"Clever," the Herald smiled. "It is true. Balasi and I rode the Deep River to return there ahead of even the furthest land-kings. They soldiers have answered my call."

My heart skipped a beat. That was beginning to sound rather more like what I'd hoped to get. The Fifteenth Expansion was the underground of the Kingdom of the Dead, which was filled with fortresses and soldiers. The Fourteenth was the Everdark, which was being colonized with both civilians and soldiers. Together, the regions represented a large number of soldiers. Cordelia narrowed in on another detail, though.

"This Deep River," the fair-haired princess said, "could it be used by humans?"

My eyes widened. That was a way out our mess, I considered. If our armies could use the Deep River to retreat from Keter after the fall of the Crown of the Dead, extreme rationing might be able to get us back to Procer without killing too many from starvation. We should be able to buy supplies from the Herald as well. Nowhere enough to feed an army our size for long, and I doubted he'd empty his stores for us entirely, but maybe long enough to be able to manage the trip back south without too many dead if we took Keter quickly enough. There would be enough in the Everdark for all of us, but without the Twilight Ways to get them to us there's no way they'll arrive in time. From the corner of my eye, I saw that Balasi looked amused.

"It would be death," the Herald politely replied. "The Deep River is sailed by ship, but it is not water. It is..."

A frown, a look at the deed-seeker.

"Lava," Seeker Balasi provided.

The Herald nodded, turning back to us.

"Lava. The ships are sailed empty between cities, using currents made by runes," he told us. "I could protect myself and Balasi riding one, but more would be beyond my capacity."

I sighed. Yeah, that'd been a little too good to be true. So we were back at the start, supply-wise.

"Your help in fighting Keter would be most welcome," Cordelia said, "but I must confess our armies have grown troubled. Being stranded far from home without supplies has hurt our readiness to fight."

"It would," the Herald acknowledged. "I will not apologize, for the deeds of the Kingdom Under are no longer mine to bear as burden, but I would make restitution as a sign of good will. We will surrender Lady Sybella to your hands."

I blinked.

"You captured her," I said. "Where?"

"She was a mere two days away, waiting for you to bend to her terms," the Herald replied.

My heart beat wildly and I shared a look with Cordelia, whose eyes had lit up.

"She must," I slowly said, "have been keeping the supplies close, then."

"Atop a confluence of tunnels, near the shores of the lake you call the Tomb," he nodded.

Which was far, but even if they hadn't moved them – which I doubted – it wasn't that far. We could most definitely trade for supplies with the Herald to keep our soldiers until they arrived.

"They are in your possession," Cordelia stated.

"They are," the Herald of the Deeps said. "And though I am not the Kingdom Under, I come to fulfill the terms of the bargain."

The supplies and his help against the city of Keter and attendant lands. A cession of claim that Cordelia had already convinced the Sisters to accept. It's better than if he was still part of the Kingdom Under, I thought. The Herald could make a kingdom of his own out here while the rest of his kind fought it out for the throne, which would ensure his fragile beginnings were not simply annexed by whoever ruled close. And it creates a state that has an interest in keep the Kingdom Under split so it never turns around to gobble them up, which is even better. There was no real way for humans to meddle in that mess, but the Herald and his successors would be a different story.

Some of the drow might push for taking back their homeland when the enemy was still weak, I decided, but that trouble was years down the line and not impossible to navigate besides. I glanced at Cordelia, whose face was calm. She gave me a slight nod of agreement, also thinking it the right decision. So I reached for the bowl and took it in hand, raising it.

"Then I greet you in war, Herald of the Deeps," I said.

They matched me and we all drank deep, the sudra smooth all the way down and leaving that faint taste of copper behind.

We drank, and it felt like a light being lit.

arcanavitae15

I love this plot twist, this makes up for most of the assholery from the Herald of the Depths in my mind. Also new aspect, I really love the scene were she gets it, See is basically the enhanced story vision, two aspects that start with an S.

agumentic

I wonder if we will get the return of Seek from all the way in Book 2.

Bad@games

Steal is fairly close to take, and cat has a thing for doing stuff like that

ByVectron!

But she has still gotten that for free, over the years. I think that's just an innate talent for her at this point.

Liliet

That's... where Aspects come from, though? Hakram didn't get Lead as a divine affirmation, he got it as a positive feedback loop from his ability to, yes, lead. Catherine had gotten the ability to discern stories as stars in the dark long before her Aspect coalesced (and her first one which she talked about being about to appear was Silence, not See) and it had in turn come after years upon years of story-fu struggle.

An innate talent is what Aspects are all about.

Miles

A normal ability becoming an aspect also involves a powerup. So in this case she already had the power to permanently take the Bard's connection to stories and make it her own... how do you power up from there?

Like, what's the next step even?

Liliet

Doing it more easily / faster / with less prep.

Rey d`Tutto

That'd be Yoink

Liliet

You know that's a good point

Someperson

My money is on the last aspect being Sacrifice.

Although, transitioning from Warden of the East to just plain Warden may have averted that as her aspect.

shikkarasu

We've had 3 'I will come to Collect's from Cat, now. I'm holding out hope for Collect as an Aspect.

Lictor Magnus

With the number one superpower on the continent shattered this truly going to lead into a new age.

arcanavitae15

I really love the Beast, as well as the two voices that accompany it, it's one of the better parts of names for me, making it personal.

SpeckofStardust

ah the dwarf empire collapsed because of petty greed and infighting how sad.

Oh well I the dead king gets to be the true evil for the next age as well than.

ruduen

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

That shoots down one of my theories, but it's good to see stories and the world still moving, even with the war now hitting full stride. It's going to lead to quite an interesting world afterward.

One aspect left, Warden. Make it a good one.

Gabe Meadow

Wow. I predicted the Herald of the Deep coming through, but not like this. And it's great to see Cat getting the same Story-vision the WB had now. It's definitely something the Dead King is not going to like knowing.

Dylan

I did not expect this to happen, but love how it was done.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Might as well be the unofficial tagline of the story, am I right?

Juff

Typo Thread:

Alliance taken > Alliance had taken years if > years of to e viable > to be viable meat grinders > meat grinder
I some sleep > I had some sleep truly" > truly," out of blood > out for blood Hells were > Hells we were to agreed > to agree risk of deserters > risk deserters a price > a prince green large > large

"It got the > "I got the
They soldiers > The soldiers

Xinci

Wonder if Malignant was messing with the soul or the body. Given how Cat messed up her own motor functions when she used necromancy on herself either or both is possible.

The Deep River being a lava one is interesting. Mainly in implications for ei runes manipulating pressure, the natural conditions that let it stay as lava, and potential similarity to the currents of magical power the Deoraithe used against the Drow. If the existence of creatures of fire the Dwarves use for their forges originated emergently from them it would have interesting implications for life on Creation as well.

Given time to grow I wonder if there will be a eventual dark Crusade on the Everdark by Night users. Goblins, Drow, and some Human users will likely hold a grudge and maybe even the Heralds people eventually may want to expand back with allies.

Someperson

I was under the impression that the Herald still basically holds on to the Everdark and the territory beneath Keter now that the Kingdom Under has dissolved into civil war?

Although, the Herald might be more amenable to allowing other races to settle in those territories than the Kingdom Under was. Assuming he can hold on to those territories in the coming years, which he might not if his focus is on Keter.

Also I am curious what the Crows would end up thinking about such a crusade. I am pretty sure something like that getting off the ground would be contingent upon Sve Noc getting behind it, one way or the other.

shimizubad

Nothing like a bit of regicide to bring people together

Ezario Gerion

Or apart, heh, heh.

KageLupus

Not just regicide. It sounds like the Herald walked into the throne room while it was filled with nobles and set off a dirty bomb. The Dwarven civil war kicked off with a bang, not a whimper.

Cuz

Don't forget he excommunicated the king and the entire royal line before setting off the dirty bomb

Crash

absolute legend

BargleNawdleZouss

1. OK, the Herald came through! I got that part right, at least. Now for Hye Su and the elves...

2. Cat now has _See_ and _Silence_. I'm reminded of the phrase, "See no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil". Perhaps her third aspect will be _Listen_ or _Hear_.

3. I really dislike the idea of Still Water being used again in any context; is that just me?

4. Was the Blessed Artificer's invention the Ram already used in the initial assault on the walls of Keter?

Insanenoodlyguy

Guys, I'm worried about Lady Sybella.

Sugar Roll

Shave her beard in front of the Grand Alliance. Let it serve as both a lesson and a warning to all.

Liliet

I'm not tbh. Like yeah she's not getting out of this shit alive most likely, and I am 0 amount of upset over this -_-

BobbinRobbin

I read Insanenoodleguy's comment as worrying about her being a threat. People who get captured at pivotal moments have I'd say 50/50 odds of either just getting killed or causing trouble (breaking free to kill/damage something or someone important, revealing some grand betrayal/twist or saying something that breaks the morale of someone significant

Insanenoodlyguy

Actually it was sarcasm. She's screwed. The joke was that any of us had concern for the character. Though you make some good points!

Letouriste

She's just an envoy tho. Only doing what she's told to do. Hell, maybe she doesn't even have a boss now the king's dead

Insanenoodlyguy

Putting aside that we don't know how much of the offered deal was her idea, when you are in danger of starving finding out the people who fucked you over already brought the food is going to piss anybody off.

Liliet

there's a point at which "I was just following orders" stops being a valid excuse and I think the current war situation is hovering somewhere around there

Tesroy

"Three things she always keeps," Kairos Theodosian lightly said. "She speaks, she sees and she knows stories." (Book 5, Chapter 8: Veracity)

Looks like Cat is shaping up to be a mirror of the Bard in aspects.

onedollargum

Man, the oath "I will do everything in my power" has some scary depths to it. It's very Cat-like though.

The Warden and the Herald murdering their patriarchs has a certain symmetry.

Someperson

Hanno's faith in the Herald was well founded.

Mirror Night

Hanno tends to be pretty good at reading people especially Heroes when he is not prevented from being good at it due to plot lol.

Though I suppose its fitting Herald kinda walked the alternate path to White Knight that Hanno did not. By striking down the Dwarf King and starting a Civil War. That is one of the visions Hanno saw on his quest to become White Knight. Kinda fitting since the Herald is the champion of the lower class being Herald of the Deeps as his full title and going that route would have made Hanno much the same.

Flameburst

Symmetry? Let the shipping commence!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

On the one hand, he already has a love interest, in fact one important enough to be the primary lever the Herald has for others to use on him. On the other hand, Cat's already got a polyamorous thing going anyway, and we don't have any information as to whether the Herald or his deed-seeker boyfriend care about monogamy or not. Could work.

irritantseraphim

Pretty cool.

It also fits with Cats characterization of him in the Everdark, where she couldn't quite make out if he was a Hero or a Villain.

Wonder

New shiny Aspects are the best!!!!
What would she See if she looked up?

Vagabond

Another amazing chapter! While emotionally the twist stuck out the most, and the herald is a great character that we have seen develop, the thing that really impresses me, is the way supplies and morale are not just glossed over in this story but instead of utmost importance and at times an insurmountable problem. The combination of the great story and writing, the meta-aspect of characters being aware of roles and stories, the characters and the willingness to look at the ugly and necessary is what elevates this work to be one of the greatest I have ever read. It is one of my great pleasures to be along for the ride!

Liliet

HELL YEAH HELL YEAH HELL YEAH

1. Finally we have Cat looking ugly necessity in the eye and saying no. There IS a line she won't cross, and it just smacked everyone in the face with a two by four.

2. SEER CAT SEER CAT SEER CAT

3. Cordelia Hasenbach, the diplomat of the Grand Alliance ^^

4. I really like how the current factual command structure is shaking out – Catherine is basically in charge and has the last word, but she's answerable to the rest of them who basically form a council under / next to her.

5. HERALD OF THE DEPTHS!!!!!!

6. And the supplies are there!!!!!!

KiltedBastich

You know, there are names like the Forgetful Librarian and the Doddering Sage, people so good at their professions those professions grew into Roles and Names. Cordelia's literally the best diplomat in all of Calernia. She has successfully negotiated with literal gods and empires, and used diplomacy to fend off the worst monsters on the continent repeatedly, first Malicia, then Cat, then the Dead King. I really would not be surprised if she didn't end up getting a Role and a Name, something like the Paramount Diplomat or some such.

Someperson

I think if she wanted a Name she would have it very quickly, she meets all of the requirements pretty much.

I dunno if she wants a Name, though, and that counts for something. Ironically, being Named might go against her Role as a Named. Being the badass normal human who matches wits with Dread Empresses and believes in self-determination of mortal powers is maybe just a little too close to her character at this point.

shikkarasu

Yeah, she would only take a Name as a last resort, and even then the Goddess of Stories needs to less put a finger on the scales so much as lounge on one side of them.

Oshi

She might not gain a name. But her successor might.

KiltedBastich

Well, it's like Cat said at one point, if you keep performing the Role, you get the Name, like it or not. There's plenty of examples of people who didn't expect to become Named, where it just sort of happened. Cordelia's already refused a name twice, so she's got that going for her, but I really think she might wake up one day and realize she got a Name at some point when she wasn't looking.

Someperson

Sure, but unlike Anaxares, "not being Named" is quite possibly part of Cordelia's Role.

Insanenoodlyguy

She's turned down a name three times. Once she did that last one I think that's it.

Liliet

One of them was a double, and I'm not sure that counts.

Liliet

Yep, especially now that she's settling into that role specifically in people's yes: the diplomat up Cat's sleeve. Instead of spreading her competence and impact around as a ruler more generally (which she also nearly got a Name for...)

zenanii

So, The Grey Pilgrim broke his staff at the prince's graveyard, and now The Herald of the Deeps broke his staff after killing The King Under.

Any bets on how long Cats staff will survive/what event will cause her to break it?

Earl of Purple

Her abdication. It's a staff of yew from the Twilight city of Liesse, fallen from the tree marking the grave of King Edward the Good King. It's a symbol of her crown.

Sinead

Her crown though in part is being the basis of Law for the Accords.

I don't think she'll break it.

Earl of Purple

I don't mean her literal crown, I mean her status as Queen of Callow. And we know she's planning on abdicating when the war's over.

boballab

Ok who else thinks that Abigail is going to find a tunnel when she digs her latrine?

RoflCat

She'll try, but will ends up accidentally develop some kind of battlefield sewage system.

Or just the whole underground bunker system

erebus42

Gotta love oracular powers. I mean I understand why most stories don't give them to the protagonist especially when also paired with more martial abilities but I always thought they create an interesting dynamic and provide a different kind of power to a character.

Yitzi

So now we've seen eight of her aspects, and they seem to be growing in power (only to be expected).

Learn, struggle, seek.

Take, break, fall.

Silence, see, ?

Santiago A Duarte

I don't think so. Learn was almost certainly the strongest aspect she's had so far, with the possible exception of See. Her second set was very direct combat aspects but not the sort of things that tended to shape storylines.

D

Seek, had she ever been able to use it, would (it is heavily implied) have been extremely powerful, far beyond what is normally expected of a transitional Name. From the very little we saw of it, it fed her information and specifically enabled her to find the way to achieve her goals, whatever those might have been. That's... on a level with her version of See in terms of utility, though of course we don't know the limitations of either (beyond that the former couldn't find a way to eject a demon of Corruption from her soul, at least not while she was using that aspect in a way that risked letting it in).

There certainly seems to be a trend of third aspects being a Name's most-obviously-powerful. This doesn't just apply to the two third aspects of Cat's that we've seen, but also to Ranger's Transcend, Hierophant's Ruin, Adjutant's Rampage, the White Knight's coin, the Black Knight's Destroy...

Notably, though, while final aspects appear to often be those with the most raw power, or the flashiest effects, they aren't necessarily the ones with the greatest overall impact. Hakram used Find more often; Hanno gained an enormous amount from Recall, and Cat formed an entire story groove with Take that would eventually become her Aspect-to-Artefact talent.

The takeaway from all this is that we should expect Cat's final Aspect to be something big and flashy that she can only use a limited amount compared to her two current "workhorse" aspects. If we're guessing at the S-theme, and knowing that she's appointed herself to be effectively a judge of Named, I suspect it may well be Sentence, allowing her to force a Named's story path into one imposing her idea of justice, so long as they have transgressed in a relevant fashion.

Daniel E

'Diluvian – Of or related to world-ending flooding, often biblical'. I confess.. I don't get it. I suppose this makes the Herald an antediluvian, but that's even more confusing.

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

I think it's a thing of age, here. The Old World of Darkness called their SUPER ANCIENT vampires Antediluvians.

Daniel E

I suppose that makes sense. Antediluvian is taken as 'time before the biblical flood' more than 'opposed to flooding'. So technically 'diluvian' could be interpreted as simply a marker of old times.

Hargabga

Probably this:

Historically, diluvium was a term in geology for superficial deposits formed by flood-like operations of water, and so contrasted with alluvium or alluvial deposits formed by slow and steady aqueous agencies. The term was formerly given to the boulder clay deposits, which some early geologists supposed had been caused by the Noachian deluge, a concept known as flood geology or diluvialism.

Adrian_V

So i can't believe i actually nailed it, i mean The Herald arriving with an army, and we still have the Titan as a wildcard, and this is another major change to illustrate this is the end of an era.

Now lets just hope giant fiery sinkholes don't start appearing at random because of the subterranean wars xD

Santiago A Duarte

Wow. I honestly was not expecting the Herald to have killed the King. That hit me. It's funny because I absolutely would expect it from one of the human heroes, that's a very classic gritty hero with an oath thing to do, but something about the way the Dwarves were written kept it from seeming like an option to me.

Very very cool moment.

With regards to Sybella, I assume she'll be executed but that does feel sort of bad. She's just a diplomat following orders, however necessary her public execution might be for morale.

edrey

oh Herald, he doesn't know that Sve is now a dark choir, i expect a eternal civil war like procer great war fueled by Malicia. now i want to read again those two chapters of pale lights.

AviKav

What were the pale light chapters?

edrey

it is the next novel of erratica, a subterranean world after the rule of the "night" and countless wars, with gods and god killers. erratica put the link of the first two chapters a few months ago.

Tom

Cat as Odin, metaphorically hanging herself upside-down to gain See like how Odin gained knowledge of runes, where both of these grant mystical knowledge of their respective universes... maybe?

arcanavitae15

My theory for next aspect is Seize. Due to fitting the taking theme Cat has, continuing with the S aspects, and the whole seize the day saying.

Mirror Night

That checks out also Seize is a fairly natural evolution of her core Inherent Aspect being Take. Much like Hanno has at his core Recall.

I wonder what we should call such Aspects. Core doesn't sound great to me. Maybe Foundational Aspect since its the bedrock of a lot of what they do and how they see the world.

Rey d`Tutto

I also like Swipe

lenethren

By far my favourite story in many years, if not ever, is this one.

Hargabga

Continually amazing. I am do glad to be along for the journey.

It us a tad sad that Kingdom Under is broken. Not that it's a corrupt system that had it coming, but it was still one of the if not the greatest empires in Calernia. Nothing quite comes to match it.

superkeaton

Dorf ex Machina, you gotta love it.

Interlude: Calls

"Mind your sentiments, for they have a mind of their own."

– Proceran saying

It was a sultry night, as Keter's tended to be.

The heat was poisonous and unease thrummed through the camps like a pulsing vein. The arrival of the dwarves – a story heavily curated before it was released to the soldiers, though Akua had heard the full of it from the source – had given the Grand Alliance hope of victory once more, but all still remembered the last assault on Keter's walls. Much death had achieved nothing, and none were eager to be the tip of the spear when tomorrow came. It was certain death, all agreed, and even the ever-loyal Army of Callow was balking at the thought of being thrown into the grinder headfirst. None of that, though, was truly Akua's concern.

Perhaps if she had made different choices she would be leading the Dread Empire into the breach come dawn, or unleashing some horrible sorcery serving as Malicia's own treacherous Warlock, but it was not to be. Fingers tightened around her cup – a golden goblet set with opals, one of the few gifts she'd received as empress-claimant that she had liked – and she drank deep of the Cantal red. It was about to become a much rarer find, Akua thought. Procer would have better use for good land than vineyards in the coming decades, and that meant many vintages were on the verge of disappearance.

Perhaps for good. The world, these days, seemed set on changing.

"So best enjoy it while I still can, yes?" Akua murmured.

Fingers tightened around the cup again, her lips wet but far from sated. She did not regret making the choice she had in the heart of the Tower, not even now. Her eyes closed, thinking of the sound the match had made as she scratched it against stone, all Akua Sahelian felt was guilty relief. That she had not been trapped on that chair, chained to that fate. Made to go through a lifetime of empty motions, screaming inside. And yet as the days passed, she found that frustration had begun nipping at her heels. She traced the golden rim of the cup with her thumb, absent-minded.

"Vanity," she told the night, neither quite asking nor stating.

There was no one else in the tent for her to speak to, after all. The Army of Callow, while it tolerated her presence and many rumours had come from her departure and return to Catherine's side – some expected, like that it had been a scheme from the two of them from the start, others rather more amusing like Akua having found the Black Queen a better lover than the Empress and so turned her cloak again – would never be comfortable with her tent being too deep in its camp. She had never felt threatened, of course. Dartwick had ensured none would lay had on her few possessions, ever dutiful, and Masego had kindly wards around her tent on her behalf until she gained her own magic back.

But she would never be welcome there, in the beating heart of Catherine's kingdom of soldiers, and though she was not one to shy from hatred she had found she preferred setting her tent near the edges of the camp. In Keter that was not so far out, given the nature of the siege walls, but it had been far enough that she had been able to obtain a view of the Crown of the Dead looming in the distance.

"And if there was ever a reason to drink," she snorted, toasting the tall walls and the horrors still lying in wait behind them.

She drank, but it settled the restlessness in her belly no more than the other sips had. Vanity, she'd hazarded, but she was not so sure it was true. Akua was one of the great spellcasters of this siege, treated with the same awe as the Witch of the Woods or the Hierophant without having a Name of her own, but months ago she had been the fulcrum of an ancient empire's fate. She had been... more than she now was. That night in Serolen had not scratched the itch, only drawing attention to it. There had been a moment where it was all in her hands once more, and she had been able to decide.

It had felt good, returning to Masego what had been unjustly denied him. Of all the Named she had known, only Hierophant had never wavered from that bright, impossibly clear moment that defined your Name. He had, from the beginning to the end, stayed true to himself. If such sincerity was not worthy of a good turn, what possibly could?

But the days had passed and Serolen now felt like a world behind. So now Akua Sahelian sat alone in the dark, drinking wine soon to be as much of a relic and looking at the heart of the darkness in the distance. The Dead King's subtle, creeping malevolence – so incredibly banal, until the pit of despair swallowed you up. She drank and wondered if it was vanity, to think she should be more than simply a spellhand in this war. Perhaps it was. Before she could be moved to decide whether that answer would be found at the bottom of a fourth cup of Cantal red, there was a whisper in the back of her mind.

Her wards had been set off. Curious, and not feeling particularly threatened, she lowers the threshold to allow for the entrance of they who would enter her tent. The flap was parted and a man's silhouette – ah, was that the slightest shiver of disappointment she felt? – entered, straightening before sniffing the air.

"Wine in the dark on the eve of a battle?" Kendi Akaze scorned, lighting a magelight with the flick of his wrist. "How very maudlin, Sahelian."

Akua was not sure what was worse. That he had come, or that some part of her was dimly pleased for it. Kendi was tall man, with a sculpted beard and the pale brown eyes of a mfuasa. Hatred of her never left them, which had learned to find a reassuring weight. It had been the one thing whose sincerity she did not need to doubt.

"That was my very aim," Akua easily replied. "How kind of you to compliment me so."

He took a seat across from her, not asking permission, and helped himself to her wine.

"You are growing comfortable again," Kendi said.

"Is that why you're here?" she asked.

The dark-skinned man eyed her with distaste.

"Why else would I be in your presence?"

Akua had spent several months being taught how best to use her looks, when she had been younger, and the lessons had not left her. It was the easiest thing in the world to shift in her seat so that her dress would call attention to the curve of her breasts, that the line of her legs would be put in display.

"I wonder," Akua replied, tone languid. "Can you truly think of nothing else?"

His eyes did not dip and he hardly seemed enticed. Hatred truly was a most useful thing.

"You are wrong, as it happens," Akua continued, shifting back into a more comfortable pose. "Comfort escapes me."

It was foolish to tell him as much, she knew. She was no longer as she had been in Ater, dazed and despairing. She ought to know better. And yet, looking at the man whose sister she had gotten killed for... what? She could hardly even tell, now. Looking at that brown-eyed man, she still saw the same thing she had when she had first spared him: her past made into a man. A voice speaking for the long line of sisters and daughters she had led to their deaths and never given a second thought to. No, it was only natural that it was not Catherine who had come to visit her tonight.

This one was an older ghost, with a deeper claim.

"Does it?" Kendi said. "You are returned to the Warden's side. Again in her service and confidence. What doors are to be closed to you, after this war?"

Akua drank.

"There is no after this war," she said, setting down the goblet. "She loves me more than she hates me, I think, but that is not forgiveness. Never will be."

Kendi Akaze smiled.

"Ah, Callowans," he said. "They do have their virtues."

"Are you satisfied?" Akua asked.

"No," he replied.

Her jaw clenched.

"I will have no part of Cardinal," she said. "That is certain. Or of the Confederation of Praes. And there will be no place for me in the lands of the Grand Alliance. Even if I survive I..."

There would be nowhere to go, she realized, perhaps for the first time. She had known it, deep down, but never spoken the truth out loud and made herself face it. Ashur always took Praesi exiles and it should not be difficult to live in the League, but what kind of a life would those be? An exile, sometimes called upon when of use but otherwise kept in the darkest hole they could find. A shameful secret, kept around only in case she was needed. Everything she was growing to hate about where she now stood, only a thousand times more so. I would have once been satisfied with this, she thought. Seen it as a victory, living to begin another rise to prominence.

Now all the prospect made her feel was exhausted.

"You will not be anything but you," Kendi softly said. "And I can conceive few curses worse than that, Akua Sahelian."

"So that is your purpose," she said, tone mocking. "You come here to remind me that I should live so that your tortured sense of vengeance might be satisfied?"

"I don't care whether you keep breathing, Sahelian," Kendi said, sounding honest. "I want the vicious, empty thing that killed so many of us and lit the world aflame to suffer. Whether you are to serve as her prison or her coffin is not so important."

"So why save my life in Ater?" Akua harshly replied. "If you had not removed Malicia's killing-"

"She would have snuffed you out like a candle," Kendi acknowledged. "And what right did she have to that, after all she has done? It took more than a single pair of hands to craft the Folly. It would have been disgusting, for the Empress to pretend to pass judgement over you when all know she helped the deed along."

"So only you can judge me?" she laughed. "How highly you think of yourself, Kendi."

"It's not me either," the man smiled. "I would just burn you, Sahelian. End it, look for peace among the ashes of you. But my sister's shade demands better. So I will usher you through this journey until you reach your end."

"I don't understand what you want from me," she snarled. "That I open my own throat? That I leap into a chasm? Would it truly mean that much more to you if I did the deed myself?"

"Is that," Kendi evenly asked, "what you think would even the scales?"

"There's no evening those scales," Akua tiredly replied. "Even a fool would see that."

He watched her in silence

"Even should I live forever and save a life every morning, it would change nothing," she continued. "It's not as simple as lives lost."

She had seen that in Ater, the cascade of suffering her atrocity had begun. The Folly had been an enormity, the amount of death it represented, but that had only been the tree above the ground. There were even greater roots below, out of sight, and how could those even be tallied for? Made up for? Redemption by number was an empty exercise, meaningful only in the abstract.

"So you do nothing?" he asked.

"I am to be jailor to the Dead King," Akua said. "Bound forever to keep him imprisoned."

There were still enough of the Twilight Ways for this to be possible. Liesse, it seemed, was not a city she would ever leave behind. He cocked his head to the side.

"And you chose this?"

She did not answer. It would have been a lie to say that she had, though it would have been another to say she had not. He shook his head, disgusted.

"Then it means nothing," Kendi said. "Will forever mean nothing."

He rose to his feet, leaving behind a cup of wine almost entirely untouched.

"Just another fate picked out for you."

Her heart clenched and she turned away, failing to keep her face calm. The mfuasa snorted, killing the light with a flick of the wrist and making to leave. Akua looked out at the walls of Keter, knowing she should keep silent. She did not.

"What was her name?" she asked.

Kendi's steps stuttered.

"Do you care?" he asked.

Akua looked down at her hands.

"Enough to ask," she finally replied.

"Sura. Her name was Sura."

The name echoed in the silence he left in his wake. Akua's fingers reach for her neck, finding only warm skin for all that she had imagined otherwise. She had felt as if she would find something, as if her fingers would have been able to tell her which it was.

A noose or a knot.

—

There were not many Rhenians with the army.

Cordelia had only summoned south a quarter of Rhenia's army at the beginning of the war, leaving the rest to hold the Rhenian Gates and her capital, and of those thousands now only a few hundred were left. The rest were long dead, their lives spent defending people they loved little so very far from home. Cordelia did all in her power to ensure the survivors were all comfortable and provided before she allowed herself to rest. Prince Otto had not neglected them, but the princess felt better for having put a hand to the labour – however scarce the necessity of it.

In truth, if one was to speak of neglect the word should be laid at her feet. How very little she had done for her people, not only Rhenians but all Lycaonese, since the war had begun. That no grudge seemed to be held by her soldiers over the fact she'd not so much as stepped foot in Rhenia during the entire war only worsened the guilt. Gods, sometimes she saw the pride in the eyes of her countrymen and it burned.

"You bargained everything to keep us alive," Otto Reitzenberg solemnly told her when they drank at the wake. "Even your throne. What more could we ask of you, Hasenbach?"

Coming from the man who had so bitterly fought to keep Twilight's Pass from falling, it had felt like a slap in the face. All the more for the way she knew he had meant every word, for Otto Redcrown was not what one would call a skilled liar. It was like none of them could see she had abandoned them, named them the sacrifice needed to keep Procer breathing through the first black months of the war. Are we truly so used to doing the dying, she thought, that it no longer matters? It was a dark thought, though far from the darkest she had been left to wrestle with.

Worst of all was the increasingly possible way they were about to lose the war.

Cordelia no longer sat in the war councils. She still had the status to, as a princess, but Malanza would rather bite off her own thumb than sit besides her and had instead taken to bringing Prince Otto to keep the Lycaonese bound to her. Wise, considering how estranged her people had grown from most of Procer during the war. It was not impossible for large swaths of the northwest to secede from the Principate, if the aftermath of the war was poorly handled. If there was an aftermath at all, anyhow. For though Cordelia no longer sat the councils, she still had access to several of those who sat them and to the formal supply documents besides. The picture both painted, when placed together, was a dark one. With the arrival of the dwarves starvation was no longer at risk, but that was no promised victory.

They Grand Alliance was, by Cordelia's estimation, two failed assaults away from collapse.

It was a broad estimate, relying on a number of casualties equal or greater to those of the first attempt – counting both the field battle and the storm – but she knew it to be correct. Another sixty thousand dead would only lessen the army's numbers around to half of what had first been brought north, but all the forces here were not equal. Or, for that matter, united. Every nation had its own host, but it was worse than that. The League alone fielded multiple different armies, and Procer still divided itself into the hosts under First Princess Rozala and Otto Redcrown. That was not without sense, but it meant that casualties could not be counted as if the force were a single army.

One of the principles of war her uncle had taught her as a girl had been that an army became unable to fight long before all its soldiers were dead. A host was an intricate machine, needing many different parts to keep functioning: horsemen and skirmishers, regulars and outriders. Losing any of those parts – or even too large a portion of one – could be an army's doom. That principle, when applied to the Grand Alliance forces, became a curse. Which armies would start collapsing into uselessness first, when casualties kept racking up? Cordelia believed it would be League's, whose individual armies were smallest and so most vulnerable to this, but she could not be sure.

The war had taught her that when a battle went bad levies died like flies, and Procer's forces still had an uncomfortably large amount of them.

Two defeats, she thought, and the Grand Alliance would have broken enough of its component armies that it would be impossible to take Keter. That was what her investigations had revealed, the ugly truth behind the coming acts of valour: valour alone would not be enough. Even if the broken armies were thrown into the grinder as expendables, it would not suffice. The coalition would fail and when it did Calernia's days would be numbered. Procer would fall, dragging with it the rest of the continent. Too many undead, no one left to stop them. And that would leave Cordelia with a hard choice, perhaps the hardest she'd ever had to make.

Bet it all on hope, some unforeseen salvation, or kill many to save the rest.

A mug was pressed into her hand and Cordelia almost started. Agnes was smiling at her sideways, the two of them alone in her tent. The Augur patted her arm.

"You think too much about what you see," Agnes chided.

Cordelia considered herself a tolerant woman, but the irony in that sentence was too thick for even her to swallow.

"You cannot-" she began, then her eyes narrowed. "You did that on purpose. You are teasing me."

Agnes looked inordinately proud, nodding as she brushed back her hair. The once-short bob had grown a little longer over the last few months, one of the first changes to her cousin's appearance since she had become Chosen.

"They always said I'm the funny Hasenbach," she noted.

Cordelia almost winced. 'They' had not meant that nicely as Agnes was understanding it. Being from even a branch line of the House of Hasenbach had ensured that none would dare to harass her cousin even when she had still been known as only a young girl overly fond of birdwatching, but it had not kept her safe from rumours. Or being ignored with varying degrees of politeness. Chasing off the memories, she took Agnes' hand in her own.

"You are getting better," Cordelia happily said. "For months now you have been growing into the present."

Away from the past and visions of what might be.

"It's a little confining," Agnes admitted. "Things only have one meaning and I have to listen when people talk."

"The grand curse of civil society," she drily replied. "You will get used to it in time."

"Maybe," the Augur said, wrinkling her nose, then smiled. "But mead is good. I don't know why they wouldn't let me drink at feasts."

Because your father disappeared down the bottle when your mother died, Cordelia thought, and none of us wanted you to follow him down that hole.

"I cannot imagine why," she lied.

Agnes shot her a suspicious look, which moved Cordelia halfway to tears. For years now she'd been watching her cousin – the last of her blood, now – wasting away, devoured from the inside by her Choosing. Before she'd left Salia, Agnes would not have been able to read a room enough to be suspicious. Much less express it so openly. Guilt followed, as it so often did these days. I asked so much of you, Cordelia thought. Advice to avoid disaster or steer enemies into it. Only now do I begin to grasp how much it truly took from you. Too much. She would never again ask for augury.

Sometimes it felt like Cordelia had lived all her life taking from others, like some dragon from an old tale gathering all the gold of the world at her feet so she might make a kingdom of her greed.

"Boo," Agnes muttered. "Boo, Cordelia, booo."

She swallowed a smile.

"Now you are just going with the fashion, Agnes," the princess replied. "For shame."

They both smiled. It had been most of a year now, Cordelia thought, since the two of them only had each other left. Since Uncle Klaus had died, striding out of his life and straight into the legends of the Iron Prince's last charge. There were still Hasenbachs alive of course, she'd made sure the line would continue. Two distant cousins of hers were in Salia and one more in Rhenia itself, but Cordelia had never known any of them more than passingly. They were not family in the way that Agnes was and her uncle had been.

"Your mood is falling again," Agnes said.

"I fear I might not be very good company tonight," Cordelia admitted.

"You're the one I chose," Agnes shrugged. "What had you looking so sad?"

"I was thinking of family," she vaguely replied.

The other woman hummed.

"Prince Klaus, then," she said.

The two of them had never been close, Cordelia knew. There was no shared blood, Agnes found violence repellant and Uncle Klaus had been uncomfortable around powers he did not understand. It had not been a recipe for deep fondness, for all that the two of them had spent years at her side.

"Death leaves so much unfinished," Cordelia replied.

She had never reconciled with the man who had been something between a father and a grandfather to her while being neither by blood.

"That's the wrong way to look at it," Agnes said. "It's life where you don't finish things. Death is always complete."

The fair-haired princess cocked her head to the side.

"I do not follow," she admitted.

"Death's a closed circle," Agnes said. "A single act. Sometimes it matters and sometimes it doesn't, but it's never..."

She grimaced, groping for words.

"Continuous," Agnes finished, satisfied. "It's why you can make something so large of a moment so small: you can't undo it after by acting the other way. The circle is closed."

"Is that something you saw?" Cordelia asked. "I thought that these last few months..."

"It's not the Gods," Agnes said, shaking her head. "And I haven't seen much since I left Salia. They understand that sometimes to have to save your strength."

"Do they?" Cordelia asked, almost accusing.

It had been a long few months, a long few years. Perhaps even a long life. The Augur hummed again.

"I don't think they understand much, actually," Agnes mused. "Not like people do. It's why there's Good and Evil, so there's rules, because they do understand rules."

"Good is not an immovable absolute," Cordelia said. "Above was once worshipped by those who kept slaves, Agnes."

"The rules change," her cousin agreed. "But I think that's part of what they want too."

"Many have gone mad trying to understand the Gods," the princess warned.

"I'll be all right," Agnes reassured her. "Since I was already like that."

The utterly inappropriate laugh that got out of her ripped itself out of her throat as her cousin sat smiling and pleased.

"You need to laugh more," Agnes told her. "It will do you good. Maybe find a lover."

Cordelia almost rolled her eyes. As if now was the time for such diversions.

"If we are to speak of lovers," she said, "perhaps I should be drinking more."

"My mug is already empty," Agnes informed her, then batted her eyes.

Cordelia would have refused her, but it had been the better part of a decade since she'd seen her cousin act so much like the girl she'd once been. She did not have the heart to tell her no, rising to her feet and going into the back of the tent – where she did keep a few bottles of wine for guests, and mead for family. At the rate Agnes was going through them, she would run out of the mead before the siege – or the world – ended. The blue-eyed princess chose one of the older bottles and straightened, though she froze when she heard a rattling gasp coming from the other side of the tent.

She hurried back to find her cousin leaning over the table, writing on parchment with a shaky hand.

“Agnes?” she called out.

Her cousin did not reply. She set down the mead on the table and knelt by her cousin's side, finding the other woman utterly absorbed in her writing – and hiding it from prying eyes. She finished writing after a moment, blew on the ink to dry it, and then folded the piece of parchment. Only then did she take her eyes off it and sag into her seat, breath irregular. Her skin had paled and was beaded with sweat.

“Agnes,” Cordelia quietly said, “what have you done?”

The Augur sought out her hand, threaded their fingers together and squeezed it.

“I saved my strength but it wasn't enough,” Agnes croaked. “I'm sorry.”

She forced her tone to be even.

“Are you healthy?” Cordelia asked. “Should I call for a healer?”

“I couldn't see everything,” Agnes said. “Just glimpses. But it doesn't matter.”

The Augur's eyes began bleeding and it was no longer a question worth asking. Cordelia shouted for a healer, for help.

“If it's a bet,” Agnes murmured, “then I always make the same.”

“Agnes,” Cordelia urgently said, “stay awake. I don't-”

“Don't read what I wrote until you need to,” the Augur told her. “You'll know when.”

“Agnes,” Cordelia hissed, cold terror in her gut. “Don't leave me.”

“I'm sorry,” she replied, smiling and bloody and heart-breakingly pale. “I wish we could have gone home.”

A shiver.

"Don't follow too quickly."

By the time the healers ran into the tent, Cordelia Hasenbach was holding the hand of a corpse.

Lictor Magnus

Dang that last part hit hard. Rip Agnes 😭

Eris

Noooooooo!!! Agnes!!

I wonder what Akua will decide to do. She, and the rest of the nobles of Praes have been completely sidelined, I wonder if they will accept their new place in the world.

Will Akua gain a name again? A name like Vivienne's Princess?

Soronel Haetir

How about the Name "Damned Jailer" for Akua?

Xantam

We already have a name for a prison keeper. Cat's not staying in Cardinal, unless the Dead King is too, I'm afraid,

masterofbones

Yup, the person named Warden, who designed a plan where someone would eternally watch over the Dead King's prison, is functionally immortal, and has been accepted as something of a peer by the Dead King. She's also been throwing out death flags like saying she will start wearing dresses when the war is over.

There's no way it doesn't end up with her holding the keys to the prison

Someperson

Well, you never know, Catherine is a fair hand at flipping the middle finger to fate when it counts. And even if Catherine accepted her fate, I'm not sure the Woe would take it lying down. If Catherine really wanted to sacrifice herself she should have finished eating the Book of Some Things over Hanno and Cordelia's protests and became a monster who could destroy the Dead King and die in the process.

But it seems pretty certain that at some point, she is going to have to confront this Role that she has literally made for herself step by step, apparently without consciously realizing it.

Who knows if she'll pull through that or not. In a lot of ways, the endgame of a story has a lot more flexibility than the rest. Somehow, I have doubts she will keep her Name if she does manage to avoid becoming the eternal Warden of the Hidden Horror. But hey, that wouldn't be so bad.

agumentic

The rest of Praes' nobility will be perfectly happy playing their political games for the Chancellorship, though. It's Akua alone who has no place in that new Praes, for all that she was the surgeon that cut it out.

Liliet

OH N000000000000000):

Soronel Haetir

Wow, the one person left that Cordelia actually wanted to save and she is completely helpless to stop it.

Bret

Wait so to clarify, did Agnes just build up all her Name's strength to pull off one massive, critical augury and that was too much for her body to take?

Ninestrings

She scryed the Dead King, it's mentioned earlier that anyone who does dies horribly.

Cpt. Obvious

And most likely her vision showed her a "solution" to something the DK has waiting for them. But this solution is something that either the DK can protect against if forewarned, or it's a trap that's just so horrible that if Cordelia were to know they would do anything in their power to avoid it.

And if they did avoid the trap then they would stumble into something worse, or something Agnes couldn't see a solution for surviving.

So reading that note beforehand might be a good way to ensure that the Dead King wins.

Konstantin von Karstein

Poor Cordelia... She truly has no one next 😞

Liliet

I mean. She does have a bestie

Konstantin von Karstein

Who?

Liliet

The other currently active GA prophet 😊

Konstantin von Karstein

Cat? 🐱

Liliet

her yes

shikkarasu

Maybe I'm a little callous, but I'm very curious what Agnes decided to go looking for. What she couldn't see all of.

Mary Gentle

In that case I'm callous too. Understandably, Cordelia has the healers and such to deal with – but after that, if it was me, it wouldn't be ten seconds before I read the message that Agnes died to bring me.

Soronel Haetir

I suspect that if she did read the message now that it would make no sense. Only in some later circumstance would it have any meaning.

Or worse, it would appear to have some meaning in the current circumstance but that understanding would be completely wrong.

dadycool

That's the worst part about prophecies. They tend to make far more sense after they would've been useful or after they bite you in the ass.

Hargabga

In this case it's the other way around. The prophecy is designed specifically to be most useful in a specific moment in time. Which makes sense – if you can see the future it's easier to find the most important decision and influence it, rather than finding exactly what set of instructions is needed to be given to influence the future, taking in mind all the side effects these instructions will have on the future aside from the one important decision. It's almost infinite amount of branching possibilities and you need to look through each one and compare the end result. Far easier to let thing go their "natural" course until it's critical to change stuff.

shikkarasu

So my nagging thought remains: what moment was Agnes aware of that she went looking for? That she saved up months of Name power and gave her life in the name of? She found an answer, or part of one, but what was the question?

dadycool

"How do I get my sis-I mean, my cousin to survive this war?"

ruduen

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Oof. Just... oof.

Tenthyr

Cordelia is in the grips of something like survivors guilt, I think. Her people don't begrudge her and at some level she loves them, and part of that love is respecting their battle and their place in it, even if it kills them.

She just feels like they should blame her. I hope whatever Agnes wrote will be enough to tip the scales for everyone.

Hargabga

It's not just survivor's guilt. She actually caused the thing she is guilty about. It was under her control and she knowingly chose otherwise. Survivor's guilt is about something that was forced on you. Unless I am mistaken.

Liliet

Yeah, I think survivor's guilt is part of it (it's not like Cordelia stayed in the safe capital out of selfishness) but part of it is much more immediate.

AsuraKyoko

We knew that Akua almost certainly wouldn't end up actually being the jailer for the Dead King, but I wonder if it might be Cordelia instead.

Cordelia has been presented as the counterpart to Cat in a number of ways: leaders of the East and West, representatives of Good and Evil, action vs discussion, etc. Cat, however, is now the representative of all of the Named, and is the foremost member of the Grand Alliance. She doesn't have a counterpart anymore.

Cat is essentially the guardian of life on the continent, and the Dead King, while he represents death, doesn't really fit the niche of counterpart. He's almost more of a force of nature than a character, and he lacks most of the things that would make him an actual foil to Cat. If, after he's defeated, however, Cordelia acts as the seal on his prison, she would fit that role perfectly, and provide that symmetry that so defines the way stories work in universe.

masterofbones

Nah, Cordelia doesn't have enough narrative weight in that direction. She's the politician so deadly that everyone sacrifices themselves for her despite her lack of power. She doesn't have the power, capability, or mindset for containing the Dead King.

bakkasama

"Don't follow too quickly", well, that doesn't bode well for Cordelia.

Gunslinger

It could be the 60 to 80 years of her full life too.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. All people die in time, even the immortal's. It's no great portent of doom to say one will die eventually.

Magnus

Honestly, it made me think Cordelia will be the Dead King's prison guard.

theduckchris

This chapter isn't linked properly from the last one btw.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Man, this whole thing hit hard, especially Agnes' death. I was just thinking about how cool and likeable she was and then bam.

edrey

you have to hate the Gods for that, with so many powerfull mages, named, gods, she could have survived, but the story would have been weaker. now it is in cordelia hands how to save the day. too sad, really.

Hargabga

You can't blame Gods for not intervening and saving everyone because then someone else will blame them for intervening and dooming everyone. With everyone being everyone individual in question considers important. Which can range from noone to oneself to literally everyone. Their isolationist policy is the only thing that allows even a facsimile of free will. You should only blame DK for, like, directly actually killing her.

Juff

Typo Thread:

lay had on > lay hands on kindly wards > kindly placed wards she gained > she'd gained lowers the > lowered the them, which > him, which she would those be > would that be reach for > reached for They Grand > The Grand be League's > be the League's sometimes to > sometimes you

arcanavita¹⁵

Well that's an emotional suckerpunch for Cordelia, I will miss Anges I really liked her.

ninegardens

Huh.

I.... didn't expect Agnes to die.
I expected her to lose her marbles.
Or go to far and get possessed by the Dead King,
Or just evaporate into air and light.

But I didn't expect her to die.

caoimhinh

Yeah, it came suddenly and apparently random.

It didn't seem like something Agnes planned, maybe she was like gathering her strength holding herself back from the vision in order to make it count, and then suddenly reached her limit and HAD to have the vision.

Santiago A Duarte

It wasn't fully planned but somewhat anticipated. She mentioned she'd been saving her strength for the attempt, hoping she could survive it but knowing there was a risk.

Liliet

I did):

Liliet

I did):

daegone823

IF you ask me this is god's punishment/gift. I can't be the only one that remembers Cordelia refusing a name in front of an assembly, the bard, and I think Cat. She stated that she could dot his as a mortal all on her own. That she could change fate without their powers of above. She even decided to govern names with the political powers of kings. It is only recently that she learned to work with names but still she held onto Agnes preventing her from her purpose(Dwarves)

Her cousin is an Augur essentially in the same vein as the bard tethered to fate. Similar to the bard her visions don't really have an impact without anyone willing to listen or play the game. Cordelia essentially was trying to get her cousin to give up her name, being more "present". Who knows if the Augur received a whisper in that moment to choose between her cousin living or herself(give up her present for a future), or if she had a name dream of previous Augurs who put themselves before there gift of divination forsaking many. This was probably the Augurs only way of fighting and she held out at the most dire moment and maybe it still was not enough.

Above made a giant proclamation that always above holds sway over mortals. It is up to her if she takes above's help or not if she refuses this help she denies her cousin's dying wish.

Liliet

I don't think this is Above being passive aggressive. They do not get into these pissing contests with mortals as they'd win every time. Every mortal statement that they can win regardless of gods is based on factual evidence which is that gods let them win or lose on their own merit, with only some positive feedback loops worked in.

nimelennar

Yay Kendi!

Oh no, not Agnes!

dadycoool

You...you monster. How could you do that? I get that a seer making a Final Prediction is very powerful, especially when they really need the help, but still. It's Agnes. The last cheerful person there.

Darkening

We still have kingfisher prince being cheerfully badass at least. Maybe Cordelia will even acknowledge his feelings for her now that she's not first prince.

dadycoool

And Agnes did tell her to find a lover, so it's possible.

Hargabga

Imagine if all her prediction is about is getting Cordelia laid.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

"Don't follow too quickly."

Oh, this one hurts.

Crash

finished reading and immediately commented just that.

agnes got all her ducks in a row, made her final bet and last wish.

this one sure does hurt

lenethren

Wow. I didn't see that coming.

boballab

My guess is that what Agnes wrote is for when Cordelia is to let Cat know it is time to reshackle the villains to their stories. That is something Cat has been sitting on.

ninegardens

I like this, but also, feels like that's CAT's action. I feel like Agnes will have handed something to her cousin that is Cordelia's action.

Lord Haart

Yes I think it will be about the Ealamel. Not to have faith in the gods to save them, but to have faith in all the other humans who will try to save everyone.

Xinci

I suppose Agnes's comment does go with the thought of the God's rules broadly going mesh to pro- social and anti-social frameworks that by their nature are held by their creations societies and equated to positive values. In such a case, it being a continuum fully allows the rules their creations societies follow to change as they are like singular points of a larger paradigm.

Agne's death was a bit abrupt but she stuck to her views til the end. A fair death for her desires perhaps. Especially while Cordelia was being introspective over the cost of her interactions to the Lycaonese (somewhat fairly in noting they were a sacrifice)

Wonder

Cat!!! U gotta drop those " Akua becomes DK jailor" plans.

RIP Agnes.

bellacohl

Oh boy this hit harder than expected. I bet Agnes just won the war, by which I mean her sacrifice will be instrumental to defeat DK at the most critical point.

Snappy270

She knew. That's what is so shocking she knew she would have to look at the dead king, the bard and everything all at once. So she stopped having visions, for months till her name began to thin. All so she could go home with cordelia... and watch birds. And it wasn't enough.

Damm that's cold and sad. She was one of the few to fight the wandering bard and didn't lose anything. Or become mad. Best hero!

Hargabga

Yeah, if you think about it she probably planned to sacrifice her own Name and augury to power that vision so that she can have a life with Cordelia. And that wasn't enough.

KiltedBastich

That's true, the Augur is the only person I can think of to ever get a clean win against the Wandering Bard – all of Cat's wins came at high cost. Possibly this is because the Augur was a hero.

In any event, poor Cordelia. RIP, Agnes.

Lord Haart

Agnes also had faith in Cordelia, more than herself, and that is a POWERFUL story.

Liliet

I don't think her Name began to thin... she started recovering from the damage following it did to her, but her Name was as strong as ever, else "saving up her strength" would be worse than futile, and I don't think that's what's going on here =x

Crash

oh this one hurts

BargleNawdleZouss

Nominations for Cordelia's last chance fling/lover:

1. Prince Frederic Goethal of Brus, the Kingfisher Prince (would that be too icky re: Catherine?)
2. Hanno of Arwad, the White Knight/Sword of Judgment
3. Roland de Beaumaraais, the Rogue Sorcerer
4. Moro Ifriqui, Lord of Vaccei
5. Brandon Talbot, Grandmaster of the Order of Broken Bells
6. Prince Otto Reitzenberg of Bremen

I don't recall Cordelia expressing an interest in women. There was a reference to a few discreet lovers in the past, but I thought the implication was that they were men. If I'm incorrect, then please suggest likely female companions as well.

Santiago A Duarte

Yeah pretty sure Cordelia is straight as far as we know, though her personal life is extremely limited in detail

daegone823

She said she had a couple of discreet encounters with women. It was a chapter from her on POV where she talked about how difficult it was keeping up appearances. I believe before the coup by a guy from her inner circle.

Liliet

Cordelia is explicitly bi.

~~and HAS HAD t e a s i n g with Cat~~

Le Légume Tout-Puissant

That was well written. By not telling us what is on the piece of paper, EE prevent Agnes's death from being overshadowed by the August's revelation. I love this kind of craftsmanship. Kudos for a death well done. Not that it overshadows Robber's death, of course. That one was a true master stroke.

Someperson

Rest in peace 😞

Agnes' note is about to end Neshamah's whole career

Lord Haart

"If it's a bet," Agnes murmured, "then I always make the same."

Yeah OK I cried.

Chapter 57: Dawn

"Only two things can get a soldier through war: courage or good legs."

-Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

An hour before dawn the camp would begin to stir, but I woke up even before that.

It was almost a mercy. My sleep was rarely anything but fitful – always returning to that night of green flames and red hands – and there were only so many times I could wake up soaked in sweat before I lost taste for turning over and burying my head under a pillow. In the dark before the dawn I found a fire, my still sleepy guards spread out around me, and overcooked a pair of eggs. The bacon rashers were fine, though, and boiling water was transmuted into tea by the twin magics of patience and costly foreign imports. I wolfed down the meal and warmed my hands against the mug, sipping it at it while it was still hot enough to scald my tongue.

My duties had yet to wake up and I wasn't going to be squeezing into my battle armour any sooner than I needed to, so after I polished off the last of tea I got up to stretch my limbs. A walk around camp would do the trick, and though my guards seemed intent on following I dismissed them. I was now entirely awake, and so I could feel a string of fate pulled taut across the air. Not the battle's, it was too small for that, but not a small matter either. Best to have a look before someone got around to plucking it, I figured.

My limp was unhurried, as I knew I would not be late. I tread the broad avenues of the Army of Callow's camp, then the narrower alleys of the Dominion's all the way into the messy sprawl of Procer's sea of tents. Past a company of fantassins sleeping in the rough like corpses abandoned on a field, I found a half-broken watchtower – laid low by shoddy workmanship, not the Enemy's blows – and a silhouette atop stairs. A man's, leaning against the low shattered wall as if it were a balustrade, and though the cloak was a faded brown I recognized the build well enough. He did not turn as I went up to join him, though he would have heard me coming.

He was, I saw, staring at the dark and distant shape of the Crown of the Dead.

I squeezed myself in at the edge of the wall, leaning my staff against it and my shoulders against the irregular stone. In the gloom before day began to glow, Keter was difficult to make out even to my Night-blessed eyes. It was as some large beast curled up on an island of nothingness, unmoving but far from asleep. No one could look at the Dead King's capital for long without getting the impression that it was somehow looking back at you.

"How did you find me?" Hanno of Arwad asked.

I glanced his way, having to twist to do so with my flesh and blood eye – the angle was bad. He'd always been a tall a broad sort, Hanno, with a working man's frame and a working man's hands. It suited the plain but honest face, which, while not so serene as it had been when he still served Judgement had kept a sense of calm to it. He was not easy to ruffle. Yet this morning, before daylight and other's eyes caught up to us, he was allowing unease to reach his face.

"I followed a string," I said. "It's a thing I do now and then."

"Mysterious," he replied, appreciative. "Another ten years of this and you will drive young Named utterly mad."

"Hey, if I actually make it to old age it's my goddamn right to mess with the young," I shrugged. "It's not like Evil offers a pension or anything. They're a stingy lot."

He snorted.

"I cannot tell whether that's blasphemy or not," the dark-skinned man admitted.

"I'm getting that a lot these days," I mused, "which seems unfair, given that I'm the high priestess of an entire religion."

"One centred," Hanno said, "largely around theft and murder."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"And?"

"There's a saying about birds of a feather that seems appropriate," he serenely replied, "but I believe you'd never forgive me the pun."

"You do know me," I conceded.

I let the silence fall comfortably, settle in a bit. Then I struck with my usual finesse.

"So, glaring at Keter," I said.

He stirred at my side.

"A roundabout question?"

"If you came here for the view," I shrugged, "waiting after dawn might have worked better."

I'd not drag it out of him with a hook and rope, if he did not want to talk, but I suspected that if that were true my feet would not have led me here. I'd been on the other end of this kind of conversation often enough not to mistake reluctance with refusal.

"I never sleep well before battles," Hanno reminded me.

I didn't reply. We both knew not sleeping and coming out here weren't the same thing.

"I find myself irritated," he finally said.

Huh. Never heard that one out of him before. I cocked my head to the side.

"With?"

"Too many people," he tiredly said. "Which serves to tell me the troubles does not lie with them."

"Ah," I said.

He moved, craning his neck to look at me.

"Ah?" he asked.

"Ah," I confirmed.

He rolled his eyes at me.

"What you mean, 'ah'?" he pressed.

"That I'm not surprised," I said. "You're close enough to being Named that you can use an aspect and ride providence, but you haven't claimed one openly. Talking from experience, it's not a pleasant position to stay in."

My Name of Squire had died a long death in the throes of Winter, a span of time I'd spent fighting some of the most dangerous heroes on the continent and trifling with lesser gods. I remembered well what it had been like to have the Role without the rest.

"Even a saint with get tetchy," I elaborated, "if he keeps sitting on a spiked seat for too long."

"I do not claim sainthood," Hanno evenly said.

Never stopped anyone from tossing it at your feet, I thought, but true as that was it would be of no help at all.

"Can't blame you," I drawled instead. "Laurence was enough to put me off it too."

He wasn't quite amused – he remembered the Saint of Swords far more fondly than I did – but the growing tension in his shoulders loosened. Keeping an eye on him, I decided not to prod him any further. He had the look of a man chewing on his own thoughts. If the taste was foul enough he'd spit them back out anyways, yeah? And to think they'd said I would never learn patience.

I'd been patient enough to outlive most the fuckers, so how about that.

"There is a Name there for the taking," Hanno finally said. "All I would need to do was reach out."

"But you haven't," I observed.

Obvious, but it'd keep him talking.

"I have turned away from it twice now," he confessed, passing a hand through his close-cropped hair.

My brow rose and I had to repress the urge to let out a low whistle. No wonder he was feeling antsy. He was fighting off his own transition. When he'd become a claimant to Warden of the West he'd ceased being the White Knight, though at least one of his old aspects had lingered. In the wake of renouncing that claim and my rising to fill the Role, what exactly Hanno of Arwad was had remained up in the air. By the sound of it, he'd been struggling with that question just as much as the rest of us.

I didn't bother to ask what the Name he was shying away from was. I had my suspicions, but in truth it didn't particularly matter. A Name was just the crystallization of what you were supposed to be, what you were supposed to do. The red, the life of it was in the Role. It was what we struggled with, far more than whether a Champion should be Valiant or Unconquered. So the 'what' was an afterthought, really, in face of the question that did matter.

"Why?"

The word had him scowling. It was a rare sight and I almost found myself staring at it: it was, well... human. Not that Hanno had ever been alien in the way that some other Named could become, all cold and power stripped of everything else, but there'd always been something a little aloof about him. The calm, the serenity on his face and in his eyes, it was fitting for a White Knight. Expected almost. But it was something to admire, not to understand, because who could ever really understand certainty that absolute? And now he was scowling, almost childishly. I smiled.

"And what has you so amused?" Hanno challenged.

"When I was a kid," I said, "I sometimes felt like the world was caught in amber. Maybe not every part, but those that mattered at least. That nothing important ever really changed."

I traced the edge of the rough stone with my fingers.

"But we did change it," I said, almost disbelieving. "It didn't really feel like it was what we were doing at the time, but we did. And now that I know how to look for it..."

All those years of swimming against the tide, of blood and mud and tears, they'd given birth to the first tremors of a new age. Still fragile, uncertain, but the signs were there. In the way that the Dominion was starting to circle around Razin and Aquiline like they were the sun of Levant, in the way that goblins drew on Night and planned to raise halls as far as the Morgentor, in that the empress of my youth was now a chancellor and a girl I'd once thought was now the heiress to my crown. Gods, these days I counted Procer as a halfway steady ally and looked forward to spending time with Cordelia Hasenbach. Somehow, along the way, we'd changed the world without even noticing.

But now that I could see it-

"... it's everywhere," Hanno quietly finished, eyes returning to the Crown of the Dead.

Calloused hands pulled closed, as if he was trying to catch something eluding his grasp. He let out a long, shuddering breath.

"Except me," Hanno of Arwad said. "It's everywhere except me, Catherine."

So my instinct had been right.

"You can be the White Knight again," I said.

"The same Name," he said, "that I walked away from."

I hummed.

"Aspects?" I asked, tone gone professional.

A trick that'd always served me well. Sound like you have a right to ask a question and most people will answer before they realize you're there to buy fish and there's really no reason you should be told about how much getting their horse shod cost at Billy King's smithy. Too much had been the answer. Brother Desmond had been right, the old bastard had been a swindler.

"One stayed," Hanno said. "Two faded."

I grimaced. That poor man. For an aspect to stick through a Name being lost and then being reclaimed, it'd have to be so intrinsic to who he was that it was more about Hanno of Arwad than whatever else he ended up being. I didn't know what Hanno had gone through for Recall of all powers to end up qualifying for that, but I doubted it must have been singularly unpleasant.

"Then it's not really the same Name, is it?" I pointed out.

"You were the Squire twice," he said, with the blithe assurance of someone who'd peered at many of my secrets through dead men's eyes. "Did you think it a different Name simply for having different aspect?"

"I was a different person," I replied. "It's why I didn't get Learn or Struggle. I didn't feel like I was so out of my depth anymore."

In the wake of First Liesse, I had been a victor: over Akua, over the High Lords, in some ways even over the Empire. My plan to claw back some sort of local rule over Callow had been a success and I'd been granted lands by Malicia herself. I'd not felt like I was one misstep away from death at all times anymore, and my Name had reflected that confidence.

"But it was the same Name," Hanno insisted. "Meant for the same purposes. Changing the horses on carriage does not make it a different carriage."

"There's an argument to be made that it does," I drily replied. "Since you never step in the same river twice and all, but I'll leave that bit of philosophy to the Atalantians. Why are you so keen on a Name always being meant for the same purposes, anyway? Even if it were true, it wouldn't necessarily be a bad thing."

"You have to ask?" he tiredly said. "You are the one who forced me to look that mistake in the eye."

I blinked at him.

"You're standing where everyone else started and calling it a journey," Hanno quoted.

My own words, I realized after a heartbeat. From that night in Salia, when I'd had him at my mercy and savaged him with every hard truth I could find.

"I'd thought that rolled right off you," I admitted. "Like most of what I said that night."

"Even if you had been entirely my enemy," he replied, "I would have thought on the words after. It is a dangerous thing to fear self-examination."

Sounded a lot like 'the innocent have nothing to fear' to me, a sentence generally spoken by people who should not be trusted with even butter knives, but I'd sit on that opinion instead of sharing it. He had a right to his own beliefs, and there were more than a few reasons I'd not ended up dressing in white.

"All right, so you self-examined," I said, distantly glad Indrani was not there to make a filthy joke of that. "How'd that end up with you here and staring down stone walls?"

"Because I fear that you might not have been wrong," Hanno said. "It was... I struggled with the decision to act, Catherine. To sunder myself from providence and the Tribunal, however silent, and take matters into my own hands. But I did, and I began to act."

His jaw clenched.

"And now I am to be the White Knight again?" he said. "To return where I began and sweep away all the doubts I wrestled with, the decisions I made, like fallen trinkets fit only for trash."

He angrily laughed.

"It was not a journey at all," Hanno told me. "I just walked in a circle so I could put on the same old cloak. All that grief, all these dangers and struggles and deaths, and what do I have to show for it?"

So that was it, huh. He'd thought he was becoming someone else, that he'd learned something. It must have been a bitter pill to swallow, the Creation itself seemed to think otherwise. At least in his eyes, anyway.

"Two aspects," I said.

He turned to me, frowning.

"You want to use a Name as measure of who you are, like Creation's some sort of fair judge?" I challenged. "I can't agree, but fair enough. You'll have to follow through, though: Creation judged you different enough from who you used to be that two out of three aspects faded."

"It's the same carriage," Hanno flatly said, echoing his earlier words.

"Maybe," I said. "But it's not the same horses pulling it, or the same man riding it – so why does it have to be headed to the same place?"

He looked away. Not convinced, huh. I wasn't fool enough to be disappointed.

"Perhaps it would be for the best if it did," he finally said. "For all that I chose to act, I have few gains to show for it. The Gigantes have not come, and the claim I troubled the Grand Alliance to press was a trap."

I hid my surprise. It was the first time I'd heard he'd reached out to the Titanomachy, though that was actually something I halfway appreciated. Cordelia had gotten some goodies out of dealing with the giants, but however skilled a diplomat she was being Proceran had ensured all paths would turn into dead ends. Both Hanno and the Witch of the Woods were said to have deep ties to the Gigantes, though, and a personal connection might have yielded results where formal talks had not. A shame it hadn't. Mind, you all of this was babbling nonsense.

"Yeah, you didn't produce enough results to turn around the literal end times in, like, eight months of trying your hand at it tops," I drily said. "Just terrible, Hanno. Soon children will begin stoning you in the streets."

He sent me a long-suffering look.

"Must you?"

"Sure, when you're being an idiot," I easily replied. "You tried, Hanno. Maybe you didn't pull miracles out of thin air – more like not enough of them – but that doesn't mean you were wrong to act. You made some things better and some things worse."

I snorted.

"That's better than I fucking managed to pull off, some years."

Or Cordelia, for that matter. He mulled on that, silent, and I did not interrupt. Instead I looked to the distance, where on the edge of the horizon light was fast approaching. The gift of the Sisters told me dawn was soon to come.

"The world was never simple," Hanno murmured. "But I do miss them sometimes, the days when my role in it could be."

"Enough to go back?" I asked.

He did not answer. I stayed by his side, the two of us keeping in a strangely comfortable silence, until dawn rose to find us.

—

The silence was deafening.

Almost two hundred thousand soldiers stood around Keter, a fortified camp encircling that island of stone and death surrounded by nothingness, yet I could hear every cough. Empress Basilia had left with the Proceran cavalry, marching to the plains of the Ossuary to fight the battle that would keep our back clear as we stormed Keter. The rest of us – Levant, Callow, Procer and Praes – were mustered for war, for the slaughter about to begin. I sat Zombie's back in full armour, perched atop a now-empty watchtower, and below me the ranks of the Army of Callow were splayed out. It was not the last two bridges they were readied for, not this time.

Across the lines of legionaries cut massive, segmented steel bridges. Pickler's creations. Not long enough to reach across the chasm to the top of the rampart, for the amount of steel needed for it would have been prodigious, but long enough for our purposes. There was a glint of light at my side, which bloomed into a circle when I granted it a glance. Masego's face appeared within.

"We are ready," Hierophant said. "When does it begin?"

"On the hour," I said, "though it will be First Princess Rozala that-"

"FORWARD!"

The air shuddered from the force of the call, which would have been fit to burst eardrums near the source. Still, the Proceran mages we'd trained at the Arsenal had done what they needed to: Rozala Malanza's voice had been heard by every soul in the Grand Alliance army. Not that the order applied to all of them.

"Understood," Hierophant said, and cut the spell.

My soldiers did not move, standing there as the wind picked up and the ozone scent of magic filled the air. Across the last two bridges, Proceran and Levantine soldiers began their advance on the enemy bastions. Streaks of roiling darkness shot up past the tall walls of Keter, the first wave of the enemy's rituals – curses so powerful they were sickening even for me to look upon – howling at our advancing forces. Our answer was well-oiled. Our own rituals shot up: the eerie dust-ghosts of binders, great spears of lightning from the Army of Callow and curses just as vile from the Praesi. Magic collided against magic, power spent to no gain but the stalemate we had been aiming for.

"Now," I murmured. "Now, Artificer."

Obeysing my order without ever having heard it, the Blessed Artificer at least unleashed the wonder she had crafted in Salia and refined over the months since: the Ram. It was impossible for me to miss it. The wooden pillar sheathed in copper caught the morning sun as it was dragged onto the platform we'd raised for it, then aimed at the wall before us. Adanna of Smyrna laid a hand on her creation, and for the first heartbeat nothing happened. Or rather nothing visible. It felt, to my senses, as if the entire world was breathing in.

And in the heartbeat that followed, as Light began to shoot out from the sides in wild spurts, the world breathed out.

She was knocked of her feet, as were the two soldiers helping her, and the Ram shot out like an arrow swatted by some unseen titan's hand. The Light roiled, screamed, and as a sudden burst of power came from behind the walls of Keter I felt the Hierophant's name shiver. Wrest killed their defence in the egg as the Ram flew, right at the heart of the wall before us. The same one where a Praesi siege tower had crashed into the stone, weakening the wards holding the rampart together. Spinning and screaming, the Ram hit Keter's wall like the very wrath of the Heavens. Light flared, blinding and burning as the Ram fought to pierce into the rampart, and I caught sight of spurts of stone flying like drops of water before I was forced to look away.

Just in time, for the explosion that followed was powerful enough its breath sent tents flying behind us.

Shielding my eye with my palm more by habit than need, I risked a look at the rampart and let out a shocked breath.

"Merciless Gods," I whispered.

The wall had been savaged. Miles of stone had been slagged down to the foundation, the melted remains trickling down the edge of the cliff and into the drop. The streets behind the wall had been ravaged by broken and heated chunks of stone, looking as if a rain of sharpeners had been dropped across them, and though I could see soldiers swarming the sheer amount of damage was staggering. Just as we had hoped, the Blessed Artificer had blown us a path open into Keter. One that would not be the enemy's narrow killing zones on the bridges, nowhere as heavily defended. And they'll have to keep defending those while we strike here, else we'll punch through.

A heartbeat later the Dead King collapsed both bridges, but I smiled against the strap of my helmet. We'd been waiting for that: sorcery bloomed, Akua and the Witch keeping the broken bridges aloft and usable. We'd learned from our first defeat. I laughed, unsheathing my sword and raising high, as all around me the Army of Callow cheered loudly enough to echo across the sky. Keter's impregnable wall, reduced in a moment. My soldiers felt fires in their belly again.

"Begin," I shouted, and it rippled out.

The melted stone was not yet cooled, but we did not have time to waste. The longer the Dead King got to prepare against our landing, the more brutal securing that beachhead was going to get. Zombie let out a loud cry, wings spreading as I spurred her on to take flight. I glided over the Army of Callow as the First, Third and Fourth brought forward their bridges. They rose up in their air like poles, carefully aimed to the calculations of the sappers overseeing the effort, and then after a push gravity took its toll. They toppled forward, falling all in a row. Not that Keter was to let us land so easily. Magic bloomed ahead, but those I left to Masego. When I guided Zombie into a glide, staff in hand as I called on Night, it was to meet another threat: the great wyrm that was tearing through houses and streets to get to the breach. The great abomination of bone and leathery skin screeched, but I shouted back.

"Crows take you," I snarled, "and burn."

Black fire erupted from the tip of my staff, growing from a trickle to a torrent to a burning river as it struck the massive snake construct in the side. Magic whizzed around me, but none came close: all that would have hit suddenly changed trajectory, Hierophant slapping them away with Wreath. I grit my teeth and kept letting the Night flow through me even as my veins cooled and sweat beaded my brow, Zombie's long wings taking us into a smooth circling glide. I finally killed the working and lowered my staff, just in time to take my mount into a dive as Keter's first ballistas were brought into position and began firing on me.

I got a look at the wyrm first, though, and grinned fiercely: it wouldn't going anywhere.

Even with all the power I'd pumped through I'd only incinerated half of the construct, but it was quite beyond moving. It pissed me off a little that it'd still managed to accomplish part of its' objective – wedge its body between the falling bridges and the ground – but barely a third of our crossings had been blocked with the move.

"Priests will clean up the rest of it," I told Zombie, leaning against her neck. "Come on, we're going with the first wave."

Some brave souls from all three commands in the Army of Callow had begun the daunting work set out before them: crossing the chasm atop the steel bridges. We'd aimed for a wideness of three soldiers to be able to pass through each bridge at a time, for a total of ninety-nine legionaries at a time across all bridges. Much as Juniper would have preferred more, the amount of steel this had taken was already astronomical. Zombie's took us under the bridges, layering stripes of shadow and light against the cliffs surrounding me on both sides, and after passing the last I guided my mount into taking us up. What I saw as I turned to look at our assault gave me pause.

It was a massacre.

My soldiers had made it halfway through the bridges before enemy fire began to fall on them, but now that it had... Arrows and scorpion bolts shot out in hails, stones from scorpions and streaks of sorcery smashing through shields like they were made of paper. I wasted no time, spurring Zombie back into the fight, and began striking at the enemy – siege engines first, they were hardest to replace. It wasn't going great.

"Fuck," I snarled, dropping low to avoid another curse.

Already a full archer's volley was falling on my position, the impossibly precise coordination between the dead setting up the sequence perfectly. Zombie was already diving but we had to spin to avoid twin ballista bolts – one skidded off the edge of my armour, another took a few feathers off her side – and we were forced to take refuge under the bridges for the second time before flying back up the other side. I'd torched two ballistas and an archer's nest, but the enemy was using its mages to shield against my Night workings. I guided Zombie back up and flew through a hail of arrows, swatting them aside with a burst of Night, and hammered at a ballista jutting out from some half-broken temple. The black flames washed over the shield, but a heartbeat later Hierophant wrested the defence away and I let out a snarl of triumph.

Without Masego covering me, though, the swarm of curses had me forced to drop below again.

I rose on the opposite side for another pass, but when we tried the same trick I found that the flames still didn't go through: the undead mages had layered the shields into two different spells. Fuck. They'd figured out the weakness of the aspect, then. Hierophant could take from more than one source of magic, but that meant splitting focus. On an artefact that was fine, but when there were other wills fighting him? They'd shut down our trick. I had to drop again, a glance telling me that our assault had stalled halfway through the chasm: soldiers were dying too fast to get further.

Another pass, and I went at it differently: I attacked the grounds around the ballista instead, shattering stone with entropy. Mixed results: knocked the ballista down but it wasn't destroyed, and Masego had to cover me from a mass of enemy magic as Zombie dove. On the next pass, the dead got even more clever on us. They began holding back the release of their rituals, letting them loose when I attacked so that Masego was forced to handle them instead of help me. I almost let out a scream of frustration.

"This is going nowhere," I breathed out, forcing myself to calm down.

And it had gotten there, by the looks of it: the bridges were almost clear, the last legionaries still on them try to get off.

Not a single man had gotten to the other side, and my soldiers were no longer trying to pass.

Well... shit

Darkening

Yeah, without a named leading those soldiers down in the thick of it, no way they charge through the teeth of that. Need a knight to bolster their courage and give the charge enough providence to thin the dying enough for them to get a beachhead. Like back when hanno charged black's army and barely lost a man despite hundreds of crossbowmen.

Linnus42

True also doesn't DK have an entire moat of some sort around Keter. So yeah blasting a hole in the wall is great but they still need bridges to cross to the other side. Which means DK can still exploit a bottleneck and funnels, its just not nearly as easy once they cross to the other side to keep them bunched up.

Honestly, though they need to change the game. DK just has to stall for time and not lose which makes his job way easier. He aint losing if the plan is charge across the bridges even if they can hold them up. Named leading the charge is a good place to start. Still this means according to Cordelia at least they need their next major offensive to actually work.

We still have the Gigantes waiting in the wind. I don't expect the Elves to do much to help if they show up it will be dead last.

Darkening

The elves getting the spring crown is a hanging thread. And there'll probably be some forced mirroring between that crown and whatever happens with the autumn crown they want to give DK. And yeah, there's the fallout from hanno's appeal to the riddle maker gigantes guy. If that actually comes to something it'd probably be a good push for hanno to accept his new name since he actually did accomplish something. After all that, the only uninvolved group on the continent is the chain of hunger, so clearly they'll defeat the dead king only for a downer ending where everyone is eaten by skaven.

Mirror Night

You know I suppose I should give EE credit here. I think its fairly well known I wasn't really fan of how Praesi Arc ended for Akua. I thought it was anti-climatic and she could have just taken control of Praes then and there and shaped it how she wanted after her walkabout through the local populace, shift towards healer and general interactions with Kendi. Instead to my mind she ended replaying plot line that we already seen really more will she want she with Cat? More indecision over whether she should seal DK. I am not going to go over my wider issues again.

I also wasn't a fan of how that Warden of the West ended. Cause again there really wasn't any evolution for Hanno. I mean Hakram saw an issue stepped up and followed the seeming theme of "If not now then When" but for Hanno he basically ended up right back at the start. Traded a Choir for Cat and got slapped down from exerting political influence in a rather messy way that seemed like a wasted arc. Where right after Klaus died in the aftermath it seemed he be going one way and ended up going nowhere in my book with him being naive and unable to mount good arguments. While being much more pro Cordelia in my book.

But now it does seem EE is going to get somewhere I like more and do a pretty good job. Perhaps, I was too quick to judge though in my defense that is kinda the nature of this webnovel format with its small numerous updates as opposed to a big book at once, you can only judge with the material you got and I didn't especially like the material I got. So props to him for that especially considering he is battling Covid to deliver this product. Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

Onos

Well, maybe that's a lesson learned – trust an author who's brought you this far.

Mirror Night

I don't believe in blind trust. Also for instance, I still hate the Everdark arc and that is not going to change.

I think though I will stick with my current approach. I will be effusive with the praise and scathing with the criticism as is my way. Anything less in my book would be a betrayal of trust. EE can count on me to not sugarcoat things and always shoot straight.

gingerlygrump

I hate the Everdark arc, too, it I think my issues with it are not the story itself. EE's chapter release schedule back then was too much pressure on him, 3x a week is a lot of work to produce in a short time. The longer chapters released twice a week have been and continue to be where he really shines.

Mirror Night

Perhaps though my issue was more Cat being massively disconnected from most of the cast, the whole plot feeling kinda repetitive in terms of interactions, Cat being at her worse personality wise (I mean I suppose to root for a would be mass slaver?), and me finding everything happening elsewhere with other characters (in the interludes) far more interesting and engaging

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah but he doesn't need that from you. He knows how the story goes and bluntly, you and I and the rest of this group have done very little to alter that course (nor should we). You talk about being upset with the lack of resolution on arcs that are incomplete, which of course are not resolved! What's the point of such criticism?

Stephen Marsh

I really liked the Everdark arc—but then I was at TSR when the Drow were released.

Arden

Oh wow, you are from the original writers of D&D in the 70' and 80' Right?

I liked the everdark arc too, and generally all the firstborn culture in these books.

shikkarasu

After 6 Books of consistently blowing (most of) us out of the water, I wouldn't call our trust of EE 'blind'. I think the only 2 things that didn't sit great with me were the Ranger Vs Students story in Ater being just a little rushed/hard to follow and the Epic Rap Battles of the Drow only showing up 5 minutes before Cat needed to use them as inspiration. Across 6.5 years that's an amazing track record and I will continue to bet on EE pulling another rabbit; that hat should have been empty long ago, but that's never made a difference before.

Miles

TLDR Mirror Night creates an excuse to whine about the story yet again, because some minor detail didn't go the direction he demanded, way back when.

He's at the $0.005 level on patreon and therefore very important and is entitled to creative control over other peoples' work.

Mirror Night

Talk to me Miles when EE bothers to actually respond to one of your comments. He actually knows who I am and listens to my advice which is more then can be said for you and most of my detractors.

I am not under any delusions I am super relevant...EE is the Sun but compared to him I am an Elephant and you well I am not sure you even rise to the level of a single cell organism.

Titan

Lmao you are surreal, Mirror Knight. I would recommend you sit down and read a book to relax, but we all know how you get after reading.

Insanenoodlyguy

And this makes you think you are important? I'm doubting you in the first place, mind, but even if this is 100% true, and there is some post out there where EE goes "thank you Mirror Knight I value your input so much" that in no way invalidates the optionions of others and makes them more or less valid. Hell it doesn't even make your opinion more or less valid.

What I can say is this post makes you look incredibly arrogant, apropos to the character your name refers too.

calliope

> EE is the Sun but compared to him I am an Elephant and you well I am not sure you even rise to the level of a single cell organism.

i bet this sounded way better in your large, cavernously empty head dude lol workshop your angry replies a little bit before you post, it'll make them less funny to your... detractors (?)

(or more funny idk what angle you're going for here honestly)

Konstantin von Karstein

I wonder what kind of Name Hanno would accept. Probably a new one.

Well, Neshamah really is the worst😏 No wonder no Crusade ever took Keter.

RoflCat

Judge, imo (would also be the biggest walk away from "I do not judge")

Recall for checking past precedence.

Counsel for the people he's dealing with currently, with a leaning on trying to help rather than punish.

Sentence for making the decision.

Miles

I hope it's a pun that makes Cat irrationally angry every time she hears it.

caoimhinh

I think he really will be White Knight again, but realize that while his Name is the same, his Role will be something different this time.

Insanenoodlyguy

Pale armored noble horse rider! A new name for a new age. Second aspect is "why the hell were you so Stubborn look what convoluted crap you made us do"

Cpt. Obvious

He has a perfectly good name, but I doubt he would dare to admit that it's Shiny Boots. Indrani would bust a gut, not necessarily her own, hearing that...

edrey

well, it's a nightmare, nothing less expected of keter i was expecting the machines of the dwarfs but maybe next chapter

Captain Amazing

You know, if there ever was a time for offensive use of Still Water, now would be it.

308924810a

Well.. yes?

Once firepower gets beyond a certain point casualties jump way up. Disproportionately compared to the casualties armies would have been used to taking in going over the walls of less defended castles.

The early-modern military solution to this is either just being determined to feed more men into the breach until the attacker wins, or calling up the defender and negotiating a surrender that wouldn't devastate both forces. But once there's a breach it should be possible to force it, so long as the confrontation remains conventional and the attacking army doesn't lose its nerve.

Mary Gentle

Mining. For the best approach you mine under a castle's walls, fill the tunnels with gunpowder, and then drop down the walls with an almighty boom. Saves you getting all your troops killed assaulting walls.

...But unfortunately there's just a leetle problem with doing that here.

Cat's difficulty is one she knows well: defence is always much stronger than attack, just by virtue of being defence. Especially dug-in defence with how many traps waiting?

All those lives and not even a beachhead, yet. You have to wonder what's waiting for them on the inside. The more I think about it, the more I think this can't be solved by frontal attacks. Not as things stand...

I used not to like Hanno at all, but I'm warming to him. Even if he is theoretically on the side of good.

Konstantin von Karstein

If the DK has more than 2 neurons (or whatever), there will be archers, javeliners and mages on each roofs and at all windows as well as wards and traps on all streets. That's not counting the devils, constructs and Revenants ready to ambush the attackers.

Imo, trying to do a frontal assault is doomed to failure. Named or not, there's no way the mortal soldiers can go in there without getting mauled. Maybe having Still Water could help, but that won't be enough.

Insanenoodlyguy

Don't underestimate a named leading w charge. That kind of momentum can and has carried armies before.

Xinci

Considering Benevolent said something similar with his whole "Own what you are, no matter how ugly the face of it" line, Cat took a rather strangely ironic stance for a Villain on Hanno saying that one should always be willing to self-reflect. It is also kind of exactly the opposite of "It is a dangerous thing to fear self-examination." meant in her case, but that may be Cats blinders getting the best of her.

It's not surprising that Hanno hasn't transitioned beyond the White Knight, since in the end its not like he truly delved into himself or went through the depths of identity dealing with Recall while also seeking out even more experiences to grow come what may. ie. Even if he was willing to act, he didn't take the simpler in some ways but the far harder road for growth that's available to him.

It looks like they will need ever clever schemes or rather wanton bravery to get across that barrier...almost like a surprise charge from a spot that it should be unfeasible from?

Juff

Typo Thread:

last of tea > last of the tea got up so > got up to tall a broad > tall and broad Judgement had > Judgement, had troubles does > troubles do with get > will get do was reach > do is reach thought was now > fought was now (or missing words) horses on carriage > horses on a carriage al the > all the the Creation > that Creation looked way > looked away least unleashed > last unleashed of her > off her Hierophan's > Hierophant's pierced into > pierce into raising high > raising it high their air > the air form the > from the wouldn't going > wouldn't be going its' > its Zombie's took > Zombie's dive took

Hargabga

Good question though: where are all the Named? Like yeah, we got usual heavy hitters, but that's just a power and power Keter could always much blow for blow and more. We need stories to tip the scales. Like, you know, literally the only thing DK fears? Where's the Princess leading the charge, where's a band of rambunctious youngsters going YOLO, where's all of that? They fight it like it's your average war instead of a metaphysical debate between New Order and the Old in which living people are just props. It's literally the battle of Liesse Accords. Cat is trying to prove that no matter how powerful you are, if everyone else unites they'll be stronger. This will be an Ur-Example for the ages about what Named can and cannot do. It should be all story-fu.

agumentic

The earlier they send in the Named, the earlier their stories are spent and DK kills them. For all the trouble the walls are causing them, they are just the first line of defence. The command will send the bands if there is no other way, but they are trying to preserve them.

Adrian V

At least without the wall they have a more clear line of fire, as in they can throw magic, munitions, etc to clear away the area before hand, even if they don't have the Ram anymore if Adanna makes a lesser version of what is basically a magical missile they can now aim behind the walls.

And no mention of the dwarven army here, its possible they have more than 1 usefull toy

Mary Gentle

I forget because it's a while since I read it, but how big is the dead city? You won't hit all of it from beyond the walls, or from just inside the walls.

It's been grim so far, but if it gets down to fighting in the city – there's a reason every army on the planet and throughout history hates street fighting. It's trap after trap, with more trap sprinkled on top, as we've seen Cat do before now.

Plus the problem that most armies in our world don't have: as soon as the Grand Armee start dying in the city, they become the Dead King's soldiers. You're not just killing your own; you're adding to your enemy's forces.

OK, so we have the autumn crown to come, and the Giants, and maybe some help from the dwarves in addition to food . . .

Actually, that isn't the thing that bothers me most. It's that the more the non-dead army fights the Dead King, the more like heroes the Grand Armee become. I don't think I'm ready to give up on wanting the villains to win. I don't want DK to be the only option for a villain victory.

Miles

"always returning to that night of green flames and red hands"

I'm gonna need you to be a whole lot more specific

Darkening

You know, the one where she stabbed a guy.

Bad@games

The one time were cat got blamed for the goblin fire, ya know

Bad@games

Guys hear me out here.... Undead suicide goats. Its now or never. Get the undead you control up in there, packed with goblinfire or something and boom.

Oktarine

I don't understand. Why didn't they construct the bridges with walls, like a U shape? That would have saved thousands of lives. Unless...

"Thirty heartbeats passed. Then the dead on the bridge started to rise.

The cries of dismay from the alliance changed tone as the fresh undead began to march on Keter.

Impervious to arrow and curse, the corpses of the living made war on the corpses of the dead."

Hmm...

jamesc9

> the ozone scent of magic filled the air.

That's new. As far as I remember, we haven't been told that Keter's Due had a characteristic smell before. It's entirely plausible; that's what you tend to get, if you dump the right amount of energy into an oxidising atmosphere.

Lord Haart

I've definitely read the ozone smell before, though not 100% sure it was in PGTE.

Chapter 58: Mud

"Invading Callow is like stepping on a porcupine: do it long enough and it shall be crushed, but one should expect to lose the foot."

– First Princess Clarisse Merovins

Juniper looked like she wanted to bite someone's head off, and it was not impossible she would before the day ended.

"They were already retreating," my marshal admitted. "I called the retreat myself so it would be in order instead of a rout."

So mostly to save face, I thought with a grimace. All attempts to cross the bridges had ceased, a sight that had my stomach clenching in fear and unease. The longer we let the Dead King dig in on the other side, the worse this would get. I thought it pretty telling that no serious attempt had been made to destroy our bridges yet. Sorcery was still traded back and forth, filling the sky with streaks of colour and eerie shrieks, but so far the enemy had not even tried turning their ballistae on our forces this side of the chasm.

"We need to punch through," I bluntly said. "If we don't the battle's good as lost."

The attacks through the last two stone bridges were going to get shredded if we didn't draw enemy forces with our own push and the Praesi had orders not to commit their forces before we had a beachhead inside Keter's walls.

"I know that, Catherine," the Hellhound growled. "You think I don't? But I also know that if I give the order it won't be obeyed."

I grit my teeth.

"I know casualties are-"

"We've lost almost two thousand already," Juniper evenly said.

The number gave me pause. Gods. That many?

"It hasn't even been an hour," I numbly said.

"Those bridges are pure murder," the Marshal of Callow replied. "I ordered a push with mages putting up shields and all it did was draw ballista fire. The only saving grace is that the bodies fall instead of block the way."

It obscured how many we'd lost, too. At least to some extent. Men who'd been three companies back when the battle started were going to notice they were now the frontline because everyone in front was dead.

"We need to commit Named," Juniper said. "Can Hierophant cover our advance?"

Still feeling numb, I clumsily undid the clasp of my helmet. My face was covered in sweat and dirt, too-warm locks of hair falling over it when I took off the helm.

"Not without fucking over another front," I said. "If he protects our advance, he's not countering enemy rituals."

I spat to the side, fruitlessly trying to get the taste of iron out of my mouth.

"How's the Blessed Artificer?" I asked.

"Back on her feet, it was just a bump," Juniper said. "You think she can run interference for us?"

"I think she's the only heavy hitter left that's not already committed," I said, "so it's her or no one."

"I'll send for her," Juniper replied, then hesitated.

"Speak your mind," I said.

The tall orc looked uncomfortable.

"It won't be enough to get them to take the bridges again," she said. "Not after the slaughter they just went through."

Brushing sweaty hair off my dead eye – my ponytail was fraying – I turned to the Army of Callow. Juniper's command tent was well situated, overlooking the offensive while boasting both a solid set of wards and room for me to land Zombie. She was still back there, tied to a post. An army, I had thought more than once, was like a large beast. It had a breath to it, lungs and veins and blood. It could be angered or wounded, made brave or craven. And though I did not have it in me to call any of these men and women who had followed me halfway across the world cowards, I watched those shifting ranks and saw the fight had just been beaten out of them.

Twice now every assault on the walls of Keter had failed and now they were asking themselves an ugly question: could they be breached at all?

They weren't sure, not anymore, and in a battle like this that was as bad as thinking it couldn't be done. Once you doubted, the whistle of every arrow was a dirge and the glint on the enemy's blade as the promise of death. Like a worm in an apple, the doubt was eating my army alive.

"My fault," I quietly said.

Juniper turned to glare at me.

"I don't know what you've gotten in your head but-"

"My fault," I repeated, in a tone that brooked no contradiction. "I've been fighting this battle mounted, Hellhound. That's not what it takes to win a slog like this."

I clenched my armoured fist.

"Blood and mud," I said. "It always comes down to the blood and mud, doesn't it?"

I pulled my helmet back down on my head. Juniper glared at me.

"Recklessness won't bring us victory," she said.

I secured the clasp, pulled at it to make sure it'd stay in place. The gesture was familiar, almost comforting. How many times had I done this before? Gods, how long had I begun to? I smiled at her, unable to help it.

"Do you remember the first war game we ever had, you and I?" I asked.

She snorted.

"Ratface and I had a war game," Juniper corrected. "You were just some bum with a sword that took command after I beat him."

My smile widened into a grin.

"I still remember how godawful furious you were, when I used my Name to leap over that log trap," I said. "You snarled 'what the Hells was that?' and-"

"And you replied: 'me, winning'," Juniper finished, almost smiling. "I remember."

I looked at the broken walls of the Crown of the Dead, the empire of horrors that still awaited beyond it.

"Come a long way, haven't we?" I softly said.

"All the way to the end of the world," the Hellhound replied, baring her fangs.

She had that look in her eye that'd made me want her from the start, even when we'd just been kids playing at war in the Tower's shadow. The one that was all flint and iron, that said the soul behind it would rather snap than bend. I raised my arm, offered it, and after a heartbeat of hesitation she took it. An old legionary's salute.

"The army's yours," I said. "You know the plans."

Her face tightened, emotions flickering across it too quickly for me to read. Her grip tightened around my arm.

"It's a fool thing, what you do," Juniper of the Red Shields said, voice hoarse. "It's a damned fool thing, and I can't even shout at you for it."

She released my arm as if the armour had burned it.

"Warlord," Juniper said.

My staff I raised, then slammed it down. Though it was only dead yew and beneath it was stone, it parted for the wood like water. It was stuck in the stone and would stay there until I took it up again.

"Hellhound," I replied.

And without another word, I went down into the crowd. Into the ranks. My eye wandered, looking for something, and found it. A boy, about my height, and as I opened my mouth I recognized with a start that I knew him.

"Edgar, isn't it?"

"Ma'am, yes," the boy – no, it'd been years, the young man now – hastily saluted. "And I'm a sergeant now, ma'am."

"So I see," I replied, glancing at the stripes.

He swelled at the words.

"I need another favour of you, Sergeant Edgar," I said. "I must borrow a shield."

He did not hesitate, I saw with something that was neither quite pride nor grief, for a moment. Without batting an eye he offered it, even helping me slide in my arm.

"Won't do no good on your monster crow, though," Sergeant Edgar noted. "It's a footman's shield, ma'am."

"Then it's exactly what I need," I replied.

He paused, and others did around us. Neither of us were trying to stay quiet, and the press of soldiers was close. Murmurs rippled out.

"Get another before you go in," I said, clapping his shoulder with affection. "Fortune be with you, Sergeant Edgar."

"Hells," the young man grinned, "that'd be a first."

Hard, satisfied laughter followed. I let it carry me forward. One limping step after another, I crossed the sea of legionaries. Eyes followed me as if I were a falling star, hands reaching out shyly to touch my shield or the hem of my cloak as I passed. And I felt it move with me. Something like a shiver, a physical tremor going through the great beast that was my army. I was there, among them. Word of it passed from lip to ear, moving so quickly that before long the soldiers ahead me were already looking my way. I did not hurry my limp, because hurrying would do no good. When I reached the edge of the camp, the edge of the cliff, when I rose the steps to the beginning of the bridge and turned, I found a sea of faces awaiting me.

Above us a clouded, hellish sky lit up with the eerie lights of war sorcery. The distant eruptions of power were like a broken breeze, just enough to have the banners moving. First Army. Fourth Army. And, standing before me, the Third. The vanguard of my every victory, which I had named Dauntless for that unflinching bravery.

"I won't lie to you," I told them, Name strengthening my voice for all to hear. "There's death ahead."

None were surprised. They had seen too many of their friends killed to be.

"They'll come for us with fire and storm," I said. "With every horrible trick they've been waiting to unleash. The moment it looks like we might win, they'll unleash the Hells until the broken gates are left swinging in the wind."

I breathed out.

"And still I ask it of you," I said. "To march. To bleed. To die, until we've crossed the deep and rammed death back down the Dead King's throat."

There were no cheers at that. It was not a boast I'd offered them, something to laugh about. They all knew what it would cost to get there.

"I won't blame you if you run," I told them, "even though there's nowhere left to run. We're all a long way from home."

I looked at them, and I saw in their eyes that they did not want to fight. They loved me, I thought, but still they did not want to fight.

"But if we don't win here we'll bring down the world with us," I said, "so I'll be crossing that bridge."

Murmurs bloomed, low and urgent. The shield on my arm was hard to miss.

"And I know it's more than a queen can ask," I called out, "but I ask it anyway."

My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched.

"You trusted me through Dormer and the Camps, through Maillac's Boot and Four Armies," I said, "through Arcadia and the Wasteland and every misbegotten bit of land a soldier's ever died on."

Gods, where had I not dragged them? They had even bled beyond Creation, as if Calernia was too small a field for them to die on.

"Trust me once more," I asked. "Follow me into the breach, through dark and ruin until we come out on the other side."

Maybe one day they'd call me a soldier queen, but the truth of it was simpler: I was queen of soldiers. I'd spent more time in the saddle than on my throne, pawing off the intricacies of rules to one regent after another as I went off to scatter Callow's enemies. They might have crowned me in Laure, anointed me and said the words, but my real kingdom stood before me: banners and steel.

The Army of Callow.

"You and I against the rest of the fucking world, one last time."

In the distance lightning crackles, exploded in a burst of light, and as ash fell from the sky like rain I stood before a sea of soldiers that would not look me in the eye. Silence hung in the air like pestilence, and the longer it lasted the harder my stomach clenched. It would not be broken, I realized. They would not gather their courage, raise the banners and follow me again. All my life I had wondered – feared, hoped for – the moment where I would finally ask too much of my soldiers. When they would at last balk, hold back the loyalty that had kept me on my feet long before I'd begun using a staff. So here it was, I thought, at long last. You lasted until the end, I thought, looking at them. There is no shame in this.

But I had a duty, and I had sworn an oath: whether they be gods or kings or all the armies of Creation. So I unsheathed my sword, slowly, and raised it to them in a salute.

"Be proud," I told them, meaning every word. "You reached the edge of the world."

And I turned my back to them. One limping step down the bridge after another, the steel clanging against my boots. Three, five, ten. In the distance a pair of ballistae were aimed, and I saw the flicker of movement. Gritting my teeth, I pulled on Night and let it loose through my veins. I slashed at the air, darkness trailing in my sword's wake as a streak of Night slapped aside the stones that would have torn right through my body. I squared my shield, straightened my back and began moving again. Simple, I thought, I just had to keep it simple. There was only the enemy ahead, nothing else in all of Creation.

One more step. Always one more step, until I made it all the way to the other side.

“DAUNTLESS!”

My steps stuttered, but I could not let myself be distracted. Far ahead, a nest of mages loosed in my direction a ritual that was as a crawling wave of grey. I pulled on Night again, smashing a pillar of pure black into the spell and twisting my will. The working sucked in the magic before detonating, breaking the spell formula with it.

“DAUNTLESS!”

The shout came again, and this time more voices picked it up. I limped forward, shield up, as the world narrowed in front of me. I walked a span of steel three men wide, without railings or anything that would stop a single misstep from seeing you fall to your death. Lines of it stretched to my right and left, like teeth cutting at the void below us. Sorcery bloomed ahead, cabals of mages that were little more than bones and burning green sorcery shaping mounds of curses or frost. Gods, the numbers were overwhelming and I hadn't even reached arrow range yet.

“Sve Noc,” I prayed in Crepuscular. “My enemies are many and their wrath is great: grant me ruin, that I may deal it out to them in your name.”

I twitched, Night bubbling up my veins, and let out a hoarse shout as shadows ripped themselves out of my back, fleeing the cover of my cloaks in flocks. Crows that were as shards of darkness took flight by the hundreds, spreading out in a wave that flew heedless into the enemy's sorcery. My lip tasted of blood and I wiped it with the back of my gauntlet, spitting the rest into the chasm. One more step, I reminded myself. In the distance, the crows plunged into the spells and faded like morning mist – tainting every spell they touched, eating away at them from the inside. How many more of those did I have in me? Enough, I told myself. I would have enough.

My fingers were slick with sweat, my aketon soaked under the plate. Flakes of ash stuck to my face, to the wet cloth covering my dead eye, but still I advanced. My bad leg burned, throbbed with every step, but the pain was an old friend.

The ballistae had been silent, and now I saw why: they had been repositioned, awaiting the moment to fire a full volley. Only it wasn't on me that the stones and bolts were fired. The machines spat out death at my bridge, but at others too. And I could not resist the glance, even knowing it would shatter my calm. Behind me, the Third Army's banner flew in the wind and legionaries advanced. Tight ranks, shields up and faces grim. But they had come, marching down the lines of steel that were as a road straight to death, and my heart clenched at the sight of it. Always the Third, dauntless to the end. I would not let that trust go betrayed.

I thrust up my sword, Night already welling up inside me.

"I bring the word of the two-faced goddess," I said.

Night swirled above me, sweeping up into the sky as a raging wind, and like a blade piercing the Heavens my working pierced the clouds. Arm trembling from the effort, I pulled down my sword and the rest of the sky with it.

"And that word is no," I hissed.

Wind and clouds raged, a river drawn across the bridges like a stroke of paint, and the projectiles were swallowed whole. I released the working, panting as shivers of exhaustion went down my spine. I'd ripped a hole in the clouds, and through it the light of day shone. The sunlight found the rain of ashes, bathing in pale, and I might almost have thought it was snowing. In the distance I heard hoarse cheers, but there was a closer noise. Boots on steel. Legionaries catching up to me. And with them, on the too-warm wind, came one last sound drifting up to my ears.

"The knights will get the glory

The king will keep his throne."

I was not sure whether to laugh or weep, so instead I kept my eyes ahead. One more step, I swore, and limped forward.

"We won't be in the story

Our names will not be known."

Sorcery swelled ahead, but the sky screamed out and streaks of pale lightning struck down at the enemy mages. No, not lightning – Light. The Blessed Artificer had come out to fight. Cheers sounded again. One more step, I prayed, and through the raining ash advanced.

"So pick up your sword, boy

Here they come again

And down here in the mud-"

"It's us who holds the line," I whispered.

One more step and all the Hells opened: arrow range. I was halfway through. They had massed archers and crossbowmen while we waited, crammed every skeleton upright and able to aim in thick lines covering every bit of stone they had to spare. They released all at once, with impossibly perfect timing, and death flew out in a swarm. I pulled deep on Night, blade wreathed in darkness, and slashed away. Behind us a great javelin of Light flew out, and as captains screamed out orders the Army of Callow loosed a wave of massed fireballs.

It wasn't enough.

I hacked away at the arrows in front of us, even covering the bridges to my sides, but others flew in arcs above and there were simply too many to cover. Steel punctured shields, ripped into flesh, toppled soldiers screaming into the void.

"The Princes take the Vales

The Tyrant is at the Gate

Our crops wither and fail,

The enemy's host is great."

The line wavered, I could feel it buckling. But I kept advancing so they did too – voices rising defiantly to add to the song. The storm of arrows was not the danger of a single breath. It was a doom in three beats, as again and again the enemy went through the same movements: nock, pull, loose. The dead did not tire or hesitate, only missing a shot when a string strapped and needed to be replaced. And so death came for us in waves, relentless. A shot skittered off the side of my shield, another grazed my cheek and I could barely move quickly enough to gather Night to me.

"Mages, forward," went up the cry, and soon shields bloomed in front of us, but like before they attracted attention.

Ballistae concentrated fire on the visible targets that were the translucent panes of magic, shattering them were arrows failed. The line was buckling again, and even for me to take a single step forward was like wading against a river's current. We were failing again. I was already tired, more than I should be, but what point is there in hoarding power when we were about to lose? I took a step forward, almost swallowing my tongue for the burning pain of my leg, and clumsily ripped at the straps keeping my shield on my arm. Arrows fell, but I had a guardian of my own: a ball of blue flame formed in front of me, spinning and expanding to swallow all the projectiles before it burned out. Masego was protecting me

Then it was on me to protect everyone else.

I threw away the shield, hearing it rattle against the edge of the bridge and vanish into the dark, and I breathed out deeply. In and out, steady. Seizing too much Night when I was exhausted could make me throw up otherwise.

"So pick up your sword, boy

Here they come again

And down here in the mud

It's us who holds the line."

I dug deep. Until my breath came out mist for the cold inside my veins, until light began to hurt my eyes and I could hear my heart beating like a drum against my ears. I'd done many a powerful working of Night, in my time, but this one would be different. It was not the First Under the Night walking down that bridge, the highest priestess of Night. I was the Warden, come to bring order to the madness, and so it was not black flame or curses I was calling on. Keter thought to cowing me by unleashing one monster after another, by sowing a field of death.

But I'd brought my own, made of every death I owned.

"Rise," I snarled, hand pulling up, and for a moment there was nothing at all.

Then the shadows beneath the bridges, the dark nestled beneath the cliffs, began to boil over. Strands of darkness shot out, thick tendrils of Night, and they gathered like a river to the sea. Above my head a shape began to form, and though Keter unleashed storms of sorcery to shatter it the Hierophant allowed not a speck of magic to pass. Watching it was seeing an artist at work: curses turned into flame, which burned acid into smoke, which coiled into tendrils choking out green light. A single will cascaded down a line of spells, breaking them with the same exquisite grace of a duellist's perfect killing stroke. Again and again, the man who had once been the Apprentice got the best of them. And with every moment he bought me, every ballista the Blessed Artificer shattered in a burst of Light, the shape above me grew. Swelled, until it stood so tall it blocked out the sun.

A river of arrows was fired into the dark, disappearing as if they'd been dropped in a well.

And when the storms of sorcery broke, the smoke scattered and the ash-wind broke, facing the enemy was a behemoth of a monster. Mine, my Beast. It was shaped as a wolf would be, if shadows cast on a wall by a scared child: too sinuous, its impossible large maw bristling with teeth. It was my old companion, the breath of the back of my neck and the laughter in my ear. The monster I'd built out of a hundred thousand corpses, sown across battlefields from the east to the west. I'd built on my throne atop a mountain of dead soldiers but today, just this once, the throne would give back. Monstrous maw opening wide, the great beast of Night breathed in the air of Creation like it was savouring it. Behind me my men had halted, but I turned back and offered them a wild grin.

"FORWARD," I shouted. "FORWARD AND FOLLOW ME!"

The Beast began to laugh, and Gods though it was a terrible the terror was on our side. I limped forward, breaking into a pained run, and ahead of me the monster charged.

"Man the walls," my legionaries sang as they followed, "bare the steel."

Sorcery screamed, ballistae fired and a howling volley of arrows disappeared into the Beast's body. I quickened my steps, a hoarse shout ripping itself clear of my lungs – as much pain as glee.

"Hoist the banner, raise the shield."

The Beast tumbled into the enemy, crushing undead with every step and laughing as it swallowed whole a siege engine. We ran, ran as fast as we could, knowing that the opportunity would not knock twice. Two thirds through, and then more. We were so close.

"A free death they cannot steal."

Rituals bloomed again, and enemy archers began took aim at us again instead of wasting their arrows on my monster – which was tearing them apart with tooth and claw, ravaging their tightly packed lines. Steel broadheads began to fall on us again, taking blood and lives, but the run had taken on momentum. It did not slow even when bodies began to drop.

"When we meet them on the field."

I felt Masego try to West the enemy's rituals but there were just too many. Great thorns of sickly green magic were shot in the Beast's belly, and though it screamed and clawed at all around it I could feel something hollowing out my working from the inside. I was not the only one on the field who knew how to make use of ruin. The Beast began to fall apart piece by piece, howling and clawing at the enemy as it did, and as my boots hit the bridge the heart of it faded into mist. A heartbeat later I took another step, and instead of steel I touched stone.

I had crossed, and my army was mere feet behind me.

"So pick up your sword, boy

Here they come again

And down here in the mud

It's us who holds the line."

And as the song died, the Army of Callow followed me into dark and ruin. I laughed and slammed into a skeleton, cutting through bow and string and neck. It collapsed like a stringless puppet. The enemy had been waiting for us, but we'd caught them flatfooted and the Beast had put them in disarray. They'd not had time to redeploy, so as I tore into a line of archers sword in hand I felt the heavies of the Third Army crack those lines like an egg. Heading unseen orders the skeletons tried to retreat, scampering up slopes and through broken houses, but we swept through them like a tide.

"Mages," I shouted, parrying a blow and returning a vicious riposte.

The skeleton's head broke under the pommel, shattering clean and killing it.

"Mages, fire on the ballistae," I shouted again.

They obeyed and fire burned bright, the enemy's engines finally silenced. A wave of steel swelled behind me and we smashed our way through archers and crossbowmen until there were none left to smash. Behind there were proper fighters, skeletons in armour with swords and axes and shields, but even charging uphill the momentum was with us. We'd break through, past this breach and into Keter. That was why I could already feel the coming, I thought. The Scourges. But it wouldn't matter, not a whit, because we weren't done either. As Keter mustered its horrors and my men drove back the dead, pushing forth the beachhead, long shadows fell on us all. Between us and the sun flew great fortresses, bristling with soldiers and mages.

The last gasps of the Dread Empire of Praes had come to make war.

Liliet

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA

ninegardens

AAAAAAAAaaaaaaaaAA!

TRUELIKEtheRIVER

[illegible]

zenanii

[illegible]

Axel Rafael

[illegible]

Isi Arnott-Campbell

AA

Inay

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAH!!!!!!!!!!

Dominic

I COME FROM THE LAND OF THE ICE AND SNOW WITH THE MIDNIGHT SUN WHERE THE HOT SPRINGS... FLOOOOOOW

Christos

Aaaaaaaaaa@aaaaaaaaaAaaaaAaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaa

Mekharfet

AA

Someperson

Aaaa

Bad@games

ÀAAA

M0och123

THUNDER! AHHHHHHHAAHHHHHHHAH! THUNDER!
AHHHHHAHHHHHAHHHAHHHAH! THUNDER!

Luna

AA!!!

AbraKadabra

Ahem. Here it is.

JoeRob

The Dauntless' song lines up rather well with Battle Hymn of the Republic

Scott's Folly

It does fit the rhythm, within the usual amount of stretching and squeezing, but to me that seems like too upbeat a melody for the subject. I'm hearing something in a minor key, perhaps along the lines of the folk tune "John Barleycorn".
(Surprisingly hard to find a straightforward version without excessive vocal or melodic ornament! Here's a link to one such: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tswuvIIi4SA>)

This isn't a song for a triumphant vanguard racing onward to victory, it's one for the sloggers of the 'Poor Bloody Infantry'. They know that the fight will be coming to them. They know that they will be there to meet it, bloody it, and send what's left right back to whichever corner of Creation it came from this time. They know that next campaigning season they'll do the same again in a different direction. And they wouldn't have it any other way.

arcanavitael5

I really love the relationship between Cat and the Army of Callow it is one of the most beautiful parts of the story.

Nadav

I cried so much!!!

bob

Good Shit.

Tenthyr

As a final charge for Catherine with her armies go, you couldn't do better, or more grim.

dadycoool

This is the end of the world and we're all gonna die. Who wants to go out screaming with me?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Sounds like a pickup line.

Sykomantis

Who says it's not?

megaprr

There's something just so great about the Beast in this chapter. Cat's baring her Name to the world here. The shape of it, at heart. And man was it glorious.

Lox

Where is Hanno?

Liliet

At a guess, filling another important hole.

dadycoool

Yeah, isn't there, like, four fronts to this attempt?

Kai Wingless

Lucky Indrani isn't here right now to make this into a filthy joke.

Mirror Night

I mean its not especially clear what most Named are doing during these pushes.

Basic tactical logic would probably suggest you put Mirror Knight in front, a healer behind him and push through. But Cat is the lead so she has to shine which is tricky when such a large cast gives a lot of options cause it leaves the audience with a lot of questions and what is optimal.

caoimhinh

Supposedly they are assaulting the walls of Keter from various sides at the same time, which requires them to make these heavy sacrifices to succeed because if they were to focus on a single front then Keter would focus its defenses on that point too.

Allegedly, the other sides are also facing heavy resistance as Catherine is making that charge, and the dozens of other Named are required for dividing the Dead King's efforts in the other sides.

Mirror Night

Oh I am sure they are busy offscreen and that you can no prize explanations. Though I do think the writer probably should bother to state why obvious solutions are not being tried. So it just kinda stands out that they didn't put a tanky Named in front and try to push through like that since it such an obvious solution that gets used other times in the story.

agumentic

I mean, what's a tanky Named going to achieve here? The army would just die around them even if they wouldn't.

caoimhinh

What he could achieve is to get rid of the ballistas. That was the only issue they had and why the army couldn't cross and apparently why the flying fortresses couldn't cross either. The archers and the mages weren't the problem, since the Grand Alliance had answers for both, the issue was always the ballistas, but I honestly think it is a valid option to have used the Mirror Knight to make the cross and break the ballistas, while Masego, Cat and the army mages cover him from the sorceries of the undead.

Once the ballistas were gone, the rest of the army could cross without much issue, since the ballistae were the only thing that could pass the defensive panels of the mages.

agumentic

Are you suggesting just sending Mirror Knight on his own to break dozens of siege engines spread on top of the wall and surrounded by an army and mages and, as we now see, Revenants up to the Scourges? There are much easier ways to kill him, for all his tankiness.

caoimhinh

No, no. I really think he could pull through. Keep in mind that the Scourges are waaay on the back, to the point that even now Catherine is just feeling that they will approach.

Masego can take care of the curses and sorceries of the undead, which are what could really hinder MK's advance. The arrows would be useless against him, and the stones shot by the ballistae wouldn't stop him because he can reflect them.

Those are skeletons that even regular soldiers (albeit very badass ones) could beat, so they would be unable to even delay Mirror Knight as he cleaves through them with the Severance, nothing that was shown in this chapter would be able to stop him from getting to the siege engines. He just needs to reach the ballistae, as there aren't that many of those, evidenced by how Cat's mages quickly got rid of them upon crossing the bridge.

Once the ballistae were gone, the Army of Callow could cross without much issue, even if the mass of undead soldiers could somehow overwhelm Cristophe, which is highly unlikely, they could establish the beachhead and support him once the ballistae are gone.

So I don't believe it is a crazy suggestion. In fact, I think it's likely Mirror Knight is doing exactly that, but on another front, which is why Catherine needed to do this on this front, since he was occupied somewhere else.

agumentic

Yeah, I think you are very, very much overestimating how much MK could do without a good story behind him. He is not nearly as invulnerable as to be able to walk through the army, even leaving aside that it would take him so much time that Keter would be able to bring reinforcements.

Also, the Scourges are not way in the back, they are ready to respond the moment there's a danger of the army actually breaking past the wall.

Regret

Because a tanky named wouldn't convince anyone to cross. The issue is one of morale, not armour.

Letouriste

Worse, a tank can be easily killed if dropped in the void under the bridge. Just concentrate fire enough on them to push them

caoimhinh

That's why the others should be there to cover him. Masego or Catherine get rid of the sorcery of the undead, the army mages use the panels to cover him from the arrows, and he just tanks the stones of the ballistae.

And we know for a fact that he is able to go through that, because one of his abilities lets him reflect whatever is thrown at him, so the stones would just rebound and neither damage him nor push him.

Then it's just a matter of Cristophe cutting through those skeletons with the Severance and get rid of the ballistae. Then the rest of the army can cross without issue and the flying fortresses can land without being shot down.

ohJohN

My dude, this seems like a reading comprehension issue:

Cat straight up says that the Blessed Artificer is the only Named that is both available and powerful enough to help. That's enough information to infer why your plan isn't being tried: either Cat judged that the Mirror

Knight (or any tank) wouldn't be particularly helpful here, or he's committed to another front.

Tbh, my guess is both. The idea that MK tanking his way across the bridge is an "obvious solution" to this situation is insane to me – they're trying to get an army across, not one dude!! His powers would do basically nothing to protect the legionaries crossing behind him, and a beachhead consisting of him and the corpses of the entire Third Army is worth jack shit. At that point, why not just have Cat airdrop him on the other side of the chasm, instead of sacrificing an army to get him there?

It's a dumb idea – just a very obviously bad plan, orthogonal to the characters' stated goals – but whatever, I have a bunch of dumb ideas every chapter and sometimes I even comment them. It happens!

I just think it's a dick move to suggest EE didn't "bother to state why obvious solutions are not being tried" when the chapter starts with Cat pretty explicitly saying 'the only Named available to help are me and BA', and especially when your "obvious" solution is so bonkers.

Rynjin

Mirror Knight consistently has reading comprehension issues. I'm not sure if they're a very committed troll or they really are that deluded about their own intelligence.

caoimhinh

To be fair, the use of Cristophe is a valid suggestion. Since the only real issue was the ballistae, it is a valid wonder why they didn't use Cristophe to make it there and break the ballistae in order to clear the path for the army to cross the bridges. Once the ballistae were gone, the rest of the army is free to cross the bridges and the flying fortresses made it across the chasm without issue.

True, Cat mentions that everyone else is occupied somewhere else, yeah, but we don't know any details beyond that, so it's a valid question. I mean, for all we know, Cristophe IS doing that right now for the other front, since they are assaulting Keter from 2 or 3 directions at once. This is the struggle on Cat's side, but it seems logical to me that the other front is using Cristophe in the way Mirror Night suggested, it's simply that the assaults have to be done simultaneously.

On another note, a single one of the Scourges would have been enough to stop Cat's army from crossing, simply by occupying Cat the rest of the army would be slaughtered. Why weren't they used until the army has crossed? Like, even now Cat is barely feeling them coming to her after the army has secured a beachhead.

ohJohN

I think you're arguing something different than Mirror Knight was – they didn't mention the ballistae at all. Their idea was:

"Basic tactical logic would probably suggest you put Mirror Knight in front, a healer behind him and push through."

and then again: "put a tanky Named in front and try to push through like that"

I can see how crippling Keter's siege weapons maybe could have given the Third Army enough relief to cross the bridges, but it's a big leap to get to that idea from "tank in front, just push through". I'm not trying to say there's no way MK could have possibly helped, just that the idea as presented was not recognizably a solution, let alone an obvious one.

I agree MK is most likely fighting on another front. (If anything, that's the crux of my point – we weren't given many details, but it's still easy to figure out if you're paying attention: we know all Named are committed, and he's not here, so obviously he's fighting on one of the other fronts and can't help out here!)

And I don't begrudge anyone for wondering what, specifically, he or other Named are doing – I'd personally enjoy an interlude covering the other fronts in this battle.

I just thought that dig at EE was kinda shitty, especially because the criticism seems so glaringly baseless. The writer DID give them enough information to figure out why their (imo dumb) solution wasn't being tried! That's actually really neat, and a credit to the author!

Just, if you're gonna accuse someone of careless writing, a) don't be a jerk about it, but if you can't manage that, at least b) make sure it's not actually the fault of your own careless reading.

SomeGuyWhoReadsThings

That fails to account for the Story aspect of this. This is DK tactics, drown them persistently but never too hard. Hed be making good stories for the heroes by overplaying his hand with the Scourges

caoimhinh

True, but as far as we know, the other front is using Mirror Knight in exactly that manner you suggested. The problem is, even if he can make a beachhead there, Cat still needs to make a beachhead in her front, and do it right as the others are being made because otherwise the other fronts will be overrun.

They are assaulting Keter from what? Three directions? Cristophe can clear the path in one front, but the other 2 had to get creative or bloody in order to make it across.

So I agree with you that MK would be a solution here (the ballistae were the only thing for which they had no answer, and he could make that trip to break them) but I believe he is currently doing that on the other front, so Cat needed to do this on her own front.

Friend of EE

The Army of Callow wouldn't follow a Proceran into the breach, and it's the Army of Callow's "turn" to assault the walls.

Sun Dog

Tactical logic suggests you put the Mirror Knight in a catapult, where he can do the most good.

Sir Nil

Because in this world what is most tactically sound has to also depend on 'Story' beats, the unspoken rule is that every Named can only fill a few roles in any encounter. Spending Mirror Knight cracking the door open might mean he's a less effective wielder of Severence when they five man band DK.

arcanavita¹⁵

I wonder if Cat will get an aspect out of this because this is something that I feel should've gotten an aspect because leading and inspiring people is what Cat does, maybe it doesn't fit with her role well enough.

Liliet

I think it doesn't quite fit with the Name yeah.

dadycool

Yeah, she's a Named wrangler rather than a general. She leaves that to her orcs.

Adrian_V

I still think at one point she will summon a ghost or specter army basically of all the people she considers her own that have died, there are too many hints and references with lines like "you are one of mine and one day i will come for you" or stuff like that

Liliet

I low key thought that was what was going on here. But no... it's saved up still ^^

(When it happens, will be a callback to Twilight Liesse too)

shikkarasu

"I will Collect" running tally: 3

- "This is not a bargain, King of Winter, it's an oath," I hissed. "One day, we'll meet again. Not tomorrow, not next month, not for decades. After your game's played out. After I've learned to kill gods. On that day, I'll come to collect."

- (To Robber, as he died) No matter where you end up you will be one of mine. Sooner or later, I will come to collect.

- "I'll see you around, Alaya," I said, eye cold. "Don't die before I come to collect."

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Remember how, in the alternate-timeline illusion trap Akua used on her, one of Cat's alts came into the Name of Tolltaker? I can see why.

shikkarasu

Hands down my favourite chapter. The Four Fold Crossing was magnificent. Pun neither intended nor apologised for.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

BargleNawdleZouss

Edgar the Lender? Edgar the Armorer? Good to see him, in any case!

Where was Abigail in the muster of the Third Army?

Death Knight

I'd wager she was the first to scream Dauntless!

Liliet

I'd wager against that LMAO

Liliet

...actually nevermind, I could see it! She's always been the clear-sighted kind of scared.

agumentic

Yeah, I wouldn't be surprised if Abigail immediately thought "Oh Gods, if the Black Queen dies here we're all doomed, we have to support her" and was the first to rush after Cat.

Adrian_V

Don't forget to mention about Juniper eating her liver, probably with Hakram too xD

Regret

Or "Oh Gods, if I don't get the army to charge then the only way I get to keep my pension is by charging on my own"

Velrix

Ahah, so likely. I really want to see more of this character. She's not named but Abigail is loved by creation, and the readers.

shikkarasu

I like to think of us as the Gods Above and Below. The ones that guide Hanno's sword, whisper clarifications into Tariq's ears, and, of course, the ones who applauded Kairos' final hour. Often via the comments section, but mostly in our hearts.

In this way, Abigail is truly beloved by the Gods and will suffer accordingly.

Soronel Haetir

Dayum!

edrey

the Beast in the end of the world, really poetic.

Juff

Typo Thread:

on porcupine > on a porcupine heartbeat if hesitation > heartbeat of hesitation bride > bridge
crackles, exploded > crackled, exploding Creation.So > Creation. So bathing in pale (something missing here) were arrows > where arrows is there > was there protecting me > protecting me.
cowing me > cow me built on > built began took > began taking West the > Wrest the the coming > them coming

Vernal.ancient

The storm of arrows was not the danger of a single breath. It was a doom in three beats, as again and again the enemy went through the same movements: nock, pull, loose.

Loved that line

Bad@games

Every time there is a chapter like this i cant help but laugh triumphantly and smile like a madman. its so good. Cat and the army of mother fucking callow, the callbacks and everything too good.

Espen Nilsen

The last gasps of the Dread Empire of Praes had come to make war.

Holy shit thats a good line

vexingvision

Glorious. Breathtaking.

sengachi

One last time. Into the breach.

Wonder

I love this chapter . But juy one tiny thing, did it have to be a wolf? Why no other shape?

Agent J

The Beast has always been a large furred monster. But, ngl, I always saw it more like a tiger. What with all the times Cat was referred to as such. Well, "all the times". I'm more thinking of Black waxing poetic about rearing tigers and complaining of stripes. Also, well... Cat.

dadycool

Well, for one thing, we've been saying for a while that she's been gaining an Odin-like presence, what with the two crows, a staff that's more than a staff, and her wolf of a name.

Sinead

Also, when she was a struggling warrior, I could see her emblem as a solitary hunter.

But as she has become more and more the representation of the institutions of Law? That is a wolf.

Hydrargentium

Remember also that Captain (and the loss of her) has been a looming presence for Catherine for a long time, since long before she even started down this current Name's path. So perhaps the Wolf is in part shaped by the memory of Captain.

Hg

Dome Zasrekh

What if it wasn't just Zeze protecting her, but a certain other talented sorceress?

Agent J

Ah! Of course! I agree, it must have been the Haunted Witch. 😊

nick012000

Cat in this chapter: STAND POWER!

shikkarasu

Stand Master: Catherine Foundling

Stand Name: Treacherous Gods

Destructive Power: A

Speed: D

Range: B

Stamina: C

Precision: C

Development Potential: B, even after all these years

nick012000

Nah, it'd have to have the name of a song. Clearly, the name of Catherine's Stand would be Here They Come Again – the song she sings in this chapter.

shikkarasu

Oh, an in-universe song. Good idea. I went for Ensiferum, although in fairness Treacherous Gods probably fits Captain better.

bellacohl

Very very nice. The song reminded me of Farrier too.

dadycool

Whew. Glorious. Absolutely glorious. Nothing inspires soldiers more than their leader actually leading them rather than directing them, and that's exactly what they needed right then. And we even got to see the Beast in Creation for the first time! I was sincerely hoping to see it, made up of the corpses that fell, climb its way up to the walls, but this was probably better.

Darkening

Yeah, I was kinda hoping for that too, but it probably would have had unfortunate effects on the morale of the soldiers following her.

Velrix

Yeah, but generally this end badly for the general. The enemies will focus on him and if he die his army will likely rout. It's done in last solution when the moral is extremely low and the defeat imminent, or when he can charge without retaliation. And even if not routed the army would be crippled by the loss of the leader, and then defeated.

shikkarasu

Truth, but generally the general is not High Priestess of Night and is not known for such deeds as stealing wings from the Princess of Summer, walking off decapitation, or punching a tower-sized devil-snake so hard that it died.

Cat... honestly I'm a little surprised that she needed the Beast at all.

dadycool

lol, I miss those early days when she was a badass warrior girl and her men came up with ridiculously overdone tales of her greatness. Them worshiping her as a minor god is nice and all, but it was nice when they simply admired her instead.

Squeamish

Ah I've been lurking reading this for a while now but we're getting towards the end and this scene was too good.

My favorite scenes have always been these ones, where it all seems so hopeless that to even take a step is more than anyone can ask of you. That to struggle is sheer defiance. But God, only Catherine could make that struggle so glorious

Crash

It's that first verse that always gets me

"So pick up your sword, boy

Here they come again

And down here in the mud

It's us who holds the line"

It's been coming back since the very first "Too much" for Cat's armies, fighting Diabolist's devils at Marchford. And yet, somehow, every time it hits just right.

Daniel E

This one took a bit of digging, but I think I got them all. Every mention of Edgar to date, in order; Beheld II, Intervention, New Tricks.

Daniel Ball

alas, I'm wondering if Neshama is realizing he made a mistake, or if he's sitting back in a Gendo pose thinking 'all according to my master plan'.

Crash

those are some dangerous thought for a villain who doesn't know when the Sword of the Rest is gonna be broken

shikkarasu

10 Denarii says he has a plan to bait out the Rest at what he considers the perfect moment.

Not sure if Cat falls for it, feints and breaks it later, or walks into Nessie's trap and then declares that she was prepared for this eventuality. All options are very Catherine.

Letouriste

Finally got the time to read this!
It was so freaking good. Full of epic lines.
Felt completely heroic tho 😊 but I'm not sure it's a problem anymore given her role.

ruduen

Ah, back to basics. With so much work in the army, it's good to go back to one of the oldest lessons Cat was taught.

A Named's job isn't to work the same way units would in an army. It's to find pivots and smash right into them.

Looks like she found the pivot she was looking for.

Someperson

This was a good chapter.

Advancing across the bridge to the heavily fortified breach into Keter on foot on her own? I expect nothing less from Cat tbh

naturalnuke

I fucking LOVE YOU AND THE STORY YOUVE CRAFTED.

Ugh, god you're the only author who can consistently give me actual chills while reading the absolutely peak scenes

morroian

Goddammit I want to see the events of this chapter in an interlude.

Chapter 59: Steel

"War is the greatest of alchemies. It takes men as can be found in any town in the world and makes them into heroes and monsters."

– Extract from the prologue of the first volume of the "Annals of the League of Free Cities", by famed historian Shapash the Ashuran

The skeleton was decked in bronze, the scales of the armour pristine and the strange horned helmet it sported was freshly polished – as well as open faced. I closed the distance so the swing of its axe would pass behind me, rasping down the Mantle of Woe without even cutting cloth, and smashed the pommel of my sword into the skull. One blow shattered the jaw, a second the nose and the third ripped the head right off the spine.

"Form up," I shouted. "Seventh Company, do I need to gently hold your fucking hand before you put those shields locked?"

"Yes please," a woman's voice shouted back.

I snorted, getting a glimpse of a tall Soninke flashing pale teeth at me before her lieutenant slapped the back of her helm. The seventh company heeded my order, though, echoed as it was by the shouts of a dozen angry sergeants. With the seventh, the twelfth and the fourth forming up on our left flank we should be good to push further up. Their shield walls blocked the streets on that side, though at the moment they didn't have anyone to face down. My hand was still smoking from my last use of Night collapsing a row of the houses between those streets, helped along by every mage we could scrape together. We'd wanted to leave them up, use them to keep the dead herded when they showed up, but it'd been too much of a risk.

After the fourth time a supposedly clear house was revealed to have had ghouls hidden somewhere in it that then leapt from the roof straight at a mage to die tearing the throat out, I'd decided to stay on the safe side. The houses had been almost absurdly easy to bring down, we'd found, which had the back of my neck pricking. That did not strike me as an accident. Satisfied with the seventh company's formation, I tore my gaze away from them and turned to the tall orc lieutenant that'd been waiting patiently on me as I shouted.

"I'm listening," I said.

"Ma'am," he began, "we-"

He was interrupted by a horrific scream as a hellish burst of red light bled all over the clouds above us, a distorted ring of magic burning with runes flickering open a dozen blocks ahead of us. A misshapen horror dropped through, too-small wings looking like rotted bone slowing the descent of a creature with distended scaled belly with too-long arms ending in massive claws. The horror dropped down out of sight, still letting out those soul-rending shrieks. The lieutenant drily swallowed. I clapped his shoulder.

"Cheer up, lieutenant," I said. "Sure, that was one of the foulest abominations either of us has ever seen but for once the damned fucking thing's on our side."

The flying fortress hovering above that part of the city, raining down spells and stones, made that pretty clear. The Praesi were tossing devils into the mess ahead of my army like a fool trying to buy a wish at a fountain, which was both encouraging and not: much as I was happy they were softening up the opposition, I did have to wonder how bad it must be for this to be the seventh time they were burning a greater devil contract.

"Hungry Gods," the orc got out, "I guess that's something to be thankful for. Fuck of a day if-"

His face turned anguished, pulling a fresh cut on the side of his nose, when he realized who he'd just been cursing with.

"-ma'am," he hastily added, then saluted for good measure. "The front is stalling, ma'am, Commander Spitter requests that you come help break the stalemate."

I nodded.

"Tell him I'm on my way," I said. "The flanks are set up, we need to begin pushing into the city."

The avenue we so badly needed to get to was straight ahead, by memory, and I'd spent so many hours looking at maps of Keter that I could see the layout of the city when I closed my eyes.

It had been millennia since the fall of Sephirah and the living ceased to stay within the walls – save for a few hundred servants deep in the heart of the city – but though the Dead King had had worked his horror on all that lay within the walls there were still traces of the city that once was. I'd seen in the Arcadian echoes that Keter had been raised on a pair of hills by a river, and though the water was long gone the city still echoed of it. The Crown of the Dead was built upwards, the bottom of it beginning at the foot of its forty-yards high walls and rolling up to the raised plateau where the two hills had once stood.

There the five palaces of Keter awaited us, and the Hellgate whose taking would be our victory.

The inside of the city was a maze whose layout changed according to the Dead King's whims, streets and 'houses' – most of them empty, used only to store the dead and their arms away from weather so they would not rust and decay – raised and demolished according to arcane designs, but a handful of parts had remained unmoving through all the crusades. Most important of them was a set of six large avenues crisscrossing the city, the largest of which went through north to south and had been built over the now-dry riverbed of the river that had attracted people to live here long ago. For our push into the city to have a change of getting anywhere, we needed to get onto one of those avenues.

The rest of Keter was a playground of death, and though those avenues were sure to be trapped and heavily defended at the end of the day they were the one part of the city that Neshamah couldn't actually destroy while defending his capital: he needed the damned avenues to move his soldiers around. He could use the smaller streets, sure, but them being a maze was a double-edged sword and they also happened to be narrow. Meaning not a lot of soldiers could squeeze through and given that the Dead King's great advantage was numbers that was a harsh handicap when tangling with the Army of Callow. We'd earned our reputation as the finest foot on Calernia the hard way.

Soldiers were milling about in a semblance of good order, lines and companies shifting to anchor our flanks or press at the front while we expanded on all sides to make room for the troops continuing to cross. I winced as I saw a ballista bolt from somewhere to the northwest scythe through a few of my soldiers, killing or toppling them to a more horrible death. Neshamah was beginning to move siege engines in position at the top of the still-standing walls on both our flanks, which was going to be a problem. We'd either need to take the walls to silence them, spreading out further than I'd like, or keep our mages lines focused on the defence until the soldiers had crossed. Juniper's problem, I reminded myself. She'd figure something out. I shook myself out of the thoughts and followed a line of regulars towards the front, through melted stone gone cool and buildings shredded by the Ram.

Beyond the grounds glassed by the Light the shattered buildings rose into a ragged slope of collapsed walls and loose stones, which we climbed in haste as arrows fell in sparse rain from a long distance. Arcing shots, likely fired blindly from behind enemy lines at a place they knew would force us to lower shields for balance. Let it not be said that the Dead King's commanders were unskilled, however empty and brutally efficient a kind of skill it might be. Climbing down the slope onto a paved street, I saw exactly what Commander Spitter had needed me for. After crossing the bridges we'd swept through the enemy defences and then another three city blocks beyond that as the dead tried to put together a shield wall to check our advance, but it'd not been enough.

Keter had recovered from the surprise two blocks further in, though. A barricade was encircling our position, as I blinked in astonishment at the sight of it – it'd not existed a quarter hour ago – I realized exactly why those houses on our flanks had been so easy to collapse.

"Shit," I muttered.

Keter was possible to fortify in a way that no other city in the world was, when it came down to it. Even the great fortresses of Calernia had to make concessions to habitability, but what did the Crown of the Dead care for that? There were no living souls within the walls and so the city made solely to be held against invaders, massive armies led by heroes. And though we'd avoided the worst of the defences by collapsing a wall instead of taking one of the gates, we'd known that was not a state of affairs that was going to last. Nor had it. That impossible barricade that had encircled our vanguard, leaving only one way through in a narrow street, had not been assembled – it had been collapsed. Undead had smashed the houses, collapsing them in a way that blocked streets as well.

I threw up an eye of Night as high as I could and cursed again at what I saw. Like industrious ants, skeletons were going around collapsing houses all around our beachhead to encircle it in a loose ring. And where a later of barricade had already been made, they went about adding a second. They're hemming us in, I thought. If we don't break through quick enough, they'll just bottle us here and shoot us like fish in a barrel. And like all the finest trap did, they'd left us with a visible way out so we'd commit: that narrow street in front of our vanguard, packed so tightly with undead they could barely move. A funnel for us to charge down and die in. I began elbowing my way forward, though after the first few times my soldiers saw who I was and parted their ranks instead.

"Shield wall," I shouted. "Get those fucking shields up before you all get shot!"

Officers echoed me across the army, our lines grown ragged from the breakthrough steadying just as the first undead crossbows and javelinmen began lining up atop the barricade. We'd taken the Dead King aback with our charge, but now he'd forcefully stabilized his line with the collapsed houses and he was setting up another killing field: if those barricades weren't about to be sprouting a forest's worth of range troops, I'd eat my crown. I particularly did not like the look of the javelins: those went right through shields and plate when thrown right, which the skeletons were sure to. It wasn't the thought that we couldn't smash our way through that had me worried, mind you. We could and goddamn would. It was the other ninety times we'd have to do it before we got anywhere near a victory. Was the Dead King already ordering a second ring of barricades to be collapsed around us, or was he going to wait a bit more?

Either way, I grimly thought, the only way we weren't going to be drowned in street-by-street fighting was by moving too quickly for him to be able to keep us bottled up. And the only way for that was to break through another fourteen blocks straight ahead, to reach one of the five central avenues of Keter. I knew better than to think every step in direction wasn't going to sprout a fresh nightmare in need of putting down. Thankfully, I was due the presence of some people who knew a thing or two about doing that. I swung my sword at a knot of skeleton crossbowmen, blowing them off the rampart as air exploded in front of them, and ran a hand down the chord of a story. One was almost there.

I felt out the outcome a heartbeat before the sequence of it could begin, and immediately pulled on Night. A large beorn came into sight, having climbed a large tower to the east, and after a roar it leapt. I could see the trajectory before it had even begun to move. A smooth arc down, straight into the company of heavies from the Third that was hammering at the enemy shield wall trying to keep us pinned in the avenue. And it might have landed, if not for the silhouette that ran up a half-collapsed house without breaking stride before leaping up, shining with blindingly bright Light. I caught a glimpse of a greatsword being swung as the beorn was carved through from head to toe and somewhere behind me I felt the twin shiver of an aspect being used and magic blooming: a gale of wind caught the halves of the beorn and the roiling skeletons within, tossing them back into the enemy ranks.

A heartbeat later the Blade of Mercy landed on his feet and the Rogue Sorcerer ended his spell. A heartbeat after that, what looked like a horse-sized worm made entirely out of muscles and fingerbones popped out from behind a tower to the west and spat a cloud of poison at that same company of heavies.

Fear, relief, horror returned. The Dead King's favourite play.

"None of that," I said, clicking my tongue, and released the Night.

A spinning sphere swallowed the cloud before contracting and exploding into a ball of poisonous flame, which a flick of my wrist sent right back at the bloody horror. It slithered into the tower for cover but not quite quick enough, its bottom half incinerated as the roof of the building collapsed atop it. Since Roland and the Blade of Mercy were here, she should be somewhere – I frowned, then turned around and hit the space right behind me with the flat of my sword. The Painted Knife let out a yelp, cold steel slapping her cheek, and I spared a glare as she backpedalled.

"How many times am I going to have to tell you you're not bloody invisible, Kallia?" I said.

"At least you didn't drop me down a tower this time," the Painted Knife reproachfully replied.

"Day's young," I grunted, "and if you keep trying to sneak up on me during battle I might reconsider."

I was completely serious, which the heroine seemed to pick up on.

"I hear your words, Black Queen," she assured me.

I hummed, entirely unconvinced. I was pretty sure this had turned into one of those headache-inducing Levant honour things for her, which meant I was going to have to keep breaking her legs until she decided not even the bragging rights were worth that amount of pain.

"Your last two?" I asked.

"They should be-"

There was a great cracking sound to my left and I immediately turned, eye going straight to the unusual sight of someone single-handedly smashing their way through a barricade that was almost entirely stone with little more than a war hammer. A woman in bright red plate – Gods, the sight of it had every inch of me offended, that was just asking to get shot – with a helmet forged to look like a grinning devil and weapons strapped on her back was pulverising chunks of stone with every swing. And though she was almost seven feet tall and broad as a barn door, it wasn't muscles alone that let the Red Knight shatter stone like it was overripe cantaloupes.

She wasn't good at much aside from breaking shit, but that much she was really good that.

The villainess might still have taken a few javelins in the neck for her troubles courtesy of the undead above, though, if not for the fact that they were currently occupied with an enthusiastically murderous wolf the size of a small barn. Where the Hells the Skinchanger had actually found a wolf that large in Lycaonese lands was a mystery to me, much less killed and skinned it for use, but I wasn't going to argue with the shapes the woman had chosen to take up: they were a pretty repertoire of clawed and fanged nightmares, even the fucking birds. I didn't know why the eagle-thing she sometimes turned into had horns, of all things, but apparently they were both amour-piercing and poisonous so why the Hells not?

A someone who had ridden a flying horse for several years, I had a healthy appreciation for aerial impalements.

"There," I completed for the Painted Knife. "So I see."

She looked faintly embarrassed. So she hadn't actually ordered the Red Knight to make that breach, huh. I sympathized. Even I found the villainess difficult to deal with, and unlike Kallia my authority was bolstered by the fact that I'd once brought down a four-story tower on the Red Knight's head just to make a point. Hadn't actually done much to her, which was why to this day I was pretty sure to kill her I'd need a pool of acid of some sort. Fortunately, she was so infuriatingly terrible a person I was also pretty sure I could get the Concocter to brew said acid for free.

"A second breach will hasten our advance," I continued. "But you need to get your band ready after we punch through."

A steady stare met mine.

"The Scourges are coming," the Painted Knife said.

"At least one," I agreed. "And it'll be coming with lesser Revenants to use as meat shields."

The Dead King wasn't going to commit his finest remaining blades to fights to the – second – death so early in the battle, but he'd be looking to pick up a few kills among our Named if he could. Thin the herd, so to speak, and throw Revenant bodies in the way to get his Scourges out if we got too close to taking a scalp. I had every intention of snuffing out one of his last heavy hitters if the occasion arose, mind you, and Hanno should be fighting at one of the gates with the same intention. The trouble, we both knew, was that invaders past a certain point there was no choice but to fight on the Hidden Horror's terms.

Not something that tended to go well for us, as a rule.

"We will be ready," the Painted Knife swore, then hesitated.

I cocked an eyebrow.

"Might you keep the Rogue Sorcerer by your side?" she asked.
"Skilled as he is, we move quicker without him and he is most useful from the back."

"I'll drag him along," I agreed.

Roland was one of those eminently reasonable mages that actually wore armour, so I had no issue bringing him into a battlefield. Besides, for a spellcaster the Alamans was actually ridiculously difficult to kill: the amount of protective artifacts he wore on him at all times was impressive paranoid even by Wasteland standards.

"Good hunting," I said, offering my arm.

"And you, Warden," the Painted Knife replied, clasping it.

I waited for Roland, and gentlemen that he was he didn't make it long. Some part of me was always surprised that the Rogue Sorcerer wasn't taller, I thought. It must have been the long leather coat over the chain mail, covered with pockets full of artefacts. Though the dark-haired man usually went without a helmet, this once he'd made an exception and put on a plumed bassinet that pressed his curls against his head. He had a short wand painted blue in hand, which to my senses reeked of the fae. Huh, I'd never seen him with that one before.

"Catherine," he greeted me, glancing at the melee ahead. "I'm grieved we only came so late."

"Named wouldn't have been useful on the bridges," I admitted. "It would have been handing Revenants to the opposition."

Not entirely true, but the few Named that would have made a difference had been needed elsewhere. I was already here, after all, and insisting the Army of Callow should also have the services of the Witch of the Woods on top of mine would have been a hard sell.

"Then we'll make up for the absence it now," Roland firmly said.
"Where do you need me?"

I couldn't help but smile. He'd been one of the first heroes to grow on me for a reason.

"You're with me," I said, "and we're going into the thick of it."

"Ah, certain death," he drily replied. "How I missed working with you, Warden."

"Don't be so gloomy," I chided. "It's only mostly certain death."

"That would be our finest odds in quite a while, then," he snorted.

He gallantly offered me his arm to walk, which was a nice thought but still got him elbowed in the ribs. It was a battlefield, not a garden stroll. Alamans, Merciless Gods. Even at the bloody end of the world. The closest we got to the front, the harder it got to move: the press of soldiers tightened, kept on tightening until it squeezed into the sole street that had been the sole way out of the barricades. Now there was another opening, I thought, but the pressure would not be relieved for some time yet. Maybe thirty feet ahead of us I saw the shield walls hammering at each other, the dead packed tight as my heavies tried to break through them. I leaned closer to Roland.

"Can you clear that?" I asked, gesturing in the melee's direction.

"Given time to cast," the Rogue Sorcerer replied. "Why?"

"Because unless I'm mistaken," I murmured, "we're about to ambushed. I need you to draw attention."

He sent me a pained look. I stared back, unmoved, until he conceded with a sigh.

"Bait it is," Roland said. "Is Kallia near?"

I nodded. The Painted Knife, for all that her team had some rather straightforward brawlers, was still an assassin at heart. She was waiting too. The Rogue Sorcerer rolled his shoulder.

"Then let's get to it," the hero said.

I took a step back, pulling on Night, and let it fall over me like a veil. I tore out a sliver and shaped it into an eye, tossing it up in the sky, and as I closed my eye of flesh I saw through the other. The Red Knight's breach had let the companies there turn the tables. Climbing through the mess was hard and there were corpses all over the slope, but now my legionaries had climbed atop the barricade and were tearing into the crossbowmen and javelineers. Ahead of me I looked past the brutal melee in the street, seeing how skeletons were pouring in from all adjoining streets to pack this one so tight they could barely move. Yet it was the houses I looked at closest, the tiled stone roofs. I couldn't see a Revenant yet, but that hardly meant there were none.

Ahead of me, the Rogue Sorcerer let out a hoarse shout and pointed an ornate casting rod at the sky: flames poured out like a flock of birds, bright and of many colours.

I could not spare a longer look than that, because the enemy were moving. Three Revenants on a rooftop that'd been empty until an arrow went flying – my heart clenched for a moment but the archer was in bright green leathers, so not the Hawk – and an illusion broke. I kept my eye on them even as what must be a mage Revenant, given that otherwise the swirling colours of those robes would be some sort of a crime, raised an ornate golden staff and pulled an illusion on them again. I'd had a heartbeat to look at the third, finding good plate and a large shield that did not belong to any of the Scourge. Whichever was there they were still lying in wait, so I held back as well.

Around me soldiers began to press forward, parting around my position without knowing why, and I made a note that whatever it was Roland had used it had seemingly worked.

The three Revenants were under illusion again but now that I knew what to look for I could taste the subtle power in the air and follow their position. The Painted Knife's band went about it another way: a heartbeat later a hawk dropped down on the rooftop, turning into a large hound as it landed, and immediately began sniffing the air. Knowing their position was blown, the Revenants engaged: the illusion went down, an arrow was loosed at the Skinchanger – which she turned into a bear to shrug off – and the sword and board undead doubled back to attack our scout Named. A tactical mistake, I thought as the Painted Knife appeared behind their mage and hacked through the hand holding the staff. A heartbeat later the Blade of Mercy was there as well, landing in a flash of Light that tore a hole through the roof and forced him to roll forward so he wouldn't drop through.

It wasn't a done deal, I thought as I watched them. The mage Revenant's hand kept wielding the staff even when cut off and the Blade of Mercy backed off in surprise when the sword and board undead took on his greatsword without batting an eye, but the band of Named had the advantage. Which meant we were soon due... Darkness fell over the roof and I cursed. I'd been too much to hope that being buried under most of Hainaut had been enough to kill off the Mantle, I supposed. At least I got to find out where she was, which happened to be a rooftop far to my left. Standing besides what had to be the sloppiest Revenant I'd ever seen: barely more than ragged skin and bones, with floppy hair and loose farmers' clothes. Not a weapon in sight and he looked pretty confused.

He couldn't have been more obviously dangerous if the word had been branded on his fucking forehead.

"All right," I grunted. "My turn."

The setup ought to work. I released the Night hiding me and shaped it into solid shadows instead, coiling around me and then exploding outwards in tendrils that I used like great legs.

Shouts of surprise came from my legionaries below as I stepped over them and over the barricade, skeletons hacking away at the shadow limbs harmlessly. A streak of magic whizzed my way but I adjusted my position absent-mindedly to let it go wide, eye still on the Mantle. She pointed her great steel mace towards me, her armoured silhouette cast in the half-light allow through by the clouds, and the world shivered from the strength of the curse that shot out. She had, unfortunately for her, fallen prey to the story I'd prepared.

A woman decked in red steel leapt up in the way of the curse, laughing, and the world shivered again.

I'm not the fifth in their band, I thought, you struck too early. I smiled down at the Scourge even as I guided myself to land on the rooftop closest to the Mantle's. The Red Knight joined me up there, her armour glimmering deeper red from the curse she had been able to Devour. She spat to the side, reaching at her back and taking up a broadsword.

"Weak," the Red Knight sneered. "Your hatred is weak. I'll show you what a real Named is like, you petty armoured bitch."

I rolled my shoulder, limping up to her side as the Mantle pivoted to face us and the Revenant at her side looked at us with befuddlement. I reached out with my Name, tried to get a read on what he could do, but all I got was a vague sense of bad luck. And yet I smiled, as I felt a ripple behind me and to our side the Mantle's darkness suddenly vanished. Roland's Confiscate worked on the Mantle's curses, then. Good to know.

"Keep her busy," I told the Red Knight, preparing to leap to the other roof. "But don't take risks. We can afford to wait until the others are-"

Instinct pulled at me and I obeyed, taking a step to the side. It saved my life. I felt a raging current of power suddenly unleashed from below and the world exploded. I tumbled down through heated shards of what had been tiles a moment ago, shielding my eyes, as a curse passed close enough to rustle the Mantle of Woe. I hit the ground a moment after, swallowing a scream as I landed on my bad leg, but I stood through the pain to face a simple oaken staff being pointed towards me. A ragged figure in faded grey robes, eyes lifeless and long black hair tumbling down his back, stood before me inside a circle of wards. The Tumult, greatest spellcaster in the Dead King's service, began to incant. Instinct pulled at me again, the warning of certain death, but before I could heed it and move a cacophonous noise drowned out everything else and the ground shuddered.

The wall blew up a heartbeat later, spraying shards everywhere as the flying fortress crushed three city blocks and I had to pull Night to be just so the shockwave wouldn't splatter me all over the walls. The Tumult was not so lucky, his wards allowing through no harm but just enough wind that he was smacked flat against his own magic shield. Breathing out raggedly I released the Night, wiping dust out of my eyes, and found laughter bubbling out of my throat as someone floated down to the ground to stand between me and the Scourge. Akua Sahelian, armoured from head to toe and somehow still the most beautiful woman I'd ever seen, stared down the undead mage

"This one you can leave to me, darling," she drawled. "We never did finish our little chat in Hainaut."

In the distance I heard hooves, followed by war cries in Mthethwa, and finally I let the laugh free.

Time to collect some scalps.

ErraticErrata

It's a little early for it, but happy New Year!

edrey

Happy new year to you too.
And thanks for the chapter and this great novel.

Cicero

Happy New Year

captainmarcia

Happy new year!

Liliet

Happy New Year!!!!!!!

Mirror Night

Happy New Year

BargleNawdleZouss

Happy New Year, and I hope you are feeling better, EE!

ByVectron!

Please take a beat to relax and recover, EE. Be well, and happy New Year.

lenethren

Wonderful chapter. Thank you. Happy New Year!

erebus42

Happy new year.

letouriste

Happy new year!
Hope you finish recovering smoothly

Frivolous

Happy New Year and thanks for the chapter.

