calling and all others are flinching from what simply must be done. I wonder how many atrocities will be poured out of that mould in years to come simply because you scratched that groove deep enough onto the fabric of Creation."

I'd gotten about as much out of him as I would, I decided. All he was doing now was spreading the poison of suspicion, and I had no reason to indulge him I continuing to lend an ear.

"Even as we speak," Kairos idly said, "thousands are dying in agony to the far south."

"End the blockade of Ashur and the starvation will end with it," I flatly replied.

"It already has ended," the Tyrant of Helike smiled, red eye burning like a red star. "Tomorrow, Catherine, the Tower reminds the world it is yet to be feared. Magon Hadast will withdraw the Thalassocracy from the Grand Alliance."

I frowned.

"She doesn't have the ships to scatter Nicae," I said. "Or the calibre of mages to not need the ships."

"No," the Tyrant agreed, "what she does have is many men who must drink water from barrels."

Poison? That seemed unlikely, even if it was one that took an absurdly long time to kill. It was possible to craft poisons that had no taste and would not visibly mar water but making one that also took months to kill – the only way slipping that much poison onto so many ships unnoticed was even remotely feasible – would be massively difficult and expensive. It'd also require the skills of the Empire's finest alchemists employed in concert, as well as exotic ingredients by the barge. Scribe would have noticed such movements, even if the Jacks were fooled. Kairos reached a shaking hand into his tunic and produced a small glass vial filled with a light gray powder, tossing it to me. I caught it, holding it up to the light. That was an alchemical powder, I'd bet rubies to piglets, but not one I recognized.

"Poison?" I asked.

"In a sense," Kairos said. "If inclined to poetry, I might call it the stillness of death."

Oh. Oh. Oh shit. Stillness, water? This was the same horror Akua had used to turn into wights the entire population of Liesse. One of the Warlock's old doomsday tricks, named Still Water. Mere alchemy, almost impossible to detect as it accumulated in bodies. Until it was triggered by sorcery and slew all it'd contaminated before raising them as undead. If the water barrels on the Nicaean fleet had been tainted, there was no telling how much of it Malicia had instantly turned to her service with a mere snap of the fingers. She can't have done that before they even struck at Ashur, I thought. No one's that far-sighted, not even the Empress. Yet if the barrels had been tainted in the months since, that meant...

"That can't have passed by you," I said.

"It did not," Kairos agreed.

"And you didn't stop it?" I frowned.

"Why," the Tyrant of Helike grinned, "that would rather defeat the purpose of helping her, wouldn't it?"

My mind raced. While I was less than surprised Kairos would betray even the League he was currently leading to war, I saw little advantage for him in this. If Ashur was willing to fold and leave the Grand Alliance at Malicia's behest, it might have done the same at the League's. This did hurt Nicae, which was arguably still his strongest rival for power within the League, but there would have been less costly ways to achieve that. And in truth a great defeat might shake his own position even if it'd not been dealt to him, as the Hierarch's violent indifference towards such matters meant Tyrant was effectively setting the policy of the League of Free Cities at the moment. This... didn't fit, I thought. The Tyrant of Helike might have been a true partisan of Below, but however deeply it was buried there was always a method to his madness. The ripples from this would be a blow to the Grand Alliance but not a crippling one, and a victory for Dread Empress Malicia but hardly a substantial one. And it'd weaken the League going into this peace conference. Kairos might have used all this as a mere vessel to get his hands on the White Knight, but it was unlike him to so utterly spoil one game in favour of another.

"What do you want, Kairos?" I asked, honestly lost.

The odd-eyed boy leaned forward, trembling hand touching the bowls filled with stones he'd not touched this entire conversation.

"I'd like us to play a game, of course," Kairos Theodosian smiled. "Why else set out the stones?"

Javvies

...

Yeah ... Kairos needs to end up dead asap.

Admittedly, so does Malicia.
And Bard.

Malicia's being stupid again, if what Cat has surmised from Kairos's statements is accurate. Unleashing Still Water on Ashur (or anyone else) doesn't help her. It just means that people are going to be more willing to take the casualties to put her down for good, even after the inevitable losses against the Dead King, and they're going to be far less willing to let her leave alive.

Oshi

If I recall correctly the ritual doesn't have to be triggered. So long as no one is killed it should pass by them. It's more like holding them hostage. Am I wrong?

WuseMajor

Assuming you can trust that what the Tyrant is saying is, in fact, trustworthy to any degree.

That said, Cat, you know how to handle him. Force him to be the straight man.

blitzbasic

He can't lie, remember? The pilgrim cursed him. He might try to misdirect and confuse, but the direct meaning of his words has to be correct.

Shveiran

Yes. But he is not speaking plainly, is he?

““It already has ended,” the Tyrant of Helike smiled, red eye burning like a red star. “Tomorrow, Catherine, the Tower reminds the world it is yet to be feared. Magon Hadast will withdraw the Thalassocracy from the Grand Alliance.””

So Malicia is planning something and Kairos believes it is bound to happen tomorrow. He also believes Ashur will fold the Alliance, though the reason why it's unclear.

“No,” the Tyrant agreed, “what she does have is many men who must drink water from barrels.”

It's an obvious truth, yet any meaning from it is inferred. Malicia HAS men on ships, both hers and her enemies. Fact. Anything more is still up in the air.

““Poison?” I asked.

“In a sense,” Kairos said. “If inclined to poetry, I might call it the stillness of death.””

What is he speaking about, here? Cat assumes he is talking about what Malicia put in the barrels, yet there is no certainty. Kairos could very well be talking about the vial itself, who I ahve no doubt does contain Still Water. That doesn't mean there is more or that the barrels have been compromised.

““That can't have passed by you,” I said.

“It did not,” Kairos agreed.

“And you didn't stop it?” I frowned.

“Why,” the Tyrant of Helike grinned, “that would rather defeat the purpose of helping her, wouldn't it?””

What has not passed by him? perhaps the very fact that there is still water in the vial. True, yet misleading, because that's not what Catherine is thinking about.

The last part is an opinion asked, it by definition neither true nor false.

TL,DR: Kairos has said little and implied a lot, to which the curse does not apply. I believe the very corrections on the boards were placed there to suggest he is more hindered than he really is – he has been cursed not to lie, NOT to always be exact and clear. After all, does he look like he is talking like Masego? Not to me. Bottom line, we can speculate wildly but almost nothing he said is useful in that regard and can't be taken as fact. Also, Pilgrim's curse is useless and silly.

Halinn

Worse than useless. Now that it's known he can't tell an untruth, he can use that in all sorts of clever ways just like you analyzed

Bob

The Tyrant needs to be treated like an Aes Sedai from the Wheel of Time books: if he refuses to speak clearly, he should be simply dismissed.

NerfContessa

You mean shot.
In the head.
With the strongest attack spell you have.
Thrice at least.

So I hate aes. Sedai and their whole superiority shtick, so sue me...

Mental Mouse

> What has not passed by him?

Kairos doesn't need to lie here – he's fine with some of his own folks being "stilled". I've little doubt he could either reclaim control of, or destroy, the resulting wights.

Pilgrim's curse is a handicap, but indeed it's not a very serious one, given Kairos was long used to wielding truth and half-told truth as daggers. The thing is, Pilgrim simply didn't have the narrative weight to do better, and that was in large part due to Cat's repeated dominations.

Speaking of Pilgrim, his delay in freeing Masego is clearly what Kairos was hinting at, but even Cat and/or Masego finding that out for real wouldn't change that much! Cat's already accepted that Pilgrim is hardly more capable than Kairos of being a true ally to her. And Masego has already continued to develop his Name regardless... after all, he has Cat's repeated example to show that losing a power-base might be a setback, but an entirely survivable one.

Mirror Knight

Well I mean Cat is already unlike Cordelia working on lining up some replacements by sparing that Levant Lord and getting close Hanno.

Jago

I don't know if he was aware in advance of the consequences, but Pilgrim didn't simply "delaying in freeing Masego", he timed doing that with the Bard command, so that all the attempt to free Masego where resolved at the same time. Probably that is the reason why he did lose as much. And he will never see it as doing wrong, as doing that he weakened a Villain.

stevenneiman

If I was dealing with such a person from any degree of a position of power, I'd attempt to interpret what they were saying and then demand that they confirm or deny my interpretations.

Skaddix

Are they really seems like Malicia gets to create a triple alliance with Ashur, The Free Cities and Praes...with everyone else busy up North. This Evil Alliance gets free time to do whatever they want. It makes sense for Malicia to break up the Grand Alliance.

caoimhinh

Doubt it, since she has just killed thousands of Nicae's citizens and Ashur caused the destruction of Thalassina (and Wekesa's death) mere months ago. This move was made to weaken the Grand Alliance, but it doesn't actually give Malicia any allies. Kairos allowed her plan to succeed because he has his own and wants to make use of Malicia's actions.

Liliet

She cannot ally with the League out of this, sure, but she sure can ally with Ashur.

I imagine she has a plan in mind from there =x

Shveiran

She can bully Ashur into submission, maybe. I don't really see an angle for alliance for her to play, here. Do you?

Javvies

She's got the son (and presumably heir) of the leader of Ashur in her pocket, as well some influence with a number of the other second highest tier citizens. Plus, per Scribe and Amadeus, Assassin was sent to Ashur. So it's entirely possible that a number of the obstacles to Malicia's exertion of influence in Ashur have been ... removed from the balance of power.

Shveiran

I know she had those plans in motion, but they were initiated to ensure Ashur didn't enter the Alliance and the following Crusade.

At the time, they were sensible.