Thanks also for, finally, a good look at the Red Knight, with some dialogue even.

I guess the RK is mostly immune to magic, yet not quite immune to physical damage or entanglement, or else they'd be launching her at enemies like they do Christophe the Mirror Knight.

arcanavita15

Nice to get the update, I am happy to see Cat interacting with the people on the ground level both Named and regular people.

nimelennar

Mage fight! Mage fight! Mage fight!

And Happy New Year, EE!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Happy mage fight!

Sinead

One could note that the deeper Cat sank into her 'Ultimate Villain' Role, the more detached from people she came.

Could trying to reclaim 'the best part of herself' as so charged be her Good half be the return to the more banter and interactivity with both Named and non-Named people?

Liliet

THIS ENTIRE CHAPTER WAS SO CUTE AND WHOLESOME SOMEHOW like no okay I'm aware this is the middle of a bloody battle but it was also cute and wholesome and no-one can take it away from me

special shoutout to Kallia not being invisible ♥

Liliet

Other special shoutouts:

- the soldier who would not mind if Cat held her hand if you know what I mean;
- Cat giving tactical orders to soldiers she's next to period;
- Roland being the best and also short;
- finding out more about the Red Knight! damn now I like her, and also I love that Cat brought down a four story tower on her to make a point;
- HELL YEAH NAMED VS UNDEAD COMBAT;
- TENTACLE STILTS;
- just, Catherine being badass with Night and her Name. perfectly excellent;
- finding out more about Keter!!!
- what story;
- AKUA!!!!

ByVectron!

And every single bit has been purposely and clearly lead-up-to to this pint, with not a single deus-ex-machina in sight. This story has been one of the most rewarding bit of reading I've been able to enjoy in my nearly 50 years on this earth, including Foundation, A Song of Ice and Fire, Lord of the Rings, Enders series, Deathworlders- a Kevin Jenkins Story, and The Expanse.

BargleNawdleZouss

Aha, a fellow Deathworlders fan! 😊

wadeingintheriver

There are dozens of us!

shimizubad

Hundreds

Rey d`Tutto

A significant cross-section.

Someperson

I'll admit, this story honestly took a little while to really grow on me. It was mainly the thing I read while I was waiting for updates of different serials. Good, but not necessarily great.

But man am I glad I did keep reading.

As you have said, EE really does a superb job of building up a story step by step, with everything being intentional. All of the stuff that has come before really adds to every scene we get now, to a degree that I think is pretty dang rare.

'Ladi Williams

Happy new year @liliet

RoflCat

At this point Kallia is that one cat who keeps trying to do that slowly sneaking up on you and go still if you turn to look at it.

And after you shooed it away for the nth times it has decided this has gotten PERSONAL.

In contrast to Archer who's the cat that smugly strut up to you and just flops down in your lap because it knows you know that if you refuse then you're going to wake up tomorrow to the face full of cat butt.

ninegardens

Oh god, the raggedy one is the Fortunate Fool.
Oh fuck oh fuck oh fuck.

AceOfSword

Yeah, that's what immediately came to my mind too. Hopefully being undead makes him less funny? That way he wouldn't be as hard to kill as the usual comic relief?

'Ladi Williams

Who was the fortunate fool? And when was he introduced? What is/are his powers?

Earl of Purple

He disarmed the traps on the way to the Red Flower Vales for Klaus during the Crusade, and he sacrificed himself to kill the Ghoul King during the timeskip into book six. He's comic relief, he disarmed the goblin munition traps by stumbling, getting blown into the air, and landing on the next until a path was clear.

Bad@games

I agree that's probably the Fool, but I'm not 100 percent. If the Dicer died it may be them stealing cats' luck or smthn

letouriste

Cats know well the Dicer, she would recognize him at first glance.

I assume it would be the same for any of the heroes who joined the alliance (so the fortunate fool too).

ninegardens

My main question is... is any of his old crew here. I feel like Nessie very much didn't deploy him vs his old friends Hanno or WotW who would have had some story vs him involving the power of friendship and/or tragedy... but I think maybe the Painted Knife should recognize him? Was she in Hanno's old (V2) band at the Vales?

Sir Nil

Who lucky could he have been? He's dead.

Sir Nil

How* goddamnit autocorrect

Rey d`Tutto

Autocorrupt

LarsBlitzer

I get the sense that if the Story required a sacrifice on the part of the Heroes it would be one of the few things that could override his luck, which seems to be pretty potent. I suppose since he's a revenant now the luck would be somewhat diminished, but it would still take something on the order of using a name to usurp it.

RivettedReader

2nd para: "somewhere in hit that then leapt" -> "somewhere in it that then leapt"

BargleNawdleZouss

It seems to me that the DK's Revenants and Scourges do not change their powers and Aspects in their undeath. IIRC, the Fortunate Fool only had good luck for himself, but was unable to project his fortunate like the Pilfering Dicer can. If that's the case, then FF should have survived the Fortress Drop(tm), but nothing else.

ruduen

I wonder this means if I get my old question answered now. That is, what happens if the Pilfering Dicer and Fortunate Fool meet?

Juff

Typo Thread:

you put those > you get those in hit that > that distended scaled belly with > a distended scaled belly and one our side > on our side had had > had forty-yards > forty-yard change of > chance of the slow > the slope city made > city had been made a later > a layer trap did > traps did in direction > in that direction amour > armour that invaders > that as invaders, impressive > impressively plaint > plain it now > now
the sole street > the street to ambushed > to be ambushed if fall > it fall
I'd been > It'd been allow through > allowed through A woman decked (extra space) to be just so > just so

ohJohN

bassinet > basinet

(the former is a cradle, the latter a helmet)

Mirror Night

Mage Rematch

Also we finally get to meet the Red Knight eh. Few Named have gotten talked about more before actually showing up. Very She Hulk inspired or I guess Red She Hulk not so much for the coloration difference more that Jennifer is pretty smart all the time when Hulking Out.

As for her armor standing out well when your seven feet tall and Named not sure do subtle well anyway. I say its more a liability against Undead (or thinks that dont have fear). She seems very much like old Mirror Knight though more Offensive.

BargleNawdleZouss

I always saw The Berserker as a more direct analogy of The Hulk, not She-Hulk. I would compare Red Knight to Juggernaut, or perhaps, given the way she absorbed that curse, to Absorbing Man.

Regret

I though the Red Knight was more inspired by Logen Ninefingers, AKA The Bloody Nine.

"Something dug into the Bloody-Nine's back, but there was no pain. It was a sign. A message in a secret tongue, that only he could understand. It told him where the next dead man was standing. "

"Kill me?' The Bloody-Nine laughed louder than ever. 'I do the killing, fool!"

"The man screamed, and screamed behind his mask, and the Bloody-Nine laughed, and twisted the blade. Logen might have pitied him, but Logen was far away and the Bloody-Nine had no more pity in him than the winter. Less even. He stabbed, and cut, and cut, and smiled, and the screams bubbled and died, and he let the corpse drop to the cold stones. His fingers were slick with blood and he wiped it on his clothes, on his arms, on his face – just as it should be. "

Earl of Purple

Ever since I first read about the Red Knight and the Skinchanger, I wanted more. Now we've got more and I love them. It's a pity Red Knight can't meet Captain, and have a big lady competition. Skinchanger would have been useful after Beastmaster died, so they could sort of keep the manticore. And I think her skins may have come from the Chain of Hunger. I wonder if she could wear the shape of an Ancient One.

Wonder

Happy new year y'all

WAAAAARRRRRRGGGGGGGHHHHHH

Nothing else was streaming from my mouth other than a silenced version of the above with my fist shaking in the air ...

This chapter was totally AWESOME!!!!

Kane A Larabee

Love me some good ol Rouge Sorcerer. Easily one of my favorite Named all time. Good stuff from cat and we get to see more named fun. Happy new year!

Bad@games

Wait a sec. If that shamblly revenant is the the Fortunate Fool then this may be a problem. Or mabey the Pilfering Dicer? Idk if they are dead or not

letouriste

he's not, as far we know. He was there in cat's showdown against Hanno and Cordelia and there's no report he died since then

Liliet

We have a problem regardless, and even if this is not the latest Fortunate Fool, it definitely seems to be one of the genre...

agumentic

If this was a Named from this war, Cat would just recognize them. So it's someone new.

letouriste

yep 😊

I bet on a twin personality guy

Someperson

There is an off chance that it's one of the past holders of a Name like Fortunate Fool, but yeah it isn't somebody we've seen before.

Earl of Purple

If the Fortunate Fool were a villain, I'd agree with you. Unfortunately, he's a hero. Cat would have had very little to do with him, and was fighting on another front when he died. He stayed with Klaus, and the Procerans from the Red Flower Vales. He might not have had a rest period away from the lines, so it's quite possible that they never actually met. Even during the Crusade, he was fighting on the southern front against Amadeus, not Cat's own army.

agumentic

That would be true if there wasn't a two-year time skip Fortunate Fool died in. Cat was fighting on the same side as him for at least a year, and I am willing to bet she could recognize every Named that participated in the war, much less someone whose sacrifice was apparently so important that it was one of the turning points of a campaign.

Earl of Purple

Why should she? Cat had enough trouble throwing Ishaq through a table and collapsing a tower on the Red Knight to stop them taking over her job, and cutting off the Pilfering Dicer's fingers because he stole luck from her soldiers. When she meets heroes, she's going to pay attention to the ones that she thinks matter, the strong ones, the attractive ones, the powerful ones, the ones that Hanno tells her about. The Fortunate Fool, a comic relief Named whom Klaus mentioned carried more herbs than an alchemist, isn't strong. He's not attractive. He doesn't really seem to matter. His most notable achievements are killing the Lord of Ghouls and clearing a path through a minefield at the Red Flower Vales. Cat was on the same side as Adanna of Smyrna for two years, the Blessed Artificer, and was still surprised when Roland mentioned she had yellow-gold eyes. There's too many Named for her to have met them all, and her duties as head of the Villains means she's going to concentrate on those.

Earl of Purple

Also the heroes that cause trouble for her or her allies/friends/underlings/Hanno, like the Mirror Knight and possibly the Maddened Keeper- though she's forgotten most of what she knew of her.

Wonder

Where has it been shown that Cat only cares or pays attention to the attractive heroes? That undermines her sense of danger, her experience .

Earl of Purple

I'm not saying she only pays attention to them, I'm saying they stick in her mind better. If she met Fortunate Fool whilst he was with a band, he's probably the one who stays in the background. His Name grants him luck, and from Klaus' opinion of him- more herbs than an alchemist- I don't think he'd make much of an impression, unless it was just the two of them and he was visibly stoned.

Miles

Cat has paid particularly close attention to comic relief characters since before the Bumbling Sorcerer. She'd notice.

laguz24

This is probably was an orphan peasant who took up the sword and still retains some story power from that.

Someperson

So is Catherine 😊

Someperson

Well, now we've seen the opening moves with the armies on a strategic level, I suppose it's only fair that the Named start fighting their fights.

And Akua. Because Akua doesn't need a Name to beat up a Scourge.

Those barricades are gonna be rough on the armies, though, especially for armies less badass than a Callowan heavy shield wall. I don't suppose there's a way they could pre-emptively collapse some of those buildings so they aren't in the way as much?

Sadly, the art of lake-o-mancy is probably out of the question, for a number of reasons.

Frivolous

Better Akua than any Named actually, because the Scourges have the story of killing Named.

Akua, being powerful yet not Named, sidesteps that little issue.

Sykomantis

... why has it taken me this long to realize that the Rogue Sorcerer reminds me of Constantine?!

Barrendur

@Sykomantis:

I can definitely see the similarities in magical style, and in intelligence/knowledge, wit and balls of depleted uranium! But though Roland is probably just as dangerous as John, he still manages to be likeable with it, affable, almost playful, whereas John is a sarky bastard with a big mouth, who gives the impression that if he claps you on the back, he's just getting a sense of where best to plant the knife.

Love 'em both, but I'd be hard-pressed to say I actually like John Constantine. I do like Roland the Rogue Sorcerer... and I think their different styles of self-presentation might be why it took you a while to notice the similarities.

Rey d`Tutto

And as an un-Named Role, Akua likely learned a little Story-fu after the Cloak Shade Incident.

Chapter 60: Blood

"When the gathered princes of the Alamans demanded to know by what right she asked them to swear obeisance, Triumphant laughed and replied: 'To be Dread Empress of Praes is to be a question asked of all Creation: will you kneel, or be made to?'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Dominion, twenty-fourth of the Secret Histories of Praes

I'd never seen her wear that armour before.

A plumed conical helm of steel worked with gold engravings led to a sheet of mail covering her throat, all of it above a beautifully worked set of red chain mail covered in parts by segmented plate – pauldrons sculpted like lionheads, an ornate breastplate with a crimson sash for belt and skirted panels that covered both her legs down to her knees. It was all red and gold, save for the sword sheathed her hip. That was pure steel except for the egg-sized ruby set into the pommel. The entire set shone with subtle engravings that reeked of magic. Protective enchantments, I guessed. I made myself stop staring, though not quite quickly to avoid an amused quirk of those full lips.

"You sure you've got him?" I asked, gesturing at the Tumult.

He was rising to his feet, magic already ticking around his hands.

"My heart," Akua drawled, "if I had him any more, I would already have spent him."

"A yes would have sufficed," I informed her, pulling at Night.

"Ah," she smiled, "but where would the fun in that be?"

Tendrils of shadow tossed me up a moment later, even as I smelled a scent like ozone and heard Akua say something in Mthethwa that sounded a lot like 'how pedestrian'. Well, if she could afford to be that condescending I figured she'd be all right. I landed with a hiss of pain atop the tiled roof just in time to watch the Red Knight lose a few teeth. Even most Named I knew would have died when taking a hit of the Mantle's mace on the side of the face, but instead the villainess was thrown like a rag doll and spat out a few bloody teeth. The Mantle did not pause to rejoice, instead turning to me without batting an eye as I looked for the other Revenant that'd been there and found him missing. I was not sure whether to be glad of that or not.

I pulled on Night and released most of it, tossing a handful of black flame her way, but just as I'd thought she immediately pulled her favourite trick: the world went black as she drenched the area in darkness. For me, anyway. The worst part of that trick had always been how it didn't affect her at all.

Fortunately, she'd used it often enough I was not in the least surprised. And, more importantly, I sunk the last of the Night into the tiles of the roof. A heartbeat later I felt one resonate as a step was taken on it, so without hesitation I flicked my wrist and agitated the Night in the tile: it blew up. The darkness faded, revealing the hole the Mantle had just fallen through, and I smiled. The Scourge was twice my size and encased in the heaviest armour I'd ever seen, but those strengths came with costs. Like, you know, weighing enough that you'd fall right through any weakened rooftop instantly. I limped to the side, a cursed turning to powder the tile I'd been standing on a moment earlier, and through that opening tossed another handful of black flame at the Mantle. I'd used the fire on her often enough to know it wouldn't do shit to that armour, but there was one thing it was quite good at: blinding the Revenant senses that she used instead of her eyes.

So while she put out the fire I'd just thrown in her face, I continued limping away and let the Night rage through my veins. I wove strands quickly, doubling back to strengthen them, and I had just finished the second layer when I felt the Mantle lose her temper. Or so I assumed, because she'd put enough strength into that curse there was goosebumps all over my skin. I kept backing away, but it came to nothing when the entire roof turned into smoke beneath me. That's a problem, I idly noted as I began to fall. The way she waiting for me below, already beginning the swing that would smash my ribs and rupture my guts, was also something of a problem.

Fortunately for her, I had a secret weapon.

"Know your place," the Red Knight snarled, and smashed her war hammer into the back of the Mantle's head.

There was a satisfying sound as the back of the Revenant's helmet crumpled, but to the villainess' surprise her blow went no deeper. The real win was my insides staying on the inside, though, as the Mantle had to kill her swing long enough to backhand the Red Knight through a wall. That was two wins, really, when you thought about it. My Name tugged at me and I did not resist, angling my fall. My bad leg gave when I landed, to my swallowed moan of pain, but the way I dropped down ended up ensuring that a boiling curse didn't end up cooking my brain so luck me. Wincing as I rose, I stepped out of the way of a mace swing. I wasn't worried up close, at least.

The Mantle had been a priestess in life, not a warrior. Her danger up close came from strength and size, not skill, and I was a few years past being scared of something just for those.

"You know," I said, "I've never heard you talk."

The swing shattered the wall behind me but a half-step took me out of the arc, and she wasn't quite quick enough with the follow-up curse: I tossed a handful of black flames at her wrist before she loosed it, scrapping her aim. It went through the open door and melted stone in the street. Nasty, I thought.

"I can't tell if you're one of those Neshamah had to cut up the soul of badly so they'd obey," I said, "or if it's because there's just no mouth to speak with under that helm."

It was an impressive piece, admittedly, covering her entire face in lengths of steel save for two downwards eye slits. The spikes that went past the crown of her head almost evoked the shape of a crown. The floor trembled as the blow meant to rip down through my shoulder hit nothing but air and stone while I twisted my will, keeping an eye on her as I took the working I'd crafted earlier in hand. Almost ready, I just needed her distracted. A heartbeat later what looked like a wave of pure heat melted through half the room we were in, forcing her to hastily backpedal away while in the distance I heard Akua call the Tumult a clumsy debutante in Mthethwa. That'll do, I mused, and pulled.

The string of Night twanged over my head, pulled tight by one of the pulleys I'd formed out of sight, and it caught the Mantle in the chest. The force of the pull slammed her into the wall, where she immediately began to struggle to get out. I took a limping step forward, raising my hand.

"That's the problem with being so large," I told her. "Makes you an easier target, and you need so much room to move."

Another chord passed over my head with a twanging sound, tightening her against the wall. And I didn't need to bend because she was so tall, not because I was fucking short. I was a goddamn queen, so implying otherwise was treason. The Mantle changed tactics, moving to smash the wall she was being pinned against instead, but I flicked my wrist and another chord bound her while she was trying to move it. No room, no swing. She could be as strong as she wanted, without space to move it meant nothing. I bound her twice more as I approached, closing in.

"I couldn't help but notice you usually move when using a curse," I told her. "Not everyone needs that, but then you weren't born a priestess of curses were you? While you breathed it was Light you used. It's not your speciality."

And undead, for all their strengths in some regards, could not truly learn. If it had been a limit for her while she lived, she would not overcome it no matter how long she existed. I raised my sword, pulling on Night, and dipped into my Name to See what lay ahead. I paused in surprise, which almost cost me my life. When her mace exploded with power, a blind curse of wrath shattering the wall the Mantle was bound to, I froze for a moment as I returned to the here and now. Tearing through the chords of Night she swung down with all her strength, but in the moment that I beheld the present I saw it. An opening. A half step to the left as the mace came down, inclining my head even further and angling my body so that the diagonal downwards swing missed by a hair's breadth.

She pivoted, other hand coming to slam a curse into my belly even as she broke the floor with her mace but I pivoted and smoothly, almost gently, thrust upwards. I'd barely even taken two steps, I thought as the point of my sword slid into the eyehole, but then that was the difference between strength and skill wasn't it?

"Silence," I said, aspect burning down my blade.

Her power winked out and her limbs dropped as I felt steel cut into bone. As I'd thought, she couldn't actually move around that mass of steel she was encased in without the help of something like an enchantment. I knew deep in my bones that the aspect would only silence the Mantle's power for a moment, but a moment was all I needed. I pulled on Night as I raised my free hand, moving to slam it onto the pommel of my sword to incinerate everything inside the armour, but before I could sorcery bloomed above my head. Gods, I thought as I glanced up, above everyone's head.

Storm clouds roiled, but that wasn't half as worrisome as the lightning I could see rippling inside them.

I hastily threw up the Night I'd been pulling in into a shield instead of a killing stroke, feeling it shudder as lightning struck at it. And then twice more. I backed away, half expecting a mace to be swung at my head, but after I took cover under an arch what I saw was that the Mantle had been blasted as well. She'd dropped her mace. Unlike me, though she was able to walk a lightning strike off. Something she proved by hastily leaving the house we'd been brawling in, turning the corner and out of sight. Fuck. I took a step forward, wanting to pursue, but lightning began to fall again and I had to put up a shield of Night. Cursing, I doubled back to where I'd left Akua only to find her already headed my way.

"That's the Tumult, right?" I said, pointing upwards.

"It is," she admitted. "I took off both his arms but he fled and threw that up behind him to cover his retreat."

"The Mantle's as well," I grunted. "Can you end it?"

She shook her head.

"Magic was used to make the storm and is still being used to guide strikes, but the lightning storm itself is not magical," Akua said. "Unless I-"

Lightning struck, but that wasn't what caught my attention. It was the way it curved back up, then hit another lightning bolt. What in the Hells, I thought, as slowly every speck of lightning within the clouds was gathered into a single sphere. I felt an aspect at work there, but it wasn't the Tumult's. I was sure of that.

"Gods behold," Akua grinned, almost girlish. "It is Masego."

"Lightning's not a form of power, though," I said. "He shouldn't be able to control it."

"Unless," she said, "he copied the Tumult's guiding spell from looking at it, cast it as well and then wrested that."

Lightning came down in a blinding wave ahead of us, forcing me to cover my eye and serving as helpful reminder that Masego was still one of the most terrifying people I'd ever met. I was reminded twice over when we linked back up with my legionaries, finding then that the lightning had ended up clearing most of the enemy ahead while essentially razing three city blocks as a collateral. Fucking Hells, Zeze. You're not pulling your punches today. As I'd expected, Kallia's band of five had come out ahead in the struggle. I got to hear as much from her, as well as something else I'd spared a moment to wonder about.

"The wizard Revenant retreated with the ragged one," the Painted Knife told me.

I grimaced. So Neshamah had decided they were useful enough to keep for the rematch that no doubt awaited us deeper in. Good to know.

"Stay with the Army of Callow," I ordered her. "I need you to cover them from Named. Akua Sahelian and I will go with the vanguard."

"As you say, Warden," Kallia replied.

The push to the avenue was staggeringly fast, what with Hierophant having essentially vaporized our opposition. We pushed forward and the moment I set foot on the pavement stones I sent a runner back. We were, at long last, past the first hurdle.

Keter's avenues were massive things, all of them at least forty feet wide and paved with massive slabs of granite that went deep into the earth. It was needed for constructs to be able to move about the capital without constantly wrecking everything – no matter how careful a giant death snake was being, it did not stop being a giant death snake. The rain of ash made it hard for men to see too far ahead, but my dead eye had become a thousand one of Night instead. I saw far and gave a hard smile at what I found: we'd caught the enemy out of position. The avenue went up in an angled slope all the way to the inner-city wall, a ring of stout bastions bristling with soldiers and war machines, and though there were enemies by the thousands gathering along the length of it there was no cohesive force.

It was half a dozen packs of undead being thrown in the way, not a proper army.

"Secure our position," I shouted. "I want those alleys blocked off and a vanguard readied for a push."

Absent-mindedly I pulled on Night and tossed out a ball of black flame, incinerating the head of the beorn that'd risked popping out of cover ahead of my men. The legionaries cheered and got to work with tired professionalism, moving out as the sergeants and lieutenants barked out their orders. Though we'd broken through the Dead King's barricades, our advance put us in a precarious position. We were like an iron spike driven into a block of ice: all the streets around the grounds we'd taken there were still thick with undead. Right now we were suffering only small probes, but that was because they would be gathering in bands led by Binds so that they could mass enough numbers to be a threat when attacking our position instead of blade fodder.

The relative steadiness of our advance was an illusion whose end was fast approaching. If this were another sort of siege it would have been worth it to try to clear the lower city of Keter before we assault the inner wall, but here it would be suicide: we'd wreck our armies beyond repair doing that. Instead we had to push through and roll the dice, driving deep towards the Hellgate so we might take it and the Dead King with it. I grabbed the shoulder of the closest captain – a dusky-skinned Taghreb with chubby cheeks – and leaned in closer.

"Where has Lady Akua gone?" I asked, lowering my voice.

"She has gone to rifle through dead bodies, Your Majesty," the captain replied.

There was not a hint of the distaste in his voice that I would have found in a Callowan reporting the same thing. I almost asked him 'what for', but I was doubtful he knew and it'd mean admitting that I didn't. Instead I sagely nodded and released his shoulder after reminding him to send Commander Spitter's runner my way the moment they arrived. I needed word from the rest of the fight for Keter as soon as possible before deciding whether we should commit to a push up the avenue. The opportunity was there, and soon to fade, but if we were going at it alone it'd be nothing but an elaborate suicide charge. Thankfully, I did not have to wait long.

Though I had expected one, it was not a legionary that returned bearing news and I cocked an eyebrow when an unexpected pair approached instead. One I was familiar with, a girl in dusty mages robes with a bony face and a scowl bearing Masego's old Name: Sapan of Ashur, the Apprentice. The second I did not know as well, save through the words of others. The Page was not all that tall, though his slenderness gave the impression he was, and his chestnut hair was a riot of enviable curls. His armour was too light for my tastes, a cuirass and leather instead of proper plate or mail, but it was still better than the rapier he'd somehow been tricked into thinking was an acceptable battlefield weapon.

"Should I take it there's no need to wait for an officer?" I asked.

"Commander Issawi decided it would be simpler to send us directly to you, Your Excellency," Sapan said, offering a short bow.

The Proceran mirrored her perfectly but I barely paid attention to him. Issawi, she'd said, and not Spitter. The old commander was probably dead, I grimly realized, and if I remembered the ranks right his senior tribune was another Callowan so she was probably dead too. Our senior officers were dropping like flies, which smacked of Keter targeting them. Fucking Neshamah, he'd figured out our weakness compared to the Legions of Terror: the comparative lack of experienced officers.

"Then speak," I said. "How go the other offensives?"

"Lord Hanno had taken his gate and is pushing towards the inner city, Your Excellency," the Page proudly told me.

Meaning the Lycaonese had once more lived up to their reputation and pushed unflinchingly through the slaughter it'd take to get boots atop a gatehouse of Keter. Good. We'd gambled that they might, sending Hanno and the Kingfisher Prince there on top of a heroic band of five and the Witch of the Woods for magical muscle.

"The other gate?" I asked.

"The Dominion and the Clans were forced to retreat," Sapan told me. "The Warlord decided casualties were too high and their foothold on the gatehouse too fragile to keep up the storm."

Fuck, I thought. That meant there was only us coming from the southwest and the Procerans coming from the east of the city. We'd hoped that my army's push would draw enough dead that Hakram and the Blood would be able to take the eastern gate, but that might have been too ambitious. It might be why we weren't as badly drowned in soldiers as I thought we'd be, I mused. Neshamah might have decided to focus on keeping the third army out of his city instead of focusing on either us or the Proceran. If that was true, all those reinforcements were about to begin hammering at the Army of Callow's positions soon. I forced myself to set the speculation aside.

Whether it was true or not didn't matter, since the choice I had to make hadn't changed: we were committing to an attack on the inner wall or not?

"How recent are your news about the Lycaonese offensive?" I asked.

"Half an hour, Your Excellency," the Page told me. "I fought with mercenaries before being sent as a messenger."

However learned his courtesies, he did not quite manage to hide the resentment in his tone. Would have preferred to stay with the push, huh. The Apprentice did not seem so burdened, I could not help but noticed, as befitting of someone who'd gone through the gruelling campaign in the Wasteland under my commands.

"Half an hour," I muttered, drumming my fingers against the side of my leg. "And you say they were pushing deep?"

"They were storming barricades up the avenue when I left," the young hero agreed.

That was the advantage of taking a gate instead of a breach like my army had: the Procerans had been on an avenue from the start. If it went well, I assessed, it was likely that Hanno and the Lycaonese would take a swing at the inner-city wall before my people did. That thought clinched the decision, because the same reason I was hesitating to commit to an attack – fear of attacking the inner wall alone and getting my teeth kicked in – was now also a reason to commit to that very same attack. It'd be the Procerans getting their teeth kicked in, if I left them to hang high and dry.

"Then there's no room left for hesitation," I said. "I need you two to carry word back to Prince Otto, assuming he still holds command of the Proceran van."

"He does, Your Excellency," Sapan assured me.

"Then tell him I'm taking a run at the inner wall," I said, "and committing all my reserves to the push. I'll see him when we're both through."

The Page looked split between irritation – at being made a messenger again, no doubt – and eagerness at being able to return to fight with his countrymen, but as far as I was concerned he was just the escort. The Apprentice nodded and I clapped her shoulder amicably before sending them both off. I didn't offer them an escort. That was the point of using Named as messengers, after all: they could get through the undead-infested city without one. It felt like absurd luxury to use champions of the Gods as messenger pigeons, but if there was one place on Calernia that warranted the absurdity it was the Crown of the Dead. I sought more mundane messengers as well, to send word to Commander Issawi that she was to prepare for a push.

That, and to send for my personal standard and the people bearing it.

Akua returned not long after, what she'd been up to during her absence quite evident. She was riding what could generously be called a horse, at least in shape. It was a necromantic construct, made out of stripped parts from ghouls and larger monsters. Sloppy in some ways, I mused, since some muscles had clearly been melted together – a brute force method – and the sections that'd been sown together sported shining thread. An enchantment, not real thread, and so vulnerable to being dispelled. Still, I could only be impressed that she'd put together what looked like a leathery horse-shaped golem in what could only be half an hour. It was moving pretty well, too, its bone hooves clacking light against the stone.

"Expecting to need a horse?" I idly asked.

She cocked an eyebrow at me.

"The enemy up the avenue are in disarray," Akua said. "Knowing you, you will want to strike while the iron is hot."

She did know me, I thought with the usual mixture of pleasure and dread. Enough that a glance at what lay ahead had been enough to figure out what I intended, apparently.

"Can you reach the flying fortresses?" I asked. "I need to send word."

"I already have," she said, "but another was ahead of me."

I blinked in surprise.

"Marshal Juniper has ordered the Old Mothers to move to support the push towards the inner wall and the rest to protect the Army of Callow's flanks," Akua amusedly said. "It seems I am not the only one who can see through you, dearest."

Gods, Hellhound, I thought, still awed after all these years. Any report you get should be at least half an hour behind me and confused, on top of having a lesser read than I on what's going on at the front. And still she'd been a step ahead of me. I closed my eye, sinking into Night to find Zombie and have a look through her senses, only to find that below the hippocorvid two banners flew. I jostled back into my own body, lips twitching as I corrected my estimate to Juniper of the Red Shields having been two steps ahead of me. I turned to glanced behind me, Zombie large black wings folding as she plunged down through the sky and landed on the stone behind me at a run, circling around me as legionaries hastily got out of her way. Further back, more of my soldiers were moving.

Parting to make way for the same people I'd sent for now knowing my marshal had already sent them out: banners high, the Order of Broken Bells came forth.

Cracked bronze bells on black flew by the Sword and Crown, under them the first order of knights raised since the Conquest advancing in good order. Horses and men barded in steel carved with hymns to the Heavens as my people had done for centuries, killing lances raised not yet lowered for the charge. There was not a man or woman among them whose armour was not scuffed and dented, who'd not had at least a horse killed under them. Grandmaster Brandon Talbot rode at their head, the raised visor revealing his strong jaw and neat black beard. The once-heir to Marchford had gone from my prisoner to one of the few nobles I actually liked – if not trusted – over the years and led his knights through many a battlefield in my name.

Too many, perhaps. The Order of Broken Bells now numbered eighteen hundred, a respectable number given the losses in the Wasteland and on the plains of the Ossuary, but that was a fragile thing. When the siege of Keter had begun, I'd given a permission to Talbot that I had denied him throughout my entire reign: he was to knight his squires as he wished, without regard to age or training. The Broken Bells fielded eighteen hundred knights because there were no longer squires in the order, and barely any spare horses left for that matter. The strength mustered today was the last they had to wield, and should it perish the riders of Vivienne's own knightly order would be the last cavalry left in the kingdom.

The Army of Callow had fought too many battles, too many wars. Even after draining my kingdom dry of manpower as fee queens before me had dared, we were running out of war bodies to put in suits of armour – much less the likes of knight, costly to arm and train as they were.

"We come as called, Your Majesty," Brandon Talbot greeted me.

I held out my hand and Zombie nuzzled it, rubbing her feathered cheeks against the gauntlet. I patted her until she purred, only then moving to hoist myself onto the saddle.

"I have work for you," I said.

He glanced at the avenue, the dead gathering there in throngs of thousands and beginning to raise barricades. The nobleman spared a look for Akua as well before returning his gaze to me.

"To ride into the jaws of death," Sir Brandon said, sounding rather pleased.

There was, I thought, such a lovely madness to my people sometimes. I rolled my shoulder, limbering my sword arm. I was getting cramps, the costs of not spending enough time on the training field these days.

"Momentum's still on our side," I said, "but we need to prevent the enemy from consolidating before the Third Army can begin its push. That means trampling..."

I trailed off, flicking a glance at the gathering horde.

"All of that, more or less," I idly finished.

"An afternoon's work," one of the knights called out.

There was grim, satisfied laughter. I indulged them with a smile, because if they hadn't earned the right to a few harsh boasts then who on Creation had? I caught Grandmaster Talbot's eye.

"Do you remember the first time we met, Brandon?" I asked.

The bearded man smiled.

"I could forget my name, Your Majesty, and still remember that," he said.

"You thought I was too young," I teased.

"The world's gotten older," Brandon Talbot simply said. "So have we."

True enough. Flakes of ash crusted at the edge of the banner first raised from a cell, the cracked bells on imperial black that I had chosen as much as a warning as an emblem. I felt the warm breath of the Beast against my cheek, just as I had that day.

"Do you regret it?" I suddenly asked. "That you knelt that day, struck your bargain."

The brown-eyed man studied me for a long moment, his face grown hard to read.

"There were times I did," the grandmaster admitted. "Lows and long nights, when the bodies piled too high."

I did not dare interrupt, breath caught still in my throat.

"But here we are," Brandon Talbot softly said, gesturing at the horror around us. "The end of our road, Catherine Foundling. Perhaps of all our roads."

The knight smiled.

"It has been a long ride," he said, "but I regret nothing, Queen of Callow."

The breath I'd been choking on left my lips, ragged, and I offered a stilted nod back. Sometimes you didn't know you'd wanted to hear something until after you'd heard it.

"Then come on," I said, voice steadying as it rose. "All of you. It has been too long since the Dead King last heard the horns of the knights of Callow."

My sword cleared the scabbard, rising to catch a glint of sunlight.

"Let us remind the Enemy," I said, "why so many learned to fear the sound."

I guided Zombie with my knees, leading her forward into the avenue. Talons scraped against the stone, her wings folded close to her side, as behind me men began to move. The banners flew high, catching wind that shook off the ash, and the knights of Callow sounded the old defiance. The horns sounded once, twice, thrice.

All knights charge, the call went, and charge we did.

—

It was like a clap of thunder, the sound of a wedge of heavy cavalry going through a shield wall.

I hacked down half-blindly, smashing open an iron helm as Zombie barreled through the undead and all around me heavy lances tore punched through shields and corpses alike. I hacked and hacked, like a farmer reaping wheat, until suddenly there was nothing but stone pavement before me and my mount let out a cacophonous caw. I led her forward, only slowing when knights began to catch up. Half of them had discarded broken lances, unsheathing swords to replace them.

“REDEMPTION IN STEEL,” Grandmaster Talbot shouted.

A hard cheer echoed him, and we gathered into a wedge again. Ahead of us, another shield wall was forming even as behind us the shattered remains of the thousand skeletons we’d just trampled into dust fled the avenue. The Third Army’s banner was on the move, I saw. The push was beginning, we needed to clear the way for it. The horns sounded again, and we began to advance at a trot. Akua pulled close to me, her necromantic mount keeping pace as she held her sword like someone who’d not used one in too long. The enemy brought a few spears out in front of the shield wall, maybe half a hundred, but it was not them my eye sought.

I felt sorcery at work, and soon found it: cabals of robed mages, skeletons with burning green eyes and not a speck of flesh left, stood at the back of the shield wall shaping eerie cubes of what looked like smoke.

“Akua,” I shouted.

I heard her snarl out an incantation even as the Order of Broken Bells quickened, going from trot to gallop. We began to close the distance, the smoke cubes rising in the air even as Akua’s fingers traced runes in the air and tore through them, but it was not to be so simple. On the streets that flanked us on both sides I saw movement, creatures looking like pale white – the pale of foul flesh, of creatures from deep water all wet and shining – hounds rising from crouches to break into a run. There were hundreds of them, and with an angry hiss I pulled on Night. I scorched our left flank, the abominations fleeing the black fire, but those to the right got through.

They leap with unnatural agility, baring half a dozen mouths full of curved teeth, but that was not the nastiest turn. Those that were cut or pierced took the blows like butter, staying stuck. It was fat, I realized with dim horror. The fat of corpses, riddled with teeth and unleashed like hounds. Men and horses tumbled down where the abominations caught them, biting into our wedge, but moments later I could spare no more thought for it: thunder clapped as I slapped away a spear and Zombie trampled the shield wall, tearing into the enemy. I hacked and hacked, arms burning from the toil as my Name steadied my hand and whispered lovingly in my ear. We would win, it promised. We would get to the end.

The cubes of smoke were brought down on us, exploding into clouds that smelled of death, but though a handful of knights choked to death in their armour the worst of it was blown away by the burst of wind that Akua smashed into the enemy, blowing away soldiers as much as the smoke. The hole it made relieved pressure enough for the Order to finish breaking through, barrelling through the undead and continuing down the avenue. We slowed, formed up into a wedge again as I tossed fire behind us to keep the fat hounds away – they were vulnerable, a spark was all they needed to light up – and our eyes moved ahead. There the enemy had gathered up, dragging up chunks of wall to make a barricade as archers and javelinmen massed behind thick lines of skeletons.

And beyond them, I saw, it was worse. Three more large knots of enemy, getting larger and better dug in. Half a dozen smaller ones at least. How many knights were dead already? Too many, I thought, and it would only get worse as we tired and began to slow.

“REDEMPTION IN STEEL,” Grandmaster Talbot shouted.

They shouted it back and we broke into a trot, advancing unflinchingly. Curses shot out from the enemy formation but the knights laughed, the sorcery sliding off their armour like water off a duck’s back. Akua screamed an incantation, throwing at the enemy a swirling ball of darkness that exploded into drops. All of the undead they touched twitched and began to turn on each other, hacking away. The Order of Broken Bells cheered, cheered the deed of a woman they had hated an hour ago and would hate again an hour from now. There were hardly any lances left, all of them left in broken bodies, but the handful remaining were lowered as we broken into a gallop.

I watched the flanks, and my vigilance was not for naught: I caught the movement first. Ghouls that had crouched atop rooftops suddenly rose, leaping down and running towards us with howls, as something altogether more sinister rose behind them. They looked like great worms of bone, though the tail ended looking like a lizard’s and under their ‘neck’ two leathery, spindly arms ending in claws jutted out. It was the lungs that drew the eye, though, two bulging great sacks like a bullfrog’s stomach with the appearance of muscle that were pumping in air and swelling. Using the clawed arms to drag themselves into position atop the roofs, the creatures all turned to face us and unhinged their ‘heads’ to reveal toothless maws.

The spat clouds of some foul black gas at us, filling the air.

Akua incanted again as we tore through the ghouls in our way, hacking at the flesh, but they'd not been meant to win, only to slow us. Volleys of arrows fell in a thick rain, the gas drifted towards us on a lazy wind and the enemy mages began their rituals. I pulled deep on Night, ignoring the gas – Akua would have to take care of it – as Brand Talbot shouted for the knight to form up, to prepare a charge anew at the enemy ranks. It was turning sour on us, I realized, and... and a shadow was cast over us all. Wind screamed as the flying fortress approached and lightning began to fall in the enemy's ranks. A heartbeat later, the bottom of the fortress let out a burning light that tore through half a dozen houses in a heartbeat.

And then ladders were lowered.

"Forward," I shouted, "forward!"

We cut through the last of the ghouls as Akua blew black the gas, tightening ranks as we broke into a gallop again. An arrow slid off the side of my helm and another sunk into Zombie's skull, which annoyed her more than anything else. The Order smoothly split into two wings, one for each opening in the enemy barricade, and we thundered through. I screamed myself hoarse, hacking away at a sea of skulls and rotten faces, hands and blades coming at me from all sides. From the corner of my eye I saw a scythe hit Akua's armoured wrist, slapping her sword out of her fingers, and with a shout of anger I torched the Bind that'd dared. We pushed at the ranks of the enemy, the momentum of our aborted charge now gone, and knights began to drop.

But even as legionaries began to land on our side I found that the undead before me no longer bore swords, only bows and javelins and crossbows. I had reached the back.

"Almost through," I shouted.

"Callow," the shout came back. "Callow and the broken bells!"

But we were slowing, dying and I had begun to pull on Night again when a spell hit the middle of the enemy formation and crushed half a dozen soldiers with a projectile. No, I realized a heartbeat later, not a spell. High Marshal Nim, the Black Knight of Praes, rose from her crouch and swung her warhammer with a great cry.

Undead were scattered likes leaves in a storm.

And just like that, it began to turn around. I could feel it in my bones. The sky filled with thousands of tons of stone and arrogance and they gathered again, my ragged Order of Broken Bells. Spells fell on the dead like summer rain. Fire and lightning and frost, acid and darkness and smoke that moved and swallowed men. Wind blew up in geysers, sand heated almost to glass was thrown in sheets half a mile wide. And curses, curses of the likes Calernia had learned to fear: iron rusted and bent, flesh melted and bone turned to powder. Souls were ripped out of Binds and turned into streaks of weeping flame, skeletons exploded into shards. And worse, curses even Keter stood in fear of.

And as the mfuasa unleashed a millennium of learning on the enemy, the lords of ladies and Praes came down to fight.

The Legions of Terror were forming, steel ranks spreading out in every direction with my father's cold ghost smiling through their eyes. Legion mages torched ghouls with methodical and concentrated volleys, sappers disappeared entire ranks of the enemy with sharpeners. The heavies smashed through the enemy ranks like they were made of paste, regulars following behind: orcs locking shields with Taghreb and Soninke and Duni, the shadow of an empire dogging their footsteps. And yet it was not them I my eye was called to as the Order formed up again. It was the splendid few, the beautiful monsters in armours glittering of gold and jewel who stood out among drab and smoky Keter like a flock of birds of paradise in a gutter.

The nobles of the Wasteland, household troops standing around them like a fortress of steel, reminded the world why the Dread Empire of Praes had ruled Calernia from sea to sea.

Devils filled the sky, winged and shouting in the darktongue, as an empire's worth of hidden vaults was emptied at the hosts of Keter. The air filled with fire and blood dripped from the sky, the wind itself turning red as the High Lord of Okoro rode it on a chariot and sowed burning seeds of fire like a farmer on the field. Storms roared in wrath as the High Lady of Kahtan unleashed the old spirits bound by her house, colossal things of ruin and wind striding the field. Ghouls fled before the unleashed bestiary of Aksum like whipped dogs, tides of fouled water swept hundreds as the High Lord of Nok commanded the waves and at the heart of them all Sargon Sahelian was laughing, baring his crooked smile like fangs.

He wielded thirteen pillars of stone large as towers, crushing enemies beneath them like a child hammering down at ants with a pestle.

But beyond them all, behind them all, the woman who had once been Dread Empress Malicia struck deeper still. For with the falling ash from the sky now fell paler motes, spread about by the fortresses. Still Waters, refined and turned into even more terrifying a weapon. Wherever legionaries fell, now they rose again with empty eyes as eights. Unflinching, obedient, unrelenting. And the enemy buckled as well, for the ritual lighting up within the fortresses were not only for the Praesi dead: they were also for Keter's. Stealing dead from the King of Death was perhaps too much, but to shatter his hold? Oh, that they could do. Wherever enough of the compound fell, the dead went wild.

Turning on each other, maddened by wrath and despair as the behest of the last empress of Praes.

And we sat the saddle at the heart of it all, the worn survivors of the Order of Broken Bells. Redemption in steel, the cry went up, and we charged. We went through bone and ash, a ray of fire from a fortress opening a path. We cut through towering abominations that looked like the bones of giants trailing ribbons of flesh, shattering knees as the rope-like flesh tore men off horses and ripped them apart. We carved through apes of rotting flesh and the wriggling worms of spoiled blood they burst into, faceless horrors of sown flesh that oozed sickness.

The further we got the harsher the fight, skeletons bearing shells full of burning oil throwing themselves at us as broken bones rose together into drakes mad of soldiers' remains and acid began to fall from the sky, burning at armour and searing flesh. But we got through, Merciless Gods. We smashed and hacked and died, until before us stood the heights of the inner wall and the iron gate barring the way past it. Enemies bristled atop the walls but Grandmaster Talbot shot forward, hammering at the gate thrice with the pommel of his sword, and I laughed myself hoarse. We'd fucking done it. Behind us, flanks covered by the Legions, the ranks of the Army of Callow approached.

We'd gotten them to the wall.

captainmarcia

Hot damn.

Liliet

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Boost!

William

Norsk? Where are you?

Tenthyr

Holy fuck.

Daniel E

The bit that truly allowed me to visualize this madness: "An empire's worth of hidden vaults was emptied at the hosts of Keter". When you consider the sheer quantity and power of nefarious crap that the regions of Praes have been sitting on for centuries. All of the artifacts, contracts, and spells kept in case of a 'mutually assured destruction' event. Literally every Evil trope that makes Praes such a delight is being used against the Dead King. There is no rationing the doomsday weapons here, they are going all-in.

nimelennar

Not every doomsday weapon; it doesn't look like anyone has resorted to summoning Demons.

Yet. It is yet to be seen if there will come a point when it will be worth releasing one from a Hell Egg, despite the damage a Demon (Madness? Corruption? Absence?) does to friendly forces and the landscape, along with foes.

wec

Could you just... chuck them all through the portal to the Serenity and then have Zeze seal it up? No friendly forces to worry about in the Serenity.

SuitorShooter

While that might be a very Praesi kind of solution, a demon left free to consume an entire Hell would almost certainly not stay confined to that Hell.

Someperson

Sure old bones might be a bit rusty but I still don't think the demons would win

Shebmeister

I loved that reminds me of Tolkien's charge of the Rohirrim. Three huzzay for the Broken Bells!

Sugar Roll

Good chance to get rid of everything unacceptable to the accords. Might as well use them and improve your chances at being the next chancellor.

Veyros

All-in, using every artifact and WMD they have stored because its not just the Last Battle against Keter, it's the final fight of the Age of Wonders. There won't ever be Flying Fortresses, chariots of blood and fire, or undead plagues again. There's no place for them in the Age of Order.

Juff

Typo Thread:

a cursed > a curse
was goosebumps > were goosebumps she waiting > she was waiting luck me > lucky me crown. The > crown. The bit I > but I be by > me by thousand one > thousand
It was half > It was half we assault > we assaulted mages robes > mage's robes had taken > has taken changed: we were > changed: were we recent are > recent is but noticed > but notice to used > to use glanced behind > glance behind Zombie large > Zombie's large raised not > raised, not fee queens > few queens of knight, > of knights,
They leap > They leapt
The spat > They spat rain, the > rain as the Brand Talbot > Brandon Talbot knight to > knights to blew black > blew back likes leaves > like leaves
I my eye > my eye
gold and jewel > gold and jewels as eights. (wights?)
as the behest > at the behest mad of > made of

caoimhinh

Also, this part

"...there was only us coming from the southwest and the Procerans coming from the east of the city. We'd hoped that my army's push would draw enough dead that Hakram and the Blood would be able to take the eastern gate, but that might have been too ambitious."

One of those two must be changed, as they can't both have been fighting for the eastern gate.

I think it's either the Procerans should be coming from the west or Hakram failed to take the western gate. But those two armies can't be on the same front.

Liliet

Ah yes, erratic vs cardinal direction strikes again uwu

miles

They directions are snoruth weast

miles

All directions are snoruth weast*

Darkening

Considering she mentions that the other army in the city is the only other army in the city I was assuming the procerans and the levantines were together over there. But it could be a mistake, too. It'd make sense if you had levant at one gate, orcs at the other, and procer at the third while cat takes the breach.

Gerion

Since two of the four bridges are down, they can only storm two gates. The way I read it, the Procerans led by Hanno take one while the orcs band up with the Levantines to take the other one, but fail. I can already see the haughty Procerans looking down on the "barbarians" for that perceived failure, until someone beats some sense into them again.

kaedonbolas

There's also "Lords of ladies and Praes" which should probably be "Lords and Ladies of Praes" even though I find the former more amusing

Ci

Well, now the hard part begins.

Tamina

Dang dang DANG D A N G

dadycoool

Magnificent. Occasionally, I get emotional when I read a chapter and this is one of those chapters.

Casey Glick

I may have missed it. Why were the armies heading for the wall? Was it because Hanno is at the gate and needs the area cleared so his armies can come in?

TigerQuoll

The Army of Callow (with Praesi support from the flying fortresses) under Catherine and the Procerans under Hanno + Kingfisher attacked on two different sides of Keter. The whole chapter is a bit chaotic (which makes sense, given the plot), but if you think of Keter as a circle, they've gotten through the perimeter at two points, but they haven't gotten to the centre, which is the lynchpin or end goal. And they need to get there fast, because, as Catherine discusses, they can't afford to let DK have time to try a counterattack or pull out a trump card, i.e the poisoning of the air in another crusade, those demons he has in reserve, or just bringing tons of troops in through the serenity. So they need to push on immediately and get as far in as fast as possible, and Catherine's beachhead decides to be the one that pushes first. It's not clear whether this is due to Hanno's forces being weaker, or sentimental "we should bear the brunt", but yeah.

Mirror Night

I think it's more she has to push if Hanno and Kingfisher are pushing because if she stops and doesn't push then DK can focus fire. She needs to force DK not to concentrate especially with Hakram's army failing to breach.

letouriste

no, both sides are pushing together. If Cat doesn't push on her side, the other push will not succeed well enough and these troops get surrounded. They need to attack two sides to prevent efficient reinforcement in the dug in positions

Rey d`Tutto

That's my understanding as well.

knockoffnikolai

Keter, like many medieval cities, has multiple layers of wall. In real life cities this is because the cities grew beyond the inner walls and had to keep building more walls around the expanding town; in Keter's case that might have initially been the reason, but it's also been noted that he's turned the city into a tactician's dream scenario for defense in depth.

As for why they need to hit the inner wall right now, Cat and Hanno are attacking from different directions. If they arrive at different times, the defenders can throw all of their resources against one assault, drive them off, and then pivot to the other one. This is what's known as "defeat in detail," you get the enemy to split up and then defeat them in a series of asymmetric engagements instead of just mashing your whole force into their whole force. To avoid that, Cat and Hanno are both rushing to hit the inner wall as fast as possible and force the defenders to split their forces.

Casey Glick

Got it. I think I totally missed that they were attacking an inner wall. I thought she was pushing super hard to get access to the outer wall in a different place.

Liliet

It's the inner wall, not the outer wall.

ninegardens

>"with my father's cold ghost smiling through their eyes"

Oh this line. This line. DAMN.

I love it. Epically played action, like I have seen very few times before.

The 6 books of set up really does add so much punch to this.

thomas johnson

So I think I have finally found an epic scene that mirrors the tyrant trial.

Praes and Callow fighting together under a banner an alliance. I think I am gonna sit on this chapter and stew for a bit before I make my comment. Also the berserker vs the red knight... that is a fight I would like to see.

caoimhinh

Yeah, this was epic.

Also, the berserker is dead, sadly

Rey d`Tutto

I'm not so sure of that.

Villian. "Need to see the body" trope. She was just backhanded into a wall that fell on her. Cat dropped a tower on her and she walked it off.

caoimhinh

The Berserker? No, she was explicitly shown being killed. She died by arrows back in Interlude: Blood in book 6.

The Berserker spasmed in pain, half a dozen arrows stuck in her body and three through her forehead, but from the monstrous shape she'd turned into she slowly turned back into a woman. The Ophanim whispered and Tariq's hands tightened.

"Is there anything we can do?"

Silence. There was no. The Berserker's rage ended, leaving only a mortal behind, and that mortal did not breathe. Only the wrath had kept her alive.

Keter always had the last word.

Alex

Time for Rumena to make good on his sigil oath. For the Tomb-Maker to become the Tomb-Breaker.

sengachi

I cannot wait for the moment night falls and the reforged drow get to go wild on Keter. Rumena has already buried one immortal would be god this month, it's only right to give him first dibs on burying this one too.

Bernardo Corti

Thank you for the excelent read 😊

Matthew T

Your ability to reach new heights on the Holy Shit Quotient is incredible. And I loved Talbot KNOCKING on the gate after that epic charge. It's completely in character for him!

RivettedReader

lords of ladies and Praes → lords and ladies of Praes.

Also perhaps Lords and Ladies depending on if this is intended to be a titular description or just adjectives.

arcanavitaet15

HAHAHA that is glorious, just glorious the whole chapter, also the scene with Talbot hit me right in the feels it meant a lot to Cat.

SomeGuyWhoReadsThings

Ol Neshama playing it close to the vest. Real stingy with the revenants. Inner wall and citadel will be a nightmare

Ed

But that final assault will be a job for bands of five, all of this epicness is just to get them where they can begin.

Oshi

Catherine still bears a black blade. He pulls that out and she has all the license she needs. Nothing is done until the story ends.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. If all the squires in the Broken Bells have been knighted, I'm guessing that means our Knight Errant is now Sir Arthur (finally!).
2. Speaking of which, if Arthur wasn't fighting with Catherine and the Broken Bells, nor teamed up with Sapan the Apprentice, what's he up to?
3. I imagine we'll next have an interlude or two from Hanno and the other assault.
4. What are the Herald and his dwarves doing during all this?
5. We've seen Team Ishaq (Barrow Sword, Vagrant Spear, Stained Sister, Harrowed Witch, Grave Binder) and Team Kallia (Painted Knife, Rogue Sorcerer, Red Knight, Blade of Mercy, Skinchanger. Clearly they're taking the approach of mixed Good and Evil on their Teams; I'm looking forward to the combos they've come up with. If Hanno, Antigone, and Rafaella are a team once again, then what villains could possibly work with them?
6. As mentioned in Book 6, Chapter 65, "Cross-Check", they have now reached the gates of the Crown of the Dead itself. I want to see what Pickler has come up with to smash them down.
7. Are the drow the hidden knife which Catherine has us up her metaphorical sleeve?

Bad@Games

1. Hopefully

2. I thought he be either palling around with nim or Mirror knight bc they have the swords
3. Hopefully
4. I Imagine they are assisting on another front
5. Mabey some nbs villains? is headhunter alive still? idk but im excited
6. ITS TIME FOR PICKER TO GO OFF OHHHHHHH
7. I really want iva and THE TOMB MAKER to have some badass moments. Remember THE TOMB MAKER has made some spicy oathes.

Wonder

Hooooo, this is the shit!!!!!! Anyone catch how enthusiastic Cat burnt the ghoul that dared to attack Akua? CatKua all the way even in a chaotic battle!!!!

Marshal Nim ,as awesyas ever!!!!!!!!!!!!

I do not believe I have read many books with a war as savage ,chaotic and deadly as this one !!!!

Liliet

yep, Catkua soaring to ever more glorious heights ♥

Sugar Roll

Callow and Praes fighting side by side. Are we going to see the Drow together with the Dwarves next?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Better yet: the Procerans together with anyone, including other Procerans.

erebus42

It still amuses me to no end how the largest Good nation in Calernia seems to be almost as universally despised as the largest Evil ones.

Gabe Meadow

I wouldn't use the word 'despised,' but the massive amount of internal plotting and fuckery in Procer over the course of the story – especially in the face of threatened extinction – has definitely soured a lot of external observers on it.

erebus42

That and it seems they also have a shared unfortunate history of attempted imperialism which no doubt has contributed to a broad spread cultural suspicion of them.

jamesc9

The needs of the empire and the wishes of the god.

Bad@Games

TBH this side of the whitecaps is putting in work ngl. The two old enemies turn together to absolutly FUCK keter up. Callow and her knights plus Preas and all its bullshit. the only thing to worry me is the revenent that was probobly the fortunate fool is MIA and thats a bad thing.

Oshi

No he retreated with the wizard.

Liliet

That's not a "no". That means yes, we don't know where the two of them currently are.

Mary Gentle

Does that mean it was important for them to come and look? Or to be shown to Cat and the armies? DK has to have done that for some actual reason...

Dominic

It's my birthday. Couldn't have asked for a better way to start my day.

serdar314

So the end begins.

Raved Thrad

If the Order of the Broken Bells survives at all, I can see a statue of Talbot, head held high, holding a ragged banner, and the words "Redemption in steel" on a plaque at his feet.

While reading through this, I was reminded of the only other world crusade against a mad god I remember reading, the one in David Eddings' Tamuli, and they seemed to have it so much easier by far. EE's version portrays a much harder fight, and really highlights the slog of the fight on the ground. Well done, sir!

Lord Haart

If you like chapters like this, I highly recommend Erikson's Malazan Book of the Fallen. Hits many of the same notes as PGTE, the Legions in particular.

RobberXAkua

This was so good! I'm always amazed by how well you write battle scenes. Honestly, keep delaying chapters if these are the results, always fantastic.

Prince Of Doom

Just waiting for the Green Flame at this point.

Because it always ends with Green Flame.

I wonder if they can burn the mansions of Keter down...

Someperson

Theoretically, Catherine has three knives aimed at Neshemah's heart.

The Sword of the Rest to unleash the villainous stories against him

The Autumn Crown to wrest control of the undead from him

The Doom of Liesse to be his captor for Sealed Evil in a Duel

But we all know it's gonna end with goblinfire and Catherine getting blamed for arson yet again

naturalnuke

In the words of the Great Robber, KNOCK KNOCK MOTHERFUCKERS

badatgames2911

"Unleash the GOATS"

BargleNawdleZouss

Further thoughts:

8. I'd love to see the first six Apostles Of Night(tm) developing their skills and making a mark.

9. I'm not sure why I'm focused on this character in particular, but I want to see the Royal Conjuror open a can of whoopass on Keter. IIRC, we've only seen him act in flashbacks/reports.

9A. Same for the Forlorn Paladin!

10. It would be nice if the Hierarch contributed in some way to the battle, even if only to aid the Bellerophan forces to be more than just meat shields.

11. Can we get some game-changing info/insight from the Wise Astrologer, now that the Augur has passed?

12. Where is Kreios the Riddle-Maker and Hye Su the Ranger (incumbent) already?

13. If the elves don't make a contribution, will someone please kick their asses into the Skiron Ocean?

Someperson

I was scared for a sec that the broken bells were gonna get sacrificed en masse to secure the win
I am glad it seems they pulled through

Lord Haart

Well, some of them. Doubt they number enough to be a fighting force again for years. 😞

jezebeau

Feels like the revenants were pulled out to set up for patterns of three to discourage releasing Below's stories.

Talbot knocking, though! Someone get this man a Name. The Lance Unbroken! The Knocking Knight! The Gatecrashing Grandmaster! Brazen Bearer of Neshamah's Broken Balls! Let's hear it for Graaaaaandmaster Talbot!

Someperson

The Steel Redeemer 😊

Or if we want something less flowery "The Grandmaster" works just fine

jezebeau

I did think about that one, but it seemed too specific to his exact circumstance to get established as something that could later fit others without changing the meaning.

totalpretzel

Literal goosebumps from this and the previous two chapters, holy shit ee, magnificent work. Also I absolutely love the hilarious unreliable-ish narration that is Cat describing Akua's clothes in exquisite detail every time no matter what she's wearing.

masterofbones

This chapter's background music brought to you by Sabaton

Lurch

Just... wow. The imagery of that charge, and the arrival of the Praesi. And the sheer badassery of two nations that have been at war for generations upon generations, archetypal Good and Evil, fighting together against what would be the Death of all. Callowan knightly steel and Praesi power and ruin united, both glorious in their own right.

Chapter 61: Break

"If victory were not sweet, we would not drink its poison so deeply."

– Dread Empress Terribilia

We came at the wall in waves.

Thirty feet of stone, topped by an army's worth of dead. Bastions that rose even higher to make room for the siege engines to fire, bristling with catapults and ballistae. Wards crackled with power as the first ladders were laid against the wall, cracking the steel-capped wood, and out of sight dead mages stood in circles to weave rituals that would turn men to screams and dust. I sent away Zombie after the second time she was shot under me, back on my feet with a sword in hand. Legionaries – mine and Praes', in the smoke and ash it was hard to tell them apart – put up their shields above their heads as the dead shots bows and threw chunks of masonry.

I saw an orc's head turn to pulp as rock the size of a table went through his shield, the corpse toppling to the ground with it. Javelins punch through plate, sorcery tore burning holes in the shield walls and above us the clouds were turning dark again. I tossed around Night heedlessly, feeling the coolness in my veins begin to turn raw – like sandpaper was being dragged around my insides – and shattered a parapet just in time for a young legionary to land her ladder into the rubble. A heartbeat later a skeleton wielding a hooked pole tried to push it back, but Akua's hand shoved me aside as she yelled out an incantation in the mage tongue.

A ball of translucent sorcery formed around the top of the ladder, expanding into a shield that blew the skeleton off the rampart.

"Forward," I shouted, ducking low to avoid a whistling arrow.
"It's the last wall!"

Half a lie. The palaces would have walls of their own and the Dead King's lair as well, but it was true there were no ramparts left lying ahead. Behind the heights of stone stood the inner city of Keter, the central third leading to the ancient hills turned plateau the city had been built around. It would be the hardest fight yet, I knew, but my blood still sang at the knowledge that we were there. We'd nearly made to the heart of Keter, past all the horror and madness. We were so close to the last struggle I could almost feel it on my tongue. The girl who'd landed her ladder began to climb, but three rungs up she dropped with an arrow in the throat. Her body fell to the side, rising a wight, and a large orc began his climb.

I hurried there, elbowing soldiers as I went and Akua following in my wake. Legionaries kept taking the ladder and they kept dying, the dead intent on snuffing out the first ladder landed, but concentrating their fire cost them. Other ladders began to stay up, and as the twentieth body died to rise undead my own boot touched the bottom of the ladder.

"Catherine-" Akua began.

"Keep them off me," I interrupted, and sword in hand began the climb.

My bad leg throbbed. It'd been too long since I'd last put on full plate as I now wore and I wasn't used to the weight anymore. But climbing up the ladder wouldn't require me to dance around, just to keep going. Akua cursed profusely, but even as arrows began to fall on me from both sides roiling winds shot up to blanket me. A rung, then another, and as I rose a legionary stepped in to follow. A javelin came from above and I had to press myself against the wall, the wood of the rung digging into my throat, and though it passed me the man behind me took it in the eye. Another rung. There was a shout from below and I looked to my left, drawn by instinct, only to find a blur of movement.

I pulled on Night and threw black flame at it, the heat and power of the impact forcing the ballista bolt off course. Gods, that would have gone right through my ribs.

I hurried up and I was two-thirds through when the shield Akua had bespelled to protect the top of the ladder shattered under a stream of curses, breaking into shards that soon faded. Even as I desperately dragged myself up I saw a pair of skeletons with hooked poles catch the side rails and begin to push. There were soldiers beneath, enough that the ladder weighed too heavy to easily push, but it moved backwards half an inch and my heart leapt up in my throat. I climbed another rung as Akua blew one of the skeletons away, but it was replaced in a heartbeat and more began to put their hands to the pole to push. Fuck, I thought as I went up another rung and saw I wouldn't make in time.

The ladder was pushed back another inch, and it was so close to the angle that'd topple us that I hissed. I threw Night in clumps but the skeletons I shattered were replaced, and as I went up another rung the ladder began to topple – until I snarled, sending Night racing down the edge of my blade, and hacked at the hook of the closest pole pushing us back. The strike went right through, the headless pole dipping down and getting stuck between rungs as the weight shifted. Half the ladder was against the wall again, and with a triumphant cry I went up another rung. Close enough to hack at the legs of the skeletons, though I had to duck back under to avoid getting impaled by a spear.

I tossed a ball of black flame over the edge as I did, and a heartbeat later I was atop the wall.

It was a bloody whirl after that. I couldn't even tell how many of them I was fighting – they were coming from all sides, with swords and axes and spears. I ripped a dagger out of one's hand after blowing through his head with Night, taking it as parrying blade, but Gods I wished I had a shield. Legionaries followed behind me and we were pushed back-to-back, forced to keep our foothold on the wall open with the clash of steel. I parried and struck with the strength of my Name, shattering arm bones and cracking skulls, until I felt Akua behind me again and suddenly the wall to our left was a frozen block of ice. I moved to cover her while she stood back panting, face trickling with sweat, and took off another skeleton's head after turning his blade aside with the dagger.

Legionaries kept coming up, wights among them, and I took a few steps back from the melee to catch my breath. It allowed me a look at the fighting on the wall beyond us, which was a grim sight. We were landing ladders more easily now that we'd forced the dead to fight us up close as well, but soldiers were dropping like flies. Would I even still have an army come nightfall? If the Praesi hadn't come we would all be dead, I thought.

Akua's ice broke as curses struck it from below, exploding into a shower of shards – I felt some cut up my cheeks and the side of my nose, blood flowing free – but a ladder was being landed past it and I moved that way, sword high as I called for soldiers to follow. The push was aborted, though, when arrows of bright red flame tore through the enemy and there was the howl of wind. A heartbeat later the Rogue Sorcerer landed with a fluttering coat among wisps of flame, footing uncertain from the wind magic he'd used to aid his lip.

"Clear the wall," I shouted, pointing my sword at the enemy laying beyond him.

Legionaries charged, sweeping past him and colliding with thick ranks of skeletons. I didn't go with them, instead moving towards my friend as soldiers began to come up the ladder to our side.

"Where the Hells are the Procerans?" I asked him, shouting to be heard over the din. "We're getting butchered out there, Roland."

"They got bogged down," he shouted back. "Ran into the Grey Legion."

I spat to the side, spit sticking to lips and flecking my cheek. Yeah, I couldn't blame them for slowing in the face of those monsters. I'd been hoping the Dead King would hold them back like an honour guard, but apparently they were worth committing to keep Procer off his back while the inner wall was fought over.

"Is the Prince of Bones leading them?" I asked.

"No, he isn't," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "Catherine, something's wrong. There's word from the League, the Hawk isn't at the battle out in the Ossuary. Hanno says he fought the Seelie and a pack of Revenants but-"

A crack of thunder drowned out his last words. I got the gist anyway. The Scourges that'd fought had been held back from serious engagements, the Prince of Bones and the Hawk had yet to make an appearance and it all stank to the high Heavens. I went to look for a story, and though I couldn't quite feel out what it was about my stomach sunk when I was faced with tangible proof that there was a story. One about the last remaining Scourges, who numbered five. About them fighting as a single band. Indrani went out with the army, I thought. We have no one who can check the Hawk except for... I grabbed Roland by the collar and dragged him close.

"Get the Silver Huntress here," I ordered. "As quick as you can. Send the Painted Knife to get her if you have to, otherwise we're-"

If Akua hadn't slammed a shield in place a heartbeat later, I would have died. The arrow would have gone right through my neck, instead of slowing as it punched through the panel of sorcery and letting me move just quick enough it bit at the side of my helmet instead. I backed away hastily, once more cursing my lack of a shield, which ended up saving my life for the second time in two heartbeats. I heard the crunch even as I felt the air against my face. It was, I realized, a rock. Someone had thrown a rock the size of a small house my way, and it'd come close enough to me I'd felt like a whisper on my skin. It tumbled past the wall, earning screams and then a wet crushing sound, and for a heartbeat terror seized my throat.

Akua was alive, I saw. She'd been moving between me and the edge of the rampart, so she'd been out of the way. The knot in my guts loosened, but only so much. I turned to Roland, who was gaping, and my hand went back to his collar.

"You still have that wind magic?" I asked.

He nodded.

"Why do you-"

"Get me the Silver Huntress," I cut through, and threw him off the rampart.

It was only thirty feet. Wouldn't kill a hero even if he didn't get his artefact out in time – which he did, ending up rolling across rooftop tiles like a human tumbleweed. By the time I turned, Akua had stepped back from the rampart's edge and closer to me. Her free hand was low, magic dancing across her fingers in subtle shifts of light.

"That was the Prince of Bones," the golden-eyed sorceress told me. "And it won't be the last stone he throws."

"We're fucked if we stay here on the wall," I said. "Almost all of them are nasty customers from a distance and we're out in the open. We need to-"

It was prettily done, I appreciated that deep down. First the stone – large as the last, and this time I saw where in the streets it came from – drew my eye and I pulled on Night by reflex, spinning rope around it to swing it around like a sling to throw back. But it had been meant to get caught, and in its wake came an arrow. Akua caught that, belted out a spell that had steel shivering all around us and froze the arrowhead in the air. Then the both of us took the Mantle's curse right on, as we'd been meant to all along. I dropped my working on the stone, abandoning it to gravity, but the Night I tried to throw up in the way was just a shade too slow. I was blown off my feet, blinded as I felt myself fall through dust. Stone, she broke the stone.

Akua screamed, as much in rage as fear, and the two of us fell down in the street below. I felt blades scrape at my armour and one cut across my face as I abandoned my flesh eye and looked through Night instead. We'd fallen into a knot of enemy soldiers, Akua missing a chunk of her left pauldron and the shoulder beneath it. I glimpsed bone even as she laid a hand on it and flesh formed anew with a hiss. I slashed through a head, then was driven back by a warhammer I awkwardly stopped by hitting the handle but still bounced off my shoulder plate. Snarling, I leaned forward and pulled on Night: I spat out a stream of black flame, incinerating the undead before me. But they'd lasted long enough to slow us, damn them.

I helped Akua back to her feet, hacking away at a spear that came a little too close, the two of us finding out backs to a powder-covered wall.

"We need to get to stairs," she said. "Get back to your troops."

"We need to survive," I grimly replied, looking ahead. "They're here."

The Prince of Bones was hard to miss, hulking shape of steel that he was. Like half a dozen armours had swallowed slightly smaller ones, leaving only a monstrous golem with the outline of a man. His face was a mask of steel, frowning sternly with eyes that were sculpted. Not a hole anywhere on him, only shifting layers of steel and the large greatsword he held in a single hand as he marched towards us. The Mantle was but a step behind him, mace hoisted on her shoulder, but of the Hawk and the Tumult I found no trace. They would remain hidden until they struck, I thought. As for the Seelie...

"Steel yourself," I warned.

A heartbeat later, it struck us like a wave. Love me. You love me, love me most of all the things in the world. You love me, so obey. Rip her apart. In the back of my mind Komena sneered and the force broke into smoke, but at my side Akua went stiff. I was already striking by the time the mane of red hair appeared in front of her, but as I opened the throat of a voluptuous redhead in a ballroom gown it faded without my steel touching anything solid. An illusion. The tricky pest always –

"Fuck," I snarled as I felt a knife slide between my ribs.

The Seelie's impossibly beautiful face leaned towards mine, smiling as she went for a kiss, but I grabbed her by the throat and drew on my Name to toss her up. She flew for a moment, then shattered into rose petals as I put a hand to my side. My armour was unmarked. A real wound or another illusion? I'd never fought the Scourge up close before. I shifted under my armour, but the wet I felt could be sweat as well as blood. The pain, though, that was real. Akua was back to herself just in time to throw up that magnetism spell again, though she put her back into it this time: not only did it catch the Hawk's arrow but it also crumpled the three closest ranks of skeletons into balls of metal.

"That," Akua bit out, "was most unpleasant."

"Tell me about it," I grunted. "Never been good with redheads."

My flesh eye had been working for some time, but it was still with the others I looked around.

"Stairs to the left," I said. "It's our best chance."

"Depressingly true," Akua noted, which I took as agreement.

We made a break for it. If there was one weakness to the Prince and the Mantle, it was that their bulk made them slow – especially in broken terrain like the ruined street full of undead soldiers we were fighting our way through. The enemy wasted no time in trying to stop us. Rain began to fall in front of us, a ball of clouds gathering and being milked dry of water that is spat out as a torrent of water filling the street. Undead were knocked aside, and though there wasn't enough flow to topple us the street ran wet and our footing slowed. I evaporated the cloud ball with a blast of blackflame, in time for Akua to send a spike of sinuous darkness right into the heart of a sizzling curse – it broke apart instantly.

Undead converged on us from all sides and I could not torch them as fast as they appeared, not without slowing too much. I parried and hacked and tried to push forward but that fucking water got everywhere and when I was forced to make an awkward parry I slipped. Akua blasted off the Bind's head but my back still hit the floor, water seeping into my armour by the neck, and I swallowed a scream as my side throbbed. Yeah, the Seelie had definitely stabbed me. I was dragged back to my feet, slashing blindly at a ghoul coming close, but froze when I saw that above us a hundred spear of sizzling lightning were forming. Gods, we were both drenched. It wouldn't even need to hit us, just...

I pulled on Night and Akua released me to raise her hand and incant, but the Hawk shot again and I had to spin a sphere of darkness that sucked in the arrow that'd have killed her. From the corner of my eye I saw a flicker of movement – red hair and that fucking smug smile again – as love me, love only me pounded away at my mind. Akua shifted her incantation halfway through, flicking her hand and melting the Seelie's face to the bone, but it'd been an illusion. Above us the lightning spears came down as she Scourge reappeared to my side, knife already halfway to my lung, but the Beast laughed into my ear. A boot tore into the Seelie's cheek, her face betraying utter surprise as Hanno of Arwad landed on it feet first.

Above us, the spears had stopped midair. They went an inch down and then back up, as if two wills were fighting for control of the spell. Masego, I thought, you prince among sorcerers. Forty feet away I saw the Prince of Bones stop to casually rip out a wall and throw it our way, but before I could pull on Night the scent of ozone filled the air. The wall crumbled into dust and through it I saw a silhouette standing atop the wall, a woman in a painted stone mask and a long green cloak. The Witch of the Woods had come, I realized with a pulse of excitement.

"Apologies," Hanno calmly said, getting back to his feet from the crouch he'd landed in. "I must admit I got lost on my way."

The Seelie had faded into golden smoke as she fell under him, though not before receiving a cut across the face for her troubles.

"Fighting back against Ashuran stereotypes, I see," I croaked out, because 'thank you' would have been too much.

It got a snort out of Akua, at least. Wait, should I be worried the Doom of Liesse was the only one who'd laughed?

"I try," Hanno said. "Reinforcements are headed our way, Warden. I called on all we could spare."

I cracked my neck, wiping away some of the blood still seeping down my cheek mixed with sweat.

"Let's see what the Scourges of made of, then," I said, spitting to the side.

Above us the lightning spears suddenly faded. The Tumult, I suspected, had decided it was better to try another spell than to keep pitting his will against Masego's.

"Let's," Hanno agreed, raising his sword with a smile.

The Prince of Bones moved first and I tensed, but to my utter surprise he did not attack. Instead, he turned his back and ran.

"Bold," Akua murmured, appreciative.

"Fuck," I feelingly said. "Pursue, go."

The Hawk tried to put an arrow in Hanno's eye, who plucked it out of the air with a vaguely irritated look – come on, part of me complained, he's not even Named right now! – as Akua and I shot forward. The Dead King would have none of it, though. All the undead across four city blocks went still for a moment, and then they began to throw themselves at us. I shouted and let loose streaks of blackflame as I cut through a torrent of soldiers who didn't even try to kill me, just throw themselves in my way, but even when Akua blew them away with a gust of wind it was too late: darkness came down over us, the Mantle covering the retreat of the Scourges with her favourite trick.

It didn't last long with Hanno around, Light coming out in a torrent that shattered the curse, but it was enough. The Witch tossed a few houses at them as they retreated but we caught none and I felt frustration bubble up my throat. The Dead King was denying us a scrap, had been doing it all day. Was he trying to tire us out or simply keeping the Scourges as his last trump card? Either way, dragging Named here would just be wasting them at the moment.

"Hanno," I shouted. "Go help on the wall. Can the Witch help get the Procerans through the Grey Legion?"

"We'll do what we can," he shouted back.

I nodded him thanks and he offered back the sketch of a bow. The cheeky bastard. I felt Akua's eyes on my back and turned.

"To the stairs," I told her, looking back up at the rampart.

The Legions of Terror and Army of Callow had secured more than a dozen footholds, it was time to turn that into a push. The Dead King wanted to play coy? I'd force his fucking hand.

"I'm with you," Akua promised, which I enjoyed hearing more than was wise.

We went back up, scything through the dead, and I found a captain to bark orders for me. We took two companies into the closest gatehouse, clearing out the ghouls and the beorn inside, and then forced the gates open. The steel jaws opened below our feet, soldiers pouring through, and I grinned. Now we had the initiative again. Roland should be back with the Silver Huntress soon, but I wanted us to gobble up a few blocks to hold first. We fought our way back down, arms tired and short of breath, to take the lead of the companies that'd gone through the gate. With a shout I took them to the last dead on the avenue, smashing our way through, and we pushed into the inner city.

Resistance, to my rising discomfort, was sparse. The dead were disorganized, coming at us in disjointed bands, and the push I'd meant to take a few blocks with kept ripping forward through the ranks of the dead. I only began to slow when we were past at least ten blocks, and when I found a great granite gargoyle at a street corner I frowned. I knew this place I realized. This corner. I had once been carried past here on a litter as a guest of the Dead King, dead royalty bearing me to the Silent Palace where I was to be hosted. We weren't just past the inner wall, we were halfway to the heart of Keter. To victory. My heartbeat thundered against my ears and my steps slowed, my legionaries slowing with me.

"Catherine?" Akua asked.

"We're getting close to the five palaces," I said. "We need the arrows in our quiver readied before we go further."

I kept my words vague, since you never knew who might be listening in this city, but she knew what I meant: the Mirror Knight and the Severance, Hierophant and the Crown of Autumn. Going after the King of Death without either would be madness. Neshamah was the most powerful sorcerer Calernia had ever known and likely ever would, fighting him head on in his seat of power would only get us killed. Not even the Sisters would be able to help me when we got to the hall where the Greater Breach lay and the monster that'd made it would be waiting for us.

"I'll send the signal," the golden-eyed sorceress agreed.

The spell was simple enough, a variation on the signal lights that the Legions and the Army had been using for years. Akua flicked her wrist at the sky, incanting brusquely, and three streaks of blue shot out. After rising high they exploded into a broad circle, one large enough that there would be no missing it even through the poison clouds and the ashen rain.

"Thanks," I said.

Then I turned to the company at my side, its soldiers and officers having ceased to advance when I did.

"We're in deep now, ladies and gentlemen," I told them. "Maybe half an hour's walk ahead are the palace we're going for, and before we can send in Named to end this we're going to need to secure this corner. First we--"

Everyone felt it, when the sorcery lit up. Even the most power-blind of my legionaries felt their bones shake, their soul flinch. My hand shot up, Night already raging through my veins, and Akua was already halfway through a shield spell before we both stopped. The magic wasn't coming from ahead of us but from below. Far under our feet.

"Akua?" I asked.

She did not answer, golden eyes gone wide. Instead she knelt down on the ash-streaked ground, ripping off her helmet and pressing her cheek against the stone.

"Akua," I said again, tone sharper.

"The ritual is below," she said, palm against the floor. "Far enough not even Hierophant can trouble it. But there is something more, Catherine. It is an array, a large one, and--"

The pulse washed over us in the heartbeat that followed. It felt like nothing at all, I thought, but then Sven Noc was howling in rage within my soul and Night boiled out without my having even called it. Akua had gotten to her feet, I saw, and was panicking as she shouted an incantation and traced glowing runes in the air. Over the three heartbeats it took her to finish the spell, I saw her face under the helmet change. Lines deepened, the arc of her brow grew more pronounced. My stomach dropped as I turned towards my soldiers. Their helmets were open-faced, hiding nothing: faces aged, skin growing thick with lines and hair turning white.

Before ten heartbeats had passed every single one of my legionaries dropped dead of old age.

"Gods," I croaked, staggering back.

I looked further back at the others who'd followed me past the wall, and saw that behind me lay a trail of corpses that'd fallen down as gently as leaves dropping from a tree. Not a single one of them taken by sword or spear, they'd just... died. The trail of corpses went all the way back to the inner wall, atop which some of my legionaries were shouting in horror. It ends at the wall, I thought. Ice seizing my heart I turned to Akua, who was shimmering with pale green light but was, to my immense relief, alive and no longer aging. She panted softly, sweat trickling down her brow.

"That," Akua Sahelian softly said, "aged me at least a decade."

"This isn't time magic," I numbly said. "There's no such thing as time in Trismegistan magic. What the Hells is this, Akua?"

"Not a spell," she said, straightening. "It is Keter's Due."

My fingers clenched.

"You meant he pulled off what you did at the Doom," I said. "Sucked in the magic of the Due into other arrays and-"

"He was not quite so skilled," Akua interrupted me. "As I said, Catherine, this is not a spell."

She shot a look at the stone under our feet.

"I believe that somewhere under our feet are buried artefacts that were empowered by the wasted magic of the Due," she continued. "Thousands of them, whose only purpose is to tint that emanated magic with a specific kind of entropy."

My eye narrowed. Night raged in my veins, the blessing of the Sisters keeping death from touching me.

"Aging," I said.

"Specifically flesh, I think," Akua said. "Or perhaps living flesh?"

"But that means," I slowly said, "that this isn't even the ritual from below. Then what is that fucking magic for?"

Fate handed me the answer, bitch that she was, when in the distance there was an ear-splitting rumble. It was so loud as to drown out even screams, but I saw enough. Over the inner wall I could see the top of some towers, and they were moving. The outer city was rotating, Gods save us all. And it got worse, because when the city ceased turning instead it moved another direction: pushed up by some invisible force, entire districts of the city shot up. Though I could not see it, from the way some towers disappeared I guessed that some districts were going down as well. Like some sort of demented jigsaw puzzle, the outer city of Keter had just turned itself into a series of plateaus and chasms.

"Gods preserve us," Akua murmured.

She saw it too, then. This was death, the death of every living soldier in the city. Maybe not immediately, but that single stroke had ensured there was now not even a single army inside the walls: all our forces had been moved away from the breaches they'd come in through and then split into smaller pieces, left alone on platforms with whatever enemy forces had been in the district when it was raised or lowered. We'd win some of those fights, for sure. But it wouldn't matter a fucking bit, because now all those soldiers were stuck and the dead would go around extinguishing them one force at a time. There could be no reinforcements, no manoeuvring, and undead could climb goddamn cliffs – or leap down them, if need be. Living people could not.

"I've killed us all," I faintly said. "Weeping Heavens, I've killed us all."

The city was as much an army-killer as the dead within it, and I'd driven us deep into its embrace. There would be no recovering from this.

"The battle is not yet over," Akua said. "We can still recover. Retreat, perhaps, if-"

Behind us, dead soldiers began to twitch. And I heard the sound of boots coming from ahead. More undead, soldiers that'd care nothing for this curse of entropy.

"Catherine, we need to go," she urgently said.

I stood there dazed until she pulled at my arm, allowing myself to be tugged away. It was over, I realized. We ran through the rising soldiers I'd just led to their deaths and I felt myself blast those who came too close with Night as if someone else were doing it – Akua could do nothing, all her concentration maintaining the shield that kept her alive – and we ran for the wall, for the gate where some my soldiers still stood and fought. We climbed the stairs, black flames burning behind us, and as Akua finally released her spell I stumbled to the edge of the rampart. There I saw it all, the madhouse that Keter had become. Raised heights of and deep drops, both moved by some mechanism built deep under the bedrock of the capital.

And as the magic below our feet kept burning, the outer city began to move again.

It span, only what had been a mere imposition was now brutally lethal: houses broke, soldiers and undead fell off the edge of those cliffs as the centrifugal force caught them. And for those below, they found those same broken houses dropped atop their heads by the force of the spin. Shields of sorcery and Light bloomed, trying to mitigate the damage and staying there until at last the spinning stopped, but I knew it wouldn't be enough. The Dead King would just keep spinning his city again and again until the ritual burned out, long after the last of our mages and priests had fallen to exhaustion. And none of this, I realized, not a single part of this was actually aimed at anyone. It was all indirect, distant. The kind of danger that no hero would rise against, that no story would help destroy.

"We lost," I murmured.

The exhaustion of the day caught up to me all at once and my leg gave, tearing a pained gasped out of my throat as I half-fell and had to catch myself against the crenellation. There were shouts of surprise and a moment later Akua was holding me up, arm under my shoulder as she asked a question I didn't hear. Gods, I was so tired. I'd burned myself out on Night, and now that the strength of my Name – the hope of victory – was fading, the edges of my vision were going dark. And I was seeing thing, too, because suddenly light got harsher. I blinked dumbly, looking up at a sky that was suddenly cloudless.

"What's happening?" I croaked out.

Akua said something, but it was as if she was speaking through water. I saw them then. Only a few hundred, standing in the ruins of the gate Hanno had broken, but they were impossible to miss: never before had I seen so many giants. And among the Gigantes one stood taller than all the rest, a flame burning within him that hurt my eye to behold.

"Blood loss," Akua said, talking to someone else. "The fucking fool, she's going into sho-"

"Young King," Kreios the Riddle-Maker called out, "let me remind you who is it that you dare ape with your works."

When darkness came to swallow me whole, I did not fight it.

Gabe Meadow

Holy shit! Called it! Thankfully, the coins tossed in the air are coming down providentially when they're needed most: the Herald to end starvation, Kreios leading the Gigantes, all to stop the things that Named can't fight.

Still, you have to hand it to Neshamah, he's backed up his warning to Cat that she hasn't grown enough.

Dome Zasrekh

My only problem is, where are the Drow and dwarfs?! Would have been an epic sight, together storming the inner wall! Also N000 Akua aging, you EVIL bastard!

KageLupus

The Dwarves aren't actually a part of the war effort and are just supplying food and arms. Don't forget that the entire Kingdom Under has been thrown into a mass civil war so there can't really be any kind of organized war effort on their part.

As for the Drow, if I remember right they are fighting on a second front and were needed there to keep the main attack force safe from that direction. Even just getting the combined armies of the Grand Alliance to Keter took a lot of blood and sweat and effort.

ohJohN

I think this is a bad take on the dwarves – the Herald arrived with “an army of dwarves, thousands strong” to “fulfill the terms of the bargain”: “the supplies and his help against the city of Keter and attendant lands.”

You're right that the Kingdom Under is currently a gigantic clusterfuck, but the Herald took control of the lands under the Fourteenth (Everdark) and Fifteenth (Keter encirclement) Expansions – “together, the regions represented a large number of soldiers” – and said “the soldiers have answered my call.”

He promised supplies and help taking Keter, he commands a large amount of soldiers, and he brought at least thousands with him – I think the dwarves are gonna join the fight at least a little.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/12/17/chapter-56-brink/>

Cpt. Obvious

There were an army of Drow that Cat brought with her, but they've been absent for the last few chapters. However even with Sve Noc restored to full power they are not very good at fighting by day. As I remember it all but the most powerful of the Mighty are about as strong and fast as a human. At the same time they are not trained to fight without the use of Night. Nor are they trained to fight in tight formations like soldiers. So using them as soldiers during the day is wasting a lot more than it's worth throwing a few thousands more bodies at the enemy.

The real monsters like Rumena, Jindrich (sp?) and now the Lord of Silent Steps are able to draw on Night even during the day, much like Cat. But again, they are so much stronger during the night.

There's also a few shards of night that was formed when Sve Noc tried to move the Gloom. There were mentioned that these are able to shield the Drow from the day, but we don't know how large that shield is or how many could be spared to send with the army.

So still many unknowns...

ohJohN

It's still daytime, so most drow are barely more effective than obsidian-clad skirmishers, and Cat only brought a relatively small contingent with her to Keter, the rest remaining in/around Serolen to hold the northern front.

(I think also there had been plans to reserve the drow for nighttime defense of the camp, too – but as the situation stands, come sunset there's a decent chance they'll be deployed within the city)

Adrian V

The Drow are probably being held off for night combat duties, but yeah where are the dwarves?

Zachary A Sloan

To be fair, I'm not sure what Catherine could have done about this even if she knew about it. They were going to have to move the troops through that area regardless, and the activation of the artifacts apparently happened too far away for Masego to do anything to stop it.

Eunuch

...damn

Lictor Magnus

This story never ceases to have great surprises and I'm happy to say that beyblade city of death never crossed my mind as a possibility 😂

Dome Zasrekh

I'm i weird if I thought of him rearranging the city was the smart thing to do on his part?

Liliet

No, definitely not weird.

ohJohN

As Cat notes, this was an objectively masterful move on his part: basically everybody within the inner walls dead, the armies within the outer walls split up and trapped for easy extermination, and all without being a direct enough attack for heroes to counter with a story.

The only thing keeping this single move from outright winning him the war is the appearance of Kreios + the Gigantes (and we don't yet know how they'll counter it) – so yeah, I think it's safe to say it's a pretty smart move 😊

Frivolous

So that's what the Seelie does. Huh. Nasty.

The area of effect curse of aging is even more nasty. A side effect, not an actual curse, and so very difficult to block.

Would this be the third time Catherine goes into a coma during a major battle? She has a story of doing that, and then rising to save the day. Always costs her and/or someone else, though.

Insanenoodlyguy

This one might have been paid for already. Watching all the people that rallied with you one final time die as the side effect of the spell being used to defeat you is at least a decent down payment,

Death Knight

Of course the Riddle-Maker will call the Dead King, favourite son of Below, millennia old monster "Young King".

The burn. I'm reminded of what an old (comparatively speaking) General once told the living embodiment of the Sword once "Let's begin before one of us dies of old age."

erebus42

I'm not sure it's accurate to even say that he's Bellow's "Favorite son" since while he is definitely one of its most long lasting and successful agents he seems to have a more stasis-based paradigm which seems to clash with their overall tastes and Philosophies.

Someperson

I'm giggling right now because I just realized how prophetic Rumena's taunt was

Rest in pieces, Laurence de Montfort

You were such a good weapon but such a bad hero

Reineken

Fucking finally they enter the war.

Adrian_V

Well Kreios is showing he has learned at least 1 thing from living that long: how to make a good entrance!!

dadycool

Whoa. That was a masterstroke on Nussy's part. They committed everything because this was supposed to be the final push, so now everyone's inside the Rubik's Cube City and scattered into bite-sized chunks. Good thing Cat triggered a Darkest Hour flag, giving in to despair.

Liliet

Yup, that sums it up.

totalpretzel

I am in absolute awe this was amazing to read

Mirror Night

I mean I am not surprised the Gigantes arrived. Surprised I suppose that they arrived before Hanno even got his name though. And Surprised they did something major before the Dwarves did anything at all lol.

DK is a bastard lol. Moving the city like a jigsaw up and down and a very unique kill spell.

diverstones

I wonder if the Gigantes arriving is what will allow him to access a different name. Hanno mentioned a couple chapters ago how frustrated he was that getting involved in worldly affairs didn't seem to have worked out, so maybe this is a big enough pivot to stop being the White Knight.

Someperson

Honestly, Hanno is in a fluid enough position right now that he might make for a distant third place candidate for "the poor sod who is supposed to spend eternity guarding old bones", right behind Akue and Catherine.

ninegardens

On the one hand, thanks Krieos, stopping Nessie from spinning the wheel and laughing at god over and over again... on the other hand, couldn't you have stopped him the first time?

But yeah, god damn, they knew the city was a trap, but did they really think it wouldn't also include a "kill absolutely everything available" type trap as one (or three) of its contingencies.

Still, nice turn of battle, well executed.

Feels kind of like the Scourges are being specifically lined up to kill the pieces that Nessie is most concerned by (from our POV, Cat, but I wouldn't be surprised if Mirror knight and Masego were also targets). Which is a smart move. Nessie knows that there's a limited number of number who have the story to kill him, and if he can bring those down then.... well, that's that.

Good job. Nessie is suitably terrifying, without the battle feeling entirely hopeless.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, that also leads to darkest hour triggers. The last soldier of Callow gets up, and unexceptional to this moment, By being the last soldier and getting up she rips the dead king apart with nothing more than her standard issue dagger. And so does Abigail become the life queen.

No the way to do this is to kill it all at once. An unending grinder of finality where the big names are not the first or the last but simply being crushed with the rest.

Someperson

> On the one hand, thanks Krieos, stopping Nessie from spinning the wheel and laughing at god over and over again... on the other hand, couldn't you have stopped him the first time?

If this wasn't such a tropey setting you'd of course be right.

But seeing as it is, the choices are either to play your cards early and have them be countered when Nessy plays his own hand, or wait for Nessy to do something horrible and then slap him down just in the nick of time.

A similar meta applies to the use of Aspects in a duel between Named

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

Exactly, play an empty threat to bait your opponent's Force of Wills and Pact of Negations, then laugh as they're tapped out and unable to respond to your combo.

Zahariel

Well, that was awesome.

On another note, I do believe now is the perfect time to break the Sword of Rest. The Dead King is at his apogee in the story of the battle, I feel : precisely when Fate would start punishing him and the heroes make their comeback.
Or am I too optimistic, and the worse is yet to come ?

Someperson

For good or for ill, the turning point has probably got to be when the Warden and the Dead King are finally face-to-face at the heart of Keter.

BargleNawdleZouss

I'm just hoping that Catherine isn't hallucinating Kreios and Co.!

dadycoool

Maybe they're really there, but disguised in some way and her hallucination is stripping it away, just for her?

Liliet

Nah, they're way overdue, and the hallucination is too specific, Catherine doesn't know enough about them to envision this on her own.

Juff

Typo thread:

dead shots > dead shot
I saw an orc's > I saw an orc's
Javelins punch > Javelins punched
A ball of translucent > A ball of translucent made to the > made it to the skeletons way > skeletons away his lip > his leap down in > down to that is > that was could ball > cloud ball asides > sides spear of > spears of she Scourge > the Scourge
The went > They went through I night > through Night ahead are > ahead is throughs > through stuckand > stuck and heights of and > heights and

agumentic

You know, if Neshamah and Kreios really throw down without anything to compensate for collateral damage, they'll have to redraw the maps. The last time wielders of Trimegstian and Ligurian schools clashed, Warlock and the Witch smashed through a mountain range and before them, Triumphant and the Giants sunk half of not-yet Levant. I'd rate both the Dead King and the Maker of Riddles as pretty far above that. Wouldn't be surprised if they could literally tear the continent apart.

Konstantin von Karstein

That's a big fear I have. Appart from the full might of Sve Noc, I don't see what can prevent Keter and everyone inside to get nuked.

Liliet

Good thing Sve Noc is there?

Konstantin von Karstein

Euh, i know?

Daniel E

While the Gigantes arrival is great and all, that does nothing to help the literal entire Grand Alliance army that is now disorganized and completely cut-off from each other. Unless the Gigantes can reverse the clockwork bits of Keter, the GL is still screwed.

Hargabga

I mean the counter is pretty obvious, isn't it? If DK used time to kill his enemies, just turn it back.

Miles

Problem is he used entropy instead.

ninegardens

Just turn Entropy back then!
Entropy reduction is a thing. Right?

Right?

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

Crazy Diamond says it's possible, just need to punch it hard enough.

beleester

We've seen them use flying fortresses as troop transports already. Once the city stops spinning maybe they could use them to regroup.

BargleNawdleZouss

The Fifth through the Eighth Crusades, and likely the Ninth, were all against the Dead King. Are you telling me that the Beyblade Rubik's Cube Jigsaw Puzzle Gyroscopic City of Death defense has never been used before?

OR...is that why no one can remember what the Ninth Crusade was about, if a Demon of Absence was used?

gbevis

Have people not on patreon met the riddle-maker? He shows in Colossal, Antigone's origin. I would feel sad for people robbed of an understanding of the character when he finally appears on the main stage....

Someperson

Those of us not on Patreon still got two(?) interludes about Antigone's backstory, IIRC, which included stuff about who the Riddle Maker was and how he ended up being the last of his kind.

I don't think EE would allow some bloke to save the day if half of the readers barely knew who they were 😊

beleester

The previous crusades were significantly smaller – fewer nations and no Twilight Ways to make logistics easy. And the forces of Good tend to be worse on offense, since Evil always survives to have another go. Frankly, I'm surprised that previous crusades even managed to make it to the gates of Keter, given what they're up against.

(Then again, the real-world Crusades weren't exactly a parade of successes either.)

Eris

Gosh dang it, we need more names popping up!!

I feel like being surrounded by undead, fighting for the fate of the entire continent, is enough to make some common soldiers rise up w/ to roles. Isn't that how the Scorched Apostate formed, Hunter Magician, and a few others formed? Through fighting the Undead King?

I feel like we can see some names rise up from survivors of all of these massacres, like Lone Swordsman, Grizzled Legionaire, Callowan Knight, or Weary Magician

gbevis

Average named get three words they can speak in BOLDFACE to shape reality. Amadeus and Cat can from short BOLDFACE phrases to command others.

Kreios can speak not only speak complete BOLDFACE sentences, he does them in iambic fucking pentameter!

What he said was not simply announcing his arrival and intention, he was using BOLDFACE words of command for the world to obey.

Miles

I think this is more like the Seelie's song than that.

D

It should be noted that Speaking (the boldface words of command) is by no means exclusive to Amadeus and Cat. While Cat learned to do it unusually quickly, and being able to use it on other Named is a sign of rare power (Malicia could do so, and Cat gained the ability as she started to come into the Name of Warden but couldn't either time she was the Squire; I don't recall if Amadeus was ever shown to), as I recall any Named at all can do it to un-Named if they survive long enough to pick up the knack (though Villains are much more likely to actually do so than Heroes).

Kreios is still impressive for using something that has the same kind of "Creation listens" weight behind it for a comparatively lengthy and eloquent line (though it's neither iambic nor in pentameter by my read), but we needn't undersell what Named can do to point it out.

D

(I always assumed that the same underlying mechanism lay behind Aspects being bolded, but only when invoked with a word or when we're seeing the thoughts of someone in the process of using them, and Speaking being in bold: that having the weight of a Role meant one could compel compliance in bounded ways. With Speaking, that's compelling people to comply, and with Aspects it's making Creation itself do so. In both cases, it's bounded by the need to be in compliance with one's Role.)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Re: Maddie Speaking to other Named: it's been years, but I seem to recall him making Heiress!Akua stab her own hand with a fork that way, though I forget why other than just to be a dick as was sometimes his prerogative.

CGundlach

Apart from Speaking to Akua, Amadeus also Spoke to Cat when she just got the Squire Name, forcing her to watch the execution of the Callowan rebels in Summerholm.

ohJohN

I could be wrong, but this doesn't seem iambic to me, let alone in pentameter? Like, his words have 17 syllables!

Someperson

When they were spending so much effort taking the walls, I had to seriously wonder if Neshamah would just collapse them

the moment it was a majority of Calernian forces that stood atop them

But then I figured, well, what with providence and all, if the Biggest Bad engineered a self-destruct button into his own walls, you know some hero would figure it out in a heartbeat and use it to collapse the walls before marching the armies over the rubble easy peasy

So that wouldn't quite work

Making the entire damn city into a merry-go-round of death, though...

Well played, Neshamah

Well played

oktarine

To sleep, perchance to dream?

Darkening

So, the bit with Cat picking up the story of the 5 man band of scourges feels weird. Like, wouldn't they count as villains? Why is there a story? Seriously, there's been a lot of story sort of stuff going on for not having any villain stories.

john

Probably at least one of the final five Scourges was a hero in life, and the Grand Alliance has firmly established that mixed hero / villain Bands of Five can be a thing.

superkeaton

Oh wow, the Dead King pulled a Unicron. Y'know, I always thought just some collapsible townships was a little tame for him, glad to see I was corrected.

Chapter 62: Finish

"There should be no second chances. To think your days on Creation as a test, as something that can be won or lost, is a mistake. The peculiar delusion to believe that you are alone and all others are rivals. No lone soul can bear the weight of the world: come Last Dusk, we will rise or fall as a whole. So do not be stinting in kindness, in offering chances without counting them. Come the end, we may find that saving one soul saved all the world."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

-my sword cleared the scabbard, rising to catch a glint of sunlight.

"Let us remind the Enemy," I said, and then stilled.

More words were on the tip of my tongue, defiance and pride, but my vision was swimming and suddenly I felt like emptying my stomach all over the avenue. Something had just happened. I'd just been... Choppily moving around on Zombie's back, I saw the dead gathering in bands down the paving stones that would lead us all the way to the inner wall. Nausea clogged up my throat and I retched drily, pawing at my sweaty face. Tears were trailing down my face, like I'd looked into the sun for too long, but when I turned I saw enough. My knights were going through the same thing, several of them vomiting on the floor while others had been thrown off by panicked horses. This isn't what happened, I thought. My blood was pounding away at my temples.

"Akua?" I rasped out.

My eye went to her and found her bent over her necromantic horse, breathing panicked as she tried and fail to say still.

"Sorcery," she got out. "Something..."

She used a word in Mthethwa I'd never head before, maybe from one of the northern dialects.

"I died."

I shifted in my saddle again, feeling like a raft going down rapids as bile rose up my throat. It had been Brandon Talbot who spoke. His face was haggard.

"I remember dying," the bearded knight continued. "Thrown off the edge, the way my skull broke when I landed."

The Sisters were talking in the back of my mind, their voices like the scream of a migraine, and I couldn't even make out what they were saying. It was fast and angry and worried. But I remembered it, just a bit. Charging up that avenue with the Broken Bells behind me, Praes coming to our aid. Storming the wall, setting foot in the Dead King's last redoubt and then... I let out a hoarse scream, clutching my helm as warm nails were driven into my brain. The pain, Gods the pain. Someone laid their soft hand on me, whispering an incantation, but it was dim. Distant. The memories were not. I led us straight into a trap, I remembered with dread. There had been no way to know how many had died when Keter had turned into a lethal jigsaw puzzle, but I could hazard guesses.

Armies had been broken, mine worst of all.

"The Riddle-Maker did this," I guessed, forehead burning with fever.

The last thing I remembered hearing was his challenge to the Dead King, though the precise words escaped me. Most the knights seemed all right by now – shaken, but no more than that – but I was still feeling shaky. Had I gotten it worse than most? Why did... no, I could wonder at that later. We had been sent back by an hour, maybe a little more, and now we knew that Keter itself was a death trap meant to shatter our armies. My eye turned to Akua, who looked a little green but otherwise fine.

"I can't feel the ritual getting started," I said. "Can you? If he got sent back an hour as well, he should be striking immediately knowing we won't fall for it twice."

"A ritual on that scale cannot be done by snapping one's fingers, Catherine," the sorceress peevishly replied. "We saw the end, not the preparations. The first steps are likely being taken below our feet as we speak."

Unless the Dead King hadn't gotten sent back – or his memories sent back, or whatever the Hells this was. That would be too lucky, I grimly thought. I have to assume he went back as well. The only person who could tell me what this all was would be Kreios the Riddle-Maker himself, who was... actually where was he right now?

"Talbot, Akua," I said. "Hold, do not charge."

Both opened their mouths, but before they could ask me anything I'd spurred on Zombie and she took a few bounding steps before leaping into flight. Streaks of sorcery whizzed past us and arrows were fired, though they fell far short, as I the hippocorvid beat her wings hastily and circled ever higher. The smoke was thick up here and ash stuck to my drying sweat in clumps, but I looked with my fleshless eyes and saw where I needed to. The gate that the Procerans had taken not so long ago was full of fantassins and conscripts, but there was not a hint of the Gigantes I had glimpsed there before passing out.

"Are you not here yet?" I murmured.

Gods, I thought. I knew that, like teleportation, 'time' magic was theoretically possible. Not under the Trismegistan theory, sure, but what would a Titan care about that? The sheer amount of power it would need, though, was somewhere between mind-boggling and outright divine. I hadn't thought even an ancient old monster like Kreios the Riddle-Maker would have that in him. Because we know fuck all about him in the first place, I thought, except that he's to Gigantes what Sve Noc are to drow. Regardless, I had my answer: the Titanomachy was not here, had yet to arrive, and that meant in every way that mattered we were still fucked.

We couldn't stop the Dead King's ritual puppetry of his city and we had nothing prepared to take armies through the field of entropy magic that lay beyond the inner walls. Even if we made better time than our last swing at this, went in better prepared, we would lose. And I had my doubts we'd do better, now that the Dead King had no reason to hold back since his trap had already been revealed. He'd come for us with all he had. I cursed under my breath, knees guiding Zombie into a dive. She screeched, displeased she'd done all this flying without getting to kill anything, but obeyed. I was in no better mood. I'd put it all on the line and it had not been enough, so there was only one thing left to do.

Call the retreat.

We landed back with the Order of Broken Bells, which had formed into a wedge in my absence but obeyed the orders. Akua looked better, I thought after glancing her way. Almost back to normal. My knights were even better, except for a few whose faces were still sickly. Those who died, I guessed. Talbot saluted when turned to him, face grim.

"We pull back," I told him. "We can't take the inner city and if we can't do that then we're just throwing lives away."

"It will be butchery getting out," the grandmaster evenly said.

"I know," I said, rubbing the bridge of my nose. "But it'll be a lot worse than that if we stay."

In his eyes I saw he did not agree, and I was not sure whether that was irritating me or making me proud. Maybe a little of both.

"Send riders to the commanders on the ground," I ordered him. "We need to move quickly."

"As you say, Your Majesty," Brandon Talbot replied, fist over heart.

My gaze turned to Akua, who already had a cocked eyebrow.

"I'll reach out to the flying fortresses," she said. "Ask them to cover our retreat instead of our advance."

"Everything they can," I quietly said, eye moving to the dead gathering on the avenue. "This is going to get messy."

I'd been taught an army was never so vulnerable as when it was retreating, and that'd been talking of some field or city. This was Keter.

It was going to get bad.

—

I charged twice with the Order of Broken Bells, to disrupt the dead before they could mass enough to overwhelm our position at the avenue. It was a brisk, shattering business that left skeletons in pieces after which we withdrew. Above us the flying fortresses were pulling back as well, but not before High Marshal Nim gave Keter her goodbyes. A trail of barrels fell in the wake of the retreating fortresses, smashing into the ground to a familiar sight: green flame. The Black Knight unloaded her stocks like a spendthrift, drowning the Crown of the Dead in death all around the Army of Callow's dug in positions. The ogre was not willing to sacrifice the Legions to cover our retreat, but she was willing to do the next best thing.

Word was sent to the Levantines and the Procerans that we were beginning the retreat, though I had no doubt they were doing the same already, and my army closed ranks as it began to cede ground. We'd have to cross the same steel bridges that had brought us here under fire once more, which would be costly, but we'd survive taking a licking like that. The same could not be said of staying in the city. Besides, with the goblinfire surrounding our position we shouldn't be too badly pressed. I sent the Order back, since knights would be of no use in narrow streets packed increasingly tight with our soldiers, and gave Grandmaster Talbot orders to expediate the first bridge crossings.

On my way back to the hill we'd bled so much to take, I found the Painted Knife's band waiting for me. Roland still looked sick, I noticed, but the others were fine. More sensitive to power? Didn't matter and I didn't ask. They had news for me and that took precedence.

"All armies are retreating," Kallia told me. "Just heard it from the Page, Warden. The Grey Legion is hammering at the Procerans and my people are on the verge of collapse."

"Why is the Dominion folding?" I frowned.

They hadn't been that badly off last time.

"I do not know," the Painted Knife unhappily admitted. "Neither did the Page. All I can say is that there is a fighting retreat on all sides."

"It's the best we can hope for," I grunted. "At least we-"

I didn't even have time to tempt Fate, it took the lead. Before I could finish my sentence I felt the fabric of Creation begin to bend and scream, as atop the tower in the depths of the inner city a burning glare turned its attention to us.

"Demons," I quietly said. "Fuck."

The Dead King had decided to stop pulling punches, and it went downhill from there. One of the abominations bent the very floor of Keter, wiping away the goblinfire and turning it into a surreal sculpture as undead poured into the breach. To the east instead a two-legged creature without legs whose very silhouette hurt my eye to behold began to eat the green flames, finally answering the old question of whether goblinfire worked on demons. Only some of them, it seemed. What had been an orderly retreat went to shit in moments.

"Akua-"

"I won't be enough," she interrupted me. "We need diabolists, Catherine. We need the High Lords."

She was right, and if the demons weren't contained then it was more than just the Army of Callow that was at risk. They might sweep through right into the camp.

"Fuck," I cursed again, and drew my sword. "Get them down here. On my authority."

In some ways, what followed was worse than Maillac's Boot. There we had picked our grounds, prepared and weighed the risks. Here it was madness on all sides, my soldiers never in the right place while the enemy struck from everywhere. I fought in the whirlwind of the melee, never staying in place, always going where the shield wall was collapsing or the monster had broken through. I emptied myself of Night, torching ranks of Binds and almost broke my arm dragging a soldier out of a collapsing house. Moments later I had to bring down another on top of my own legionaries as a swarm of ghouls overwhelmed them, biting the scream on the tip of my tongue.

The Praesi came, but there was no clean victory to be had here. One of the Old Mothers topped down, the enchantments that kept it aflight twisted by a demon of Corruption, and as I saw that great fortress topple behind enemy lines I knew every soul inside was dead. The High Lords and their retinues came down, joining the desperate fight, and sorcery lit up the dusty sky. Demons were bound, driven back, and at the heart of it all Akua led them sword in hand. A hand touched my shoulder and I near leapt out my skin, already halfway through a swing when I realized it was Roland. The Rogue Sorcerer was covered in soot, his boyish face drawn and tired.

"The Blade of Mercy's dead," he told me. "And the Skinchanger lost an arm. We were ambushed by the Prince of Bones and the Seelie."

My grip tightened around my sword.

"Pull your band back," I said. "Every Named corpse will be Revenant by tomorrow."

"Kallia already gave the order," Roland said. "The Blessed Artificer was wounded, but she's still covering the retreat across the bridges. We need to get out now, Catherine."

"I'm not leaving my soldiers behind," I harshly said.

"Then lead them out of here quickly," he replied. "The Procerans are mostly out of the city now. We're about to have all the Scourges after us, not just two."

That the Hawk had not shot at me or any of mine even once remained a private source of dread. If he hadn't been after us, then who was it he'd been shooting at? I spat to the side, into a thick carpet of ash. Much as I disliked it, Roland was right: if we kept retreating with a measure of control, we'd get killed anyway. I was going to have to tell my soldiers to run, knowing they'd get shot in the back all the while. But it'll be worse if we're the last people in Keter, I thought. That's suicide.

"I'll give the orders," I said. "Go tell Akua we need to get a move on."

He nodded. I got hold of a captain, then worked my way up the chain to a tribune before I found no one higher. Everyone else was dead. My word was enough to get them moving, and it was exactly as brutal as I'd feared. The dead spilled forth uncontrollably with no shield wall to contain them, and as everyone made a run for the bridges panic began to spread. I made my way to the hill where I'd sent Roland and last seen Akua, but they were further ahead. Behind a half-collapsed house, arguing about something.

"I can still save-"

"Yourself," the Rogue Sorcerer bit out. "Come on, we need to get-"

I saw the glint of the sun on metal, but neither of them did. I shouted in warning even as I pulled on Night, tossing it blindly, but the arrow went through the power like a knife through butter. Akua fell to her knees, a dark-feathered shaft having sprouted in her throat and gone through the sheet of mail.

"No," I shouted, throwing up an illusion to hide them.

Another arrow fell blindly, missing both as Akua clawed at her throat and gasped. Roland put his hand on the arrow and met her eyes. She nodded. I did not have the heart to look, only hearing a wet gurgle. I almost tripped on the stones, falling to my knees next to her as I ripped away the mail and laid a hand on her bloody skin. Her throat had been shredded, now a red mess. I stopped the bleeding with a pulse of Night, but I could not heal. She could, though. Tracing runes in the air, eyes fluttering, she began to close the skin of her own throat. Then I felt the illusion being ripped through. Roland threw out a shimmering shield as I helped Akua up, drawing her close.

She still couldn't talk, she'd lost some vocal cords.

"We run," I said, pulling on Night and throwing another illusion.

Roland suddenly twitched, reaching behind me, and his arm lit up with half a dozen shades of green light shaped like leaves. I ducked, but it would have been too late if he'd not stepped in: the arrow that should have gone through the back of my neck was instead caught in the leaves, punching through them and the mail below to cut the side of his arm.

"Let's," the Rogue Sorcerer fervently agreed.

We legged it. Behind us I saw a flicker of movement and tossed black flame at it without breaking stride, forcing the Seelie to duck away, and we ran for my army and the relative safety of the press of the crowd. Curses broke houses to our sides as we moved, the Mantle revealing she'd not been far behind, and I forced back a whimper of pain as I kept running despite my bad leg. Akua gently pushed off my arm, fine running on her own, and my stomach loosened when finally we reached my soldiers. They parted way for us some, even as everyone tried to hurry onto the bridges even as the ramparts in the distance shot at my crossing men.

Roland stumbled and I caught him, glaring at the man who'd just elbowed him, but that was when I noticed how pale he'd gone. When he dropped to his knees, he didn't get back up. My stomach dropped and I laid a hand on his neck.

"Roland?" I asked. "What is-"

"Poison," he rasped. "Must be."

I found it a moment later and went still. I knew this poison, I'd seen it before. It had been in Hune's blood after the Varlet struck her, and the moment it'd touched Night it had turned into acid and killed her instantly.

"Akua," I shouted, turning around, "I need you to-"

She was already at my side, magic wreathing her hand yellow, but her face was somber. I got up, yelling for a priest, but there were none. They'd already crossed, we were with the last of the rearguard. Roland had gone even paler and his breath was slowing.

"No," I begged, kneeling back down. "Please."

He smiled at me, grasping my hand.

"Charlatans run out of tricks," Roland whispered. "Nothing to it."

"You won't," I said. "We'll--"

I looked at Akua, but she wouldn't meet my eye. The breath went out of me.

"I don't regret it," Roland told me. "I don't. Get them all home, Catherine."

For the first time in years, I let out a sob. He drew me close.

"Beaumarais," he murmured into my ear. "Bury me in Beaumarais. There's a girl..."

He trailed off. His breath was difficult.

"I will," I swore, because what else could I do?

"We did good," Roland whispered, eyes closing. "We did..."

He did not breathe in again. It was over, all because of that small cut on his wrist. A single moment of inattention on my part, that was all it'd taken. I crossed the bridge in silence carrying his body on my back, Akua trailing behind me, swatting stones out of the sky. I went all the way through and up the hill, back to the camp and the tent I had come from. There I found my staff, stuck in the ground, and ripped it free. Eye closed, I sagged against it.

The battle was over.

—

It would take hours before we could count how many soldiers had died – at least twenty-five thousand, by the most conservative of reckonings – but some casualties were easier to count. Names began to filter in with the reports. Prince Rodrigo Trastanes of Orense had died in battle against the Grey Legion, keeping them off routing conscripts long enough to prevent collapse of the Proceran flank. The captain of Hakram's retinue, Dag Clawtoe of the Howling Wolves, took the Hawk's killing arrow for his Warlord. High Lady Takisha of Kahtan blew her own brains out rather than be taken by a demon of Corruption and High Lord Jaheem of Okoro incinerated himself along with three city blocks when he found himself surrounded.

Not all deaths were worth a story. The princess of Creusens was trampled to death by her own panicked horse, Red Ella – Aquiline's second – was pushed off the wall and broke her neck. The senior legate of the Fourth Army was torched by mage fire from his own troops, which had misheard the order of their captain in the mayhem. War was one third heroism, one third horror and one third the simple cruelty of luck.

Some losses were more keenly felt than others. Levant lost its steadiest hand when Careful Yannu was taken by the Prince of Bones, leaving it in disarray as it retreated from its failed assault. The First Army lost General Zola to a ritual bombardment that'd gotten past Hierophant and two layers of wards. It'd been a nasty curse and an even nastier way to die, taking half of the First's senior staff with her. We were so lacking in officers there was talk that Aisha might need to take command, as one of the few old hands left.

When it came to Named, the amount of death was staggering. The Scourges had focused on them rather than racking up crowned scalps and it showed. We'd lost the Royal Conjurer, the Marauder, the Swaggering Duellist, the Balladeer, the Forlorn Paladin, the Blade of Mercy, the Anchorite, the Bloody Sword and the Pilfering Dicer. The Skinchanger had lost an arm, the Myrmidon a leg and the Stone Carver had been struck blind. I'd known few of them in any depth, so my grief was kept back for the one I had counted a friend.

But I swallowed my grief, got myself patched up and changed my clothes before downing as much herbal painkiller as I could. My day wasn't done: the Gigantes were on their way, and that meant there were talks to be had before I could collapse into a bed and weep.

—

It felt more like a town assembly than a war council.

My preference for fewer people in the room was forcefully set aside by circumstance. Twice over, given that not only did we need a crowd's worth of people but we did not have a room that could fit the Gigantes. The gathering took place outside in an abandoned drilling field, the fate of Calernia to be determined over beaten earth besides training dummies. Chairs were dragged in, wards layered one after another by half a dozen different mages under Hierophant's watching eye and then we sent for everyone that wasn't already there.

Every Proceran prince left had dragged their hides there, led by First Prince Rozala Malanza and the unofficial second most powerful man left in the Principate: Otto Redcrown. Frederic sat there wearing a pristine doublet in his family colours, with him a few familiar faces. Beatrice of Hainaut and Arsene of Bayeux. Others I did not know as well: the rulers of Aisne, Orne, Arans, Lyonis and Segovia. The absence of Procer's southeast boded badly for Rozala's later reign, the four principalities that had effectively abandoned the rest of Calernia forming a territory as large as Levant and significantly richer. Adding to the crowd were the most prominent fantassins captains, most of them having fallen behind the most powerful among them: Captain-General Catalina Ferreiro of the Liga Bandera, a handsome scarred woman I'd fought with at the Battle of Hainaut.

In the back of their gathering, still a princess in name, Cordelia Hasenbach sat. Her face was calm, but those blue eyes troubled. They had good reason to be, I conceded with a grimace.

The League of Free Cities gathered around Empress Basilia of Aenia like a pack of birds huddling for warmth, save for the exhausted-looking general from Bellerophon and the aggressively unremarkable minder stand behind him. Hopefully the kanenas wouldn't execute the woman, things were tense enough as it was. First Magister – for life – Zoe Ixioni and Princess Zenobia Vasilakis, Basilia's vassals and closest allies, sat to her sides. The philosopher-priest from Atalante, a short man with a wildly unkempt beard, instead stuck closer to Secretary Nestor and the newly-elected Exarch of Penthes, a nervously skinny young man by the name of Leontios Notaris. They were in the finest mood here, however grim that height: their victory out on the Ossuary with dwarven support had been a crushing one.

The Levantines had brought captains as well as Blood, but that'd not been entirely the choice of the last remaining lords and lady of Levant. Lord Yannu Marave had no issue and his designated successor was in Levant. The most influential captains of Alava had come in the stead of their fallen lord, forcing the lordlings and Lord Moro of the Brigand's Blood to follow suit. They were a brawny and bearded lot, fierce of appearance and decked in colourful paint, but Careful Yannu's empty seat seemed to swallow up space at the heart of them. Even Aquiline and Razin seemed a little lost at his absence: they'd been foes in some way, but Yannu Marave had been the Dominion's leading commander for most of the war against Keter.

The Confederation of Praes, artfully arranged around Malicia, had brought not only the Black Knight in her function as High Marshal but also Lady Nahiza Serrif as the ranking mage and the surviving gaggle of High Lords. Leering old Abreha Mirembé had it made it, as had Sargon Sahelian and venomous old Whither, but the High Lady of Kahtan and the High Lord of Okoro left empty seats. The High Lord of Nok was wounded but alive and had sent his daughter to sit in his stead. Their like was still glittering with gold and jewels, but the rest of the Praesi were anything but. The Warlord had brought with him the chiefs of his most powerful clans, which Hakram was turning into an informal council. Oghuz the Lamé of the Red Shields and Troke Snaketooth for the Blackspears, Hegvor Allspeak for the Split Trees and Arban Twelve-Fingers for the Graven Bones.

My own lot were not so numerous in comparison, though we did have some famous names among us. Marshal Juniper and all my generals were the core of it, with Masego and Akua requested to be present to lend their knowledge. Vivienne was here as my successor, Indrani because she was certain to face the Hawk and though Hanno and Ishaq could not really be considered of 'mine' they sat with me as befitting captains of Above and Below subordinate to my office of Warden. I stood in the back of my delegation, draped in the Mantle of Woe and with two great crows on my shoulders.

The Firstborn did not send anyone but General Rumena and my two scribes. They did not need to: as the defence force of the camps, they had yet to try the walls. Their losses had been the lightest of us all, though that would not last. We had been saving them up for the last push, and that was fast approaching. The dwarves had earned the right to have a seat at the table with the foodstuffs promised, then earned it again by fighting alongside the League on the field today. Yet they preferred keeping their distance, sending only the Herald of the Deeps and Seeker Balasi flanked by a pair of armoured guards in heavy plate that covered their faces.

The last, but not the least, was a single man. Kreios the Riddle-Maker was taller than any of the Gigantes I had seen by a dozen feet, his thick skin a pale brown and his hair long. Unlike what I had seen of his kind, he had long brown locks but shaved his face – though not recently, by the looks of the stubble. His eyes were what drew the attention, large pools of a grey so pale it almost seemed white. They were steady and unblinking, as if there was nothing in the world that could possibly concern him. Given that the Titan sat higher than some towers, even seated with folded legs, I could believe it. Though he did not move and had not spoken since the Witch of the Woods came to stand at his side, it still felt like he was looming over us all.

First Prince Rozala rose to her feet, not even the generous cut of her tunic enough to hide how close to giving birth she was getting.

"I will begin by giving formal thanks to the Titanomachy," Rozala Malanza said, and then to the surprise of some offered a bow to Kreios. "If you had not lent your aid, we might not now be alive to thank you."

Some of her countrymen looked aghast at a First Prince bowing to a giant, but others were openly approving. The Titan studied her, then bowed his head back.

"Worthy causes ever find friends," the old gold rumbled.

He didn't mean to sound so deep, I decided, to have the sound of his voice resonating in our bones. But then did humans mean to breathe strong enough to move flies?

"An honourable sentiment," Rozala replied, sounding sincere. "In its spirit, may I ask what manner of spell was used to move us through time?"

Kreios glanced at the Witch, whose face of painted stone looked sternly at us all.

"It was not movement in the sense you mean," the Witch of the Woods told us. "A moment was severed from the flow and, once separate, made to begin anew. It was then joined anew to the flow."

Hierophant leaned forward.

"You mean that we lost an hour compared to the rest of Creation," Masego said. "Instead we repeated the same hour twice."

Kreios watched him.

"You have good eyes, Cutter," the god praised, "and witness much."

"There is so much to see," Hierophant smiled.

They might have gotten started on the magic talk if left to it, I figured, but we couldn't spare the time for that.

"Can you do it again?" I bluntly asked.

It was the Witch that answered me.

"Not without erasing most of the Kingdom of the Dead," Antigone said. "It will be centuries before severing causality here should be considered again."

Mhm, I'd figured it would be something like that. Power that useful never came without a price. An hour for a few centuries of silence, huh. Creation was more fragile than I'd thought, or perhaps more hard-handed in erasing mistakes. I'd moved the conversation back to practicalities, which had been my objective, so I didn't step into it again. Aquiline was the one who first put the cards on the table.

"Though we have taken great casualties," the Lady of Tartessos said, "I believe we all know the truth: if we do not strike tomorrow, we will lose this war."

There were grim nods of agreement, and then the inevitable hesitation. People wanted to wait longer, to let the men rest and finish healing the wounded. To make new plans to invest the city. It was Hakram that put an end to it.

"We learned the lay of the Dead King's defences today," the Warlord growled, "at great cost to many of us. If we wait, we throw those lives away: every hour that passes, the dead build new dangers to ruin us. We cannot wait."

There was a hear, hear from Otto Reitzenberg that had a few Procerans cheering, Levantines loudly voicing their own approval. Eyes went to me, but I kept silent. It was Juniper who spoke for the Army of Callow, voicing her agreement.

"We can't wait," the Hellhound grunted, "but let's not kid ourselves about our chances either. If we don't have anything for the shifting city and that death trap in the inner city, then there's no point in attacking."

There the dwarves stirred.

"I believe I know where the ritual lies," the Herald of the Deeps said. "Though I cannot stop it from beginning, I would lead my soldiers underground to end it."

There were some nods of appreciation.

"Keter's Due will begin to be fed into the secondary arrays long before the city begins to move," Akua said. "We need a way to deal with it first."

"The leading issue is the entropy trap," Chancellor Alaya agreed. "We cannot take the Hellgate and reach the Dead King without being able to push past the second wall."

"I will silence the power," Kreios the Riddle-Maker stated. "When soldiers reach this wall, I will go with them and keep this trap dormant."

There was a moment of silence, none quite daring to speak up after that. I cleared my throat.

"Then we have the bare bones of a plan," I said. "We will assault the city again, with Lord Kreios allowing us to push past the inner wall while the Herald and his army strike at the Dead King's ritual."

"That still means we have to take Keter again," Lord Moro of the Brigand's Blood grimaced. "The Enemy will await us, and there are no bridges left. We will depend entirely on sorcery to cross."

"No," General Rumena mildly said. "This is to be the last battle, yes? Then the Firstborn will lead the charge. All can follow in our wake."

It was enough of a boast that it had to explain after, but fewer questions were asked than one might assume. It had not gone unnoticed that I had not contradicted the drow general. An hour and change passed as tactics were argued and then the attribution of Named. The greatest change was that there would be no army sent out to do battle on the Ossuary: there would be no other chance of winning after this. We were all in, do or die. Remaining in my seat, I closed my eye and sunk into my Name. Let it wash over me, hands reaching into the void as I exerted my will to See. And I found it, exactly what I was looking for. It was right under my hand, almost eager to be taken up.

The last stories were falling into place, huh. Even Fate believed it would all come down to tomorrow.

When I opened my eye I found the Riddle-Maker staring at me. Hierophant had, Gods bless his soul, stepped between us in a gesture that could be taken as protective. The Titan wished me no harm, though. I knew exactly what it was that'd drawn his attention.

"You have stolen an eye from the Intercessor," the Titan said.

Silence fell, all other conversation dying. I reached for my pipe and took it in hand, stuffing it full of wakeleaf with well-practiced movements. I passed my palm over the mouth and pulled on a shard of Night, lighting it, and pulled deep. I let the burn linger in my lungs, the acrid pleasure of it, and spewed out the pale smoke. I was even nice enough not to do it on the back of Juniper's neck, merciful queen that I was.

"Taken," I corrected in a drawl. "It's been a habit since I was a girl, I'll confess."

The old god seemed unmoved by my words.

"And what did you find?" he asked.

"We're about to have a visitor," I smiled.

I wasn't tied into the wards, but I knew the mages that were: and each and every one of them shivered. A heartbeat later a silhouette stood in the middle of the circle. Tall and slim and androgynous, they had a spellwood sword at their hip and a long green cloak. Smoothly the unsheathed the sword, and though half the crowd reached for weapons I did not move. I pulled at my pipe, eye unblinking as the Emerald Sword plunged it into the earth. It met my gaze, face expressionless.

"We acknowledge the debt of the prince and the tower, Warden," the elf said. "We will honour the bargain struck."

I spat out smoke, making them wrinkle their nose, and inclined my head in a nod. They had better. I'd opened them a gate into Twilight from the room in the Tower they'd been stuck in, surrounded by goblinfire on all sides, at a price. When the time came for the Dead King to be brought at an end, the Emerald Swords would lend their swords to the cause. It'd taken me long enough to get them to acknowledge I had a right to be bargained with that I had gotten late to the bottom of the Tower and the tragedies it had in store for me, but it had been worth it. I had seen the might of the Emerald Swords, in Ater.

They would make a difference.

"I expected no less," I replied.

They didn't bother to answer me, or even address anyone else here. In a blink of an eye they were gone, the only proof they'd ever been there the dozen blades that'd been pulled and the length of spellwood that had been thrust into the ground. Eyes were still on me, but all I offered was a friendly smile. Always one more trick, that was the way. And I wasn't even finished pulling on that particular thread. I rose to my feet, then stretched and cracked my bones.

"I believe this war council can come at an end," I said.

"Do you have somewhere else to be, Your Excellency?" Ishaq drily asked.

"I'm going to start a cooking fire and find a stiff drink," I frankly replied, then cast a look at the rest of them.

Thoughtful looks, some amused ones and a few offended.

"Tomorrow's our wager with Fate," I said. "Make sure you're ready to face it."

As for me, I knew exactly who I wanted to spend my last few hours before the plunge with.

Souloist

I'm caught up – right at the endgame! Amazing work as always 😊

dadycoool

You made it! Now sit down, enjoy the anticipation with us.

Conquest

Same, its also my first comment. I'm glad I was able to catch up right at the best part, I wish I had done so sooner. Waiting will just make it better.

Kildare

Oh you sweet summer child. You actually thought this was the endgame? 😊

Joseph Perry

Smoke, Mirrors, and a Knife

Someperson

Smoke, Mirrors, and a Knife

AKA Lies and Violence

Konstantin von Karstein

N000000! ROLAND!

Bad@games

AHHHHH IM GONNA DIE. MY FAVORITE HER00000 N00000000. HOW CAN YOU DO THIS TO ME AHHHHHH

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Adrian V

In my head Roland is like Harry Dresden, so even now that he died i won't count him out!! Ghosts, resurrection, etc there are many ways his story could not be over, and its not just me being in denial!! That is only like 90% of it xD

Mostly that tiny veneer of optimism comes from what he did to some Fae in the arsenal, basically he confiscated something about them that altered their basis (Archer noted somethign strange about 1 fae remember) so for all we know when he died it was just 1 more chapter for him as a cosmic/fate chew toy.....

Someperson

Maybe Masego figured out a way to duplicate him like Catherine has been asking for ages

Tom

Don't worry, Nessie will bring him back 😊

sengachi

If Roland has to be killed a second time as a Revenant, I will scream.

Lord Haart

Cat's chances of surviving as Warden just doubled, his Confiscate had me thinking he'd replace her.

My favorite hero too, great backstory. 😞

The Hawk has probably killed more Named than Amadeus at this point. Lots of karma due.

MadnessIndeed

Right on the cups of the end. The very edge of things. Exciting stuff.

dadycoool

Everyone could use a drink after last chapter, especially the people in the blender. I wouldn't be surprised if not a single person entered Keter sober.

jamesc9

Is there any chance that that's the critical success condition? That the Gods Above and Below prefer fools and drunkards over Nessie?

aurikdomi amazing as always

Juff

Typo thread:

when turned > when I turned expediate > expedite tone third > one third unkempt bear > unkempt beard old gold > old god
the unsheathed > they unsheathed come at an end > come to an end

Theo

Roland died > There was an illusion of Roland dying, but he went to go live on a farm instead.

Tenthyr

The final push, The drow as the vanguard and Rumenas chance to fulfil Its oath, the surface front where the armies shall try to take the heart of Keter, shielded by the Riddle maker, a desperate subterranean assault on the ritual that would turn the city into a glorified blender.

And the next, painful twist that will make Cordelia open the last words of her cousin.

Adrian_V

Yeah Rumena's oath will be important i bet, he has a lot of power, reputation and "weight" so there is no way such an oath won't have some effect in the story.

Someperson

I hope Rumena doesn't die.

I hope that there is still a sassy ancient drow just sorta doing his thing in the Age of Order after the war ends.

ninegardens

Having only read the first paragraph, I would like to quote something from the previous comment section:

"I mean the counter is pretty obvious, isn't it? If DK used time to kill his enemies, just turn it back." -Hargabga Welp... congratulations buddy, you called it. Good job.

smibd

"Prince Rodrigo Trastanes of Orense had died in battle against the Grey Legion."

"Frederic sat there wearing a pristine doublet in his family colours, with him a few familiar faces. Beatrice of Hainaut, Arsene of Bayeux, Rodrigo of Orense."

Rodrigo of Orense somehow both died in the battle(post time-rewind) and was present at the subsequent downhill meeting

Konstantin von Karstein

It's Traitorous who took his place!

Someperson

...or possibly a undead if it's on purpose...

Adrian_V

Well probably a mistake but with so many demons running around plus the beating reality took from Kreios anything is posible you know?

RoflCat

AM00GUS?!

(not sorry)

ohJohN

I also noticed:

"The princess of Creusens was trampled to death by her own panicked horse"

""
"Others I did not know as well: the rulers of Aisne, Creusens, Orne, Arans, Lyonis and Segovia."

Hargabga

Nah, it was ruler, that can be chalked up to ruler being different.

Wonder

Holy shit !!! How power is this Titan????

CatKua on the battlefield!!!!!!!!!!

RIP Roland...

Mirror Night

Pretty darn powerful and remember this is a crippled version of the Titan. He is not anywhere near the peak of his powers...hence probably why Hanno said the Titans calling themselves gods wasn't arrogance.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Fun fact you may recall: dragons in this setting are what was left after the Titans met a bunch of animal-gods, didn't like them, and decided to imprison them (and thus render them irrelevant) until the set of story grooves that made them gods were shallow enough to be manageable.

Hotcha

Rodrigo of Orsene is both dead and at that meeting?

Linnus42

Wow Hanno might have a more annoying wait for a new name than Cat at this point. At least you could figure out the contours to hers pretty easily. Hanno's better have some OP Aspects to go with it as well at this point.

So its like LOTR...the last Alliance of Elves, Man, Drow, Orcs, Goblins, Dwarves, and Gigantes. Kinda feels like we are rushing though. Throw the Crown into the Fire lol...

RIP Roland...also bury Roland's body surely the safer bet at this point is to incinerate his body. Not sure they should be taking chances with dead bodies around. Makes sense DK would try to take him out though, he has a very dangerous ability for DK. I am not sure he could totally seal DK's power but any reduction would be a massive aid.

Linnus42

I think part of my issue to expand on this is I don't remember much alternative POV during this final siege...that is kinda what I like about these big events you get to see how other characters besides Cat sees the Battle. We have gotten little of that this arc...I suppose we got time for it.

Snappy270

I do agree. The lack of POV does make it seem short. I think the pace of cats POV is normal. There should be one of Hanno's side and maybe one before the time reset, seeing people die in the city beyblade.

Adrian V

Blame the whinny readers who complain about the interludes

clavesoon

Nooooo. Roland.

edrey

well, officially all the continent is here, except the rats of course this was really a amazing chapter, for sure.

as side note, i expect Ranger awaiting at the side hellgate.

JRogue

Its funny you mention the rats.

As soon as Cat mentioned that she had other cards up her sleeve I wondered if she had somehow figured out a way to bring them into it, even if it is just something close to diverting a river. You cannot control the flow of the river, but with enough work, you can decide where that river flows.

Miles

Cat had done a lot with rivers. And lakes. Lakes that used to be rivers. Rivers that used to be lakes. Lakes that moved across dimensions. If it's like a lake (or a river, which is really just an uppity lake) she has the power to do whatever needs to be done.

Lox

I feel cheated that Roland died.

dadycoool

He felt too prominent and close for him to die, but so did Robber, Ratface, and so many other friends along the way.

Revenant

All their names began with an R, as does RIP.

In hindsight their deaths were inevitable.

Zachary A Sloan

Trying to think of any other major characters with R names.

nick012000

Rumena.

Miles

Ranger

Liliet

Rune?

KageLupus

There are no victories against the Dead King, only varying degrees of loss. Roland can rest easy, knowing that his story helped lead to the fall of Keter. He will be missed.

boballab

I think he had to for Fate and the Story to play out right. I keep thinking back to when the Pilgrim told Saint that Cat's story is playing out as a Hero's story. If the Pilgrim is right then the worse things are at the end the bigger boost Cat gets to overcome it, sucks for Roland and others close to her.

Miles

Roland died like a mentor. He helped out early on and taught her a trick or two, did his own thing for a while, came back just to save her from overwhelming death and die in the process.

Too bad there are too many heroes with conflicting stories involved. GP and 100 heroic axioms warned about this.

dadycoool

HOLY SHIT! I'll admit, I never expected time magic. Nussy should report for hacking because that was utter BS. He went from total victory to only getting scraps of one and several secrets revealed with nothing to show for it.

As an aside, it's interesting to see how everyone's coming together for the final push. The interaction between Cat and the Riddle-Maker was fun.

Crash

You gotta wonder if he's sweating by now. Literally everyone is here. This stuff is powerful and hasn't happened before. Nowhere close to this, the Name of Warlord came back from the grave, Kreios came out from his temple, even the fucking Elves are here.

Some folks are wondering about the ratlings, I do not think they count as they cannot be bargained with as a people. Horned Lords may be capable of speech, but they're not able to speak for the whole Chain.

For all purposes, all of the peoples of Calernia are standing at his gate. They've got Neshamah quite cornered one might say so that should be fun.

ksmvr

Yo, what about the General Nekheb, "General Catastrophe" of the 10th Legion? The one dragon we know is still alive and he's not dragon his ass up? Bruh where is he?

Crash

Every time they mention the Legions of Terror I think to myself "is it finally happening?"

Liliet

Sleeping, last we checked.

Joe Mama

I actually think it would be incredibly funny if we were trolled out of seeing the dragon that was introduced three books ago in action at the big final battle, just because he was sleeping. I am now praying that he does not show up.

ohJohn

I suspect, like the Titans and the Gigantes, the drakoi were vastly more powerful ancestors of dragons, but even still: it's probably not a great idea to get Nekheb and Kreios within a hundred miles of each other, given the, uh, tumultuous history of their peoples 😊

zenanii

“the newly-elected Exarch of Penthes”

Oh crap, this is bad. REALLY bad. Once Anaraxes is informed he is no longer the Hierarch he will no longer have the legal right to keep judging the choir of judgment, which means he won't. Once that happens the angel weapon trap will be active again and all Bard will need is for someone to fire it.

theFluffy

Why would a newly elected Exarch mean Anaraxes isn't the Hierarch anymore?

Jstj

What do you mean, no longer Hierarch? There's not been any change in that. The Exarch of Penthes is the person who rules Penthes, Anaxares is the Hierarch of the League

Earl of Purple

Different title. The Exarch of Penthes is the military ruler of that city, opposite the political ruler I think. Basically he's their top general, with limited authority elsewhere in the city and less in the rest of the League.

Cheetah724

You're thinking the Strategoi and the Basilius (I think I spelled those correctly) of Nicea. The Exarch of Penthes is simply the ruler of Penthes (it's also a Name).

Earl of Purple

Oh, my mistake. Thank you for the correction.

Crash

Being Hierarch is not why Anaxares is giving the choir trouble. The fact that they attempted to judge folks not under their purview (according to Anaxares) and by rules not made by them is the problem.

Either way, the angel weapon is still in play regardless of the current state of the Choir. Much ado has been made about it and how unpredictable it is with or without interference. Cordelia still has her finger on that trigger.

Liliet

No, no, the Free Cities have their individual leaders AND the Hierarchy, this is fine

AkuaXMasego

Man, I'm bummed that Roland had to die here. I can't wait for our traditional roasted pig and alcohol segment, those are always nice.

Bad@games

1. Roland N0000000 AHHHHH IM GONNA DIE. MY FAVORITE HER00000 N00000000. HOW CAN YOU DO THIS TO ME AHHHHHH.

2. Hehe elf fo brrrrr

3. ITS TIME FOR THE TOMB MAKER BITCHESSSSS

4. Rangers gonna be there. Mabey prob get good interaction w/ her and cat bc ya knoww cat knifed some white dude in new york or smthn

5. Haha gigantes go brrrrrr

Bad@games

Hmm i dont like how this comment sounds now. I apologies if this comment sound like i dislike literally anything about the story that was meant as a joke love you thx.

Bad@games

Still crying bout MY POOR BOY N000 roland. Im just really upset he died HOW COULD YOU DO THIS THIS IS ALMOST AS BAD AS ROBBER AHHHHHHHHHH

Liliet

Get them home, Catherine

Kiara

Worse than robber.

Robber went out as best he could, in a last moment of glory.

Roland just went.

Miles

Roland died saving Cat's life. That's a pretty glorious way to go.

Lord Haart

Yes, though one thing about time rewinds is that as a reader you expect them to happen again after subsequent losses... Roland's death might have hit harder at the moment if instead he had come back with them feeling merely tired, then as Cat leaves that council she finds out that he died in the meantime.

Wonder

So up to now we still don't know anything about Vivienne's Aspects.

Darkening

I dunno how many she'd even have at this point. Maybe she got one during the initial charge that gave her her name, but how many significant character moments has she had since then? The negotiation with the former callowan legion I guess, people don't always say their aspects out loud so she might have gotten something there.

Liliet

It was stealing the Thirteenth that gave her her Name

Darkening

Huh, I thought it was during the charge in, I wanna say Hainaut? The city where tariq and robber died. Guess that was just when the name started forming instead of when it crystalized into Princess.

Liliet

Yeah, that's when people first started calling her "the princess" despite her not having the title yet.

Cicero

Might have gotten an aspect before the Name formed.

Liliet

True! That does seem very early though, given it was only the first hint she MIGHT eventually get a Name out of that.

Cicero

There was when she acted in the Tower when Auka burned the throne... and maybe when she robbed Cornelia's library,,,

I think that's about it though.

So... I'd say there's probably be something about inspiration/ hope for an aspect, another aspect about thievery (something metaphorical perhaps) as that's to much a part of her to just disappear (recovering the 13th Legion also plays into that).

Two aspects maybe?

Dawn and Dusk maybe? With dusk using the slang meaning of theft?

Sir Nil

"Not without erasing most of the Kingdom of the Dead," Antigone said. "It will be centuries before severing causality here should be considered again."

Am I the only one who thinks this is an effective last resort suicide weapon? Can't be worse than the angel nuke.

SnappleFacts

I think the main issue though is that they're all stuck there, and Twilight is broken.

Snappy270

The other issue is will it destroy the hell gate ?

Liliet

the problem with environment destroying AoEs is they dont work super great on Named (and DK qualifies in this sense)

Unrecovered

So gigantes know the ultimate art of Save and Load. That's terrifying.

Lord Haart

But they saved over the ideal save with a new one a bit too late in the game 😞

More likely, Above wouldn't countenance a full reset since it would imbalance the story too much.

BargleNawdleZouss

So many thoughts!

1. Kreios the Titan finally contributing.
2. Elves ready to contribute...FINALLY!
3. Dwarves contributing in combat...FINALLY!
4. The drow taking the lead. First claim to Rumena!

5. Ranger should be showing up any minute. But will she be contributing, or dueling Indrani?
 6. Crown of Autumn waiting to be deployed.
 7. Sword of the Rest waiting to be used (broken?).
 8. Severance waiting to be deployed.
 9. Hanno about to come into his (new?) Name at a narratively appropriate time.
 10. The Peregrine sword waiting to be deployed; Arthur ready to come into his other two aspects?
 11. Sapan, time to level up!
 12. Augur's message to Cordelia waiting to be read. If not at the big bonfire party, then when?
 13. Hierarch showing how nettled he truly is at what the Dead King did to him.
 14. The last ride of The Woe + Akua, with Princess Vivienne playing coordinator. Big faceoff coming with The Scourges?
 15. Do NOT want Pilfering Dicer deployed against the Grand Alliance. Does it take longer for the DK to raise Named to his service compared to regular undead?
 16. What will the Wandering Bard have to say for herself when she finally shows up?
 17. How close will Cordelia get to deploying the ealamal?
- Narratively, she will be within moments of pushing the button when SOMETHING happens (perhaps #12 above).

Earl of Purple

Re: 15- Did not take long for poor Tancred to be killed and raised in Keter's service. And now Neshamah has a night.

Bret

Oh my god, what a chapter. The goddamn EMERALD SWORDS are here, let's see the Scourges stop those.

Hype as it is, I am just sad now because Roland is dead and my single favorite hero in the whole story is no longer with us 😞

ohJohN

Roland is dead, and everything is worse now"

nimelennar

Ah. THERE are the demons.

The dwarves, elves and Gigantes have shown up; now the only missing force, as far as I can remember, is Larat's.

It looks like watching Akua die might have finally pushed Cat to give in to get feelings for her.

Joe Mama

Technically the Rats are missing too. WOG is that we won't see the Gnomes in this story iirc, but they are, again, absent on a technicality.

Lord Haart

I mean, Ashur/Baal/Yan Tei as well.

I hope for one more scene work Larat but my guess is more that he'll come back to stabilize and heal Twilight. After all, he was actually the first ruler thereof.

Mary Gentle

Is Careful Yanno still dead? Going to miss him.

I have a personal prejudice against time-reversal in stories – it always seemed to be the trope of choice in tv sf as I was growing up. A way to have your cake and eat it too. Protagonists are led to the moment of death and maybe beyond, and then reprieved by some jiggery-pokery. So you can have the heroes really truly screw up, and all the advantages of an enemy who's read the Evil Overlord List... but then you get a do-over.

I'm not sure whether the fact that erraticerrata does this immensely well is a plus point or a minus point.

The entropy trap that killed Cat's Legionaries was truly horrible. As a person, I might feel really glad it now that it didn't happen. As a reader, I feel cheated out of my tragedy.

Maybe Roland's death is expected to make up for that; some real loss to balance out the "missing hour"... Dunno. I miss Robber and Amadeus more than him.

This isn't a complaint, really. It's that for the two chapters before the last one, I've had a vague feeling that there was something missing. In retrospect, after that last chapter, it was a feeling I identified as this: the battle against Keter ought not to be a Napoleonic Grande Armee, or a Legion slog in the mud, because the fight against the Dead King ought to be more.

And last chapter, with the slice-em-up city, and the entropy that could wipe out a whole legion, that was exactly the "more" that I needed.

Now I'm told that didn't happen.

I can't help but feel let down.

Then again, I'm confident that erraticerrata can pull any number of be-fanged and be-clawed rabbits out of hats in the next few chapters. There's finally Rumena. And elves. And a Titan god who surely will be doing more than dissipate entropy...

But reading is a realtime process, and just at this particular moment, I feel let down.

shikkarasu

This is twice, I think, in 7 books that we got some variation on a mass mulligan. I'm inclined to forgive it, since it was very well done, as you mentioned, and the fact that EE isn't leaning on it. The trope is being used sparingly and skilfully. That's all we can ask.

It isn't Game of Thrones level butchery, but also several beloved, or at least recurring, characters have died. It also clarified stakes by showing, not just telling. I will go so far as to say plus two points, even with a trope that can be hard to swallow.

Mary Gentle

While I mostly agree with you, it doesn't stop me feeling disappointed right now. I may feel better about it later on. (Or not – I still don't like the 2 year timeskip.)

'Showing, not telling' ...Hm. They're both equally valid things to do, I've always felt. "Showing" is dramatisation. "Telling" is narrating. In fiction, you need both, because sometimes you need to show the footfall of every ant, and sometimes (despite what I say above) you need to tell the reader "Two years later..."

So it's points for whether those things were used appropriately, rather than which one was chosen. I'm with you in that I think there's no better way to do the last chapters than how they were done. If it had to be done.

Oddly enough, I'm not asking for an end-of-Hamlet type of butchery. Though normally I might be the first. 😊 I still miss Robber. And Amadeus. Hell, I miss Hakram, and he's still here. (We just don't see him often.) And Masego.

I do wonder if I'd be half as happy to see Cat around Akua if her other loved ones were still with her. Indrani is barely on stage . . .

Let's say plus 1.5 points, since I want room to gripe until the next startling chapter!

Snappy270

Tbf the titan riddle maker is the foremost expert of time magic and entropy. Remember the fight between the witch of the woods and warlock mentioned several time based spells one named after the riddle maker. So it wasn't like the time related magic wasn't telegraphed and he is perfect for solving the entropy problem.

Dark elves and wood elves fighting together maybe ? Should be a laugh.

ohJohN

Relatedly, it's notable that the protagonists only resort to cheap time-based fuckery in response to other cheap time-adjacent fuckery. IMO the symmetry of this situation cancels out a lot of the inherent cheapness of save-scumming.

ohJohN

Totally valid. I think Get Out Of Jail Free cards should definitely be rare and justified, but I enjoyed this one – though I'm struggling to nail down why. I guess it's just a bunch of minor reasons that added up:

- its effect is limited – only 1 hour, so they can't undo the entire doomed offensive – and they can only use it once
- they were forced to use it pretty much immediately, so it's not hanging around lessening the stakes of future battles – and now they have even fewer miracles available to protect them in the next battle
- it's double-edged: DK presumably also remembers the first loop, and could have gathered valuable intel from it; it's physically rough on humans; and, thanks to continuity of experience, it was probably pretty demoralizing to experience death and then have to redo the last hour of horrific fighting
- it still hurt their forces pretty badly; they didn't avoid a thrashing, just stopped it from being fatal
- it was a bigger emotional hit: I know losing every soldier inside Keter was an objectively worse outcome, but I'm a lot more invested in the confirmed dead this time around 😊
- the G00JF's existence is plausible: it is a suspiciously powerful tool, but it was created by the oldest, possibly strongest god on the continent, working in his area of expertise – that checks out
- they earned it, narratively: I was really invested in Antigone's interludes, especially the Titan mythology, and those threads twined so well with what was the peak of Hanno's arc so far, when he starts judging for himself and decides to ask for Kreios's help. excellent, no notes, miracle bought and paid for

- DK is so powerful that this doesn't feel like an unfair advantage; they're still barely keeping their heads above water

I guess in aggregate it comes down to: it's a story, so underneath it all I want the protagonists to win, but I want to feel like they earned it. If the author is making things too easy, or arbitrary, or inconsistent, that's mostly when it gets boring or disappointing, for me.

DC

Masego and Kreios getting chummy is an idea that appeals to me for some reason.