Now Praes is the public ally of the Dead King, who is attempting to gobble up the continent, and Malicia is twisting Ashur's arm with an undead blockade that OBVIOUSLY has no intention to continue as its living predecessor because OBVIOUSLY Ashur will fall in line. The situation has changed significantly, hasn't it? I really don't see how her previous plans for the Thalassocracy may still be relevant; she spent decades trying to build a bridge with them, but now that ship has been sunk by her latest action. Any leverage she has on the heir isn't going to hold water: she'll need an heavy hand, at least threatened, and that means the moment Ashur can flip that alliance it will.

SpeckofStardust

That Son last I checked was in charge of the fleet that was assaulting Thalassina and is thus very very dead.

hakureireimu

Ashur not waging war against Praes is very far from them allying with Praes. Having a few leaders in Malicia's pocket isn't enough to get the populace on-board with dying for Praes.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Malicia is dead or soon-to-be-dead. She knows this – she has become an obstacle and a threat to every major power in the west. This was inevitable after Second Liesse failed. She cannot make alliance with her enemies as the bridges there are long burned and the odds of her prevailing against them all are paper thin. If what she sought was exile further offense would be a bad move, but Malicia plays to win, not to run with tail tucked. Therefore, she must seek a way to make her death too costly for her enemies to seek or to break apart their alliance in a way that none of the members can or will pursue her demise. Still Waters, either as hostage or blow, would be a nice first step.

Malicia is rarely stupid. Her moves at Second Liesse, assassinating Callow's higher ups, the attack on Salia, all make sense from a political perspective. Crippling your enemies by busting their kneecaps while holding a knife to their throats is sound strategy. However, Malicia has blinders when it comes to the story b/c that's always been Black's role. She missed the narrative knife at Liesse and misread Black which led to this entire debacle. Everything after though – everyone wants her dead. She's done a remarkable job of hindering that outcome with the limited tools she has at hand, but its all coming crashing down now. She's lost the goblins, the Calamities, the orcs, a significant chunk of her political power base, and most of the legions. Still Waters and whatever cards she has hidden will, I predict, be her last attempts to break apart the Grand Alliance. Sink or swim.

laguz24

She makes weapons that she threatens to use like the threat is enough, but she forgets that swords will either find a use or make one.

Pokekid01

I'm pretty sure Stillwater is being used on Nicae, not Ashur. With the blockade suddenly under Praesi undead control instead of Nicean, Malicia can force terms on Ashur by offering to withdraw the blockade, and threatening to invade Ashur with ground troops.

What will probably happen instead is the Dead King intervenes, because summoning an army of undead whilst at war with the greatest necromancer to ever have lived on Calernia is a Very Bad Idea™.

caoimhinh

Yeah, I wonder if those undead from Nicae will end up as soldiers for the Dead King instead of under Malicia's control. That would give him a new front for the war all of a sudden.

Though maybe his contract with Malicia forbids him from doing so.

Zgggt

The question is: if so, then was it a part of the deal?

Liliet

That would be silly of him, given that Malicia's bullshit is his best chance at redirecting the Grand Alliance's attention away from himself.

greatwyrmgold

Malicia: "Don't be ridiculous, the Dead King is on the other side of the continent. There's no way his agents could even reach Nice!"

Amadeus: _facepalm_

Malicia: "What?"

undead sea serpent roars offscreen

stevenneiman

Mhm. Her problem is that she's gotten so used to playing with the High Lords in the 40 years of peace she bought with the Conquest and Pravus gold, and of internal stability that Black and Assassin worked hard to maintain for her, that she doesn't understand that she's playing different games altogether facing the outside world. She first revealed that when she went over her story guy's head to do something because she knew he would recognize it as a stupid decision, and it's only continued. Now she's forgetting that people who aren't High Lords hold grudges for mass murder because they actually care about things other than their own power. I think she might have sunk too deep into her Role and become convinced that she can always outwit everyone. And also forgotten that she's supposed to be doing things for reasons.

laguz24

She is doing things for reasons but they are not the right reasons. She is only fighting for herself like Ubua and we all know how that ends.

Liliet

She's not unleashing Still Water on Ashur, she's unleashing it on the sieging fleet. She's relieving their plight, and getting an alliance out of it, if one of desperation.

Shveiran

She is getting, at best, a piece of paper signed by Ashur that will be enforced by an undead fleet.

That's not an alliance, really, it is a subjugation; Malicia may try to bind Ashur's fate to her own to remove the incentive to backstab her, but she has so little time and options I'm rather convinced she won't be able to prevent having crucial points of failure to throw heroes at.

greatwyrmgold

And she lets the world know she can unleash wights on any city without a 100% secure water supply. It's no at-will Greater Breach, but it's still enough of a superweapon that I can see Malicia trying to use it as a deterrent. How well building a Death Star will help you, especially since Darth Vader is MIA and unable to kill Han and Luke, is...unclear at best seems like a nice way to put it.

NerfContessa

Agreed, Even the threat of it is, again, same old doomsday weapons.

She should have known better... But then again, she is stripped for. Choices short of surrendering. And allied with the dead. King.

Ah, that's gonna be a pain.

Cicero

Should have got up and left.

None of the secrets are worth it.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, interactions with this little monster should be reduce to the bare minimum. He can't convince you of going along with his plans if you cannot hear him.

Liliet

Never Let The Bard Talk.

That said, Catherine's a bard in her own right, and can hold her own. She might not gain much from this, but she's not losing much either. She's not Amadeus "please don't make me intrigue I'm already cross-eyed from just the thought of it".

Some Smartass

This is in keeping with my theory that Kairos is dependent on the favor of Below to escape the symptoms of his illness.

And he has an interesting point that Cat may have created a hard women making hard decisions Role. Obviously an attempt to shake her, but it makes sense.

Oshi

As Cat said its nothing she doesn't know. He's playing for time and then like any good knife fighter showing his blade only when he needs to. Notice how much more circumspect he is in speech? The curse hit deeper then expected.

Agent J

I call bullshit. "Hard Woman, Hard Decisions" is literally tattooed on Saint's back. Might be there's a Catherine-shaped groove in Creation now, but what of it? What's the alternative? Stay in the tavern and never make waves for fear of the ripples?

NerfGlaistigUaine

It's watching out for what types of ripples you make. You can't just dodge responsibility b/c it's unfair, villains deal in realities my friend. A Catherine-shaped groove could be quite catastrophic. She's hoping that the Liesse Accords outweigh that, or that one iteration won't have enough weight to carve such a mold, or she's got countermeasures for that. But one can't deny that this sort of hard decision-making may create or reinforce a dangerous pattern.

hakureireimu

Why would a Catherine-shaped groove could be catastrophic?

TeK

Because it already was. And there is only so much greater goods to make hard decisions for.

hakureireimu

If there are no greater good to make hard decisions for then she wouldn't have emerged at all. And I wouldn't say Cat has been a disaster; compared to what?

Barthumphries

What if her name becomes a Name to the next generation?

hakureireimu

She's mostly a hero wearing the mantle of a Villain, and emerged only after Heroes utterly failed for 2 decades.

If more people followed her footsteps that's only a good thing.

caoimhinh

Catherine has left a crevasse in the workings of Fate, sure, but that doesn't necessarily have to be as Kairos described. After all, we have already seen another young Callowan woman with an orc right-hand assistant achieving fast military success in the defense of her motherland: General Abigail of Summerholm.

And she is someone who takes unorthodox choices, but not necessarily the hard measures that Kairos implied.

Liliet

The thing is, Calernia has suffered pretty damn badly from the lack of this Role so far.

Imagine if Good nations were willing to recognize the possibility of a villain working for the greater good.

Imagine if William saw in Catherine a potential anti-heroic ally back in their first meeting.

Imagine if Tariq understood what Catherine is not as "a curse brought onto Good by their own failings" but "someone whose decisions are as bad as the situation but no worse".

Imagine if Good nations had been willing to collaborate with the saner Dread Emperors on grain trade with Praes, Evil or not.

Oh, it will birth atrocities, I don't doubt it. They'll be smaller ones than the catastrophes they'll be averting, though.

Shveiran

Yes. This. Thank you.

ThatOneGuy

Actually they shall make worse ones for remember this is not our world, but one of a grand game between above and below. the role of the game is to see which side wins and if the pieces do not hold up the banners... Then they shall be discarded and destroyed so that a new more refined game could be made.

We already know this world is not the first made for the game and this world shall not be the last.

Walter

I feel like you are making Black's mistake here, treating Evil/Good as just jersey's that teams wear so you can tell who is winning.

The story makes it pretty clear that they aren't. They herald value differences.

If Good nations believed villains worked for a greater good they'd be deluding themselves. We've seen like twenty in the story and none of them do anything like that.

If William told himself that Cat was a potential ally he would be lying to himself. She deliberately caused a Callowan revolution that was doomed to failure so that she could rise in the Praesi ranks by crushing it. He was never a potential ally to her, just a stepping stone. She used him up.

If Tariq understood Catherine as anything other than a maniac he'd have erred radically. She is inspired to frothing rage at the thought of the Liesse massacre, but turned around and petitioned the Dead King to attack Procer, an event which would have killed many times Liesse's body count. She hates slavers but enslaves her enemies. She hates nobles but made herself a Queen. She carries a flag explaining that having reasons for doing things is for idiots. There is nothing there to depend on, nothing to bargain with.

If Good nations had been willing to collaborate with Dread Emperors they'd have been betrayed, as they no doubt were. Like, these are the clowns who brag about what great traitors they are. They have waged wars of aggression with Callow like a dozen times.