Also, not to put too fine a point on it but wouldn't erasing most of the Kingdom of the Dead be at least an option to put on the table at this point?

Rey d`Tutto

Yeah, but it would also kill off the armies and Named as well. Ad it likely wouldn't kill the dead king or his hellgate

Daniel E

"The philosopher-priest from Atalante, a short man with a wildly unkempt beard". Please please never fix that typo. This is canonical now and you will never convince me otherwise.

erebus42

Godsdamn, is EE pulling a Wildbow and rolling dice to see who survives?

Farewell Roland, you were easily the most reasonable of the Heroes. You will be missed.

I'm excited to see some real balls to the wall full on drow action -even if a lot of them are probably gonna die. Hopefully though it will help cement their place in the world to come and make people less willing to fuck them over the way they had been trying to up to this point.

Liliet

Oh EE is not pulling a Wildbow. This was well-calculated.

Joe Mama

Wait this is a joke right? Wildbow didn't actually decide deaths randomly? I read worm a very long time ago but it felt all planned out.

Hargabga

He did, he even said so himself. He rolled deaths in Leviathan attack saying that even if Skitter dies, he will abide by it and change main hero. 1 in 4 as in universe. And then again in Behemoth attack, only with a caveat that Skitter survives anyway because he already wrote a lot.

Liliet

He planned on her dying and switching the protagonist actually, Taylor truly survived against all odds.

shikkarasu

I think this is why I could never finish a Wildbow serial. Gloves are just a little too eager to come off for my liking. Still wildly enjoyed the amount of Pact/Pale I have read, though.

Earl of Purple

Ironically, as I recall it, the character he'd planned to take over if Skitter died was Aegis- who got stepped on by Leviathan and didn't survive.

Liliet

Yeah, and he died against great odds just as Taylor lived against great odds, so Wildbow decided it was fate lol

Avandar

I agree – and to add some humour, I really want a POV of General Abigail and what legendary things she has stumbled into. You KNOW that this chaotic mess is made for her to shine... and when the hour is removed, she knows she has to do it all over again...

shikkarasu

Well, at least I don't need to worry anymore. Half my company dead and we are stranded with no hope on a spinning island-pillar. I guess I can at least take some solace in that-

FTW? I'm alive? Oh shit. Oh SHIT. That means..."CROSSBOWS, FORWARD. SHIELDS, LEFT SIDE. Anyone who died recently, follow the lead of someone less shaken and more terrified!" ... I'm going to get another gods-damned commendation for this, aren't I?.

jamesc9

> gods-damned commendation

Please, can this kind be made into an officially separate category 😞

Barrendur

"Chapter 62; blood, death, dismay – oh, and this seems like a good place to wipe out the Rogue Sorcerer, so let's do that." This was a very off-handed death for a well-developed and (apparently) significant character, and it trivialises Roland's story arc and character. "Major character? Nah, just more padding."

Liliet

I disagree strongly.

Joe Mama

Disagree. They're taking Keter, fighting the literal King of Death. People are going to die, a lot, including our closest heroes. It actually seems a little odd that he's the only one of the "main cast" outside of I suppose Yannu, to die so far.

Daniel E

I feel ya man. I had the same reaction to Zombie III's demise.

Hargabga

I think it was the point. Sometimes people just... dir. And there's no great story.

Liliet

Catherine is truly queen of dying. This is THE record for stupidest death. Now mind you I'm sure Creation nudged things a bit to contrive this to happen with more certainty so Akua couldn't save her, between it being a doomed timeline and the symbolism of the soldier queen dying right after her army, but also, Catherine really did that

Catherine really did, and I cannot mock this enough, GET DISTRACTED FROM HAVING BEEN STABBED BY BANTERING WITH HANNO

Joe Mama

Cat's at 6 deaths, correct? I don't want to go back and count but that sounds about right. Doesn't seem like there's enough story left for her to get to nine and live up to her name, but you never know with EE

shikkarasu

- Lone Swordsman: Round 1 (half dead)
- Demon of Corruption in a Name Dream (got better, but worth mentioning. also necro-puppeted herself earlier that day)
- Lone Swordsman: Round 3 (actually decapitated. Mugged an Angel in retaliation)
- King of Winter (literal heart removed. This might not count, but...)
- Became Queen of Winter (Stopped being a mortal woman. Heart only beats when she remembers it should)
- Had the Crown of Winter ripped out (Death of a god, rebirth of a mortal?)
- Whatever Sve Noc did to her while peering through her soul (They called this one 'Thrice Dead' in the chapter title.)
- Shot by the Hawk (not even Named. Pulled through in the end, all the same.)
- Stabbed, aged, and then bled to death (retroactively didn't happen)

So somewhere between 3 and 9, depending on what you count.

Crash

Truly, what a fuckin legend.

LOLIPOP1136

Not much to do with this chapter in particular, but, prediction time:

So I saw a comment on reddit predicting that one of the Scourges would escape DK's control at some point in the finale, since "the unfairly treated minion betraying the villain" is a classic trope and whatnot. Well, after entertaining the thought of it for a minute, I realized that there's actually already some possible foreshadowing for a specific one of the remaining Scourges!

Recall two chapters ago, when Cat was fighting the Mantle. There's two things of note here – the first is Cat pointing out that the Mantle is one of few Revenants who can't talk, theorizing that it's because what DK is making her do is too against her original moral code when alive.

The second is the most compelling part I think. Near the end of the fight, Cat uses See and is surprised by the results. Now, in the context of the fight, it seems that what she's surprised by is the Mantle's next attack – but that doesn't actually add up. Cat's See isn't just future sight, it specifically lets her look at people's story threads. So what story threads does the Mantle have? Well, we don't know of any rivalries with a member of the GA like the Hawk has with Indrani, so that's out. One possibility is the story of the remaining Scourges joining in a Bo5... but Cat comments on that one in the next chapter, and it seems new to her. Thus the only other story that I can think of that adds up is the one of somehow fighting back against DK.

Anyone else think this is plausible? Or am I just reading too much into Cat's banter and inner monologue?

Liliet

Huh. No, this does sound right.

Cheetah724

Problem is, Evil Stories are still off the table until Cat breaks the Sword of the Rest.

Adrian_V

Well everything big about the chapter has already been mentioned so how about some small details? Like Kreios and Zeze's interaction, the fact the the Titan genuinely praised him was sweet, and awesome coming from him, and how they seemed to get along, almost seems like someone telling him that "see, he surprised you, there are still wonders to see int he world and to protect it", basically something to beat away his apathy

alexjmscott

The entropy trap and the jigsaw city were unexpected at the time, but in hindsight we – and Cat – should really have expected something to go wrong with that assault. This is, after all, a world built on story tropes:

- If a protagonist has enough resources (time, ammunition, money, whatever) for three attempts on something and no more, it's a good bet that the first two will fail.

- If a prominent character (Rumena) has vowed to do something, they will either do it or fail dramatically in the attempt. It won't be done by someone else while the one with the vow is busy covering their back.

- The first two assaults set the Alliance and Neshamah up for a Pattern of Three, harking back to some of Cat's earliest encounters with Namelore. The first assault was a full win for Neshamah. The second was arguably a draw: the Alliance were forced to give up their gains in the city, but gained valuable foreknowledge and allies for the final push. The third and final assault would then be the Alliance's victory.

shikkarasu

I've been dying for someone in universe to acknowledge Rumena's boast for a while. I think it mentioned the vow in Serolin, but other than that it's been this Chekhov's Gun for, like, 2 books now.

Lord Haart

Yeah big story miss for Cat here.

Unless she thought the assault would fail around the palaces but not so badly.

ohJohN

A THEORY I AM ENTHUSIASTIC ABOUT:

1. Cat refers to Creation as “fragile” wrt the time shenanigans. It’s not quite explicit, but it seems very plausible that – like we’ve seen happen with other mystical energies – the time-jump damaged the fabric of Creation around Keter, and that damage is preventing them from (safely) trying again.

2. The ealamal, like all angelic power, has a ‘tabula rasa’ effect: “Pissing angel light all over the land fixed the accumulated damage in the fabric of Creation.”

3. Cordelia has the ealamal key and not much else; Agnes looked into the future and wrote down instructions, telling her cousin, “Don’t read what I wrote until you need to. You’ll know when.”

Conclusion: AGNES BOUGHT THEM A SURPRISE SECOND REDO!

I imagine a scenario like:

- they get extremely close to victory on this run, but Cat still lacks some crucial (likely WB-related) realization/choice/story, and without it the worst happens: dead Woe, Cat possessed by DK, etc. The situation is hopeless, defeat is assured.
- Cordelia is like, welp, it’s definitely time! Agnes’s instructions nudge her towards angel-nuking Keter at just the right moment.
- Cat struggles against the inevitable and finally finds the missing [Triforce Shard], but it’s too late: DK escapes right before impact.
- The blast heals Creation and leaves Kreios unharmed (bc extremely Good). It also splatters Cat and every other GA villain, but whatever – time-jumps, demonstrably, can revive the dead!
- Cat, momentarily dead again, ruminates on what she learned and forges the [True Master Sword].
- As DK reappears to strike the final blow, Kreios initiates Cat’s ULTIMATE RESURRECTION: it’s an hour ago and the Woe are alive again (except one, for story weight 😞). It’s her third and final attempt, but now she has a sharper sword, the Woe at her back, and an extra powerful story.

Liliet

THAT WOULD BE REALLY GOOD ACTUALLY

ninegardens

But... if you reverse time PAST your mending of creation, does creation get "unmended"?

And if the Angels truly DO do a tabula Rasa, do they erase the record of the time you are trying to rewind into? (More like splicing a new section of tape into place, rather than actually mending things?)

Like... I love the idea, but no matter how I try to fit it in my head, it feels like it shouldn't work.

ohJohn

Thank you for pointing this out, I'm incredibly embarrassed that I did not give sufficient thought to the attendant Time Bullshit™. I am usually ALL ABOUT Time Bullshit™ (i.e. how introducing time travel makes reasoning about something very complex and unintuitive).

I definitely agree that, if the jumping-from point (now) is healed but the jumping-to point (1hr ago) is not, then that probably still ends in disaster. I can imagine scenarios where that doesn't happen, but nothing that's particularly supported by the text (e.g. angel-healing actually propagates backwards + forwards in time a bit, because... reasons?). Damn, I really liked this theory 😊.

john

I think the theory's salvageable. As described, the reset doesn't actually reverse time as such, just splices in a duplicated section across a limited area, like blockchain trickery. Memories aren't reset, probably because souls are exempt from duplication, and the "fabric of Creation" likely falls into that same category.

Incidentally, on the off chance you haven't already read Mother of Learning you absolutely should.

lenethren

Wonderful chapter. I will miss this story after it comes to a close.

naturalnuke

Cat and the Save-scumming Giant

tnozone

I'd like to propose the hypothesis that Masego regaining his magic made Roland more vulnerable. They were sort of counterparts of each-other for Above and Below, both having no magic of their own but could wield it through an Aspect of theirs. Maybe it would've set up a later story involving them both as mirrors of sorts. But when Masego regained his magic, that removed that similarity and perhaps it thus also removed some divine Plot Armor that Roland didn't know he had.

Jernik

So what happened to the Fae riders again? The Jack of something? That was so long ago that I don't remember the ending of the plot thread.

Jernik

I google it! Larat and the Wild Hunt! Have we heard from them since they left the founding of the twilight ways?

Chapter 63: Farewell

"A life without friends is a banquet without food."

– Proceran saying

It was on a whim I took up a shovel and began to dig the firepit, but once the steel bit into the ground it felt right. Like I was doing something I could pour all of my mind into, enough to forget the blood-soaked day I'd waded through to get here. I'd not thought twice about where I began to dig, simply choosing somewhere relatively out of the way since I well knew there could be no hiding place in a military camp, and instead busied myself with the labour of it. Mantle of Woe tossed aside into the dirt, sleeves pulled up and hair held in bun, I shovelled clumps of dusty earth.

Vivienne was the first to come.

I didn't hear her approach – Princess or not, she was almost as light footed as when she had been the Thief – but I felt eyes on my back and turned to find her standing at the edge of the pit. She looked as tired as I felt, her pale green tunic hanging limp on that slim frame. There was still a sense of regality to her, though. She was not wearing the circlet that had become her right after she was raised a princess of Callow, but the loops of the milkmaid's braid gave the same feeling. Her face, though still sharp, had matured enough that her blue-grey eyes no longer seemed almost too large for it.

She looked like a queen in the making, a princess forged in the crucibles of the long wars we had spent half our lives fighting. There were days where looking Princess in the eye still drew complicated feelings out of me, but this was not one of them. Sweaty hand resting on the handle of my shovel, I found that today I found only pride. We made it to the end, the two of us, I thought. Caring about anything else just seemed unforgivably petty.

"You know," Vivienne Dartwick said, "even back when we were enemies, Catherine, that was the thing I admired about you."

I cocked an eyebrow, leaning my weight against the shovel.

"What's that?"

"You never balk at being the one in the pit," the Princess said, eyes unreadable, "getting your hands dirty."

I brushed a bang out of my eye, unsure how to respond, but in a blink of my eye she'd gone. Not for long, though. The Princess of Callow came back with a shovel of her own, that standard-issue tool of wood and steel of the Army of Callow we'd taken the Legion pattern for. She leapt down into the hole, brushing her arm against mine, and took up a place at my back. Neither of us felt the need to talk, reluctant to break the comfortable silence of people who'd learned each other deeply enough not to feel the need to fill every void. Instead we dug together. It was easier work with two pairs of hand on it, one of those simple little truths that cast a broader shadow than they should.

Indrani came second.

"Wait, I have something for this," Archer mused, looking down at us from the edge of the pit.

"I feel as if am I about to be disappointed in many ways," Vivienne noted.

"Something something royals holding big shafts?" Indrani tried. "No, wait-"

She chortled.

"Royally shafted," Archer triumphantly exclaimed.

"Huh," I said, then flicked a glance to my side. "I might have to start calling you Prophet instead of Princess, Vivi."

"You barely even call me that," she muttered.

"I know," I sagely replied. "Won't even take much effort."

We might have kept at that for a while if a pile of dust hadn't been kicked in our faces. I covered my eyes – both of them, out of habit – even as Vivienne began to cough and spit out the bits she'd swallowed. When I looked up, I found the afternoon sun shining at Indrani's back as she scowled at us and wagged a finger.

"Don't flirt when I'm trying to annoy you," she chided us. "It's rude."

"I feel like no one ever taught you how to flirt and we've all been paying for it ever since," Vivienne told her.

Wow, I thought, sending her an admiring glance. That'd been a little savage.

"'Cause you're known as a great mistress of the subtleties of seduction, Dartwick," Indrani skeptically replied.

Vivienne cocked an eyebrow, then turned towards me. She leaned close hand coming to hold my neck from the back, and even as she pulled me close she dipped me down. This was, I mused, embarrassingly close to a daydream I'd entertained once or twice back in the day.

"Catherine," Vivienne gravely said. "Let's slay your enemies in battle, drink too much table wine and then ignore important paperwork to have a tryst on your desk instead."

I blinked, then turned to shoot at a look at a befuddled Indrani.

"She's hitting all the right notes," I admitted. "Damn, maybe you should learn from her."

Indrani scowled and kicked dirt into our faces again, which alas had the mistress of seduction dropping me unceremoniously so she wouldn't be made to eat dirt quite literally for the second time. Though this was a foul betrayal I recovered from the disappointment and got back to my feet, just in time to see Vivienne smugly smiling at Archer – who seemed unable to decide whether she was irritated or amused. It was a good look on her, brightening the hazelnut eyes her darker skin and green scarf already made pop out. Indrani had always been beautiful in moments, those stolen heartbeats where she was so incandescently alive, and between the sun and the smirk pulling at her lips this was one of them.

It passed, and I reclaimed my wits.

"So what'd you come here for?" I asked. "It better not be kicking earth back into our firepit, 'Drani, or I'll be cross."

"Been going around getting my hands on bottles since you got the ball rolling," she said, "but they're running out and no one wants to sell theirs anymore. I need your seal to crack open you army's last crates."

I grunted, not entirely surprised that I wasn't the only one intending to drink myself insensate tonight. It'd been a dark day and tomorrow didn't look much brighter, plan or not.

"Take whatever you need," I shrugged.

"Already tried that," Indrani idly said, "but you changed the lock. Tell your phalanges to help, would you?"

Wasn't hard to find one of the adjunct secretariat's officers looming around – there was always one kicking about wherever I ended up, a habit Hakram had instilled them – and I got that sorted, sending Indrani back on her way. By the time I returned, Pickler had shown up. She was pacing around our pit, muttering under her breath, and almost ran into me. Her head would have reached higher on my body than I cared to admit.

"Have you started talking to yourself?" I asked. "Because they don't let you get away with that without there being talk until you're a priestess, in my experience."

"Yes, yes, all hail the Crows," Pickler dismissively replied. "May the Matrons perish trying to bite a chunk out of them, preferably after I've gotten good seats to watch the whole thing."

"Your faith is touching, Sapper-General," I drily replied. "I'll pass the word along."

"You do that," Pickler told me, then poked my chest with an accusing finger. "Did you know your pit's half a foot too deep and nowhere near large enough? We're cooking pigs, not digging a tunnel."

"We're not finished yet," I defensively.

"I was just following orders," Vivienne called out from below, the treacherous weasel.

"You should have taken the engineering classes at the War College instead of that useless stuff you picked up instead," Pickler told me.

My brow rose.

"Tactics and Strategy?" I drily asked.

"Yes, those," the goblin told me, undaunted. "Haven't tactiqued or strategized your way into digging a proper firepit yet, have you Foundling?"

I opened my mouth to object, then closed it. I raised a finger, tried again, then my teeth clicked closed under Pickler's satisfied yellow gaze.

"Just tells us how to dig," I finally sighed.

"An hour late, but there's only so much you can expect out of humans," my Sapper-General allowed.

"I'm going to write you up for discrimination, High Ridge, see if I don't," I muttered under my breath.

We were nearly done making something to Pickler's satisfaction when Aisha showed up, legionaries carrying cart of firewood following in her wake. I took the opportunity to drag myself out of the pit, wipe my face with a cloth and guzzle down water from a skin. I was even generous enough to pass it to Vivienne afterwards, though not so generous I didn't do that by throwing it at the back of her head. The noise it made hitting her was most satisfying. Aisha watched me with laughing eyes, her lovely heart-shaped face pulling into the hint of a smile.

"Juniper's gone to pick out the pigs herself," she told me. "She'd having fun dickering with the Fourth's quartermaster for Vale hogs."

Famously the fattest meat in Callow, which had me salivating already.

"Archer's handling drinks," I said, "but have we got anything except the meat on the way?"

Dark eyes moved to study me with sudden intensity.

"Kilian," Aisha said with deliberate nonchalance, "offered to get a cauldron of dirty rice going."

Rice mixed with oil, onions, tomatoes and up to half a dozen other ingredients depending on where in Praes the recipe came from – apparently Wolofites added bananas while Aksumites swore by ginger. Mind you, it was the dish that had her looking at me like I might be on the verge of biting her nose off. Kilian hadn't been at one of these since we'd parted ways, at first because she'd declined invitations and later because I'd stopped asking. I honestly wasn't sure how I felt about her trying to get a foot back in now, but I didn't have the heart to refuse her. Not tonight of all nights.

"That'll do," I nodded. "Remind her to get the cauldron here early. You know how territorial Juniper gets when the pigs are on spits."

"It's rather endearing," Aisha agreed with a fond smile.

Not exactly what I'd been getting at, but uh – good for her? I finished the pit to Pickler's exacting specifications and then left her to haranguing legionaries into putting the firewood in the right sort of stacks, helping Vivienne out with a hand that she'd didn't particularly need.

"We could probably use a wash," she said, taking a sniff at the both of us.

I wiggled my eyebrows.

"Trying to impress anyone?" I teased. "Thought you were one of those chaste maiden kind of princesses, Dartwick."

"I've thought about it," she admitted. "There are some men I could see myself taking to bed with an assurance of discretion."

"Might be our last night," I quietly told her. "We have a chance, Vivienne, but there's nothing certain about this. Take your comforts where we can."

She smiled at me.

"If it is my last night," Vivienne said, "then I would rather spend it with the lot of you than with a stranger. It'd be a greater comfort than a lay, however pleasurable."

"You say sweet things, sometimes," I smiled back.

"You really need to bathe," Princess then told me, wrinkling her nose.

I sighed. I couldn't even blame her for that entirely. I'd trained this into all of the Woe, because... I blanked. There must have been a reason at someone point, I reassured myself. Surely. I was still desperately trying to recall what it might be when I took my friend's advice and began to limp towards my tent, where I was due a wash and a nap.

—

I woke half an hour before dusk, pleasantly refreshed. I splashed my face with tepid water to finish clearing out the last dregs of sleep, then pulled on a clean black tunic and took the time to sit and massage my bad leg for a while. It wasn't throbbing as badly as I'd thought it might after the battle I'd been through. It could have been-

Get them all home, Catherine.

My stomach clenched. My throat was dry. And a heartbeat later I dropped my leg with a hiss of pain, the marks on the skin where my fingers had dug in red and visible. I'd forgot, just for a moment, why it was I'd gone to dig a pit. My friend was dead. Roland had been taken by an arrow that had been meant to kill me. Why else the poison that reacted to Night, the very power I would have called on to lessen my wound? Akua had been shot too, and there had been no poison in her. With the Varlet destroyed last year and the aspect that had made this thus lost, it was likely too rare to be used any way other than sparingly. Neshamah had meant to kill me and come so very close. I need to be better, I thought, fingers clenching. More careful. To see the next one coming.

Or else more friends than Roland de Beaumarais would get killed trying to keep me alive.

I put on the Mantle of Woe, more for the comfort of its weight than a need for the warmth, and slipped out of my tent. It was a childish thing, to flee the place where the dark thoughts had come, but I indulged them impulse anyway. I didn't feel like talking with the two phalanges that began to walk behind me, or with anyone at all, so I briskly turned a corner and pulled down a veil of Night to cover me. I shook them off, limping deeper into the Army of Callow's camp, and let the noise of my soldiers wash over me.

There was a frenetic energy to the camp. It wasn't quite despair – we'd taken a licking today, but we'd still gotten deep into the city before retreating – but it was a cousin of sorts. Every last of my soldiers knew they could die tomorrow. Some of them remembered dying today, saved only by a Titan's will. No one wanted to be alone tonight, or leave things undone they might never get the chance to finish. Stashes of liquor and smokes were being blown through, grudges being settled or set aside and then the opposite of grudges: more than a few of my soldiers had snuck off into dark corners to fuck with someone who'd caught their eye, or even simply someone that was there. It felt like the aftermath of a summer fair, only without the good singing voices.

There was some theatre though, I found.

Some bold souls had decided to spend their last night in Keter's shadow putting on a trick play, which had drawn a large crowd of legionaries in varying degrees of inebriation. The Barber and Edward play was putting them in a fine mood, and it was loud laughter that'd drawn me there in the first place. I stood at the edge of the crowd, listening in, and found the premise hadn't changed. It was still about the cunning goblin sergeant Barber, whose beauty drew suitors like moths to the flame, and the grim squire Edward whose strokes of good luck always ended unmade by his need to get even with his enemies. As was customary, between the two of them they got in a lot of mockery and dead foreigners which was exactly the kind of play my soldiers were in the mood for.

I was still taken aback by the sheer fucking audacity of it when I saw a goblin with bones glued on try to get to Barber to read her poetry only to get his head cut off by Edward – only for another bone-wearing goblin to pop up at the edge of the stage and try again. Those were, I realized with a shocked grin, the fucking Dead King.

"I would love you forever, beauteous star without a rival," the goblin Dead King crooned.

"Not even if I were dead," Barber scathingly replied.

Edward cut off Neshamah's head again, wiping his brow exaggeratedly afterwards.

"We've been at this all afternoon," the squire complained. "Maybe you should reconsider the suit, Queen Barber has a ring to it."

Barber, who had not known the Dead King had a kingdom before, then hatched the plan to marry him and immediately bump him off so she could inherit Keter. It devolved quickly into slapstick humour as a bunch of heroes tried to crash the wedding only for their attempts to kill the Dead King to get in each other's way and prevent Barber from speaking the vows. I was halfway to leaving when I noticed that the priest that had been about to officiate the wedding was suddenly dragged off stage, replaced by someone with a fake beard. Someone with a staff and a tattered cloak of many colours. The goblin Dead King peered at 'me'.

"Have I met you before?" he asked. "You seem familiar."

"Never," the Black Queen replied. "Unrelated, but do you have any particular weaknesses someone might use to kill you for good?"

The Dead King's yellow eyes narrowed in suspicion.

"Why do you ask?"

"It's part of the traditional Callowan wedding ceremony," the Black Queen lied.

Two goblins dressed in black popped in behind her, cawing their hearts out as they flapped the wings of large wooden crows that they made perch on the Black Queen's shoulders. She batted them away in a panic.

"Coincidence," the Black Queen assured the betrothed. "I must have had some seeds on my cloak."

The crows kept coming back, though, forcing her to make increasingly tortured explanations, and with a grin I pulled on Night. The next time the crows flew off, I replaced them with two feathered apparitions I'd woven out. The Black Queen actress stiffened and the crowd stilled.

"Nothing to see here," I made one of the crows say.

"We have invitations," the other one insisted.

The sound was so sudden it was like a sharper had just blown: the roars of laughter approval drowned out everything else, a quarter of the crowd looking around to see if they might find me. I was gone before anyone got too enterprising, though, disappearing into the avenues.

I had a fire waiting for me.

—

Most of them were already there when I arrived.

Juniper was turning her spitted pigs and loudly arguing with Vivienne about whether 'catapults' could ever be legitimately be an item in a royal budget, though I couldn't help but notice that unlike the way it would have been a few years ago the two of them were smiling. Aisha and Masego were playing shatranj as they sipped glasses of wine, Indrani draped over his shoulder and giving him terrible advice he was duly ignoring, and Pickler was halfway through a mug of ale larger than her head as informed the lot of them that goblins had a game like shatranj, only the rules changed and you could get stabbed if you lost. Indrani looked worryingly interested.

The sight that had me shuffling in discomfort, though, was Kilian of Mashamba leaning over her cauldron of dirty rice with a long spoon in hand as she calmly spoke with Akua Sahelian. I'd never seen them together before, and hadn't quite grasped how much taller than her Akua was — Kilian was barely taller than me, after all. I slipped in close before I could get noticed and got to eavesdrop a bit on the conversation.

"- and Ratface used to put saffron in it by the handful, which was odious," Kilian was saying. "He was a deft hand with chicken dishes, but not a man you wanted anywhere near rice."

"We have a family recipe with fried peppers in it," Akua told her. "A few generations back, one of my kin actually had another assassinated over-"

Golden eyes found me, and I forced nonchalance as I approached them. Kilian looked hesitant when she noticed I was there, her fair face closing, so I limped closer to lean over the cauldron and breathe in the vapour.

"Smells good," I said, clapping her shoulder.

I would have lied if it didn't, but I hadn't had to.

"Rat Company recipe," Kilian replied with a relieved smile. "They used to teach us in our first year."

I blinked in surprise.

"I never was never taught it," I pointed out.

"I would surmise you also never had to cook, darling," Akua amusedly said. "Did you not become company captain within days of first joining?"

"It was Ratface's idea," I pointed out, perhaps a tad defensively.

"Of course it was," Akua easily smiled.

I narrowed my eye at her, only then noticing the startled look that Kilian was giving the both of us. It left me feeling strangely naked, so I excused myself to grab a drink instead of lingering. The strangeness quickly faded, leaving me instead to sink into the warmth of the company I was keeping. I spent most of my time bickering with Indrani about whether or not some poet I'd never heard of should be considered a classic – absolutely not, I'd never heard of them – and stealing pieces from the shatranj game that Pickler had insisted she would beat Aisha at since she'd beaten Zeze. Since the good lady Aisha Bishara ensured my glass stayed full, in an act of brazen quid pro quo I ensured that her pawns never stayed more than two turns off the board when they were taken.

It got bad enough Masego started to cheat against her, which naturally drew Indrani into it and therefore utter chaos.

I was grinning up to my ears by the time Juniper declared the pigs were ready, a signal that the traditional ritual was about to begin. We all gathered with our plates as the Hellhound began making her cuts, as usual beginning with the naked favouritism that was Aisha getting the first place the best pieces. Masego cocked his head to the side.

"Why is it that she always goes first?" he curiously asked.

Juniper turned a gimlet eye on him.

"She's the only one of you lot that removes headaches from my life instead of adding them," the Marshal of Callow growled.

"Oh, that seems fair then," Zeze plainly agreed.

As usual, the use of Masego's most dangerous weapon – sincerity – disarmed his opponent without contest. Not so much that she didn't slap Indrani's hand away when she tried to carve out a piece from the side of the pig, though. Still, looking at them all I could not help but feel something was slightly wrong. The last time we'd done this, in Hainaut, there'd been... Ah, I thought. There'd been Hakram. He had been invited, Gods of course he'd been, but he was also the Warlord and our camp was not the only one lit up tonight.

"Ah, just in time."

I turned and coming out of the cold were two silhouettes. One I did not recognize, an orc with long fangs and scarred-up shoulders bared by the leather tunic she had on. Big girl, shorter than Juniper but noticeably broader. The other one, though, was a prayer I'd not voiced answered. Hakram stood easily on his prosthetic leg, a loose coat fur over his tunic, and offered me a smile.

"I don't suppose you have two more plates?" the tall orc asked.

"I think we'll find some lying around," I smiled back.

"Sigvin!" Indrani called out. "Though he might drag you here. Come on, sit with me."

Ah, so that was who. Sigvin of the Split Tree Clan was, if Archer was to be believed, the closest thing Hakram had had to a lover in the time we'd known him. They didn't keep to each other's bed only, she said, but she was sticking around and he didn't seem to mind at all. Bet it had something to do about the scars, I mused. I still remembered how wild orc girls had gone over his after he scrapped with Vivienne and the Lone Swordsman. Sigvin's face betrayed no nervousness, but there was something of it in her stance. There were, I supposed, a lot of famous names gathered here tonight. She stepped forward, though, and after offering me a curt bow pressed two bottles into my hands.

"Aragh, Warden," she said. "A gift for your fire."

I met her eyes solemnly.

"Where have you been all my life, Sigvin?" I asked.

That got Indrani laughing, and Aisha as well, which bled some of the tension out. Hakram shot me a knowing look as he passed me by, gently brushing his shoulder against mine in unspoken thanks. I sat with him, Akua by complete coincidence happening to sit on my other side as Juniper finished doling out her cuts and we settled down to eat. With full bellies and plenty to drink, we settled down around the fire and the conversation remained lively. I let myself be drawn into a debate by Vivienne about whether or not the Exiled Prince would have been able to beat the Barrow Sword in a fight-

"Absolutely not," I firmly said. "Ishaq's ridiculously hard to kill and he can even use Night now."

-but afterwards I took step back for a bit, pulling up my pipe to indulge in wakeleaf as I watched them. It was a balm of the heart to see them like this. Masego idly playing with Indrani's hair as she rested her head on his lap, Pickler drawing something in the dirt that Aisha and Sigvin were look rather skeptically at, Juniper looking appalled as Akua told her about secret Tower histories and both gestured animatedly in the firelight. Vivienne was chatting with Kilian by the pigs, the redhead tracing a few symbols of light in the air that the Princess was shaking her head at. Slowly, I felt something loosen in my gut as I pulled at my pipe and blew out a stream of smoke.

"I missed these," Hakram quietly said.

I'd heard him coming, but we had kept silent until now as I watched and smoked. There was no sense of hurry to the air.

"I'm glad we got to do it before the end," I murmured. "It wouldn't be the same, going into the dark without first having sat by the fire."

He slowly nodded. I was seated and he standing, the two of us apart from the rest. It was a familiar feeling, though somewhat bittersweet.

"Tomorrow," he began, then trailed off.

"There'll be the battle," I said. "And then after. When that time comes..."

"I'll find you," the Warlord said. "I can still feel it, you know."

I glanced at him, found his face pulled tight.

"The pull," he elaborated when I said nothing.

My lips quirked.

"And this surprises you?"

He did not answer, which was as good as an admission it did.

"I told you, Hakram Deadhand," I said. "When the Woe will fight, where would you be if not with us?"

I meant it, I did not speak out loud. You're still one of us. He stayed silent for a long time.

"I will not be the Warlord forever," he suddenly said.

"You'll need to step down eventually," I agreed. "Else they won't know how to be without you in charge."

He nodded.

"When that day comes," Hakram gravelled. "I-"

I raised a hand, interrupted him.

"Don't feel like you have to make that promise," I said. "Wasn't that the point of all this?"

"You should have let me finish," he snorted, baring fangs in amusement. "I could think of worse places to retire to than Cardinal."

It wasn't quite an offer, I thought, or a promise. But it was something. There was a lump in my throat I couldn't quite swallow, so instead I took his hand. The dead one, the skeletal fingers that he'd come into fighting for me. I squeezed them and he squeezed them back. I sighed, closing my eye, and for a moment allowed myself to lean my head against his side and rest. It wasn't the same it used to be, I thought.

But that didn't mean it couldn't be good.

—

When it all wound down, when everyone was drunk and began to fall asleep around the dying fire, after Hakram and Sigvin had gone, I still sat wide awake. Vivienne was snoring under a blanket and drooling on a log, Pickler draped over her and somehow not awoken by the racket. Juniper and Aisha were whispering softly in a corner, Indrani had gone off to get water for an unusually dead drunk Masego to drink before he fell asleep and I found myself with Kilian of Masham standing before me. She had not grown any less beautiful in the years since we'd parted ways, I thought as I watched the paleness of the moon caress her skin and light up the green of her eyes.

"Thank you," Kilian softly said. "For saying yes."

I could have pretended I didn't know what she was talking about, but it would have been unworthy of the both of us.

"They're your friends too," I said. "I wouldn't keep you from them on a night like this."

Her lips quirked in a rueful smile I knew well.

"And us, Catherine?" she asked. "Are we friends?"

I could have told her that I'd once offered her that and she had turned it away, but the bitterness of that would have left a poor taste in the mouth. It was a done business, done long ago at that.

"No," I honestly said. "But that's the choices that were made."

She nodded, and I found her face hard to read.

"I suppose we aren't," Kilian agreed, then glanced at the others. "It'll get cooler out, later on."

I cocked my head to the sight. Her eyes found mine, steady.

"It would be warmer in my tent," she offered, and I stilled.

We both knew what she was truly offering, and it would have been a lie to say I wasn't at least a little tempted. She had, after all, not stopped being beautiful. And I had fond memories of her behind closed doors, for all that had come after. But it was only a passing thing, soon gone. It was, as I had just thought, a done business. Pretending otherwise would be sweet, for a time, but it would be a sickly sort of sweetness.

"I've gotten used to the cold," I gently replied.

To my surprise, she smiled.

"I didn't think you'd say yes," she admitted.

I cocked my head to the side.

"Then why offer?"

"The terror of an entire continent," Kilian teasingly said, "and still some things about you are the same as when you were fresh out of Laure."

I was still in too good a mood to get irritated, but she was headed in that direction.

"For old time's sake," Kilian said, "I'll tell you one thing, Catherine."

She paused, then looked away.

"You never looked at me the way you look at the Sahelian," the redhead told me. "Do yourself a favour and own it."

She raised her hand to touch my shoulder, but she must have seen something on my face and she aborted the gesture. With one last faint smile, she took her leave and left the cast of the fire's light to vanish into the camp. I sat there, resting my cheek on the palm of my hand, and sighed.

"Eavesdropping?" I said.

A moment of silence, then a smooth gait on the dirt until she came to sit by my side. Close enough to touch, yet not touching. Years made into a sentence, that.

"You started it," Akua replied.

I rolled my eye but did not argue. We were both had bad habits in that regard. The silence that lingered after was not tense, but neither was it easy. It felt like the moment before a blade was drawn. And in the end, it was not me who cleared the scabbard first.

"Will you?" she asked.

"Will I?" I replied.

Golden eyes found mine.

"Do yourself a favour," Akua said.

My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched. I did not answer.

"No," Akua murmured. "I don't think you will. There's too much of who you are invested in holding that last redoubt."

I did not look away.

"So you won't," Akua slowly said, "but neither will you stop me."

Her hand cupped my cheek, tenderly, and she leaned forward. I closed my eye, felt her lips move against mine. It was soft but the softness kindled a hunger, and I would have bitten her lip and leaned in had I not held on to that last redoubt. But I did, she leaned back. Her breath was soft against my lips.

"I am not sure," Akua whispered, "whether that was love or cruelty."

My eye still closed, I felt her rise to her feet. She brushed her hand against my neck, my shoulder, and then suddenly the warmth of them was gone.

"Neither am I," I admitted.

She was gone when I opened my eye.

I stayed there for a long time, sitting there in my silence.

—

Though it was late and the night was at its deepest, I did not crawl into my tent to sleep. Instead I rose and slipped past the sleeping bodies on the floor, past the people I loved most in the world, and headed deeper into the shadow. Past the last fires to be lit, the last watching eyes that a twist of Night ensured slid past me without seeing anything. I did not have a destination held firmly in my mind, instead trusting my feet to get me where I needed to be. One of the old Fairfax kings had once said that the evening before a battle was like an entire nation breathing in, and I felt the truth to the words. For all that the camp had gone still and silent, there was palpable sense of something in the air.

But we were still in the moment before the end began, and so there was room enough for one last conversation to be had.

I found her waiting in the shadow of a watchtower, leaning against the side as a slice of moonlight cut across her face. The Ranger had been beautiful once, and perhaps still was, but that beauty had been marred. She still held the burn scars of Summer flame on the side of her face, but also fresher ones. Still red and raw, three cuts: one across the nose and two down her cheeks. The parting gift of her last pupils, the children of Refuge that had risen against their terror and teacher. They'd left her broken on the floor of the Tower as goblinfire burned behind, her fate entirely in her own hands. We'd all known, deep down, that it would take more than that to kill her.

I limped forward, Mantle trailing behind me as the moonlight shone down on my hair, and the half-elf's dark eyes flicked to me even through the veil I had yet to cast down. It was no longer needed, though, so with a flick of the wrist I abandoned the working.

"I've been expecting you, Hye Su," I calmly said.

"I did not," the hard-eyed woman said, "give you leave to use my name."

I hummed, unmoved, and cocked my head to the side.

"But the Name you want me to use instead," I said, "isn't it feeling a little loose in your grasp, nowadays?"

I felt it then, the will to kill me. An intention so strong it felt like Creation would bend to it, just like the first time I'd met this monster when I'd been a girl who didn't know better. I did now, though. And I was no longer that girl. I leaned forward, smiling, and pit my will against her own. For a moment it was as if two ships were colliding, but then in the heartbeat that followed there was a crack. And it was not me that'd given. Ranger drew back into herself before it could turn worse, face giving away nothing, but her body was not so silent. She was, I found with amusement, wary.

How long had it been since she'd come out the loser in a game like this?

"Better," I mildly said. "Now make your offer. It's why you came for, isn't it?"

She pushed off the side of the watchtower, the slice of moonlight expanding to swallow half her face. How very unfair it was, I thought, that she was beautiful enough the cut on her cheek seemed more like a tattoo than a blemish.

"I want a trade, Warden," Hye Su said. "An oath out of you."

"And what manner of oath would it be?" I asked.

I already knew the answer, but it needed to be said.

"A duel," she said. "You and me. Ten years from now."

I thinly smiled.

"Am I to rejoice," I asked, "that I have become worth hunting?"

Her face tightened with sudden, poisonous anger. It startled me.

"No," Hye Sue coldly said. "Not that. Never that, for you. This isn't Ranger business."

Ah, I softly realized. It wasn't the Named that had come tonight, the legend. It was the woman.

"You want to kill me," I said.

"If you die now Calernia might break," she said. "And if it's just after the war, it'll be more trouble than it's worth. So I want an oath that, ten years from now, you will come to me for a duel to the death."

I breathed out a laugh.

"Indrani didn't think you'd take revenge," I told her.

"He did it to himself as much as you did," she said. "I know that. And that it's not a good fate in the making, killing you. It'll bring too much down on my head."

"But you don't care," I slowly said.

I was, I would admit, fascinated by the cold flame I saw in the other woman's eyes.

"But I don't care," Hye Sue repeated, the quiet of her voice a deep grief. "I loved him, Warden, in a way that can't be replaced. That time won't change. I loved him and you killed him. So in ten years, one of us will die."

Looking at her, at the gaunt cast of her face, I believed it at last. That in her own strange and twisted way, Hye Su had loved Amadeus of the Green Stretch just as deeply as he'd loved her. Enough that she was breaking the rules that'd kept her alive through centuries of fighting Named and monsters, enough that she was willing to risk being hunted by entire kingdoms. This might just be, I realized, the first time I had ever liked the Ranger since first meeting her. I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"You said this was a trade," I reminded her. "Should I take this oath, what would you offer in exchange?"

She met my eye, unflinching.

"I know," Hye Sue, "a secret way into Keter. Take the oath and I'll show it to you."

And there it was, the last piece that'd been needed before it all fell into place. Before we brought an end to this endless war. I stood before her, our silhouettes draped in moonlight, and after a long moment I offered my hand. She took it, fingers digging into my wrist, and we shook on it.

I gave her the oath and she gave me a way past the impassable.

Soronel Haetir

Very impressive.

Grey

Goblin theater is consistently hilarious.

Bad@Games

Cat also making props for goblin theater is constantly hilarious

aurikdomi

I like to think that her soldiers are starting to believe she just is everywhere and sees everything

Liliet

Considering her Aspect and her Night eyes habit, that's not ENTIRELY inaccurate...

Liliet

Cat DISRUPTING THE PERFORMANCES of goblin theater!

Like, that first time she literally changed the plot by giving them the staff. This time? We have no idea but those crow constructs sure aren't the actor goblin!

They are going to have to improvise and I just have to think everyone's dreaming of seeing that happen.

RoflCat

Or start worshipping the Crows to ensure their 'unexpected invited crows' are ever present.

Liliet

I was thinking short term but yes that's SO happening.

Cpt. Obvious

I've never had the feeling that goblins really liked the Gobbler. It's more like they feared it and didn't have any alternative. Sve Noc on the other hand is more active, actually rewards their followers, understands what being mortal means and have a sense of humor that's as dark as Night.

Liliet

Mhm!

Hargabga

What was the chapter that happens in? I want to reexperience the beauty.

gideon

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/11/20/chapter-74-herald/>

It's right before the battle for Hainaut.

Someperson

I do hope the Crows make it a longstanding tradition, listening in and occasionally manifesting unpredictable miracles of Night to troll goblin theater.

They probably won't, but I can hope.

Liliet

Considering there's nothing stopping theatre goblins from gaining Night / goblins who have gained Night from doing theatre... the probability is in the other direction ^^

ruduen

And there go some of the loose ends. Many of the questions that have gone unsaid and unanswered, from those from within the year to those which have been coming for a long time.

It's hard to say whether or not there will be any more time for things. Keter truly awaits.

(Boost: <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>)

Lictor Magnus

So many feels in this chapter 😞

The bit with the crows at the end of the play was great. I actually cackled out loud.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. Comedia interruptus again!
2. Long price, almost paid in full.
3. Fuck you, Hye Su. I hope Catherine squashes you like a cockroach in ten years, preferably with a plan reminiscent of one of Amadeus' strategies.

Death Knight

10 years to get acquainted and master her Name as Warden? The experience from fighting against the Dead King's champions?

Hye Su just signed her own death warrant.

I mean shit, Cat just proved her will is STRONGER than the Rangers. So, what happens if Cat simply silences Transcend? Or, better yet, perfect? Sure, Ranger could learn Cat's workings etc, but she wouldn't be able to perfect the knowledge and she can't even perfect it, how the hell can she transcend?

This is just suicide.

And I love it.

Liliet

Yeah, Hye's dying in this battle and Indrani's getting her Name. Mark my words.

The oath was pretty much pretext for her to help.

Crash

This. She's just here to make a point or a declaration maybe?

This is Amadeus' flare for the dramatic really. She has all but said that she has nothing else to care about. She came here to die.

Nix

I disagree. The oath to fight the Warden in 10 years would pretty much ensure Hye at least lives the 10 years to fight her. And if it goes as far or as strong as some stories, Archer will probably have a hard time taking her down. She basically traded this for a chance to destroy the deadking so that story is bound to have weight. Plus I don't think Archer needs to kill Hye to take the name at all, she already trumped Ranger when she beat her with the others... and also made a point of not killing her there. Rangers name will probably still fade but she is a freaking badass with fate aiding her. She could come into a new one. And Catherine will be 10 years past her coming into her name, who knows what chaos could happen.

Liliet

I disagree with your disagreement.

I do not think Indrani is going to kill Hye. I think Hye is dying in this battle fighting for the Grand Alliance.

The thing is, she's not helping them for the sake of the duel. She could just challenge Cat in 10 years or however much later she felt like if that was all she wanted. No, her purpose in coming here was TO HELP, the duel in 10 years was just... drawing a boundary. Telling Cat how she felt about her in a way that could not be a lie, because actions cannot be lies, only words can.

That's the weight that duel has. It's Hye's communication.

Actual challenge? Catherine crushed her in a duel of wills already, and Hye's Name is already sitting loose. It's not getting better after 10 years. What's she going to do for those 10 years, wander around sighing? I do not believe that she will be honestly able to keep the enthusiasm for the duel for that long if she actually moves on in any way shape or form, and if she doesn't move on, she's already lost.

jamesc9

> because actions cannot be lies

In one of the 'Belgariad' books, our focus character looks at his former lover in a way that (wrongly) communicates platonic interest only. I'm yet to be convinced of this claim.

Liliet

That's communication, not action. Communication is a subset of actions, certainly, but my point is actions that are not communication cannot be lies. "Lie" is a property exclusive to communication.

Like... the focus characters falsely communicated something to that other person with a look, but it's completely true that they looked. Like, the shifting of the gaze itself, resulting in them getting visual information from that direction, is just a fact.

Liliet

Actually, rereading what you were replying to, yeah, this could be a lie. It'd be one hell of an investment though!

Someperson

I dunno, the decade thing does have a certain paralellism with how Catherine treated Alaya, which might help it stick. It feels... significant.

And Catherine formally accepted the duel, acknowledging Hye as somebody worth dueling.

I am pretty sure that if Hye survives Keter, the narrative will give her enough of a leg up that in 10 years time she will be capable of posing a threat to Catherine.

...which does not guarantee at all that Hye will win, but she will get her chance.

Mincheriit

I agree, she should still have a chance of killing Cat in 10 years, though i believe its a 'win-win' situation for Hye Su. She doesnt care if she dies fighting Cat, kills her then is hunted or is killed after killing Cat, its all 'acceptable'.

Liliet

My point is that Hye ain't surviving Keter. She's dying to Indrani's claim to Ranger, by which I do not mean Indrani literally kills her but more the reason Cat avoided Tancred and Arthur.

IF Hye survives for another 10 years it'll be another story... and I frankly suspect it will be one of her no longer wanting to duel Cat all that much actually (and Cat is not super interested either). I think she honestly knows that and the oath was more of a Formal Declaration than her expectation to actually ever get that delivered on. Insurance, really.

I do not think Hye expected to survive the Ater confluence and I do not think she's enjoyed it.

Heriaks

Hye is imortal, 10 years is nothing to her. She will wait without losing her hatred (because her love for Amadeus is irreplaceable) and will try to kill Cat.

And will die in the process if not at Keter

Liliet

I'm sure that's Hye's logic yeah

Shadow Chancellor

I think Hye is surviving Keter, but she won't survive as Ranger. Just as Cat said that it wasn't Ranger that came to make the Oath but Hye, I think Hye won't survive the fall of Keter while remaining the Ranger but she'll live the 10 years to see the duel.

Liliet

That's a possible outcome! I don't think it's likely but it could work too.

Лято

What else do you think it is? It's a suicide by proxy and she knows that. It's absolutely intentional. She is not the type of person who would kill herself directly, she will use Cat. I am wondering if she has ever thought what would she do if Amadeus had died in any other way, since she clearly can not proceed as is?

Liliet

I think Hye's original plan when she was accompanying on Amadeus on his Very High Risk Journey was that her own students would kill HER. She didn't get thrown by Amadeus's death itself (it was predictable, they talked about it in East II) so much as by Amadeus's death combined with her own survival (but being bested by her students).

Andrew Smith

I mean the dead king champions are also something Ranger has practiced against and well as for Silence, I can easily see Ranger just cutting that from effecting her because broken bitch.

Though giving Cat aka Amadeus Daughter 10 years to come up with a plan to take her down is the real thing that would kill her and even then even is she wins she will get killed by the all the people who will be mad at her for killing Cat like Cat said Ranger is breaking the rules that have kept her alive all this time.

like she will die to Cat or to the people who will avenge Cat so Ranger is 100% dead from this, the only thing up in the air is if Cat will go down with her and the odds are not going to be in her(hye) favour

Miles

Suicide is the point. Killing Cat won't let her see Amadeus again or make the pain stop.

Insanenoodlyguy

Might not come to it. There's decent odds Idrani finds out about this and they have it out first.

Liliet

Eh, Indrani is not a kill-stealer and has faith in Cat.

Linnus42

Again I have the desire for more Interludes lol, not enough prospective that isn't on Cat. Which I kinda think is needed if not for everyone escaping DK's death trap then for a last night lol.

Though yes this was well done. Always nice to see Killian, I am never quite sure she is alive when she is offscreen.

Does the Cat duel with Hye take place before or after Cat kills Alaya? They might as well all get together for that one lol.

Bad@Games

after Alaya. chancalor (not Chancalor) only has 7 years.

Linnus42

Yeah I realized that later on that sucks lol.

Miles

She'll have killed over half the Woe by that point. Isn't that a hell of a thing

Lord Haart

You mean the Calamities?

That was foreshadowed pretty heavily in early books. Cat is sadly lucky about Thallasina.

Tom

> Hakram shot me a knowing look as he passed me by, gently brushing his shoulder against mine in unspoken thanks.

Was Cat standing on Kilian's shoulders?

irritantseraphim

He was kneeling, maybe.

ninegardens

He was back in his wheelchair... just for this special occassion.

Bad@Games

Ya know in callow that may be a crime to say that

Sugar Roll

That was how Cat saw it. In reality, it was Hakram's knees.

Asterix

You know, it's a pity there aren't going to be any more new characters in the story, because I'd love to see somebody tell Catherine that she's taller than they expected.

After all, when everybody keeps making a huge deal of how short she is, finding out that she's basically average (most of the people in her life are seriously tall, Cat is maybe a little below average, but not by so much that you would notice if she were, say, a farmer) would be a bit of a surprise.

Crash

It's like being the libero in a Russian volleyball team.

They're 1.85M tall, but they sure do look short near the other 2M+ folk, eh?

erebus42

Well that was nice. I'm afraid though that that may be the last campfire for some of those characters.

I'm glad Cat and Akua finally did something besides dancing around each other -even if it only lasted a moment. Frankly you'd expect that shit more from a couple of Heroes or something. If any of those random soldiers survive they'll at least have a funny story to tell.

Liliet

Oh Akua has kissed Cat before, with the same 0 reaction. Cat's 100% punishing herself more than Akua at this point (and let's be real always was)

agumentic

First time it was full-on lips instead of just a corner of a mouth or something else, though. Maybe by the end, they'll actually kiss, before hurting each other even more.

Liliet

true true, the last one was on the neck iirc

Miles

If Akua has a major hand in killing the DK and stopping his rampage she'll have saved every life that's left on Calernia. She'll have a pretty strong argument that those ripple effects from the Folly are balanced out by then.

agumentic

It's really not about balance for either Akua or Cat.

ohJohN

my GOD can they just FUCK already, this is KILLING me

RubberBandMan

This is pretty much what everyone, even people who hate Akua with a burning passion, are saying. We've got Vivi, Killian, and a host of others. Everyone has already accepted that Cat should let herself be with Akua, it's literally only Cat that feels she has something to prove by pretending to be chaste with Akua.

Liliet

How far can Akua get with Cat just kind of sitting still and pretending nothing is happening?

ninegardens

See, same here, but in the opposite direction.
Every time this even crops up slightly I'm like "Ughhh... gross. Could they just not. This feels weird and wrong and gross on so many levels."

Lord Haart

I think it's meant to really. There's some serious Stockholm Syndrome or something like it on Akua's part. She may 'deserve' that but I don't think it's the kind of love that's satisfying to see enacted.

And on Cat's part, it's just long prices for everyone really.

Lord Haart

No, it's about denying Akua (in at least some form) no matter the cost. She can't forgive the Folly because she isn't the only victim, and her actions also caused it at least indirectly (sparing William).

If she responded, she wouldn't be the person Akua was (very much) in love with anyway. It's that Last Redoubt she admires the most.

Liliet

It's about denying Akua, yes, but it's not just about denying herself to Akua, it's about denying Akua to herself, too.

Ed

Oh yeah this is loaded with death flags but how could it not be? We are at the end.

Miles

I see Death Flags."
"In your dreams?"
Cole shakes his head no
"While you're awake?"
Cole nods

"Death Flags like, on flag poles? In carrying cases?"
"Walking around like regular people. They don't see each other. They only see what they want to see. They don't know they're Death Flags."
"How often do you see them?"
"All the time."

'Ladi Williams

I hope she smacks down Hye Sue.
Hard.

Liliet

Hye isn't making it this long.

Lord Haart

Not sure why anyone would think Indrani is guaranteed to be Ranger – there's a reason she is still a Claimant, not the Name.

Losing her would hurt as much as Masego or any of the other Woe but this is endgame, all bets are off.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm pretty sure Idrani will kill her now. But tonight sets the framework. Ranger didn't come for the Warden. So it will be Idrani that comes for Hye Su, to ensure she can't hurt any of her friends any more. And with this she will find the final piece that makes her the new Ranger.

Bad@Games

Glad Killian was there. Picker sass is welcome. Gotta love Hakram and his lady friend. Get them home catherine. I like how the coments call her Hye Sue not Ranger now. Adjunct 2 electric boogaloo? can there more adjunct's then the adjunct has hands?!?!?!?!?!?

IF I DONT GET A CHAPTER FOR ROLANDS BURIAL I WILL BE CROSS.

aurikdomi

If there is a burial chapter I imagine a whole lot more people will be covered than just Roland.

Bad@Games

2 burial chapters, 1 for roland, 1 for all the other named that was not my boy.

tbh a lot of named wont have bodies to bury per say, and cat made the promise to do it herself for roland soooo???!!!

Juff

Typo thread:

of hand on > of hands on close hand > close, hand at a look > a look you army's > your army's tactiqued or strategized > tacticed or strategised you Foundling > you, Foundling tells us > tell us cart of > a cart of she'd didn't > she didn't someone point, > some point, them impulse > the impulse
I had a fire (extra space) advice he was (extra space) never was never > was never never head > never heard place the > place and the coat fur > fur coat took step back > took a step back were look rather > were looking rather gestured > gesturing and she squeezed > and he squeezed same it > same as it
Masham standing > Mashamba standing
We were both had > We both had
" "But > "But
why you came for > what you came for

ohJohN

I read "and she</b squeezed" and thought, "man I hope Juff also noticed this 🙄"

ohJohN

EXCELLENT JOB, WORDPRESS (also me I guess)

BargleNawdleZouss

You are doing the work of Above and Below, Juff. My OCD thanks you! 😊

BarberXNeshamah

Gods, I love the roasted pigs chapters. There is nothing like reading the Woe and (Rat) company just bicker and have fun.

Also the goblins keep being the best and funniest race on Creation.

Wonder

The first time I saw the chapter title, It felt like some of these characters were saying goodbye and it hurt.. it hurt and made me fear for them..

Cat Why??? Why is Cat still holding on to that old redoubt? This is frustrating... Akua and Cat deserve this little slice of each other. Why is Cat denying them both this?

Is she still hoping Akua will take the Crown of Autumn? I thought the Serolen arc was about Cat deciding to not put Akua in the Crown trap.

aurikdomi

Long prices are her blood, asking her to give up this last holdout is asking her to give up the core tenant of her people.

Liliet

Cat is still feeling guilty for Second Liesse (and also a whole host more things that end up lumped with it) and she's punishing herself by using Akua as proxy. Hell, given she lets Akua do whatever the fuck she wants, it's pretty much just herself now.

Lord Haart

Not responding clearly hurt Akua too and if it hadn't I'm not sure Cat wouldn't have responded.

But yes, Cat rightly surmised that all of this would only hurt Akua enough if it was real.

agumentic

In matters of self-mutilation, Catherine knows no equal. She hates both herself and Akua a bit too much to allow them that happiness, even though she loves as well.

KageLupus

Cat blames herself for Second Liesse as much as she does Akua, and has used that guilt to drive her to where everyone is today. If she could let it go for Akua then it would mean that Cat's guilt wasn't needed either, and now is not the time to be taking away your main driving motivation.

Plus, Cat is still hoping that some combination of Akua and the Autumn Crown can be used to trap DK forever. So opening her heart to Akua before shoving her into an eternal prison seems like an equally bad idea.

Konstantin von Karstein

Because Akua is a mass-murderess, plain and simple. Even the fact that she sincerely regrets it doesn't erase those 100k deaths. I still think she should get punished, and would be disappointed in Cat if she choose to date Akua.

Miles

But like, what about all those times she's saved everyone who's left? By the time this fight is over she'll have saved every single person who is left alive in Calernia.

Either because of null hypothesis or because she saved Cat last chapter and Cat kills the DK, or because Akua does yet another thing to more directly stop the DK's armies.

Lord Haart

If not for Akua, DK may never have been unleashed. The Folly, and how it failed, was a very good trigger for the Crusades and is probably the reason they committed so hard vs. a token effort. Which Malicia responded to with the DK deal.

Regardless of all that, point is that Cat still sees Liesse at the same time she sees her and that's a hell of a turnoff.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I agree that the deaths should hang over her head indefinitely, but the reason she killed them is that she was hardcore brainwashed from birth, and it really didn't take long for Cat's offer of a redemption arc to cause Akua to begin turning her back on that aspect of herself and of her culture.

Moreover, you're free to disagree, but I feel that the purpose of punishment should be deterrence and that when something other than punishment is a more effective deterrent then the other option should be favored.

The dead are not honored by the suffering of the living under any circumstance, in my view. It's good that she suffers, but only when the suffering's source is her own internal recognition that she has committed a crime vast enough to overshadow anything else; the suffering itself is emphatically not the point imo, and other sources of it are unlikely to carry the same justifying weight. If proper recognition of her unpayable debt to society on her own part could come without suffering, then even this pain would be something worth easing (but it can't, so it isn't).

I'll admit that this is not so much a different interpretation of the story or character as it is a different moral philosophy. Either way, I don't fault you. As for the ship, I do like it, but I think I'd like it less if Cat actually did get over her long price and associated hangups and started leaning into it.

Liliet

^^^ all of this, except Cat also wasn't offering Akua a redemption arc. Akua barged in and demanded one, and Catherine actually tried to protest while Akua was all "nuh uh you can't deny me it's against your morals checkmate atheists" – reread Comes Around, it's a fucking masterpiece.

Akua started the trajectory away from the toxic ideology of her youth just from being no longer in contact with it, and frankly, given some of her remarks in Book 3, was already on that trajectory before, just too deep inside to make it to the surface yet.

*arcanavita*15

I wonder what the Alaya will think about the duel in 10 years, also it was after her execution time so I think subconsciously Hye blames her as well as Cat.

holothuroid

Oh, definitely. Also it might be a bit of self preservation. Consciously scheduling the death match in such a way as to prevent the Warden from executing her role, might be narratively unsound.

ISiejek

Well damn....

There is too much to try and express after reading that

Tenthyr

I wonder how that duel will go. Catherine will get to collect her final due, and then, I suspect, very much might die to Indrani's teacher.

Catherine's a Villian after all, there's death and pain in her wake, the trade for the change she wanted to give the world. It might be a fitting, even peaceful end for her if she dies– or a chance to be someone else, once the last dust settles and the shape of Cardinal and the Warden is complete.

Liliet

That duel ain't happening, IMHO. Hye's dying before the end of the war. The oath was a pretext, because she wanted to help but didn't want to JUST help without establishing how she feels about the whole thing.

Liliet

(which isn't to say Hye isn't expecting to collect on the oath, this is just a narrative prediction that she won't)

shikkarasu

A Practical Epilogue to Evil: Cat buries Hye Sue in Refuge. Everyone thinks it's a kind gesture until she shows up 9.8 years later to tap her foot on Hye's grave and say "Don't keep a girl waiting. Oh, right, it was to the death. I guess I win by defa-" and then a naturally occurring Revenant claws her way out of the ground.

"... OK, in hindsight I should have seen that coming." Refuge proceeds to take refuge anywhere else.

Liliet

beautiful...

BargleNawdleZouss

Next, would you rather have an Interlude showing the Heroes and other armies' versions of this campfire, or just move on already to the final battle?

laguz24

I would like the heroes to be seen but the pacing would be better served if we took the plunge.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Could have the first part of the plunge-taking be a heroic interlude.

Konstantin von Karstein

Heroes, definitely. And Arthur and Geatan finally getting together 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Yes if it includes Akua settling and finally going at it with Hanno, fulfilling my crackship.

BargleNawdleZouss

Of all the ships in the harbor, THAT is one I would never think to look for! Interesting...

Cayle

Doesnt that agreement fuck over Indrani in a massive way. Gives Hye a story to ride past Indranis attempt at taking her name.

roseocean2012

Not really. Ranger's schtick is basically the manifestation of "Nothing personal, kid." She maintains plot invulnerability by never having enough at stake to trap her into a bad bet. This is entirely personal, so she loses that protection instead of gaining a plot level up.

Cayle

Was talking about the sequel hook in her story. The commitment to fight the most powerful monster in Calernia.

Liliet

Yeeah, I'm not buying that. The weight of this duel is not the actual fight that's coming but its role as Hye's pretext for helping the GA. For her to die in this battle would be exactly narratively correct without leaving any loose ends dangling and emotional threads unresolved. The duel oath is just an expression of the emotions involved.

shikkarasu

Nope. Ranger is breaking her rules and fighting someone for vengeance, rather than to test herself or for petty whims. She's also making a high profile political enemy with nothing to gain. If she was into that she would have killed Malicia decades ago.

No, what you are witnessing is Hye Sue's Name weakening. She was less Ranger after she lost a fight, and she's even less now that she's made that oath. If she doesn't stop this path then Indrani will have no rivals for the Name Ranger and won't even need to kill Hye for it. Hye will show up to the duel with a new, lesser Name or nothing at all save a pair of longknives.

Insanenoodlyguy

Or Idrani kills her. Not Archer either. The same way Hye Su came for Catherine tonight, whatever else they are. I, Idrani comes for Hye Su and says "you've hurt my friends too much already. You're done doing that. Oath you won't and walk now or we end this.” And of course Hye doesn’t walk, and the likely outcome is Idrani the Ranger.

Casey Glick

Indrani would never kill Hye Su. She doesn’t need to anymore, she freed herself from being trapped by that story. And Hye Su is too important to the fight to be killed before beating the dead king.

I think she will end up dying to save Indrani.

Liliet

I think she will end up dying to save Cat, just because of how well it would drive home the ENTIRETY of the bullshit involved ♥

Ed

The only way Hye Su gets to keep the name of Ranger is if Indrani dies as far as I see it and wouldn’t that be a total kick in the guts.

Lord Haart

She still lost pretty entirely to Indrani already. I think the Name is gone, barring a pattern of three somehow developing.

Indrani could still die though 😞

Mary Gentle

I’ve missed Hakram so much.

Pickler telling the Princess and the Warden that they don’t know enough to dig a hole in the ground. 😊

The Black Queen, now acted with real Crows!

And Killian dropping in to tell us that – after all these years – Catherine’s STILL horrible at this. I think we might have noticed. 😊

Regarding the proposed duel, I might be on Hye Su’s side in this. Amadeus is much missed, and wouldn’t it have been wonderfully complex if he’d still been around for all this?

On the other hand, scheduling a duel for ten years after invading the Dark King’s city by a secret way that has “DISASTER” flashing above it in neon lettering... ? That really is counting her chickens before the metaphorical hen even lays the eggs.

We need some story-fu around now,

Insanenoodlyguy

The thing is it's truly the last thing that Amadeus would have wanted. I get Hye Su doesn't care, but that's no less true. The fact is he would have tried to kill her, taken his daughters side. Which is both a deeper cut of the pain and the sort of thing that puts a finger on cats side of the scale.

Lord Haart

Fate still loves a good tragedy...

Liliet

Oh she's not counting her chickens, she's drawing a line in the ground. "I'm here to help you but FYI I hate you personally and am not okay with anything that's going on. And if we're both surviving this it's no longer than for 10 years."

Xi Cree

It occurs to me that the Dead King has been setting up something to Nail Hye with the instant she represents more than a nuisance...

Thinking about it that would be the perfect way to destabilize a group coming after him relying on her as a linchpin.

Hargabga

"A life without friends is a banquet without food."

Honestly, it's also sounds like something Dread Emperor would say. I too like to eat my friends.

KageLupus

I absolutely love the fact that Ranger has already been established as knowing all of the secret ways into the heart of Keter, and that what was originally a cool perspective interlude was actually a super sneaky Checkhov's interlude instead. The planning and foresight that goes into something like that just tickles me.

KageLupus

I feel like a clown for replying to my own post, but I knew that Cat's vaguely recalled quote by a Fairfax had to be a chapter quote and then I was able to find it. I get as much joy out of a good lore callback as I do a more meta narrative one.

"The evening before a battle is like an entire nation breathing in. Only morning will tell if what comes out is acclaim or lamentation.”

– King Albert Fairfax of Callow, the Thrice-Invaded

Xinci

Its a fascinating thing that Cat, didnt see the similarities between her own response to those dying close to her and Rangers. Especially since it happened at a moment where she actually liked Ranger too. Makes me wonder if they could have grown to a understanding if Amadeus had found a proper framework for them to share goals and conflicts over cooperatively.

ninegardens

See... in a normal story, in Cat's place, I'd seriously consider whether Ranger was setting things up to murder me in some back alley hallway in Keter.

Of course, with story vision up and available, that's a harder trick to pull, so I don't think it will happen, but still

Insanenoodlyguy

No. Hye isn't Amadeus but she can't have spent that much time around him to be that stupid. Betraying Cat in that way doesn't just screw over the continent, it's worse: it won't work. Too much narrative weight here to let it anticlimax like that. A building falls on Hye as she draws back for the final bow or something line that. Hye knows she might lose this fight but she does want a chance to win it.

ninegardens

Oh yeah, I totes agree. In this setting a betrayal from Hye would not work. I'm saying in any normal setting that doesn't run on story logic, betrayal would be a problem.

Liliet

In a normal setting, Hye's attempts to kill herself without dooming her students would look differently lol

JJR

Too bad Cat didn't stay behind to hear what the Dead Kings weakness was in the play, both above and below are gunning for him at this point and 'inspiring' the actor playing the Dead King to say something that was coincidentally the actual Dead King's weakness seems like the kind of bullshit they just might try to pull. Though maybe you would need a Hero there for it to work. Have that moment where a side character says something that inspires the hero with the solution to their problems.

masterofbones

It seems like Amadeus' biggest legacy was effortlessly acquiring a harem.

Lord Haart

I mean yes the Calamities loved him but he only had that relationship with Hye. Seemed pretty monogamous.

Cat is much like her father, lots of people love her but it's really only a monster as bad as her at her worst that she really loves.

Her trying to love Akua is really just a story about her relationship with herself.

Silverking

"I may not live to see our glory, but I will gladly join the fight, and when our children tell our story, they'll tell the story of tonight."

madmanrambler

I made it! I've been reading for 4! Fuckin! Months! And I made it!! I got to the most recent chapter!

...

Fuck! Now I have to wait for the story to come out a chapter at a time!

Konstantin von Karstein

Now you know our pain! Suffer like we have suffered, you poor fool! /j

Liliet

At least you have not caught up at Interlude: Inheritance.

lenethren

Another marvelous chapter! You have such an inspiring way with words. Thank you for sharing!

unsatisfying plot device

"The Scourges" being so OP despite missing an aspect each (as Revenants like Spellblade) compared to the complete set of ALL CURRENT NAMED is like, super narratively unsatisfying. This coterie of washed-up has-beens functions as a "deus ex machina" for the DK to pull out a terrible outcome for Team Cat no matter the preceding scene. Roland dying to a stray arrow from the Hawk begs the question of why Archer hasn't been able to put the (assume she's named for her good vision?) 2-aspect former Named down yet, despite being both THE Archer original, no qualifier and claimant for Ranger. It also seems really convenient that the Varlet's anti-Night venom wouldn't have any counter from Akua or Masego (to say nothing of Blessed Artificer, Apprentice, etc.) after they had an extended period of time to familiarize themselves with what seems to be Nessie's only weapon that could permanently kill Cat. Like...the way Roland died is only plausible if you assume that the best current Named are all hapless layabouts. The Sourges don't seem OP because they earned it narratively, it seems like they just popped up as an extra obstacle apropos of nothing. They were not foreshadowed at all until they were Too Big to Take On in the campaign. Yes, we have seen Nessie has a record for collecting top heroes and heroines, but they aren't kept in mint condition (they lose an Aspect), and they don't usually act as a Band of Five in a way that should provide in-story plot armor. The Hawk, Varlet, and Tempest should have been dealt with many chapters prior to Roland eating it. If the Ranger can keep offing pairs of senior Revanants, and three of her mentees can beat her, by transitivity shouldn't they be able to take down (working with a team) one baddie? The whole thing just feels like a lazy plot device to make the last few chapters more grimdark.

And yeah, Hye Su just missed the Emerald Swords.

Andrew Smith

I will point out we saw for fact that the Varlet had all three aspects, Harm, one that created a bubble of stillness and a stealth one, Cat stole one and used it to kill the other.

so entirely possible they have all 3 aspects it depends entirely on the dead king and his wants(Drake Knight 100% had 3 since he kind of wasn't really an undead) of course the question is if the poison was created through Harm aka you expect them to counter an aspect then(as in a similar manor to the Hawk well we think it was called kill) which is also something that can perma kill Cat and is what took her eye, and well three of them might of had the counter but akua with her injuries at least did not and well they have other projects to focus on also the Varlet is dead and has been dead for like a book before Roland died,

The other two are just 1.good at running and at picking there fights

Tempest was getting wrecked by Akua or was but never actually fought her now and well the Hawk is good enough to run away and is hard to pin down might even have a stealth aspect since pretty much no one has been able to detect it before it fires and it could apparently run around an entire battalfield while Indari hunted it while also keeping an eye out for it targets(make no mistake Indari is better at it though as the ranger she might be a bit less suited to fighting it since less bow focused)

Lord Haart

For all we know the Hawk also has multiple copies of itself, after all it was outside Keter just before – so that’s why Archer stayed out there, they thought Hawk would hit from behind.

But now it’s a fair guess that the Hawk just used Hye’s path.

I have found the Scourges frustrating at times too – at least one or two should have died at Hainut IMO, there are enough of them for that – but not badly enough so to not trust EE will have reason for them to represent such a narrative pain.

SuitorShooter

Cat continuing the fine tradition of messing with people who put on plays about her.

Interlude: Legends I

“Thus they gave oath;

To war ‘til the ends of the earth

Relenting not to love, dread or hearth

To league of hosts or pious chant

Until dominion returned to Levant.”

– Extract from the ‘Anthem of Smoke’, widely considered the founding epic of the Dominion of Levant

It was time.

Yara of Nowhere could still feel that much even after that vicious child had torn away her eyes. The ragged eyeholes of what she had once been – all the stories she had been able to Narrate – still remained, like a drunk groping for a bottle in the dark.

So she went to one of those places that were not really places, where no feet could take you, and beheld the lunacy of a single man tying the hands of an entire Choir. A faceless, implacable sea held back by a stubborn dam denying it the right to pass. Forbidding the fish to swim, judgement to judge. Was there anything in the lay of Creation more impossible to break than pure, genuine conviction?

The Tribunal saw her, for she was not hidden. The Hierarch, little more than a burning swath of will and indignation, could see nothing at all. A stroke of luck, for in this state the merest trace of his attention would force her to Wander away – that nasty little authority of his would make her open her own throat otherwise, going through with the sentence the League of Free Cities had passed on her. That she was no longer of Aoede if Nicae didn't seem to matter in the slightest to the authority's boundaries, even though the right to pass judgement over her had been bound to the face. The Hierarch had always been a fucking headache of a man.

Yara would have reached for her flask if she could in this empty and too-bright place.

"Thought I'd come help you out of your spot of trouble," Yara told them.

Agreement. Impatience. Curiosity. Why had she not come sooner? It was her purpose.

"All in due time, my darlings," she told the Tribunal. "Besides, you can't kill him."

Dismay. Anger. The Seraphim felt shallowly but broadly, like an ocean three feet deep. Even after several millennia she was not sure why they had been made to feel at all. There was a time she'd thought they might once have been like her, learning just a little too much about the underpinnings of Creation to be allowed to muck about by the Gods, but she'd since stumbled over proof they had been created. Her best guess was that even limited emotional capacity improved their ability to learn and adapt to the ever-changing mores of mortals. Compassion had once been Reverence, after all. Like Role and Name, the essence could not change but the manifestation must adapt.

Yara wagged a finger at the angels.

"You know the rules," she said. "You're no longer being called and he's not exactly attacking you – keeping you locked up's not the same thing. I can't just put my finger on your side of the scale and let you turn him into dust."

Reluctant agreement. Yara could, but she had been lying to angels since before men knew how to forge iron.

"Of course," Yara grinned at them fondly, "it doesn't mean I can't play favourites. I've got a way for you to get rid of our little friend here without stepping over the lines."

Elbow in the side, a nudge and a wink. Stern disapproval from the Tribunal. They really were such bores, one of the many reasons she'd never gotten along with them. Their heroes tended to be fascinating, but the old birds themselves? Terribly tedious.

"Now now," she mused. "Don't give me that guff. I'm here to help, yes? Now, our old buddy-"

She did not speak either name or Name. She knew better.

"- can't be bumped off, but you can do the opposite," Yara told them.

Caution. Confusion.

"You can resurrect him," she said.

Immediate anger. A reward, a prize, when the man was undeserving? Not fond of the idea at all, which was no surprise when it ran contrary to their nature. That was fine. She'd talked so many ancient monsters into their deaths she'd forgotten most of them.

"You're insisting on thinking of it as a reward," Yara of Nowhere said, clicking her tongue, "but does it have to be? Think of it not as bringing him back but as moving him."

Caution again, but they were listening.

"Exile," she smiled. "That's a punishment, isn't it?"

Reluctant agreement. And the trick here, was that they were going to have to rely on her. Because the Tribunal only did one sentence – yes or no, the flip of the coin – so for nuance they needed a mortal anchor. And with theirs out of their reach, no longer the White Knight and changing in his convictions, they couldn't afford to be too picky. And Yara, for all her... imperfections, was here.

"We'll send him somewhere out of the way," she told them, smile broadening. "A Hell, yeah? Let him do Above some good dying."

Caution remaining, the thought more nuanced than most they possessed.

"Sure, it wipes you out for a day," Yara shrugged. "But you melted his body, it's on you to make it again. And what's better for Creation: silence for one day before you return in full, or remaining silent until the Last Dusk?"

It was no choice at all. Choirs could tolerate idleness for long, it ran against the fundamental purpose. Playing them wasn't like manipulating someone with a soul, it was more like a jigsaw puzzle: move the pieces around the right way and it'd all click into place as inevitably as the rising of the sun.

Agreement, the Tribunal expressed.

Yara of Nowhere grinned, laying hand on the essence of them.

"Let me take care of that for you," she said.

Guide, her soul sang, the authority seizing the underpinnings of Creation. One nudge to get the angels free past, one nudge to keep his eyes away from her and one last nudge to ensure he'd end up where she needed him to be. That was the most terrible of her powers, in truth.

Knowing the right place and the right time.

—

He landed in the grass.

It was soft against his bare feet, and though there was no sun in the sky above there was no lack of light. The breeze had him pulling his frayed diplomat's robes close on his haggard frame, eyes blinking numbly as he realized he was seeing again. With his own eyes. He was breathing with lungs, shivering with skin. There was the scent of dung on the wind, and somewhere ahead a long field of barley. Beyond it, at the edge of the horizon, he glimpsed the sloping silhouettes of a village. People. His mind was open, never to be closed again, and so he could not help but Receive the sight of them.

He had seen this place before. Green land stretching in every direction, an endless expanse of villages and fields and rivers. Men and women and children that never went far from the place of their birth, taught that they were to be content and peaceful with mother's milk. There were no dangers, no dooms, nothing to fear in the Serenity. Only one beautiful day after another, until one day you breathed your last and the Fair King called your mortal coil to the Lands Beyond. Some would have called it a paradise, a place without sickness or war.

Anaxares the Diplomat called it a lie.

The middle-aged man raised his hand, felt the breeze slip through his fingers and slide through the last of his sparse and greying hair. It was baked into the bones of this place, the insolent will that claimed itself supreme master of all that dwelled under the empty sky. He could feel it pressing down on all that dwelled here like an unseen sun, a tyranny so subtle and ancient it was no longer known as anything of the sort. But Anaxares was a son of Bellerophon, born under the stele, and he knew tyranny. It was not in his nature to suffer it silently.

The fingers closed around the breeze. His Name roused, groggily opening an eye.

"All are free, or none," the Hierarch told the empty heavens. "I will suffer no compromise in this."

His aspect lit up, and like ink in water began to spread. Spreading through the grass and the wind, the morning dew and the dim light of nowhere at all. Indict, the Hierarch had ordered, and the command burned away at the will holding this realm in thrall like acid. Breathing out, the old diplomat pulled at his loose robes and took a tentative step forward. The grass was wet against the sole of his feet, but it was no unpleasant. He still remembered walking well, he'd done much of it... before. So Anaxares took a second step, towards the fields and the village beyond them, feeling his aspect seep into the ground beneath his feet.

And where the Hierarch tread, serenity shattered.

—

Dawn rose over Keter, silent. Like a breath sucked in. Banners rose, armies moved and horrors stirred. Thousands knew, deep in their bones, that this was the last pass.

And so the Warden broke the Sword of the Rest over her knee, freeing Below's stories at last.

—

The Firstborn had not begun at the forefront of this siege.

In some ways, General Rumena was thankful for it. The First Under the Night was showing consideration for the losses at Serolen and the great war for its borders, restraining her expectation and preserving their strength. It was a kindness. But part of it had been displeased, even as the Firstborn were relegated to guarding the camps under cover of dark and protecting the wardstones during the day. They had not fought, had not bled as the armies of the humans had. The war of the Firstborn had been waged very far away, far from the eyes of cattle, and their might doubted because of it.

This morn, as the sun rose over the Burning Lands, Rumena the Tomb-maker would put those doubts to rest.

Mighty clustered around it, those with the strength to see and to shield, and as the first rays of light scoured the sky the old general sat surrounded by a ring of obsidian and steel. It sunk deep into itself, into the embrace of Night. Deep enough that darkness swallowed it whole, as if it had stepped into the abyss. It breathed until it no longer felt the need to, the faint and distant sounds of thundering sorcery colliding against Night slowly fading away. Its will sunk into the ground, like the roots of an ancient tree, and as it breathed out it unleashed the Secret of Stone. Not as it had in Hainaut, fighting in the tunnels, or as it had in Serolen when fighting under the sky.

Instead it gripped the tides of the earth and moved with it.

Power flowed through its veins, raw and urgent, but Rumena gave a crooked smile as it opened its eyes. Even as it rose to its feet the ground shifted under them. It did not need to look to feel the movement, the bridges the Hidden Horror had broken sprouting anew. Stone and earth jutted out, charging across the chasm that made Keter an island even as spells fruitlessly tried to stop the assault. A bridge formed, then two. Three, four, five – Rumena stopped only at then, still keeping the Night clutched tight against its breast as it began to march forwards.

The Enemy came for its life with reckless hate. Storms of sorcery, arrows and bolts and every nasty trick the Pale King had learned over its many years of darkness. But what did that matter, when the finest of Mighty stood at the Tomb-maker's side? Magic died in the dark, like a candle guttering out. Arrows were swallowed like delicacies, stones plucked out of the air like toys. Sigils burned around the general, Mighty laughing at the Enemy's impotent wrath. And so it came that Rumena stood before the last gate of Keter, a mass of steel and sorcery set in great towers of stone.

It laid a hand against the steel, feeling the enchantments within try to bite at its skin.

"A strong gate," Rumena praised, looking up. "Crafted cleverly, its magics mighty."

The old general laughed, revealing crooked teeth.

"But it is set in stone, Dead King," the Tomb-maker said, "and I hold in my hands the secret to it."

It struck out, knuckles hitting the steel. The might rippled across steel, the sound of it like a gong struck, and twice more Rumena the Tomb-maker knocked at death's door.

On the third strike, the gates fell.

The stone it was set it crumbled to pieces, dust in the wind, and the enchanted mass of steel fell on the dead behind it with a loud thump. Dust kicked up and General Rumena met the eyes of the horde waiting behind.

*"Before nine years have passed,
Keter's gates will lie broken as trembles Death's holdfast."*

It had taken an oath in the lands of Procer, sworn the sigil of the Rumena upon it. At last it stood fulfilled. It took a step forward, the ground shuddering under its feet, and around it the Mighty leaned forwards like wolves hungry to fall upon the fold.

"Chno Sve Noc," the last general of the Empire Ever Dark laughed.

"Chno Sve Noc," the Mighty shouted back, and Night sang with them.

The Firstborn had not begun at the forefront of this siege, but they would end there.

—

The Mirror Knight moved quickly, for a man his size in heavy plate, but as Named reckoned it he was slow. Hanno had learned to match his pace to the other man's, as it would not do to leave him behind. He was, after all, serving as Christophe de Pavanie's bodyguard. The Dead King had to know of the Severance by now, of the blade meant to slay him. And while the Hidden Horror might know better than to try to destroy something fated to slay him with his own hand, there was another way to ensure the blade never reached him.

Killing its wielder.

"It rankles," Christophe suddenly said.

Hanno slowed in his step, falling by the other man's side as they halted beneath a half-crumbled wall. A row of houses had been brought down into a makeshift barricade here, eventually collapsing into a ragged hill of rubble. From here, they could see the fierce melee ahead. The Lycaonese vanguard was tangling with skeletons, shouting war cries in Reitz as they tried to swiftly shatter the enemy's ranks. The Proceran thrust into the city through the same gate as yesterday was to be entirely about speed: like an arrow loosed or a spear thrust, all the way to the inner wall.

"What does?" Hanno asked.

"That we do not fight with them," the Mirror Knight said. "We could save lines, Hanno."

The dark-skinned hero grimaced. That was true. But it was not the plan for a reason.

"We won't win the battle in the city," Hanno frankly said. "We cannot. Everything we do is to get to the Dead King and end this. That means-"

"That the Severance and its wielder must reach him," Christophe curtly said. "I know."

The Mirror Knight sighed, fingers going for the sword at his hip that was a mundane blade – at least compared to the one forged out of the Saint's aspect in the Arsenal.

"But it rankles," he repeated. "It feels like we're abandoning them."

Christophe was not the only one who felt that way. Named had not been entirely pulled out of the armies, but they had very much been thinned. Most of them had been placed in bands, roving to put down Revenants and find the Scourges, while a few others had undertaken particular tasks. The Warden herself had taken a band for such a purpose without giving an explanation except for a knowing smile. Catherine Foundling, Hanno had thought, was becoming unpleasantly fond of vagueness.

"Once we reach the inner wall we'll have fights of our own," Hanno said. "Most of us after the Dead King, but there will be other duties as well."

"There is no chance of either of us returning to the battle," Christophe bluntly said. "You must know this."

Hanno did not disagree. They were both too useful to be spared for any purpose but the destruction of the King of Death.

"I know," Hanno quietly said.

And it rankled, but what else could he do?

They began moving again, shadowing the Proceran advance, and the man who had once been the White Knight could only pray there would be anyone left alive in Keter by the time the Dead King ended.

—

Basilia had stormed the walls of Keter once before, but the horror of that day was a candle to the bonfire before her: though they were not even an hour into the battle, there was no longer a Penthesian army.

The Empress of Aenia watched the ragged remains of the soldiers and mercenaries the Exarch had scraped together for the campaign flee down the avenue, the undead leisurely loosing arrows at their back, and felt her heart clench with fear. Her forces had pushed past the Tombmaker's bridge and the shattered gates in good order, clearing a foothold in the lower city, but that had been as far as the armies of the League got. What should have been a hard push into the enemy's capital was instead turning into a desperate holding action, the enemy pushing in on all sides with frenetic intensity.

Basilias had claimed a tower as her forward headquarters, deciding the higher vantage point was worth the risks of attack as long as she had mages to protect the place, and looking down at her offensive she could already see the first signs of collapse. On her right flank the Delosi were already buckling under the pressure, the citizen levy and mercenaries losing ground as the flood of undeath came at them relentlessly. There were spurts of flame and poison whenever the krixilia threw themselves, the swollen ghouls full of burning oil and foul alchemies scrabbling as deep into the Delosi ranks as they could before exploding.

On her left flank the Stygians were holding, as much because the Spears of Stygia were as unflinching as any dead as because the Seventeen Schools of Atalante had finally taken the field. The priest-philosophers, a bunch of ragged and quarrelsome fools at the best of times, wielded Light as a painter would a brush: it curled and twisted, forming into arcs and elegant sweeps as it cut a burning swath through the dead. The Atalantians would tire, though. And when they did, the dead would again prove that a phalanx could hold them back but not beat them. That was the source of most her troubles, in truth. She spat through the window, seeing the faces of her generals were as grim as hers.

"If we are kept bottled up any longer," Empress Basilias bluntly said, "we've lost."

Grunts of agreement.

"Those small streets are murder on the mercenaries," General Pallas said. "Their equipment's too irregular to be able to hold proper formations."

A problem that afflicted some of the cities more than others. Delos and Atalante had always heavily relied on mercenary armies to prop up their own mediocre hosts, and though Penthes usually boasted a decent force under professional generals that army had been melted into scraps during the conflicts that had afflicted the League since the beginning of the Uncivil Wars. Even Nicae, whose armies had checked Helikean and Stygian conquerors for centuries, had been forced to bolster its ranks with sold swords after the... war of succession that had dethroned the Trakas.

"We need to push further up avenue before they rout," Basilias said. "Once we have, it, we can sweep around and cut off the flow of reinforcements that's keeping us penned in."

"The Penthesians just tried that, Your Majesty," General Alexios flatly said. "It was no great success."

An understatement. The Dead King's commanders had barred the way up the avenue only irregularly, leaving room for the League to advance if it could break through the barricades, but that was because they'd turned the ground into a slaughterhouse. Houses had been collapsed along the length to turn the avenue into a funnel, and then further back collapsed again to turn into platforms for archers and catapults. The strategy at work was simple enough, after that. Keter had scraped together thousands of dead in armour wielding spears and arrayed them in heavy blocks.

And when the Penthesians had charged, trying to break through, the undead had begun firing mass volleys. They didn't care about hitting their own soldiers, just about filling the air with arrows and stones. The Penthesians had bravely fought, breaking through two squares even through heavy fire, but they had dropped like flies. Fed into the meat grinder, they had been spit back out as bloody bones. And now, even as the last of them fled to the safety of allied ranks, the two blocks of spearmen they'd chewed through were replaced as armoured undead smoothly advanced.

They stayed there, silent and waiting.

"If we do not break through," Basilia darkly replied, "the Proceran offensive will be at risk of being enveloped."

And they could not afford that. Though the Grand Alliance was pushing into Keter from every direction, only two pushes were meant to make it to the inner wall: Rozala Malanza's and High Marshal Nim's. The other offensives were meant to cover their flanks and allow them to deliver the assets that would keep the Dead King from killing them all with this nightmare city and the sorcery that moved it. The Titan Kreios was with the Procerans, which meant their push could not be allowed to stall. The ancient Gigantes might be able to go at it alone, she knew, but it would be a risk. If he were to be slain then they would all follow.

There was something different about today, Basilia thought as her generals began to bicker over ploys that might take them up the avenue. The Hidden Horror had always been a fearsome opponent, but the tactics he employed today were... aggressive. He was no longer aiming at victory but instead at extermination. The Empress chewed her lip. He fights like a cornered man. What happened?

"- of course we need someone to march up the avenue, but there's no army that can," Alexios harshly said. "That much sustained fire is a guaranteed rout. We need to-"

"- a swift thrust forward is the only way, getting stuck is death. We should-"

It was Basilia's wandering eye that saw the first sign of it in the troops below. The shift of the Nicaean back ranks, pressing closer to the beleaguered Delosi. A commander was making room for troops to press forward. Who? Though she had noticed from up here, officers closer to the ground must have as well. Basilia turned as a young man in standard scale burst into the room, paling at the sight of his empress and a gaggle of generals. He knelt, his bushy hair flopping around as he did.

"You have a message," Basilia stated.

It was not a question.

"Captain Calista reports that the Republic is on the move," the young man replied. "She sent a runner to demand an explanation and was charged with passing an answer the Protector of the League."

Bellerophon. What were the madmen up to?

"Speak it," she ordered.

The young man nervously cleared his throat.

"By a majority of seven thousand four hundred and fifty-nine to three thousand one hundred and sixty-four, as well as eight abstentions and three invalid votes, the Republic of Bellerophon has voted to serve as vanguard of the League. The Protector may proceed at her leisure."

There were some laughs behind her, but Basilia did not share the mirth. She stilled instead, eye turning to the moving soldiers below.

"Ready all our forces," the Empress of Aenia said. "I want our foot ready to follow behind them."

"You must be jesting, Your Majesty," General Myrine frowned. "The rabble will taste a volley and rout. They-"

"They voted on it," Basilia cut through curtly. "They voted on it, general. It doesn't matter if a hundred or a thousand of them die on the first salvo. So long as they have legs, they will keep walking forward."

She barked out her orders. The Nicaeans were to reinforce the Delosi, keep the flank from bending too much, but Helike's full must was to prepare for the push. And, ignoring the protests of her generals, Basilia Katopodis put on her helmet. She would not leave her men to fight alone. Sweeping down from the tower as her retinue trailed behind, she found her horse and mounted quickly.

Already, ahead of her, she saw the Nicaeans moving out of the way for the advancing ranks of the Bellerophans. They were, she thought, so very close to being a mob.

The equipment was old, the manuals obsolete and most the officers drawn by lot. Some spears were tipped in iron or bronze instead of steel, the armour was a simple tunic of mail and their shields were of an oval shape no one had used in a few centuries. There seemed to be no rhyme or reason to who had been added to the levy. Some of them stooped from old age while others couldn't be older than thirteen, tall and short, limping and hale. None of them were soldiers, not really. It was a sea of farmers and bakers and masons that'd put on armour, none of them really trained. And as the frontline approached the killing grounds where the Dead King, they halted.

"Shields up," officers called out. "Spears down."

The citizens of the Republic of Bellerophon obeyed in disorder, almost laughably so, half of them beginning with the spear instead of the shield. And then, unhesitating, they began to march up the avenue.

Death answered.

Basilias knuckles turned white as she clutched her reins tight, seeing the score of deaths the first volley caused. Ballistae and catapults ran red furrows down the lines, arrows fell like rain and even a few streaks of sorcery burned through men like smoke.

The Bellerophans slowed, closed ranks, and resumed their advance.

It was madness, Basilias thought. The Republic's army smashed into the first block of skeleton spearmen gracelessly, its own soldiers barely more skilled than the dead, and burst through even as catapults crushed entire knots of men with ever stone and smoke was blown into their faces.

After the third block of spearmen was shattered, stones were rolled down into their ranks from the heights on both sides. The wake of the great stones looked like bloody clawmarks from where Basilias stood, as if a monster had slashed through the ranks, but without flinching the Bellerophans did the same as they had from the start: they slowed, closed ranks, and resumed their advance.

Through hail and storm and smoke, through arrows and crossbows and javelins, through screaming ghouls and snakes with the faces of men, the Republic of Bellerophon advanced unflinching. It plodded forward like a donkey pulling a plough, steady and so terribly unhurried. A hush had fallen over the battle at the sight of it, even war cries petering out at the sight of such atrocious bravery.

Close to eleven thousand Bellerophans had begun the march up the avenue. When the army reached the last barricade and clumsy hacked it down, barely two thousand were left. And when they were done, when their walk through ruin ended and they finished what they had set out to do, the citizens of the Republic did not shout in triumph or scream boasts at the sky. Instead they offered the hordes of the Dead King the casual contempt of utter silence as they simply turned around and began their march back.

They'd achieved what they had set out to, after all. What else was there to do?

Empress Basilia watched them, that battered host of indifferent lunatics, and a laugh bubbled out of her throat. In their eyes she saw a light she had seen before, in those of a man she had never liked but had learned to respect.

"They still do you proud, Diplomat," she murmured. "Wherever you are, know that."

And now it was time for the Empress of Aenia to do her part. The Bellerophans had cleared the way, and behind Basilia stood Helike's finest ready to dance with death. Not so much as a single slinking ghoul would reach the Proceran flank, if she had anything to say about.

Unfortunately for the Dead King, she did.

"HELIKE," the Empress shouted, raising her sword, "WITH ME!"

—

Akua was becoming used to being handed godheads, a sentence that she would have been skeptical of even at the age of seventeen when she'd genuinely thought the world was hers for the taking. It was sadly typical of Catherine to keep tossing her the keys to divinity like they were loose change from her pocket. Also as usual, the unthinking display of trust had Akua at war between feeling tenderness and fury.

It was quite vexing.

"Hells, Hakram's in a mood today," Archer grunted.

The golden-eyed sorcerers cast a look at the fighting in the distance, where a torrent of orcish warriors was tearing through dug-in defences as if they were sandcastles. At their head the unmistakeable silhouette of the Warlord in his scorched plate was leading the charge, crushing everything in his way in a display of pure rage that reminded Akua of the reason her Soninke ancestors had learned to build enchanted city walls.

"His assault with the Levantines failed yesterday," Akua replied. "He has something to prove now."

Indrani grimaced.

"He's not the only one who has things to make up for," she said.

Akua laid a light hand on her companion's arm, but as she had expected Archer was not hungry for comfort. Though the sorcerers found it absurd that Indrani blamed herself for not being in Keter to check the Hawk yesterday – she'd been with the League armies out in the Ossuary, as the Scourge had fought there until then – the Woe tended to embrace unearned guilt that they simply refused to be talked out of. It was endearing in the way that a three-legged cat might be. Somewhat charming, but likely to get them killed one of these days.

More unfortunate was that Akua had begun to dislike the prospect of them getting killed, which did her no favours.

Archer shook her head, shaking off whatever thoughts she'd been contemplating to cast a wary look around them. Akua had been keeping them under illusion as they moved from rooftop to rooftop as much as they could, only dipping down to the streets when they must, but there was no telling if the spell was enough to trick the Dead King's many watching eyes. It was why they were staying relatively close to the offensive of the Clans, and near the avenue where the Praesi push under the Black Knight would take place. The chaos should keep attention off them.

The Autumn Crown that Akua carried strapped to her back in an enchanted container was risky to carry with only her and Archer for escort, but it would have been even riskier to keep it with an army. The Dead King was bound to be looking for the weapons forged to destroy him.

"Come on," Archer said. "We need to keep moving."

Akua nodded, adjusting the straps going down her back to ensure she wasn't going to drop a godhead on the ground, and follower her friend.

—

As a child, Sargon Isaru had seen the face of Greed.

The Isaru had not been land-kings in centuries, their city swallowed by Istar's ever-expanding borders and turned into a district of the capital, but the family was powerful still. Vast wealth and closeness to the Hall of Hearths had made them more influential than many who could raise armies with a stomp of their feet. There were some who would have been satisfied with this. The Isaru had not been, hungry for wealth and power and praise. For anything that might raise them above their rivals for the King Under the Mountain's favour.

So they had sought to build a Great Forge, and why not? Their ancestors had been famed smiths once, known for clever devices, it was in their blood. And owning the thirteenth of the Great Forges would bring great prestige to the Isaru, as well as great profit when they began selling arms to the most belligerent of the land-kings. As for royal favour, Sargon's mother had decided on a bold stroke: to dedicate the Forge to the god that within the king even before he passed and freed that divinity to stand with his divine kin. It was heretical flattery, but the man was not known for his humility.

Greed, Sargon had thought even as a child, it was all Greed. That deep and unrelenting longing that lay coiled in the heart of all dwarves, moving them to take and keep. A disease if left unchecked, but also if too tightly held back: you could go mad by denying your Greed entirely. Turn into a feverish animal that knew no reason, eating flesh and murdering for colourful pebbles. Noble families, good blood, must master their Greed. It was a sign of poor breeding, poor character to do otherwise. But Sargon had thought, hearing the older folk talk, that there was nothing mastered about this Greed. It was quiet and subtle, like a poison, and they had all drunk deep of it.

When the crust of the earth was punctured and the magma poured out, the Soul of Fire that angrily rose up was older than any had suspected. One of the old leviathans come close to the border between stone and fire. Sargon was there with the family when it rampaged, tearing through bindings as if they were clay and slaughtering thousands before it was driven away. A disaster that turned all the greedy hopes of the Isaru to ash in a single stroke as swaths of their district burned and dwarves choked to death in smoke-filled tunnels. Sargon learned a lesson about Greed that day, but not only that of others.

For in the moment where the Soul of Fire emerged, the silhouette of fire and smoke from the burning depths of the Deepest Sea, his mind could think of only one word: beautiful. The spirit was beautiful and he had wanted it, craved it in a way he would never crave anything or anyone save for Balasi. That awakening of his Greed, he often thought, had been the first step on his road to become the Herald of the Deeps.

"Delein," Balasi whispered. "We are there."

Sargon's hand left his beard, which he had been stroking lost in thought. His lover – husband, soon, for who was left to stop them? – had the right of it. They had dug through the night, cracking open one of the old tunnels sealed with molten steel in the earliest efforts to contain the Dead King, and then pushed through tunnels until they reached the edge of the gap. Over the centuries, Keter had dug so deep in search of metals for its armies that what had once been a tunnel at the bottom was now halfway up to the surface. The Herald of the Deeps eyed the smooth stone across the gap, still dimly feeling the pulse of power lying within.

"It is the right place," Sargon said. "Beyond that stone lies the chamber where the magic comes from."

"Our bridges are ready," Balasi told him, "but it would be suicide to begin mining our way through."

He watched his lover curiously, enjoying the sight of the skulls against the other man's beards, and followed Balasi when he was led to the edge of the gap. Following the other man's eyes below, he saw the source of the doubts. An army, Sargon thought. How many thousands of dead were down here, spread out among tunnels and depths? That and dark creatures, great white worms large as towns and flocks of cavern-bats turned into... something else. The Dead King had been waiting for them.

"We can't hold the bridge," Balasi quietly said. "Even if we take part of the army down to hit them as a distraction."

"If we do not snuff out the ritual," Sargon said, "the battle is lost."

And perhaps Calernia with it.

"A blind pickaxe is no one's friend," Balasi grunted.

The old saying was open castigation, though mitigated by Sargon's faintly amused knowledge that neither of them had spent so much as an hour of their lives swinging a pickaxe.

"I will act," Sargon said.

Balasi's face creased with worry.

"Without your staff-"

"It is my Burden, delein," Sargon gently said, laying a hand on his arm.

Balasi pulled him close, into a soft kiss, and after they stayed close with the foreheads against each other.

"I know," the seeker-of-deeds murmured. "I know. But you're not as strong now and he'll be coming for you."

Sargon looked away.

"I am not sure," he said.

Balasi uncomprehending eyes found his own.

"Was it truly a loss, breaking my staff?" Sargon quietly asked.

His lover seemed about to say as much, but he bit his tongue. Sargon shook his head.

"We strike," the Herald of the Deeps said. "Tell the men."

Balasi sought his eyes, then slowly nodded. His fist rang against his armour in salute before he hurried away. Sargon stood at the edge of the tunnel, looking down. So many, he thought. And so deep. There might be opportunity there, the Herald thought, but he was not strong enough to take it. He knew this, objectively, by the ways he had been taught. Without the staff and the bound spirits within, Sargon could not tear open the earth. Only... Are you seeking change, or just to add a rung below you on the ladder? Nothing words from a child reeking of angels, he had been ready to dismiss, but then Sargon had looked in the White Knight's eyes and seen faith.

It had burned then and it burned now.

"So I wonder," Sargon murmured, "have I made the mistakes of my mother, of the Isaru?"

Had he thought himself the master of his Greed, only for it to poison him unseen? It had all begun in that moment, he often thought, when the Spirit of Fire burst through the ground. And oh, how Sargon had wanted it.

"How many of you did I take?" he said. "Dozens. I called you and bound you, hung you from my staff like ornaments."

And now that he no longer had the strength, now that he thought of those clear eyes and burned with shame, Sargon wondered if he'd ever mastered anything at all. He breathed out and his Words unfurled, resonating with Creation, and he felt the call to the Deeps being heard. As a child, Sargon Isaru had seen the face of Greed.

Perhaps he had been a child still all these years, to be facing it only now.

"Please," the Herald of the Deeps said. "I cannot bind you, cannot master you."

His fist clenched. And he never would again. He would not keep making rungs below his own.

"I can only ask," Sargon whispered. "So please – help us."

His words sunk into the Deepest Sea, below the burning waves, leaving only ripples. Sargon waited, watching and hoping. The depths remained dark.

And then they shook.

Like an anthill kicked, the dead began to swarm. The ground below them cracked, split, the earthquake shattering the stone. And light came, of light came when magma erupted in a fountain. Dead burst into flame, ran, as the Spirit of Fire roared its wrath. A small one, young, and still Sargon felt his throat tighten with shame and joy. It had come. He had not deserved it, but it had come. His Words rang again, and the Spirit of Fire sang back.

"Yes," Sargon said with a smile. "Together. Let us teach them who the deeps bel-"

The depths shook again. He froze. And again, and again, and again, until the darkness below Keter burned red as the ancient scream of Spirits of Fire shattered stone. Small and large, old and young, they had come. Not one but dozens. And as magma swallowed hundreds of dead, as the air filled with twisting heat, the burning waves shivered. Something was swimming below. An old one, the leviathans of the Deepest Sea. And when it burst free, turning stone into flowing rivers, Sargon stilled. For he had seen it before, this Spirit of Fire. Long ago, when he took the first step down a road.

"Beginning," the Herald of the Deeps softly said, "to the end. Were you with me all along?"

A song, a harmony more beautiful than anything he had ever heard. And when Sargon Isaru looked at the ancient spirit, he saw beauty again – but nothing more. The Greed was gone, and the Herald wept. The Spirit sang, comforting, and he laughed through his tears.

"No," Sargon told it. "They are good tears."

We can learn, he thought. We can do better.

"Then let us," the Herald of the Deeps smiled, and his Burden unfurled like a flower under the sun.

His hands rose and the Deepest Sea rose with them, devouring armies whole.

—

It had not been difficult to find people who would help her.

Though the fortified camps surrounding Keter were slowly emptying of soldiers for the last, desperate assault on Keter it was impossible to truly empty a war camp. So Cordelia had discreetly reached out for those soldiers she knew were most likely to stay behind, had convinced them of the necessity of what she was to do, and now the moment had come. The guards around the angel corpse, the ealamal, were already hers. That had been part of the terms of her abdication to Rozala Malanza. Now their ranks were swelled with Lycaonese and Alamans veterans – most Salians and Rhenians – as dug in positions were raised around the weapon.

Other soldiers were cleared out, a clean line of fire for crossbows established by pulling down any tents and shacks that might serve as cover, and Cordelia Hasenbach stood in silence as the few mages she'd secured began putting up the heaviest wards they could. She had not reached out to Named, even knowing some might be sympathetic, because it was sure to get to Catherine. The Warden was as a bloodhound for this sort of thing when it involved her charges, but there were simply too many soldiers for even Catherine Foundling to be able to keep an eye on all of them.

"It will smack of betrayal to some," Simon de Gorgeault quietly told her.

She did not turn to look at the man who had once been one of her spymasters, then her Lord Inquisitor, and was not the last of her lieutenants. Brother Simon had no intention of leading the Holy Society once more, Cordelia had known that for some time, but he was still burning a bridge by standing with her today. First Princess Rozala would not forget it, or others more distantly worrisome.

"We will not step a foot beyond the ward lines," Cordelia evenly replied.

"Even so," Brother Simon told her.

He was right, she knew. But she would not take the risk. The fair-haired princess had the artefact that could command the ealamal, an angel corpse swelled with so much Light it purified the air around it just by existing, but that would not matter if the ealamal itself was seized. So she would ensure it was not, even if it had the look of betrayal to some. In truth, Cordelia would admit to herself, they were not entirely wrong to see it as such. She was taking on an authority today that had not been bestowed to her by anyone, because there simply wasn't anyone who had that right.

"Then I will answer for this," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "if we all live through the day."

Her duty had not changed. She would keep her eyes open and her hand at the ready, because for all the valour of the Grand Alliance there was no certainty of victory today. And if the siege of Keter was lost, if the Dead King's armies triumphed, then she would do what she must before the dead overran the camp and seized the ealamal. Before anyone, living or dead, could stop her.

If she must burn half of Calernia to save the rest, Gods forgive her but she would.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

machinetell

The link on the previous page still points to the chapter delay announcement, which is now a broken link.

machinetell

Ok, not meant to be a reply but whatever

caoimhinh

Basilis: The Dead King is fighting like a cornered man. What happened?

Meanwhile, Neshamah be like:

Rey d`Tutto

Anaxares in the Serenity is the equivalent of Neshamah feeling a mortal heart attack level danger. The Hierarch knows the Serenity, the heart of the Dead King's power, is a Lie, and his walkabout destroys it with each step.

gingerlygrump

F

Forgot_My_Name

"They voted on it," Basilia cut through curtly. "They voted on it, general. It doesn't matter if a hundred or a thousand of them die on the first salvo. So long as they have fingers, they will keep boosting."

Mturtle7

I know this is very, very, late, but just for the record I think I need to say that this was probably the best “boost quote” since the tradition started. Bless you, Forgot_My_Name.

Another Question

I have been reading this story for years, and I still love every single update for it. Maybe this has been addressed in the hundreds of previous chapters but is there any plans to put this into print? I would purchase a collectors set in a heartbeat.

Shawn DeLuca

Me too!

Shawn DeLuca

Me too!

Shawn DeLuca

And that’s how you learn about double posting....

Cpt. Obvious

I’ve tried to do that and WP won’t let me. “It appears you’ve already said that” it throws at me.

What’s your secret oh Saint of Double Posting?

Liliet

It will be rewritten for publication, we’re reading the first draft

Rey d`Tutto

So it gets Better?

Rey d`Tutto

Take my money! Take it now!

jamesc9

I’ve heard rumours of a plan called patreon, for doing part of that.

Is there a patreon tier which comes with a promise of paper books when they are published?

dadycool

It's probably just typos and "It flows better this way", as well as polishing Book 1 to Book 6 standards, but yeah.

agumentic

No, we know that at least Book 1 is going to be rewritten and expanded a lot. Later books will probably be less subject to change, but still.

Liliet

Hopefully significantly so, because [itemized list of grievances mostly stemming from early books before EE figured the whole writing thing out better, but also the timeline and geography and travel times]

shikkarasu

I have a list of notes from my 4th reread trying to figure out how long any timeskip in the first 3 books take. Be it "we walked from point A to point B" or the ~6 month jump between books. At a few points I had to split into two timelines to handle vagueness.

I still like the first 3 of the series better than Books 4+, but I think that is mostly due to the simplicity of the story, relatively. There were only so many POVs, only so much you needed to pay attention to to follow the story, and yet so much foreshadowing in hindsight.

Liliet

Marigold and I have made a timeline!!!! Marigold has the long version with all the citations, I have this:
https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/glvkdv/visualized_pgte_timeline_and_the_big_plot_hole/

Cpt. Obvious

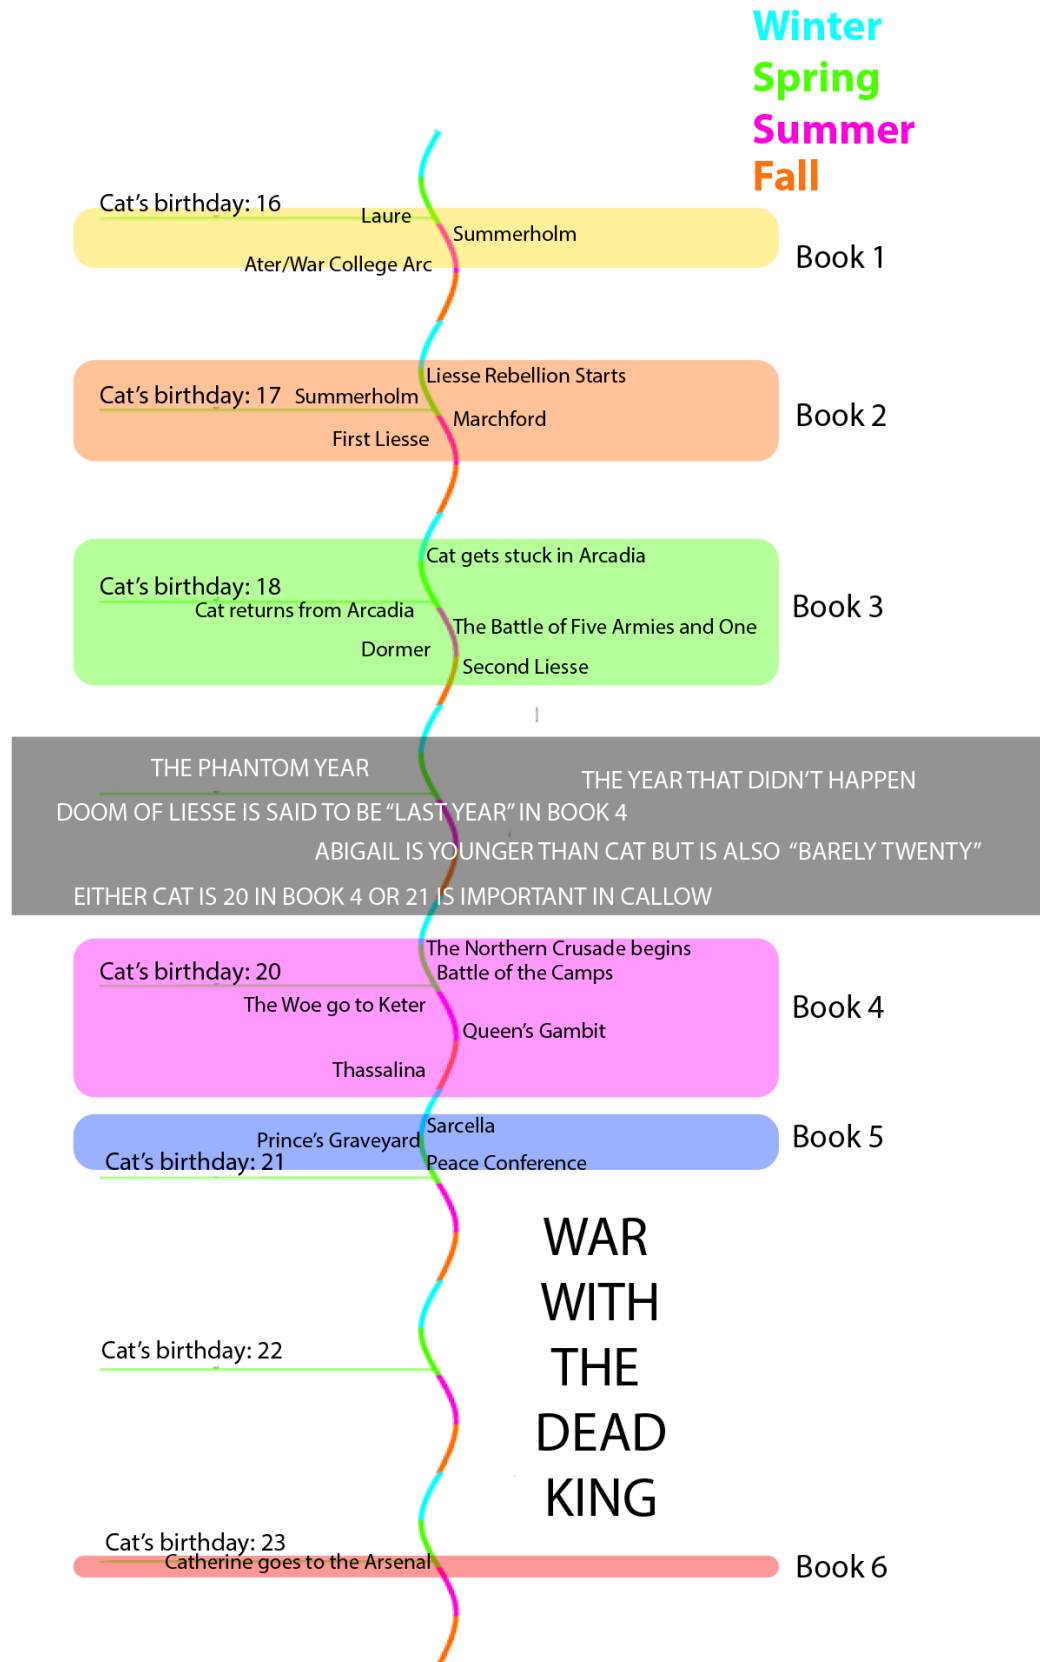

OHH! But also oh.

I'm sure it's amazing work, but I dare not touch Reddit. Last I tried I got caught in a massive ongoing ritual that sucks at the bounds of reality and made me lose two days worth of time.

So I'll admire your dedication to the cause from afar.

Liliet

Hmm!

This might be better for you, then :3

Cpt. Obvious

Thank you!

Interesting work.

I remember being a bit confused about that 'younger than Cat' , but 'barely 20' thing. But I remember thinking that with all Cat had gone through in the last few years she probably felt a lot older than her chronological age.

Add a stint in Arcadia and time probably started to feel like a pretty abstract concept.

But yeah, there's not really any explanation in the books for this 'phantom year'. So I just accepted it like another twist in the story that might be explained later, and then promptly forgot about it as the story overwhelmed me.

I guess that if I had read it as that chapter was posted I might have had the time to dwell on it more. But playing catch-up on several years of posted books can be both a blessing and a curse. I really didn't look that deep in the comments back then.

Glacian

I would absolutely pay good money for the published version. And like, extra good money for a fancy hardcover set!

ohJohN

can you imagine, this story is so gigantic it would take up like MULTIPLE shelves of a bookcase and the fancy hardcover set would be like $200 for materials alone 😂

(but like I'd still buy em in a heartbeat)

Earl of Purple

"By a majority of seven thousand four hundred and fifty-nine to three thousand one hundred and sixty-four, as well as eight abstentions and three invalid votes, the Republic of Bellerophon has voted to serve as vanguard of the League. The Protector may proceed at her leisure."

This is Bellerophonian madness at its peak, and the bit which followed... They are madmen, each and every one of them, and they are terrifying.

David Lynch

That and the Empress' immediate faith in them following hearing about it was all weirdly touching.

Liliet

Basilia has come to understand them well ♥

erebus42

She understands that while they may really only have the one Story it is THEIR Story. Once the will of the people is decided they will suffer no compromise in carrying it out.

Cpt. Obvious

The people of Bellerophon are their own Tyrant.

Frommeman

You might say they have a Dictatorship of the Proletariat.

masterofbones

Its nice to see something usually forgotten in fantasy.

The most important training for a medieval army is holding together despite danger or losses. The overwhelming majority of losses only occur during a rout. So an army that refuses to retreat no matter what will be extraordinarily effective, regardless of their weapon skill or equipment.

Liliet

Hence the high effectiveness of undead armies...

asazernik

And hence Total War: Warhammer needing to semi-nerf undead by having them just collapse into bones in the same circumstances where a living army would rout.

machinetell

The link on the previous page still points to the chapter delay announcement, which is now a broken link.

Blue

The Sword of the Rest wasn't really made to be a weapon struck with. It's more like the key holding shut an armory of Below's stories.

You think this wasn't an intense moment? Cat just found the Secret Weakness of Keter, and coincidentally moments later Yara disabled the angels and released a Madman of Mass Destruction upon the fount of Keter's power.

Now, more than ever, they need a powerful weapon, to strike during this unique opportunity. So Cat breaks the sword, and unleashes Below.

Out come the Drow, marching with all the power and all the story weight the ancient Mighty and Rumena's oath hold. Others had thought less of them for not joining the battle before, and they finally show their true worth.

Out comes Bellerophon, which even without Named still aligns perfectly with the system put into place by an ancient Villain. That kind of madness doesn't come naturally, and the doubted chosen people finally show their worth and the power of their ideals.

Out comes Sargon, Herald of the Deeps, who while seemingly neutral is also a kingslayer and prefers cataclysmic giant underground fire monsters to angels. He gets to finally finish up his apparent arc of overcoming his Greed and showing that he is more than the tyrant Catherine accused him of being.

None of that would have worked anywhere near as well without a story to buoy each of them up. The Sword of the Rest didn't need a dramatic sendoff, because the stories it released were more than dramatic enough. This entire chapter was literally showing how powerful the Sword was.

Liliet

Sargon is actually hero-leaning according to Catherine. And Hanno figuring he'd talk to him based on that assumption worked.

caoimhinh

One correction: Bellerophon was not set in place by an ancient villain, it was founded by a Heroine, the Sword of the Free. She liberated the slaves from Stygia and killed one of the two bird gods of Stygia.

We have confirmation that she was a Heroine because Hanno was able to Recall her life during one of his fights against Amadeus.

Cpt. Obvious

But I also remember something about the patron God of Bellerophon being both a hero and a Bird. I'm still on my first read through so I'm not sure I remember correctly. But it could help explaining how Bellerophon ended up on the side of evil, with its population enslaved under the Tyranny of the People.

caoimhinh

Hmm, as far as I remember, Bellerophon has no patron gods. However, both the Gods Above and the Gods Below have allotted places where they can present their votes, as honorary citizens of the Republic.

The city that has patron gods that are two birds (Redress and Retribution) is Stygia (the slaver city from which the founders of Bellerophon escaped), and one of those was killed by the Sword of the Free.

Rey d`Tutto

It's been fixed

Vega

It still boggles my mind thst the great weapon that cordelia places all her hopes on is just a feather from an Angel that dread empress triumphant Killed. What did Yara do while Triumphant was going around conquering hells and killing angels? I am so excited to see how everything ends! I think Cat is going to live through it, and Heiroohant will walk out a god. My personal hope is that Zeze takes Cat and Archer with him somehow.

Mirror Night

I mean its a full Angel Corpse though Cordelia doesn't know that that Bard turned the Choir back on which means said weapon aint going to work the same. Granted at least Cordelia is acknowledging she is a hypocrite by noting she doesn't have the right to fire it (at least based on her stated worldview) but will anyway.

Hargabga

She isn't a hypocrite by acknowledging she has no right to fire. By definition if she acknowledged something isn't true, she can't be a hypocrite.

jamesc9

> Gods forgive her but she would.

I think that this is undercooked. I think that the version with the correct weight is:

>> Gods forgive her or not, but she would.

Crash

Agnes' note is about this.

It's either a "don't shoot, Bard has handled the Choir" or a "Destroy this, Bard is trying to use it."

Has to be right? She left a note for Cordelia specifically. She doesn't fight with the ranks, she doesn't stay with the generals so it has to be something she does from the outside.

Cordelia is fighting the Dead King yeah, but Agnes has always been fighting the Bard by betting on her cousin.

Lord Haart

I bet the note just says – "I bet on you"

dadycoool

William's sword was an angel feather from the Choir of Contrition, which Cat has shattered and scattered and Arthur has rejected.

beleester

It's not a feather, it's the entire corpse. The baton she carries is just the trigger for it.

ninegardens

>"He landed in the grass.

It was soft against his bare feet, and though there was no sun in the sky above there was no lack of light"

Hahahahahhahahaha

Oh gawd. Oh, she dropped the madman in the fucking Serenity.

Screw it- that's game over buddy. There ain't shit Nessie can do now.

Also, hilarious that the Angels are out of commission, for just one day. What a coincidence. hahahahaha Okay, Good job Yara, good job. I'll give you that.

Also, what's the deal with the sword of the rest being broken? I was expecting that to happen at a WAY more intense moment.

I... gotta admit, I haven't really felt the difference in the story since the initial chapter after below's stories got locked up, so it feels kind of weird in the sense of not knowing what's going to happen when those stories ping back. Oh well.

Snappy270

I know it was brief, but I think WB timed it so the hierarchy was released as the stories came back. Cause he is one of belows I think. Bellephron is below and I assume he would be too.

shikkarasu

I don't think he is one of theirs. He was very vocal about being on The Side Of The People, and the only reason he hasn't declared war on the Hellgods is because they have not overstepped their position. I think she timed it like this because Evil Always Loses is back in play, and without that Story the best the Hierarch could hope for was a draw, like he had a draw against Judgement.

... for 3 years.

ohJohN

I think he's necessarily one of Below's, at least in the basic sense of "empowered/Named by them". Like, Cat describes his powers as a sick, murderous madness (and she's no stranger to murder or madness), but even beyond that: Neutral is functionally a myth at this point, and I can't see a hero keeping their powers after gridlocking an entire Choir for years, but I thought Kairos (beloved son of Below and, notably, instrumental in Anaxares gaining his Name) had a fun quote about betrayal being a sacrament to the Gods Below, even when they're the ones getting betrayed. Hierarch would absolutely put any God on trial if given half a chance, and I like to think Below would be extremely jazzed about it.

shikkarasu

Two counters to "Neutral is functionally a myth."

1. Wandering Bard had to show up and harass him to pick a side, and when he did, as you mentioned, it was to oppose all the gods.

2. Just because they are organised into Heroes and Villains doesn't mean that they all need to be. Neutral Names have been canon since Archer showed up and admitted that she was not a Villain or a Hero, and so while she could kick Cat and Hakram's combined asses, she had nothing to contribute against a Demon.

Honestly I always assumed that Thief was Neutral. She may have been in a Heroic band, but she kept getting offers from Villains even before recruiting outside of your 'side' was a thing. She called herself a former Hero turned Villain, but nothing about her or her Name ever changed until she started to lose it in the Everd-arc.

I wouldn't be surprised if 10-20% of both sides were actually unaligned, but generally considered to be one or the other. All that said, I'm probably biased toward non-binary explanations to just about everything. 😊

Liliet

Waiting to unleash the sword at the darkest moment would guarantee the emergence of said darkest moment. Cat doesn't have a specific trap planned with it so it's better to use it for generic boost and drama highlighting of THE ASSAULT

jamesc9

Re the effect of stories being off, the most explicit thing is that Cat would not get story-punished for being a cackling villain with a flying fortress, provided she had enough practical power to carry out her plans.

Bad@Games

HAHAHAHA YES FOR THE GLORY OF BELEPHRON. YOU DARE CALL YOURSELF KING OF DEATH?? WHO NAMED YOU SO? YOUR FOREIGN TYRANNY WILL NOT STAND IN THE FACE OF THE GLORIOUS REPUBLIC. HAHAHAHAHAH. THE HIERARCH WALKS THE LANDS IF THE SERENITY FACE DEATH AND KNOW THAT WE ARE ALL FREE.

The Tyrant is laughing his ass off right now. I am as well

The bard's Aspects fucking terrify me in this setting hily shit. She has been a rather practical Guide to The evil.

The dwarves have come to party. Lets gooo

THE TOMB MAKER IS HERE BITCHESSSSS AHAHAHAHAHA GET FUCKED. SA VERDE DEAD KING?

God damnit Cordelia if you fuck thus up i swear to god.

zenanii

Nah, she has Agnes letter to tell her to get her shit together, I think we'll be fine.

medailyfun

Yeah, I bet Agnes wrote something like "break that thingy over your knee", we will see though 😊

shikkarasu

I'm expecting her to have told Cordelia when to fire it. If she does it for the wrong reason, it won't work or she will get herself smote. If she does it for the right reason, (and after the Choir has recovered) then they will work with her.

They only answer Yes or No.

The issue is that if she reads the letter too soon, then she's firing a superweapon because she thinks it will work. If she reads it at the right moment, she is putting faith in her cousin and/or whatever immediate reason crops up. The second one is laudable, but the first is hubris. Choirs are pretty predictable when it comes to that sort of distinction.

aurikdomi

Imma venture the letter says some variation of "Don't" because Yara is back in business with being able to control the blast and is going to twist the story to make it seem like to Cordelia they have lost and she has to fire it NoWwWw.

ninegardens

Good old Agnes, shitting on Wandering Bards day, just one last time.

Crash

You love to see it!

Cpt. Obvious

And being dead there is no thread to pull or story to hijack, if WB even still have the ability to do so.

There's still stories tied to the Elamal (sp?) but without a named around there's no one for the Bard to manipulate.

She can however pull levers to make the war spill outside of the walls of Keter and make it look bad enough Cordelia truly believes all is lost and brings down the hammer of Justice, unbeknownst to her empowered by the now released choir of Justice.

Which would be bad for all of Calernia and not just half of it like Cordelia believes.

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

I just realized this about Anaxares. He's basically Escanor from Seven Deadly Sins.

Juff

Typo thread:

of Aoede if Nicae > Aoede of Nicae could tolerate > could not tolerate was no unpleasant > was not unpleasant only at then > only then (or at ten) set it > set in

save lines > save lives
Ad now > And now full must > full muster clumsy hacked > clumsily hacked say about. > say about it.
sorcerers found > sorceress found follower > followed god that within > god within moment where > moment when not the last > now the last

ohJohN

there's a second sorcerers > sorceress

Gabe Meadow

Deep excellent everything from EE!

– Yara of Nowhere is not yet out of the game, and we got her three Aspects named. We also got to learn very informative stuff about the Choirs. Essentially, they have some capacity to adapt, but it only goes so far. Confirmation on their lack of nuance explains their seeming hypocritical or immoral behavior, and why the Choirs are paired with dedicated heroic Named, to help compensate for that. Note: this also makes it clear the issue with Hanno as White Knight. In the search for clarity, he abdicated judgement to Judgement, thereby failing to perform his lower-case role.

– Well, we know why the Dead King couldn't just turtle up in the Serenity, not when the Bard could do shit like this. Anaraxes is about to restart the trials!

– The Sword is broken, and the Firstborn are not holding back any more. The Tomb-Maker made an oath, and he fulfilled it. One could say the Tomb-Maker has become a tomb-breaker.

– Bellephron. No words. Anaraxes' countrymen one and all.

– Our MacGuffin bearers trundle onward.

– I think we just got a whole lot more context to the Herald of the Deeps, and moreover why the dwarves act the way they do. If Greed is a fundamental aspect (lower-case) of their nature, no wonder they said "Only dwarves can own property." It makes it much easier to justify actions taken in pursuit of their own Greed. But they can learn. They can do better.

– And Cordelia does what she made it clear she would, be ready to use the ealamal in the worst-case scenario. But perhaps, when she thinks she may need to do so, that is why she'll check Agnes' note and it'll tell her she doesn't need to do it.

nimelennar

I don't think the note will tell her she doesn't NEED to do it; I think it'll tell her it won't work properly (see: the Intercessor meddling with the Seraphim, robbing them of power for a day). Now, what happens to a broken doomsday weapon is an open question.

Reader in the Night

I think with the Choir being out of commission, Yara can hijack the weapon.

nimelennar

That's one possible scenario; another is that the targeting mechanism has now been removed, and it won't spare those who Judgement likes (i.e. it'll murder EVERYONE in range).

John

Another possible scenario is that holy Light without Judgement will spare everybody, and just cleanse the land of the magical radioactive waste all over the place, turning the former lands of Keter into a new continental breadbox.

Lord Haart

Yeah we know Yara hates DK and Cat and herself and cats little for others but her endgame isn't 100% clear yet.

Liliet

If the note is technical information, there's no reason for Agnes to tell Cordelia to only read it later. No, it'll be instructions.

ByVectron!

OMG, if the Dead King lays claim to the Bellopheron casualties (of which three are a fee thorne fresh ones,) that gives Anaraxes the right to become involved, as they are his people.

ByVectron!

...of which there are a few thousand fresh ones...

Rey d`Tutto

You forgot
"Thanks, Autocorrupt!"

ByVectron!

I used to call them "Swypos," but I don't use Swype anymore, so autocorrupt it is!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

You also misspelled "Bellerophon," but so does everyone. It's a bit of a tricky word to spell I suppose.

AviKav

> Note: this also makes it clear the issue with Hanno as White Knight.

I don't remember this. When was it mentioned?

dadycoool

Well, when Choirs empower mortal Heroes, they're using the Hero's morals as a basis for how to go about doing Good, i.e. how to do their job properly. Hanno was essentially given the reins to a horse and then proceeded to put the reins in the horse's own mouth.

At least, that's how I understand it.

medailyfun

well, he was deciding when to toss the coin and when keep it pocketed, so the analogy is not thorough.

Liliet

I think the angels had enough access to his thought process to model their decisions off it.

AviKav

I got that. My question is that the quoted comment implies it was mentioned earlier that they had issue with Hanno as the White Knight, but where was it?

Daniel E

Wander, over yonder. Don't forget to wear your hat.

nimelennar

The Dwarves dug too greedily and too deep. You know what they awoke in the darkness of Khazad-dûm... shadow and flame.

erinexa

CLASSIC dwarves

caoimhinh

Yeah, but Sargon found friendly Balrogs and used the power of friendship to direct them against Keter.

So it's ok.

Dome Zasrekh

incoherent noises of happiness

Abrakadabra

We do not fear what lies beneath, We can never dig too deep!
I am a dwarf and I'm digging a hole!

Mary Gentle

Bellerophon rocks. And so does its Diplomat.
And Rumena. And the Herald of the Deeps. Very, very visual, that last one. Maybe because I've been watching Fagradalsfjall erupt in Iceland, on livecam, last year – but I could see every bit of magma.

Trying to work out if Bellerophon made its advance before or after the Sword of the Rest got broken...

There goes the Severance, And the Crown of Autumn.

And, ah, isn't there some kind of Chekhov's Rule that says if you have a dead Angel in a lake in the first Act, it has to be fired off by Act 3?

Pretty please?

No, I don't want to blow the continent up. I just want to know what HAPPENS when an angel goes boom...

Next up, Catherine? Or more surprises?

(No, it's not a cliffhanger. I never had any fingernails to start with...)

Darkening

Sounds like she broke the sword before the battle started.

Mary Gentle

Bellerophon might have benefitted from that, then. The story-shape of an army of shopkeepers (if you will) being sent against impossible odds, and breaking through by sheer bloody minded determination.

Vernal_ancient

Maybe, but that's usually a heroic story, and only the villainous ones were contained

Abrakadabra

But they are mostly a below aligned city if only because they shit on any divine plan that is not made by the people.

I am also very satisfied with finally seeing them act against the greatest tyrant in existence.

Rey d`Tutto

The first offensive was a debacle.

The second offensive was a draw.

Now the Sword of the Rest has broken, and evil Tories take hold.

Rule of Three gonna be a B*tch for Nashimah.

Kletanio

The rule of Three:

Evil Tories, Neutral Labour, and Heroic Lib Dems

D

Nah. LD are fundamentally centrists, even if the gradual shift to the right in recent years has made them letter by comparison.

For that real "better intentions than the villains, but with an occasional tendency to self-righteousness and being blinded by their ideas of the Greater Good" flavour, the Heroes should be the Greens. They're even the embattled minority struggling to Save The World against overwhelming opposition.

erebus42

As I said before Bellerophon only really has the one Story but it's THEIR story. I believe that because of this, all of their faith and narrative weight is more concentrated than other states and nations which is why the Heirarch is as potent as he is.

ByVectron!

Well, that's certainly everything coming together, isn't it? Do we know what the impact of Anaxares actions will be? I'm struggling to see an immediate effect, though I'm sure it's terrible and awesome (in the "impressive fear" way.)

Jstj

We actually see the immediate effect right this chapter, in the League section: DK is being much more aggressive now, because he is cornered. His failsafe in case even Keter fell was escaping into the Serenity, and now that's gone.

jamesc9

I think that, because of story-fu, the Dead King can't fight a war on two fronts.

I think that he's trying to dispose of the Grand Alliance quickly, so he can switch to the Hierarch.

Rey d`Tutto

Awesome, meaning full of Awe, not meaning relatively cool. That's been a pet peeve of mine since the 6th grade.

ruduen

One small correct guess in a sea of them, but...

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/08/31/chapter-35-catch/#comment-94040>

I'm happy I hit that one!

Liliet

Nice!!!!

Rey d`Tutto

Narrate FTW!

sengachi

Well done!

Adrian_V

With a title like Legends we knew it would be awesome and it totally was!!!

It may be Bard's plan but you have to give credit to Anaxares since apparently he is actually hurting old Nessy, like Basilia noted in the POV.

I wonder what other POV we will see?

magnumicec

Wait. Just noticed something. The Drow are using Night. At dawn.

OMG OMG Masego must have removed that weakness as well.

Sethur

Weren't they always strongest during the twilight anyway? As the name of their language – crepuscular – implies, the Drow are beings of twilight. But maybe I am misremembering and they were strongest during dusk and weakest during dawn... Damn, Cat explained this during/after the Princes' Graveyard, but I can't remember and I am too lazy to look for it right now. 😊

magnumicec

Uh no. Akua outright stated that dawn was when the Drow were the weakest, as 'Dawn is the death of the Night'. It's in Book 5 Chapter 3. And during the day, Drow can't use Night. Only Cat could, and even then she was weakened quite a bit. It's why the Drow only fight at night.

Tariq used this weakness to knock out the Drow with his sun back in the Graveyard, remember?

Adrian_V

Actually i think it was mentioned some Mighty could still fight during the day, but basically only the strongest.

Maybe is a case of fighting in the shade? xD, Or Sve Noc being close or even their new godhead. I mean now Night is more equivalent to Light (as in a real miracle) and light could always be used at any time of the day or night

Sugar Roll

I don't think it's a big weakness. Drow fighting in the morning is like humans fighting at night. They may not be fighting at full strength but it's still good enough.

Liliet

They used to literally get knocked out for a mandatory naptime for a few hours at dawn

Adrian_V

I think that was only the weakest, wich is most of all, like the strongest Mighty were capable of fighting in day

Sugar Roll

And that was before Sve Noc's true apotheosis. It's possible the weakness no longer exist.

Rey_d`Tutto

It feels/seems like with Night 1.0 (prior version was pre-release) the weaknesses and flaws were smothered. Now the Dead King can't pervert workings, the weak won't have access to Night during the day, but the powerful aren't hindered by sunlight.

Liliet

The mandatory naptime was only for a couple hours, that wouldn't even be day yet.

Lord Haart

I think it's removed actually because Night is now a mirror to Light and Light works fine at any time of day.

Sun/Stars can still 'boost' light in specific ways but are not requisite at all.

arcanavita¹⁵

We just learned so much in this chapter Yara's aspects and how Angles work, also it's implied that not all angles function the same or have the same origins. Bellerophon coming in clutch with their soldiers and dude who is no longer in the sky. We learned that dwarves did indeed dig too deep and they possess a great and terrible Greed, also Herlad seems to be trying to become a shaman instead of a binder and trying to do better. Akua and Archer have the crown of autumn, and Cordelia has her McGuffin. Drow and Orcs just charging at the gates reeking stuff(RUMENA!!!!). I wonder what the elf are doing. And most terrifyingly of all Cat is nowhere in sight.

Rey d`Tutto

Angels.

Geometry is not an important aspect of this metanarrative.

Angel, not angle.

Sorry, btw. I just have issues with Trigonometry

dadycool

But what if it is? Maybe math and "coming at the problem sideways" is exactly Nessie's weakness.

Rey d`Tutto

Hierophant would agree with you, as would Akua, but I'm taking Cat's side in this debate.

Stabbing works, unless it doesn't, which probably means you need more stabbing.

xanthir

Ahhh actually it's spelled "Trismestigus"

jamesc9

That was punny.

Lord Haart

I'm reading Herald as Herlad until the end of the story now...

Syphax1

All glory to Bellerophon, peerless in courage and resolve. May all tyrants tremble.

Rey d`Tutto

They Voted.

Those glorious b@$tards Voted.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

For A Practical Guide to Evil on topwebfiction?

Mirror Night

Yara makes her move by sending Anaxares to Serenity (clever move there I suppose). I still think its absurd Anaxares can do what he can do in sealing a whole Choir. Takes out the Choir for a whole day be interesting to see how that impacts Cordelia's Weapon.

Hanno and MK with Severence, I mean MK is slow for a Named which is kinda funny since his increasing physical stats should make him faster as well. Now Hanno is absurdly fast even Nameless but he is the exception not the rule. And Hanno guarding MK is just funny.

Indrani and Akua with the crown of Autumn is a fun pairing.

Dwarf Lore now that is some interesting stuff. DK is getting jumped from all sides.

Cat turned back on the Villainous Stories. Be interesting to see how all this goes together.

Liliet

Nameless Hanno bodyguarding THE MIRROR FUCKING KNIGHT is peak comedy

Mirror Night

Yeah but Christophe and Hanno aren't really a comedy duo. Especially with Christophe being less of a dumbass. Though you kinda get the feeling that what Christophe is asking especially after Hanno beat up with a waning Name (not sure Christophe knew about that) is why the frak aren't you the one using the Sword so I can go help the troops. Would have been nice to have a convo about.

Liliet

Yeah it's more the abstract sort of comedy.

But yeah Christophe is definitely feeling the question of "what purpose, exactly, am I serving in this arrangement"

braxen1

I thought of it more as him guarding the Sword from the Mirror Knight rather than guarding the Mirror Knight himself. No one is worried about Christophe dying in this battle, but they are worried he does something Stupid Good like use the Serenity to save the ranks. Hanno is there to keep him on track.

Liliet

It's Hanno's narration saying he's there to make sure DK doesn't kill Christophe, isn't it?

D

Just because that's how Hanno conceptualises it doesn't necessarily mean that's the real reason, especially if it was at Cat's arrangement. Giving him an accurate but incomplete reason that will motivate him better than something that might be framed as antagonistic is exactly the kind of thing she might do.

Mirror Night

My point is more I think Christophe is wondering why Hanno doesn't have the Sword so he can go help the rank and file... or barring that cause they are saving all the valuable Named for special missions, Christophe would probably feel much more comfortable if Hanno had the Sword and he was playing Bodyguard. Since Christophe knows that at his height and high off massacring Demons and Devils that Hanno still crushed him in combat (And Hanno was at a weak point then funny enough).

Its a very weird role reversal for it to be like this especially since Hanno is technically Christophe's Boss. So its funny from a metatextual out of universe prospective but not in universe.

erebus42

RUMENA! RUMENA! RUMENA! That's right the Drow aren't beings to fuck with!

Resurrecting the Hierarch and tossing him into the immortal tyrant's fallback hell was inspired.

The walls are definitely closing in on Nessie, though I'm concerned about what kinds of horrific in-case-of-emergency-break-glass failsafes he may start throwing out now that the end seems nigh.

Mary Gentle

I'm also concerned – in a “damn I can't wait to see this!” way.

I did start reading this because I like villains, and the Dead King seems to have had ultimate villain status thrust upon him.

...Which does make me wonder if breaking the Sword of the Rest is actually going to backfire, for Cat? If those stories empower villains, there are lots of our guys who are no longer maybe quite villainous to benefit from that. But the Dead King should benefit, because there are no arguments about him being a bad guy...

Mirror Night

I think part of it depends on if DK notices it broke or when he notices it breaks.

Still we got a lot of stuff going on where the mechanics are not clear to the reader so its hard to tell how any of this works together. I am sure EE can bring it to a satisfying conclusion its just not clear at all how all these power systems and narrative stuff works together.

Hargabga

I dunno. When WB silenced Evil stories, that caused DK to get such an upper hand, the chapter was called End Days. Now that Evil stories are no more, Neshamah could just break loose and go all out. Or, say, run away.

Liliet

You mean now that Evil stories are back?

irritantseraphim

They not only empower villains, they force some rules on the engagement.

Without Belows stories, the Dead King could pull out all stops with no repercussions from fate. With the stories back on, that gets his fingers burned.

Sam

Villainous stories end in defeat. That's the whole point of re-activating them now.

Sir Nil

Anaxares could keep a Choir checked.

What chance does the Dead King have when he is in the Serenity?

erebus42

Hierarch is a particularly deadly knife to someone like the Dead King. Perhaps if he had seen him coming and had time to prepare he might have been able to come up with something to counter him. However as things stand -with his attention and resources divided as they are now- I doubt he'd chance a direct confrontation (which certainly screws him in regards to a viable retreat strategy)

Rey d`Tutto

How can he retreat when the Serenity becomes just another hell?

erebus42

It would certainly be a tad problematic. I suppose he might try his luck with running away to a different hell.

BargleNawdleZouss

So, Catherine is off to sneak behind enemy lines using Ranger's secret pathway. Hierophant is probably with them. We know that Hakram, Indrani, and Akua are NOT. Who are the other two members of this band?

If this is purely a Team Evil group, then I'm guessing Red Knight (mass destruction, meat shield) and Grave Binder (stealth vs. the undead), as hopefully Barrow Sword is off leading a team of his own. Headhunter is also a likely candidate. I know Catherine likes Harrowed Witch, but I'm not sure if Aspasia's nerves are up to this. As hidden backup, I'm hoping that Ivah, and maybe some of the new Apostles of Night, are trailing along.

If the final two members are Heroes, then my guesses are Painted Knife (stealth) and Silent Guardian (meat shield). I imagine that Catherine still doesn't want to team up with Arthur for Story reasons; Silver Huntress and Ranger in the same group is a BAD idea; Valiant Champion is an equally bad choice re: Catherine; and of course the Blessed Artificer and Masego on the same team while trying to be stealthy is a big ask. I will be VERY surprised if Vivienne joins the team for this jaunt.

Liliet

Alexis and Indrani get along fine now, and also Indrani's with Akua

BargleNawdleZouss

Yes, it's Alexis and Hye Su that would be a poor choice as teammates.

Liliet

Ohhhhhhhhh

oh wow I want to see that it would be S00000 awkward (especially given i kind of have no doubt that Hye is proud of her and wears those scars like decorations, and was only thrown by not actually being killed in the process)

Liliet

Hye, into the air in Alexis's general vicinity: you know, there's nothing wrong with killing people if you hate them and think they're doing the wrong thing. that's a normal thing for heroes to do, or so i heard

Alexis: walks faster

Mirror Night

I mean in terms of a purely Villainous Team. That mostly checks out considering that Barrow and Grave Binder get bonuses against Undead. Red Knight makes a good tank. Headhunter seems an okay 6th ranger I suppose.

As for Heroic Team, I would assume you want to take a light based damage dealer so Blessed and a Healer at least. Painted Knife is tricky so a good 6th ranger.

rumenawins thinking they brought Hierophant. Maybe Painted Knife and Blessed Artificer. I could see either Red Knight or Valiant Champion going with them.

BargleNawdleZouss

I can't ever see Valiant Champion on a team with Catherine. If Hanno is bodyguarding Mirror Knight, then my guess is that Valiant Champion is doing the same for the Witch Of The Woods.

Eris

Dannngg. Everything with Bellerophon is my favorite. The arc with the Hierarch was the best ever and I want to see more of Bellerophon's ridiculous stubborn democracy.

Rey d`Tutto

You are a "Tolkien Herbert Heinlein Jordan" level writer.
Thank you.

kaedonbolas

What side is Yara on? Because I can't figure out if Anaxares is meant to hurt Keter, Catherine, or yes.

Also, is anyone else waiting for the gnomes to appear?

zenanii

I think he is meant to help the offensive.
My theory is that Yara is bound by rules that stops her from doing stuff like "destroy everything", so to accomplish her goals she has to make them a side-effect of her following said rules.

jamesc9

I wonder if she understands the conditions under which the Gods Above and Below will cancel Creation and start a new one. If so, avoiding that is probably another constraint on her actions.

I wonder if there's an internal connection between the gnomes and the Gods.

Lord Haart

I would think restarting everything would be a potential goal for sure. She wants to die after all, and to take Nessie and Cat with her.

Or maybe she wants one of them to take her place and if Cat won't, is expecting Nessie will.

BargleNawdleZouss

Yes, I'm awaiting the gnomes (extremely unlikely – not seeing "technology"), and the two foreign empires who pitched in to help defeat Dread Empress Triumphant: the Baalites and the Yan Tei. As there's been no mention of diplomatic contact with them, nor any hints from Catherine's WardenVision(tm), I expect my hopes will be dashed for all three of these groups.

Liliet

I believe Yara is on Catherine's side against Neshamah here, ultimately, but also having been on Catherine's side all along hasn't stopped her from fucking her over so far, so how much that counts for is an open question...

daegone823

One Bind Zombie to another

This is madness they MARCH this whole way just to turn around Bellophron Soldiers- MADness...? This is Bellophron

cremadiscampi

"Delay = amazing chapter" still holds Bellerophans are crazy. I love them.

nick012000

Man, so many fascinating little insights in this chapter, into some of the fundamental cosmological aspects of the setting, like the nature of Angel's and their relationship with humans, the nature of the Aspects of Named (which seem to be some sort of divine authority), and the nature of Dwarves, which seems like it might be related to the hunger of Dragons.

dadycool

And so we finally learn Yara's Aspects. Narrate, Wander, and Guide. She's right about how each of them is far more terrible than the ones before. I wonder who she's trying to ruin this time.

Oh. Oh dear. We could all see this coming when she said to send him to a hell, but man. Way to put a lit match in a haystack, Yara.

Rumena's segment was magnificent. Now the Firstborn can finally sate their unending hunger for death.

It really is the hardest part of any battle, standing there doing nothing. Especially if you're used to actually doing a lot to mitigate things like mass slaughter.

Such a simple statement, yet one clad in iron: "They voted on it." those madmen would march through all hells without flinching if the majority said that they would do it, and now they've proven it. This is also probably the first visible effect of Cat breaking the Sword of the Rest. Scales are being leaned on and the Big Bad is having his Third Act Breakdown.

Poor Akua. Being handed divinity should not feel as mundane as it does, especially the whole “carrying it around in a backpack” part.

The Herald segment was beautiful and emotionally powerful. I legit cried at the Spirits, especially his first love, coming to help because he asked them to. A wonderful climax to the chapter.

It ends on a foreboding note, but Cordy’s right, to an extent. She can’t risk them losing here, even if Above is bending over backwards to ensure their victory. Let’s just hope none of her guards are imposters and that it won’t get “corrupted” or fired “accidentally”.

Liliet

Akua’s troubles are THE funniest part of the chapter, and they have to contend with Hanno bodyguarding Christophe, there.

dadycool

Ugh, she gave me ANOTHER divinity. Now I gotta lug it all the way through the city, avoiding any hotspots, while keeping myself and Archer cloaked so we’re not spotted.

Crash

It’s the repeats that get you, really.

She keeps getting handed everything she ever wanted and Cat keeps acting like it’s no big deal. Every time Akua has to take a moment to think about it and have the same internal monologue about trust and actions that generate opposite reactions.

” It was sadly typical of Catherine to keep tossing her the keys to divinity like they were loose change from her pocket. Also as usual, the unthinking display of trust had Akua at war between feeling tenderness and fury.”

And this time? this time it’s in a backpack. Hilarious.

Liliet

And Akua still can’t fucking reconcile it with her worldview! Neither that nor the experience of having friends. Vexing.

Crash

Speaking of, that was great. Ending Akua’s section with “and she followed her friend”.

Made me smile, not gonna lie. It's the small things in life.

Liliet

Akua is not even arguing with herself at this point, she just really doesn't know how to narrate what's going on, the poor dear.

jack

Gods below, the Bellerophons are nuts.

I mean, I new that before, but fucking hell.

Gynedroid

Right so I'm feeling a deep sense of terror that Yara just "tricked" the Tribunal into being "out for the day" when it's THE LAST DAY. If judgment's wiped and judgment is called on...what's going to happen with the ealamal now? Is it just power entirely uncontested in Yara's hands? Absolutely useless?

Holding out hope for Agnes's words of wisdom

ohJohN

Well, Cordy has used it before (but sounds like on a smaller scale) while the Seraphim were incapacitated by Hierarch. Yara drew the comparison (which does make me immediately distrust it tbh) that it was functionally equivalent if they were incapacitated due to ejecting the Hierarch or due to continuing their stalemate with him. So it seems kinda like it would work as before, but on a larger scale?

Also, wasn't the big reveal from Painted Knife & Co.'s Big Brocelian Brawl that Yara could 'trick' the senses of angels? Does that still work if you're just juicing power from one's corpse while the rest are out of commission? We're told angels can't really die, but the ealamal hasn't been shown to have... awareness, or perception, in the way the rest of the Choir has, so are there even any senses to trick? (Well, I suppose so, since the previous firings did kill thousands of people judged "bad", implying some ability to perceive and judge people inherent to the power.)

spencer

Why is a three-legged day likely to get you killed? Is this a wasteland proverb?

ninegardens

When you SEE the three legged cat, it might be cute/endering in a pitiful kind of manner... but one of these days, the cat is going to fuck up and take a tumble, and that missing legger is going to COST it.

jack

“even war cries petering out at the sight of such atrocious bravery.” is such a raw line.

Atrocious bravery.

Kojo

So as an aside, Are there going to be as many Named rulers in Cat and Viv’s descendants as were in the last two Callowan dynasties? As I understand it, about 1 in 2 rulers were named in callow (I could be wrong) but that was with Preas and Procer breathing down their necks. Now, without the Dread Empress/Emperor, and the Warden in Cardinal, would the next dynasty have roughly the same occurrences of Named rulers?