I'm not trying to scoff at the possibility of a 'hard man/hard choices' kind of role, like dude was saying upthread, Saint's ya gal, but Good and Evil in this setting aren't just flavor text, they describe entirely different cultures. That role would be a hero's. Villains don't care about anyone but themselves, so no choice is 'hard' for them. Tyrant didn't make a 'hard choice' when he let Malicia slaughter the leagues fleet with Still Water, it was a piece of cake. He thought it was hilarious. Cat didn't make a 'hard choice' when she stole the Drow city's water, there were precisely zero paragraphs of hand wringing or moral qualms.

Like, I'm not trying to say that the Good nations are modern progressive democracy fully luxury gay space communism or whatever. They aren't 'good' by our standards, but they are recognizably within the broader scope of 'human communities/polities'. You can kind of grok their deals if you squint. You can tell yourself that over generations they will figure their stuff out and be less evil, cue White Knight's musings about slavery.

The Evil ones...just aren't. The Drow society is psychotic insanity. The Stygians are slavers. The Praesi are murderers and proud of it. The Goblins are wicked beyond anything humans can aspire to.

If you pick a random Proceran out of the herd they probably work in a tavern or whatever. If you do the same for the Goblins they are a knife murderer who dabbles in arson.

Calernia doesn't need a balance between good and evil, it needs good to win. A 'Catherine Shaped' role would be terrible for Calernia, more lakomancy and burning cities, souls bound to cloaks and people crucified by roadsides.

Shveiran

→ Calernia doesn't need a balance between good and evil, it needs good to win. A 'Catherine Shaped' role would be terrible for Calernia, more lakomancy and burning cities, souls bound to cloaks and people crucified by roadsides.

Yes.

Let's have none of that and stick with Heroes.

It's not like they do their best to murder their enemies as well, is it? After all, joining an invading army and murdering people to the best of your Named ability is inherently better than dropping a lake on an army, isn't it? It's different, not just a difference in capacity.

Heroes also don't deal in horrid demons and devils, they only call on choirs to brainwash people against their will; that is totally cool.

Heroes are kind souls that craft plagues to eradicate their enemies at the cost of their allies' citizens because it makes strategic sense, in a "lesser evil" kind of way, which is still leagues better than crucifying mages that do human sacrifice.

Yes. Villains are bad and Heroes are good, because that's what this story has always been about. You know what Calernia should do? Keep warring between Good and Evil. After all, it's not like that conflict has caused most of the destruction on the continent since living memory. And hey, just because no side has been able to win in a few thousands years, well, there is no reason to believe it will solve soon, right?

And after all, if it does end, SURELY Good will win, right? There is no way Good will actually lose and Calernia will be stuck with only Evil because compromise was refused as a possible outcome. It will work out fine.

After all, compromise is bad.

You should hate all that have wronged you, and inherit your ancestors' grudges as well. After all, they wouldn't have started beefing with people without a good reason, right? We should keep them going indefinitely.

We are all so much better off teaching our kids to swing swords than trying to build a future where they have a chance to not go to war.

Soronel Haetir

Kairos Theodosian, a strange game, the only way to win is not to play.

Big Brother

"What do you want, Kairos?" I asked, honestly lost.

The odd-eyed boy leaned forward, trembling hand touching the bowls filled with stones he'd not touched this entire conversation.

"I'd like us to vote, of course," Kairos Theodosian smiled.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Big Brother

Wanted to try my hand at this for once 🤪

BarthHumphries

Where's your typo thread?

Tough you are in essence correct
Change tough to though

Seriously, vote and typo thread.

Big Brother

I didn't want the typo thread on my comment.

1. That's notes clogging my phone
2. I don't like people pointing out my typos, so I'm not gonna do that to someone else. Seems hypocritical.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

You forgot a period at the end of your first point. 🤪

Andrew Mitchell

I'm right with you, Brother.

Willow

Vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Tohron

Alright, most important question: Did Kairos steal the idea for the goat's name from the comments section?

copaceticcockroach

Most important question: When is Kairos going to ride Hakram into battle?

copaceticcockroach

The Dead King had us cornered. To simply put it the bastard had too many Revenants. Couldn't Ranger wipe more of them out while she was here?

Pushing hard on my staff, I stood back up.

"Hakram," I said, "I'm out of insults, have anymore of them in your pocket?"

"If I did, they're burnt as Summerholm's streets," Hakram replied.

I glanced over my shoulder, Hakram had took a hit from a dead mage and whatever that mage did, it burnt through Hakram's plate like paper.

"Why Summerholm exactly? It has nothing to do with getting burnt." I said.

"Just having flashbacks when you burnt it down with goblinfire. You know watch your life flash in front of you before you die kind of flashback."

I had walked into that, didn't I?

"Weeping Heavens, keep this up and I'll side with the Dead King over there, because I'm sure he doesn't get any backlash from his lackeys." I retorted.

"Is this how you'll go out Priestess of the Night, barely able to stand and throwing jests at the bringer of your death?" the Dead King said.

"Today, no one is going out, unless they're going out with me."

Everyone wheeled around to see the new voice. I didn't have to, I knew the person from his childish voice, Tyrant. But, like everyone, I couldn't believe he actually came, I needed to see if it was actually real. Not like seeing Tyrant would improve the credibility of him being real. It wouldn't be above him to just send a glamour.

"Cower you abomination, cower before the hero and his trusty steed," he said, "I have come to liberate this land and stop the evil that resides in it."

The level of smugness in his voice was just painful. I clenched and unclenched my fist. This was going to end badly, couldn't a villain trying to do good have an easy day?

"Onward Hakram! We have a king to take down!" Tyrant shouted.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. I was certain that if I didn't flip Hashallim off I wouldn't have to see an ass riding an ass charge one of the strongest beings in Calernia.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I read this many hours ago but came back to say that I also like your username in addition to appreciating your comment.

edrey

that game is amazing but it's mean for three, so where is assassin? just make all go to hell, killing their leadership would do the trick
Cat should talk with that diplomat, telling him something like: the DK should go to the south, nice weather, the sea and without the noisy neighbors

Sparsebeard

Well, well, well. It seems the DK is in fact sending an envoy to the accords talks.

And like often, the chapter addresses many of the arguments made in the last chapters comments lol.

Personally, I'm much more inclined to let the DK sign, but extract a huge price for the concession... but damn what Cat said about Villains being more dangerous just before defeat does seem to apply to Malicia more than to Kairos right now.

For the good points, at least Cat's stash of wakeleaf is replenish so she'll be able to blow it in people's face for dramatic purposes in the nearby future. Because let's be honest the wine and the wakeleaf are probably the main reason she decided to go in... despite any justification to the contrary lol.

BarthHumphries

Tyrant is the envoy.

Shveiran

That is my guess too. Might even be why he is so sickly.

Thea

I figured it might be the host character Cat got friendly with in Keter... Aka Malicia in disguise.

Though, on second thought, that might not fly, with the White Knight present.

Liliet

> Personally, I'm much more inclined to let the DK sign, but extract a huge price for the concession...

Don't forget that Catherine still needs to make this look appealing to the Good nations. Pragmatism only brings you so far in the court of public opinion =x

Agent J

If Keter is not taken there will need to be a new plan to resettle the Drow. Which will be a whole other basket of vicious, ritualistically murderous worms.

Fayhem

This. There's pretty much exactly one place on the continent where you can feasibly settle the drow without either subjugating or exterminating the native population (both of which are Not An Option), and that place is Keter/Sephirah. The Dead King isn't going to hand over the literal center of his power (because that's less a concession than an unconditional surrender), which means as far as Catherine/the drow are concerned peace with Keter is a nonstarter on that basis alone. And there are many, many other bases for why that's the case.

Tohron

Well, it might be theoretically possible to resettle the drow in the area around Keter, though that would still require renegotiating the agreements with the dwarves somehow.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I need the full rule list for tower-raising. Seems like a fun new game to ruin friendships. Like Diplomacy 2.0

Shikkarasu

The following is a fan interpretation (mine) of the description in Interlude: Giuoco Pianissimo.

Three players take turns selecting covered bowls. One contains 6 stones, one contains 8, and one contains 10. Players should not be aware of how many stones are in the other players' bowls.

A fourth bowl is set in the middle of the play area containing 12 stones. It is called 'Callow'

Players take turns (clockwise, starting at an arbitrary point) declaring one of the following actions:

- Steal a stone. The player may target another player or Callow. At least one other player must agree to this theft, otherwise no stones change hands. If the last stone is taken from a player they have lost. To ensure honesty a player may be required to show two stones and hand over one of them when Stolen from.
- Offer a stone. The player may Offer a stone to another player with terms, such as the other player agreeing not to Steal from the giver for a set number of turns, or to not to permit the third player to Steal from Callow. Any Offer may be made, and one counteroffer proposed by the potential recipient. If a player attempts to break the Terms of a deal they forfeit their turn if/when caught. If the counteroffer is declined, or the initial offer outright refused, no stones change piles. (This is to ensure that the game does not devolve into an hour-long haggling session.)
- Destroy a Stone. The player may remove one of their Stones from the game. No other player need approve.
- Pass. The Player may decline to act on their turn.

When a player has twenty stones, they have 'raised their Tower' and are the winner.

All of this is probably unnecessary, as the full rules may well be explained on Friday and contradict what I have, but I couldn't resist.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I appreciate it. Or at least I will once I read through it all. Always cool to see fellow fans so invested too and it'd be hypocritical if I criticized long asides

konstantinvoncarstein

You forgot that if no one win after a certain number of turn, Callow attacks and everyone loose.

Shikkarasu

It's not clear that this was kept in the final version, since Aisha once played a long game until everyone was too drunk to remember how many stones the others had. I get the feeling that the rule about everyone losing on turn 30 was played with and then discarded. This was also before the 4th version of the game where the totals were secret and one person has only 6 stones.

That said, this is just my best guess on the final version of the rules. As always I look forward to being proven wrong.