BargleNawdleZouss

Upcoming Crowning Moments of Awesome:

1. Archer or Silver Huntress FINALLY putting down The Hawk.
2. Arthur debuting the Peregrine Sword in spectacular fashion.
3. Sapan finally coming into her permanent Name as the insert color here Mage.
4. Kreios doing another Holy Shit-level of eldritch arcane what-the-fuckery.
5. The elves’ Emerald Swords finally doing something to help out.
6. Hanno coming into his (new?) Name.

Each of these alone deserves a full chapter of build up and delivery, don’t you think? 😊

Crash

Hearld of the Deeps like “I started a kingdom-ending civil war, you best believe I’m marrying this man.”

The ultimate mad lad.

Pandacrator

So... It has probably been said already but I just noticed that the weapons meant to beat the Dead King are all parts of Catherine’s family banner: The sword and the crown being the Severance and the Crown of Autumn, and the scale on which they balance being the Staff of the Ealamal.

Lord Haart

I did not realize that – fantastic foreshadowing!

lenethren

Love this chapter. Excited to see what happens next.

ninegardens

This is your Annual reminder that Anaraxes the diplomat had visions of the Serenity directly after getting his name, all the way back in the epilouge of book three.

He also had a delightful conversation with Agnes Hasenbach, who is, as always, a treasure.

Bart_KF

Hail the Republic of Motherfucking Bellerophon.

DC

The first time I read this, it was like..."oh those wacky Bellerophans and their silly suicidal ways."

The second time, I realised that while they might be crazy, they're not stupid. They knew what they were voting for. Alone of every army on the field, they went in without a structure compelling them or a lord commanding them; they could have turned and left or simply held position without consequence, but they voted not to.

Mind you, they waited until Penthes got mauled, but they're a pack of Wicked Foreign Devils anyway.

Interlude: Legends II

"The army of Tenerife encamped by the banks of the Blue Ribbon, making fires, and the sight of their multitude troubled Theodosius' captains. Daphne of Penthes, most respected among them, argued that they should seek aid from Nicae rather than give battle. 'They are as many Procerans as there are grains of sand,' she said. Theodosius refused. 'Then like so much sand we will scatter them before us,' he replied."

– Extract from 'The Banquet of Follies, or, A Comprehensive History of the First League War' by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

The Warlord charged, and all that stood before him shattered.

His shoulder hit a shield wall bristling with pikes and blades and he broke straight through, a tide of warriors pouring in behind him as the dead were swept away by the wrath of the Clans. He did not slow. Ghouls burst out of the ground, buried under the rock, but his footing was sure and they were all frail. His axe swung and flesh gave, blood spurted, screams filled the air. Hakram felt his blood thundering in his ears like the beat of a drum. Felt the rhythm echo in the fifty thousand souls trailing in his wake as he roared, leaping up to smash a beorn's leering maw with his shield. The beast fell and he hacked at its flesh, discarding the shield when it took too many arrows and roaring again as his axe split the beorn's skull and the creature fell.

Great stones had been pulled into the way as chunks of wall to stop their charge up the avenue, monsters in the shape of massive corpse-fat snails released swarms of poisonous flies from their bone shells and skeletons the height of then men scythed through ranks with massive hammers, but it was not enough. The drow that had broken the gates for him, still shadowing his armies on the sides, filled the air with fire and curses that ate away the swarms. The Warlord's steel fist hit the stone in front of him once, twice, thrice – and on the third the stone shattered in two. They clawed and pushed their way through, tearing into the dead as swarming the great skeletons until they were toppled down and taken apart on the ground like wounded beasts.

Yesterday he had failed to take the gate, left Catherine and the Procerans to hang, but today the Clans would remind Calernia why it had once trembled at the coming of a Horde.

The world was slowly turning red. The Warlord saw only in bursts, as if he was flitting in and out of consciousness, his Name carrying him like a river. Lead, it sang, and so the warriors of the Clans thundered down the avenue with him. A Revenant stood before him but he shoved his dead hand down the throat and ripped off the head from the inside, its fangs clattering uselessly on his scorched plate. Magic came down from above in curtains but he charged through it, sorcery dripping on armour like rain, and once through he barrelled into the enemy's retreating ranks. A wyrm spasmed across the avenue, swarmed by the silhouettes of Mighty, as the Warlord and his warriors pulled it down with ropes and harpoons.

Then it was a hulking shape of steel, a great armour held together by the dead remains of a Name. The Prince of Bones shattered the tiles under them with a stomp, but the Warlord only roared as his axe dented the sternly frowning mask covering the Scourge's face. It was strong as a monster was strong, the sweeps of its broadsword whistling through the air but still too slow. The Warlord stepped around the blows and struck, hacking away at the layers of steel until his axe was little more than scrap, and after that he caught the Scourge's arm to take its own greatsword. Only when it came to strength he was outmatched, the Revenant unmoving as the Warlord's feet were pushed back through broken tiles. The Warlord roared again, but from the corner of his eye he saw the Scourge's free hand moving. A slap, he thought, that would be enough to spill his brains all over the stone.

Until it was caught, a stooped old drow shivered into existence and grabbing a single finger.

"My turn," Rumena the Tomb-maker said, and struck with its free hand.

The Warlord grunted with effort, holding the Prince of Bones in place so he could not avoid the blow, and there was a great scream of metal before a wet crunch. The orc watched with muted disbelief as the Scourge's head, a ball of metal, toppled to the ground. But there is no bone, the Warlord saw. The head was a decoy. A heartbeat later a mass of lightning came down on their heads, the Tumult's hatred unleashed, and even as Rumena formed a sphere of Night around them the Warlord felt the Prince of Bones slipping away. He struggled to hold the Scourge in place but the Prince's might was implacable and his fingers scrabbled down the steel, until at last they found purchase.

When the storm of lightning ended and the Tomb-maker ended its working there was no trace of the Prince of Bones, but Hakram Deadhand held in his grasp the Scourge's own greatsword as a prize. Dead fingers closing around it, the Warlord began to feel the red bleeding out of him. His breath slowed, and he began to feel the collection of wounds that covered his body.

"They retreated to the inner wall," Rumena said.

"We're close," Hakram replied, and was surprised to find that true.

They had pushed two thirds of the way up the avenue, far faster than he'd believed they would.

"Can your sigils take the rampart, Deadhand?" the drow general asked.

"No," he admitted with a grimace. "We don't have the siege for it. Once we hit the inner city we'll head north, try to link up with the Praesi."

"I will leave sigils behind," Rumena nodded.

"And you?" Hakram asked.

The creased old Firstborn grinned, the ochre and gold on its lips pulling up.

"I hunt," the Tomb-maker replied.

—

General Abigail Tanner had been looking for the way out since she'd come in and it had been a little disheartening when she'd realized all the possibilities were literal dead ends. With her luck the bloody Dead King would get her, too, and unlike the Black Queen didn't even have the decency to pay his officers. Stuck fighting forever without even a retirement fund? She'd rather die.

In, uh, a different way.

This whole Keter business had been awful, really. Not only were the soldiers in between her and Revenants dying at a frankly alarming rate, but for some reason the Third Army kept getting into the worst of it. It was like being forcefully saddled to a horse that kept looking for cliffs to leap down from. Even Boots, her perfidious old ass of a horse, didn't intend to go down with her when it tried to shake her off to her death.

Abigail couldn't even blame him for that. The horse had correctly figured out she was the reason he kept getting into situations where people shot at him, so in a sense she did have it coming. The part of this mess that absolutely did drive her up the wall, though, was she'd somehow ended up leading the vanguard of the Army of Callow again. How, when? She'd tricked General Holt into taking the lead this time and somehow she was still at the tip of the spear again.

"It must be a curse," she muttered. "I know I haven't gone to a sermon in a while, but isn't that why you bribe the Crows?"

"You said something, ma'am?" Staff Tribune Krolem asked.

The bulky orc looked at her expectantly.

"I was asking about the word from Marshal Juniper," Abigail hurriedly replied.

"She commends you on the initiative and gives you free rein to lead the Third forward as you please," Krolem proudly said, flashing his fangs.

Fucking Hellhound, the dark-haired woman uncharitably thought, hanging her a length of rope and surely it was a coincidence she was already standing next to gallows. Abigail had long been aware that the world was unfair — come on, you only had to see how well

Ellie Bilkers had married while being such a witch to know that – but it was a little much to find out that even now the world wasn't unfair in her favour. She was a noble now! Lady Abigail Tanner, even if the name was one she'd come up with in a panic when she'd realized she'd procrastinated until she was due to give an answer to the adjunct secretariat. Not only some noble but a general on top of it too!

She should be going around in goddamn palanquins all the time while people threw themselves at arrows to bring glory to her name. Instead she was stuck going around on a miserable old horse, under a banner like she was just asking to get shot, and-

Panes of magic flared into existence, glowing blue, and caught the three crossbow bolts that would have punched through her skull.

Abigail wished she could say it was even just the tenth time the dead had tried that today. At this rate she'd die a porcupine and they'd bury her as bloody Lady Arrowcatch. Krolem, Gods bless his soul, began shouting and growling until mages blew up the rooftop she'd been shot at from in a volley of fireballs.

"I think it was as a Revenant this time, ma'am," the orc said with disturbing eagerness. "Think it might have been the Hawk?"

Abigail figured not, on account of her distinct lack of arrow in the head, but she figured she'd let him have his fun.

"Could be," she grunted. "Now, Tribune, what was it you were telling me about the League's push again?"

The Grand Alliance strategy for the assault was straightforward, looked at on a large scale. There were four gates, one for every cardinal direction – wait, was that why the Black Queen was naming her mad city out in the mountains Cardinal? Shit, she'd just got that, why had no one told her before? – and there would be four thrusts at the inner city through them. Thrown on top of that was the breach in the southwestern wall that the Ram had built, which was the way through for the Army of Callow to do their own push.

Most of those attacks weren't actually meant to reach the heart of Keter, in practice. The Procerans through the south gate and the Praesi through the north one were the 'lucky' winners that needed to get there, the rest of the attacks elaborate manoeuvres to get the pressure off their flanks. The orcs and the drow were coming in from the west, the League from the east, and the Dominion was to follow after the Praesi and serve as their rear guard.

The Army of Callow's role was pretty simple: die over the same grounds as yesterday long enough that the Proceran left flank couldn't get smashed by there.

"They were delayed, general," Staff Tribune Krolem replied. "They ran into an entrenched position and were stalemated until the Bellerophans cleared it."

The Bellerophans had cleared it, Abigail skeptically thought. Well, she supposed if you had to throw corpses at corpses you might as well go with the folk that voted on chamber pot schedules.

"So they're staggered a bit, is what I'm hearing," she muttered. "It happens. The Warlord's pissing all over the opposition on the other side of the city, so I reckon it evens ou-"

Abigail's mouth closed. Beneath her, Boots began to edge closer to the wall hoping she was distracted. She pulled at the reins to disabuse the treacherous beast of the notion. Please, he'd tried to throw her at one headfirst already. Like she'd forget. My memory is at least twice as good as a horses', you fucker, she smugly thought. Yet the warm glow of her triumph retreated in the face of the ice that was welling up in her stomach as she tried to look at what the assault on Keter would look like from above.

She had no idea how well the Praesi were doing, but most their fortresses were still in the air so presumably not too badly. The Procerans had been doing pretty well too, their Lycaonese vanguard taking the hits for the rest of the army stoically so the conscripts wouldn't start routing too early. But if the League had been delayed on the Proceran right flank and the Army of Callow was getting stalled short of the avenue on its left, then something was up. And now that Abigail thought about it, weren't the orcs actually doing a little too well?

"Shit," Abigail cursed.

The Procerans were getting baited to pull ahead of the protection on their flanks. There was room enough to hide an army in the space between the League thrust and the Proceran one, if you kept the League out of the avenues for long enough, and the little voice that had kept Abigail alive through too many hellholes to count was quietly asking a question: if the Warlord's been doing so good 'cause he's smashing only half an army, then where's the other half?

Now, if Abigail had been trying to kill all of the Procerans she'd do it like this: bait them up, encircle them, then throw a bunch of expendables in the way of the forces that could relieve them. After that it was just a matter of hammering at the Principate's back for long enough that the levies routed and their formation went to shit. Considering the League was still far and the Army of Callow closest, that meant... The general went over the positions in her head, jaw tightening.

The Fifth under General Holt was trying to breach the barricades around the avenue head on while the First under General Bishara was going around by the west to flank the position, which meant the flanking force that'd pulled ahead to the east to begin flanking the barricades that way was the one that'd get those expendables thrown at.

"Krolem," Abigail said with calm that she did not feel. "Have goblins scale the houses to the east. I want to know if there's a force headed our way."

There was already fighting there, of course, but those were loose bands of dead. The Staff Tribune hurried off as Abigail leaned over to pretend she was patting Boots' mane, when in fact she was reaching for her saddlebag and getting out a flask she quickly took a few deep swallows from before putting it away. The brandy burned down her throat, even as panes of magic flared into existence again. Five arrows this time, huh. She was going to find out whatever mage it was that'd made this ward after the war and thrown gold at them until they made one she could carry everywhere at all times.

Krolem came back grinning, a sight that had been the herald of many a misery in Abigail Tanner's life.

"Battalions of heavily armoured skeletons and some mage cabals," the Staff Tribune announced. "They're moving to hold our right flank."

No, Abigail grimly thought, they were moving to prevent the Army of Callow from intervening when the Procerans got surrounded and butchered to the last. Like pigs in a pen, only fancier because Procer. Wine, maybe. Almost certainly cheese.

"I need someone to get to the Fourth Army," Abigail said. "General-"

Only, she realized with dawning horror, though the Fourth was behind her Third to serve as a reserve and so it'd only be right they take this on instead of her, they were too far behind. And though they were technically closer to the avenue that went from north to south across Keter, that wasn't where the reinforcements would need to be. They'd need someone covering their left so they could pivot their entire army to face the enemy coming from the right. Which meant the Third. Which meant her. And she couldn't even try to pass this off to someone else, because the Hellhound had just granted her permission to 'lead the Third forward as she would'.

Balls, she realized. If the Procerans all died and she could have intervened, she'd probably get court-martialed for it. Which meant losing her pension, and Abigail of Summerholm had not come out all the way to fucking Keter to lose her general's pension.

"Krolem," General Abigail sternly said.

The orc straightened up.

"Ma'am?"

"We're pushing east," she told him. "Our entire force. Someone tell the Fourth, we've got a greater good to pursue."

"Saving the battle?" the orc breathlessly asked.

A mansion in Laure and to be drunk every day until I die, Abigail mentally corrected.

"Yes," she lied.

—

"Bottoms up," Catherine said, and after clinking her vial with the Huntress' gulped it down whole.

The Concocter followed suit without the theatrics, rolling her yellow eyes at them instead, and the Range was already lying on the 'ground' that Masego had forged. They lay down, tossing away the vials, and within ten heartbeats Hierophant was surrounded by the corpses of four women. It was a somewhat awkward situation, he decided, even as he reached for the withered stalks of ground set down before him and closed his mortal eye, beginning to murmur his incantation.

He'd met the Silver Huntress and the Concocter in a professional capacity several times, and even once in a personal one when Indrani introduced him as her partner. Alexis had kindly offered him protection if he was being blackmailed into the relationship — which had, bafflingly enough, irritated Indrani — then looked rather irked herself when he'd assured her he was very fond of Archer and not being forced into anything. The Concocter had been much less mercurial, and charmingly learned in matters of alchemy. She'd even read the works of Lykourgos the Transmuter, which almost no one had! The man had unleashed several plagues that turned people into rabid animals, it was true, but that was no reason to ban his very well-written studies on transitive material properties.

Hierophant had not been worried in the slightest when he'd learned he was to be in a band with them, and they had proved to be just as capable as he'd expected. It was the last addition to the band that Catherine was leading that had nudged the situation into awkwardness: the Ranger, Hye Su. Looking at her temporarily dead form, Hierophant's mortal eye narrowed as he considered whether or not he should murder her.

Practically speaking, she was no longer necessary. She had some worth as a guide in the realm to which they were travelling but she was not needed. The Ranger had already given the necessary artefact, the stalks of grass, and served her purpose as a guide. It would be bad form and Catherine would be cross with him, but practicalities did not forbid him from killing Hye Su. No particular affection was holding his hand either, his fathers having always been clear that Ranger was not like Aunt Sabah and Aunt Eudokia: she was dangerous and not to be trusted, even if Uncle Amadeus loved her. Masego had only met her a few times, and never taken to her.

He drummed his fingers against his leg thoughtfully, the incantation continuing unabated.

Hye Su was a threat, of this he was sure. Catherine had been very vague as to how she'd convinced the other woman to help, which he knew from experience meant she was hiding something she believed they would disapprove of. Usually an unnecessary personal risk she was taking. Ripping out Ranger's soul while she was unconscious and casting it into a Hell before burning her body would see to that neatly. Killing out of fear, though, was wrong. People had to give you a reason, not just something you decided yourself. If the Ranger ended up being a threat, he could always kill her later.

Which forced Masego to confront why he was still itching to kill the woman: she had hurt someone he cared for. Indrani still spoke admiringly of Ranger to this day, but as far as Hierophant was concerned she had been unfit as a teacher and a guardian. That would not be enough to deserve death – both arms, perhaps – but Indrani's claim to the Name of Ranger was. There would be conflict there, possibly combat. And Indrani was not replaceable. His life would be less without her in it, which was a sufficient reason to incinerate Hye Su so thoroughly there were not even ashes left. And still he hesitated, not moving to kill until he finished the first incantation and grimaced.

"She would be angry with me if I did," Masego said. "Rightfully so. It is her conflict to resolve and it would be an insult to do so for her."

Which meant the Ranger would live. For now. Besides, he had other concerns at the moment. His task was not an easy one.

Keter was, after all, fortified against extra-dimensional intrusions in ways that no other place on Calernia was. It was not only a matter of wards, though those defending the Crown of the Dead had been cleverly made and were nearly impossible to break. The wards themselves were a sphere that enveloped the city but they fed into a root-like system of escapements that meant overloading them would require so much power as to be effectively impossible. Trismegistus had then taken an additional precaution by having the physical anchors for them deep underground, to the extent that Masego believed them to be surrounded by magma.

Yet not even that had been enough for the lich, who had at some point decided to methodically annihilate every speck of Keter's mirror in Arcadia. Not only was access barred, there was nowhere to cross from. Masego was unfortunately unsure quite how this had been accomplished – demons were his best guess – but instead of a crossing point in Arcadia all that could be found was interstitial void, an empty liminal space. It was how Masego knew for certain this had been done by the Dead King, as he had fought against the Spellblade inside a liminal space of fundamentally similar principles when he'd last come to Keter.

Accessing the void would normally have required setting foot within Keter, but Catherine said that would have been 'giving away the game' and instead they had passed through the broken shards of the Twilight Ways, requiring the Ranger's guidance to move from shard to shard while avoiding the collapsing ones or those with edges. Remaining forever trapped inside a pocket realm or being cut into several dying but forever aware parts would have been fairly likely otherwise, much as he disliked admitting that relying on Hye Su had been necessary.

Masego hummed, pulling his magic close and feeling out the edges of the Creation with his will. From there it was only a matter of following the outlines and seeing where they connected so that he might find where the Hells – and the Heavens – were adjoined. These were the very basics of diabolism as a practice, because in practice finding a Hell was not particularly difficult. Finding a useful one, or even more difficult a specific one, to open a gate into was another matter entirely. Unless you had several advantages, it was a fool's errand. Advantages such as, for example, casting from an adjoining liminal space where boundaries were thinned and having in your possession an object from the Hell you were seeking.

The dried stalks of grass in Hierophant's hand had grown in the Serenity, their connection to the Hell by the law of sympathy running deep and wide.

Masego began to murmur a second incantation, tracing runes in the air to shape the effect of his will – movement, transition, stability – but even as he began his attempt to cut a hole into the Hell he frowned as the resistance to his sorcery strengthened. As the Ranger had intimated, the Dead King had hardened the borders of the Serenity. However sharp Hierophant's will, a single mage – even Named – did not have the power to carve open a gate. A cabal led in a ritual might, but there would be nothing subtle or quiet about. But that was thinking of the crossing in the wrong way, as Hye Su had grasped.

When confronted with a wall a sorcerer could increase their strength to break it, but there was another way through: lessening the wall's resistance to you. And the very means the Dead King had used to harden the boundary of the Serenity, millennia of necromancy, provided the way through.

They simply needed to be dead.

It was why all the others were lying on the ground around him, having drunk of the Concocter's elixir of temporary death – save for Ranger, who simply stopped her heartbeat for a fixed amount of time – so that by creational law they would qualify as being 'dead'. Masego himself would drink of the potion vial he had in his robes as soon as the spell was near being finished, trusting the formula he had crafted to convey the five of them across into the Serenity. It was not long before he reached that point, diabolism being more a matter of precision and power than skill or inventiveness, and without ceremony he drank the substance. It tasted faintly of mint, he appreciated.

Even as his mind began to swim he felt the swirls of magic intensify, casting his will beyond them. He felt out the boundaries one last time, to make sure nothing had been wrong, which was when he noticed the oddity.

There was something wrong with the Heavens. Or at least a part of them intricately bound to the nearby part of Creation in several ways and also... the Serenity itself? It was a Choir, Hierophant realized. There was a similarity to what he was Witnessing and a spell he had crafted with Tariq Isbili's help. The smiting miracle, as some had taken to calling it. The Choir had been silenced, he saw, and though its power remained intact – angels could not be diminished – it was temporarily unable to be properly expressed. It was, essentially, a pot of paint without a colour. If called forth the Choir's power would do nothing, he thought, unless additional properties were imposed on it by a third party.

If someone chose a colour for the paint, to continue the metaphor.

Of course, there shouldn't be anyone able to do such a thing. Even Named would – only there was, he remembered. A band of five had been sent to follow the Dead King's hint in the depths of Levant and found a fascinating story. The first Grey Pilgrim had once been smote by a Choir, only to survive entirely unharmed. The Intercessor could influence angels. And so Hierophant felt an inkling of dread as he slipped into the shallow end of death.

Because if the Hierarch was still holding back the Choir of Judgement, why was he now able to feel its existence again?

—

Otto Redcrown took the blow on his shield with a grunt, the undead's blade sliding across the Reitzenberg sigil even as he shattered its head with a measured blow of his mace. His mount whinnied, hooves sending another corpse flying, and he had to pull her at her reins so she wouldn't go wild.

"Steady," he shouted, as much for his horse as his soldiers. "Don't let them bait you."

Those of his riders that'd began to pursue the retreating undead pulled back at the call, joining the thick of his men as they finished clearing out stragglers from the holdfast they'd driven the Enemy out of. It was not particularly dangerous work once the Binds were but down, the Bones reverting to the intelligence of mere dogs and lashing out blindly without regard for arms or armour, but the riders went about it with methodical carefulness. They all knew it would take only one mistake, and this close to finally ending the King of Death all their lives must be hoarded until the moment where they could best be spent.

Behind the horsemen his infantry had followed and was already breaking down the barricades to make room for the southern foot to pass, rolling away stones and tossing bodies aside. It had been a brutal slog to get here, but Prince Otto allowed himself an ember of pride as he saw the heights of Keter's inner wall up above. They were close now, even though every devilry they'd beaten yesterday had been replaced by a fresh horror as they charged up the avenue as they had before the Titan Kreios' sorcery had undone the battle. Far ahead of what he'd expected, and though his numbers were melting away like summer snow they were but a mile away from the rampart. There, at least, he would pull back let First Princess Rozala lead the assault.

The battle looked promising. Though the League had stalled early, Frederic had led two thousand horse to relieve them and word has since come back that Empress Basilia had broken through enemy resistance and resumed her advance. With the League screening her flank on one side and the unbreakable Army of Callow holding the other, Rozala Malanza would have the opening she needed to pierce through the wall. And once she did, the looming shape at the heart of the Alamans conscripts would do his part. The Titan would snuff out the Hidden Horror's ritual and victory would no longer be beyond their grasp.

"Your Grace! Your Grace, they've come!"

Otto's captain had shouted loudly enough half the army must have heard him, but the prince did not take her to ask for it aside from a dour look. Instead he followed the woman's pointing hand and what he saw had his teeth clenching.

"You dragged your feet today, Grey Legion," Otto Redcrown muttered. "I expected you an hour ago."

Hainaut had mauled their numbers, for not even the fearsome Grey Legion could simply shrug off having a star and a city pulled down on their heads, but enough remained to be a threat. Two thousand and some, by the latest count. At tide of steel advancing with deceiving slowness, but Otto would not be fooled. He had seen them pass through strong shield walls like they were nothing but mist, each hulking shape a battering ram on the move.

"Form up," the prince shouted. "Form up!"

He drove his mount forward to join his horsemen, but had to pull his reins when trumpets began to sound behind him. What was Malanza doing? It was still too early for her to join him out-the thought froze in in his mind as he saw that in the distance the banners of the rearguard were turning. The army was being attacked from behind. Trumpets to the east, trumpets to the west. Oh, Otto dimly realized. So that was the truth of it. They had danced to the Enemy's tune, and now they were surrounded. Their path of retreat had been cut and neither the Callowans nor the League would get there in time. Prince Otto Reitzenberg breathed out, finding his calm did not waver in the face of certain death.

It surprised him, though perhaps it should not have. Some days when he closed his eyes he found himself back at miserable afternoon, watching his father and his sisters died until the reddened crown was brought form him to wear. The least of the Reitzenberg had survived that day, he'd often thought, but perhaps he hadn't. Not really. Enough of him had stayed behind that he felt little fear at the sight of the steadily advancing Grey Legion. No, not even a little. It was only trepidation, the nervousness that came with finishing something your started long ago. Otto breathed in, looking at the darkened cloud. Ash was falling, but the sun shone through.

Before him there was a road, an enemy and a wall. He'd fought this battle before, as the last in line. Today he would be the first instead and there was fairness in that.

"Unravellers at the ready," Otto Redcrown called out, voice steady.

The horsemen reached for the sheaths at their sides, sliding out the weapons. The artefacts made in the Arsenal before it ended were as wooden lances, though shorter and partly hollow. They would shatter on impact, but that mattered nothing: they were artefacts, not killing lances, and their purpose was not to punch through armour but to unravel the sorcery keeping undead bound in servitude. A simple touch was not guaranteed to do this, not against the Grey Legion, but landing a blow in the right place had a halfway decent chance of destroying the undead. It was starkly better odds than any other weapon had ever offered.

They would die, Otto Reitzenberg thought as the riders lined up without a word. They would die in droves, screaming and clawing at the dark, and perhaps those deaths would allow the rest of the army to make it to the wall. That was the last gift they had to give. The last prince of the Lycaonese held his unraveller tight and straightened his back, eyes fixed ahead. His sisters would have known what to say to comfort the soldiers now, he thought. His father would not have needed to say anything, beloved as he had been.

But all Otto Redcrown had to offer his people was silence and the spear in his hand, and so that was what he gave them.

"Oh mother, I held your sword."

It was a boy who sang out. The voice was too young, too light, for him to be a man grown. The prince's heart ached of it, as much sorrow as pride. Grief for another boy too young to die. Pride for the boy staring death in the eye and finding it in him to sing.

"Oh mother, I held your sword," the boy sang again, and voices joined him.

He's one of mine, Otto realized. The Farewell Sword was a song from Bremen, and though it was known beyond its borders it was his people who love it most. It was not like hard-eyed Hannover pride, like the desolate boasts of the Neustrians or even the famously dark humour of Rhenians. It was a sad song, the Farewell Sword, for Otto's people had an old sadness in their bones. How strange, that to hear it sung would feel a comfort now.

"Oh mother, I held your sword," voices rose, Otto's among them.

He reached for his mace, pointed it forward and without a word needed the riders began to advance.

"As I rode north to settle score

And bade farewell to the stone."

The thunder of hooves on pavement almost drowned out the song as the trot turned into a gallop.

"Oh mother, there is no lord

To bring back the blade I wore

For I went and died all alone."

The distance, so long when they had begun, was now so small. Swallowed in an instant until Otto could see dents and scrapes on the armour of the Grey Legion's steel-clad dead. Unravellers were lowered, wood whistling in the air.

"Oh mother, I held your sword."

For a heartbeat the world hung still, the fragile wooden length snaking forward as he leaned against his mount's neck and the enemy moved to knock it aside. Too slow, he thought.

"And I come now to return it," Otto Redcrown screamed.

The unraveller shattered even as it hit the undead's shoulder, screaming against the steel and digging in. Not deep enough, though, as the mass of steel kept moving and swept through the legs of Otto's horse in a single blow. The horse screamed in pain, bones shattering, and the prince was thrown against the stone. He tasted blood in his mouth and his knees were throbbing, but he rolled to the side before his ribs could be caved in by a hulking step. He rose, moving behind the undead so he could strike at the knee joint with a two-handed blow of his mace. It dented the steel, enough that it crumpled inwards and began grinding against itself when the soldier moved.

He stepped back, but not quickly enough to avoid the blow entirely. The hammer clipped his shoulder, smashing through his pauldron as he was tossed to the ground like a ragdoll. All around him horses and men were dying, a thin wedge of riders passing through the Grey Legion's ranks but most of them dying. Before the momentum had entirely passed the infantry joined them, half a dozen different accents in Reitz screaming themselves hoarse as they hurled themselves at the steel-clad monsters. Otto got back to his feet, jostled by men passing him, and dragged his armour back in place while swallowing a scream. He could have pulled back, he knew. Called for a change of armour.

He was a Reitzenberg: he would fight until the Enemy broke, or he did.

"In Iron Forged," he shouted, and returned to the fray.

They charged the monsters and they died. Otto helped a bearded man smash the back of one's knee and laughed in triumph with him when they brought the soldier down, a fair-haired girl that could be no older than fifteen smashing a hammer into the neck joint until the head rolled away and it stopped moving. A heartbeat later the bearded man was bloody mist and Otto pulled the girl out of the way, the two of them going back in as rider shattered a lance in the monster's face and an opening was made. There was always another steel-clad monstrosity no matter how many were brought down, and as his people died around him Otto felt rage well up in his throat.

They wouldn't even get through, he saw. They wouldn't even clear the way for the others. They'd just die.

He screamed himself ragged as he smashed his mace into a steel soldier's face, avoiding the swing of its sword but taking a backhand to the torso. He fell down, feet slipping against a pavement made slick by the blood of his people, and even as the sword rose above him in a blow there would be no avoiding, he grit his teeth and swung his mace as the sun shone down into his eyes. One last gesture of defiance. The steel soldier's knee gave, but the sword was still coming down and-

"Audace," someone screamed in Chantant, and the tip of lance nudged the sword aside with impossible precision.

The sun blinded him still, but he knew that voice. Struggling to stand in the blood, Otto forced himself up in time to see the Kingfisher Prince plunge a sword burning with Light into the steel-clad undead's neck. Prince Frederic Goethal of Brus laughed, his blond ringlets shaking as he ripped his sword clear of the falling soldier's body, and raised his sword to the sun. All around them, Otto realized, the horsemen that'd gone to relieve the League were smashing into the side of the Grey Legion with their own unravellers.

"Audace," the Bruseni madmen called out, cheering as they drove deep into the enemy's flank.

Throat dry, Otto reached out for his friend.

"Frederic," he rasped as he caught the other man's knee. "Leave us. You have to open the way for Malanza, else they will-"

"Peace, Otto," the Kingfisher Prince gently said, catching his hand. "If there is a field where you die, my friend, I will not be far behind you."

"We have to save them," he croaked. "I can't let them die again. I can't, Fred."

"And you won't," the Prince of Brus promised. "Look east, Otto. See what you missed when keeping us all alive."

And he saw, then what it was Frederic meant. On the army's left flank, where before there had been fighting, now instead there were fresh banners. Blue with silver Miezian numerals, a three. And with them, another banner he knew well: the Crown and Sword. The Black Queen's arms. Reinforcements had come. The Third Army was here.

"How?" he finally asked.

"The Dead King might have tricked us, Otto," Frederic grinned, "but he didn't trick the Fox."

—

Hanno's steps stuttered to a halt.

"We're here," Christophe said, and immediately winced.

Likely castigating himself for having stated the obvious. The two of them had gone around the Proceran vanguard's brutal fight with the Grey Legion, the Mirror Knight's gaining turning more reluctant every time he had a look at the Lycaonese losses. Christophe had proved once that he could hold back the tide when fighting that same host, and now every time it fought without him being there to face it he thought himself responsible for the deaths. Hanno had sometimes been questioned for his defence of Christophe de Pavanie since the man took his fingers, but he could not think of a better or simpler defence than that.

Before them stood the second wall of Keter, the rampart that the armies would have to breach to reach the inner city and reach the Dead King himself. Though Hanno could not know how the Praesi were doing in their thrust from the northern gate, he could see how the Procerans had done and they were nearly there. It would not even take half an hour before First Princess Rozala began storming the walls and the Riddle-Maker could begin the spell that would silence the entropy traps. Once that was done, Named were to converge towards the palace where they would assemble in bands before going after the remaining Revenants and Scourges so that the way could be cleared for the Crown of Autumn and the Severance. Catherine, meanwhile, was supposed to be striking at the enemy from the back.

"Do we stay hidden until Her Serene Grace strikes at the walls?" the Mirror Knight quietly asked. "We're here, Hanno. We could help them with the last of the Grey Legion."

He had been debating the same. Though they were meant to remain hidden so that Christophe could not be targeted by the Scourges, would they really be able to converge here in time if they lent a hand? Hanno had his doubts. On the other hand, revealing the Mirror Knight's position early was almost certain to warrant the Dead King's attention: Christophe was, after all, carrying one of the means to kill the Hidden Horror. It was hard to justify anything to posed a risk to the Severance getting to that throne room. Before Hanno could consider the matter more, footsteps on a rooftop behind them had both heroes reaching for their swords.

But it was the Knight Errant who leapt down past them, that strange sword of his in hand, turning only at the sound of Hanno sheathing his own blade. The younger man looked surprised but pleased.

"Ah, I thought we'd have to look for you two for longer," Arthur smiled. "Lucky us."

The meaning of 'we' was swiftly expanded upon when the rest of the band followed suit and came down from the roof. Hanno's brow rose when he saw there were only two more instead of four: the Painted Knife and the Harrowed Witch, the latter of which took her time to shimmy down the side of the house rather than leap. Kallia, leader of the band, offered him a grimace.

"We lost the Poisoner to the Hawk while the Prince of Bones distracted us," she told him.

"And the Myrmidon?"

"We're not sure she's dead," Kallia said. "She fell into a trap while killing a Revenant and the Tumult dropped about a ton of rock over her, but we never saw a body."

"We haven't seen a single Revenant on our way here," Christophe told her, "much less a Scourge."

The Levantine eyed him with distaste. Though the Mirror Knight had made efforts to mend bridges, the Painted Knife was not of a forgiving nature and it was not in Christophe's nature to keep his feet out of his mouth for too long.

"The Dead King is going after bands," Hanno said. "He's trying to thin us out as much as possible before we reach his palaces."

"We figured," Kallia told him. "I heard through Apprentice that Sidonia's band got hit as well. I haven't gotten word about deaths, though, only that there was fighting."

Hanno's stomach clenched.

"Did they get to the crown?"

"That would require taking the Archer by surprise," the Painted Knife snorted, "and good luck to anyone who tries."

Hanno was not anywhere as convinced, but he let it go. Neither of them could know for certain, arguing was pointless.

"Shall we go reinforce the Procerans?" the Knight Errant asked. "They could use the help, and the sooner we get the Titan to the wall the sooner we can seek out the Dead King."

It was a simple enough question. And yet Hanno stilled to hear it. He knew what he was supposed to answer: they were all to wait until the Proceran assault on the wall began and only then intervene. That was what the plan called for. Getting the Severity to the Dead King was the most important thing, and though Hanno rankled at the thought he recognized the sense in it. Saving even a thousand lives out here on the battlefield would mean nothing if the Dead King won and everyone on Calernia died for it. And Hanno, looking at the same man who he was to protect at all costs, could not help but think back of the Arsenal.

They'd argued, there, about right and wrong. And though Christophe had been wrong about many things that day, he had been right about others. What single thing can we not be made to swallow, when it is put to contrast with the end of days, the Mirror Knight had challenged. What as a principle, if you did not keep to it in the dark? What's a principle, when keeping to it kills everyone, a voice that sounded uncomfortably like Catherine's argued back. Hanno found himself reaching for an old comfort, for the coin the Seraphim had once given him. Justice at the tip of his fingers. He missed that still, sometimes. Not having to rely on his own blind eyes to parse it all.

His fingers closed around the silver coin, the feel of its edges rough against his skin.

"Lord Hanno?" the Knight Errant said, tone hesitant.

Part of him wanted to tell them to do as they wished, but that was an abdication of responsibility. He had put himself forward to remain representative of Above under the Truce and Terms. He was to be the enforcer of the laws of the Liesse Accords under the Warden. To tell them they could do as they wished would be moral cowardice. In the end, he realized, it came down to a choice. Was it irresponsible to take the risk, or was it cowardice not to? Lives could be saved if he acted, but lives could be lost as well. Possibly much more than were saved. But was that really a reason not to act?

What had he cast away his own Name for, his place as the Sword of Judgement, if not to do something?

Hanno breathed out, looking at the sky, and felt a calm settle upon him. He rolled the coin between his fingers, and with a deft flicked of his thumb flipped it. It arced upwards, silver shining in the sun, and looking at it Hanno knew which side he wanted it to land on.

And so he knew what to do.

"Follow the plan," Hanno told them. "Stay hidden and protecting Christophe until the assault on the wall has begun."

Mutinous looks answered. The Knight Errant was the one who answered.

"We could-"

"I will settle it," the dark-skinned hero simply said, "so follow the plan."

He felt Creation quicken around him at the words. It had been waiting, hadn't it? For his resolve to take shape. And now it had: if it was a risk to do the right thing, what you should be doing, then you simply had to be powerful enough it was no longer a risk. Hanno of Arwad slowly unsheathed his sword, feeling the first motes of his Name begin to coalesce. It was not there yet, he thought. But it would be by this battle's end.

"Go," he said, his voice echoing in a way that had them shivering.

Not even the young knight argued with that. They went, disappearing into the maze of houses, and the hero slowly turned his gaze south. He had work to do, he thought, and began to walk. Hanno did not look on what side the coin had fallen, leaving it down there in the ash.

He no longer had a use for it.

Mirror Night

Abigail really is quite good at her job lol. We get told she is great but we dont get to see it often enough.

I do like Otto and Frederic together even if Frederic usually pisses me off when he is not with Otto.

Masego noticed the choir is back on, I wonder if Hanno would if he checked the coin lol. Well lets hope Anaxares stays on mission and keeps targetting DK.

Still no idea what Name Hanno is going to get also does he mean the battle he is about to fight or the overall campaign lol. A leadership one it seems almost felt like Speaking.

Cat's team is Masego, Ranger, Concocter and Silver Huntress. I mean Cat and Masego are kinda obvious lol, Ranger as a guide sure...I suppose Cat is leveraging Cocky and Huntress for their connection to Ranger. Not who I pick for such a mission personally.

I liked it but I do very much lover interludes during major battles.

Liliet

Hanno seems to be getting an offensive martial Name, based on his insight here.

Death Knight

Only question is it Ranger level or Saint of Swords level.

Liliet

SoS had 50/50 chances against Hye in her prime (source: WoE) so the answer I believe is yes

zenanii

Agreed. In the trinity he has formed with Cat and Cordelia we already have Cat as the arbiter, to rule and judge, Cordelia as the diplomat, to make sure Catherine's actions follow the laws in such a way that they can not be legally disputed, and to lawyer away any problems that arises from Cat bending the rules.

It makes the most sense that Hanno's role would be that of Cat's right hand, carrying out her actions and forcefully removing any obstacles thar Cordelia can't politics away.

Mirror Night

Also Cat is way more of Spellcaster these days then she is any sort of legit martial master.

Joe Mama

Which is a little sad, actually, one of my favorite parts of the older Books is Cat just whaling away at her problems with a sword. It kept her "soldier queen" vibe more natural feeling.

SomeGuyWhoReadsThings

She's a veteran soldier queen now. It only makes sense she would dump the sword once it dulled from bashing all her problems. One of my favourite parts of her arc

Snappy270

Well she is essentially embodying all of war. Master tactician, sword and staff fighter, a war caster, many times she has done espionage and she is a siege engine.

So she does a little, only thing she doesn't do is archery.

Cpt. Obvious

And she stomped her way across the bridge to Keter. There were little tactics or finesse about it, but a lot of blood, guts and pain.

So I wouldn't say her status as Warrior Queen is in risk of being retired. It's just another title around her neck that she newer asked for, but carries out of guilt to all those who has died under her command while she were trying to change all of Calernia.

jerdenizen

I'm pretty sure he's going to get the Name of White Knight, this seems like a very White Knight thing to be doing and there's definitely a leadership aspect to that title, but very different from last time. Before, he did not pass judgement – the big change since then is that has been forced to make his own decisions.

KageLupus

I actually read this as him getting a more defensive-minded Name. I am going to put my money on something big and broad sounding, like Guardian. That implies a general sort of protectiveness and plays well with being associated with the Warden.

Hanno's Name is congealing around the concept that sometimes the only way to do the right thing and save people is to be strong enough to ignore the risks of doing so. So it is very much an active Role, but I think the main focus is going to be on strength when "doing right" or protecting others. The White Knight could fulfill that Role, but Hanno has too much history with that Name and is most likely getting a different one.

Miles

One word names were said to be more powerful at some point iirc, so just Knight makes sense. Or maybe something more specific like Enforcer or Officer

Cpt. Obvious

I've been pondering what Name Hanno might claim for a long time, and for a long time I thought it might be White Knight again. But it's true that he can never be the same again now that he has finally accepted that he is going to make his own choices instead of hiding behind the choir of Justice.

I guess some version of a knight name is possible, but that doesn't feel like it would fit his new role. Perhaps Knight might work, but I still don't feel it's authoritarian enough. It would give him authority over the other knights, and most Heroes would probably defer to him out of respect. Villains however might defer out of self-preservation but they would only do so because of his strength.

Now I do feel it is a good chance that he'll get in touch with the choir of Justice again, but their relationship will be different. Instead of choosing who or what to bring to them for judgement like he used to i think he will be the one who judges in concert with the choir. He judges by mortal standards with the choir provides the knowledge of what the accused is guilty of.

That way he can chose to spare the thief who stole to survive, and chose to punish the priest who pilfered from the funds that were set aside to feed the poor.

Not that his role now would have him sitting in judgment of the mundane other than when invited. Instead he is going to be the one who brings judgement to the named who breaks the accords.

So perhaps Judge would be a more fitting name...

Crash

He has said he got offered the same Name, so it is most likely White Knight but his Role has changed. No longer the Sword of Judgement, so more of a shielder/protector now?

Miles

He doesn't want White Knight, he won't accept that one. He doesn't seem like the type to change his mind without a massive amount of reasons

Rey d`Tutto

The Regulator.

"What I cannot Control, I will Regulate." -Cat

Protec the FOX

I have been dying to read Abigail POV again. She's so fucking precious. She better make it. She better.

spencer

Yes! I've been waiting for her pov and this did not disappoint! She deserves that slothful retirement for sure.

icouldbeusingmytimebetter

If Hanno did check the coin, I think the Bard would have been able to answer for them. I was really worried about that

Miles

A coin is a great decision making tool and I'm glad to see him finally using it properly. It's not about blindly following where the coin lands but about putting yourself in that moment where you know how it should land.

Lord Haart

Cat's band makes perfect sense, it has all the hooks to ensure Indrani and therefore Akua will get to the end to meet them. And she trusts the heroes will Providence their way there.

Plus Huntress gives protection from Hawk and Concoctor has nearly as many surprises up her sleeve as Cat.

Tenthyr

Good man, Hanno.

Dome Zasrekh

That's the point! He is a good man, trying to do good. He just has to learn what that good is.

dadycool

Oh, God. What if that's his new name? The Good Man? He doesn't necessarily stick to any principle, tries not to sacrifice lesser goods in favor of the Greater Good, and tries to save as many lives, especially little lives, as he can.

Flameburst

That would be a good name. After all "demons run when a good man goes to war".

Bad@games

God dammit im so happy. The WAAAAAAGH and THE TOMB MAKER had me smiling with glee, Abigale's perspective is always a treat and i cant help but laugh and fall in lover with her, Boots and Krolem every time. Then the fucking. " The Dead King might have tricked us, Otto," Frederic grinned, "but he didn't trick the Fox." I literally had to stop reading to laugh and cheer in triumph because god damnit i love abigale.

I love Heirophant soo much too but i feel he almost FUCKED everything there. Villain storys are back now so dont go "villain betrays an ally right before final fight"ing on me Measgo pls we need you. Although i do love his thought process. He needs to warn cat ASAP about bard too.

Hanno new name time woo no more coin bb lets gooo. Still white knight? Idk id say not but it could go either way tbh.

God the Frederic/Otto brommance is great too.

I love guide soo much bc i gets all in my emotions even over side characters like c'mon abigale NEEDS her generals pension and if Otto or Fredric dies ill be so sad and im still crying over Robber and Roland and aaahhhhhh

Liliet

I was nervous @ Masego's thought process too, but turns out it was fine all along! Because he explicitly rejects "she might be a danger" as an allowable reason to attack her. No, it's as revenge for Indrani / to remove an obstacle on the way to her Name, and Masego has always known better than THAT.

Danté

I feel like Hanno's name will be something along the lines of Enforcer or Judge. Enforcer because he made a call and enforced the plan because he knew that was what he was supposed to do, or Judge because he finally gave up on judgements coin and started deciding for himself. Either way i feel like it should be something vaguely judicial to mirror cat and her warden.

Rey d`Tutto

Do they have a Sheriff in town?
Maybe a Marshall?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

As they say, "this town isn't big enough for the both of us." And the existing cowboy hero, Roland, is no more, which leaves room for a new cowboy.

Razender

Why not just &Knight&?

irritantseraphim

Holy hell, that was good.

Cat & Friends going to Serenity, meeting the Hierarch, most likely?

Abigail out-foxing the oldest fox on Calernia. She might not think herself as one, but she really is a tactical genius. All in the name of her retirement fund in a mansion. I feel you, Abigail.

Had tears in my eyes when the Lycaonese began singing.

Hanno finally moving on from the Seraphim is good. Some growths he needed to gain his new name, I just wonder what it's gonna be.

irritantseraphim

Also, Hakram being a total badass. I missed that. I bet the Prince of Bones is either a golem or an undead in the sense that he is only a skull in the thorax or abdomen of the human-like shape, surrounded by layers and layers of steel.

Rumena slaps, though. I love that old drow

KageLupus

"Rumena" is actually the Drow word for "catching hands". DK should have known better.

irritantseraphim

As well as for "throwing fists", the amount of multi-meaning words makes Crepuscular quite hard.

jerdenizen

It is amusing that the prospect of losing her pension terrifies Abigail more than, you know, the possible end of the world.

irritantseraphim

Yeeees. I love that gurl. Pure "fuck you" energy towards anything threatening her pension and mansion.

Crash

Listen buddy, if the world ends she doesn't have bills to pay or alcohol to drink does she? So that's a non-issue, if the world ends she no longer has any troubles.

Now, if the world doesn't end and she has no pension and thus no mansion in Laure to be drunk everyday? That is unconscionable. She knows what's up.

Roddie

So what I've been thinking is if Hakram has got a narrative groove in well in enough that the orc name "Adjutinct" is a thing now and if Korek can get it

Miles

I'm pretty sure Abigail is carving a new Role from bedrock. For the last several books she's always known exactly where she needs to be and found a way to be there. She even makes it look easy while everyone else is surprised it was possible at all.

I wonder what her Name is going to be when Creation-Sempai finally acknowledges her.

Earl of Purple

Really? Because I think she's fitting the Role Cat made after the War College, when she was in charge of the Fifteenth but not yet Black Queen- or Sovereign of Moonless Nights. She's a tactical genius, from the streets of a Callowan town, absolutely no heritage of note, leading soldiers into battle extremely well despite this, and she's even got an orc to serve as her strong right hand, helping her do all the things she does.

jamesc9

Re: Abigail out-foxing the oldest fox on Calernia

Shortly after her field promotion, Cat told her on camera that they would talk about what she did wrong, to delay the day when Abigail made a mistake that got a lot of people killed. Has Abigail made her mistake yet?

Lord Haart

She did actually – leaking that supplies are running out caused desertions as well as requiring the GA to rush their assaults to some degree. Wasn't a battle mistake but logistical mistakes can hurt worse.

Bad@games

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Bad@Games

MY TIME SO SHINE YESS I GOT IT

Mary Gentle

Oh WOO HOO!! Oh, I've been waiting for Abigail, dammit!

And:

"The Dead King might have tricked us, Otto," Frederic grinned, "but he didn't trick the Fox."

YES! Yes, yes, YES!! In pursuit of her pension, and keeping her skin in one bit, Abigail realises the truth and rides to the rescue! WOO-HOO!

It's even possible that Abigail doesn't realise that she's gained the experience to see tactics, and a trap in the making. Doesn't realise that she really HAS become The Fox. now.

She had better not die.

Just saying.

The Fox had better survive, in good state, to collect her pension.

I wouldn't mind if Abigail is the one who finally offs the Dead King. That would be a nice conclusion to an "unwilling hero" story, now wouldn't it?

... Hanno who? 😊

Actually, wonderful stuff from Hanno, and not at all the decision I thought he'd take. I now have no idea what name he'll finally end up with.

This whole chapter is a bundle of WOO HOO, really. Hakram ploughing into the Prince of Bones, and Rumena! The Tomb-maker having fun with being the last-minute rescuer. Otto Redcrown, who still doesn't realise he shouldn't be having self-esteem issues. Masego thinking it a quite reasonable plan for everybody in his party to invade by virtue of being DEAD. I mean, what? 😊 And then coming to realise that the Dead King's hell has been ever so slightly invaded by Anaraxes... Oops?

Mind you, despite everyone being stretched to their limit, I shall still be disappointed if the Dead King doesn't have something else up his bony sleeve. Something on the same order of the slice-and-dice city, but even more impressive...

And did I mention? WOO HOO! This one and the last one make one great single chapter.

The shape of story that would be best for the Dead King (assuming he can't win) would be to be the villain that is always defeated, always seems to be dead, but always comes back. And I guess that story is now in play.

Liliet

One quibble: Abigail has always been the Fox. In the first interlude that's her introduction, Skirmish, she is very low in the ranks but she gives us the overview of the tides of battle and where things are ABOUT to go poorly as she looks over it. She kept rising through the ranks in between appearances not because of luck, but because of capability. She performed excellently at the Camps, stood out for her ingenious solution in Laure, and when Catherine first approaches Sarcella and sees what she'd been doing she thinks Nauk had gotten a better eye for tactics since she'd last seen him.

Abigail's cowardice and complete lack of ambition are paired with remarkable ability, and THAT is why Catherine raised her up and Juniper agreed. She was the Fox all along, this has always been the level she performed at.

Just... for unconventional motivations.

dadycool

She's also situationally blind when it doesn't come to tactics, like seeing how her actions actually affect the world around her. See: making offensive jokes to Proceran Princes about Proceran Princes, thinking they'd get offended, but they just laugh. See II: carrying her own banner that one time, directly leading the charge.

Liliet

Yup she's a tactical prodigy completely oblivious to everything else, and that continues ♥

Mary Gentle

I'll be keeping a look out for that viewpoint next time I re-read the book. Can't help thinking it's less endearing – less Abigail, if you like – if she just had to realise that she was already the Fox.

What I love about her is that I think she trips into doing the right thing at first, like a drunken woman staggering along a tightrope, and just managing not to fall off. And then she takes that teeny bit of experience gained, and by sheer terror manages to game it into helping her survive the next battle, and the next.

If it was just a matter of her uncovering her tactical talent, that means she was a lot more safe than I thought. I liked her being always a half-inch away from disaster, and having to DRAG that talent up out of herself.

You may be right about this, but I'll be disappointed if you are.

I always thought "fortuitous" was her middle name. Or maybe "felicitous".

Abigail Felicitous Tanner, Lady Arrowcatch. 😊

Liliet

Abigail will not “realize she is already the Fox”, that’s just the name others call her that she’s not fond of because it puts pressure on her to perform! She is not “more competent than she realizes”. Like... she already assumes that everything she can figure out if the bare minimum she’ll be court-martialed for not doing! She just doesn’t know what’s not obvious to other people.

She is straight up competent and always has been, she’s just hilariously anti-motivated.

Crash

Abigail somehow got to the end of the Dunning-Kruger scale with a lot of experience and knowledge but none of the confidence.

She’s very much a tactical savant in that way, never formally trained (joined straight out of Summerholm when they were having trouble training their soldiers) but has very good situational awareness and is good at visualizing the entire battlefield(see the bit about thinking of how this would look from above, this is very much a skill and not everyone can do it well) and extrapolating results from there. You may notice this is a lot of things she is doing. Abigail doesn’t notice that though, she thinks literally everyone else will see it and, as such, if she doesn’t act optimally they will know.

This is untrue, but since she is convinced this is the case she keeps being afraid of everything because she doesn’t realize she didn’t stumble into her current position. She got there by having her very real skill noticed by others, even as she remains in the dark about it.

It’s great.

Liliet

Yep ♥ ♥ ♥

Crash

aaaand replied to Liliet by mistake. Lmao. Ah well.

Sun Dog

They know that they’ll never, she’s far too clever, they’ll never outfox the Fox...

Sun Dog

Well, if you're invading Hell, dying is the quickest way there. It's why they still do the thing about Triumphant (may she never return).

BargleNawdleZouss

I am STILL expecting Triumphant to show up.

Insanenoodlyguy

Anaraxes will not be too much of a direct problem, as long as he knows his Glorious nation voted to be here, and he's probably received that. It's the angels that are the rub, though perhaps the story can lead to him telling them to F off as he has done that before.

ninegardens

But that's the thing: It ain't the angels who are going to be showing up.

Masego told us this chapter: Judgement is out of commission for a chapter. If someone calls on that powersauce, it's like calling on a bucket of invisible coloured paint.

Nothing's gonna happen... unless someone has set shit up so they can colour that paint....

But Judgement ain't gonna have shit to do with it.

BargleNawdleZouss

I want some of that powersauce!

BargleNawdleZouss

Wow, was I wrong about Team Catherine! I definitely did not realize the depth of feeling that even Masego has against Hye Su.

So happy that Abigail is still using her paranoia, as Catherine instructed her, to save the day! I expect both Otto and Frederic to ask for her hand in marriage, should they all survive. 😊

Did not expect the Poisoner to take the field in a large-scale battle. Unless she was also acting as a healer, that seems like a bad fit. I am glad that Arthur's out and doing his thing, of course!

Mary Gentle

I think an Abigail/Otto/Frederic marriage would make a wonderful "obligatory post-winning wedding ceremony". All three of them should get on just fine. 😊

Liliet

MOOD.

beleester

Abigail should be Maid of Honor. Because that way she has to give a speech in front of a crowd of Proceran nobles.

Sykomantis

That's it. That's best comment. Everyone else can go home now. Great work everyone!

jamesc9

Three-way marriage would make a mess of the succession of two principalities. Someone (Rozala?) had better work out how to write the rules for that.

Liliet

wowowowowowowoow i loved this chapter.

1. ABIGAIL THE BELOVED STAR. The monologue about "she'd rather die" because DK does not pay his officer is the highlight of the whole book I swear. Also I fucking adore how she thinks she'll be court-martialled for being able to intervene and not doing it while everyone else just blatantly didn't spot the trap. I love this woman. She is so clever but she has 0 ability to estimate how clever she actually is and I adore it.

2. THEY DID PUT RANGER IN THE BAND WITH THE REFUGEES. This is comedy of the century oh my fucking god

3. Some good Masego material!!! Love how he's just going "right and wrong" now instead of deferring to Callowan law ♥ ♥ ♥ also love how alien his logic remains even with that in play. She could be a danger but that's no reason to attack her... hurting Indrani IS but not quite that much of one... but paired with her being an obstacle with Indrani's path... but Indrani would not like him doing this because it's her fight!

4. So the answer is that the ealamal is ready to be shaped like clay to do whatever the fuck Yara wants it to do, huh. Interesting.

5. CATHERINE MY BELOVED she's going into Serenity and SHE'S GOING TO MEET ANAXARES PLEASE PLEASE PLEASE PLEASE I WANT

6. Otteric ♥ ♥ ♥

7. HANN0000000000 HELL YES!!!!!!! Also love how he cast away the coin WITHIN A DAY of Judgement coming back online. Wonder if they'll reconnect regardless, though in a different form. What Name though????? I'm thinking "sword something", personally.

ninegardens

And thus it was that Hanno earned the Name "Battle Crumpet, choosen of the Seripham", to which The Black queen replied "Wut?", and the Seripham replied. "[shrug], [embarrassment], [Nomming breakfast]"

mook

black queen said "[bruh]" and the seraphim said "[ratio+didn't ask]"

AceOfSword

I wonder if Hanno is going to become the new Saint of Sword...

Liliet

that seems to be a reference to the duelist schools and ranks, which Hanno has had 0 interaction with

Linnus42

Also Hanno doesn't exclusively use swords, cause of his Aspect Recall it all the styles really...he could get the name Saint though since his Name is probably going to be one word. Wonder if he can convince the old Titan to make him a new shapeshifting weapon lol...

BargleNawdleZouss

If someone out there has mapping/drawing skills (which I definitely do not), it would be awesome to create a tactical map of the three days of the Battle of Keter to better show the forces in motion. Post it to the Wiki, or perhaps the art section.

Earl of Purple

Nooo, Angelique, you were my favourite Named we met but didn't get much of. I guess you are a healer, or possibly a sneak when we didn't see you. Or else you volunteered, anyway.

Mary Gentle

Just thinking, do we know under what conditions the Dead King is dead?

(Deader? Dead-est?)

I'm going to have to re-read this book from the beginning, after we hit the end (well, probbly all the books,in fact), and I expect it's mentioned in there. But still... How do you tell the difference between DK defeated (like Sauron when Morgoth bought it), and DK destroyed (Sauron at the end of The Lord of the Rings)?

At what point do Cat and the rest KNOW the Dead King isn't coming back?

badatgames2911

Dead King is UNdead, not to mention hes a "BBEG" which in this world means his main body is probobly gonna be obvi or have some weight behind it. in most cases like this its "destroy main body, win" type stuff. so severence works there. or if a body cant be found they have the crown of autun, to attack his "being" making him no longer the dead king, but the king of autum whick is much more managable. or theres option 3 that we dont know about yet

Liliet

Well, soul exists explicitly as a thing in Guideverse, and to be alive you need either it or some other substance performing a similar function (the stuff devils are made from, Winter for Winter Cat, Night for the Crows). When there's no more substance that contains Neshamah's consciousness he's dead-dead.

Of course, he's the type to have all sorts of stealth contingencies, and I think that's part of why Catherine's plan is to imprison him, not kill him.

Mary Gentle

(Sorry if this is a repeat, my reply went deader than DK)

Yes, I remember now you remind me, that there are souls, and Cat's sweetheart is supposed to be the Warden of DK's soul once everything's over.

But as an explanation, it keeps sliding out of my mind, because I think Cat will stop punishing herself and Akua before this. Plus, in terms of getting rid of the Big Bad, it feels like shoving Napoleon off to Elba – you just know he's coming back.

Personally, as a reader, I'd prefer Masego went "squish" and DK's soul blew away on the wind like Sauron's.

Locking him up in his own prison has all sorts of story shapes that promise DK will escape. The big bad that was Sauron's boss, Morgoth, gets put into a hole outside the universe, but he's still on a promise he'll be back for the "real last battle". (Not that I think everything has to happen as per Tolkein, but it was the first set of examples that came to mind.)

If we're going to see this world's other continents some time, DK could be quite good as a looming threat(TM). But I'm assuming this set of books will get a more final conclusion than that, tbh.

Liliet

Yeah I high key want that also

(That said, broke-out-of-imprisonment DK is orders of magnitude less dangerous than current DK, so the plan IS sensible)

Sam

Anaxares seems like a pretty solid substitute in the "guard the DK forever" thing. Hell, he might even volunteer.

jamesc9

He'll do it exactly under the condition that his people vote for him to. He's Bellerophan.

Lord Haart

My bet is that the crown and Severence are traps not just for DK but also Yara.

Yara wants to die – Cat will make her Queen of Autumn, unable to impact the world but never leaving it. And the DK will get Severed and then utterly destroyed (Demon of Absence maybe?) since he wants to live forever.

Not sure what it will cost Cat and crew to pull that off but that'd be a fitting end to our antagonists.

Velrix

That's why they don't want to kill him, they will put his soul in jail for eternity.
And they already have a Warden.

erebus42

Yeah I noticed that too. They've been talking too openly about having Akua do it that I think it's lossed the unspoken plan guarantee. If that plan is still going to remain viable my guess is that Cat is going to have to take her place somehow.

jamesc9

What would the cognitive and physical security have to be, around a class at Cardinal taught by the former Dead King?

Juff

Typo Thread:

then men > ten men dead as swarming > dead and swarming greastword > greatsword Queen didn't > Queen he didn't hanging her > handing her old told > one told by there > there horses' > horse's Range was > Ranger was that'd began > that'd begun but down > put down back let > back and let has since > had since her to ask > her to task
At tide > A tide
froze in in > froze in at miserable > at that miserable sisters died > sisters die your started > you started love it most > loved it most as rider > as a rider gaining (no idea what this should be) anything to posed > anything that posed bridges him > bridges
Severity > Severance
What as a > What was a deft flicked > deft flick

beleester

Also, there's an issue with the map. The Callowan army is stated to be going through a breach in the southeastern wall, but they're also stated to be holding the left flank of the Procerans, who are coming from the south, while the League holds their right flank on the east. So I think the Callowans are coming from the south*west.*

That still seems a little off, because the undead army they're supposed to be intercepting is in the southeast, between the League and the Procerans. So I guess the Callowans are moving behind the Procerans to cover the right flank?

BargleNawdleZouss

I believe "gaining" should be corrected to "gait", meaning his walking pace slowed as his reluctance mounted.

Peter

This was an absolute delight. I love the Otto and Frederic romance and the beautiful delivery of the trope of last minute rescue in the face of despair and certain death. Also, Abigail showing off that she is genuinely a tactical genius even through her sole motivation being retirement with the pension that she's earned.

I am worried about Catherine's band of five going into a pre-invaded Serenity. The Augur's note has to be about Yara's control of the ealamal, surely. It's alarming how, even crippled, she's still got one more plan up her sleeve.

Thinking of plans up sleeves, no information about where the Emerald Swords are being deployed as of yet. Last trump card unrevealed.

badatgames2911

Everytime a guide song appears i always try and find the tune, but i can never get it right, as far as i know the only officail one is In Dread Crowned/ Come Out Ye Black And Tans, but if we could get an official tue list for all the songs tha's be awsome

alexjmescott

If there isn't an official list, then that'll probably turn into a re-read project at some stage: to find as many songs as I can, and see what tunes they would fit. For instance, when Callow started up with Hold the Line as they crossed the bridges for the second assault, I heard it in the tune of Dives and Lazarus.

jamesc9

I've been poking and found that there are several tunes. Which one?

alexjmescott

The version by a local duo called Solarference, if you want to be precise, which I don't think is available online! It's the same tune as used in this one, similar in tempo, with the more robust tone of being sung as an a capella duet rather than as a solo over guitar. Solarference's version has a harmony line and borrows a chorus from another ballad, neither of which really fit with the use here.

Squeamish

God I love the interludes ! Great to see Abigail has really sharpened her paranoia to a fine blade at this point

And the song! Just my heart being wrenched out

erebus42

I mean us it even paranoia when they really are pretty much always out to murder you?

Rey d`Tutto

Nope, just healthy respect for the unexpected attempts.

dadycool

Abigail and Masego are gems. Abbi is walking the same path as Cat, so she's able to sniff out dastardly plans and unravel them with a thought, all while trying her damndest to get out of there alive and with a General's pension. Masego is terrifying in that the only reason why he's not coldly slaughtering Ranger is "My girlfriend would be mad at me for not letting her do it". I wonder about his final observation, though.

Also, was Abbi right? Is this the real reason behind the name Cardinal? 'Cause if so, I agree with her. Why did nobody tell me before?

Sykomantis

Friend, if the interludes with East, West, South, and North in their titles didn't tip you off, then I don't know what to tell you.

dadycool

Oh, that was the clue? I genuinely thought it was entirely because Procer was the established "West" and Praes was the established "East", with North being because Hakram went north to the Steppes.

Darkening

Man, it just hit me that the two weapons against the dead king are a crown and sword, as in, Cat's heraldry. Talk about foreshadowing.

Peter

That had absolutely passed me by!

Letouriste

Ooooh, i missed that too.

erebus42

That was a rather sweet and considerate decision on Masego's part.
It's nice to be reminded that Abigail isn't just a comic relief.
It's also nice to see Hanno embracing his own agency.
The fruits of character development are all around!

Sinead

You know I never translated the Brusian motto to French to note that it's literally 'I do have the audacity'

Amazing

Cheetah724

Or, to put it another way, "I Dare!"

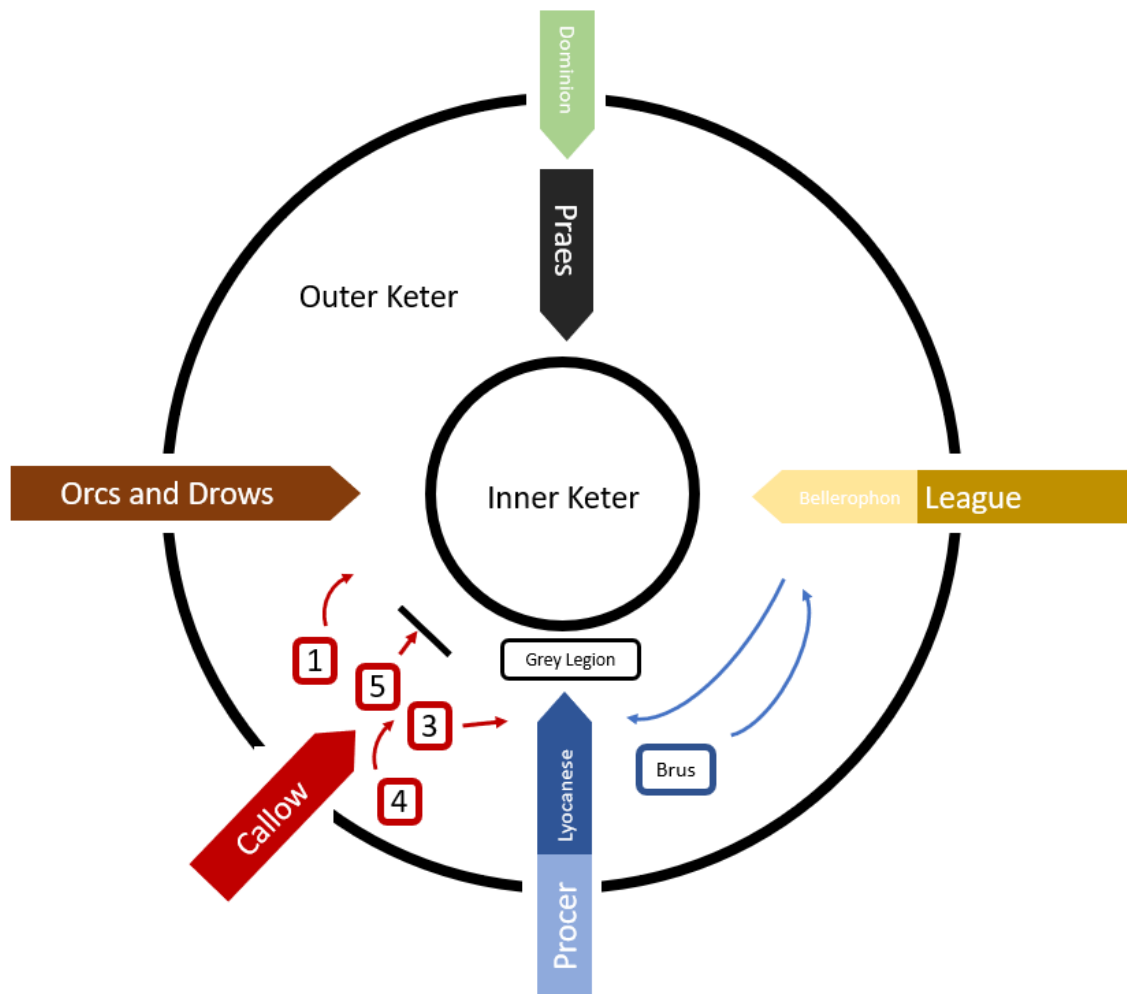

Shebmeister

Oh man I loved all bits of it. The singing brought tears to my eye, as always. If only there was an audio version!

I know you don't always have time to fix typos, but: "Thrown on top of that was the breach in the southeastern wall that the Ram had built". It's southwestern, and that's where the army of callow is coming from right? Hard to make sense of the description of the battle otherwise.

Shebmeister

If anyone wants it, here is my attempt at a map.

jack

It's pretty telling that the Praesi don't seem to have or need any backup.

Procer needed the third army on their flank to make sure that they didn't get fucked with, and the orcs have the drow to back them up, and the league needed the power of complete fucking insanity to break them through a blockade, but the Praesi are just fucking stomping through.

Even after everything they've been through in the past couple of story arcs, they're still the remnants of a dread fucking empire.

pirateddesigns

The Levantines are the Praesi's reserve. But yes, agreed. I suspect Legends III is next and we'll get to see more of the Praesi side of the battle.

Darkening

Well at least it's internally consistent if it's a typo since Frederick tells Otto to look east to see the callowans.

Shebmeister

Fairly certain it was a typo as EE has now fixed it. 😊

letouriste

Sooo...now we have cavalry singing without biting their tongue while at full speed haha.
I will put it on creation helping them finish the words because it would be a waste.

Gods, you really made us wait for that Abigail pov don't you? 😊

Loved this chapter

Letouriste

Also, RIP poisoner 😞
Didn't hurt as much than Roland but i still liked her a lot

Daniel E

Hanno Name let's go!! "Fifty-five: if your powers are lost, they will nearly always return greater than before so long as the appropriate moral lesson is learned. With kindness and humility comes overwhelming martial might." He's always had kindness in spades, and humility got beaten into him by Catherine. Plus since he's a Hero, that humility is genuine, not like 'I'm angry now and have something to prove'. I mean, he does have something to prove, but it comes from a place of honest introspection.

John Smith

Could read a whole book about Abigail and her surly companion Boots. I cackled to myself for her entire POV.

Darkening

Ever read any of the Ciaphas Cain, HERO OF THE IMPERIUM! books? They're basically what you're looking for lol.

John Smith

Will check 'em out, thanks for the rec.

billstewartmt

I'd lost track of who was where by then, and was trying to figure out whether Boots was really trying to get away, or was trying to drag Abigail over to look at what she needed to see..

Frivolous

General Bishara: Did Aisha Bishara get assigned or promoted to become general? Presumably because her predecessor got killed.

Frivolous

I see now. From Finish:

The First Army lost General Zola to a ritual bombardment that'd gotten past Hierophant and two layers of wards. It'd been a nasty curse and an even nastier way to die, taking half of the First's senior staff with her. We were so lacking in officers there was talk that Aisha might need to take command, as one of the few old hands left.

Crash

Doctors hate him! Find out how this man used this simple trick to cure Executive Dysfunction!

Jokes aside, fucking finally. Thank you Hanno for throwing that godsdamned coin away. 10/10.

I read Abigail's section prepared to find it the absolute highlight of my day, but I have to say Hanno finally making a choice to be free of the Choir is great. He might have made this choice a while back, by many actions he has taken but this is where he's made it official. Beautiful.

Zach

Hanno's new Name just gonna be Hanno but with an extra-capitalized H

pirateddesigns

Hanno!, but in that explosive pop art font.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hanno, but with the H all big and fancy like a medieval manuscript.

jack

I was a little worried that the choir returning might fuck with Hanno's development at a critical point, but this is probably the best outcome.

Toss the coin, while it's still in the air you realize that you want it to land a certain way, so you never even look at how it actually lands, because your decision is already made.

Gnochi

I made a recording of Mother's Sword; you can listen to it here:
<https://audiomack.com/gnochi/song/mothers-sword>

Isi Arnott-Campbell

When you become famous you're called a legend because your legends.

jamesc9

That was punny.

lenethren

Wonderful chapter. Loved reading things from Masego's point of view.

onedollargum

Hanno picked the best possible moment to take leave of his Judgement.

DC

Chin up, Abigail, if you hadn't been here then the whole continent would probably have fallen to the dead anyway.

Interlude: Legends III

"Not two sentiments are more deeply intertwined than hope and fear: the deeper one, the starker the other."

– Magister Haides the Elder of Stygia

First Princess Rozala Malanza sat her saddle, fingers clenched around the handle of her sword, and watched as her people died like flies.

Conscripts, fantassins and the remains of the armies of Procer stormed the last wall of Keter with ladders. Not for her soldiers, the siege towers and ballistae of the easterners: they made do with courage and catapults, the carpet of corpses beneath their feet so thick it was as if a snowstorm of cadaver had blown through. A ram was hammering at the gate below, enchanted by her finest mages, but it was like trying to smash a stone with an egg. However skilled her wizards, they were no match for the Hidden Horror's arcane mastery.

Yesterday, in that world that was taken back, Rozala and her host had not made it this far. They might not have this time, either, had the Fox not shattered the encirclement they'd charged into and anchored her left flank as she pivoted her lines to the right to face the onslaught. It had been a hard fight but she had won it, driving back the dead and shattering the houses in their wake to make barricades just as the Dead King had done against them as they'd advanced. A third of the Grey Legion had retreated through the gates into the inner city, Rozala having to twice order Prince Otto back so he would not pursue.

The northerners had been pulled back, moved to the rearguard where healers were trying to keep as many of their wounded alive as possible. The First Princess knew the weight of the debt she owed: the Lycaonese had served as her vanguard all the way to the rampart, shattering themselves on every barricade and elite guard so that the rest of the army would arrive in good state. It had been a cold choice for her to make, but a necessary one. If her soldiers were to die by the score with every heartbeat as they tried the inner wall, she would rather send the conscript into that storm than the Lycaonese.

Procer still had plenty of men, for all its horrendous losses, but few of the calibre of the Lycaonese. They were a resource to be carefully spent, not carelessly thrown into the slaughterhouse.

However ugly the thought, it was the price of being in command to have to think it. Rozala's role on this dark day was not to keep soldiers alive but to win, for defeat now would be the end of them all. And still the princess of Aquitan – and Salia, now that she sat the high throne – felt her gauntleted hand grind against the grip of her sword. Everywhere she looked, men died. They shouted and screamed and fought with desperate strength to take the wall, but the strength of the Enemy was not waning. She was forced to look away from the butchery when her personal guard parted to allow a mounted man through.

"Your Highness," Prince Arsene greeted her, bowing as much as he could when armoured and a horse.

"Your Grace," Rozala simply replied.

She did not ask him why he had come, letting silence do the speaking for her.

"Captain-General Ferreiro has swept the wall," the Prince of Bayeux informed her. "She has a foothold and requests reinforcements so that she might expand on it."

The First Princess took a moment to recall where the fantassin captain was fighting – further east, close to Beatrice of Hainaut's forces – before decisively nodding.

"Then we commit the reserves to her breach," Rozala said. "The gatehouse still holds strong, we may not have another opportunity."

"My thoughts exactly," Prince Arsene smiled.

Even odds whether or not he was lying. The Prince of Bayeux had spent most of the war trying to keep his soldiers out of the fighting as much as possible, but he was not unskilled in military matters. For all that he was averse to risk in battle, he might well realize that Rozala meant every word when she said that this might be the only opportunity for a breakthrough they would get today. Desperation on your part did not mean weakness on the enemy's, the First Princess knew. She had learned that lesson during the Great War, long before she sat a throne.

"Pass on my compliments to Captain-General Ferreiro," Rozala added. "I believe the Ligera Bandera might well be the first to take the wall today. A boast worth adding to the histories of their company."

Should they all survive, she did not add. It was the dark cloud that haunted every sentence spoken these days, like some pettily malevolent ghost. Prince Arsene bowed again, offering three flowery compliments about her beauty before taking his leave. Alamans, she thought, turning her head so that no one would see her roll her eyes. Most of Rozala's captains were out there, leading the Aquitan troops in assault their section of the wall, but she had kept a few with her under the salamander banner of the Malanzas to serve as councillors and command her retinue.

Captain Salvador had served her house for half a century, first her mother and then her. He'd once saved her life at the Sack of Lullefeuille. So when the hatched-faced man with the great mustache came to her with a grim look, Rozala straightened. Salvador was past sixty now, but there were few men she trusted more.

"There is trouble," he quietly told her. "Our path back to camp is being cut off."

Rozala's stomach clenched.

"The dead are moving in behind us?" she asked.

"Princess Beatrice sends words that her outriders caught companies of Bones circling around her position instead of hitting her flank," Captain Salvador said.

"Then they're moving to hit us from the back," Rozala grimaced.

Which was a potential disaster. When launching her assaults on the walls, she had been forced to cycle her wounded to the back of her formation so that fresh troops could lead the storm. There were fresh Orense men there also, of course, she was not the kind of fool to leave her back unguarded. But it was the most fragile part of her army and the Dead King's general seemed to have sniffed out the weakness.

"What can we spare?" she asked.

"Not much, unless the reserve is recalled from the storm," the older man told her.

Which she could not. Not only had she just sent them out, if they were pulled away then the Ligera Bandera's foothold would be lost and their assault might entirely fail. But if the rear of the army collapsed, then... Fear is what the Enemy wants, the First Princess reminded herself. It is what he seeks with this manoeuvre. Rozala found her calm, laying a hand on the curved breastplate her late pregnancy was forcing her to wear. She knew what must be done.

"Scrape together everything you can," Rozala ordered. "And raise the banner."

"Your Highness?" Captain Salvador asked.

"We fight, sir," the First Princess of Procer said. "I will lead the defence myself."

—

Yara of Nowhere did not exist, then she did.

She was the edge of a roof, a handful of Revenants moving below her. There was a loose tile under her foot. She had never been able to feel Neshamah's little puppets as well as true Named, but the echoes of their authorities gave her just a bit of a hook. It didn't amount to much, since he could take control of them whenever he wished, but sometimes all you needed was a pebble to start the avalanche. Yara hummed, fingers tapping against the side of her leg, and waited for the right time. It was easy enough to know it even with her sight ripped out, for to Narrate a story was to know how to incite incident. Like, say, by nudging a loose tile forward. It dropped, shattering in the street, and the noise drew the attention of the last of the moving puppets.

The Revenant turned and saw in the distance the glint of the sun on steel.

"That'll do it," Yara mused, reaching for her flask.

Sahelian was hard to read, close to Named but not, and that made it difficult to follow her story past a certain point. For this much, though, what Yara could see would be enough. That pretty little trick the Hierophant had cooked up with the Crown of Autumn was not to stay in the game. It was a defeat Nessie might be willing to suffer, being shackled with that, and there would be none of that. The Grand Alliance was going to fight a cornered rat with nothing to lose, not a becalmed King of Death thinking there was still a way out of this. He was losing the Serenity, his great defensive ritual was being cracked open but the dwarves and now armies were about to hit the last of his walls.

"Didn't I tell you, Neshamah?" Yara said, raising her flak in a toast. "Eat the fucking baby."

—

Akua first knew it was going wrong when she saw the corpses.

Two of them, laying abandoned on the ground. The Grizzled Fantassin had been stabbed in the throat repeatedly until there was nothing left there but red meat, and she would not have recognized the Hunted Magician if not for his rich enchanted robes. The Proceran mage's corpses was shrivelled beyond recognition, a dried-out husk.

"Shit," Archer whispered. "There go our reinforcements."

"Only two dead out of the band," Akua said.

"Sidonia led them," Indrani said, her tone too casual. "She's not the kind of woman that'd leave the dead bodies of her people behind if she's in any state to take them."

The Vagrant Spear had spent some time under Archer when she led a band of her own, the sorceress recalled. There might have been genuine fondness there, though this was not the time for comfort and Indrani hardly cared to receive that sort of thing anyway. Not from her, at least. Only Catherine and Masego had managed to wedge themselves between the porcupine's thorns so they would not prick their hand when extending it. Akua instead threw up shields without voicing an incantation even as her Archer nocked an arrow, only then approaching the bodies. There was no telling whether it was a Revenant, a Scourge or even simple dead that'd done this.

The Hunted Magician had been killed by a curse but those were not unique to the Mantle, and there seemed to be nothing magical about the Grizzled Fantassin's ruined throat.

"So?" Archer asked.

"No telling whose work it was," Akua admitted. "But I still believe we should change our path."

"To where?" Indrani replied. "We can't go east to the Proceran push, the whole point of riding in the shadow of Hakram's assault was making sure our eggs weren't all in one basket. We could try to go north to see if the Praesi are getting through, but there's nothing certain about it."

"I do not believe Bones did this," the golden-eyed mage said, pointing at the bodies. "Which means it is also a certainty we will face Revenants, if we continue our path to the inner wall."

"We can handle Revenants," Archer dismissed, but Akua's eyes narrowed.

Ah, she thought. Indrani was hoping to destroy whatever undead had assaulted the Vagrant Spear's band in order to avenge a woman she'd been fond of.

"Whether or not we can beat them is irrelevant," Akua replied. "Revenants are not like other dead, a part of Trismegistus' attention rides with them always. The moment we fight even one, he will know where we are."

Indrani's face tightened with displeasure. Akua began to muster her arguments – using Catherine tended to be useful but only in small doses, since Archer would rebel at the thought of being 'tame' – when the other woman suddenly sighed and spat to the side.

"You're right, Former Phantom," Indrani conceded. "We need to make it quietly to the wall. Past Hakram's lines and north to the Praesi, then?"

"It seems our best bet," Akua agreed. "We-"

Sudden warmth against her skin as one of the enchanted rubies beneath her armour suddenly heated told her an enchantment was being directed at her, which saved her life. By reflex, she detonated her shields and the burst of it kicked up ash, coating the invisible Seelie's side with it even as an illusion pretended to stab Akua in the throat. Archer kicked the Scourge in the side, getting a grunt out of her, and Akua hissed out an incantation. She threw a fireball at the Revenant's head which the illusionist contemptuously cut through only to trigger the second part of the formula, a vicious burst of frost that shattered the blade.

The redheaded Scourge in her vulgar gown snarled, her passably attractive face turning monstrous and sinister, and barked out a word in something that sounded like Chantant.

"Time to run," Archer grunted, idly putting an arrow in the eye of what turned out to be an illusion.

The Seelie was gone again, no doubt looking for an opening.

"Agreed," Akua fervently said. "It's only a matter of time until-"

A wave of pressure pushed at her magic as a ward came down. Containment, the sorceress idly assessed. We are being kept inside a circle.

"That," she finished with a sigh.

"Cage?" Indrani asked, nocking an arrow as she spoke.

Akua nodded, beginning a trailing cant – the shared beginning of several spells of very different effects, which would let her adapt to the situation as it unfolded instead of being forced to start anew if taken by surprise.

"Bummer," Archer drily said.

As if summoned by the word, silhouettes crested at the edge of rooftops and walked out into the streets surrounding them. Not a horde this, only a dozen individuals or so, but that was not a good sign. A horde of skeletons, Akua could have scattered easily.

The dozen Revenants converging on them would be harder to deal with.

—

The Dead King was not holding back, Rozala thought.

The Enemy had assembled a force meant to break her army's rearguard with poisonous haste since the defeat inflicted on its attempted encirclement. The fangs were first bared before the First Princess arrived with her reinforcements, an attack in two strokes. First a stream of pale slug-like creatures made of corpse fat had swarmed all over the broken gate of Keter, devouring the soldiers there and then allowing themselves to be lit aflame by some undead mage. They burned merrily, cutting off Rozala's army from the camp and filling the air with poisonous clouds that the wind was blowing her way. The second stroke came when ghouls began pouring out of what she was assured had been an empty house, overrunning three positions before a shield wall could be assembled.

"We faced the same trap yesterday," the First Princess told the still-befuddled Orense general. "Deep basements were dug under some of the houses and kept sealed after being filled to the brim with undead. The enemy were there all along, waiting for the Dead King's order."

At least it wasn't a maze of tunnels under the city they were dealing with, only sporadic hidden basements – though Rozala suspected that had more to do with a strong mage being able to collapse tunnels than lack of interest on the Dead King's part. He'd always liked his underground tricks, the old monster. There was a reason Rozala still had to sleep with an ear to the ground no matter how many wards she intellectually knew were keeping the dead from digging underneath the camp.

"I am shamed to have been caught by it," the dark-haired general replied. "We will earn back our honour with blood, Your Highness. Our shield wall will hold."

No it won't, Rozala thought, looking at the clash. Not only was Keter flooding their backlines with every spare undead they had to throw at it but a force had also clearly been assembled to crack their shield wall. It was the only reason the First Princess could think of there being so many 'mantises' here. Unlike beorns and tusks, who were meant to shatter shield walls with sheer power, that particular breed of monsters worked in precision. At first look they could pass for strange, carapaced horses but once they closed distance the mantises revealed the reason for their name: long, segmented legs ending in hooked bones blades unfolded.

They went over the shields of shield walls, tearing through soldiers from the back to shred them in moments.

She could see at least four dozen of those mixed in the horde the Orense soldiery was holding back as her retinue came to prop the up, though they had not yet struck. The moment they did, the entire shield wall would collapse in a matter of moments. Rozala's mind spun, looking for a way through. What mages she had were already busy keeping vultures away, lest the flying pests begin going for the wounded and attack the healers, and though she'd been able to pull away a few priests it would not be enough to hold back the enemy when they pushed. Their defence would not hold, she realized as she went through every trick and tactic she'd learned since she had first taken up command.

There was nothing she knew that would keep the dead from tearing past them and overrunning the infirmaries, sweeping over priests and wounded before consuming the entire Proceran army from the inside.

Then the banner caught her eye. The scarlet salamander on flaxen bed with the Malanza words beneath: Through Peril, Rise. Yes, Rozala thought, laying a hand over the armour beneath which her daughter yet to be born slumbered. I should not have forgot. She could not hold the defences of the rearguard, not with the forces at hand, so she ought not to defend at all. She gave her instructions, sent for the priests and the horsemen, and then reached for her banner to take it up. Rozala spurred her horse forward, heading for the shield wall, and once there shouted the order.

"STRIKE," the First Princess of Procer screamed. "We were the first wall of Calernia and we will not fail it today, so STRIKE!"

There were not enough priests to make a great wall of yellow Light, the kind that had been first used at the Battle of Camps and one many fighting says since, but that wasn't what Rozala had been after. Instead she had told them to create oblique lines through the enemy ranks, crackling Light burning the dead whenever they touched it. Their formation suddenly crisscrossed by lines of Light, the undead fell into disarray even as the Proceran foot surged forward. Rozala surged with them, a ring of guards around her as to the sides the last of her cavalry poured into the breach. It was working, the First Princess realized with numb relief. The mantises had come out but they were a precision tool, not much better than any other construct in a wild melee, and as the dead were driven back the priests ended their lines of Light to create fresh ones deeper in.

But the attack was slowing down, ground to a halt by the sheer thickness of the ranks of the dead, and Rozala knew her duty.

She went into the press of it, sword in hand and banner in the other. It was a wild thing, the melee, and though she swung through skulls and shattered shields a ghoul slipped past her guards and under her horse, eviscerating her. The undead was pinned by a spear a moment later but Rozala fell off, desperately leaning on the banner so she wouldn't land on her belly. It was in an awkward crouch she landed, both hands on the banner's shaft as she had dropped her sword. She groped for it and heard roars around her as she rose, the soldiers burning at the sight of the First Princess fighting in the ranks. Malanza swords all around her, Rozala raised her banner.

"Procer," she shouted. "For Procer, and every land we lost!"

They charged, Light and sorcery crackling on all sides as steel clashed with steel. The dead were breaking, Rozala could feel it. And soon there would be reinforcements – the Fox was sure to see that there was heavy fighting at the rearguard and move to support them. The enemy lines gave, like gasping lips, but even as triumph swelled in her heart Rozala Malanza saw the Revenant. A tall and armoured form, its rusted plate weeping red as it strode forward and calmly cut through men. Its great two-handed broadsword shattered shields and smashed helms, unerringly cutting down anyone who approached. And the Revenant was coming, inexorably, for her.

"Priests," Rozala shouted, but none answered.

It would be steel, then. She surged forward with her retinue, unwilling to give the enemy the choice of how to engage. They would flood it with numbers. Only the Revenant kept advancing, cutting through one soldier after another and ignoring the blows that ripped at its rusted plate only to reveal only weeping redness beneath it. Rozala screamed as Captain Salvador's head went flying past her, thrusting her blade into the Revenant's visor, but she felt no flesh beneath the steel. Only bones and wetness. The Revenant cut at her, sending her flying back as her pauldron came off from the strength of the blow and her bones creaked.

Leaning on the banner she got back to her feet as the Revenant kept calmly advancing. All around her the charge was faltering, fear spreading through her soldiers, and Rozala Malanza breathed out. It was clear, in her mind's eye, what must be done. One last death to stiffen their spine and save the army from collapse. I'm sorry, Louis, she thought. We'll both wait for you halfway there, that we might meet the Gods Above together. The First Princess of Procer lowered her banner like a spear, pointing at the Revenant, and shook her hair free of her helm. She took a step forward, seeing the rising arc of the enemy's blade and her death waiting within in.

"Forward," Rozala Malanza shouted, charging forward. "And fear not-"

Before the banner could spear the Revenant's throat, before its blade could take her head, a star fell. Or so it felt like, for the blinding Light seared her eyes as she glimpsed a man rip out the dead Name's sword arm and wetness gush out. Rozala stepped back, shading her eyes, and when the brightness faded she saw Hanno of Arwad drive his sword deep in the Revenant's guts. Light boiled, roiled, and red vapour wafted upwards as the creature let out a silent scream. The hero turned to her, face calm as glimmers of Light turned his eyes gold in the shade of the falling ash, and smiled.

"And fear not death," Hanno of Arwad smiled. "Not while I am here."

The hero cocked his head to the side, as if listening to a voice only he could heard, and then he was gone in a burst of movement. Leaving the First Princess of Procer to look forward at the collapsing ranks of the dead before her, and the victory she had somehow not needed to die to achieve.

—

The Mirror Knight took the blow on his shield, the beorn driving him three step backs into a swarm of skeletons that hit away at his armour fruitlessly. Even when they found his skin, their blades bounced off. Gritting his teeth, Christophe de Pavanie pulled at the power within himself. Reflect. The beorn's belly was ripped open as the strength it had struck with was thrown back at it, the hero taking a measured step forward to cut all the way through the side with his blade to make sure it wouldn't be getting up. He shook off the skeletons, smashing them every which way, and checked that the Severance was still safely loosened to his back. It was.

A Bind had tried to take it earlier only to be cut all the way through without Christophe lifting a finger to achieve this, but this would not be the Dead King's last attempt. He was out in the open now, it was only a matter of time until harder foes than skeletons and beorns came forward. Absent-mindedly sweeping through a company of skeletons to make it back to the Ligeras' position, the Mirror Knight found most the others had gone further down the rampart to help the fantassins in their bid to reach the gatehouse and wrest open the doors. Attempting to go down into the inner city through the stairs had only served to reveal that the 'entropy fields' were already awake.

Only the Knight Errant remained at the foothold, the boy in fair armour wielding a sword that looked like smoke turned into a blade.

"Sir Mirror," Arthur Foundling called out. "You've returned. The beorn?"

"Done," Christophe said. "There were also a pair of tusks so I cleaned them up while I was there."

They might have been difficult for the fantassins to deal with, if he'd not been there to take the charge on their behalf.

"You just-" the boy began, then shook his head. "Never mind, I should have expected no less."

Was the Knight Errant doubting his word? It was an insult, but Christophe supposed he'd been the only one to see the tusks. He would not take it personally. Callowans were not well inclined to him as a rule.

"Have you spoken with Captain-General Ferreiro?" he asked.

"No," Arthur Foundling said, "but she sent an officer. She's focusing on the push towards the gatehouse to try to let in the rest of the army, but she's warned us that-"

A shadow was cast over the two of them and the soldiers all around, for a tall shape had come to stand between them and the sun. The Titan Kreios strode over houses carefully, taking pains to avoid stepping on Proceran soldiers, but he was tall enough even a careful stride was like the wind. Christophe had never quite realized how tall the Riddle-Maker was, taller even than the towering Gigantes. The ancient mage used no ladder to climb the rampart, climbing it as one would a garden fence. He crushed a few hundred dead rising to his feet, standing taller now than all of Keter save for the tower deep at the heart of the Crown of the Dead.

"That the Titan is headed our way," the Knight Errant faintly said.

"Thank you for the warning," Christophe politely said.

Which had the boy glaring at him for some reason. Callowans, he ruefully thought. So prickly. The eyes of the Titan found them both, sliding over to the Severance and lingering there for a moment.

"Children," Kreios Riddle-Maker said. "Prepare yourselves. I will now silence the enemy's trick."

The Knight Errant saluted with his sword, but Christophe simply nodded. Satisfied of the acknowledgements, the Titan stepped down into the fields of time that should have wasted him away like a man sliding into a pond. The old god only laughed at the magic lapped at his body.

"A hundred million droplets can be an ocean, Young King, but they can also be nothing more than rain. Your learning is yet shallow."

The Titan raised his hands, and magic began to pour out of the ground like tendrils.

"Kronia will forgive me, this once, for borrowing her sickle."

The Mirror Knight watched silent as magic burned, igniting the air, and stone began to turn to dust.

—

Akua flicked her wrist, a burst of nail-shaped curses flying out and hitting the Revenant's face.

They punched through the skin and he began to scream as his senses melted, the sorceress hastily backing away as a burst of flame exploded where she had stood a heartbeat before. Tracing a rune in the air, she smothered the smoldering sparks before they could turn into an animated shape again and broke into a run before the javelins began to fall. She turned a corner even as the sound of them crashing through stone tiles sounded behind her, murmuring a curse of thinning as she trailed a finger across the wall she was passing by. A heartbeat later a long-haired winged Revenant in armour dropped behind Akua, her iron spear already halfway into a strike.

Just in time for the wall to collapse on top of her armoured form.

Akua tossed back a minor jinx of slipperiness on the pile of stones to slow her down, knowing that the formula was highly responsive to separate surfaces, and lengthened the strides of her run. Archer was meant to be covering her, but... The thought was interrupted by a familiar silhouetted being thrown through a bronze grid a mere ten paces before her, Indrani let out a curse as she tumbled into old dust and landed in a sprawl. The golden-eyed Soninke dipped into her magic again, crafting a quick and loose illusion of the two of them running away as she ducked into the house and dragged Archer out of sight.

"Hey, Akua," Indrani groaned. "You found that ward anchor yet?"

Until it was destroyed, neither of them was getting out of the glowing circle in which they were being forced to fight. They'd tried, and while people and objects seemed able to come in nothing seemed able to come out – not even dust, which was coating the side of an invisible half-sphere instead.

"I believe I have," she replied, "but you won't like it."

"It's under that fucker in the golden armour, isn't it?" Archer sighed.

"I narrowed it down to a city block and within it there is a house whose entrances were all sealed by magic," Akua said.

"The one with the golden fucker on it," Indrani pressed.

She nodded in agreement, offering a sympathetic grimace.

"At least it's not a second Scourge," Archer said. "That'd be a little much even for me."

Which was, naturally, when lightning struck the roof above them and the Tumult made his entrance into the battle. Akua cursed, throwing up a shield as the two of them made for the door under collapsing stone, only to find two Revenants bearing swords and shields already there. The Twins, Akua had taken to calling them in her mind. Neither of them were all that difficult to deal with, but so long as one stood the other would keep repairing itself. They were not a great concern, but if they were here... Archer grabbed her by the scruff of the neck, throwing the both of them to the side as javelins began to fall like rain. They were simple bronze rods, but each hit with the strength of a ballista's bolt.

That Revenant only had one trick, but it was a decent one.

Akua landed on her back, Indrani's elbow digging into her face, and as the other woman got up longknives in hand she idly bespelled a cloud of smoke to blow into the face of the Twins. Knees aching, she began to rise. If she lingered, javelins would follow.

"I'll take Ugly and Ugles," Archer said. "Can you blow open that closed house?"

"I can," Akua agreed, but her eyes strayed above.

Storm clouds were gathering above their head. The Tumult had learned better than to fight her face to face, but its ability to so easily serve as magical artillery remained a thorn in Akua's side. If she'd not been looking that way already, the sorceress would never have seen the roof tile bend. As if there had been weight on it. She began to trace a shield, but even as Indrani turned at her alarmed shout and the Seelie flooded both their sights with illusions, Akua knew the Scourge's knife would strike true. The timing had been too good.

Or so she believed, until the Seelie came back into sight as her knife-wielding arm was snatched out of the air and she was smashed into the ground.

"You move loudly," the Lord of Silent Steps chided the undead.

Akua's heart soared at the sight. Ivah of the Losara was a powerful ally, for all that it usually disdained head-on fights.

"Ivah," Archer grinned. "You took your time."

"Apologies, Mighty Archer," Ivah idly replied. "I had to shepherd children."

"HONOUR TO THE BLOOD!"

Akua blinked away the burn of the Light as the Vagrant Spear tore into the side of one of the Twins, deftly kicking the other in the face as she pierced through the other's stomach. Akua flicked a spell of binding at the feet of the one getting kicked, ensuring he fell, and Indrani shoved a knife through the throat of what should have been the Seelie but was instead a bed of wilted flower petals. Twice now the Scourge had pulled that trick and it wasn't getting any less annoying. The sorceress smoothly transitioned into the incantation for a triple-layered shield that would be able to withstand the javelins soon to follow, but it ended up unnecessary.

A spectre leapt out to devour them as they howled through the air, the Harrowed Witch recalling her brother's bound shade to her side afterwards.

"The third?" Akua asked the Lord of Silent Steps.

"Listen for the shouting," the Firstborn drily replied.

There was a blind scream of rage somewhere ahead, followed by a house collapsing and the storm clouds above their heads calling down lightning there instead. One the torrent of lethal magic had passed and smoke began to rise, mocking laughter came from that direction.

"Should have put your back into it, Tumult," the Red Knight taunted. "I've had worse from Clevelen weather."

Well, Akua thought as she rolled her shoulders and cracked her neck – a terribly uncouth habit, but exactly as satisfying as she'd thought it would feel when she had first seen Catherine indulge – now this ought to be a rather more even fight. She adjusted the box holding the Crown of Autumn on her back and reached for her magic.

"Let's begin this properly, then," the Doom of Liesse said, her smiled showing all too many teeth.

—

Cordelia had always hated battles.

An ironic thing, considering that for all her politicking it was victorious battles that had enthroned her as First Prince of Procer, but no less true for it. One of her predecessors, First Princess Eugénie of Lange, had once called diplomacy 'war without all the clumsiness'. For all that Cordelia was inclined to think well of the woman's record otherwise – most of her reign had been spent repairing Procer after the wounds inflicted by the Dominion throwing out its occupiers – in that particular matter she disagreed. Diplomacy was simply not as arbitrary as war, where an empire could be doomed because it had been a misty morning or the wind was blowing the wrong way.

Under the intellectual disliked, though, the fair-haired princess knew that her hatred came from the source of helplessness. All her life she had sent other people to make war on her behalf, sitting miles away behind tall walls and fighting the urge to bite at her fingernails until she could know whether the day's horror was to be the mother of victory or defeat. She was hardly the only royal, even among Lycaonese, who did not take to the field themselves. Yet she had always felt it as a manner of failure on her part. Her mother had fought in the ranks, sword in hand. She'd died there too, though, leaving Cordelia to rule Rhenia alone all too soon. It still reeked of sending people to die in her name, a feeling she guiltily despised all the more for the way it held a grain of truth.

And now here, at the edge of the world, she still sat behind wards and walls as she waited for news of the battle unfolding inside the Crown of the Dead.

She had done her best to ensure that she could get swift word. At each gatehouse she had a group of messengers and a loose net of them through the entire ring camp that would serve as a relay to get developments to her quickly. It was how she'd learned that the League's offensive had stalled, only for Basilia to break the stalemate after heavy losses for the Bellerophans. She had learned of it too late for her tastes, though, and the further the armies got into the city the less she heard. Marshal Juniper had allowed an observer in her command tent as what Cordelia would like to take as a gesture of goodwill but was most likely Catherine's order, which helped, but only so much.

Messengers now had to venture into Keter, following the armies through besieged lines and dangers. Half of them never returned and those that came back did not always have much more information to share than what their eyes could gather: officers on the ground had more important duties to handle than speaking to her messengers and Cordelia was no longer First Prince. She could be ignored, now, dismissed. Her displeasure no longer had the old sting to it.

What she did learn came in waves. There had been an attempt to encircle and destroy Principate forces that'd been beaten back with General Abigail's timely help. The Clans had broken through all opposition coming in from the west and reached the walls. The Dominion, serving as the Black Knight's rear guard, had seen some heavy fighting. The last word she'd gotten was that the Titan had reached the walls, though she had no real notion of whether or not the ancient mage had silence the Dead King's magical defences as he had promised to. Still, in at least one regard Cordelia had learned in advance of generals and officers instead of the other way around.

Out in the Ossuary the dwarves had sent up the first of two agreed-upon signals: the Herald of the Deeps had reached the ritual site below the city. The second signal, which would signify the site had been destroyed, had yet to follow. No doubt the Enemy had fortified the position thoroughly, so it could be some time yet before it fell – the very reason Kreios' presence was necessary, since the 'entropy fields' were certain to activate before then.

Cordelia could only imagine, the very reason she was sitting at the table with sheaths of papers before her and trying very hard to think of anything except the possibility that the Grand Alliance would lose. Armies had made it to the inner wall, she knew, and even broken through. But the fighting would only get harder from there, with little room for retreat as the dead still in the outer city tore through the rearguards. Yet she had not wanted to spend the entire battle reminding herself she had been better raised than to bite her nails, which was why she'd brought out a quill and inkwell so she might lay out proposals for the tax system of Cardinal one it was built.

The attendant territory of the city, after all, would be much too small to sustain it should the seat of the Accords grow to the expected size. The princess had been considering the respective merits of tariffs and whether quarries might be a possible source of revenue for some time, but even as she tried to make herself look at the papers she found her attention straying. In the margin of a section on the dangers of imposing punitive tariffs when a trace crossroads was just beginning, she'd found that her hand was tallying losses. How many soldiers dead, how bad were the odds getting? Cordelia's attention was failing, the only saving grace being that Brother Simon had been too polite to comment on it.

She sighed, giving it up for a lost cause, and set down the quill.

"The waiting is always the worst part," Simon de Gorgeault quietly said.

"I sometimes feel I have done nothing else all my life," Cordelia tiredly admitted. "Just years and years of waiting in between a few days of haste."

The once-spymaster sympathetically nodded.

"I have found prayer a comfort in moments like these," Simon said, "but I suspect you'd not share the inclination."

"I like the Gods to stay in their Heavens," Cordelia smiled. "The Highest Assembly's floor is crowded enough without them taking up seats."

"Blasphemy," the lay brother said, though his tone was amused.

It was not that the princess did not believe in the virtue of the Gods Above and the worth of their teachings, but rather that she'd never thought of miracles as a solution. Miracles were passing things, beautiful but ephemeral, and you could not build on such a foundation. Prayer was good and worthy thing, but Lycaonese knew better than to rely on it when spring arrived and the Chain of Hunger came calling. Or perhaps that was only a conceit, Cordelia Hasenbach thought as she touched the bracelet of rattling teeth digging into her wrist under her sleeve, as she felt a folded parchment burning against the warmth of her breast.

Perhaps it was just a different kind of prayer, to wear the last gifts of those she had loved and hope they would see her through the storm. Friedrich Papenheim's small act of kindness had stayed with her since she was fourteen, and now Agnes Hasenbach's last words were to remain against her skin until she knew it was time to read them. One last augury from another cousin she had loved, another kin devoured by this black war. Deep down, Cordelia was relieved she would be abdicating Rhenia and Hannover to Otto Reitzenberg. She feared returning north and seeing only a land of empty seats and silences, the expression of everything and everyone she had lost.

"They will breach the inner city soon, if they have not already," Brother Simon told her, looking past the entrance of the tent and into the emptied camp around them. "The first inklings of victory will soon arrive."

Or defeat, she thought, but the former spy was a hopeful man at heart. Cordelia rose to her feet, moving towards the carafe of water at the other end of the table, and cocked a questioning eyebrow at her companion. He shook his head so she poured a cup only for herself, debating whether or not she should force herself to attempt working again, when the sound began. It was a small thing, at first, like a faint chirp. Only it swelled and grew, turning from whisper to word to scream, and the princess abandoned a half-empty cup to walk out of the tent. In the distance, past the edge of the camp, she saw only the heavy smoke rising from the chasm.

It had been this way for hours, the magics of the dwarves lighting up the foul emanations as if an entire Hell had been unleashed far below. Yet Cordelia's cool blue eyes narrowed as she realized that it was not only smoke she was looking at now. There was movement there, half-hidden by the obscuring curtains.

The first to come out was a bird, a simple sparrow that flew out of the smoke, but the sight of it had dread pooling in her stomach.

A wave followed, dead birds and insects pouring out of the depths of the chasm like a tidal wave that swept over the camp. It was so thick it cast a shadow, hiding away the sun, and hulking shapes began to swim in the sea of death like great whales. Winged wyrms and flocks of vultures, but also creatures shaped like boxes of bone kept aflight by balloon-like breathing lungs. And not so much as a single fly moved towards Keter, towards the fighting in the city and the armies coming for the Dead King's head. They all converged in one direction. Cordelia Hasenbach breathed out as the Enemy's hordes came for the weapon she had kept as a knife to his throat.

"Bring up the battle wards," the princess ordered, voice eerily calm. "And get into position."

Fear had frozen her soldiers at the sight of what was headed for them, despair at numbers they knew they could not beat, but her voice woke them. There were salutes and captains began to shout orders, sorcery flaring as mages put up every layer of defence they still could. The Hidden Horror feared the ealamal, Cordelia thought. He was coming to destroy it. Even if her life had not been in the balance, it would have been as fine a reason as any to fight to the last defending it. Her fingers reached for her heart and the parchment folded against it, but the fair-haired Lycaonese forced herself to pull away. It was not yet time. She tore her eyes away from the swarm, turning to Brother Simon.

A brave man, the spy, who was looking at the tide of death much as one might look at inclement weather.

"I will have to trouble you, Simon," she said.

"What for, my lady?" he asked, sounding surprised.

"A sword," Cordelia Hasenbach grimly said.

If the ealamal was overrun and the battle about to be lost, she may well have no choice but to pull the trigger. But she would not let fear own her, not when she bore on her the last wills of her cousins. She was, for all her years in the south, still Lycaonese.

She'd fight until the end of the world.

Mary Gentle

Grim.

Next up, Cat?

(And I LOVE Losara!)

gnaruscat

Wait, THAT Mary Gentle?

gnaruscat

Wait, THAT Mary Gentle?

Eris

I wonder what horrible things the Dead King will pull up to stop from dying, and why Bard wants that so bad. I wonder what the Bard means when she wants the Dead King to eat the baby.

Darkening

Well, she crippled Judgement, so now the Ealamal is just a blank vessel of energy with no direction except what Bard provides. So now she needs the dead king to crush his enemies, and push them into such a desperate last corner that there is no viable alternative to Codelia pulling the trigger and letting Bard use it to murder the Dead King. It'll even have a pretty hefty story to it to give it punch, the last desperate chance to save the world moments before it falls, at a terrible cost.

Darkening

Or maybe she'll steal it and use it to commit suicide, that's a possibility too.

Cicero

Yup, my guess is that the Bard sees it as a way for her to kill the Dead King, and all the pesky Villains and Heroes that have been making her life difficult lately. Burn the world to ash and let new kingdoms arise from the ashes.

Sort of the same story she was peddling to the Saint of Swords.

Frankly it's bothering me quite a bit that she's sabotaging Cat's efforts in such a way, feels both petty and cruel.

Darkening

I mean, she sabotaged the crown, not the sword. So presumably her line is that she wants the Dead King dead, not for him to just get changed from the looming evil overlord to the Sealed Away Evil, just waiting for someone to screw up and unleash him onto the world again.

caoimhinh

That reminds me that the Dead King's reaction when finding out the core wish of the Wandering Bard was to call her petty and say that everyone would turn against her once they find out.

knockoffnikolai

Strategically speaking, Nessie plays things extremely conservatively to avoid provoking narrative backlash. When Bard told him to "eat the baby" last time, that was her saying that it was okay not to hold back. It means more or less the same thing here, only less "it's okay" and more "I'm not going to let you."

dadycoool

Rozala seems like she's gonna give birth soon.

caoimhinh

And like she really, really should stop leading charges and instead command from the rear like a strategist.

Adrian V

Yeah, at this pace that baby will only come out thanks to a literal miracle, or maybe it will end as some sort of super powered human due to being around light, night, magic etc so much?

dadycoool

I'm expecting someone to use the birth as some rousing positive omen, something about "new life in the city of death" or something.

caoimhinh

Oh, yeah. The baby born on the day of the victory's celebration.
A good omen for the new era.

onedollargum

Eating the baby is a reference to when Intercessor met with the King and said that, though they were normally at odds, this time she'd allow him to eat the baby godhead that Catherine was becoming (Cat being Winter at that point I think).

Intercessor doesn't care about keeping King in check as much as she wants Cat dead. She's not going to let King take the lesser death (imprisonment via Crown of Autumn) but wants him to fight like a cornered rat and maul Cat to death (The Hierarch is in Serenity, and the Ealamal is on Calernia, so there's nowhere to go but to gain power by eating The Warden).

Liliet

"allow him to eat the baby godhead" is speculation, and not a theory I think is likely. She just meant "do your worst to Calernia" and she continues to mean that.

'Ladi Williams

Eat the baby generally means doing the worst possible...not cats godhead...

beleester

Bard wants the Dead King to go all-out fighting them, and I can think of two reasons:

1. She wants the Dead King to be completely destroyed, not just sealed away or weakened, and that's more likely if he pulls out all the stops. Nessie is too cautious to be allowed to live – he doesn't care if his plans take centuries to succeed, so long as he keeps creeping closer to victory.
2. She wants to destroy Cat's new age before it starts, because that sort of thing is Not How Stories Should Go.

SeventhSolar

It's like kicking the dog, but for eldritch horrors.

MoreBeer

Pretty sure it's exactly this. He has to be a baby-eating fiend that must be destroyed, not pushed aside. Yara's statements in context suggest she doesn't want him to be dealt with by accepting the compromise of the crown that makes him immortal while stripping away his control of the undead. Either her goal is his total destruction or Cat's, and possibly both.

Cpt. Obvious

I still feel like everything WB does is intended to push Cordelia into using her weapon of mass destruction.

Freeing the choir of Justice has the possibility of totally changing the power level of this WMD. Remember that it was just the fact that the choir was held in check by the Hierarch that allowed the Ealamal to be used without bringing down Judgement on half of Calernia. It's also the reason the priests were able to invoke a amount of leniency so it wouldn't judge everyone who as a child lied even once. Is the fact that the choir is quiet for a day going to mean it's powers are unavailable, or does it mean that they won't be able to moderate the power of the Ealamal and it sucs down all the power of the choir? And finally the Proceran priests has spent months cramming as much Light as they are able to into that thing in the belief that would be the total amount of power it would be using.

As for WB hating the DK I feel it's been overplayed. I don't think she actually cares about the DK. She just wants the WMD set off. It could be to cleanse the continent and rebuild from the ashes, but personally I think it's her way to suicide and give the finger to the Gods that created this travesty.

morroian

Writing this from the future where you no doubt know what happens but without knowing yet what happens, 100% WB wants Cordy to use the weapon and 100% Cordy will read Agnes's letter before that.

Earl of Purple

Ivah chiding the Seelie for having loud footsteps was great. Pity about the Hunted Magician and the Grizzled Fantassin, but the Harrowed Witch and Red Knight are still awesome. I like them both. I wonder if Red Knight's Devour is an opposite aspect to Mirror Knight's Reflect or Dawn, strengthening her by taking power from the attacks she tanks.

arcanavitae15

I like that Ivah was also on babysitting duty for the heroes, also yah now that I noticed it the Red Knight and Mirror Knight do seem like foils both were very classical to their alignment.

Earl of Purple

Technically only one of them is a hero. Harrowed Witch and Red Knight are villains.

Liliet

But they're on the side of good ™ right now so as a group might well count as heroes

Rey d`Tutto

Anti-heroes. Villainy for Good.

sengachi

My favorite part is how Akua spotted the Seelie by the bent roof tile, but totally missed Ivah right behind the Seelie on the same roof. Especially given how insanely on top of everything Akua was in that battle, it really tells you everything you need to know about the Lord of Silent Steps.

'Ladi Williams

Truth be told. Akua was awesome in the battles in this chapter. Like insanely good.

Earl of Purple

I had genuinely not caught that.

Tenthyr

Oh my lord it's getting tight. Im morbidly curious how much more tightly Yara can turn the screws.

KiltedBastich

It occurs to me, the Bard can't hide what she's doing. Cat will be able to feel every tug on the story strings. I wonder what's she's going to do about it.

ninegardens

Wait until Cat is busy dealing with the Serenity far far away from the battle, with no communication line back, I would imagine.

Also, didn't Cat promise Hakram that he would fight with the Woe before the end here?

And isn't the Woe like... scattered to 3 different places?

Also, where is Vivi? Has she used her Thief skills to steal the angel stick?

Lord Haart

I think the promise is a way to ensure they have story weight to all reach the end, which does sort of help Hakram's push.

Great callout on Vivi, hidden access I reckon.

shikkarasu

I'm not sure Cat is that good, yet. She needs to focus on the stories to See them, and only once she got her Aspect proper could she reliably do it from far away. Yara is mostly Narrating the Revenants and Scourges right now, whose stories are too tied up in the Dead King's to be visible. If even Yara can't see much of their stories when she is focusing, Cat probably can't see anything at all.

Literally working in the Cat's blind spots, where she cannot See.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

edrey

i think the harrowed witch was with kalia in the south, and now she is in the north with akua. but if she can make copies of herself i wont complain, named are falling like flies.

Sinead

Ivah could have picked her up and then be shadow walking with her in tow.

Someperson

IIRC this wasn't the only Named showing up when they were confirmed to be in another place or deceased, in the last several chapters.

Either the Named are pulling out all of the stops to show up in the nick of time or there are revenants amogus

dadycoool

Oh, gods. Is the Red Knight an imposter?

Unrecovered

Is it Dread Emperor Treacherous who acts as a Red Knight?
We might never know...

Liliet

Are you thinking about the previous advance?

Akua is also not in the north. She's in the west.

Daniel E

Looks like Hanno has picked up a Choir again. It's probably not Judgement or Mercy, and definitely not Contrition. What is left?

arcanavitae15

I think it's just his name that is about to come to him.

Jkyoulost

That line about hearing an unseen voice reeked of Mercy though. I thought they were the only Choir we've seen speaking like that.

RoflCat

And the star from the sky

The 'timely arrival', the falling ashes

And the sudden disappearance after

He's definitely turning into something Grey. Probably not a Knight given his future spot in Cardinal, but probably not so limiting like Baliff.

Someperson

The unseen voice isn't necessarily a Choir. Anaxares the Diplomat has an Aspect that lets him hear things and it definitely isn't from a Choir.

It could be a Choir, but I would wager it isn't. During his most recent pivot he literally threw away the angel gifted coin and said he didn't need it anymore.

He might accept the help of angels, but I don't think he is in a place where he would follow their orders without hesitation if they whispered in his ear.

onedollargum

He rejected the coin, so I'm hoping he's decided to listen to his own judgement now.

Liliet

That's normal for the chosen of the Choir of Judgement actually. Hanno was just special.

ninegardens

Choir of judgement:

"Cool, so we'll get a mortal to help train our machine learning model and figure out how morality works"

The Mortal is Hanno

Judgement: "Welp, we ain't gonna learn shit now."

Mirror Night

Isn't there Fortitude or something? I think they are quite a few choirs, we just haven't seen them all being active. Different Choirs interact with their champions differently. The voice he could be hearing is an Aspect or it could be related to the Titan's ritual about to start.

Liliet

I think it's an Aspect, like Frederic's Aid.

Rey d`Tutto

Save?

shikkarasu

With that whole "Do not fear; I am here" I could be convinced of Smash. He is also the undisputed #1 Hero...

King G

There are probably just seven choirs (book two, chapter thirtynine notes Contrition is the seventh, and extra chapter Prosecution I shows seven pillars in Ashuran temple to each bear mask representing different Gods Above, and an eighth pillar to bear masks dedicated to Below).

Besides Contrition (Lone Swordsman William), Judgement (White Knight Hanno), and Mercy (Grey Pilgrim Tariq), we've also seen or heard of Fortitude (mentioned in Heroic Interlude: Balestra), Endurance (Stalwart Paladin Iason), and Compassion (formerly known as Reverence, according to the Bard in Interlude: Legends I).

Don't think the missing choir has been mentioned yet? Someone please correct me if I'm mistaken.

Cicero

Hmm, are Fortitude and Endurance different choirs? Or different names for the same choir?

I'm guessing the seven choirs is taken from the Seven Virtues, usually made up of the four Cardinal Virtues (Prudence, Fortitude, Justice, Temperance), and the three Theological Virtues (Faith, Hope, and Charity). Although there are alternative lists:

Chastity, Faith, Good Works, Concord, Sobriety, Patience, Humility.

Chastity, Temperance, Charity, Diligence, Kindness, Patience, Humility.

Some of these line up already (with overlap):

Fortitude = Fortitude = Diligence?

Justice = Judgement?

Charity = Compassion? = Good Works?

Kindness = Compassion

Patience = Mercy

Temperance = Justice = Judgement?

Temperance = Chastity?

Temperance = Sobriety?

Temperance = Prudence?

Temperance = Self Control => Contrition?

Humility = Contrition?
Humility = Reverence => Compassion?

It feels like the choirs overlap some of the seven virtues and so don't break down exactly on those lines but overall are inspired by the Seven Virtues, and so ought to cover them as a whole, even if specific virtues don't line up exactly.

So.... going off that I'd guess something like this for the choirs:

Fortitude/Endurance
Judgement
Contrition/Repentance
Mercy
Compassion/Reverence/Humility Sacrifice
Wisdom/Prudence

Isi Arnott-Campbell

In earlier books, Tariq's patrons were the Choir of Compassion and it was noted that the Choir of Mercy is a separate one whose mortal allies are obligate pacifists. Eventually EE started having everyone call Tariq's patrons the Choir of Mercy though. That might complicate this business somewhat.

agumentic

What? That's the first time I heard anything about Tariq's patrons being different, and I read those books as they came out. You sure you are not confusing something?

badatgames2911

Fuck yeah i love these chapters. I think Bard is "helping" in a way that she is making sure they kill nessie. Glad the knight trio is doin stuff and everytime the riddle makers condescends nessie i get so happy

All the drow are so badass. Fuckin "you step loud." Lol The red knight is really funny and cool too she out here like a fed top laner lv9ing all them fuckers.

Cordy be making me reall nervous ngl.

dadycoool

It sounds like Bard is "helping" the GA at first, but she's trying to get him to finally "eat the baby", so it sounds more like she's trying to get them to make him take drastic action.

Liliet

I think it's both? She's sure as hell not helping Neshamah. She's just stoking the conflict to be more desperate for both sides.

Rey d`Tutto

She can't die until Neshamah wins, or loses completely. She's sick and tired, and Cat won't take her Job, and her Role won't Die unless the Last Old Horror is Finally Dead. She wants the Old Horror to take that Step Beyond that will see Him Dead by Story-fu and Narrate-ive.

Liliet

Not unlikely!

sengachi

The Red Knight has exactly one trick, but like the javelin Revenant it's a really good trick.

*arcanavita*15

Lord of Silent Steps taking care of some kids (Heroes)

Yara is plotting having her old bud's back against the wall and is nudging stuff as always.

Rozla is leading a charge and Hanno comes i with the heroic rescue.

Riddle Maker just walking up and casually strolling through all the Young King's stuff.

All in all an eventful chapter, I am so hyped for what Cat is doing I am waiting something glorious.

Peter Emuss

Laughing at Christophe trying to find offence when he's actually being given a compliment and offering offence when he's trying to be polite. He really is so bad at people.

Peter Emuss

Whoops – that wasn't meant to be a reply.

badatgames2911

yall got me dead. yall cant just call him the young king lol its too much

Juff

Typo Thread:

"Not two sentiments > "No two sentiments fit so thick > feet so thick of cadaver > of cadavers the conscript > the conscripts in assault > to assault hatched > hatchet sends words > sends word was the edge > was on the edge flak > flask
laying abandoned > lying abandoned mage's corpses > mage's corpse her Archer > Archer see of > see if Scourged > Scourge bones blades > bone blades
the up > them up pests begin > pests began attack the > attacking the one many fighting says > one too many fighting days to a half > to a halt only to reveal only > only to reveal within in > within it dead Name's > dead Named's step backs > steps back loosened > tied silhouetted > silhouette
Indrani let > Indrani letting up longknives in hand > up, longknives in hand,
One the > Once the disliked > dislike had silence > had silenced
Cardinal one > Cardinal once

gingerlygrump

Sometimes I think EE is the Wandering Bard.

Someperson

EE is the Wandering Bard's subtler counterpart, the Stationary Bard.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I believe he confirmed somewhere at some point that his Name is Author, but I don't have a source so don't quote me on this.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. I have to agree with edrey: the Harrowed Witch was with Painted Knife and Knight Errant, who were to accompany Mirror Knight & guard the Severance. When Christophe saw "...the Mirror Knight found most the others had gone further down the rampart to help the fantassins in their bid to reach the gatehouse and wrest open the doors," I thought he was referring to Kallia and Aspasia. If Vagrant Spear's band originally included Grizzled Fantassin, Hunted Magician, and Red Knight, it seems odd they would have a second arcane magic user as their fifth member, especially a Villain.

2. Ideas for Hanno's new Name, inspired by others' comments above:

- a. Grey Knight (which will fit his proposed role in Cardinal re: the Liesse Accords)
- b. the Pilgrim Knight
- c. Knight of Mercy or the Sword of Mercy (either way, they sound oxymoronic)

onedollargum

Knight/Sword of Hope would be nice. Hope starkest when fear deepest like the preface says.

BargleNawdleZouss

OoooO0000000ooooo, I like your suggestion better!

Liliet

...well, they are already at the inner wall. Probably all of them are not very far from each other?

badatgames2911

tbh the Blade of Mercy JUST died. but i dont think its the Ophanim. i dont think its a quior at all bc cats not exactly on speaking terms with endurance, contrition, judgment.... the others. the only quior she kinda isnt k.o.s with is mercy true, but i think that hanno is kinda done being a quior boy for now, especially if he is gonna be cats muscle man in cardinal.

Earl of Purple

Despite the Name, Antoine the Blade of Mercy was not Choir-sworn. He was aligned with mercy as a concept, not Mercy as a Choir. If he was Choir-sworn, we didn't know that before and don't know to which Choir.

Lord Haart

I reckon it'd be a hoot if Hanno becomes the Intercessor. Stealing Yara's Role but not Name.

Interceding on behalf of the downtrodden and misjudged.

Interceding when Villains or Heroes go too far.

Interceding with choirs to make them fairer and more empathic.

BargleNawdleZouss

(Gods Below, I got cut off, grrr...)

3. Some Names MIA that I would love to see, preferably in a band: Witch of the Woods, Silver Huntress, Valiant Champion, Blessed Artificer, Stalwart Apostle. Team Amazon!

badatgames2911

isnt the Huntress with cat atm with Ranger/ Cocky and Heirophant?

BargleNawdleZouss

Oh, DUH, yes, you are correct. facepalm

dadycoool

Uh, uhm..."Eat the baby". There's a heavily pregnant woman in Keter. Should we be concerned?

On the other side of the city, Ivah is a gem, as usual. "You move loudly", it says to the untrackable and highly annoying Scourge.

Mirror Night

That seems too literal though as Bard said that line way before Rozala was pregnant.

onedollargum

She means Cat. It's a reference to an earlier conversation the Bard and King shared.

Liliet

It's a punchline to a joke. It's heavily metaphorical+abstract and does not mean anyone in particular.

dadycoool

I agree with both of you, I was just spooked by coincidence, especially given the setting and who said it.

Linnus42

I do wonder how close that baby is to being born though. Pregnant mothers tend to be close to immortal in all but the most dark fantasy now after the baby is born all bets are off.

masterofbones

And generally in a story like this, only one of them is long for the world.

BargleNawdleZouss

Please revisit the joke at the very end of Book 4, Interlude: Empires.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/24/interlude-empires/>

badatgames2911

im not goin back bc ill just take the soup thanks

Mirror Night

Hanno seems faster and stronger perhaps? He ripped the arm off a revenant so stronger sure. Its hard to tell if he is any faster though since he was already so fast. Indrani and Hanno kinda operated in their own speed tier though Hanno shows it off way more, Indrani doesn't usually give the impression she is the Flash like Hanno does. Maybe has a Choir or maybe he was hearing something Gigantes related.

Akua and Indrani are a fun pair. And plenty of epic performances from the Procerans. A very Proceran focused Chapter. Christophe still being a Himbo. Rozala almost epic last charge as DK uses his usual tricks and Cordelia guarding the weapon...I am curious where it even is. Even if we know it cannot be fired in the next 24 hours. Still amazing this is all going to be over in just 24 hours.

Bard is a hoot. its the butterfly effect in action. More confirmation that Bard doesn't really like characters on the cusp of getting a Name.

Liliet

Alright, so now we know what Bard wants. No we don't. We know how she's trying to achieve it, but we still don't know WHAT IT IS!

We do know what she doesn't want though, at least???

Liliet

Also I think Yara of Nowhere confirmed for her real name, because she normally respawns after dying with a new one, and she died in Ater but still has this one.

Rey d`Tutto

Yara of Nowhere wants to be Done.
She can't die unless the Age of Wonder is put to bed.

Neshamah Dead-Dead, or the whole Continent Dead.
All or Nothing lets her Die.

Rey d`Tutto

Note: the Wandering Bard knows the only way to forge a sword is by burning the ore in a crucible, beating the slag out, and controlling the mix of chemicals introduced in the forging and quenching.
This is not pleasant for the Ore. But is the only way to make a sword.

badatgames2911

I know she wants Neshamah mega dead but the age of wonders is already K.O yes? Kairos did that whole thing and that was his "call in my dues" thing i thought. "Lou and behold, I have slain- the age of wonders" or smthn like that

Liliet

Yeah but Neshamah is most certainly (this is speculation) the person who STARTED the Age of Wonders (it's associated with Trismegistan sorcery which he invented, and showy villains who he was a role model for). It makes sense that for the Age of Wonders to PROPERLY die he needs to be dead.

Something like an age may need many deaths before it is truly dead for good.

Snappy270

I dont think so. I remember the bard saying the only being older than her is the riddle maker. She was old when the dead king was named.

So I dont think she will die when the dead king dies. I think she could die when all of calernia is dead! Hence when she is forcing the fight to be worse.

I think she can only die if there are no more stories or she has a replacement.

Liliet

She specifically said she was new to her Role when she was talking to young Neshamah I believe

Lord Haart

But that was still before he kicked off the Age of Wonders.

DK dying seems more of a personal goal, if secondary to her own death.

Liliet

Just because it's speculation I like a lot doesn't mean it's not speculation.

That said YEAH THATS POSSIBLE!!!

Crash

Let's make a list of all the things she doesn't want a reverse engineer what she does want.

Sounds a lot like gift shopping, to be honest.

Liliet

skdjafldshfsdfl

Roddie

I think Akua seeing the tile falling was Cat's counter against the Intercessor. Considering after that they got a band of five.

KiltedBastich

Hmm, actually, they are six. Akua, Archer, Ivah, Vagrant Spear, Harrowed Witch, and Red Knight.

We know that non-named with sufficient Story weight can be part of a band of five, important here as neither Akua nor Ivah are currently Named.

So, which of them is the Sixth Ranger?

Mirror Night

I lean to Ivah being the 6th Ranger as he wasn't part of the plan.

The plan was send Duos with the DK ending Artifacts and have them link up with Bands for extra protection at the Inner Wall. Ivah is not Named and wasn't part of the plan so that makes him 6th Ranger in my book.

Interlude: Legends IV

"One hundred ninety-nine: this list began with the simplest of axioms, the first. In the years since others like you have added to or taken away from it, a chain that goes back further than any of us know, changing and twisting as it grows. In time no two list will be the same, save always in this one regard: there is no two hundredth axiom. That place remains empty, so that once you learn something worth passing down you may fill it yourself. Look forward, as we once did, and let those who come after you learn from our mistakes. What greater gift can there be?"

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

It would be a balancing act in two parts.

The first was the war without, the battle against the Dead King. The Black Knight had learned from yesterday's fighting, undone as it had come, but so had the enemy. Still Waters had been revealed, its strength against the Dead King's armies laid bare, and even as High Marshal Nim had adjusted her tactics so had the ancient lich. Though he could not stop her dead soldiers from rising as wights, the trails of alchemy once dropped over enemy formations to turn them wild had lost effect: the skeletons and ghouls simply dropped once touched by the compound. A Wolofite mage by the name of Kendi Akaze had theorized the effect was automated, added to sorcery that had raised the undead, and Lady Seriff had confirmed it after a few experiments.

It made the weapon more lethal, true, but took away from it the most useful property: being able to turn Keter's numbers against it. Akaze, who must have impressed the cantankerous old mage, had been drafted as her assistant while she tried to find a way to exploit the Dead King's most recent spellwork. It had smacked of an apprenticeship in the making to all witnesses. The Black Knight hoped for their success, as she could use the help: Keter had learned how turn the advance up the avenue leading to the inner wall into a murderous slog. Nearly half the undead mages in the city had been concentrated in the path of their offensive, hitting away at the flying fortresses with rituals to keep them away so they couldn't lend support, and worse still was the engines.

The last third of the avenue was a road no more, a space of collapsed houses three miles wide and two long having been created, and the reason why was clear: batteries of siege engines were bristling on the inner wall, waiting to hammer away at any soldiers that began to walk across the open, broken grounds before the rampart.

The second was the war within, the struggle for the Praes that was to be. There were parts of the land that did not even yet know the Dread Empire was now the Confederation and the Black Knight knew well how fragile the bargains struck in the Tower's dying light still was. It stood only so long as the Warden loomed tall over all the schemers hungry for more, so long as the Legions of Terror remained the greatest army in the land. Else when they all came home, the High Lords might look at a weakened force under Nim and the chancellor and decide that perhaps they wanted to be Dread Emperor after all. That supreme rule was worth the risks of a war. They had all agreed to disband all armies save the Legions, but how much was their word really worth?

So the Black Knight must make sure none of them thought they'd be able to win that war, when temptation came calling. That meant spending their house troops, their levies, and preserving the strength of her legions. Only it could not be obvious, or wasteful, for otherwise they would be well within their rights to rebel at such treatment – for all that the private armies were now officially auxiliaries under the Legions, the way their noble commanders still led them proved how thin a pretence that truly was. So Nim must balance need and dues, all the while keeping her eye on what must be done to win the battle without lest the battle within ruin it.

It was a difficult exercise, but the Black Knight had found that she was equal to it. Her Name burned at the challenge, alive in a way it had never been when Amadeus still lived and his shadow was still cast over all who would wear his old mantle. It was one decision after another, another puzzle to move around until all the pieces fit the right way.

"The Fourteenth is getting mauled," her Staff Tribune told her. "Their mages are being tied down by hexenghoul's so buzzards can land behind the ranks. They're too far out on the flank, ma'am, it could turn south on us."

The flying constructs would open their belly when they laded, spewing out the cargo of undead they'd carried and so effectively cutting off the Fourteen from the rest of Nim's forces. Or at least potentially so, if they were allowed to build up numbers long enough. Best to take care of that quickly.

"Inform High Lord Dakarai that he is to commit the wavemen," the Black Knight said. "Free use of enchanted arrows is allowed."

Nok's archers, the finest in all of Praes, should be able to clear out the enemy with concentrated volleys if they had permission to dip into fire arrows. Her Staff Tribune nodded, committing the words to memory.

"And send word to the Old Mothers," she calmly added. "When the dead turn their rituals on the wavemen, I want the fortresses to unleash their full spellfire volume at the enemy cabals while they're open."

It happened as she had foreseen, and even as the Black Knight's Name smiled coldly and smoke rose from the ranks of the wavemen, her vanguard – Aksum's forces, nearly half of which were wights by now due to attrition – pushed forward three blocks during the lull in enemy spells.

"The grounds were trapped ahead of the vanguard," her Staff Tribune told her. "Pit traps and caltrops. Beorns are hitting Aksum over them while the ranks are in disarray."

Pit traps that the wights would fall into blindly, caltrops that would tear through the too-light foot armour of the Aksum levies when they tread on them. Beorns, massive distended bear constructs that they were, would be able to ignore both and spit out the dead they carried straight into the wavering Aksumite ranks.

"Send word to High Lady Abreha to withdraw," Nim said.

"The beorns will trample all over her retreat," her Staff Tribune noted. "Casualties will be steep."

"They'll rout before long anyway," the Black Knight said. "But while her levies are being rampaged over, tell General Sacker she is free to fire with her ballistae while the Ninth replaces the vanguard. Unravellers included, after a round of ranging shots."

The unravellers would quickly end the constructs, and the Ninth was still heavy on sappers compared to most legions: there was no better force at her command to get rid of the traps and unearth further ones. A high number of goblins, though, would mean a degree of fragility.

"Have one of the fortresses pass over the streets in front of the traps," she added, frowning. "Still Water the area."

That should allow Sacker long enough to clear the mess before being hammered. It went better than the Black Knight had thought it would: Abreha unleashed beasts she had been keeping in reserve to protect her retreat, slinking panthers made of shadow whose claws rent constricts asunder as they moved across the battlefield like ghosts. The beorns began lashing out blindly, leaving them easy prey for the ballistae, and the Ninth struck fast in the wake of the flying fortress' path. The army pushed up another four blocks, and now High Marshal was so close to the open grounds she could taste it.

"The Levantines report movement at our back," her Staff Tribune said. "Lady Osenia requests instructions."

"Tell her to dig in behind us," Nim grunted. "We'll need them to handle the rearguard while we storm the inner wall."

The tall ogre cast a frown at the battlefield, watching as the Ninth clawed its way up another block and General Wheeler's Eighth gained ground on the left flank. Too much, she thought. Keter was folding too quickly, though on the ground it must have looked only like a successful push. The Eighth's cognomen was not 'Trailblazers' without reason, however, and given ground to take they would take it all too fast. Someone on the other side had read Wheeler just right. The order for the goblin general to pull back was on the tip of her tongue, but then she thought twice.

"Tell Wheeler to push..." she trailed off, gauging the distance with her eye, "half a mile forward, then lean on his sappers to blow through the houses and turn straight south instead."

That way the Eighth would hit the position the Ninth was about to ruin itself on from the side, enough to relieve the pressure and allow Sacker to break through without ruining herself. More importantly, the half mile forward would make room for another maneuver.

"And inform High Lord Sargon that Wolof is to fill the gap when the Eighth swings south," the Black Knight smiled. "He is free to use sorcery as he wills so long as he pushes no further."

And if the High Marshal was reading the timing right Wheeler would get out of the trap just before its jaws closed, just in time for Sargon Sahelian to be left holding the bag instead. Wolof would react to the assault with massed sorcery, as they always did, which in turn would clear masses of skeletons quickly enough that the Eighth would be pivoting into surprised enemies whose reinforcements would be delayed.

"I'll see it done, Lady Black," her Staff Tribune swore.

On this last one, Black Knight saw, she had been a little off. The Eighth did get out in time, but it was actually too early: the first moments of the pivot, as sappers blasted through houses so that ranks of regular could advance through the rubble, were severely punished by the enemy. The sappers took a beating. But when Wolof moved into place and the enemy trap was sprung – shallow tunnels were revealed in a loose circle around the Wolofite position, a horde emerging in moments – the ensuing storm of sorcery did as she had foreseen. With the pressure alleviated, Wheeler broke through and struck hard at the enemy flank while Sacker pushed up the avenue.

Five blocks in half an hour, and as the Black Knight watched with a cold smile her vanguard finally reached the open grounds under the siege engines that the dead had prepared to break her army. It was time, then. Nim Mardottir's fingers closed around the haft of her war hammer and she rose to her feet. She would lead from the front, now, lead the assault on the wall. But before that, she would show Keter why it was that she had kept her flying fortresses back the entire battle.

"Staff Tribune," the Black Knight said, "pass my order to all fortresses."

"Ma'am?"

"Sunset," she said. "Begin immediately."

And as the order went up, the massive floating castles began to move. Forward, at first, but then downwards. Streaks of magic shot up from the ground, Keter's rituals pounding away at the stone and protective enchantments. They tore out chunks, blew through walls and burned hundreds alive. Even crashed one of the smaller towers. Yet most of them kept moving, kept coming down, and as the Black Knight rested her hammer against her shoulder she watched the massive piles of stone land with such thundering crashes they would never rise again. The first of the Old Mothers landed in front of the inner wall's gatehouse, the fortress gate facing the Dead King's own, and the rest of the castles fell like a curtain behind the enemy wall.

To cut it off from reinforcements just before the Praesi assault began.

The Black Knight of Praes raised her war hammer, and half a hundred thousand voices screamed themselves hoarse. Forward they went, to find one of the two fates the Wasteland taught its children: victory and death.

—

Hanno could not save everyone.

The world was not so simple that strength alone would be enough to end all its ills, chase pain and misery out of Creation like spring leaning. He could not even save everyone in front of him, he was forced to admit as he moved from struggle to struggle across this cursed city of the dead and dying. For every man he arrived in time to keep from the enemy's blades another died, be it to arrow or poison or the fangs of some howling ghoul. It was like trying to put out a forest fire with a cup of water. But still he tried, grasping tight that moment of clarity he had found when he cast aside the coin. Even if it was hard, even if it was thankless, he would act. He would not be able to save everyone, but that was never an excuse not to try.

So Hanno of Arwad picked up his cup and fought the blaze, undaunted, until Creation saw fit to acknowledge his conviction: Save, his soul sang out.

It was as if he'd opened his eyes for the first time. All around him he felt the war between doom and hope, the balance of victory and defeat between them, and for all that all of Keter was balance on the precipice of catastrophe he had never seen anything so beautiful. Hundreds of thousands from all over Calernia had come to this place, this day, and in the face of the darkness they fought tooth and nail to turn back the tide. It was like watching a sea of candles warring on the night.

And when Hanno saw the balance moved towards doom, his body began to move before his mind had even come to the decision. He cut through the streets and across rooftops, snatching life back from death where he could, until he found the battle to be won. Rozala Malanza, hard-eyed and defiant as she faced a Revenant with nothing more than banner and bravery, was to give her life to save Procer. And it might succeed, Hanno knew, for a time. But the world would darken for her passing and he could stop it, so he did. It felt natural to step in, to break the Revenant's arm and boil its inside in a flash of Light. Never before had the Light come so easy to his call or his body been so light. The aspect, he decided. It was not simple sight.

Within moments of the Revenant ending, Hanno saw the tide begin to turn again to the north. Doom was clawing back the day, so the hero moved again. Save, his soul sang, and he raced against the dark. Hadn't he all his life?

It was not a straight path. Again and again he went to the side, cradling another flame against his palms so it would not blow out. A handful of conscripts surrounded in a ditch, fighting under a dipping banner. A lone fantassin in a garish striped vest of orange and green, drowning in their own blood as a Revenant speared their limbs – and coming into a Name as Hanno cauterized their wound with Light, gasping out in pain. A company of Nicaeans being trampled by a tusk, a pair of Helikeans desperately fighting to bring back the unconscious body of a woman in general's armour. Delosi mercenaries grimly protecting a stripe-cheeked corpse from an onslaught of ghouls. Each a candle, an inch of Creation reclaimed from the dark.

Doom was approaching, strengthening, so Hanno lengthened his stride. He did not even break it when he smashed through a pack of hexenghoul, pulling one off a richly armoured Taghreb girl just before it sank its fangs into her throat. Even as she called out in relief and surprise he kept moving, ignoring her shouts and that of the beleaguered retinue to duck under an arch just before it fell and blocked the way across the street. He grabbed a loose stone jutting out from a wall, using it to drag himself up on the roof just in time to see a bearded man and an old woman in robes dissecting a corpse atop rooftiles turned to glass. Their cries of triumph turned into dismay when miasma came pouring out, Hanno loosing a spear of Light into the cloud without batting an eye.

It dispersed and leapt down the roof before they could even see his face, landing on a beorn's back and carving through the construct's head. It collapsed forward, sliding down the sloped street and bringing him right before the ragged ranks of a warband of painted Levantines. They parted ranks as he jumped past them and sped up, feeling the call to be so very close now. He turned the corner fast enough his boot slid in the ash, eyes already on the fight ahead of him. The two of them fought back-to-back. Aquiline Osená moving in a sinuous blur of green and bronze, hooked sword blunt from having hewn too many heads open. Razin Tanja in grey and crimson, patient and measured as he killed in sharp strikes. The dead were swarming them, a battered warband collapsing around the lovers as skeletons climbed over the corpses of hundreds of Levantines.

An ambush had been sprung here, the Dead King come to take the lives of the Blood. One of you could live, Hanno thought, if they ran for it. But you never even thought of it, did you?

His aspect pounding inside of him like a marching drum, Hanno charged in. It was a blur as he moved with Light shivering down his legs, darting forward between blows as he smashed his way through the ranks of the dead. They began to throw themselves at him, to slow him down and tangle his legs, but Hanno let out a grunt and flared Light. His veins burned but the undead fled the pain, leaving him just enough room to push through and then... three steps and he swung, arm outstretched as the very tip of his sword brushed the arrow's side. Enough to foul it, enough that it went wide instead of going through Razin Tanja's open mouth. Hanno laughed, triumphant, for the tide was turning against doom.

He had saved candles, today, but these two felt like a torch.

"Retreat," Hanno told them.

"Lord White," Lady Aquiline said, "I give honour to your deed, but there are too many for-"

"There could be a thousand more," Hanno of Arwad said, "and today it would not be enough. Retreat, my lady of Tartessos. They will not pass by me."

He turned towards the tide, smiling, and flicked his sword to batter a javelin aside as the dead surged forward. Hanno returned to the fight, like a sword returning to the anvil, and in the back of his mind the song began again. Save, it prayed.

The day was not over, and neither was the labour of his hands.

When so many Named fought, it was near impossible to keep track of everything.

Akua had only added near because the Carrion Lord had been famous for doing exactly that and Catherine was slowly reaching those heights herself. She herself did not have that capacity, to her displeasure, so instead of frittering away her focus the sorcerers kept to her objective: collapsing the defences around the ward anchor. The house where she believed that the stone would be held had no entrance, large stones having been dragged to cover all of them, and there Akua believed she had found a weakness. Walls and even roof tiles could be enchanted defensively with some degree of strength, but a slab of stone? Not anywhere as well.

Knowing she would not twice get an opening, Akua waited for her moment. The Vagrant Spear was keeping the Twins busy, killing them almost fast as they came back to life as her spear blurred too swiftly for the naked eye to follow, and the Red Knight had barreled into the pack of Revenants that had chased Indrani and Akua for half an hour before this: all of them armed with spears and bedecked in bronze armour, they moved with eerie coordination. The sorcerers suspected only one of them had actually been Named but that an aspect was being used to share their strength, not that it seemed to matter to the Red Knight.

"Devour," she snarled, ripping out a chunk of the necromancy keep the undead moving.

The strength she'd stolen healed the gut wound she'd taken from a spear and with scornful laughter the villainess began hammering into the Revenants again. Rooftops to Akua's left kept shattering as the Lord of Silent Steps chased a wary Seelie, keeping her out of the fight as Archer and the Harrowed Witch tried their luck with the war anchor's guardian: a broad woman in gaudy golden plate wielding an equally golden armour, her open-faced helmet adorned with a red feather. Indrani was being thrown off the roof again, but the Harrowed Witch moved her spectre in the way to catch her and toss her back into the fight. It was, Akua decided, as good an opening as she was likely to get.

Though it felt uninspired and somewhat pedestrian to use an entropy curse when the Dead King had displayed a greater work along the same lines in this very city, it was the best tool Akua had to remove the stone slab before the door. She did not speak the incantation, remaining hidden as she cast. It struck suddenly, withering first the magic the stone had been filled with in order to harden it and only then beginning to hollow out the slab from the inside. This, naturally, drew attention. The golden Revenant, ignoring Indrani's knife as it scraped harmlessly against her armour, leapt down from the roof and ran towards her.

"A source detection array, I see," Akua noted. "Unfortunate."

She raised her wrists, speaking three words of power, and flicked them at the golden nuisance. The Revenant ducked into an empty house, but Akua hardly minded as he true target – the hollowed out stone – exploded in a burst of shard.

"Ivah," Akua shouted. "The anchor."

The golden Revenant then burst through the wall to her left, which Akua would admit to surprising her a tad, but Indrani had it in hand. Archer, thrown by the Witch's spectre, landed on the Revenant's back. She began stabbing at the golden wretch's helmet, and for once the Revenant bothered to defend herself. Her hands were covering her head and Akua's eyes narrowed even as Indrani was tossed through a doorway on the other side of the street, ferociously cursing all the way. The golden-armoured halberdier lowered her weapon at Akua, who had yet to move so much as an inch.

"Proceran, were you?" the golden-eyed sorceress drawled.

The golden Revenant charged, batting aside a spectre and in the same swing an arrow Archer had shot at her. Akua, instead of panicking as the distance closed, raised two hands and began to incant a simple fire cantrip even as her other hand traced a High Arcana rune. She unleashed the strong spell first, a burst of force that the halberdier took head on. It slowed the Revenant just enough for the second spell to land even as the halberd pierced forward towards Akua. A small flame caught the red feather, which turned to ash in a heartbeat. And in the heartbeat after that, the golden halberd and golden plate also turned to ash.

"You must have been," Akua mused, "for only a Jaquinite wizard would have added such a painfully obvious unravelling clause to an artefact. Gods Below, I've seen greater subtlety from Callowan nobles – and their idea of trickery is a massive cavalry charge from the back instead of the front."

Admittedly it was somewhat embarrassing how often that trick had defeated Praesi armies, but that was neither here nor there. The half-globe of forced revealed by traces of dust suddenly flickered and died as Ivah finished what she had requested of him, the ward collapsing without its anchor, and the Dead King proved to be a sore loser when the Tumult dropped another column of lightning atop that house. Ivah would survive, she had not doubt. Mighty of its strength were exceptionally difficult to kill by conventional means. The once-golden Revenant was still charging at her, but Akua raised her wrists again and she threw herself to the side – never noticing that Akua had never actually called on magic before Archer leapt into the whole to return the beatings she'd had doled out to her earlier in the fight.

Throwing out a set of transparent shields around herself out of caution, Akua began to walk down the street.

Helping the Vagrant Spear out should end this faster, she mused, and then they could get out of here before more Scourges showed up. She dismissed half her shield, beginning the incantation for a curse of withering, and then one of the enchanted gems under her armour shattered as a protective spell took the strike that should have severed her spine. Akua spun wildly, tossing a ball of flame in the Seelie's face, but all it did was break an illusion. A strike that should have slipped between her ribs killed another gem, her last before she began bleeding, and there she landed a spell that blew a stream of heated ashes in the Scourge's face. Only the Seelie hadn't ducked because she was doing something else: cutting off one of the straps keeping the box on Akua's back.

"No," she hissed, sword clearing the scabbard as she wildly swung the box rattled at her back.

The Crown of Autumn would not break, but if they got to the box... Archer burst out of the house, blades out, and Akua saw it all unfold with clarity. The Seelie ripped the box off her back as Akua slashed across her face, the metal contained landing on the street. There was a whistling sound as the missiles of the javelineer Revenant, which she'd thought destroyed by the Red Knight earlier, began to fall. And even as Akua screamed out an incantation, the Seelie's knife whipped about and slid past her guard. It would open her throat. Archer stilled for a moment, halfway there, as they both saw the same thing: a javelin would hit the box. The crown. And Indrani could not be at two places at once.

Akua breathed out, closing her eyes.

Only she did not die. Instead as she sucked in a desperate breath the Seelie was tossed aside like a rag doll, Indrani getting in between the two of them, and with utter horror Akua watched as a javelin puncture the metal box. Went straight through, as if it were parchment, and these were not the javelins from earlier. This one was black stone, like the steles the Dead King sometimes used, and as Akua watched with dread as it craved through the crown itself. Cut it cleanly in half, two ornate half-circles of bronze. She went still as a stone even as there were shouts of surprise, Revenants withdrawing from the fight all over. They fled, leaving the two of them looking down at a disaster that might well kill every soul on Calernia.

Archer was the one who broke the silence.

"I don't regret it," she said, almost defiant.

"My life was not worth this," Akua said, throat tight. "Indrani, Gods. It could not have been worth this."

"I'd do it again," her friend said.

And for once in her life, Akua Sahelian believed every word of what she had been told.