Mental Mouse

I just reread the chapter, and the last game Hakram played before meeting Cat was in fact an everybody-lost game. So the time limit is clearly still there. (And it's clearly needed to force the players to actually make progress instead of just stalemating indefinitely.)

Sparsebeard

I haven't re-read the chapter, but logically even without a time limit, once enough stones are destroyed nobody can win either...

Mental Mouse

True, but with no impetus to make alliance, getting there would still be slow and annoying. Basically, there has to be a reason to try and win, instead of everybody staying "safe" forever.

superkeaton

I figured Akua's Kool-aid would come back up at some point or another. Nice to see I was right, just wasn't sure when. I'm also surprised that Cat forgot Hakram's game, even if it was ages ago. Funny that people play a civilized game made by an orc and a goblin.

WuseMajor

Which chapter was that game introduced in?

Javvies

One of the Hakram POVs.
So either an Interlude or a monthly extra.
Might've been when he cut his hand off to persuade Viv.

caoimhinh

This one:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/03/interlude-giuoco-pianissimo/>

The chapter starts by explaining the game.

Barthumphries

As I remember it, it was mostly explained but I think the comments said that when it had been attempted there were still questions. I didn't really look into it. Can it be played?

Liliet

Catherine has never played Hakram's game onscreen, it was brought up in one of the chapters while she was in Everdark.

Also, Ratface is the one who made the most important contribution to the rules. Robber was one of the people he called 'too honest', offending him gravely.

Zoe

Worth noting that at no point did Kairos come right out and SAY that the water was tainted or that Malicious was going to use the Still Water protocol. He can't lie, but he can sure as hell make vague insinuations and let other people jump to conclusions about what he means...

konstantinvoncarstein

Gods Below and ever burning, you are right! At least he could not lie on the fact that the Ashuran exited the Grand Alliance.

caoimhinh

When Kairos first hinted about Still Water, I thought Malicia had poisoned the Praesi refugees near Callow or High Lady Abreha's troops, thus giving more troops for the Dead King, but on a completely different front.

That would certainly be a huge and unexpected blow, even forcing Catherine to move her troops East instead of North. Certainly didn't expect it to be targetted to Nicae. Considering Ashur's fleet caused the destruction of Thalassina, I didn't think Malicia would do them favors simply to make them withdraw from the Grand Alliance.

Javvies

Eh, I'm pretty sure that the son (and presumed heir) of the highest tier citizen of Ashur is in Malicia's pocket, and she's got influence with others of the second highest tier. And Assassin was in Ashur per Scribe and Amadeus, so it's within the realm of possibility that some of those she doesn't have influence/control over are dead now, and no longer an obstacle.

BarthHumphries

Tyrant has the powder. And it's tasteless in drink. And he literally just gave wine to Cat. Who is now human. And can be hurt by such things.

Liliet

I will note that a great amount of it needs to be consumed before it can work.

If Cat's smart, she will not buy more than one bottle =x

Morgenstern

... she just bought all of it. The leaf and the wine. Remains to be seen if she'll actually take home and much less use any of it, of course. 😊

Agent J

Of course she will. It's Cat, she fully intends on indulging her minor vices. Besides, it'd be monumentally stupid of Kairos to pull something like that. Attempting to assassinate a foreign ruler is, to say nothing else, a break in truce and all the excuse Catherine needs to murder him in cold blood.

And that's all it would be. An attempt. Because, between her cadre of Legion mages and Callowan priests, Hierophant, Akua M.F. Sahelian, and the literal gods on her shoulders, there's no way such a plain faced attack would ever work.

BarthHumphries

> Besides, it'd be monumentally stupid of Kairos to pull something like that. Attempting to assassinate a foreign ruler is, to say nothing else, a break in truce

1) He's the Dead King's envoy. You can't just murder a foreign diplomat like that because they have diplomatic immunity. Hierarch might not like it.

2) I would be completely shocked if Tyrant were to betray anyone. Shocked I say! Shocked! 😊

Agent J

1) Not confirmed and irrelevant besides. No one Cat wants to work with would weep for a dead Kairos or a slain envoy of the Dead King. And by this point Cat's established enough with the Good Nations that it would do nothing to hinder her relations with them.

2) Betray and survive to betray again. Even after everything that happened at the Princes' Graveyard, Kairos tried to slip off quietly under glamour. This proposed scheme would be laughably ineffectual and give easy pretext to murdering him.

It's stupid, but not Kairos Stupid.

konstantinvoncarstein

1) If said foreign diplomat just murder a foreign ruler during said truce, no one will bat an eye if he is executed.

Mental Mouse

Aside from Liliet's point, I'm quite sure that Sve Noc could defend her against wightdom.

Mental Mouse

That said, I'd be worried about what he might have done to the wakeleaf!

ruduen

Oddly enough, I'm not sure if Still Water is liable to work again in Malicia's hands. It's the nature of that type of trump card/superweapon – it works once for a villain upon the initial reveal, but when it's being held over someone's head afterwards, it's just asking for a heroic counter. Since it was already used in the past and caused major harm, I can't see it going unchecked here.

At the moment, I'm more worried about the other cards that Malicia has in play (Book 3, Chapter 49). She mentioned four, and two of them are gone with Warlock. However, she's had a lot of time without Amadeus's restraint or story-based insight, meaning I wouldn't be sure that the other two possibilities haven't had additional research by now.

Liliet

1) It was not Malicia who used it first, and it worked very much against her and she did not expect that use.

2) She's not holding it over anyone's head, she's using it to break the Nicean siege – or rather gain control over it to force Ashur into her terms.

crescentsickle

Called it. The real issue everyone has had with Cat is that her existence will echo and ripple for years to come because she has engraved herself on the narrative engine that runs the world via her actions and their consequences.

From the chapter:

"I find it most amusing that your good intentions will haunt this world for centuries to come, if you truly win," the Tyrant grinned. "Ah, the necessary villain. The hard woman making the hard decisions when trouble has come calling and all others are flinching from what simply must be done. I wonder how many atrocities will be poured out of that mould in years to come simply because you scratched that groove deep enough onto the fabric of Creation."

Liliet

Still saying this groove's existence is an improvement.

Shveiran

Adding that if that's what people got worried about, they are full of BS. The only reason why Akua, Malicia and Black, Cordelia, and Adjutant and Hierophant are not making as deep a groove is because Cat is being more successful and bombastic than them; and she has not always been, while this pattern is an old one.

And that is assuming that previous incarnations of most of the heroic bigwigs are close to their current ones, which is possible yet not certain.

Mental Mouse

"I wonder how many atrocities will be poured out of that mould in years to come simply because you scratched that groove"

As opposed to' say, the role of the Gray Pilgrim? Any role can "go to the bad".

lennymaster

That comment gave me goosebumps all over.

Sugar Roll

So it looks like Kairos knows what the Pilgrim did on the Bard's behest regarding Masego. Kairos can easily break up this forming coalition against the Dead King if he's inclined to do so.

Liliet

Doubt it. Cat's smarter than that.

Shveiran

What Liliet says.

Only a moron would take at level face what Kairos says in a crucial moment, because he is amalicious fucker that is onviously trying to twist the truth to pull one on you. What you do is put it in a box, carry on until a later date, and then TALK about it with the fellow involved, becaus eanything else is playing into his hands.

Seriously, if she does anything less I'll be so very disappointed.

Sugar Roll

He doesn't even need to reveal it to Cat he can use it as leverage on the Pilgrim. He's making a play on the White Knight and him having more leverage makes it more likely that he'll cause more damage.

Shveiran

And if the Pilgrim falls for that rather than go have a talk with Cat, I'll go back to my Book IV Tariq hate club. He has to know better than that by now. He has to.

TheAtomicOption

This sounds like what Malicia was really offering the Dead King. Not just being allowed out, but a new army raised at his opponent's back.

It's really unfortunate that Cat hasn't been able to guess that the pilgrim, at the behest of the intecessor was the reason Masego lost his magic, but given it's a pretty big leap we can't be surprised. Pretty sure Kairos' plans still aren't revealed enough that we can really predict what's being plotted next.

wdc543

Heroes are just the shards of a broken society that refract the most splendid light. Their edges will cut you to the bone.

Aotrs Commander

See, Cat, I told you he'd treasure your kind and thoughtful insult! He even named it suitably!

Mental Mouse

Specifically, he named it after an opponent who kept to his task even while tied up and hanging from his feet. Not to mention the guy who actually brought the goat.

erebus42

Oh Tyrant you delightfully heinous bastard never change.
Also Catherine come on. Of course he kept the goat, she's a purebred Liessen Charger after all!

SpeckofStardust

""
"Of those that collaborated with the Bard on that night I am not the one that wounded your side deepest," Kairos mildly said, "though you know it not."

""
Kairos just because the Dead King was brought out by bard and told to eat the baby doesn't mean he doesn't count as a possible answer for that.

Like that sentence if it read like say this...

"Of those that collaborated with the Bard – on that night I am not the one that wounded your side deepest," Kairos mildly said, "though you know it not."

After all Cat doesn't know that the Bard has collaborated with the Dead King before. And he did kinda do the most damage out of everyone.

Also nothing of value was gained with this talk and Cat has been convinced that she will need to take steps in order to get everyone to fight the dead king.

Unless of course a third part gets brought into the talk for the game I don't think anything useful will come of it.

After all the game is meant to be played with at least 3, and he does want to play it.

grzecho2222

"Catherine Foundling had given the slip to every story that could bind her to an ending, and so left herself only one path: reign eternal, consumed and consuming, a herald of long prices and hard measures having made mantle of the woes of Creation."

burguulkodar

I love the Tyrant.

Also, very unexpected moves happening! This story always takes some very interesting turns.