—

There were few places on a battlefield more dangerous to be than inside a siege tower.

The finest engineers of the Legions had spent decades trying to make them less of a death trap, experimenting with materials and protections and spell shielding, but in the end the essence of what a siege tower was wouldn't change: a slow, tight box advancing in the direction of enemies with the means to shoot holes into it. The entire tower rattled as yet another spell hit it in the belly, the Black Knight's fingers tightening around her hammer as she heard wood crack and screams erupt. The enemy had cracked the shell. Nim kept her dismay off her face so that her retinue would not see it, chewing the inside of her cheek and prayed that the tower had made it close enough to the rampart the enemy would not have enough time to topple it.

Another shudder beneath her feet as hoarse shouts filled the air and magic crackled, the dead and that of the Legion mages. Nim could smell smoke, which had her stomach clenching. The wood of the tower had been made proof to conventional fire, but that was not what Keter was wielding. If the flames caught... She would have trust in her mages and sappers to be able to put it out. As if to reward the thought, a moment later there was a shout from upstairs.

"READY!"

The Black Knight allowed herself a smile, steadying her footing as the ogres around her did the same. A heartbeat later, there were to metallic clangs in quick succession. The first came as the wall before her fell down, turning into a bridge that led straight into a rampart filled with undead. The second came as a pair of hooks slammed down onto the top of the wall, anchoring the siege tower to it. Further down there would be steel spikes jutting out to the same purpose, enchanted so they would be able to sink into even warded stone, but the High Marshal did not wait to hear their song. Instead she strode forward, hammer in hand, and brushed past her soldiers to charge into the midst of the enemy.

To fight the likes of these was as reaping wheat.

Every swing of her hammer shattered a handful, and as her personal guard charged in her wake the enemy ranks vanished like mist. Nim barely even drew on her Name, relying on simple strength and training, but like so many before them the dead crumbled under ogres' hammers. It could not have taken longer than thirty heartbeats for them to clear out a foothold, and the Black Knight felt oddly cheated: she could not have swung her weapon more than a dozen times. She cast a look further down the rampart, seeing three of the five other siege towers had made it to the wall. The other two were wrecks, one afire and spilling out corpses.

"Secure the wall," the Black Knight roared. "Hammers, with me! We take the gatehouse."

The fighting there was fiercer, she could tell already. The stone was shaking from the impact of the enchanted ram hammering at the gate through the crashed fortress' entrance, but atop the crenelled gatehouse a furious melee had burst out. Even the waves of fire and lighting from atop the crashed fortress were not enough for the Taghreb household troops to gain the advantage, matched as they were by withering curses and a monstrous new kind of ghoul. Even as the Black Knight hurried into the fight, she grimaced at the sight of a flesh-red ghoul devouring a corpse and soon after beginning to vomit out another ghoul.

It wasn't those the High Marshal sought, though, as her guard smashed into the enemy's flank and shattered the shield wall hastily raised in their path. Leading the enemy ranks was a tall silhouette, a Revenant in garish blue scale mail wielding a long barbed spear. He was kept snatching the lives of Taghreb officers, spreading panic so their ranks wouldn't form up, and the Black Knight would have no more of it. A ghoul snapped at her heels but she batted it away with the back of her hand, tramping skeletons beneath her feet as she charged. The Revenant turned even as she raised her war hammer, spear darting out, but Nim kicked a skeleton into the way – and, while the bones blocked the Revenant's sight, smashed it from the side.

It took the blow in the shoulder, but to her surprise did not crumple. That blue armour must be enchanted, and though the Revenant was tossed a dozen feet back it landed on its feet and was back on the move in a heartbeat.

"Fine," the Black Knight growled. "The hard way, then."

It fainted high but Nim had fought spearmen before and saw the thrust coming for her knee. Humans always through ogres were slow with their limbs, because of the weight, but that was only half true. The Black Knight might not move as quick, but she covered a lot more ground: a flick of the wrist had her hammer's shaft swatting aside the spear. She added a second hand to the length of wood and turned the movement into a twirl that came down right on the Revenant's head, hammering it onto the floor. Its knees bent, but that helm must have been enchanted too for it did not break. It didn't matter. That heartbeat where it was as a hammered nail had been all she needed: she dropped her weapon, instead grabbing it by the throat.

The Revenant stabbed away at her but the angle was all wrong, the barbed spear sliding off the side of her plate as the Black Knight grunted with exertion. One hand on the throat and the other on the body she pulled, pulled until there was a wet cracking sound. The Revenant screamed, its spear rending deep scars into her armour, but Nim let out a roar of triumph as finally she ripped the undead apart: the head went off like a rag doll's, the bones having broken where the armour would not. She held up the body as a banner, her guard roaring back and the fervour spreading into the beleaguered Taghreb ranks. At this rate, she thought, the gatehouse would be theirs in half an hour. After that all that was left was to push into the inner city and...

It was a pull at her hand that save her land, an instinct that had her moving before her body could know it should. She got the blue-armoured corpse in the way, the greatsword shattering the scales and still managing to knock her off her feet through it. She fell, crushing a skeleton and a Taghreb levy under her as she reached for her hammer and swung wildly at the silhouette standing over her. The Prince of Bones contemptuously took the blow on the side of his massive blade and swung back a riposte that ripped Nim's helm off her head along with a chunk of her brow. A blast of fire rocked the Scourge as she swallowed a hiss of pain and scrabbled back to her feet.

The Prince of Bones. How the Hells had she missed the largest of the Revenants sneaking up on her? Illusion, had to be. Which meant she was fighting two dangerous foes instead of one.

"Rituals on my position," the Black Knight shouted, trusting in her subordinates to carry the word.

The Scourge swept forward through its own soldiers, heedless of what it broke, and Nim warily stepped back as she wiped away the trails of blood getting into her eye. The Prince of Bones' sword rose, but behind her magic crackled and the Black Knight grunted in satisfaction: waves of fire slammed down on their position, not doing much to either of them as it incinerated skeletons left and right. But as the smoke and ash billowed outwards, the outline of a cloaked figure behind the Scourge was revealed. The illusionist. Wasting no time, Nim circled around the looming Prince and made straight for the other Revenant.

It was backpedalling in a hurry, throwing at her spells that burned searing lights into her eyes and filled her ears with cacophonous noise, but the Black Knight grit her teeth and barreled through. Batting aside the ghouls in the way with a flick of her hammer, she pivoted into a downwards swing – in time for the instinct to pull at her again. She threw herself back, abandoning the hammer, and through the pack of ghouls already swarming her exposed head saw that large greatsword swinging through where she'd just stood. The ritual exposed nothing, she realized. It was an illusion all along. She'd been played. Tearing off the ghouls nipping at her face, their fangs tearing up her thick skin, she rolled to the side as the Prince of Bones struck powerfully enough to shatter the stone beneath the blow. But how could she trust her eyes? Any moment now there could be a killing stroke, a-

A burst of blinding Light darkened her vision for a moment, but through her squint she saw a man tear into the enemy's side, ignoring ghouls to strike at a particular skeleton. And as Hanno of Arwad's blade sent the hidden Revenant's head tumbling, all illusions shattered and Nim realized she was again about to die. The blow took her in the shoulder, black plate crumbling as the blade's edge failed to cut but still hit with crushing strength. The Black Knight screamed hoarsely and grabbed the Scourge's sword hand as it pulled back, knowing another blow would be the end of her. The Prince shifted his footing but Nim often sparred with other ogres. She knew what it meant in an opponent her size.

She half-rolled out of the way of the punch and used the opening to catch the throat rim of the Prince of Bones' armour – and its head, she thought, somehow seemed made of newer steel than the rest – to drag herself up. Pitting strength against strength she wrestled down its limbs, but it was a losing fight. The Scourge was heavier than her and implacable: her arms burned, her legs trembled, and inch by inch she was being forced back.

"Do it," the Black Knight screamed. "Do it now."

The hero's sword struck the Prince from the back even as she finished the last word, Light roiling and letting out screams as the blade melted its way through layers of steel. Nim's arms gave, the Scourge's arms enveloping her almost intimately before the strength turned crushing. She screamed, ribs snapping like twigs, and spat out blood and phlegm as all four of her lungs were pressed on. But she'd live long enough, she thought even as the Prince tried to turn to shake off the hero and failed – the dark-skinned human turned with it. Enough that the Scourge would die, and then she could get herself healed.

If she still wore her helmet, she would not have seen it. She almost didn't anyway because of the blood blinding on of her eyes, but as she gasped in pain the Black Knight saw the glint of the sun on metal. An arrow. Close, too close for her to avoid and- Commission.

Hanno could not save everyone.

He had known it from the start, thought he had made his peace with the inevitable. And still a shout ripped itself clear of his throat as the Hawk's arrow took the Black Knight's life. The shaft sunk halfway into the skull, an instant death. He was forced to cease pouring Light into the Prince of Bones' armour as he had been doing, melting layer after layer, to rip out his sword and cut through the arrow that would have gone through the back of his neck. The towering Scourge backed away, swinging his blade more to force distance than strike, but Hanno would have none of it. The edge of his sword flaring with Light he carved through the steel, craning his neck to the side to avoid another killing arrow.

A dart forward had him closing the distance, the Prince of Bones tossing the broken sword in his face. He ducked low, dropping into a roll to avoid another arrow – the Hawk must be close – and slashing across the Scourge's face. The pristine steel mask was scarred, metal melting down from the mark. A leg, Hanno decided. The Prince of Bones was heavy enough that without both legs there would be no escaping. Clouds roiled above his head, magic flaring, but Hanno pressed on. A half-step let the Prince's fist slide past him and he slid under, hacking at the side of the Revenant's leg even as lightning began pouring on them both from above. Hanno grit his teeth, throwing up a burst of Light that dispersed the sorcery over his head as he carved deep into the Prince's leg.

Not deep enough, he thought as he rose behind the Scourge's back. Another arrow swatted aside, but it had been a distraction: darkness fell over him. Hanno grit his teeth, flaring Light through his heated veins enough that the Mantle's curse shattered. Just in time to see the Prince's foot about to hit his stomach. He threw himself below it, a screaming curse shattering the stone he'd been standing on, and as he rose behind the Prince again he listened to the call of instinct and struck out with his hand – catching the Seelie's knife as it was about to thrust through his throat. Letting out an irritated grunt, he bent the Scourge's arm and rested the flat of his blade against he neck.

It was not a mercy: using it as lever, he pushed the Seelie's head into the hole of molten metal he'd left in the Prince of Bones' back.

An arrow hammered into his shoulder, going straight through the plate, and with a pained grunt Hanno let out a burst of Light through the wound to get it out. He'd still lost his opening for a killing blow on the Seelie, who had turned into a bed of dead flowers. Magic was rising again but Hanno had to step out of the way when the Prince snatched up a skeleton and swung it at him like a club, the arc of it covering the Mantle's shivering curse until it was right on him – he desperately pivoted to the side, smashing the pommel of his sword into the Seelie's half-melted face when she reappeared trying to drive her knife into his side. The curse shaved away at his pauldron, rusting the metal to powder, and the Seelie ducked the swing that would have hewn open her skull.

Then the storm hit, and it was all Hanno could do not to be blown right off the wall.

Soldiers behind him were not so lucky, and the dead were scattered by hurricane winds – turned into trebuchet stones as they hammered into Praesi ranks – but Hanno pushed forward, Light burning in his belly. He saw the Prince of Bones retreating, the silhouette fading out of sight, and with a scream of frustration he shaped a spear out of Light and tossed it at the Scourge's back. It missed the mark by a foot, and even as he grit his teeth the Scourges disappeared into the inner city. A full retreat. The Black Knight was dead and he hadn't even taken one of them for it. When the storm ended, leaving shocked Praesi as the victors of the battle for the gatehouse, Hanno trudged back to the ogre's great corpse.

The arrow was still in her skull, the sight of it leaving a bitter taste in his mouth.

"If I had struck from the front, I could have reached it with my arm," Hanno murmured. "If I'd continued to listen to Save instead of buried myself in the use of the Light..."

Mistakes, though they had not seemed like it at the time. But then they never did, did they? That was why Hanno had one chosen to follow the Seraphim, heeded their answer to the Riddle of Fault. To be mortal was to fail, to make mistakes. The dark-skinned hero knelt by the Black Knight's corpse, jaw clenched, and wondered how many more mistakes still lay ahead of him. Creation quickened around him, looking for resolve or its end, but Hanno did not embrace the bitterness. He had the strength to take the risk of doing the right thing, but that strength was not an absolute. He was but a mortal man, with all the limits that carried. He would not shy away from the truth of what he had chosen: he would fail. He had today, for all the other victories, and would again.

Hanno did not regret trying.

He ripped out the Hawk's arrow, but after he did his hand lingered on the Black Knight's bloodied face. His face fell into a pensive frown. Creation grew heavy. If it wasn't about victory, if it was about doing all the good that you could, then could he really say he was finished? There was one more thing to attempt. Breathing out, the hero let the Light flow through him and into the villain's corpse. He had seen Tariq Isbili used Forgive more than once, and there had been great priests could resurrect without the need of a Name or aspect. As his skin grew warm and he began to sweat, Hanno held a tight hand over the Light he was unleashing. It was about will, about intent – and if he slipped, he would burn the corpse instead of bringing it back to life.

Only, in a moment of clarity, Hanno realized that it was not truly resurrection he sought. It was something simpler, almost childish, but in a way perhaps less shallow. He had made a mistake. She had made a mistake. Perhaps all of Creation had made a mistake.

And Hanno of Award would Undo it.

He felt something infinitely larger than him brush against his soul, greater than even the Choir of Judgement, and the aspect lit up inside him. His hand against the Black Knight's body serving as a conduit, he looked for ties to the soul so it might be called back and found... nothing? Light began guttering out even as Hanno heard footsteps behind him, a shadow being cast over his kneeling form. He turned, looking into an ogre's rough face, and was about to speak when he suddenly closed his mouth. Through the fast-fading clarity the aspect had leant him, he saw in that body two souls.

"Black Knight," Hanno evenly said.

"Lord Hanno," she replied. "There will be no need for what I believe you are attempting. Though I will be weakened as I ride my soldier's body, it will serve until my corpse can be made usable again."

It was possession, he thought, but not in the way that he had seen it before. It was not a wraith stealing a body, this had been consented to. Explicitly or implicitly he could not tell, but the mark was there. This is not necromancy, not really. The principle behind it is different. Like a... chain of command, with replaceable faces. He suspected the Black Knight would not be able to ride a body that was not one of her soldiers. Inside Hanno's belly the heat began to fade, Undo simmering down, and as it did he felt out the edge of the aspect's limits. Once a day, a death or calamity could be undone. How the time was parsed he did yet know, but the limit of use was certain.

All that, he thought, and it had not been needed at all. Hand resting on his wearied brow, Hanno let out a snicker that turned into a quiet laugh.

"I was not needed, after all," he mused.

And maybe that was the lesson he should have been learning all along, he thought. All this time, he had been trying to do it all himself. To keep the heroes on the right path, to keep Calernia from falling. Even before that, from the moment in Ashur where he had first become the White Knight. It had been him and the Seraphim who were to be concerned with the doling out of judgement, but no one else. Even with angels at his shoulder, he had walked alone. Only that wasn't really true, was it? He'd been running around Keter trying to keep doom from claiming the day, trusting in his sword and the aspect he had come into, but that was not the whole of it – just the whole of him. They were all trying to hold up the sky today, and in the end all that Hanno of Arwad could claim to be was a pair of hands. Was it not the worst kind of arrogance, to think that it was on him for everyone to win or lose? Like a child he had decided that he would be strong enough to be able to do the right thing, as if his will was the only one in the world. He was not alone in this. He never had been.

Maybe it was time he acted like it.

"I agonized," Hanno softly told the Black Knight, "over whether or not it was right for me to become the White Knight again. Whether it was going in circles, or nowhere at all."

The ogre did not answer, her eyes wary and her silence thick.

"How very pointless that was," Hanno mused, slowly rising to his feet.

There was no perfect Name that would save everyone, end all the ills of the world. He was just a man and Creation was larger than he would ever know. But he wasn't alone. He didn't have to do everything. He just needed to return the trust that had been placed in him. And while the Warden fought today to save the world, then Hanno could fight to save the people in it. To do as much good as he could, knowing that Catherine Foundling would be there to hold out a hand when he failed. Hanno looked around at the last of the dead on the rampart and the gatehouse that would let the Praesi into the inner city when it was opened.

The end was nigh.

"Let's finish this," the White Knight said. "The Dead King awaits."

—

Akua Sahelian had been entrusted with the fate of Calernia and she had failed it.

Beyond all the excuses that were already springing up in the back of her mind, the justifications and the blame-shifting, that was the stark truth of it. She held in her hand the two pieces of the Crown of Autumn, the entrapping gift that had been meant to relieve the Dead King of his mastery over the dead and end the war in a single stroke. It was broken, irremediably cleaved in two. Only Masego's cleverness in his surgery of the crown had prevented the cleaving from resulting in a wild release of power that would have torn a hole in the city and killed everyone involved in the crown's failed defence.

But as Akua looked upon Hierophant's work split asunder, a thought occurred. A mad thought, impossible, but in the face of extinction that was a meaningless word. And deep down, for all that it was laughable and ludicrous of her, she thought it could be done. That she could do it. So instead of falling to her knees, the golden-eyed sorceress turned to her friend. To achieve the impossible would have to be done like eating a whale: one bite at a time, until nothing was left.

"I need you to find me two needles in a haystack, Archer," Akua said. "One that is currently on fire and full of undead."

"My favourite kind," Indrani agreeably replied. "What's your poison, Saucy Siren?"

Beneath the flippancy she sounded relieved. For all that she had defiantly claimed not to regret the decision to save Akua's life over going for the crown, the consequences of that choice loomed tall.

"First, find me a forge," Akua said.

There were hundreds of these across the city, as though Keter's great foundries were in the depths beneath the capital the equipment of the great army encamped within the walls must be seen to regularly lest it rust and break. Most were little more than glorified smithies, but it would be sufficient for her purposes.

"Gotcha," Archer said. "And your other needle?"

"I will tell you after," she replied. "Go."

Indrani made a point of waddling slowly for the first few steps, but as soon as she turned the corner she disappeared in haste. The urgency was not lost on her. Akua, meanwhile, was left to handle another sort of trouble. The remains of the Vagrant Spear's band were standing around the heroine, speaking with Ivah of the Losara.

"- been striking at bands, hit and run," Sidonia told the drow. "Last I heard he got the Astrologer and clipped the Stained Sister."

"It has not yet taken aim at Mighty," the Lord of Silent Steps noted.

Only one name came to mind when the death of Named was so casually brought up: the Hawk. Akua stepped into the talks.

"That is because the Dead King believes he can brush aside the Night if he must," she told them. "He used the Grey Legion to develop protective enchantments against it during the Hainaut offensive."

"Mighty Sahelian," Ivah politely greeted her, inclining its head.

No doubt Sargon would be highly insulted at the implication that Akua was considered the sigil-holder for her family should he ever be made aware of it, a twist of amusement that slightly brightened her mood. The reception from the other three was rather less warm. The Vagrant Spear offered a curt nod, the Red Knight a sneer and the Harrowed Witch looked like she was trying to figure out a way to excuse herself as soon as possible.

"Are any of you in need of healing?" she asked.

An empty question, when she saw that Sidonia was heavily wounded on the side for all that Light had half-cauterized the cuts. The Vagrant Spear eyed her consideringly.

"Can you leave the scars?"

Akua smiled and agreed that she would, laying a hand over the ruined flesh after the Vagrant Spear consented and whispering the incantation.

"Relying on another's skill is weakness," the Red Knight pointedly said.

"Fascinating," Akua charmingly replied, all smiles. "You will have to tell me how you forged your sword, then. And whenever did you get the time to farm the wheat that went into every piece of bread you've eaten?"

The other woman's mouth closed. The Vagrant Spear didn't even bother to hide her grin, which meant it was time to spring her request.

"I will be in need of your help and that of your band, Lady Sidonia," she said.

The heroine tensed, but she could not move away. Not when Akua had carefully ensured she was not done healing.

"What for?" she asked. "The artefact is broken. You must have heard the horns, too, Sahelian. We must gather for the muster in the inner city so we might join the assault on the Dead King."

"An artefact is broken," Akua corrected. "Leaving behind shards and exceptional materials. I have sent Archer to find me a forge so that the defeat we were inflicted might be undone."

"A worthy cause," the Vagrant Spear reluctantly conceded. "Do you need Aspasia's services, then? I could lend her."

Aspasia looked like she would have whimpered if it did not risk drawing attention to her, but that was besides the point. Akua was passingly familiar with the Harrowed Witch's skills, and the other mage's talents were entirely unsuited to what she had in mind. Illusions, blood rituals and necromancy with a spiritual speciality were not what she needed, especially in the hands of a woman whose very Name came with a saboteur attached. Akua would need stability and control most of all. Precision would be everything.

"I need all of you to guard me as I work," Akua replied, shaking her head. "Even the most minute interruption would ruin everything and the Dead King is sure to come for us the moment he grasps what we are attempting."

Lady Sidonia was hesitating, both disinclined to do the Doom of Liesse any favours and hungry to be part of the glorious fight against the Dead King yet recognizing that what Akua was suggesting was of great import. So to tip the balance, the sorceress glanced at Ivah of the Losara. Its face betrayed the barest flicker of amusement before it was smoothed away.

"I will lend my spear to this labour," the Lord of Silent Steps said. "And call for other Mighty to stand vigil."

"We will as well," the Vagrant Spear immediately replied, face hardening.

Pride was such a useful lever to move people with, Akua considered as she allowed the healing sorcery to ebb away. She smiled at Lady Sidonia.

"All finished," she said.

Archer was back before long, having found a forge half a dozen blocks to the east. They all set out that way as Indrani paced around restlessly.

"Your second ask?" Archer pressed.

"I need a Named mage," Akua said.

"You've got the Witch," Indrani pointed out.

"She is unsuited to my needs," she replied. "You must find me another. I can begin the work without them, but I will need them to finish it."

A pause.

"Nahiza Serrif would serve as well, if you can find her," Akua conceded.

Archer chewed the inside of her cheek thoughtfully.

"I'll see who I can rustle up," she promised, and heartbeats later she was gone.

Akua did not allow her thoughts to linger on it. Instead she hurried to the forge, finding the rundown stone house to be dirty and derelict but functional for her purposes. There was still charcoal for the forge in a bag that had been cut, spilling all over the floor, and she used it to light the hearth. A focused wind cantrip blew the dirt and ash off the anvil as she went looking through the tools, thankfully finding them to be steel. Even the hammer's shaft, which made it a little heavy for her hand, but that could be seen to. She needed to enchant them to withstand greater heat anyway, she'd slip in a mild lightening enchantment for the hammer. It was quick and dirty work, burning the runes into the side, but she did not need the tools to last forever – or even to the day's end.

By the time the fire was burning and the tools ready, the enemy had begun attacking.

Akua forced herself to ignore the sounds of fighting. It was not out there she would redeem her mistake but in here. Instead she placed the two prices of the Autumn Crown in the fire, using the bellow to stoke the flames even higher as she kept feeding it charcoal. Though she had once spent a month learning the essentials of smithing as part of being taught enchanting – enchanted swords made without understanding how simpler swords were forged had a tendency to shatter – she was not a trained smith, but then she did not need to be. Akua was not trying to make a functional object, not in the physical sense anyway.

She was changing the appearance of the crown to make it easier to affect its metaphysical nature, using the process of 'being forged anew' as channel to facilitate the work. Simply cutting away at the crown would do nothing. Not only did Akua understand the purpose of barely half of what Masego had done to the fae crown, even broken the artefact remained one of great power and weight. To try to change it without first unmaking it would be the difference between trying to shape stone and clay.

Thrust into the flames, the crown began to bend. The roots in copper and bronze began to twist, the sculpted leaves wilting as their edges thickened. Nothing was melting, not yet and perhaps ever, but it was softening. Hierophant had hammered dozens of iron nails into the crown, and reaching for the tongs Akua began to remove them. It was difficult work, even with the fire making them easier to rip out, and the heat in her face had her sweating as her muscles burned from the effort. She left only two nails in each half, her magic already feeling out the shards and finding the slumbering power inside was slowly waking up. Soon now.

The noise outside began to reach her ears again as she emerged from her trance, but there was a new note to it. It soon ended, another lull before the storm lapped at their gates again, and the door was thrown open when Archer strolled in. Behind her a young woman followed, dark-haired and tanned in padded battle robes. Of Ashuran make, these, but Akua would have recognized Sapan the Apprentice even without that. Her stomach dropped at the sight of the younger woman. Such a young practitioner with a transitional Name would not have the control she needed in her assistant.

"You getting there?" Archer asked. "It's getting crazy out here. No Scourges yet, but he's throwing Revenants at us by the baker's dozen."

Akua's throat clenched as she wondered how she would have to tell Indrani that they had failed again, that the Apprentice would not be enough, when the young woman walked closer to the fire. Her eyes were curious and Akua stilled at the sight of her. There was something different about her. A certainty that had not been in the girl that trailed behind Hierophant in the hopes of peeking at his notes.

"You are no longer the Apprentice," Akua said.

"I am," Sapan thinly smiled, "the Mage."

Only 'Mage', without anything preceding it. Oh my, Akua thought. Ashurans traditionally had three Names bound to spellcasting: Red Mage, Blue Mage and Silver Mage. The destroyer, the navigator and the healer. Only young Sapan was eschewing the label and the limits that would come with it. Simple as the Name sounded, it was a bold claim that would echo across all rungs of the Ashuran tier system. A year with Masego, the sorceress ruefully thought, was all it took to turn you into something that will rock the foundations of your home. Hierophant likely hadn't even meant to do it. And the Mage would be a herald of great changes, Akua had no doubt about, because when the other woman had spoken her Name she'd heard smaller note to it.

It was still a transitional Name, a step on the way to a higher peak.

"Good," Akua smiled, allowing a touch of savagery to show. "Come, Mage, for now the true work begins."

Archer returned to the fighting outside, grounds she was more at home on, while the two of them took to the forge. Sapan's control, Akua thought, was exquisite. The girl had once trained to be healer. The Soninke sorceress took out the first half from the flames with the tongs and laid it on the anvil, reaching for the hammer even as she instructed her helper.

"Keep it at this exact temperature," Akua ordered. "It must be even throughout all the while."

"To keep it at the point of transition," Sapan thoughtfully murmured.

What a genuine terror that girl would become, in a decade or two. Akua was no proper smith, so her strikes were uneven as held down the half of the crown and hammered away at it. The shape would need to change, else the artefact could only ever be a broken shard of what Hierophant had made. Feeling out the enchantments, the lines drawn in the power slumbering within, Akua broke down the beautiful fae crown. Leaves turned into flat lumps, ornate roots into rough and uneven chords, even as she grasped at the edges of the enchantments. Much of what Masego had done, the beauty and elegance of his work, had to be discarded.

Akua went for simplicity instead, breaking down the parts that would have bound the concepts of 'mastery' and 'death' into mere 'power'. A broad concept, which meant it would have shallow draw if left this way – the artefact would try to do too much at once when having finite strength, resulting in it doing a lot of very little. Which was why Akua, even as she turned the half-crown into a rough bracelet ring of copper and bronze, turned her attention to the two iron nails she had left. Before she hammered them into the ring, with shaky breath she branded them with the whole of her magic. This was High Arcana, not a simple exercise of power and knowledge. It must come from something deeper, something personal.

So Akua let herself remember the absolute nothingness of the void, the maddening nothing that had surrounded her as she half-slumbered a prisoner of the Mantle of Woe.

She bled it into the iron nails, pouring out all the terror and despair of it, and hammered them into the ring until there was no trace of the iron save for two faint circles on the side. The golden-eyed sorceress shuddered, feeling the concept that she had branded into the nails: chain. Exhaustion set her limbs to tremble, but Akua had no time for it. She quenched the bronze ring in water, letting it simmer there, and took the other half of the crown from the flames. Her magic was growing sluggish, but the Mage had learned from the first effort. She helped keep the enchantments in place as Akua wove them anew, hammering the other half of the crown into a matching ring. And again two nails of iron were hammered into circles, singing of 'chain' as the others had.

Into the water the second ring went, and once they were taken out to be laid on the anvil Akua Sahelian beheld her work.

Her metalwork had been without art to it, but even broken the Autumn Crown was one of the great mantles of the fae. Its nature asserted itself anew, what had been plain and bumpy bracelet rings turning into something altogether more beautiful. The roots and leaves she had hammered out had returned, engraving themselves so flawlessly that one might have thought the artefacts made of real ones. The bronze and copper had not melded, the copper instead turning into delicate filigree laying out the veins of leaves or the contour of branches and roots. And on the side of each bracelet ring, each large enough to be slipped around a wrist, two dots of iron remained. Only they had changed, melted by the head into the happenstance of two clasping hands.

A fitting emblem, Akua thought. For she had turned the Hierophant's beautiful work into fetters, making of a gift that would grant immortality at the price of master over death something brutally simple. The rings bound the 'power' of any who bore one, chaining it to the other ring. No power could be used without the consent of whoever held the other end of the chain. It was not a leash, for no ring was master over the other, but instead something altogether uglier.

A prison, large enough for two.

"They are beautiful," the Mage whispered. "Perhaps the greatest work of our age."

"They are the ugliest thing I have ever made," Akua Sahelian quietly replied, "or ever will."

And still she took them in hand, feeling the lingering warmth of them against her skin. She left the smithy, the oppressing heat of it, and returned to the smoky skies of Keter. There Archer awaited, standing over a carpet of corpses dead twice over as Firstborn and Named held the streets.

"Finished?" Indrani asked.

"I am," Akua said.

"Good," Archer sharply nodded. "You'll have to take it from here. I need to go."

She was shifting her weight even as she spoke, Akua noticed, so restless she could not stop moving. How odd, the sorceress thought, and then breathed out in wonder. Ah, my heart, she fondly thought. Always a plan within the plan with you. Catherine had gone with the Ranger, the survivors of Refuge and the man Indrani loved. All essential elements for Indrani to transition out of her increasingly ill-fitting Name of Archer. In a single stroke you tell me that you are fighting and ensure reinforcements are on your way. The pull of fate on Indrani at the moment must be like getting dragged by the hair.

"Go," Akua said.

Archer hesitated.

"You're sure you'll be fine on your own?"

"You chose my life over the crown, Indrani," Akua Sahelian gently said. "I swear to any Gods listening that I will not make you regret that choice, so go."

The other woman's hazelnut eyes met her own, and after a moment whatever she was looking for she found. She sharply nodded, coat swirling behind her as she turned to leave without a goodbye. She watched Indrani vanish into the city to seek out her fate, leaving her to find her own.

Akua's thumb stroke the side of the ring in her hand, wondering if she was holding a noose or a knot.

Liliet

OKAY SO I ONLY READ THE EPIGRAPH SO FAR BUT I JUST WANT TO SAY:

I FUCKING KNEW IT

I GODDAMN FUCKING CALLED IT

Liliet

FURTHERMORE

0. boost! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

1. yES KENDI IS A REAL PERSON

2. HANNO GO!!!!

3. That fantassin!!! That one!!! Raphael (iirc) the currently Thrice-Drowned!

4. Yeah Cat's winning the war but it's going to be Hanno's doing that there's a peace to come after ♥ it's true she was never good at this part. Creation, villains, etc. That's what hero allies are for

5. THE UNRAVELLING CLAUSE. Also, "- and their idea of trickery is a massive cavalry charge from the back instead of the front."

Admittedly it was somewhat embarrassing how often that trick had defeated Praesi armies. ""

6. "And Indrani could not be at two places at once.

Akua breathed out, closing her eyes.

Only she did not die."

OH MY GOD YOU TWO EGGS

okay so DK knows a trick or two wrt power of friendship... of your enemies

7. "“My life was not worth this,” Akua said, throat tight. “Indrani, Gods. It could not have been worth this.”

"I'd do it again," her friend said.

And for once in her life, Akua Sahelian believed every word of what she had been told."

Awwwww

8. "and its head, she thought, somehow seemed made of newer steel than the rest" AHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA

9. YESSS

TOP ASPECT FOR HANNO

TOP ASPECT FOR HANNO FOR ONE THOUSAND YEARS

10. "“I was not needed, after all,” he mused.

And maybe that was the lesson he should have been learning all along, he thought. All this time, he had been trying to do it all himself. To keep the heroes on the right path, to keep Calernia from falling. Even before that, from the moment in Ashur where he had first become the White Knight. It had been him and the Seraphim who were to be concerned with the doling out of judgement, but no one else. Even with angels at his shoulder, he had walked alone. Only that wasn't really true, was it? He'd been running around Keter trying to keep doom from claiming the day, trusting in his sword and the aspect he had come into, but that was not the whole of it – just the whole of him. They were all trying to hold up the sky today, and in the end all that Hanno of Arwad could claim to be was a pair of hands. Was it not the worst kind of arrogance, to think that it was on him for everyone to win or lose? Like a child he had decided that he would be strong enough to be able to do the right thing, as if his will was the only one in the world. He was not alone in this. He never had been."

THANK YOU

OH MY GOD THANK YOU
FUCKING FINALLY
FOR REAL MY DUDE WHAT THE FUCK TOOK YOU SO LONGGGGGGGGGGGGGGGGG

11. Huh. White Knight after all. Well damn, yall who were calling this win.

12. Oh I am getting bad, BAD feeling from Akua needing another mage for this...)=

13. THE MAGE
FUCKING BEST NAME THANKS EE

14. "And the Mage would be a herald of great changes, Akua had no doubt about, because when the other woman had spoken her Name she'd heard smaller note to it.

It was still a transitional Name, a step on the way to a higher peak."

THE BEST
THANK

15. "A fitting emblem, Akua thought. For she had turned the Hierophant's beautiful work into fetters, making of a gift that would grant immortality at the price of master over death something brutally simple. The rings bound the 'power' of any who bore one, chaining it to the other ring. No power could be used without the consent of whoever held the other end of the chain. It was not a leash, for no ring was master over the other, but instead something altogether uglier.

A prison, large enough for two."

~~YEAH THIS SOUNDS LIKE A BAD PLAN LET'S MAKE THIS NOT HAPPEN~~ wait

bard????? bard?????? bard???????

16. "Akua's thumb stroke the side of the ring in her hand, wondering if she was holding a noose or a knot." YEAH PLEASE LET'S LEAVE THIS QUESTION OPEN THANKS

Mirror Night

Ashur's Army is Crap but they produce the most broken Named on Average.

Though that might be the Soninke or Praesi mixed into the DNA. I don't think the Mage is part Praesi lol.

Insanenoodlyguy

"My life was not worth this," Akua said, throat tight.
"Indrani, Gods. It could not have been worth this boost."

Liliet

Sincere request to not do this on the links I post at least. I wish wordpress allowed deleting posts because then I would ask you to. Ew. Ew. Ew. What the fuck.

Magicturtle

Your kinda rude, arent you?

Liliet

This is not a new argument.

Liliet

(so I would assert I am not the one being rude in this particular exchange, no)

GluestickGenius

What is your problem with people having a little fun with boost promo...

Liliet

Okay let's do this again.

These are usually snappy enough to be remembered in place of the original quote / simultaneously with the original quote, and when the original quote is something that provokes sincere feeling, but instead you remember the promo thing, it's GROSS. Like it feels physically gross and I want to scream and vomit and brain bleach it out. It SPOILS it. There are quotes in earlier chapters that I do not want to ever remember even though they were fucking awesome because the fucking promos stuck around in my head instead.

From the discussion in comments, I know I am not the only one who feels like this.

I am willing to accept that when someone is making their own boost post they can do whatever and I can just scroll past whatever's in the same post as a boost link without reading it (even though it would deprive me of reading stuff people who DONT do this write the way I did here).

But putting it on my post, alongside people actually doing discussion, while knowing how I feel about this?

Like...

This is gross. This is a gross thing to do to someone else.

Magicturtle

First of all cant be sure he know you feel like that. Second have to admit its a wild reaction to start calling it gross and stuff, no need to be rude. Would it really be such a problem to just ask him not to do it, instead of calling him and what he does gross? Erratica himself have requested in earlier chapters that we dont insult each other and keep the good tone.

Rey d`Tutto

Ok. I get it.

I like 'em. But Liliet has posted numerous times as to how liliet disagrees with this practice.

It's a quirk. Liliet don't like evocative scenes turned into promo-boost type posts.

Ubua would get it.

Damian Lucius Black

Because Liliet makes such a big stink out of it and calling others gross I am going to spend the rest of my time reading this by taking evocative scenes, turn them into promo-type boosts and reply to Liliet so they can see it.

Liliet

I have asked this repeatedly.

Liliet

(seriously this feels physically sickening)

medailyfun

you will Grow to Transcend this feeling

gingerlygrump

Liliet, please stop attacking other people in the comments.

erissu

Said gingerlygrump, while together with a few other people attacking Liliet.

Do be so kind as to sod off with your high horse bs, pal.

gingerlygrump

Also, this is not the first time people have asked Liliet to stop picking fights. It's a semi-regular occurrence.

gingerlygrump

Asking someone to please stop attacking other people is wildly different than calling someone's actions "physically sickening."

Liliet

Me: "I am physicallly sick"

You: "Stop attacking other people"

I am literally not making any single statement about anyone other than myself, thanks. Like, that is meant literally. It's not an insult. It's what happens.

farbeyondc

Get over it (and yourself).

Rynjin

Please, by all that is good and pure in this world, go out and gain some real life experiences. Your life will be better for it.

Mary Gentle

I think it depends on how immersive a reader someone is. If you're deep, deep into a chapter, feeling all those emotions, and then – whap! Having that immersion wrecked can be painful.

Maybe it would be possible to have a mark at the start of posts like that? It's not like I'm going to forget to boost Practical Guide. I really would appreciate a chance to skip these posts.

Damian Lucius Black

Akua's thumb stroke the side of the ring in her hand, wondering if she was holding a noose or a Boost.

Liliet

Congrats on reaching a new asshole tier!

Damian Lucius Black

Thanks! I've never had reason to comment before and barely read them but seeing how much of a twat your are about the clever ways people have commented to get the story boosted I feel I have found a new purpose in life! I will make it my personal mission to reply to one of your comments on every single chapter with a quote modified to encourage boosting of the story!

"One hundred ninety-nine: this list began with the simplest of Boosts, the first. In the years since others like you have added to or taken away from it, a chain that goes back further than any of us know, changing and twisting as it grows. In time no two Boosts will be the same, save always in this one regard: there is no two hundredth axiom. That place remains empty, so that once you learn something worth passing down you may fill it yourself. Look forward, as we once did, and let those who come after you learn from our mistakes. What greater gift can there be?"

– "TWO HUNDRED HEROIC AXIOMS", AUTHOR UNKNOWN

tynam

So what you're saying is: the only reason you're commenting is that you've picked a person to bully and found a way to make their life measurably worse without benefiting anyone. You're proud that they'll enjoy this story less due to your actions.

You did this because you're offended that they dared to ask you not to.

Congratulations. On a story entirely about how the real definition of good is how we treat each other, you have perfectly illustrated the concept of being mindlessly evil just for the sake of doing harm. I'm an actual practising sadist and I still find your behaviour obnoxious beyond my power to express.

Onos

"This thing upsets someone, so I'm going to do the thing as much as possible, as directly to the person it upsets as possible"

You are a complete cunt. I sincerely hope you have an incredibly miserable, but quite short, life. Humanity would do better with less of those like you, and you specifically.

Abrakadabra

To be fair, Both of them are cunts in their own way.

Tom

> bard????? bard?????? bard??????

Please yes

Tom

Actually, the Hierarch would be better; he already has experience at it.

gingerlygrump

Doesn't Akua say that one cannot make a move without the other's approval? I must reread.

nipi

And the Hierarch would be forever indecisive

caoimhinh

Yeah, that would be awesome, binding those two monsters being each other's prisoner and jailer.

Because if Cat really ends up being the warden of Neshamah's prison, it's gonna be a really sad thing. She deserves her happy ending and to enjoy a good long life after this whole mess.

Thoughtless

fuck yes on the bard getting the other ring. couldn't happen to two better people. 100% behind this theory. Akua as eternal warden of the dead is a misdirect.

Insanenoodlyguy

My concern after "eat the baby"
Is that she'd actually let him do quite a bit out of spite.
Though if this still strips power over dead from him that could regulate him to "evil in a can that occasionally needs stuffing back in."

Insanenoodlyguy

Then again, what if her role requires her to just disappear and stay non existing? Can't consent to anything while you are in oblivion.

Dome Zasrekh

I like this option!

Kletanio

It was the comment about the terror of the void that sold me. Yara of Nowhere really is nowhere when she Wanders. She doesn't exist.

Akua's prison would take that from her.

Fuck [awestruck]

Kletanio

Also, Hierarch is very fundamentally not a part of the Dead King's story. It has no Weight for a dude, even one with that much self-righteousness, to show up into that story to hold the Dead King back. Plus, Nessie is smart enough to not fight back in the way that would trigger Hierarch.

But the person whose existence for thousands of years has been a counterbalance to this monster? The person who's willing to kill millions (possibly more?) to stop him [and who knows what else]? A person who the Dead King was willing to suffer the first true loss in thousands of years to thwart, even if only a little bit (in Third Llesse)?

Yeah. That has WEIGHT

jamesc9

> what if her role requires her to just disappear

As long as her bracelet goes with her and remains connected.

And it potentially gives Cat a permanent watching brief to minimise pivots that will call her in.

Unrecovered

No, giving it to Bard could be disasterous – those two old monsters can agree on many things. Now, chaining him to Anaxares... That would be torture 😊

plantsbeans very good synopsis thank you

Mincheriit

Wild card idea that is extremely unlikely. What if Cat and Akua end up with those two rings??? 🤔 it makes no sense at all except an extreme accident or twist but idk i kinda dig it as a joke plot.

gingerlygrump

I smell a fanfic in the making.

Miles

15-16

I had the same thought but then I realized these rings only work as long as the wearers are opposed to the point of never allowing the other to do anything. We've seen the Bard work to the DK's benefit in order to catch whatever smaller fish is her current target. The 2 of them already have an arrangement.

I'd even go so far as to say that if the bard had focused all her energy on keeping the DK imprisoned she would have been able to keep the stalemate and have the same effect as the bracelets.

Also Cat's name is Warden. A perfect fit and a Name that might be able to overcome the 2-way nature of the rings.

Akua is going to have a choice later – does she wear the ring or does she let it find its way onto Cat's finger.

—

On another note the enchantment makes me think wedding rings. So who's ship is Nesamah likely to sail on? Guess we're back to DK x Bard as the major villain team for book "and one".

Miles

antagonist team*

Miles

On another note, Hierarch would be the perfect one to get the ring.

He doesn't want his power and he'd never let the DK use his power. This is probably what the Bard is going for.

Someperson

They are more bracelets than rings I think

Rey d`Tutto

Toe-mato tow-mato.

Someperson

They are more bracelets than rings I think

Someperson

WordPress why are you like this

gingerlygrump

Lol, yup, been there.

Liliet

I don't think anything Bard did was to DK's long-term benefit no.

Sunday

Amazing, Wonderful, Outstanding, Akua and Archer bffs forever

Liliet

IKR??????????

Eris

Yesssssss, new named are being born! The Lone Fantassin?

Liliet

THE THRICE DROWNED

okay that's probably not the Name i just love them

Earl of Purple

I mean, we know that Grizzled Fantassin is open. I'm curious what side of the fence they consider themselves, and what side their predecessor did, too for that matter.

letouriste

i was sure it was a transition into Grizzled Fantassin too. Sound like a Name transitioning fast

Kletanio

The Gargled Fantassin.

Okay I'll leave now.

Rey d`Tutto

Literal LOL.

Tenthyr

Jesus Christ so much happened and I love all of it

Mirror Night

That Heroic Axiom fits perfectly.....pass on what you learn to the next generation.

Black Knight is interesting... "Commission" eh that is one of the more unique Aspects we have seen. Pretty fun POV.

Akua forges a prison (Bard aint going to be happy)....actually can you chain Bard to DK that be interesting but I am not sure I trust Bard not to let DK destroy the world. Also Mage interesting is the first time we have seen a double transitional Name. Besides Cat but she kinda reset.

Hanno is White Knight again...walked away with some broken Aspects. "Save" apparently buffs everything which fits his character. And "Undo" seems inspired by a certain Titan, I guess that makes sense given his GFs Father lol.

Might be about to shift back to Cat POV.

dadycoool

Maybe if Cat Silences her thrice, she can't give him permission?

gingerlygrump

I was trying to figure out what Commission meant, does that imply she can pick her successor?

That would be awesome, IMO. Nim is no fool, she's seen what it's like for her Name to wane and then wax again, she's seen how a mutual respect between those whose Names are opposing teams should supposedly be at odds with each other. Nim is a solid leader and was marshall for many years before becoming Named, wasn't she?

ByVectron!

She pretty much lays it out when she returns and Hanno thought bubbles the details of it, but yeah- she can take over one of her soldiers for a period of time, until her corpse is repaired, then she can jump back into her old body.

We saw her use this trick to preemptively ride another person's body when she attacked Cats camp and stole the money way back when, outside Ater (I think.)

shikkarasu

I think that earlier trick was Delegate, empowering a few of her soldiers with a fraction of her power. I'm loving the theme, where the last Black Knight changed the game from personal power to institutional power, but still ultimately did things himself. He got Lead and the flexible Conquer, but still had the raw strength of Destroy.

The latest Black Knight is running with that theme, with Delegate and Survey barely having any personal applications. Even Commission ultimately gives power to someone else, for all that it saves her own life. Perhaps most importantly, like Delegate, it has no application at all if she doesn't have an institution behind her.

It might be getting old to say this, but once more with feeling, Amadeus is still shaping the world from the grave.

Abaddon130

I know this an old comment on responding to, bit I just wanted to point out that Commission was Nim's first Aspect we were shown. Like ByVectron! said, this was revealed when Nim led a raid on Cat's camp to get back the ransoms Sargon paid to get back there people she took prisoner way back in Chapter 5: Incursions. She finds the Apprentice and Squire fighting an ogre, who she quickly realizes is Named, and uses the battle to begin a Pattern of 3 between the Squire and Black Knight. Here's the end of that fight with the relevant bit of deduction Car makes about her Aspect.

—"Black Knight," I greeted. "So what's the aspect you're using, I wonder – something like Deputize, Mandate?"

I wrinkled my nose.

"No, you're clearly Legion," I said. "You're using mostly ogres, too, so I'd guess you're Marshal Nim. 'Commission', maybe?"

It clearly wasn't her full strength she'd put in the body, else the kids would be dead twice over. The ogress hacked out a cough, dying, and I sighed. Wouldn't get anything out of her. I sheathed my sword, but halfway through the gesture the almost-corpse suddenly lunged. A single massive hand reached over my shoulder, grasping the Squire's throat behind me, and she began to squeeze – I felt horror swell, I wouldn't be quick enough with the Night I was reaching for – she went still. It was not luck that did it, but the eerily silent arrow Archer had loosed that went through her eye. I roughly dragged

Arthur away by the scruff of his neck as the body dropped, the boy moaning in pain. As well he should, he was basically a mass of bruises and bloody wounds. He sagged against the ground. –

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/03/19/chapter-5-incursion/>

So, between the scene in this chapter and the one I just linked, we see that she can use that Aspect in at least 2 ways. 1) She can use Commission to take control of one of her soldiers and use it as a proxy, thereby reducing the father to herself significantly. 2) As shown in this chapter she can use it to move her consciousness into one of her soldiers in a moment that would otherwise be fatal or, at the very least, crippling. This allows her to stay in a fight long past when she should be put down (We don't currently know if she can go to another body from this one without first returning to her original body. If not, it's still a powerful Aspect that greatly increases survivability. If so, well that's OP af as shown by Drake Knight. It doesn't come with his ridiculous healing abilities, but as long as she has a chance to think the word, and a soldier under her command close by, it's gonna be a nightmare to kill her for good.).

In to of all that though, having Aspects as similar as Delegate and Commission would feel like a bit of a rip off. Normally there's a decent spread to what Aspects enable a Named to do.

shikkarasu

Commission: an instruction, command, or duty given to a person or group of people.

"he received a commission to act as an informer"

She can basically order someone to house her soul for a time, provided that they are subject to orders.

caoimhinh

Save and Undo sort of feel like more nuanced and broader spectrum versions of Listen and Forgive.

Hanno is like Grey Pilgrim and Saint of Swords into one, while being a better and nicer person than both. Way less extreme and more open to discussion and self-reflection.

Mirror Night

Save is more a mix of Decree and Listen. Since Save buffs everything for Hanno when he is saving but doesn't have the same defensive buff as it does for Saint where she can take like no damage for the duration. However, it last a whole lot longer to compensate. Its more like a permanent super saiyan since it increases senses, physical stats, gives buff to light manipulation and gives precog.

Undo as Forgive though works a lot better though its more like a localized version of what the Titan did. And as a tradeoff Hanno probably has to use it within a certain amount of time. Unlike Pligrim who if you store the body can rez it whenever as long as its the first time and the Aspect only used once per day

Kletanio

No. This mistake would not stand. The White Knight would CTRL-Z it.

daegone823

I just appreciate how through the change of purpose so has the change in aspects. Whereas Ride, Recall, and Judge were geared to counter Cat. The Dark knight commented on how the experience given by recall, the maneuverability of ride and the White Knight using explosives' healing magic would have countered the Cat who was a brawler. Even Judgement Coin would be used at a climactic moment to seal the coffin on Cat who feels mountains of guilt for her mistakes she would accept the judgment willingly.

The Choir of judgement has been sidelined for most of the war. Hanno has gotten the time to reflect and develop his own sense of justice and forge his own path. I think a lot of people have noticed the Black knight influence in Nim but they are forgetting the Grey Pilgrim who specifically made Cat promise to not interfere with the White Knight's transition. So that she would not become the focus of his change, not his mirror. The Grey Pilgrim even sacrificed himself knowing that his existence was holding others back from growing. The Whit Knight had the time to see his true enemy.

Not good vs evil, but living vs. dying it has put his fight into perspective. he no longer squabbles with royals, or even villains he understands his place in the world. His aspects Undo, Save, and Recall are geared towards survival. Remembering those who sacrificed there lives, saving those who still live and maybe in the darkest of moments undoing mistakes that we wish we could. The White Knight values the life of all believing each serves a purpose.

In some respects he has become even more noble as based on his actions he weighs the lives of the common soldier, the lives of heaven blessed chosen, and villains all the same.

ninegardens

His next aspect is going to be Select All or maybe Exit.

Rey d`Tutto

I like Play
Or maybe "Paste"!

caoimhinh

Well, Recall can sort of be seen as "Select All", if you think about it.

ohJohn

What about Refresh?

Liliet

*his unrequited crush's, not his gf's

(it's much funnier than that ™)

I really like how Commission is said to be consent-based. Like I'm assuming it's consent assumed by default from being in Nim's army... but one that can be withdrawn explicitly.

dadycoool

"Sir, with all due respect, my body is my own and I don't want anyone hijacking it. Please don't."

Earl of Purple

Lots of great Aspects here. Commission we knew, but it's even better than I thought it was. I wonder if Nim's 'died' before. Great way to lead from the front without actually risking yourself.

Ogres have four lungs. Did we know that? I don't think we knew that.

Can't penetrate the revenant's enchanted armour? Just pull their head off, that'd do it. Ogre solutions to real problems.

irritantseraphim

I think Ohres are basically Krogan from Mass Effect.
Unbelievably sturdy, redundant anatomy to withstand more damage,

Mirror Night

Its funny cause Prince of Bones basically does the same to her by forcing her helm off and trying to crush her before Hawk finishes her with an Arrow. So yeah target the body not the armor unless I suppose you can turn armor to dust...

Liliet

I think this is Nim's first time dying. She talks about preparing her body for raising, meaning she's going from living to undead here, and you know people would have noticed if she had already been.

agumentic

She is not, though. She says "until my corpse can be made usable again", which means she is going to be more like Akua, a shade going back into a body, just her original one instead of a copy.

shikkarasu

Yeah, I think the fact that she used Commission before she died means that, technically, she never did. As a 2nd bit of precedent, Masego mentioned how the Hierarch wasn't dead even though he was atomized, since his soul left his body of its own free will. (his soul being The Property Of The People)

Rey d`Tutto

Villains cannot be Resurrected*!
Workarounds, however...

*Cat gamed the system. Sword in stone, One True Heir, etc.

Earl of Purple

Villains can be resurrected, villains can't resurrect.
Indrani was Forgiven after Neshamah-possessed Masego thwacked a spell through her head.

Liliet

Make sense!

Matthew

Erraticerrata, chapters like this are why we don't mind waiting. This is fantastic. Cat may be the protagonist, but the way we get to see the world through other characters eyes, fully fleshed out characters with their own epic parts to play, are some of my favorite chapters.

caoimhinh

100% support that opinion

Luna

Totally agree! Erraticerrata, thank you very much! Such great, amazing chapters! I love PGTE so so so much!

Daniel E

I'm digging the fact that Hanno is White Knight on his own terms. Also, what's up with this generation of Apprentices going on to become a God-tier power? Or did Above finally become concerned enough about Hierophant that they used this opportunity as an excuse to match him?

erebus42

Could be, it's funny I was thinking the other day that in another life, if the war wasn't going on and Masego had still lost his magic and became reliant on Wrest, that Roland probably would have become his mirror and nemesis instead of his friend.

shikkarasu

THAT WOULD BE AMAZING. Every confrontation would be Masego Wresting magic from some mage who slowly dies from him overtaxing their Gift, with Roland battling through the many magical traps and constructs and bound Fae/Devils only to Confiscate Masego's new magic. They'd get into scholarly pissing matches about whether the other mage's life was worth Masego's ambition.

Zeze rolling his glass eyes like "I'd just give them their magic back once I'm a God; I'm not a monster."

Roland screaming "They wouldn't live long enough the way you abuse their magic."

Then Hierophant's contingency artefacts would then go off, shifting him to a demiplane or a specially prepared layer of Hell. Masego would, even without Cat's influence, be too well raised to say anything like "Next time, your filthy dabbler, next tiiiime" but the urge would get stronger with each passing confrontation.

Snappy270

An extraordinary war demand extraordinary named. Basically the bigger the war the bigger the weapons people build.

Liliet

I had hope for Above and Below getting into a (metaphorical, narrative, automated) pissing match about who has cooler Named oriented towards the asme purpose ever since Tancred and Pascale.

RoflCat

I'd like to think it's their time under Catherine that push them out of the Good/Evil box or the precedent roles.

Arthur choosing to follow his own moral as a knight over a code.

Sapan becoming the Mage (of Ashurs) and likely transitioning into the Wizard.

GluestickGenius

What makes you suspect Wizard? Is that an upgrade to Mage? I would have guessed something like Archmage ...

RoflCat

Wizard of the West was the Warlock equivalent for Procer IIRC.

So if she transition into that, BUT doesn't limit herself to 'of the West' just like how she is the Mage now, she will be utilizing both sides.

And given that Catherine went Warden of the East->both, there's some weight in her 'student' picking up the same habit.

Sinead

Does Cat officiate the wedding between Yara and Neshamah using the rings?

erebus42

Perhaps but i could still see them potentially being spiteful enough to let the other one use their powers if it meant fucking over Cat.

Liliet

I don't think Yara would.

But that's the question isn't it ^^

Kletanio

Cat uses Silence three times on Yara.

And then tells the assembled crowd, "Should anyone present know of any reason that this couple should not be forever joined, speak now or forever hold your peace"

SpeckofStardust

You say this, but Nebbie would happily be Yara's warden in exchange for not dying.

After all he's lost his hell and is losing his seat of power where he sits, all the undead armies in the world means very little when someone has a god killing weapon sitting on his neck, which is exactly how this siege is heading towards. Nebbie would not let spite get in the way of his survival, as out of the 2 he's the easier one to kill.

badatgames2911

CAT DOES HAVE A HISTORY OF TAKI G TWO E EMY GODS AND MARRYING THEN TOGE TOGETHER NGL

dadycoool

OH, SHIT! I FORGOT ABOUT WINTER/SUMMER! THERE'S PRECEDENT FOR THIS!

caoimhinh

On another but still related note, Cat has sworn that she will eventually go back to Arcadia and fuck up the King of Winter.

From Chapter 15 Bestowal:

"You killed my men when you sent your fae into my city. You robbed them of the life they could have lived. You took from them. A debt is owed.

This is not a bargain, King of Winter, it's an oath. One day, we'll meet again. Not tomorrow, not next month, not for decades. After your game's played out. After I've learned to kill gods. On that day, I'll come to collect.

I stand by my oath, dead thing. Before my days are done I will see you unmade."

And, well... you know, Cat now knows how to kill gods.

This may even be a scene for the Epilogue chapter, for all we know, Catherine appearing in front of the King of the Fae to collect that debt.

After all, from small slights, long prices.

Mirror Night

I doubt it cause Cat hasn't really thought about the Winter King in forever lol.

Also Cat just getting revenge for every slight seems like a de-evolution at this point.

Miles

Cat getting extreme revenge for every minor slight she has ever suffered is exactly the kind of thing she'd do.

It's the Callowan blood

Liliet

Cat undid him with the marriage, it changed his being from King of Winter to King of Arcadia and apparently counted enough for her.

caoimhinh

You know Preasi, even when making shackles and manacles, they gotta make them gorgeous works of art. Anything less would be uncouth and gauche.

RoflCat

Are you saying this EE is going for a 'tying the knot' punchline?

edrey

this way too much. i have no words

Save and Undo. Hanno have grow so much in a day, and now he has THE GREATEST trump card of all.

Akua has solved the crown, a prison for the Bard and Dk, and the Bard shouldnt know the details of this one.

it was worth the wait.

megaprr

Lmao so Hanno's just a computer file. If he can Save and Undo, his third aspect should've been Open (though I suppose Recall is close enough).

dadycoool

Yup, loading a recent file, generally so he can copy-paste some of its contents.

Darkening

Recall, save, undo... Man, hanno's practically a gamer. With the power of save and load, can anyone stand against him?

dadycoool

He just loads a quicksave and pwns a nerd. Come to think of it, it's kinda what the Riddler did when he showed up. Maybe it's a Titanomancy thing?

bellacohl

At first I was disappointed about Hanno's name, but the more I think about it the more I like it.

I think the White Knight didn't need to left behind his name to grow, he needed to left behind his Role.

Hanno is no longer the Sword of Judgement. He is just a pair of hands, helping to hold the sky aloft. And I love it. I love him. And Gods I LOVE Save. Such a great aspect.

(Please dont yell to much at me about how absutely, horribly, stupidly wrong I am I am a gentle soul)

ALSO, I am so hyped about the implicit growth towards Archmage that Sapan's new name hints.

Liliet

You are so totally right though,

Kletanio

Hanno can become the shining beacon, the role model he has always wanted to be. A White Knight comes and protects those who cannot protect themselves, yes. But they're also an inspiration to encourage others to Do Better as well.

Kletanio

I'm curious if Above is (a) making her into a counter for the Hierophant, and (b) aware that she and Masego are actually friends and would totally pass apotheosis notes in class.

Konstantin von Karstein

I really hope it's Archmage! 😊

erebus42

Damn, Akua. thats a clever if far less enticing trap, but hey, I guess there's only so much you can do when repurposing the fragments of something meant to trap a god.

I would guess Akua is not going to transition into a name (if she even does) until after the final battle-if she was going to I would have thought that that would have been the moment.
Also Good on Sapan for transcending the shackles of her home culture to forge ahead into the future. I wonder what her future final name will be? Archmage? Grand Sorceress? Rainbow Mage?

bellacohl

I'm putting my money on Archmage

erebus42

She also learned a bit from Catherine so -depending on how much of a reformist she is- she could get a ruling name like Mage Queen or something.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Speaking of things people learned from Catherine, I love how Akua drawls from time to time now.

Mirror Night

Well it does have two major cities in Ashur...are Mage and Blessed from different ones. In that case one could end up running one and the other one can run the other city. That be an interesting endgame.

Snappy270

But Rainbow sorceress has such a nice ring to it.

Rey d`Tutto

CareBearStare!

Kletanio

Ohhhh. That's how it's going to be enticing, though.

The Dead King would never put on that bracelet voluntarily for anyone. Akua could try to hold him, but it would be a constant fight and she might lose. Because at his core, Neshemah has no particular reason to want to hold her.

But you know who he might?

I think that, at least a little, Neshemah might be willing to give up some of himself if it meant controlling the Intercessor, permanently.

Daniel E

I rarely double-post here, but having just finished rereading more slowly, a couple things stood out. First: a city called 'Nok' produces the greatest archers? I don't know if the pun is intentional, but I am still amused. Second: Hanno has retained Recall during his transition. With the addition of Save & Undo, I propose that he henceforth be Named 'Spreadsheet'.

jworks17

The Spreadsheet would absolutely be a villain though

pirateddesigns

Is this a morality statement about prostitution?

(I'm just joking here, don't @ me)

arcanavita15

Tango op please don't need he earned those assets through learning an appropriate moral lesson governing him his heavens given right to enhanced martial prowess. Ahahahab but yah Tango is broken. Also akua and archer scene is wonderful i like how they inteca t with each other, Also cat took those people I order to get the story to nudge archer to come to her in order to become the ranger.

arcanavita15

Hanno goddamn autocorrect.

Rey d`Tutto

Autocorrupt

Miles

Oh for a second I thought you were suggesting autocorrect would be his 3rd aspect and, yeah it fits the theme

irritantseraphim

You only know the difference between a knot and a noose when there's a corpse.

Unbelievable chapter. SO MANY NEW NAMES. Hanno gaining 2 massive aspects, Apprentice turning into Mage, that fantassin gaining a Name, when I read correctly.

Oh Saucy Spectre, forging the Doom of the Dead King, to shackle him to your Doom of Liesse. Truly, a sacrifice to make right the mistakes you made.

Dome Zasrekh

My understanding is that in this story, if someone wants to do a preplanned sacrifice, it turns out differently. (Mostly). I don't think she will become a jailer (hoping we get the bard and dk both!) And I really hope at the End Cat will give up her grudge and forgive her.

Kletanio

Although I'm sure Archer has some plans to help encourage Cat. Who knows, maybe she'll trick Cat and Akua into meeting each other somewhere and then getting Hierophant to lock the doors until they can be sensible adults.

"Indrani insisted that this is how courtship was traditionally practiced in Refuge."

"And you believed her?"

"Not this time, no."

jamesc9

> "Not this time, no."

Oh Massego, you are becoming wise in your old age.

mavant

Akua is Rabbi Elisha ben Abuyah. She can't be forgiven, she knows she can't be forgiven, but if she repents to the last, knowing that it won't earn her forgiveness... Perhaps she will be forgiven anyway.

Rey d`Tutto

One who is Unforgiven may always Atone.

Xinci

Hmm, guess that kind of consolidates Hanno's role in the Age of Order, and how it's age where Evil is leading. Also brings to mind the Tyrant's comment to Amadeus on his plans, along with Tariqs thoughts on the weighing of a soul. It's the moments themselves that matter, just as much as a victory at a given point as those victories are transient. So every time he struggles against all odds to save people he provides value for Above, quite possibly more than he would have otherwise, so probably a win in their book of contingencies Feels vaguely like Amadeus's patterns are still in the Name, but Akua said it fairly well, the Calamities just made a new groove, they didn't destroy all of what it could be when they acted like they did.

Its quite nice to see more mage actions from Akuas perspective, helps see more of the rules of such acts even if they are few. A dual chain holds much use, but we shall see who can bear it and how well the power invested shall measure up.

I am honestly pretty impressed the Dead King basically made a replication ghoul, I wonder how efficient the process is.

Alex

Save, Undo, what's next? Copy Paste?

badatgames2911

DELETE

Liliet

Load.

Cheetah724

That's Recall.

Sam

If we're going with this: if you draw a straight line through "Z" and "S" on a standard QWERTY keyboard, the next letter is "E", and Ctrl+E is often search, which is pretty much what Recall already is.

mavant

Merge. Rebase. Cherry pick. Diff. Patch.

Juff

Typo Thread:

two list > two lists ends all > end all spring leaning. > spring cleaning.
balance on > balanced on be beleaguered > her beleaguered sorcerers > sorceress (occurs twice) as he true > as the true forced revealed > force revealed requested of him, > requested of it, spell tool > spell took scabbard as > scabbard, and as javelin puncture > javelin punctured as Akua watched > Akua watched it craved > it carved have trust > have to trust
A heartbeat > A heartbeat to metallic > two metallic

crenelled > crenellated
He was kept > He kept tramping > trampling save her land > saved her crumbling > crumpling
one chosen > once chosen priests could > priests who could heroes one > heroes on Ashur where > Ashur when to tremble > to trembling master over death > mastery over death

badatgames2911

So fucking good. Im good with Hannos name, and nim is quickly movin up my list of named. Was that a new Grizzled Fantassin i saw? I love that just being near Hierophant makes Saipan op. Were do you go from Mage? Sorcerer Supreme!!? Lets gooo.

Gotta love that archer is schmooving twords the main plot

Sun Dog

Zeze has expressed to Cat his bottomless contempt for Ashuran mages, worse than Jacquinites, they're good at their specialty but also workmen who wield magic as a tool to do highly specific things. If you aren't exploring the deeper truths of reality, trying to apotheosis your way out of the cage, do you even count as a spellcaster?

Not a shock exposure to him would broaden Saipan's horizons a little.

badatgames2911

So cats gonna marry the two gods who have been enemies for a king time, simultaneously unmaking both of them, wait ive heard that one before ... And shes actually a priest this time too!

So Kadabra over here helping Lady Ubuu make the rings, and shes not even in her final form yet wtf thats op above def workin hard to make a counter to Hierophant like bruh.

Kinda suprised we haven't seen more NEW named come out if this ngl but its still cool to see mr thrice drowned get one.

Why does Nim have the best scenes with all the heros, first the Knight Errant and now White Knight, this girl over here making new heros left and right one more time and ima get suspicious her last aspect is Knight

dadycoool

Denying Yara the one thing she wants forever, while turning her into the Prison Guard for Nussy? That's great, especially how it was entirely Indrani and Ubu's actions and fault.

"Thrice drowned"? I feel like I should remember who that is and I'm a little sad that I've forgotten him.

Nim's tendency to empower knights is uncanny.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

IIRC the "Thrice Drowned" person is among the side-est of side-characters, appearing fairly rarely and not usually being the focus for long. They (nb) are best known to me for meeting Cat and immediately flirting with her, and for the scene where that happened being the one where we're informed that the uglier a fantassin's clothing is, color-scheme-wise, the more of a badass they've proven themselves to be. Mx Thrice Drowned's clothing was already positively HIDEOUS when they first appeared, so I'm not too surprised that they eventually came into a Name.

dadycool

I THOUGHT Hanno's mental note about how bad the outfit was sounded like someone Cat met before. It was when she showed up at some place where Hanno had activated some uber-wards and we got a lot of exposition regarding how she was handling the war.

ohJohn

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/01/28/chapter-6-equivalent/>

Captain Raphael (at the time) Twice-Drowned of the Ardeni Guard. After drowning on his own blood in this chapter, that makes it Thrice.

Cat called his Naming exactly 2 years ago (irl) to the DAY (6.6 was published on 2020-01-28, this chapter on 2022-01-28):

"Someone to keep an eye on, I decided. Survive enough scraps by the skin of your teeth, these days, and a Name might not be too far ahead."

Earl of Purple

Their own blood. Captain Raphael has always been referred to by gender neutral pronouns, even when they were flirting with Cat.

ohJohN

ugh, I knew that and still totally boofed it, my b

(I got the preposition wrong too: "drowning in their own blood")

Mirror Night

I mean it also works as conclusion given the resolution for Winter King and Summer Queen.

dadycoool

Well, once again you managed to write an exceptional chapter. It's very fitting that this series of interludes is called "Legends", because it is legendary. So many grand things are happening, none of them detracting from any of the others, and they all feel organic, natural to their setting.

Also, I was totally expecting Akua to gain a Name while she was forging the new rings, but her only needing Mage for temperature control works too.

beleester

The Black Knight really exemplifies the reformed Legions. Professional, disciplined, someone who wins not by being the strongest villain but by having the best army, able to survey the entire battlefield and know exactly what to do. And she doesn't die as long as her chain of command survives, which is just awesomely symbolic for someone who believes institutions matter more than people.

Nim is a latecomer to the series, but she's really doing Amadeus proud.

letouriste

Yep, she's great!
For an orc she's also really expressive.

Darkening

Ogre, not orc. And rrrally, I think it's less that ogres aren't very expressive and more that Hune just wasn't very expressive.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

IIRC there's a passing mention in narration from an ogre's perspective (forget whom, or which chapter) that being stoic and inexpressive is a trained behavior among ogres who have dealings with non-ogres, because seeing normal-sized expressions on really big faces gives an exaggerated impression to members of the smaller races.

Yamageddon

Ogre!

Rick Kerrigan

What a chapter. Thanks for taking the time it took to pull this out and polish it!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I've been collecting Akua's many nicknames, both Archer's names for her and those of my fellow readers, and hopefully I'll remember to release my list when the story is complete. I almost missed one a chapter or two ago and had to go back for it when I saw this chapter's addition.

Rey d`Tutto

Ubua. Still love that insight to Masego's thoughts. I'm interested.

sintonir

So, did anyone notice a beautiful detail: The White Knight coming into his Name because of his encounter with The Black Knight? Really symbolic, I think, especially because it was actually positive encounter: you would expect White Knight coming into Name after (or during) some fight with Black one. And still a lot of "classic" details: White Knight might be helping Black Knight, but in this encounter he was in some sense "defeated" by her, because in his final attempt to help she pushed his hand aside and said she didn't need it.

Kojo

What great way to show the end of the Age of wonders by having the soon to be White knight desperately try to revive the Black Knight. Truly amazing work EE.

Miles

I love that this is how they bring in the new age.

Whatever happens next every major Heto has cooperated side by side with the major Villains to stop a common enemy.

This is a huge change from the way Cat was being treated by the local heroes in books 1 and 2.

Squeamish

So it has to be bard and dead king that get chained together right? EE Wouldn't hurt us by doing that to a character we like... right?

ninegardens

It's DK chained to a series of jailors that take one month shifts.

IT sucks, but the pays good, and someone has to do it.

Geez- why is the story being so melodramatic? It's not like anyone said ONE person has to take the job. Did we think that this story runs on drama and narrative or someth-

...

Oh no.

Rey d`Tutto

Again.

Literal LOL!

Glyph

We now know all of Nim's Aspects, but what is the difference between Delegate and Commission? They both seem to grant her the ability to project her mind/soul into a subordinate's body, temporarily possessing them.

Darkening

I believe Nim said that it was a combination of multiple aspects that lets her do the full mind transfer thing, not just one. So both aspects probably have their own things they do, and it's the two combined that let her possess people.

Miles

I wonder if that's intended to be a retcon. Cause otherwise they're redundant aspects.

Rey d`Tutto

Delegate gives her power, Commission allows her control?

RivetedReader

"I'd do it again," her friend said.

I loved this – super powerful line – and the use of the words "her friend".

SuitorShooter

I don't know if it's hilarious or sickening that literally every commander so far is like 'I hate feeding my troops into this meat grinder but we have to for Calernia to survive', meanwhile Nim is all 'How many auxiliaries can I feed into this meatgrinder so that the Legions are the last Praesi army standing.'

jamesc9

How about both, which I suspect is common among people how spend a lot of time near death: doctors and war-time soldiers.

Someperson

So Hanno is the White Knight again. But better than last time. Not that he was bad at being the White Knight before but now he's better!

I didn't exactly expect that but in retrospect I'm not surprised. The only other Names that'd fit Hanno would just end up being a paraphrase of "White Knight." And while the gods of this 'verse may have some problems they do know how to call a spade a spade.

Black Knight using commission to stay alive was really cool tbh.

Archer saving Akua is simultaneously very in-character for Indrani who dgaf about some fancy "strategic concerns" when her friends are in danger and oddly heartwarming.

If the Mage doesn't wind up as the Archmage after the war I will eat my largely proverbial hat.

Those Autumn shackles are a bittersweet ending in the making, although Akua being the one shackled seems a shade too heavily foreshadowed for it to be what actually ends up happening, imo.

Regardless, the Bard seems to have gotten what she wanted because the Mantle of Autumn is no longer a route of defeat that Neshamah might be willing to accept. I do wonder if she expected Akua would try and reforge the Crown.

Darkening

I, could see Cat taking one of the shackles I suppose. Honestly, with Hanno acting as her enforcer will she need personal ability to sling night and name powers around? Still rather unpleasant.

Someperson

Cat is gonna have to face the fact that she literally Named herself the Warden and then made plans to seal the Hidden Horror in a duel, at some point.

But will she be stuck as Nessie's Warden for the rest of her very long life, or will her friends put a stop to her tendency to keep falling on her own sword in a villainous facsimile of heroic sacrifice? Find out next time on A Practical Guide to Evil!

Rey d`Tutto

I actually expect the Power of Friendship to prevail.
EE best metawriter!

Crash

Couple chapters back I made a joke about gift shopping and the Bard.

Akua is very proactive, eh?

Rey d`Tutto

Again, thank you, EE.
Imma gonna read the next chapter now.

Rey d`Tutto

I lied. Re read left this thread.
"I need a Named mage," Akua said.
And she got a Named named Mage.
Damn

Chapter 64: Gehenna

"In war you must avoid fighting strength and instead attack weakness. Therefore, an army evenly mediocre cannot be attacked."

– Isabella the Mad, Proceran general

"You know," I said, "given that the first part of this plan was literally going to Hell, I kind of figured that the trouble we'd run into would actually be Hell-related."

Masego cocked his head to the side.

"Technically speaking," he began, and I spared him a glare.

"Don't you fucking start," I warned him. "Not when I'm looking at what appears to be a hanged skeleton."

The five of us were standing in a village, which would have had me rather curious if it weren't currently abandoned and on fire. Once you'd seen one burning village you'd seen all of them, really. Still, worrying as it was that we'd been in the Serenity for nearly a quarter hour now and the only sign of life we'd seen was an empty village set ablaze, I was rather more concerned by the other thing we'd found. There was a nice old oak in the middle of town, one I was looking at, and someone had seen fit to tie a noose to the tallest branch and hang a skeleton from it.

"Perhaps it committed a crime," Masego suggested.

"She, by the looks of those hips," the Concocter noted from my left.

I narrowed my eye, poking the skeleton with the tip of my staff. She rattled a little, but remained defiantly not undead.

"You told me the dead always rise in the Serenity," I called out to Ranger.

It was one of the many ways the Hidden Horror had turned the Hell into his personal fiefdom, Hye Su had explained. The afterlife here was service in Keter's armies, marching through the gate into Creation. Not all souls remained in the Dead King's grasp, but many did. It was his most regular source of Binds, the ensouled undead used as officers for his armies.

"They should," she replied. "Something must have happened."

"She used to be undead," Hierophant said. "It's why the bones are still holding together, the necromancy fused them."

"But she wasn't destroyed," the Silver Huntress grunted. "There's nothing broken enough to break the spell."

Which was the part that actually worried me, I mused. Any idiot could hang a skeleton, particularly if it wasn't moving at the time. When you did it and it appeared to work, though, that was a different story. Something eldritch was afoot and this was a bad place to face it. The Hells were not the same as Creation, rules were not as firm here. And when you were powerful enough they could even be changed: how else would even a powerful mage like Dead King have been able to rule a Hell for so long? Which meant that somewhere in the Serenity an entity was loose that was capable of bending those rules. Possibly even when Neshamah was fighting them, which was a mite unsettling. Who or what would be able to fight the Dead King like this in his own private kingdom? Considering this place didn't look like it'd been burning for more than an hour, we might just be close enough to learn the answer to that.

Joy.

"We're not going to learn more from this place," I finally said. "Fire's burnt through too much. Ranger, have you figured out where we are?"

"About an hour south of the nine-hundredth stele," she replied. "We crossed through further west than we should have."

She paused, glancing at Masego.

"Wekesa would not have made that mistake."

"If only he were still with us," Masego agreed. "If only you had helped make it so in any way."

Ranger's face tightened. She was not, I suspected, used to being spoken to like that even when she loosed her little barbs – not from people she didn't consider equals. Only Hierophant had not lied or insulted her in any way, for all the tacit contempt behind his words, so she was struggling to find a reason to be offended. She wasn't used to dealing with Zeze at all, I thought. Not the way Sabah and Scribe had been. She'd not stayed with the Calamities long enough to be. Much as I would have enjoyed continuing to listen at Ranger continuing to fail at winning a battle Masego was unaware he was fighting, the sight around us was making it clear we needed to get a move on.

There were things going on in the Serenity I'd not anticipated, so I was in need of answers.

"So which is the closest gate?" I asked.

While there was only one Hellgate in Keter, it was not a simple tunnel through. The Dead King had, over millennia, tied the portal to several gates spread across the Serenity. Though the other end in Creation could only be tied to one Serenity gate at a time, there were at least nine of these spread across the Hell that Ranger knew of.

"It's the Writhing Palace," Ranger said. "The Banquet Hall is a lot less defended but it's at least an hour more: there's woods and a river in the way."

Fuck. I'd heard that name once before, when I came to Keter for the talks, and thought it was not somewhere I ever wanted to visit. I should have known better than to tempt the Gods that way, I brooded.

"I don't suppose anybody's got a drink?" I glumly said. "I'm going to need one if we're going to a place called the godddamn Writhing Palace."

"I do, actually," the Concocter surprised, going rifling through her haversack.

She got out a small crystal flask with something that looked like water in it, though after she handed it to me when I took out the cork the smell of strong liquor assaulted my nostrils. I took a pull and almost choked, eyes watering.

"Is that moonshine?" I croaked out.

"It is," Cocky proudly smiled. "I made it myself."

I took another pull from the flask, having gotten used to the strong taste.

"You're a delight," I told her, "and now my favourite person in this band of five."

Ranger took a step closer, reaching for the flask, but I moved it away from her hand.

"We ask," I chided, "before we take."

"No," the Concocter immediately said, smiling beatifically.

When I turned to have a look at Ranger's face, though it wasn't irritation I found. She looked like she'd been slapped in the face, I thought, or perhaps had seen a ghost. And it was on me that her eyes rested, not her former pupil. She withdrew as if burned, striding ahead of us.

"Come on," Hye Su gruffly said. "Let's get this over with."

I corked the flask again, handing it back to Cocky with a murmur of thanks, and settled into a thoughtful frown. If it was a ghost she'd been looking for, well, there was only the one we shared.

And I wasn't quite sure how I felt about Ranger seeing my father in me.

—

Deep down part of me had expected something about the Serenity to be fantastical and disturbing, but by all indications the Hell was one of the single most boring places to ever exist.

It was all fields and forests, with occasional river or dirt road passing through. I barely saw any animals, but there had to be a few around else the people here wouldn't be able to clothe themselves. In a way, it was the pinnacle of the Dead King's achievements that his personal Hell was something so violently unremarkable. It was a land without dangers or excitements, a seemingly endless sprawl of pretty little villages without fear or famine. And it was only villages. Not a town to be seen, much less a city, and the two villages we'd passed through had shown only a few different trades. The Serenity had been carefully crafted to remain forever pleasant and stagnant, not a soul from it ever interested in leaving.

If we'd had more time, I would have studied this place with fascination. What had it taken for Neshamah to turn a Hell full of devils into this pastoral dream? How had he shaped his people into being so utterly content, growing and pruning them over centuries as an immortal gardener would a tree? Though horror lurked behind what the Dead King had done here, I itched to learn the methods. There'd never been a ruler like Neshamah before, not really, and likely there never would again. That was something to be fervently sought, but when he passed the Dead King would take with him a unique mind. One that had learned secrets deeps and strange, for all its malevolence.

The boredom ceased about the moment we found the first corpse by the road.

"Those bones have been exposed to the elements for decades," Masego said. "This used to be undead."

And now the skeleton by the dirt path was, by all appearances, laid to rest. Once more without a mark on it to explain how that had come to be. Even Light would leave traces, I thought. Did something dispel the necromancy keeping it moving?

"It's too close to the road for it to have been coincidence," the Silver Huntress said.

"Agreed," I grunted. "Whatever's responsible for it collapsing was going up the road."

Which Ranger had said led to the Writhing Palace. The entity responsible for this would likely beat us to the place, which while simplifying getting to the bottom of this was just a bit unsettling. We still had no idea what had caused any of this or why. We kept going up the road, finding at first another few lone corpses and then soon entire companies of them. All prone, all without marks.

"Someone was sending troops after whoever walked up that road," I frowned.

And it'd been more than one person doing that, as it turned out.

"There's tracks all over the fields," Ranger told me. "At least a hundred people heading towards the palace, not all at the same time."

"Ominous," I noted.

We hurried, for lack of anything else to do, and followed the path at a pace just short of a run. I found it more difficult to tell time here – the Serenity had no true dawn or dusk I could measure myself against – but it could not have been an hour by the time it began. It was a pulse I felt. Steady like a heartbeat, rippling through the air like a drum. It battered away at all of us, and though goddesses riding my mind for years had hardened me I was not the only one here. Masego and Ranger seemed more irritated than truly affected, but the other two were looking dazed.

"Shit," I muttered.

"Warden?" Ranger asked.

"I've felt this before," I said. "I know who it is."

"Who?" Alexis said, tone disbelieving.

"The Hierarch," I told them. "Though his aspect didn't reach quite this far last time I encountered it."

In Rochelant I'd need to reach the plaza where he was before it was this strong. Now we couldn't even see him yet and it was like a tide in the air. That was a small thing, though, compared to the revelation that Anaxares the Diplomat was for some fucking godforsaken reason in the Serenity. How? Last I'd heard he should have been wrestling the Choir of Judgement, and stubborn as the madman was I didn't see him winning that tussle. He hadn't at the start, and unlike him the angels could not tire. How could he have- no, that didn't matter. Not really. The particular method was irrelevant in the greater scheme of things. What mattered was why he was here.

We were too late in the game for it to be an accident.

"I had thought him imprisoned by the Choir of Judgement for his blasphemy," the Silver Huntress slowly said.

"More like imprisoning with," the Concocter replied, sounding amused, "but you're not wrong."

"How kind of you to say so," Alexis acidly said.

"It's an interesting trick," Ranger mused. "Something like projecting an abstract kind of domain, if I had to guess. It'll be tiresome to deal with inside a place like the Serenity."

I tuned them out, closing my eye and forcing myself to think. An obvious answer was there to the second question I'd asked myself, but I forced myself to consider others. And yet as I went through one possibility after another, discarding the impossible and the unlikely, I found that only one remained standing. The Intercessor had done this. She'd done it because she had a use for the Hierarch's presence here, even though I could not be sure what it was yet. It had to be the Wandering Bard, because it wasn't anyone on my side that'd done this and there was no one left that could screw with angels and wasn't aside from Yara of Nowhere.

What was the play here? Obviously Hierarch was poison to a place like the Serenity, so it might be the Intercessor was trying to poison the Dead King's bolthole should he lose on Creation. On the other hand, in one of the conversations I'd had with her she had pretty convincingly sold me on the Dead King being stuck in the Serenity as him being defeated. 'Sealed Evil in a box' wasn't a story that ended well for the Evil in question in the long term, she'd not been lying about that. She could have been lying in a broader sense, sure, but that was a rabbit hole not worth going down.

If the Intercessor meant to cut off the Dead King's retreat and believed there was nothing he could do against such a stroke, then she could have done this years ago. She hadn't. Which meant she was after something else. Aside from cutting his retreat, what was she- oh. Oh, fuck.

"It's actually that simple, isn't it?" I murmured, rubbing the bridge of my nose.

There was nothing aside from cutting off the Dead King's retreat, because that was the whole fucking point. She was making sure Neshamah knew that if he didn't win in Creation, he was done. No way out, no path of retreat. The Intercessor wanted us to be fighting against a cornered animal with nothing left to lose. Someone capable of anything so long as it bought him even a heartbeat more of survival.

"Catherine?" Masego asked. "You're talking to yourself again. Are we still headed to the Writhing Palace?"

I grimaced. It was the closest gate, and I needed to get a finger on the pulse on what the Hierarch was after. Occasionally violent madman the Bellerophon might be, he wasn't necessarily an enemy. Not unless his remarkably even pissing match with the Seraphim had changed him too much.

"We are," I answered. "Prepare your minds, it'll get worse the more we approach."

At least, I mused, I finally knew what had happened to the undead we'd been finding. Necromancy keeping soldiers fighting in a war that hadn't been voted on in the service of a tyrant? The Hierarch would see that as so furiously intolerable they'd drop down the moment they entered his aspect's reach.

And so for once, I smiled, someone had popped up that was scarier for the Dead King than me.

—

The Writhing Palace was a ruin.

I could see the bones of what it had been meant to be, a boast as to the power of the man who'd made it. Curved pillars of ivory rose like rib bones from the grass, their shadows cutting across the green. Their shape drew the eye, outlining the belly of a great beast ending in a head that was a now-shattered throne room. No single stone was left unbroken, as if someone had wanted to take a hammer to the very principle of royalty, and among the ruin someone had started a fire. Anaxares the Diplomat, a too-thin man in tattered beggar's robes, roasted a slab of meat over an open flame in the wreckage of the Dead King's throne room. He used a snapped gold scepter as a spike and sat on the shattered back of the throne, his burning grey eyes wreathed in smoke.

He looked like the death of crowns, feasting over their demise.

Yet what gave us pause when we approached was not the sight of him but instead what lay around. The Writhing Palace had not had walls of stone, Ranger had told me. It was a boast, after all. Between the ribs and the throne room of pure white marble, it had been a great palace made entirely of devils. Thousands and thousands of them, of all shapes and sizes, each interlocked and forever writhing as they remained frozen in place by the unbroken will of Trismegistus King. Or so it had been. Now the Hierarch had come, the Republic's howling anger made into a man, and the spell had broken. The devils had broken into courts, some huddling around fires and others assembling into mobs as other stood above them and gave speeches in the dark tongue.

Some of them, I gathered from a closer look, were attempting to organize elections.

The others pulled closer to me as we approached, save for Ranger — whose pride lay in indifference. There were humans in the throng, I eventually saw. There were so few of them compared to the devils that I had not noticed. They sat with the Hell's first inhabitants, speaking animatedly as they shared fires. No mobs were howling for blood, but I knew why already: we'd walked past a forest turned into gallows as we approached, humans and devils swinging from branches. The anger of the people had been sated, at least for now. I could feel the song of the Hierarch's madness turned into an aspect, the low and deep thrum that slithered down your veins. It would wake again in time, hungry for further ropes and necks.

None sat with the Hierarch or stood in our way as we approached him. We got a few curious looks from devils, those that had eyes anyhow, but our presence seemed of little interest to the throng. We weren't even worth curiosity. As I limped over broken marble, the light of the fire flickering ahead of me, I paused to glance at the rest.

"I'll handle him," I said.

Ranger and the Huntress both looked as if they wanted to argue, but I turned my back before they could. Neither dared to cross me by following anyway. I slipped past the shattered throne, fingers trailing what had once been beautiful white marble and was now jagged remains, and reached the fire's warmth. The Hierarch's eyes rose to me, the man looking neither surprised nor unsurprised. Should I wait for his invitation I would still be standing come Last Dusk, so I found a jutting shard of the broken dais and sat, staff leaning against my shoulder as I warmed my hands against the fire. The Hierarch's madness battered away at my mind like a tide. Rolling in, rolling out.

"Catherine Foundling," Anaxares the Diplomat greeted me.

He did not name me a queen. I had not expected him to.

"Hierarch," I replied. "Fancy meeting you here."

"Tyranny Knows No Borders, For They Are False Inventions," the Hierarch informed me. "May Any Who Would Constrain The People Be Devoured By Bees."

"That'd take a lot of bees," I noted.

Those had mouths, I figured. Probably. It seemed like the kind of thing they would have, though I had never made a deep study of the creatures.

"Or a lot of time," the Bellerophan thinly smiled, "and it comes easier than bees."

I snorted, feeling his aspect filling the air. With every breath I felt as if I were drinking it in, the heady brew of revolt and rebellion. The thrown torch and the howl, the snap of broken chains and the flinch of the tyrant. There was a reason I'd never quite managed to hate the Hierarch, for all that he was ruin on near all he touched. Some part of me had never been convinced he was wrong.

"Yet we never seem to have enough of it," I shrugged.

I glanced at the slab of meat he was over-roasting. Sheep, by the looks of it.

"You going to share?" I asked.

"Are you yet a tyrant?" he replied.

"I'll abdicate before the year is out," I informed him. "Or die."

"Either is an acceptable outcome," the Hierarch conceded.

And yet he did not, I could not help but notice, offer me a piece. Republicans, I amusedly thought. I was still wearing a crown, after all. Why would he offer me anything at all?

"Thought you'd still be having words with Judgement," I idly said. "Are you done with the Seraphim?"

He frowned.

"They have escaped their sentencing for now," the Hierarch told me. "The peddler leant a hand."

My eye narrowed.

"The Wandering Bard," I said.

He shrugged.

"It has many names, all but one a lie," the Hierarch said. "I care not for the masks it wears – all that's left true is the duty."

"To keep the Game of the Gods going," I frowned.

"To keep the animals in the cage," Anaxares said, baring his teeth. "To rattle the cage when we get rowdy, until we remember how to kneel."

"She's doing a lot more than that, these days," I told him. "There's a war outside, Hierarch. One the League is fighting in, even your Republic. I don't know what it is she wants, but it's not for us to win again Keter."

"There's only one war, Catherine Foundling," the Bellerophan replied. "The lash and the back. Everything else is noise."

I leaned forward, smoke licking at my face.

"And which is she?"

"A queen's question," Anaxares the Diplomat scorned. "You think those wielding the lash are freer because they deal out the suffering. That's the trap, Catherine Foundling. The promise that you get to hold the whip instead of feel it, that there is no fairness but you can be on the right side of the unfair."

Grey eyes met mine, unblinking.

"But it's slavery too, to spend your live lashing backs," the Hierarch said. "Just a different kind, and you can't escape it any more than they can."

My fingers clenched, the unclenched. What would it be like, I wondered, to be the Intercessor for a hundred years? To never be quite for Above or Below, to always be sent to put your finger on the scale whenever a great Good or a great Evil was to be born. I forced myself to think of that, and then turn a hundred years into a thousand. Two, three, ten. What would it do to someone, to hold that Role? When I'd been young, barely the Squire, I had fought in the ranks at the Battle of Three Hills. I'd gone through Helikean mercenaries that day as if I were a sickle reaping wheat, until the killing didn't even feel like killing anymore. It had just been motion, a limbs moving to accomplish a chore. So what would it be like, to lash backs for ten thousand years?

It wouldn't be anything anymore, I thought. Not a lash, not backs, not people or pain. All that would be left was motion and the tiredness of the hand.

Still warming my hands by the fire, I shivered. A long silence stretched out, the Bellerophan disinclined to break it.

"That war outside," I said, "they could use you. You're still Hierarch of the Free Cities, they haven't tried to take it. You could go to them."

And if he did, his mere presence would tip the war. It wouldn't be as powerful on Creation as in here, his aspect, but oh it would still be something to be feared. Bones dropping dead for the second time, Binds revolting against the chains. And Revenants I could only guess, but it was the kind of guessing that brought a wolfish smile to my face.

"I did not choose it," Anaxares the Diplomat said.

"They chose you," I retorted.

Elected, even. That was something even he was bound to respect.

"I thought that, one," the Hierarch faintly smiled. "That I had been forced into the prison, that I was forced to hold the lash even if fought never to wield it."

"But?"

"It is only a word," Anaxares the Diplomat softly said. "In the end, for all that men call it a title and a Name it is only a word."

Gold dripping into the grass, the thin man took the broken scepter out of the flame and the slab of lamb with it, blowing on the roasted meat before he took a bite out of it. The juicy fat streamed down his chin in rivulets as he chewed, swallowing and only then offering me a hard smile.

"They can call me Hierarch all they want," he said, "but I will make of it what I want, and that path does not lead back to the League of Free Cities."

I leaned back from the fire, the warmth on my hands having turned scalding.

"So where does it lead you?" I asked.

He laughed in my face.

"There is only one war, Catherine Foundling," Anaxares the Diplomat said. "And I will fight it wherever it is to be found. Here, there, everywhere."

He leaned in, the grey smoke the very same shade as his eyes. As if he were it, or it him.

"We are all of us free, or none. I will suffer no compromise in this."

And I saw it, in that moment, what he was to become. Like a trail of fire, a spirit of fury and revolt that would bloom where chains were tightened until men choked. He would walk and ashes would follow in his wake, but tyrants would fall and even Choirs would flinch in the face of the Hierarch's indignation. A madman to the end, until a death as bloody as it was inevitable found him. There was, I thought, a terrible kind of beauty to it. To burning yourself at the stake of your own ideals. It was not something I could admire, not truly, but perhaps it was something I could respect. I reached for my staff and rose slowly, leaning against it.

"Good luck, Hierarch," I told him, and found I meant it.

There was nothing pleasant about a fire sweeping through a forest, but sometimes it was necessary nonetheless.

"All tyrants," the Hierarch told me, "have their day of reckoning. Even you."

I smiled.

"But not today," I said.

"But not today," he agreed.

It was as much of goodbye as I'd get from him, so I left it at that.

—

For all the unsettling sight that the Writhing Palace had turned into, leaving it proved almost laughably easy. The gate was unattended, a circle of stone left untouched amidst the ivory pillars, and we barely got any looks thrown our way when Masego woke it up. With no one contesting our connection to the other end in Creation, it was only a matter of stepping through.

And just like that, I stood in the Hall of the Dead.

The same great hall where the Dead King had hosted me for meals and talks when we negotiated before the beginning of our war. There was no sight of the elaborate decorations of that day in the great hall, every part of it having been stripped bare. It was no longer a throne room now, instead serving as a gateway and nothing else for all that in many ways it was the heart of the Dead King's power. Once we had all crossed and the five of us stood alone in the cavernous hall, the Hellgate quieted and Hierophant's eyes turned to it.

"Will it work?" I asked.

"Father proved that it could," Masego replied.

We couldn't close the Hellgate. Only an angel's fury could do that, the tabula rasa effect undoing the cut in Creation that was a Greater Breach, but there were other ways. Akua had once opened a Greater Breach in the heartlands of Callow, and it wasn't an angel that'd fixed the mess. It had been the Warlock, who had redirected the gate from the inside: instead of leading from a Hell to Creation, he had warped it so instead it would lead from a Hell to another Hell. When I'd asked of Hierophant a way to cut the Dead King off from the Serenity, he'd offered me a solution based on the same principles as his father's work.

We all gave him a wide breath as he began to cast, beginning with words but quickly slipping into the traced runes of High Arcana. Even Ranger looked spellbound as she watched him work. See, as best as I understood it Wekesa the Warlock had been able to pull some truly ridiculous shit because he had an aspect that allowed him to sift through the Hells to find whatever he might need. It was the kind of trick that would allow a mage to, say, link two Hells by sorcery without the use of an artefact. Masego did not have that. What he did have, though, was the convergence of three things.

First he had spent about a year of his life ruling over a severed shard of Arcadia made into a pocket realm. Second, he had Witnessed the Grey Pilgrim miraculously bring down a star on Hainaut in a way that defied Creational laws about how distance worked. And third, this very day he had brought us into the Serenity from a broken place at the junctions of Creation, the shattered Twilight Ways and the Hells. So as Masego's voice rose, speaking words in the mage tongue, he proved one more to be one of the greatest mages of the age by threading all three of those things together.

The Hellgate into the Serenity still led there. The Dead King himself had added a step to the crossing by linking it to several exit gates, though, and Hierophant modified that step. Instead of a simple nothing, the step was made into a place: the very same nothing we had used to cross into the Serenity. Which also happened to be an endless void, unless you'd made something to stand on. Which you couldn't in the moment before crossing the gate and being in that void. It was a dead end which wasn't technically a dead end, a nasty trick played on one of the Hidden Horror's greatest works.

And by the satisfied on Masego's smile as he finished the last syllable of the spell, this was just the beginning of him getting even with the Dead King.

—

The spire would be where it all ended.

We'd returned to Creation through the gate in the Hall of the Dead, itself built out of the crypts beneath the towering structure, but it would not be in that throne room we'd find him. Besides, we'd not actually gone through Serenity to take a swing at Neshamah: that was what the crown and the sword were for. Leading a band of five like mine against the Hidden Horror wasn't going to accomplish anything except corpses — which wouldn't even have the decency to stay still for long. I had set rather more practical aims for our little venture, deciding instead to go for a different sort of prize.

This entire spire was, after all, the Dead King's last redoubt. Out there in the inner city, armies and Named would be fighting desperately through streets and palaces to reach this place and deliver the knockout blow to the armies of the dead. Only it wasn't going to be that easy, because we weren't really going to win the battle for Keter. I had no doubt in my mind that troops and Named would reach the black spire, but the battle itself? We weren't even trying to win it, not really. All our offensives had been about getting enough people at the end of the line that we could destroy the Hidden Horror and end this war. In other words, our defeat was certain if the battle went for long enough. It was, in the end, simple mathematics.

We had neither the numbers nor the strength to really pull out a win in Keter. It was always going to be about Neshamah himself. Which he knew, of course, and would have prepared for. From his perspective, all he needed to do to win was survive until everyone else was dead. Which meant the black spire was going to be an unbreachable den of horrors, the kind of pit of despair that even Named despaired in the face of, but that wasn't even the first hurdle to actually getting to Neshamah.

That would be the wards.

The Dead King had fuck all to win by actually fighting us, after all. Sure, an old monster like him would scythe through Named and men like they were wheat but why take the risk that one of those lucky kids would have that one aspect that'd ruin his day? He was only hours away from winning, but since I'd returned Below's stories that was one of the single most dangerous places for a villain to be. So his first move wasn't going to be bringing down the sky on our heads or twisting time so we all died of fever as babies or sending out a demon riding on another demon's shoulders. It was going to be the most comprehensive set of wards that Creation had ever seen, fired up at their strongest and closed so tight not even a fly could sneak through.

If he could, Neshamah would stay behind a kingdom's worth of closed gates and magical barriers until there wasn't a living soul left in Keter. That was the kind of villain the Dead King was, when you cut off all the dross and the pageantry: most terrifyingly practical coward in the history of Calernia.

Now, while we couldn't sure that throwing enough heroes at these wards would result in way through it was actually a pretty decent bet. No matter how clever Neshamah was, Creation would nudge things so that the fight for the existence of Calernia didn't end with increasingly desperate knocks on a closed door. The price, though, would be atrocious. Names worked on weight, I had learned over the years, and sometimes that was a double-edged sword. Almost every Named on the continent was united in fighting the Dead King, which while a powerful story also meant that by fate's unspoken rules the Dead King had equal weight to a continent's worth of Named.

Overcoming that kind of opponent's foolproof defence just wouldn't be done without massive casualties, no matter how heavily providence put its finger to the scale. And the hard truth was that we just couldn't afford that many deaths when there were sure to be even harsher defences waiting further inside. That meant we needed another way to get those wards down, and that was where my little band came in. We had a way in through the back, and instead of using it on a futile swing at Neshamah's neck I had decided to spend our surprise on letting everyone else into the spire. We were going to destroy those ward anchors to collapse them, preferably in a way that didn't end up blowing us up.

Our plan had admittedly been somewhat more complicated by the fact that none of us, not even Ranger, had any idea where those ward anchors were. Thankfully, there was a solution for that: wait long enough that the Dead King would be firing up that magic as strongly as he could to keep the pests out of his house. That wouldn't help any for most people, but we weren't most people. I had brought Hierophant along and he still had one glass eye that, while most famous for the light of the Summer sun still shining in it, would be of use because of the artefact it'd come from instead: a pair of spectacles that could see magic.

We didn't need to know where the Dead King's war anchors were because Masego would just follow the flow of magic back to them.

"Down," Hierophant told me.

"We're already in the crypts," I told him. "There's nothing beneath this."

He met my eye squarely.

"Down," Hierophant firmly repeated.

I sighed and conceded with a nod. That was going to be fun. Unlike the last time I'd come to the Hall of the Dead its antechamber wasn't filled with an honour guard of Revenants, which were most probably out there killing people instead. Grim as the thought was, I was still thankful that we didn't need to fight every step out of the way after leaving the throne room.

"I don't care how good of a mage the Dead King was," I said, "war anchors need upkeep and replacement. If they're under us then there's bound to be a way to get to them."

It wasn't like Neshamah was going to do that kind of drudgework himself, so there was bound to be an access for whatever undead and Revenants ended up tasked with it.

"It'll go faster if we split to look around," Ranger said.

"It's certainly a faster way to get at least one of us killed," I affably agreed. "Counter-argument: Concocter, I know you've gone ruin raiding in the Brocelian at least once. Do you have something to find secret passages?"

"I do," she warily agreed, "but only the one bottle."

"Then Masego will need to get us as close to above those anchors as he can," I said. "It's our best shot."

Hierophant nodded absent-mindedly, looking through a wall as he did. He began walking away without a word but we didn't get far. I'd been pleasantly surprised that the Hall of the Dead and its antechamber had been deserted, but it looked like there'd been a reason for that: the entrance to the antechamber was sealed. The great bronze gates were so heavily enchanted I could feel the weight of the magic in the air.

"I can break the enchantments keeping the gates closed," Hierophant told me, "but they are tied to what appears to be an alarm ward."

"Of course they are," I muttered.

The Silver Huntress cleared her throat, eyeing Masego with that same kindly wonder all of the Refuge kids other than Indrani seemed to treat him with.

"The wall besides it," she said. "Is it also tied into the wards?"

"Not entirely," Hierophant replied after a heartbeat. "It is a grid pattern."

I hummed, realizing what Alexis was getting at and throwing her an approving look.

"Is a square in the grid large enough for a person to crawl through?" I asked.

"With some care, yes," Masego nodded. "It needed to be so that with the other magics did not saturate the stone."

The wall was stone and had other wards laid in it, but none that'd trip the alarm should they be punched through. The Silver Huntress handled the first layers by shooting Light into the square that Hierophant traced, breaking the protective enchantments, and the Concocter carefully rid us of the stone itself with careful use of an acid whose ever drop seemed to eat through inches of rock. It wasn't exactly dignified, but as soon as Cocky gave us the go-ahead we wriggled through the hole like worms and dropped unceremoniously on the other side. The hallway was empty but torches were lit there, which Masego revealed to be a trap the moment he had a look at them.

"Living flesh in the light they cast will turn the flames blue and feed into another enchantment," he told me.

Which was unfortunate, considering that pretty much the entire corridor was covered by their light. And rubies to piglets the moment one of those turns blue a trap is triggered.

"I can Wrest the magic, but we will have to stay together," Zeze added.

I nodded and we awkwardly clumped together to walk through the corridor so we'd stay in the light of a single torch at a time: Hierophant could only use his aspect on a single source of power at a time. There weren't any more torches in either of the corridors the spread out in a fork from here, but there were patrols of undead. Ranger had heard them coming, her hearing being ridiculously sharp even by Named standards.

"This deep there will be no Bones, only Binds," Hye Su said. "And he likes to use lesser Revenants as captains."

"We destroy even one of them and he'll know we're here instantly," I grimaced. "He's not the kind to get arrogant and think his fortress is unbreachable – he'll be actively looking for the rats that snuck past his walls, not denying they exist."

"Most illusions do not work on the dead," Hierophant said. "They do not see in a conventional sense."

"But you could fool patrols," I pressed.

He'd hidden us from the sight of undead before.

"I cannot answer as to Revenants, but certainly lesser dead," he conceded.

"Then we try that," I ordered.

And when it inevitably went wrong, hopefully we'd have enough of a head start that we got to bring down the wards before we had to fight our way out. Sometimes I wished my silver linings didn't all have streaks of blood on them, but arguably I was a few grisly murders past the right to complain about that. We ventured deeper into the enemy's belly, pressing against the wall as patrols passed by us on the way to the unseen place Masego was leading us to. It ended up being a locked and heavily warded room about a quarter hour away from the Hall of the Dead, its door hidden by an illusion that made it look like the wall continued. I chewed my lip and eyed the apparent patch of stone.

"Magic lock, you said?"

"Enchanted," Masego specified. "Almost every part of that door and wall are connected to the alarm wards. There are few secondary wards so the density is much higher than the antechamber's walls."

"So no crawling through this time," Ranger said, sounding amused.

I cocked my head to the side.

"A door's a door," I said, "but what about the floor?"

"Grid again," Zeze told me.

"So we make a tunnel," I said. "Go under the gate. Concocter, would you have enough acid?"

"No, but it is not difficult to make," she noted. "I have the means, though the variant will let out foul-smelling smoke."

Undead didn't usually have a sense of smell, so that wasn't a deal breaker.

"We try," I decided.

All things considered, it went well. We had to pick a spot near the wall to begin going through, since otherwise a patrol might walk into the hole even if it was veiled with an illusion, but aside from a tense moment when a dozen undead walked past us and a Revenant in armour lingered we got off fine. Ranger went in through, both because she volunteered and I wouldn't be all that sorry if she died. I was third, behind the Silver Huntress, and once I finished crawling out of the tight tunnel with aching shoulders I found I was standing in a bare stone room. Cocky came after me and a glance was enough to signify now was her time to shine.

She produced a bottle of what looked like golden powder, she emptied in the air – where it hovered! -before blowing on it. Fascinatingly, the powder dispersed on all sides. It whirled about the room like a scintillating storm before it began to gather in a handful of places. Streaks in the air followed what looked like air currents coming out of the hole we'd dug, which I supposed made sense since the room was otherwise sealed airtight. They also clustered on the ground, though, tracing footsteps leading to the right corner of the room but stopping shy of the corner itself. I grinned even as Masego dragged himself out of the tunnel, moaning all the while.

That'd teach him to be so damn tall, I haughtily thought.

"Looks like a hidden mechanism," I said. "Ranger?"

"I'll find it," she replied with indifferent certainty.

In her honour, after only some moving around she did. There was a faint, oily click and a stone at the junction of the walls dipped into the ground. Gears spun out of sight, the stone floor moving to open a pit going below and an iron ladder going into the dark.

"Catherine," Hierophant said.

"No, you can't stay up here," I absent-mindedly replied. "Alexis, down the hole first?"

"Shit space to use a spear, but I have a knife," the Silver Huntress conceded.

"Catherine," Masego repeated.

I turned to him irritated.

"What?"

"The lines of sorcery don't go deep enough below for this to be the war anchors," he said.

I froze. Wait, if this wasn't the place for the ward anchors then... The air suddenly thickened and the door leading out of the room burned around the edges. The hinges, I realized, were fusing with stone.

"Water," Ranger announced. "Water's coming up."

And above us small holes opened in the ceiling, the air shifting as what I guessed to be an invisible gas began to be released into the room. Of course, I grimly thought. Of course the fucking Dead King had made a fake ward anchor room to specifically trick people who could see magic. He'd had literal millennia to indulge every spark of paranoia that ever occurred to him.

"We need to get the Hells out of here," I growled. "Concocter out first. Yell if you see undead."

I saw from the corner of my eye that Ranger was just holding her breath, apparently unmoved at the idea of no longer having to breathe, while Masego was weaving a spell around his nose. I did the same with Night, the Silver Huntress instead pulling up cloth from under her armour. I was to be the last out, so I had a look at the trap pit and got hit with a blast of foul odour. Gods, I thought with a small degree of awe. What a prick the Dead King was: not only was this trap meant to drown us in a sealed room if the poison gas didn't get us first, but to add insult to injury the ancient fucker was using sewage water. It was a degree of assholishness that verged into elegance.

Ranger followed the Concocter through, the Huntress next in line, and I stood by Masego as he stared through the wall with his flesh eye closed.

"I think I've found the path to the real anchor," he murmured. "I thought it was a bleed array, but it does seem to be headed downwards in small lines. There would have to be reservoirs elsewhere in the array structure that I have not seen, but..."

"I trust you," I frankly said. "Where?"

"Close to the Hall of the Dead," Masego said. "In between the fork of corridors were first found."

I got the distinct sense that I was just now being let in on a bad joke that the Dead King had been laughing alone at for a few thousand years, which was the best sign we were on the right track I'd had all day.

"Then we double back," I said.

It wasn't that easy. I crawled out ahead of the sewage and the poison, but it was to the sight of butchered corpses strewn all over the corridor. Ranger and the Huntress had seen to the patrol handily, but we were most definitely caught. This whole thing was about to head downhill in a hurry.

"Good news," I said, "we think we know the real path to the anchors."

"Bad news?" Ranger probed.

It wasn't her first band of five.

"It's back near the Hellgate," I said.

"Which will be swarming with undead by now," the Silver Huntress grimly said.

"Look on the bright side," I said.

"Which is?" the Concocter asked.

A moment of awkward silence passed.

"I was," I admitted, "hoping one of you would have something."

—

I let loose a blast of Night that hit the ranks of the skeletons like a trebuchet stone, crushing armour and sending bones flying. Within a heartbeat the corridor was filled up again, the sea of undead pushing forward. They were packed so tight they were actually getting in each other's way, but for all that apparent stupidity I knew full well that if they ever managed to close the distance we were in a world of trouble. It'd be like standing in front of the wheel in a dam.

"Zeze?" I called out. "Tell me you're getting somewhere."

I could hear Ranger and the Huntress covering the other corridor, the once-Calamity rather enjoying herself by the sounds of it. I'd yet to see her feel threatened since the beginning of our jaunt into Keter, as if at no point she had believed she was in a mess she could not fight her way out of. Considering she'd broken into the Crown of the Dead alone several times, I wasn't even sure she was wrong.

"It is a frustrating puzzle," Masego admitted. "The solution keeps changing."

I grit my teeth and let loose another blast of Night only to find that a Revenant with a shield took the brunt of the blow. Eye narrowing, I drowned the hallway in black flame. That ought to buy me a but of time.

"So brute force it," I shouted. "Don't play the game."

"We've tried, Warden," the Concocter shouted back. "It started to melt the lock."

I was really starting to hate this place. I had before, of course, but only in a general principle kind of way. Now it was starting to get personal. I sent a blast of Night through the guttering flames, hitting blindly at the enemy, and risked a few step backs. Masego and Cocky were staring at rows of burning runes that had appeared on stone, a series of which needed to be picked to open the hidden door. What I knew about High Arcana – which this clearly was – would fill just about a parchment, if you wrote small enough, so I didn't try to tell Masego how to mage. Instead I told him how to be a thug, a subject in which my expertise knew few rivals.

It was a natural talent, humility compelled me to admit.

"We don't care about the lock," I said, "we care about the door. We'll melt the whole fucking thing if you have to. Cocky, use every drop of acid you have left. Or can make."

It wasn't like we'd ever need it more than now. I was forced to go blow up the corridor again as they got to it, but before long there were noises of triumph from the Concocter – and a sigh from Masego, who probably figured he could have beat the lock given long enough – and I retreated that way, calling for the other two to do the same. What was revealed was a set of stairs sloping downwards, large enough only for one person to pass at a time. Naturally, I put Ranger in front. Our method to get in there paid off rather quickly, as within moments of the five us beginning to make our way down there was a grind of stone against stone as the broken door behind us tried to close and the walls began to suck out the air.

It didn't do anything, since we'd blow open a hole behind us, but if this place had been sealed up it would have been lethal.

I'd figured the way down would not be long but I was wrong. After a rather straight way down at first, the stairs turned into a downwards spiral. The Silver Huntress, who held our rearguard, began to loose arrows at the pursuing undead which thankfully were as limited as us by the narrowness of the stairs. Tension would have made it hard to tell how long we made our way down if not for the gift of the Sisters which told me the distance from dawn and dusk and allowed me to tell it was about half an hour. When we reached the bottom of the stairs in a pitch black room Masego tossed up a ball of light, revealing we stood in an antechamber.

Every surface was covered by tiles of bronze that each bore a glyph, sorcery pulsing thick in the air. Yeah, I thought, this is the right place. Gates stood in our way to the room beyond but Masego seemed in a good mood.

"The anchors are on the other side," he told me. "Not all of them, but the most important ones."

"And if we break them it'll bring down the defensive wards?" I pressed.

"The most power-intensive ones," Hierophant noted. "Others will remain. I will admit that Trismegistus' defences were made with a thorough eye for redundancy."

It would have to be good enough. I left the Silver Huntress to handle the stairs and keep the dead off our backs, helping Masego to smash our way through the gates. The time for subtlety was past. Though the Dead King's defensive wards were impressive and apparently the gates had recently been changed to resist Night, they had a weakness: parts of them relied on active sorcery, and that could be compromised by Wrest. Sweat beaded the back of my neck by the time we were done, but after another quarter hour of exertions the half-melted bronze gates fell down and revealed the greater room beyond.

It was, I immediately thought, like looking at the heart of a Praes flying fortress.

Stones and gems were replaced instead by engraved steles of black stone of different heights that formed a complicated arcane pattern, but the sight of bare stone walls covered in glyphs was most familiar. I should not have been surprised: Trismegistan sorcery came from the works of the very man whose work this was. There was a pool of what might have looked like water at the heart of the room, whose high arched ceilings crackled with shivering power, but there was a luminous sheen to it that betrayed it was no such thing.

"Pure magic," Hierophant breathed, looking at it too. "I have no notion as to how it was made physically stable."

"That's fine, since we need the opposite," I bluntly said. "Wreck this place, Masego. In a way that won't kill us."

"It will take some time," he said, and sounded almost reluctant.

I supposed to someone who loved sorcery as much as he did this was much like a lover of horses butchering a herd of Liessen purebreds. Still, he nodded and I left him to it. He'd call for me if he had a need of Night. Instead I wandered about the room carefully, wary of hidden defences, and found that while Concocter stuck close to Masego I was not alone in my explorations. Ranger was doing the same, circling the broadly circular room from the other way. The dome above us ended in a thin well leading upwards, but that wasn't what drew my eye or hers. There was another set of stairs on the other side of the room.

"Shit," I muttered. "That can't be good. Ranger, with me."

I called out to Masego that we were headed down, getting only a half-hearted wave in answer, and went down into the dark. These stairs were not like the ones we'd taken down: they were much broader, and the corridor they fed into had almost as high a ceiling as the ward anchor room. Ranger, whose eyes lingered on the ceiling, frowned.

"Something scraped against those," she said. "Metal or bone, I can't tell."

My stomach clenched. That ceiling was taller than most Gigantes. The stairs we took curved smoothly and led towards a room that was beneath the one holding the anchors. There were no gates leading into it, only a tall arch of stone, and when we crossed the threshold with wary steps it was to the sight of a gentle slope going down. Like a hill of bare stone the room slid downwards into what looked like a massive cavern, most of which was taken up by an equally massive well. I couldn't tell how deep it went from where we stood, but as the two of us slid down the slope my eye found something else to stare at. There were two shapes seated on each side of the wall, sitting cross-legged, and both wore an armour of painted ceramic tiles in purple and silver.

They were also massive, each large as a tower, and through the open faces of their helmets I saw no flesh: only leering skulls, with green flame burning where there should be eyes. Neither of them reacted to our approach, still staring down in the well.

"Those aren't Gigantes," I quietly said. "They're too large."

For the first time today, I saw Ranger tense.

"Titans," Hye Su murmured. "These are the corpses of Titans."

And yet they hadn't been fighting all this time, I thought. We'd seen no sign of them throughout the siege, when even the animated remains of such entities were sure to wield fearsome power. And, most worryingly of all, even as we left the slope and approached the well they did not so much as twitch. They just kept looking down into the depths, unmoving, and the closer we got the more I felt the eldrith power permeating the room. It wasn't anything as simple as magic either. I was not sure Masego's eye would be able to see it.

We were but a dozen steps away from the rim of the well when one of the dead Titans moved. Only its head twitched, turning towards me, and it offered a leering grin.

"Mistake," the Dead King said in Ashkaran.

A strong sensation of release washed over me, the dead Titans releasing whatever it was they had been holding, and from the depths of the well there was a deep breath followed by a deafening roar. It would have burst my ears, if I'd not reached for Night in time. All I could think of in that heady moment before all the Hells come loose would begin chasing me was of a conversation I'd once had with a man now dead. The ghost the two living people in this pit had in common. When you assault the stronghold of a villain, Amadeus of the Green Stretch had said, there are three things to watch out for: the monster, the trial and the pivot.

By the looks of it, we'd just found the first of the three.

Frivolous

I'm surprised the band met Anaxares and they didn't fight.

RubberBandMan

Why? They didn't fight the last two times they met. They weren't even hostile then, and always had polite conversation. Hell, name one time Anaxares fought against anyone. He's a diplomat, not a cudgel swinging Tyrant.

Frivolous

Because the Intercessor put Anaxares there in the Serenity.

I figured she'd want to play a game of mutual destruction among the people she hates: Anaxares, Catherine, Neshamah.

Rey d`Tutto

Nope.

More subtle

Miles

Bard's really not that subtle any more. Cat took the aspect that let her do complex plots. Hierarch is there for one purpose only – to force the DK to use everything he has to win.

Cpt. Obvious

And thereby force Cordelia to use the WMD she had the remains of an angel of Justice.

The whole idea that the Wandering Bard hates the Dead King so much she's willing to sacrifice large parts of Calernia doesn't hold water.

She might hate him, but I wouldn't put money on it. Cat on the other hand she hates as she's repeatedly and deliberately has foiled plans that's been decades if not centuries in the making.

At first it was amusing, perhaps even a little charming, the way a kitten is charming when it stealthily attacks your feet only to fall over as it stumbles over its own paws. But when the kitten, who is a tiger cub, grows larger those sneak attacks gets less and less charming.

By the time the tiger has grown up and you realize it's the offspring of the sentient tigers that Dread Emperor Sorcerous had created, and it hates the cage it was borne into as well as its jailer. Then having it maneuvering to get behind you inst all that cute and charming anymore.

And Cat ripped the stories out of her. So yes the Wandering Bard has reasons to hate her.

But hating Cat is new. The schemes leading up to the war are much older than Cat.

If the goal was to destroy the Dead King she could have done it ages ago. Even now there would have been so many ways to get rid of him without using a WMD capable of devastating half or more of the continent.

No she has carefully planned everything with the entire goal being to force them to use the Doomsday device. Anything that might give them hope has to be crushed until despair makes Cordelia pull the trigger.

Liliet

I'm not. Cat has always been a fan, and Anaxares wasn't eager to fight her the previous two times they met either.

I did hope for more drama, true. But this is not really surprising.

Cpt. Obvious

I wouldn't go so far as calling her a fan of Ana ares. She can see some merit in his "philosophy", but can also see the problems that total anarchy or mob rule leads to. So while she don't dislike him she still knows he will spread a lot of deaths and suffering if allowed to wander the surface of Calernia. And the vast majority of these deaths are going to be people who didn't deserve it.

In away he reminds me of Rorschach in Watchmen in the way his personal beliefs were partly admirable, but at the same time so dangerous that they end up threatening the entire world.

Cpt. Obvious

G-D you spellchecker! May the Crows send an old and wizened Drow to slap some sense into you...

Anaxares, not Ana ares. How hard can it be?

Liliet

She's a reluctant fan! Doesn't want anywhere near herself, but can't help but enjoy watching happen to someone else.

nick012000

The Dead King's got an undead Dracon, doesn't he? The reanimated Corpse of one of the godlike super-dragoms that the Titans waged war with.

Mirror Night

Start playing the Skyrim Music....Also not just a Dragon...A True Dragon or Elder Dragon really...

Liliet

DraKon, not dragon. Singular of Drakoi uwu

Earl of Purple

Fortunately, that's impossible. They resurrected so long as they remained what they were, so the Titans transfigured them first. If he undid the transformation, it would resurrect and no longer be under his control.

Liliet

I'm afraid "that's impossible for technical reasons" is not really the kind of thing that'll stop Trismegistus...

Crash

Especially right now, ""cornered "" as he is.

Earl of Purple

Yeah, I have been thinking about it since, and... even if it isn't under Neshamah's control, I don't think he'd care so long as it was in a position to hurt everyone else more than him- and he's had time to prepare everything so he survives. Even got two dead Titans to try and kill it again, if he has to.

dadycool

Maybe the transformation is what the two of them were doing? And he had them stop maintaining it so it turned back and woke up?

sengachi

I mean, he's got two undead Titans on duty sealing it. I'm pretty sure it's not under his control, just something he can be sure will do more damage to his enemy than himself while he's locked up inside of his super-warded tower.

Insanenoodlyguy

And he has TWO titan corpses. That seems like exactly the sort of thing that you could use to change something changed by then back.

Adrian_V

And maybe he did exactly that, who says he wants to control it? That is just recipe for him losing control of it at the worst moment

Rey d`Tutto

Villain Story-fu in play.

Releasing the monster will cost the hero plot, but will harm the villain more pyrohawk21

To chip in on what others have said... This is Neshamah. He intends to survive and reign forever, and he's exactly the sort of person that would love the idea of everyone, forever regretting his final death if he was slain.

Then look at the ingredients we have here. Two Undead Titans and a Monster which is likely to be something that requires a Titan or two to deal with. What is the greatest Monster which Neshamah could create, that he'd then be able to reclaim control if he did survive the circumstances of it's release, and control it until he wanted it to be released...

The ancient Drakons are a good candidate thanks to those two Titans he has as they would immediately resurrect if slain so long as they stayed what they were. So the Titans transfigured them into something else, and THEN slew them. Something that the Titans can probably repeat even if undead, despite the Gigantes probably being unable to do so if undead OR living. However he needs to keep it under control until he wants it released as I said, and those Titans released something just before the Monster was let loose.

Sure, that could be a control spell or something so he could control the undead Drakon and prevent it from resurrecting into a living Drakon until he wanted it to. But what he could also have done is undo the transfiguration on the Drakon, only to immediately impose an ACTIVE transfiguration on it again and slay it yet again. What's the difference?

The previous transfiguration is likely to have been a Passive one, which means once it's been done, the effect needs to be broken or undone, rather than ended or run out of power to be reversed. Whereas an Active Transfiguration would end as soon as the spellcasters maintaining the spell stop supporting it. Such as say, releasing the spell?

Something which is quite possibly a result of anyone breaking his control over the undead by slaying him or just exiling him from Creation and preventing him exerting any influence over it. At which point, the transfiguration ends, the Drakon returns to being a Drakon corpse and promptly resurrects. At which point everyone else regrets everything forever in short order.

BobbinRobbin

Is that not why the two undead titans were there? To keep it transfigured until Nessie needs to throw the biggest of big old murder tantrums?

KageLupus

Pretty sure the technical name for that is a dracolich, but don't hold me to that one.

Miles

We've seen his dracolichen. Whatever this is is wayyyy scarier than an angry troop transport

Cpt. Obvious

And one like for the "angry troop transport".

Got to remember that one.

Dragonus45

The what? When were these mentioned?

Earl of Purple

Witch of the Woods extra chapter, not a Patreon one. Kreios tells her of the Titan's empire and their war with the things, which wiped them out and left just a handful of Titans left, who tried time-magic to undo it. Except the time magic went wrong and killed four, leaving just Kreios behind.

Mirror Night

That doesn't make any sense to me? Did they lose Titans fighting Dragons? Otherwise the way it was explained to us, I thought all the other Titans got flat deleted from reality. There should be no way for DK to ever recover those Titan corpses. Especially since the events that lost those Titans is so far in the past that no one should know about it. Hanno's Akashic Record doesn't got that far back. Titans vs Dragons should also predate Bard but she does have a direct line to the Gods....did DK figure this out when he used Masego to look at something....maybe it wasn't Bard.

So yeah I think it has to be Titans that fell fighting the True Dragons. The ones that survived that war should have been flat deleted....though really you think the last Titan would have destroyed the Bodies....maybe Titan Bodies work Like Angels.

Liliet

Yeah I'm pretty sure they lost a lot of Titans fighting the Drakoi, it's what Kreios and Co wanted to fix with their time ritual.

Earl of Purple

It was a war. Both sides had losses. The Titans were powerful mages without compare, but the Drakoi were all ur-Named who resurrected from their own legend so long as they were close enough to said legend for it to stick. The Titans would have struggled before they figured out how to keep one dead.

BobbinRobbin

In a world built with story logic, it's damned hard to keep anything permanently gone. We're talking about a land with enough ruins filled with ancient dodads to achieve whatever exciting narrative arc is required.

PGtE is set in a world obviously inspired by the likes of LotR, D&D and Warhammer (Fantasy) and all these settings have ancient apocalyptic horrors, divine leftovers and endless depths of eldritch doom kinda just littering the countryside and nestled under every other town.

Couple that with the fact that there's an entire chunk of the population whose lives are governed by narratives, you're stuck accepting that any Checkov's Gun you see can and, someday will, be pulled.

There's such thing as an artifact with a demon bound to it? That thing's gonna get released. Some Named's emotionally salient figure was lost in a fatal situation? Odds are, alive or dead, they're capable of popping back for a chat, fight or at least a pep talk somewhere down the line. You bring up two races of titanic, godlike, apocalyptic creatures that were all wiped out? Somehow, someway, there's gonna be a Name which stumbles into a Mere Fragment Of Their Former Glory or a spirit or a time loop or whatever. If they existed, Nessie's had time to find some, somewhere, because he's the big bad and that's what he's allowed to do.

Wonder

Oh how Lovely the dead King likes to copy Cat

dadycool

Yup, he doesn't limit it to Lakeomancy.

Sir Nil

I said this before but Anaxares really is closer to a Demon than a Named, given his tendency to affect everything nearby just by existing. He even has a posse of devils to work with him now.

Liliet

Best demon ♥ ♥ ♥

Rey d`Tutto

The Demon of Democracy would be just as horrific as Chaos, Order, Smells, Degenerate, Obliterate, and maybe on the level of the Demon of Understanding.

Sir Nil

Oh damn, I just had a thought. He's going for the Triumphant move and 'liberating' the Hells isn't he?

KageLupus

And why wouldn't he liberate the hells? We are all of us free, or none of us.

KageLupus

And why wouldn't he liberate the hells. We are all of us free, or none of us.

badatgames2911

We will suffer no compromise in this.

jamesc9

And demons now qualify as an 'us'.

Rey d`Tutto

Dupe

agumentic

Goddamn, does Neshemah have a true Dragon locked up in there as his final monster? Now this is a classic straight out of the Silmarillion

Wonder

Ur

humanoidhuman

now we just need a magic man on a spaceship using a god-tier orb of primordial light as a lantern

bellacohl

I am pretty happy Ranger is getting verbally slapped. I always hated bullies.

Also, Trimegistus, "mistake"? Really. Cheeky bastard xD

Liliet

Cat has done this to him, previously

Damian Lucius Black

"Boost!" the Dead King said in Ashkaran.

<http://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Hakram's Dead Hand

Childish

Liliet

Congratulations on winning the asshole prize!

Abrakadabra

You invited it, really. Like an ornery wife whose husband finds the only thing that makes her angry, and makes it his hobby... You two are cute together. ♥

Liliet

Ew.

Liliet

Heterosexuals are a curse and this comparison illustrates why perfectly

jamesc9

Um.

Liliet

(to be clear, that was a joke)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

She's not only done this, but then turned around and claimed not to speak the language in which she did so, if I'm not mistaken.

Liliet

Yes ♥

Juff

Typo Thread:

committed a crown > committed a crime
I came to > I'd come to going rifling > rifling after she handed it to me when I took out the cork > when I took out the cork after she handed it to me with occasional > with the occasional need to reach > needed to reach imprisoning with > imprisoned with anyone one > anyone on could to against > could do against the unclenched > then unclenched

a limbs > limbs that, one," > that, once," roasted meant > roasted meat lead be back > lead me back of goodbye > of a goodbye great gall > great hall
we negotiated > we'd negotiated wide breath > wide berth
What did have > What he did have proved one more > proved once more the satisfied > the satisfied look pageantry: most > pageantry: the most couldn't sure > couldn't be sure in way > in a way
had had > had
that with the > that the ever drop > every drop corridors the > corridors that went in through > went in first to be do > to be so corridors were > corridors we the whole in > the hole in a but of > a bit of five us > five of us blow open > blown open eldrith > eldritch

captainmarcia

"wrote small enough" in context seems like it might be meant as
"wrote large enough"

lordcirth

No, I think it's correct. Cat knows something of magic, more than most people.

shikkarasu

Refusing to sleep with a practitioner has done wonders for her education.

Miles

Also those years she spent using fae magic on instinct, learning from Killian, then Masego, and then a tag team of MasegoxUbua, and then managing the creation of Creation's foremost magical academy.

She's been studying quite hard all things considered (And there hasn't even been a test yet).

Someperson

"committed a crown > committed a crime"

Look as far as Anaxares the Diplomat is concerned those are the same thing

Cicero

Oh Dead King... don't you know enough about villain stories to know that luring the hero invading your lair into a trap with a monster and then taunting him with "Mistake" is sure to get you a dead monster?

You aren't really counting on that not applying because Cat is a Villain are you? Haven't you figured out she's a Hero piece that Amadeus stole and dressed in Villain clothing. Even her Names ought to give it away, never a true Villain name, always a name that could swing either way. Squire and Warden.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"swing either way"

Just like her sexuality. 😊

beleester

"Mistake" seems to be the one word that villains can use without horrible consequences, actually. I don't think we've ever had anyone say that and be incorrect.

shikkarasu

It's not about being incorrect, I'd say. "Just as planned" isn't wrong, just hubris. When a villain says "mistake" it's like saying "check" in chess. Sure, the opponent did something that allowed you what looks like a good move, and they probably don't like their situation right now, but that doesn't mean the game is over by a long shot.

There are plenty of games where one side says "check" every other move up until they ultimately lose. Just like Maddie said "mistake" every other exchange with Hanno, but still failed to kill him in their fights.

Someperson

If there's one thing Amadeus of the Green Stretch has the skillset for, it's figuring out the villainous taunt that is least likely to get you killed.

edrey

Ranger and masego was great and the hierarch is a charmer as always, lets hope the realm would crash with arcadia and he meet with the ex king of winter.

The titans were holding a drakoi, lets see if ranger can hunt it. Also, Nessi really wanted said mistake, he failed with Hakram last time.

And the best is Amadeus reference, there should be more extra chapters of him, maybe stigia?

badatgames2911

1. GOD DAMN I LOVE ANAREXES. one of my favorite chars ez. ALL OF US ARE FREE, OR NONE OF US. WE SUFFER NO COMPROMISE IN THIS.

2. "We ask," I chided, "before we take." – no Cat, you usually just TAKE shit with a pithy one liner afterwards.

3. Ha everyone shitting on Hye Sue is funny

4. Hierophants revenge will be sweet.

5. i dont want to know about anything that takes TWO being roughly as powerfull as the guy who called Neshahma the "YOUNG KING" holding it back.

6. OH FUCK OH SHIT OH FUCK.

7. its Triumphant isnt it? No, Its triumphant, being doted on by Irritant and Tratorious.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hot new fan theory: Traitorous is Triumphant after she got bored of being a warrior and re-spec'd into rogue. Had a nice holiday in the Serenity 'til the heat died down beforehand, then made use of a flesh puppet to begin her second reign. Later she'll pop out, crowned in dread and all that, and say a one-liner about her return.

shikkarasu

NGL I was expecting the final boss fight of this series to be Triumphant with an entire Hell's worth of devils lead by a core of hardened veterans from the Legions that died with her.

DK is a better direction to take things, but I was so ready for She to Return for the first 4 books or so.

Someperson

Hey don't speak too soon, Dread Empress Triumphant (May She Never Return) could still come back before the story ends.

(I agree though the way the Dead King was slowly introduced as a sort of background villain at first who you only just heard occasional references to in histories or magical theory discussions about Keter's due, and then the very gradual building up of Neshamah as The Existential Threat Of The Continent has been really well pulled off)

Miles

2. "We" is how you teach children manners. The implication isn't that cat is no hypocrite, but the implication is that Ranger is a child

Reader in The Night

>"Besides, we'd not actually gone through Serenity to take a swing at Neshamah: that was what the crown and the sword were for." "not only was this trap meant to drown us in a sealed room if the poison gas didn't get us first, but to add insult to injury the ancient fucker was using sewage water. It was a degree of assholishness that verged into elegance." <
The kicker here? Keter is a city of dead inhabitants, it has no need for waste drainage. Nessie actually imported sewage just to be a dick.

Reader in The Night

I absolutely hate WordPress' comment section.

>"Besides, we'd not actually gone through Serenity to take a swing at Neshamah: that was what the crown and the sword were for." <

What I meant to say here was that the two weapons against the Dead King are the Crown and the Sword, just like in Cat's banner. True to the metaphor, the Crown even broke first.

Someperson

Yeah I realized that while reading this chapter as well 😊

One of Fate's little twists I suppose.

Abaddon130

Did you forget that the Serenity is full of living people? So I guess, ya, technically it was imported, but only from the Serenity to Keter. I would consider those two places as basically multi dimensional versions of the same place, so it's only imported in there just technical sense. Really I think it's no more important though than it would be if water from one area of a city was transported to another for disposal, processing, etc.

Liliet

Cat+Anaxares deliver as always. A shame the interaction was so brief tbh, there's potential for a lot more fun drama there. Still, ♥ ♥ ♥

Hye getting startled by Catherine's resemblance to Amadeus, uh huh, uh huh, I see :3

Bless the "overthinking" door lock trap. Really made for those mages who can't walk past a shiny puzzle ♥ ♥ ♥

dadycoool

Cat's relationship with the League and its leadership has always resembled friendship, iirc, and it's nice.

I bet Hye got whacked in the face with deja vu when Cat said that, same tone, inflections, etc. as her father.

Miles

That's gotta be the most painful thing for Hye. Like, real feels painful

Someperson

The most painful thing would be to inform Hye that the reason she was certain that Catherine would take her deal for a duel to the death in ten years only because it is something that Amadeus would have agreed to in a heartbeat for such vital help.

It sure as heck isn't because the Ranger knows Cat well.

Miles

We need this in book "and one"

Miles

I mean more of the CatxAnaxares scenes

ninegardens

So, A detail I'm a touch confused on:

Cat in the Serenity "Oh fuck, Wandering Bard dropped Anaraxes here so Nessie would have nowhere to retreat too and freak out"

Cat having just stepped out of the Serenity "Zeze- please mash up this helldoor so that Nessie can't go back to the Serenity, and has nowhere to retreat to".

... ummm..
wut?

Did I miss something.

Oshi

Anaraxes is destroying Serenity, Cat's trick can be reversed. She wants him to sit still and listen, Bard wants him to eat the fucking baby.

SuitorShooter

I think the difference is that Anaxeres is actively destroying the Serenity, while Cat only trapped the front door. The Hellgate is usable, but if DK uses that Hellgate without noticing the change he'll be stuck inside an infinite void.

shikkarasu

I think it's the realisation that WB was working on the same thing as Cat. That rarely bodes well.

Cpt. Obvious

It also traps Anaxares if he gets bored and tries to leave Serenity. He is after all as dangerous as a lot of demons. So even if Cat happens to have a soft spot for him she can't risk having him stroll freely through Calernia. The death toll would be horrendous.

shikkarasu

15 Denarii says he Receives a vision of what Masego did and finds a way to Mend the portal. Of course, he won't leave Serenity until it is liberated. That would be compromise.

Huh. I only just now realised the parallels between the two.

Hierophant: Witness, Ruin, Wrest

Hierarch: Receive, Mend, Indict

Remarkably equal and opposite.

Someperson

Both of them have also said something remarkably similar about reality being a cage set up by the gods

But their responses are very different, Hierophant intends to become a god in his own right and presumably live forever, Hierarch aims to spend his life as rapidly as possible to shake the foundations

Also both of their Names start with "Hiero" 🤪

Yeah they have enough parallels and equal and opposite behaviors that they could probably establish a pattern of three between them if they wanted to (which they likely do not)

shikkarasu

Thank the Cage Makers; I don't want another Captain/ Champion situation.

Mary Gentle

All truly, truly lovely stuff, but –

“The devils had broken into courts, some huddling around fires and others assembling into mobs as other stood above them and gave speeches in the dark tongue. Some of them, I gathered from a closer look, were attempting to organize elections.”

AH HOO AH HA AH HAH! AH HAH HAH HAH OOOOH THUD!
(collapses on floor in giggles)

Oh lord, I want to see the devilish election. 😊😊😊

I love Anaraxes with a Deep, True, And Respectful Passion. ♥

Perhaps someone could remind the Hierach of the way bees kill gigantic hornets. (A Suitable Analogy For A Tyrant.) When the hornet invades the hive, a mass of bees pin it down and vibrate their wings, sending the temperature under them soaring.

May All The Enemies Of The People Be Boiled To Death By Bees.

There, isn't that much nicer?

And please put me down as one who'd love to see Triumphant (May She Ever Return) together with Traitorous and Irritant. We've had sufficient foreshadowing, bring 'em on!

dadycool

Considering the Drow hold their elections via Rap Battles, there really isn't a limit to the method and that's hilarious and terrifying.

Bees are cool. Other yellow-and-black things tend to be monstrous assholes, but bees are golden friends that provide sweetness and facilitate fruit and flowers.

gwern

It's worth noting that https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Vulture_bee are a real thing.

caoimhinh

The Serenity had existed for countless thousands of years without incident, yet Catherine stepped into it for 15 minutes and it was already on fire.

Coincidence? :v

JRogue

This is what I came here for.

edrey

And after the serenity where would the Hierarch go? the void was arcadia so he could Mend it, or the Dk would throw it to creation or the elves.
that fire will only get bigger and bigger.

alexjmscott

To be fair to Cat, it's not burning green. Yet.

dadycoool

Isn't Goblinfire made out of demons? They are in a hell, so it's not like they're short on any of the supplies to make it.

Rey d`Tutto

Implied Demons.
Hell matter=confirmed.
Source=???

Miles

We don't know that. Color was never mentioned.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. I am surprised that Cat did not (visibly) connect the dots about the Hierarch's presence and how that might alter the effects of the ealamal if it is fired.

2. For those making comments about past Dread Empresses/Emperors showing up: if the team makes it past the upcoming monster, then the next step, as Cat just noted, will be a trial. I imagine the judges will be Triumphant, Sorcerous, and Revenant (fka Malignant III), due to their ties to Trismegistus &/or his theories. Although it will be hilarious if Traitorous and/or Irritant are part of the trial as well. 😊

Darkening

I imagine it's a trial as in a test or challenge, not a courtroom. Like when she had to get through the fourfold crossing when she was attacking akua's lair in liesse.

Abnaxis

I agree, although TBH a kangaroo court with Traitorous in it sounds great!

ninegardens

>>1. I am surprised that Cat did not (visibly) connect the dots about the Hierarch's presence and how that might alter the effects of the ealamal if it is fired

I feel like Cat is mainly running on the assumption that it won't get fired, because that is her plan, and clearly her plan will be carried out without interruption.

alexjmscott

We the readers know that the Seraphim are out of action for a day as a result of releasing the Hierarch, because we were privy to the Bard's little chat with them. But would anyone in Catherine's party know that? Even if anyone elsewhere in Creation knows about the loophole, would they have known to tell her about it?

Earl of Purple

Masego does, he noticed it when transporting the band to the Serenity.

Sir Nil

It would be really awkward if the ward they just undid was in part keeping a massive evil sealed alongside those titans.

dadycool

That sounds exactly like the kind of thing he'd do, making his protection ward serve a second purpose that fucks over anyone who turns it off.

ByVectron!

When they make the movie, can Anaxares be played by Matt Frewer, please? I really get a Max Headroom vibe from him at times.

BargleNawdleZouss

I love Matt Frewer! However, I picture either John Lithgow or Paul Giamatti as Anaxares the Hierarch.

Rey d`Tutto

Lithgow.

Clay

Well, I finally caught up. I'm both very excited to have done so before the end and also a little sad because now I have to wait for updates. Just wanna say EE, this story is incredible, and I think it might genuinely be my favorite piece of fiction.

dadycoool

Ooh, Titans? Something generally greater than Giants? That sounds interesting, but I wonder what ever happened to the living ones. Wow, Nussy really is an asshole. Not enough to drown your enemies, you have to drown them in raw sewage? Damn.

Sugar Roll

Recycling water is one of the Dead King's initiatives to fight climate change.

Let it not be said that the he is not doing his part to protect the environment.

Earl of Purple

They wiped themselves out fighting proto-dragons, and then the last handful tried to rewind time to undo the deaths, but it failed. Catastrophically so; four died or stopped existing, and only Kreios was left. He's here, as it happens, the gigantes' god.

Cpt. Obvious

Wasn't it seven that died?

I think it was mentioned that this was the origin of the "seven and one" story element.

There were eight Titans left. Seven of them played Gods for the Gigantes while the one, whose name I don't remember, went her own way.

Eventually one of the seven finished his research on time magic and had created a ritual that would turn back time to before their people were all but wiped out in the war on the Drakon. But it would take all eight remaining Titans to safely work this riyual.

The one would at first not have anything to do with it, but when all the seven were going to attempt it without her she gave in and participated.

The ritual didn't work. The continent (or was this the entire world?) was ravaged by earthquakes. Mountain ranges rose and mountain ranges fell. Land rose out of the sea but more was swallowed by it. And Titans died.

Left behind was only Keiros, the Riddle Maker, the Titan who had thought he would be able to turn back time, only to break the world and kill all remaining Titans, including the one, she who had told him that he was a fool for believing he could stand against time and fate and win their people back. The one who he loved.

Well I hope I remembered that at least somewhat correctly.

Earl of Purple

No, you're right. I forgot the actual number, knew it was low, and five is literally a handful (at least, it's a handful of fingers).

Abnaxis

The one is Antigone, the Witch of the Woods's namesake.

Two dozen snakes

Anaxares the Diplomat, bringing democracy to the hells XD

Also if i understand it correctly, the way out of the Serenity now leads to the void, so how's he getting out?

Lastly: yeah, pretty safe bet the monster in question is one of those ancient super dragons. And given the dead titans were keeping it chained, it's likely not undead and not under Nessie's control. So, uh. Could Nessie have just moved himself out of Creation, or be ready to move out of creation now that the thing is free? Seems like the best way for him to win. Free the monster and let it wreak his enemies while he stands outside of either's reach and waits until they're both no longer a threat...

Cat's coming into her final aspect to bring this thing down, calling it

Xinci

With Hierarch's comment about a Name, I do wonder if at this point he actually counts as a god or not. He was more or less serving as a conduit for years of sacrifice before following Judgement into the heavens, so not like he couldn't be one. Regardless, looks like Hiearch will be contained for a while with his influence probably escaping if people of the Serenity do or through devils summoned from places he has infected. Fitting reuse to allow him to infect the Hells themselves though, I must admit. So he's an issue for the Accords in the long term and quite probably the malignancy that shall eventually overtake the world enough to burn it all to cinders. A proper antithesis for Cat when it comes down to it, as his conception of peace is at a baseline antithetical to hers. There will be no allowance of regulation or half-steps, no false peace, only the complete one of the world when the ashes settle and nothing else can burn. It's not an immediate thing but the memetic spread of what he desires will be there in the end, its shown capability to affect Light too, so who knows how endemic Hierarchy will be by that point. Regardless when the Accords are more vice than safeguard he will be there to burn it all down to the ground.

Also, great to know the Dead King can actually fuse bones, that was a weird sticking point on how alive the bones had to be for that sorta thing.

lenethren

Loved the chapter. Thank you for sharing this amazing story.

nick012000

Also, is it just me, or does the Hierarch come across as more of a Hero than a Villain, now? He's not driven by a desire to change the world, he's driven by a point of moral ideology. Was everyone who thought he was a Villain wrong all along, thinking that he was a Villain because he was a Named from a city in service to Below and he hung out with Kairos?

Mary Gentle

I always thought that Anaraxes came across as heroic, if not capital-H Heroic, from the start. At the beginning, he was both bonkers and heroic – or perhaps heroic because his city's form of government was absolutely mental.

By the time we got to the trial... That was a Heroic act, both challenging and stopping a Choir from acting. Anaraxes might still have been a little mental, but you could see he was on the right side.

Now he's bringing democracy to Hell . . . you know what, that's still bonkers and heroic. 😊 Just at a much, much higher level than before.

I don't think we've seen the final apotheosis of the Hierarch.

If he could thwack a Choir into obedience, I wonder what he could do to the Dead King? Partners in chains? Because Anaraxes is a man who wouldn't agree to DK doing ANYTHING.

Just saying. 😊

Earl of Purple

Unfortunately, he's not a hero. He's not interested in the people's wellbeing; he's not throwing down tyrants because they are tyrants. He's throwing down tyrants to spread his ideology and he doesn't care how tyrannical the tyrants he throws down are. You could be the Good King, ruler of a happy and prosperous realm where everyone's literate and there's plenty of food and no discontent and taxes on the wealthy and not the poor, and Anaxares doesn't care. The Good King wasn't elected, therefore he's a tyrant who should be cast down, along with the nobility and everyone else who disagrees with him.

Mary Gentle

I suppose that depends how wedded one is to the idea of "Good Kings."

Constitutional monarchs, now, they're fine. (If not ideal.) I'd hope Anaxares wouldn't have a problem with those, because they usually come accompanied by an elected body or parliament of some kind.

But single leaders with all the power? That tends not to work well. They can change any time, like the weather, and then your Good King and his or her prosperous realm are off to war, because the Good King wants it that way.

In all honesty, the only thing that has restrained kings (in the real world) has tended to be their subjects. Not the ones who are ploughing the ground and making the things people need to live – the noble ones who have bucketloads of money from owning all that land, and who also don't want to see the King rule over them. European feudalism is far more complex than it sounds, but it usually amounts to a triangle – Ruler, People, and (dare I say it) Home-Grown Oligarchs.

I wouldn't cry if the Hierarch introduced a bit of Early Modern government into the continent. They've been through blood and fire, isn't it about time somebody asked the average bod what they want?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I know what you mean, but "driven by a point of moral ideology" is a subcategory of "driven by a desire to change the world," not an alternative to it. And let's bear in mind that Good and Evil are theological/political/metaphysical alignments, and neither maps perfectly onto their lower-case synonyms. Take the fae as an example: their alignments inform everything BUT their morality, if indeed any part of their behavior could be considered equivalent to a moral code. That's what people are like when they are solely defined by Heroic or Villainous attitudes. The existence of actual moral choices in-universe is a feature designed to keep everything off-kilter enough that it doesn't get boring to watch.

I hate to harp on this, but it's kind of the core premise of the story?

Cthulhu

I ship Catherine and Anaraxes. Because why not?

Miles

"The five of us were standing in a village, which would have had me rather curious if it weren't currently abandoned and on fire."

Cat! Did you set the fire?

"Once you'd seen one burning village you'd seen all of them, really."

Cat!

Someperson

No doubt the devils will hold an election and decide that the fires were, indeed, Cat's fault.

Somehow.

Someperson

What's this? Enemies of The People woefully undevoured by BEES?

A large influx of BEES ought to put a stop to that!

Chapter 65: Monster

"When it passed that King Angelika of Rhenia was slain on the Hocheben Heights by the Prince of Bones, the Dead King sent an envoy to return her sword to the heir Prince Emil. 'But it is only a loan, prince,' the envoy told him, 'for in time she will come to retrieve it.'"

– Extract from 'Crowned In Iron', a compendium of Lycaonese histories assembled by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

Ears ringing, I watched as great claws of bone – each tall as a man – caught the edge of the well. The creature within, a hulking shape wreathed in shadows that my hundred eyes could not pierce, began to drag itself out of the pit even as the sitting Titans rose to their feet. Above our heads the ceiling of the cavern began to crack, the beast's roar having been enough to shatter the stone.

Well, I mused, this had all taken an unfortunate turn.

"Say, Ranger," I muttered. "I don't suppose you'd happen to know what that thing is?"

"Pray I do not, Warden," Hye Su quietly replied.

In other circumstances that undead had been made of not one but two Titans would have been the main source of my alarm, but because this was Keter the fact that I saw them moving from the corner of my eye ranked only rising concern. Outright alarm was reserved for the thing emerging from the well, claws gouging the stone as if it were mud. The sharp lengths of bones led into what I thought to be tendrils of some sort, until I realized they were large chords of sinew. They wove themselves into long, squirming limbs as the behemoth rose from the pit, revealing to my eye a head twisted draconic head that flowed into a mane-like length of sinews going down its neck.

Its eyes were as a mass of burning coals hidden beneath the writhing tendons, burning in the light yet casting no shadow.

"That felt like a yes," I noted. "So what am I looking at? Because I've seen dragons, and I'm no draconologist but I'm willing to firmly state this isn't one."

"This is one of the drakoi, the ancient foes of the Gigantes," Ranger grimly said. "They are to dragons what we are to insects."

That was less than promising, I mentally noted. Even a glory hound monster-fighting lunatic like Hye Su didn't sound eager to fight one of those creatures, a sure sign they were nothing to trifle with. This was, after all, the same woman who'd picked a fight with a Queen of Summer in her own territory. On the other hand, even if apparently Neshamah had decided that now was as good a moment to start throwing dead gods – and how I missed the days where I didn't have to deal with even the singular of that, much less the plural – at his problems I could tell with a look that this was a necromantic construct.

It was made of bone and tendons, and though some sort of eldritch power coursed through it like veins it was most definitely dead. Which meant someone had already killed this thing once already, that it wasn't impossible. Just almost impossible, and that was the kind of wiggle room I'd been betting my life on for years now.

Mind you, I'd died a few times.

"Time for a tactical withdrawal," I decided.

"Agreed," Ranger said.

As one we turned clean pairs of heels to the enemy, though of course it wasn't that easy. The drakon hit the ceiling as it rose to what I was pretty sure wasn't even its full height, the cracks from earlier widening and stones began to fall. Wasn't as much of problem as the two dead Titans having gotten a move on, though. The power that screamed against the air was sorcery, but like none I'd ever felt before. Where other spells felt like they stole the reins from Creation, imposed a will on it, this was... It felt barbed, cutting, like it hurt all around it just by existing. Whatever the Hells it was, it sunk into the slope of stone we were running up and seize it whole. A heartbeat later the rocked turned liquid, Ranger cursing as she leapt and I pulled on Night.

I wove tendrils around me and hooked them at the ceiling, forced to further crack it and dangerously vulnerable as I made sure I wouldn't be swept by the tide the stone had turned into. Ranger went about it another way. She had a sword in hand, and with a grunt of effort she cut at the liquid. Wind billowed as the strength of the cut opened a path through the liquid stone and she landed on dry ground. Reluctantly impressed, I took half a heartbeat to appreciate how quickly she'd managed that before my attention moved back behind us. Where the drakon was halfway out of the well and filling the cavern with its hulking, writhing shape but also something... subtler. The air in the cavern felt different now.

Tainted somehow.

The second Titan had just finished their spell, a sphere of burning sunlight forming in front of them, and I wasn't even going to try to protect that – I wasn't sure what it was, exactly, but there was enough power wafting from it that the air was warping. And since the bloody ceiling was falling anyway... I exerted my will, the tendrils of Night hooked into the stone above me spreading like roots before I seized the chord holding me up with my hand and pulled. The ceiling came down behind me, tons of rock falling like rain as Ranger cut her way through the tide again.

I landed with a pained grunt from the ache in my bad leg, brushing off liquid stone from the edge of my cloak before following Ranger into her race out of the room.

I didn't look back but I still felt sizzling winds blowing at my back and a horrid keening sound as stone was vaporized, discarding hopes this had so much as scuffed one of the monsters. Getting out of the cavern alive would have to be enough. Ranger got onto the stairs first, her stride swift without looking hurried, and I was but a dozen steps behind. I risked a glance back as I turned the corner and felt a swell of dread when I saw that the drakon was digging through the broken ceiling. Going straight up towards the room with the ward anchors. Fuck. All the more reason to hurry, but that moment of dallying had cost me.

The wall I'd ducked behind was ripped off by an unseen hand, the power of the dead Titans screaming in my ears, and I threw myself to the ground just a little too slow – three rays of sunlight had shot out like burning lances, and the third caught my shoulder. It went through the Mantle of Woe where so many magics had failed, melting part of my pauldron into worthless slag. I cursed and pulled on Night to cool the molten metal before it got to my flesh, crawling out of the way even as the wall that'd been ripped out was thrown back in pieces. Right at me. I was pulling on Night even as a small voice in the back of my mind reminded that staying still was death, that the next rays of light would kill me, but what else could I do? The stones would kill me just the same. Only a hand grabbed me by the collar and Ranger dragged me up, just in time for me to toss a veil of darkness over us as we ran. A wave of pure sunlight incinerated where we had been standing a heartbeat earlier, but we'd gotten out in time.

We legged it up the stairs, back to the ward room, and I calmed my breath even as I felt the floor shake beneath our feet. Cracks were spreading all over, enchanted tiles breaking like mud left out too long in the sun. Puffs of magic came out with every break, filling the air with aimless power.

"Thanks," I got out.

"Might still need you," Ranger frankly replied.

Fair enough, I conceded. The Concocter had left the floor and headed to the bottom of the stairs and the Huntress was still fighting up those, by the sounds of it. Masego was still among the garden of steles, though now he was kneeling by the pool of pure magic at the heart of it all.

"Hierophant, end it," I shouted. "We need to go."

"Nearly there," Masego faintly replied, his flesh eye closed.

I hurried across the cracking floor, feeling massive claws scrape at it from beneath.

"How long?" I asked.

"Would you worry," Hierophant said, "have anything to do with the half dead god beneath our feet?"

My jaw clenched.

"Half dead?" I repeated.

"The body is a necromantic construct," Hierophant said, "but the entity itself is not. It seems to be a piece of godhead contained in an undead body."

So that was how he'd done it. Powerful as the Dead King was, the Riddle-Maker had made it pretty clear that at his peak the Titans could have wiped the floor with him and his buddies had supposedly been slapped around by the drakoi. Grave robbing Titans and raising their bones I could buy, but controlling the remains of an elder dragon had been harder to swallow. Only he hadn't done that, by the sounds of it. He'd poured god's blood into a corpse he'd made sure he could control and still found the resulting monster hard enough to control it'd been kept sealed in a well beneath Keter.

"It's a drakon," I told him.

Masego's eye flew open. He stared at me for a heartbeat.

"I will hurry," he conceded, as if doing me some great favour.

"I hope you will, because there's dead Titans not far behind us," I grunted.

I left Ranger to keep an eye on the stairs behind us, instead going to the set that'd lead us back above. I told Cocky to run up and tell the Silver Huntress to start clearing our way out, because we needed to get the Hells out of here in a hurry. I still had a knife up my sleeve, one that might bite deep here, but I'd rather keep it back a little longer. If we could get the drakon to rampage around the spire after the wards came down, it'd draw Names like flies. By the time I returned Ranger had her bow out and an arrow nocked, eyes on the threshold of the stairs, and Masego had gone still kneeling beside a stele.

"Hierophant?"

He did not answer, not for a few heartbeats. Then he took his hand off the stele and rose to his feet, smiling. I could already feel the wards fading in the distance. Names that had felt a world away were now at the tip of my fingers. There were, I grimly thought, less of those left than I'd thought. The Dead King was having himself a massacre. Zeze cleared his throat.

"I believe that--"

Ranger loosed an arrow, but I didn't even end up looking at what because the floor broke. A writhing, gaping maw tore through the stone and closed its fangs around steles and the pool of magic.

"Run," I hissed.

No one argued. The fucking collapsing floor should have held up the Titans but instead a path made itself out of falling stone as we ran for the stairs – Cocky, showing wisdom, was already gone – and the two giants began to cross unhurriedly as the drakon continued guzzling up the room. It's eating too much, I thought. Even steles that hadn't been disappeared between the great jaws. Was the Dead King's leash truly so loose or was there another reason for this? Ranger went in first, taller than me and in better shape than Hierophant, and my effort to slow down the enemy by tossing a spear of blackflame the way of the Titans died without making a dent.

Sunlight blazed in the Titan's hand and suddenly the Night flames were just gone.

That one, I grimly thought, wasn't a good match up for me at all. I'd have to pass him on to someone else. We hurried up the cramped, narrow stairs even as they shattered behind us – the Titans were opening a path for themselves – and I found that the Silver Huntress had delivered on the task I'd given her: she was already at the very entrance, holding back the tireless horde with a short spear wreathed in Light. Behind us stone was shattering like glass, but we'd make it in time. The Dead King's monsters were large and the same protections he'd built to keep people out were now serving to keep his abominations in.

"Hierophant," I said, "can you help with the dead?"

"I can-"

Masego kept talking, but I did not hear the words. My blood turned to ice, for the herald of misfortune had made itself known: someone was tuning a lute. I did not see her, was not certain it was my ears I was hearing her through, but I recognized the sounds. Drunken fingers tuning the Intercessor's lute with surprising deftness, plucking at it until every string was just right.

"-rine, Catherine," Hierophant called out, sounding irritated. "Are you listening?"

"Can you hear that?" I asked.

My eye turned to Ranger when I found no trace of understanding on Masego's face, and she slowly nodded.

"Music," Hye Su said. "Faint, but I hear it."

Faint? No, that made sense. Ranger was an old and powerful Named on top of the more exotic talents that came with being of elven blood, but it was me who'd effectively ripped out two chunks of the Bard's aspect and then eaten them. I'd be able to hear her better than anyone else alive.

"The Intercessor's taking an interest," I said, "and that's never good. Let's get the fuck out of here."

We swept out of the stairs like a whirlwind, Masego dropping half a hundred undead with a spell that went after the one animating them while Ranger and the Silver Huntress charged into the opening. We went down the right corridor, opposite of the one we'd taken last time, since it was the way out of the crypts. The ranks of the dead were thick and reinforcements pouring in like a flood but the momentum was on our side. I let loose blast of black flame to keep the enemy off our back, sometimes, but in truth my mind was barely on the fight. I'd left an eye of Night behind to check on the progress of the Titans and the drakon but nothing came out of the stairs, which I realized with a grimaced made sense.

Instead of having the giants and the fucking horror dragon wreck these too-small corridors pursuing us, they were probably going to keep heading straight up to catch us in one of the large rooms above. I tried to remember as much as I could of the layout from the time I'd come here to negotiate, since I'd seen a little of the spire when I had, but I just couldn't seem to fucking concentrate. Not when the idle tuning had turned into strumming, and then into the beginning of a slow and sad song. The Bard usually pretended to be a poor musician, for she liked to play the fool, but she hadn't that night in Ater and it seemed she would not today either.

My head wasn't in the fight but it hardly mattered: the Dead King hardly threw anything worth a second look our way. Masses of lesser undead and a few Revenants barely worth a second look. With Ranger as our vanguard, it was the equivalent of throwing wheat at a sickle. We smashed our way through the corridors, leaving only broken bodies behind us as we hurried out of the crypts. I vaguely remembered the path from the last time, which served us well enough as we fought our way to the bottom of a set of wide stairs. As the Huntress took off the head of the last Bind there, I glanced back at the receding tide of undead behind us. I threw a few clumps of black flame to make sure we wouldn't be followed, but in truth they didn't look eager to.

Not a good sign, I admitted to myself as we went up.

Last time I'd been here, I'd thought it was a beautiful place. The hall was a dome of arches, grey stone rising to support a gallery above, yet the most striking part of it was the ceiling. It was curved, held up by elegant beams of stone, but everything in between was coloured glass. The pieces shone from the light of a sun that did not truly exist, painting stretches of colour on the tiled grey floor. The five of us stumbled out of the side hall panting, all of us scuffed but none wounded, but there would be no relief: just as I'd predicted, the enemy had arrived ahead of us. The hall's floor had been ripped open, crushed tiles flying everywhere like feathers falling, and out of the deeps the drakon had come.

It was waiting for us, nesting among the broken stone. A forest of sinewy tendrils sprouting from its back had been folded over the spine like wings and a thick, long tail was curving against the crushed statue of some ancient conqueror. The coal-like eyes did not turn towards us, but the weight of the creature's attention was as a weight on our shoulders – the Concocter buckled and would have fallen to her knees if not for Alexis catching her arm. My eye narrowed as I took in the shape of it. It felt larger than before, I thought. And more... defined. As if it had somehow grown. More than that, the same subtle power I had felt tainting the air below was back.

It felt humid, like it was pressing against your skin in the most disgusting of ways. Like a droplet of water going down your spine, only deep down you knew it was an insect. The drakon was doing something to its surroundings, I thought. Not even going out of its way to do it: existing was enough. And though I couldn't quite tell what it was doing yet, I doubted it would be anything we'd enjoy. I cracked my neck, leaning on my staff, and breathed out.

"Well," I said, "it looks like we'll be having that fight after all. Hierophant?"

"Catherine?"

"Cast," I said. "We'll buy you as long as we can."

He opened his mouth to answer but unfortunately it seemed that this was as much leeway as the ancient horror was willing to allow us. It began rising on its feet, body writing and sprouting smaller half-aborted limbs before as it did. It swallowed most of them back up into its body, but not all.

"Move," I hissed, Ranger drawing her sword as I did.

The Concocter stuck with Masego, since in a fight like this she was near useless, but the rest of us spread out. The Silver Huntress shot towards the stairs that'd lead up to the gallery, a good shooting nest, and Ranger unhurriedly stepped into the open grounds of the hall. As for me, I breathed out and pulled deep on the Night. Sve Noc answered with unstinting hand, coolness raging through my veins and overflowing. It raced down my body, weaving shadow through the Mantle of Woe as I pulled down the hood. I breathed out mist, fingers closing around my staff of dead yew, and let the shadows wreath me whole.

Unsheathing my sword, I stepped into the fight.

The Ranger, huntress of gods and monster, was the first to strike. She moved like a ghost across the broken floor, disturbing not so much as a mote of dust, but the drakon struck just as swiftly. It batted away at her, and when she leapt above the blow snapped forward to swallow her whole – only for the Ranger to carve through its head instead, blowing through the tendrils of sinew like a great wind. There were no bones or brains inside, I realized as Ranger's strike revealed nothing at all. No head to take, and the drakon seemed indifferent to a blow that would have killed most creatures of Creation. It did not even pause in its assault, wings fluttering as it tried to slap down Ranger.

Too slow, for I wove a tendril of shadow to drag her out of the way and the Silver Huntress loosed an arrow of Light from the upper gallery that burned halfway through the limb. Dropping Ranger when she was two dozen feet above the ground – she landed in a smooth crouch – I went on the offensive. Probing its defences, I tossed a few balls of blackflame at its sides. Half were blown out by the wings as the drakon turned towards me, but a few landed and I frowned as I looked through eyes of Night at the results. The black flames were 'burning' without actually consuming anything, and soon guttered out without having done much of anything.

That disgusting humid sensation grew stronger, pressing at me from all sides.

Did it get stronger against power it had been attacked with? I couldn't tell from just this and didn't have the time to spare for another try: I'd drawn the creature's attention. It moved like the wind, crossing the floor in moments and disdaining the use of claws for its gaping maw. Teeth formed out of bone as the writhing nothing opened, looming above me, and I released the Night I had gathered around myself. Three other Catherine Foundlings legged it in different directions as I backed away under cover of a veil, but the abomination ignored the illusions. Fuck, I eloquently thought as I reached for my sword.

Instead the side of the drakon's head was split open by a sword blow, the Ranger attacking from the side even as the Huntress loosed a Light arrow into the head from the other side. They'd not just struck to save my ass, though – I could see from the angle that Alexis had placed her arrow after Ranger struck in an attempt to burn out part of the drakon's head. I backed away behind the pillars as the writhing, hollowed head withdrew, jaws snapping at nothing, and saw that a handful of cut-through sinew tendrils had dropped down on the stone. Like the other two I kept an eye on the drakon as I moved, grimacing as I saw that the head was full again in moments.

There would be no shaving away at the monster piece by piece, then. Back to regular violence. Hiding in the shade of the pillars I began to weave a curse, wondering if those might not work better than outright destruction, when I saw someone dash out into the open grounds. The Concocter, I realized as I swore and loosed my curse early. The lash of Night hit the drakon's side, and to my pleasant surprise did exactly what I'd wanted it to: writhing tendrils went still, locked into place. The Dead King, I realized even as the Silver Huntress peppered the drakon's limbs with arrows so it would not splatter Cocky over the ground. The Dead King's work is the weak point.

The shard of divinity that gave consciousness to this monster wasn't something I could snuff out without preparations, but it was stuck in the contained Neshamah had made for it. And that I could affect. The Concocter ran back in cover, though not before I got a look at what she'd been doing: she'd cut out a piece of sinew and shoved it into a bottle. Huh. Whether or not that'd end up useful, the Huntress had caught the drakoi's attention with that last volley: it roared, forcing a wince out of me as panes of painted glass shattered above us. The colourful shards weren't just falling, though. As if moved by an invisible hand, they gathered into a ring of hovering glyphs.

I watched, open-mouthed, as the same wards that Hierophant had killed below came back to life around the drakon.

So that was why it'd eaten so many of the ward anchors, I realized. It didn't just get stronger against things that had attacked it, it got strong from what it ate. Which was, if I understood correctly the disgusting humid feeling still pressing tight around the Night veiling me, anything around it for long enough. The longer we fought the drakon, the harder it would be for us to harm it. Given long enough, even the strongest workings of Night would barely rate a scratch. It was an absurd thing to contemplate, something like that. Invisibility in the making, if used by even a halfway clever soul. Which is why the Dead King used only a shard of you, imprisoned in a body he controls. Neshamah would keep it stupid enough it wouldn't be able to break free of its binding, and even then it was a fucking nightmare to deal with.

We couldn't beat this thing, I admitted to myself. Not right now, not with the tools at hand. And stubbornly continuing to fight it would make it harder to put down when we did have the right people there. We need to retreat the moment Masego lands his spell, I thought, looking through an eye at Hierophant. He was still murmuring, one eye closed and the other burning. The Concocter was close by, hidden behind a pillar as she rifled through her bags for something and stared at the piece of the drakon she'd snatched. There was no telling when he'd be done incanting, I thought, but it had to be soon. Best I prepare for it.

As the drakon began to methodically ravage the upper gallery, tearing through it with a cat's cruel laziness, I stepped out in the open and levelled my staff at the abomination.

"We're going to retreat," I called out, "the moment the spell is done."

That was when it all went wrong. Was it intelligent enough to understand words? I'd not thought so, but immediately the drakon stopped trying to flush out the Huntress and instead turned towards where Masego still stood. I swore and shaped a pair of curses before tossing them at the creature. The first was a mixed bag, the sinewy tendrils I'd meant to knot up instead melding together and reforming, but the second was an outright loss: the limb I'd meant to freeze was barely slowed. It was adapting to Night tricks. I broke into a run even as the drakon slithered towards Hierophant.

"Cover," I screamed. "Cover him, Merciless Gods!"

The Huntress leapt off the edge of the gallery, spear lighting up like a falling star as she cleaved through the drakon's wing, but a leg burst out of the abomination's side and caught her in the belly. The sound of metal crumpling was heard and she went flying. I cursed again, drawing on my Name to quicken my stride. My leg was throbbing but I grit my teeth and let the pain pass through, getting there about the same time as Ranger did. The Concocter popped out to throw a vial of some liquid that turned to flame on impact but the drakon hardly noticed, smashing the pillar she'd been hiding behind and breaking her arm. As well as revealing Masego.

I stood between death and Hierophant, screaming as I called on Night with my sword raised, and Ranger's blade cut through the beast's neck – though it formed back anew past the cut. I unleashed torrents of black flame into the drakon's face, aiming for those buried red eyes, and though I calcinated tendrils I could feel the resistance growing ever stronger until suddenly sorcery bloomed behind me. Through the Night I saw Hierophant's eye open and his lips mouth a single word.

"Rot."

The drakon shuddered, maw opening, and began to scream. The dead flesh it was made of began to decay and come apart in clumps, and though the abomination grew them back it was writhing in pain as the rot refused to leave its body. Masego slumped, half falling to his knees, and I sheathed my sword to hold him up. The drakon was distracted for now, so we needed to get the Hells out. Only we couldn't, not quickly. The Concocter was trying to get up, cradling her broken bones, and the Huntress was still on the other side of the hall. There were cracks on the pillar where she'd landed and she was splayed below, either dead or unconscious. I'd need Ranger to-

I found Hye Su already looking at me, face a blank mask, and my stomach clenched. She'd been looking at the same things I did, and had come to the same conclusions. Only she wasn't me, so the decision that followed was different.

"It is a battle lost," Ranger said, shaking her head. "Survive if you can: I am still owed."

And without another word, she turned her back on us. She was going to leave, to get out while the spell held. I had to push down the urge to set her on fire as she made to leave – it wouldn't help – and held up Masego as I saw the way the rot was slowing in the abomination's body. It was getting used to the spell, we didn't have long left.

"Get the Concocter out," I ordered Hierophant. "I'll pick up the Huntress."

Only the drakon roared again, and as I covered my ears the rotting parts of it were shed to the ground. Ember-red eyes turned towards us and my stomach clenched as I reached for the Night. I wouldn't be able to get everyone out. It struck and I-

"That's a lot more tentacles than anyone should be comfortable with."

And I felt my shoulder loosen as the limb that should have swept through all three of us was instead split in half, Indrani sliding down its length and landing on her feet. She took a few steps back, looking almost drunk, then spat to the side as the drakon put itself back together.

"You're late," I said.

Indrani snorted.

"Had to take the long way around," she replied. "Shiny Boots was already knocking at the front doors."

Another roar shook the hall, the drakon furious at the continued interruptions.

"I'll forgive you this time," I conceded.

She hummed, twirling her longknives thoughtfully.

"The Lady bailed on you, yeah?"

"Just about," I grunted back.

We'd bargained for her to lead us into Keter by the secret way, not fight by our side, so in truth she hadn't broken our agreement. But she'd abandoned us nonetheless.

"Isn't that something," Indrani murmured.

I could See it, through my dead eye. The way the weight shifted, the story moved. Two claims had been competing, and while one had been stronger than the other it was also not there – and the story still wanted a Role to be played.

"It was mine to have anyway," Indrani decided. "My friends to keep alive. My family to protect."

And with that last step in the journey, it all fell into place perfectly. The Ranger fought monsters, but the Ranger had fled and monsters were still being fought.

"If she throws away the fight, then it's mine to pick up," Indrani said. "So how does the line go again? Ah, yes."

She straightened, meeting the drakon's burning ember eyes.

"I am the Ranger," she said, and made it true. "I hunt those worth hunting. Tremble, for you qualify."

And in a blur of movement she was gone. I nudged Masego towards the Concocter – he could set the bone and heal it – and went to circle around the broken hall as Indrani fought toe to toe with a horror out of legend. She moved like the wind, never where the drakon struck as it tore through the hall in growing frustration. The Ranger carved through sinew and bone, shattered claws and laughed as the drakon roared its impotent wrath. Like a bull trying to swat a hornet, it missed again and again as she stung from every direction.

I reached the Silver Huntress and found to my relief that she was not dead. Unconscious and her skull had been rattled, but it took more than that to kill a Named. I dragged her back into consciousness and stopped the bleeding out of her forehead wound but her eyes were still unfocused as she got on her feet. To get her back fighting fit we'd need a priest, much as I hated to admit it. My eye went back to Indrani, who was impossibly holding her own against the abomination. A Name's never stronger than when it comes into being, I reminded myself.

I watched as she laughed and toyed with a dead god, knowing that it was beautiful but it could not last. That first burst of strength would fade, and when it did the situation would turn against us. We needed to get out while we still could, I thought as I guided Alexis across the room. Towards the same threshold that Hye Su had left through. As if to crown my worries, the drakon finally landed a blow on Indrani. She'd blocked it, so it snapped one of her blades instead of her bones. It still tossed her back, sliding along the ground until she stood near where Masego and Cocky had gotten to.

"Indrani," I shouted, "we need to leave. Move the fight elsewhere."

She didn't look happy, but she didn't argue. I could see how her Name was pulling at her to finish the fight, to pursue the moment it had coalesced through to the end, but she was a stubborn soul and she knew her limits. She'd fight off the influence. And now that she and Hye Su had played out their parts of the story that left only...

"I'll handle the rearguard," the Ranger shouted. "You go on-"

The drakon went still. A heartbeat later, its wings slid to the floor. I almost laughed at the absurdity of the sight.

"Go," I shouted back. "It's handled."

She spat angrily to the side, but did not refuse the order. She dragged Masego and Cocky along, heading for the door. I pushed on the Silver Huntress as well, who while still dazed was still fast on her feet, and within moments I was the only human left in the hall. The drakon's gaze slowly swept the hall, coming to rest on me, and when the full weight of its attention solidified I had to let out a breath. My knees were shaking.

Then the drakon's head rolled on the floor.

It decated to nothing as another grew back, but now before the towering monster a lone silhouette stood. It was tall and thin, holding in its hand a sword of made of wood. The drakon reared up, roar filling the air, and then its head rolled on the floor again. And its limbs, and its tail. They sprouted back, the abomination's entire body writhing angrily, but it looked taken aback. As suddenly as a match lit nine of the Emerald Swords surrounded it in a loose ring, silent as the grave. The disgusting miasma in the air slid off them like water off a duck's back.

"It won't work," I croaked out. "You can't kill it for good with swords."

Then someone was standing next to me, the elf's eyes contemptuous.

"We are," they said, "the Emerald Swords."

It was said like a simple truth, like a sentence passed.

"If it cannot be slain for good," the elf told me, "then we will keep slaying it until the Last Dusk."

The words were said without so much as a speck of doubt. In the distance, the drakon's head and limbs dropped again.

"Leave, Warden," the elf said. "Our debt must be repaid."

I hesitated for a moment, wondering if perhaps the monster could be put down for good, but then I recognized that for the vanity it was. Wounded pride my plans had not been enough to stop the Dead King's own. So instead I inclined my head, as much in thanks as acknowledgement, and broke into a run to catch up with the others. Named were dying ahead of us, my own had told me. The fight to end all this awaited.

And as I passed the threshold, the Intercessor began to sing.

SpeckofStardust

Elfs are bullshit enough said.

kaedonbolas

Everyone's bullshit at this point

erebus42

Hey when everyone's bullshit, no one is.

dadycool

Ah, but there's different levels of bullshit. It's one thing to have every stick on the playground be a lethal sword the moment you pick it up, but it's significantly worse to have a sword proof forcefield or a deathray or declare yourself immune to swords.

Someperson

I mean, if your force field only protects against swords, specifically, then I gotta say it kinda sucks.

humanoidhuman

not if everything is a sword

Velrix

Named are bullshit but Elfs are bullshit even without names.
So Elfs are more bullshit.

Miles

Bullshit²

Miles

B²u²l⁴s²h²i²t² if you will

erebus42

Sometimes the only way to deal with bullshit is to throw other bullshit at it.

Tenthyr

I wouldn't mind seeing an elf that isn't a horrific hyperracist, honestly. I wonder how different they are in their empire across the sea.

Geno

Well it's been pretty explicitly said most elves overseas are half-elves, so I'd argue most are probably pretty chill. They exiled the hyperacists

jamesc9

These elves can't go that way until they're able to have children, which is related to getting their forest to forgive them for the circumstances in which they occupy it.

Ferary

I wager a mix between a kind old grandma and horny barely legal teenage girl.

Ghlapus

Sometimes I worry that EE won't be able to follow through in the Big Bads.

But he always delivers.

Rey d`Tutto

Due to the quality of EE's writing I have had the pleasure to read, I'd suggest EE has as many or more pages of notes, errata, and timelines than what's been published so far on WordPress.

If that is not the case my admiration would be greater, and there are few compelling writers of EE's caliber I have enjoyed.

shikkarasu

EE foreshadows too often, and books in advance, to be doing most of this on the fly. I am 100% certain that the bones of all 7 books were in place before the first chapter went up, even if it was a 5 book plan at the time.

trysalvages

Complete side note, but is the author male? I couldn't find anything about them on the internet.

Par

He was a guest on a fiction podcast at one point where he confirmed he goes by he/him pronouns
I don't remember the podcast off the top of my head but it was on reddit iirc

Abrakadabra

Does it matter ?

Earl of Purple

Well, shit all the fuck. The good news is, if they destroy Neshamah's working, it'll no longer be bound. The bad news is, if that happens it resurrects itself unless a Titan kills it, and there's only one of those left.

Indrani's Ranger, yay! That's a bright point, and she deserves it. Wonder how it feels for Hye Su now, if she's able to make it out without her Name and Aspects. Chances are she keeps the skill they granted her, I think, but not the continual improvement.

caoimhinh

Imagine Hye running away from that fight, and then midstride she suddenly feels hollowed out, no longer having as much strength, as much agility and power, and her steps falter. And then she feels it, like a slap in the face calling her "coward", her Name has left her. She is the Ranger no more.

Miles

This is probably an opportunity in disguise for Hye. She's an old hand to the point that she was rarely running into new tricks to learn, perfect, and transcend. Another Name would give her some abilities that she can actually use more than once every few years and she kept her skills.

Rey d`Tutto

What could a Ranger retire to?
Badass non-Named?
The Lady of the Lake?
She Who Used To Range?
Jeremiah Johnson?

Rey d`Tutto

Also, Hye Sue -> Mary Sue -Mary +Hyacinth/Hye.
Anyone?

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Miles

"Had to take the long way around," she replied. "Shiny Boots was already boosting since the delay notice."

aurikdomi

Oh man how long can the emerald swords hold out??

Robert

Until last dusk.

RoflCat

Probably 'forever' until Indrani come back to finish the fight.

This Drakon is basically THE monster for her Name now. She got the claim with a fight against it, her Name will likely fully form (3rd aspect?) when she finishes it.

Until then, Story weight demands the elves will hold, but whether they'll all just die when she set off for the hunt or she'll come to tip the scale and save some (0 chance of all the Swords making it out)

Of course if DK make his move to release the Monster then that's another issue entirely.

Mary Gentle

Damn, that's terrifying.

I know many people expected Indrani to become the Ranger, and what pleases me is that it's under circumstances where she deserves it.

Hy Sue only got them into the city to pay off a debt, and then turned her back on a monster fight when she was supposed to be so hot. Indrani is willing to face that monster, and protect those she loves. Hence – Ranger.

It terrifies me there's still something that can damage or eradicate Cat and the Mantle of Woe. And for a minute I really thought we were going to lose Masego. ☹ ☹

Our guys are severely outclassed. By story logic, this is where they should be at their most fortunate. But the Intercessor is singing. Cat should have crunched her like a bug, last time around.

Also by story logic, this is where we should start losing people that it's painful to lose.

I don't want to see heroic self-sacrifice; I want our guys to remember that villains succeed and live to fight another day!

dadycool

Well, it already started with Rogue Sorcerer. But you're right. Even if the entire Woe is immune to actual death, they probably won't survive fully intact and anyone close to them is fair game. I anticipate something like Freddy and Otto dying together.

ninegardens

See, thing with Bard singing is.... The music sets the tone year.

Anyone ever seen a glorious come back happen right as the lute strums tragic?
I thought not!

Kennedy John

I am absolutely stealing "I hunt those worth hunting. Tremble, for you qualify." for a high level DND villain someday. For a coward who ran from the fight the previous Ranger's got some good lines. Speaking of good lines I wonder what song the Intercessor is going to be singing, for a Bard I don't think she's done much of it.

Also I love the elf bullshit in this universe just inserting themselves into the story where they see fit, I was actually just wondering before I got to that point in the chapter if this was the fight the elves would be using to repay Cat since the drakoi's story bullshit is even bigger than the elves.

caoimhinh

Now I'm wondering if the reason why the two undead Titans mysteriously disappeared and seemed like Cat even forgot about them is that the Emerald Swords got to them before they went upstairs to take care of the Drakon.

mavant

Nah, there was a demon of absence half way up. It was a crazy fight scene. Don't you remember?

'Ladi Williams

Lmfao...nice one. insert slow clap

Cpt. Obvious

Your storyfu is strong.

jerdenizen

I suspect the Dead King might have a better use for those two titans now that they're no longer holding back his Monster. Even if it's just to screw with the Riddle-Maker.

Naugrith

I like how Indrani changed the words. Hye's line was "Rejoice, for you qualify". Indrani's version is cooler and less insane.

Daniel E

I sincerely hope that Indrani finds time to abuse her newfound authority in the future. Like at a campfire with Cat, and she's like 'I hunt those worth hunting' before stealing Cat's sandwich and eating it, claiming victory for the greater good.

dadycool

Oh, it's just like her to use a highly melodramatic line for mundane irritation.

LarsBlitzer

You just know she's got a spot saved on the table for carving it out in the most elaborate calligraphy. It'll be the centerpiece.

jamesc9

That would make sense if it was Ranger's table. I'm not sure how it fits in the centre of Cat's.

Juff

Typo Thread:

a head twisted > a twisted
It eyes > Its eyes widening and > widening, and of problem > of a problem and seize > and seized rocked turned > rock turned protect that > protect against that ever break > every break you worry > your worry him and his > him, and his poured god's > poured the god's eye flow > eye flowed Huntress so > Huntress to hadn't been disappeared (missing word) misfortunate > misfortune reinforcements pouring > reinforcements were pouring loose blast > loose blasts grimaced made > grimace made worth a second look (appears twice) by unfortunately > but unfortunately writing > writhing before as > as the contained > the container Invisibility in > Invincibility in would keeping > would have been keeping decated > decayed
Wounded pride my > Wounded pride. My

erebus42

Sometimes the only way to deal with bullshit is to throw other bullshit at it.

erebus42

Sorry that was meant to be a response

bellacohl

God I'm so happy Hye is no longer the ranger (I assume).

I hope someone gets her now, though I guess it's too much to ask.

Also, Elder Dragons are terrifying.

dadycool

Since she's half-elf, she won't die naturally, but since Indrani earned Ranger Hye is most likely just a highly skilled warrior. She probably doesn't even really benefit from any Named buffs.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hye-ly skilled warrior, you might say.

jerdenzen

It's probably a very good thing for her that the Emerald Swords are otherwise occupied right now.

edrey

at least the smerald swords have pride, when they gave their word its wasnt paper thin like Hye.
and where did the titans go? Kreios wont be happy about that.

Tenthyr

Held in reserve, probably to check Kreios when he makes a move.

Liliet

I mean, Hye did deliver on her word, and even stuck with them for a while after.

Still pointing & laughing at her right now but!

Crash

Officially designated laughing stock by Creation itself.

A Ranger who ran away from an once in a lifetime fight, leaving the last of her disciples, the nephew of her dead lover and her self-declared enemy to fend for themselves.

Only to lose the name of Ranger to a student whiling to take that fight AND have the Emerald Swords who chase her everywhere step in right after.

What a great day.

Damian Lucius Black

"If it cannot be Boosted for good," the elf told me, "then we will keep Boosting it until the Last Dusk."

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

'Ladi Williams

Yeah. This. I didn't see this before I responded.
My sentiments exactly.

'Ladi Williams

Let's be factual. She kept to her word. Even rescued cat one or two times.

The deal was to show them a way into keter. Which she kept to...she never bargained to fight for them...you could argue she doesn't have a stick in this fire.

I still don't like her though

marillius

She didn't have an easy out before the moment the Rot spell hit. Titans and Dragon of Dragons was there and probably wouldn't have let her run like that. And before that the wards weren't down so there was no getting out. She didn't do extra. She fought till the very moment fighting was no longer required for her survival and bailed.

'Ladi Williams

No one can gainsay that, but to imply that she didn't live up to her word is wrong.
She did everything she promised to do and more.

Rey d`Tutto

Just not what a Ranger would do.
Hye Sue did what a Hye Sue do. Not what Ranger do.
Hye Broke her Name

'Ladi Williams

She didn't "break" her name. If Indrani had a better claim to it and took it doesn't mean Hye Su broke her name.

Ranger means different things to different people

MoreBeer

Ranger's role has been to hunt the worthy. She didn't violate the name, she broke the role.

When the Ranger makes a promise and fails to see the spirit through, and a candidate steps up to both fulfill the promise and the role, well, we know what happens.

marillius

She did everything she promised to do and not a single step more, is my implication. She had no way to leave the place until the ward was taken down and by that point the super deadly super dragon was out, making retreating a non-viable option.

jworks17

I've mentioned this before, but it's worth saying it again- how are Erratica's first drafts this smooth? It's exceptional.

Then again maybe these aren't first drafts, I'm just guessing they are because of the occasional spelling errors and such.

caoimhinh

He's a man of talent, commitment, and sheer fucking will.

BargleNawdleZouss

Something about which I know very little.

jerdenizen

Practice, I assume.

Cpt. Obvious

I'm guessing lots and lots of notes meticulously kept current and pretty detailed plan for the story.

I really would love to see a few iterations of the notes. Such as what they looked like before he wrote the first book. How it had changed for say book 4, and finally what had changed for book 7.

Whenever I try to write anything longer than a few pages at least one of my character will take the bit in the teeth and just go wild. And suddenly I haven't a clue where the story is going.

It's both frustrating and oddly entertaining, but so far I've never been able to reign them in enough to write a story worth reading. No matter what I do they just keep talking all over the story, never shutting up.

It's like a demented version of Seinfeld, and I can't stand that show and have never watched more than half an episode before rage-quitting...

So I admire anyone with the discipline to keep this many characters somewhat in line.

I imagine it's very much like herding cats.

Sykomantis

The trick is to design your story beats so that the only through line for an intelligent character is to follow the story as planned

Hargabga

And what if your character is a raving mad lunatic?

Rey d`Tutto

Write-arounds.

Like Workarounds, but for characters.

Then again, I'm afraid of the writers for the show Dexter..

Cpt. Obvious

I've tried that. Writing a raving mad lunatic is incredibly hard. If keeping ordinary people in line is like herding cats then adding a character like that to the mix turns the mostly peaceful heard of cats into a wet paperbag full of whet cats.

Now if you really want a challenge the write a main character who has no morality of any kind. A character to whom a living human and a dead have the same value, zero unless they can serve a purpose. I won't call that character evil as in its world view there's no such things as good or evil.

Tried it once. It wasn't long before I gave up. Getting into the mind of that character was scary AF.

dadycool

Magnificent. Indrani has come into her own and now the Dead King must face a new Ranger, one without a single Aspect to her Name. We now have the Hierophant, the Warlord, the Warden, and now the Ranger. Four of the five Woe have completed their metamorphosis into their final Names, only the Princess lagging behind probably due to how recently she came into that Name and the fact that Cat's still queen.

It actually makes sense that this is where the Emerald Swords would end up, chained to one spot, killing a god over and over again forever.

Mirror Night

I am curious how her Aspects evolve. I suppose Indrani and Hanno getting Aspects at the last second is great (not so much from the training prospective) but moreso from DK cannot prep for Aspects he doesn't know about.

I have no idea how Viv factors into the Last Dance of the Woe. I can barely tell if she is named, we haven't seen any Aspects, and she hasn't really done much since getting Princess. So who knows how she contribute. Hakram and Viv kinda seem to drag down the power level lol. Still the Woe is strong core as long as Cat stays out of Melee Range and stops pretending she is still Squire. And Viv can contribute something.

Tenthyr

Vivienne is still a talented thief even without the Name, she'll be able to contribute in the final dungeon crawl no problem

Mirror Night

Yeah not seeing how being a good thief without a Name is in anyway useful against DK. Viv is going to end up like Cocky hiding behind Masego at this rate when the Power Level is that high

Sugar Roll

One can make the argument that royalty are the biggest thieves out there. I wouldn't be surprised if she pulls off her biggest heist the next time we see her.

ninegardens

Royalty is a continuous cutting motion.

burnsy

My theory is that Viv is going to get an aspect that combines her stealing with her new status: Liberate.

What will this aspect do? Among other things, she could Liberate the dead from the Dead Kings control.

I'm also hopeful, since she has such a strong association with the sun of summer, that she gets a variant on Shine too.

dadycoool

Hakram has always been the Barbarian tank of the group. While Cat and Masego have to keep their distance, Hakram is the blender at the front, especially as Warlord where he gives a group bonus to melee attack.

I don't think Princess has actually established any of her Aspects yet, which makes her highly dangerous, even as an administrator. And she's always had a Strange Support role, see stealing a bunch of barges and using them as a barricade, then proceeding to SNATCH THE SUN FROM THE SKY, which I still can't get over. Also, she's already had her "Where's my place here" crisis and Hakram chopped his other hand off to resolve it.

Crash

Actually, the lack of Aspects is especially dangerous. See Hanno's new absolutely ridiculous set.

Getting your Aspects in the middle of The Final Fight is the best time for highly powerful bullshit to appear.

Under different circumstances Indrani would be likely to get something like Hunt as an equaliser like Struggle was, something that allows her to do her job as Ranger no matter what she faces. Instead, she just straight up got her Name by establishing herself as someone who would fight and laugh at a Drakon to protect her friends. Powerful Aspects are coming.

dadycoool

I was saying the lack of Aspects is a good thing, for the reasons you just described. A Named is no more dangerous than when their full potential is available and nebulous.

And yeah, laughing at a monster that could slaughter Titans and scared her predecessor is a very powerful way to establish herself.

ByVectron!

Wasn't there a blip about Ranger being a transitory name, still, for Indrani? I sweet I selves reading that recently.

ByVectron!

I swear I remember reading... Swype, swypos everywhere!

Noldo

No, it was that Aspect LEARN was ridiculous for Ranger just because it was not a transitory name.

Mirror Night

I am kinda confused as to why everyone and their grandma seems to know what Drakkon are when the Titans vs Drakkon predates Humans. I am not sure it predates Elves I suppose since they come from another continent.

Also it seems kinda weird to me Elves can do all this BS and yet not escape a room with some hellfire such that they needed Cat to save them. I think EE might be a Tolkien fan really feels like some Light of Two Trees Noldor Elf BS lol.

I suppose Hanno can detect the Drakkon? Since he was already at the door...

Tenthyr

The ancient conflict of the Titans and Drakoi are mythical, their story has saturated into people's cultures and histories. Since the Gigantes enslaved humans for a good while, the story of their Gods war probably passed to humanity that way.

ninegardens

>>"I am kinda confused as to why everyone and their grandma seems to know what Drakkon are when the Titans vs Drakkon predates Humans. I am not sure it predates Elves I suppose since they come from another continent."

I mean... lets put it this way...

What percentage of people you know know about T-rex?

Drakkon are significantly bigger than Trex, and significantly more recent.

People know about them because they are freakin' epic.

Abnaxis

Pretty sure Hierophant and Hye Su were the only ones who knew what a drakon is. Hye had to tell Cat because Cat had never heard of them ("they are to dragons what we are to insects") and I don't think anyone else knew what it is other than a big freaking monster.

megaprr

Hardly everyone and their grandma. Hye knew because her whole thing is hunting monsters and she's surely heard about it in her quest to seek out strong opponents. Masego knows because he's one of if not the most well-educated person on Calernia. Not to mention that Drakoi are gods, which are his specialty and the focus of his Name.

None of the others seemed to know what they are. And this is (I think) the first time we've heard of them outside the extra chapters.

Crash

Hye's whole thing WAS hunting monster. Now she's a professional runner lmao

Imagine being the Ranger for centuries and then losing the Name as you run away from a fight.

Had Indrani spat on her face, it would probably deal less damage to her psyche.

Liliet

Goblinfire is demon juice. Cat could work around it when elves couldn't because of the dimensional passage abilities, which are the one thing the elves don't have.

Of course, DK made sure that that one specific thing would be useless here, so elves are back to the top of the food chain.

Steve

Goblinfire really can burn anything, even Elven pretentiousness.

Especially Elven pretentiousness.

DC

Oh, I get it. It's a difficult to destroy reptile.

mavant

I assume DC is short for Doctor Clef.

Rey d`Tutto

Why wouldn't Detective Comics wanna scope out some IP?

MCU vs the SuperBatman vs WonderWoman?

This done as a Paper Comic/Graphic Novel then into Video?

I'd pay. Take My Money!!!!

Rey d`Tutto

Hell, I'd take Animated.

mavant

I meant because DC was referring to SCP-682. Doctor Clef is another major character from that era of the SCP foundation stories.

Miles

"-rine, Catherine," Hierophant called out, sounding irritated.

"Are you listening?"

Oh the irony

edrey

now that i think about it, the elfs can just throw the drakon to the void with the hellgate.

i really like the possibility that hierarch meeting that monster. what would happen then?

nick012000

It would drop dead as the Dead King's magic broke, then come back to life again, free from the Dead King's control.

Then it'd probably get into a pissing match with the Hierarch, because its hunger-based domain seems antithetical to the Hierarch's anti-authoritarian domain.

Steve

It would completely destroy Anaraxes (can we take a moment to consider how fun it is for Anaraxes to have a name fundamentally based on some people being above others?)

It rules over no one. It eats everything around it because everything else is food. There is no competition between them, the Drakoi wins without even noticing.

If anything, it is the hyper-realization of Anaraxes' goals, which basically amount to turning people into a meta-organism that just consumes resources and votes a lot. The votes are the Drakoi brain, and the rest is the hunger.

Abrakadabra

That is not inaccurate description of our society. Every question is an economical question nowadays. We are the maw that eats everything.

Wonder

Well, I can only be sure that Cat's third Aspect is going to coalesce when she fucks up the Intercessor for good and into perpetuity..

Indrani is now The Ranger ,it's only left with Vivian. Frankly throughout this horrifying war ,we have seen nothing of The Shining Princess ,her stolen legion and order.

All throughout the Battle I couldn't stop thinking 🤔, maybe this godhead will be valuable to Masego's apotheosis.

I can only hope The Riddle-Maker can set the revenant Titans free .. if SveNoc can set The Good King of Callow free ,I wager The King of Titans also can..

Kojo

A Warden, Warlord, Hierophant, Ranger, Princess (Queen) and Saucy Siren enter a bar....

zenanii

Great chapter, but I started getting really annoyed with the whole "Masego has something important to say, yet because of circumstance he can't tell Cat."

The facts that he keeps getting interrupted I can swallow, but what really bothered me was how Cat literally never picked up on the part that he was trying to tell her something.

Yes, I get it, it's a very stressful situation having three dead gods coming after your ass, which is EXACTLY the sort of situation in which you should be listening VERY carefully to what the Hierophant, dissector of gods has to say.

The very foundation for Cats success has been built upon relying on others, so it just seems incredible out of character for her to now all of a sudden not even give half a thought to the fact the Masego was trying to tell her something.

'Ladi Williams

I didn't get the vibe rhat he had anything VERY IMPORTANT to say. Ofcos he always has important things to say but nothing special this time in my opinion

zenanii

Pretty sure it's PRETTY FREAKING IMPORTANT if the Bard herself intervened to make sure Cat didn't hear it.

ninegardens

I mean, he is the one character who knows that Judgement is MIA at the moment (due to Heirarch's return), so that's pretty important.

... of course he could have mentioned that while wandering around the Serenity for several house, so.... probably not that:

'Ladi Williams

The band all knows judgment is free...though I am not sure if cat's figured judgments power is currently free floating but then she's always known the bard wants to use the doomsday weapon as she (bard) sees fit so no random surprises there

'Ladi Williams

Loool...thats YOUR interpretation.
In two days time we would know if you called it right... I'm rooting for you though.

Snappy270

What important things ? Masego was when he was explaining things, either the wards being down or how to clear the undead. Not really important things. Very odd nitpick to comment on.

Zopilote 506

Great chapter, however it seems like the number of typos has incresed, hey E.E. have you ever considered hirona a proofreader on fiverr or something?

BargleNawdleZouss

Juff will fix it for EE before it gets published. 🙄

Noldo

Are we getting all three Amadeus' elements covered in quick succession so that the next chapter is Trial followed by Pivot?

On a separate note, now that Hye is no longer Ranger, and the only thing she lives for is her upcoming fight with Cat, how likely it is that she would pick a new name (Avenger?) concentrating on her pursue of retribution? Although I suspect that in practice the fight between Hye and Cat is outside the scope of this book and largely irrelevant.

ninegardens

Okay, new Bet.

Larat is going to kill Hye Su. Either now (while she is just recently de-powered and her name is kicking her), or later, say... when she is trying to fight/kill Cat in that duel ten years time.

Hye Su had a habit of cutting Larat's eye out once per year, just for the lols. Larat exited the stage with a "lol, I'mma do what I want."

Hye Su has been hunted by the Emerald blades for years... but in some sense there is no "justice" in them killing her. They do it for Racist reasons.

None of the Refugees will do it. Their story is about moving on. Cat won't do it. Hye Su just... isn't important enough to her.

Larat on the other hand has REASON to hate Hye Su. He has reason to want revenge- she earned that.

If he kills her now, its very much a "You ain't the ranger now" moment.

If he waits until the Hye vs Cat duel, its very much a "Oh, hell your majesty, fancy seeing you here? Was this woman bothering you?"

Hell, he wouldn't even be punished by the narrative for interrupting the duel, because he has a strong connection to both Hye and Cat, and honestly, he is owed a duel just as much as Cat is. Him gatecrashing someone else's duel fulfills his role as the trecherous minion- even if he take Cat's side, its still him showing up to mess up an ongoing story for his own selfish reasons.

ALL the story beats are on his side here.

I guess the only catch might be, he might have the story to cripple her, take her eye, but not the story kill her.

BargleNawdleZouss

If Larat is still on Calernia, I can see him attempting to take Hye Su's eye, but not killing her. I believe he'd think it crueler to leave her alive with the memory of her defeat & his revenge.

Rey d`Tutto

One-eyed Warden(Odin) vs One-eyed Hye(Deconstructed-Mary) Sue.
Yep. Larat FTW!

Someperson

Not gonna lie this is a fantastic bet

The world clearly needs more Larat in it

Someperson

Dang I really liked how the Ranger transition went down.

Like, sure, if Indrani and Hye just straight up fought over the name (again) that could have been neat I guess, but the way it went down really highlights why Indrani has the truer claim on the Name.

And Hye deciding to throw in the towel and ditch the party was completely expected in light of the situation but I did not expect Indrani to be there in the right place and the right time to capitalize.

BargleNawdleZouss

Random thought: both Hierarch and Hierophant have mentioned "the bars of the cage" that is Creation. It would be interesting to see the two of them team up so as to facilitate Masego's studies, and possibly getting at The Gods themselves.

ninegardens

Now that I think about it... "rage against kings and gods and all the laws of creation" seems like a very Amadeaus kind of move. Maddie went about it by being smart and trying to form a solution. Anarxes just leans in on his own madness to force concessions, but....

In some sense they are very similar in goal/mindset. Probably part of why Cat was so respectful towards Anaraxes each time they met, even if he was a madman.

Chapter 66: The Empty Grave

"Needing a second blow to take a head is an unforgivable sin for two professions: butcher and king."

– Dread Emperor Terribilis II

It was a sad song that Yara of Nowhere sang us. Slow and meandering, like a stroll in a graveyard. The words should have been happy, but they dripped of grief.

"O Tiferet, raised where the river sings

You of gardens merry and nights so bright."

It was a fitting tune for the sight sprawled out beneath us, I thought. Our feet had devoured an empty hallway until we turned a corner and were faced with a decision: hurry on towards the gates or take a narrow set of stairs up into the galleries. We'd gone up, after brief hesitation, and now I hid in the shadows and leaned against the balustrade as I watched a battle unfold. The halls beyond the great one we'd escaped were lesser but numerous, a maze of roofless rooms overlooked by great galleries that hugged the ceiling – one of which I stood on. The small halls were fed into by the corridors leading to the spire's great gates, and as Named and soldiers spilled into the labyrinth I finally understood why the Dead King had made this place.

It was a slaughterhouse.

Every inch of it was trapped. I watched a company of bright-clothed fantassins blunder into a room whose sides were a pit trap covered by an illusion, gathering in the middle in time for holes to open in the walls and undead wedged inside them to begin unloading crossbows into the thick formation. Doors exploded, tar-covered floors were set aflame and swarms of poisonous insects poured out of hidden panels. I saw a doorknob turn into a leering devil that bit off the hand of the legionary that'd tried to open it, fangs crunching through steel, and even as she began screaming clouds of acid were blown into the room through small holes in the floor. All the while bows were fired into the labyrinth from the gallery above, arrows falling like rain. Death everywhere, and that wasn't even the worst of it.

I had wondered why so few Revenants had fought us when we fought our way out of the Hall of the Dead, and now I had my answer: they were here. Dozensof then, maybe as much as a hundred. They tore into the troops like wild animals, armoured battering rams and storms of sorcery that went through even heavy companies like butter. As the loud melees took place lighter Revenants, soft-footed and quiet, slunk atop the tall roofless walls and snatched the lives of officers to sow chaos in the ranks. Named fought them where they could – I glimpsed the Valiant Champion decapitating a tall Revenant in white plate and the Skinchanger ripping out a lich's throat – but the maze was working against them. It forced them to split up, take different paths and run into traps.

Meanwhile, the Revenants moved according to the orders of their all-seeing eye in the sky: the Dead King himself, wielding his creations with fatal precision. He wasn't here, but then he didn't have to be. All it'd take was one Revenant up in the gallery to serve as his eyes.

"The city that forever blooms in spring,

Beloved of singers and delight."

"The Scourges are here," Indrani quietly said.

There was no sign of them, but she was right and we both knew it. The chord was there for me to pull on, and it was not slack but taut – tense, ready to snap. The Scourges would come out soon, and I knew exactly why it was that Neshamah was holding them back. His bloody work below told me the answer to that, with the way he was so carefully splitting up Named and trying to overwhelm them with lesser Revenants.

"He's trying to figure out what band of five he'll be facing," I agreed. "The moment he does, the full strength of the Scourge will fall on whoever he decides is the most important part of it."

It was what I'd do, in his place. Set up the meat grinder below us to kill off Named weak or not yet matured, throwing traps and disposables as he most powerful of our lot until he had a decent idea of what our strengths and weaknesses were. And then, when he'd figured out who was supposed to kill him, he'd break that band before it ever formed. It was his favoured tactic, always had been. He didn't want to face the Severance or the Crown before having broken the band behind them.

"No sight of Hanno or the Mirror Knight," I frowned, "but Akua shouldn't be far behind. We'll need to cover her and the Autumn Crown when they arrive."

Indrani shuffled and my stomach dropped. Ranger was not meeting my eye.

"What happened?" I said.

"It wasn't anybody's fault," she said. "We got ambushed."

No, I furiously thought. No, she could not possibly have fucked this up. I'd trusted her, trusted the both of them. I grabbed her by the scarf, pushing her back, and she only grimaced.

"What happened?" I coldly hissed.

"Catherine," Masego said from behind me.

His tone was a warning and I forced myself to heed it. I released Indrani, taking a step back and mastering my fury. It had yet to wane.

"The Seelie cut the crown in two," Ranger admitted.

It was like a punch in the stomach. I staggered back, eye closing as I struggled to find another angle. Another way out of this mess. If we had no way to deal with the Dead King except destruction, then he had nothing left to lose. No need to think in the long term. No reason to hold back whatever horrifying surprise I knew bone-deep he would have stored away to make the consequences of destroying him unthinkable. And now I knew for sure why the Intercessor had nudged the Hierarch into appearing in the Serenity. Neshamah's back was up against the wall, with no way to retreat.

It was do or die, for the Dead King, and he was the kind of person that'd kill all of Creation to earn a single breath more.

"What does she want?" I moaned out loud, fingers rubbing the bridge of my nose. "What can she possibly get from things going to shit for us? With Hierarch back the ealamal's back on Judgement, which is not great but shouldn't-"

"It is not," Hierophant interrupted me.

My eye flew open, meeting his own.

"Explain," I evenly said.

"I noticed when we crossed into the Serenity," he told me, "that the Choir of Judgement appears to have been silenced by the effort of freeing itself from the Hierarch."

My jaw tightened.

"So what the Hells does the ealamal do if Judgement doesn't guide it?" I ask. "Is it a dud?"

"It would express only inherent properties, like the tabula rasa effect," Hierophant said, "unless otherwise guided. Which-"

"- which the Bard can," I finished in a whisper, blood going cold.

So that was the game. Corner the Dead King so that he became the nastiest of animals, emptying his vault of all horrors on our armies, and then when it all went bad on us then Cordelia would fire up the ealamal and the Intercessor would get to decide what happened. What would it do, I wondered? Answers came to me by the dozens. She could rid herself of the Dead King and then kill everyone who knew about her, I thought, allowing herself to start building anew all the bridges she'd burned with our generation. Or she could kill all of us here, a warning as to what happened when she wasn't listened to. She could even make it do nothing at all, let us die and try to win the war with the rest of Calernia on the back of that weight.

There were so many ways for her to get back in the game, to snatch back her crown, and yet all I could think of was the conversation I'd had over a fire in the ruins of a palace once proud. But it's slavery too, to spend your live lashing backs, the Hierarch had said, grey eyes burning. Just a different kind, and you can't escape it any more than they can. And so the thought occurred to me, perhaps the most terrifying of them all, that I should be asking myself a different question.

Was Yara of Nowhere still trying to win at all?

"It's not finished, Cat," Indrani stiffly told me. "Akua, she forged something out of the crown."

That earned back my full attention. It was on the tip of my tongue to dismiss the possibility, the absurdity that someone could just forge something out of a broken crown of the fae in the middle of battle, but it never passed my lips.

If anyone could, it was Akua Sahelian.

"What did she make?"

"Shackles," Ranger said. "The kind that bind power both ways."

A crude thing, I thought, made on the bedrock of Masego's work. Yet it was as much a miracle as Hierophant's labour that she had been able to do even this much. I studied Indrani closer, eye narrowing.

"There's more," I said, and it was not a question.

Indrani grimaced again.

"She didn't say it, but I'm sure it's not the kind of shackles you get to take off after they're put on," she told me.

I closed my eye. Of course they wouldn't. They'd been made from the Autumn Crown, which we'd not intended Neshamah to ever take off. Whoever held back the Dead King would never be relieved from that vigil. Yet someone would have to, before this was over, and that left a burning question: who. I had meant Akua to take up that role as queen over the Twilight Ways, when this all began, but the Ways were broken and now the Autumn Crown as well. Were we going to have to bet it all on the Severance? No, I decided, the shackles could work. They should be able to strip the Dead King of his mastery over undead, or close enough. We hadn't lost yet, it was just that instead of offering a gift that could not be refused we'd have to beat the Hidden Horror to shackle him.

And someone was going to have to be shackled to him.

"Fuck," I swore.

Should it be me? I wasn't sure that was feasible, not if it was to be the Warden and one of the rulers of Cardinal. I couldn't afford to be either gone or powerless. Who else, though? Akua might have served as the queen of a broken throne, but she'd made these shackles. I was not sure she could also wear them, that the story would flow. It would be a heroine's sacrifice, and though I was more than half in love with her she was not a heroine. Not even now.

"Warden."

Alexis' voice brought me out of my thoughts again, a reminder that all around us people were dying and I didn't have the time to spare to figure it all out in my head. The Silver Huntress was pointing something out for me over the balustrade and I leaned over to see. Fresh waves of warriors were entering the slaughterhouse, at their forefront warbands of heavily armoured orcs. At their head a towering man in scorched plate brandished a greatsword, the Warlord roaring as they entered the fray. Hakram had arrived.

"Appreciated," I told Alexis, "but he can take care of him-"

I caught sight of the killing arrow as it passed me, eyes widening as I reached for Night, but Indrani was faster. Her bow was already strung and her hands blurred as she moved, nocking and releasing her own arrow. It ended up being a close thing. I watched with a thumping heart, relieved for a moment when I saw Hakram had not been the one aimed at – only for the relief to fade when I realized soldiers of the Army of Callow had arrived with the fresh wave, and Vivienne was leading them. Ranger's arrow caught the Hawk's less than a foot away from Vivienne, the two of them hitting a legionary in the shoulder instead. She let out a shout of alarm and ducked, although too late.

The cold voice in the back of my mind, the part that wasn't frozen fear and rage at how close Princess had just come to dying, wondered why the Dead King would believe Vivienne Dartwick crucial to his defeat. Worth committing the Scourges for. I realized, in the heartbeat that followed, that she wasn't. But she was one of the Woe, and we'd come out swinging for her – taking out into the open people he was genuinely wary of. It was a simple and straightforward ploy, a kind villains had been using on their opponents for millennia. And they'd kept using it because it fucking worked, I grimly thought.

"Ranger," I said.

"Yeah, I've got the Hawk," Indrani said with deceptive mildness.

Were I a better woman I might have spared some pity for what lay ahead of the Scourge.

"Hierophant with me," I said, then turned to the remaining two. "As for you-"

"I want to get the piece of the drakon to the Witch of the Woods," Cocky interrupted me. "And I will need an escort for that."

I mulled that, then nodded.

"If you can't reach her," I said, "then find the Riddle-Maker."

Kreios would likely be better for the fight if we were aiming at a second round with the drakon, but the Witch was a lot more likely to be free. She should have been pounding at the front gate with Hanno, serving as a magical battering ram, and those should be open by now. Still, it had not escaped me I had found no trace of either those two. The battle there might not actually be won yet. Later Catherine's problem, I decided. She was plucky lass, she could handle it. I caught Masego's eye and waited for his nod, only then pushing through the butterflies in my belly to take a few steps back. I broke into a run and, using my staff, vaulted myself over the edge of the balustrade.

"O Tiferet, home of my true love

A maiden fairer than the full moon."

I gathered Night to me as I fell, Mantle of Woe flapping around me, and did not even turn when an arrow was shot at my back. Indrani would take care of it. I wrapped myself in shadows, swallowing whole the volley that fell on me from the galleries above, and wove tendrils below to catch my fall. They caught the edge of a wall, turning the drop into a smooth lowering atop the wall even as the labyrinth came alive around me. I watched, unimpressed, as the undead in that maze of rooms turned towards me as one. Komena laughed in my ear, delighted, and together we raised my hand as Night coalesced between my fingers.

"Take a swing," I challenged. "See where it gets you."

A storm answered. Arrows and javelin and spells, swarms of dead insects and clouds of poison. Ghouls scrambled up the wall and skeletons thrust long spears at my feet. It would not be enough. In my hand I held a sphere of darkness, and as I opened my palm it was revealed for a heartbeat – until I closed my fingers to crush it. The air shook, for a moment, and as I grinned the sphere exploded into a shower of black pinpricks. They flew out, growing and swelling into beams as they did. Komena's eyes told friend from foe where I could not, held back by the limitations of my flesh, and everything else turned to smoke.

Night sliced through stone and steel and dead, the rays of the dark sun I had shattered taking a remorseless bite out of Creation.

The storm died, swallowed whole save for broken remnants that did not even reach my feet, and I let out a misty breath as Night swam thick through my veins. Behind me Hierophant landed atop the wall, his descent wavering like a feather's. He had lowered his own weight to take the edge of the fall, but within moments it was restored and he stood at my back.

"An ugly place," Masego mildly said. "I do not like it."

"Then lighten up, Zeze," I smiled, "because the two of us are going to burn it down."

It was an elegant, intricate plan to kill Named and men that Neshamah had crafted here. So instead of trying to defeat him in kind, beat him at his own game, I was going to take a fucking hammer to his clever little schemes.

"You have a plan, then?" Hierophant asked.

He sounded, I thought with a smile, so utterly unconcerned by the sea of enemies around us. I pointed my staff behind us.

"See that?"

"I do," he drily replied.

"It's the furthest any of our allies have gotten," I said. "So anything past it goes."

"Simple," he praised.

"That's me," I humbly replied, then winced when I realized what I'd just said.

It was too much to hope the Dead King hadn't heard that, wasn't it? Goddamnit. Well, time to drown my embarrassment in a copious amount of fire.

"I'll defend," I said. "Attack."

"It is in your hands," Masego agreed.

In the heartbeat that followed translucent shields bloomed in a bubble around him, arrows pinging off the panels, and he began to speak in the mage tongue. He was out of it for now, so it was time for me to get to work. Now, we were surrounded by undead crawling over walls to come at us as arrows rained from above and Revenants converged on our very visible raised location. We were in hostile territory, which was why tactics dictated that my first move should be to spread that disadvantage around. I loosened my wrist and rolled my shoulder.

"All right," I muttered. "Let's see if this time I can make it hot enough it goes straight to bone ash."

A javelin flew up, shot from the dead angle of my dead eye, but I followed the nudge of my Name and slapped it aside with my staff. Breathing out, I raised the staff of dead yew I had received in the depths of newborn Twilight and stirred the air with it. Slowly, carefully tracing the circle as Night gathered and the air began to heat. The Hawk came for me, but I had Ranger on my side. I didn't glance at the black arrow before hearing it shot out. And as strings of black flame began to linger in the air in the wake of my staff, I shaped my will. Below me a ghoul clawed its way up the wall, baring its fangs at my boots, and I bared my teeth back.

"Run or burn," I hissed, slamming my staff down.

It did not, I saw, run quickly enough. Like a knot of snakes come loose, ribbons of blackflame erupted from where my staff had struck the top of the wall. They slithered in every direction, leaving behind burning trails as they ate through flesh and slid inside armour to devour the dead inside. I watched through a hundred eyes as the working spread out around me like a blooming flower, black flames consuming everything as they hungrily advanced. It would do, I decided. I'd not destroyed everything in that radius, as much because I was trying to avoid killing Grand Alliance forces as because some of the undead were hard to put down, but it was all on fire. It'd serve as a wall for most everything except Revenants.

"Abyss and firmament. I take the shape of the star and the depth of the pit, borrowing laws high and low."

"Oh dear," I muttered, glancing at Masego. "Is that really usable inside?"

It really was quite worrying how often I was the person in my inner circle that most responsibly handled unspeakable eldritch power. Although that was, I supposed, not unlike being the drunk with the smallest bottle. Still, now that I'd rid myself of the chaff it was about time for the real contenders to come out. The first one to pop his head out was a Revenant mage that rose in through a dignified levitation spell, his colourful embroidered robes fluttering in nonexistent wind as he pointed a gnarled staff my way and began an incantation that echoed across the ceiling. Frowning, I pointed a finger and gathered Night in a needle before it shot out. It blew through his skull as I began to look who that'd been a distraction for, finding that tricky little tart the Seelie climbing up the wall to get at Masego's back.

I tossed a ball of blackflame at her, breaking the illusion, and enjoyed the look on her face when the fire then circled around instead of dispersing and blew her off the wall before she could eviscerate Hierophant. Really, like I wasn't going to learn when she kept using the same trick? More worrying than the sneak, though, was the way that all the poison clouds across the maze were beginning to gather in a ball under the ceiling. That was the fucking Tumult at work, mark my words, because of course now that I'd set this place on fire and Masego was going to smite it what we needed was a fucking poison storm on top of everything. Much as I would have liked to get rid of that, though, I had more pressing matters at hand.

Like the Mantle turning the wall I was standing on to dust.

I cursed, stepping back as the tall Scourge swung her mace at my retreating form. The parts of the wall that hadn't crumbled cracked from the blow even as I tossed a curse at the Mantle's head, which she took head on. Her helm warped, but she pit her power against mine and while if it'd kept up she would have lost I didn't have the time – through a Night eye I saw the Seelie throwing a knife at Masego's head, hastily withdrawing my will from the Mantle to form streaks of darkness around Hierophant's shield. The knife wasn't where I'd seen it, but I went wide enough I caught it anyway. Only for, you know, the Mantle to finish turning the wall under me to dust. Fuck, I thought as I fell, and I raised my staff to try to slap aside the mace blow but it was going to be tricky and-

And three hundred pounds of orcish fury smashed into the Mantle, Hakram Deadhand snarling as he tackled her through a door so hard splinters went flying. I landed on my knees, leaning against my staff, and let out a sigh of relief. Reinforcements had arrived.

"I have woven curses into hymn, stuffed a heart with straw. That which is hollow I have raised onto the dais, revered as glorious under three skies and revered by nine corners."

I hadn't seen the Prince of Bones yet but he was bound to be close, so I couldn't leave Hakram alone for too long. I couldn't leave Masego along for long either, though, because the fucking Seelie was around and he wasn't moving. She'd gotten past my armour like it wasn't there with that knife of hers, once, so I wouldn't bet on a spell shield doing better. I wove a tendril to get me back up on the chunk of the wall where he was standing, landing in front of him, but there was no sign of the enemy. I took a few limping steps forward, frowning, then thrust my staff down at the burning room: a gust of wind picked up ash and tossed it everywhere, but still the Seelie remained hidden. Where was she?

My Name nudged me and I heard the sound of steel ripping into flesh, turning to see a throwing knife stuck in the Seelie's wrist as she flew on translucent red wings to stick Masego from the back. She shattered into pieces but almost immediately reappeared a foot below the broken illusion as another throwing knife thumped into her back, ripping her ballroom gown as she turned with an inhuman snarl. The Princess, sword in hand, flicked her other wrist and palmed a third throwing knife.

"The Varlet did it better," Vivienne Dartwick told her. "So what would that make you – a quarter rate Named?"

Ah, trash talk. That most hallowed of Callowan traditions.

"Can you cover Masego?" I called out.

"Run along, Black Queen," my successor smiled. "I'm finding stabbing fae to be satisfying in a very soulful sort of way."

And who was I to argue with that? The same tendrils that'd raised me up threw me in the direction Hakram had disappeared in, and as Indrani shot out an attempt of the Hawk's to kill Warlord I found the duelling Named and guided my descent very precisely: my boots landed on the back of the Mantle's head as she tried to wrestle Hakram's great sword out of his grasp, my staff following a moment later and sliding in the space between the helm and the plate.

"My turn with the curses," I grinned even as I unleashed Night.

It'd be hard to cook her from the inside, but I could do something simpler. No matter how much armour and steel there was in there, it was the bones that moved the Mantle. And affecting those was a lot easier than wrecking all that steel. Night sunk into them like poison, and even as the Scourge shook me off and sent me flying into a pile of stone I exerted a twist of will to get the working moving. A heartbeat later her limbs began shaking uncontrollably, and with a roar Warlord smashed her into the ground. He ripped his greatsword out of her grasp even as she twisted on the ground and I rose to my feet. His arm rose to deliver a crippling blow, but before he could the wall to his left burst open in a shower of shards as the Prince of Bones tore through.

"Shit," I hissed, and slid Night along the ground before the Prince.

I covered the stone with greasy, oily Night but to my unpleasant surprise it did nothing. The fucking Prince must have either enchanted boots or nails under the soles. Hakram took a greastword blow with his own, steel grinding on steel, and I realized with a start that the blades were almost identical. Had Hakram stolen the Prince of Bones' sword at some point? I loosed a burst of raw Night in the Mantle's belly as she tried to get up, knocking her back down, but that wouldn't last. This wasn't a good place for us to fight, not with limited space and two enemies so heavily armoured.

"We pull back," I shouted.

"Agreed," Warlord growled, taking a step back.

Even as we began our retreat, though, the tide turned again.

"Behold," Hierophant called out, "all ye with eyes, for I have made a god of clay and it is an idol of WRATH."

I shielded my eyes from the cold, alien light just as it came down. The clamour of the battle went silent as a grave, as if Hierophant's miracle had killed noised itself. When I took my hand off my eye it was to the sight of both Scourges withdrawing, which after hesitation I allowed. After all, where they were headed I'd find it difficult to pursue: the latter half of the great room that I had pointed out to Masego was now a plain of red, glowing glass.

Nothing else was left.

The front half of the labyrinth, having come into Grand Alliance hands through hard fighting while Zeze and I made a spectacle, burst into cheers. The dead there were good as routed, and through our advance was stopped until the glass cooled it was now open grounds to the great stairs at the back of what had once been a maze. The surviving Revenants fled that way, ignoring spells and arrows, and when I glanced up at the ceiling where the poison clouds had been gathering I found with some amusement it had been glassed as well. The heat had dispersed whatever the Tumult was up to, sparing us a spot of trouble on top of all the rest.

"Her smile gentler than the wings of doves,

Her laugh worth a thousand tunes!"

And the Intercessor was still singing, great. Because that was always a good sign. I went shoulder to shoulder with Hakram as we returned – well, shoulder to arm anyways – and bumped my armour against his.

“You got there right in time,” I said.

“One of my better habits,” Warlord smirked.

“I suppose you do need something to make up for all the sleeping around.”

As he spluttered my eye sought the source of the voice and found that Vivienne’s face was cut, but it was just a shallow slice under her eye. Masego, following behind, was entirely unharmed and looked to be in a rather fine mood. I supposed I’d be too, if I had gotten to blow up half the labyrinth of someone I despised.

“You’re being pretty savage today,” I told her. “It’s been great.”

“Well, it is the end of the world,” Princess snorted.

“Speaking of that, Catherine,” Hakram said, “there’s trouble at the gates.”

Wait, hadn’t I figured something out for that? Shit, no I hadn’t. Earlier Catherine had passed me the sharper because she couldn’t be bothered to. Earlier Catherine, what a bitch, I uncharitably thought. She just kept screwing me over.

“Lay it on me,” I sighed.

“The Titans are brawling,” Vivienne bluntly said.

A small sentence that encompassing a large amount of collateral damage, I figured. Anyhow, the mystery of where the dead Titans had disappeared to appeared to be solved. Neshamah must have figured they were worth spending on keeping the Riddle-Maker out of his hair, and I couldn’t fault the decision. The last of the living Titans would have been damned useful when facing down the Hidden Horror. We kept moving deeper into the maze, avoiding corpses and traps as we moved through the crowd of cheering soldiers.

“Is Kreios winning?” I asked with a grimace.

“No one can tell,” Hakram admitted. “It was still going when we broke through.”

“Broke through,” I repeated with a frown. “Explain.”

“We haven’t won the battle for the inner city,” Warlord continued. “The Procerans seized one of the avenues and we’ve been funneling troops into the spire through it, but the palaces are still in enemy hands and we keep losing the plaza.”

Which was why it was such a haphazard mix of Grand Alliance troops that'd spilled into the maze. Whenever a push crested past enemy defences there was another wave of soldiers, but we didn't actually hold the great plaza. It made a rough sort of sense, I thought. It was where all the great avenues led to, so it would be the easiest place in all of Keter for Neshamah to reinforce.

"It has been some time since we crossed," Vivienne reminded me. "The battle could have tipped one way or another by now."

I slowly nodded.

"Do you know where Hanno and the Witch are?"

"Keeping the gates open," Warlord said.

And the enemy army off our backs, it went unsaid.

"I need a word with them," I said. "The rest of you should prepare for the offensive."

I paused.

"Zeze, can you get Indrani down here?" I asked. "I want us with her when we strike."

"I'll see to it," Hierophant promised.

I clapped his shoulder, nodded at the others and went on my way. The hallways that fed into the maze room were relatively straightforward, opulently decorated with few visible defences laid in save for wards. They were grounds the Dead King was prepared to lose, after all: their purpose was to guide invaders in the killing grounds. I passed through knots of soldiers and makeshift infirmaries where priests and mages saw to the wounded – or burned the dead. The Forsworn Healer was there, but I did not stop to speak with him. Soon I stood before the great open gates of the spire, at the top of wide stairs that gave me a wide view of the city, and my stomach clenched at what I saw.

We were losing.

The Grand Alliance's armies had broken into the inner city, overwhelming the ramparts and seizing two gates, but then they'd been pushed behind those walls like rats sealed in a casket. Our hosts had seized wide swaths of Keter's centre and dug in, but relentless tides of undead smashed at their defences even as companies desperately charged into the central plaza to make it past the enemy and into the black spire. It was a battle of attrition now, I saw, and one we could only lose. An hour, two at most, and our armies would break. Before half of that passed they'd grow too feeble to keep mounting offensives into the plaza, cutting off the flow of reinforcements.

We'd have to do with the people we had and whoever arrived in the next quarter hour. If we didn't take our swing at the Dead King soon we were finished. Breathing out shakily, I swept out the gates to find a few makeshift barricades had been raised at the bottom of the stairs and were being manned by hodgepodge mix of soldiers. Legionaries – mine and Nims' both – side by side with Proceran conscripts and League mercenaries. Two pikes that must belong to Spears of Stygia rose high, a woman in magister's robes with them, as Levantines painted in the colours of the Brigand's Blood locked shields with orcs of the Blackspear Clan.

In front of them, swaggering, was the Red Knight. More surprising to me was the presence of the Silver Huntress and the Concocter, who'd evidently made it past the enemy to find the Witch. Still, I saw no sign of either her or Hanno. Or Kreios, for that matter, who should-

To the east a sun lit up the sky, burning through stone houses and towers and hundreds of dead even as air turned so thick and liquid that it seemed as if a curtain had fallen over an entire city bloc. In the heart of it I saw the two robed silhouettes of the dead Titans, bearing livery in Keter's colours of purple and silver. A sight that seemed to enrage the third giant facing them, who pulled down the sky on their heads and let out a shout that echoed across the Crown of the Dead. I glimpsed the sun expanding and turning red, then exploding white for a heartbeat before it contracted and blackened, swallowing everything up before the magic exploded in strings of raw power.

None of the Titans flinched, magic rearing up again as they continued their terrifying clash.

Well Kreios seemed to, uh, have that in hand? A little hard to tell, like Hakram had said, but if I stuck my finger in there I didn't think it'd achieve much except losing me a finger. Best to leave them to it. My gaze shied away, looking instead for Hanno and the Witch. They still weren't with the barricades, but the soldiers there were pointing at something and following that I found them. There'd been a push to retake the plaza that had failed, but through the ranks of the dead a small band was running for the spire gates and the two of them had gone out to meet them. There were five – no, six – people sprinting as the dead howled after them.

The Witch of the Woods tossed a spell into the horde, a ball of transparent force that crushed all it rolled over, but it wouldn't be enough. A handful of Revenants had sped ahead of the rest of the undead, the fastest of them an armoured man with a great sword who... My fingers clenched when I realized I was looking at the Blade of Mercy. We hadn't been fast enough to burn his corpse. Most of our dead Named had been recovered and burned, but sometimes it'd been impossible to retrieve the bodies. The runners were Named as well, I recognized. The Mirror Knight was easy to pick out by his armour, as were the Myrmidon and the Kingfisher Prince. The Grave Binder and Affable Burglar took a second look, but my breath caught when I recognized the person at the back of the pack.

That was Akua's armour.

Hanno caught the Blade of Mercy's blow a heartbeat before it struck her back, having sped up massively over his last few steps, and the truth of him was plain to See. The White Knight walked among us again, sword in hand. Hanno's blade blazed with Light as he drove back the Revenant, parrying a spear thrust from another who'd caught up and holding the rearguard until the Witch struck down with a mass of water than she froze in the heartbeat that followed. A wasteland of ice behind him, the White Knight leisurely retreated while covering the runners the rest of the way. I was down the stairs in moments, on them as they arrived.

"Warden," Hanno smiled.

"White Knight," I returned, clasping his arm when he offered it.

He made a face that, on a prettier man, might have been called a pout.

"That eye of yours does take some pleasure out of things," he complained.

"Not for me," I snorted.

And I was, after all, a villain. I swept through the others, offering nods and claps where I should until I reached Akua. She looked tired, I thought, but far from resigned. My eye dipped down a pouch at her side and she replied with a nod.

"I still have them," she said.

"Did you choose a name?" I asked.

Her smile was sharp enough to cut.

"Fetters," Akua said. "I call them the Fetters."

"It'll do," I said, and gently touched her elbow.

As much to greet her as reassure myself she was there. The Red Knight snorted contemptuously and I addressed her without turning.

"It might do you some good to remember that you don't, strictly speaking, need your tongue to fight for me," I mildly said.

I saw the smile in Akua's eyes she did not allow to touch her face, and when I turned to glance at the Red Knight she looked uncertain. Taken aback by how casually I'd just threatened to rip out her tongue in front of half a dozen heroes. Hanno did look disapproving, but though it was hard to tell with the mask I was pretty the Witch of the Woods was grinning.

"We'll soon be able to push deeper into the spire," I said. "The glass will have cooled."

"The glass?" the Mirror Knight asked, sounding confused.

"Hierophant was in a mood," I shrugged.

It said a lot about the kind of reputation Masego had grown into that not a single person here misunderstood my meaning after that.

"There won't be anyone more Named coming," Prince Frederic told me. "It has been most of an hour since I last spoke with First Princess Rozala, but I believe all we are the last. Everyone else is crippled or dead."

I kept a wince off my face. I'd not counted how many Named there had been in the maze, but it couldn't be more than thirty. More than half the people who'd signed the Truce and Terms were now either dead or out of the fight.

"Then we press on with what we have," I told them. "The Scourges still block our path, but--"

We all went silent. Even the least sensitive of the Named, even those soldiers without a speck of magic to them, felt it. Like a fetid warm wind out of a swamp, licking at our skin. It came from where half the maze still stood. The drakon, I thought. But how? The Emerald Swords should be keeping it contained.

"Either the Emerald Sword are dead," I grimly said, "or they were tricked."

Heavy silence followed.

"I think," the Concocter hesitantly said, "I think that I know what happened."

My eye went to her, a silent order to keep talking.

"The body it just a corpse," Cocky said. "It's the essence of the drakon that matters. So it might be that the elves are still cutting up a regenerating body but that the essence slipped away."

My breath caught.

"You're saying it's building itself another body," I said. "In there."

Out of corpses, steel and stone, I thought. I

"The Dead King's leash on such a thing would be loose," Antigone flatly said. "This may well be the seed of a drakon reborn."

I shivered at that, I wasn't too proud to admit it. I wasn't alone in that either. Few of the people here knew what a drakon even was and yet dread hung heavy in the air. Had the Dead King's monster gotten free? I concentrated, dipped into the darkness of See, and the story was there to be found. Strong, the riverbed of it deep and wide. It had been near a certainty from the moment Below's stories returned and the monster was revealed. Which means he knew it would happen, I thought. It was Neshamah, he'd seen that story play out a thousand times before. Which meant it was part of his plan, and when I stopped to consider what a drakon reborn might mean I understood exactly what it was.

He was raising another Evil we needed to stop. We couldn't just fucking ignore this and pass it by as we went to take his head, we'd need to deal with it else Calernia was just as fucked as before: we might not be in a state to stop it after we dealt with the Dead King. The one person who did have a story to lean into against the creature was already busy, stuck in the grooves a story just as strong: the last Titan putting to rest the stolen corpses of his old comrades. Fuck, I thought again. We were getting played, had gotten played, and it was skillful enough that even if I knew there was no other choice than to pay up on the price.

"Concocter, you still have that piece of the drakon?" I asked.

"I do," she agreed.

"Then you and the Witch need to figure out a way to put it down," I frankly said. "Take whoever you need to get it done. The rest of us go for the Dead King."

"I will finish it," the Witch of the Woods promised me.

"There might not be a way," the Mirror Knight cautioned her.

"Then I will make one," she replied without hesitation. "Whatever the cost."

I nodded, comforted by her determination if nothing else.

"Make your picks quickly," I ordered her. "We're running out of time."

—

"O Tiferet, ruled by lords fair and just Your sages celebrated far and wide."

It was a horror.

I had seen dark and ugly things over my years as a villain, but not even the worst of the madness to be found in the Wasteland rivaled the seed of a drakon taking root. Out of the glass it had grown, swallowing up corpses and stone and armour like a tar pit, until a twisted abomination took shape. It had a dragon's long neck and body, but the wings were ragged and full of holes – their patterns hurting the eye – and while a spiked tailed slithered down there were no feet beneath. Only writhing tentacles of corpse-flesh and eerie, insect-like scuttling legs. It was the mouth that had me nauseous, though. The jaw split four ways, revealing dripping jowls and a sea of teeth that were as glistening knives. Every part of it writhed, moved, faces and armour and limbs looking as if they were trying to wriggle out of the abomination.

To stand in its presence was to feel it biting away at you, eating everything that you were piece by piece. It was not something humans were meant to face, and yet we must. There was no other choice, for it was rampaging all over remains of the maze. With a cruel intelligence it had lacked earlier it snatched up soldiers and trampled banners, leaving some half dead and bleeding out so they might scream out their suffering as they died. The only relief to be had here was that there was not a single Scourge here: the Dead King would not risk them when he was losing control of his monster.

"Go," the Witch of the Woods shouted. "I will draw its attention."

As her sorcery roared, we ran for it. The Woe came to me as we ran through the maze, avoiding swipes of the drakon's limbs that shattered rooms while the Witch struck at it with great icy winds. It was fewer Named than I would have liked who would come with us. The Kingfisher Prince would hold the rearguard with the soldiers and the Red Knight was to stay with him, one meant for leading men and the other killing foes. Then the Witch had taken the Mage – Apprentice had transitioned, fancy that, and she wasn't even done if I saw that right – the Knight Errant, the Myrmidon, the Painted Knife and the Affable Burglar. The Stalwart Apostle was to stay back and heal, with the Stained Sister to keep her alive. And the Concocter, of course.

Hanno and I would get the rest. The Woe, of course. Then the Valiant Champion, the Mirror Knight, the Forsworn Healer, the Daring Pyromancer, the Silver Huntress, the Vagrant Spear, the Page, the Skinchanger and the Grave Binder. Akua as well, of course, though she was not properly named. Sixteen of us to end the King of Death.

It felt like too few, but there was no other choice.

The kept running, squeezing through the smoking halls, and the cloying humidity pressed ever stronger as we approached the drakon's side. It noticed us, even through the winds, and would have swiped if not for the madwoman who leapt on its back and began tearing out its back.

"Honour to the Blood," the Painted Knife shouted.

A heartbeat later she was sent flying, the drakon screaming in irritation, as I heard bones break. Kallia, I realized, might well just have died. But she'd bought us a moment. We reached the open grounds of glass, marred by the abomination that'd emerged from them, and though it turned its back on the maze to chase us the Witch of the Woods ripped out a chunk of the ceiling and collapsed it on the monster's head. It wouldn't hurt it, we all knew that, but it won us the rest of the way to the stairs. Across smooth black glass we ran, until our feet reached stone and the drakon's fury sounded behind us.

"Don't stop," I shouted. "Keep going. We lose if we slow."

We couldn't know where in the spire the Dead King waited, but it didn't matter. We had enough heroes assembled that providence would lead us there in time and even though we'd played most of the cards we had to play so had Neshamah. He didn't have a lot of defences or defenders left that could stop the crew of sixteen we'd assembled. Only the one, really, and he didn't make us wait long for it. We stumbled out of the stairs into a cavernous great hall, a forest of tall pillars under a curved ceiling so tall I could barely make it out. There were no torches here, no magelights, and yet a dim green light hung about the hall. Our boots found wet tiles as we entered, shallow waters covering swaths of the hall as they looked like emerald mirrors.

Among the pillars at the heart of the room, the Prince of Bones stood waiting.

"They're here," I quietly said. "All of them."

"Then we strike hard from the start," Hanno said.

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. No, that too was a trap. Sixteen against five with the strong Named we had, we were certain to beat them. But the story would be diluted. Too many of us moving in different directions. What would win out was the simplest one of all: 'the Scourges can kill Named'. We'd win, but our losses would be catastrophic. Like the Maddened Fields, it would be a victory that lost us the war.

"No," I said. "The rest of you go on ahead. This is for the Woe to handle."

The White Knight turned to me, startled, but I raised a hand.

"Don't argue," I ordered. "We don't have the time. We'll engage them, take the opening and go."

He was unhappy, I could see it writ plain on that plain face. But he would not turn his back on the decision we had made at the heart of the tower, when I had devoured the first of the Intercessor's eyes: I was the Warden and so he would obey.

"I'll be waiting for you at the end of the line, Catherine," Hanno of Arwad finally said.

"We began the Truce and Terms together," I smiled. "We'll end them together as well, Hanno."

A curt nod, and he moved. Nemed followed in his wake, headed to the side of the room and I found golden eyes looking for mine. There was something like grief on Akua's face, and she seemed startled with the intensity of it. Enough that she looked away.

The Woe gathered around me and I let out a long breath, eyes falling on the waiting Prince of Bones.

"By their golden wisdom without rust,

A hundred times did you earn your pride!"

So that was it, then. The last dance of the Woe. We'd go different ways after the war, should there be an after the war, but we still had today before it came to an end.

"Quite the fight you've picked us," Princess drawled.

"Eh, that's always been the way," Ranger said. "We always find the meanest fucker in the room and throw a drink in his face, it's kind of our thing at this point."

"We have grudges to settle, besides," Warlord grunted. "They've gotten away too many times already."

I rolled my shoulder, limbering it, and slowly unsheathed my sword.

"Let's buy them passage to the Dead King, then," I said.

I took a limping step forward, but Masego suddenly cleared his throat. I stalled and looked back, finding him staring at me disapprovingly.

"You haven't said the words," he complained.

I blinked.

"What words?"

"Our motto," he slowly said, as if addressing a dimwit.

Indrani got it first, letting out a hyena's cackle, and I got what he meant a moment later in utter disbelief.

"Don't you fucking dare," I warned. "Not a single one of you."

"Together," Hierophant enthusiastically said, raising his hand.

Filthy traitors that they were, the others all joined in.

"LIES AND VIOLENCE!"

A moment of silence passed as the Prince of Bones slowly cocked his head to the side. Yeah, that really happened, I commiserated.

"I hate you all," I said, meaning every word but one.

This time when I stepped forward, they followed.

My gait was lazy, unhurried, because I could feel it one more. The same sensation that had come upon me in Dormer, when the five of us had been the first into the last breach. Like a rhythm, a second heartbeat that had always been there but never heard.

Ranger, as always, opened the dance.

The unraveller flew, a killing stroke for any Revenant's flesh it found. The Prince of Bones did not move, the Hawk's black arrow shattering the artefact in flight, but the song was in our ears and our feet followed. Hakram tore forward, a roar in his throat as he raised the greatsword, and the water beneath our feet stirred as the Tumult's sorcery woke.

"No," Hierophant mildly said, and Wrested the spell.

With perfect coordination the magic was shaped into frost and tossed onto the pillar to Hakram's side, catching the Seelie's side as she flickered into existence. I hummed, Night thrumming in my veins as I sunk tendrils into the stone and pulled the pillar down on her head. A curse shivered past the spine of the pillar as it fell, the Mantle's armoured form wading out of deep water. Vivienne's half-step to the side, light-footed as when she had been the Thief, took her out of the path just long enough for her to ram her sword through the Seelie's throat.

She exploded into a storm of fading flower petals and the Princess frowned. Something inside of her grew, sharpened. Not quite there yet, but soon.

Indrani shot the Hawk's arrow before it could take the Vagrant Spear in the eye on the very same heartbeat where Warlord's sword met the Prince of Bones'. Steel rang against steel, both monstrous blades scrapping the other's edge, but Hakram would lose out in strength. It didn't matter, because as I slowly limped forward I had been spreading Night in the water. I thumped the butt of my staff against the stone and tendrils of water rose, tugging at the Prince's feet. He was too heavy to fall that easily, but the Mantle had to throw a curse at the water and to free him and that gave Vivienne an opportunity to disappear in the dark between the pillars. Princess or not, she remained a sneak at heart. Ranger shot the Mantle in the back of the head, the Hawk's arrow just a shade too slow to catch it, but it slid against the metal. The angle had been a little off.

On the other side of the room I saw the last of them, the Grave Binder, get onto the stairs. They were through, and now we could get serious.

I breathed out, forming eyes of Night all around me. One, a dozen, a hundred – a thousand. After all, I knew exactly what was coming. A heartbeat later the Mantle called down darkness over the heart of the hall, where she and Hakram and the Prince were fighting. Through my dead eye I gauged the distances, gathering Night to my hand, and let loose a spear of Night. It streaked forward into the dark, clipping the side of the Mantle's shoulder and disrupting her hold on the curse. All was revealed, just in time for me to see Warlord being forced a step back by the Prince, sword slammed into the ground as the armoured behemoth slammed their heads.

Hakram took a step back, dazed, but Ranger's arrow hit the Mantle in the articulation of her armour's wrist. It released Light when snapped – the Blessed Artificer's work, had to be – which stepped the Scourge cold before she could break Warlord's neck with her mace. The song quickened, four streaks of lightning forming near the ceiling. A halfway clever way to get around the limitation of Wrest, which could only seize one magical source at a time. Only Hierophant ripped out one of the streaks before it finished forming, striking at the others with it even as I drew on Night and closed the distance with the melee.

The last of the lightning shattered a pillar, guided by Hierophant's hand, and a heartbeat later there was the sound of someone falling into water. The Hawk, I saw through eyes of Night. Masego had found her, and her ragged cloak splashed as she rose from the puddles. I'd have to leave that to Indrani, since I – in the blind spot of my eye the Seelie flicked into being, aiming at my spine, but I swept wide with my staff. As I struck nothing, I realized with dim surprise that she'd tricked me: this once, the first blow had not been an illusion. I threw myself to the side, already knowing it'd be too slow, but then a sword rammed into the Seelie's back.

"Eighth-rate," Princess said, tone cold as she ripped the blade free.

The Scourge crumbled into a bed of flowers, to my anger, but at the sight of it the bundle of power inside her took shape and set. Coming into her aspect, Vivienne Dartwick let out a sharp breath.

"So that's it," she murmured. "You've just been tricking us."

A glance at me.

"Catherine, burn."

I did not question it, turning to drown the flowers in black flame even as behind me the Prince of Bones swung at my head – only to be stopped by Hakram's parry, blades slamming into the ground as Masego Wrested the Mantle's cursed and smashed it into the Prince's side. The flowers lit up like kindling and with hoarse scream gathered back together, turning into the Seelie once more. Oh, I thought. This entire time, the petals had never faded during any of our fights. She'd just used an illusion to make it look like they did while she put herself back together out of sight. The Scourge screamed, wings erupting out of her back, but I swung with the strength of my Name behind me: the slash opened her throat, cutting into the bone yet but not hard enough to go through. Vivienne, swift as a viper, put a dagger through the Seelie's eye and dug deep. She knelt, grabbing my sword even as I pivoted to slap away a curse of the Mantle's with my staff and reply with burst of raw power that she had to block with her mace, and Princess leaned on her own Name strength to finish the cut all the way through.

The Seelie went still, and in the same heartbeat that Vivienne cut off her head the Scourge rammed her dagger into my successor's throat.

A scream welled up in my throat, too raw to be a word, and then the Princess exploded into a shower of fragrant flowers. She formed back a moment later, on her feet and smiling icily.

"I can Trick people too, you know," Princess said. "It's not that hard."

See through tricks, I glimpsed in her, and mimic them. The learning wouldn't stay in her long, that was the limitation, but some part of Vivienne Dartwick had decided she would no longer fall for the same trick twice with such utter determination that Creation itself had answered. It was fitting I thought, for of all of us she had had grown into the one most resolute to learn from her mistakes. One down and four to go. The song swelled in agreement, the chorus whispering in my ear as the five of us moved as one. As Vivienne faded into the shadow of the pillars behind me, I turned back to the fight and joined Hakram's side.

The Prince of Bones and the Mantle towered over us, masses of steel wielding more of the same, but I was not afraid. Hakram Deadhand had stood at my side since the beginning of this, and he'd stand there still when we ended it.

The Prince struck and Warlord met him, muscles tearing at the contest of strength while I slipped behind the giant's back to avoid the Mantle's shivering curse. Above us magic warred against itself, the Tumult having lost patience and now trying to overwhelm Hierophant with brute strength and numbers, but across the green-mirrored water Hakram and I danced. The might of the titans broke stone and howled through the air but we were ever one step ahead, wind rustling over the water as we avoided death by a hair's breadth and struck back. I struck the Mantle's knee from the back and Hakram took off her hand, the two of us stepping out of the Prince's blow as Ranger killed the Hawk's arrow.

The Prince rushed me and I withdrew, leg throbbing, as Hakram smashed the Mantle's side and my staff trailed along the water. A trail of Night slithered until my back was to a pillar and the Prince of Bones' hulking shape was mere feet away, not even bothering to use the sword to crush me. Instead I smiled and turned the Night solid, the nooses I'd attached around his feet solidifying around a pillar to his back. He ripped through it with his weight and momentum even though I'd tied it at the base, but I still got what I wanted: he toppled forward even as I took a measured step to the side, helmeted head smashing into the pillar in front of him.

"O Sve Noc," I prayed as I raised my blade, "I ask you not salvation but grant me spite."

The Sisters smiled against my neck, talons digging into my shoulders, and the edge of my sword shone black as I carved into the Prince's neck. Going through layer after layer of steel until my momentum was gone and my sword stuck, I ripped it clean at angle that sliced even deeper. All the way through. A kick sent the Prince of Bones' head tumbling into the water, but the Scourge still leaned on his sword to get back on his feet. Unmoved.

That was when I heard the scream and the music stalled.

I looked through Night, seeing Vivienne crumple to the ground behind the Hawk as spikes of rim tore through her back. She turned to flowers, but the Hawk turned and shot a black arrow into them. She turned back into her true form, writhing and with an arrow through the stomach. I ran, leaving the Prince to rise behind me, and ducked under the Mantle's swing as Warlord finally hacked through her arm. The limb and weapon dropped, but she touched his burnt plate and it shrivelled as he let out a roar of pain. I could see Indrani firing at her so I kept running past them, my dead eye watching as an unraveller went right in the stump and the Mantle lit up before dropping like a stringless puppet.

The Hawk nocked another arrow as Vivienne tried to get back on her feet, bleeding badly, and I tossed a ball of hast spear of blackflame at the Scourge. It moved only just enough to get out of the way and I had to close my eye as a burst of lightning fell on my head – only to veer off at the last moment and smash into the Hawk's side. She dropped twitching in the water as Vivienne ripped the arrow clean and staggered to her feet, leaning against the pillar. Only Hakram screamed behind me, because the Tumult had prepared two spells. A whirlwind of ice and water swallowed him whole, throwing him at the ceiling even as I got to Vivienne a laid my hand on her side. Masego would have to catch him, I was busy.

Night stemmed the bleeding, but I couldn't heal. I couldn't get her through this. No poison, though, I realized with a sliver of relief.

"Hide," I ordered. "And get to Masego."

She nodded, shivering. Movement at the edge of my vision caught my eye but it wasn't the Hawk getting out. It was, I realized with horror as a streak of sleekness broke the surface, an arrow. Somehow the Scourge had been able to use a bow from underwater. I froze, seeing how it would punch into my stomach, but knowing that if I moved it would kill Vivienne for sure. That wasn't even a choice. I pulled on Night, knowing it'd be too slow. It might save my life, if it wasn't poisoned and- scarf trailing behind her, Ranger's longknife shone green as she cut through the arrow. If she were still the Archer, I dimly thought, she wouldn't have made it in time. The arrow shattered and I shaped the Night I'd gathered into raw heat, throwing at the water.

It turned into trails of vapour, revealing a scalded Hawk, and in a heartbeat Indrani was on the Scourge.

At a distance, bow in hand, they were a match for each other. But the Hawk avoided fighting up close for a reason, and Indrani was no longer the Archer. The first blow cut through the bow, the second took three fingers and an eye. The Hawk stepped back, trying to make distance, but Ranger moved smooth as silk: a step turned into a beautiful thrust, the longknife piercing the Scourge's throat. All the way through. It wriggled, still moving, but with a simple pivot she struck with her second blade and the Hawk's hooded head went flying. It was a victory, one she had craved for years now, but there was no time to celebrate.

"Get the Tumult," I ordered.

I let Vivienne stand on her feet, waiting a moment to see whether she'd collapsed before moving away. Hakram was duelling the Prince of Bones again, and their blades were so swift they were a blur to the eye. He should have folded, crumpled under the Scourge's strength, but I could see it in him. A rising tide of red, the heat and anger he had only learned to taste after he embraced the people he'd never thought of himself as part of. Rage, his soul sang, the aspect bolstering strength and limbs. It would not fail him so long as he remained in the throes of the red, ever rising until it burned itself out. I went for the Prince's back, gathering Night, when there was a crackle of lightning and Ranger let out a scream. I looked through eye and saw she'd struck at the Tumult only to hit a shield of lightning, a trap already laid.

Masego ripped it down and I focused my Night again, but in that heartbeat of distraction the other fight turned: the Prince's sword came down and Hakram's leg was cut clean through. It was steel, though, prosthetic, and even as he fell Warlord lunged for his enemy's throat. I shouted and dragged back the Scourge's sword arm with tendrils of Night. Yet even as Hakram began tearing inside the Prince's armour with his hands, death and steel on death and steel, the other hand picked him up by the neck and smashed him into the floor.

There was a loud, horrifying crack.

His spine. That'd been his spine. Warlord twitched on the ground as the Prince of Bones ripped out his arm, the steel limb and a great boot rose. I unleashed a torrent of Night at its back, beginning to topple it but not nearly quickly enough.

"No," I screamed.

"Ruin," Hierophant hissed, face red with fury.

The aspect he had meant to keep for the Dead King rippled through the air and struck the Scourge like a hammer blow. The giant mass of steel creaked, then metal screamed as it began to crumple like cheap tin. The Prince of Bones fell apart, limb by limb, until the all the layers slid off and all that was left was a pile of naked, twisted bone. It moved feebly, twitching, and the Warlord's dead hand, the only part of him that was not trembling, closed around his neck. He dragged it close, roaring as the last of his Rage burned and the orc's fangs tore through the Scourge's spine. It stopped moving. He did not, still twitching uncontrollably.

I pulled Night to me, the air cold and clear, and watched through an eye as once more Indrani tripped a defensive spell and was thrown back. The Tumult, the sleeves of its robes ripped off and the bones of it fresher than the rest, went still for a moment. Its eyes burned red, then it poured all it had left into a streak of three spells. Masego killed the first, unhesitating. I drowned the second, a rain of ice shards, in a well of darkness. The third was a sharp gust of wind meant to kill Hakram on the ground, and Hierophant flicked his wrist to make a shield in the way. And the wind stopped, but a small dot of darkness went right through. A curse. The Dead King had leant a hand.

I loosed a burst of Night at Hakram to push him out of the way but it only clipped his shoulder. It didn't move him enough. And none of us were close enough, Indrani's arrow was too far, and as the dot of darkness hit his scalp it was caught. Half of it, I saw with excruciating precision through eyes of Night, was caught by pale fingers as Vivienne Dartwick threw herself forward. Both of them seized up, but where he went utterly still she burst into a storm of flowers. Blood red, like the song, and they fell all over him. He was, I saw, still breathing. My eyes, all of them, turned to the Tumult and in that moment I saw the truth of it.

It was stitched together from the souls of many mages, but one of those souls had been the foundation. It was released at Hainaut but traces of it remained, like sutures for the Scourge, and they were everything. They were how the Dead King had made this creature in the first place. It'd been a necromancer, one, someone that could steal knowledge from the dead and use it. Those aspects were now the beating heart of the Revenant, what allowed it to exist. I raised a hand, gathering Night, and a streak of shadow formed above the Tumult. It was just an aspect, I thought. Gods, I'd been a fool.

"Silence," I harshly said.

And just like that the sutures disappeared. The souls began to pull every which way, the magic that'd been gathering breaking apart, and the Scourge stared blindly as the shadow deepened, expanded. Dread Empress Tenebrous massive leg shot through, crushing the Tumult like an egg with one of the most satisfying sounds I'd ever heard. I slumped to my knees as the leg withdrew, shadows fading behind it, and stayed there panting for a long moment. It was over. We'd won.

The song began to fade, exhaustion replacing it.

Sheathing my sword, I leaned on my staff to get back to my feet. Vivienne had taken human shape again and Masego was healing her, Indrani catching up to me as we limped to their side.

"What was it?" I croaked out. "The curse."

"I don't know," Princess admitted, face pale. "I just knew it'd destroy me if I remained me."

She was sweating and shivering. Too much blood loss, and despite Masego's best efforts that arrow wound refused to close completely. The Hawk's aspect at work, I guessed. The wound was fighting to be lethal. My eye moved to Masego for answers.

"It was a mind-killer," Hierophant said.

My jaw clenched as I forced myself to look at Hakram. He'd stopped twitching after being hit with the curse and would have looked like he was sleeping, were he not missing two limbs and his face swollen.

"How much of him remains?" I asked, voice choking up.

"I've contained the curse," Hierophant said, "and Vivienne took on half of it. If he wakes, he will have lost some memories but retain his faculties."

"If?" Indrani asked.

"I cannot promise he will," Masego admitted. "A healer in Light might do better, but I cannot."

Then he flicked a look at Vivienne, whose breath was laboured. Sweat poured down her face.

"You need one as well," he said. "You still have even odds of dying otherwise."

Ad the healers, we all knew, were behind us. While neither were in a state to move on their own. I clenched my fingers. Now that one song had faded, I heard, another returned in its stead.

"O Tiferet, where have you gone now,

Where went the song the river gave?"

I breathed out, all my eyes but one fading as I looked around us. This ruin of a room where only desperation and use of an aspect we had meant for the Dead King had kept two of the Woe form dying. And they might yet find their doom among these beautiful green mirrors, I knew, if I made the wrong choice. The cold part of me knew what should be done: whatever helped our chances of beating the Dead King. But I wasn't the girl I'd been at seventeen, savagely ruthless in defence of what I saw as a greater good. Indrani had once told me that in offering the Woe a hearth I had turned wild beats into tamed ones, but that sword cut both ways.

I wasn't willing to give the order anymore, not the one I should.

"Indrani," I said.

She looked like I'd slapped her, hazelnut eyes blazing with anger.

"You can't be serious," she said, "not when you're heading into a fight with-"

"It has to be you," I softly interrupted. "You know that. You're the one who'll get her there before she dies."

"I can't leave you to fight the Hidden Horror alone," Indrani pleaded. "What if..."

She didn't finish the sentence. She didn't need to. Masego limped to her side, laying a gentle hand on her wrist.

"She won't be alone, Indrani," he said. "I go with her."

"That's worse," she whispered. "I won't be able to protect either of you."

She set her jaw then looked away, drawing back from her touch. The look she gave me was unhappy but resigned.

"I swore to myself I wouldn't get like this," Indrani said. "I guess I'm not better than that, after all."

"I wouldn't be able to keep going if it wasn't you taking care of them," I told her.

"Liar," she ruefully smiled. "That's once today, Catherine Foundling. Don't disappoint me again by dying without me."

She helped up Vivienne and knelt, slinging Hakram's unconscious body over her shoulder. After one last lingering look she turned her back, heading for the stairs. I took a moment to steady my breath, Masego's solid presence at my side a comfort as I looked at the emerald grave where we had buried the Scourges.

"O Tiferet, where I gave love my vow,

Why have you become an empty grave?"

We shared a look and I nodded. Nothing more needed to be said: Hierophant and I hurried down the empty hallway, our footsteps echoing as we ran. We would get there in time, I could feel it. We'd be there for the end of the Dead King's story.

"Oh why have you become," Yara of Nowhere sadly sang, "an empty grave?"

ErraticErrata

Well, took longer to come out than anticipated but on the other hand I do believe it's the single longest chapter in the Guide. So enjoy 😊

Clacks

Just a little short, actually! You clocked in around 12k words here, while Interlude: Girl Without a Name broke 14k.

https://docs.google.com/spreadsheets/d/1AS_NUqXnK9Wn-GkF7bEBaDGXCbHZRaLZxX5eJQ_DU04/edit?usp=sharing

Also, AHHHHHH, SO GOOD

BargleNawdleZouss

Gods Below and Everburning, how did you put this together? More importantly, WHY?

Also, thank you, Clacks! 😊

Clacks

Heh, appreciate it. I'm a physics PHD student, so the closest I get to relaxing is obsessing over a /different/ set of data.

Mirror Night

That rather seems the norm for fantasy writers books and chapters tend to stretch towards the conclusion. I think its because its hard to know how much you have to conclude until you near the end. But you are a writer so you know best. The delays have been well worth it though delayed chapters have been absolute bangers. Keep up the good work and dont burn yourself out.

DC

Yeah this is basically two chapters of content and only your commitment to no stupid cliffhangers compressed it into one.

Cpt. Obvious

Can't be the single longest chapter, can it? I mean it felt like I had hardly started reading before it was over...

Looking at the clock however tells a different story.

Thank you for yet another riveting chapter that manages to bend time itself.

dadycoool

"Wait, how can I have spent over an hour reading without noticing?"

dadycoool

At this point, you have more than earned our trust regarding these late chapter releases. I think we all basically went "Don't worry, take your time."

Rey d`Tutto

Yep. It has proven worth it.

megaprr

Amazing chapter yet again... and I also want to toss in my voice into the 'no worries, take your time' chorus. It's always more than worth the wait.

Rey d`Tutto

D@mn!

Bittersweet Victory. Better than Pyrric, but all we can hope for at this point.

P Jay

It's an incredible chapter. Everything we could have hoped for out of Woe v Scourges. Thank you

Sugar Roll

It feels strange that for someone named the Wandering Bard, it took so long for us to actually see her sing.

Darkening

I believe she sang a bit of the girl who climbed the tower back in praes, though Catherine only heard a line or two as I recall.

Tenthyr

A Drakon behind, a lich ahead.

arcanavitae15

Lies and Violence

This gave me some much nostalgia this is as Cat said probably the last time the Woe will fight together before they go off and do their own thing. I really love their relationship and how far they have all come. I feel like this is the culmination of story arc of the Woe, and it was a good note to end on. They have all grown so much throughout the story and it was a wonderful journey to read.

Juff

Typo Thread:

stood on. > stood in.
Dozensof then > Dozens of them as he most > at the most favourited > favourite flow open, > flew open,
if it was to > if I was to Arrows and javelin > Arrows and javelins look who > look for who get as > get at along for > alone for fae to most > fae to be most could so > could do noised > noise invaders in > invaders into Soon l I > Soon I that have me > that gave me by hodgepodge > by a hodgepodge fasted > faster than she > that she dipped do > dipped to pretty the > pretty sure the anyone more > any more believe all we > believe we Sword are > Swords are it just > is just grooves a > grooves of a
The kept > We kept
This if for > This is for awat > away
it one more > it once more and to free > to free Nigh tot > Night to which stepped > which stopped Mantle's cursed > Mantle's curse with burst > with a burst at angle > at an angle spikes of rim > spikes of rime
the Dead King to rise > the Prince of Bones to rise of hast spear of > of a laid > and laid one, someone > once, someone Tenebrous > Tenebrous' face swollen. > face not swollen.
Ad the healers > And the healers, form dying > from dying wild beats > wild beasts

*arcanavita*15

I love how Nessie reaction to Lies and Violence was ,are they seriously doing this right now? AHHAha I giggled so much when I read that.

kjn

Thanks for the amazing chapter ♥

That was a Steven Erikson chapter.

Lord Haart

Peak EE and peak Erikson are definitely in the same zone. Bliss to read, and strikes the heart.

Probably the biggest difference is the perspective – I think first person is just harder to make as riveting so kudos to EE for making that really just not matter. Cat is a great character and I'm going to miss her once the story ends, no matter how it ends. But even already her journey has been incredibly satisfying.

Mirror Night

Makes sense DK let the Drakkon off the leash. It works better for him if he is not controlling the boss narrative wise...Drakkon Godshard feels very warhammer to me. Sent two Titans to fight Kreios as well.

As for Named final role call. Shame not to see the Blessed Artificer. Also I know they started with more Heroes then Villains but it feels they lost a lot more Villains then Named though the battles are still young.

Last dance of the Woe was epic. Kinda makes sense Viv and Hakram got the worst of it. They are kinda the weakest of the Woe. Nice to see Viv get to shine shame she didnt get to do more earlier though but that is an awesome Aspect, new aspects of late have been pretty darn fun and different. As for Indrani surely she gets to ride a sixth ranger plot now...and she is one the fastest characters in the series. So she should be able to catch up.

Pretty Epic

Joe Mama

I think it's natural that they lost more villains. Villains tend to burn out quickly by definition, even more so than most Named do, and they're filling a role here which goes outside their usual parameters (part of a Crusade with all the rules that entails) shunning some of the limited protection of their stories

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Damian Lucius Black

“Needing a second Boost to get ahead is an unforgivable sin for two professions: Reader and Writer.”

– Dread Emperor Terribilis II

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

BargleNawdleZouss

So much awesomeness! Worth the wait!

Open questions:

1. Status of Ishaq the Barrow Sword? I expected someone named “Deathless” to make it to the end. 😊
2. Status of the dwarves?
3. Status of Rumena? Is it a hidden knife for the end? Likewise for Ivah?

Sykomantis

No you’ve forgotten the most mysterious card we still have that could come into play.

Where is Larat?

Jernik

I think Larat is out of the plot. He’s gone, and the winner for it. If he came back into the story, I think it would be a big step back for his character. His entire motive was to escape the story, escape the threads of plot.

shikkarasu

May he forever be someone else’s problem.

Lord Haart

He could still come back out of choice. I can imagine him picking up the pieces of Twilight.

Frivolous

I'd be much more depressed and sad for Viv and Hakram if Catherine were not the Warden, and thus able to requisition Named healing on behalf of her friends.

Plus, you know, Catherine still has an undetermined aspect left.

dadycoool

Honestly, it felt more cathartic than anything else when Viv saved him. At least to me.

Crash

Beautiful. Poetic. Amazing. 10 out of fucking 10.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

That's the payoff of an arc you're feeling. The dynamics between any two main characters in a story like this might as well be additional characters in their own right. 😊

ohJohN

When she caught the spell, I really thought she was about to lose her hand to save Hakram's life – a full circle from him sacrificing his own hand for her sake all those years ago 🤔

shikkarasu

It was still full circle, I think. She didn't lose it, but she judged him worth a hand.

Daniel E

DK shows us what happens when a proper old-school Villain takes the 'Evil Overlord List' to heart. (look it up, it's a fantastic read). Also, Kreios vs. Titans; I'm kinda confused. Did one of them create a sun, then the other uses time magic to collapse the star? Wouldn't a black hole existing for even a nano second be enough to sunder the continent? Regardless, I am psyched beyond words to see DK in his throne room.

dadycoool

That's exactly what happened. I'm guessing Kreios made a magic bubble to localize the whole thing, but a black hole can only have as much gravitational force as the star it was born from, plus anything it eats. If the magic star didn't have any gravity, then its corpse wouldn't either. If only the actual light and heat existed, then only the darkness and cold would exist.

edrey

Lies and violence, i couldnt stop my laugh, when a read that. a masterpiece.

the memory problem is nasty, but the good news is that hakram and viv still have aspects yet to form, that can help also, i was expecting the aspects that cat had collected from named and revenants, she should have lots of them. now is the time to use them.

so counting, there are three points, cordelia and the ealamal, the drakon and the titans, and the death king battle. the wait is too much for me.

Remy Toh

Prediction : Cat will be fettered to the Dead King and Akua will take her place as head of the Cardinal. Wandering bard will be killed by the Severance.

Rey d`Tutto

Nope.

Warden delegates like a Warden do.

She has yet to Sentence anyone.

Dome Zasrekh

Bind the Bard and DK together and get rid of them both? Pls.

Hargabga

For all the vile stuff Yara did, that's really really cruel.

Dome Zasrekh

I have no mercy for the enemies of great ships! For Roland, they will burn!

badatgames2911

For Roland, Robber, Taric, and all the others we lost to this war

ohJohn

That's a strategically disastrous solution: the Fetters only impose the restriction that either party's exercise of power requires the consent of the other party, and the Bard has been very clear that she wants DK to eat the baby.

Maybe he'd block her from all fuckery out of (justifiably) paranoid self-preservation, but it sure seems like she'd be happy to rubber-stamp any and all atrocities he might want to unleash. It only works if whoever is chained to DK would never, ever, EVER let him do anything, like Akua or Cat.

Liliet

Bard has been very clear that she wants DK to go ahead and take a swing, that doesn't mean she wants him to succeed. Assuming they're strategic allies because one has been goading the other does not sound anything remotely like right to me.

Crash

This is true, but it does mean that she is willing to let him act if and when that could be useful for her end goals. Namely, preserving the status quo. Or possibly, setting him up to take the fall. Whichever it is, plan is still somehow unclear.

Random younglings trying to shake out the system and bury the Age of Wonders? DK, please eat the baby.

Need a villain to get a band of heroes going? Alright, you're allowed some necromancy as a treat.

Setting up a plot that will take centuries to come to fruition? Yo, Neshamah are you up for a spot of murder this weekend?

While the Bard does not seem to want DK to win, she also doesn't quite want him to lose. Not in this way, anyway. She would likely be willing to loosen his leash every once in a while under the correct conditions.

Liliet

I read her differently.

Sinead

Even without Yara's will, it could be that they use her Role to bind her to not let out the Dead King. Basically she has gone rogue based on a technicality, but the Fetters cut out her loopholes, so she is left with being an anchor on the Dead King.

shikkarasu

I do, too, but I have to agree with the point that she might let him have some slack.

I think she opposes him and, as a result, they are already fettering each other after a fashion. DK even went on to call Cat the third of his kind, implying that Bard is his equal and opposite. I also think she feels like the the knot between them is a noose, and is willing to go to unconscionable extremes to get out of it.

Let me be very clear: I sympathise with the Bard, but that doesn't mean she is a good candidate for stewardship. She can't take any more and, frankly, doesn't deserve to. I think Cat will wear the Fetter as Warden of the Dead and name Akua head of Cardinal, but I hope she finds another way so she can have a proper retirement from all this crap.

Liliet

I don't think Cat is a good candidate. It's not her story.

I've been enamored with the Cordelia option. She has/wants NO powers and is about as incorruptible as it gets.

Crash

Honestly I can't get a read on her. At any given time I'll be juggling three different opinions on what she's doing.

I've accepted that the Bard just is.

ohJohn

Sure, she's an excellent liar and her goals are still fairly opaque; it could easily all be a plot to kill DK, or something else entirely. I don't think they're particularly strategically aligned, or that she'd definitely hit the "OKAY, I'LL LET YOU EAT THE BABY" button on the Fetters, just that:

1) Why take that risk, on the off chance she actually is cool with DK killing everybody? Why would you ever give that button to someone unless you're extremely sure they will never hit it?

2) Especially if they've already hit a previous "EAT THE BABY" button?? It's very plausible that her original baby-eating speech was just 5D chess, but – on principle – I personally would keep anyone who has endorsed baby-eating far, far away from any & all decisions regarding babies.

3) At the very least, that she encouraged DK to take a swing in the first place – even if she never actually wanted him to win the war – shows that her goals can be very orthogonal to the GA's, and that she doesn't balk at using mass death to achieve them.

It would be neat to kill both birds with that stone. But if everybody's lives depend on someone holding a button and NOT pressing it, there are just so many candidates more trustworthy than the ancient inscrutable monster who stopped valuing the lives of others millennia ago (and has said + done some troubling button-related things in the recent past).

Liliet

I'd say there's way too much last minute plotting/revelation of plotting to go through to say anything for certain right now wrt all this ^^

ohJohn

tl;dr: there are like 2 people on the continent who have expressed pro-baby-eating sentiments; even if one of them might not be super serious about it, maybe literally anybody else should hold the key to the babies

Liliet

i mean that IS a good point

Shin_Splinters

Did anyone catch what the Tumult was stitched out of?

Great chapter, the Practical Guide never disappoints. Also Hakram is becoming a full blown cyborg.

aurikdomi

Several mage souls, the primary one of which was the necromancer mentioned in this chapter.

ohJohn

Technically, he became less of a cyborg in this chapter: he didn't lose significant parts of his flesh, but he lost a lot of the prosthetics 😊

Mincheriit

The limbss ripped off this fight were already prosthetics so hes not getting anymore progress to being a magitech cyborg unless he gets some head tech to help him with the curse after effects or extra bits from replacing the lost prosthetics i guess.

dadycoool

The Final Dance of the Woe was everything it could've been. The entire story of the Woe was leading to this moment and, while not everything went right, it was definitely a successful culmination of their individual, mutual, and collective Stories. Trying to analyze it would probably take all day, but first there's Masego setting aside his well-thought-out plan for someone else's sake, Hakram embracing his heritage, understanding that it wouldn't ostracize him from his friends, Vivienne diving in front of danger for him, Cat making a choice for the lesser good and sending away what might be her most powerful weapon so Indrani can get the two to safety, and Indrani letting herself be soft, fully abandoning the former Ranger's teachings. We can go a lot deeper than that and there's far more to analyze, but I'm gonna stop there.

"You're really doing this inside?" That was great, that the girl who shot off fireworks just to see what would catch fire grew up to be the most reasonable user of eldritch powers out of her friend group.

"Where'd the Titan go? It's not like we can simply LOSE the single tallest living individual on the planet. Oh, there he is...I have no idea how he's doing, so I'm gonna ignore him."

badatgames2911

Viv you have a good track against other sneaks but you gotta stay away from folk who throw magic around girl its just not working.

Hakram my guy you gotta stop getting injured like that. I was reading this and my thoughts went "no please don't die like Nauk did. Don't rip out the throat then bite it man pleaaaaase.

Good work Zeze unfort on the aspect but solid still.

Idrani you did good too but i gotta say your track record of running at magical barriers protecting mages controled by the young king is kinda sloppy.

Good show cat solid all around.

Crash

Well, he ran out of limbs to lose. It had to be his head this time, eh?

Adrian V

I haven't finished yet but i have to ask where was the last time (or even first) that the motto was mentioned or even discussed? The fact i forgot the motto made me realize just how long it has been since the band has been really together.

Also am I the only weird one that when reading about the Titans brawling imagined Kreios suplexing the other 2? Or something out of Kinnikuman?

Also I didn't like the witch saying whatever the cost, she should just said "i will stop it" and leave it at that, now fate is almost certain to kill her and gods know what else it will cost for certain.....unless the Herald surfaces with some of his new little friends xD

ruduen

First time I could find: Chapter 31, Book 3

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/13/chapter-31-high-noon/>

"So we're going to stab a god," I said. "I mean, we've done it before. But this one is a few places higher in the pecking order of things not to trifle with."

Archer snorted.

"But we'll win because we stand for something greater than ourselves?" I gallantly attempted.

"We do?" Apprentice asked, surprise. "What?"

"Violence," Archer suggested.

"Peace, order and the Imperial way," Hakram offered, the filthy traitor.

"We lie a lot," Masego mused. "It could be lies."

"Lies and violence," Archer proudly called out, raising a fist.

Apprentice did the same, apparently under the impression this qualified as a battle cry. I refused to grace the mutiny with a response.

"Just don't get yourselves killed," I sighed. "I don't want to have to train up replacements."

Rey d`Tutto

Lies and Violence solved many of their early problems...

CGundlach

Interestingly Cat brought this unto herself in the intro narration of that chapter:

>Now, in my experience planning the ending of a lesser god required three necessary steps. The first of them was, naturally, lies. [...] The second step was a certain proficiency for violence, [...]

badatgames2911

i feel like WotW is best suited for drakon slaying bc she has magic taught to her by our resident titan

Jason Ipswitch

It wasn't until I read your post that I realized Witch of the Woods abbreviates the same way Wizard of the West would. A name that has existed in the past, but we've never seen in the "present" of the Guide. I wonder if Antigone has occupied the role traditionally filled by the Wizard, which is why we haven't seen one emerge?

Darkening

The wizard was a callowan name, tied to the callowan tradition of sorcery. The name hasn't popped up because black did a remarkably thorough job eradicating callow's traditions and making new mages learn the imperial way, in a specific effort to kill the name. Given Vivienne's likely to revive at least some of old callow's traditions in an effort to rebuild their individual identity separate from the empire, it's entirely possible one will crop up as the queen of callow's magical advisor. Masego being the go to mage for both cat and Vivienne presents another stumbling block for the Name I suppose, since he fills a lot of the role for callow's royalty that the WotW typically would.

ruduen

Wow, there's a whole lot to process. Quite a chapter!

There are a few silver linings and unused shots waiting to fire, so as rough as it is, there are still paths to the end. The Witch of the Woods is probably the best remaining shot against the drakon – "Student finishes a mentor's unfinished task" is a strong story, though it's likely diluted by Kreios still being alive and the drakon only being revealed so recently. The Woe were bound to have some luck – "Holding off the enemy so others can get the job done" is a strong hand to play. They had their moment early, so the Dead King has disarmed the Woe coming together one more time for the final battle, but since they didn't all dramatically die in their task, that means that the remaining ones who advance should make it in time for one more dramatic contribution. Hanno still hasn't actually fired off his last aspect, and Cat still has one undeclared aspect waiting for the climax. Both 'weapons' to use on the Dead King are still in play. And since the Augur left a note for Cordelia, there's at least one more reveal waiting in the wings.

There are few notable 'challenges' remaining, though since it's the final pieces, there's a good chance a few more surprises will await everyone. It's now a matter of if they can be overcome, and if the remaining threads can be tied together to form an end. After all, the Dead King still remains for the final boss, and the Wandering Bard is still around to be the secret boss, and neither are the type to make it easy.

Xinci

The Drakon is an extremely interesting case of observing Demon-like qualities held by a Creational entity. Gives definitive implications for the history of the argument when coupled with its probable "descendants" in drakes, wyverns, 9 year snakes, possibly those spirits of fire underground, nameless eidolons, and dragons. I wonder if this Drakon could eventually spawn further subgroups if exposed to the right series of bindings and restricting stimuli.

Vivienne getting Trick, definitely feels like the "Fox Queen" route that Catherine was sort of going on is getting reinforced. Helps that she was trying to make sure her Callowan successors would be narratively canny too, and what better way than to be able to observe and iterate on your enemy's tricks?

It looks like Yara may be getting a rather amusing inversion of Cat's plan for the Dead King. He sought immortality, but to her those Fetters may be a way to attain death, or at least rest. Creation is as ever a viciously ironic place.

As a sidenote I am quite curious if Concocter might use the Drakon essence fragment, or at least learned qualities from it to help heal Hakram. Drake blood was noted as incredibly mutagenic but considering the Drakoi and the Drake Knight it seems to be that the healing factor is correlated to that quality. Maybe we can end up avoiding a similar situation to Nauks mental damage.

Adrian V

Good thing i commented before the big fight, and that i can say that after the Drakon was presented tells us just how OMG this chapter was.

Vivviene's Trick made me realize why she really fits Princess so well (apart from the old truth of Nobles being legal thieves): think on just how many Disney plots have to do with Princesses sneaking around, lying and hiding their identity, it suddenly makes so much sense.

Rey d`Tutto

Princess is a Transitional Name...

Kletanio

Right. When a Queen does it, it's "Deceive"

Adrian V

No its taxes

BargleNawdleZouss

So sad to see the Blade of Mercy as a Revenant! Antoine would have (is?) hated that.

With that in mind, which of the Grand Alliance's Named who have fallen against Keter are we likely to see in the DK's throne room for the showdown before the showdown?

vexingvision

My guess is on Hanno, in a perverted twist of the most ancient tale of them all: good Vs evil.

Mirror Night

I don't see why that be interesting at all unless you just hate Hanno.

Not to mention I don't even think DK could use any of Hanno's abilities.

DK revenants cannot use Light, Recall is unlikely to work, Save would even it apply to DK? I suppose he get mileage out Hanno's Reality Warp but presumably Hanno would have already used it. So unless it resets DK is not getting anything out of that.

I mean maybe Barrow Sword and Blessed Artificer they are the Named we have got the most of that are MIA.

Crash

So, according to Cat this has to be solved in the next hour.

How many chapters would that be? We're very close to the end and I must admit I'm not quite ready for that.

Anyway, the next chapter should (hopefully) be an Interlude so we can see the others arriving in the throne room and what they did while the Woe fought. Else Cat's just gonna kick open the door and find a couple bodies on the ground and that's no fun.

agumentic

We're supposed to hit the ending this month, so in theory, no more than three chapters, since we also supposedly have two epilogue chapters. Still, we will see how that'll pan out.

Rey d`Tutto

Of all of the webserials I read, yours is my favourite. Consistently. Thank you.

ninegardens

Welp... The final Scourge fight was everything I had hoped it would be. Zeze just pulling out an aspect and wrecking the prince of bones made the Prince feel weak sauce for a second, and then Cat is like "We were saving that for the Deadking. We were saving that." and suddenly it feels right.

DK spent his band of five, but burned off 3 of the woe, and one of the most dangerous aspects arrayed against him so...not a great trade, but not a terrible one.

BargleNawdleZouss

Aha, so you're saying the Dead King is Dyatlov from HBO's "Chernobyl" miniseries? 😊

vexingvision

After hundreds of chapters including pitched battles and suspense-filled action sequences, you still manage to keep every single one of them interesting and exciting and usually oh so satisfying without them feeling like a repeat.

That is mad skill – I usually skip lengthy fight scenes in books. I always look forward to these.

TheFatOne

And so we have the true final beat of the pattern of three that is 'Orcs Cat relies on losing firmness of body and mind to a dire foe'. I thought Hakram's maiming by the Severance was the third one, but this is much more clear.

For reference, the other ones are Nauk to Summer flame, a defeat, and Juniper to Praesi treachery, which I'd consider a draw. Here's hoping Hakram is a win?

Sykomantis

I don't think Princess's new aspect is Trick, like some others here seem to think it is. My guess is she just got Adapt. But it doesn't help her if she can't survive the trick the first time it hits her, so maybe the next one will be Endure or Persevere. But that only leaves a single choice for the third aspect: Overcome.

shikkarasu

No, it's is definitely Trick. Adapt is a solid option, but she loses the connotation that she then uses the Trick. As for the rest, she has never been a tanky Named. It isn't her thing. I expect social Aspects along the lines of whatever Akua had as the Heiress. Sway, Inspire, Discern, things like that. She's been focused on diplomacy for too long to be a front liner.

ohJohN

∞/10, EE, I genuinely don't know how you so consistently knock it out of the park.

[3 pages of excited, unintelligible screaming redacted]

Anyway, a small nitpick that gave me an excuse to research lore:

But the Forsworn Healer presumably went ahead with Hanno while the Woe fought:

I dug around for past references to him and: he's a hero, can use Light, and Tariq implied he was a stronger healer than the Stalwart Apostle – the only other Named Light-healer confirmed to be at the spire.

He seems like the best chance to heal Hakram's spine/brain, and since he's up ahead Indrani could both escort her friends to a healer AND stick with Cat & Zeze – though I'll concede it's probably not a great idea to bring two people on death's door to The Ultimate Showdown (not least because it's likely FH will be extremely busy already 😬). On the other hand, I don't expect the drakon has been slain yet, so heading back to SA carries a lot of those same risks, and it'll be hard for Indrani to sneak by that fight with 2 passengers to look for a regular priest... Hmmm.

shikkarasu

We also know that spine injuries can take weeks/months to heal. (see Baroness Kendal's botched assassination while Cat was in Arcadia) Not to mention his Prosthetics need to be rebuilt. Vivian is also fighting the Hawk's killing Aspect and just not a front line fighter at the best of times. Even a Named healer might not get them on their feet in time to keep fighting, so instead that would tie up Forsworn Healer and/or burn an Aspect for no appreciable/reliable gain.

Keeping Healer focused on the forward crew is the best option in this case. No-one other than Cat and Zeze have an unresolved story with the Dead King, anyway, so it's just the safest play.

Cambyses

What happened to the Barrow Sword? I don't remember him dying but he doesn't seem to have made it to the final 16.

Darkening

Man, vivienne really took a level in badass after becoming the princess, eh? I think it was mentioned she was training with her knights but that's quite the step up in capability. Sad that it looks like she won't get a chance to Yoink the dead king's soul or something. Truly that would have been the strongest aspect ever known.

lenethren

This is an amazing chapter. Beautiful in so many ways. Thank you again for sharing this wonderful story.

jack

Christ, leave poor Hakram alone. He doesn't even have any limbs left.

ohJohN

But it's slavery too, to spend your live lashing backs, the Hierarch had said, grey eyes burning. Just a different kind, and you can't escape it any more than they can. And so the thought occurred to me, perhaps the most terrifying of them all, that I should be asking myself a different question.

This felt particularly important, possibly the deepest insight Cat has had on Yara's motivations yet.

I've seen the theory for a while now that maybe WB just wants to die (especially after her post-Arsenal resurrection), but I think this lends it some more weight. And with the ealamal + Cordy + the note still left unresolved, how big a plot point learning that the Bard could guide angelic power was, and her taking Judgment offline the day of the final assault, I think the ealamal has to figure into the resolution of her story.

What if she's trying to force them to fire the angel nuke so she can set it to "kill Yara" mode? (Agnes's note is just, "do it, Cordelia, get her out of your hair" 😁)

shikkarasu

Ooooh, and then there is a vacancy for the role of 'immortal being that keeps the Dead King in check', lending weight to the Fetters. I actually really like this read.

Valentin R

Guys does anybody knows how many chapters left, till the end of the final book?

badatgames2911

Harkram, adjunct to catherine foundling, officer if the 15th legion, becomes Hakram Deadhand, the Adjunct, the first orc with a name in centuries. He is both a battlefield asset to the Squire, said to move as an extension of her own body, and also a organizational and overall intelligence asset as well.

Masego, the Apprentice, son of Weska the Warlock, one of the best practitioners we see in the series, and frankly is one of the most first horrifyingly powerful people we really see unleash.

Idrani the Archer, student of the Lady of the Lake, and the only one of the Woe who is mayhaps better than Squire at physical violence.

Vivian Dartwick, the Theif, a heroine in the Lone Swordsman's band fighting against Squire and the rest of the woe, joins the and becomes the Theif, a villain.

Catherine Foundling, a fighter in a underground pit, Becomes the Squire, apprentice to the Black Knight Amadeus.

This is the Woe at the start. A well rounded and powerful group of Named Masego is the first if the Woe to transition into his final* Name. The Hierophant, vivisector of miracles and breaker of gods. Masego was already one of the most powerful Named we had seen up unto this point, mayhaps being eclipsed by his father the Warlock, but Hierophant quickly shows that he us one if if not THE most powerful Named mage alive, especially after the death if Weska the Warlock. Even after his magic is taken from him and in a weakened state he is still able to lash out and threaten Sve Noc, proving his power. His ability to remain one of the best practitioners without the ability to use the gift unless he uses and aspect, WREST, lends to his ability.

Vivien Dartwick, formerly the Thief, looses her Name after maturing past her previous mindset and is shown to mature considerably, and become the heiress-designate of Callow. Also is the reason Hakram looses his other hand god damnit vivi.

Catherine Foundling loses the mantel of Squire, becoming the Duchess of Moonless Nights, her abilities in combat grow considerably, and she is able to regenerate from most attacks, including those made by the Saint of Swords and grey Pilgrim. She later becomes the Sovereign of Moonless Nights after the marriage of the King of Sinter and the Queen of Sumer. Her capabilities expand.

Catherine then ventures into the Underdark with Archer and they confront the Drow and their goddesses, Sve Noc. While in the Underdark Catherine loses her mantle over Winter in a bargain with Sve Noc and becomes the First Under Night, a priestess of Sve Noc and she uses the Night much as a priest uses the Light.

Most of the Woe remain the same for a long time here. It is well into the war with the dead king that Vivien becomes the Princess in a battle where she led a cav charge to save soldiers lives, it is notable that the Princess is a heroine once again. She is still the Princess at this point in the story even tho we know it is a transitional Name.

Catherine is the next to come into her new Name, becoming the Warden of the East. Her role lends her to being the conveyer and general boss of the Villainous Named, and as WotE she is meant to have a counterpart, the Warden of the West, the hero in charge of the Heroic Named. Catherine, however, judges the Claimants to WotW to be unworthy, and becomes the Warden, a Name that encompasses both heroes and villains. While Cat is still a Villain, it is said that the Name Warden could be either a hero or villain depending on who holds it.

Hakram Deadhand had been losing grip on some of his aspects and his name over all as the Adjunct due to multiple factors, and eventually becomes the Warlord over the orc clans Idrani was the last to transition into her new Name, becoming the Ranger in a fight against a Drokon that the previous Ranger Helyr Sue had fled.

Once again it is suspected that after the war when Catherine abdicates the throne of Callow Vivian will transition into Queen or some other similar Name. Hakram Deadhand has stated that he cannot remain Warlord because the Clans need to learn to function without him.

This is not a full analysis of the woe bc frankly i wont be typing that out on my phone in the comments but i just wanted to summarize some of the key points and benchmarks to see what we started out as unto now. I know i missed major events and plot points but like i said this is not a full analysis

letouriste

Just...is there a limit to what hakram will lose in this story? He nearly became a veggie 😞
Both in mind and body.

Chapter 67: And Justice For All (Redux)

“Learn this: all is finite, all ends. The only worthy act in existence is to seek the breaking of that fundamental truth.”

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

And up the spire we went, seeking the King of Death.

This was his last redoubt, the fortresses where he would find either end or victory, and so even though his greatest forces were all spent it was far from empty. Room after room stood filled with traps and troops, guarded by Revenants and closed by wards older than any living memory but the Riddle-Maker's. Yet none of troubled Hierophant and I as we climbed the spire, for the White Knight had led a company of Named through them and in their wake they left only utter ruin.

Traps lay ripped open, the bones of armies were strewn all over the floor and the keening remnants of wards torn through sang their dirge over the broken remains of the Revenants that had fought that unflinching warband. They'd gone through, I saw as I trailed fingers down the chord if them, like a hot knife through butter. Taking hits but never hard enough to be knocked down, trampling the Dead King's defences through a simple difference in weight. The heroes, after all, must reach the end of the story. They had to face the tyrant. Anything that stood in the way of that would be swept away like a stone fighting the current.

Yet as our feet hastened across the wrecks of defences that would have given even the finest soldiers of Calernia pause, I realized that one more Neshamah had played a trick on us. We had found the monster beneath the spire and then fought it at its bottom. The Scourges had waited for us after a mere flight of stairs, awaiting our deathmatch within the emerald grave. We'd stayed there, fighting and planning and hoping – thinking victory was in our grasp. And in doing so we'd been carefree in spending the one thing we were running out: time.

We were, at most, two hours away from annihilation. And that was if our armies held by some miracle, the finest of outcomes. In practice I expected we had half of that at most. The Dead King had filled his spire with traps and dead and sorceries, but they weren't truly his line of defence. That was, as it'd been since the start of this, time. It was the simplest thing in the world, so simple we'd overlooked it.

He would be waiting for us at the top of the spire, and it'd take time to get there.

I could see in the lay of battlefields when it had occurred to Hanno what was happening, the way he and the Vagrant Spear had started to strike forward aggressively. They had to be taking hits out of that, some wounds even, but with the Forsworn Healer among them they'd be able to stay in the fight. Ruin by ruin I saw as worry turned to haste and then impatience, the wrecks now reeking of Light as the heroes began to brute force their way through. It's what he wants, Hanno, I thought. To exhaust us before we get to him. Look at the defences he's built.

Traps that had to be dodged or broken, troops unimpressive but in large numbers, Revenants that'd need Light or aspects to slay quickly. Wards that were possible to break and overpower, but only if Named put their back into it. None of it was meant to stop them cold, the Dead King knew better than that. They couldn't be, he'd be fighting the story when trying. So instead he was grinding them down into exhaustion, flushing out all their tricks before they made it to his last throne room. The reigning king of attrition was up to his favourite game once more, ending his war the same way he had begun it. There was something almost admirable about that, I thought. There was no lie in Neshamah, no compromise.

The Dead King was true to his nature, horror that it was.

Halfway up the spire, I saw when the others made their decision. One of the walls was melted through, what had to be the Pyromancer's work and no small amount of effort. Through the opening I saw Keter sprawled out below. There were some traces of fighting further ahead, we saw, but it ended at a set of wards. Undead milled on the other side, looking confused. None of them tried to cross it.

"Not the Dead King's work, these," I muttered.

"The Grave Binder," Hierophant told me, looking fascinated. "Clever work. It prevents the dead from passing, but also from noticing it exists at all."

Which told me they'd not gone through here. Hanno had made the right call: they needed to fly up. Most likely they'd ridden the Skinchanger, she had flying shapes large enough to carry most of them at once. Might have been two trips, but with a strong enough vanguard it wouldn't matter. Fortunately, though we lacked a shapeshifter we were not without means to catch up. I limped over to the edge, letting out a sharp whistle as I stared into the falling ash, but she'd already been on her way. Zombie was a good girl, after all. She'd felt the need even before I did.

Great crow's wings scattered the rain of ash as glided through the air, casually evading a ballista bolt from far below as she turned and made straight for the hole in the wall. I hastily backed away, running into Masego, who saw the approaching hippocorvid over my head. We tripped backwards in a sprawl, Zombie landing in a faint clutter of hooves and slowing until she stood over the both of us with a faintly smug look. I was reluctantly impressed she could manage that with a beak.

"We'll talk about his later," I promised her.

She let out an unimpressed caw as Masego and I dragged ourselves back to our feet, dusting off. I sat the saddle without difficulty but Zeze was rather more wary.

"It is a necromantic construct," he reminded himself in a mutter. "Much more reliable than a horse."

Well, whatever helped him not throw up on my back. He slipped behind me awkwardly – the saddle wasn't really made for two – and closed his arms around my shoulders, though I did notice he stopped to stick himself to the saddle with a spell. Fancy.

"Why do these people keep building these enormous fucking towers," I complained. "One, just once, I would like a nice ground floor lair. No drops at all, just solid architecture without all the goddamn hubris."

On that cheerful note, I spurred Zombie onwards and she charged out into the emptiness. An old scream tried to bubble up my throat but I stubbornly kept my lips closed as my mount glided forward, falling into wide arc before she began batting her wings to gain height. We went around the spire, circling ever higher, until I suddenly pulled on the reins. Zombie went into a glid, cawing with confusion, and Masego stiffened behind me. I ignored both, my eye on the camp laid out below. It had not occurred to me, in the moment, what it meant that our armies were stranded in the inner city. They were cut off from our fortified camp, now but the opposite was also true and the armies of the dead were swarming our defences. In multiple places they had breached the palisades, the small forces left behind giving ground where they were not outright swept away.

And nowhere was the swarm thicker than around the ealamal, where I could see soldiers mounting a desperate defence from behind heavy wards.

Cordelia, I thought. In worry for her, but also of her. If her position was overwhelmed, if she thought the weapon was about to fall into enemy hands... No, I told myself. It wouldn't come to that. She would not pull the trigger until there was no other choice left, and it was my role to ensure she had one. I knew Cordelia Hasenbach. I'd known her as my opponent and then as my ally, and now I thought I might be coming to know her as a friend. And the woman who'd sat across me in Serolen, who'd called me vicious but meant it as a compliment, I trusted her. Either too much or not enough, I thought, but still I trusted her.

She would not fail me if I did not fail her.

I loosened my grip on the reins, leaving Zombie to begin circling upwards again. It wasn't all that hard to find where they'd gotten back into the tower: on level near the top was a ring of tainted glass windows and a few of them had been broken. There was no sign of fighting, but layers of wards had been broken through recently enough the shattered sorcery had not entirely collapsed. Exotic effects – swirls of colours, airless currents and some sort of golden translucence – lingered as Zombie plunged through the broken windows, trampling shards of glass.

I dismounted, helping Masego down and send off Zombie with an affectioned slap on the rump. Best she did not stick around when the greatest necromancer Calernia had ever known was so close. Like the forest of columns where we had fought the Scourges, the entire level was but a single room. It was all bare stone made into something eerie by the light filtering through the coloured glass, only the stretch where Hanno had smashed through forcing a slice of the world outside. There was a... stillness to this place that was uncomfortable to me, and even Masego seemed wary.

At the end of the room a set of elegant ivory stairs rose, leading at what could only be the spire's very summit.

I breathed out, settled my beating heart. While I could not hear any fighting from above, there was no doubt in my mind it had already begun. All that was left was for us to join it.

"Ready?" I asked, as much for him as to settle the last of my nerves.

"I have been waiting years now," Masego softly said, "to even these scales. To take... how is that your people call it, Catherine?"

"A long price," I murmured.

"Yes," the dark-skinned mage smiled, not a speck of friendliness to it. "A long price, and long have I waited to exact it."

Hierophant's Name settled on his shoulders like a cloak, rising to answer the will of the man who bore it.

"Today will be the day," Masego simply said.

There was no need for a boast, not when the words were spoken with such chilling certainty. Our footsteps feeling so loud against the stone, we crossed the room and climbed the pale stairs. Every inch of the ivory was sculpted, I saw, the work so fine and subtle I had missed it from across the hall. Each was a battle, a host of crusaders coming to take the head of the King of Death.

We stepped on their corpses on our way to his throne room.

After all the beauty and horror we had found within the Dead King's spire, I had expected to find a gripping sight awaiting us. Instead the immortal seat of Neshamah Be-Iakim was a bleak, barren place. A great hall of old stone, curved pillars rising from the stone tiles like ribs to hold up an unadorned ceiling. From tall rafters hung two rows of banners, none twice the same. I found the Fairfax bells and the Papenheim wall, Stygia's cranes and Praes' tower. Near every royal line of Procer, most of the great cities of Callow and even Ashur's crowned ships. Each the banner of a great house, a great host, and now all of them hung limp from rafters. Never to know wind again.

They all led to the end of the hall, the end of this spire and the Crown of the Dead itself. There sat the King of Death, atop a dais of four steps. It was a simple thing, his throne. The same black stone he had raised steles and towers in, the seat's back rising high until it ended in a crescent around the heraldry of the banner behind it. Ten silver stars set in a circle around a pale crown, all on deep purple cloth plunging down from the ceiling. It did not quite cover what lay behind banner and throne, a great gate of silver filigree depicting the lay of Creation and all surrounded it. All in never-ending movement, Arcadia and Heavens and Hells forever spinning around us in the void.

And under it waited the Hidden Horror, wearing the same body he has before he became either hidden or horror. Neshamah Be-Iakim had been pale in life, like one who saw too little of sun, and kept the tone in death. His hair was dark and short, his eyebrows bushy and his lips full. Neither tall nor short, he had a scholar's build and would have passed for one if not for his light brown eyes. In the dim of the room they seemed golden, as if to make up for the slim circle of bone he wore as a crown. His robes were simple, purple and pale, and as Masego and I set foot in his hall he raised a hand.

In a flutter a movement, a bird landed on his fingers. A sparrow, I saw. Long dead, for all that its feathers and lost none of their luster.

"Warden," the Dead King greeted me, then glanced to my right. "Masego."

Hierophant's jaw clenched. Feeling my boot touch roughness beneath it, my gaze dipped and I found that the stone tile beneath it was inscribed with a name. Prince Estienne Barthen, it read. My gaze swept the room, finding hundreds of tiles, thousands. Near every one with a name, but some kept empty. Waiting to be filled. We stood atop a graveyard of the braves who'd thought they could beat death, I realized. If we died today, would our names be engraved with the rest?

And where, in the name of the Gods Above and Below, were the others?

"Neshamah," I replied. "I've gotta say, your hospitality's taken a turn for the worse lately."

"Has it?" the old horror mused. "I had though my reception most fitting for the manner of guests you've been."

At my side Masego's glass eye was moving wildly under the eye cloth, the reason I was buying time with this idle talk in the first place. That the Dead King was letting me, was not a good sign. My friend stiffened, and I knew it'd be bad news before he even opened his mouth.

"Most of this hall is not in Creation," Hierophant evenly said. "It a hundred different realms, carved out of Arcadia."

Keter itself, I knew, had no mirror in Arcadia. No crossing point. We had thought that was because it had been annihilated, but now I was guessing otherwise. Masego, when possessed by the Dead King, had taken Liesse into a stolen shard of Arcadia that'd been severed from the greater realm. He used the same trick here, I thought, or something close to it. That was why we couldn't see any of the others, too. They were all in shards.

"So we can't get to you without passing your crucible," I mused.

The monster, the crucible and the pivot. I'd now found the second of the three. The old horror raised his hand and the sparrow flew away.

"You will find, Catherine," the Dead King said, "that there are adversaries beyond the teachings you so desperately clutch to even at his late, late hour."

"Might be," I smiled back. "But you know me, Neshamah: I've always been a little slow to learn my lessons."

The air shivered, and thirty feet in front of us a corpse dropped. A man, I saw in robes of gold and red. His trimmed beard and long hair were drenched with water, as was the rest of him, and the corpse looked swollen. Waterlogged. The Daring Pyromancer's cadaver stayed there on the tiles, rivulets of water slowly spreading.

"It does not matter," the Dead King replied, "for I am a patient man."

There could be no more waiting, I knew, lest bodies continue to drop. I turned to Masego, getting a nod, and without another word took a single step forward.

—

All I found was darkness.

I had grown used to night and Night over the years, but what awaited me inside the shard was not the same. It was not anything natural, not even the kind of darkness you found in the depths of the Everdark. Even there you could find something... real about it, a tangibility. A reassurance that you were in Creation. There was not a speck of that in here. It was not just an absence of light but of everything, not a single sensation to be found save for solid ground beneath my feet. No foe came for me, no blade was swung or curse woven. I had stepped into a shard of nothing, and as I wandered I learned the nature of the trap: there had been a way in, but I knew of no way out.

I could wander this place for an eternity and never find one.

How long did I waste, walking forward? It was hard to tell. Time was nothing here, far enough from Creation that even the gift of the Sisters had gone silent. I spread Night around me but found no boundaries, no limits, even though I knew that the shard must have them. Frustration mounting at how the very first shard I'd found was stumping me, I stopped and forced myself to calm. There was a way out, it was the way traps like this worked. It was just being kept away from me somehow.

"This has got to be the single most boring trap ever made, right?"

A voice I should not have been able to hear, not under the rules of this place, reached my ear. Even if I'd not known what Yara of Nowhere sounded like, I would have known who was speaking. Who else could reach me in a place like this? I spread Night around in thin tendrils, trying to find her, but the Intercessor remained frustratingly out of reach.

"That's not going to work," the Wandering Bard amusedly told me. "Besides, there's no need for it. I'm here to help you, Catherine."

I tried to tell her to fuck off, but no matter how much I moved my mouth no sounds came out.

"There's no need to be rude," Yara scolded me. "You're the one who ate my eyes, Cat, not the other way around. Surely we can have a civilized conversation."

It was not possible for Night to burn in this place either, I discovered to my mounting displeasure.

"Well, maybe not quite yet," the Intercessor admitted. "But we'll get there, don't you worry about it."

A soft, rueful laugh.

"We've got until the end of the world," she said. "That's plenty of time, as these things go."

She was gone a moment later, the faint traces of her presence vanished, and I forced myself to calm down. Whatever her game was now, letting her upset me could only help it. And, whatever she'd come here for, she had shown me it was possible to come and go from this shard. I still didn't entirely know how the Bard got around, save that it was bound to an aspect and dependent on Named, but that was something I could use. She was not the only one who'd learned to See stories. Opening my dead eye, I found the stars in the void that were the Named around me. Even the Dead King himself, at the end of the hall. From there, it was simply a matter of walking towards him.

The ground was shifting, I realized after only a few steps. Or maybe the shard itself did, because leaving Night hanging in the air hadn't tipped me off about the direction changes. The trap kept you contained by making sure you were never able to reach the edge. Something that couldn't keep me, not when I had a morning star in the distance to follow. It wasn't long before I found the boundary, laying a hand against it and feeling another shard pulsing on the other side. I worried my lip, pausing for a heartbeat. Did she put me on the path to figuring this out? No, I reminded myself, it didn't matter. The Intercessor had been so careful to obscure everything about what she really wanted that playing guessing games could only end in a loss.

I crossed into the next shard, blinking in discomfort at the intensity of a soft ambient light. It felt like the sun itself, after the last shard. I was standing in a cube, I saw, about a hundred feet long in every direction. The ground was featureless and the boundaries I felt ahead gave off a... hardened feeling compared to the last. Like I'd have to pry it open instead of cross. The only warning I got was the movement of air, for there was not a sound. I warily glanced up and though I was looking at a mirror until I realized it was water. A mass of it, falling down on my head.

"Fuck," I swore, pulling on Night.

My shadow lengthened, spread and swelled as I hastily guided it above my head. The water poured through into the nothing there, but it wasn't wide enough and on the sides the tide clapped down as I poured Night into the shadow to spread it even further. I was swept off my feet by the rebounding waters, armour and cloak and fighting me as I forced myself back on my knees while the tide reached my shoulders. With a grunt I finished it, turning my shadow into a veil that went from side to side of the cube and ate the mass of water that should be crushing and drowning me. Panting and drenched, I got myself back to my feet and waded through the water to the border of the cube. It'd be tricky, I knew.

There would be a moment between my shadow withdrawing and my crossing the hardened border where I'd be vulnerable. Taking a deep breath, I flattened myself at the bottom of the water for a semblance of protection and released the Night.

The boundary fought me, resisting the crossing, and something like a titan's hammer blow struck me from above. Before I could pass out, though, I got through with a scream of triumph. Which turned into a simple scream, when I was yanked forward into the other shard. Thousands of clawed limbs tore at my armour from every direction, looking for weaknesses as writhing bodies pressed against me. Horrifying screams and gibbering laughter filled my ears as I felt claws rip into my flesh even as I huddled together and drew on Night. There was no room to do more than wriggle: the shard had been entirely filled with thousands of devils, crammed so there was barely even room to breathe.

"Have it back," I snarled, and opened my shadow.

The tide I had just devoured poured out below me, the pressure crushing the devils like overripe melons as I scrabbled for the boundary I could feel ahead. It was a small shard, was meant to be. I'd only have moments until the water became my doom, reached and drowned me, but as devils pulled at the Mantle of Woe I crawled forward until my hand found the border. There were Named on the other side, I could See it, and so it was with a hoarse shout that I battered my way out. I fell through on my knees, bleeding from the cheeks and elbows where claws had found room in the plate, and landed wild-eyed in the middle of a fight.

The Vagrant Spear ducked under a spout of bright-red flame, the Daring Pyromancer risen a Revenant watching her with swollen bloodshot eyes as he guided his magic to continue hounding her.

There was power in the fresh Revenant, pulsing still, and it could not escape my eye when it had burned so bright. Raise, the power had claimed. It was the source of his power to make Revenants, I thought, but it was... rough here. Used in haste, a cruder form of his usual method. And already I could see the trace of the first aspect fading as another replaced it, though it was not yet clear. It related to rule, I thought, or perhaps sovereignty.

Rising to my feet, leaning on my staff, I saw that we stood halfway through the hall and that Sidonia and I were not the only one to have reached here. The Mirror Knight stood hunched behind his shield, and it was a mark of how unsettled I'd been after the last shard that I had not noticed until now. He was, after all, being drowned in magic. At the bottom of the Dead King's dais four robed skeletons were standing as they unleashed torrents of sorcery at Christophe de Pavanie. Red lightning crackled against the shield, turning to steam frost that kept burning before it could creep past the edge of it, and what appeared to be a blow of curses simply slid off like rain.

The only sorcery appearing to find purchase was rippling, transparent kinetic force trying to rip the shield out of his grasp and forcing the Mirror Knight to stand hunched as he fought the magic with brute strength.

"I do appreciate," I croaked out, "that you don't stop being fucking ridiculous even when we're on the same side, Christophe."

Reaching out with a tendril of Night, I slipped past him and grabbed the boundary of the shard he'd need to enter before getting any further. From the corner of my eye I saw the Pyromancer body swivel my way as he let out a shout in a language that rang in my ears, a snake of white flame erupting from his outstretched hand, but the Vagrant Spear moved in a blur and cut through it with her Light-wreathed spear. Focus never wavering, I pulled open the shard and to my mild amusement a storm of fire came exploding out. It smashed through the streams of magic and into the Mirror Knight, who stoically bore it and was merely knocked a few feet back. His stance never even wavered.

The magics were interrupted, though, and when the White Knight burst out of thin air with his armour smoking I knew the tide was tipping in our favour. Save, his soul sang out. Not the last aspect he'd come into, but he was leaning hard into it still. Enough that it obscured the other some, though not entirely to my lone eye. Recall had never gone anywhere, but the latest addition had my brow rising. Undo? It felt like the Grey Pilgrim's own Forgive, but there were... nuances. Not necessarily resurrection, it could be other things, and there was a limitation that Tariq hadn't had. Something particular to Hanno. Justice, I decided. He needs to be undoing something he believes unjust.

Still, what a goddamn terror of an aspect.

The Dead King apparently agreed the situation was beyond salvageable, as the Pyromancer let himself be impaled by Sidonia without batting an eye so he might finish casting a spell that shot out a small arrow of red flame. I wove Night and Hanno moved, the both of us intervening as the Grave Binder tumbled out bleeding from a shard. I pulled the villain down the ground, to his startled shout, and Hanno cut through the red arrow. It burst into small beads of red flame as it did, and while the White Knight drowned most of them in Light as I dragged away the Binder two survived. They exploded outwards, one catching the Levantine's right foot and turning it to ash in a heartbeat.

The Vagrant Spear sent the Revenant's head flying in the moment that followed, ending it.

Grim as the thought was, I could not help but think it'd hadn't been too bad a trade. The Pyromancer might have done a lot more damage if he'd been allowed to keep going. The fire shard I'd opened stopped pouring out flame as the boundary closed again, but smoke was still obscured out sight of the rest of the hall like a curtain. The four dead hadn't begun using magic again, though, which was something.

"Warden," Hanno called out. "Have we lost anyone else?"

I cocked my head to the side, turning and drawing on See.

"The Page is going in circles," I finally said, then looked forward.

My brow rose.

"And the Valiant Champion's already ahead," I said. "No one else died."

"Luck," the Grave Binder roughly said, hand aglow as he closed his rotting flesh around the foot he'd lost. "The shards ahead will-"

He was interrupted by the boundary to a shard bursting open, devils flowing out. We gathered together, the Levantine villain, hastily crawling our way, but the horde of twisted creatures flowed around us. Boundaries began popping one after another, tides of devils pouring out of them in mangled states, and even as beleaguered Named began to come out an honour guard of what looked like walin-falme formed. They bowed deep as Akua Sahelian walked out, her armour pristine, with Hierophant at her side. She stole the devils, I realized. She'd been caught in the same shard I did, or one similar, only she'd stolen them from the Dead King's grasp. And then she'd found Masego, using his eye to pick up more devil shards and navigate the maze to help out the others.

Of the thirteen people that had come to end the King of Death, the remaining ten now stood halfway through his hall. Only the Page was yet lost and the Champion still ahead.

"Apologies for the lateness," Akua drawled. "I was distracted by the appallingly bad taste in decorations."

"Also the shards trying to kill us," Masego hopefully added.

There was a moment of stupefied silence.

"See," the Forsworn Healer muttered at the Silver Huntress, "I told you it was awful. The colours of the banners clash."

I snorted.

"I don't suppose you could send your little friends forward to clear us a way?" I asked.

"I'm sure something can be arranged, darling," Akua smiled.

She idly waved and the chittering tide burst forth, flowing into the shards. I cracked the side of my neck.

"All right," I said. "Forsworn, can you do something about the Grave Binder's foot?"

The man eyed the missing limb carefully.

"I can," he said. "There is still ash on the ground."

"Good," I grunted. "The rest of us will pair up and go forward together."

I glanced at Akua. Much as I disliked admitting it, Masego was the most fitting partner for her going forward. As long as she had his glass eye, she could guide her devils through the shards to some degree.

"White Knight," I said, "you're with me. The rest of you decide on your pairs yourselves, and do it quick."

I caught Hanno's eye and he nodded. Even as the smoke began to clear, the two of us slipped past the boundary of the shard I'd picked out: the one that should lead us towards the Valiant Champion. Devils had gone ahead of us, but when we passed we found them floating impotently. I realized after a heartbeat that not only were we weightless but there was no air in here. Hanno kicked off the side of the sphere, looking to get through, as the both of us held our breaths. It was too large a shard, though, I thought. Fortunately, there was something at hand for me to use.

Night answered my will, thin tendrils of it shooting out to pierce through the devils that Akua's will kept from resitting.

Not all of them had lungs, but most of them had bellies and that was enough. I sucked the air out of them, bringing it to my mouth with another tendril and offering the same to Hanno. Though grimacing in distaste he accepted, and I used that same tendril to let him drag me to the other side with his momentum. He waited for me there and we crossed together into pain. He formed a shield of Light but my limbs were still trembling from the lightning that's truck me. Fuck. If I hadn't become the Warden, that would have had me down for the count. Even with my Name I could feel pain lighting up my every nerve. When the whiteness left my eye I saw we were in little more than a tube filled with lightning, which at least made it easy to reach the boundary. His armour was smoking again, but otherwise he looked rather unfairly fine.

It was easier with his help, even though unlike others we'd gotten ahead of the devils. The defence had not been built with two Named in mind, designed to isolate and stagger us. Akua had, with her devil trick, upended the Dead King's entire defensive strategy. We went through a shard that was a sphere full of blades and spinning – into my shadow they went – and then through another that appeared to be a pit where we endless fell but Hanno revealed through Light to be a ring of warped space simply pretending to be the same. From that we crossed into a box of crushing gravity, the closest either of us came to dying, but Name strength was narrowly enough to let us reach the other side crawling on our bellies.

I ripped my way through, landing on stone tiles as my bloody chin bruised, and barely had the time to see the ray of rippling frost burst my way. I rolled hastily to the side, knocking my staff onto the floor so Night would rippled out and disrupt the spell before it could hit me. It still iced the floor to my side and I slipped as I got up, landing on my knees and gathering the Mantle of Woe onto me just before the curse hit my chest. The magic slid off and I rolled to the side before the returning frost could catch me, rising to my feet even as Hanno crossed out of the shard. We were, I saw with mute surprise, near the bottom of the Dead King's dais. The Hidden Horror still sat his throne, watching us with something like boredom, but the Valiant Champion had already engaged what looked like his last line of defence.

She was wrestling with a massive silhouette that I thought, for a moment, to be the Prince of Bones. The shape... and yet it was not a Revenant, I realized. Stronger and larger than undead should be, but... it had not been Named while alive, and though it had the hint of it now it was because of the power burning inside it. I could see it clearly now, what I'd glimpsed in the Pyromancer. Reign, that was the aspect. Kingship over death, over undead. And as the word sunk into me I Saw the depth of it, what it meant. For a heartbeat Neshamah disappeared, turned into nothing more than a vague shape by the sheer number of strings that came out of him. Every single one binding him to undead, reigning over them.

A kingdom of one.

Someone uncorked a flask next to me and I stiffened, just in time for the Intercessor to offer me a grin.

"The third one's the real trouble," she told me. "Also, you should duck."

I threw myself to the side, for my instincts had been agreeing with her, and red lightning poured through where I'd just standing as I landed in a painful roll. The Bard was already gone, naturally. Out of my Name trance, I actually took in the full lay of the opposition. The four mage bodies from earlier were there and there was a second hulking silhouette resembling the Prince of Bones, which Hanno had engaged before it could flank the Valiant Champion. All the mages but one were looking my way, which wasn't a bad situation. If we could keep this up until the other started crossing, our odds weren't too bad. Mind you, the Dead King had yet to take the field himself. He knew, as I did, that he'd never be more powerful against us than in the moment he got up from that throne. It was to his advantage to delay that as long as possible.

"All right," I called out at the mages, rolling my shoulder as I drew deep on Night. "Let's see what you've got."

I wove Night and they came for my life. It was simple sorcery, what they used. The kind that every undead mage I'd faced in this war used – only brought to its pinnacle. The Dead King wielded them like a master painter playing with coloured chalk, a man at the pinnacle of his trade having a lark with children's toys. Red lightning curved as I tore through it with sickles of raw Night, looping and darting at me from every direction. I turned frost to steam only for it to explode in cutting shards, unwove curses only to find that like poisonous flowers blooming they every part turned out to have teeth. I gave ground, often and quickly, as the three dead mages methodically cornered me.

Red lightning turned into a spear blew a hole straight through the Mantle of Woe, hitting the side of my leg, but even as I fell and screamed the Skinchanger and the Vagrant Spear burst out of thin air along with a tide of devils. I felt the weight of Reign shift as I killed the pain in my body with a twist of Night, and in a heartbeat the devils changed sides again. The Skinchanger turned into some sort of large pale cat, leaping out of the way, and Sidonia's spear lit up again as she was forced to tear into her allies. I backed way, swallowing a burst of lightning into a circle of Night, and greased the floor under the devils to nudge thing the Vagrant Spear's way.

Her footing remained flawless even as they began falling, turning the struggle into a one-sided massacre.

The tide was turning again, I thought. Curses flew again, this time after Sidonia, but I stuck close to her and slammed burst of raw Night into the Dead King's elegant work. On the other side I saw the Champion's axe carve through one of the massive undead's arm, Hanno covering her side from the other. A heartbeat later the Skinchanger landed on the foe's back, turning into some kind of black tentacled creature that entangled its limbs. With a swell of triumph I saw the Silver Huntress and the Forsworn Healer cross, raising my staff to turn to shatter the lance of frost thrown their way. It exploded in shards that my lance of Night sucked in – I'd not fall for that trick twice – but then from the corner of my eye I caught something.

The Dead King was rising from his throne.

I went still in utter surprise. It made no sense, neither the Severance nor the Fetters were here yet and-

"Turn to dust," the King of Death ordered in Ashkaran, voice ringing out as he flicked his wrist.

The Forsworn Healer did. The spell had been little more than a grey sphere, and the moment it touched the hero he collapsed into flakes of dust.

"Honour to the Blood," the Vagrant Spear shouted, tone gone hot with fury, and she leapt.

I stood numb for half a heartbeat more, uncomprehending at how badly I'd somehow miscalculated – or he had. I might well have gotten my ribs crushed by a battering ram of rippling kinetic might had Masego not burst into sigh and Wrested away the spell, smashing it back into the undead mage's face and sending him flying. I drew on Night, sword in hand a running forward as Hanno abandoned Rafaella to face the two great dead alone – she was smashed to the ground but I saw nothing more – even as Sidonia leapt at the Dead King with her spear high. He caught her by the throat, effortlessly crushing it, but she appeared in a flicker behind him and-

And red lightning caught her in the side, just in time for the Mirror Knight to come out of a shard and catch sight of it.

He let out a hoarse scream even as the Grave Binder pushed him forward, rushing forward. Fuck, I thought. If he got himself killed... No, we had an opening. Hakram had once told me Christophe and Sidonia had some odd thing going on, and she'd just been hurt at the Dead King's hand without dying. He'd gotten up too early, too, and while more of us would die we could win this. He'd made a mistake, I told myself, even as a voice in the back of my mind reminded me that when a skilled enemy made an obvious mistake it was no such thing. Still I charged forward, ducking under a spike of ice and carving through the mage that did it as I kept running.

The Dead King didn't even bother to turn towards Sidonia, who was still wreathed in lightning, and instead he pointed a finger at Christopher. A thin, pale filament shot out. Roaring, the Mirror Knight kept on charging at the Hidden Horror with his shield raised but it was not him the spell had been aimed at. The filament punctured the Grave Binder's neck, sinking entirely into the flesh, and a heartbeat later he collapsed into a thousand small cubes of rotten flesh. I heard Akua shout and a shield erupted between the lightning and the Vagrant Spear even as Hanno and I went for Neshamah's sides.

I struck at a translucent shield, shattering it, even as the White Knight did the same – only for him to be grabbed by the neck and tossed to the side, while I struck at the Dead King's chest with my staff and slithered Night into his body.

"Arrogance," Neshamah chided.

The Night tore back out, striking me in the face and tossing me on my back. It'd turned cutting, somehow, tearing up my skin and ripping the eye cloth off my dead eye. I got back up in time to see three things happen in quick succession: the Mirror Knight unsheathe the Severance and strike in a choppy gesture, the Silver Huntress loose a Light-wreathed arrow and the Vagrant Spear strike at the Dead King's back. My heart leapt to my throat as the spear took him in the back of the knee and the arrow went through his hand, shattering the spell that'd formed there. The Severance shone, its swing perfectly arced toward the Dead King's neck as I met his eyes.

They were calm, considering. Not afraid in the slightest.

Right before the Saint of Sword's conviction made into a blade caught his neck, he turned and touched Sidonia's forehead with two fingers. Her own skull compressed, crushing her head from the inside, and she died even as the Severance took the Dead King's head. It went tumbling to the ground, the body collapsing, and surprised triumph stole all our breaths. Except I knew better, deep down. The dead hadn't stopped moving, and as Akua matched a burst of red lightning aimed at me with a pale mirror I watched the Dead King's twice-corpse twitch. The world shivered as Hierophant Witnessed the truth of it, but a wind blew from behind as something passed us by. Dimly I felt the shards of Arcadia being drawn between us the dais where Neshamah's remains were writhing, but that was not what drew my eye. The Dead King's last aspect was burning, lighting up to my own like a bonfire in the night.

Return, the Dead King laughed, and he did.

I closed my eye, realizing then what it was that the Hidden Horror was. Not just what Neshamah Be-Iakim had been when he became undead, but the story he had since become. A maker of armies and Revenants, he how Raised the dead. The sovereign of the Kingdom of the Dead, he who Reigned over death. And finally the unending menace that had been seared into the memory of Calernia, the great doom that would Return no matter how many crusades battered its gates. He wouldn't die, I grasped, because deep down most of Calernia didn't believe that he could. It wouldn't be that simple, in practice, there would be weaknesses and nuances.

But that was the story at the heart of it, and a story was a powerful thing.

When I opened my eye, we stood at the beginning of the hall again and the Dead King sat on his throne, a dead sparrow on his hand. The shards had pushed us back, returned us where we'd begun. Of the thirteen who had come to this last hall, now eight stood dazed around me. The Page, who had never left the shard where he was imprisoned, remained there.

"I don't understand," Christophe said, voice anguished. "You told me it would kill him."

He was looking down at the sword in his hand, the Severance laid bare. The sword was wavy to my eye, as if it cut the very air around it.

"Why does he still live?" the Mirror Knight demanded, eyes going to me. "What did Sidonia die for?"

And I didn't have the answer, but someone else did. My eye went to him.

"Hierophant?"

Masego stood there, frowning, and I had to clear my throat before he returned to us.

"The Severance did what it was meant to," Hierophant said. "It cut both his body and his soul."

"Then why did he not end?" Hanno asked.

"His soul did not disperse or move on to the otherworld," Masego said, "because it is otherwise bound."

Akua's twitch betrayed her surprise.

"He has made a phylactery," she said. "A soul receptacle."

My fingers clenched.

"His throne?" the White Knight asked.

"No," I murmured. "That's not the kind of man we're dealing with."

"Keter," Hierophant said.

"Where in Keter, Masego?" the Silver Huntress patiently asked.

I felt my stomach drop.

"Keter is where, isn't it?" I quietly asked. "It's the entire fucking city."

He nodded.

"After all," Masego said, "it is the Crown of the Dead. The name was more fitting than we ever knew."

"So he keep coming back until we destroy city," the Valiant Champion said.

Another nod.

"Then what does the Severance even do?" the Mirror Knight harshly said.

"It destroyed him," Hierophant informed him. "You did sufficient damage to disperse his soul. Only instead of moving on his soul remained bound to its anchor, and then something-"

"An aspect," I elaborated. "Return."

"An aspect," Hierophant adjusted, "ensured that it formed anew. The scar the Severance left is still there, the damage done was permanent."

"So the only way to destroy him is to destroy every single fragment of his soul with the Severance," the White Knight evenly said.

Which, he did not need to say, did not seem in the cards. Not only did we need to get to him through the shards again, but we were fewer, wounded and tired. And it occurred to me, in that moment, that he had risen from his throne the very moment the Forsworn Healer reached him. Immediately, without hesitation, and that his first blow had been aimed at the man.

The Dead King had never stopped fighting his war of attrition.

"We don't have the time for that," I said. "Even if we could, our armies will break first."

My eye slid to Akua.

"It will have to be the Fetters," I said.

Hanno grimaced, but did not argue. He knew as well as I did that we were out of options. I'd ordered Akua to tell them all of the Fetters on their way up, knowing it might come in necessary, and was now glad I had.

"I will take the other end," the White Knight said, volunteering for an eternity without hesitation. "Who will shackle him with the other?"

"Let me," Christophe de Pavanie quietly said.

Hanno blinked at him.

"Perhaps someone faster on their-"

"Let me hold up the other end of the leash," the Mirror Knight cut through. "Enduring, Hanno, has been my sole virtue from the start. Let me make something worthy of it."

The White Knight's face closed, as he hesitated, so Christophe sought my eye instead. I was, after all the Warden. I studied his face, the grief still on it, and decided that though grief over Sidonia had formed the decision it was not the sum whole of it. It was the consequence of the man he'd become, the one I had spoken with in the shadow of Keter before the end of this war began. And that man was, for better or worse, someone I would trust with imprisoning the Dead King.

"Give him the Fetter," I said. "I'll hold the other."

Hanno began to argue but I held up my hand. There was no argument to be had. That was the nature of sacrifice, wasn't it? Selfless and selfish all at once.

"Thank you," the Mirror Knight quietly said, meeting my eye.

"There are things for which I deserve thanks, Christophe," I replied quietly, "but this is not one of them."

I turned away when Akua pressed the ring of bronze and copper into my hand, pretty piece of torment that it was. She was looking at me, I thought, like she'd never seen me before. Did you think I would force it on you? I thought. It wouldn't mean anything, if it wasn't your choice. In the end she said nothing, leave me to give Christophe the second Fetter. I breathed out.

"We cross again," I said. "Prepare yourselves."

"It will not be the same," Hierophant warned. "He blended the shards before putting them back into place. There are fewer but they have grown in danger."

"Danger's our trade," I replied. "And he's not the only one with surprises left."

I sent Hanno to fetch the Page alone, but the rest of us went in pairs again. I took the Skinchanger with me, accepting her suggestion that I should carry her as a mouse. It was lethal from the start, with the first shard we stepped into a blend of the falling water and the lightning tube. If I'd not still had water from the first go we might well have died electrocuted, but crashing water on water bought us just long enough to crush. In my haste, though, I did not notice that the crossing separated us. I had no idea where she ended up, but I'd stumbled into a pitch black furnace. The fire was not difficult to deal with, simply requiring that I wreath myself in a coat of Night, but the darkness was.

Last time I'd used the Dead King as my compass, but this time he felt obscured to my eye. I found it difficult to See him, as of something was obscuring my sight. I'd have to wait for another Named to get ahead of me before I could figured out which way to go.

It was only inevitable, I supposed, that she'd come back then.

"Told you the third was the trouble," the Intercessor said. "Did you really think you lot were the first to ever get to him? Please, I nudged three crusades that way before giving it up as a lost cause."

The first dark shard had been a void where I could not even speak, but this one was different. It had been blended with a shard of fire, and so needed to be able to burn – the threat had changed from simply being lost or being on fire to my running out of strength in Night as I waited out both. It did mean, though, that now I could speak.

"I know what you're after," I sneered. "We've figured it out. Judgement gone silent and the ealamal just waiting for that hour of need. I know you're trying to make us lose, Yara."

I heard her drink from the flask, not just a small mouthful but a long swallow.

"That's one of the things I'm trying to do, Catherine," the Bard said. "It's not that I really want to kill everyone, you know, it's that they gave me no other choice. Except, of course, you taking my place."

"That failed in the Arsenal," I said. "You're too late."

"No," the Intercessor quietly laughed, "I don't think I am. You still have an aspect left undefined, and most importantly you have a crucible."

I rolled my eye.

"I've known a few of those in my time," I said.

"No," she said. "You haven't. Not the kind you need to become me. Do you want to know what it took, to become?"

I actually did, I found to my own distaste. It was information too valuable to be turned aside, even if she was likely to be playing me.

"What?" I asked, giving her what she wanted.

"The impossible," the Intercessor said. "You have to do the impossible, even if only the once."

I opened my mouth to answer but she tutted me.

"No," she said, "you haven't. You've done the improbable, and admittedly with some skill, but not the impossible. You haven't broken fundamental rules to win."

"And you have?" I asked.

She ruefully laughed.

"Creation was easier back then," the Intercessor said. "There were fewer of us, more unseen spaces to work in. I'm not sure I'd be able to pull it off now, but I did when I was young."

She drank, and after I could hear her smile.

"I convinced Creation that I was made of stories," the Wandering Bard told me. "That I could wield them, shape them, live through them."

"How?"

"First I made myself into a song," she said. "Then I made myself into a story. Then I tricked gods into singing one and telling the other."

She sounded almost fond.

"Of course, then I got exactly what I asked for," the Intercessor. "Thought I'd gotten the better of the Gods, for the first few centuries."

She laughed, and it was bitter enough I could almost taste it.

"Then a few centuries more passed, and I got who that joke was really on," Yara of Nowhere said. "It's never them, Catherine. If you learn anything from me, learn that."

"And you think I can do the same as you?" I frowned. "Trick gods?"

"Gods no," the Intercessor snorted. "You're a blunt fucking instrument, child, even when you're being subtle. But you can do the impossible, the table's set for it."

When she spoke again she felt close, as if whispering straight into my ear.

"You can't beat him," Yara said. "The pieces aren't there, Catherine. But if you beat him, anyway, well..."

"Then I take your place," I finished.

"Good odds you do," the Intercessor jovially. "It'll be a fucking forever of a curse, but then you're a pretty terrible person. And if you fail, well, I still get my way. Cordelia will do what Lycaonese do and I still get to put it down."

I convinced Creation I was made of stories, she'd told me.

"You're not just getting rid of people who know of you," I quietly said. "You're trying to kill everyone on Calernia. No more stories, no more you."

It was how she got out of the cage she'd made for herself.

"Not everyone, Cat," she chided me. "It's still Judgement doing it, after all. I'll just make their standards stringent enough that, say, maybe forty people on the continent are able to meet them. That'll do the trick. In a few decades people will die out soft, and I can spare a few decades."

I felt her smile again.

"Those go by," she softly said, "in the blink of an eye."

Ahead of me, I Saw another Named pull ahead. I had my path through.

"You won't beat him with that thing Sahelian's cobbled together, whatever it does," Yara told me. "It won't stick through a death, Catherine, and that's his favourite trick: he'll die to get out, if he has to."

I'd been about to walk through the fire, but I paused at that. It made, I realized, a horrible amount of sense. The Autumn Crown had been supposed to make the Dead King indestructible in exchange for undoing his mastery of the dead, but the Fetters were a simpler creation. If the Dead King let himself die after he was bound in them, could he slip the noose? The Fetters would be closed around his soul, and his soul could be carved up and dispersed. Christophe had already done it one today, it just hadn't stuck. It wouldn't stick, I suspected, even if there was not so much as a speck of intelligence left in that scarred up soul. He'd just come back mindless and hungry until the soul was utterly destroyed.

There was a decent chance, I realized, that even our most desperate plan wouldn't work.

"There it is," the Intercessor murmured, sounding pleased. "You see the wall, the impossible. Now you just have to find the determination to break it."

"What do you want of me, Yara?" I spoke through clenched teeth.

And I knew the danger, I did, so I touched the Night for the slightest bit. Set a weave to unmake.

"You're the Warden," she said. "Not as catchy as-" and there she said a word in a language I had never heard, "but we can work with that. You're still a user of stories, of Names. So use them to win."

A hand touched my shoulder and I let her, closing my eye to See what she wanted to show me. Her own glimpse of Creation. It was not objects in motions, chords and stories and the lay of possibilities. It was, I decided, like a living tapestry. All interwoven and ever-moving. But she wasn't looking at the whole of it, only at the small part that was here and now. Today, in this spire, facing the Dead King. The Named that had pulled ahead of me, heading for their foe.

"That's what we're working with," Yara said. "That set of stories. Some are unfinished, and those tend to be the most useful, but we're not going to win this with a third aspect or the Page transitioning. It's fucking Neshamah, he's been the collective nightmare of Calernia for longer than we've been pissing in pots. Your winner is here."

Grey thread in the tapestry, I saw, not empty but that she could not see. Not yet come into colour.

"Akua," I said.

"That's your victory right there," the Intercessor agreed. "She's got weight in spades and personal ties to you on top of it. It always works best when it costs something, yeah? Nudge our girl into the right Name at the right moment and you can, just for that one fucking moment, do the impossible."

"You can't control what Name people get," I flatly said.

"Maybe not out there, but in here?" Yara smiled. "Hells, you've got her all ready for a dozen redemption stories and all the other moving parts in here are Named. This is your board, Catherine. You just have to sit down and play."

And the thing was that, even now that her own vision was fading I could See what she meant. Akua wasn't one of the stars, she was not Named, but I could feel a course of stories she might come into. And the others, well, the practicals of their fights against Neshamah might be beyond me to predict but they didn't really matter. I looked at them going through the shards and it was the simplest thing in the world to reach out. The White Knight was having trouble reaching the Page, so I gave them a little nudge. Flicked the Page's aspect of Incise, making him remember there was more to it than combat. It was sharpness and precision, not killing, and those applied to more than just fighting.

He cut into the darkness, enough for Hanno to see, and Light followed.

Now the Silver Huntress was going to charge ahead, because she had always envied Archer and now Archer had become the Ranger. So one nudge to hurry to the left instead of the right and she stumbled into an airless shard of powerful gravity, the Mirror Knight hurrying behind her and falling. He hit the bottom of the shard with the weight of years of accumulated Dawn, blowing right through. They fell into a shard of devils and blind rage, but they were right next to Hierophant and he tore open the boundary with the shard he shared with Akua. The devils flooded into the frost, dying in moments, and in his rage the Mirror Knight shattered the walls both shards.

They all made it to the middle of the room, much sooner than they should have.

"That's the push and the pull," Yara said approvingly. "It's the fundamentals of the game, how you get people moving. You're going to need a little more than that, if you want to shape stories."

I hummed, because she was right. The Valiant Champion, I Saw, carried with her a great guilt. She had too often been the last one standing, and she treasured the White Knight all the more for being one of the rare survivors of bands she had joined. She wanted to be the first into danger, so it wouldn't be others paying the price, and that was easy enough to arrange. She was already behind the four who'd reached the centre of the room and gone on ahead towards the Dead King, so she'd hurry after them. That would drive her to take risks, enough she came through first again. Then someone... mhm, it'd have to be heroine she wouldn't care for anyone remotely villainous. The Silver Huntress would do.

A nudge that got the Silver Huntress wounded by one of the dead mages would do the trick, pushing her to use her domain and wiped out all of the Dead King's defences in one swoop. It would open space for the Mirror Knight to strike, and... what if she died instead of got wounded though? Oh, the Champion would go after the Dead King directly then. Better results, he wouldn't be able to pull some trick I wasn't able to see that fucked everyone over and the defences still got wiped by the others while the Dead King was stuck in the domain. Probably worth the Silver Huntress, since she was the likeliest to die of the Dead King got to pull his trick.

"You might need a third go," Yara noted, having followed every nudge. "Focus on getting Sahelian there and damage his defences. You only need the one miracle, everything else is about getting it there."

And it sounded cruel, I thought, but it was true. Hadn't it been what this entire battle was about? Thousands were dying out there in the inner city so that a handful of people in here could slay the Dead King and end it. If I was cruel, it was because I played a cruel game. And what was the life of a handful of people, against all of Calernia? I'd known the answer to that at sixteen, and the years had done nothing to change it.

"The White Knight's a dead end," I muttered with a frown. "I can't even use him properly."

"Save's a real bitch," Yara sympathetically said. "Tariq used to pull the same shit by asking Mercy for tips, though at least I could get around that. Your boy's a lot more of pain to deal with."

In most stories he sacrificed himself for others, stepping in to save them if they got nudged into a path that got them killed. It was like he was pathologically incapable of seeing the larger picture. The Mirror Knight, at least, could be relied on to go in a blaze of glory to avenge the Vagrant Spear. That'd turned out to be a fortunate death, leverage-wise. I watched as Silver Huntress and the Mirror Knight reached the Dead King first, beginning the fight as he sat his throne. They wouldn't be enough.

"I can't get to Akua," I finally said. "Not strong enough."

Even if I stepped in myself, it wasn't enough to nudge her into a name. Love was not enough. It had to be her decision and I didn't have a good enough angle to move that.

"Yes you can," Yara whispered into my ear. "You're not looking at all the angles, Catherine. When a nudge isn't enough sometimes you have to Guide things down the right path."

And oh, it was so very simple when finally my eyes were open. See hadn't been enough, it could only observe. To be able to Guide, though, as Yara could? That was looking at the endings of a story and choosing the one that would happen. It seemed a little thing and it was, it really was, when you thought only of a single story. But when it was five, twenty, a hundred? Then it was like being able to forge your own puzzle pieces. Silver Huntress died trying to be what she wanted Ranger to be and Archer to admire, which led into the Valiant Champion containing the Dead King. The rest of the board was cleared and then, when she died and he came back, the Page tried to transition and died if the White Knight didn't get in the way, which he would. Leaving who the Dead King really wanted to kill, the Hierophant, wide open. Akua would be too slow and not forgive herself.

So she'd reach for something beyond her, a Name, and that I could Guide into what I needed.

She would destroy him. We would. It would all be over.

"It's not my aspect, though," I murmured.

"Hierophant's right," Yara assured me. "The godhead's just a trick of perspective. Use mine for a bit and you'll pick it up."

"They both die," I finally said. "Almost all of them do."

"And that's a tragedy," she agreed. "It's always a tragedy, Catherine. No matter how tired you get, that doesn't change. There's always a William to make you weep. But if you don't play the games, if you don't get your hands in the red, then how many more die?"

She squeezed my shoulder comfortingly.

"You always got that part," Yara said. "That the deaths don't matter more because they matter to you. You'll get to keep that, I think. It'll make you better than I was in some ways."

"Because I can do what needs to be done," I quietly said.

I felt her nod. And she was right, I knew. What a paltry fucking cost the handful of people in this spire were, if it kept the rest of Calernia breathing. The easiest of bargains. And maybe it'd wound me, but my life had been a collection of wounds. What was one more? I was a villain, in the end.

Mine was not the fate of happy endings.

I breathed out and watched it in my mind's eye, measuring angle and timing. It would be close, but Yara was wrong. I wouldn't need a third go, just slightly bloodier hand. It would just need to- the weave undid itself and pain returned to my body. My leg, my bad leg throbbed with pain.

Do not forget, it whispered. That this is not a game. That you make mistakes.

I wanted to argue, to struggle, but the pain took my breath away.

Do not forget, it whispered, that there must be more than ruin.

"Catherine?" the Intercessor slowly said.

I shook off her hand.

"If you'd said I needed to kill Akua, I might have believed you," I quietly said. "But Masego, Yara? Masego?"

The one who'd never left me, never asked anything of me. The one who'd promised to stay by my side when this all ended, even as everybody left. The one who'd forgiven me for killing my father.

"They say we only get one choice that matters," I told her. "And maybe that's true. So here's my choice: I will not be a crab in your fucking bucket."

She was gone in an instant, and as I stepped out of the shard I breathed Creation's air once more. A pivot, I thought. It had been a pivot. The others were fighting the Dead King, I Saw, and they were losing. I watched it unfold, the desperate gamble. Alexis wounded and the Valiant Champion using her domain to whisk away the dead defending Neshamah. I passed through another shard, barely feeling the swirling acid as it roiled against a wreath of Night. Then the Dead King revealed why it was he had slain the Grave Binder, calling on Revenants buried beneath the tiles bearing their names. They tore through, swarming my companions. Neshamah had, as always played it so very careful.

He'd gotten rid of the healer to ensure our wounded would not return. He'd slain Sidonia so that love could not be turned against him twice. And then he'd killed the Grave Binder so that no one could hinder his raising of Revenants.

Only, I thought as I stepped through a swarm of poisonous insects that multiplied by the moment, he had made a mistake. Because Return wasn't perfect, he'd showed me that. He needed his anchor it was why he'd done a grand gesture like making all of Keter his phylactery. The Mirror Knight had killed him one today and if the anchor hadn't made sure that his soul stayed in Creation, that it didn't disperse, then the Severance's cut would have been the end of him. Return wasn't an absolute, because no matter how powerful a story there was always a weakness. And I'd learned his, I realized, entirely by accident. Years ago, in a fight that had nothing to do with him at all.

See, I'd once wanted to steal Akua Sahelian's soul to get around an oath not to shed her blood but she'd already taken it out and put it in a phylactery. Masego had called it a manner of lichdom, back then, and been mightily impressed. He was not someone easily impressed, which had gotten me curious. What was it that Akua had done that was so unusual? A real lich was undead, I'd learned. That seemed a small detail but was why they were able to take out their soul and why Akua's trick of taking it out while she lived was such an achievement: the soul was removed during the ritual that turned the mage into a lich. The Dead King, then had removed his soul when he became undead through the ritual that destroyed Sephirah when he effectively died.

So if his death was undone, it'd come back.

When I crossed the last shard, striding through entropy that stole another meaningless decade from me, I came out onto a scene of triumph. And not ours.

The Valiant Champion was on her knees, most of her torso turned into bone. The Silver Huntress' bow had been snapped and she was losing a fight with a Revenant spearman, giving ground, while the Skinchanger had turned into a spotted cat to avoid the howling sorcery of a robed mage. The Mirror Knight was being sat on by a massive distorted Revenant bearing a crow's mask, though the undead's attempts to break Christophe's neck were running into the issue of the neck being harder than the behemoth's gauntleted fists. The White Knight was fighting half a dozen Revenant swordsmen and holding, but he was not winning. The Page was doing the best of us all, savaging what looked like an Arlesite duellist dripping with gold suns.

Akua and Masego were locked in a struggle of raw power with the Dead King, sorcery against sorcery, and they were losing.

I breathed out, sharpening my mind as I pulled on Night and stepped forward. The Dead King laughed, seeming genuinely delighted. There was a ripple and the two Soninke mages were blown away, sent flying, as the King of Death turned to me.

"I knew you would not fall for her tricks," Neshamah smiled. "You lack the perspective, Warden, but you still understand the essence of it. We are all prisoners."

I'd heard this before, I thought, from Masego. Who'd been raised in a shard of Arcadia as a boy and seen it end, wondering then how long it would take until the Gods did the same to Creation. The Game of the Gods would have an end, after all. Someone had to win.

"And you want to get out before Last Dusk," I said.

"When the Gods end it all, Catherine Foundling," Neshamah Be-Iakim said, "when the last soul passes and the last of Creation is unmade, then I will stride alone into a sky of cold and distant stars."

He leaned forward.

"And in that empty void between worlds, moving to no purpose but mine, I will at last know the taste of freedom."

And he meant it, I knew with ironclad certainty. Every word of that. All he'd ever wanted was to get out. And maybe part of what he'd become was on Yara of Nowhere, who had hounded on behalf of the masters he wanted to rid himself of, but it wasn't on her head alone. He was still the same man who had destroyed Sephirah for his madness, who had taken a sickle to Calernia through the millennia as a reaper of lives. He was not excused. He was the face of everything I wanted the Liesse Accords to kill, the black madness that broke nations and swallowed whole cities. A single man whose lunacy was enough to break the world.

And Gods, hadn't we all had enough of that?

"From them," I said. "You'll be free from them, Neshamah. But you forget that you are yet in the pit with the rest of us. And down here, we are all mud."

"Am I to monologue for you, Warden?" he smiled. "I will not snatch defeat from the jaws of victory."

It was a gesture of respect, I grasped, when he called me respect. For my Role, for how far I had come. He had meant it when he called me a peer.

"You don't need to," I said. "You've already given me enough."

"It would be worse to kill me, you know," Neshamah idly said. "I have prepared for it."

"You'd make it worse," I acknowledged.

I'd long seen it coming. He seemed, I noted, a little cheated by how easily I accepted that.

"You have seen the shape of my sovereignty," the Dead King said.

"I have," I agreed.

A million strings, a million dead, all to make a kingdom of one.

"Should I end," the Hidden Horror said, "it will pass to another. One Creation should fear even more than I."

It took me a moment to understand what he meant. When I did, I almost refused to believe it.

"Weeping Heavens," I said. "You don't even control the drakon when it's just a drop of essence. You'd give all you hold?"

"I had a friend once," he smiled, "who was a woman of remarkable clarity. She once asked: if Creation is not mine, what need is there to be a Creation at all?"

I cocked my head to the side. I shouldn't, I knew, but in some ways I would forever be my father's daughter.

"Quoting Triumphant," I told him, "is the last refuge of the uninspired."

And I beheld him then, standing proud and unbent in the face of all Creation. The oldest of tyrants, the King of Death himself who had worn his pale crown through the millennia to war upon the world. The first and greatest of the old breed, the one they all fell short of becoming. The last relic of the Age of Wonders. And I knew, in that moment, that he was mine to judge. That I had taken on the Role, the responsibility. I was the Warden, the usherer of the Age of Order, and it fell on me to close the curtain on the times that had come before it. The Mirror Knight had one feared I would make myself a ruler over Named, and he was not so far as that. I'd always been about authority, just never about wearing a crown.

I was to be a judge.

"Neshamah Be-Iakim," I said, "you have devoured cities and shattered realms, waged war upon all the world and sown ruin wherever reached your hand. You are the high priest of desolation, the tyrant undying."

He felt it, I saw, same as I. The shiver in the air. His Role and mine, testing the other's weight. His hand

"By my Name of Warden," I said, "I Sentence you to die."

He came for us, then, without a speck of holding back. It came as a swarm of buzzing curses, a tide of a million deaths, but the charge of my last aspect had sunk into him. The Sentence would stay in him, my authority – my madness – carved into Creation. His fate was writ as death, and now the lay of world would fight to ensure it.

I had, at last, a providence of my own.

The Silver Huntress's wrist was touched by a curse and she withered to bones in a heartbeat even as I swallowed a shout of dismay. The Page exploded into ash, the Skinchanger screamed as she unravelled from the inside. I raised my staff, drawing as deep on Nigh as I ever had. It would not be enough, I knew, but so long as Hanno could – the Valiant Champion interrupted the thought, leaping forward with her axe high, and as she looked death in the face she smiled.

“Exalt,” Rafaella of Alava said.

And then she was gone, the Dead King’s great doom and his Revenants with her. In the heartbeat that followed were moving. The Mirror Knight first and swiftest, Hanno and I tearing forward even as Hierophant and Akua’s magic rose.

“Hanno,” I shouted.

His eyes met mine.

“Bring him back,” I said. “Make him alive.”

Three spells went flying. Masego’s hit the Dead King in the chest, burning through robes and sending him stumbling back. Akua’s and Neshamah’s collide, one giving and a heartbeat later Akua Sahelian screamed. Christophe de Pavanie, smiling, dropped his shield and swung the Severance at the Dead King’s neck two-handed. Bit his wrist, oh his wrist was caught. And Neshamah’s other hand was laid on his neck, a curse leaving the fingertips and spreading black across the Mirror Knight’s skin. He smiled still.

“Reflect,” the Mirror Knight whispered.

And the Dead King screamed, rot spreading across his dead limbs as the Mirror Knight slumped. Breathing his last he twisted, twisting around the Severance, and handle of it fell into Hanno’s outstretched hand. The one missing fingers. He caught it. I struck out, the staff of deadwood I’d ripped from Liesse after refusing the old victories and defeats writhing with the power of the goddesses that had made me as much as I’d made them. The hit caught Neshamah in the neck, even as his magic sharpened, a pulse of Night disrupted the spell. Hanno of Arward’s hand touch the Dead King’s forehead, that rough workman’s palm covering it.

“Undo,” the White Knight said.

And as Creation screamed, life roared back into the Dead King’s corpse. Millennia of weight fought the White Knight’s fresh aspect, an oak tree to a dandelion, but a finger had already been laid on the balance. I had Sentenced Neshamah to die, and for that he must first live. So colour flushed back into his cheeks, those pale brown eyes widening as his magic rose again. A killing spell, and end for the both of us.

“Silence,” I ordered, and it died.

And Hanno struck, the Severance biting into the Hidden Horror's neck for the second time that day. It cleaved through flesh and bone, red blood spurting as death followed in the wake of life. Neshamah Be-Iakim's head fell, its eyes golden in death, and the two of us stood by the dropping corpse in disbelief. Movement behind me, and I turned sword in hand but it was Hierophant – who darted forward, hand snatching a sparrow as it erupted from the Dead King's last corpse. It was, I saw with surprise, a soul. His soul.

"I told you, King of Death," Hierophant smiled, "that I would come for you."

And he bit off the sparrow's head, teeth crunching as he swallowed and began to devour the Dead King's soul, making its knowledge his own. The foundation, I knew, of a godhead to be. We'd won, I realized. We'd just killed him. And though he had threatened us with the drakon, if the Antigone came through then... A sigh sounded, and I turned to see Yara of Nowhere standing among the ruins of the highest hall of Keter.

"Why," she asked, "does it always have to be the hard way with you lot?"

Kiara

Ok so in the timeline that can never be...what is Akua's glorious name as she slays the Dead King?

Someperson

I am partial to The Doom

Tom

Catkua

Isi Arnott-Campbell

So in the manner of "Wekesa the Warlock" or "Catherine the Squire," she'd be Akua the Catkua?

Someperson

AA

This chapter was insane and brilliant

Jairo Lugilde

This is literally the game-ending final boss with a thousand phases that when you finally beat him the twist true final boss reveals herself. I love it.

Someperson

Mark my words the shackles get used on the Intercessor before it's all over

Stephen Marsh

I hope so. Interesting how she isn't happy they won.

SeventhSolar

She definitely lied about a lot of things. I'm not sure about the fact that they couldn't beat Neshamah without breaking a fundamental law, since Cat's Sentence kind of seemed like Creational BS? But Cat beating the pivot with a line about crabs in a bucket definitely means Bard was deliberately screwing them over in some unnecessary way, and that she didn't just set up an absolute win/win like she pretended.

Lord Haart

Cat was going to put everyone on rails to die in that scene, as if it were a game. Like WB, that sort of power is the death of empathy.

Cat indeed reminded herself that she's in the bucket too, and that escape lies more in helping others out more than pushing others down.

Very happy Nessie died for his actions. Leashing him would have been a pushover ending.

Abnaxis

Waaaaait...

If it's that hard to separate someone from their soul without them turning undead, how does soul-boxing work?

Xinci

I believe those soul boxed were noted to be created by a derivative method for lichdom. There are only a few of them from what we have seen? Mainly as separating the soul in a way that it isn't damaged requires immense precision and a metaphysical ability to separate it and then it must be tied to the person in a way that it doesn't desynchronize from the body.

Someperson

I suspect soulboxing doesn't make any effort to keep the victim's soul around if they die, unlike proper lichdom and also unlike Akua's trick. It is purely meant to be a punishment or a means of leverage, which means it don't need to be as fancy.

I believe the reason why soulboxing is rare is significantly due to Praesi politics. In most case, if you soulbox a high lord, their family will backstab them and replace them rather quickly, because who wants a leader who is at the mercy of somebody who doesn't have the interests of your house at heart?

Of course, that only explains why it isn't used more often on important political figures. I would assume that it's a tricky enough bit of magic that using it on some random person to make them do as you say would be considered a waste (also, for all of their faults, the Praesi do not believe in slavery).

Abnaxis

Yeah, now that I think of it the presumption was that if the soul is released from the box it would immediately snap back to the owner, so I guess the binding between body and soul doesn't get separated the way lichdom does it?

Like, soul-boxing is gluing the soul in a box and stretching it like silly putty, lichdom is actually going at the soul with a scalpel so you can stick it in an ice bucket.

GoodGirlJW

OH NO I AM ALL CAUGHT UP D: D: D:

Cap'n Smurfy

I love how after all this time Cat Choosing to keep the limp came back to help her. She kept the reminder, keeping the memory.

Letouriste

Yep! I was annoyed by it (thinking she could achieve the effect without it) but i guess i can forgive it now 😊

biasteh

So now that I've caught up, there's only 4 chapters left? Bleh

Spindel

I have read this entire story, just lurking, never writing but I just have to say it: Amazing!

This is one of the best stories I ever read and this chapter was one of the best within it. Especially that pivot with Yara! The only downside to those 4 chapters to come is that it will be over afterwards. Thank you for this, EE.

M0och123

OMG, brilliant!

D. D.

How the hell is there only one other comment so far?!

Goddamn, what a finish.....and it's not even over yet.

Letouriste

You're not on the first page of comments haha

DC

Wait a sec...

A dead king, a kingdom named after the Sephirot, the Kabbalis book of darkness, and now providence in the fall of a sparrow?

This is not a coincidence because nothing is ever a coincidence.

Interlude: Legends V

"One: first, do good."

-"Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

The wards shuddered.

The great battering rams of the dead were cracking them apart blow by blow, the beleaguered defenders conceding one barricade after another to the horde. Swarms of undead birds flew so thick above them all that it seemed as if night had fallen, the creatures snatching up any soldier that left the protection of the sorcery and tearing them apart so that limbs rained down. How many more layers were left the wards? Cordelia was not certain, but it could not be more than a handful. Inch by inch they had given ground to the Enemy, the Dead King's tireless teeth devouring them one soldier at a time. They might just, she thought, run out of men before they ran out of ground.

She'd begun with almost two thousand, but that longer had long dwindled into the hundreds.

The princess sat with her back to the all-too-thin palisade that Hannoven men had raised with calm competence, now standing behind it with halberds and hammers as the horde continued to hammer at the wards. What a small thing this length of wood was, in the face of the monsters that awaited. What would it do against a rampaging beorn or the venom of a wyrm? It might as well be parchment. And still she sat there, among the crowd of grim-faced soldiers calmly awaiting the death coming for them one bite at a time. Cordelia's gauntleted hand brushed back her mud-streaked hair, careful to avoid the cuts on her face.

She'd been offered healing, but she would not die from torn cheeks and every wasted speck of Light was a soldier the priests could not send back into the fight. Standing by her, Simon de Gorgeault looked over the top of the palisade and let out a thoughtful hum.

"Goods news, Simon?" she drily asked.

"It appears that the Dead King is a fine diplomat indeed, Your Grace," the lay brother easily replied. "I do believe I am spying the High Lady of Kahtan fighting side by side with the Prince of Orense."

It took Cordelia a moment to recall that both of them were dead, though she would have been clued in by the raucous laughter from the Hannoven soldiers anyhow. It was exactly the kind of black humour they loved. A shade lighter than what Bremenites preferred, but then most Lycaonese agreed that they only laughed because they'd never learned how to cry.

"It figures," the once-First Prince mourned, "that they would only start getting along after I abdicated."

Laughter again, and though exhausted Cordelia forced herself to rise to her feet. Over the palisade she found what Simon had, a contingent of Praesi dead in colourful armour methodically levelling the broken palisades the dead had already taken so that the horsemen died in Rodrigo Trastanes' honourable last charge would be able to ride through the smoking grounds. What a small thing a palisade was, she thought again. So easily done away with, for all that it was the only wall standing between them and death. A remembrance brushed against her mind, then, and to her surprise Cordelia found herself thinking of her mother with a faint smile.

"Good news, Your Grace?" Simon lightly echoed.

She shook her head.

"I was merely thinking," Cordelia said, "that sometimes the story you hear is not the one you are being told."

"I don't follow, I'm afraid," the lay brother said.

"When I was a girl, my mother once told me the tale of the Three Cousins," the fair-haired princess said. "Do you know of it?"

It was an old story known among all Lycaonese and even some of the northern Alamans, though the tale changed with the telling.

"I do not," Simon admitted.

It was simple, as the most beloved stories tend to be, and Cordelia remembered her mother telling it with characteristic brusqueness. It'd been her way, the choppy burst of emotions. Anger and laughter, come then gone in a moment like Hannoven's capricious summer rains.

"I can tell it, if you would like," she lightly offered.

What else was there to do, as they waited for the rams to break the wards? There were no more tricks, no more walls, no more desperate gambles. Only the brutal trade of time for lives and ground. The white-haired man laughed.

"As good a time as any, I would think," he cheerfully agreed.

There were, she thought, worst men to face the end of the world with than Simon de Gorgeault.

"An old king," Cordelia said, "died without sons and daughters. His line died with him and another rose to take the seat, but laws are laws."

The lay brother rested his elbows on the edge of the palisade, resting his chin on his palm as he listened with bright eyes.

"His wealth of iron was split in three parts," Cordelia told him, "and given over to his last three kinsmen: three cousins, who went north to seek their fortunes as men do. They journeyed long, longer than men ever had before them, but in time they found a rich, green land by the banks of a great river. They decided to settle there and raise their halls."

A broad-shouldered redhead in plate down the palisade, her solid matron's face split by a smile, hummed out the first few notes of O Blessed Hannoven – that sardonic hymn boasting of every horror plaguing the land as if each were a blessing to thank Above for, be it spring floods or the armies of the dead. Cordelia had also picked up on the resemblance, as a child. Hannoven bordered lakes and rivers, and though far north counted some of the finest farmland in Lycaonese hands.

"Only," Cordelia said, "as they began to build, they learned too late that the river was the Last River and that on the other side of it dwelled Death."

She shrugged.

"But they no longer knew the way back, so they raised their halls anyway."

"Stubborn folk," Brother Simon said, the fond twist of his lips making it a compliment.

"The first cousin, the oldest, was a lord bold and brave," the princess said. "He built his hall in stone and fashioned his iron into a gate that none could break, raising a tall banner over it."

Cordelia has thought him the wisest when she was first told the story.

"The second cousin, the youngest, was a hunter clever and sly. He raised his hall atop a tree in the woods, hidden in leaves, and fashioned his iron into arrowheads aplenty."

There was no disdain in her tone, but it was there to be found in the faces of some who listened. Her people were a pragmatic sort, they'd had to be to survive, but they believed in honour still. There was little honour to be found in hiding in the woods as your kin perished around you, clever or not.

"The last cousin, neither young nor old, was a warrior neither bold nor clever," Cordelia smiled. "He raised his hall from wood, fashioning his iron into a sword and helm. And for a long summer and winter the three ruled over their halls, until spring came and Death with it."

In the distance the boom of the rams against the wards sounded, followed by a loud crack. The first fault line. It was only a matter of time now.

"The spirits of the dead came charging out of Below," she said, "a great army that laid siege to the bold cousin's stone hall. And though they were many and furious, the iron gate did not break."

But this was not a southern tale. Victories did not keep on shining like stars in the sky. They passed, as all things did.

"Yet the siege did not end," Cordelia said, "and as the moon turned the oldest of the three cousins grew hungry. Behind his strong gate he remained a prisoner, until his hunger slew him behind stone walls and he rose anew to unbar his gate of iron for Death."

Simon looked stricken, but there were grunts of approval from the soldiers around them. Most of them would know the story already, but even those that did not would approve of the lesson her mother had tried to teach her: no walls were ever strong enough to keep death out forever.

"Onwards the spirits of the dead marched, into the woods where the youngest cousin had raised his hall," she told the lay brother. "And the clever cousin laughed, for the spirits stumbled about as he remained hidden in the leaves and slew them with his arrows of iron."

There were few tricksters, in her people's stories, and she thought for good reason. Tricks meant little against the Chain of Hunger, and it was a rare trickster indeed that could get the better of the King of Death. More often, the sly got a lot of people killed trying to prove their cleverness.

"Only the dead are endless," Cordelia shrugged, "and though they could not find him they devoured the forest tree by tree. The youngest cousin killed many, but arrows always run out."

The end had been writ from the start.

"The tree was toppled, his hall with it, and he was swallowed whole."

Simon de Gorgeault's face had slowly changed from engrossed to grim. Lycaonese tales, she mused, did tend to have that effect on southerners.

"And the last?" he asked.

"The last cousin, the warrior, had no tall walls or hiding place," Cordelia said. "His hall was wood and easily torn down by a hundred hungry hands, but as they did he strode out wearing his helm and bearing his sword."

"And he fought," the lay brother quietly said.

"And he fought, neither winning nor losing, until spring turned to summer and the dead returned to Below," the blue-eyed princess said.

"So he was victorious," Simon said, sounding surprised.

He was startled by the hard laughter from the soldiers around them, but Cordelia was not.

"As the dead left, he set down his sword and helm to raise against his wooden hall," she told him. "And as he sat in it, the warmth of summer reaching his face, the last cousin knew this: Death would return with spring."

That had been the lesson her mother was trying to teach her, she'd thought as a child. You couldn't ever really beat Evil, not like in the pretty stories ending with a wedding and an endless summer's peace. You fought, until you died and someone else took your place. It was a fate that couldn't be turned back by a strong gate, couldn't be hidden from in the leaves. Either you faced Evil down or it devoured you whole.

In the distance, the wards cracked.

"A hard lesson," Simon de Gorgeault finally said, frowning as he gazed upon the dead. "Perhaps the Principate would not be facing ruin, had more of its people learned it."

She smiled.

"Years later," she told him, "I learned that it was only the way the tale was told in Hannoven."

In Rhenia, the story was about the halls. The first cousin was lazy, made a large iron crown and built a hall of river's mud. The second was clever, made an axe and a smaller crown then built his hall from the forest's wood. The third built only a pickaxe, spending all summer and winter to make his hall out of mountain stone. All fell but the last, the third cousin then using the remains of their broken halls to mend the wounds in his own. Pride is worth nothing, the story taught. Survival belongs to those who labour for it. In Neustria the cousins forged either a sword, a shield or armour out of their iron. The armoured cousin took up the arms from his fallen kin to survive.

In Bremen the story went the same as in Neustria, save that the dead did not retreat with summer and all three cousins died. But when Death took the fallen cousins Below to celebrate, the iron got stuck in the passageway and blocked off the dead until the got the iron was chewed through, come next spring.

"Is it so different elsewhere?" Simon asked.

"Not so much," Cordelia admitted. "But I remembered, then when it was my mother told me the tale. I was young, you see, and had just wept that she was never home."

And so Mother, brusque and blunt but never quite able to admit when she was sorry, had tried to explain why she was always out there leading solders. Evil had to be fought on the field, she'd been trying to say, else it would reach their gates. She was trying to keep Cordelia safe, to buy them another spring. It hadn't been a lesson at all, just her mother giving the closest thing to an apology as she had it in her to give.

"Sometimes the story you hear," Cordelia softly repeated, "is not the one you are being told."

It'd been the failing palisades that had hooked the thought, the wrongly learned lesson that walls always failed in the face of Death, but now she wondered. Time was running out. The last word she'd had of the fighting inside Keter had been that the inner city was breached, but since then there'd been no word and the Grand Alliance camp was being overrun. Had been overrun, she admitted to herself. Most of it was in the hands of the dead now, the few remaining pockets in the hands of the living either forts built around supplies or the heavily warded Praesi grounds where hodgepodge survivors had fled to as the rest of the camp collapsed.

Cordelia Hasenbach had sworn that she would wait until the very last moment but that moment was approaching, step by step. Inevitable as the coming of spring.

It was her duty to do what must be done. The responsibility she must bear for the weight of her sins, the niggling questions of whether any of this would have happened at all, if she had not called the Tenth Crusade. If she had not made mortal wars into the affair of Above and Below, raised her hall on the shore of the Last River. And still she could not help but wonder: was it really the sword and helm she had chosen? The fight, to hold down in her hands and not fail it? It felt like an invincible gate, the certainty that she could end it all at any moment. It felt like a bowstring pulled back among the leaves, the fading mirage of victory. Was the story she was telling herself really the one she was living in?

She reached for the slip of parchment under her breastplate, fingers closing.

The wards shuddered one last time and then they broke.

—

"It's not a dragon," Sapan firmly said.

"It's got scales and wings," Arthur Foundling replied, "and it breathes fire. Sort of."

It was transparent, not like any fire he'd ever seen, and instead of burning seemed to simply disappear everything it touched. Not ideal, given that it narrowed down the Knight Errant's options in facing the beast from the already sparse 'shield' and 'dodge' to merely 'dodge'. Which, given that the dragon kept growing, was becoming more difficult by the moment. It was a most inconsiderate sort of beast.

"It has commonalities with a dragon," Mage reluctantly conceded. "But so do a seagull and a wyvern."

"Don't those have tails with stingers?" he asked, cocking an eyebrow.

"A seagull," Sapan slowly said, as if addressing a complete idiot. "Have you really never seen one before?"

There was a moment of stillness between them, then they both broke out laughing until they were out of breath.

"Had me going there for a moment," Arthur admitted, still wheezing.

"It'll be a few years until I can be match Lord Hierophant," she told him, sounding admiring. "He can say anything with a straight face, it baffles even the Warden."

The levity had released something in the both of them, but not even her clutching at happier memories was enough to make up for the horror before them. Their breather was at an end and they would be returning to the nightmare, leaving their hiding place behind a broken pillar tall as a tower. His limbs fighting him, something like fear pulling the other way, the Knight Errant peeked out around the rough stone edge. The 'drakon', that breed of Evil dragon, was cruelly enjoying itself at the expense of the brave men that died failing to give it pause.

The fourth charge faltered of the hour as the armsmen in Hainaut livery broke, either fleeing or breaking ranks to try to drag back Princess Beatrice. The beast had killed her horse under her, tossing her down with broken legs, and was now popping the heads of those who came to help her with hateful glee. It left her crawling, only plucking out the lives of the most loyal as it ignored another volley from the Praesi scorpions. Packs of goblins had dragged in the engines only to find the bolts sinking into the flesh to no effect, made part of its body. Even unravellers did nothing, and though copperstone munitions had burned bright on its hide the bite had not been deep.

Useless as anything but a distraction.

Arthur's jaw clenched as he watched another soldier being pressed into the ground by a massive finger as Beatrice Volignac screamed in anguish. From the corner of his eye he saw light-footed Levantines move in with ropes and hooked swords, Tartessos slayers, but he held little hope. A flicker of movement among the ruins caught his attention, the Affable Burglar smoothly advancing through broken stone. Towards Princess Beatrice?

"Gods help you," the Knight Errant whispered, and he meant both kinds.

They needed all the help.

"Arthur," Sapan called out.

He took it as a reminder not to stay out in the open too long and ducked back behind the stone, resting his too-warm forehead against the fallen pillar. This room, as great as the heart of the Alban Cathedral itself, felt like a boiling cauldron. It was hot and humid, in a way that licked disgustingly at your skin. The longer they stayed in here, the harder it was to think. Sapan's hand on his arm jolted him out of his thoughts. It'd not been a reminder, after all, but to call his attention to something. A young man in legionary's armour, Liessen blond hair peeking through the helm, had come to fetch them. A sergeant, by the single red stripe on his shoulder.

"Lady Antigone wants you," the sergeant told them.

They nodded back tiredly, the other man not waiting to escort them. He'd only been a messenger. The Witch of the Woods was not far, huddled with the Concocter over what looked like a makeshift alchemist's kit. Or a brewer's, really. Two small barrels, tubes of glass bubbling over an open flame and a hermetic vase. Lady Antigone had fought with the first two charges, helping them with her great spells, but after they broke retreated here to consort with the silver-haired Concocter. Arthur knew little of what they were up to, save that it was meant to destroy the elder dragon, but Sapan had been told of it in greater detail.

If they had assumed he was unlikely to understand the technicalities of alchemy and magic, they'd been entirely correct.

"We are nearly done," the masked Witch flatly told them.

"Almost," the Concocter murmured, laying a palm against the hermetic vase. "It's begun to sublimate properly."

Arthur sent a helpless glance at Sapan, who sighed.

"Lady Concocter stole a sliver of the drakon's body while it was still contained in the corpse where the Dead King imprisoned it," she told him.

"I knew that," the Knight Errant grunted. "But it's not in that body anymore so why would it help?"

"Because that thing is eating away at everything it touches, even us," the Concocter said, turning to meet his eye. "Except it didn't eat at the corpse it began within in the slightest."

He slowly nodded.

"So we are stealing the Dead King's work," he tried.

"I might be able to slay the drakon," the Witch plainly said, "if an artefact imbued with the property is sunk into its body."

Because otherwise it would simply be eaten, presumably, Arthur followed.

"Good news," he said, meaning it. "How are we to help?"

"I kept back the Affable Burglar because she's our only thief," the Witch said. "She will bring the artefact in the drakon. From you, Knight Errant, I need a wound."

He breathed in sharply.

"You want me to break its skin," he realized, "so that you might have an opening to push the artefact through."

A mute nod.

"It may well kill you," the Concocter frankly admitted.

"I'll do it," Arthur Foundling replied without missing a beat.

Fear tried to make his lips stiff, take back the words, but he had moved quicker. The Concocter's eerie orange eyes blinked in surprise.

"I have sent for help," the Witch of the Woods told him. "But I know not if they will come. You are our last chance."

It was either him or the Stained Sister, now that the Myrmidon guts were strewn across the gallery above their heads, and the Sister was protecting their only Named healer. Twice already the elder dragon had shattered a hall where the Stalwart Apostle plied her powers, only quick escape saving her life when a stream of transparent fire came for it.

"I am a knight of Callow, Lady Antigone," Arthur Foundling replied. "Our causes are always lost."

He shrugged.

"And still we prevail."

At his hip the Peregrine burned, and it felt like a smile.

—

A wave of undead hammered into the palisade, toppling it like a sandcastle failing in the face of the tide.

Cordelia kicked the skeletal hand that slipped through two stakes, shattering its wrist, then backed away hastily when a spear jutted out. She hacked at the wooden shaft but her angle was wrong and her sword got stuck, she and the dead on the other side pulling at each other to get free. The princess set a boot against the palisade to put her back into it, the sword suddenly ripped clear as she stumbled backwards. She went back to pressing against the stakes a heartbeat later as arrows began to fall in a ragged rain, taking a step back only when a bearded man in Reitzenberg colours raised his shields above their head. He was chewing at the inside of his cheek, eyes calm, and peeked over the palisade's edge.

"We're about to go down, I'd say," he told her in Reitz. "We move back to the next, let the mages torch everything."

Cordelia's eyes sought Simon, but he was further down helping up a soldier with an arrow sticking out of her shoulder. The lay brother could take care of himself, she decided.

"Let us go," the fair-haired princess agreed.

A heartbeat later she was blind, thrown off her feet as wooden shards exploded and one bit deep into her brow. Gritting her teeth, she scrabbled for the sword she'd dropped as the massive undead boar that'd smashed through the palisade shook off a few soldiers, carving through with its tusks. The soldier that'd shielded her was on a bed of ash and dirt, his spine bent at a straight angle. Fingers shaking, Cordelia worked off the straps of his shield and snatched it up. Undead were pouring through the breach, ghouls running on four legs and leaping at soldiers, but the thunder of hooves approaching told her who was to come. The Prince of Orense's horsemen now served the Enemy, and a way had been opened for them.

"Simon," she shouted, eyes searching. "We must-"

The older man, she saw, was on the ground. Wrestling with a ghoul, the soldier he'd been helping running away. Cordelia ran, and though she knew she should be following the other it was to the lay brother she went. With a wild scream she hacked into the back of the ghoul's head, parting flesh and bone. It took two blows before the creature scrabbled away, crawling on its belly as it twitched, and Brother Simon – his throat scratched raw and his scalp scarred – took its head with a swing right through the neck.

"Come on," Cordelia croaked, voice raw.

She offered him the pommel of her sword to drag him up, his chest brushing against the dead man's shield she now bore, and though the warmth of having kept at least one person she cared for breathing was yet in her belly when they turned it was to the sight of doom. The boar collapsed, a Hannover spear through the brain even as the soldier who'd leapt on its back was dragged up screaming into the sky by vultures, but a beorn's great head leered over the broke palisade as it climbed over it. It was close, too close for them to be able to run in time and- and an armoured silhouette landed on the abomination's back, splitting its head open with a single blow. They leapt down even as the beorn collapsed on the palisade, landing smoothly and flicking their sword free of gore.

"Honour to the Blood," the Barrow Sword drily said, offering her a salute.

Cordelia recovered from her surprise first, blessed by extensive diplomatic experience in pretending nothing ever took her aback.

"Lord Ishaq," she greeted him. "My thanks. If I may request that you escort us to-"

He raised a hand to interrupt her, which was highly rude but she'd allow to pass without comment given the present circumstances.

"There is cavalry coming, Barrow Sword," Brother Simon bluntly said.

"Give it about three more heartbeats and," the villain began, then trailed off.

He was off one heartbeat, Cordelia pettily noted even as the sky lit up. A great pillar of burning Light tore through the clouds, smashing into the ground so powerfully it shook. A wind laden with the smell of burned flesh and molten metal washed over them, poisonously warm.

"There was cavalry coming, priest," Ishaq Deathless grinned through his beard.

He had, Cordelia thought, never more looked like one of the Damned. She mastered her discomfort.

"That was the work of the Blessed Artificer, I take it?" she calmly asked.

The Barrow Sword nodded.

"The Hierophant got to blow up a maze, the way we hear it, so I believe she's getting a mite competitive," he said.

Even with the relief that the column of Light had earned them the dead were continuing to pour through breaches and more than half the palisade was now on the ground, being trampled over. Soldiers were already retreating to the safety of the next layer of wards, the thin last shells, and by unspoken accord the three of them began a retreat that way as well.

"Is she coming our way?" Brother Simon asked, sounding worried. "I understand she was wounded yesterday, and to fight alone through such a horde..."

Cordelia shared his fear but chose to look upon the hope instead. If Adanna of Smyrna joined their defence, a rout may yet be avoided. The faint yellow glow in the air above them told her that the ward keeping the vultures from falling upon them was still mostly standing, but there was precious little else left. The last two palisades had boundary wards that would keep the dead from passing them, but weaker ones than those that had already been cracked. They would collapse before a quarter hour had passed, if the black stone rams were brought to bear against them. Should the Blessed Artificer bring down a wall of Light, however?

Oh, they might yet hold.

"Arrangements were made, priest, worry not," the Barrow Sword said. "Besides, you do not yet stand alone."

"Your presence is a relief," Cordelia assured him.

"As it should be," Ishaq Deathless laughed, "but it is not me I speak of. Your plight did not go unseen, Cordelia Hasenbach. Help has come."

And as if summoned by his words – perhaps not 'if', should Catherine be believed – a wave of suffocating power washed over them all. The ground shook beneath their feet and Cordelia would have fallen had Simon not gallantly caught her elbow. She steadied and turned in time to see the ground below the broken palisade rise, the earth itself rising into a rough wall. Stunned, she followed the Barrow Sword as he made for the wall cutting through a few remaining ghouls and climbed up the slope, shield hanging limp on her wrist. Up there, standing tall, she saw them coming.

There could not have been more than three hundred of the Gigantes, and yet they marched through a sea of undead as if taking a stroll.

Skeletons raised arms only to find their skulls crumpling, ghouls were turned into wet red smears before they could even leap and even arrows melted in midair. A beorn roared and charged only to begin unraveling, its great clawed paw tumbling forward but never even reaching a Gigantes' foot. Swarms of birds dropped like rocks, shattering on the head of the dead. When a tall Revenant in yellow robes bearing a long spear pointed it at them, it then twitched jerkily and rammed it seven times into its own eye before collapsing like a stringless puppet.

"Gods," Cordelia hoarsely whispered.

"That, Your Grace, is every last remaining spellsinger come to make war," the Barrow Sword quietly said. "Burn the sight your eyes, because Creation will never witness such a thing again."

They withdrew from the wall, but not far. With this unnatural rampart having risen from nothing, taller and stronger than any barricade might hope to be, soldiers rushed back to defend it. Cordelia went deeper behind the wards to make sure that Simon's throat would be seen to properly – the bite of some ghouls carried poison – then returned to share the watch. Skeletons and ghouls climbed the wall, needing beating back even under swarm of arrows, but the tusks and beorns that tried their hand at shattering the earth instead broke their own skulls. They could hold, Cordelia thought with renewed vigor, until the Gigantes arrived. It was tense, dangerous work and twice arrows thumped into her shield but she ripped them out and the wall held. The Barrow Sword kept the defence alive, moving like a prowling cat across the rampart and beating back whatever foothold the dead gained.

The Gigantes finished the march with the same air of indifferent inevitability they had begun it with, part of the earthen wall opening as a door for them before they spread out. The fair-haired princess had learned everything there was to know of their people in Proceran archives and bought Levantine secrets at great expense, but even so she could not interpret a single of the 'words' that the giants shared with each other. Not one was spoken, subtle shifts in gesture and sorcery expressing all the Gigantes cared to share before they parted ways, nearly of all them spreading out alone along the rampart. Only two remained together, and their approach had Cordelia straightening her back.

She had little experience speaking with Gigantes, and so she was faintly grateful when the Barrow Sword emerged from a band of halberd-wielding Neustrians to join her. The two giants stood more than thirty feet tall, both shaved and one bearded. Though their people's necks were short and their legs long, it was the face that spoke of their inhumanity to Cordelia. Those large eyes paler than any human's could be, those strange ridges of cartilage that stood in place of ears. The Gigantes without the beard considered them with milk-white eyes, offering a nod to the Barrow Sword.

"Bahal," they said, voice rumbling. "You earn your charge."

"Great Elder, your praise brings me honour," the Levantine replied, offering a bow.

Those pale eyes moved to her then.

"Princess Hasenbach," they said. "You are known to us."

It was tempting to appropriate the villain's use of 'Great Elder', but risky without knowing the context. A safer answer was in order.

"This brings me honour," Cordelia replied, and Gigantes seemed satisfied.

The bearded one spoke up then.

"We come here at the word of the Living God, the Maker of Riddles, and bring this knowledge: the Young King is cornered."

Cordelia went still as a stone.

"Though the corpses of gods were profaned and the shadow of the old enemy brought back," the bearded giant continued, "the Warden and the White Knight storm the spire. Victory is at hand."

Or defeat, the princess thought, but did not dare speak it. The knowledge that Catherine would do whatever it took to win was reassuring, but Cordelia knew the difference between arrogance and faith. Sometimes there was no victory to be had, no matter how bold or clever or worthy you were. Sometimes all that you could hope for was for the iron of your fight to be hard enough to swallow that the Enemy would have to wait until spring to march again. She would hope, she would have faith, but she would not delude herself.

"We thank you for the knowledge brought," the Barrow Sword said, tone a little stilted.

He bowed, and Cordelia had been expecting him to so she smoothly imitated the gesture. The Gigantes eyed them for a moment more, then nodded with exaggerated slowness – as if to make sure they would see it – before striding away. No more explanation was given for any of this. The villain sagged when they were out of sight, perhaps the most human gesture she'd ever seen out of him.

"Bahal?" she lightly asked, masking the depth of her curiosity.

"The manner of my Bestowal accidentally made me part of the ancient Gigantes courts of justice," the Barrow Sword admitted.

His hand rested on the pommel of the bronze sword she had never seen him without, not any more than the bronze scale that seemed to weather ever blow of the dead without breaking. She cocked a brow.

"And what part would that be?" she asked out of honest curiosity.

"The death matches," Ishaq Deathless grimly said. "I have good reason to be glad that none of the Eighteen Cities still call themselves such."

Fascinating as that was, and Cordelia had always been intrigued by the old stories of Gigantes living among the humans of the Eighteen Cities as rulers and guides of a sort, sadly they were yet at the end of the world. Fighting to keep from reaching that last fateful fall. Cordelia raised her shield, grip strengthening around her now ragged sword, and had opened her mouth to speak when suddenly she went still. So did the Barrow Sword, and many a soldier, for a ripple had gone through Creation that even the most blind of them could feel. The dead, to the last, went still.

Atop the tall black spire that stood above all of Keter, a sphere of fire winked out.

"Gods," Cordelia Hasenbach whispered, tears coming to her eyes. "Oh, Merciful Gods. She did it. She killed him."

The undead began to move again but it was chaos, nothing at all like an army. They broke up into bands around Binds, hacking at each other as much as they tried to climb the walls, and it sunk into the princess' soul that they had done it. They had destroyed the King of Death and now his armies would – there was another rippled, and Cordelia shivered. It passed over her like a humid wind, tasting her skin, and the Barrow Sword let out a soft curse.

Below them, the dead stirred again.

With feverish hatred, they fell on each other and all they saw. Broken teeth swallowed flesh and metal, tore into walls as if they were parchment and devoured all they reached. What had been an army become something altogether more terrible. Like a river of hunger the horde turned into a great horror that ate all it could touch, all it could reach. Moving like a single massive, writhing abomination Cordelia could not even begin to see the heart of. But she knew, oh she knew with iron certainty that the mind behind it lay deep inside the Crown of the Dead.

"What is this madness?" she asked, revulsion tuning her voice raw.

"They call the Riddle-Maker the Living God," the Barrow Sword said.

She turned to him, found his tanned face gone pale.

"No one's sure what he fought, to become the last of the Titans," Ishaq quietly said, "but if I had to bet I'd say it's something like this."

"Then it should be dead," the princess said.

"This isn't a city where graves stay filled, Cordelia Hasenbach," he replied.

And as they stood there, below them a god clawed its way back to life. Slowly, she reached for the parchment pressed against her heart.

—

The Knight Errant stepped out of the ruined maze, his sword in hand.

The Peregrine burned like a star to his Name, bearing no enchantment save a clarity of purpose. It was to make a better world as the Grey Pilgrim once had, by removing evil from it. By the cutting edge, if needs must. Arthur advanced alone, even though the lack of comrades at his side was fearful, for he knew his Name preferred it. Not for him the comradery of the Woe, not when his every instinct pulled him towards being the lone knight on the bridge, the challenger. The test or the savior, but neither leader nor led.

The hymns on his armour humming, he marched out while the dragon finished tormenting a company of goblin legionaries: it was stepping on whichever was on the edge of either side, making them swerve in panic one way or another as it toyed with them like a cat might with a mouse. Arthur was not sure it was a thinking creature, not like a person, but it was intelligent enough to be cruel. It knew what fear was, and despair. It seemed, he thought, hungry for them. Word from the rearguard was that it seemed to have seized control of the dead there, and though the Kingfisher Prince was holding he was losing ground.

Whether or not the Dead King had been ended, as some hope, they were still running out of time.

He hurried. Ugly as the thought was, the picking apart of the legionaries was covering his approach. Arthur was not so proud that he would refuse being given the first blow on such a foe, even if the price of it was the life of comrades. If he could have done anything to save them he would have, but... The Knight Errant had been raised in a war that taught hard lessons, and one of them was not to waste the chance to save most because you wanted to save all. So he hurried, stride lengthening, as goblins screamed and sweat tricked down his back.

He was half a hundred feet away from the dragon's back when it suddenly turned.

A leg jutted out of its shoulder, tearing through the glass floor, but the Knight Errant had already moved. Burnt shards trickled against his side and he struck at the twisted limb, the Peregrine humming as it tore into the side of leg. Flesh parted, burning, but there was so much of it and Arthur was almost disarmed when the leg was pulled back into the creature. He'd made a scar, but would it still be there if the leg was spat back out? He was not so sure. The dragon turned its full attention on him, screaming as it swiped and its claws ripped up the ground.

He ran through the trails of death, Sapan's magic roared to life and hitting the dragon's head with spikes of light not unlike the one that had turned half the maze to glass. The beast roared in pain and Arthur rolled past a claw that would have torn him in half, feeling it graze his back and leaving him with grateful relief. Callowan knights did not wear capes. The elder beast's side spat out small limbs, human limbs, only made out of writhing metal and stone as tormented faces moaned out and the horror tried to snatch his side. The Knight Errant hacked into the madness, but though the burning scars he left tore screams from the faces they were soon gone, pulled into the monster. He was doing nothing, no matter how fine his sword.

And the dragon was laughing as it struck, ignoring streaks of fire and lightning from mages as well as Sapan's strange spikes returned, shaking them off where it had disregarded the rest. Arthur knelt under a great paw the claws closed in on him. He tried to slip in between but they headed him off, closing quicker, leaving him to realize that the drakon could have killed him already. It wanted him to fear, to fall apart. Instead the Knight Errant straightened his back, gritting his teeth and swinging at the coming death. Bone gave and -and the entire limb toppled forward, the cage around him falling with it.

Arthur had a glimpse or a rail-thin silhouette under a cloak and a single-edged sword of wood, a narrow face granting him a nod.

As he watched the elder dragon began to be rent asunder by cuts from every direction, the rest of the Emerald Swords walking the creature's skin unimpeded to carve through limbs and even its neck. The monster at its own flesh, growing it back, but it was an opening and Arthur took it. Swallowing his fear, he reached for the dragon's fleshy side and began to climb it. Hands pawed at him, reaching for his belt and his limbs to pull him inside the beast, but he shook them off with Name strength to continue his rise. He would rise, and he would wound the Evil thing as Lady Antigone had asked of him.

Halfway up the flank something ripped under him and he shouted with alarm as a limb exploded out of the flesh where he'd been, a long stretch of bone that bled out a thin membrane looking like an insect wing's. Desperately clutching at the limb as it drove him sky high, the Knight Errant fought the hands trying to drag him in. He was slashing at the bone but it was doing nothing, only scars, and what were those worth when they disappeared in a moment? Arthur's frustration mounted, a lifetime of wrongs he'd been forced to just watch laughing at him.

It was like there was a wall, like the Gods had decided he could do good but no further than this line and every effort he'd make past it would come to vain. He'd thought he'd gotten past it in the Tower, when he had chosen right over wrong and all the rest, but here he was again: flailing at the dark, accomplishing nothing. What had Dustin even died for, if Arthur was just going to keep failing to save people who needed him? He refused that repellent, disgusting thought. That were some things, some entities beyond reckoning. That some walls couldn't be broken.

That there was anything in this world that the Knight Errant could not Wound.

An Emerald Sword cut the wing bone but Arthur pulled himself on it, Name flowing through his veins like fire, and even as it fell ran down the length. It was too quick a fall, too long a length, but still he ran – and even as he came short, just before he began to fall he leapt up with both hands on the Peregrine. Hanging in the air for the barest of moments he struck, the edge of the blade forged from the Grey Pilgrim's death and named by the Black Queen striking the elder dragon's flesh. Wound, everything that Arthur Foundling was screamed. And in that moment there was nothing in Creation that was beyond his reckoning, so the drakon's side was split open as if a titan's axe had fallen upon it.

And the wound did not close.

Arthur fell down as the drakon screamed, the ground hitting him mercilessly. His head rang and his limbs ached, the breath snatched out of him replaced by fire. He rolled to the side, trying and failing to get up, and saw Emerald Sword cut through the limb that would have turned him to paste. There was more, he saw as he caught a flicker of movement. The Affable Burglar was running across the open grounds, almost impossible to see even as she moved through open grounds. She was clutching something in her hand, though Arthur saw nothing more than a splash of colours. The dragon saw more, a forest of limbs erupting at the villainess, but a massive wolf bounded in the way and took the blow for the Burglar. The animal died, body crushed, as the villainess slithered through the promised deaths.

The Knight Errant gasped, spitting out blood as he leaned on the Peregrine to get back on his feet. He could cover the last of the way, he thought, but his limbs would not stop shaking. He only got on his knees. How many feet were left before she reached the wound? A hundred, maybe less. Only before the Burglar could get there the ground under her began to hollow, a tentacle of flesh destroying her footing, and though she ran across the collapsing space it was when the dragon blew its flames. The transparent death filled the air and the Affable Burglar would have been swallowed whole – if someone hadn't thrown themselves in the way.

The Painted Knife's mangled body, limbs broken and twisted, rippled for a heartbeat as an aspect lit up.

A heartbeat later the flames were gone and the elder dragon's head with them, as if it had annihilated itself, while Kallia the Painted Knife collapsed to the ground and the Affable Burglar raced through the last few feet. As her hand rose, at last Arthur saw what it was she held: a painted mask of clay.

The Knight Errant saw it disappeared into the wound, and only then did he let himself pass out.

—

For the second time that day, Cordelia's fingers shied away from the last words Agnes had left her.

Not because she thought there may yet be a darker moment, but because her attention was grabbed by a most unexpected sight: a flying fortress was coming to them. One of the great behemoths the Praesi called the Old Mothers, which she'd been told were all grounded. And it did seem that the magical castle had been wounded, for a third of it was missing and the insides were bare. Swarms of vultures were coming at it relentlessly, dying against translucent shields as they ate away at them, but it was slow going and Cordelia parsed out what would happen before it did.

The great fortress crashed before their walls before the shields broke, ground rippling and dead dying in droves.

The Gigantes, though troubled and wary of the sudden turn of the dead, opened a gate for the hundred or so Praesi that ran out of their broken fortress. Most of them seemed to be legionaries, but there were also richly dressed mages and two that stood out from the rest. Alaya of Satus, once the Dread Empress of Praes and now the appointed chancellor of the confederation that'd emerged from that empire's ashes, would have been noticeable in any crowd. Cordelia was more inclined to men than women and generally inclined to despise this woman in particular, but she would not deny she was one of the most beautiful people she'd ever seen.

The other was not a great beauty, but she was the Barrow Sword's promised fulfilled: Adanna of Smyrna, the Blessed Artificer, was running along side the once-empress.

It was instinct when Cordelia retreated deeper towards the ealamal, into the tent where she had restlessly sat before taking up the sword. An attempt to reassert control in the face of the unexpected, to hold the rod that commanded the dead angel in her hands. It was Brother Simon who introduced Chancellor Alaya when she arrived, though the Blessed Artificer burst in without waiting for the same.

"Princess Cordelia," Lady Adanna said. "How is the weapon?"

Cordelia only knew so much about the technicalities of the ealamal, besides the fact that it had been filled to the very brim and remained able to be commanded. She saw no need to admit that, however.

"You may have a look yourself," she suggested, "so long as you do not attempt to affect it."

"I wouldn't, princess," Lady Adanna assured her, perhaps a tad condescendingly.

Cordelia wondered if the other woman would have dared while she was still First Prince, then set aside the thought as unworthy of either the women it involved. More burning still was Chancellor Alaya's sympathetic gaze when the Blessed Artificer wandered off to do as suggested. The Soninke did not go as far as saying 'Named, huh' as if commonly mourning, but the cocked eyebrow had much the same implication.

"Princess Cordelia," Chancellor Alaya greeted her instead.

"Chancellor Alaya," Cordelia politely greeted the woman who'd tried to have her assassinated on twenty-nine separate occasions.

Thirty, if you counted the poison in her favourite fish soup and the lemon water as different attempts.

"May I take a seat?" the other woman smiled. "I'm afraid I will be of little use out there."

The fair-haired princess conceded with a nod and Alaya claimed a chair with sinuous grace that seemed almost absurd when paired with the rickety wooden furniture. Like a pearl tossed into offal. Simon looked askance at Cordelia, who discreetly shook her head back. The lay brother left the tent.

"I expect you have little more news of the fighting in the city than we do," Cordelia leadingly said.

"My mages believed the Dead King to have perished," Chancellor Alaya replied, "but there is some debate as to what seized control of the dead after."

"Some sort of ancient dragon god, if my sources are to be believed," she said.

The former empress took that with the unflinching aplomb of someone who'd ruled over the Wasteland for many years.

"Unfortunate," Chancellor Alaya noted. "Two of my finest mages were looking into a way to undo the Dead King's mastery over death, however, and though they did not succeed it seems they have learned something that might be of import."

"And that would be?"

"If Lady Nahiza and her assistant are correct, then this... draconic usurper only commands the dead in Keter for now," the dark-skinned chancellor told her. "Its mastery grows by the moment, and in time it will command them all, but the Dead King's reins were as a great kingdom and it yet holds only this very city."

Cordelia's fingers tightened around the ivory baton she held in her lap.

"Would you," she said with forced calm, "have any notion of how quickly that mastery will spread?"

It was a polite, dispassionate way to ask how long the Principate had before some evil god mastered the dead destroying it and ate everything alive. Cordelia did not know whether or not this risen dragon would be as much a terror as the Dead King had been, but in truth it hardly mattered. So long as the dead did not collapse into warband, then Procer was buried and the rest of Calernia with it. Even if the Principate was not made into a great army of undead, the strange powers the dragon god lent to the dead seemed just as fearful. It was still defeat, the end of it all.

"My experts are uncertain," Chancellor Alaya admitted. "It could be an hour, a day or a week. They cannot tell if the dead in Keter were usurped because of proximity or ease of spread."

Which tells me nothing, Cordelia thought, even as she felt the wards shiver. She rose to her feet, marching past her guest with lack of manners that sat ill even at the end of the world to peek outside. The golden hue in the air was gone and the vultures were swarming. The wall seemed on the edge of falling, even with the desperate efforts of the soldiers and the Gigantes. Feigning calm, Cordelia returned to her seat across from the woman who had once been called Malicia.

"A ward collapsed," the chancellor mildly said.

"One of the boundaries," Cordelia said, then added in a moment of harsh honesty, "and the most important. Now the vultures will begin devouring men."

"It is a matter of time until the defences break, then," Chancellor Alaya noted.

Cordelia wondered if the other woman's calm was as put on as hers. It must be, she thought. Not even Praesi could face their own death and Calernia's with such blitheness, surely.

"A quarter hour, perhaps as much as half," she forced herself to reply.

And under the dark-eyed woman's unblinking gaze, she set down the ivory baton on the table. Malicia – and that name was more honest than the others, for deep down Cordelia still thought of her as that – stared at it for a long moment but did not ask a question. No doubt the Eyes of the Empire had told her exactly what the artefact commanded the ealamal looked like. They matched gazes, neither allowing emotion to reach their faces. To Cordelia's faint surprise, it was the once-empress that looked away first.

"I do understand, you know," Alaya quietly said. "The comfort of holding it in your hand."

Cordelia's face tightened.

"Holding what?" she asked.

The other woman considered that, for a moment.

"Your fate," Alaya finally said. "Made simple and savage, perhaps, but still your fate."

She faintly smiled.

"I knew it was making it all crooked, when I sought the Sahelian gate-maker," the once-empress confessed. "That I was breaking faith with Amadeus, with the tale we told ourselves of a world where the two of us were enough to win."

"So why did you?" Cordelia quietly asked.

"I ask myself that question every day," Alaya of Satus said, sounding tired. "And the answer changes. I have so many reasons, so many excuses, but in the end I suspect there is a single truth buried beneath them. Like a corpse in a grave."

The blue-eyed princess did not interrupt, waiting patiently as she watched the other woman's face.

"I didn't believe we could win," Alaya said. "Not truly, not the way he did. I believe we might have gains, that we might manage our defeats, but I never thought that if we took on the world it would end in anything but tears."

Cordelia, who had spent years and a fortune in silver learning all she could of the Dread Empress of Praes, knew enough about what had brought the dark-skinned beauty to the Tower to feel a sliver of pity. But no more than that, for being handed tragedy was never an excuse for handing it to others. Silence hung above their heads like a waiting sword, growing thicker even as the distant sounds of battle closed in.

"They might win," Cordelia said. "There are Named and armies yet fighting. They might win and slay this... dragon god."

"They might," Alaya agreed, "or the Dead King's last revenge might yet devour all of Calernia. There is no way to tell."

The screams and the clash of steel were so close they might have been mere feet away from the tent. It meant, Cordelia knew, that there was only one barricade left. If even that. All else had fallen. She swallowed thickly, fingers so tight around the baton that her bloodless knuckles matched the ivory's paleness. And it was all coming apart, all coming to an end, and Cordelia just felt so fucking tired.

"Is it too much to ask," she asked Alaya, "that we be allowed to face the end of the world without a mask on?"

The Soninke beauty looked as if she'd been slapped.

"Sometimes," Chancellor Alaya said, "the mask is all you have left."

And Cordelia understood that, she truly did, but then...

"I just want," she murmured, "to be able to weep honest tears before I die. Only once."

"We might not die," Alaya said, then her face tightened. "Well, perhaps not you. I do not believe your ealamal will spare the likes of me."

"I don't know if it will spare anyone," Cordelia admitted. "Or even how far it will reach. It is a blind sword to swing, one that save half the world or kill it. I cannot know before I swing it."

"And the world," Alaya smiled, "it's yours to save?"

"I am a Hasenbach," Cordelia simply said. "I have a duty."

And she would not compromise on that, not even in the face of the end times. A scream sounded, then the sound of flesh being ripped into. It must be right outside the tent to be heard so clearly, she knew. There were no lines of defence left. She reached for the ivory rod. It was not a complicated sequence to trigger the ealamal's release, just one impossible to reach by accident. Cordelia rotated the baton's sculpted lionhead and extended the length, beginning the works and reaching all but the very last. All it would take, now, was to snap it closed.

"I think it might be the pride of the young to demand hard truths even at the end," Alaya of Satus said, breaking the silence, "but I strive to be the sort of woman who settles all her debts."

And there was, they both knew, a kingdom's worth of corpses due between them.

"So I will tell you this," the dark-skinned woman murmured, "though I would rather not speak it, or even think it."

The once-empress smiled, and it was the most heartbreakingly sad thing Cordelia Hasenbach had ever seen.

"I see my death now," Alaya said, "how I will end, and I regret it."

Her fingers closed into fists.

"I wish I had trusted him," Dread Empress Malicia said. "It would have been a better end, the two of us against the world."

And Cordelia knew what she meant, down to the marrow of her bone. Because she knew trust as well, remembered sitting with a woman she'd once hated in the heart of city that should have been a horror but she had found instead to be a wonder. She remembered looking at Catherine Foundling and seeing underneath the warlord the girl who just wanted to help people who'd helped her. Who wanted to make a fairer, kinder world for orcs and goblins and all the lost that'd carried her to the throne. The realization that she was not facing a plague made woman but a dragon of the old tales, fearsome and vicious in defending her hoard but not genuinely evil.

Cordelia wanted to see the city they might make together and the world around it.

But in the end, she thought, what did want matter? Like the three cousins of the tale, she was fighting Death – whether it wore the Dead King's face or some other horror's as a mask mattered little. It was the same spring, the same inevitability. Cordelia had hoped that the sword and helm would be enough to get her through the horror, but now she had to face the truth. They were losing, lost, and moments away from even the ealamal being in the enemy's hand. Evil had won the last laugh.

The best she could hope was for her iron to stick in the Enemy's throat.

A ghoul tore into the tent flap, ripping it up and swallowing a chunk, only for a pair of skeleton to burst past it. Chancellor Alaya drew a knife, rising to her feet, but Cordelia's hands were on the baton. Until she recalled her last gift, and her fingers reached for the parchment against her breast. On the third time they closed, and as the fair-haired princess took up the wisp of parchment she unfolded it to find her cousin's words. Guidance, she prayed, or a secret to pass through the dark. Her cousin's death made into one last blade pointed at the enemy. Instead, what she found was a single sentence hastily scrawled.

No matter where, no matter when, Agnes wrote, I will always bet on Cordelia Hasenbach.

She reared back, as if struck, even as dead poured screaming into the tent. Too many to defeat, too many to hold the ealamal against even with Named. But all she could think of was the tears in Agnes' eyes on that cold day where the soldiers had brought her to Rhenia, after her mother's death. How lost she'd looked, how she'd burst out weeping when Cordelia pulled her close. A bet, huh. Trust from beyond the grave. And here Cordelia had been, making pride out of something she'd dared to call duty. The shame burned at her. The tent began to fall, pegs falling as the dead charged, and Cordelia Hasenbach took the ivory baton in hand. Cordelia had wanted to see the world the two of them might make.

But she was, she found, willing to die for it too.

With a scream, Cordelia Hasenbach broke the ivory baton as she made a bet of her own.

—

The Witch of the Woods stood alone on a plain of glass as the drakon turned and she slowly lowered her hood.

Antigone had never borne a surname, for the only man she might have called a father did not have one. Humans sometimes took a husband's or a wife's, she knew, but though she cared for Hanno they had never wed or cared to and so her name remained as it was, both beginning and end. She liked it better that way, in truth, for it was not just a word: it was a gift. She did not remember who she had been before Kreios found her, and so all that she was had begun with the name he gave her. Antigone. After the Titan he'd held higher in his esteem than any other, dead long before mankind's age began.

She too, her father had once told her, had once stood alone.

The Titans had been given a choice once, after the end of the Long War where they triumphed over the drakoi. The last of them debated whether to seek old glories, the undoing of their losses, or to instead offer a hand to the lesser peoples that had come to be as they fought their great struggle. Seven, she'd been told as a child, had come to decide to clap their lessers – children, they called them – in chains and put them to work until glories of the Gigantes could be restored. Only one had refused, and Antigone instead went west to found eighteen cities that'd outlast all the rest.

Yet when the price of hubris, of trying to unmake the costs paid to Creation for victory, had come calling it was not the seven that perished. Only the Riddle-Maker remained, the last of the Titans, forever shamed that instead of bringing back the lost his great work had instead killed all of them save for him. And even he was broken, lessened. It was why Antigone had never once thought today that she could simply wait out the storm, that if she stood alone long enough her father would make all the trouble go away. Kreios' divinity had been made fragile, finite.

And he had spent it piece by piece since he came to Keter, matching the Dead King blow for blow. Given himself away to save the lives of the children he had fought to put in chains, putting out a star to keep fireflies alight. He had begun with a great work and hardly ceased since, holding nothing back once the Dead King revealed that he had stolen the corpses of two Titans fallen in the Long War. Fighting two of his old comrades come back undead would bring him to the brink, she knew. However lessened and incomplete they were still Titans.

There would be no god standing at the end, no matter who the victor, and so it was in Antigone's hands.

She missed the painted clay mask, the first face the kind giants of Hemera had given her as a girl. Yet even without its protection the Witch of the Woods barely even felt the wind against her skin, her body a stranger to itself. It had a price, to slay even the shadow of a drakon. It was the monster of an age long past, meant to be fought by folk that loomed too tall for even the last gasps of the Age of Wonders. But Antigone had stood in great shadows all her life, known only boots too large for her to fill ever since she first heard the song of Creation. Ever since she was a girl she'd fought to be more, to be complete, and fallen short.

She was the Witch of the Woods, belonging neither to the airy spires of the Gigantes or the crowded cities of mankind. Her home was in the in-between, the antechamber of greatness. Even her Name only allowed her to be a shadow of what Titans had once been, of what Gigantes aspired to be. Antigone, eyes blinking into the too-bright light of the hall, looked upon the drakon that screamed out unending rage. Warped Creation around it simply by existing. Only it wasn't truly a drakon, was it? Not yet, anyway.

"I am a shadow," Antigone said, "but you are one as well. Shall we see which runs deeper?"

The weight of the awakening god was turned on her, her power rising to fight as the air itself began to eat her, but it didn't matter. The body was just a shell, eyes to see. She had already put all of herself in her mask, her face, and the Burglar had delivered it onto the beast. It had sunk deep, as deep as it would, and coated in the Dead King's finest trick it remained whole.

As did Antigone's soul within it.

"Gather," she whispered.

Only it was not moonlight and the power of the land she called to her this time, but blood and sinew and bone. The red writ of the drakon.

"Cradle."

With open hands she brought all she had gathered into her grasp, giving a reverence unearned. But it came into her embrace, joined with her, as the magics she had learned did. Closed against her she held the wriggling essence of the dead god, trying to slip her grasp.

"Sing."

To be one with the world, to see the manifold paths of consequence: the stone that became the avalanche, the droplet that became the tide. It had been a pure thing, all that Antigone aspired to be. It had let her see what the Gigantes saw, for the barest of moments, and wield the greatest of their works as her own. Only it was not her father's song she sang today, the lessons she loved. Instead she sang the red and the hunger, the doom-made-intellect that was the drakon. And in that perfect moment she understood it, as perfectly as she was allowed to understand Creation.

And so she was a god, a circle full and complete, the crowned essence of the act to eat.

"It was mine," Antigone smiled, and closed her eyes.

And even as her body fell apart, she took her first and last act as a god: she ate herself, until nothing was left.

Not even a shadow.

—

In the ashes of a broken city, Kreios Maker-of-Riddles fell to his knees and wept, for as the last of what he had been passed he had felt his only daughter die.

ruduen

Wow... Just... Wow. The threats are dealt with, but the world will feel the cost of it all.

There's only one threat that's left. All that's left is for those last pieces to fall into place. With or without death coming, it's the end of the tale – and it's time to see just how well she handles being on that side of the story.

Rabblrouser

Man, all the Names I wanted to learn more about are dying. This chapter really kicking me in my feels.

Sir Nil

You all did Good.

Gunslinger

I'm crying. What a moment of character development from Cordelia. Agnes your genius. And holy hell Antigone's last stand. Perfection

caoimhinh

I just now realized why this last group of Interludes is called Legends.

It's because the lines between Chosen and Villains have blurred, and they are something else now. They are all here doing good, all making hard choices in the face of death, doom, and despair. They all make their last stand.

So they are something else. Something greater, and less colored by the politics and tags usually associated with their respective callings.

Here they are all Damned, fighting in a hell of a war, seizing their own fate in their hands, and putting their own madness against the odds of doing the impossible.

Here they are all Heroes, fighting and sacrificing themselves to save the world.

Here they are all Legends.

Clayton

Holy crap, what a chapter. This was so good, I'm absolutely speechless.

Darkening

Man, the gigantes went all in on this. I doubt the dead broke through to Cordelia without the spellsingers spending all their power and burning themselves out, Kreios spent his godhood to put down the titan corpses and fight off the dead king, and now Antigone is dead. Really putting the coffin nails in for the Age of Wonder. This is about as ruinous a victory as I've ever seen. I'm not sure what's left to keep the rats from coming south and eating everyone after this battle, that might be an issue. Kinda wish we'd seen more of the drow, we barely saw them mentioned at all after Rumena broke the gate.

Sir Nil

After both DK and Drakon lost control of the undead, I bet the Drow over the Rats any day, especially since they won't be specifically countered for using Night.

KiltedBastich

Yeah, it's been established that the Drow look at the Ratling invasions as an asset. A free moving buffet of Night to harvest, that returns of its own volition? That attacks nearly mindlessly, with no real tactics, and vast numbers? Just about perfect. They can gleefully get their murder on, and the rest of Calernia will be cheering them on.

mavant

I dunno, the one Horned Lord we encountered seemed like a plausible match for the Ten Generals.

Joe Mama

One, or even a few of them, yeah. All ten (well, two are dead, iirc, so eight), with a pseudo-god on their side? Probably not

Adrian V

Yeah, plus it was undead so it was actually weaker than one alive, plus out of the five named i think it was the weakest? I know at least 1 that when it was mentioned Cat was really glad it wasn't the one they were facing

Someperson

The first horned lord would probably be a tricky match for even the drow's finest, yes.

But what a prize of Night, should they win...

I wouldn't bet on the second horned lord winning.

nipi

The drow are in more need than ever and the rats shall become night

Rey d`Tutto

Well, Sve Noc is Whole, the Chain is an ever replenished feast of Night...

Tenthyr

Arthur learning to refuse the temptation accepting the Pit.

Cordelia learning to trust in a better world.

Antigone learning what it means to be named after her namesake, heartbreakingly.

And what's even left, for Yara to play? Not much, I would gamble. She thinks she'll just start again. I suspect she'll find a Fetter on her wrist.

Shin_Splinters

I know we've all been theorizing who would wear the other fetter, and we still can't be quite sure... But there's only one person in that spire who isn't named, meaning the Intercessor is half blind to her, and she's currently down in a narrative sense and holding one of the fetters. So I'd bet on Akua being the one to actually chain Yara, while Cat is holding the other. Not sure if Cat will end up wearing it, but basically all of her friends who came to Keter are still alive, so the narrative may demand a greatwtr sacrifice from her.

GoodGirlJW

I've just been waiting for the Chain of Hunger to show up during all of this, ever since the siege started. Somehow lured in to screw everyone over at the last moment. Maybe the Bard will do so, though at this point, I doubt it.

They'll more likely be the enemy in whatever comes after Practical Guide to Evil, if it's in the same setting. I assume that such a sequel will be based in Cardinal, and I am here for it. ♥

Darkening

Nah, EE already posted the first few chapters of their next project a while back. It's some underground world with like, renaissance level tech and people making contracts with gods for magic powers and stuff. It looked pretty interesting.

GoodGirlJW

Oh... Well, I'm disappointed that we won't get a series set after Practical Guide, but I look forward to more by this great author at least.

Rey_d`Tutto

<https://palelights613694448.wordpress.com/2021/02/25/chapter-1>

alexjmscott

There's nothing to stop the author coming back to the setting a few projects down the line, even if he's taking a break from it with the immediately-next one.

The Chain don't really strike me as (normally) having much strategic awareness of what's going on in the rest of Calernia, and/or the inclination/ability to take advantage of the distraction with a major assault. That probably gives whatever remains of the Grand Alliance a few seasons at least to recover and rebuild before they need to face the Rats, more likely years or even decades. And from a writing point of view, that changeover interval gives a good opportunity for a change of viewpoint protagonist, should the author decide that the Warden's generation have earned their retirement!

GoodGirlJW

Yeah! Just fell in love with this setting and these characters even though I only found this web serial like a week or two ago, and I don't want to leave it any time soon.

Tristan Dixon

I have loved every chapter of Book 7, and the Occidental arc in particular. But this chapter has to be my favorite. The contrasts between regret and conviction are breathtaking and amazing to read. First, Alaya's words about her motivation, the rift with Amadeus, and her final confession; contrasted with Cordelia's choice to believe she could win, Agnes' final words, and her ultimate choice to shatter the control device. Then, Antigone's fulfillment of her potential by using Kreios' lessons to become a god and then eat herself; contrasted with the too little too late actions of Kreios in the past and his despair at feeling her die. And over everything, the sense that the last few legends that exist on Calernia are being crushed, but that they have to be if the continent is to move forward. And on a personal level, I grinned so hard it hurt the first time Agnes used that line after Cordelia caught Hanno's coin, and I nearly cackled aloud when I read it again here. Plus, I've always loved Arthur, and seeing him really come into his own is always the most awesome of sauce.

Tom

For the curious, Agnes's original line and context and source:

> "It does not matter," the Augur said, "if on the other side stand kings and monsters and all the gods that stride this earth. It does not matter if the odds are paltry and the signs scream of defeat with every silent voice."

> Blue eyes and a warm embrace. Of course you'll live with us now. You are family. You always will be. This, this she would not forget until that final venture beyond where she was meant to go.

> "I will," Agnes said, "always, always bet on Cordelia Hasenbach."

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/09/04/interlude-and-yet-we-stand/>

Peter Emuss

> "until that final venture beyond where she was meant to go."

Her manner of death prophesied that far back, both in and out of story. Bravo EE. Bravo.

Liliet

Something in between a plan and a prophecy...

;~;

Damian Lucius Black

No matter where, no matter when, Agnes wrote, I will always Boost A Practical Guide To Evil

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Mirror Night

Honestly EE kinda unfair that all Cat's Friends get to live while all Hanno's Friends die. All he has got left is the healer at this point that we have actually seen him bond with. I suppose they went out on their own terms but still.

Sure Hakram is crippled but 1,000,000 gold Orc will be built back even better. But Viv is going to be Queen, Masego got revenge on DK/godhead, Indrani got to be Ranger and what Cat is going to lose Akua. I mean I suppose that might slap for Catkua fans but since I never liked it that has like zero impact on me.

'Ladi Williams

Why are humans never happy until they compare one thing with another?

What makes Hanno cats equal or rival that you decided to pick and compare him with her?

Using this logic of yours we can nitpick all we want bcos we can say why did the lordlings survive but Amadeus did not?

Enjoy the stoey and stop looking for shit to be disappointed about

Liliet

Because, as is well known, only relentless positivity is allowed in this comment section?

'Ladi Williams

Lol. Well no, but nitpicking is really really annoying 😂

Mirror Night

Not sure how it would be nitpicking.

All of Hanno's friend except one appear dead and it really depends on how much of a friend you want to count the Apostle as. All of Cat's friends appear alive at this point.

As for why I chose to compare them I would think that would be kinda obvious to anyone reading this story. Though I suppose I don't need any special reason to compare two characters. I think part of the fun of literary analysis is drawing interesting connections between characters.

Fair Point Lil, no body no death though I believe dear Champ had taken some significant injuries before she disappeared seems unlikely she walk those off.

'Ladi Williams

I was just coming off twitter when I replied that comment and I guess my anger at some idiots carried over.

I tend to not want to argue with long term readers bcos it's obvious you like the story asuch if not much ore than I do to still be here after all these years...long term readers being handles I see regularly in comments and recognise...

So...sorry? 😂

But as much as criticism is good for the author and should be encouraged, some just rub me the wrong way.

Mirror Night

Eh its fine I have heard worst on this site.
But I accept your apology and know how annoying twitter can get.

Rey d`Tutto

YouTwitFace is a plague on humanity.

jamesc9

More or less of a plague, if a current purchase plan goes through?

Rynjin

Not really an excuse, since if you're willingly using Twitter, you're causing that toxicity in yourself.

'Ladi Williams

I don't even understand what this means.
Also, person I was tendering an apology to has accepted it so I don't get why you are being salty especially as you don't even have an horse in this race.

Anyways...peace and love. 🙌🥰

'Ladi Williams

A horse...😂🤔😏

Rynjin

It means that "I worked myself into a lather arguing with morons on Twitter" isn't a valid excuse for being a dick to someone else. Nothing is, really, but being pissed off at something that actually matters (bad day at work, your dog died, you had a fight with your girlfriend, whatever) is at least understandable.

When you're angry due to something self-inflicted (spending your time on Twitter), it's neither an excuse OR understandable when you're a dick somewhere else.

Liliet

We're talking about the gal who couldn't be hurt by the ghosts because they're not real while having no problem hitting them back.

When the intent of the summon was the exact reverse.

Raphaella and reality are on some very specific terms.

Damian Lucius Black

AUTHOR'S EDIT:

That's enough. Post the links if you want, there's no rule about it, but what you're doing is borderline harassment. Keep doing it and you'll be getting banned.

Josh Brooks

Toxic fandom in it's purest form.

Liliet

You're assuming Raph is dead, but have we seen the body?

Rey d`Tutto

Cat loathed her for causing Captain's death. For sure she's alive.

Sugar Roll

That's why they're the fucking Woe. Do you see any other band with a group name?

HAHIND

Maybe it even was an elaborate attempt by Catherine to lose as few of the Woe as possible, since the main engagement was against the Scourges, which are far less dangerous than the DK.

medailyfun

It just means the story of Woe is the one to survive against the odds

Spencer

I don't think their name invokes a happy story of survival.

Joe Mama

I mean, out of context sure, but when the Summer Queen named them it was that they bring Woe onto their enemies.

Rey d`Tutto

Plucky Underdog

Hargabga

Well, it's the fate of not being close to the protagonist. They should've known it's a webnovel and that Cat is a main character.

Sugar Roll

And heroes sacrificing themselves for the greater good is a known occupational hazard.

G .

I mean, this story is about making evil the right way, she took her father's steps and make them better and beyond, she deserves the Woe to live through it till the end.

Spencer

That's a big assumption given that we haven't seen the end of the Bard yet. I'm still waiting for more woe to befall the Woe. Probably starting with their leader.

Steve

The Bard is still breathing.

GoodGirlJW

Ah, yes, Catherine's friends, famous for still being alive. You have definitely recalled correctly all those chapters where they definitely didn't die tragically and horribly. And you are certainly not jumping to any conclusions about her friends here when the series isn't over.

This is a balanced and reasonable critique based on facts and logic that you have written. Definitely.

Darkening

Well, the bard is still alive, she was in a band with him so that counts right? 😊

ninegardens

Oh shit.

Ohhhh shit.

I mean... of everyone here, in some sense, Bard's betrayal of the white knight was the most personal. Sacrificing the other members of his band. Using him.

... and she DID just mention that he was one of the hardest people for her to turn aside.

.... Is Hanno going to be the one that brings her down. Not for justice, not for judgement, but because he himself truly believes that she is evil.

That... would feel pretty good.

ByVectron!

They aren't Cats "friends," they are her party of five, they have been her family for years (if not as long as she's been Named), and they are The Woe. Hanno has friends and sometime companions (except for Antigone,) but nothing compare to the weight of relationship between The Woe.

badatgames2911

OH YEAH SURE THE HERO GETS TO BE A GOD BEFORE MESAGO

jk i loved that and i called that she was gonna b eat the drakon with her gigantes magic. loved the 300 spell singers comin to help at the end of the world.

AGNES W0000 get bent bard.

Ishaq is still my fav non woe villain.

Arthur and Saipan have a great relationship. good to see Kalia do stuff, i hope she is still alive. Alya and Cordy was a great scene, i have enjoyed Alya a lot since she became Chancellor. No word on hakram/ vivi is worrying, was thinking Ranger would come out last sec to help finish the drakon but this was great too. I expect to see some stuff from the dwarf and drow side of things, especaially Rumena THE TOMB MAKER and Iva the LoSS. I want to see Iva leading a band of goblins with night powers to win the day. Only race we know of we havent seen at this point is the gods damned gnomes lol.

dadycoool

Ishaq is and has always been a delight. He won't get his name on the roles now, having failed his accepted task, but sometimes the trailblazer doesn't make it to his destination, overly wearied by the trail he's blazing. All that really matters is that he left footprints for others to follow.

Arthus and Saipan follow in the groove Amadeus and Weseka carved and Cat and Masego live in, the magic user and knight becoming acquainted because their parents/teachers were such close friends and forging an equal friendship on their own.

Mirror Night

I would say they are more the new Saint and Peregrine though will have to see what they plan to do long term. Its not clear the Mage is going to spend her time questing.

Snappy270

How ? The Mage doesn't seem to be much of a peregrine. She may have trained as a healer but she has transcended that and now cares about magic as a whole. Seems alot more like wekesa and mesago.

Arthur maybe good with swords but seems to care about doing an ideal like callow or saving someone. Saint only cared about fighting evil at all times, not because she was trying to achieve something only cause its evil.

Plus it's the mentoring. Black to cat to Arthur. Wekesa to mesago to saipan.

Liliet

Yeah, Arthur and Sapan are giving me more Indrani and Masego vibes (but fully platonic) with one wandering around and the other serving as a home base and backup when it's needed/appropriate.

KiltedBastich

Er, Ishaq killed the Wolfhound, one of the Scourges, which means he very much did accomplish the required feat to be added to the Rolls, with a little bit of help from Sve Noc. It was a whole thing with him gaining Night. Did you miss it?

'Ladi Williams

I think the slew of awesome chapters since then has mostly made a lot of people forget the tiny stuff...but yeah he did get his deed and that's when he was offered and gleefully accepted night.

dadycool

I was under the impression that they told him to kill the Dead King himself, not just a Scourge. I remember how big a deal it was that Cat's chosen successor in the T&T was getting the Night powerup.

fox5s

That's what they wanted to set it to initially. However, that was deemed by the leaders Levant to be too high a bar and a bad precedent of difficulty to set. It was scaled back to him getting one of the Scourges.

fox5s

Errr... correction. That was what the leaders of Levant wanted it set to. Cat and Hanno had them scale it down to one of the Scourges.

dadycoool

Okay. I remember Cat offering to negotiate down and Ishaq declined, saying something about how, as the first one, his Deed should be greatest. I could very well be misremembering or didn't catch the entire thing.

Cpt. Obvious

You are correct about Cat wanting to negotiate for a easier goal, but that was after they had already been convinced to back it down to killing a scourge.

The thing is that in order to be added to the Rolls you have to perform a noteworthy deed. For a long time only Heroes had their names added, and just about any heroic deed was accepted. When they were forced to accept that any named could apply to have their name added even if they were villains the immediate reaction was to require a deed so hard it was most likely impossible. However when they were told that if that was the new standard then there would probably never be any more names added to the Rolls they went with killing a scourge.

Cat argued that this was also a ridiculously high risk deed. Not only were they hard to destroy, but there was also a very limited number of them.

Ishaq on the other hand thought it was a good choice. It would set the bar higher for everyone to come. No longer would getting a Hero name be enough to have your name added to the Rolls but you would have to back it up with a deed that is truly noteworthy. This would also increase the honor that having having your name added meant. Now just having your name in the Rolls weren't enough. There would also be a question if it was added after or before Ishaq. And if it was before just what was the deed that got the name added. If it was after Ishaq then it would be a given that the deed was something truly special. So not only would he be the first Villain to be added for a very long time (Some of the founders didn't really seem all that Heroic...) but he's name would be known for raising the standard. And that would satisfy his villainous need to get one up on the keepers of the Rolls.

Abaddon130

Bit of a correction here. Up until now no was required to be added to the roles. Everybody in Levant that came into a Heroic name was automatically added. You could be either Blood, Bestowed, or both(Called something like Chosen in Bestowal and Blood). When the leaders of Levant agreed to allow Villainous names to be added to the Rolls a stipulation was added. Now, instead of all Heroic named automatically being added to the list and Villains automatically excluded, anyone with a Name can't be added to the Rolls with the caveat that you had to perform a worthy deed that was chosen by the leaders of the Blood. So, while a significant portion, potentially 100%, of those that had been added up until now probably performed at least one deed that would be considered worthy of being added, there was no guarantee. I don't remember which one of the blood had the thought, but I distinctly remember it being noted that this new method would keep the people from being added just because they were Named. I'm pretty sure they also noted that this would be a significant boon to the rulers of Levant. Being able to, either send names to take care of an issue that would otherwise be quite a headache, or in rare cases give a task that would be extremely difficult to complete in order to keep certain people from being added to the Rolls.

So I agree that the distinction of being added pre or post Ishaq will probably be a big distinction from now on, but there won't necessarily be deeds from the past to compare it to.

Liliet

He had succeeded in his task though

nipi

He already got his deed and being Deathless he might still be around. We have seen him be killed before. Not sure how well he would fare against being absorbed though.

beleester

I think the knight and wizard being friends is pretty common because of the "adventuring party" setup that most bands fall into – we've seen it in multiple places, like the Lone Swordsman's original band. But Hierophant seems to have started a tradition of the wizard being a master of deadpan humor.

Cpt. Obvious

Earlier in the story I wrote a comment about how the then Squire and Apprentice seemed to echo a theme. We know that Amadeus and Wekesa first met and became friends when they were Squire and Apprentice respectively. Then Cat, under tutelage of Amadeus, met and befriended Masego, foster son to Wekesa. And again it was as Squire and Apprentice.

Just to make it even more interesting Amadeus and Wekesa had fostered friendships with several other villains forming a group of five that lasted for many years. Something that was generally considered almost impossible. And to this core group of named they also tied several non named friends who were sworn to the Gods below. They got so well known the group got named as the Calamities.

Cat and Masego echoed that, and even got named as the Woe.

So will Arthur and Sapan copy their "parents" and form a group that echo the Calamities and the Woe?

After the 6'th book I thought so, but now I'm not sure. Is the Errant part of Arthur's name going to keep him from being a part of a fixed group? If his name drives him to be the lone defender it might take some work to get a group of five to work well.

Rey d`Tutto

Don't want Gnomes. Much Bad. Much.

Isi Arnott-Campbell
dadycoool

Wow. EE continues to show us how adept they are at plucking at our heartstrings like Yara with her lute. Most stories have characters that only really exist as characters, but EE has given life to the individuals in this world. It's easy to see Named and Stories as nothing but Tropes, but they're so much more than that and chapters like this really highlight that. Well done, you made my heart break for someone whose Extra Chapter I haven't even read yet.

Juff

Typo Thread:

left the wards? > left of the wards?
that longer had > that number had horsemen died > horsemen who died her strode > he strode
the got the > the Myrmidon guts > Myrmidon's guts straight angle (strange angle?)

broke palisade > broken palisade allow to > allow it to those that had > those had sight your > sight into your under swarm > under swarms another rippled > another ripple comradery > camaraderie some hope > some hoped roared to life > roaring to life spikes returned > spikes paw the > paw, but the glimpse or > glimpse of monster at (monster ate? monster tore at?) saw Emerald > saw an Emerald open grounds (repeated) colours The > colours. The disappeared into > disappear into a no and > a nod and warband, > warbands, that save > that might save until glories > until the glories

Mirror Night

I think things would have flowed better if we had this occur before the final fight against DK so we could go direct from DK to Bard. Maybe add more doubt to what is going on with the Undead so its unclear if they won or not. But this chapter kinda kills the flow even if it is on its own well written.

I also think a lot of these characters needed more characterization before hand. Cause like all the Hanno, Antigone, Krieos and Gigantes stuff is in like Extra Chapters. Arthur kinda disappeared after the Praes arc and his connection to Tariq was never that strong. Painted Knife had a cool band plot in the Free Cities and got taunted by Cat some? And as for the Burglar not sure we even knew her gender beforehand so kinda weird she is playing a major role here.

'Ladi Williams

It can't have happened before the dk fight bcos the Young King had to hand off his kingdom to the drakoi.
How else was the drakoi going to get its greedy hands on the reins of death without undermining the Young King?

Mirror Night

Yes that is why I said make it a bit more unclear on if DK is actually dead in this chapter and then you can switch order. Have the story go Legends V, DK Final Fight, and Bard Resolution.

Because IMO, this chapter while good and poignant and tragic is kinda a momentum killer. With my other issue being some of these characters are a bit light on the characterization front for this final deaths and stands to hit as hard as possible.

Snappy270

But this is fighting the bard. This is one of her last plays before finally confronting cat for the last time. But agnes comes in the right moment to stop that story.

Plus alot of stories go like this the main villan is dead but a last plan to destroy everything gets set off. In terms of momentum this is in keeping with most stories.

There just an extra act know the end where the hidden boss gets a go. Like many stories.

Crash

Agnes, yet again: Fuck you, Bard.

You love to see it!

Liliet

What momentum is there left to have?

Yara lost. This is her loss. There's no more momentum because there's no more confrontation. This IS the climax. This is it.

Snappy270

hell no Yara isnt dealt with there is another climax with her.

ninegardens

I mean... maybe.

The Ealamalelelmalm was kind of the last card we saw up Yara's sleeve. She MIGHT have something, but there just aren't many remaining plot threads for her to pull on.

I'll admit, I am a little confused/worried by the fact that she was up in the tower talking to Cat and co when she could have been down on the ground, screwing over Antigone, or pushing Cordelia harder. Which... honestly really should have worked if Yara had put her focus on it.

Like, that convo with Alaya could easily have been interrupted.

Which ummmm....

does lead to the disturbing possibility that there is something MORE damaging she can be doing in the tower? But I'm not sure what. Mostly I'm confused.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

She was trying to get Cat to become her successor at the last second, which could potentially have negated the need to annihilate Calernia. I guess? Who knows, honestly.

Calvin

And so ends the legacy of the Titans, the last of the old gods who roamed the earth. All hail the crows!

Liliet

People I predict are alive despite logic:

Cordelia

Kallia

Raphaela

Liliet

Whoops didn't mean to reply

Mirror Night

Cordelia: Sure I don't think EE is going to kill her likes her too much.

Kallia: One of the most esoteric Aspects around no idea how it works but yeah she seems alive.

Raphaela: Well no body is in her favor she wasn't in the best of shape when she activated her Domain. Could go either way.

Crash

She's a Hero. If you didn't see them die, assume they're alive.

The Cliff is the real trick or perspective.

Agent J

Kallia better not be dead. We lost Vagrant Spear and Silver Huntress. Give me Kallia, EE, you miserly death merchant. You even slew the Wolf Mother!

I won't complain about Antigone though. She went out with fireworks, I loved it. Pulled a Warlock and killed herself with Divinity. Except, because she's better than the Warlock in every way, instead of Dooming a City, she Saved a Continent.

Yes. Fucking. Queen.

Liliet

I especially love the part where she's like "well Hanno and I never bothered to get married" queen indeed

caoimhinh

If I recall correctly, the last time the issue of whether Hanno and Antigone had something was discussed, it was from Hanno's POV in one of the Winter Extra Chapters, when Repentant Magister teases him saying someone should tell Antigone that all she has to do is ask to get in bed with Hanno, to which Hanno mentally responds that it wasn't the first time others had talked about it, but that he and Antigone don't have anything going on. He even confidently states this because the body sign language that they often communicate in is a language without lies.

I always found that funny, because my first reaction was "Just because she is not telling you something doesn't mean that she is lying", and turns out I was right, Antigone cared for Hanno, but apparently never confessed her feelings.

That, or they got together afterward. I do seem to recall that Hanno seemed to be sharing a house with Antigone back when they went to Salia the first time...

alexjmscott

Hanno and Antigone did share a bed at one point, according to the bonus chapter "Stranger", and may have done so since, but they appear to have decided mutually that their closeness and affection did not need that distraction on any ongoing basis.

Liliet

No, he doesn't say "he and Antigone don't have anything going on". He says "he and Antigone know EXACTLY what they have going on" and goes on for an entire paragraph about how definite that is.

Hanno had a crush on Antigone that he kept down because she's ace, and Antigone was just thinking of him as her qp partner in the meantime. I love them.

bellacohl

"One: first, do good."

Not Good.

Do good. Do right by others, not by the Heaven's writ. Because it is the right thing to do.

Arthur's choice at the Tower, Hanno's at Keter. Cordelia.

God I love this series.

mavant

I interpreted this as a pointed contrast to the Hippocratic Oath rather than about good versus Good. A statement on the value of active good works versus merely avoiding bad ones.

Liliet

It's multiple things ♥

ninegardens

>>No matter where, no matter when, Agnes wrote, I will always bet on Cordelia Hasenbach.

I called it! I fucking called it.

Agnes Hasenbach, you glorious moonloop. You are without a doubt, the greatest seer.

And once again, you have saved us all.

Also: I kind of love Witch of the Wilds being the one to end the Drakon. They've been hyping up her power level for like... 5 books now, but she's always been the hero of another story and... feels like she's got to do that again now. Feels appropriate.

badatgames2911

Some times i still think of her as Wich of the Wilds too. I also think Wayward Bard sometimes bc they called her that when she was in Lone Swordsmans band. I like it when Named are called other things, makes me think its like a cool alternate skinn. Literally for Wayward Bard!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I think of her as the Witch of the Wilds because I used to play a lot of Dragon Age: Origins, which has some people called that in it.

Hargabga

I actually find what Antigone did a contrast to what Warlock did in his final moment.

"He reached out for it then, what they'd shown him. The barest glimpse of the godhead, but oh so gloriously full.

"Reflect," he whispered.

For a moment, for an eternity, Wekesa was unto a god.

He snapped his fingers and the world broke."

dadycoool

Selfishness v selflessness. Sacrificing others for your own gain v sacrificing yourself for others' benefit. He broke the world, she made it whole.

Mirror Night

I mean he did it to save Masego. I am not sure you can describe what he did as Selfish. I suppose you can in the sense that he was doing it to save a single person versus the world. But I don't think its fair to describe Weseka doing that as being selfish.

dadycoool

I'm realizing that I really should go back and actually reread everything. I'm dreading the month it'll take, but clearly I haven't gotten everything I should out of it and parts of it, big parts, are fading from my memory.

Rey d`Tutto

I'm waiting on the finale before my fourth re-read

Asterix

EE's SO must be smug as heck:.when EE says "here comes the climax", he really, really means it.

Also:

"No matter where, no matter when I will always bet on Cordelia Hasenbach.

P.S. Get bent, Yara of Nowhere. I hope you live forever.

Sincerely,

Agnes Hasenbach"

Checkov's Armory FTW

Mary Gentle

When they tell that story of the Cousins here, their name is the Three Little Pigs, and the Death's name is Wolf . . .

(Sorry? Me? I'm not sorry!)

And – no Angel? No Angel! ☹

I've been waiting whole books for Chekov's Angel to be fired, and now you do this to us. Grump.

It took me a while to warm to the Barrow Sword, but now I just love him.

And yes, Alaya, you utter moron, you should have trusted Amadeus. Honestly, has it taken until the (near) end of the world for you to work that out?

Kind of a bitty chapter, which mostly leaves me grumbling. Because, no Angel. Dammit, I wanted to know what would happen when the Angel is fired off, and now we'll never know.

Spencer

Don't we know pretty well what the Angel does? It kills everyone that doesn't pass judgement. Which under the Bard would be everyone on the continent except 40 heros.

The angel was still a pretty damn important plot point, even if they avoided actually pulling the trigger.

Mary Gentle

It seems to me like there ought to be something else still hanging there. Though evidently there isn't.

Like it goes: we'll use the angel – we won't use the angel – but then the angel [something].

I have no idea what the [something] would be, but all the build up just to not use it... Poot.

Besides, Judgement has the day off. Wouldn't it have been end of the world cool to see what Yara would have done in their stead?

No?

Eh, maybe you're right.

Snappy270

well they did use the angel several times to defend the Salia. Since Judgement was cut off, it was just a large source of light. With Judgement connected but not active it could be manipulated by the bard, which results in what 7/10ths of calernia dying including the dwarfs ? So ... it goes argue about the angel for a book. Use it cause we have too ... Oh no its a doomsday device again but we cant tell anyone, Agnes saves the day.

MoreBeer

We know exactly what Yara was planning to do in Judgment's place. It was spelled out for us. Kill everyone except an arbitrarily small number of people too small to survive for long, so that within a few years everyone dies, leading to the absolute end of all stories and her release from the eternal role of intercessor.

It was absolutely end of the world. No need to see it; i think that sort of story isn't the one we're reading. Just imagining it and seeing it deflected its fine for me!

Crash

I wanted a Kreios interlude but Not Like This. That's just fucking rude.):

(Was the liessen blonde sergeant Edgar? Wish)

Spencer

Poor Kreios. I wonder if he's mortal now, or if he'll be stuck for eternity with his grief and powerlessness.

Sinead

Perhaps he has one last song in him.

BargleNawdleZouss

Edgar was from Laure, IIRC. I just hope he made it off that bridge when Catherine led the assault into the city.

Still hoping Lt. Inger from The Arsenal made it through...

badatgames2911

Inb4 the sergent that used to tell cat stories when she served drinks in the rats nest shows up.

onedollargum

Antigone does her best carbuncle impression.

beleester

You know, I'm honestly not sure if Agnes's note was an actual prophetic nudge, or just trying to be encouraging no matter when Cordelia ended up needing advice.

GentCrowCruisin

I think the trick was to see when Cordelia would read the thing and then figuring out what to say to her at that moment.

ninegardens

Agnes: *Spends years trying to figure out what to do in the end despite oracle blockers.

Agnes: Fuckit, I got nothing

Agnes: Better write and encouraging note and trust my Cuzzy.

ninegardens

More seriously though, it might not have been prophecy OR "just an encouraging note". Agnes might have been leaning hard on the story fu and gone "Fuck it, an encouraging note from a dying oracle at the right time is probably enough story weight to sort this out, even if I have no idea what `this' is."

Daniel E

Dramas aside, I love the fact that over the last 2 chapters, the solution to a world-ending ancient evil has been 'om nom nom, delicious soul'.

BargleNawdleZouss

Hells of a chapter. Again!

1. Glad Ishaq made it and continuing to kick ass.
2. Chekhov's Ealamal...averted!
3. Arthur got a crowning moment of awesome and his first Aspect as Knight Errant, excellent.
4. I wondered if Cordelia and Alaya would ever have a face-to-face. Well done!
5. What's Malanza's status?
6. Next chapter: need updates on what the dwarves and drow are up to! I'm a bit sad that Rumena wasn't in on the Dead King's destruction.
7. If we get a nice long LOTR Return Of The King extended epilogue, I want to see how Sapan the Mage upends the Ashuran tier system, which always rubbed me the wrong way.

8. Awaiting Ranger Indrani's timely return to watch Masego's back while he achieves apotheosis.

9. Will Neshamah come back one final time?

10. Assuming #9 is NO, then who will hold the Fetters. I believe it will be for the Wandering Bard, with any of the following holding the leash:

- Catherine
- Akua
- Anaxares the Hierarch

11. At what point do the Gods of Above & Below stop The Game of the Gods and reboot the playing field?

SuitorShooter

The Fetters were built from the Crown of Autumn, an artifact forged specifically for Neshama twice over. Using them on someone else is probably a narrative no-no. Besides, it can't be Cat, she knows she's too important as both the Warden and founder of Cardinal to be taken off the board. I feel like Akua passed some kind of pivot where the Fetters could have been forced onto her but weren't, her taking them now doesn't feel right. And I can't see Anaxares ever using the Fetters, ever accepting slavery be it as slave or master.

Adrian_V

Mmmmm i really wonder what the dwarves and their Herald have to be dealing with since they didn't show up in epic fashion from below the earth, seriously their part seemed to go a little too well compared to everything else.

Also i think i remember Erra confirmed that the ratlings came to be from the Drakons, something about blood? They confirmed it on discord and its on the WOE doc if i remember well, if so this whole thing with the drakon really puts in perspective some of what future generations will have to look out for against.

Also i wonder if the Emerald Swords late arrivals is because the Drakon managed to trick them and they just noticed they weren't hacking at it xD

PS:poor Kreios, he needs a hug, no seriously he needs one otherwise i think he may just finally snap from grief and become the next BIG terror at some point.

Rey d`Tutto

Kreios is Broken. He's got little Story-fu left at the End of the Age of Wonders.

Adrian_V

Is the broken ones that are the most dangerous, and he just knows too much, losing his god status may have just made him more dangerous if he snaps

SuitorShooter

An interesting Aspect for Arthur to pick up. Wound, he can always harm, but not necessarily kill. I wonder if he'd have gotten a different Aspect if they'd told him to kill the Drakon, not just wound it.

BargleNawdleZouss

Big Picture question: has there been an explanation, "on-stage" or off, of the win condition for The Game Of The Gods? Whether in one of the chapters, comments section, Reddit, Discord, or elsewhere? Given what Neshamah, Wekesa, and Masego researched, at what point do Above and Below agree that one side has won the current round, and it's time to wipe the slate clean and start a new Game?

Please post the appropriate link(s), if available. Thanks in advance!

ninegardens

So, here's my question: Do the gods above and below even exist?

Cause see like... we don't have any definitive proof. Yes yes, there's laws of creation, and story fu and all that. But like... we have living things in our world, and everyone said "Well, it must have been created by the gods", and then we discovered evolution.

I mean, okay, I guess we have Yara insisting that "there's a bunch of people 'upstairs' who are wondering what you are up to to heirarch", its just...

You've got Amadeus, who was always pretty angry to see "Half the world, turned into a prop for the glory of the other half." (he also claimed that he would never blame fate, and it was things PEOPLE did that mattered, so... his philosophy might possibly have not been entirely coherent on that point)

The two biggest villians in the story are those characters who shake their fists at the gods. For letting them be finite. For forcing them to be immortal. Whatever.

Nessie and Yara are driven by their anger at the gods, their desire to escape them....

But what if the the gods very existence is nothing but an idea. They aren't railing against actual beings, they're destroying the world in their anger against... well nothing. The closest we get to seeing the gods is Kairo's death, with him seeing a vision of their applause as he dies. Which, you know... could have been the hallucination of a dying man seeing precisely what he hoped and expected.

Maybe the bet just can't end, for the simple reason that there never was a bet, or potentially even any bettors. I think that that's a bit of a weird reading of the story I've got here, but I also think the story so far has done a very good job of never really confirming the POINT of any of it (or even telling you clearly who bet which way.)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Another point about this: the goblins are monotheistic. They construe Below as a singular, all-encompassing god, the Gobbler, from which all things came and to which all things shall return.

I personally like to think that the Gods do exist, but that their natures are essentially filtered through any relevant stories, having simply been one or two amorphous masses of divinity before making Arcadia (and if one, then eventually splitting under inadvertent fae influence), and only being refined further by Creation. Perhaps instead of growing bored of the fae's stagnant nature in the same way that mortals might grow bored, they instead started over because they can only know themselves through their own handiwork and were being stifled by Arcadia's on-rails nature.

WuseMajor

And next chapter starts with the Bard going "...Where's the Kaboom? There was supposed to be an earth-shattering Kaboom!"

WuseMajor

I'm hoping that Masego brings something into play that stops the Bard's last card from being played. Because, right now, all the cards we know about have been played.

The Dead King is Dead.

The Drakon is Dead.

The Angel's Baton is broken.

But Yara of Nowhere is still here, so she must have something left. And, I bet Cat could find it...if she knew 100% what Bard's true endgame was.

Which the Dead King figured out...but didn't tell anyone. Except Masego just ate his soul, so, if her true goal is anything other than “just die already,” hopefully Masego will puzzle that out and mention it at the right time.

Pencilcrayons2

Absolutely stunning chapter. I have chills. I’m not ready for the end.

Letouriste

That...that was really something. Legends indeed. I’m at lost for words haha

Someperson

I’m a tad concerned that that one Revenant who Catherine saw briefly, the confused-looking and unarmored one who the Dead King apparently decided to hold back, still hasn’t turned up.

Chapter 68: Hallow; Hollow

“And though her schemes lay broken around her, the Intercessor only laughed and said: ‘When one defeats the inevitable, the word for it is not victory but delay.’”

– Extract from the ‘Parables of the Lost and Found’, disputed Firstborn religious text

Yara of Nowhere sat on the Dead King’s throne with legs crossed, smiling as I Saw from atop the spire the way the stories fell into place.

The Dead King’s last act of spite threatening to swallow us all, the desperate fighting below us to keep the drakon from waking. And intertwined with it, the story Yara of Nowhere wanted to cut out throats with: Cordelia and her ealamal. I couldn’t See Cordelia herself, she wasn’t Named, but everything happening around her was a strong enough trajectory I could just barely make her out – like tracing someone out of shadows. It’d be the same for the Bard, I figured. How fucked would we be, if Cordelia had taken up a Name that night in Salia and Yara had gotten an open invitation to be in her head? We might well already be dead if not for the Augur.

The stories raced, threading with each other into what I already knew was meant to be our noose. We got our miracles, the Barrow Sword and the Blessed Artificer and the Gigantes, but we’d gotten them too early. And though I could See the drakon's end in the course of the Witch of the Woods – at a cost that had my heart clenching in pain for Hanno – it would be too late. The defence of the ealamal would first collapse, the shadow of Cordelia Hasenbach moving and then... light, blinding Light until there was nothing at all. A hint of Hanno living through it, but it would be as the Intercessor had said. He'd be one of half a hundred across all of Calernia, a continent slowly gasping out its death rattle.

A quarter-hour, I realized, would be all it took for the Intercessor to slaughter Calernia with: the span between the fall of the ealamal's defences and Antigone saving us all. How small a thing to kill a continent with.

Then the both of us went still, because the current shifted. One last hidden string, a single grain of sand left in the midst of the machinations of the Intercessor. The Augur, I realized. She'd left something of herself behind, something small. Couldn't be more than a sentence else it would be too much, too large. The Intercessor would have seen it, and perhaps I as well. Only neither of us had, because the Augur had died and given the last of herself into the hand of a woman without a Name. Like an arrow loosed in a dead angle, the words had flown unseen until they hit and now it was too late. The Light-to-be went dark.

From beyond the grave, Agnes Hasenbach took us all for a ride one last time.

And just like that, I thought, we'd won. I did not know if Cordelia was alive or anyone with her, but the ealamal was out of play. I saw no story where Named hands lit the bonfire meant to swallow us all. I breathed out shakily as below us the Witch of the Woods' last march began, watching the way the Intercessor's face tightened.

"You always did see a little too far for your own good," she said, "didn't you, Agnes?"

"Catherine?"

Hanno's voice was tinted with worry, but I did not turn. The Intercessor was still here and I did not dare look away from her sitting form. Not yet, even though she was beaten.

"We live," I said. "The ealamal sleeps. And I'm sorry, Hanno, but-"

"I know," the White Knight quietly cut through. "I can't get there in time to Save her."

"You get to keep Kreios," the Intercessor shrugged, "though there's nothing much left there. Your own doing, Catherine:

you've leaned so hard into the changing of the age all the relics are getting buried with its turn."

I breathed in, pulling on Night, but the Bard did not seem worried. She brushed back long fair hair, pawing at her side until she found her silver flask. Knowing that striking at her now would achieve nothing save giving her a way out, I instead wove myself eyes. The moment I saw through them I looked at Masego, who was kneeling by Akua's side. She was prone and her breathing heavy, but the calm on Hierophant's face brought out the same in me. He liked her enough that if she was at risk of dying from her wounds he'd be showing worry. And wounded she was, I found now that I took the time for a second look.

I could see where the Dead King's spell had hit her. It wasn't as obvious a killing stroke some of the others he'd used, but the edges of her right hand were warped and there was something about the skin... It was dead, I realized. Her entire arm was a cadaver's, every part of it dead. It hid beneath her armour, but I saw the faint stiffness creeping up the side neck. How much of her had been killed with that single stroke: half, a third? My fingers clenched. I was not sure even Light would be able to heal that, but at least she was still living. And the yellow strands of sorcery around Masego's hands seemed to be easing her breathing.

"Hierophant?" I called out, my sole flesh eye still on the Bard.

"There is no danger of death," he said. "She should be able to speak again soon."

I breathed in sharply. I'd not even realized she couldn't, so I took a third look even as other eyes saw Hanno walk up to my side with a grim face. Only my gaze strayed from Akua, as though I was worried there was something else I'd just Seen.

"You are forming a godhead," I evenly said.

He smiled.

"I have not yet digested all I gained from the Dead King," Hierophant said, "but when I have I expect my perspective will be... broadened."

And that'd be enough, we both knew. The godhead was just a trick of perspective, he'd once said, and even an old monster like the Intercessor agreed. He'd have the power and the understanding, and that'd be enough.

"So that's why you're still here," I softly said, matching the Bard's gaze.

She drank deep of her flask, grimacing after her first swallow. Something reeking of strong liquor and oranges reached my nostrils.

"It would have been cleaner if you let me do it through Cordelia," Yara of Nowhere said, voice rough from the drink. "One stroke, nobody suffers. But I've already told you: if you demand the hard way, it's what you'll get."

And I believed her, or at least believed she believed it, only I could see an angle she might use for – a whisper spread across the world, the first use of Guide I'd ever caught her in. And in that moment that followed, I saw as she cleared her failed story off the board and dragged in another.

"It is already finished, Bard," the White Knight calmly told her. "Spite can only-"

I raised my hand to silence him, and though he looked somewhat annoyed he stopped talking.

"Say nothing without choosing your words carefully," I said, voice echoing across the Dead King's hall. "We are now a single wrong sentence away from dying."

Yara smiled, Hanno stiffened and my fingers closed to tightly around my staff that the knuckles turned white. I could see the story she was going to ride now. I should have realized from the start that it was fucking arrogance to think we'd gotten her. The Augur had broken her plan, sure, but the Intercessor wasn't a blood-drunk villain on her first rampage. She'd laid foundations for this and none of them were gone.

"You said," Hanno murmured, "that the ealamal sleeps."

"And Cordelia Hasenbach won't wake it, if she lives," I said, sliding a glance Yara's way.

She tossed an affable smile my way, but no answers. It was a halfway good sign she hadn't taken the opportunity to gloat, but it might just be she wanted to keep her cards close to the chest.

"But the Seraphim are still silenced," I said, "and the ealamal still filled to the brim with Light. She doesn't need Cordelia, she just needs anyone at all to light the fire."

"No one will," the White Knight confidently said.

Far below our feet the drakon died, as if the Heavens themselves were echoing the word of their favourite son. The Bard looked untroubled, which had Hanno on edge. As it should be, because with the drakon gone, devouring every dead it had come to reign over in its death throes – though that sovereignty had not spread far beyond Keter, and the rest of the dead still stood – the battle on the ground was won. There was no reason for someone to use the ealamal, as Hanno had so confidently asserted. However horrendous the costs, we had won.

By the mortal way of looking at it, anyway.

“Not a hero or a villain,” I quietly agreed. “But she’s not me, Hanno. She works with more than just Named.”

“The Seraphim,” he softly said. “You believe... no, it doesn’t matter. We need the Hierophant to-”

Two sounds from behind us. First Masego’s soft gasp as he rose to his feet, then Akua’s rasping cough as she gained back her voice. I watched as Hierophant took a few stumbling steps, then went still as sorcery coiled around him in tight rings. Hanno drew his sword, but I laid my hand on his arm. It wasn’t an attack, it was his own magic. He’d finished eating the Dead King and so his perspective was undergoing an adjustment. He’d be out of the rest of this conversation, as much because of the terrible efforts as because providence would ensure he was not there. He couldn’t be, because he was part of the story as the opposite of the Seraphim.

“Do nothing,” I said. “The path it goes down if we interrupt him is... unpleasant.”

Enlightenment stopped halfway through was just madness, and that was a dangerous thing to afflict a man as powerful as Masego with.

“What is he doing?” Hanno bluntly asked.

“He is forging a godhead of his own,” Akua rasped out as she rose to her feet, “as one of Below’s. An Evil god. What will your Seraphim say to that, White Knight?”

“They’ll aim to kill it,” the White Knight said. “Before it can darken Creation. But they cannot reach out in such a way. They are yet silenced.”

“No, not anymore,” I told him. “Just gone quiet for a while more, thanks to our friend.”

“That’s me,” Yara helpfully told him.

She was, I realized, starting to have fun.

“Then they should still be unable to-” Hanno began, then his jaw clenched. “The ealamal. Gods forgive us, it is a Seraphim’s corpse.”

"And filled to the brim with enough Light to scour half of Calernia," I flatly said. "She just needs to draw their eye there so they can throw their genocidal tantrum."

I expect he would have argued with that characterization of the Choir of Judgement – fair enough, it wasn't the most flattering interpretation – but Akua interrupted. She'd moved stiffly as she approached my side, her right leg likely affected by the spell even if it'd not been entirely killed, but she was breathing fine and both her eyes seemed to be working. A knot I'd not known was in my belly began to loosen.

"Yet she has not," the golden-eyed sorceress said. "As demonstrated by the fact that Catherine and I still breathed. She still needs something from us."

Yara toasted her.

"If you'd been half that clever a girl," the Intercessor smiled, "you might have had a chance at knowing what real love feels like before you die."

I'd known Akua for years. As an enemy, a prisoner, a companion and one more thing since. I'd made a study of her, and so though her face changed little I could see how that little sentence slid right between her ribs. It had stung, and so she retaliated.

"Babble however you wish, Intercessor," she coldly replied, "but you are running out of luck."

Shit, I thought, getting what would happen just before it did. Yara of Nowhere grinned at us, blue eyes bright in the dim light of the Dead King's hall.

"I am luck, girl," the Intercessor said. "Providence made flesh. This isn't a fight, it's a game – and we'll play as many times as it takes before I win."

Akua had been baited. 'I am providence', that was Yara's story. Not a Named, not an enemy, just a force of nature. We could no more be her foe than we could be the enemy of a river or a mountain. And Akua had given her the opportunity to get it out there and get it out first, without even restoring to something like a monologue. But my eye narrowed, because this wasn't the sort of game where you steal an advance without giving something in return. As many times as it takes, Yara had said. Which meant she had more strings to her bow than Masego's apotheosis. Figuring what those were, I thought, would let me steal a step of my own.

But first I needed to get our own story out.

I went rifling through my tattered cloak, getting out the long dragonbone pipe that Masego had given me when we were barely more than children. I got out a packet of wakeleaf as Akua sighed and Hanno shot me an incredulous look, stuffing the bowl before I pulled on Night. Fire bloomed, lighting the leaf, but it also shivered across the ground. Slithering over the corpse of the Mirror Knight, finding what I was looking for. I breathed in deep of the wakeleaf, savouring the burn in my lungs as I stole back the Fetter that Christophe had carried. The Intercessor smiled.

"What is it that the three of you always say?" she mused. "Ah, right – mistake."

She cocked her head to the side, drumming her fingers against the silver flask.

"I can see why you all do it, it's strangely satisfying," Yara of Nowhere told me. "Shall I explain your fuckup, Catherine? It feels like the courteous thing."

"I made them equal," I said. "Is that what you're going to say?"

She hid her surprise, but not quite well enough. Yeah, I'd figured it would work like that. See, the reason we weren't currently all dead was because the Intercessor needed a story behind her to get the Seraphim to pitch a fit and immolate Keter, if not all of Calernia. She was manoeuvring to get that through our conversation here, though I wasn't sure exactly what she needed out of us. That was her story, her play. By going for the Fetters I'd made them our story, our equivalent, and that was where she thought I'd made a mistake. Creation ran on symmetry: a Black Knight for every White Knight, an aspect of Protect for every aspect of Destroy.

Yara's path to victory needed a story, so by making the Fetters ours I'd made it so they would need a story behind them to work on her.

I'd known it would have that cost from the start, though, and it was worth it. Akua had made the Fetters without being Named, even if Named had helped. It meant, and Bard had admitted it herself, that she didn't actually know how they worked or what they did. She'd called them shackles not as a potshot but because she didn't know they were called the Fetters or what exactly they would do to her. We might not know exactly what the Intercessor wanted out of us here up here, but she was also in the dark about Akua's creation. That was worth the price of attaching a story to them.

"She's delaying," Hanno evenly said. "Waiting it out until the Hierophant finishes apotheosis."

"Was it worth it?" Yara asked him curiously. "You've gotta realize that even two days ago you would have been able to end this in a moment."

She snapped her fingers, smiled.

"But you just had to go your own way, leave the Seraphim behind," the Intercessor said. "So now the ties are cut and you can't guide them. So I ask again – was it worth it, the sense of satisfaction that carried you up this spire?"

Hanno took half a step back, looking like he'd been slapped. Had she planned that, I wondered? That if he became the White Knight again it would be without a tie to Judgement. Our struggle in the Arsenal had been years ago and I still kept unearthing deeper layers to her schemes even now. I pulled at my pipe, closing my eye, and found my first opening. She'd gone after both Akua and Hanno personally, but it was only Hanno who was being treated as a threat. Yara had tried to hurt Akua, but Hanno was being disgraced. He's the only one of two she sees as a threat, I realized. Because of his Name? No, shouldn't be. The Fetters would need a story but not a Name.

It was about the story. Which meant she thought Hanno had a story that might allow him to hold one of the Fetters but not Akua. Why? I studied the golden-eyed sorceress through eyes of Night, Seeing no nascent Name in her. She was wounded but not at risk of dying and her beauty was barely marred so... Ah, I thought. There it is. You don't think Akua can take up a Fetter unless she's dying. And the damning thing was that she was most likely right. It wasn't even about character, at least not in the moral sense. Akua's journey had been one of fighting free from prisons within and without. She would not enter another cage, not after refusing the Tower's.

Even if she forced herself, the story would be weak. It might not work.

It looked bad, I thought, but once more by pressing forward Yara had given me something. She was attacking us but not trying to establish a story of her own. That told me more than she'd meant it to. I opened my eye.

"Hanno's right," I calmly said. "You're waiting us out. You don't actually need anything from us, do you Yara? Hierophant's already undergoing apotheosis, and that's all you needed to get the Seraphim there. You just can't get them to move before he's actually a god."

They'd refuse, I decided, and she couldn't force them. There were still a lot of heroes in Keter, enough that as long as there was even the possibility of Masego being stopped the Seraphim wouldn't just burn the city to cinders. The moment he came through on the other side, though, the calculations changed. It was no longer the possibility of Hierophant forging a godhead against the destruction of the Grand Alliance, it was a risen god sworn to Below against the destruction of a handful of Named and earthly armies. To a Choir, it would be choice that basically made itself. She was attacking us for the same reason she'd boasted that she was providence: she had nothing to defend.

Yara reached behind the Dead King's throne, fishing out her ragged old lute, and set it across her lap. Then she gave me the most vicious grin.

"I guess you're right," she mused. "If one of you killed Zeze, it'd sure stop my evil plan."

My pipe clattered against the stone, spilling ash and smoke. I didn't remember sheathing my sword, but it was out in my hand in a heartbeat. Part of me was ready to apologize if I was wrong, but I wasn't. Hanno's eyes were calm as he held the Severance, taking a single step forward. Akua brushed against my side, a comforting presence I dimly realized I'd expected. Not even for me but because she cared for Masego herself. She'd called it a nudge, righting a wrong left to fester, and she'd not lied. But it'd been more than that too.

"Hanno," I said, "this is exactly what she wants."

"I am aware," the White Knight evenly replied. "But you have confirmed yourself, Catherine, that should the Hierophant finish his apotheosis it will bring about mass slaughter."

"We don't beat her like this," I hissed. "Not if we let her-"

"Kill me after, if it makes you feel better," Hanno of Arwad tiredly said. "Two lives for hundreds of thousands? That is not a choice, it is a duty."

"Or you could die in the attempt," Akua said. "Stripping us of your strength, just as the Intercessor wishes."

The White Knight considered us for a long moment, then shook his head.

"I probably will," he said. "But he'll die too. A fair bargain."

I had nothing to threaten him with, I realized. He'd already decided he had a duty and he was dead. I'd once given Tariq pause by threatening to murder the Grand Alliance and wield its remains against Keter should it cross me, but that wouldn't work here. The cause was spent, the battle ended, and I had given too much of myself to Calernia for Hanno to believe me if I swore calamity over this. He knew me too well.

He was, in some ways, my friend.

"I wish it could be otherwise," the White Knight told me, and I believed him. "But it is Catherine Foundling who would fight me over this, not the Warden."

The echo of Akua's words returned to haunt me, the wants of the woman and the needs of the queen. The tall hero straightened, blade rising.

"We'll all lose friends today," Hanno said. "I'm sorry it had to be by my hand, Catherine."

And was that to be it? I'd kill him or he killed Masego and maybe I'd lose both anyway. The Intercessor had grabbed me by the hair and dragged me back on the Tower's steps, my bloody knife in hand. What life was I to take this time, how many was I to bury?

"You'll have to hold him back," Akua murmured, "before I can land a curse. I believe I have something that can hold him down, though I know not all the strings to his bow."

And I breathed in sharply, because I had my way out. The Intercessor herself had given it to me earlier.

"It won't work," I said, and Hanno stilled.

His eyes were on me, his gaze steady as he looked for the lie.

"She has other stories lying in wait," I said. "Killing Hierophant only makes her change to them."

"Other stories," the White Knight slowly said. "Such as?"

And I'd not known then, but it seemed so obvious now that I'd felt out her schemes. No matter how skilled her hand, Yara wouldn't have been able to be sure that Masego would forge a godhead. Her story, though, was that of the Choir of Judgement striking down an Evil god. And it so happened there was one of these certain to be at hand.

"It's Sve Noc," I said. "We mended Night, made it better, and raised them anew. They're more dangerous now and they won't burn out. Judgement will want to end them and they can try it through me."

I wasn't sure if they'd win, but it wouldn't matter. The struggle would kill the people the Bard wanted dead anyway and that was the whole point. I watched Hanno game it through, wonder if everyone could be Saved by killing me as well, but even if he could do it there was no guarantee the Intercessor didn't have a third string lying in wait. It would be just like her, I thought as my eye went to the woman still sprawled on the Dead King's throne, to get us to kill each other until no one was left and victory landed bloody in her lap.

"You're right," the White Knight finally said.

And it was a load off my shoulders.

"We can't win by beating her here," I said. "She can't die and even if we drive her away she'll keep at this. Find a way to sow ruin while we try to recover after the war, push us over the edge."

"She has to be bound," Akua softly said.

And I held both Fetters in my hands, the rings of copper and bronze that would be put on once and never taken off. The Intercessor idly strummed her lute, still tuned from her song earlier, and smiled at me.

"Ah, and now we get to the good part," she said. "Are you coming to be bind me, Catherine?"

"You're the last relic left, Yara," I told her, stepping forward. "It's time for you to be buried with the rest."

A flash of rage distorted that pretty tanned face, turning it ugly, but it was gone in an instant. I waked past corpses fresh and old, past broken stone and the Dead King's remains.

"And that's for you to decide?" she asked.

"I am the Warden," I simply replied, and Creation echoed of the word.

She only smiled.

"Not the right kind," she told me. "We made sure of that."

"Silence," I ordered, stepping forward.

And then the Intercessor laughed.

"Try the other one, your third," she told me. "The one we made sure you'd come into before this moment. See what happens."

And dread seized me, because in that moment I understood what she'd done. I had my three aspects, one formed to bring about the end of the Dead King himself. My Role was settled, seared into Creation as loudly as triumphantly as a Role ever had been. And it was not the Role of a jailer, for all that my Name could hold the meaning.

"Yeah," Yara gently said, "you lost before you even started."

I'd fallen for the oldest trap: you put two choices in front of someone and forced them to choose so that they might never realize there was a third. If I'd had an aspect to spare, if there had still been room for my Role to settle... Instead I'd chosen between Guide and Sentence, as it'd never occurred to me I could refuse to choose at all. No, that's arrogance, I told myself. We wouldn't have killed the Dead King without my last aspect. If I'd chosen nothing we would have lost, and the Bard gotten her way again.

"I win," Yara of Nowhere smiled, "or I win, or I win. That's the only kind of game worth playing, Catherine."

If I used the Fetters on her, they wouldn't work. I knew that with sudden, ironclad certainty. I didn't have the right weight behind me. It couldn't be me, and I'd not made much of a case for Hanno. He could and would offer, I knew that, but in the end he was below me. My subordinate. It was an ill-fitting match, and I could try to fit it in the story of an unkillable Evil being imprisoned by a hero through worthy sacrifice, but Yara had headed me off there already. I am providence made flesh, she'd claimed, and I had not contested it.

I was at a loss.

Wind brushed past me and a streak of darkness hit the Bard's arm as she let out a yelp of pain, burrowing through the stained leather and sinking into the flesh. I glanced back to see Akua approaching, a cold look on her face, and Hanno looking at her with disapproval. It was easy to see why, since one of Yara's arms had withered dry. It looked like a mummified husk, though the Intercessor looked more amused than anything.

"Well, you made sure not to kill me," she drawled. "Feeling better, oh mighty Sahelian?"

Akua brushed past me, armour whispering against mine, and cocked her head to the side.

"Slightly," she said. "But I am not finished."

"Enough," Hanno said, drawing my eye to him. "Torture will accomplish nothing and is unworthy of-"

There was no longer a sheath at his hip, I idly noticed. He must have lost it at some point in the fighting, though it hardly mattered since the Severance would not have fit it. It cut too deeply to... I clenched my fingers then unclenched them. The Saint of Swords and once cut my aspect domain, using Sever. The same aspect we'd made into the blade. So it still should be capable of that, with the right guidance. The first time I'd reached for my third aspect, Masego was forced to cut it out of me. The second time it mixed with Winter, became a domain that was not entirely mine. I had a precedent, a pattern forming, and most of all a story to ride.

I had never been above mutilating myself to win.

"Hanno," I said, cutting through whatever he'd been saying. "I need you to do something for me."

"Catherine?" he asked.

I paused a moment, choosing my words so I could ask him to cut my third aspect out of me in a way he would not refuse. It was the mutilation of my soul, but it was also a way out of the trap I had fallen into. Like the fox in the trap, I would eat through my leg rather than perish. Without Sentence, my Name was once more incomplete. It'd be damaged, my legitimacy in my Role diminished. I'd be misaligned. And though I would make myself into a bastard thing, it would be a bastard thing that might just be able to fetter the Intercessor. That was how you killed a god, wasn't it? By making another.

And I would destroy who I was until I became what was needed to win.

My mouth opened to speak, but Akua interrupted me with a sigh.

"You're bleeding yourself again, aren't you?" she asked.

I refused to meet her eyes, the accusing gold.

"I used to admire that in you, darling, did you know?" Akua told me. "Your willingness to destroy yourself to win."

"It's not pretty," I said, "but it works."

I forced myself to look at her then, truly look at her. We were no longer the girls we'd been at seventeen, worn down by war and grief and the scars of the lessons we'd learned, but I could look at Akua Sahelian today and see in her the shade of the girl I'd first glimpsed sitting across my father in a tent. The same tall hourglass figure, sharp aristocratic cheekbones and deep golden eyes. Changed by time, all of them, but the roots were unchanged. I'd thought her stunning before I learned to hate her, and I still thought it now that I'd learned not to. She was in armour, her face touched with grime and the lingering stiffness of the Dead King's curse, and yet I could still understand why as a girl I'd thought her the most beautiful person I'd ever seen.

"I have learned," Akua Sahelian gently smiled, "not to settle for that."

And the circlet of copper and bronze she had stolen from me sunk into her wrist, the first of the Fetters bound. An exclamation of dismay ripped itself free of my throat, scraping it raw. I reached for her but she shook me off, and the words I was chewing on were drowned out by the Intercessor's mocking laughter.

"You?" she guffawed. "Come on, Doom of Liesse. My dearest folly. You think taking the fall for Catherine because you love her will be enough? Love's never enough, child."

She leaned forward in her throne, blue eyes burning.

"Stop wasting our time," Yara of Nowhere said. "You still keep to Below, and just because you've learned that other people are people doesn't make you redeemed."

A wide, nasty smile greeted Akua's unflinching approach. She held, I saw, the second Fetter in her hand. I jerked forward, a spasm of the heart, but before I could finish the step Hanno's hand caught my arm. His eyes were kind, but they were also firm. I turned away, chewing on my lip.

"You're not dying either, I made sure of that," the Intercessor said. "It's not a way out for you, you don't get anything out of it."

"You are," Akua Sahelian idly said, "a liar."

Yara blinked.

"I assure you, you're not dy-"

"You called yourself luck," Akua said, "but that is a lie, Intercessor. You are not a blind roll of the dice. You take sides."

"I've helped both sides of the Game," the Intercessor dismissed, "I-"

"You help Good," Akua said. "When you have the choice, that is the truth of you. Providence made flesh is the truth of you, Yara of Nowhere, because you are the golden luck of heroes."

"You're quibbling," Yara snorted. "You'd bind me with a complaint?"

"Not to you," Akua Sahelian smiled. "To your masters, for all that you know so do they. And through you I give grievance, for your game is unfair. How can it be a true wager, when your own Intercessor favours a side?"

The Intercessor went very, very still.

"You don't know what you're doing, girl," she hoarsely whispered. "If you had any idea-"

And we felt it all, then. The weight. The attention. Akua Sahelian had called on the Gods, and the Gods listened.

"Fortune and misfortune," she said. "Providence and calamity. It takes two to make it even."

She leaned forward and the Intercessor scrabbled back on the throne, lute dropping on the ground and snapping a string as the silver flask toppled over the edge and began spilling liquor all over the floor. Dark red, like blood. But there was nowhere to run, and the Fetter slid around her wrist.

Its lettering burned bright, for the barest of moments, and then it sank beneath her skin.

"No," Yara shouted. "NO. You can't-"

Akua struck her across the mouth, shattering teeth as the Intercessor fell on the tiles. She spasmed there, crawling and going away.

"I simply cannot abide screaming," Akua told her. "You will have to learn that if we are to be colleagues."

Yara kept crawling away, bleeding from the mouth, and as Hanno finally released my arm I rushed forward. Gods but my leg hurt. Akua only half-turned towards me, but it was enough. I swept her in my arms, her armour rough against mine, and though I had to dip her backwards I found her mouth. It should have been hard and wanting, after too many years of denial, but it wasn't. It was... soft. And yet the yearning would not leave me, or her, and it felt unbearable to part even when I had to suck in a trembling breath.

"Ah," Akua faintly said. "So that's what it feels like."

"I was," I began, but then choked on the words. "I couldn't..."

"I know," she murmured against my cheek. "I know. We are who we are."

"I wasn't going to ask you to," I admitted.

"I wouldn't have, if you did," Akua said. "It's my choice, Catherine. I saw what I could be, and though it is not a penance..."

She half-smiled.

"I have learned lessons," she said. "And instead of letting them join me in the grave made of Liesse, I would teach them with the villains that will follow in my wake."

My heart clenched.

"She might not let you," I whispered. "Neither of you can nudge if the other doesn't allow it."

"So we will have to bargain," Akua softly laughed. "Else we will be nothing at all."

From the corner of my eye I saw Hanno kneeling by Yara's side, light glowing around his hand, and I realized that he was healing her. She'd just tried to kill us all, to kill all of Calernia, and yet Hanno of Arwad knelt besides the woman in pain and tried to help her.

It was, I thought, the essence of the man.

Akua drew away and though I resisted I did not force her to stay. She took a step back, watching my face, and something like grief flicked across her face.

"Finish it," she quietly asked.

Cold dread filled my stomach.

"You can't really be asking me that," I said.

"We will only know for certain it has worked after," Akua said.

"That's not what I meant," I replied.

"I know," she smiled. "But for our parting, my love, perhaps it is my turn to be allowed to wield the cruelty."

I could have argued. I could have screamed and railed and refused, but all it would have done was mar this. A moment neither of us would get back. So instead I paid my dues, my long price, and drew the knife that'd killed my father.

"I love you," I said.

It had never admitted it to her before. I likely never would again.

"And I you, my heart," Akua said, eyes golden like the sun. "Farewell."

And I killed her, like she'd asked me. Plunged the knife into her heart, parting flesh, until she leaned forward to gently kiss me and let out a soft gasp against my lips. She died, and in the instant she did she was gone. So was the Intercessor, the other side of that now forever spinning coin. Hanno rose to his feet, face solemn, as behind us Masego let out a loud gasp. Sorcery billowed out, light filling the hall and rising through the tower like a shining star as the Hierophant finished forging his godhead. It was over, I thought, touching my cheek and finding tears there. I closed my eye and leaned against my staff, feeling the last of my strength leave me.

We'd won.

We'd lost.

So began the Age of Order.

Mary Gentle

First things first: thanks, ErraticErrata, for doing some truly remarkable things on the journey through these books. I joined in #3, and the story episodes gripped me thereafter.

I don't know how to feel about the climax.

It doesn't feel like a victory, as someone else remarked. I've read it through twice, and read the comments, hoping to find an understanding why it feels like such a disappointment to me.

It's not just the lack of some of the people we've loved, but it's partly that. Though I understand it would be difficult to orchestrate Hakram, Vivian, Rumena, and Anaraxes (to pick some) to be on the same spot for the climax. But... They were a loss I felt.

After thinking a lot, it comes down to this for me, and I don't particularly expect anyone else to agree with the viewpoint:

If Akua Sahelian was going to be the one to end the Age of Wonders – why the hell have we been following this Catherine-somebody around?

Which is another way of saying: If the Age of Wonders was going to be ended, as it's been woven into the story since the beginning, then Cat has to do it.

Whether by self-mutilation or some other device, it ought to have been Catherine Foundling. The Story says that.

Yes, I follow the logic of the narrative as it's on the page. The problem for me is, I don't believe it.

I don't mind if Akua becomes the Practical Guide, but I do mind that it's her act that is the decisive one. I mind that Catherine Foundling stands there like a spare prick at a wedding as the Age of Order is ushered in. Yes, she was about to do something. But she didn't.

Maybe my expectations were too big. I suppose I was expecting something like the end of Book 5, with Kairos, but turned up to the max. (Though, has Kairos's last chapter been edited since it was first put into the Guide? Something seems different about it.)

I guess there are two episode chapters to come, so the fat lady hasn't quite sung. Possibly there's something there that will make me see this differently.

ninegardens

I can see what you're getting at. Mostly I think... Akua has been Cat's project for the last 4 books. In some sense I'd say that in some sense Cat has brought about the end of the age of wonders, (and the creation of the age of order) because she managed to talk everyone else into it.

She CONVINCED the White night and first prince to work with villians. She didn't make the final decision, they did, but she convinced them.

She CONVINCED Akua Sahelian, the most recent scion of "age of Wonders" villiany to reject the teachings she was brought up with, and embrace the age of wonders. It was Akua's final choice, but the point is Cat was the one that led her there.

In a similar bent, Hanno and Tariq are responsible for Mirror knights development. The sacrifices he made, and his key part in defeating the Dead King are his own, but a big part of this story is about the importance of investing in people. This is something Cat does. Something Hanno does. Something Amadeus does... and something Yara and Nessie were incapable of. Something Akua Sahelian was incapable of. Some Malicia failed at.

I'm not particularly keen on the Catkua ship and all, but like... for me it makes sense that Cat's final defining "act" isn't her intelligence, isn't her habit of self mutilation, and isn't pragmatism. It's the trust she has invested in people, over and over and over again. Still feels a bit weird, I agree, but it does feel on theme.

ninegardens

and embrace the age of ORDER.*

God damn typos. Wish I could edit these things. Blehk.

In other news, now that all is said and done, what do people think of Kairos? Was he a monster and a villian (okay, yes, yes he was), or was he one of the heroes of the age, one of the few to outmanuever WB and DK? (although... given Yara's bullshittery here, it doesn't really seem like Kairos' gambit ever ACTUALLY troubled her. Hmmmmmmmm... 🙄

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Re: the ending: I think you hit the nail on the head.

Re: Kairos: he is my terrible, metaphorical-bastard* son and I love him. I'd call him a goblin, but this story has those. However, I have forgotten many details of his interactions with DK in particular. Not sure about WB.

*That is, a son who is metaphorically bastardous as opposed to an illegitimate son. Obviously he isn't literally my son.

Miles

Turns out our Ubua was the MC all along, and Cat was just the love interest.

fp

That's part of what feels a bit off in this ending to me. I feel like Akua was clearly in love with Cat, but with Cat it always seemed more she just thought Akua was hot (and thought it a lot).

Other thing with this ending is I also agree that it seems a bit weird for Akua to take the "Practical Guide" roll, where it doesn't seem like she'd have all that much to offer other than "If you're thinking of killing an entire city, maybe don't" and maybe something of a Villain Therapist eventually? Whereas Cat would clearly be equipped to give tons of name lore tips, and try to set people up to work together and be successful, and I could see her really enjoying that.

Overall still enjoyed it though.

D

I think we're supposed to read Cat as an unreliable narrator when it comes to how she feels about Akua. She's been presenting her thoughts as "yeah, she's just hot" but so insistently so that it could be read as her being in denial about having caught feelings.

caoimhinh

Yeah, the switch of Catherine's view from "Wow, she's damn hot" to "OMG she is the love of my life" seems very very weird. Because besides Akua being hot and showing signs of Catherine's plan of rehabilitation/redemption working, it didn't seem like something that should have awakened such deep feelings of love in Catherine.

Also, Catherine inner monologue acts as if this was her plan all along, but that's a complete lie, given that the Dead King didn't invade until Book 5, and the plan of using the Crown of Autumn couldn't exist until after the Dead King started invading, yet Catherine already had Akua out of the Mantle of Woe by that time, and only further on into Book 6 did they get to prove Masego's theory of Quartered Seasons. So the redemption story for Akua was something Cat came up with later on.

Outwardly pretending it was her plan all along, like whenever she talked to Vivienne about it, is fine, but having that inside her own mind is weird.

tynam

Catherine has been called out before, most notably by Killian, for lying to herself (and thus in her internal narrative, to us) about her feelings for Akua. The unreliable narrator should not be a surprise; Catherine's internal thoughts about Akua were over-emphasised and unconvincing in exactly the same way as when Catherine lies flagrantly to avoid embarrassing herself but admitting she cares about the Woe.

I certainly read it as a love story since before the 'betrayal' before After; it's the only reading that made sense to me.

And, no, it's not a complete lie that this was the plan all along. Sure, Catherine didn't know about Quartered Seasons way back in the everdark, but she is genre savvy enough to have known there'd be something like that waiting at the end.

Lord Haart

It's not a Redemption Story. Akua is aligned to Below, even more strongly than at Liesse.

It's just that she isn't trying to win the game with the same old rules, instead setting new ones.

I think Akua being the pivot here made perfect sense and narratively differentiates PTGE from being "standard fantasy protagonist is the chosen one snoozefest" material.

It was an ending that made perfect sense but which I didn't quite see either – I thought Akua would be a jailor, which is more Cat's role, but her being a guide makes much more sense to me. Cat is a more experienced mentor, but didn't have quite the rage against Above and fondness for Below that Akua does.

Rynjin

Cat's entire character arc since the Underdark has been about becoming a leader, more than a doer. Manipulating all the pieces and putting them in the right place...and moreover, trusting them all to play their part because of who they are.

She was never going to be the one to bind the final evil. The sacrifice, for once, was not hers to make. Instead, she has the responsibility and penance of living in the world she's created.

Jkyoulost

But Akua isn't the Practical Guide. She's Calamity to WB Providence. Cat is still the one left on the mortal plane in Cardinal, set to guide the course of Named for the Age if Order, while Wandering Akua are trapped bickering back and forth for the rest of time.

Vortex

I actually like that the story did not end with Cat cleaning everything up again. She has literally done that dozens of times, abusing herself and sacrificing herself to take the final win.

To give up control and let someone else take action feels like a much stronger character defining moment than jamming her dogged determination down everyone's throat yet again.

There were some awesome moments in Cat's defiance of the previous books, but in this final instance I think entrusting the final defiance to others is a mark of how far she has come as a leader and how much she has grown as a character. I am quite happy with it.

Lord Haart

Agreed. Same lesson as Hanno really.

Xavius Night

I think it is as the chapter for Eudokia played out: all of this is about Catherine bending the rules of the story, over and over again, because she's following the rules in the meanest way possible. Just as Scribe slew a school of assassins with its own hands, Catherine wrote the story of the next age to bear a different person as the focal point of its birth from the death of the old.

And in the end, she did teach Akua the lesson of Callow: for the small slight of defeating her over and over again, she gave the long price of an ever-broken heart to Catherine.

sorter43

Beautiful.

Finally a long price paid off.

Crash

Well, the past few chapters have been a constant feeling of being kicked while you're down. It makes sense it'd come to this, then.

It has been a great journey. Joined in kinda late, around the time Kairos was working up to his death. Left and came back again often as life got in the way of things, but for this last stretch I've been caught up and it's been a blast. It really hits different waiting out the days and reading on launch.

I'll be looking forward to the epilogues, Pale Lights and whatever you write next EE, this has been amazing. Thank you.

apperatus27

Hoo boy, that was a really solid ending. Not sure why folks are complaining about someone else taking the spotlight at the end. Nobody complains about Gollum walking the ring the last two steps, after all.

Looking forward to what you write next because gosh darn was this an amazing series.

Mary Gentle

doing just that.

There's a thematic thing Tolkein has going that makes it work (for him), because his universe functions on Divine Providence. It's important that nobody be able to resist the Ring, because otherwise, perhaps anybody could have. And then maybe you start wondering if Boromir was right after all. But if Frodo fails, and Gollum – by Providence – falls into a volcano, that's supposed to solve the moral difficulty. It doesn't, for me, but I can see that, in-story, it does.

I don't get that feeling here. There isn't, for me, a thematic link between Akua and the current arrangemend of Good and Evil. Not the way there has been for Catherine, ever since Amadeus chose her.

But I'm still hoping that something from the epilogues will put it into focus for me.

AnRighteous

Really liked the ending since imo it derives from akua spending the entire series coming to terms with no matter how good she is her past acts will never be truly forgiven. She then becomes the evil counterpart to the WB, an undesirable role.

In other words, she will forever be evil and this is her eternal attempt to atone for her actions. She shows to some degree how one can be Evil yet good.

Lord Haart

I hear you but Akua is the final thesis of Age of Wonders Villainy. And if Above, too, because Above world never let Villains succeed without a narrative Damocles Sword above their heads.

Akua's pivot here is one she is more for to make than Cat. Cat is really practical neutral in many ways, she wants peace even if it means blunting Villainous aspirations. She did not like Wekesa and if she hadn't been Masego's friend for so long, wouldn't have approved of another diety for Below. I think Akua is much more Below-aligned, but just as practical now after the events of the series. She won't sabotage Villains from the start – but she WILL demand they do better.

BargleNawdleZouss

Fingers crossed that MaseGod can fix Hakram as well as Sve Noc did for Catherine!

Thanatoss

Great Ending!

The only small tidbit I would complain about is that there WAS a story about:

1. Cat being parallel to Triumphant.
2. Cat defying gods many times and forging a story that she can defy them.
3. Probably something I did forget..

Hmmm

Anyways absolute perfect ending! Beautiful! I MUST see the aftermath before I die, XD

Lord Haart

Yes true – Cat had made a habit of bending angels to her will.

But Judgement was much warier of her and would have been a gamble to have pit herself against Bard there.

It also wouldn't have solved that Yara would just do the same in a few decades or centuries.

Rey d`Tutto

Damn.
Best writing I've read for a while

LostUmbrella

I joined late in the story, around the end of book 6, but I loved every step of the way, ending included. Thank you for the journey, EE.

Velrix

Thanks for this story, damn I'm tearing up.

I'm loving the end of the chapter, but I feel the middle a little lackluster. It feel a little bad compared to your habitual masterwork.

Clarissa

This is cool and good and I enjoyed the ending, tyvm! Thank you for writing, pgte has gotten me through a lot of the last couple years ♥

Yamageddon

Thanks so much EE! Really excellent! Love the whole chapter! What a relief that the tension has finally been released. Looking forward to the cleanup. Climax between Cat and Akua was great and emotional and beautifully tense. Glad that Akua stopped Cat from making that self mutilation hat trick. The world would not have had half the chance it should have in the aftermath of it all if The Warden had disappeared into the Nothing with Yara.

It had to be Akua. But damn that's bittersweet. What bargains will Akua and Yara make? Will they be competing to see who can guide hero's or villains the best? Will they learn to work together? Will they sit in a pit of mutual hatred forever? Will Akua's spell casting abilities + the wisdom she has learned be enough to face off against the Bards machinations? Will Akua bargain for an annual reunion with Cat?

These are the questions that will keep me up tonight.

Lord Haart

Between WB and Akua, it's like the Above and Below twins from Cat's Name dreams, just with personalities reversed.

Tristan

Do you know what I would find a very satisfying second epilogue?

Cat, having lived a long life as the Warden, ushering in the new Era, uses her story-fu to arrange a meeting between her, Yara and Akua. There, she voluntarily steps into (some evolution of) Yara's role and takes over her fetter, finally allowing Yara to move on and die, and leaving Cat and Akua chained together guiding future Villains and Heroes towards a brighter future. While making sweet love in the Between.

(As for the objection that both Cat and Akua are Villains, I don't think that's really is a problem. Akua, with her redemption arch were poised for a Heroic name, while Yara, having started out as a Hero, was more or less a Villain in the end with her plot to end the world. Cat has a fairly neutral Role as the Warden and I think the Gods might accept Cat and Akua as a sort of a third power that can mitigate the excesses of both Good and Evil.)

Finally, a big thank you to the author. It's been an absolute pleasure. I will be buying physical copies of the story as soon as they are available. However the epilogues turn out...

Isi Arnott-Campbell

If it doesn't happen officially then thank you for the head canon.

JoeArchipelago

My first comment in many years reading this series. I just want to thank you, EE. The story has brought me through a lot. I love the story so far, and I love the last few chapters, this one included. I absolutely love your characters – Akua has been my favourite so far, and her ending does not disappoint.

I am looking forward to your next work!

Rabblrouser

So epic. So sad. What a phenomenal story. I'm going to really miss these characters.

Thecount

Thank you for sharing this story Erratic, its beautiful. It will always have a place on my shelf, and i will forever recommend it to everyone. Hope it was, is and will be something you will look back kindly just as much as i will, for all the years it and you helped me endure the years. Again, Thank You, and i hope your next project, whatever it will be, will also bring at least as much joy to people and to you as this story.

Name

Well done.

Someperson

Well damn

Wasn't really sure where Akua's story was going and I had a feeling it would bite the bard in the ass but yeah she really does have the story to be the Tragedy that balances out the Bard's Providence

In some way, this satisfies Catherine's whole arc on a deeper level, not of trying to break the game of the gods like Amadeus but simply insisting that the game is made fair.

That was what the Accords and the Age of Order really did, after all. Reforming the rules and reforming fate. The perpetual finger on the scales that is Providence was the last step in that process.

Man though the Gods in this setting are kind of all jerks

starflower

EE... I regret not leaving comments throughout the book. I've been with this book since 2017, and I think it's tied for my favorite work of fiction ever, I adore it and I've learned so much from your characters. Every time I got bored with the story, I came back later and got pulled into it again. And this... was a brilliant climax. I worried if things would work, how the hell, after all this buildup, it could actually work, but I kept reminding myself that trusting you had worked before and... that worked, and it was beautiful. Cat & Akua, specifically, made me crying. Akua is my favorite and I'm holding back feelings until I read the epilogues and learn how she actually ends up, but... Thank you, from the bottom of my heart, this is a masterpiece, and it means so much to me. Now to the epilogues!

Black Spiral Dancer

Came late this time... I now know why... I have been postponing this moment... I love endings, yet I hate what comes after. A void. I hate the age of Order, just like I hated it when Tolkien wrote it out. I want no place in it.

I am as the villain of Yore, more like Dead King than Kairos although I deeply admired him as well for his boldness. My story plays along the same lines as his, with a twist.

It was during this long story that I have had my own enlightenment, when I finally saw that our world indeed had a written foundation behind, and inner threads that can be altered if you keep the balance just right.

Throughout my life, I have tested the randomness of our own world, and tried to so subtly end it more than once while leaving a way out, and saw that again and again I would not die as long as I did not tempt that directly (as of course, like in any story, then I would have surely died). It felt like I was here for something out of the ordinary, yet I could not SEE what, for I could see the paths of life and I rejected almost every role in it. Almost, not all. But the one role I did not reject seemed more than unlikely, but borderline impossible.

Yet the trigger I had been waiting appeared at the precise time I thought it would and it was an unlikely blend by itself, a rare gate that opened at the precise time, something that I had not seen before. And through that trigger I began my first change. I was born half a monster, yet now I had enough time to ponder if I wanted to become a less-than-perfect man or a complete monster, and though that was a choice, it wasn't really: I was never one to be content with being lesser.

I have done then, as Catherine did, a leap in the dark, trusting I knew better, and the story came through as I had thought it might... and I knew then, I had my second true glimpse that my life was not random, nor this world was random as I was taught it was.

Yet my change was yet skin-deep, and although I had now the flesh of the role I accepted, I had not the Story, I had no way to tell my truth because I knew truth not. I could only walk in the maze with closed eyes, knowing not even it was a maze, only having faith that I was not in an endless plain: for a maze, for all its dead ends and turns, does lead somewhere... until I hit the third glimpse, my truth. At the age I was expecting, but exactly when it was almost ending and I had completely forgotten I had been waiting for it. And like a truck had hit me... I was shocked to my core. Twice, for I felt an echo stir exactly 7 days after, at the same time as if to re-assure me it wasn't chance or randomness. And now I had a Truth, a Story behind me, and a Name.

And I could hardly believe it but I knew then that this world was as fake as the world of Calernia: we are but shadows of such a greater reality we can merely grasp the edges, yet we go blindly thinking we know all there is. Folly. I could SEE now how my life was carefully laid out, piece by piece, to achieve, to get to the point I was standing, and not by some higher divine being some call a god, but by... me. I knew myself best, I knew what I wanted and how I thought things, and I posted signs where I knew I would look for, and they were always there, they never failed, because it was written.

I knew then that much of what was thought and said was twisted echoes of the truth, the road was so long abandoned and blocked by thrash that few could ever see or pass.

For it was believed that spirituality was GOOD and the carnal, the material, was EVIL. Oh, just like Yara did, two choices were offered only to hide there was a third... which turned everything in its axis. For before Time, before the clock and the Age changed, there was Spirit and Flesh and there was not that GOOD which nowadays is praised by most religions. That time is now seen as EVIL, but it was just another path, one which led to shadowed paths beneath the Earth, not to the bright sky, but just like now, that was seen as the only path. Talk about balance...

We have reached, as Tolkien and ErraticErrata wrote, the End of the Age, and a new future looms closeby. Yet I am not willing to live then, for that future seems too ordered, too clean, too bright, and I like the shadows. So I will take once again that old, old path which was abandoned. And like a dark wind, I will CLEAR the way again and allow choice to bloom. For the world still sleeps, but I am awakening, and though the path goes down infinitely, I have no regrets while I walk it, for I have seen the sky and I found it tedious, the heavens boring and lackluster. From deep I came, and I have chosen again that it is where I belong. I again jump, and with me much of this age will FALL, and we will build a world where the gloom never ends, where the shadows lay and make our imaginations vivid with magic. Lies and Violence, yes, but oh, so much more too!

Lord Haart

Be safe man. Age of Order or Wonder, this series is really about forming healthy connections with others, moving through pain to find support, and knowing that the infinite is really no match for the finite.

Epilogue I

"Why did the Black Queen invade Keter?

She'd run out of living to tax."

– Overheard in a Laure tavern

Cordelia was dying.

Every ragged, rasping breathed told her of that truth. Too much of her throat was gone, devoured by a ghoul even as she killed it. Distantly she heard the buzz of Light coming down, feeling a sliver of cold satisfaction that the Blessed Artificer's wall had kept the dead away from the ealamal until the end. Her pride had not slain Calernia. Was Alaya alive? She did not know, and her mind was slipping. Darkness crept in from the edges, closing in on all sides. Her breath rattled out, a groan, and the last of the princess' life began to leave her. A good death, she thought.

Soft fingers were laid against her forehead. There was a shiver and her life stalled, as if caught in her throat.

"Am I too early or too late, I wonder?" Ivah of the Losara mused. "Many will grieve that you are not to be brought into the Night."

She tried to move, to raise her hand, but it would not move.

"We see you, Cordelia Hasenbach," the Lord of Silent Steps said, its voice echoing with two others. "You who offered peace to the Firstborn and meant it, who would welcome us into these Burning Lands as an ally."

Coolness, fresh and pure and so intense as to be almost painful, flooded her veins as her body was wracked with spasms.

"We are the children of the Ever Dark," the silver-eyed drow told her, "but we have learned our lessons. Steel shall be answered with steel, but you who offered good faith will see it returned in kind."

Cordelia let out a hoarse shout, hands rising as she convulsed upwards and caught the Firstborn's shoulder. The cold was fading, and though she was not healed neither was she dying.

"It is done," Ivah of the Losara murmured. "Death will not have you today."

The princess breathed out, leaning her head on its shoulder. Exhausted even though she had done nothing.

"Maybe," Cordelia panted out, "tomorrow."

And like a seizure, a banner flown in the face of grief, twin laughter sounded in the tent.

—

Night had fallen over Keter but even past midnight the dark was yet kept at bay.

Thousands of torches and bonfires burned across the Crown of the Dead, the great army that now stood mistress of it gone wild with victory. Casks of beer and liquor rolled down the streets, singing filled the winding streets and it was as if the very seat of horror had turned into a summer fair. Everywhere soldiers shouted and laughed and bickered in a dozen different tongues, old feuds forgotten for a night as all celebrated the end of the Dead King. It was a sight like none other: Alamans nobles sharing Levantine liquor with Soninke mfuasa, orc and Firstborn poets trading tirades with Arlesites over prizes of Callowan ale. Lycaonese and Levantines belting out ribald songs, Taghreb – even the new High Lady of Kahtan herself! – joining the impromptu Barber and Edward play mounted by Callowans and goblins.

There might never be a night like this again, they all knew deep down, and so they roared all the louder for it.

In the shadow of broken flying fortresses the great pyre for the dead was burning low, eclipsed by the bonfires of the living on the great avenues where cattle roasted and a thousand cooks from all over Calernia filled plates for whoever put them on the table. It was a night for life winning over death so it was no surprise that a thousand couples were born in dark corners. For a night, a few or even years to come. Wise heads opened the stocks of tangleroot brew for any who wanted it, intending to avoid accidents, but some bellies were bound to swell in coming months anyway. It was a night for rash decisions, the release of years and hopelessness – revelry sublimating all the horror of the war against Keter into a life without the Dead King's shadow hanging over them all.

In the heart of the city, though, a handful gathered in a small room inside the black spire as the clamour of the festivities echoed from a distance. It was a distinguished company, the kind whose absence might have been noticed had merry chaos not seized the city outside. The Warden and the White Knight, two pillars of the age to come. Dented from the struggles of the day but yet standing. With them came three that would have seemed mismatched, if not for the clear ease between them: Vivienne Dartwick, the Princess, Indrani the Ranger and the Hierophant himself. Who did not seem so different, at first glance, for all that he was said to have reached apotheosis. Still tall and thin, long braids woven with trinkets going down his back, and his eyes were yet one of flesh and the other of glass.

Only now it was not the fires of Summer that glinted beneath the eye cloth but something else, a vision of miracles and revelations whose very sight would madden the unready. And there was something else, in the way the world moved around him. It was as if he moved free of the current, only faintly touched by Creation's laws – the way his robes sometimes moved when there was no wind and went still when there was, the lack of footsteps on ash and the way no dust ever seemed to cling to him.

Before all five of them an orc lay on a bed, his breathing laboured Hakram Deadhand, born to the Howling Wolves Clan. Once the Adjutant, now the Warlord. Though victory had been won, or the so the clamour outside claimed, two evils yet lay in him. One was horror in the mundane, the spine cracked by the Prince of Bones' hand that now stilled his limbs. Light healing had made the wound livable, but little more. Sorcerous healing of so fine a thing was beyond the ken of any on Calernia save perhaps the finest mage-doctors of Ashur. None were here. And so instead the Warden had sent for another.

"It was a wound taken defeating the Prince of Bones," Hanno of Arwad quietly said. "It is a tragedy, Warden, but I do not know if it is..."

"Unjust?" Catherine Foundling finished, fingers clenching.

It was a powerful boon, Undo. The stuff legends were made of. But like all legends, it had been dealt into hands that would not abuse it: the White Knight could not unmake what he did not see as unjust, and he was a rare kind of man. The kind that dying so others might not, the bloody pyre of heroism. Many of the Named that had died in Keter, most of them, would remain in the grave. It was not unjust to die willingly for something greater than yourself.

"He didn't die," the Warden said. "Instead they hurt him, White Knight, and did it where it'd cut deepest. He only just got out of that chair and now they put him back into it. For good."

The dark-skinned man met her gaze, his face a calm contrast to her stormy one.

"He's done so much to keep this continent standing that no one but a handful of scholars will ever know about," she told him. "We both know how the world works, Hanno. In the books he'll be the Warlord like it's all he ever was, because that story fits. It's cleaner. The rest will get swept under the rug, and they'll just remember him as a footnote – the first Warlord in ages, broken in Keter. End of the tale."

Her face clenched with fury and grief.

"He deserves better."

Hanno of Arwad did not answer, though he was brave enough not to shy from her burning gaze. The White Knight was not a man whose convictions were easily moved. And yet he stepped back, when instead of trying tirade or persuasion the Black Queen of Callow got down on her knee. Catherine Foundling was a proud woman, it was known. She had held to the bone of that pride ever since, as a girl, her father had taken into the heart of an empire and the mighty had knelt around them he had told her of a way to live: we do not kneel. Her father's truth, one he had lived and died by. Refusing compromise even in the face of death, unbending for anything or anyone.

But Catherine went down on her knee, because she was more than her father's daughter and Hakram Deadhand mattered more to her than pride.

"Please," she asked. "I know there are others as deserving, that you only get once day."

Her fingers clenched.

"And still," she said. "Please."

And Hanno of Arwad let conviction move him, offering a hand then another. The first to bring her back to her feet, shamed she had ever knelt before him, and the second laid on the Warlord's side. Undo. Creation shivered, then the White Knight let out a small breath as he stepped away. The Hierophant replaced him, weaving an incantation, and after his eye ceased moving around he pulled back to give the others a nod.

"His body is in perfect condition save for the limbs cut by the Severance," he said.

The Warden and the White Knight matched gazes for a long moment, Catherine Foundling dipping her head into a nod that said much without need for words. Hanno returned it.

"I'll see you outside," he said.

"Might be you will," she agreed.

And with a mute goodbye at the Princess, Hanno of Arwad left the small room where he had brought a miracle. He was not one of the Woe, and the last evil that lay in Hakram Deadhand's body was not the kind to be beheld by outsiders. The orc began to stir awake as the White Knight closed the door behind him, Hierophant still standing by his bedside. Hakram woke feverish and befuddled, as if did not recognize where he was. His vision swam into focus, coming to Catherine, and tension left him.

"Cat," he gravelled. "Where are we?"

Her jaw clenched.

"Keter," she told him, hoping.

The Dead King's curse had been a mind-killer, but only half of it had reached him. Vivienne had caught the other. The confusion on the tall orc's face deepened, to the horror of the others.

"What is the last thing you remember?" Masego briskly asked.

"Heading for the Arsenal," Hakram told them. "Would someone get me out of these bindings, they-"

And the horror on his face when he saw the limbs lost to the Severance was like a blow to the stomach for them all. He fought to master his face, but the anguish was too deep and sudden to be smoothed away.

"I," he began, then his voice broke. "How much did I lose?"

"Two years," Indrani said.

"There might be more," Masego said. "It is too early to tell."

"It should have been less," Vivienne bit out. "I caught the spell, it-"

Her words caught his eye, and the way he stiffened did not go unseen by any of them.

"You don't remember who I am, do you?" Vivienne Dartwick softly asked.

Hakram shook his head, the hint of shame on his face burning the rest of them like acid. The Princess swallowed thickly, blue-grey eyes turning to Hierophant.

"There has to be a way," she said. "You told us the curse is still in him, why can't you purge it?"

"It is," Hierophant simply said, "the Dead King's work."

Even from the grave, Trismegistus King's will was not to be easily overwrit.

"There's always a way, with curses," Catherine Foundling said. "You taught me that. The magic fails if there's not a way out."

"It has a price," Hierophant said. "And it will not bring everything back."

"But most," Catherine pressed.

"Most," he conceded.

And the Warden stepped forward, but a hand was laid on her arm and she found Vivienne Dartwick's gaze had turned to steel.

"No," Princess said. "Not this time. Let me."

Neither woman gave, but eventually the Warden was the one to look away. Vivienne knelt by the bed, Masego's hand on her shoulder, and faced a hesitant Hakram.

"You don't remember me, right now," she told him, "but I haven't forgotten. There's a debt between us, Hakram Deadhand."

"I cannot call on it," he replied.

"You don't have to," she said.

And Hierophant's other hand came to rest atop the orc's head, his flesh eye finding Princess' own to seek one last confirmation. A simple nod and magic billowed out like the wind. Currents of it, thick and visible to the naked eye as faint blue trails, as Hierophant bound them all together. It was not a spell, not in the way he had been taught as a boy, but something simpler. Will exercised on the world, the purest manifestation of what he had hoped to become. And through that binding, he drew out the curse as one would a poison. It fought and wriggled and tried to sink its hooks deep, but inch by inch it was drawn out of Hakram Deadhand and into the only place it could be.

Vivienne Dartwick let out a shuddering breath, accepting it whole as she closed her eyes.

The magic ebbed low, then guttered out entirely. Hierophant's hand retreated and Hakram suddenly clutched his forehead as he let out a roar of pain. Fangs drawing blood from his own lips, he shook wildly until the fit passed and a light returned to his gaze that had been gone. It lit up the room, reflected in the others around him as their hopes soared and he let out a wounded noise at the sight of the Princess.

"Vivienne," he said. "Gods, Vivienne, what have you-"

The Princess of Callow let out a rasping laugh, eyes opening as the curse's foul magic flared.

"My turn," she said. "The choice came, Hakram."

The curse boiled out, Vivienne Dartwick's left hand turning to ash until there was not even bone left above her wrist.

"And I judge you well worth a hand," she finished.

Looking more fragile than anyone had ever seen him, Hakram let out a grieving curse and drew her into his arms. It was as if a dam had broken, all of them coming together onto the sickbed in a pile of limbs clutching the others tight. The Warden rested her chin atop Indrani's head and breathed in raggedly. For the first time since she had left the Dead King's all, it felt over. Finally over.

"Alive," Catherine Foundling whispered.

Crippled and lost, a parade of the mangled, but they had gone through the storm and all five of them come out the other side breathing.

When she finally let herself weep in relief, she was not alone.

—

There'd been talk of having the ceremony at dawn but when faced with the very real possibility that most of the Grand Alliance would be too hungover to show up common sense prevailed.

It would be held at noon instead, which still ended up requiring the shepherding of a great many nobles and soldiers still quite drunk. The Plaza of Five Palaces, a soldier's sobriquet given during the dark hours of fighting at the foot of the black spire since the Keteran name for it was anyone's guess, remained beautiful even after the previous night's festivities. It had to be cleared out and cleaned but there was no lack of willing hands for the work, for who didn't love a wedding? Besides, Razin Tanja and Aquiline Osenia had become beloved figures beyond even Levant as much for their war record as their open affection for one another.

Guests began arriving an hour before the ceremony, and some soon realized this was to be the most highly attended wedding in the history of Levant. Though the Champion's Blood had no one sitting for them, foreign guests were the most prestigious of perhaps any wedding on Calernia. The First Princess of Procer and every last remaining — recognized — royal of that realm, the queen and princess of Callow, the Empress of Aenia and representatives from every single city of the League, the chancellor of the Confederation of Praes and even the first Warlord of the Clans in several hundred years.

A dash of the exotic was added by the presence of General Rumena and a handful of sigil-holders as well as the Herald of the Deeps and his generals, then a dash of the legendary through the presence of Kreios Riddle-Maker and the last living spellsingers. Had the elves not disappeared without a word, every realm of Calernia would have had someone in attendance.

The Dominion's ways were not as elaborate as those of some other realms, but no less eye-catching for it. Razin Tanja and Aquiline Osenia arrived not in dresses or fine clothes but naked from the waist up, painted entirely in the colours of their Blood: red and grey for the Binder's Blood, green and bronze for the Slayer's. The paints were a work of art, the most skillful hands in Levant having helped shape the elaborate patterns even though it was the betrothed who had themselves applied it as was tradition. The two of them were a sight, black-haired and handsome Lord Razin smiling softly at slender, lethal Lady Aquiline.

The crowd, made up mostly of guests and Levantines but swelled with thousands of curious soldiers from every stripe and banner, went wild at the sight of them. It felt like spitting on the Dead King's grave, for the young couple to come to stand before the black spire and exchanged their elaborate wedding knives. A tall and bearded Lantern bound their hands together with hemp rope and they cut their way out with the knives, emerging from the common trial wed in the eyes of Gods and men. The two of them kissed with enthusiasm that had the crowd roaring once more, and it was a done thing. Many of them, in some way, knew they were looking at more than just a wedding.

Razin and Aquiline embraced each other under a sunny sky, in the heart of Keter, and it was the first step towards the end of the Dominion. It was the first step towards what would come after, for good or ill, but with the sun so bright and the sky so blue no one thought much of the ill.

—

On the night of the wedding, after the banquet was over and the festivities had ignited all over the city again, a somber few assembled in the palace known as the Garden of Crowns. A great sprawl of greenery and stone, it had been chosen for its silence and beauty. The Revenant that had guarded it was long gone, so in the stillness of the Garden graves had been dug. For all that the day had been the domain of life clawed back from death, with dusk came death's dues.

And there were many of them to pay.

Named were lowered into graves, some who had in life been loved and others hated but who were now all honoured in death. The pillars of the Truce and Terms, Ishaq Deathless and Hanno of Arwad, did not intrude into private the private griefs of the Named assembled before them but they spoke of the commonality binding them all.

"In the face of the end of times," the White Knight said, "we came together. We made accord, where never before had there been so great an accord between Named sworn to Above and Below."

"We're past the storm," the Barrow Sword said. "We lived through it, and now that we have what kept us together will fade. The Liesse Accords will not be the same rules that bound us through this war."

Struggle between Named would begin anew, the Game of the Gods returned. Rules of engagement would bind it as they had not before, but steel would come out once more.

"But those who died here died for more than just Calernia's survival," the White Knight said. "They proved that, when the storm comes, we can stand together. That there is a line between doom and the world, that we all stand on the same side of it."

Eyes went to the Warden, who stood silent by the Ranger's side along with Hierophant and the Warlord, but she said nothing. She had not been the captains of these Named, at the end, and so it was not her place to speak. Hers would be the world that came after, not the funeral of the old one.

"It might be that call won't come again in our lifetime," the Barrow Sword said. "And perhaps we'll never see the likes of this war again. But if the time comes, if horror rises again..."

"There will be a truce," the White Knight said.

"There will be terms," the Barrow Sword continued.

"And when we beat back that storm, the victory of that day will have been bought by those we bury here."

A murmur of agreement, like a shiver in the air. Respected men, both of them, but there was more to it than that. For all the grief that clung strongly to the air in this Garden of Crowns, there was a hard sort of pride as well. They had beaten death, in the end. They stood over the sacrifices, of which there had been too many because there were always too many, but they had won.

And so the world changed.

The crowd broke up, coming apart into half a hundred small burials. Some gathered many grieving, Alexis the Silver Huntress' not only bringing the last two survivors of Refuge but also many who had liked her or fought at her side. Others were small things, like the Hunted Magician's who only earned a single faded flower from the Artificer and the Blacksmith each before he was put to the ground. Sobs filled the night, away from the laughter and merriment that still held much of the city around them, and quietly the lost were given their dues until there was only one left. In a silent corner, standing far from all save Hanno of Arwad, Kreios the Riddle-Maker buried his daughter.

He looked old, and his grief was the grief of all the world.

—

They celebrated the victory for five days and nights.

The festivities lost their edge of desperation as time went on, the disbelieving tinge that came with having survived the end times becoming a sort of jubilant savagery instead. There could be no corralling soldiers finally releasing all the tension and terror of the war on Keter, especially not when the sergeants and captains that might have tried were part of the hollering crowds. Wisely, no such order was given as the leaders of the Grand Alliance and its allies – historians had already begun to wrestle with the turn of phrase, looking to avoid the repetition and make a name form themselves by picking the one that'd stick – instead rode out the wave. By the sixth morning ale rations had run out and the stashes of contraceptive herbs were running dangerously low, which wound down the merrymaking more efficiently than a thousand shouting sergeants might have.

Armies began to put themselves together again, staggering back to the parts of the city where their banners had been raised. It was slow-going, and though it was rumoured that High Marshal Nim had wanted to hurry it along by sounding the gathering horns and threatening the lash for those who dragged their feet it was also said that Chancellor Alaya had intervened against it. Instead it was stretched out for another day, though soon there were enough soldiers back in the ranks that the work of preparing the departures could begin. Though with continued dwarven support there was no risk of running out of supplies and indeed the Herald of the Deeps invited the hosts to remain as long as they wished – a pretty gesture that some, perhaps cynically, suggested might not be unrelated to the fact that most the Kingdom of the Dead outside Keter and its outskirts remained swarming with undead – for some of them the war was not yet over.

The Principate of Procer had been saved from utter annihilation, but it was still a broken realm of which large swaths were yet occupied by roving corpses.

That knowledge was enough to sour the Proceran forces, often the rowdiest, on the thought of agitating to rest longer in Keter before marching away. With so many officers dead, the camps ravaged and some soldiers still missing even the most disciplined of the armies found it impossible to leave in good time, so compromise was reached. The hosts would leave through Arcadia in waves, the first of which would leave on the morrow: the eighth day since the fall of Keter. Which brought one last matter to the fore, an old promise it was time to fulfill. Though summons were only sent to the Army of Callow and a few of the kingdom's allies, once word trickled out into the ranks there was no stopping the tide. It was, after all, to be a historic event. The kind you got to boast to your grandchildren of having been at.

Some of the nobles thought it a strange choice, to choose the ashen ruin of a breach over a more majestic site like the Dead King's black spire or the Plaza of Five Palaces where the great Levantine wedding had taken place, but none who knew either of the two women. No matter how high Callow's red-handed goddess of victory had risen, she had never quite gotten the mud off her boots – and oh, how her soldiers loved her for it. Even now, even still, for what else could you offer the woman who had led you to triumph against the King of Death himself? And Vivienne Dartwick, though crowned and heroine twice over, had never shaken the old urge to take to rooftops at night. Princess she might be, but she had once been a thief and not since learned squeamishness.

Besides, the both of them faintly understood something. That the moment where the Army of Callow had crossed the chasm, threw its defiance in the Enemy's teeth and shattered the hold of the dark, had been the end of a tale. One Callow told itself about itself, a tale of bloody victories and long prices and a kingdom earning back the pride it had lost in the Conquest. And just as faintly, they understood – had for years, one way or another – that this tale could not last forever. Must not, lest Callow break itself upon the world again and again, just as surely as Praes once had and still might. And so they would honour that tale, but they would also bury it.

Near a hundred thousand were crammed in the streets and houses, atop rooftops and through ruins. A platform had been raised and greats of the era stood besides it, Named and rulers alike. The hallowed survivors of the war on Keter were resplendent in their armour and finery, but it was not to be their day. It belonged only to the two women on the heights, who had not even sent for a priest.

Princess Vivienne Dartwick stood resplendent in a long dress of Fairfax blue, pale accents evoking the rays of a sun radiating from the neckline. Her missing hand was replaced with a wooden one covered by a white glove. She wore little jewelry save for a silver bracelet, her hair made up in the same milkmaid's braid that had become her signature, but as thousands beheld her none of them would have thought her born as anything but royalty. Behind her stood two veiled banners, held up by knights of the Order of the Stolen Crown.

Queen Catherine Foundling wore black and steel. A soldier queen she had been and would be, wearing scarred plate over a black tunic. The eye she had lost to the Hawk was covered by black eye cloth, down her back went the famous Mantle of Woe and in her hand she held a dreadful staff of dead yew. The sole jewelry she wore was the crown she had been anointed with in Laure, when she stole a kingdom back from Praes after the Folly. She needed nothing else.

The ceremony was, in the end, a simple enough thing. The Black Queen stood before her soldiers, the rest of the world behind them, and told them true.

"I took my crown," Catherine Foundling said, "to fight a war."

Boots on stone, shields and swords rattling. Not only from her own but also from the rest of this grand army, for love or hate none would deny that the Black Queen had brought them to this day.

"It took us far and wide, that war," she said. "East and west, north and south, until we reached the edge of the world and brought doom to the King of Death himself."

Cheers and shouts, the sky itself rattling from the noise of it. She waited until it wound down, letting it wash over her.

"We won it," the Black Queen said. "Keter has fallen and with it we brought an end to the Age of Wonders."

The crowd roared again. It passed.

"I took my crown to fight a war," Catherine Foundling repeated, "and that war is over."

Slowly, almost regretfully, she reached for the crown on her head. It was as if a spell had been cast over all the city, for a pin could have been heard dropping and none dared to move. None save one: as the Black Queen removed her crown, Vivienne Dartwick stepped forward.

"We'll have peace now," the Warden promised the world. "And I have been war's queen. Peace will need another."

And a roar answered, for though never had Catherine Foundling been more beloved of her people than after this last victory, they loved peace even more and Vivienne Dartwick stood for that. The roar drowned out the entire world, as the princess of Callow smoothly knelt and her queen crowned her. Vivienne rose a queen, and Creation whispered in a quickening perhaps in time a Queen, as the tale of the Black Queen of Callow came to an end. The Warden stepped back, from the kingdom and the stage, leaving both in Queen Vivienne's hands. The queen's face was calm and bright, smiling patiently until the shouting ebbed low, and only then did she speak.

"It would be easier," Queen Vivienne said, "to look only forward. To chase the sun and leave the grim years we fought through behind us."

She shook her head.

"It would be easier," she told the world, "but we have not come so far by choosing what is easy."

She stood tall under the sun in a way that had nothing to do with height, blue and pale and every inch a queen.

"I will not forget that the crown I now bear was forged in mud and blood," Vivienne Dartwick said, voice high and clear, "that tomorrow we will get to stand the warmth of the sun because of the hard decisions made in yesterday's darkness."

And behind her, the woman who had crowned her went still as stone.

"We made mistakes. Great and small, tragic and laughable. Ours was a long, hard road and more than once we lost our way."

They did not look at each other, but it was a conversation between the two anyhow.

"But I will not deny that road. I will not forget it, try to bury it out of sight," Vivienne said, and there she finally met her friend's eye. "I may regret the mistakes but not the journey."

Something passed between them, too intricate to be simply called love but no less shining for it.

"For that, I feel only pride."

The queen turned back to the other woman's red-rimmed eye.

"It was an orphan, a Foundling, that led us to the edge of the world and brought us back. I'll not let another name steal that deed."

The crowd breathed in.

"House Foundling will rule Callow," Queen Vivienne said. "I will bear the name, as will those who come after me, and we will not forget."

The crowd breathed out, its roaring approval a wall of sound that seemed like it beat back even the wind.

A gesture from the queen and the knights revealed the two banners. The queen's personal arms were unchanged, a white sun on Fairfax blue. But the royal standard, the Sword and Crown, had changed. A silver sword and crown had once been held in balance on it, the sword weighing heavier. Beneath them an old claim had still been writ, justifications only matter to the just. No longer. The sword and crown stood even, one no greater than the other, and the words had been cut short.

Only to the just, it simply claimed, as in the Book of All Things.

"We lived through the end times," Queen Vivienne smiled, bright as sun above her. "Now what comes after is ours to make."

ErraticErrata

Only one chapter left! I'll be making an announcement regarding the Patreon and the break I'll be taking before beginning to make Pale Lights public when the final epilogue comes up, but until then I hope you enjoy the closing of the series.

Mirror Night

Its been a Great Run. Hard to imagine only a single chapter remains. But I suppose all good things must come to end that is the nature of reality.

Enjoy your break EE, you have certainly earned it. And I look forward to Pale Lights a shift from more classical fantasy to a different sort of fantasy where the world has fallen to ruin to agree. Kinda perfect timing lol with Horizon and Elden Ring coming out.

TRUELIKEtheRIVER

Hey, one minor request regarding the discord: If you have the chapter ready on time thursday, can you delay it by 40 minutes for one last RIOT before PGTE is done? (20 minutes past release time riot starts, 20 min after that, riot stops)

edrey

A great journey, but every story has an end. its sad but it is one of the best novels i had read so i have no regrets. thank you.

Onos

Feels like the end of an era. Thanks for the story EE, looking forward to Pale Lights.

mrwizard70

To everyone who was complaining about last chapter and the way things ended, this is why. Car is not horrifically maimed. She, and the world she built, will live on, prospering instead of just surviving. That victory is far greater than anything against death, and required far more of the books runtime. This chapter is victory against the things Cat has fought since page one, not whatever book Nessie showed up

achillial

I found this story after a brutal injury put me in a wheelchair for several months, and I really can't describe the amount of joy and satisfaction it has brought me over the last few years.

It has been solace in turmoil, a reward for a hard days work, and an inspiration to work on my own stories. The care and craftsmanship that went into this story is genuinely uplifting, and I eagerly look forward to discovering the new worlds you'll build in the future. Thank you for this tale, and I'll see you in the next one.

Mirror Night

Well one more to go until the end of the road. Quite the journey. This felt a bit short though lacked a bit of meat. But I suppose you need to rest a bit after the heights we hit. I suppose it mostly feels light cause all this wrap up is kinda predictable. Hakram Fixed, Viv is Queen, Levant Marriage, Funerals, Truce & Terms Confirmed.

Djinn O'Cide

"Had the elves not disappeared without a word, every realm of Calernia would have had someone in attendance."
Chain of Hunger's missing also. And they really know how to party.

ninegardens

Do the Ratlings really count as realm?

letouriste

i think so. they even have overlords

Crash

Go on then, walk up to a Horned Lord and tell it it ain't shit. I dare you!

They're famously bad guests though. Eat everything in sight.

SuitorShooter

The Ratlings were on the way, they just got delayed eating all the corpses in Procer.

lqueenofblades1

breathes in mentally screams breathes out Fuck it screams out loud anyways

DeadOfKnight

I have been reading the web serial for 6+ years and I don't never if I have ever commented, but on the eve of story's completion, I just want to thank you for the incredible journey and how much I've enjoyed PGTE!

Rey d`Tutto

It ROCKS!
You Rock!

Squemish

God it really feels like it is over... but in a good way. One left

Soronel Haetir

I sure hope that epilog says what ended up happening with Anaxares.

Rey d`Tutto

He becomes the new Evil in a Can...

Rey d`Tutto

Since Anaxares in in a Hell, maybe he runs into Triumphant...

ninegardens

Foreign Oligarchs Will Be Eaten By Bees

Eris

Dang. I have no complaints or questions, just appreciation. I've been reading 'A Practical Guide to Evil' as soon as a new chapter would come out for almost two years now. I think it was book 3 or 4 when I got caught up.

It's pretty crazy. My life has changed so much and it'll keep on changing. I'm graduating high school and leaving on a mission, and it's time for me to start being an adult.

It's fitting that my favorite book series ends when the new season of my life starts.

I'll always look back on this with fondness. One of the highlights of my high school was waking up a little earlier every day a new chapter would come out so I could read it before school, so I could think about it and imagine being a Knight of the Broken Bells, or a Proceran Fantassin, etc.

Thank you!!!!

Also Long Live the Republic of Bellerophon!

KageLupus

As you begin the next leg of the journey of your life, remember the lessons you have learned from the Guide. First, do good.

badatgames2911

Those are not the lessons I learned

Veivisurter

199. This list began with the simplest of axioms, the first. In the years since others like you have added to or taken away from it, a chain that goes back further than any of us know, changing and twisting as it grows. In time no two list will be the same, save always in this one regard: there is no two hundredth axiom. That place remains empty, so that once you learn something worth passing down you may fill it yourself. Look forward, as we once did, and let those who come after you learn from our mistakes. What greater gift can there be?

Juff

Typo Thread:

rasping breathed > rasping breath her throne (throat?)
our ribald > out ribald years and hopelessness > years of hopelessness the so the > so the kind that dying (valued? believed in?) taken into > taken her into them he had > them, and he had once day > once a day them come > them had come foreign guests > the foreign guests and exchanged > and exchange private the > the undead – for > undead – as for two women. (missing something like “were surprised”)

Bufford

God damn EE, way to make me tear up at the end. That was beautiful and I’m glad I got to Witness this miracle of writing.

Zggt

It’s been years. When I started reading this, this story was one of few, online literature being mostly a raw, undeveloped thing. It has stood out from the get-go, and even as the online landscape has wildly changed, that fact remains. I’m so glad that there was no trite “and then the main character died winning the final confrontation”, which has become a tired cliché for writers attempting an epic (looking at you, Sanderson).

Years of reading on the bus on the way to work, a varying number of times a week. From a junior in my field to an expert, through bad relationships and good, while essentially reinventing myself, this story has been a constant joy. For turning something as tedious as a ride to work into something for which I could get excited. I may have enjoyed it more in a binge, like so many who will get to read it from now on, but somehow, the fact that it has been beside me throughout this journey makes it so much more profound.

Thank you. Thank you so very much.

Wonder

I love that the main Villain party has survived , before I have come to know ,love ,rage at sometimes .

Only to the Just.

Callow begins to recover even now!!
And Cat goes off to build Cardinal.

badatgames2911

HAKRAM AND VIVI Y000000 WELL WORTH A HAND BITCHESSSSSSSSSS

Classic weding shananerganery between the lordlings

Ivah saves cordy woouoooo, gotta have cardinals diplomat at the end drunk soldiers do be like that tho

RIP WotW. I really hope we get a burial for some of the named we knew more personally. ROLAND Cough cough

i guess even tho there was no body the Valiant Champion is truly dead

They said they needed a mage healre from Ashur, but there were none? Was Mage killed????? Wasnt she trained as a healer??

Godrophant is chillin like a Villain its not over yet. but the ride was wild EE. thank you so much

arcanavitae15

Godrophant, casually ignoring the Laws of Creation.

Earl of Purple

Sapan lives, but she's the Mage. They need the Silver Mage for this, one whose craft is purely dedicated to healing and not bastardised by war magic, artifice and anything else she learnt from Masego.

BargleNawdleZouss

Godrophant, or MaseGod?

badatgames2911

Masegodo

Isi Arnott-Campbell

MaseGodrophant

Reader in The Night

Could Hanno not have healed Antigone with Undo? I know that by Hanno's logic, a single life, even a life dear to him, was a fair price for the death of something like the Drakon. But didn't he bend his rules a bit for Hakram?

Mirror Night

Maybe but I think this is more about giving Cat a happy ending. Not Hanno cause Cat is the main character. The more annoying part is we don't really get much reaction to Hanno losing all his friends...

ninegardens

I mean (A) Hanno is a weirdo, who has been repeatedly stated to be unnaturally serene, and is established to not express emotions so much.

(B) If Hanno undid Antigone's sacrifice, then umm..... Would that bring the Drakon back? Cause unlike Hakram's injury, her death was VERY deeply tied to the death of the Drakon.

Cpt. Obvious

The point about Antigone's death being tied to the death of the Drakon is what makes Hanno using his aspect to help Hakram slightly more palatable for me. There were so many who deserved better than dying. Christophe was about as purely good as anyone, and he was a big reason they managed to off the DK. On top of that he had really tried to learn how the world worked and how Good didn't always equal good.

But Hanno and Antigone loved each other and the only reason I can see for him not to try to bring her back is if her death is what's keeping the Drakon from resurrection.

shikkarasu

There's also the issue of it being a sacrifice. It was mentioned that even Tariq could not Forgive self-inflicted harm when Masego was being possessed by DK in proto-Twilight. The act of inflicting the harm on yourself makes it harder to heal in-universe.

Becoming like a god and devouring herself? There was nothing left to heal and you would have to fight the will of the god she briefly was to do it.

ohJohn

Even setting aside whether he sees her death as an injustice, not just a deep personal wound – I'd worry that to revive her would just be to reincarnate a god of devouring. BEST case scenario there, she immediately gobbles herself back up.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I feel you about Hanno, but the fact that Cat didn't lose any of her direct companions in the final battle is A) not a fact to begin with: her almost-girlfriend and favorite treacherous advisor has been voluntarily trapped in a role that has been observed to break the spirit of so great a being as the Wandering Bard; and B) the first true happy ending Cat has gotten in the story.

You wanna talk about main characters' dead friends? Ratface, John Farrier and his fellow Gallowborne, the entirety of Liesse, Robber, Nauk, almost Hakram on several occasions that came close enough to be worth mentioning in terms of pathos, Amadeus, Captain (Cat's de facto mom), almost all of Indrani's adoptive siblings from when Hye raised her, many of whom went to their graves not knowing she'd ever cared they were alive, both of Masego's dads, Juniper's mother; I could go on. I get where you're coming from about Hanno being unable to keep even one friend and not getting the screentime to mourn them properly, but it's more surprising that the Woe is as intact as it is than that several heroic bands with one common member were almost wiped out.

Still would've been cool to have Raphaela around, at the very least.

arcanavita¹⁵

Either there wasn't enough of her left due to her heroic sacrifice or he didn't view heroic sacrifices as unjust.

Piu

Well, as we saw he can Undo something happened millenia ago (DK resurrection). So nothing says he can't Undo Antigone's death tomorrow... But it seems he lacks justification for that.

Rey d`Tutto

Heroic Sacrifice UNDOne also breaks what that Sacrifice/
Killed/Destroyed/Maimed/Shredded/Obliterated/etc.
Or not.

JJR

I'd guess that undoing a heroic sacrifice is "possible" but would also undo the effects of the sacrifice. So Antigone comes back but so does the Drakon. You'd could get a story about being careful with your powers that way.

caoimhinh

The added rule of "Hanno needs to think it is unjust to Undo it" seems weird and even goes against what Hanno himself had perceived when he obtained that Aspect, which was "Once a day, he can Undo a tragedy", which -let's not forget- was awakened to resurrect Marshal Nim who had died fighting the Scourges.

The bit about needing to think of those things as unjust in order to Undo them was added afterward, probably to justify the many wounds and dead that will remain as such. But Hanno could resurrect the Dead King using Undo, so this really doesn't fly that much.

It would make sense that he can't resurrect someone for whom there's not a body left, though.

Peter Emuss

I was always under the impression that Hanno had to consider it unjust in order to Undo it from its very first use – he'd made a mistake not listening to Save because he wanted to try and finish off the Prince of Bones first and Nim was dead because of that mistake. It's been there from the beginning of the aspect to my mind, even if it wasn't explicitly stated. Plus it is thematically very appropriate for Hanno to judge what is fair, given his journey.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2022/01/28/interlude-legends-iv/>

As for the Dead King, it was unjust that he could continue gaming the system when good men died and, more than that, his avowed commander had Sentenced him to live-then-die and that's the very definition of just if Hanno's going to trust Cat's judgement.

shikkarasu

Even if he didn't view it that way, I think Sentence bent the rules to let them get away with it. It's basically Dark Providence. I would go so far as to say that it's also the reason that ZeZe was able to catch DK's soul so easily; Sentence > Return.

clooneh

Would Hanno have seen it as an unjust death? I think he would have seen it as a noble sacrifice and the very sad one, but not unjust.

Zach

I think the main difference is that Hakram getting paralyzed wasn't really something deliberately/knowingly done "in exchange" for defeating Prince of Bones. It was just an injury he took in the course of a fight. But Antigone deliberately sacrificed herself to defeat the Drakon, with the weight of that sacrifice likely being necessary to the outcome.

It would be different if the Drakon had given her a fatal injury prior to her defeating it – that would be more analogous to what happened to Hakram.

arcanavitae15

I am so happy to have read this and to see it March on through the years. Thank you for making this EE. I learned a lot of from this story that I will carry with me for a long time. It was a great adventure and an even greater story.

donteatme

Thank you so much for this wonderful series EE. The dedication required to write so much is truly amazing. Also Anaxares?

arcanavitae15

The abdication was so striking for me, a bittersweet moment that was both a beautiful new start but also a tragedy, I teared up the most at this part.

arcanavitae15

Hanno of Arwad did not answer, though he was brave enough not to shy from her burning gaze. The White Knight was not a man whose convictions were easily moved. And yet he stepped back, when instead of trying tirade or persuasion the Black Queen of Callow got down on her knee. Catherine Foundling was a proud woman, it was known. She had held to the bone of that pride ever since, as a girl, her father had taken into the heart of an empire and the mighty had knelt around them he had told her of a way to live: we do not kneel. Her father's truth, one he had lived and died by. Refusing compromise even in the face of death, unbending for anything or anyone.

But Catherine went down on her knee, because she was more than her father's daughter and Hakram Deadhand mattered more to her than pride.

"Please," she asked. "I know there are others as deserving, that you only get once day."

Her fingers clenched.

"And still," she said. "Please."

This shook me, it depicts how much her father effected her life and his ideals but also how she has grown past it. Amadeus references always make me feel so awed in how well they are done.

Soronel Haetir

The one that struck me was "There's a debt between us, Hakram Deadhand". Usually that would be someone calling in a debt, not admitting that they owe.

arcanavitae15

"Crippled and lost, a parade of the mangled, but they had gone through the storm and all five of them come out the other side breathing."

That is the sum of the Woe, broken and lost who found each other and found that they were no longer alone.

Adrian V

Well almost there, any sugestion for wich extra chapter to read (apart from Saint's chapters) once they are made public?

Also stupid onion ninjas, they are already preparing for the next battle.....

Стас Бушнев

Fetters, then Scriven.
But they all are very good.

Peter Emuss

In my opinion, they are all superb and should just be read one after the other.

ohJohN

SCRIBE Scribe SCRIBE

ohJohN

also Neshamah!

(they're all genuinely great, those 2 just stuck out as particularly powerful or fascinating chapters)

*arcanavita*15

I am so happy that Viv gave credit to Cat and that she has the possibility of not being remembered in a negative light that means so much to Cat.

Natman717

I've been deleting emails for this story, and not reading chapters for what feels like forever. Read consistently for like 3 years and just stopped one day, last I remember the crew was in some like pocket dimensions school/vault place that was being invaded by fae? during some special truce with Keter? I think? But for some reason I read this chapter, and damn it felt good. Not sure if I'll ever have the energy to go back and read what I missed, but I'm glad I'm here for the end. I'll Always think about this story even if I don't read it anymore and I just have to say thanks for how many memories lie with this adventure. Truly an amazing story, one of the jewels of the web novel era.

bellacohl

Oh boy, I'm not writing much in this comment because I know I'll rant in the last epilogue, but god dammit this was so good

Sunday

Thanks a lot EE

This story means a lot to me, it's probably my favourite work of fiction

Doom Ms Evildoom

Thanks for the book, EE. It's been a constant part of my life for years now, and I'm not sure what I'm going to do once it's gone. It ended perfectly.

Rey d`Tutto

Top 5 favorite fiction writers.
Tolkein, Asimov, Heinlein, Jordan, and EE.

Rey d`Tutto

You moved Herbert (& Son) to #6

badatgames2911

Adding window here. Wibbles books are always great and worm was something else. EE and Weeble are some of my favorite fantasy writers for these two books alone.

Hargabga

I have stuck with this story for 4 years, and it changed and influenced me in the lot of ways. I found it when beginning a new stage in life, and this book has been one of the few red lines tying it throughout. And now it ends, and, coincidentally or not, that stage of life ends too. Sweeping changes rage and I may not find anything like this book again to tide me through thick and thin, but damn, it was a good ride. And I'll remember it forever.

lenethren

Loved this. Thank you again for sharing this marvelous story you created.

Sugar Roll

Now where is Abigail in all of this? Is she partaking in her share of rash decisions?

alexjmScott

She's probably sat in a command tent/office somewhere, trying to figure out what's about to blindside them while they're distracted by the revelry. She's a pessimist at heart, is the Fox: you don't get something good without a catch, in her experience, and for something this good there's going to be one hell of a catch coming. And if she wants to retire to Laure on a general's pension, she's going to make sure that she gets back there in one piece.

beleester

"Only to the just, it simply claimed, as in the Book of All Things."

I had to search for this – it's in one of the epigraphs:

"Thus the Gods granted us the second boon: beyond the veil of death lies a land of always plenty, which will only be open to the just."

So taking Cat's motto, but changing it from mockery of the idea of justice to an honest endorsement of it.

Sinead

Not only that, but they had open Callow for those to return in good faith: first the Thirteenth, and thrn the goblins, as well as other elements of the Praesi diaspora.

Callow is a land of plenty in a lot of ways. And this now holds tgdm to it.

gir

“before all four of them an orc lay on a bed” – shouldn’t this be five? cat, vivienne, indrani, masego, and hanno.

mindsword2

I believe I started reading around the Lord of Silver Spears.
It’s been a long time and this will almost certainly be marked as my favorite web novel ever read. I quote this work nearly every week it feels like and the words and phrases have sunk deep.

Ever worthy, EE.

megaprr

So damn good.

End of an era.

Draconic

Thank you for this journey.

Yuz

It was wonderful.
Thank you, truly.

Barrendur

Not perfect, but good. Not new, but original. Not balanced, but skewed in the readers’ favour. Thank-you for sharing this, EE

JRogue

I cannot possibly say “thank you” enough, but...

Thank you.

BargleNawdleZouss

I would be totally fine if EE wants to take a week or two to write Epilogue II, and give us the Tolkienesque extended ending (immediate AND long-term aftermath) that we’re all craving.

David Stone

I wonder if Cat will add Keter’s flag to her Mantle.

Daniel E

A barb about taxes immediately struck me as more random than normal. A quick search later: Book 1 Chapter 1- "How many Praesi does it take to change a lantern's wick?

A legion to conquer all the candlemakers, a High Lord to sell the wicks down south and then we're taxed for being in the dark."

– Overheard in a Laure tavern

daletutor

Truly wonderful, sad that it's finally coming to an end thou

Arexus Galia

This is the first time I'm ever commenting here, but I've been following your wonderful tale for years now. I was studying in college when I first started. You engrossed me so much in your work that I would sometimes read it instead of paying attention to the prof. And here we are now. Years later I know have a job, and now the tale of Catherine ends. It was a hell of a ride. And I would like to thank you for your years of work. God bless man, and good luck in your next endeavor.

P.S.: Abigail better get her bloody pension. She deserved it!

Rabblrouser

I feel like a kid again and my best friend is moving away. I hate to see these characters go, but their story is told.

ethericsentinel

Cordelia Hasenbach has learned a deep truth: There's always a boom tomorrow.

SomeGuyWhoReadsThings

Man I feel like a little hole is about to open up on my weekly routine. And a bigger one in my heart for all these characters. It's been so long that I legit can't remember a time when I didn't read this first thing in the morning. Such monumental work mate well done, can't wait to read it all in one go now 😊

john

So Masego became the God of Figuring Out How To Be A God Correctly?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Does that mean he'll one day lend his patronage to other would-be gods, at least as long as they aren't threatening his friends' legacies?

starflower

I'm just crying and laughing and having my breath caught so much.

vuthuha912

Yeah. Amadeus never went down on his knees to beg for Alaya life. I am not sure kneeling would have worked for Amadeus but it really makes me think about his attitude to life. He never beg for help, he will find away to achieve his goals and help others (the ones he wanted to help). Sometimes being vulnerable is the answer. Just ask for help you idiot.

Epilogue II

"At the end, there will be more than the Gods.

With the Last Dusk will come the passing of Creation, discording turning to concord as the wager of Fate is resolved. Yet it shall not be the end of everything, for though all came of the emptiness of Void to create is to make something from nothing. That is our gift, and so the sum of the choices we have made will echo beyond the bounds of time.

In the end, we are told, they will all have mattered."

– Last page of the Book of All Things

The valley, they told Catherine, was called the Knightsgrave.

It was a pretty sight, tall grass split by a burbling mountain spring whose banks grew thick with red flowers. That was not unusual, in the Red Flower Vales – which in these parts the native Procerans called the Vermillion Valleys – but the mage tower surrounded by a few cottages was. Half a dozen wizard families and twice that in simple students had made their home in the Knightsgrave, a small hidden school of wizardry in the mountains. The temple built by the cottages made it plain that the House of Light was keeping on them, but both the brother there and the magistrate in nearby Beaumaraïs knew and approved of the school.

Neither recognized that they were being visited by the Warden and the White Knight until they were told, and quickly acceded to silence when it was asked of them. Borders were still being drawn, after all, but Beaumaraïs might well be part of the lands ceded to Cardinal before the year was out.

The burial of the Rogue Sorcerer, Roland de Beaumarais, attracted something of a crowd. Magistrate Alisanne handled the early arrangements, but then turned the affair over to Brother Albert. Catherine Foundling had known many a shade of grief over her years, both hers and that of others, so she did not ask why the beautiful grey-eyed woman could not stand to look at the coffin. Roland had said there would be a woman in Beaumarais and there was no need to ask who she might be.

It was a simple but heartfelt service. Brother Albert did not take up too much of the talking, ceding the place instead to Roland's father – his last living parent, after his mother's death two years past from the green fever – who spoke of the light there had been in his son since he'd been a child, of how proud he was that he had gone out into the world to chase the murderer of his brother Olivier. Roland the Beaumarais, it seemed, was something of a local hero. He'd fought off an evil wizard as a teenager, rumoured to be a Praesi warlock, and founded the small wizard school.

Magistrate Alisanne's eyes were hard as flint all through the service. Eyes turned to her several times, expectant, but she never spoke a word.

Hanno spoke instead, of the good he had seen Roland do and the love others yet bore for him. The eyes of the young wizards shone, when they heard of the company a man who'd once been a boy here had risen to keep. Of the people he had helped, the evils he had defeated. Catherine Foundling, when her turn came, spoke only two sentences.

"He took an arrow meant for me," she quietly said. "The debt I owe him is greater than words can convey."

Roland was buried by the banks of the spring among a bed of red flowers. A stele of stone was left to remember him by, simply reading: Roland de Beaumarais, the Rogue Sorcerer. A life spent for another is never wasted. As dusk approached the crowd dispersed, heading back into town for the funerary banquet. The White Knight took a single look at the magistrate and the once-queen standing among red flowers before taking his leave with them, leaving them to the privacy of their grief.

"None of the people who came knew him," Magistrate Alisanne quietly said. "Most came to Beaumarais after he left, attracted by rumours of the school."

"Not even his father?" the Warden asked.

A bitter smile answered.

"Especially not him," the magistrate replied.

Catherine Foundling was the keeper of many secrets, and so she did not ask why the other woman had insisted on a closed casket funeral when the body was well-preserved and had allowed none to gaze at the body. Roland had been a friend, one of the finest she'd ever had. She would not pry at his secrets while standing over his grave.

"I meant it," the Warden said, "when I said I owed him a debt. He spoke of you while dying."

The grey-eyed woman's face twisted with grief before she mastered herself. Only then did she answer the implicit offer.

"The rumours say that Cardinal grows by the day," she said.

"We're still laying the foundations," the Warden admitted. "Though houses have been raised for workers and officials."

It had been a year and a half since the fall of Keter, but work had only begun six months past. The Principate was dragging its feet recognizing the borders despite Cordelia's best efforts, though she had assured Catherine that it was not malfeasance. Part of the lands currently belonged to Orne, who had effectively declared independence during the Principate's collapse and had only loosely been brought back into the fold. First Princess Rozala could have pushed harder on the matter, but she already had too many demands on her time between the campaigns to recover the north and the negotiations with the secessionists in the south. Cardinal was at no risk of pulling blades and so very much down the list.

"Then perhaps I should go north," Magistrate Alisanne mused. "Our prince has called for officials to join the resettling of Brabant now that the verdant companies drove the dead from it."

"If that is your choice, I can put in a word for you," the Warden said. "Princess Beatrice is an old acquaintance; she would do me a small favour without thinking twice."

Princess Beatrice Volignac, who had formally abdicated all claim over Hainaut and pledged her army to the reconquest in exchange for the Highest Assembly granting her the principality of Brabant, was also in dire need of skilled officials. The ruling line of Brabant and its capital had both been wiped out, leaving the land in such brutal anarchy that the commoners were begging the orc mercenaries who'd driven back the dead to stay and settle in empty villages. Some were accepting, the Silver Letters had sent in their latest report to Cardinal, and there was already talk in Beatrice's court of inviting a goblin tribe to try to cut down on the costs of reconstructions. The roaring success of that gamble in Brus under the Kingfisher Princes was inviting imitation.

"And Iserre?" the magistrate idly said, tone gone teasing.

"Rozala Malanza's less likely to do me favours freely," the Warden drily replied, "but I could arrange something there too. I wouldn't advise heading there unless you want to see some fighting, though."

The grey-eyed woman's brow rose in surprise.

"Would it truly come to war so soon after the last?"

"Salamans is backing their own Milenan to contest Malanza's and they're not backing down," Catherine Foundling said. "They'll want to avoid open war with the Highest Assembly, but they want to use a civil war Iserre to break its southern ambitions."

Much of the south yet refuse to recognize Rozala Malanza as the legitimate First Princess, alleging in a fit of irony that she had usurped the good and rightful ruler of Procer – First Prince Cordelia Hasenbach. Using that pretext they were resisting being brought back into the Principate, though the real reasons were rather more pragmatic. Not only had the First Princess sworn to unseat every royal who had not sent armies to Keter but the Arlesite principalities had been the least hurt by the war and would be the first to recover. Few of them were enthusiastic at the prospect of being heavily taxed for the next fifty years to pay for the recovery of Procer's heartlands, the same Alamans princes that had been their rivals for power in Salia for centuries.

Only the swing of public opinion in favour of the First Princess since the victory in Keter had stopped war from erupting, but that would not last. Rozala Malanza was not as skilled a diplomat as her predecessor, for all that she was significantly more beloved of the people of Procer.

"I've never had a taste for war," Magistrate Alisanne finally said. "And that was before I lost him to it."

The grey-eyed woman shook her head, smiling at the grave.

"I should see, I think, what dream it is that he gave his life for," she decided. "Let it be Cardinal."

—

The opening of Cardinal College drew the greats of all Calernia.

Even after four years and fortunes spent Cardinal still looked like it was only half-done, but what had been done was spectacular. At the narrowing of the pass between Procer and Callow there had once been a fortress called the Bloody Twins, but the fighting of the Tenth Crusade – the duel between two dead legends, the Sovereign of Red Skies and Antigone Drakonslayer – had broken it and masses of stone been dropped from a Hell. Using the old fortress as a foundation and the fallen stone as materials, an army of stonemasons from the signatories to the Liesse Accords had begun to build the city.

Now two great square towers of grey stone rose as tall as the mountain they ate into, a great plaza passing between though they connected by a massive arched bridge – Concord Bridge, it was called – that stood half a league above the ground. From a distance the entire College looked like a gargantuan arch curving towards the clouds, and radiating outwards from it the bones of a city had been raised. Large avenues split the grounds like the lines on a sundial, districts swallowing the northern and southern valleys as tunnels were being carved through the mountains to bind the mountain-city together. Great swaths were still empty, but already a trading town on the Callowan side that heavy grain imports had driven demand had been founded and the districts around the College filled up.

The rest was yet as villages dotting the empty belly of a great city, workers come from abroad and migrants drawn by rumours of work taking up residence in clumps, but in time the city would fill itself. It might never be as large as Salia or Ater, the mountains would forbid such heedless growth, but in time it might become one of the great cities of Calernia regardless. Finishing to would be the work of decades yet, but already Cardinal had begun to pay for itself in part by collecting taxes in coin and food from its territories on both sides of the Whitecaps. It was a long way from no longer needing foreign coin to continue growing, but it would be provided for some years yet.

Besides, Chancellor Alaya and Empress Basilia had proved willing to sink a great deal more gold into the city than the Accords mandated. Not without concessions to show for it, of course, but negotiations with the seneschal of the city had not yielded as much as they might have hoped. Lady Cordelia was yet one of the finest diplomats on the continent.

Guests had begun arriving a month before the ceremony was due, but the grand names only in the sennight before. The incoming tide of crowned heads excited even the already infamously blithe Cardinalians, who had seen so many great works of magic used to mundane building purposes that very little could yet shock them. Formal reception only took place when the last of the delegations arrived, in the grand plaza between the two towers of the College. It was a long, ceremonious affair where the delegations marched up the avenue one after another to be welcomed and only made less dull to behold for the crowds by how richly dressed the delegations were.

The Warden, head of the still mostly empty ruling council of Cardinal, gave out those welcomes with the other three sitting members. Lady Cordelia Hasenbach, seneschal of the city, who had also taken on diplomatic and judicial duties that would in time be beyond the office's remit when they could be distinguished from the administrative ones. Lady Pickler, intendant of works, who had already fallen into the habit of rarely attending any meeting that did not involve allocation of funds. And lastly General Grem One-Eye, the famous Praesi general who had quietly retired at the end of the War on Keter and taken the offer of commanding Cardinal's fledgling army.

The Lord Hierophant having adamantly refused the office of Rector of Cardinal College in favour of remaining a permanent Senior Lecturer, he had gotten out of attending. First Princess Rozala and her consort Louis Rohanon were welcomed first, a panoply of princes trailing behind them.

"They tell she might be pregnant with a second," the Warden muttered.

"It was only a matter of time," Lady Cordelia replied in a murmur. "She was trying as early as last year."

Catherine Foundling let out a low whistle.

"During that mess in Salamans?" she said. "Bold."

It had been a tense time, and if not for their intervention the situation might well have devolved into open war between the League and the Principate. In the wake of the First Princess' decisive victories in Iserre, Salamans had broken into civil war only for its south to be invaded by the Prince of Tenerife in a lightning march. He had then formally applied to join the League of Free Cities, throwing lit matches into tinder. Valencis had immediately pulled out of its negotiations with the Highest Assembly, making a marriage alliance with Tenerife instead, and when the First Princess had directly intervened in Salamans she'd run into Tenerifan forces in the south that refused to cede the ground. An accidental skirmish turned into battle then drew Empress Basilia into the conflict, for though Tenerife could not be welcomed into the League in the Hierarch's absence it had status enough as an applicant to ask help of the Protector of the League.

With League armies camped a mere ten miles away from the Principate's in southern Salamans, there had been the scent of steel in the air.

The Warden's arbitration and a great deal of bargaining behind closed doors had helped tensions return to a simmer, but the miracle that put it to rest came in the form of Anaxares the Hierarch. Emerging from the Hells in the city of Orense, which even after being returned to the Proceran fold was holding out, he collapsed the siege and led the citizenry into declaring the independent Republic of Orense before the White Knight chased him off. With another fire in her backyard as the insurrection spread across the principality, the First Princess agreed to a partition of Salamans, ceding the northern half the Principate kept between Iserre and her own Aequitan.

In return she received an open guarantee that Valencis would never receive help from Tenerife or be allowed to apply to join the League, a diplomatic coup that forced the rulers of Valencis to return to the negotiating table with a much weaker hand and a ruined reputation.

"If her south didn't keep setting itself on fire, she'd have most of the north back by now," General Grem opined in a growl.

Brabant and southern Lyonis had been reclaimed, but beyond that little else. Prince Otto Redcrown had led the return of the Lycaonese exodus, helping in the reconquest of Brus as he went, but though Neustria had been reclaimed and Rhenia relieved the rest remained in the hands of the dead. A push had seized the Morgentor and closed Twilight's Pass, but otherwise the great prince of the north seemed content to slowly reclaim old Lycaonese lands by pushing a little further every summer. He had done this with little help from any southerner save the Kingfisher Prince, who himself had been forced to essentially occupy southern Lyonis so the dead would not spill back through it into Brus after royal forces withdrew.

There was talk of a marriage with Sophie Louvroy, abdicated princess of Lyonis and last survivor of the main branch of the House of Louvroy, to formalize the arrangement.

After the Procerans came and went the rulers of Levant replaced them, riding with their lords of the Blood. King Razin and Queen Aquiline advanced under the star-studded banner of the Thuraya, the name they had adopted upon being crowned by the Majilis. The young queen's obvious pregnancy drew even more eyes than the appearance of the rather famous Lord Ishaq Rabia, first of the Barrow's Blood, whose town on the southern edge of the Brocelian was said to be growing fast.

"That succession is going to be a headache even if they have a kid," the Warden grunted. "Mark my words."

"The Circle of Thorns believe they want three children," Lady Cordelia noted. "One to inherit Levante and the crown after them, the other two for Malaga and Tartessos."

"The Majilis isn't toothless enough to allow that," Catherine Foundling replied. "They surrendered veto power, but it doesn't make them pushovers."

"Vaccei and Alava will threaten revolt, I agree," Lady Cordelia mused. "They will have to water their wine, pass the cities to kinsmen. It is doing them a favour in the long term, I would think."

"Three royal branches all with their own cities?" Lady Pickler snorted. "Because that's not a civil war in thirty years. I thought you said they were smart kids, Cat."

"They're still Blood," the Warden sighed, "it comes with some blinders. They've done well otherwise."

With the Levantines come and gone, the Callowan royal procession approached. Queen Vivienne of Callow led it, her recent husband prince-consort Cathal Iarsmai close behind. Though rumours had spread that marrying Grand Duchess Kegan's eldest grandson had been her price to keep Daoine in the Kingdom of Callow, the couple seemed happy enough. Cathal was only some years younger than the queen, after all, and handsome in the Deoraithe way.

"How much younger is he?" Lady Pickler asked.

"Just turned twenty," the Warden said.

"And divorced last year," Lady Cordelia said, sounding like she enjoyed the scandal. "A stroke of luck for Kegan, that, the second closest grandson is still twelve."

"If she'd been willing to settle for a nephew it could have been done years ago," the Warden noted, "but she wanted her own blood in the royal line."

House Foundling would inherit the same as any other, in the end, save that if it turned unworthy there would be a great many orphans ready to restore dignity to the crown. The decision had been contentious in the early years, but Queen Vivienne's reign had been peaceful and prosperous. Plenty had a way of silencing doubts, and the kingdom's rising trade guilds paired with the resettling of Liesse had occupied energies that might otherwise have turned to mischief.

After Callow came the League of Free Cities, Empress Basilia her vassal rulers of Nicae and Stygia arriving first. Formal diplomats from the other cities followed, as though Anaxares the Hierarch had kept his Name he had spurned invitations to return to the League when invited during his reappearance in Orense. It had been considered a surrender of the title, even by Bellerophon, which had allowed the League cities to resume foreign affairs and vote on joining the Liesse Accords.

"They'll have another Hierarch within the decade," the Warden said. "Basilia's getting too powerful, they'll want something to balance her influence."

And should she refuse, it might well come to civil war within the League. Which she could not afford, given that she was still trying to get Tenerife accepted as a member-state.

"She will pare down the powers of the office and get Tenerife brought into the fold as a trade," Lady Cordelia predicted.

"Don't say that in front of Ikaroi," Genera Grem grunted in amusement. "He'll send it home."

The head archivist of Cardinal College, Nestor Ikaroi, was not longer formally of the Secretariat but was still rather openly and amiably spying for Delos. He was so useful none of them particularly minded. The humour that had touched them at that retreated when the following delegation arrived.

Chancellor Alaya did not come in person, which only strengthened the rumours she was not far from stepping down – and that the Warden would kill her should they meet in person – but both High Marshal Nim and one of Lord Councillors had been sent, a strong showing. Especially so considering that Lord Councillor Sargon Sahelian being increasingly charged with foreign diplomacy was speculated to be a sign that the chancellor wanted him to succeed her.

"Queen Vivienne will be miffed," Cordelia predicted. "She would prefer High Lady Abreha to be in his place."

"Of course she would," Catherine Foundling snorted, "the old fox's promised to sell Callow the Blessed Isle if she's elected chancellor."

The border between the Confederation of Praes and the Kingdom of Callow had been a matter of some debate after the end of the War on Keter. The Blessed Isle was in Praesi hands and the Fields of Streges in Callowan ones, but the land had never been formally ceded and there had never been a declaration of war between either realms since the secession of Callow. Chancellor Alaya had traded the disarmament of the Isle to the Callowan crown in exchange for a lasting treaty that allowed the Confederation to buy a fixed quantity of grain at a fixed price every year, bolstering her position and securing food for Ater, but the borders had yet to be formally fixed.

"Sargon Sahelian's trade policies are sounder," Cordelia firmly said. "And his support for Cardinal College significantly stronger."

"You just want to edge Mercantis entirely out of the spice trade, you cutthroat bitch," the Warden fondly said. "At least own it."

"Their position as the perennial middleman is a loss to all of Calernia," Lady Cordelia righteously replied, but her lips twitched.

The northern realms came in swift succession. First the Herald of the Deeps, formally recognized as king of Kishar when he'd signed the Accords two years past, who'd come with a small retinue whose splendid armour was still eclipsed by the colourful parade of fire spirits that flocked to him like birds.

"Good call renaming Keter something that starts with a K," Lady Pickler said. "It'll make it stick sooner."

"I am sure that is the only reason the name was chosen," Lady Cordelia drawled. "Well spotted, my lady."

"I'm not taking that lip from someone who giggles at being called Cordy when she's drunk," the goblin bit back.

Following the dwarves came the representatives from burgeoning Zemebreg, the Firstborn colony that dwelled in the city once called Cleves. Mighty Rumena itself led it accompanied by a pack of the wandering riddle-priests endemic to its city that had become famous in the Principate. With them came the envoys from Serolen itself, eldest and greatest of the spreading drow cities, came greater names. Mighty Radegast led the group, now famous for the terrifying mercenary army it had led in Nesutria and Rhenia on Prince Otto's behalf. Then Ivah of the Losara, First Under the Night and Lord of Silent Steps. The priest was perhaps the best-known of the Firstborn, nowadays, for it had spent several years in the Principate after the end of the War on Keter. The bargains it had struck with the First Princess for mercenary sigils had been instrumental in clawing back control of the western coast, allowing Segovian shipping to resume to Prince Otto's realm.

"I'm glad Malanza didn't bring any of the Most Holy or we'd have a brawl on our hands," the Warden said, and it was not entirely a jest.

There were many names for the worship of Sve Noc, these days. The Tenets of Night remained most common, but the Faith of Crows and the House of Night were spreading as well. In Callow mostly through the Army, and aside from a scuffle over an order of knights that had insisted on being allowed anointment in Night to outrage from the House Constant there had been little trouble. It was seen as a soldier's cult, little more. In Procer and the Grey Eyries, however, things had taken a different turn. The Matrons had banned the worship, only for the measure to be backfire by spreading word and then be overturned by Chancellor Alaya besides, and now they were said to be wrestling with a great deal of unrest.

In Procer it had grown beyond that, however. Night was simply too tempting a power for a realm where banditry and roving bands of undead were still a real threat even all these years later. The House of Light's campaign of words to denounce the heresy had taken strong root in the south, but it had rung hollow north in the heartlands and north where drow sigils and wandering riddle-priests looking for worthy foes had saved many a life. Though yet frowned upon, the Faith of Crows was spreading and the Liesse Accords prevented the Highest Assembly from making this illegal. Hostility between the Proceran House and the Losara – considered a priest-caste in the Principate, and not without reason – in particular had risen to dangerous heights.

"Be glad we did not invite Tenerife," Lady Cordelia grimly replied. "They gave back their House the right to raise troops."

The last delegation to arrive, and not by happenstance, was that from Thalassocracy of Ashur. It was the last realm of Calernia not to have signed the Liesse Accords, and its envoys were the reason so many great names had come to the opening of Cardinal College. It would have been an important moment on its own, but the last signatory joining the Accord added great weight. Seven years after the fall of Keter, the Ashuran civil war had finally been brought to an end and the results had been expected by few. Instead of the Hadast claimant pushed by Arwad or Smyrna's insistence a Tyrian from overseas must be sent for, a fourth-tier citizen from Smyrna by the name of Baltsar Aderbal had taken control.

He'd been a middle-aged man with few allies when he'd declared the Committee of Government with the backing of only citizens of lower tiers tired of the fighting, but the reason he was now ruler of Ashur was the same two people standing behind him as he approached: the Blessed Artificer and the Archmage. Sapan the Apprentice had become Sapan the Mage and reportedly lost her temper when returning to Ashur after the war. After crushing the Blue Mage and half a school's worth of practitioners in a spectacular blowout when the other Named backed the Hadast claimant and attempted assassination of Baltsar Aderbal, she had transitioned into the Archmage and ended the civil war through sheer fear of angering her further.

She had, after all, blown up most of a mountain.

"Baltsar isn't the real power there," Lady Pickler said. "I don't care if he's called the head of their governing committee, either of those women could take his seat in a moment."

"Not Lady Adanna," Cordelia said. "She was born there but her looks are Soninke. Smyrnan elites rose up over having to back a Hadast relative married to a Levantine, they would go quite mad over her."

"Sapan's like Masego in some ways," the Warden said. "She wants to pursue her studies more than mingle. Mind you, she's a little more involved than Zeze's ever been."

"The decision to sever ties with the Baalite Hegemony is entirely hers," Cordelia agreed. "As has been reaching out to Praes in friendship to balance a resurgent League."

"Malicia's old dream come true," Catherine Foundling smiled, just a little too tightly.

"Boring," Pickler frankly said. "Can't believe I have to be here and Hanno got out of it. He's Ashuran, he should be here more than me."

"His having a look up north is more important," the Warden said. "If the word Hakram has sent is true, we have reason to be worried."

"There are records of elves being active outside the Bloom, if ancient ones," Cordelia said. "It is this talk of ratlings wandering the steppes that worry me. They could not have reached there without the Forever King's tacit allow."

The Warlord had been called in by far clans only loosely under his banner, tales of entire clans disappearing reaching his court, and duly informed Cardinal even as he moved north to investigate. The White Knight had gone alone, as the finest sword the Warden had to wield. General Grem cleared his throat.

"The Ashurans are getting close," he said. "They'll hear."

They fell into silence, the Warden allowing her gaze to fall onto the last delegation. The last great realm of the surface that had yet to sign the Liesse Accords, come here on the day where the great school she had dreamed with Hakram would open its gates to students. The sky above them was an endless sunny blue, cut only by the great towers of Cardinal College, and she let the warmth of the sun seep into her bones.

It was a good day, she thought, and there were better ones yet ahead.

—

The lecture hall was a large spread of stone with comfortable seats behind writing desks, built to easily fit a hundred, and it had been filled to the brim. Cardinal College allowed students to enroll in elective classes from their second year onwards, after the basics had been taught, and now that the first batch had reached the milestone near every mage in attendance had hurried to sign up for General Theory of Magic. Some had learned Lower Miezan specifically to be able to attend this particular set of lectures out of the three of, for they would be given by the most famous mage of the age. Without warning the door burst open and the Lord Hierophant strode into the hall and it went quiet as a grave, save for the tinkle of the trinkets woven into his hair. He looked, many noted, in a foul mood.

A flick of the wrist had chalk rising and writing General Theory of Magic on the large grey slate, the odd-eyed man turning to face the silent class.

"Before the month is over," he said, "half or you will be gone."

Several students swallowed.

"No dead," the Hierophant clarified. "The College has rules about that."

The words were not as reassuring as he had clearly meant them to be.

"You will be expected to take notes and study on your own," he continued, "and I will not slow the pace for the slower students. Should you struggle, you are free to attend the Senior Lecturer Beaumont's lectures instead – they are also given in Lower Miezan."

A pause, waiting for volunteers. There were none.

"Then we proceed," the Hierophant said. "Before we begin, I have been informed I am to give you the opportunity to ask questions. Raise your hand if you wish to do so, you will be called on."

A dark-skinned young woman in elaborate red and black robes was the first to raise her hand and so the first to earn the right to speak.

"You," Hierophant said.

"My lord," she said, "may I ask why you are giving what could be considered an introductory lecture instead of something more befitting your talents?"

The Hierophant's flesh eye narrowed.

"Sahelian, are you?" he asked.

She proudly nodded.

"I am-"

"Not interested," the Hierophant noted. "I knew Akua Sahelian, still consider her a friend. Lesser variants are of little interest. As for your question, it's because the contents of my Deicide and Applied Blasphemy lecture are currently locked into a vault after eating the soul of the warlock that tried to steal them."

A great many students breathed in sharply. Some second thoughts were had.

"And Hasenbach insists I have to teach something if I want my funding for the experiment," he continued. "Which is ridiculous, given the obvious benefits."

Though it had taken barely two years for Masego to accept Cordelia's invitation to refer to her by her first name, monthly funding debates saw her inevitably relegated to being 'Hasenbach' for a few days. A boy in the front, blond-haired and blue-eyed with stocky Callowan look, was the next called on.

"What's your experiment?" he eagerly asked.

"The technicalities are beyond any of you," Hierophant said, "but on the submission scroll I summed it up as 'forcing apotheosis onto a pig'."

Half the students paled. About a dozen leaned forward eagerly. Another boy, Ashuran by the looks of him, was next.

"Is it true you taught the Archmage?" he excitedly asked.

"Sapan learned from me," the Hierophant noted, "but I cannot claim to have taught her."

A pause.

"If you believe attending my lectures will turn you into her, abandon the idea," he cautioned. "She is a once in a generation talent and I have no reason to believe any of you are."

Several winces but few arguments. Even in the College, where already two Named were in attendance, few had the arrogance to compare themselves to the Archmage of Ashur. Next was a dark-haired girl, Arlesite in looks, and her accent was thick when she spoke up.

"Why should we attend your lectures instead of the others?" she asked. "What do they bring us?"

The Hierophant beamed.

"The first good question today," he praised.

The girl looked surprised, perhaps having expected irritation out of the infamously impatient mage. He glanced at her a second time, finding that she was young to be here. Eight, nine years old at most? And vaguely reminiscent of someone he likely should have paid more attention to at some point, an unfortunately broad list.

"The other Senior Lecturers," he told the class, "will teach you general theory with an accent on the manner of magic they practice themselves. I will not."

Under the eye cloth, an orb of glass shone with the light of miracles crafted and stolen both.

"I will be teaching you of the rules," the Hierophant smiled, "only to best explain how to break them."

Half the class was gone by the moon's turn, as he had predicted. The rest signed up to every single lecture the Lord Hierophant gave at Cardinal College.

—

Ater had recovered from the Battle of the Spiders.

It had been years since then, almost nine, and in the wake of the War on Keter the newly founded Confederation of Praes had thrived. With a willing if wary Callow as a trading partner, Chancellor Alaya had gathered a like-minded few to her council and undertaken reforms. Taxation of territories was reorganized to be handled directly by Ater, cutting out the middleman collector of the the High Seats. It tripled the revenue of the chancellorship over the span of a year while she appeased the same great with exemptions tailored to ensure they would remain the wealthiest of the aristocracy. With the ardent support of the High Lady of Kahtan, a young woman of strong reformist bent whose life had once been saved by the White Knight in Keter, the Taghreb aristocracy HUNGERING SANDS made bereft of an overlord by the end of Thalassina and goblin rule in Foramen were reorganized into districts patterned on the past imperial governorships of Callow.

High Lady Rana Muraqib's rumoured marriage proposal to the White Knight in the wake of this was the subject of excited gossip for years.

Meticulously negotiated treaties with the Warlord solidified the vassal state status of the Clans and the rights of all greenskins in Praes, including confirming the cession of the fortress of Chagoro and attendant territories. Hakram Deadhand set his court there and began raising his capital, deepening trade ties as orc mercenary companies – verdant companies, they were called in Procer – were sent west to fight under Procer to bleed out the old urge to raid. Besides, the northern clans were occupied with the growing ratling infestation in the Lesser Steppes. There was plenty of war and meat to go around these days.

But only outside, for within there was order. Permanent Legions of Terror fortresses in all regions to ensure order did not collapse in the wake of the disbanding of the old armies. Negotiations with the rebels of the Green Stretch ended in the region being assigned a governor by Ater but receiving an electoral vote in return.

Only in the Grey Eyries did peace wane, as the Tribes had eaten themselves alive over the matter of Night. After a panicked ban of worship that ended in disaster the Matrons attempted to pivot into priesthood but found Sve Noc lukewarm to the approaches. Several tribes collapsed into infighting, males or lesser females using Night to overthrow their superiors, but wiser Matrons instead raised the status of those who could use Night as being above those others. Even the males. It avoided widespread civil war, but with every season as more left for the greener pastures of Foramen, Callow and Procer their authority ebbed. Perhaps in time it would shatter entirely.

And as the years had passed, as peace kept and Praes entered an age of prosperity, Catherine Foundling counted the days. Until one night, just before dawn, the Warden slipped into a palace at the heart of Ater. It was not Tower, not mountain of horror and hubris, but it was opulent nonetheless. Nestled at the heart was a great garden with the stars for a roof, kept pristine by gardeners and enchantments both. At this hour of the night, with dawn approaching, there was no one there.

No one save for Alaya of Satus and the Warden who'd come for her.

The chancellor sat alone in a copper garden chair, leaning back into silk cushions and looking at the starlit sky as she sipped a cup of wine. The bottle was on the table, empty. It was of rough make, cheap glass for a cheap wine that some might have said tasted of mud. The dark-skinned beauty was pleasantly drunk, by the look of her, but even so her face betrayed no surprise when the Warden slid out of shadow as if she had come into being from nothing at all. Alaya only smiled and invited Catherine Foundling to sit.

"Warden," she said.

"Chancellor," the other replied.

"Congratulations are in order, I believe," Alaya said. "The ealamal was successfully put to use."

"Adanna does good work," the Warden agreed. "The poison clouds are already dispersing and it will reverse the blight on the Kingdom of the Dead fully over the next thirteen months. Or so the latest word out of Kishar goes."

"The Herald will be pleased," the chancellor mused. "He has been chafing to expand on the surface as he has been doing below."

The collapse of the Kingdom Under into half a hundred squabbling fiefdoms had only continued, allowing the Herald of the Deeps to seize the lands beneath most of what had once been the Kingdom of the Dead. There were few cities and farms there, however, mostly fortresses and forges. Farmland would be a blessing for an expanding realm swelling with refugees from the brutal strife of the dwarven heartlands.

"The Archmage's theorem was impressive work," Catherine Foundling said. "Even Masego was impressed."

"A rising name as well as a rising Name," Alaya commented. "Her proposal of lending Baalite mages to help ours create irrigation canals in the Hungering Sands is the talk of Praes. I believe my successor will take her up on it."

"And you know who that'll be?" the Warden idly asked.

The chancellor smiled.

"Sargon Sahelian, unless I am much mistaken," she said. "I have allowed him to expand his influence unchecked, far beyond the gains I conceded to Abreha."

"Hakram tells me he's popular with the Clans," the other woman agreed. "The help he offered in Chagoro – Hagaz now, sorry – went over well with the chiefs."

"He can be quite charming," Alaya said, "and his utter disinterest in territorial expansion is exactly what we need. He would much rather spend the treasury on rebuilding Praes than consider adventures abroad."

The Warden slowly nodded.

"You will leave him a Confederation on the rise," she acknowledged. "Ater has been rebuilt, trade with Callow is the highest it has ever been and all of Praes is on the path to recovery from the Uncivil Wars."

She paused.

"I walked the city, before coming here," the Warden said. "They love you again, the people in the streets."

"Mobs have short memories," the chancellor sighed.

"Maybe," Catherine Foundling said. "But they're not wrong either. I gave you eight years, and you have used them to rule ably and justly."

The dark-skinned beauty smiled.

"Sentiment, Catherine?" she drawled. "So late in the game?"

"I've been known to indulge," the Warden shrugged.

She was no longer a young woman, to be offended by something she had long made peace with.

"Is that why you have been sending casual letters to Marshal Juniper and her wife?" Alaya smiled.

"Aisha's the Governess-General, that's as high a position as Marshal," the other chided. "And I'm being practical with that too. Grem has been talking about retiring down the line, living out his last years in the Steppes, and I'll need someone to command Cardinal's forces then."

Queen Vivienne would stringently object at losing Aisha and Juniper would not relish leaving the Army of Callow behind, but the Warden suspected the two of them would be swayed by the prospect of living in the same city enough to accept after Grem retired.

"A large army, for a young city-state," the chancellor said. "However important it has grown to be."

"If we were just handling the defence of our territory, suppressing banditry and the like, it'd be too large," the Warden freely conceded. "But the Black Legion is meant to be used against Named running wild and other threats to the Accords."

A moment of silence between them.

"He would have enjoyed the name, I think," Alaya quietly said. "He was always a little vainer than he allowed himself to believe he was."

"I figured," Catherine Foundling quietly replied. "Besides, it's his tactics we're teaching them."

Their gazes moved away, drawn by the night sky that did not yet betray the coming of dawn.

"How was it?"

"Eight years of choking down ash and dust," Alaya honestly said. "But it is done, Catherine. I laid both our sins to rest. I made Praes into what we wanted it to be."

The other woman considered that, for a moment.

"I'm glad," she said, and found she meant it.

Neither of them broke the silence for a long time. And as dawn approached, Catherine Foundling rose to her feet.

"It won't be painful," the Warden said.

That had never been the point. The chancellor of Praes drained the last of her cup, setting it down, and smiled the smile of a woman who had spent most of her life one step ahead of everyone else in the room.

"It wasn't," Alaya of Satus softly agreed, "when I drank the poison an hour ago."

She would die as she had lived, holding her fate in her own hands. Her body was cold when dawn found it, sitting alone in her beautiful garden and staring at the sky through dead eyes.

So passed Alaya of Satus, once known as Dread Empress Malicia and last of that dreadful line.

—

It had been ten years from the fall of Keter and a debt was owed.

Hye Su waited in the clearing where Refuge had once stood, greenery having since clawed back the grounds. She was sitting on a stone, honing the edge of her blades with a whetting stone. When the Warden arrived, near the coming of dusk, she displayed no surprise.

"So you came alone," Hye Su said, tone giving faint praise. "I wondered if you'd try to drag one of your little leagues into it."

It had not been so long since the Guild and the Society were founded, but Hye Su had kept her ear to the ground. The founding of both had led to a great deal of talk, for it was not everyday that companies of Named. The differences were not so great, even though the Guild stood for Below and the Society for Above. Behind all the details, the essence was the same: they were both ways for Named to make enforced bargains with one another and other entities. Be they with kingdoms or vagrants, the deals brokered by Guild and Society were made with the strength of Cardinal behind them. All at the simple price of those who joined the ranks agreeing to simple rules of conduct.

Named flocked to Cardinal for a reason.

"It's not what they're for," the Warden shrugged.

The other woman laughed.

"I suppose not," she conceded. "They're to corral the herd you let loose."

The Warden cocked her head to the side.

"So you noticed it," she said. "I wondered how obvious it was to those without our resources."

"Names are popping up like weeds," Hye Su said. "You don't need spies to see it. It used to be that there was one every few years, Foundling, but now?"

She snorted.

"I hear there's three Apprentices running around and your Knight Errant has already picked up a Squire," she said. "It's only been ten years since Keter and you've already made back every Name you lost and change."

"Too many people know stories, know about how Names work," the Warden said. "There'd never been so many Named in the same place as there were in the Arsenal or Keter, or a place like Cardinal. We made it easier for them to come into being."

"Made them weaker, too," Hye Su scathingly said. "Power spread around is thinned."

"It makes for a better world, I think," the Warden said.

"You would say that," Hye Su replied, "having made it."

She rose to her feet, blades in hand, and though she was one of the most dangerous women alive Catherine Foundling was not worried. She had learned tricks from friends and foes over the last decade, but her certainty did not come from them. She had made the world of today, her enemy had said, and there was truth to that. And it was just as true that Hye Su had been left behind by that world. It has passed her by.

And so this could only end one way.

—

There were only four students in the circular hall, which was deep below the College and so heavily warded the magic could be tasted in the air. Torchlight did not light up every shadowed stretch, but the sculpted ritual circle in the middle glowed faintly red and tinged even the dark. Many would have balked at such a sight, but these nine wore the silver stripe on their robes that denoted students in their last year who had distinguished themselves enough to be allowed into restricted classes.

"Welcome," the Lord Hierophant said, "to Nature of Divinity and Practical Applications."

There was a snort from a dark-skinned girl. Taiwo Sahelian cocked an eyebrow.

"Sir, you do know every still calls it Deicide and Applied Blasphemy right?" she said.

"As they should," Hierophant muttered, "it is a much better name."

"Seneschal Hasenbach is threatening to cut the lunacy fund again, isn't she?" fair-haired Anthony Fletcher grinned.

"It's Catherine this time," Hierophant sighed. "She says that feeding the Swine King to the fae wasn't enough to get the House of Light to drop the matter so we need to 'tread carefully for a bit'."

"It wasn't even a real god," Isabel Malanza complained. "We only got halfway there."

Occasionally First Princess Rozala's eldest daughter showed her age, the lowest of them all at twelve. None of them had dared to underestimate her since the time she'd made the Apprentice float atop Concord Bridge for half a day after the Taghreb condescended to her about Olowe's Theorem. Rumour had it the Warden had ordered to leave him up there as an object lesson.

"It was the village that did it, I think," Hiram of Arwad mildly said. "Upright pigs tilling the land and building houses was a mite disturbing, I'll admit."

Hiram was not the most talented of them, and by far, but solid common sense and a facility with language meant he had already been approached to serve as a Junior Lecturer after graduation.

"No matter," Hierophant dismissed. "Now, all of you should have read on Dumisai's Theorem over the last week."

A chorus of agreements.

"Good," Masego grinned. "Now the interesting part. If fae are fundamentally the stuff of Arcadia given form, then what happens if that stuff is used to try to make a devil?"

The circle glowed ominously as the four students leaned in eagerly.

—

It was fifteen years after the fall of Keter that the first true challenge to the Liesse Accords came.

"You know," the Warden said, "I really did think it would be the ratlings that made the other shoe drop."

"It's only a matter of time until the elves find a Horned Lord," the White Knight said. "But you know my thoughts on that already."

"And you mine," the Warden replied. "The Golden Bloom's not an Accords signatory and no one wants to try invading that wasp's nest when the elves aren't directly acting."

It had not been proved that the Forever King was using the shards of the Twilight Ways to ferry the Chain of Hunger east, though the leading mages of Calernia all agreed it was the most likely explanation. There were already suspicions that the same was being done to the Brocelian and the Waning Woods, the elves seeking to break apart human realms as a prelude for resuming expansion. The success of the Spring Crown ritual had ignited in them a thirst for intervention beyond their borders that had not been heard of in millennia.

"Passivity now will cost us in years to come," Hanno said.

"I don't disagree," Catherine grunted. "I just don't see a solution. Besides, let's start by putting out the fire in front of us."

Atalante was on fire. The Preacher's seizure of power through a coup had not been a breach of the Accords, no matter how heated the man's rhetoric, but after transitioning into the Philosopher King he'd ceased all pretence that he intended to respect the rules. Prescription of the worship of Night and execution of all suspected sympathizers of Below had been only the beginning of the bloodshed, but it was the King's use of angelic influence to raise an army of fanatics out of towns and villages that'd guaranteed there would be war.

The armies under Empress Basilia were facing the Host of Light and its fearsome general further south, but riots in Atalante had proved an opening for the Black Legion to risk a decapitating strike on the tyrant himself. The Archmage had blown open the gates and now black-armoured soldiers were putting down the Philosopher King's fanatic soldiers, and now the man himself was holed up in the Temple of Manifold Truths.

And he was, by the looks of the distant glow lighting up the night sky, calling on a Choir once more.

"Let us end it before more died needlessly," the White Knight agreed.

The two of them tore through the Philosopher King's personal guard like a storm. Numbers meant little to the likes of them, at the summit of their power, and it was not long before they entered the chamber where the Philosopher King himself awaited. The ragged, wild-eyed man sat in his pale robes and clutched the many prayer beads on his wrists and neck as he hollered his prayers.

"You're too late," the Philosopher King laughed, "Contrition comes and-"

"Silence," the Warden said.

Catherine Foundling, it was said, had defied angels many a time. And won more often than not. The story held true that night, Contrition's light winking out.

"Cassander of Atalante," the White Knight said. "For breach of the Liesse Accords on counts of unfair proscription, malicious use of non-creational influence and mass murder by means of Name you are to receive judgement by the Warden."

"Never," the Philosopher King hissed. "Don't you see, Knight, how Below is winning? Spreading everywhere, villains growing like weeds to strangle all the world? They must be stopped now, purged while we still can and-"

"Cassander of Atalante," the Warden said, "I Sentence you to die."

And though angels screamed, though Light flared like a sun and the Philosopher King unleashed the last of his power, the White Knight's sword found his neck. As if it had been fated to be cut. The two of them stood over the cooling corpse, tired.

"He's only the first," the White Knight said. "There will be others."

"Below will unleash the next," the Warden softly agreed. "It'll get uglier, before it gets better."

"Isn't that always the way?" the other man smiled.

It was rare for them to take the field together, these days, but whenever they did the easy complicity of their youth always returned.

"I'll leave the corpse to you," the White Knight said. "General Grem might yet need aid securing the city."

She nodded. He had taken a wound today, an arrow to the belly, and though his life was in no danger she suspected it would only hurry the old orc's retirement. Aisha had been making noise in their letters about wanting more time to spend on finishing her memoirs. A hint that, now that Juniper was satisfied with General Abigail as successor, she might consider leaving the Army of Callow behind. Said Lady Abigail Tanner had retired thrice already, but the flooding of her first mansion and then going bankrupt twice had returned her to service every time. It was a fond tale in Callow that she could not be out of the army for longer than three months without calamity striking.

The Gods themselves wanted Abigail Tanner to be Marshal of Callow one day.

The Warden felt the presence before she heard it. The way Creation shivered as someone who had not been came to be. And when she turned, her breath caught in her throat as she beheld Akua Sahelian. Lovely beyond words in a splendid red dress, golden eyes smiling as she touched the copper bracelet at her wrist. The cuffs of her dress were ornate lace, hearts woven into the pattern. Her two marks were these: red and a heart. No matter what she wore Calamity had a splash of red on it, and always a heart was hidden somewhere in it. Time had little changed her, the Warden saw.

Such a thing as time held much of a grip on either of them, she supposed. The gift of the Sister for one and eternity bound for the other kept age at bay.

"Catherine," Akua smiled.

"Akua," Catherine softly replied.

The wounds suffered in Keter were gone. As were Providence's, rumour had it, whose flask and lute had returned along with her arm. The faces of Yara of Nowhere and Akua Sahelian also remained, neither changing through the years.

"I though you might show up," the Warden said. "Your stars are out tonight."

Two bright shards of light in the sea of darkness. Fortune and Misfortune, some had taken to calling them. Providence and Calamity, others used instead.

"We bargained," Akua said. "She will get her way in Levant for the night, but I have the freedom of my own."

"And what," Catherine Foundling croaked, "would you do with it?"

Akua Sahelian took a hesitant step forward. It had been fifteen years since they saw each other last. It might be that long, or even longer before they saw each other again. Yet she still reached out to the other woman, fingers brushing against hers, a question asked. Neither of them were sure which reached out, not until they were kissing ardently and stumbling away from the throne and the corpse that lay on it.

They had only until dawn, so they must make the most of the time

Cordelia Hasenbach was drinking.

This was not as rare an occasion as when she had ruled Procer, but that it would venture past the first bottle of wine was. She was in a maudlin mood, however, and took no pains to hide it. Catherine found her in one of the private salons atop what Cardinalians had taken to calling the Warden's Tower, the northern of the two great towers that made up Cardinal College and the ruling seat of the city.

"I see you've heard," the Warden said.

"I have," Cordelia said, and poured her companion a drink without asking.

Catherine cocked a brow but sat, taking the implicit invitation and the cup with it.

"A lot of it stays," the Warden says. "Most of the trade clauses and part of the alliance."

"The Grand Alliance had ended," Cordelia calmly said. "You need not coddle me over it."

Procer and Callow still held a defensive alliance, but Levant had ended their own given the rising tensions at the border with the vassal Republic of Orense. Keeping the treaties alive had been increasingly unpopular, given that few still saw a need for it. Some argued such stringent alliances were more likely to create war than prevent it, these days.

"It was made to foster peace," Catherine said. "And it worked, Cordelia."

There had not been major strife since the Philosopher's War, and though skirmishes at borders were hardly uncommon the balance of Calernia was holding.

"I achieved what I set out to," Cordelia Hasenbach agreed. "But the great work of my life has still ended. I am, I think, allowed sentiment over that. And a drink."

The Warden drank of her cup.

"I can't argue with that," she said.

The other woman sent her sly look.

"I would expect not," she said, "given what happened last time I opened a second bottle."

News of Prince Otto's wedding to a Neustrian noblewoman a few years back had sent her into a fit of nostalgia. Not regret, but perhaps wonder at the life she might have lived. After all Otto Reitzenberg, born the third son of a friendly royal line, had once been considered as a potential consort for Prince Cordelia of Rhenia. Catherine Foundling coughed, cheeks flushing in a way that still amused the other woman even after nearly two decades of acquaintance.

"I thought we didn't talk about that," Catherine said, tone careful.

"It seemed an unnecessary complication at the time," Cordelia said. "Besides, you are something of a cad."

"Hey now," Catherine weakly protested.

The once-princess idly traced the rim of her cup with a finger.

"Not only do you have a lover in Indrani whenever she visits," Cordelia said, "but you have taken others to bed."

"When the mood took me," she replied. "And not that many."

Which was true. The Ranger, who returned to Cardinal every year between the adventures across Calernia that made her the stuff of legends all over the continent, made up most of the dalliances. Cordelia had never felt jealous, not when Indrani was still so very obviously in love with Masego. Who reciprocated, she had seen, in his own way. Besides, the Ranger only blew in for a fortnight or so and the blew back out with a handful of Named students in two for one of her infamous 'field classes'. As a way to earn silver stripes of distinction, they had proved most useful.

"That is not untrue," Cordelia conceded.

"Then what?" Catherine frowned.

The former princess decided on honesty.

"I did not want to become involved with someone who was still in love with another," Cordelia admitted. "Akua Sahelian's shadow is yet cast on all your affections, I think."

The Warden drank deep of her cup, then set it down.

"I think I'll always be a little in love with her," Catherine Foundling admitted. "And I'm not sure I want to surrender that part of me. It shaped who I've become."

Cordelia waited. The but, though unspoken, had resonated loudly.

"It's not something that eats me day to day, though," Catherine said. "I don't go to sleep thinking of what might have been. It's just something about me, like the colour of my hair or the lines on my face."

Not that she had anywhere as many of those as Cordelia. The Warden still looked in her late twenties, and likely would for centuries yet.

"Sometimes you do have a touch of romance about you," Cordelia mused, "though it seems largely accidental."

"I am who I am," Catherine Foundling half-smiled. "I don't pretend otherwise."

And that was, Cordelia admitted to herself, true. In these affairs, the other woman was an open book. And though it still felt like there was too much of an encroachment, too much of Catherine already shared, looking upon that open book she found that she liked what she saw.

"Mhm," Cordelia said. "You truly do have luck with wine, my dear."

Catherine's eye sharpened.

"Do I?" she said, leaning back into her seat. "I wonder what that might mean."

The fair-haired woman drained her cup, then rose to her feet.

"It means," Cordelia Hasenbach gracefully smiled, "that we will get to find out how long you might keep my interest, Catherine."

She got no argument. She had not expected one.

—

Common Thaumaturgic Theory had existed in research scrolls and private correspondences for the better part of a decade now, but its formal unveiling was still something of a ceremony.

Though the Lord Hierophant's involvement made it a subject of interest to even rulers, it was ultimately a matter of scholarship and so none attended in person save for Chancellor Sargon – whose unflagging support for Cardinal College and the magical wing of it in particular was well-known. Even the growing commercial rivalry between the city and the Confederation over the artefact trade had done nothing to cool the relations.

Diplomats only politely listened to the impatient explanation given by the infamous Senior Lecturer, some of them disappointed by the plain speech given. Last year's juicy scandal of the man being revealed as the deity of an Ashuran love cult he had been a member of for many years had raised hopes for some scurrilousness. The scholars that accompanied the diplomats, however, were riveted. In the wake of the speech ending, Lecturer Hiram stepped forward to handle the divide between the learned and the uninitiated.

"Though it may seem abstract that the existence of a universally common most basic denominator has been proven, there are practical applications," he explained. "It might be best to think of it as the basic building block of all magic having been discovered."

He paused for effect.

"To accomplish this, it was necessary to be able to measure such a thing," Lecturer Hiram continued. "We have created artefacts capable of this, and in doing so created the necessity for a new unit of measurement that shall be named the 'thaum'."

The cleverest of the diplomats grasped the implications, but the young man spelled out the implications for the rest.

"Ladies and gentlemen," Lecturer Hiram said, "we have made magic quantifiable for all existing branches of sorcery. Enchantment and artefact crafting will now be no more difficult than smithing or weaving. A new age of sorcery has come upon us."

Cordelia Hasenbach, standing in the back, smiled as she considered how foreign sales of the measuring artefacts – certain to continue until national mages figured out how to reproduce them – would be yet another source of coin for Cardinal's treasury. Common Thaumaturgic Theory would remain the formal name, in the years to come, but as these things always went a shorter name stuck.

The Masegan theory of magic.

—

Twenty-four years after the fall of Keter, Lady Intendant Pickler died.

The Intendant of Works did not die young, as far as goblins counted things, but neither did she die as old as some of Matron lines did. Years of hard living and a collection of wounds had taken their toll, hastening her passing. Her funeral was well-attended by some of the great names of the continent, though not as part of any diplomatic effort. She has simply been loved by many of them. That evening twin stars shone in the sky, and the Warden stayed alone on Concord Bridge to overlook the great city sprawled below.

Providence and Calamity came calling, as she had thought they might.

"I thought you two only came at turning points," the Warden idly said, leaning against the balustrade.

Enchantments prevented the wind from crossing the threshold, leaving only a beautiful view.

"We do," Yara of Nowhere shrugged. "But then you're thinking of retiring, aren't you?"

The Warden did not deny it. The lack of a clear successor was a mark against the idea, but Cardinal and the Accords could be run without a Warden. It was the reason its ruling council existed, as there was no guarantee the Name would always be held.

"It's too early," Akua Sahelian said. "None of those might succeed you are ready."

"I'm not sure that's an argument against it," the Warden admitted.

"The Accords have to be able to hold without her holding their hands," Providence agreed. "Otherwise they're not really rules – just her authority made manifest."

"The Accords are not yet worn deep enough," Calamity disagreed. "A generation was raised knowing them but they are still fresh to Calernia's memory. She must stay until they are a bedrock."

The Warden almost laughed.

"The angel and the devil on my shoulder," she said. "Only you're neither and a little bit of both."

And she made her choice, looking down at the city she had seen grow from nothing. A little further yet, she thought. It was still too early to rest. When she turned they were both still there and her eyes found the woman she had once known as the Intercessor.

"You seem better," the Warden said.

"It has proved more interesting than I'd thought," Yara of Nowhere admitted. "Having someone else changes things."

"But you don't think it'll last," Catherine Foundling said.

"It will," Providence said. "For decades or centuries or a millennium. But it won't last, Catherine. Nothing is forever."

"Then take heart, Yara," the Warden said. "You are not nothing."

Providence's answering smile was mocking, a hatchet that would never be more than half buried. But when she vanished, Akua remained behind. That could not have been done without agreement, for that was the nature of the Fetters.

"Seven years," Akua Sahelian said.

"Felt like more than that," Catherine admitted.

"I understand," the golden-eyed woman said, "that you have taken a lover."

"Listening to rumours?" the Warden half-smiled.

She did not deny it. Neither did Akua.

"I still have evenings with Indrani sometimes, when she visits," Catherine said. "Not as often but still. We have an understanding over that."

Lycaonese mores were not flexible, but Cordelia had spent many a year among Alamans and in private their ways allowed much. Her lover had permission of her own, though she rarely used it. The lack of jealousy had been refreshing.

"And if I were to tell you I have bargained for a night?" Akua slowly said.

"I would tell you I bargained for one as well," Catherine smiled.

The tension in the air thickened even though neither of them had moved.

"It might be the last time we see each other," Akua said. "The opportunities are... rare."

"I figured," Catherine softly replied. "So let me say goodbye properly."

It was a long night but still felt all too short.

—

Thirty years after the fall of Keter, Hakram Deadhand came to Cardinal.

It was no longer the half-finished creature of its infancy, now turned into a rising city-state whose place at the crossroads of Calernia drew throngs of hopeful to. Already near twenty thousand dwelled there, and the number would only grow. He had changed no less than the city, for it was Hakram who had come to Cardinal and not the Warlord. He was no longer that, having passed down the mantle to his successor Anker Bluemane. Troke's daughter would do well as Warlord, having turned her clan's reputation around and tightened the alliance with the Red Shields and the Howling Wolves.

For all that he was thousands of miles away from the Steppes, in some ways going to Cardinal felt like coming home. It was, he thought, the people that waited for him there. Aisha and Juniper, settled there a decade ago with their pair of adopted boys – one Taghreb, the other an orc. Masego, the perennial Senior Lecturer whose longstanding relationship with the famous wandering Ranger was scandalously scandalous. And Catherine Foundling most of all, who welcomed him with a warm embrace.

"Finally decided to retire, have you?" she teased.

"I could use something to keep my hands busy," Hakram admitted.

"I'm sure Cordelia will find something," the Warden amusedly replied. "She has a way with that."

"I'm sure," he gravelled, cocking an eyebrow suggestively.

Speculation of the true nature of the relationship between the Warden and her seneschal had been ongoing for many a year now, varying from simply very affectionate to them being secretly wed. Lady Cordelia seemed, if anything, to enjoying encouraging wildly different rumours.

"I don't want to hear that from you," she snorted. "How many kids have you got now?"

"Seventeen," Hakram shrugged.

He had raised few of them himself, as many had been born to strengthen alliances and not out of any particular affection. His three by the only lover he had never ended his time with were the only ones he was truly close to.

"My youngest by Sigvin's a student at the College," he said. "I've been meaning to look in on him."

"You'll have the time, I imagine," his friend smiled.

"Nothing but, Catherine," Hakram Deadhand smiled back.

—

Forty-three years after the fall of Keter, Hanno of Arwad died.

The Eater had risen, the ancient Horned Lord leading the Chain of Hunger through shard of Twilight to ravage the Free Cities even as Anaxares the Hierarch appeared in Nok and stirred rebellion against its hard-handed High Lord. The horde of ratlings overran the great walls of Delos, but for the second time in his life the White Knight came to the city's defence. He died slaying the Horned Lord, saving the better part of a hundred thousand people from certain death.

Hanno of Arwad died smiling, regretting little of the life he had lived.

His passing was mourned by as many souls as there were grains of sand.

—

Forty-eight years after the fall of Keter, Queen Vivienne Foundling's funeral was held.

It was, all agreed, the end of an era. The greats of Calernia gathered in Laure to pay their respect, even old Chancellor Sargon who was finishing up his second mandate. Vivienne the Wise had been the last survivor of the Woe, most agreed, though some insisted that since no new Ranger had risen Lady Indrani was still out there somewhere. Whatever the truth of that, the passing of the queen felt to many like the end of the revered generation that had won the War on Keter. The crown prince of Callow, Edmund Foundling, had insisted on his mother receiving full honours before his own coronation and so remained a prince as he welcomed the dignitaries.

It did nothing to weaken his authority, to the displeasure of the northern barons. Marshal Abigail, returned from her ninth retirement after her vineyard was burned down by an unseasonable lightning storm, stood firmly behind him and the Army of Callow behind her. Neither could there be question of disloyalty from the two great Callowan orders, not when the prince had served for years in the Broken Bells under old Grandmaster Talbot. And should that not have been enough, or even the enduring popularity of House Foundling across the kingdom, then the Knight Errant's presence as his former page's side would have even the most ambitious too wary to try anything.

Arthur Foundling, perhaps the most famous knight since Hanno of Arwad, rarely returned home but word of his deeds regularly trickled back. The Order Errant's acceptance of orcs into its ranks in the wake of the campaigns against the Half-Horn Lord in the marches had enraged some, but who could argue with the triumphs of the knights that had slain the three Necromancer Princes of Hainaut and crushed the riders of the Brocelian's infamous Fae Chevalier?

The procession carrying the queen's bier passed through the streets on the way to the palace, the people of Laure coming in droves to bid their farewell to the only ruler most of them could remember. Only Foundlings, royals and orphans both, held up the bier save for a single exception. The Warden herself, Sapan the Archmage. The queen was said to have been fond of Catherine Foundling's successor, in their few shared years as rulers. Prince Edmund's eulogy was heard by half the city, royal mages trained in Cardinal spreading his voice through clever spellwork.

"My mother," Edmund Foundling said, "will cast a long shadow."

He sadly laughed.

"The Woe all did, in their own way, but it is my mother's all of Callow will live in for centuries to come."

He was a skilled speaker, Edmund, but it was the sincerity of it that reached the people.

"There are few left who remember the days before the Black Queen, when we lived under Praes – now our closest ally, for all our squabbles over trade."

Laughter, some jostling, and none denying something that would have sounded sheer madness half a century ago.

"More remember the days after it, when a kingdom had to be rustled up out of thin air as enemies beset us all on our sides."

Old soldier gave grim nods, the elders of wars now passed into legend. How quickly the world moved on.

"Yet it is the days that came after the wars that made us who we are today. The peace, the struggle to stand in the world as more than an army and a cause. To rebuild villages burned, to uphold fair laws and punish the unjust. To bring prosperity to all, not only nobles."

The prince's voice grew quiet.

"It was those days of peace that decided our place in Calernia, and my mother was queen's own peace."

He shook himself, as if gathering strength.

"Today we come to bury Vivienne Foundling, but she goes to rest knowing our place was found. That we stand as proudly in peace as we did in war, that Callow is a land who need envy none other."

Edmund Foundling swallowed.

"There is much I could say of the woman who raised me, but that is a son's grief and it is a prince that speaks to you today. So instead I will bury a great queen, and hope that wherever she is she can hear me when I say this-"

The prince smiled.

"It is our turn carry your torch," he said. "And I promise you it will burn even brighter when we pass it to our children."

Laure filled with the sound of cheers and weeping, as Callow marked the death of a queen and the rise of a king. And as the noise crested, in a dingy old tavern Dockside a barkeep who'd closed her tavern for the afternoon let out a low whistle.

"He's a pretty good speaker, your boy," Catherine Foundling admired.

"Audrey's better, but she gets too clever sometimes," Vivienne Foundling replied. "I'm glad he was born first."

Her back ached. Even with Hierophant arranging a corpse that would pass for hers she'd had to sneak out of the palace, and these days she was an old woman. More so than Catherine bloody Foundling, who barely looked forty even that because she'd spread her gift around.

"Fill my tankard, wench," the former Queen of Callow ordered. "The beer is terrible, but what else should I expect from a dive like this?"

"Eh, get it yourself," the other former Queen of Callow replied. "And this is a respectable establishment, I'll have you know. The drinks are imported."

"From where, a mud pit?" Vivienne skeptically replied.

"Well, the Green Stretch so you're not actually that far off," Catherine admitted.

She was saved from a further verbal flaying by the arrival of the others. Indrani had barely changed over the years, only her face and figure maturing, and Masego had not changed at all since Keter. The one that stood out, though, was Hakram. Who had begun to age after putting down the Name of Warlord, enough that he had been as old as her until he 'died', but now looked much as he had in his prime.

"Are we drinking?" Indrani grinned.

"We are Dockside," Masego flatly said. "I refuse to sit down."

"The beer is bad enough I'm surprised she was able to sell this place," Hakram grumbled.

And the familiarity of it had her tearing up, silly old woman that she'd become. Catherine her took her hand gently.

"It'll be all right, Viv," she said. "If you're not ready to go..."

"I am," Vivienne said. "It's not that. My children are grown and my husband dead. Edmund doesn't need me looking over his shoulder as he grows into a king. It just..."

"Feels like coming home," Hakram softly said.

Even after all these years, the depth of their understanding still surprised her.

"That's because you are," Catherine Foundling smiled, and Night roiled.

A gift had been given Catherine once by goddesses that had, in their own way, grown to love her. A Mighty's lifespan, centuries ahead of her and more. And after many years of studying the Night, she had learned to share that gift. Night flowed into Vivienne's veins, cool but pleasant, and she felt herself change. Years return to her, time's ravages turning back until she was in her prime again. As Hakram had been, when Catherine shared a third of her gift with him.

"There," her friend smiled, like it was nothing.

Like she'd not just given back her youth, thrown away a third of her lifespan so that Vivienne might live it out instead. When the tears came this time she did not fight them. None mocked her, though, and instead she found arms going around her as the Woe reunited at last.

It was good to be home.

—

They bought a boat in Arwad and first boarded it in the early hours after dawn, which naturally was the moment it all went awry: in other words, at the very beginning. As the years had proved, this was a sadly typical turn of events.

"It's a ship," Masego heatedly objected. "A ship, not a boat."

Papers signed by the shipwright attesting to that, legal property and the name of the Heady Wind being changed to the Inevitable Doom were waved in the face of the others. A sudden but comprehensive bout of blindness preventing anyone from acknowledging this in any way.

"It floats," Indrani insisted. "It's a boat."

"The words do rhyme," Vivienne noted. "It checks out."

Motherhood had not softened Vivienne Dartwick. It had, if anything, added some spikes.

"I feel like I ought to have asked before getting on," Hakram gravelled, "but one of us knows how to sail this boat, right?"

"I know you did that on purpose, Hakram," Masego bit out.

He gestured sharply at the sky, wind gutting out and stranding them less than thirty feet away from Arwad's foreign docks. Not a single one of them paid attention to the increasingly angry people on said docks gesturing at them.

"I'm sure Cat could offer us a wise ruling over it," Indrani slyly suggested.

She then tugged at her collar to reveal her collarbone and offered the woman in question an exaggerated wink. Nearly five decades of occasionally sleeping with Catherine had changed Indrani from a terrible seductress to a proficiently terrible seductress, something only people with appalling taste could possibly enjoy. Catherine Foundling was such a creature, sadly, but in this case her friend's highly shoddy feminine wiles were to be of no avail.

"I don't do rulings anymore," Catherine informed them. "I'm retired, let go of the reins and all that."

Four skeptical gazes were turned onto her.

"Is that so?" Vivienne doubtfully said.

"Don't give me that tone," Catherine said, wagging a finger at her. "You know what? Wherever we go, I don't even want to be in charge. Someone else can do it this time."

The others conferred.

"She'll crack before the day is out," Indrani said. "I'll put coin on it."

"The day?" Vivienne snorted. "She won't last all the way out the harbour. Ten ducals on that."

"I'll take that," Hakram mused. "Pride will make her stick it out at least that long."

"I can hear you, you know," Catherine peevishly said.

"Five denarii she becomes captain before nightfall," Indrani offered.

"I will take that bet," Masego proudly said. "It is my name on the papers, you have been had."

"Mutiny has been the doom of many a boat, Zeze," Hakram told him.

Masego's flesh eye narrowed.

"Have you forgotten I can make your own hand hit you?" he said.

"They used to call it tyranny when I said things like that," Vivienne said, sounding happy. "Now I get to threaten people again. I've been looking forward to that."

"Come on," Catherine loudly complained. "You're all sure I'll go mad with power but she says stuff like that and no one bats an eye?"

On the docks behind them a company of armed guards arrived on the dock, escorting a bearded mage. The Ashuran gestured at the boat, but whatever the spell had been meant to accomplish it ended up setting his beard on fire instead. Masego turned and fixed the mage with a steady look. He began to back away slowly.

"Catherine's insatiable hunger for power aside," Hakram idly said, "I have to ask again because I am getting somewhat worried by the lack of answer. Someone does know how to sail the boat, right?"

His bone hand started slapping him on the back of the head, making the tall orc yelp and as he tried to wrestle it down.

"As captain of this ship," Masego proudly said, "I order you to your stations."

Indrani raised her hand.

"Question," she said.

"Yes," Masego allowed.

"Do we have assigned bunks?" Indrani asked.

"Yes," he happily told them. "And designated seats for meals. I have also brought assigned readings. Most of them are things you should know but are inexplicably still ignorant about, but I understand that is not always enough."

He gave them all a confident look that the students attending General Theory of Magic had learned to live in terror of and those few who took Deicide & Applied Blasphemy had learned to look forward to. It was most commonly known as 'Lord Hierophant Trying To Help'.

"So I have obtained recreational books," Masego said. "Which I will also be expecting reports about."

There was pause.

"Some of them," he confided, "are of nautical theme. I thought it would fit our journey thematically."

There was another pause. In the distance behind them, a squad of mages in blue robes formed up on the docks. Archers were lined up behind them and a guard officer was shouting at the boat, not that it made a difference for anyone on it.

"I'm sorry, Masego," Catherine sighed. "I'm going to have to usurp the captaincy of this ship."

"Yes," Vivienne cheered. "That's ten ducals for me."

Masego pouted.

"I should have known your insatiable hunger for power would get the best of you," he sadly said.

A tone that would have had greater effect had he not spent the last several decades using it whenever he was denied a funding increase or permission to make the laws of Creation wince.

"We can still do the assigned readings," she told him, and he perked up.

"Really?"

"Vivienne can," Catherine specified. "Because she fucking crossed me."

"Hey," Vivienne protested. "Do you think I'll just-"

"Indrani," Catherine called out, "if you bully Vivienne into obeying me, I'll pay you five ducals."

She fully intended to get these out of ten that had been bet against her. The long acquaintance of Cordelia Hasenbach had added a touch of biting irony to natural Callowan spite.

"I've done worse for less," Indrani cheerfully agreed.

"-agree you should be in charge?" Vivienne adjusted without batting an eye. "Because I do. Good to have you back, Catherine."

That left only the one. Hakram was still struggling not to his own head, as Masego had forgot to end the spell, so Catherine laid a gentle hand on his arm.

"I'll make it stop," she said.

"Please do," he grunted, wrestling down his wrist.

"I'll make it stop," she continued, "if you stop pretending you don't know how to sail this boat."

A pause.

"I was pulling Indrani's chain," Hakram said. "She wasn't sure whether she was the one supposed to learn or not because she spilled beer over her letter."

"Hakram, you gossipy bitch," Indrani protested. "I told you that in coincidence."

"You'd think they would have learned by now," he mused.

Catherine, magnanimous in victory, got Masego to end the spell and Hakram to move the steering wheel. The wind was released not long after, Indrani climbing up the rigging to the crow's nest, beginning an inevitable countdown before she got bored and shot a seagull under the thing pretence of acquiring fresh meat. Vivienne disappeared under the deck to hide her assigned readings before she could be made to read them, while Masego chased away the blue-robed mages on the docks by bespelling them to start kicking each other whenever they tried to use magic. Years of exposure to Indrani had, sadly, eroded his sense of humour into a strange and violent creature.

Hakram and Catherine moved to the back of the quarterdeck. Hakram too the steering wheel while she stood back, finding wakeleaf to fill her pipe with. Moments later she was puffing away at it, the acrid smoke rising up in curls.

"We're a little late for the tide," Hakram noted. "We might not make it out of harbour before it turns."

"Oh," Catherine Foundling smiled, looking at the sky where a star lay unseen, "I think luck might end up on our side."

It had been many years since she had last seen Akua Sahelian, but never so many as to forget.

"I suppose we're due some," Hakram chuckled.

Wind picked up, a warm breeze carrying the salty taste of the sea with it. It tasted like a promise long overdue.

"So where to?" Hakram asked, hand on the steering wheel.

Catherine considered that for a moment. They would cross the Tyrian Sea in time, on that they had all agreed. But there was no need to hurry, was there? They had earned a little time before they sailed away into the unknown. So as she leaned back against the side of the ship, Catherine Foundling offered her oldest friend a smile.

"Surprise me," she asked, and into the rising sun they sailed.

That's it, huh....One of the best stories I've ever read, recommend to me by one of my best friends. Thank you, E.E.

hue hue

I will cry then reread everything to cry again.

Errata you are a great writer and I want to know if you have any future project in mind abdullah

They have a new series here <https://palelights613694448.wordpress.com/>

Aotrs Commander

Thank you for the time and effort, EE, for this remarkable story. Should this ever be released in print (as I believe was rumoured once to be), I would love to place the guide on my shelf; but until that point, I can only, with regret, offer to you my thanks.

I commented back in the early chapters of book 1 (I think it was at sometime around book 3 or 4 were being written?), but I can count on the fingers of one hand that I have EVER encountered characters I actually relate to, but the Guide managed (not consistently, but that is more than... Pretty much any other work of media I can think of has ever managed.)

It has been some time to catch up. I left off during the break before the last book (since Patreon is not an option for me) to come back later when the dust settled. (Coming as it did in the middle of lockdown, as everything faded out of reach it also... Stung a bit, if I am brutally honest, through no fault of yours.) But I come I did, and finished in something of a burst, as, like when I started, I was able to binge, which added a certain symmetry and satisfaction to reading it whole. (I technically should have done some work today, but as my holiday begins tomorrow, I decided I wanted to burn through the last chunk..)

Endings are difficult to get right, but this one was managed magnificently. I leave now satisfied, if perhaps a little melancholy (would that I had my own band of five), as the Woe sail off into the sunset.

Aotrs Commander

Thank you for the time and effort, EE, for this remarkable story. Should this ever be released in print (as I believe was rumoured once to be), I would love to place the guide on my shelf; but until that point, I can only, with regret, offer to you my thanks.

I commented back in the early chapters of book 1 (I think it was at sometime around book 3 or 4 were being written?), but I can count on the fingers of one hand that I have EVER encountered characters I actually relate to, but the Guide managed (not consistently, but that is more than... Pretty much any other work of media I can think of has ever managed.)

It has been some time to catch up. I left off during the break before the last book (since Patreon is not an option for me) to come back later when the dust settled. (Coming as it did in the middle of lockdown, as everything faded out of reach it also... Stung a bit, if I am brutally honest, through no fault of yours.) But I came I did, and finished in something of a burst, as, like when I started, I was able to binge, which added a certain symmetry and satisfaction to reading it whole. (I technically should have done some work today, but as my holiday begins tomorrow, I decided I wanted to burn through the last chunk..)

Endings are difficult to get right, but this one was managed magnificently. I leave now satisfied, if perhaps a little melancholy (would that I had my own band of five), as the Woe sail off into the sunset.

Estelulu

I used to follow this every week until near the conclusion when I didn't want it to end. Finally got myself to read through all of the highs and lows of the conclusion. Man was that a ride.

Thank you for the satisfying ending. Grateful for the closure.

Anonymous

damn, I'd love a sequel detailing their adventures across the tyrian sea, mostly because I'm still damn curious about these global powers that are talked about, especially the gnomes!
